Their advantage on matters of state policy at stake that year proved far more decisive. By exploiting state issues, Democrats had won the governorship in 1847. In 1849, internal divisions among Whigs over antimonopoly protests against the notorious Joint Companies (the Camden and Amboy Railroad and the Delaware and Raritan Canal) had reduced Whig majorities in both legislative chambers.⁶⁴ During the subsequent legislative session, Whigs divided over railroad bills designed to challenge the Camden and Amboy's monopoly of rail traffic between Philadelphia and New York City, thereby allowing the Democratic minority instead to fashion a general railroad incorporation bill that carefully protected the privileges of the Joint Companies. Whig legislators' ineffectual performance discredited the party and infuriated opponents of the monopoly, who had supported Whigs in 1849 to break it.

Much more closely affiliated with the Joint Companies than the Whigs who had sided with them, Democrats had no intention of focusing their 1850 campaign on state transportation policy. Their state platform emphasized other reforms that had traditionally united Democrats and divided Whigs: substitution of general for special incorporation laws and the imposition of unlimited liability on stockholders and directors; abolition of property-holding requirements for local officeholders; taxation of the face value of stocks and bonds at rates equal to the assessed value of real estate; increased debtor exemptions; and improved common schools.

That this agenda, on which Whigs remained resolutely mum, gave Democrats the initiative during 1850 became clear in the contrasting gubernatorial campaigns waged by the two parties. Democratic papers praised their candidate, George Fort, for consistently championing every plank in the Democratic platform during his recent service in the state senate. In contrast, Whigs lauded their candidate, John Runk, for his votes in Congress against the Democratic measures of 1846. The sole state matter Whigs mentioned was the last Whig governor's success in retiring the state debt between 1844 and 1847. Self-consciously and suicidally, Whigs portrayed themselves as the party of the past; eagerly, Democrats crusaded as the party interested in New Jersey's future.

The upshot was a smashing Whig defeat. Fort, with almost 54 percent of the vote, rolled up the largest statewide majority in New Jersey's history against Runk. Whereas Whigs had won four of the five House seats in 1848, Democrats won four of the five in 1850 while running 6,000 votes ahead of Whigs in the popular vote. In the legislative races, Democrats drew even with Whigs in the senate and converted a six-seat Whig majority into a four-vote Democratic majority in the house. Then, as if to scourge Whigs for their inept handling of the antimonopoly issue, Democrats used their majority on the joint ballot in the 1851 legislative session to replace Dayton in the Senate with Democrat Robert F. Stockton, president of the infamous Joint Companies.⁶⁵

To some extent Democrats' pro-Compromise stance contributed to this rout, as the reelection of incumbent Democratic Representative Isaac Wildreck with 67 percent of the vote indicated. But the election had been less a referendum on the Compromise than on the future of state policy. Whigs themselves admitted that their ostrich-like refusal to address current state issues cost them the governorship, the legislature, three seats in the House of Representatives, and one in the Senate, losses the congressional Whig party could ill afford. As the Whig Newark Mercury bluntly confessed: "The Whigs passed mealy-mouthed resolutions squinting everyway and meaning nothing. Democrats went before the people with reforms, cheerfully and confidently." Then, with extraordinary prescience, the same editor continued: "It is frequently said that . . . the Whig party is a National party, founded upon great principles and not to be disturbed by all the local questions of policy that may arise." Such a stance was a profound mistake. To succeed, Whigs must "plant" themselves "upon those questions of State reform which are justly assuming such prominence in the minds of the people." In the 1830s, in fact, the Whig party had established itself only where it took concrete and distinctive stands on state as well as national issues. The failure to do so in the 1850s was suicidal.⁶⁶

Only minor statewide offices were contested in Pennsylvania that October, but the stakes for Whigs were far higher than in New Jersey. Pennsylvania had twenty-four congressmen compared to New Jersey's five, and in 1848 Whigs had carried fourteen districts to the Democrats' eight. Because Lewis C. Levin, the Native American from Philadelphia County, usually cooperated with House Whigs, while the Free Soiler David Wilmot was sharply at odds with his Democratic colleagues, Whigs effectively held three-fifths of Pennsylvania's seats heading into the 1850 elections. Retaining that margin constituted their primary challenge. In addition, should Whigs recapture the legislature in October, they could fill Daniel Sturgeon's Senate seat.⁶⁷

Outside of Wilmot's fiefdom along the New York border and in one or two other districts, the Free Soil party did not seriously threaten Pennsylvania's Whigs. Indeed, Wilmot's refusal to seek reelection in 1850 effectively disbanded the Free Soil organization, although it hardly diminished antislavery sentiment in northern and western areas of the state. In Pennsylvania the biggest menace to Whigs' chances lay in Democratic resurgence and in their own divisions between Governor Johnston and Senator Cooper, and between supporters of Clayton's proposal for a new Taylor Republican party and its orthodox Whig opponents. To reunite their party and defeat the Democrats, Whigs hoped to focus the 1850 campaign on the Democratic Walker Tariff, which, they iterated and reiterated in platforms and private correspondence, had prostrated the state's mining and manufacturing interests and destroyed jobs. 68 In 1850, however, the tariff lost its edge as a Whig weapon. Aside from other problems, such as Democratic attempts to ignore the issue and evidence that workingmen in some industrial areas no longer believed Whigs' claim that higher duties meant higher wages and more jobs, Congress did nothing about tariff rates that year. Southerners, including prominent Whigs, insisted that all slavery questions be resolved before Congress considered anything else, and the session ended with no action. Infuriated by the logiam in Washington, Whig Representative Moses Hampton of Pittsburgh announced at the end of May that he would resign because Southerners, obsessed by their own monetary losses in the form of fugitive slaves, refused to help solve the problems causing far greater financial losses in Pennsylvania's industries. Anger among Pennsylvania Whigs at southern intransigence was intense, but they could hardly blame Pennsylvania Democrats for a blockade their fellow party members helped construct.⁶⁹

Thus the sectional issues and compromise proposals that consumed the entire congressional session became the only available platform for Pennsylvania Whigs, yet on those issues they were divided. Johnston, his allies, and the Clayton Whigs from Philadelphia supported the Taylor plan and opposed further concessions to Southerners. Cooper's allies and the disgruntled regulars who idolized Clay promoted compromise proposals from early on, even to the extent of joining Democrats in mass Union meetings. Whig congressmen elected in 1848 before Johnston took office did not necessarily belong to either faction. Pennsylvania Whigs who voted for prosouthern bills in the House were friendly to Cooper and Clay, but all of those who voted against them were not Cooper's enemies or Johnston's allies. Rather, they voted their consciences or on what they believed was Whig sentiment in their districts.

Whig foes of compromise heavily outnumbered its Whig proponents in Pennsylvania. At the June state convention, prior to Taylor's death, Johnston's forces crushed the attempt by Cooper/Clay Whigs to endorse Clay's omnibus in the state platform. Instead, they demanded California's untrammeled admission as a free state. Even Fillmore's elevation to the presidency and his tilt toward compromise failed appreciably to reverse the imbalance of forces. In July and August, observers reported that outside of Philadelphia, at least three-fourths of the state's Whigs continued to favor Taylor's plan and to execrate compromise; even a few Philadelphia Whigs vilified Cooper for "prostrating himself to the dark spirit of slavery."

The adamant hostility to compromise expressed by the Pennsylvania Whigs' state platform, their press, and most of their congressmen who voted contrasted dramatically with the Democrats' record. With the possible exception of Iowa, no free state's Democrats advocated appeasement of southern demands so unabashedly as Pennsylvania's. The Democrats' state platform in June explicitly demanded "compromise of the existing controversy" and the establishment of formal territorial governments in Utah and New Mexico on the basis of popular sovereignty. Daniel Sturgeon worked unceasingly for compromise in the Senate, and the eight Pennsylvania Democrats in the House voted for compromise as consistently as humanly possible. Six of the eight, indeed, cast affirmative votes for the Fugitive Slave Law. During the spring, moreover, Democratic state legislators pushed for repeal of an 1847 state law that forbade incarceration of suspected fugitive slaves in the state's jails, and only Whig control of the senate stopped them.⁷¹

On the record, in sum, the differences between Pennsylvania's Whigs and Democrats over conciliating the South were crystal clear. Thus its October elections offered a far better chance for a partisan referendum on that issue than did those in Iowa, Ohio, or Connecticut. That promise, however, was not realized. The refusal of the Cooper/Clay Whigs to adhere to the state platform and the defection of some Whig papers from the anti-Compromise camp presented Whig voters with a discordant cacophony, not a clear call to action. Whatever the partisan polarization in the legislature and Congress, moreover, the passage of the Compromise by mid-September rendered Whigs' state platform obsolete. Concessions had been made to the South in the Mexican Cession and on fugitive slaves; the new Whig national administration and the most prominent Pennsylvania Whig in Washington endorsed them. Even denunciations of Cooper could not reverse those cold facts.

Opposition to pending measures in Congress was one thing; a refusal to recognize the legitimacy of laws on the statute books was another. Although public opinion is impossible to gauge at this distance, most Pennsylvanians, including many Whigs, apparently regarded the settlement of the seemingly interminable sectional debate, no matter what its concessions to the South, with relief and were prepared to acquiesce in it.⁷² The Whig state committee's September address to the electorate outlining the issues in the impending elections, in sharp contrast to June's platform, said nothing whatsoever about the Mexican Cession or the Compromise. In effect, that silence invited Whigs in individual congressional districts to take whatever stand they wished on the Compromise. Clearly, however, many Whig leaders believed that taking any position at all would be beating a dead horse.⁷³

Even without detailed analysis of the Compromise's impact on Whig contests for nomination and the subsequent elections in all twenty-four congressional districts, certain generalizations are possible. First, Fillmore's administration rarely, if ever, intervened to help pro-Compromise Whigs or to defeat their rivals. Just as it provided no aid to Cooper by removing Taylor's appointees, it did not shift printing contracts to pro-Compromise Whig papers until after the elections were over. Six of the eight anti-Compromise Whig congressmen won renomination, and the other two did not seek it. Second, as Cooper bitterly complained, in contrast to Fillmore's hands-off approach, Johnston apparently tried to punish pro-Compromise Whigs. None of the three pro-Compromise Whig congressmen was renominated, but Chester Butler, who died five days after the congressional session closed, was replaced as the Whig nominee by Henry Fuller, Cooper's closest ally in the state.⁷⁴ Third, Whig congressional candidates' ability to take any position they wished on the Compromise did not guarantee that they could draw an advantageous contrast with Democrats. In Pittsburgh and surrounding Allegheny County, for example, where antislavery sentiment was strong and outrage at the Fugitive Slave Act universal, both Whig and Democratic candidates pledged to work for its immediate repeal if elected. Conversely, even where Whigs ran anti-Compromise incumbents, it is not clear that those men emphasized their opposition or criticized Democratic support for the measures during the campaign. Some, like Thaddeus Stevens of Lancaster County, surely did, but others, like Andrew Jackson Ogle, just as certainly did not.75

In many districts, in short, differences between the parties became blurred, and Whigs had to rely on the residual loyalty of their voters or the popularity of individual candidates. In most places, that was not enough. As in other northern states, Pennsylvania's turnout rate plummeted in 1850, even below that in the off-year state elections of 1849.⁷⁶ Whigs suffered disproportionately from this voter apathy. The total statewide Whig vote dropped by 26,700 (17.1 percent) between the congressional elections of 1848 and 1850 compared to a Democratic decline of 14,320 (9 percent), and Whigs carried only nine districts compared to fourteen in 1848. Whigs, in fact, lost six districts they had won in 1848, and three losers were anti-Compromise incumbents, while they carried one Democratic district only because multiple Democratic candidacies allowed a Whig to win with 42 percent and a considerably smaller absolute vote than his defeated predecessor had amassed in 1848. The inability of Whigs to mobilize their supporters also left the legislature securely in Democratic hands, and in 1851 it replaced Sturgeon with another Democrat, Richard Brodhead.

Many former Whig voters evidently refused to support Whig candidates whose stand on the Compromise they disliked. In the Lancaster County district, where observers reported a significant Clay following during the congressional session, for example, the vote for the vehemently antislavery, anti-Compromise Whig incumbent, Thaddeus Stevens, fell by 3,864 (40.4 percent) between 1848 and 1850, even though Stevens still won. Similarly, the Whig candidate substituted for Charles Pitman in Cooper's home district garnered over 3,000 (30.9 percent) fewer votes than the popular Pitman had in 1848. Two of the defeated anti-Compromise Whig incumbents, John Freedley and Jesse Dickey, represented districts near Philadelphia where pro-Compromise sentiment was strong. Both suffered declines of over 20 percent in their vote between 1848 and 1850, again suggesting that pro-Compromise Whigs refused to reelect opponents of the settlement.

The failure of more incumbents either to seek or to win renomination probably hurt Whigs even more. With two marked exceptions, the incumbent Stevens and Henry Fuller, Chester Butler's successor, incumbent candidates generally retained a larger proportion of the previous Whig vote than did new men who replaced the victorious Whig candidates of 1848.⁷⁷ This pattern suggests that Whigs depended heavily on the skill and popularity of individual candidates to bring out voters and that in some districts the pool of talented leaders was dangerously shallow. In Pittsburgh, which had experienced numerous strikes by disgruntled workers, for example, Whigs foolishly replaced the disgusted Moses Hampton with Thomas M. Howe, a wealthy banker and Episcopalian vestryman, who perfectly fit the silk-stocking, smugly self-righteous image that Democrats loved to paint of Whigs. Howe's vote was almost 30 percent smaller than Hampton's in the entire county and a stunning 45 percent lower in Pittsburgh, where he was best known.⁷⁸

No case better illustrates the dependence of Whigs on capable leadership, however, than what happened in Samuel Calvin's district, which also illuminates how the jealousies endemic to the typical multicounty rural districts of the nineteenth century produced shortsighted decisions. Running west of the Susquehanna River opposite Harrisburg in central Pennsylvania, the district consisted of five counties. Blair and Huntington, the two most populous ones, normally returned Whig majorities; Democrats usually carried Centre, Mifflin, and Juniata by equally steady but smaller margins. The result was a closely balanced congressional district where Whigs needed to mobilize their full vote to win.⁷⁹

A resident of Hollidaysburg in Blair County, Calvin had carried the district in 1846 and again in 1848. He was lionized by his Whig constituents because of his eloquent protariff speeches on the House floor and his implacable opposition to prosouthern concessions in 1850. Thus they were stunned when Calvin announced in late July that he would not run again. Calvin's decision is understandable. He disagreed with the new Fillmore administration on the Compromise. He had been able to accomplish nothing for his constituents on the tariff. And he was suffering through the longest congressional session in history in the suffocating heat and humidity of Washington. News that a few disgruntled Whigs outside Blair County were grumping that Calvin should step aside for a new man was the final straw. Nonetheless, most Whigs in the district begged Calvin to reconsider. They knew that the party needed an experienced champion to win and that Calvin's withdrawal ensured a debilitating scramble for the nomination as each county in the district plumped a favorite son. 80

When Calvin refused to reconsider his decision, Whigs from Huntington County insisted that they deserved the nomination, especially since a Blair Whig was the nominee for state senator. Calvin's correspondents argued that, aside from Calvin himself, the strongest Whig contender would have been Andrew Curtin, later Republican governor during the Civil War. But Curtin had a fatal flaw. He was ruled out—indeed, he ruled himself out—because he lived in Centre, a Democratic county. According to questionable Whig logic, the congressional nominee had to come only from one of the two Whig counties. Blair had had its chance with Calvin; now it was Huntington's turn.⁸¹

Thus a Huntington Whig named McCulloch received the Whig nomination for Congress, even though Whigs outside that county considered Curtin "a far abler man." McCulloch was not disliked by Whigs elsewhere in the district. He simply failed to rouse enthusiasm, and that failure proved fatal when apathy among Whigs had been noted even before Calvin withdrew. In October, McCulloch polled almost 2,000 fewer votes than Calvin had in 1848, a drop of 21 percent. Democrats carried the district, and Whigs lost another vote in the House.⁸²

Many elements undoubtedly contributed to Whigs' defeat in 1850, but to the extent that Pennsylvania's congressional elections constituted a referendum on the Compromise of 1850, they indicated that most Pennsylvanians, certainly the majority of those who bothered to vote, accepted it. Only one pro-Compromise incumbent, the Native American Lewis Levin, lost, but his defeat was hardly a punishment for his voting record. Instead, rival nativists who had been excluded from federal jobs because of Levin's alliance with Customs Collector Lewis united with anti-Johnston, pro-Compromise Cooper and Clay Whigs to run a separate Whig candidate who siphoned votes from Levin. Other nativists apparently voted Democratic to bring down the domineering Levin.⁸³ All five Democratic incumbents easily won reelection, and Democrats retained two districts where incumbents declined to run. In contrast, three anti-Compromise Whig incumbents were defeated, and victorious incumbents saw their vote drop.

Whig defeat only exacerbated factional warfare within the party. Governor Johnston, the chief instigator of internal bloodletting, sought reelection in 1851, and his lieutenants retained federal and state jobs. After October, pro-Johnston Whig editors continued to pummel Cooper, the Compromise, Fillmore's administration for attempting to enforce it, and Whigs who joined Democrats in Union rallies. The administration could hardly suffer such impudence in silence, as it had between July and October. Thus it shifted printing contracts to pro-Compromise Whig papers.⁸⁴

Pennsylvania's very location forced the administration to reverse its hands-off stance. Pennsylvania was the likeliest destination of fugitive slaves from Maryland and Virginia, and enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Act immediately became the acid test for southern Whigs of the administration's commitment to southern rights. Johnston's well-publicized record of hindering the pursuit of fugitives and his determination to run an antislavery campaign for reelection in 1851 infuriated Southerners and deeply embarrassed Fillmore. In 1851, unlike 1850, the administration would have to confront Pennsylvania's ambitious Whig governor.⁸⁵

Unlike the situation in most northern states, the Democratic/Free Soil alliance continued to flourish in Massachusetts. The two partners usually ran separate candidates for Congress and governor against the Whigs, but three-way races could deny Whigs the absolute majorities necessary for election. Whigs had been deprived of two House seats in 1848 by Free Soil candidates, and outrage at the Fugitive Slave Act that Webster championed and Fillmore signed guaranteed that Free Soilers would run congressional and gubernatorial candidates to punish the Whigs in 1850.86 If no gubernatorial candidate won a majority, the election would be thrown into the legislature, where incumbent Whig Governor George N.

Briggs had triumphed in the two previous years. For Whigs, the legislative elections of 1850 were the rub, for Democrats and Free Soilers backed common, not separate, candidates in those races. This Coalition, as it was dubbed, had made considerable gains in 1849 even before Webster's pro-Compromise course handed it a golden issue. Because of the state's peculiar system of representation, moreover, small towns that had been prohibited from sending men to the legislature in 1848 and 1849 could do so in 1850. Antislavery sentiment as well as hostility to Whiggish Boston smouldered in such towns; hence, the chances were good that the Coalition would capture control of the legislature. If so, Whigs knew well before the election, they would give the governorship to a Democrat and Webster's Senate seat, to which Winthrop had been temporarily appointed, to a Free Soiler.⁸⁷

Anti-Compromise Whigs, a heavy majority of the party outside of Boston, wanted to meet this threat by denouncing the fugitive slave law and demanding its repeal. At most, to conciliate Webster's friends, they would ignore the Compromise and Webster's record altogether and plant themselves "upon the old Whig platform and stand as we have stood perfectly erect."88 Webster and his vengeful Boston allies spurned that strategy, for the "old Whig platform" was openly antislavery. Webster considered the state party "sorely afflicted" with abolitionists and quasi-abolitionists, who were "afraid to act a manly part, lest they should lose the State Govt." and who courted antislavery voters through "wicked & abominable" attacks on the Fugitive Slave Act. Infuriated by Whig criticism of his course, solicitous of the southern Whigs' sensibilities, and indignant at the threats from Massachusetts Whigs to resist enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Law, Webster sought vindication. Although Fillmore refused to strip federal patronage from Webster's antislavery Whig foes like William Schouler, Charles Hudson, and Philip Greely, Jr., Webster and his agents nonetheless made it clear that the administration would wage war against any Whigs who continued to flay the Compromise. Webster's opponents, in turn, believed that such an about-face meant "the destruction of the Whig party."89

Inevitably, therefore, the two sides collided over Whigs' platform and over congressional and state legislative candidates. Both camps agreed that Briggs, who had won annually since 1843, should run again, but the platform and the address to be issued by the state convention on October 1 were another matter. When Webster urged his friend Edward Everett to go to the Worcester convention and "nationalize the Whig party," he wanted more than an endorsement of the national administration and acquiescence in the Compromise. He wanted an acknowledgment that the South deserved the concessions given it and that the Compromise was too essential to saving the Union to be tampered with. He wanted any hint of antisouthern or antislavery language expunged. His intemperate friends wanted still more—an expression of praise for Webster himself.⁹⁰

Everett had no chance of winning such concessions, for Webster's foes controlled the state committee, which wrote the platform and address, and the convention itself. Everett later reported that, to preserve harmony, the documents stressed what Whigs agreed on—the need for a higher tariff and the danger of Coalition control of the state—and kept divisive matters "in the shade." Nonetheless, they hardly fulfilled Webster's hopes, and the resolutions issued later by the district conventions were even worse.⁹¹

Rather than portraying the laws for the Mexican Cession as a fair intersectional accord, the state platform and address presented them as northern victories over the South. California had been admitted despite the "unwarrantable resistance by a portion of the South." The Texas boundary settlement had kept New Mexico free, and Whig congressmen would make sure that "the present free territories of New Mexico and Utah" were quickly admitted as free states like California. Because of these triumphs, they gloated, "The protracted contest for an obnoxious 'equilibrium' has terminated, and the preponderance is on the side of freedom." The Slave Power that had controlled the nation's policies for so long "has now surrendered its sceptre to the advancing destinies of free States."

Even the few words of praise for southern Whigs offended Webster. To balance a brief expression of confidence in Fillmore and "his distinguished cabinet" in the platform, the address lavishly praised Taylor's attempt to keep slavery out of the Cession as evidence that at least some slaveholders could be trusted by northern Whigs, an encomium that galled Webster. While the state platform closed by calling the Whig party "a National and not a local party" and praising southern Whigs "who have stood by its fortunes with as much firmness and devotion as Whigs of the North," a district convention lauded "those National Whigs of the South" who regarded slavery as "a curse."

On the matter that most concerned Webster and over which Whigs were most divided, the new fugitive slave law and its enforcement, the state platform was utterly silent, while the address criticized the absence of jury trials. District conventions were less reticent. They blasted the act as "arbitrary, unjust, and cruel"; they demanded its immediate amendment or repeal; the Essex County convention even called on the state government to appoint agents to protect Massachusetts citizens against its enforcement.⁹⁴

Grumping to Everett that "the proceedings at Worcester could have been worse," Webster was, in fact, furious. The state's Whigs, he raged to Fillmore, "act a most mean part in the courtship of abolitionism." To bring the state party in line with the administration, Webster's faction now set out to secure Whig congressional nominations for pro-Compromise men—or National Whigs, as they called themselves. In August, during special elections to fill three vacant House seats, Webster dictated his strategy for congressional races: "I much prefer to see a responsible Democrat elected to Congress than a professed Whig, tainted with any degree of Free Soil doctrines or abolitionism."

The August races previewed the later struggles for the fall Whig nominations. For Winthrop's old Boston seat, Webster's friends prevailed twice by nominating pro-Compromise conservatives whom all Whigs in Boston then elected over Democratic and Free Soil opposition: first, Samuel Eliot in August, who arrived in Congress in time to vote for all the measures, including the Fugitive Slave Act, and then William Appleton, a member of the famously rich textile clan, who pledged support for the Compromise and the administration. Conversely, in both August and November, Websterites refused to vote for the Whig nominee in the Essex County district, Charles Upham, whom Webster considered an abolitionist. "If all those, who disapproved of Mr. Webster's 7th of March speech, are to be sacrificed," complained Upham after Websterite abstentions denied him the necessary majority in August, "where will the administration find support in Massachusetts?"

In addition to Appleton, Webster was initially satisfied with only two other Whig nominees for the fall: George Davis, who replaced George Ashmun, Webster's chief congressional lieutenant during the 1850 session, in the sixth district, and the third district's incumbent, James Duncan, whom Webster had pressured to support at least the Texas-New Mexico bill. Almost everywhere else the Websterites were routed. Upham was nominated again for the full term in the second district. Orin Fowler, who had received both the Free Soil and Whig nominations in 1848, accepted both again in 1850. The replacements for incumbents Julius Rockwell and Joseph Grinnell, John Z. Goodrich and Zeno Scudder, were staunch antislavery, anti-Compromise men. And no Whig, regardless of his opinions, stood a chance against incumbent Free Soiler Charles Allen in the Worcester district. Webster considered all these men wild-eyed fanatics.⁹⁷

The most closely watched and most symbolically freighted nomination fight, however, occurred in the eighth district. Its enormously popular Whig incumbent, Horace Mann, who had won over 80 percent of the vote in 1848, had not just voted against every concession to the South. He had infuriated Southerners by his repeated tirades against slavery and slaveholding as sinful. Applauding this record, the district's Free Soilers nominated Mann as their own candidate in 1850. The question was whether its Whigs would also renominate him. To do so would signal their contempt for Webster, the Fillmore administration, the South, and the Compromise.

Anti-Webster Whigs on the state committee and in Boston urged Whigs to choose Mann to keep the seat in Whig hands. The district's Websterites, insisting on a pro-Compromise administration loyalist, surprisingly secured the nomination of Samuel Walley instead. But even they justified that choice on the grounds that Walley had a better chance than Mann of securing southern Whig consent to amending the "arbitrary, unjust, and cruel" Fugitive Slave Act. And even on that platform Walley had no chance of defeating Mann, a certainty that may explain why anti-Webster Whigs allowed his nomination as a gesture toward party harmony.

Websterites enjoyed greater success in naming Whig candidates for the legislature in and outside Boston. That success spelled trouble for Winthrop, as he well knew. Though Winthrop, like his Senate colleague John Davis, supported the Texas boundary bill, he angered Webster by voting against the territorial bills and the fugitive bill. "I am literally between two fires," Winthrop explained to his Baltimore friend John Pendleton Kennedy. Although he got along with Webster himself, Webster's "peculiar friends have a basilisk eye for all who did not follow the track of his 7th of March Speech. On the other hand, the Free Soilers do not forget my old opposition to them, nor forgive my vote for the Boundary bill." Whoever won control of the legislature, in short, Winthrop knew his days in the Senate were numbered. Whigs were in such disarray because of divisions over the Fugitive Slave Act, indeed, that Winthrop doubted that "Massachusetts Whiggery will survive the shock which this and other things have given it."

Winthrop's pessimism proved well founded. In the three-way gubernatorial contest, Briggs' plurality of the vote slipped below 47 percent, the worst Whig showing since 1842. Despite impressive gains, Democrats still won less than three-tenths of the total. Because Coalition candidates won decisive majorities in both legislative houses, however, the election of Democrat George S. Boutwell was assured. Culminating a surge that had been building for two years, the Coalition converted an eight-seat senate minority into a ten-seat majority and a thirty-five-seat deficit in the house into a forty-eight-seat advantage. Winthrop's fate seemed sealed.⁹⁹

The outcome of the congressional elections was almost as bad. After 1848, Whigs held eight seats to the Free Soilers' one; the fourth district was never represented because stubborn Free Soil support for John Gorham Palfrey in repeated runoffs denied Whigs the necessary majority. In November 1850, only five Whigs triumphed—Appleton, Davis, Duncan, Fowler, and Scudder. Mann crushed Walley, who garnered less than a third of the vote, while the hapless Whig Ira Barton ran even more poorly against the victorious Free Soiler Allen. Three races yielded no winner in November, but in special runoff elections the following May those districts chose representatives. Democrat Robert Rantoul, Ir., defeated Upham in the second district, in part because Webster Whigs abstained. In the seventh district, Goodrich, who openly scorned Webster, prevailed, and in the long-unrepresented fourth district the Whig Benjamin Thompson, whom Websterites considered tolerable if undistinguished, finally secured the necessary majority to defeat the persistent Palfrey. When the smoke had settled, in sum. Whigs held seven of ten, not eight of nine, seats, their House delegation would be sharply split between Webster and anti-Webster men, and the majority of the entire Massachusetts delegation execrated the Fugitive Slave Act. 100

Bay State Whigs did not wait until May to blame each other for their losses. Upham castigated Webster for exercising "a fatal influence" in New England because he whored after southern support for the presidency, while Schouler's Boston Atlas faulted Whigs for alienating antislavery voters by failing to attack the Compromise and Fillmore's administration vigorously enough. In contrast, pro-Webster sheets like the Boston Advertiser attributed the setback to Whigs' refusal to embrace the Compromise and the administration more enthusiastically. Snorting that the election was "all bad," Webster himself ascribed the result to Whig opposition "to the peace measures of the last session." Again he called on fellow cabinet members like Corwin to strip the Atlas of federal printing contracts, and again he urged Fillmore to sack Greely and Hudson. Equally significant, the furious Webster, who had returned to Massachusetts, vowed personally to oversee enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Act to prove to the South that northern members of the administration would do their duty. As elsewhere, in sum, electoral defeat only exacerbated intraparty animosity. In terms of rancor, depth of penetration into the cadre of local party leaders, and damage inflicted on Whigs' electoral fortunes, however, divisions among Massachusetts' Whigs paled next to those in New York.101

VIII

At 5:18 P.M. on September 27, a Fillmorite frantically telegraphed the president from Syracuse, site of New York's Whig state convention: "Affairs at a crisis. Convention split open. Granger and your friends gone to another house." This unprecedented rupture destroyed efforts to hold New York's Whigs together that had begun as soon as Taylor died. Negotiated by intermediaries between Thurlow

Weed and Fillmore like Comptroller Washington Hunt and Governor Hamilton Fish, that truce rested on a mutually agreed-upon formula to deal with political reality. 103

Level-headed leaders from both Whig factions recognized how much rode on the 1850 elections. They also saw clearly that, in the words of one Fillmore advisor, "we shall need all our strength" to have a chance in November because Barnburner and Hunker Democrats had reunited behind a pro-Compromise platform and gubernatorial candidate Horatio Seymour. 104 The importance of the 1850 elections for New York's Whigs cannot be exaggerated. Barnburner defections to Free Soil candidates in 1848 had allowed Whigs to win an astounding thirty-two of New York's thirty-four House seats, and retaining as many of them as possible was a top priority. The legislature to be elected in 1850 could also replace Daniel S. Dickinson in the Senate; to do so, Whigs had to reverse the slide they had suffered in 1849. Important state administrative positions were also at stake. Although Democrats had captured four statewide offices a year earlier. Whigs still controlled the three most powerful ones—governor, lieutenant governor, and comptroller. The first two of these, as well as a seat on the canal commission would be filled in 1850, and if Whigs were defeated, they would lose control of the all-important canal board that annually distributed contracts for repairs that lubricated the Whig machine along the entire length of the Erie Canal.

With so much at risk, Weed, Fillmore, and their saner allies implicitly agreed to mobilize full party strength. Having insulted Fillmore in July, Weed quickly abandoned any thought of packing the state ticket with Sewardites, causing the Albany patrician Daniel D. Barnard to crow a week before the convention that "the [Albany Evening] Journal of last evening shows signs of cowering." Fillmore, for his part, followed Alex Mann's advice to conciliate anti-Compromise Whigs in order to win the elections. After replacing Levi Allen with William Kethcum in the Buffalo customs house, he steadfastly resisted demands to decapitate additional Sewardites like Palmer V. Kellogg, Thomas Clowes, and Lewis Benedict.¹⁰⁵

The linchpin of this tenuous rapprochement was agreement that Washington Hunt should run for governor. Having worked with Hunt in Albany, Weed believed he held him in his pocket. Conservatives were equally confident that he was a loyal Fillmore man. "He is your friend, no matter what may be said to the contrary," wrote one from New York City. Fillmore congratulated Hunt on his impending nomination weeks before the convention met, and he carefully heeded Hunt's warning not to sack any more Sewardites. ¹⁰⁶

Aside from his understandable determination to secure Buffalo's congressional nomination for his law partner Solomon G. Haven, Fillmore's commitment to party unity behind the state ticket was sincere. Four days prior to the state convention he informed Daniel Ullmann, a New York City delegate and an ardent Clay man, that Ullmann must not offend anti-Compromise Whigs at Syracuse. "They are good men and we want them all." Yet Fillmore's willingness to make peace with Sewardites had limits. He would brook no attack on the Compromise or on his congressional Whig allies who had supported it. Samuel P. Lyman explained this quid pro quo to Weed after a conversation with an administration insider. To preserve party unity, Fillmore was willing to let "by gones... be by gones" with respect to patronage, but he would not tolerate a platform that offended southern Whigs. Fillmore condemned "any [such] measure" as indicating a ''willingness to sacrifice the Whig party of the Union for the sake of a temporary triumph in the State of New York.'' 108

Fillmore's conservative Whig allies from the Hudson Valley were even more adamant about the platform. Since 1847 they had complained that Seward's speeches, the state platforms Weed had dictated, the legislative resolutions of 1849, and the galling Geddes resolutions of 1850 all proved that Weed and Seward were intent on "abolitionizing" the Whig party to court first Liberty and then Free Soil voters. Convinced that this Sewardite tack would have disastrous consequences for the national Whig party and the Union itself, conservatives saw Fillmore's pro-Compromise stance as both correct in principle and splendidly useful for dethroning Weed and capturing control of the state organization. They could now make the case to rank-and-file Whigs that the Union's safety required repudiation of Seward's "Higher Law" stance and endorsement of the Compromise. Conservative Whigs across the state, Barnard told Fillmore, were determined "that the Convention shall do right."

A pro-Compromise platform was precisely what Weed and his subalterns across New York would not accept, for they genuinely hated slavery and the possibility that it might spread westward. In part, nonetheless, this refusal did reflect expedient calculations about what was necessary to win. To them victory in New York was more important than the feelings of southern Whigs or of the administration. Both before and after the state convention, correspondents urgently warned Weed that Whigs could mobilize their supporters only by renouncing the Compromise and vigorously attacking the Fugitive Slave Law. Moreover, they did hope to attract the remaining Free Soilers, whom Barnburners had abandoned to return to the Democrats. As one of these indignant survivors wrote Weed six days before the convention, "Can't you give us a plank from the Buffalo [Free Soil] platform in your resolutions at Syracuse on the 26th, & put one of the old Whig Liberty men on for one of the minor offices?" If Whigs did so, "we will float 15,000 strong to the Whig ship... & you know very well to which wing of the Whig party the new accession would be attached." Weed could hardly ignore so tempting a prospect. 110

Deep-seated principle, however, primarily motivated Sewardite foot soldiers who attended local meetings and went to Syracuse as delegates. Such men, Hunt admitted to Fillmore, "consider the gratification of their particular views more important than the success of the party and the administration which embodies its principles." Hunt was only half right. To such men, Fillmore's administration emphatically did not represent the principles of New York's Whig party. Those principles had repeatedly been spelled out since 1846 in local resolutions and state platforms, in speeches on the hustings, and in legislative resolutions of instruction to the state's congressional delegation—adamant opposition to slavery and its spread west of the Nueces River. Far from embodying those principles, Fillmore and House Whigs who had supported or abstained on the Texas-New Mexico bill, the Utah bill, and the Fugitive Slave Act had betrayed them. Traitors deserved repudiation, not endorsement.¹¹¹

This principled dispute between conservatives and Sewardites over the Compromise's propriety, as well as the sheer number of offices at stake, guaranteed ferocious factional struggles over legislative and congressional nominations, no matter what agreements had been reached on the state ticket. New York's Whig congressmen had divided almost down the middle on the crucial resolution of the Texas boundary dispute. Seward had opposed the Texas bill in the Senate; on the House's Texas-New Mexico bill, New York's huge Whig delegation had divided thirteen for and sixteen against, with three abstentions. Scorning support of this bill as a betraval of Whig principles, Sewardites sought to block renomination of Fillmorites like David A. Bokee, James Brooks, J. Phillips Phoenix, Walter Underhill, Robert Rose, and William Duer, the last of whom announced his refusal to seek renomination even before the congressional session closed. Simultaneously, Fillmorites forced Spaulding out of the race for the Buffalo nomination; pressured Abraham Schermerhorn of Rochester to support the Texas-New Mexico bill to secure renomination, a capitulation that infuriated Sewardites in Monroe County; and vigorously challenged Orsamus B. Matteson and other anti-Compromise incumbents. Meanwhile, the two New York City freebooters—Subtreasurer John Young and his toady, Customs Collector Hugh Maxwell, over whom Fillmore exercised no control—sought to nominate conservatives for the legislature in New York and to commit the Syracuse platform to the Compromise.112

Struggles over congressional and legislative nominations did not necessarily ensure a breakup at the state convention. Combatants on both sides, in fact, expected that successful nominees, no matter what their faction, would get the support of all rank-and-file Whigs if the party could maintain a semblance of unity. They wanted to control, not disrupt, local organizations. The threat to harmony at Syracuse came from elsewhere. Local politicos in Weed's faction planned to endorse Seward's course in the Senate as faithfully expressing New York Whigs' principles. By implication, such a move would condemn Fillmore and pro-Compromise Whig congressmen. Neither Weed nor Seward orchestrated this spontaneous effort, but both realized that it could disrupt the convention.¹¹³

Informed of the plan by Ullmann, Fillmore responded, "I should regret to see any controversy in the convention about the relative merits of our Whig Senator and myself." Because he considered himself "at the end of my political race," he cared nothing about a personal endorsement in the platform. "But not so, with those gallant men who have stood by me, and by the country in the darkest hour of its peril. . . . Pray do not let them be sacrificed." To avert the implied condemnation of his friends, Fillmore sent William Duer to Syracuse as a delegate from Oswego County, even though Congress had not yet adjourned. With him Duer carried the platform Fillmore wanted, a platform Hunt assented to before the convention opened.¹¹⁴

Leaders from both factions descended on Syracuse to marshal their respective delegates. Weed set up shop in a hotel room. He was aided by federal officeholders like Kellogg, Clowes, Benedict, and Syracuse's own postmaster. Horace Greeley, who had once favored the Compromise but now deprecated its abandonment of free-soil principles, roamed the convention floor. To aid Duer, Young and Maxwell came up from New York City; they were joined by other Fillmorites: Alex Mann of Rochester, James Kidd and Jerome Fuller of Albany, and A. K. Hadley of Troy. All had previously determined that if Sewardites made "mischief," they "shall be defied, & the proper remedy resorted to."

On September 26 the hopelessness of preserving harmony immediately became apparent. The two sides squabbled over the preliminary organization and even over the hour to start the convention. Though Weed's forces had a clear majority, they acquiesced in Francis Granger's selection as permanent chairman, just as Fillmore's friends hoped. After deploring the party's divisions and begging for reconciliation, Granger appointed an evenly balanced platform committee that included Duer and John T. Bush from the Fillmore camp and Andrew Bray Dickson from Weed's. After deadlocking for hours over Duer's demand to present the platform he had brought with him, one Sewardite relented, and Duer read it to the delegates that night. The convention then recessed until the following morning without taking any action on the platform or nominations.

The salient planks of Duer's platform, which he insisted was dictated by Fillmore, praised Fillmore's virtues and declared that New York's Whigs had "the utmost confidence in his administration of the government and his maintenance of the well-known principles of the Whig party." They iterated New York Whigs' adamant opposition to slavery extension and their belief that Congress had a right to prohibit it. Nonetheless, they "acquiesce[d]" in the Texas-New Mexico boundary bill and the creation of territorial governments for New Mexico and Utah "in the confident belief that those acts of conciliation will result in the exclusion of slavery" and "restore cordial sentiments and fraternal ties" between the sections. Finally, they admitted that the state's "Whig Senator and Representatives" had adopted "differing and antagonistic views" on the Compromise measures, but praised "the honest purposes and patriotic motives" of both sides and their toleration for each other. About the explosive Fugitive Slave Law, the platform was silent.

In sum, Fillmore's support for compromise was said to represent Whig principles, Seward was not named, prosouthern concessions were accepted without protest, and votes for and against them deserved equal respect. Sewardites could not stomach that litany. With undoubted input from Weed and Greeley, during the night's recess they drafted alternative resolutions and plotted procedural strategy.

At the start of the next morning's session William Cornwell, a Sewardite from Cayuga County, immediately moved to nominate the ticket before debating the platform. Despite vigorous objections from Duer and Bush, the motion carried by a voice vote. Duer, Bush, and nineteen other Fillmore men then announced that they refused to participate in nominating candidates because the platform had not yet been debated, let alone adopted. The majority brushed aside their complaints and proceeded to select the ticket. Hunt easily won the gubernatorial slot with eighty-seven of eighty-nine votes cast. For lieutenant governor the convention chose the eminently conservative George J. Cornell of New York City rather than Fillmorites' favorite, Hadley of Troy. Not closely affiliated with Webster or Clay Whigs in New York City, Cornell, like his good friend Hamilton Fish, stood independent of all factions. Ebeneazer Beach, another neutral, was nominated for canal commissioner.¹¹⁷

As soon as the ticket was completed, again before a single word had been uttered in defense of Duer's platform, Cornwell proposed a substitute set of resolutions. He accepted six of Duer's planks word for word and other language that was noncontroversial, but he zeroed in on the points of disagreement. Cornwell's revisions contained a resolution dealing exclusively with the state's House delegation. It expressed confidence in their motives but omitted any reference to their disagreements or their mutual tolerance of them. Like Duer, he praised the admission of California, but he intransigently rejected acquiescence in the territorial bills. Pointedly emphasizing the omission of the Wilmot Proviso from them "on the assumption that Slavery is excluded by other causes," Cornwell's plank proclaimed "the solemn duty of Congress" to impose the Proviso on those territories at "the first indication" that slavery would be introduced into them. (Like Duer, significantly, Cornwell omitted any reference to the new Fugitive Slave Law.) Whereas Duer offered separate resolutions praising the deceased Taylor and lauding Fillmore, Cornwell combined references to the two men in a single plank. By citing the "clear judgment and Roman firmness" Taylor had displayed "at a crisis in our country's history," Cornwell, in contrast to Duer, alluded to Taylor's opposition to Congress's compromise. The remainder heralded Fillmore's "experience, fidelity, and enlightened statesmanship." The omission from this plank leaped out at the delegates. Praise for Fillmore's "maintenance" of Whig principles had been jettisoned.

The bombshell came with the plank that immediately followed the reference to Fillmore. In an obvious attempt to highlight the contrast, it read:

Our thanks are especially due to the Hon. William H. Seward for the signal ability with which he has sustained in the United States Senate, those beloved principles of public policy so long cherished by the Whigs of the Empire State, expressed in State and County conventions, as well as on the votes and instructions in our State Legislature. . . .

This was not exactly an endorsement of the "Higher Law" speech, but the message was loud and clear. Seward in opposing concessions to the South, not Fillmore and his congressional Whig allies who supported them, represented New York's Whigs.

Pandemonium erupted once Cornwell finished reading his resolutions. Their adoption, warned Duer, meant disruption of the Whig party. At Duer's request, Cornwell's substitute platform was returned to the platform committee, which was doubled in size to include Cornwell as well as staunch Fillmore men like Ullmann and James R. Thompson of Rochester. Attempts at compromise failed. The committee deadlocked 8–8 over the rival platforms, and the decision went to the convention floor. Duer demanded an up-or-down vote on Cornwell's substitute, again warning that adoption would rupture the party. Unfazed, Weed's forces carried it, 75-42. Duer then demanded separate roll calls on the individual planks. When the resolution praising Seward passed 76-40, Duer and his thirtynine supporters began to march ostentatiously out of the hall. Granger, who remained in the chair and who had presided with scrupulous fairness, then gave a short speech calling this the saddest day of his political career, relinquished his gavel, and followed Duer and his colleagues out the door. Granger, in short, did not lead the exodus, but forever afterward the bolters and other Fillmore men would be called Silver Grays in reference to Granger's hair. The remaining delegates, some stunned, others taunting the defeated minority, then named a new state committee dominated by Weed's cronies and adjourned. They did not even bother to name a committee to officially extend nominations to the party's ticket.

The bolters reassembled in another building that night and named Granger as their chairman. The following morning they called for a new state convention to be held at Utica on October 17 and issued an address defending their action. The Whig party in the nation's largest state lay in shambles.

Recriminations flew immediately. The bolters' address laid down a line that would be echoed privately and publicly by Silver Grays up to and beyond the November election. Sewardites had caused the split because they wantonly insisted upon a plank that they knew was offensive to Fillmore and would cause a rupture. Weed's minions wanted "to convert the Whig party of this State into an abolition party, or rather to destroy the Whig party, and build up an abolition party on its ruin." Sewardites intended to reagitate the slavery question by renewing efforts to impose the Proviso on the territories. Silver Grays stood by the Compromise and rejected "all attempts to disturb it." 118

To the contrary, retorted Weed, Silver Grays were engaged in an "insane and incendiary attempt to distract and divide the Whig Party of the Empire State." Hypocritically ignoring the presence of Sewardite patronage holders from across the state at Syracuse, he criticized Young, Maxwell, and Duer for abandoning their official duties in New York and Washington to come to Syracuse to orchestrate a rupture they had planned in advance. "We stand firmly on the Whig platform of 1848," he intoned. Fillmore and Duer had once pledged themselves to uphold its principles. "The Whig party must stand where it stood in past conflicts and triumphs. Any departure, by the Convention, from cardinal principles—any faltering in the path of duty—any Compromise of the cause of Freedom, would have left the Whig party defenceless and naked." Thus Duer, who acted as Fillmore's agent, caused the split. Fillmore ruptured the party because he jealously would not tolerate approval of Seward's course against him. "The Whig party [was] broken and shivered by one whom it has elevated to the highest office in the Republic!"

Pragmatic leaders from both camps understood that restoring party unity before November was essential, but they disagreed about how to repair the breach. Weed, underestimating the anger of many Silver Grays, expected the bolt to fizzle for lack of popular support, forcing the bolters to back the ticket. Neither he nor his allies, therefore, saw any need for concessions. Some Sewardites, in fact, worried mainly that, to appease conservatives, the convention had foolishly omitted any condemnation of the Fugitive Slave Act and that some Fillmorites' support for Hunt's nomination would arouse suspicion of him among antislavery Whigs. To mobilize those voters, they warned, Hunt must publicly denounce the fugitive law, an action that would only further antagonize Silver Grays. 120

Conservatives' reactions varied. Those with Whig nominations like Solomon Haven sought reconciliation in order to bring out a full Whig vote. Washington Hunt and George Cornell were especially frantic. Both, Cornell wrote Fillmore, liked Duer's platform and were prepared to acquiesce in any resolutions adopted at Utica, but they were terrified that Silver Grays would press them to renounce the Syracuse platform publicly. Such a repudiation would turn Sewardites against them and Silver Gray congressional candidates, thus dooming them all to defeat. Hence, continued Cornell, the two had agreed that Hunt should simply announce his acceptance of the nomination, which appeared in Weed's paper on October 2, without any reference to the platform. 121

Fillmore sympathized with the bolters, and on September 30 he withdrew Lewis Benedict's nomination as Albany's postmaster to indicate his displeasure with Weed. But, Fillmore told Ullmann, he would remove no one else until he saw what Weed did. "I am very anxious to save the Whig party of N.Y. entire if I can." Other conservatives, in contrast, were ready to sacrifice the party to ruin Sewardites. Nathan Hall suggested that Silver Grays simply sit out the state election, throw the state administration to Democrats, and thereby strip Weed of state patronage. "A masterly inactivity will I think be the most wise when we get to the polls." Hotheads like Young, Maxwell, and C. B. Stuart wanted all-out war. Such men not only demanded that Fillmore sweep all Sewardites, not just Benedict, out of federal offices. They wanted a new ticket nominated at Utica to "draw out a full vote of the National Whigs." It was "better to have a minority standing upon the National Platform which is right than a majority vote for the Ticket with a Platform that is undefined or totally wrong." 122

This suicidal strategy appalled the vote-seeking Haven. The Utica convention should never have been called; the bolters should simply have protested against the platform and endorsed the ticket. It was foolish to make war on the Weed wing "when they control the power & patronage of this State, controlled its stocks, its banks, & its immense Canal revenues—had all the party organization of the State, and the active politicians in it." Had Fillmore replaced federal appointees with his own men earlier, they would have had the resources to battle for the party's machinery. As it was, "It is impossible for the staid sober men of the State, who attend to their own business, to prevent such active[,] wellfed[,] and reckless 'sons of bitches' from controlling to some extent our nominating conventions." 123

Fillmore agreed with Haven. "I think it madness at this late hour to nominate another ticket," he told Granger. "We have no time—no organization." The Utica convention should therefore readopt Duer's platform and endorse the Syracuse ticket. Hunt and Cornell should not be required publicly to accept that platform, reject the Syracuse platform, or even acknowledge the Utica nomination. "In this way the ticket may be elected, or at all events, we shall save many members of Congress, sheriffs, clerks, assemblymen, etc. etc. which we cannot afford to lose." 124

Conservatives in New York City, particularly wealthy merchants on whom Whigs depended for campaign contributions, however, flatly refused to tolerate a "stealth candidate." They would not support Hunt without knowing where he stood on the Compromise. Private assurances were not enough. Hunt would have to endorse the Duer platform publicly, they threatened, or they would vote Democratic. To appease these intransigents, it was arranged that Hunt would write a public letter to Granger approving the Duer platform in advance of the Utica convention. The convention then would readopt that platform, reiterate the Silver Grays' reasons for bolting the Syracuse convention, and endorse the Syracuse ticket. Diehards who wanted a new ticket insisted on one additional condition—the appointment at Utica of a rival state Whig committee "composed exclusively of Union Whigs!" They would grudgingly support Hunt, but they were determined to demonstrate publicly their continued independence of Weed.¹²⁵

This carefully planned scenario was followed to the letter, although Fillmore was so nervous that hotheads still might go too far at Utica that he sent his personal secretary, Robert Campbell, from Washington to oversee the meeting. Dated October 11 and printed in Whig papers, Hunt's letter to Granger admitted that he had approved of Duer's platform before the Syracuse convention, deplored the party's divisions, and lauded both anti- and pro-Compromise Whig congressmen for their rectitude and patriotism. Even though he personally disliked the Texas boundary agreement and the territorial bills, Hunt said, "we must acquiesce in the constitutional action of Congress." Hunt did not fully support the Compromise, however. Obviously informed by Weed about the restlessness of rank-and-file Sewardites, he also declared, "I deplore the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law, in its present form. . . . It could not have been well considered and needs essential modifications." 126

Delighted by the success of their plans for Utica, Fillmore's closest Silver Gray allies accepted this statement. Even Weed's taunts that Silver Grays were "Leaders without Followers—Officers without Troops" did not dint their confidence that the party had reunited sufficiently to carry the elections and that Silver Grays had remained faithful to conservative principles by issuing their own platform and creating their own state committee. From their point of view, indeed, it was the Sewardites who were crawling in repentance, not National Whigs.¹²⁷

Unity, however, remained elusive. Rumors abounded that Sewardites planned to knife Silver Gray congressional nominees in some districts, while Silver Grays would cut Sewardites in others. Lewis Benedict, the Weed man sacked from the Albany postmastership, traveled to Rochester and Buffalo and openly opposed the election of Schermerhorn and Haven. In the latter district a local Sewardite named Seth Hawley repeatedly challenged Haven at his speaking engagements, charging that Haven and Fillmore had betrayed Whig principles by endorsing the Compromise. So rancorous and vindictive was the feuding that Hamilton Fish wrote Seward in disgust two weeks before the election, "I fear that some of our professing Whig friends are becoming tired of belonging to a party in power. Intolerance seems, in some quarters, to have destroyed reason, & personal hatred, to have become superior to party attachment." After the election, Fish admitted to Fillmore that both sides cut rivals from the tickets they cast. 128

The multiplicity of tickets made available to the electorate, some of which were clearly intended to sabotage certain men, was an even greater problem. While George Cornell was not Silver Grays' first choice for lieutenant governor, for example, he was much friendlier with Manhattan's Silver Grays than with Weed and the Sewardite faction. Prior to the election he complained to Fish that Weed was distributing Whig tickets along the Erie Canal that excluded his name altogether. Cornell was also omitted from a separate ticket distributed by what was left of the Anti-Rent party, a ticket that included Hunt for governor and Barnburners on the Democratic ticket for other offices.¹²⁹

The Anti-Rent ticket, as well as Hunt's denunciation of the Fugitive Slave Act, engendered a last-minute development pregnant with present and future danger to the Whigs. New York City merchants, pressured by southern customers to demonstrate their fealty to the entire Compromise, refused to support Hunt, despite his endorsement by Silver Grays at Utica, and called for a Union Safety meeting to be held at Castle Garden at the end of October. Thousands of normally Whig merchants signed the petition calling this assemblage, but its orchestrators were a small group of men who plotted to break up both parties and to form a bipartisan Union party consisting of pro-Compromise Whigs and Democrats. "They are playing the very Devil here with the Whig ticket & getting up a Union party," wrote one of Fish's correspondents. The plotters included Robert West, the editor of the ostensibly nonpartisan New York Journal of Commerce, who in advance of the meeting prepared a Union ticket consisting of the Democrat Horatio Seymour for governor, Cornell for lieutenant governor, and pro-Compromise Whig and Democratic congressional candidates from New York City and Brooklyn. Among his coadjutators were Democrats, who hoped to line up Whig support for Seymour in November and Dickinson in the impending senatorial election, and the schemers Young and Maxwell, who hoped a bipartisan Union coalition would increase their own chances of winning the Senate seat. Most significant, however, was Daniel Webster, who sent a letter to be read at the Castle Garden meeting praising its organizers as "abject slaves to no party" and pledging that he himself would support that party "whose principles and practice are most calculated to uphold the Constitution and to perpetuate the glorious Union." 130 Attended by thousands, the Castle Garden meeting adopted resolutions approving the Compromise as a "fair" settlement, expressing determination to enforce the Fugitive Slave Act, renouncing allegiance to old parties, and pledging to support no candidate "at the ensuing, or any other election," for state office, the legislature, or Congress "who is known or believed to be hostile to the peace measures recently adopted by Congress, or any of them, or in favor of re-opening the questions involved in them for renewed amendment." This clause targeted Hunt, who had called for amendment of the Fugitive Slave Act, but also Fish, Weed's preferred Whig candidate for Dickinson's Senate seat, who had also denounced the fugitive measure. Upon adjournment, a Union Safety Committee appointed by the meeting then endorsed the Journal of Commerce's Union ticket as the "Anti-Disunion, Anti-Abolition, Anti-Seward, Anti-Demagoguism Ticket." Fully aware of the gullibility of the Whig merchants who had attended the meeting and of the harm it could do Hunt and his own prospects for the Senate, the patrician Fish exploded: "The Castle Garden meeting was the design of knavery. It was the adulterous offspring of political trickery, perpetrating violence upon political ignorance and stupidity. The trickster of the Journal of Commerce determined to set a trap for the benefit of Dickinson and Seymour; so he baited it with the word 'Union'' & drove the game toward it.''131

Though dismal, the election's results were not so bad as many Whigs had feared. Hunt squeaked by Seymour in the gubernatorial election with a plurality of fewer than 300 votes out of over 229,000 cast. Only Hunt's presence on the Anti-Rent ticket produced this small margin, for conservatives in several upstate districts cut him and in New York City he ran 3,500 votes behind Cornell, who was on the Union ticket. Hunt drew about 3,500 fewer votes than Fish had won in 1848 and almost 17,000 fewer than Fillmore had garnered in his losing run for governor in 1844. If some conservatives refused to support Hunt, so did the remaining Free Soilers. Because Hunt had endorsed the Duer platform, they scattered their votes or stayed home. Altogether, the gubernatorial turnout dropped 23,672 votes between 1848 and 1850, while the proportion of potential voters who came to the polls was the lowest of any gubernatorial election since the 1830s. Hunt's undistinguished performance was, nevertheless, the best by any statewide Whig candidate. Cornell and Beach were abandoned by upstate Sewardites; Democrats captured both the lieutenant governorship and the canal commission post. Only Hunt's narrow victory denied them control of the canal board. 132

The backstabbing of Whig candidates on the state ticket was so selective from county to county that Whigs managed to regain control of the state legislature. They retained their two-seat margin in the senate and converted a two-seat Democratic majority in the assembly into a thirty-eight-seat Whig margin. Dickinson's days in the Senate were apparently numbered, but who the Whigs might put in his place remained in doubt, especially as the senate, which voted in separate session for United States senators, was so closely divided and would be the center of Silver Gray strength in Albany.

In contrast, the congressional races were a flat-out disaster. Whigs lost fifteen seats to Democrats, so that the delegation was evenly divided seventeen to seventeen, not tilted thirty-two to two in the Whigs' favor. Democratic reunification was the primary cause of this reversal. Whigs had carried eleven of the fifteen lost districts in 1848 only by pluralities that were often quite small. Once Hunkers and Barnburners supported common candidates in 1850, therefore, Whigs suffered defeat even though they often garnered a much higher proportion of the vote than in 1848. Charles F. Clarke, a staunch Sewardite, for example, won with 39.7 percent in 1848 but lost with 48 percent in 1850; Orsamus B. Matteson, that inveterate Fillmore hater, won with 42.4 percent in 1848 and lost with 49.6 percent in 1850; John Thurman won in 1848 with 42.6 percent, while his successor as Whig nominee lost with 49.2 percent. Viewed differently, Whigs retained nine of thirteen majority Whig districts but only eight of the nineteen they had won with pluralities.

Only eleven incumbent Whig congressmen won renomination in 1850, including four of fourteen pro-Compromise incumbents and seven of eighteen anti-Compromise men. Of the former, three won reelection—James Brooks and George Briggs in New York City and Abraham Schermerhorn, who had been pressured by Rochester's Silver Grays to defect to the Fillmore camp. Other pro-Compromise men were forced off the ticket, although it is unclear how many were replaced by Sewardites. Brooklyn's David Bokee was denied renomination because Staten Island demanded his district's nomination under rotation, and the Whig who replaced him, and won, was probably pro-Compromise, as was Walter Underhill's victorious successor in New York City. While some upstate Fillmorites like Elijah Risley from Chatauqua County and Hugh White were replaced by Silver Grays, it is likely that anti-Compromise Sewardites replaced Duer, John Thurman, and George Andrews on the Whig ticket. 133

The case of J. Phillips Phoenix, a pro-Compromise Whig incumbent whose district encompassed northern New York City and Westchester County, and one of the few Whigs to prevail with an absolute majority in 1848, illustrates both the complexity of the nomination fights and the jealous backstabbing that hindered Whig efforts. Seward's allies opposed Phoenix's renomination because of his pro-Compromise votes, but conservatives also opposed him because he was a corrupt ingrate who had won in 1848 by buying illegal votes and then refused to contribute any of his salary to the party's coffers for the 1850 campaign. When Phoenix loyalists and anti-Phoenix conservatives split at the convention, Sewardites surprisingly captured the nomination for James Bowen of Dobbs Ferry. The furious Phoenix then persuaded another Whig named Rodman to enter the race against Bowen, and Maxwell and Young exerted all their efforts to distribute Rodman rather than Bowen tickets at the polls. Bowen ran last, the total Whig vote was much smaller than in 1848, and a Democrat carried the district with a plurality in the three-way race. 134

Only four of the seven anti-Compromise incumbents won reelection: John L. Schoolcraft, Weed's Albany lieutenant, Henry Bennett; William A. Sackett; and Lorenzo Burrows, who was rumored by Weed's agents in Washington to have sold out to Fillmore after Congress adjourned but who would have been known to his constituents by his solid record of anti-Compromise votes. The others fell victim to reconstituted Democratic majorities and sabotage from Silver Grays. Matteson, who lost by 117 votes out of 15,500 cast even though his own vote increased by 1,617 (26.5 percent) between 1848 and 1850, is a classic case. Despite his antisouthern votes, he fumed after the election, Barnburners and other Free Soilers supported his Democratic opponent. Even worse was the treachery of the Silver Grays, who cast 300 votes for the Democrat, thus costing Matteson a net 600 votes, and who, led by young Roscoe Conkling and the Utica Gazette, openly boasted that they had caused Matteson's defeat.¹³⁵

Some Sewardites who replaced anti-Compromise incumbents as Whig nominees also suffered defections by disgruntled Silver Grays, but most benefited from the anti-Compromise records of their predecessors. 136 As Whig turnout rates demonstrated, indeed, how New York's Whig congressmen voted on the Compromise in September influenced the November results in their districts, whether or not the incumbents themselves ran. Opposition to the Compromise expanded the Whig vote, whereas support for it usually contracted that vote. In the fourteen districts whose Whig congressmen voted for or abstained on prosouthern concessions, Whigs lost an aggregate of 8,663 votes (9.1 percent) between 1848 and 1850, and the four pro-Compromise incumbents who ran again suffered an even larger aggregate decline of 11.9 percent. Altogether, Whigs lost votes in eleven of those fourteen districts, and of the three where they gained votes, the biggest increase came in a district where a Sewardite replaced the Silver Gray John Thurman. Conversely, Whigs gained votes in eleven of the eighteen districts represented by congressmen who opposed prosouthern concessions, and while their aggregate gain in all eighteen was only 3,050 votes (2.7 percent), in those eleven districts it was 6,223 (9.2 percent). In five of the seven anti-Compromise districts where the Whig vote fell, including two carried by incumbents John L. Schoolcraft and Henry Alexander, vengeful Silver Gray abstentions caused the decline, but the biggest losses came in districts where Sewardites refused to support Silver Grays who defeated Sewardites for Whig nominations. John A. King's successor on Long Island ran 736 votes (16.7 percent) behind King's 1848 total and lost. Haven, Fillmore's law partner, who pledged to resist any amendments to the Fugitive Slave Law, carried the Erie County district, but he ran 1,009 votes (13.2 percent) behind Spaulding's poll in 1848 and apparently carried the normally Whig district only with the aid of pro-Compromise Hunker Democrats. 137

The experience of the Sewardite Whig who replaced William Duer in the Oswego district vividly illustrates what an incubus a predecessor's pro-Compromise record could be. Even a fresh candidate, complained one Weed man, could not overcome Duer's disgrace. At every Whig rally Democratic hecklers raised the cry that Whigs could not be trusted by antislavery voters because Duer had voted for Texas-New Mexico and Utah, because Duer had ducked the vote on the fugitive slave bill, because Fillmore had signed that hated law and demanded obedience to it, and because Duer had introduced the pro-Compromise, pro-Fillmore platform at Syracuse. Nor would antislavery Whigs support the party's legislative ticket, for Democrats charged that it was pledged to support Duer for the Senate seat. The upshot of these deadly tactics was that Free Soilers supported the Democrat, while Sewardites stayed home. "Our people were afraid that they should again be deceived," sighed one correspondent. "I found many such on election day & after pressing them to vote, they would say who can we trust, since Duer has turned traitor." Whereas Duer had won with 8,107 votes (48.2 percent), his tarnished Whig successor lost with 7,136 (45.9 percent). "138"

The disparate success rates of pro- and anti-Compromise candidates, and the evidence that both Silver Grays and Sewardites had sabotaged factional rivals, perpetuated the debilitating internal divisions that, almost everyone admitted, had nearly wrecked the party. "Our movements were impeded at every step by internal jealousies and strife," Hunt wrote Fillmore ten days after the election. "The great question for you and me and all of us is to determine whether the Whig party can be preserved." Both Hunt and Fillmore wanted to hold it together, but scores of local politicos did not. With the election's conclusion removing the need for an uneasy marriage of convenience, they preferred divorce. 139

Convinced that Weed and Seward would never jettison their antislavery stance and that conservatives would always writhe under their tyranny inside the party, furious Silver Grays called for a parting of the ways. "The Silver Greys are boisterous—boast that the Whig party is broken up, etc.," an upstate Whig reported to Weed. Many conservatives insisted that Fillmore purge more Sewardites from federal offices, and a few were sacked by the end of the month. Without administration approval, Maxwell fired the few remaining Seward men in the customs house, and the Silver Gray congressman Brooks urged Fillmore to uphold him. "We must either break down the negro party in this city, or all be painted black—and to keep ourselves white, Maxwell must be sustained in all his removals."

More ominous still, as Hamilton Fish warned Fillmore, Silver Grays were "openly advocating the Union of a portion of the Whig party with the Hunker portion of the Democratic party" in the legislature to put Duer or Dickinson in the Senate. Even before the election, Ullmann had warned Fillmore "that there can be no permanent union between the two sections [of the state Whig party]. I am also pretty certain that the Hunker and Barnburner sections of the Locofocos in this State will ultimately assimilate with their respective sections in our ranks." Any such reorganization would doom all hopes of preserving the Whig party, yet by mid-November at least some Silver Grays wanted to push it to fruition.¹⁴¹

After the election, angry Sewardites were equally prepared to let the Silver Grays go—if not go in peace. Silver Grays, they fumed, were an albatross, not an asset, during the campaign. They sabotaged Whig candidates, and their demand that Hunt embrace the Duer platform further reduced the Whig vote. "If the Silver Grays had not endorsed our Ticket, we should have done better," declared one. "Men believed that we were sold to the South, if not to be their slaves, to be their doughfaces which was worse." The Duer platform had ruined Whigs' chances, echoed another. Only continued attacks on the Fugitive Slave Act and slavery extension could save the party. As James Bowen, himself a victim of Silver Grays' treachery, assured Seward, "Without them, we shall move on a harmonious party, & gather strength in every campaign. My only fear is that timid friends will endeavor to make a hollow peace to be broken at a more critical juncture." Alvah Hunt, the new governor's brother, was blunter in a note to Weed: "Give the Traitors Hell hereafter."

IX

By the end of November, in sum, Whigs were more deeply divided than at any other time in their history. The pressure to carry elections had widened, not healed, rifts over the Compromise and patronage. And the elections' results inflicted a grievous, if not yet mortal, wound on the party. Granted, aside from setbacks in Iowa and Indiana, Whigs did surprisingly well in the region where the party had always been weakest—the West. The upsets in Missouri, the comeback in Ohio's congressional elections, the creditable performance in Illinois, and the upsurge in Michigan pointed to a brighter future, and Whigs also stood on the verge of an astounding triumph in Wisconsin. Setbacks in the East and South, however, more than balanced these gains. They lost chances to replace Democratic senators in Pennsylvania and Florida. They had lost a governor and possibly a senator in Connecticut, as well as the governorship of North Carolina and Maryland. New Jersey's Democrats routed them and Delaware's gained complete control of the government, thus costing Whigs two Senate seats. Even in Kentucky and Maryland, where they retained control of state legislatures, they encountered trouble from new state constitutions, as they also would in Ohio and Indiana. Worst of all, Whigs experienced grievous congressional losses in their core New England and Middle Atlantic bastions.

Summary comparisons best reveal the damage. In 1848, Whigs won ten (71.4 percent) of the fourteen governorships contested; in 1850, they captured only three (23 percent) of thirteen. In 1848, Whigs carried eighty two (57.3 percent) of the 143 House races; in 1850, they elected only 57 (42.2 percent) of 135 congressmen chosen. Theoretically, Whigs still had a chance to control the House during the Thirty-Second Congress. To do so, they would have to dominate the congressional contests scheduled for 1851. Since Whigs had won only 30 percent of the House elections in 1849, however, that possibility seemed remote.

More than past history dimmed prospects of a comeback in 1851. Most elections that year would be held in the South, and during 1850 northern Whig candidates almost everywhere denounced the Fugitive Slave Act and the territorial bills, just those features of the Compromise southern Whigs hoped to trumpet as southern victories delivered by the Whig party. Convinced that Fillmore's "Administration has driven their friends to repudiate them to save the party from utter annihilation," most northern Whigs, indeed, contemptuously scorned Fillmore's and Webster's solicitude for southern Whigs' electoral needs. By choosing instead to "make war on this administration to save the Whig party from contempt and scorn," they heedlessly threatened to make the Whig party an object of "contempt and scorn" in South. 144

While southern Whigs enthusiastically praised the attempts of Webster and Fillmore to secure their region's rights, moreover, northern Whigs openly execrated Webster and called on "God [to] save us from Whig Vice Presidents." As the extent of northern Whigs' autumn debacle became clearer, indeed, they no longer waited for Providence to deal with Fillmore. A public dinner for Clayton in Wilmington, Delaware, a Whig meeting in Bangor, Maine, and a Sewardite editorial in a New York paper all arrived at a similar solution. They boomed General Winfield Scott for the Whigs' 1852 presidential nomination to stop Webster or Fillmore from winning the presidency in his own right. By the fall of 1850, therefore, the intraparty struggle over patronage and the Compromise became inextricably entangled with the next presidential race, still two full years away.¹⁴⁵

The administration's Whig opponents had thrown down a gauntlet. Now Fillmore, Webster, and other administration supporters had to meet that challenge. In doing so, they had not only to weigh the strength of contending factions in different northern states and to balance the conflicting needs of northern and southern Whigs. They also had to respond to developments in the South and North that seemed to threaten the existence not just of the Whig party but of the nation itself

Chapter 17

"Fillmore . . . Is Precisely the Man for the Occasion"

"MY ONLY OBJECT IS TO save the country [and] to save the Whig party, if possible," Millard Fillmore assured Hamilton Fish on November 21, 1850. Fillmore wanted no quarrel with angry northern Whigs who vilified him. He shared their hatred of slavery. He understood their outrage at the Fugitive Slave Act, but, he explained, Whig principles regarding the veto required him to sign that deeply flawed law. Most important, because he owed his present position to his beloved Whig party and had no interest in its 1852 nomination, "I should regard any attempt on my part to divide the Whig party as suicidal."

Yet Fillmore's commitment to party reunification clearly had limits. Saving the country, not the Whigs, was his top priority. Northern Whigs, he believed, focused too selfishly on their own resentments and electoral fortunes. They did "not fully appreciate the dangers to which we are exposed from the South, and the infinite importance of setting an example of maintaining the Constitution in all its parts." The fugitive slave law "must be executed" and "sustained against attempts at repeal." Henceforth, he would therefore regard as good Whigs all who "sustain me in sustaining the laws." Whigs who opposed that effort were enemies of the Whig party "and would be treated accordingly."

By dangers from the South, Fillmore meant more than southern Whigs' electoral welfare, about which he was genuinely solicitous. As soon as Congress admitted California, hotheads in several southern states initiated formal steps toward secession. To blunt that threat, Fillmore was prepared "to bring the whole force of the government" to sustain the fugitive slave law in the North. Its determined implementation might do more than undermine popular support for secession. As Fillmore told Fish, enforcement would set an example; it would show Southerners that, if necessary, he would use force to stop secession in order to save the country.³

This course only earned Fillmore execration from many northern Whigs, who pooh-poohed talk of secession and blamed Fillmore's needless capitulation to southern pressure for their rout at the polls in 1850. Tens of thousands of other Whigs, however, recognized that Fillmore was pro-Union, not a prosouthern doughface, and they esteemed him precisely because they took disunionism seriously. Some were northern conservatives who increasingly called themselves National Whigs to indicate their devotion to the country, not just to northern Whigs' electoral success. Most resided in the South and the border states. "You know Fillmore, and therefore know how safe a man he is for us at this time," Baltimore's John P. Kennedy gushed to Richard Pakenham, the former British minister. "Plain, direct, honest, and manly, with a sound judgment and great discretion, he is precisely the man for the occasion."

Even some of Fillmore's greatest admirers, however, no longer believed that his twin goals of saving the country and the Whig party were compatible. To secure the former, they advocated abandoning the latter for a bipartisan Union party of pro-Compromise Whigs and Democrats. Infuriated by defiant Whig state conventions in New York and Massachusetts, Webster thundered that "a new arrangement of Parties is unavoidable" and that "there must be a Union party." Kennedy argued that bipartisan congressional support for compromise pointed to "the creation of a great National Union Party which will . . . obliterate the present divisions." The main impetus for a new party, however, came from the South, where, many contended, only it could stop secession.

Developing tremendous momentum during the winter of 1850-51, the Union party movement challenged Fillmore's hope of saving the Whig party as much as did the defiance he encountered from northern anti-Compromise Whigs. If southern Whigs fused with like-minded Democrats in a new party, he knew, pro-Compromise northern Whigs would probably follow suit. Their defection would abdicate control of northern Whig organizations to anti-Compromise men and possibly drive them into an explicitly antisouthern alliance with Free Soilers that could provoke the disunion he sought to avert. To Fillmore, therefore, the dangers from the South included both the secession movement and the Union party movement formed to prevent it. To demonstrate that neither secession nor a new party was necessary, he set out to prove that the Whig party was reliably pro-Union and could win elections on those grounds. This course enormously enhanced Fillmore's popularity among southern Whigs, who by 1852 clearly wanted him as the party's presidential nominee. Simultaneously, however, that course convinced more and more northern Whigs that Millard Fillmore was anything but "the man for the occasion."

I

As the next Whig in the White House would later say about a far graver crisis, the occasion that confronted Fillmore's administration in the late fall of 1850 was piled high with difficulty. Its most vindictive northern allies bellowed for massive decapitations of holdover Taylor appointees, a move that could destroy state organizations. It also had to address unavoidable problems of governance that inevitably had implications for voters' attitudes toward the Whig party. It faced an embarrassing diplomatic flap with important domestic political ramifications. Enforcement of the unpopular fugitive slave law placed an unprecedented administrative burden on the executive branch. Most important, it had to defuse, rather than inflame, secessionist movements in the South while simultaneously demonstrating its even-handedness and firmness to Whig critics in the North. This combination of problems required all the sound judgment and discretion Fillmore and his advisors possessed.

The administration met these challenges with considerable skill. Fillmore subordinated the demands of bloodthirsty allies to the good of the party. To hold Whigs together for impending senatorial elections in the Rhode Island, New York, Massachusetts, and Ohio legislatures, as well as for spring elections in Connecticut and Rhode Island, with six representatives and another Senate seat at stake, he eschewed a divisive purge of patronage holders. Daniel Webster and Nathan Hall favored much more aggressive action against anti-Compromise Whigs than did Fillmore himself. After the Massachusetts elections, Webster again demanded that his cabinet colleagues strip William Schouler's Boston Atlas of federal printing contracts and that they be awarded to pro-Compromise Whig sheets. In New York, by mutual agreement, Webster assigned contracts for printing federal laws to the Albany State Register and the Rochester American, while Hall gave the lucrative post office printing in New York City to the Commercial Journal, organ of the Union Safety Committee.⁷

Prior to the spring of 1851, this cabinet-led retaliation was confined almost exclusively to a few newspapers, not personnel. Fillmore steadfastly prevented his advisors from axing jobholders for whose heads pro-Compromise Whigs clamored: William D. Lewis and John Ashmead in Pennsylvania; Palmer V. Kellogg and Thomas Clowes in New York; and Charles Hudson and Philip Greely, Jr., in Massachusetts. He repeatedly pleaded with his allies instead to patch up their differences with intraparty enemies. As late as February 23, 1851, he could honestly tell Washington Hunt that he personally had ordered the removal of only two Sewardites in New York—Levi Allen and Lewis Benedict. Only later would the administration take its gloves off on patronage.⁸

Webster, in consultation with Fillmore, Edward Everett, and a state department clerk named William Hunter, handled the diplomatic spat with Austria even more adroitly. Inherited from Taylor's administration, this dispute involved American reaction to the unsuccessful Hungarian rebellion against the Hapsburg Empire during 1848 and 1849. Scrupulously observing neutrality, Taylor had nonetheless sent A. Dudley Mann to Hungary to report on developments in case success might warrant American recognition of Hungarian independence. Austrian spies intercepted Mann's instructions, and when the Austrian chargé to Washington, Chevalier J. G. Hülsemann, complained to the administration about improper American interference in Austrian affairs, Rough and Ready was furious. To tweak the Austrians for violating the confidentiality of diplomatic papers, he sent the administration's instructions to Mann to Congress along with a message trumpeting his determination to recognize Hungarian independence had the revolt succeeded.

Both Hülsemann and Austrian authorities in Vienna were livid about this calculated swipe, but the brunt of their anger fell on the new administration. In a note to Webster, Hülsemann accused the United States of insulting the Austrian Empire and desiring its overthrow. Webster brilliantly seized on this opening to score political points. Few Hungarian refugees lived in the United States in 1850, but German and Irish immigrants cheered any attempts by subordinate nationality groups to gain political independence from authoritarian regimes like Austria's. Thus Webster could gain credit for Whigs among burgeoning and traditionally Democratic immigrant groups. Primarily, however, the occasion offered Webster a chance to sing paeans to American nationalism that would, he hoped, "touch the national pride and make a man feel sheepish and look silly who should speak of disunion."

Webster's long public reply to Hülsemann was a political masterpiece. Reaffirming American commitment to neutrality in foreign conflicts, it rehearsed America's historic mission to advance freedom everywhere through its own republican example. Americans, hymned Webster, always wished success to peoples contending for self-determination and political independence. If Austria contemplated any retaliation for this stance, he boasted in full knowledge that Austria lacked the fleet to damage the United States, the American people were "quite willing to take their chances and abide their destiny." Indeed, Austria should remember that compared to the vast United States, "The possessions of the House of Hapsburg are but a patch on the earth's surface."

Most Americans lustily cheered this bombast. In 1851, therefore, Congress demanded that Lajos Kossuth, leader of the Hungarian revolt, be released from his Turkish detention, and it invited him to visit the United States. For the moment, however, Webster had triumphantly resolved the diplomatic squabble. In the winter of 1850–51 the administration could turn its attention to a far graver matter—quelling disunion.

The threat of southern secession required far more than bravado or carefully crafted hymns to nationalism. Yet it also demanded more than wholesale capitulation to southern pressure, and Fillmore and Webster were in fact resolutely determined to resist secession. Their problem was to demonstrate their firmness to Northerners without pushing southern extremists over the edge.

The secessionist menace came from several sources. One was the radical fringe who had attended the Nashville Convention in June 1850 and deplored its failure to precipitate disunion. After denouncing the admission of California, the reduction of Texas, and abolition of the District of Columbia's slave trade as blatant violations of Southern Rights, the Nashville Convention called for another regionwide convention to meet in November to assess Congress' achievements, and some delegates, especially those from South Carolina, went home demanding secession. Radicals, in sum, regarded the Compromise as grounds for disunion, although the Nashville Convention's second session ultimately proved to be even more of a dud than its first.¹¹

The more concrete threat came from governors in Deep South states who could act on their own. On September 23, after receiving official notification of California's admission, Georgia's Democratic Governor George Towns, citing the legislature's January resolutions, called for a state convention to meet on December 10 to consider secession, and he set a date in late November to select the delegates. On September 26, Mississippi's Democratic Governor John A. Quitman ordered a special state legislative session to meet on November 18 and announced that he would urge it to call a secession convention. Popular agitation for special legislative sessions in South Carolina and Alabama portended the same result. Governor Whitemarsh Seabrook of South Carolina was an especially avid secessionist, but he realized that South Carolina's reputation for radicalism could stigmatize disunionist movements elsewhere. Thus he, as well as Alabama's governor, a moderate who opposed secession, refused to summon their legislatures and instead awaited the outcome of developments in Georgia and Mississippi. 12

Even before Congress adjourned, in sum, Fillmore and his advisors knew of the southern danger. Ironically, it provided the same opening for mending political fences with dissident northern Whigs that Fillmore and Webster had astutely exploited in their August replies to Texas Governor P. H. Bell's threats to march Texas militia against Santa Fe. Virtually all southern politicians who sought secession were Democrats. Since southern Whigs were appalled by secessionism, the administration would not offend them by taking a firm stance against Democratic disunionists that simultaneously pleased northern Whigs.

Webster salivated at this opportunity to earn approval from northern Whigs. When federal district attorneys in Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, and South Carolina telegraphed warnings about the depth of secessionist sentiment and the determination of Democratic governors to exploit it, Webster instantly proposed that he or Fillmore telegraph a circular to every United States attorney in the country setting forth "fully and explicitly, the duty of the Executive Government of the United States . . . in case of a collision between the authority of a State and that of the United States." Such a tough-minded proclamation, argued Webster, would be "quite applicable to the present state of things, and be a good Union paper, to send to Congress with your annual message." Webster, in sum, meant not only to cow secessionists; he intended to show Northerners that the administration played no favorites when it insisted on obedience to the laws.¹³

Without awaiting approval from Fillmore, Webster, who was in New England at the time, drafted such a circular, which reminded potential secessionists of the fate of South Carolina's Nullifiers, against whom Congress had authorized the use of military force if necessary. Webster mailed this draft to Fillmore, who then circulated it among other cabinet members for advice. Both Interior Secretary Alexander H. H. Stuart, a Virginian, whose department had formal authority over United States marshals, and Hall vigorously objected that Webster's bellicose language and especially his caustic references to South Carolina's retreat over Nullification would inflame, not intimidate, secessionists. Consequently, Webster's proposed circular was never sent. The administration decided instead to watch developments in the South carefully while using its enforcement of the fugitive slave law in the North to indicate its refusal to tolerate lawbreakers.¹⁴

Although the administration eschewed saber rattling to frighten potential secessionists, it did not rely solely on northern law enforcement to dissuade southern extremists. It was sworn to uphold neutrality laws that forbade American citizens from interfering with or attacking foreign countries. Between 1850 and 1853 the most daring American violators of the neutrality laws, the so-called filibusterers, were Southerners whose chief target was the Spanish possession of Cuba. By fomenting and joining a revolution of resident sugar planters against Spanish authorities, these southern crackpots believed, they could ultimately secure Cuba's annexation to the United States and thus enlarge the realm of slavery. By cracking down on southern filibusterers, who usually set sail for Cuba from ports on the Gulf coast, Fillmore's administration, in turn, could balance its enforcement of the fugitive slave law in the North.

By a fortuitous coincidence, the most prominent southern filibusterer when Fillmore took office was Mississippi's secessionist Governor Quitman. A hero of the Mexican war who found the lure of combat almost irresistible, Quitman became involved during the spring of 1850 with Narcisco López, a Venezuelan expatriate, who had once lived in Cuba and who had already attempted unsuccessfully to invade it in 1849. Quitman hosted López and other filibusterers at the governor's mansion in Jackson. He traveled to New Orleans in April to arrange supplies for the expedition and to grease the skids for it to avoid naval patrols when it left New Orleans. Rumor circulated that he even accepted military command of the reinforcements that would back up López's May assault on Cuba. That assault was aborted and López was chased by the Spanish navy back to the United States, where he immediately began planning another sortie.

In June 1850, López was arrested in New Orleans. To appease or perhaps overawe the authorities, he implicated various Americans who had helped him, like John L. O'Sullivan, the famous Democratic proponent of Manifest Destiny; John Henderson, Mississippi's former Whig senator, who was practicing law in New Orleans; and Quitman. They and others were indicted by a federal grand jury for violating the neutrality laws in late June and were ordered to appear in federal district court in New Orleans in December. All of this occurred under Taylor's administration, but Fillmore's team inherited the task of overseeing the prosecution by United States Attorney Logan Hunton in December. Despite the delicacy of the federal government's prosecuting a sitting governor and despite delays secured by defense attorneys, the administration refused to drop the proceedings. Ultimately Quitman, who succeeded in getting Mississippi's special legislative session in November to call a secession convention to meet in the fall of 1851, resigned the governorship on February 3, 1851, and went in the custody of a United States marshal to New Orleans for his trial. When the cases against two of Quitman's co-defendants ended in hung juries, however, Hunton dropped the charges against them, Ouitman, and all the others on March 3, 1851.15

Now Quitman gained the status of martyr as well as military hero and avid secessionist, but Fillmore's administration had demonstrated its willingness to prosecute Southerners as well as Northerners who broke the law. For the remainder of his term, indeed, Fillmore vigilantly tried to rein in the filibusterers, and in April and October 1851, he issued proclamations threatening to arrest and fine anyone who joined their illegal expeditions. Not coincidentally, these proclamations coincided with the use of federal force to implement the fugitive slave law in the North. What is more, Fillmore used precisely the same language against southern as against northern lawbreakers. He called "upon every officer of this Government, civil or military, to use all efforts in his power to arrest for trial and punishment every such offender against the laws of the country." Fillmore's purpose of playing no favorites between North and South was clear. Without question, however, northern enforcement of the fugitive slave law constituted the administration's central strategy for curbing secession.

H

Technically, implementation of that law was a judicial, not an executive, responsibility. The new United States commissioners designated to hear cases brought by slaveholders or their agents had judicial status; the marshals and deputies whom commissioners could order to apprehend fugitives were considered officers of federal courts. Nonetheless, the administration appointed the commissioners, it had responsibility for United States marshals and attorneys, and it was determined that the law be enforced and alleged fugitives returned to the South regardless of the costs to the government in money and manpower. On this point, Fillmore, Webster, Stuart, and Attorney General John J. Crittenden were in full agreement. "There must be no flinching, nor doubt, nor hesitation," insisted Webster. ¹⁷

Despite public protest meetings and scathing editorials threatening forcible resistance to the Fugitive Slave Act, its initial implementation during the fall of 1850 went smoothly. Northern blacks, who had always regarded slave hunters as kidnappers and occasionally armed themselves to ward them off, increased their vigilance, and many blacks fled immediately to Canada to escape the law's operation. The great majority of whites, however, obeyed the law. Alleged runaways were captured and returned to the South without incident in New York, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Illinois, and Massachusetts by the end of the year. In early November even Webster, who had been apoplectic about threatened defiance during October, assured Fillmore from Boston that "the excitement caused by the Fugitive Slave Bill is fast subsiding, & it is thought there is now no probability of any resistance, if a fugitive should be arrested." Ten days later he crowed, "We can kill off Free Soilism, in the whole of New England, in twelve months by energy and decision."

Fillmore exhibited both. On October 8, a mob of armed and angry blacks in Detroit threatened to rescue a fugitive in federal custody, forcing the marshal to call out troops. When two Democratic federal judges in Pennsylvania requested Fillmore two weeks later to issue a general order allowing federal judges to deploy federal troops to enforce the law, therefore, he ordered the commander of the United States Marines in Philadelphia to make his troops available if U.S. marshals called for them or if federal judges certified that they were necessary. A few days later, Fillmore dispatched additional troops to Boston to aid federal authorities there. "I have therefore commenced mildly—authorizing this force only at the last resort but if necessary," he told the absent Webster. "I shall not hesitate to give greater power, and finally to bring the whole force of the government to sustain the law."

In his December annual message to Congress, Fillmore declared "that to the utmost of my ability and to the extent of the power vested in me I shall at all times and in all places take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Significantly, he coupled that pledge with a warning that Americans "instigate no revolutions, nor suffer any hostile military expeditions to be fitted out in the United States to invade the territory or provinces of a friendly nation." The laws, in sum, would be enforced in both the North and the South.

Although fugitives continued to be remanded to their owners without resistance in most places throughout 1851 and 1852, three incidents in 1851 tested the administration's determination. The most important in terms of the administration's response occurred in Boston on February 15 when a mob of blacks assaulted the federal marshal and his deputies, forcibly seized a fugitive named Shadrack from a federal courtroom, and spirited him to Canada. On September 11, a crowd of armed blacks in Christiana, Pennsylvania, shot and killed a Maryland slaveholder and wounded his son to prevent their capturing two fugitives, who also escaped to Canada along with their defenders. The following month, blacks and white abolitionists snatched a slave named Jerry from authorities in Syracuse. 22

The Shadrack rescue deeply embarrassed the administration. On February 18, Fillmore issued a proclamation calling on citizens to obey the laws and commanding "all officers, civil and military, and all other persons, civil or military" in the vicinity to aid by all means in their power "in quelling this and other such combinations." He also directed the federal attorney to prosecute everyone who had participated in the rescue. In a message to the Senate the following day, Fillmore asked Congress to facilitate enforcement by changing the law to allow him to call state militia into national service without first issuing a proclamation calling on lawbreakers to desist and disperse and by clarifying the president's authority to use the regular army and navy to implement laws.²³

Especially mortified by the events in Boston, Webster took personal charge of the arrest and prosecution of Shadrack's rescuers. His need to work through local federal officials was a problem. He trusted U.S. Marshal Charles Devens and the federal commissioners, but he regarded Customs Collector Greely and Naval Officer Charles Hudson as untrustworthy anti-Compromise men. The key federal official was U.S. Attorney George Lunt, the man who had beaten his son for the office, the Whig who had abandoned Webster and supported Taylor at the 1848 Whig national convention, and an incompetent lawyer whom Webster deemed a dolt.²⁴

Because Webster and Fillmore considered conviction of the rescuers vital as a signal to Southerners, Webster, on February 25, 1851, ordered Lunt to hire Charles Loring and Rufus Choate, the state's preeminent lawyer, to help him prosecute the government's case. Lunt, however, proved obdurate and held out for a junior subordinate. Nothing helped. The trials against four blacks and four white abolitionists in late May and June ended in hung juries and dropped charges.²⁵

This failure to secure convictions, which would later be repeated in Pennsylvania, was offset by another fugitive case in Boston while Webster was on the scene. On April 3 city officials arrested a fugitive slave named Thomas Sims for theft. Abolitionists tried to secure his release, but they were rebuffed first by federal authorities and then by state courts that refused to issue a writ of habeas corpus for a federal prisoner. When abolitionists urged blacks to arm themselves and take Sims by force, the Whig mayor called out two companies of state militia. On April 11, Sims, guarded by 300 armed men, was loaded onto a navy brig and sent to Savannah. Two days later Webster rejoiced at the government's success and particularly the decisions by both state and federal courts upholding the constitutionality of the Fugitive Slave Act. "I cannot but think that these judgments will settle the question, with all sane men in Mass."

III

To conservative Whigs, indeed, Sims' successful rendition and judges' refusal to countenance opposition to the fugitive slave law more than balanced the Shadrack rescue. By the spring of 1851 they loudly applauded the administration's success in overcoming various challenges. "How thickly the testimonies in favor of the administration crowd us from all quarters," Baltimore's Kennedy cheered to Interior Secretary Stuart. History would record "as the chief glory of the present administration that they have identified themselves with a new era of peace and prosperity." From Kennedy's perspective, moreover, those achievements had immense political implications. "I regard every man who now places the Compromise in the front of his creed a good and true Whig—and every convert to the administration on that ground a new recruit to the standard of Whig principles."

Kennedy's readiness to consider any pro-Compromise man, regardless of formal partisan identification, as an adherent of Fillmore and a recruit to Whig principles is significant. Kennedy ardently wanted to create a new bipartisan Union party, and he envisioned Fillmore's administration and pro-Compromise Whigs as its rallying point. Some members of Fillmore's cabinet—especially Webster, who saw a Union party as a vehicle for his presidential ambitions—welcomed this prospect. Millard Fillmore himself emphatically did not. Possessing the prize Webster still hungered for and uninterested in another term himself, he viewed the Union party movement that mushroomed in the winter of 1850–51 as at best a useful though temporary check on secessionism and at worst as a Democratic ruse to seduce gullible Whigs that must be undermined in order to achieve his second goal—saving the Whig party.

Even before Taylor's death, Whig and Democratic cooperation on opposite sides of the compromise struggle in Congress had spawned predictions of an imminent realignment. As soon as Fillmore replaced Taylor, interest in fusing the "patriotic hearts and minds" from "all parties" in a new "Union party" quickened. By October, as bipartisan Union meetings proliferated in northern cities, excitement about a new party spread. Baltimore's Kennedy fanned it, and the Silver Gray bolt in New York spurred widespread predictions that Silver Grays and Hunker Democrats would ultimately combine against Barnburners and Sewardite Whigs to form the nucleus of a new national party.

Webster's letter to New York's Castle Garden meeting in October raised this excitement to a fever pitch. Praising the Union Safety Committee that was circulating a separate, predominantly Democratic Union ticket as "abject slaves to no party," Webster pledged, "With you, I declare that I 'range myself under the banners of that party whose principles and practice are most calculated to uphold the Constitution and to perpetuate our glorious Union.'" While Winthrop, who had taken Webster's Senate seat, huffed that Webster's letter disgraced a Whig administration and dismissed "all this fuss about the Union" as "nonsense," Kennedy, who attended the Castle Garden meeting, was jubilant. Webster's letter, he told his wife, announced "the beginning of a great Conservative National party which will overwhelm the old divisions of Whig and democrat and make a new order of politics." Anxious to perpetuate that momentum, Webster arranged for a mass Union meeting in Boston in November, and he gave his blessing to a bipartisan Union meeting in Philadelphia arranged by conservative Whig Josiah Randall.²⁹

Henry Clay also endorsed the new party. At a barbecue at Lexington, Kentucky, in October, Clay praised the bipartisan cooperation behind the Compromise in what, his antislavery cousin Cassius M. Clay snarled, was a transparent attempt "to bring over a number of the democrats to form a 'Union' party—which means a slavery party, strong enough to carry him or his 'Executor' and friends into power." Then, in a November speech to a special joint session of the Kentucky legislature, Clay announced that continued resistance to the fugitive slave law in the North "will lead to the formation of two new parties, one for the union and the other against the union." Devoted as he was to Whig principles, if northern Whigs grafted abolitionism onto the Whig creed by continued opposition to the Compromise, "from that moment I renounce the party and cease to be a Whig." If a new Union party were necessary, "I announce myself, in this place, a member of that union party, whatever may be its component elements."

The primary drive for a Union party, however, came from the South. Talk of merging pro-Compromise Whigs and Democrats occasionally emerged in North Carolina, Tennessee, and other southern states during the fall of 1850,³¹ but the Union party took concrete form only in Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, the last by far the most important of the three. Georgia's election on November 25 for delegates to the convention that Governor Towns had called was not simply the most direct referendum on the Compromise held in the country that year. Secessionists in South Carolina and Alabama awaited events in Georgia and Mississippi before acting. The special session of the Mississippi legislature summoned by Quitman met on November 18, one week before Georgia's elections, but since opponents of secession managed to postpone the state convention there until November 1851, events in Georgia would effectively determine secession's fate across the South. Those events, therefore, played a vital role in Fillmore's attempt to save the country.

The most populous state in the Deep South and the only one, aside from Louisiana and sparsely settled Florida, where Whigs were competitive, Georgia was also crucial to Fillmore's hope of saving the Whig party. Whigs had carried Georgia for Taylor and Fillmore in 1848 and elected four of eight congressmen. In 1850 both United States senators were Whigs. Any threat to the Georgia Whig party therefore directly impinged on Whigs' congressional strength. On that score, developments in Georgia seemed particularly ominous. Georgia would help save the country from secession, but in doing so it presaged the demolition of the Whig party.

During the campaign for delegates to the December state convention, as Alexander Stephens informed Crittenden, "old party lines [were] obliterated and forgotten." The battle was fought between embryonic Union and Southern Rights coalitions that drew support from both major parties. The division was hardly equal. The vast majority of Whigs and almost half of the Democrats joined the Union coalition. The remaining Democrats were joined by a small Whig rump in the Southern Rights camp. For Democrats, this realignment during 1850 and 1851 proved only temporary; many Georgia Whigs, in contrast, would never return to their old party. Since similar patterns ensued in Mississippi and Alabama, developments in Georgia merit close examination.³²

At first blush, the gravity of the secessionist threat in Georgia by itself appears to explain the emergence of Union and Southern Rights parties. Georgia harbored rabid secessionists with whom Governor Towns sided. After the Nashville Convention, they successfully urged formation of Southern Rights Associations in most of the state's counties, and on August 22, a statewide Southern Rights rally at Macon actually called for immediate secession. Most county Southern Rights Associations, however, fervently renounced disunionist intentions and instead contented themselves with denouncing the proposed compromise as an insult to Southerners and demanding the extension of the Missouri Compromise line to the Pacific coast. In short, the great majority of the Southern Rights men sought to exploit anti-Compromise sentiment to secure political power within the state, not to remove it from the Union. Even avid secessionists admitted that publicizing their aim would prove suicidal in any popular election. For exactly that reason, the Unionist foes of Southern Rights men grossly exaggerated the threat of secession in order to maximize their vote. Authentic secessionists, in sum, were far too weak to provoke the political realignment that occurred.³³

Union and Southern Rights men crystallized into political parties, as distinguished from ad hoc blocs, indeed, only after the threat of secession had already been crushed. Unionists' confident prediction that if Towns called a convention the "traitors who seek dissolution will not muster a corporal's guard" proved accurate. In November, Southern Rights candidates carried only ten of Georgia's ninety-three counties, and Unionists outpolled them approximately 46,000 to 24,000. In the convention itself, delegates favoring the Compromise and cessation of agitation outnumbered their foes 240 to 23. That crushing triumph effectively ended the threat of secession throughout the South for ten years. Yet it was only at the convention, after the victory had been won, that the Union coalition gelled into a party that sought to perpetuate its existence, a move that forced Southern Rights men to follow suit. Obviously something more than the menace of disunion itself spawned partisan reoganization.³⁴

The formation of new parties in Georgia—and later in Alabama and Mississippi—stemmed from changes in the competitive relationship between Whigs and Democrats, from rancorous feuds within both parties, and especially from ambitious politicians' attempts to exploit the sectional controversy to score a knockout blow against factional rivals or to save threatened political careers. Three aspects of interparty conflict facilitated realignment. First, the legislature rescheduled Georgia's congressional elections from even-numbered years, as had been the case throughout the 1840s, to odd-numbered years beginning in October 1851. Had those contests been slated for October 1850 rather than October 1851, the pyramid of conventions necessary to nominate candidates and the subsequent campaigns, which would have been underway long before Towns called the state convention, would most likely have reinforced partisan identities among politicians, the press, and the electorate and thereby inhibited the abandonment of old parties. Conversely, the absence of such elections allowed the campaign for convention delegates to focus exclusively on the question of accepting or resisting the Compromise, an issue that fostered cooperation between Whigs and Democrats on both sides.

Second, by 1850 Whigs and Democrats in Georgia, as was also true in Mississippi and Alabama, had ceased to battle over state economic issues. However radical Towns was on sectional issues, he was a conservative with Whiggish views on state financial policy, and Whigs praised the part of his legislative message in November 1849 dealing with it. This agreement was important, for almost everywhere in Georgia, as elsewhere in the nation, proponents of a Union party pointed to the abatement of partisan conflict over economic issues as justification for replacing the Whig and Democratic parties with new coalitions formed around current sectional questions.³⁵

Third, Whigs' competitiveness vis-à-vis Democrats in Georgia had deteriorated markedly by 1850, and Whigs' chances of winning elections in Alabama and Mississippi were even more remote. Whether or not new parties were necessary to stop secession, they seemed necessary to put Whigs in office. In part, this perception reflected what historians have called "the politics of slavery" or "loyalty politics." By this analysis, since northern Whigs proved far less willing than northern Democrats to appease Southerners during the recent congressional session, continued affiliation with the national Whig party meant political annihilation in Dixie. Specifically, some historians have attributed Toombs' and Stephens' readiness to desert the Whig party to their fury at antislavery Whigs. Similarly, Berrien's Whig allies, who rejoiced during the summer that "the old party lines are broken down" and that "there will never be another election between the old parties," wanted to deal no longer with Northerners as mere "parcels of the great National parties."

Equally if not more important, by 1850 Whigs' prospects for controlling the state government were declining dramatically. As a result, state leaders within Georgia whose focus was the legislature and the governorship, not national officeholders issuing directives from Washington, launched the reorganization of 1850. After dominating the state government from 1843 to 1847, Whigs lost the governorship in 1847 and again by a larger margin in 1849, when Democrats also won small majorities in both houses of the legislature. Even in 1848, Whig congressional candidates garnered only 47 percent of the statewide popular vote. while Taylor benefited from the refusal of Democrats to support Cass. Especially worrisome were Democratic incursions into Whig support in the rice plantation belt along the coast that appeared in 1849 and even more emphatically in a special congressional election to replace Thomas Butler King, who resigned to remain in California. In 1848 the popular King crushed Democrat James Jackson by 57 to 43 percent, but in February 1850, Jackson, who would join the majority of southern Democrats in adamantly opposing the Compromise, defeated his Whig opponent.38

Democrats' tack of courting normally Whiggish slaveholders with the aggressive proslavery, Southern Rights platform they adopted in 1849 and continued to push in 1850, in sum, appeared capable of building a permanent statewide majority that could doom Whig gubernatorial aspirants. But that was not all. In February 1850 the new Democratic majorities in the legislature tried to ram through bills to reapportion both congressional and state senate districts so as to force Toombs and Stephens into the same district and to cement control of the senate. So outrageous did Whigs find these gerrymanders that all but one Whig bolted the house for four days to deny the Democrats a quorum. Eventually Whigs, with the aid of a few Democrats from the upcountry Cherokee district, who saw the measure as a power grab by black belt Democrats, blocked the congressional redistricting. But the senate reapportionment passed, thus jeopardizing Whig hopes of ever again controlling that chamber. The handwriting was on the wall. Unless Whigs could recapture the vote of slaveholders or cut into the Democratic vote elsewhere, they seemed doomed to minority status.³⁹

Most Whig leaders eventually decided on the latter course, but at first they tried to stanch the hemorrhaging of slaveholders toward the enemy by matching Democrats' proslavery zeal. Almost all Whig legislators voted for the militant

Georgia resolutions threatening secession should California be admitted, as well as for appropriations to hold elections to send delegates to Nashville. Indeed, the original house resolutions in November were introduced by a Whig who sought, in the words of the Savannah Republican, "to set the Whig party right before the public on slavery." Yet those same votes reinforced a fissure within the Democratic party that Whigs had long recognized but that they could only now exploit.⁴⁰

For years Georgia Democrats had divided along lines of geography and principle. One wing of the party was composed overwhelmingly of nonslaveholders from the mountainous upcountry regions like Cherokee. Fervent disciples of the lacksonian faith, these men were staunch nationalists who had opposed Nullification, and they remained suspicious of the commercial mentality and proslavery zealotry of the black belt. Their preeminent leader was Howell Cobb, speaker of the House. Indeed, these nonslaveholding constituencies usually sent more Democrats to Congress than did their intraparty rivals because they were the safest Democratic districts in the state. The other wing of the Democrats was concentrated in the slaveholding areas that Whigs usually controlled. Known as the Chivalry, this wing contained many Calhounites who shared their hero's desire to destroy both major parties and combine all Southerners into a single organization. This wing, to which Towns belonged, seized control of the party machinery in 1849, and they were the ones pushing the extreme proslavery, Southern Rights agenda reflected in the Georgia resolutions. They hated Cobb because of his public repudiation of Calhoun's Southern Address in 1849 and his support of the Compromise in 1850.41

For different reasons, various groups within the Chivalry saw advantages in converting the Democratic party into a Southern Rights organization in 1850. Some sought to consolidate their control of the state party and increase the number of converts from Whiggish slaveholders. Reapportioning congressional districts was a complementary effort to increase their representation in the House. Others saw a Southern Rights organization as the fruition of Calhoun's long-sought southern party. A minority including Towns hoped to effect secession. All of these variants left Cobb and his followers, who heartily reciprocated the Chivalry's hatred, in the cold and up for grabs.

Understandably, therefore, the idea of forming a Union party was first broached publicly by the house Whigs during their February bolt to prevent a quorum. By building a new coalition devoted to stopping secessionists, they might pick up support from Cobb's followers, who distrusted proslavery extremists even more than Whigs did. This call in February produced no results, but when Union rallies were held during the summer to counteract the formation of Southern Rights Associations, nonslaveholding Democrats flocked to them. Fear of losing control of the state government permanently, in sum, caused Georgia's desperate Whigs to hatch the Union party idea, but its success depended on divisions within the Democratic party. As had been the case since the birth of the Whig party, its fate was inextricably linked to what Democrats did.

Whig politicians too were divided, although more by generational rivalries for office than by ideology or geography. The exception to this pattern was a tiny bloc of proslavery extremists. A few Whig newspapers, notably the Augusta Republic, edited by James M. Smythe, represented this small faction, and they had a few representatives in the legislature, though none in Congress. Despite the support most Whig legislators gave the Georgia resolutions, this extremist fringe recognized their lack of influence on the party's mainstream. Hence, they avidly embraced the new Southern Rights organization, in which they might have more clout.

Many supporters of Berrien also gravitated to the Southern Rights cause, as would Berrien himself. Neither he nor almost all of them were secessionists. A firm nationalist. Berrien was a close friend of Webster, and in 1848 he supported Clay rather than Taylor for the Whig nomination. That record allowed his younger rivals in the party, Toombs and Stephens, who hungered for Berrien's Senate seat, to try to undermine Berrien by taking more advanced proslavery ground than he on every sectional issue that emerged between 1844 and 1848. Berrien then sought to turn the tables on his tormentors after the 1849 election. In the Senate during 1850 he lacerated Stephens for his earlier position that Mexican law barred slavery in the Cession, and he stridently opposed California's admission as a free state to establish his prosouthern credentials. Berrien's intransigent hostility to both the Taylor and Clay plans and his own proposal for dividing California at the 35° 30' line put him closer than any other Georgian in Congress to the position taken by the Nashville Convention. Since the Nashville platform was the platform of the emerging Southern Rights Associations, proslavery zealots among the Whigs like Smythe, who had long disdained Berrien, and anticompromise Democrats began to sing the senator's praises during the summer.42

These developments convinced most of Berrien's followers that the way to advance their own careers in Georgia and to perpetuate Berrien's career in the Senate was to embrace the Southern Rights cause. They knew that the followers of Stephens and Toombs, aided by the federal patronage Taylor had given them, now dominated the state Whig party and would give short shrift to either Berrien or his followers when it was time to make nominations. They, too, recognized that the Whigs seemed to be sinking inexorably into a statewide minority and that if something was not done, Democrats would control the legislature elected in 1851 that chose Berrien's successor. By siding with Southern Rights Democrats, who had already ridden to power in the state by pushing an aggressive proslavery platform and who were now praising Berrien to the skies, they could do three things. They could gain the necessary allies to defeat Toombs and Stephens, whom the Georgia press had identified since the spring as pro-Compromise men, and perhaps put Berrien men in their places. They could construct a coalition in the legislature that might return Berrien to the Senate as a reward for his manly stand in 1850. And, if the Southern Rights movement swept the entire South, as they expected it would, they could make Berrien its presidential candidate in 1852.43

Not all of Berrien's followers accepted this rosy scenario. Democrats, some accurately warned him, dominated the Southern Rights movement, and they would never reelect Berrien to the Senate. By joining the Southern Rights camp, Berrien men simply would become the tail wagged by a Democratic dog. Others recognized the Southern Rights cause as a sure loser because of the stigma of secessionism and doubted the wisdom of joining it. "There are many genuine Southerners," wrote one, "who will not go for disunion upon the California question." Still others, including Berrien's kinsman and closest lieutenant, Charles Jenkins, were put off by the secessionists in the Southern Rights camp and joined the Union coalition to put them down. For months, in fact, Jenkins and others warned Berrien that he would only isolate himself by opposing the Compromise since most Georgians cared far more about ending agitation than extending slavery. 44

Unwisely, Berrien ignored these warnings. Convinced that the Compromise represented an ignominious defeat for the South that must be resisted and desperate to win reelection, he threw his support to Southern Rights candidates when he returned to Georgia in October. Before leaving Washington, however, Berrien tried to carve out a position of resistance that distinguished him both from the secessionists, whom he abhorred, and from Democrats in the Southern Rights organization. This was a totally impractical and unconstitutional proposal for economic nonintercourse with the North in which the Georgia legislature would impose a confiscatory tax on all northern goods that entered the state in order to keep them out.⁴⁵

That Berrien committed the political suicide against which his saner friends had warned was evidenced by two facts. Southern Rights candidates in only one of Georgia's ninety-three counties, Burke, endorsed his platform of economic nonintercourse. In addition, when Berrien sought election to the convention himself as a Southern Rights delegate from Savannah, he suffered humiliation. Southern Rights Democrats in Savannah, led by Congressman James Jackson, wanted to monopolize the Southern Rights movement for themselves. Thus they refused to cooperate when Berrien's Whig friends suggested a joint ticket that included Berrien. Those Whigs then refused to nominate Berrien on the grounds that it was undignified for a four-term United States senator to grovel for votes in a local election against Democrats who ostensibly shared his anti-Compromise views. To demonstrate indelibly who controlled the Southern Rights organization, Savannah's Democrats then nominated Berrien as one of their candidates, an insulting gesture that Berrien's proud Whig friends refused to let him accept. Berrien would be back in Washington when the Georgia convention met in December. That physical distance from the center of action perfectly symbolized how out of touch with Georgia this immensely learned Whig stalwart had become. He would linger on in the Senate until the spring of 1852, but his career as the leading force in Georgia politics was effectively finished.⁴⁶

Conversely, the Union party movement finally allowed Stephens and Toombs to displace Berrien, a goal they had sought since 1844. Throughout 1850, their oscillations in Congress between concerted efforts to secure passage of the compromise package and hair-raising speeches threatening secession and demanding federal protection for slavery in the territories baffled many Georgia Whigs. But on the central matter at issue—whether California's admission justified resistance—the differences separating Berrien from Toombs and Stephens were crystal clear. As early as March 11, Toombs published a letter to Governor Towns in Georgia's newspapers declaring that a compromise package that included California offered no justification for calling a state convention or seeking secession. Although Toombs, like most Southerners, voted against the California bill when it came before the House in September, he then announced, "I do not consider the admission of California an aggression upon the South." Stephens, who returned to Georgia for a month in mid-August and thereby missed key congressional votes on the Compromise, made a number of speeches defending it as an end to northern aggression against the South. The continued resistance that Berrien demanded, he insisted, was unnecessary.⁴⁷

Since Toombs and Stephens had been cooperating for months with Cobb and other pro-Compromise Democrats in Washington, the shift of Cobb's followers in Georgia to the Union coalition opened the way for the duo to follow their Whig supporters back home into a new alliance that could finish Berrien and advance their own careers. When Congress adjourned, Toombs, Stephens, Allen Owen, and Whig Senator William C. Dawson campaigned in Georgia for Union candidates among Whig constituencies, just as Cobb and other pro-Compromise Democratic congressmen canvassed for Union tickets in Democratic strongholds. Leadership of the Southern Rights cause was left to Berrien, the state's two anti-Compromise Democratic congressmen, and various state politicians.

That Stephens and Toombs sought to purge Berrien and not just to stop secession became clear at the Milledgeville convention in December, During a recess. Toombs, who by mutual agreement between the two was slated for Berrien's Senate seat, insisted that the Union forces organize a Union party across the state to contest the 1851 state and congressional elections. Cobb's Democratic followers in the Union coalition, sensing the chance to drive Southern Rights Democrats from power within the state by running Cobb for governor, readily agreed. Southern Rights men rightly protested that this conversion of an ad hoc Union coalition into an office-seeking party was totally unnecessary and a transparent grab for office. The November election, they insisted, had emphatically determined that Georgia would accept the Compromise and not secede. Like Stephens and Toombs, they recognized that a Union party campaigning demagogically against the phantom of secession would sweep the 1851 elections. Haplessly watching events from Washington, Berrien understood instantly that formation of a Union party meant the end of his Senate career. Only his belief that Stephens, not Toombs, would displace him was mistaken.48

Toombs and Stephens sought more than victory in Georgia's 1851 elections and the destruction of Berrien. They hoped to build a permanent national Union party that would replace the Whigs and run its own presidential candidate in 1852 and thereafter. Thus they encouraged incipient Union party movements in other southern states, and they returned to Washington in the winter of 1850–51 seeking northern recruits from among pro-Compromise Democrats and Whigs. Meanwhile, their Georgia allies seconded the call from New York City's Union Safety Committee for a national Union party convention to meet in Washington on February 22, 1851, the highly symbolic birthday of that city's namesake.

The Milledgeville convention not only launched the Union party, its resolutions, drafted by Charles Jenkins, also provided that party's platform in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. Intended to refute the charge that pro-Compromise men were cowardly submissionists, the famous Georgia Platform provided southern Unionists with impenetrable armor by making it absolutely clear that Georgia's acceptance of the Compromise was not absolute. Its acquiescence depended upon full compliance by Northerners in whose hands lay "the destiny of the Union."

Sharply noting that parts of the Compromise were unjust to the South, the Georgia Platform nonetheless declared that the package as a whole negated the need for immediate secession. It pledged that Georgia "would abide by it as a permanent adjustment of this sectional controversy." Permanence was the key, and Georgians would make no more concessions to northern demands. They would resist "to a disruption of every tie that binds her to the Union" any congressional action that touched slavery in the District of Columbia, that refused the admission of new slave states, that tried to bar slavery from Utah and New Mexico, or that modified or repealed the new fugitive slave law. In a clear warning to Fillmore's administration, the final resolution declared, "That it is the deliberate opinion of this Convention that upon a faithful execution of the Fugitive Slave Law by the proper authorities depends the preservation of our much beloved Union." In sum, secession had been temporarily shelved, not permanently renounced. Any of the actions still loudly being demanded by many northern Whigs would provoke it.

Most Southern Rights men in Georgia applauded this belligerent manifesto as representing their own position. Only diehard secessionists and Berrien, miffed that his nonintercourse idea had been completely ignored, continued to grouse. Yet their agreement with the Union party's platform did nothing to deter the organization of that party, which justified its existence by the recalcitrance of the secessionist fringe. Southern Rights men had little choice but to convert the local Democratic organizations they still controlled into a Southern Rights party to save their own careers from the Unionist onslaught. Whigs who had cooperated with them in 1850, similarly, had no choice but to support Southern Rights candidates for state and federal offices, for their former Whig allies in the Union organization totally shunned them, refusing even to print Berrien's speeches in the papers they controlled. With Berrien cornered, they showed no mercy.⁵⁰

One of Berrien's Whig followers, a Southern Rights legislative candidate in 1851, shrewdly intuited what was going on in Georgia. Furious about being forced to cooperate with Democrats because Union party leaders were flogging the dead horse of secession to secure selfish ends, he exploded, "I am unable to see any good reason, why this slavery agitation should break up old parties in Georgia, when no such consequence has followed in other states." Since secession was now a chimera, the "rank & file" were ready "to return to old party lines." Only "some of the leaders" who desired "to control the affairs of Georgia" were determined on "breaking up old & forming new parties." With astonishing prescience, he then predicted the rapid demise of the Union party. "This Constitutional Union party may subserve the purposes of its founders for the present," but "it cannot endure" since "the South has acquiesced in the adjustment" and "Parties cannot be maintained on past questions." This small-fry politico from Athens, Georgia, could not know it, but he had written an apt epitaph not only for Georgia's Union party, but also for the national Whig party.

For the present, however, the Union party most certainly did subserve the purposes of its office-hungry founders. Continuing to praise the Compromise a year after it passed, Cobb ran for governor against Charles J. McDonald, a Southern Rights Democrat, who defended the right while denying the necessity of secession, continued to pillory the Compromise, and blasted the Union party as Whiggery in disguise. This tack won back many Democrats who had sat out the 1850 convention elections but pried few, if any, Democrats from the Union party. Cobb breezed into office with three-fifths of the popular vote, a landslide by Georgia standards, and Union candidates—Stephens, Toombs, and four Democrats—carried six of the eight congressional districts.⁵²

The outcome of the legislative elections, which mattered most to Toombs and Berrien, was even more one-sided. Union men outnumbered their Southern Rights foes 104–29 in the house and 39–8 in the senate. Long certain of defeat, Berrien particularly abhorred the prospect that Toombs would get his seat. To avert that mortification, he announced that he would not seek reelection in the hope that this sacrifice might sway the legislature's Union majority to support his kinsman Jenkins rather than the hated Toombs. The Stephens-Toombs juggernaut was not to be denied, however; they elected Toombs to the Senate on the session's very first day. Thus Stephens and Toombs won their long war with Berrien. In the process, they willfully helped destroy the most important state Whig organization in the Deep South.⁵³

IV

Developments in Mississippi and Alabama can be quickly sketched. Despite impressive performances in the presidential elections of 1840 and 1848, between 1839 and 1849 Mississippi's Whigs had never won the governorship, elected only two of the twenty-two men Mississippi sent to the House of Representatives, and averaged less than a third of the seats in the legislature. Even more than Georgia's Whigs, in short, they badly needed a transfusion of Democratic blood to restore their competitive vigor.

There, too, Democratic divisions over the Compromise and the potential isolation of a prominent Democrat who needed Whig help to save his career offered them a chance. The Democrat was Senator Henry S. Foote, who had strongly supported the omnibus measure and later the Compromise, and who was censured by Democrats during the special November legislative session for his apostasy from Mississippi Democratic orthodoxy.⁵⁴

Foote, whose Senate seat would be filled by the legislature elected in 1851, in sum, burned his bridges to the state's Democratic leadership. He now needed new allies to prolong his career, just as Whigs had long needed reinforcements to launch theirs. It seemed like a marriage made in heaven, and Quitman's push for secession provided the opportunity to hold a ceremony. After Quitman's call for a special legislative session, pro-Compromise Whigs agreed with Foote to hold a meeting in Jackson to organize a bipartisan Union party on November 18, 1850, the same day the special session met. Pressure from it and Democratic legislators from strongly unionist nonslaveholding districts forced postponement of the state's secession convention until the following November.⁵⁵

Mississippi's Union party thus faced two elections in 1851, one in September for delegates to the state convention and the regularly scheduled November election for congressmen, governor, and state legislators. As in Georgia, Whigs constituted the great majority of Union party supporters, and they hoped that since "the issue now with us is union or disunion," Whigs might actually "carry the State next year." Since they were even more dependent than their Georgia counterparts on securing Democratic aid, however, they gave all four congressional nominations to Democrats, while Foote himself ran as the Union candidate for governor. Just as in Georgia, moreover, Whigs ran on the Union ticket for the legislature and convention in traditionally Whiggish plantation regions, while Democrats received Union nominations in nonslaveholder strongholds.⁵⁶

As in Georgia, finally, Democrats who demanded repudiation of the Compromise or secession formed a Democratic State Rights party, which in June 1851 nominated Quitman, the state's most renowned secessionist, for governor. Even though their platform admitted that immediate secession was inexpedient. Ouitman's well-known radicalism sank the State Rights cause.⁵⁷ In the September election for delegates, Unionists prevailed by a margin of 28,277 to 21,421, and in November the convention by an overwhelming vote of 72-17 adopted a resolution condemning secession as "utterly unsanctioned by the Federal Constitution." The size of September's popular vote, which reversed the 10,000-vote majority Quitman had won in 1849, sealed his fate, and four days after the September elections he withdrew as a gubernatorial candidate. Jefferson Davis, who had adamantly opposed the Compromise in the Senate but who was no secessionist, replaced Quitman, and he ran much closer to Foote than Quitman could have. Nonetheless, Foote won, as did three of four Union party congressional candidates, and, as in Georgia, the Union party piled up heavy majorities in the state legislature.⁵⁸

Alabama followed a different pattern than either Mississippi or Georgia, but there too black belt Whigs combined with hill-country Democratic nonslaveholders in a Union coalition that swept to a massive victory in the August 1851 state legislative and congressional elections. Democratic Senator Jeremiah Clemens, who owed his election primarily to Whig legislators and who took a pro-Compromise stance in 1850, became the leading Democratic proponent of a Union coalition just as Cobb and Foote did in Georgia and Mississippi. ⁵⁹ Its main proponents, however, were Whigs who swung to a pro-Compromise position in 1850 and who, by the fall of that year, were clearly winning support from thousands of north Alabama Democrats because of that stance. Unlike Mississippi, Whigs received at least three of the seven Union party congressional nominations for 1851, and two of those Whigs as well as three Union Democrats won in August. The results of the legislative races were even more decisive. Altogether, Union tickets carried about two-thirds of Alabama's counties. ⁶⁰

That Whig politicians in Alabama, like those in Georgia and Mississippi, seized on the Union party as a way to advance their careers is illustrated by the case of Henry Hilliard, the state's most prominent Whig, who represented the Montgomery district in the Thirty-First Congress. Hilliard had been one of the bolters from the Whig caucus in December 1849, but like his fellow Alabama Whig John Allston, he supported the Compromise to secure sectional peace. Ambitious for higher office. Hilliard refused to run for the House again in 1851. He unsuccessfully sought a diplomatic post from Fillmore's administration, but he immediately sensed that the Union party movement offered an alternative route for advancement. Thus Hilliard supported efforts to construct a national Union party in Congress during the winter of 1850-51, he campaigned hard for his Whig/Union successor as congressman from the Montgomery district, and he could barely contain his glee when the Union party swept the legislature. Because he and other Whigs had joined the Union party, he exulted, "For the first time I am in a majority in my State & now believe that I shall reach the Senate ''61

 \mathbf{v}

These developments had only begun when Millard Fillmore sent his annual message to Congress in December 1850. He could not know that Georgia's November election would effectively stymie secessionism everywhere in Dixie. Nor did he know that the pro-Compromise Union movement would transform itself into a political party. Instead, it seemed to offer the best hope of checking secession and saving the country. He therefore paid Georgia's Unionists heed as he drafted sections of the message pertaining to the Compromise, for Stephens bluntly warned the administration that Fillmore must insist that Northerners had an obligation to uphold the Union by obeying the Fugitive Slave Act. Even before he submitted his message, indeed, Fillmore had a letter published in the Washington Republic assuring Georgians of his complete compliance with that law.⁶²

Fillmore declared to Congress that the Compromise measures were "a settlement in principle and substance—a final settlement of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embraced." Since Congress could not now change the laws regarding California, the Texas boundary settlement, Utah, and New Mexico, they were "final and irrevocable." As for the others, Congress should adhere "to the adjustment established by those measures until time and experience shall demonstrate the necessity of further legislation to guard against evasion or abuse."

Fillmore later told New York's Governor Washington Hunt that these controversial statements were necessary to deter secession. Fillmore's rival, Seward, understandably viewed things differently. "It is quite evident, from the message," he griped to Weed, "that the Whig party is required to occupy the Castle Garden platform." Both Fillmore's attempt to reassure New York's new governor and Seward's allusion to a New York City meeting point to a crucial fact. Fillmore was as concerned about the Whig party in New York as about events in the South. As Seward apparently intuited, Fillmore echoed the stance of the Castle Garden meeting, not to foment the surging Union party movement in New York or elsewhere, but to check its growth by coopting its platform for the Whig party.

By December 1850, that growth seemed formidable. Northern bipartisan Union rallies were spreading from coastal cities into the interior as far west as Ohio. Michigan, and Iowa. Within New York, many of Fillmore's Silver Gray allies loudly demanded fusion with pro-Compromise Hunker Democrats. Louisiana's Democratic Senator Solomon Downs publicly endorsed a new party at a November rally in New Orleans. Thus Washington was abuzz with rumors in December, especially after Toombs and Stephens arrived from Georgia and, along with Speaker Cobb, began to proselytize for the new party. Whig Senator John Bell was so unnerved by Stephens' approach that he apprehensively wrote lieutenants in Tennessee to ascertain Whig attitudes toward a Union party there. 65 By the end of December the Ohio Free Soiler Joshua R. Giddings, hardly a potential recruit, predicted that a Union coalition of Whigs and Democrats would elect Ohio's new United States senator during the winter legislative session and that a national Union party would soon bury both major parties. The Whig party, he jeered, would "never again rally under that name with its present leaders or policy." Both Whigs and Democrats "will soon be swallowed up by the Unionists."66

Giddings welcomed this development, for it opened the way for merging Free Soilers with anti-Compromise Whigs and Democrats into a broad, exclusively northern antislavery party. That prospective realignment appalled Fillmore, who hoped to save the Whig party by rallying all its elements behind his administration. If pro-Compromise Whigs abandoned the party for a coalition with Democrats, Fillmore recognized, they would abdicate control of state Whig organizations to anti-Compromise men, who would then seek reinforcements from Free Soilers. Fillmore wanted pro-Compromise Whigs to stay and fight rather than switch.

Enthusiasm for a merger with Hunker Democrats among Fillmore's Silver Gray allies in New York who sought to put down "Seward, Weed et id omne genus" and to escape "the despotism of Weed" especially alarmed him.⁶⁷ His most immediate concern was a proposal that John Young and Hugh Maxwell openly advocated in New York City: that Hunkers and Silver Grays unite in the new legislature to reelect Democrat Daniel S. Dickinson to the Senate rather than the consensus Whig choice, Hamilton Fish. Fish himself, who had regarded the Union party movement from its inception as a Democratic trick to dupe gullible Whigs, warned Fillmore on November 18 that the proposed merger aimed at Dickinson's election and that Fillmore must therefore publicly denounce the creation of a Union party to prevent a permanent rupture of New York's Whigs.⁶⁸ These warnings prompted Fillmore's assurance to Fish that he hoped to save the Whig party and would do nothing to divide it. Eschewing the public pronouncement Fish demanded, Fillmore instead privately wrote allies like Solomon Haven and Jerome Fuller denouncing any alliance with Hunkers.⁶⁹

To a far greater extent than events in Georgia or pleas from New York Whigs associated with the Castle Garden Union movement, the advice Fillmore received from Fish and Washington Hunt, the departing and incoming Whig governors of New York, shaped his annual message and the course he pursued during the winter of 1850–51. Within two days of each other during the third week of November, both men implored Fillmore to help reunite and thus preserve New York's Whig party.⁷⁰ The simultaneity and similarity of these letters suggest a concerted effort to double-team the president.

Both Fish and Hunt argued, as they had prior to the election, that saving the New York party required Fillmore to forgo a pogrom against Sewardites still holding federal jobs. Weed and other Sewardites, they vowed, would zealously cooperate with the administration if Fillmore left patronage holders untouched. A purge, in contrast, would permanently alienate them from Fillmore and his Silver Gray allies. Whig divisions, they chorused, were confined for the moment to leaders. The rank and file had not yet split, and Fillmore could prevent them from doing so. Whig voters, according to Hunt, "are for Whig principles and will not consent to be divided up into personal factions." Whig voters would remain united unless Silver Grays allied with Hunkers in the legislature, echoed Fish, who obviously had a personal stake in preserving party cohesion in that body.

Other than patronage, the two continued, the major source of intraparty division that fall had been over the Compromise's territorial and Texas boundary provisions. Those wounds were bound to heal, for the new laws forever settled those questions. "These questions therefore no longer remain to divide us," declared Fish. "The sectional agitations which have . . . shattered the Whig party must gradually subside," chimed Hunt. "The territories being disposed of, the great cause of sectional conflict is removed." When Fillmore declared the territorial aspects of the Compromise irrevocable, in sum, he heeded not just the demands of Georgia Unionists but also the advice of New York Whigs that the sooner the sectional question was buried and forgotten, the faster the state party would reunite.

The Fugitive Slave Law was another matter. Both Fish and Hunt condemned its retroactive implications that threatened blacks long resident in the North and its lack of jury trials. Both pointed to the legitimacy of northern Whig outrage. Both urged Fillmore to tolerate dissent against the law, though not resistance to its enforcement, and to remain open to possible revisions. Demands for changes, insisted Fish, "may be entertained without being cause for separation between Whigs." Avoid declaring the fugitive law "unalterable," urged Hunt. "That would make it a 'higher law' than the Constitution." Fillmore's insistence on the finality of the Compromise seemed to ignore these pleas, yet he in fact went as far toward meeting them as southern pressure would allow by alluding to possible future revisions to remedy abuses and evasions revealed by experience.

Fillmore also heeded their advice on matters other than patronage and the Compromise. Both asserted that rank-and-file Whigs were eager to support a reunited Whig party and Fillmore's administration, but Fish emphasized the continuing threat that a Union party posed to Whig reunification, while Hunt stressed positive ways Fillmore could rally Whigs. Whig voters could be reinvigorated, reunited, and remobilized, insisted Hunt, by an emphasis "on the original measures and principles of the Whig party."

Fillmore clearly took this advice to heart. The dominant theme of his annual message with regard to government policy was not the finality of the Compromise or his determination to enforce the fugitive slave and neutrality laws. Its longest sections instead resurrected the traditional Whig case for an activist state in general and for a higher tariff and federal subsidization of internal improvements, including a Pacific railroad, in particular. To an astonishing degree, Fillmore iterated in detail almost every charge Whigs had made against the Walker Tariff in 1846. He called for abandonment of its ad valorem duties, which cut government revenue, provided insufficient protection to manufacturers, and encouraged fraud as shippers and importing merchants undervalued goods on bills of lading to secure lower duties. He urged Congress to substitute specific for the variable ad valorem rates and to end the heinous provision that placed higher rates on the raw materials used by American manufacturers than on the finished goods they made with them.⁷¹

By rehashing Whig themes from 1846, Fillmore thus attempted to leap back to the last election prior to the sectional controversy over the Mexican Cession, to an election that focused on economic issues, to a campaign during which Whigs throughout the country had rallied behind a distinctive Whig economic platform and had apparently ridden that platform to victory. The longest part of his message, in sum, attempted to ignore the sectional conflict, to advocate "the original measures and principles of the Whig party," and to shift the agenda from what divided Whigs to what united them and distinguished them from Democrats.

Fillmore thus moved indirectly rather than overtly to undermine a bipartisan Union party. By proclaiming the benefits of an activist state, decrying the invidiousness of ad valorem tariff duties, and explicitly defending the constitutionality of federal internal improvements, Fillmore moved explicitly to differentiate Whigs from Democrats. By coopting the Union party's position on the Compromise and reaffirming traditional Whig economic principles, he sought to negate the need for, and scuttle the possibility of, bipartisan cooperation. He sought to demonstrate that he was a Whig, not a Union party man.

VI

By itself, Fillmore's annual message did little to reunify the Whig party or to derail the Union party movement. Yet by the end of March 1851, developments in both Washington and the states suggested that the Union movement might be confined to its Deep South base. It stalled because the conditions that fostered it in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi did not exist elsewhere. To flourish, the Union party required at least three things: a rationale in the form of a disunionist threat or a credible opposition party that refused to accept the Compromise; the willingness of both Whig and Democratic politicians to abandon old organizations for new ones; and the abatement or cessation of partisan conflict on issues other than the Compromise. The absence of one or more of these elements stifled the proposed realignment.

Though no test votes on slavery or the Compromise occurred during the short congressional session to promote a possible Union coalition, the Georgians maneuvered to convert their state Union organization into a permanent national party. Stephens drafted a Union pledge and circulated it for signatures first among all the southern Whigs in the House and Senate and then, with the aid of Speaker Cobb, among southern and northern Democrats. Simultaneously, Silver Grays like William Duer solicited signatures from pro-Compromise northern Whigs. Dubbed the Round Robin by its critics, this document pledged that its signers, in order to protect the Union, would maintain the compromise "settlement inviolate" and "resist all attempts to repeal or alter the acts aforesaid." Nor would they support for state or federal elective office "any man, of whatever party, who is not known to be opposed to the disturbance of the SETTLEMENT aforesaid. and to the renewal, in any form, of agitation upon the subject of slavery." Signed by forty-four men, the Round Robin was printed in the New York Express, the paper of Silver Gray Congressman James Brooks, who signed it, as well as in the Democratic Washington Union, which did not endorse it.72

Stephens and others saw this document as a blueprint for a national Union party.⁷³ Along with the failure of the proposed Union party's national convention for February 22 to materialize, however, the paucity of support for the Round Robin instead demonstrated the difficulty of building such an organization. The Round Robin's forty-four signers represented approximately one-third of the representatives and senators who had voted for compromise measures that required some sacrifice of sectional interests. Thirty-nine of the forty-four were Whigs, but only ten of those were Northerners: Cooper of Pennsylvania, Boston's lameduck Congressman Samuel Eliot, who opposed creation of a Union party, and eight of New York's thirteen Silver Grays.⁷⁴ Representation from southern Whigs was far more respectable. Henry Clay and all six of Kentucky's Whig representatives signed. So did Senator Thomas Pratt and the entire Maryland Whig delegation in the House; Senator Willie P. Mangum and four of six North Carolina Whig representatives; four of Tennessee's five Whig representatives; the lone Whig representatives from Florida and Louisiana; Henry Hilliard of Alabama; both of Virginia's Whig representatives; and all the Georgia Whigs who had joined the Union party—Toombs, Stephens, Allen Owen, and Senator William C. Dawson.

Yet there were notable absences from the ranks of pro-Compromise southern Whigs: Senator George Badger and Congressman Edward Stanly from North Carolina; John Bell and a Whig representative from Tennessee; Delaware's three Whigs; Joseph Underwood, Clay's Senate colleague from Kentucky; and James Pearce of Maryland, Fillmore's closest Senate friend. 75 Nor is it clear how many of the southern Whigs who signed, aside from Hilliard, the Georgians and Kentuckians, and perhaps the Louisianan Henry Bullard, were prepared to join Democrats in a Union party.76 Nonetheless, the most glaring aspect of the Round Robin is that only five Democrats signed it. They included four Southerners: Senator Thomas Rusk of Texas and Foote, Cobb, and Clemens, each of whom was committed to a Union party in his home state. But no other Democrats from those states, let alone from Maryland, Kentucky, or Louisiana, signed. Especially revealing was the total absence of northern Democrats other than California's Senator William Gwin, a beneficiary rather than an architect of the Compromise, for no bloc had backed compromise more solidly in 1850 than they. Why they refused to sign is clear. They saw no reason to join a new party and share credit with Whigs for saving the Union. They believed they could win as Democrats on a pro-Compromise platform in the North by tarring anti-Compromise northern Whigs with the stigma of disunionism. As Stephen Douglas, who indignantly refused to sign the Round Robin, declared in a Senate speech, "The Democratic party is as good a Union party as I want, and I wish to preserve its principles and its organization and to triumph upon its old issues."77

Pro-Compromise Democrats, in sum, undermined the Union party movement. By mid-March, moreover, many Whigs had evinced equal disdain for combining with Democrats, no matter what their stand on the Compromise. When Bell sounded out his Tennessee lieutenants about a Union party, he received a crescendo of catcalls. "You speak of the desire to form a Union party," Thomas A. R. Nelson wrote. "I have no objection to the Whigs becoming the chosen champions of the Union," but "I am opposed to changing our name or abandoning the old standards." Both parties in Tennessee were equally devoted to the Union, another declared, but "on most other important questions, on which there can be a difference of opinion, they differ now as they have always done. A union of heterogeneous bodies! It is absurd." "The great mass" of northern Whigs "cannot & will not affiliate" with a Union party, echoed Detroit's Whig editor Henry Barns, for they regarded it "as a Webster plot." Thomas Ewing, who faced reelection by the Ohio legislature that winter and who, like Giddings, feared the creation of a Union coalition during that contest, received similar tidings when he tested opinion at home. True Whigs, he was told, saw the Union movement as a "humbug"; they would not swerve from the previous state platform that endorsed the Taylor plan against compromise. "No coalition with Locofocos even under the plausible title of Union party can succeed."⁷⁸

VII

If the Union party movement stalled during the spring of 1851, it was far from dead. Its strength in Alabama and Mississippi and its continuing potency in Georgia were yet to be demonstrated in elections between August and November. In addition, pro-Compromise Democrats and Whigs in certain northern states, notably those where Democrats had formed coalitions with Free Soilers and where anti-Compromise Whigs controlled state Whig organizations, like Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, still saw mutual advantages in such a merger if it progressed elsewhere. Ultimately, therefore, the fate of the Union party movement in 1851 hinged on the electoral fortunes of southern Whigs outside of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. For if southern Whigs could not win state and congressional elections on their own with a pro-Compromise platform, they might follow the example of their counterparts in the Union party's three Deep South strongholds and abandon the Whig party for the new organization. And if Whigs across the South did so, then the likelihood that Northerners would follow suit would increase exponentially. As Jerome Fuller, the Albany editor and Union party proponent, told Fillmore in January, "A mere bargain between Nationals and Hunkers in the North to unite and form a Union party would not be worth a straw. The current events at the South must determine whether a union party can be formed, and bring its members together."79

Aside from Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, eight other slave states held congressional and/or gubernatorial elections in 1851. As usual, Whigs were routed in the Democratic bastions of Texas and Arkansas. Since the mid-1840s Virginia had become almost as predictably, if less lopsidely, Democratic. In 1849 Whigs had carried only one of the state's fifteen congressional districts, although they had added another in a subsequent special election.

For various reasons, however, they expected to do much better in 1851. First, Virginia's Whigs, like their two representatives in the Thirty-First Congress who signed the Round Robin, were ardently pro-Compromise. In contrast, while half of the Virginia Democrats in the House supported the Compromise, the other half, both Democratic senators, and much of the Democratic press vigorously opposed it both before and after its passage.80 Thus Whigs hoped to label the enemy as secessionist fire-eaters and pose as the Union's only reliable defenders.81 Second, Virginia's Whigs recruited the most able and renowned men in the party to run as congressional candidates. Ex-Congressmen Thomas Flournoy, William Goggin, and John Minor Botts all accepted nominations. In the Ninth and Tenth Districts, James F. Strother and Charles J. Faulkner were men of considerable talent. Third, Virginia's Whigs, quite unlike those in other states, expected to benefit from the new state constitution that was completed in May 1851. Indeed, the congressional elections, which were normally held in May, were postponed to October on the same day as the referendum on the constitution. If it were adopted, legislative contests and the state's first popular gubernatorial election would be held in December.

Although Whigs were a decided minority at the constitutional convention, they gave far more proportionate support to its final adoption than Democrats, and they expected to reap benefits from its more popular features. The constitution not only made the governorship elective rather than appointive, it also broadened the suffrage by removing property-holding requirements. That provision, Whigs believed, would benefit them in cities like Richmond, Norfolk, Petersburg, and Lynchburg, where they had traditionally been strong. Both chambers of the legislature were enlarged, and the districts were reapportioned to give western Virginia, where nonslaveholders constituted the vast bulk of the population, a majority of house seats, whereas eastern Virginia retained a majority in the senate. This change too would benefit the party, Whigs trumpeted, for western areas were far more appreciative of Whig support for internal improvements than was the East. To exploit that presumed popularity, they not only ran a Westerner named George Summers for governor, they also boasted of Whigs' strong support at the convention for measures that would ease state funding of internal improvements. All in all, Whigs believed, their backing for the constitution and the provisions they had helped write into it would rejuvenate the party.⁸²

This optimism proved unfounded. Even though many Democrats continued to denounce the Compromise for sacrificing Southern Rights, they neutralized the Whig advantage by supporting legislative resolutions in the spring that acquiesced in the finality of the measures, the same formula pushed by Fillmore. By the time of the October congressional elections, disagreement about the Compromise was a dead issue. One reflection of this consensus was that, even though Whigs had recruited an all-star team to run in some congressional districts, they offered no challenger to Democrats in six of fifteen districts. This abdication not only portended party collapse, it nullified any advantage Whigs might gain from turnout in the constitutional referendum. Although the constitution, which Whigs backed more avidly than Democrats, carried by a seven-to-one margin, Whigs again carried only two districts, the Ninth and Tenth, and Democrats, regardless of how they had voted on the Compromise, usually won by far bigger margins than they had two years earlier. Because of the pro-Compromise consensus and the absence of Whig candidates, moreover, total turnout in the congressional contests was a pathetic 44,000 compared to over 80,000 in the simultaneous constitutional referendum and 126,000 in the subsequent gubernatorial election.83

Nor did expansion of suffrage and legislative reapportionment help Whigs markedly in December. Summers lost the gubernatorial contest with 47 percent of the votes, 59,476 to 67,074, the customary proportion Whigs had drawn before the abolition of property requirements. Whigs' share of seats in the legislature's lower chamber increased from only 39 to 43 percent. In the senate, it declined from 34 to 32 percent. Virginia's Whigs, in sum, remained a respectable but maddeningly persistent minority.

The Compromise had even less influence on Maryland's congressional elections. The three Whigs and three Democrats in its House delegation had voted similarly on the measures, and popular sentiment in the state almost unanimously favored them. Personalities and local factional squabbles thus dominated the campaigns, and in October, Whigs actually gained a seat in Baltimore formerly held by a Democrat. Yet this nominal success failed to conceal the problems that afflicted the state party and that stemmed from discontent over revision of the state constitution.

Despite Whig opposition in the legislature and in popular referenda, Maryland's citizens authorized a constitutional convention that met from November

1850 to May 1851, the product of which was popularly ratified in June 1851. Among other changes, the new constitution made a host of previously appointive state and local offices, including judges and justices of the peace, elective, created new state offices that would be filled in the 1851 election, and reapportioned the legislature to the Whigs' disadvantage. Whig strength in Maryland had always centered in the oldest, slaveholding, tobacco-growing counties of southern Maryland and the Eastern Shore, which under the old constitution had grossly disproportionate representation in the legislature, thereby almost guaranteeing Whig control. Democrats, in turn, were strongest in heavily populated Baltimore and Baltimore County, as well as western Maryland, the areas most enthusiastic about constitutional revision. The new constitution changed the method of electing senators and thereby opened that chamber to Democratic penetration. It also reduced the size of the house, stripped the usually Whiggish counties of at least ten seats, increased the Baltimore County delegation by one seat, and doubled Baltimore City's representation from five to ten.⁸⁴

Other aspects of the movement for constitutional revision also damaged Whigs. Because opposition was identified with their party, Whigs in Baltimore and western Maryland who wanted revision abandoned the organization for fusion "union" or "reform" organizations during the election of delegates and the voting on ratification. The convention's proceedings, which dragged on far longer than anyone believed necessary, only increased the impatience with and antipathy toward established politicians in both parties. As a result, during the 1851 elections in the fall, when Maryland's voters had the opportunity to elect more officeholders than they ever had before, a host of independent candidates - some representing self-proclaimed antiparty, reform organizations, others self-nominated contested regular party candidates for local offices, judgeships, the legislature, and Congress. No disagreements on specific issues spurred these insurgent candidacies; indeed, precisely the absence of policy disputes encouraged them because both major parties now seemed interested only in the spoils of office. Independents' agenda was simply to destroy the monopoly that regular parties exercised over public office, to restore power to the people.85

Thus, even though Whigs won four of six congressional seats, their local organizations were in disarray. In the solidly Whig First District north of Washington, incumbent Whig Congressman Richard J. Bowie of Montgomery County, who had run unopposed in 1849 and staunchly supported the compromise measures, received a serious challenge, not from a Democrat but from an "Independent" Whig in neighboring Prince Georges County, who was also named Bowie. In the Sixth District on the Eastern Shore, which had been represented by Whig John Kerr in 1850, the regular Whig nominee was defeated by "Independent" Whig Joseph S. Cottman. Independent candidacies together with the legislative reapportionment took an even heavier toll on Whigs in the state and legislative races. Democrats, already holding the governorship, in 1851 swept the new state offices and most of the elective judgeships. Independents, whose qualifications were dubious, took the others. Democrats evenly divided the new senate with Whigs, who had consistently dominated that body since the early 1830s. In the newly apportioned house, where Whigs had held a majority of 57 percent in 1850, they fell to a minority of 42 percent.

Despite Whigs' gain of one congressional seat, therefore, Whigs both inside and outside Maryland regarded the results as a defeat. Significantly, indeed, few commentators even mentioned the congressional returns and concentrated instead on Whigs' loss of the legislature, Democrats' sweep of state offices, the infusion of unqualified men into the judiciary, and the palpable erosion of their voter support as former Whig voters defected to "reform" tickets. "Our judges are below medicocrity, and lower in inverse ratio, according to the squares of the distances of the elevation of the Court—the Court of Appeals being the worst—inferior to the run of our students' mock court," lamented the intellectual Kennedy. "The other officers—I mean, not judicial—are shocking to behold. Ours is a horrible Q.E.D. against reform." The populistic upsurge boiling up in Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and other states as well as Maryland, it would seem, had a high price—at least if one were a Whig. 86

In other southern states, however, Whigs successfully tarred Democrats with the stigma of secessionist radicalism and thus exploited the unionist sentiment embodied by the Union party elsewhere. Louisiana, a strongly competitive state, offers a good example. The four House seats as well as the legislature were at stake in 1851, and the new legislature would fill Solomon Downs' Senate seat. Despite talk of starting a Louisiana Union party in 1850, none materialized. Instead Democrats split along the lines they had taken on the Compromise. Two of the state's three Democratic representatives, as well as Pierre Soulé, cast solidly anti-Compromise votes, and once back in Louisiana they defended that record. Although they shunned secessionism, Southern Rights Associations formed to defend them as champions of the proslavery cause. This move left the pro-Compromise Downs isolated from the majority of his party; nonetheless, Downs stumped the state in defense of the settlement in 1851, occasionally accompanied by Whig congressional candidates. Charles Conrad's move to the War Department in 1850 prevented any Louisiana Whig from voting on the Compromise, but his successor, Henry Bullard, signed the Round Robin, while the Whig press like the New Orleans Picayune, once again edited by Alexander Bullitt, former editor of the Washington Republic, wholeheartedly defended the settlement and castigated Democrats as disunionist "extremists."87

Defense of the Compromise and the Union was not Whigs' only weapon. They also urged that the next legislature call a new constitutional convention that could reapportion the legislature, exempt homesteads from debt, provide for an elective judiciary, and, above all, eliminate the restrictions on banking and other corporations contained in the 1845 constitution. Democrats were not adverse to all these revisions, but they wanted them made by legislative amendment, not a new constitutional convention, which, they charged, was certain to increase New Orleans' representation in the legislature. This stance gave Whigs the advantage, especially in the South's largest city. §88

This combination of issues powered impressive Whig gains. While they carried only two of the four congressional districts, they thereby doubled their representation in the House. More important, Whigs gained complete control of the legislature, and in January 1852 the Whig majority selected Judah P. Benjamin to replace Downs in the Senate. Thus Louisiana was one of the very few states where Whigs took a Senate seat from Democrats, although Benjamin would not serve until the Thirty-Third, not the Thirty-Second, Congress. In addition, over concerted Democratic opposition, Whig legislators also pushed through a bill providing for an April referendum on the question of calling a constitutional convention, and when it passed, Lousiana's Whigs appeared to be on a roll. ⁸⁹

North Carolina's Whigs also managed to make the August congressional elections a referendum on disunionism. Without state offices at stake, they could evade the divisive free suffrage and reapportionment questions that had so hurt them in 1850. With the marked exception of Thomas Clingman, the renegade Whig from Asheville, who had joined Democrats in opposing the Compromise in 1850, the lines between the parties were crystal clear. Both Whig senators and the other five Whig representatives supported compromise, and all three Democratic representatives opposed it, a division mirrored in the party press.

Even though all three Democrats and four of the six Whig incumbents ran again in 1851, however, the race focused less on the merits of the Compromise, which even Democrats grudgingly accepted by the summer of 1851, than on the related question of secession. In the state legislature and on the hustings, Democrats defended the right, if not the expediency, of secession to defend Southern Rights from northern aggression. Whigs not only denied the right of secession, they approved the use of federal force against South Carolina should it attempt secession that year. As one Whig reported, the congressional race in his district "has been conducted in reference chiefly to the issue of Secession, and acquiescence in the measures of the compromise, and the course of the administration." The last reference was important, for North Carolina's Whigs, like those elsewhere in the South, publicly and privately trumpeted their approval of Fillmore and pointed to his administration's fairness toward the South as a reason to elect Whigs and reject any hint of secession.⁹⁰

Many North Carolina Democrats, however, staunchly upheld the Union and rankled at their party's extremism in 1851. For a while, therefore, Whigs hoped to pick up their votes. But either because of the unpopularity and ineptitude of certain Whig candidates such as Burgess Gaither, who opposed the apostate Clingman, and Calvin Graves, who contested Democratic incumbent Abraham Venable, or because of partisan animosities that kept Democrats from backing rabid Whigs like Edward Stanly, few conversions occurred. As a result, all three Democratic incumbents prevailed, while Whigs carried the same six districts they had in 1849, although the victorious Clingman, who still claimed to be a Whig, should probably be counted as a Democrat since all Democrats in his district supported him.

Three aspects of this Whig triumph stand out. First, while North Carolina as a whole was an intensely competitive state, most congressional districts were extremely uncompetitive, in part because of the Whigs' gerrymander in the 1840s. Of nine districts, only in Stanly's did fewer than five percentage points separate the winner from the loser, and in no other district was the margin less than ten. In most districts, indeed, it surpassed twenty or thirty percentage points, whether carried by Whigs or Democrats, and incumbents Whig Joseph Caldwell and Democrat William Ashe ran unopposed. Compared to 1849, when only two districts produced such lopsided results and voter turnout was significantly higher, these results suggest that the partisan polarization over the Compromise and secession questions effectively cemented the majority party's control of each district by depressing the vote of its opponent.

Second, Democrats immediately recognized their disadvantage on sectional questions. How many votes Ashe may have drawn in a contested race is unclear, but the total Democratic vote dropped from 38,606 in 1849 to 17,857 in 1851. Even if Ashe's district is excluded from the 1849 total, Democrats drew 30,666 elsewhere that year, and in 1850 David Reid attracted over 45,000 votes for governor. Clearly, many Democratic voters rejected the party's extremist stance, and the party quickly abandoned it. The Democrats' leading editor, William W. Holden of the Raleigh Standard, informed the fire-eating Venable that Democrats must now silence their guns and accept the finality of the Compromise measures. Whigs, in turn, recognized that Democratic capitulation stripped them of their best issue. "As to Politicks [sic], the secession feeling is dead in N.C.," one sighed. "I only fear it is too dead for the good of the Whig party." With the secession issue still alive, he thought, Whigs could carry the 1852 state election "by 5000 or 10,000 majority." As it was, he lamented, "they are now backing out from secession & will press State & constitutional questions, on all which they outmanage the Whigs."

Yet in the same letter, this despairing Whig pointed to the third important impact of the 1851 elections. "Nothing will gain us" victory in the next state elections, he predicted, "except the popularity of the present Whig administration, which is, I assure you, very real in this state. We can point to it with pride & as fair illustration of Whig policy." Even before the congressional elections in August, indeed, North Carolina's Whigs concluded "that the Whigs of the South cannot rally for the next Presidency on any other person so readily as on Mr. Fillmore." Nothing better illustrates the chasm that continued to separate northern from southern Whigs. 93

In no slave state in 1851 were the political stakes so high and in none did the Whigs score so impressive a victory as in Tennessee. Not only were the elevenman congressional delegation, the legislature, and the governor to be elected in August. The new legislature could also replace Democrat Hopkins L. Turney in the Senate. Even more important to Tennessee's Whigs, the new legislature would reapportion not just the state's congressional districts but also the legislature itself, and the new districts could not be altered for a decade. As the Whigs' gubernatorial candidate put it, whichever party won control of the legislature "may without seriously outraging the other, so arrange the Legislature that the political complexion of the State will be permanent for the next 10 years." As a result, "the victory of a Whig governor would be valueless without the Legislature"

Clearly recognizing the consequences of the August elections, Whigs in early 1851 despaired of carrying them. They had no worries about the pro-Compromise positions taken by Bell and Whig congressmen, all of whom had voted even for California's admission. They saw that stance as a source of strength, especially since Turney opposed the Compromise in the Senate and the Democrats' gubernatorial candidate, incumbent William Trousdale, repeatedly called it outrageous. Elected in 1849 on a platform pledging defense of Southern Rights "to the last extremity," Trousdale was Tennessee's equivalent of Georgia's George Towns. Although he did did not call for secession, he had as governor endorsed the Nashville Convention and its anticompromise resolutions. The Democrats' 1851 platform acquiesced in the finality of the Compromise, but it made that acceptance conditional on complete northern compliance with the laws. Throughout the 1851 campaign, moreover, Trousdale repeatedly attacked each of the individual measures as southern defeats, a stance that Whigs believed exposed the hypocrisy of the Democratic platform. Because Trousdale as governor also opposed any increase in the state debt to fund railroad construction, a stance that angered residents of East Tennessee, he seemed especially vulnerable.⁹⁵

The Whigs' problem at the beginning of the year was finding a gubernatorial candidate behind whom they could rally. Tennessee's Whigs were bitterly divided by factional rivalries and personal enmities that had little to do with issues, although they frequently led to differences over potential presidential candidates. In part, divisions reflected age-old jealousies among the state's three well-defined and self-conscious geographical regions—East, Middle, and West Tennessee jealousies that mandated the balancing or rotation of the party's candidates for the governorship and Senate. Whigs from mountainous East Tennessee in particular felt shortchanged. Distribution of federal patronage in Tennessee also engendered immense anger, for under both Taylor and Fillmore, Senator John Bell and his allies like ex-Governor Neill Brown, Congressman Meredith Gentry, Nashville editor Allen Hall, and East Tennessee's Thomas A. R. Nelson monopolized the jobs and newspaper printing contracts. Bell was Tennessee's most eminent Whig, but many in his party despised him as a "cold hearted, selfish, and artful scoundrel." So deep was the anger at Bell that many of his rivals, especially ex-Governor James "Lean Jimmy" Jones, wanted the new legislature, if Whigs won control, to forsake the tradition of electing senators late and fill Bell's seat as well as Turney's. "Bell's day is over," growled Felix Zollicoffer, editor of the Nashville Republican Banner. "He must not be re-elected." 96

Tennessee's governorship was a largely honorific post since the governor lacked the veto power and the legislature distributed most state patronage, but a strong gubernatorial candidate was deemed essential to carrying the legislature, since he had to stump the entire state defending the Whig cause. That grueling and expensive responsibility deterred some potential candidates, and the expectation that the legislature might fill both Senate seats deterred others who wanted to remain available for the federal office. At the same time, candidates for the Senate like Jones and Bell wanted to derail potential opponents by inducing them to run for governor. The man whom both Bell and his opponents hit on to fill that bill was William B. Campbell, a circuit court judge and Mexican War hero from Carthage in Middle Tennessee. Both Bell and Gentry pleaded with Campbell to run, as did their factional rival. Nashville editor Zollicoffer. Campbell's refusal to run, argued Zollicoffer, would "strike upon the Whig party as a death-knell.... We are lost, if you do not stand by us, now, and of consequence, forever." On Campbell's candidacy, declared another Whig, rested "the destiny of the Whig party, not only in Tennessee, but all over the Union."97

But Campbell, miffed that he had never been offered a federal job by Taylor or Fillmore and fearful that he would lose money by running for and serving as governor, balked. Finally, promises that the party would raise the money for him and immense pressure from across the state persuaded the reluctant Campbell to become the standard bearer. Whigs' platform praised the Compromise as a final settlement of sectional controversy, and throughout the campaign, Campbell and other Whig speakers lauded its wisdom and patriotism and heaped encomiums on Fillmore for supporting and enforcing it. Campbell, moreover, repeatedly insisted that he preferred Fillmore as the Whigs' presidential candidate, while Democrats, unbelievably in light of developments since July 1850, dredged up the charge that Fillmore was an abolitionist. Helped in East Tennessee by his support for aid to railroad construction and by the withering speeches of Nelson, who filled in for him in joint debates with Trousdale when he fell ill, Campbell garnered about 3,000 more votes than his unsuccessful predecessor and edged out Trousdale 63,423 (50.7 percent) to 61,648 (49.3 percent). Whigs agreed that Campbell's victory marked "a triumph of the Compromise and the Union over an anti-Compromise factionalist."

Because only 22 percent of Tennessee's white families owned slaves in 1850 and because even most slaveholders were staunch unionists, the only surprising thing about this victory over Trousdale was how close it had been. Trousdale's total, indeed, declined by fewer than 100 votes from 1849 to 1851, a fact that indicates that even yeoman Democrats who disliked his reputation as an extremist loyally stood by their party. That steadfastness combined with other factors to prevent Whigs from using their pro-Compromise position to similar advantage in the concurrent congressional elections.

As in most other slave states, Tennessee's congressional districts were flagrantly gerrymandered. Whigs ran no candidates in three of the districts Democrats controlled, just as Democrats mounted no challenge to Whig incumbents Meredith Gentry and Christopher Williams. Nor were most Democratic incumbents as vulnerable to attacks of extremism as Trousdale. Although Hopkins Turney had opposed compromise in the Senate, all seven Democratic members of the House gave it varying degrees of support. Three supported all the measures except the District slave trade ban; the other four also opposed California, but all supported the crucial Texas-New Mexico bill. 99 Consequently, Whigs failed to make any gains in the congressional races; just as in 1849, they won only four of the eleven House seats, although they came within 16 votes of 13,000 cast of carrying a fifth district. 100

Whigs scored their greatest triumph in the legislative races, the focal point of their campaign. They converted a three-seat deficit in the house into a three-seat majority and increased their margin in the senate from three to seven seats. Whig control immediately set off a scramble for the open Senate seat when the legislature met in October. Favorites from each of the state's three regions demanded the prize: Thomas A. R. Nelson, who had filled in so ably for Campbell, from East Tennessee; Gustavus A. Henry, a frequent presidential elector, who claimed a payback for his efforts in repeatedly canvassing the state, from Middle Tennessee; and Bell's enemy James Jones, who now lived outside of Memphis in West Tennessee, the area of the state where slaveholding and cotton growing were most prevalent. Each man had such strong claims that for weeks the Whig caucus could not make a choice. Finally, after the angry Henry withdrew, Jones prevailed over Nelson, who was furious that Campbell did not back him, and Jones easily defeated Trousdale, the Democrats' candidate. The party was so divided that it abandoned all thought of trying to replace Bell.¹⁰¹

Despite the embarrassing squabble over United States senators, the legislature's Whig majority, at Campbell's urging, passed a bill providing for the loan of state credit to railroads that could connect East Tennessee with Virginia and Georgia and thereby redeemed the party's campaign pledge. Whigs also reformed the state's legal system and passed a free banking act. Most important, the defeated senatorial aspirant Gustavus Henry wrote and Whigs passed an ingeniously partisan redistricting bill for the state's congressional and legislative districts.

Notorious thereafter as the Henrymander, the districting act, as Governor Campbell jubilantly reported, would secure "to the Whigs a majority in both branches of the Legislature & 7 out of the 10 members of Congress." 102

Tennessee's elections of 1851 had three results of enormous importance for the state and national Whig parties. First, by ensuring the Whigs a powerful base in the legislature and a more competitive chance in congressional elections, the Henrymander enhanced the Whig party's longevity in Tennessee and guaranteed that even its successors would offer far stronger opposition to Democrats than was true in most southern states. The Henrymander did not work perfectly. By adding the two most heavily Whig counties in the state to the hitherto securely Democratic first congressional district, for example, Whigs achieved their goal of forcing Democrat Andrew Johnson out of Congress, but Johnson then won the governorship in 1853. Nonetheless, more successfully than Whigs in any other state, North or South, Tennessee's tilted the political playing field in their direction and guaranteed that so long as the national Whig party endured, opponents of Democrats in Tennessee would adhere to it.

Second, Campbell's vigorous defense of the Compromise and of the Fillmore administration convinced the vast majority of Tennessee Whigs that running Fillmore on a pro-Compromise platform in 1852 offered the party its best chance in the presidential election. "Tennessee may be put down as sound on the Union question, for the Compromise & for Mr. Fillmore or a sound Union man for the next Presidency," Campbell assured his uncle after his victory. ¹⁰³

Third, not all Tennessee Whigs shared that conviction, for in James Jones the state elevated to the Senate a man with even higher aspirations. Jones dreamed of the vice presidency or the White House itself, and since his intraparty rivals like Bell and Gentry were wholeheartedly in the Fillmore camp, hitching his star to the incumbent did not stike Jones as the best way to realize those dreams. He would look elsewhere, just as he had backed Clay in 1848, when Bell and Gentry promoted Taylor. Because of Jones' naked ambition, Tennessee's Whigs became more deeply involved in and more divided by the maneuvering for the Whigs' presidential nomination in 1852 than those from any other slave state.

If Tennessee produced the Whigs' most significant southern victory in 1851, neighboring Kentucky, the home of Clay and the cradle of Whiggery, inflicted their most stinging defeat. For only the second time since the formation of the Whig party in the winter of 1833–34, Democrats won half of the state's House delegation by gaining one seat from the Whigs. With the addition of only 120 votes in another district, Democrats would have completely reversed the six-to-four margin Whigs had won in 1847 and 1849. Leven more embarrassing, for the first time ever, Whigs lost the governorship when Democrat Lazarus Powell, who had lost to Crittenden in 1848 by over 8,000 votes, edged out Whig Archibald Dixon by fewer than 1,000. Whigs were hardly crushed, but a former bastion was now closely competitive. Leven more embarrassing was now closely competitive.

This setback stemmed primarily from the popularity of a rising Democratic star who stole a traditionally Whig congressional seat and from the palpable unpopularity of Dixon. Democrats' new star was John C. Breckinridge, who defeated Clay's old friend Leslie Combs in the eighth congressional district that encompassed Clay's Ashland farm, as well as Lexington and Frankfort. Breckinridge clearly cut into the Whig vote and mobilized previously despondent Democrats. Democrats had not even contested the district in 1849 against Whig Charles Morehead, although a separate nativist candidate had. But Breckinridge ran 1,100 votes ahead of Powell's vote in the district during the 1848 gubernatorial race and 600 votes ahead of Powell in 1851. Breckinridge's coattails, indeed, made the eighth district the only one in the state where Powell gained votes since 1848.

The victorious Powell actually attracted over 2500 fewer votes in 1851 than he had three years earlier; he won because Dixon ran almost 11,000 votes behind Crittenden. The new constitution in part accounted for this drop-off, for it reduced the number of days on which Kentuckians could vote from three to one. Nonetheless, Dixon clearly alienated many Whigs. Abrasive and ambitious, he selfishly demanded the gubernatorial nomination because he had stepped aside for Crittenden in 1848. This, of course, was a self-serving version of history, for the reluctant Crittenden, who had to sacrifice a Senate seat to run for governor, had been selected in desperation to end a standoff between Dixon and another man. To prevent another contentious convention in 1851 Whigs gave the nomination to Dixon, but many obviously rankled at his browbeating tactics.

Equally important, the 1850 constitutional convention increased Dixon's unpopularity with a small but significant constituency. Because of agitation by Cassius M. Clay's Emancipationist party for a provision mandating gradual emancipation in the new constitution, Dixon fought on the convention floor to bolster the state's commitment to slavery. This stand infuriated antislavery men, who ran Cassius Clay as an Emancipationist gubernatorial candidate against him. While Clay garnered only about 3,600 votes, many were Whig defectors and others were previous nonvoters who obviously disliked Dixon. As some Whigs argued prior to their state convention, the Whigs would probably have been better off had they run little-known John B. Thompson, the party's successful candidate for lieutenant governor.¹⁰⁸

The new constitution also reapportioned the state's legislative districts, and Whigs had to struggle to retain control of that body. They did so, but their majority in the house was reduced from fourteen seats to ten, and, in the senate, from twelve to two. This victory meant that the new Whig legislature could fill the Senate seat of Joseph R. Underwood, Henry Clay's stubbornly independent Whig colleague. Yet when the legislature met in November 1851, the party again faced problems with the grasping Dixon.

Underwood's term actually did not end until March 1853, but the openly antislavery stance he had taken during Kentucky's constitutional elections in 1849 and his siding with northern antislavery Whigs in the Senate during so many roll-call votes in 1850 made him an albatross to the party. Dixon now demanded this Senate seat as a reward for making the gubernatorial run. The immensely popular Attorney General Crittenden also wanted it, for the beginning of the term would coincide with the end of Fillmore's administration. Congressman Charles Morehead, who did not seek reelection in 1851, Judge George Robertson, and Congressman Humphrey Marshall, who won reelection in 1851, also threw their hats into the ring. 109

The result was paralysis and a divisive struggle that dashed Whigs' hope that the legislative majority might reorganize and reenergize the party. Crittenden's entry into the race caused the friends of Henry Clay, who still simmered over Crittenden's support for Taylor in 1848, to back Robertson. Dixon's friends refused to withdraw him on the grounds that he had stepped aside for Crittenden in the 1848 governor's race; Crittenden's allies retorted that precisely Crittenden's willingness to make that race justified his return to the Senate. To the dismay and growing anger of Whig newspapers, the Whig caucus could agree on no one, and vote after vote on the floor of the legislature produced no winner since Whigs divided among the rivals. Finally, after a month of fruitless balloting, both Crittenden and Dixon agreed to withdraw. Fifteen men now presented their claims. From this melee Whigs chose the man with the fewest enemies, a man whom no one could possibly imagine in the United States Senate, and the man whom the legislature ultimately sent there—newly elected Lieutenant Governor John B. Thompson, whom Democrats greeted with the derisive jeers that Whigs had heaped on James K. Polk in 1844.¹¹⁰

Within days of Thompson's election, while the legislature remained in session, Henry Clay announced from Washington that he would resign his seat effective September 1852. Thus the legislature could elect someone to the remainder of his term, which ran until March 1855. Crittenden immediately refused to allow consideration of his name, but the unmitigatedly selfish Dixon again grabbed for the ring. After another unseemly quarrel among Whigs, who divided their votes on six roll calls among Dixon and other contenders, Dixon finally prevailed on December 30. Thus in the Thirty-Third Congress, Kentucky, represented for so many years in the Senate by the irrepressible and enormously gifted Clay and the brilliant if more taciturn Crittenden, would send Thompson, whom many considered a nonentity, and Dixon, the only Kentucky Whig ever to lose a statewide election to the Democrats and a man who was now thoroughly hated by a substantial minority of the party.

VIII

Despite setbacks in Kentucky and the Maryland state elections, southern Whigs' performance at the polls in 1851 checked the spread of the Union party across Dixie and thereby boosted Fillmore's effort to save both the country and the Whig party. By ardently embracing the Compromise and Fillmore himself, they demonstrated that Whigs could win on the terms Fillmore laid down and did not need a Union party. Although Whigs lost a congressional seat and the governorship in Kentucky, they still retained control of the legislature and both Senate seats, and they obviously had a chance to carry the state again if they mobilized the Whig voters alienated by Dixon. In Tennessee they took the governorship and a Senate seat from the Democrats, and while they elected only four men to the House, the Henrymander promised much greater success in the future and control of the legislature for a decade. In Maryland, where they lost the state government, they picked up an additional congressman and retained both United States senators. In Louisiana, they also added a House seat, captured the legislature, and replaced a Democratic United States senator with a Whig. In North Carolina, where both United States senators were still Whigs, they kept a majority of the House seats, and a two-thirds majority if Clingman is considered a Whig. Only in Texas, Arkansas, and Virginia did they continue to languish in a minority, and in the last they suffered no net loss in Congress.

Altogether, exclusive of Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi, of the fifty-eight House seats filled from the South in 1851 Whigs won twenty-three (39.6 percent). or twenty-four (41.3 percent) if Clingman is considered a Whig, a respectable improvement over their 31.6 percent success rate in 1849. If one were to add Whigs elected to Congress under the Union or Southern Rights label in those three states, the total would be thirty-one of seventy-seven seats or 40.3 percent. and, in addition, Georgia's Union party elected Toombs to the Senate for the Thirty-Third Congress. Union Whigs, of course, had abandoned the party, but Fillmore could hope that if the party nominated a pro-Compromise man for president in 1852, they might return to the fold. Whatever Whigs who had joined Union parties might do in the future, indeed, the sweeping success of Union parties in Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, as well as Whig triumphs elsewhere in the South, pointed to an undeniable fact. No presidential candidate could carry the South in 1852 without an unshakable commitment to enforcement and preservation, without alteration, of the Compromise measures. That fact, Fillmore hoped, might bring northern Whigs to their senses.

Yet during 1851 most northern Whigs showed little evidence of ackowledging it. And, as Fillmore well knew, however crucial southern Whigs were in checking the growth of the Union party, they alone could never save the Whig party. Their unanimity behind the Compromise and their enthusiasm for Fillmore himself starkly contrasted to the response in the North, where Whigs were divided and often deeply hostile to the president. The North, not the South, in short, posed the real challenge to saving the Whig party on Fillmore's terms. Not only was it far more difficult to persuade northern Whigs that they could win by rallying behind the finality of the Compromise. Northern Whigs' very divisions made Fillmore's control of patronage potentially a far more important weapon in influencing the outcome of intraparty battles over it. Given the position of southern Whigs, Fillmore had no need or inclination to wield the patronage axe in the South to force compliance with the administration. The North was another matter, and despite his reluctance to make removals in the winter of 1850-51, pressure to do so increased inexorably during 1851, as did the potential damage of doing so to Whigs' electoral fortunes.

Only five northern states held congressional elections in 1851, but there were a number of important state elections. In addition, at least four incumbent northern Whig senators faced stiff but potentially winnable reelection challenges in state legislatures, and Fillmore's own New York Whigs had a chance to displace Daniel S. Dickinson if they made peace with each other. The political situation confronting Fillmore in the North, in sum, was far trickier than that in the South. Putting Whigs in office, and especially in the Senate, required reunifying a fractiously divided party that could be further rent by clumsy attempts from Washington to dictate platforms or threaten jobholders.

In the North, in sum, Fillmore's twin goals of saving the country by quelling agitation against the Compromise and saving the Whig party by not dividing it further were often conflicting, not complementary, as they were in the South. There he had to balance his desire to commit the party to the finality of the Compromise against its potential risks to Whig electoral fortunes. And there, quite unlike the South, he faced an additional aggravating complication that ultimately subverted his efforts to reunify and reinvigorate the party. This did not come from his overt intraparty enemies, the anti-Compromise Whigs, who continued to vilify him and boom Winfield Scott for the next presidency. It came instead from the unslaked ambition of his nominal ally, the secretary of state.

Chapter 18

"Webster Is Now Engaged in Strenuous Efforts to Secure the Succession"

"WHILE YOU AND I ARE TOGETHER... in the administration of the Government," Daniel Webster assured Millard Fillmore in October 1851, "that Administration will not be bi-faced, but will be one in principle and purpose." On most challenges confronting Fillmore's administration, the two men in fact saw eye to eye. They cooperated brilliantly to extinguish the fire over the Texas-New Mexico boundary and to secure passage of the Compromise. They shared a commitment to its finality. They completely agreed on Webster's nationalistic manifesto to Hülsemann and on the need for vigorous enforcement of both the Fugitive Slave Act and the neutrality laws.¹

On two matters of critical political importance, however, Webster and Fillmore parted company, so much so that Webster's portrait of unanimity was disingenuous, if not wantonly hypocritical. The first concerned the administration's response to intraparty strife among northern Whigs. While Fillmore insisted that all the Compromise measures must be enforced and should be acknowledged as a permanent settlement, he sincerely hoped to reunite feuding Whigs and promote the party's success at the polls. He opposed massive, regionwide purges of anti-Compromise Whigs from federal jobs as suicidally destructive. To facilitate reunification, he tolerated intentionally vague platform statements about the Compromise so long as they did not explicitly repudiate it. To allies who threatened to sabotage factional rivals, he counseled forbearance and stressed the imperative of party loyalty. The passage of time, he appeared to believe, would heal all wounds, especially if Whigs could bury the hatchet and coalesce around a new agenda.

This patient, tolerant stance sorely exasperated Webster. Rather than conciliating anti-Compromise Whigs, he advocated total war against them. Where Fillmore hoped to bury disagreements over the Compromise and stress different issues on which all Whigs could agree, Webster demanded that northern Whig platforms explicitly endorse the Compromise for what he believed it was—a crowning achievement of statesmanship, including his own, that was justified by the legitimate demands of the South and the need to preserve the Union from reckless fanatics. Unlike Fillmore, who admitted the justice of northern Whig complaints about slavery and the fugitive slave law even as he ignored them, Webster intended to expunge every hint of antisouthern sentiment from the northern Whig party. Similarly, from the moment he joined Fillmore's cabinet, Webster sought to axe anti-Compromise Whigs from appointive office in order to punish enemies and crush dissent. As for those holding elective office, Webster intervened repeatedly in different northern states to block their renomination or reelection. Unlike Fillmore, Webster much preferred the triumph of a Democrat to that of a Whig if he was not emphatically pro-Compromise. Personal vindication, not party success, was Webster's goal.

These different attitudes toward the electoral fortunes and future of the Whig party both contributed to and resulted from the two men's disparate responses to the Union party movement. Fillmore feared and tried to subvert it; Webster embraced and fomented it. To him, combination with like-minded Democrats in a new party seemed far preferable to continued affiliation with a Whig party dominated in the North, as he saw it, by small-minded politicos who always put victory at the state level ahead of the good of the country as a whole.²

Different temperaments and the different political situations Fillmore and Webster confronted in their home states of New York and Massachusetts in part account for their contrasting reactions to anti-Compromise Whigs and the Union party. Primarily, however, they derived from a single difference of circumstance. Fillmore occupied the White House and had little interest in seeking it again in 1852; in contrast, Webster lusted for the presidency.

That gnawing ambition shaped everything Webster did in 1851, but he remained undecided about the best way to fulfill it. At times he looked to a possible Whig nomination, and he sought to crush anti-Compromise Whigs to strip power from men who opposed his selection and to win southern Whigs' support. At other times, he despaired of obtaining that nomination, in large part because he eventually came to believe that Fillmore, despite professions to the contrary, sought reelection and would have an inside track with northern patronage holders and southern Whigs. At these times, Webster pointed to the strength of the Union party in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi to justify building it in the North as the vehicle to carry him to the White House.³

Webster's ruthless self-interest in reaching that destination was clear to everyone by the end of 1850. To succeed, Winthrop predicted in December, Webster "must be less repulsive to his old friends." As the months passed during 1851, Webster's hostility toward Whig enemies and disregard for Whig welfare as he pursued the presidency became even more evident. "Webster is now engaged in strenuous & incessant efforts to secure the succession," wrote the disgusted Truman Smith in August. "If he expects me to enter the field [on his behalf], he will be greatly disappointed."

Webster, with his single-minded pursuit of the presidency during 1851, inflicted as much damage on the northern Whig party, especially in New England, as any one individual possibly could. He negated Fillmore's efforts to reunite rival factions and inflamed bitterness instead by refusing to let bygones be bygones with regard to the Compromise. Internal divisions and disadvantages on state policies were severe enough by themselves to jeopardize Whig success in many states, but Webster instigated one Whig defeat after another, not only at the polls but also in senatorial elections. As a result, northern Whigs enjoyed markedly less success than their southern counterparts in 1851. Those losses reinforced the conviction of most northern Whigs that they needed a candidate other than Webster or Fillmore in 1852. But they had even greater significance for the party's future. However much intraparty strife weakened the Whig party and contributed to defeat, the cumulative decline of Whig strength in the Senate, the House, and state governments threatened the very existence of the Whig party. Hence the combination of circumstances that produced defeat in state after state must be recounted.

I

When Fillmore assembled his new cabinet in 1850, he announced only one fixed rule regarding federal patronage. He would not tolerate its manipulation to advance the prospects of a cabinet member or anyone else for the party's 1852 presidential nomination.⁵ Not interested in the nomination himself, Fillmore did not view his own dispensing of patronage to friends as a double standard. Instead, the ban stopped Webster from sacking enemies who held federal jobs in Massachusetts and elsewhere.

In frustration, Webster therefore flirted with the Union party movement almost from its inception. He sent his approving letter to New York City's Castle Garden Union meeting in the fall of 1850, urged his followers in Boston to organize a Union meeting there, and by letter endorsed a similar effort in Philadelphia. But to keep alive his chances for a Whig nomination, Webster also sought to defeat the renomination or reelection of elected Whig officeholders who had not supported all the Compromise measures, especially the Fugitive Slave Act. By purging such leaders, he could increase his chances of winning support from their state organizations. Alternatively, driving anti-Compromise men from office might ingratiate him with Democrats and allow pro-Compromise Whigs to control local and state Whig committees, which could then provide an organizational infrastructure for a bipartisan Union party.

Webster focused first on the New England states, where he had the greatest following. He paid little attention to Vermont and Maine in 1851, for their congressional delegations, including the disposition of Senate seats, had been determined in 1850. Instead, Webster concentrated on the four remaining New England states, three of which had congressional and gubernatorial elections scheduled for the spring of 1851 and three of which also considered the reelection of incumbent Whig United States senators whom Webster regarded as unsound. Webster saw those elections as the launching pad for a Union party, but ultimately they, as well as senatorial elections in Ohio and New York, finished any chance that party had in the North. By revealing the disastrous consequences for Whigs of flirting with Democrats, those elections discredited the very idea of coalition politics. They also demonstrated how continuing Whig divisions over the Compromise could decimate Whig strength in Congress, and in New England, Webster and his vindictive allies served as the firing squad.

Like Delaware and New Jersey, tiny Rhode Island was crucial to Whigs' chances of controlling Congress. That January the Whig-dominated legislature chosen in 1850 was to replace Albert Greene, who declined to seek another Senate term, perhaps because of vocal opposition from a small group of Websterites headed by John O. Charles and W. G. Gibbs. Webster aggressively lobbied Rhode Island's Whigs to back a conservative named Whipple for the Senate, but instead the Whig legislative caucus nominated former Senator James F. Simmons, politically inactive since 1847 and therefore lacking any public record on the Compromise. Repudiating the caucus, Webster's friends clung to Whipple. This split opened an opportunity for ex-Governor William Sprague, who for his own reasons set out to stop Simmons. Unable to sway the anti-Webster Whig majority, Sprague backed a protariff Democrat named Charles James and persuaded thirteen Whigs to join all of the Democrats in electing him over the indignant opposition of the remaining Whig majority.

This outcome not only cost Whigs another valuable Senate seat. It also put bipartisan cooperation in an exceedingly bad light, since James was exposed as making flatly contradictory promises to Whig and Democratic legislators to secure their votes. The fiasco in the legislature completely shattered the Whig party for the April elections, as pro- and anti-Webster men refused to cooperate. When the anti-Compromise Whig majority nominated Josiah Chapin, a favorite of the state's tiny Free Soil party, for governor, some Websterites threw their support to the Democrat Philip Allen, a pro-Compromise man, while others abstained.⁸ As a result, Whigs lost the governorship for the first time since the early 1830s, Democrats captured the state senate, and the Whig majority in the house sank from seventeen to four seats. In the popular vote, Whig majorities of 59 percent in 1849 and 80 percent in 1850 were reduced to a 46 percent minority because of Websterite defections and Democratic gains.

The results of the congressional elections were almost as bleak. Anti-Compromise Whig incumbent Nathan Dixon did not run, but his successor, Charles Jackson, was no more popular among Websterites. Jackson drew only 38 percent of the vote against the same Democrat Dixon had defeated in 1849 with 56 percent. In the other district, in contrast, anti-Compromise Whigs loyally backed Webster's ally George King, who squeaked by with only 51 percent of the vote, a sharp drop from his two-thirds majority in 1849. In his district, Democrats inspired by the chance finally to win the governorship turned out in unusually high numbers. Another Whig stronghold had been penetrated, largely because Webster's friends preferred Whig defeat to the victory of Whig rivals.

In neighboring Connecticut the Senate seat at stake belonged to Roger Sherman Baldwin, an ardent antislavery Whig who had failed to win reelection in 1850 and who, along with Senator Robert C. Winthrop of Massachusetts and Pennsylvania's Governor William F. Johnston, was one of Webster's three main targets in 1851. Baldwin's fate hinged on the outcome of the April legislative elections, which coincided with contests for governor and Congress. Although a Free Soil-Democratic coalition won three of four congressional seats in 1849, and although Democrats captured the governorship and the legislature in April 1850, Connecticut's Whigs exuded optimism about the 1851 elections after they swept the local elections in the fall of 1850. Intraparty divisions over the Compromise and Democratic attempts to lure pro-Compromise Whigs into a Union party in the New Haven congressional district, however, confounded those hopes.¹⁰

Since Connecticut was a relatively small and closely balanced state, defections to Democrats in even a single congressional district could cost Whigs heavily.

Terrified that New Haven's carriage manufacturers, whose southern trade left them anxious to register support for the Compromise, would force their employees to vote Democratic and withhold the money that customarily bankrolled their own party, Whigs therefore tried to run in 1851 as a pro-Union party that tepidly acquiesced in the Compromise as a finality. But they could hardly outflank Democrats with such a tack. With doughface incumbent Governor Thomas Seymour again heading their ticket, Democrats advanced a platform that wholeheartedly embraced all Compromise measures, including the fugitive slave law. Repudiating their former coalitions with Free Soilers in congressional races, they ran ardent pro-Compromise men in all four districts.¹¹

The tilt of pro-Compromise Whigs toward Democrats in the New Haven district decisively influenced the statewide result. Democrats again won the congressional seat there and in two other districts. Only in the Hartford district, where Charles Chapman nosed out the Democratic incumbent by fewer than fifty votes, did Whigs prevail. Seymour again defeated Lafayette Foster for governor with a slightly larger plurality than in 1850. The all-important legislative races would again determine the governorship as well as the Senate seat.¹²

In contrast to their disappointing performance in the gubernatorial and congressional contests, Whigs made marked gains in the legislative races. They won a three-seat majority in the senate and reduced the Democratic margin in the house to four. Since the Democratic delegation remained divided between doughfaces and Free Soilers who could agree on Seymour's reelection as governor but not on Isaac Toucey's elevation to the Senate, the chances that Whigs could reelect Baldwin, who easily secured the nomination from the Whig caucus, seemed good. Yet three to five "Union-safety Whigs" consistently refused to support Baldwin because he was an anti-Compromise man. Rumors circulated in Connecticut that Webster had orchestrated this obstinate minority, and Baldwin complained of that fact to Winthrop. Though unprovable, Webster's complicity seems almost certain. In any event, the Whig dissidents and Democratic divisions once again prevented any election. Baldwin's career was finished. The stubborn vindictiveness of a few Websterite Whigs had cost the party another United States senator.

The Democratic stronghold of New Hampshire had no senatorial election in 1851, but its congressional and gubernatorial elections that year deeply interested its most famous native son. Webster saw New Hampshire as potentially fertile ground for a Union party, but only if New Hampshire's Whigs spurned the alliances with Free Soilers they had formed in 1849 and earlier. During his trip to New England in the fall of 1850, therefore, Webster exerted pressure on New Hampshire's Whigs to recant their antislavery agitation and coalition. He achieved some success, but far from enough to justify his exultant boasts to Fillmore that Free Soilism would be wiped out within a year. Webster secured a Whig congressional nomination for his old friend, ex-Governor Anthony Colby. He also approved the Whigs' gubernatorial candidate, and he condoned the Whig platform as the best he could get given prevailing Whig sentiment. That evasive document said not a word about the Compromise or the fugitive slave law, but it did call for obedience to all laws and condemn nullification, provisions that could be interpreted as repudiating resistance to the fugitive slave law.¹⁵

Webster may have hoped that on this platform Whigs could either outflank New Hampshire's Democrats, who in 1850 had shamelessly and successfully attacked Whigs as prosouthern appeasers, or lure pro-Compromise Democrats into a Union coalition. In 1851, however, Democrats flipflopped once again and defended the Compromise far more explicitly and enthusiastically than the Whigs. Democrats ran their two incumbent congressmen, Harry Hibbard and Charles Peaslee, who had both voted for all the Compromise measures, and they dumped their first gubernatorial nominee when he criticized the Fugitive Slave Act and replaced him with a staunch pro-Compromise man. Far from succumbing to the siren call of a Union party, in sum, New Hampshire's pro-Compromise Democrats drove anti-Compromise elements from their own party and told voters that Democrats were safer unionists than Whigs.¹⁶

Democratic Congressmen Hibbard and Peaselee easily won reelection, but Amos Tuck and Jared Perkins, behind whom Whigs and Free Soilers combined in defiance of Webster's pressure, also triumphed. In the gubernatorial election, Democratic incumbent Samuel Dinsmoor was reduced from a majority to a plurality as almost one-sixth of the 1850 Democratic voters decamped to the Free Soilers, whose vote soared from 12 to 21 percent of the total cast. Democratic divisions allowed marked Whig gains in the state legislature, but not enough to overcome the huge Democratic cushion. Thomas E. Sawyer, the Websterite Whig who ran for governor, garnered a whopping 32 percent of the total, while Colby won an even smaller proportion of his district's vote. Democratic tribulations, in sum, did not translate automatically into Whig gains. The results underlined emphatically that only alliance with Free Soilers offered Whigs hope in the Granite State. Webster's political embrace seemed a kiss of death, but, amazingly, his New Hampshire loyalists ignored that lesson. In 1852 they would send Webster delegates to the Whig national convention.¹⁷

II

Quite naturally, Massachusetts commanded Webster's greatest attention during 1851. There his allies' vindictiveness peaked, and there Webster's selfish penchant for putting personal advancement ahead of Whig welfare became most clear. Webster counted on Massachusetts to launch his presidential campaign and was thus determined to wipe out anything about the Massachusetts Whig party that offended Southerners. That agenda guaranteed intraparty bloodletting, for in 1851 Bay State Whigs faced a powerful Democratic/Free Soil Coalition that had won control of the state legislature in November 1850. Any shift by Massachusetts Whigs toward Webster's position on national affairs, therefore, would only enhance their enemies' power within the state.

In early 1851 the legislature would choose the governor and was scheduled to fill Webster's old Senate seat, now held by Winthrop, who had outraged Webster by refusing to vote for the fugitive slave bill. Months before the November 1850 election, Whig papers warned that Coalition control of the next legislature would produce a Democratic governor and a Free Soil senator, most likely the pedantic, unctuous, and radically antislavery Charles Sumner. As soon as the Coalition-dominated legislature opened on January 1, 1851, things went as badly as Whigs predicted. Democrat George S. Boutwell was immediately installed as governor, and as if to accentuate the opportunistic nature of the alliance between Democrats and Free Soilers, a Democrat became speaker of the house and a Free Soiler president of the senate. 18

Initially, disposition of the Senate seat also proceeded with clock-like efficiency. To humiliate Winthrop, in late January Coalition legislators selected Democrat Robert Rantoul, Jr., for the remaining few weeks of his term. But Free Soilers insisted that one of their own get the new, full six-year term. The self-righteous Sumner, Winthrop's chief Massachusetts tormentor since 1846, had positioned himself to be the Coalition's Senate candidate for over a year. While he never retreated from his extreme antislavery ground, he made sure that Free Soil platforms incorporated Democratic positions on state economic policy. His ascent to the Senate seemed assured when both Free Soil and Democratic caucuses in January overwhelmingly nominated him and when the senate, which in Massachusetts voted separately from the house for United States senators, elected him two weeks later. In the house, however, the Coalition locomotive derailed.¹⁹

Although some Free Soilers opposed alliance with Democrats or Sumner's election or both, the real problem came from a bloc of pro-Compromise Democrats, who began to protest immediately after the November election that they had cooperated with Free Soilers solely to wrest the state government from the hated Whigs. Helping the Coalition put an antislavery fanatic in the Senate, these dissident "regular" Democrats raged, was "a gross outrage on our principles."20 Their leader in the house was the chairman of the Democratic State Executive Committee, Caleb Cushing. An immensely learned scholar and eminent jurist, Cushing was a Tyler Whig turned Democrat. In the summer of 1850 Webster's friends approached Cushing about running as a bipartisan, pro-Compromise, pro-Webster Union candidate for Congress, but instead he campaigned as a Democrat for the legislature and was elected with the help of Webster's friends in his Newburyport district. Supported by twenty-five to thirty like-minded Democrats, Cushing bolted the Democratic caucus as soon as it endorsed Sumner and vowed never to support him. Without this crucial bloc of votes, the Coalition in the house failed to muster the necessary majority for Sumner on roll call after roll call.21

This wrench in the Coalition's plans unexpectedly offered the Whig minority a possibility of snatching victory from the jaws of defeat. Cushing was prepared to support a conservative pro-Compromise Whig like Webster's ally Edward Everett. More important, although Whigs were badly outnumbered in the house, what counted was not the total membership but how many legislators were present and voting on roll calls for senator. Because the session dragged on for five months, legislators frequently quit Boston to return home. Each party therefore faced the problem of getting members back to Boston in time for votes, and in this regard Whigs had a decisive advantage. Spearheaded by Amos A. Lawrence, a member of the fabulously wealthy textile clan, Whigs raised a fund to pay for train fares to bring legislators back for key roll calls. If Whigs could not pull a coup when Coalition absentees were numerous, moreover, so long as Cushing and his dissident Democrats refused to support Sumner, Whigs had the votes to prevent any election at all if no one broke ranks.²²

Unity was the rub, for the prolonged stalemate over the senatorial election aggravated Whig divisions evident during the 1850 campaign. Even though Winthrop was the Whig caucus' overwhelming choice for the full term, Webster and his legislative lieutenants insisted upon making an example of Winthrop to demonstrate the political oblivion that awaited Whigs who refused to support all the Compromise measures. This vindictiveness baffled and deeply hurt the mild-mannered and deeply conservative Winthrop, who had once read law with Webster.²³ But Webster saw the Senate election as a chance to advance the Union party movement in Massachusetts already launched by the bipartisan Union rally in Boston arranged by his friends. The unusual political situation in Massachusetts, with both parties sharply split over the Compromise, indeed, undoubtedly helps explain Webster's enthusiasm for the new party, since the pro-Compromise Democratic minority whom his old friend Cushing led seemed very likely recruits for a new Union party. Thus, while his preferred candidate for the Senate was the ultraconservative Whig Samuel Eliot, he and his friends were fully prepared to back a Union Democrat instead. In January, Webster ordered his allies to assist the birth of the new organization. It was "the duty of the Whigs in the Massachusetts Legislature to join with honest conservative Democrats, & elect any good man of either party," he commanded. He personally would "not hesitate" to vote for "a sound, sensible, Union man of the Democratic party, if I could not elect a decided Union Whig" since now was the time "for friends of the Union to unite, & rally in its support."24

Webster and his fawning Whig acolytes "are really green enough to believe that they can detach democrats from their party to help them make a 'Union party'!" sneered the contemptuous Charles Upham, "and all for the sake of the Presidency." Verdant they were. Moses Stuart, head of the Andover Theological Seminary and a Webster disciple, revealed his naiveté when he wrote Webster in April that he preferred Sumner to Winthrop "on the desperate ground of, the worse the better" in terms of driving pro-Compromise Whigs and Democrats together. "I think a Union party, taking the Corps d'elites of the two quondam parties bids fair to become the order of the day, in the North & the South." If it did, "I expect, if I & you live, to see you in the White House." "25

Stuart's fantasy recognized at least one reality. Long before April, it had become evident that the only choice was between Winthrop and Sumner. Webster's Whig followers and Cushing's Democrats, combined with disciplined support for Winthrop by other Whigs, blocked Sumner's election throughout January, February, March, and most of April. As the end of the legislative session approached, however, a few antislavery Whigs and a handful of Cushing's Democrats decided to support Sumner rather than postpone the election to the next legislature. On April 24, on the twenty-sixth ballot, Sumner finally prevailed by a majority of exactly one vote. The sum of the Websterite and anti-Webster Whigs alike regarded Sumner's victory as a grievous defeat and the Coalition as an abomination. Not only did the Coalition send Sumner to the Senate and blatantly trade for office; it proposed election reforms to replace the state's traditional majority requirement with a plurality decision, advocated a state constitutional convention to effect them, and passed economic legislation all Whigs reviled.²⁸ Whigs' common antagonism toward the Coalition, in short, opened an obvious way to reunite the party for the November elections, but the prolonged struggle over the senatorship eliminated that possibility. Furious that Websterites were prepared to sacrifice Winthrop for a pro-Compromise Democrat, the majority of Whigs determined to nominate Winthrop for governor later that year. Nonetheless, they made a peace offering to Webster's faction to restore party harmony. Conceived by Samuel Hooper, a Whig state legislator, and aired in William Schouler's Boston Atlas, this treaty had two parts.

Since Webster regarded the Whig state committee, chaired by George Morey, as uniformly hostile to him, it would be enlarged to include more Webster men, though not enough to give them a majority. With regard to the state platform, Whigs would agree to disagree, as they had done during the legislative session. They would insist on obedience to all laws, including the fugitive slave law, but they would tolerate criticism of that statute and demands for its revision to protect blacks' rights.²⁹

Webster and his allies angrily spurned the offer. Miffed that the Whig majority had refused to support Eliot or a Democrat for the Senate, furious that Webster had been denied the use of Boston's Faneuil Hall for a pro-Union rally on the pretext that it might provoke a riot by foes of the fugitive slave law, and incensed that the Whig majority refused to accept the Compromise's finality, they insisted on battling for outright control of the party and were prepared to abandon it if they lost.³⁰ As soon as Schouler printed his peace offering, Whig papers affiliated with Webster like the Bee and the Courier denounced it. Webster told friends that he would have nothing to do with the Whig state committee, even if a few of his allies were added to it, because it was so intent on carrying the state elections that it would whore after antislavery votes and thereby discredit the Massachusetts Whig party with southern Whigs and Union men. Both Whig and Democratic leaders were "National, and justly appreciate[d] great national objects," Webster wrote Democrat David Henshaw. "But there are thousands in each party, who are more concerned for state, than for national politics, whose objects are all small." Webster also flatly repudiated the live-and-let-live platform proposed by Schouler as an "utter absurdity." "I, for one, shall have nothing to do with the Whig party, if a part of their 'platform' be . . . to 'agitate' for the modification of the Fugitive Slave Law." Any attempt to revise or repeal that law would "break up, forever, the Whig party of the Union."31

As Webster saw it, Winthrop's candidacy for governor would ensure the same disruption. Webster wanted a formal presidential nomination from Massachusetts in 1851 that would increase his appeal to southern Whigs or proponents of the Union party, and he and his allies were convinced that running Winthrop as the Whig candidate for governor would undercut that appeal. Within a month of the legislature's adjournment, therefore, pro-Webster newspapers were questioning Winthrop's fitness and electability. Simultaneously, Webster's lieutenants tried unsuccessfully to marshal support for alternative Whig nominees more satisfactory to Webster, like Samuel Walley or Rufus Choate.³²

When his initial efforts to derail Winthrop failed, Webster prepared openly during May, June, and July 1851 to abandon the Whigs and cast his lot with the Union party. By then, he was convinced that "Mr. Fillmore shall try his chances" for the Whig nomination. By then, as well, he was thoroughly disgusted with the Massachusetts Whig party and persuaded that since the Union party would sweep the South, "the present organization of the Whig party cannot be continued throughout the United States." Apparently never considering that strife over the Compromise, the only rationale for a Union party, could prove ephemeral, he urged his Massachusetts allies "to call a meeting of the Union men of all parties," for if the new party took root there, "New Hampshire is not unlikely to follow the example." That meeting or a petition campaign organized by his friend Franklin Haven would boom Webster as the Union party's presidential candidate.³³

Both the proposed bipartisan Union convention in June and the petition campaign, however, fizzled. In desperation, therefore, Webster and his friends jumped back from the Union to the Whig horse and again sought an endorsement from the September Whig state convention on grounds that could attract both southern Unionists and pro-Compromise Democrats like Cushing's supporters. As Webster and his acolytes saw it, Winthrop's nomination for governor by that body would totally negate the effect of any endorsement of Webster's presidential candidacy by alienating the conservatives Webster hoped to woo. Once it became clear that the boomlets for Walley and Choate had failed, therefore, Webster, through an intermediary, tried to persuade Winthrop to postpone his candidacy until 1853 on the grounds, as Winthrop sputtered, that his nomination in 1851 "would not be satisfactory in Georgia!" When Winthrop indignantly refused to withdraw, Webster commanded his friends to boycott the state convention: "A convention which shall nominate me, for one high office, & Mr. Winthrop for another, would be an inconsistency."³⁴

The state convention's nomination of Winthrop on a platform that added calls for revising the Fugitive Slave Act to planks denouncing the Coalition's actions reinforced Webster's alienation from his state's Whig party. Nonetheless, in November the Whig total increased by almost 8,000 votes over the Whig vote in 1850 despite approximately 1,100 defectors to the Democratic column. Websterite Whigs almost surely accounted for those bolters, but even those votes, if added to Winthrop's total and subtracted from the Democrats, would not have given Winthrop the necessary majority. The election again went to the legislature, and since the Coalition, despite the defection of Cushing's Hunkers, narrowly retained control of that body, Governor Boutwell's reelection was assured. Still, the willingness of Websterite Whigs to support a Democrat and their overt joy at Winthrop's defeat, just like their attempt to stop his nomination, underlined their willingness to wage open war on anti-Compromise Whigs.³⁵

Ш

During the winter and spring of 1851, while Webster concentrated on developments in New England, Millard Fillmore responded in a markedly different fashion to the concurrent senatorial election in New York. Where Webster sought to defeat Whigs who were not totally pure on the Compromise, Fillmore vigorously worked for the election of a Whig who criticized the fugitive slave law. Where Webster urged cooperation with Democrats, Fillmore actively discouraged it. Where Webster spurned ambiguous platforms, Fillmore was prepared to forgo a statement on principles to secure Whig success. Nonetheless, New York's election also deepened factional animosities among Whigs and damaged their chances at the polls. It also pushed Fillmore into using patronage against his New York rivals in ways he would not permit Webster to adopt in other states. And it was Fillmore's wielding of the axe in New York and the gratitude it earned him from his Silver Gray allies that, more than anything else, convinced the ambitious Webster that the president himself was his chief rival for the Whig nomination.

New York provided Whigs with a splendid chance to gain a new senator who could partially offset losses elsewhere in 1851. Despite Democratic gains in 1850's congressional races, continued bickering between Hunker and Barnburner Democrats over legislative candidates allowed Whigs to secure a thirty-six-seat majority in the house and a two-seat edge in the senate.³⁶ Hamilton Fish was the consensus Whig choice to replace the Democrat Daniel S. Dickinson. Although some Sewardites and Silver Grays preferred a different man more closely identified with their respective factions, Weed, Seward, and Fillmore acknowledged that the party could unite only on Fish, and Fillmore himself enthusiastically supported him. Nonetheless, Fish's election inevitably became entangled with and embittered the rift between Sewardites and Silver Grays.³⁷

With the exception of sacking Lewis Benedict, Fillmore had worked hard since the Silver Gray bolt of September 1850 to restrain his allies and restore party harmony, and by December those peace efforts appeared to be bearing fruit. Seward, back in Washington for the congressional session, told Fillmore at the White House that he wanted reconciliation, and from early December 1850 to early March 1851, Seward remained resolutely mum on the slavery issue, to the great dismay of supporters who feared a retreat from "higher law" ground. If anything, Weed seemed even more eager to please. Alerted by Corwin that Fillmore would be gratified by an editorial endorsement of his annual message, Weed, to Fillmore's delight, warmly praised it in the Albany Evening Journal, although he studiously omitted any reference to the Compromise's finality. Weed also talked seriously of retiring from the fray, of going on an extended trip to Europe, and even of selling his paper, the state's flagship Whig journal, to the Silver Grays. With both Seward and Weed silenced, the chances of rallying the state party behind the administration and its measures brightened.³⁸

Even during the fall of 1850, however, Fillmore recognized that the state legislative session starting in January 1851 posed the biggest obstacle to his hope of saving the New York Whig party from irreparable disruption. Still mutually hostile, many Sewardites and Silver Grays distrusted the thaw in relationships at the top of the party hierarchy. Seward's friends repeatedly warned that the duplicitous and vengeful Fillmore intended to axe jobholders no matter what he promised. Especially his acquiescence in the bloodletting by John Young and Hugh Maxwell in New York City, they warned cabinet members, would provoke "the cry of Tylerism" since "these reptiles sting the bosoms in which they are warmest." By January 1851, Seward, Weed, and their followers insisted that Fillmore could "unite and consolidate" the New York party only by decapitating Young, "the Knave," and Maxwell, his "Dupe." And in retrospect, it is clear, Fillmore should have done so. 39

Silver Grays were even less happy about the unsigned truce during November and December, especially when Seward and Weed made support for the administration contingent upon retaining patronage posts. "Any trust or confidence bestowed on any of that crew, will be misplaced, and surely be abused & betrayed," insisted Jerome Fuller. "They will stab you, they will stab every National Whig at the first opportunity." Their "uncompromising hatred" and selfishness, warned Silver Grays, would be revealed when Weed bulldozed the Whig members of the new canal board to deny National Whigs lucrative contracts for repairs. If Fillmore's friends did not get at least half of that state boodle, they cried, more removals from federal jobs must be made.⁴⁰

The likelihood that men so suspicious and resentful of each other could keep the peace when they came together seemed remote. Yet the meeting of the legislature created additional problems. However much Weed and Fillmore—to say nothing of the desperate Hunt and Fish—might want to hold the party together, they lacked total control over their respective troops. Even Weed, whose influence over legislators was legendary, could not prevent every single Sewardite from making a speech or presenting a resolution that might precipitate a blowup. Fillmore, who had to direct his forces from Washington rather than Albany, was at an even greater disadvantage. He had some trustworthy lieutenants in the legislature, but he had little influence on conservatives from New York City. In outright defiance of his wishes, Young and Maxwell continued to urge the legislature's Whig delegation to reelect Dickinson and construct a Union party rather than reunite the Whig party behind Fish. Even worse from Fillmore's perspective, the Silver Gray press was utterly reckless. To Fillmore's dismay, those papers continued to pillory Weed throughout December despite his endorsement of the president's annual message, and during the legislative session they embarrassed Fillmore by refusing to endorse Fish and praising Whig legislators who opposed him, by making demands upon Sewardites far beyond those that Fillmore himself asked, and, most explosively, by falsely insisting that Fillmore sought the 1852 nomination.41

Equally problematic was the fundamental matter of the basis on which Whigs could reunite other than common support for Fish. In November the factional rivals supported Washington Hunt on vastly different grounds, and distrust of Hunt by both sides caused considerable abstention. The party's tenuous unity, in sum, encompassed flatly contradictory stances on the slavery issue. As even Joseph Varnum, Jr., the Silver Grays' leader in the state house of representatives, admitted about the impending legislative session, "We shall certainly divide if any slavery resolutions are introduced."

The problem was not simply the near inevitability that some legislator, possibly a Democrat bent on mischief, might introduce resolutions for or against the Compromise that could ignite an explosion. Fillmore himself, in his public and private letters, his orders to troops and marshals, and his annual message, had altered the equation by demanding acquiescence in the finality of the Compromise, total compliance with the fugitive slave law, and, most important, postponement of any attempts to revise that statute. Fillmore wanted loyal followers who sustained his administration's measures, not equal partners with their own agenda. He made that clear to Fish in November, and on the back of a letter he received in January 1851 warning against any alliance with Weed's faction, he jotted, "No alliance proposed. I am anxious for union & harmony but it must be their supporting the administration."

If Fillmore's Silver Gray allies carped at his leniency toward Sewardites on patronage, his firm stand on finality delighted them. Coupled with the secessionist threat in the South, it allowed them to portray any Whigs who refused to accept finality as dangerous disunionists whom, they believed, Whig voters would repudiate. More than this, they yearned to avenge the slur in the Syracuse platform that Seward, not Fillmore, represented the ideals of New York's Whigs. As the legislative session approached, therefore, they demanded a public demonstration of adherence to Fillmore from the Sewardites as a precondition for their backing Fish. That some Silver Grays wanted simply to humiliate the Sewardites became clear when Fuller in the State Register insisted that Sewardites "accept" the merits of the Compromise rather than merely "acquiesce" in its finality, an escalation of terms that incensed Fillmore.⁴⁴

Sewardites found the demand for prior concessions as a precondition for allowing Fish's election unconscionable. Endorsing Fillmore's position and abandoning criticism of the Compromise and especially of the hated fugitive slave law, they complained, would destroy the Whig party's credibility. Besides, they railed, it was degrading for the majority of the party to submit to extortion by the minority. In the legislature, where Sewardites outnumbered Silver Grays by fiftynine to twenty-three in the house and by fourteen to three in the senate, indeed, the Sewardite majority was even larger than it had been at Syracuse: nonetheless. in each chamber, Silver Grays had enough votes, when combined with Democrats, to block Fish's election. Although Weed and others hinted that they might publicly endorse the administration in some way after Fish's election, to make that endorsement a precondition for support was intolerable. Even the willingness to make a postelection acknowledgment of loyalty evaporated, moreover, when Thomas Foote printed rash editorials in the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser asserting that Fillmore intended to run again in 1852. Those statements implied that an endorsement of the administration was an endorsement of Fillmore's nomination for a new term, something Weed's men, who were already booming Winfield Scott, would never do. 45

These festering tensions made almost everything that happened in Albany during January a test of wills, a matter of saving or losing face, that widened rather than bridged the chasm between rival factions. On every occasion when Silver Grays expected a concession, they met what they perceived as insulting defiance. First came the delivery of Washington Hunt's inaugural address to the legislature and the announcement of his initial appointees. Neither side fully trusted Hunt's self-proclaimed neutrality, and Silver Grays especially looked for evidence that he would give their faction a fair shake. Instead, they regarded his appointees as Sewardites "of the rankest kind." Since lame-duck Governor Fish had already appointed a man they distrusted as an interim replacement for Hunt in the all-important position of comptroller, the head of the canal board, they immediately concluded that Weed intended to keep his monopoly over state jobs. ⁴⁶

Nor were they happy with Hunt's inaugural message. They expected Hunt to toe the line Fillmore had laid down in his own annual message. Sewardites, in contrast, wanted Hunt to repeat his campaign demand for immediate revision of the fugitive slave law.⁴⁷ Hunt responded characteristically to these cross pressures by straddling, and to most Silver Grays, although apparently not to Fillmore himself, a straddle did not suffice. Just as he had urged Fillmore in respect to Fillmore's annual message, Hunt devoted most of his own message to traditional Whig economic arguments. He promoted protective tariffs, internal improvements, and an amendment of the 1846 state constitution to facilitate enlargement of the Erie Canal system. But he also sought to reassure Anti-Renters in ways that nettled conservatives. Fuller considered his eulogies to Zachary Taylor too fulsome and his praise of Fillmore too faint, a complaint other Silver Grays echoed. On the all-important litmus test, Hunt continued to call for minor revisions in the fugitive slave law, and, in sharp contrast to the Round Robin then circulating in Congress, he insisted that men have the freedom to discuss and criticize it.48

The organization of the legislature itself increased the rancor between the two sides. During the preceding weeks, Silver Grays repeatedly cited the election of the house's speaker as the key test of Whigs' fealty to Fillmore. In particular, they demanded the defeat of Henry J. Raymond, a newspaperman and prominent Sewardite from New York City. Their logic was clear, if reductionist. Raymond's election as speaker would identify Fish as a Seward man unless counteracting resolutions were passed by the Whig caucus endorsing the Compromise. Raymond's defeat, however, would mark a repudiation of Sewardism, obviate the need to press a vote on divisive resolutions, and magically transform Fish into a Fillmore man in the eyes of Whigs elsewhere in the nation. Symbolism, in short, was everything.⁴⁹

Yet symbolism also reduced the leverage available to the outnumbered Silver Grays. Unwilling to boycott the Whig caucus, which would have reinforced their reputation as bolting soreheads who put personal resentment ahead of party loyalty, they had no choice but to attend the caucus, futilely run Varnum as their candidate against Raymond, and sit by mutely when Raymond won an easy victory. Once the caucus had decided, moreover, similar demands of party loyalty and legitimacy required them to support him on the house floor, where he won the post. ⁵⁰

Then Raymond, who later in 1851 would start the New York Times as a pro-Seward, pro-Scott organ, added insult to the Silver Grays' injury. By party tradition, the speaker automatically named the runner-up for the caucus speakership nomination, in this case Varnum, as chairman of the ways and means committee. Raymond, however, refused to appoint Varnum unless he pledged that he and all other Silver Grays would refrain from introducing resolutions accepting the Compromise or endorsing Fillmore and his annual message. The livid Varnum refused. From that point on Silver Grays boycotted Whig caucuses, and Raymond packed the committee chairmanships with Sewardites. Rupture appeared more and more likely.⁵¹

Varnum, in fact, had no intention of introducing pro-Compromise resolutions, for he, like Fillmore, knew that an up-or-down vote on them would destroy the party. Thus, when a Democrat and a Silver Gray later introduced such resolutions and a Sewardite Whig countered with one calling for repeal of the fugitive slave law, Varnum and most Sewardites cooperated to bury the inflammatory measures in Whig-controlled committees. Yet Varnum possessed resolutions that were drafted in Washington by Congressman James Brooks, Postmaster General Nathan Hall, and Webster. These praised the administration and endorsed Fillmore's call for acquiescence in the finality of the Compromise. Fillmore himself urged Silver Gray legislators to force a vote on these resolutions to test the Weed faction's allegiance to the administration.⁵² When Varnum introduced them, however, they too were buried in the judiciary committee, which Sewardites controlled. Thus the issue boiled down to a simple choice. Would the house judiciary committee release the Varnum resolutions and would the Sewardites support them prior to the house vote for senator, thus placing Fish on a pro-Fillmore platform, or would the Sewardites press for a vote on Fish before allowing a vote on Varnum's proposals? On that procedural question the fate of the New York Whig party appeared to hang.53

Conflicting external pressure on legislators was immense. From Washington, William Duer, Brooks, Webster, and the hard-nosed Hall, who orchestrated the false reports that Fillmore wanted the 1852 nomination, all sent unauthorized messages professing that Fillmore wanted Silver Gray legislators to throw away their votes to deny Fish the election unless Varnum's resolutions were adopted.⁵⁴ Young came up from New York City and demanded that Fish be stopped. Simultaneously, Weed, aided by Sewardites from western New York, urged that the resolutions be stymied and threatened that if any resolutions were passed, they would be those denouncing the fugitive slave law. Varnum took this threat so seriously that he abandoned efforts to pry his own resolutions out of committee. Meanwhile, Samuel Lyman, who knew Fillmore's wishes, reported to him that his so-called friends were misrepresenting him as implacably opposed to Fish's election.⁵⁵

During the week before February 4, the scheduled date of the senatorial vote, frantic efforts were made to break the logiam. Varnum, despairing of any actions on his resolutions, went to New York City to extract a pledge from Fish that he supported Fillmore's position on finality. Specifically, he asked Fish to respond in writing to a letter from the three Silver Gray state senators asking him to endorse Fillmore's annual message and thereby renounce any attempt to change the fugitive slave law if elected. Far more fair-minded than his allies, Fillmore himself later admitted that Fish could make no such pledge "without degrading himself," and Fish, who abhorred the fugitive slave law, adamantly refused. Instead, he showed Varnum his correspondence with Fillmore and a speech he intended to give at a public dinner, which, unsurprisingly, was almost identical to Hunt's inaugural address. To die-hard Silver Grays that was not nearly enough. Meanwhile Fillmore finally recognized that both his cabinet and the Silver Grays in Albany were out of control. Fearful of being blamed for Fish's defeat, he forced Hall and Webster to telegraph the legislators and countermand their earlier orders to oppose Fish. Those pro-Fish messages, however, were partially offset when, during this same crucial week, the canal board announced its new dispensation of jobs and contracts, from which Silver Grays were totally excluded, as they had long angrily predicted.56

As a result, Fish initially failed to win election. Only a few Silver Grays in the house threw away their votes, and Fish easily prevailed. The senate, where only two votes separated the parties, was another matter. Fifteen Democrats lined up behind their man, and fifteen Whigs, including Fillmore's lieutenant, George Babcock, voted for Fish. One Whig missed the vote, however, and James Beekman, a Silver Gray from New York City, ostentatiously wasted his vote on Francis Granger to deny Fish the necessary majority. Beekman, moreover, announced that for personal reasons, as well as Fish's refusal to send a written pledge endorsing Fillmore's message, he would never vote for Fish, no matter how many votes were held or how many telegrams arrived from Washington. Worse still from Fillmore's perspective, Fuller in the State Register lauded Beekman for saving the administration from disgrace and rebuking Weed, while the renegades Young and Maxwell, together with the Union Safety Committee, had cannon fired in New York City to celebrate Fish's defeat. To aggravate the situation, Henry Clay, who still hoped to force Silver Grays to cooperate with Dickinson's Hunkers in a Union party, wrote Maxwell a letter praising Beekman's stand and Maxwell's support of him, a letter Maxwell happily showed to everyone he encountered. Weed, in response, editorially savaged the administration for blocking Fish. New York's Whigs stood on the brink of the rupture that Fillmore desperately hoped to avert.57

Immediate attempts at damage control proved futile, in large part because animosity between the two camps had become so great. Talk of finding some other candidate was quickly dismissed. Fillmore blasted Fuller for misrepresenting him, and he forced Fuller to admit in his paper for the first time that Fillmore wanted Fish elected. The obstreperous Beekman held the key, however, and Fillmore's efforts to sway him directly or through friends failed. So did efforts to persuade Beekman to allow the election to go to a special joint session of the house and senate, where the large Sewardite majority in the house could overcome his obstructionism. Proposals to resurrect Varnum's resolutions or to change them so that Sewardites could support them to convert Beekman also came to naught. Weed made it unmistakably clear that his troops would block any vote on those resolutions unless Fillmore first removed Young and Maxwell, and the furious president, who believed that he had made every concession that honor allowed, flatly rejected that extortionate demand. "If harmony can be restored on no other grounds" than the "sacrifice of a friend," Fillmore huffed to the frantic Hunt, then "this discord must reign."58

Finally, at 1 A.M. on March 19, after another futile ballot earlier that month, the logjam on the senatorship broke. Beekman never relented, but senate Democrats, anxious to remove the Senate seat as an issue from the impending fall elections because it had so divided Barnburners and Hunkers in the legislative races of 1850, allowed the vote to proceed even though two of their members were absent. That allowed Whigs to elect Fish 16–13 despite Beekman's stubborn ballot for Granger.⁵⁹

IV

Fish's election failed to restore party unity. By the third week of February, Millard Fillmore had clearly been pushed beyond the limits of even his monumental patience. The ruthless exclusion of Silver Gray friends from state patronage by the canal board, Weed's refusal to allow a vote on the Varnum resolutions, and particularly Weed's arrogant demands for the heads of Young and Maxwell finally convinced Fillmore to launch retaliatory strikes against Sewardites. During the last week of February and the first three weeks of March, Fillmore's New York friends prepared a list of victims for the chopping block: Thomas Clowes, postmaster of Troy, as well as postmasters in Auburn, Oswego, and elsewhere; Elias Pond, customs collector in Rochester; and, most important, Marshal Palmer V. Kellogg and his deputies. The removal of Kellogg, warned the faithful Babcock, meant "open war in the party in this state," but "this is infinitely preferable to the present state of things."

Fillmore waited for over a month after mid-February to launch his purge. He could make interim appointments without the need of Senate confirmation only after Congress adjourned in early March. Nor did he want to turn Sewardite legislators against Fish, whom he had publicly endorsed, as long as it was possible that he could still win the senatorship. On March 27, eight days after Fish's election, the guillotine dropped. John Bush replaced Kellogg as marshal for the northern district. James R. Thompson, a Silver Gray from Rochester, who had been fired from his state job by the canal board, took Pond's place as customs collector there. Silver Grays took the jobs of Clowes and other Sewardite post-masters. The joy of Fillmore's friends knew no bounds. "It is an emphatic proof that the Administration not only in words but in deeds makes adherence to the settlement a test question," cheered Duer. 61

Nor did Fillmore stop there. He gave the lame-duck Duer a foreign post, but focused primarily on finding an appropriate place for his Binghamton friend John A. Collier. Fillmore's loyalty to Collier anguished respectable allies, for Collier was a notorious womanizer with a fondness for young girls and other men's wives. He had also been fined for exposing himself to women on the sidewalk through the ground-floor front window of an Albany hotel. Fillmore was none-theless determined to find something for him. In December 1850, he contemplated replacing the Sewardite John C. Clark with Collier as solicitor for the treasury, but the intervention of scandalized friends, who hinted that they would inform Mrs. Fillmore of Collier's sordid reputation, deterred him.⁶²

Then, in early May 1851, the Manhattan patrician Philip Hone, naval officer in New York harbor, suddenly died, and Fillmore placed the Albany flasher at the top of his list of possible replacements. Again consternated Silver Grays from Albany to Washington pleaded with the president not to tarnish his administration by appointing so disreputable a rake. Fillmore finally relented and instead named David A. Bokee, the former Silver Gray congressman from Brooklyn, to the influential post. Bokee's appointment in July reinforced the lessons of March, for Bokee was an avowed foe of Weed and a personal enemy of Fish, who begged Fillmore not to appoint him. The message was loud and clear. At least in New York the administration would play the patronage card to force compliance with its wishes.⁶³

Weed responded to Fillmore's patronage offensive by excoriating the administration in the Evening Journal. All talk of resurrecting the Varnum resolutions stopped. Instead, Weed was rumored to be pressing for the passage of resolutions that openly condemned the Compromise or approved Seward. If those failed, Weed was expected to get every Sewardite legislator to sign a vehemently anti-Compromise address at the end of the session. Meanwhile, Silver Grays circulated their own address among legislators that endorsed Fillmore's annual message. Despite Fillmore's cooperation with Weed in securing Fish's election, in sum, the Whig party remained bitterly divided over patronage and principles.⁶⁴

Then, suddenly in April, the storm clouds dissipated, and intraparty harmony suddenly emerged for the first time since 1844. The reason for this miraculous reunion was not, as some contemporaries and later historians suggested, that Weed wilted before administration pressure in order to protect the federal jobs his men still occupied. Each Rather, in April, Whigs stumbled across a new issue that united their party and redivided the Democrats. It bore no relation whatsoever to Fillmore, the Compromise, or slavery. It illustrated a fundamental fact about the federal structure of American government in the nineteenth century: state policies often mattered more to politicians and the public than the actions of Congress or presidents. The issue that saved the New York Whig party from almost certain disaster was enlargement of the state's Erie Canal system.

To unify fractious Whigs, Washington Hunt had tried to soft-pedal the sectionally and factionally divisive slavery issue in his inaugural message and to return instead to the party's traditional economic themes. As part of this strategy, he called on legislators to amend the state constitution to facilitate enlargement of the Erie Canal by improving the main east-west channel and completing construction of north-south feeder canals. Since the 1830s Whigs had advocated funding enlargement through bond issues that would eventually be repaid with revenues from tolls. Deficit financing divided Hunker Democrats, who favored it, against Van Burenites, who opposed it. In 1842 the dominant Van Burenites slowed construction with their stop-and-tax law, and in 1846 they wrote that approach into the new state constitution. One of its pertinent provisions allocated annual revenues from canal tolls to sinking funds to defray general expenses and pay off the existing debt before any annual surpluses over those amounts ($1.85 million) could be spent on repairs and new construction. Another prohibited new bond issues for canal construction worth more than $1 million unless the legislature first won approval of the new debt in a popular referendum and accompanied it with real estate taxes that could pay off the bonds' interest and principal. Hunt sought to lift those restrictions.⁶⁶

Hunt contemplated beginning the lengthy process of constitutional revision, but Whig legislators seized on an alternative he had mentioned in his message but rejected as a violation of the constitution's spirit and letter—as indeed it was. By this device the state would sell "revenue certificates," not bonds to which the future credit of the state was pledged, to fund enlargement. The annual surplus revenue from canal tolls allotted by the constitution for repairs and construction that is, the surplus after the yearly payments to the sinking funds—but no other state funds, particularly those that depended on land taxes, would be pledged to pay the holders of these certificates for a number of years. They would be a form of debt that would be extraordinarily attractive to investors because of the huge surpluses earned from tolls on the mainline Erie Canal. But they would not be, or so their advocates maintained, bonded indebtedness as defined by the constitution, since their holders could not seek any payment by the state other than canal revenues. In short, with revenue certificates the legislature could finesse the requirement to secure permission in a popular referendum and to levy land taxes to pay off the bonds. Ingenious Whigs had raised smoke and mirrors to an art form 67

On March 13, in the midst of the stalemate over Fish's election and Varnum's resolutions, a Sewardite assemblyman from Buffalo named Orlando Allen, responding to a letter from Seward urging Whig legislators to expand the canal system, introduced a bill calling for the issue of $9 million in revenue certificates to fund immediate completion of all canals. Some Silver Grays carped that the Nine Million Loan, as it was quickly dubbed, would only give more leverage to the Weed-controlled canal board, but others recognized that the potential boodle was so large that there would be plenty of room for Silver Grays and Sewardites alike to feed at the government trough. Thus, when Whigs sought legal opinions to justify the constitutionality of this quintessential pork barrel scheme, they went to administration supporters, not Sewardites, in order to eliminate any suspicion that it was a factional rather than a party measure. Not only did John C. Spencer, one of the state's most eminent jurists and the Silver Gray most responsible for dissuading Fillmore from appointing John Collier, write a brief. Daniel Webster himself also delivered an opinion assuring New Yorkers that the proposed revenue certificates were not bonds subject to the constitutional limitations.⁶⁸

The political benefits of the Nine Million Loan went far beyond increasing the pelf available to Whig contractors and investors. Whig voters across New York, who had no possibility of sharing the boodle themselves, shouted enthusiastically for the proposal. Simultaneously, the scheme initially split the Democrats, while the certain opposition of Barnburners could make it a defining issue in the 1851 election. When the bill steamrolled through the house on April 4 by a vote of 75-27, for example, all of the negative votes came from Democrats, while only four supported it. Fourteen Democrats, all from districts along proposed canal routes, abstained rather than vote against a Whig measure of such direct benefit to their constituents. The senate provided Whigs with even better campaign fodder. Twelve Barnburner senators announced their immediate resignations, and another absented himself to deny the quorum necessary to vote on the measure. Unable to act, the senate adjourned sine die. On April 19 Hunt then issued a proclamation denouncing Democrats for their outrageous obstructionism, ordering special elections in May to replace the twelve senators who had resigned, and calling a special session of the senate to meet in June. In May, Whigs carried seven of the twelve special elections, and in late June, on a straight party-line vote, senate Whigs passed the Nine Million Loan.

Long before this triumphant outcome, Whigs realized that they had discovered a truly golden issue, and they refused to jeopardize it by continuing quarrels over Fillmore, the Compromise, slavery, or even patronage. Babcock, the Silver Gray senator from Buffalo, urged Fillmore to make no further removals in order to nurture the party's newfound unity, a request with which the delighted president happily complied. Weed "and his friends now talk of harmony, and say the Canal Bill will unite us," the recently appointed U.S. Marshal Bush told Fillmore in April, while Thomas Foote, long a visceral foe of Weed, announced in early May that "the break-up at Albany [i.e., the adjournment of the senate because of Democratic resignations] will do good by uniting the Whigs and by substituting a new issue of agitation for that of slavery."

Seward and Weed, not Fillmore, in sum, discovered a way to reunify the New York Whig party without Sewardites endorsing the administration's position on the Compromise. Instead, their formula depended on ignoring slavery altogether and focusing on something else. United by the new and apparently invincible canal expansion issue and the momentum from the May results, New York's Whigs seemingly faced only one final hurdle on the road back from disruption—reuniting the rival regular and Silver Gray state committees.⁷⁰

Whigs were anxious "to rally together on their common and undisputed principles and forget or lay aside the topics on which they differ, or to unite on them as far as possible," Spencer reported to Fish in June. Even Fuller was now prepared "to go for harmony in the party." Negotiations involving Hunt, Spencer, Foote, Varnum, Babcock, and Weed, among others, began in July to find a formula to ensure a harmonious state convention that fall. Attempts to draft an address dealing with the Compromise that all Whig legislators could sign at the end of the special summer session aborted, however, for Sewardites rejected the Silver Gray demand that it condemn agitation for repeal of the fugitive slave law as unpatriotic and unwise. Nonetheless, the common commitment to canal expansion allowed Whigs to overcome even this obstacle. They agreed to divide the fall state ticket evenly between Silver Grays and Sewardites, and a committee was appointed to bring the two state committees together so that they could jointly issue the call for the state convention. That summit occurred in Albany in early August when both state committees called the convention and issued the so-called Albany Platform, which had been drafted by Spencer. It insisted upon obedience to all constitutional laws while admitting the right of men to criticize and seek revision of statutes they found offensive. However unsatisfactory some administration supporters found this compromise manifesto, most Whigs had long since turned their attention to the canal issue. Fillmore himself was overjoyed. "I congratulate you and the country upon the union of the Whig party in N. York," he exulted to Webster.⁷¹

V

That Fillmore boasted to Webster of Whig reunion in New York testifies to his blindness toward the widening chasm between the two men. Webster contemptuously scorned the Albany Platform as precisely the kind of live-and-let-live platform he rejected in Massachusetts. Refusing even to allow his friends to attend a state convention where Winthrop would be nominated, he spurned as a sellout the deal to split the New York ticket evenly between Sewardites and Silver Grays. He deplored the reunification of the party in New York because it increased the difficulty of building a Union party there. More important, Fillmore's willingness to sack Sewardites and appoint his own friends convinced him that Fillmore had decided—or would be forced by his New York allies like Hall who wanted to retain patronage—to seek the party's nomination in 1852. And he was especially angry that his patronage-holding enemies in Massachusetts like Philip Greely, Jr., and Charles Hudson justified their opposition to Webster's own nomination on the spurious grounds of supporting Fillmore for the prize. That promise, Webster jealously concluded, explained Fillmore's refusal to axe them.⁷²

Webster misjudged Fillmore's intentions in 1851; he had not decided to seek the nomination. Although he and especially his Silver Gray allies concluded that his dramatic removals forced Weed to seek a rapprochement in New York, moreover, he also recognized that hope of winning in the fall on the canal expansion issue did most to reunite the New York party. Fillmore comprehended, in short, that the best way to save the Whig party was to prove that it could still win. Unlike Webster, therefore, from the summer of 1851 on, he refused to do anything that could jeopardize Whig victory in New York or elsewhere. No more removals occurred in New York, and Fillmore used patronage only sparingly elsewhere. Yet his restraint in the name of party unity did not guarantee victory in New York's fall elections, for he had no control over the New Yorkers who were most enthusiastic about Webster's Union party scheme: the New York City Union Safety Committee.

The tenuous Whig alliance behind the Albany platform held through the September state convention. The state platform expressed confidence in Fillmore's administration, called for obedience to the Compromise measures, and admitted the right of individuals "in a constitutional manner" to seek modification of any of the "Peace Measures." As arranged previously, the convention also carefully divided the state ticket among Sewardites, Silver Grays, and neutrals with no ostensible factional affiliation. George Patterson of Chautauqua County, a close Weed ally and the nominee for comptroller, was the most prominent Sewardite on the eight-man state ticket, and Daniel Ullmann, the candidate for attorney general, was the leading Silver Gray.⁷⁴

At stake in the 1851 election, aside from the legislature, were six of the nine positions on the all-important canal board. Although Whigs had distributed $3 million worth of revenue certificates immediately after passage of the Nine Million Loan bill in June, the new board would allot the balance. Since the three holdovers on the board, two canal commissioners and the lieutenant governor, were all Democrats, Whigs needed a near sweep to retain control. Since most Whigs wanted to focus the fall campaign on the benefits of canal expansion, the issue that had brought such spectacular success during the special May senatorial elections, such a sweep seemed feasible.

Almost from the moment the state convention adjourned, however, Whig strategists encountered unforeseen setbacks. They counted on the canal issue not only to unite and mobilize their own voters but also to divide Hunker and Barnburner Democrats. They expected to pick up procanal Hunker votes in areas benefited directly by the proposed enlargement. Yet Democrats proved far more united and energetic than Whigs anticipated. Hunkers found the prospect of a Whig canal board distributing the boodle just as appalling as Barnburners found the distribution itself. Thus, for quite different reasons, both factions were determined to capture the canal board.⁷⁵

The struggle for control of the canal board also generated controversy over Ullmann's nomination. The attorney general not only sat on it, but he also had to defend the constitutionality of the Nine Million Loan in court from legal challenges Barnburners immediately brought against it. The attorney general also had to deal with the claims of Anti-Renters, who sought state intervention to end the quit-rent system. Like other Silver Grays, Ullmann rabidly opposed Anti-Renters, whereas his Democratic opponent, Levi Chatfield, vocally championed their cause. From the start, therefore, Whigs had to write off the small but potentially crucial Anti-Rent vote. They hoped instead to pick up enough offsetting votes from procanal Democrats and Whigs, for Chatfield had published a pamphlet denouncing the loan as illegal. Chatfield's stance seemed to give Ullmann an advantage among upstate proponents of canal expansion; the problem was that the views of the Manhattan lawyer on the canal issue were utterly unknown in the areas where it mattered most. Throughout the two-month campaign, therefore, suspicious upstate Whigs pressed Ullmann to write public letters endorsing expansion (which he did) and to speak in its defense along the canal itself (which he did not). Whether letter writing alone was sufficient to mobilize enough votes to offset the loss of Anti-Renters was the problem.⁷⁶

That problem, in turn, was complicated by an unavoidable fact. Most, though hardly all, upstate Whigs interested in canal expansion were Sewardites who hated the Compromise and scorned New York City merchants who clamored for appeasement of the South. Ullmann, in contrast, was renowned as a Silver Gray bolter in 1850 and a fervent champion of finality. That is why Silver Grays demanded his inclusion on the ticket. Despite the accord reached by factional leaders on the Albany Platform, in sum, animosities between rank-and-file Sewardites and Silver Grays remained intense.

They were fanned by New York City's Union Safety Committee, which had not participated in the love fest at Albany. In September it demanded that both Whig and Democrat platforms explicitly renounce agitation against or alteration of any of the Compromise measures. Neither party complied with this ultimatum. but the Union Safety Committee found the Whigs' platform especially offensive. Therefore it sought signed pledges from businessmen in New York Citv and upstate towns that they would not vote for anyone who did not unequivocally oppose revisions of the fugitive slave law. By election day, according to one estimate, at least 20,000 merchants in New York City alone had signed the pledge, which precluded them from voting for Sewardites on the Whig ticket. Worse still from the Whigs' perspective, the Union Safety Committee then circulated its own state ticket, consisting of three men from the Democrats' slate and four from the Whigs', including Ullmann.⁷⁷ After his nomination Ullmann was warned, even by Fillmore's allies like George Babcock, that any hint of association with the Castle Garden crowd would be the kiss of death among upstate Whigs, who already distrusted his commitment to canal expansion. As soon as the Union Safety Committee placed Ullmann on its ticket, therefore, rumors spread that upstate Sewardites would knife him. Silver Grays, in turn, vowed retaliatory strikes against Patterson and other Sewardites.78

Merchants not only refused to vote for many Whig candidates, but they also withheld contributions to the Whigs' war chest. So, significantly, did patronage-holding Whig allies of the Union Safety Committee—Young, Maxwell, and the new naval officer, David Bokee, a well-known friend of Webster. While privately assuring Fillmore that they supported the whole Whig ticket, they openly endorsed pro-Compromise Democrats over Whig candidates, not only on the state ticket but for the assembly and state senate as well. The chagrined Fillmore knew of their apostasy, but he refused to condemn it publicly, thus implicating himself as their accomplice.⁷⁹

The result was a Whig disaster. Only two of eight candidates on the Whig state ticket won, and both were on the Union Safety ticket. Ullmann lost, however, for he was cut by upstate Sewardites and opposed by Anti-Renters who supported Chatfield. Democrats thus gained control of the new canal board. Silver Grav and Sewardite legislative candidates, knifed by factional foes, went down in droves. The huge advantage Whigs had won in May's special senate elections vanished; the thirty-two seats were now evenly divided, giving the Democratic lieutenant governor the deciding vote.80 Whigs' thirty-eight-seat cushion in the house shrank to two. Silver Grays crowed that Weed and Seward were now "flat on their backs." In contrast, Weed moaned that "a gallant, glorious party has been used up." Sewardites blamed the treachery of Silver Grays, the cupidity of Whig merchants, and the timidity of Fillmore, who refused to crack down on Maxwell, Young, and Bokee. Most of all, however, anti-Compromise Whigs blamed the blind presidential ambition of Daniel Webster, who had publicly sanctioned the Castle Garden meeting, who still saw the Union Safety Committee as a nucleus for a Union party, and who, they sputtered, sought Whig defeat as a way to discredit Winfield Scott's presidential candidacy. "Webster has succeeded better under Fillmore than he did under Tyler, in breaking up the Whig organization and forming a third party," fumed Fish.81

VI

By November 1851, most other northern states had already voted. Whether or not Fillmore's administration or Webster on his own tried to bolster their pro-Compromise forces, moreover, almost everywhere Whig candidates were crushed. Ohio, the other northern state with a crucial senatorial election in early 1851, provides a good example.

Throughout 1851 both Fillmore and Webster refrained from intervening in the Buckeye State, in part because they could not identify any reliable pro-Compromise Whig politicos who might benefit from federal aid. With striking unanimity, Ohio's Whigs hated the Fugitive Slave Act, deplored Fillmore's insistence upon implementing it, and complained that "Webster and Clay have contributed more to the annihilation of the Whig party in Ohio than any other causes combined." In sharp contrast to this overwhelming sentiment, moreover, by early 1851 virtually every Whig paper in the state was pledging fealty to the administration and tempering attacks on the Fugitive Slave Act in order to keep federal printing contracts, so nothing could be gained by switching them to other editors 82

Primarily, however, Fillmore and Webster hesitated to intervene in Ohio because, next to Massachusetts, the Free Soil party retained its greatest disruptive potential there. Both men wanted to avert the election of another Free Soil United States senator from Ohio in the winter of 1851 and Free Soil gains in the fall elections. They realized that their insistence on finality was burden enough for Ohio's Whigs to carry, and they refrained from any pogrom against jobholders that might drive still more angry Whigs to the Free Soil camp.

The Senate seat at stake in the winter of 1850–51 was Corwin's, to which Ewing was appointed by Seabury Ford in July 1850.83 As in Massachusetts, the legislature could confirm or replace Ewing for the remaining three months of that term, as well as fill the new full-term seat. Both Ewing and the Free Soiler Joshua R. Giddings sought that prize. Although each sounded alarms about a Union party possibly coalescing during the legislative session to defeat them, Whigs' anti-Compromise sentiment rendered such a possibility remote. In addition, Ohio's Whigs and Democrats remained sharply at odds over state economic policy, not only in the legislature but even more so at the state constitutional convention sitting in Cincinnati while the legislature met at Columbus.⁸⁴

Some interparty bargaining in the legislature was inevitable, however. Free Soilers still retained the balance of power in both chambers. Ewing and Giddings feared a Union party in the election for senator, indeed, because Whigs and Democrats had bargained in the 1849–50 session to divide the state patronage between themselves in order to exclude Free Soilers totally. Many predicted the reemergence of this so-called People's Line coalition to give one party the state jobs and contracts and the other the Senate seat. Common contempt for Free Soilers, if not mutual support for the Compromise, might cause Whigs and Democrats to cut a deal.

Considerable sentiment existed among Whig and Democratic legislators for renewal of the People's Line in 1850–51, but significant elements in both parties wanted instead to forge a coalition with Free Soilers by giving them the Senate seat in return for control of the legislature and its spoils. Exploiting Fillmore's vow to enforce the hated fugitive slave law, newly elected Democratic Governor Reuben Wood, whose nomination and campaign during 1850 had infuriated Free Soilers, denounced the fugitive law in his December inaugural address and demanded the complete abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Wood's nakedly opportunistic somersault so enraptured Free Soilers, from Salmon P. Chase and Giddings on down to local politicos, that the chances of consummating another Democratic-Free Soil bargain surged. But conservative Democrats, Ohio's equivalent of New York's Hunkers and Cushing's Democratic bloc in Massachusetts, were appalled at the thought of supporting Giddings, the Free Soilers' favorite, for the Senate. Nor would they support the nominee of the Democratic caucus, Henry Payne of Cleveland. Without complete Democratic support, the putative Democratic/Free Soil alliance lacked the votes to elect the senator or to distribute the remaining spoils. Whigs now had their chance.

Whigs, however, were even more badly fragmented than the Democrats. Some believed that Ohio Whigs had been so thoroughly indoctrinated with antislavery views by Whig "stumpers" for six years and were so repelled by the prosouthern course of Fillmore, Clay, and Webster that the party's only future lay in repudiating the Compromise and reaffirming antislavery orthodoxy, whatever the risk of alienating the administration. Elike northern anti-Compromise Whigs elsewhere, they were already booming Winfield Scott for the next presidential nomination, and they also advocated cooperation with Free Soilers in the legislature. No Whigs could tolerate elevating the traitor Giddings to the Senate, but they argued that a staunch Whig foe of the Fugitive Slave Act could attract enough Free Soil votes to win.

Others preferred the opposite tack. They were so incensed at Free Soilers' "corruption & selfishness" in pursuit of office since 1848 that their top priority was "to put them down." These Whigs favored the People's Line bargain with Democrats on patronage, and they would accept a stalemate that postponed the senatorial election until the next legislature or even support a Democrat to keep a Free Soiler out of that office. The Free Soilers' "object is office & their motto 'office by bargain or any other means,' " snarled one such Whig. "Quit buying meat at their stalls & they will soon be out of the market."

Between these poles stood straight-out Whigs composed primarily of Ewing's followers. They shunned bargains with either Free Soilers or Democrats on both patronage and the Senate seat. Such men came as close as any Ohio Whigs could to Millard Fillmore's model of good Whigs. They refused to endorse the Compromise openly, but since they had received most of Ohio's federal jobs when Ewing was in the cabinet, they considered it impolitic to flout Fillmore and embarrass Corwin by running a known opponent of the fugitive slave law for the Senate. They would grudgingly acquiesce in finality, and, as would occur in New York, they wanted to rally the party on different issues, such as opposition to the new state constitution then being drafted in Cincinnati. Their preferred candidate for the Senate was the incumbent Ewing, although some favored other conservatives like Samuel Vinton or Henry Stanbery.⁸⁸

Pulled in three directions, the Whig caucus in January rejected Ewing, Vinton, and Stanbery and nominated a nonentity named Hiram Griswold on the pretext that he could gain Free Soil backing. Calling this claim spurious, Ewing's friends attacked Griswold as a stalking horse for proponents of the People's Line who were prepared to let the Democrats have the Senate seat in return for control of state patronage. On that ground they refused to support him.

Neither all the Whigs nor all the Democrats, in sum, united behind their caucus candidates for the Senate. Nor would they vote for Giddings or any other Free Soiler. Stalemate ensued, just as in New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island. It was not until February 16, 1851, two and a half months after the session began, that state jobs were finally distributed, and here the People's Line finally prevailed to shut out the Free Soilers. No agreement was reached on the senator, however, and most legislators assumed that the decision would pass to the next legislature.

Then, in mid-March, the situation suddenly changed. The constitutional convention in Cincinnati finally completed its business and scheduled a popular referendum on its handiwork for June. The new constitution was not as bad as many Whigs had feared, for Whig delegates had combined with conservative Democrats to defeat the most radical economic proposals such as a clause authorizing the state legislature to repeal every bank charter in the state. But the Democratic majority in that body reapportioned the legislature in a way that, as Whigs complained, would "render it utterly impossible for the Whigs to obtain a majority in the next Legislature." Alarmed that this would be their last chance for at least a decade to elect a United States senator, the Whig caucus frantically reassembled and replaced the unpopular Griswold with Benjamin Franklin Wade, A resident of the Western Reserve, the hotbed of antislavery sentiment and Free Soil strength in Ohio, Wade had remained loval to the Whig party. Since October 1850, however, he had given hair-raising speeches against enforcement of the fugitive slave law even though he himself was a judge. With the aid of Free Soil votes and the abstention of disgruntled Democrats who still refused to support Payne, the Whigs then elected Wade to the Senate.89

Wade's election was a Whig triumph, but it resembled a pyrrhic victory. The selection of so extreme an antislavery man could hardly please Southerners or Fillmore even though federal officeholders in Ohio tried to reassure him that Ohio's Whigs would confine their antislavery sentiment "within legitimate bounds." Wade's election, in sum, aggravated rather than reduced the difficulty of reuniting the national party. Within Ohio itself, the blatant bargaining over the Senate seat and the flagrant pursuit of lucrative state jobs at the disposal of the legislature by Whig legislators themselves convinced many Whig voters that "the present Ohio Legislature is the most infamously corrupt that ever assembled." ⁹⁰

This burgeoning disgust with legislators who arrogantly assumed "that they embodied all the wisdom and ability of the State," and with a political system that had become unspeakably polluted, pointed to immediate trouble for Ohio's Whigs in the impending June referendum on the new constitution. Although Whigs stifled what they considered the most obnoxious proposals from the Democratic majority at the constitutional convention, they still regarded the new charter with horror. It reapportioned the legislature to deprive Whigs of a majority, and it menaced an activist, prodevelopment state by restricting appropriations, limiting the ability to fund internal improvements through bond issues, prohibiting county governments from buying stock in railroads, and increasing taxation on, and stockholder liability in, banks. It mandated new elections for every state office in October 1851. Furthermore, in what Whigs regarded as an invitation to demagoguery and incompetence, it made elective all the posts legislators had previously appointed—state executive offices below the governorship, the Board of Public Works, and all state judgeships.

Yet Whig voters lauded precisely this attempt to strip the legislature of patronage. As elsewhere, a disgust with politics and politicians that had nothing to do with the slavery issue was boiling up, and it would cost Whigs heavily. Although some Whig delegates refused to sign the new constitution in protest against the offensive clauses, and although almost every Whig editor and politician in the state went "against it tooth and toe nail," in June at least half of the normal Whig voters either supported the document or abstained, allowing it to pass narrowly. Such voters, in sum, disregarded the harm the new constitution did to their party's competitiveness and program. They did so, as one Whig explained, "to give the people directly, as far as they will, the appointing power."

"Election all wrong," the young Cincinnati Whig Rutherford B. Hayes tersely jotted in his diary after the votes were counted in October. "Democrats take all and would have taken more if there had been more to take." Democrats, indeed, swept all the previously appointive state offices, rolled up huge majorities in both houses of the legislature, and trounced the Whigs by an unprecedented margin in the gubernatorial contest. Whig candidate and Ewing ally Samuel Vinton was reduced to 42.4 percent of the vote. 2 Surly Whigs attributed their rout to anger at Fillmore and Webster and looked desperately for an attractive presidential candidate to spark a comeback in 1852. "Here in Ohio we are a little devoured," one confessed, "but Scot [sic] is a talisman with us."

VII

In some other northern states the administration played the patronage card against anti-Compromise Whigs, but removals were erratic and often hardened animosity toward Fillmore and his cabinet. Even where administration intervention did not cause Whig defeats, moreover, the outcome of the 1851 races reinforced the conclusion drawn by many northern Whigs at the end of 1850: only repudiation of Fillmore and Webster offered them a scintilla of hope for the future.

Dispensation of federal jobs in the nation's newest state was calamitous. Because California's entire congressional delegation was Democratic, the administration had no firsthand knowledge of the situation on the West Coast. It treated federal jobs there as sinecures for friendly eastern Whigs, much to the annoyance of men already in California. Thomas Butler King's appointment as customs collector in San Francisco fanned pique into outrage. How much this discontent affected the outcome of California's 1851 elections is unclear, but Democrats elected both congressmen. In the gubernatorial race John Bigler, brother of Pennsylvania's Democratic gubernatorial candidate, nosed out his Whig competitor by about 440 votes.⁹⁴

To the extent that midwestern results outside of Ohio secured support for the administration, Fillmore, not Webster, won credit. Whether it was his original determination not to allow cabinet members to advance their own presidential prospects with patronage or confidence gained from the apparently salutary moves in New York in March is unclear. But Fillmore took charge of midwestern appointments himself. When he won personal credit from grateful Whigs, therefore, Webster's jealousy only increased.

Iowa, for example, had no major elections scheduled for 1851, and its Whigs had already thrown their support to the Compromise the previous year. Nonetheless, Iowa's Whigs had long complained that the cabinet, out of deference to the state's two pro-Compromise Democratic senators, allowed Democrats to control the government's land office there. As soon as the Senate adjourned in March, therefore, Fillmore named a Whig as surveyor general. By itself, this appointment could not improve the electoral prospects of Iowa's outnumbered Whigs, but it did, Fillmore learned, cement Iowa's support for his renomination in 1852 if he wanted it.⁹⁵

In Wisconsin, Fillmore used patronage in a more heavy-handed fashion to redress the party's factional balance. James D. Merrill was named postmaster of Milwaukee after Congress adjourned in March, largely because he pledged to start a proadministration newspaper to rival the Sewardite sheet of Rufus King, who had previously secured the post office for a friend from Taylor. Merrill's appointment, however, failed to deter Wisconsin's Whigs from coalescing with Free Soilers in the gubernatorial and legislative elections of 1851 when they won their unprecedented victory. The triumph argued that defiance of, rather than compliance with, the administration's pro-Compromise stance still provided the route to success in the North.⁹⁶

Michigan posed a delicate problem for Fillmore, for he knew that only Free Soil support had allowed Whigs to capture two of its three congressional seats in 1850. He therefore attempted a complicated straddle on patronage. To woo antislavery Whigs and Free Soilers, the administration appointed former Whig/Free Soil Congressman William Sprague as Indian agent there. This move won widespread applause from antislavery Whigs in Michigan, disconcerted Fillmore's Silver Grav allies in New York, and would have been inconceivable on the part of Webster. Simultaneously, however, Fillmore, whose brother led Michigan's pro-Compromise Whigs, attempted to silence the state party's dominant Sewardite wing that was already booming Scott for the 1852 nomination. Apprised of the administration's get-tough policy, Detroit's federal officeholders—Alpheus Williams, Charles Babcock, and Oliver M. Hyde—abandoned assaults on the administration and the Compromise in order to keep their jobs. Meanwhile the pro-Fillmore Detroit Advertiser, fattened by revenues from government printing contracts, made concerted efforts to buy out the Detroit Tribune, a pro-Seward, pro-Scott sheet. Despite pledges of loyalty from cowed officeholders in Michigan and gratitude among anti-Compromise Whigs for Sprague's appointment, the Whig majority in the state legislature endorsed Winfield Scott for president in late March. Sewardite Whigs also dominated the Whig state convention in September. They not only nominated an antislavery man who won Free Soil backing for governor, but they also selected four Scott men and only two administration supporters as delegates to the anticipated Whig national convention in 1852. In response, Fillmore's supporters sat out the election in an effort to depress the Whig vote and thereby discredit Scott. Consequently, the Whig/Free Soil vote dropped from 23,561 (45.7 percent) in 1849 to 16,901 (41.3 percent) in 1851. Such sabotage hardly won friends for the administration from the party's dominant wing. 97

In contrast, Fillmore won acquiescence in finality from Illinois Whigs, who like their counterparts in Iowa faced no elections in 1851. During the summer and fall of 1850, many Illinois Whigs endorsed the Compromise, and strategic removals by the administration in late 1850 increased Whigs' flight toward its position. In January 1851 Democratic resolutions praising the Compromise for resolving the sectional conflict received almost unanimous support from Whig state legislators, and by the end of 1851 Whig papers openly condemned continued opposition to the Fugitive Slave Act. Nonetheless, as events would soon show, near-unanimous acquiescence in finality did not translate into support from Illinois Whigs for either Fillmore's or Webster's nomination. 98

Outside of Ohio, the midwestern state of greatest concern to the administration was Indiana, which held congressional elections in August. Like their Illinois neighbors, many Indiana Whigs embraced Clay's compromise in 1850, and the party's crushing defeat in that year's legislative elections clearly sapped the will of Whigs still inclined to oppose the administration's position. At the constitutional convention during the winter of 1850–51, Whigs joined Democrats in passing pro-Compromise resolutions by a vote of 90-25. Opposition came almost entirely from delegates representing Quaker and Free Soil strongholds in the Whitewater River Valley in southeastern Indiana. By the spring the state's leading Whig paper, John Defrees' Indiana State Journal, argued that agitation against the fugitive slave law should cease until it had a fair trial. Most indicative of Whigs' shift, however, was the retreat of South Bend editor Schuyler Colfax. For two years Colfax had argued that Whigs must seek Free Soil votes with a hardline antislavery stance, and he had bitterly vilified the pro-Compromise tilt of Clay, Webster, and Fillmore for ruining Whigs' hopes in the 1850 elections. In 1851 Colfax accepted the finality of the Compromise, and that summer he was nominated as a Whig congressional candidate on a platform that echoed verbatim the language of Fillmore's annual message regarding the Compromise and the fugitive slave law. Fillmore, in sum, had no need to use patronage to whip Indiana's Whigs into line behind finality.99

As in Illinois, however, acquiescence in finality did not equal support for Webster's presidential pretensions. By the spring of 1851 Defrees and Colfax, as well as other Whig editors, were booming Scott for the 1852 nomination. Individual Whig congressional candidates, moreover, took divergent stances on the Compromise. Whig incumbent Edward McGaughey, who had voted against the Texas-New Mexico bill, abstained on Utah and, incredibly, supported the Fugitive Slave Act, insisted during his campaign against pro-Compromise Democrat John G. Davis that he still wanted to impose the Wilmot Proviso on Utah and New Mexico in a vain—and, from this distance, ridiculous—attempt to win Free Soil support. Samuel Brenton, the Whigs' candidate in the Tenth District, also openly solicited Free Soil backing. In sharp contrast, Samuel W. Parker, who had been defeated by Free Soiler George W. Julian in 1849 and again challenged him in 1851, recognized that Democratic support for the Compromise dissolved the basis for the Democratic/Free Soil coalition of 1849. Thus he posed as a pro-Compromise Fillmore loyalist in hopes of winning over or keeping home Democrats, who had no candidate of their own in 1851. A third variant was represented by Colfax, who challenged Democratic incumbent Graham Fitch. Elected with Free Soil support in 1849, Fitch in 1850 had voted against the fugitive slave and Utah bills but for the crucial Texas-New Mexico bill. Hampered by a platform that embraced finality, Colfax could not stop Free Soilers from reendorsing Fitch. In most other districts, little separated Whigs from Democrats on the Compromise. 101

Whatever advantage or disadvantage Whig congressional candidates had on the slavery issue, their prospects were threatened by another factor that had nothing to do with it. The August elections coincided with a popular referendum on the new state constitution hammered out between October 1850 and February 1851. For years in the state legislature Whigs had opposed calling a convention and thereby earned a reputation for obstructionism. The vote for delegates in 1850 had occurred on the same day as the legislative elections when Democrats won such a resounding victory, and although party lines apparently did not hold in contests for delegates. Democrats still won a lopsided majority. 102 Although Whigs applauded many of the new constitution's provisions, the Democratic majority added some that Whigs found repellent. As elsewhere, restrictions were placed on state debt and on the ability of local governments to buy stock in railroads. Of greater political significance, the new constitution allowed immigrant aliens to vote in all elections after one year's residence in the state, four years before they were eligible for naturalization, a provision that was calculated to inflate the Democratic vote. Finally, a separate clause prohibited free blacks from settling in the state. Most Whigs did not oppose this measure, but the resistance to it in the convention had come from Whigs and Free Soilers. Given the pervasive racist sentiment in Indiana, Whigs knew that the popularity of this discriminatory measure would provoke a high turnout of voters who would most likely go Democratic in races for elective offices. 103

It could have been worse. With the aid of some Democrats, Whigs blocked the most radical antibanking measures at the convention. Unlike the Ohio and Kentucky constitutions, moreover, Indiana's did not require new elections for all state officials. Thus Whigs in 1851 escaped the impossible task of running against the immensely popular Democratic incumbent, Governor Joe Wright, whose name at the top of the ticket would certainly have increased the Democratic vote. Nonetheless, the constitution seemed so popular, especially its provisions reflecting the rising tide of antipolitician, antiofficeholder sentiment in Indiana and elsewhere, that Whig papers tried to deflect its consequences by endorsing ratification. That proved to be no contest. In August the new constitution passed by an enormous majority, 113,230 to 27,638, and the prohibition of black settlement won by an even wider margin, 113,828 to 21,873.¹⁰⁴

Given this landslide and another rout by Democrats in the legislative elections, Whig candidates for Congress ran surprisingly well.¹⁰⁵ The incumbent McGaughey lost to Davis, but Whigs won two of ten seats compared to one in 1849. Parker defeated Julian, undoubtedly to the administration's delight, and Brenton, who had Free Soil backing, edged out his Democratic opponent in the Tenth District. Colfax lost by fewer than 250 votes out of over 18,000 cast, and he blamed his defeat on ballots illegally deposited by railroad workers.¹⁰⁶ In three other districts, including McGaughey's, the margins against Whigs were just as slim. Still, the total Whig vote of 68,493 was about 2,000 less than the party had polled in 1849, while the Democratic vote grew by 5,000. With fewer than a third of the seats in the legislature, only a fifth of the new House delegation, and a declining proportion of the statewide popular vote, Indiana's Whigs remained in dire shape. With the Democratic vote bound to grow because of the enfranchisement of alien immigrants and the invincible Wright heading the Democrats' state ticket in 1852, Indiana's Whigs might well conclude that they needed the aid of gunpowder in the 1852 presidential election, just as they had in 1848.

Of the six midwestern states, in sum, Whigs openly defied the administration by seeking Free Soil support only in Michigan and Wisconsin. In the other four, Whig papers silenced their criticism of the Compromise and embraced finality, whether expediently or enthusiastically. Yet Wisconsin provided the Whigs' only statewide triumph after Ohio elected Wade to the Senate, and both of those victories, like one of the two congressional successes in Indiana, were attributable to Free Soil support. Of the four states that acquiesced in finality, moreover, only Iowa's Whigs were enthusiastic about Fillmore's nomination for 1852. Nowhere in the Midwest, significantly, was there any hint of support for Webster.

VIII

The two remaining northern states, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, therefore provided Webster's only hope of building northern support for his presidential aspirations outside of New England to counteract the possibility that New York might support Fillmore's nomination. Whatever New Jersey's Whigs thought about Webster or the Union party, the administration made no attempt to reallocate federal jobs there in 1851. Nor could Webster punish any Whig candidates that year. The state's new congressional delegation had been chosen in 1850, and even before Congress adjourned that year, the state Whig party had fled from the anti-Compromise stance of its Whig congressmen. All four Whig incumbents retired without seeking renomination, and one of the offending Whig senators was already bound to be purged by the new Democratic legislature elected that year. Hence little could be gained by removing Whigs who already swore fealty to the administration and finality, and Fillmore forbade patronage manipulation simply to advance someone's presidential prospects.

Neither adherence to the Compromise nor control of federal jobs, however, prevented New Jersey's Whigs from suffering the worst defeat in the party's history in the October 1851 legislative elections. As in 1850, those elections revolved around discontent with the Whig stand on state issues like railroads, taxes, and reform, not slavery or the Compromise. In the house, Whigs plummeted from 48 to 25 percent of the seats; in the senate, they dropped from 50 to 35 percent. Ineptitude on state, not national, policy had been responsible, but to aghast Whigs another former bastion now resembled New Hampshire. 107

Neighboring Pennsylvania, the nation's second largest and politically most important state, in contrast, seemed tailor-made for a patronage offensive that might shift the balance of factional power and force compliance with finality. The identity of whom to punish and whom to reward in Pennsylvania was crystal clear. Incumbent Governor Johnston and his allies, who included most state and federal patronage holders as well as the state's leading Whig papers, opposed adoption of the Compromise in 1850, and after its passage they remained vociferous critics of the fugitive slave law. Johnston's rivals, regular Whigs who idolized Henry Clay or Daniel Webster and Senator James M. Cooper's friends in central Pennsylvania, had supported the Compromise and joined Democrats in Union rallies to praise it. Nonetheless, no state so clearly illustrated the contrasting responses of Webster and Fillmore to anti-Compromise Whigs.

By the beginning of 1851, the Johnston and anti-Johnston Whigs were bitterly split over the question of repealing the state's 1847 antikidnapping statute that forbade the retention of captured fugitives in the state's jails. That question gave a concrete state policy dimension to Fillmore's demand that agitation against the fugitive slave law cease forthwith. Not only did Democrats make repeal of that law their top priority for the 1851 state legislative session; so did Cooper's allies on the grounds that only repeal could quash secessionism in the South. Philadelphia's bipartisan Union meeting of November 1850, which had been organized by Webster's allies Iosiah Randall and Iohn Riddle, demanded repeal, and after that meeting Joseph P. Sanderson's Philadelphia Daily News, Cooper's major newspaper, ran editorials with headlines like "The Policy of the [Fillmore] Administration Re-endorsed.... The Act of 1847 Condemned. Its Repeal Demanded." Johnston, his newspapers, and his lieutenants in federal jobs, in contrast, adamantly opposed repeal on the grounds that it would doom Johnston's reelection, and they openly repudiated Fillmore's formula of finality. Johnston sent special messages to the legislature to rally Whigs against repeal, and he openly denounced Southerners who demanded it for interfering in Pennsylvania's

With Fillmore's blessing, therefore, Webster personally intervened in Pennsylvania to champion the administration's cause (and to build up support for his own nomination). Wangling an invitation to address the legislature in Harrisburg in order to secure Whig support for repeal, he called on it in early April to reassure the South of the state's devotion to the Union by complying fully with the Compromise measures. Undaunted, Johnston immediately followed him to the dais and proclaimed that nothing Pennsylvania did or did not do would threaten the Union, a reply that Webster correctly took as a personal rebuff. When the Democratic majority finally pushed repeal through the legislature over the opposition of all Whigs except Cooper's few allies at the end of the session, Johnston defiantly killed the measure with a pocket veto. 108

Nor was this the only evidence of Johnston's contempt for the administration. Through Philadelphia Customs Collector William D. Lewis and Morton Mc-Michael, editor of the pro-Johnston, anti-Compromise Philadelphia North American, Johnston had allied himself with former Secretary of State Clayton, who had launched the presidential boom for Winfield Scott the previous fall. In 1851 the pro-Johnston press eagerly raised Scott's banner, and from the moment the legislature assembled in Harrisburg, Johnston pressed the Whig caucus formally to nominate Scott. Opposition from Cooper's few legislative allies frustrated Johnston in February, but in March the majority of the inexperienced Whig legislators succumbed to Johnston's whip, to his free whiskey, and to the wheedling of McMichael, who traveled to Harrisburg for the occasion. After a night of revelry and arm twisting at Johnston's quarters, forty of the fifty-four Whig assemblymen and senators signed a card calling for Scott's nomination in 1852. Terrified that this endorsement might be repeated at the June state convention, anti-Johnston Whigs hastily organized a mass pro-Fillmore rally in Philadelphia and circulated the state with calls for nominating Fillmore, not Scott.¹⁰⁹

At precisely the time that Fillmore dropped the guillotine on Sewardite, anti-Compromise officeholders in New York, in sum, Johnston and his Pennsylvania subalterns had made themselves obvious targets for similar sanctions. Conversely, outside of New York and Massachusetts, no Whig in the North appeared so natural an ally for Fillmore and Webster to succor than James Cooper. To boot, Fillmore had the perfect opportunity to act. From the moment Fillmore assumed the presidency, Cooper and other anti-Johnston Whigs pressed him to sack the entire crew of federal jobholders in Philadelphia, but their chief target had always been Customs Collector Lewis. In late 1850 Cooper's allies had published charges that Lewis had forged most of the letters recommending his appointment and confirmation. The Treasury undertook a closely watched four-month investigation of these accusations, and Cooper, Josiah Randall, Charles Gibbons, and other anti-Johnston Whig regulars clamored for the administration to smite Johnston and build up the pro-Compromise, proadministration wing of the party by replacing Lewis.¹¹⁰

Webster itched to launch a pogrom. He knew that Southerners considered Pennsylvania's compliance with the fugitive slave law of crucial importance. He also knew that no northern Whig, with the exception of Seward, was so hated by Southerners as Johnston, who went out of his way to snub southern governors. Pennsylvania was also central to his presidential aspirations. Aside from New England and New York City, Philadelphia housed the only Whigs openly promoting his nomination, and throughout 1851 he repeatedly visited Philadelphia to coordinate their activities. Livid at Johnston's insulting behavior when he visited Harrisburg and convinced that Johnston's defiant antislavery stance must not be tolerated, he urged Fillmore in March to initiate a purge. In April, Webster shifted public printing in Philadelphia from the North American to the Inquirer, a sheet promoting his candidacy, and to Cooper's Daily News. "I have no confidence whatever, in Gov. Johnson [sic], or his professions, & not much in Mr. W. D. Lewis," he bluntly warned Fillmore in May. "I"

Incredibly, however, Fillmore refused to punish Johnston or his cohorts. On April 16, at Fillmore's direct command, Corwin issued a letter to the Philadelphia press dropping all charges of forgery against Lewis as groundless and giving him what amounted to a slap on the wrist. The pro-Johnston press, particularly Johnston's new personal mouthpiece, the Harrisburg Daily American, edited by young Edward McPherson, crowed that Lewis' retention demonstrated that Fillmore sided with the governor rather than the malcontents who opposed him.¹¹²

Johnston's Whig foes found Fillmore's decision as incomprehensible as it was indefensible. In an interview with Fillmore, the hapless Cooper exploded in rage and threatened that he would now support Scott for president, an outburst for which he and his friends quickly apologized. "We could not under any circumstances go over to Genl. Scott and his friend Gov. Johnston without an entire abandonment of principle," declared Randall. But they could and would ground their arms, cease to compete for control of the state organization, and sit out the state election, he warned. How, they bitterly asked, could Fillmore and Corwin muff the best chance they had of gaining sufficient leverage to stop the nomination of Johnston and Scott at the state convention? "It is a striking fact," complained Charles Gibbons, "that while Gov. Johnston is making war upon everybody who sustains the policy of the National Administration, he is able by some power which nobody here understands, to use its patronage in promoting his own schemes."

The historian is equally bewildered. Why did Fillmore repeatedly give the cold shoulder to Cooper, who seemed so natural an ally? Why did he refuse to axe Johnston's allies when he decapitated Sewardites in New York, Michigan, and Wisconsin? Why retain so sleazy and perfidious an operator as Lewis in office? Why not lower the boom on a crowd that so richly deserved it? Absolutely nothing else about Millard Fillmore's entire presidency remains so puzzling or seems so dumbfoundingly stupid as his response to Pennsylvania's Whigs. Was this simply another example of Fillmore's congenital indecisiveness or could there possibly have been method behind his madness?

Answers to such questions can only be inferred. It is tempting to suggest, for example, that Fillmore's response to Pennsylvania proves beyond cavil his disinterest in seeking the presidency again. Unlike Webster, he was not bothered by Johnston's support for Scott, since, like most Washington insiders, he knew that Scott warmly supported the Compromise and consequently did not fear his possible nomination. Scott aside, however, the open opposition of Johnston and his men to the Fugitive Slave Act argued for action. Instead of Fillmore's disinterest in the presidency, therefore, the key to his behavior probably lies in the inherent tension between his twin goals of saving the country and saving the Whig party.

No state posed so stark and agonizing a choice between those goals as did Pennsylvania. Johnston was no moderate, like Washington Hunt or Hamilton Fish or Robert Winthrop or Samuel Vinton. Through his well-publicized clashes with the governors of Maryland, Virginia, and Georgia over Pennsylvania's lax enforcement of fugitive slave laws, he had become anathema to the South. Fillmore had as much reason to defeat his renomination as did Webster, who openly denounced Johnston on his many trips to Philadelphia and urged his friends to vote Democratic should Johnston be the Whig nominee. 114 Simultaneously, however, Johnston and his lieutenants like Lewis and John Ashmead, the U.S. attorney in Philadelphia, seemed indispensable to keep Pennsylvania in Whig hands, and in 1851 no state in the nation seemed more important to the party's future than Pennsylvania. After the losses of Connecticut and Rhode Island in the spring, when Fillmore had no way of anticipating the Whig upset in Wisconsin the following November, only three northern states still had Whig governors—Vermont, New York, and Pennsylvania. Losing Pennsylvania's statehouse would have a profoundly demoralizing effect on Whigs elsewhere, yet everyone knew that retaining it in the face of Pennsylvania's normal Democratic majority required a candidate who might cut into the Democratic vote like the ex-Democrat Johnston. More important, winning required maintaining the coalition between Whigs and Native Americans that had carried Pennsylvania for Johnston and Taylor in 1848.

Solicitude about that tenuous alliance best explains Fillmore's otherwise unfathomable decisions regarding Ashmead, Lewis, and the other federal officials in Philadelphia. U.S. Attorney Ashmead, for example, was a Native American himself, as he repeatedly reminded Fillmore. But Lewis was the linchpin to the alliance between Natives and Whigs. Cooper, Gibbons, Randall, and other regular Whigs objected to Lewis precisely because he appointed so many Natives and Taylor Democrats as subordinates. In their minds only true blue Whigs deserved federal jobs, and they wanted one of their own ilk to replace him. They were not the only group lusting after Lewis' influential post, however. Lewis won appointment largely through the efforts of former Native American Congressman Lewis C. Levin, who had promised Clayton and McMichael his support for a Taylor Republican party if Lewis got the job. Yet Levin and his henchman, Lewis, were opposed by a rival Native American faction who wanted the collector's job for Peter Sken Smith. 116

Replacing Lewis, in short, could have been even more divisive than retaining him. If Fillmore gave the job to Smith, he would infuriate Cooper and the regular Whigs as well as Levin's faction of nativists. Appointing a regular rather than Smith might drive both wings of the Native American party to run their own gubernatorial candidate, who would undoubtedly siphon off enough votes to throw the election to the Democrat William Bigler. Far better, it seemed, to keep the support of at least Levin's faction of nativists by retaining Lewis.

The key to keeping the state administration in Whig hands, however, was Johnston himself, not Lewis. That, at least, is what Fillmore and Corwin were told by Whigs whom they trusted—William Reed, the elected district attorney of Philadelphia, and James E. Harvey, an influential newspaperman currently on the staff of McMichael's North American. Fillmore's obvious confidence in these two was misplaced, for they fronted for Johnston. The hook they dangled before the president was the argument that only Johnston could possibly get the necessary Democratic and Native votes to carry Pennsylvania for the Whigs. Yet, they warned, this indispensable man would refuse to run unless Lewis was retained, and, if Johnston withdrew, Democrats would rack up huge majorities. To reinforce this threat, Johnston coyly refused to announce his intention to seek renomination until after Corwin issued his letter of April 16.¹¹⁷

If the imperative necessity of Johnston's candidacy was the hook dangled by Harvey and Reed, the bait was the promise that if Fillmore eschewed a patronage assault against Johnston's friends, Johnston would make sure that the Whig state convention adopted a pro-Compromise, proadministration platform and refrained from making any presidential nomination. Conversely, any mistake in Washington with regard to patronage would only ensure an endorsement of Scott and deter Johnston from running. Whether out of desperation or gullibility, Fillmore swallowed this baloney, and once he was hooked, Harvey and Reed played the line like championship fishermen. When the directorship of the Philadelphia mint opened up in May and Cooper pleaded for the appointment of a friend, Harvey warned of the implications: "We have a sensitive & nervous candidate & a delicate campaign to manage and therefore it is desirable if possible to avoid new troubles." If Cooper got a single crumb, in short, Johnston would refuse to run. The promise of a proadministration platform was also abandoned in May. The only way to hold the party together, cooed Harvey, was to make no references at all to Fillmore or the Compromise. 118

Their vow that no presidential endorsement would be made also had to be broken. Here Harvey and Reed brilliantly exploited Webster's strenuous efforts to line up Pennsylvania for his own nomination to play on Fillmore's commitment to Whigs' electoral success and antipathy toward a Union party. Webster and his

Pennsylvania friends were openly pushing for an endorsement from the Whig state convention, they argued, and Johnston would therefore be powerless to stop the delegates from nominating Scott in order to block the nakedly ambitious Webster. Cooper, Gibbons, Randall, and the whole anti-Johnston crew were already vowing to support Bigler rather than Johnston, complained Harvey and Reed, and Webster repeatedly boasted in Philadelphia that Bigler's victory over Johnston would be a triumph for the Union party. Narrow-minded and selfish Websterites, not the heroic Johnston, caused all the party's problems.¹¹⁹

Iohnston's betraval of Fillmore climaxed in June at the Lancaster state convention, where Johnston's forces outnumbered Cooper's 92-27. Those delegates who bothered to vote nominated Johnston unanimously on the first ballot. Efforts by Cooper's friends to obtain an outright endorsement of the fugitive slave law's finality were crushed. Instead the platform, most of which dealt with traditional Whig economic themes like the tariff, vaguely asserted that the adjustment measures "shall be faithfully observed and respected" by Pennsylvania's Whigs, a sharp contrast to the Democrats' explicit pledge to "observe and execute" the Fugitive Slave Act. The platform did rehearse the willingness of Pennsylvania's Whigs to carry out all provisions of the Constitution, if not the specific fugitive law that had been passed to do so, but it coupled that pledge with a needlessly belligerent declaration that southern complaints to the contrary were "a libel upon the fair fame of the citizens of the Commonwealth." Expressing "unbounded confidence" in Fillmore's administration because of its fidelity to Whig economic measures in one plank, it urged Scott's nomination for the presidency in another. As if this platform were not sufficient to enrage conservatives, Johnston then broke precedent by coming personally to Lancaster to accept the nomination. Arguing that all existing laws deserved respect and obedience, he pointedly insisted that had he been in Congress in 1850, he would have voted against the Texas boundary and fugitive slave bills and that both required immediate revision. 120

Johnston's spokesmen, Reed and Harvey, unblushingly blamed the convention's outcome on Cooper's friends, who, they asserted, had forced the nomination of Scott to stop that of Webster and scuttled a plank promising the rendition of fugitive slaves that Johnston had personally written because it did not unwaveringly oppose revision of the Fugitive Slave Act. Conservative Whigs, in contrast, were furious, especially at Johnston's acceptance speech, and none more so than the frustrated Webster. "I am quite prepared to see the defeat of Gov. Johnson [sic], & its necessary consequences upon the fortunes of Genl. Scott," Webster huffed. From that point on, in fact, Cooper and his friends, as well as Webster's Philadelphia lieutenants, announced their intention to support Bigler in order to defeat Johnston and discredit Scott. Once again, where Fillmore sought Whig success, Webster sought revenge. 121

In several campaign speeches Johnston continued to criticize the Fugitive Slave Act, and Whig papers and local platforms, especially in western Pennsylvania, also stressed the party's antislavery, antisouthern credentials. Nonetheless, Whigs tried to focus the race on economic issues, particularly on the need for tariff revision and on Johnston's success in reducing the state debt. Democrats in rebuttal largely ignored economic matters and stressed the sectional consequences of the campaign. Because of Johnston's open contempt for the fugitive law, they harped, his reelection could precipitate southern secession. The Union's safety, they cried, depended upon Bigler's victory. 122

Democratic scaremongering benefited enormously from the so-called Christiana Riot in Lancaster County in September during the last weeks of the campaign. Even though blacks perpetrated the murder of a Maryland slaveholder and the wounding of his son, Democrats held Johnston and the Whig party responsible for inciting their violence through the example they set in defying the fugitive law. They further pilloried Johnston, quite unfairly, for failing to pursue the "rioters" vigorously enough, and even the farfetched attempt by U.S. Attorney Ashmead, a Johnston ally, to charge some white bystanders at the affray with treason against the United States failed to blunt that charge. Together with the determination of Cooper's friends and Websterites to defeat Johnston, the riot ensured Bigler's election. 123

Johnston polled almost 10,000 more votes than he had in 1848, and Whigs actually gained four seats in the assembly and recaptured the state senate. Nonetheless, Bigler defeated Johnston by almost 9,000 ballots. About 1,900 Native Americans abandoned Johnston for a separate nativist candidate, and others, according to the vindictive Peter Sken Smith, voted directly for Bigler. Still, defections to Bigler by Cooper's central Pennsylvania friends and Webster's Philadelphia minions palpably contributed to the defeat. Despite the statewide gain by Whigs, there was a swing of about 1,400 votes against Johnston in Cooper's Schuvlkill County, between the two elections, and in Philadelphia City and County Johnston's vote dropped by about 2,200. "We have been defeated by Whig treachery," groused Edward McPherson. "Gibbons of Phila voted an open ticket for Bigler & that whole faction did the same." Other Whigs as well as Democratic friends of Bigler agreed; Webster, Cooper, and their vindictive friends had defeated Johnston. "Governor Johnston has been sacrificed—not destroyed," thundered the Berks County Intelligencer, "to gratify the vengeful spirit of a disappointed domestic rival [Cooper]—to remove a supposed obstacle to the ambitious schemes of a Presidential aspirant [Webster]—and to minister to the cupidity of a misguided and mistaken commercial interest [Philadelphia merchants who feared the loss of southern business if Johnston won]."124

Other aspects of the election had equally critical implications. In 1850 Pennsylvanians ratified a constitutional amendment requiring popular election of state supreme court judges, and in 1851 both Whigs and Democrats ran full slates of five judges. In selecting their ticket, Democrats rejected the bid of Philadelphia judge William D. Kelley and instead nominated his Irish Catholic colleague on the county bench, James Campbell. Both decisions had profound consequences. The furious Kelley, theretofore a stalwart and immensely popular Democrat, bolted the party and accepted the Whig and Native American nominations for county judge in Philadelphia. By bringing Democrats to the Whig ticket, he helped Whigs retain a 2,600-vote majority in the city and county in 1851 and thereby elect the state senators necessary to give Whigs a majority. Kelley would also go on to win fame as a Whig and even more so as a Republican. Foolishly, Democrats had handed their enemies a most powerful champion in "Pig Iron" Kelley.¹²⁵

Campbell's impact on the race was far more important and problematic, for everyone considered his nomination a blatant payoff to Irish Catholics and a palpable symbol of their growing influence in the Democratic party. Some Whigs attributed the vast bulk of the 18,000-vote increase in the Democratic total between 1848 and 1851 to a surge of immigrant Catholics attracted by Campbell's name on the ticket. But Campbell's nomination also infuriated Protestants and anti-Catholic bigots in Democratic ranks, and for months before the election Democratic leaders feared that Catholic haters would bolt to the Whigs. Not many did in the gubernatorial election, at least outside Philadelphia, but Campbell was the only Democrat on the state ticket to lose. The refusal of so many Protestant Democrats to support him, in turn, enraged Catholics. "The Catholicks [sic] of this place are up in arms at the defeat of Judge Campbell and have declared themselves Whigs hereafter," warned one frantic Democrat from central Pennsylvania. By appealing to those resentful Catholics, Harvey promised Fillmore, "Pennsylvania will be recaptured next fall by 10,000 easily." Thus was planted the poisonous seed that would ultimately prove fatal to the Whig party. 126

For the national administration, therefore, the loss of Pennsylvania had a silver lining. The rancorous Democratic divisions caused by Campbell's nomination and defeat and the prospect of picking up alienated Irishmen raised hopes of salvaging the state in 1852. At the same time, Bigler's victory ensured repeal of the state's antikidnapping law in 1852 and underlined the political futility of continued opposition to the Compromise. Johnston's defeat removed from office a major obstacle to Fillmore's goal of reuniting southern and northern Whigs. It also appeared to chasten Johnston's supporters. Criticism of the Fugitive Slave Act and of the administration by Whigs lowered to a whisper almost everywhere in the state. The Harrisburg Daily American instantly blamed Fillmore as well as Webster for the defeat, but it ceased publication within two weeks of Bigler's victory. Lewis and Harvey hastened to ingratiate themselves with Fillmore and other members of the administration in order to avert a postelection purge. Johnston's defeat, along with that of Samuel Vinton in Ohio and of Michigan's Whigs, moreover, temporarily deflated Winfield Scott's presidential balloon. Scott could not get the vote of a single Democrat, Quaker, or Union Whig in Pennsylvania, wrote one of Fillmore's supporters, and even Scott's proponents seemed to agree. Daniel Webster could barely contain his glee. "As to the 'North American', it is clear that Mr. Clayton & Mr. Harvey are a little in doubt, which way to steer, since the Penna election," he chortled.127

Webster was the last person to have celebrated Pennsylvania's results. His presidential prospects there were now dead, for his name was mud among the vast majority of Pennsylvania Whigs. Fillmore, Corwin, and Crittenden, but notably not Webster, received vows of loyalty from Johnston's friends after the election. Scott supporters pledged allegiance to Fillmore, moreover, precisely because they believed he would not run in 1852. At the same time, the man anti-Johnston Whigs and Native Americans now urged to carry the pro-Compromise, pro-Union banner in 1852 was not Webster. Rather, it was Fillmore himself.

IX

Whatever the reasons, northern Whigs suffered far more heavily at the polls during 1851 than did their southern colleagues. Where southern Whigs captured two-fifths of the House seats contested that year, northern Whigs won only 23 percent. Where southern Whigs gained a governorship from the Democrats in Tennessee and additional United States senators there and in Louisiana and Missouri, northern Whigs prevailed in only two of ten gubernatorial races in 1851, and they lost previously held Senate seats in Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New Jersey. Altogether the cumulative impact of the 1850 and 1851 elections on the Whig party had been decimating. When the new Thirty-Second Congress opened in December 1851, Democrats outnumbered Whigs by 140 to 88 in the House and 35 to 24 in the Senate. 128 If Free Soilers are added to the total, Whigs held approximately 39 percent of the seats in each chamber. Even worse was the condition of Whigs in the states. At the end of 1851 Whig governors served in only five of the thirty-one states—Vermont, New York, Wisconsin, Florida, and Tennessee-and Whigs had lost New York's most recent statewide race. Similarly, Whigs controlled both houses of the legislature in only four states—Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Louisiana—whereas Democrats could boast of that honor in fully sixteen states, including the former Whig bastion of New Jersey. Union parties with substantial Democratic minorities controlled legislatures in that party's three strongholds, while in six states power was divided.129

Understandably, therefore, many Whigs believed that the party's future as a competitive organization depended upon victory in the 1852 presidential election. At the end of 1851, however, who their candidate might be remained a mystery. Everywhere in the North where anti-Compromise Whigs had openly boomed Winfield Scott—in Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, and Maine—they had lost. Those losses did not necessary dim enthusiasm for Scott, as Webster and some Fillmore men mistakenly believed, but they along with other northern results convinced even Scott's supporters that opposition to the Compromise must be jettisoned. In contrast, southern Whigs who heaped praise on Millard Fillmore had usually won, but Fillmore had as yet shown no inclination to run. Nor could southern votes alone ever elect a Whig president. Webster avidly sought the Whig nomination, but he was anathema to most northern Whigs and not considered seriously by Southerners. And Henry Clay, finally, had admitted the realities of age and the near certainty that 1852 would be a Democratic year by refusing to allow his name to be considered. 130

"Can nothing be done to prevent our going into a hopeless minority?" asked an anxious Pennsylvania Whig after the fall's defeats. The party in Pennsylvania and elsewhere remained angrily divided, he warned. "Should we go into the Presidential contest next Fall, situated as we are at present, we shall be beaten beyond peradventure, no matter who may be our candidate." Scott's friends had been silenced, for he now had no chance for the nomination. The main problem, therefore, was uncertainty among pro-Compromise Whigs as to "the views of the Administration in reference to the Presidency. Who is to be our candidate? Are President Fillmore and Mr. Webster rivals? Without knowing who [sic] to centre on, how can we act effectively?" 131

Chapter 19

"Scott & Scott Alone Is the Man for the Emergency"

"THE SESSION WILL BE SPENT more in President making than anything," Ohio's freshman Senator Ben Wade wrote home in January 1852. "Soon everything will give way to this one idea." Newspapers also reported "positively no transaction of Congressional business" because of the obsession with "who shall be President in 1853." As in 1840, 1844, and 1848, the gravitational forces of the political universe in 1852 pulled every public event, every policy controversy, and every personality dispute into the orbit of the impending presidential election.¹

If 1852 inevitably resembled other presidential years, Truman Smith concluded that Whigs confronted "exactly the same situation" as they had in 1848. Once again, Whigs required a military hero to win. "We are a minority party and can not succeed unless we have a candidate who can command more votes than the party can give him," he counseled a North Carolinian on May 1, 1852. "Every consideration which justified us in going for Taylor in /48 requires that we should go for Scott now."

Although a Whig now occupied the White House, Whigs' "situation" was strikingly akin to that four years earlier. Once again the convening of a new Congress crystallized the scramble for their nomination. Just as prosperity engendered by wartime financing and grain exports had temporarily neutralized traditional Whig economic appeals in early 1848, so a boom spawned by California gold strikes, surging foreign investment, and frenetic railroad construction appeared to eliminate economic issues in 1852. Just as sectional divisions over possible enactment of the Wilmot Proviso influenced northern and southern Whigs' respective preferences for the nominee and dictated their subsequent Janus-faced campaign in 1848, so poisonous sectional strife over the Compromise threatened to contaminate the 1852 nomination contest and to cripple Whig efforts during the following campaign. And just as defeats in the state and congressional elections of late 1847 combined with loss of the antiwar issue in March 1848 had convinced many Whigs that they needed gunpowder to capture the fortress of Loco Focoism, so northern Whigs' losses in the off-year elections of 1850 and 1851 persuaded many that they needed a famous general to maximize their vote in 1852.

Conditions in 1852, however, formed a mirror image rather than an exact replica of those in 1848. In 1848, Taylor's appeal to the vital Native American vote in Pennsylvania helped him secure nomination and election; in 1852, nativists there and elsewhere vehemently opposed Winfield Scott. In 1848, most southern Whigs zealously sought, and most northern Whigs vigorously opposed, Taylor's nomination; in 1852, northern Whigs led the drive for Scott, whereas almost all Southerners tried to derail him. Suspicious of Taylor's No Party tactics, northern Whigs in 1848 demanded concrete evidence of his fidelity to Whig principles; his southern backers would dispense with pledges, platforms, and even a formal convention nomination. In 1852, in contrast, Southerners insisted upon irrefutable proof from Scott that he deemed the Compromise measures a final settlement of the slavery controversy.

Social, economic, and political developments between 1848 and 1852 produced these reversals. Ouarrels over slavery-related issues exacerbated suspicion of individual Whig leaders, eroded intersectional comity within the party, and complicated the task of selecting a presidential nominee behind whom all Whigs would rally. In addition, Whig control of federal patronage had aggravated factional rivalries within state parties and personal animosities among leaders since 1849. Job allocation under Taylor and Fillmore vividly reminded small-fry politicos that it mattered greatly not just whether a Whig, but also which Whig, occupied the White House. Most important, however, were changes Whigs could not control. Sectional, factional, and personal disagreements had wracked the Whig party since its formation, yet the powerful glue of conflict with the Democrats had always contained those divisive forces. Competitive zeal, in turn, had always depended on the clarity of differences with Democrats over specific policy options and general principles of governance. By 1852 the deepening of sectional, factional, and personal divisions among Whigs coincided with a diminution of differences from, and a waning of policy conflict with, the Democrats. By decreasing opportunities to deflect attention to issues that united Whigs against Democrats, these developments focused Whig leaders all the more narrowly on what divided them-sectional quarrels, the identity of the nominee, and calculations about patronage. Simultaneously, the disappearance of party differences made voter apathy as formidable an obstacle as sectional anger to mobilizing voters, thereby increasing the pressure to find a candidate who might rouse enough voters to win. Apathy, moreover, easily shaded over into alienation from the major parties and their leaders precisely because those politicians seemed concerned only with the spoils of office, not with providing alternative solutions to the electorate's grievances and problems. Hence, far more Whigs than in 1848 questioned the value of maintaining allegiance to an organization they now deemed purposeless. For such skeptics, the ability to win the presidency again in 1852 became a crucial test of whether the Whig party could, would, or should survive as a political organization.

Ι

Together three developments—the 1850–51 defeats of northern Whigs, the corresponding success of southern Whigs who defended the Compromise of 1850, and the emerging power of new Union parties in the Deep South—profoundly influenced the scramble for the Whig presidential nomination in 1852. Each different electoral trend particularly affected the prospects and calculations of one of the three chief contenders for that prize—Fillmore, Webster, and Scott.

Webster fixated on the Union party's apparent rejuvenation. Its Deep South victories combined with palpable northern Whig and Democratic divisions over the Compromise resurrected attempts in the late fall of 1851 to cobble together a national Union party for the presidential election. Anti-Compromise or Sewardite Whigs were so dominant in most northern states, argued Union party proponents like John O. Sargent, editor of the Washington Republic, and John P. Kennedy, that the National Whig minority must combine with northern pro-Compromise Democrats and then align with the southern Union parties. "Neither Whig nor Democratic conventions can make a President on old party grounds," Kennedy wrote Winthrop in December. "Nothing can succeed with the people but a strongly compacted conservative party." Prospects for a new party seemed so bright that several of Millard Fillmore's most ardent supporters envisioned Fillmore himself heading the Union ticket. "New organizations are forming in spite of leading minds of the old line," Oran Follett told the president in late November 1851 while arguing that now was the time to build a Union party around Fillmore. "You have only to cut loose from the anti-Compromise Whigs to rally to your support Union men enough to elect you as the honored head of a great Union party," echoed Daniel Lee, a Georgia newspaperman then working for the Patent Office in Washington.4

Nonetheless, Fillmore still spurned a new Union party. In sharp contrast, Webster, having orchestrated attempts to launch his presidential bid for a year, eagerly sought to bring it to fruition. Whig divisions and Whig defeats across the North convinced him by November 1851 that "there can be no entire Whig Ticket nominated for President & Vice President." He therefore instructed the Boston organizers of a November mass meeting to nominate him that "the Union idea should be kept up, & strongly put forth," and he was enormously pleased when its resolutions did so. Simultaneously, Benjamin Balche of Newburyport, Massachusetts, the self-appointed chairman of the imposingly titled but thinly manned National Union Party Organizing Committee, now broadcast Union presidential tickets pairing Webster with Georgia's Howell Cobb.⁵

Webster, the earliest, most avid, and most hopeless aspirant for the Whigs' 1852 nomination, turned to the Union party again in the winter of 1851–52 from a mixture of realism and desperation. The seventy-two-year-old statesman knew 1852 would be his last chance to grasp the maddeningly elusive prize and that his chances for the Whig nomination ranged from unpromising to improbable. He retained enough prestige in Massachusetts and New Hampshire to capture their delegates, but his prospects among Whigs elsewhere in the North seemed remote. He had allies but also many enemies in Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Maine. He might pick up a few delegates in New York City by cooperating with Sewardites against Fillmore men, but he had no strength whatsoever upstate. In Pennsylvania, on which he had lavished so much personal attention during 1851, his name was mud, and even James Cooper's friends, furious at the administration's cold shoulder on patronage, had abandoned him. Across the Midwest most Whigs execrated him. And in the South, Webster knew only too well, Whigs who had not joined the Union party palpably preferred Fillmore to himself.

Capturing an exclusive Whig nomination seemed a very long shot indeed, and given Whig losses in 1851, winning with it seemed doubtful.

In contrast, building a bipartisan Union party offered numerous possibilities. Since the powerful Union parties in Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi were widely expected to preserve their independence from both major parties, they could form a separate power base from which Webster could rival Fillmore's popularity in the South, especially since the two men's sharply contrasting attitudes toward a Union party were well known. To increase support among southern Union men, Webster promised Alabama's Henry Hilliard a juicy diplomatic post if he would support his nomination, and in the winter of 1851–52 he ostentatiously befriended Mississippi's Henry S. Foote, who had already been elected the Union governor of Mississippi, whom Kennedy considered the perfect running mate for Webster on a Union ticket, and who returned to the Senate for six weeks that winter before his January inauguration.⁸

Not only might the three (four if South Carolina went along) Deep South state Union parties give Webster a beachhead in Dixie, but the apparent trend of events suggested that they could provide the nucleus for a national organization. Once other southern Whigs and pro-Union Democrats understood that Union men from Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi would boycott the major parties' national conventions, he calculated, they too might defect to a Union party and drag along with them pro-Compromise Northerners from both parties who found fellow party members still too anxious to propitiate antislayery elements. Webster was told in November that Missouri's new Whig Senator Henry Gever expected the formation of a Union party in that state before the presidential election, and he knew of Kennedy's efforts to organize the party in Maryland. On the eve of the congressional session, moreover, pro-Compromise Democrats from both sections angrily stormed out of the House Democratic caucus when it tabled resolutions committing the party to the Compromise's finality, and in the Senate during December and January, Southern Rights Democrats blocked any action on Foote's finality resolutions. Frustrated and rebuffed, pro-Compromise Democrats, too, might find a Union party alluring. Then, in a widely discussed speech to the House on February 3, Florida's Whig Congressman Edward Carrington Cabell raised the possibility of a massive defection of southern Whigs to the new party. If northern Whigs continued to press for Scott's nomination, warned Cabell, he and other southern Whigs were prepared to abandon the Whig party in order to "act in harmony with the Union Constitutional party." Immensely heartened by all of these omens, Webster in speeches in New York City in late February continued to speak of "the formation of a Union party, of which he would be the head."9

By mid-March, however, even Webster admitted that the Union party had again aborted. ¹⁰ By then, both pillars supporting his renewed hopes of a Union nomination had crumbled. First, like many others in Washington in the winter of 1851–52, Webster believed that Fillmore would stand aside, publicly announce his refusal to accept a presidential nomination, and thus leave "the coast . . . clear" for Webster to monopolize the pro-Compromise elements in the Whig party and drag them with him into the Union party. ¹¹ But Fillmore, after a period of waffling and mixed signals, had a change of heart. On January 22, 1852, the Washington Republic, the administration's organ, denied that Fillmore would withdraw. In the context of Whig politics that winter, not withdrawing was equivalent to tossing

Fillmore's hat into the ring. Webster's friends were furious, and Webster himself was crestfallen, for they all recognized the consequences of Fillmore's decision. As the Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Public Ledger put it, Fillmore and Webster both "run on the same combination and merely weaken each other, while Gen. Scott comes in under a combination entirely different, being thus able to beat up Union Whigs in detail." With Fillmore still a possibility, in short, Webster could never monopolize the backing of pro-Compromise Whigs or line up the crucial support of federal patronage holders, who now would not dare to cross the president in backing delegates to the Whig convention or, more significantly, by following Webster into a Union party that Fillmore disdained. And without solid backing from pro-Compromise Whigs, Webster's chances of persuading Union Democrats to make him the Union presidential candidate plummeted.¹²

At exactly the same time that Fillmore toppled one prop buttressing Webster's Union party strategy, moreover, the other—the belief that the Union parties from Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi could serve as the nucleus for a broader Union party—was also rapidly collapsing. Like many other people, Webster reckoned between November 1851 and February 1852 that the Whigs and Democrats already in those state Union parties would never return to their old parties. That was indeed the intention of Union men when the new Congress opened in December. Both former Whigs and former Democrats in Georgia's Union delegation, for example, refused to attend the major party caucuses. Contending that "the mission of the Constitutional Union party is not fulfilled yet," Alexander Stephens contemptuously dismissed the Whig party as "dead" and condemned the Democratic caucus for embracing former Free Soilers and Southern Rights men. Stephens, indeed, worked with southern Democratic congressmen friendly toward Howell Cobb, Georgia's Union governor, to introduce finality resolutions into the Democratic caucus in order to precipitate a bolt of pro-Compromise Democrats should the caucus defeat them. 13 Simultaneously, Robert Toombs urged southern Whigs to introduce finality resolutions in the Whig caucus, and Toombs fully expected that northern Whigs' refusal to pass them would provoke a bolt by Southerners and "cutt [sic] them all off from their national organization and therefore shut them out of the Whig national convention." Mississippi's Foote returned to the Senate with precisely the same goal in mind—to force a vote on finality that could shift pro-Compromise men away from anti-Compromise colleagues in both old parties. And his successor, Walter Brooke, a one-time Whig elected by the Union majority in the Mississippi legislature, pledged that he would never support "the nominees of the next Whig Convention, because I fear the Convention will not be sound on the compromise."14

Yet events in Washington and in the three states themselves stymied these plans and undermined the new party movement. In Washington, new congressional recruits for a Union party once again failed to materialize. Southern Whigs, though undeniably suspicious of their northern colleagues and frightened by the possibility of Scott's nomination, refused that winter to abandon their party, a fact made abundantly clear by none other than Florida's Cabell on the opening day of the House session. Foote failed to force a Senate vote on his finality resolutions, and Democrats maintained an uneasy unity. Pro-Compromise Democrats in the House were angry about their caucus' tabling of finality resolutions, but the selection of Linn Boyd, a staunch Compromise man, as speaker appeased most of them. Most important, Democrats deemed it folly to abandon a party on the verge of winning the presidency.¹⁵

Southern Rights Democrats in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi shrewdly seized on this likelihood to shatter the bipartisan Union coalitions in those states. They demanded the immediate reorganization of the Democratic party, and by the time Congress opened, they had already called state conventions to select delegates to the Democratic national convention and invited their former colleagues in Union parties to attend them. ¹⁶ Union Democrats found this pressure to return to the Democratic party nearly irresistible, for if they allowed Southern Rights men alone to reclaim the mantle of Democracy and send delegates to the party's national convention, they faced the risk of losing any claim on federal patronage should Democrats win the presidency. Thus, in January, Union Democrats in the Georgia legislature tried to commit the Union party to send its own delegation to the Democratic national convention, while in Alabama and Mississippi more and more Democrats drifted back to the old party. ¹⁷

Democrats bent on redrawing old party lines also brilliantly exploited state legislative sessions that winter to disrupt Union coalitions. In Alabama, Democrats used the legislature's allotment of patronage to drive a wedge between Whigs and Democrats in the Union coalition. By January 1852, when a state convention reorganized the Democratic party, only a dozen of over thirty Union Democratic legislators continued to cooperate with Union Whigs. When Mississippi's legislature convened in January 1852, Democrats repeatedly forced roll calls on old economic questions such as banking, the disposal of state lands, and payment of the long-repudiated Planters' Bank bonds. These votes utterly fragmented the Union coalition and repolarized Whigs and Democrats against each other. 18

Having previously pledged that they would never return to the Whig organization, Union Whigs in all three states frantically tried to preserve the Union coalition and to stem Democrats' defection. 19 Nonetheless, their inability to retain Democrats in Deep South Union state organizations virtually doomed prospects for a Union party in 1852. Conservative Whigs' disinterest outside those states also helped abort it. Before Congress opened, for example, Samuel Eliot, the ultraconservative Websterite Whig from Boston, scoffed at attempts by John O. Sargent to recruit him. The whole idea of a Union party was ludicrous, he laughed, for by the end of 1851 no one anywhere opposed the Union. "How can a party exist without an opposition?" he pointedly asked Sargent. "And what party is going to stand permanently in opposition to the Constitution?" A Union party "cannot live alone, & it cannot find a vis-a-vis."

Aside from his astute understanding of what was necessary for a political party to exist—namely, conflict with a rival party—Eliot grasped a point of central importance. By the end of 1851, northern Whigs who had railed against the Compromise for eighteen months were ready to foreswear continued attacks in 1852. They signaled that resignation during the organization of the House and during the Senate debates on Foote's resolution, from which they assiduously abstained in order to avoid saying anything whatsoever about slavery or the Compromise. Again, southern Whigs never fully trusted this abjural of antislavery agitation by northern Whigs, but it robbed both them and pro-Compromise northern Whigs of any pretext for bolting the party and encouraged them instead to battle for control of its nominee and platform. With pro-Compromise Whigs and Democrats apparently comfortable in their old parties and the existing Union parties disintegrating with each passing day, hopes for a national Union party in 1852 expired. As Webster's long-time nemesis, Boston Customs Collector Philip Greely, Jr., jeered in reference to Webster's boasts of forming a Union party with himself at its head, "Uncle Dan is a dead man, & upon a dead horse." 21

II

Southern Whig congressmen did not abandon the Whig party in December 1851 because of the contrast between House Whigs' initial caucus on the morning of Monday, December 1, and its Democratic counterpart the preceding Saturday night. Spurred on by Toombs, southern Whigs planned to introduce finality resolutions at the caucus and to bolt when the northern Whig majority rejected them. Webster knew and approved of this scheme, as did Silver Grays like New York's James Brooks, since they fully expected the breakup to drive pro-Compromise Whigs into the Union party. The surprising result of the Democratic caucus, however, abruptly altered southern Whigs' plans.

To lure Southern Rights and Free Soil Democrats back into the party fold for the presidential campaign, Democrats tabled finality resolutions sought by pro-Compromise men, arguing that the Democratic national convention, not a House caucus, should enunciate party principles. Whatever the excuse, Democrats' action suddenly raised for southern Whigs the irresistible prospect of making the 1852 presidential campaign in Dixie a replay of the 1850 and 1851 congressional races when they donned the pro-Compromise, pro-Union mantle and pilloried Democrats as soreheaded agitators and outright secessionists. To make this case, of course, southern Whigs first required the adoption of their own finality resolution by the Whig caucus, and to the astonishment of politicians in and outside Washington, the Whig caucus passed it on a voice vote with barely a murmur of dissent. Only hours later, both Brooks and Cabell taunted Democrats on the House floor that Whigs, including the majority of northern Whigs, now were clearly a safer pro-Compromise party than the Democrats.²³

Exactly what occurred at the Whig caucus may never be known. Reporters were barred and no attendance was recorded, nor were votes or speeches. The best source, the angry debate on the House floor that same day, is filled with conflicting claims about its size, composition, and significance. Union and Southern Rights Whigs from Georgia and Alabama boycotted the meeting, and only a fraction of the remaining eighty-six Whigs showed up.²⁴ How big that fraction was and how many Northerners it contained are unclear. The safest conclusion is that the caucus attracted about half of the Whig members, that few Northerners dissented openly on the voice vote, and that those who disliked the finality resolution silently allowed it to pass in order to preserve Whig unity for the impending election.²⁵

Whatever their satisfaction with the caucus vote, southern Whigs knew that it alone could not undergird another pro-Compromise campaign in 1852. They demanded a presidential candidate openly committed to finality. "We are willing to take a northern man," wrote Tennessee's Whig Governor William B. Campbell, but only one "who is undoubted on the compromise." Throughout 1851, indeed, their newspapers had repeatedly vowed that southern Whigs could support no one for president in 1852 except a forthright Union man who, according to the New Orleans Bulletin, "must avow himself boldly and openly, as have FILL-MORE and WEBSTER, the friend and staunch advocate of the compromise as a final settlement of all the questions connected with slavery." "This," echoed the Memphis Eagle, "is a sine qua non with every man in the South." 26

By the end of 1851, Fillmore and Webster were virtually the only possibilities considered by most southern Whigs. Unlike 1848, 1844, 1839, or 1836, they lacked a slaveholding favorite son. Taught by Taylor in any event that even a slaveholder could take antisouthern stances, southern Whigs insisted on platform commitments in 1852. They gravitated to Fillmore and Webster because both personified the platform they wanted—an irrefutable commitment to enforcement of the fugitive slave law and to finality. What Southerners meant by finality was quite specific: no renewed efforts to have Congress bar slavery from any territories, prevent the admission of new slave states carved out of them, or change one word of the Fugitive Slave Act, and an insistence that further agitation of the slavery question by anyone, North or South, would not be tolerated. Almost all southern Whigs, moreover, considered Fillmore a far more reliable exemplar of these tenets than Webster.

Southern Whigs admired Webster's role in passing the Compromise in 1850 and in defending it and the Union in speech after speech thereafter. They never doubted his unshakable commitment to retention and enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Act. They cheered his defiance of northern antislavery elements in the party. Nonetheless, southern Whigs never completely trusted Webster. Some recalled his flirtation with Massachusetts' Conscience Whigs in the mid-1840s, when he strongly opposed Texas' annexation and slavery extension. Others remembered his Federalist background and his lifelong devotion to Massachusetts' manufacturing and mercantile interests. Most important, Southerners cited Webster's speech in Buffalo in the summer of 1851, when he was trying to court the Sewardites and Weed men. The territorial provisions of the Compromise together with climate, he assured his Buffalo audience, guaranteed that no additional slave states would ever be added to the Union. To southern Whigs this remark rendered Webster not only unelectable but undeserving of election.²⁷

Fillmore, in contrast, was regarded as sound. He had committed himself to finality in his annual message of December 1850 and again in December 1851. Ignoring Hamilton Fish's pleas to recommend revision of the Fugitive Slave Act, in that latter message he ringingly reaffirmed his determination to enforce it and castigated its opponents as enemies of the Constitution itself. What a North Carolinian said of Whigs in his state, therefore, applied to the entire South: "all are for Fillmore." During the spring of 1852 Whig state conventions in Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, Virginia, Tennessee, North Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana endorsed him, as did less official Whig assemblages in the Union states of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi. And in March, Henry Clay, now mortally ill, took one final stab at his old rival Webster and urged Whigs to nominate Fillmore in a public letter to a New York newspaper.²⁸

If southern Whigs overwhelmingly preferred Fillmore's nomination by the end of 1851, neither then nor later did Fillmore actively seek it. Since entering the presidency in 1850, he had refused even to discuss the 1852 race other than to forbid the allotment of patronage to benefit any aspirant for the party's nomination, a policy Webster found maddeningly restrictive. When the Boston mass meeting nominated Webster in November 1851, Fillmore told Everett he did not care a whit who the Whig candidate was so long as he was devoted to the Union, and Fillmore clearly considered all the most often mentioned possibilities—Webster, Crittenden, and Scott—to be in that category. Thus he concluded that he could bow out. In November and December, Fillmore told both his cabinet and Buffalo editor Thomas Foote that he would publicly announce his withdrawal. Only pleas from Alexander H. H. Stuart that an announcement could hurt Whig chances in Virginia's December gubernatorial election prevented Fillmore from saying so in his annual message. As insiders and reporters correctly stated, he postponed his withdrawal until January.²⁹

Meanwhile, pro-Compromise Whigs from both sections pleaded with Fillmore to remain in the race. Consciously or unwittingly, they played on Fillmore's love of the Whig party and his determination to commit it to finality. Only Fillmore could possibly carry Iowa and Indiana for the Whigs, argued correspondents from each. John Ashmead, the U.S. attorney in Philadelphia and a Native American, swore that Fillmore was the only Whig whom that third party would back and thus the only Whig who could win Pennsylvania. "The idea of Genl Scott carrying the state of Pennsylvania is preposterous," declared Ashmead. "He cannot receive one Native American vote."

Putting the Whig party on proper ground, declared his petitioners, necessitated Fillmore's candidacy. If Fillmore withdrew, Alabama's Hilliard warned, the Union party would make a separate nomination that could end any hope of reunifying the party or winning the election. More than that, as Fillmore well knew, independent action by the Union party would keep Whigs from Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and possibly other southern states from attending the Whigs' national convention. Without full southern participation, the chances of adopting a pro-Compromise platform were remote.³¹

His closest allies from New York echoed that message. Seward and the other managers of Winfield Scott's candidacy, they charged, wanted to impose an anti-Compromise platform on the party that would drive Southerners from it. According to Fillmore's friends, antislavery Whigs had given up on 1852, but they hoped to blame the defeat on southern Whigs' refusal to support the party's candidate in order to gull angry northern Whigs into joining a new, exclusively northern, antislavery party by 1856, when Seward himself expected to run. The only way to foil this scheme, Fillmore was told, was to get enough pro-Compromise delegates at the convention to adopt the right kind of platform. Yet pro-Compromise Whigs would never battle to control the district conventions that selected delegates if Fillmore withdrew, for his withdrawal would guarantee Scott's nomination and pro-Compromise Whigs' exclusion from federal jobs if he won. Only the promise of patronage down the road from a new Fillmore administration could guarantee the grass-roots effort necessary to succeed. Only a majority of delegates, in sum, could produce the kind of platform Fillmore wanted, and only the hope of making Fillmore the nominee could bring enough rightminded delegates from the North and South to secure it.32

These pleas did the job. Convinced, as he later wrote, that his withdrawal "would not only endanger the perpetuity of those measures, which I deemed so essential to the peace and welfare of the country, but would sacrifice many friends who had stood by my Administration," Fillmore had the Republic refute the rumors that he intended to withdraw. He would "sacrifice" his own wishes for the "cause" of committing the party to the end of sectional agitation. Sy Yet behind this decision lay a more pragmatic consideration. Fillmore's correspondents flatly and repeatedly told him that Webster by himself could never stop Winfield Scott from winning the nomination. If Scott ran without a pro-Compromise platform, it would forever shatter the Whig party, since Scott, as Fillmore knew, was anathema to southern Whigs. 4

Many southern Whigs revered Scott's achievements as a soldier. He was, after all, a legitimate hero of two wars, and while his partisan opponents tagged him with the sarcastic sobriquet of "Old Fuss and Feathers," his admirers alternated between "Old Chippewa" in reference to the War of 1812 and "Old Chapultepec" in reference to his capture of Mexico City.35 It was not Scott himself, but his northern advocates, notorious opponents of the Compromise and the fugitive slave law like Seward, Johnston, and Ben Wade, whom southern Whigs feared and detested. From their point of view, Seward, author of the hateful "higher law" doctrine, had bewitched Zachary Taylor into betraying the South, and Scott, no matter how imposing physically and professionally, would simply be putty in Seward's demonic hands. "Not one Southern state would cast its vote for him," warned the Savannah Republican. "The fact that he comes forward under the auspices of Mr. Seward of New York and Gov. Johnston of Pennsylvania . . . is enough to damn him to utter defeat in this section of the Confederacy." As Tennessee's Whig Congressman Christopher H. Williams warned in January, moreover, "If Genl Scott should be the Whig nominee . . . the Whig party as a national party will be forever disbanded." Scott's nomination, in short, might not only ensure Whig defeat, but it would also convert the party into an exclusively northern, antislavery party, exactly what Fillmore and his conservative New York allies had long dreaded. The need to avert that disaster and keep Southerners in the party is what ultimately persuaded Fillmore to "sacrifice" his inclinations for the good of the "cause."36

Ш

If southern Whigs gravitated to Fillmore in order to perpetuate the platform they had ridden to victories in 1850 and 1851, most northern Whigs seized on Winfield Scott to rectify the problems that had caused their own defeats in those years. Even Whigs like Horace Greeley, who considered Scott a pompous fool, had concluded by February 1851 that "we must run Scott for President, and I hate it" because only Scott seemed capable of diverting attention from embarrassments that plagued northern Whigs in 1850 and 1851 and of bypassing still other obstacles that loomed ahead in 1852. Democrats who understood that pro-Scott Whigs wanted "to reduce the [presidential] contest to a personal struggle" between Scott and his Democratic opponent were right. Scott's proponents expected a campaign based on men, not measures, and they were convinced that "Scott & Scott alone is the man for the emergency." "37

Scott had no connection to the quarrels over patronage and the Compromise that produced earlier defeats. In addition, his presumed popularity as a military hero could counteract the defeatism and demoralization that threatened Whig success. Reuniting the party by ignoring previous quarrels, reviving Whig spirits, energizing the rank and file, and mobilizing non-Whigs, especially in the North, were the central concerns of Scott's proponents. Only making a fresh start with a fresh face like Scott seemed to offer an antidote to past ills.

Truman Smith, for example, repeatedly faulted "the utter want of tact & skill displayed by our Whig statesmen when in power" for producing Whig electoral defeats, but he also cited the stigma of corruption tainting Taylor's administration. And to Whigs' horror, even Fillmore's official family became mired in muck when the details of the spurious Gardiner claim and Treasury Secretary Corwin's involvement in securing its payment were exposed in 1851. Given the odium of both previous Whig administrations, Smith and others believed that the party must find a presidential candidate with no official connection to either of them. Hence Smith believed that uniting behind Scott offered Whigs their only chance of victory. Scott had served as interim secretary of war under Fillmore during July and August 1850 when Fillmore could find no civilian to take that post. Unlike Webster and other cabinet members, or Fillmore himself, however, he distributed no jobs and was untarnished by scandal. His reputation rested on his triumphant military career; he was Mr. Clean.

Scott's status as outsider also might heal intraparty quarrels over the Compromise. Just as Whigs in 1848 sought a candidate with no record on the Wilmot Proviso to hold both northern and southern Whigs behind him. Scott's supporters wanted a nominee who had taken no public stance on the Compromise. Yet beyond this negative asset—no record that offended either pro-Compromise or anti-Compromise Whigs—Scott's supporters counted heavily on his personal popularity to mobilize the largest vote possible. When they declared "that the only platform we can fight upon in the North is Scott, Scott alone," northern Whigs meant more than a rejection of southern Whigs' demand for an explicit platform commitment to finality, although they indeed meant that too. They recognized that no platform could help Whigs, for old issues seemed obsolete and emerging matters of popular concern too divisive to rouse Whig voters from their defeatism and lethargy. Had Whigs believed that they could mobilize the electorate with an issue-oriented campaign. Scott's nomination would not have seemed so vital. Only the conviction that northern Whigs lacked a decisive edge on any issue made Scott's nomination seem indispensable.³⁹

Scott's proponents believed that the North held the key to victory in 1852. Certain southern states—Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, and South Carolina—seemed untakable by Whigs, they themselves hailed primarily from free states, and the North had 176 electoral votes to the South's 120. As would happen eight years later, a party could amass an electoral vote majority without a single southern elector, and some of Scott's proponents, like Boston editor William Schouler, spoke in 1851 of electing him exclusively with northern votes so that he "owed nothing to the South." Saner advocates like Smith admitted the need for some southern support. Nonetheless, he believed that Scott, if nominated, could get 133 of the 149 electoral votes necessary to win from Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana and that he also had a good shot at carrying normally Democratic Maine, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Michigan. In contrast, Smith argued, neither

Fillmore nor Webster, who had been millstones dragging down the northern Whig party in 1850 and 1851, could garner more than seventy-five electoral votes.⁴⁰

Scott's supporters thus pinned their hopes on the region where Whigs had done worst in 1850 and 1851. Since 1848, Taylor's margins of victory in Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania had been wiped out by Whig losses and Democratic gains, and Whigs had fallen even further behind the Democrats in Maine, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa. To sweep most of the North, as Scott's supporters asserted that he and he alone could do, Whigs counted on remobilizing Whig voters who for one reason or another had abstained since 1848 and on adding to them to counteract Democratic gains during that interval.

To do so, most Whigs knew they could not count on the elements that had brought northern successes in 1848. In many states that year, most significantly New York, they had benefited from Free Soil incursions into the Democratic vote. By 1852, however, many of those Democratic bolters had already returned to the party fold, and Democratic leaders were frantically rounding up the remaining strays. Fillmore's friends George Babcock and Thomas Foote, for example, believed that no Whig could carry New York in 1852 because the Barnburners and Hunkers had reunited. In 1848 Native American voters had provided Whigs' edge in Pennsylvania, and while many of Scott's advocates did not yet believe nativists' angry vows never to support him, they knew that openly courting them in 1852, as they had in 1848, would alienate two vital constituencies. One was the regular Whigs who had rallied behind Senator James Cooper, who fumed over the patronage given nativists, and who abstained or defected in 1851 in order to defeat Johnston's reelection bid. The other was the burgeoning immigrant vote, which everyone knew would be a central factor in 1852.

Most important, Whigs realized that their northern victories in 1848 had stemmed from their ability to mobilize Whig voters disenchanted with Taylor's nomination by promising that they would pass and Taylor would sign the Wilmot Proviso and by resurrecting attacks on Democratic economic policies when the economy slumped during the fall of 1848. In 1852, however, neither of those issues was available. Imposition of the Wilmot Proviso on territories seemed a dead letter to all but fanatical antislavery men, and, for reasons to be explained below, most—though hardly all—of Scott's northern backers thought it counterproductive to agitate against the Compromise and the Fugitive Slave Act that year. As New York Governor Washington Hunt, admittedly a moderate but none-theless a strong proponent of Scott's nomination, put it, "For one I am ready to proclaim that our action as a party has no more to do with Southern niggers than it had fifteen years ago." Of greater moment here, with each passing month in 1852, more and more Whigs recognized that they could not use economic issues that year or perhaps ever again.

IV

By 1852, diverse developments had rendered much of the Whigs' traditional economic program obsolete and blurred the distinction between them and Democrats on the few remaining economic questions requiring governmental action. Whigs always contended that economic growth and prosperity demanded the positive governmental intervention that they alone advocated. By their logic, the atomized American economy lacked the concentration of private capital necessary to diversify and expand. Thus government must supply investment capital directly through subsidies to large projects like canal and railroad construction or else facilitate its accumulation in private hands by chartering banks and other corporations, by limiting stockholder liability to increase people's willingness to buy stock, and by encouraging investment in manufacturing and mining with protective tariffs.

To Whigs, banks and tariffs were integrally linked as the keys to prosperity, for the oil that lubricated the engine of economic growth was credit. Individuals' ability to borrow beyond their existing resources and to use those loans to transport products, start businesses, pay workers' weekly wages, buy land to farm, and earn the profits from which to repay loans generated expansion and opened opportunity for upward mobility. Banks and businesses provided the necessary credit, and since the specie resources of the United States were limited, it came primarily in the form of paper bank notes, bills of exchange secured by goods in transit, and promissory notes.

The credibility of those paper devices ultimately depended on assurance that they could, if necessary, be redeemed in specie. Thus the supply of credit and interest rates for it ultimately depended on the nation's specie reserves. That is why Whigs regarded the tariff as so crucial. To them the biggest threat to the nation's specie reserves and thus to the availability of credit was an unfavorable balance of foreign trade. If the value of imports exceeded the value of exports, Whigs believed, specie would be drained abroad, and credit, the economy's lubricant, would dry up. Hence protective tariffs did more than shelter American manufacturers, mine operators, and workers from foreign competition. By limiting imports, they also slowed the exodus of specie and preserved the credit supply that freed men to pursue their economic ambitions beyond the limits of their restricted individual financial capacities.

Most Democrats, of course, had always castigated this program as baneful and unnecessary. They viewed credit from its dark flip side, as debt, as a trap rather than a release. They denounced its public form—bonds—as a burden on taxpayers and its private forms as threats to individual autonomy, as insidious inducements to self-enslavement. They attacked banks and other corporations as privileged monsters that violated the principle of equal rights before the law. They vilified paper money as a cheat and a fraud. They dismissed protective tariffs as pandering to manufacturers, who would inevitably raise prices to unjust and unjustifiable levels if shielded from foreign competition. What is more, they denied that active government intervention into the private economic sector was necessary to achieve growth or enhance the public welfare. "There is, perhaps, no more dangerous heresy taught in our land than that the prosperity of the country is to be created by its legislation," intoned Pennsylvania's Democratic Governor William Bigler in his inaugural message of 1852. "The people should rely on their own individual efforts, rather than the mere measures of government for success." "43

To Whigs' chagrin, by 1852 Bigler's analysis seemed correct. Since 1849 the economy had been soaring even without Whigs' governmental programs, primarily because of a huge increase in the specie supply fueled by the California gold strikes and by truly unprecedented British investment in the American economy. Thus, while the value of imports continued to exceed that of exports, as Fillmore noted in his December 1851 annual message, the total international flow of funds favored the Americans. Have Much of the British investment, in turn, went into railroad stocks and bonds, funding a spectacular construction boom that tripled the amount of track in operation from 6,000 to 18,000 miles between 1849 and 1854. Railroad construction itself had important stimulative multiplier effects. It provided markets for and thereby revived the previously prostrate iron and coal industries. It gave jobs to at least some among the swelling tide of European immigrants. It allowed cheaper and faster movement of agricultural goods and thus increased the productive acreage and profits of farmers.

Together these and other developments undercut the rationale for Whigs' program and eliminated many of the specific issues Democrats and Whigs had fought over since 1837. The huge new supplies of specie, for example, ended all talk about the pernicious impact of the Independent Treasury system. Simultaneously, they rendered moot many of the old quarrels over banking and paper bank notes, for now there was ample specie to back notes. As a result, Democrats' traditional aversion to banking and credit softened, a fact evidenced by substantial Democratic support for free banking acts in midwestern legislatures and increased demands from Democrats for the chartering of more banks in states like Pennsylvania. To be sure, many Democratic editors and politicians such as Pennsylvania's Governor Bigler clung to the old Jacksonian faith and continued to denounce banks, paper money, and special privilege. Nonetheless, in state after state, partisan combat over old banking questions waned perceptibly, and even Whigs pooh-poohed the idea of a new national bank.⁴⁵

Similarly, the railroad boom reduced old partisan disputes over the funding of internal improvements. While some of the earlier roads had been built at state expense, almost all railroads since the mid-1840s were private corporations, not public enterprises built with state funds, as canals had been. The necessity of securing charters, rights of way, and other privileges from state legislatures put railroads on the policy agendas of officeholders, but almost everywhere the competition for state favors pitted locality against locality or company against company, not party against party. Similarly, the lack of state funding did not mean that railroads relied entirely on private financing. Public support, however, usually took the form of investment by local rather than state governments, and those local bond issues or bond endorsements usually had bipartisan backing. In Congress, state legislatures, and city councils, Democrats proved just as enthusiastic about railroads as Whigs.

Prosperity also nullified Whig attacks on the low Walker Tariff. The unprecedented supplies of gold destroyed the argument that protection was necessary to secure credit supplies. Railroad construction and other business activity provided ample markets for iron manufacturers and coal miners; indeed, since the American iron industry did not yet have the rolling mill capacity to meet the demand for rails, anyone with a stake in the rapid construction of roads—and such people, ranging from stockholders to potential customers, numbered in the hundreds of thousands—had a stake in keeping the duties on foreign rails low. By the early 1850s, large textile firms also considered high duties unnecessary and counterproductive in that they only encouraged smaller, less efficient competitors to enter the business. All in all, the Whig demand for higher tariffs had also become moot.46

In the late 1840s and early 1850s, new state constitutions further eroded partisan conflict over economic questions by restricting state indebtedness and aid to internal improvements, mandating general incorporation acts that ended conflict over special charters, encouraging legislatures to pass free banking acts that had the same effect, and substituting biannual for annual legislative sessions, thereby halving the opportunity for partisan confrontation. As a result, partisan combat over most economic questions in both Congress and state legislatures declined appreciably from the starkly polarized levels of the 1840s. This trend appeared in the Thirty-First Congress and would be even clearer in the Thirty-Second. Some economic questions in certain states, like New York's Nine Million Loan, continued to engender sharp interparty conflict, and the rate at which levels of partisan disagreement sank between 1848 and 1854 varied from state to state. Nonetheless, from Louisiana to Wisconsin, from North Carolina to Connecticut and New Hampshire, party differences on economic policies diminished.⁴⁷

By early 1852 Whigs admitted that prosperity had apparently blunted the need for their programs, thereby spiking a once powerful gun for that year's presidential campaign. Even Whigs' public statements implied surrender. In his December 1851 message, Fillmore again alluded—briefly and perfunctorily—to the need for tariff revision and to the constitutionality of federal internal improvements. But he conceded that people had been blinded to the need for these policies by the plenitude of gold pouring out of California. Kentucky's Whig state platform in February, written by Henry Clay's old friend Leslie Combs, chorused Whigs' traditional refrain about protecting American labor but entirely omitted the words "tariff" and "duties." Virginia's state Whig platform in April flatly opposed protective tariffs and condemned lavish federal internal improvements. And in June, Whigs' national platform said absolutely nothing about banking and currency, defended the constitutionality but made no case for the urgency of congressional aid to rivers and harbors improvements, and adopted a milk-and-water tariff plank that Democrats accurately hooted was now identical to their own. Absent from it was any reference to the special needs of northern manufacturers, the threat of foreign pauper labor, the desirability of specific rather than ad valorem duties, or the need to reduce imports to protect credit.⁴⁸

In November 1851, Wisconsin's Nathaniel P. Tallmadge privately outlined the obviation of Whigs' economic issues with stunning acuity. Pointing, as Fillmore would, to the huge excess of imports over exports as a reason why a protective tariff would at some point again be necessary to fend off "disastrous results," he admitted, "The famine in Ireland by reason of the demand for our breadstuffs, mitigated the evils of the tariff of 1846, and when that ceased the evil day was put off by the discovery of California gold. This, with our Government stocks, state stocks, railroad stock etc. etc. etc. which are sent abroad, may put it off still farther." The United States had to have a much higher tariff, echoed Ohio's Ben Wade to his wife. "But this will never be done until a fatal breakdown brings men to their senses. And this would have happened long ago, except for the enormous quantities of gold from California." Whigs and Democrats now stood so close together on the issues of tariffs and internal improvements, a New Orleans Whig told Fillmore in February 1852, that in the approaching campaign

"many of the issues that have heretofore been made will scarcely be mooted at all." 49

Other Whigs believed that prosperity permanently rendered Whigs' whole approach to governance obsolete and wiped out forever disputes that had justified the Whig and Democratic parties' existence. "The real grounds of difference upon important political questions no longer correspond with party lines," the young Cincinnati Whig Rutherford B. Hayes wrote in his diary in September 1852. "Politics is no longer the topic of this country.... Government no longer has its ancient importance.... The people's progress, progress of every sort, no longer depends on government." Daniel Barringer's brother, a resident of Baltimore, sounded the same note in early 1853. Bankers who were investing in railroads, he reported, "say that never before has the world been so largely and regularly supplied with gold." Therefore, "the great dividing lines between the two old parties are fast melting away" and "issues formerly momentous are now of comparatively trifling importance."

Democrats also noted "the rapid approximation of Whig doctrines" to their own on economic questions. "There is now nothing but the name left to distinguish Democrats from Whigs," New York Barnburner Jabez Hammond informed Seward in November 1851. John Van Buren, the former president's son, also predicted that the impending presidential campaign would be issueless, a "dreary waste of petty plans, personal schemes, and small dodges," not "great questions" on which rival "parties took sides," as in earlier elections.⁵¹

Soaring prosperity thus spiked the heaviest artillery of northern Whigs, who felt enormous pressure to bring their voters back to the polls and to mobilize new recruits to offset Democratic gains since 1848. To many, therefore, only a presidential candidate who could arouse voters on his own, without an economic platform, seemed to offer hope. New Jersey's Whigs, for example, wanted a candidate who diverted voters' attention from their bumbling inability to handle emerging state issues dealing with economic reform in 1850 and 1851. They therefore sent a solid Scott delegation to the Whigs' national convention.⁵²

Indiana also illustrates the desperation that turned northern Whigs to Scott. In October 1852 (the date of state elections had been changed from August by the new state constitution) Indiana's Whigs had to run against popular incumbent Democratic Governor Joe Wright. Without any issues to ride, Whigs considered Wright invincible, and thus their first choice for gubernatorial candidate, Henry S. Lane, flatly spurned pleas from the state convention and the Whig legislative caucus that he run. Without issues, he repeated, the race was hopeless. Similarly, the party's preferred candidate for the state supreme court refused on the grounds that it would be "ruinous" even to enter a state ticket against a Wright-led Democratic slate. "Think of the excitement that will exist next Oct.," he complained. "The Presidential election approaching—every bog-trolling Irishman in the land voting—the Whigs in the minority by more than 10,000. The Democrats straining every nerve to carry the State elections in order to come, like so many victorious troops, to the battle for President. . . . What can any Whig hope under the circumstances?" Unsurprisingly, therefore, Indiana's Whig state convention in February 1852 chose national convention delegates and a slate of presidential electors pledged to Scott, even though almost all delegates to that convention were pro-Compromise and wanted "to quiet agitation" by "saying nothing about slavery" in their state platform. 53

 \mathbf{v}

If proponents of Scott's nomination hoped to substitute his personal popularity for now defunct economic issues, they also sought to divert attention from troubling new social issues percolating into the public arena in the early 1850s. By far the most important was the escalating crusade against liquor. For decades temperance associations had sought to reduce the consumption of alcoholic beverages, but they had relied primarily on moral suasion to convince tipplers to renounce strong drink. When they resorted to state authority, it usually took the form of local option licensing laws to regulate the number of taverns, inns, and "groceries" that sold liquor by the drink. By taxing those who sold booze, they sought to reduce consumption by raising its cost. The passage of the famous Maine Law in 1851, however, drastically ratcheted up the use of state police power, for that statute mandated a statewide ban on the manufacture, sale, and consumption of alcoholic beverages. Maine's example inspired temperance forces elsewhere to seek similar legislation.

Agitation for state-imposed prohibition laws swept across the North by the end of 1851 and appeared in some slave states as well. Reformers flooded legislatures with demands to emulate Maine's model, interrogated candidates from all parties as to how they stood on the issue, and, ominously, vowed to vote for no one, regardless of party affiliation, who opposed passage of the law. Boasting that a petition signed by 130,000 people was forcing Indiana's legislature to consider a Maine Law, one Whig declared, "Why, many of us no more think of voting for any man, unless he be right on this question, than we would vote for a free negro." Prohibition "bids fair to eradicate for a time all party lines," echoed a frantic Whig from Geneva, New York, in March 1852. "The Temperance question is far more important to the people of this State than any other that agitates the public mind," chorused another New York Whig in August. Whigs and Democrats alike would vote "for temperance men only," regardless of "the consequences" to "the two political parties." "54"

Temperance had, in fact, never been a strictly partisan issue. Both Whig and Democratic parties encompassed its proponents and opponents, and votes concerning strong drink in state legislatures prior to the 1850s were usually nonpartisan. Party leaders usually avoided official party stances on the divisive liquor question, and the fissures in Maine's Democratic party over that state's liquor law amply confirmed the wisdom of this hands-off posture. By 1851, however, zealous prohibitionists would no longer tolerate neutrality; they demanded open commitments from the parties and threatened to run their own independent candidates if they did not get them. Northern Whigs proved especially vulnerable to such pressure because their core electorate, the self-defined "respectable" middle classes who prided themselves on their sobriety, their female-centered home life, and their regular attendance at Protestant churches, enthusiastically took up the cry for prohibition.

The Whig constituency, however, included a number of groups who opposed prohibition—merchants, innkeepers, and liquor dealers; farmers who sold products to breweries and distilleries or simply converted apple crops into hard cider; men from all socioeconomic classes who enjoyed a drink; and independent thinkers who believed state governments had no business telling people what they could and could not consume. If prohibition became an issue in the 1852 elections, as seemed likely at the start of the year, and if Whigs endorsed it in platforms or established a partisan record on it with their votes in legislatures, they could alienate crucial supporters from the party.⁵⁶

Connecticut's spring election dramatically illustrated prohibition's perils for Whigs. Sobered by the Democratic success in blaming Whigs for enforcing unpopular local license laws in 1850, Whigs, like Democrats, tried to duck prohibition in 1851 by ignoring calls from temperance organizations to take an official stance on the liquor question. Silence did not avert another Whig defeat that year, and in 1852 Whigs decided to reverse course again. By then, Connecticut's Whigs had renounced any thought of running against the Compromise, and state economic issues were quiescent. At the close of the 1851 legislative session, however, Democratic Governor Thomas Seymour pocket-vetoed a measure to call a referendum on prohibition. With Seymour heading the Democratic ticket again in 1852 and Democrats still refusing to answer inquiries from Maine law proponents, Whigs decided openly to court dries.⁵⁷

Although the Whigs' platform said nothing about the Maine Law, their gubernatorial candidate, Green Kendrick, was an ardent prohibitionist, and Whig legislators had strongly supported the referendum bill in 1851. When Whig legislative candidates in 1852 pledged to support the Maine Law, therefore, temperance groups publicly endorsed them; in response, the Democratic press came out vigorously against state-imposed prohibition. Former Senator Roger Sherman Baldwin, among other Whigs, questioned the wisdom of their party's new tack. While the influence of the new issue "baffles calculations on both sides," he warned, "past experience has generally shown that the Whigs are the greatest losers when any new issue of this sort is brought into the election."

April's election results further convinced Baldwin that "the Maine law issue operated as such collateral issues generally do, very much against the Whigs." For the first time since 1843, Democrats won the governorship with an absolute majority of the vote. Seymour's total increased by 1,600 votes (5.3 percent) between 1851 and 1852, while the Whig total dropped by 515. These shifts widened the margin Democrats had already gained over Whigs from 1,300 to 3,400 in a state Taylor had carried. Statistical analysis suggests that almost one-sixth of the 1851 Whig voters either defected to the Democrats or refused to vote when the party embraced prohibitionism. Whigs partially compensated for these losses because they outrecruited Democrats among previous nonvoters by a four-to-one margin. Nonetheless, the losses were substantial, and according to Baldwin they came not in cities, where he expected them, but from farmers who sold hard cider. That fact was reflected in the legislative races, where Democrats captured the senate and widened their house majority from four to twenty-eight seats. Whatever the sources of the shifting voters, Whigs knew that prohibitionism had been political poison. "We have been defeated" more thoroughly than "for many years," moaned the Hartford Courant, because of "the introduction into the canvass of a side issue—of a question that was merely moral in its bearing." ⁵⁹

In early 1852, few people expected prohibition to be directly at stake in the impending presidential campaign. Regulating alcoholic consumption fell squarely within the jurisdiction of state and local governments, not national authorities. Nonetheless, voters wishing to reward or punish parties for their stands on it at the state level could influence the presidential turnout in November. Whigs' experience in Connecticut (and in New Hampshire, where Whigs also suffered losses that spring after embracing prohibition) signaled that courting dries had significant costs and that they needed a presidential candidate who could reawaken the enthusiasm of Whig voters alienated by that tactic. To many Connecticut Whigs, Scott appeared to be that man. ⁶⁰

Rewinning the allegiance of Whig wets offended by a pro-Maine Law stance, however, constituted far less than half of the problem posed by prohibitionism. The much graver danger, as most Whigs knew, was the political awakening of Irish and German immigrants. They might troop to the polls in unprecedented numbers in 1852 and vote Democratic in order to punish Whigs for what they regarded as intolerant and unconscionable attacks on cherished mores, as bigoted infringements on the individual liberties they had fled the Old World to secure. 61

An anticipated surge in the immigrant vote loomed over all political calculations in 1852. Since 1846 almost half a million Europeans a year had entered the United States. Most were Irish or German, most were Catholic, and almost all settled in the North and border states. By 1852, those who had arrived in 1846 and 1847 could meet the five-year requirement for naturalization, and in any event, Whigs believed with some foundation, Democrats had long employed fraudulent naturalization to inflate their vote. In addition, several midwestern states like Indiana, Iowa, and Wisconsin allowed unnaturalized aliens to vote. For decades, most immigrants, except for British and Scots-Irish Protestants, traditionally voted Democratic when they bothered to vote at all. Despite Whig complaints during the 1840s, however, the majority of recent immigrants, whether from disinterest or ineligibility, had not participated in American elections. They were a sleeping giant waiting to be aroused.⁶²

As astute Whigs realized, anger at holier-than-thou do-gooders trying to cut off immigrants' supplies of whisky and beer might be the prod that did so. In that event, as the results in New Hampshire and Connecticut indicated, Whigs would be the losers. Whereas opponents of prohibition abandoned the Whigs when they embraced it, dries among Democrats had shown little inclination to defect to the Whigs. That was why Baldwin warned that Whigs were always "the greatest losers" when such issues emerged. In sum, Whigs could never hope to mobilize a unified force of Maine Law advocates to counteract a surge of new immigrant voters toward the Democrats if prohibition remained an issue by the fall campaign. Far better, it seemed, to drop that hot potato and rely on their candidate's popularity.

Even if Whigs managed to shun the prohibitionist cause, however, they correctly expected an outpouring of new immigrant voters in 1852, and they knew that unless they cut into that vote, they were goners. In December 1851, indeed, something other than prohibition also aroused immigrants' political zeal, an event that momentarily overshadowed the impending presidential campaign, only to be quickly sucked into its vortex. It altered the calculations of every Whig and Democratic presidential aspirant, illustrated the difficulty of formulating a programmatic appeal to potential new foreign-born voters without also alienating members of one's own party, aggravated sectional and factional divisions among Whigs, and ultimately forced them to seek different ways to woo newly politicized immigrants. The explosion that set off these shock waves was detonated on Saturday, December 6, when the Hungarian exile Louis (Lajos) Kossuth arrived in New York City.

VI

Kossuth had led an attempt to win Hungarian independence from the Hapsburg Empire in Austria. When Russian troops intervened to help the Austrians crush the rebellion, Kossuth ignominiously fled to Turkey, leaving thousands of his followers to be mowed down by Austrian firing squads. In Turkey the sultan placed Kossuth's entourage under house arrest until they were "rescued" by an American naval vessel sent by order of Congress and carried to the United States. Despite Kossuth's unseemly abandonment of his troops, Americans considered him a hero, a freedom fighter, a Magyar George Washington.

Dapper and dashing, a splendid orator who dazzled crowds with his fluent English, the diminutive Kossuth ignited almost unprecedented excitement and adulation from celebrity-worshipping Americans. A Kossuth mania swept the East Coast even before he landed. Hundreds of thousands of people turned out to gawk at him in New York and other cities he visited, and they roared enthusiasm at his every word. Yet Americans expected that the grateful Kossuth, after accepting the applause of admiring crowds, would simply settle somewhere in the United States and enjoy the benefits of American liberty, as had so many other refugees from the revolutions of 1848. Kossuth instead turned out to be the most disruptive and politically embarrassing foreigner to set foot on American shores since Citizen Genet ⁶³

Kossuth announced in his very first speeches in New York that he wanted Americans to contribute funds to reenergize the failed Hungarian revolt. More important, he demanded that the United States government recognize Hungarian independence; that it officially warn Russia not to intervene on the side of Austria when the fighting renewed or face American military intervention on the side of the Hungarians if it did; and that it send an American fleet to the eastern Mediterranean to give teeth to that ultimatum. As he had in England on the way to the United States, furthermore, Kossuth also suggested the formation of an Anglo-American alliance to help Hungary against Austria and Russia. In sum, Kossuth insisted that Americans renounce the traditions of neutrality and non-intervention in European affairs that had been the cornerstones of American foreign policy since Washington's administration, a policy that Fillmore and Webster had enforced so vigorously. What is more, by the hundreds of thousands, adoring crowds screamed their approval of everything he said.⁶⁴

Even before Kossuth's arrival, Webster and other Whigs expected that Democrats would use him to revive their jingoistic program of spread-eagle expansionism and to expose Whigs' supposed "timidity" in enforcing neutrality laws against filibusterers. In particular, they feared that Democrats' cries for intervention to help Europeans struggling for liberty against autocratic regimes would galvanize support from Irish and German immigrants. To counteract this potential Democratic appeal, Webster ordered his friends to have copies of his Hülsemann letter and a dinner speech he had given in Buffalo printed in German and distributed in the South and West. "They would suit the foreign population, I think, better than anything else," he hoped. Yet even the bombastic Hülsemann letter paled next to the calls for direct intervention in Europe that Democratic presidential aspirants like Senators Lewis Cass and Stephen A. Douglas immediately raised after Kossuth spoke in New York. Thus the wildly enthusiastic reception Kossuth received seemed to give Democrats yet another advantage. As the pessimistic Winthrop put it, Kossuth's "advent" would "conspire with other circumstances in giving the Democracy an easy return to power." "65

Almost overnight, Kossuth threatened to inject a foreign policy question—intervention or nonintervention—into the center of the impending presidential race. According to Tennessee Whig Congressman William Cullom, a rare Southerner who advocated Scott's nomination, "This Compromise question will be a secondary element in the presidential canvass. . . . Other new and more immediate issues will enter the canvass such as intervention." Kossuth seemed so popular, indeed, that Whigs could neither ignore him nor allow Democrats alone to side with him. As the Philadelphia Public Ledger put it, "Each party, each clique of each party, would appropriate the great Magyar as an electioneering machine for the next Presidency." Kossuth, in short, did not displace the anticipated issues of the impending presidential campaign. He provided an issue; he filled a vacuum. 66

Various contenders for the Whigs' nomination scrambled to align themselves with Kossuth so that Democrats alone did not bask in his reflected glory. Fillmore's supporters urged him to invite Kossuth to the White House even before the Hungarian landed in New York, and he later reluctantly did so. Webster's friends, too, wanted him to 'take a strong hold of this Kossuth movement,' and Webster arranged for Foote to introduce a Senate resolution on December 7 that officially welcomed Kossuth to the United States and invited him to visit Washington.⁶⁷

Webster quickly learned that Kossuth must be handled as gingerly as nitroglycerin. As secretary of state, Webster dared not endorse Kossuth's demands that Americans abandon neutrality and nonintervention. Equally important, the Senate debate provoked by Foote's resolution of welcome and roll-call votes on inviting Kossuth to address Congress starkly exposed Southerners' nearly unanimous hostility to the Magyar and his cause. Rhetorical endorsement of rebellions for liberty frightened Southerners, who worried about setting a precedent for government intervention on behalf of abolition or slave rebellion in the South. When Congress eventually arranged a public dinner for Kossuth, therefore, Southerners, led by Georgia's Stephens, engineered a counter dinner to reaffirm their commitment to Washington's doctrine of nonintervention in European affairs. Consequently, as soon as Southerners protested Foote's original motion, Webster, fearful of further alienating Southerners, had Foote withdraw it.⁶⁸

Webster's temporary retreat allowed Scott's managers to cash in on the Kossuth mania. As the army's highest-ranking officer, Scott himself dared not make any public pronouncements about American foreign policy, especially since his commander-in-chief adamantly clung to neutrality and nonintervention. Indeed, Scott's supporters wanted him to make no public statements whatsoever. His propensity for malapropisms such as "fire in my rear" and "a hasty plate of soup" was notorious. Scott's managers rather than Scott himself, in sum, had to make the case for Scott's nomination. Of these, none was so important as Seward, with whom Scott was inextricably identified.⁶⁹

Seward seized Kossuth's cause with gusto. His lieutenants in New York City, Henry J. Raymond and Simeon Draper, immediately took Kossuth under their wing when he arrived there, and other followers urged him to exploit Kossuth's popularity. Always a fervent champion of human freedom who had long sought to lure immigrants to the Whig column, Seward introduced his own joint resolution welcoming Kossuth to the United States. This quickly passed both houses of Congress before Kossuth aired his demands for a change in American foreign policy, but knowledge of Kossuth's agenda failed to deter Seward. Southerners might scream and Silver Grays like James Brooks might denounce Kossuth on the House floor, but Seward saw political points to be won, both for himself in the long run and for Scott in the near term.⁷⁰ To embarrass conservative intraparty rivals, moreover, in December 1851 and again in January 1852, Seward delivered powerful speeches denouncing Russia's suppression of Hungarian independence as a blow to human freedom, but he carefully refrained from threatening that the United States would use force to stop such intervention in the future. Seward's friends were delighted by these orations, and Seward immediately arranged with New York printers to publish a million copies of them for distribution in the North and West, where immigrants were concentrated.⁷¹

By the time Kossuth reached Washington in late December after another tumultuous reception in Philadelphia, Whig leaders were divided over him, and everyone recognized the implications for the impending presidential campaign. Seeing a chance to win votes in the North, especially among immigrants, northern Scott men lavishly praised Kossuth's attempt to win political freedom. Fillmore, in contrast, was incensed that Kossuth publicly challenged his administration's foreign policy, acutely solicitous about not offending Austrian or Russian ministers any further, and embarrassed that he had invited Kossuth to the White House. When Webster finally brought Kossuth to meet him on the afternoon of December 31, therefore, Fillmore bluntly declared that the United States would never abandon neutrality and nonintervention so long as he was president. Angered by this rebuff, which Fillmore made sure the press printed, Kossuth addressed the House of Representatives a week later, urging it to ignore the president and to adopt the agenda he had set forth in New York. Southerners and Silver Grays had failed to stop the invitation to Kossuth to speak on January 7 and a congressional dinner in his honor that evening. But their warnings had effect. Kossuth's speech evoked only stony silence; any prospect that Congress would recognize Hungary, threaten Russia, or officially condemn Russia's actions in 1849 was dead.⁷²

Webster, still hoping to benefit from Kossuth's popularity, sought a position between Seward's warm embrace and Fillmore's cold shoulder. Aware that he could not renounce nonintervention but also that the pro-Hungarian speeches of Seward and of Democrats had eclipsed his earlier Hülsemann letter, Webster sought to refurbish his reputation as a champion of republican liberty. Telling Fillmore that he must attend the congressional dinner for Kossuth to defuse Democratic charges about the administration's insulting response to the Magyar, he joined Seward and Democrats like Cass and Douglas at the gathering and toasted the prospect of Hungarian independence without committing the United States to do anything that helped achieve it. Both Whig and Democratic politicos, sneered Baltimore's indignant Kennedy after the dinner, were engaged "in a ludicrous and disgusting competition for whatever amount of popularity they may be able to get out of the great Hungarian Pretender," who refused to accept the refusal of Congress and the president to change America's foreign policy."

Kossuth, indeed, would not take no for an answer. If the country's political leaders rejected his demands, he would go over their heads to the people. Five days after the congressional dinner, Kossuth left Washington to make a speaking tour of the West, where he hoped not only to raise money but also to arouse so much enthusiasm for intervention that the government would be forced to change course. Such a speaking tour could benefit only Democrats politically. Conservative and southern Whigs so heartily approved of Fillmore's rebuff to Kossuth that wooing foreign voters by praising him, as even Seward and Webster now recognized, would only further divide the party for the presidential campaign. Without official responsibility for foreign policy, Democrats, in contrast, could court foreign votes by promising to change it if they won the White House.⁷⁴

VII

One response to Kossuth, however, offered Whigs a different way to seek immigrant voters. Kossuth aroused immigrants even more than native-born Americans, but he also divided foreigners against each other. Recently arrived Germans saw in Kossuth a kindred spirit, but many Irishmen were infuriated by his proposed Anglo-American alliance. More important, before Kossuth left New York City for Washington but after Seward's speech praising him, Archbishop John Hughes, the nation's leading Roman Catholic prelate, denounced him. Seward's friends at first dismissed this criticism, but they soon realized that Kossuth outraged other Catholic clergymen as well as lay Catholics. As a Maryland Whig informed Fillmore, Kossuth's "appeal is to the Protestantism of the country to interfere by arms, if necessary, for the religious as well as the civil liberty of Hungary, against the Pope and the Jesuits." Catholics, in short, viewed Kossuth's proposed war against the Hapsburg Empire as a war against their church."

For every German who cheered Kossuth, therefore, a Catholic Irishman booed him. "Kossuth is taking the people by storm, and no mistake," wrote one Philadelphia Democrat. "Our German people are crazy, and Bishop Hughes' denunciation of him is widening the break between the Irish & Germans." From St. Louis to Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, New York City, Brooklyn, and Boston, the refrain was the same. Germans loved Kossuth, but "the Catholics here are Anti-Kossuth, to a man."

A personal friend of Hughes who had long championed Catholics' rights, Seward was embarrassed by Hughes' condemnation of Kossuth. Seward therefore immediately sought to right himself with those whom a Brooklyn ally called "the bigoted Catholics, who did not approve of your advocacy of the noble and generous Magyar" by broadening his appeal to all immigrants. He supported resolutions of sympathy for Irish exiles who had been the target of British persecution and introduced a Senate bill to force merchant ship owners to improve the sanitary conditions of immigrant passengers.⁷⁷

Other Whigs, however, decided that the best tack was to forget the Germans, whom Kossuth was turning against the Whigs by denouncing Fillmore's nonintervention policy, and to concentrate on the Irish, who hated Kossuth. Lew Campbell, a Whig congressman from Dayton, Ohio, and a major player in the Scott organization, for example, chided Boston editor Schouler for his overenthusiastic praise of Kossuth. Schouler must keep his eye on the ball, Campbell warned. Their top priority was to elect Scott. To win Ohio's Catholics for Scott, Campbell announced proudly, he had voted against the House resolution welcoming Kossuth, and that vote "shall tell in the fight for Old Lundy's Lane."

More than Irish Catholics' anger at Kossuth made Whigs believe their votes were takable in 1852. In Massachusetts, Boston's large Irish community, a mainstay of the Democratic coalition, chafed against Democrats' alliance with Free Soilers from western Massachusetts, who were notoriously anti-Irish, strongly pushed enactment of a Maine Law, and wanted to reduce Boston's representation in the legislature. Schouler, the target of Campbell's rebuke, relished the prospect of converting them to Whiggery in order to break up the Coalition. By backing a bill in the legislature to give alien immigrants equal rights with citizens to own real estate, Whigs "are fast becoming the Liberal party," Schouler boasted to Seward. "The Irish in & about Boston all swear by me, and I like them."

Prohibition was the key issue to Boston's Irish, however. In 1851, Free Soil legislative candidates had campaigned for a Maine Law, and in the 1852 legislative session they, along with most Whigs and those Democrats who sought to preserve the Coalition, passed one, to the fury of the Irish, who now seemed even more likely to defect from the Democratic column. In hopes of holding both dries and the Irish in the subsequent gubernatorial campaign, Democrats nominated a Maine Law proponent for governor and a wet for lieutenant governor. In response, Whigs ran an opponent of the Maine law for governor and a temperance man for lieutenant governor. And if that did not suffice to bring Irish into the Whig column, Boston's Whigs circulated a separate ticket devoted to repeal of the recently passed Maine Law featuring the Whigs' gubernatorial candidate and the Democrats' nominee for lieutenant governor. Proponents of the new Maine Law countered with a separate prohibition ticket headed by Horace Mann, Free Soilers' gubernatorial candidate and an ardent prohibitionist, and the Whigs' candidate for lieutenant governor.⁸⁰

The relevance of this tangled maneuvering over prohibition to the presidential campaign was that Schouler and other Massachusetts proponents of Scott's nomination believed that Scott could attract the alienated Irish without taking a stand one way or the other on liquor. Scott, after all, had commanded American troops in a war against England, Irishmen's archenemy. More important, Scott was believed to have particular appeal to Catholics.

Scott's supporters among Pennsylvania Whigs certainly counted on that appeal. Catholics among Pennsylvania's Democrats were furious with their traditional party because James Campbell, the Irish Catholic from Philadelphia, was the only Democrat on the statewide ticket who lost in 1851. Even before the Kossuth mania further outraged Catholics, in short, Pennsylvania's Irish Catholic votes appeared to be up for grabs, and as a Webster supporter from Philadelphia wrote in March, "The Scott men here count on the Roman Catholic vote." Precisely the vows of Pennsylvania's Irish Catholics that "they will never vote the Democratic party again," indeed, made Scott's Pennsylvania supporters so heedless of Native Americans' threats never to support Scott, for Catholic voters far outnumbered Native Americans.⁸¹

Irish Catholics' anger at the Democratic party in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and other states like Illinois, of course, did not ensure that they would vote Whig in 1852.82 That is why most northern Whigs considered the nomination of "Scott & Scott alone" absolutely critical. An Episcopalian himself, Scott educated his two daughters in convents, and one converted to the Catholic faith and joined a nunnery. Scott also took particular care during his march across Mexico to prevent his troops from desecrating Catholic churches. To be sure, this record offended anti-Catholic bigots among Whigs, one of whom fulminated against "our military, sapheaded, Roman Catholic Scott," who had "compelled the American Armies to prostrate themselves in the mud whenever a crucifix, or an idolatrous Doll Baby passed along," and who would therefore "get every roman catholic vote in the United States." Yet this presumed appeal to Catholics is precisely why his advocates wanted him nominated. Aware in the winter and spring of 1852 that the immigrant vote was bound to be larger in crucial northern states, fearful that Kossuth was arousing Germans against the Whigs in every city he visited, and certain that Whigs would be crushed if all immigrants went Democratic, they saw Scott's supposed popularity among Catholic immigrants as yet another reason why he offered Whigs their only hope.83

VIII

Convinced that with Scott "we can be successful" and that "without him we will be defeated," and dismissing Fillmore and Webster as "dead dogs" who had dragged northern Whigs down to defeat in 1850 and 1851 and would do so again in 1852 unless displaced, Scott's supporters arrived in Washington in December 1851 supremely confident that he would win the nomination. They quickly organized a Scott club under the day-to-day management of Assistant Postmaster General Fitz Henry Warren and James Pike, the Maine newspaperman once again reporting for the New York Tribune. They began to proselytize among Whig congressmen. And they had Pike prepare a campaign biography. They of course knew of southern Whigs' antipathy toward Scott, but for a variety of reasons they tended to discount it—at least initially.⁸⁴

For one thing, in December and January they believed that, if necessary, they could bulldoze Scott's nomination through over southern opposition. Like others, they did not expect any delegates from South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi at the Whig convention. Their absence would reduce the vote against Scott and, more important, the number of votes Scott needed for a majority. In addition, while Sewardites from New York never believed that Fillmore would not run, other Scott supporters accepted the accuracy of the rumors about his intentions. Fillmore's withdrawal would leave the South without its preferred candidate and reduce the race for northern delegates to Scott and Webster, and as they counted noses among Whig congressmen, they concluded that "no body" favored Webster. If Fillmore threw in the towel, in short, Scott would win in a walk.⁸⁵

Most Scott men, however, wanted Southerners to support, or at least acquiesce in, Scott's nomination. Even after they learned that Fillmore was not withdrawing, they evinced confidence that they could get that backing by arguing that only Scott could win enough electoral votes, especially in the North, to bring victory. As Philip Greely of Boston put it in March, "I trust that our Southern friends will soon begin to see 'that success is worth more than pride.' We can succeed if they will come in cordially to support the only man who can be nominated." Even Webster feared that southern Whigs would succumb to the argument of Scott's "availability," and in December and January, Seward and others cheered that "the South breaks." ⁸⁶

Southern Whigs insisted on more than a case of electability. They demanded that the nominee explicitly pledge himself to the Compromise's finality, and as the year opened, Scott had not done so. Seward initially hoped that Southerners would support Scott "without his giving a disclaimer that would ruin him in N.Y. & Pennsylvania." Yet even the few southern Whigs who favored Scott, like Tennessee Senator James Jones, who angled for the vice presidential nomination on a Scott ticket, his Tennessee lieutenant Congressman William Cullom, and North Carolina's Edward Stanly insisted that Scott could never be run in the South without declaring that not a single word of the Compromise measures should be altered. Other Southerners like Humphrey Marshall of Kentucky, Florida's Cabell, John Moore of Louisiana, and Tennessee's Christopher Williams and Meredith Gentry insisted even more adamantly that Scott must make a pledge before he could be considered. Scott's northern supporters found this demand both puzzling and annoying. They knew, and they knew that southern Whig congressmen admitted, that Scott was pro-Compromise, that while serving as interim secretary of war in 1850, Scott had done everything he could to persuade congressmen to pass the Compromise measures. "Genl. Scott is as open for the Compromise as any man in Tennessee," Cullom wrote his governor in January, and later Willie P. Mangum and Stanly publicly asserted the same to justify their support. Leading southern Whigs' personal knowledge of Scott's fidelity to the Compromise, Scott's northern managers believed, should suffice. "There must be no pledges, no resolutions, no compromise issue," and they hoped that "the South will come to that ground."87

But Southerners in and outside the Scott camp would not relent. Lew Campbell attributed their obstinacy to their sense of honor. Southerners, he explained, felt bound by the vows they had made when they foolishly signed the Round Robin the previous winter never to support anyone for office who was not explicitly pledged to finality. Pike came nearer the mark when he stressed that southern Whigs wanted to preserve the pro-Compromise platform on which they had won in 1850 and 1851. Ultimately, he believed, they would back Scott even without a pledge.⁸⁸

Pike may have gauged pro-Scott Southerners like Jones and Mangum, who also had vice presidential ambitions, but he fundamentally misread Gentry, Cabell, and others who hoped for a Fillmore candidacy. Rather than "let byegones be byegones," as Pike predicted, such men were determined to compel a surrender from northern Whigs, and they threatened on the House floor to bolt the party if Scott were nominated without a finality pledge. Northern Scott men opposed a pledge, Gentry railed, because, just as in 1848, they wanted to foment "the prejudices of the North against the South." They intended to run Scott "upon such ground that hostility to the fugitive slave law and the compromise generally, with strong denunciations of the same, and furious appeals to the prejudices against Slavery and the Slave States, can be indulged in by his Northern supporters." Scott's northern managers, he carped, whored after "that Abolition element at the North" that "has hung like a millstone about the necks of those in the South who have for years struggled for the ascendancy of the Whig party." Tennessee Governor William B. Campbell, the recipient of Gentry's warnings, concurred that Scott was "out of the question" because of his "equivocal position on the compromise & the warm support of such men as Seward & Greeley." For years southern Whigs had been "growing weaker, in consequence alone of our affiliation with such men as Seward"; it was "now good time to cut loose from them ''89

However understandable their suspicions, Southerners like Gentry and Campbell misread Scott's managers' intentions, and their accusations have misled subsequent historians. In 1852 most of Scott's northern backers had no intention of continuing to agitate against slavery or the Fugitive Slave Act in order to appeal to Free Soilers and abolitionists. Southern Whigs, not Scott's northern supporters, wanted to keep the Compromise issue alive. 90

Scott's strategists, in contrast, hoped to attract antislavery voters simply by avoiding a pro-Compromise pledge from Scott and a pro-Compromise platform. Much as Democrats benefited from silence on the prohibition issue when Whigs embraced it, Whigs, who correctly believed that Democrats would adopt a pro-Compromise platform, expected to pick up anti-Compromise voters by taking no position at all. They did not want to seek their vote openly by running against the Fugitive Slave Act or the Slave Power. The risks of an antislavery campaign aimed at wooing Free Soilers far exceeded its benefits. Reassuring conservative National Whigs, who had produced northern Whig losses in 1850 and 1851 by bolting or abstaining, was the central task.⁹¹

Ample evidence indicates that most of Scott's supporters had renounced all thought of campaigning against slavery, the South, or the Compromise in 1852. First, northern Whigs allowed a finality resolution to pass at the poorly attended House caucus on December 1, and during the vote for speaker of the House, when Whigs scattered their votes among twelve different men, the only clear anti-Compromise Whig in contention, Thaddeus Stevens, drew a grand total of sixteen votes. Second, not all of those who wanted Scott's nomination were anti-Compromise Whigs, at least not by the beginning of 1852. Delaware's John M. Clayton had initiated the Scott boom, more out of anger at his treatment by Fillmore's administration than resentment of the Compromise, and the legislative caucus of Delaware Whigs that endorsed Scott's nomination hardly wanted to denounce the Fugitive Slave Act. Rather, they believed that with Scott "we have the cards in our hands to win the game, and if we play them right Delaware will be redeemed." The majority of the Indiana Whig state convention that sent a solid delegation of Scott delegates to the national convention were pro-Compromise, and Indiana Whig leaders like John D. Defrees and Schuyler Colfax were anxious to appease southern Whigs as well as National Whigs in the North. Convinced that Scott was staunchly pro-Compromise, Illinois' Whigs also picked a Scott delegation. Connecticut and New Hampshire Whigs abjured antislavery agitation, as had New Jersey's by 1850.⁹³

Individual northern Whigs tried to reassure Southerners and northern National Whigs of this fact. Explaining to William Schouler, the anti-Compromise and pro-Scott editor, why he had given a conciliatory speech in the Senate, Massachusetts' John Davis argued, "We need as a party some common & satisfactory ground to rally upon." Therefore congressional Whigs should "rock the subject to sleep without giving or exacting pledges." "There is not an agitator in the whole Whig party here, at the moment," echoed Robert Winthrop from Boston, "nor one who cares to disturb anything that has been done." Connecticut's Truman Smith repeatedly wrote Southerners that he did not want to overturn Fillmore's pro-Compromise position; he favored Scott because only Scott could win. "The North have acquiesced & will acquiesce in these measures," he assured Southerners. Northern and southern Whigs differed on only one thing: "we of the North wish to let the whole subject drop and to sink quietly & forever into oblivion whereas some of our Southern friends (mistakenly I think) wish us to be all the while affirming & affirming that the thing is dead & shall never be revived."94

Needlessly alienating Silver Grays or abandoning the Whig party for a new antislavery coalition with Free Soilers is precisely what Seward and other Scott managers did not want to do in 1852. To them, fabricating antislavery bona fides for Scott in order to appease fanatics seemed suicidal. The beauty of Scott was precisely that his views were unknown, that he could be all things to all people, that he had publicly said nothing that would antagonize either pro-Compromise or anti-Compromise men. And it was exactly on this point—the determination to keep Scott from publicizing his views in order to reunite Whigs in the North—that Scott's managers ran afoul of southern Whigs' demand for a written commitment to finality.

By publicizing his enthusiasm for the Compromise or vowing to oppose changes in the fugitive slave law, as Southerners demanded, Scott would mimic the detested Fillmore and Webster and thereby lose his chief appeal to the vast majority of northern Whigs—namely, that he was not Fillmore or Webster. The goal of Seward and other Scott men was to hold pro- and anti-Compromise Whigs together without siding with either bloc. That is why they insisted that "Scott, & Scott alone" was "the only platform we can fight upon in the North."

To help ensure a platform-free campaign, Seward and other Scott managers purposely smothered all talk of slavery and the Compromise. They accepted the Whig caucus' action on December 1 and abstained from the Senate's debates on Foote's finality resolution because they believed that "silence is our true policy." Although Seward made countless Senate speeches in 1852—on Kossuth and Russian aggression, on British persecution of Irish exiles, on the unsanitary conditions for immigrants on ships, on rivers and harbors improvements, on disputes over Canadian fisheries—he said nothing whatsoever about slavery or the Compromise. By June, Free Soilers like Joshua Giddings, supposedly the targeted recruits of Scott's managers, were denouncing Seward for betraying his antislavery principles to propitiate Southerners. Similarly, for the first time in years, Sewardites in the New York legislature introduced no inflammatory antisouthern resolutions, and Fillmore's secretary, Robert Campbell, happily announced that Woollies and Silver Grays could therefore unite for the impending campaign.⁹⁵

The wisdom of Sewardites' refusal to attack the Compromise or slavery in 1852 became clear during New York's spring contests to select district delegates to the Whig national convention. From Rochester, customs collector and Fillmore ally James R. Thompson complained that he could not mobilize rank-and-file Silver Grays against Scott's forces, who had muted the issue that might arouse them. "We want some issue of Compromise & antiCompromise. We cant [sic] attach Sewardism to Scott & the odds is greatly against us here." He then added what the consequences of Scott's nomination and election would be: "a Seward triumph that grinds us to powder." Thompson palpably referred to the patronage, not the policy, consequences of Scott's victory, a consideration that motivated many in the Scott camp. Indiana's Schuyler Colfax, for example, told Seward that he supported Scott because Scott was pro-Compromise, an utter necessity in Indiana, and because Scott, unlike Fillmore and Webster, would not proscribe from office Whigs who had formerly opposed the Compromise. "

Northern Whigs, in sum, supported Scott's nomination and opposed that of Fillmore or Webster because they hungered after victory and its spoils, not because they wanted to renew assaults on slavery, the Compromise, or the South. Free Soilers scented their retreat toward expediency even in the fall of 1851. "The Whig party is hopelessly given over to Slavery," groused Vermont's Edward A. Stansbury. "It will, more and more, grapple the Slave Power to itself, and slough off all but the despots and the partizans [sic] of despotism."

ΙX

Most Scott men wanted no party statement whatsoever about slavery or the Compromise in 1852, but a few recommended acceding to southern Whigs' demand that Scott issue a pledge to support finality. This split largely reflected the prospect of winning back Free Soil Whigs and the degree to which quarrels over the Compromise had divided state Whig parties. The stronger National Whigs were in a state party, and the more adamantly they had insisted earlier on explicit acceptance of finality, the more implacably anti-Compromise Whigs in those states opposed any statement by Scott. Thus Sewardites from New York, Webster's enemies like Greely and Schouler in Massachusetts, Israel Washburn of Maine, and the Ohioans Wade and Lew Campbell pleaded, exhorted, and demanded that Scott say nothing. They did count on blocking a separate Free Soil nomination so that antislavery men would have no alternative to the Whigs once Democrats endorsed finality. Everywhere their message was the same. Scott "should write no letters"; "keep pens away from him," make "no pledges," and the result would be certain Whig success.98 On the other side and much to Seward's dismay, both John Defrees and Schuyler Colfax of Indiana prepared letters for Scott to issue; Truman Smith favored some kind of new Allison Letter from Scott; and Clayton, working through James E. Harvey, the Washington correspondent for the Philadelphia North American, pressed for one in order to win southern support for Scott's nomination, as did other Southerners in Scott's camp.⁹⁹

During the first four months of 1852, therefore, two tests of will took place in Washington over Scott's issuing a letter: between northern and southern Whigs and between members of the Scott camp itself. On February 8, Ben Wade boasted to his wife that at that evening's meeting of the Scott club he had browbeaten potential appeasers into "a final & irrevocable decision" that Scott must say nothing. Within a week, however, Harvey assured Clayton that northern and southern Whigs were about to agree on a letter Scott could issue. On February 26, Cullom promised that a letter from Scott was imminent; eight days later, Lew Campbell asserted that Scott "remains firm" and that his northern supporters remained adamant that no statement be issued. Almost weekly, rumors floated that a letter from Scott was in press, and that possibility repeatedly forced Seward and other hard-liners to scramble to stop it. Those like Colfax, who were not privy to the arguments in Washington, argued that an ambiguous letter could forestall a platform commitment, which would be far more harmful to northern Whigs. Some Southerners, however, played a deeper game.

Tennessee's breathtakingly ambitious James Jones, who was serving his first months in national office, whom several northern Whig newspapers mentioned as Scott's running mate, and who wangled a vice presidential endorsement from the same Tennessee Whig state convention that demanded Fillmore's presidential nomination, spotted an opportunity to leapfrog to the head of the political pecking order. As the naive Cullom wrote various Whigs in Tennessee, if Jones could entice a finality pledge from Scott, it would ruin Scott among anti-Fillmore Whigs in the North. They would then turn in gratitude to Jones, who had braved other southern Whigs' anger to support Scott, as the best man to keep Fillmore and Webster from gaining the nomination. Lean Jimmy Jones, of all people, might head the Whig ticket! Jones' game, however, was too clever by half. Once others learned of his scheming, his unpopularity among most Tennessee Whigs, and his rashness when he finally spoke in the Senate, Scott's northern managers dropped him from their list of possible running mates.¹⁰¹

Throughout Ianuary, February, and March the tug of war over a letter continued. Hard-liners in Scott's camp like Lew Campbell frequently voiced the hope that "the pressure of our Southern Whig friends is abating somewhat" and that "they will cave if we but hold out," but the pressure from Southerners, especially men like Gentry, Williams, and Cabell, proved relentless. 102 Tension escalated when Whigs from outside Washington pressed for a congressional Whig caucus to issue the call for the national convention. Its meeting had been delayed for months because Southerners refused to attend unless Scott first committed himself. Attendance at a caucus that called a national convention, just like attendance at the convention itself, was, by long tradition, equated with a commitment to back whomever the convention nominated, and in March, Scott still seemed the front-runner. If a caucus were called, therefore, southern Whigs might introduce a finality resolution that could provoke an explosion. Unlike the poorly attended House caucus on December 1, by the spring so much publicity had been given to Southerners' demand for a pledge from Scott that his managers believed passage of another finality resolution would doom his chances. At the same time, by

March, Southerners, who still feared they could not stop Scott at a national convention because Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and South Carolina would send no delegates desperately sought a pro-Compromise commitment from Scott's northern supporters if they could not get it from Scott himself.¹⁰³

Fully aware of the risk, congressional Whigs finally agreed to caucus on April 9, and Scott's camp exerted every effort to avoid an embarrassing confrontation. On April 6, North Carolina's Edward Stanly sent a public letter to the Washington Republic admitting that most southern Whigs favored Fillmore but also blasting Gentry, Williams, Cabell, and others for vowing never to support Scott unless he publicly pledged himself. Stanly knew that Scott "was as earnest, ardent, and zealous a friend of the Compromise measures as there was in the United States." North Carolina, Stanly averred, wanted a man like Scott whose patriotism was clear, not "a man who writes letters and makes pledges just before an election." Democrats intent on mischief, however, neutralized whatever soothing impact Stanly's letter had, for on the very day it appeared in the Republic, two Georgia Democrats forced the House to vote on a formal finality resolution. This roll call starkly revealed how deceptive the outcome of the two caucuses at the start of the session had been. Now two-thirds of the northern Democrats supported and 70 percent of the northern Whigs opposed the resolution.¹⁰⁴

That vote confirmed southern Whigs' worst fears. An angry Virginian immediately informed Webster that southern and northern Whigs must split and make separate nominations. "That vote left to me, and to other Whigs from the slaveholding states," Kentucky's Humphrey Marshall later protested to the House, "no evidence whatever that a faithful adherence to the compromise" or a determination to "proclaim" it "as a final settlement . . . would henceforth be considered as part 'of the Whig creed.'"

The likelihood of a rupture was so obvious when the caucus was gaveled to order by North Carolina's Mangum on the evening of Friday, April 9, that his Senate colleague George Badger immediately pressed for adjournment. Truman Smith, in response, insisted that the gathering proceed with its purported agenda: naming the site and date of the national convention. Kentucky's Marshall then tried to force a vote on the same finality resolution the Whig caucus had passed on December 1, and Gentry, David Outlaw of North Carolina, and Thomas Walsh of Maryland vowed that southern Whigs could never cooperate with Northerners who refused to swear to the permanence of the Fugitive Slave Act. Thaddeus Stevens, Truman Smith, Lew Campbell, and Samuel Parker of Indiana angrily opposed the motion. To avert further strife, a motion to adjourn and reconvene on Tuesday, April 20, was adopted. Before the attendees departed, Mangum, who automatically chaired joint caucuses because of his seniority as the Whig with the longest continuing congressional service, announced that next time he would rule Marshall's divisive motion out of order since the caucus should only call a national convention, not write the party's platform. 106

Tension between northern and southern Whigs soared during the eleven-day interval. On Saturday, April 10, the New York Tribune printed a blistering report from James Pike that accused southern Whigs and Fillmore's administration of breaking the unstated but vital agreement between northern and southern Whigs to disagree on matters involving slavery, "upon which, in the very nature of things, they could in fact do no otherwise than differ." "It is in a word," he steamed, "a very plain attempt to make Northern Whigs take Southern ground on the subject of Slavery. It is an attempt to destroy the old divisions, by making one side surrender to the other." Northern Whigs, vowed Pike, would never capitulate to the extortion of "Mr. 'KIT' WILLIAMS, and Mr. HUMPHREY MARSHALL, and Mr. E. CARRINGTON CABELL, et id genus omnes."

On Wednesday, April 14, the Democratic Washington Union ran an editorial on Pike's letter entitled "The Ultimatum of the Northern Whigs" that attempted to incite southern Whigs to open revolt. Pike's main point, insisted the Union, was that there "never can be any agreement or community of opinion between Whigs of the North and Whigs of the South in relation to sectional questions." Pike, the paper gibed, had let the cat out of the bag. Northern Whigs regarded the passage of the Compromise as an "odious" betrayal and would never submit to its finality. They intended to run Scott without any pledges in order to woo "the antislavery elements of their own section," and even if Scott now released a letter, Pike had made it clear that it could not be trusted.¹⁰⁸

Southern threats and Pike's reckless report further divided the Scott forces. Fulminating that a few southern "ultraists" were trying to extort "humiliating concessions" from Northerners, Henry J. Raymond's New York Times assured Southerners of northern Whigs' "acquiescence" in the "existing laws" and of their "aversion to any further agitation of Slavery and the incidental issues to which it has given rise." On April 16, Mangum came out openly in the Senate for Scott on the grounds that he was perfectly safe on the Compromise, as had William Ward, a Kentucky Whig, earlier in the House. 109 Complaining that the party was being "buffeted about by extreme men" in both sections, Truman Smith warned that unless Southerners were reconciled to Scott's candidacy, Whigs faced "overwhelming defeat" in the fall. Meanwhile the intransigent Philip Greely urged Seward from Boston not to yield an inch at the next caucus and to let Cabell, Marshall, and other southern soreheads walk out if they wished. 110

The Whig caucus on April 20 thus met in an atmosphere of extraordinary tension. With Mangum publicly in Scott's camp and prepared to disallow a finality resolution, several Southerners refused to attend: Dawson and Berrien of Georgia, as well, of course, as Toombs and Stephens; John Bell of Tennessee; North Carolina's Badger; all the Maryland Whigs from the House and Senate; Alabama's two Union Whigs; and all but one Missouri Whig. Some Northerners, too, absented themselves, and Seward, the lightning rod for Southerners, remained conspicuously outside the meeting, although he was close by in an anteroom to lend direction to Scott's forces. Altogether, only 70 to 75 of the 116 congressional Whigs were present.¹¹¹

When Humphrey Marshall again pressed his finality resolution at the start of the meeting, Mangum ruled it out of order. Marshall demanded a vote on the chair's ruling, and when it was upheld 46–21, Marshall angrily stalked out. Gentry then tried to amend the motion to call the national convention with a proviso that no Whigs who participated in the call would be bound to support its nominee unless the convention adopted a finality platform. When this amendment, after an angry debate, was also defeated, Gentry and Christopher Williams of Tennessee, North Carolina's Outlaw and Clingman, Florida's Cabell and Senator Jackson Morton, John Strother of Virginia, Louisiana's two Whig congressman, and Senator Walter Brooke, the Unionist from Mississippi, also departed. When the smoke cleared, only Stanly, Alfred Dockery, James Morehead, and Mangum of North Carolina, Cullom and Jones of Tennessee, a few Kentuckians, and the lone Missouri representative remained from the slave states.

Crowing that the caucus marked "the entire disorganization of the Whig party, as a national party," the Washington Union quoted extensively from the testy debate. The moderate Outlaw announced that to carry any slave state Southerners must have an explicit, public pledge from Scott himself, rather than private assurances from his surrogates, that "each and all" of the compromise measures was "a final adjustment of the slavery question," a warning echoed by even the North Carolinians who remained in the caucus. To this tocsin Maine's Israel Washburn defiantly retorted that northern Scott men would "never consent that the finality of the compromise measures shall be made a part of the Whig creed; and any candidate, whether he be General Scott or any other man, who insists upon that, or who is nominated by a convention which affirms or requires it, cannot . . . obtain the vote of a single northern State—not one." This blast, asserted the Union, showed that Southerners could never again trust the Whig party and that Democrats alone adhered to the Compromise. 112

As if to ratify the Union's analysis, the southern bolters published a manifesto refusing to cooperate with the Whig party unless it formally embraced finality, and numerous southern Whig papers insisted that the national convention, scheduled for Baltimore on June 16, must adopt a pro-Compromise platform or Southerners would abandon its nominee. These actions panicked some of Fillmore's northern supporters. Since they were competing with Sewardites to elect delegates and could afford nothing that offended rank-and-file northern Whigs, they bitterly complained that Southerners' attempt to dictate a platform in caucus, when only the national convention could frame it, would drive infuriated Northerners toward Scott. If Southerners boycotted the convention, as the bolters threatened, moreover, they would deprive Silver Grays of necessary southern allies and thereby ensure that Seward, Johnston, and other northern Scott men wrote the platform. Fillmore himself, in contrast, viewed the bolt as a wake-up call to spur southern Whigs to attend the convention in order to obtain an appropriate platform, and he hoped "almost against hope, that in some way or other its action may be made to harmonize and give satisfaction both to the North and the South." Aware that Scott's New York supporters were driven primarily by animosity toward him, he offered once again to withdraw his name from consideration immediately to produce a harmonious convention. 113

The southern bolt also further divided Scott's backers. All along, those recommending a conciliatory letter from Scott had argued that a pro-Compromise platform, especially one adopted at the South's insistence, would do far greater harm in the North than any personal statement from Scott, for a platform would implicate as accessories northern Whig convention delegates. Simultaneously, pro-Scott southern Whigs like Stanly, who had defied their section's clear sentiment, became all the more importunate in demanding a statement from Scott that justified their action. Pressure thus increased to get Scott to say something in advance of the convention to forestall a platform. Former hard-liners like Massachusetts' Charles Hudson and Philip Greely, Jr., aware that their state's pro-Webster delegates would support a finality platform, now prepared letters that Scott could issue. So did Horace Greeley, although he and others hoped to delay publication until after the convention so that Scott would not be seen as appeasing Southerners in order to win the nomination. Schouler and Truman Smith meanwhile escalated their private attempts to assure Southerners that Scott was a sound pro-Compromise man in order to blunt the demand for a pro-Compromise platform. 114

These efforts had only minimal results. In what Greeley considered a "first-rate" public letter, Virginia's John Minor Botts asserted that he had talked to Scott and found him perfectly sound on the Compromise. Only the impropriety of appearing to seek the nomination, cooed Botts, prevented Scott from making that commitment public. Botts also promised Schouler privately that he would fight any attempt by Southerners at the national convention to force a finality platform on the party. Yet even Botts, like Stanly, expressed annoyance that the pro-Scott northern press refused to print publicly what northern Scott men freely admitted privately—that Scott was ardently pro-Compromise and wanted no change in the Fugitive Slave Act. Without a public pledge, warned Stanly, southern convention delegates would demand a pro-Compromise platform, and if Northerners refused to give them one, they would bolt the convention and the Whig party would be destroyed.¹¹⁵

Intransigents among Scott's supporters, in contrast, insisted that allowing Scott to make a pledge after Southerners had bolted would constitute craven capitulation to southern intimidation and ruin all chances of holding northern antislavery voters. "If we yield to the South we are gone irrevocably!" cried one. Even having Scott issue a letter after the convention, in lieu of a platform, struck Seward and some of his New York allies as humiliating. "'Finality' must be avoided by hook or crook," insisted one Sewardite. "The fate of the party now & for years depends upon avoiding that obnoxious issue." As an alternative way to avert a pro-Compromise platform and still mollify Southerners, some suggested saving Southerners' face at the convention by having Scott delegates scatter their votes for a few ballots rather than ramming through his nomination immediately. Implacable Israel Washburn was far more realistic when he admitted that nothing could now stop a platform fight. "The battle is to be lost or won at Baltimore on the question of the finality resolutions." If all northern delegates "will only stand like a rock there will be no trouble." By late April, however, even Scott's most sanguine supporters knew that the real question now was whether the Scott forces would have enough rock-like delegates, not just to defeat a pro-Compromise platform but to win the nomination itself. 116

X

Despite their bravado at the beginning of the congressional session, Scott's backers knew by spring that they faced a dogfight for control of the national convention. "The greatest danger is that the South in convention will to a man go for Fillmore and that he will get scattering votes North enough to nominate," an alarmed Lew Campbell warned in March. "We must be particular about that. We must not lose a single delegate where we can help it." The delegate selection process had in fact been proceeding for months before the Whig caucus called a national convention, and, despite the few pro-Scott Southerners, Fillmore seemed assured of virtually unanimous support from the southern delegates who attended except those from Delaware. To make certain that there was no wavering from Fillmore, moreover, Virginia, Kentucky, and Louisiana sent two or more delegates to represent each congressional district and insisted that those delegates, or a majority of them, concur before the district cast its vote.¹¹⁷

By April, when Southerners bolted the Whig caucus, the question was not whether southern delegates at Baltimore would back Fillmore. It was whether all slave states would be represented. By then the four states with Union parties—Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and South Carolina—still had made no arrangements to pick delegates, and Whigs affiliated with those Union parties, like William C. Dawson of Georgia and Arthur F. Hopkins of Alabama, had told Fillmore that they had no intention of doing so.¹¹⁸ In addition, by April, North Carolina's Whigs, who faced a crucial gubernatorial election in August, still had held no state convention that could choose its delegates. They had not dared to call one because of continued antipathy toward the central clique and virulent regional disagreement over committing the state party to the legislature's reapportionment on the white basis as a response to incumbent Democratic Governor David Reid's anticipated use of the "free suffrage" issue.¹¹⁹

Alerted by April's two fractious caucuses, Fillmore and Southerners in his cabinet—Crittenden, Stuart, Charles Conrad, and William A. Graham—pressed for a full southern attendance. Even Webster, who by April knew that his only chance at the convention was to block a quick Scott victory and emerge as a compromise choice if Fillmore and Scott deadlocked, worked through Tennessee's John Bell to persuade Georgians to attend. And he personally pleaded with conservatives in South Carolina to send delegates. Working through Arthur Hopkins, Joseph Baldwin, and Henry Hilliard in Alabama, the administration succeeded in arranging a May state Whig convention to pick delegates that only Whigs who had never joined the Union party would attend, and their Alabama contacts assured them that Mississippi Whigs also would pick delegates. Graham contacted friends in North Carolina to make sure his state sent men, and they in turn also tried to induce the few Whigs in South Carolina to select a delegation. Aside from North Carolina, the machinery that picked these delegates was jerry-rigged, but by early Iune it was clear that the entire South would be represented at Baltimore. 120

The South's full attendance and its near unanimity for Fillmore meant that Scott's forces would have to marshal 149 of the North's delegates, or 146 if they could count on Delaware's 3 votes, to obtain a convention majority. Despite their earlier bluster, it was unlikely that they could ram Scott's nomination through with northern votes alone. Fillmore seemed assured of Iowa's delegates, probably some of Michigan's and Wisconsin's, and undoubtedly a minority of New York's. In New England, Webster posed the biggest threat to Scott's friends. Although they were certain Scott could carry Massachusetts, they knew that the majority, if not all, of its thirteen delegates would go for Webster, as would New Hampshire's. 122

Rhode Island and Connecticut picked delegates at early spring state conventions to nominate gubernatorial candidates for the April elections. Because their Whigs feared that a presidential endorsement might offend supporters of nonendorsed candidates and thus reduce the party's gubernatorial vote, both states chose unpledged delegations, leaving both open to imprecations from Fillmore's and Webster's influential friends.¹²³ California, which would be represented by Whigs already in the East, was also subjected to intense lobbying. The northern states where Scott's managers were determined not to "lose a single delegate where we can help it," therefore, were Maine, Vermont, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, although they, too, battled for every delegate they could get from other New England states, California, and Wisconsin.

In 1848, northern Whigs hoping to block Taylor's nomination had suffered because Southerners chose delegates at state conventions, thereby increasing the likelihood of unanimous delegations, whereas most northern states selected most delegates one by one at individual congressional district conventions, thereby increasing the likelihood of divided delegations. In 1852, therefore, Scott's forces in several states sought to discard the traditional district system and pick all the delegates at state conventions they controlled. 124

Michigan's Sewardite Whigs led the way at the party's state convention in September 1851, where they chose four Scott and two Fillmore men as delegates to the national convention. Whether anger at the refusal of proadministration Whigs to support the state ticket that year or a response to pleas from Scott's managers in Washington not to lose a single vote caused the change is unclear, but when Michigan's delegation reached Baltimore it was unanimously for Scott.¹²⁵

Vermont's antiadministration Whigs attempted to follow suit in October 1851. Whig members of the state legislature and other Whigs who happened to be in Montpelier pronounced themselves a state convention and picked the two at-large delegates, as well as all of the delegates representing the state's four congressional districts. "We beat the Websterites, with their allies, horse, foot, and dragoons," one Scott man later boasted. Yet this preemptive strike was neither so draconian nor so effective as it at first seemed. Though the "convention" endorsed Scott rather than Webster, it did not pledge the delegates to Scott. Its two senatorial delegates were Justin Morrill, whom even Fillmore's friends described as a moderate, and the newspaper editor Harry Bradley, Fillmore's long-time friend, who sought a patronage post and whose "vote in Convention may be considered in the market." Of the four delegates chosen for congressional districts, moreover, only one was a staunch Scott man; the other three were described as "out & out Compromise, Fillmore or Webster men." The so-called state convention, moreover, blundered by naming four congressional delegates since Vermont had four seats in the Thirty-Second Congress. According to the new reapportionment that took effect in the 1852 elections and determined the number of delegates each state would have in the national convention, however, Vermont was eligible for only three district delegates. Furthermore, three of the four men chosen in October resided in the same one of the new congressional districts, while the newly drawn third district had no delegate at all. Thus the Vermont delegation could be challenged on the ground that the state "convention" was unrepresentative, that it violated party tradition by not allowing individual congressional districts to select their own delegates, and that the delegation it picked did not represent all of the new congressional districts. The attempt of Scott's friends to jump the gun had backfired. 126

Elsewhere Scott's forces were equally ruthless but more effective. Regularly elected state conventions in Indiana enthusiastically, and in Illinois, after astute tactical sleight of hand by Sewardites who boasted that "we managed it well & trapped the Silver Grays," endorsed Scott, chose all the delegates, and imposed a unit rule on each delegation so that their pro-Scott majorities could cast all the votes. Ohio picked delegates by the traditional district system, but the Scott forces there, at Lew Campbell's urging, also imposed a unit rule. In New Jersey, Senator Jacob Miller, ex-Senator William L. Dayton, and former Congressman James King, all of whom had voted against the Compromise in 1850 and were implicitly repudiated by the state party thereafter, dominated the state Whig convention, demanded that it pick all the state's delegates, and committed them to Scott. Although the New Jersey state platform made no specific mention of the Compromise measures, it pledged the state's Whigs to oppose "all discussion on the subject of slavery or the agitation of any measures having reference thereto." As elsewhere, in short, pro-Scott did not automatically mean antislavery. 127

Scott's supporters flexed their muscle most nakedly in Pennsylvania. Several district conventions in the Philadelphia area had already picked convention delegates, at least half of whom favored Fillmore, when the Whig state convention met in Harrisburg in March. Dominated by allies of ex-Governor William Johnston, this gathering, like the 1851 state convention, endorsed Scott. It then flouted what one Webster man called "time-sanctioned custom" by naming the state's entire delegation to the national convention and replacing all but one of the Fillmore men already chosen from Philadelphia with Scott supporters. Johnston himself was named an at-large delegate. In line with the Scott camp's strategy of burying sectional issues in 1852, the state platform said nothing about the Compromise or slavery, reassured southern Whigs that Pennsylvanians had "none but the kindest feelings for their Whig brethren of the whole country," and "earnestly appeal[ed] to them to forget past differences, forgive past grievances, and move in a solid column" against the common Democratic foe. The true temper of Pennsylvania's Scott men reappeared, however, in their defiant response to the manifesto of the eleven southern bolters from the April 20 Whig caucus. "We can elect Scott without the aid of the South," declared a Pittsburgh paper, "and there never will be harmony and repose, in the relations of the two wings of the party until we show these disorganizers not only that we can do without them, but that we mean to carry our man in spite of them."128

New York required finesse rather than brute force. Disagreement about a potential gubernatorial nominee was so divisive that Whigs wanted to put off their state convention until long after the June national convention met. Sewardites, in any event, sought reconciliation with Silver Grays, and strong-arm tactics like those of Johnston's allies in Pennsylvania would have been self-defeating. Thus supporters of the different contenders faced a district-by-district battle, and since both Fillmore and Webster had considerable support in the New York City area, Scott could never capture all the delegates. Some upstate districts quickly selected Scott men. Where Silver Grays held the patronage posts, as in Buffalo, Rochester, Oswego, Albany, and Troy, however, Fillmorites prevailed or else fractiously divided district conventions sent rival Scott and Fillmore delegates to Baltimore.¹²⁹

In New York City and Brooklyn, which together picked seven delegates, the federal patronage holders, particularly Customs Collector Hugh Maxwell and Naval Officer David A. Bokee, proved far friendlier to Webster than to Fillmore. By early March, when the delegate elections were at hand, indeed, even Fillmore's closest allies like Daniel Ullmann pleaded with him, as Weed and Seward had done for a year and a half, to sack Maxwell. Since Whig merchants who had contributed to the Union Safety Committee also preferred Webster to Fillmore, and since James Watson Webb's New York Courier and Enquirer openly endorsed Webster and savagely attacked Fillmore, Webster had significant strength in the metropolis. Recognizing that Fillmore posed a far greater threat than Webster to Scott and that they lacked the strength in "this sink of Silver Greyism" to pick straight-out Scott delegates on their own, Sewardites joined forces with the Webster men against Fillmore. The upshot was that Moses Grinnell, a Webster man, defeated a Fillmorite in one district, and Scott men carried four of the other six, although often by dubious practices that prompted challenges at the national convention.¹³⁰

During late March and April, attention in New York and especially in Washington focused on the meeting of the Whig legislative caucus in Albany that traditionally chose the two at-large delegates and announced the state's Whigs' presidential preference. Silver Grays were badly outnumbered by pro-Scott men in both chambers, and in April the caucus endorsed Scott by a 50–15 vote. Nonetheless, to propitiate Silver Grays, the Sewardite majority agreed to postpone the selection of at-large delegates until a more representative body of state Whigs met. Since the regular Whig state convention would not meet until September, the decision fell to an assemblage of the previously chosen district delegates in New York City on June 11, when they were on their way to Baltimore. Dominated by Scott men, it chose J. L. Talcott, a staunch Scott man, and Simeon Draper, a Sewardite merchant who, like his close friend Grinnell, now leaned toward Webster.¹³¹

Despite nominally controlling thirty of thirty-five New York votes for Scott on the eve of the convention. Scott's friends knew that at least seven of their men would be challenged. Hence, it was far from clear that Scott had enough delegates to win the nomination, let alone block a pro-Compromise platform. As Horace Greeley alarmedly but accurately predicted in April, "Everybody in the Free States is going pell mell for Scott, and so any number of the most inveterate Hunkers are slipping into the National Convention as Scott men, to help endorse the Fugitive Slave Law and thus saddle us with a load that (with St. Paul) 'neither we nor our fathers were able to bear." "Greeley probably had in mind delegates from Illinois, Indiana, and New Jersey, but Maine's George Evans best exemplified such fifth columnists. Pro-Scott Whigs in no northern state went as far as those in Maine to conciliate pro-Compromise Whigs. Prior to the state convention in early June, five congressional districts chose ardent Scott men, including the abrasive James Pike, whose April 10 column had so infuriated Southerners. The state convention, where Scott's backers had a decisive majority, chose the other two district delegates as well as the at-large delegates. For those latter two slots it coupled the anti-Compromise William Pitt Fessenden with Evans. Evans swore that he would honor the state party's endorsement of Scott, but for decades no man in New England had been more loyal to Webster than he. Prior to Maine's convention, moreover, Evans had stated unequivocally that he favored a platform commitment to finality. With nominal Scott delegates like Evans and moderates from other states who favored concessions to the South, Scott's managers had every reason to doubt that they could meet Israel Washburn's test—that northern Scott delegates "stand like a rock" against a pro-Compromise platform. 132

XI

By early June no one knew who would control the convention, and supporters of all three contenders made desperate last-minute attempts to sway delegates. Long before June, Webster and his agents planned to lobby unpledged delegates from New England as well as some of the Midwesterners. In addition, Webster invited as many southern delegates as possible, especially those from South Carolina, to confer with him on their way to Baltimore. Their argument was that only Webster could carry the vital state of New York since Sewardites, who cooperated with him, would never vote for Fillmore and immigrants would never support Scott because of his previous nativist letters. Webster delegates at the convention, no matter how small their number, should therefore stick to Webster for as many ballots as it took for the Fillmore delegates to give up the ghost and throw their support to him. That strategy assumed a deadlocked convention, but it also counted on Fillmore delegates' willingness to take Webster, not Scott, as a second choice.¹³³

Southerners seeking Fillmore's nomination and a pro-Compromise platform were equally active. By June, they had lost hope of securing any letter from Scott prior to the convention and dismissed any letter after the convention as certain to "be a shilly, shally affair." Thus Williams and Gentry of Tennessee, Marshall, and others pressed southern delegates to hold out for an acceptable platform. The day before the convention. Florida's Cabell and Tennessee's Gentry declared once again in the House that the convention must write a pro-Compromise platform and pick a candidate who would sustain it. Pointedly attacking Scott and praising Fillmore, Cabell warned, "If Northern Whigs . . . are resolved to go on with the slavery agitation, and to repeal the fugitive slave law, the party ought not to be preserved." Aside from publicly intimidating Scott's supporters, southern Whigs met privately in Washington and again in Baltimore on the night of June 15 and the following morning to plot strategy. They wrote a platform and apparently agreed to insist upon its adoption before any nominations were made as the price of their continued participation in the convention. Significantly, the southern Fillmore men won concurrence in this strategy from Webster's New England delegates on the night before the convention began. 135

Unknown to these Southerners, on June 10 Fillmore drafted a letter of withdrawal that he entrusted to George Babcock, his floor manager at the convention. This letter, which Babcock was to give to the president of the convention, who would then read it to the delegates, rehearsed Fillmore's decision not to seek reelection upon ascending to the presidency in July 1850 and the reasons he had delayed making that announcement the previous winter. He specifically instructed Babcock to decide for himself precisely when, during the convention, the letter should be revealed, but Fillmore insisted that "you will not suffer my name to be dragged into a contest for a nomination, which I have never sought, [and] do not now seek."

Fillmore's withdrawal, in sum, depended upon the proceedings of the convention itself, and in delegating responsibility for announcing it to his supporters, he guaranteed that he would indeed be dragged into a contest for the nomination. By June 10, Fillmore's closest advisors were certain that together Fillmore and Webster would have a majority of delegates and that Fillmore could win. On June 11, Nathan Hall wrote from Buffalo that Fillmore must hang on because victory was within reach. The following day, another Silver Gray brought the Iowa delegates to the White House for personal lobbying by the president. And still another supporter, John Barney, promised to attend the convention to bring Webster's delegates into Fillmore's column.¹³⁷

In the final week before the convention Scott's managers were frantic. Meeting almost nightly at Seward's house or the Scott club, they argued furiously over what could be done to head off a pro-Compromise platform and secure the necessary votes to select Scott. Over Seward's protests, Pike and others promised Southerners that Scott would release a letter on the Compromise after he got the nomination if Southerners would relent on their demand for a platform. Clayton of Delaware tried a different tack by floating a Scott-Crittenden ticket in hopes of at least winning more southern votes for Scott, if not blocking a platform. Fearing "a 'Silver Gray' explosion of the Whig Convention," Seward knew that the once overconfident Scott forces faced the battle of their lives. 138

Democratic actions raised the stakes for all contenders and thereby demonstrated once again the inextricable relationship between the Whig and Democratic parties. On June 5, the Democratic national convention nominated Franklin Pierce of New Hampshire for president and William R. King of Alabama for vice president on a pro-Compromise platform. Though eschewing the code word "finality," it pledged that Democrats would "abide by and adhere to a faithful execution of ... the compromise measures, settled by the Congress of 1850: 'the act for reclaiming fugitives from service or labor,' included." Democrats would oppose any effort to change or repeal the Fugitive Slave Act as a violation of "an express provision of the Constitution." And they would "resist all attempts at renewing, in Congress or out of it, the agitation of the slavery question under whatever shape or color the attempt may be made." Democrats, in sum, made it emphatically clear that they sought the pro-Compromise vote. Whigs now had to decide if they would also compete for it or seek a different constituency. 139

XII

Slightly before noon on Wednesday, June 16, the longest, most rancorous, and most debilitating Whig national convention ever to meet commenced in the grand hall of Baltimore's Maryland Institute. Presidential nominating conventions were the apogee of the party apparatus. Like meetings of Congress, only on a much larger scale, they brought together men from different regions of the country who had often never laid eyes on anyone outside their own state. They invited fractious confrontation and placed a premium on skillful management to avoid it. Averting an explosion and preserving party unity were consequently top priorities of the men who made local arrangements for the Baltimore convention.

Decorated with red, white, and blue bunting and with portraits of Washington and of the dying Henry Clay, the hall featured two huge banners on opposite walls. One quoted Webster's famous reply to Hayne: "Liberty and Union, Now and Forever, One and Inseparable"; the other echoed across the hall: "The Union of the Whigs for the Sake of the Union." Such platitudes and equally gaseous rhetoric about common commitments to unity, comity, and fair play for the good of the party, however, were quickly and repeatedly punctured by the strife between anti- and pro-Scott forces over the convention officers, the composition of committees, procedural rules, delegates' credentials, and even the veracity of newspaper reports about the proceedings. With tempers shortened by Baltimore's suffocating June heat and humidity, enmities could not be concealed. Speeches were greeted with boastful cheers or derisive jeers, hisses, and angry catcalls, depending upon the identity of the speaker and auditors. So antagonistic and confused were the preliminary jousts that balloting for president did not begin until the evening of the third day's session. The convention, indeed, took an unprecedented six days to complete its work.¹⁴⁰

Aside from naked animosity and distrust, from the din inside a hall packed by over 3,000 people, and from exhaustion attributable to the extraordinary heat, what caused and conditioned the prolonged struggle were the following facts. Scott's backers, who hoped to secure his nomination without any platform, let alone a pro-Compromise document, had failed to secure the majority they needed. Together, Webster's and Fillmore's delegates could control the convention—if and when they worked as a team. Equally important, Scott men dominated only nine state delegations—those of Maine, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan. In addition, California was divided, but leaned toward Scott. With Iowa and fourteen slave states, Fillmore's forces controlled fifteen. Websterites dominated Massachusetts and New Hampshire, and together Fillmore and Webster men controlled Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Vermont. This imbalance was a crippling handicap to Scott men, for although they dominated the northern states with the largest delegations, committees traditionally consisted of one member from each state. Procedurally, that is, the number of states mattered more than the number of delegates. For example, the three pro-Scott committee members from Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, who collectively represented eighty-five votes, could be outvoted by four Webster and Fillmore members from New Hampshire, Texas, Arkansas, and Florida, who collectively represented only sixteen. With Scott men outnumbered on every committee by a two-to-one margin, in sum, they were bound to lose every important committee fight—on permanent officers, on credentials, and on the platform.

The first day's session on June 16 did little more than name committees on permanent officers and credentials and in the evening session, over some Northerners' protests, install Maryland's John G. Chapman as the convention's permanent president. Opposed by outnumbered Scott men in committee, that choice was portentous, for Chapman chaired the southern caucus on June 15 and 16 that prepared a pro-Compromise platform. Particularly annoying to northern Scott delegates was the inflated size of southern delegations that had sent two or more men for each vote they had, a practice that bolstered the presence of Southerners on the convention floor and gave them an enormous advantage on voice, as opposed to roll-call, votes. 141 The debate on this matter quickly revealed the reciprocal suspicions among delegates and featured at least one classic exchange. Ohio's John Sherman moved unsuccessfully to table the report recommending Chapman until the credentials committee made clear who among southern delegations had authority to vote. A Maryland delegate then objected with a point of order that Sherman had no right to speak after a motion to table. When he insisted that "I stick to my point of order," Sherman shot back: "Stick to your seat."

During the evening recess, as supporters of all three contenders paraded through Baltimore's streets, serious work was done in private. Webster's delegates caucused and vowed to stick by him until Webster withdrew his name; some of Fillmore's supporters, probably led by John Barney, meanwhile spread the word that Fillmore wanted his delegates to back Webster should Fillmore withdraw. Pennsylvania's Johnston, meanwhile, huddled with John Minor Botts in an attempt to break into the Virginia delegation, and other Scott men floated rumors that Scott would send a letter on finality to the convention to reassure Southerners. Botts and Johnston both told reporters that Scott would win on the third or fourth ballot.

Ill temper increased during the second day's session. The credentials committee again failed to report, so the convention continued to quarrel over precisely who could speak or vote. After the adoption of procedural rules that allotted each state the equivalent of its electoral votes, T. B. Duncan of Louisiana introduced resolutions calling for the immediate appointment of a platform committee consisting of one man from each state, allowing each state's delegation to designate its representative, and requiring the convention to vote on the platform it reported before taking up the presidential nomination. As Duncan proudly declared, his purpose was "to know if our [Southerners'] principles are your [Northerners'] principles" and to ascertain "whether we are all of one party or not." Recognizing this strike for what it was—an attempt to force the decision on a platform before the nomination and to ram the Southerners' prewritten platform through a committee Scott's foes would dominate—northern Scott men sought to table Duncan's resolutions or adjourn to delay a vote. Nonetheless, the first resolution passed comfortably, 199 to 97, over the opposition of Scott delegations from New York, New Jersey, Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan, as well as Wisconsin. The rules for this vote required each state's entire total to be recorded as its majority wished, and, ominously for Scott hard-liners who opposed any platform whatsoever, ten of the twenty-three Ohio delegates favored the resolution, while Pennsylvania and Illinois voted in favor with the Fillmore and Webster delegations. 142

The convention's first roll-call vote, therefore, demonstrated that Scott men were bound to lose on the issue of whether or not to adopt any platform. To give Scott's forces a better chance than they otherwise would have to influence that platform, therefore, a Pennsylvanian named Jessup immediately introduced an explosive amendment to Duncan's second resolution, which called for each state delegation to appoint one man to the platform committee. Charging that the one-state, one-vote rule on committees was patently unfair to large states with the most delegates and electoral votes, Jessup moved to weight representation on the platform committee by allowing each member to cast his state's entire vote during committee roll calls. That way, for example, New York's member would have thirty-five votes and Florida's only three rather than being treated as equals. That way the nine members from Scott states could outvote the entire South, as outraged Southerners were quick to protest.

Not quickly enough, however, for Jessup's stunning initiative caught Fillmore and Webster men flatfooted. Demanding the previous question before Southerners mounted a counterattack, Scott's backers forced a vote on the Jessup amendment and scored their only victory on a procedural vote during the entire convention, 149-144. On this roll call, states were not required to vote as a unit, and the results thus suggested the balance of forces within individual delegations. Every slave state except Delaware and, surprisingly, Missouri, which divided 6-2 in favor with one abstention, cast unanimous votes against Jessup's motion. 143 The pattern of the free states was far more complicated. 144 Vermont's delegation was in turmoil and did not vote. Maine was solidly in favor, but the other New England states, where Webster men dominated, voted against: New Hampshire 0-4: Massachusetts 3-10, Connecticut 2-4, and Rhode Island 0-4. California split 2-2, Wisconsin 1–3 against, and New York 31–4 in favor. All of the other northern states, including Iowa, voted unanimously in favor. The four Fillmore men from New York immediately protested that six Scott delegates whose credentials were being contested had voted with their state's majority and should not be counted. Despite those protests, furious complaints from Southerners that Jessup's amendment violated the equal rights of states and substituted majority tyranny for traditional Whig conservatism, and attempts to replace Duncan's motion as amended by Jessup with a less controversial substitute, Jessup's amendment stood when the convention angrily adjourned for the night, although the convention had not yet adopted the resolution to which it was attached.

As everyone was aware, the total vote for Jessup's amendment equaled the precise number of votes necessary for nomination. Victory though the vote was for Scott men, however, the total exaggerated Scott's strength. Aside from the disputed seats from New York, Missouri was instructed for Fillmore, and he seemed assured of Iowa's votes. Nonetheless, the vote on Jessup's amendment spawned frantic maneuvering during the second night's recess, especially among the Webster and Fillmore men. To the consternation of Fillmore's lieutenants, Webster's forces again vowed to stand by him rather than switch to Fillmore. This was outrageous, Barney reported to Fillmore from Baltimore. By his count, Scott would get 137 votes on the first ballot, Webster 40, and Fillmore 119. Since it took 149 to win, it would be far easier to transfer 30 of Webster's delegates to Fillmore than all but 10 of Fillmore's to Webster, especially as he knew of at least 12 votes from Kentucky, Virginia, and North Carolina that would go for Scott rather than Webster if Fillmore withdrew. "Prudence requires Mr. Webster's phalanx to join your Legion," Barney told the president. 145

During the same night, the cantankerous Jessup, as well as other Scott men anxious to conciliate Southerners, had second thoughts about his inflammatory amendment. The vote to adopt Duncan's first resolution revealed that a substantial number of Scott delegates would accept a platform. No matter how gratifying the vote on Jessup's amendment was to Scott men, anyone who could count realized that even under Jessup's formula Webster and Fillmore men could outvote Scott's representatives on the platform committee, for in divided states like Wisconsin, Connecticut, and Massachusetts, to say nothing of Missouri and Iowa, anti-Scott men would pick the committee members. Infuriating Southerners for what could only be a pyrrhic victory did not seem worth the cost.

A third crucial development also occurred that night. The credentials committee, heavily dominated by anti-Scott men, met until 1 A.M. Obviously swayed by the vote for Jessup's amendment, they contrived to strip Scott of at least seven votes from Vermont and New York. Their report sparked a ferocious dispute the following morning.¹⁴⁶

Friday, June 18, the convention's third and most pivotal day, proved one of the most important in the party's entire history. At the outset, Jessup moved to withdraw his controversial amendment, and, significantly, the majority that adopted it acquiesced. This action allowed the immediate appointment of a platform committee, each of whose members would have only one vote. It included a distinguished and diverse group: William Pitt Fessenden of Maine; Vermont's ex-Governor Carlos Coolidge; George Ashmun, Webster's loyal ally from Massachusetts; New York Sewardite A. B. Dickinson; ex-Governor Johnston from Pennsylvania; Clayton of Delaware; Louisiana's determined Duncan; Crittenden's friend Orlando Brown from Kentucky; Felix Zollicoffer of Tennessee; and Georgia's Senator William C. Dawson. As soon as the committee was named, the platform already drafted by the southern caucus was submitted to it, as were other resolutions.

The platform committee's diverse membership ensured some lively debates during its meetings, but the one-state, one-vote rule guaranteed defeat of the Scott men, at least in committee. That fact became clear when the credentials committee finally reported. Aside from admitting a nonvoting, though pro-Scott, delegation from the District of Columbia, it effectively stripped Scott of at least six and perhaps seven votes, one from Vermont and the remainder from New York. In Vermont it denied Porteas Baxter, a pro-Scott man chosen at a June district convention from the new third congressional district, which had been left unrepresented by the October state convention. Instead it admitted all six delegates chosen the previous October and left it up to them how to cast the state's five votes. Since at least four of those six were pro-Compromise, anti-Scott men, this decision left the Vermont delegation in the hands of Scott's enemies. 148

Seven districts required action in New York. In one, the committee seated Grinnell, the Websterite, instead of his Fillmorite opponent. In four, it named Fillmorites rather than the Scott men who had already voted for Jessup's amendment. Its decision on the remaining two district disputes was more insidious, for it seated both the Silver Gray and his pro-Scott opponent in each and stipulated that the vote of the districts could not be cast on any roll call unless the rival delegates concurred. Since everyone at the convention realized that such agreement would never be reached, this decision effectively deprived New York of two votes while simultaneously counting those two votes in the total from which a majority had to be constructed. More precisely, Scott still needed 149, not 148 votes, and he was robbed of 6 votes from New York and 1 from Vermont that his floor managers had counted on. New Yorkers—Silver Grays and Sewardites alike—screamed in protest at this emasculation, while Southerners hooted in derision for them to shut up, especially since one of the delegates rendered a eunuch was the despised Sewardite Henry J. Raymond, editor of the New York Times. 149

While New Yorkers fumed, Florida's Cabell pressed for the previous question on adoption of the committee report. This motion produced the third critical roll call at the convention and, according to Solomon G. Haven, revealed that together the Fillmore and Webster forces had a majority of forty-seven votes. While the report was adopted 164 to 117, Haven's estimate was overly optimistic. Altogether thirteen pro-Scott delegates from Indiana, Illinois, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Michigan broke ranks and supported adoption. No votes were cast from the disputed districts in New York, which split 4–24 against, however, and only 5 of Missouri's 9 votes were cast. Scott's opponents would pick up additional votes from those states. Predictably, every southern vote cast and twenty-nine of the thirty-three New England votes outside of Maine favored adoption.

Appointment of a platform committee without Jessup's amendment and adoption of the credentials committee's report marked stinging defeats for the Scott forces. When Southerners moved to adjourn for a few hours until the platform committee reported, therefore, Ohioans attempted to salvage the chief objective of Scott men—nomination without a platform—by moving that the convention proceed immediately to presidential balloting without waiting for the platform. Surprisingly, Southerners' attempt to stop this effort by moving adjournment was initially defeated by twenty-five votes. At that point, Maine's George Evans, the Websterite in Scott clothing, declared that it was obvious that the convention would never allow a nomination until a platform was adopted, and, with the aid of a favorable ruling from Chapman on a loudly disputed voice vote, Evans won adjournment. Chapman's selection as permanent president and Maine's inclusion of Evans to appease Websterites had together produced the convention's decisive turning point. Now a pro-Compromise platform was inevitable.

George Ashmun reported the platform to the evening session. With only slight modifications, it was the same platform drafted by the southern caucus on June 15 and 16. The critical eighth plank announced that the Whig party "received and acquiesced in" the Compromise measures, "the Act known as the Fugitive Slave law, included . . . as a settlement in principle and substance" of the matters they addressed. It pledged Whigs to "maintain them and insist upon their strict enforcement." If "time and experience" showed the need for further legislation to guard against abuse or evasion, moreover, that new legislation must not "impair their present efficiency." Like the Democrats, finally, the plank said that Whigs "deprecate all further agitation of the question thus settled, as dangerous to our peace; and will discountenance all efforts to continue or renew such agitation whenever, wherever, or however the attempt may be made." Like the Democratic platform, in short, the Whigs' meant finality without using the word. 150

The Compromise plank drew most of participants' attention at the convention and virtually all the attention of later historians, but two other planks proved critically important during the subsequent campaign. The third resolution endorsed the stance of Fillmore's administration and of Southern Whigs against any intervention in European affairs and thus effectively put the party on record against Kossuth. It thus lengthened the odds against cutting into the expected new German vote. As a member of Kossuth's entourage wrote Seward immediately after he read it, "What a pity that the Whig platform could not be more favorable or at least less hostile! You could have had the german vote of all the western States, which could have secured the election."

The fifth plank adopted word for word the Southerners' tariff resolution, which called for a revenue tariff with "a just discrimination, whereby suitable encouragement may be afforded to American industry, equally to all classes, and to all portions of the country." This was the plank that Democrats mocked as a total surrender of Whigs' protectionist pretensions, the plank that appeared in both Whig and Democratic newspaper versions of the Whig platform, and the plank that appears in supposedly authoritative collections of national party platforms.

Astonishingly, however, it was not the tariff plank written by the platform committee.

The following day William F. Johnston, Pennsylvania's member on the committee, angrily protested that the plank reported in newspaper accounts was not what the committee had adopted. He had successfully amended the Southerners' plank in committee, he insisted, by inserting a vital demand for specific rather than ad valorem duties. The plank should read, he declared and the committee chairman Ashmun concurred: "and in laying such duties sound policy requires a just discrimination and protection from fraud by specific duties whereby suitable encouragement may be afforded to American industry...." The importance of specific duties to Whigs who wanted a protective, not just a revenue, tariff cannot be exaggerated. Nor can it be doubted that the platform committee inserted that phrase, for northern and border state Webster and Fillmore men were just as committed to specific rates as northern Scott men. 153 Yet for whatever reason, while the journal of the convention recorded the plank as Johnston wrote it, the versions of the platform that went out to the public and that have come down to posterity never included the critical words about specific duties. Whatever opportunities booming economic conditions still allowed Whigs to make a case for protectionism had been closed by their own inadvertence, indifference, or sheer incompetence.

On Friday night, however, delegates focused on the controversial Compromise plank, not the truncated tariff resolution. In the hubbub that ensued after Ashmun read the platform, Webster's eminent Massachusetts ally Rufus Choate got the floor first. Intentionally and gratuitously insulting Scott's backers, he exultantly declared that the platform "affirmed the finality of the Compromise," argued that the Democrats' platform had left the Whigs with no alternative but to do so, and praised the prescience of Webster's notorious Seventh of March speech. Then, in a direct stab at Scott's delegates, he insisted that honor required Whigs to go forth to the country with an explicit platform and a candidate committed to it rather than an uncommitted and two-faced candidate who told northern audiences "No platform—agitation forever" and southern audiences "No platform—but a letter in every man's breeches pocket."

This shaft was aimed at southern Scott backers like Botts and Jones who circulated among the delegates swearing they had letters to prove that Scott was pro-Compromise. After an Ohioan angrily urged Scott to spurn the obnoxious platform should he win the nomination, Botts tried to respond. Protesting Choate's acerbic language, he denied that Scott had written any letters to influence delegates at the convention. Then, as if not recognizing the contradiction, he pulled out of his own pocket and read a letter that Scott had written ex-Senator William Archer of Virginia on the day before the convention began. In that letter Scott said that he had decided not to write anyone at the convention itself before the nomination, but that, should he receive it, he would send a letter of acceptance that affirmed his strong approbation of the Compromise measures. Botts, in short, quoted a letter from Scott announcing to the convention that Scott was pro-Compromise in order to demonstrate that Scott had written no letters to influence the convention. To refute Choate's charge, he had seemingly proved it, thus bringing waves of derisive laughter down on his head. Yet Botts was hardly the bumbler he seemed. He had cleverly seized an opportunity to make public for the first time a letter from Scott himself approving the Compromise and promising to make that approval much more explicit if he won the nomination.¹⁵⁴

After this exchange the convention proceeded to vote on the platform. Since its adoption was certain, Scott's floor managers spread the word that Scott men were free to vote for it to conciliate the South. As Pike wrote Seward, arms had to be twisted to get certain men to do so, and he had promised them that a paragraph of Scott's acceptance letter would explicitly repudiate "the doctrine of making the compromise a party test."155 Voluntarily or grudgingly, at least half of the Scott delegates supported the platform, and it carried easily 226-66. Every Southerner, including Delaware's three Scott delegates, was in the majority, and all the negative votes came from Scott men. Yet the roll call revealed where hardliners and moderates in the Scott camp were concentrated, if not precisely who they were. Michigan was the only free state unanimously opposed. Iowa, California, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island were unanimously in favor, but so was New Jersey, a Scott state. Wisconsin split 4-1 in favor, as did Connecticut, where one delegate abstained. Maine divided 4-4, Indiana, 7-6, Illinois, 6-5, and Pennsylvania, whose heavily pro-Scott delegation was headed by William F. Johnston, gave the platform 25 of its 27 votes. Even in Ohio, eight of twenty-three delegates voted in favor. Only New York joined Michigan as a bastion of opposition. There only three delegates, who probably included the Webster-leaning Grinnell and Draper, joined the eight Fillmore men in favor, while the remaining twenty-two delegates who could vote opposed it. 156

If Scott's strategists bowed to the inevitable by releasing delegates to support the platform, hard-liners still considered its adoption a decisive defeat. "The wretched platform, contrived to defeat General Scott in the nomination, or sink him in the canvass, comes to him like the order of a superior power," Seward carped to his wife, "and he is incapable of understanding that it is not obligatory on him to execute it." The North "as usual," he lamented, had divided in the face of "intimidation" from a united South, "and so the platform adopted is one that deprives Scott of the vantage position he enjoyed."

Muzzled and voteless, Henry J. Raymond tried to salvage some benefit from this disaster. On Friday night he telegraphed a dispatch to the New York Times that appeared in the Saturday issue and that caused the convention's biggest blowup. He reported that the New York delegation was outraged by the credentials committee's action and would refuse to support the convention's nominee if it cost Scott the nomination. But he also predicted that Scott would win on the third or fourth ballot on Saturday because "Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, and one or two others will give Scott the nomination. . . . The Northern Whigs gave way on the Platform, with this understanding. If Scott is not nominated, they will charge breach of faith on the South."

Raymond's allusion to a quid pro quo swapping northern votes for the platform in exchange for southern votes for Scott accurately reflected the hopes of Scott's managers, but it represented wishful thinking, not hard evidence. The balloting for president began on Friday night, after the platform was adopted, but before it did, southern Scott men made one more attempt to provoke the break in anti-

Scott southern ranks that Raymond predicted. Tennessee's Lean Jimmy Jones declared that he knew from personal conversations with Scott that he would accept and endorse the pro-Compromise platform just adopted because Scott "was an ardent supporter and friend of the Compromise measures from the day they were first presented to Congress by Henry Clay and that he was opposed to touching them in any manner, shape, or form." ¹⁵⁸

Botts and Jones barely dented southern opposition to Scott, however. On the first ballot and on five additional votes cast on Friday night, Scott's support from the South ranged between four and six votes, three from Delaware and between one and three from Virginia. Jones of Tennessee, who angrily denied that he intended to betray his state's wishes, apparently abstained rather than support Scott, for Tennessee cast only twelve of its thirteen votes. More significant was the general stability of the vote and the deadlock it signified. Nomination required 149 votes. On the first ballot that night Fillmore had 133, Scott, 131, and Webster 29. On the remaining five ballots Scott's vote fluctuated between 130 and 134. Fillmore's between 130 and 133, and Webster's surpassed 29 only once when it reached 30. Indeed, during forty ballots on Saturday, the convention's fourth long and contentious day, Scott never went lower than 131 or higher than 136, Fillmore fluctuated between 133 and 126, and Webster ranged between an irreducible 28 and his high of 32. Of the few switches that occurred, moreover, one fact was clear. Delegates swung back and forth between Scott and Webster and between Scott and Fillmore, but there was virtually no traffic in either direction between the Fillmore and Webster columns. By the end of Saturday's extraordinarily long and turbulent day of voting, the pattern stood pretty much where it had started on Friday night: Scott 134, Fillmore 127, Webster 31.

The breakdown of support can be discerned from the first ballot for which we have state-by-state data. Maine, New Jersey, Delaware, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan were unanimous for Scott. He also garnered twenty-two of Ohio's twenty-three votes, twenty-six of Pennsylvania's twenty-seven, and twenty-four of New York's thirty-three. Two men in the Connecticut, Massachusetts, and California delegations backed him, as did one from Virginia, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin. Aside from a surprising three of Wisconsin's five delegates, two from New York, and one from California, Webster's strength came exclusively from New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont, Connecticut, and Rhode Island. Fillmore took 115 of the 119 votes cast by Southerners, along with 7 from New York, all 4 from Iowa, and a scattering of 1 each from Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Wisconsin, and California.

The lesson of these ballots was crystal clear. Both Scott and Fillmore were within striking distance of the nomination, and the irreducible Webster bloc of twenty-eight votes stood in each man's way. Aside from a few individuals in New Hampshire, New York, and Wisconsin who switched back and forth between Webster and Scott, Scott's managers had little hope of cutting into Webster's vote; they concentrated on prying Southerners away from Fillmore. Fillmore's managers, in turn, engaged in desperate negotiations during recesses on the 18th and 19th to bring Webster men into the Fillmore column.

The stubbornness of Webster's New England base infuriated Fillmore's Baltimore floor managers. From the moment the convention opened, operatives like Barney, Haven, and B. M. Edney, a North Carolinian employed in the Interior Department, huddled with Massachusetts Webster delegates like Choate and William Hayden and pleaded with them to abandon Webster and support Fillmore. If Fillmore instead withdrew, they pointed out, they could not deliver all of his votes to Webster. Enough Southerners would then break to Scott to nominate him, they warned, but Webster's delegates refused to believe it. "No men ever were more mistaken," the disgusted Haven wrote Fillmore on Friday. At daybreak that morning, Barney had traveled to Washington to plead with Webster himself to turn his delegates over to Fillmore, but Webster was as unmovable as his delegates. Aware that he had sacrificed his popularity in the North to aid the South in 1850, he believed southern Fillmore men owed him their support. "My friends will stand firm," he telegraphed a Maryland delegate on Saturday morning. "Let the South answer for the consequences. Remember the 7th of March."

During the prolonged balloting on Saturday, June 19, which caused Elihu Washburne, an Illinois Scott delegate, to say "that the Whig party is about to pass through the dark valley of the shadow of death," Fillmore's operatives grew angrier at Websterites' stubbornness as they saw Fillmore's total decline negligibly but perceptibly. After the convention adjourned Saturday night until Monday morning, Fillmore's friends doubled their efforts during the recess. At a meeting on Saturday night, they proposed that if Webster could bring forty votes from the North, Fillmore's men would break to him, but if he could not, then Webster's delegates should support Fillmore. Webster's friends shunned the deal. On Sunday morning, Edney offered a different bargain, On Monday, he proposed. 4 Webster delegates should shift to Fillmore on each ballot until he reached 145, 4 short of the necessary 149. This movement should frighten the Scott men into switching to Webster to stop Fillmore, and if Webster could get seventy-five northern votes in this fashion, Edney would deliver seventy-five southern Fillmore men to Webster. Alternatively, if Webster could not get seventy-five northern votes, then his supporters should go to Fillmore. This proposal, too, was rejected. Meanwhile, Barney and Brooklyn's David A. Bokee arranged a delegation from Baltimore to speak with Webster in Washington on Sunday. As of Sunday night, however, Webster would not budge. If he withdrew in favor of Fillmore, Webster contended, enough of his New England delegates would go to Scott to nominate him. 160

The inability of the Webster and Fillmore delegations in Baltimore to unite their combined majority is puzzling, but the behavior of the principals back in Washington strikes the modern observer as positively surreal. During the entire convention week, the two men who had worked so closely together for two years never saw or spoke to each other. True, Fillmore and Webster had occasionally been at odds, especially over Fillmore's willingness to take patronage from his New York enemies while refusing to allow Webster to do the same in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and elsewhere. Nonetheless, they agreed with each other about so much that was at stake in Baltimore that one wonders why they simply did not meet themselves for an hour or two and resolve the deadlock. Concern about the impropriety of openly maneuvering for the presidency is an obvious answer, but newspapers were already reporting that their men in Baltimore met at every opportunity to arrange a deal.

Mutual pride and Webster's resentment may offer a better explanation. Fillmore was certainly prepared to turn his delegates over to Webster, but he had promised his friend Babcock that Babcock alone should make that decision.

Besides, as Fillmore was head of the administration, making the first overture to a subordinate would be unseemly. Webster's pride was monumental; since January, moreover, his anger that Fillmore had refused to withdraw had festered and the proceedings in Baltimore had brought it to a flash point. Webster spent most of Sunday afternoon, indeed, cursing Fillmore and his southern supporters as duplicitous ingrates. Whatever the reasons why the two men failed to communicate directly with each other, rather than through their Baltimore emissaries, that lapse almost produced a fiasco of legendary proportions.¹⁶¹

On Monday morning, Webster conceded the hopelessness of his situation. Early that morning he sent a note to Fillmore saying that he had informed his friends in Baltimore to throw their support to the president and that Fillmore should be nominated by one o'clock that afternoon. But Fillmore had also had enough. As he replied to Webster, he too had sent a messenger to Baltimore that morning urging his friends to withdraw his name and cast their support to Webster, "which I presume will be done unless the knowledge of your communication shall prevent it." The possibility existed that both men's names would be withdrawn, leaving Scott alone in the field.\(^{162}

That ludicrous denouement was averted. Neither the Webster nor the Fillmore men at Baltimore would obey instructions. As Francis Granger later wrote Fillmore, Babcock had acted superbly. "There was never a moment when your withdrawal would have secured Mr. Webster's nomination. There were never more than 94 of the 116 Southern votes which sustained you that could have been given to him." By keeping Fillmore in the race, moreover, the Southerners who planned to switch to Scott if he dropped out would have to desert openly to do so and thus earn the execration they deserved. As for Webster's friends, chided Granger, "Some of them, as you know, were Scott men at heart. The rest, Choate included, seemed to me to act like a parcel of school boys, waiting for the sky to fall that they might catch larks. Such another collection of respectable out of place gentlemen was never seen."

Another factor stopping a simultaneous withdrawal, however, was that the convention did not immediately recommence balloting when it reconvened on Monday morning. It spent several hours instead debating a motion from a Georgian to expel Henry J. Raymond. That angry debate, during which Raymond implied that Cabell was a liar and Cabell threatened to challenge Raymond to a duel, provided sufficient time for the Fillmore and Webster managers to compare notes, decide that it would be pointless for both men to withdraw, and determine to keep both in the race on the grounds that the instructions canceled each other out.¹⁶⁴

On the first two votes after balloting resumed, Scott gained 3 votes from Missouri to bring his total to 137. On the next, the forty-ninth, ballot, Cranston of Rhode Island abandoned Webster and joined Scott's column, a shift that caused enormous excitement in the spectator galleries. By the fifty-second ballot Scott's total stood at 148, 1 vote shy of nomination, Fillmore had declined to 119, and Webster was down to 26. In a normal convention there would have been a landslide in Scott's direction as everyone tried to side with the winner, but the long and acrimonious struggle had cemented most delegates to the man with whom they started. On the fifty-third and final ballot, Scott edged over the top with 157 votes, Fillmore got 114, and Webster retained only 21—4 of Wisconsin's

5 votes, 1 from California, 1 from New York's faithful Grinnell, and the remainder from New England, including the 11 diehards in Massachusetts who refused to back Fillmore. 166

Between the first and last ballots the following shifts had occurred: Scott picked up two Fillmore and six Webster votes from New England, including those of all four New Hampshire Webster men. Very early in the balloting, New York's Simeon Draper had also moved from the Webster to the Scott column. 167 Otherwise, his gains came at the expense of Fillmore: one in California, one in Pennsylvania, one in Ohio, one in Iowa, three in Missouri, three in Tennessee, and seven in Virginia. 168 Although Kentucky and North Carolina had been repeatedly rumored to harbor Scott supporters, they remained solidly opposed to Scott, as did the other slave states. Still, the thirteen southern votes made the difference. Scott could have won without the eight votes he gained in New England. The thirteen southern votes, in contrast, were indispensable, and they equaled all of the gains Scott had made elsewhere.

Many of these Southerners obviously decided over the Sunday recess to switch to Scott to break the stalemate, and as if to justify the vote he had finally dared to cast, Tennessee's Jones immediately stood and read a letter from Scott, dated Sunday, June 20. One sentence long, it said: "Having the honor to be a candidate of the Whig Convention, I will accept the nomination, with the platform of principles the Convention has laid down." Whether Jones actually had a letter from Scott of that date—he had promised on Friday that Scott would accept the platform—will never be known, but hard-liners among Scott men considered any acknowledgment of the platform by Scott a blunder. "In God's name have no slip here," Pike had written Seward. Scott's letter of acceptance must explicitly repudiate "making the compromise a party test." Most important, "The letter of Gen. S. should be sent by the committee." If Scott wrote what Jones read, in sum, he proved to be the loose cannon his managers had always feared. 169

While Scott's northern managers would later try to repair the damage caused by Scott's convention letter in his official letter of acceptance, Jones' speech allowed southern delegates to follow customary ritual and accede to the nomination. With varying degrees of enthusiasm, speakers from Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and even South Carolina announced their support for the nominee, as did a Massachusetts delegate. However sincere or hollow these pledges, everyone knew that a Southerner had to be placed on the ticket to balance Scott, and thus the convention moved to select the vice presidential nominee.

Altogether, nineteen men received votes on the first ballot for vice president, and all but one—New York's hapless Silver Gray Richardson, who got three sympathy votes for being denied a vote during the convention by being paired with Raymond—were Southerners. Three men from Kentucky, four from Tennessee, three from North Carolina, two from Maryland, two from Missouri, and one each from South Carolina, Florida, Virginia, and Alabama got votes. The leader was Missouri's Edward Bates, with ninety-seven votes, followed by William A. Graham of North Carolina with seventy-four. Crittenden of Kentucky got ten and Jones of Tennessee, once the front-runner for the slot, a meager five. Both withdrew their names after that ballot.

Aside from favorite sons like Florida's Governor Thomas Brown, the home states of serious candidates were not accidental. Missouri, Tennessee, and Virginia were the states that had put Scott over the top, and northern Scott men wanted to reward them. The front-runner Bates, for example, got only six southern votes, aside from his own state's nine, although the other contender from Missouri, John W. Crockett, got all twelve of Tennessee's votes, as well as seven from the North. All of Bates' remaining votes came from the North, and he ran especially well among Midwesterners, who considered him one of their own. ¹⁷⁰ In contrast, Kentucky, Maryland, and North Carolina, whose various contenders received a total of 143 votes, were traditional Whig states that solidly supported Fillmore and whose votes were considered vital in November. In the end, the necessity of appeasing them rather than rewarding southern bolters to Scott carried the day. Graham won on the second ballot by a vote of 232 to 52 for Bates.

Graham's nomination was perfectly logical. Unlike Mangum and Stanly, other North Carolinians who received votes, Graham had never supported Scott, and he was a member of Fillmore's official family. Unlike Crittenden of Kentucky, who was also in the cabinet, Graham's name was not withdrawn. And unlike Senator James Pearce, the leading vote getter from Maryland, Graham hailed from a state with ten, not just eight, electoral votes. Since Jones had already pledged to work as hard for the ticket as possible in Tennessee, shoring up North Carolina seemed the top priority. As soon as his nomination was announced, indeed, a North Carolina delegate pledged that the Scott-Graham ticket would carry North Carolina by at least 10,000 votes.

XIII

The ticket of Scott and Graham represented a desperate attempt to preserve the party as a bisectional organization. Although one wag immediately predicted that a ticket coupling a North Carolinian with "Old Fuss and Feathers" would be derisively labeled "Tar and Feathers," it linked the clear favorite of most northern Whigs with a slaveholder closely associated with the runner-up and eminently acceptable to Southerners who distrusted Scott. Given Webster's anger that no Southerner cast a single vote for him at the convention, probably no Southerner could appease Webster loyalists, but Scott, not Graham, was expected to carry New England for the Whigs.

Nonetheless, the ticket by itself could not heal the wounds opened up at and before the convention. One reminder of those divisions came in the convention's last minutes when Pennsylvania's irascible Jessup moved that at the next national convention no state be allowed more delegates than it had votes, a slap at the overrepresentation of the South that had so infuriated northern Scott men. More important were the divergent sectional reactions to the outcome. Southern Whigs in and outside the convention cheered the adoption of the platform and Graham's nomination. Their response to Scott, in contrast, was tepid, if not downright chilly, and they always coupled promises to support the ticket with the contingent demand that he embrace the platform. Both Botts and Jones had specifically pledged that Scott's letter of acceptance would explicitly endorse the Compromise, and for Southerners much hinged on what Scott would actually say in that epistle. Many Northerners' reactions were succinctly captured by Charles Dana, the New York newspaperman: "Hurrah for the nomination & damn the platform!" Appalled by the letter Jones read, Scott's managers hoped to repair the damage in the official letter of acceptance. No letter acceptable to them could possibly say everything that Southern Whigs now anticipated.

When the Whig convention finally adjourned, in sum, most northern and southern Whigs still deeply disagreed about what the thrust of the ensuing campaign should be. That chasm could not be papered over by obligatory promises to support the ticket. During the entire six days of the convention, in fact, delegates for different candidates and from different regions enthusiastically united on only two occasions. Both were commemorations of Henry Clay, the party's mortally ill founder, who had championed its cause for so many years. That Whigs were far more united when they looked to the past than when they confronted the future spoke volumes.

What Clay thought of the convention's outcome is unknown. He lay dying during its proceedings. A little after 11 A.M. on June 29, eight days after the convention adjourned, the only man on whom Whigs seemingly still could unite expired. Word of Clay's death, which Whigs had anticipated for months, went out to the nation in the next day's papers. By an eerie and ominous coincidence, the same editions of papers on June 30 that announced the doleful news also carried the acceptance letters of Winfield Scott and William A. Graham that had such grave implications for the future of the party that Clay had personified in the past.

Chapter 20

"Like Pissing Against the Wind"

"THE WHIG CAUSE never was more vulnerable in its platform and in the person of the individual hoisted up on the rickety scaffolding," a Louisiana Democrat jeered on the very day that Henry Clay died. Other Democrats shared this confidence, but they were struck less by the shakiness of the Whigs' platform than by its similarity to their own. Pennsylvania's Governor William Bigler told Franklin Pierce that Whigs had purposely "assimilated" Democratic doctrines "to reduce the contest to a personal struggle between General Scott and yourself, relying as they evidently do on the brilliance of his military career to secure success."

Bigler erred. Whigs did not intentionally mimic Democratic principles in order to contrast the candidates. Most southern Whigs fought Winfield Scott's nomination until the bitter end, while many of Scott's northern supporters regarded the platform as an unconscionable price to pay for his nomination. On the same day that Scott was nominated and Tennessee's James Jones read a letter from him accepting the platform as "laid down by the Convention," for example, Horace Greeley wrote of the platform in his widely read New York Tribune: "We defy it, execrate it, spit upon it."

If Bigler mistook Whig intentions, he correctly judged the result of the Whig and Democratic conventions. More than any presidential election since 1836, the 1852 campaign focused on the character and reputation of the opposing presidential candidates rather than on alternative public policies. Southern Democrats' campaign tactics, northern Whigs' disgust with their platform, and the Democrats' selection of Pierce, a man particularly vulnerable to personal attack, all contributed to that focus. Primarily, however, it resulted from the elimination of issue differences between the parties. Their indistinguishable positions on the Compromise and the irrelevance of economic issues because of prosperity forced them to appeal for votes by contrasting their nominees.

The lack of programmatic differences between the two parties, their opportunistic efforts to fill that void with ad hominem attacks, and the resulting disaffection and disinterest among the electrorate together produced one of the electror's two most important results. Despite the anticipated mobilization of tens of thousands of new immigrant voters, turnout rates in November 1852 fell to the lowest level since 1836, a plunge never equaled again during the nineteenth century. Whigs suffered most from voter apathy, but the election also loosened Democrats' and Free Soilers' grip on the electorate's allegiance. And the weaker voters' partisan loyalties became, the greater grew the opportunities for new parties to steal them away.

Abstention from the polls was not uniform across the nation. Total turnout fell much further and Scott ran far more poorly in the South than in the North. This sectional differential was the election's second most important result. The disgusted response of Florida's truculent Edward Carrington Cabell to the convention's outcome suggest some reasons for it. "We got an antiFreesoil platform, with the candidate of the Freesoilers, nominally on it. I will not vote for Scott, though I shall not go for Pierce." Southern Whigs' refusal to support the ticket despite the pro-Compromise platform crippled Scott in Dixie and drove down turnout rates among Democrats, who saw no need to vote once it became clear that Scott's showing, especially in the Deep South, would be pitiful. But the "antiFreesoil platform" Cabell and his co-agitators like Meredith Gentry, Christopher Williams, and Humphrey Marshall had helped force on the party vastly complicated the challenge facing northern Whigs. It guaranteed that Scott would not get Free Soilers' endorsement and forced desperate northern Whigs to seek other ways to arouse support.

Despite the considerable problems Whigs faced, many Whig leaders, especially the party's high command who orchestrated the campaign from Washington, convinced themselves that victory was certain. Although some prescient Whigs had long predicted defeat in 1852, even a few of the previous naysayers converted and remained optimistic until the votes were cast. For the historian blessed (or cursed) with hindsight, explaining that confidence is far more difficult than explaining the outcome itself.

I

Since voters in individual states would decide the presidential election, Whigs depended on state and local leaders to bear the brunt of grass-roots campaigning. Far more than any other presidential election contested by the party, however, in 1852 Whigs tried to coordinate the campaign from Washington. In part, this attempt reflected Winfield Scott's residence in the capital. Preventing Scott from issuing the damaging letters that Clay wrote in 1844 and the all-too-independent Taylor published in 1848 was an even more pressing incentive for the Whigs who had engineered Scott's nomination to surround him with a campaign team in Washington. For the only time in their history, moreover, Whigs commanded the national executive branch during a presidential campaign. With the glaring exception of Daniel Webster, who brooded bitterly about his humiliation at Baltimore, Fillmore, his administration, and the administration's Washington newspaper, John O. Sargent's Washington Republic, rallied loyally behind the party's ticket. Not only did cabinet members such as Secretary of War Conrad, Attorney General Crittenden, and Treasury Secretary Corwin relay information between

Washington and their home states of Louisiana, Kentucky, and Ohio, but their cooperation allowed Scott's managers to launch the campaign's most important innovation.

Nominal responsibility for the campaign rested with the national committee. Manned almost exclusively by Scott's original supporters, it raised and allocated funds, recruited and dispatched speakers, and wrote, printed, and distributed campaign literature. Connecticut's Senator Truman Smith once again chaired the operation, with Fitz Henry Warren, the assistant postmaster general, as his vice chairman. The most influential members and committee staff were Congressman Henry D. Moore of Philadelphia, the Maine newspaperman James S. Pike, North Carolina Senator Willie P. Mangum, ex-Congressman John Minor Botts of Richmond, John M. Clayton from nearby Delaware, Senator Ben Wade of Ohio, and Alexander H. Greene of New York, Seward's young secretary and his agent at the Baltimore convention. Within hours of Scott's nomination, the committee arranged for New York publishers to print a million copies of Pike's campaign biography of Scott and hired German printers to translate documents.⁴ Campaign strategy, however, was also charted by many of Scott's original backers who remained in Washington until Congress adjourned in early September, such as Seward, John L. Schoolcraft, and Ohio's Lew Campbell. Usually the two groups concurred, but at least once, disagreements led to disarray.

As soon as the Baltimore convention adjourned, Whig leaders in Washington frantically tried to bridge the chasm between anti- and pro-Compromise men. The Washington Republic instantly raised the banner of Scott and Graham to signal administration approval. In mid-July, Fillmore himself magnanimously wrote a letter for publication to Philadelphia in which he endorsed Scott as a true Whig who was devoted to the Compromise and deserved all Whigs' support.⁵ Scott's managers reciprocated. Comprehending the fear he aroused among southern Whigs and New York's Silver Grays, Seward announced in late June that he would neither seek nor accept a cabinet position should Scott win. Until Congress adjourned, Seward carefully avoided all personal contact with Scott in order "to show that he is not under my dictation."

Given Seward's supposedly malign influence over Taylor as United States senator, these actions failed to mollify suspicious Southerners. Instead, they looked to Scott's official letter of acceptance for fuller evidence of his commitment to finality. "If Scott's avowals shall be satisfactory to run on the compromise, I may give him my vote," wrote Tennessee's previously hostile Whig Governor William B. Campbell on June 26. Yet hard-line northern Scott managers, who hated the platform and were appalled by the note Scott had apparently given Jones to read at the convention, were determined to use that acceptance letter to erase any impression that Scott flatly opposed revision of the fugitive slave law or that he considered commitment to finality a test of party orthodoxy."

Dated June 24, two days after Scott received official notification of his nomination, Scott's reply did not appear in the press until five or six days later when news of Clay's death was announced.⁸ Exactly who wrote it is unclear. Scott's biographer asserts that only Scott could have written a statement so transparently devoid of political guile. Yet at the end of June, Wade, an insider in the preconvention Scott club, wrote his wife that two of its members, whom he refused to name, composed it and that they had made as strong a bid for the Free Soil vote "as they dare under the circumstances."

Anything but guileless, Scott's acceptance letter artfully attempted to reunite the party for the forthcoming campaign and to increase its ranks. Unable to reconcile the divergent attitudes toward the platform, Scott (or his ghost writers), in sharp contrast to the promises Botts and Jones had made at the convention to sway southern votes, said nothing directly about slavery, the Compromise, or even the platform; he merely accepted the nomination "with the resolutions annexed." His only other reference to the intraparty gulf was to insist that sectional harmony required him and other Americans to "know no South and no North" and to discountenance "any sedition, disorder, . . . or resistance to the law or the Union . . . in any part of the land." This promise could be interpreted as a pledge to implement the fugitive slave law but also as a vow to crack down on secessionists and filibusterers. As to the all-important veto power—which Southerners wanted used and Northerners wanted renounced in case Congress repealed or revised the fugitive law—Scott straddled by saying it must be "cautiously exercized, and under the strictest restraints and necessities."

A long draft that Horace Greeley sent Pike on May 29 suggests the ideas that influenced, if not exactly who wrote, Scott's letter. Greeley emphatically insisted that Scott reject southern demands for pledges to veto bills that revised or repealed the fugitive law, a rejection implicit in Scott's letter. In addition, Greeley, like other northern Scott managers, stressed that full acceptance of the Compromise must not be made a litmus test, as pro-Compromise Whigs had demanded in the Round Robin of 1851. Scott's letter promised that in order "to cultivate harmony and fraternal sentiments throughout the Whig party" he would appoint or retain in office only qualified Whigs, "without attempting to reduce [the administration's] members, to exact conformity to my views." However tepidly Scott endorsed the platform, in short, he would not require other Whigs to do so. Yet these well-chosen words could also reassure Southerners and northern pro-Compromise men that they too would have a chance for federal jobs. Finally, they signaled that Scott, unlike Zachary Taylor, had no intention of pursuing a No Party or all parties patronage policy.

Other parts of the letter also strongly suggest Greeley's influence on whoever wrote it. Should the convention adopt a pro-Compromise platform, Greeley argued in May and June, Whigs could still bid for Free Soil voters with a plank endorsing homestead legislation. Free soil had always meant more to the third party than slaveless territories; it also meant free government land to encourage rapid settlement of the West. "A Free Land plank," Greeley urged, "would almost act as a chloride to a compromise infection." Since the Whigs' national platform said nothing whatsoever about a homestead bill, Scott's acceptance letter attempted to rectify that omission. Scott could not fully endorse free land; too many northeastern and southeastern Whigs still clung to the vain hope of distributing federal land revenues to the states. The letter recommended instead that Congress change the laws regarding the public domain "so as to secure an early settlement of the same, favorable to actual settlers, but consistent, nevertheless, with a due regard to the equal rights of the whole American people in that vast national inheritance." Along with the studied noncommittalism on finality, this backhanded embrace of cheap land marked the bid to Free Soilers by the letter's authors "as strong as they dare make it under the circumstances." 13

The second new substantive proposal in the letter reflected the previous decision by Scott's managers to seek Irish Catholic votes and their desire to mollify Germans angered by the platform's endorsement of Fillmore's nonintervention policy that seemed intentionally to insult Kossuth. Whatever Scott's purported appeal to Catholics, Greeley, Seward, and other Scott men were only too well aware of Scott's nativistic letters from the mid-1840s that, during 1852, Democrats dredged up and reprinted to turn immigrants against him. Scott's most notorious—and clumsy—bid for Native American backing, the "Americus" letter of 1844, had demanded that all immigrant men serve two years in the American armed forces after naturalization as a prerequisite to enfranchisement. Now his managers sought to put a favorable spin on that impolitic proposal. The acceptance letter called for admitting to immediate citizenship any immigrant aliens who served in the armed forces during a period of war for only one year and were honorably discharged. In short, military service was now presented as a voluntary way to shorten the naturalization process by four years, not as a mandatory method of prolonging it. This proposal, crowed Raymond's New York Times, "refutes the allegations of his political enemies, that he is . . . hostile to the rights and interests of foreigners."14

Appearing in the same newspaper editions as Scott's letter, William A. Graham's acceptance of the vice presidential nomination overtly attempted to conciliate Southerners and other pro-Compromise Whigs. He had served for two years in Fillmore's administration, he proudly announced, and the Whig platform fully reflected its policies during that period. Should Scott and Graham win, "so far as I shall be invested with authority, a faithful adherence to these doctrines may be expected."

Additional efforts to sell Scott to southern Whigs began simultaneously with publication of the two acceptance letters and continued nonstop until November. Like so much else about the 1852 Whig campaign, they largely ignored the parties' records and platforms and concentrated instead on reassuring Southerners about Scott's reliability and instigating fear and suspicion of Pierce, who was almost completely unknown to Southerners. Propaganda aimed at southern Whigs was reduced essentially to a simple assertion: our guy is not as bad as their guy.

Ostensibly, Whigs had little room to maneuver. New Hampshire's Democratic party had been fully committed to the Compromise since early 1851; Pierce had personally driven the Free Soiler John Atwood off the Democratic state ticket that year; and Pierce's letter accepting the Democratic nomination was far more forthright in endorsing the Compromise than was Scott's. Pierce, in sum, was the archetypal doughface. Whigs tried to sow doubts about him by reminding Southerners that the notorious Free Soil Senator John P. Hale, who was nominated in August as the Free Soilers' presidential candidate, hailed from New Hampshire and was once a Democrat, just as they had stigmatized Lewis Cass in 1848 by pointing to Martin Van Buren. But Whigs needed more.

They found it when they discovered a skeleton in Pierce's closet. Responding to hecklers during a speech in New Hampshire in January 1852, Pierce incautiously declared that he disliked the fugitive slave law because it was inhumane. Such words were harmless so long as Pierce remained a nonentity outside of New Hampshire, but when he unexpectedly won the Democratic presidential nomination in June, they became a smoking gun. Before the end of the month Sargent's Washington Republic, which had vociferously defended the fugitive law for two years, was daily printing the charge that Pierce opposed and would therefore never enforce the act. Fully aware of the credibility of Fillmore's organ with Southerners, consternated Democrats in Washington screamed for Pierce to rebut this lethal canard.¹⁶

Southern Whig papers widely reprinted this charge, and later it, along with other assaults on Pierce's character and testimonials to Scott's soundness on everything that mattered to Southerners, was gathered in a series of campaign pamphlets. Compiled by the national committee, these tracts formed the core of Whigs' propaganda campaign in both sections. With titles like "The Contrast," "Pierce and His Allies," and "Franklin Pierce and His Qualifications and Intentions for the Presidency," they reflected Whigs' emphasis on candidates, not programs. Truman Smith not only oversaw the preparation and distribution of these materials, he personally wrote each of them. "I have never exerted myself so much," Smith complained. "I thought I worked as hard as I could in /48, but I worked harder now." 17

Smith aimed "The Contrast" and "Pierce and His Allies" especially at the South, and he later congratulated himself that they had done the Whig cause much good there. The latter pamphlet stressed Pierce's untrustworthiness on the Compromise by pointing to the Democratic-Free Soil coalition in certain northern states, notably Massachusetts, which, one Masschusetts Whig argued, should "surely" strike "all Southern men as heretical and damnable." In "The Contrast," Smith unfavorably compared Scott's brilliant military career to Pierce's ostensibly cowardly record as a brigadier general in Mexico. Although Pierce had won official commendations from Scott himself for his participation in some very hard fighting, Pierce's experience in Mexico had been luckless indeed. When the horse on which he was mounted to lead his brigade on a charge bucked, Pierce was thrown violently against the pommel of his saddle, fell to the ground, fainted from his painful groin injury, and lay there ignominiously as his brigade marched by and an underling shouted, "Take command of the brigade, General Pierce is a damned coward." At the next encounter, Pierce, this time safely afoot to lead the charge, twisted a knee he had hurt during the previous fall and collapsed to the ground as his troops again marched by and beyond him. Finally, when his brigade participated in the storming of Chapultepec, Pierce again missed the fray, for he lay prostrated behind the lines with diarrhea. Whigs gleefully mocked this ill-starred showing, for Southerners with a fetish for manly honor reviled any hint of cowardice.19

Aiming more directly at his southern audience, Smith also gathered in "The Contrast" every testimonial to Scott's nationalism, devotion to the Compromise, and independent character he could find. Most of these came from predictable sources: southern Whig editorials and speeches from southern Whig politicians. But some were unexpected. Mississippi's Union governor and former Democrat Henry S. Foote was quoted as telling a Democratic mass meeting that he personally knew Scott was sound on the Compromise. More surprising, John A. Quitman, Mississippi's secessionist former governor, who had served under Scott in Mexico, provided a ringing endorsement. As a Democrat, Quitman announced, he could not vote for Scott; nonetheless, Scott was the only Whig whom he could ever support for president. Moreover, the charge that Scott would be Seward's puppet was sheer "stuff!" No one was more independent or more "true to the South." Thus, Quitman told a Democratic rally, "I have been surprised and astonished that among the Whig party there should be found a single man unwilling to give him a cordial and hearty support."

These, then, constituted the array of Whig appeals that the Whigs' high command in Washington aimed at the South. Southern Whig papers and speakers offered their own variations on them, and they often reminded voters that many of the same Democrats who now embraced Pierce and finality had only recently been promoting secession. But the central question was how well this message played in Dixie. Could the palliatives offered by Whig leaders soothe suspicious southern Whig voters?

II

"The South have been humbugged already by the pledges of Taylor & I trust they will not be simple enough to be humbugged again," a Democrat wrote Pierce from Washington when Scott's acceptance letter first appeared. Most southern Democrats, indeed, reacted with contempt to Scott's letter, and they remained confident that it could not mitigate southern Whigs' deep distrust of him. There was "not the slightest enthusiasm anywhere" for Scott, asserted a Democrat from Raleigh, North Carolina. Whigs were "downcast, dispirited, and distressed," echoed a Mississippian. In late July a Louisianan summed up what Democrats across Dixie saw as southern Whigs' response to Scott: "The Whigs in this state are bolting in all directions—they are cut to pieces." Given Whigs' revulsion toward Scott, Louisiana Democratic leaders advised New Orleans' leading Democratic newspaper editor, Democrats must not reawaken Whigs' party loyalty by traditional partisan assaults, but should instead further undermine Whigs' confidence in their candidate.²¹

Convinced that true Southerners should regard Scott's nomination as insulting evidence that hostile Northerners now controlled the Whig party, southern Democratic papers constantly portrayed the election as a referendum on sectional loyalty. Equally convinced by their own rhetoric that any southern votes for Scott would mark "a degree of degradation which the Southern character has never before reached," Democrats believed that Whig support for Scott was literally inconceivable.²²

Initially, at least, Southern Democrats' confidence seemed justified. Within a week of Scott's and Graham's letters' publication, nine southern Whig congressmen, led by the six Unionists from Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, announced in the Washington National Intelligencer that they could not support Scott because he had refused to endorse finality before or after the convention. In July, moreover, Robert Toombs denounced Scott on the House floor as a stalking horse for antislavery men in a speech that Whigs later circulated in the North as one of their own campaign documents. Whig Representative Charles J. Faulkner of Virginia and Tennessee's Williams and Gentry, who had vowed throughout the spring that they would never support Scott unless he committed himself before the convention, also signed the defiant manifesto. Florida's Cabell did not, but as the only Whig congressman from the Deep South who faced a reelection campaign in 1852, he tried to distance himself from Scott by writing Florida's Whig state convention that he could not support him. In addition, North Carolina's renegade Congressman Thomas Clingman completed his four-year march toward the Democrats by openly pledging to support Pierce and King.²³

Since this opposition was expected, neither it nor Democrats' crowing fazed Scott's managers, who had always written off the Deep South. For over a decade Democrats had dominated Mississippi and, to a lesser extent, Alabama, and once Democrats abandoned their Union coalitions early in 1852, it became clear that Whigs could not prevent Democrats from carrying them any more than they could stop Democratic victories in South Carolina, Arkansas, and Texas.²⁴ Hopes of carrying Georgia in 1852 had also long since died, but a rout there in November could prove more serious. Georgia had always contributed more to Whig congressional strength than any other Deep South state. If influential Union Whigs like Toombs and Stephens, not content with renouncing Scott, openly defected to the Democratic party and carried their large personal followings with them, Georgia's Whig party might never rebound, despite the efforts of Senator William C. Dawson and John M. Berrien, who resigned his Senate seat in May, to rally the state's Whig politicos and voters behind the Scott ticket. Georgia's Whigs' fate after 1852, in sum, might well be determined by the presidential campaign.²⁵

Whigs outside Georgia were therefore heartened when Whig papers in Atlanta, Macon, Savannah, and Columbus ignored Stephens and Toombs and endorsed Scott. More important, although a few Whigs instantly threatened to vote for Pierce, by July Union Whigs loyal to Stephens had joined him in rebuffing pressure from Union Democrats to support Pierce for fear of being absorbed "into all the evils of locofocoism." Instead, they insisted, Georgia's Union party should "reject both the regular nominees & hoist the banner of [a] third candidate." When Georgia's remaining Union Democrats, including Governor Howell Cobb, endorsed a Union electoral ticket pledged to Pierce at the Georgia Constitutional Union party's last state convention in mid-July, therefore, Union Whigs called a new state convention to make an independent nomination. They carefully scheduled it for Macon in August on the day before the pro-Scott Whigs met in state convention there, thereby briefly raising false hopes that the two Whig assemblages might combine behind Scott.²⁶

Determined to inflict a humiliating defeat on Scott, averse to a merger with Democrats, and hopeful of "putting an end to these party conventions and irresponsible bodies... who now virtually make choice of our chief magistrates," Stephens and his Georgia followers had decided upon the identity of their candidate by early July. As if to prove their spite, or sense of justice, it was the embittered Webster, who was privately telling friends to join him in voting for Pierce. Some Georgians approached Webster directly, and Stephens secured permission to run him from his disappointed Massachusetts loyalists like George R. Curtis, who planned to use the Georgia nomination as an excuse to run a separate Webster ticket there as well. In August, Georgia's Unionist Whigs chose an electoral slate pledged to Webster and their own Charles J. Jenkins for vice president. If Scott ever stood a chance of carrying Georgia, that nomination destroyed it. Stephens, moreover, had clearly burned his bridges to the Whig party. Nonetheless, the Union Whigs' decision to spurn the Democrats encouraged hope that all Whigs might still reunite after the presidential election.²⁷

Even more heartening to Whigs, in neighboring Florida, Cabell grudgingly recanted his opposition to Scott.²⁸ Despite residual anger among longtime residents of Florida at Scott, who had denounced them in an 1836 report as cowards because of their panicked reaction to some Indian raids, Florida's Whig press and the popular incumbent Whig Governor Thomas Brown quickly endorsed the general's nomination. Although Brown would campaign hard for the Whig ticket in the fall, he declined to seek renomination, and the Whig state convention in July chose as his successor George T. Ward, a delegate to the Baltimore convention, who also strongly endorsed Scott. The determination of Florida's Whigs to repudiate Cabell's repudiation of Scott became even clearer when his letter refusing to support Scott was read to that convention. Ward instantly and angrily refused to accept the gubernatorial nomination or run on the same ticket with Cabell unless he retracted it. To preserve the strongest and most harmonious ticket possible, the convention then induced Cabell to write another letter in which he agreed to "acquiesce" in Scott's nomination. Florida's Democratic press jeered that the state Whig party had committed "political suicide" and that "the body will be embalmed and kept over ground till November, when it will be laid in the grave." Since voters would not register their opinions until October, however, Whigs elsewhere could hope during the summer that this small, but symbolically important. Whig outpost might be preserved.29

Contrary to Democratic jeers, Louisiana Whig leaders, except for newly elected Senator Judah P. Benjamin, also rallied behind the ticket. Even more heartening to the Washington campaign team, most upper South Whigs, who had always formed the backbone of southern Whig support, responded positively to the ticket. In Virginia, which gave Scott eight votes on the final ballot in Baltimore, Congressman James Strother, ex-Senator William Archer, Secretary of the Interior Alexander H. H. Stuart, and ex-Congressman Botts praised the nominee, while the Richmond Whig, the state's most influential Whig paper, proclaimed, "Scott's letter is all his friends could desire, and a great deal more than his enemies can digest." Months before the national convention, Kentucky's longtime Whig state chairman promised Seward that state's support for Scott should he be the nominee, and virtually the entire Whig leadership, from sitting United States senators and incumbent congressmen on down through local politicos and editors in Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, Delaware, and North Carolina, threw their weight behind the ticket. Particularly noteworthy to Scott's northern managers was the silent acquiescence he received from southern Whig congressmen who had bolted the second Whig caucus in April, like North Carolina's David Outlaw and especially Kentucky's Humphrey Marshall, who even more than Gentry, Williams, and Cabell had brought the party to the brink of sectional disruption.³⁰

No state better illustrates the tendency of upper South Whigs, despite a few well-known but atypical dissidents, to rally behind the ticket than Tennessee. After the convention only William G. "Parson" Brownlow's Knoxville Whig echoed Gentry and Williams in repudiating Scott, whereas the rest of the Whig press, including the flagship Nashville Republican Banner, endorsed the ticket. So did most of the state's Whig leadership. Senator Jones and his lieutenant, Congressman William Cullom, had long since been committed to Scott, and in July other

Whig congressmen, Governor Campbell, and, most important, Senator John Bell, the state's most prominent Whig and Jones' foremost intraparty rival, joined them. Like other Southerners, Bell had favored Fillmore's nomination, and he had privately applauded the heavy-handed efforts by Gentry, Williams, and others to extort a pro-Compromise platform from the Whig convention. Furthermore, Bell had angrily and publicly rejected rumors that he was pro-Scott like Jones. Thus his series of letters to the state's Whigs in July endorsing Scott as someone whose principles were perfectly compatible with Southern Rights had considerable impact.³¹

By the end of July, Gentry and Williams had clearly failed to carry Tennessee Whigs into revolt with them. Whig Governor Campbell and Democratic Congressman Andrew Johnson concurred that "Gentry has most foolishly destroyed himself and is a ruined man among his constituents." Campbell's letters reflect the sea change that occurred among Tennessee's Whigs during the two months following the convention. Although Campbell vowed throughout the spring never to support Scott, on June 26 he expressed a grudging willingness to cast his own vote for him. At that point, however, he refused to campaign personally for the ticket, and he cited as the Whigs' only hope of carrying Tennessee Democratic weaknesses: Pierce was a less distinguished political pygmy than even Polk, and unlike 1844, Democrats had no Texas annexation issue to ride. By late July he reported that Tennessee's Whigs were now zealous for Scott and that he himself could campaign for the ticket "warmly." On August 17 he exulted that "there can be no doubt now but that Scott will run like wild fire."

The few August state and congressional elections prolonged Whigs' hopes about the South by indicating that support for Scott was not necessarily fatal. Whereas Whigs won three of five Missouri's House seats in 1850 because of Democratic divisions, in 1852 they retained only two. Nonetheless, this was an outstanding performance in that former Democratic bastion, especially as Whigs lost a seat primarily because Thomas Hart Benton himself ran in the St. Louis district Whigs had carried two years earlier. Nonetheless, Whigs remained a distinct minority among Missouri's voters, winning 43 percent of the total popular vote in the congressional contests and 41 percent in the gubernatorial election, while Whigs' share of seats in the lower legislative house declined from 41 percent to a more normal 31 percent. Scott's nomination, in sum, failed to reduce the previous gains Whigs had made with Missouri's voters, but Pierce was certain to carry it in November.³³

Nor did North Carolina's August gubernatorial and legislative elections, which Whigs watched closely since Graham was on the national ticket, shake their confidence. Incumbent Democratic Governor David Reid defeated his hapless Whig opponent, John Kerr, with 53 percent of the vote, a landslide by North Carolina standards, while in the legislative races Whigs won a majority of the house for the first time in six years and Democrats increased their margin in the senate. Although almost a tenth of the men who voted Whig for governor in 1850 now abstained, neither Whig nor Democratic leaders in North Carolina attributed these results to either party's presidential candidate. Instead they pointed to Reid's effective exploitation of the free suffrage issue; Kerr's unpopularity among western North Carolina Whigs because he opposed a constitutional convention to reapportion the legislature on the white basis and distribution of the state's public school fund; the intrusion into the state race by the magnetic maverick Clingman, who, from Washington, endorsed Pierce for president and urged his mesmerized constituents to support Reid as well; and, with regard to Democratic losses in the legislature, the selection of incompetent candidates in eastern North Carolina who could not compete with very strong Whig slates. Concerning "the prospect for Whig success in the Presidential election," one Whig reassured Graham in early September, "we have no cause for either despondency or despair." Kerr's defeat was not "evidence of a declension of the Whig cause."

Attributing the North Carolina defeat to local factors, knowledgeable northern Whig leaders also continued to count on North Carolina's electoral votes for Scott. "The aspect of our affairs South is much better than I anticipated they ever would be & our intelligence leads us to believe we shall carry Louisiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, & Maryland," Truman Smith rejoiced in late August to Thurlow Weed, now back from Europe. "We have strong hopes of N. C. notwithstanding the result of the recent election." Exactly what Smith heard from the South is unclear since no collection of his incoming correspondence has ever been found. Yet other southern Whigs besides North Carolinians exuded optimism. In early September, B. H. Sheppard, chairman of Tennessee's Whig state committee, assured Seward that the state was safe for Scott. A week later a Virginian reported that "all the Whigs" believed that Scott's prospects in the Old Dominion were "becoming more bright and favorable every day."

How, one asks, could Whigs and Democrats have read the southern electorate so differently? In part because of Whig attacks, Pierce clearly failed to arouse much enthusiasm among southern Democrats, and Whig observers possibly concentrated on Democratic apathy, just as Democrats counted on Whigs' refusal to turn out for Scott. In addition, the infrequency of southern elections that summer concealed the electorate's mood, causing Whig activists who displayed unity and vigor in nonelectoral arenas to project that enthusiasm onto the silent electorate.

In Louisiana, where Whigs won in 1851 and elected Benjamin to the Senate in early 1852, for example, Whig leaders focused their attention during the spring and summer on a constitutional convention that Whigs had called over the opposition of Democrats and to which Whigs elected a majority of delegates. Those delegates worked cohesively and successfully to achieve Whigs' foremost goal: revision of the 1845 constitution to allow the legislature to charter banks and fund internal improvements for the first time in seven years. Success had followed success, in sum, and Whig leaders may have assumed that this momentum would continue into November, when the referendum on the new constitution would be held simultaneously with the presidential election. Had they examined the workings of the convention more closely, however, they might have been less sanguine. To achieve what Whig delegates wanted on banking and other economic provisions in the new constitution, they made a Faustian bargain with Democrats to change the basis of representation in the legislature in ways that reduced the influence of Whiggish New Orleans and increased the representation of Democratic cotton planters, thereby almost ensuring that Whigs could never control the legislature again. Rather than signaling Whigs' optimism about future political prospects, this was the act of men who, having secured certain specific goals through the partisan political process, were preparing to abandon it.³⁷

There is another possible explanation for Whigs' misreading of the South. Although Truman Smith was not the only member of the national committee who counted Louisiana and other slave states as certain for Scott, his optimism is the most puzzling, for Smith was as unsentimental a realist as the Whig party possessed. Prior to the Whig national convention, he himself wrote off all the South but the border states and argued that the election had to be carried in the North. Yet on October 7, less than four weeks from election day, he told a Californian that in addition to seven certain northern states, Scott would carry Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Louisiana. "We expect also Florida & our friends on the other side of the Potomac even talk of carrying Va. & I shall not be astonished if they do." Complaining that he was exhausted since he had to write all the Whig documents himself, Smith significantly added that those pamphlets "have produced a great effect in the South & have contributed to work a great revolution in that section in favor of Scott." One sees here the delusion of authorial pride. Having worked so hard to convince southern Whigs to vote for Scott, he convinced himself that he had done so.³⁸

Ш

Unlike the South, where Scott's chances seemed surprisingly bright, in the North the reaction to Scott initially proved cooler than his managers anticipated. To be sure, northern Whigs who had previously promoted Scott as the party's savior rejoiced that "present appearances indicate a triumphant election," and midwestern Whigs voiced particular confidence.³⁹ Yet even some of Scott's strongest proponents expressed doubts. To some the platform posed a potentially insuperable hurdle. Ohio's Lew Campbell pronounced it "a dead weight" in his state. In New York, where Greeley ringingly repudiated the platform, upstate Sewardite Whigs were so embarrassed by it that they refused to hold ratification meetings in areas where Silver Grays were numerous, lest they be forced to ratify the platform as well. Seward himself angrily told his wife that if the state Whig convention in September adopted the national platform, he would immediately resign from the Senate. The platform's pro-Compromise planks worried such men, but many also complained that the endorsement of nonintervention that so offended the Germans aroused by Kossuth "gives us no votes in the South & cripples us in the North." With good reason, therefore, northern Whigs ignored, when they did not explicitly renounce, the platform during the remainder of the campaign and instead contrasted their candidate's purported virtues to the weaknesses of his foe.40

Yet many anti-Compromise Whigs now questioned Scott's reliability as a standard bearer. They viewed his impetuous letter to Jones at the convention as evidence of his penchant for shooting himself in the foot. "Feathers will be more fussy than ever and I shall be greatly surprised if he does not throw himself into the hands of the enemy immediately," Seward's young secretary wrote the senator's wife. "I am getting a little afraid of Gen. Scott," another New Yorker warned Seward. "I know you made him, & we've got him and it's better Scott than anybody else in the world and all that, but I am a little afraid of his vanity & letter writing."

To most of the Whig high command in Washington and to many northern Whigs, however, Scott remained the party's best, if not its only, card. And they needed that "tower of strength" to overcome the many other problems they faced.

Sudden trepidation among Scott's early supporters was one thing; the distinct lack of enthusiasm among conservatives who had preferred Fillmore or Webster was quite another. Conservative leaders promised support for the ticket, if only because of common antipathy to the Democrats, but often they added that such support was contingent on exactly what Sewardites refused to give—untempered endorsement of the national platform. At the grass-roots level, moreover, both Whigs and Democrats reported unprecedented apathy and indifference, especially among conservatives. "No enthusiasm exists in this region for Scott," a Philadelphia Democrat reported. Neither Native Americans nor the pro-Compromise merchants who had supported Senator James Cooper and Fillmore would vote for him. "Should the state and local conventions create some political action, there may yet be a spirited campaign," the loyal Francis Granger warned Fillmore from western New York, "but at present, there is a want of interest never before witnessed. No enthusiasm for Scott nor anything for Pierce." From southeastern Ohio Whigs portrayed "alarming apathy and indifference," a cry echoed even in distant California.42

Conservatives' disaffection and distrust deepened when Sewardite Whigs rejected the platform. Yet the problem of apathy and indifference extended far beyond disgruntled Silver Grays and Websterites. The fundamental reason, as both Whigs and Democrats recognized, was the irrelevance of economic issues that had long fueled partisan conflict. Pennsylvania's Democrats rejoiced that the Tariff issue "has lost much of its potency" for Whigs because the national platform nullified their traditional claim to be "the exclusive friends" of protection and because the boom in railroad construction had brought prosperity to ironmakers and anthracite coal miners who had normally gone Whig to secure now unnecessary tariff protection. "I never did see in the whole course of my political experience such apathy and want of confidence on the part of the Whigs," reported a gleeful Pennsylvania Democrat. Without the tariff issue, another chortled to Pierce at the end of September, Whigs' "great argument . . . against you here, is the fainting at the Battle in Mexico—it is doing them no good."⁴³

Whigs agreed, and some desperately urged leaders in Washington to resurrect traditional economic issues in order to reawaken and reunite the troops. Henry C. Carey, for years the nation's most erudite and famous advocate of tariff protection, complained to John O. Sargent in early July that Whig politicians lacked the courage of their convictions. Citing a temporary credit crunch in Philadelphia as justification, he urged Sargent to get Fillmore immediately to send a special message to Congress demanding a higher tariff. If Congress passed such a bill, "it would be a Whig measure, & the Whigs would profit by it." If the Democratic majority defeated such a bill, "the party would go to the country upon the issue—their only one." Then, revealing a spreading disillusionment with Whig leaders, Carey immediately lamented, "It would be a bold measure, & for that reason it will not be adopted. The Whigs have little faith in the truth of their own doctrines, & less in the common sense of the people."

Whigs from New York and Massachusetts also implored Seward to energize Whigs by demanding higher tariffs and rivers and harbors improvements. They are "unquestionably Whig measures," argued Seth Hawley. Seward was sympathetic, but he told the Boston editor William Schouler that he simply had no time to prepare a tariff speech until the next session of Congress, after the election. Attempts to breathe life into the tariff issue thus expired.⁴⁵ Nor did anything come of proposals to promote internal improvements, an issue of special importance to midwestern Whigs. A rivers and harbors bill was introduced into Congress in July, but, as one New York Whig congressman warned Weed, since it contained no subsidies for western projects, western Whigs would vote against it, thereby allowing midwestern Democrats to portray Whigs as the enemies of internal improvements. By the end of the session, no legislation had passed for which Whigs could claim credit.⁴⁶

The two parties, however, still differed on foreign policy, an issue of considerable concern to many Whig leaders. Prior to Democrats' national convention, many Whigs feared that they would endorse a policy of spread-eagle expansionism that at best condoned aggressive action to acquire Cuba and at worst sanctioned armed intervention in Europe in a bid for German votes. The Democrats did not go that far, but their national platform, by defending the Mexican War as 'just and necessary' and celebrating 'the results of that war, which have so manifestly justified the policy and conduct of the democratic party,' indicated a yen for future aggressive foreign adventures. Belligerent Democratic United States senators reinforced that impression by attacking the administration's response to provocations by the British navy in the Canadian fisheries as proof that Whig foreign policy consisted of cowardly appeasement.

Whig leaders' fear that reckless Democrats might drag the country into war with Spain over Cuba, with Great Britain over the North Atlantic fisheries, or with German states and Austria to appease Kossuth was genuine, and they personally believed that this terrifying prospect necessitated the preservation and triumph of the Whig party. Nonetheless, three things prevented Whigs from using foreign policy to arouse their demonstrably lethargic electorate in 1852. First, no evidence existed that rank-and-file Whig voters appreciated the threat or would have responded to it if they had. Second, emphasizing Whig opposition to foreign adventurism would be counterproductive in some southern states especially Louisiana—for Whigs there reported that Scott's greatest handicap was not his tepid Compromise stance but his evident intention to crack down on filibusterers. Most important, many alarmed Whigs saw the platform's commitment to neutrality and nonintervention as driving the entire and vastly enlarged German vote into the Democratic column. To emphasize foreign policy, in sum, was to write off Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, and perhaps New York. Like tariff protectionism and rivers and harbors improvements, foreign policy could not be used to combat Whig apathy. Scott's strategists had to look elsewhere.49

IV

The first place some looked was to Scott himself. Personal campaigning by major party presidential candidates was simply not done, but Scott's position as commanding general offered opportunities to place him before the public on ostensibly nonpolitical trips that could remind voters of his glorious military achievements. As soon as Scott was nominated, therefore, Whigs in Washington and upstate New York made arrangements for a huge rally in late July at Niagara Falls to celebrate the anniversaries of Scott's triumphs at nearby Chippewa and Lundy's Lane. Veterans of both the War of 1812 and the Mexican War were to be brought in by special trains to cheer their former commander, and Whigs from western New York, northwestern Pennsylvania, and northern Ohio, which had relatively easy access to Buffalo by boat service across Lake Erie, would assemble to kick off the campaign and shake off Whig listlessness.

Although Fillmore's Buffalo allies urged Attorney General Crittenden to keep Scott from personally attending because any hint of electioneering would be fatal, Sewardites considered Scott's presence absolutely essential. He would be carefully scripted by his campaign managers so as to avoid blatantly political remarks and other blunders, but he had to be there to arouse Whig enthusiasm. "Our western friends are very, very sanguine that staying away will be awful," warned Simeon Draper from New York City. Lew Campbell proposed that Scott go from Niagara Falls into Ohio to awaken its Whigs as well, and he busily telegraphed Ohio Whig leaders to make local arrangements.⁵⁰

This initial attempt to excite torpid Whigs aborted. George Morey, chairman of the Massachusetts Whig state committee, begged Truman Smith to keep Scott away from the celebration, and, in Campbell's contemptuous words, "Uncle Truman & others caved." Word was sent that Scott had fallen ill and could not attend. The celebration took place, but even Whigs admitted that it fizzled. Democrats jeered about a complete flop. Campbell was livid. "This business will prove disastrous. Don't count on Ohio any longer," he fumed. "We have too many cooks at work, and if the broth is not all spoiled already, it will be, unless we all determine to act in our own latitude—leaving those at a distance from us to operate at the dictates of their own discretion." Why on earth did Morey of Massachusetts interfere in a rally planned for western New York? he angrily asked Boston's Schouler. 51

Why indeed? What Morey wrote Truman Smith is unknown. Since both the War of 1812 and the Mexican War had been vastly unpopular in Massachusetts, at least among likely Whig voters, he may have feared anything that reminded them of Scott's prominent role in those contests. More than most Whigs, those in Massachusetts, especially Webster and his followers, had also long railed against the dangers of a military man in the White House. Primarily, indeed, Morey probably sought to contain the damage caused by Webster's expected independent presidential candidacy that was bruited by his diehard followers within days of the Whig national convention and actually launched in Massachusetts two weeks after Georgia's Union Whigs nominated him on August 17.52

No one in Massachusetts believed that a splinter Webster ticket could prevent Scott from carrying the state, but the revolt betokened sabotage of the Whig state ticket that would once again prevent a Whig majority and allow the hated Democratic/Free Soil Coalition to recapture the legislature, name the new governor, and send a Free Soiler to the Senate.⁵³ In northern states outside of Massachusetts, an independent Webster ticket could prove far more damaging to Scott's chances. Whigs expected New York's race to be extremely close, and Scott needed every Whig vote to prevail. "The great object now is to elect Scott," argued one Sewardite, "and one flank of the Whig army cannot do it without the aid and cooperation of the other." As early as July 14, however, angry conservatives in New York City approached Webster about running a ticket for him there. Democrats encouraged the effort with funds and press support. And Whigs groaned that if any significant fraction of Silver Grays threw away their vote to Webster, Scott would lose. Even Vermont's Whigs feared that defection of Websterites to a separate ticket might deprive Scott of that bastion.⁵⁴

Separate Webster tickets raised an even more insidious threat. Native American parties and other nativist groups like New York City's Order of United Americans detested Scott's flip-flop on naturalization and his obvious sympathy for Catholics. As Pennsylvania's Native American leader Lewis C. Levin wrote in October, "The feeling among my friends is intense—intense hostility to the Whigs." Because they believed Whigs' charges, aimed at wooing Catholic voters for Scott, that Pierce was an anti-Catholic bigot, most nativists favored Pierce's election to reward his "Anti-Popery." They realized, however, that open support for Pierce might drive immigrants and Catholics toward Scott. To prevent that and to entice nativist Whig voters away from Scott, those nativists, with the full encouragement of Democratic leaders, nominated separate Webster tickets in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.⁵⁵

If independent Webster tickets threatened to siphon off pro-Compromise Whigs and nativists from Scott, Whig hopes of preventing a separate Free Soil candidacy evaporated when Free Soilers in July called for a national convention at Pittsburgh in August. Democrats like Pennsylvania's Governor Bigler and some Whigs believed that any Free Soil nomination would be "the end of Scott," but Whig strategists like Seward, Weed, and Schuyler Colfax hoped that the damage could be contained if Ohio Senator Salmon P. Chase rather than New Hampshire's Hale was the nominee. Chase was anothema to Whigs and Whig-Free Soilers in Ohio, and his selection might still allow Scott to get most of the antislavery vote. Hale, in contrast, had frequently cooperated with New Hampshire's Whigs and might lure away antislavery Whigs disgusted with their party's platform. Weed urged Schouler, while Colfax implored Seward, to persuade Hale not to accept the nomination if offered. "If you can't influence Hale, I don't know who in our party can," cried Colfax. The selection of Hale and Indiana's George W. Julian as the Free Soil candidates in August and Hale's acceptance of that nomination were therefore severe setbacks.56

Virtually all the Free Soil leaders—Chase, Charles Sumner, Henry Wilson, and Hale himself—knew they had no chance of winning the presidency, and they far preferred Scott to Pierce. Hale therefore decided to break precedent and tour Ohio and Michigan in September after Congress adjourned. By blaming Democratic leaders in those states for Texas' annexation and the growth of the Slave Power, he believed, he would turn normal Democrats against Pierce and cut more deeply into the Democratic than the Whig vote. The prospect of this tour at first panicked Ohio Whig leaders, and they begged Seward to come to the state to counteract it. Once Hale reached Ohio, however, Whigs in Washington mistakenly concluded that he hurt Democrats there far more than Whigs. Nonetheless, Hale's candidacy meant that Whigs could count on neither Free Soil nor nativist votes for Scott.⁵⁷

V

By early September Scott's northern campaign was clearly floundering. The Hale and Webster tickets threatened to siphon off votes. Pro-Compromise conservatives remained discontented, and New Yorkers widely predicted sabotage or abstention by Silver Grays.⁵⁸ The rank and file exhibited unprecedented indifference. No national issues were available to arouse them, and the first attempts to use Scott himself to do so had been badly bungled.

Whigs responded to their plight in four ways. They stepped up efforts to vilify and denigrate Pierce personally. They mounted an extraordinary campaign to court immigrants and Catholics to reduce the Democratic vote and offset the loss of Free Soilers and nativists. With the crucial help of Secretary of War Conrad and the blessing of Fillmore, they found an excuse to send Scott on a speaking tour of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and New York in order to counter Hale's campaign swing and excite their immobilized troops. Finally, they resorted to state and local candidates and, where possible, to state issues to unify and rouse Whig voters.

From the moment Pierce was nominated, Whigs belittled him as an unknown who patently lacked qualifications for the presidency. The more they learned about Pierce, the easier a target he seemed. His unfortunate military career was widely mocked, and the charge of cowardice was extensively bruited. Whigs reminded antislavery constituencies of his blatant subservience to the South. When Whigs learned that Pierce once had a serious drinking problem, they ignored the evidence that he had since reformed and pilloried him as a hopeless drunkard. Linking Pierce's war record with his purported fondness for liquor, Whigs across the North joked that Pierce was the "Hero of Many a Well Fought Bottle."

Whigs criticized Pierce's drinking through a whispering campaign, not in the party's official documents. Fearful of offending opponents of prohibition, Whig strategists wanted no part of the rum issue. Prohibition's contribution to Whig defeats in New England's spring elections helps explain Whigs' refusal to emphasize Pierce's drinking. More important, criticizing drinking would undermine their effort to align Catholics and immigrants behind Scott. Since Whigs had long been identified with evangelical Protestantism and moral reform and since many conservative, pro-Compromise northern Whigs decidedly disliked immigrants, Catholics, and Seward's sympathy for them, this campaign marked a dramatic and risky shift of tack. Ultimately it, and the concomitant renunciation of prohibitionism, proved to be the Whigs' biggest blunder of 1852. To Scott's strategists, however, it appeared imperative. They expected a hugely expanded foreignborn vote in 1852, and they knew that unless they cut into it, Democratic victory was certain.⁶⁰

The disaffection of Irish Catholics from certain state Democratic parties and their clergy-led opposition to Kossuth had caused Scott's strategists to salivate over the possibilities of a pro-Catholic campaign for six months prior to the Whig convention. Even in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, where unnaturalized aliens could often vote and where the enlarged German vote was expected to be crucial, Whigs believed that a pro-Catholic tilt might offset Kossuth's efforts to turn Germans against them. Catholic Germans bitterly disliked the atheistic "Forty-Eighters" who responded most enthusiastically to Kossuth's appeal. The Democrats' nomination of Pierce clinched Whigs' decision to seek Catholic and immigrant voters, for Pierce seemed particularly vulnerable to the charge of anti-Catholic bigotry.

In 1850 New Hampshire, like many other states between 1848 and 1853, revised its state constitution, and Pierce presided over the convention that did so.

At the referendum in 1851, voters rejected the fifteen amendments it had written. At Pierce's urging, three amendments, now unencumbered by those voters had found most objectionable, were resubmitted to the electorate in March 1852. One of them called for a repeal of the old constitution's ban on officeholding by Catholics, and it failed again, primarily because a two-thirds majority was necessary for approval. Although Pierce led the drive to remove the ban, the amendment's defeat could be attributed to New Hampshire's Democrats since they had a heavy majority in the state. As the state's Democratic leader, Pierce was vulnerable to the same charge. Thus, as soon as Pierce was nominated on June 7, Whig papers around the country, under headlines such as "To Your Tents, Catholics!", charged that Pierce had in fact led the drive to defeat the pro-Catholic amendment and was an enemy of the Catholic faith. "Catholicism appears to be the leading question of the day," a stunned Cincinnati Democrat wrote Pierce in late June, and from Whigs and Democrats alike came reports that Catholics would vote for Scott en masse, "I fear there are more probabilities of Scott's success than we democrats are willing to believe," a frantic New York City Democrat wrote a southern friend in mid-July. "I find that he would receive the entire Catholic vote of our Town. if the election took place tomorrow, and they are nearly all democrats!"62

Whig leaders eagerly fanned this potential revolt. In addition to his acceptance letter proposing a way to shorten the naturalization period, Scott sent the editor of the Catholic Boston Pilot another letter that he had written in 1848 "retracting his Native Americanism & ordering 5000 extra copies for distribution among the Irish & German Catholics in Ohio & Pennsylvania." William E. Robinson, an assistant editor of the New York Tribune, prepared a pamphlet that rehearsed the charge that Pierce had led New Hampshire's Democrats in retaining the anti-Catholic constitutional provision and listing the many reasons why Catholics could trust Scott. Fearful of the 15,000 new German voters enfranchised by Indiana's revised state constitution, Schuvler Colfax even got Truman Smith to solicit Weed's help in lining up the Catholic hierarchy for Scott. Weed should drop everything and travel to Cincinnati to confer with Bishop John B. Purcell, argued Smith, for Purcell's word was law with midwestern Catholics and his endorsement of Scott could save Indiana, Ohio, and other midwestern states. Whether Weed made this trip is unknown, but at least some Democrats believed that Catholic bishops, if not the humbler priests, solidly supported Scott.⁶³

Special appeals to the Irish, such as copies of Seward's speech commiserating with Irish victims of English persecution, and to the Germans were also broadcast. Henry D. Moore of the national committee assumed responsibility for preparing and distributing German-language copies of all Whig documents. In cities without a German-language Whig newspaper, Whigs sought to buy or start them. Wisconsin's Whigs proved especially vigorous in the pursuit of the foreign born. They distributed German-language editions of Scott's biography and other campaign documents, and they also printed 5,000 copies in Norwegian, for they estimated that Wisconsin harbored 6,000 to 8,000 Norwegian voters.⁶⁴

Whigs also used state and local tickets to appeal to immigrants. In Massachusetts, they ran an opponent of prohibition for governor to help pry Boston's Irish away from the Democrats. In Cincinnati, Whigs placed a German on their state legislative ticket specifically to attract German votes, and when they carried the city in October's congressional and legislative elections, Whigs poured into the streets shouting, "Hurrah for the Germans!" "They gave us the victory," reported one Whig. "This victory almost assures the German vote for Scott next month." ⁶⁵

Illinois' Whigs also aggressively pursued Catholics. Democratic Senator James Shields urged his Illinois lieutenants to put Gustave Koerner, a Protestant German, on the Democratic state ticket for lieutenant governor to exploit the sudden new political interest of Germans fanned by the Kossuth mania, and they did so. To make sure that they did not offend those Germans angered by Catholic attacks on Kossuth, Democrats also bypassed the front-runner for the gubernatorial nomination because he was Catholic and chose the Protestant Joel A. Matteson instead. This switch infuriated Catholics, and Whigs believed Democrats had committed a major mistake that they could exploit. Lacking a prominent Catholic to run as their own gubernatorial candidate, they nominated for lieutenant governor "a good & true Whig whose wife & daughters are communicants of the Holy Catholic church, though not one himself." Illinois Whigs thus regarded the nomination of Scott as perfect for the pro-Catholic campaign they intended to run, and one Chicago Whig leader assured Seward that they would use the anti-Catholic charge against Pierce "to the best advantage."

At least one Illinois Whig congressional candidate also bid strenuously for Catholic support. Elihu B. Washburne worried about both his district's numerous Free Soilers, who could split the anti-Democratic vote, and the large, normally Democratic Irish Catholic vote. To neutralize the first threat, he begged Horace Greeley, whose New York Tribune circulated even in northwestern Illinois, to endorse him because Washburne vehemently opposed Whigs' national platform. Now ruing his impetuous response to the platform in June, Greeley refused since such a statement could kill Whig hopes in the South. "You can be elected easily enough, and by help from another quarter," advised Greeley. "The Catholics are strong in your district, and they are going to elect Gen. Scott and will take care of his friends." Washburne dealt with the Free Soil threat in another manner. The same printer under contract to prepare the district's Whig tickets also printed its Free Soil tickets. At Whigs' urging, he prepared 3,000 Free Soil tickets with Washburne's name as the Free Soil congressional candidate. "I have not printed the Free Soil candidate's name at all," he chortled to Washburne. But Washburne remained very nervous about the "very large Irish Catholic vote in the district." and to sway it he asked Seward to get him a letter of recommendation from New York's Archbishop John Hughes. Seward replied rather testily that Hughes never wrote such letters, and instead he sent a copy of his speech sympathizing with the Irish. In part because of these efforts, Washburne edged out his Democratic competitor 7,392 to 7,106, while the betraved Free Soiler polled only 2,200 votes.⁶⁷

The maneuvering for Irish and German voters in Illinois illustrates an obvious but crucial fact. Democrats fought vigorously to retain their Catholic and immigrant supporters and to win over the new voters from those constituencies. They too sought endorsements from Catholic clergymen and the Catholic press such as the Boston Pilot. They too chose candidates and campaign speakers because of their appeal to target groups. In Pennsylvania, for example, both George W. Woodward, a Democratic candidate for the state supreme court, and James Campbell, the Irish Catholic whose defeat in 1851 ignited the Catholic rebellion and whom Governor Bigler had appointed state attorney general to pacify the Catholics, crisscrossed the state to hold the Irish in the Democratic column. Democrats too aimed specific appeals at Germans in their own language. They repeatedly reprinted Scott's "Americus" letter, and they broadcast German translations of his acceptance letter in which Scott's suggestion of voluntary military service as a way to abbreviate the naturalization period was transmuted into a mandatory requirement that would lengthen it. Democrats even charged that Scott had ordered the flogging and execution of German volunteers in Mexico out of sheer anti-German prejudice.

This savage counterattack blunted Whigs' offensive in many areas. Whigs' "desperate effort" to "carry off the Irish Catholic vote" would "fail," a prominent Indianapolis Democrat told Pierce. In late July a Brooklyn Democrat echoed, "The Whigs is [sic] sorry they meddled with religion as it has influenced them very much. The respectable Catholics has [sic] all went [sic] to work for you and the Irish in general is [sic] working hard for you." Two months later James Campbell assured Bigler that Philadelphia's "Whigs are playing for the foreign vote here as elsewhere, in which they are going to be most egregiously deceived." By early September, reports that virtually all Irishmen and Germans would go for Pierce far outnumbered predictions of significant Whig inroads into the immigrant vote. "By the product of the same product of the sam

VI

Clearly worried by Democrats' effective counterattack, members of the Whig national committee especially feared the false charges Democrats aimed against Scott in German. Together with continued reports of Whig torpor, especially in Ohio, they turned Whigs to new tactics. The national committee flooded Ohio with thousands of documents, speakers, and money in September. Truman Smith personally wrote at least 200 letters to Whig politicos there urging them to take to the stump. More important, Whigs decided to put Scott on the road to stimulate Whigs and reassure the Irish and Germans. 69

The excuse for this transparent political junket, Whigs' biggest tactical innovation of the campaign, came from an army appropriations act passed on August 31. It authorized Fillmore to send a group of army officers to examine a site at Blue Lick Springs, Kentucky, for the possible construction of a home for aging army veterans. Secretary of War Conrad ordered Scott to head this team, and rather than proceeding directly to Kentucky, Scott's managers routed him through areas where the immigrant vote was crucial—through Pittsburgh to Cleveland, then down to Columbus, and from there south into Kentucky, across Kentucky to Louisville, then up into Indiana and back to Cincinnati. From there Scott moved north to Sandusky on Lake Erie, by boat to Buffalo, across northern New York to Albany, and then down to New York City. Scott left Washington on September 18; that he was in Ohio at the same time as Hale was hardly coincidental.⁷⁰

Scott did little more in Pittsburgh than show himself to crowds and praise army veterans, but during a downpour in Cleveland he made his first heavy-handed bid for the immigrant vote. "Fellow Citizens of Cleveland!—and when I say fellow citizens, I mean all American citizens, both native and adopted citizens," he began. When a member of the drenched audience shouted a response to his remarks, Scott replied as if on cue: "I love to hear the Irish brogue. I have heard it before on many battlefields, and I wish to hear it many times more!" In Columbus, Scott held a carefully arranged interview with some Germans in front of reporters. When the Germans repeated the Democratic charge about his maltreatment of their countrymen in Mexico, Scott thundered that it was "a false and groundless lie!" In his speech there he again waxed lyrical about "the rich [Irish] brogue" and "the gallant men of Erin who in such great numbers have followed me to victory." Whig newspaper accounts, meanwhile, stressed his easy interaction with the people, his decided lack of "Fuss and Feathers," and his great impact on Whig voters.

Members of the national committee in Washington were overjoyed by the apparent success of Scott's junket. "Since the General's trip to Ohio the skys [sic] seem to smile more brightly there," wrote one in late September. Henry Moore, head of the German subcommittee, declared that Scott's remarks in Columbus had saved the German vote. A Pittsburgh Whig who campaigned in both New York and Ohio after Scott had been there pronounced both states as well as Pennsylvania safe for Scott. Even the hardheaded Weed wrote Seward on September 25 that because of Scott's speeches "we shall most likely carry this State [New York], and there is a possibility of General Scott's election."

Not all Whigs applauded Scott's campaign swing, however. "For God's sake, Seward, keep Scott at home. One more Cleveland speech and 'we are ruined,' " sputtered a furious Boston Whig. "'Oh, that rich brogue! I love to hear it' Just write him some speeches and forward as soon as possible—don't trust him a single minute alone—if you do the game is up." Scott's speeches and Whigs' aggressive courtship of Catholics and immigrants in fact thoroughly alienated a crucial bloc in the party's constituency—native-born Protestants who despised Catholics and foreigners. From the start, Democrats, especially in Pennsylvania, predicted that the Whigs' blatantly crude courtship of Catholics would backfire because it was so offensive to Presbyterians, Methodists, and the Protestant Scots-Irish who hated their Catholic countrymen. "Hundreds of protestant Whigs here, could by no possibility be induced to vote for Scott if they believed he was tinctured with Catholicism," wrote one in late July. "Many honest Protestants among the Whigs are disgusted at the course Scott has taken to secure the Catholic vote & will vote against him," echoed another three months later. Perspicacious Democrats were not alone; some Whigs also recognized that alienating Protestants by wooing Catholics was a disastrous, and perhaps irredeemable, mistake.⁷²

VII

However severe the revolt of angry Protestant Whigs might be, many Whigs appeared oblivious to the threat. "Pennsylvania is all right," a Philadelphian reported on September 20. Scott would win because "the party never was better organized than it is now" and because "the full Whig vote will be out & accompanied by many that were never given for a Whig candidate before." A Pittsburgher echoed that confident prediction two weeks later. Pennsylvania's Whigs thus joined those in Massachusetts, Seward, Weed, and other Whigs in New York, some Ohioans after Scott's tour, and the Washington high command in forecasting victory. A side from contempt for Pierce as a political pygmy, the expected inroads into the immigrant vote, and optimistic appraisals of Scott's tour, Whigs' confidence derived from their purported advantages in several key state races to be decided simultaneously with or shortly before the presidential contest.

In 1844, Democrats had helped salvage enough northern states to elect Polk by running exceptionally strong state tickets, and Whigs hoped to turn the tables in 1852. In addition to Illinois, New York and Michigan held gubernatorial and congressional elections on the same day as the presidential contest, while Wisconsin and Delaware had congressional elections scheduled.⁷⁴ Iowa, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey would elect congressmen in October, and Indiana had a gubernatorial contest as well. Maine and Vermont elected both congressmen and governors in September.

Though Whigs always considered Vermont safe for Scott, the dimensions of their September triumph caused confidence to surge among Whig leaders elsewhere. Whigs swept all three congressional races, more than doubling their foe's vote in two districts, carried the three-way gubernatorial contest with a plurality, and elected Erastus Fairbanks governor with their dominant majority in the legislature. Vermont, in sum, remained solidly Whig; the national platform had not mobilized antislavery men against them.

In Maine, Whig hopes rested less on the strength of gubernatorial candidate William G. Crosby, who had won only 40 percent of the vote in 1850, than on Democrats' rancorous divisions over prohibition, which resulted in rival Democratic gubernatorial tickets. Thus, even though Crosby's own proportion of the vote declined to 31 percent in 1852, Whigs both in and outside Maine took heart when incumbent pro-Maine Law Democratic Governor John Hubbard's total sank to 44 percent, the worst showing by a regular Democratic candidate since the formation of the Whig party.⁷⁵ Not only did Crosby and the renegade wet Democratic candidate Anson Chandler between them have a majority of the vote, but Whigs could hope that Democrats' acrimonious division would reduce Pierce's vote in November. In addition, Hubbard's failure to win a majority threw the gubernatorial election into the state legislature, and because of Democratic divisions, Whigs dramatically increased their share of seats in the house from 34 to 46 percent and in the senate from 19 to 39 percent. If Whigs could strike a bargain with one of the Democratic factions, they might vet elect Crosby governor. Most important, Whig candidates did extraordinarily well in Maine's congressional elections. They carried three of six districts, an event reminiscent of 1840, the only year a Whig presidential candidate had carried Maine.76

No state figured more heavily in Whigs' calculations of assembling an electoral vote majority than New York, and surprisingly, Whigs exuded more confidence about it than about any other northern states except Vermont and Massachusetts. Aside from Democratic predictions that Pierce was certain to carry New York, Whig complacency about it is puzzling because Democrats seemingly possessed so many advantages while Whigs confronted so many problems there. Democrats, for example, appeared likely to obtain a huge new foreign-born vote from the burgeoning immigrant populations of New York City, Brooklyn, Buffalo, and Albany and from the construction crews working to complete the New York Central Railroad. Given Greeley's assurance to Elihu Washburne that Catholics were going to put Scott in the White House, Whigs may have considered Catholic support certain, especially since they counted on Seward's reputation as a champion of immigrants and Catholics to neutralize the immigrant threat.⁷⁸ Nonetheless, New York Whigs' sangfroid in the face of it is stunning given the anxiety voiced by Whigs elsewhere.

More striking than Whigs' apparent complacency about the foreign vote was their equanimity over the divisive Compromise issue. Recent experience indicated that divisions between Hunker and Barnburner Democrats provided their best hope of carrying New York. The Barnburner bolters of 1848 had returned to the Democratic fold by 1852, however, and Democrats of all kinds embraced Pierce's nomination and the Democrats' pro-Compromise platform with enthusiasm. In contrast to Democratic harmony, Sewardite and Silver Gray Whigs remained deeply divided over their own national platform. They often refused to hold ratification meetings together, a rupture over the platform at the state convention in September appeared inevitable, and predictions of Silver Gray sabotage of Scott in November were rampant. Even the sanguine Greeley admitted, "Our State is certain unless our Silver Grays behave worse than Judas Iscariot and Benedict Arnold ever knew how to." Given Democratic unity and Whig division over the Compromise, how could Whigs be so serenely confident about New York?

The answer is that New York's Whigs expected their congressional candidates and state ticket to reunify their party, while Democrats' divisions over canal expansion would neutralize their agreement on the national platform, depress Democratic turnout in November, and thereby help elect Scott. Just as Massachusetts Whigs bid for conservatives by giving their congressional nomination in the Fourth District to the Websterite Samuel Walley after he grudgingly agreed to endorse Scott, Sewardites allowed Fillmorites to have congressional nominations in Buffalo, Rochester, and New York City in the belief that Silver Gray congressional candidates had a stake in maximizing Whig turnout to achieve their own elections, thereby helping Scott in the process.⁸⁰

However pragmatic the dispensation of Whig congressional nominations was, for many months achieving unity on a state ticket and especially on a state platform appeared far more problematic. In 1850 feuding Whigs had combined uneasily behind Washington Hunt, who had won by the narrowest of margins. Hunt's appointments and annual message in 1851, however, angered conservatives, and then, in his January 1852 message, he infuriated antislavery Whigs by condemning abolitionists and explicitly renouncing his earlier demands for revision of the Fugitive Slave Act. To boot, he then announced that he would not seek renomination. Seward's most fervent antislavery followers therefore demanded that the 1852 gubernatorial nomination go to a flat-out anti-Compromise man. Appreciating the need to harmonize the party, Seward instead promoted the conservative New York City merchant Moses Grinnell for the post. But Grinnell's friend, and Seward's other closest lieutenant in New York City, the merchantauctioneer Simeon Draper, was also interested in the nomination. So was the Manhattan lawyer Daniel Ullmann, who was anathema to Sewardites but far more palatable to Silver Grays, who demanded "a true[r] friend of Mr. Fillmore for Governor" than either Grinnell or Draper.81

More than continuing divisions over the Compromise, however, blocked the nomination of anyone from New York City. As early as March, Seward was warned that "prohibition or not, Maine law or not, will be the issues tried by the people." Seward and Weed desperately wanted to avoid the divisive prohibition issue, for the Whig coalition possessed men who passionately supported opposite sides of it. Since both Grinnell and Draper dealt in liquors and wines, both offended temperance men. Ullmann too was distrusted by prohibitionists, if only because his views on the Maine Law were unknown and because he resided in a city that upstate dries considered Sodom and Gomorrah. ⁸² This dilemma laid the ground for Washington Hunt's resurrection from his self-consigned political grave, and by mid-August Hunt was the favorite for the nomination. ⁸³

Hunt was, in fact, the most available of all the potential Whig gubernatorial candidates. He had offended neither dries nor wets. He remained in the middle on the slavery issue when neither Sewardites nor Silver Grays could accept an outright member of the opposing faction. Indeed, to Seward and Weed, who clearly wanted to conciliate Silver Grays in some fashion, he offered hope of finessing a disruptive battle over the state platform. To Silver Gravs they could emphasize Hunt's January message and the fury it evoked from antislavery Whigs to prove that they were willing to acquiesce in the Compromise even if the state platform said nothing about it. To their own supporters they could stress their success in nominating Scott and defeating Fillmore, the necessity of mobilizing a full Whig vote, and the undesirable alternatives among Silver Grays like Ullmann if Hunt was not nominated. Most important, Hunt provided the best chance to divert the state election, and with it the presidential election, away from the national issue that divided them and united Democrats to a state issue that united them and bitterly divided their foes. As George Bancroft wrote Franklin Pierce a month after his nomination, "The issue [outcome] here will depend on the Canal issue ''84

Although the scramble by the Whig rump on the canal board to distribute the remaining revenue certificates and repair contracts in December 1851 discredited New York's Whigs, by the close of the legislative session in the spring of 1852 Whigs believed they held a considerable advantage on the canal expansion question. Democrats on the state's highest court ruled the Nine Million Loan unconstitutional, and the new canal board, headed by Democratic Comptroller George Newell, refused to honor either the revenue certificates or the repair contracts. In the legislature, meanwhile, Democratic majorities readopted the stop-and-tax policy, and by the time the legislature adjourned, no new bonds had been issued or the taxes to pay them passed. Thus Whigs believed that they could pose once again as the state's only champions of immediate expansion, especially after a feared special summer session of the legislature, which might have issued new bonds complying with constitutional requirements and thereby relieved Democrats of the anticanal stigma, never met. Thus Whigs behind Hunt, a fervent proponent of immediate expansion, could pillory Democrats for opposing progress. As Hunt himself wrote, Whigs "in the canal counties" most urgently pressed his renomination. Or, as a Buffalo Silver Gray bluntly put the matter, "The Canal Contractors are determined to nominate Hunt or some other man whom they think they can control."85

If the canal issue could rally Silver Gray contractors to the ticket in November, no matter what the state platform said about the Compromise, it could also divide Democrats. By doing nothing about canals in 1852 other than refusing to pay Whig contractors, Democrats preserved their tenuous alliance between Hunkers who wanted to push expansion under Democratic auspices and Barnburners who remained hostile to it. Picking a Democratic state ticket for the fall election, however, could blow the party apart, especially since proexpansion Hunkers hated Horatio Seymour, Democrats' most likely nominee. Democrats tried to bridge this chasm at their state convention. To Barnburners' dismay, their platform entirely ignored the court's decision against the Nine Million Loan, Newell's refusal to pay contractors, and what, if anything, the future policy of Democrats on the canal question might be. Seymour got the gubernatorial nomination, but to balance him, Democrats picked a well-known proponent of expansion for canal commissioner. Signs of mutiny at this straddle appeared immediately. If the Democrats lost, forecast one, "it will be owing" to "the unfortunate position of the canal question," while another warned Pierce that Whigs had a strong state ticket and a much more popular position on canal expansion than the Democrats. The strange of the canal expansion than the Democrats.

Although Marcy predicted that a Whig rupture over the Compromise would offset Democratic divisions over canal policy, the Whig state convention in late September was the most harmonious in four years. Hunt was renominated for governor by acclamation. The rest of the ticket, apparently constructed at Weed's direction, included men with no known stand on the Compromise whom Silver Grays could not possibly find offensive. The platform, which, according to Raymond, expressed in "unmistakable terms" the measures to which Whigs were pledged and put "a clearer and more exact construction" on some planks of the Baltimore platform, also received unanimous support. The controversial Compromise plank of the national platform received no such clarification; instead, it was fudged. Since Whigs were a national party, the state platform maintained, "an honest acquiescence in the decision and action of the late National Convention of the Whig party upon all subjects legitimately before them, is the duty of every Whig."

This purposely vague plank was then balanced by one that lavishly praised "the President and his Cabinet," especially for "maintaining the honor of the nation untarnished abroad" and "promptly answering every attempt to embroil us in a foreign war." Lest this praise for Webster's Hülsemann letter, Fillmore's rebuff of Kossuth, the crackdown on southern filibusterers, and the administration's stand on the Canadian fisheries compound the alienation of Germans angered by the nonintervention plank of the national platform, a separate resolution denounced violations of the laws of nations "for the furtherance of the interests of despotism"—that is, Russia's intervention against Hungary—and pledged "generous and active sympathy with, and moral support to, all oppressed nations and races struggling to assert their liberties." Other emendations of the national platform called for tariffs with specific duties, a land policy that encouraged both rapid settlement and distribution of land revenues to the states, and subsidies for rivers and harbors improvements "as fast as such appropriations can be effectively and economically expended." separate resolutions are struggling to assert their liberties."

The heart of the platform, however, was the plank on the canal issue. The canal system, Whigs thundered, must be vigorously expanded and completed "at the earliest possible day without imposing taxes on those sections least interested in these noble works." The canals would "certainly and promptly" pay for themselves "if speedily completed." Rejection of Democratic obstructionism could not have been clearer.

Although Democratic campaigners tried to defuse the canal issue by promising enlargement under a new constitutional bond issue with the necessary tax support, Whigs remained confident that they held the edge because they were certain that Democratic divisions would defeat not just Seymour but Pierce in November. When Weed told Seward that New York was safe for Scott on September 25, he exulted, "The feud between Barnburners and Hunkers rages bitterly. This will weaken them greatly." Three weeks later, another Whig from western New York added that only hunger for federal spoils was still holding the Democrats together. "The Canal question is bound to be their death in this state certainly."

VIII

"We are getting good tidings from all points," Fitz Henry Warren informed Seward from national committee headquarters on September 28. "Unless we are greatly misled by the statements of our friends the election of Genl. Scott is quite certain." Nine days later Truman Smith predicted that Scott would carry eight slave states, along with Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania in the North, and he also had great hopes for Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin. Two days after that, a Pittsburgh Whig pronounced Ohio, New York, and Pennsylvania safe. 91

"Scott has not moved the masses as was expected," a Pennsylvania Democrat more accurately concluded, "and the campaign has not been judiciously conducted by our Whig adversaries." Despite numerous Whigs' confident predictions, indeed, others continued to worry about the intractable indifference among their rank and file. "In Illinois there is no political excitement at all," a Whig complained in mid-October. "I would like to see General Scott elected President," young Rutherford B. Hayes wrote in his diary on September 24. "But there is so little interest felt by the great body of thinking men that I shall not be surprised at his defeat." "Genl. Apathy is the strongest candidate out here," reported another Cincinnati Whig, while a Baltimore newspaper announced, "Let either [party] win that may; we have nothing at stake."

State and congressional elections during the second week of October shattered most Whigs' hopes. Arkansas went predictably Democratic, but under the new apportionment Democrats now won two House seats, not one, as well as the governorship and complete control of the legislature. In Iowa, surprisingly, Whigs elected one of two congressmen. That gain was primarily attributable to discontent with the defeated Democrat over a local railroad question, however, and Democrats still maintained a narrow statewide majority in Iowa. No one believed Scott could carry either state.⁹³

Results from states Whigs expected Scott to win were more significant. In Florida, George Ward lost the gubernatorial election by 292 votes out of almost 9,000 cast; Cabell succumbed even more narrowly, 4,590 to 4,568. Although the Whig vote was comparable to the totals in 1848 and 1850, over half of the men who supported Thomas Brown for governor in 1848 refused to vote at all in 1852, and a tenth of Brown's voters defected to the Democratic column. Even substantial gains from previous Democrats and nonvoters could not make up for that hemorrhaging. Cabell actually won slightly more votes in 1852 than in 1850; nonetheless, almost a tenth of his previous supporters voted for his opponent, and an equal proportion abstained. Discontented Whig voters' rebellion was felt most heavily in the state legislative elections. The Whigs, who trailed the Democrats by only one vote in each house after 1850, were reduced to one-third of the seats in both. Florida's small but doughty Whig party had been gutted.⁹⁴

Suspicion of Scott clearly contributed to Whig defections in October, and, coupled with discouragement over that month's heartbreaking losses, it produced a rout in November. Total turnout declined by 21 percent since October, but Whigs suffered most from the electorate's disaffection. Scott retained only two-thirds of Ward's support, and Pierce thumped him 4,318 to 2,875. By another measure, only slightly more than a third of the Floridians who voted for Zachary Taylor in 1848 stood by Scott. Over a fifth switched to the Democrats, and almost half abstained.⁹⁵

Although Maryland's Whig Senator James A. Pearce warned in the spring of 1852 that the state's new constitution "must place the Whig party in a minority for years to come," Whigs escaped that ignominy in October since legislative and congressional elections were postponed until the following year. Local elections took place, however, and Baltimore's mayoral contest should have alarmed the Whigs' high command. The Whig candidate lost because a Baptist minister circulated a letter warning that if he won, "the city & the state would be given up to the Pope." If Protestants refused to vote for a Whig mayoral candidate suspected of having pro-Catholic sympathies, Whigs should have wondered, why would they vote for Winfield Scott?

The remaining northern elections pointed to disaster in November. Indiana's Whigs had said that they would have to hold Democrat Joe Wright's majority below 3,000 for Scott to have a chance there. Wright instead romped through by 19,000 votes, and Democrats won two-thirds majorities in both houses of the legislature. New congressional elections were also required since Indiana had gained a new seat under reapportionment. Although Whig candidates in the aggregate ran slightly better than their martyred gubernatorial candidate, they won only one of the eleven seats compared to two of ten the previous year. "Every Irish Catholic I found or heard of, stands faithfully by us," one Democrat crowed, and the new immigrant vote so feared by Whigs appears to have gone by over a three-to-one margin against them. Scott's prospects in Indiana were now hopeless.⁹⁷

On the day before the congressional elections in neighboring Ohio, the state's most important Whig editor exuded optimism. "The State is just as thoroughly stirred up as it can be," he reported to Thomas Ewing. "If the signs do not prove to be mere 'surface indications,' we shall do extremely well." Surface indications they indeed were. Whereas Whigs had won ten of Ohio's twenty-one House seats in 1850, in 1852 they captured only seven of twenty-three. Lew Campbell won reelection and Whigs carried the Cincinnati district, but Free Soilers, whom Whigs hoped would hurt Democrats rather than themselves, carried two districts in the Reserve and deprived Whigs of majorities in at least five other districts, allowing Democrats to win with pluralities. In the only statewide race, Whigs almost halved the Democratic margin in 1851, but they still garnered only 47.4 percent of the total. Reports of apathy may have been exaggerated, for, as in Indiana, three-fourths of the eligible electorate voted in October. Consequently, Whigs could not expect a surge of new voters in November to overcome their shortfall. Despite bright spots like Dayton and Cincinnati, information from elsewhere in the state indicated Scott's defeat.⁹⁸

Once reliably Whig, New Jersey continued its slide into the Democratic column. As in 1850, Whigs won only one of five congressional seats, and their sole victor edged out his opponent by fewer than 200 votes out of over 15,000 cast. Turnout was slightly higher than it had been two years earlier, but the Whigs' share of the vote, 46.3 percent, remained exactly what it had been. Nor did the state legislative races provide solace. Whigs' share of house seats rose only from 25 to 35 percent, the same proportion they held in the senate. In four short years, New Jersey's Whigs had become uncompetitive.⁹⁹

Pennsylvania completed the rout. In 1850, Whigs had carried nine of its twenty-four House seats, and in 1851 Governor William F. Johnston went down to defeat by only 12,000 votes. In 1852, Whigs elected nine of twenty-five congressmen and trailed Democrats in the statewide race for canal commissioner by 20,000 votes. Third parties severely damaged Whigs. A Free Soil congressional candidate who got 9 percent of the vote allowed a Democrat to win with a plurality of 29 votes. In the Philadelphia area three Native American candidates, who together amassed 7,224 votes, allowed Democrats to carry two districts with pluralities of less than 47 percent. Since both nativists and Free Soilers seemed certain not to vote for Scott, even the still-hoped-for Catholic surge toward him in November might not suffice. Statewide turnout had plunged since 1851, and the total Whig vote trailed Johnston's by almost 26,000. Nativists and Free Soilers together accounted for less than half of that deficit. Whigs' widely reported apathy about an issueless race and disgust with their party's pro-Catholic campaign undoubtedly caused the bulk of it. If Catholic immigrants did vote Whig in October, they dramatically failed to offset the defection of men who hated them or who saw no reason to vote at all. As one Philadelphia Democrat assured Governor Bigler after seeing the returns, "We may consider this state as safe for Pierce."

ΙX

"Notwithstanding the indigo twist of Pennsylvania returns, I have full faith in the election of Genl. Scott," Schouler wrote Seward on October 16. "We are by no means discouraged," a Cincinnati Whig echoed to William Pitt Fessenden. "We honestly expect to carry Ohio, & we have good hope of Pennsylvania." Kentucky, Tennessee, and Louisiana, he added, were all "certain." Pennsylvania's unbowed if delusionary Whigs, Lewis Levin scoffed three days before the presidential election, were "making the most stupendous efforts" to secure both the nativist and the Irish Catholic vote for Scott. But others knew that October's elections had broken the party's back. "I don't know how it is but my presentiments all favor our being licked and no cyphering & no argufying can make them any better," New York's Charles A. Dana wrote his fellow newspaperman Pike. The brother of Pennsylvania's ex-governor put it best when he wrote retrospectively in December that "the election last year and the first election this year had entirely prostrated the Whigs." Aptly summarizing the frustration of Whig campaigners unable to mobilize apathetic voters who saw little at stake in a personality contest, he added, "To make a fight in November was something like pissing against the wind, when blowing about sixty miles to the hour."

On November 2 Whigs suffered the most stunning defeat in the party's history. Scott carried only Vermont, Massachusetts, Kentucky, and Tennessee for a total of 42 electoral votes; Pierce won 254 electoral votes from the remaining twenty-seven states. Whig gubernatorial candidates on the same ticket with Scott were mowed down in Illinois, Michigan, and New York, where Hunt lost to Seymour by 23,000 votes despite running 7,000 ahead of Scott. Congressional hopefuls fared almost as badly. Whigs lost Delaware's only seat, both of California's, all three in Wisconsin, and all four in Michigan. In New York, where Whigs had won thirty-two of thirty-four House seats in 1848 and seventeen of thirty-four in 1850, they were reduced to eleven of thirty-three; in addition, their share of seats in the state assembly plummeted from 51 to 33 percent, while the senate, because of holdovers, remained evenly divided. Finally, in Louisiana, where the new constitution won overwhelming ratification, Whigs lost the governorship and both legislative houses in the new elections mandated for December.

Only Illinois and Massachusetts offered a ray of hope. Illinois Whigs garnered less than 42 percent of the statewide vote, but they won four of nine congressional districts, their best showing in the party's history, largely because separate Free Soil candidates allowed them to carry three districts with pluralities. Whigs won five of eleven House races in Massachusetts with outright majorities in November and four more after runoff elections. More important, Whigs finally broke the Democratic/Free Soil Coalition's control of the legislature by gaining a one-seat margin in the senate and a ten-seat house majority over Hunker Democrats and the Coalition combined. Although John Clifford won only a 45 percent plurality, Whig control of the legislature ensured his election, as well as that of a Whig to the Senate. 102

Even Illinois and Massachusetts, however, could not disguise how disastrous 1852 was for the Whig party. Whigs won only three of twelve gubernatorial elections contested that year. After the legislatures in Maine and Massachusetts resolved undecided elections in early 1853, they controlled governorships in only five of thirty-one states: Wisconsin, where the party was clearly in jeopardy; Maine, where it remained a decided minority and utterly depended upon Democratic divisions; Tennessee, where the popular William B. Campbell itched to retire and enter private business; Vermont; and Massachusetts. Everywhere else, now including all-important New York, along with Pennsylvania and Ohio, Democrats reigned. Whigs' standing in Congress was equally perilous. In 1848, Whigs had won 57 percent of the House seats contested. In 1850, that proportion slumped to 42.2 percent, and in 1852 it plummeted to 29.1 percent. Democratic command of so many state legislatures also threatened Whig strength in the Senate, and between the Thirty-Second and Thirty-Third Congresses, Whigs slipped from twenty-four (39 percent) to twenty-one (33.7 percent) seats.

Democrats gleefully hooted that the Whig party had "suddenly departed this life, on the 2nd inst." and mockingly asked, "Who ever dreamed that Whiggery would squat & shrivel—& collapse and die of overfeeding on its own aliment—humbuggery?" Stunned Whigs meanwhile searched for language adequate to describe "the disastrous result—the complete Waterloo overthrow of the entire Whig forces." "Waterloo" was in fact a favorite metaphor, and the finality of that legendary defeat spoke volumes. "The Whig party have not only been defeated, but, as a national party annihilated in the late contest," an Ohioan groaned. "What a tremendous general wreck it is," declared an Illinois Whig. "Was there ever such a deluge since Noah's time?" Henry Raymond asked Seward. "I can see no resurrection of the Whig party as such." Seward himself was more restrained, but he too initially believed the party might be finished. "Well!" he despaired to Weed, "the play is played out for this time and played out practically for us perhaps forever." "God help the Whig party," chorused an Alabamian. "I fear it is a mere abstract idea." 104

Others expressed resignation at the result. It confirmed what he and Fillmore had long believed, Nathan Hall wrote the president: no Whig could win in 1852. "I see that Greeley speaks of disbanding the party, & Weed seems astounded," the defeated William Kent serenely wrote Seward. "After all, was it surprising? We call this election a catastrophe, but was it more than the natural conclusion of a long descending series? Have we carried an election anywhere in the last two years?" The election merely confirmed, wrote another of Seward's correspondents, that the Whigs were "a minority party & can never be otherwise except upon a division of the Democratic party," a view echoed by Fillmorite Whigs. Many Silver Grays, indeed, consoled themselves that the election repudiated Seward's leadership and vindicated Fillmore's. "We are whipped—some say terribly," gloated one. "I say, the more the better. May the lesson not be lost upon our party."

The rout induced a kind of gallows humor in some Whigs. "The number who supported the late Winfield Scott is so small that there is no danger of being overlooked in the crowd," Hayes quipped from Cincinnati. "Our Waterloo is so huge that we are not kept several days dangling in suspense between the heaven of success and the pit of despond, but are compelled to make one big plunge." "We are beaten so preposterously," he added, "that we can't lay our defeat to any neglect or blunder on the part of any of Scott's friends" since "no prudence or sagacity, no industry or expense, could have averted the result." Bitterly disappointed, most Whigs, however, demanded to know what had happened, who was to blame for the debacle, and what future, if any, the Whig party had.

"How unavailing have been all our efforts! how overwhelming and disastrous our defeat!! how sad and unexpected our disappointment!!!" moaned Virginia's John Minor Botts. What, he asked, could explain such a defeat? The primary cause, he answered, was southern Whigs' "senseless and insane apprehension of Sewardism and its influence upon Gen. Scott." Others located the source of the defeat in the North. "The Whig party was practically defeated for the next presidential term when Clay & Webster deserted Genl Taylor & the North and took prominent seats in the proslavery omnibus," complained Schouler. Since 1850, "we have wilted as a party like leaves of the maple in the forest." The splenetic Lew Campbell pointed to "that cursed platform" imposed on Scott at the Whig convention. "It drove from us the Anti-Slavery Whigs & free Soilers, whilst Webster & Fillmore drove their stiletto into us from the rear." "The Slave power obtained its platform" at Baltimore, echoed Massachusetts' John Davis, and thus forced Scott to stand "on the same ground as Pierce with the disadvantage of an apparent abandonment by the Whigs of their former professions." "107

Yet in the same letter Davis offered other explanations. Scott's supposed "personal popularity" was illusory. "Foreigners were misled & deceived by an issue artfully raised about Nativism & Naturalization and Scott lost the vote of multitudes predisposed in his favor." Others, too, blamed Democrats' huge new vote from immigrants, not a reduced Whig vote, for the slaughter. "The truth is, Judge, we are overwhelmed by the Foreign vote," John Teesdale informed John McLean from Akron. "It has been accumulated with wonderful rapidity for two or three years past; and now the whole flood breaks on us at once." Yet from nearby Cleveland, Whig editor John Barr complained about just the reverse. Scott's foolish pro-Catholic tilt lost the election, he snapped. "Our Whig papers here made so much ado about Catholic Irish, that quite as many American Whigs voted for Pierce as Democratic Irish for Scott." The Pittsburgh Gazette also attributed the defeat to the "coldness produced among zealous Protestants from the courting of the Catholic vote." "108

These conflicting reactions and explanations powerfully influenced what different Whigs did in the future, but they also raise many questions. Had the Whig party in fact been annihilated in November? Was the source of the defeat to be found in the North or the South? If the former, was it attributable to a growth of the Democratic vote, especially from foreigners, or to an unnatural reduction of the Whig vote? If the latter, was low Whig turnout caused by the defection of antislavery Whigs alienated by the platform, conservatives determined to knife Scott and his manager Seward, Protestants and nativists infuriated by the Whigs' pro-Catholic campaign, or, as Davis suggested, by Whigs' overreliance on Scott's personal popularity rather than issue differences to mobilize the Whig vote? The short answers to the first two questions are, respectively, no and both. With respect to the last two, the answer is all of the above, but the weight of the different factors varied from state to state.

Whig candidates were massacred on November 2, but rhetoric about the party's death was overwrought. In amassing almost 1.4 million votes, Winfield Scott drew more popular support than any previous Whig presidential candidate. Nationally, Pierce got 50.9 percent of the popular vote compared to Scott's 44 percent, and the absolute margin between the two was 214,000 votes out of over 3 million cast. Aside from the four states Scott carried, Whigs ran creditably in Louisiana, North Carolina, Connecticut, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, and Iowa. In the last three, as well as in Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, Scott ran well ahead of Taylor and of Whig gubernatorial candidates in elections held prior to 1852. A greater accumulation of new votes by Democrats in those states, as well as in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and California, not a smaller Whig vote, explains Scott's defeat (see Tables 30, 31, and 32).¹⁰⁹

The story in the South was far different. In the eleven states that later formed the Confederacy, Scott garnered scarcely four-fifths of Taylor's total in 1848. With only 42.5 percent of the vote cast, his was the worst showing ever recorded by a Whig presidential candidate south of the border states. Yet even that figure disguises significant regional variation. In the six Deep South states that cast popular votes, Scott won only 37.5 percent, and in Texas, Alabama, and Georgia his share was even smaller, in part because Webster, who died one week before the balloting, still won 5,324 votes (9.2 percent) from Georgia's defiant Whig Unionists, while a Southern Rights ticket received 2,205 (5 percent) in Alabama.

Table 30Popular Votes, Proportions of the Vote, and Turnout Rates in 1852^a

	Turnout Rate
	1848	1852	Democratic	Whig	Free Soil
Alabama	69.7%	45.3%	26,881 (60.9%)	15,038 (34.1%)
Arkansas	55.9%	48.6%	12,173 (62.2%)	7,404 (37.8%)
California		75.7%	40,626 (53.4%)	35,407 (46.6%)	100
Connecticut	72.3%	72.3%	33,249 (49.8%)	30,359 (45.4%)	3,160
Delaware	80.4%	75%	6,318 (49.9%)	6,293 (49.7%)	62
Florida	64%	56.9%	4,318 (60%)	2,875 (40%)
Georgia	86%	54.8%	34,705 (61.4%)	16,660 (29.4%)
Illinois	70.5%	64.7%	80,597 (51.8%)	64,934 (41.8%)	9,966
Indiana	78.5%	80.3%	95,340 (52%)	80,901 (44.2%)	6,929
Iowa	90.7%	80.2%	17,763 (50.4%)	15,856 (45%)	1,604
Kentucky	73.9%	64.2%	53,806 (48.4%)	57,068 (51.3%)	265
Louisiana	51.5%	48.7%	18,647 (51.9%)	17,255 (48.1%)
Maine	68.4%	61.2%	41,609 (50.6%)	32,543 (39.6%)	8,030
Maryland	76%	72.8%	40,020 (53.1%)	35,066 (46.5%)	281
Mass.	64.6%	57.8%	44,569 (35.6%)	52,683 (42%)	28,023
Michigan	74.5%	71.3%	41,842 (50.4%)	33,859 (40.8%)	7,237
Mississippi	80.7%	61.7%	26,876 (60.5%)	17,548 (39.5%)
Missouri	62.5%	46.3%	38,353 (56.1%)	29,984 (43.9%)
New Hamp.	67.4%	65.7%	29,997 (56.8%)	16,147 (30.6%)	6,695
New Jersey	82.7%	79.8%	44,305 (53.2%)	38,556 (46.3%)	350
New York	79.6%	84.7%	262,083 (50.2%)	234,882 (45%)	25,329
N. Carolina	71.4%	65.8%	39,744 (50.4%)	39,058 (49.5%)	59
Ohio	77.5%	80.6%	169,220 (47.9%)	152,526 (43.2%)	31,682
Pennsylvania	76.3%	72.6%	198,568 (51.4%)	179,174 (46.4%)	8,525
Rhode Is.	41.1%	57.8%	8,735 (51.4%)	7,626 (44.8%)	644
Tennessee	83.4%	72.9%	57,018 (49.3%)	58,898 (50.7%)
Texas	69.6%	42.6%	13,552 (72.9%)	4,995 (27.1%)
Vermont	70.5%	63.5%	13,044 (29.7%)	22,173 (50.6%)	8,621
Virginia	47.3%	63.3%	73,858 (55.6%)	58,572 (44.1%)	291
Wisconsin	58.3%	59.6%	33,658 (52%)	22,240 (34.4%)	8,814
U.S.	72.7%	69.6%	1,601,474 (50.9%)	1,386,580 (44%)	156,667 (5.1%)

[&]quot;These returns are based on the table in the Nichols' article "The Election of 1852." The totals and percentages differ slightly from those in Gienapp, Origins of the Republican Party, p. 28. The figures on turnout are those listed in Historical Statistics, p. 1072. These are based on percentages of adult white males (and blacks, where they could vote). Gienapp's figures in "'Politics Seem to Enter Into Everything,'" pp. 18–19, are based on his estimates of eligible voters in northern states and are therefore slightly higher in most cases.

Only Louisiana, where Scott got 48.1 percent and trailed Pierce by 1,400 votes, bucked this regional trend. In dramatic contrast, Scott took 47.2 percent of the vote in North Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, and Arkansas. In the four border slave states of Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware, Scott ran more strongly still, with 48 percent. Scott, indeed, ran far better in those eight slave

Table 31Changes in the Parties Vote for President, 1848–1852

	Democrats	Whigs	Free Soil
Alabama	- 4,292 (13.8%)	-15,444 (50.7%)
Arkansas	+ 2,872 (30.9%)	- 183 (2.4%)
Connecticut	+ 6,198 (22.9%)	+ 41 (0.1%)	- 1,845 (36.9%)
Delaware	+ 408 (6.9%)	- 147 (2.2%)
Florida	+ 1,304 (43.2%)	- 1,206 (29.5%)
Georgia	- 10,087 (22.5%)	-30,851 (64.9%)
Illinois	+ 24,682 (44.1%)	+12,081 (22.9%)	- 5,736 (36.5%)
Indiana	+ 20,782 (27.9%)	+10,601 (15.1%)	- 1,104 (13.7%)
Iowa	+ 6,525 (58.1%)	+ 5,926 (59.7%)	+ 501 (45.4%)
Kentucky	+ 5,014 (10.3%)	- 9,505 (14.3%)
Louisiana	+ 3,268 (21.2%)	- 1,232 (6.7%)
Maine	+ 1,779 (4.5%)	- 2,582 (7.3%)	- 4,066 (33.6%)
Maryland	+ 5,533 (16%)	- 2,677 (7.1%)
Massachusetts	+ 9,288 (26.3%)	- 8,387 (13.7%)	-10,035 (26.4%)
Michigan	+ 11,100 (36.1%)	+ 9,912 (41.4%)	- 3,156 (30.3%)
Mississippi	+ 276 (1%)	-14,967 (58%)
Missouri	- 1,512 (3.7%)	- 2,714 (8.3%)
New Hampshire	+ 2,234 (8%)	+ 1,366 (9.2%)	- 865 (11.4%)
New Jersey	+ 7,425 (20.1%)	- 1,453 (3.6%)
New York	+147,763 (129.2%)	+16,279 (7.4%)	-95,181 (79%)
North Carolina	+ 3,934 (11%)	- 5,037 (11.4%)
Ohio	+ 14,438 (9.3%)	+13,870 (10%)	- 3,841 (10.8%)
Pennsylvania	+ 25,864 (15%)	- 6,249 (3.4%)	- 2,748 (24.4%)
Rhode Island	+ 5,089 (140.4%)	+ 846 (12.5%)	- 85 (11.6%)
Tennessee	- 1,209 (2.1%)	- 5,341 (8.3%)
Texas	+ 1,908 (16.3%)	- 286 (5.4%)
Vermont	+ 2,096 (19.1%)	- 949 (4.3%)	- 5,716 (39.9%)
Wisconsin	+ 18,657 (124.4%)	+ 8,493 (61.8%)	- 1,609 (15.4%)

states than in the free states, which cast more than twice as many popular votes as the slave states and where Scott got 43.4 percent compared to 49.9 percent for Pierce and 6.7 percent for Hale.

Whigs' refusal to vote because they distrusted Scott, expected defeat, or were simply indifferent to the outcome of a personality contest with no clear programmatic differences at issue clearly damaged the Whigs in Dixie more than a surge of new Democratic voters after 1848. Only in Virginia, where the 1851 constitution broadened suffrage rights, did Scott outpoll Zachary Taylor, but Democrats' increase since 1848 doubled Whigs' gain. Everywhere else, even in slave states where Whigs remained competitive, the Whigs' vote dropped—dramatically so in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and North Carolina. Few previous southern Whig voters, however, apparently supported Pierce. The Democratic vote also declined between 1848 and 1852 in Alabama, Georgia, Missouri, and Tennessee, though by only a fraction of the Whig slump. Elsewhere Democratic gains over 1848

Table 32Difference Between Whig and Democratic Presidential Vote in 1852 and the Most Proximate Preceding Gubernatorial Election in Selected States^a

	Democrats	Whigs	Date of Election
Connecticut	+ 1,625 (5.1%)	+ 2,118 (7.5%)	April 1852
Delaware	+ 317 (5.3%)	+ 315 (5.2%)	November 1850
California	+17,451 (75.3%)	+12,675 (55.7%)	November 1851
Florida	- 310 (6.7%)	- 1,461 (33.7%)	October 1852
Georgia	-11,929 (25.5%)	-26,689 (61.6%)	October 1849
Indiana	+ 2,381 (2.6%)	+ 7,254 (9.8%)	October 1852
Iowa	+ 4,277 (31.7%)	+ 4,453 (39%)	October 1850
Kentucky	- 1,015 (1.8%)	+ 3,045 (5.6%)	August 1851
Louisiana	+ 188 (1%)	- 152 (0.9%)	November 1849
Maine	$-21,596 (34.1\%)^b$	+ 4,414 (15.7%)	September 1852
Maryland	+ 3,680 (10.1%)	+ 208 (0.6%)	October 1850
Massachusetts	+ 680 (1.5%)	-11,596 (18%)	November 1851
	+ 5,806 (14.9%)	- 9,550 (15.3%)	November 1852
Michigan	+18,015 (75.6%)	+16,958 (100.3%)	November 1851
	- 949 (2.2%)	- 803 (2.3%)	November 1852
Missouri	- 8,141 (17.5%)	- 2,722 (8.3%)	August 1852
Mississippi	- 6,241 (18.8%)	- 5,448 (23.7%)	November 1849
New Hampshire ^c	- 750 (2.4%)	- 2,260 (12.3%)	March 1852
New Jersey	+ 4,582 (11.5%)	+ 4,026 (11.8%)	October 1850
New York	+47,731 (22.2%)	+20,268 (9.4%)	November 1850
North Carolina	- 8,740 (18%)	- 3,935 (9.1%)	August 1852
Ohio	+23,564 (16.2%)	+31,421 (25.9%)	October 1851
Pennsylvania	+12,069 (6.5%)	+ 1,140 (0.6%)	October 1851
Tennessee	- 4,630 (7.5%)	- 4,525 (7.1%)	August 1851
Vermont	- 1,957 (13%)	- 1,622 (6.8%)	September 1852
Virginia	+ 6,784 (10.1%)	- 904 (1.5%)	December 1851

[&]quot;I have used the 1849 gubernatorial elections in Georgia and Mississippi since the vote in 1851 did not reflect regular party strength. Similarly, although a Whig contested Democrat Henry Collier in Alabama in 1851, his total was so low that it would distort results to use it. Nonetheless, it is significant that Pierce's total in Alabama trailed Collier's by almost 12,000.

were modest given four years' of population growth and the manifest unpopularity of Lewis Cass in 1848 (see Table 31).

Since Taylor appealed to Southerners as a native son and since Cass failed to evoke their enthusiasm in 1848, indeed, inverse movement in the two parties' votes between the two presidential contests was almost inevitable. A better gauge of the 1852 race's impact on southern voters, therefore, is the differential between its results and those of a gubernatorial election held between the presidential contests (see Table 32). By that measure, Scott still cost Whigs votes in every slave state except Delaware, Maryland, and Kentucky, where he outpolled Archibald Dixon, Whigs' losing gubernatorial candidate in 1851. But the deficit in some states, particularly Louisiana and Mississippi, was notably smaller. What this comparison shows more dramatically, however, is either how unpopular Pierce was in the South or, more likely, how disinterested both southern Democrats and southern Whigs were in the result. The substantial Democratic drop-off in Georgia, Mississippi, and Alabama, where Pierce ran 30 percent behind Henry Collier's 1851 vote, might be attributed to certainty about November's outcome. But neither overconfidence nor defeatism can explain why the decline in Democratic turnout since the gubernatorial elections of 1851 or 1852 exceeded that of Whigs in Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, and North Carolina. With both parties' platforms pledged to finality and little else apparently at stake, southern voters, like many Northerners, saw no reason to vote at all.

^bThe Maine figures are calculated on the basis of the combined Democratic vote for Anson Chandler and John Hubbard.

^{&#}x27;In New Hampshire, John Hale's vote for president lagged behind John Atwood's for governor by 2,788 (29.4 percent). Both presidential candidates from that state, in sum, attracted fewer votes than their parties' candidates in March, extraordinary testimony to the lack of interest the presidential race aroused.

Louisiana, Tennessee, and North Carolina provide the best evidence of this phenomenon. Louisiana witnessed the lowest turnout decline of any slave state between 1848 and 1852, and aside from Delaware, it was the only slave state to give voters a choice in November on something besides the presidency—ratification of the new state constitution, over which Whigs and Democrats were at odds. Everyone in Tennessee knew that the 1851 state election would determine future state policy toward railroad construction and free banking, as well as congressional and state legislative apportionment. Those matters inspired a higher turnout than 1852's issueless beauty contest. North Carolina's parties fought the August 1852 gubernatorial contest over salient state issues, 79 percent of the potential electorate voted, and David Reid won by a margin of 53 to 47 percent. Three months later, turnout fell to 66 percent, twice as many Democrat as Whig voters dropped out, and the margin between the parties fell below 1 percent.

While voter turnout in the North dipped only from 77.1 to 75.3 percent between 1848 and 1852, compared to an average arithmetic decline of 19.9 percent in the fifteen slave states, that minuscule decrease masks considerable variations from state to state and among the three parties. Increased turnout that primarily benefited Democrats in populous states like New York, Ohio, and Indiana offset decreases elsewhere. In western states with rapidly growing populations, the absolute size of the vote grew substantially in four years; any decline in turnout rates, therefore, merely reflected an increase in the pool of potential voters. In the four New England states of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts, in contrast, calculated abstention and sheer apathy reduced the vote.

Significantly, Free Soilers suffered greater declines in turnout than either Whigs or Democrats in every northern state except New Jersey and Pennsylvania. The Free Soil vote and the proportion of the vote were almost halved in four years. Much of that drop occurred in New York, where Barnburners returned to the Democratic column, but the Free Soil vote sank appreciably in Connecticut, Illinois, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and Vermont as well. Some former Free Soilers voted for Scott or Pierce, but many sat out the election, apparently in despair that revising the Compromise was now hopeless.¹¹⁴

After the election, Georgia's vindictive Toombs gloated that "it must have satisfied the northern Whigs, that free soil don't pay any better at the North than at the South. If their candidate had no other merit, he was certainly available.

What would they have done with an unpopular candidate?" Toombs may have referred to the purported defection of pro-Compromise Whigs, but if he meant that antislavery men refused to support Scott, his reasoning is questionable. True, had Scott received all of Hale's votes, he would have carried Connecticut, Ohio, and, surprisingly, Delaware. But it is doubtful that without Hale in the race, all of those men would have voted, and Whigs' platform, not their candidate, caused Free Soilers to run Hale. Hale and other Free Soil leaders sought to hurt Democrats more than Whigs, and in New York, where over three times as many former Free Soilers voted for Pierce than for Scott, that hope clearly backfired. In Connecticut, Indiana, Massachusetts, and Ohio, however, far more of Martin Van Buren's former backers supported Scott than Pierce, and the same is probably true of Michigan, where Scott doubled the vote of the 1851 fusion Whig/Free Soil gubernatorial candidate. In Ohio, moreover, some of Cass' 1848 voters did desert to Hale. Whigs lost a few voters to the Free Soilers in Illinois, Indiana, and Connecticut, but in none did those defections affect the outcome.

Even in New York, over a third of the increased Democratic vote did not come from former Free Soilers, and in other northern states where Democrats gained the most votes between 1848 and 1852, Free Soilers constituted only a minuscule fraction of the increment. Most of this gain instead most likely came from immigrants, about whom Whigs complained vociferously. Turnout by foreign-born voters jumped substantially in 1852, and the Germans preponderantly and the Irish overwhelmingly favored the Democrats. Whigs' pro-Catholic campaign, in sum, failed dismally. "The Catholic question was brought to bear heavily on us in this State," a Wisconsin Democrat wrote, "but by untiring efforts, and a complete and most effective system of operators, that ridiculous movement was thoroughly headed off." 116

Nonetheless, some Whigs did defect to Pierce. Proportionately most significant in Ohio, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, these turncoats also existed in Indiana, Maine, and New York. Some undoubtedly represented angry Protestants disgusted by Whigs' pro-Catholic campaign for Scott, and the Whig decline in Maryland in part reflected the same impulse. Pierce's election, concluded Hayes in Cincinnati, was "a sort of anti-Catholic triumph," while Cleveland's John Barr also bemoaned defection by anti-Catholic Protestants. In Pennsylvania, where Protestant Whigs' disillusionment and nativists' anger were most widely reported, however, very few of Taylor's 1848 voters supported Pierce. There they simply sat out the election, depriving Scott of over 15,000 votes. Abstention also greatly exceeded defection in New Jersey, New York, Maine, and Massachusetts, where almost a third of Taylor's voters stayed home.¹¹⁷

Conservatives miffed by Scott's nomination and by many northern Whigs' contempt for the platform also contributed to this outflow. Websterite Whigs had been sufficiently strong in Connecticut to block Baldwin's reelection to the Senate, and they undoubtedly constituted a considerable fraction of 1848 Whig voters who supported Pierce or abstained and whose votes could have given Scott that state. The same was probably true in Vermont, New Hampshire, and Maine, where a fifth of Taylor's voters abandoned Scott. In New York, where Sewardites railed about "the treachery of Silver Grays" and Washington Hunt groaned to Hamilton Fish that "the backbone of the Whig party was broken by those internal divisions which you and I have so long deplored," conservatives' sabotage clearly hurt Scott, although Democrats' huge additional vote would have defeated him even without those abstentions. One index of this sabotage is that Scott ran almost 7,000 votes behind Hunt. Defection by conservatives in New York City, where one Democrat reported that Websterites voted for Pierce and other Whigs who had earlier supported the Castle Garden Union ticket abstained, was especially severe. Even Silver Gray congressional candidates suffered from this calculated abstention. Our "periodic feuds" and "the shameful defection of the disappointed proved stronger than the principles which now divide the two great parties," concluded a demoralized Fish.¹¹⁸

In Massachusetts almost half of Taylor's supporters defected to Pierce or abstained, and frustrated Websterites surely contributed to that hemorrhage. John Clifford, a conservative acceptable to them, ran almost 10,000 votes ahead of Scott in the gubernatorial election held a week later. John Davis complained that those Whigs who posed as Union savers by insisting on finality looked "assiduously for favorable opportunities to trample upon all Whigs who differed from them in opinion." Davis had good reason to complain; Websterites elected about thirty members of the state legislature. They held the balance of power, and as the price of supporting Clifford in the legislative election of governor, they insisted that Davis be replaced in the Senate.¹¹⁹

Yet the electorate's widely reported apathy also surely contributed to abstention by Democrats as well as by Whigs on November 2, especially in Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, where the absolute vote, not just the turnout rate, declined between 1848 and 1852. Those four, of course, were among the least competitive two-party states in the nation, and a combination of defeatism and overconfidence further depressed turnout by Free Soilers as well as Whigs and Democrats, especially in Vermont. Still, the issueless nature of the presidential contest unquestionably tranquilized the electorate.

In Massachusetts, for example, the state election's central issue was the Maine Law, and that contest evoked a turnout of 73.9 percent compared to 67.8 percent only a week earlier. One reason Clifford ran so far ahead of Scott, indeed, is that he got 8,000 votes on a separate anti-Maine Law ticket, many of which were apparently from Democrats who had supported Pierce, the notorious "drunkard." Similarly, Horace Mann, the Free Soilers' gubernatorial candidate and the most ardent prohibitionist in the race, drew over 8,000 (31.1 percent) more votes than Hale had a week earlier, in part because he was also on a separate pro-Maine Law ticket. The liquor issue obviously mattered more to voters than stale debates about the finality of the Compromise or who was the superior general in the Mexican War. People would vote when public policy was at stake. Maine's September gubernatorial election had also revolved around the liquor issue, and 12,000 more men, almost one-tenth of the potential electorate, voted in it than for president. Whigs had hoped that one of the warring Democratic factions might boycott the presidential election, and many Democrats did. Pierce drew slightly fewer votes than John Hubbard alone had in September, and he trailed the combined vote of Hubbard and Anson Chandler by over 34 percent. Even in New Hampshire, home of two presidential candidates, turnout dropped between March and November, and, incredibly, both Pierce and Hale ran behind their parties' gubernatorial candidates, as did Scott. Men voted when differences over policy were clear; in an issueless personality contest they did not bother. 120

X

For Whigs in 1852, answering the question of whether the Whig party was now "dead—dead," as Lew Campbell angrily growled two days after the election, involved much more than recapitulating the popular vote or compiling reasons for Scott's defeat. However competitive the party remained at the polls outside the Deep South, Whigs could not gainsay their candidates' massacre that year. Ultimately, therefore, the Whig party's life or death boiled down to a matter of psychology. Did Whigs have the will to carry on despite their rout?¹²¹

In a defiant letter dictated twelve days before he died in October, Daniel Webster spurned pleas from his closest New York supporters to renounce the independent tickets launched in his name. Defending the motives of soreheads, he explained, "Probably they think they see indications that within a fortnight, the Whig party in the United States will have become merely Historical." After the election, many Democrats and Free Soilers as well as some Whigs agreed. "Is there any Whig party now?" Philadelphia's Customs Collector William D. Lewis asked John Clayton. "Did not 'Godlike' Daniel prophecy truly?" Reminding Clayton of their effort in 1849 to replace the Whig name with the Taylor Republican party, he queried, "Can we get clear of it now in the new organization which our great rout renders inevitable?" From western Pennsylvania James Johnston concluded: "The Whigs are out of heart and I think many will seek new party connections." "As a party organization we are extinct, and are of 'the things that were, but now no more forever," despaired an Indiana Whig. Why continue a hopeless struggle? he asked. For twenty-five years the party had been "butchered and slaughtered." Its two great leaders, Clay and Webster, were now dead. Why "keep up an opposition that stimulates our adversaries to excesses and which will constitute their apology for such excesses?"122

If some Whigs were prepared to ground arms, others looked to the reorganization of parties to which Lewis alluded. Anti-Compromise Whigs in particular spoke of merging with Free Soilers to oppose expansionistic foreign policies designed to spread slavery that they expected from Pierce, and four days after the election, Charles Sumner tried to tempt Seward into negotiations aimed at launching a new antislavery party. Even without such a merger, many of Seward's New York allies wanted to drive Silver Grays permanently from the party, no matter how small a minority such an ostracism rendered them. Silver Grays retorted by proposing a new and purified Whig party from which all hint of Sewardism and antislavery sentiment was distilled. Referring to one such effort in Rochester, a Sewardite asked sarcastically, "Can you conceive that sane men would believe they could bring Fillmore out in 1856 with a great chance for success? and yet these noodles really do think so! There is no knowing what effect the 'Rochester Knockers' [spirit rappers] will next produce on men's minds." 123

Though deeply discouraged, most Whigs vowed to soldier on. "Cast down but not dismayed there are many here eager to reorganize against our opponents," a defeated Whig candidate reported from New York City. "There is a slight pulsation in the region of the heart which shows that life is not wholly extinct, but the doctors differ as to the probability of restoration to his wonted vigor," a successful Whig congressman wrote Israel Washburn about the party in Pittsburgh. "I am willing to stay here and battle for the good cause," Schouler told Seward from Boston. "We cannot disband," William Kent insisted. Seward himself wanted no part of a party reorganization either in New York or the North as a whole. "No new party will arise, nor will any old one fall," he replied to Sumner. Instead, Seward and many other leaders recommended that Whigs remain quiescent until their wounds healed.¹²⁴

Some Whigs based their decision on pragmatic grounds. Virginia's Botts declared that he intended to stand by the Whig organization since it was far easier to disband an old party than to build a new one. Others stressed patriotic duty. From his post as consul to Argentina, Maine's conservative Edward Kent argued plaintively to Israel Washburn, who clearly wanted to merge with Free Soilers, that he had always worried that "the defeat of Scott, especially if he was largely deserted in the Slave States, would [lead to] the abandonment of the national Whig party & the formation out of . . . its northern section, and of other materials, a substantially sectional party." Any such party, he warned, would jeopardize "the Union." 125

Primarily, however, Whigs determined to hang on because they believed they could win again in two or four years. Separately but almost simultaneously, Whigs across the nation reached the same conclusion. Democrats' sweep was so huge that they were bound to fall apart once they distributed patronage and tried to formulate policy, especially if Whigs indulged in what Simeon Draper called "a good sound sleep" and thereby deprived Democrats of the cohesive pressure provided by external competition. "In the very magnitude of the defeat I find omens better for the future," piped an Illinois Whig. "The Democrats go in with such overwhelming power that they must fall to pieces." An Alabamian concurred: "Democracy have the sway, and I say let them have their own way, for the next four years. Give them rope and they will hang themselves." "We say to ourselves, let us see how Mr. Pierce shall administer the government," Hugh Maxwell wrote Fillmore from New York. Some predicted that Democratic economic policies would rouse the electorate against them when depression followed. Others pointed to inevitable attempts to expand slavery "by purchase, stealing, or war" that would bring at least northern voters back to the Whig party. Whatever it was. Whigs agreed. Democrats were bound to do something that alienated their own supporters and allowed Whigs to mount a triumphant counterattack. "To talk of abandoning the Party is to me absurd," William Kent wrote Fish in January. "Everything was against us [in New York], yet our vote was immense. Let General Pierce form his cabinet, &, what is more important, fill his offices, & we shall see, whether we assist it or not, a formidable rising up in this state in opposition."126

At the close of the most disastrous election year in the Whig party's history, in sum, most Whigs wanted to battle on. By pursuing a policy of "masterly inactivity," they would await the inevitable Democratic blunders. ¹²⁷ Whigs had always functioned better as outs than as ins. The party was founded on opposition to Democratic governance, it survived for almost twenty years because of that role, and now Whigs could oppose it again in Washington as well as in twenty-seven states. As one Whig had said of the comeback in 1846–47, Polk's administration had been the Whigs' best recruiting officer. Why could they not expect the same kinds of gifts on a silver platter from Franklin Pierce? Why not indeed?

Chapter 21

"Now Is the Time to Start New; the Old Issues Are Gone"

"THE WHIGS ARE sullen of course but more united in Congress by far than at the last session," Tennessee's William Cullom reported from Washington in December 1852. "They seem confident that they are only postponed for a season." Also impressed by congressional Whigs' unity, New York's Seward concurred that they wanted "to be quiet and wait without committing ourselves until a breach shall occur in the ranks of the majority." Outside of Washington, too, Whigs of all varieties agreed that "if we keep still and quiet" "the Democratic party must soon divide itself." "If we will be wise," summarized Virginia's John Minor Botts, "we shall have little to do but hold out our hats to catch the fruit as it falls in 56."

The Whigs' own history after defeats in 1836 and 1844 and the entire course of American political history demonstrate that outs can mount comebacks by exploiting ins' mistakes. Whig predictions, moreover, were largely accurate. During Pierce's administration Democrats divided over patronage and policy, and they committed blunders that produced massive defeat at the polls. Whigs, however, did not reap the fruit of voters' backlash in the congressional elections of 1854–55 or in the 1856 presidential election. After 1852, instead, the Whig party disintegrated and was displaced. Decomposition was marked during 1853. In 1854 and 1855 erosion accelerated so that by 1856 only a shadow of a once formidable party remained.

What requires explanation, therefore, is why Whigs' eminently reasonable assumptions in the winter of 1852–53 proved erroneous. Since Whigs correctly predicted that Democrats would divide and alienate most American voters, why did Whigs fail to benefit from their opponents' woes? Why did the Whig party waste away when the Democrats provided so much nutriment to revive it? Addressing those questions forms the agenda of the remaining chapters.

Although Whigs' reactions to the party's plight after the crushing defeats of 1852 differed, virtually all of them factored Democrats' imminent disruption into their calculations for the future. Thus the Whig party's fate continued to be shaped by its interaction with the Democratic party. What was common to all those calculations and what gave coherence to the kaleidoscopic pattern of events during 1853, in turn, was the need of both Whigs who hoped to preserve the party and those who sought new allegiances to find distinctive identities that could attract voters. The central theme of 1853, in sum, was the search for new issues to fill the void that had emerged in 1852.

Ι

By itself, Whigs' "Waterloo" defeat in 1852, which caused Horace Greeley to moan in the New York Tribune that the party had been "not merely discomfited but annihilated," cannot explain the frustration of Whig expectations.² To be sure, the rout in the electoral vote combined with heavy losses in congressional, gubernatorial, and state legislative races made the 1852 debacle unusually severe. Nonetheless, the margin between the Democratic and Whig shares of the nationwide popular vote was hardly insurmountable; nor had many Whig voters, even in the South where the Whig totals declined most sharply, defected to the enemy. Reviving the party, therefore, appeared to be largely a matter of remobilizing temporarily demoralized or alienated supporters and of courting new voters, not of converting lifelong enemies.

Nor was Whig strategy that winter manifestly illogical. What Greeley called the "quiescent policy" offered Whigs several advantages.³ Temporarily postponing nominating conventions and eschewing efforts to define distinctively Whig, but potentially divisive, positions in speeches and platforms could provide time to heal the party's factional and sectional wounds. Equally important, as outs Whigs could finally escape fractious quarrels over patronage. Similarly, waiting for Democrats to take some unpopular action could allow Whigs to rally against it, just as opposition to Democratic policies had united Whigs during Polk's administration.

Democrats and Whigs alike, moreover, correctly recognized that without the "external pressure" provided by active Whig opposition, Democrats almost certainly would divide over issues and patronage allocation once Pierce was inaugurated. As the astute Truman Smith snapped, "I have got tired of officiating as a sort of hoop to the democratic barrel! keeping the heading & staves in place by outside pressure." Although Democrats united behind Pierce's candidacy in 1852, potential rifts among them were manifold. Distrust between pro-Compromise Democrats and those who had supported coalition with Free Soilers in the North and extremist Southern Rights demands in the South was especially deep-seated. As Nathan K. Hall accurately predicted, Pierce tried to gloss over these differences by constructing a "piebald cabinet," but by the summer of 1853 his attempt to please everyone had instead infuriated numerous Democrats, particularly pro-Compromise men in both sections.⁴

Squabbling among Democratic leaders in Washington and state capitals might produce an image of disarray, incompetence, and selfish preoccupation with spoils that disillusioned previous Democratic voters. Whigs knew that their own rifts in 1841–42 and again in 1850 had paralyzed government and engendered disproportionate Whig drop-off in off-year elections. Democratic divisions might have a similar effect.

The calculated policy of watchful waiting until Democrats ruptured or blundered, however, rested upon a chain of seriously flawed assumptions. Most fundamental was the delusion that time was on Whigs' side, that Whigs could passively wait for Democrats to self-destruct while healing their own factional and sectional rifts. Conflict with Democrats had always been the chief counterweight to Whigs' internal divisions. If they ceased fighting Democrats for some indefinite period, there was no guarantee that they would cease fighting each other. Nor would the passage of time necessarily reverse the apathy and alienation of previous Whig voters that eroded Whig strength. If the opposition party's purpose was to oppose the majority, an abdication of that role, no matter how temporary, could increase, not decrease, popular disenchantment and turn still more former Whig supporters into nonvoters.

Above all else, the strategy of lying low and waiting to reap the fruits of the anti-Democratic harvest in 1854 or 1856 presupposed that primarily Whigs would benefit from a voter backlash against Democrats. In the winter of 1852–53 this assumption too had a patina of plausibility. The tiny Native American party was an annoyance chiefly in Pennsylvania. More important, Free Soilers, not Whigs, clearly lost the most votes between 1848 and 1852. Since the 1852 campaign underlined the national consensus on the Compromise's finality, the antislavery party might shrivel to its abolitionist base. Politics could then revert essentially to a two-party contest between Democrats and Whigs, a zero-sum game in which Democratic losses automatically meant Whig gains. As the Whigs would learn to their dismay, however, new players could enter the game. Those new players could define the issues before the electorate just as readily as Whigs and Democrats, and rather than generating a Whig revival, their new issues could—and would—devastate the Whig party.

II

Aside from passivity's unsuitability for Whigs' immediate needs in 1853 when they had to provide voters some reason to come out and vote for Whig candidates, the strategy of watchful waiting presupposed that all Whig leaders saw it as a means toward the same end. The shared expectation that Democrats would inevitably come acropper, however, did not indicate consensus about how to respond to Democratic divisions, what the future shape of the Whig party would be, who should control the organization, or whether it deserved perpetuation at all. At the start of 1853 most Whig leaders and voters hoped to preserve the party in order to fight again another day. Most loved the party, and most were deeply committed to Whig principles of social order and Union, activist domestic governance to improve people's lives, and a nonaggressive foreign policy. Most sincerely believed Whigs would govern more wisely than Democrats. "It will not do for us to think of joining any other party, whatever some may say to the contrary," declared Ohio's Ben Wade, an original Scott supporter and militant antislavery Whig. "The country cannot survive the destruction of Whig principles." The country would always look to Whigs "to set things right," echoed Fillmorite John P. Kennedy a few months later. Most Whigs, in sum, still saw a vital need for their party.⁵ Agreement on preserving it, however, did not indicate complete consensus. If the sobering shock of defeat produced a semblance of harmony among previously divided Whig congressmen during the winter of 1852–53, Whigs outside the capital remained deeply divided along factional and sectional lines. From the moment of Scott's defeat, therefore, jockeying for advantage against intraparty foes commenced.

Seward, for example, was content to remain in the Whig party and temporarily assume a passive stance, not simply because he, like Greeley, expected that divisions among New York's Democrats might hand Whigs victory in the 1853 state elections. He also believed that once Fillmore left the White House and Whigs reassumed the role of an opposition party, Silver Grays would be exposed as the "Croakers, Irregulars, [and] Disorganizers" that they were. Thus his followers would rise to dominance in New York, across the North, and in the nation as a whole.

Many of Seward's northern followers had even less use than he for pro-Compromise Whigs. They spoke angrily of purifying the party in the North by driving conservatives from it. They wanted "the line [to] be squared and distinctly drawn between Anti-Slavery & Pro-Slavery Whigs." Convinced that in the North "the only question available is Freedom against Slavery," they sought reinforcements from the ranks of the apparently collapsing Free Soil party. From their perspective, the chief reason to postpone Whig conventions and the writing of Whig platforms was not to mend fences with conservative rivals and southern Whigs, but to allow time for negotiations that would bring former Free Soilers into the Whig fold. They did not, however, want to jettison the Whig party's southern wing. Like Seward, they sought to retain a national, bisectional organization. But they did insist that northern antislavery Whigs no longer be muzzled, as they were by the 1852 national platform, that northern and southern Whigs again agree to disagree about slavery.

This prescription for the future Whig party appalled southern Whigs and conservative Northerners. "We can never have peace & security with Seward, Greeley & Co. in the ascendant in our national affairs & we had better purchase them by the destruction of the Whig party than of the Union," Georgia's defiant Robert Toombs thundered after Scott's defeat. The continued prominence among northern Whigs of antislavery zealots convinced even moderate southern Whigs like North Carolina's Senator George Badger and Tennessee's John Bell that an unbridgeable sectional chasm would continue to divide the party if Seward and his ilk led its northern wing. "The Seward party are an incubus upon us—universally so at the South," William L. Hodge, a Louisianan who had worked for Fillmore's administration, concluded by September 1853.⁸

Precisely because Silver Grays and other northern conservatives believed that the Sewardites' "game undoubtedly is, to monopolize the name of Whig, control the party, and make it abolitionist," they feared that lying low, as Seward and Greeley advised, might allow the suspected Sewardite strategy to succeed. In Ohio and New York, therefore, conservative Whigs moved quickly after Scott's defeat to call local and state party conventions, from which they excluded Sewardites, to define what the Whig party stood for according to their own views and thereby to block any infusions from former Free Soilers.9

Ohio conservatives' success in calling and dominating a Whig state convention on February 22, 1853, over Sewardites' protests turned Sewardites themselves against the policy of lying low.¹⁰ As Ohio Sewardites learned, their calculated inactivity merely allowed their conservative intraparty rivals to strike first. Furious that the Whigs who wrote the Ohio state platform in February referred to Whigs as "the 'National Conservative' party," one Ohio Sewardite sputtered, "I am not a National Conservative Whig in the sense they intend, and am sick of endeavoring to make the most of an equivocal position." Silence was a mistake. We "must be committed to some political position or party ere long." Unless Seward or another trusted national leader spoke up and defined a position around which antislavery Whigs could rally, he warned, "many will be wandering off into other organizations or become permanently disgusted with every attention to public affairs."

Nor were splits over the slavery question the only Whig divisions that the "quiescent policy" could not heal. During the winter of 1852–53 Whigs in Maine and North Carolina squandered an opportunity to elect at least two United States senators because of intraparty sniping. In Massachusetts it forced an uneasy compromise on the party's successful candidate.

In Maine, the problem stemmed from Whigs' need to prolong the division between Wildcat and regular Democrats. To propitiate the Wildcats, who had allowed Whig state senators to elect him, and to prevent the Democratic majority from reuniting, Whig Governor William Crosby appointed many Wildcats to state jobs and thereby outraged Whig regulars who had been out of power for years. The same dynamic shaped the legislature's contest for the Senate seat. The Whig state senators elected with Wildcat complicity were numerous enough to give Whigs a majority on a joint ballot of the two legislative chambers. Thus Whigs had a splendid chance to replace Democratic Senator James Bradbury. Several Whig senators refused to support Whig candidate William Pitt Fessenden, however, because that refusal had been the price of Wildcat acquiescence in their own election. No Democrat took the seat, but selection of the United States senator was postponed until after the 1853 legislative elections, when Whigs might not do as well as they had in 1852.¹²

Old regional jealousies, as well as resentments spawned by the recent presidential campaign, prevented North Carolina's Whigs from filling the Senate seat of Willie P. Mangum, who announced his intention to retire when he endorsed Scott's nomination in April 1852. While Democrats had a fragile two-seat legislative majority on the joint ballot, they would not rally behind James Dobbin, their caucus' choice. Even fewer would support the Democrats' fallback candidate, Whig apostate Thomas Clingman. Democratic fractiousness offered Whigs a realistic chance to seize the senatorship, but between five and eleven Whig legislators refused to support their top contender, Kenneth Rayner. Since Rayner hailed from eastern North Carolina, some western Whigs found him unacceptable. Rayner's main problem, however, was his refusal to endorse the Scott-Graham ticket in 1852, a stance that some Whigs viewed as treason. Whigs took solace in the fact that both Dobbin and especially the turncoat Clingman had been stopped. But the stalemate meant that George Badger alone represented the state in the Senate during the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress and that the legislature elected in August 1854 would fill both Senate seats.¹³

The Massachusetts legislature was to pick a successor to the deceased Webster's longtime antagonist, Whig Senator John Davis. Whigs elsewhere invested great symbolic importance in the Massachusetts decision, for, as Thurlow Weed wrote Springfield editor Samuel Bowles, "It would help the cause in other states to see the Whig Party, amid all its embarrassments, strong enough to elect a Whig Senator." With good reason, however, Weed feared that internal Whig divisions might destroy this chance. A small bloc of Webster's acolytes together with an even smaller group of antiCoalition Democrats held the balance of power between the Whig majority and the Coalition. The Websterites would never condone Davis' reelection, and they vehemently opposed replacing him with Robert C. Winthrop. As a compromise the party settled on the scholarly and extraordinarily cautious Edward Everett, an ally of Webster, but not one who had worked actively in Washington for the Compromise measures. Time would show Whigs that his election was a mistake.¹⁴

More portentous than continuing intraparty divisions that could neutralize any benefit from anticipated Democratic splits, by 1853 a minority of Whigs wanted to jettison the Whig party altogether. How large that minority was is impossible to estimate, but such men fell into different categories. The most fascinating group—because of what they signified about the party's perceived bankruptcy—were men who had no interest in starting or joining new parties. Instead, because of the prosperity during the early 1850s, Whig and Democratic agreement on remaining economic questions, and the bipartisan commitment to squelch further agitation of the slavery issue, they no longer believed that the Whig party served any useful purpose. They spoke of retiring from political life altogether and devoting their attention to making money or other matters. And they included some extraordinarily important Whig politicians. Historians have long noted that the deaths of Clay and Webster in 1852 deprived Whigs of their two foremost national leaders, but they have not appreciated how many second-tier leaders who might have replaced them also abandoned the party when it most needed them.

Thomas Ewing, the former United States senator and cabinet member from Ohio, represented these refugees from the political arena. After his unsuccessful bid for reelection to the Senate in 1851, he devoted his attention almost entirely to private business activities, not politics. Governor William B. Campbell of Tennessee, the state's most popular Whig, also yearned for private life. Adamantly refusing to seek reelection in 1853, he counted the days until he could escape office, move to New Orleans, and set up as a cotton factor. "Politics is at a low ebb here," he wrote his uncle after his successor had been chosen, "and I daily feel rejoiced that I am done with it." The Boston patrician Winthrop, whose touchy sense of personal dignity bordered on arrogance, also abandoned political life in early 1853. In January, he refused to allow his name to be used as a Senate candidate before the legislature, in part because he feared that the malignant opposition of "Webster toadies" would guarantee yet another humiliating defeat. But he also complained that a return to Washington would force him into "a daily contact with the thing I loathe."

Unlike Ewing, Campbell, and Winthrop, who still sympathized with the Whig cause even if they no longer wanted personally to participate in it, two influential Whigs whose service to the Whig party had been vital now rebuked it. One was Horace Greeley, who had fallen out with his allies Seward and Weed and who was engaged in a ferocious competition for subscribers with other Whig editors in Manhattan like James Watson Webb and especially Henry J. Raymond of the fledgling New York Times. Scorning as "blockheads" Whigs who spoke of resurrecting the party in 1853, Greeley saw the quiescent policy that he urged as more than a temporary lull during which Whigs could regroup. Convinced that the Whig party had begun a process of terminal disintegration, he said almost nothing about party politics in the columns of his Tribune throughout 1853. When he did, both in his paper and privately, he argued that keeping the Whig party alive foolishly endangered enactment of policies Whigs favored since Whig advocacy only guaranteed Democratic opposition. His advice, therefore, was for Whigs to disband, support a friendly Democrat such as Missouri's Thomas Hart Benton for speaker of the House when Congress met in December, and ally with Democrats who favored Whiggish projects like federal subsidies for a railroad to the Pacific Coast. The goal, he insisted at the end of April, should not be a revival of two-party competition but the "general fusion of all parties." 18

The politician who greeted Greeley's call for Whigs to abdicate their opposition role most enthusiastically was also the Whig whose loss could do the party more harm than that of Clay, Webster, Ewing, Campbell, Winthrop, and Greeley combined—Truman Smith, the party's de facto national chairman since 1842. Throughout 1853, in letters to newspaperman James Pike, his California friend John Wilson, and Weed, Smith lacerated his party's futility and savaged its leaders with extraordinary scorn and contempt. "Galphinisms & Gardnerisms," "stealing on a large scale," and "a remorseless scramble for the Spoils" had disgraced the party under Taylor and Fillmore, he railed to Pike in March. Rather than support another "Old Fogie of the Whig party" for president in 1856, he intended to "encourage the presentation of a Democratic candidate who favors tariff revision and Rivers & Harbors improvements but who opposes further territorial annexation & war." "19

"I have washed my hands now & foreover of all further intermeddling in party politics," Smith told Wilson and Weed the following August. Spurning Weed's plea to help rally Whigs for a comeback attempt, he declared that he would "never again lift a finger to put the Whig party in power" or "step across Pa. Av." to place a Whig in the White House. The only presidency that interested him now was that of two copper mining companies in Michigan to which he had just been appointed. "What do you expect to gain by the resuscitation of the Whig party of your State?" he pointedly asked Weed. Nationally, "the party is not worth preservation." "The Whig party should" instead "be broken down & put out of the way."

Smith's contempt for Whigs and Whiggery is simply extraordinary. No other Whig had been more devoted to the party's welfare as a national institution. No one had paid more attention to the nuts and bolts of running congressional and presidential campaigns on a nationwide scale. No other Whig had been so willing as he to seek the compromises across sectional lines necessary to preserve the party's national competitiveness. That such a dedicated party man was now so disillusioned with it, now so ready "to have Whiggery charred & burned," now so eager to escape political life altogether spoke volumes about the impediments to a Whig comeback.²¹

The belief that Whigs could lie low for some indefinite period and then rally their troops again to the clarion call of battle, in short, was folly. Campbell, Winthrop, and Smith were not the only Whigs who saw no point in continuing the fray. "These party names of Whig and Democrat now mean nothing and point to nothing," a journalist wrote in April. Devoid of "principles and measures," their rivalry was perpetuated solely "as a means of political intrigue and an avenue for the attainment of office." Politics now completely lacked national principles, a New Yorker echoed in September. It had become a mere "scramble for the spoils & a fight about Men rather than measures." As an angry Ohioan warned Seward in February in a somewhat different context, unless Whigs defined what they stood for and thereby justified the party's continued existence, "many will be wandering off into other organizations or become permanently disgusted with every attention to public affairs."

The second half of this prophecy described Whigs who wanted to quit political life completely. The first points to a different group of former Whigs who would no longer support the party. It also highlights the most egregious flaw in the strategy of quiet passivity that many Whig leaders advocated in the winter of 1852–53.

Ш

"No new party will rise, nor will any old one fall," Seward had retorted to Charles Sumner's postelection proposition that northern antislavery Whigs and Free Soilers merge in "a new organization," a new "party of Freedom." In the narrow sense that no existing party disappeared and no new antislavery party appeared during 1853, Seward's prediction proved accurate. Nonetheless, Whigs' biggest mistake in waiting passively until they reaped the fruit of Democratic dissensions and mistakes in 1854 or 1856 was their assumption that Whigs could monopolize opposition to the Democrats and thereby automatically benefit from popular wrath against them.

During the twentieth century, American electoral politics has always been organized around the same two major parties—Republicans and Democrats—in large part because the adoption of state-printed ballots in the 1890s measurably increased the difficulty of launching a third party to challenge them. Since those major parties had an automatic slot on the ballots governments prepared and since the legal hurdles for other parties to get on those ballots were so high, Republicans and Democrats effectively monopolized voters' choice. During this century, therefore, the Republican party has been the only realistic alternative to the Democrats. Thus it, and not some other party, has usually benefited when voters sought to punish Democrats and to replace them in office.²⁴

In the 1850s and for most of the nineteenth century, however, the rules of the political game encouraged rather than inhibited the creation of new parties. Instead of state-printed ballots that gave legally recognized major parties pride of place and disadvantaged other groups who sought to be listed on them, political parties printed and distributed their own ballots. As a result, it was far easier for new parties to challenge the old ones. As Whigs would learn to their dismay, therefore, politics in the 1850s was not a zero-sum game. Animosity toward Democrats did not translate automatically into support for Whigs. Voters had other options, especially in races for state and local offices that often had different, and for voters more salient, policy agendas than did officials in Washington. By siphoning off former Whig voters and eroding their allegiance to the Whig party, those new subnational parties were every bit as damaging as a new antislavery coalition to the survival, let alone the comeback, of the Whig party. Unlike their twentieth-century Republican successors, in sum, Whigs could not monopolize opposition to Democrats, and that simple, if easily overlooked, fact more than anything else explains the death of the Whig party.²⁵

Although Seward and most other Whig leaders wanted to perpetuate the Whig party as a national, bisectional organization, in 1853 a minority of militant antislavery Whigs yearned for a merger with Free Soilers and antislavery Democrats into a new antislavery party. Such men were generally small-fry politicos, religiously inspired antislavery zealots, or simply former Whig voters who were fed up. There was a fine line, moreover, between Sewardites who wanted to lure Free Soilers into the northern Whig party in order to strengthen their own faction and to reaffirm the party's antislavery commitment, on the one hand, and antislavery Whigs who had viewed Seward as their spokesman and who now wanted to combine with Free Soilers in a new party, on the other. Their numbers, therefore, are impossible to calculate.

Some were not even Northerners. Kentucky's Cassius M. Clay, for example, had long since abandoned his famous cousin's Whig party to advance the antislavery cause. "The Whig party has had its day," he told Seward. "It had long since lost most of its measures, and its late disgraceful minority proves that its vitality is gone also." What was more, "your usefulness in the Whig ranks is at an end." If Seward stubbornly clung to the Whig party, Clay warned, "you would daily lose your own troops who will join us!"²⁶

Some of Seward's troops were indeed prepared to defect. "The Whig party sought their own graves, by compromising with slavery at Baltimore," protested an Ohioan in late November 1852. "The time must soon come," he vowed, "when, regardless of consequences, the issue of freedom or slavery will be tried in this country." "The Whig party as such is completely used up and appears to be doomed," a New York Sewardite chorused the following February. "The only hope appears to me to be in the union of all lovers of freedom. The only question available is Freedom against Slavery."

These passionate howls, ironically, help explain why Seward himself had no interest in trying to build a new antislavery party in 1853, why none took shape that year, and why even the remaining Free Soilers looked beyond the slavery question to perpetuate their party. The Free Soil party could not possibly recover its strength or a new antislavery coalition possibly be built until someone made an issue of "Freedom against Slavery." Disgruntled small-fry politicos and impatient abolitionists in Ohio, New York, or Massachusetts could not make slavery a live issue, that is, do something that convinced a majority of northern voters, who now seemed prepared to acquiesce in the Compromise's finality, that a new antislavery party was necessary. Only politicians in Washington could do that. Yet both the departing Fillmore administration and the incoming Democrats were pledged to squelch any new agitation of the slavery issue, and for most of 1853 Congress was not in session. Starting an antislavery fire required new fuel that no one of consequence seemly likely to supply.

Nonetheless, some northern Whigs' desire to agitate against slavery in order to build a new party or revive their own convinced a wholly different group of Whigs that they must abandon the Whig party and seek new alliances. Like other Whigs, these men fully expected that the Democratic party would rupture within months of Pierce's inauguration, but they did not see that impending division as the spark to ignite a Whig revival. Rather, the prospect that pro-Compromise or Union Democrats would be most offended by the new administration caused them to resurrect plans for building a bisectional Union party from conservative Whigs and Democrats.

Within two weeks of Scott's defeat, Daniel Lee, a Georgia newspaperman who had served in Fillmore's administration and who now edited the Silver Gray Rochester American in New York, wrote him that "the conservative and filibustering elements" of the Democrats would soon "separate, adding the former to the patriotic Whigs North & South, who sustain your Administration." His friends in the Georgia and Alabama Union parties controlled major newspapers in those states, he added. Thus, "arrangements are in progress for the Union men of the whole country to cooperate in effecting a perfect national organization." Lee's allusion to southern Union parties and especially to his native Georgia was important. Throughout 1853 proponents of a Union party looked to Georgia and New York as the pillars on which to build it. And by the end of that year, many conservative Whigs, especially ex-members of Fillmore's administration and Fillmore himself, embraced the Union party idea.²⁸

To summarize briefly, by the start of 1853 the Whig party was already fragmenting into at least five groups of very uneven size: conservative, pro-Compromise northern and southern Whigs who wanted to remain in the party and do battle with antislavery northern Whigs for control of it; Sewardites who were prepared to stay in the party, hoped to dominate it, and looked to former Free Soilers as allies in that struggle; men who yearned to quit politics for private life, some of whom believed the Whig party had outlived its usefulness; antislavery Whigs who wished to combine with Free Soilers in a new organization; and conservatives who thought a battle with Sewardites was hopeless and who looked toward a combination with conservative Democrats in a new Union party. That a party containing men of such different dispositions might hold together and stage a comeback at some future date, as Whig optimists envisioned, was problematic.

Nor was it only Whig politicos who could launch new parties that siphoned off voters whom other Whig politicians expected to mobilize when they sounded the charge. Rank-and-file Whigs' vulnerability to incursions by new parties was forecast in a remarkable letter from a disgruntled New York Whig to Seward in the spring of 1852. Anticipating Truman Smith's vitriolic criticisms, he declared that thousands of citizens held both Whig and Democratic congressmen in "utter contempt" because of "their neglect of the real interests of the nation, their apparent incapacity to discover anything better to occupy" their minds "than the tricks of demagogues to arrange for place and profit." Because their elected leaders were "imbeciles," he warned, "thousands of Whigs, tired of the present condition of things, are debating in their minds the propriety of abandoning their old association in the hopes that by a new crystallization a better development will be realized."²⁹

That angry and disillusioned Whigs would eagerly embrace new parties that seemed responsive to popular grievances, even if those parties openly opposed

Whig candidates, became clear in some local and state races in 1852 when the excitement stirred by the presidential campaign held most voters in party traces. The Whigs' triumph in the Massachusetts state election in November had been the party's most satisfying victory that year. In the gubernatorial race, however, there had been five separate tickets, two of which took a more forthright stand for or against prohibition than either the Whigs, the Democrats, or the Free Soilers. Granted, Whigs had operated behind the scenes to launch the ticket opposing prohibition in order to lure alienated Irish voters from the Democrats. The more important fact is that those two tickets captured a tenth of the previous Whig vote and almost a tenth of the cast vote. In the Whig bastion of Pittsburgh in October a bigot named Joe Barker, who had won the mayoralty as a "People's and Anti-Catholic Candidate" in 1850 and who was renowned for his hostility to the enforcement of liquor laws, attracted a fourth of the vote in the race for county sheriff, while his Whig opponent captured little more than a third, a significantly smaller share than other successful Whig candidates on the same ticket.30

These elections were ominous for two reasons. First, they illustrated the ease with which splinter tickets could enter state and local races and the vulnerability of Whigs to them. Second, they highlighted the salience of anti-Catholicism and prohibition (or hostility to prohibition) to certain voters, issues that Whigs had purposely spurned in 1852 and that could be injected into the political arena by others when Whigs renounced them. As events soon revealed, indeed, they were the first breezes of an impending hurricane.

IV

Whigs, therefore, could not simply stand pat in 1853. To compete in the elections that year, to stem defections to new parties, and to restore the confidence of those who now deemed the party purposeless and corrupt, they had to justify the Whig party's perpetuation. They could hope that Democrats might eventually contribute to that rationale by angering voters, but they could not wait for Democrats to do so. They had to find an issue or issues that reestablished a distinctive and relevant identity for the party. Among Whigs across the nation, therefore, 1853 was marked by a flailing, often unsuccessful, search for issues that polarized Whigs against Democrats and thereby rejuvenated the party.

Seward, for one, intuitively recognized this need. Prior to the congressional session in December 1852, he pressed his friend Samuel Ruggles for facts and arguments he could use in a speech promoting construction of a railroad to the Pacific coast. "We can't fight Locofocoism with its own fire & I see nothing but this fire to fight them with," Seward succinctly explained. In the same speech he went out of his way to revive the tariff issue for Whigs by arguing that the duties on iron, and particularly iron rails, should be raised rather than lowered, as so many railroad men demanded. In his final annual message to Congress, Fillmore also tried to breathe life into the tariff issue that the Whig platform of 1852 had abdicated. Far more thoroughly than he had in his 1850 message, Fillmore trotted out the entire arsenal of traditional Whig arguments for protection. He pilloried the Walker Tariff's ad valorem duties as invidious inducements to fraud, and he denounced that law's differential rates on raw materials and finished goods as pernicious disincentives to manufacturing. Flatly declaring that the United States needed "discriminating protective duties," the code words so conspicuously absent from the 1852 national platform, Fillmore recounted in detail the country's unfavorable balance of trade, the resulting outflow of specie to Europe that siphoned off almost the entire yield from the California gold strikes, the reluctance of capitalists to invest in manufacturing unless they were protected "from ruinous competition from abroad," and the need "to protect and encourage the labor of our own citizens." A protective tariff with specific duties, he hymned in language reminiscent of Henry Clay, "would place the mechanic by the side of the farmer, create a mutual interchange of their respective commodities, and thus stimulate the industry of the whole country." Friends of both Fillmore and Seward praised these efforts to revive the tariff issue, but the reigning prosperity continued to blunt its utility.³²

Both Fillmore and Seward also addressed foreign policy, a topic many Whigs thought provided the greatest potential for drawing a line between themselves and expansion-minded Democrats. Alluding obliquely to his efforts to squelch filibusterers, Fillmore announced that he had assured both England and France that the United States had no designs on Cuba and that he personally regarded "its incorporation into the Union at the present time as fraught with serious peril." With regard to Democratic enthusiasm for Kossuth's calls for intervention in Europe, Fillmore was more emphatic. Rehearsing his commitment to strict neutrality and nonintervention in foreign wars, he chastised those who "now said . . . that this policy must be changed" and "that we ought to interfere between contending sovereigns and their subjects for the purpose of overthrowing the monarchies of Europe." "This," warned Fillmore, "is a most seductive but dangerous appeal to the generous sympathies of free men."

Franklin Pierce's initial actions as president reinforced the belief that foreign policy might replace economic issues and slavery as the focal point of two-party conflict. In his inaugural address Pierce went out of his way to repudiate Fillmore's cautious approach by brashly proclaiming, "The policy of my Administration will not be controlled by any timid forebodings of evil from expansion." The location of the United States rendered "the acquisition of certain possessions not within our jurisdiction eminently important to our protection." That Pierce had annexation of Spanish Cuba and more of Mexico in mind became clear from his diplomatic appointments. To Spain he dispatched the notoriously reckless Louisiana champion of filibusterism and slavery expansion Pierre Soulé. To Mexico he sent the South Carolina fire-eater James Gadsden.³⁴

Along with the selection of Mississippi's Jefferson Davis as secretary of war, these appointments indicated that Pierce would favor Southern Rights Democrats over pro-Compromise Union men, and southern Union Democrats resented them accordingly. But they also betokened a belligerent, expansionist foreign adventurism that genuinely appalled many Whigs, at least some of whom believed that voters could be rallied by opposition to it. Yet opposition to expansionism also failed to develop as a Whig panacea. Only some Democrats, many of whom adopted the label "Young America," promoted that policy. Other Democrats, as both Daniel Lee and Truman Smith had noted, opposed filibusterism, and Lee had cited them as potential recruits for a Union party.

With no new national issues to exploit in 1853, astute Whigs instinctively turned to state issues for desperately needed ammunition. In Ohio, they sought to exploit negative reaction to a new tax Democrats had imposed on banks' assets, a reaction that Cleveland editor John Barr predicted could "give Whigs the ascendancy [next fall], especially in the legislature." In Illinois, some Whigs sought to ban "intoxicating drink" in order to break "the shell of the Democracy." Samuel Bowles of Springfield, Massachusetts, argued that since Whigs had been "beaten out" by the Coalition in elections for delegates to an impending state constitutional convention, "our only hope is in making a State question" out of its actions. Pushing a single-district system of legislative representation, which could split Democrats and Free Soilers, he believed, "affords the best chance for the Whigs to make head against the Opposition." If defeated at the convention, "let us go to the people & fight it out there." Such a stand "is our only present hope of 'saving the state,' i.e. "the Whig party." "Now is the time to start new," he insisted. "The old issues are gone, we can't live under them."

V

By the time of the spring elections in 1853, however, no compelling new Whig platform had yet emerged, and Whigs paid a terrible price for their failure to find one. In 1851. Virginia's Whigs had won two of fifteen House seats, wracked up 47 percent of the vote in the first popular election for governor, and made gains in the lower house of the legislature under the reapportionment dictated by the new state constitution. Because of congressional reapportionment, Virginia had only thirteen House seats to fill in 1853. Whigs failed even to run candidates in six districts, and they lost all seven they contested. Of those seven, the Whigs' share of the vote exceeded 45 percent in only four, and in two it fell below 40 percent. In contrast, a combination of increased representation from the west and multiple Democratic candidates in other districts produced the strongest Whig showing in legislative races since 1848. A net Whig gain of eight seats reduced the Democratic majority in the house from twenty-two to six and increased the Whig share from 43 to 48 percent. Nonetheless, Democrats still controlled the legislature and the governorship, and now there would be no Virginia Whig presence whatsoever in Congress.38

Lack of salient national issues also ruined Whig congressional candidates that spring in New England. The size of the Whigs' vote and their share of the total dropped everywhere. In New Hampshire, where they won two of four seats in 1851 through alliances with Free Soilers, they lost all three reapportioned districts. In the former Whig bastion of Rhode Island, George King had resisted the state's swing toward Democrats in 1851 by winning with 51.2 percent in the first district. Even though King's absolute vote grew by over 40 percent between 1851 and 1853, he lost in 1853 with less than 46 percent of the total, while the hapless Whig candidate in Rhode Island's other district attracted fewer than a tenth of its voters. Whigs had carried one of Connecticut's four districts in 1851, and their statewide total of 28,886 votes constituted a respectable 49.1 percent of the total. In 1853 their total vote sank to 24,891 (42.7 percent), and they lost all four seats. As in Virginia, in sum, Whig congressional candidates were completely shut out.

Whereas Whigs had won six of twenty-five congressional seats in the four states with spring elections in 1851, they were zero for twenty-two in 1853.³⁹

Unlike Virginia, New England's state elections provided little solace for Whigs. Rhode Island's incumbent Democratic Governor Philip Allen won by his largest majority in three years, while Whigs were reduced to less than a third of the seats in the state house of representatives. In New Hampshire, Whig gubernatorial candidate James Bell won 2,270 (11.4 percent) fewer votes than his humiliated predecessor in 1852, Whigs' share of the total dipped to 31 percent, their proportion of house seats plummeted to 30 percent, and they elected only one of twelve senators. Once again, however, Connecticut best augured future developments.

In 1852, Connecticut's Whigs had tried to exploit prohibitionist sentiment by running Green Kendrick, a well-known dry, for governor and by urging their legislative candidates openly to endorse passage of a Maine Law. That strategy backfired when Kendrick won only 45 percent of the vote, and Whigs lost twenty house seats and six in the state senate. Nonetheless, most political observers in Connecticut expected that prohibition would again be the central issue in the 1853 state election, if only because a coalition of Whigs and Free Soilers in the legislature still sought to pass a Maine Law and because the Democrats' gubernatorial candidate, incumbent Governor Thomas Seymour, adamantly opposed it.

Confident that "the sinking carcass of Maine Lawism" was "a no go," Democrats eagerly wanted to make the election another referendum on prohibition by openly opposing it. As they suspected, however, Whigs changed tactics and tried "hard to effect, this year, by indirect means & side issues what they failed to accomplish last year by more open & direct means." Stung by the 1852 results, the 1853 Whig state convention directed candidates on the Whigs' statewide ticket to spurn all inquiries from temperance groups. It also purged prohibitionist sympathizers from the new state ticket. Henry Dutton, Whigs' gubernatorial candidate, particularly offended dries, for as state senator in 1850 he had helped bury a prohibition bill in order to save the Whig governor from having to sign or veto it. In sharp contrast to the studied silence of the state ticket, however, many Whig legislative candidates ran as open proponents of the Maine Law.

With both Whig and Democratic gubernatorial candidates decidedly unsympathetic to prohibition, the question was whether temperance men would run candidates of their own or support the Free Soilers, who had endorsed the Maine Law a year earlier. Arguing that the Free Soil party must not pollute itself by taking a stand on a side issue like prohibition, at least one Free Soiler strenuously urged that the party keep hands off and force temperance men to make their own nominations. Most Free Soilers, however, disliked drinking and drinkers intensely. The party therefore nominated Francis Gillette for governor on a pro-Maine Law platform, and Gillette won the endorsement of temperance groups. In legislative races Free Soilers ran their own candidates in a few districts, but more often they supported Whigs or Democrats committed to a Maine Law.⁴¹

Free Soilers, in sum, were the only Connecticut party officially committed to prohibition in the gubernatorial race, but in the simultaneous legislative races Whigs and Democrats both ran dries and wets. Already demoralized by Scott's decisive defeat the previous November, Connecticut's Whigs, especially dries among them, were confused and often paralyzed with indecision by this bewildering situation. "The Whigs expect defeat," Emily Baldwin shrewdly wrote her absent son on election day. "They are disheartened & divided by temperance, Maine Law & abolition. While the opposite are in high feather from the Presidential election and all hang together." Democrats concurred. "The Whigs here seem disposed to let the election go pretty much by default," wrote a Democrat from the eastern shoreline town of Lyme. "Upon the whole things look, as if the Democracy would have their own way, without much of a struggle."

Renouncing prohibition proved even more disastrous for Connecticut's Whigs than embracing it had been. Dutton was crushed. Between April 1852 and April 1853 Whigs lost almost 8,000 votes, a fourth of their 1852 total, and their share of the total plunged from 45 to a dismal 34 percent. Almost a tenth of Kendrick's 1852 supporters backed Gillette. Combined with recruits from previous nonvoters, those defectors increased the Free Soilers' vote by 6,000 and their share of the total from 4.6 to 14.8 percent. By stressing prohibition, and not the slavery issue, that is, Connecticut's Free Soilers garnered the biggest vote since the party's formation. Even more worrisome for Whigs, wets as well as dries abandoned the Whig party. Twice as many Kendrick voters as those who defected to Gillette decamped to the Democratic column in 1853, and Seymour's 51 percent of the vote represented the largest share won by a Democrat since 1837. Another index underlines Whig dissolution. Winfield Scott had won 2,000 more votes in November than Kendrick had the previous April, yet in April 1853 almost a fifth of Scott's supporters refused to vote at all.⁴³

Demoralization and the divisive prohibition question also decimated Whig legislative candidates. As recently as 1851 Whigs had retained control of the senate, and by winning 49 percent of the house seats they had remained within four votes of the Democratic majority. In 1852, Whigs' share of house seats dropped to 40 percent, and the Democrats' majority increased to thirty-eight seats. Simultaneously, Whig strength in the senate was halved, and Democrats took firm control. In 1853, Whigs lost yet another senate seat to the Democrats, and in the house they were almost wiped out. Reduced to three-tenths of the seats, they now trailed the Democrats by seventy-seven votes. By 1853, in sum, Connecticut's Whig party had been torn apart. This collapse surely reinforced Truman Smith's conviction that the party was finished.

Two municipal elections that spring were also ominous harbingers. In Detroit an open assault by the Catholic clergy on the city's public school system and their demand that the public school fund be divided to support Catholic schools infuriated Protestants. Democrats split as Catholic supporters of the bishop "nominated a city ticket pledged to destroy the schools of this city by hook or crook" and Protestant Democrats nominated an Independent ticket against them. Caught flatfooted and now embarrassed by their pro-Catholic campaign in 1852, Whigs made no nomination of their own and supported the anti-Catholic ticket. The anti-Catholic Independent ticket easily prevailed, but Whigs' support of it indicated that others besides Whigs could define the political agenda and that Whig voters, disenchanted by their own party's pro-Catholic tilt in 1852, would readily support an openly anti-Catholic party.⁴⁴

Cincinnati's mayoral election that spring demonstrated even more emphatically former Whig voters' readiness to punish their old party for its flirtation with Catholics. There, too, popular outrage at a perceived Catholic assault on public schools fueled an anti-Catholic backlash that shattered the existing parties. Four parties contested the mayoralty. The regular Democratic candidate tried to avoid the religious issue, but he was generally viewed as the favorite of Bishop John Purcell and the Catholic hierarchy, who petitioned the Ohio legislature in February for a division of the public school fund. The Whig candidate, backed strongly by the city's major Whig paper, dubbed himself an Independent and took a moderate proschool, anti-Catholic stance—far too moderate for most Protestants. Hence a new Free School party nominated a virulently anti-Catholic and anti-immigrant bigot, who was denounced by the regular Whig press as totally unfit for office. His candidacy, in turn, caused anti-Catholic Germans, who feared the nativism of the Free School candidate and who resented native-born Democrats' dominance of that party's local organization, to run a fourth, Anti-Miami ticket.⁴⁵

Because foes of the Democrats split the anti-Catholic vote, Democrats won with 40 percent of the total. Still, three-fifths of Cincinnati's electorate chose anti-Catholic parties, and the Free School party alone took 35 percent of the vote. More important, Whigs, who had carried the city in the congressional election of October 1852, now won less than a fifth of the cast vote. Over three times as many former Whigs supported James Taylor, the Free School candidate whom the Whig press had denounced, as supported the Whig-backed Independent. More worrisome still, Ohio had held a referendum on prohibition in 1851, and almost two-thirds of the Cincinnatians who had then voted against liquor supported Taylor, twice the number retained by Whigs. That fact was ominous, for prohibition would become a central issue in the fall state election. The storm clouds that combined prohibitionism, nativism, anti-Catholicism, and antipartyism into the most powerful political force in the North, a storm that would shatter Whiggery, were gathering visibly on the horizon.⁴⁶

VI

Prohibition played a role—often a decisive role—in almost every northern state election during 1853. Coupled with the propensity of men who now disgustedly rejected both major parties to start or support new parties in order to repudiate the old ones, it usually wreaked havoc on the Whig electorate. In every northern state where Whigs failed to find a defining new issue of their own, indeed, internal division, defection, and abstention mocked their hopes for a comeback.

California was one of very few states where prohibition was not a central issue in 1853, but its gubernatorial and legislative elections directly tested Whigs' hopes of benefiting from Democratic divisions. They also showed how even the vaguest of platforms, if relevant to voters, could keep Whigs competitive. Having come within a whisker of winning the governorship in 1851 and within 5,000 votes of defeating Pierce in the much larger turnout of 1852, California's Whigs remained within reach of the Democrats, and in 1853 their status as outs was a distinct advantage. The same antiparty, antipolitician sentiment mushrooming in the East appeared in California, in part because, as one Whig admitted, "The Whigs and Dems agree on virtually every policy for the state except patronage." By posing as clean government reformers, Whigs might therefore benefit from anti-incumbent animosity, especially as Governor John Bigler, whom Democrats renominated, was especially unpopular.⁴⁷

Whigs, however, split over strategy. Led by John Wilson, Truman Smith's friend, some wanted to forsake Whig nominations altogether, "postpone our party issues if we have any," and instead merge with "the better portion of the Democratic party by means of an independent movement." "Let the leading issue be opposition to the present corrupt set & their measures, & go for competence & honest men of either party," argued one such advocate. Others, including the majority of the Whig state committee, believed that rabidly hostile anti-Bigler Democrats would support a separate Whig nominee who could win by at least 12,000 votes. Especially if Whigs committed themselves to a new constitututional convention that would divide the state in two, argued one advocate of this strategy, Whigs could rout the Democrats "horse, foot, & dragoons." 48

For various reasons, most Whigs opposed a constitutional convention. As a result, Whigs made their own nominations for governor and the legislature but without a concrete platform other than throwing the rascals out. By itself that was almost enough. Bigler won by a slightly larger margin than in 1851, but his 1,500-vote majority was markedly smaller than Pierce's a year earlier. Some dissident Democrats may have voted for the Whig candidate who ran 2,400 votes ahead of Scott, but defections were not nearly as numerous as optimistic Whigs had predicted. And in the legislative races where dissident Democrats presumably supported their own candidates, Whigs were slaughtered. They fell from a dismal 35 to 15 percent of the house seats, and in the senate their minority shrank to 23 percent. Democrats would subsequently engage in a blood feud over the Senate seat the new legislature was to fill, but the elections had already demonstrated that Democratic rifts did not translate into Whig victories.⁴⁹

Fortunately for Whigs in Iowa, Illinois, and Indiana, they faced neither congressional nor important state elections in 1853. Wisconsin's Whigs were not so lucky. The Whig alliance with Free Soilers that had elected a majority of the state house of representatives and Governor Leonard Farwell in 1851 collapsed in 1852 because of the Whigs' national platform, and Democrats swept the elections that year. Farwell's refusal to run again in 1853 because he wanted to pursue private business affairs shattered attempts to revive the coalition behind a People's ticket that year. Anti-coalition Whigs, Democrats, and Free Soilers, now running as the People's party, each nominated their own gubernatorial candidates. Worse still from Whigs' perspective, only Edward Holton, the People's candidate, pledged to sign a prohibition law should the next legislature pass one. The liquor issue annihilated the Whig party. Holton ran second, with approximately 22,000 votes (39.3 percent); the Whig candidate drew a pathetic 3,300 votes (6 percent). Faced with a choice between a sterile old party and a new one with a decisive stand on a salient new issue, Whig voters abandoned their old party in droves. 50

Prohibitionism also contributed to Whigs' collapse in Ohio. Although Ohio's Whigs had not won a state election since 1848, the popular vote margin between them and Democrats remained narrow. By cooperating with ex-Whigs among Free Soilers in the legislature on economic policy, moreover, they had managed to stop Democratic measures prior to 1852. That year's legislative reapportionment dictated by the 1851 constitution gave Democrats overwhelming control, and they used it to pass the bank tax many Whigs saw as the party's salvation.⁵¹

Despite their mutual suspicions, both Sewardite Whigs and the conservatives, who had seized control of the 1853 state convention, reviled the Democrats' bank tax. "If the Whig party will now do its duty, we might succeed," wrote one conservative in January. "The Democrats having made the Hard money issue, let us make no other issue & put them on the defense. They cannot defend this issue before the people." Since Whiggish Free Soilers, businessmen who were normally apathetic about politics, and probanking Democrats also hated that new law, making opposition to it the focal point of the Whig campaign, as Sewardite Whigs also urged, offered a realistic chance of carrying October's state elections.⁵²

For two reasons, these hopes foundered. Whigs could not capture either the governorship or the legislature unless they won support from Free Soilers. Attempts to form fusion Whig-Free Soil legislative tickets in northern Ohio sputtered, however, when Free Soilers demanded as the price of cooperation that Whig legislative candidates commit themselves to Joshua Giddings' "ultra views of Slavery," to Salmon P. Chase's reelection to the Senate, and to the formation of a new antislavery party "for all time to come." Chase remained a pariah even to Western Reserve Whigs, and they refused to commit suicide by dissolving the Whig party in a new coalition. "This is more than we can stand," complained Sewardite John Barr, who sought Free Soil support for Whig candidates "to check the rampant and destructive Locofocoism . . . in this State," not a new party. "I care as little for names as anyone, but I am not to be driven from the support of Whig principles, or from acting with the glorious old party, sink, or swim," echoed Ben Wade. 53

Simultaneously, "inveterate Silver Grays," who shared Sewardites' horror at the bank tax, opposed any cooperation with Free Soilers. That is why they engineered the gubernatorial nomination of the conservative southern Ohio congressman Nelson Barrere in February. The brief Whig platform, which called Whigs the "National Conservative party" and pledged them to uphold the Union and oppose Democrats' state policies, left Free Soilers cold. They therefore nominated their own gubernatorial candidate and, where Whigs spurned fusion on their terms, their own legislative candidates. 54

Whigs' hope of focusing the election on the bank tax also foundered. Since 1851, when voters had ratified a clause of the new constitution authorizing the legislature to attack liquor, prohibitionist sentiment had burgeoned in Ohio. Unlike banking policy, which still polarized Whigs and Democrats against each other, temperance divided both parties internally. Hence, neither the Whig nor the Democratic state convention in 1853 said anything about it. Prohibitionism was particularly strong among Free Soilers, and even though some complained that stressing it rather than slavery would be "to throw away the stack to clinch at straw," Free Soilers featured it in their campaign. Their gubernatorial candidate, Samuel Lewis, vigorously called for passage of a Maine Law, and the state's leading temperance paper endorsed him. Free Soil legislative candidates also pushed prohibition, and on that issue, rather than banking or slavery, they often fused with Democrats or Whigs. Some Whig legislative candidates, sensing that prohibition was the only issue that aroused popular interest in 1853, also took up the cry. "The Maine Law will enter largely into the contest," Whig Congressman Lew Campbell reported from the Miami Valley. "I am not exactly a Maine Law man, but I say, Heaven send us anything that will help break down Locofocoism. $^{\prime\prime55}$

That Whigs were perceived as less committed Maine Law men than Free Soilers was precisely the problem. By the summer Whigs knew they faced another defeat. Reports of apathy among Whig voters abounded, and Whig politicos spoke of going fishing rather than campaigning. The result was even worse than Whigs feared. In a poll that brought out fewer than three-fifths of the eligible voters, Democrats won the governorship easily. The Whig vote plunged by almost 34,000 (28.2 percent) since 1851 and by an even more alarming 66,734 (43.7 percent) since the presidential election in 1852. Accordingly, Whigs' share of the total plummeted from 42 percent in 1851 and 43 percent in 1852 to 30 percent in 1853. Meanwhile, Samuel Lewis, the clearest prohibitionist in the race, tripled the vote of his predecessor in 1851, ran far more strongly than Hale or even Martin Van Buren had, and raised Free Soilers' share of the total to 17.5 percent, its all-time high. Altogether, Whigs retained only two-thirds of their voters from the 1852 state election. 56

After the election, Ohio's most important Whig paper, the Ohio State Journal, attributed the defeat to prohibition, blaming some Whigs for failing to vote, while Whig wets defected to the Democrats in order "to uphold and sustain the free and unrestricted traffic in ardent spirits." Few Whigs apparently supported the Democrats' gubernatorial candidate, but many dries bolted to the Free Soil column. In legislative races, however, wet Whigs who bothered to vote did support Democratic candidates. Whigs who had won only twenty-six house and nine senate seats in 1851 sank to seventeen in the house and seven in the senate. Whigs, in sum, had been routed, and the prohibition issue, combined with apathy, caused their obliteration.⁵⁷

VII

Prohibition also contributed to Whiggery's unraveling in the Middle Atlantic and New England states, but their elections illuminated additional problems that afflicted the party. In 1852 Maine's Whigs exploited Democratic divisions over liquor to elect three of six congressmen, gain control of the legislature, and thereby put William Crosby, who won less than a third of the popular vote, in the governor's office. Democratic dissension over prohibition, and now over allocation of federal jobs, continued into 1853, and Whigs again stood to profit from it. This time the wet Wildcat faction controlled the Democratic state convention, which nominated Albert G. Pillsbury, a moderate opponent of prohibition, as the regular Democratic candidate for governor. Their platform said nothing about the Maine Law. Dry Democrats, who had previously supported Hubbard, bolted and nominated Anson P. Morrill, chairman of a recent state temperance convention, on a platform pledged to retain the Maine Law. Whigs renominated Governor Crosby, and Free Soilers again entered their own candidate, who defended the Maine Law even more strenuously than Morrill.⁵⁸

Democratic division and the four-way race guaranteed that Maine's legislature would again choose the governor, but Whig prospects of success were anything but sure. A Senate seat was at stake in the legislative elections, and Wildcat Democrats who now ran as regulars seemed unlikely to help Whigs control the legislature again. In addition, Crosby alienated a number of Whigs because he had appointed Democrats to office and because his senate supporters had blocked Fessenden's election to the Senate in February. Finally, some Whig dries had voted for Hubbard rather than Crosby in 1852, and with more committed Maine Law men in the race than he, their support in 1853 was doubtful.⁵⁹

The September gubernatorial results underlined how completely the prohibition issue had disrupted Maine's politics. Pillsbury, the Wildcat or regular Democratic candidate, emerged with a plurality of 43 percent. The two dry candidates, Morrill and the Free Soiler, took 24 percent between them, with Morrill running modestly ahead. With almost 33 percent of the reduced vote, Crosby ran only slightly better than he had a year earlier. More important, both the Whig and Democratic coalitions fragmented. While Crosby's net vote declined by only 2,000 between 1852 and 1853, analysis suggests that he retained only about 65 percent of his previous supporters. The balance split evenly between presumably wet defectors to Pillsbury and abstainers. Fragmentation of Hubbard's and Chandler's 1852 supporters was even more severe, as they divided among all the available candidates or joined the ranks of nonvoters. Results in the crucial legislative elections were just as chaotic. But the key fact was that after September, eleven senate seats remained to be filled by the successful senate candidates, and whoever won those senate seats could determine who became governor. 60

Jockeying for advantage began even before the senate met. Morrill's supporters among Democratic legislators vowed to support no one but him for governor. Nonetheless, Whig divisions were more portentous, for they forecast which Whigs would later abandon the party and which would not. Whigs who had no love for Crosby spoke of uniting all the proponents of the Maine Law, that is, the opponents of the Wildcat Democrats, into a new coalition that would back Morrill for governor, Fessenden for United States senator, and Crosby for state supreme court justice and thereby split the Democratic party forever. "The effect of a coalition will be destructive of the harmony of the Whig party," the panicked Crosby protested to Fessenden. "You & I must stand or fall together." If Fessenden's friends supported Morrill, he warned, "my friends, & that includes all the aspirants for state patronage, will feel themselves aggrieved," and their only satisfaction "will be in defeating you."

Fessenden's reply was frosty. Whigs' best strategy, he averred, was to combine all foes of the Wildcats, a goal with which his Whig allies like Israel Washburn, Jr., concurred. "Although I do not see that you and I must 'stand' together since your election by no means involves mine, yet a Whig governor is a good thing per se." Hence, he personally would not engage in any deals. Instead, he ambiguously wrote, he would work to carry "into effect the decrees of the Whig party to the best of my power."

Despite continuing suspicion between pro-Crosby and pro-Fessenden Whig legislators, by mid-February both men had won election. "We now have what no reasonable Whig could have expected, a Whig Administration & Whig Senator," exulted one of Fessenden's friends. Even he, however, admitted that Whigs' rift pointed to trouble ahead. Crosby and Fessenden were, in fact, supported by very different coalitions. In the senate, which had exclusive authority to pick the governor, Whigs split evenly between Crosby and Morrill, and Crosby won only with the support of Wildcat Democrats determined to defeat Morrill. In the joint-session's election of United States senator, in turn, Crosby's avenging friends, whom one Whig termed "wild cat Whigs" representing "the stationary conservatism of venerable Whig antiquity," refused to support Fessenden. He won only by combining Morrill Democrats and Free Soilers with the majority of Whigs against the Wildcats.⁶³

The rift widened in early 1854. Crosby and Fessenden disagreed about the party's future course. Crosby was now determined to give state jobs only to Whigs and only to his loyalists among them. Aware of his dependence on Morrill Democrats and determined to build a broader coalition against the anti-Maine Law Wildcats, Fessenden, in contrast, implored Crosby to appoint at least some Morrill men and above all not to remove Morrill himself from the state job he held. Even in victory, in sum, divisions between Whigs seeking a broader anti-Democratic coalition and those hoping to preserve an exclusive Whig party intensified. And while this contentious debate waxed in the early months of 1854, Congress was debating an even more controversial matter that exacerbated it—the Kansas-Nebraska bill.⁶⁴

If division marred Whigs' victory in Maine, a startling defeat stunned them in Vermont, which by 1852 had become northern Whigs' safest stronghold. There, as elsewhere, trouble erupted over the liquor issue. In late 1852, a coalition of Whig and Free Soil legislators, aided by some Democrats, passed an anti-liquor license law, not a full-fledged prohibition act. But two-fifths of Whig legislators, fearing a wet backlash, opposed the license law, and Whig papers denounced it. Whigs' nervousness increased when a popular referendum on the law passed by only 300 votes out of more than 44.000 cast. When Whigs renominated Governor Erastus Fairbanks in 1853, therefore, they tried to finesse the liquor issue by declaring "that this is not a party question, and never should be." Democrats, in contrast, flatly denounced the new license law as a Whig measure and called for its repeal. As elsewhere, therefore, the Free Soilers, who ran their own gubernatorial and legislative candidates and who had strongly supported the new law in the legislature, were the most clear-cut proponents of prohibition in the race. Furious at the backsliding by their own party, a few dry Whigs, led by prominent editor E. P. Walton, then endorsed the Free Soilers' gubernatorial candidate. Recognizing that their hope of wresting the legislature from the Whigs and thus electing the new United States senator depended upon cooperation with Democrats, however, Free Soilers refused to attack Democrats' antiliquor stance in what Whig Justin Morrill disgustedly called a "chicken-hearted" display. 65

By August, once-confident Whig leaders were deeply worried. Bulwarked by the funds and organizational resources of federal jobholders, Vermont's Democrats made their most vigorous effort in years. At the same time, overconfident Whigs seemed too complacent and dry Whigs too cross-pressured to vote at all. Even worse, wet Whigs who opposed the license law threatened to scratch Whig legislative candidates or "desert us for Rum openly" by voting Democratic. Efforts to awaken Whigs to the danger proved too little and too late. In September, Fairbanks got 2,600 fewer votes than a year earlier, reducing his share from 49.3 to 44.1 percent. Conversely, Democrats gained 3,000 votes, boosting their share from 31 to 38 percent. The Free Soil gubernatorial candidate lost about 1,000 votes between 1852 and 1853, and his percentage slipped from 19.6 to 17.5. Nonetheless, and more important, pro-Maine Law Free Soilers doubled their representation in the legislature and gained the balance of power between the two major parties. The chance of throwing Whigs out of power for the first time since the party's birth proved too tempting, and Free Soilers joined Democrats to elect Democrat John Robinson governor. Democrats, however, refused to send a Free Soiler to the Senate, and as a result the legislature failed to choose anyone to replace Whig Senator Samuel Phelps.⁶⁶

In Massachusetts, Whigs' other remaining New England bastion, prohibition became inextricably entwined with the Democratic/Free Soil Coalition's attempt to revise the state's constitution in 1853 because support for prohibition had a decidedly regional cast. When the state legislature passed a Maine Law in 1852, it was supported by Whigs and Coalition members from thinly populated western towns that were decidedly hostile to Boston and its growing Irish population. Opposition to the law came primarily from eastern Democrats sensitive to the views of their Irish and working-class constituencies. Whigs exploited Irish Catholics' antipathy toward the Coalition's nativism and the prohibition law to win the 1852 gubernatorial election, but they failed to defeat a referendum to call a constitutional convention long sought by the Coalition.⁶⁷

Whigs' lethargy and internal division over constitutional reform allowed the Coalition in March 1853 to elect the majority of delegates to that convention. They had two priorities: preserving the majority rule in statewide elections so that multiparty races for governor would almost always be thrown into the legislature, where the Coalition could bargain, and increasing the already disproportionate representation of small towns that were the heartland of Free Soil strength. These proposals were included in the constitution submitted to the electorate on the same day as the 1853 state election.

The constitution offended three groups. Irish Catholic Democrats from eastern Massachusetts opposed any increase in the strength of western Democrats and Free Soilers, who had inflicted the hated Maine Law on them and whom they quite properly regarded as bigoted enemies of their faith and mores. Pro-Compromise Democrats disliked anything that prolonged the Coalition, and a few weeks before the November election, Caleb Cushing, whom Pierce had appointed attorney general, tried to rally them against the constition and behind their own dissident ticket of National or Hunker Democratic candidates by issuing a public letter, quickly labeled the "Cushing ukase," which declared that Pierce's administration would no longer tolerate Democrats who cooperated with Free Soilers. Whigs, however, stood to lose most under the new constitution, which by increasing the representation of small towns would guarantee Coalition control of the legislature. Hence Whigs denounced the new constitution "as shameless a party manoevre as was ever concocted" and urged their supporters to defeat it. 69

Massachusetts Whigs, in sum, found a compelling new state issue around which the party rallied. Because dissident Democrats agreed with them about the constitution, they not only defeated it, they triumphed in the state elections as well. Total turnout dropped by about 14,000, including a 3,000-vote Whig decline, since 1852, but with almost 46 percent, Whig gubernatorial candidate Emory Washburn's plurality was slightly larger than John Clifford's a year earlier. Democrats ran second with 27 percent, and Free Soiler Henry Wilson, who garnered almost 8,000 fewer votes than Horace Mann in 1852, was third with 22.5 percent. The anti-Coalition Hunker candidate attracted less than 5 percent, but his 5,500 votes, drawn almost entirely from wet Democrats who had supported Clifford in 1852 and conservatives, proved crucial.

Had Whigs possessed modern statistical methods, they would have known that they retained more of their 1852 electorate than either Democrats or Free Soilers and that they gained more votes from other parties than those rivals. What Whigs could see was even more important. The presence of dissident Democratic legislative tickets deprived Democrats of some seats by preventing the necessary majorities and threw others to the Whigs. Whigs retained narrow control of the senate, and they increased their margin in the house over Hunker Democrats and Coalition members combined from ten to sixty-four seats. Washburn's elevation to the governorship was thus assured.⁷⁰

Best of all for Whigs, the new constitution lost by about 5,000 votes. Nearly unanimous opposition from the Whigs provided the biggest bloc of negative votes, but the margin of victory came from dissident Democrats and even a few Free Soilers. Seventy percent of the Hunker Democrats, approximately 3,900 men, voted against ratification. In Massachusetts, Democratic divisions, along with Whig unity behind a new state-oriented issue, produced Whigs' victory.⁷¹

Three other results of the Massachusetts election were portentous. First, Sumner blamed his new Senate colleague, Edward Everett, for leading the Whig charge against the constitution, a view that betokened trouble between the two when they went to Washington. Second, while Sumner called the defeat "a calamity to the Liberal cause," it had far more pragmatic implications for Sumner himself. Along with Cushing's ukase, it effectively finished the Massachusetts Coalition that put Sumner in the Senate. As a disconsolate pro-Coalition Democrat wrote Gideon Welles the follow February, "Cushing's ukase, aided by one or two other circumstances that would have been powerless without it, 'crushed out' the most genuine and hopeful democratic movement that was ever organized here." Sumner, that is, now lacked a secure base in the legislature, which would determine his reelection. He needed to revitalize antislavery sentiment, and as a United States senator he, quite unlike the small-fry politicos who wrote Seward, could make an issue of Freedom against Slavery when Congress met in 1854. Third, within Massachusetts the group credited with or blamed for the constitution's defeat was Irish Catholics in Boston and its environs. Their supposed responsibility, in turn, helped fan the embers of Massachusetts nativism into a conflagration.72

New York, where Whigs had been promoting state canal enlargement since 1851, produced northern Whigs' only other triumph in 1853, and as in Maine and Massachusetts, it depended primarily upon Democratic divisions. Though contention over canal expansion contributed to Democratic rifts, feuds between Hardshell Hunkers, led by ex-Senator Daniel S. Dickinson, and Softshells and their new Barnburner allies over the allocation of the party's nominations and appointments primarily caused them. Pierce's distribution of federal patronage pushed these disputes beyond the breaking point, and the two rival factions nominated their own state tickets in 1853.⁷³ Whigs knew that Pierce's blunders had handed them victory on a silver platter. "We are stronger today than we ever were before," wrote one Whig in June. "The trumps are all in our hands for this year and probably for many years to come." Even better, Whigs could again focus their campaign on canal expansion, which united them and divided Democrats since, in early 1853, Whig and Hard state legislators passed a constitutional amendment allowing the enlargement aimed at by the Nine Million Loan bill in 1851.

Getting "men of the right stamp" on the Whig ticket was the pothole on the comeback trail. Precisely because Democratic divisions meant that Whigs could win with only a fraction of their normal vote and precisely because control of the canal board now seemed more important than ever, the prospect of certain victory aggravated rather than mitigated Whigs' own internal divisions. Distrust between Silver Grays and Sewardites remained rancid after Scott's defeat, and in a few spring muncipal elections Silver Grays supported Democratic candidates to defeat Sewardite foes. As Whigs' October state convention approached, therefore, the rival factions jealously eyed each other. Both knew Whigs would "have control of the Canals," and therefore both wanted "men of the right stamp" on the Whig ticket.

Fearing that Weed intended to exclude them entirely from the state ticket, Silver Grays insisted that some of the slate go to their own men, such as George Babcock for comptroller or Daniel Ullmann for attorney general. If "Weed & Co exhibit their intolerance to the utmost extent" by "forcing obnoxious men on us," they vowed, they would refuse to vote or support the Hards. The prospect that Hards, who shared Silver Grays' antipathy toward antislavery men, would nominate a procanal ticket, indeed, provided defiant Silver Grays with such an attractive fallback position that in some localities they did not even bother to contest the selection of delegates to the Whig state convention. And if the Hard ticket proved unacceptable, some Silver Grays threatened, they would bring out a separate ticket of their own that would get Hard support. "In either way," predicted John C. Spencer before the Democrats formally split, "the nucleus of a new and honest party that can work together, will be formed."

Sewardites welcomed an intraparty brawl. "I would go in with all my soul to put Greyism out of the party," declared one. "A glorious opportunity to vindicate the Whig party & remove from it the crushing weight of the Baltimore platform will be lost unless the plainest & [most] outspoken resolutions be passed," wrote another. "We can do so now with safety—let Silver Grays join the Hunkers—the Whig party will be vastly stronger internally & externally without them." The course to "complete victory" was "plain and simple," urged still another Sewardite. "Make no compromise with slavery beyond the strict letter of the Constitution and eschew all sympathy with the treacherous Silver Grays."

Much to the consternation of Silver Grays, allies of Seward and Weed easily dominated the convention, but neither Weed nor Seward wanted to alienate Silver Grays by reaffirming the party's hostility to the Fugitive Slave Act. Under Weed's guidance, the platform was completely silent on the slavery issue and the divisive prohibition question. It instead emphasized canal enlargement. Weed also adroitly arranged a superficially balanced state ticket, even to the point of angering followers who complained that antislavery Whigs had resurrected, not crushed, Silver Grays with the ticket.⁷⁸

Despite apathy caused by overconfidence, residual Silver Gray disaffection, and confusion caused by the volatile Maine Law question in legislative races, Whigs, as Washington Hunt predicted, elected their "state ticket & Legislature very easy." Democrats lost thirty-eight seats in the house, and their remaining contingent was evenly divided between Hards and Softs. The Whig share of seats soared from 33 to 61 percent, and in the senate it jumped from 50 to 72 percent. The entire Whig state ticket also won, causing one Seward lieutenant to rejoice: "I congratulate you on the result of the Election. Another 1840 seems to be approaching—1837 has already returned."

The scope of Whig gains in the legislature between 1852 and 1853 resembled that between 1836 and 1837, but this glowing comparison was misguided. In 1837 and 1838 Whigs triumphed in New York and elsewhere because new voters surged into their party, not because of Democratic divisions. In contrast, turnout in New York plunged from 84 percent in 1852 to only 59 percent in 1853, and victorious statewide Whig candidates attracted some 81,000 fewer votes (33.5 percent) than the defeated Hunt had a year earlier. Statewide, moreover, Whig candidates won with less than 44 percent of the vote, while Hard and Soft candidates evenly split almost 52 percent between them. Both significant Silver Gray defections to the Hard ticket and heavy abstention by 1852 Whig voters contributed to the depressed Whig total that year.⁸⁰

Democratic divisions and hope of directing canal enlargement, in sum, brought Whigs victory in the nation's largest state. But even their triumph revealed the toll taken by internal division and apathy. Whigs might crow about majorities in the legislature "quite as large as any good Whig could desire" and about the absence of anything "to prevent our holding the State for some time," but Silver Grays' action pointed to a quite different future. Even before the votes were cast, Fillmore, who urged his friends to support the ticket, noted that New York politics were "in a snarl" and that only Democratic divisions made Whig victory certain. That triumph, he added, would "disorganize the Whig party as the democrats are now disorganized" since "Woollies" would control the state administration and proscribe "'Silver Grays' or National Whigs" from all state jobs.⁸¹

VIII

Quite unlike Whigs in Massachusetts and New York, those in Pennsylvania and New Jersey failed to develop a compelling issue in 1853, and they suffered the consequences. The difference between the fortunes of Pennsylvania's and New York's Whigs is especially puzzling, for not only were Pennsylvania Democrats' divisions potentially as explosive as Democratic rifts in New York, but Pennsylvania's economy also resembled New York's. With its Main Line Canal system, newly completed Pennsylvania Railroad, and numerous other railroads under construction, its commercial center of Philadelphia, its extensive coal mining areas, and its iron foundries, glass factories, and textile mills, Pennsylvania was one of the nation's three most economically complex and advanced states. Both the legislature's agenda and Bigler's correspondence in 1852–53 indicate that concrete economic policies concerning banks, coal-mining companies, and railroads generated intense interest around the state. Yet Whigs' failure to define a distinctive and unifying state economic issue was emphasized by their insipid single-sentence 1853 state platform: "The Whigs of Pennsylvania adhere steadfastly to the cherished and often avowed principles of their party." That meaningless statement, growled Pittsburgh's major Whig paper, "measurably weakened" party ties and produced "indifference and apathy" in "the public mind." ⁸²

Given the cornucopia of economic issues in the state legislature and the rifts among Democrats, what prevented Pennsylvania's Whigs from mounting a campaign in 1853 as compelling as that of their New York neighbors? One answer is that Pennsylvanians would elect only a canal commissioner and state legislators that year. More important, the complex public policy questions associated with a modern economy defied exploitation by statewide political parties, quite unlike expansion of the Erie Canal system, which was a state, not a private, responsibility. Questions involving railroads and coal companies generated intense interest, but it was highly localized in individual communities. Railroad policy aligned region against region, not party against party.

Banking policy seemed an exception to this pattern, and in 1853 legislative roll-call votes on banking and currency generated levels of partisan conflict reminiscent of those of the 1840s prior to the California gold strikes. But that conflict was misleading. By the early 1850s, Pennsylvania's Democrats sharply divided over banking. New charters passed the legislature with considerable Democratic support, only to be vetoed by Governor Bigler. Attempts to override those vetoes polarized the parties against each other and thus camouflaged the considerable Democratic support for the original bills.⁸³

Unable to find a compelling state economic platform in the 1853 legislative session and fully aware of apathy among their supporters, Pennsylvania's Whigs in the summer tried to manufacture a statewide issue by demanding sale of the state's Mainline Canal system to private investors, but Democrats refused to take the bait and oppose such a sale. In this void, Whig legislative candidates in certain localities like Pittsburgh committed themselves to passage of a Maine Law to mobilize votes. Where Whigs did not, independent protemperance tickets challenged them. As elsewhere, prohibition divided both Democrats and Whigs internally, and its injection into the race confounded everyone's calculations.⁸⁴

This crazy-quilt pattern paralyzed some Whig voters and drove others, along with some Democrats, to splinter parties. The issueless statewide contest for canal commissioner brought out barely half of the potential electorate, and Whigs won barely two-fifths of the cast votes, the worst showing in the party's history. Apathy clearly afflicted Whigs more than Democrats. Since the hotly contested and unsuccessful campaign for William F. Johnston's reelection in 1851, the Whig vote had plunged by 60,000 (33.7 percent), while the Democrats had lost only 33,600 (18 percent). Measured against the lower-profile race for canal commissioner in October 1852, Whig turnout declined by 33,664 votes (22.2 percent) compared to a Democratic loss of only 18,684 (10.9 percent). Even worse, over 7,700 Native Americans still backed their own canal candidate rather than the Whig, Native Americans won four of five legislative seats from Philadelphia County, and an Independent pro-Maine Law ticket, whose stated goal was "to break down for once the power of party organization in this city," swept all of eight of Philadelphia City's normally Whig assembly seats. When the smoke had cleared, Whigs were reduced to a pathetic 26 of 100 seats in the house and a fourvote minority in the senate.85

As in Pennsylvania, the economic questions pressing upon New Jersey's government were far too complex for partisan exploitation. The cross-cutting impact of railroad legislation, taxes, and other state economic issues had long since split the once-dominant Whigs and toppled them from power.86 The gubernatorial and legislative elections of 1853 further punctuated their disarray. After the crushing losses of 1852, some Whig papers and politicos in New Jersey concluded that "the Whigs are a used up party," an organization barely "breathing the breath of life."87 Desperate to revive the vigor of their moribund party. Whigs in 1853 tried to combine prohibitionists, nativists who had bitterly opposed Scott, and remaining Whig voters interested in economic projects blocked by the Camden and Amboy Railroad into a new, potentially broader coalition. They did so, however, in hopelessly inept fashion, for their platform ignored the liquor question completely and instead stressed the antimonopoly issue, on which Joel Haywood, their gubernatorial candidate, a favorite of the state's small Native American party, and a strong prohibitionist, was unfit to run since he had been a consistent supporter of the Joint Companies.88

A chaotic race ensued. Democrats pilloried Haywood as a prohibitionist fanatic and an anti-immigrant bigot. Whig legislative candidates stressed different issues in different parts of the state. Democratic legislative candidates endorsed a Maine Law where prohibitionist sentiment was strong. And temperance men, who distrusted Whigs' commitment to prohibition because of their platform's silence, successfully ran independent legislative tickets in some counties. Although Haywood carried lightly populated southern New Jersey, where antimonopoly and prohibitionist sentiment was most intense, he lost northern New Jersey, where immigrants were concentrated and opposition to prohibition was strongest. Statewide he got 47.4 percent of the vote, only a slight improvement over his defeated predecessor in 1850, and Whigs remained a powerless minority in the legislature.⁸⁹

IX

However dismal, northern Whigs' performance in 1853 did not drastically reduce Whig strength in Congress. They lost four House seats in New England, to be sure, and Vermont's surprising defeat temporarily cost them another Senate seat. Even in Vermont, however, Free Soilers and Democrats had failed to elect a U.S. senator, and elsewhere, as in Ohio or California, sitting Democratic or Free Soil United States senators, not Whigs, were most affected by the results of legislative elections. Northern Whigs, in sum, could still hope to increase their representation in Washington in 1854, when the great majority of northern states held congressional elections.

The preservation of the Whig party as a competitive national organization depended far more upon the southern than the northern elections of 1853, since many House and important Senate seats were at stake. In addition, a much larger proportion of southern than northern Whigs had refused to vote in 1852. The South's 1853 state and congressional elections thus posed a crucial test of the party's ability to restore their allegiance. Though unquestionably ominous, the wipeout in Virginia's May congressional elections could be attributed to Democrats' traditional strength there. Virginia had also voted before the expected Democratic dissensions had time to fester or demoralized Whigs had time to regroup. What happened later in Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina, where Whigs remained strongly competitive, and in Georgia, where they had once been powerful, would provide a more accurate gauge of the party's future. Without the albatross of Winfield Scott, could southern Whigs rebound?

Although many Southerners favored the Maine Law, prohibitionism and anti-Catholicism played a lesser role in most southern congressional and state elections than in the North. Maryland was the only slave state where the Catholic clergy joined their northern counterparts in attempting to raid public school taxes to fund parochial schools. Outside of Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, and Louisiana, Catholics and immigrants were not numerous enough to arouse much concern—at least in 1853. In most southern states, therefore, feuds among Democrats had the greatest influence on the 1853 elections. Unfortunately for Whigs, they usually were not enough to help them win.

Missouri was a marked exception to this rule. Under the congressional reapportionment that took effect in 1852, Missouri was entitled to seven federal representatives. Since the legislature had not yet drawn up new districts by the time of the August elections that year, Missouri elected only five congressmen, two of whom were Whigs and another, Thomas Hart Benton. In August 1853, therefore, Missouri had two additional House seats to fill. Benton's impending return to Congress shattered the majority Democrats once again along pro- and anti-Benton lines, and Whigs consequently won both seats. Thus, when the Thirty-Third Congress met in December, Whigs controlled four of seven House seats and a senatorship from one of the most solidly Democratic states in the nation.

Democratic divisions over congressional candidates also portended Whig gains in Maryland, where discipline among both parties began to break down in 1851 after ratification of the state's new constitution. "I was mortified to find so much disorganization in Maryland... owing entirely to domestic contestions," one appalled Democratic observer reported to Washington in October 1853. But Whig organization proved little better, and failing to exploit a glorious opportunity, they elected only two of six congressmen in 1853 compared to four of six in 1851. Maryland's gubernatorial election in 1853 featured a straight-out race between Democrat Thomas Ligon and the recently retired Whig Congressman Richard Bowie. Both Democrats and Whigs predicted their man would win, but Democratic unity carried the day. Exploiting Democratic divisions over prohibition, however, Whigs won both houses of the legislature for the first time since 1849 and all the offices on the state ticket other than governor.

Prohibition's impact on Maryland's elections bears emphasis. In the fourth congressional district, "a Maine Liquor Law organization" threw its support to Thomas Walsh, the only incumbent Whig from the Thirty-Second Congress to seek reelection in 1853. Yet that support did not spare Walsh from defeat and may have contributed to it by causing a few hundred Whig wets to shift to his rival, who claimed to be an Independent Democrat, not a regular Democrat. Democration of likely, the temperance endorsement meant little to dries, since Congress had no jurisdiction over liquor. By running separate tickets in heavily Democratic Baltimore and fusing with Whigs elsewhere, however, prohibitionists helped Whigs win state offices. At the same time, third-party legislative tickets, like the proliferation of independent congressional candidates, demonstrated how extensively anti-incumbent, antiparty sentiment pervaded Maryland. "The result of the elections," the Baltimore American accurately observed, "shows with great significance the abatement of party feeling, and the difficulty of organization under party banners."

Although some Kentucky Whigs were ready to abandon their party by the summer of 1853, others, buoyed by Scott's victory in the state and their success in a special 1852 congressional election to replace Humphrey Marshall, looked forward confidently to August's congressional and legislative elections. Unlike Maryland, where only one of four Whig incumbents sought reelection to Congress in 1853, for example, three of Kentucky's five incumbents ran. In addition, Clement S. Hill, who had lost the fifth district in 1851, reentered the fray. Most important, in the eighth district, former congressman and governor Robert P. Letcher, now back from a stint as minister to Mexico, contested Democratic upstart John C. Breckinridge, who had usurped that former banner Whig district in 1851. However demoralized Whigs elsewhere seemed, in short, Kentucky's displayed the old fighting spirit.

Spirit without compelling issues, however, was not enough.⁹⁴ As they had since 1834, Whigs carried both chambers of the legislature. Yet they won only fifty-five house seats, exactly the same as their 1851 total and the smallest number controlled by Whigs since the party's formation in 1834. They did pick up two additional senate seats, yet, with the exception of 1851, their share of senators was the lowest since 1838. Despite the strong slate of congressional candidates, moreover, Whigs again won only five of ten House seats. Though Letcher attracted almost 1,000 more votes than Leslie Combs in 1851, he also lost to Breckinridge, the Democrats' new star. Elsewhere too, Democrats seemed on the rise. While the statewide Whig total increased by almost 5,000 votes (9.8 percent) between 1851 and 1853, the Democratic total grew by 12,000 (24 percent), and in 1853 Democrats ran almost 7,000 votes ahead of Whigs in the state as a whole. Tradition, in sum, kept Whigs securely in power, but they failed to roll back the gains Democrats had been making since 1848.⁹⁵

Tennessee was the other slave state carried by Scott, but as 1853 opened, its Whigs were far less sanguine than Kentucky's about August's gubernatorial, congressional, and legislative elections. On the one hand, their 1852 reapportionment of the congressional and state legislative districts seemed to give them a clear edge over the Democrats, and the program of railroad aid and a free banking law they had enacted were popular, especially in East Tennessee. On the other hand, those achievements exhausted the party's state agenda, and they lacked compelling state issues for 1853.96

Ironically, moreover, the reapportionment that Whigs expected to help them control the state for a decade also fomented Whig rifts. Many legislative districts were now so securely Whig that several Whig aspirants ran, thereby threatening to allow Democrats to win with pluralities. More important, to drive Democrat Andrew Johnson from Congress, the Henrymander added the heaviest Whig counties from the old second district to Johnson's first district. Whig Congressmen Albert G. Watkins, who represented the second district in the Thirty-Second Congress, lived in one of the transferred counties, and he refused to stand down in favor of the Whig candidate preferred by the old first district's Whigs. Consequently, two Whig candidates ran in the new first district in 1853, and by dividing the heavy Whig majority, they allowed a Democrat to win with only 37 percent of the vote. The reapportionment did succeed in forcing Johnson not to seek reelection, but that freed him to become the Democrats' gubernatorial candidate instead.⁹⁷

Leadership feuds also split the Whigs. Endemic jealousies among prominent Whigs from the state's three main geographical regions—West, Middle, and East Tennessee—seemed sure to flare again over the choice of a gubernatorial nominee and when the legislature elected in August tried to fill John Bell's Senate seat. The refusal of Congressmen Meredith Gentry and Christopher Williams to endorse the national ticket in 1852 was a new source of intraparty rancor. To the dismay of their supporters, neither won renomination in 1853, and Gentry, for one, blamed Bell for stirring up opinion against him, thereby jeopardizing Bell's reelection to the Senate. What made these resentments all the more threatening is that the only prominent Whig whom all factions trusted, Governor William B. Campbell, refused to run again.98 Without an obvious gubernatorial candidate, Whigs first approached Gustavus A. Henry of Middle Tennessee, the party's most effective stump speaker, but he initially refused on the grounds that he had already exhausted himself crisscrossing the state as a presidential elector in 1852.99 Late in the spring, however, Henry relented and agreed to run, believing that his Democratic opponent Johnson, known for his rough-hewn mannerisms and lack of formal education, was vulnerable on a number of fronts, "I will ruin him." boasted Henry. 100

Although Whigs regarded Johnson as an "arch demagogue" who lacked the education to be governor, Johnson in fact possessed superb political instincts. Even the overconfident Henry eventually admitted that Johnson was "as smart a fellow as I have met in many a day." As early as December 1852 Johnson sensed the antiparty, antipolitician mood emerging across the nation, and to capitalize on it he had preferred to be run for governor as a People's candidate without a formal convention nomination. His demand for reapportioning the legislature exclusively on the basis of the white population appealed to the nonslaveholder majorities in East Tennessee. In 1852, moreover, the legislature passed a state constitutional amendment providing for the popular election of all judges in Tennessee, and the referendum on that amendment coincided with the gubernatorial poll in August. Johnson vigorously endorsed the amendment for "bringing the government nearer to the people, as originally designed by our republican ancestors." Like so many politicians since the days of Andrew Jackson, in sum, Johnson posed as the paladin of republicanism, the champion of popular self-government. He, not Henry, defined the winning issue. 101

The gubernatorial contest was close. Henry ran some 2,300 votes behind Campbell in 1851 and lost to Johnson by the same margin. Defections in East Tennessee proved crucial. Campbell attributed them to the popularity of the white basis among nonslaveholders. Henry blamed vote swapping by friends of Whig legislative candidates and, in the first congressional district, of the rival Whig congressional candidates. Whigs, he fumed, agreed to vote for Johnson in return for Democratic votes for the Whig legislative and congressional candidates they preferred. "I was regarded as a sort of merchandise on the market & vended to the highest bidder," howled Henry. However accurate Henry's analysis, Whigs did retain control of the legislature, although even the Henrymander did not prevent their losing the senate by one seat. 102

When the Henrymander became law in 1852, Governor Campbell rejoiced that it ensured Whigs seven of the state's ten congressional districts. In 1853, however, Whigs won only five, a net gain of one over 1851. In the "safe" first district, where rival Whig candidates squandered the chance to take Johnson's old seat, moreover, the death of the successful Democrat allowed Whigs to carry it in a special election early in 1854. And in the new tenth district, they came within 6 votes, out of over 10,000 cast, of unseating incumbent Democrat Frederick Stanton. Of the Whig victors, the most important were the incumbent William Cullom, Emerson Etheridge, who ran unopposed in the new ninth district, Nashville editor Felix K. Zollicoffer, and Charles Ready.

No sooner had the polls closed than Whigs divided over the impending selection of United States senator. Like Kentucky's Archibald Dixon after his defeat in 1851, Henry demanded the Senate seat as reward for his sacrifice of time and health during the grueling gubernatorial campaign. Henry's ambition frightened the incumbent Bell. Both came from Middle Tennessee, and Henry's challenge, along with Meredith Gentry's bitter opposition, could divide Bell's support there, opening the way for a claimant from East Tennessee like Thomas A. R. Nelson. Nelson had lost the other Senate seat to Jones in 1851, and he could justly assert that he merited the party's nomination since Middle and West Tennessee had controlled the plums for years and since East Tennessee Whigs needed party recognition to offset Democrats' selection of Johnson for governor. 103

An exhausting marathon ensued. Whigs would not unite behind a single candidate, and forty-nine ballots were required before Bell was reelected. Even then, he owed his success to Democratic supporters of A. O. P. Nicholson, who sought to stop the Democrat Aaron V. Brown from exploiting the Whig rift to seize the seat. ¹⁰⁴ Bell's reelection meant that Tennessee's Whigs would have both senators and five representatives when Congress opened in December. Its size, but especially its behavior, made Tennessee's the most exceptional southern Whig delegation in that body.

Elsewhere in Dixie, Whigs' fortunes were dismal. An attempt by North Carolina's Whig congressional candidates to resurrect the call for distribution of federal land revenues to the states to fund expansion of North Carolina's railroad network did little good. Whigs elected only three of eight congressman in 1853 compared to six of nine in 1851. Veteran Whig Congressman David Outlaw went down to defeat, and other experienced Whig incumbents like Edward Stanly, Joseph Caldwell, and Alfred Dockery refused even to seek reelection. Altogether, Whig candidates attracted only 32,000 votes, less than two-fifths of the total and far less than they had won in either August or November 1852. Coupled with a loss of a United States Senate seat because of the legislative stalemate, Whigs' dominance of the state's congressional delegation had ended. The Whigs' slump extended to Louisiana, where Theodore G. Hunt was the only victor among four Whig congressional candidates, whose proportion of the popular vote was smaller than that won by Winfield Scott, and where Whig representation in the state legislature slumped from 58 to 38 percent in the house and from 53 to 37 percent in the senate. And in Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, the question was not whether the Whigs would decline, but whether the Whig party could be revived after the successful bipartisan Union coalitions of 1851 dissolved in 1852.

The history of Alabama's Whigs can be briefly told. The old two-party lines did not reemerge in 1853; instead, fragmentation that weaned former Whigs away from their old allegiance continued. Whig voters placed a priority on defeating the more obnoxious Democrat in multicandidate congressional and legislative races, not on electing Whigs. The strength of the Whig party itself was best illustrated in the gubernatorial election. There a Whig named Earnest opposed the new champion of the Jacksonian faith, John A. Winston, as well as a dissident Union Democrat. Winston won with 65 percent of the vote. Polling fewer than 10,000 votes, Earnest ran second with 20 percent. The Alabama Whig party had effectively evaporated. 106

In contrast to Alabama, Mississippi's Whigs initially made a vigorous effort to revive the party in 1853. Never had Mississippi so "required a thorough organization of the friends of law, order, and good government," the party's organ intoned from Jackson in January. "By the united action of the good old Whig party, the State may yet" be redeemed. In calling for a state Whig convention in June, the Whig executive committee stressed traditional Whig issues like state funding for internal improvements and repayment of the long-repudiated Planters' Bank bonds. Even earlier, two self-nominated Whigs entered the race for state judge against Charles D. Fontaine, the Democratic candidate, and other Whigs presented themselves for the governorship, the congressional seats, and the legislature.¹⁰⁷

Then, as had so often been the case during the history of the Whig party, Democratic decisions reshaped Whig actions. Democrats split at their May state convention. Eager to reclaim his old Senate seat, which became vacant in March 1853, Union Governor Henry S. Foote insisted as the price of his reentry into the Democratic fold that the party commit itself to his election and split the state ticket evenly between Union and Southern Rights Democrats. When the convention refused to submit to such extortion, Foote stormed out and vowed to back legislative candidates who were former Unionists, whether Whigs or Democrats, and who might support his Senate candidacy. While Democrats nominated a Southern Rights man for governor, they nonetheless named Union men for state treasurer, secretary of state, and an at-large congressional seat. 108

Furious at this leniency toward Union men, Southern Rights Democrats denied renomination to all three Union Democrats who had won congressional seats in 1851. Meanwhile Congressman Albert Gallatin Brown, the lone Southern Rights Democrat to resist the Unionist tide in 1851, declined renomination, secured the candidacy for his friend Wiley P. Harris, announced that he sought the Senate seat coveted by Foote, and pledged to campaign across the state to see that anti-Foote Democrats got into the legislature.¹⁰⁹ Nominally, in sum, the governorship, five House seats, and the legislature were at stake in Mississippi's election, but popular attention focused on the race between Brown and Foote for the Senate seat the new legislature would fill.

With the Democrats resplitting along Union/Southern Rights lines, Mississippi's Whigs abandoned their attempt to resurrect the state party on economic issues and opportunistically seized the chance to reforge the triumphant bipartisan Union coalition of 1851. The Whig state convention in June eschewed separate nominations and merely recommended Whigs who had already nominated themselves. Whig papers denounced "the spirit of party," called for the election of "pure patriots, without regard to old party distinctions," and endorsed Foote for the Senate. In two congressional districts, Whig conventions nominated the incumbent Union Democrats, whom their party had spurned, as Whig candidates, and even one of Charles Fontaine's Whig opponents appealed for Democrats' votes on the "no party . . . ground of long acquaintance and superior qualification."

Whigs' tack toward nonpartisanship almost succeeded. With 46 percent of the vote, their gubernatorial candidate ran better than any Whig since 1841. Nevertheless, his total fell about 2,000 votes short of Foote's in 1851, while the Democrat John McRae ran 4,000 votes ahead of Jefferson Davis that year. Some, but not all, Union Democrats, in short, supported the Whigs. Similarly, the two Union Democrats whom Whigs had adopted as their own congressional candidates came achingly close to winning, and Whig candidates also ran respectably in a third district and in the statewide, at-large race. The fact remains, however, that Whigs lost all five House seats and the governorship, and in the legislative races, the key elections in 1853, Whigs slipped back to their traditional minority status. The new Democratic majority would send Brown to the Senate in January 1854. What proved to be Mississippi's Whigs' last gasp came up short even when they shed their Whig clothes for the garb of Unionism.¹¹¹

Georgia's Whigs fared no better, but their most influential leaders renounced any connection to the old Whig party even more emphatically. "If the Whig party is incapable of rising to the same standard of notoriety as the motley crew, which offers peace under the name of the Democracy," growled the intransigent Toombs in December 1852, "it is entitled to no resurrection [and] it will have none!" Toombs' ally Alexander Stephens was equally determined to smother the rebirth of Georgia's Whig party. Undeterred by Howell Cobb's warning that "a reorganization of the Union party" was "impracticable," Stephens sought exactly that. Thus the Georgia papers loyal to Stephens and Toombs pressed for a reunion between Whig regulars, who had grudgingly supported Scott, and the anti-Scott Whigs on a Union party, not a Whig party, basis.¹¹²

Not all Whigs who had rallied behind the national ticket in 1852 accepted this arrangement, especially allies of ex-Senator John M. Berrien. They implored Berrien in the spring to run for governor in 1853 so that the Whig party, not a Union party, could be reorganized behind his candidacy. Their rationale for calling on the aged statesman, aside from hatred of Stephens and Toombs, was the implausible argument that Berrien, a Savannah resident who had not contested a popular election for thirty years, could get more votes than any other Whig in the upcountry, traditionally Democratic Cherokee district. Berrien, who possibly saw through this nonsense or knew that Stephens and Toombs were grooming his kinsman and closest political ally, Charles Jenkins, for the Union gubernatorial nomination, refused to tilt at windmills. Efforts to resurrect a Whig party thus failed.¹¹³

Most delegates at the Whig state convention in June opposed any reunification with the national Whig party. Stephens wrote its address to the electorate, and the splenetic Toombs composed the platform. Among other things, they denounced both the Whig and Democratic parties as faithless to their pledges on the economy and public lands and insisted that the maintenance of the Georgia platform and the promotion of the interests of Georgia's citizens were more important than any national party. The gubernatorial candidate Jenkins had not only written the Georgia Platform and run for vice president on the Webster ticket. During the campaign he repudiated "for himself and party all alliances with national parties." Pierce's appointment of Free Soilers and secessionists, he argued, revealed the Democrats' unreliability on the Compromise's finality, and the continued dominance of Sewardites among northern Whigs tainted that party too. "I maintain that the best hope of the country is the promotion of a new National Conservative party."

Jenkins openly bid for former Union Democrats' support, a strategy ostensibly abetted by the Southern Rights background of his Democratic opponent, Herschel Johnson. Yet Johnson vigorously denied that he sought secession. He denounced the Union party as a Whig wolf in sheep's clothing. He blamed Jenkins for destroying the old Union party, and he accused him of elitist hostility to the political rights of the poor, a charge to which Jenkins was particularly vulnerable. Johnson also shrewdly fanned the hostility of Whig regulars who had supported Scott by emphasizing Jenkins' role on the Webster ticket in 1852. For at least two months after Jenkins' nomination, indeed, Scott Whigs continued to implore Berrien to enter the race as the Whig candidate since Jenkins renounced that affiliation. Only a public letter from Berrien endorsing Jenkins in September stopped those pleas, but even then Whig suspicion of Jenkins as an apostate may have cost him the election. 115

With over 47,000 votes, almost triple the count for Scott and within 400 of Zachary Taylor's 1848 total, Jenkins drew more support than any Whig in the history of state elections. Still, he ran some 500 votes behind Johnson. Though Jenkins drew more votes than any other Whig ever had in the Cherokee district, statewide he ran some 10,000 votes behind Cobb in 1851, clear evidence that many Union Democrats, like Cobb himself, had returned to the Democratic fold. Jenkins blamed his loss on Johnson's demagogic use of the "Algerine Law" issue, low Whig turnout in southwestern Georgia, where there were few Whig papers to spread his message or print Whig ballots, and the inveterate hostility of Scott Whigs. Estimates of voter movement between the 1852 presidential election and the 1853 election suggest, indeed, that one-fourth of the 16,000 Whigs who cast Scott ballots abstained in 1853. They also indicate that less than a tenth of Pierce's supporters defected to Jenkins. 116

Jenkins' opposition to prohibition, as Stephens worried, may also have hurt him. Jenkins complained that in many legislative districts with Union majorities, Union Whigs ran rival temperance and antitemperance legislative candidates. With no legislative candidates of their own in those districts, Democrats promised to vote for the Whig legislative candidate their Whig friends backed in return for those Whig votes for Johnson. This tactic may have helped defeat Jenkins, but it also helped Whigs achieve a very respectable performance in the legislative races. Union Whigs won half of the senate and 45 percent of the house. 117

To dissociate themselves from Whiggery and reforge a bipartisan Union party, Georgia's Whigs also refused to run congressional candidates against two Democratic/Union incumbents who now ran as Democrats. Of the six other Whig Union candidates, only two—Stephens and David Reese—won election, although several other races were exceptionally tight. Still, the effort to resurrect a bipartisan Union party had clearly failed. Union votes had come almost exclusively from former Whigs, and they had not been enough to bring the relabeled party back to power. By the end of 1853 even Stephens, who still wanted no part of Whiggery, conceded the hopelessness of preserving a separate Union party in Georgia. 118

Like their northern counterparts, in sum, southern Whigs failed to come back in 1853 and instead fell further behind the Democrats. The defeat in Tennessee removed the last southern Whig governor, and with the losses in Wisconsin and Vermont, Whig governors served in only two of thirty-one states—Maine and Massachusetts. After the 1853 elections, Whigs controlled both houses of the legislature in only two of fifteen southern states—Maryland and Kentucky. In contrast, Democrats had complete control in nine. By another index, of the twenty-eight southern state houses and senates for which data from the elections of 1852 and 1853 are available, Whigs constituted less than 40 percent in fifteen.¹¹⁹

In 1853, Whigs also lost an aggregate of nine House seats in Virginia, North Carolina, Maryland, Kentucky, Louisiana, and Alabama, almost half the total they had elected from those states in 1851. The net gain of three seats from Missouri and Tennessee could not compensate for those losses. In the Thirty-Third Congress, Whigs would hold only twelve of the thirty Senate seats from the South—thirteen if the fiery Toombs were considered a Whig. Of ninety-one slave-state representatives, only twenty-three (25 percent) were Whigs, and three of those had been elected as Union Whigs. ¹²⁰ Like northern Whigs, in sum, southern Whigs were in desperate shape at the end of 1853.

X

Thus, Whigs' search for compelling state or national issues in 1853 usually failed. In the Deep South their revival of the Union issue brought Whig voters back to the polls and restored the anti-Democratic opposition to respectability, at least in Mississippi and Georgia. But it did not help most Whig congressional candidates win, and it necessitated renunciation of the Whig name and the existing national Whig party. A quixotic demand for distribution of federal land revenues could not stop Whig defeat in North Carolina or Tennessee. Canal expansion in New York and opposition to the new state constitution in Massachusetts proved successful state issues, but in those states, like Maine, Whigs also depended on Democratic divisions. In Kentucky, Whigs relied on traditional strength and prestigious candidates, not compelling issues, to hold power, but Democrats made the greater gains among the electorate. In California and New Jersey, finally, Whigs exploited popular anger at incumbent Democratic regimes to remain respectably competitive minorities—but minorities nonetheless.

In most states, Whigs either failed to find a distinctive issue and lost votes through abstention or took the unpopular side of issues made by others and suffered defection. Strikingly, only in New Jersey did the head of the Whig state ticket take an uncompromisingly favorable position on the Maine Law. Elsewhere Whigs who gave only tepid endorsement, remained resolutely silent on the liquor question, or actively opposed prohibition paid a terrible price for those stances.

In Wisconsin, Ohio, Vermont, and Connecticut, Free Soilers salvaged their own party and threatened to eclipse the Whigs by seizing the issue. In Tennessee and Georgia, pro-Maine Law Whigs supported Democratic gubernatorial candidates in order to get prohibitionist Whigs into the legislature. In Michigan, Pennsylvania, Maryland, New York, New Jersey, and elsewhere, independent temperance tickets confused state and local elections. In most states, indeed, anger at incumbents was not channeled through the Whig party. Instead, splinter tickets siphoned off Whig voters by demanding clean government, the ouster of spoilsmen, the repudiation of Catholics, and the implementation or evisceration of antiliquor laws.

The seepage of some Whig voters toward new parties and the abstention of many more meant that popular allegiance to the Whig party was far weaker at the end than at the start of 1853. Well might Whig leaders who hoped to preserve the party thus look with relief to the opening of the Thirty-Third Congress in December. With its huge Democratic majorities, that Congress had always been the trump card for Whigs who wanted to stand pat during 1853. They expected those Democratic majorities to divide over confirmation of Pierce's controversial appointees and to do something that offended the electorate and sent them racing back to the Whig party to punish and oust the offenders. They expected the Democrats to create the winning issue they themselves had been unable to find in 1853, an issue against which all Whigs would rally.

Whigs hopeful of reviving the party were not the only political actors who eagerly looked to the new congressional session. So did Democrats, who, despite easy triumphs in most states, fissured along various lines during 1853. Animosity among former Union and Southern Rights Democrats in Mississippi and Alabama was almost as fierce as that between pro- and anti-Benton Democrats in Missouri, Hards and Softs in New York, and Wildcats and Maine Law Democrats in Maine. Protestant and Catholic Democrats warred in Michigan, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. Independent tickets, devoted to breaking the power of party organizations, cut into the Democratic vote in those states and Maryland as well. Everywhere, moreover, anger at Pierce's patronage allocation exacerbated intraparty tensions, and an effort to prevent Senate confirmation of many appointees seemed certain. Many incensed Democrats, indeed, looked to the meeting of Congress primarily as an opportunity to humiliate the administration.

Though Whig feebleness camouflaged Democratic difficulties in most states, the Democratic party too seemed to stand at the brink of disintegration, and Democratic leaders knew it. Like the Whigs, moreover, they instinctively recognized that only a revival of traditional interparty conflict over concrete policies could halt intraparty fragmentation. The best way to reunite the fractious party in Pennsylvania, a Pittsburgh Democrat wrote Caleb Cushing in July, was for Pierce to launch a policy initiative "that will raise invective from the other side and compel us to quit our domestic squabbles." The Democratic party would be "shivered to atoms," a St. Louis Democrat warned Illinois Senator Stephen A. Douglas in December, unless Pierce or the Democratic majority in Congress promptly marked "out a line of sound national and Democratic policy." Only the "boldest and most decided action can turn the current." Douglas needed no such warning. A month before receiving this letter, he wrote an Illinois lieutenant that "the party is in a distracted condition & it requires all our wisdom, prudence, & energy to consolidate its power and perpetuate its principles. $^{\prime\prime}$ He intended to provide that necessary leadership when Congress met in December. 121

Whig proponents of a new Union party also looked eagerly to the new Congress to hasten the alliance between conservative Whigs and Democrats that had failed to gel during 1853 itself. The Whigs' continued erosion at the polls, indeed, increased such advocates' numbers. Not privy to Democratic plans to heal that party's divisions with partisanly distinctive policy initiatives, such Whigs were fully aware of Democratic divisions themselves. They especially noted the anger of pro-Compromise southern Democrats at Pierce's tilt toward Southern Rights men, the continuing feuds between Union and Southern Rights Democrats in Alabama and Mississippi, and the Hard/Soft rupture in New York. Coupled with the apparent determination of Georgia's Whigs to preserve an independent state Union party and the strife between Silver Grays and Sewardites in New York, Democratic rifts, they believed, provided the materials for a successful Union party.

In September, Fillmore loyalist William L. Hodge pleaded with Fillmore to have New York's Silver Grays and Hunkers merge into a new "Union party," make "it the nucleus of a new party organization," and drop "old party names." Pierce's administration had been "an absolute abortion," he maintained. "The whole Union Democratic party at the South are ready to cut loose from them." Since southern Whigs were solidly unionist, "I have no doubt the Southern Union Democrats would readily unite with them & make one general sweep of every Southern state in the Canvass of 1856." Everything, Hodge insisted, depended upon New York's Silver Grays. "There is no national success for us unless we can clear our skirts of Sewardism, which will ruin us in the South." But "if we play our cards right at the North, especially in N. York, the Southern Whig party could attract & swallow up the Union democrats, & whether you still called it the Whig or the Union party it would to all practical purposes be the former."

On October 3, two days before New York's Whig state convention, Fillmore wrote Hodge that a merger between Silver Grays and Hunkers was impossible in 1853. Hungry for control of state canal contracts, too many Silver Grays still hoped for a fair shake from the as yet unnamed Whig ticket that was sure to win. The Democratic split that raised the possibility of a merger, in short, also deterred it—at least in 1853. Whigs would not swap sure victory and a possible share of its spoils for a risky new alliance. When Hards ran dead even with Softs in the November election, moreover, Fillmore concluded that they were far less likely to seek an alliance with Silver Grays than if they had been humiliated, for now they stood within reach of taking over the state Democratic party.¹²³

Nonetheless, by the fall of 1853 Fillmore himself finally acknowledged the necessity of forging a new Union party. One reason, unquestionably, was his expectation of becoming the Union party's presidential nominee. To bring the party to fruition, he began to plot with other members of his former administration, especially Kennedy and Stuart. On October 14, prior to the New York election but after he knew that Sewardites would monopolize canal patronage and thereby further alienate his own allies, Fillmore wrote Kennedy one of the most illuminating letters in American political history. Yet neither the writer nor the recipient of this brilliant analysis, which so incisively identified what eroded loyalty to old parties and what was needed to build new national parties, could appreciate its irony. For they did not know what their historian does—what Stephen A. Douglas intended to do in the forthcoming Congress in order to save the Democratic party from being "shivered to atoms."

New York Whigs' inevitable rupture, Fillmore told Kennedy, "will leave the national Whigs and democrats to act unitedly on national affairs if they can agree upon a common platform and name. Probably the sooner this takes place the better." But, he added, what new combinations will grow out of this, it is difficult to foresee, as national parties can only be formed by the action of the general government. Parties are broken up by local causes and that centrifugal force which throws individuals and masses beyond the attraction of the central power; but new parties of a national character can only be gathered from these fragmentary nebula of dissolving systems by the magnetism of some great national and centripetal force at Washington. Will any question present such a magnet at the ensuing session of Congress? If so, then we may hope to see a national Union party which will cast off the secessionists of the South and the abolition freesoilers of the North and rally around the Constitution and sustain it in its purity.

Kennedy could barely contain his enthusiasm for the idea. "A Union party, against all seceding fragments... seems now to be inevitable," he replied. "Neither National Whig nor National Democrat can henceforth hold communion or acknowledge fellowship with the freesoil section of either party." Whigs would numerically dominate the new party, especially in the South, and thus it would represent Whig principles. Hence, "the Whigs may willingly part with their name and external form." Kennedy also agreed with Fillmore that "this winter will bring forth many developments to enable us to compute the probability of the new organization." If Union Democrats were honest in their professions of opposition to Pierce, "we may regard" the Democratic party's "dissolution and the reconstruction [as] certain."

Kennedy moved immediately to proselytize for the new party. "Can we now make a perfect Union party which shall consolidate the Whigs of every state into a compact mass so completely national as to make the contest of 1856 an easy victory?" he asked his friend Winthrop in early December. All southern Whigs would eagerly join a new Union party. "How will it be with the Whigs of the North? In other words what is the strength of national Whigs in New England? Can you not throw off all abolitionism from the Whig party by a public renunciation of fellowship with those who entertain it?" To woo converts in the South, Kennedy urged Fillmore to accompany him on an ostensibly nonpolitical tour of southern states in the spring of 1854, a trip the now nakedly ambitious Fillmore was eager to take. 126

Stuart also agreed with Fillmore "that the sooner the present parties are broken up and new ones formed, adapted to the practical issues of the day, the better." National Whigs and Union Democrats had more in common with each other than either had with rival factions in their old parties. "I should be very willing to drive a trade, & bargain off Seward & his gang for Dickinson & the hards; especially as we should get the whole South to boot!" "The Whig party has fulfilled its appropriate mission," he concluded, "& it may now honorably ground its arms." 127

Fillmore and others who sought to replace the Whigs with a Union party all looked to the action of the new Congress to advance it. What Stephen Douglas and the Democrats did there, however, was not all that frustrated their vision of a grand conservative party. Other actors had been at work in 1853. To explain the confusing voting patterns in New York City in November 1853, a German Democrat contemptuously cited "the secret working and complotting of the Order of United Americans, lately called the 'Know Nothings,' who for the sake of their paltry designs in their notorious nothingness strived to create some confusion." Still, he admitted, "they have been successful to a certain degree." 128

Started in 1849 as a superpatriotic secret society called the Order of the Star Spangled Banner, the Know Nothings were taken over by the Order of United Americans in 1852. Confined initially to New York City, they operated outside the orbit of both Whigs and Democrats, and for most of 1853 they were more interested in recruiting members to a social fraternity than in political activity. But the spread of the organization had been fueled by the same nativistic, anti-Catholic hatreds that exploded in several local elections during 1853, and in the fall they used the cohesive power of their oath-bound members to back anti-immigrant and anti-Catholic candidates in certain races. What appeared in New York was hardly the "paltry designs" of a "notorious nothingness." Rather, it was a strike of lightning that heralded an impending tornado. 129

Chapter 22

"This Nebraska Business Will Entirely Denationalize the Whig Party"

"There must be some modification of party relations before the close of the present session of Congress," Alexander H. H. Stuart excitedly wrote Millard Fillmore in early December 1853. Convinced that the California gold strikes had permanently settled partisan disputes over economic policy and that congressional Democrats' anger at Pierce's administration had inflicted an "irremedial wound" on the Democrats, Stuart, like John P. Kennedy, Solomon G. Haven, and other Fillmore allies, believed that the impending Democratic crackup augured a merger of National Whigs and antiadministration Democrats in a new Union party. When dissident Democratic United States senators cooperated with Whigs in December to defeat Pierce's preferred candidate for Senate printer, Fillmore himself exulted that "a nucleus has been formed around which the Union men of all parties may rally and form a Union party."

Those hoping to revitalize the Whig party also rejoiced at Congress' opening. Although Democrats outnumbered Whigs 159–71 in the House and 37–22 in the Senate, Seward described congressional Whigs as "a happy set of men" since the long-predicted Democratic rupture over Senate confirmation of Pierce's controversial appointees was now imminent. Better still, as one Whig congressman reported, "the administration is without [any] policy" around which feuding Democrats might reunite. With Democratic bloodletting now inevitable, advised Tennessee Senator John Bell, "The Whigs who are prudent will take no active part against the adminn. for the present, but let the elements of distraction accumulate before they make a combined attack."

What happened in Congress during that session would indeed weaken the Democrats and help define the postsession "phase of politics." Those developments, however, prevented the "combined attack" by Whigs that Bell envisioned, and they also frustated advocates of a new Union party. On December 14, Iowa's Democratic Senator Augustus Dodge introduced a bill to organize the area west of Missouri and Iowa into a Nebraska Territory. The seemingly innocuous bill was immediately sent to the Senate's Committee on Territories, which Stephen A. Douglas chaired. What Douglas and others, including Whigs and Free Soilers, did with that measure helped transform American political life and propel the Whig party to its grave.

Developments elsewhere that December also portended things to come. While Whigs across the nation looked expectantly to Washington for ammunition, two independent, reform-oriented nativistic splinter parties—a Citizen's Union Party and a Young Men's League—outpolled both Whigs and Democrats in Boston's mayoral election.³ Emblematic of the grass-roots, antiparty revolt that had bubbled up during 1853 in the form of anti-Catholic, antiliquor, and antiwireworker tickets, the Boston insurgents also heralded the emergence of the Know Nothings as a powerful third party that, in 1854 and 1855, sought to punish Whigs and Democrats alike for their pro-Catholic, proimmigrant tilt.

The reaction to the Nebraska bill and the eruption of Know Nothingism together produced smashing Democratic defeats, derailed the Union party movement, and permanently eclipsed the Whig party. Many southern Whigs' support for the Kansas-Nebraska Act in the spring of 1854 reopened and deepened the sectional chasm in the national party. Unlike earlier rifts over the Wilmot Proviso and the Compromise of 1850, this split proved irreparable. Between the act's passage and the presidential election of 1856, new parties emerged in the North that gutted the Whig party by siphoning off its constituency. Despite the desire of many southern Whigs to preserve the national organization by arranging another armistice with Northerners in 1856, as they had in 1848 and 1852, no credible northern wing of the party with which to make terms remained. By 1855, indeed, southern Whigs who wished to continue active opposition to Democrats had to seek new political homes.

Most chose the new Know Nothing or American party. The secret, antiforeign, anti-Catholic Know Nothing organization arose in response to social, political, and economic developments that antedated the introduction of the Kansas-Nebraska Act. Given the outbreak of antipartyism, anti-Catholicism, and prohibitionism in 1852 and 1853, a populistic party that vented those feelings would probably have grown in 1854 and 1855 even without its passage, especially since the last six months of 1854 and first five months of 1855 witnessed a sharp economic recession that aggravated tensions between native-born and foreign workers. Nonetheless. Know Nothingism's most rapid growth coincided with a furious northern backlash against the Nebraska Act that both contributed to that growth and spawned still other new northern coalitions organized explicitly to stop slavery expansion and Slave Power aggressions. Two new parties—the Know Nothings and the Republicans—thus yied with each other and with Whigs to mobilize anti-Democratic voters. By the end of 1855 they had displaced the Whig party as the major opponent of the Democrats and thereby destroyed its utility as a political organization.4

The rise of the Republican and Know Nothing parties after 1853 has been thoroughly studied.⁵ The intent here is not to retell that story. The remaining chapters focus instead on how Whigs contributed and reacted to events that precipitated and then completed the party's final death throes. This chapter deals with the framing of the Kansas-Nebraska Act and its initial impact on the Whig party prior to the adjournment of Congress in August 1854. The next three assess the varying tribulations of Whigs outside of Washington during the state and congressional elections of 1854 and 1855. And the last describes the stillborn attempt to resurrect the Whig party during the 1856 presidential campaign.

Ι

From the moment of Winfield Scott's defeat, Whigs in both sections had looked wistfully to the Democratic majorities in Congress to do something against which Whigs could once again rally. No such galvanizing issue emerged from Washington during the winter of 1852–53, but the new Thirty-Third Congress was another matter. For a brief moment at the start of 1854, it looked as though the long-awaited Democratic blunder might indeed provoke a "combined attack" by Whigs that could rejuvenate their party.

When Congress met in December 1853, Senator Stephen A. Douglas had sought official organization of the area west of Missouri and Iowa for almost a decade. Long a champion of building up the West as a balance wheel between Northerners and Southerners, Douglas knew that settlers eager to move there could not gain legal title to land until Congress officially organized a territorial government and the land office surveyed and placed land on sale. For similar reasons, various proposals to build railroads with government land grants across that immense area to the Pacific coast required formal territorial organization. By the end of 1853, finally, Douglas was looking for a concrete Democratic policy to reunify his fragmenting party, "to consolidate its power and perpetuate its principles." To supply it, he envisioned a three-pronged program: organizing the Nebraska territory, allotting federal land grants from it to subsidize construction of a Pacific railroad, and encouraging settlement with a homestead bill.⁶

The hurdle blocking passage of a Nebraska bill was that, according to the Missouri Compromise of 1820, slavery was "forever prohibited" from the contemplated Nebraska Territory. Southern Democrats refused to vote for the bill unless those insulting terms were changed. Anger at what seemed a denial of southern equality primarily caused their intransigence, but some southern Democrats were also determined to buttress slavery in Missouri by ensuring that areas west of it did not become free-soil refuges for fugitive slaves. In addition, key southern Democratic senators, who sympathized with New York's Hardshell Hunkers, sought to redefine Democratic orthodoxy in order to test Softshell and Barnburner appointees when they came before the Senate for confirmation. Since the Democratic platform of 1852 committed the party to the finality of the Compromise of 1850, these Southerners insisted that its territorial provisions should be applied to all federal territories, not just Utah and New Mexico. They would substitute popular sovereignty in the Nebraska territory for the eternal prohibition of slavery north of 36° 30' contained in the Missouri Compromise.⁷

For different reasons, Douglas hit upon the same formula to secure the organization of the Nebraska territory. Douglas believed that all Democrats would rally behind a policy that reaffirmed the party's commitment to local self-determination, the basic republican principle of self-government. Since Whigs had generally opposed western development, moreover, it might provoke Whig opposition, the external pressure necessary to reunite feuding Democrats. The critical point here is that, to the extent that Douglas succeeded in reclarifying the line that differentiated Democrats from Whigs, he might also, willy-nilly, breathe life into the torpid Whig party. $^{\rm 8}$

In the initial stages, Democrats monopolized the framing of legislation in the Senate. Only two Whigs—Bell and Edward Everett of Massachusetts—served on Douglas' committee. Bell was not in Washington when it wrote the bill, and Douglas was determined to report out a measure southern Democrats could accept, regardless of any protests from Everett. Douglas, however, desperately wanted to avoid outright repeal of the Missouri Compromise line since he knew that many Northerners regarded that thirty-four-year-old provision as sacrosanct. He wanted Democrats to go before the country behind the positive platform of western development and popular sovereignty, not responsibility for repealing that prohibition against slavery expansion. Through legislative sleight of hand he thus hoped to substitute the principles of the 1850 compromise for those of the 1820 compromise. He dismissed as nonsense the idea that slavery might spread to the area in question.⁹

Ignoring Everett's futile dissent, Douglas reported a bill on January 4, 1854, that organized the entire area between the Missouri Compromise line and the Canadian border into a Nebraska Territory and provided, in the language of the Utah and New Mexico laws, that any states formed out of the immense territory could be admitted with or without slavery, as their constitutions prescribed. The bill further declared that the legislative power of the territorial government would extend to all rightful subjects, including slavery, but Douglas ambiguously implied in his accompanying report that until the territorial legislature acted, the 1820 prohibition against slavery would continue to have legal force. On one point—repeal of the Missouri Compromise line itself—the committee's report was clearer. It did not recommend either "affirming or repealing the 8th section of the Missouri act."

Seward immediately wrote his wife that Douglas had gone as far toward repeal as he dared. A few days later, he told Weed that the administration, not Douglas, had designed the measure to conciliate Hardshell Hunkers into accepting confirmation of Softshell and Barnburner appointees, while Democrats more perceptively interpreted it as a test devised by Hards to embarrass Soft appointees and force resignations if they did not go along with it. Whatever its impact on Democrats, Seward and other northern Whigs immediately determined to oppose the "infamous Nebraska Bill." Of greater importance, Seward also voiced hope "that we shall get up a division in the South on the subject" and "draw [John M.] Clayton out to lead an opposition to 'the repeal of the Missouri Compromise.' " "That," he wrote Weed, "is the word." Since Douglas's original bill explicitly did not "repeal" the Missouri Compromise line, northern Whigs obviously wanted to portray it that way in order to outrage northern voters, who might then be mobilized against Democrats in the impending 1854 congressional elections. Though unelaborated, Seward's hope that southern Whigs would also oppose "repeal" probably rested on its clear violation of the implicit promise southern Whigs had made when they helped foist the 1852 national platform upon the party—namely, that the Compromise of 1850 was a final settlement and would preclude any further sectional disputes over slavery.¹¹

If Seward believed that the first version of Douglas' bill was so "infamous" that the entire Whig party might rally against it, southern Democrats immediately complained that it failed to replace the 1820 ban on slavery extension. As most people interpreted the original draft, a decision regarding slavery would be made only when application for statehood occurred; during the entire territorial stage, that is, the previous ban would apply. Key southern Democratic senators therefore pressed Douglas for modifications, and on January 10, Douglas had newspapers print a twenty-first section of the bill that had supposedly been omitted by clerical error. This made emphatically clear what Douglas had always intended: that the residents of the territory, through the territorial legislature, could make the decision on slavery if they so chose. This change not only made the displacement of the Missouri prohibition more explicit. It also increased the likelihood of southern Whig opposition to the measure, for Southerners condemned a decision on slavery by territorial legislatures before statehood as "squatter sovereignty" that robbed Southerners of equal rights. Had that been the final form of the bill, that is, southern Whigs would have considered its Democratic supporters vulnerable to attack.¹²

These changes, therefore, still failed to satisfy certain Southerners. In addition to disliking Douglas' explicit incorporation of squatter sovereignty, they recognized that the Missouri Compromise ban could possibly still apply until the territorial legislature made a decision. If so, only nonslaveholders would elect that legislature, and its decision would be foreordained. Thus southern Democrats and Whigs contemplated moving for outright repeal of the Missouri ban. Two weeks before Douglas reported out his original bill, indeed, Georgia's Whig Senator William Dawson had predicted that someone in the House would move for explicit repeal. Like many Whigs, he expected the motion to come from Hardshell Democrats or their southern Democratic allies.¹³

Philip Phillips, a Democratic representative from Alabama, did urge outright repeal in early January, but in the Senate, Kentucky Whig Archibald Dixon beat Democrats to the punch. After consulting with Tennessee's James Jones, Dixon announced on January 16 that, when it was in order, he would propose an amendment that neither the Missouri prohibition nor squatter sovereignty should apply to Nebraska or any other territory. As if to emphasize for Southerners the implications of not adopting repeal, the Massachusetts Free Soiler Charles Sumner immediately offered a counteramendment that explicitly reaffirmed the Missouri restriction in Nebraska.¹⁴

Seward, who from early January on clearly hoped to stigmatize Democrats for attempting to repeal the Missouri restriction, later claimed to have prompted Dixon's amendment as a way of forcing Democrats to make that move and turning northern opinion against them. Since Dixon's threatened amendment was so extreme that it could never pass Congress, posturing as a more ardent proslavery man than southern Democrats in order to goad them into repeal, as Seward hoped, may indeed have been his purpose. Democrate, however, argues against such a possibility. On January 24, Dixon told the Senate that he had no idea how radical his proposed amendment was. Explicitly citing the gossip that his motion was a Whig attempt to embarrass Democrats, he also denied any partisan motives. "Upon the question of slavery, I know no Whiggery, and I know no Democracy," he declared. He was, instead, "a pro-slavery man" who sought to maintain the "rights" of his "slaveholding constituency."

It is tempting to suggest that just as Milton Brown had added a proslavery amendment to the joint resolution for Texas annexation in December 1844 in order to prove southern Whigs better defenders of Southern Rights than southern Democrats. Dixon and Iones sought to benefit Whigs in Dixie by attacking a restriction many Southerners now regarded as an insulting denial of southern equality. Yet Dixon and Jones, who enthusiastically endorsed Dixon's surprising initiative, each had more selfish motives. Both were men of burning ambition who needed to mend fences with Whigs in their home states by enhancing their leadership credentials. Dixon's reelection to another Senate term, indeed, would be decided by the Whig majority of the Kentucky legislature, which was sitting in Frankfort while Congress met in Washington, within five weeks of the day he threatened to introduce his proslavery amendment. Dixon had always ridden the slavery issue to advance his career within Kentucky. By posing as a nonpartisan champion of slaveholders' rights, he might even pick up votes from Democratic legislators to offset opposition from Whigs who despised his self-centered lust for office. Just as the actions of New York's Whig legislators in early 1850 forced Seward's Higher Law speech, the impending decision by Kentucky's legislature spurred Dixon's move in 1854.17

Dixon's threatened amendment in combination with Sumner's embarrassed Douglas and altered the political calculus. Dixon demanded an explicit repeal of the Missouri restriction that could outrage Northerners and thereby inhibit northern Democratic congressmen from supporting the bill. But he also sought to gut the popular sovereignty formula for territorial self-government that Douglas considered the linchpin of his bill, the feature that defined it as a Democratic measure. Dixon's proposed amendment asserted that "citizens of the several States or Territories shall be at liberty to take and hold slaves within any of the Territories of the United States or of the States to be formed therefrom." Dixon's amendment, in sum, implied that neither a territorial legislature nor even a state constitutional convention could bar slavery from the contemplated territory. Taken literally, it would legalize slavery in every new state thereafter admitted to the Union. One of the most extreme proslavery pieces of legislation ever aired in Congress, it could not pass. Nonetheless, Southern Democrats immediately understood its political threat to their own proslavery credentials, especially once Sumner highlighted the implications of not seeking direct repeal. Refusing to be outflanked by southern Whigs, they insisted that Douglas incorporate some form of repeal in the bill.18

Dixon's shaft forced a week-long series of frantic negotiations among Democrats, including President Pierce and some of his cabinet, from which Whigs were excluded. The goal was to concoct a recognizably Democratic bill by saving popular sovereignty and to present a more palatable version of repeal. Douglas reported this measure on January 23, and Pierce's administration spread the word that support for it was the new test of party orthodoxy. Douglas' revised bill now created two territories—Kansas, directly west of Missouri, and, to the west of Iowa, Nebraska, whose northern boundary would be the border with Canada. Rather than directly "repealing" the ban of 1820, it declared that the Missouri prohibition had been "superceded [sic] by the principles" of the Compromise of 1850 and was therefore "inoperative and void." And, in sharp contrast to Dixon's amendment, it did not legalize slavery in the territories but left the decision, at least implicitly, to their residents. As revised two weeks later, the bill explicitly asserted that "the true intent and meaning of this act [is] not to legislate slavery into any territory or state nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." This was not the flat grant of power to the territorial legislature included in earlier versions, but, significantly, it still strongly implied what Southerners abhorred as squatter sovereignty—an early decision on slavery by territorial legislatures.¹⁹

II

The January 23 version of the bill offered the best chance that a unified Whig party might rally against it. Here was the controversial Democratic legislative initiative that Whigs had yearned to run against for over a year, one that, like the Independent Treasury bill of the late 1830s or the Walker Tariff, the Independent Treasury, and the Mexican War of the late 1840s, might spark a Whig comeback. Douglas' authorship and Pierce's endorsement stamped it indelibly as a Democratic measure. Equally important, the junking of Dixon's inflammatory language excused Whigs from blame for repealing the Missouri restriction on slavery extension, for, whatever its language, the bill did repeal it. As Seward wrote his wife on January 29, without once mentioning Dixon's threatened-butnever-moved amendment, "The 'Hards,' finding fault with Douglas' equivocations in his first bill, insisted on the repeal of the Missouri Compromise." Seward, like most Whigs in Washington, attributed this action to the Hards' "purpose of ruining the 'Softs,' " but the important point was that the spotlight had been taken off Dixon and southern Whigs, even though Dixon himself immediately endorsed Douglas' new bill. Responsibility for framing the legislation could be laid exclusively upon Democrats. Not only might Whigs count on the habitual inclination of Whig politicos and voters to oppose any Democratic measure once the differences between the parties had been made clear. There was also much about the bill that Whigs of all varieties. Northerners and Southerners, antislavery Sewardites and pro-Compromise conservatives, despised.²⁰

All northern Whigs, but especially antislavery men who had so bitterly execrated the Compromise of 1850 and the 1852 platform as betrayals of freedom, northern interests, and northern Whigs' long-standing principles, abominated Douglas' measure. Sewardites repeatedly charged, and many of them undoubtedly believed, that, regardless of climate, slaveholders would take their chattels anywhere they legally could and that consequently the bill opened the possibility of slavery extension into a vast area long promised exclusively to nonslaveholders, especially northern nonslaveholders. In addition, they knew that the bill, and most certainly its passage into law, could revive the Free Soil party and with it resurrect the hated Free Soil/Democratic coalitions that had so discomfited Whigs in Ohio, Massachusetts, and elsewhere. The political necessity of averting a Free Soil revival combined with visceral revulsion at the prospect of slavery expansion to mobilize northern antislavery Whigs against the bill.

Until May, therefore, northern Whigs' top priority was to stop enactment of the bill into law. Instantly in January, Whig newspapers, state legislators, and local politicos affiliated with Seward flayed Douglas' bill. Whigs alone, of course, did not have the votes in Congress to prevent passage if Democrats united behind the bill, and by early February a Senate majority for it seemed certain. Rather, the Whigs' goal was to arouse the northern public in order to intimidate northern Democratic representatives, who faced elections in the fall of 1854, into helping Whigs defeat the odious measure in the House. And from January almost to the last minute, northern Whigs expressed confidence that they would have the necessary votes to do so.²¹

Even if Douglas' measure failed to pass, Seward and his northern Whig allies also expected considerable political dividends from opposing it. For over a decade they had believed that fighting slavery extension and portraying northern Democrats as doughfaced lackeys of an aggressive Slave Power offered northern Whigs their best chance to win elections. During 1853, Seward's most zealous antislayery supporters had unavailingly demanded that he and other northern Whigs make an open issue of Freedom versus Slavery in order to expunge the stigma stenciled upon the party by the 1852 national platform.²² Now, suddenly in 1854, the Democrats handed them a terrific issue on a silver platter. Northerners regarded the bill "as base and fraudulent," Connecticut's former Senator Roger Sherman Baldwin excitedly wrote Truman Smith from New Haven. "It will do us good politically at the coming election." So convinced, northern Whig congressmen did everything they could to make Douglas' bill as repulsive as possible to northern voters. As Ohio Congressman Lew Campbell wrote in May, if he and other opponents could not prevent enactment, their "policy" was to "drive" the bill's backers to pass it "by some desperate means—overriding the rules, or disregarding our rights—so that it may go to the country with as much odium as can be heaped upon it."23

More than the prospect of pillorying Democrats' responsibility for the bill to defeat them in the 1854 elections caused Sewardite Whigs to salivate. That tack could also trump their conservative intraparty rivals who had long tried to bury the slavery issue precisely to prevent Sewardites from using antislavery rhetoric to control northern Whig organizations. The Kansas-Nebraska bill discredited the promises of pro-Compromise Whigs that pledges to finality in the 1852 Whig and Democratic platforms meant the end of Slave Power aggressions and exposed conservatives' opposition to the Taylor plan and the Wilmot Proviso in 1850 as a fatal mistake. Northern anger at the bill was so intense and so widespread, moreover, that Whig conservatives, who themselves reviled it, had no choice but to follow Sewardites' lead. "If the Missouri Compromise is repealed, then nothing remains but sectional war," declared a pro-Compromise Whig from Maine. "The feeling is intense & bitter & the National Whigs as they are called are beyond all others mortified, enraged, and determined." Democrats' contention that the Nebraska bill was the logical extension of, indeed was inherent in, the Compromise of 1850, in sum, demolished conservatives' case for leading the northern Whig party.24 or of attempting to drive northern conservatives and Southerners from it. The more Whigs who remained in the party, the greater the chances that it could win office, and the greater the benefits control of it might yield to them. Seward, for example, had a personal stake in keeping New York's Silver Grays in the party as long as his followers dominated local Whig organizations and the nominations they made. He was up for reelection in the legislature to be chosen in the fall of 1854. Hence he needed a Whig majority in that body. The angry northern Whig reaction to the Nebraska bill virtually guaranteed that most Whig legislative candidates would be his allies, not Silver Grays, but to ensure their election he wanted to retain as many votes in the Whig column as possible. What Sewardites counted on, in fact, was that all Whigs would unite behind their leadership in opposition to the bill, for the more united Whigs were against it, the better the chance of pinning the blame solely on Democrats and the more credible the case that Whigs should reap the credit for trying to defeat it.

In early 1854, therefore, Sewardite Whigs had no intention of abandoning the national Whig party for a different kind of northern coalition with Free Soilers

Conservative northern Whigs instantly recognized the untenable position in which Douglas' measure placed them. "If I determine to vote against the bill," Haven moaned to Fillmore in late January, "my greatest regret will be that I shall be thereby compelled to go with the woolly headed crowd from the north." By late January, however, Haven and other northern Whig conservatives had no alternative but to oppose the bill. Even more than other Whigs, they considered the Democrats' pretense that in 1850 Congress had extended popular sovereignty to all territories, not just Utah and New Mexico, sheer demagoguery, a transparent fabrication, an outright lie. "Clay & Webster could have, & would have, blown this Bill to atoms," fumed the outraged Robert C. Winthrop. "Overthrowing the Compromise of 1820," echoed Truman Smith, was "the last thing which either Mr. Clay or Mr. Webster would have assented to." 25

More important, northern conservatives recognized that the measure, and especially its passage, would "renew the old strife between sections & make it rage more furiously than ever," thereby betraying "the promise of that cessation of agitation which the Compromise of 1850 held out." Winthrop, indeed, could only explain Douglas' measure as a "deliberate design to keep alive an active Free Soil Party at the North" since Democrats wanted to negate "all our late victories over the Coalition." Thoroughly appalled by this threat to the sectional peace they had promised, pro-Compromise or National Whigs knew that consistency alone required them to join Sewardites in opposing the Nebraska bill. 26

Douglas' bill, therefore, forced together and kept intact the entire northern wing of the Whig party by stopping conservatives aligned with Fillmore from bolting to a new Union party. It was precisely in December 1853 and January 1854, when Sewardite Whigs in Albany ruthlessly excluded Silver Grays from canal contracts and jobs, that Fillmore's closest Whig allies tentatively decided to abandon the Whig party permanently for a new alliance with anti-administration Democrats.²⁷ Nonetheless, however much Sewardite actions in Albany infuriated Silver Grays, Democratic actions in Washington abruptly stopped talk of such a new party. For one thing, the alignments among Democrats over the bill confounded the calculations of conservative Whigs. Hardshell Hunkers and other antiadministration Democrats, whom they had targeted as potential allies in a Union party, were precisely the Democrats who most aggressively pushed Douglas' measure. "The Hards of the North (together with some Softs) will vote for it," Haven lamented. "So we are isolated from the hards, and made particularly subordinate & secondary amongst the Whigs of the north," since opposition to the bill "gives a decided preponderance to the woolly headed influence of the north."

Silver Gray leaders, however, had no choice but to join Sewardites in opposing the Nebraska bill since their constituents angrily demanded that they do so. As Ogden Hoffman, a Silver Gray, enthused to Seward in early March, "The Nebraska bill has had one good effect, to atone for its many sins. It has united the Whig party, & broken down the foolish partition wall, which separated one portion from another." Or, as a visceral anti-Sewardite conservative despaired later that spring, "The Nebraska Swindle has driven National & Sectional Whigs into the same camp where they must mess together."

Particularly embarrassing to Fillmore's northern allies was the prospect that their joining Sewardites in opposition to the bill would destroy Fillmore's popularity in the South and thereby kill his prospects for the presidency in 1856. On the one hand, they knew they had to oppose the bill in order to retain any credibility with northern Whig voters. On the other, southern Fillmorites like Virginia's Stuart and Daniel Lee, the Georgian now editing the pro-Fillmore Rochester American, warned Fillmore that Southerners much preferred Douglas' doctrine of congressional noninterference to the Missouri prohibition and that, consequently, "the National Whigs are about to commit a great blunder on the Nebraska question." I hope, Lee pleaded, that "vou will not be found in the same boat."30 Most conservative northern Whigs, however, saw only one escape from their quandary. They wanted southern Whigs to join them in opposing the bill by portraying it not as a Slave Power aggression against the North to spread slavery, but as a "question of plighted faith," that is, a flagrant violation of the party's pledge to finality. "It is upon this point that a chivalrous Southron might make a stand which would cover him with honor," Winthrop advised Kennedy. 31

As Douglas' bill stood on January 23, there was still a chance that most southern Whigs might oppose it. Southern Whigs in and outside Congress considered the principle of congressional noninterference more palatable than the Missouri restriction, and for this reason alone some undoubtedly found the bill irresistable. Dixon publicly endorsed Douglas' new version on January 24 because it repealed the Missouri restriction, and Tennessee's "Lean Jimmy" Jones quickly concurred with him. In addition, the erstwhile Georgia Whigs Stephens and Toombs, who still exerted great influence among their former Whig colleagues from Dixie, avidly supported the bill because they thought it vindicated the Georgia Platform. Since they had already renounced allegiance to the national Whig party and sought to replace it with a new regionwide organization more faithful to Southern Rights, moreover, they believed that pressuring southern Whigs to support the bill could drive a permanent wedge between them and the northern wing of the party. Their intention is clear, but what such an anti-Democratic, non-Whig, pro-Southern Rights organization might accomplish in national politics is not, at least to this modern observer. Nonetheless, both sought passage of Douglas' Kansas-Nebraska bill. Stephens was indisposed by illness until mid-February, but Toombs, who had now finally replaced Berrien in the Senate, worked actively for passage from January on. Citing Stephens and Toombs by name, John Bell, who ultimately voted against the measure, later complained that from the start its "most zealous" southern Whig backers hoped "that there would no longer be a Whig party" since they sought "to get up a new party." 32

On January 23, when Douglas presented his revised version of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, however, most southern Whigs still wanted to preserve the Whig party, few of them had as yet committed themselves to the bill, and they had numerous reasons to oppose it. For one, the rejection of Dixon's amendment and inclusion of a provision that seemed to condone squatter sovereignty meant that proslavery southern Whigs could attack the measure in a politically viable way. Hence, virtually every southern Whig newspaper editorial and every southern Whig congressional speech against the bill condemned it for enacting squatter sovereignty. For another, northern Whigs like Ohio's Ben Wade and Connecticut's Truman Smith instantly warned Southerners that their support of the bill meant permanent disruption of the national Whig party. That was a threat most southern Whigs, quite unlike Toombs and Stephens, did not take lightly. In addition, there was virtually no grass-roots pressure on southern Whig congressmen to go along with the bill. To the contrary, many southern Whigs, just like many southern Democrats, believed that nothing would be achieved by changing the law for Nebraska since climate would render plantation slavery unprofitable there.33

Thus the South's gain would be purely symbolic rather than substantive. It would be what Tennessee's Bell pronounced an "abortive abstraction." Against that gain Southern Whigs had to weigh the certain renewal of antisouthern agitation in the North, the probable political resurrection of the most fanatical antislavery groups there, the alienation of their northern Whig allies and likely rupture of the national Whig party, and a threat to the survival of the Union itself. To many southern Whigs that price seemed far too high merely to gain repeal of a law they had accepted for nearly thirty-five years. Richmond's John Minor Botts published a public letter against the bill in the Washington National Intelligencer in mid-February. Denouncing the measure as "odious in principle, uncalled for by any political exigency," and certain to reopen "the floodgates to future agitation on the slavery question," a public meeting of Whigs in Wilmington, Delaware, chaired by ex-Senator John Wales, "earnestly" petitioned Clayton to oppose it. William A. Graham, the party's vice presidential candidate in 1852, urged North Carolina's Whig congressmen to vote against it, and Kentucky's United States senator-elect Crittenden privately pleaded with his state's Whig congressional delegation, including Dixon himself, to do likewise in order to avert sectional strife and preserve comity between northern and southern Whigs. Initially, the southern Whig press was just as unenthusiastic. The New Orleans Bee and New Orleans Bulletin, the Louisville Journal, the Raleigh Register, and the Savannah Republican, among other papers, flayed the measure as Democratic demagoguery, warned against igniting an antislavery conflagration in the North that would jeopardize sectional peace, and reminded southern Whigs that their 1852 platform committed them to oppose any revival of the slavery auestion.34

Though most southern Whig protests against Douglas' bill appeared during formal debates on it between February and May, it was on January 23 that the chances of rallying most Whigs against the measure peaked. Just as northern and southern Whigs had united against Texas annexation in 1844 and behind the No

Territory formula in 1847, all Whigs might oppose Douglas' bill and campaign on that opposition in both sections to revive the party. Outrage at the bill by committed nationalists stymied the threat of a bolt by conservatives to a new Union party—and with it the potential loss of vital northern Whig voting support. Southern Whigs seemed to have reason and sufficient political cover to resist the bill. Northern Sewardites eagerly anticipated the prospect of leapfrogging ahead of their conservative rivals, trouncing the Democrats, burying the Free Soil party by rendering it unnecessary, and still retaining an alliance with southern Whigs. A clear-cut, nationwide, two-party partisan battle, not a sectional clash, appeared to be on the horizon. Douglas and the Democrats had seemingly worked a miracle. The chance for a powerful bisectional comeback lay within Whigs' grasp.

Ш

That chance evaporated within twenty-four hours of Douglas' presentation on January 23. The following day, newspapers published a protest from the few remaining Free Soil officeholders in Washington entitled "The Appeal of the Independent Democrats in Congress." Signed by Senators Salmon P. Chase and Charles Sumner and four House members, including Joshua Giddings and the abolitionist Gerrit Smith, it lacerated Douglas' measure as "a gross violation of a sacred pledge," as "part and parcel of an atrocious plot" to spread slavery and exclude northern whites from the new territories, and as a "bold scheme against American liberty" that would subjugate the entire nation "to the yoke of a slaveholding despotism." If the bill passed and this audacious Slave Power aggression succeeded, they vowed, they—that is, Free Soil politicians—would "go home to our constituents, erect anew the standard of freedom, and call on the people to ... rescue ... the country from the dominion of slavery." "

The manifesto appeared a week before formal debate on Douglas' proposal even started. Free Soilers, therefore, defined the purpose of Douglas' measure before he himself could do so. More important for the Whigs, they preempted the ground of opposition to it. They thereby cast anyone inclined to oppose the bill for any other reason as a fellow traveler of abolitionist fanatics. "The cry of abolitionism" raised by "that address of Chase, Sumner, Giddings and Company," complained one Ohio Whig editor, who sought to mobilize Whigs against Douglas' measure, "came near swamping us altogether." By exaggerating and impugning southern responsibility for the bill, by portraying it as a southern assault on the liberty and future economic prospects of northern whites, the "Appeal" converted what, only hours earlier, had been shaping up as a partisan struggle between Democrats and Whigs into a sectional brawl. In achieving this transmutation, the tiny group of Free Soil congressmen had a far more devastating impact on the Whig party than even they probably intended.

With their clarion call to arouse the North, Chase, Sumner, and Giddings obviously hoped to revive the flagging fortunes of the Free Soil party by enlisting antislavery Democrats and Whigs behind the Free Soil banner.³⁷ Most northern Whigs needed no scolding from Free Soilers to oppose the bill, especially after the Pierce administration defined it as the new test of Democratic orthodoxy. Some, like Ohio's Wade, clearly hoped Whigs and Free Soilers would combine behind the Whig banner.³⁸ Initially, that is, the northern Whigs most likely to bolt to the Free Soilers saw no need to follow their lead since northern Whig editors and legislators were already denouncing the bill for opening up the floodgates to slavery extension. If anything, the prospect that Free Soilers might profit the most politically from passage of the measure by erecting "anew the standard of freedom" in the North only intensified northern Whigs' desire to stop its enactment.

By identifying opposition to the bill with abolitionist extremism, however, the "Appeal" deepened the embarassment of conservative northern Whigs who personally despised the bill and saw no political alternative but to oppose it. They wanted to fight the bill on grounds of its threat to national tranquility and its violation of the concord reached in 1850, in ways, that is, that could persuade pro-Compromise southern Whigs to oppose it and thus preserve harmony between northern and southern Whigs. The Free Soilers' bold strike seemed to eliminate the middle ground on which Whigs with diverse attitudes might cooperate. How could conservatives now try to stop a bill that had been painted as prosouthern without alienating Southerners and driving them into its support?

Writhing in agony at this dilemma, conservatives begged their congressional spokesmen like Haven and Everett to retrieve the initiative and present the case against the Nebraska measure in less inflammatory, nonsectional terms. Informing Everett in early February of his personal hostility to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, Fillmore fretted, "If our people intend to oppose its repeal," they should move "a proper amendment and not suffer themselves to be placed in the false position of following the lead of known and avowed abolitionists." Appalled that that Free Soilers and anti-Compromise Sewardites led the charge against Douglas' bill, thereby winning plaudits from angry northern voters, Winthrop also pleaded from Boston for Everett to make a Senate speech around which conservatives and southern Whigs could rally since, he insisted, it was the friends of finality who would lose the most by the bill's passage. And yet, as he was still protesting over a year later, Free Soilers had driven "off the only persons who could have prevented" its passage. They "usurped a lead which belonged to others, and gave an odor of abolition to the whole movement."

How effectively Free Soilers had staked out the anti-Nebraska ground became clear in February when Everett attempted to articulate the conservative case against the Nebraska bill in the Senate. With his friend Webster now dead, Everett was easily the most renowned and accomplished orator in American public life, and conservatives like Fillmore and Winthrop looked upon him as a natural rallying point. To Winthrop's delight, Everett cited his intimacy with Webster to shred Douglas' rationale that the Compromise of 1850 had already superseded the Compromise of 1820 by extending popular sovereignty to all territories. In order to conciliate southern Whigs and rally them against the measure, Everett also stressed their conviction that climate would prevent slavery from ever taking hold in Kansas and Nebraska. Given that prospect, Everett implored, southern friends of the Compromise and sectional harmony should join him in opposing Douglas' measure.⁴⁰

Whatever conservatives like Winthrop thought of this tack, it infuriated Free Soilers and Sewardite Whigs, who wanted to stress the real threat of slavery expansion in order to increase northern opposition to the bill. Aimed at reassuring

Southerners about the motives for opposition to Douglas' bill, Everett's speech struck Sewardites and even some conservative northern Whigs instead as a "milk water speech" that anesthetized Northerners just when they needed to be aroused into pressuring northern Democratic congressmen to vote against the bill. It smacked too much of Webster's opposition to the Wilmot Proviso in 1850. It was quintessential doughfacism, and when painful kidney stones later forced Everett to miss the Senate vote on adoption of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, he inadvertently undermined conservatives' credibility even further. Everett thus found himself an odd man out, reviled by Whigs in New England and scorned by most northern Whigs in Congress, and he would resign his Senate seat in June before the session ended. Clearly, however, Free Soilers' success in sectionalizing debate over the bill most discomfited him. "Why should I persevere in this contest?" he forlornly asked his niece in May 1854. "I do no good. I gain no credit. I have no future. The Country is given over to ultraism on both sides, and moderate counsels are despised alike at the South and the North."

When Winthrop subsequently complained that Free Soilers had driven "off the only persons" who could have stopped passage of the Nebraska bill, however, he did not refer to northern conservatives like Everett. In neither the Senate nor the House could the few northern Whigs who failed to vote have stopped passage had they been present, and every northern Whig in Congress who cast a vote, whatever his factional affiliation or ideological orientation, voted against passage. Rather, the Whigs most alienated by the Free Soilers' "Appeal" were Southerners, and, at least in the House, their support provided the margin of victory.

With the exception of one-time Whigs who had won as Union candidates in 1853 and openly repudiated Whiggery, the southern Whigs who came to Congress in December 1853 were loyal party men. Most had rallied faithfully behind Scott's candidacy in 1852 and sought the resuscitation of the Whig party. Of those old-line Whigs, moreover, twenty of twenty-one representatives and nine of twelve senators hailed from the border states, North Carolina, or Tennessee, the slave states where the Whig party had always been strongest, most committed to national harmony, and most adverse to reckless proslavery propagandism. The unusual enthusiasm within Missouri for the formal organization of Kansas and Nebraska might make it difficult for Senator Henry Geyer and the four Whigs in the Missouri House delegation to vote overtly against the measure, but northern Whigs had every reason to expect support against it from conservatives such as Clayton of Delaware, James Pearce and Thomas Pratt of Maryland, George Badger of North Carolina, Bell of Tennessee, and John B. Thompson of Kentucky, as well as from Whigs in those states' House delegations.

Free Soilers' insulting manifesto ended that possibility by rendering any opposition to the Nebraska bill for whatever reason betrayal of the South. To most Southerners in Congress, including southern Whigs, its passage now became a matter of southern honor, just as resistance to the Wilmot Proviso had been. As Jewett reported to Fillmore from Washington in mid-February, "It is unfortunate that the free soil Senators have been suffered to lead off the opposition. This fact more than anything else has contributed to unite Southern sentiment on the bill."

Little evidence exists that the Free Soil assault, which northern antislavery Whigs immediately echoed, created much enthusiasm among rank-and-file southern Whigs for a measure they still considered solely symbolic. Rather, by citing northern attacks, southern Democratic newspapers made support of the bill a test of fealty to Southern Rights. Given their unhappy experience since 1844 with Democrats' one-upmanship on the slavery issue, that was a test most southern Whigs refused to flunk. By February and March, southern Whig editors who had previously denounced the bill as a reckless and useless provocation of renewed sectional strife fell silent or changed their tone. Southern Whig congressmen, proclaimed the Richmond Whig, must leave no doubt about "the soundness of Southern Whigs upon the questions involving the peculiar institutions of the South"

Perceptive northern Whigs like Truman Smith, and especially conservatives who desperately sought to preserve an alliance with Southerners, began to worry about southern Whigs' seepage from the anti-Nebraska camp within a week of the "Appeal's" publication. "This movement if consummated," the indignant Smith privately protested on the last day of January, "will be a finishing blow to the Whig party. No man has struggled... as I have to preserve it as a national party," but "I shall have nothing to do with any Southern Whig who joins Stephen A. Douglas in introducing into Congress & into the country another controversy on the subject of slavery."

During February, southern Whigs not only endorsed Douglas' bill. Key representatives and senators collaborated actively with its Democratic sponsors to revise the bill in order to enhance its chance of passage. North Carolina's Badger and Clayton successfully moved amendments that made the bill more palatable to southern Whigs while simultaneously attempting to make their support for it more palatable to northern Whigs, for, it must be emphasized, southern Whigs by no means intended their support to disrupt the national Whig party. Meanwhile a number of southern Whigs from both the House and Senate participated in bipartisan caucuses that refined the language regarding popular sovereignty and the rationale for replacing the Missouri Compromise's restriction. Presented to the Senate by Douglas on February 7, this new language, while still insisting that the bill intended neither to establish nor prohibit slavery in the two territories, declared the Missouri restriction "inoperative and void" because it was "inconsistent with the principle of congressional nonintervention with slavery in the States and Territories, as recognized" by the "Compromise Measures" of 1850. This apparently minor modification, by stressing the "congressional nonintervention" rather than the local self-determination aspect of popular sovereignty, was far more attractive to Southerners than Douglas' earlier twenty-first section. That section had forthrightly—far too forthrightly for most Southerners—insisted that "all questions pertaining to slavery in the Territories ... are to be left to the decision of the people residing therein, through their appropriate representatives." With the aid of southern Whigs, that is, the emphasis concerning the decision on slavery extension had been shifted from action by territorial legislatures to nonaction by Congress.⁴⁷

What appeared to many to be the "finishing blow" to the national Whig party, however, occurred in the Senate after these collaborations were completed. On the morning of February 15, the ultraconservative Washington National Intelligencer, still regarded by many as the official organ of Whiggery, strongly condemned repeal as dangerous to sectional harmony and implied that almost all Whigs in Congress would consequently vote against it. Most southern Whig senators, who now favored repeal, were embarrassed by that implication since the Senate's upcoming schedule for floor debate would keep them from refuting it publicly. At Clayton's urging, therefore, nine of them—Clayton, Bell, Badger, Dawson, Dixon, Jones, Geyer, Pratt, and Judah P. Benjamin—together, significantly, with the ex-Whig Toombs gathered briefly in a Senate lobby upon adjournment of that afternoon's session to discuss a response to the Intelligencer's editorial. Some would later call this meeting a "caucus" whose agenda had been scripted in advance. At least Bell and Benjamin, however, were simply grabbed by friends as they left the Senate chamber and had no foreknowledge of what the impromptu meeting was about, and Bell later vehemently protested that he left after a few minutes before the "caucus" reached any final decisions. 48

Toombs was selected to preside, and that choice alone says much about the tenor of the gathering. He presented a formal resolution that was adopted with no audible dissent. It declared "that we disapprove of the course of the National Intelligencer upon the Nebraska bill, and that, in our opinion, it does not truly represent the opinions of the Whig party of the South." Clayton, Badger, and Bell were then deputized to take this protest to the Intelligencer office, but they never did so. Instead, prior to the dispersal of the brief meeting, it was decided that Badger, who was already scheduled to speak to the Senate the next day, be authorized to announce "that the southern Whigs were a unit in favor of the bill." On February 16, Badger accordingly declared that he had the "authority" of all his southern Whig colleagues to assert that "we all agree as one man—every southern Whig Senator" that the bill must be passed because it repealed the Missouri restriction.⁴⁹

Southern Whig senators proved almost as good as their word. When the Senate, after a marathon sixteen-hour session, voted at 5 a.m. on March 4, nine southern Whigs supported final passage, and they provided almost a fourth of the thirty-seven votes in favor. Only Bell, who first announced his opposition during debate the previous afternoon, joined the six northern Whigs still on the floor among the minority of fourteen. Pearce, Toombs, and Clayton missed the vote, as did three northern Whigs. How Pearce might have voted is unclear, but his absence, like that of Maryland's two Whig representatives from the final House vote ten weeks later, suggests a conscious attempt to avoid offending southern or northern colleagues by not voting at all.⁵⁰ Toombs most certainly would have supported it, but Clayton, who had already announced his approval of repeal, later asked to be recorded against the bill on the grounds that it incorporated squatter sovereignty.⁵¹

Furious northern Whigs later condemned the February 15 meeting of southern Whig senators as "the funeral of the National Whig party—or rather the choking & stabbing—preparatory to the funeral on the last night of the Nebraska bill" and Badger and Clayton as the party's "executioners." Even if all nine southern Whigs who cast votes for the bill, along with the absent Pearce and Clayton, had joined Bell in opposition, however, the bill would still have passed 28–24. Even the addition of the three absent northern Whigs—Everett, Pennsylvania's James Cooper, and Vermont's Samuel Phelps—to this hypothetical Whig phalanx could not have overcome the pro-Nebraska Democratic majority in the Senate. Rather, it was in the House, where southern Whigs were more evenly divided over the measure, that their support would prove crucial.⁵²

Heavy northern majorities, the greater susceptibility of northern Democratic representatives than senators to public pressure, and different rules all made the prospect of stopping the Nebraska bill in the House better than in the Senate. An attempt to assign the Senate bill to the Committee on Territories, where it could expect favorable treatment, indeed, was defeated. Instead it was sent to the Committee of the Whole, whose rules and pre-existing agenda seemed, initially at least, to guarantee burial. Thus Connecticut's Truman Smith, who fumed at the betrayal of southern Whigs in the Senate, could crow as late as April 27 that "this vile measure . . . is just as good as dead! It will never see daylight in the House of Rep." In addition to unrelenting administration pressure on wavering northern Democrats, therefore, the bill's Democratic sponsors in the House needed all the help from southern Whigs they could get to excavate the bill from its apparent grave and secure passage. ⁵³

At least ten of the twenty-four southern Whig congressmen, however, were distinctly unenthusiastic about the measure, and seven of them—Louisiana's only Whig representative, two of North Carolina's three, and four of Tennessee's six Whig congressmen—openly opposed it in debate and later voted against it. Together with all northern Whigs, Free Soilers, and anti-Nebraska northern Democrats, they managed, through constant demands for adjournment that required time-consuming roll-call votes, to stall the efforts by Democrats to pry the bill out of the Committee of the Whole. Other southern Whigs or ex-Whigs, however, provided the margin and the methods by which the bill's managers ultimately did so.

To resurrect the Nebraska bill from the bottom of the Committee of the Whole's agenda, those bills ahead of it had to be set aside on individual votes. Those votes were taken by teller as members filed past, not by roll call, so how individuals voted was not recorded. Nonetheless, the Georgians Stephens and Toombs worked closely with administration managers of the bill to secure southern Whig votes, and it seems clear that southern Whigs helped provide the margins by which bills were set aside. Stephens would also discover or remember an obscure procedural rule by which the Nebraska bill was finally removed from the Committee of the Whole without the possibility of further amendment on the House floor and forced to a vote on final passage. "If I had not been here the Bill would never have been got through," Stephens crowed to a friend. "I took the reins in my own hand and drove with whip & spur until we got the 'wagon' out of the mud."

Two votes best gauge southern Whigs' impact on passage. The first was a roll call on May 15 in the House, not the Committee of the Whole, that required a two-thirds vote to postpone consideration of a Pacific railroad bill from May 16 to May 24 in order to allow continued action on the Nebraska bill in committee. Had that procedural roll call been defeated, it is likely that the Nebraska bill would have been permanently buried, but it passed by a margin of 123–53, 16 more than the necessary two-thirds majority. ⁵⁵ On this vote, southern Whigs divided fifteen for, two against, and seven not voting. Two of the majority—Sion Rogers and Richard Puryear of North Carolina—and three of the abstainers—Theodore

Hunt of Louisiana and William Cullom and Robert Bugg of Tennessee—would later vote against final passage, along with Nathaniel G. Taylor and Emerson Etheridge of Tennessee, who voted Nay on this procedural roll call. Had those five, plus the four other abstainers—two each from Maryland and Kentucky—voted Nay, the two-thirds majority would have been denied.⁵⁶

On May 22 the Kansas-Nebraska bill finally passed the House by a margin of 113–100. Southern Whigs split thirteen for, seven against, and four not voting. One of the abstainers, Samuel Carruthers of Missouri, missed the vote because he was paired with an absent northern Whig, and he later announced that he would have supported passage, as did the three Missouri Whigs who voted. 57 Had half of those fourteen southern Whigs—say, Felix Zollicoffer and Charles Ready of Tennessee, John Kerr of North Carolina, and the four Kentucky Whigs who voted Yea—instead voted Nay, the bill would have been defeated. Southern Whigs, in sum, provided the critical margin of victory even if 100 of the 113 votes came from Democrats.

Equally noteworthy, however, is how much less lopsided southern Whig support for passage in the House in May was than it had been ten weeks earlier in the Senate. One-third of the southern Whigs whose opinions are known—almost two-fifths if the three Georgia and Alabama Unionists are excluded from the total of House Whigs—joined a unanimous northern Whig delegation in voting against passage. The three other abstainers—the two Maryland Whigs and Kentucky's Presley Ewing, whom Crittenden had urged to vote against the bill—also probably desired its defeat even if they dared not vote openly against it. While Missouri and Kentucky Whigs, like the Whig senators from those states, gave solid backing to the bill, Whig representatives from Louisiana, Tennessee, and North Carolina stood predominantly against it, and Maryland's Whigs had refused to support it.

Southern Whig opponents cited squatter sovereignty, the impossibility of carrying slavery into the new territories, and the necessity of preserving sectional comity to justify their opposition to the bill. But, it seems clear, they were also determined to stand by what Bell called the "patriotic and noble Whigs at the North, who . . . have acquiesced in the compromises of 1850—those who are opposed to the plans of the abolition organization, and entertain no purpose of pressing their antislavery feelings to the point of disunion." What motivated the southern Whig opponents of the Nebraska bill, in short, was a desire to prevent the sectional disruption of the Whig party. As they saw it, "the tendency of this bill is to stimulate the formation of a sectional party organization . . . the last and most fatal evil which can befall this country."

IV

The tocsin John Bell sounded against a sectional reorganization of parties in May was hardly the first mention of that nightmarish specter. Speculation about a political realignment in which parties that exclusively represented the North or the South displaced the nationwide, bisectional competition between Whigs and Democrats began in early February when events seemed to presage such a reshuffling. Caucuses of pro-Nebraska southern Whig and Democratic congressmen in Washington portended a bipartisan fusion in Dixie. Simultaneously, in community after community across the North, meetings that combined Whigs, Democrats, Free Soilers, and the politically unaffiliated gathered to protest the Nebraska bill as an outrageous southern aggression against the rights, interests, expectations, and moral convictions of Northerners. Along with the acrimonious debate in Congress and angry recriminations traded by northern and southern editors, these cross-party sectional gatherings in early 1854 seemed harbingers of intrasectional unity and permanent intersectional conflict. Understandably, if incorrectly, therefore, some historians have dated the death of the Whig party in early 1854 and attributed it to sectional divisions over the Nebraska bill that drove exasperated Whigs to new parties.⁵⁹

Some Whig leaders and editors from both sections did speak angrily in early 1854 about breaking away from former allies in the other section—what Whigs often called the "denationalization" of their party—and it is important to assess how representative and successful they were. It is even more important to emphasize the crucial distinction between, rather than to conflate, the readiness of some northern and southern Whigs to separate from each other and their readiness to abandon existing state and local Whig organizations in the North and South in order to join new sectional parties. Three separate but related steps were necessary for the collapse of national party organizations and the creation of sectional parties in their place. The first was a permanent rift between northern and southern leaders of the Whig party, or at least the majority of those leaders in each section. The second was an abandonment of the resulting sectional wings of the party by both Whig leaders and Whig voters. The third was the combination of those defecting Whigs with Democrats—and, in the North, with Free Soilers and abolitionists, as well—in new sectional phalanxes that were overtly hostile to the rival section.

By May 1854, when the Kansas-Nebraska Act finally passed and was signed by Pierce, a few Whigs in and outside Washington voiced a willingness to take all three steps. Since many northern Democrats opposed the Nebraska bill and half of them in the House voted against final passage, formation of a new sectional party seemed especially likely in the North. Significantly, however, in both North and South, the most ardent advocates of new sectional parties were primarily men who had already abandoned the Whigs and Democrats for third-party action.

Far more Whig leaders, though still probably not a majority of them, demanded or grudgingly accepted the inevitability of at least a temporary separation between the northern and southern wings of the Whig party because of the rancor stirred up by the Nebraska issue. The absolutely crucial point with regard to the dating of, and the explanation for, the death of the Whig party is that most of them saw no need to take steps two or three—abandoning their local Whig organizations and combining in new sectional parties with their former political enemies from the same section. They understood what it has been difficult for subsequent historians to comprehend. Aside from sessions of Congress themselves—and in the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress, Whigs and Democrats remained internally cohesive on most measures other than the Kansas-Nebraska Act—northern and southern Whigs did not need to cooperate with each other until it was time to nominate a presidential candidate in 1856. ⁶⁰ By that time a reconciliation across sectional lines might be possible. In the meantime—in 1854 and 1855—a sectional split between Whig leaders over national policy need not be fatal to the Whig party itself since Whig organizations could be preserved in both northern and southern states to compete with Democrats. Prior to 1850, after all, northern and southern Whigs had always campaigned in opposite ways on slavery questions. Why, some Whigs implicitly asked, could they not do so again?

Reactions of southern Whigs during the first half of 1854 well illustrate the vast difference among the three steps outlined above. Bitter accusations from northern Whigs about Southerners' betraval of the Whigs' national platform and of a sacred intersectional compact, and particularly their statement that no Northerner could coexist with slaveholders in the territories, deeply affronted southern Whigs' honor and convinced a number of them that they must deal no longer with their northern Whig tormentors. Thus southern Whig editors rang changes on the same theme: the necessity of seceding from the national Whig party. Northern Whigs' slurs about Southerners, concurred Georgia's Savannah Republican and Milledgeville Southern Recorder in March, necessitated the termination of a "party association that will not admit and treat us as equals." "The Whigs of Florida have already waived their party affinaties [sic] and allegiance with northern Whigs until they should give unmistakable evidence of repentence." echoed the Tallahassee Florida Sentinel in June. And in May, the Petersburg, Virginia, Intelligencer attempted to orchestrate a regionwide bolt by calling for a separate southern Whig convention to decide all southern Whigs' future course. "Such a convention as we propose may be termed sectional," its editor defiantly declared. "Well, let it be so. It is sectional, and meant to be so."61

At least some southern Whigs, in sum, were prepared to "denationalize" the Whig party. There is very little evidence, however, that many were yet prepared to abandon southern Whig state parties or to combine with Democrats in a new sectional party of the type that Calhoun and his acolytes had long envisioned. 62 Though southern state legislatures, usually with heavy bipartisan majorities, endorsed the Nebraska measure along with newspaper editors from both parties, no mass public meetings in support of the bill, comparable to the North's anti-Nebraska meetings, were held. 63

Southerners' widely noted public lethargy about the Nebraska bill no doubt helped dull Whig interest in bolting the party. Ignoring that disinterest, the two dispeptic ex-Whigs from Georgia, Toombs and Stephens, hoped to convert the depleted Georgia Union party, to which they still clung, into a bipartisan southern party that could force cooperation and concessions from Northerners still interested in intersectional comity. In 1854, they worked closely with both pro-Nebraska Democratic congressmen and the Pierce administration, and they rejoiced at the wedge the Nebraska controversy drove between northern and southern Whigs. Toombs told Solomon G. Haven in February that he "sought the entire separation of the South as a party from the north." In June, Stephens wrote supporters in Georgia that the country was now in better condition for a "reorganization" of parties than it had been in 1852, when he first attempted it. If southern Whigs and Democrats remained aloof from any cooperation with Northerners until they accepted the finality of both the Compromise of 1850 and the Kansas-Nebraska Act, Stephens rosily predicted, southern Whigs could ultimately achieve "a sound national party" upon "broad national, Republican principles." Neither other Whigs nor Georgia Democrats, however, showed much interest in this idea during 1854.⁶⁴

Prior to Congress' adjournment in August 1854, in fact, most southern Whigs had little interest in combining with southern Democrats, abandoning local and state Whig organizations, or, most significantly, separating permanently or even temporarily from their northern Whig counterparts. A number of indices point to this conclusion. Most pro-Nebraska southern Whig congressmen did not intend their support for the bill to indicate a break with northern Whig colleagues or a bolt from the party. Clayton expressly voiced regret that northern Whigs were angered by southern support for the bill, and Badger clearly intended his amendment to alleviate northern concerns that repeal of the Missouri prohibition would automatically reinstate the proslavery French laws in the territory.⁶⁵ On matters not related to Nebraska, moreover, southern and northern Whigs continued to cooperate. At the close of the congressional session in August, Bell reported that all southern Whig congressmen, except Stephens and Toombs, had abandoned the attempt "to get up a new party, & are willing to be anointed Whigs, at least until they perceive that the party is more clearly doomed than it seems at present."

Within the South itself, numerous Whigs expressed second thoughts about the wisdom of the Nebraska bill and of splitting from northern Whigs for separate action or new combinations. To the Petersburg Intelligencer's call for a separate southern Whig convention, for example, the Mobile, Alabama, Register retorted in July with a list of fifteen prominent southern Whig papers that opposed the scheme of sectionalizing the party as "impolitic, uncalled for and mischievous." On July 1, the Louisville Journal proclaimed that "if we have at any time expressed fears of the imminent disruption and dissolution of [the Whig party's] present organization, we have never felt the slightest apprehension of its death." Admitting that southern Whig support for the Nebraska bill had been a huge blunder because it so incensed "our Northern allies," George Bryan, the stalwart though isolated Whig from Charleston, South Carolina, worried in August if "the unity, the nationality of the Whig party [were] a possible thing." Others answered emphatically that it was or was at least worth working to restore.⁶⁷

Indeed, some southern Whigs believed they had already found a national champion who would preserve the party and lead it to victory. Despite the qualms of some northern friends and the necessity of postponing his plans to proselytize for a new Union party, Millard Fillmore, accompanied by John P. Kennedy, toured the Mississippi Valley and a few other southern states in the spring of 1854 before Congress finally passed the Nebraska bill. From everywhere he went—indeed, from southern cities he never got near—came stunning reports of extraordinary Whig enthusiasm for Fillmore, of certainty that he could carry the South as a presidential candidate in 1856, and, most important, of renewed commitment among the rank and file to the Whig party itself. So long as a northern Whig like Fillmore appeared capable of winning the Whig presidential nomination in 1856—and to many southern Whigs in 1854 it apparently seemed inconceivable that he would not-most southern Whigs had no intention of breaking away from northern Whigs or abandoning southern Whig organizations. As the jubilant Virginian Stuart concluded at the end of Fillmore's trip in mid-May, "The Nebraska bill, which was intended to demolish the Whig party, seems likely [instead] to perform that kind of office for its inventors." A far more important indication of southern Whigs' determination to adhere to the old organization in 1854 was that in every slave state that held congressional or gubernatorial elections prior to November, the Whigs, rather than some new party, continued to do battle with the Democrats. 68

Southern Whigs' enthusiasm for Fillmore and the Whig party, however, did not negate the chief threat to national Whig unity: fury among northern Whigs that southern Whig votes for the Nebraska bill constituted an unforgivable betrayal. Some southern Whigs openly condemned that support as a mistake, and others—Kennedy and George Bryan, for example—expressed the hope that northern Whigs' anger would dissipate once it became clear that slavery would not expand to either Kansas or Nebraska. Still others sought to propitiate Northerners in an attempt to save the national party. On July 1, for example, a St. Louis Whig begged Fillmore to indicate what "course the Whigs of the South should pursue to secure the cooperation of their Northern brethren, and to avoid the consequences of the Douglas bombshell."

Though this Whig's willingness to support restoration of the Missouri Compromise's restriction on slavery extension in order to prevent sectional rupture was wildly atypical—even southern Whigs who rued the Nebraska Act considered its repeal politically impossible—his diagnosis of the menace to Whig unity was on the mark. All southern Whigs, except those in Delaware, proved willing to retain the Whig label during the elections of 1854, but ultimately, their continued loyalty to the party, and with it the future of the national Whig party, depended upon northern Whigs' willingness to let bygones be bygones. As John Bell wrote home in August, "The course of the Northern Whigs will decide whether we can unite with them or not."

V

From the moment of Badger's announcement on February 16, the chances that northern Whigs would bolt the party and unite with others in a new northern antislayery party had always been greater than the chances that southern Whigs would defect. With varying degrees of dismayed regret or bitter outrage, northern Whigs declared that, as a bisectional or national coalition, the Whig party was finished. "We no longer have any bond to Southern Whigs," Seward wrote his wife on the very day Badger spoke. "This Nebraska business will entirely denationalize the Whig party," Thurlow Weed concurred. The Nebraska bill has provoked "the ultimate disruption and denationalization of the Whig party," chimed the Ohio State Journal from Columbus in mid-April. "The Whig party has been killed off effectually by that miserable Nebraska business," echoed the disgusted Truman Smith in May. The "break" was "final," he declared. "We could not heal it if we would & would not if we could." At their mid-February meeting, southern Whigs "had made up their minds to sever forever all further connection with their northern brethren," snarled Ben Wade. "And most effectively have they done it. After this I hope to hear no more of national parties."⁷¹

Initially, northern conservatives also fumed at southern Whigs' betrayal and seemed just as certain that, as Haven moaned, "it cuts off all communion between us & the Whigs of the South." "What party are we to belong to hereafter?" asked one of Hamilton Fish's correspondents. "Not the Whig party I fear—for it seems to me that it must cease to exist as a national party" because of "the unanimous desertion of us on this question by the southern Whigs." The speeches by Clayton and Badger, groaned Maine's conservative Edward Kent in March, "ring forever the knell of the Whig party as a national party." "Never was a greater mistake made than in passing the Nebraska bill," summarized Winthrop in June. Had southern Whigs only rallied "en masse" against it, "we should have had a party now & a President two years hence. As I see it, nothing ahead but discord & deviltry."

Most Free Soilers did all they could to foment such "discord & deviltry" by pressing northern Whigs to join a new, exclusively northern, antislavery party in protest against the Nebraska Act and slavery extension. Precisely the presence of a preexisting sectional third party in the North, indeed, increased the likelihood of building a broader sectional party there. "Whigs who have any patriotism will not attempt to reorganize their party now," argued Samuel Lewis, Ohio's 1853 Free Soil gubernatorial candidate, 73 and other Free Soilers begged northern Whig leaders to repudiate their southern Whig allies and abandon northern Whig organizations in order to form such a party. "It is impossible to unite the north on the old Whig basis," a Maine Free Soiler told Whig Senator William Pitt Fessenden. Northern Whigs must "give up the idea of reconstructing the old Whig party" and instead unite with all other antislavery men "on equal terms." "You must separate from the Southern Whigs or all is lost," declared Massachusetts' Henry Wilson to Maine's Whig Representative Israel Washburn, Jr. "Our friends in this State will make any concessions but we will do all we can to crush the national Whig party," he warned. "Decide and we can sweep the free states continue to act with the Southern Whigs and you will fail and ought to fail. Now is the time for action, bold decisive action." "The Whig party has been a noble party in its day, in many respects," Gamaliel Bailey, editor of the Free Soil Washington National Era, wrote James S. Pike, yet another Maine Whig and a Washington reporter for both Greeley's New York Tribune and Weed's Albany Evening Journal. But "we all know that it was not organized with any view to antislavery issues, that as a National party it has never been sufficient to the protection of Freedom, that the great Question now before us must be met by a different kind of organization, by new tactics, by new ideas."74

The primary target of Free Soil supplications, however, was Seward, the preeminent leader of the North's antislavery Whigs. Boston's abolitionist minister Theodore Parker urged him to help organize a national, or at least regionwide, convention of northern antislavery men in the summer of 1854 to launch a new party. "The time has come to dissolve the infamous union of Whigs of the North and South," echoed Wilson. Seward was Wilson's preferred presidential candidate for 1856, cooed the Free Soiler, but not if he was the candidate "of the united Whig party. I will never act with or vote for the candidate of the Badgers', Toombs', & Dixons' of the South." Instead Wilson would "do all in my power" to build a new antislavery northern party and "to defeat all efforts to reconstruct and hold up the national Whig party." He hoped Seward, too, "will do all in your power to make a North—to combine in one great party all the friends of freedom."

The very stridency of Free Soilers' language, the very urgency of their pleas that northern Whigs repudiate alliance with Southerners, point to a fact of central importance—and deep embarrassment to those who attribute the Whig party's death to a sectional rupture over the Nebraska Act. By the time Congress adjourned on August 7, 1854, few northern Whigs in Washington or in the states were inclined to break permanently with their southern Whig allies, let alone to abandon northern Whig organizations for new affiliations with Democrats and Free Soilers. To the contrary, many seemed disposed "to reconstruct and hold up the national Whig party."

During the ten-week struggle over the Nebraska bill in the House, for example, there was no coordination among its polyglot Free Soil, Whig, and Democratic opponents. "Party names & prejudices are the cords that bind the Sampson of the North," moaned Bailey, who, along with Preston King, the former Barnburner and Free Soil congressman from New York, sought for weeks to arrange a caucus of anti-Nebraska men to agree upon tactics. They finally succeeded only on the evening of May 21, when final passage on the following day was certain, and even the frantic Bailey admitted at that point that the only hope of launching a new party from Washington was the issuance of an address protesting the act signed by all its opponents "without distinction of party."

As Bailey's list of the men who arranged this last-minute caucus indicated, moreover, even among anti-Nebraska Whig representatives, three separate blocs operated independently of each other. The floor leaders of the most ardent antislavery northern Whigs—the Whigs most likely to bolt the party for an alliance with Free Soilers—were Ohio's Lew Campbell, Maine's Israel Washburn, and his brother, Illinois Congressman Elihu B. Washburne, who had added an "e" to the family name. Three Massachusetts Whig congressmen—Thomas Eliot, Edward Dickinson, and John Z. Goodrich—cooperated closely with this group. Significantly, however, the firmest New York Sewardites in the House—Russell Sage, Orsamus B. Matteson, and Edwin B. Morgan—conspicuously conceded leadership of antislavery Whigs to non-New Yorkers not closely identified with Seward. The harsh antisouthern stance assumed by Campbell and Washburn caused southern Whig opponents of the bill—Hunt of Louisiana, Rogers and Puryear of North Carolina, and Etheridge, Bugg, Cullom, and Taylor of Tennessee—to give them a wide berth and, for the most part, to steer an independent course. When these Southerners cooperated openly with northern Whigs, it was with the third distinctive bloc, northern conservatives like Fillmore's spokesman Haven, the Massachusetts Websterite Samuel Walley, Philadelphia's Joseph Chandler, E. Wilder Farley of Maine, and Ohio's John Taylor. Northern conservative Whigs, in sum, provided the most obvious bridge across the chasm that threatened to separate northern and southern Whigs over the Nebraska bill. They provided the first but hardly the last—hope of preventing the denationalization of the Whig party.⁷⁷

Conservatives like Haven and Farley had no intention of breaking with southern Whigs or cooperating with Free Soilers because of the Nebraska bill. Despite the discouragement Haven expressed in February about being cut off from southern Whigs after Badger's announcement, he and other conservatives took heart from the greater southern Whig opposition to Nebraska in the House. Even Truman Smith, who had given up on the Whig party before the session opened, who resigned his Senate seat in disgust in late May, and who vowed never to have anything to do with southern Whig supporters of the bill, singled out Hunt, Cullom, and Etheridge for praise. Conservatives deemed their courageous stand against Nebraska, along with Bell's, the reason that the alliance with southern Whigs could and should be preserved. Now that Democratic support for the Nebraska Act had once again derailed the possibility of building a new Union party, moreover, conservatives like Haven rejoiced at Fillmore's enthusiastic reception in the South. Together with the continuing strength of conservatives in Philadelphia and New York City, it resuscitated their hope that conservatives could take control of the national Whig organization and make Fillmore Whigs' presidential nominee in 1856. But that possibility depended upon retaining an alliance with southern Whigs.⁷⁸

If hope of reviving an alliance with southern Whigs that could win the 1856 nomination for Fillmore motivated some northern conservatives, their revulsion at cooperating with antislavery fanatics killed any thought of merging with Free Soilers. Long before the Kansas-Nebraska Act passed Congress, indeed, conservatives had moved to expunge any Free Soil taint from the anti-Nebraska movement. They sought to keep anti-Nebraska protests as moderate as possible, to focus them exclusively on the injustice of overturning the Missouri restriction, and to prevent Free Soilers from so radicalizing anti-Nebraska meetings with demands for abolition in the District of Columbia or repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act that southern Whigs would be permanently alienated.

In Massachusetts, for example, Winthrop addressed a protest meeting at Boston's Faneuil Hall to tone it down, and for the same reason he asked Everett to write noninflammatory anti-Nebraska resolutions for the Massachusetts legislature to pass. These were not the only Whigs worried about the radicalization of the Whig party. "The Southern Senators are not so much to blame as those scoundels from the North," Judge David Davis of Illinois advised Julius Rockwell, the Massachusetts Whig who had been appointed to take Everett's Senate seat, in July. "Try to save the Whig party," he implored. "I don't fancy it being abolitionized—although no one can be more opposed to [the] admission [of] Nebraska than I am." After his resignation from the Senate, Everett worked successfully toward that same goal, and by the end of August he rejoiced in relief that in Massachusetts "there will be no fusion of the Whigs and freesoilers."

In Ohio, ex-Senator Thomas Ewing diverted his attention from his salt and coal-mining businesses long enough to send a public letter to a state anti-Nebraska convention at Columbus in March. Alerted by an enthusiastic friend that circumstances might make Ewing himself president in 1856, Ewing clearly hoped to quash Free Soil radicalism and hold open the possibility of southern Whig support. His letter insisted that the meeting's resolutions should, with "calmness, prudence, and consideration," focus exclusively on the threatened repeal of the Missouri restriction, "single and alone." He also flagrantly courted Southerners and thereby infuriated antislavery extremists by proposing that "a due proportion of newly acquired territory should be opened to the unobstructed occupancy of each section of the Union." Since this remarkable statement implied that slaveholders had a legitimate right to take slaves to at least some federal territories, it seemed to endorse the idea that Kansas should be slave and Nebraska free. Ewing's ally Oran Follett, editor of the Columbus Ohio State Journal, went even further to appease southern Whigs. In mid-April he bitterly announced that the Nebraska bill had denationalized the Whig party, but only a few days later he attempted to renationalize it. Citing the danger that on "this Missouri question" the entire North could be bulldozed "into freesoil-ism or semi-abolitionism," he argued that Whigs should ignore the repeal of the Missouri Compromise to avoid "the Abolition taint." In late April, therefore, he floated an editorial proposal that would concede to Southerners the right to take slaves to the new territory but abolish the three-fifths rule regarding representation of slaves in Congress for any new states admitted from it. "We would not seek to abolish slavery," he excitedly wrote Ewing. "We would simply sink it to its municipal character, and when it will no longer confer political power, it will soon pass away." ⁸⁰

Hostile to Free Soilers and determined to reach out to southern Whigs, northern conservatives also shunned attempts by Free Soilers to orchestrate the formation of a new party from Washington. The principal part of what Seward dismissed as Free Soilers' scheme for "dissolving the Whig party" was to bring as many anti-Nebraska men from all parties together as possible to issue a public protest that could launch the new party. 81 On June 20, Free Soilers succeeded in arranging a gathering of anti-Nebraska congressmen at the National Hotel to write an address. Drafted by a committee of Whigs and Democrats, the meeting's address sought to attract as many signatures as possible. Thus its tone was, in Seward's words, of "utmost moderation," in contrast with the Free Soilers' appeal in January. 82 Though the protest blamed the Nebraska Act on Pierce's administration and "the slaveholding power." though it condemned the law as a violation of both parties' 1852 national platforms, and though it rued the possible spread of slavery, it spoke only of restoring the Missouri Compromise line and recovering "the ground lost to freedom," not the full antislavery agenda pushed by Free Soilers. It also failed to call for creation of a new sectional party. Indeed, it explicitly repudiated sectionalism. "We appeal in no sectional spirit," vowed the authors. "We appeal to the North and to the South, to the free states and to the slaveholding states themselves."

According to Free Soilers and northern Whigs now desirous of a new antislavery coalition with them, the "tame" language and lack of a "trumpet tone" in the address, and the failure to name the men who had signed it, would prevent the consolidation of anti-Nebraska forces in the North. Still, southern anti-Nebraska Whigs considered the address offensive, and precisely because they did so, the small bloc of conservative northern Whig congressmen headed by Haven, Chandler, and Walley refused to sign it. Even though the address had been intentionally watered down to gain support from such conservatives, sneered Israel Washburn in disgust, six or seven "weak-backs" from the North "would have nothing to do with" it. Washburn thought he knew why. The goal of "southern Whigs & Fillmore men" was to make Fillmore president, and that goal required "acquiescence in the Miss. repeal & unquestioning submission to the Slave Power to be secured by continuing the present national organization of the Whig party."

The furious Washburn was one of the few northern Whig congressmen who, by the summer of 1854, were clearly ready to bolt the Whig party for a new antislavery coalition that would wage unrelenting political war against slavery expansion and southern slaveholders. His brother Elihu, the Massachusetts Whigs Thomas Eliot and Edward Dickinson, Ohio's Senator Ben Wade and Congressman

Lew Campbell, and the just-resigned Connecticut Senator Truman Smith also seemed ready to form a broader anti-Nebraska coalition to conduct the 1854 campaigns in the North. Prior to Congress' adjournment in August, however, most northern Whigs evinced little interest in abandoning northern Whig organizations for a new sectional party. Aside from deep-seated distrust of former Free Soil and Democratic enemies, they were convinced that the contrast between Democratic responsibility for, and their own opposition to, the Nebraska Act guaranteed Whig victories in the 1854 elections. If anti-Nebraska Democrats and Free Soilers wanted to support Whig candidates in order to repudiate Pierce, Douglas, and the Democratic party, they were delighted to accept that support. But they saw no need to jettison the Whig party in order to get it, and in many parts of the North they believed they could win without it. In sum, they saw no need for a new antislavery party to win. And they had no desire to share either the glory or the material benefits of those impending triumphs with Democrats and Free Soilers, as formally joining new parties would surely require them to do. Property in the same parties would surely require them to do.

Northern Whigs who spoke of riding the anti-Nebraska wave to power clearly expected Free Soil and even anti-Nebraska Democratic support without the need of formal new parties. By early April, for example, constituents of Illinois Whig Congressman Richard Yates informed him that the universal outrage in his district among all parties made his reelection certain. "The Whig party of the North is, this day, stronger than at any other period" because Democrats could be blamed for the Nebraska bill, a Pittsburgh Whig informed James Pollock, Pennsylvania's Whig gubernatorial candidate, in May. The hope that Whigs could win reinforcements from Free Soilers with a few sops—in sharp contrast to the complete abandonment of the Whig party for a new coalition in which all anti-Nebraska elements were treated "on equal terms," as Free Soilers demanded was made clear by Russell Errett and D. N. White, editors of the Pittsburgh Gazette, one of the most influential Whig papers west of the Alleghenies. In July they proudly called the anti-Nebraska address issued by the Whig state committee a "platform broad enough to secure the cooperation of every Anti-Slavery man in the State." Similarly, on May 26, just at the time Free Soilers in Washington were trying to orchestrate the creation of a new party, Thurlow Weed declared in the Albany Evening Journal that only Whigs could win in 1854 and that, "so far, we have not found freedom practically advanced one step except by the Whig party." In case anyone missed the point, Weed iterated two months later: "Having found the Whig party of the North, on all occasions, and in every emergency, the most efficient and reliable organization both to resist the aggressions of Slavery and to uphold the cause of Freedom, we concur...that it is best, now and ever, 'for the Whig party to stand by its colors.' "86

VI

No antislavery Whigs opposed a new antisouthern party so intransigently and thereby did more to frustrate the plans of Free Soilers, in fact, than did Seward, his New York Whig allies in Congress, and their mentor, Weed, in Albany. To Theodore Parker's pleas that Seward help arrange a national convention that could combine all antislavery men, Seward coldly replied, "We are not yet ready for a great National Convention at Buffalo or elsewhere. . . . The States are the places for activity just now. They have elections for Senators & Congressmen coming off in the Autumn." Seward's reference to "Senators" makes it clear how much his own reelection spurred his and Weed's determination to preserve the Whig organization. It also reflects how much his and his allies' confidence that Whigs could defeat Democrats with the anti-Nebraska issue rested on the outcome of state contests earlier that year.⁸⁷

New England's spring elections in 1854 did not constitute a clear referendum on the Nebraska bill. They occurred between Senate and House action on the measure, when many people still expected it to be stopped in the House. In all three states, moreover, Democratic candidates tried to ignore the Nebraska issue or contended that it was irrelevant to gubernatorial and legislative contests, while rival Democratic papers in a particular state often took opposite stands, endorsing or condemning the bill. Nonetheless, Whigs everywhere campaigned against Democratic responsibility for the odious measure, and by mid-April it was clear that anti-Nebraska sentiment helped them, if only by depressing Democratic turnout. New England's results also seemed to show that Free Soilers would cooperate with Whigs against Democrats even without a formal merger. What Seward and other Whigs who believed that what Congress did would spark a Whig comeback apparently ignored about those results, however, is that Whigs alone did not benefit from anti-Nebraska sentiment and that voters had far more on their minds than just Nebraska.

Rhode Island's elections produced the least ambiguous Whig victory, if only because they were two-party contests. Whigs prevailed in the gubernatorial contest primarily because of Democratic abstentions, not Whig gains. The Democratic vote plunged by almost 40 percent from the previous year. With 58.4 percent of the vote compared to his predecessor's 42.9 percent, William W. Hoppin became the first Whig governor in four years.⁸⁸

New Hampshire's March elections were symbolically important because they occurred in Franklin Pierce's home state, but they suggested less cause for Whig confidence than Rhode Island's. To Pierce's chagrin, his state party refused to mention, let alone endorse, the Nebraska bill, and only that silence probably prevented Whigs and Free Soilers from scoring a major upset. Former Congressman Amos Tuck, however, exaggerated when he jubilantly concluded that "the Whigs and free soilers are welded together in this State, and cannot again be separated." The two camps shared an antipathy to the Nebraska bill and to the state's reigning Democratic dynasty, but they ran their own candidates for the legislature and governor.⁸⁹

Free Soilers, indeed, appeared to benefit more from the anti-Nebraska backlash than Whigs. After the 1853 elections, Democrats had enjoyed a fifty-two-seat majority in the state house of representatives over the combined forces of Whigs and Free Soilers, but in 1854 Democrats lost twenty-three seats, Whigs gained eleven, and Free Soilers added seventeen, thereby reducing the Democratic margin to one. Still, holdovers with the power to fill empty seats left the senate securely in Democrats' control, and in the gubernatorial contest their majority slipped only from 54.7 to 51.3 percent between 1853 and 1854. In the latter race, indeed, the Free Soilers, with some success, blatantly attempted to encourage Whig defections by running former Whig Congressman Jared Perkins as their candidate. He ran

3,000 votes ahead of his Free Soil predecessor in 1853 and increased the third party's share of the cast vote from 14 to 19 percent. Meanwhile, James Bell, the Whig candidate in both years, suffered a decline in his absolute and proportionate votes despite the Whig crusade against Nebraska.⁹⁰

Nor did Connecticut's results point unambiguously to the ability of the Nebraska issue to revive Whiggery. In 1853, when prohibition remained the most salient issue, Connecticut's Whigs had suffered a disaster. They had plummeted to a meager 34 percent of the popular vote in the gubernatorial election, 30 percent of the seats in the lower house of the legislature, and less than a fourth of the senate seats. When 1854 opened, many politicians in the state expected that prohibition would again be the central issue. Democratic Governor Thomas Seymour had vetoed a local-option temperance law that the legislature passed in 1853. Even though the most ardent dries opposed the bill as too weak, that veto, together with the Free Soil party's abandonment of its pro-Maine Law candidate, Francis Gillette, and Whigs' determination to stick with the notorious wet Henry Dutton caused prohibitionists to nominate their own legislative and gubernatorial candidates, headed by Hartford Whig Charles Chapman for governor. The Nebraska bill, in sum, was only one of several issues. Nonetheless, outrage against it—even the Democratic Hartford Times denounced it—was so widespread that Whigs shunned all other issues and expressed confidence that their anti-Nebraska stance would produce victory, especially since Connecticut's Democratic Senator Isaac Toucev had voted for the bill in March.91

At first blush, April's results seemed to prove that confidence well founded. Whigs recaptured control of the state senate and helped reduce the Democrats from a 65 percent majority to a 40 percent minority in the house by adding forty-two new Whig seats. Those gains guaranteed election of a Whig governor by that body, as well as the ability of Whigs to choose a successor to Senator Truman Smith. Thus Whig papers like Greeley's New York Tribune, Henry J. Raymond's New York Times, and Samuel Bowles's Springfield, Massachusetts, Republican hailed the results as a spectacular Whig triumph. "We have had another political revolution in Connecticut growing out of the excitement in relation to the Nebraska Kansas outrage and the Maine law temperance question," Roger Sherman Baldwin wrote his son. "2"

Baldwin's inclusion of prohibition was crucial; Whigs' ability to win with the Nebraska issue was not nearly as clear-cut as it appeared to Seward and other Whigs in Washington. While the Connecticut legislature would elect the Whig Dutton governor, he in fact received a smaller vote and a smaller proportion of the vote than he had in the 1853 debacle. There were four gubernatorial tickets, and anti-Democratic voters refused to combine behind the wet Dutton. Despite the Nebraska issue, Free Soilers' total plunged from 8,926 (14.6 percent) in 1853 to 2,560 (4.2 percent) in 1854. Their decline, in turn, reflected defections to the prohibitionist Chapman, whom angry dries kept in the race after the emergence of the Nebraska issue specifically to prevent opponents of the Democrats from concentrating behind the hated Dutton. Chapman drew over 10,000 votes (17.4 percent) compared to Dutton's 19,465 (31.8 percent). Dry Whigs who bolted the party for the Free Soiler Francis Gillette in 1853 continued to boycott the straight Whig ticket. Even dissident Democrats and previous nonvoters preferred Chapman to Dutton, despite the Nebraska issue.⁹³

The rebellious prohibition party also elected seven men to the lower house of the legislature, and Free Soilers also added six seats to bring their total to seventeen. Splinter parties, rather than the Whigs, in sum, gained almost a fourth of the seats lost by Democrats. Many of the new Whig members, moreover, were either outright Free Soilers or abolitionist sympathizers who had been put on Whig tickets to attract antislavery voters who normally refused to support Whigs. "The election is a glorious triumph of F[ree] D[emocratic] principles," gloated one Free Soiler. "The Whigs do not claim it as a Whig victory—it is ours." That boast was surely overblown, but Whigs acknowledged their dependence upon an alliance with Free Soilers when the new legislature met in May, a month after the elections. That body had already planned to elect a successor to Truman Smith, whose Senate term ended in March 1855, but Smith's resignation allowed it to name someone to complete his term as well as his successor. Although Whigs constituted the overwhelming majority of the anti-Democratic forces in both legislative chambers, they conceded from the start that a non-Whig, either the prohibitionist Chapman or Francis Gillette, the Free Soilers' pro-Maine Law gubernatorial candidate in 1853, should succeed Smith immediately. Prohibitionists and a number of Whigs tried to hold out for Chapman, but Gillette ultimately got the nod, while Lafayette Foster, the Whigs' unsuccessful gubernatorial candidate in 1850 and 1851, was given the new six-year Senate term that began in March 1855.94

Connecticut's Whigs had undeniably rebounded behind the Nebraska issue. But antislavery and antiliquor sentiments had tended to fragment opponents of the Democrats, not unite them behind the Whig party. Whigs' subsequent cooperation with Free Soilers in the legislature, moreover, suggested that many of them might indeed be prepared to abandon the Whig organization to "unite with the Free Democracy on the broad platform of freedom from rum and Slavery."

Seward, Weed, and New York's Whigs, however, most emphatically were not—at least not in 1854. Like Whigs in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Vermont, and elsewhere, they believed that they could ride the Nebraska issue to victory in 1854. They therefore spurned formal mergers with Free Soilers in a new party. Yet what most differentiated Sewardites from other northern Whigs who wanted to perpetuate state and local Whig organizations—and what most infuriated Free Soilers about their refusal to jettison the Whig party—was that Sewardites also sought to keep conservative Silver Grays in the New York party, and Silver Grays adamantly opposed any cooperation whatsoever with Free Soilers. Of greater importance still, Seward, Weed, and their closest New York lieutenants were resolutely determined to preserve an alliance with southern Whigs. They insisted on maintaining the Whigs as a national party.

Even in February, when Seward wrote of a split with southern Whigs and Weed warned that Nebraska would "denationalize the Whig party," their tone had been one of regret and sorrow, not bitterness or glee. "I cannot see how or where good can come out of it," Weed had said despairingly to Fish. Once it became clear that Bell in the Senate and even more southern Whigs in the House would oppose the Nebraska bill, therefore, they instantly reached out to the Southerners. With the enthusiastic concurrence of their New York lieutenants in the House like Matteson and Morgan, they lavishly praised Bell, Etheridge, Cullom, Hunt, and the others, as well as northern conservatives like Haven, in their papers, the Albany Evening Journal and the New York Times. Thus, when Henry J. Raymond, the editor of the Times, privately urged Maine's Fessenden to resist "a formal disbandonment of the Whig party" and argued in his editorials against the "disbanding of a strong, disciplined, and well organized [Whig] army," he emphatically meant to include southern Whigs and northern conservatives as soldiers in it."

Seward contemptuously regarded as "absurdities" the "schemes" of Free Soilers for "dissolving the Whig party," and he did all he could personally to keep southern Whigs under the Whig umbrella. On February 17 and again on May 26, Seward delivered Senate speeches against the Nebraska bill, and he previewed the latter in an important speech in New York in early May. He blasted the fraudulence of the Democratic rationale for the bill, condemned the overturning of the Missouri Compromise as unconscionable, iterated the impossibility of slavery and free labor coexisting in the new territories, and described the difference between freedom and slavery as one "between truth and error, between right and wrong." But he did not declare war against Southerners or engage in scaremongering about the threat of slavery expansion, as Wade and some other northern Whigs did. Rather, he spoke calmly, if resolutely, about accepting the South's challenge to compete for control of Kansas and Nebraska and reassuringly about the certainty that Northerners would win such a contest and thereby bring sectional agitation over slavery to a close. The Union would endure, Seward insisted: North and South could not separate. The nation, he hymned in what many correctly interpreted as an effort to get men to look beyond current sectional quarrels, was destined for a glorious future of development and expansion. Since most southern Whigs—even those who had voted for the Kansas-Nebraska Act agreed with Seward's conclusion that slavery would never be established in the new territories and yearned for the intersectional harmony he promised in the future, Seward's argument, as furious Free Soilers were quick to see, represented a peace offering to them.97

"I wish I could take as hopeful a view as you do of the future that awaits us, on this question," gushed the conservative Everett after reading a copy of Seward's May speech. "Your hopeful bearing, & assurances—the future which you see & depict—have done more to encourage me than anything else I have seen or heard," chimed Raymond from New York City. Coupled with Weed's simultaneous editorial in the Albany Evening Journal calling for preservation of the Whig party, that same speech caused Gamaliel Bailey to snap, "Seward hangs fire." He and Weed clearly meant to preserve the Whigs as a "National party." Referring to Seward's New York preview of that May speech, Henry Wilson protested, "I think I see in it an idea of going on to concentrate the Whig party as a National Party—to keep up the union of the Northern and Southern Whigs." Seward had suddenly become the darling of conservatives and southern Whigs since he sought the preservation of the Whig party, yelped the proponents of a new party from Maine, "and every earnest friend of freedom regrets it." "98

VII

When Congress adjourned on August 7, 1854, in sum, the sectional disagreement among Whigs over the Kansas-Nebraska Act had not yet completely denation-

alized the party, let alone destroyed its local and state organizations in the North and South. The future of the Whig party remained unclear. Some men spoke of abandoning the party, and key northern Whig leaders were prepared to combine with Free Soilers and anti-Nebraska Democrats in a new sectional party. But others were not. They wanted to make the northern Whig party the anti-Nebraska party, and Seward and Weed in particular fought to preserve the Whigs as a national party and to sabotage a formal merger with Free Soilers that would require a break with northern conservatives and southern Whigs. By mid-summer they appeared to be so successful that many Whigs dreamed of electing the next president in 1856 and anticipated that the fight for the party's nomination would be between those old New York rivals, Seward and Fillmore. All the signs, Fillmore's Warwick Kennedy assured a friend in early October, pointed to the election of a new Whig president two years hence.⁹⁹

At the same time, precisely the refusal of Sewardites and conservatives to abandon the party and combine with Free Soilers, as well as their efforts to soften the antisouthern tone of anti-Nebraska rhetoric, gave heart to southern Whigs like John Bell. "The course of the Northern Whigs will decide whether we can unite with them or not," he predicted on August 10. "The Whigs of Massts have set the example of declining any party or other annexion with the abolitionists & freesoilers. This is noble conduct, & I hope will have a decided effect in moderating the violence of Whigs in other states." 100

In June, Seward had also emphasized that "the States are the places for activity just now. They have elections for Senators & Congressmen coming off in the Autumn." Ultimately, in fact, the Whig party's fate was determined not in Washington, but in the state and congressional elections of 1854 and 1855. When Whigs prepared to campaign for those elections, however, they confronted a bewildering complexity of problems and difficulties that made sectional resentments within the national party seem simple by contrast. In the North, for example, the willingness of Whigs to preserve the old party or to abandon it for new coalitions varied not only from state to state, but also from congressional district to congressional district within individual states. Once Whigs shifted their attention from Washington to the states, moreover, in both North and South they discovered that voters did not always share the agenda or priorities of Whig congressmen. Instead, they encountered a cluster of issues that had nothing to do with slavery but mattered far more to many Whig and non-Whig voters than the Nebraska bill. Most important, once Whigs focused on developments within the states, rather than those in Washington during the first half of 1854, they collided with a burgeoning Know Nothing movement that abruptly shattered all calculations based on the potential impact of "this Nebraska business" and that threatened, far more seriously than did the entreaties from Free Soilers for a new antislavery organization, to disembowel the Whig party. 101

Chapter 23

"The Whig Party, as a Party, Are Entirely Disbanded"

"The Whig Party of the North is, this day, stronger than at any former period," Pittsburgh's William Larimer wrote James Pollock in March 1854, several weeks after Pennsylvania's Whig state convention selected Pollock over Larimer as the party's gubernatorial nominee. "Occupying as she now does, the true Republican ground, the policy of the opposition is making her a unit, and is doing more to render her invincible than all the efforts of her most astute political tacticians could accomplish." Many northern Whigs shared Larimer's confidence that Democratic responsibility for the Nebraska bill guaranteed Whig victories that year. That Larimer was an erstwhile Free Soiler epitomized Whigs' hope that all opponents of Nebraska and other Democratic measures might now rally behind the Whig banner. That he saw opposition to slavery extension and Slave Power aggressions as a reaffirmation of fundamental republican principles illustrates the remarkable persistence of those inherited values. That Larimer, like many others, capitalized "Republican" unintentionally indicated one route by which a different organization would usurp the Whig party's mission to rescue public liberty.

By late March, indeed, when Larimer wrote Pollock, and certainly by May, when newspapers published his letter, other political observers would have disputed his rosy prediction about Whigs' unity and invincibility. Northern Whigs might condemn slavery expansion and Slave Power aggressions to win at home in 1854, but that tack could permanently alienate Southerners from the party. Nor were northern Whigs united about how best to exploit anti-Nebraska sentiment. Some advocated abandoning the party, if only temporarily, for broader anti-Nebraska coalitions to ensure that Democratic candidates were rebuked. Others, hoping to preserve northern Whig organizations intact, often feuded over how far the party should go to reach out to non-Whigs, particularly militantly antislavery Free Soilers. Astute observers, moreover, doubted Whigs' invincibility because they doubted that the upcoming elections would be clear-cut referenda on the Nebraska Act and other actions by Democrats in Washington. Ominous evidence existed during the spring and summer of 1854 that voters insisted instead that politicians confront matters that fell within the jurisdiction of local governments and state legislatures, matters that often divided Whigs against each other. Yet Whig leaders dared not straddle or evade them, for the groups most intensely interested in those issues threatened to start new parties to address them if the existing parties would not.

Because the vast majority of the elections slated for 1854 and 1855 involved neither governorships nor congressional seats but instead state legislators and local officials chosen from relatively small districts, they would occur in precisely the geographically limited arenas where new parties could easily distribute ballots and mount credible challenges to the major parties. Once insurgent organizations made the decision to print tickets of their own, moreover, they might run their own candidates for Congress and statewide offices as well. All in all, the new concerns transforming the political agenda outside of Washington threatened to rend, not unite, the Whig party and to render it anything but invincible.

Northern Whigs' hopes in particular were jeopardized by the same cluster of issues that had divided and drained the Whig vote in 1853: the cry for reform to cleanse government of arrogantly unresponsive, spoils-oriented politicos associated by the public with both major parties; burgeoning resentment of immigrants; and escalating anger at Catholics. Northern states also suffered from what one Indiana Democrat called the temperance "disease." In New England's spring elections of 1854, when Whigs tried to exploit mushrooming anti-Nebraska sentiment, zealous prohibitionists fragmented the potential Whig vote, and they seemed likely to remain a divisive force in Vermont, Maine, and Massachusetts that fall. From New York, Democratic Governor Horatio Seymour, who had apparently sewed up the wet vote by vetoing an antiliquor bill in 1853, assured Secretary of State William L. Marcy that prohibition would dominate the 1854 race and chortled that Whigs were "at a loss in the Maine Law question" because of their internal divisions over it. Whig friends of Seward agreed that the prohibition issue would be critical in the fall elections and that it would undoubtedly "trouble us" and "play the very 'dickens' with party lines." Nonetheless, dry Whigs bluntly insisted to Seward and his lieutenants that the party could not carry New York in 1854 on the anti-Nebraska issue alone, that "party leaders should understand that the people are in earnest in their advocacy of the Maine Law," and "that the Whigs must sail in our cold water ship or sink."

Ultimately, however, the biggest threat to the unity, the invincibility, and indeed the very existence of the Whig party came from the rapid growth and increasing political militance of the still-secret, anti-immigrant, anti-Catholic, and antiparty Know Nothing fraternal order. In January, Democrats from New York City, the birthplace of the order, shrieked to Marcy that "Native American sentiment" was "never so strong before." Instead of worrying about the possible spread of slavery to Kansas and Nebraska, a Whig told Hamilton Fish, artisans feared that the "thousand evils . . . to the working classes" caused by "the vast influx of immigrants" might drive "American mechanics" from eastern "cities to western wilds." With a barely concealed allusion to the readiness of Know Nothings to run their own candidates if necessary, another nativist prophetically warned Fish that "you may rest assured that it will not be the Nebraska bill that will decide the next State election, but a sterner and more exalted question will determine the result."

Unfortunately for the Whigs, that prediction proved all too accurate. The elections of 1854 and 1855 did not revolve exclusively around the Nebraska and slavery extension issues. Nor did the Whig party remain a unit, mobilize all the various opponents of the Democrats behind the Whig banner, or prove invincible. Instead, those elections witnessed the continued fragmentation of major party lines, the emergence of a bewildering variety of new coalitions that challenged Whigs' credentials as leaders of the anti-Democratic opposition, and an accelerating exodus of once-loyal Whigs to new political homes. Even though Democrats suffered a massive rebuke at the hands of the electorate, as Larimer and others predicted, the Whig party, too, became a casualty of voters' wrath. By December 1855, when the new Thirty-Fourth Congress met, not one but two new parties appeared to have displaced Whigs from their role as the Democrats' chief political opponents. Their ability to hijack what had been the Whigs' primary political function since the early 1830s convinced all but a few diehards that the Whig party had outlived its usefulness and should be given a decent burial.

I

The purpose of this and the following two chapters is to describe the process by which new parties displaced the Whigs as vehicles for anti-Democratic political action during 1854 and 1855, to outline the divergent reactions of Whig voters and politicians to it, and to suggest why it occurred. The congressional, state, and local elections between August 1854 and December 1855 were the most labyrinthine, chaotic, and important off-year contests in all of American political history. To help the reader comprehend what occurred during them, therefore, certain themes and conclusions must be elaborated at the outset.

Three interrelated, but analytically distinguishable, political processes occurred simultaneously over the course of those elections. First, a majority of the American electorate, particularly in the North, turned against the Democratic party. This realignment, which continued into the 1856 presidential election, went both ways. It involved both the movement of first-time voters and former Democratic supporters to anti-Democratic ranks and the mobilization of first- and second-generation immigrants and some Whig defectors behind the Democratic banner.

Second, the Whig party failed to benefit from the realignment against the Democrats. Rather, it disintegrated. This collapse had two separate aspects, and historians' failure to keep both aspects in view largely accounts for their contentious dispute over the past thirty years as to whether sectional conflict over slavery or ethnocultural issues killed the Whig party. On the one hand, the sectional chasm dividing northern from southern Whigs widened. Incensed by the antisouthern posture many northern Whigs assumed to win the elections of 1854, most southern Whigs by the end of that year renounced allegiance to the national Whig party. Within the North, on the other hand, the Whig party suffered crippling internal erosion as former supporters decamped for new political homes rather than using the Whig party itself to punish offending Democrats. What weakened the Whig party in the North was not necessarily the same as what split the national organization, but both toxins had a poisonous effect.

The emergence of an astonishing variety of new political movements in 1854 and 1855 that challenged the Whigs for the anti-Democratic vote constitutes the third process that contributed to the turbulence of those years. These new coalitions not only sought to displace the Whig party in 1854 and 1855. They also attempted to combine and broaden their ranks; to establish their durability; to transform themselves from temporary, often localized protest movements into permanent, national political parties; and to compete with each other, as well as with the Whigs, to become the major opponent of the Democrats by the time of the 1856 presidential election. A process of building new parties, in sum, accompanied and accelerated the processes of voter realignment and Whig disintegration. Whigs' sharply divergent reactions to these new parties had as profound an influence on Whigs' behavior as did their ingrained aversion to Democrats.

Essentially, what happened to the Whig party in 1854 and 1855 is that it bled to death. Or at least it was bled to the point where it no longer possessed the vitality or will to perform its traditional function. It became so depleted of personnel in both the North and South that diehards who remained in it eventually, and almost always regretfully, recognized that it was useless any longer to hold legislative caucuses, call nominating conventions, or run candidates for office on tickets with the Whig—and only the Whig—label. The date at which different Whigs reached that decision varied from state to state and from locality to locality. The central point here is that the demise of the Whig party refers to the cessation of its activities as a political institution. It does not connote the death of individual Whigs, their loss of a sense of identity as Whigs, or their abandonment of Whig principles, for which many expressed admiration long after the party itself ceased to operate.⁴

Although the process of Whig attrition was cumulative, it did not proceed at a constant rate. It oscillated in response to fast-changing developments that affected both the decisions of different Whigs about leaving the party and the destinations they then chose. Those fluctuations and the sense of contingency they inspired had two main sources. One was the sequential nature of the prolonged election cycle between August 1854 and November 1855, during which the new members of the Thirty-Fourth Congress were selected. Conditions and the political calculations based upon them varied not only from state to state, and often from congressional district to congressional district, but also from month to month. New parties did not emerge everywhere simultaneously in the summer and fall of 1854 to displace the Whig organization. In a number of places Whigs preserved the party intact and contested the 1854 elections under the Whig banner. Elsewhere, however, the party was severely weakened, if not entirely replaced, by new challengers. The momentum these rivals generated in 1854 convinced even Whig leaders in those states where the party had survived, and often flourished, that year, that future prospects lay elsewhere.

No matter how successful Whigs were in some states in 1854, they closely watched the fate of Whig candidates elsewhere to assess the party's future. They calculated whether there would be enough Whig congressmen to secure a majority in the next House of Representatives, whether Whigs controlled enough state legislatures to replenish the party's dwindling strength in the Senate, and whether Whigs remained sufficiently competitive in enough states that it was arithmetically possible to secure a majority of the nationwide electoral vote in the presidential election of 1856. Once it became clear that Whigs no longer possessed the requisite numbers to achieve those goals, most Whig leaders gave up on the party. Many men elected as Whig governors, Whig state legislators, and Whig congressmen in 1854 themselves abandoned the Whig party within a year, and often within a few months or weeks, of their victories in order to join new organizations that apparently had a better chance of gaining majority control of the new Congress and electing the next president.

If the diverse and changing results of the sequential elections from August 1854 to November 1855 helped to shape the spatial and chronological pattern of Whig disintegration, so did the simultaneous process of transforming the ad hoc coalitions and secret societies that entered the political fray in 1854 into durable political parties. The fast-paced internal changes within these rival organizations affected their attractiveness to different Whigs. In addition, the increasing evidence that they intended to broaden and perpetuate themselves and might have a better chance than the Whig party itself of controlling Congress and the White House in 1856 altered the thinking of Whigs who had seen their support for them in 1854 as a temporary act of expediency or protest, not necessarily as a permanent break from the Whig party. Once Whigs politicos became enmeshed in the process of party building, moreover, they often devoted their attention to ensuring their own control of the new organizations rather than to reviving the Whig party itself. New commitments, in short, diverted the time, energy, and talent necessary to sustain old relationships.

Quite obviously, different Whigs contributed and responded to this process of erosion and displacement in different ways. Some left the party early and eagerly because their alienation from it had passed the point of no return and because they reacted enthusiastically to the appeal of new parties. Others abandoned the party solely to perpetuate careers in new parties that seemed to promise defeat of the hated Democrats. Others left the party only reluctantly and involuntarily, when they had no choice but to support a different party or cease political participation altogether, and a not insignificant number of one-time Whigs did simply toss in the towel. A tiny minority clung bitterly and intransigently to the Whig party. Viscerally disliking the new parties that sought to displace it, they hoped against hope that the disruptive developments of 1854 and 1855 would prove ephemeral and that the Whig party would somehow reclaim its role as the vehicle for the anti-Democratic opposition in 1856 and thereafter.

Aside from the impact of contingent events and short-term chronological changes, two other variables influenced Whig leaders' divergent reactions to the developments of 1854 and 1855.5 One was the geographical and political context in which they were situated. Outside of the South, much depended on the competitiveness of the Whig party in different states and localities by the end of 1853. Whigs in areas where the party was weakest were the most prone to seek new affiliations or alliances. One can also categorize leaders by the level of the federal system at which they operated. Small-fry local politicos whose aspirations for advancement up the ladder of political offices had been frustrated or members of dissident, minority factions within Whig state parties often jumped immediately at the opportunity provided by new affiliations to win state or local office. In contrast, seasoned, established, and nationally oriented leaders who personally had no interest in any subnational office often awaited the results of the 1854 contests before they determined upon a course of action. Although events between August 1854 and December 1855 repeatedly reshaped the decisions made by Whigs, the watershed event was the elections in October and November of 1854. More than anything else, their results, and especially the stunning strength of Know Nothings they revealed, forced Whigs of all varieties into major recalculations.

The second variable that influenced the divergent responses of Whig leaders and voters was the nature, composition, and agendas of the rival organizations that emerged in 1854 and 1855 to challenge the Whig party's role as the vehicle for anti-Democratic political action. Put briefly, to fully understand the displacement of the Whig party, one must first examine its competitors.

H

That the new organizations were anti-Democratic is of the utmost importance. Both the fusion anti-Nebraska coalitions, which appeared in some northern states in 1854 and which would not be successfully combined into a regionwide Republican party until early 1856, and the still-secret Know Nothing fraternity won support from disillusioned Democrats as well as Whigs.⁶ Nonetheless, both sought to oust Democrats from office in order to reverse the direction of Democratic governance. Thus they offered Whigs a chance to continue their long-time opposition to the Democrats. Many Whigs, indeed, initially viewed the new organizations less as competitors to or replacements for the Whig party than as pliable instruments Whigs might manipulate to advance the cause of Whig candidates by bringing non-Whigs to their support.

The ability of Whigs to continue political opposition to Democrats through the new organizations, however, hardly explains why Whigs preferred them to the regular Whig party itself or why they preferred one alternative to the other. The different organizing principles and political agendas of the new movements provide the explanations. They gave priority to different issues; that is, they stressed different actions by Democrats that demanded immediate redress and reversal. But they also made a compelling case that their sense of urgency and their new organizational schemes for rallying political support made them far more likely than the Whig party itself to secure the redress of grievances many Whigs shared with them.

Although northern Whigs courted Free Soil support in some states in 1854, those attempts to broaden the Whig vote must be distinguished from the formal anti-Nebraska coalitions that emerged elsewhere. The former usually entailed attempts to secure outside support for Whig candidates after exclusively Whig conventions had met and nominated them as Whig candidates. The latter involved open cooperation by Whig leaders with Free Soilers and anti-Nebraska Democrats to arrange statewide conventions or mass meetings that purposely eschewed the Whig label so as not to offend non-Whigs and that carefully constructed state tickets representing all of the participating parties, not just Whigs. In short, they required a conscious decision by Whig leaders to suspend operations as a separate Whig party and instead to enfold themselves and their followers in a broader and different organization. Thus, when Indiana's Whig leaders fused with other groups to present "People's" rather than Whig tickets in 1854, a Democrat could assert with accuracy that "the Whig party, as a party, are entirely disbanded. They have not as a party, brought out a single candidate."

In Michigan and Wisconsin these new coalitions called themselves the Republican party in 1854, and proponents of forming an exclusively northern Republican party existed elsewhere as well. In most northern states, however, the names adopted by these protest movements—Anti-Nebraska, Anti-Administration, Fusion, Independent, People's Party, and numerous hyphenated permutations that indicated attitudes toward the Maine Law, public schools, and so on—reflected their inchoate, ad hoc nature. Their composition, the degree to which they incorporated anti-Nebraska Democrats, the proportionate strength and influence of Whigs within them, the issues other than condemnation of the Nebraska Act on which they campaigned in 1854, and, of particular interest here, the degree to which these new statewide alliances penetrated individual congressional districts and localities to displace regular Whig organizations and candidates in 1854 varied widely from state to state. Successful arrangement of fusion tickets for governor and other state officials, in other words, did not automatically ensure similar degrees of interparty cooperation, and thus the suspension of independent Whig efforts, in congressional and state legislative races during 1854. Local pockets of straight-out, fusion-resisting Whigs endured far longer in the North than many historians have acknowledged.

By itself, the prospect that anti-Nebraska coalitions were more likely than Whigs alone to defeat Democrats attracted some Whigs to them, but these coalitions also threatened the continued existence of the Whig party in still other ways. First, Whig politicians who helped form them often announced that the Whig party was not adequate to meet the present emergency and must be shelved, if only temporarily. With Whig congressmen still in Washington until mid-August 1854, influential Whig newspaper editors often first made this case. In Ohio, Oran Follett of the Columbus Ohio State Journal and William Schouler of the Cincinnati Gazette promoted new organizations. In Indiana, both South Bend's Schuyler Colfax and Indianapolis' John D. Defrees, editor of the Indiana State Journal and chairman of the Whig state committee, did so. Pro-fusion Whig leaders insisted, as Free Soilers had since 1848, either that the old issues that had once divided Whigs from Democrats were settled and obsolete or that traditional partisan disagreements must be put into abeyance and political efforts directed instead to the resolution of a far more pressing and dangerous crisis. The Whig Chicago Tribune, for example, declared itself "sick and tired of party organizations which are dead and lifeless," while Joseph Warren, editor of the Detroit Tribune, insisted that, since Michigan's Whigs had "suffered defeat after defeat of the most overwhelming and hopeless character for the last 14 years," they should instead support a movement that "irrespective of old party organizations" would "combine the whole anti-Nebraska, antislavery sentiment of the State, upon one ticket."8

The emergency that required the cessation of independent Whig action was, of course, the threat of slavery extension to Kansas and Nebraska. Everywhere anti-Nebraska coalitions insisted that Northerners must forget former party differences and unite to stop slavery's spread by replacing Democrats in Congress with men who would repeal the Nebraska Act, restore the Missouri Compromise line, impose new statutory bans on slavery in the territories, or resist the admission of any more slave states to the Union. The policy demands and degree of antislavery radicalism of these coalitions varied, but they all insisted that Northerners must combine in exclusively northern political organizations that no longer dealt with putative southern allies.

In sum, anti-Nebraska coalitions required a cessation of independent Whig activity, but they also further separated northern from southern Whigs. Whigs elected on anti-Nebraska tickets seemed unlikely to cooperate with former party allies from the South in upcoming sessions of Congress or during the 1856 presidential campaign. Just as Ben Wade and Truman Smith had done before Congress adjourned, many procoalition Whig politicians vowed never again to cooperate with southern Whigs. Since the betrayal by southern Whigs had already destroyed the national Whig party, they declared, now only an exclusively northern party could defend northern liberties and rights from a Slave Power conspiracy to extend slavery. As Oran Follett put it in the Ohio State Journal, "There is no longer a National Whig or Democratic party" because southern Whigs and Democrats had "turned their backs on the compromises of 1820 and 1850."

Beyond their obvious expediency to Whigs who had long languished in a political minority, in short, anti-Nebraska coalitions seemed preferable to the Whig party precisely because they were exclusively northern, precisely because they seemed prepared to meet the threat posed by southern slaveholders more directly and adamantly than northern Whig organizations that still preached the necessity of party fellowship with Southerners, and precisely because they called for an end to partisan disputes that seemed outmoded or inconsequential when compared to the sectional threat. Conversely, precisely this sectional cast of the anti-Nebraska coalitions rendered them anathema to southern Whigs and to conservative northern Whigs, at least some of whom had hoped to create a new national Union party even before the introduction of Douglas' Nebraska bill.

The antisouthern thrust of the anti-Nebraska coalitions had two additional implications that help explain the embryonic Republican party's incursions into the ranks of northern Whiggery. First, since they called upon Northerners to mobilize politically to check Slave Power aggressions, any events—whether in Washington, Kansas, or elsewhere—that focused public attention on slavery and that increased northern animosity toward, and fear of, Southerners tended to reinforce their case that Northerners needed an exclusively northern party to defend northern rights and interests. Second, by identifying a compelling cause that required political action and an immediate political target, northern Democrats who subserviently abetted Slave Power aggressions, the anti-Nebraska coalitions simultaneously highlighted the hollowness into which the strife between spoils-oriented Whigs and Democratic parties had apparently degenerated by 1853 and reinvested political participation with important purpose.

This last point merits elaboration. Neither the anti-Nebraska coalitions nor the Know Nothings lured men away from the Whig party simply because they offered them a way to perpetuate opposition to Democrats, because they focused more pointedly on new concerns than the Whig party itself seemed capable of doing, or because they offered a better chance to defeat Democrats than the Whig party. To be sure, all of these considerations mattered. But the new parties also succeeded in usurping Whigs' ideological mission.

Whatever programs and policy positions had been grafted onto the platform of the Whig party since its formation in the early 1830s, it was founded to rescue public liberty, to save the Revolutionary experiment in republican self-government from the threat that King Andrew Jackson and his Democratic minions posed to it. From the 1830s on, Whigs continued to insist that they were dedicated to the defense of republican principles and institutions. And, as the language of Larimer's letter to Pollock indicates, the felt need to protect and perpetuate republicanism still mattered deeply to men in the 1850s.

The new organizations emerging in 1854 and 1855 co-opted Whigs' mission to defend republicanism by portraying themselves as better able to do so. They insisted that powerful new threats to America's experiment in republican self-government had emerged that made executive tyranny and the other antirepublican bogeys against which Whigs had campaigned seem tame by comparison. They explicitly and repeatedly invoked the key code phrases of the familiar republican idiom—power, tyranny, corruption, conspiracy, and enslavement versus liberty, freedom, self-government, majority rule, and republicanism itself. And they summoned voters to join a crusade in defense of republican principles and institutions that, they argued, far exceeded in importance stale partisan quarrels fought between now irrelevant parties. They initially portrayed themselves, in short, not as officeseeking political parties, but as patriotic Minute Men springing to freedom's defense. Anti-Nebraska coalitions and the Know Nothings, however, saw different dangers to republicanism that approached from different directions. In effect, they wanted to wage the battle to rescue public liberty on different fronts.

The anti-Nebraska coalitions insisted that the threat to republican liberty and self-government now came from the South, from a Slave Power conspiracy to spread slavery in defiance of the majority North, and from an attempt by domineering slaveholders to treat northern white men themselves like slaves rather than as free and equal citizens. "The sectionalism of the South," declared the Ohio State Journal in July 1854, had delivered "a blow at the Republicanism of our institutions and the free labor of the North." To save them, chimed Gamaliel Bailey in the National Era, Northerners must "rally as one man for the reestablishment of liberty and the overthrow of the Slave Power." In June, a month before the Ohio People's party anti-Nebraska convention met in Columbus, Follett predicted in the Ohio State Journal that "we shall soon find a common name in the pure Republicanism of our object." The state platform adopted by Michigan's new Republican party in July 1854 identified that label. The Kansas-Nebraska Act, it declared, was intended "to give to the Slave States such a decided preponderance in all measures of government as shall reduce the North . . . to a condition too shameful to be contemplated." To meet this threat of enslavement, a new party was necessary, and its name would signify its mission. "That in view of the necessity of battling for the first principles of republican government, and against the schemes of aristocracy the most revolting and repressive with which the earth was ever cursed, or man debased, we will co-operate and be known as Republicans until the contest be terminated."11

In 1854, it must be stressed, their overtly antisouthern thrust and their attempt to combine men from all parties in exclusively northern organizations, not anti-Nebraska sentiment itself, distinguished Whigs who joined anti-Nebraska coalitions from northern Know Nothings, as well as from northern Whigs who spurned coalition. For many northern Whigs, there was no incompatibility between the objectives of the Know Nothings and those of anti-Nebraska men. Both groups offered compelling reasons to smite the Democrats. The difference between Know Nothings and the anti-Nebraska coalitions, rather, stemmed from the mode and geographical scope of their organization, from the grievances against Democrats to which they gave priority, and from the primary threat to Americans' republican self-government they identified. Know Nothings mobilized secretly rather than publicly. Their organization penetrated extensively into the South as well as the North. And they did not see the Slave Power as the chief threat to American freedom.

The menace came not from the South but from Rome. A Catholic conspiracy or papal plot, Know Nothings cried, sought to subvert America's republican institutions and to steal control of government from the hands of native-born Protestants. That plot was powered by the huge waves of European immigrants inundating the United States in the 1840s and 1850s, and it was abetted by corrupt Democratic and Whig politicos who obsequiously whored after immigrant and Catholic support. It had become so dangerous by 1854 that it "was the duty of every American and naturalized protestant citizen throughout the Union," of Southerners as well as Northerners, that is, "to use his utmost exertions to aid the cause by organizing and freeing the country from that monster," which sought "to plant its flag of tyranny, persecution, and oppression among us." 12

Social and economic grievances spawned by the rapidly growing immigrant population undoubtedly contributed to the growth of Know Nothingism. The new and menacing political influence of Catholics and immigrants by the early 1850s. however, created the Know Nothings' political agenda. Among other things, that influence was manifested by the outpouring of new immigrant voters for Pierce in 1852, by demands of Catholic clergymen for local ordinances or state laws to ban Bible reading from public schools and to divide school funds to provide tax revenues for Catholic schools, and by the blatant awarding of political jobs to Catholics, most notoriously Pierce's appointment of the Philadelphia Catholic James Campbell as his postmaster general. Nativist spokesmen shrieked that Roman Catholicism was inimical to American republicanism because it was a "despotic faith" that was "diametrically opposed to the genius of American Republicanism," because its "crafty priesthood" taught "anti-republican sentiments," and because Catholics' assault on the public school system threatened "the very Citadel of Republican strength." Smashing that threat, cried Know Nothings, was imperative to "guarantee the three vital principles of Republican Government-Spiritual Freedom, Free Bible, and Free Schools."13

Republican self-government, in sum, stood in jeopardy because Protestant Americans no longer ruled America, because the existing political parties shamelessly and unpatriotically kowtowed to Catholics and foreigners. Thus the political goal of Know Nothings—and only of Know Nothings, they stressed—was to reduce, indeed to obliterate, the political influence of Catholics and foreigners. They and they alone would make sure that only native-born Protestants gained elective and appointive public office. They and they alone would stop immigrants from voting by revising the state constitutions that allowed aliens to vote before naturalization, by enacting requirements that even naturalized immigrants wait years after they technically became citizens before they could vote, and by imposing stiff literacy qualifications on the right to vote that could keep foreigners from the polls. They and they alone sought control of Congress in order to increase the naturalization period from five to twenty-one years and to pass laws that would prevent European nations from dumping criminals and paupers on American shores.

Know Nothings tapped into and articulated a remarkably deep and widespread anxiety about, and antipathy toward, foreigners and Catholics, and those sentiments helped fuel the dazzling growth of the order in 1854. Urban artisans and mechanics, who blamed immigrants for driving down wage scales and driving up the cost of food and rent, may have been particularly susceptible to those sentiments. But the bias and certainly the propensity to join Know Nothing lodges was not confined to a particular class or even to large cities, where concentrations of Catholics and immigrants were most dense. During the first seven months of 1854, prior to Congress' adjournment, anti-Catholic sentiment and Know Nothing lodges appeared in remote country hamlets as well as large cities and in slave states like Virginia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana as well as in New England, Middle Atlantic, and midwestern states.¹⁴

The ferocity of nativism and the rapidity of Know Nothingism's spread especially stunned Democrats, not just because they knew they were the order's chief political target but also because they recognized that thousands of Democrats, long galled by the influence of Catholics and immigrants in their party, had become "altogether deranged on Nativism" and were flocking to the order. 15 Many Whigs were equally startled by the intensity of anti-Catholicism and the extensive geographical range of the Know Nothing movement it helped fuel. "How people do hate Catholics," marveled the Whig Rutherford B. Hayes after Know Nothings swept Cincinnati's congressional and state legislative elections in October. But anti-Catholicism also erupted in small towns. "The 'Know Nothings' . . . are a great power even out here in the country," a Whig warned Thurlow Weed from upstate Geneva, New York in June. Calling himself "astonished" that the Know Nothing "mania" was sweeping up even third-generation Germans in Pennsylvania, Fillmore's close advisor, William L. Hodge, declared in July that Know Nothings would not only "govern the fall elections" in New York and Pennsylvania, but they were also already "overwhelmingly powerful" in Virginia and his home state of Louisiana.16

Voters who demanded that politicians take steps against Catholics and immigrants, in sum, refused to be denied. Although Democrats were Know Nothings' most obvious targets, that determination menaced the Whig party as well. The momentum generated by Know Nothings might attract Whigs looking for a winner, and Know Nothings' agenda could attract zealous Protestants who had long supported the party primarily because immigrants and Catholics supported the Democrats. But Know Nothings' insistence that they and they alone would do something to counteract the papal plot was especially important.

For one thing, they obviously expressed an urgency about the Catholic threat that many staid and complacent Whig leaders did not share. That Know Nothings had a specific agenda for state and local officials to undertake when northern Whigs were focusing their campaigns on the Nebraska bill in most states was also significant. Know Nothings, that is, often seemed more relevant than Whigs in elections for local offices, and even in the spring of 1854, Know Nothings defeated Whigs in small Pennsylvania towns by electing men whom no one but Know Nothings even knew were candidates.¹⁷

More important, when Know Nothings clamored that Catholics had become a political threat only with the aid of sycophantic politicians, they included Whigs along with Democrats among the traitors. Granted, Democrats were primarily responsible for the pro-Catholic actions that most infuriated nativists, but Whigs too had eagerly supplicated Catholic and foreign support, most notably in the recent 1852 presidential campaign. Former Whigs who embraced Know Nothingism harshly attacked this betrayal by Whig politicians. "A secret American movement'' had emerged to combat Catholicism, Judge Ross Wilkins of Detroit wrote Supreme Court Justice John McLean, because "both parties had courted what was called the foreign vote" [emphasis mine]. Catholics had achieved power, sneered Tennessee's vitriolic Whig-turned-Know Nothing editor William G. "Parson" Brownlow, only because "the worst class of American politicians, designing demagogues, selfish office-seekers, and bad men, calling themselves Democrats and 'Old-Line Whigs' " had wooed them to secure "the Catholic vote." Chastising Seward. Weed, and Horace Greelev by name, New York's veteran nativist Thomas R. Whitney in his Know Nothing tract, A Defence of the American Policy, insisted that venal "political leaders who have vielded to [the] pretensions and demands" of the "Romish Church," "whether Democrat, Whig, or Native American," must "be repudiated from Maine to California." 18

Know Nothing leaders and propagandists portrayed the order as a refuge for those who believed that all existing parties were controlled by corrupt spoilsmen and wire pullers and that honest, responsive government could be restored only by driving them from office. And without question, at least some people regarded the order as an antiparty, reform organization that would restore republican self-government not just by stifling the Catholic conspiracy, but also by purging self-interested politicos from the political system and returning political power directly to the people. "This new and mysterious party called 'Know Nothings' may, and I think will, do good in ridding the country of the trading and trafficking politicians," argued a Virginia Whig in December 1854. Looking back on the Know Nothing outburst in 1859, Connecticut's Gideon Welles, who despised it, acknowledged that "thousands flocked into the order, not that they approved its principles, but for the purpose of relieving themselves from the obligations and abuses of the old organizations."

Know Nothings themselves waxed euphoric about the order's potential for smashing all the existing parties, driving their corrupt leaders from office, and restoring a more pristine politics that honestly reflected the will of the people. Philadelphia Whig editor Morton McMichael wrote in the North American that the mayoral triumph of the Know Nothing Robert T. Conrad, McMichael's coeditor of that Whig sheet, in June 1854 had been the "triumph of popular intelligence and virtue, solicitous for the public welfare, over party organization and objects, as such." A New York Know Nothing bluntly insisted later that year that "we are determined to give old party lines and old party hacks a glorious drubbing this fall." Everywhere, in fact, Know Nothings promised to reject professional, office-seeking politicos clad "in the cast off garments of Whiggery or Democracy" and to elevate to office instead new men "fresh from the ranks of the people." 20

Know Nothings' call for restoring power to the people clearly enhanced their image as champions of republican self-government. Just as clearly, calls for the obliteration of old party lines and the repudiation of candidates associated with Whiggery menaced the Whig party's very existence. Some Whig politicians, especially those identified with the pro-Catholic campaign for Winfield Scott in 1852, were prominent Know Nothing targets. In New York, the goal of Know Nothingism was "to sweep Sewardism & Political Catholicism off the face of the Earth," and "particularly to defeat Mr. Seward's re-election to the Senate."

Nonetheless, neither the importance of an antiparty impulse to Know Nothings' early success nor the danger that Know Nothingism posed to the Whig party in 1854 should be exaggerated.²² The Know Nothings undoubtedly attracted sincere antiparty reformers who did indeed want to destroy all the old parties. How influential they were among Know Nothings in 1854 and how many initiates knew of their intentions are unclear, however. One man's hack, after all, is often another man's statesman, and all Know Nothings did not regard all politicians, especially all Whig politicians, with equal contempt. Many of the candidates they backed in 1854, especially candidates for Congress and statewide office, were not amateurs "fresh from the ranks of the people," but instead veteran politicians, the great majority of whom were Whigs.²³

Just as modern-day calls for imposing term limits on congressmen are often aimed at entrenched and apparently unbeatable officeholders from the other party, vows to drive hack politicians from office may sometimes have been self-interested cant. They often reflected the frustration of soreheads who had long been galled by the dominance of the other party or of rival factions within their own party and who saw Know Nothingism as a way to bring old enemies down. This is not to suggest so much the hypocrisy of Know Nothings as to point to the order's potential malleability and manipulability, its capacity to serve very different ends for different people. It could indeed be a vehicle for bigots, alarmed Protestants, and authentic antiparty reformers; it could serve as a temporary home for anti-Nebraska men until some better antisouthern alternative came along; but it could also serve as a refuge for conservatives who feared the control that antislavery Whigs exerted over the regular Whig party. It could be a weapon wielded by one Whig faction against another, but Whigs could also seize upon it as a powerful ally against dominant Democrats that would bring the Whig party back to power.

What made Know Nothings seem so malleable to so many different groups was the nature of their organization. In 1854, Know Nothings, despite their concrete demands upon government, were not yet a political party that publicly nominated its own exclusive candidates in open conflict with the preexisting parties. Rather, they were a secret society that sought to secure the election of men who agreed with their goals. They did so either by infiltrating existing parties and seeking to control their nominations or by throwing the weight of the organization behind candidates already nominated by existing parties. In short, Know Nothings were a pressure group, rather like the contemporaneous temperance associations, whose influence often seemed up for grabs.

It was, to be sure, a very peculiar pressure group. Its secret grips, signals, passwords, and elaborate superpatriotic initiation rituals struck even veteran Whig politicians who joined the order like Congressman Solomon G. Haven as "puerile," if not downright "foolishness."²⁴ The pledge to absolute secrecy about belonging imposed on members, moreover, meant that men who joined local lodges in one place did not know whether men who joined lodges elsewhere were also members, and this ignorance often led to some hilariously stilted written correspondence between them as they sought to feel each other out and to indicate that they belonged to the order without openly saying so.²⁵

Yet the Know Nothings were a pressure group, nonetheless, and one that had vast potential power because of their secret organization. By the summer of 1854, they had developed a pyramid-like organization ranging from local lodges or councils to countywide to state councils to a grand national council. More important, one of the Know Nothings' membership oaths required members to support candidates endorsed by the order, regardless of those candidates' party affiliation. These endorsements for local and congressional candidates were usually made by majority vote within the local lodges, but statewide candidates in most states were endorsed by state councils, sometimes after polling opinion within local lodges.

These practices meant that Know Nothings could deliver an unusually disciplined and solid vote from their membership. They also meant that those who gained control of the Know Nothing machinery, from local lodges to state councils, could determine who got that vote. Thousands of Democrats joined the order in 1854, and to retain them, Know Nothings did occasionally endorse Democratic candidates for whom Whig members would have to vote. At the same time, however, the Know Nothings' organization meant that Whig candidates could get Democratic votes if Whigs gained control of the machinery. Whigs could join the order, in sum, not to destroy the Whig party but to bring reinforcements to its aid. Allegiance to the one, at least originally in 1854, did not necessary imply a cessation of allegiance to the other.

It is often difficult to tell from this distance, in fact, exactly who was trying to take over whom in 1854. By the fall, Know Nothings were trying to infiltrate Whig meetings and conventions to dictate their nominations, but just as often, Whig politicos signed up with the Know Nothings in order to control the order's endorsements. In New York, for example, where Seward and Weed were indeed the primary targets of many Silver Gray Whigs who joined the order, Sewardites themselves joined lodges to negate their opposition to Seward. Understandably, just as many Democrats regarded the threat by temperance associations to run separate tickets in 1854 as "a hypocritical devise [sic] of the wireworking Whigs" to trick dry Democrats and thereby "elate & resuscitate the almost expiring Whig party," so many Democrats regarded Know Nothingism as "the new invention of the Whigs" that sought to gull resentful Protestant Democrats. Just as often, however, Democrats admitted that Know Nothings were a threat to Whiggery, "demanding the disbanding of the Whig organization, name, & everything." Know Nothings had dominated every People's party convention in Indiana by the end of September, reported one Democrat, and "Whigs have had to play second fiddle to them." Similarly if some Whigs considered the order a powerful ally— "Whig thunder" one Nashville Whig called it in December 1854—others moaned that the Know Nothings and the resentments vented by them "have destroyed everything like party discipline, and many staunch old Whigs are floating off they don't know where."26

By 1855, the American party that evolved from the secret order would clearly be recognized as a substitute for and therefore a threat to the Whig party, but in 1854 Know Nothingism's import for the Whigs was anything but clear. The order's growth and potential power were apparent, but it often seemed a prize Whigs could capture and use rather than a menace that might gut the Whig party. The very plasticity and manipulability of the order, in sum, meant that its impact upon the Whig party and upon the fortunes of Whig candidates varied considerably from state to state in the elections that year.

Know Nothingism ultimately proved lethal to Whiggery, paradoxically, because it was not as malleable as it originally seemed. Whatever the original intentions of Whigs who joined the order may have been, once they became enmeshed in its oath-bound machinery, either they were seduced by its potential to become a substitute for the Whig party itself or they discovered, to their chagrin, that they were abetting men who did indeed mean to drive the Whig party out of business. First appearances, in short, proved deceptive. Men could not remain simultaneously loyal to both the Whig party and the Know Nothing organization.

Ш

In 1854 anti-Nebraska coalitions and the Know Nothings initially had their greatest impact in northern elections. Six slave states, however, also voted that year, and with the exceptions of South Carolina, where no Whig party had ever existed, and Delaware, their contests featured the traditional combat between Whigs and Democrats. By itself, that fact undermines assertions that sectional anger stirred up by the Nebraska debates, and especially southern Whigs' fury at northern Whig assaults on their support for the Nebraska measure, instantly caused southern Whigs to desert the Whig party. Southern Whigs instead gave every indication that they hoped to perpetuate the national Whig organization.

Residents of Missouri and neighboring Arkansas went to the polls in early August, when their incumbent congressmen were still in Washington and could not campaign personally. Whigs had no prayer of carrying Arkansas, a Democratic stronghold since its statehood in 1836, and they again lost both congressional seats.²⁷ In sum, regardless of what happened to Whig parties elsewhere, Whig prospects in Arkansas were hopeless, and it is little wonder that Whigs, led by the explorer Albert Pike, initiated the formation of Know Nothing lodges in the fall of 1854 and sought to recruit dissident Democrats to them in order to increase their strength. By August 1855 Democratic leader Senator Robert Johnson could, with prefect accuracy, pronounce the Whig party in Arkansas "notoriously extinct."²⁸

Missouri's results differed dramatically and bordered, indeed, on the astounding. In what was once one of the nation's most reliable Democratic states, Whigs won six of seven congressional races and increased their strength in both chambers of the state legislature.²⁹ Missouri's Whigs had already exploited the rift between pro-Benton and anti-Benton Democrats to win four House seats and elect a United States senator. Earlier, however, Whig candidates had been almost solely dependent on those divisions, and they had often won with pluralities in multicandidate races, not by convincing majorities. In 1854, in contrast, four of six won with majorities of greater than 51 percent. Samuel Carruthers, who had attracted less than 40 percent of the vote in 1853, garnered 58 percent a year later.³⁰ Unlike the situation in Arkansas, Missouri's Whigs appeared to be very much on the rise.

Unlike Arkansas as well, the Nebraska issue was absolutely central to Missouri's elections, and Whigs' success disproves the contention that Nebraska killed southern Whiggery. It did not, however, largely because Missouri's Democrats were more deeply divided by it than were Whigs themselves. Benton represented the St. Louis congressional district during the Thirty-Third Congress, and he, as well as his Democratic allies in Missouri, vehemently opposed repeal of the Missouri Compromise line. In contrast, Senator David R. Atchison, leader of the state's anti-Benton Democrats, was a primary architect of the Nebraska bill, and his Missouri allies demanded its passage. Previously, Whigs had allied with one or the other of the warring Democratic factions, but in 1854 Missouri's Whigs themselves divided over the Nebraska bill. Three Whig congressman whom pro-Benton Democrats had helped elect, along with Carruthers, whom Bentonites had bitterly opposed, and Whig Senator Henry Gever voted or announced support for the bill. When Whig district conventions renominated all four incumbents and praised their pro-Nebraska position, Benton Democrats now opposed all but one of them. In contrast, both of the new Whigs elected to join the incumbents— Gilchrist Porter and Luther Kennett, who defeated Benton in St. Louis—were known as anti-Nebraska men, and Democrats, at least, reported considerable anti-Nebraska sentiment among Whigs across the state. Whigs could win, in sum, no matter how they stood on Nebraska.31

Kennett won without aid from either pro- or anti-Benton Democrats, but he did get vital help from elsewhere. As a rapidly growing city with a huge German population, St. Louis was one of the first places west of the Mississippi where Know Nothings organized. On July 22, three weeks before the election, an anti-Benton Democrat frantically reported that "the new element introduced into our politics, the 'Know Nothings,' disturbs all calculations. All depends upon their course." Between the writing of this dispatch and election day, the Whigs apparently worked out a deal with the Know Nothings. In return for purging several foreign-born candidates from their local ticket and pledging that Kennett would join the order after the election, Whigs won Know Nothing support for him.³²

Kennett did join the Know Nothings after the election, as did reelected Whig Congressman James Lindley sometime before the Thirty-Fourth Congress met. In contrast, Gilchrist Porter adamantly refused to join the order and pronounced himself a Whig during his entire congressional term, while Carruthers and Mordecai Oliver openly denounced the order and would vote with Democrats against American candidates for House speaker when the new Congress met. Unlike Arkansas, where the tiny Whig party appeared to move en masse into Know Nothingism, in short, Missouri's nativist order had a divisive rather than a unifying impact on the Whig party. The St. Louis Missouri Republican, the most influential Whig paper in the state, vehemently denounced Know Nothings in 1854, and in April 1855 it backed an anti-Know Nothing Whig for mayor against the Know Nothing candidate. And divisions over Know Nothingism in the new legislature helped stop the Whig minority from picking a new United States senator.

With full attendance in the joint legislative session that in late 1854 would fill the Senate seat for which both Atchison and Benton hungered, there were sixty Whigs, fifty-seven anti-Benton Democrats, and forty-three Benton Democrats. Since none of the three groups had the majority necessary to prevent a stalemate, ambitious Whigs and Democrats alike looked to Know Nothings for help. At least one contender for the Whigs' caucus nomination, James S. Rollins, joined the order to gain its influence, and so too, astonishingly, did the Democratic incumbent Atchison, apparently in the hope that Whig members of the order might support him and offset the visceral opposition of Bentonites to his reelection. In the end, Know Nothings helped no one. Whigs from western Missouri, who distrusted Know Nothings as anti-Nebraska men, spurned Rollins' bid and instead nominated a vehemently pro-Nebraska, proslavery Whig outsider named Alexander Doniphan, and even Know Nothing Whigs stuck by him in subsequent roll calls. Voting went according to party and factional lines, not according to membership in the order, and the resulting stalemate forced a postponement of the election until the following winter.³³

Missouri's Whigs, in sum, had done so well on their own in the August 1854 elections that a good many of them actively resisted merging the party with the Know Nothings. Like other southern state organizations, however, they could not ignore what happened to Whig fortunes elsewhere in 1854 and 1855. During the latter year, when the state held no important elections, most Whigs drifted toward the American party that had evolved out of the secret order. Thus, when the still defiant St. Louis Missouri Republican in November 1855 called for a Whig state convention to meet to nominate candidates for the 1856 races, the rival Missouri Democrat jeered, "An invitation to the ghostly and grinning skeletons of some cypress-decked necropolis to walk forth once more under the joyous sky would not be more absurd and mournfully ludicrous."

No congressmen were due to be elected in North Carolina in 1854, and its August contests for governor and members of the state legislature consequently revolved primarily around states issues, particularly state subsidization of railroad expansion into eastern and western parts of the state and revisions of the state's constitution.³⁵ Nonetheless, Whig leaders, who had seen the number of Whig congressmen reduced from five to three in the 1853 elections, considered the legislative contests especially crucial, for the new legislature would fill both of the state's United States Senate seats. Thus Whigs mounted an extraordinary effort to capture it, demonstrating beyond cavil that they, too, had no intention of abandoning the Whig party in 1854.

North Carolina's Whigs had long relied on the statewide speaking tours and joint debates of rival gubernatorial candidates, even more than upon state platforms, to define the issues at stake in state contests and to rouse the faithful to vote for Whig legislators as well as governor. As a result, Whig legislative candidates in North Carolina, as in most states, indeed, were often obscure and inexperienced small-fry politicos. For several reasons, however, in 1854 North Carolina's Whigs abandoned this customary strategy.

Whigs' problem in 1854 was not men but measures. Their gubernatorial candidate, ex-Congressman Alfred Dockery, was able and experienced, and he ran against Thomas Bragg, not the popular David Reid, who refused renomination in the hope of securing one of the Senate seats. By 1854, however, little differentiated the two parties on state subsidization for railroad construction. Their state platforms agreed on it, and during the joint debates between Dockery and Bragg, Bragg came out flatly for state subsidies, thereby neutralizing Whigs' advocacy of state railroad promotion. The other salient state issues—free suffrage and legislative reapportionment on the white basis—divided Whigs along regional lines. Since the legislature itself blocked reapportionment, by the 1850s western Whigs demanded a constitutional convention to adopt this and other reforms. Whigs' supporters among slaveholders in central and eastern North Carolina, however, strongly opposed the white basis, whether by statute or constitutional revision. In this situation, the Whig state platform adopted in February straddled by calling for a state constitutional convention but only if it preserved the present apportionment of the legislature.³⁶ This plank provoked a storm of protest from western Whig meetings and Whig newspapers, but Dockery clung to it because he knew that the Whigs would be pulverized in "the Eastern and Middle counties" if "we go into the campaign with a change of the basis upon our banner."37 The straddle thus spiked one of Whigs' two biggest guns in the west, just as Bragg's prorailroad stance had spiked the other.

By the spring and early summer, then, Whigs clearly could not rely on Dockery's coattails to retake the legislature. Rather than run the typically obscure men as candidates in 1854, therefore, they ran "our strongest men for the legislature," many of whom had long been retired, few of whom had any interest in spending dreary months in Raleigh, but all of whom recognized that the necessity of controlling the legislature in order to elect the two United States senators required a significant personal sacrifice. Former Governor, Senator, Secretary of the Navy, and Whig vice presidential candidate William A. Graham ran for the state senate. Former Governor John Morehead and former Congressmen David Outlaw and Daniel M. Barringer, as well as prominent Whigs like William Cherry and Samuel F. Patterson, who had once been mentioned as potential gubernatorial nominees, all ran for the legislature in 1854. When Barringer's wife complained that she was "mortified" that he would consent to run for so lowly an office after just serving as United States minister to Spain, he explained that he had "good reasons for yielding" to the demands of his constituents "at the present time. It is a critical period in the affairs of our State. All our best men are being called upon."38

Whigs' "best men" were not enough. Dockery ran almost 4,000 votes ahead of his predecessor in 1852, and he cut the Democratic margin from 6 to 2.2 percent. Nonetheless, he still lost to Bragg by 2,100 votes. Some of the Whigs' best men won election to the legislature, but they still suffered a net loss of five seats in the house, converting a four-vote majority into a six-vote minority, and in the senate they lost two more seats and fell to two-fifths of the total.³⁹

Although the North Carolina Whig party obviously remained quite competitive, the narrow defeat, especially after so much effort, had to have been demoralizing. After the expulsion of Vermont's Samuel Phelps and the resignation of Connecticut's Truman Smith and Massachusetts' Edward Everett from the Senate, Whigs held only nineteen of its sixty-two seats. Thus the North Carolina result severely damaged the hopes of Whigs across the nation of regaining control of Congress' upper chamber. "Our little company of Whigs here are mourning over the great defeat in N. Carolina," George Bryan groaned from Charleston, South Carolina. If only Fillmore and John P. Kennedy had visited Raleigh on their southern swing in the spring, he pipe-dreamed, "the event might have been different."

Florida's Whigs also were in disarray as they prepared for the state's October congressional and legislative elections. By 1853, only three Whig papers remained in operation, one each in Jacksonville, Tallahassee, and Pensacola. E. C. Cabell, the popular former Whig congressman, had announced his retirement from politics to engage in business. And in 1854 demoralized Whigs could not even agree to hold a statewide convention to nominate their congressional candidate; they relied instead upon county conventions to pick their man.⁴¹

Ex-Governor Thomas Brown, whose former popularity, it was hoped, would reinvigorate the party, eventually got the nod. But Brown quickly infuriated pro-Nebraska Whigs by announcing that he would have opposed the Nebraska bill had he been in Congress in 1854, since it unnecessarily insulted northern Whigs, and by stating that he would work amicably with northern Whigs in Congress if elected. Pro-Nebraska Whigs openly heckled Brown at rallies and bolted meetings that endorsed him on anti-Nebraska grounds. Brown began the race "with such a prospect of defeat before him as no Whig candidate has had for many a day," taunted one Democratic editor, but, undaunted, Brown and his friend Richard K. Call continued to condemn the Nebraska Act as an unnecessary provocation and to stress the vital necessity of preserving the national Whig party and its principles.⁴²

Brown's heroic effort rejuvenated Florida Whiggery, but not sufficiently to restore its majority status. Democrats easily retained control of the legislature, which sent David Yulee back to the Senate to replace Jackson Morton, thus reducing the Whig remnant in that body even further. In the congressional contest, Brown amassed only four votes fewer than Cabell had won in 1852, but he still lost by almost 1,100 votes to the same Democrat who had defeated Cabell by only twenty-two votes. Brown's stance clearly alienated large slaveholders. Despite gains elsewhere in the state, he retained less than a fifth of Cabell's 1852 voters in heavy slaveholding counties in central Florida.⁴³

Although local Whig candidates did surprisingly well in county elections during 1855, 1854 was the last statewide race run by Florida's Whig party. During 1855 Know Nothing lodges appeared in Florida, and in November a public American state convention met in Tallahassee. Brown, who chaired that American convention, and Richard K. Call, who was prominently mentioned for the American party's vice presidential nomination in 1856, led most of Florida's Whigs into the new organization, but some Whigs, as they would elsewhere in the South, moved instead into the Democratic party.

Florida's October election, in fact, was the last statewide campaign Whigs ever ran in the South. As usual, Whigs ran no candidates in South Carolina's congressional elections, and by November 1854 the American party had replaced the Whigs in Delaware, the final southern state to hold elections that year. Only nominally a slave state, Delaware economically and politically had long resembled its Middle Atlantic neighbor Pennsylvania, where Know Nothings became a powerful political presence in 1854. Know Nothing lodges were organized in Delaware during 1854 as well, but the alliance of Delaware's Whigs with them had less to do with a process of osmosis than it did with the predominance of Senator John M. Clayton within the state's Whig party.

Although Clayton himself apparently never joined the Know Nothing fraternity because he abhorred its secrecy, in October 1854 he issued a public manifesto calling for the creation of an open American party based upon its principles. As soon as the polls closed in 1854, he urged Know Nothing candidates in other states to get their state councils to renounce secrecy, and well into 1855 he complained bitterly about "the silly jealousy between the outside & inside Americans" that was "eating into the very vitals of the best party the country ever had."⁴⁴ Whatever his squeamishness about secrecy, Clayton enthusiastically embraced nativism and anti-Catholicism, but his longtime hope of replacing the Whig party best explains his advocacy of a new American party. Convinced by Whigs' sectional rift during debates over the Nebraska bill in 1854 that "the old parties, as National parties, are broken up & their power gone," he pleaded with other Whigs to help form an American party to replace them.⁴⁵

Clayton's determination that the American party operate publicly also stemmed from his recognition that many Delaware Whigs, including heavy-weights such as former Congressman John W. Houston, shared his hostility to the order's secrecy. In 1854, therefore, Delaware's Know Nothings publicly announced their own candidates, who had been secretly nominated in the lodges, in order to preempt the Whigs and prevent them from running their own slates. In this they succeeded, but Clayton's public endorsement of an American party in October may have been crucial in persuading fractious Whig outsiders to swing behind the Know Nothing candidates.⁴⁶

With the backing of most Whigs as well as Democratic defectors to the order, the Know Nothing candidates swept to victory in November. Know Nothings won nineteen of twenty-one seats in the state house of representatives and eight of nine seats in the state senate. Know Nothing congressional candidate Elisha D. Cullen, a lawyer who was apparently "fresh from the ranks of the people" and without previous political experience, narrowly defeated Democratic incumbent George Riddle, who himself had narrowly defeated the Whig Houston in 1852. Peter F. Causey, the Know Nothings' gubernatorial candidate and a well-known Whig, won far more impressively than Cullen. Causey had run for governor twice before as the Whig candidate; he lost in 1846, a Whig year otherwise, with 6,012 votes (49.4 percent), and again in 1850 with 5,978 votes (48.1 percent). He won in 1854 as a Know Nothing with 6,941 votes (52.6 percent), a gain of almost 20 percent since his most recent candidacy.

If Delaware was the only slave state in which Know Nothings completely displaced the Whig party by the end of 1854, it was emphatically not the only slave state penetrated by the order that year. As noted, Know Nothings were operating in St. Louis by July and possibly as early as April 1854. Elsewhere in the South, however, the order made its greatest headway in states without 1854 elections like Virginia, Maryland, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Tennessee, and Kentucky, and it probably did so precisely because there were no elections in those states. Had Whigs and Democrats been engaged in campaigns against each other that year, politicos from both parties may have viewed the order as a possible threat. Without elections and the partisan fervor whipped up by them, in contrast, men could view the order as a pressure group that they could join without discarding their old party allegiances.

The order sprouted like kudzu across the South during the hot summer of 1854. Kennedy noted its presence in Maryland by early July. In August a New Orleans Whig exultantly told Fillmore that the order already had 10,000 members in that city and a proportionate number elsewhere in Louisiana. If his estimates were anywhere near accurate, his prophecy of certain "triumph" for "the glorious old Native American party" in its new "form" in 1855 was realistic, for the entire vote in Louisiana in 1852 had been less than 36,000. That same month another Whig reported that the order was spreading in Georgia, especially around Savannah, and even earlier an Alabama Democrat worried about the growth of "this stupendous and far-spreading leprosy" in his state. By November and December even Mississippi Democrats wondered how to stop "the progress of this extraordinary movement," and by January 1855 Solomon G. Haven, who was in close touch with Know Nothing leaders from Virginia, reported that there were at least 60,000 members out of a voting population of 170,000 in the Old Dominion. 48

Southern Know Nothingism is usually interpreted by historians as simply a continuation of Whiggery, as a refuge for conservative Union-loving Whigs who were driven to it not by nativism, but by their fear of sectional agitation and the emerging Republican party in the North. Three aspects of the spread of Know Nothings among Southerners in 1854, however, refute that interpretation, First, many southern Whigs did not join the order, and when 1854 ended they still contemplated independent political action as Whigs in 1855.49 Second, Know Nothingism originally grew in the South for the same reasons it spread in the North—nativism, anti-Catholicism, and animosity toward unresponsive politicos not because of conservative unionism. In January 1855, for example, ex-Governor William B. Campbell of Tennessee wrote, "I have been astonished at the widespread feeling in favor of their principles—to wit, Native Americanism & anti-Catholicism—it takes everywhere." Later that year, an apprehensive Mississippi Democrat complained that Know Nothingism "has been eagerly embraced" because the order allowed "men of the very meanest capacity . . . to vote now according to birth and religion" and "to inflict injury on what they hate." Third, and most important, southern Democrats joined the order by the thousands in 1854. By November, Virginia's Alexander H. H. Stuart reported that "many of the democrats who are tired of party dictation have joined the order." "I am sorry to see so many of our Democratic friends taking up with the 'Know Nothings,' " complained Mississippi's Democratic Senator Albert Gallatin Brown in December, and three months later he moaned, "Know Nothingism like the measles is catching."51

Most Democratic politicos were terrified by the heavy Democratic defections to the order in the South, and they bent every effort to break up the order and to woo those men back to the Democratic column before the 1855 elections. Southern Know Nothings, in turn, fought to retain their Democratic members, and they used nominations to do so. That effort had a vital impact on Whig reactions to the order as the 1855 elections approached. One reason many Virginia Whigs kept their distance from the order in the winter of 1854–55, for example, was a belief that Virginia's Know Nothings would insist upon nominating a Democrat for governor in order to demonstrate their independence from Whig control, as Know Nothings in fact did in Mississippi to prove the order was "no Whig trick." Ultimately, however, former Whigs received the vast majority of southern nominations made by the American party in 1855.⁵²

By May 1855, when Virginians voted, many southern Whigs had concluded that their old party had been obliterated. To understand fully why they did so and why many southern Whigs continued to regard the Know Nothings with suspicion, however, one must first examine what happened to the Whig party in the North during the elections of 1854 and how both Whigs and northern Know Nothings behaved in the aftermath of those elections. What happened in the North, rather than the nature of the southern American party itself, primarily shaped the outcome of the South's 1855 elections.

IV

Unlike the South, not a single free state witnessed completely straightforward two-party races between Whigs and Democrats. Know Nothings affected the results in many states, and where they did not, temperance men and Free Soilers did or else anti-Nebraska coalitions replaced the Whigs entirely. The upshot was a paradox. Northern Whig candidates were far more successful than southern Whigs in 1854, but by the end of that year the northern wing of the party had been weakened, or at least altered, far more than its southern counterpart. And where Whig state and local organizations had not eroded internally, they had assumed a corrosive antisouthern stance that dissolved the ties binding northern and southern Whigs together. Northern rather than southern elections inflicted mortal damage on the Whig party in 1854.

In distant California, for many reasons the most idiosyncratic of all free states, Whigs showed every intention of preserving the party intact. As in Missouri, Maine, New York, and, in 1854, Indiana, their potential success hinged on bitter splits within the dominant Democratic party, thus revealing once again how much Democrats determined Whigs' fate. By 1854, the most important of these Democratic divisions pitted Northerners against Southerners and focused on the rivalry between Tennessee-born Democratic Senator William Gwin and David Broderick, a New Yorker, who hungered for Gwin's Senate seat. When California's two incumbent Democratic congressmen sided with Broderick, Gwin's followers ran their own candidates against them, thus opening a golden opportunity for California's Whigs to capture the two seats. For two reasons, however, they again squandered it.

First, northern and southern Whigs also fell victim to sectional jealousies. By the summer, when Whigs held a state convention to nominate congressional candidates, word of the Kansas-Nebraska Act had reached the state. Northerners in the party wanted to take a stand against it or at least run northern-born men for Congress. A few Southerners, led by a militantly proslavery Tennessee Whig named Crabb, in contrast, sought to endorse the act in the state platform.⁵³ Ultimately the platform, like the subsequent Whig congressional campaign, ignored Nebraska altogether and instead trumpeted the same anticorruption, cleangovernment reform themes the party had used against the Democrats in 1853.

Southerners at the convention, however, exerted sufficient control to claim both congressional nominations for southern men, G. W. Bowie and Cal Benham. Many northern Whigs, angered by their rebuff at the convention, apparently refused to vote for them.⁵⁴

Second, the Know Nothing order that burgeoned in California that summer in response to incipient anti-Chinese sentiment endorsed the two anti-Broderick Democratic congressional candidates. Given the sectional divisions in both parties and the pervasive hostility to wire-pulling politicos, Know Nothing influence proved decisive. "But for the Know Nothings, the Whigs would have carried the State," one disconsolate Whig wrote Fillmore after the election. Both anti-Broderick Democrats won seats in Congress, whereas in the legislative races, where Know Nothings backed Whigs, Whigs tripled their numbers in the house from twelve to thirty-six and lost one seat in the senate.⁵⁵

After the election, some frustrated northern Whigs spoke of combining with Broderick Democrats in a new party against Southerners from both old parties. But when the badly divided new legislature failed to elect a new United States senator to Gwin's seat, southern Whigs and Democrats, who were determined to topple Democratic incumbent John Bigler in the 1855 gubernatorial race, took the lead by combining anti-Bigler forces in the Know Nothing party. Missouri's John Wilson and Tennessee's Bailie Peyton, who had fought Crabb's pro-Nebraska platform during the 1854 convention, led Whigs en masse into the American party, but the Democrat who did the most to form this coalition was Henry S. Foote, the former Democratic United States senator and Union governor from Mississippi, who palpably hungered after one of the state's two Senate seats. In 1855 Know Nothings ran ex-Whig J. Neely Johnston for governor, and he defeated the despised Bigler by about 4,000 votes. Know Nothings also gained control of the legislature. ⁵⁶

The California American or Know Nothing party was an oddity. Although there clearly was nativist sentiment in the state, Know Nothings recruited both Catholics and foreigners. Thus it was primarily the bipartisan anti-Bigler reform organization some Whigs and Democrats had spoken of creating in 1853. Yet it was also very clearly a party dominated by Southerners, and some northern Whigs who had no choice but to support it in 1855 angrily complained that the thrust of that campaign "was not that Americans shall rule" but that the new, antisouthern Republican party must not gain control of the national government. As one disgusted northern Whig put it, "Americanism was a mere pretext behind which to conceal the great question of the day and the prejudice against foreigners in our mining counties was eagerly seized hold of to forward the covert scheme of electing Foote and Crabb to succeed Gwin and [John B.] Weller" in the Senate. Such discontent meant that the Republican party had potential recruits in California, but by September 1855 the Whig party itself had been utterly displaced. A month later, one San Franciscan accurately observed, "The Whig party seems to be defunct in this State."57

V

That same assessment could have been applied to the Whig party by the end of 1854 in four midwestern states where anti-Nebraska coalitions displaced it—Wisconsin, Michigan, Indiana, and Ohio. The extent of cooperation among anti-Nebraska elements varied in those states, as did the enthusiasm of Whigs about joining new organizations. What the states had in common was more important. By the end of 1853, the Whig party in each was in desperate shape. In the most recent gubernatorial election in each state, the Whig proportion of the vote ranged from 43.3 percent in Indiana and 41.6 percent in Michigan in 1852 to 30.3 percent in Ohio and 6 percent in Wisconsin in 1853. In none of the four states did Whigs hold more than a third of the seats in the popular branch of the state legislature. Only one of the eight United States senators from the four states was a Whig, and in the House of Representatives that sat during 1854, the proportions of Whigs were: Wisconsin, zero of three; Michigan, zero of four; Indiana, one of eleven; and Ohio, seven of twenty-one. So forlorn did Whig prospects appear at the start of 1854 that no arrangements had been made in any of the four states to hold Whig state conventions.

Given their pathetic condition, Whig leaders understandably greeted the uproar caused by the Kansas-Nebraska Act as the chance to get outside aid even if that opportunity required a cessation of independent political action. From early March until late June, for example, New York's Horace Greeley, who advocated the formation of Republican parties across the North, excitedly urged his Indiana protegé Schuyler Colfax to arrange fusion tickets that combined Whigs and Free Soilers throughout the state. "Anti-Nebraska and anti-Rum," he crowed, "ought to unite Whigs and Free Soilers and carry your state this Fall." Any Whigs who refused to support "men on a Free platform . . . ought not to win." In the following months, both Whig Senator Ben Wade and Whig Congressman Lew Campbell of Ohio urged Whig editors in that state to promote anti-Nebraska alliances, and, as already noted, Whig editors in all four states did so. ⁵⁸

The intensity of anti-Nebraska sentiment among Whig politicians and voters in those four states—and everywhere in the North, for that matter—cannot be gainsaid. Furious that seven of ten Indiana Democrats in the House voted for the "perfidious" repeal of the Missouri Compromise in May, the determined Colfax vowed, "The North shall remember to expunge the expungers." Whig politicos and editors from all four states publicly fulminated against Slave Power aggressions and southern Whig betraval.⁵⁹ By itself, the intensity of anti-Nebraska outrage predisposed the minority Whigs in all four states toward coalition in order to ensure that Democrats were defeated, but two other factors facilitated the creation of anti-Nebraska coalitions. Democrats in all four states, but especially Indiana, were deeply split over Nebraska, and thus anti-Nebraska Democrats seemed likely recruits. In addition, to varying degrees in all four, prohibitionism, nativism, and Know Nothingism further fragmented the Democratic rank and file and further alienated the electorate from the reigning Democratic state parties. In none of the four states, consequently, was antislavery sentiment the sole issue in the 1854 campaign or the only element in the formation of anti-Nebraska coalitions.

Both Whig needs and existing issues and circumstances, therefore, pointed to the relatively easy formation of anti-Nebraska coalitions in Wisconsin, Michigan, Indiana, and Ohio. July state conventions formalized anti-Nebraska alliances in all four, and they swept to impressive triumphs in the October and November elections. Individual Whig politicians who embraced coalition, moreover, palpably benefited from that decision. In Wisconsin, where there was no statewide race, anti-Nebraska men elected two of three congressmen, including Cadwallader C.

Washburn, the Whig brother of Elihu and Israel Washburn(e), and their majority in the new legislature sent Free Soiler Charles Durkee, whom Whigs had helped reelect to Congress in 1850, to the Senate. In Michigan, the entire coalition state ticket, including the zealous prohibitionist and stridently anti-Catholic Detroit Whig Jacob Howard, who ran for attorney general, triumphed, as did three of the state's four congressional candidates, all of whom were Whigs who had independently been endorsed by Know Nothings. Headed by a one-time Whig, Indiana's anti-Nebraska state ticket won, as did nine anti-Democratic congressional candidates, five of whom were Whigs, compared to one Whig and ten Democrats elected only two years earlier. And in Ohio, where anti-Nebraska candidates swept all twenty-one congressional districts in 1854, fourteen of the new representatives were Whigs.⁶⁰

However inevitable coalition appeared in the spring and however much Whigs apparently benefited from it in the fall, there was nonetheless some Whig resistance to it in all four states, as there would also be in Illinois and Iowa. If only because Democratic disarray and vulnerability created the possibility of Whig victories even without coalition, dissident Whigs held out against the gravitational forces pulling anti-Pierce administration men together. Thus Ohio Free Soilers seeking coalition feared "that the hunker Whigs will again seek to make capital from the division of the democratic party" by attempting "to reorganize their party now." Similarly, Indiana's Whig state committee chairman John Defrees, a proponent of coalition, had to fend off the demands of Whigs who wanted to preserve an independent "organization of the Whig party, for the present contest."61 This resistance was far more significant in Iowa and the lower midwestern states that bordered on the Ohio River than in Wisconsin and Michigan. As a result, the anti-Nebraska coalitions assumed a different form in the former than in the latter, and Whigs in the two blocs of states perceived them as serving different functions. Simply put, far more Wisconsin and Michigan Whigs viewed the coalitions created in 1854 as a final and irrevocable break from the South than was the case in Ohio and Indiana.

The differences stemmed from demography and recent political history. A much greater proportion of the residents in Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio than in Michigan and Wisconsin had southern antecedents and kinfolk still living in the South. As a result, Whig leaders who lived among them or personally shared their southern heritage recognized the need to propitiate the sensibilities of their constituents. This attitude by no means precluded opposition to slavery extension and the Nebraska Act. Many of the Southerners in the Midwest had left the South to escape the economic and social dominance of slaveholders, and they abhorred the prospect of its establishment in Kansas and Nebraska. But solicitude for the concerns of southern-descended constituents did foster conservatism and an aversion to anything that might threaten the Union, whether southern aggression against a hitherto sacrosanct sectional compromise or the self-righteous antislavery, South-bashing rhetoric they associated with abolitionists and Free Soilers.

Readiness to cooperate with Free Soilers as equal partners was the second thing that differentiated Michigan and Wisconsin Whigs from those in the lower Midwest. In contrast with Ohio and Indiana Whigs, Michigan and Wisconsin Whigs had joined pragmatically with Free Soilers to back common congressional and gubernatorial candidates as early as 1850, and the platforms adopted by Republican coalitions in those states incorporated much more of the radical Free Soil agenda than those of anti-Nebraska coalitions elsewhere. In Wisconsin, for example, even a tiff between the state's most prominent Whig editor, Rufus King of the Milwaukee Sentinel, and his Free Soil counterpart, Sherman Booth, over the latter's supposed responsibility for preventing legislative passage of a prohibition bill in early 1854 failed to stop coalition against the Nebraska Act. When Booth called for a statewide convention to meet in July, Whig papers endorsed the call. Taking the name "Republican," that convention adopted a platform that incorporated the Free Soil agenda. It demanded repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act as well as of the Nebraska law and pledged resistance to slavery extension and to the admission of more slave states. Subsequently, local Whig organizations embraced the Republican label and called on Free Soilers and anti-Nebraska Democrats to combine with them. Few, if any, Whigs, moreover, failed to support Republican candidates who ran on this platform.

Although it took Michigan's 1854 Republican coalition over a full year to develop into a coherent political party, Michigan's Whigs made a more thorough repudiation of national Whiggery and former southern Whig allies in 1854 than those from any other northern state. Paradoxically, however, the party's demolition resulted primarily from the determined resistance of some Whigs to any fusion whatsoever. For years, Michigan's Whigs had been split between an antislavery, antisouthern Sewardite majority associated with Ioseph Warren's and Henry Barns' Detroit Tribune and pro-Fillmore conservatives aligned behind the Detroit Advertiser, which denounced the Nebraska Act as outrageous but also argued that Whigs should exploit anti-Nebraska sentiment by preserving a separate organization for the fall elections and by spurning alliance with other anti-Nebraska men. When Free Soilers precipitously nominated their own state ticket in February 1854 and subsequently refused to abandon it in order to cooperate with Whigs, they provided additional ammunition for the Advertiser's case that Whigs should go it alone.⁶³ This impasse infuriated Whigs who sought coalition. By June one Whig paper noted despairingly that Free Soil and conservative Whig intransigence guaranteed separate anti-Democratic tickets in the fall, and that possibility prompted Warren's angry insistence that Whigs surrender their "love for an empty name" and his call for an all-parties anti-Nebraska convention on July 6. Finally, in late June, a mass meeting of Free Soilers agreed to drop their ticket and attend the meeting Warren had called. Relieved pro-coalition Whigs then vindictively set out utterly to humiliate the conservatives who had opposed coalition by making it as radically antisouthern as possible.64

Not only did the July state convention adopt the name Republican and nominate the Free Soiler Kinsley J. Bingham for governor. Whig attendees agreed to a platform that incorporated Free Soil demands for "abrogation" of the Fugitive Slave Act and abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia as well as repeal of the Nebraska Act, a platform that even the pro-Republican Greeley considered "a little too steep." Furthermore, to neutralize criticism from the Advertiser that a handful of self-appointed Whig leaders were trying to sell the Whig party body and soul to Free Soilers and abolitionists, pro-coalition Whigs attempted to legitimize abandonment of separate action with rank-and-file Whigs by holding a series of local and district meetings that ratified the actions taken in July. During August and September, local or district Whig conventions met on the same day as, or a few days after, Fusion, Independent, or Republican conventions and endorsed their nominees for Congress and the state legislature. Ostensibly as a concession to the Advertiser, finally, pro-coalition Whigs agreed to hold a Whig state convention in October, the last ever held in Michigan, where the majority of delegates shouted down demands from conservatives for a separate Whig state ticket and endorsed the Republican candidates on a platform that denounced "the undying efforts of the Slave Power for political supremacy."

Despite the Advertiser's continued grumbling, election returns suggest that most conservative Whigs supported Republican candidates in 1854 rather than abstaining. The reason they did so appears to have been the Know Nothing order that emerged in Michigan by June, which grew independently from, but parallel to, the Republicans that year and which reflected the anti-Catholic animosity that had erupted in local elections in 1853 and 1854. Whatever the Advertiser thought of Free Soilers and coalition, it had taken stridently anti-Catholic positions in Detroit politics, and during 1854 it openly justified the growth of Know Nothingism. Many conservatives, therefore, probably joined lodges in 1854, and once those lodges endorsed Republican state and congressional candidates, membership vows required conservatives to support them. Together, that is, Republicanism and Know Nothingism gutted the Michigan Whig party, and the vindictive Warren could barely suppress his glee. "I think we shall not be troubled hereafter with any more attempts to galvanize the Whig party into life." he gloated to Seward after the fall election. "The sooner AntiSlavery Whigs and antislavery democrats combine their strength the better for the cause of freedom."66

Warren's determination to bury the Whig party was shared by few procoalition Whigs in Indiana and Ohio, where there was much greater Whig resistance to even a temporary cessation of independent activity. Deep distrust of Free Soilers and the larger numbers of conservative Whigs convinced even Whig proponents of coalition that they must control the anti-Nebraska movements or at least keep Free Soilers from dominating them. In Ohio, for example, Whig editors and officeholders dared not push for coalition until Whig intervention at a mass anti-Nebraska meeting in March excluded Free Soil demands and confined protests to repeal of the Missouri Compromise line. Similarly, nine day's before Indiana's anti-Nebraska convention in July, Whig leader Godlove Orth insisted that "The Whigs must control that convention—without SEEMING to do so." 67

The need to reassure reluctant Whigs had several results. In both Indiana and Ohio the anti-Nebraska coalitions shunned the name Republican because of its radical connotations and instead called themselves "People's" movements. Their state and local platforms eschewed Free Soil planks attacking slavery in the District of Columbia and the Fugitive Slave Act and instead confined themselves to demands to restore the status quo by reimposing the Missouri restriction on Kansas and Nebraska. Unlike Michigan's Whigs, who pledged to enlist in the Republican cause until the struggle against the Slave Power ended, moreover, procoalition Whigs in Ohio and Indiana explicitly emphasized that no permanent alliance with anti-Nebraska Democrats and the hated Free Soilers was contemplated and that cooperation in 1854 was temporary. In Ohio, for example, Whigs at the People's state convention insisted that no state committee be appointed in order to indicate the alliance's evanescent quality. Four days after it met, Schouler, who worked for coalition, cooed in the Cincinnati Gazette that "the Whig party and the Union will stand. . . . It makes no difference by what name you call it, its principles are undying." Similarly, Indiana's Defrees denied that the People's state convention was launching "a permanent organization."

Implacable Whig resistance to coalition below the statewide level reveals why Whig editors had to sugar-coat what many Whigs deemed an exceptionally bitter pill even with the watered-down anti-Nebraska platforms. In Ohio, for example, Whig conventions in the eighth, tenth, and fifteenth congressional districts flatly refused to coalesce with other anti-Nebraska men and instead nominated straight Whig tickets for congressmen and state legislators. As if to punctuate Whig antipathy to coalition, Oscar Moore, who replaced four-term incumbent John Taylor as the Whig nominee in the tenth district, repeatedly proclaimed his loyalty to the national Whig party. In the second district defiant Whigs renominated J. Scott Harrison, an archetypal Whig conservative, despite Free Soilers' refusal to endorse him, and in the third district a Whig convention also renominated Lew Campbell without consulting other anti-Nebraska men.⁷⁰

In most Ohio districts, People's, not Whig, conventions nominated the coalition's congressional candidates, and in many places where Whigs failed to control those nominations, their aversion to coalition was especially glaring. When the People's convention in the eleventh district nominated a Democrat, Whigs refused to support him and forced his replacement by Valentine Horton, a Whig who had Know Nothing backing. Whig rebellion against coalition was perhaps sharpest in the two Western Reserve districts represented by incumbent Free Soilers Ned Wade and Joshua Giddings. Although Whigs realized that it was futile to run their own men against them, local Whig organizations loudly refused to endorse their renomination and reelection even though Ned Wade was Ben Wade's brother, and large minorities of Whigs abstained rather than support them on election day. Despite all attempts to assure Whigs that coalition was moderate and temporary, indeed, about one-fourth of the Ohio voters who had supported Whigs in October 1852 sat home on election day in October 1854 rather than vote for the coalition ticket.⁷¹

Similarly, Horace Greeley's plea that Indiana's Whigs combine with Free Soilers and return George W. Iulian to the House fundamentally misread Whig attitudes in that state. Most Indiana Whigs, particularly those in Julian's home district, detested Free Soilers. At the People's state convention in July, delegates shouted down an attempt by Julian to substitute a more radical platform that in effect called on the North to repudiate the Compromise of 1850, and not one of the slots on the People's state ticket or one of the eleven People's congressional nominations went to a Free Soiler.⁷² More than perverse jealousy explains why Whigs shut out Free Soilers from People's nominations. Unlike Ohio's, Indiana's Free Soilers were not numerous enough to give Whigs a majority against the dominant Democrats.⁷³ Only by cutting into Democratic ranks could the People's coalition win, and Whigs therefore targeted dissident Democrats, not Free Soilers, as their preferred allies in 1854. The opportunity came when the Democratic state convention in May, at the instruction of Democratic Senator Jesse Bright, not only committed the party to the Nebraska Act and thereby effectively read anti-Nebraska men out of the party but also opposed passage of a Maine Law and denounced the Methodist clergy who sought it for interfering in political affairs. When furious anti-Nebraska Democrats called for an anti-Nebraska meeting at Indianapolis in July, Whig state committee chairman Defrees and other Whig editors endorsed the call. In addition, the People's state convention itself not only called for restoration of the Missouri restriction. It also demanded passage of the Maine Law and defended the right of clergymen to participate in politics.⁷⁴

If procoalition Whigs sought help from dissident Democrats in the People's movement, they still intended to control the People's state convention "without SEEMING to do so." Whigs did just that. Whigs claimed three of the five slots on the state ticket nominated at Indianapolis, six of the eleven subsequent People's district conventions nominated Whigs for Congress, and when the People's convention in the third congressional district had the temerity to nominate an anti-Nebraska Democrat named John Hendricks for Congress, furious Whigs nominated veteran Whig leader George Dunn and forced Hendricks to withdraw from the race to avoid splitting the anti-Democratic vote. Altogether, that is, in a state where Whigs had seemed a hopeless minority at the start of 1854, they seized seven of eleven congressional nominations. Whigs dominated the Indiana People's movement because they seized control of the state's Know Nothing order. In no other state in 1854 did Whigs manipulate the secret nativist fraternity so expertly to advance their own partisan purposes. And they could do so, in large part, because of the integral relationship between nativism and prohibitionism in Indiana.

A state temperance convention in January had not nominated its own ticket, as many politicos had feared, but it had urged subsequent meetings of its local and county affiliates to run their own legislative candidates if neither Whig nor Democratic nominees pledged themselves to enact a Maine Law. Those local affiliates began to meet in February, the same month that the first Know Nothing lodge appeared in the state. Since one of the membership vows of Indiana's Know Nothing order pledged members to support passage of a Maine Law, it seems likely that temperance men seized upon the secret society as a device to ensure a consolidated prohibitionist vote in October. Since many of those dries were Democrats who would be bound by Know Nothing vows to support candidates endorsed by the order, astute Whigs like Orth and Colfax instantly recognized its potential for locking up Democratic votes if Whigs could control the order itself.⁷⁶

How Whigs managed to do so is unclear, but that they used the order to serve their own purposes is undeniable. Two days before the People's state convention met in Indianapolis, the first meeting of the Know Nothing state council with representatives from local lodges gathered secretly in the city, chose Whig activist Orth as president of the state council, and nominated a state ticket. The same Know Nothings then attended and controlled the People's convention and selected the identical ticket. A similar scenario unfolded in ten of the state's eleven congressional districts. Know Nothings met prior to district People's conventions, secretly chose a congressional nominee, and then infiltrated the People's convention so thoroughly that the same man was nominated. The exception to this pattern proved the rule. Know Nothings had not met yet to select a candidate when the People's convention in the third district nominated the Democrat John Hendricks. Instead, Know Nothings threw their endorsement to Hendricks' rebellious Whig rival George Dunn, and that endorsement, possibly more than anything else, forced Hendricks out of the race. In sum, every anti-Democratic congressional candidate in Indiana was a Know Nothing or had Know Nothing backing. 77

The beauties of Know Nothingism for ambitious Whigs went beyond the permeability of the order's secret machinery. In a state long dominated by Democrats, Know Nothings' antiparty, antipolitician rhetoric proved perfect for Whig needs. Thus Defrees happily asserted in the Indianapolis Journal that supporters of the People's movement were "unawed by party dictation." Whigs and Democrats alike also recognized what a powerful combination anti-Nebraskaism, prohibitionism, and nativism was. By September Orth predicted "a glorious victory" for "the friends of Freedom Temperance and our Native Land," and after the election Defrees, a Know Nothing sympathizer and probably a member, crowed that "American Principles" contributed to the victory and that Know Nothingism was an instrument of "the people, to overthrow the corruption that continued [Democratic] party success has spread through all departments of the Government." Long accustomed to easy Democratic triumphs over the hapless Whig foe. the bitter Democrat John Law, in contrast, complained that "the Whig party . . . have no existence in Indiana." Instead, Whigs had "united themselves with the abolitionists, the anti-Nebraska men, the Maine Liquor Law men, and the 'Know Nothings' the most dangerous of all."78

Finally, as in Michigan and Ohio, Know Nothingism allowed procoalition Whig leaders to persuade many of their party's most conservative elements to cooperate in a movement they otherwise would have spurned. Nonetheless, in Indiana as in Ohio, resentment among conservative Whigs about the apparent abandonment of the party ran deep. Between a tenth and a fifth of Whigs who voted for Winfield Scott in 1852 abstained in 1854 rather than support People's candidates.⁷⁹ For whatever reason, Whig abstainers in Ohio and Indiana had not joined Know Nothing lodges by the fall of 1854, but what often linked them with conservatives who joined the coalition via Know Nothingism is what most differentiated them from men like Michigan's Joseph Warren. Many Ohio and Indiana Whigs were not yet prepared to burn all bridges to their erstwhile southern Whig allies. The dilution of anti-Nebraska platforms in the two states and the insistence by editors like Defrees and Schouler that coalition was only temporary were emphatically not simply opportunistic ploys to induce suspicious conservative Whigs to support People's tickets. They were instead conscious efforts to hold the door open for future alliances with southern Whigs who also deplored the reopening of sectional agitation. The outraged Free Soiler Julian recognized that fact when he spat in disgust after his failure to modify the Indiana People's platform that "every Doughface in Indiana can demand the restoration of this compromise."80

Equally important, however, by late 1854, Whig leaders who entered People's movements in Ohio and Indiana via Know Nothingism and still sought to perpetuate alliances with southern Whigs believed that it could now be done only through, or in conjunction with, the Know Nothing order. This belief reflected a recognition that Know Nothingism had attracted tens of thousands of ardent nativists and antiparty reformers who would never abide an attempt to resurrect Whiggery, as well as a recognition that Whiggery had been so weakened elsewhere that an open American party of the type advocated by Clayton now represented perhaps the best chance of creating a new bisectional organization to oppose the Democrats.

The point here is that some men who authentically hated the Nebraska Act and slavery extension and who helped engineer the anti-Nebraska coalitions of 1854 still wanted no part of a permanent, exclusively northern antislavery party. It seems likely that such Whig politicos originally embraced Know Nothingism precisely because they saw it as a bridge to potential southern allies who could help them control the Thirty-Fourth Congress and win the presidency in 1856. In Indiana, for example, Orth concluded by 1855 that since "the 'fusion' party had outlived its usefulness and the Whig party cannot be galvanized into existence again," Know Nothings offered the best hope to build a new bisectional organization. "I want to preserve the nationality of our order if it can be done without a sacrifice of principle."81 Meanwhile, Ohio Congressman Lew Campbell, who pressed for cooperation among all anti-Nebraska men in Washington and promoted fusion within Ohio during the spring of 1854, simultaneously joined a Know Nothing lodge in Washington in order to line up southern Whig/Know Nothing backing for his run for the speakership of the House when Congress met in December 1855 or even the presidency in 1856.82 Similarly, the ex-Boston editor William Schouler, now in Cincinnati, endorsed Know Nothing candidates in that city during 1854 even as he promoted a fusion anti-Nebraska coalition. Once the 1854 election was over, moreover, Schouler entered into correspondence with other Whig editors from around the country to make arrangements for holding a Whig national convention in 1856 that would reunite the northern and southern wings of the party by running an anti-Nebraska southern Whig like Kentucky's Garrett Davis, who was also a Know Nothing, for president.83

VI

Outside of Wisconsin, Michigan, Indiana, and Ohio, indeed, Whigs from every northern state were determined to preserve distinctive Whig organizations, if not ties to southern Whig allies, in 1854. Nonetheless, what occurred in them explains why even northern Whigs who hoped to retain an alliance with their southern counterparts doubted by the end of 1854 that they could do so through the Whig party itself. In some states—Iowa, Vermont, Pennsylvania, and a few congressional districts in Illinois, for example—Whigs could not resist reaching out to Free Soilers for help, thereby reducing the likelihood of future cooperation with southern Whigs. In Pennsylvania and other northern states, moreover, ambitious Whig candidates either joined Know Nothing lodges or sought to enlist Know Nothing aid, thereby compromising the likelihood of their future independent action as Whigs. And in the few states like Maine, Massachusetts, and New York where some Whig leaders defiantly refused to combine with any other group, other Whigs successfully orchestrated massive defections by the Whig rank and file to new organizations. Only New Jersey's Whig party escaped the 1854 elections anywhere near intact, and by the time New Jersey's November returns were in, even its Whig leaders realized that the Whig party must ally with Know Nothings to have any chance of remaining a national force.

Iowa and Illinois, which occupied opposite banks of the Mississippi River, illustrate how events forced even grudgingly reluctant midwestern Whigs to abandon the party. In Iowa, which voted in August, a few ambitious and committed leaders dragged the Whig party into an alliance with Free Soilers in 1854 that many rank-and-file Whigs considered both unnecessary and repugnant. Profusion leaders then used their control of elective offices to make the new alliance permanent. Most Illinois Whigs, in contrast, staunchly resisted fusion during the 1854 campaign. Nonetheless, during the winter of 1854–55 they found it necessary to sacrifice one of their champions in order to replace the pro-Nebraska Democrat James Shields in the Senate with an anti-Nebraska man. By reducing even further the possibility that the Whig party might ever control the Senate again, that lost opportunity along with events elsewhere in 1855 convinced realistic Whigs that continued allegiance to the party was fatuous.

In 1852 Winfield Scott ran only 1,900 votes behind Pierce in Iowa, and the narrowness of this margin made that year's 1,600 Free Soil voters an obvious target as Whigs prepared for the gubernatorial, congressional, and state legislative elections of 1854. For two reasons, however, many Whigs shunned their support. First, Iowa's tiny Free Soil party was led by genuinely egalitarian ideologues, abolitionists who wanted not just to stop slavery's spread, but to eradicate it as well as all antiblack laws within Iowa itself. Many Iowa Whigs, especially those who favored Fillmore's nomination in 1852, considered Free Soilers' abolitionist proclivities and racial egalitarianism simply too extreme, and Free Soilers, who reciprocated that distrust, displayed their own contempt for fusion by nominating their own gubernatorial candidate in January 1854.⁸⁴

Second, by the start of 1854, abstention by disillusioned and disgusted Democratic voters seemed so likely that Whigs might be able to win even without Free Soil aid. Once again, in sum, the condition of and actions by Democrats vitally shaped what Whigs did. The Democratic party was riven by internal feuds over rival railroad schemes seeking state and congressional subsidies. It opposed prohibition when demand for a Maine Law was burgeoning, and temperance men threatened to run their own tickets. It stubbornly defended the absolute ban on banking in the state's 1846 constitution that even many Democrats themselves considered anachronistic and inimical to economic development. When all three Iowa Democrats in Congress supported the Nebraska bill, finally, they outraged even southern-born conservatives.

When the Iowa state Whig convention met in late February 1854, most Whigs expected to focus at least their state campaign on the prohibition issue and to run independently of the Free Soilers. Free Soilers, including that party's gubernatorial nominee, who attended the Whig convention as a delegate, persuaded them otherwise. If Whigs nominated James W. Grimes on a platform that strongly condemned the Nebraska bill and endorsed prohibition, the Free Soilers promised to withdraw their ticket and support the Whig slate. Grimes was the key to coalition. A young New England-born and-educated lawyer, he had attended the Whig national convention in 1848 and served several terms in the legislature, but he was not known as a Whig activist and he had cast no previous votes for or against antiblack laws that might alienate Free Soilers from him. Confronted with an offer they could not refuse, Whigs nominated Grimes, who then bent every effort to cement a permanent fusion and thus bury the Whig party, to which he had little attachment.85 Furthermore, during the campaign, he stressed the slavery extension issue and soft-pedaled prohibition in order to attract support from anti-Nebraska Germans. In July, he wrote Illinois Whig Congressman Elihu Washburne to solicit endorsements of his candidacy from Free Soilers Salmon Chase and Joshua Giddings. And he kept his distance from one of the Whig congressional candidates, James Thorington, because Thorington was also a Know Nothing. 86

Iowa's conservative Whigs were furious. "James W. Grimes has been nominated for Governor in connexion with an out & out abolition ticket," one protested shortly after Grimes' selection. "His own Whiggery has been greatly suspected. I feel no interest in the Canvass—having but little confidence in either party." Whigs therefore insisted upon nominating their own congressional candidates, thereby spurning further coalitions with Free Soilers, but in the second district the opposition united behind Thorington. Grimes and Thorington won in August, and anti-Nebraska men, the majority of whom were Whigs, would also control the state legislature. But some disgusted conservative Whigs refused to vote for Grimes, and over three-fourths of previous Whig voters abstained rather than support the Free Soilers on the rest of the state ticket.⁸⁷

Because Iowa was the first northern state to vote in 1854, eastern Whigs watched its results closely, and Greeley initially pronounced them a victory of a "Whig Anti-Nebraska, Anti-Whiskey ticket." As Greeley's own interest in promoting new Republican parties in New York and elsewhere grew during the fall, however, he changed his tune. In a later editorial, Greeley flatly denied that "the late victory of the Anti-Slavery and Anti-grog-shop ticket in Iowa" was "a victory of the Whigs." "The Whig party, as such, never could have gained that success," he intoned, even though former Whigs constituted almost 70 percent of Grimes' vote. "It was not done by either of the old organizations but by that new party of the People which the Nebraska outrage has brought to life in all Northern States and which, we do not doubt, is destined substantially to triumph everywhere."

Grimes attempted to bring Iowa's "new party" to maturity when the new legislature met. He called on it to pass forthright resolutions condemning repeal of the Missouri Compromise, to enact a strict antiliquor law, and to repeal the ban against banking activity in the state. He also persuaded Whig legislators to put a Free Soiler on the state supreme court. Most important, he intervened in the election of a new United States senator to prevent Whig regulars, who protested the abandonment of the party, from winning that prestigious office. At least a dozen conservative Whigs boycotted a caucus of anti-Nebraska men and refused to support its nominee, former Assistant Postmaster General Fitz Henry Warren. Free Soilers also balked at Warren, and they instead backed young James Harlan, a Whig who had previously cooperated with the third party. As a result, on the first ballot opponents of incumbent pro-Nebraska Democrat Augustus Dodge fragmented among three candidates—Harlan, Warren, and Ed Johnson, the candidate of the "National Whigs." After that ballot Dodge withdrew, and Democrats in desperation agreed to back a different National Whig in the hope of luring dissidents into a coalition. In response, the anti-Nebraska caucus now united on Harlan, but he won only because Grimes twisted the arms of seven Whig conservatives to vote for him.89

In the spring of 1855, some Whigs as well as Know Nothings competed in Iowa's local elections. By April and May of that year, however, Grimes was writing Chase that "it seems to me that it is time to thoroughly organize the Republican party," and Grimes probably wrote the call for the first statewide Republican convention in 1856 that did so. Along with his Free Soil allies, who joined him in repudiating "the shibboleths of Whiggery" clung to by "Old Hunkerish" Whigs, Grimes had done more than any single individual to destroy the Iowa Whig party as an independent political force.⁹⁰

Across the Mississippi River from Iowa, Illinois' Free Soilers tried to organize a Republican party at a state convention in Springfield in October 1854, but it proved a complete fizzle. Whigs from the northern half of Illinois had cooperated with Free Soilers in 1852, when Whigs won four of nine House seats, and they were ready to do so again in 1854. Whigs from central and southern Illinois, however, refused to abandon their old party, thereby dooming rapid formation of a statewide Republican organization. When Springfield Whig Abraham Lincoln was named to a Republican state committee by the small October gathering, for example, he declined to serve.⁹¹

Only a single, relatively minor statewide office was contested in Illinois that year, and Whig newspapers nominated their own man for that office even before the abortive Republican convention met. The congressional races, because of almost solid support from incumbent Democratic congressmen for the Nebraska bill, were considered far more important. In five of the nine House districts Whigs made no pretense of fusion whatsoever and ran straight Whig tickets against Democrats. Two of their candidates, James Knox in the fourth district and Richard Yates in the sixth, were incumbents who simply announced their intention to run again and were accepted without formal convention nominations. In still another district, the eighth, Whigs ran state legislative tickets but nominated no one for Congress. Instead they backed anti-Nebraska Democrat Lyman Trumbull against the regular, pro-Nebraska Democratic nominee.

Only in the three northernmost congressional districts did Whigs fuse with Free Soilers, but even there some Whigs resisted. In the northwestern first district, which bordered on Wisconsin, Galena Whig incumbent Elihu Washburne, who had squeezed by with a 300-vote margin and less than 44 percent of the vote in a three-way race in 1852, avidly sought Free Soil support in 1854. Yet Whigs in the district, "who fear they shall loose [sic] their identity as Whigs" if they cooperated in an anti-Nebraska coalition, insisted that a separate Whig convention nominate Washburne on the same day that a fusion Republican convention also did so. Washburne's fusionist friends were embarrassed by this separate Whig nomination, but he refused to repudiate it, even though it caused anti-Nebraska Democrats to run their own candidate.⁹²

In the third or Bloomington district, Free Soilers also held the balance of power in 1852, but because many Whigs opposed coalition with them in a new Republican party, Whig incumbent Jesse Norton, who won with only 46 percent of the total in 1852, originally announced himself as a Whig candidate for reelection who would stand down only if a Whig convention replaced him. No such Whig convention ever met. Norton, meanwhile, joined the Know Nothings to enhance his chances. Nonetheless, a Republican convention also nominated him on a platform that called for repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act and imposition of the Wilmot Proviso on all territories. Fuming at that platform's radicalism, the Joliet Signal, the district's leading Democratic paper, in a transparent attempt to drive conservative Whigs away from him, accused Norton of renouncing "his allegiance to the old Whig party," repudiating "the old Whig platform," and trampling "upon the ashes of the immortal Clay." In campaign speeches for Norton, Abraham Lincoln neutralized these wild charges by insisting that the Whig party still existed in the district, despite Republicans' endorsement of Norton. Nor did many, if any, Whigs abandon Norton in November. His vote surpassed the combined total for Whigs and Free Soilers in 1852, and he won with over 62 percent of the total. 93

The second or Chicago congressional district witnessed the most confusing race and the least successful attempt to combine the anti-Democratic opposition. Unlike most large cities, Chicago housed a powerful Free Soil party that had drawn over 13 percent of the vote in 1852, and its leaders were the state's most zealous advocates of forming a Republican party. Like other northern cities, however, Chicago also saw a burgeoning Know Nothing movement in 1854. Anticipating a race against incumbent anti-Nebraska Democrat "Long John" Wentworth, proponents of fusion were willing to seek Know Nothing support to marshal every vote they could get. Their real problem, however, came from what the Free Soiler Zebina Eastman called "old fogy Whigs," who were appalled at the thought of combining with Free Soilers. Whigs chose delegates to a fusion or Republican nominating convention in September, but even before it met, the pro-fusion Whig editor Richard S. Wilson of the Chicago Tribune feared "the difficulty that may grow out of the ultra Whigs insisting upon a nomination of their own." "94

That fear proved prophetic. The Republican convention attracted Whigs, Free Soilers, and Know Nothings, but its congressional nomination went to the Democratic Mayor James Woodworth, who also had the endorsement of Know Nothings. Conservative Whigs found Woodworth's nomination intolerable. Instigated by the Chicago Journal, long a competitor and ideological rival of Wilson's Chicago Tribune, they nominated their own man, Robert S. Blackwell, a move that the Democratic State Register jeered was "a sickly effort on the part of the Chicago Journal clique to resist the crushing out of the old [Whig] name with the surrender to abolitionism."

The campaign grew even more complicated because the Democrats refused to renominate Wentworth and chose a pro-Nebraska regular in his place. That move caused anti-Nebraska Democrats, who were dissatisfied with both Woodworth and Blackwell, to nominate a fourth candidate. Despite the four-way race, Woodworth, the Know Nothing Republican, still won with a majority. Nonetheless, Blackwell attracted about a fifth of the total vote, and his 2,600 supporters represented almost two-fifths of the Whig vote in 1852. The Chicago Whig organization had not been completely supplanted, but it had been ripped apart.

The bitterest disappointment for Illinois Whigs came in the winter of 1854–55 when the legislature selected a new United States senator. Anti-Nebraska men controlled both chambers, and Whigs far outnumbered Free Soilers and anti-Nebraska Democrats in each. Believing their preponderance in the opposition justified the selection of a Whig to replace James Shields, Whigs rallied behind Lincoln, who resigned the legislative seat he had just won to make himself available for the Senate. Both Know Nothings and Republicans opposed Lincoln, the latter because they doubted his antislavery fervor and because he had spurned the Republicans and instead made "indiscreet professions of Whiggery 'and nothing else'" during the recent campaign. Republicans, as one wrote, "rejoice[d] at the death of Whiggery $^{\prime\prime}$ and refused to allow the revival of ''old Whig doctrines'' that Lincoln's election would signal. 96

Within the legislature itself, a small bloc of anti-Nebraska Democrats who refused to elevate any Whig to the Senate ultimately doomed Lincoln's chances. That intransigence, in turn, caused some Whig legislators to cling to Lincoln in retaliation. When divisions among the anti-Nebraska men threatened to allow a pro-Nebraska Democrat to slip into the Senate seat, Lincoln urged the Whig legislators to swallow their pride and support Lyman Trumbull, the favorite of the anti-Nebraska Democrats, and Trumbull won the senatorship. Lincoln's magnanimous intervention helped inflict a stinging blow on Douglas and the pro-Nebraska Democrats, who despised Trumbull as a turncoat, but it also hastened the dissolution of the Illinois Whig party by promoting the fusion that Lincoln and the great majority of Whigs had rejected in 1854.⁹⁷

VII

Three New England and three Middle Atlantic states also held elections in the fall of 1854. Whigs in all six tried to ride the anti-Nebraska issue to power, but they met only mixed success. What most differentiated these six states from each other, however, was the influence of Know Nothings on the 1854 races. In Vermont, Maine, and, surprisingly, New Jersey, Know Nothings had only a minimal impact during 1854. In Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, in contrast, they proved so central to the outcome that Know Nothingism doomed all hopes of resurrecting the national Whig party.

Know Nothings had the least impact on Vermont, but Vermont's Whigs courted Free Soilers so aggressively during the 1854 campaign that they helped frighten southern Whigs and northern conservatives out of the Whig organization. Following their upset defeat in 1853 in which prohibitionist Whigs had deserted the party, Whigs at their June 1854 state convention adopted a platform that denounced the repeal of the Missouri Compromise as "palpable perfidy to a solemn pledge of Freedom" and included the Free Soil demand for repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act. In addition, Whigs nominated Free Soiler Oscar Shafter to run for lieutenant governor. For governor, they bypassed former Governor Erastus Fairbanks, whom prohibitionists loathed, and instead chose Judge Stephen Royce, whom the Whig press called a "firm and consistent Whig."

Despite the party's transparent reach for Free Soil support, which caused former Senator Samuel Phelps to complain that "the Whig party of Vermont has become an ultra abolition party," fusion almost failed because of the prohibition issue that prompted prohibitionist defections in 1853. Payce may have been a "firm and consistent Whig," but dries doubted his commitment to the Maine Law. Their suspicions impelled a rebellion. On July 13, three groups gathered simultaneously in Burlington: the Free Soil state convention, the state convention of Vermont's temperance association, and an anti-Nebraska mass meeting that encompassed the other two groups. To the Whigs' dismay, the anti-Nebraska mass meeting refused to endorse Royce and Shafter and instead nominated the prohibitionist E. P. Walton, who had orchestrated the bolt from the Whig ticket in 1853, for governor and a different Free Soiler for lieutenant governor, nominations that the Free Soilers immediately ratified. Walton declined on the spot, reendorsed Royce, and persuaded the Free Soilers and temperance men to do so too, but Whigs were forced to replace Shafter with the Free Soiler named by the anti-Nebraska meeting.

Cooperation was almost as rocky in the congressional races. All three incumbent Vermont congressmen were Whigs who had voted against Nebraska and who had been opposed by Free Soilers as well as Democrats in 1852. Two of them, Alvin Sabin and James Meacham, sought reelection. Meacham was nominated by a straight Whig convention, an action to which Free Soilers acquiesced, and Sabin by a nonpartisan anti-Nebraska mass meeting that the Democratic press labeled Republican. In the second district, Whigs insisted on running their own man, Justin Morrill, whose repeated pledges of exclusive fealty to the Whig party caused the Free Soilers to run Oscar Shafter, who seemed likely to attract Whig votes, against him. 100

Vermont was a Whig state, and Whigs swept the elections, primarily because of a huge decline in Democratic turnout since 1852. With the support of Free Soilers, Royce ran some 6,700 votes ahead of Fairbanks in 1853 and won with 62 percent compared with Fairbanks' 44 percent. All three Whig congressional candidates won, Meacham and Sabin by huge majorities and Morrill by a safe margin in his three-way race. Shafter, the champion of Free Soilers disgusted by the stubborn independence of Whigs, got about 15 percent of the vote. As a sop to Free Soilers, the new Whig majority in the legislature elected a Free Soiler to the remaining three months of the Upham/Phelps Senate term, but for the full six-year term they chose an orthodox Whig regular, former Postmaster General Jacob Collamer, whom the outnumbered and outraged Free Soilers fruitlessly opposed with their own candidate. That lopsided division of booty, like the Whigs' monopolization of the gubernatorial and congressional nominations, faithfully reflected the balance of power among Vermont's anti-Democratic majority.

By the end of 1854, in sum, Vermont's Whigs had not fused with Free Soilers in a new party; rather, they had attempted to co-opt Free Soil support with a minimum of concessions. Their state platform was militantly antislavery and therefore deeply offensive to southern Whigs. Nonetheless, Morrill's nomination for the open House seat in 1854 and especially the selection of Collamer, who had served in Zachary Taylor's cabinet, for the Senate over the protests of Free Soilers indicated that Vermont's Whigs were not yet ready to give up the ghost. By giving top priority to the success of the party within their state, regardless of its consequences for Whigs elsewhere, however, they helped sever the ties that bound the northern and southern wings of the Whig party together.

Many Maine Whigs also adopted radical antislavery positions that inevitably offended Southerners and conservatives, but unlike Vermont, where the anti-Nebraska uproar helped reunite the state Whig party, in Maine it shattered the Whigs, who had already split over the proper response to Democratic rifts over prohibition. Newly elected Senator William Pitt Fessenden, Congressman Israel Washburn, Jr., and influential newspaper reporter James S. Pike all favored an alliance with the dissident pro-Maine Law Morrill Democrats, who had helped elect Fessenden to the Senate. In contrast, Governor William Crosby, who had been opposed by Morrill Democrats in the legislature, and conservative Whig Congressman E. Wilder Farley condemned alliance with any Democratic faction. During the spring and summer of 1854 continued Democratic disarray over the governorship, which promised even further defections to the Morrill faction, and passage of the Nebraska Act, which increased some Whigs' desire to combine with them, intensified these Whig divisions.

Anti-Nebraska outrage within Democratic ranks was so widespread that one Democrat called the party "completely abolitionized." Nonetheless, the regular, anti-Morrill faction stubbornly tried to ignore it altogether by nominating the rotund, protemperance Albion K. Parris for governor without any platform. That evasive stance alienated both wet and dry Democrats. The former nominated Shepard Cary for governor on a platform that attacked the Maine Law as unconstitutional but also ignored Nebraska. Dry Democrats once again nominated Anson Morrill on a platform that denounced the Nebraska Act, called for repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act, and enthusiastically praised the Maine Law.¹⁰¹

Morrill Democrats' strong antislavery stance caused Free Soilers to forsake a separate gubernatorial candidacy in 1854, endorse Morrill, and call on all anti-Nebraska men to rally behind him. As one Portland Free Soiler wrote Fessenden, "The Whigs of the North" must "give up the idea of reconstructing the old Whig party, and meet all other citizens on equal terms who favor the right," for "it is impossible to unite the North strongly on the old Whig basis." Many Maine Whigs agreed. In May the Bangor Whig and Courier asserted that the Nebraska outrage was "irresistibly driving together all men, of all parties, who sincerely deprecate human bondage, and who are opposed to the universality of the slave power." Fessenden, Washburn, Pike, and the pro-Compromise conservative Edward Kent, who was appalled by southern Whig support for Nebraska, all urged Whigs to unite behind Morrill's candidacy. 103

Conservative Whigs, who considered Morrill "highly objectionable to every consistent Whig," nonetheless insisted on holding their own state convention in late June and nominating their own gubernatorial candidate, Isaac Reed, on a platform that condemned repeal of the Missouri Compromise but explicitly refused to cooperate with legislative candidates who refused to support Reed's gubernatorial candidacy. The apoplectic Kent fumed about "tender-toed & impracticable Whigs" who "want everything to be Whig & nothing but old Whigs." As in 1853, the gubernatorial campaign featured a four-way race, and the horrified Fessenden groaned that the anti-Nebraska forces would "be beaten by the utter folly of men calling themselves Whigs!" "Nothing but party depletion will produce the right state of mind in that class of Whigs," snarled Free Soiler Austin Willey.¹⁰⁴

Whig stubbornness also prevented cooperation among anti-Nebraska men in several congressional races. In the first, or Portland district, Whigs eschewed a separate nomination. Instead, they joined Morrill Democrats and Free Soilers at an anti-Nebraska meeting to nominate Whig John Wood, a close friend of prohibitionist Neal Dow, on a platform that denounced the Nebraska bill and also called for repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act. Portland's Know Nothing lodge also endorsed both Wood and Morrill, and Wood won easily.¹⁰⁵

Whig incumbents Samuel Benson and Israel Washburn, Jr., were both assured of renomination, and both sought formation of a broader anti-Nebraska coalition. Even though Benson had won handily in 1852 with Whig votes alone, the straight Whig convention that renominated him in the fourth district won the support of other anti-Nebraska elements by adopting a platform that condemned the Slave Power conspiracy, called for repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act, and urged abolition in the District of Columbia. Benson, who in 1852 had won by 3,300 votes over his closest competitor in a three-way race, amassed 77 percent of the total in 1854 and crushed his sole Democratic opponent by 8,200 votes.

However much Washburn desired fusion, an exclusively Whig convention renominated him in the fifth district. Nonetheless, Whigs reached out to Morrill Democrats and Free Soilers by proclaiming that repeal of the Missouri Compromise nullified all compromises with the South. Washburn cruised to reelection as a Whig, but he and his constituents were obviously prepared to join an exclusively northern Republican party.

In the other three districts, Whig resistance to abandonment of their party was more substantial. In the second district, after Whigs initially made their own nomination, they and the Free Soilers eventually rallied behind John Perry, the Morrill Democratic candidate and Morrill's closest ally in the state. Although Whig papers outside the district praised its Whigs for "sacrificing old prejudices and party ties," and although C. J. Gilman, the original Whig nominee, unselfishly endorsed Perry, many Whigs from Gilman's home town of Brunswick were so miffed by his forced withdrawal that Perry had to beg Fessenden to try to rally them to his support. Fessenden did so, and Perry easily carried the district. 106

In the sixth district, Whigs and other anti-Nebraska men utterly failed to cooperate. When an anti-Nebraska meeting listed the names of Whigs it could support for office, indignant Whigs rebuffed those choices and instead nominated Noah Smith, a strong Maine Law proponent, the speaker of the state house of representatives, and the runner-up to Isaac Reed for the straight Whig gubernatorial nomination, for Congress. Another anti-Nebraska convention then rejected Smith and selected a Morrill Democrat.

But the third district, represented by the archetypal antifusion Whig diehard, the conservative E. Wilder Farley, saw the most bitter brawl between regulars and pro-fusion Whigs. Although Farley voted against the Nebraska bill in May, even before Congress adjourned, Ebeneazar Knowlton, a radically antislavery and prohibitionist Baptist minister, announced that he would run as a Free Soiler against him unless Farley pledged himself to seek repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law and abolition in the District, as well as restoration of the Missouri Compromise line. In a public response, Farley defiantly declared repeal of the first and restoration of the last politically impossible, a stance with which virtually all anti-Nebraska southern Whigs agreed. He also refused to have anything to do with a proposed anti-Nebraska nominating convention and announced, "I shall adhere to the Whig party" because it was "sounder than any other" party on slavery and other issues. "I cannot abandon it" since "the best hopes of the country depend upon its continuance as a political organization." When the unfazed anti-Nebraska meeting then nominated Knowlton, a convention of intransigent Whigs nominated Farley, endorsed Isaac Reed for governor, and demanded "the perpetuity of the National Whig organization." Farley had won a four-man race in 1852 with only 36 percent of the vote, so his stubborn independence was suicidal. In September he retained barely three-fifths of his 1852 vote, and he garnered barely a quarter of the total. Knowlton handily won the three-way race. 108

It requires solomonic wisdom to determine whether the 1854 election inflicted greater damage on the Whig or the Democratic party in Maine. Morrill ran far ahead of his three competitors in the gubernatorial race, and between a fourth and a half of previous Whig voters supported him. The hapless Reed, who retained fewer than half of Crosby's voters from 1852 and 1853, garnered only 15 percent. As in 1852, Whigs won three of the six House seats, but their only victors—Wood, Benson, and Washburn—had fused with or been endorsed by other anti-Nebraska men and run on militantly antislavery platforms that precluded further cooperation with southern Whigs. Where Whigs tried to preserve an independent organization, they were swamped. Farley got only 26 percent of the vote in the third district and Smith only 19 percent in the sixth.

Almost as emphatically as possible, Maine's electorate had repudiated diehard Whigs' call for "the perpetuity of the National Whig organization." The Augusta Kennebec Journal, which had explicitly rejected pleas for a new fusion party in 1854, admitted as much. Two months after Maine's polls closed, it pronounced an epitaph for the Whig organization and pledged its allegiance to the new Republican party. The first Republican statewide convention, held on Washington's birthday in 1855, nominated Morrill as the Republican candidate that year. Know Nothings also extended their organization to other parts of Maine in 1855, but they also endorsed Morrill and were absorbed into the emerging Republican party by the time of the September election. 110

Nonetheless, a few Whig leaders stubbornly refused to give up. In both 1855 and 1856, despite the protests of Kent, Fessenden, and even Noah Smith, "straight out Whigs," who refused to agree with the party's majority "that the old Whig organization is dead & was sundered by Southern Whigs on the Nebraska bill," held rump state conventions and ran separate gubernatorial candidates who, notably, explicitly condemned Know Nothingism and nativism as well as the new Republican party. Whiggery had essentially become a refuge for men who completely rejected the new political order. In 1855 their candidate drew 11,000 votes, 9.6 percent of the total and about two-fifths of the Whigs who had supported Winfield Scott in 1852. By September 1856 this stubborn residue shrank to 6,600 men, or 5.5 percent of the cast vote.

If most Maine Whigs emphatically rejected the plea for "the perpetuity of the National Whig organization," New Jersey's far more moderate Whigs just as emphatically hoped to extend its existence. Free Soilers were a negligible presence in New Jersey, and Whigs could therefore eschew inflammatory antisouthern rhetoric when focusing congressional campaigns against Nebraska. Since pro-Nebraska Democrats represented four of the five House districts contested that year, Whigs blamed the Democratic party, not the South, for wantonly violating intersectional comity. Although prohibitionism and nativism were openly aired issues in the 1853 election, nativists exerted influence in only two of five congressional districts, and there they served as allies rather than competitors to Whig candidates.

Whigs ran their own candidates in four of the five congressional districts and all four won, thereby reversing the Whig/Democratic ratio of the two preceding congressional elections. Two were nominated by straight Whig conventions—the lone Whig incumbent, Alexander C. M. Pennington, in the fifth district and Dr. George Robbins in the second, where the Whig convention declared that they "firmly adhere to the Whig organization" and needed no coalition with other anti-Nebraska men. James Bishop, the Whig victor in the third district, was nominated on the same day by separate Whig and anti-Nebraska conventions, but Know Nothings may have been as instrumental to his triumph as anti-Nebraska Democrats. Only after the votes were in did a Know Nothing newspaper reveal that Bishop was a member of the order. His Democratic opponent, incumbent Samuel Lilly, had depended on immigrant support, it crowed, whereas Bishop "had never occupied any other than the American platform" and therefore received "the whole American vote."

The two other races especially underlined Whigs' commitment to the continuation of the Whig party as a national organization. The only district Whigs did not carry, the heavily Democratic fourth, had been carried in 1852 by pro-Nebraska incumbent George Vail with three-fifths of the vote. There Whigs ran no candidate of their own and instead backed an independent anti-Nebraska Democrat. Yet even there, where Whigs apparently had no chance of winning, that support came only grudgingly. The Whig Newark Daily Advertiser, commenting from outside the district, hoped "the Whig party there" would not "compromise its own integrity" by endorsing the anti-Nebraska Democrat. A few days later, a Whig convention at Morristown did so on the grounds that "good men" must "forego their party predilections and make common cause" with others against "those entrusted with power" who, "in an act of reckless legislation," threatened "the Constitution, Justice, Liberty, and Union." The fourth district's Whigs, in sum, did not rail against slavery, southern treachery, or Slave Power aggressions, as did other northern Whigs. Instead, they cited Democratic recklessness to justify their temporary digression from the Whig fold, and to emphasize their antipathy toward a permanent new northern party, they simultaneously vowed their allegiance to the national Whig party. 114

A Whig carried the first district, which encompassed the state's six southernmost counties, but it witnessed the state's most confused race. As would be the case well into the twentieth century, zealous prohibitionists were proportionately most numerous in these southern counties, and when none of the other parties addressed that issue in the congressional contest, they ran their own man. The district also harbored a small Native American party that, unlike the obsessively secret Know Nothings, operated publicly. Seeking to beat Whigs to the punch in exploiting anti-Nebraska sentiment, it nominated a young Whig named Isaiah Clawson as the Native American candidate for Congress on an anti-Nebraska platform. Clawson would declare himself a Know Nothing by the time the Thirty-Fourth Congress assembled, but whether he was a member in 1854 is unknown.

Native Americans' preemptive strike caught the Whigs, who expected to run their own man, completely off guard. The state's flagship Whig paper, the Trenton State Gazette, urged the district's Whigs to rally behind Clawson since he had "always heretofore...been a consistent Whig," but local Whig papers complained that "endorsement of the Native candidate would be a suicidal measure, utterly destructive of our party organization." Only after "warm discussion," the reading of numerous testimonials to Clawson's Whig pedigree, and the adoption of a platform that lauded the national Whig party as "the only true conservative party" did a district Whig convention endorse Clawson. Again, what is striking is the total absence of the South-bashing sectional rancor voiced by Whigs farther north and the continued fealty to the national Whig party as a bisectional alliance of Northerners and Southerners. ¹¹⁵

Know Nothings who attended the Whig convention possibly provided Clawson's winning edge among Whig delegates. Certainly Clawson's Democratic opponent denounced him as a Know Nothing and tried to focus the race on the evils of Know Nothingism to divert attention from Nebraska. Clawson carried the normally Democratic district, but with only a 43 percent plurality since the independent prohibition candidate siphoned off over a fourth of the voters, including a healthy minority of the Whigs. Pro-Nebraska Democrats suffered a dramatic repudiation. They lost almost two-fifths of their 1852 supporters, and their share of the total plummeted to 30 percent. 116

The electorate's determination to punish Democrats for the Nebraska Act allowed New Jersey's Whigs to stage an impressive comeback in congressional races without repudiating their external ties to southern Whig allies. Nonetheless, the party did not reattain its previous vigor, for it suffered the same internal erosion that occurred elsewhere in the North over nativism and prohibition. Whigs were forced to back the candidate originally chosen by Native Americans in the first district, and even then they lost votes to a separate temperance candidate. Know Nothings and independent prohibitionists particularly damaged the major parties in the legislative races. When the returns were counted, insurgent minor party candidates had elected twenty-two members of the lower house compared to eighteen Whigs and twenty regular Democrats, and at least fifteen of those insurgents had Know Nothing support. Together with Know Nothings' stunning showing in neighboring Pennsylvania and New York, this nativist surge within New Jersey convinced the state's Whig editors who hoped to reunite the national Whig party in 1856 behind a southern anti-Nebraska Whig presidential candidate that their candidate must also be a Know Nothing. 117

VIII

The 1854 election results from the five southern and ten free states discussed above had ambiguous implications for the Whig party's future. Aside from Arkansas, South Carolina, and Delaware, where Whigs folded themselves into the American party, southern Whigs appeared to be flourishing. Nonetheless, the heartbreaking losses in North Carolina and Florida cost Whigs three Senate seats they could ill afford to lose given the party's weakness in the Senate already. At the same time, Whig candidates for the House of Representatives ran far more successfully than they had in 1852. Whigs had won only twenty-four of seventy-seven House seats from these fifteen states in 1852; in 1854, Whigs captured forty-three of those seats. Of thirty-seven Whig victors from the free states, however, only nine won as straight Whigs, and four of those from Vermont and Maine took such strident antislavery stands that Free Soilers willingly supported them. In contrast, twenty-one of the victors won on Republican, People's, or fusion tickets, and together with Democrats and Free Soilers who triumphed on such tickets, thirty-five congressmen with some kind of anti-Nebraska coalition label had been elected. Based on these results, that is, new party men seemed to have almost as good a chance as Whigs to control the next House, to say nothing of the Senate, where the election of Durkee, Harlan, and Trumbull gave the incipient Republican party momentum.

Based on returns from these fifteen states, Know Nothings posed almost as serious a challenge to Whigs' traditional role as the major anti-Democratic party. Of the northern Whig congressional winners, at least twenty were, or had been endorsed by, Know Nothings, and the addition of Missouri's two Whig Know Nothings brought the total to twenty-two. Counting Democrats with Know Nothing backing as well as Delaware's Elisha Cullen, indeed, the total number of nativist representatives elected by the fourteen of these states that held congressional elections was thirty-one, compared to forty-three Whig winners. 118

This assessment of the Know Nothing threat to Whiggery, however, is incomplete. It omits the three remaining northern states with 1854 elections—Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania. Altogether the ten free states previously discussed, including Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, possessed a combined total of sixty-six House seats and seventy-six electoral votes. By themselves, Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania were eligible for sixty-nine seats in the House and would cast seventy-five electoral votes. Thus it was the course of events in these three states that Whigs elsewhere, especially in the South, watched most closely for clues to the Whig party's fate. In August, indeed, Tennessee Senator John Bell explicitly said that the course and fate of Whigs in those three states and Ohio would "decide whether we [southern Whigs] can unite with them or not."

Ohio's Whigs clearly disappointed Bell's hopes by fusing with Free Soilers, and Whigs in Pennsylvania and New York would do so by reaching out for Free Soil support to guarantee Whig victory. Their militantly antislavery and antisouthern stand jeopardized future cooperation with Southerners, but even it failed to prevent fatal internal erosion of Whig strength. Know Nothings, not incipient Republican parties, made lethal incursions into the ranks of Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts Whiggery that dashed Whigs' hopes of riding the anti-Nebraska issue back to power and that doomed the future viability of the Whig party as an independent political force in the North. Results from those three states formed the critical turning point that drove the great majority of Whigs who had hoped to preserve the Whig party into a frantic search for new political homes. Those three states' elections in 1854 effectively demolished the Whig party as a competitive organization.

Chapter 24

"Confusion Worse Confounded"

"THE, SO-CALLED, Whig Convention in this State surrendered at discretion to the abolitionists," Louisiana's Charles M. Conrad, Millard Fillmore's secretary of war, railed to the ex-president after reading newspaper accounts of the proceedings while on a business trip to New York City in September 1854. Whigs' platform amounted "to a declaration of perpetual warfare against the South"; therefore, it was "impossible for Southern Whigs to cooperate with the authors & abetters of these measures." New York's Whigs, like those in Vermont and Massachusetts, Conrad raged, aimed at "a virtual dissolution of the Whig party" that would result in "a new arrangement of parties" and in a new northern "organization based on merely sectional issues." To avert that catastrophe and retain southern Whig support in 1856, Fillmore must repudiate New York Whigs' actions and help "to form a new national party."

Other Southerners also viewed northern Whigs' virulently antisouthern stance in 1854 as lethal to the continued "nationality of the Whig party." "What are we to do with our Northern allies?" George S. Bryan asked Fillmore's close advisor John P. Kennedy in August. Although Bryan recognized that northern Whigs' antislavery bluster was only "political & for local power," he still wondered, "Can we of the South maintain brotherly relations with men whose power is based on sectional association against our section?"

Both Conrad and Bryan correctly perceived the fatal impact that northern Whigs' campaigns during 1854 had on southern Whigs' allegiance to their old party. Yet Bryan understood northern Whigs' motives better than did Conrad. Outside of Wisconsin, Michigan, and perhaps Maine and Vermont, most northern Whigs, even in Indiana and Ohio, viewed the campaigns of 1854 as sui generis. They did not seek the creation of a permanent new northern party "based on merely sectional issues"—at least not in 1854. Instead they hoped to resurrect disintegrating northern Whig organizations that year by exploiting anti-Nebraska, anti-slavery-extension sentiment to defeat Democrats. Once they revivified the northern Whig party with those anticipated victories, they expected to rebuild bridges to southern Whig allies so the two sectional wings could rally again for the next presidential election.

Because Bryan, unlike Conrad, appreciated Know Nothings' surging power, he also understood why the 1854 results from Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New York, the three northern states that most decisively influenced Whigs' calculations for the future, forever dashed those hopes. Nativism and prohibitionism produced an earthquake that confounded Whig expectations of a comeback on the Nebraska issue, transformed the political landscape, and caused "the dissolution of the Whig party" in all three states. Aftershocks from it in 1855 shaped New England's spring elections, changed northern Whigs' calculations elsewhere, and sent Whigs across the South scurrying to new political homes. Although Conrad was right that northern Whigs' extreme antisouthern rhetoric would permanently alienate southern Whigs, Know Nothings' stunning strength in Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania in 1854, not the emergence of Republican parties that year, propelled "the new arrangement of parties" that Conrad feared.

I

Anti-Catholicism and nativism had been powerful political forces in Pennsylvania long before 1854. The Catholic James Campbell's appointment as postmaster general intensified the growing animosity between Protestant and Catholic Democrats, and in early 1854 Democratic state legislators introduced bills to divide the public school fund with Catholics, thereby fueling Protestant charges of a Democratic-aided papal assault against republican institutions. Meanwhile, thousands of zealous Methodists and Presbyterians in Pennsylvania were alienated by Whigs' courtship of the Catholic vote in 1852. To make amends, Whig papers and politicos in 1854 sharply reversed course to side emphatically with Protestants against Catholics. In Philadelphia, the Whig press cheered the Whig/Know Nothing Robert Conrad's election as mayor in June as an anti-Catholic triumph. Across the state, the Pittsburgh Gazette, the most influential Whig sheet in western Pennsylvania, proudly boasted by March and April that "the Whig party always was and is, the standard bearer of Protestantism and Free Soilism," while "the papers and leaders of [the Democratic] party have always been ready to yield to the wishes and demands of Popery." The Whig state platform adopted in March not only included the traditional demand for a protective tariff and condemned the as yet unpassed Nebraska bill as "a deliberate breach of plighted faith" and "a high-handed attempt to force slavery into a territory now free from it by law." It also declared that universal education (i.e., the teaching of Catholics in public, not parochial, schools) and religious liberty should be the goals of all state laws. And later, Whigs explicitly accused Governor William Bigler, whom Democrats renominated, of favoring the division of the public school fund demanded by the Catholic clergy.3

Whig strategists, in short, obviously recognized the powerful anti-Catholic currents in the state. Many Whig politicos therefore struck a Faustian bargain with Know Nothings when the order burgeoned across the state during the first half of 1854. Others like Pittsburgh's William Larimer, however, dazzled by the apparent potency of the anti-Nebraska issue, refused to sell their souls to nativism. In retaliation against that defiance, Know Nothings prevented Pennsylvania's Whigs from winning a revitalizing party victory.⁴

The Nebraska bill, which Democratic Senator Richard Brodhead and eleven of Pennsylvania's sixteen House Democrats supported, outraged both Whigs and Free Soilers, who together captured 48.6 percent of Pennsylvania's vote in 1852, and many Democrats, especially in northern counties along the New York border. When the March Democratic state convention totally ignored it, indignant anti-Nebraska Democrats vowed that they would never support Bigler or anyone else who did not openly condemn the measure. When Bigler, an archetypal trimmer, said nothing about Nebraska even after the Democratic state committee endorsed the law that summer, defection or abstention by anti-Nebraska Democrats seemed certain ⁵

Bigler's straddle on Nebraska explains why Whigs salivated at the prospect of running anti-Nebraska campaigns against him and other Democratic candidates. Widely reviled by dissident Democrats, Bigler seemed especially vulnerable in 1854, even without the Nebraska issue. He had infuriated Democratic politicos across the state with unpopular local appointments. He alienated antiprohibition Democrats by allowing a referendum on that subject to be placed on the ballot in October, and he then offended dries by refusing to commit himself to sign a Maine Law should the referendum authorize one. He angered Germans by failing to veto a bill that required beer-hall owners to pay the same license fees required of taverns that sold hard liquor. Later, when he reversed himself and denounced that law, he enhanced his reputation for flip-flopping. His frequent vetoes of bank incorporation bills in the spring antagonized residents of communities that sought additional banking facilities. Yet his failure to veto a bill that allowed the sale of the Pennsylvania Mainline Canal to the Pennsylvania Railroad offended residents along the public works. Finally, his appointment of James Campbell as state attorney general in 1852, suspicion that he had helped secure Campbell's place in Pierce's cabinet, and his apparent sympathy for Catholic attempts to divide the public school fund earned him execration from the state's most rabidly anti-Catholic Democrats, to say nothing of Protestant Whigs.⁷

Just as anti-Nebraska Whig congressional candidates differed sharply from Democratic incumbents who had voted for that measure, Whig gubernatorial candidate James Pollock presented a clear contrast to Bigler on all of these matters except sale of the unprofitable Main Line Canal.⁸ A Scots-Irish Presbyterian with a puritanical streak, Pollock was far more acceptable to anti-Catholics than Bigler, and during the campaign he vowed to defend the public school fund from Catholic assaults. He won the support of prohibitionists, if not outright endorsement from the state temperance association, by pledging to sign "every measure of moral or political reform" the legislature passed that did not violate the state constitution. His embrace of Whigs' anti-Nebraska platform, finally, highlighted Bigler's waffling on the slavery extension issue.⁹

During the early spring, therefore, Whigs expressed confidence about capturing the rich booty at stake in October: seats on the supreme court and canal commission as well as the governorship; the twenty-five congressional seats; and the new state legislature, which would select a successor to Whig Senator James Cooper. Convinced like his fellow Pittsburgher Larimer that all antislavery men would rally behind Pollock, D. N. White, editor of the Pittsburgh Gazette, boasted on March 24 that "the Whig party was never stronger" and predicted that in October it would "give evidence of vitality never possessed by it before." The Harrisburg

Telegraph agreed that Whigs had "a platform broad enough to admit every Whig, every friend of freedom, and every American." 10

After March, however, Whig confidence was rudely jolted. In part because the Whig platform, passed when most Northerners still expected the House to kill the Nebraska bill, failed to demand its repeal, Free Soilers and anti-Nebraska Democrats spurned Pollock and other Whig candidates. Gamaliel Bailey of the Free Soil Washington National Era sneered that "Pennsylvania Whiggery is simply old fogeyism" and tried to get Free Soilers to nominate David Wilmot in order to drive Pollock from the field and create a fusion anti-Nebraska coalition. ¹¹

Free Soilers' disdain for Pollock and the widely rumored Wilmot candidacy panicked some Whigs, especially the Pittsburgh Daily Gazette's editors, White and Russell Errett, who had counted on rallying Free Soilers behind the Whig ticket. In what proved to be a huge mistake, they therefore sought to head off a Free Soil nomination by dropping all references to anti-Catholicism and prohibitionism from the paper's editorial columns and exclusively stressing Whigs' opposition to slavery and slavery extension. They pleaded with Free Soilers in April not to nominate a separate candidate, especially Wilmot, behind whom Whigs would never unite since Wilmot opposed protective tariffs. "We are not so wedded to the Whig organization or name as to refuse to enter any better organization for the purpose of resisting the encroachments of slavery," the Gazette declared. But "the Whig party of Pennsylvania as now organized, is a large, powerful and tolerably well disciplined party." Its March platform had purposely avoided the divisive prohibition and nativist questions to focus on two issues that united Whigs and Free Soilers—sale of the public works and opposition to the Nebraska bill. "What is to be gained, then, by relinquishing this organization, and accepting an independent candidate?"12

Wilmot in fact had no interest in breaking from the Democratic party again, but in late May, Free Soilers nominated the little-known David Potts for governor. His selection satisfied neither national Free Soil leaders hoping to build a new anti-Nebraska coalition nor Whigs. Worried that the obscure Potts would split Pennsylvania's anti-Nebraska voters, Bailey reluctantly concluded that Pollock had the best chance of unifying them. Sill angry that the Whigs' March platform was confined to a condemnation of the Nebraska bill, he urged pro-fusion Whig newspaperman James S. Pike to get Pollock to write "a stiff antislavery letter" that repudiated all compromises with slavery, called for repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act, and sought to "denationalize slavery, by excluding it from every inch of soil within Federal jurisdiction."

Whether Pike contacted Pollock is unknown, but Pollock wrote a public letter in July that called for restoration of the Missouri Compromise line and declared that Congress had no authority to establish slavery in any territory. Other Whigs also moved vigorously to appease Free Soilers. Immediately after the Free Soilers' May state convention, Pittsburgh's White asserted that "we are willing to make any reasonable sacrifice of party ties to a great and undying principle." In June, he and Errett helped rig the Allegheny County Whig convention to make that sacrifice. It put a Free Soiler on the state legislative ticket and adopted radical antislavery resolutions.¹⁴

Condemning the effort to "propagate, confirm, and diffuse the national sin and shame" of slavery, that platform vowed to oppose its further extension, the admission of more slave states, and any further compromises with the South. "For the future the South must take care of itself—take care of its peculiar property; supply its own bloodhounds and doughfaces," Allegheny County's Whigs warned. Lest this defiant language prove insufficient, Whigs added a plank that Gamaliel Bailey himself could have written and that Errett, a confidant of Bailey, probably did write: "That in view of the dangers of the crisis—a crisis overriding all former party distinctions—we hereby pledge ourselves to the camp of Freedom—we inscribe Free Men to Free Labor and Free Lands upon our banner, and enlist for the whole war." This platform and the Whig state committee's July address, which took far more strident antisouthern ground than the March state platform, trumpeted White, were "broad enough to secure the cooperation of every Anti-Slavery man in the State." Coupled with Pollock's letters, they were at least enough to cause a Free Soil meeting in August to withdraw Potts and endorse Pollock.

By essentially placing all their eggs in the antislavery basket, Pennsylvania's Whigs helped alienate Southerners from the party. But they hardly solved all their problems within Pennsylvania. That exclusive emphasis utterly ignored the divisive but increasingly salient prohibition question. That evasive stance, like the waffle of Whigs and Democrats in the 1854 legislative session on the Maine Law, left cold water men icy. Although most dries ultimately backed the moralistic Pollock for governor, prohibitionists ran independent Maine Law legislative tickets against regular Whig candidates in Erie, York, and Philadelphia counties. Elsewhere they backed independent Know Nothing legislative candidates against Whigs. 17

Independent anti-Whig Know Nothing tickets posed the biggest threat to Whig control of the legislature, and Know Nothings menaced Whig statewide and congressional candidates as well. During the spring, at exactly the time some Whig newspapers ceased to attack Catholics and boasted that the party was eschewing nativistic attacks on immigrants in order to focus on the Nebraska issue, Know Nothing lodges mushroomed across the state. That spring Know Nothings won a number of local elections, often defeating regular Whig candidates, and in June, Know Nothing-backed Whig candidates scored decisive victories in Philadelphia's municipal elections. Reporting to James Buchanan, now minister to England, about the "overwhelming majorities" Know Nothings won in the spring, one Lancaster Democrat whinged, "Politicians are dumbfounded—editors are completely smashed into the middle of chaos, and the people stand amazed." "The Old Whig Party is undoubtedly annihilated," he added. If Bigler were defeated, "it will not be a Whig victory." "Is

That prediction proved accurate. As elsewhere, Know Nothings had the potential to help Whig candidates against Democrats in Pennsylvania, and some Whig politicos rushed to join the order after its impressive showing in the spring. In Philadelphia, the Whig Conrad obviously did so before his election as mayor. By early June, Andrew Curtin, the state Whig chairman and a future Republican governor, had also joined, and he immediately contacted other Know Nothings about supporting the entire Whig state ticket. After Conrad's victory, Pollock himself traveled to Philadelphia, where Conrad arranged for his induction into the order. Nothing, however, shows how profoundly Know Nothingism altered the political calculus than the behavior of William Larimer, who in late March wrote Pollock that "the Whig party of the North" had never been stronger since Democratic actions made "her a unit" and rendered "her invincible." Three months later, in June, Larimer became a Know Nothing.¹⁹

Some Whig candidates, in short, benefited from the order's support, but Know Nothingism still proved extraordinarily damaging to Pennsylvania's Whig party. For one thing, in Pennsylvania, Know Nothings did not have to pick their candidates from only the Whig and Democratic tickets. The independent Native American party also fielded candidates, and if Know Nothings backed them, Whigs would be denied anti-Democratic votes. For another, while anti-Catholicism primarily motivated Pennsylvania's Know Nothings, the order's nativism prevented it from supporting any foreign-born Whig candidates while alienating Protestant immigrants, who had previously voted Whig, from any Whig candidates suspected of being Know Nothings. Most important, many of the numerous former Antimasons among Pennsylvania's Whigs, men who still despised all secret organizations, furiously opposed the Know Nothings even though they shared their animosity toward Catholics. "The old antimasons are rising strong in opposition to Know Nothingism," reported a Democrat from Somerset, and White of the Pittsburgh Daily Gazette, himself an old Antimason, waged open warfare against the secret order as "unwise, dangerous, and Anti-American" from July 1854 on.²⁰

Whigs, in sum, divided sharply in their reaction to Know Nothingism. Consequently, Know Nothings rivaled Whigs almost as often as they helped them in races from statewide offices down to county clerkships. In late August local Know Nothing lodges began to choose from among the three parties' candidates for governor, supreme court justice, and canal commissioner. Those selections were confirmed at a meeting of the Know Nothing state council in October. The Whig Pollock, who had joined the order, rather than the Native American Benjamin R. Bradford, got the Know Nothing nod for governor, but in the supreme court race, Know Nothings endorsed the Native American Thomas H. Baird rather than the Whig candidate, thereby virtually ensuring reelection of Democratic incumbent Jeremiah S. Black. For canal commissioner, Know Nothings chose the pro-Nebraska Democrat Henry S. Mott, a member of the order, and rejected Whig George S. Darsie, a Presbyterian lawyer and former state senator from Allegheny County, because Darsie was born in Scotland, Most Pennsylvania Know Nothings undoubtedly opposed the Nebraska Act, as they did elsewhere in the North, but Mott's endorsement emphatically shows that one's stand on Nebraska was largely irrelevant to Know Nothings. It also shows that nativistic suspicion of all foreigners, not simply anti-Catholicism, impelled the order. If a Scottish Presbyterian could be blackballed by the fraternity, no foreigner, no matter how anti-Catholic, was safe.21

Pollock was the only triumphant Whig candidate for statewide office. He defeated Bigler by over 35,000 votes, and his 55 percent majority in a three-way race was the best showing by any Whig, including Harrison and Taylor, in the state's history. As promised, Free Soilers, who with very few exceptions shunned the Know Nothings, backed him, but Know Nothings contributed well over half of his total, including virtually all of the previous Democratic voters who supported him. If Pollock won as a Whig, moreover, he was clearly ready to abandon the party. Two weeks after his victory, he wrote Delaware's Clayton and agreed with him about the desirability of launching a new American party. "The old parties, as National parties, are broken up & their power gone," concurred Pollock. "We have the material for a 'liberal, tolerant, highminded, and truly American party' and it will be used."²²

What Know Nothings gave with one hand they took with the other. In the race for canal commissioner the Democratic Know Nothing Henry Mott defeated the hapless Whig Darsie, 274,074 to 83,331, compared to Pollock's 204,008 to 167,001 victory over Bigler. That approximately 120,000 Know Nothings accounted for the difference became clear in the state supreme court balloting, the one race where Know Nothings backed the Native Americans rather than a major party candidate. Democratic incumbent Black won with 167,010 votes (45.6 percent), virtually the same number as Bigler drew. But the Know Nothing-backed Native American Baird ran second with 120,576 (32.9 percent), while the Whig candidate, now abandoned by Whigs who had joined the order, drew only 78,571 (21.5 percent). In sum, loyal Whigs had been reduced to about 80,000 voters, approximately 23 percent of the active electorate and less than 15 percent of the state's potential electorate. Of Whigs who voted for Winfield Scott in 1852, half remained in the party column, almost a third defected to the Know Nothings, and the remainder did not vote. Because Democratic defectors to the Know Nothing column almost equaled the number of Whigs in the order and because the Know Nothings dramatically outrecruited Whigs among previous nonvoters, the Know Nothings had replaced the Whigs as the major opponent of Pennsylvania's Democrats by October 1854.23

Know Nothings also wreaked havoc on Whigs in congressional races. In four of the state's twenty-five House districts—the eighth, fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth—Whigs fielded no candidates against the dominant Democrats. In three of those districts Know Nothings threw their support to Independent Anti-Nebraska Democratic candidates, thereby seizing control of the anti-Democratic opposition, and two of those Democratic Know Nothings, J. J. Pearce and Lemuel Todd, triumphed. Everywhere else Whigs ran candidates, but Know Nothings still caused trouble. In the southeastern sixth district, which Whigs had carried handily since 1846, Know Nothings backed anti-Nebraska Democrat John Hickman against veteran Whig state legislator John Broomall and thus took that seat from the Whigs. In the northwestern and heavily Democratic twenty-fourth district. Know Nothings also backed the regular Democratic nominee, an anti-Nebraska man named David Barclay, against a Whig named Arthurs. Arthurs drew a pitiful 25 percent of the vote compared to 34 percent won by his Whig predecessor in 1852, and he ran an astonishing 5,120 votes behind the Know Nothing-backed Pollock in his district. In the fourth district, one of four in Philadelphia, Know Nothings helped elect Jacob Broom, the Native American candidate who had been that party's 1852 presidential nominee, over the Whig John Lambert and a pro-Nebraska Democrat. Broom opposed the Nebraska Act during his campaign, but unlike virtually every northern Whig congressional candidate in 1854, he flatly announced that if elected he would not support its repeal unless Southerners agreed to it, thus illustrating once again that how one stood on the slavery issue was not what mattered most to Know Nothings.24

In at least three other districts—the second in Philadelphia, the ninth in Lancaster, and the eighteenth, composed of Somerset and three other counties—Know Nothings split the Whig vote by backing one Whig candidate against another.²⁵

Elsewhere, at least ten "regular" Whig candidates, including Henry Fuller, James Cooper's close ally, who became the major Know Nothing candidate for speaker of the House when the Thirty-Fourth Congress met, secretly joined the order before nomination, between nomination and the election, or after the election and thus had at best divided loyalties to the Whig party. Altogether, fifteen Whigs were elected to Congress in 1854, compared to nine in 1852, but twelve (80 percent) of those men were or would become Know Nothings. Combined with the victorious Barclay, Hickman, Broom, Pearce, and Todd, members of the order filled seventeen of Pennsylvania's twenty-five seats, all but four of those won by anti-Nebraska men.

Know Nothings' challenge to Whigs was equally extensive in state legislative races, where Whigs already confronted independent temperance tickets. Across the state, Know Nothings ran their own independent tickets against regular Whig slates, chose slates from all of the existing parties that included Democrats and Native Americans rather than Whigs, or usurped Whigs' opposition role altogether. One or more Democrats were always included on these tickets to demonstrate their independence from Whiggery, yet one-time Whig voters supported them in droves. As one astonished Democrat reported to Simon Cameron after the election from northwestern Venango County, "We are whipt in everything, a most unaccountable victory by the 'Know Nothings.'" "Know Nothingism has knocked the spots off us here," echoed another bewildered Democrat from central Huntingdon County. "The Whigs on the day of the election . . . disbanded & went over in a body" to the Know Nothings.²⁷

Three localities, each of which had traditionally been a Whig stronghold— Philadelphia, Lancaster, and Pittsburgh—illustrate the devastation Know Nothingism inflicted on Whiggery. One can begin with Lancaster, some sixty miles west of Philadelphia in the southeastern portion of the state. In late spring, Lancaster's county (and district) Whig convention renominated Congressman Isaac Heister as well as a full Whig ticket for the legislature and local offices. Although Heister, like all northern Whig congressmen, voted against the Nebraska bill, he represented the conservative faction of the Lancaster Whig organization, which had secured his nomination in 1852 explicitly to unseat his antislavery Whig predecessor. Thaddeus Stevens. In retaliation, Stevens and many members of his Whig faction joined the Know Nothings in the summer of 1854. The order, probably at Stevens' instigation, ran another Whig, Anthony E. Roberts, a crony of ex-Governor William F. Johnston, who had served as United States marshal in Philadelphia under Taylor and Fillmore, as the Know Nothing candidate against Heister and his Democratic opponent. Nominated first as an Independent Whig by a rump Whig convention of the Stevens wing and then later by a public Know Nothing meeting, Roberts won the three-way race with 6,561 votes, 40.5 percent of the total. Heister trailed with 5,371 (33.2 percent), 3,470 fewer votes than he had received in 1852, when he racked up almost 58 percent of the total.

In Lancaster's state legislative races, Democrats highjacked seats Whigs would have won by joining the Know Nothing order. Led by a dissident Democrat named Reah Frazer, who was publishing articles against Bigler in the local Know Nothing Register by July, three Frazer Democrats won slots on an independent Know Nothing ticket along with two Stevens Whigs. That ticket defeated the regular Whig slate in October. Know Nothings' sweep in Lancaster, moaned one Democrat, "can be explained only by the hostility to foreigners and Catholics," but the revived impetus that the Nebraska Act gave Thaddeus Stevens' antislavery wing of the local Whig party surely contributed to it.²⁸

Pittsburgh's Know Nothings did not defeat the regular Whig congressional candidate, David Ritchie. They coopted him instead by inducting him into the order after his June nomination by the convention D. N. White had rigged to promote fusion with the Free Soilers, not the Know Nothings. By the fall Ritchie's membership, like Pollock's, was widely known. Know Nothings helped Ritchie cruise to a much more imposing victory in 1854 than he had won in 1852.²⁹ In other races, however, nativists decimated the Whig party, whose chief editorial spokesman, White, virulently denounced them. Aside from Pollock and Ritchie, there were ten other men on the Whig ticket in Pittsburgh. Of these only two Whig assembly candidates, both of whom were Know Nothings, triumphed.³⁰ Three Democrats, two of whom were pro-Nebraska, and five Native Americans carried the county, and all of them, like the four victorious Whigs, were Know Nothings.³¹

Because a United States Senate seat was at stake, state legislative races were especially significant and illuminating. Whigs had gone all out to win those races by adopting a radical antisouthern, antislavery platform at their June convention and by placing a Free Soiler on their assembly ticket. He ran dead last among the five Whig assembly candidates. Democratic Know Nothings won the senate seat and one assembly seat. C. S. Eyster and D. L. Smith, the two victorious Native American assembly candidates, were both dissident Whigs who had been denied nomination by the Whig convention in June and who joined the order and the Native American party explicitly to advance their careers and to punish the Whig party.³²

J. Heron Foster of the Pittsburgh Dispatch, the city's leading Know Nothing editor, attributed Know Nothings' sweep to popular anger at the political power of foreigners and Catholics, and Democrats concurred that "the momentary supremacy of bigotry and prejudice" and "the power of political frenzy" had produced the result. D. N. White and those Whigs who sought to use the anti-Nebraska issue first to resurrect Whiggery and then to build a new northern party were furious. Convinced that Know Nothings had diverted and diluted the anti-Nebraska vote and that they could now control any Whig meeting, White called for his old party's utter dissolution. No Whig convention must meet or any Whig nomination be attempted, he declared, until the Know Nothing blight was eradicated. Admitting that this task required cooperation with the Democratic enemy, he and like-minded Whigs then persuaded incumbent Whig Mayor Ferdinand Volz, who had won election rather easily in January 1854, to run as a Whig-Democratic fusion candidate in January 1855 against the Know Nothing candidate, who had the backing of the city's other Whig paper. Volz triumphed, but the Know Nothing vote had increased by 55 percent since October as virtually all native-born Whig voters, except those who had been Antimasons, shifted to the Know Nothing column.33

Whig disintegration continued later in 1855. In the fall elections Whigs nominated no local or state candidates of their own. Instead, some Whigs voted Democratic to preserve January's anti-Know Nothing coalition, most voted Know Nothing, and still others, led by White and the county Whig committee, futilely tried to transfer the Whig vote to the new Republican party. Volz ran for mayor again as a Whig in January 1856, but with less than half of his 1854 vote, he lost badly. For all intents and purposes the Pittsburgh Whig organization had been destroyed by January 1855. The bright hopes raised by the Nebraska Act in the spring of 1854 had been dashed.³⁴

Philadelphia's population dwarfed both Pittsburgh's and Lancaster's, and the city's Whig organization began to unravel as soon as Robert Conrad won the mayoral election in June 1854. Since Conrad was the regular Whig nominee, Whig politicos who had not joined the Know Nothings were shocked by his proscription of everyone but members of the order from the offices at his command. "The consequence is, real fright and disgust on the part of the Whigs," one Democrat reported in mid-July, and he subsequently repeated that "Know Nothingism has broken up the Whig organization," that "the old Whig managers are outsiders completely in the new order of things and they will not surrender power quietly," and that "thousands of the old line Whigs are in open rebellion" "35

Rivalry between Whigs and Know Nothings wrecked Whigs in Philadelphia's congressional and state legislative races, where Maine Law tickets joined American Union (Know Nothing) tickets in competing with Whig and Democratic slates. As noted above, in Philadelphia's fourth congressional district, Know Nothings helped elect Native American Jacob Broom over the Whig nominee. In the first and third districts, in contrast, Know Nothings backed the regular Whig nominees, Edward Joy Morris and William Millward, against pro-Nebraska Democrats. It was in the second district that bloodletting between Know Nothings and Whigs was most copious.

The second was the only Philadelphia district represented by a Whig during the Thirty-Third Congress, and three-term incumbent Joseph R. Chandler was one of the party's most respected men. A moderate on the slavery issue, he had voted against the Nebraska Act and been a key player, after it passed, in attempting to draft an anti-Nebraska statement that all Whigs could support. Yet Chandler committed an unpardonable sin so far as Know Nothings were concerned; he had recently converted to the Roman Catholic faith. Thus Know Nothings infiltrated the Whigs' district convention and threw its nomination to Job R. Tyson instead of Chandler.³⁶ Regular Whigs were livid. Declaring that the "present nominees of the Whig party, or so-called Whig party, are very objectionable to a large number of Whigs," a rump convention of outsiders nominated Chandler as an Independent Whig for Congress, as well as their own slate for the legislature. Tyson and the other Know Nothing/Whigs won, but Whiggery was shattered. Chandler had triumphed with approximately 6,600 votes in 1852, 62.4 percent of the total. In 1854, Chandler garnered fewer than 1,200 votes (12 percent), while Tyson got 5,655 (55 percent). Know Nothings had displaced Whigs there, as elsewhere. As one Democrat moaned, "The tornado has been so stunning and overwhelming."37

Attempts to elect a new United States senator when the legislature met in January 1855 only punctuated the demise of Pennsylvania Whiggery. There is no need to detail the legislature's tribulations other than to say that when an attempt was made to hold a straight Whig caucus, only eight men appeared, in contrast to the ninety-one who attended a Know Nothing meeting. The primary contenders for the Senate seat, Whig State Chairman Curtin and the notoriously ambitious and corrupt Democrat Simon Cameron, had both joined the Know Nothings by the time of the balloting, and the selection of Cameron was ultimately defeated because the majority of Whig/Know Nothings refused to support him. Viewing the Whig disarray in this contest, reelected State Supreme Court Justice Jeremiah S. Black wrote Buchanan in February, "The Whigs are gone hook & line." Even though a few Whigs stood "obstinately on the old platform" and refused to coalesce with Know Nothings, most Whigs did "not pretend now to have an organized existence."³⁸

The previous October a Philadelphia Whig had provided a fuller epitaph for his party. In Ohio and Indiana, he admitted, antislavery sentiment helped produce Democratic defeats. "But here the 'American Union party' 'Know Nothings'" dropped "all other issues as secondary" and fought the battle "against a powerfully organized foreign and Catholic party—a party coquetted with by Buchanan—bought by Pierce and whose 'rich Irish brogue' Scott was so fond of hearing." "We see the work [of the Know Nothings] finished in the North," he continued: "the destruction of the old party organizations between which the administration of the government and the destinies of the country have vibrated for the last quarter of a century." Not only was the Democratic party "gone disbanded—exterminated." In addition, "the old northern Whig party has ceased to exist—it is swallowed up[,] routed[,] and merged into the great 'American Union party.''' With respect to the entire North in the fall of 1854, this assertion was an exaggeration. But in Pennsylvania, the Whig party was not "invincible," as Pittsburgh's William Larimer had boasted in March. It had instead been "swallowed up" almost whole by a rival new organization.39

II

Know Nothings also shattered the Massachusetts Whig party in 1854, but the secret order's composition in the Bay State was unique. As a result, it ruined Whiggery for slightly different reasons than it did in Pennsylvania and New York. Anti-Catholicism, nativism, and prohibitionism powered Know Nothingism in Massachusetts, as elsewhere. The difference between it and other states lay in Free Soilers' response to the nativist party. Only a few current or former Free Soilers joined the order in New York and Pennsylvania in 1854; in contrast, the majority of Massachusetts' proportionately much larger Free Soil party enlisted in the Know Nothing crusade.⁴⁰

Massachusetts had been one of Whigs' few bright spots in 1853. They had discovered a winning issue—opposition to the new state constitution written by the Free Soil/Democratic Coalition—and used it to disrupt the once-dominant Coalition. Mistakenly, Free Soilers blamed the defection of Irish Catholic Democrats from Boston and its environs for the constitution's defeat and the Whigs' victory in the gubernatorial and legislative elections.⁴¹ As a result, nativist and anti-Catholic sentiments among Free Soilers outside of Suffolk County escalated. Democratic responsibility for the Nebraska bill in 1854 cauterized the split between Free Soilers and Democrats and left the former looking for a new path back to power.⁴²

Some Free Soilers, led by Henry Wilson, the party's 1853 gubernatorial nominee, pressed northern Whigs to fuse with them in a new antislavery party, a prospect that terrified conservative Whigs.⁴³ Massachusetts Whigs ultimately spurned fusion with Free Soilers in 1854, but less because of conservative fears than because of residual Whig bitterness against Free Soilers and the universality of antislavery, anti-Nebraska sentiment in the Bay State. Conservative influence in the Whig party was on the wane, and antislavery Whig leaders like Ezra Lincoln saw anti-Nebraskaism as a potentially unifying and winning Whig issue, just as opposition to the 1853 constitution had been.⁴⁴

Thus in June, the Whig state committee issued a tough address rejecting fusion and condemning Free Soilers for their previous participation in the noxious Coalition. The Whig state convention adopted a platform that called for revision or repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act as well as repeal of the Nebraska bill. It also reaffirmed its rejection of fusion with Free Soilers and nominated a full Whig slate, headed by incumbent Governor Emory Washburn. Whigs followed suit in later district conventions by nominating straight Whigs for Congress and rejecting cooperation with Free Soilers.⁴⁵

Whigs' hard-line antislavery stance disconcerted conservatives. Edward Everett had rejoiced in late August that "there will be no fusion of the Whigs and free soilers," but by the fall he was grumping about the implications for intersectional comity of the stance the party had taken. "The Whig party is—to use the French expression—completely demoralized; and will have little else to do for some time to come but to follow a 'freesoil' lead," he moaned. "The Southern Whig papers say that the Northern Whigs can no longer be trusted, and that the National Whig party is used up. There is a good deal of truth in the last part of this." 46

Whereas conservatives rued the antisouthern posture adopted by Massachusetts Whigs, their rejection of fusion infuriated Free Soilers. Rebuffed by the Whig convention, a few Free Soilers, led once again by Wilson, called for a Republican state convention in early September. Although that convention nominated Wilson as the Republican candidate for governor, it attracted so few people, almost all of whom were disgruntled Free Soilers, that erstwhile Young Whig and Free Soil leader Charles Francis Adams scoffed that it was little more than "a drum and fife [corps] without followers."

Henry Wilson was ceaselessly ambitious, but he was no fool. He accepted the Republican nomination because he hoped to get the endorsement of the Know Nothing order, which had been growing like topsy in Massachusetts since early in the year. So numerous had Know Nothings become by the summer that even the Whigs' Ezra Lincoln admitted that "the result of our State election will depend upon the Know Nothings." That was a crucial admission from a leader who sought Whig victory on an anti-Nebraska, antisouthern platform, for incumbent Governor Emory Washburn, the Whig candidate, refused to join the order. In contrast, Wilson and many other Free Soil politicos became members in the spring at the same time as they were loudly demanding the creation of a new northern antislavery party. A desire to punish Irish Catholics, whom they blamed for the defeat of the constitution and the collapse of the Coalition, motivated such men, but it is just as obvious that they saw Know Nothingism as an alternative route to office should their hopes for a fusion antislavery party abort. 48

Once antislavery Whigs rejected fusion, therefore, Free Soilers streamed into Know Nothing lodges to control their nominations and endorsements. Free Soilers never dominated the order numerically. Tens of thousands of Democrats and Whigs also rushed into it. The Whigs who joined, moreover, were not staunch antislavery men like Lincoln, Julius Rockwell, or John Z. Goodrich, the most likely candidates to join Free Soilers in a new antislavery organization. Rather, they were often Wesbterites unhappy about the thrust of the Whigs' 1854 campaign. Ultimately, indeed, the Know Nothings nominated and then publicly announced as their own gubernatorial candidate not Wilson, but Henry J. Gardner, a politically obscure Boston merchant and former Websterite Whig.⁴⁹

At the leadership level, in sum, Know Nothingism represented an unlikely coalition of the two groups most unhappy about the actions of the Whig state convention: Free Soilers and Websterites. Among the rank and file, it represented not only those who sincerely despised the state's large Irish Catholic population, but also those who yearned for political reform and who were sorely disappointed that the Whig-controlled legislature in 1854 failed to follow through on promises to clean up government. That "debauched" legislature, wrote one disgusted Whig, had reached "the extremity of degradation" and engaged in "the most corrupt log-rolling and pipe-laying that Massachusetts has ever witnessed."

Massachusetts Know Nothingism thus consciously repudiated the Whig party, as well as Catholics and immigrants. Yet it also measurably advanced Free Soilers and their goals. Although Wilson lost the order's gubernatorial endorsement. veteran Free Soil politicos deftly won seven of the eleven Know Nothing congressional nominations. Nor was Wilson permanently blocked. He used his Republican gubernatorial nomination as leverage to gain an even bigger prize. He and Gardner made a secret deal whereby Wilson declined the Republicans' nomination a few days before the election so that Republicans could not name another man; in return, he secured a pledge of Know Nothing support for election by the legislature to the remaining three years of Everett's Senate term.⁵¹ Though Websterite Whigs and thousands of Democrats flocked to the Know Nothing order along with Free Soilers, moreover, Massachusetts Know Nothings were thoroughly antislavery and anti-Nebraska too. Indeed, Gardner, who had served two terms in the legislature without taking a public stand on any controversial issue and thus earned a reputation as a third-rater, was as shrewd and ambitious as Wilson. Suddenly changing spots, he presented himself as the strongest antislavery man in the race and began denouncing the defining article of the Websterite faith, the Fugitive Slave Act. Dismissing his earlier votes against prohibition, he also now demanded a restrictive Maine Law. To call this rank opportunism misses the point. Acutely aware of public opinion, Gardner bent accordingly.⁵²

But Massachusetts Know Nothingism also differed from the movement in other states like New York for an additional and quite significant reason. Unlike the politically ambitious and socially suspect Gardner or the most bitter Websterites who saw Know Nothingism as a vehicle for revenge against Whig factional foes, many of the state's wealthiest, most socially prominent, and best-educated conservative Whigs like Winthrop and Everett clung tenaciously to the Whig organization, even though they were asked on numerous occasions to join the secret nativist order. Principled revulsion at Know Nothings' bigotry and proscriptiveness, as well as love of Whiggery, help account for their stubborn adherence to the old party. As early as 1853, for example, Everett refused to speak to the Order of United Americans because he considered nativism pernicious. Nonetheless, sheer social snobbery also explains their aversion to Know Nothingism.⁵³

The naked contempt for the Know Nothings expressed by the Harvard-educated bluebloods who had once dominated Massachusetts Whiggery is stunning. "The personnel of the Native American party here has been of a very repulsive character," huffed the patrician Winthrop. Henry Gardner, he added tellingly, "is not of the Gardner family to which I belong, either by pedigree or principle." Mocking Gardner as "that rickety vermin," Ezra Lincoln moaned that Know Nothings "have spawned upon us the veriest race of spaniel ministers, lying toothpullers & bargaining priests that were ever showered upon any unoffending people." The order had "made a most preposterous string of nominations. People—most of whom—one has never heard of before," sneered an appalled Everett, "small traders, mechanics, & artisans, wholly unkown to the public." As for Gardner, he was "a man of some cleverness, but no solidity of character & no qualifications for high office."

Nonetheless, Gardner and other Know Nothings won one of the most sweeping victories ever achieved by an American political party. Contemporaries disagreed, as have later historians, about the reasons for the Know Nothing explosion, but its decimation of the once-dominant Massachusetts Whig party was unmistakable. Know Nothings won every seat in the state senate and all but a handful in the huge lower house. In the four-way gubernatorial race, where Wilson still received a few Free Soil votes, Gardner won with an astonishing 63 percent of the total, while the hapless Whig incumbent, Emory Washburn, ran second with 21 percent. Between 1853 and 1854, Washburn's total plummeted by 32,000 votes, 5,000 more than he received in 1854, and more Whigs who had supported Winfield Scott in 1852 backed Gardner than remained in the Whig column. That latter fact is especially telling, since, of course, diehard Webster Whigs refused to vote for Scott in 1852.⁵⁵

Returns from the House races proved especially devastating to the future of Whiggery. All eleven Massachusetts congressmen had voted against the Kansas-Nebraska bill in 1854, and nine of those men were Whigs. Only seven of the nine Whig incumbents ran again, but all of them, as well as the two Whig replacement candidates, were defeated by Know Nothings. The only two incumbents who won reelection had joined the Know Nothings too: the Free Soiler Alexander De Witt and the ambitious Democrat Nathaniel P. Banks. Of the victorious Know Nothings, moreover, only two had formerly been Whigs, and one of them, Linus Comins, who defeated the Websterite Whig incumbent, Samuel Walley, in the fourth district, had fluctuated like a shuttlecock between the Whig and Free Soil parties.

Regular Whig candidates were not simply defeated; they were obliterated. Of the eleven, four amassed between 30 and 32.1 percent of the vote, and they were the front-runners among Whigs! Only two of the others drew more than a fourth of the vote, and three failed even to reach the 20 percent mark. That talented anti-Nebraska Whig incumbents like John Z. Goodrich, William Appleton, Charles Upham, and Thomas D. Eliot, whose defeat even the Free Soiler Charles

Sumner lamented, were cast aside for Know Nothings demonstrates beyond cavil that something in addition to the Nebraska Act was on voters' minds. 56

Whiggery's demolition by Know Nothings stunned men within and outside the Bay State. How, wondered Illinois Whig David Davis, could Massachusetts voters have defeated so many anti-Nebraska Whig incumbents and thus given solace to the South? "The Know Nothings have smitten Whig and Democrat hip and thigh in Massachusetts," wrote the crusty New York patrician George Templeton Strong in his diary. "If we are in a fix, how is it with the Whigs," a Massachusetts Democrat rationalized. "If there be anything then in the idea that misery loves company, we surely have company enough in our overthrow." "Poor old Massachusetts!" Winthrop groaned after the election. "Who could have believed the old Whig party would have been so thoroughly demoralized in so short a space of time?" "57

Weeks before the election, astute Whig conservatives had worried about Free Soil infiltration of the Know Nothings and especially about the rumored bargain between Gardner and Henry Wilson. Wilson's subsequent election to the Senate, therefore, only punctuated the humiliation of Massachusetts Whigs. But it did more than that. Along with senatorial elections during 1855 in New York and New Hampshire, it attached the stigma of antislavery radicalism to northern Know Nothings. And that stigma, far more than the nativist, anti-Catholic tenets of Know Nothingism itself, crippled Know Nothing candidates in most southern states during the elections later that year.

Ш

Know Nothingism mushroomed in New York as well, but its politics were far more complicated than those in Massachusetts or Pennsylvania. Since New York possessed the nation's largest bloc of House seats and electoral votes and was home to Fillmore and Seward, the two northern Whigs most frequently mentioned as possible Whig presidential candidates in 1856, its politics were also far more consequential.

At first glance, New York's Whigs seemed more successful than their Bay State brethren in 1854. Nonetheless, Know Nothingism and, even more so, prohibitionism so damaged the unity and integrity of New York's Whigs and Democrats that developments there had even more profound consequences for the future of the national Whig party. By demonstrating the impossibility of holding the traditional Whig and Democratic coalitions together, New York augured a fundamental reorganization of American political life rather than the reinvigoration of the second party system that Seward sought in the spring of 1854. Internal divisions smashed Whig hopes of turning the election into a referendum on slavery extension and a demonstration that Whigs could carry the state for a favorite son in 1856. As a result, events in New York altered the calculations of almost every Whig who looked ahead to the presidential contest.

Like other northern Whigs, Seward's New York followers voiced supreme confidence in 1854 that opposition to the Nebraska bill would bring victory in the fall state and congressional elections and provide them the inside track for the national party's 1856 presidential nomination.⁵⁸ Silver Grays were every bit as appalled by Douglas' measure as Sewardites, if for somewhat different reasons, and they wanted Whigs' state platform to condemn it vigorously. Only a call for repeal of the Fugitive Slave Act might alienate them, and that was a call Weed and Seward were determined to muzzle. An attack on the Fugitive Slave Act like that made by Whigs in Vermont, Massachusetts, or Pennsylvania could doom their whole effort to keep the party united. If for no other reason than to ensure Whig control of the new legislature so that Seward might be reelected to the Senate in 1855, they bent over backward to preserve Whig cohesion, and throughout the spring, Whig and Democratic commentators alike commented on Whigs' apparent harmony.⁵⁹

Despite their unwonted agreement on the slavery issue, however, at least five different threats menaced and ultimately subverted Whigs' unity. First was the residual jealousy between Silver Grays and Sewardites. Despite their common antipathy to the Nebraska Act, many resentful Silver Gravs were determined never again to play second fiddle to Seward and Weed. A donnybrook for control of the Whig organization and its nominations was thus irrepressible. Second was an attempt during the summer to launch a fusion Republican party in New York that could fatally weaken the Whigs by siphoning off their angriest antislavery supporters. The third and fourth threats were the intensification of nativist and prohibitionist sentiments, which, by the summer, displaced Nebraska as the key issues in the fall elections. The fifth, ironically, was the continuing rift among the state's Democrats between Hardshell Hunkers led by ex-Senator Daniel S. Dickinson and the alliance of Softshell Hunkers and Barnburners, led nominally by Secretary of State William L. Marcy and incumbent Governor Horatio Seymour. By the summer, the entanglement of these five elements caused seasoned Whig leaders to moan in bewilderment that "so many strange elements [were] afloat" "that we are to have political chaos—'confusion worse confounded' for a time." 60

As was the case since the party's founding, Whigs' relationship with the rival Democrats largely determined their fate. Paradoxically, Democratic divisions simultaneously encouraged Whig cohesion and jeopardized it. On the one hand, just as in 1853, when separate Hard and Soft tickets guaranteed Whig victory and thereby deterred bolts by dissident Silver Grays who hoped to share in the spoils of certain Whig triumph, Democratic divisions in 1854 promised Whigs control of the governorship, the legislature, and most congressional seats if they could hold together. That prospect increased the likelihood of an intraparty battle for nominations, but it also seemed to ensure that rival Whigs would remain within the party, at least until nominees were named. On the other hand, the near impossibility that either Democratic faction by itself could defeat a united Whig party gave both a powerful incentive to provoke Whig division.

Internal disagreements within both Democratic factions over the Nebraska bill in 1854 complicated their rivalry. Five Hardshell Democratic congressmen voted against it, but in early July a Hard convention nominated Greene Bronson for governor on a platform that endorsed Nebraska and stridently denounced the alliance between Softs and Barnburners as "unmanly and dishonest." Hards also ran congressional candidates against Softs in at least twenty-four of the state's thirty-three House districts. 61

Fearful of offending the administration, especially with Marcy in the cabinet, Softs dared not repudiate the Nebraska Act. Nor could they endorse it, for it outraged Barnburners and many Softs themselves, and, given the separate Hard ticket, Soft leaders knew they had no chance whatsoever of carrying the state if they alienated Barnburners by endorsing the Nebraska Act. Softs therefore renominated Seymour in early September on a platform that straddled the Nebraska issue and tried to focus the campaign on other matters. Whigs and Free Soilers alike mocked this "sniveling, twaddling, ropedancer balancing proposition." Both Democratic factions were thus vulnerable if Whigs could remain united and keep their campaign focused against the Nebraska Act and further slavery extension. 62

Acutely aware of this fact, Hards and Softs each sought to split the Whigs to even the odds in November. Some Hards hoped to break off the Silver Grays, whom they saw as potential allies. Simultaneously, anti-Nebraska Hards, dissatisfied with their faction's July platform, began to cast about for new political moorings. They sought different Whig allies. Hards and some Softs, therefore, encouraged an effort by Free Soilers (or Free Democrats, as they had called themselves since 1852) to create a fusion antislavery coalition in New York that year. Anti-Nebraska Hards did so because they needed a new party; pro-Nebraska Hards, in contrast, simply hoped that if enough antislavery men abandoned the Whig party for a new Republican coalition, the remaining Silver Grays, now less confident of Whig victory, might combine with them.

The occasion for launching an antislavery fusion party was a statewide anti-Nebraska convention scheduled to meet in Saratoga Springs on August 16. The original calls for this convention, issued by mass anti-Nebraska meetings in New York City and Albany, said nothing about nominating a state ticket. Instead, they simply invited New York's voters "to consider" what was necessary "For the protection of the Free States from Southern aggression and Northern treachery; For the recovery of the rights of the Free States . . . and For the rescue of the General Government from the control of the Slave Power."

That language opened the door for proponents of a new party. So did the mechanism for selecting delegates to Saratoga. County mass meetings were to choose five delegates from each of the state's 128 assembly districts, and those county meetings might be steamrolled into demanding a fusion party. Of particular concern to Whig strategists, Horace Greeley enthusiastically pushed the new party bandwagon in his New York Tribune. Frustrated by the apparent intention of Seward and Weed to maintain ties to southern Whigs and by the waffling of Whig legislators during the spring on the Maine Law, Greeley hoped to build a Republican party in New York on an anti-Nebraska, prohibitionist platform. That Greeley also hoped the new party would nominate him for governor was widely known.

Hardshell Democrats, either cynically or sincerely, and a few Softs abetted this drive for Republican nominations at Saratoga in order to break up the Whig party. At the Saratoga convention itself, indeed, a Hard introduced the resolution to form a Republican party. A few Silver Grays, who hoped that Republican nominations might lure Sewardites from the Whig party so that their own faction could control it, joined the cry for fusion nominations. Sensing the danger to Whig unity, one appalled Whig complained to Weed that his county's meeting had been "controlled by Abolitionists, Free Democrats & Softs, pushed on by a few inveterate Silver Greys[,] all of whom ardently desire the dismemberment of the Whig party." ⁶⁵

Suspicious "that a ticket is to be nominated at Saratoga," major leaders from all Whig factions cooperated to avert this threat. Nothing, indeed, better illustrates their consensus on the Nebraska issue and their desire to preserve party unity in 1854 so that one or both of them might enjoy the fruits of the anticipated Whig victory. Fillmorites like Solomon Haven and James Kidd raged at "the disorganizers seeking to break up the Whig party" by "going over to the Abolitionists."66 Ex-Governor Washington Hunt worked to ensure that his county's mass meeting sent to Saratoga reliable delegates who would "resist the fusion scheme, and . . . secede if a ticket is formed."67 Weed, who had always questioned what "good" the Saratoga convention "will do," recognized how difficult it was to build the organizational apparatus for a new party. He also understood that the remaining Free Soilers represented only a fraction of the Silver Gray Whigs who would be alienated by an attempted coalition. What was worse, he wrote Hunt, by drawing away antislavery Whigs, a Republican nomination would leave Silver Gravs and other anti-Weed men in control of the existing Whig organization. That eventuality would menace what seemed certain Whig victory in the fall and, with it, Seward's reelection to the Senate by the new legislature. Having already publicly spurned Free Soil overtures for a merger, Weed now urged his lieutenants around the state to "have friends in it [the Saratoga convention] to guard against mischief," reliable Whig delegates who were committed to preserving "the integrity of the Whig party."68

Weed personally set out to persuade Greeley to abandon the new-party effort during an interview in New York City in late July. Appealing to Greeley's antipathy to the burgeoning Know Nothing movement by warning that Silver Grays and Know Nothings would cooperate to carry the state if the Whig party were split by Republican nominations, thereby stopping Seward's reelection, which was vital to the antislavery cause, Weed prevailed upon Greeley to change his editorial tack in the Tribune. On July 26, Greeley disgustedly wrote his Indiana protegé, Schuyler Colfax, ''We shall have no nomination at Saratoga, and, alas! no fusion at all, which will do harm in all the 'fusion' states. It will tell heavily against us that we carry all the States Whig that we can, and go 'fusion' where we can do no better.''

With Greeley, who chaired the resolutions committee at Saratoga, now on board, enough loyal Whig delegates on the floor, and unexpected help from the Barnburner Preston King, who still hoped the Soft convention in early September would oppose Nebraska, Weed's friends beat back attempts to make separate nominations at Saratoga. Instead, the convention adjourned to meet again at Auburn in late September, after the Whig and Soft conventions, in the hope that the continuing threat of a new ticket would force both to condemn the Nebraska outrage. Since the Whigs were certain to do so, the fusion menace to Whig hopes had seemingly been checked.⁷⁰

The suppression of fusion nominations, however, did not completely disarm Democrats seeking to rend the Whigs. Hostility to slavery extension was hardly the only issue in the impending election, as New York's Whig congressional delegation had been warned repeatedly during the spring. Both nativism and prohibition had the potential to split Whigs, and by the summer these issues seemed to matter far more than Nebraska to vast numbers of them. "Whig or Democrat will have nothing to do with the election this fall," wrote one Whig in early August. "The temperance and Catholic questions" were now the central issues in New York, echoed another upstate Whig later that month. Residents of rural districts harbored "a deep conviction of the necessity of a prohibitory law, & determination to obtain such a law even at the expense of other favorite measures or party ties." Zealous Protestants demanded that "some check should be given to the wily schemes of political demagogues who pander to the prejudices and passions of our foreign population." As a result, "The Nebraska-Kansas bill is obsolete, or in the language of its famous Author 'is superceded & inoperative' in comparison with these immediate & practical questions."

Precisely because these questions transfixed so many Whig voters, Democrats, having failed to divide Whigs with a new antislavery party, seized on them to accomplish that goal. The Softs' renomination of Seymour consciously targeted wet Whigs who adamantly opposed passage of a Maine Law. In March, Seymour vetoed a prohibition law passed by a bipartisan legislative majority.⁷² His veto instantly established Seymour as the darling of the "liquor interest," drinkers, and those who opposed sumptuary legislation on principle as unconscionable state interference with individual freedom. So popular among liquor dealers and tavern owners was Seymour, indeed, that at least one important Soft tactician feared that he would be identified "as the rum candidate," thereby deterring "many sober & temperance democrats from voting at all."

Other Soft strategists correctly saw great advantages in running Seymour again. His nomination diverted attention in at least the gubernatorial and legislative campaigns from the nettlesome Nebraska question to liquor. It could negate the rebellious Hards, since, one Soft calculated, at least half of the Hard rank and file would vote for Seymour rather than Bronson if the right to drink were clearly at stake. Best of all, since Seymour had already preempted the anti-Maine Law position, Whigs faced a dilemma. They dared not nominate a wet themselves, lest they thereby provoke outraged temperance men to run a separate Maine Law candidate who might siphon off tens of thousands of Whig voters. Yet if Whigs ran a zealous prohibitionist, or even a passive temperance man who seemed willing to sign prohibitionist legislation, uncounted numbers of anti-prohibition Whigs might defect to Seymour or abstain. Softs could not split the Whigs over the slavery issue, but they might do so with the liquor question.⁷⁴

Though Seymour had staked out the antiprohibition position, Whig leaders wanted to hold their own wet voters if at all possible.⁷⁵ Finding a gubernatorial candidate who could appeal to Whigs on both sides of the liquor issue, therefore, proved to be Whigs' thorniest problem prior to the state convention at Syracuse on September 20. Flatly warned by leading prohibitionists "that the Whigs must sail in our cold water ship or sink" and aware that dries would run their own candidate unless Whigs "nominate a well known Temperance man for Governor," they also worried that the "avowal" to sign a prohibition measure that antiliquor men now demanded as a sine qua non "will alienate great numbers of the political party to which the candidate may belong."

Conflicting advice deluged Weed, who once again hoped to engineer the Whig nomination. During April, in the weeks immediately following Seymour's veto, when a bolt by appreciative wet Whigs seemed likely, Weed toyed with the idea of running Seward himself for governor. By mid-May, however, Weed admitted that "the Maine Law question would be fatal to Seward as a candidate for Governor" since the most fanatical prohibitionists "would never support him." Greeley, who ached to be governor, was disqualified for the opposite reason. Even before he pushed for nominations at Saratoga, Greeley demanded daily in his New York Tribune that the Whigs' gubernatorial candidate must pledge to sign a prohibition law. Since any candidate who publicly sympathized with prohibitionists would instantly be consigned to "his political grave," wrote another Whig, the party's best hope was "to keep Greeley quiet."

Nonetheless, the pressure on Whigs to appease prohibitionists was inexorable. Thus, in late June, when Weed broached George W. Patterson's name to John M. Bradford, Bradford replied that if Patterson "cannot get the whole Maine law vote it would be madness to nominate him." A better choice, Bradford suggested, would be State Senator Myron H. Clark, a loyal Sewardite, who as author of the vetoed prohibition bill would pose the clearest alternative to Seymour on the liquor question. Clark, he argued, would get all the Sewardites, who, by his grossly inflated estimate, constituted nine-tenths of the Whig rank and file, all the Free Soilers, and the whole Maine Law vote. "He would lose all Whigs who love anti-Maine Lawism more than the party," but "so I think would any man we should nominate." Since Seymour had locked up the anti-Maine Law vote, only an ardent dry would do."

Were the divisive prohibition question Weed's only problem, holding the party together would have been difficult enough. But as he and other Whigs well knew, Know Nothings also threatened Whig unity, and particularly Weed's long domination of the party. While Softs used the liquor issue, Hards seized on Know Nothingism to split the Whig party after fusion nominations were blocked at Saratoga. And they did so primarily because Know Nothingism was also the vehicle that some Silver Grays used to capture control of Whig nominations from Weed and Seward.

As elsewhere, Know Nothing lodges spread across New York State during 1854 in response to intense grass-roots anti-immigrant, anti-Catholic, and antiparty resentments. However sincere those resentments were, both Hards and Silver Grays quickly sought to exploit the secret, oath-bound fraternity to advance their factional interests. Silver Grays wanted to use its tightly disciplined machinery to counter Weed's control of regular Whig county organizations in a pitched battle to select delegates to the Whig state convention and to name Whig candidates for the legislature and Congress. Hards looked for a direct alliance with Silver Grays by seeking control of Know Nothing lodges and their candidate endorsements.

A concerted Silver Gray challenge to Weed's control of the Whig party emerged almost simultaneously with, but separately from, Know Nothingism. Significantly, Fillmore himself did not orchestrate either movement. During the spring, Fillmore was repeatedly informed by his closest advisors of the Know Nothings' astonishing power and of their likely support for his presidential candidacy in 1856. He and they, however, saw no need to join the order to get that support, and they awaited the results of the 1854 elections before determining upon a course of action with regard to it. Since Haven planned to run for reelection as a Whig and since Fillmore still hoped that Silver Grays would be treated fairly at the Whig state convention, moreover, during the summer they were far more interested in quashing fusion nominations at Saratoga than in spawning a different independent party.⁸⁰

For similar reasons, Fillmore initially abstained from Silver Grays' challenge for the Whigs' gubernatorial nomination. He certainly knew that many Silver Grays, despite their opposition to the Nebraska bill, still yearned to break "the power and cohesion of the Seward dynasty" and would resist an attempt by Weed to impose a radical antislavery platform on the Whig party since they "will not go Nigger when a White Man is at stake." Nonetheless, Fillmore bided his time as younger men outside his inner circle launched an effort to control the state convention. The instigator was Daniel Ullmann, the New York City lawyer who had helped lead the Silver Gray bolt in 1850, run unsuccessfully for attorney general in 1851, and grudgingly stepped aside for Washington Hunt as the Whig gubernatorial nominee in 1852.

Starting in April, Ullmann began to write to veteran anti-Weed Whigs across New York to ascertain what his prospects for the Whig gubernatorial nomination might be and what the chances were of constructing a statewide organization to rival the regular, Weed-controlled Whig committee structure. He asked Albany's James Kidd, for example, for a copy of the mailing list of reliable conservatives Fillmore had compiled in 1849. Aside from widespread sympathy for a concerted challenge to Weed. Ullmann received three key pieces of information from his numerous correspondents. First, Know Nothingism was spreading like wildfire across the state, and nativists hated Weed, Seward, and Greelev because of their well-known sympathy for Catholics and foreigners. Second, prohibitionism was the dominant sentiment among upstate Whigs. Dries would support no one, regardless of his factional affiliation, who was not committed publicly or privately to signing a Maine Law, and they were congenitally suspicious of anyone from that den of iniquity, New York City. Third, and most important, in most places Silver Grays were heavily outnumbered by Sewardites and could never select pro-Ullmann delegates to the Whig state convention unless they could lure Sewardites to the Ullmann camp.82

In July a group calling itself the New York Central Whig Association formed to coordinate Ullmann's drive for the Whig nomination. Second-tier Silver Gray leaders like Benedict Lewis, Robert C. Wetmore, and Stephen Sammons directed the NYCWA, and its corresponding secretary was Marcellus Ells. Significantly, both Ells and Sammons were influential Know Nothings. On August 1, the NYCWA published a circular making the case for Ullmann's nomination. Touting Ullmann's fidelity to "all our favorite measures," his "earnest" advocacy of canal expansion, and his "determined" opposition to the Nebraska bill, it asserted that no one else could "more readily unite and cement the party." "83"

"The party" in question was the Whigs, and the NYWCA was presented to the public exclusively an as organization of Whigs. Nonetheless, Ells was a leading Know Nothing, and many of the men who wrote to him, other NYCWA leaders, or Ullmann openly identified themselves as Know Nothings or included the tell-tale phrase "I know nothing" in their letters. By August, Ullmann himself had probably joined the order, and he certainly had by September 20, when the Whig state convention met.⁸⁴

Many Silver Grays never became Know Nothings, but cooperation between the two groups was almost inevitable. Genuine nativists despised the pro-Catholic, proimmigrant proclivities of Weed, Seward, and Greeley, and many conservative Whigs shared that animosity. Determined to shove Weed and Seward aside, Silver Grays swarmed into the order, and by early August one Whig reported to the NYWCA that "the Know Nothings are to exert considerable influence in the Whig caucuses this Fall." Accordingly, veteran Silver Grays like John L. Dox boasted openly "that the know nothings and silver grays would carry the state by 30,000 this fall."85 Precisely because many Silver Grays flocked to Know Nothingism, Hardshell Hunkers followed suit in the admittedly unlikely hope that, should Ullmann fail to get the Whig nomination, Know Nothings instead might endorse Bronson. Regardless, from the perspective of Weed, Seward, and their lieutenants, Hards' movement into Know Nothing lodges only aggravated the threat to their own control of the Whig party and Seward's reelection. "Silver Grav treachery & Know Nothing activity may defeat the Whig ticket," one Sewardite warned Weed. "You should know that secretly the K. N. are pledged against vou & Seward & Abolitionism.''86

Sewardites responded to the Know Nothing threat in various ways. Some, like Greeley, openly defied the order and demanded war to the hilt against the nativists. Others, like Weed's favorite, George Patterson, refused to have anything to do with them. Still others, including Weed himself and some of Seward's closest advisors, believed that Sewardites themselves must infiltrate the order to counter Silver Gray influence within it. Sewardites should join the order to disrupt it and thus "get back our true men and disavow the traitors," advised one Syracuse Whig. So many Seward Whigs followed this tack to control Know Nothing lodges that one outraged correspondent of the Senator complained that they had "thrown away 'both their honor and their weapons'" since they would be bound by the order's oaths of allegiance to oppose him. Se

Once it appeared that Know Nothings might elect a majority of delegates to the Whig convention, moreover, other aspirants for the gubernatorial nomination besides Ullmann joined the order in a bid for their help. Of the Sewardites, Myron H. Clark, the prohibitionist state senator, proved boldest. As the apoplectic Elbridge Spaulding, who sought the gubernatorial nomination himself, raged to Weed, Clark's friends in Canandaigua created a bogus Know Nothing lodge that inducted him so that he could claim to be a Know Nothing when the Whig convention met. Ullmann, too, received angry warnings that Clark would be his main competitor in a planned caucus of Know Nothing delegates to the Whig gathering. ⁸⁹

With ample reason, therefore, a perplexed Weed dejectedly confessed to Patterson three days before the state convention that he could no longer control it. Anti-Nebraska sentiment, which he had counted on to hold Whigs together and defeat the Democrats, would not be the campaign's leading issue. Know Nothings and Silver Grays were organized against him. The prohibition issue remained a headache, with prohibitionists planning to hold a convention at Auburn to nominate their own man unless the Whig candidate satisfied them. "I don't see how we are to get through the Convention safely," he moaned. "The breakers ahead cause serious apprehension. Unless we hit right the Auburn Conventions will act." Nor was that all. "The 'Natives' and 'Silvers'" would insist upon the nomination for lieutenant governor if they did not get the governorship itself. "This is the worst aspect of the question." $^{\prime\prime90}$

IV

Thurlow Weed had never suffered many Whigs' penchant for overoptimism, and in 1854 his fears again proved all too accurate. At the convention he discovered that non-Know Nothing, nontemperance delegates were divided between Spaulding and his man Patterson. Maine Law men threatened to form an independent ticket if either were nominated and instead insisted on Levi Harris, who had little support outside their circle. Meanwhile, Know Nothing delegates, who caucused before the convention officially opened, demanded that the nominee be a member, but they were divided among Clark, Ullmann, Joseph Savage, and William Campbell. Incensed that Clark might derail months of effort to nominate Ullmann, Silver Gray Know Nothings passed around a document known as the Canandaigua Circular, signed by James W. Barker, the president of the Know Nothings' state and national councils, and members of the official Ethan Allen Council in that town, asserting that Clark "belongs to a spurious Order here & is not a member of our Order."

In part because of Silver Gray opposition to Clark, but primarily because his nomination would appease zealous temperance men, Weed decided to back him at a conference between the two men on the night before the convention opened. With Weed's support, Clark won the nomination on the third ballot. Henry J. Raymond, the Sewardite editor of the New York Times and a prominent foe of the Maine Law, got the nod for lieutenant governor. In an effort not to further alienate Silver Grays, who had been completely excluded from the major slots on the state ticket, the Whigs' platform condemned the Nebraska Act but suggested no remedy for it. On enforcement or revision of the Fugitive Slave Act, it was utterly silent, as it was on both the Maine Law and nativism. Within a week, the adjourned Saratoga convention and the state temperance meeting at Auburn endorsed the ticket. Yes

Given the difficult circumstances Weed faced, his reluctant swing from Patterson to Clark made sense. He knew that Sewardites would never tolerate a Silver Gray nominee, and Clark was even more rabidly antislavery than Seward. As a deputy United States marshal in 1850, indeed, he had vowed never to enforce the Fugitive Slave Act and had helped fund a new Whig paper that denounced the Compromise. His prohibitionist credentials were impeccable, and he might lure Know Nothings to boot. In the short run, moreover, Clark's nomination seemed to pay dividends, as the actions at Auburn implied.

Still, the choice of Clark reflected Weed's desperation. Many Whigs regarded him not simply as a cold-water fanatic, but also as a dimwit who was totally unqualified to be governor. "Mr. Clark is a respectable citizen without a single qualification for Gov.," Francis Granger huffed upon learning of the decision at Syracuse, and later he asserted that "thousands of Seward Whigs... will not vote for Clark, from a knowledge of his utter want of fitness." Similarly, Alex Mann, Rochester's Silver Gray editor, reported "wide and deep dissatisfaction with the nomination of Clark among the Whigs of this section, and it is by no means confined to Silver Grays." Incensed by the nominations of a simpleton like Clark and his hated editorial rival Raymond, Greeley bitterly railed against Weed to Seward, and after the election he announced to Seward "the dissolution of the political firm of Seward, Weed, & Greeley by the withdrawal of the junior partner"

Incompetence was hardly Clark's only liability. As Weed had been amply warned, Clark's prohibitionist zeal infuriated wets. Terrified at the prospect of Clark as governor, "the liquor dealers," as even Weed admitted, made "a tremendous effort to elect Seymour." In New York City they printed and distributed 17,000 Seymour tickets at their own expense. "We lose more Whigs than you would anticipate," Washington Hunt bluntly told Weed two weeks before the election. "Many of our best outdoor men are those who keep or resort to places of entertainment," and they "are ready to sacrifice party, country and everything, sooner than be deprived of the 'critter.' "⁹⁶ Hunt was as flummoxed as he was discouraged by the chaos that followed Clark's nomination. "There never was a time when party ties seemed of so little account," he groaned. "The new questions have destroyed everything like party discipline, and many staunch old Whigs are floating off they don't know where." "⁹⁷

Among the new questions that threatened Whig discipline, Hunt listed an open bolt by Know Nothings and Silver Grays who were even more offended by the actions at Syracuse than were hard-drinking Whigs. The nomination of Clark and Raymond, in fact, detonated an explosion that ended Whig unity based on common anger at the Nebraska Act. The long-simmering resentments of Silver Grays now erupted in an outpouring of anger and spleen that proved irrevocable. Because Silver Grays now had Know Nothings as both an ally against and an organized alternative to the Sewardite-dominated Whig party, their defection was irreversible.

To be more precise, Whig attempts after the convention to cement endorsements of the Syracuse ticket at Auburn mortally wounded the party. In the first few days following the convention, at least some Silver Grays seemed disposed to support the ticket. Since Weed's preference for Patterson or Spaulding as the nominee was well known, some Silver Gray papers, including Fillmore's personal mouthpiece, the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser, and the Albany State Register, initially crowed that Clark's nomination marked a defeat for Weed. Francis Granger, whose silver locks had given the National Whigs their sobriquet, for one, was not fooled. Demanding to know how the Commercial Advertiser could reach such an erroneous conclusion, Granger bluntly told Fillmore that "W. has not a more pliant tool in the State" than Clark, that Weed had marshaled support for him at Syracuse, and that, unless Silver Gray papers repudiated the ticket, "we here [in Canandaigua] must consider it, as a formal disbanding of the Silver Grays."

Within days of this outburst, the actions at Auburn dispelled the illusions of other Silver Grays. Between September 25 and 27, the Free Democrats, the adjourned Saratoga convention, and the state temperance convention met in Seward's home town. Refusing to ratify the Whig ticket, Free Soilers pressed the remnants of the Saratoga convention to nominate a genuine fusion ticket by substituting a Barnburner for Raymond in the second slot. Orchestrated by Weed, Edwin Morgan, and Seward himself, the numerous Whig delegates at the anti-

Nebraska gathering fended off this threat and secured endorsement of the entire Whig ticket. But they also supported resolutions that, quite unlike the Syracuse state platform, repudiated both major parties' 1852 national platforms and their commitment to the finality of the Compromise of 1850, vigorously condemned the Fugitive Slave Act, and called for an exclusively northern convention to nominate a presidential ticket in 1856. What is more, after many Whigs had left to go home, the remaining anti-Nebraska men and Free Soilers agreed to name a Republican state committee, even if there was no Republican state ticket, and the Whigs who were still in town made no protest against it.⁹⁹

Delighted by the endorsement of Clark and Raymond, neither Seward nor Weed apparently recognized what public perception of their complicity with the actions at Auburn meant. Their careless indifference allowed hotheads at Auburn to wreck within a few hours everything they had done over nine months—indeed. during the four years since the Silver Gray bolt in 1850—to hold the New York Whig party together. The attack on the Compromise and the Fugitive Slave Act and the apparent sympathy for an exclusively northern Republican party, not the condemnation of the Nebraska Act at Syracuse, reopened the party's wounds over slavery. Newspaper accounts of the Auburn meetings, not of the official Whig state convention on September 20, caused the furious Charles Conrad to protest to Fillmore that the "so-called Whig convention" had "surrendered at discretion to the abolitionists," that the resolutions accompanying the endorsement of Clark and Raymond "amount to a declaration of perpetual warfare against the South." and that Fillmore and other National Whigs must repudiate the ticket and help form a new "national party" since "it would be impossible for Southern Whies to cooperate with the authors & abetters of these measures."100

Furious Silver Grays instantly recognized the consequences of what had transpired at Auburn. "The Whig candidates have all gone over to a sectional Seward abolition movement and I hold them utterly unworthy of support as Whigs," protested one. Since they were "loaded down with isms," he raged, "it would be a publick [sic] disgrace as well as the ruin of what is left of the Whig party to have them elected."

Some Silver Gravs initially spoke of supporting Seymour or Bronson or simply abstaining en masse to bring down Clark and Raymond. Sitting out the election. however, might simply demonstrate the Nationals' weakness and unwillingness to fight, thereby encouraging southern Whigs to leave the party. 102 To persuade Southerners that they continued to have powerful allies in New York and to coordinate strategy for the state election, therefore, leading Silver Grays met in Albany on October 24. Fillmore, who publicly took no part in the 1854 campaign in order to conceal his continuing political ambition, did not attend, but he privately kept abreast of the proceedings. 103 The Albany gathering made two important decisions. First, to reassure southern Whigs that Silver Grays repudiated the actions at Auburn, they issued a circular that was disseminated widely among conservative Whigs in New York, other northern states, and, most significantly, the South. It announced that conservatives planned to issue an address on the day after the election "in which the principles of the National Whig party will be plainly declared" and called for another Whig convention, purified of Sewardite influence, at Albany in January 1855 "to re-instate the old Whig party on its old platform recently discarded at Auburn." It went on to list the principles on which the "National Whig party" would be based: opposition to "the Nebraska bill as a violation of the Missouri Compromise"; continued enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Act; and a firm pledge "to oppose all propositions for the fusion of the Whig party with any other for the purpose of forming a sectional party based upon the agitation of the day." The circular concluded on a ringing and ominous note. "The time for decisive action has arrived, as the coming winter will determine whether a National Whig party will cease to exist." ¹⁰⁴

As late as October 24, 1854, in short, many Silver Grays still hoped to perpetuate the Whig organization and to have it nominate Fillmore for president. Their circular said absolutely nothing about Catholics, foreigners, Know Nothings, or the Maine Law. Nonetheless, their second decision at Albany recognized the necessity to continue their implicit alliance with Know Nothings. Through a private letter-writing campaign they would throw Silver Gray support to Ullmann, whom Know Nothings, acting on their own, had nominated for governor at a convention in New York City on October 4.

Know Nothings' refusal to endorse Clark, Bronson, or Seymour and their nomination of Ullmann signaled their transformation from a secret pressure group into an alternative party. They had good reasons for making the switch. Nativists had a concrete political agenda they wanted enacted, but to force politicians to address it, they needed to demonstrate their strength among the electorate or elect men of their own. James W. Barker, who had taken over the struggling Order of the Star Spangled Banner in 1852 and personally directed its astounding growth since then, hoped to do so at first by infiltrating the Whig convention, but even before it met, he had called a Know Nothing convention for October 4 to make its own nominations should those at Syracuse be unacceptable. Barker and other sincere nativists, moreover, were indignant at Sewardites' cynical attempt to capture local lodges, outraged by the insulting selection of the "bogus" Know Nothing Clark, and miffed that neither the Hards, the Softs, nor the Whigs had said one word against the Catholic and foreign menace. At their insistence, Ullmann was nominated to show the order's electoral power, but since they planned a campaign that would operate primarily through the lodges themselves, they saw no need to publish a platform. 105

As was the case prior to the Whig convention, Know Nothings and Silver Grays cooperated against Seward and Weed—and now Clark—but they did not merge completely. Many Silver Grays never joined the Know Nothings, others waited to do so until after the election, and a few simply found it inconceivable to vote for anyone without a formal Whig nomination. Fillmore punctuated many Silver Grays' inclination to hold Know Nothings at arm's length. Fillmore deemed Ullmann "a good national Whig and . . . in all respects qualified for the office." But when Stephen Sammons directly asked him to endorse the Know Nothings publicly in order to swing Silver Grays behind Ullmann and thereby build "a united force that could well harmonize in the future," Fillmore answered coldly that he could do "nothing."

Know Nothings wanted Silver Gray help for two reasons. First, despite the order's rapid spread, they recognized that by themselves they lacked a majority of the state's voters. Of particular concern, although they disseminated the Canandaigua Circular among lodges across the state to discredit Clark's phony Know Nothing credentials, they still feared that many lodges might support him rather than Ullmann since Clark's supporters spread the false rumor that Ullmann had been born in Calcutta, India, and was therefore ineligible to be a Know Nothing. So likely did it appear that all Know Nothings would not rally behind Ullmann, indeed, that a few members strenuously opposed his nomination on the grounds that it would only split the anti-Democratic vote and throw the election to Seymour or Bronson. Second, Know Nothings also desperately needed money to pay for the printing and distribution of ballots and campaign posters. They regarded patrician Silver Grays as men with deep enough pockets to provide the necessary cash. 107

If some Know Nothing leaders unabashedly solicited Silver Gray help, many rank-and-file members detested the need for it. They distrusted Silver Grays as pompous bluebloods or jaded hacks, not new men "fresh from the ranks of the people." Nonetheless, more pulled the two groups together than pushed them apart. Although Ullmann carefully kept his distance from the Albany Silver Gray conclave and although it refused to endorse him publicly, Know Nothings and Silver Grays shared a commitment to "a complete annihilation of the Weed and Seward Regency." Your "nomination by the 'Know Nothings,' " Mann told Ullmann, "will give many in this quarter, besides the members of the 'mysterious order' an opportunity to vote for a candidate whom they like and know to be qualified." Fillmore, who publicly took "no part in politics this fall," also hoped for Ullmann's election, and he now privately began to urge his friends to join Know Nothing lodges. Cooperation between Know Nothings and Silver Grays on the state ticket, in short, was nearly complete. 109

Inevitably it spilled over into local contests to nominate Whig legislative and congressional candidates, and it was in those struggles between September 20 and late October that Know Nothings took their most devastating toll on the Whig organization. Across the state, stunned Weed men reported Know Nothing and Silver Gray takeovers of local conventions. "At our caucus they rushed in from their Council room in a body—controlled it—elected their delegates—& aid [adjourned] in a few moments," gasped one Sewardite. "They acted like zombies." Here is where the Hards' infiltration of Know Nothing lodges paid dividends. Know Nothing Whigs aided Silver Gray outsiders in pitched battles within Whig meetings against Weed's allies. If they won, Know Nothings endorsed the Silver Gray candidate, and Democratic Know Nothings were under oath to support him too. But where Sewardites won Whig nominations, Know Nothings endorsed Democrats—and usually Hard Democrats—and Silver Grays, whether Know Nothings or "outsiders," followed their lead. Referring to one legislative ticket, for example, a Silver Gray Know Nothing gloated, "The Whig party, as a party, are broken up in Troy. . . . The Seward Whigs in Troy are about two-thirds of the party but the Silver Grays will have a man that the Democrats will unite on, or they will have a Democrat that the Whigs will unite on, and no Seward Whig will go to the legislature from Troy, mark that." "We are determined to give old party lines and old party hacks a glorious drubbing this fall, and learn them hereafter a lesson they will not forget during a lifetime," echoed another Know Nothing from western New York.111

This determination took its greatest toll on Sewardite Whig candidates in the congressional races. "Chaotic" barely begins to describe the confusion of those contests. When the smoke had settled, only five of the state's thirty-three districts featured the customary two-candidate races. Whigs nominated one or more candidates in all thirty-three districts; Hards and Softs each nominated men in all but three, although the Soft or Hard candidate withdrew from two before the final balloting; and Know Nothings made endorsements in at least twenty-two races. In addition, four Free Soilers and two independent temperance candidates entered the lists.

Democratic divisions gave Whigs their anticipated advantage in many congressional races. Whigs carried twenty-seven of the state's thirty-three districts, compared to only eleven in 1852, and they won nine of those seats with pluralities smaller than the combined Democratic vote. Nonetheless, Whigs suffered considerable disarray, to which the Know Nothings contributed. At least five races saw rival Whigs competing against each other, and the total would have been six had not George W. Patterson, the Sewardites' nominee in the Chautauqua/Cattaraugus district, withdrawn and endorsed anti-Nebraska Soft incumbent Reuben Fenton, a future Republican governor, against Francis Edwards, the Silver Gray and Know Nothing candidate, who defeated Fenton. Disagreements over prohibition produced two Whig candidates in Long Island's first district, which was carried by a Democratic Know Nothing. In three districts, however, Know Nothings backed Whig challengers against regular Whig nominees, and in one, New York City's fifth district, Silver Gray and veteran nativist Know Nothing Thomas R. Whitney won the seat. In the Oneida district, finally, the incumbent Sewardite Orsamus Matteson faced a challenge from a Silver Grav who tripled the proportion of the vote won by Matteson's Silver Gray opponent in 1852, thereby reducing Matteson's share of the vote from 50 percent in 1852 to 38 percent in 1854.

Know Nothing influence spread far beyond these districts. Altogether, Know Nothings backed thirteen Whig candidates, eleven of whom were victorious. Incumbent Russell Sage of Troy was a Sewardite, but most of the others appear to have been Silver Grays, like Buffalo's Haven and Lockport's Thomas Flagler or prominent nativists who had probably joined the secret order. In addition, nine Softs and two Hards had Know Nothing backing; four of those Democrats won. In sum, the fifteen Know Nothing winners, four Democrats and eleven Whigs, almost matched the sixteen non-Know Nothing Whig victors.

The toll Know Nothings took on Whig voting strength, however, is best illuminated by popular voting percentages. New York's congressional districts can be divided into three categories: the eleven carried by Whigs whom Know Nothings endorsed and who thus got votes from Democratic members of the order; the sixteen carried by non-Know Nothing Whigs who were often opposed by Know Nothing Whig or Democratic rivals; and the six carried by Democrats, four of whom were themselves Know Nothings backed by Silver Gray insiders and outsiders. Victorious Whig Know Nothings averaged 58.1 percent of the vote, and in those districts Whigs' share of the vote on average increased by 12.4 percent between 1852 and 1854. In stark contrast, the share of the vote amassed by victorious non-Know Nothing Whigs averaged only 45 percent, a decrease of 0.1 percent between 1852 and 1854. Worst of all were Whig fortunes in the six districts carried by Democrats. In those districts, Whigs' mean share of the vote in 1854 was a pitiful 26 percent, on average an astounding 16 points lower than in 1852. Know Nothings, in short, shattered the normal voter alignment.¹¹²

Whigs from inside and outside New York, however, focused primarily on the stunning evidence of partisan fragmentation in the four-way gubernatorial race. The bitter election was a cliffhanger, and the final results were not known for several weeks. The prohibitionist Sewardite Whig Clark narrowly edged out the antiprohibitionist Soft Seymour, 156,804 (33.4 percent) to 156,495 (33.3 percent). The Hard Bronson ran last with a dismal 33,850 votes (7.2 percent). The big news was Ullmann's total of 122,282 (26 percent).

For at least three reasons, Ullmann's vote is not an accurate gauge of Know Nothing strength in New York. First, his nomination came so late that ballots for him could not be distributed throughout the state. Second, his correspondence indicates overwhelmingly that nonmembers supported him where Ullmann ballots were available. Third, Ullmann's friends and Sewardites both testified that some Know Nothings—how many is unknown—supported Clark rather than Ullmann because they thought Clark was a member and were suspicious of Ullmann's commitment to a Maine Law and his possible foreign birth. Nonetheless, even a quick glance at New York's 1852 presidential returns, when Winfield Scott got 235,000 votes, indicated both that the state's Whig party had been fractured and that Ullmann attracted considerable support from non-Whigs.

Modern statistical analysis confirms that conclusion. Whig voters from 1852 who turned out in 1854 divided almost evenly between Clark and Ullmann. Wet Whigs offended by Clark did not bolt to Seymour as predicted; instead, they either abstained or supported Ullmann. Whig divisions reflected intriguing splits among different Protestant denominations, but far more significant was the evidence that Know Nothings could attract new voters and Democrats, who constituted a third of Ullmann's vote, in much larger numbers than did Clark. That fact, as much as Silver Gray defection to Ullmann, made the Know Nothings a dangerous threat to the survival of the Whig party. 113

V

Know Nothings' dramatic success in New York, on top of their victories in Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, shocked observers in and outside the Empire State and instantly altered the calculations of Whigs everywhere. "The large vote for Ullmann reinvigorates the Silver Grey faction," moaned one of Seward's friends. "Who could have believed that K. N. fanaticism was so extensive and so well organized?" Conversely, Silver Grays in New York and their allies outside of it counted on that same discipline to stop Seward's reelection to the Senate when the new legislature met. New York's results indicated that Seward "is about to realize the fruits of his Catholic proclivities," chortled a Rhode Island conservative. "The greatest strength of Seward's influence in the State," chorused Baltimore's John P. Kennedy, "cannot cope with the antagonistic force of the Know Nothings and the National Whigs—which two seem to me to have sufficient affinities to make their combination hereafter inevitable." Even New York's defeated Democrats agreed that Know Nothings had "torn the Whig strength to pieces."

If Know Nothingism seemed to have gutted northern Whiggery, the harsh antislavery, antisouthern rhetoric adopted by many Whigs in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New York simultaneously seemed to preclude any further cooperation between them and Southerners. "The old parties, as National parties, are broken up, & their power gone," Pennsylvania's victorious James Pollock had concluded even before the Massachusetts and New York results came in. On election day in Massachusetts, one week after New Yorkers voted, Edward Everett, the Bay State's devoted unionist, glumly predicted that northern and southern Whigs could never again cooperate. The platform on which Clark carried New York was "purely sectional," and "the Whig party in the nonslaveholding states is completely abolitionized." Thus, Everett complained to Fillmore, the planned attempt by New York's Silver Grays to resurrect a "National Whig" organization in 1855 would prove stillborn. It was not just that fury against the Nebraska Act in the North "has strengthened the free-soil wing of the Whig party, at the expense of the Conservative wing." In addition, as North Carolina's William A. Graham wrote Fillmore, "Southern Whigs" regarded northern Whigs as "so infest[ed]" by "Abolitionism or Free soilism" that they welcomed their defeat.

Precisely this perception that cooperation between Northerners and Southerners within the Whig party was now impossible prompted Delaware's Clayton, with the blessing of Pennsylvania's Pollock, to promote a public American party to replace the Whigs as the "new national party" Conrad had called on Fillmore to help build in September. Sewardite Whigs from New York regarded Clayton's project as sheer fantasy, for they now believed that Northerners and Southerners who opposed Democrats could never cooperate in any common party. Others beyond Clayton's immediate circle of friends, however, were more sanguine. If Know Nothings would abandon their secrecy and especially if northern Know Nothings "assume a political position in harmony with the conservative National party of the South," that is, with southern Whigs, Kennedy concluded after seeing Know Nothing strength in New York, that party would carry the 1856 presidential election. 116

Fillmore and his numerous northern and southern Whig backers came to the same conclusion. Only after the results of the Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New York elections were clear did Fillmore and his conservative Whig allies decide to infiltrate the Know Nothing movement in order to convert it into the Union party they had sought since 1853—in some cases, indeed, since 1850. Fillmore's association with Know Nothingism, whose anti-Catholic and nativist bigotry Sewardites already despised, in turn, ensured that Seward, Weed, and their friends across the North would do all in their power, even to the point of abandoning the Whig party for a new "organization based on merely sectional issues," to defeat it. This titanic struggle lasted until the presidential election in November 1856. Even before 1856 began, however, the Whig party would be shattered into smithereens. Not even all the king's horses and all the king's men, let alone the few diehard Whig fossils who tried to do so, would be able to put it back together again.

Chapter 25

"Let, Then, the Whig Party Pass"

SOUTHERN WHIGS' "only chance" was now "a diversion—a change of names," South Carolina's George S. Bryan concluded two months before the North's crucial October and November elections. Northern Whigs' attacks "against our section" destroyed "the nationality of the Whig party" and rendered it impossible for southern Whigs "to maintain brotherly relations" with them. In the future, therefore, southern Whigs must tout "Fillmore & the Know Nothings—or whatever better than can be devised."

On seeing the returns from Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New York, John P. Kennedy agreed. Know Nothings could form the core of his long-sought Union party. "National Whigs" and Know Nothings must inevitably combine in New York and other northern states, and "the National Democrats of the North must seek their fellowship hereafter in the same combination." Their interest was to cooperate "with the conservative National party of the South," Kennedy maintained, for in Dixie, Know Nothing "sentiment is thoroughly National and will enlist the support of the whole Whig party and, I doubt not, the National democratic party also." Across the South, he added, those groups "constitute in sentiment and policy one party" that "looks with extraordinary unanimity to Mr. Fillmore" for 1856.²

Kennedy's dream appalled most northern Whigs. Furious that Know Nothing strength in the North's fall elections had "demonstrated that, by a majority, Roman Catholicism is feared more than American Slavery," they refused "to have the Whig organization broken up, or merged, into either Temperance or Know Nothing organizations." Nor would they surrender antislavery principles to propitiate southern Whigs. "True friends of Freedom," one snarled, must never again allow political cooperation between Northerners and Southerners. Only by intransigently rejecting cooperation with Southerners and reemphasizing their own antislavery, antisouthern credentials, not propitiating Know Nothings, insisted intransigent Sewardites like Orsamus Matteson, could northern Whigs prevent Free Soilers from seizing control of the fusion Republican movement that many of them now believed to be the North's only hope.

These dramatically divergent reactions to Know Nothings' success in 1854 outline the millstones between which the Whig party was ground to powder. Starting immediately in November and December 1854 and extending throughout 1855, most southern and conservative northern Whigs, led by Fillmore and his acolytes, abandoned the Whig organization and flocked to the Know Nothing order to convert it into a new bisectional Union party that could make Fillmore president. In response, northern Whigs of the Sewardite ilk, who continued to fear that Slave Power aggressions might succeed unless the North was rallied against them, declared "war" against Know Nothingism.⁵ Almost inevitably they gravitated toward the emerging Republican party in order to smash the nativists and to prevent Free Soil extremists from dominating it.

The odd men out in this reshuffling were a few die-hard Whig patricians typlifed by Edward Everett and Robert C. Winthrop of Massachusetts; Washington Hunt, Daniel D. Barnard, and Hamilton Fish of New York; Thomas Corwin of Ohio; James Pearce of Maryland; Georgia's Charles Jenkins; Kentucky Congressman William Preston; Virginia's William C. Rives; and William A. Graham and George E. Badger of North Carolina. Repulsed by Know Nothings' principles and personnel, appalled by the Republican party, and sickened as ever by the thought of cooperating with Democrats, these men fumed at their futility. They continued to hope that somehow, some way, the storm would pass and Whiggery could be revived.

Ι

"I am an individual Whig, but where is my party?" moaned Daniel Barnard, Albany's silk-stocking diehard, in late December 1854. "Where are the Whig elements that are to act in concert, with one leading faith, over the great length and breadth of this great country, to carry a Presidential election?" In New York, the state most pivotal to continued cooperation between northern and southern Whigs, "what calls itself the Whig party now . . . is just no Whig party at all. It has not one element of nationality in its whole composition; and it is the mere broken remnant of a party at that."

New York's November election propelled its long-feuding Silver Gray and Sewardite Whig factions to a permanent parting of the ways. Convinced that the results "have done more to break the back of the Weed & Seward faction than anything that has ever occurred" and opened the way for conservatives "to sweep the Union in '56," Silver Grays wondered only if they should "fight" Sewardites in the future "as 'National Whigs,' or as the 'American Party.' "To bring about a complete merger between Know Nothings and Silver Grays against the Sewardites, John T. Bush, now publisher of the Albany State Register, urged Fillmore that Silver Grays should cultivate Know Nothing leaders like Ullmann and James W. Barker, and "our papers should now defend this order and provoke as much denunciation of them, and Silver Gray Whigs jointly, from the Wooly organs, as possible."

Fillmore emphatically agreed with his New York henchmen. Previously dismissing Know Nothings as merely "a disturbing force," he had encouraged Silver Grays' proposed postelection National Whig convention as a device to compete for control of the state Whig organization. November's stunning results changed his mind. Since Sewardites could use state offices to fend off a conservative challenge and since so many Silver Grays had already defected to the Know Nothings in any event, he now viewed Know Nothings as "the best remedy for existing evils." Continued allegiance to the Whig party, in short, now struck Fillmore and his friends as a dead end, not a path to power. In early December, accordingly, Granger and other Silver Grays canceled the planned Albany conclave of conservatives, thereby signaling that National Whigs could no longer survive in the northern Whig party.

Ullmann's strong showing after his last-minute nomination simultaneously convinced Fillmore and his allies that Silver Grays could control the Know Nothing organization, which now offered a better vehicle than Whiggery for a conservative national party. Aware that Massachusetts' Edward Everett was "gloomy" about "the prospect for conservative Whigs," Fillmore assured him in mid-December "that Know Nothingism or Americanism is fast purging a political party from sectionalism and slavery agitation, and may lay the foundation of a party useful to the country and entirely national in its character." The Know Nothing order, he repeated to Virginia's Alexander H. H. Stuart, "presents the only chance of preserving a National party at the North" as well as "the only hope of forming a truly national party, which shall ignore the constant and disturbing agitation of slavery." For that reason, "I give it my countenance."

Unmentioned in Fillmore's letters was what others had been saying for months. What one called "the resistless Know Nothing element" could also be "useful" in making Fillmore president once again. That prospect, rather than a sudden conversion to nativism, spurred their sudden appreciation of the secret order. Unlike conservative Whigs from eastern New York, Fillmore had never condemned Catholics or immigrants. As a founder of New York's Antimasonic party, moreover, he abhorred the order's secrecy and agreed with Congressman Solomon G. Haven that its initiation rituals were "puerile." Nonetheless, since Fillmore also agreed with Haven "that the material could be worked (perhaps usefully) into a national fabrick which should be of service," he now discovered virtues even in nativism and secrecy. With Seward's pro-Catholic and proimmigrant proclivities clearly in mind, Fillmore told Stuart that Know Nothingism could "take away the inducement for demagogues, of both parties, to pander to the foreign vote and corruptly chaffer for its purchase at every election." Aware, too, of conservatives' inability to pry New York's Whig organization from Weed's grip, he touted the order's secret selection of candidates in lodges as an antidote to the "fraud and bribery" and the "disorderly and riotous" behavior that had prevented "respectable gentlemen" from attending Whigs primary meetings. For all these reasons, Fillmore concluded, "the KNs are the best remedy for existing evils "12

Once New York's returns were in, therefore, Fillmore pressed his New York Whig allies to join Know Nothing lodges if they had not already done so. Fillmore and Kennedy also bombarded conservative Whigs elsewhere like Everett, Robert C. Winthrop, and Virginia's Stuart, with imprecations to give up on Whiggery and convert to Know Nothingism. While Fillmore and Kennedy privately lobbied Whigs to switch to Know Nothingism, New York's Silver Grays publicly announced their abandonment of Whiggery. In January 1855, the Albany State Register, New York's flagship Silver Gray organ since 1850, asserted that there was no longer a Whig party in either the South or the North. Discounting "men who claim to be Whig leaders and masters of ceremonies [i.e., Sewardites]," it asked, "Whether there is in sober truth any such thing as a Whig party embracing Whig masses? An organization based upon Whig principles, advocating a Whig policy?" Both the Whig and the Democratic parties "have become practically obsolete . . . [and] are broken into irreconcilable fragments." Since New York's Whig organization had become "a mere abolition party, its leaders abolitionists, a mere sectional party," the old Whig party was "dead" and could never "be galvanized into a new existence." "Instead of all this foolish talk about the Whig party and the Locofoco party," concluded editor Samuel H. Hammond, "why not step out independent American men, kicking away these old party fetters that have so long been rusting into the flesh, . . . and gather on a broad American platform?"

II

Whether public or private, these arguments sought to surmount a series of interrelated obstacles that Fillmore and his advisors confronted once they decided to cross the Rubicon and leave the Whig organization. Most basically, by casting his lot with the Know Nothings in anticipation of riding the nativist wave into the White House in 1856, Fillmore instantly acquired a personal stake in making sure that wave did not ebb. To help secure Know Nothings' continued success at the polls, he had to persuade as many Whigs as possible to join him in abandoning ship and supporting Know Nothing, not Whig, candidates in 1855. New England's spring elections would be his first target, but far more important were southern contests later that year since Southerners were critical to his presidential aspirations.

Continued Know Nothing success, however, would not benefit him unless he cleared additional hurdles. For one, whatever Kennedy and other Fillmore lieutenants said about Know Nothings' preference for Fillmore's presidential candidacy in 1856 and about the order's potential to become the long-sought Union party, Know Nothing strength in 1854 primarily reflected intense anti-Catholic, anti-foreign, and antiparty resentments. Populistic nativists would not necessarily look kindly on the intrusion of seasoned pols like Fillmore's friends or on the candidacy of a nonmember like Fillmore, who had never publicly expressed any anti-Catholic or nativist sentiments. Original Know Nothings, in sum, must be reassured that Fillmore shared their agenda.

Fillmore could not do so publicly, however. He knew that hundreds, perhaps thousands, of Whigs like Everett and Winthrop reviled the anti-elitist demagoguery, secrecy, and anti-Catholic bigotry of Know Nothings and were "vehement in [their] denunciation" of the order. An open embrace of Know Nothingism would simply discredit Fillmore with such men, not encourage the conversions he needed. Any public endorsement of Know Nothing principles, moreover, would shatter Fillmore's calculated pose of noninvolvement in political affairs and expose his ambition for the presidency.

Fillmore, therefore, moved privately on two fronts to reassure nativists. In early January 1855 he sent a confidential letter to Isaac Newton, a Philadelphia Know Nothing and former Whig, who had worked for Stuart in the Interior Department during Fillmore's presidency. Fillmore instructed Newton to circulate it among Pennsylvania's Know Nothings, but he insisted that the letter must not be published. In it he denounced "the corrupting influence which the contest for the foreign vote is exciting upon our elections," deplored the perversion of "the ballot-box—that great paladium of our liberty—into an unmeaning mockery, where the rights of native-born citizens are voted away by those who blindly follow their mercenary and selfish leaders," and protested "the large disproportion of offices which are now held by foreigners at home and abroad." All this, he declared, caused the cheeks of every "true-hearted American" to "tingle with shame and mortification." Thus it was time for "our country to be governed by American-born citizens."

More delicate was the matter of whether Fillmore should personally join the Know Nothing fraternity. Originally, Fillmore and his friends like former Postmaster General Nathan K. Hall hoped that he would not have to demean himself by doing so. They relied implicitly, however, on the advice of Haven, who sought opinions from other Know Nothing congressmen in Washington during December and January. Haven initially advised against Fillmore's joining. Know Nothings, he wrote, would make no presidential nomination until mid-1856, and every lodge in the country would know it within ten days if Fillmore did join, thus effectively throwing his hat in the presidential ring. No one in Fillmore's inner circle wanted his name "hawked about" as a presidential contender until 1856, and they encouraged Fillmore to make an extended trip to Europe that would keep him out of the country, and out of the public eye, from May 1855 until June 1856. By mid-January, however, Haven became convinced that Know Nothings would nominate no one but an insider. Thus he arranged for Fillmore's private induction into the order at Fillmore's Buffalo home in late January 1855.

Both Fillmore's letter to Newton and his initiation also addressed two far more serious problems hindering his objectives. And it was these, more than anything else, that caused Fillmore and Kennedy to press conservative Whigs to ignore their disdain for Know Nothings and follow them into the nativists' camp. First, after November 1854, Fillmore was not the only ambitious politico who realized that Know Nothings might elect the next president. Fillmore therefore sought to outmaneuver potential competitors for Know Nothings' nomination.

Fillmore became a Know Nothing and sent his letter to Newton to neutralize those threats. Since New York's Know Nothings insisted upon retaining their secrecy and rejected pleas by John M. Clayton for open action, Fillmore and his managers calculated that insiders who belonged to the order, rather than outsider fellow travelers, would name the nativists' candidate from among their midst. That calculation clearly influenced his letter to Pennsylvania's Newton since he and his managers especially feared the popularity of Delaware's Clayton among nativists. To hedge their bets on the secret order's control of the nomination, however, Kennedy, the co-manager of Fillmore's presidential campaign along with Haven, never joined a Know Nothing lodge so that he could maintain his credibility with men who wanted to jettison the Whig party for a new bisectional nativist party but who vehemently rejected secrecy.¹⁸

The same tactics could also stymie another outsider who hoped to ride the anti-Catholic, antiparty eruption into the White House—Supreme Court Justice John McLean. Possibly the only man in antebellum America whose thirst for the presidency was as unquenchable as Daniel Webster's, McLean had flirted with the Antimasonic nomination in 1832, bid for the Whig nomination in 1836, and orchestrated a concerted effort for the party's 1848 laurels by presenting himself as a No Party reformer. Now he saw the antiparty, antipolitician, clean-government impulse behind Know Nothingism as the perfect opportunity to achieve his long-sought goal. After the 1854 returns came in, McLean obsequiously showered letters on Know Nothings in New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan, praising their organization as "the party of the people" that could save the government from "cliques," "demagogues," and "political traders and gamesters," and warning them to "suffer not the political hacks of any party to enter into your organization or to control your action." That advice, if heeded, could certainly have checked Fillmore, but by joining the order, when McLean himself did not, Fillmore might trump McLean's bid for the Know Nothings' favor.¹⁹

Fillmore could outflank outsider Whigs by joining the order but not Democratic hopefuls who also became Know Nothings. By far the most prominent of these in the winter of 1854–55 was Texas' famous Senator Sam Houston. Houston aroused enormous enthusiasm among Democratic Know Nothings, whose support had to be retained if Know Nothings were to elect a president. He was also extraordinarily popular among anti-Nebraska Democrats in the North who were not members, for Houston had opposed the Nebraska Act. Fillmore might compete for Democratic/Know Nothing support by renouncing the Whig party, as he did privately and Hammond did publicly in his Albany State Register manifesto, but Fillmore's best hope against Houston—and against New York's George Law, who later emerged as Fillmore's primary Democratic challenger for the Know Nothing nomination—was to make sure that former Whigs outnumbered former Democrats among Know Nothings. That was a major reason why he urged conservative Whigs to join the order after the 1854 elections.²⁰

It was not, however, the most important reason. Fillmore sought reelection in 1856 primarily because he sincerely believed that the renewed sectional agitation over the Nebraska Act endangered the Union and that he offered the best hope of rallying a bisectional Union party that could save it. Southern Democrats who pressured Douglas and Pierce into renouncing their party's 1852 platform pledges had to be driven from office, but so too did anti-Nebraska Whigs who courted Free Soil support in 1854 by adopting vehemently antisouthern platforms or, even worse, by joining fusion and Republican coalitions. Only the Know Nothings now seemed capable of defeating all three political groups that menaced the Union, but that was true if—and only if—Know Nothings could be converted into a bisectional Union party that, in both the North and the South, would now "ignore the constant and distructing agitation of slavery." That task, in turn, seemed to require massive reinforcements by conservative Whigs who had thus far remained indifferent or hostile to the Know Nothings' anti-Catholic, anti-immigrant crusade.

Specifically, Fillmore needed additional conservative Whig infusions into Know Nothing ranks to accomplish three critical political goals. First, to defeat southern Democrats and to make sure that southern Know Nothings supported his own nomination for president, Fillmore had to persuade southern Whigs, many of whom despised the secrecy, bigotry, and proscriptiveness of Know Nothings, to abandon the old party and join the nativists. At the same time, he had to bring southern Whigs on board without driving Democratic Know Nothings out of the order, for unionist Whigs and Democrats must combine to carry traditionally Democratic slave states. During December and January, therefore, Fillmore and Haven were already deeply involved in advising Whigs from Virginia, the first slave state to vote in 1855, not to do anything that offended Democrats in the order and thereby jeopardized Know Nothing chances of winning the May gubernatorial and congressional elections.²¹

Fillmore realized, however, that Know Nothing success in the South ultimately depended upon achieving two other goals in the North, both of which required converting more conservative northern Whigs to Know Nothingism. To convince southern Whigs, upon whom his hope for the presidency had always rested, to follow him into the Know Nothing party, Fillmore and his inner circle had, first, to demonstrate that in the North genuine conservatives who would "ignore" antislavery agitation, rather than anti-Nebraska zealots, controlled Know Nothing machinery. For this reason, among others, they planned to "exclude the Nebraska bill and the temperance question from discussion in the paper" when the State Register was converted to a Know Nothing organ, but they also required help from hostile conservatives outside New York like Everett and Winthrop to displace antislavery men from power in the order. Kennedy told a New York Know Nothing in February 1855, for example, that he must "impress upon the association in New York and all north of it" that to achieve success the order must "declare and show itself to be thoroughly national. Its whole virtue as a supreme political agency depends upon its sober—I may say religious—determination to crush all mischievous sectionalism which is now struggling for ascendancy in American politics."22

Second, Fillmore and his boosters had to show that northern Know Nothings who eschewed attacks on the South could in fact carry elections in 1855 against both northern Democrats, who defended the Nebraska Act, and anti-Nebraska parties, whether Whig or Republican, that engaged in South bashing to win northern votes. Unless they could do both, southern Whigs might shun Fillmore's new vehicle and turn instead to the southern-oriented Democrats themselves as the best way to check South bashers in the North. To win in the North, and thereby help Know Nothings in the South, as many reliable National northern Whigs as possible had to aid the Know Nothing cause.

Ш

In 1855 these three tasks—attracting more southern Whigs to Know Nothingism without alienating Democratic Know Nothings, ensuring that conservative Whigs controlled northern Know Nothing parties, and winning northern elections without attacking the South—preoccupied Fillmore and, after he departed for Europe, his inner circle of advisors. All ultimately proved beyond their power to accomplish. Know Nothingism could not be harnessed by any single group, and its performance at the polls that year owed little if anything to Fillmore's agenda. At the same time, events continued to inflame sectional antagonism. As a result, northern anti-Nebraska Know Nothings refused to cease antisouthern agitation, while anti-Nebraska Whigs, Democrats, and Free Soilers outside the order strained every nerve to crush it. This ferocious battle between pro-Know Nothing and anti-Know Nothing Whigs nearly obliterated what remained of northern Whiggery.

In the South most, but never all, Whigs backed Know Nothing or American candidates in 1855, yet their conversion owed little to Fillmore's efforts or to his potential presidential candidacy. And it drove most Democrats who had joined the order in 1854, when few elections were held in the slave states, back to their former party. Reduced essentially to a shrunken Whig base, southern Know Nothing parties did not prove nearly as powerful as the effusive Kennedy predicted. Southern Whig conversions to Know Nothingism instead produced two results: the decimation of the southern Whig party and a sectional split among Know Nothings at a national council meeting in June 1855 that eerily resembled the rancorous Whig national convention of June 1852.

Control of Whig state organizations in New York by Sewardites and by even more rabidly antisouthern men in Vermont, Pennsylvania, and the Midwest drove Fillmore and Silver Grays out of the Whig party toward the Know Nothings. Yet they could not escape conflict with antislavery men by fleeing to the nativist order. Though a few conservative Whigs joined the Know Nothings in the Midwest, Fillmore lacked leverage over the ex-Whig leaders who engineered Know Nothing participation in the anti-Nebraska fusion movements in Wisconsin, Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, and several congressional districts in Illinois. Rather than ignoring slavery to facilitate cooperation with Southerners and to convert Know Nothingism into a national Union party, for example, John Defrees, Godlove Orth, and Schuyler Colfax, the Indiana Whigs who skillfully manipulated Know Nothingism to gain control of Indiana's People's party and who hoped to "preserve the nationality of our order," would do so only "if it can be done without a sacrifice of principle." Throughout the spring of 1855 they insisted that both "a strong Anti-Slavery feeling" and "a strong American feeling...must be preserved & united if possible, else both go by the board."23

Ohio's Whig/Know Nothings even more adamantly resisted renunciation of open opposition to slavery extension. No presidential candidate from a slave state would do, Lew Campbell angrily told Schouler when he boomed Kentucky's Garrett Davis. At the mere hint of that, "the influence of Greeley & [Gamaliel] Bailey & co. will destroy the K. N. element." For Know Nothingism to remain viable in the Midwest, it must remain an avowedly anti-Nebraska, anti-Slave Power party. Men with such beliefs were hardly prepared to abdicate antislavery agitation, as Fillmore wished.²⁴

More important, at the start of 1855 the tenor of Know Nothingism in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and New York had to give southern Whigs pause. Many of their victorious gubernatorial and congressional candidates who had been identified by newspapers as Know Nothings ran vehemently antisouthern campaigns. The first tests of Fillmore's effort to demonstrate conservatives' control of northern Know Nothingism, therefore, were senatorial elections scheduled for the early months of 1855 in all three of those key states. To entice southern Whigs to combine with Know Nothings, northern Know Nothing state legislators must elect conservatives to the Senate. As Haven told Fillmore in December, the election of "a national man" from Massachusetts like Julius Rockwell, Winthrop, or Rufus Choate, each of whom indignantly refused to have anything to do with Know

Nothingism, but especially Seward's defeat by Know Nothings in New York's legislature, "would open up a nice future for our folks." "The Order would be hailed everywhere as having accomplished a great work," and "the South would no longer be restrained if that were to happen."²⁵

It was not to be. Know Nothings dominated the Pennsylvania legislature, yet no acceptable conservative candidate for the Senate emerged there. Conservative Whig incumbent James Cooper was never considered, even though he courted Know Nothing support. Instead, a three-way race split the Know Nothing caucus among two avowedly anti-Nebraska Whigs who would be anathema to Southerners: ex-Governor William F. Johnston and Andrew Curtin, the Whig state chairman who had written the antislavery Whig address in July 1854, and the opportunistic Democrat Simon Cameron, who joined the order after the October elections to advance his senatorial ambitions. Residual jealousies between ex-Whigs and ex-Democrats in Know Nothing ranks and a strenuous lobbying campaign against Cameron by the fervently antislavery Whig-Know Nothing Thaddeus Stevens prevented any selection whatsoever. The only solace Fillmore and his friends could derive from Pennsylvania was that no one offensive to the South had been named.²⁷

Results from Massachusetts were far grimmer from Fillmore's perspective. Not only did its Know Nothing legislature pass resolutions demanding repeal of the Nebraska and Fugitive Slave Acts, but, for the remaining three years of Everett's Senate term, it elected Free Soiler Henry Wilson, who had become a Know Nothing only after his efforts to lure Massachusetts Whigs into a new Republican coalition aborted. Everett, who predicted Wilson's election from the moment Know Nothings swept the state, mourned his triumph as an indication that in the North "there is a great increase in antislavery feeling," while "conservative views are paralyzed." Winthrop, who adamantly spurned Kennedy's pleas to cooperate with Know Nothings, saw Wilson's victory as a signal that southern Whigs must not abandon the party for Know Nothingism. "I hope our Southern friends understand what Massachusetts Know Nothingism is," he growled.²⁸

Of far greater consequence to Fillmorites and southern Whigs was the New York contest over Seward's Senate seat. By the end of 1854, Seward was in a curious position. On the one hand, his refusal to abandon the Whig party that year and his insistence on holding out olive branches to southern Whigs earned him contempt from Free Soilers and other Northerners intent upon building a new antislavery fusion organization. On the other, his moderation failed to mitigate the hatred of Silver Grays and the suspicion of southern Whigs, who still regarded him as the North's preeminent antislavery Whig. Consequently, Seward's defeat was considered essential to the success of southern Know Nothingism. "It will hurt us greatly in this part of the country if he should be elected by 'Know Nothing' votes,' North Carolina's Whig/Know Nothing Kenneth Rayner warned New York's Ullmann in January. "For God's sake, have him defeated, if possible." 29

Seward was certainly New York's preeminent Whig politician, and Weed had tried to preserve the Whig organization intact in 1854 primarily to ensure Seward's reelection. On paper that task seemed easy. Along with capturing the governorship and the vast majority of congressional seats in November 1854, New York's Whigs won overwhelming majorities in both houses of the state legislature. The problem, of course, was that some of those successful Whigs were Know Nothings, and both committed nativists among the Know Nothings and Silver Grays who had joined them to vent displeasure with the Whig ticket pledged to stop Seward. So widely known was the intention of Know Nothings and Silver Grays to use "every means their conceivable meanness can invent to defeat" Seward that Democrats crowed about the "division within the Whig ranks," while out-of-state Whigs like Rhode Island's John O. Charles and Pennsylvania's Edward McPherson predicted that Seward's "imprudent" hostility to nativism ensured his defeat. Seward himself was so pessimistic that on Christmas Eve he wrote Weed volunteering to decline reelection to help the Whig cause, an offer Weed emphatically rejected.

Three things, in fact, operated against the Know Nothings and to Seward's advantage in the senatorial contest. First, whereas Silver Grays, Know Nothings, and Democrats could agree on opposing Seward, they could not agree on a common champion, and by late January. Haven had concluded that, without a consensus candidate of their own, the Know Nothings' only hope was to postpone the senatorial election until the next legislature.³³ Second, Seward had support outside of straight Whig ranks. In some districts Sewardite Whigs helped elect Democrats in exchange for their pledges to support Seward's reelection. More important, Know Nothings' ability to stop Seward depended on disciplined cohesion within their ranks. Yet some of the Whig/Know Nothing legislators were Sewardites who intended to vote for the incumbent if they could do so without being expelled from the order.³⁴ Third, and most important, loyal Weed Whigs controlled both the governorship and the canal board, and thus they had the patronage resources to woo even the most inveterate Silver Gray and Know Nothing legislators into Seward's camp. "Clark, by all consent, is a miserable man," whined Barnard in late January. "The offices are held for sale." Three days before the crucial vote, E. R. Jewett, a prominent Silver Gray leader, dejectedly predicted Seward's election because Clark refused to make any appointments until after the Senate election. "This unites all applicants and their friends in his [Seward's] behalf, who act as if the zeal they manifest is to be the criterion of their claims."35

These factors combined to return Seward to the Senate on February 6 with 87 of 160 votes. By one estimate, twenty-nine of thirty-six Whig/Know Nothings voted for Seward, while only seven held out against him. It was a crushing blow to Fillmore's plans and to Know Nothings' hopes. Sewardite Whigs were quick to celebrate Seward's victory—significantly, not as an elixir for the Whig party, but as poison for Know Nothingism. "Hindooism in New York has met with an Artic [sic] calamity—the beak is too far below the water line to have any hope for the craft," crowed one. "Your election yesterday will carry consternation into the camp of 'Sam,' " echoed another, "and from it may be dated his decline." Such exultant gibes were wildly premature. The supposedly obtuse Myron Clark came closer to the mark when he warned Seward that, because "there is still so much of the spirit of vandalism or 'Hindooism', such a fever or rage for some new organization, or a breaking up of the old ones amongst us," even Seward's reelection had failed to insulate the Whig party from danger. "

Rather than permanently slowing Know Nothing momentum, Seward's reelection instead had a paradoxical impact on the rival Whig camps that had fought over it. By indicating that Sewardite Whigs could run New York's state government even without the help of Silver Grays, it encouraged Sewardites' hopes that the New York Whig party, and with it the northern Whig party, might continue to be a viable political force. Thus it delayed, if only for a few months, any serious consideration by New York's remaining Whigs about joining the antislavery fusion movement that was mushrooming elsewhere. Yet Seward, Weed, and other leaders of the truncated New York Whig party were as hardheadedly realistic as any leaders the Whig party ever produced. Given the "rage for some new organization, or a breaking up of the old ones amongst us," they knew that the acid test of northern Whiggery's survival was the ability of northern Whigs outside of New York to emulate their performance by defeating Democrats, Know Nothings, and Republicans in 1855. Simultaneously, Seward's victory meant that, at least until the next New York election in November 1855. Fillmore and his conservative Whig allies must also look beyond New York for evidence to persuade southern Whigs that northern Know Nothings were controlled by conservatives who, by abjuring agitation of the slavery issue, could defeat both pro-Nebraska Democrats and anti-Nebraska forces, whether Whig, Republican, or Know Nothing. Pro- and anti-Know Nothing New York Whigs, moreover, looked to exactly the same place for the evidence they needed. And both were sorely chagrined by what occurred in New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Connecticut that spring.

IV

Tiny Rhode Island clearly disappointed those who hoped to preserve the Whig party, but it hardly fulfilled Fillmore's wishes. With the Nebraska question neutralized by Rhode Island Democrats' anti-Nebraska votes in Congress, attention focused on whether its Whigs, who had ended a skein of Democratic victories by electing William Hoppin governor and capturing the legislature in 1854, would merge with Know Nothings in the gubernatorial and congressional races.³⁸ Deploring the rush of good Whigs into the Know Nothing order, the Providence Journal considered even certain defeat on a straight Whig ticket "no sufficient reason why we should abandon our party" and praised those Whigs "who have not been seduced into new combinations, and who are not ashamed of the name, the principles, or the organization of Whigs."

The majority of Rhode Island's Whigs were so seduced, however, and Governor Hoppin, who apparently joined the order before the end of 1854, led them. A Whig convention renominated Hoppin in March, but Know Nothings then immediately named him as their own candidate. Adding over 1,300 votes to his 1854 total, Hoppin crushed his Democratic opponent, a vociferous critic of Know Nothingism, with 81.5 percent of the vote, compared to 58.4 percent in 1854. Know Nothings also overwhelmingly won both House seats, appropriating Whig candidate Nathaniel Durfee in the first district and popular anti-Nebraska Democratic incumbent Benjamin Thurston, whom Whigs dared not oppose, in the second.⁴⁰

Rhode Island, in sum, demonstrated that Whigs could not withstand the surging Know Nothing movement. But it hardly produced a Know Nothing movement purged of anti-Nebraska sentiment. Both congressmen-elect were anti-Nebraska men. Rhode Island's Know Nothings bolted the national council meeting in June 1855 when it failed to condemn the Nebraska measure. And Hoppin won reelection again in April 1856 as a joint American and Republican candidate. By April 1855, however, it was clear that the Whig party had effectively ceased operation in another northern state.

New Hampshire and Connecticut also heralded the Whig party's demise, but they gave even less solace to Fillmore than to Seward and Weed. Rather than providing unionist ballast to the soaring Know Nothing movement, as Fillmore hoped, many conservative Whigs in both states, like their counterparts in Maine and Massachusetts, clung to the crumbling Whig party that Fillmore abandoned or sat out the election, thereby forfeiting leadership of Know Nothings to others. Many antislavery Whigs, the men most likely to follow Seward's lead on sectional issues, also refused to abandon Whiggery. Their stubbornness may have temporarily gratified the New Yorkers, but the thrashing that holdout Whigs received at the hands of Know Nothings quickly chastened them.

New Hampshire's politics were complicated because the existing Democratic, Whig, and Free Soil parties, following custom, all nominated gubernatorial candidates in the summer of 1854, months before the March 1855 election and months before the Know Nothing frenzy swept the state. A singular fact none-theless emphasized Know Nothings' power. Both incumbent Democratic Governor Nathaniel Baker, whom Democrats renominated for 1855, and Whig candidate James Bell, who had lost to Baker in 1854, joined Know Nothing lodges before the end of that year in hopes of their endorsement. Anti-Nebraska Democrats, who wanted to repudiate Pierce's administration, and Free Soilers also rushed into the order. So headlong was politicos' flight into the secret society that the Websterite Whig Boston Courier complained that Whigs and Free Soilers "virtually disbanded themselves" to whore after Know Nothing support, while the pro-Pierce Democratic Concord New Hampshire Patriot warned that Know Nothings were controlled by the "log-rolling and wire-pulling ambitionists of the whig and freesoil fusion party." "

Antislavery men dominated New Hampshire's Know Nothing party, and, ignoring Baker and Bell, they nominated Ralph Metcalf, an anti-Nebraska and anti-Pierce Democrat, for governor because, as the Free Soiler John P. Hale explained, they wanted the help of anti-Nebraska Democrats in electing "two Senators of the right stamp to the next Congress from New Hampshire." In the state's three congressional districts, the various foes of the administration—Whigs, Free Soilers, anti-Nebraska Democrats, and Know Nothings—held separate conventions to choose candidates. Nonetheless, all opposition groups ended up agreeing on common candidates, all three of whom were Know Nothings. All these Know Nothing candidates, as well as Know Nothing legislators, swept to decisive victories, thus ending Democrats' decades-long domination of New Hampshire.

The gubernatorial race best demonstrates how Know Nothings decimated Whiggery and absorbed Free Soilers, precisely the group Fillmore did not want in the new party. Metcalf won with 32,783 votes (50.7 percent), and Baker, whose vote dropped by 2,700 since 1854, polled 27,055 (41.8 percent). Far more striking, the Free Soil vote plummeted by almost 90 percent between 1854 and 1855, and statistical estimates suggest that almost all of the defectors, many of whom were Whigs attracted by Jared Perkins' candidacy in 1854, went Know Nothing in 1855. Just as dramatically, the Whig Bell's total dropped from 17,028 (29.4) percent) in 1854 to 3,436 (5.3 percent) in 1855. Three-fourths of New Hampshire's Whigs had decamped to the Know Nothings, and Bell himself had decamped with them.⁴⁴

Observers outside the state quickly recognized the implications of Free Soilers' and Whigs' absorption into New Hampshire's Know Nothing party. Indiana's Schuyler Colfax, who wanted all anti-Nebraska men to rally behind the Know Nothing, not the Whig or Republican, banner, rejoiced that Know Nothings' sweep meant that New Hampshire would send Hale back to the Senate, as indeed the legislature did in June. That act, along with Wilson's election in Massachusetts, Colfax exulted, "will show Anti-Slavery men that the indiscriminate attacks [on Know Nothingism] of the [National] Era & Tribune are unjust as well as mistaken." New Hampshire's Know Nothing party, in short, represented exactly what neither Fillmore nor Seward wanted. Clearly, New Hampshire Know Nothings were not potential Fillmore men; just as clearly, Seward and Weed knew by June that Whiggery was dead in the Granite State, and that, as elsewhere, its antislavery Whigs now sought to join the new Republican party.

Know Nothings also decimated Whiggery as an independent force in Connecticut. Free Soilers and Maine Law men futilely warned that "the cause of Liberty and Temperance'' would be "swallowed up by the 'one idea' that Roman Catholicism is the great bugbear and the only question that interests the freemen of this country." To no avail, staunch old-line antislavery Whigs like ex-Senator Roger Sherman Baldwin and his sons also protested against any Whig fusion with the nativists. Two weeks before the April election, Baldwin's shrewd wife, Emily, ruefully admitted that Know Nothings had infiltrated most Whig meetings and "draw more from the whig ranks than any other." The day after Know Nothings swept the April gubernatorial, legislative, and congressional elections, reducing staunchly anti-Nebraska Whig incumbent Governor Henry Dutton, whom Free Soilers endorsed in 1855, to a mere 14 percent of the vote and putting virtual nonentities rather than veteran Whig politicos in Congress, she reported accurately that "the present result of this new party is to break up the Whig influence and to put forward an entire set of new men." Anti-Nebraska Democrat Gideon Welles, who detested the bigotry and proscriptiveness of Know Nothings, agreed: "Our election has resulted in a rout & break up of the old parties."

V

New England's spring elections and the winter's senatorial selections punctuated two developments begun in the fall of 1854: the fragmentation of the anti-Democratic vote and the Whig party's irreversible dissolution. As shrewd observers recognized, those developments also indicated that pro- and anti-Know Nothing Whigs could largely determine whether, and on what basis, anti-Democratic elements might combine for the 1856 presidential race. By the spring of 1855, indeed, virtually every political leader's calculations explicitly or implicitly revolved around that impending presidential contest. And to shape its outcome, two battles among Whigs raged simultaneously for the remainder of 1855: one between anti- and pro-Know Nothing Whigs over the nature of the new anti-Democratic party; and one between anti-Nebraska Whig/Know Nothings and Fillmorite conservatives for control of the Know Nothing organization. Tellingly, almost no protagonist in these fights suggested that the Whig party itself should or could survive.

Less obviously but just as significantly, the same developments in the winter and spring of 1855 suggested that southern Whigs might profoundly affect the outcome of both battles. The nature of New England's victorious Know Nothing coalitions set back Fillmore's hope of converting the nativist order into a Union party and decreased the likelihood that other northern conservatives would help displace antislavery men as Know Nothing leaders in the North. Thus Fillmore became all the more dependent on aid from Southerners in national gatherings of Know Nothings to accomplish his goals. Conversely, those who wanted to combine all northern antislavery men in a new Republican party would have welcomed an exodus of anti-Nebraska Whigs from the Know Nothings, but the spring results reduced the likelihood that such men could be pried away—unless Southerners did something that forced them from the order.

Even if northern anti-Nebraska Whig/Know Nothings could be weaned from the order, moreover, the fall and spring elections demonstrated indelibly that anti-Catholicism and nativism could not be ignored—let alone repudiated, as New York's Whig remnant appeared bent on doing—by any non-Know Nothing anti-Democratic coalition. Determined to focus the public's attention on the slavery issue, proponents of a Republican party lamented that nativism's strength in the spring "shows that we have lost the precedence, so far as New England is concerned." Many admitted as well "how idle it would be for us to hope to triumph in '56 in direct antagonism to the K[now] N[othings], as we should be with Seward for our leader & the Tribune for our oracle!" Midwestern Whigs like Indiana's Schuyler Colfax and Ohio's Lew Campbell, who sought to rally antiadministration men behind the Know Nothings and were convinced that no party that repudiated their anti-Catholic, antiforeign agenda could carry the North in 1856, also castigated New York Whigs' "insane course" that had "butchered up matters so as to have hatred where there should be fusion." Free Soil friends of Salmon Chase, who understood the necessity of including Know Nothings in any antislavery organization, and anti-Nebraska Democrats like Gideon Welles joined the cry and blamed Weed's and Seward's pigheaded decision to cling "to the Whig party too long" and to run a "strict Whig ticket" in New York for the disarray of the North's anti-Nebraska forces. Along with Sewardites' insistence upon running separate Whig tickets against anti-Nebraska Know Nothing coalitions in Connecticut and New Hampshire, fumed Free Soilers, that stubbornness showed "a persistent purpose not to let the old Whig party with all its history of Clay & Webster & Fillmore abominations die out." Only by overcoming "Whig stupidity," therefore, could a "union of all Anti Nebraska parties" be effected. 48

If almost all politicos recognized that Whiggery was doomed and that nativist sentiment could not be ignored, antislavery Whig/Know Nothings who wanted to perpetuate the nativist party, like Fillmore and his inner circle of Whig advisors, believed that most southern Whigs would join the American party. Throughout 1854 and the first half of 1855, moreover, most of them still expected to cooperate with their southern counterparts behind a common presidential candidate in 1856. Yet they also believed that Fillmore's nomination or the conversion of the nativist movement into a Union party that eschewed an anti-Nebraska platform would destroy Know Nothingism in the North by driving men like themselves from it and guaranteeing the opposition of antislavery outsiders to it. "'Sam' will be proslavery in all the slave states—but 'woe betide him' if the smell of that fire is on him in a free state," warned Indiana Whig Samuel W. Parker in May 1855. "The old codger's sons North and South will have to 'agree to disagree' on the Slavery question—or else be ground to powder." Since some southern Whigs had condemned the Nebraska Act before its passage and even more did so afterward, Indiana Whig/Know Nothing leaders like Colfax and Godlove Orth expected southern Know Nothings to tolerate a call for its repeal in a national platform. Others, notably Ohio's Campbell, were willing to avoid any antislavery statement in the expected platform from the Philadelphia national council meeting in June, so long as northern Know Nothings were left free to demand that repeal in their own states.⁴⁹

Further to build a bridge to Southerners in 1854-55, but also to stop them from fixing irrevocably on Fillmore as their presidential candidate, midwestern Whig/Know Nothings touted various southern Whig/Know Nothings who might be palatable to Northerners as possible nominees: Garrett Davis, Schouler's favorite; Tennessee's Whig Congressman William Cullom, who had voted against the Nebraska bill: Missouri's Edward Bates: and North Carolina's Kenneth Ravner, a prominent nativist, who had taken no public stand on the Nebraska issue. The important corollary point, however, is that anti-Nebraska Whig/Know Nothings sought utter control of northern Know Nothing organizations so that they could dictate to southern Know Nothings who could—but especially who could not—be the candidate if Southerners expected northern help in electing him. The refusal of Sewardite Whigs in New York and elsewhere to combine with them frustrated that objective by cracking the northern solidarity believed necessary to negotiate with Southerners from a position of strength and instead opened the possibility that some northern Know Nothings would back an unacceptable doughface.50

While picking the proper man to win the White House in 1856 was the ultimate objective of both Fillmorite conservatives and anti-Nebraska Whigs, both groups knew that their battle to control the Know Nothing organization could be determined by two interim contests, both of which might turn on what southern Know Nothings did. One was the election of the new speaker of the House when the Thirty-Fourth Congress met in December 1855, for, after the 1854 elections, antiadministration men expected to dominate that body. As early as the fall of 1854, therefore, jockeying began to shape a decision that would be made a full year later.

"The Speaker should be Whig," declared Indiana's Parker when endorsing Ohio's Lew Campbell, the favorite of Colfax and other midwestern Whig/Know Nothings who had cooperated with anti-Nebtaska fusion movements in 1854. During the winter of 1854–55, Campbell was also mentioned prominently in caucuses of anti-Nebraska congressmen that included anti-Know Nothing Sewardites, but so were Massachusetts' anti-Nebraska Democrat Nathaniel P. Banks, who was reelected as a Know Nothing in 1854, and Maine's Israel Washburn, Jr., the favorite of those promoting the Republicans as an alternative to Know Nothings. Expecting a dogfight, Campbell orchestrated a letter-writing campaign through Ohio's Whig/Know Nothing Congressman-elect Samuel Galloway in the spring of 1855 to line up support. Colfax arranged for the entire Indiana Know Nothing congressional delegation to operate as a unit for Campbell in December, and he promised that Michigan's Know Nothing/Republican congressmen would act with them.⁵¹

As potential rivals to these northern anti-Nebraska men, Know Nothings occasionally mentioned Southerners, but the man they most feared and the hope of the Fillmorite conservatives was Buffalo's Solomon G. Haven. After New England's spring elections, in fact, electing Haven speaker represented one of the two last chances Fillmorites had of demonstrating to southern Whigs that conservative Unionists, rather than antislavery zealots bent on repealing the Nebraska Act, controlled northern Know Nothing organizations.⁵² During the nine months Congress was out of session between March and December 1855, therefore, Haven, too, engaged in a vigorous correspondence campaign to line up support. Campbell and other northern opponents of Haven feverishly predicted that proadministration Democrats would back Haven to defeat more militant anti-Nebraska alternatives, but the conservatives understood from the start that Haven had no chance without considerable southern support.⁵³

What Southerners did could also determine the outcome of the Philadelphia national council meeting in June 1855, the second contest that might determine the future direction of Know Nothingism and thus the future course of Whigs inside and outside the order. Even if that meeting retained the order's secrecy, it was expected to issue a public platform spelling out where the order stood on the slavery issue. Thus antislavery Whig-Know Nothings seeking to commit the order to repealing the Nebraska Act and conservatives hoping to quash sectional agitation struggled during the spring to control it. Only if antislavery New England Know Nothings attended the Philadelphia conclave, Indiana's Colfax wrote E. W. Jackson of Massachusetts, would be go, "so that we can make a demand that the anti-slavery sentiment of the North shall be respected & consulted in the National nomination."54 "Our order must & will be nationalized," insisted Kentucky's Garrett Davis in a typical southern reponse to that determination. The national council meeting must stress the order's "all-sacrificing devotion to the union," avoid any public statements on slavery, and thus "prevent the proscription of any man, or set of men, from sectional considerations."55

By late May 1855, however, the chief concern of those who wanted to ensure cooperation between northern and southern Know Nothings was not whether the council would openly condemn the Nebraska measure. It was, rather, that southern delegates might insist upon an avowedly proslavery, pro-Nebraska statement. A movement would be made at Philadelphia to give the order a "Southern" character, warned North Carolina's Kenneth Rayner, author of the order's third or "union" membership degree. One of Schouler's Massachusetts correspondents agreed in late May that "the great fear now is that, the South will go into the order so generally as to utterly swamp it, with a view to taking care still forever of their darling institution." "If this is done," he added, "the North must stand up resolutely against such tricks. We shall be better posted up after the Convention in Phila. in June."

Two elections outside of New England in the spring of 1855 heightened apprehensions of a sectional showdown at Philadelphia that might determine which Whigs entered and which Whigs left the Know Nothing movement. In March, the elections for a territorial legislature in Kansas inflamed the North. So-called border ruffians from Missouri poured into Kansas, stuffed ballot boxes with illegal votes, and secured a vehemently proslavery territorial legislature. This brazen violation of popular sovereignty undercut predictions that southern Whigs had repeated since the spring of 1854 "that slavery will never find its way into Nebraska" and caused Greeley, who was booming an anti-Know Nothing Republican party, to announce ominously in the Tribune that "an inevitable collision is before us, between the North and the South, on the question of Slavery Extension." To keep Greeley's Republican party from absorbing all northern antislavery voters, anti-Nebraska Whig/Know Nothings like Indiana's Orth and Colfax therefore redoubled their efforts to secure an explicit condemnation of slavery extension at Philadelphia.⁵⁸

If Kansas' March territorial election increased northern Whig/Know Nothings' insistence upon a repudiation of the Nebraska Act by the national council meeting, the results of Virginia's May gubernatorial and congressional contests ensured that southern Know Nothings would fight tooth and nail against it. Since Virginia was the first slave state to vote in 1855, it also provided the first test of Fillmore's ability to lure southern Whigs into the Know Nothing order. To most observers inside and outside the order, indeed, Virginia's was the pivotal southern election in 1855.

VI

During 1854, long before Fillmore decided that Know Nothingism was "the best remedy for existing evils," Southerners of all partisan varieties rushed into Know Nothing lodges in response to the same anti-Catholic, antiparty, and nativist impulses that fueled their growth in the North. Nonetheless, throughout the spring and summer, most southern Whig officeholders and editors ignored Know Nothingism and instead called for continued cooperation with their northern Whig counterparts. Some condemned the Nebraska Act as a foolish and needless insult to Northerners that "was in reality, what Northern Whigs regarded it, a Democratic trap to catch the South, and destroy the Whig party." Others, lamenting that any southern Whigs had opposed the measure, still argued that southern Whigs had far more in common with northern Whigs, despite their predictable disagreements over slavery, than they did with Democrats and that therefore the Whig organization must be preserved.⁵⁹

By discrediting the Whig name and organization in the eyes of Southerners, northern Whigs' anti-Nebraska campaigns in 1854 compelled most southern Whig leaders to abandon Whiggery and seek refuge in the new nativist movement. Southerners had little interest in the Nebraska measure since slavery could never exist in the two new territories, Charles Conrad told Fillmore in late December, "but the clamor that has been raised against it by the antislavery party" has "awakened a much stronger feeling in its favor and few even of those who were originally opposed to it, would now favor any attempt to repeal it." Thus, "any attempt to revive old party divisions [between Whigs and Democrats] will be abortive." For this reason, Conrad added, in Louisiana as in the rest of the South, "the Whig party has, more or less, merged in the 'Know Nothing' organization." 60

Not all southern Whigs upset by northern Whigs' antislavery stance saw Know Nothings as their best resort. Some self-proclaimed "old Henry Clay Whigs" gravitated toward the Democrats since northern Democrats, unlike northern Whigs, contained "a reputable number of union men, who will accord to the South their rights."61 Others preferred futile independence to joining any new party. And still others angrily declared Whiggery's survival as if their mere assertions could keep the party alive. "Is the Whig party to be dissolved or is it to preserve its organization?" asked a Kentucky editor in February 1855. Since "the two great parties, which have so long divided the American people and held sway alternately over the national administration, . . . are mutually dependent, and one cannot exist without the other," the Whig party must endure despite the rise of Know Nothingism. Know Nothings "tell us the Whig party is dead," echoed a Tennessee congressional candidate. "Fellow citizens, I do not believe them. Its winding sheet has been placed upon it by those who have an interest to get it out of the way. No! No! the Whig party is not dead, but only sleepeth, and when it arises from its slumbers and its lion voice is heard to roar through the land, it will frighten away all these little fellows who want to put it aside." More realistic was North Carolina's Whig Congressman John Kerr when he announced his candidacy for reelection in May 1855; "I am aware that the Whig party is now disbanded, but Whig principles and Whig measures are not on that account less dear to me."62

By May 1855, indeed, Know Nothings, now calling themselves the American party, had displaced Whiggery as Democrats' major opponent across Dixie. "I think the Whig party of the South is dissolved and the divisions of the parties for the immediate future will be Hindoo and Democrat," a Whig informed Seward from Louisville in late March, and two days later, Kentucky Democratic Congressman John C. Breckinridge concurred that Know Nothings had displaced Kentucky's Whigs and that whatever happened in 1855, "the Whigs will be unable to resume their position in the state, and we shall control it." The American party, glowed Knoxville's former Whig editor Parson Brownlow, an early Know Nothing enthusiast, would "swallow up all other parties" and remain "free from the trading, huckstering spirit of party, which has divided and distracted the Whig party." Since "old party lines of Whig and Democrat" had been "obliterated, and new ones drawn," agreed the Whig Greensboro, North Carolina, Patriot in May, Whigs must now rally behind the Know Nothings. "The Whig party has been divided, denationalized, and destroyed beyond all hope of resuscitation and reorganization," summarized Alabama's Democratic Senator Clement C. Clay in July. In most states, "the very name has perished, and not a banner bearing the Whig insignia flutters in the breeze."63

As elsewhere in the South, Know Nothing lodges mushroomed in Virginia, the South's largest and still most influential state, during the summer and fall of 1854 for reasons extraneous to the slavery issue or Millard Fillmore's designs. By the end of 1854 Know Nothing membership was estimated at 60,000 out of a total potential electorate of 170,000, and between one-third and two-fifths of those members were thought to be ex-Democrats.⁶⁴

Democratic strength in the order gave Virginia's Whigs pause about joining it, for they feared that Know Nothings would insist upon running ex-Democrats for governor and Congress to demonstrate their independence from Whiggery. The likelihood of this calculated freeze-out increased in December when Democrats nominated as their gubernatorial candidate Henry Wise, the erstwhile pro-Tyler Whig congressman who rejoined the Democracy after Whigs expelled Tyler from their party. A spellbinding speaker and acerbic debater who was chosen because he had written a withering anti-Know Nothing manifesto, the apostate Wise was anathema to many Democrats. Fearing that Know Nothings would run a Democrat for governor to attract anti-Wise Democratic voters, some Whigs vowed to shun the new party.⁶⁵

Even beyond Democratic influence in the organization, other aspects of Know Nothingism provoked mixed reactions from Virginia Whig leaders. Some abandoned Whiggery and joined the order enthusiastically, either because they agreed with its nativist agenda or because they saw in it an opportunity to jump-start long-stalled careers. When New Jersey Whig/Know Nothing editors arranged a public dinner in Newark to boom Richmond's John Minor Botts for president, for example, Botts told it that "if the Whig organization is to be broken up, it leaves no alternative for us but to choose between the two other parties, the Know Nothings on the one hand and the Good-for-Nothings on the other." Thus, he gladly joined the Know Nothing crusade against the Democrats. 4 widely circulated editorial by Vesparian Ellis in the Washington American Organ stating that Virginia's Know Nothings would nominate no one but full members of the order infuriated many Virginia Whigs, who vowed to vote against it solely because it proscribed outsiders.

In the winter of 1854–55, despite the rise of Know Nothingism within the state and the ferociously hostile antisouthern rhetoric of northern Whigs in the 1854 elections, in fact, many Virginia Whigs still hoped to preserve an independent Whig organization that could cooperate with, but resist absorption by, the Know Nothings. Foremost among these was Staunton's Alexander H. H. Stuart, Fillmore's former cabinet member, who expected a formal Whig gubernatorial nomination early in 1855, which, he hoped, Know Nothings would then endorse. Lacking a state committee to call a Whig convention, Whig editors from Richmond, Fredricksburg, Norfolk, Lynchburg, Petersburg, Charlottesville, and Staunton decided instead to boom Stuart as the Whig candidate in their newspapers beginning in February. Whigs, and in particular Fillmore and Solomon Haven, worried, however, that by preempting the Know Nothings they might drive Democrats from the order and that Know Nothings might reject Stuart as an outsider. 68

The intervention by Fillmore and Haven stopped the separate Whig newspaper nomination of Stuart. It thereby effectively made the death of organized Whiggery in Virginia the price of cooperation with Know Nothings. One index of how much Whigs sacrificed by this bargain came from the concomitant congressional races. In 1853, Democrats carried all thirteen House seats when the demoralized Whigs contested only seven of them. In 1855, Know Nothings ran candidates in ten districts, yet only five of those men were former Whigs. And the two Know Nothing victors were both ex-Democrats.⁶⁹ Even Know Nothingism, that is, could not put a Virginia Whig in Congress.

Democrats also got Know Nothings' nominations for lieutenant governor and state attorney general, but their March state convention picked a Whig to run for governor. Unlike Stuart, or even Haven's preferred candidate, James Strother, whose prominence as Whigs may have alienated Democratic/Know Nothings from the ticket, Thomas S. Flournoy had not held public office since his single congressional term ended in March 1849. And that term had been notable for only one thing—Flournoy's membership in the Young Indians, who promoted Zachary Taylor's nomination as a No Party candidate against Henry Clay. Whatever his potential appeal to Democratic/Know Nothings and anti-Wise Democrats, Flournoy proved a poor choice for two reasons. First, after accepting the Know Nothings' nomination in a public letter that scathingly attacked Catholics and demanded their exclusion from office, he adamantly refused to campaign or make public speeches. This abdication left the field clear for Wise, Virginia's most compelling orator, who began to crisscross the state immediately after his December nomination lashing out at Know Nothings' intolerance and subversive secrecy.

Second, and of greater importance in terms of the election's impact beyond Virginia, both Flournoy and his Democratic running mate for lieutenant governor were vulnerable to attack as being hostile to slavery. A major thrust of Wise's campaign and those of many Democratic congressional candidates, indeed, was that northern Know Nothings' support for the election of Seward and Henry Wilson to the Senate proved that Virginia's Know Nothings had leagued themselves with abolitionist foes of the South. Virginia's Democrats, promised Wise, "will defend the state against agrarianism, free-soilism and abolitionism, now threatening to invade the South from Northern and non-slaveholding councils of Know Nothingism."

The belief that antislavery men dominated northern and especially New England Know Nothings also inhibited Virginia Whigs from joining the new party even when they sympathized with its nativist goals. Across the North, Rives warned a friend, a "strong anti-slavery feeling . . . has infused itself among them." Wilson's election in Massachusetts and Know Nothings' gubernatorial campaign in New Hampshire left "no doubt that in . . . all the New England States, it is strongly injected with the spirit of free-soilism & abolition." Hence, there was "very much . . . doubt whether the order can ever nationalize itself."

Despite such doubts and Flournoy's refusal to campaign, he still ran a respectable race against Wise, who won with 83,224 votes (53.2 percent) to Flournoy's 73,244 (46.8 percent). No previous election in Virginia had ever generated such a large turnout, and Flournoy ran almost 15,000 votes ahead of Scott in 1852 and 14,000 ahead of George Summers, the Whigs' gubernatorial candidate in 1851. While Vesparian Ellis angrily attributed the relatively narrow defeat to "the foreign vote introduced into Virginia since 1852 & now employed on the railroads in that State," most Whig/Know Nothings in Virginia and other slave states blamed the antislavery and abolitionist image of northern Know Nothings for undercutting Virginia Know Nothings' attempt to run as "a National Union Party." "The Whigs would not vote with the American party in many of the counties," David Campbell reported to his nephew, then president of Tennessee's Know Nothing state council, in a typical postmortem. "They were not prepared to join a party that was so little to be relied on in the free states." Foreigners had hurt Virginia's Know Nothings, reported Alabama's major Know Nothing newspaper, but they also "had another enemy to fight—Massachusetts." 72

Virginians voted on May 24, two weeks before the Know Nothings' national council was scheduled to meet in Philadelphia. By the end of May, Virginia's results had been telegraphed to other slave states with elections still to be held in August, October, or November and where Know Nothings fully—and accurately—expected a replay of Wise's attack on the antislavery virus infecting northern Know Nothingism unless something were done at Philadelphia to exterminate or expunge it. Southern delegates thus descended on the Know Nothing conclave determined to stop the kind of anti-Nebraska platform sought by Colfax, Pennsylvania's notorious William F. Johnston, and the Bay State's still more notorious Henry Wilson.

VII

By June 1855, in sum, the Whig party had already disintegrated in most states, but the Philadelphia Know Nothing national council meeting could go far to settle whether former Whigs from the North and South could cooperate with each other in the order and thus, indirectly, what options might be available to non- and anti-Know Nothing/Whigs. Original nativists like James W. Barker, the Know Nothings' national president, and important Whig/Know Nothings—Ohio's Campbell, Massachusetts Governor Henry Gardner, Kentucky's Garrett Davis, and North Carolina's Rayner, to name just four—hoped that the Philadelphia meeting could preserve intersectional comity by avoiding any controversial statement on slavery and focusing instead on the nativist program Know Nothings had in common. The odds, however, were very much against them. Jolted by Wise's victory in Virginia, most southern delegates vowed to demonstrate that New Englanders did not speak for the party on the slavery issue. The elevation of Free Soiler John P. Hale to the Senate by New Hampshire's Know Nothings while the council was meeting only intensified that determination.

Northern anti-Nebraska Whig/Know Nothings also confronted Fillmore's attempt to ignore slavery agitation in order to convert Know Nothingism into a Union party, although little evidence exists that Fillmore's inner circle sought to engineer the outcome at Philadelphia to achieve that goal.⁷³ The New York delegation, indeed, was led by Barker, who opposed Fillmore's presidential aspirations. 74 Nonetheless, Silver Grays had publicized that project, and in March the New York State Know Nothing council published a platform, written by Baltimore's John P. Kennedy, that portrayed the Americans as a national Union party. 75 Anti-Nebraska Know Nothings, in reply, threatened to have none of it. "The K. N. of the Free States will Bolt the Convention at Philadelphia if the[y] undertake to make a National Platform," vowed one of Weed's saboteurs in the order on May 30. "The course of affairs in Kansas will compell [sic] us to go for a restoration of the prohibition of slavery in Kansas and Nebraska." Henry Wilson wrote Schouler in mid-April. If he could not secure even a moderate antislavery platform at Philadelphia, he subsequently promised a friend, he "would blow their party to hell."76

Wilson thus became the lightening rod of a rancorous gathering that lasted from June 8 to June 15. Efforts of moderates like Rayner and Kentucky's Albert T. Burnley to keep peace failed totally, and they later railed at the "fools and demagogues" who "were trying to pervert the order into a great antislavery element in one section & a pro-slavery element in another section" for wrecking it. Feveral nonsectional questions also generated intense controversy. The council denied requests from Southerners and especially Louisianans that native-born Catholics be allowed to join the order, and the eighth section of its platform ringingly reaffirmed its hostility to Catholics. Delegates also debated whether the order should jettison its secrecy and rituals, an abandonment that the council eventually recommended to, but did not require of, "subordinate councils." Nonetheless, the assemblage quickly degenerated into an angry sectional melee.

Southerners immediately denounced the Massachusetts delegation and especially Wilson for their antislavery extremism, and Wilson retorted, "We intend to repeal the Fugitive Slave Act, and we mean that Kansas will never come into the Union as a slave State—no, never." The battle carried over into the platform committee, which delivered both a minority northern report calling for the restoration of the Missouri Compromise prohibition and admission of Kansas and Nebraska as free states and a prosouthern majority report. After the minority report was rejected, the majority's was adopted by a vote of 78–63, when eleven Northerners—four each from New York and California, two from Pennsylvania, and one from New Jersey—joined all the Southerners except those from Delaware to defeat the remaining Northerners.

The defeated Northerners met separately the next morning and adopted a protest. Spurning demands from Wilson that the delegates immediately urge northern Know Nothings to join the Republican party, they instead simply reaffirmed their commitment to restoring the Missouri Compromise and their devotion to other nativist principles. Fifty-three Northerners signed this document, and ten others from Pennsylvania and New Jersey signed a similar protest that Pennsylvania's former governor Johnston drafted. Altogether, that is, sixty-three of seventy-five Northerners in attendance rebuked the majority's platform. The most conspicuous absentees from these protests were the entire delegations from New York and California, as well as a few delegates from Pennsylvania, Illinois, and New Jersey.⁷⁹

What incensed most Northerners was Section Twelve of the majority platform. It blamed "obnoxious acts" and "violated pledges"—that is, the Nebraska's Act's repeal of the Missouri Compromise line—on the Whig and Democratic parties, but it pledged Know Nothings "to abide by and maintain the existing laws upon the subject of slavery, as a final and conclusive settlement of that subject, in spirit and substance." In short, it opposed any attempt to repeal the Nebraska Act and the Fugitive Slave Act. In addition, it announced "the sense of the National Council that Congress ought not to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the territories" or interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia.

If this sounded eerily like the finality pledge that Fillmore had tried to impose on the Whig party since 1850, the platform's Section Three—which was apparently ignored by delegates during the hubbub in Philadelphia and has since been forgotten by most historians—rhetorically achieved virtually all that Fillmore and

Kennedy could have wished in terms of converting the Know Nothings into a Union party. Praising "the maintenance of the union of these United States as the paramount political good," it advocated "uncompromising antagonism to every principle of policy that endangers it" and "the suppression of all tendencies to political division, founded on geographical discrimination, or on the belief that there is a real difference of views between the various sections of the Union."

Four different groups of Whigs came away from Philadelphia with renewed hope, if for vastly different reasons. By spurning the platform, northern Whig/Know Nothings did not feel bound by it, and by standing up to Southerners, they believed they had reaffirmed their antislavery credentials for northern voters. As yet, that is, they saw no need to abandon Know Nothingism in the North, especially since every northern state council sanctioned their action explicitly or implicitly.⁸⁰

Free Soil/Know Nothings like Wilson and non-Know Nothing northern outsiders, conversely, saw the flare-up as preparing the way for a Republican party since they expected a wholesale exodus of outraged antislavery men from Know Nothing ranks. One of these, Samuel Bowles, editor of the Springfield, Massachusetts, Republican, was hired to report on the proceedings by the New York Tribune, and he worked closely with Wilson at Philadelphia to foment a northern bolt. The Northern delegates, Bowles inaccurately alleged in his final dispatch, agreed to "throw up the American organization as an organization in order to unite the North in an all-powerful and effective party against the aggressiveness of Slavery." New York's increasingly isolated Sewardite Whigs similarly spied new opportunities in the events at Philadelphia. "I congratulate you on the brightening prospects of last week," one told Seward the day after delegates left Philadelphia. "Secrecy is gone; Nativism is gone, and only anti-Catholicism remains, and that is shivering." "The Know-nothings, thank God, are in their graves," echoed Charles A. Dana, who was editing the Tribune in Greeley's absence. "Samuel Service of the samuel se

Millard Fillmore was already in Europe when the Philadelphia convention met, but his inner circle were just as jubilant about its results. The national council constructed an almost perfect platform for a Fillmore candidacy. It identified the Americans as a national Union party, and Section Twelve exempted, indeed prohibited, Fillmore from making any public statement about the Nebraska Act that could offend Northerners or Southerners. Brushing off the sectional split over it as predictable and temporary, Kennedy insisted to the still skeptical Winthrop that "the platform of the Convention" provided the basis for "a National party" that could bridge "the chasm between the Slave and free states" and oppose "an anti-slavery hating combination" in the North. All that was necessary for its success even in Massachusetts, argued Kennedy, was that "you and Clifford, Everett, Choate, Lawrence, Appleton and the rest of you" embrace the "Phila. platform."

Yet it was southern Know Nothings, almost all of whose delegates to Philadelphia were former Whigs, who believed they had won the most. They had not just smothered a demand for repeal of the Nebraska Act. By apparently forcing antislavery Northerners out of the party, they also demonstrated their toughness and fidelity to southern interests. Democrats, they fantasized, could no longer rail against them as allies of abolitionists. A replay of Wise's campaign now seemed impossible. Whatever had happened in Virginia, the way was open to sweep the South's remaining elections—and to sweep the South's remaining Whig holdouts into the new American party.

VIII

Northerners' walkout at Philadelphia, southern Whig/Know Nothings believed, removed the major obstacle stopping other Whigs from joining them. Union-loving southern Whigs no longer had any excuse for not joining the Americans, crowed the New Orleans Bee, since "the Whigs can scarcely be said to exist." The Philadelphia convention was the only instance in American political history "where the friends of the Union had the nerve to force its enemies from their own councils into a separate organization," boasted the Charlotte North Carolina Whig. Hence, "the South may now stand upon this platform as a unit, if they wish to preserve the Union." "The ejection of these men [the Massachusetts Know Nothings] from the Convention in Philadelphia, is . . . a restoration of confidence in the South," concurred Kennedy. "If the Convention had met before the Virginia election and had done the same thing then, Wise would have been overthrown by an overwhelming vote." "S

These predictions—both about a headlong rush of holdout Whigs into the new American party and about the insulation of southern Know Nothings from loyalty politics on the slavery issue—proved badly mistaken. Of seven other southern gubernatorial elections in 1855, Know Nothings carried only Kentucky, where former Whig Congressman Charles S. Morehead took the statehouse back from the Democrats. Hopeful that they had defused the slavery issue, Know Nothing gubernatorial and congressional candidates across the South made "the Pope and Catholics" their "great Hobby" during the campaigns. Like Wise, Democrats elsewhere criticized that intolerance, but even after the Philadelphia convention, Democrats repeatedly charged that southern Know Nothingism represented an antislavery fifth column.

No Democratic gubernatorial candidate played the slavery card so relentlessly or effectively as Tennessee's Andrew Johnson against Meredith Gentry. In no southern state had more congressional Whigs opposed the Nebraska Act, and Tennessee's Know Nothings chose Gentry in part because he was not in Congress in 1854 and, indeed, had been denied renomination in 1853 because of his strident opposition to Winfield Scott as a figurehead for northern antislavery Whigs. That record offended pro-Scott and anti-Nebraska Whigs, but it was expected to protect Gentry from the charge of being soft on the slavery issue. By exhuming and repeatedly attacking ostensibly antislavery votes that Gentry had cast during his long and exemplary period of service in Congress, however, Johnson defeated Gentry by the same narrow margin he had gained over Gustavus Henry in 1853.⁸⁷

Anti-Nebraska Whig congressional incumbents who ran as Know Nothings in 1855, like Tennessee's William Cullom and Louisiana's Theodore Hunt, also faced charges of betraying slavery. Both lost, and Cullom attributed his defeat in part to "the cry of Abolitionist." Nonetheless, southern Know Nothings ran far better in later congressional races than they had in Virginia. Whereas they won only two (15.4 percent) of Virginia's House seats, they carried twenty-five (41.7 percent) of sixty congressional elections in Alabama, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Texas.

Altogether, Know Nothings won twenty-seven of seventy-three House seats in slave states that sent only nineteen Whigs to Congress in 1853. They won one seat each in the traditional Democratic bastions of Mississippi and Texas, and two in Alabama, but most victories occurred in states where Whigs had been competitive or dominant. The relevant questions with respect to southern Whigs, therefore, are to what extent they benefited from their absorption into the new American party and how complete that absorption was.

Of eight southern Know Nothing gubernatorial nominees in 1855, only Flournoy, Gentry, Morehead, and Louisiana's Charles Derbigny were Whigs. Only Morehead won, but Whigs had not elected a governor anywhere in the South since 1851. Former Whigs did even better with regard to Know Nothing congressional nominations outside Virginia, capturing thirty-nine (68.4 percent) of fifty-seven, and they dominated Know Nothing congressional slates in Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina, Louisiana, and Georgia. Twenty-two of the twenty-seven southern Know Nothings elected to Congress in 1855 were former Whigs, compared to nineteen Whigs who won House seats in 1853. By these measures, Whig leaders marginally benefited from trading the Whig label for the American brand name.

Even so, the transition from Whiggery to Know Nothingism in the South was conflicted, often costly to individual Whig politicos, and far from complete. At least two Whig-Know Nothings got to Congress by defeating loyal and vociferously anti-Know Nothing Whig incumbents. In Kentucky, Humphrey Marshall, a leader of the anti-Scott forces in 1852, routed William Preston, who mourned that "the old Whig party by which I was elected is disbanded," who pronounced himself "an independent candidate" while vilifying Know Nothings' bigotry and secrecy, and who attracted Democratic support in a losing effort. Be Similarly, North Carolina's pro-Nebraska Whig Congressman John Kerr won a Democratic endorsement, even after announcing "I am now, as ever, a Whig," because of his strident denunciations of Know Nothingism. But neither that help nor his proslavery credentials spared him from being crushed by the Know Nothing newcomer Edwin Reade in North Carolina's fifth district.

These were not the only anomalies in the congressional results. At least four Whigs or former Whigs, who attracted Democratic support, defeated Whig/Know Nothing rivals by running as anti-Know Nothing Independents or Whig Independents: Thomas Bowie in Maryland's sixth district along the western shore of Chesapeake Bay; Albert G. Talbott, who carried Kentucky's fourth district by only 16 votes out of over 13,000 cast; Georgia's Alexander H. Stephens, who stridently denounced Know Nothing intolerance even as he publicly refused to endorse Democratic candidates; and Albert Watkins, a former Whig congressman, who defeated sitting anti-Nebraska Whig (and now American) incumbent Nathaniel G. Taylor in East Tennessee's heavily Whig first district. In sum, at least twenty-six Whigs were elected in slave states in 1855, but they were sharply, if unevenly, divided by Know Nothingism itself.⁹¹

Know Nothingism, in short, did not simply replace (or forcibly displace) the southern Whig party. It also turned former Whigs against each other, provided a new arena in which to renew old factional struggles, and drove some Whigs into an alliance with Democrats to crush a movement they abhorred. Occasionally, as in Tennessee's first congressional district, disagreements about the Nebraska Act or the Know Nothings' purported unreliability on the slavery issue contributed to these divisions, but most often they reflected divergent reactions to Know Nothings' attempt to restrict the political rights of Catholics and foreigners.

There is little evidence of Whig resistance to Know Nothingism in Mississippi or Alabama, where even Henry Hilliard, the state's most eminent Whig, publicly endorsed the new American party and its principles. PMost Whig leaders and Whig newspapers in Louisiana also readily embraced it in 1855. But many Creole Catholic Whigs in the sugar plantation parishes refused to support Know Nothing candidates that year, despite the state platform's repudiation of the national council's anti-Catholic Section Eight and the nomination of a Catholic for governor. And the state's leading Whig officeholder, Senator Judah P. Benjamin, a Jew born in the West Indies, issued a public statement in August 1855 blasting the party's bigotry and proscriptiveness as "a wretched fall from the the proud tradition of the gallant Whigs of the older time" and pronouncing himself henceforth a partyless Whig independent.

In North Carolina, too, Whig resistance went beyond Kerr's bold stand. In the sixth congressional district, incumbent anti-Nebraska Whig Congressman Richard Puryear was first renominated by a Whig convention before Know Nothings later endorsed him. In debate, he defended Know Nothing principles but also "denied that he had deserted his Whig friends or foresaken one Whig principle held dear by them." Even more defiant was Whig leader James Caldwell, who announced in the spring that he would run as a Whig against incumbent Democratic Congressman Burton Craige. When Democrats suggested he was a Know Nothing, he issued a public card declaring that "he was not the Know Nothing candidate, but was 'a Whig of the old line, a Henry Clay Whig,' and expected to be supported by that party." When the Know Nothings then nominated a Democrat to face Craige, the bitter Caldwell withdrew and endorsed Craige.

The Know Nothing explosion especially wreaked havoc on the unity of Whig leaders and, to a lesser extent, of Whig voters in Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Georgia, states that, along with North Carolina, were once the most reliable Whig polities in the South. Two complementary dissolvents appear to have been at work. Whiggery's collapse as an organized, competitive party freed longtime Whig factional rivals to go their separate ways. Simultaneously, the anti-Catholic bigotry and proscriptiveness of Know Nothingism provided a new dividing line between former Whig allies.

In Maryland, for example, previous rivalries between Reverdy Johnson's Court House clique and the Whig faction aligned behind Senator James Pearce and John P. Kennedy only marginally affected divergent reactions to Know Nothingism. The key was the order's anti-Catholicism, resort to violence in Baltimore elections, and insistence on putting no one but full members in public office. Catholic planters whose families had been in Maryland since the seventeenth century crucially contributed to Whig dominance in the Eastern Shore and southern Maryland tobacco-growing counties between the Potomac and the Chesapeake. Significantly, neither John R. Franklin nor August R. Sollers, the Whigs who represented the two districts on the Chesapeake's opposite shores in the Thirty-Third Congress, sought reelection once it became clear that Know Nothings would pick the nominees. The list of eminent Whigs who refused to join the order also included Kennedy; United States Senators Pearce and Thomas G. Pratt, who called the anti-Catholic Eighth Section of the Philadelphia platform "suicidal"; Reverdy Johnson, who, unlike Pearce, issued a forceful public denunciation of Know Nothing intolerance; and Johnson's brother-in-law Thomas Bowie, who won a House seat as an anti-Know Nothing Independent Whig.⁹⁵

Pearce remained publicly silent throughout much of 1855, but in September he sent John M. Clayton a revealing letter that illustrated the isolation he and many Whigs increasingly felt. Complaining that the American party "allow no connection except with duly admitted and sworn members," and that it could never become "a National" party since "the whole North is so inflamed on the Slavery question," he also refused "to be a tail to that [Democratic] kite." Thus "I am quite hopeless of any political changes acceptable to me," especially as "the Whig party if not forever at an end is so broken up that I see no probability of its reunion."

Less eminent Whigs were more willing to cooperate with Democrats against Know Nothings' anti-Catholic bigotry. Meetings of old-line Whigs in St. Mary's County, first settled by Catholics in the 1630s, and Frederick, which encompassed another concentration of Catholics, protested "know nothingism as still more alarming" than "northern abolitionism" and vowed that since "the principal issue before the people is between Know Nothingism and anti-Know Nothingism," they would cooperate with Democrats in the anti-Know Nothing party. Maryland's 1855 elections, which produced four Know Nothing congressmen out of six chosen and a heavily Know Nothing legislature, in fact, also produced the most dramatic voter realignment experienced by any slave state. The old southern and Eastern Shore counties where Whigs had been strongest became Democratic bastions, whereas former Democratic strongholds in northeastern counties and especially Baltimore went Know Nothing.⁹⁷

The urbane Kennedy lived in Baltimore, the site of Maryland's most extraordinary voter realignment and campaign violence. As he repeatedly told confidants, the main reason he did not join the Know Nothings was to conceal his main purpose—converting the order into an electioneering machine for Fillmore. But he hoped that the new Know Nothing legislature would send him to the Senate to replace Pratt, his old Court House clique antagonist. When it instead rejected him because he was not a member and chose his sworn-in brother Anthony, whom he considered "a good fellow whom everybody likes" without a brain in his head, John Kennedy's bitterness knew no bounds. Blasting the "wretched condition of that organization in its personnel," he warned that old-line Whig outsiders like himself would be even less likely to cooperate with it in the future. "The truth is," he railed to his friend Winthrop, "the party is a very mean one in this state. . . . If it is not reformed and strengthened by an infusion of men of sense, into it, it will go to pieces all over the country."

Hostility to Know Nothings' anti-Catholicism also contributed to Whig resistance in Kentucky. The Bardstown Herald, which led the opposition to joining the Americans, was printed in the county with the state's largest concentration of Catholics. Even more important was sheer resentment among Kentucky's Whigs, who prided themselves as being the nation's oldest and most loyal party members, at being shoved aside. As elsewhere, Know Nothingism emerged in

Kentucky's local elections of 1854 as an independent antiparty movement that denounced Whigs and Democrats alike, and most Whig leaders spurned it. "The principles generally imputed to the Know Nothings are not our principles," announced the state's leading Whig newspaper in August 1854.99

Hope of preserving a separate Whig organization lasted as late as February and March 1855 even though uncertainty sparked by the North's elections caused Whig leaders to postpone a scheduled Whig state convention from February 22 to April. Before it ever met, however, third parties forced the Whigs' hand. In December 1854 the state's temperance association nominated a gubernatorial candidate, and the Know Nothings, meeting secretly, followed suit in February by nominating a different man, Judge William Loving. By then, a few Whig papers had endorsed Know Nothing principles, but it was not until mid-March that the Danville Kentucky Tribune openly attacked Catholics and that Louisville's George D. Prentice, in an article entitled "The Whig Party of Kentucky," called on Whigs to forgo a race in 1855 and back the Americans on the ground that "many of the old measures that once divided the two parties [Whigs and Democrats] were settled by incorporation into the policy of the country."

Belated recognition that developments in the North ended any hope of preserving a national Whig party spurred this change. But Prentice's announcement launched a full-scale attempt by Kentucky's Whig leaders—or most of them—to seize Know Nothing machinery from its original founders and convert the order from a nativist, anti-Catholic, and antiparty populistic protest into a conservative Unionist Whig vehicle. Kentucky's Whigs, in sum, attempted at the state level what Fillmore and his friends sought on the national level.

Relentlessly, old-line Whigs shoved original Know Nothings aside. When Know Nothing gubernatorial candidate Loving withdrew because of ill health, the Whig-dominated state council replaced him with ex-Congressman Morehead, whom most Whigs had expected to nominate as their own gubernatorial candidate in April. In the seventh (Lexington) congressional district, where former Native American congressional candidate Stephean Trabue had announced himself as the Know Nothing candidate, the Whig-controlled district council replaced him, first with Whig James Robertson and then with Alexander Marshall, who had formerly been both a Whig and a Democrat. Most important, in the Louisville district, Whigs secured the American congressional nomination against Whig incumbent William Preston for Humphrey Marshall, even though the Know Nothing Louisville Courier had previously denounced him by name as an example of "men who have broken down in the old parties to which they belonged, and who are now seeking to advance themselves by riding into power on the popularity of the new organization."

Prentice, Senator-elect John J. Crittenden, Marshall, Albert T. Burnley, incumbent Congressman Leander Cox, and many other Whig leaders went along with this coup. But many others did not: Preston; Senator Archibald Dixon, who had already been replaced by Crittenden; Senator John B. Thompson, whose seat was safe for four more years; former Senator Joseph R. Underwood; congressional candidate Albert Talbott; and Henry Clay's son James B. Clay, among others. Contempt for Know Nothing principles in part explains their refusal, but the division between Whigs who became Know Nothings and those who clung to Whiggery in 1855 most resembles the split between Whigs who had boomed

Zachary Taylor for the 1848 nomination and Henry Clay loyalists. Prentice, Crittenden, and Burnley were all leaders of the Taylor boom, and Morehead had privately chastised Clay for refusing to endorse Taylor once he had the Whig nomination. 102 James B. Clay's loyalties in that ancient controversy are obvious, but Underwood was a Clay man and Dixon was a foe of Crittenden, if not an outright Clay man. Other than Talbott, the holdouts did not become Democrats in 1855, but their antipathy to Know Nothingism belied assertions that all southern Whigs would back Fillmore if he were the American party's presidential nominee.

More recent feuds help explain Whig divisions over Know Nothingism in Tennessee. The emergence of anti-Scott and pro-Nebraska Whigs like Gentry, Parson Brownlow, and Nashville Congressman Felix Zollicoffer as Know Nothing leaders alienated pro-Scott and anti-Nebraska Tennessee Whigs, who correctly saw it as an attempt by old foes to purge them from power. Because of their popularity in their districts, both Emerson Etheridge and Cullom managed to secure Know Nothing congressional nominations, but Cullom specifically attributed his defeat in part to the unpopularity of Gentry among his constituents. 103 Senator James Jones, whose vigorous support for the Nebraska Act failed to mitigate the enmity he had earned from Gentry and his ilk for Jones' equally vigorous support of Scott in 1852, however, refused to join the new party. He remained a Whig, he announced in a public letter in July, "and so far as the recognition of the correctness of principles go, I expect to live and die one." 104 Nor did John Bell endorse the party until after his enemy, Gentry, lost. Lamenting that there was no more "glorious old Whig party," he announced on October 8, 1855, that he could never join the secret Know Nothing fraternity but would support the public American party because it was a conservative unionist organization. 105

Whether or not Know Nothingism could serve their personal ambition, however, appears to explain other Tennessee Whigs' divergent reactions to it. Furious that a separate Know Nothing candidate blocked his attempt to run as a Whig for Congress in the tenth district, for example, Walter Coleman insisted that "the Whig party is not dead," and he bitterly, if futilely, complained that "its winding sheet has been placed upon it by those who wish to get it out of the way."106 Tennessee's first congressional district, redrawn by Whigs between 1851 and 1853. illustrates how Know Nothingism became a new battleground for old Whig antagonists. Since early 1854, when Whig Nathaniel Taylor won a special congressional election against Albert G. Watkins, formerly the Whig congressman from the old second district but now a resident of the first, the furious Watkins had vowed to take the seat from Taylor in 1855. Both men joined the order to seek the Know Nothings' endorsement, and when Taylor got it, the vindictive Watkins shifted course. Castigating local Know Nothings as bitter personal enemies, he secured Democrats' endorsement by running as an Independent. Supported by Democrats and anti-Know Nothing/Whigs, Watkins then narrowly edged out Taylor.107

In no state, however, did Know Nothingism wreck what remained of Whiggery so completely as Georgia. By 1855, of course, internal Whig divisions had already thoroughly disrupted the party. The feud pitting Stephens, Toombs, and William Dawson against John Berrien, Charles Jenkins, and others in the 1840s helped shape the Union/Southern Rights realignment of 1850–51. In 1852, when many Union Whigs, including United States Senator Dawson, loyally rallied behind Scott's presidential candidacy, Stephens and Toombs arranged a separate electoral ticket for Daniel Webster that their most loyal followers backed even after Webster died. Stephens and Toombs then orchestrated a "Conservative" or "Republican" convention in 1853 that explicitly repudiated the national Whig party and nominated Charles Jenkins for governor. ¹⁰⁸

Whatever Toombs and Stephens called themselves, however, they still despised Democrats who had been Southern Rights men, and their constituents, as one told Stephens in 1855, did not consider them any "less the Whig[s]" because "the old landmarks which divided you and them [Democrats] still exist." In 1853, moreover, both pro- and anti-Scott Whigs, as well as some Union party Democrats, rallied behind Jenkins, Berrien's kinsman and close associate, who came within 500 votes of defeating Democrat Herschel Johnson. Residual antagonisms between Whigs and Democrats, in sum, survived all the shuffling of party labels and lines in Georgia. And in early 1855, many Whigs expected Jenkins once again to carry their banner, whatever it was labeled, in a rematch against the hated Johnson. A few Whig proponents of the so-called Columbus movement in southwest Georgia, however, called on all Georgians to combine behind Johnson to erect a unified phalanx against the North. 110

The eruption of Know Nothingism shattered any chance that Georgians would unite in a single party or that Whigs would rally again as a unit behind Jenkins. Instead Georgians—Whigs and Democrats alike—divided into Know Nothings and the "Anti-Know Nothing party." Though many Whigs poured into Know Nothing lodges, Stephens and Toombs both issued withering public letters denouncing the order's secrecy and intolerance and damning it as an abolitionist trick. Even earlier, Stephens had protested that "the old Whig party is about to be sold out to the Know Nothings" and insisted that "to crush them out I would join with any man." Stephens had intended to retire from Congress, but his abhorrence of the possibility that a Know Nothing might replace him caused him to run as an Independent in the eighth district, as did his brother Linton in the seventh. Democrats endorsed both Stephens brothers even though each publicly denounced Democratic gubernatorial candidate Johnson, and Know Nothings, most of whom were former Whig idolators of Stephens and Toombs, ultimately ran candidates against both brothers.

Unlike Stephens and Toombs, indeed, "nearly all the old Whig leaders" ardently embraced Know Nothingism. These included not just the duo's old Whig foes like Berrien and Savannah editor Francis Bartow, but also former friends like William S. Jones, who edited the Augusta Chronicle; Dawson, whose Senate term expired in March; ex-Congressman Eugenius Nisbet; Mayor Thomas Miller of Augusta, whom one Stephens loyalist called "a bonafide traitor"; and even former Governor and Secretary of War George W. Crawford, whom the same Stephens ally said was "galvanized (not Galphinized) into a spasmodic effort" for the Know Nothings. 113

Democrats also became Know Nothings, and in the vain hope of attracting still more of them, Georgia's American party bypassed the respected Whig Jenkins, who refused to join the secret order, and nominated Democrat Garnett Andrews for governor. An inept campaigner whose Democratic background alienated many Whigs who would have undoubtedly voted for Jenkins, Andrews was a terrible choice. In 1853 Jenkins drew 47,128 votes (49.7 percent) and lost to Johnson by only 510. In 1855, Andrews garnered only 43,358 (41.8 percent) and lost to Johnson by 10,778. Andrews also ran 2,300 votes behind the aggregate total for the eight Know Nothing congressional candidates, five of whom were former Whigs, including the state's two Know Nothing victors.¹¹⁴

Whigs who shunned this internecine brawl between pro- and anti-Know Nothing Whigs because they had friends on both sides saw careers come to an abrupt halt. David A. Reese, the Union Whig elected to Congress with Stephens in 1853, for example, refused to seek a nomination from either side. But the greatest casualty was Jenkins. Author of the revered Georgia Platform, Jenkins, because of his close ties to both Union Whigs and the Berrien camp and because of his strong showing in 1853, was the single Georgia Whig with the greatest potential for reuniting Whiggery's long fractured ranks. Refusing to demean himself by joining a Know Nothing lodge, to denounce old friends on either side, or to run as an Independent, he placed himself on the sidelines in a June public letter: "I have concluded, therefore, that being neither a Democrat nor a Know Nothing, there is no place for me in this contest." His abdication was personal, but he had written an appropriate epitaph for the southern Whig party.

ΙX

Many northern Whigs whose support Fillmorites sought for the American party also remained on the sidelines in 1855 rather than join a new party or cooperate with Democrats against the Know Nothings and Republicans. Winthrop quickly deflated John Kennedy's hope that Know Nothings' June national platform would persuade conservative Whig leaders in Massachusetts to aid them. First, he informed Kennedy, "the bolters [who repudiated that platform as insufficiently antislavery] are a vast majority in this State." Second, "there are no dramatis personae" of old conservative Whig leaders to endorse the platform, for age itself had taken its toll on them. Abbott Lawrence was "very ill" and would sail for Europe if he did not die. Nathan Appleton was "about, but quite feeble," and Rufus Choate was hobbled by "water on the knee." And Winthrop himself refused "to be found higgledy-piggledy with Wilson, Gardner & Co." 116

Edward Everett also expected antislavery men to control Know Nothingism throughout 1855 and then to cooperate with Seward, "notwithstanding his early and persistent denunciations of it." Thus conservative Whigs must continue to oppose Know Nothings. "If the conservative Whigs had an able leader," he wrote his niece, while shunning that role himself, "they could make a very important stand" in Massachusetts in 1855. "But I do not see that they could rescue the state from the freesoil K. N.s—owing to the impossibility of coalescing with the democrats" since Democrats would never demand repeal of the Nebraska Act, a sine qua non for even conservative Massachusetts Whigs. 117

In New York, Washington Hunt and Hamilton Fish also remained isolated. Complaining to Weed "that the Whig party is to be swallowed up in fusion," Hunt published a letter in the New York Commercial Advertiser in August "declaring my purpose to remain a Whig, even after the party has been dispersed." As for the cost of this stance, "I understand perfectly that my views of duty will separate me from all the political movements of the day." Hunt's letter "expresses my sentiments better than any of the Manifestoes of the day," Winthrop rejoiced to Kennedy. "Here in Massachusetts, Fusion is in full progress. I have refused to have any part or lot with it."

The fusion that Winthrop and Hunt resisted was an attempt after the Philadelphia Know Nothing national council meeting to unite antislavery Know Nothings and antislavery outsiders like the Sewardites in the new Republican party. Fusion's success varied widely from state to state. Holdout Whig conservatives resisted it. But so too did many anti-Nebraska Whig/Know Nothings, who repudiated Section Twelve of the Americans' national platform specifically to avert the collapse of independent northern Know Nothing parties. Nonetheless, together with Know Nothingism, fusion helped pulverize what remained of northern Whiggery.

In the three New England states with fall gubernatorial and legislative elections, fusion proved most complete in Vermont, yet even there it met some resistance. By adopting what one appalled conservative Whig called "an ultra abolition" stance in 1854, Vermont's Whigs swept the governorship, the legislature, and the three congressional seats, and in early 1855 the Whig legislature then sent Jacob Collamer back to the Senate. Know Nothing lodges existed in Vermont, but by the summer of 1855, almost all Whig leaders—Governor Stephen Royce, Senators Solomon Foot and Collamer, and the three Whig congressmen elected in 1854—had committed themselves to the Republican movement. Royce won reelection as a Republican with 25,699 votes (59 percent) compared to the 27,811 (62.4 percent) he had amassed as a Whig in 1854. Former supporters who deserted his column may have voted for a separate American candidate, who garnered 3,631 votes (8.3 percent), but Republicans clearly commanded the state. The once-indomitable Vermont Whig party had been extinguished.¹¹⁹

Maine's conservative Whigs proved more numerous and stubborn. In 1854, most of Maine's Whig leaders and about half of the party's former voters supported fusion with Free Soilers and anti-Nebraska Democrats behind Anson Morrill's successful gubernatorial candidacy. In February 1855 those elements, as well as virtually all of Maine's Know Nothings, held a Republican convention that renominated Morrill on the most radically antislavery platform adopted anywhere in the North that year. Die-hard Whigs, who secured only 15 percent of the vote for Isaac Reed in 1854, however, defiantly called a Whig convention that renominated Reed on a platform denouncing Know Nothingism, demanding dilution of the prohibition law, which the fusion legislature had just stiffened, and castigating the new Republican party as "the offspring of a corrupt fusion of men of opposite political opinions, and associations aided recently by a secret political organization of the most dangerous character." 120

Even before the "straight Whig" convention met, pro-fusion Whigs like Edward Kent and Noah Smith protested that "these straight out Whigs are manifestly determined to ruin us all if they can & they will openly or covertly join or aid the Hunkers in smothering northern sentiment." Pro-fusion Whigs, insisted another, must issue an address stating "boldly & with cleanness that the old Whig organization is dead throughout the union & was sundered by the Southern Whigs on the Nebraska bill." These anguished cries proved prophetic. Though three-tenths of Reed's 1854 supporters went Republican in 1855, reducing his vote from 14,000 in 1854 to 10,645 (9.6 percent), Whig holdouts still denied Morrill a majority. And since the conservative Whigs combined with Democrats on legislative candidates, they had enough men to elect the Democrat Samuel Wells governor over Morrill in the legislature's runoff contest.¹²¹

"A portion of the old Whig party... are not yet ready to abandon the name & the organization but cling tenaciously to both," Kent groaned to Seward after the election. A minority of these diehards, "composed" of once "prominent... leaders, is determined to join the Democratic party" since they were "hunkers and proslavery at heart." The rest "are with us in feeling" against "the Slave Power & its outrages," but they are "frightened by the cry of sectionalism and disunion."

Old line Whigs and anti-Nebraska Whig/Know Nothings, though still enemies, together stymied the Republican movement in Massachusetts. During the three months after the Philadelphia Know Nothing meeting, Henry Wilson, Know Nothing Governor Henry J. Gardner, and anti-Know Nothing Whig editor Samuel Bowles strove to combine the state's anti-Nebraska elements. "I hope our Whig friends will go promptly with the movement," Wilson told Bowles. But conservatives like Winthrop and Everett instead longed for a coalition of "the great conservative interests" to "crush" Wilson. Thus Whigs held their own state convention and nominated the old Websterite Samuel Walley for governor on a platform denouncing the Republican party, even though the Republican state convention a few days earlier had nominated Whig Julius Rockwell "in the hope," Everett believed, "to catch the Whig votes."

Furious that Republicans had spurned him, Gardner, running again as a Know Nothing, won the four-way race with a plurality of 51,497 (37.7 percent), a dramatic drop from the 81,503 (62.6 percent) he had achieved a year earlier. Rockwell, with 36,714 votes (26.9 percent), ran second, and the Democrat Edward Beach ran third with 34,728. Walley, the champion of intransigent Whigs, garnered only 13,296 votes, a decline of 14,000 from Emory Washburn's total a year earlier. The Whig proportion of the cast vote slumped from a fifth to less than a tenth. More of Washburn's 1854 supporters voted for Rockwell and Beach, indeed, than stuck with Walley, and while a fifth of Gardner's 1854 voters went Republican and another 15 percent reverted to the Democratic column, virtually none came back to the expiring Whig party. Measured differently, Whigs retained only about 7 percent of Winfield Scott's 1852 supporters; two-fifths of those men were now Republicans, a fourth remained Know Nothings, and almost a fifth did not bother to vote. 124

Attempting to account for Whigs' pitiful vote, Everett explained that "the repeal of the Missouri Compromise shattered us." In 1854 many conservative Whigs went Know Nothing since Gardner was a former Webster Whig. In 1855, some voted Republican, but "a great many conservative Whigs voted for the democratic candidate. Had it not been that the democratic party, as supporters of the Administration, had to endorse the Nebraska concern, the conservative Whigs would have joined them almost en masse." Nonetheless, he exulted, "we Whigs are well satisfied with the result, which so completely demolishes the paltry 'fusion' intrigue." Republicans were annoyed by Whig holdouts, but they more accurately blamed the continuing appeal of Know Nothingism. According to Wilson, they had "overestimated the power of the antislavery sentiment and underestimated the power of old organizations." "The people will not confront the issues at present," another griped. "They want a Paddy hunt & on a Paddy hunt they will go." Consequently, "the hope of a united North in 1856 is the merest moonshipe." $^{\prime\prime 125}$

The results certainly raised doubts that Massachusetts' most conservative men could be rallied behind Fillmore's candidacy on the American ticket in 1856. To fend off the Republican challenge, moreover, Massachusetts Know Nothings had trumpeted their anti-Nebraska and antislavery credentials. Thus they also appeared likely to oppose Fillmore if he ran on the 1855 American platform with its despised Section Twelve. 126

Most northern Know Nothings who protested Section Twelve of the Philadelphia platform, in fact, wanted no part of fusion. They still believed that they could maintain their organization as both a nativist and an antislavery party in the North, yet still cooperate with southern Americans in the impending presidential campaign. To facilitate that cooperation, the bolters called a meeting of northern Know Nothings in Cincinnati in late November to which they invited E. B. Bartlett of neighboring Covington, Kentucky, the new national president of the order. Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Pennsylvania sent delegates to this gathering, including Pennsylvania's ex-Governor Johnston. But the most important delegations came from the midwestern states of Michigan, Wisconsin, Indiana, Illinois, and especially Ohio. 127

Rejecting a pro-fusion platform proposed by Thomas Spooner, president of Ohio's state council, which announced that "since the slavery issue is paramount" Know Nothings would "cheerfully unite" with anyone opposed to Slave Power aggressions, the Cincinnati meeting instead adopted a far more moderate platform endorsed by its president, Thomas Ford, also of Ohio. Those resolutions called for another National Council meeting in February at Philadelphia a few days before the Americans' national nominating convention met there, demanded that Section Twelve be replaced with a plank that called for restoration of the Missouri Compromise line, insisted that Congress refuse to admit any slave states formed in Kansas and Nebraska Territories, and firmly repudiated "coalescing with any party which demands the postponement or abandonment of American principles, or the disorganization of the American party."

That plank, warned one Cincinnati Republican, meant "that the Republicans will have to enter upon the Presidential contest without calculating on much aid from those still adhering to the K. N. Organization." According to Schouler's fuller assessment in the Cincinnati Gazette, northern Know Nothings clearly spurned fusion with the Republicans and still desired cooperation with southern Americans. Because of the Nebraska outrage, however, "the Northern members of the American party cannot with safety to their party, respect for themselves or regard for principle, wink out of sight this great question. It is one that must be met." Unless Southerners agreed to this change, he warned, Know Nothingism in the North was finished.¹²⁸

This demand severely disappointed Fillmore's friends who had expected "a just and liberal construction of the principles of the Philadelphia resolutions" that reaffirmed Know Nothingism's conversion into a bisectional Union party. Northern and southern Know Nothings in Congress, Haven wrote Fillmore two weeks later when the new Thirty-Fourth Congress commenced, "constantly quarrel about Platforms & to save me from perdition I can contrive no way to prevent it."129 Yet northern Know Nothings' determination at Cincinnati, both to reject absorption by the Republicans and to insist on stopping slavery expansion in Kansas and Nebraska, was easily comprehensible. The Cincinnati meeting was carefully scheduled to follow all of the North's 1855 elections so that delegates could plot future strategy based on their results. What happened at the polls shaped what they did in the Queen City.

In Pennsylvania, Know Nothings almost totally stifled attempts to launch an independent Republican party or to preserve Whiggery as an independent force. They infiltrated and controlled the initial Republican state committee, insisted on restoration of the Missouri Compromise in their own platform, and ultimately forced anti-Democratic elements to coalesce behind Thomas Nicholson, a Know Nothing, as the opposition's candidate for canal commissioner. In local elections during the winter and spring of 1855, Whigs had divided votes between Know Nothings and anti-Know Nothing Democrats, but the remaining Whigs still held a state convention that nominated a candidate for canal commissioner. According to delegate Alexander K. McClure, it was "an assembly of leaders without rank and file" since Whiggery's remaining adherents were "a few old Scotch-Irish Whigs, most of whom would have been compelled to lie awake at night to decide whether they most hated Know Nothingism or Democracy." McClure himself, like D. N. White and Russell Errett of the Pittsburgh Gazette, helped form a Republican party in 1855 that also nominated a candidate for canal commissioner—the controversial Passmore Williamson, who had been arrested for defying the Fugitive Slave Act. Nonetheless, Know Nothings heavily outnumbered other opponents of the Democrats. When their leaders called for a meeting of three members each from the American, Whig, and Republican state committees at Harrisburg on September 27 to agree upon a fusion candidate, McClure represented the Whigs and accepted Nicholson. 130

A few Whigs, however, insisted on keeping their own candidate in the race. So did two other groups: Republican ideologues, who refused to cooperate with Know Nothings, and the anti-Know Nothing Native American party. The Native American got 4,056 votes (1.2 percent), but that was almost twice as much as the showing of the last statewide Whig candidate to run in Pennsylvania, who attracted only 2,293 votes (0.7 percent). "There are about enough Whigs left to keep us in remembrance that there was once such a party, and no more," joked one Democrat. "The Whig party is defunct," accurately chimed another. Some of the Whigs who had not yet joined the Know Nothings in 1854 went Republican, but Williamson attracted only 7,226 votes (2.2 percent). Over two-fifths of those 1854 Whig holdouts, however, refused to vote in 1855, and the rest went for Nicholson, as did the great majority of 1854 Know Nothings. 131 With 149,745 votes (46 percent), Nicholson was clearly the major opposition candidate, even though he still lost by over 12,000 votes to the victorious Democrat. Little wonder that Pennsylvania's delegates to the Cincinnati conclave had little interest in abandoning the Know Nothing organization for a merger with the Republicans. 132

Ohioans were the key delegates at Cincinnati, and at first blush, Ohio's state election seemed strikingly different from those in Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Maine. Few Ohio Whigs contemplated running their own gubernatorial candidate in 1855. Virtually all non-Democrats hoped to preserve the polyglot anti-Nebraska People's coalition that swept the 1854 congressional races and that planned to nominate a state ticket in July at a Columbus convention. The major question was who would control those nominations: Whig/Know Nothings like Lew Campbell, who wanted to preserve his ties to southern Know Nothings at least until after the speakership election in the impending session of Congress, or non-Know Nothing and often virulently anti-Know Nothing Free Soilers who sought to convert the People's coalition into a Republican party. "We are battling the Know Nothings," declared Joshua R. Giddings. "We refuse to go into Convention with, or to recognize them as allies. We are determined to have a Republican Convention, a Republican nomination, and Republican Candidates without surrender, without compromise." Just as adamantly, Campbell insisted that the Know Nothings, whose Ohio membership had swollen to about 130,000 by the spring of 1855, were too "formidable" to be insulted and that while they were "strongly Anti-Slavery," they would "not consent to abandon other reforms . . . to remedy other palpable wrongs besides Slavery!"

Each side correctly suspected the other of plotting earlier nominations to preempt the decision at Columbus, and each pushed favorites for the gubernatorial nomination. Know Nothings strongly preferred Jacob Brinkerhoff, a member of the order and a former Free Soil Democrat, whom Campbell had promoted since December 1854. Free Soilers and non-Know Nothing antislavery Whigs like Senator Ben Wade favored Salmon Chase, whose nomination, Campbell warned Schouler, "will ruin us" because he was an outsider and anathema to old-line Whigs. 134 Nonetheless, many Know Nothings were so eager to unite antislavery voters that they would accept Chase, who for months had been trying to get his friends to stop attacking the nativists in order to forge a Republican majority.

The most important pro-Chase Know Nothing was Thomas Spooner, president of the state council. An ex-Free Soiler, rather than a Whig like Campbell, Spooner enthusiastically supported merging the Know Nothings into an exclusively northern Republican party. Using his authority as president, Spooner quashed attempts by Know Nothings to make separate nominations at a June council meeting. The way was thus prepared for Ohio's Whigs, Free Soilers, anti-Nebraska Democrats, and Know Nothings to combine in the Republican party. Yet the mutually suspicious groups still had to construct a mutually acceptable ticket. 135

Adopting the Republican label, the July convention gave Chase its gubernatorial nomination on a platform that focused almost exclusively on the slavery issue and was utterly silent on nativism. But the eight other slots on the state ticket went to Know Nothings, including Thomas Ford, the candidate for lieutenant governor. Prominent among the northern protesters at Philadelphia, the ex-Whig Ford later opposed Spooner's motion at Cincinnati for a merger between northern Know Nothings and Republicans. One reason for that stance, clearly, was that the Know Nothing preponderance on the July Republican ticket did not assuage dissident Know Nothings and conservative Whigs. They immediately nominated Allen Trimble, a septuagenarian former governor, to oppose Chase.

Chase won, but he polled over 22,000 fewer votes than others on the ticket, while Trimble got over 24,000 (8 percent), almost all of whom were former Whigs. Considerably fewer than half of Ohio's one-time Whigs, indeed, could stomach the hated Chase. Of those who supported Winfield Scott, only a third backed Chase, a fourth went to Trimble, and 44 percent abstained. Yet almost all of Trimble's voters supported anti-Nebraska candidates in 1854, and they also backed Ford and other ex-Whig Know Nothings on the Republican ticket. For that reason, Ford and most Ohio delegates to the Cincinnati Know Nothing meeting broke with Spooner and spurned a merger with Republicans. For the same reason, however, they also insisted on free soil and restoration of the Missouri Compromise line, a position starkly at odds with Fillmore's vision of the American party. 136

X

Fillmore's confidants like Kennedy and Haven drew far more solace from New York's results since the Know Nothings, whom his Silver Gray allies now almost completely controlled, won the few statewide offices at stake that year. Yet even New York Know Nothings, who refused explicitly to repudiate Section Twelve of the American party platform in order to hold the door open for future cooperation with Southerners and who boycotted the postelection Cincinnati gathering precisely because they expected it to jettison that controversial plank, knew that they could not explicitly endorse it. In August, therefore, a state council meeting at Binghamton condemned the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, insisted that slavery "should derive no extension from such repeal," and asserted that the slavery issue had "no rightful place in the platform of the National American Party."

Because Sewardite Whigs' 1854 victory caused them stubbornly to shun both the Republican and Know Nothing movements, the 1855 New York election is important primarily for completing the northern Whig party's obliteration as an independent political force. Discomfited by their isolation from antislavery men elsewhere and aware after New England's spring elections that even hostility to slavery extension could not preserve northern Whiggery, Seward, Weed, and their various lieutenants began to plot in May and June to merge their forces with New York's Free Soilers and anti-Nebraska Democrats in an anti-Know Nothing Republican party. Seward made no public statement until the fall, but the key decisions came in July. Early that month Seward privately endorsed the formation of a Republican party in Indiana. Three weeks later, Weed wrote Seward that within New York itself "the necessity of getting in line with other states is imperative." 138

Weed briefly toyed with the idea of calling a People's convention, as had been done in midwestern states a year earlier, 139 but instead he and others hit upon the idea of holding simultaneous Whig and Republican state conventions in Syracuse on September 26 to combine the two organizations. Even before this proposal was published in Whig newspapers, Haven had doubted "that there will be a Whig State Convention" in New York that year. Once the plan was broadcast, Weed's intentions were clear. "The Whig party is dissolved by the formal action of its leaders with a view to its reconstruction," former Democratic Governor Horatio Seymour told Secretary of State Marcy. Fillmore's friends and Washington Hunt concurred that "the Whig party is sick unto death," "moribund," and "foreordained... to be swallowed up in fusion" with the Republicans, a merger for which Sewardite Whig newspapers were "straining every nerve." 140

Many Sewardites optimistically endorsed the plan. The Republican movement was spreading like wildfire and would crush "Hunkerism, Know Nothingism and all its allies," one wrote Governor Myron Clark in early August. "This Republican movement cant be resisted—other states having gone so far with it," chimed another Weed lieutenant. Weed and Seward themselves were far more skeptical of success, at least in 1855. "It is possible that the state may be carried this fall," Weed told Seward to justify his call for simultaneous conventions. "There are elements enough, if combined, to effect it." Seward was even more reluctant to abandon the Whig organization. In September, when he congratulated Edward A. Stansbury upon his election as chairman of Vermont's new Republican state committee, he warned, "The revolution is inaugurated and it will prevail, but not everywhere, all at once. . . . We are by no means at the end but only at the beginning of the end."¹⁴¹

Democrats and Silver Gray Know Nothings were certain that fusion would fail abysmally. Assuming like so many others that Weed's stance in the Albany Evening Journal represented Seward's thinking, Seymour told Marcy that Seward's objective for the Republican organization was "to get entirely clear from the Silver Grays & induce a portion of the Democratic party to act with him." Yet, Seymour predicted, "he will lose a large number of Whigs," and few Democrats would join the "new organization." Given the "disastrous" handling of canal repairs by the incumbent Whig state administration and the obnoxious new prohibition law that Clark had signed, he added, Democrats should win the election on state issues. Only the effort of Whig papers that embraced the Republican movement "to excite the minds of the northern people against the South" gave him pause. 142

Convinced that New York's election ''must be between the Democracy & the Americans,'' Haven assured Fillmore that ''Fusion is out of the question . . . unless the extreme sectional Whigs fuse by voting the Democratic nomination'' rather than running a Republican ticket. Confident about the power of the anti-Catholic issue, other Know Nothings believed that they could easily undercut the Republican movement by demonstrating that ''Black republican'' leaders ''have long slept with [Archbishop John] Hughes'' and ''that Seward and Pierce have a common interest in crushing out the American sentiment in the country.'' Mocking Weed's effort to divide what was left of the Whig carcass, Nathan K. Hall rejoiced that Washington Hunt's letter clinging to Whiggery signaled that many Whigs ''will not go into the Republican fusion movement.''¹⁴³

Hunt, in fact, was not the only old-line Whig appalled by the Republican movement. "Whig young men will not follow the lead of King Weed & Company," crowed one Democrat, who expected Whig reinforcements for his party. "The total abandonment of the Whig party leaves all Whigs to form such political associations as best comports [sic] with their notions and ambition." More important, some conservatives wanted to preserve the Whig organization itself. In New York City, a Silver Gray wrote Fillmore in early October, "a strong organization of the Whigs will still be kept up to resist this [Republican] movement." Citing a meeting of those Manhattan Whigs, Hunt told Hamilton Fish, the state's most prominent Whig holdout, that "thousands of Whigs in the [upstate] counties will not vote the fusion ticket." And a week later, a worried Weed man from Oswego warned that "the Whigs who were once in the habit of contributing funds are now openly opposed to us & openly call a meeting . . . to resuscitate the old Whig party. $^{\prime\prime_{144}}$

Jeering that old-line Whig "opposition to the Republican movement is by no means equal to the Clay opposition to Taylor [in August and September 1848] which flattened out so completely," one Sewardite dismissed the New York City meeting in early October as "a miserable abortion." Nonetheless, he warned that in 1856 Republicans must bring in "the Trimbles of Ohio[,] the Winthrops & Walleys of Mass.[,] and the Bradishes & Fishes of N.Y." since "it seems to be hopeless in 1855." Indeed, a second straight-Whig convention in Manhattan on October 23 attracted delegates from thirty-one counties. They adopted resolutions by Robert A. West, the editor of the Commercial Advertiser, who probably arranged the meeting, that condemned the Republican movement and declared that the Whig party still lived. By late October, however, even most of these conservatives admitted that the mass of Whigs who had not joined the Know Nothings accepted the new Republican party, and they therefore resolved not to run their own candidates.¹⁴⁵

A month earlier, the incorporation of Sewardite Whigs into the new Republican party occurred with barely a hitch at Syracuse. Seward told one Whig delegate that "it didn't make a difference" whether he attended the Whig or the Republican convention. "He said we would go in by two doors, but we would all come out through one." Whigs, in fact, attended both conventions that initially met in separate locations. Committees from each agreed upon a common ticket and platform before formal merger was attempted. Free Soilers Preston King and Abijah Mann got the nominations for secretary of state and attorney general, but Whig James Cook was selected for comptroller to assure Whigs that, along with the executive officers chosen in 1854, Whigs would still control the all-important canal board.¹⁴⁶

The platform demanded slavery's exclusion from all territories, condemned Missouri's border ruffian outrages in Kansas, and opposed the admission of any new slave states. Significantly, it did not call for reimposition of the Missouri Compromise line, perhaps because New York's Know Nothings, like those elsewhere in the North, had in effect done so.¹⁴⁷ As to Know Nothingism itself, the platform was forthright: "We repudiate and condemn the proscriptive and antirepublican doctrines of the order of Know-Nothings, and all their secret constitutions, oaths, rituals, and organizations." The Whig convention approved both the ticket and the platform, as did the Republicans, after some grousing about the platform's complete silence on prohibition.

Once they had ratified the platform and ticket, Whigs adjourned and marched across town to the Republican gathering. Led by Weed himself, they entered to thunderous applause, and the combined membership then reratified the ticket and platform; added a renowned dry as Republican candidate for the state court of appeals, which would decide upon the constitutionality of the 1855 prohibition act; and appointed a Republican state committee. The New York Republican party was launched—after the New York Whig party had willfully committed organizational suicide.

Thunderous applause at Syracuse was not enough to bring Republicans victory. Winning pluralities in the four-way statewide races, Know Nothings captured all three executive posts, as well as control of the legislature and canal board. In the race for secretary of state, for example, Know Nothings won with 148,557 votes (34.1 percent), an increase of 26,000 over Ullmann's poll in 1854 despite an overall decline in turnout of 33,000 since that election. Republicans ran second with 136,698 (31.4 percent), 20,000 fewer than Clark had received a year earlier. The Soft and Hard Democratic candidates trailed with 91,336 (21 percent) and 59,353 (13.6 percent), respectively. "If we fail this fall," Seward's friend George Baker predicted three weeks before the election, "it will be because the people have read more about the Pope and Bishop Hughes than about Slavery and Equal Rights." Anti-Catholicism, indeed, clearly remained a powerful force among New York's voters, a force that the new Republican party, in a display of righteousness some Sewardites considered more foolish than brave, had explicitly repudiated. 148

Yet Democrats who complained that "this hurricane of Know Nothingism has been contributed to largely by the 'straight out Whigs' who rushed blindly in, to defeat republicanism" were also correct. As historian William E. Gienapp has demonstrated, Know Nothing voter support shifted dramatically from 1854 to 1855; antislavery men now voted Republican, while more conservative Whigs replaced them in American ranks. As one Whig consoled Hamilton Fish, "There is one thing about this contest quite discernible—that where they [Know Nothings] were strong last year they have now lost & where they were weak now they are strong." "To my mind," he wistfully added, "this is an indication that ere long they will die out."

Only three-fifths of Ullmann's 1854 supporters continued to vote Know Nothing; the remainder divided evenly among Republicans, Democrats, and abstainers. Conversely, whereas approximately one-fifth of Myron Clark's supporters went Know Nothing in 1855 and a smaller fraction abstained, the others moved into the Republican column. Indeed, they provided virtually all of the Republican votes. Free Soilers had voted for Clark in 1854, but even when measured against the 1852 presidential vote, Whigs outnumbered Free Soilers among 1855 Republican voters by five to one. Exceptionally few former Democrats supported the new party. The same estimates suggest that three-tenths of Winfield Scott's 1852 supporters abstained in 1855, while the remainder divided almost evenly between Republicans and Know Nothings. 151

New York's Whig party had been completely shattered. With its demise, all but diehards admitted, Whiggery as an independent political force had evaporated as thoroughly in the North as in the South. Hunt pragmatically attributed the collapse in New York and other free states to the transfer of "nearly all the [party's] machinery," its newspapers and local organizations, to the Republicans or Know Nothings, making it necessary for those who sought to perpetuate Whiggery "to reorganize and wait for better times." Seward, who loved the Whig party as much as Hunt, offered a deeper explanation of what had happened. No party could exist, he wrote organizers of Indiana's Republican party in July, unless it "admits and justifies the claim of every man of whatever race or clime or faith to equal protection with all others in the enjoyment of the inalienable Rights of Life and Civil and Religious Liberty and the pursuit of happiness" guaranteeed by the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence. Though "the Whig party" originally "cloth[ed] itself with the traditional policy of the Revolutionary fathers," it had abandoned its commitment to liberty for men of every race and faith. Seward implied, in sum, that Whigs' mission to save the Revolutionary experiment in republican self-government by rescuing public liberty had run its course. The issue now was the freedom of northern whites of whatever religious or ethnic background and indeed of blacks, and Whigs either ignored that issue or sided with the foes of freedom. New parties were necessary.¹⁵²

Yet it was on October 12, 1855, on the steps of the state capitol in Albany, that Seward delivered his most poignant public valedictory for the Whig party. It was time, he argued, for antislavery men to abandon Whiggery and rally to the new Republican party. Whatever the Whig party's past accomplishments, the past must be left behind; the battle against the Slave Power required a fresh start. "Shall we report ourselves to the Whig party? Where is it? 'Gentle Shepard' tell me where?" he asked. "It was a strong and vigorous party, honorable for energy, noble achievements, and still more noble enterprises." Yet "it was moved by panics and fears to emulate the Democratic party in its practiced subserviency" to the Slave Power. "It yielded in spite of your remonstrances and mine, and now there is neither Whig party, nor Whig, south of the Potomac." Then came the moving peroration. "Let, then, the Whig party pass. It committed a grievous fault, and grievously hath it answered [for] it. Let it march out of the field, therefore, with all the honors." 153

ΧI

Millard Fillmore's friends did not mourn the death of the Whig party in New York or anywhere else. By their analysis, New York's results proved that the American party, now purged of antislavery men and firmly in the hands of Unionists, could carry New York and thus deliver it to Fillmore in 1856. Even sweeter, they had "routed the Fusion republicans," stripped them "of power & patronage" in New York, and thereby "destroyed Sewardism." Best of all, Seward's futile efforts to "break down the American party there, by consolidating the whole force of abolitionism, Whig and Democratic, in a republican fusion against it" had succeeded only in driving conservatives in both the South and North into the arms of the American party. Therefore, crowed Kennedy, "the Whigs especially" who had thus far spurned the American movement must now look to it "as the chief repository of that national conservatism which has been the distinctive point of their creed." 154

Republicanism had hardly been "routed" or Sewardism "destroyed" in New York. Events in the following weeks and months quickly revived both. Even as he "grieve[d] for the disappointment of so many good friends" and hung his "head with shame" at the Know Nothing victory, Seward predicted that no "other termination of the canvass would have been better calculated to promote our ultimate success." Know Nothings' boasts were "just so much gas in any ascending balloon. . . . But the balloon is always sure, not only to come down, but to come down very quick." The presidential election of 1856 would determine the rivals' true strength. "The 'Know Nothings' will inevitably disappear in the heat of the great national contest," Seward told his son. "A year is necessary to let the cheat wear off."

Nor were die-hard Whigs yet prepared to give up the ghost by joining either the Know Nothings or the Republicans. "I agree with you fully that we ought to preserve the Whig organization," Hunt wrote Fish on December 20, 1855. Even though almost all Whig newspapers and "active politicians who are looking for patronage advancement" in the North and South had gone over to the Republicans, the Know Nothings, or, in the South, the Democrats, there were still "in every state (or nearly all) a respectable body of men, respectable for numbers and intelligence, who are still Whigs and will not act with any of the other parties except as a choice of evils for the time being." Certain "that neither the K. N. or the Fusion [Republican] combination can be of long duration," Hunt predicted that "one presidential election will finish them both." Whoever won it, "then all or nearly all the honest Whigs who are now acting in either of the factions, will be glad to resume the Whig name and do battle again for national Whig principles." Holdout Whigs like Hunt, Fish, Winthrop, and others must therefore hold "a National Convention" in 1856 "to demonstrate that we are still alive as a national party."

Kennedy, Seward, and Hunt each articulated what had been on the minds of Whig politicians since the party first began to disintegrate after the 1852 election. Anything might happen in off-year state and congressional elections. But the final fate of the Whig party would be determined only by the presidential campaign of 1856.

Chapter 26

"The Whig Party Is Dead and Buried"

"The Whig party died of too much respectability and not enough people." That, at least, was the opinion of Edward Stafford, a Republican newspaper editor from Jackson, Mississippi, five years after the Civil War. A review of the reasons for the party's rise and fall demonstrates the manifold inadequacies of Stafford's witty epitaph. As this last chapter also seeks to show, however, Stafford quite accurately described the party's final death throes in 1856.

I

By the end of 1855, so many one-time Whig voters and leaders had deserted their former party for new organizations that it did indeed have far too few people to contest the presidency in 1856. But Stafford's sarcastic gibe fails to explain why the Whigs had been reduced to that condition by the start of 1856. To the extent that he posited a causal connection between his two variables—that the Whig party had too few supporters because its self-righteous aura of respectability and social superiority turned most American voters against it—his analysis is manifestly wrong. Although the majority of the nation's politically active wealthy citizens supported the Whig party, it had never been the exclusive preserve of the rich. Although the often self-consciously respectable, God-fearing, churchgoing, sober middle classes in towns and cities across the nation also tended to be Whig, moreover, the party could never have dominated almost every city in the country or the small towns and prosperous agricultural regions that constituted the core of its strength if only the social elite and smugly fastidious middle classes composed it.

Nor was a sense of social and moral superiority the main reason even the upper and middling classes gravitated to Whiggery. Whig supporters were attracted by the commonwealth tradition of republican government Whigs espoused and Democrats so vigorously rejected. Inherited by the Whigs from the Madisonian wing of the Republican party to which Henry Clay had belonged, this tradition held that government at all levels of the federal system should be used positively to elevate people economically, socially, and morally through the internal development of the nation's civic institutions and economic infrastructure rather than through foreign expansionism and adventurism, the only positive use of government that Democrats championed and one that appalled most Whigs.

Initially, however, a related, but equally powerful, republican conviction engendered the Whig party. This was the belief that the fundamental purpose of the Revolutionary experiment in republican self-government was to protect personal and popular (or public) liberty from concentrations of arbitrary and tyrannical power that would lead inevitably to the people's figurative "enslavement" unless actively resisted and repudiated. Whigs' commitment to this bedrock tenet never wavered. It explains why so many of them cherished the very name "Whig," with its reverberations of the Revolutionary struggle. Nor did Whigs view it as separate from their concomitant commonwealth belief in an activist state, which Whigs hoped would liberate people from restrictive conditions, debilitating character defects, and unhealthy dependencies. Similarly, Whigs advocated government promotion and subsidization of economic growth and diversification through the expansion of banking credit and currency, the granting of corporate privileges, tariff protection, and internal improvements because they sincerely believed that such diversification enhanced individuals' economic freedom by expanding their opportunities for upward economic mobility.

In the winter of 1833–34, however, economic prosperity obviated the need for and the electoral appeal of such programs. Instead, the Whig party formed around a crusade to save public liberty and republican self-government from Andrew Jackson's supposedly tyrannical executive usurpations that upset the constitutional balance between branches of the national government and that seemed to violate the laws of the land. While these concerns facilitated a coalition of various anti-Jackson leaders, they did not ensure Whig success at the grass-roots level. Indeed, the party flourished at the state level only when it took concrete, partisanly distinctive stands on state public policies and demonstrated the congruence between its founding principles and state affairs. Nor, manifestly, did a crusade against executive tyranny combine the heterogeneous Whig legions behind a single presidential candidate in 1836. Only the Panic of 1837 and Democrats' response to it allowed Whigs to unite behind a positive agenda for governmentaided economic recovery and to make a persuasive case to the electorate for the necessity of positive governance, the interrelatedness of what state and national governments did, and the inadequacies of the Democratic alternatives.

From the start, indeed, Whigs were deeply divided between Northerners and Southerners over slavery and other matters; between National Republicans and later converts, whether former Jacksonians, Antimasons, or southern State Rights men; between self-styled progressives and self-conscious conservatives; and among ambitious politicos and their personal devotees, be they Clay, Webster, and others who chafed at those titans' pretensions to the party's presidential nominations or factional rivals in Vermont, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, and so many other states. Those divisions, utterly omitted from Stafford's caustic postmortem, contributed far more than "too much respectability" to the Whig party's death.

From the beginning, these centrifugal forces were counteracted by a powerful centripetal pressure that Stafford also failed to recognize. That cohesive force was deeply principled opposition to Democrats and a common abhorrence of what Democrats stood for, or, at least in Whigs' biased eyes, seemed to stand for—executive suppression of the legislative will; the negative, do-nothing state; warmongering expansionism; corruption; subservience to the demands of their Catholic, immigrant, and rum-swilling constituents; and, by the mid-1840s, Union-threatening and liberty-crushing Slave Power aggression. If anything, indeed, Stafford's omission of the synergistic relationship between Democrats and Whigs in the death—and life—of the Whig party is even more glaring than his silence about its internal divisions.

If Stafford's epigrammatic epitaph is manifestly incomplete, why, then, was the Whig party at death's door when 1856 began? Only the cumulative and combined impact of many factors can explain the party's demise. The problem and the source of disagreement among historians who have seriously considered it—is how to weigh or prioritize those many factors. Focusing on the party's woes during its last six or eight years, some historians attribute the party's demise to increasingly hostile sectional antagonism over slavery and to sectionalism's inseparable concomitant, many northern and southern Whigs' genuine fears about the danger that sectional agitation posed to the Union. Others cite the increasingly fractious infighting among Whig leaders. Still others stress the uniquely subversive impact of new issues like nativism and prohibitionism on the Whig electorate in the 1850s. All of these did indeed contribute to the party's ultimate collapse, but historians too often view those corrosive forces as mutually exclusive. More important, any explanation that focuses only on the party's final years misses the mark. The reasons for the party's death can be found in the same dynamics that first allowed it to rise and flourish.

In essence, the history of the Whig party was encapsulated in the fluctuating balance between the divisive centrifugal forces that threatened to tear it apart and the centripetal pressure of conflict with and difference from the Democrats that held it together. Between 1834 and 1854 that balance followed a parabolic and surprisingly symmetrical trajectory, with its apogee in 1844. Beginning in 1834, only common opposition to Jackson united the new coalition. Divisive forces were clearly stronger, as evidenced by the three-headed presidential campaign in 1836, the holdout of Antimasons in some northern states and State Rights parties in some southern states, and sharp sectional splits between northern and southern Whigs over slavery and the gag rule in Congress.

Even before 1837, however, a few state parties—in Ohio, North Carolina, and New Jersey, for example—managed to rally behind distinctive state programs and against their Democratic opposites. After the Panic, the balance between centrifugal and centripetal forces tilted increasingly toward the latter in response to the dramatic sharpening of programmatic differences between the two parties at both the national and state levels of the federal system. Personal rivalries for the 1840 presidential nomination notwithstanding, hard times and the major parties' divergent remedies for them rallied growing numbers of Whig voters and brought both northern and southern anti-Democratic holdouts into the Whig fold.

Division flickered again in the break with Tyler, and disarray in Washington dearly cost Whigs in the off-year elections between the spring of 1841 and late 1843 as disillusioned and disappointed new supporters stayed home on election days. But that split also solidified the vast majority of Whigs against Tyler and behind Henry Clay and his programs. Thus, in the presidential campaign of 1844, Whigs were never more unified and their differences from the Democrats were never sharper. Yet still the Whigs lost a heartbreakingly close election.

After that election, the parabolic trajectory of the balance between cohesive and divisive forces in the party turned downward. Almost immediately internal rifts intensified—over the reasons for Clay's defeat, over the next presidential nominee, over Texas' annexation, over the response to the Native American and Liberty parties, and within certain state parties like those of Massachusetts, New York, and Georgia. Nonetheless, common opposition to the economic policies of James K. Polk and his Democratic congressional allies and to the Mexican War kept the balance tilted toward centripetal pressures, allowed the Whigs to rebound in the 1846-47 state and congressional elections, and helped them win the congressional, gubernatorial, and presidential elections of 1848. Almost from the moment of Zachary Taylor's election in November 1848, however, interparty conflict between Whigs and Democrats diminished and intraparty divisions among Whigs dangerously escalated. By 1854 the balance between centrifugal and centripetal forces had returned approximately to its starting point in 1834, yet with an absolutely crucial difference: the emergence of powerful and attractive new parties that could siphon off the Whigs' leadership cadre and electorate.

II

To a large but not exclusive extent, therefore, explaining the Whig party's expiration requires explaining the shifting relationships after 1844 between the forces of interparty conflict and intraparty division. The diminution of the first and exacerbation of the second together did alienate Whig voters, provoke their defection, and thereby contribute to the problem of "not enough people." The danger for the historian, however, lies in totally conflating the reasons for the two divergent trends.

At times the two processes did stem from a common cause, and never more so than with the exacerbation of sectional conflict over slavery extension after 1848. That divided Whigs against each other along North-South lines and within a number of states. Simultaneously, in Congress during 1850 and in a number of states that year and later, it caused some Whigs to side with Democrats of like mind against intraparty foes, thereby diminishing the perception of difference between the parties. Yet, however principled disagreements were between rival Whigs over whether to emphasize preservation of the Union and intersectional comity within the Whig party, on the one hand, or protection of sectional rights and interests, on the other, principle alone did not cause those divisions. In Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Georgia, those disagreements also reflected the preexistence of rival factions motivated in many cases by different issues or simply by the conflicting ambitions of rival politicos. Those rivalries had been dramatically intensified indeed by so nonideological a matter as federal patronage allotment by the Taylor and Fillmore administrations. And even where state organizations did not divide over slavery, as in Maryland, Virginia, and Ohio, rancorous internal feuds weakened the party.

Similarly, the weakening of Whigs' competitive position against, and the diminution of their conflict with, Democrats helped spur internal Whig division over the best strategy for coping with their plight, and those processes coincided in time. But they were distinct and must be analyzed separately. Nor can analysis focus solely on the Whigs and the societal conditions to which they reacted.

From the time of the Whig party's birth, Democrats vitally determined its fortunes and fate. Opposition to the Democrats and Democratic policies was always the strongest glue holding the Whigs together and the strongest incentive for men to go to the polls to vote Whig. Sometimes the biggest Democratic target emerged in Washington, whether it was Jackson's Caesarism, Van Buren's wrongheaded and cold-hearted response to the depression, or Polk's warmongering and seemingly vulnerable economic program. Just as often, however, it appeared in individual states, whether New York Democrats' opposition to canal expansion, Ohio, Louisiana, and New Jersey Democrats' hard-money policies, North Carolina and Tennessee Democrats' opposition to railroad subsidies, or Mississippi Democrats' bond repudiation.

Any shift by Democrats toward Whiggish stands on issues such as Pennsylvania Democrats' embrace of tariff protection in 1844, Midwestern Democrats' endorsement of internal improvements in the 1840s and 1850s, North Carolina Democrats' acquiescence in railroad aid after 1848, or Alabama Democrats' shift to a probanking stance in 1849, therefore, could dull both party differences and men's incentive to vote Whig. Logrolling deals between the two parties in state constitutional conventions in Virginia, Louisiana, and Maryland had the same effect. The burgeoning prosperity after 1848 based on California gold strikes and increased foreign investment, however, did the most to blunt Whigs' economic appeals. Prosperity undermined the justification for Whigs' positive governmental programs; drove far more Democrats in a probanking, probusiness, prodevelopment direction; and, with the boom in railroad construction, divided both parties along regional and interest group lines, thereby further blurring interparty differences.

Democratic decisions after 1848 on the slavery issue also gravely damaged the Whigs. Blaming their defeats that year on the Whigs' artful Janus-faced campaign, the Democrats trumped it with one of their own in 1849. Swinging to a more adamant antislavery stance, often in combination with Free Soilers, in the North and to a more extreme proslavery stance in the South, where some Whigs felt compelled to go along, they outflanked the Whigs in the 1849 elections. Thus they made it impossible for Whigs from the two sections to unite behind Taylor's plan for the Mexican Cession or the congressional Compromise. Then pro-Compromise Democrats helped lure Whigs away from their party in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, and subsequently they left them stranded in non-Whig Union parties in 1852.

Whigs themselves, of course, also contributed to the diminution of interparty differences. Genuine devotion to the Union undoubtedly motivated Millard Fillmore's insistence that all Whigs acquiesce in the finality of the Compromise of 1850, but his administration's stance injured northern Whigs even as it helped their southern counterparts. Egregious Whig blunders that reflected defective political judgment also muddled interparty differences. The abortive attempt to displace the Whig party with a new Taylor Republican party wrought electoral havoc in 1849 and intensified internal Whig divisions. The hope that it could succeed was sheer fantasy, as the Taylor administration itself seemed finally to recognize. Similarly, the hopes of the Georgians Stephens and Toombs and of Daniel Webster that they could replace the Whig party with a permanent Union party incorporating pro-Compromise Democrats were surreal. As events in the Deep South in 1852 demonstrated and as Webster's close Boston friend Samuel Eliot argued, no Union party could exist without a "vis-a-vis," without a coherent anti-Union opponent. By 1852 no such party was to be found.² Sewardite Whigs were equally guilty of mistakes that erased interparty differences. However understandable, their desperate decision during the 1852 presidential campaign to compete with Democrats for Catholic and immigrant votes was a colossal blunder. It failed dismally in the short run and permanently alienated an important, rapidly growing sector of the anti-Democratic electorate in the long run. Nor did Whig leaders prove much more skillful in handling the other powerful and divisive new social issue that emerged in the early 1850s—prohibition. By 1853 Free Soilers profited at Whigs' expense from the issue in Connecticut, Ohio, and Wisconsin, while in Maine and Massachusetts, Whigs tried to forge coalitions with dry or wet Democrats that further diminished interparty differences.

Whigs' internal divisions deepened and widened after 1848 even as the reality and perception of conflict with Democrats declined. Without question, the most important and pernicious of those divisions was the split between northern and southern Whigs, and among northern Whigs themselves, over matters related to slavery and slavery expansion that preoccupied the attention of politicians in Washington after Taylor's election. Yet the rifts intensified by the Taylor administration's bungling patronage policies and Fillmore's attempts to rectify them were almost as damaging. They increased the difficulty of rallying the party behind a presidential candidate in 1852 and simultaneously helped convince one-time supporters that spoils, rather than distinctive programs, was all that party leaders cared about.

Equally pernicious and divisive were the selfish ambition and dogmatic intolerance of so many Whig leaders, who often acted with heedless disregard for the party's welfare in order to advance their personal careers or simply to humiliate Whig rivals. Daniel Webster heads this list of self-centered villains. Many Whigs after 1847 also saw Henry Clay acting from spiteful selfishness, although perhaps just as many viewed him as the party's savior, as, of course, did Clay himself. But second-tier politicos who sought personal advancement at the expense of intraparty foes, whatever the cost to internal party harmony, like New York's John Young and Hugh Maxwell, Pennsylvania's William F. Johnston, Maryland's Reverdy Johnson, Kentucky's Archibald Dixon, North Carolina's Thomas Clingman, and Georgia's Robert Toombs, also did the Whigs immense harm. If Democrats always helped determine Whigs' fortunes, in short, many of their wounds were self-inflicted.

All of these things—the loss of distinctive and viable issues, corrosive sectional division and distrust, bitter factional and personal rivalries, ineptitude in handling new issues—weakened the Whig party, alienated many of its former supporters, and left it on the ropes by the end of 1853. By themselves, however, they did not kill it. Shorn of responsibility for national and most states' patronage by the election results of 1852, Whigs escaped a divisive burden and could profit from the toll it took on Democrats. By the time Fillmore left office in March 1853, moreover, sectional tensions had abated and along with them the threat to Whig integrity from a new Union party. True, in most places Whigs failed to develop a compelling platform in 1853 when abstention and defection to minor parties continued to weaken voters' allegiance to the party. Even that year, however, they exploited Democratic divisions in Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Missouri, and California to run creditable campaigns, and they remained quite competitive in Florida, Louisiana, and the upper South. More important, they correctly expected Democrats in the new Thirty-Third Congress to do something against which all Whigs could unite and rally, as they had during the administrations of Polk, Van Buren, and Jackson.

The Democrats' Nebraska Act supplied the anticipated provocation, but for three vitally important reasons Whigs could not mobilize their former legions against it. First, the tiny bloc of Free Soilers in Congress managed to define the Nebraska bill as an aggressive Slave Power attempt to spread slavery against the wishes of the North rather than as a Democratic violation of sectional peace that threatened the Union. This brilliant tactical coup prevented northern and southern Whigs from uniting against it and goaded most southern Whigs in Congress instead to support it. Southern Whigs' defection, in turn, caused outraged northern Whigs either to seek new antislavery allies, as the Free Soilers hoped, or to ignore southern sensibilities during the 1854 elections in the belief that southern Whigs had signaled their willingness once again to let northern and southern Whigs disagree on slavery-related matters. The Nebraska Act thus badly damaged intersectional comity in the party, although some Whigs in both sections continued to hope that it might be restored in time for the 1856 election.

Restoration failed in large part because of the second development that frustrated Whig hopes of a united rally against Democratic actions. Many Whig and Democratic voters in the North, where most of the 1854 elections occurred, proved as, if not more, motivated by prohibitionist zeal and anti-Catholic, anti-immigrant, and antiparty rancor as by anti-Nebraska sentiment. Despite Whig efforts to revive the party on anti-Nebraska platforms, therefore, many one-time Whig voters bolted to the Know Nothing party and to splinter prohibition tickets. In the Midwest, they expressed their multivalent grievances against the Democrats through new fusion parties that displaced the Whigs as the primary vehicle for anti-Democratic political action. Whatever the destination of Whig defectors, by the end of 1854 the northern Whig party itself was so decimated that neither northern conservatives nor Southerners who had hoped to preserve the Whig organization for the 1856 presidential campaign believed it was any longer worth the effort.

These developments point to the third and most important reason why Whig hopes of rallying the party foundered. Politics in the nineteenth century was not a zero-sum game. Voters were not restricted to a choice between two major parties, so that one always gained from the electorate's anger at the other. Since parties printed and distributed their own ballots, it was easy to start new parties that might grow rapidly if they discovered compelling issues, as the Know Nothings and the embryonic Republican party manifestly did. Though easily overlooked, this ability to challenge existing major parties for access to the electorate, more than anything else, explains why the Whig party lacked "enough people" to remain a viable political force by the end of 1855.

Whigs were absolutely correct to expect that Franklin Pierce's administration and the Democratic Congress would alienate the American electorate. Where they erred was in their corollary assumption that they alone would benefit from the voters' disgust and anger. Their poisonous leadership feuds, their unseemly and often corrupt scramble to feed at the public teat, the obsolescence of much of their traditional economic platform, their attempts to maintain bisectional comity in the face of escalating sectional antagonisms, their waffling on the prohibition issue, and their disastrous solicitation of Catholic and immigrant support in 1852 alienated far too many voters for the party ever to regain their trust. For too many people, the Whig party had become part of the problem, not its solution. Thus, when both Know Nothings and Republicans found compelling ways to revive and usurp the party's original ideological mission of saving republican liberty from conspiracies against it, a mission that Whigs had seemingly abandoned, the party's days were numbered.

Ш

In this broader context, Edward Stafford had a point when he cited "too much respectability" as a cause of the Whigs' demise. Neither the partisan preference of most wealthy families for the Whigs nor the privileged educational background and social eminence of many Whig leaders necessarily drove the "people" away from the Whig party. Rather, the temperament instilled by privileged social backgrounds rendered many Whigs inflexible and inept political leaders. They were frequently too conservative, too cautious, too disdainful of political infighting, too slow to recognize the need to alter course in the face of public pressure for the party's benefit. The adamant, politically costly, and ultimately unsuccessful opposition by Whig leaders to constitutional revision in Maryland, Kentucky, North Carolina, Ohio, and Indiana is one such instance where Whigs undoubtedly suffered from "too much respectability," where innate conservatism put them on the losing side of an issue.

The presidential campaign of 1852 is another. No doubt 1852 was a Democratic year, but arguably the party would have been far wiser to run Fillmore on the platform his friends dictated than Winfield Scott. Sewardite northern Whigs had already decided not to run against the Compromise that year, and they had staked too much on Whig success in state or congressional races in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and elsewhere to bolt if Fillmore were the nominee. Fillmore quite possibly could have run as creditably in the North as Scott, and he most certainly would have run better in the South. Even Stephens and Toombs could not have stopped Georgia's Whigs from backing him, his nomination would also have finished the Alabama and Mississippi Union parties, and Whigs in other southern states would have been spared considerable backbiting.

Thus, though defeated, the party would have emerged from the election far stronger and more united than it was, especially, indeed, if Fillmore were defeated. Yet Sewardites did not prevent Fillmore's nomination. Rather, it was the ostrichlike stubbornness of the blue-blooded Websterites in the Massachusetts delegation to the Baltimore national convention. Of them, Francis Granger, Fillmore's friend and as conservative a man as the Whig party possessed, angrily wrote: "The rest, Choate included, seemed to me to act like a parcel of school boys, waiting for the sky to fall that they might catch larks. Such another collection of respectable out of place gentlemen was never seen." Naive and amateurish gentlemen who had long made the Massachusetts Whig party the same kind of private club its National Republican and Federalist predecessors had been simply would not do. At decisive moments like the Baltimore convention, the Whigs too often lacked hardheaded realists.

"Too much respectability" also hurt the Whig party after 1852. For one thing, the self-consciously sober, church-going, respectable Protestant middle classes who formed the party's base across the North were far more vulnerable to incursions by new prohibition, nativist, and antislavery parties than were Democratic constituencies. For another, precisely the conservative, cautious, safely respectable aura that so many Whig leaders cultivated made the Whig party seem precisely the wrong vehicle to channel, let alone to lead, crusades against new liberty-threatening conspiracies that voters identified with the Democrats. However much Whig leaders condemned Democrats' assault on a sacrosanct sectional compromise in 1854, they did not seem the men to take on the Slave Power. Moreover, despite the Protestant bona fides of Whig leaders and their unquestionable social revulsion toward immigrants, they could not be trusted to lead a populistic crusade to ensure that Protestant Americans ruled America.

Repelled by the hurly-burly of politics and grass-roots popular enthusiasms, many former Whig leaders simply could not or would not confront or adjust to political convulsions after 1853. Precisely their conservative abhorrence of the Republicans and their snobbish contempt for the populistic Know Nothings caused respectable gentlemen like Robert Winthrop, Edward Everett, Rufus Choate, Hamilton Fish, Daniel D. Barnard, James Pearce, William C. Rives, William A. Graham, and others of their ilk to stand on the sidelines during 1855 and to cling to the shell of the rapidly disintegrating Whig party. It was precisely such out-of-place, respectable gentlemen on whom Washington Hunt counted at the end of 1855 to preserve the Whig party so that it could fight again another day. They, too, would willingly suspend disbelief, blindly ignore disconcerting realities, and await a miracle to save the party.⁴

IV

Announcing in January 1855 that "the Whig party is dead," an Illinois Democratic editor chortled, "In a few years they will be as few and far between as the old Federalists, the National Republicans, the National Bank, or the Tariff party men." Diehards like Hunt hoped to stop such Whig scattering. Hunt admitted that the depleted party could not elect a president on its own in 1856. His goal, rather, was "to preserve the Whig organization" by holding a "National Convention to demonstrate that we are still alive as a national party," a scheme he hawked to other New York conservatives in early 1856. Assuming that neither the Know Nothing nor the Republican party could be "of long duration" and that both would be finished by "one presidential election," he believed that after its conclusion, "all or nearly all the honest Whigs who are now acting in either of the factions, will be glad to resume the Whig name and do battle again for national Whig principles."⁵

This strategy of waiting out events in 1856 and then resurrecting the Whig party was itself hostage to those events. Hunt mistakenly assumed that the surging sectional, ethnic, and religious animosities that fed the rise of the Know Nothing and Republican parties would subside during 1856. He calculated that neither Republicans nor Know Nothings would generate sufficient momentum in 1856 to endure. Yet it was just as likely that at least one of them would do so well that Whigs who had joined it would never consider returning to the Whig fold. And he blithely presumed that conservatives like himself and Fish who still clung to Whiggery would continue to stand apart from all other parties rather than being pressured by the exigencies of the presidential election itself to join one, a decision that could prove permanent, not temporary.

Other conservative Whigs, indeed, believed that it was foolish to preserve the Whig organization and that Whig principles, certainly Whigs' commitment to the Union, could best be perpetuated by aligning with the American party and "National Democrats" behind Fillmore's presidential candidacy. Insisting that Fillmore's chances would be ruined "by a regular, formal, old party nomination," John P. Kennedy, for example, envisioned the creation by newspaper endorsements of a platform-free Union coalition behind Fillmore that would displace the Whig party even as it was "altogether dependent upon the cordial support it may get from'' conservative Whigs.6 Vermont's ex-Congressman Andrew Tracy envisioned a different destination for men like Hunt and Kennedy. Like other Vermont Whigs in December 1855 and January 1856, Tracy urged his successor, Justin Morrill, to help build up the Republican party as a replacement for the Whigs. "As for that hybrid animal, [the] national Whig[s]," he sneered, "the sooner they unite in name, as they already have, in feeling, with the Pierce Democracy, the better for us." Conservative Whigs, in sum, could just as likely join the Democrats as rally behind Fillmore. And whatever they did, northern antislavery Whigs like Tracy hardly seemed ready to reunite with them in the Whig party after 1856.7

At the start of 1856, therefore, still uncommitted Whigs might be lured by three different parties. Complete retirement from political activity also powerfully beckoned many of them. Spurning a request to join the Republicans late in the year, George Ashmun, Webster's chief lieutenant in the House during 1850, exclaimed, "I am clear, & intend to keep clear, of all party associations. I have had enough of them, more than enough, & have accomplished an absolute disenthralment from the slavery, worse than African, which they involve." Diehards who hoped to preserve the Whig party, therefore, had to do something to hold the remaining Whigs together and keep them politically engaged. During January they debated their options.

Some, like Hunt and New York City Whig editor Robert A. West, wanted to make immediate preparations for a Whig national convention. They waited, however, for a conclave of Whigs in New York City on January 10 that had been arranged by James A. Hamilton, son of the famous Federalist, to plot the party's future course. Ultimately, only a few patrician Whigs from New York City and Boston attended the gathering, but Hamilton claimed to have letters supporting his plans from Whigs in at least nine states. Insisting that his tiny assemblage therefore represented "the sentiment of the Whig party," this "select number of leading Whigs," as Daniel Barnard called them, "determined that there should be no national Whig convention, and of course no separate Presidential nomination." Rather, after the other parties named their candidates, Hamilton would "summon another meeting by letter, which meeting should decide what course the Whigs should pursue." In the meantime, Hamilton would urge his Whig correspondents to refrain from joining other parties and to remain ready for independent action.⁹

Even this gathering was plagued by "too much respectability." Hypocritically, West warned Fish when reporting on its proceedings that Hamilton was "not the people's man enough" to lead the Whig remnant out of the wilderness. "His tastes and ideas are too much above those of the masses for him to enter into their feelings or make sufficient allowance for their intellectual obtuseness, mental ignorance, or moral obliquity." West, in short, was every bit the snob that Hamilton was. Only such out-of-touch fossils sought to rejuvenate Whiggery.

As had always been the case, keeping the organizational machinery of the party in working order was the job of leaders, not rank-and-file Whig voters, no matter how passionate their loyalty to the Whig name and principles. The problem, therefore, was how many Whig leaders remained to take on this task and whether they had the capacity to accomplish it. That capacity, in turn, involved their own talent, commitment, and sagacity, but it also hinged heavily on the political situation they confronted.

Die-hard Whigs consciously chose to wait out events until the summer before acting, but almost every development between early February and the end of June 1856 damaged prospects of preserving the Whig party either behind Fillmore's candidacy or without him. In retrospect, Kennedy and others who urged remaining Whigs to rally around Fillmore identified the only possibility, however remote, of preserving the Whig party as a functioning political body. While the magnetic forces that pulled remaining Whigs toward the Republican and Democratic parties constituted part of the Whig party's final act in 1856, therefore, Whigs' reaction to Fillmore's campaign gave that denouement its central theme.

If Fillmore won or even if he ran second in the three-candidate presidential race of 1856, his unionist coalition could provide Whigs a vehicle in which to persevere as the nation's primary anti-Democratic party. Achieving either goal, like the resuscitation of the Whig party itself, however, hinged upon a fundamental requirement: limiting the growth of the Republican party. For that reason, the factors that caused Fillmore to run a distant third in 1856 drove the final nails into the Whig party's coffin. Rather than sustaining the possibility of its postelection resurrection, the events of 1856 buried it beyond hope of revival. Since those events have been very ably analyzed elsewhere, and since the main focus here is on the remaining Whigs who watched them as spectators rather than shaping them as active participants, they can be quickly sketched.¹¹

V

While conservative elitists from New York dithered during January, the House of Representatives in Washington was locked in a nine-week struggle to elect its speaker that dramatically underscored the improbability of putting the Whig party back together. Democrats were outnumbered in the House by almost two to one, and only about seventy Democrats were Pierce administration loyalists. Excluding anti-Nebraska Democrats, who clung to the Democracy even as they opposed Pierce, straight Whigs, Know Nothing/Whigs, Know Nothing/Democrats, Know Nothings of Free Soil or nonpartisan background, and anti-Nebraska fusionists, many of whom by December 1855 sought an exclusively northern and overtly antisouthern Republican party, constituted the polyglot opposition. Amazingly, the largest single non-Democratic bloc was the 117 one-time Whigs, exactly half of the total House membership, elected in 1854–55 in the best performance by Whig congressional candidates since 1846–47.¹²

These one-time Whigs, however, included Northerners and Southerners, Know Nothings, non-Know Nothings, and overt anti-Know Nothings who had often courted Democratic support, beneficiaries of the northern anti-Nebraska fusion movements, and northern conservatives intransigently opposed to a new anti-slavery northern party. With Whig reunion behind a common candidate for speaker apparently unlikely, the central question when Congress convened, therefore, seemed to be whether northern and southern Know Nothings, approximately 115 of the members, or various northern anti-Nebraska men who numbered a few more, including many Whigs and Whig/Know Nothings, would seize the prize and other posts all parties coveted—the House clerk, sergeant-at-arms, doorkeeper, postmaster, and printer.¹³

Since Northerners constituted the majority of the opposition, anti-Know Nothing Republicans like the editor Gamaliel Bailey and Joshua R. Giddings, who sought the speakership himself, insisted on a Northerner with "back-bone" and no nativist affiliation. Has ut it quickly became clear that only an anti-Nebraska Know Nothing could win. This imperative might allow a coalition between straight Whigs and Know Nothing/Whigs from both sections behind a common candidate. When the initial Democratic caucus issued a statement praising the Nebraska Act and blasting Know Nothings, causing southern Americans and most southern Whigs to vow never to support any Democrat who had participated in it, the chances of such a bisectional Whig coalition seemed to improve. He is the chances of such a bisectional Whig coalition seemed to improve.

Whig/Know Nothings had a plausible ticket for such a deal that might help resuscitate the national Whig party. For over a year, Ohio's Lew Campbell had courted southern Whig support for the speakership race. When Tennessee's Whig/Know Nothing William Cullom, whose courageous anti-Nebraska stance in 1854 earned him the admiration of northern Whigs and cost him reelection in 1855, announced his candidacy for the House clerkship, the possibility of reuniting Whigs behind that duo increased.

For various reasons, however, it never materialized. First, southern and northern Know Nothing congressmen immediately quarreled over the platforms adopted at Philadelphia in June and at Cincinnati in November, causing Fillmore's frustrated lieutenant Solomon G. Haven to complain, "To save me from perdition I can contrive no way to prevent it." Second, some Republicans initially backed Campbell as sufficiently "extreme," and their support alienated both conservative northern Whigs and all southern Americans from him. Instead, they supported northern moderates like Pennsylvania's Henry Fuller, James Cooper's Whig friend and a Know Nothing "who has no record on national matters but is a national Whig," or New Jersey's Alexander Pennington, who had voted against the Nebraska bill but won reelection as a straight Whig with no connection to either Republicans or Know Nothings. Third, anti-Nebraska Democrats and Democratic Know Nothings refused to support any ex-Whig for speaker, especially since the Whig Cullom seemed assured of the clerkship. Instead, they, along with most New England members, eventually rallied behind Massachusetts' Nathaniel P. Banks, an anti-Nebraska Democrat and prominent Know Nothing. As a result, Campbell never got more than eighty-one votes, far from the necessary majority. After a few ballots, he grudgingly withdrew his candidacy, and most northern anti-Nebraska men then clung to Banks, whom Republicans, seeking permanently to displace the Whig party, quickly anointed as their standard bearer. 16

In early February, Banks finally won a plurality vote over the South Carolinian William Aiken, who had replaced the Democrats' original candidate. Not a single Southerner voted for Banks, while all but a handful of one-time northern Whigs in Congress did so. Even though Cullom and several other southern Whig/Know Nothings won the coveted House patronage slots, the opportunity of using the speakership contest to reunite Whigs had been lost.

Since early December, most Northerners had viewed this struggle in nakedly sectional terms, and they urged their congressmen to "stick to Banks at all events" to prove that "there is a North." Vermont, one former Whig wrote Justin Morrill, was pervaded by "but one feeling... fear that the Slave Power will ultimately triumph." Thus one Pennsylvania Whig convert to Republicanism pronounced Banks' victory "a great triumph for the North." Since Maine's Republicans needed a "demonstration of the fact that we had a party" in Washington, echoed Edward Kent to Congressman Israel Washburn, Jr., "the election of Mr. Banks electrified us all." And Washburn himself crowed, "The importance of this victory cannot well be overestimated." In sum, Banks' triumph, coupled with a Republican organizational meeting in Pittsburgh on February 22 that called for a national nominating convention in June, gave powerful momentum to the new Republican party. Whigs now had two potent rivals for their role as the primary anti-Democratic party. 17

Know Nothings, in fact, also took some solace from the result. Many nativists considered Banks "a straight out and out K. N.," and over 70 of his 105 winning votes came from Know Nothings. Half of those northern Know Nothings now wanted to leave the nativist fraternity to become Republicans, but the others were still determined to keep northern Know Nothings independent of Republicans and to give anti-Catholicism and antiforeignism equal billing with free-soilism. In addition, as the appalled Republican Bailey grumped, only intervention by prosouthern Washington Know Nothings had put Banks over the top. They persuaded southern Know Nothings and northern conservatives like Jacob Broom, Scott Harrison, and Bayard Clark to scatter their votes or abstain rather than support the Democrat Aiken.¹⁸ In return, Republicans supported Know Nothing candidates for clerk, sergeant-at-arms, doorkeeper, and postmaster. Even Solomon G. Haven, who complained that Know Nothings in the House had been "disunited, broken up, and fragmentary," believed that "all this difficulty & disorganization" ensured that Know Nothings would nominate Fillmore for president as the best way to restore sectional harmony in their party. 19

The Americans nominated Fillmore at Philadelphia three weeks later, but Haven erred about the restoration of sectional harmony. Republican gloating over Banks' election virtually ensured a sectional donnybrook. Since the summer of 1855, Fillmore's supporters from the border states and New York had feared another "fatal" platform fight in which Northerners sought to replace the proslavery Section Twelve of the 1855 platform with an explicit demand for restoration of the Missouri Compromise line. Such a fight might increase northern support for Fillmore's main competitor for the nomination, George Law, a free-spending ex-Democrat from New York. Therefore, they had been trying for months to postpone the scheduled American national convention and its nomination from February to July.²⁰ Banks' triumph killed any chance of delay.

Furious that some seventy northern Know Nothing congressmen backed Banks, southern Americans now demanded a convention to provide evidence that other northern Know Nothings were not antisouthern. Haven and other Fillmore managers now realized that an immediate platform statement was necessary to appease them. Equally important, the impetus that Banks' triumph and the call for a June Republican convention gave to the Republican party created the specter of wholesale northern Whig/Know Nothing defections to the Republicans unless Fillmore's nomination provided a rallying point to stop them. "We had no alternative between a nomination now or being switched off onto the Republican track before the convention reassembled [in July]," Haven assured Fillmore. That same prospect simultaneously galvanized the determination of antislavery northern Know Nothings intent upon avoiding absorption by Republicans to repudiate Section Twelve, lest its retention force them into Republican ranks.²¹

Sectional wrangling therefore wracked both the preliminary American national council meeting and the subsequent nominating convention in Philadelphia. At the former, Northerners jettisoned the entire 1855 American platform with its odious Section Twelve. With the aid of conservatives from New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts, however, Southerners on the council then adopted a new platform written by the Washington, D.C., lodge. Unlike the 1855 platform, it contained no explicit reference to slavery, let alone declare the finality of existing laws regarding slavery. But it explicitly endorsed the principle of popular sovereignty and called for all laws to be obeyed until repealed. It did not, that is, incorporate Northerners' demand for reimposition of a congressional ban on slavery north of 36° 30'.22

Outraged by this setback, many northern delegates to the subsequent convention refused to participate in any presidential nomination unless the convention repudiated the council's handiwork and adopted the platform they wanted. Their abstention increased Fillmore's chances of winning, and his managers at Philadelphia, who included Haven, Kennedy, and Alexander H. H. Stuart, pushed their advantage by insisting on an immediate nomination without a new platform. Delighted with the council's noncommittal platform, which one furious Indianan condemned as "so covered in verbiage that [the Americans] would be able to elect a President before the people discovered what it meant," they saw the chance once again to present Fillmore himself as "the best platform" on which to build a "national party." 123

Fillmore won the nomination, but with meager northern support.²⁴ The sectional breach in the party had been widened, not bridged, as Fillmore's strategists had hoped. Upon Fillmore's selection, indeed, some seventy northern bolters formally repudiated his nomination because an anti-Nebraska platform had not been adopted, named themselves North Americans, and called for a new North Americans.

ican convention to meet in New York City on June 12, five days before the scheduled Republican convention in Philadelphia. Law's New York delegates issued a protest of their own, and the Albany State Register's editor, Samuel Hammond, now completely in Law's pocket, promised the bolters that Law's friends would help substitute a new candidate for Fillmore in June.²⁵

Some of the bolters from Ohio and Iowa wanted to join the Republican party immediately rather than form a separate North American party, and many Republicans, badly underestimating Know Nothings' continued commitment to anti-Catholicism and nativism, believed that the Americans' split guaranteed North Americans' support for the Republican nominee instead of Fillmore. "It is not a dead lion they are attempting to run but a dead ass," hooted Andrew Tracy. "The nomination of Fillmore has ruined the Americans here," echoed a Bostonian. "It falls like a wet blanket."

Conversely, Fillmore's friends initially dismissed the bolt as insignificant. Some of the protesters at Philadelphia, they believed, were Republican saboteurs whose departure marked a good riddance.²⁷ Their bolt would enhance Fillmore's vote in the South, especially among National Democrats whom Kennedy had targeted as recruits for two years. More important, Fillmore's lieutenants confidently expected to bring the majority of bolters and the rank-and-file northern Know Nothings whom they represented back to Fillmore's camp by stressing Fillmore's commitment to Know Nothings' nativist agenda.

Fillmore's closest advisors all wanted him to delay any official letter of acceptance until he returned to the United States in June, but they urged him in writing it to take explicitly "Protestant" ground and rehearse the cry that "Americans must rule America." In the interim, they published Fillmore's 1855 pro-Know Nothing letter to Pennsylvania's Isaac Newton, and they leaked word that Fillmore had in fact joined the order. In addition, Fillmore's friends relied upon the order's oaths of allegiance to keep members in line. Thus they rejoiced when state councils like New York's immediately endorsed Fillmore's nomination, and they had E. B. Bartlett, the order's national president, replace northern state councils that refused to do so with new state councils that would. They also called yet another national council meeting in New York for June when North Americans convened to further remind members of their organizational obligations, and they strove to make sure that Southerners were fully represented at it to counteract the expected influence of Republicans among the North Americans.²⁸

Between Fillmore's nomination in February and his return to New York from Europe on June 22, however, three developments virtually doomed his prospects—and with them Whiggery's only possibility of revival. Once again, Democrats critically influenced the fate of the Whig party. Pro-Compromise National Democrats, who had been infuriated by Franklin Pierce's patronage policies and by his endorsement of Douglas' sectionally inflammatory Nebraska Act, were not just a figment of John P. Kennedy's imagination, and he confidently predicted that "the National Hard Democrats North and South are much too offended with the administration and the Softs" ever to support the Democratic nominee in 1856.²⁹ In early June, however, Democrats bypassed both the palpably incompetent Pierce and the seemingly reckless Douglas and nominated instead the old Pennsylvania wheelhorse James Buchanan. As the candidate of the anti-Pierce Democrats, he seemed likely to reward National Democrats with federal plums if elected, and they dropped any plans of bolting the party. Freed of any responsibility for the Nebraska Act because he was absent in England, the sixty-five-year-old Buchanan, a former U.S. representative, U.S. senator, and U.S. secretary of state, also seemed to personify conservative experience, in contrast to the callow Pierce. In addition to squelching defections by conservative Democrats, therefore, his nomination made the Democratic ticket far more palatable to Union-loving Whigs still searching for a new political home and increasingly worried by the rise of the Republican party.

The other two developments between February and the end of June drove northern antislavery Whig-Know Nothings toward the Republican column. Fillmore's friends expected to deter that movement by playing on those Know Nothings' loyalty to the order and still-vibrant nativist prejudices. A bigger problem, of course, was what Haven despairingly called "the old eternal question of slavery over again, only very much intensified" by northern anger at border ruffian outrages in Kansas that opened the possibility that slavery might actually be established in that territory. To soothe North Americans' concerns on this front, Fillmore's friends, in his absence, assured them that Fillmore had deplored the passage of the Nebraska Act and now favored statehood for Kansas under any constitution written by "bona fide" residents of the territory, not proslavery Missouri invaders. Primarily, however, they expected to present Fillmore as the only man who could save the Union from sectional agitation.³⁰

This holding action depended on the absence of events that increased northern anger at the South, and in May 1856 two new provocations exploded. The so-called sack of Lawrence, an antislavery stronghold in Kansas, by a posse of Missouri border ruffians on May 21 and the brutal caning of Massachusetts Senator Charles Sumner by South Carolina Representative Preston S. Brooks in the Senate chamber itself the following day totally changed the election. "Bleeding Kansas" and "Bleeding Sumner" electrified the North and gave Republicans an almost invincible combination of issues, for both incidents exposed white Southerners, the Slave Power, nakedly treating white Northerners like slaves. Northern fury was intense, widespread, and of immense political significance.³¹

Fillmore's Know Nothing backers, holdout Whigs, and joyful Republicans instantly recognized the political consequences. Republicans would gain—and Fillmore would lose—votes in the North. The likelihood that the impending North American convention would shun Fillmore and merge with the Republicans soared. "The late outrageous proceedings in Kansas & the assault on Mr. Sumner have contributed very much to strengthen the Republican party" and had laid "Conservatism, in all its forms, ... prostrate," Everett moaned to Fillmore in early July. "Brooks has knocked the scales from the eyes of the blind, and now they <code>see!</code>" exulted a Vermont Republican. "The color is <code>red bloody</code> and their wrath is hot."

Even before shocks from Kansas and Washington changed the race and reduced the possibility that North Americans would ever back Fillmore, Republicans and their Know Nothing allies rigged the North American convention so that it ultimately supported the Republican nominee at Philadelphia, John C. Frémont, without first naming him themselves at New York and thereby driving antislavery Germans from him. To achieve this, they used Banks as a stalking horse for Frémont, even though many of Banks' fervent supporters in New York were clueless about Banks' double-dealing. Banks, not Fillmore, got the North American nomination, and the delegates then were persuaded to remain in New York until Banks replied. By prearrangement, Banks delayed his response until after Republicans nominated Frémont. Then he declined the North Americans' offer and urged them instead to endorse Frémont, which most of them did.³³

The day after North Americans succumbed to this trick, Fillmore landed in Manhattan. Dated May 21, his letter formally accepting the American nomination had preceded him by several weeks, and it was circulated among North American delegates to hold them in Fillmore's column. After the events of May, however, they found Fillmore's pledge to quiet sectional agitation and scrupulously defend the rights of both sections, as he previously had while president, palpably inadequate; they now wanted an outright champion of the North.³⁴

By June 22, in sum, Fillmore's prospects were bleak, and during the next four months they grew steadily bleaker. Nonetheless, Fillmore and his advisors battled to the end. By the fall, they sought to throw the election into the House of Representatives, where, they dreamed, the opponents of the front-runner, whether Buchanan or Frémont, would help elect Fillmore rather than let a hated foe win. That desperate strategy, of course, required carrying enough states for Fillmore to stop either of his foes from amassing a majority of electoral votes. To keep northern Know Nothings out of Frémont's column, they fanned the false rumor that Frémont was Catholic, a charge that more than anything else prevented him from winning the election. To weaken Buchanan in the South, they charged that the Democratic platform on which he ran sanctioned squatter sovereignty in the territories, a doctrine still anathema to most Southerners. To Union-loving conservatives in both sections, they trumpeted Fillmore's rescue of the nation between 1850 and 1853 and argued with increasing stridency, but rapidly decreasing credibility, that Fillmore, not Buchanan, had the best chance of beating Frémont.35

With National Democrats apparently mollified by Buchanan's nomination and most antislavery northern Know Nothings moving inexorably to the Republicans, these Unionist appeals were increasingly aimed at die-hard Whigs like Hunt, Fish, and Everett who had yet to make a commitment. Such conservative Whigs were always envisioned by Fillmore's friends as a key building bloc of their long-sought Union coalition. Their wholehearted and unanimous support for the champion of the Compromise of 1850 had never been questioned. By mid-1856, moreover, both Fillmore's managers and die-hard Whigs themselves believed that "Old Guard" Whigs held "the balance of power" in the election. Yet in 1856, when Fillmore desperately needed their help, it proved surprisingly elusive. "

VI

The political cross winds buffeting "straight," "Old Line," or "Old Guard" Whigs between January and July drove them in different directions and left many too paralyzed to act. Since Republicans and Democrats considered the Americans' choice of Fillmore essentially a "Whig nomination," they worried that "the old Whig party," and especially northern Silver Grays, would "rally in union with the Know Nothings on Fillmore." Most die-hard, non-Know Nothing conservative Whigs did regard Fillmore's candidacy as the best hope of keeping their party intact and his election as the nation's best hope of ending sectional strife. Some, like North Carolina's William A. Graham and George Badger, therefore, quickly threw their support to him, as did "the old Whigs of Florida."

New York's diehards also rallied behind Fillmore after his nomination at Philadelphia. James Hamilton immediately pressed Fish to help call a national Whig convention in the summer to endorse Fillmore and thereby "rally multitudes of the solid & conservative men of the country." "If anybody wants to see the true Whig party reconstructed & substantially placed in power again," piped Daniel Barnard in April, he should "take the American party at their offer, & bring in an administration with Mr. Fillmore at its head." National Whigs should hold a convention to preserve "the organization of the Whig party, that it may be prepared to resume its mission when the ephemeral factions of the day have been dissolved—an event which must speedily follow the canvass of 1856," counseled West's New York Commercial Advertiser. That convention, however, must not "present a distinct presidential nomination." Whigs must support Fillmore "not because of, but notwithstanding his nomination by the American party." New York's "old line Whigs," Hunt promised Fish, "will hold a convention some time this summer" and "take our position boldly." "39"

The uncertain dates and provenance of these proposed conventions, the vagueness of Hunt's prospectus for them, and especially West's obvious embarrassment at the Know Nothing imprimatur on Fillmore speak volumes. The Americans' nomination of Fillmore and his three-month delay in accepting it left Whigs in a perplexing quandary. Old-line Whig leaders feared that the Whig party would completely disintegrate unless they took some dramatic public action to reinvigorate it, yet they also knew that too quick a public embrace of Fillmore could have a high cost. If Whigs officially endorsed Fillmore before he responded to the American convention, they would appear to hijack him as their own man and possibly cause Democratic/Know Nothings and nativist true believers to renounce him

One such true believer was Know Nothing editor Vesparian Ellis, who wanted Know Nothings to supplant, not provide life support to, the dying Whig party. Whigs who publicly endorsed Fillmore to resurrect Whiggery behind his candidacy would "drive every democrat out of our ranks & make the issue one of whiggery & democracy," he ranted. "Let outside Whigs keep quiet & vote as they please when the time comes." Fillmore must be run exclusively as "the American Candidate, or he will be defeated."40 For haughty Whig bluebloods like Everett, Winthrop, and Charleston's George S. Bryan, who condemned Know Nothingism as "about an equal mixture of blind machinery, imbecility, & craft," however, the major problem was precisely that Fillmore was, or might consent to be, the Know Nothing, not the Whig, nominee. Such stuffed shirts simply could not stomach an open alliance with a party they despised as the vehicle of bigots, riffraff, and thugs. "Our Whigs are exceedingly exclusive and they parade their Whiggery as a badge of aristocracy, sometimes in a very obnoxious manner," one pro-Fillmore Massachusetts Know Nothing complained during the summer. "They paralyze us here, and also do the cause harm elsewhere." As Edward Stafford would later jeer, in short, the Massachusetts Whig rump harbored "too much respectability."41

Old line Whigs balked, in part, at Fillmore's running mate on the American ticket. They considered Tennessee's Andrew Jackson Donelson, nephew of the Democratic demon himself and erstwhile editor of the hated Democratic Washington Union, "a bitter pill," far too bitter for many Whigs to swallow. Thus North Carolina's George Badger, though willing to disregard his own abhorrence of nativism to back Fillmore, carped, "The association of Donelson with Fillmore hurt us here with Whigs who had a strong dislike of him, whilst it will not gain a single vote."

Donelson, however, was not the main problem. Anti-Know Nothing southern Whigs in particular raged that Fillmore's acceptance of the American nomination would signal his betraval and abandonment of the party they loved and wished to preserve. Rather than support such a traitor, they warned, they would bolt Whiggery for the Democrats. That threat also forced Whigs to delay any public endorsement of Fillmore until his intentions were clear. "The nomination of Fillmore is coldly received," rejoiced a New Orleans Democrat in March. "The old line Whigs consider it a political assassination." A month later Charles Conrad, Fillmore's former secretary of war, warned the ex-president that neither he nor other Louisiana Whigs could support him if he ran as the candidate of anti-Catholic bigots. Fillmore "must not permit himself to be possessed by the Know Nothings—to be their mere [i.e., exclusive] party exponent," Bryan warned Kennedy. Old line Whigs harbored too "much revulsion at the idea of his having become a member of the order." These alarm bells were more than sound and fury. When Americans lost North Carolina's state elections in August, two months after Fillmore's acceptance of the American nomination, Badger cried, "Our old line Whigs have behaved like apes—have turned democrats—have ruined the State. Heaven help us!"43

Southern old line Whigs were at least willing to back Fillmore as an independent Unionist candidate. Such was not the case with Pennsylvania's "large body of old national Whigs, who will not support Fillmore" and would, it was reported, vote Democratic or Republican rather than "strengthen the Know Nothings." Their peculiarly intense obduracy seems inexplicable. But the explanation is obvious once one recalls the history of the Whigs in question. They were the Cooper-Clay Whigs who fought Clayton's attempt in 1849 to combine Whigs with Native Americans in a Taylor Republican party, who bitterly protested Fillmore's refusal to remove William D. Lewis from the Philadelphia custom house in 1850-51 so as not to alienate nativists, and who proudly supported incumbent Whig Congressman Joseph R. Chandler in 1854 after Know Nothings ruthlessly dumped him because Chandler was a Catholic. Old chickens were coming home to roost at Fillmore's expense in Pennsylvania. But so long as there was a chance of holding such "old national Whigs" in the party fold, Whigs there, as in other states, could not endorse Fillmore publicly until they knew his response to the Know Nothings.44

If Whig diehards could be damned by embracing Fillmore before his return from Europe, however, they were also damned if they failed to do so. Unless and until some collective, recognized body of Whigs such as a national convention indicated that the party meant to preserve itself as an independent political force, discouraged Whig loyalists around the country would hang suspended in uncertainty or, worse, look elsewhere for a political home. The longer old guard Whig gentlemen waited to act, in short, the fewer they and their followers were and the more vulnerable they became to incursions by Republicans, Democrats, and Know Nothings.

Even before May's pivotal sectional shocks drove many "straight Whigs and conservatives" toward the Republican column, Republicans took aim at uncommitted Whigs. In New York they urged Governor Myron Clark to help "get back a great many Old Whigs, who have not joined any organization" with a careful dispensation of highly visible state jobs. Massachusetts Republicans struck in July by organizing a straight Whig ratification meeting for Frémont. "It has convinced the fossils that they are not paramount, and has divided the [Whig] party," one exulted, a conclusion with which discouraged Whig conservatives agreed. In Indiana, where Whig/Know Nothings played a central role in organizing the party in the spring, they eschewed even the name "Republican" and wrote a moderate state platform in order, as one furious Free Soiler sputtered, to woo "Knownothings and old fossil Whigs who have just emanated from their old political graves where they have been 'persevering to rot.' "45"

As Pennsylvania and North Carolina indicated, however, the Democrats were a likelier destination than the Republicans for National Whigs if they were allowed to float free. Common antipathy to Know Nothings' bigotry and to Republicans' apparent sectional extremism drew them together. In late fall 1855, Kentucky's Archibald Dixon, Henry Clay's successor in the Senate, announced his conversion to the party of Jackson. After Banks' election, the trickle of prominent Whigs toward the Democrats became a torrent, for many doubted that Fillmore, especially if he ran as a Know Nothing, could win. In the spring, Georgia's Robert Toombs and Alexander H. Stephens, who had abandoned the Whig party in 1850 but persistently kept their distance from the Democrats, finally joined that party, and Stephens' brother Linton was a Georgia delegate to the Democratic national convention. Appalled by Know Nothingism and Republicans' surging prospects, key local Whig leaders in Michigan and Indiana, along with Maryland's Reverdy Johnson, became Democrats as well. By midsummer the list of Whig leaders who openly endorsed Buchanan as the best hope of defeating Frémont was stunning: Tennessee Senator James Jones; Maryland Senators Thomas Pratt and James Pearce: North Carolina's ex-Congressman Daniel M. Barringer: Georgia's Charles Jenkins, Henry Clay's son James, and Rufus Choate. 46

Prominent Whig defectors gave Democrats a powerful weapon, especially in the slave states where Whigs had once been most competitive and that Fillmore therefore had to carry to have a chance. Both crestfallen Whig converts to Know Nothingism like Tennessee's William G. Brownlow and anti-Know Nothing Whigs like George Bryan shrieked about the "utterly faithless" Whigs who supported Buchanan, while Democrats rejoiced at their coup. Thanking North Carolina's Barringer for his support, Kentucky's John C. Breckinridge, the Democratic vice presidential candidate, spelled out its consequences for the election and the postelection prospects of the Americans. "The very choicest spirits of the old parties now stand together—and the K. N. party . . . is literally composed of the fag ends of other organizations," he exulted. "It may continue for a little while as a disturbing element in certain localities, but its pretentions as a national party have already fallen into common contempt."

Whig/Know Nothings committed to Fillmore's candidacy tried to combat Republican and Democratic incursions by bidding for old line Whigs themselves.

They did so primarily by contrasting Fillmore's Whig background to the Democratic lineage of his two opponents, by stressing Fillmore's Whiggish conservatism and unionism, and by arguing that Fillmore in fact had a better chance to stop Frémont than did Buchanan. Some even deigned to dirty their hands with the kind of one-on-one personal politicking most Whig gentlemen had long disdained. Calling himself the only prominent Indiana Whig to remain loyal to Fillmore, Richard W. Thompson was one such stalwart. "Thompson is making desperate exertions to carry his points," gasped an astonished Republican in June. "He does what he has seldom done before; he is on the streets, and at the corners in season and out of season trying to inveigh old Whigs to his scheme of resuscitating the Whig party" behind Fillmore. "

VII

Well before the summer, therefore, old line Whigs who hoped to revive their party by preserving its independence as an organization knew that there would be little left to preserve unless they counteracted these incursions. Hesitant to endorse Fillmore until they learned his reaction to the American nomination, they had to do something in the interim to show that Whigs were "still alive as a national party."

Those demonstrations varied. Primarily, however, die-hard Whigs relied on proclamations that the party still survived from newspapers still loyal to it, like West's New York Commercial Advertiser and especially the Washington National Intelligencer, and from a series of county and state Whig conventions that showed the Whig flag even if they usually refused to nominate Whig candidates. During the spring, for example, local Whig meetings were held in Boston, Staunton and Charlottesville, Virginia, and Washington, D.C., while straight Whig state conventions met in Iowa, Kentucky, Maryland, and Rhode Island. In the summer, after Fillmore's return, small Whig state conventions also assembled in Virginia, New York, Maine, and Massachusetts. In northern states like Massachusetts and Rhode Island, where a semblance of Whig organization still existed, the purpose of these avowals was "to keep the Whig party from falling into the Fremont current." In the South, where few Whig candidates had been run in 1855 and conversions to the Democrats were soaring in 1856, Whigs insisted "the Whig party [must] be reorganized" to "preserve unimpaired their distinct political character amid the many conflicting organizations by which they are surrounded and sought to be absorbed."49

For admirers of the Whig party, including this historian, these poignant manifestos make for painful reading. They portray the pitiable condition to which the party had been reduced, predict the most pernicious consequences of its demise, and punctuate Whigs' seemingly endless capacity for self-delusion, their pathetic propensity to cling to pie-in-the-sky fantasies in the face of unwelcome realities. One is reminded, indeed, of Granger's cutting remark about the "out of place" Websterites at the 1852 Whig convention who waited "for the sky to fall so that they might catch larks."

Old line Whigs' calls to battle usually admitted that Whigs had "ceased to be an organized and active party in political affairs," that they had been "shorn of [their] former strength" because "many men...had attached themselves temporarily to other organizations," and that they were therefore "in a minority compared with the three other great parties into which the country is divided." Yet they then declared that, for three reasons, those prodigal sons could and must be won back. The first was to resolve the sectional crisis other parties had caused. That crisis required Whigs to "keep the good old Whig party alive, distinct, and organized, to serve as a nucleus around which all these dispersed conservative republican elements may rally at the critical juncture to save the Republic." The second was "to prepare the way for a national reorganization of the Whig party when the phrenzy of the hour shall have passed." The third, equally delusionary goal was to keep die-hard Whigs "together" so that they could exert "the balance of power" and "turn the scale of the Presidential election" in 1856 itself.⁵⁰

If the remaining Whigs all recognized the necessity for "a concert of action between the various companies and regiments of the Whig army" so that "the Whig party" could "survive the present changes and disruption of parties" and "control the result of the next Presidential election," however, they deeply disagreed on how this should "be done." New York Whigs like Barnard and West argued that the best course was to eschew any separate Whig nomination and throw Whigs' collective support to Fillmore. Yet Whig meetings and newspapers in Washington, Kentucky, Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina flatly repudiated an early endorsement of Fillmore and insisted that only a national Whig convention, which Barnard and West dreaded would nominate someone other than Fillmore, could "give due expression to the political opinions they still entertain." ⁵²

With no representative body of Whigs in Congress to call a national convention, however, it was unclear who could or would do so. Many Whigs looked to the prestigious Washington National Intelligencer to call the convention, but it refused to do anything or, ominously, even to mention Fillmore as the likely Whig nominee until Whig meetings gave it some direction. Finally, the Kentucky Whig state convention on April 12, which bitterly attacked Whigs who had jumped ship to the Know Nothings and sought to stop Whigs from nominating Fillmore, called for a convention of loyal Whigs from across the country to meet in Louisville in July. But this action was so irregular that some Whig papers in the East announced the date of the proposed Louisville convention as July 4, while others announced it as July 30. Because of this confusion, suspicion that the intention was to blackball Fillmore, and Louisville's distance from the East, this assemblage never met.⁵³

VIII

When Fillmore arrived in New York on June 22, therefore, he and his advisors faced a cruel dilemma. Well aware of the anti-Know Nothing Whigs' decided coolness toward Fillmore's candidacy as an American, they still believed such conservatives could be won over by stressing Fillmore's devotion to the Union and attacking the sectional extremism of Republicans and Democrats. In late June, however, their top priority was to repair the damage caused by North Americans' nomination of Frémont the day before Fillmore returned. Stopping the hemorrhage of northern Whig/Know Nothings to the Republicans seemed more pressing than reassuring anti-Know Nothing Whigs. Stressing Fillmore's Unionism was manifestly insufficient to staunch that outflow. In addition to playing the anti-Catholic card against Frémont, therefore, they decided to reemphasize Fillmore's personal allegiance to the American organization and its founding nativist principles. Perhaps more than anything else Fillmore could have done, that tack risked alienating Whig diehards still further.

By long custom, presidential candidates did not make campaign speeches. Since Fillmore had been out of the country for over a year and out of the public limelight for almost four years, however, he attempted to jump-start his campaign by giving a series of public addresses as he moved north from New York City to Albany and then west toward his home in Buffalo. His advisors like Haven and Stuart were so delighted by these speeches that they had them published as a campaign pamphlet entitled Fillmore at Home. "The old line Whigs seem to be coming round right," gushed Haven at the end of June after reading accounts of them. Fillmore should say nothing more. 54

Old line Whigs, in fact, applauded most of what Fillmore said. At Albany, Rochester, and elsewhere he primarily rehearsed his patriotic devotion to the Union. He attacked Democrats for reopening sectional agitation with the Nebraska Act and Republicans for cynically inflaming that agitation to arouse the North. Fearful of offending Southerners, however, Fillmore resolutely refused to publicize his own solution to the Kansas crisis—the repeal of unfair proslavery territorial legislation, the holding of honest elections protected from border ruffian incursions to choose a new legislature and a constitutional convention, and rapid admission to statehood under a constitution written and approved exclusively by legitimate residents of that territory, not interlopers from Missouri. 55 Instead, he warned that either a Democratic or a Republican victory would "break asunder the bonds of our Union and spread anarchy and civil war through the land." Only he stood above the sectional fray. "If there be those at the North who want a President to rule the South—if there be those at the South who want a President to rule the North—I do not want their votes," he declared. "I stand upon the broad platform of the Constitution and the laws."56

Two of Fillmore's otherwise unexceptionable speeches, however, deeply incensed anti-Know Nothing Whig holdouts. For six months old guard Whigs had pronounced the Whig party still alive and, if not exactly well, still capable of reorganization and rejuvenation. Yet in a speech to New York City's Whig General Committee on June 23, Fillmore hymned a dirge over the party's "grave." For years, he mourned, the time had been "approaching when that noble Whig party, of which I was ever proud, would be inevitably destroyed." Clay's defeat in 1844 started the process, and "the canker worm that has been gnawing at the very vitals of that party has at last, I fear, destroyed it" and "carried it to the grave." "But, sir," he immediately added, "a phoenix . . . has arisen from its ashes that is yet to save the country." Just as the Compromise acts that had rescued the country in 1850 "were not the measures of one party" but the handiwork of both Whigs and Democrats, that new party must not be exclusively Whig. Rather, it must combine "conservative Whigs—old-line Whigs, true Whigs" with "true-hearted Democrats" in a new organization. "

Having urged Whigs to give up the ghost as a separate party, Fillmore, a few days later at the Hudson River town of Newburgh, assured Know Nothings that he was now no longer a Whig but one of their own. He was proud to be the American candidate, "for I am an American and with the Americans." Not opposed to all immigrants, he would still "exclude the pauper and the criminal." Tolerant of all religious creeds, he would "exact from all faithful allegiance to our republican institutions." Thus, "if any sect or denomination, ostensibly organized for religious purposes, should use that organization or suffer it to be used for political objects, I would meet it by political opposition." The safety of the republic required "that, independent of all foreign influence, Americans will and shall rule America." Avowedly no longer a Whig, Fillmore trumpeted his Know Nothingism. ⁵⁸

These announcements appalled anti-Know Nothing Whigs who wanted to preserve the party, but then Fillmore further compounded the damage by adamantly refusing to accept "straight" Whig endorsements lest Americans be offended by them. Fillmore's carefully calculated response to the proffered support from Virginia's state Whig convention in mid-July is a case in point. Flatly contradicting Fillmore's speeches in New York, its resolutions credited Whigs alone with resolving previous sectional disputes that Democrats had caused, angrily accused Democrats of stealing "Whig propositions as [their] own, regardless of having denounced them," so as to deny Whigs "credit" for them, and "condemn[ed] the thought of disbanding the Whig party, and of any remission of its untiring exertions." In addition, the platform flatly opposed repeal of the Nebraska Act and, though calling Fillmore the best of the three presidential alternatives available, refused to surrender Whigs' separate identity by merging with the Americans.⁵⁹

Fillmore consulted with Virginia's William C. Rives and John S. Carlisle, as well as with Haven, before replying. "The few who composed this meeting," warned Carlisle in a scathingly accurate assessment of die-hard Whigs' impotence and naiveté, "are men who cannot see what is passing around them and do not know that the idea of reviving the Whig party by its name is utterly hopeless." Stick by what you told the New York Whig committee—that the Whig party had already been "carried to the grave," echoed Haven. "Give no old party a chance to either pamper you or complain of you." Thus, Fillmore frostily wrote Rives, Virginia's Whigs "were indiscreet in laying down a platform on the slavery question & for my acceptance." By adopting a Whig platform, he "would but increase the jealousy of the American Democrats who are constantly told that the American party is the old Whig party in disguise." Nor could he publicly sanction its commitment against repeal of the Nebraska Act. "I cannot be one thing to the North and another to the South," he sputtered, "nor one thing to the American party and another to the Whig party." "60"

Fillmore's frustration is understandable, and some former Whig officeholders who had never joined the Know Nothings and still-loyal Whig editors accepted his proclaimed independence from their old party and pledged their personal support. Nonetheless, his rebuff of die-hard Whig loyalists caused many to respond in kind. Some, like North Carolina's Daniel Barringer, who angrily cited Fillmore's speeches as evidence that "there is no organized Whig party—and no Whig candidate in the field," petulantly defected to the Democratic party in retaliation. Others demanded that Whigs nominate someone else to resurrect the party that Fillmore had so insultingly consigned to oblivion. To Fillmore's great chagrin, the leaders of these recalcitrants were Joseph Gales and William W. Seaton, editors of die-hard Whigs' flagship newspaper, the Washington National Intelligencer. Gales and Seaton loathed the Know Nothings and absolutely refused to support Fillmore as a Know Nothing candidate. Until mid-September they repeatedly insisted that their only allegiance was to the Whig party, and they repeatedly complained that "there is no Whig candidate in the field."

Within weeks of Fillmore's return to Buffalo, he and his campaign managers recognized their mistake; old line Whigs would not automatically support him as an American candidate. Daily the Republicans seemed to grow stronger in the North, in part, as Everett told Fillmore, because "events in Kansas & the outrages in Washington have done much to break down the straight Whig organization." As Republicans surged, more and more conservatives, frightened by the threat of disunion should Republicans win, deemed Buchanan, rather than Fillmore, the best hope of stopping Frémont. Whig support therefore seemed more and more necessary, yet still-uncommitted Whigs demanded some "united action" by Whig leaders "to give due expression to the opinions they still entertain" before committing themselves to a candidate. And the only Whig leaders sending signals to rank-and-file Whig diehards about what to do were the growing list of prominent Whigs who announced their support for Buchanan. So massive was the flight by renowned Whigs to the Democrats, indeed, that Ohio's Thomas Ewing had to deny newspaper reports that he, too, had endorsed Buchanan, even though he leaned toward him.64

Starting in July, therefore, Fillmore personally or through intermediaries begged still-neutral Whig leaders like Everett, Winthrop, Fish, and Ohio's ex-Senator Tom Corwin to announce their support publicly in order to counteract other Whigs' endorsements of Buchanan. Opinion molders such as he, Fillmore pressed Everett, had no right to abandon politics and remain "inactive or neutral." Democrats were driving the "ship of state . . . directly upon the rocks of perdition, and if she founders, we must go down with her." Both Everett and Winthrop published affirmations of support, but even they doubted their influence on Bay State voters. It was not just that some Websterites like Choate announced for Buchanan, while others like Samuel Walley came out for Frémont. As Everett warned, Fillmore's embrace of Know Nothingism "is what will prevent you, more than anything else, from being more cordially supported by the straight Whigs of this State."

Haven was blunter about the folly of relying on elitist political has-beens, no matter how blue their blood, to carry Massachusetts. "Such men as Choate, Everett, Winthrop etc. are good for their own votes, but they are the fossil remains of too low and ancient a strata to stir up the surface in the least now." Hating Know Nothings as "too contemptible for them to fight," yet "too powerful for them to conquer," bitter Whig diehards would never "give any portion of such a party a hand, even in a good cause."

Haven was right on both counts. As Edward Stafford later contended, respectable gentlemen like Everett and Winthrop no longer molded opinion. Whigs who despised Know Nothings still refused to work for Fillmore's election even after a state Whig convention in September tepidly recommended him. "Our Whigs prefer that the great cause should be entirely ruined rather than [a]bate a hair of their exclusive aristocracy of feeling," fumed one Fillmore American. Winthrop shared his anger at Whigs' stubbornness, this Know Nothing admitted, but

Winthrop "lacked and always will lack that sort of pluck which is now needed to make those fellows do right."⁶⁷

Haven also dismissed an endorsement from the Whig grandee Fish "as not worth enquiring about" since "he cannot control more than his own vote." But virtually every old guard Whig in New York state considered Fish, a sitting United States senator, absolutely the key figure to lead a revival of the National Whig party and swing the remaining Whig holdouts behind Fillmore. Pouting that Weed and Seward had merged the state Whig organization with the Republicans in 1855 without ever consulting him, Fish resolutely remained on the Whig fence during the first half of 1856. Fillmore dearly wanted him to jump off. A New York Whig state convention attended by Fish's old guard acolytes backed Fillmore on August 14, but Fish himself stubbornly remained neutral until mid-September, when, to pro-Fillmore Whigs' consternation, he came out publicly for Frémont because Fillmore had deserted the Whig party. 68

Corwin, one-time darling of the free-soil Whigs now at work building the Republican party, agreed with Fillmore that "the Whig party as such is dead & buried." But he was not a Know Nothing; nor could he ever vote Democratic. Since he had always opposed slavery extension and since the Republicans were the only party openly committed against its spread, he leaned toward Frémont. But he could never campaign publicly for a party led in his state by Free Soilers like Chase and Giddings. 69 Corwin, therefore, considered endorsing Fillmore, but only, he told Fillmore's agents, if the ex-president publicly avowed his private opposition to slavery extension. At this demand, Fillmore balked. He knew from his southern correspondents that publicizing his preferred policy for Kansas would utterly ruin his chances in the South. With negotiations stalemated, Corwin, citing his need to concentrate on his business affairs, broke them off.⁷⁰

By early September, therefore, Fillmore's attempt to shore up conservative Whigs' support had stalled. Fish and Corwin held back, and he knew that in Massachusetts Everett and Winthrop were hardly enough. The prestigious National Intelligencer stubbornly denied its support under the pretext of awaiting "some unanimous decision on the part of the 'Old Line Whigs.' " Friends from New Jersey, a northern state absolutely critical to his chances of amassing enough electoral votes to throw the election into the House, warned of Whig losses to the Republicans. And he was certain that Republicans, because of "the outrage upon Mr. Sumner and upon the people of Kansas," would sweep the September state elections in Maine and Vermont. Yet Southerners had been warning him for months that they could never stop Whigs from going to Buchanan without concrete evidence that Americans could carry enough northern states to win themselves or to keep Frémont from winning.⁷¹

IX

In desperation, therefore, Fillmore and his campaign team resorted to precisely what pro-Fillmore old line Whigs recommended against in January, to what Fillmore and Haven calculatedly spurned in July, and to what Know Nothing true believers always sought to stop—Fillmore's nomination as a Whig by a straight Whig national convention to be held in Baltimore on September 17. The last Whig national convention ever held, this rump meeting had not been arranged by Fillmore's friends. To the contrary, it was called by anti-Know Nothing Whigs who sought to ensure their party's independence so that Whigs would rally to it once again after the election was over. It was first suggested, in fact, by the same Virginia Whig state convention on July 16 whose determination to preserve Whiggery's independence Fillmore so contemptuously scorned. Aware by mid-July that the proposed Whig meeting in Louisville would fizzle because of the confusion over its date, the Virginians recommended the September convention as an alternative, and straight Whig papers like the Intelligencer enthusiastically embraced it.

Now desperate for a Whig endorsement and fearful that this gathering might back someone else, Fillmore frantically urged his non-Know Nothing old guard Whig friends to attend it to make sure that it indeed nominated Fillmore. Loyally they did so. Among others, the delegates included the following pro-Fillmore Whigs: Benjamin O. Tayloe from the District of Columbia; William L. Hodge from the same city but representing Louisiana: George Lunt of Massachusetts: James M. Townshend of Connecticut; Joseph F. Randolph of New Jersey; James Spruance, son of Delaware's former Whig United States senator; ex-Congressman Richard J. Bowie of Maryland; Edward Bates of Missouri; Senator John Bell of Tennessee; John Janney, William L. Goggin, William C. Rives' son Alex, and Wyndham Robertson, who had sent Fillmore word of the state's July Whig convention nomination, from Virginia; former governors William A. Graham and John M. Morehead of North Carolina; and Granger, Hunt, David A. Bokee, James Kidd, James A. Hamilton, A. K. Hadley, and other Silver Grays from New York.⁷² Refusing even to mention the American party or its principles, the convention nominated Fillmore and Donelson, declaring that their election promised the best hope of saving the Union.73

What is most noteworthy about this forlorn gathering, however, is that it managed to combine "too much respectability" with "too few people." The air of unreality that had characterized die-hard Whigs throughout 1856 was omnipresent. Altogether only 144 men attended, the smallest national convention held by any political party since Antimasons met in 1831. No delegates whatsoever appeared from Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, California, Wisconsin, Michigan, South Carolina, or Texas, and most of the states represented sent only a handful of men. The sixty-nine New Yorkers, indeed, composed almost half of the total count. Most of the delegates, moreover, were political nonentities, despite the presence of a few prominent Whigs.

Politically obscure they may have been, but the aristocratic Hamilton and the Albany banker Kidd must have felt comfortable in this gathering of wealthy, middle-aged amateurs who were no more attuned to the mood of, or capable of mobilizing, average voters than they were. Describing the delegates as "quiet, respectable, black waist coat individuals, whose very air stamps them unmistakably as gentlemen of the old school," a reporter from the Democratic New York Herald scoffed, "I could have hardly imagined that so many intelligent men could be got to engage in this resurrectionist business. With all their antiquatedness . . . they are as confident of electing Fillmore as orthodox Christians are of the coming of the millennium."

More sadly still, the veteran newspaperman Hodge, who had worked since 1853 to build a Union party behind Fillmore, made exactly the same point without the saving grace of sarcasm. The convention, he gushed to Fillmore, "was without exception the finest body of men I ever saw assembled on any occasion—staid, sober, solid, respectable—two-thirds of them over fifty years of age." Since the speeches were uniformly "decorous, eloquent, & highly appropriate," he added, the convention would "make its mark." "These proceedings, have aroused the Whigs throughout our widespread land," would "lead to the resuscitation of the Old Whig Party," and would guarantee Fillmore's election, echoed another delusionary delegate. "5

Such old fogies, such "respectable" gentlemen, could neither elect Fillmore nor resuscitate the Whig party. Indeed, their convention could not even persuade Gales and Seaton, who still insisted there was no genuine Whig in the race, to endorse Fillmore, although they did allow Hodge to write an unsigned editorial for the paper that did so. Nor, after Democrats won the crucial October elections in Pennsylvania and Indiana, thereby indicating beyond cavil that only Buchanan had a prayer of defeating Frémont, could the convention's action stop still more conservative Whigs from fleeing to the Democrats. All the Whig elitists at Baltimore managed to do was infuriate genuine nativists. "Your pretended friends have destroyed you!" Pennsylvania's veteran Native American Lewis C. Levin exploded to Fillmore.⁷⁶

X

Levin's outburst was as farfetched as hopes that the Whig convention could save the election for Fillmore. His chances of winning or even running second expired long before September. Fillmore, whatever his other flaws, was often capable of quite perceptive political analysis. He knew when his campaign had been doomed. "If Freemont [sic] is elected," Fillmore wrote William A. Graham on August 9, "he will owe his election entirely to the troubles in Kansas and the martyrdom of Sumner; and the Republicans ought to pension Brooks for life!!"

No pension was offered since Frémont did not win in 1856. Buchanan, although carrying only 45 percent of the popular vote, captured 174 electoral votes, 58.6 percent of the total, and the White House with that majority. Frémont ran second with 33 percent of the popular vote and 115 electoral votes, all from the North, where he carried all but five states. Fillmore finished a distant third. With 871,731 votes (21.6 percent), he ran 500,000 votes behind Winfield Scott in 1852, and he carried only Maryland's eight electoral votes.

The national totals were humiliating enough, but the skewed sectional distribution of the popular and electoral votes finished all hope of preserving a national, bisectional Whig party. Fillmore's own vote itself was divided fairly evenly. His 476,485 votes in the South represented 54.6 percent of his total, and his 43.9 percent of the slave states' vote virtually equaled Scott's 44.2 percent in 1852. Fillmore, in fact, ran almost 110,000 votes ahead of Scott in Dixie, but Buchanan surpassed Pierce's total by over 150,000.

By themselves, these comparisons raise questions about Nathan Sargent's angry complaint that Fillmore was defeated by "the treachery, the faithlessness, & the utter lack of pride & spirit exhibited by . . . a great portion of the Old Whigs—the Henry Clay Whigs" in Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee and other slave states who either supported Buchanan or abstained. Prominent Whig leaders in the South—including one of Henry Clay's sons—had indeed endorsed Buchanan, but most rank-and-file Whigs, whatever they thought of Know Nothingism, appear to have voted for Fillmore, if they bothered to vote at all, out of traditional enmity to Democrats. According to one statistical estimate of southern voter movement between presidential elections, indeed, Fillmore retained 86 percent of 1852 Whig voters (91 percent if one excludes Georgia and Texas from the analysis), 84 percent of Zachary Taylor's voters, and 86 percent of 1844 Whig voters. By the same estimates, barely a tenth of one-time Whig voters could have supported Buchanan. Whatever its label, in short, the electoral core of the Whig party in Dixie had held together, and in that section a potential base for a resurrected Whig party existed.⁷⁸

Among them, Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina possessed thirty-four electoral votes. Had they gone to Fillmore rather than Buchanan, the election would have gone to the House. But in none of the three states did Whig conversions to Buchanan explain the result. In both Kentucky and Tennessee the margin between Buchanan and Fillmore barely exceeded 7,000 votes, and in each, Fillmore's gain over Scott since 1852 surpassed that margin. Statistical analysis of voter movement in Kentucky suggests that about one-tenth of previous Whig supporters failed to vote at all, but even had they backed Fillmore, they could not have overcome the new non-Whig voters in the Democratic column. In North Carolina as well, few Whigs apparently defected to Buchanan. But almost one-sixth of Winfield Scott's supporters abstained, and there Fillmore, who trailed Buchanan by 12,000 votes, also ran 3,000 votes behind Scott's 1852 total. Recovering all the former Whig strength in Dixie, in sum, would require jettisoning the American label.⁷⁹

The real problem lay in the North, where most former Whigs joined a different party than their southern counterparts. That trend can be measured in various ways. Fillmore's 395,000 northern votes, though 43.4 percent of his own total, represented a puny 13.4 percent of the northern votes cast. His share exceeded an embarrassingly low one-sixth of the turnout only in Pennsylvania (17.9 percent), New York (20.9 percent), New Jersey (24.1 percent), and California (32.8 percent), the only free state where he ran ahead of Frémont. Scoring what historian William E. Gienapp aptly calls a "victorious defeat," the Republicans not only won the electoral vote in eleven of sixteen free states. They captured 45.2 percent of that section's popular vote, more than three times the proportion won by Fillmore, and, equally important, almost 4 percent more than the Democrats' 41.4 percent. Republicans, indeed, carried eight states with outright majorities in the three-way race. Whatever the situation in the South, in sum, by the end of 1856 Republicans had clearly become the major anti-Democratic party in the North, and their supporters, just as clearly, had no interest in reuniting with Whigs who backed Fillmore in the South, at least in the near future.80

Viewed differently, in 1852 the partisan breakdown of the northern popular vote was: Democrats, 49.8 percent; Whigs, 43.6 percent; and Free Soilers, 6.6 percent. In 1856, it was Republicans, 45.2 percent; Democrats, 41.4 percent, and Americans, 13.4 percent. Almost 650,000 more Northerners voted in 1856 than in 1852, so the proportions for each year do not represent the same number of voters. Buchanan, in fact, garnered some 80,000 more votes than had Pierce in free states. Nonetheless, Democrats had clearly suffered devastating proportionate losses over four years, while over twice as many former Whigs appear to have become Republicans than voted for Fillmore. Professor Gienapp's valuable estimates of voter movement between elections allow more precise delineations of how former Whig voters fragmented in 1856. In Connecticut, for example, more Scott voters supported Buchanan than Fillmore, and Frémont outpaced Fillmore among former Whigs by a ratio of five-to-one. In no other state in his sample were Whig defections to the Democrats so large, but the split of former Whigs between Republicans and Americans often was. The Republican/American ratio among 1852 Whig voters in Illinois was almost two-to-one, in Indiana three-to-one, in Maine seven-to-one, in Massachusetts, where more Democrats than Whigs supported Fillmore, eleven-to-one, in New York, three-to-two, and in Ohio, five-to-two. Only in Pennsylvania was the split relatively even. Frémont also far outpaced Fillmore among 1854 Know Nothing voters everywhere but New York and Pennsylvania.⁸¹

The key assumption for those old line Whigs who hoped that one-time Whig supporters would regain their senses after 1856 and return to a reconstituted Whig party was that both the new American and Republican parties would prove ephemeral. The American party did disintegrate rapidly after 1856, but most ex-Whigs in it showed little interest in resurrecting the Whig party. During the campaign's frantic last month, Fillmore refused pleas to allow Americans in Pennsylvania and New Jersey to form fusion tickets with Republicans to stop Buchanan from carrying them and the election on the grounds that the American party was "a national Union party." And after the election, he and others spoke vainly of reorganizing and strengthening the nativist American party, not of reviving the Whigs. "2"

More important, the majority of northern Whigs who had joined the Republican party had no intention of deserting it. Republicans already controlled most northern states, and if they could attract Fillmore's northern voters, they stood in reach of carrying Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Indiana, Illinois, and California. Why should ex-Whigs in the Republican party, who had long hated Democrats, leave it when it so clearly appeared to be a winner? Why should ex-Whigs who supported Fillmore in the North stick with the American party, rather than join their former colleagues in the Republican party, especially if it could be made more palatable to them? For both groups, there was no reason. By 1860 all but 80,000 of Fillmore's 395,000 northern voters would join the Republicans to help elect ex-Whig Abraham Lincoln president.⁸³ The Whig party had been displaced—permanently.

What finally buried the Whig party, therefore, was the extraordinary Republican surge in the North. It lodged most northern Whigs in a different party than their southern counterparts, and there was no immediate prospect that they could reunite. Unlike conservative old guard Whigs who abstained or voted Democratic in disgust at Fillmore's embrace of Know Nothingism, moreover, antipathy to anti-Catholicism and nativism did not drive most of them to the Republican column. Many had themselves been Know Nothings, and Republicans, in addition to arranging a common front behind Frémont, used anti-Catholic appeals to attract them. Nontheless, as Fillmore knew, they went Republican primarily because of their outrage at slavery expansion and Slave Power aggressions against the North—specifically, against Senator Charles Sumner and northern residents of Kansas. Explaining why Republicans would sweep the former Whig bastion of Vermont, one Fillmore loyalist confessed in early July, "The outrage upon Mr. Sumner and upon the people of Kansas has strengthened them as a party and placed it out of our power to carry this State unless Congress settles the Kansas question soon." In late October, another Vermonter reported that attempts to revive the Whig party there and in the rest of New England by ratifying the action of the Baltimore Whig convention had failed. "The mass of the Whig party in N. Eng." simply refused "to keep their former organization" and went as a "body" to the Republicans because of the "deep & extensive revulsion of feeling at the present state of things."

That is the point. Neither Congress nor the election of 1856 settled the Kansas or broader sectional questions. The new Democratic administration only helped exacerbate "the present state of things," thereby fueling the continued growth of the Republicans and dooming any chance of resurrecting the Whig party. The intensity of northern anger at Slave Power aggressions and the aid it gave Republicans cannot be exaggerated. Northerners felt a profound need for a party that championed the North. They saw themselves being reduced to slavery, the antithesis of the public liberty they cherished, because Democrats allowed Southerners to destroy republican self-government. "What has taken place in Kansas and at Washington within the last few months," screamed one Massachusetts Republican in July 1856, "is a disgrace to the country and a reproach to our republican form of government." "It is high time that the people of the whole country should know and understand, that the degraded negro is not the only class of slaves among us; but that the arrogance of the 'Slave Power' tramples ruthlessly upon all who presume to fix the limits of its dominion," echoed an Ohioan. The people "are perfectly furious," concurred a Pennsylvanian, "and nothing but the vent which our election affords, prevents [them] from resorting to arms."86

XΙ

Within four and a half years of the 1856 presidential election, Northerners and Southerners did take up arms to vent their reciprocal fury at each other. From the moment he assumed the presidency in 1850, Millard Fillmore had seen the potential bloodbath coming. If either the Democrats or the Republicans won in 1856, he predicted that year, "Civil War and anarchy stare us in the face." 87

As argued in the first parts of this chapter, sectional division was not the only thing that destroyed the Whig party and drove it to its grave. But the death of the Whig party clearly contributed to the outbreak of war, if only by clearing the way for and, in the form of essential northern Whig converts, aiding the rise of the Republican party as the major opponent of Democrats in American political life. That achievement, largely completed by the end of 1856, allowed Republicans, rather than a differently constituted anti-Democratic party, to capture the votes of Northerners who wanted to punish the Democrats in 1860. And their victory in the presidential election provoked Deep South secession and the subsequent war.

The death of the Whig party thus had consequences, and none graver than the outbreak of the Civil War in April 1861. This is not to say that there never could have been a civil war had a bisectional Whig party survived. If anything, this study should show how rapidly contingent events could change things. But surely the circumstances provoking that war and its chronology would have been different. The historical Civil War, the one that started in April 1861, resulted primarily from the fact that an exclusively northern and overtly antisouthern Republican party, not a bisectional Whig party, benefited most from anger at Democrats in 1856 and defeated Democrats for the presidency in 1860. That southern fire-eaters who had unsuccessfully sought secession for decades could have exploited the election of a Whig president, supported by southern Whigs, to trigger disunion seems doubtful indeed.⁸⁸

To the extent that the Whig blunders, heedlessly selfish decisions, and failed strategies outlined at the start of this chapter contributed to the death of the Whig party, therefore, they also indirectly helped cause the Civil War. The more important question, however, is whether Whigs inflamed the escalating sectional antagonism that helped destroy the party and disrupt the nation, as Fillmore had so presciently forecast. By even raising this question, one risks attack as an unreconstructed revisionist, as a purveyor of the long since discredited argument that a "blundering generation" of narrow-minded or misguided political leaders, not irreconcilable and popularly rooted sectional differences over slavery and slavery extension, "caused" the Civil War.

For over thirty years, the accepted interpretation of the war's coming in the academy has been that it resulted from basic social, economic, and ideological differences between the sections deriving from the presence of African-American slavery in the South and its absence from the North. In its cruder—and more common—formulation, the "forces" that caused the war were self-generating and operated toward their inevitable conclusion almost without the need of human agency. And most certainly, this argument goes, specific political leaders cannot be held accountable for the war since the sectional conflict producing it involved mass public opinion and sensibilities growing out of different economic and social systems, not something so epiphenomenal as politics.

Yet sectional differences over slavery had existed for decades without causing a shooting war, and the Whig party itself survived for two of those decades despite them. As even the most compelling modern critic of the revisionists recognizes, moreover, the Civil War resulted from a specific chain of events. And those events did not just happen; they were not just products of sectional differences. Rather, specific human actors—and, yes, specific political leaders—usually caused them to happen.⁸⁹

The questions, then, are, how many of these actors were Whigs and who were they? Whigs are hardly blameless. Without question, John Tyler and his cabinet, who decided to seek Texas' annexation to secure Tyler's reelection and salvage his historical reputation, are most blameworthy. Had Henry Clay been nominated in December 1839 and elected in 1840, as he surely would have been, he would not have sought Texas' annexation in 1844. Nor would he have provoked the subsequent Mexican War, with its legacy of dispute over slavery extension into the Mexican Cession. But Tyler and his cronies were hardly alone. Stephens, Toombs, Thomas Clingman, and a few other southern Whigs, usually for narrow political gains, helped ratchet up the provocative southern demands that so infuriated the North. Next to Tyler's Texas adventurism, moreover, no Whig action did more to destroy the party and bring on the war than southern Whigs' easily avoidable support for the Nebraska Act in 1854, a mistake that many of them later rued. Similarly, some northern Whigs—John Quincy Adams and his son Charles Francis, Joshua Giddings, Henry Wilson, Weed, Seward, Greeley, Ben Wade, William F. Johnston, Roger Sherman Baldwin, and others—helped whip up northern anger in response to these perceived aggressions.

To the extent that politicians, rather than nonpartisan actors, were responsible for the events that inflamed sectional animosities and helped lead to war, however, Democrats and Free Soilers, by any objective standard, deserve more blame than Whigs. As the historian William W. Freehling demonstrates so persuasively, southern Democrats and the Calhounites who operated as a pressure group upon them launched most of the assaults that outraged the North along the road to disunion. In Dixie, Whigs were far more often conservative unionists victimized politically by Democratic aggression than they were aggressors themselves. And during the secession crisis of 1860–61, Whigs in virtually every state of the South provided the leadership of and most votes for the opposition to immediate secession, whereas Democrats led the rush to leave the Union.⁹⁰

Likewise, it was always northern Democrats, not northern Whigs, who folded before pressure from the South, thereby encouraging still more southern aggressions. Antislavery northern Whigs did take a harder sectional line than northern Democrats, and they did play the antislavery card to win elections in the North. But most of them usually acted on the defensive, only after southern or northern Democrats had created an issue, and many were motivated as much by a recognition of how southern aggressions, if not stopped, would endanger the Union as by antislavery and antisouthern sentiment. Most, emphatically, were not abolitionists who sought to destroy the South's domestic institution or sectional tyrants who sought to dictate to white Southerners.

Seward is a perfect example. After the most extreme antislavery Whigs bolted to the Free Soil party in 1848, no other northern Whig was so frequently condemned as a dangerous fanatic by Southerners and his conservative New York Whig rivals as Seward. Yet when the crunch came in 1854, Seward's true conservatism showed. Supremely confident that Northerners could win any contest with slaveholders for the territories without a new party and certainly without a war, Seward, to the dismay of infuriated Free Soilers and the consternation of some outraged northern Whigs, sought to preserve his ties to southern Whigs and to save the Whig party as a bisectional organization. Again, during the secession crisis, five years after he had become a Republican, Seward and his New York editorial allies like Weed and Henry Raymond responded more positively than any other Republicans to pleas from southern ex-Whigs that secession in the upper South might be stopped if the exclusively northern Republican party dropped its South-bashing, antislavery rhetoric and joined antisecessionist Southerners in a new, bisectional Union party. Millard Fillmore himself could have done no more.91

Yet Seward's efforts, like Fillmore's, came to naught. They did so primarily because other Republicans, led by another ex-Whig, President Abraham Lincoln, refused to follow the example of earlier northern Democrats by acceding to southern demands and thereby destroying the new Republican party itself. Lincoln's attitude toward a Union party would change, but his intransigence in the winter of 1860–61 helped provoke the Civil War that many northern and southern Whigs had long hoped to avert. That Lincoln was the president who made this decision, like the rise and triumph of the Republican party itself, was a direct result of the death of the Whig party to which Lincoln himself had clung until early 1856. There would have been no Civil War without an underlying sectional conflict, but a specific chain of political events and politicians' decisions both aggravated that conflict and explain why that war started in April 1861. And among the most important links in this chain of causation were the decisions and developments that put the Whig party in its grave.

XII

Five years after that unimaginably sanguinary war ended, Edward Stafford offered his epitaph for the Whig party. He did not write in 1870 from sheer whim. Rather, he was responding to widespread talk in the South about reviving Whiggery to replace the Republicans as the Democrats' primary partisan opponent. Such talk had appeared sporadically in the late 1850s. During the secession crisis and the war itself, moreover, proposals for building a Whig-based Union party of the type envisioned by John P. Kennedy had flourished. Because southern Whigs largely opposed secession in 1860–61, moreover, even during the years of the Confederacy, Southerners elected them to express hostility to the Democrats who brought on secession and now led the Confederacy. This habitual Whig opposition to the hated Democrats continued immediately after the war, when former Whigs won most of the appointive and elective offices in the South under the terms of President Andrew Johnson's Reconstruction policies.⁹²

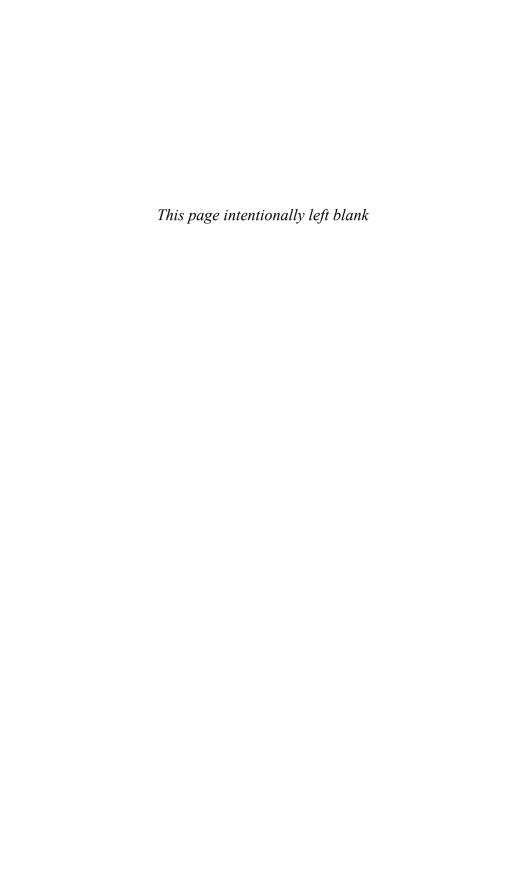

Even after passage of Congress' Military Reconstruction Acts in 1867 and 1868 added adult black males to the southern electorate and thereby launched the formation of Republican parties across the South, former Whigs, most of whom had languished out of office during the late 1850s, landed on their feet. In most southern states, they ended up leading both the Republican and Democratic (or Conservative) parties between 1868 and 1872. Often having far more in common with their fellow ex-Whigs in the opposition than they did with the mass base of their newly adopted parties, ex-Whigs in both talked of reviving the Whig party. 93

Stafford hoped to squelch this talk with his caustic putdown. He need not have bothered. Like the surreal visions of Whig resurrection voiced so poignantly during 1856, prospects of Whig revival after the Civil War were sheer fantasy. Having embedded themselves in power across the North by managing the successful northern war effort, Republicans had no inclination whatsoever to abandon their party for resurrected Whiggery. And without northern allies who shared their hatred of and contempt for Democrats, southern Whigs had no hope of ever reviving the Whig party.

At least one tough-minded North Carolina Whig recognized that fact—and as early as 1865, when prospects that antisecessionist southern Whigs might rise to power again seemed bright. Unlike any other state in the nation, in North Carolina Democrats' opponents reassumed the Whig label and ran Whig candidates in the late 1850s. They almost won the governorship in 1860 and gained additional recruits by opposing immediate secession in early 1861. Thus a formal Whig organization still existed there when the Civil War began. Born in 1830 and therefore far too young to seek office as a Whig during the party's heyday, Zebulon Vance imbibed Whig principles from his family, and he became one of the most energetic and effective Whig leaders during its second coming. In 1862 he was elected governor for the same reason former Whigs in North Carolina and elsewhere were elected to the Confederate Congress in 1863—to express opposition to the administration of ex-Democrat and Confederate President Jefferson Davis. During his tenure in office, indeed, Vance earned fame as an unusually effective and obstreperous critic of the Richmond authorities.⁹⁴

The very opposite of the old fogies who tried to save the Whig party in 1856, Vance, in sum, was exactly the kind of youthful, vigorous, ambitious, and skillful politician to lead a revival of the Whig party. But he was also realistic enough to know the task was impossible. When asked to do so in 1865, therefore, he replied with cold finality: "The [Whig] party is dead and buried and the tombstone placed over it and I don't care to spend the rest of my days mourning at its grave." To this brutally candid and totally accurate extinguisher, there was—and is—only one appropriate response. Amen!

CHAPTER 1

- 1. Beverly C. Sandrin to James B. Clay, Baltimore, February 20, 1844, Thomas J. Clay MSS.
- 2. J. W. Mighels to Henry Clay, November 11, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 3. See, for example, Binkley, American Political Parties, and Schlesinger, Age of Jackson. For one historian who questions the very concept of a first party system by denying that Federalists and Jeffersonians developed the permanent organizations and voter identifications necessary to qualify as genuine parties, see Formisano, "Deferential-Participant Politics," and id., "Federalists and Republicans."
- 4. This literature is too vast to list here, but for examples see Benson, Concept; Livermore, Twilight of Federalism; McCormick, Second American Party System.
- 5. The following analysis is largely my extrapolations from the insights in Ellis, Jeffersonian Crisis. The links between Jeffersonianism and Whiggery are also suggested by McCoy, Elusive Republic, pp. 236–59; Birkner, "Politics, Law and Enterprise"; and especially Howe, Political Culture, pp. 49–50, 90–91, 109, and passim.
- 6. The best study of the economic thought of the Jeffersonians is McCoy, Elusive Republic, but see also Appleby, Capitalism.
- 7. The best modern analyses of Clay during the 1820s can be found in Peterson, Great Triumvirate, and Remini, Henry Clay. For the Republicans' schizophrenia about the constitutionality of federal internal improvements, which would help explain Madison's veto of Calhoun's bonus bill in 1817 and Clay's later shift to a formula of federal revenue sharing, see Larson, "Jefferson's Union."
- 8. Aside from Ellis, my portrait of the Radicals is drawn from Brown, "The Missouri Crisis"; Phillips, "Democrats of the Old School," and Phillips, "Pennsylvania Origins"; Risjord, Old Republicans; Schlesinger, Age of Jackson, pp. 18–29; and Sellers, Market Revolution, pp. 34–136.
- 9. The literature on republican ideology and its relationship to older "commonwealth" or "country" political ideas is now so familiar that it seems unnecessary to cite it all again. Much of it is conveniently summarized and cited in the Introduction to Elkins and McKitrick, Age of Federalism, pp. 3–29, 757–61. On the inculcation of veneration for the Revolutionary generation's achievements, however, see Welter, Mind of America, pp. 3–218 and passim; and Forgie, Patricide, pp. 3–53 and passim. For interpretations of how republican ideology was transformed between the Revolution and the Jacksonian period, see Ross, "Transformation of Republican Ideology," and Kruman, "Second American Party System."
- 10. On the egalitarian thrust of the Revolution that displaced the hierarchical conceptions of classical republicanism, see Wood, Radicalism.

- 11. On James Madison's own postwar popularity, see McCoy, Last of the Fathers, pp. 11–20.
- 12. To the extent that Americans bothered to vote at all between 1808 and 1828, turnout was usually higher in state than in presidential or congressional elections. Prior to 1819, however, it is not clear that, except for a few places, these state elections pitted candidates from the rival Republican wings against each other. Prior to that year, indeed, turnout was usually greatest in elections where Federalists still contested Republicans. See Tables I and II in McCormick, "New Perspectives."
- 13. The political ramifications of the Panic nationally and in individual states have been described in a number of works, but for able summaries, see Sellers, Market Revolution, pp. 103–201; and Remini, Jackson and the Course of American Freedom, pp. 39–54.
 - 14. Brown, "Missouri Crisis."
- 15. On the influences in the 1824 campaign, see McCormick, Second American Party System; the two articles by Kim Phillips cited in note 8; Ratcliffe, "Role of Voters"; Marshall, "Genesis"; and Sellers, "Banking and Politics."
 - 16. Remini, Jackson and the Course of American Freedom, pp. 75–76.
 - 17. Ibid., pp. 12-38, 74-99; quotations are from pp. 76-77.
- 18. The best modern treatment of the maneuvering in the House is found in ibid., pp. 85–99, and in Remini, Henry Clay, pp. 251–72. See also Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, pp. 6–12; and Poage, Henry Clay, pp. 4–5.
 - 19. Nathans, Webster, pp. 18-24.
- 20. For a succinct, exceptionally insightful interpretation of Adams' presidency, see Skowronek, Politics Presidents Make, pp. 110–27. It, in turn, draws heavily from the best modern treatment of the Adams administration, Hargreaves, The Presidency of John Quincy Adams.
- 21. Brown, "Missouri Crisis"; Pessen, Jacksonian America, pp. 293–99; Howe, Political Culture, pp. 40–42; Remini, Jackson and the Course of American Freedom, p. 258.
 - 22. For the "Tariff of Abominations," see Niven, Van Buren, pp. 194-201.
 - 23. McCormick, "Political Development."
 - 24. Marshall, "Strange Still-Birth."
- 25. Ibid.; McCormick, Second American Party System; Nathans, Webster, pp. 1–7, 22–47, and passim; Formisano, "Toward a Reorientation," 61.
- 26. Robert V. Remini has analyzed the building of the Jackson organization between 1825 and 1828 and the nature of its campaign appeal in a number of works, among which are Election of Andrew Jackson; Andrew Jackson; and, most recently, Jackson and the Course of American Freedom, pp. 100–42. In the last book, he demonstrates how the Jackson campaign stressed the need for reform to stamp out corruption and thus save republican liberty.
- 27. Remini, Henry Clay, pp. 323–28; Nathans, Webster, pp. 26–27; Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, pp. 13–16; Birkner, Southard, pp. 75–89.
- 28. Henry Clay to Francis Brooke, January 10, 1829, in Works of Henry Clay, IV, p. 217. The figures on party strength in Congress come from Historical Statistics, II, 1083.
- 29. On May 29, 1830, Webster explicitly wrote Clay that "the Tariff and Internal Improvements" would be "the great ground of difference" between new parties and that Jackson's stand on them must produce "discontent and schisms among our opponents from which much is now to be hoped." Works of Henry Clay, IV, pp. 274–76.
- 30. Clay to Barbour, November 21, 1829, quoted in Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, p. 30; Clay to J. J. Johnston, July 18, 1829, and Webster to Clay, April 18, 1830, May 29, 1830, in Works of Henry Clay, IV, pp. 238–40, 260, 274–76. See also Clay to H. Niles, November 25, 1828, J. J. Crittenden to Clay, December 3, 1828, and Clay to Francis Brooke, January 30, 1829, ibid., pp. 213–21; Nathans, Webster, pp. 29–31.
- 31. Richard P. McCormick, in the works cited above, makes the point that it took sixteen years for the second party system to crystallize. Yet in some states the alignments that appeared in 1828 probably already represented previously fixed attachments. See, e.g., Benson et al., "Toward a Theory of Stability"; and Ratcliffe, "Politics in Jacksonian Ohio."
- 32. Remini, Andrew Jackson, pp. 106–32; Remini, Jackson and the Course of American Freedom, pp. 257–79: Ellis, Union at Risk, pp. 13–73; Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, p. 56.

- 33. This story is well told in a number of sources: Remini, Andrew Jackson and Andrew Jackson and the Course of American Freedom, pp. 203–352; Nathans, Webster, pp. 31–47; Freehling, Prelude to Civil War.
- 34. The best recent treatment of the Barbour movement is Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 11–22.
- 35. I have interpreted the origins and course of Antimasonry at greater length in Holt, "Antimasonic and Know Nothing Parties," pp. 575–620. All quotations of Antimasonic rhetoric in this and subsequent paragraphs are drawn from that essay. See also Kutolowski, "Antimasonry Reexamined"; Formisano, Transformation of Political Culture, 197–221; and Goodman, Toward a Christian Republic.
- 36. Peter B. Porter to Clay, October 6, 1830, Clay to John Bailhache, November 24, 1830, Clay to J. J. Johnston, July 23, 1831, Clay to Francis Brooke, June 23, and October 4, 1831, in Works of Henry Clay, IV, pp. 284, 288–91, 300–03, 306–09, 314–17.
 - 37. Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, pp. 48-53; Shade, "Political Pluralism," pp. 80-81.
- 38. The quotation is from W. B. Lawrence to Clay, November 18, 1830, in Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, p. 49. My portrait of the National Republicans' orientation is based on Marshall, "Strange Still-Birth," and Nathans, Webster, pp. 29–49.
- 39. Alexander H. Everett to Henry Clay, October 29, 1830, quoted in Nathans, Webster, p. 36.
- 40. Oran Follett to Major G. Camp, December 13, 1831, quoted in Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, p. 67; see ibid., pp. 43–68, for evidence of others who doubted Clay's ability to unite the anti-Jackson men. The Address of the National Republican Convention, December 1831, is reprinted in Remini, "The Election of 1832," pp. 553–66.
- 41. Russo, "Major Political Issues," p. 6 and passim; Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, pp. 55–57.
- 42. Remini, Jackson and the Bank War; Wilburn, Biddle's Bank; Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, pp. 57–70; Nathans, Webster, pp. 41–47; Marshall, "Strange Still-Birth"; Clay to Francis Brooke, April 19, 1830, and to J. J. Johnston, April 30, 1830, in Works of Henry Clay, IV, pp. 260–61, 264–65.
 - 43. Remini, "The Election of 1832," p. 509.
- 44. For the Democrats' use of the veto to offset liabilities on state issues, see Benson, Concept of Jacksonian Democracy, pp. 47–63. On Weed, see Van Deusen, Weed, pp. 63–64.
 - 45. Remini, "The Election of 1832," pp. 511-12.
- 46. Ibid., p. 515; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 5. Wirt carried Vermont, and Robert Remini estimates that Wirt got 8 percent of the popular vote compared to Clay's 37 percent. Yet even Remini's estimate of Clay's vote may be too high and, correspondingly, that of Wirt's too low since three separate electoral tickets were in the field in at least eight states. See Shade, "Political Pluralism," pp. 80–81.

CHAPTER 2

- 1. Henry Clay to Francis Brooke, Washington, January 17, 1833, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 347–48.
 - 2. Henry Clay to Willie P. Mangum, August 26, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, p. 191.
 - 3. Clay to ?, Ashland, July 14, 1835, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 392-95.
- 4. The best account of this episode, which stresses Jackson's desire to avoid the use of force, is Freehling, Prelude to Civil War, pp. 260–97. For the congressional enactment of the so-called Compromise of 1833, see Peterson, Olive Branch; Peterson, Great Triumvirate, pp. 212–33; and Remini, Henry Clay, pp. 412–35.
- 5. Willie P. Mangum to Charity A. Mangum, Washington, December 15, 1833, in The Mangum Papers, I, p. 589; Augusta Courier, n.d., quoted in Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 17. On the general reaction to the nullification crisis in the South and its role in launching State Rights organizations, see, ibid., pp. 17–24; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 52–57; Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 54–63; Folsom, "Party Formation," 221–23; Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 21–28; McCormick, Second American Party System, pp. 192–93, 205–06, 241–42, 197–301.

- 6. Willie P. Mangum to David L. Swain, Washington, December 22, 1833, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 51–56. See also Mangum to John Beard, Philadelphia, October 7, 1834, ibid., pp. 212–19.
- 7. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 1–38 and passim; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 43–97; Folsom, "Party Formation"; Williams, "Foundations," 115–29; and Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 20–39.
 - 8. Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, pp. 71-117; Nathans, Webster, pp. 48-61.
- For this portrait of Webster, I have relied on Nathans, Webster; Brown, Webster; and Dalzell, Webster.
- 10. Boston Daily Evening Transcript, June 20, July 29, 1833, and Boston Courier, August 8, 1833, quoted in Nathans, Webster, pp. 64–66. I have borrowed heavily from Nathans' perceptive analysis of this episode, pp. 61–73, but see also Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, pp. 71–117, and Brown, Webster, pp. 15–55.
 - 11. Nathans, Webster, pp. 61-66; Carroll, Origins of the White Party, pp. 81-83.
- 12. Amos Kendall to Andrew Jackson, March 20, 1833, quoted in Latner, "A New Look," 956; Curtis, Fox at Bay, pp. 39–46. The announcement on September 25 came from interim Treasury Secretary Roger B. Taney, whom Jackson had appointed specifically to make it.
- 13. Sentinel, October 4, 1833, quoted in Birkner, "Politics, Law and Enterprise," p. 328.
- 14. There had been a series of investigations of the Bank since 1830, most of which were biased for or against it according to the predispositions of various committee members. Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, pp. 178–95.
- 15. Mangum to Duncan Cameron, Washington, February 7, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 72–75. That the pets were selected for their political reliability is demonstrated in Gatell, "Spoils of the Bank War."
 - 16. Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 50-52.
- 17. Samuel Hillman to Mangum, February 16, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 81–83. For an analysis of the contraction's impact on Tennessee, see Sellers, Polk; Jacksonian, pp. 196–210. A splendid example of a northern Whig's case against Jackson's economic blunders is William Henry Seward's "Six Million Dollar Loan Speech" of April 10, 1834, reprinted in Van Deusen, "The Whig Party," 369–78.
 - 18. Mangum to David L. Swain, Washington, December 22, 1833, loc. cit.
- 19. For this sketch, I have drawn heavily on the stunning portrait of Clay in Schlesinger, Age of Jackson, pp. 82–83, and the admirable analysis of Clay in Howe, Political Culture, pp. 123–49. Clay's personal magnetism is also described at length in Remini, Henry Clay. For Clay's temporary renunciation of presidential ambition, see Clay to Francis Brooke, May 30, 1833, in The Works of Henry Clay, V. pp. 360–63.
- 20. Van Deusen, "Whig Party," p. 337; Nathans, Webster, pp. 66–73, 85–87; Brown, Webster, pp. 56–66; Darling, Political Changes, pp. 85–129.
- 21. Ibid.; Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, pp. 101–17. Both Nathans and Brown correct Carroll's erroneous assertion, p. 210, that Clay maneuvered Webster into accepting the chairmanship to force his hand.
- 22. Birkner, "Politics, Law and Enterprise," pp. 339–40; Clay's speech is quoted in Remini, Henry Clay, pp. 447–49.
- 23. Brown, Webster, pp. 64–66, Clay to Biddle, February 2, 1834, quoted p. 65; Nathans, Webster, pp. 75–78, Webster quoted p. 77. Clay and Mangum also urged Virginians and North Carolinians to mount opposition to Jackson in their state legislatures on the removal question, not recharter. Clay to Francis Brooke, December 16, 1833, January 14, 1834, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 375–77; Mangum to David L. Swain, Washington, December 22, 1833, loc. cit.
 - 24. Clay to Francis Brooke, December 16, 1833, loc. cit.
- 25. According to Remini, Henry Clay, pp. 456–59, a speech that Clay made to the Senate on April 14, 1834, was primarily responsible for affixing the Whig name to the new opposition coalition.
 - 26. Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, pp. 171, 124-27; Schlesinger, Age of Jackson, 106-

- 11, 267–82. The quotation is from p. 279. Howe's Political Culture, the fullest exploration of Whig thought, constitutes a retort to this indictment of intellectual sterility.
- 27. Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 9–11; McCormick, "Was There a 'Whig Strategy' in 1836?" 50–52.
- 28. Willie P. Mangum to John Beard, October 7, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 212–19.
- 29. My thinking about the interrelatedness of parties in any party system has been influenced by Sartori, Parties and Party Systems, pp. 25–28, 43, and passim.
- 30. Howe, Political Culture, pp. 69–95; Mangum to David L. Swain, December 22, 1833, loc. cit. Raleigh Register, June 10, 1834.
- 31. Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, p. 124; Clay to Francis Brooke, December 16, 1833; Richmond Whig, April 8, 1834, quoted in Simms, Rise of the Whigs, p. 86. "The name Whig made its appearance in North Carolina," recalled the Raleigh Register on January 23, 1846, "when power first began to encroach on the rights of the people. . . . The name implies opposition to misused power, and we glory, as does every true Whig, in the name."
- 32. Alexander Coffin to Henry Clay, May 12, 1834, in Works of Henry Clay, II, pp. 383–84; Isaac Croom to Mangum, Lenoir County, N.C., April 13, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 143–44.
- 33. New York Daily Advertiser, March 21, 22, 1834, quoted in Nathans, Webster, p. 80; Seward's Address of the Whig Minority in the legislature is reproduced in Van Deusen, "The Whig Party," pp. 379–83.
- 34. James Mowatt to William Henry Seward, N.Y.C., September 20, 1834, Seward MSS (RU).
- 35. Howe, "Virtue and Commerce," 351; Appleby, "Origins of American Revolutionary Ideology." Kathleen Kutolowski questions the extent of anticommercial sentiment among Antimasons in western New York in "Antimasonry Reexamined."
- 36. My reference here, of course, is to Howe's superb Political Culture, on which I rely heavily for the following discussion.
- 37. In this and the following paragraphs, I have relied heavily on Howe, Political Culture, pp. 23–98 and passim; and Formisano, "Political Character." The quotations came from my essay "The Antimasonic and Know Nothing Parties," p. 587.
- 38. Hofstadter, Idea of a Party System; Howe, Political Culture, pp. 28–68; Welter, Mind of America, pp. 173–74, 196; Ann Arbor State Journal, October 26, 1837, quoted in Formisano, "Political Character," p. 702; and Silbey, "Election of 1836," p. 585.
- 39. Wallace, "Changing Concepts"; address of the New York Whig State Convention, February 1836, in Van Deusen, "The Whig Party," p. 395; Ann Arbor Michigan Emigrant, quoted in Formisano, "Political Character," p. 702.
- 40. Latner, "A New Look," p. 965; Illinois Whig caucus of 1835 quoted in McCormick, Second American Party System, p. 284; Huntsville (Ala.) Southern Advocate, May 26, 1835, quoted in Thornton, Politics and Power, p. 32.
- 41. Howe, Political Culture, pp. 52–54, 142, 157–59, 280; Formisano, "Political Character"; McCormick, Second American Party System, pp. 282–93; Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 32–37.

CHAPTER 3

- 1. Henry Clay to Willie P. Mangum, Ashland, August 26, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, p. 191. Niles Register, Volume 46, p. 443, lists the Whigs as winning 74 of 100 seats in the lower house of the Kentucky Legislature.
- 2. Van Deusen, Weed, pp. 65–69, 86–89; id., Seward, pp. 23–28. Seward's speech against the Six Million Dollar Loan and the Address of the Whig Legislators are reproduced in Van Deusen, "The Whig Party," pp. 369–83. The standard study of the formation of the Whig party at the state level is McCormick, Second American Party System. I have utilized it in my discussion of every state, and because it is organized by states, I shall eschew the repeated listing of page citations in these notes.

- 3. In addition to McCormick, see Ratcliffe, "Politics in Jacksonian Ohio"; Darling, Political Changes, pp. 126–27; Birkner, "Politics, Law and Enterprise," pp. 350–67; Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 96–97; Van Deusen, "The Whig Party," pp. 336–38.
- 4. Simms, Rise of the Whigs, pp. 63–86; Washington National Intelligencer, April 3, 1834, quoted in ibid., p. 84; Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 28–38.
- 5. Williams, "Foundations," pp. 119-24; The Mangum Papers, II, p. 216, note; Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 58-65.
 - 6. See the sections on Illinois and Indiana in McCormick, Second American Party System.
 - 7. Ibid., p. 28.
- 8. The Mangum Papers, I, p. xxxii; Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, p. 61; Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, p. 126; Silbey, "Election of 1836," p. 582; Simms, Rise of the Whigs, p. 98. For returns in gubernatorial elections I have used Kallenbach and Kallenbach (eds.), American State Governors. Figures on congressional elections come from the Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections.
- 9. Weed to Seward, April 13, May 13, 1835, Albert H. Tracy to Seward, April 14, 1835, Seward MSS (RU).
- 10. Nathans, Webster, pp. 82–83; Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, pp. 221–22; Temin, Jacksonian Economy, pp. 61–68; Josiah Randall to Willie P. Mangum, Philadelphia, December 12, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, p. 236. The percentages are based on the figures for currency in circulation outside the Treasury listed in Historical Statistics, p. 993. For estimates that continuing hostility to the Bank of the United States cost the Whigs the New York election in 1834, see William H. Seward to William W. Tredway, November 8, 1834, and Dudley Selden to Seward, November 12, 1834, Seward MSS (RU).
- 11. For more on this bitter feud among Quakers and how Democrats exploited Hicksite wrath against National Republican Governor Elias P. Seeley and United States Senator Theodore Frelinghuysen, see Birkner, "Politics, Law and Enterprise," pp. 330–36, 364–67, 382–83.
 - 12. Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties, pp. 81-97.
- 13. Nathans, Webster, pp. 83–89; Holt, "Antimasonic and Know Nothing Parties," pp. 590–92; Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, pp. 49–81. See also the sections on these states in McCormick, Second American Party System.
- 14. R. H. Alexander to Willie P. Mangum, Raleigh, November 29, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 224–26.
 - 15. Crittenden quoted in Silbey, "Election of 1836," p. 585.
- 16. John C. Calhoun to Francis W. Pickens, January 4, 1834, and to Christopher van Deventer, January 25, 1834, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 326–30.
- 17. John C. Calhoun to Francis Pickens, April 15, 1834, and to Duff Green, September 20, 1834, ibid., pp. 335–36, 341–42; Clay to Mangum, Ashland, August 26, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, p. 191; see also Matt M. Moore to Mangum, April 17, 1834, and Orlando Brown to Mangum, December 21, 1834, ibid., pp. 147–48, 250–52; Henry Clay to Francis Brooke, April 17, 1834, in Works of Henry Clay, V, p. 382.
- 18. For a forceful argument that no coherent national Whig party existed by 1836 and that incipient Whigs pursued no concerted strategy that year, see McCormick, "Was There a 'Whig Strategy' in 1836?". Additional evidence on the embryonic state of Whig organization and partisan loyalties can be found in Shade, "Political Pluralism." For evidence that Whigs shared enough of a common bond to monitor and participate vicariously in the campaigns of their fellows in different states, see Brantz Mayer to William Henry Seward, Baltimore, September 21, 1834, Joseph M. Root to Seward, Norwalk, Ohio, October 23, 1834, and Thurlow Weed to Seward, Albany, March 8, April 13, October 16, 1834, Seward MSS (RU).
- 19. National Intelligencer, July 1, 1835, quoted in Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, p. 145; Weed to Seward, June 15, 1835, Seward MSS; Clay to ?, July 14, 1835, James Barbour to Clay, August 2, 1835, in Works of Henry Clay, II, pp. 392–99; Nathans, Webster, pp. 90–91.
- 20. Thurlow Weed to Francis Granger, November 23, 1834, quoted in Kirwan, Crittenden, p. 127; Mangum to Graham, Washington, December 17, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 245–47.
 - 21. Nathans, Webster, pp. 91-95; Mangum to William A. Graham, December 17, 1834; Orlando Brown to Mangum, December 21, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 245–47, 250–52; John C. Calhoun to Lewis S. Coryell, Fort Hill, S. C., August 10, 1834, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," p. 340.

- 22. Clay to ?, Ashland, July 14, 1835, in Works of Henry Clay, II, pp. 392–95; Willie P. Mangum to John Beard, Philadelphia, October 7, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 212–19.
- 23. Mangum to John Beard, October 7, 1834; James Barbour to Henry Clay, August 2, 1835, loc cit.; Nathans, Webster, pp. 90–103.
- 24. Seward to Weed, February 15, March 15, 1835, quoted in Brown, Webster, p. 113; Nathans, Webster, p. 95. See also Weed to Seward, March 8, 1835, and Albert H. Tracy to Seward, April 14, 1835, Seward MSS (RU).
- 25. Cincinnati Gazette, September 18, 1835, quoted in Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, p. 141; Ohio State Journal, October 15, 1836, quoted in Fox, "The Bank Wars," p. 265; Nathans, Webster, pp. 95–103; Brown, Webster, pp. 110–23.
 - 26. Silbey, "The Election of 1836," p. 587; Clay to ?, Ashland, July 14, 1835, loc cit.
- 27. Henry Clay to John Bailhache, Ashland, September 13, 1835, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 399–400; Brown, Webster, pp. 98–99, 124–48; Nathans, Webster, pp. 94–98; Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, pp. 69–71.
- 28. My account of the southern Whig campaign for White in 1835 and 1836 rests heavily on Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 74–97, and Silbey, "Election of 1836."
- 29. Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, pp. 234–303; McCormick, Second American Party System, pp. 227–36.
 - 30. Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 30-35.
- 31. Alexander Porter to Jesse B. Harrison, January 12, 1836, quoted in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 81; Richmond Whig, April 7, 1835, quoted in Simms, Rise of the Whigs, p. 100. While Harrison would officially head the Whig ticket in Virginia, the electors on it had been chosen originally as White men and Virginia's Whigs ran as supporters of both.
 - 32. Alfred Balch to Andrew Jackson, April 4, 1835, quoted in Latner, "A New Look," p. 964.
- 33. Raleigh Register, December 22, 1835, W. H. Roane to Frank Blair, May 7, 1835, and Thomas Ritchie to Francis Blair, March 27, 1835, quoted in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 81, 83–84; Washington Globe, n.d., quoted in Silbey, "Election of 1836," p. 594.
- 34. The quotation is in Silbey, "Election of 1836," p. 590, and in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 91.
- 35. See Cooper, Politics of Slavery; Silbey, "Election of 1836"; and Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 28–29.
- 36. Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 11–13 and passim; Van Deusen, "The Whig Party," p. 341. Thurlow Weed lamented that the southern campaign for White would only help Van Buren in the North in Weed to Seward, September 30, 1835, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 37. Silbey, "Election of 1836," pp. 592–95; Kirwan, Crittenden, p. 128.
 - 38. Van Deusen, "The Whig Party," pp. 390-96.
- 39. While the statistical state-by-state correlation between the 1828 and 1832 results was +.93, it was only +.22 between 1832 and 1836. Silbey, "The Election of 1836," p. 597. In certain states like Ohio, however, the county-by-county product-moment correlation between the 1836 vote and that of 1832 was exceptionally high. See Ratcliffe, "Politics in Jacksonian Ohio," p. 14.
- 40. The Spearman rank-order coefficient of correlation between the states, as ranked by growth in turnout and change in the anti-Democratic share of the popular vote, is +.658.
 - 41. Tribune Almanac for 1838, quoted in Burnham, Presidential Ballots, pp. 1–2.
- 42. The significance of the regional identification of candidates is a central theme in McCormick, Second American Party System; Silbey, "Election of 1836," pp. 595–99.
- 43. According to results listed in the Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections, pp. 562–67, the anti-Jacksonians captured 43 percent of House seats filled in 1834, 32.7 percent in 1835, and 40 percent in 1836. These figures include the South Carolinians identified as State Righters or Nullifiers.
 - 44. Walton, "Second Party System in Arkansas," pp. 127-30.
 - 45. Mering, Whig Party in Missouri, pp. 28-40.
 - 46. This and the following paragraph are based largely on Lucas, "Political Alchemy," an admirable piece of research and analysis that the author generously loaned me. The figures on party strength in the legislature are based on Lucas' estimates listed in Table III, p. 133. William G. Shade provides further statistical evidence that there was no relationship between state and national politics and thus no coherent Whig party in Mississippi or elsewhere before 1836 in "Political Pluralism," pp. 77–112, esp. pp. 90–91.

- 47. Van Deusen, Weed, pp. 86-87, 93.
- 48. Shade, Banks or No Banks, pp. 23–28. For the partisan dimensions of roll-call voting patterns in the Ohio and New Jersey legislatures between 1834 and 1836, on which assertions about the two states in the following paragraphs are based, see Ershkowitz and Shade, "Consensus or Conflict?"; and Levine, New Jersey.
 - 49. Levine, New Jersey, passim.
 - 50. Ibid., pp. 157-67.
 - 51. The previous three paragraphs are based on Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, pp. 50-85.
 - 52. Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 56-66.
 - 53. Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 29-34.
- 54. Simms, Rise of the Whigs, pp. 94–116, 167–92. For evidence of the lack of a party dimension to voting in the legislature in 1834 and 1835, see the figures for Virginia in the various tables in Ershkowitz and Shade, "Consensus or Conflict?"

One might argue that the joint Harrison-White electoral ticket in Virginia blunted the Whigs' attempts to pose as southern defenders of slavery and to attack Van Buren as untrustworthy on the abolitionist issue, yet the evidence is overwhelming that Virginia Whigs pursued that strategy.

- 55. Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, pp. 267–92. It is true that advocacy of White rather than the internal improvements issue probably accounts for the overwhelming victory Whigs appeared to win in the legislative elections of 1835. But as Sellers has ably demonstrated, that majority should be regarded as a White rather than a Whig victory. It quickly dissipated when the legislature met in the fall of 1835.
- 56. Bergeron, Antebellum Politics in Tennessee, pp. 35–63, argues that the presidential question was the central issue in the 1835 campaign. But he also sharply disagrees with Cooper that slavery was the central issue in the presidential election in Tennessee. I have used the figures he gives on pp. 45–46 for my calculations.
- 57. Raleigh Register, February 23, 1836, quoted in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 82; R. H. Alexander to Willie P. Mangum, Raleigh, November 29, 1834, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 224–26.
- 58. Williams, "Foundations," pp. 121–29; Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 3–28; Watson, Jacksonian Politics and Community Conflict, pp. 198–245 and passim; Jeffrey, "Internal Improvements," 111–56. See especially pp. 111–22 and Tables 2 and 3, pp. 152, 155.
- 59. Cooper, Politics of Slavery. Freehling, Road to Disunion, pp. 298–99, reaches an identical conclusion about the inapplicability of Cooper's paradigm to internal southern state politics.

CHAPTER 4

- 1. Clay to Francis Brooke, Washington, March 7, 1837, in Works of Henry Clay, V, p. 412.
- 2. According to Thomas Alexander's figures, 67 percent of the Democrats and 98 percent of the Whigs in the House of Representatives supported the final bill. Sectional Stress, p. 131, vote 50.
 - 3. Webster to Hiram Ketchum, January 28, 1837, quoted in Nathans, Webster, p. 106.
- 4. While I stress the formative impact of the panic more than he, William G. Shade's brilliant essay, "Political Pluralism," provides systematic evidence for this point.
- 5. The analysis in this and the following paragraphs is drawn from: Temin, Jacksonian Economy; Shade, Banks or No Banks, pp. 40–59; Curtis, Fox at Bay, pp. 64–85; Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 3–49; McFaul, Politics of Jacksonian Finance; Timberlake, "Specie Circular and Distribution"; and idem., "Specie Circular and Sales."
 - 6. Temin, Jacksonian Economy, pp. 88-91, 124.
- 7. The Specie Circular is quoted in Shade, Banks or No Banks, p. 42; Van Buren is quoted in Curtis, Fox at Bay, p. 71.
 - 8. Here I rely heavily on the analysis in Temin, Jacksonian Economy, pp. 136-47.

- 9. Ibid., Table 3.3, p. 71.
- 10. Ibid., Table 4.3, p. 124.
- 11. Ibid., Tables 3.2, 3.3, and 5.2, pp. 69-71, 159, and pp. 148-71.
- 12. Martin Van Buren to Andrew Jackson, April 24, 1837, quoted in Curtis, Fox at Bay, p. 71; see ibid., pp. 70–85, and Shade, Banks or No Banks, pp. 40–59.
- 13. William Henry Harrison to Nathaniel P. Tallmadge, February 22, 1840, quoted in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, p. 12.
 - 14. Curtis, Fox at Bay, pp. 64-85 and passim.
 - 15. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, III, pp. 324-46.
- 16. I am particularly indebted to the analysis in Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 39–58, for this point.
 - 17. Vroom quoted in Welter, Mind of America, p. 80.
- 18. Democratic Review (1838) and Edward D. Barber quoted in Welter, Mind of America, pp. 90, 185.
- 19. For partisan conflict on congressional votes from 1837 through most of the 1840s, see Alexander, Sectional Stress, and Silbey, Shrine of Party. Votes in the House during the special session are recorded in Alexander, pp. 24–30, 137–44.
- 20. Curtis, Fox at Bay, pp. 86–151; Friedman, Conservative Democrats; Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 3–24; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 101–19; and Schlesinger, Age of Jackson, pp. 227–66.
- 21. For differences on social legislation and cultural perspective, see especially Ershkowitz and Shade, "Consensus or Conflict?"; Benson, Concept of Jacksonian Democracy; and Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties.
 - 22. American Review, quoted in Welter, Mind of America, p. 15.
 - 23. Ibid., p. 127.
 - 24. Boritt, Lincoln.
 - 25. Whig address and American Review quoted in Welter, Mind of America, pp. 18, 123.
 - 26. New York Tribune, November 29, 1845.
 - 27. Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 20-21, 24, 32.
- 28. For an explanation of the data used to construct these tables and for citation of the political science literature relevant to the impact of economic conditions on off-year elections, as well as additional tables, graphs, and analysis that document this fluctuating pattern in Whig fortunes, see my "The Election of 1840, Voter Mobilization, and the Emergence of the Second American Party System" in Holt, Political Parties, pp. 151–91.
- 29. Compare Tables 3.3 and 3.6 in Temin, Jacksonian Economy, pp. 71, 103, and see his analysis of cotton prices, pp. 152–54. For example, cotton prices in New Orleans were 12.5 percent lower in the fall of 1837 than they had been in the fall of 1836, but the general wholesale price index was down 18.5 percent.
- 30. Compare the cotton prices listed in Table 3.6 in Temin's book with the figures in Table 6 and with the figures on the Whigs' share of the popular vote and accompanying graphs in Holt, "The Election of 1840," pp. 172–80.
- 31. Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 34–39. For the other states, see Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 113–15; Cole, The Whig Party in the South, pp. 47–52; and Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, p. 376.
- 32. Friedman, Conservative Democrats, pp. 31-39; Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 215-38.
 - 33. Friedman, Conservative Democrats, pp. 39-47; Van Deusen, Weed, p. 104.
 - 34. See Table 5 in Holt, "The Election of 1840," pp. 182-85.
 - 35. Historical Statistics, p. 1072.
- 36. See, for example, Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign; Chambers, "Election of 1840"; and McCormick, "New Perspectives." The presidential election of 1840 will be examined in Chapter 5.
 - 37. Table 5 in Holt, "The Election of 1840," pp. 182–85.
- 38. For a statistical analysis that shows the hardening of partisan allegiance after 1837, see Shade, "Political Pluralism," pp. 88–93.
 - 39. This argument is based on the theory of retrospective voting advanced in Fiorina, Retrospective Voting, and in complementary work by other political scientists. I discuss that literature and its applicability to nineteenth-century elections in my essay "The Election of 1840."

- 40. Thurlow Weed to William Henry Seward, Albany, May 16, 1837, Seward MSS (RU). See also Weed to Seward, March 12, 19, 31, April 16, 18, October 19, 25, 1837, Seward MSS (RU). In addition, the account of New York politics in this and the following paragraphs is based on Van Deusen, Weed, pp. 93–119; id., Seward, pp. 43–76; Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 297–305; Benson, Concept of Jacksonian Democracy, pp. 89–109; and Friedman, Conservative Democrats, pp. 39–46.
- 41. Christopher Morgan to Seward, March 1, 1838, Seward to Christopher Morgan, March 5, 1838 (draft), N. P. Tallmadge to Seward, March 4, 1838, Seward to N. P. Tallmadge, March 14, 1838, Thurlow Weed to Christopher Morgan, October 4, 1838, and Millard Fillmore to Seward, October 22, 1838, Seward MSS (RU).
- 42. Weed to Seward, December 2, 10, 1837, Day Otis Kellogg to Seward, October 8, 1838, Henry Raynor to Seward, October 14, 1838, and Fillmore to Seward, October 22, 1838, Seward MSS (RU).
- 43. This account of the battles over railroad and canal subsidies is based on my colleague Professor Charles W. McCurdy's brilliant forthcoming study of New York's Anti-Rent controversy.
- 44. After the October election, Whigs held forty-four seats in the house, Democrats possessed forty-eight, and the eight seats from Philadelphia County were disputed because of the closeness of the returns. An impasse ensued when the new legislature met in December, with each party claiming control of the house. Mobs milled in the streets, and to prevent violence, the governor called out the militia, which was armed with shotguns, earning for this episode the sobriquet of "the Buckshot War." Democrats eventually seated their disputed Philadelphia representatives and controlled the house, but had the Whigs prevailed, they would have had 52, not 44, seats in the 100-member chamber.
- 45. For Pennsylvania, I have relied on Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, pp. 112–50; Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 289–96 (Democratic legislative address of 1840 quoted on p. 294); and Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 43–66. The Whig legislative address of 1840 is quoted in Mueller, p. 63.
- 46. On New Jersey, see Levine, New Jersey, pp. 112–42. Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 55–73, 114–16, 123–32, and 239–43, covers the battles in Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Ohio, and Virginia. But for Ohio, see also Shade, Banks or No Banks, pp. 79–84, 102–03, and for Mississippi, see Lucas, "Political Alchemy." For Connecticut and New Hampshire I have used Morse, Neglected Period, pp. 300–09; McFaul, Politics of Jacksonian Finance, pp. 87–90; Niven, Welles, pp. 167–87; and Cole, Jacksonian Democracy in New Hampshire, pp. 185–96.
 - 47. Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 67-95; Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, pp. 321-77.
- 48. For Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois, I have relied on Shade, Banks or No Banks, pp. 53–54, 60–102; Roll, Dick Thompson, pp. 23–35; Goodrich, Canals and American Economic Development, p. 197; Boritt, Lincoln, pp. 8–62; Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 61–70.
- 49. Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," pp. 22–25. The Whig share of seats went from 59 percent in 1839 to 77 percent in 1840.
- 50. For the data on legislative voting and sharply different interpretations of the significance of state issues to Whig fortunes in North Carolina, see Jeffrey, "Internal Improvements"; id., "Party Alignment and Realignment"; and Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 3–28, 55–85, and passim.
 - 51. Darling, Political Changes, pp. 202-43.
- 52. Studies that identify the Whig and Democratic electorates are too numerous to be listed. The books previously cited in this chapter by Sharp, Thornton, Donald Cole, and William G. Shade, as well as Shade's "Political Pluralism," support these generalizations. See also Oakes, Slavery and Freedom, pp. 107–13; two studies by Harry L. Watson: Jacksonian Politics and Community Conflict and Liberty and Power; Johnson, Shopkeeper's Millennium; Howe, "Evangelical Movement"; and Sellers, Market Revolution. Finally, for a brilliant analysis of how the economic, social, and religious changes transforming the United States between 1815 and 1850 produced cleavages in the electorate that explain the Democratic and Whig voting bases, see Hays, "Politics and Society."

- 53. The crucial point that Democrats were less interested in the economic consequences of economic policies than in the maintenance of equal rights is made by Welter, Mind of America, p. 90.
- 54. Again, I have discussed the results of that research and its applicability to these elections in my "The Election of 1840." For a challenge to the applicability of this political science research to nineteenth-century elections, see Formisano, "The New Political History." Formisano's article is a forceful critique of my essay, and it requires a thorough response that I shall not attempt here. Unlike Formisano, I remain convinced that the contemporary research I have cited is relevant to the late 1830s.
- 55. Memphis Enquirer, August 23, 1839, quoted in Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, p. 374. See the same page for Sellers' analysis. See also Bergeron, Antebellum Politics in Tennessee, pp. 50–52.
 - 56. Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 334-42.
- 57. Mills Thornton provides evidence for economic differences between Whig and Democratic voters within Alabama's counties in his Politics and Power, pp. 41–42. Harry L. Watson's superb study of party formation in Cumberland County, North Carolina, also demonstrates that the Whig and Democratic parties attracted voters with different levels of involvement in, and different attitudes toward, the market economy and that between 1836 and 1840 the Whig vote grew in wealthier, more commercially oriented sections of the county, while the Democrats recruited in the remote areas hostile to the urban commercial sector. Watson, Jacksonian Politics and Community Conflict, pp. 246–81 and passim.
 - 58. See also the graphs and tables in Holt, "The Election of 1840," pp. 172-80.

CHAPTER 5

- 1. The first statement is attributed to Clay by Henry Wise in his memoirs, Seven Decades of the Union, and is quoted in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, p. 68. The second was attributed to Clay by South Carolina Senator William C. Preston and is quoted in Van Deusen, Clay, p. 318.
- 2. Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, p. 94. See also Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 28, 73–74, 96, 115, and passim, and Schlesinger, Age of Jackson, pp. 267–305. Howe, Political Culture, pp. 1–22 and passim, persuasively rebuts the canard that Whigs were unprincipled opportunists.
- 3. Seward to Weed, November 17, 1836, quoted in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, p. 41; Weed to Seward, April 18, 1837, Seward MSS. For able summaries of the struggle for the nomination, see Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 41–66; Nathans, Webster, pp. 104–29; Van Deusen, Clay, pp. 320–36; id., Weed, pp. 109–11.
- 4. Webster quoted in Nathans, Webster, p. 108; The Mangum Papers, II, p. 513, note. Nathans, Webster, pp. 104–29, presents the most perceptive analysis of Webster's attempt for the nomination.
 - 5. Nathans, Webster, pp. 114–18; Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, p. 42.
- 6. Clay to the New York Committee, August 6, 1837, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 415–17; William Henry Harrison to William Ayres, August 22, 1838, quoted in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, p. 50. On Clay's fears, see Nathans, Webster, pp. 117–18, and Van Deusen, Clay, p. 322. For evidence that those fears were well grounded, see Hamilton C. Jones to Willie P. Mangum, December 22, 1837, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 513–14.
 - 7. Clay to Brooke, April 14, 1838, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 426-27.
- 8. Henry Clay to Willie P. Mangum, Washington, May 31, 1838, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 525–26; Nathans, Webster, pp. 116–24; Harrison Gray Otis to Clay, Boston, January 11, 1839, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 437–38. See also Dalzell, Webster, pp. 65–69.
- 9. Clay to George D. Prentice, August 14, 1837, in Works of Henry Clay, V, p. 418; Crittenden to Willie P. Mangum, October 11, 1837, and Clay to Mangum, November 17, 1837, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 511–13.
- 10. Clay to Brooke, Washington, April 14, 1838, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 426–27; Clay to Mangum, May 31, 1838, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 525–26.
- 11. Hamilton C. Jones to Mangum, December 22, 1837, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 513–14. See also William A. Graham to Mangum, October 11, 1839, ibid., III, pp. 18–20; Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 53–58; and Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 119–26.

- 12. William C. Preston to Willie P. Mangum, October 4, 1837, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 508–10.
- 13. Clay to Francis Brooke, October 9, 1838, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 428–29; Clay to Beverley Tucker, October 10, 1839, in Tyler, Letters . . . of the Tylers, I, pp. 601–02; Curtis, Fox at Bay, pp. 130–31; Van Deusen, Clay, p. 320. See also the sections of Cole and Cooper cited in note 11.
- 14. John C. Calhoun to Duff Green, July 27, 1837, to James Edward Calhoun, September 7, 1837, and to Anna Maria Calhoun, September 8, 1837, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 374–79. See also William C. Preston to Willie P. Mangum, October 4, 1837, April 7, 1838, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 508–10, 519–20. That Calhoun and other South Carolinians, who were committed to the perpetuation of slavery, feared that white Southerners from other states were eager to abandon slavery if the proportions of blacks in their populations could be reduced is a central theme of Freehling, Road to Disunion.
 - 15. See the very perceptive analysis of Calhoun in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 103-18.
- 16. John C. Calhoun to James Edward Calhoun, December 24, 1837, January 8, 1838, and to Anna Maria Calhoun, December 24, 1837, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 386–88; Curtis, Fox at Bay, pp. 118–19; Van Deusen, Clay, pp. 314–15.
- 17. Curtis, Fox at Bay, pp. 118–24; Van Deusen, Clay, pp. 309–19; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 121–24. Able accounts of this debate can also be found in Peterson, Great Triumvirate, pp. 274–77, and Remini, Henry Clay, pp. 507–15.
 - 18. Clay to Francis Brooke, January 13, 1838, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 423-34.
 - 19. Clay to Peter B. Porter, January 10, 26, 1838, quoted in Van Deusen, Clay, p. 317.
- 20. Clay to Mangum, May 31, 1838, loc. cit.; for Van Buren's desire to finesse the sectionally divisive Texas question, see Curtis, Fox at Bay, pp. 152–69.
 - 21. Clay to Mangum, May 31, 1838, in The Mangum Papers, II, pp. 525-26.
- 22. Clay to the New York Committee, August 6, 1837, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 416–17; Nathans, Webster, pp. 118–29; Van Deusen, Clay, pp. 320–34; Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 43–47; Van Deusen, Weed, pp. 109–10; Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, pp. 141–42.
- 23. I have relied for the details of this border conflict on Curtis, Fox at Bay, pp. 170–88, and Elliott, Scott, pp. 332–66.
- 24. Van Deusen, Clay, p. 321; Clay to Francis Brooke, January 13, 1838, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 423–24.
 - 25. Nathans, Webster, pp. 118-24.
 - 26. Boston Atlas, September 14, 15, 1838, quoted in ibid., pp. 123-24.
- 27. Clay to Francis Brooke, October 9, November 3, 1838, and Harrison Gray Otis to Clay, December 24, 1838, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 428–31, 433–34; Nathans, Webster, pp. 123–24.
- 28. Charles B. Penrose to Nicholas Biddle, February 29, March 1?, 1839, quoted in Carroll, Origins of the Whig Party, p. 161.
 - 29. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 56-58; Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, p. 141.
 - 30. Clay to Francis Brooke, November 3, 1838, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 429-31.
- 31. Clay to Brooke, December 20, 26, 1838, January 7, 18, 28, 1839, ibid., pp. 432–40; Van Deusen, Clay, pp. 325–27.
- 32. Fillmore to Weed, December 26, 1838, quoted in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, p. 44; for the New York maneuvers, see ibid., pp. 44–47; see also Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 97–110.
 - 33. Clay to Brooke, December 20, 1838, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 432-33.
 - 34. Clay to Brooke, December 26, 1838, ibid., pp. 434-36.
- 35. Simms, Rise of the Whigs, pp. 131–34; Tyler, Letters of the Tylers, I, pp. 587–93; Seager, And Tyler Too, pp. 127–32.
- 36. For Clay's speech and the southern reaction, see Van Deusen, Clay, pp. 317–19; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 122–25.
- 37. John C. Spencer to William Henry Seward, Albany, August 18, 1839, Seward MSS (RU). For New York abolitionist opposition to Clay, see Seth M. Gates to Seward, NYC, November 23, 1839, ibid.
- 38. Weed to Seward, August 16, 1839 (quotations), Seward MSS (RU); Van Deusen, Clay, pp. 327–29; Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 46–47.

- 39. Harrison to Giddings, December 15, 1838, and Charles Todd to Seward, February 8, 1839, quoted in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 49, 51.
 - 40. Ibid., p. 56; Charles B. Penrose to Seward, November 20, 1839, Seward MSS (RU).
- 41. M. Bradley to Weed, August 29, 1839, quoted in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, p. 52; for the campaign by Weed on Scott's behalf, see pp. 51–56.
- 42. Weed to Seward, Harrisburg, December 4, 1839, Seward MSS. Gunderson, citing Weed's autobiography, says that the figures were twenty for Scott, ten for Clay, and two for Harrison. I have assumed that Weed misremembered since he referred to thirty Scott men in the letter cited above and since New York had forty-two delegates at the convention.
- 43. For the convention itself, I have relied on the following: Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 57–66 (Clay is quoted on p. 68); Van Deusen, Clay, pp. 331–33; Seager, And Tyler Too, pp. 132–35; Bain and Parrish, Convention Decisions, pp. 24–27. The proceedings of the convention are also printed in the appendix of Van Deusen, "The Whig Party," pp. 401–10.
 - 44. See Table 32 in Temin, Jacksonian Economy, p. 69.
 - 45. Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 89-91.
- 46. On Tennessee, see Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, pp. 370–77; Parks, Bell, pp. 159–69; and Atkins, "'A Combat for Liberty,'" pp. 162–63. I am deeply indebted to Professor Atkins for sending me a copy of his dissertation.
- 47. On Southard's position, see Winfield Scott to Seward, Washington, December 9, 1839, Seward MSS (RU); and Birkner, Southard, pp. 182–85.
- 48. For the vice presidential nomination, see especially Seager, And Tyler Too, pp. 134–35. Hone's diary entry for August 17, 1841, is quoted on p. 435.
- 49. C. Davis to Weed, November 13, 1839, and Burnet's speech, quoted in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 65–66.
- 50. Harrisburg Keystone, December 11, 1839; M. Bradley to Weed, August 29, 1839; and the Whig ditty, all quoted in ibid., pp. 59-66, 62, and 115.
- 51. Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, provides the fullest description of the campaign, and unless noted otherwise, I have taken my information from him. There seems no point in providing a specific page citation for every slogan and ditty quoted here.
 - 52. Baltimore Republican, December 11, 1839, quoted in ibid., p. 74.
- 53. Washington National Intelligencer, January 14, 1840, and Northwestern Gazette and Galena Advertiser, January 17, 1840, quoted in ibid., p. 75.
 - 54. Ibid., pp. 101–05.
- 55. The Log Cabin reprinting the Evening Journal, May 23, 1840, quoted in ibid., pp. 110-11.
 - 56. Ibid., pp. 149, 194, 211.
- 57. For Lincoln's campaign themes see Boritt, Lincoln, pp. 63–78; Prentiss and the Pennsylvania Whig banner are quoted in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 189–91. Badger's speech is quoted and described in Thomas E. Jeffrey, "State Parties and National Politics: North Carolina and the Second American Party System, 1815–1861" (draft manuscript), chapter IV, pp. 17, 20, and Chapter V, p. 16.

Throughout his book, Gunderson argues that the major Whig effort was to avoid issues, not to make them, but other historians have recognized more accurately that there were real issues involved in the campaign. See, for example, Howe, Political Culture, pp. 7–8, 90, 142, and Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 3–70, especially 3–5.

- 58. For Webster during the campaign, see Nathans, Webster, pp. 130–47; Van Deusen, Clay, pp. 335–36.
 - 59. See Chapter 4.
- 60. Log Cabin, September 5, 1840, quoted in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, p. 132. On Whig appeal to evangelical Protestants, see especially Carwardine, "Evangelicals." Carwardine argues, p. 49, "that for pious evangelicals the election of 1840 was not a vacuous campaign devoid of issues . . . but rather . . . had a profound religious significance."
 - 61. On the presence of women at Whig rallies, see Varon, "Tippecanoe and the Ladies, Too."
 - 62. Crisis of the Country, quoted in Welter, Mind of America, p. 192.

- 63. New York Whig Address for 1840 and Clay, quoted in ibid., pp. 31, 210; Raleigh Register, October 9, 1840, quoted in Kruman, Parties and Politics, p. 3.
- 64. Again, the best account of the presidential campaign in the South is Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 126–48. The Richmond Whig, March 24, 1840, is quoted on p. 137. On the antiabolitionist tone of both parties' campaigns in 1840, see Volpe, "The Anti-Abolitionist Campaign of 1840."
- 65. New Orleans Bee, June 30, 1840, and Richmond Whig, March 6, 1840, quoted in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 134. For more on Poinsett's militia scheme and its deleterious impact on the Democratic campaign, see Curtis, Fox at Bay, pp. 199–202, and Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 94–95, 228–29.
- 66. Harrison's speech at Fort Meigs is quoted in Welter, Mind of America, p. 195; the speech at Dayton is quoted in Chambers, "Election of 1840," p. 678. Harrison's campaign efforts are fully, if hostilely, described in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 161–72. Failing to recognize the centrality of republican values, Gunderson unduly minimizes the importance of Harrison's pledges to reduce the power of the presidency and to protect the people's liberty.
- 67. The Democratic campaign is described in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 219–47. The Alabama Democrat's remarks are in Samuel Forwood to William S. Forwood, October 5, 1840, quoted in Thornton, Politics and Power, p. 48.
- 68. Richmond Enquirer, July 24, 1840, quoted in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 140; Washington Globe, September 25, 1840, and Democratic slogan quoted in Gunderson, Log-Cabin Campaign, pp. 228–29.
- 69. Modern political scientists have coined the phrase "retrospective voting" to describe how voters incorporate evaluations of past party records in office into the decisions they make at the polls. See Fiorina, Retrospective Voting, pp. 83, 197, and passim.

An obvious question raised by my insistence on the centrality of issue-oriented voting is why Whigs continued to run a hoopla campaign after the economy had turned sour. One reason, clearly, is that they were determined to capture the presidency and saw how effective hoopla was in arousing voters. Another may be that they did not know what we now do—that voters' attachment had hardened during the congressional and state elections of the late 1830s and early 1840. What they did know was that in 1836 there had been very little relationship between how people voted for president and how they voted for other offices that year and in 1835. They may have (wrongly) believed, that is, that they still had to run a different kind of campaign for president than for their congressional and gubernatorial candidates.

- 70. In addition to Tables 5, 6, and 7 in this study, see the additional tables and the graphs in Holt, "The Election of 1840."
 - 71. Historical Statistics, p. 1072.
 - 72. See Table 3 in Holt, "The Election of 1840," p. 176.
- 73. Pennsylvania's October congressional returns are incomplete, and they are not included in this calculation.
- 74. Gatell, "Money and Party"; Rich, "A Wilderness of Whigs' "; Holt, Forging a Majority, p. 76; Dalzell, Webster, p. 59. This proclivity of the rich to support the Whigs did not hold everywhere, however. See Folsom, "Politics of Elites."
- 75. Documentation for the general pattern was cited earlier, but for Louisiana see McCrary, The Louisiana Experiment, pp. 19–65.
- 76. Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," pp. 13–17. See especially notes 26, 28, and 29 for the statistical correlations.
- 77. On North Carolina, see Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 3–28, and Watson, Jacksonian Politics and Community Conflict; on Virginia, see Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 247–73, and Shade, Democratizing the Old Dominion; on Tennessee, see Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, pp. 374–75. For the South in general, see the maps in Cole, Whig Party in the South.
- 78. Goodman, Christian Republic; Cole, Jacksonian Democracy in New Hampshire, pp. 136–59; Benson, Concept of Jacksonian Democracy, pp. 278–87.
- 79. The quotation is taken from Brock, Political Conscience, p. 42. The now-notorious "eth-nocultural" interpretation of Jacksonian voting behavior is elaborated in Benson, Concept of Jacksonian Democracy; Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties; Kleppner, Third Electoral System, pp. 59–74; and Shade, "Pennsylvania Politics." See also the perceptive discussion of Whigs' evangelical religious orientation in Johnson, A Shopkeepers' Millennium. For the southern antagonism to the aggressive efforts of evangelical denominations to proselytize and to Christianize society at large, see Wyatt-Brown, "Antimission Movement." For general discussions of the impact of religious and ethnocultural influences on political behavior, finally, see Kelley, Cultural Pattern, and Carwardine, Evangelicals and Politics.

- 80. For the Midwest, see Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties; Kleppner, Third Electoral System, pp. 59–74; Shade, Banks or No Banks, pp. 158–67; Fox, "Politicians, Issues and Voter Preference"; and Flinn, "Continuity and Change," 524–27.
- 81. New York Whig Legislative Address of 1844, quoted in Welter, Mind of America, p. 18. This analysis rests heavily on Howe, Political Culture, pp. 21–42 and passim. For how this emerging middle-class mentality reflected changing economic and social relations among classes in developing industrial communities, see Johnson, A Shopkeeper's Millennium.
- 82. Wiley P. Harris to John F. H. Claiborne, August 30, 1855, Claiborne MSS (MDAH). I have developed this theory of the dynamics of party loyalty and interparty interaction at greater length in Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 1–38 and passim.
- 83. R. G. Lee to Nathaniel P. Banks, Boston, September 3, 1846, Banks MSS (Ill.SHL). For evidence on betting, see, for example, G. H. Steele to R. W. Thompson, Indianapolis, January 5, 1849, Thompson MSS (Ind.SL).
 - 84. Felix K. Zollicoffer to William B. Campbell, July 14, 1851, CFP.
- 85. Alexander H. Stephens to James Thomas, July 16, 1844, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 59–60; L. Lisle Smith to Elihu B. Washburne, Chicago, February 19, 1849, Washburne MSS (LC).
- 86. "Necessity of Party—the Press—the Locofoco Platform," American Review, II (July 1848), 69; Preston King to Francis P. Blair, November 21, 1855, Blair-Lee MSS (Princeton University Library).

CHAPTER 6

- 1. John Van Hook, Jr., to Willie P. Mangum, February 1, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 103–04.
- 2. The figures on party strength are taken from Silbey, Shrine of Party, p. 238, note 3. There were also six Independent Whigs in the House; eventually they supported President John Tyler rather than the Whig majority. There was an odd number of men in the Senate because Tennessee had only one senator in the special session.
- 3. I take this figure from Brock, Political Conscience, p. 76. All of these offices, of course, were not filled directly by the president; many subordinate positions in customs houses, post offices, navy yards, and so on were filled by men whom the president and his cabinet appointed.
- 4. Whig leaders in 1841 intuitively sensed what modern research on voter realignments has demonstrated. A surge of dissatisfied voters can eject one party from power and give dominant control of government to its opponent. But for the new governing party, in this case the Whigs, to confirm the allegiance of those new supporters and retain power, its officeholders must pass legislation that alleviates the dissatisfactions that turned voters against the old governing party in the first place. Clubb, Flanigan, and Zingale, Partisan Realignment, pp. 11–45 and passim.
- 5. John J. Crittenden to Robert P. Letcher, January 30, 1841, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 140-42.
- 6. John C. Calhoun to Andrew Pickens Calhoun, November 22, 1840, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," p. 467. For the results in state legislative elections, see Table 6.
- 7. Poage, Clay, pp. 1–122; Van Deusen, Clay, pp. 336–57; Chitwood, Tyler; Seager, And Tyler Too, pp. 141–288; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 30–58; Nathans, Webster, pp. 143–214. These valuable studies are often biographical and it would be unfair to fault them for focusing on personality, but for a welcome corrective that stresses the systemic flaws in the Whig conception of congressional government, rather than personal rivalries, as the reason for party failure, see Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 71–113.
 - 8. Sundquist, Dynamics, pp. 32, 304.
 - 9. These maneuvers are treated in considerable detail in Poage, Clay, pp. 14-32, and Nathans, Webster, pp. 148–60. Mangum to William A. Graham, March 27, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 128–29. See also Henry Clay to Francis Brooke, December 8, 1840, January 7, 1841, Peter B. Porter to Clay, January 28, February 20, 1841, and Clay to William Henry Harrison, March 15, 1841, in The Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 446–52. Though Curtis' appointment was a Webster victory, Webster in fact abstained from the cabinet vote on the post.

- 10. The best discussions of Webster's motives are in Nathans, Webster, pp. 149–51, and Dalzell, Webster, pp. 30–38.
- 11. Crittenden to Robert P. Letcher, January 30, 1841, loc. cit. See also Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 147–48; Poage, Clay, pp. 21–32; Van Deusen, Clay, p. 39; Nathans, Webster, pp. 154–58.
 - 12. Fillmore to Weed, February 6, 1841, quoted in Brock, Political Conscience, p. 81.
 - 13. Nathans, Webster, pp. 154-58.
- 14. Ibid.; the most detailed account of the exchange between Clay and Harrison is in Poage, Clay, pp. 28–32.
- 15. My account of the growing rift between Tyler and Congress and the course of legislation in 1841 and 1842 is based on the detailed accounts in the works listed in note 7. I shall not burden the reader with continuous citations to specific pages in those books, and hereafter will only document direct quotations and material based on other sources.
- 16. See, for example, Willie P. Mangum to Duncan Cameron, June 26, 1841, Priestly H. Mangum to William A. Graham, July 7, 1841, and Willie P. Mangum to C. L. Hinton, August 13, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 181–87, 191–92, 215–16. In his splendid biography of Henry Wise, Craig Simpson demonstrates that Wise was not as close ideologically or personally to Tyler as were other members of the so-called Virginia Cabal. Personal resentment of Clay apparently explained his support for Tyler as much as his views on policy. Simpson, A Good Southerner, pp. 45–60.
 - 17. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, IV, pp. 40-51.
- 18. John C. Calhoun to Thomas G. Clemson, July 11, 1841, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 480–81; Willie P. Mangum to William A. Graham, July 10, 11, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 193–95.
 - 19. Stephenson, History of the Public Lands, pp. 54-57.
- 20. Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 91–93, disagrees with virtually every other account of the Ewing plan by asserting that it specifically prohibited the Bank from discounting promissory notes. This power would become a major source of contention between Tyler and the congressional Whigs, and they included it in their own bill.
- 21. Henry Clay to Robert P. Letcher, June 11, 1841, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 156–57; Nathans, Webster, p. 166, note 16; Mordecai N. Noah to Mangum, June 13, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 166–67.
- 22. Willie P. Mangum to Duncan Cameron, June 26, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 181–87. This remarkably detailed letter provides a full account of Whig consideration of the bank bill in the caucus.
- 23. John C. Calhoun to Thomas G. Clemson, July 11, 1841, in Jameson, "The Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 480–81. Chitwood, Tyler, pp. 209–51; Seager, And Tyler Too, pp. 151–71; Poage, Clay, pp. 37–106; Nathans, Webster, pp. 162–80.
 - 24. Mangum to Duncan Cameron, June 26, 1841, loc. cit.
- 25. The Compromise Tariff of 1833 provided that duties in excess of 20 percent should be reduced by one-tenth of that excess annually until January 1, 1840. Then on January 1, 1842, half of the remaining excess would be cut, and on July 1, 1842, the remaining excess would be eliminated. The great bulk of the reduction, in short, was delayed until 1842.
- 26. Congressional Globe, 27th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 53; Calhoun to Thomas G. Clemson, July 11, 1841, loc. cit.
- 27. Stephenson, History of the Public Lands, p. 30. The states that had been forced to suspend payment on their debt and would thus benefit from distribution included Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Arkansas, and Louisiana. In 1841, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Louisiana had Whig governors who could be helped politically by distribution. Wellington, Political and Sectional, p. 75.
 - 28. Mangum to Duncan Cameron, June 26, 1841, loc. cit.

- 29. Clay to R. P. Letcher, June 11, 1841, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 156–57; Clay to Francis Brooke, July 4, 1841, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 454; Mangum to Duncan Cameron, June 26, 1841, loc. cit.
- 30. All quotations come from Priestley H. Mangum to William A. Graham, July 7, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 191–92. For more on fear of a veto, see Willie P. Mangum to C. L. Hinton, August 13, 1841, ibid., pp. 215–16.
- 31. The best analysis of the cabinet reaction to the conflict over the bank bill is Nathans, Webster, pp. 161–80. See also Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 147–55; and Parks, Bell, pp. 181–88.
 - 32. Nathans, Webster, pp. 161-80; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 37-40.
- 33. Webster to Hiram Ketchum, July 16, 17, 1841, quoted in Nathans, Webster, p. 155, and Dalzell, Webster, p. 37.
- 34. Willie P. Mangum to Duncan Cameron, June 26, 1842, and to William A. Graham, July 10, 11, 1841, loc. cit.; John C. Calhoun to Andrew Pickens Calhoun, July 26, 1841, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 482–83; Poage, Clay, pp. 49–66.
- 35. Clay quoted in Poage, Clay, p. 52; Mangum to Graham, July 10, 1841, loc. cit.; Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 87–97.
- 36. John C. Calhoun to James H. Hammond, August 1, 1841, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 483–85; Poage, Clay, pp. 63–66.
 - 37. Alexander, Sectional Stress, p. 157, vote 65.
- 38. Nathans, Webster, pp. 171–73; Poage, Clay, pp. 67–78; John C. Calhoun to Thomas G. Clemson, July 23, 1841, and to Andrew Pickens Calhoun, July 26, 1841, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 482–83; Willie P. Mangum to C. L. Hinton, August 13, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 215–16.
 - 39. Crittenden to Clay, August 16, 1841, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 159-60.
 - 40. Nathans, Webster, pp. 173-77; Poage, Clay, pp. 79-91; Chitwood, Tyler, pp. 237-51.
- 41. Botts' "coffee-house letter" is reprinted in Tyler, Letters . . . of the Tylers, II, p. 112, note 1.
- 42. Reverdy Johnson to Willie P. Mangum, August 27 and 29, 1841, James D. Ogden to Henry Clay, August 30, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 222–29.
 - 43. R. P. Letcher to Crittenden, September 3, 1841, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 160-62.
- 44. Mordecai M. Noah to David Lambert, July 18, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 200–02. In his letter of August 30 to Clay, James D. Ogden explicitly called the national bank "the keystone of the party's arch."
- 45. In July 1842, a North Carolina Whig warned both Mangum and Graham that the Bankruptcy Act was so "odious" that "it is doing more to allay the zeal of Whigs than every thing else." J. H. Long to Mangum and Graham, July 7, 1842, in The Mangum Papers, III, p. 366; see ibid., p. 266, note 11; and Alexander, Sectional Stress, p. 167, vote 14.
 - 46. Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 122-25.
- 47. The history of land policy, as well as detailed accounts of the framing of the Land Act of 1841, can be found in Wellington, Political and Sectional, passim, and Stephenson, History of the Public Lands, pp. 19–65. See also Robbins, Our Landed Heritage, pp. 72–91.
- 48. In 1838 and 1840, for example, whereas 60 percent of the Whigs in the House had voted against preemption, while about 90 percent of the Democrats had favored it each time, about four-fifths of Whig congressmen from midwestern and southwestern states had voted in favor of it. Alexander, Sectional Stress, p. 139, vote 63, and p. 151, vote 37.
- 49. The Land Act of 1841 can be found in Statutes at Large, V, pp. 453–58. The studies by Wellington, Stephenson, and Robbins cited in note 47 make it clear that previous proposals for the actual cession of public land to western states had come from Democrats, especially John C. Calhoun.
 - 50. Poage, Clay, pp. 92-106.
 - 51. The quotations are listed in Chitwood, Tyler, p. 318; see also ibid., pp. 249–51.
 - 52. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, IV, pp. 68-72.
 - 53. Nathans, Webster, pp. 181-84; Chitwood, Tyler, pp. 269-89.
- 54. Possibly apocryphal, this quotation is based on a letter written by Tyler's son in 1883. It is quoted, among other places, in Chitwood, Tyler, p. 273.

Notes Notes

- 55. In addition to Nathans, Chitwood, and Poage, see Dalzell, Webster, pp. 37–55, for an admirable discussion of Webster's motives for remaining in the cabinet and his actions while in it.
- 56. Manuscript diary of Phillip R. Fendall, September 23, 1841, quoted in Nathans, Webster, p. 182; Van Deusen, Weed, pp. 118–24; id., Greeley, pp. 84–87.
- 57. For factionalism in Massachusetts, see Dalzell, Webster, pp. 61–80; in Pennsylvania, see Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 66–69, 83–84; Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, pp. 151–52, and Hall, Politics of Justice, pp. 48–51. In Virginia the split was between state rights men like Wise, Gilmer, and Upshur and Clay supporters like Congressman John Minor Botts of Richmond; on Michigan, see Streeter, Political Parties in Michigan, pp. 37–42; on Indiana, see Hall, Politics of Justice, pp. 52–54; on Ohio, see Holt, "Party Politics in Ohio," pp. 54–61; on Maryland, see Willie P. Mangum to Duncan Cameron, June 26, 1841, loc. cit.
- 58. Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 96–99; Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 73–79; Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, pp. 152–59; Van Deusen, Weed, pp. 114–25; Shade, Banks or No Banks, pp. 98–100; Holt, "Party Politics in Ohio," pp. 60–61.
- 59. James K. Polk to John C. Calhoun, February 23, 1842, in Jameson, "The Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 884–85. The best analysis of the Tennessee campaign is Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, pp. 431–44.
- 60. Nicholas Carroll to Willie P. Mangum, October 28, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 247–50; Clay to Francis Brooke, October 28, 1841, in Works of Henry Clay, V, p. 455.
- 61. Calhoun to Thomas G. Clemson, Washington, December 31, 1841, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 500–01; David Lambert to Willie P. Mangum, October 14, 1841, and Willis Hall to Mangum, January 31, 1842, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 244–46, 282–83.
- 62. Hall to Mangum, January 31, 1842; see also Reverdy Johnson to Mangum, August 27, 1841, in The Mangum Papers, III, p. 222.
- 63. Seager asserts that the Senate rejected more of Tyler's appointees than those of any other president in American history. And Tyler Too, p. 227.
 - 64. Chitwood, Tyler, pp. 291-93; Nathans, Webster, pp. 185-89.
 - 65. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, IV, pp. 74-89.
 - 66. See messages of March 8 and March 25, 1842, ibid., pp. 102-03, 106-11.
- 67. Stephenson, History of the Public Lands, pp. 55, 73–87; Seager, And Tyler Too, pp. 165–68; Henry Clay to John J. Crittenden, Ashland, June 3, July 16, 1842, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 180–81, 188–89.
 - 68. Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 127-32.
- 69. Crittenden to R. P. Letcher, June 23, 1842, Crittenden to Clay, July 2, 1842, and Clay to Crittenden, July 16, 1842, in Coleman, Life of Crittenden, I, pp. 183–86, 188–89; Clay to Willie P. Mangum, July 11, 1842, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 367–68.
- 70. Calhoun to Thomas G. Clemson, August 22, 1842, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 514–15; Crittenden to Clay, August 12, 1842, in Coleman, Life of Crittenden, I, pp. 192–93; and Willie P. Mangum to Henry Clay, June 15, 1842, to Priestley H. Mangum, August 10, 1842, and to Charity A. Mangum, August 14, 1842, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 358–60, 376–80. See also the perceptive analysis of the shifting voting blocs on the different tariff bills in Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 102–06.
- 71. See the able discussion of the protective features of the 1842 Tariff Act in Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 126–36. See also Baack and Ray, "Tariff Policy." This important article points out that the actual tariff rate on textile goods was far higher than the ad valorem rate. "While the ad valorem duty was 30% between 1843 and 1846, the actual tariff rate was more on the order of 291.24%" because of minimum evaluations on British goods (p. 107).
 - 72. Albany Evening Journal (n.d.), quoted in Brock, Political Conscience, p. 106.
- 73. Jonathan H. Jacobs to Willie P. Mangum, March 4, 1842, John D. Hager to Mangum, July 19, 1842, and Priestley H. Mangum to Graham, May 12, 1842, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 296–98, 332–35, 371–72.
 - 74. Willie P. Mangum to Priestley H. Mangum, August 10, 1842, ibid., pp. 376-77.
- 75. Morgan, Whig Embattled, pp. 48-54; Chitwood, Tyler, pp. 298-302; Alexander, Sectional Stress, p. 171, votes 102 and 188. On the first vote 95 percent of the Whigs voted to accept and 100 percent of the Democrats voted to reject the select committee report. On the second vote, 93 percent of the Whigs supported and all Democrats opposed a resolution denying Tyler's right to protest House proceedings.

- 76. John J. Crittenden to R. P. Letcher, June 23, 1842, and to Henry Clay, July 2, 1842, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 183–86; Poage, Clay, p. 107; Seager, And Tyler Too, p. 170; Van Deusen, Greeley, p. 87. In 1843, Wise and Gilmer were elected to Congress as Democrats.
 - 77. Nathans, Webster, pp. 194-200; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 61-77.
- 78. Nathans, Webster, 195; Chitwood, Tyler, pp. 269–89, 367–85; Seager, And Tyler Too, pp. 161–71, 209–42; Hall, Politics of Justice, pp. 44–59; Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 107–08.
 - 79. Davis to Clay, Worcester, October 14, 1843, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 480-81.
- 80. See, for example, Willie P. Mangum to Priestly H. Mangum, August 10, 1842, and John Leeds Kerr to Willie P. Mangum, July 22, 1843, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 376–77, 462–64. Kerr served as United States senator from Maryland in the Twenty-Seventh Congress.
 - 81. Campbell, "Party, Policy, and Political Leadership," p. 7.
- 82. John Tyler to Alexander Gardiner, July 11, 1846, quoted in Seager, And Tyler Too, p. 170; Webster to Edward Everett, November 28, 1842, quoted in Nathans, Webster, p. 201.
- 83. Clay to Nicholas O. Britton, September 23, 1842, and Clay to Francis Brooke, December 30, 1842, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 470–74.
- 84. The classic statement of this argument is Formisano, "Political Character." But see also Shade, "Political Pluralism," pp. 77–111, especially pp. 79, 82; and Howe, Political Culture, pp. 280, 301–02, and passim.
- 85. In addition to the sources in note 58 on state politics in these years, see Van Deusen, Seward, pp. 55–86; Kruman, Parties and Politics, chapters 1–3 and Tables 8 and 9; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 149–66; and Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 64–103.
- 86. The literature on the abolitionist movement is too vast to list here, but the best study of the origins of the Liberty Party is Sewell, Ballots for Freedom, pp. 3–106.
- 87. Barnes, Anti-Slavery Impulse, pp. 177–90; Stewart, Giddings, pp. 71–74. For the voting pattern of congressional Whigs on matters relating to slavery, see Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 155–76.
- 88. Stewart, Holy Warriors, pp. 77–79; id., "Abolitionists, Insurgents, and Third Parties"; Sewell, Ballots for Freedom, passim; Benson, Concept of Jacksonian Democracy, pp. 120–21; Howe, Political Culture, pp. 150–80 and passim; for an example of a contemporary's recognition of the problem, see John Davis to Henry Clay, October 14, 1843, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 480–81.
 - 89. Darling, Political Changes, pp. 281-93.
- 90. The Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections, p. 578, shows three of four Democrats winning in Connecticut in 1843 with less than a majority of the popular vote. Although it lists no Liberty candidates in those districts, it may indeed have been Liberty men who siphoned off the balance of the vote. It should be noted, however, that in the one district Democrats carried with a majority, a separate Liberty candidate, who attracted 5.1 percent of the vote, was listed.
- 91. For some evidence of the partisan disputes over reapportionment in different states, see Holt, "Party Politics in Ohio," pp. 70, 85; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 80–81, 87; and Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, p. 471, a discussion of Democratic success in Tennessee.
- 92. The relationship between the increase in the share of House seats and the nationwide increase in the share of a party's popular vote from one congressional election to the next is technically known as the "swing ratio." For Democratic candidates in all elections between 1836 and 1972, it averaged only 1.8, yet in 1842–43 it was 10. See Clubb, Flanigan, and Zingale, Partisan Realignment, pp. 172–84, especially Figure 5.3a. The extent of the Democratic increase in the proportion of the popular vote in 1842–43 can only be approximated because congressional returns are incomplete. I calculated this figure by adding up the total popular vote and deriving the Democratic proportion of it in 1840–41 and 1842–43. Where congressional returns were unavailable but gubernatorial returns from the same day were, I utilized the gubernatorial returns. By this calculation the Democrats won 48.4 percent of the popular vote in the congressional elections of 1840–41 and 50.5 percent in those of 1842–43. In the April 6, 1844, issue of the

New York Tribune, Horace Greeley asserted that Democrats had gerrymandered congressional districts against the Whigs in two-thirds of the states.

- 93. Georgia's Whigs exulted in the districting scheme as soon as they had completed it. See Robert Toombs to Alexander H. Stephens, January 1, 1844, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 53–54.
- 94. Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 104–06, 115–16; Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, pp. 454–57, 469–89; Nathans, Webster, pp. 215–18; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 77–82; Holt, "Party Politics in Ohio," pp. 71–74; Shade, Banks or No Banks, pp. 104–06; Darling, Political Changes, pp. 293–311
- 95. Nashville Republican Banner, August 11, 1843, quoted in Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, p. 489.
- 96. See especially the discussion of the Tennessee campaign in Sellers, Polk: Jacksonian, pp. 469–89; Poage, Clay, pp. 107–20; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 153–66.
- 97. Porter to Clay, October 11, 1843, and Davis to Clay, October 14, 1843, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 478-81.

CHAPTER 7

- 1. Robert Toombs to John M. Berrien, January 28, 1844, Berrien MSS; Beverly C. Sandrin to James B. Clay, February 20, 1844, T. J. Clay MSS; A. Patterson to Samuel F. Patterson, March 23, 1844, Patterson MSS; New York Tribune, April 8, 1844; Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, April 26, 1844, Everett MSS; Joshua R. Giddings to Maria Giddings, April 28, 1844 (quotation), Giddings MSS.
- 2. Gustavus V. Henry to Marion Henry, July 24, 1844, Henry MSS; Charles A. Davis to Henry Clay, October 4, 1844, H. Clay MSS (LC); Washington Hunt to Millard Fillmore, October 5, 1844, MFP-O; Arthur Ritchie to H. B. Murdoch, October 30, 1844, Murdoch-Wright Family Papers.
- 3. J. C. Wright to Clay, September 5, 1844, H. Clay MSS (LC); Willis Green to William C. Rives, June 19, 1844, Rives MSS.
 - 4. Poage, Clay, pp. 107-12.
- 5. John Leeds Kerr to Willie P. Mangum, July 22, 1843, in The Mangum Papers, III, pp. 462–64; Winthrop to Edward Everett, May 11, 1844, Everett MSS; Caleb Smith to Thomas Ewing, May 12, 1844, EFP.
- 6. Ritchie to Howell Cobb, May 16, 1844, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," p. 56; H. C. Whitman to William Allen, April 27, 1844, Allen MSS. Analyses of the Democratic divisions that influenced the nomination of 1844 can be found in Paul, Rift; Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 133–47, 285–305; and especially Sellers, Polk: Continentialist, pp. 14–66, 129–30. I have largely relied on Sellers for the following two paragraphs as well.
- 7. Crittenden to Ewing, March 10, 1844, EFP; Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 20–21; Chitwood, Tyler, p. 284; Seager, And Tyler Too, pp. 209–42.
- Crittenden to Letcher, January 28, 1844, Crittenden MSS (Duke); Crawford to Stephens, March 6, 1844, Stephens MSS; George W. Crawford to John M. Berrien, February 13, 1844, Berrien MSS; Mangum to Paul Cameron, February 10, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 41– 43.
- 9. Clay to John Pendleton Kennedy, December 3, 1843, quoted in Kirwan, Crittenden, p. 177; New York Tribune, April 8, 1844.
 - 10. New York Tribune, July 2, 1844.
- 11. Willis Green to William C. Rives, July 23, 1844, J. S. Shirrer to Rives, July 23, 1844, and James S. Penn to Rives, September 3, 1844, Rives MSS.
- 12. Toombs to Alexander H. Stephens, January 1, 1844, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 53–54; Toombs to Berrien, January 28, 1844, Berrien MSS; Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 116–20.
 - 13. Trester, "David Tod," 170; J. Sloane to Clay, May 9, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
 - 14. New York Tribune, May 23, 1844.

- 15. Ibid., June 15, 1844; Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 180–85, votes 8, 32, 50, 51, 56, and 57.
- 16. Robert Winthrop to Edward Everett, August 1, 1844, Everett MSS; New York Tribune, June 14, 15, October 7, 1844; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 153–66; Boritt, Lincoln, p. 105.
- 17. Historical Statistics, pp. 886, 993, 1104, 1106. I also used the graph on "American Business Activity Since 1790," published by The Cleveland Trust Company in 1966, which used monthly commodity and security prices between 1815 and 1861 to measure deviations from a long-term trend line based on a composite index of commodity outputs. These monthly figures show that the deviation from the long-term trend in April 1843 was –19; in August 1843, –12; in November 1843, –8; in March 1844, –2; and for most of 1844, –1. Prices and productivity, in short, were moving up even though they did not recover completely from the depression until the end of 1845.
- 18. See, for example, New York Tribune, June 14, 27, 1844; Toombs to John M. Berrien, January 28, 1844, and Clay to Berrien, March 23, 1844, Berrien MSS; Clay to John J. Crittenden, March 24, 1844, Crittenden MSS (Duke).
- 19. D. F. Caldwell to Daniel M. Barringer, April 10, 1844, Barringer MSS; Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 99–102; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 155–66; New York Tribune, April 17, 1844; Henry Clay to Rives, August 19, 1844, Rives MSS; Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 51–56.
 - 20. New York Tribune, May 13, 1844.
 - 21. Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 20-21, 51-56, 180-85.
 - 22. New York Tribune, April 1, 3, 9, 10, 12, 17, 26, 30, May 3, 13, 1844.
- 23. Johnson to Mangum, April 5, 1844, Mangum MSS; David F. Caldwell to Daniel M. Barringer, April 10, 1844, Barringer MSS.
- 24. Ohio State Journal, November 5, 1842, quoted in Tutorow, "Whigs in the Old Northwest," pp. 69–70. See also Tutorow, Texas Annexation, pp. 17–46, and Merk, Slavery, pp. 3–11 and passim. On pp. 205–11, Merk reprints an antiannexation address issued by Adams and twelve other northern Whig congressmen on March 3, 1843.
 - 25. J. R. Giddings to J. A. Giddings, April 28, 1844, Giddings MSS.
- 26. Merk, Slavery, pp. 3–32 and passim; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 182–89. The best account of the basis for these fears is now Freehling, Road to Disunion, pp. 353–439.
- 27. Clay to Crittenden, December 5, 1843, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 207–10; Butler to Martin Van Buren, April 6, 1844, Van Buren MSS (LC); Silas Wright to Van Buren, n.d., quoted in Foner, "Wilmot Proviso," 267. For evidence that Massachusetts Whig leaders wanted to smother the Texas issue to protect Clay, see Nathans, Webster, pp. 219–20, and Formisano, Transformation, p. 326.
- 28. See the accounts cited in note 26. For Webster's role in delaying Tyler's plans for annexation, see Dalzell, Webster, pp. 40–58. England's role in the tangled maneuvers that eventuated in the annexation of Texas was complex. Briefly put, the English government did want to prevent the acquisition of Texas by the United States and was endeavoring to mediate between Mexico and Texas to perpetuate the latter's independence. Moreover, English authorities did favor abolition in Texas and elsewhere and had proposed to the Mexican government that they would try to secure abolition in Texas in return for Mexican recognition of Texan independence. Finally, abolitionists had approached the British government asking for a loan to Texas to start the abolition process, but the British authorities had never promised to grant it. Indeed, exaggerated talk by abolitionists about the probability of such a loan may have been as responsible as letters from Duff Green and Texas agents in England for the rumors of official governmental support for an abolitionist plot in Texas. A careful treatment of this complicated story is Pletcher, Diplomacy, pp. 86–88, 113–207, esp. pp. 121–22, but see as well Freehling's splendid account in Road to Disunion, pp. 353–439.
- 29. In addition to the works by Merk, Cooper, Paul, and Pletcher cited above, see Seager, And Tyler Too, pp. 209–42.
- 30. Paul, Rift, pp. 38-47, 79-113; Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 40-61; Merk, Slavery, pp. 44-82.

- 31. The Pakenham Letter is reprinted in the appendix to Sellers' essay "The Election of 1844," pp. 818-21.
- 32. Clay to J. J. Crittenden, March 24, April 17, 19, 21, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Clay to Mangum, April 14, 1844, Mangum MSS; William Hayden to Mangum, April 5, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 92–93; Crittenden to Thomas Ewing, March 30, 1844, EFP; New York Tribune, April 1, 1844; Washington Hunt to Alvah Hunt, April 4, 1844, Knollenberg Collection.
- 33. John C. Calhoun to Armistead Burt, January 24, 1838, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 388–90; Clay to Crittenden, April 21, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC). At least one member of Tyler's Cabinet, Secretary of War John C. Spencer, expected both Clay and Van Buren eventually to support the treaty in order to neutralize the issue. Silas Wright to Martin Van Buren, April 8, 1844, Van Buren MSS.
- 34. Clay to Crittenden, April 21, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Alexander H. Stephens to James Thomas, May 17, 1844, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 57–58.
 - 35. Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 40-107; Paul, Rift, pp. 114-68.
- 36. Francis Granger to Thomas Ewing, June 7, 1844, EFP; Willie P. Mangum to Priestley H. Mangum, May 29, 1844, and Clay to Mangum, June 7, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 127–29, 134; Grieve Edvine to John M. Berrien, June 3, 1844, Berrien MSS.
- 37. Geo. S. Yerby to Willie P. Mangum, June 29, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 140–42; William B. Campbell to David Campbell, August 14, 1844, CFP; Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 100–01, 139–41.
- 38. Merk, Slavery, p. 81; Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 51–54; Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, p. 133.
 - 39. New York Tribune, June 1, 12, 1844; Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, p. 101.
- 40. Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 101–03, 109–16, 123–28; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 205–06.
- 41. Trester, "David Tod," pp. 162–78; Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 123–59; Maizlish, "Triumph of Sectionalism," pp. 48–58; New York Tribune, August 1, 15, 19, 26, 1844; Williams, "Graham and the Election of 1844"; Gibson, "Opinion in North Carolina," 7–10; Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, pp. 179–82; James Buchanan to Robert P. Letcher, July 27, 1844, Crittenden MSS (Duke).
- 42. Nicholas Carroll to Willie P. Mangum, September 8, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 180–84; Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 129–31.
 - 43. Buchanan to Letcher, July 27, 1844, Crittenden MSS (Duke).
 - 44. Rantoul to Nathaniel P. Banks, August 9, 1844, Banks MSS (Ill.SHL).
- 45. Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, p. 131; Tutorow, Texas Annexation, pp. 61–77; Bruser, "Political Antislavery," pp. 80–83; Van Bolt, "Sectional Aspects," 121–28.
- 46. Clay to Clayton, August 29, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); New York Tribune, July 2, 1844.
 - 47. Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 42-45.
- 48. Clay to Crittenden, December 5, 1843 in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 207–10; Merk, Manifest Destiny, pp. 34–44; Wilson, "Concept of Time."
- 49. Stephens to James Thomas, May 17, 1844. The Whig case against Texas annexation is well summarized in the two books by Merk, Slavery and Manifest Destiny. I have also relied on Tutorow, Texas Annexation, pp. 1–117; Pletcher, Diplomacy, pp. 137–47; Williams, "Graham and the Election of 1844," pp. 38–42; Clay to Crittenden, December 5, 1843, loc. cit.; and Clay's Raleigh Letter of April 17, 1844.
- 50. See, for example, the letter of Samuel Medary to Polk, November 10, 1844, quoted in Tutorow, Texas Annexation, p. 74; Varon, "Tippecanoe and the Ladies, Too."
- 51. Clay to Willie P. Mangum, April 14, 1844, Mangum MSS; Clay to Crittenden, March 24, April 19, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Clay to Weed, May 6, 1844, copy, Henry Clay MSS (Duke).
- 52. Jacksonian Southron, February 7, 1844, quoted in Lucas, "Political Alchemy," p. 92; for the vote in the Mississippi legislature, see Lucas, "The Second Party System in Mississippi," pp. 35–36; New Orleans Bee, March 28, 30, 1844, cited in Tutorow, Texas Annexation, p. 23;

Stephens to James Thomas, May 17, 1844, loc. cit.; David F. Caldwell to Daniel M. Barringer, June 12, 1844, Barringer MSS.

- 53. William Kinney to Willie P. Mangum, April 29, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 121–22; Ephraim H. Foster to William B. Campbell, April 6, 1844, CFP. I am indebted to Professor William J. Cooper, Jr., for bringing this latter letter to my attention. For additional evidence of early Whig fears of the Texas issue, see George F. Platt to Alexander Stephens, April 30, 1844, Stephens MSS; James Lyons to William C. Rives, June 14, 1844, and S. A. Wales to Rives, June 29, 1844, Rives MSS.
 - 54. Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 208-09; Merk, Slavery, pp. 78-81.
 - 55. New York Tribune, July 3, 1844; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 196-216.
- 56. For the Memphis meeting, see New York Tribune, June 14, 1844; the quotation from the Lexington meeting is taken from Poage, Clay, p. 142; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 211–12. A particularly good example of the Whig case against the pernicious economic consequences of annexation is a circular issued to his constituents by the Virginia Whig Congressman William Goggin, on January 1, 1845, in the Richmond Semi-Weekly Whig, January 10, 1845. Although it deals with an earlier period, there is an excellent discussion of the economic consequences of western emigration for older southern states and of the Whiggish attempt to promote internal economic development in order to stop it in Watson, Jacksonian Politics and Community Conflict, pp. 45–59 and passim.
- 57. Oakes, Ruling Race, pp. 146–47, 192–224; J. S. Shirrer to William C. Rives, September 14, 1844, Rives MSS.
- 58. Arthur Campbell to David Campbell, September 8, 1844, CFP; Jeremiah Morton to William C. Rives, July 1, 1844, Rives MSS; Oakes, Ruling Race, pp. 51–57, 69–91, 147–50.
- 59. Grieve Edvine to Berrien, June 3, 1844, Berrien MSS; James Lyons to Rives, June 14, 1844, Rives to Clay, July 15, 1844, draft, Morton to Rives, July 16, 1844, Nathaniel Tallmadge to Rives, July 25, 1844, Rives MSS; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 209–10; Poage, Clay, pp. 141–45.
- 60. The most detailed discussion of these letters is in Poage, Clay, pp. 143–45. For the letters themselves, see Clay to Stephen F. Miller, July 1, 1844, in The Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 490–91; and Clay to Thomas M. Peters and John M. Jackson, July 27, 1844, in the appendix to Sellers, "The Election of 1844," pp. 855–56.
- 61. Clay to Joshua R. Giddings, September 21, 1844, Giddings-Julian MSS; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 218; Dalzell, Webster, p. 91.
- 62. Poage, Clay, pp. 140–43; Crittenden to Waddy Thompson, July 1, 1844, Waddy Thompson MSS; Stephen Miller to Clay, June 20, 1844, quoted in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 211; Clay to Nicholas Davis, June 24, 1844, Henry Clay MSS; Clay to Stephen F. Miller, July 1, 1844, loc. cit. I am indebted to Professor William J. Cooper, Jr., for giving me his notes on the letter of Crittenden to Thompson.
- 63. Campbell to Rives, July 10, 1844 and Rives to Clay, July 15, 1844, draft, Rives MSS; Gustavus A. Henry to Marion Henry, July 24, 28, 1844, Henry MSS; William B. Campbell to David Campbell, August 14, 1844, CFP; A. Brackett to Erastus Fairbanks, August 5, 1844, Fairbanks MSS; L. Evans to Jesse Turner, August 19, 1844, Turner MSS.
- 64. R. B. Cuyler to Thomas Butler King, July 18, 1844, King MSS; New York Tribune, July 12, 15, 24, August 8, 15, 16, 26, 1844; James Harvey to Willie P. Mangum, July 23, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 159–61. Clay to Epes Sargent, August 7, 1844, Boston Public Library. Again, I am greatly indebted to Professor Cooper for sharing his notes on the Clay letter to Sargent with me.
- 65. Adam Huntsman to James K. Polk, September 20, 1844, Adam Huntsman MSS (Tennessee State Library), and the Milledgeville, Georgia, Federal Union, September 17, 1844, show Democratic awareness of the Alabama letters by September. Again, I am indebted to Professor Cooper for these references. New York Tribune, August 26, 1844.
- 66. New York Tribune, August 19, 26, 1844. In Kentucky the Whig proportion of seats in the lower house of the legislature increased from 62 percent in 1843 to 76 percent in 1844. In North Carolina, it increased from 44 percent in 1842 to 58 percent in 1844. Changes in the popular vote in the two states between 1840 and 1844 show dramatic Democratic gains.

	Vote for President 1840		Vote for Governor 1844
	Whig	Democratic	Whig	Democratic
Kentucky N. Carolina	58,597 45,705	32,593 33,781	59,792 42,586	55,089 39,433

- 67. New York Tribune, August 26, 1844. In 1842 Whigs had captured 57 percent of the seats in the lower house of the legislature; in 1844 they won 52 percent.
- 68. Wm. L. Savage to Thomas Ewing, July 6, 1844, EFP; William H. McFarland to David Campbell, August 27, 1844, William C. Rives to Campbell, September 24, October 25, 1844, CFP; G. A. Henry to Marion Henry, July 24, 28, 1844, and Marion Henry to G. A. Henry, September 26, 1844, Henry MSS; John Pendleton Kennedy to Philip C. Pendleton, October 17, 1844, copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 69. Clay to Mangum, September 11, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Clay to Giddings, September 21, 1844, Giddings-Julian MSS; Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, p. 147.
- 70. New York Tribune, June 1, 27, 1844; North American, June 3, 1844, quoted in Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 102; Tutorow, Texas Annexation, pp. 67–70; Van Bolt, "Sectional Aspects," p. 128.
- 71. New York Tribune, June 27, 1844; Seward to Weed, June 20, 1844, quoted in Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, p. 146; Seward to Samuel B. Ruggles, September 11, 1844, Seward MSS (LC); Morrill to J. W. D. Parker, August 2, 1844, Morrill MSS.
 - 72. Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 116-23.
- 73. Ibid., pp. 120, 126–27. Despite exposing Polk's promises to Southerners, Sellers defends the candor of the Kane letter because Polk seemed to endorse both protection and discrimination in favor of manufactured products. But that is a dubious judgment, for the central issue in 1844, especially in Pennsylvania, was where Polk stood on the Tariff of 1842, not some hypothetical measure. Publicly Polk refused to say anything about that measure even as he privately told Southerners that he wanted to replace it.
- 74. See, for example, New York Tribune, June 27, July 6, October 7, 1844; James E. Harvey to Thomas Butler King, August 7, 1844, King MSS; Reynolds McFarland to James M. Bell, September 10, 1844, James Bell MSS; Truman Smith to William B. Campbell, August 18, 1844, CFP.
- 75. Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 122-23; Tutorow, Texas Annexation, pp. 61-72; New York Tribune, June 15, July 6, 1844.
- 76. New York Tribune, August 26, 30, 1844. For evidence that Indiana's Whigs worried about the incursion of the Liberty party into their strength, see Schuyler Colfax to Richard W. Thompson, June 11, 1844, Thompson MSS (Lincoln Life Foundation).
- 77. On Ohio, see P. B. Ewing to William L. Savage, n.d. (July 1844 folder), EFP; Tutorow, Texas Annexation, pp. 66–67; and Maizlish, "Triumph of Sectionalism," pp. 58–60. On New York, see Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 129–31; Benson, Concept of Jacksonian Democracy; pp. 230–32; and New York Tribune, November 8, 9, 16, 1844.
- 78. William Lawrence to William Allen, March 29, 1844, and H. C. Whitman to Allen, April 27, 1844, Allen MSS; Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, p. 141; New York Tribune, November 9, 1844; Lewis Tappan to Joshua R. Giddings, December 19, 1845, Giddings MSS.
- 79. Daniel Webster to Edward Curtis, September 1, 1844, Webster MSS; Weed to Granger, September 3, 1844, Granger MSS; Seward to Weed, September 2, 1844, quoted in Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, p. 147.
- 80. William Slade to Joshua R. Giddings, June 6, 1844, Giddings MSS; Winthrop to Everett, September 14, 1844, Everett MSS.
- 81. Seth M. Gates to Giddings, October 2, 1844, quoted in Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, p. 147; John Lorimer Graham to William C. Rives, October 2, 1844, Rives MSS.
- 82. Clay's letter of September 23, 1844, is quoted in Poage, Clay, p. 147; Hunt to Fillmore, October 5, 1844, MFP-O.

- 83. Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 148–49; John Lorimer Graham to William C. Rives, October 30, 1844, Circular from the Whig State Central Committee of Ohio, October 11, 1844, Rives MSS.
- 84. Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, p. 184; Nathan Sargent to Willie P. Mangum, August 21, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 179–80; New York Tribune, October 7, 1844; Edward Jenkins to William C. Rives, June 5, 1844, Rives MSS.
 - 85. New York Tribune, April 6, 1844; Seager, And Tyler Too, pp. 230-42.
- 86. Benson, Concept of Jacksonian Democracy, pp. 241–42; John S. Wendell to Clay, March 11, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 87. Louisiana Courier, July 19, 1844, quoted in Redard, "Election of 1844 in Louisiana," 426.
- 88. William Lawrence to William Allen, March 29, 1844, H. C. Whitman to Allen, April 27, 1844, Allen MSS; Whig Platform of 1844 in appendix to Sellers, "Election of 1844," p. 807; The American Review, I (January 1845—but issued in the fall of 1844), pp. 99–103; Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, p. 184.
- 89. Peter B. Porter to Clay, October 13, 1843, in Works of Henry Clay, V, p. 479; Clay to Weed, May 6, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (Duke). The generalizations about potential candidates in this and the following paragraphs are based on the following letters: James Watson Webb to W. H. Morrell, January 12, 1844, Willie P. Mangum to John M. Clayton, March 16, 1844, Reverdy Johnson to Mangum, March 23, 1844, Mangum and James T. Morehead to Clayton, March 25, 1844, B. W. Leigh to Mangum, March 28, 1844, Clayton to Mangum, March 30, 1844, Richard H. Atwell to Mangum, April 17, 1844, S. P. Walker to Mangum, April 30, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 13–14, 65–68, 74–76, 79–87, 104–06, 121–22; Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, April 26, May 11, 1844, Everett MSS; Thomas Corwin to Thomas Ewing, April 8, 1844, EFP; William H. Seward to William Woodbridge, April 6, 1844, Seward MSS (RU). Of these letters, only two even mentioned Frelinghuysen before the convention.
- 90. In addition to the letters listed above, see Dalzell, Webster, pp. 89–90, for Webster's hostility to Davis; Van Deusen, Weed, pp. 132–33, 362, note 5; Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 147–51.
- 91. Winthrop to Everett, April 26, 1844, Everett MSS. On the night before the convention, a Whig wrote Mangum from Baltimore, "The East, Ohio & Inda stand firm for Davis. Fillmore gains, and so does Frelinghuysen. McKennan is brought out today, but nothing is known, more than you can conjecture about the matter of the V. P. at Washington." S. P. Walker to Mangum, April 30, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 121–22.
- 92. I have used the report on the convention's proceedings in the New York Tribune, May 3, 1844.
- 93. For the background of the American Republican movement I have relied on Billington, Protestant Crusade, pp. 1–211; Benson, Concept of Jacksonian Democracy, pp. 114–22; Leonard, "American Republican Party"; and Feldberg, Philadelphia Riots.
- 94. Estimates of Democrats voting American Republican are taken from Leonard, "American Republican Party," pp. 164–72, 183; Feldberg, Philadelphia Riots, pp. 95–96, 164–67.
 - 95. Leonard, "American Republican Party"; Van Deusen, Weed, pp. 131-35.
- 96. Feldberg, Philadelphia Riots, pp. 99–168. Within three days of the Kennsington riot, indeed, Thurlow Weed, who had backed James Harper for mayor of New York City in April, wrote that the Whigs must spurn any connection with "the Philadelphia Native Americans." Weed to Alvah Hunt, May 11, 1844, Knollenberg Collection.
- 97. Clay to Peter Sken Smith, June 17, 1844, Clay to Clayton, August 29, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); John C. Hamilton to John M. Berrien, August 27, 1844, Berrien MSS.
- 98. New York Tribune, October 3, 1844; John Lorimer Graham to William C. Rives, October 30, 1844, Rives MSS; Nathans, Webster, pp. 222–23; Charles A. Davis to Clay, October 4, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 99. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 104–13, quotation on p. 111; Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, p. 185; Feldberg, Philadelphia Riots, pp. 165–68, properly expresses skepticism about the existence of such a bargain.
 - 100. Feldberg, Philadelphia Riots, pp. 164-68.

- 101. James E. Harvey to Thomas Butler King, October 22, 1844, King MSS; Nicholas Carroll to Willie P. Mangum, October 15, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 214–16; John C. Hamilton to Millard Fillmore, October 8, 1844, Henry Davies to Fillmore, October 14, 1844, V. M. Smith to Fillmore, October 27, 1844. MFP-O.
 - 102. John C. Hamilton to John M. Berrien, August 27, 1844, Berrien MSS.
- 103. Nicholas Carroll to Willie P. Mangum, September 8, October 7, 15, 1844, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 180–84, 205–07, 214–16; Henry E. Davies to Millard Fillmore, October 1, 1844, John C. Hamilton to Fillmore, October 8, 11, 1844, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, October 2, 1844, Fillmore to B. F. Whitney, October 28, 1844, draft, and Horace Greeley to Fillmore, November 8, 1844, MFP-O; Charles A. Davis to Clay, October 4, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); W. Niles to William C. Rives, October 29, 1844, John Lorimer Graham to Rives, October 30, 1844, Rives MSS.
- 104. For the quotations, see Seward to Clay, October 25, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Clay to William B. Campbell, October 26, 1844, CFP. Dozens of similar letters could be cited.
- 105. Thomas Nevitt to Clay, November 24, 1844, E. Pettinger to Clay, January 1, 1845, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Richard W. Thompson to Millard Fillmore, January 8, 1845, MFP-O; Leslie Combs to John M. Clayton, November 20, 1844, Clayton MSS; John L. Lawrence to Clay, November 25, 1844, Fillmore to Clay, November 11, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); William M. Cooke to William C. Rives, December 14, 1844, Rives MSS.
- 106. Weed to Granger, February 25, 1845, Granger MSS; New York Tribune, November 16, 1844. See also the Tribune for November 8, 9, 15 and for December 15, 23, 1844. I say "apparently divergent responses" because Weed and Greeley both believed Whigs could win on issues once the electorate had a taste of the Democratic alternatives.
- 107. For historians who consider the Texas issue decisive, see note 26; Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 108–9, 159. For other historians who minimize the impact of issues, especially the Texas issue, on voting behavior, see Benson, Concept of Jacksonian Democracy, pp. 123–40, 254–69, and passim; Alexander, "Voter Partisan Constancy," pp. 78, 92–93, 116, and passim.
- 108. S. M. Chester to Clay, November 13, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC). See also "A Native Whig" to Millard Fillmore, November 9, 1844, MFP-O; Fillmore to Clay, November 11, 1844, Ambrose Spencer to Clay, November 21, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); David Davis to William P. Walker, February 1845, draft, David Davis MSS.
- 109. Daniel Webster to Edward Everett, December 15, 1844, Webster MSS; New York Tribune, November 9, 1844; John Lorimer Graham to William C. Rives, November 19, 1844, Rives MSS.
 - 110. Alexander, "Voter Partisan Constancy," pp. 92-95.
- 111. Some of the absolute decline in the Whig vote may have reflected defeatism. Different states held the presidential election on different days in 1844, beginning on Friday, November 1, and extending to Thursday, November 14. Because most of the crucial states voted before November 6, Whig voters in many of the states voting later may have known the results and been discouraged. Maine, Massachusetts, and Alabama voted on November 11, Vermont on November 12, and North Carolina on November 14. New Hampshire and Tennessee, however, voted on November 4 and 5, respectively. For election dates, see Tribune Almanac for 1844, p. 60.
- 112. The proportions alluded to in this paragraph are calculated by dividing the total increase in the vote between 1840 and 1844 by the gains of the three parties. Were one to begin with the estimated proportions of the 1840 vote each party retained, the figures would be slightly different. Given the decline in the Democratic vote during 1840 from earlier congressional and gubernatorial contests to the presidential balloting in November, it is likely that some of the increase in the Democratic total of 1844 also came from normal Democratic supporters who had failed to vote for Van Buren in November.
- 113. Webster to Everett, December 15, 1844, Everett MSS; James F. Strother to William C. Rives, November 17, 1844, Rives MSS. Another correspondent complained to Rives that Virginia could have been carried "if the old Adams men had not been allowed to take the lead and undo all we did in 40 without them." James Lyons to Rives, November 11, 1844, Rives MSS.
- 114. Thomas Baird to Clay, November 30, 1844, Stephen Russell to Clay, March 4, 1845, Henry Clay MSS (LC).

- 115. The quotations are from Ambrose Spencer to Clay, November 21, 1844, and William L. Gould to Clay, December 18, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); V. Bouligny to Clay, December 4, 1844, Thomas J. Clay MSS; and Charles Oliver to Clay, November 29, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (Lilly Library, Indiana University). For similar lamentations, see David Campbell to William B. Campbell, December 23, 1844, CFP; and New York Tribune, November 9, 1844.
- 116. Redard, "Election of 1844 in Louisiana," p. 428; Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, p. 159; Burnham, Presidential Ballots, p. 30.
- 117. William L. Gould to Clay, December 18, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); George H. Colton to John P. Kennedy, November 13, 1844, Kennedy MSS; Gilbert H. Sayers to Clay, December 21, 1844, Thomas H. Baird to Clay, November 30, 1844, and Allan B. Magruder to Clay, November 21, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
 - 118. New York Tribune, November 13, 1844.
- 119. William L. Gould to Clay, December 18, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); H. M. Cunningham to Alexander Stephens, December 21, 1844, Stephens MSS; Combs to John M. Clayton, November 20, 1844, Clayton MSS; Arthur Campbell to James Campbell, November 21, 1844, and to David Campbell, November 17, 1844, CFP.
- 120. Gould to Clay, December 18, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Cunningham to Stephens, December 21, 1844, Stephens MSS (LC).
- 121. For Louisiana I have relied on the multiple regression and correlation analyses in Redard, "Election of 1844 in Louisiana," pp. 430–33. Note that the Whigs lost some 2,500 votes in Alabama between 1840 and 1844. Since the party was strongest in the wealthiest counties with the most slaves in that state, Democratic gains in counties more than 30 percent slave could well represent the conversion of former Whig voters. Long ago, indeed, Arthur Cole noted that Whig losses in the South occurred in the black belt plantation areas, while Democratic gains came in the areas with few slaves. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 115–16.
 - 122. David Campbell to Arthur Campbell, February 11, 1845, CFP.
 - 123. See also Renda, "Retrospective Voting."
 - 124. New York Tribune, November 8, 9, 16, December 23, 1844.
- 125. Ambrose Spencer to Clay, November 21, 1844, Hone to Clay, November 28, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Fillmore to Weed, November 6, 1844, Weed MSS (RU); Simeon Baldwin, Jr., to Simeon Baldwin, November 23, 1844, BFP; Amos Abbott to William Schouler, November 16, 1844, Schouler MSS.
- 126. Charles Henry Hall to John C. Hamilton, January 1, 1845, J. Burnet to John M. Berrien, February 14, 1845, Berrien MSS; J. W. Migels to Clay, November 11, 1844, Thomas H. Baird to Clay, November 30, 1844, C. L. Leary to Clay, November 14, 1844, Theodore Frelinghuysen to Clay, November 9, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); V. Bouligny to Clay, December 4, 1844, T. J. Clay MSS; New York Tribune, November 6, 9, 11, 13, 1844, October 10, 1846.

Because the federal census of 1840 did not list information on place of birth and because the immigrant population grew rapidly in any event, it is impossible to analyze statistically the behavior of foreign-born voters. But it is likely that Whigs were generally correct. In Buffalo and Erie County, New York, where the German and Irish populations were growing rapidly, for example, Democrats outgained Whigs between 1840 and 1844 by 1,363 to 118 votes. In New York County, where Whigs made some gains through their cooperation with the American Republicans, the Democrats still attracted 1,000 more new voters than they did. In Pennsylvania, Whigs outpaced Democrats among new voters in populous Philadelphia County because of their alliance with the American Republicans, but the Democratic vote grew dramatically between 1840 and 1844 in areas of German settlement such as Berks, Bucks, Lehigh, and Schuylkill counties, while in Allegheny County, site of Pittsburgh and a traditional Whig bastion, Democrats outgained Whigs by 1,170 to 464 votes. Finally, J. Burnet claimed that Democrats illegally naturalized 1,500 Germans within two weeks of the election in Cincinnati, and the Democrats outdrew Whigs by 3,100 to 1,300 among new voters in Hamilton County, Ohio. For more on the surge of non-British immigrants to the Democrats in New York State, see Benson, Concept of Jacksonian Democracy, pp. 138-76.

- 127. W. E. Cramer to Polk, November 13, 1844, quoted in Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, p. 158.
 - 128. The resolutions of the New Haven meeting are enclosed with P. S. Galphin et al. to

Notes Notes

Clay, November 16, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Cincinnati Gazette quoted in the New York Tribune, November 16, 1844; for Greeley's lament see ibid., November 11, 1844.

- 129. Thomas Nevitt to Clay, November 24, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Draft of Webster's Speech at Faneuil Hall, dated November 10, 1844, Webster MSS; and the sources cited in note 128. Whigs also pointed to a surging Democratic immigrant vote in Illinois and Michigan, where, as they lamented, aliens could legally vote prior to naturalization. See, for example, New York Tribune, August 26, 1844, and Tutorow, Texas Annexation, pp. 76–77.
- 130. Philo D. Mickles to Millard Fillmore, November 14, 1844, MFP-O; New York Tribune, November 9, 11, 1844; Albany Evening Journal, quoted in ibid., November 13, 1844. See also the speech of Connecticut Governor William Ellsworth printed in ibid., November 28, 1844; and Seward to Henry Clay, November 7, 1844, copy, Seward MSS (RU).
- 131. Samuel Sample to Schuyler Colfax, December 1, 1844, Colfax MSS (NIHS); New York Tribune, November 6, 12, 1844. Comparison of state and congressional returns with the presidential tally in New York City and Philadelphia suggests that complaints of American Republican betrayal were justified.
- 132. Fillmore to Clay, November 11, 1844, Gilbert H. Sayers to Clay, December 21, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Combs to Clayton, November 20, 1844, Clay to Clayton, December 2, 1844, Clayton MSS.
 - 133. Thomas Ewing to Timothy Childs, January 3, 1845, EFP.
- 134. See Table 9. Three Senate seats held by Whigs were to be filled in 1845 by legislatures that Democrats carried in 1844. The Whig margin in the Senate during the 28th Congress was twenty-eight to twenty-three, with one vacancy.
- 135. Thomas Butler King to Winfield Scott, February 15, 1845, draft, King MSS; William J. Hough to William Allen, December 9, 1844, Allen MSS; George Tucker to William C. Rives, November 16, 1844, J. J. Fry to Rives, November 13, 1844, Rives MSS; Clay to Crittenden, November 28, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Arthur Campbell to James Campbell, November 21, 1844, CFP.
 - 136. G. H. Colton to J. P. Kennedy, November 13, 1844, Kennedy MSS.

CHAPTER 8

- 1. Leverett Saltonstall to Clay, December 10, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC). For additional examples of Whig pessimism after Clay's defeat, see Chapter 7.
- 2. For typical examples of historians who sneer at the bankruptcy and unpopularity of Whig programs by 1848, see Nevins, Ordeal: Fruits, p. 194; and Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 151–53 and passim. For the argument that sectional issues replaced economic issues after 1844 and thus destroyed the Whig party, see also Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism.
- 3. Boritt, Lincoln, p. 145; see also Brock, Political Conscience, p. 188, and Potter, Impending Crisis, p. 81.
- 4. F. S. Bronson to Henry Clay, November 20, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); J. J. Fry to William C. Rives, November 13, 1844, Rives MSS.
- 5. Draft of Webster's speech, November 10, 1844, Webster MSS; William L. Gould to Clay, December 18, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 6. Resolutions of Whig meeting in New Haven, Connecticut, November 14, 1844, with P. S. Galphin et al. to Clay, November 16, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); New York Tribune, November 9, 1844; Clay to Crittenden, November 28, 1844, Crittenden MSS (LC); Clay to John M. Clayton, December 2, 1844, Clayton MSS.
- 7. New York Tribune, December 18, 1844; Albany Evening Journal quoted in ibid., November 13, 1844; John H. Pleasants to Rives, December 23, 1844, Rives MSS.
- 8. I have relied on the minutes of this meeting of March 15, 1845, in the Webster MSS. Clay, in the letters to Crittenden and Clayton cited above, urged Whigs in Congress "to have an early consultation and to adopt some system of future action."
- 9. "The Result of the Election," The American Review, I (February, 1845), 113–20. No author was listed for the article, but George H. Colton, owner of The American Review, had written Kennedy after the election asking him to contribute an article on the election outlining what the Whigs' future course should be. Colton to Kennedy, November 13, 1844, Kennedy MSS.

- 10. In legislative races, this weakness was largely attributable to representation based on atlarge county tickets, rather than single-member districts, which denied Whigs a share of seats commensurate with their popular vote. For Whig complaints about the apportionment of the legislature, see the Michigan Whig State Platform for 1845, New York Tribune, September 27, 1845.
- 11. This total includes special elections to fill vacancies as well as regularly scheduled elections. My sources for the congressional races are the Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections and the Tribune Almanac.
- 12. Duncan McKenzie to Duncan McLaurin, November 2, 1845, McLaurin MSS; P. B. Barringer to Daniel M. Barringer, June 26, 1845, Barringer MSS; B. F. Dill to John A. Quitman, September 7, 1847, Claiborne MSS.
 - 13. C. F. M. Noland to Jesse Turner, October 22, 1845, Turner MSS.
- 14. David Davis to John Henry, February 11, 1845, Davis to John Rockwell, December 17, 1845, and Davis to William P. Walker, December 6, 1845, David Davis MSS.
 - 15. New York Tribune, September 17, 20, 1847.
 - 16. C. F. M. Noland to Jesse Turner, February 23, 1848, Turner MSS.
- 17. Abraham Lincoln to T. S. Flournoy, February 17, 1848, in Collected Works of Lincoln, I, p. 452; see also Lincoln to Taylor Committee, February 9, 1848, Lincoln to Usher F. Linden, February 20, March 22, 1848, and Lincoln to Jesse Lynch, April 10, 1848, ibid., pp. 449, 453, 457–58, 463–64.
- 18. N. C. Barnett to John M. Berrien, February 18, 1845, Berrien MSS; Leslie Combs to John M. Clayton, November 20, 1844, Clayton MSS; James Lyons to Rives, November 11, 1844, Jeremiah Morton to Rives, December 11, 1844, W. E. Sutton to Rives, January 31, 1845, Rives MSS; H. M. Cunningham to Alexander H. Stephens, December 21, 1844, Stephens MSS (LC).
 - 19. Joseph H. Peyton to William B. Campbell, February 16, 1845, CFP.
- 20. Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 44–45; New York Tribune, February 6, 1845; Daniel Webster to Robert C. Winthrop, December 29, 30, 1844, January 10, 1845, Winthrop MSS; Webster to Samuel Hurd Walley, March 8, 1845, Webster MSS; copy of the anti-Texas resolution passed by the Massachusetts legislature, March 31, 1845, in Adams Family Papers; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 91–97; A. G. Johnson to Rives, December 2, 1844, Joseph R. Ingersoll to Rives, February 18, 1845, Rives MSS.
- 21. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, IV, pp. 334–56; John P. Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, December 12, 1844, Kennedy MSS; Samuel Sample to Schuyler Colfax, January 15, 1845 (quotation), Colfax MSS (NIHS); Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 156–63; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 219–23; Merk, Slavery, pp. 140–59.
- 22. Sample to Colfax, January 15, 1845, Colfax MSS; John P. Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, December 12, 1844, Kennedy MSS; Joseph H. Peyton to William B. Campbell, February 16, 1845, CFP. For details of the Brown plan, see the books by Brock, Cooper, and Merk cited in note 210.
- 23. Arthur Campbell to James Campbell, November 21, 1844, CFP; Robert Toombs to Berrien, February 13, 1845, Berrien MSS.
 - 24. Congressional Globe, 28th Cong., 2nd Sess., p. 194; Silbey, Shrine of Party, pp. 60-62.
- 25. William E. Sutton to Rives, January 31, 1845, James F. Strother to Rives, February 2, 1845, and James Tallmadge to Rives, February 19, 1845, Rives MSS; Toombs to Berrien, February 13, 1845, Charles Jenkins to Berrien, February 15, 1845, N. C. Barnett to Berrien, February 18, 1845, Berrien MSS; Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, February 2, 1845, and Webster to Edward Everett, February 26, 1845, Webster MSS.
- 26. Congressional Globe, 28th Cong., 2nd Sess., pp. 360, 372; see also the section of the books by Merk, Cooper, and Brock listed in note 21; see also Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 214–23.
- 27. Allen F. Owen to John M. Berrien, January 2, 1845, Samuel Dickson to Berrien, February 3, 1845, Charles J. Jenkins to Berrien, February 3, 15, April 22, 1845, Berrien MSS; S. T. Chapman to Alexander H. Stephens, February 4, 1845, Stephens to James Thomas, February 11, 1845, Stephens MSS (LC); Toombs to Stephens, February 16, 1845, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 63–64. For more on the Georgia Whig divisions, see Walton, "Georgia's Biennial Legislatures."
 - 28. Toombs to Berrien, February 13, 1845, and J. R. A. Merriweather to Berrien, April 21,

- May 10, 1845, Berrien MSS. See also C. B. Strong to Berrien, April 25, May 9, June 10, 1845, Berrien MSS. By 1845, the Tariff of 1842 was drawing increasing criticism from Georgia's Whigs because its high rates on English iron rails increased the state government's costs for constructing the Western and Atlantic Railroad. Throughout the winter of 1844–45, indeed, Governor Crawford bombarded Berrien and Stephens with pleas to secure a reduction of rates on railroad iron.
- 29. Toombs to Stephens, January 24, 1845, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 60–62; S. T. Chapman to Stephens, February 4, 1845, Stephens MSS (LC); Charles J. Jenkins to Berrien, April 22, August 6, 1845, and Francis S. Bartow to Berrien, July 30, August 3, 1845, Berrien MSS.
 - 30. James E. Harvey to Thomas Butler King, October 20, 1845, King MSS.
- 31. For Whig expectations and disappointment in Virginia, see J. J. Fry to Rives, January 23, 1845, and Jno. Pendleton to Rives, May 1, 1845, Rives MSS. A year later, when the Whigs also lost the legislative elections, the chief Whig paper in the state openly admitted that the party could find no state issues with which to contest the elections. Richmond Whig, April 19, 1846.
- 32. Bergeron, Antebellum Politics in Tennessee, pp. 77–80. The percentages are calculated from the figures in Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections, pp. 78–80.
 - 33. New York Tribune, November 16, 1844.
- 34. Webster to Samuel Hurd Walley, March 8, 1845, Webster MSS; copy of Massachusetts anti-Texas resolution, March 31, 1845, Adams Family Papers; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 102–05; New York Tribune, March 13, September 4, 27, 1845; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 62–64; Samuel Sample to Schuyler Colfax, June 8, 1845, Colfax MSS (NIHS).
- 35. William Ellsworth to Roger Sherman Baldwin, April 9, 1845, and Roger Sherman Baldwin to S. C. Phillips, Charles Allen, and Charles Francis Adams, July 3, 1845, copy, BFP.
- 36. Joshua Giddings to S. C. Phillips, Charles Allen, and Charles Francis Adams, July 7, 1845, Salmon P. Chase to S. C. Phillips et al., July 2, 1845, William W. Ellsworth to S. C. Phillips et al., July 2, 1845, and Julius Lemoyne to S. C. Phillips et al., July 22, 1845, Adams Family Papers. The best modern analysis of Whig and Democratic attitudes toward expansion in general and Texas annexation in particular is now Morrison, Slavery and the American West. For his discussion of Texas, see pp. 13–38.
- 37. For these developments, see Brauer, Cotton versus Conscience; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 91–107; Donald, Sumner, pp. 135–41; Charles Francis Adams to Louisa C. Adams, January 24, 1845, and Abbott Lawrence to Charles Francis Adams, November 17, 1845, Adams Family Papers; Abbott Lawrence to William C. Rives, January 17, 1845, Rives MSS; Nathan Appleton to C. F. Adams, John Gorham Palfrey, and Charles Sumner, November 10, 1845, copy, Appleton MSS.
- 38. Stanley, "Majority Tyranny"; William Henry Seward to Gerrit Smith, January 21, 1845, Seward MSS (RU); Albany Evening Journal, quoted in the New York Tribune, January 13, 1845. See also the Tribune, January 9, March 11, 20, April 20, 24, May 17, 20, June 9, 18, and July 2, 3, 1845.
- 39. L. Saltonstall to Henry Clay, December 10, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); George Wm. Boyd to John Quincy Adams, April 7, 1845, Adams Family Papers; New York Tribune, December 17, 1844, January 17, April 10, 1845; S. M. Troutman to James M. Bell, November 13, 1844, James Bell MSS; Abbott Lawrence to Edward Everett, March 31, 1845, Everett MSS.
- 40. New York Tribune, November 26, 1844, January 7, 9, 1845; draft of Webster's speech, November 10, 1844, Webster to David P. Hall, November 26, 1844, and Webster to Robert C. Winthrop, December 13, 29, 1844, Webster MSS; copy of the Massachusetts legislative resolution, March 31, 1845, in Adams Family Papers; George Tucker to William C. Rives, November 16, 1844, and John H. Pleasants to Rives, December 23, 1844, Rives MSS.
- 41. Jno. C. Hamilton to John M. Berrien, January 15, 1845, and J. Burnet to Berrien, February 14, 1845, Berrien MSS; Samuel Sample to Schuyler Colfax, December 1, 1844, Colfax MSS (NIHS); New York Tribune, March 10, 1845; U.S. Congress, Senate Documents, 28th Congress, 2nd Sess., Volume II, Documents 59 and 173; Congressional Globe, 28th Cong., 2nd Sess., pp. 389–90, 3030.
- 42. Resolutions of the New Haven Whig meeting, November 14, 1844, included with P. S. Galphin, et al. to Henry Clay, November 16, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Ellsworth's speech in the New York Tribune, November 28, 1844; Boston Courier, quoted in the Pennsylvania

Telegraph (Harrisburg), October 29, 1845; "Boston Correspondence," New York Tribune, November 7, 1845. For the quarreling in New York, see the New York Tribune, December 18, 1844, January 24, February 18, March 12, 20, 21 (quotation), April 5, 7, 10, May 17, 20, June 9, September 4, November 4, 14, 1845.

- 43. New York Tribune, September 26, November 5, December 31, 1845, January 1, 3, 1846; John P. Kennedy to Philip C. Pendleton, October 9, 1845, copy, Kennedy MSS; William Henry Seward to Thurlow Weed, January 1, 1846, and John Tayler Hall to Weed, February 17, 1846, Weed MSS (RU).
- 44. On Ohio, see Maizlish, "The Triumph of Sectionalism," pp. 74–95; and Sharp, Jacksonians versus the Banks, pp. 140–52. On Pennsylvania, see Holt, Political Crisis, p. 112; and Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 131–32. On Indiana, see Samuel Sample to Schuyler Colfax, December 8, 1844, Colfax MSS (NIHS); New York Tribune, February 1, 1845; and Godlove Orth to Colfax, August 16, 1845, Orth MSS. On Connecticut, see New York Tribune, April 16, 1846; Roger Sherman Baldwin to S. D. Hubbard, March 28, 1846, Emily Baldwin to Edward Baldwin, April 12, 1846, May 12, 1847 (quotation), BFP; A. E. Burr to Gideon Welles, June 17, 1846, Welles MSS (NYPL); Welles to Isaac Toucey, June 23, 1846, Welles MSS (LC). Since the proposed railroad line needing the Middletown bridge would connect New Haven with Boston, New Haven Whigs favored the bridge, while Hartford Whigs, fearing disruption of river traffic, opposed it.
- 45. New York Tribune, November 21, 1845, April 2, 1846; Thomas J. Stead to Samuel F. Man, March 18, 1846, Jenckes MSS.
- 46. Sewell, Ballots for Freedom, pp. 126–30; Daniel Webster to James Wilson, March 16, 1846, and Webster to Anthony Colby, May 20, 1846, Webster MSS; John P. Hale to Joshua R. Giddings, April 5, 1846, Giddings MSS; Franklin Pierce to Edmund Burke, November 18, 1846, March 2, 1847, Burke MSS; New York Tribune, March 15, 1847. Both Whig and Democratic turnout in 1847 soared above their respective levels in the presidential election, and it has been estimated that the proportion of eligible males voting in New Hampshire's elections was 66.4 percent in 1844, 71.9 percent in 1846, and 77.2 percent in 1847. See Table 1 in Gienapp, "'Politics Seems to Enter into Everything," pp. 18–19.
- 47. Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, January 27, 1846, in Schauinger, ed., "Orth Letters," 39, pp. 378–80.
- 48. Among works by political scientists, I have been primarily influenced by Kernell, "Presidential Popularity"; Fiorina, Retrospective Voting; Bloom and Price, "Voter Response"; and Hibbing and Alford, "Electoral Impact."
- 49. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, IV, pp. 373–84, 392–98; Merk, Manifest Destiny, pp. 29, 46, 62–64; Sellers, Polk: Continentalist, pp. 358–415. In the House vote to give notice, 52 percent of the Whigs voted yea and 48 percent nay. Alexander, Sectional Stress, p. 188, vote 11. For evidence of the strategic considerations dividing the Whigs on Oregon, see the Washington correspondence and editorials in the New York Tribune, January 8, 17, 20, 31, February 5, 13, March 25, June 20, 1846; "The Whig Party, Its Position, and Duties," The American Review, II (December 1845), 554–56; William B. Campbell to David Campbell, December 22, 1845, March 8, 1846, CFP; William Henry Seward to Thurlow Weed, January 3, 6, 22, 1846, Weed MSS (RU); and Truman Smith to William C. Rives, February 24, 1846, Rives MSS.
- 50. The situation in Massachusetts is detailed in Brauer, Cotton versus Conscience; Donald, Sumner, pp. 143–49; and Dalzell, Webster, pp. 113–22. Winthrop privately justified his vote in the following terms, which reflect the dilemma of many Whigs: "The Mexican War Bill presented the most difficult case for an honest man to give a satisfactory vote upon, which I have ever met with. I could not bear the whole Massts. Delegation should be mixed up with a little knot of ultraists against supplies; and altho' the preamble of the Bill did not tell the whole truth, I thought that the rejection of our Minister by Mexico was, under all circumstances, a pretty serious affront, & one which at least divided the responsibility of the war." Winthrop to Edward Everett, June 7, 1846, Everett MSS.
- 51. For the votes in Congress and state legislatures, see Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 57–69; Silbey, Shrine of Party, pp. 172–88; and Holt, Political Crisis, p. 47. The standard account of Whig opposition to the war is Schroeder, Polk's War, but see also: Howe, Political Culture,

- pp. 92–93; Bolchin, "Caleb B. Smith's Opposition"; Boritt, "Lincoln's Opposition"; Gilley, "Polk's War"; id., "Tennessee Whigs"; and Graebner, "Party Politics." Typical examples of Whig denunciations can be found in The American Review, IV (December 1846), 545–47; V (May 1847), 433–46; VI (October 1847), 331–46; VI (December 1847), 553–60; and I (January 1848), 1–14.
- 52. The specific appropriations in the vetoed Rivers and Harbors bill were printed in The Whig (Tribune) Almanac for 1847, p. 38.
- 53. For example, see the New York Tribune, December 20, 1844, January 7, 17, 18, 1845; Thurlow Weed to Francis Granger, February 12, 1845, Granger MSS; Henry Clay to John J. Crittenden, November 28, 1844, Henry Clay MSS (LC); and Clay to John M. Clayton, December 2, 1844, Clayton MSS.
- 54. New York Tribune, April 14, 1846; "The Independent Treasury," The American Review, III (May 1846), 465–68; "Finance and Commerce," ibid., 556–57; New York Tribune, August 8, 1846
- 55. Abbott Lawrence to William C. Rives, January 17, 26, 1846, Rives MSS. I provide a much fuller analysis of Whigs' predictions about the baneful economic consequences of tariff reduction, the Independent Treasury system, and the Public Warehouse Act in my "Winding Roads to Recovery: The Whig Party from 1844 to 1848," in Holt, Political Parties, pp. 192–236.
- 56. Abbott Lawrence to William C. Rives, January 17, 26, 1846, Rives MSS; New York Tribune, August 14, 1845; "Mr. Walker's Report and Bill," The American Review, III (April 1846), 335–48; ibid., III (May 1846), 466; New York Tribune, February 27, May 9, June 17, 18, July 6, 15, 1846.
- 57. New York Tribune, July 6, 1846; Truman Smith to Nathan Appleton, April 9, 1846, Appleton MSS; John B. Lamar to Howell Cobb, June 24, 1846, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 82–84; H. King to Thomas Butler King, June 22, 1846, King MSS; James Bowen to Thurlow Weed, July 21, 1846, Weed MSS (RU). Significantly, Seward doubted that the Whigs could carry New York on the tariff issue in 1846. Seward to James Bowen, September 25, 1846, Seward MSS (RU).
- 58. Webster's attempt to arrange a compromise tariff can be followed in great detail in the Daniel Webster MSS for July 1846; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 109–12; New York Tribune, July 23, 24, August 8, 1846.
- 59. Daniel Webster to James K. Mills, July 21, 24, 1846, Webster to Fletcher Webster, July 27, 29, 1846, and Joseph Balch to Webster, July 25, 1846, Webster MSS.
- 60. Moses Stuart to Daniel Webster, August 3, 1846, Webster MSS; Thomas Corwin to Thomas Ewing, August 1, 1846, and William Bebb to Ewing, August 10, 1846, EFP; The American Review, IV (September 1846), 228. For other examples of Whig confidence that they could win by campaigning against the Democratic economic legislation of 1846, see New York Tribune, August 12, September 3, 1846; R. Fisher to Thomas Butler King, August 3, 1846, and S. Jardin to King, August 6, 1846, King MSS.
- 61. For a superb analysis of the decentralized nature of the Whig organization in a crucial state, see Booraem, Republican Party in New York, pp. 79–115 and passim.
 - 62. Moses Stuart to Webster, August 3, 1846, Webster MSS; ZT:SWH, p. 63.
- 63. For this and the preceding three paragraphs, see Truman Smith to Thomas Butler King, September 16, 17, October 13, 1846, King MSS; Smith to John Davis, September 16, October 26, 1846, John Davis MSS. On Whig fund-raising efforts, see also Leo W. Blunt, July 20, 1846, and James G. King, July 30, 1846, to Thomas Butler King, King MSS; Abbott Lawrence to Nathan Appleton, August 4, 1846, Abbott Lawrence MSS; and Lawrence to Daniel Webster, August 4, 1846, Webster MSS. No central collection of Truman Smith's papers, alas, has survived, a great misfortune for a historian of the Whig party.

To convert the dollar amounts listed here and elsewhere in this study to 1995 dollars, one should multiply by a factor of 17.5. Thus Smith's original target of $7,500 was $131,250 in 1995 dollars. I have taken this conversion ratio from Hummel, Emancipating Slaves, p. 39.

- 64. For figures on turnout I have relied on William Gienapp's table, cited in note 46.
- 65. On the Whigs' delight with the reapportionment, see Robert Toombs to Alexander H. Stephens, January 1, 1844, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 52–53.

66. See the sources cited in notes 42, 47, and 48 above. See also the New York Tribune, November 17, 20, December 2, 1845, April 1, May 2, 4, 5, August 20, 1846.

- 67. New York Tribune, April 26, May 17, 20, June 18, September 17, 1845, February 23, 28, March 2, 4, April 1, 21, May 2, 4, 5, August 13, 20, 1846; John Bradley to Thurlow Weed, February 1, 1846, Benton Rose to Weed, February 6, 1846, Alvah Hunt to Weed, February 17, 1846, John Tayler Hall to Weed, March 19, 1846, Washington Hunt to Weed, April 4, 1846, and Seward to Weed, April 5, 1846, Weed MSS (RU); Seward to John McLean, March 20, 1846, Seward MSS (LC); John T. Bush to Millard Fillmore, March 11, 1846, MFP-O.
- 68. Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, April 22, 1846, Greeley-Colfax MSS; New York Tribune, April 27, May 2, 4, 5, June 2, July 2, 9, 21, 31, 1846.
- 69. New York Tribune, April 24, 26, May 3, 14, 1845, March 9, July 2, 9, October 12, 1846. For the analysis of Hunker and Barnburner voting in the constitutional convention, I have relied on Merkel, "Party and Constitution Making." Merkel convincingly disproves the existence of a Whig-Democratic consensus on economic issues in the convention, a notion advanced by Meyers, Jacksonian Persuasion, pp. 236–37. As Merkel demonstrates, most votes in the convention divided sharply along party lines, and the compromises forced upon the Barnburner majority were the product of Hunker aid to the Whigs, not agreement between most Democrats and most Whigs on economic policy.
- 70. Bush to Fillmore, March 11, 1846, MFP-O; Greeley to Weed, March 13, 1846, Seward to Weed, August 10, 1846, Philander B. Prindle to Weed, October 15, 1846, Weed MSS (RU); Greeley to Henry Clay, November 15, 1846, Henry Clay MSS (LC). To strip Barnburner Governor Silas Wright, whom Democrats renominated in 1846, of patronage, Hunkers also joined Whigs at the constitutional convention in voting to limit the governor's appointment powers.
 - 71. Seward to James Bowen, September 25, 1846, Seward MSS (RU).
- 72. The best existing secondary account of the Anti-Rent movement is Ellis, Landlords, pp. 225–312. It will be supplanted, however, by a brilliant study of the legal issues involved in this prolonged controversy that my colleague Charles W. McCurdy is writing. I have also utilized David D. Barnard, "The 'Anti-Rent' Movement and Outbreak in New York," The American Review, II (December 1845), 587–98, which has a prolandlord bias, and the following issues of the New York Tribune: November 10, 11, December 2, 1845, January 9, 12, 17, March 4, 30, April 1, 6, May 5, 6, 15, 1846. Wright did commute the death sentences of the two men convicted of the murder to life imprisonment, but he refused to release other Anti-Renters convicted of lesser charges.
- 73. Barnard, "The 'Anti-Rent' Movement," loc. cit., p. 596; in addition to the issues of the Tribune cited in note 72, see those for July 31 and August 13, 1846; Van Deusen, Greeley, pp. 97–115; id., Weed, pp. 142–53; Greeley to Weed, May 14, 1846, Weed MSS (RU).
- 74. For this and the preceding paragraph, see New York Tribune, July 31, August 13, 26, 27, September 25, 26, October 7, 8, 14, 15, 29, 1846; Seward to Weed, August 10, 1846, Seth Hawley to Weed, August 21, 1846, Weed MSS (RU); B. F. Hall to Fillmore, August 21, 1846, J. L. White to Fillmore, August 27, 1846, D. O. Kellogg to Fillmore, September 17, 1846, J. L. Kellogg to Fillmore, September 27, 1846, Philip Hone to Fillmore, October 20, 1846, MFP-O; Fillmore to Artemus S. Childs, October 8, 1846, Millard Fillmore MSS (HSP); Greeley to Clay, November 15, 1846, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Seward to James Bowen, September 25, 1846, Seward MSS (RU).
- 75. New York Tribune, September 3, October 14, November 7, 20, 1846; Greeley to Clay, November 15, 1846, Henry Clay MSS (LC). Young, in fact, ran far better and Wright ran far more poorly in Anti-Rent strongholds than in the rest of the state, and regression analysis suggests that within Anti-Rent counties far more former Wright voters defected to Young or abstained than was true elsewhere. As a result, Wright retained only about three-fifths of his 1844 vote in Anti-Rent counties but three-fourths of it elsewhere in the state. Statistical analysis also suggests that Democrats who backed Young would not back Fish. For this analysis I have relied on a superb paper by my doctoral student John R. Kirn. See the tables on the 1846 election in his "Elections, Roll Calls."

76. John Couper to Thomas Butler King, November 17, 1846, R. R. Cuyler to King, November 12, 1846, circular of the Whig State Central Committee of Ohio, October 17, 1846, and Robert C. Schenck to King, October 25, 1846, King MSS; Davis to Clay, November 13, 1846, Clay to John S. Littell, November 17, 1846, Henry Clay MSS (LC). See also the speeches by Webster and John M. Clayton ascribing the Whig victory to economic issues in the New York Tribune, November 10, 11, 1846.

Clay's fellow Kentuckian Crittenden also warned in January 1847 that it was too soon to consider the presidential nomination for 1848 because any Whig candidate would divert attention from "the conduct & measures of the present Administration which is now bringing down daily condemnation upon it, & the party that sustains it." Crittenden to George B. Kinkead, January 10, 1847, Crittenden MSS (Duke).

- 77. James E. Harvey to William Hayden, November 6, 29, 1846, Schouler MSS; Davis to Clay, November 13, 1846, with Abbott Lawrence to John Davis, November 12, 1846, enclosed, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Walter Forward to Millard Fillmore, October 26, 1846, MFP-O.
- 78. Jno. C. Pendleton to William C. Rives, November 23, 1846, January 31, 1847, Rives MSS; Sam W. Fite to William B. Campbell, August 13, November 24, 1846, John Bell to William B. Campbell, November 22, 1846, CFP; R. H. Kingsburgh to Nathan Appleton, June 18, 1846, Appleton MSS; Charles L. Hinton to Samuel F. Patterson, July 10, 1846, and Alfred Dockery to Duncan McLaurin, January 9, 1847, McLaurin MSS; Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, January 27, 1846, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 39, 378–80; T. H. Nelson to Richard W. Thompson, July 5, 1847, Thompson MSS (Ind.SL); Thompson to H. J. Hilton, July 16, 1847, Thompson MSS (IU).
- 79. On the impact of the war and tariff issues in Connecticut, see John M. Niles to Gideon Welles, April 11, 1847, and William G. Pomeroy to Welles, May 11, 1847, Welles MSS (NYPL); A. E. Burr to Welles, April 13, 1847, Welles MSS (Conn.HS).
- 80. For an example of Whig doubts in Virginia, see William Ballard Preston to William C. Rives, February 28, 1847, Rives MSS; on North Carolina's reapportionment, see Walton, "Elections to the Thirtieth Congress," 196, and the New York Tribune, January 16, 1847.
- 81. Bergeron, Antebellum Politics in Tennessee, pp. 80–83, and William B. Campbell to David Campbell, January 23, 1848, CFP.
 - 82. Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, September 18, 1847, Greeley-Colfax MSS.
- 83. Walton, "Elections to the Thirtieth Congress," 186–202, provides a convenient summary of historians who cite changing sentiment on the war. Walton's main thesis is that southern Whigs began to boom Taylor for president in 1847 in order to help them in the congressional elections that year by neutralizing criticism that the Whigs were antiwar. He concludes that there is little evidence that Taylor helped Whig candidates or that their antiwar stance hurt them. In this admirable article, Walton takes no cognizance of the declining efficacy of economic issues from 1846 to 1847, and thus his interpretation differs markedly from my own.
 - 84. R. R. Cuyler to Thomas Butler King, November 12, 1846, King MSS.
- 85. Again, readers interested in a fuller analysis of Whig assumptions about the baneful economic impact of Democratic policies should consult my "Winding Roads to Recovery." In addition to the sources, I cite there, I rely here on the following articles in the American Review: "Mr. Walker's Report and Bill," III (April 1846), 335–48; "The Independent Treasury" and "Finance and Commerce," III (May 1846), 465–68, 556–57; "Finance and Commerce," III (June 1846), 662–63; "Finance and Commerce," IV (July 1846), 95–98; "Finance and Commerce," IV (August 1846), 199–204; "The Tariff of 1846," IV (September 1846), 215–28; "Mr. Secretary Walker's Agricultural Project for the United States," IV (September 1846), 410–15; "The Twenty-Ninth Congress," V (May 1847), 433–46.
- 86. Virtually every economic statistic available bears out this portrait. Exports in merchandise and grain exceeded imports, but imports of gold and silver dramatically exceeded exports in 1847. The value of wheat exports jumped 300 percent in 1847 over 1846. Circulating currency expanded by 15.7 percent in 1847, even though state bank note circulation dropped slightly that year. Government receipts were down and deficits up, but the wholesale price index rose from 83 in 1845 and 1846 to 90 in 1847. For the relevant tables, see Historical Statistics, pp. 203, 886, 899, 993, 1104, and 1106. For Walker's financing of the war, see Shenton, Walker, pp. 87–98, and Cohen, Business and Politics, pp. 40–62.
 - 87. Meredith P. Gentry to William B. Campbell, February 20, 1847, CFP; American Review, V (May 1847), 436; New York Tribune, August 23, 1847; Daniel Ullmann to Henry Clay, July 12, 1847, Henry Clay MSS (LC).

- 88. Meredith P. Gentry to Daniel Webster, April 13, 1848, Webster MSS.
- 89. For North Carolina, see the sources cited in note 80; the North Carolina Whig platform of 1848 is printed in the National Intelligencer (Washington), March 2, 1848. The figures on New York are based on a content analysis of party addresses in Harp, "Character of Party Dialogue," pp. 30–32. Only the Hunker address in 1847 focused on national economic policy; the Barnburner address that year concentrated on slavery expansion and the internal party dispute. My analysis of Pennsylvania rests on my Forging a Majority, pp. 49–53. The quotation is from the resolutions of the Allegheny County Convention, Pittsburgh Morning Post, January 13, 1848. For more on the Democrats and the tariff issue in Pennsylvania, see Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, pp. 194–202. Despite their defense of the Walker Tariff, Democrats still tried to shift attention to other matters; 51 percent of the space in their 1847 and 1848 platforms was devoted to the Mexican War.
- 90. The best study of the popular reaction to the war is Johannsen, To the Halls. For Polk's denunciation of the Whigs in his annual messages of December 1846 and December 1847, see Schroeder, Polk's War, pp. 63–64, 148–49.
 - 91. Johannsen, To the Halls, pp. 68-143 and passim.
- 92. The summary of Whig arguments against the war in this and subsequent paragraphs is based on the sources listed in note 51. For attacks on Walker's requests for duties on tea and coffee, see the New York Tribune, December 18, 1846, January 4, 8, March 2, 1847.
- 93. New York Tribune, June 2, 9, 11, 18, 1846, January 12, 25, 1847; Daniel Webster to Fletcher Webster, April 18, 1847, Webster MSS; Winfield Scott to Robert P. Letcher, June 5, 1846, Crittenden MSS (Duke). On Ringgold, see Johannsen, To the Halls, pp. 123–27. For fuller accounts of the hostile relations between Generals Taylor and Scott and the Polk administration, see Hamilton, Zachary Taylor, pp. 217–230; Elliott, Scott, pp. 417–596; and "The Administration: Its Treatment of General Scott," The American Review, I (June 1848), 553–72. The American Review renumbered its volumes beginning in 1848.
- 94. Corwin's speech quoted in Graebner, "Corwin and the Election of 1848," 163. The activities of Giddings and other extreme antiwar Whigs are covered extensively in Schroeder, Polk's War, pp. 29–32 and passim, and Stewart, Giddings, pp. 110–40. For vivid examples of Giddings' scornful attitude toward his fellow Whigs, see Giddings to J. A. Giddings, December 20, 1846, January 4, 1847, Giddings MSS; and Giddings to Horace Greeley, December 27, 1846, Giddings-Julian MSS. Scores of letters in the Giddings MSS and the Adams Family Papers for 1846 and 1847 document this intraparty feud, as well as Giddings' link with the Young Whigs of Massachusetts.
- 95. Donald, Sumner, pp. 140-59; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 114-22; Stewart, Giddings, pp. 110-40; Schroeder, Polk's War, pp. 59-62.
 - 96. David Campbell to William B. Campbell, December 24, 1846, CFP.
- 97. National Intelligencer, February 28, 1848; Schroeder, Polk's War, pp. 155–56; Johannsen, To the Halls, pp. 164–74.
 - 98. Schroeder, Polk's War, p. 46; Foner, "Wilmot Proviso"; Morrison, Democratic Politics.
- 99. New York Tribune, August 12, 1846; Schroeder, Mr. Polk's War, p. 49; Columbus Delano to Joshua R. Giddings, August 25, 1846, Giddings MSS.
- 100. See, for example, the reports on Whig and Democratic positions in Congress and the New York legislature in the New York Tribune, January 23, 27, 1847; Joshua R. Giddings to Charles Francis Adams, August 12, 1847, Adams Family Papers.
- 101. Walton, "Elections to the Thirtieth Congress;" Schroeder, Polk's War, pp. 82–88; John McLean to John Teesdale, April 6, 1847, McLean MSS (OHS).
- 102. My views on the southern stake in the Proviso issue are further elaborated in Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 52–56. See also Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 238–44; Lander, Reluctant Imperialists, pp. 63, 71–73, and passim.
 - 103. Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 228; Schroeder, Polk's War, p. 86.
- 104. Augusta Daily Chronicle and Sentinel, May 18, June 17, 1847, quoted in Schroeder, Polk's War, p. 124; William B. Campbell to David Campbell, November 20, 1847, CFP. For additional statements by southern Whigs that acquisition would endanger, not benefit, the South, see Alfred Dockery to Duncan McLaurin, January 9, 1847, McLaurin MSS; William Ballard Preston to William C. Rives, February 28, 1847, Rives MSS; Richmond Whig, March 27, 1847; and Rives to David Campbell, September 13, 1847, CFP.

105. Daniel P. King to Charles Francis Adams, January 17, 1847, Giddings to Adams, August 12, 1847, Adams Family Papers; Charles Sumner to Giddings, January 22, 1847, Giddings MSS.

106. Ohio State Journal, April 13, 1847, quoted in Schroeder, Polk's War, p. 124; see ibid., pp. 86–87, for votes in Congress; Richard W. Thompson to ?, June 8, 1847, draft, Thompson MSS (Ind.SL); Corwin to Thomas B. Stevenson, September 23, 1847, Stevenson MSS. See also John McLean to William C. Rives, February 27, 1847, Rives MSS; and McLean to John Teesdale, April 16, 1847, McLean MSS (OHS).

- 107. Philadelphia North American and United States Gazette, March 12, 1847; New York Tribune, October 9, 1847; Washington National Intelligencer, January 26, 1848.
 - 108. Dalzell, Webster, pp. 122-41.
 - 109. New York Tribune, December 4, 1847.
- 110. Corwin to Crittenden, September 2, 1847, Corwin MSS (OHS); Corwin to Thomas B. Stevenson, December 10, 1847, Stevenson MSS; Andrew S. Fulton to David Campbell, January 1848, CFP; Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, January 24, 1848, Winthrop MSS.
- 111. Schroeder, Polk's War, pp. 89, 124–41; Johannsen, To the Halls, p. 130; New York Tribune, November 16, 1847; "The President's Message—The War," The American Review, I (January 1848), 1–14; "The National Finances: The War Debt," The American Review, I (February 1848), 170–78.
 - 112. William H. Underwood to John M. Berrien, December 19, 1847, Berrien MSS.
 - 113. New York Tribune, October 19, 1847.
- 114. Truman Smith to William C. Rives, December 17, 1847, Rives to Jno. C. Pendleton, December 28, 1847, Rives MSS; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, December 20, 1847, January 7, 1848, Outlaw MSS; Andrew S. Fulton to David Campbell, January 1848, CFP.
- 115. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, January 23, 1848, Outlaw MSS; Alexander H. H. Stuart to Richard W. Thompson, February 9, 1848, Thompson MSS (Lincoln National Life Foundation). 116. Truman Smith to Rives, October 18, 1847, Rives MSS.

CHAPTER 9

- 1. Thomas Dorr to Edmund Burke, January 13, 1848, Burke MSS; see sources listed in notes 2 and 3, Chapter 8.
- 2. William H. Seward to Thurlow Weed, February 5, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Dorr to Burke, January 13, 1848, Burke MSS; New York Tribune, January 24, 1848.
- 3. Poage, Clay, p. 152; Clay to John J. Crittenden, November 28, 1844, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 223–25.
- 4. Daniel Webster to Edward Everett, December 15, 1844, Everett MSS; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 95.
- 5. Moses Stuart to Webster, August 3, 1846, Edward Everett to Webster, December 5, 1846, Webster to James A. Hamilton, June 16, July 1, 1847, and Webster to Thomas Butler King, July 1, 1847, Webster MSS.
 - 6. Dalzell, Webster, pp. 114-41.
 - 7. Ibid., pp. 256-57.
 - 8. Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 1-10; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 80-84.
- 9. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 80–82; James Harvey to McLean, April 24, 1846 and McLean to Harvey, May 1, 1846, draft, McLean MSS (LC); McLean to John Teesdale, December 11, 1846, McLean MSS (OHS); Elisha Whittlesey to William C. Rives, August 30, 1846, Rives MSS.
- 10. William Miner to McLean, April 24, 1846, McLean MSS (LC); John B. Mower to Willie P. Mangum, June 8, 1846, James E. Harvey to Mangum, August 25, October 24, 1846, in The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 448–49, 479–81, 500–502, 515–16; Elisha Whittlesey to William C. Rives, August 30, 1846, James Lyon to Rives, November 11, 1844, James F. Strother to Rives, November 17, 1844, and McLean to Rives, February 19, 1846, Rives MSS. Harvey, one of the most influential behind-the-scenes players in the Whig party, was simultaneously the Washington correspondent for the Philadelphia North American, the Boston Atlas, the Richmond Whig, and a Maryland paper. James E. Harvey to Daniel Webster, June 11, 1846, Webster MSS.

- 11. A. H. Shepperd to Willie P. Mangum, May 20, 1846, George C. Collins to Mangum, July 14, 1846, The Mangum Papers, IV, pp. 438–39, 455–57; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 7.
- 12. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 84–85; McLean to John Teesdale, October 16, 1846, McLean MSS (OHS).
- 13. William J. Hough to William Allen, December 9, 1844, Allen MSS (LC); New York Tribune, November 8, 1844; T. B. King to Winfield Scott, February 15, 1845, draft, King MSS; Corwin to Oran Follett, March 13, 1845, quoted in Rayback, Free Soil, p. 3.
- 14. William H. Seward to Thurlow Weed, January 6, 1846, Weed MSS (RU); Arthur Campbell to James Campbell, March 8, 1846, CFP; John J. Crittenden to Robert P. Letcher, March 9, 1846, Crittenden MSS (Duke); Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 3–4.
- 15. Elliott, Scott, pp. 425–29; William S. Robinson to William Schouler, June 12, 1846, Schouler MSS; Amos Sawyer to Thurlow Weed, June 22, 1846, Weed MSS (RU); Boston Courier, June 15, 1846, quoted in Rayback, Free Soil, p. 5.
- 16. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 84; Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 9–10; W. Jones to William C. Rives, February 27, 1847, Rives MSS; Seward to Weed, late February 1847, in Seward at Washington, pp. 37–38; McLean to Teesdale, December 22, 1846, February 7, 1847, McLean MSS (OHS).
 - 17. John J. Crittenden to George B. Kinkead, January 10, 1847, Crittenden MSS (Duke).
- 18. Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, August 16, 1845, Orth MSS; Orth to Colfax, February 11, May 9, 1847, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 39, 384–89; T. H. Nelson to Richard W. Thompson, July 5, 1847, Thompson MSS (Ind.SL).
- 19. Everett to Webster, December 5, 1846, Webster MSS; C. F. Adams to Joshua R. Giddings, May 19, 1847, Giddings MSS.
- 20. Clay to John S. Littell, November 17, 1846, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Clay to John Pendleton Kennedy, December 27, 1846, Kennedy MSS; Clay to John M. Clayton, April 16, 1847, Clayton MSS; Clay to Henry White, November 27, 1846, in The Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 537–38; Walter Forward to Millard Fillmore, October 26, 1846, MFP-O.
- 21. Clay to Clayton, April 16, 1847, Clayton MSS; Clay to Ullmann, May 12, 1847, Ullmann to Clay, July 12, 1847, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 22. Corwin to Thomas Ewing, August 1, 1846, EFP; Robert Young to McLean, December 25, 1846, McLean MSS (LC).
- 23. Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 9–10; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 84–88; Wm. Miner to McLean, September 28, 1846, James Harvey to McLean, October 12, 1846, Robt. Young to McLean, December 25, 1846, John Teesdale to McLean, April 28, 1847, McLean MSS (LC); McLean to Teesdale, September 26, December 11, 1846, McLean MSS (OHS); Schenck to T. B. King, October 26, 1846, King MSS. For evidence of Corwin's hesitancy to become a candidate, see Corwin to William Greene, May 30, June 7, July 25, 1847, in Hamlin, "William Greene Papers," 18–23.
- 24. Seward to Thurlow Weed, late February 1847, in Seward at Washington, pp. 37–38; Ohio State Journal, February 20, 1847, quoted in Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 84; Henry Wilson to Joshua R. Giddings, February 6, 1847, Greeley to Giddings, April 24, 1847, Giddings MSS.
- 25. McLean to Teesdale, September 26, December 11, 1846, February 7, 1847, McLean MSS (OHS).
- 26. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 85–86; McLean to Rives, February 27, 1847, Rives MSS; McLean to Teesdale, April 6, 1847, McLean MSS (OHS); Thomas B. Stevenson to John J. Crittenden, May 1, 1847, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 27. Joshua R. Giddings to Joseph A. Giddings, January 31, 1846, William Slade to J. R. Giddings, April 27, 1846, C. F. Adams to J. R. Giddings, December 16, 1846, Charles Sumner to J. R. Giddings, January 7, 21, 22, 1847; and Henry Wilson to Giddings, February 6, April 10, 1847, Giddings MSS; J. R. Giddings to Horace Greeley, December 24, 1846, Giddings-Julian MSS.

Notes Notes

- 28. J. R. Giddings to C. F. Adams, April 16, 1847, Adams Family Papers; Giddings to Horace Greeley, April 16, 1847, Giddings-Julian MSS.
- 29. Greeley to Giddings, April 24, 1847, Giddings MSS; Henry Wilson to Giddings, April 10, 1847, Giddings to C. F. Adams, March 15, 1847, Adams Family Papers.
- 30. Graebner, "Corwin and the Election of 1848"; Wilson to Giddings, April 10, 1847, Adams Family Papers; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 89–90; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 94; Corwin to Thomas B. Stevenson, September 23, 1847, Stevenson MSS.
- 31. Giddings to C. F. Adams, August 12, December 7, 1847, January 10, 1848, C. F. Adams to John G. Palfrey, December 11, 23, 1847, Adams Family Papers.
 - 32. W. Jones to William C. Rives, February 27, 1847, Rives MSS.
- 33. Calhoun quoted in Rayback, Free Soil, p. 28; George W. Crawford to John M. Berrien, February 23, 1847, Berrien MSS.
 - 34. Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 30-33; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 234-38.
 - 35. William B. Preston to William C. Rives, February 28, 1847, Rives MSS.
- 36. Florida Sentinel quoted in Rayback, Free Soil, p. 42; McLean to Teesdale, April 29, 1847, McLean MSS (OHS). The most forceful case that southern Whig support for Taylor was motivated primarily by the need to neutralize the Proviso issue by running a slaveholding candidate is made in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 244–53.
 - 37. Meredith P. Gentry to William B. Campbell, February 20, 1847, CFP.
- 38. J. J. Crittenden to G. B. Kinkead, January 10, 1847, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 268–69; ZT:SWH, p. 64.
- 39. Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 203–5, Taylor to Crittenden, May 15, 1847, quoted p. 205; Taylor to Crittenden, January 26, 1847, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 270–78; Crittenden to Taylor, March 23, 1847, Crittenden MSS (Duke); ZT:SWH, p. 40.
- 40. For a superb assessment of Taylor's military record in Mexico, see Bauer, Zachary Taylor, pp. 166–214. The battle of Buena Vista actually began on February 22, 1847, Washington's Birthday, a fact that would later prove to be of great symbolic significance.
- 41. Caleb B. Smith to J. R. Giddings, May 21, 1847, Horace Greeley to Giddings, April 24, 1847, Giddings MSS; George Ashmun to Daniel Webster, June 14, 1847, Webster MSS; James E. Harvey to Willie P. Mangum, June 3, 1847, in The Mangum Papers, V, pp. 65–68; Seward to his wife, March 31, 1847, in Seward at Washington, p. 42; Weed to ?, April 3, 1847, Weed MSS (LC); F. H. Davidge to Mangum, August 1, 1847, Mangum MSS (SHC, UNC).
- 42. Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 41–55; Edward S. Harden to Howell Cobb, May 3, 1847, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 87–88; James Hamilton to John C. Calhoun, April 24, 1847, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 1117–19; James Edward Henry to Samuel F. Patterson, August 24, 1847, Patterson MSS.
- 43. Poage, Clay, p. 155; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 48, quote from Cincinnati Signal, p. 49; Clay to Crittenden, September 26, 1847, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 44. ZT:SWH, pp. 21-24; Nevins, Ordeal: Fruits, pp. 198-99; Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 36-44.
- 45. Holman Hamilton disagrees with this traditional portrait and presents Taylor as a shrewd political strategist in ZT:SWH, pp. 41–51. In contrast, K. Jack Bauer's more recent biography reasserts the traditional critique of naiveté; Bauer, Zachary Taylor, pp. 215–38.
- 46. Zachary Taylor to Jefferson Davis, August 16, 1847, draft, Taylor to ?, December 16, 1847, draft, Taylor to Joseph Taylor, January 1, 1848, draft, Taylor to William M. Murphy, et al., January 23, 1848, draft, Taylor MSS (LC); Taylor to Cincinnati Signal, May 12, 1847, quoted in Rayback, Free Soil, p. 50; Taylor to Crittenden, September 15, 1847, March 25, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); ZT:SWH, pp. 40–47.
- 47. Taylor to Crittenden, December 16, 1847, Crittenden MSS (LC); ZT:SWH, p. 43; Taylor to Robert C. Wood, September 27, 1847, in Samson, Letters of Zachary Taylor, pp. 131–37; Taylor to Jefferson Davis, August 16, 1847, Taylor MSS. Davis married Taylor's daughter Sarah Knox Taylor in June 1835, but she died within three months of the wedding.
- 48. Alexander Bowie to John C. Calhoun, April 13, 1847, Duff Green to Calhoun, April 16, 1847, R. K. Crallé to Calhoun, April 18, 1847, and Fitzwilliam Byrdsall to Calhoun, July 19, 1847, in Jameson, "Correspondence of Calhoun," pp. 1107–27.

- 49. Stoddard Judge to N. P. Tallmadge, March 10, 1847, W. M. Bayard to Tallmadge, July 1847, N. T. Eldridge to Tallmadge, August 12, 1847, Philip Potter to Tallmadge, October 15, 1847, Tallmadge MSS.
 - 50. Preston to Rives, December 18, 1847, Rives MSS.
- 51. John P. Kennedy to Thomas Turner, May 4, 1847, copy, Kennedy MSS; Iverson S. Harris to John M. Berrien, May 9, 1847, Berrien MSS; Berrien to Webster, June 21, 1847, Webster MSS; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 44; Walton, "Elections to the Thirtieth Congress."
- 52. McLean to John Teesdale, April 29, 1847, McLean MSS (OHS); Daniel Ullmann to Henry Clay, July 12, 1847, Botts to Clay, August 24, 1847, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Joseph L. White to Clay, September 4, 1847, Crittenden MSS (Duke); David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, February 11, 23, 1848, Outlaw MSS.
- 53. John Bell to Wm. B. Campbell, December 23, 1847, CFP; Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, May 9, 1847, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 39, 386–89; Caleb B. Smith to Allen Hamilton, February 15, 1848, Hamilton MSS; Nathan K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, January 9, 1848, MFP-O; Stevenson to Crittenden, May 1, 1847, Crittenden MSS (LC); Stevenson to Caleb B. Smith, March 6, 1848, Smith MSS.
- 54. Columbus Delano to Joshua R. Giddings, May 25, 1847, Giddings MSS; George W. Patterson to Thurlow Weed, January 28, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Caleb B. Smith to Allen Hamilton, February 15, 1848, Hamilton MSS; Hall to Fillmore, January 9, 1848, MFP-O; Thomas B. Stevenson to J. J. Crittenden, September 1, 1847, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 55. Wilson to Giddings, April 10, 1847, Giddings MSS; Charles Hudson to William Schouler, June 28, 1847, Schouler MSS; Stevenson to Crittenden, May 1, September 1, 1847, Crittenden MSS (LC); Corwin to Crittenden, September 2, 1847, Corwin MSS (OHS); New York Tribune, August 12, October 14, 1847; James Dunlap to John McLean, December 29, 1847, McLean MSS (LC); Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, September 9, 1847, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 39, 389–90; William P. Walker to David Davis, September 5, 1847, David Davis MSS; Smith to Allen Hamilton, February 15, 1848, Hamilton MSS.
- 56. Zachary Taylor to Jefferson Davis, July 27, August 16, September 18, 1847, April 20, 1848, in McIntosh, et al., ed., Papers of Jefferson Davis, pp. 198–204, 208–14, 217–23, 304–11; Zachary Taylor to Joseph P. Taylor, January 1, 1848, Taylor MSS.
- 57. N. T. Eldridge to P. Potter, October 7, 1847, Tallmadge MSS; John McLean to Thomas Ewing, October 6, 1847, EFP; Seward to Home, October 14, 1847, in Seward at Washington, p. 55.
- 58. John Minor Botts to Clay, quoting a letter from Clay, August 24, 1847, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 59. Clay to Epes Sargent, February 15, 1847, quoted in Brock, Political Conscience, p. 185; Poage, Clay, p. 159; New York Tribune, September 11, 1847; Peter Sken Smith to Clay, November 6, 1847, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Clay to Horace Greeley, December 10, 1847, De Coppet Collection; Greeley to William E. Robinson, February 8, 1848, Greeley MSS (NYPL). A copy of Clay's Lexington Address can be found in The Tribune Almanac for 1848, pp. 7–16.
- Poage, Clay, p. 160; E. C. Wines to Clay, August 16, 1847, in The Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 547–48.
- 61. Poage, Clay, pp. 159–61; Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 125–26; Clay to Daniel Ullmann, August 11, 1847, in Works of Henry Clay, V, pp. 543–45; Thomas B. Stevenson to J. J. Crittenden, September 1, 1847, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 62. Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 125–26; Greeley to Joshua R. Giddings, April 24, 1847, Giddings MSS; New York Tribune, September 3, 1847; Poage, Clay, p. 162; Van Deusen, Greeley, pp. 119–21; Thomas J. Dowling to John McLean, October 30, 1847, McLean MSS (LC); Joseph L. White to Crittenden, June 28, 1847, Crittenden MSS; White to Clay, September 4, 1847, Crittenden MSS (Duke).
- 63. White to Clay, September 4, 1847, Crittenden MSS (Duke); Clay to Crittenden, September 21, 26, 1847, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 64. Clay to Crittenden, September 21, 26, 1847, Henry Clay MSS (LC); copy of Robertson's Lexington Circular, October 1847, Clayton MSS; Robertson to Berrien, November 30, 1847, Berrien MSS.

- 65. Taylor to Clay, November 4, 1847, Henry Clay MSS (LC). The gist of Clay's letter of September 27, 1847, must be inferred from Taylor's reply.
 - 66. Clay to Daniel Ullmann, August 11, 1847, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 67. Cleveland True Democrat quoted in the New York Tribune, October 11, 1847. Edited by E. S. Hamlin in 1847, the True Democrat would subsequently become a leading Free Soil paper in Ohio.
 - 68. New York Tribune, October 11, 1847.
- 69. Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 210–24; "Mr. Clay's Resolutions," The American Review, VI (December 1847), 553–60.
 - 70. The Lexington Address is printed in The Tribune Almanac for 1848, pp. 7-16.
- 71. W. H. Seward to Frances Seward, January 19, 1848, in Seward at Washington, p. 60; Washington National Intelligencer, January 28, March 2, 1848; Luther J. Glenn to Howell Cobb, December 1, 1847, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," p. 89.
- 72. J. B. Mower to McLean, December 6, 12, 1847, Thomas Dowling to McLean, December 7, 1847, McLean MSS (LC); N. K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, January 9, 1848, MFP-O; New York Tribune, November 26, 1847, January 10, 1848; Seward to Frances Seward, January 19, 1848, in Seward at Washington, p. 60; Seward to Weed, January 10, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).
- 73. N. K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, January 9, 1848, MFP-O; Truman Smith to William C. Rives, December 17, 1847, Rives to John C. Pendleton, December 28, 1847, draft, Rives MSS; Andrew S. Fulton to David Campbell, January 1848, CFP; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, December 20, 1847, January 7, 23, 1848, Outlaw MSS. Two virulently antiwar Whigs, Joshua R. Giddings of Ohio and John Gorham Palfrey of Massachusetts, as well as Amos Tuck, a product of the coalition among Liberty men, Whigs, and Hale Democrats in New Hampshire, voted against Winthrop, thereby disgusting regular Whigs at the fanaticism of antiwar zealots. See Ezra Lincoln to William Schouler, December 12, 1847, Schouler MSS.
- 74. Lexington Address in Tribune Almanac for 1848, pp. 7–16; Clay to Greeley, December 10, 1847, De Coppet Collection; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 148; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 252; Marian Henry to Gustavus A. Henry, January 1848, Henry MSS; William P. McConnell to Thomas Butler King, March 6, 1848, King MSS; John P. Kennedy to Richard Pakenham, November 28, 1847, copy, Kennedy MSS; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, January 19, 21, 1848, Outlaw MSS.
- 75. Franklin W. Bowden to William P. Browne, November 24, 1847, Browne MSS; Charles Jenkins to John M. Berrien, December 13, 1847, March 11, 1848, Iverson L. Harris to Berrien, December 15, 1847, Berrien MSS; David Campbell to William B. Campbell, November 24, 1847, CFP; E. J. Hale to Daniel M. Barringer, January 21, 1848, Barringer MSS; William Ballard Preston to Rives, December 18, 1847, Rives MSS; Thomas M. Peters to George S. Houston, March 1, 1848, Houston MSS; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 225–68.
- 76. New York Tribune, November 19, 25, 26, December 21, 1847, January 24, 27, 1848; Albany Evening Journal quoted in Poage, Clay, pp. 166–67; Trenton State Gazette quoted in Rayback, Free Soil, p. 128; Samuel Hannah to Caleb B. Smith, January 25, 1848, Smith MSS; Harry Bradley to Millard Fillmore, February 18, 1848, MFP-O; James F. Babcock to Roger Sherman Baldwin, February 12, 1848, BFP; Thomas Dowling to McLean, December 7, 1847, McLean MSS (LC).
- 77. Thomas Dowling to McLean, December 7, 1847, J. B. Mower to McLean, January 3, 1848, H. Vallette to McLean, January 26, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); N. K. Hall to Fillmore, December 30, 1847, MFP-O; Seward to Weed, January 20, 1848, Weed MSS (RU). See also Samuel Hannah to Caleb B. Smith, January 25, 1848, and William H. Barnett to Smith, February 8, 1848, Smith MSS; and Jno. Ewing to George Dunn, February 9, 1848, Dunn MSS.
- 78. William Seward to Frances Seward, November 1847, in Seward at Washington, pp. 57–58; Charles Francis Adams to John Gorham Palfrey, December 11, 23, 1847, Giddings to C. F. Adams, January 10, 1848, Adams Family Papers; Samuel Galloway to John McLean, January 10, 1848, misdated 1847, McLean MSS (LC).
- 79. Thomas Dowling to McLean, October 30, December 23, 1847, February 26, 1848, John Teesdale to McLean, February 9, 1848, misdated 1847, J. B. Mower to McLean, February 15, 21, March 12, April 2, 19, 24, May 15, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); Greeley to Clay, November 30, 1847, Henry Clay to Wife, February 18, 1848, Clay to James B. Clay, February 1, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); New York Tribune, January 25, 1848; Cyrus Prentiss to Weed, January 28, 1848, Weed MSS (LC).

- 80. Truman Smith to Rives, October 18, 1847, Rives MSS.
- 81. Thomas Dorr to Edmund Burke, January 13, 1848, Burke MSS; Seward to Weed, February 5, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).

CHAPTER 10

- 1. Joshua R. Giddings to Charles Francis Adams, December 15, 1847, Adams Family Papers.
- 2. Seward to Frances Seward, January 19, 23, 29, 1848, in Seward at Washington, pp. 60-62.
 - 3. Seward to Frances Seward, January 29, 1848, ibid., p. 62.
- 4. See Seward's letters cited in note 2; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, January 21, 1848, Outlaw MSS; John J. Crittenden to Albert T. Burnley, January 8, 1848, Crittenden MSS (Duke); Giddings to Adams, December 15, 1847, Adams Family Papers.
 - 5. ZT:SWH, pp. 63–65.
- 6. Ibid, p. 43; Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 49–50. So widespread was this belief that as late as February 1848 New York's free-soil Barnburner Democrats considered making him their own candidate. J. R. Doolittle to Mary Doolittle, February 12, 1848, and Doolittle to Zachary Taylor, February 22, 1848, Doolittle MSS.
- 7. For the details of Georgia's Senate election, see Walton, "Georgia's Biennial Legislatures," 140–55. Berrien was sixty-six at the start of 1848. Dawson was sixteen years younger, and Stephens and Toombs were thirty-six and thirty-seven, respectively.
- 8. Berrien to Daniel Webster, June 21, 1847, Webster MSS; Walton, "Georgia's Biennial Legislatures," pp. 145–46. Berrien was elected on November 15. The Milledgeville Southern Recorder, the major Whig paper in the state capital, did not carry stories of Clay's speech until November 23, 1847.
- 9. Berrien to Webster, June 21, 1847, Webster MSS; J. S. Locke to Berrien, July 4, 1847, Iverson L. Harris to Berrien, December 15, 1847, Berrien MSS.
- 10. See Table 23 for the Democratic drop-off rate in 1847. For the vote in Flournoy's district, see Congressional Quarterly, Guide to U.S. Elections (Washington, 1975), p. 586. Because Whigs generally ran better in slaveholding than in nonslaveholding regions of the South and because three-fifths of the slaves counted in the apportionment of congressional districts within slave states, the total number of voters in southern congressional districts carried by Whigs was usually considerably lower than the total turnout in northern congressional districts. Even so, the 1,300 votes cast in Flournoy's district was an unusually small vote.
- 11. John C. Pendleton to Rives, November 19, 1847, William Ballard Preston to Rives, December 18, 1847, James Lyons to Rives, February 16, 1848, Rives MSS.
- 12. Boritt, Lincoln, pp. 63–147; Abraham Lincoln to T. S. Flournoy, February 17, 1848, to Usher F. Linder, February 20, March 22, 1848, and to Jesse Lynch, April 10, 1848, in Collected Works of Lincoln, I, pp. 452–64.
- 13. Truman Smith to Rives, October 18, 1847, Rives MSS; Truman Smith to Daniel M. Barringer, May 1, 1852, Barringer MSS; James Babcock to Roger Sherman Baldwin, February 12, 1848, Baldwin Family Papers. Hamilton in ZT:SWH, p. 63, asserts that Crittenden encouraged Smith to form the Young Indians, but his evidence for that statement is unclear.
- 14. Seward to Weed, January 20, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Hall to Fillmore, December 28, 1847, MFP-O; David to Emily Outlaw, January 21, 1848, Outlaw MSS; Giddings to Adams, December 15, 1847, Adams Family Papers.
- 15. Hall to Fillmore, December 28, 1847, MFP-O; ZT:SWH, pp. 63–64; E. J. Hale to Daniel M. Barringer, January 4, 1848, Barringer MSS; John Ewing to George Dunn, February 9, 1848, Dunn MSS; Lincoln to Usher Linder, March 22, 1848, Collected Works of Lincoln, I, pp. 457–58. Without naming them, Lincoln asserted that in addition to himself and Smith, there were two Whigs from Indiana, three from Ohio, five from Pennsylvania, and four from New Jersey in the Taylor group. Dunn was a freshman from a normally Democratic district. Like Flournoy, he had won by a single vote out of a total of 15,000 in 1847, so his preference for a No Party campaign is understandable.

- 16. John Gayle to William Crawford, December 11, 1847, Sarah Crawford MSS (Duke); Hall to Fillmore, December 28, 30, 1847, January 9, 1848, MFP-O; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, January 19, 28, 30, 1848, Outlaw MSS; John Bell to William B. Campbell, December 23, 1847, CFP; E. J. Hale to Daniel M. Barringer, January 4, 1848, Barringer MSS.
- 17. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, January 28, 30, 1848, Outlaw MSS; Hall to Fillmore, January 28, 1848, MFP-O; Washington National Intelligencer, February 5, 1848.
- 18. Fillmore to James Woods, February 5, 1848, De Coppet Collection; Franklin Pierce to Edmund Burke, February 1, 1848, Burke MSS; Godlove Orth to Caleb B. Smith, January 30, 1848, Smith MSS; John McLean to John Teesdale, February 7, 1848, McLean MSS (OHS); John Ewing to George Dunn, February 9, 1848, Dunn MSS.
- 19. William Rockhill to Allen Hamilton, January 15, 1848, Hamilton MSS; Poage, Clay, pp. 168–69; Seward to Frances Seward, January 19, 29, 1848, in Seward at Washington, pp. 60–62; Seward to Weed, January 20, 22, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Henry Clay to James B. Clay, February 1, 1848, Clay to H. L. Duncan, February 15, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
 - 20. Orth to Caleb Smith, January 30, 1848, Smith MSS.
- 21. New York Tribune, October 9, 1847, February 15, 1848; Washington National Intelligencer, February 7, March 25, April 29, 1848; Z. Collins Lee to John McLean, March 24, 1848, McLean MSS (LC).
- 22. The southern states that chose all delegates at a state convention included Texas, Arkansas, Missouri, Mississippi, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, North Carolina, and Virginia. Rayback, Free Soil, p. 158.
- 23. New York Tribune, January 24, 27, 1848; Bergeron, Antebellum Politics in Tennessee, pp. 90, 95.
- 24. John H. Sanders to McLean, January 12, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); Samuel Hannah to Caleb B. Smith, January 25, 1848, Godlove Orth to Smith, January 30, 1848, and William H. Bennett to Smith, February 8, 1848, Smith MSS.
- 25. Thomas Corwin to William Greene, December 24, 1847, January 24, 1848, in Hamlin, "William Greene Papers," 25–27; William H. Seward to Frances Seward, January 23, 1848, in Seward at Washington, p. 62.

My account of the Ohio Whig convention in this and subsequent paragraphs is based on the following: Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 159–62; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 90–93; letters to John McLean in the McLean MSS (LC) from John Teesdale, December 15, 1847, January 4, 7, 11, 19, 20, February 9, 1848, Samuel Galloway, January 7, 10, 1848, William Miner, December 25, 26, 1847, January 8, 21, 1848, J. C. Wright, January 7, 1848; McLean to John Teesdale, December 25, 1847, McLean MSS (OHS); National Intelligencer, January 26, 1848; and Henry Stanbery, January 14, 1848, A. Banning Norton, January 20, 1848, Philemon B. Ewing, January 20, 1848, Dr. Boerstler, January 22, 1848, and N. H. Swayne, January 23, 1848, all to Thomas Ewing, EFP.

- 26. McLean's paper, the Cincinnati Gazette, and McLean in private correspondence had taken a position on territorial acquisition and the Wilmot Proviso, but McLean had made no public statement that rank-and-file Whigs could identify as his. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 90.
- 27. An undated newspaper fragment of the January 7 letter is in the McLean MSS (LC); A. Banning Norton to Thomas Ewing, January 20, 1848, EFP.
- 28. Specifically, the territorial plank read: "Resolved, that we deprecate a war of conquest, and strenuously oppose the forceful acquisition of Mexican Territory; but if additional territory be forced upon us, or acquired by the nation, we shall demand that there 'shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude therein, otherwise than for punishment of crime." The quoted words were taken from the Wilmot Proviso. Washington National Intelligencer, January 26, 1848.
 - 29. Henry Stanbery to Thomas Ewing, January 14, 1848, EFP.
 - 30. A. Banning Norton to Thomas Ewing, January 20, 1848, EFP; for the subsequent efforts of McLean's friends, see J. C. Wright to McLean, February 21, 1848, and the numerous letters from Teesdale to McLean in February, March, and April 1848 McLean MSS (LC).

- 31. Teesdale to McLean, February 9, 26, 28, March 2, 6, 1848, J. C. Wright to McLean, March 3, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); McLean to Teesdale, March 1, 1848, McLean MSS (OHS); William Bebb to Henry Clay, April 4, 1848, Thomas B. Stevenson MSS.
- 32. Henry Clay to H. L. Duncan, February 15, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); L. C. Holmes to Millard Fillmore, February 4, 1848, MFP-O.
- 33. Clay to Greeley, December 10, 1847, De Coppet Collection; L. C. Holmes to Fillmore, February 4, 1848, MFP-O.
- 34. Seward to Thurlow Weed, February 5, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Dudley Selden to Weed, February 3, 1848, Weed MSS (LC).
- 35. For further background on the divisions in New York, see Carman and Luthin, "Seward-Fillmore Feud"; and Rayback, "Silver Grey Revolt."
- 36. Dalzell, Webster, p. 292; Thomas Dowling to McLean, October 30, December 7, 1847, J. B. Mower to McLean, January 3, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); Greeley to Clay, November 30, 1847, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Hall to Fillmore, December 28, 1847, January 9, 1848, MFP-O.
- 37. Weed and Seward had reason to fear the wrath of New York City conservatives. In 1847, one of them wrote Crittenden that he had only two political objectives: "First the election of Mr. Clay or yourself & secondly the punishment of Seward & Co. for defrauding the country of Mr. Clay in 1840—until these men are destroyed there will be no peace in all Israel and but little of principle." Joseph L. White to Crittenden, June 28, 1847, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 38. Seward to Weed, February 5, Mary 27, 1848, George W. Patterson to Weed, January 28, 1848, Minos McGowan to Weed, March 23, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Rayback, Free Soil, p. 162.
- 39. For different attempts to make sense of the course of Weed, Seward, and Greeley, see Poage, Clay, p. 163; ZT:SWH, pp. 61–63; and Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 162–64.
- 40. Richard M. Blatchford to Seward, February 15, 1848, Seward MSS; Washington Hunt to Weed, February 15, 21, 25, March 19, 30, 1848, Samuel Partridge to Weed, February 22, March 23, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).
- 41. New York Tribune, February 16, 17, 18, 1848; Boston Daily Advertiser, February 18, 1848; David B. Ogden to McLean, January 15, 1848, J. B. Mower to McLean, February 26, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); Nicholas Carroll to Crittenden, February 20, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Poage, Clay, p. 170.
- 42. Hamilton Fish to John M. Berrien, February 22, 1848, Berrien MSS; New York Tribune, February 27, 19, 1848; N. K. Hall to Fillmore, February 23, 1848, MFP-O; Hiram Ketchum to William Pitt Fessenden, March 10, 1848, Fessenden MSS (WRHS). There is a newspaper clipping of the resolution, filed for February 15, 1848, in the Thomas J. Clay Papers with the penciled notation, apparently by Clay's son, that the resolution was a nomination of Clay.
- 43. John P. Kennedy to E. J. Morris et al., February 20, 1848, Kennedy MSS; Edward Joy Morris to Rives, February 15, 1848, Rives MSS; Daniel M. Barringer to Philadelphia Committee, February 16, 1848, draft, Barringer MSS; Lincoln to Taylor Committee, February 9, 1848, Collected Works of Lincoln, I, p. 449.
- 44. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 145; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, February 11, 1848, Outlaw MSS.
- 45. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 146–67; John P. Kennedy to E. Joy Morris, February 20, 1848, Kennedy MSS; George Tucker to William C. Rives, October 26, 1847, Rives MSS; R. J. Arundel to John McLean, October 15, 1847, McLean MSS (LC).
- 46. Daniel Ullmann to Clay, February 18, 1848, Henry Clay MSS; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 146; J. B. Mower to McLean, April 19, 1848; Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 168–69; Edward Joy Morris to J. P. Kennedy, May 6, 1848 (quotation), Kennedy MSS.
- In 1846, 14,000 of the 15,000 Native American votes in the state came from Philadelphia City and County (Mueller, p. 133). In 1847, a Native American gubernatorial candidate attracted 11,247 votes, or about 4 percent of the statewide total.
- 47. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, February 23, 1848, Outlaw MSS; David Davis to Sarah Davis, February 24, 1848, David Davis MSS (CHS); Cornelius Darragh to John McLean, March

- 2, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); Poage, Clay, p. 170; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 147–48. The proceedings of the Buena Vista Celebration (or Festival) were later published in pamphlet form.
 - 48. New York Tribune, February 28, 1848.
 - 49. Peterson, Great Triumvirate, pp. 435–36.
- 50. My account of events in Kentucky in this and subsequent paragraphs is based on: ibid.; Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 211–14; Poage, Clay, pp. 171–73; Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," pp. 38–46; Letcher to Crittenden, January 15, February 16, 21, 1848, John S. Helm to Crittenden, January 11, 1848, P. Swigert to Crittenden, February 24, 1848, John Bibb to Crittenden, December 25, 1847, Addison White to Crittenden, February 5, 1848, Thomas Metcalf to Crittenden, February 8, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); George Robertson to John M. Berrien, February 29, 1848, Berrien MSS; John P. Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, April 16, 1848, Kennedy MSS.
- 51. For the general weakness of governors in the Upper South, see Wooster, Politicians, Planters, and Plain Folk, pp. 57–78, especially pp. 58–59. For the reliance on the coattails of the gubernatorial candidate to help elect legislative candidates, see Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 43–45.
- 52. Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 211–14; P. Swigert to Crittenden, February 24, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); George Robertson to Berrien, February 29, 1848, Berrien MSS; Leslie Combs to Daniel Ullmann, February 24, 1848, Ullmann MSS.

Kirwan's conclusion that the result was a clear defeat for Clay and a victory for Taylor, because Clay did not secure the nomination or committed delegates and because eleven of the twelve chosen favored Taylor, strikes me as untenable. Clay did not seek committed delegates, five of the twelve supported Clay at the convention for three ballots—indeed, Clay was shocked that the others did not—and the pledge to support the nominee of the national convention, given Taylor's position at the time, was a victory for Clay.

- 53. Richmond Enquirer, February 24–29, 1848; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 149; Poage, Clay, p. 173; James Lyons to William C. Rives, February 16, March 1, 1848, R. E. Scott to Rives, February 21, 26, 1848, Rives MSS.
- 54. Kruman, Parties and Politics, p. 119; Washington National Intelligencer, March 2, 1848; E. J. Hale to Daniel M. Barringer, January 4, 21, 1848, Barringer MSS; Augustine Sheppard to Lyndon Swaim, March 21, 1848, Swaim MSS.

Hale feared that a Democrat would run as an independent who attacked convention dictation of nominees, an appeal that would resonate with the many Whigs angered by the tight control over Whig nominations by a central committee drawn from Raleigh and its environs. Instead, the eventual Democratic gubernatorial nominee, David M. Reid, demanded elimination of the property requirement for the right to vote in state senate elections, or equal suffrage, an issue with great appeal to many Whig voters in western North Carolina. Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 85–90, 145–53; Harris, Holden, pp. 28–31.

- 55. Kruman, Parties and Politics, p. 148; London, "Badger"; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, January 19, 23, February 10, 22, 23, 24, 29, March 3, 1848, Outlaw MSS; David L. Swain to William H. Battle, April 7, May 3, 1848, Battle Family Papers. On Mangum's fondness for alcohol, see Brock, Political Conscience, p. 86. The Democratic senator whom Badger replaced had resigned in 1846 rather than obey instructions from the Whig state legislature to vote against the Walker Tariff.
 - 56. New York Tribune, February 24, 1848; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 154.
- 57. Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, February 25, April 7, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Philemon B. Ewing to Thomas Ewing, March 2, 1848, EFP; James Harlan to Caleb B. Smith, March 5, 1848, Thomas B. Stevenson to Smith, March 6, 1848, Smith MSS; E. J. Hale to Daniel M. Barringer, April 7, 1848, Barringer MSS; Orth to Schuyler Colfax, April 29, 1848, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 39, 390–93.
- 58. Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, February 15, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Crittenden to Orlando Brown, March 25, 1848, Crittenden MSS (Duke); "What General Taylor Ought to Say," [March?] 1848, Collected Works of Lincoln, I, p. 454; Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 216–18; ZT: SWH, p. 77.
 - 59. Extract of Taylor to Smith, March 4, 1848, in Truman Smith to Thomas Ewing, n.d.

(May 1848 folder), EFP; Caleb Smith to John McLean, April 10, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); Weed to Patterson, April 9, 1848, quoted in ZT:SWH, p. 74; John Defrees to George Dunn, April 18, 1848, Dunn MSS.

- 60. Meredith P. Gentry to William B. Campbell, April 18, 1848, CFP; James Bowen to Thurlow Weed, April 26, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); James E. Harvey to John McLean, April 27, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); ZT:SWH, pp. 76–77; William C. C. Claiborne to Henry Clay, April 26, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 61. Henry Clay to James B. Clay, February 21, 1848, Thomas J. Clay MSS (LC); Clay to James Harvey, April 1, 1848, David Davis MSS; William Bebb to Clay, April 4, 1848, Stevenson MSS; Thomas B. Stevenson to Clay, April 8, 1848, Clay to S. S. Prentiss, April 12, 1848, Clay to James Brooks, April 13, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Thomas Dowling to John McLean, April 14, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); New York Tribune, April 6, 7, 1848; Poage, Clay, p. 170.

Although the resolution of the New York Whig legislative caucus declared that New York's Whigs preferred Clay's nomination, it did not instruct the state's delegates to vote for him. The lack of such instructions may have reflected Weed's influence, although most observers saw the resolution as a defeat for Weed and Seward (Greeley to Clay, April 28, 1848, Henry Clay MSS). More likely, Whig legislators believed that they could not bind the thirty-four delegates chosen by district conventions. Even without such instructions, the vast majority of New York delegates would vote for Clay at Philadelphia.

- 62. Poage, Clay, pp. 173–75; printed excerpt of April 10 announcement in Henry Clay MSS (LC); Thomas Dowling to John McLean, April 14, Mary 4, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); Meredith Gentry to William B. Campbell, April 18, 1848, CFP.
 - 63. Taylor's letter is reproduced in Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 155-56.
- 64. ZT:SWH, pp. 77–79; William C. C. Claiborne to Clay, April 26, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC). As the three New Orleans men were leaving Baton Rouge on the morning of April 22, Bliss arrived on the same steamboat that was to carry them back to New Orleans. They showed Bliss the Allison Letter, and Bliss pronounced it superior to the various drafts he had brought with him from Washington.
- 65. ZT:SWH, pp. 75–81; Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 218–20; Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 155–57; Crittenden to Clay, May 4, 1848, Crittenden MSS (Duke); Thomas Dowling to McLean, May 4, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); C. S. Morehead to Clay, May 3, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Thomas Ewing to Crittenden, May 26, 1848, draft, EFP.
 - 66. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, February 23, 1848, Outlaw MSS.
 - 67. Charles Jenkins to John M. Berrien, March 11, 1848, Berrien MSS.
- 68. William Rockhill to Chester Stocker, March 6, 1848, Rockhill MSS; Roger Sherman Baldwin to Edward L. Baldwin, March 19, 1848, R. S. Baldwin to Simeon Baldwin, March 19, 1848, BFP; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, February 23, March 6, 21, 1848, Outlaw MSS.
- 69. Nathan K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, February 23, 1848, MFP-O; Duer to Weed, March 7, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).
- 70. Potter, Impending Crisis, pp. 5–6; Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 216–17; R. S. Baldwin to Edward L. Baldwin, February 26, 1848, BFP.
- 71. James F. Babcock to R. S. Baldwin, March 22, 1848, BFP; Mark Howard to James M. Barnard, April 5, 1848, Howard MSS.
- 72. John D. Defrees to Caleb B. Smith, April 4, 1848, Smith MSS; for additional evidence that Whigs thought the Democrats would win an issue-oriented campaign, see Meredith P. Gentry to Daniel Webster, April 13, 1848, Webster MSS.
- 73. Corwin to Crittenden, September 2, 1847, Corwin MSS (OHS); see also Godlove Orth to Caleb Smith, January 30, 1848, Smith MSS.
 - 74. See, for example, Caleb Smith to Allen Hamilton, February 15, 1848, Hamilton MSS.
- 75. Samuel Partridge to Thurlow Weed, March 23, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); John Edwards to George Dunn, April 3, 28, 1848, Dunn MSS; Orth to Schuyler Colfax, April 29, 1848, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 39, 390–93; A. Babcock to Millard Fillmore, April 7, 1848, MFP-O; David Davis to William P. Walker, May 16, 1848, David Davis MSS; J. M. Huntington to John McLean, March 28, 1848, McLean MSS (LC).
 - 76. Harris to Berrien, March 25, 1848, Berrien MSS.

Notes Notes

- 77. Gentry to William B. Campbell, April 18, 1848, CFP. For a modern analysis of how the attempt to win antislavery voters away from the Liberty party caused northern Whigs to internalize antislavery sentiments, thereby pushing northern Whigs to adopt more extreme antislavery positions, see Stewart, "Abolitionists, Insurgents, and Third Parties."
- 78. Toombs to James Thomas, April 16, May 1, 1848, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 103–05; Gentry to William B. Campbell, April 18, 1848, CFP. See also John Bell's letter to Campbell of the same date.
- 79. ZT:SWH, p. 83; Washington Barrow to William B. Campbell, April 1, 1848, David Campbell to W. B. Campbell, March 21, 1848, Gentry and Bell to Campbell, April 18, 1848, CFP; Lucius J. Gartell to Henry Clay, April 15, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); S. S. Locke to Thomas Butler King, May 11, 1848, King MSS; Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 132–33.
- 80. Corwin to Stevenson, April 6, 1848, Stevenson MSS; Stevenson to Clay, April 8, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC). For other references to Mexican law prohibiting slavery in the Cession, see Francis Granger to Thomas Ewing, January 10, 1848, EFP; and Henry L. Benning to Howell Cobb, February 23, 1848, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 97–103.
- 81. Corwin to Clay, May 3, 1848, Stevenson to Clay, May 18, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Clay to Stevenson, May 20, 1848, Stevenson MSS.
- 82. Nathan K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, February 23, 28, 1848, MFP-O; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, February 28, 1848, Outlaw MSS; Caleb Smith to Allen Hamilton, March 26, 1848, Hamilton MSS; Orth to Caleb Smith, January 30, 1848, Smith MSS; Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, March 19, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Thomas Dowling to John McLean, March 24, 1848, McLean MSS (LC).
- 83. Dalzell, Webster, pp. 145–46; Peterson, Great Triumvirate, pp. 439–40; Hiram Ketchum to Fessenden, March 10, 24, April 11, May 1, 30, 1848, Fessenden MSS (WRHS); Charles March to Daniel Webster, April 2, 1848, Webster to Edward Everett, May 22, 1848, Webster MSS.
 - 84. Fillmore to Ketchum, May 9, 1848, MFP-O.
- 85. Thomas Dowling to John McLean, March 24, April 26, 1848, James E. Harvey to McLean, April 12, 1848, John D. Defrees to McLean, April 16, 1848, John B. Mower to McLean, April 20, 24, 1848, Caleb Smith to McLean, March 29, April 22, May 1, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); O. H. Smith to John M. Berrien, May 20, 1848, Berrien MSS.
- 86. Zachary Taylor to Clay, November 4, 1847, Harvey to Clay, May 3, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Harvey to McLean, May 16, 1848, McLean MSS (LC). In a private letter to Clay dated April 30, 1848, Taylor tried to explain away the Richmond Republican letter by disingenuously dissembling that he was in the hands of others who had nominated him and whom he could not betray. They, not he, insisted upon his avowal to remain in the race no matter what the Whig convention did. Only they could withdraw his name.
- 87. Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, April 29, 1848, loc. cit.; Lewis D. Campbell to Caleb B. Smith, May 4, 1848, Smith MSS; Harvey to McLean, May 2, 1848, McLean MSS (LC).
- 88. John Teesdale to John McLean, April 26, 29, 1848, Thomas Dowling to McLean, April 28, May 12, 1848, Caleb Smith to McLean, May 1, 1848, Lewis Benedict to McLean, May 4, 1848, McLean MSS (LC).
- 89. C. W. Hester to George Dunn, April 24, 1848, Dunn MSS; Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, April 17, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).
- 90. Edward McGaughey to Caleb B. Smith, March 15, 1848, Smith MSS; McGaughey to George Dunn, May 23, 1848, Dunn MSS. For evidence of support for Taylor or Scott in different parts of the North, see Greeley to Clay, April 28, May 29, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Washington Hunt to Weed, May 19, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); William H. Bogart to Fillmore, May 9, 1848, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, May 15, 1848, MFP-O; Thomas Ewing to John Sherman, May 26, 1848, EFP; William H. McCrillis to William Pitt Fessenden, May 29, 1848, Fessenden MSS (WRHS); Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, April 29, 1848, loc. cit.
- 91. Thomas Corwin to Caleb Smith, May 10, 1848, Smith MSS; Corwin to Thomas B. Stevenson, March 3, 1848, Stevenson MSS; William Rockhill to Allen Hamilton, March 16, 1848, Hamilton MSS; McClernand to Charles H. Lanphier, May 30, 1848, Lanphier MSS; Thomas B. Stevenson to Clay, May 22, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC).

- 92. Hunt to Weed, March 19, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Orth to Colfax, April 29, 1848, loc. cit.
- 93. Thomas B. Stevenson to Caleb Smith, March 6, 1848, John Defrees to Caleb Smith, April 4, 1848, Smith MSS; James Harvey to John McLean, April 12, 1848, Robert Howard to McLean, April 27, 1848, Thomas Dowling to McLean, May 12, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); Thomas B. Stevenson to Henry Clay, May 18, 1848, Joseph L. White to Clay, May 26, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Thomas Ewing to John Sherman, May 26, 1848, EFP; Daniel Webster to Hiram Ketchum, May 27, 1848, Webster MSS.
- 94. Elisha Whittlesey to John McLean, April 12, 1848, J. B. Mower to McLean, April 20, 1848, Thomas Dowling to McLean, April 26, May 1, 1848, James Harvey to McLean, May 1, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); David M. Nagle to Henry Clay, May 1, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 95. Henry Clay to James Brooks, April 13, 1848, Greeley to Clay, April 28, 1848, Joseph L. White to Clay, May 26, 1848, Winfield Scott to Clay, July 19, 1848, Thomas B. Stevenson to Clay, August 10, 1848, John Minor Botts to Clay, August 23, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Clay to Thomas B. Stevenson, August 14, 1848, Stevenson MSS; Thomas Dowling to John McLean, May 1, 4, 1848, McLean MSS (LC). Clay believed that Garnett Duncan of Louisiana was the Whig to whom Scott referred. Scott's biographer guesses, plausibly, that it was Washington Hunt. Neither Duncan nor Hunt favored Clay's nomination. Elliott, Scott, p. 592.
- 96. William H. McCrillis to William Pitt Fessenden, May 29, 1848, Fessenden MSS (WRHS); E. Joy Morris to John P. Kennedy, May 6, 1848, Kennedy MSS; Henry Wilson to Daniel Webster, May 31, 1848, Webster MSS; Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, April 3, 1848, Greeley-Colfax MSS; Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 171–85.
 - 97. See, for example, Seward to Weed, May 27, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).
 - 98. Henry Wilson to Charles Francis Adams, June 3, 1848, Adams Family Papers.
- 99. H. E. Eastman to Amos A. Lawrence, April 28, 1848, Amos A. Lawrence MSS; C. S. Morehead to Henry Clay, May 3, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Daniel Webster to Hiram Ketchum, May 27, 31, 1848, Webster to Edward Everett, May 29, 1848, Webster MSS; John A. Watkins to Leslie Combs, May 15, 1848, Ullmann MSS; E. W. Huntington to George Dunn, May 31, 1848, Dunn MSS; J. R. Williams to Millard Fillmore, June 2, 1848, MFP-O.
- 100. Jerome Fuller to Millard Fillmore, June 1, 4, 6, 1848, John T. Bush to Fillmore, June 6, 1848, MFP-O; Henry Wilson to Charles Francis Adams, June 3, 1848, Adams Family Papers; Hunt to Weed, June 4, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); James Harvey to John McLean, April 12, 1848, McLean MSS (LC).
- 101. William Ballard Preston to William C. Rives, May 30, 1848, Rives MSS; Henry S. Levert and C. C. Langdon to Henry Clay, May 29, 1848, Greeley to Clay, May 29, 1848, and James Harlan to Clay, June 2, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 102. The best secondary account of the convention, on which I have relied heavily in this and the following paragraphs, is ZT:SWH, pp. 86–97. See also Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 194–200, and Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 220–22. A memoir by an individual who describes himself as the convention's official reporter is Dyer, Great Senators, pp. 68–86. On the impact of the Native Americans, see George C. Collins to Henry Clay, June 10, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); and Edwin G. Lindsey to Millard Fillmore, April 7, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 103. John T. Bush to Millard Fillmore, June 6, 1848, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, June 4, 1848, Harry Bradley to Fillmore, June 20, 1848, MFP-O; Henry Wilson to C. F. Adams, June 3, 1848, Adams Family Papers; Amos A. Lawrence to Members of the Philadelphia Convention, June 1, 1848, draft, Amos Lawrence MSS; John O. Sargent to Thomas Butler King, April 22, 1848, King MSS; Dalzell, Webster, p. 147; Greeley to Henry Clay, April 22, June 21, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 104. Leslie Combs to Henry Clay, June 10, 1848, John Sloane to Clay, June 22, 1848, Thomas B. Stevenson to Clay, June 12, 19, July 26, August 10, 1848, John L. Lawrence to Clay, June 23, 1848, P. Van Trump to Clay, July 26, 1848, J. M. Botts to Clay, August 23, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Clay to T. B. Stevenson, August 14, 1848, Stevenson MSS; William Miner to John McLean, June 13, 1848, James Harvey to McLean, August 30, 1848, McLean MSS (LC).
- 105. Jerome Fuller to Millard Fillmore, June 6, 7, 1848, John T. Bush to Fillmore, June 6, 1848, Harry Bradley to Fillmore, June 20, 1848, MFP-O.

Notes Notes

- 106. A Louisianan represented Texas on this committee.
- 107. John L. Lawrence to Clay, June 9, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); ZT:SWH, pp. 91-92.
- 108. Rayback, Free Soil, p. 196, note 21.

9%

58%

29.5%

34%

38%

36%

North

South

Group average

- 109. John T. Bush to Millard Fillmore, June 6, 1848, MFP-O. The votes of the individual delegates on all four ballots at the convention can be found in the Washington National Intelligencer, June 16, 1848. On the first ballot, Webster had one vote from New York, three from Maine, and all eighteen from Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Scott's total was divided as follows: Ohio, twenty; Indiana, nine; Pennsylvania, six; New York, five; Michigan, two; and Illionis, one.
- 110. Leslie Combs to Henry Clay, June 10, 1848, James Harlan to Clay, June 15, 1848, John L. Lawrence to Clay, June 23, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Jerome Fuller to Millard Fillmore, June 9, 1848, MFP-O; Meredith Gentry to William B. Campbell, June 18, 1848, CFP.
- 111. Henry Clay to Thomas B. Stevenson, August 14, 1848, Stevenson MSS; Stevenson to Clay, August 10, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 112. John McLean to Caleb Smith, March 23, 1848, Smith MSS; Clay to James Brooks, April 13, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC). The combined influence of sectionalism and partisan strength can be seen in the following table, which uses the same categories as Tables 20 and 22, to which the delegates from Wisconsin and South Carolina are added. In every group, ranged from the strongest Whig to the strongest Democratic, Taylor drew a higher proportion of votes in the South than the North. The only northern Whigs for whom Taylor had significant appeal, on the other hand, came from Democratic states. Even in the South, moreover, Taylor was considerably weaker in Whig states (Group I) than in those Clay had lost in 1844. Conversely, with the exception of the southern states Clay had carried in 1844, Clay's strength was concentrated in the northern states he had won or come close to carrying. His relative weakness in the North (38 percent) reflected his negligible vote in Democratic states as well as losses to Scott and Webster. Altogether, Clay won 48 percent of the votes from northern states in Groups I and II.

Group I		Group II		Group III		Regional Average
Tay.	Clay	Tay.	Clay	Tay.	Clay	Tay.	Clay

57%

8%

43%

39%

93%

69%

17%

7%

12%

15%

76%

38%

20%

14%

92%

37%

Percentage of Delegates for Clay and Taylor

113. Dyer, Great Senators, pp. 68–75; ZT:SWH, p. 93; Horace Greeley to Henry Clay, June 21, 1848, J. Morrison Harris to Clay, May 1848, John G. Proud to Clay, June 11, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC).

114. James Harvey to John McLean, August 30, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); Kirwan, Crittenden, p. 222.

115. Rayback, Free Soil, p. 197, note 23; ZT:SWH, pp. 93–94; Dyer, Great Senators, pp. 72–73; Truman Smith to John Davis, August 8, 1848, John Davis MSS. In this letter, Smith said he lobbied for Taylor immediately before the convention because of his conviction that Taylor was the only man whom Whigs could elect.

116. For more on the fascinating battle among Connecticut's Whigs over both Senate seats during May 1848, a battle that reflected both north/south and east/west regional tensions in the state, see Holt, "Rethinking," 97–111, especially 104; Emily Baldwin to Edward L. Baldwin, May 11, 23, 1848, C. Bissell to Roger Sherman Baldwin, May 12, 1848, Roger Sherman Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, May 17, 24, 1848, Emily Baldwin to R. S. Baldwin, May 19, 24, 27, 1848, James F. Babcock to R. S. Baldwin, May 27, 1848, and Dennis Kimberly to R. S. Baldwin, June 1, 1848, BFP; Alfred E. Burr to Gideon Welles, September 27, 1847, Welles MSS (NYPL); Burr to Welles, November 5, 1847, William J. Hammersley to Welles, December 27, 1847, April 13, 1848, Welles MSS (LC).

- 117. Jerome Fuller to Millard Fillmore, June 9, 1848, MFP-O; Dyer, Great Senators, p. 76.
- 118. John G. Proud to Clay, June 11, 1848, Henry Clay MSS. Clay retained one vote each from Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Alabama, and Kentucky.
 - 119. Peterson, Great Triumvirate, p. 441.
- 120. John L. Lawrence to Henry Clay, June 9, 1848, David Graham to Clay, June 9, 1848, Leslie Combs to Clay, June 10, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Harry Bradley to Millard Fillmore, June 20, 1848, MFP-O; ZT:SWH, p. 95. See also the excerpts from the New York Tribune's account of the convention reprinted in the Appendix to Van Deusen, "The Whig Party," pp. 436–44, especially p. 440.
- 121. Newspaper and hence the secondary accounts of the speeches in the confusion following Taylor's nomination differ. In this and following paragraphs, I have relied primarily on the National Intelligencer, June 12, 1848, which includes the bracketed phrase in the quotation in its original report. But I have supplemented the Intelligencer's account with Van Deusen's appendix and the descriptions by Hamilton and Rayback.
 - 122. Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, June 9, 1848, MFP-O.
- 123. Harry Bradley to Millard Fillmore, June 20, 1848, MFP-O; Dyer, Great Senators, pp. 79-80.
- 124. Bradley to Fillmore, June 20, 1848, MFP-O; John O. Sargent to Thomas Butler King, April 4, 22, 1848, King MSS; John O. Sargent, Hugh Maxwell, M. H. Grinnell, and Simeon Draper to Nathan Appleton, May 16, 1848, Appleton MSS; John Lorimer Graham to William C. Rives, June 15, 1848, Rives MSS; J. R. Williams to Millard Fillmore, June 10, 1848, MFP-O. Webster denied that he personally had interfered to stop Lawrence. Daniel Webster to R. M. Blatchford, June 10, 1848, Nathan Appleton MSS.
- 125. Thomas Ewing to John Sherman, May 26, 1848, typescript copy of letter from Thomas Ewing, Jr., to the editor of the Springfield Republican, October 11, 1933, quoting William Bebb to Crittenden, November 24, 1848, and Thomas Ewing to John Sherman, January 22, 1867, EFP.
- 126. Seward to Weed, March 29, May 27, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Jerome Fuller to Millard Fillmore, June 1, 4, 6, 7, 9, 1848; John Bush to Fillmore, June 6, 1848, Harry Bradley to Fillmore, June 20, 1848, MFP-O; Edward G. Lindsey to Fillmore, April 7, 1851, William I. A. Birken to Fillmore, December 25, 1850, MFP-BHS; ZT:SWH, p. 88.
- 127. Ibid; Joseph L. White to Millard Fillmore, August 27, 1846, MFP-O; J. L. White to John J. Crittenden, June 28, 1847, Crittenden MSS (LC).
 - 128. Harry Bradley to Fillmore, June 20, 1848.
- 129. Ibid; for the votes on the vice presidential nomination, I have used the Tribune account reprinted in Van Deusen's appendix.
 - 130. William Tyson to Millard Fillmore, March 28, 1849, MFP-O.
 - 131. Van Deusen, "The Whig Party," Appendix, p. 444.
- 132. William Ballard Preston to William C. Rives, June 9, 1848, Rives MSS; Daniel Webster to Hiram Ketchum, June 11, 1848, Webster MSS: Thomas Dorr to Edmund Burke, January 13, 1848, Burke MSS.
 - 133. J. R. Williams to Fillmore, June 10, 1848, MFP-O.

CHAPTER 11

- 1. Meredith P. Gentry to William B. Campbell, June 18, 1848, CFP.
- 2. E. D. Culver to Millard Fillmore, June 11, 1848, MFP-O.
- 3. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 73–146; Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 303–10 and passim; Nevins, Ordeal: Fruits, pp. 211–16; Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 184–232; Mayfield, Rehearsal for Republicanism, p. 126.
- 4. E. D. Culver to Fillmore, June 11, 1848, Henry Clay to Committee at Louisville, June 28, 1848, draft, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 5. These estimates of turnout can be found in Historical Statistics, 1072. Clay received 48.13 percent of the votes cast in 1844; Taylor gained 47.28 percent of those cast in 1848.

Multiplying those figures by the respective turnout rates in the two years indicates that Clay won 37.9 percent of the potential vote and Taylor only 34.34 percent.

- 6. Albert G. Riddle to Joshua R. Giddings, June 12, 1848, quoted in Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 99; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 205; Thomas B. Stevenson to Henry Clay, June 19, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); William H. Howe to Roger Sherman Baldwin, Jr., July 25, 1848, BFP.
- 7. Frank Otto Gatell, "'Conscience and Judgment'"; call for Worcester Convention quoted on p. 27; Charles Francis Adams to John Gorham Palfrey, May 26, June 10, 1848, Adams Family Papers.
- 8. Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 99-112, 181-83; Mayfield, Rehearsal for Republicanism, pp. 86-91, 101-02.
 - 9. Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 60-77, 171-81, 201; Sewell, Ballots for Freedom, pp. 145-49.
- 10. Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 205–13; Mayfield, Rehearsal for Republicanism, pp. 108–11; Boston Daily Advertiser, June 12, 1848. The fifteen Whigs at Philadelphia, not all of whom would leave the party in 1848, were: Lewis O. Cowan and Samuel Bradley of Maine; Charles Allen, Henry Wilson, and Daniel Alvord of Massachusetts; Isaac Platt, John C. Hamilton, and Robert Colby of New York; Horace Conger of New Jersey; and Lewis D. Campbell, Samuel Galloway, John C. Vaughan, Stanley Mathews, John Burgoyne, and H. B. Hurlburt of Ohio (Rayback, Free Soil, p. 205, note 20).
- 11. J. N. B. to William Schouler, May 1848, Schouler MSS; for additional evidence of the enthusiasm for a new free-soil party among Northern Whigs, see J. Sloane to Henry Clay, June 22, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Thomas Treat to Millard Fillmore, July 4, 1848, D. H. Davis to Fillmore, July 8, 1848, MFP-O; Thurlow Weed to William Henry Seward, July 29, 1848, Seward MSS (RU).
- 12. Potter, Impending Crisis, pp. 63–73; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, July———, July 31, August 1, 1848, Outlaw MSS.
- 13. The other members of the select committee were Missouri Democrat David R. Atchison and Whigs Joseph Underwood of Kentucky, Samuel S. Phelps of Vermont, and John H. Clarke of Rhode Island.
- 14. Clayton's bill provided for the presidential appointment of executive and judicial officials for California and New Mexico, but it explicitly forbade the creation of a popularly elected territorial legislature, as in Oregon. Instead, the appointed executive and judicial officials together were to exercise legislative authority in the two territories. The bill is printed in Congressional Globe, 30th Cong., 1st Sess., 1002–05.
- 15. The bill allowed a slave, or presumably an attorney for a slave, to seek a writ of habeas corpus from a federal district judge or the territorial supreme court and provided that the Supreme Court would hear an appeal on the decision to award the slave habeas corpus, which would temporarily free the slave.
 - 16. Clayton's speech is quoted in the Washington National Intelligencer, July 19, 1848.
- 17. Congressional Globe, 30th Cong., 1st Sess., 953–1002. See also Seward to Weed, July 25, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, July 23, July———, 1848, Outlaw MSS; Thomas B. Stevenson to Henry Clay, July 26, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Andrew S. Fulton to David Campbell, July 25, 27, 1848, CFP; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 252.
- 18. T. C. Peters to Fillmore, July 11, 1848, MFP-O; Weed to Seward, July 29, 1848, Seward MSS (RU). The platform of the Free Soil party is printed in the appendix to Kraditor, "Liberty and Free Soil Parties," pp. 876–78.
 - 19. Congressional Globe, 30th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 1002; Potter, Impending Crisis, p. 74.
- 20. Seward to Weed, July 25, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, July 23, 1848, Outlaw MSS; Andrew Fulton to David Campbell, July 25, 27, 1848, CFP; Congressional Globe, 30th Cong., 1st Sess., p. 1007; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 253. The seven southern Whigs who helped Stephens table the bill included three Kentuckians, two North Carolinians, and one each from Tennessee and Virginia. Significantly, Robert Toombs and the two other Georgia Whigs, as well as prominent southern Taylor men like Gentry, Ballard Preston, and Thomas Flournoy, voted in the minority against Stephens.
 - 21. Congressional Globe, Appendix, 30th Cong., 1st Sess., 1103-07; Alexander H. Stephens to Milledgeville Federal Union, August 30, 1848, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 117–23; A. H. Stephens to Duncan L. Clinch, October 7, 1848, Stephens MSS (LC).

- 22. Ibid.; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 253, note 101; Iverson L. Harris to John M. Berrien, August 23, 1848, Berrien MSS.
- 23. Washington National Intelligencer, August 2, 3, 1848; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, August 1, 1848, Outlaw MSS; Alexander, Sectional Stress, p. 199, votes 84 and 85.
- 24. Washington National Intelligencer, August 12, 14, 1848; Roger Sherman Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, August 11, 1848, BFP; Daniel Webster to Richard M. Blatchford, August 13, 1848, Webster MSS; Alexander, Sectional Stress, p. 200, vote 100; Potter, Impending Crisis, pp. 75–76.
- 25. Poughkeepsie Eagle, August 5, 1848, clipping in MFP-O; Boston Daily Advertiser, September 14, 1848; A. B. Conditt to George Dunn, September 1, 1848, Dunn MSS.
- 26. For the creation of the Free Soil party, I have relied on Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 201–30; Mayfield, Rehearsal, pp. 108–25; Sewell, Ballots for Freedom, pp. 152–69; and Blue, Free Soilers, pp. 44–80.
 - 27. E. Harrington to Salmon P. Chase, August 5, 1848, Chase MSS (LC).
- 28. Rayback, Free Soil, p. 226, note 105. For additional evidence that vengeful Clay Whigs joined the free-soil movement, see George W. Patterson to Thurlow Weed, August 19, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).
 - 29. Patterson to Weed, August 24, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).
- 30. Henry Howe to Roger Sherman Baldwin, September 27, 1848, BFP; Seward to Weed, October 27, 29, November 6, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); P. Hitchcock to Thomas Ewing, June 12, 1848, A. Banning Norton to Ewing, August 7, 1848, EFP; Ewing to John J. Crittenden, October 15, 1848, Ewing MSS (OHS); John W. Allen to Crittenden, September 90, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Benjamin F. Wade to Caroline Wade, July 21, October 27, 1848, Wade MSS; John W. Allen to Millard Fillmore, November 2, 1848, MFP-O; Thomas B. Stevenson to Henry Clay, June 19, July 26, August 10, 24, October 2, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Thomas Corwin to Thomas B. Stevenson, June 13, 1848, Stevenson MSS.

Several of Clay's friends believed that the only possible explanation for the treachery of the Ohio delegation at the national convention was that Corwin wanted to foment an antislavery revolt so that he could lead the new Free Soil party. See John Minor Botts to Clay, August 23, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC).

- 31. S. Todd to John J. Crittenden, September 27, 1848, John M. Clayton to Crittenden, October 12, 1848, Moses Hampton to Crittenden, November 26, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Thaddeus Stevens to Abraham Lincoln, September 7, 1848, David Davis MSS; B. Rush Petrikin to Samuel Calvin, October 2, 1848, with clipping of Petrikin's Address to the Electors of the Seventeenth Congressional District, September 30, 1848, Calvin MSS; E. Joy Morris to Amos A. Lawrence, August 4, 1848, Amos Lawrence MSS; Holt, Forging a Majority, p. 56.
- 32. Horace Greeley to Clay, June 20, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); T. W. Williams to Fillmore, July 28, 1848, MFP-O; Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, September 15, 1848, Greeley-Colfax MSS; Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 203, 213; Van Deusen, Greeley, pp. 122–25; Blue, Free Soilers, p. 112; Seward to Edward J. Fowle, August 26, 1848, Seward MSS (RU); Elisha Whittelsey to Oran Follett, October 11, 1848, in Hamlin, "Follett Papers," 30–31.
- 33. Charles Francis Adams to J. G. Palfrey, May 26, 1848, Henry Wilson to C. F. Adams, June 3, 1848, Palfrey to Adams, June 7, 1848, Adams Family Papers; Boston Daily Advertiser, June 14, 15, 1848; Daniel Webster to Fletcher Webster, June 19, September ?, 1848, Edward Everett to Daniel Webster, August 4, 1848, E. Rockwood Hoar to Webster, August 13, 1848, Webster to E. R. Hoar, August 23, 1848, Webster MSS; Stephen C. Phillips to Salmon P. Chase, October 19, 1848, Chase MSS (LC); Gatell, "Bolt," 38–40.
- 34. A. Willey to Charles Francis Adams, June 16, 1848, Joseph W. Porter to C. F. Adams, July 3, 1848, Edward A. Stansbury to C. F. Adams, June 26, July 5, 1848, Adams Family Papers; Boston Daily Advertiser, September 12, 13, 1848; Blue, Free Soilers, p. 117.
- 35. A. E. Burr to Gideon Welles, June 24, 1848, John M. Niles to Welles, October 8, November 8, 1848, Welles MSS (LC); John M. Niles to Welles, September 17, 1848, Welles MSS

- (NYPL); Hugh White to Roger Sherman Baldwin, September 4, 1848, Amasa Mason to Baldwin, September 25, 1848, E. A. Andrews to Baldwin, October 3, 1848, A. Brewster to Baldwin, October 3, 1848, and draft of speech in New Haven by Baldwin, September 8, 1848, BFP.
- 36. Joshua Leavitt to Joshua R. Giddings, July 6, 1848, quoted in Blue, Free Soilers, p. 80; see also A. E. Burr to Gideon Welles, July 24, 1848, Welles MSS (LC).
- 37. Thomas Mumford to Charles Francis Adams, July 17, 1848, Samuel Lyman to Adams, July 17, 1848, Seth Gates to Adams, July 24, 1848, Seth Webb to Adams, July 27, 1848, and C. F. Adams to J. G. Palfrey, July 30, 1848, Adams Family Papers; Samuel Lyman to J. G. Palfrey, July 30, 1848, quoted in Gatell, "Bolt," 43.
- 38. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, August 10, 1848, Outlaw MSS; Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, August 14, 1848, H. B. Lathrop to Fillmore, August 28, 1848, George Morey to Fillmore, September 3, 1848, Silas Stillwell to Fillmore, September 19, 1848 (quotation), and Philip Greely to Fillmore, September 26, 1848, MFP-O; ZT:SWH, p. 112; Stephen C. Phillips to Salmon P. Chase, October 19, 1848, Chase MSS (LC).
- 39. Thomas B. Stevenson to Henry Clay, August 29, September 9, October 2, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Adams Jewett to Salmon P. Chase, September 1, 1848, Chase MSS (LC); John W. Allen to J. J. Crittenden, September 9, 1848, William Woodbridge to Crittenden, September 12, 1848, R. W. Thompson to Crittenden, October 21, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); John Defrees to George Dunn, September 5, 1848, Dunn MSS; John Defrees to Thurlow Weed, September 30, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Schuyler Colfax to Caleb B. Smith, November 16, 1848, Smith MSS.
- 40. Citations for the Pittsburgh Gazette can be found in Holt, Forging a Majority, p. 58; Boston Daily Advertiser, June 15, August 11, 18, 19, September 11, 1848; Hugh White to Roger Sherman Baldwin, September 4, 1848, draft of Baldwin's speech at New Haven, September 8, 1848, BFP; see also Abraham Lincoln's campaign speeches in Massachusetts and Illinois, Collected Works of Lincoln, II, pp. 1–14.
- 41. Ibid.; A. B. Conditt to George Dunn, September 1, 1848, Dunn MSS; Poughkeepsie Eagle, August 4, 1848, clipping in MFP-O; Resolutions of Whig meeting in Roxbury, Massachusetts, Boston Daily Advertiser, September 14, 1848.
- 42. Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, March 19, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Pennsylvania Whig State Platform of 1848, Pittsburgh Commercial Journal, September 16, 1848; Boston Daily Advertiser, September 14, 15, 1848; Van Deusen, Seward, pp. 109–10. See also sources in note 40.
 - 43. Boston Daily Advertiser, August 11, October 28, November 4, 1848.
- 44. Draft of Baldwin's Speech at New Haven, September 8, 1848, BFP; C. B. Stebbins to Fillmore, July 5, 1848, Poughkeepsie Eagle, August 5, 1848, clipping, MFP-O; public letter of Thomas Ewing, June 30, 1848, typescript copy, EFP; Stevens to Lincoln, September 7, 1848, David Davis MSS; John M. Niles to Gideon Welles, October 29, 1848, Welles MSS (NYPL).
- 45. Roger Sherman Baldwin to Thomas Ritchie, August 28, 1848, draft, BFP; Lincoln's speech at Jackson, Illinois, October 21, 1848, in Collected Works of Lincoln, II, pp. 11–12; Truman Smith to Thomas Ewing, June 30, 1848, with extracts from John Wilson to Truman Smith, May 10, 1848, EFP. Baldwin specifically denied accusations that Ritchie had printed in the Washington Union that Baldwin had letters from Taylor explicitly pledging not to veto the Proviso. Ritchie circulated such reports, Baldwin charged, in order to discredit Taylor in the South.
- 46. William M. Dunn to George Dunn, June 26, 1848, Dunn MSS; Alexander Kelsey to Millard Fillmore, August 21, 1848, B. B. Chamberlin to Fillmore, October 3, 1848, MFP-O; William Woodbridge to J. J. Crittenden, September 12, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 47. P. Van Trump to Clay, July 26, 1848, Henry Clay MSS; Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, July 11, 1848, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 39, 393–94. Democrats also commented on the same combination of apathy and anger among Whigs. See, for example, Edwin Crosswell to Horatio Seymour, July 29, 1848, typescript copy, Fairchild Collection.
- 48. A. T. Ellis to George Dunn, June 12, 1848, Dunn MSS; Edward McGaughey to Henry S. Lane, June 20, 1848, Henry Lane MSS (IU); Justin Morrill to Thomas Hale, June 19, 1848, Morrill MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, July 5, 1848, Everett MSS; Report on the Maine election, Boston Daily Advertiser, September 13, 1848; John H. Bryant to Millard Fillmore, August 7, 1848, MFP-O; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 148–49.

- 49. Meredith P. Gentry to William B. Campbell, June 18, 1848, CFP; Charles Jenkins to John M. Berrien, July 15, 1848, Berrien MSS; George W. Crawford to Thomas Butler King, July 30, 1848, King MSS.
- 50. Charles Jenkins to John M. Berrien, July 15, 1848, Berrien MSS; New Orleans Bee, March 23, 1848; John A. Calhoun to Joseph White Lesne, July 10, 1848, quoted in Thornton, Politics and Power, p. 175. K. McKenzie to Duncan McLaurin, October 14, 1848, McLaurin MSS; Resolutions of Raymond Rough and Ready Club, enclosed with John B. Peyton to Millard Fillmore, August 9, 1848, William Hodge to Fillmore, October 21, 1848, MFP-O; W. H. Hull to Howell Cobb, July 22, 1848, quoted in Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 132.
- 51. John P. Kennedy to George Sanburn, October 15, 1848, copy, Kennedy MSS; Richard W. Thompson to Edward Duff et al., June 29, 1848, Thompson MSS (Ind.SL); S. W. Parker to Caleb B. Smith, July 1, 9, 12, 1848, Smith MSS.
- 52. Rives to Taylor, July 11, 1848, draft, Rives MSS; clipping from Richmond Times, October 3, 1848, with Rives to Millard Fillmore, October 28, 1848, MFP-O.
- 53. Clay to Committee at Louisville, June 28, 1848, draft, Clay to George M. Curtis, July 4, 1848, draft, Clay to James Lynch et al., September 20, 1848, draft, George C. Collins to Clay, June 10, 1848, John G. Proud to Clay, June 11, 1848, Willis Hall to Clay, June 28, 1848, Thomas B. Stevenson to Clay, June 19, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Thomas B. Stevenson to Caleb Smith, June 12, 1848, Smith MSS.
- 54. Edwin Bryant to Clay, June 11, 1848, C. S. Morehead to Clay, June 22, 1848, P. Van Trump to Clay, July 26, 1848, Nicholas Dean to Clay, July 27, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); H. B. Eastman to Amos A. Lawrence, June 14, 1848, Amos Lawrence MSS; David S. Crandall to Thurlow Weed, June 19, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); David S. Crandall to Millard Fillmore, June 19, 1848, MFP-O; C. A. Trowbridge to J. J. Crittenden, September 15, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 55. Alexander Fleming to M. B. Fleming, June 22, 1848, Fleming MSS; John Minor Botts to Henry Clay, July 3, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); John Pendleton to J. J. Crittenden, September 14, 1848, Robert Toombs to Crittenden, September 27, 1848, Charles W. Morgan to Crittenden, October 12, 1848, and Balie Peyton to Crittenden, October 21, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 56. E. D. Culver to Fillmore, June 11, 1848, MFP-O; Seward to Weed, June 10, 1848, David S. Crandall to Weed, June 19, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, July 11, 1848, loc cit; Erlem Bratney to George Dunn, August 12, 1848, Dunn MSS.
- 57. Boston Daily Advertiser, June 14, 1848; Daniel D. Barnard's letter and Weed's editorial can be found in "The Nomination—General Taylor," The American Review, Vol. II (July 1848), 3–4, 7–8. Unless specified otherwise, all the quotations in this and the following eight paragraphs are taken from various articles in that Whig periodical. It would be tedious and repetitious to list individual page citations for each. The articles I relied on are: "The Future Policy of the Whigs," Vol. I (April 1848), 329–340; "The President's Message," ibid., 384–396; "The President and His Administration," Vol. I (May 1848), 437–452; "The Nomination—General Taylor," Vol. II (July 1848), 1–8; "Necessity of Party—The Press—The Locofoco Platform," ibid., 8–14; "The Whigs and Their Candidate," Vol. II (September 1848), 221–34; and "Party Discontents," Vol. II (October 1848), 331–40.
 - 58. James D. Ogden to Thomas Butler King, June 13, 1848, King MSS.
- 59. National Intelligencer, June 10, 1848; for similar arguments, see Thomas Ewing's public letter of June 30, 1848, EFP; and Boston Daily Advertiser, June 14, July 18, 20, 1848.
 - 60. National Intelligencer, June 29, 1848.
- 61. Weed to T. B. King, July 15, 1848, King MSS; T. C. Peters to Weed, July 2, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Seward, July 27, 1848, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 62. ZT:SWH, p. 117; William L. Hodge to Fillmore, July 19, 1848, MFP-O.
- 63. ZT:SWH, p. 120; Patterson to Weed, August 14, 24, 1848, Edward Dodd to Weed, August 18, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Fillmore to Solomon Haven, August 19, 1848, D. A. Kelsey to Fillmore, August 21, 1848, MFP-O.

- 64. Fillmore to Taylor, August 19, 1848, Fillmore MSS (original in Zachary Taylor MSS, University of Kentucky).
- 65. Thomas Y. Simons to Jefferson Franklin Jackson, September 8, 1848, Jackson MSS; Rayback, Free Soil, pp. 270–71; Joshua L. Brown to Thurlow Weed, August 29, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).
- 66. Fillmore to Solomon Haven, August 19, 1848, Fillmore to D. A. Kelsey, August 24, 1848, Fillmore to Zachary Taylor, August 28, 1848, Thomas Foote to Fillmore, August 30, 1848, James O. Putnam to Fillmore, August 30, 1848, Weed to Fillmore, September 26, 1848, A. K. Hadley to Fillmore, February 17, 1855, MFP-O; Fillmore to Erastus Brooks, February 10, 1855, in Severance, "Millard Fillmore Papers," 11, 350–51; Fillmore to Weed, September 27, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).
 - 67. Joshua L. Brown to Weed, August 29, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).
- 68. Nicholas Dean to Clay, August 5, 1848, Daniel Ullmann to Clay, August 9, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 69. John B. Mower to J. J. Crittenden, September 11, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Fillmore to Zachary Taylor, September 16, 1848, MFP-O; Morton McMichael to Clay, September 9, 1848, Thomas J. Clay MSS; Washington National Intelligencer, September 11, 1848.
- 70. Clay to George Curtis, July 5, 1848, Clay to N. B. Meade and J. W. King, September 11, 1848, Clay to James Lynch et al., September 20, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Washington National Intelligencer, September 29, 1848; Rayback, Free Soil, p. 273.
 - 71. Edward Dodd to Weed, August 3, 1848, Weed MSS (RU).
- 72. Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 224–31. Powell polled 57,397 votes compared to Polk's 52,000 in 1844 and 55,000 for William O. Butler, the Democrats' gubernatorial candidate, that year.
- 73. Alex Fleming to M. B. Fleming, June 22, 1848, Fleming MSS; Alfred Dockery to Robert L. Caruthers, July 25, 1848, Caruthers MSS; William L. Battle to Lucy Battle, August 6, 1848, Battle Family Papers; Willie P. Mangum to John S. Pendleton, August 26, 1848, Mangum MSS (Duke); Washington National Intelligencer, August 14, 1848; Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 61, 86–90. Although absolute turnout in August 1848 exceeded that in November 1844, the rate of turnout did not. It was 92.1 percent in 1844 and 84.2 percent in August 1848.
- 74. The Whig reluctance to run a candidate against the Democratic incumbent, Augustus French, may have reflected French's stand on a new state constitution ratified in the spring, which offended Democrats and ingratiated Whigs. French intervened in the convention to defeat antibanking clauses, and he vigorously endorsed the constitution that forbid alien suffrage, previously allowed in Illinois, thereby potentially reducing the Democratic vote; mandated a new tax specifically to pay off the state debt; stripped the legislature of patronage and made most state and local offices elective; and called for circuit judges to be elected by district, rather than at-large statewide, thereby allowing Whigs to win four of seven circuit judgeships in 1848.
- See David T. Gregg to Charles H. Lanphier, February 14, 1848, Thompson Campbell to Lanphier, March 9, 1848, and John Roberts to Lanphier, June 15, 1848, Lanphier MSS; D. H. Whitney to David Davis, March 1, 1848, David Davis to Julius Rockwell, December 7, 1848, David Davis MSS; Letter of J. S. W., April 24, 1848, Washington National Intelligencer, April 29, 1848; McCormack, Koerner Memoirs, I, p. 524.
- 75. Thomas Foote to Millard Fillmore, October 1, 1848, MFP-O; Isaac E. Johnson to George Dunn, July 2, 1848, Dunn MSS; John Defrees to Thurlow Weed, September 30, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); R. W. Thompson to J. J. Crittenden, October 21, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 76. Clay to Nicholas Dean, August 24, 1848, Thomas J. Clay MSS; Boston Daily Advertiser, September 12, 13, 1848.
- 77. Iverson Harris to John M. Berrien, July 14, 1848, Berrien MSS; James Meeks to Bolling Hall, August 1, 1848, Hall MSS; F. G. Norman to George Houston, July 27, 1848, A. C. Matthews to Houston, August 7, 1848, Houston MSS; Elmore J. Fitzpatrick to Reuben Chapman, September 23, 1848, Reuben Chapman MSS (Governors' Records, ADAH).
- 78. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, August 7, 1848, Neil Brown to William B. Campbell, October 1848, S. M. Blythe to William B. Campbell, October 30, 1848, CFP.
 - 79. Historical Statistics, p. 899.

- 80. Truman Smith to Alexander H. Stephens, October 2, 1848, Stephens MSS (LC); John McLean to John Teesdale, December 10, 1848, McLean MSS (OHS).
- 81. Richmond Enquirer, September 15, 1848, Tallahassee Floridian, September 16, 1848, Raleigh Standard, November 8, 1848, all quoted in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 260.
- 82. Ibid., p. 261. The first quotation apparently comes from the Richmond Enquirer; the second is from the Jackson Mississippian, September 18, 1848.
- 83. W. G. Snethen to Fillmore, July 11, 1848, Fillmore to W. G. Snethen, July 14, 1848, copy, E. C. Cabell to Fillmore, July 11, 1848, William L. Hodge to Fillmore, July 13, 1848, William C. Rives to Fillmore, September 6, 1848, James Brooks to Fillmore, September 7, 1848, MFP-O; Toombs to Crittenden, September 27, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 84. Fillmore to John Gayle, July 31, 1848, Fillmore to John B. Peyton, August 20, 1848, in Severance, ed., "Millard Fillmore Papers," 11, pp. 280–81; William L. Hodge to Fillmore, September 7, October 21, 1848, Fillmore to James Brooks, September 13, 1848, William L. Goggin to Fillmore, September 20, 1848, Richmond Times, October 3, 1848, clipping with Rives to Fillmore, October 28, 1848, MFP-O; Finkelman, Imperfect Union, pp. 266–71.
- 85. William J. Penniman to John M. Clayton, December 3, 1848, Clayton MSS; Richmond Times, October 3, 1848; Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 179–80; clipping of Dallas County, Alabama, Whig ratification meeting in R. H. Chamberlayne to Millard Fillmore, June 24, 1848, MFP-O; Milledgeville Southern Recorder, October 3, 1848, quoted in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 262 (see pp. 262–63 for quotations in a similar vein); Raleigh Register, October 21, 1848, quoted in Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 120–21.
- 86. For voting records in the House of Representatives, see Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 51–54, and particularly the sharp divisions between southern Democrats and Whigs on votes 40, 58, 59, 62, 63, and 65, pp. 181–82. In the Senate, every southern Whig but one had voted against ratifying Tyler's treaty of annexation.
- 87. Will B. Walton to William B. Campbell, October 3, 1848, CFP; S. S. Locke to Thomas Butler King, October 26, 1848, King MSS. I have interpolated the figures for turnout rates in the Georgia congressional elections of 1844 and 1848 from the figures for presidential turnout rates for those years listed in Historical Statistics, p. 1072. The following table gives the total Democratic and Whig votes in the elections referred to.

	Whig	Democratic
1844 Congress	38,111	40,377
1846 Congress	27,563	31,187
1847 Governor	41,941	43,219
1848 Congress	38,651	38,908

- 88. John Van Buren to Joshua Giddings, December 11, 1848, Giddings-Julian MSS; John M. Niles to Gideon Welles, October 8, 1848, Welles MSS (LC).
 - 89. Taylor to Fillmore, September 6, 1848, MFP-O.
 - 90. The entire text of the second Allison Letter is printed in ZT:SWH, pp. 121-24.
- 91. Weed quoted in ibid., p. 125; Fillmore to Taylor, September 16, 1848, copy, Philip Greely to Fillmore, September 26, 1848, Debs Lake to Fillmore, September 30, 1848, MFP-O; Ogden Hoffman to J. J. Crittenden, September 30, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Robert Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, September 19, 1848, Kennedy MSS.
- 92. Tom Corwin to Thomas B. Stevenson, June 13, 1848, Stevenson MSS; P. Hitchcock to Thomas Ewing, June 12, 1848, D. C. Pinkerton to Thomas Ewing, July 1, 1848, EFP; Luther Ruien to Caleb Smith, July 1, 1848, Smith MSS; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 78.

My assertions about partisan conflict in the Ohio legislature are based on two unpublished papers by my former students who calculated indexes of party disagreement and internal party cohesion on roll-call votes for 1848 and other sessions: Hampel, "Ohio Whig Party," and Shadle, "Consensus." The following table lists the number of roll calls and average indexes of partisan disagreement for various categories of legislation in 1848.

	Number of Votes	Average Index of Disagreement
Business incorporations and stockholder rights	11	38
Banking and currency	16	71
Internal improvements	27	65
Constitutional revision	3	67
Social reform	3	47

Stephen Maizlish argues, in his admirably detailed study of Ohio, that state economic policy lost salience for voters after 1846, largely because the Democrats decided that their own internal strife over it was destroying their party (Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 40–50). But he ignores continuing Whig interest in state policy and the relatively high levels of partisan legislative conflict over it after that date. The figures listed above were lower than those for 1847; none-theless, they indicate that on average, between two-thirds and 85 percent of Whigs and Democrats opposed each other when voting on the roll calls included.

- 93. D. C. Pinkerton to Thomas Ewing, July 1, 1848, Van Brown to Ewing, August 23, 1848, EFP.
- 94. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 113–15; P. Hitchcock to Thomas Ewing, June 28, 1848, William L. Perkins to Ewing, July 24, 1848, EFP; Joseph Vance to J. J. Crittenden, October 24, November 13, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); E. S. Hamlin to John McLean, September 16, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); Salmon P. Chase to James A. Briggs, September 27, 1848, Chase MSS (LC); James Ferguson to Austin Brown, September 27, 1848, Austin Brown MSS; Thomas Ewing to Crittenden, November 3, 1848, Ewing MSS (OHS).
- 95. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, Appendix A, Table 2, p. 242; Congressional Quarterly's, Guide to U.S. Elections, pp. 584, 588; Hampel, "Ohio Whig Party," Table 4; E. S. Hamlin to McLean, September 16, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); William Bebb to Crittenden, November 24, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC). Whigs in Root's district ran no candidate against him, but some Whigs in Giddings' district backed his Democratic opponent in a futile attempt to unseat him. The impregnable Giddings still won 62.7 percent of the vote compared to 60.6 percent in 1846, when a separate Liberty party candidate had siphoned off 13 percent of the vote. In short, Liberty men more than compensated for any Whig defections to the Democrat in 1848.
- 96. T. S. Williams to Fillmore, July 28, 1848, C. B. Stuart to Fillmore, August 31, 1848, Fillmore to Taylor, September 16, 1848, MFP-O; Edward Dodd to Thurlow Weed, August 3, 1848, George W. Patterson to Weed, August 14, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Nicholas Dean to Clay, September 5, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, September 15, 1848, Greeley-Colfax MSS; Ogden Hoffman to Crittenden, September 30, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); John A. Dix to Francis P. Blair, October 18, 1848, Blair-Lee MSS; Van Deusen, Weed, pp. 163–64.
- 97. My analysis of the New York Whig platform is based on an admirable content analysis of party platforms in Harp, "Character."
- 98. Philip Greely to Fillmore, September 26, October 12, 1848, Weed to Fillmore, October 13, 1848, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, October 23, 1848, James Lynch to Fillmore, October 24, 1848, MFP-O; Daniel Webster to ?, October 16, 1848, Webster MSS; Philip Greely to Weed, October 20, November 6, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Truman Smith to Daniel M. Barringer, October 20, 1848, Barringer MSS; Daniel S. Dickinson to S. Brewster, October 23, 1848, Fairchild Collection.
- 99. Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, pp. 215–17; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 149–51; John H. Bryant to Fillmore, September 4, 1848, B. B. Chamberlin to Fillmore, October 3, 1848, MFP-O; S. Todd to Crittenden, September 27, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 100. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 148–53, Johnston quoted on p. 152; Snyder, Jacksonian Heritage, pp. 214–18; Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 48–53, 289, note 47; John Bryant to Fillmore, August 7, September 23, October 5, 1848, MFP-O; Frederick J. Fenn to Samuel Calvin, October 9, 1848, Calvin MSS.
- 101. Historical Statistics, pp. 201, 886, 899, 993, 995, 1104, and 1106. In 1966 the Cleveland Trust Company published a chart of American business activity between 1790 and 1966 that measured yearly and monthly fluctuations above and below a standardized mean. In short, it measured surges and declines in economic conditions. Constructed from wholesale commodity prices, data on output and consumption in industries like coal, iron, and textiles, and information on railroad construction, that chart best demonstrates the slide in economic activity that began at the end of 1847 and accelerated in July 1848, immediately after the Whig convention. During 1847, economic activity was, on average, 12 points above the standardized mean for the entire period 1790 to 1966. Business activity also hovered above that mean during the first six months of 1848 by an average of +2.6 points. Beginning in July, however, it sank below the mean and continued in the negative category for the remainder of the year. The average index for those last six months was -2.8 points, that is, 2.8 points below the mean or 5.4 points below the average for the first half of the year. For the last three months of 1848, it was -4 points. In short, the closer the presidential election came, the worse the condition of the economy grew.

- 102. Washington National Intelligencer, February 4, 1848; James M. Barnard to Mark Howard, March 20, September 12, 1848, Howard MSS; Abbott Lawrence to Nathan Appleton, August 11, 1848, Abbott Lawrence MSS. Why Lawrence and the other Boston Associates were less dependent on commercial banks than other manufacturers for operating capital is brilliantly explained in Dalzell, Enterprising Elite, pp. 79–112 and passim.
- 103. Boston Daily Advertiser, July 4, 18, 20, September 14, October 15, 16, 28, November 2, 4, 1848.
- 104. George Morey to Fillmore, September 3, 1848, Philip Greely to Fillmore, September 26, 1848, MFP-O; Stephen C. Phillips to Salmon Chase, October 19, 1848, Chase MSS (LC).
- 105. Niles to Gideon Welles, September 17, October 29, 1848, Welles MSS (NYPL); Niles to Welles, October 8, November 8, 1848, Welles MSS (LC).
- 106. Eiselen, Pennsylvania Protectionism, pp. 212–13. Turnout rates in New Jersey were 58.2 percent in 1846, 68.1 percent in 1847, and 73.7 percent in October 1848. Those figures, however, still lagged behind the 82.3 percent rate in October 1844. Gienapp, "'Politics Seems to Enter into Everything,' "pp. 18–19.
- 107. Turnout in Pennsylvania was 41.5 percent in 1846, 61.9 percent in 1847, and 70.6 percent in October 1848. In October 1844 it had been 78.2 percent. Gienapp, "' 'Politics Seem to Enter into Everything,' " pp. 18–19.
- 108. Charles B. Penrose to Crittenden, October 24, 1848, Charles H. Delavan to Crittenden, October 25, 31, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Daniel Webster to ?, October 16, 1848, Webster MSS; Jacob Abell to Fillmore, October 31, 1848, MFP-O.
- 109. Moses Hampton to Crittenden, November 26, 1848, John Kennedy to Crittenden, November 26, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Robert Orr to James Buchanan, October 4, 1850, Buchanan MSS (HSP); Hendrick B. Wright to James Buchanan, November, 13, 1848, quoted in Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 159.
- 110. The following table lists changes in the parties' totals in different regions between 1844 and 1848. The four new states of Iowa, Wisconsin, Florida, and Texas are included, and the Free Soil gains are measured against the Liberty party vote in 1844.

	Whig	Democrat	Free Soil
New England	-15,457	-33,211	+ 52,142
 	(-8.3%)	(-18.7%)
Mid-Atlantic	+12,851	-118,483	+116,230
	(+3%)	(-26.8%)
Midwest	+16,360	+36,207	+ 64,054
	(+5.6%)	(+11.5%)
South Atlantic	+12,639	-1,677
	(+7.3%)	(-1%)
South Central	+21,317	-10,407
(Ky., Tenn., Ala., Miss.)	(+12.8%)	(-5.9%)
Southwest	+14,380	+11,539
(Ark., La., Tex.)	(+28.9%)	(+17.8%)

- 111. James F. Cooper to Howell Cobb, November 11, 1848, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," p. 137; William Dickinson to George Houston, December 17, 1848, Houston MSS; Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 179–80.
- 112. Calabro, "Collapse in Florida," p. 16. Calabro used the congressional election of 1848 rather than the presidential because turnout was substantially higher in October than in November. His regression estimates are contained in the following table.

	1040
XA71. : .	D

1846	Whig	Democratic	Nonvoters
Whig	88%	6%	6%
Democratic	18%	49%	33%
Nonvoters	18%	12%	70%

- 113. See Table I in McCrary, Miller, and Baum, "Class and Party." These estimates, it must be noted, cannot logically account for the substantial increase of the Whig vote in all three states, and their reliability has been questioned in Benson, "Mistransference Fallacy," 127.
- 114. Table 13 in Alexander, "Voter Partisan Constancy," pp. 98-99. Unlike the other two studies cited, Alexander does not consider movements to and from the nonvoting category. Hence his estimates of Democratic losses must appear as Whig gains when many probably did not vote at all. Because the overall participation rates were down, however, more faith can be placed in his estimates of the share of its 1844 vote that each party retained.
- 115. Again, Professor Alexander's estimates of voter movements between 1844 and 1848, cited in note 114, suggest that almost twice the proportion of Democrats switched to Taylor in the lower South as in the upper South. In the eight upper South states, the unweighted average arithmetic decline in the turnout rate was 8.3, compared to 4.6 in the four lower South states with popular votes in 1844, although the increased turnout in Louisiana offset sharp drop-offs in the other three.
- 116. That nonslaveholders had a racial, economic, ideological, or symbolic stake in the defense of slavery and Southern Rights seems to me a central point of consensus among scholars who disagree about much else when interpreting the antebellum South. It seems unnecessary to list all the works by William J. Cooper, Mills Thornton, James Oakes, Bertram Wyatt-Brown, George Frederickson, Eugene D. Genovese, and Harry L. Watson, among others, that I have in mind. Watson, "Conflict and Collaboration," synthesizes much of the relevant literature, as does Thornton, "Ethic of Subsistence."
- 117. When totals from Iowa and Wisconsin are excluded, the Whigs' vote in the Midwest declined by 7,307 (2.5 percent) between 1844 and 1848. Whigs gained votes in Indiana and Illinois but lost them in Michigan and heavily in Ohio, where the Whig total declined by 16,435 (10.6 percent). In the six New England states, the total decline was 15,457 (8.3 percent).
- 118. Alexander, "Voter Partisan Constancy," pp. 98-99. Even including Iowa and Wisconsin, the Democratic gain in the Midwest between 1844 and 1848 was 36,207 compared to a gain of 61,757 in the four other midwestern states between 1840 and 1844.
- 119. Joseph Vance to Crittenden, November 13, 1848, William Bebb to Crittenden, November 24, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Table 4, Appendix C, in Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 244. In making these calculations, I have converted the negative estimates in the table to zero and reduced the positive estimates proportionately to their size.
- 120. William Woodbridge to Daniel Webster, November 27, 1848, Webster MSS; Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties, p. 30.
 - 121. Current, Wisconsin, pp. 202–04.
- 122. John Defrees to Weed, September 30, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Richard W. Thompson to Crittenden, October 21, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Schuyler Colfax to Caleb B. Smith, November 17, 1848, Thomas Dowling to Smith, January 5, 1849, misdated 1848, Smith MSS.
 - 123. Elihu B. Washburne to Cadwallader C. Washburne, November 12, 1848, Washburne

MSS (Norlands); David Davis to Julius Rockwell, December 7, 1848, David Davis MSS. For the changes in the new state constitution that caused Whig hope and Democratic despair in Illinois, see note 74.

- 124. John W. Allen to William H. Seward, November 13, 1848, Seward MSS (RU).
- 125. The Free Soilers' share of the vote was 1.1 percent in New Jersey and 3.0 percent in Pennsylvania.
- 126. My former doctoral student Lex Renda calculated the following regression estimates for New Jersey voter movement between the presidential elections of 1844 and 1848. The small Liberty and Free Soil totals (131 and 849 votes, respectively) were included in the Nonvoters categories for 1844 and 1848.

		% of 1848
1844	Whig	Democrats	Nonvoters	Electorate
Whig	29	1	5	35
Democratic	2	31	2	35
Nonvoters	6	2	22	30
% of 1848 electorate	37	34	29	100

- 127. E. G. Lindsey to Millard Fillmore, January 28, 1851, MFP-BHS; Adam Diller et al. to J. J. Crittenden, November 11, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); John M. Niles to Gideon Welles, November 8, 1848, Welles MSS (LC).
 - 128. Current, Wisconsin, pp. 202-04.
- 129. Alexander, "Harbinger," pp. 28, 30, also concludes that identifying Whig bolters to the Free Soil party in Pennsylvania is impossible because virtually all of the gain this party enjoyed over the Liberty party in 1844 came from former Democrats. Examination of county-level returns suggests that if Whigs did defect to the new party anywhere in the state, it was most likely in a few western counties near Ohio like Beaver, Mercer, and Crawford.
- 130. Alexander, "Voter Partisan Constancy," Table 13, pp. 98–99. The large number of estimated abstentions in New England and the net decline in both major parties' votes between 1844 and 1848 may in part reflect the movement of 1844 voters out of the region to other states.
- 131. McLean to John Teesdale, December 10, 1848, McLean MSS (OHS); Joseph Vance to J. J. Crittenden, November 13, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 132. O. H. Smith to Crittenden, November 16, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Schuyler Colfax to Caleb B. Smith, November, 17, 1848, Smith MSS.
- 133. A. M. Baker to Fillmore, October 23, 1848, MFP-O; Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties, p. 30. Whigs won only 18 percent of the seats in each house of the Michigan legislature in 1848.
- 134. Howe edged out a Democrat by 348 votes. In November, Taylor ran behind Cass by 1,072 votes in the counties composing the district, while Van Buren garnered 1,776 votes, a gain of 968 over Birney's total in 1844.
- 135. Democrats' share of the Maine gubernatorial vote fell from 51.3 percent in 1847 to 47 percent in 1848. Their membership in the lower house of the state legislature dropped from 78 percent in 1847 to 55 percent in 1848; they remained overwhelmingly dominant in the state senate, however.
- 136. The best analysis of the peculiar apportionment law in Massachusetts and its relationship to fluctuations in Free Soil and Whig strength in the legislature is Sweeney, "Rum." After the 1847 elections 295 men were sent to the lower house of the state legislature; after the 1848 elections, 243 were sent. As with all figures for the partisan composition in state legislatures, I have used the data from the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research at the University of Michigan. For an analysis of the apportionment system that gave Massachusetts Whigs firm control of the state senate, as well as of the reasons for George Briggs' customary popularity, which made his low vote in 1848 unusual, see Formisano, Transformation of Political Culture, pp. 299–301, 329.

Notes Notes

- 137. John H. Clifford to Robert C. Winthrop, November 19, 1848, Winthrop MSS.
- 138. Thomas Foote to Fillmore, November 9, 1848, MFP-O; Benjamin F. Wade to Caroline Wade, November 21, 1848, Wade MSS.
- 139. John W. Head to Robert L. Caruthers, December 9, 1848, Caruthers MSS; Fillmore to Zachary Taylor, November 11, 1848, copy, Leslie Combs to Fillmore, November 10, 1848, Harry Bradley to Fillmore, November 28, 1848, John Bowson to Fillmore, with unidentifiable newspaper clipping entitled "The Taylor Republican Party" enclosed, November 23, 1848, MFP-O; John B. Mower to Crittenden, November 12, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Alexander H. Stephens to Crittenden, December 5, 1848, Crittenden MSS (Duke).

CHAPTER 12

- 1. A. C. Brown to Millard Fillmore, November 21, 1848, Harry Bradley to Fillmore, November 28, 1848, MFP-O; Theodore Barnett to Caleb B. Smith, December 6, 1848, Smith MSS.
- 2. Philo Shelton to Thurlow Weed, January 22, 1849, Weed MSS (RU). March 4, the normal date for an inauguration, fell on a Sunday, and Taylor waited until Monday, March 5, to be sworn in.
- 3. A number of secondary accounts provide good analyses of the second session of the Thirtieth Congress. In this and subsequent paragraphs I have relied most heavily upon Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 240–51; Potter, Impending Crisis, pp. 82–89; Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 241–56; and especially Cooper, "'The Only Door.'"
- 4. Potter, Impending Crisis, p. 84. Palfrey's bill called for congressional abolition in the District; Giddings proposed a plebescite by the residents of the District on the continuation of slavery there. Gott, who had won with 49.2 percent of the vote in 1846, garnered only 42.2 percent in 1848, and his absolute vote was also smaller that year. In 1848, his Free Soil opponent won 38.5 percent and the Democrat 19.5 percent. Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections, pp. 583, 588. Apparently Gott's desire to placate his own antislavery constituents, rather than any preconcerted northern Whig plan, motivated his resolution, and even other northern Whigs considered its preamble unnecessarily insulting to the South. See Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, December 30, 1848, MFP-O.
- 5. Hopkins Holsey to Howell Cobb, January 29, 1849, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," 142–45; John Beire to Daniel M. Barringer, February 3, 1849, Barringer MSS; Daniel Lee to Fillmore, January 25, 1849, MFP-O; Potter, Impending Crisis, p. 88.
- 6. Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 245–46; Thomas B. Stevenson to Caleb B. Smith, December 12, 25, 1848, Smith MSS; N. K. Hall to Fillmore, January 8, 1849, MFP-O; Hopkins Holsey to Howell Cobb, February 13, 1849, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 148–52.
 - 7. Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 243-44; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 269-70.
- 8. John C. Calhoun to James E. Calhoun, January 17, 1849, Calhoun MSS; Alexander H. Stephens to John J. Crittenden, January 17, 1849, draft, Stephens MSS (Duke); George E. Badger to Crittenden, January 13, 1849, Robert Toombs to Crittenden, January 13, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Robert T. Scott to Reuben Chapman, January 27, 1849, Reuben Chapman MSS (Governors' Records, ADAH).
- 9. Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, January 31, 1849, Everett MSS; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, January 15, 1849, Outlaw MSS; Badger to Crittenden, January 17, 1849, Toombs to Crittenden, January 22, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Stephens to Crittenden, January 17, 1849, draft, Stephens MSS (Duke).
- 10. Potter, Impending Crisis, pp. 84–86; Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 246–47; Toombs to Crittenden, January 22, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).
 - 11. Holt, Political Crisis, p. 69.
- 12. The two Whigs who signed the Southern Address were John Gayle of Alabama and Patrick W. Tompkins of Mississippi. The four Democrats who denounced it were Howell Cobb and Joseph Lumpkin of Georgia, and Linn Boyd and Beverly Clarke of Kentucky. For evidence that southern Democrats from nonslaveholding hill regions feared and resented the radicalism of the Southern Address, see Robert T. Scott to Reuben Chapman, January 27, 1849, Reuben

Chapman MSS; and Hopkins Holsey to Howell Cobb, January 29, 1849, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 142-45.

- 13. Toombs to Crittenden, January 22, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Hopkins Holsey to Howell Cobb, January 29, February 13, 1849, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," 142–45, 148–52; Henry W. Hilliard to John M. Berrien, May 8, 1849, in McCrary, "Hilliard"; P. Fauntleroy to Henry Bedinger, January 17, 1849, Bedinger-Dandridge MSS; John Phillips to James McDowell, February 5, 1849, McDowell MSS; Alexander Stephens to George W. Crawford, March 20, 1849, Stephens MSS (LC); Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 140–46.
 - 14. N. K. Hall to Fillmore, January 12, 1849, MFP-O; Potter, Impending Crisis, p. 88.
 - 15. Dan Coleman to Daniel M. Barringer, January 10, 1849, Barringer MSS.
- 16. See the letters of Stephens and Toombs to Crittenden cited in note 9; Hopkins Holsey to Howell Cobb, January 29, 1849, loc. cit.; William Penniman to John M. Clayton, December 3, 1848, Clayton MSS; William L. Hodge to Fillmore, November 16, 1848, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, January 8, 1849, and Daniel Lee to Fillmore, January 25, 1849, MFP-O.
- 17. J. J. Crittenden to John M. Clayton, December 19, 1848, Clayton MSS; Toombs to Crittenden, January 22, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Daniel Lee to Fillmore, January 25, 1849, MFP-O.
 - 18. Brock, Political Conscience, pp. 244-45; ZT:SWH, p. 181.
- 19. Congressional Globe, 30th Cong., 2nd Sess., p. 477; Toombs to Crittenden, January 22, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).
 - 20. Cooper, "'The Only Door'," loc. cit.
 - 21. Robert T. Scott to Reuben Chapman, March 5, 1849, Reuben Chapman MSS.
- 22. William Upham to Justin Morrill, September 23, 1848, Morrill MSS; for the characterization of Collamer as conceited, see Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, March 17, 1850, Greeley-Colfax MSS.
 - 23. Doherty, Whigs of Florida, pp. 22-23, 31-32.
- 24. My account of North Carolina in this and subsequent paragraphs relies on Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 145–59; Walton, "Elections . . . in North Carolina"; Jeffrey, "Clingman"; Kruman, "Clingman"; Inscoe, "Clingman."
 - 25. Table 1 in Jeffrey, "Clingman," 369.
- 26. Thomas L. Clingman to Willie P. Mangum, September 1, 1848, Mangum MSS (Duke).
- 27. J. R. Hargrave to Daniel M. Barringer, December 13, 1848, J. M. Long to Barringer, December 15, 1848, Barringer MSS.
- 28. Long to Barringer, December 15, 1848, Barringer MSS; David L. Swain to William H. Battle, December 16, 1848, Battle Family Papers.
- 29. B. G. A. Love to Thomas Clingman, December 16, 1848, B. M. Edney to Clingman, December 16, 1848, Clingman-Puryear Family Papers; D. F. Moore to Daniel M. Barringer, December 29, 1848, Barringer MSS.
- 30. D. F. Moore to Barringer, December 29, 1848, J. R. Hargrave to Barringer, January 18, 1849, Barringer MSS: Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 149–50.
- 31. Harry Woods to Samuel Calvin, November 17, 1848, Calvin MSS; Adam Diller to John J. Crittenden, November 11, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); B. B. Chamberlain to Millard Fillmore, January 11, 1849, MFP-O; for the factional division in Pittsburgh, see Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 73–74.
- 32. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 160–61; James Cooper to Millard Fillmore, March 13, 1851, MFP-BHS. Cooper told Fillmore that when Johnston was still a Democrat, Whigs had bribed him to whitewash a legislative investigation of the deal in the 1830s by which Thaddeus Stevens obtained a state charter for the Bank of the United States. He also said that in 1848 Johnston became president of the state senate, the post from which he became acting governor upon Shunk's resignation, against the will of senate Whigs, by threatening to help elect a Democrat unless the Whigs supported him.
- 33. Ibid; William F. Johnston to J. J. Crittenden, January 17, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Townsend Haines to William M. Meredith, March 17, 1849, Meredith MSS.

Notes Notes

- 34. Trumbull Cary to Thurlow Weed, December 15, 1848, Washington Hunt to Weed, January 28, 1849, Weed MSS (RU).
- 35. Seward to Weed, May 27, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Zachary Taylor to Fillmore, December 4, 1848, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, December 25, 1848, January 9, 1849, E. T. Osgood to Fillmore, January 19, 1849, David B. Ogden to Fillmore, January 22, 1849, MFP-O; James Watson Webb to Seward, January 28, 1849, Weed to Seward, January 28, 1849, Seward MSS (RU).
- 36. Benjamin Harwood to Seward, December 10, 1848, Richard M. Blatchford to Seward, December 10, 1848, Seth Hawley to Seward, January 23, 1849, Weed to Seward, March 11, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Andrew Bray Dickson to Weed, November 24, 1848, George W. Buck to Weed, December 12, 1848, David H. Abell to Weed, December 1848, Seward to Weed, January 4, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); William A. Cornwall to Fillmore, December 17, 1848, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, December 20, 25, 1848, MFP-O; John C. Spencer to C. B. Penrose, April 12, 1849, Meredith MSS.
- 37. Weed to Seward, December 2, 10, 12, 1848, January 9, 16, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Washington Hunt to Weed, December 12, 16, 1848, January 22, 28, 29, 1849, Washington Hunt to Alvah Hunt, January 21, 1849, and Washington Hunt to Morgan Johnson, January 19, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); N. K. Hall to Fillmore, December 20, 25, 1848, January 9, 1849, Alfred Babcock to Fillmore, December 30, 1848, MFP-O. There were 107 Whigs in the house and 24 in the senate, and Seward was believed to be assured of 70 to 80 votes if the caucus met.
- 38. Ibid. Weed to Seward, March 11, 1849, Seward MSS (RU). For a description of the powers of the comptroller, see Gideon Hard to Fillmore, November 20, 1848, and D. O. Kellogg to Fillmore, November 29, 1847, MFP-O. Not only did the comptroller chair the canal board, he also supervised the deposit of state funds in different banks and the regulation of banks and railroads. He had more direct impact on businessmen in the state than any other public official.
- 39. See Fillmore's Comptroller's Report, December 30, 1848, in Severance, "Millard Fillmore Papers," 10, 275–83, and for contemporary praise of it, see Schuyler Colfax to Fillmore, March 10, 1849, MFP-O; Weed to Seward, December 10, 12, 1848, January 16, 28, March 11, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to Weed, December 5, 7, 1848, David H. Abell to Weed, December 18, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Fillmore to Taylor, November 11, 1848, Thomas Foote to Fillmore, November 14, 1848, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, December 20, 26, 1848, January 8, 1849, James Woods to Fillmore, January 9, 1849, E. T. Osgood to Fillmore, January 19, 1849, MFP-O.
- 40. Weed to Seward, January 28, February 4, March 11, 1849, James Watson Webb to Seward, January 28, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to James Watson Webb, February 1, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); N. K. Hall to Fillmore, February 11, 1849, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, March 16, 1849, Gideon Hard to Fillmore, March 18, 1849, MFP-O; Van Deusen, Seward, pp. 112–15.
 - 41. Poage, Clay, pp. 189-91.
 - 42. Ibid.; John Bowson to Fillmore, November 23, 1848, MFP-O.
- 43. Clayton to Crittenden, January 23, 1849, Johnson to Crittenden, December 12, 1848, Pendleton to Crittenden, December 22, 1848, Burnley to Crittenden, January 12, 1849, Dayton to Crittenden, December 14, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Stephens to Crittenden, January 17, 1849, draft, Stephens MSS (Duke); William B. Campbell to David Campbell, February 23, 1848, CFP; N. K. Hall to Fillmore, December 26, 30, 1848, January 8, 12, 1849, MFP-O; Philo Shelton to Thurlow Weed, January 22, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); J. G. Marshall to George Dunn, January 28, 1849, Dunn MSS; Poage, Clay, p. 190.
- 44. Henry Clay to Nicholas Dean, August 24, 1848, Thomas J. Clay MSS; Nicholas Carroll to Henry Clay, November 11, 1848, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Leslie Combs to John M. Clayton, January 22, 1849, Clayton MSS; Philo Shelton to Weed, January 22, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Thomas B. Stevenson to Caleb Smith, December 7, 1848, January 5, 18, 1849, Smith MSS; John A. McClung to Crittenden, January 6, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 45. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 121-46; Potter, Impending Crisis, pp. 49, 73, and passim.
- 46. In addition to the chapter in Maizlish's book cited above, my account of the Ohio legislative session in this and subsequent paragraphs relies on the following secondary works: Holt, "Party Politics in Ohio," 319–402; Pershing, "General Assembly of Ohio," 222–83, especially 232–42; Erickson, "Repeal of Ohio's Black Laws"; and Blue, "Ohio Free Soilers."

- 47. To prevent passage of the law, Democrats withdrew from the state senate to deny the quorum necessary to enact legislation, yet senate Whigs found a pretext to pass the law anyway. That action and the Democratic attempt at obstructionism in part generated the charges of revolutionary anarchism. Traditionally, Hamilton County had been awarded five house and two senate seats, although only one of the two senators was elected each year. The Whig apportionment law of 1848 created one district out of the first eight wards of Cincinnati and allocated two house and one senate seat to it. It was the district Whigs expected to carry. The other district, consisting of Cincinnati's remaining wards and the rest of the county, was allotted one senate and three house seats. Democrats were expected to carry it easily. The reason the state senator elected in 1848 did not raise a dispute was that he would represent the safe Democratic district. In 1849, the senate contest in the controversial Cincinnati district would produce the same kind of conflict that the house election did in 1848.
- 48. John Harris to Fillmore, December 15, 1848, MFP-O; Oran Follett to William H. Seward, November 30, 1848, Seward MSS (RU); James Ferguson to Austin Brown, December 9, 1848, Brown MSS; John L. Miner to John McLean, December 14, 1848, McLean MSS (LC). Authorities disagree about the exact strength of the three parties in the two chambers, and my figures in the text represent an amalgam of their estimates and the data gathered by Walter Dean Burnham for the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research at the University of Michigan. Burnham lists thirty-three Democrats, thirty-one Whigs, and eight Free Soilers in the house, which means that Whigs and Democrats were at even strength before the resolution of the disputed Cincinnati seats.
- 49. Edward Wade to Albert G. Riddle, December 10, 1848, Riddle MSS; E. S. Hamlin to John McLean, December 9, 1848, John L. Miner to McLean, December 12, 1848, John Teesdale to McLean, January 5, 1849, McLean MSS (LC); Salmon P. Chase to Belle Chase, December 30, 1848, Chase MSS (LC); Samuel Lewis to Joshua R. Giddings, March 20, 1849, Giddings-Julian MSS.
- 50. Oran Follett to Seward, November 30, 1848, Seward MSS (RU); A. S. Brewer to Thomas Ewing, November 27, 1848, David Peck to Ewing, November 27, 1848, George Riles to Ewing, January 16, 1849, William Bebb to Crittenden, November 24, 1848, EFP; Salmon Chase to Belle Chase, February 15, 1849, Chase MSS (LC); John L. Miner to McLean, December 14, 1848, John Teesdale to McLean, January 5, 1849, McLean MSS (LC).
- 51. Giddings to Albert G. Riddle, November 25, 1848, Riddle MSS; Miner to McLean, December 14, 1848, McLean MSS (LC); George Riles to Thomas Ewing, January 16, 27, 1849, EFP; Salmon Chase to Belle Chase, February 15, 1849, Chase MSS (LC).
- 52. H. C. Whitman to William Allen, January 29, 1849, Allen MSS; A. S. Brewer to Thomas Ewing, November 27, 1848, David Peck to Ewing, November 27, 1848, EFP; Alfred Thomas to Salmon Chase, February 1, 1849, Chase MSS (LC); R. G. Corwin to Caleb Smith, February 7, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 53. Salmon Chase to Belle Chase, December 30, 1848, February 15, 1849, Chase MSS (LC); E. S. Hamlin to Chase, January 19, 27, 1849, Chase MSS (HSP); John Woods to Thomas Ewing, January 24, 1849, George Riles to Ewing, January 23, 27, February 13, 1849, EFP; R. G. Corwin to Caleb Smith, February 7, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 54. James H. Briggs to Thomas Ewing, March 10, 1849, Oran Follett to Ewing, April 30, 1849, E. N. Sill to Ewing, April 6, 1849, EFP; Oran Follett to Fillmore, March 10, 1849, J. Ridgeway to Fillmore, December 12, 1848, MFP-O. Historians who insist that Chase's election increased the pressure on northern Whigs to oppose concessions to the South on slavery extension, in sum, are absolutely correct.
- 55. B. S. Cowen to Thomas Ewing, April 9, 1849, EFP; R. G. Corwin to Caleb Smith, February 7, 1849, Smith MSS; John Reaves to John McLean, January 31, 1849, McLean MSS (LC); Alfred Thomas to Chase, February 1, 1849, Chase MSS (LC); Samuel Lewis to Giddings, March 20, 1849, Giddings-Julian MSS.
- 56. The following table lists the average index of disagreement between Whigs and Democrats, Free Soilers and Democrats, and Free Soilers and Whigs on roll-call votes in the state house of representatives during the 1848–49 session. It indicates that most Free Soilers voted with the Whigs against the Democrats on most matters except constitutional revision.

	No. of Votes	Whig/ Democratic	Free Soil/ Democratic	Free Soil/ Whig
Business incorporation	33	71	71	10
Stockholder liability	19	83	75	10
Banking and currency	8	100	86	13
Internal improvements	26	67	64	8
Slavery and race	9	40	58	15
Constitutional revision	9	84	14	72

Note: These figures are taken from the tables in Shadle, "Consensus."

- 57. Columbus Delano to Thomas Ewing, April 10, 1849, Oran Follett to Ewing, April 30, 1849, EFP; Boston Daily Advertiser, April 3, 1849.
- 58. Crittenden to Clayton, November 14, 1848, Clayton MSS; Alexander C. Bullitt to Crittenden, December 3, 1848, John Pendleton to Crittenden, December 22, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Alexander Stephens to Crittenden, January 17, 1849, draft, Stephens MSS (Duke); Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, November 14, 1848, Kennedy MSS; Seward to Weed, December 10, 11, 1848, Truman Smith to Seward, January 7, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Zachary Taylor to Fillmore, December 4, 1848, James Watson Webb to Fillmore, December 22, 1848, MFP-O; Washington Barrow to William B. Campbell, January 6, 1849, CFP.
- 59. William L. Hodge to Fillmore, December 11, 1848, MFP-O; Stephens to Crittenden, January 17, 1849, draft, Stephens MSS (Duke).
- 60. J. B. Mower to Crittenden, November 12, 19, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); for other examples of the determination to purge all vestiges of Clayism, Websterism, and National Republicanism, see S. Pleasonton to John M. Clayton, November 22, 1848, Clayton MSS; John Bowson to Fillmore, November 23, 1848, MFP-O; and E. Joy Morris to Daniel M. Barringer, November 10, 1848, Barringer MSS.
- 61. Richard M. Blatchford to Crittenden, December 4, 1848, Nathan Appleton to Crittenden, November 20, 1848, John Pendleton to Crittenden, December 22, 1848, John Clayton to Crittenden, December 13, 1848, James S. Pike to Crittenden, January 26, 1849, Joseph Grinnell to Crittenden, January 31, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Daniel Webster to Hiram Ketchum, November 27, 1848, February 9, 1849, Webster MSS; Weed to Seward, December 2, 1848, Seward MSS (RU); Philo Shelton to Weed, November 27, 1848, January 22, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Elihu B. Washburne to Cadwallader C. Washburn, December 12, 1848, Washburne MSS (Norlands); Harry Bradley to Fillmore, November 28, 1848, William Pitt Fessenden to Fillmore, January 26, 1849, Nathan Appleton to Fillmore, February 6, 1849, MFP; Crittenden to John Davis, January 26, 1849, Philip Greely to John Davis, January 20, 22, February 23, 1849, John Davis MSS; Daniel Ullmann to John M. Clayton, December 5, 1848 (quotation), Clayton MSS.
- 62. Alexander C. Bullitt to Crittenden, December 3, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Thomas B. Stevenson to Caleb Smith, February 16, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 63. Thomas Dowling to Caleb B. Smith, February 21, 1849 (quotation), Smith MSS; Weed to Seward, December 2, 10, 12, 1848, March 4, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to Weed, December 10, 11, 1848, February 27, March 1, 4, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Stephens to Crittenden, January 17, 1849, Stephens MSS (Duke); Washington Barrow to William B. Campbell, January 6, 1849, CFP.
- 64. Ibid.; R. G. Corwin to Caleb Smith, January 19, 1849, Schuyler Colfax to Caleb Smith, March 3, 1849, Smith MSS; Caleb Smith to Allen Hamilton, December 20, 1848, Hamilton MSS; Truman Smith to Seward, January 7, 1849, Weed MSS (RU).
 - 65. Washington Barrow to William B. Campbell, January 6, 1849, CFP.
- 66. William Bebb to Crittenden, November 24, 1848, EFP; Caleb Smith to Allen Hamilton, December 20, 1848, Hamilton MSS; Thomas B. Stevenson to Caleb Smith, December 12, 1848, January 9, 1849, R. G. Corwin to Caleb Smith, January 19, 1849, Schuyler Colfax to Caleb Smith, March 3, April 2, 1849, Elihu B. Washburne to Caleb Smith, May 4, 1849, Smith MSS.

- 67. Thos. B. Stevenson to Caleb Smith, December 7, 1848, February 16, 1849, John Defrees to Smith, February 18, 1849, Colfax to Smith, March 3, 1849, Smith MSS.
 - 68. Stevenson to Caleb Smith, January 5, 18, 27, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 69. John Bowson to Fillmore, November 23, 1848 (quotation), A. D. Chaloner to Fillmore, December 4, 1848, Zachary Taylor to Fillmore, December 4, 1848, clipping of the resolutions of the Natchez Rough and Ready Club, January 22, 1849, MFP-O; J. W. White to John M. Clayton (quotation), April 30, 1849, Clayton MSS; Nathaniel Pope to Crittenden, November 19, 1848 (quotation), Crittenden MSS (LC).
 - 70. Albert T. Burnley to Crittenden, January 12, July 22, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 71. Alexander C. Bullitt to Crittenden, December 3, 1848, John Pendleton to Crittenden, December 22, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); William L. Hodge to Fillmore, December 11, 1848, MFP-O; Seward to Weed, November 29, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); T. B. Stevenson to Caleb Smith, December 7, 1848, Smith MSS; Stephens to Crittenden, January 17, 1849, Stephens MSS (Duke); Kirwan, Crittenden, pp. 235–37.
- 72. Crittenden to Clayton, November 14, December 19, 1848, Clayton MSS; Clayton to Crittenden, December 13, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); Seward to Weed, November 29, December 10, 11, 1848, Truman Smith to Seward, January 7, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); James Watson Webb to Fillmore, December 12, 1848, MFP-O; Daniel Webster to Hiram Ketchum, November 27, 1848, Webster MSS.
- 73. Poage, Clay, pp. 188–89, and the numerous letters between the two in the Crittenden and Clayton Papers.
 - 74. Crittenden to Clayton, December 19, 1848, Clayton MSS.
 - 75. Crittenden to Clayton, November 14, 1848, July 8, 1849, Clayton MSS.
- 76. Seward to Weed, December 3, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Clayton to Crittenden, November 8, December 13, 1848, January 23, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 77. E. Joy Morris to Daniel M. Barringer, November 10, 1848, Barringer MSS; A. D. Chaloner to Fillmore, December 4, 1848, MFP-O; Morton McMichael to Clayton, December 3, 1848, Robert M. Bird to Clayton, n.d., Clayton MSS; Clayton to Crittenden, December 13, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 78. Crittenden to Clayton, December 19, 1848, William D. Lewis to Clayton, December 18, 1848, E. C. Reigart to Clayton, February 19, 1849, Clayton MSS; Seward to Weed, December 3, 11, 1848, Weed MSS (RU); Seward to Josiah Randall, November 29, 1848, Seward MSS (RU); William L. Hodge to Fillmore, December 11, 1848, MFP-O; Thomas B. Stevenson to Caleb Smith, February 16, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 79. William D. Lewis to Clayton, December 18, 1848, M [McMichael?] to Clayton, n.d., Robert M. Bird to Clayton, n.d., Townsend Haines to Clayton, March 1, 1849, Clayton MSS; William B. Reed to Fillmore, March 2, 1849, Gideon Ball to Fillmore, March 2, 1849, Isaac Davis to Fillmore, March 3, 1849, MFP-O.
- 80. Alexander C. Bullitt to Crittenden, December 3, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC); William L. Hodge to Fillmore, December 11, 1848, MFP-O; ZT:SWH, pp. 137, 151.
- 81. Thomas B. Stevenson to Caleb Smith, February 16, 1849, Smith MSS; Leslie Combs to Fillmore, February 23, 1849, MFP-O; Memo by Thomas Ewing on Clayton's appointment, May 1849, EFP; Webster to ?, February 22, 1849, Webster to Richard M. Blatchford, February 25, 1849, Webster MSS; Crittenden to Clayton, December 19, 1848, Clayton MSS; Crittenden to John Davis, January 26, 1849, John Davis MSS.
- 82. ZT:SWH, pp. 147-52; Seward to Weed, November 29, 1848, February 27, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); J. J. Burnett to William B. Campbell, March 12, 1849, CFP.
- 83. Webster to Richard M. Blatchford, February 25, 1849, Webster MSS; Seward to Weed, February 27, March 1, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Seward to Wife, March 1, 1849, in Seward at Washington, p. 101.
- 84. Seward to Weed, February 27, March 1, 4, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Webster to Clayton, March 3, 4, 1849, Clayton MSS; J. J. Burnett to William B. Campbell, March 12, 1849, CFP.
- 85. Burnett to Campbell, March 12, 1849, CFP; E. J. Hale to Daniel M. Barringer, March 12, 1849, Barringer MSS; Schuyler Colfax to Caleb Smith, March 3, April 2, 1849, Smith MSS; Webster to Franklin Haven, March 10, 1849, Webster MSS; Horace Greeley to Thomas B.

Stevenson, February 27, 1849, Henry Clay to Stevenson, April 21, 1849, Stevenson MSS; Iverson L. Harris to John M. Berrien, August 17, 1849, Berrien MSS; Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, March 17, 1850, Greeley-Colfax MSS.

- 86. Truman Smith to Thomas Ewing, April 6, 1849, EFP; Webster to Franklin Haven, March 10, 1849, Webster MSS; Seward to Weed, March 4, 1849, Weed MSS (RU).
- 87. In 1847 Preston won by only 325 votes in a district Democrats had carried handily in 1843 and 1845, and some of his constituents considered him the only Whig they could elect in 1849. In any event, the Whigs lost the seat with a different candidate in May. See ? to William Ballard Preston, January 26, 1849, and John B. Floyd to Preston, February 19, 1849, Preston MSS.
- 88. William L. Hodge to Fillmore, December 11, 1848, MFP-O; ZT:SWH, pp. 142–43, 152–53. According to Robert W. Fogel, the most recent estimates of econometricians indicate that in 1850 the entire cotton crop of the South was grown on only 6 percent of the cultivated acreage in the cotton regions of the South and that output could be doubled simply by converting 1/15th of the land planted in other crops to cotton. In essence, that is what happened during the 1850s. See Fogel, Without Consent, p. 71.
- 89. Seward wrote Weed on March 4 that Southerners objected to both Caleb and Truman Smith on the grounds that they were antislavery men, yet Collamer could hardly have been more acceptable to them. Collamer had steadfastly supported the Gott resolution and voted against efforts to reconsider it. Both Caleb Smith and Truman Smith, in contrast, refused to vote on the original motion to pass the Gott resolution, even though both were on the House floor, and both later supported reconsideration. Collamer, in short, was a more hard-line antislavery man than either Smith. Congressional Globe, 30th Cong., 2nd Sess., 83–107, 212–16.
- 90. Taylor did not regard McLean as an ultra Whig like the supporters of Clay and Webster, but he did dislike him as a rival and considered his letters to newspapers on current affairs improper behavior for a Supreme Court justice. Alexander C. Bullitt to Crittenden, December 3, 1848, Crittenden MSS (LC).

CHAPTER 13

- 1. Clayton to Crittenden, January 23, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 2. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 4-6.
- 3. ZT:SWH, pp. 170–71; Walter Taylor to William H. Seward, April 1, 1849, William L. Hodge to Seward, June 2, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Balie Peyton to William B. Campbell, April 14, 1849, CFP; Albert T. Burnley to Crittenden, January 12, July 22, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 4. For the pay of skilled and unskilled labor, see Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 28–31; and Wilentz, Chants Democratic, pp. 117, 405.
- 5. E. Joy Morris to Daniel M. Barringer, November 10, 1848, Willie P. Mangum to Barringer, May 30, 1849, Barringer MSS; Summers, Plundering Generation, pp. 23–40.
- 6. Seward to Weed, March 6, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Nathan K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, March 10, 1849, MFP-O; William F. Johnston to William M. Meredith, May 7, 1849, Meredith MSS.
- 7. John Defrees to Thomas Ewing, March 14, 1849, EFP; Townsend Haines to William M. Meredith, March 17, 1849, Meredith MSS; N. K. Hall to Fillmore, March 10, 1849, Thomas Foote to Fillmore, March 12, 24, 1849, Gideon Hard to Fillmore, March 18, 1849, and Dennis Bowen to Fillmore, March 24, 1849, MFP-O.
- 8. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, May 14, 1849, CFP; Thomas Foote to Millard Fillmore, April 4, 1849, MFP-O; Samuel D. Hubbard to John M. Clayton, May 22, 1849, Clayton MSS; Samuel Calvin to Fitz Henry Warren, April 5, 1849, Calvin MSS.
- 9. Crittenden to Clayton, July 20, 1849, Clayton MSS; C. A. Trowbridge to Thomas Ewing, October 15, 1849, EFP.
- 10. John Defrees to Caleb B. Smith, May 23, 1849, Smith MSS; Balie Peyton to William B. Campbell, November 7, 1849, CFP.
- 11. ZT:SWH, pp. 203-18; Seward to Weed, March 10, 24, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Zachary Taylor to Henry Clay, May 28, 1849, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Walter Cunningham to William

- H. Seward, June 27, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Crittenden to John M. Clayton, July 10, 1849, Clayton MSS.
 - 12. ZT:SWH, p. 204; Bauer, Zachary Taylor, pp. 259-60.
- 13. ZT:SWH, pp. 216–17; Millard Fillmore to Edward Everett, July 11, 1849, Everett MSS; Orlando Brown to John J. Crittenden, July 10, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); J. G. Marshall to Richard W. Thompson, April 23, 1849, Thompson MSS (Ind.SL).
- 14. Abraham Lincoln to John M. Clayton, July 28, 1849, Crittenden to Clayton, July 8, 1849, Clayton MSS; Fillmore to Everett, July 11, 1849, Everett MSS; Orlando Brown to Crittenden, July 10, 1849, Nathan Sargent to Crittenden, July 15, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); J. G. Marshall to Richard W. Thompson, April 23, 1849, Thompson MSS (Ind.SL).
- 15. W. W. Carter to William M. Meredith, May 2, 1849, William C. Dawson to Meredith, June 15, 1849, Meredith MSS; Orlando Brown to Crittenden, June 27, July 10, August 29, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 16. C. S. Morehead to John M. Clayton, March 14, 1849, Thompson MSS (Lincoln National Life Foundation); John Pendleton to John J. Crittenden, May 22, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); E. D. Baker to John M. Clayton, March 20, 1849, Clayton MSS; Willie P. Mangum to Daniel M. Barringer, May 30, 1849, Barringer MSS; Moses Hampton to Thomas Butler King, April 5, 1849, King MSS; Henry Hillard to Nathan Appleton, May 21, 1849, Appleton MSS; ZT:SWH, pp. 209–12; Elihu B. Washburne to Thomas Ewing, May 4, 1849, EFP.
- 17. Senate Executive Proceedings, pp. 83, 84, 88, 106, 110, 145; Clayton to Crittenden, April 18, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Truman Smith to Elihu B. Washburne, March 26, 1849, Washburne MSS (LC); John Defrees to Caleb Smith, October 1, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 18. Nathan Sargent to Crittenden, July 15, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); William L. Hodge to Seward, June 2, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); James E. Harvey to Clayton, May 5, 1849, Crittenden to Clayton, July 20, 1849, Clayton MSS.
- 19. ZT:SWH, p. 206; Senate Executive Proceedings, p. 90; Seward to Weed, March 24, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Seward, April 1, 1849, Walter Cunningham to Seward, May 4, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Edward McGaughey to Caleb Smith, April 16, 1849, Smith MSS. The Senate always met in a special March session after a presidential nomination to confirm cabinet members, but Democrats' pretext for rejecting McGaughey was that he was constitutionally ineligible for the post since he had served in the Congress that formally organized the Minnesota Territory.
- 20. Russell Sage to Seward, May 2, 1849, Walter Cunningham to Seward, May 4, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to Weed, March 24, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Alexander H. Stephens to George W. Crawford, March 20, 1849, Stephens MSS (LC); ZT:SWH, pp. 203–09.
- 21. Nathan Sargent to Crittenden, July 15, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); E. G. Spaulding to Seward, March 30, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); E. C. Cabell to William M. Meredith, June 3, August 28, 1849, William C. Dawson to Meredith, June 15, 1849, Edward Stanly to Meredith, June 29, 1849, Meredith MSS; Daniel Lord to John M. Clayton, March 30, 1849, J. W. White to Clayton, April 30, 1849, Clayton MSS; Thomas Foote to Millard Fillmore, April 11, 1849 (quotation), MFP-O.
- 22. Charles D. Drake to Crittenden, April 2, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); John Drew to Thomas Ewing, April 9, 1849, James E. Harvey to Ewing, June 7, 1849, EFP; Samuel Kramer to William M. Meredith, March 21, 1849, Harvey to Meredith, May 28, 1849, Meredith MSS; David A. Bokee to Millard Fillmore, May 12, 1849, MFP-O.
- 23. H. H. Hunter to Thomas Ewing, March 7, 1849, Nicholas Dean to Ewing, April 4, 1849, Crittenden to Ewing, June 4, 1849, EFP; Stephens to George W. Crawford, March 20, 1849, Stephens MSS (LC); Thomas B. Stevenson to Caleb Smith, January 5, June 12, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 24. D. S. Woods to Caleb Smith, December 15, 1848, David Kilgore to Smith, January 5, 1849, D. McGuire to Smith, April 11, 1849, Smith MSS; John Defrees to Thomas Ewing, April 5, 1849, John Bell to Ewing, April 19, May 1, 1849, Patrick W. Tompkins to Ewing, June 1, 1849, William Alston to Ewing, June 16, 1849, EFP; P. B. Barringer to Daniel M. Barringer, July 17, 1849, Barringer MSS.
- O. P. Q. to Thomas Ewing, June 7, 1849, EFP; Edward McGaughey to Caleb Smith, April 16, 1849, Smith MSS.

Notes Notes

- 26. Senate Executive Proceedings, pp. 73–88; J. W. White to John M. Clayton, April 30, 1849, Clayton MSS; S. D. Pardee to Samuel D. Hubbard, February 27, 1849, James F. Babcock to Roger Sherman Baldwin, March 1, 1849, BFP.
- 27. Senate Executive Proceedings, pp. 73–86; William Peterson to Thomas Ewing, May 31, 1849, O. P. Q. to Ewing, June 7, 1849, Ewing to Joseph Ligon, June 13, 1849, EFP.
- 28. Harvey to Ewing, May 5, 1849, Patrick W. Tompkins to Ewing, June 1, 1849, O. P. Q. to Ewing, June 7, 1849, EFP; Willie P. Mangum to Meredith, April 2, 1849, William C. Dawson to Meredith, June 15, 1849, Meredith MSS; Joseph A. Acklim to Jefferson Franklin Jackson, June 2, 1849, Jackson MSS.
- 29. Leslie Combs to Millard Fillmore, October 8, 1849, MFP-O; Nathan Sargent to John J. Crittenden, July 15, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 30. Truman Smith to Caleb Smith, October 28, 1849, Smith MSS; Seward to Weed, March 24, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Orlando Brown to Crittenden, June 27, July 10, August 29, 1849, A. T. Burnley to Crittenden, July 22, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Crittenden to Orlando Brown, July 26, 1849, Crittenden MSS (Duke); Crittenden to Clayton, July 20, 1849, Clayton MSS.
 - 31. John Pendleton to Crittenden, May 22, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 32. Willie P. Mangum to Daniel M. Barringer, May 30, 1849, Thomas L. Clingman to Barringer, June 21, 1849, Barringer MSS; Clingman to Clayton, July 5, 1849, Clayton MSS; William H. Haywood to Francis P. Blair, July 15, 1849, Blair-Lee MSS; Mangum to William A. Graham, March 1, May 24, 1849, in The Mangum Papers, V, pp. 135–26, 149–50.
- 33. Balie Peyton to Gustavus A. Henry, April 14, 1849, Henry MSS; Walter Cunningham to Seward, June 23, 1849, Seward MSS (RU).
- 34. Cunningham to Seward, June 27, 1849, Seward MSS (LC); Senate Executive Proceedings, pp. 106–16.
- 35. Henry Clay to Nicholas Dean, June 21, 1849, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Clay to Thomas B. Stevenson, April 21, 1849, Stevenson MSS; Crittenden to Clayton, June 1, 1849, Clayton MSS.
- 36. Daniel Webster to William B. Preston, March 7, 1849, Webster to Franklin Haven, March 10, 1849, Webster to Fletcher Webster, March 26, 27, 28, April 12, 1849, William LeRoy to Daniel Webster, March 23, 1849, Webster MSS; Webster to Thomas Ewing, May 1, 1849, EFF; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 160–61.
- 37. Webster to Edward Curtis, April 3, 1849, Webster MSS; Curtis to Ewing, May 8, 1849, EFP; Dalzell, Webster, p. 161.
- 38. A. B. Chambers to Thomas Ewing, June 9, 1849, EFP; Elihu B. Washburne to Caleb Smith, May 4, 7, 21, November 17, 1849, Justin Butterfield to Smith, June 5, 1849, Smith MSS; Truman Smith to Elihu B. Washburne, March 26, 1849, Washburne MSS (LC); A. G. Henry to Joseph Gillespie, June 2, 1849, Gillespie MSS; E. D. Baker to David Davis, June 20, 1849, David Davis MSS; ZT:SWH, pp. 209–12.
- 39. William Woodbridge to Thomas Ewing, March 29, 1849, Elihu B. Washburne to Ewing, April 26, 1849, EFP; Washburne to Caleb Smith, May 4, 1849, Thomas Dowling to Smith, July 27, 1849, Hugh O'Neal to Smith, July 30, 1849, John Defrees to Smith, October 1, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 40. Thomas Corwin to Millard Fillmore, August 7, 1849, Thomas Foote to Fillmore, October 9, 1849, MFP-O; Schuyler Colfax to Caleb Smith, September 27, November 3, 8, 1849, Truman Smith to Caleb Smith, October 28, 1849, Elihu B. Washburne to Caleb Smith, November 15, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 41. Albert T. Burnley to John J. Crittenden, February 20, 1849, Boyd McNairy to Crittenden, August 6, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Neil J. Brown to John Bell, March 27, 1849, John Bell MSS; Bell to Thomas Ewing, April 9, May 1, 1849, EFP; William B. Campbell to David Campbell, May 14, August 19, 1849, CFP.
- 42. J. J. Sanford to Daniel M. Barringer, August 9, 1849, Barringer MSS; James Pearce to John M. Berrien, May 21, 1849, T. W. Spencer to Berrien, July 13, 1849, Berrien MSS; Pearce to Crittenden, July 14, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Crittenden to John M. Clayton, July 23, 1849, Clayton MSS.

- 43. Alexander Evans to William M. Meredith, August 9, 1849, Meredith MSS; Pearce to Berrien, May 21, 1849, Berrien MSS.
- 44. B. B. Chamberlain to Millard Fillmore, January 11, 1849 (quotation), Isaac R. Davis to Fillmore, March 3, 1849, MFP-O; Townsend Haines to Clayton, March 1, 1849, Clayton MSS; Morton McMichael to William M. Meredith, August 18, 1849, Meredith MSS; J. E. Bradley to Thomas Ewing, October 12, 1849 (quotation), EFP.
- 45. Truman Smith to Ewing, April 6, 1849, C. F. Hoeckley to Ewing, May 7, 1849, J. E. Bradley to Ewing, August 19, 1849, EFP; George W. South to Zachary Taylor, April 22, 1849, Meredith MSS.
- 46. Johnston to Meredith, March 7, 1849, H. H. Watts to Meredith, March 9, 1849, Ewing to Meredith, April 25, 1849, Meredith MSS.
- 47. C. F. Hoeckley to Thomas Ewing, May 7, 1849, EFP; Cornelius Darragh to Meredith, March 8, 1849, Meredith MSS; Senate Executive Proceedings, pp. 86, 98.
- 48. Johnston to Meredith, March 9, July 14, 1849, Townsend Haines to Meredith, March 17, 1849, Sydney G. Fisher to Meredith, March 20, 1849, and Meredith to Johnston, April 23, 1849, Meredith MSS; Senate Executive Proceedings, pp. 98, 105, 106, 109, 133.
- 49. Meredith to Johnston, April 23, 1849, Henry White to John M. Clayton, April 23, 1849, Morton McMichael to Meredith, May 4, 1849, William D. Lewis to Meredith, May 10, June 3, 4, July 15, November 16, 1849, P. C. Ellmaker to Meredith, November 1, 1849, Meredith MSS; James Buchanan to Edmund Burke, June 4, 1849, Burke MSS.
- 50. Robert M. Riddle to Millard Fillmore, March 21, 1849, MFP-O; H. M. Brackenridge to Meredith, April 4, 1849, Isaac R. Davis to Morton McMichael, May 8, 1849, Meredith MSS; Sherman Zook to Samuel Calvin, May 29, 1849, Calvin MSS; John E. Bradley to Thomas Ewing, August 8, 19, 30, 1849, EFP. Probably because of complaints from the Whig bastion in Pittsburgh, the cabinet eventually appointed Walter Forward chargé to Denmark.
- 51. F. Fraley to Meredith, May 5, 1849, Charles Gilpin to Meredith, October 17, 1849, William D. Lewis to Meredith, November 15, 1849, Meredith MSS; James Pettus to Thomas Ewing, August 3, 1849, John E. Bradley to Ewing, October 12, 1849, EFP.
- 52. James Pettus to Ewing, August 3, 1849, EFP; William D. Lewis to Meredith, November 16, 1849, Meredith MSS.
- 53. Seward to Weed, March 1, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 15, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Seward, March 11, 17, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); N. K. Hall, March 10, 1849, Thomas Foote, March 12, 1849, Gideon Hard, March 18, 1849, Jerome Fuller, April 24, 1849, all to Fillmore, MFP-O.
- 54. Seward to Weed, March 8, 22, 25, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Walter Cunningham to Seward, March 30, April 3, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); letters to Fillmore from C. B. Stuart, March 10, 1849, Robert Rose, March 14, 1849, David A. Bokee, March 17, May 12, 1849, and James Brooks, March 19, 1849, MFP-O.
- 55. Hunt to Clayton, April 18, 1849, Clayton MSS; Matteson to Seward, March 23, 1849, William T. Jackson to Seward, April 17, 1849, Seward MSS (RU).
- 56. Robert Rose to Fillmore, March 14, 1849, MFP-O; Henry J. Raymond to James Watson Webb, July 13, 1849, Webb MSS; Webb to Clayton, n.d. (1849 folder), Clayton MSS; Webb to Meredith, May 17, 1849, Meredith MSS.
- 57. Seward to Weed, March 24, 29, Weed MSS (RU); Seward to George W. Patterson, March 29, 1849, in Seward at Washington, p. 108; Fillmore to Francis Granger, April 17, 1849, MFP-O; Van Deusen, Weed, pp. 166–69.
- 58. Seward to Weed, March 1, 4, 10, 24, 29, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Seward, April 16, April——, 1849, Russell Sage to Seward, May 2, 1849, Walter Cunningham to Seward, May 4, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); N. K. Hall to Fillmore, March 10, 17, 1849, Millard Fillmore to Abigail Fillmore, March 25, 1849, MFP-O; ZT:SWH, pp. 165, 209; Van Deusen, Seward, pp. 113–15; Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 196–205.
- 59. Thomas Foote to Fillmore, March 12, 19, May 22, 1849, Robert Rose to Fillmore, March 14, 1849, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, March 17, 22, 26, April 14, 1849, Gideon Hard to Fillmore, July 30, 1849, MFP-O; Seward to Weed, July 13, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Fillmore, John T. Bush, and James Kidd, July 20, 1849, Knollenberg Collection.

- 60. Seward to Weed, March 9, August 13, 1849, Charles Stetson to Weed, July 7, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Seward, March 15, 1849, Isaac Platt to Seward, April 17, 1849, Frederick Whittlesey to Seward, April 20, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Weed to Meredith, June 2, 1849, Meredith MSS; Alex Mann to Fillmore, April 19, 1849, John T. Bush to Fillmore, June 1, 1849, John L. Dox to Fillmore, September 24, 1849, MFP-O.
- 61. Fillmore to Seward, April 17, 1849, Seward MSS; Fillmore to Francis Granger, April 17, 1849, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, May 2, 1849, MFP-O; Fillmore to Edward Everett, July 11, 1849, Everett MSS (MHS); Charles E. Clarke to Seward, May 14, 1849, Weed MSS (RU).
- 62. Jerome Fuller, May 2, September 10, 19, 1849, Alex Mann to Fillmore, July 27, September 18, 1849, MFP-O; Fillmore to William Johnson, July 30, 1849, Fillmore MSS (LC); Seward to Weed, July 13, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Fillmore, Bush, and Kidd, July 20, 1849, Knollenberg Collection.
- 63. Fillmore to William S. Johnson, August 10, 1849, Fillmore MSS (LC); John L. Dox to Fillmore, September 9, 1849, John Young to Fillmore, September 21, 1849, MFP-O; Seward to Meredith, August 3, 1849, Meredith MSS.
- 64. E. G. Spaulding to Weed, September 3, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Erasmus Pershine Smith to Weed, August 31, 1849, Weed MSS (LC); N. K. Hall to Fillmore, July 27, 1849, James Kidd to Fillmore, July 28, 1849, E. Crosby to Fillmore, July 30, 1849, C. Swain to Fillmore, August 9, 1849, John Saunders to Fillmore, August 9, 1849, MFP-O. A copy of the July 24 circular signed by Fillmore can be found in MFP-BHS.
- 65. Congressman William A. Sackett to Weed, August 19, 1849, August 4, 1849, Weed MSS (LC); Seward to Weed, July 14, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Seward to Meredith, August 3, 1849, Weed to Meredith, October 6, 1849, Meredith MSS; Weed to Seward, September 18, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); John L. Dox to Fillmore, September 18, 1849, MFP-O; Schuyler Colfax to Caleb B. Smith, September 27, 1849, Smith MSS. Seventy percent of the address that Seward wrote dealt with slavery extension.
- 66. Schuyler Colfax to Caleb Smith, September 27, 1849, Smith MSS; Gideon Hard to Fillmore, September 29, 1849, Daniel D. Barnard to Fillmore, November 9, 1849, MFP-O; E. G. Spaulding to Weed, October 7, 1849, J. H. Lathrop to Weed, October 14, 26, 1849, Seward to Zachary Taylor, October 18, 1849, copy, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Meredith, October 21, 1849, Meredith MSS. For New York Democrats' tenuous reunion in 1849, see Mayfield, Rehearsal for Republicanism, pp. 141–47.
 - 67. C. G. Blake to Ewing, July 10, 1849, Rufus King to Ewing, July 21, 1849, EFP.
- 68. Toombs to William Ballard Preston, May 18, 1849, Preston MSS; C. S. Morehead to Clayton, April 10, 1849, Clayton MSS; Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 145–47.
- 69. James Babcock to Roger Sherman Baldwin, January 24, 26, 1849, BFP; Alfred E. Burr to Gideon Welles, February 15, March 19, 1849, M. A. Osborn to Welles, March 26, April 3, 1849, Welles MSS (LC); John M. Niles to Welles, March 26, April 5, 1849, Burr to Welles, July 12, August 9, 1849, Welles MSS (NYPL).

The total votes for each party were:

	1847 (Governor)	1848 (Governor)	1848 (President)	1849 (Governor)
Whig	30,137	30,717	30,318	27,300
Democrat	27,135	28,525	27,051	25,106
Liberty-Free Soil	2,135	1,728	5,005	3,520

- 70. Niles to Welles, April 5, 8, 1849, Burr to Welles, July 12, 1849, Welles MSS (NYPL); Niles to Welles, May 13, 1849, Welles to ?, November 3, 1849, draft, Welles MSS (LC); Boston Daily Advertiser, April 17, 1849; J. W. White to John M. Clayton, April 30, 1849, Clayton MSS; Thomas Foote to Fillmore, April 4, 1849, MFP-O.
 - 71. P. Fauntleroy to Henry Bedinger, January 17, 1849, Bedinger-Dandridge Family Papers;

John Phillips to James McDowell, February 5, 1849, McDowell MSS; John Pendleton to Crittenden, April 30, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).

- 72. E. D. Baker to Clayton, March 20, 1849, Crittenden to Clayton, April 11, 1849, Clayton MSS.
- 73. ZT:SWH, pp. 176–82; Clayton to Crittenden, April 18, 1849, Clayton MSS. For evidence of the little-known Utah aspect of Taylor's plans, see John Wilson to Zachary Taylor, December 24, 1849, Wilson to Ewing, May 13, 1850, EFP; Wilson to John Davis, April 29, 1850, John Davis MSS; and Truman Smith to John Wilson, February 12, 1850, John Wilson MSS. I am obliged to Professor William E. Gienapp for making available to me photocopies of the important Wilson Papers at Berkeley.
 - 74. ZT:SWH, pp. 180-82.
 - 75. See the letters from Wilson cited in note 74.
 - 76. ZT:SWH, p. 182.
- 77. C. S. Morehead to Clayton, April 10, 1849, Crittenden to Clayton, April 11, 1849, Clayton MSS.
 - 78. William H. Haywood to Francis Preston Blair, July 13, 1849, Blair-Lee MSS.
- 79. Rufus King to Ewing, July 21, 1849, Ewing to J. C. Wright, July 30, 1849, draft, EFP; George H. Andrews to James Watson Webb, August 30, 1849, Webb MSS; Fish to Seward, November 29, 1849, Seward MSS (RU).
- 80. Washington Barrow to Clayton, August 5, 1849, William T. Ward to Clayton, August 17, 1849, Clayton MSS; Joshua Bell to Crittenden, June 9, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); R. H. Stanton to John W. Stevenson, November 27, 1849, Stevenson Family Papers (LC); Washington Barrow to William B. Campbell, August 7, 1849, CFP.
- 81. D. S. Woods to Caleb Smith, December 15, 1848, S. W. Parker to Smith, December 27, 1848, Thomas Dowling to Smith, January 1, 5, 1849, John Defrees to Smith, April 18, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 82. Defrees to Caleb Smith, April 18, 1849, S. W. Parker to Smith, July 10, 1849, Smith MSS; John H. Bradley to Thomas Ewing, May 18, 1849, EFP.
- 83. Schuyler Colfax to Caleb Smith, May 12, 16, June 12, 1849, James H. Hunt to Smith, June 12, 1849, Smith MSS; George W. Julian to G. C. Starbuck, June 1849, draft, Julian MSS.
- 84. Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, August 18, 1849, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 39, 400; Hugh O'Neal to Caleb Smith, August 12, 1849, R. A. Clements to Smith, September 1, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 85. John M. Clayton to Zachary Taylor, August 13, 1849, Taylor MSS; Boston Daily Advertiser, June 6, 1849; D. W. Clarke to Clayton, August 4, 1849, Clayton MSS.
 - 86. Delano to Ewing, April 10, 1849, B. S. Cowen to Ewing, April 9, 1849, EFP.
- 87. Thomas Bolton to Salmon P. Chase, April 23, July 30, 1849, Chase MSS (HSP); William Dennison to Ewing, May 14, 1849, C. G. Blake to Ewing, July 16, 1849, Rufus King to Ewing, July 21, 1849, EFP.
 - 88. Iverson L. Harris to Berrien, August 17, 1849, Berrien MSS.
- 89. ZT:SWH, p. 225. Like other historians, I have relied on Hamilton's quotation from this speech, for which he provides no citation. A search of two Whig papers from Ohio, two from Pennsylvania, and the Albany Evening Journal and the New York Tribune yielded no accounts of the speech, even though Greeley's Tribune had a reporter traveling with Taylor who described his trip from Pittsburgh north to Erie. Part of the problem was that Taylor immediately became ill after his stop in Mercer. Since there was a cholera epidemic that summer and people feared Taylor may have contracted the disease in Pittsburgh, newspapers started to print telegraphic dispatches about his condition, rather than delayed accounts of his speeches as they had done for his stops in other Pennsylvania towns. Nonetheless, other primary evidence clearly indicates that Taylor said something about opposing slavery extension and the irrelevance of a Free Soil party at Mercer.
 - 90. Ben Wade to Caroline Wade, September 10, 1849, Wade MSS.
- 91. William Penniman to Clayton, December 3, 1848, Clayton MSS; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 227–28.

- 92. Stewart to Meredith, July 17, 1849, Meredith MSS; Stewart to Taylor, August 8, 1849, Taylor MSS; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 164–65.
 - 93. McMichael to Meredith, August 18, 23, 1849, Meredith MSS.
 - 94. Harvey to Meredith, August 26, 1849, Meredith MSS.
- 95. Fillmore to Edward Everett, July 11, 1849, Everett MSS; Stewart to Taylor, August 8, 1849, Taylor MSS; ZT:SWH, p. 25.
- 96. Meredith's papers between July and December 1849 are filled with letters related to this effort. Among the most illuminating are those from Robert L. Martin, July 27, Philip Greely, Jr., August 30, Benjamin Bannen, September 11, Isaac R. Davis, September 19, 22, 24, and Charles Hudson, October 6, 1849, Meredith MSS. See also Meredith to Nathan Appleton, November 6, 9, 1849, Appleton MSS.
- 97. With its lengthy tables and appendices, Meredith's report filled an entire, unusually thick, volume of the House Executive Documents, but the gist of his recommendations, on which these paragraphs are based, came in his twenty-four-page introduction to those data. U.S. Congress, Thirty-First Congress, 1st Sess., House Executive Documents, Volume 2, Executive Document 4.
- 98. In July, while complaining that he had no knowledge of the administration's intentions, Fillmore used these words to predict what it would do. See Millard Fillmore to Edward Everett, July 11, 1849, Everett MSS.
 - 99. Peyton to William B. Campbell, November 7, 1849, CFP.
- 100. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 146–49. Patrick W. Tompkins, the Whig congressman who signed Calhoun's Southern Address, did not seek reelection in 1849.
- 101. Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 141–42; Schott, Stephens, pp. 98–105; William Hope Hull to Howell Cobb, January 26, 1849, Lumpkin to Cobb, March 12, 1849, and John W. Burke to Cobb, March 22, 1849, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 142, 156–58.
- 102. Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 141–42; Schott, Stephens, pp. 98–105; Iverson L. Harris to John M. Berrien, August 17, 1849, Berrien MSS.
 - 103. Ibid.
- 104. Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 141–42; Jenkins to Berrien, July 16, 1849, Iverson L. Harris to Berrien, October 6, 1849, Berrien MSS.
 - 105. Schott, Stephens, p. 104.
 - 106. Ibid., p. 105; Iverson L. Harris to Berrien, August 17, October 6, 1849, Berrien MSS.
- 107. Jacob Collamer to Zachary Taylor, September 11, 1849, Taylor MSS; Ben Wade to Caroline Wade, September 10, 1849, Wade MSS.
- 108. In Maine, Taylor had garnered 35,125 votes (40.3 percent) in November 1848, whereas the Whigs' gubernatorial totals in 1847, 1848, and 1849 were, respectively, 24,308 (37.2 percent), 30,026 (37.8 percent), and 28,260 (38.3 percent). In 1848, Free Soilers had drawn 11,978 votes in September and 12,096 in November, but in 1849 their total was 8,025.
- 109. The lack of statewide returns for Wisconsin in 1849 prevents comparison with 1848, but in Michigan, where Taylor had garnered 29,947 votes and Van Buren 10,393, in 1848, Flavius Littlejohn, the Whig-Free Soil gubernatorial candidate, got only 23,561 in 1849.
- 110. Ben Wade to Caroline Wade, September 10, 1849, Caroline Wade to Ben Wade, September 19, 1849, Wade MSS; William Dennison to Thomas Ewing, September 16 (quotation), October 6, 1849, Aaron F. Perry to Ewing, December 16, 1849, EFP; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 149–53. As for other Ohio elections, different scholars who have examined Ohio's legislative returns give different numbers for Whig gains and Democratic losses in 1849, yet they concur that Free Soilers continued to hold the balance of power in both chambers even though they lost two seats in the house and one in the senate.
- 111. My chief source for this and the following paragraph is Kevin Sweeney's invaluable "Rum." The Democratic platform is quoted on p. 120. Whigs' gubernatorial vote dropped from 61,640 (49.7 percent) in 1848 to 54,009 (49.4 percent) in 1849; meanwhile, the Democratic vote increased by 5,000 and the Free Soil vote declined by 11,000 between the two years.
- 112. Democrats were elected as attorney general, canal commissioner, prison inspector, and judge of the state appeals court. In 1848, Taylor won 218,603 votes (47.9 percent); in 1849, Hunt garnered 205,034 (50.7 percent), a net loss of 13,569. In contrast, with 199,134 votes, Hunt's Democratic opponent ran 35,696 votes behind the combined total for Cass and Van Buren.

The regression estimates for voter movement between the 1848 and 1849 state elections are:

		1849			% of
		Whig	Democratic	Not Voting	1849 Electorate
	Whig	30	8	0	38
	Dem.	1	13	6	20
1848	Free Soil	4	13	4	21
	Not voting	0	0	21	21
	% of 1849 elect.	35	34	31	100

These figures are taken from Kirn, "Third Party System," Table IX, p. 60. By Kirn's estimates, about 46,000 Whig voters went Democratic in 1849, not just the 13,500 indicated by the difference between Taylor's and Hunt's totals. Kirn used the 1848 gubernatorial, not presidential, returns, but Whig Hamilton Fish's 218,280 poll was virtually identical to Taylor's total.

- 113. I shall document these assertions in the next chapter, but my point is to explain Seward's oft-noted but puzzling refusal to endorse the Taylor plan in his famous "Higher Law" speech against Henry Clay's compromise proposals.
- 114. In 1847, Whigs won four congressional seats to the Democrats' two, although Democrats led in the gubernatorial vote, 34,368 to 33,730. In 1849, when the parties evenly split the six-man congressional delegation, Whigs won the aggregate popular vote in those contests, 30,699 to 25,974.
- 115. J. E. Bradley to Thomas Ewing, October 12, 1849, EFP; Charles Gilpin to Meredith, October 17, 1849, Meredith MSS; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp, 162–67.
- 116. For the voting patterns in the lower houses of the Maryland and Pennsylvania legislatures, see Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 115–16, and Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 162.
- 117. For the tangled and much neglected New Jersey story, I have relied on Lex Renda's excellent "Railroads, Revenue, and Reform," pp. 33–50.
 - 118. Leslie Combs to Millard Fillmore, October 12, 1849, MFP-O.
- 119. Balie Peyton to William B. Campbell, November 7, 1849, CFP; Washburne to Caleb Smith, November 15, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 120. Thomas Foote to Millard Fillmore, October 9, 1849, Combs to Fillmore, October 12, 1849, Henry Davis to Fillmore, October 19, 1849, MFP-O; Charles Stetson to Weed, July 7, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Schuyler Colfax to Caleb Smith, September 27, November 3, 8, 1849, Truman Smith to Caleb Smith, October 28, 1849, Washburne to Smith, November 15, 1849, Smith MSS; Robert Letcher to Crittenden, July 10, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 121. Brown to Crittenden, July 10, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Truman Smith to Caleb Smith, October 28, 1849, Smith MSS.
 - 122. Joseph Root to Joshua R. Giddings, June 12, 1849, Giddings MSS.
- 123. Henry Clay to Nicholas Dean, June 21, 1849, Henry Clay MSS (LC); James Harvey to Meredith, August 26, 1849, Meredith MSS. The best study of the vital impact that James B. Clay's mission to Portugal had on Henry Clay's behavior in 1850 is Bearss, "' 'How All Occasions Do Inform."
 - 124. Clay to Nicholas Dean, June 21, 1849, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
 - 125. James Harvey to Meredith, August 26, 1849, Meredith MSS.
- 126. William T. Ward to Clayton, August 17, 1849, Clayton MSS; Joshua Bell to Crittenden, June 9, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Peterson, Great Triumvirate, pp. 378–79; Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," pp. 69–75.

CHAPTER 14

- 1. Henry Clay to Thomas B. Stevenson, December 21, 1849, Stevenson MSS; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, December 2, 6, 17, 1849, Outlaw MSS; C. H. Wiley to David F. Caldwell, January 7, 1850, Caldwell MSS; Simon Cameron to Edmund Burke, June 13, 1849, Thomas Dorr to Burke, October 3, 1849, Burke MSS; Joseph Root to Joshua R. Giddings, June 12, 1849, William L. Hodge to William H. Seward, January 4, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); N. K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, November 20, 1849, N. C. King to Fillmore, November 30, 1849, Francis Granger to Fillmore, December 12, 1849, MFP-BHS.
- 2. Alexander H. Stephens to John J. Crittenden, December 17, 1849, draft, Stephens MSS (Duke); Oliver Butler to Caleb B. Smith, September 15, 1849, Smith MSS; Seward to Thurlow Weed, November 30, December 3, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Alexander Stephens to Linton Stephens, December 2, 1849, quoted in Schott, Stephens, p. 107; William H. Bissell to William Martin, February 5, 1850, Bissell MSS.
- 3. James C. Marshall to George Dunn, January 28, 1849, Dunn MSS; Joseph Root to Joshua R. Giddings, June 12, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); see also Seward to Weed, December 3, 1849, Weed MSS (RU).
- 4. Nevins, Ordeal: Fruits, pp. 219–341; Poage, Clay, pp. 183–264; ZT:SWH, pp. 229–359; Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict. In this and following chapters, I shall designate attitudes toward the final Compromise measures that passed in September 1850 as pro- and anti-Compromise. But to refer to vaguer attitudes toward the idea of compromise itself during 1850, before the final package of laws was formulated, I shall use the lowercase "compromise."
- 5. William H. Bissell to William Martin, February 5, 1850, Bissell MSS; Seward to Weed, December 3, 1849, Weed MSS (RU).
- 6. Seward to Weed, November 30, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Seward, December 7, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Stephens to Crittenden, December 17, 1849, draft, Stephens MSS (Duke); John M. Berrien to Charles J. Jenkins, December 10, 1849, Berrien MSS; Robert Toombs to John J. Crittenden, April 25, 1850, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 364–66.
 - 7. Nevins, Ordeal: Fruits, p. 257; Potter, Impending Crisis, pp. 92–94.
- 8. Anthony C. Brown to Seward, February 2, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); John L. Dox to Fillmore, January 30, February 2, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 9. Resolutions of the Legislature of New York, January 17, 1849, U.S. Congress, House Miscellaneous Documents, 30th Cong., 2nd Sess., Document 6. I originally wrote this chapter seven years before the publication of Mark J. Stegmaier's immensely detailed and valuable Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850. Although I am heartened that Stegmaier agrees with me about the centrality of the Texas-New Mexico boundary issue to the Compromise of 1850, his research on this episode is far more thorough than mine, and his book supersedes the sources I have used. His book has forced me to make some revisions in this and the following chapter, but I continue to cite the sources, particularly my students' unpublished seminar papers, that I originally used to draft them.
- 10. John C. Spencer to John M. Clayton, August 25, 1849, Clayton MSS; Daniel D. Barnard to Millard Fillmore, November 9, 1849, MFP-O; Barnard to Fillmore, December 15, 1849, John T. Bush to Fillmore, January 5, 1850 (quotation), MFP-BHS.
 - 11. John Defrees to Caleb B. Smith, November 16, 1849, Smith MSS.
- 12. At the very end of the Thirtieth Congress' second session in March 1849, Wisconsin's Democratic Senator Isaac Walker had tried to amend an appropriations bill with a clause that explicitly abrogated all Mexican laws, including the prohibition of slavery, in the Mexican Cession. That amendment passed the Senate, but in the House northern Whigs successfully amended Walker's amendment specifically to retain Mexico's antislavery ban in the Cession. The Senate balked and killed both amendments, but the fierce two-day debate had alerted everyone to the continuing force of Mexico's antislavery laws in the Cession.
- 13. Nathan Appleton to Henry Hilliard, December 22, 1849, Appleton MSS; John L. Dox to Fillmore, January 30, February 2, 1850, MFP-BHS; Anthony C. Brown to Seward, February 2, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 14. This summary of the southern Democratic position in 1850 is based on my reading of the congressional debates and numerous secondary sources.

- 15. Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 149; Johannsen, Douglas, p. 263; copy of Georgia legislative resolutions, January 26, 1850, Berrien MSS.
- 16. Charles Jenkins to Berrien, December 1849, Berrien to Jenkins, December 10, 1849, January 7, 1850, Berrien MSS; John S. Williams to Fillmore, November 17, 1849, MFP-O.
- 17. David to Emily Outlaw, December 9, 1849, January 10, February 16, 1850, Outlaw MSS; C. H. Wiley to David F. Caldwell, January 7, 1850, Caldwell MSS. Outlaw's Whig colleague Edward Stanly also attributed Clingman's radicalism to his desire to win a Senate seat "on the excitement he is trying to raise." Edward Stanly to David F. Caldwell, March, 1, 1850, Caldwell MSS.
- 18. William L. Hodge to Seward, January 4, February 20, 1850, Seward MSS; William B. Campbell to David Campbell, January 9, 1850, CFP; Charles Jenkins to Berrien, December 1849, A. J. Miller to Berrien, January 5, 1850, Berrien MSS. Jenkins gauged the Georgia Whig mentality accurately. In January 1850 two-thirds of the Whig legislators, most of whom had earlier acquiesced in the Democrats' bellicose resolutions, signed a manifesto protesting that the admission of California should not be grounds for calling a state convention. Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 158.
- 19. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 146–62. That the antebellum South was not a united phalanx on virtually anything up through the secession crisis of 1860–61 itself is, of course, a central argument of Freehling, Road to Disunion.
- 20. Nathan Appleton to Henry Hilliard, December 22, 1849, Appleton MSS; Berrien to Charles Jenkins, January 7, 1850, Berrien MSS.
 - 21. Schuyler Colfax to Caleb B. Smith, February 16, 1850, Smith MSS.
 - 22. The language is Potter's in Impending Crisis, pp. 92-94.
 - 23. Charles Sumner to Joshua R. Giddings, July 3, 1849, Giddings MSS.
- 24. Joseph Root to Joshua R. Giddings, June 12, 1849, Seward MSS. Because one Massachusetts seat went unfilled for the entire session, the House had a total of 230 members prior to the admission of California. For good reasons, historians have varied in their estimates of party strength. Mine are based on the party identifications in the Biographical Directory of Congress and other information. I estimate that of the 230 members there were 114 Democrats, 106 Whigs, 2 Whig-Free Soilers, John Howe and William Sprague, one Native American who was expected to cooperate with the Whigs—Philadelphia's Lewis C. Levin—and 7 Free Soilers.
- 25. The estimates of the sectional balance within each party are based on the identifications in the Biographical Directory of Congress and Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, December 23, 1849, Everett MSS. Altogether there were 91 representatives from the slave states and 139 from the free states.
- 26. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, December 2, 3, 1849, Outlaw MSS; Henry Hilliard to Nathan Appleton, December 4, 1849, Appleton MSS; Robert Toombs to John J. Crittenden, April 25, 1850, in Coleman, Crittenden, I, pp. 364–66, and Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 38.
 - 27. Schott, Stephens, pp. 108-09; Smith, Presidencies of Taylor and Fillmore, p. 107.
- 28. Howell Cobb to Wife, December 2, 1849, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," p. 117; Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, December 4, 1849, John P. Kennedy to Winthrop, December 4, 18, 1849, Kennedy MSS; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, December 2, 1849, Outlaw MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to John H. Clifford, December 3, 1849, Winthrop MSS; Seward to Weed, December 4, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Seward, December 7, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Francis Granger to Millard Fillmore, December 12, 1849, MFP-BHS.
- 29. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, December 3, 1849, Outlaw MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to John H. Clifford, December 3, 1849, Winthrop MSS; Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, December 4, 1849, Kennedy MSS; Iverson L. Harris to John M. Berrien, December 17, 1849, Berrien MSS; Toombs to Crittenden, April 25, 1850, loc. cit.; Stephens to Crittenden, December 17, 1849, Stephens MSS (Duke).
- 30. Schott, Stephens, pp. 107-08; Iverson L. Harris to John M. Berrien, December 24, 1849, Berrien MSS.
- 31. Seward to Weed, December 4, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Henry Hilliard to Nathan Appleton, December 4, 1849, Appleton MSS: Winthrop to Kennedy, December 4, 1849, Kennedy to Daniel D. Barnard, December 10, 1849, letterbook copy, Kennedy MSS; Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 146. Morton's district in the northern neck of Virginia had a smaller proportion of slaves in its population in 1850 than any other congressional district east of the Blue Ridge Mountains.

- 32. Stephens to James Thomas, February 13, 1850, draft, Stephens MSS (Duke).
- 33. Charles Jenkins to John M. Berrien, December 1849, Iverson Harris to Berrien, December 24, 1849, Berrien to Charles Jenkins, December 10, 1849, January 7, 1850, Berrien MSS.
- 34. Iverson Harris to Berrien, December 17, 24, 1849, A. J. Miller to Berrien, January 5, 1850, Berrien MSS.
- 35. Jenkins never received the most detailed suggestions for the Georgia resolutions that Berrien mailed from Washington, and, in any event, the Democratic majority insisted on passing their own resolutions. Jenkins to Berrien, February 26, 1850, Berrien MSS.
- 36. Berrien delivered his first speech against California statehood on January 29, 1850. Much later in the session, Berrien successfully amended the territorial provisions of the omnibus bill by revising the language regarding the authority of territorial legislatures over slavery. His amendment barred those bodies from establishing or prohibiting slavery but opened the possibility that they could pass laws protecting property rights in slaves. In a tit-for-tat response, both Toombs and Stephens, who had previously said that only local laws could protect slavery, then called in the House for federal slave codes to protect slavery in the territories. I rely here on Morrison, "For Buncombe or Principle," pp. 36–45.
- 37. This and the following paragraphs are based on an analysis of the roll-call votes for speaker between December 3 and December 22, 1849 in the House Journal, 31st Cong., 1st Sess. There are good secondary accounts of the speakership struggle in ZT:SWH, pp. 243–53, and Smith, Presidencies of Taylor and Fillmore, pp. 106–07.
- 38. Seward to Weed, November 30, 1849, Weed MSS (RU); Winthrop to John H. Clifford, December 15, 1849, Winthrop MSS; Winthrop to Edward Everett, December 11, 16, 1849, Everett MSS.
- 39. Winthrop to Clifford, December 15, 1849, Winthrop MSS; Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, December 16, 1849, Kennedy MSS; Charles Morehead to John J. Crittenden, December 25, 1849, Crittenden MSS (LC); Poage, Clay, p. 196.
 - 40. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, December 12, 1849, Outlaw MSS.
- 41. Howell Cobb to Wife, January 11, 1850, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 181–82; Thomas L. Harris to Charles H. Lanphier, January 12, 1850, Lanphier MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, December 23, 1849, Everett MSS; Winthrop to John H. Clifford, December 22, 1849, Winthrop MSS.
 - 42. George W. Julian to Isaac Julian, January 25, 1850, Giddings-Julian MSS.
 - 43. Seward to Weed, November 30, 1849, Weed MSS (RU).
 - 44. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 9-24.
- 45. Seth C. Hawley to Seward, December 25, 1849, Simeon Draper to Seward, December 26, 1849 (quotation), William L. Hodge to Seward, January 4, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); William B. Campbell to David Campbell, January 9, 1850, CFP.
- 46. Daniel Webster to Peter Harvey, December 30, 1849, Webster MSS; Kennedy to Winthrop, December 25, 1849, letterbook copy, Kennedy MSS; Simeon Draper to Seward, December 26, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); Edwin M. Stanton to William M. Meredith, January 5, 1850, Meredith MSS.
- 47. Philip Greely, Jr., to James S. Pike, January 15, 1850, Pike MSS; Carlos G. Houston to Seward, January 21, 1850, Simeon Draper to Seward, January 25, 28, February 2, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Simeon Draper to William M. Meredith, March 28, 1850, Meredith MSS. I am indebted to Professor William E. Gienapp for loaning me a microfiche copy of the Pike MSS.
- 48. ZT:SWH, pp. 262–63, 273–76; Anderson, "Texas Boundary Dispute," pp. 10–16. The best modern study of the Texas boundary issue is Stegmaier, Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, but I have often used preliminary Senate votes analyzed by Anderson, but not Stegmaier, to identify pro- and anticompromise senators. Maps in Stegmaier, pp. 94 and 96, show the different Benton and Foote proposals for Texas. Each man also wanted to carve new states out of Texas to balance California's admission.
 - 49. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 26-30. Taylor's descriptions of his official instructions to Thomas Butler King and Colonel George McCall, the agent to New Mexico, were accurate, but Mark Stegmaier has uncovered evidence that, unknown to Secretary of War Crawford, McCall had been instructed orally by Taylor and Colonel William Bliss, Taylor's son-in-law and private secretary, to take an active role in launching New Mexico's statehood movement. Stegmaier, Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, pp. 68–78.

- 50. Edward Wade to Albert G. Riddle, February 3, 1850, Riddle MSS; ZT:SWH, pp. 266–68.
- 51. Seddon and Howard are quoted in ZT:SWH, pp. 272-73.
- 52. Ibid., pp. 268–69; John P. Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, January 22, 1850, Kennedy MSS; Philip Greely, Jr., to James S. Pike, January 25, 1850, Pike MSS. Scores of additional northern letters could be cited.
 - 53. ZT:SWH, pp. 270-71.
- 54. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, February 14, 1850, Outlaw MSS; Julius Rockwell to David Davis, January 25, 1850, David Davis MSS; Iverson Harris to John M. Berrien, December 28, 1849, Berrien MSS.
- 55. George Julian to Isaac Julian, January 25, 1850, Giddings-Julian MSS; Henry Clay to Lucretia Clay, December 28, 1849, January 2, 1850, Thomas J. Clay MSS (LC); Peterson, Great Triumvirate, p. 453.
- 56. Henry Clay to James B. Clay, December 4, 1849, to Susan Clay, December 15, 1849, and to Lucretia Clay, December 28, 1849, Thomas J. Clay MSS. For a discussion of the negotiations with Portugal, see Smith, Presidencies of Taylor and Fillmore, pp. 72–73; and ZT:SWH, pp. 190–91, 371.
 - 57. George Julian to Isaac Julian, January 25, 1850, Giddings-Julian MSS.
 - 58. Henry Clay to James B. Clay, December 4, 1849, Thomas J. Clay MSS.
- 59. Henry Clay to Thomas B. Stevenson, June 18, 1849, Stevenson MSS; Henry Clay to Boyd McNairy, January 26, 1850, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Henry Clay to James B. Clay, January 2, 1850, Thomas J. Clay MSS.
- 60. Henry Clay to James B. Clay, December 29, 1849, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Joseph Root to Joshua R. Giddings, June 12, 1849, Seward MSS (RU); James G. Marshall to George Dunn, January 28, 1849, Dunn MSS.
 - 61. Poage, Clay, pp. 199-200; Peterson, Great Triumvirate, p. 455.
- 62. Clay's remark came in a speech to the Kentucky legislature in Frankfort on November 15, 1850. There is a draft of the speech in the Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 63. For Clay's speech and resolutions, see Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 244-46.
- 64. By the time Clay spoke, Virginia's Senator James M. Mason had already introduced a new fugitive slave bill, and Clay said little about it in either his short speech of January 29 or his two-day address in early February. Yet he privately wrote friends that he was concerned about protecting free blacks who were falsely accused of being fugitive slaves, and in his report from the select committee of thirteen in May he proposed two clauses to be inserted into the law. Those provisions would have allowed alleged fugitives to testify in their own behalf before the commissioners hearing their cases in the North; required the purported owner to obtain a court affidavit from his home state attesting to his ownership of the slave; and, most important, forced the owner to post a bond of $1,000 with federal authorities, which he would forfeit if the alleged fugitive were not given a jury trial in the owner's home state to determine the fugitive's actual status. None of these requirements was included in the final statute (the provision about the court affidavit was made optional rather than mandatory), and testimony by captured fugitives was explicitly banned. See Henry Clay to R. H. Walworth, March 11, 1850, Henry Clay MSS (LC); U.S. Congress, Senate Committee Reports, 31st Cong., 1st Sess., Report 123, pp. 24–25; and U.S., Statutes at Large, Volume 9, 31st Cong., Chapter 60, pp. 462–65.
- 65. Recall that the residents of New Mexico had petitioned the Thirtieth Congress to create a territorial government for them and to bar slavery from it.
- 66. I was first alerted to the antislavery implications of Clay's Texas boundary proposal by the manuscript of Freehling's Road to Disunion, pp. 496–97. The estimate of 20,000 slaves is Professor Freehling's. In his recent Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, pp. 98–99, and note 27, p. 372, Stegmaier notes that Clay stipulated the continuation of the "southern line of New Mexico," and that in early 1850 no one knew exactly where that line would be located. He also argues vigorously that Clay could not have knowingly intended to bring about emancipation in Texas north of the 32nd parallel. If Clay realized how many slaveholders lived north of the line he proposed, he undoubtedly expected those men to move to keep their slave property. Nonetheless, I think Clay intentionally proposed stripping so much land from Texas to appeal to northern Whigs, although his stipulation of the Rio Grande, rather than the Nueces, as Texas' southwestern boundary was a bone tossed to Southerners.

Notes Notes

- 67. Clay did say that his third and fourth resolutions were inextricably linked, but rather than admitting that federal assumption of the Texas debt was compensation for the surrender of Texas's claims to New Mexico, he insisted on just the opposite—that is, that Texas should surrender its claim to New Mexico as compensation to the United States government for assuming its debt. Clay clearly believed, that is, that it made a major difference to Northerners whether the United States compensated Texas or Texas compensated the United States. His plan would benefit the holders of Texas bonds, not the State of Texas.
- 68. On the bondholders' distrust of the Texas state government, see James A. Hamilton to John Bell, May 1, 1850, John Bell MSS.
- 69. For the initial reactions to Clay's plan on January 29, see Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 247–52.
 - 70. Ibid.; Washington Daily Union, January 7, 1850.
 - 71. Truman Smith to John Wilson, March 14, 1850, Wilson MSS.
- 72. The final laws that comprised the Compromise of 1850 can be found in United States, Statutes at Large, Volume 9, pp. 446–65. To compensate Texas, Congress authorized the issue of $10 million of United States bonds. Half of that amount was to be paid directly to the Texas government without any stipulation as to how it spent the money. The other $5 million was retained in Washington to pay off Texas bondholders. As I will argue in the next chapter, even with the provisions that were incorporated into the territorial laws, many congressmen at the time of their passage still believed that Mexico's antislavery statutes would hold force until directly replaced. This was especially true of the Texas-New Mexico statute, which, unlike the Utah law, contained a provision explicitly allowing the expropriation of property by "the law of the land." Exactly what that law was in New Mexico remained a source of dispute.
 - 73. ZT:SWH, p. 298.
- 74. Ibid.; Parks, "John Bell," 340–42. Stegmaier, Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, pp. 105–08, identifies Webster as the original author of Bell's plan. Northern Whigs' anger upon learning of it apparently deterred Webster from offering it himself.
- 75. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, February 14, 1850, Outlaw MSS; Alexander H. Stephens to James Thomas, February 13, 1850, draft, Stephens MSS (Duke); Schott, Stephens, p. 113; Julius Rockwell to David Davis, January 26, 1850, David Davis MSS.
- 76. Lewis Henry Morgan to William H. Seward, February 2, 1850, Anthony C. Brown to Seward, February 2, 1850, Simeon Draper to Seward, February 9, 1850, Seth C. Hawley to Seward, March 3, 1850 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); John L. Dox to Millard Fillmore, January 30, February 2, 7, 1850, MFP-BHS; Roger S. Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, March 3, 1850, BFP; John Davis to George Briggs, March 3, 1850, Briggs MSS.
 - 77. Ibid.; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, February 18, 1850, Outlaw MSS.
- 78. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 66; Truman Smith to John Wilson, March 14, 1850, Wilson MSS; Winthrop to William Schouler, February 19, 1850, Schouler MSS; Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, March 1850, Kennedy MSS; Winthrop to Edward Everett, January 30, March 3, 1850, Everett MSS; Josiah Snow to Seward, January 31, 1850, S. C. Hawley to Seward, February 11, 1850, Edwin B. Morgan to Seward, February 12, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Henry Carter to James S. Pike, April 17, 1850, William Schouler to Pike, April 25, 1850, Pike MSS.
- 79. Robert C. Winthrop to William Schouler, February 15, 1850, Schouler MSS; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, February 18, 1850, Outlaw MSS; Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 67; Schott, Stephens, p. 113.
- 80. Several historians date this stormy interview in February after the marathon session on the 18th, but they disagree about the substance of the meeting and who attended it. See, for example, Poage, Clay, pp. 207–08; ZT:SWH, p. 300; Schott, Stephens, p. 114. The fullest treatment was Stegmaier, "Taylor versus the South," but in Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, pp. 103, 112, Stegmaier recants on his February 20 date for the meeting and now puts it in mid-April. Taylor, however, did meet with an unidentified group of Southerners in mid-February, when he also pledged to lead federal troops personally against any secession movement.

- 81. ZT:SWH, pp. 303-05.
- 82. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 92; Josiah Snow to Seward, January 31, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Lewis Cass to Samuel Medary, January 26, 1850, Medary MSS; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 154.
- 83. Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 251–56, 262–303; S. S. Hayes to Stephen Douglas, April 13, 1850, Douglas MSS; Gideon Ball to William M. Meredith, February 19, 1850, Meredith MSS.
- 84. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 88; Poage, Clay, pp. 206–07; Schott, Stephens, pp. 113–14; Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 272–73. I say that Stephens "apparently" wrote down his terms for a compromise because the only evidence for this assertion is Stephens' own post-Civil War history/memoir, A Constitutional View of the Late War Between the States. I have found no contemporary evidence that he put his terms for territorial governments in writing, and Johannsen credits Douglas, not Stephens, with the language of the bills the House and Senate territorial committees reported.
- 85. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 66; Nevins, Ordeal: Fruits, pp. 272–73; James Simonton to Thomas Ritchie, July 10, 1852, included with Thomas Ritchie to Richmond Enquirer, December 6, 1852, newspaper extract in Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 86. Simonton to Ritchie, July 10, 1852; Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 62; Poage, Clay, pp. 211–17; London, "Badger," pp. 103–04.
- 87. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 63–65; John J. Crittenden to John M. Clayton, February 18, 1850, Clayton MSS; T. M. Brewer to William Schouler, March 8, 1850, Schouler MSS.
- 88. George W. Julian to Isaac Julian, January 25, 1850, Giddings-Julian MSS; Moses McGowen to William H. Seward, March 7, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); T. M. Brewer to William Schouler, March 8, 1850, Schouler MSS; Winthrop to Edward Everett, March 3, 1850, Charlie Everett to Edward Everett, March 5, 1850, Everett MSS; Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, January 13, 1850, to Peter Harvey, February 13, March 1, 1850, to Edward Everett, February 16, 1850, to Fletcher Webster, February 24, 1850, Webster MSS; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 175–77; ZT:SWH, p. 313.
- 89. On Calhoun's reaction, see Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 79. The many historians who call Webster's speech an endorsement of Clay's compromise err because they assume that support for the idea of compromise automatically meant support for Clay's version, ignore the differences between Clay's original resolutions and the compromise he eventually backed, and minimize the difference between what Clay and Webster actually said in January and March since the two men ended up on the same side. To contemporaries like Calhoun those differences were crucial.
- 90. The best summary and analysis of Webster's speech, upon which I have heavily relied, is Dalzell, Webster, pp. 178–95. See also Nevins, Ordeal: Fruits, pp. 286–91.
- 91. Again, contemporaries paid closer attention to the details of the speech than have the historians who call it an endorsement of Clay's plan, and they noted Webster's careful omission of any reference to Mexican law. Reflecting the opinion of most northern Whigs, a dismayed Winthrop wrote, "The argument from Nature, too, is, at best, pretty loose, and is much less satisfactory to our friends than that from the Mexican law, to which W. does not allude." Winthrop to Edward Everett, March 17, 1850, Everett MSS.
 - 92. Dalzell, Webster, p. 183.
- 93. Daniel D. Barnard to Millard Fillmore, January 31, 1850, John Young to Fillmore, March 14, 1850, MFP-BHS; Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, March 11, 1850, MFP-O; Truman Smith to John Wilson, March 14, 1850, Wilson MSS.
- 94. Dalzell, Webster, pp. 197–98; Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, April 7, 1850, Everett MSS; T. M. Brewer to William Schouler, March 14, April 1850, James S. Pike to Schouler, April 21, 1850, Schouler MSS; Daniel Webster to Willie P. Mangum, April 19, 1850, Webster MSS.

- 95. Seward to Weed, March 22, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, March 11, 1850, MFP-O; Weed to Meredith, March 10, 1850, Meredith MSS; Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 79.
- 96. Daniel Webster to Fletcher Webster, March 31, 1850, to Peter Harvey, April 7, 1850, John Pendleton to Webster, March 12, 1850, Webster MSS; Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, March 15, 1850, Kennedy MSS; Roger S. Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, March 8, 1850, Emily Baldwin to Roger S. Baldwin, March 14, 1850, BFP; Fitz Henry Warren to William Schouler, March 9, 1850, Schouler MSS; Lyman A. Spaulding to John L. Schoolcraft, March 28, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 97. T. M. Brewer to William Schouler, March 8, 1850, Schouler MSS; Truman Smith to John Wilson, March 14, 1850, Wilson MSS.
- 98. Van Deusen, Seward, p. 120; Seward to Weed, January 25, March 11, 1850, in Seward at Washington, pp. 121, 124–25.
- 99. I have relied on the able summaries of the speech in Van Deusen, Seward, pp. 122–24, ZT:SWH, pp. 316–19; and Nevins, Ordeal: Fruits, pp. 299–301.
- 100. Van Deusen, Seward, pp. 125–26, ably summarizes the exchange between Seward and Weed. See also Weed to Seward, March 14, 15, 26, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); and Seward to Weed, March 15, 22, 1850, in Seward at Washington, pp. 129–30.
- 101. Van Deusen, Seward, p. 125; ZT:SWH, pp. 321–23; Weed to Seward, March 15, 26, 1850, Joshua R. Giddings to Joshua A. Giddings, March 16, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); N. K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, March 17, 1850, MFP-O; Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, March 20, 1850, Alex Mann to Fillmore, March 22, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 102. Van Deusen, Seward, pp. 125–26; Seward to Weed, March 15, 22, 1850, in Seward at Washington, pp. 129–30. Seward cited no evidence that most northern Whig congressmen were prepared to compromise in March, and I have found none.
 - 103. See, for example, Gideon Hard to Millard Fillmore, April 4, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 104. Albany Evening Journal, January 2, 1850; Daniel D. Barnard to Millard Fillmore, January 31, 1850, John L. Dox to Fillmore, February 2, 1850, Gideon Hard to Fillmore, February 9, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 105. John L. Dox to Fillmore, January 30, February 2, 7, 1850, Daniel D. Barnard to Fillmore, January 31, 1850, Gideon Hard to Fillmore, April 4, 1850, MFP-BHS; Henry J. Raymond to Seward, January 19, February 15, 1850, James Bowen to Seward, January 21, 25, February 3, 1850, Robert H. Pruyn to Seward, February 1, 1850, Hamilton Fish to Seward, February 9, 1850, Seth C. Hawley to Seward, February 19, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 106. Weed to Meredith, March 10, 1850, Meredith MSS; D. D. Barnard to Fillmore, January 11, 1850, John L. Dox to Fillmore, February 2, 7, 18, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 107. Henry J. Raymond to Seward, February 15, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); John L. Dox to Fillmore, February 17, 18, 1850, D. D. Barnard to Fillmore, February 25, 1850, Gideon Hard to Fillmore, April 4, 1850, MFP-BHS; Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, March 11, 17, April 2, 22, May 23, 1850, MFP-O; John C. Spencer to Daniel Webster, April 11, 1850, Webster MSS; Millard Fillmore to Oran Follett, April 30, 1850, Millard Fillmore MSS (Cincinnati Historical Society, in microfilm edition).
- 108. Weed to Seward, March 26, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Hall to Fillmore, March 17, April 2, 1850, MFP-O; Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, March 20, 1850, Alex Mann to Fillmore, March 22, 1850, Leonard Rising to Fillmore, March 29, 1850, Gideon Hard to Fillmore, April 4, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 109. James Bowen to Seward, February 3, 1850, Weed to John L. Schoolcraft, July 5, 1850, copy, Seward MSS (RU); Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, May 28, June 6, 14, 1850, John H. White to Fillmore, July 3, 1850, MFP-BHS. Readers of my Political Crisis will note a shift in my interpretation here, for there I erroneously telescoped developments by listing Fillmore and his Whig followers as supporters of Clay's plan from the start. Clay and Webster Whigs in New York did support a compromise, especially after the presentation of Clay's omnibus bill in May, but Fillmore's closest allies preferred Taylor's plan until July.
- 110. Johannsen, Douglas, p. 279; Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 89, 203; for the Union Meetings in New York City, see Foner, Business & Slavery, pp. 24–31.

- 111. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 92; Poage, Clay, pp. 210–17; James S. Pike to William Schouler, April 21, 1850, Schouler MSS.
- 112. This and the following paragraph are based on the analysis of Senate roll calls in Anderson, "Texas Boundary Dispute." Summary figures best reveal the disproportionately southern and Democratic composition of this bloc. Altogether it contained ten southern Whigs, seventeen southern Democrats, two northern Whigs, and nine northern Democrats. Anderson used a different sample of roll calls than does Stegmaier in Appendix B of his Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, pp. 325–30, for Stegmaier's sample of twenty-five roll calls includes no votes before June. Though I question the conflation of roll calls before and after Taylor's death to identify compromisers and anticompromisers early in the session, Stegmaier has demonstrated more authoritatively than any previous scholar the extent of cooperation within an anticompromise bloc of northern Whigs, northern Free Soilers, and southern Democrats.
- 113. James A. Bayard to Henry Clay, July 1, 1850, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Joseph Gales to John P. Kennedy, March 3, 1850, Kennedy to Rufus Griswold, March 9, 1850, letterbook copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 114. U.S. Congress, Journal of the Senate, 31st Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 299–303; Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 94–95; Stegmaier, Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, p. 135.
- 115. Here I am in utter retreat from my previous argument in Political Crisis, p. 82, that the Fugitive Slave Act was "peripheral to the real concerns of the Compromise of 1850." I have been forced to recant by a brilliant seminar paper by a University of Virginia undergraduate, Jane Lemley, "The Passage of the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850" (May 1989), the best study of the framing of the Fugitive Slave Act I have ever seen.
 - 116. Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 1573 (Foote) and 1588 (Cass).
- 117. Ibid., 32nd Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 113–14. Mason, in his speech on these pages, quotes Foote's speech a few days earlier.
- 118. James S. Pike to William Schouler, April 21, 1850, Schouler MSS; Theodore Barnett to Caleb B. Smith, April 24, 1850, Smith MSS. Stegmaier, Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, p. 102, argues persuasively that the Taylor plan ceased to be a viable option even earlier in the House, when James Doty's resolution for the untrammeled admission of California was blocked by a southern filibuster on February 18.
- 119. Simeon Draper to Seward, January 28, February 2, 1850, Seward MSS (LC); Simeon Draper to Meredith, March 28, 1850, Meredith MSS.
- 120. For more detail, see my discussion of the Galphin Claim in Woodward, ed., Responses, pp. 75–78.
- 121. Allen A. Hall to Meredith, April 11, 1850, Meredith MSS. On March 18, 1850 Berrien wrote John Milledge, one of the Galphin attorneys, asking for $1,899 as a fee for his help in getting Meredith and Johnson to expedite payment of the interest. Berrien MSS.
 - 122. ZT:SWH, pp. 345-53.
- 123. William R. King to N. Blue, April 11, 1850, Blue MSS; Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, March 1850, Kennedy MSS; Seward to Weed, April 1, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Seward, April 4, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Schuyler Colfax to Caleb Smith, April 19, 1850, Theodore Barnett to Smith, April 20, 1850, Smith MSS; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, May 12, 1850, Outlaw MSS.
- 124. Weed to Meredith, May 31, 1850, Meredith MSS; Alexander H. Stephens to John J. Crittenden, May 7, 1850, Stephens MSS (Duke); David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, May 12, 1850, Outlaw MSS; Daniel Webster to Jonathan Prescott Hall, May 18, 1850, Webster MSS; John J. Crittenden to Albert T. Burnley, April 29, 1850, Crittenden MSS (Duke). I have found no evidence to prove it, but the stigmatization of Reverdy Johnson for his involvement in the Galphin affair may have been one reason that Thomas Pratt kept his distance from the administration and joined Johnson's enemy, James Pearce, in backing a congressional compromise rather than Taylor's plan.
- 125. U.S. Congress, Senate Committee Reports, 31st Cong., 1st Sess., Report No. 123, pp. 4–6. The three bills are printed on pp. 12–26 of the report, and the omnibus bill fills pp. 12–24. For the reactions of southern Whigs to the bills and the report, see Alexander Stephens to Crittenden, May 7, 1850, Stephens MSS (Duke); David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, May 13, 16, 1850, Outlaw MSS; Francis S. Bartow to John M. Berrien, May 21, 1850, Charles J. Jenkins to Berrien, May 29, 1850, and Iverson Harris to Berrien, June 1850, Berrien MSS.

- 126. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 95-96; Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 285-86.
- 127. A Mississippi Whig wrote in June that "Clay's [compromise] is hotly opposed by all extreme Southerners—particularly in reference to Texas." Patrick Henry to Gustavus A. Henry, June 20, 1850, Henry MSS.
- 128. Bearss, "'How All Occasions Do Inform," pp. 69–70. Clay is quoted in Ms. Bearss' excellent thesis.
- 129. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 95; J. L. Locke to Berrien, March 23, 1850, Iverson L. Harris to Berrien, April 25, 1850, Charles J. Jenkins to Berrien, May 15, 1850, Volney Howard to Berrien, May 5, 6, 1850, Berrien MSS. Berrien, it should be noted, received conflicting advice from Georgia because Whig foes of Stephens and Toombs had always contained two quite distinct groups: conservative Unionists like Locke, Jenkins, and Francis S. Bartow, and diehard state rights men like Harris and Volney Howard, who should not be confused with the Texas Democratic congressman with the same name. Harris and Howard were prepared to abandon the Whig party for a new Southern Rights coalition, and in the letters cited above, Howard excitedly wrote that party lines were collapsing in the South over California's admission. By offering a bill fixing California's southern boundary at the 36° 30' line as a substitute for the select committee's report, Howard cheered, Berrien could become the leader of a new Southern Rights party in Georgia, win the backing of all Georgia Democrats except the Cobb wing of that party, and leave Stephens and Toombs stranded in a minority. Berrien's entire course until August, I believe, was an attempt to bring that end about. As it turned out, Stephens and Toombs not only neutralized Berrien's efforts to outflank them in Congress, but when such a reorganization of parties did occur in Georgia in 1850-51, Berrien was its victim rather than its beneficiary.
- 130. Winthrop to Edward Everett, April 7, 1850, Everett MSS; D. H. Abell to Thomas Ewing, May 7, 1850, EFP. Scores, if not hundreds, of other letters from northern Whigs could also be cited to substantiate this point.
- 131. James S. Pike to William Schouler, May 3, 1850, Charles Russell to Schouler, May 18, 1850, Schouler MSS.
- 132. Theodore Barnett to Caleb B. Smith, May 14, 1850, Smith MSS; ZT:SWH, pp. 324–25, 333–34; Poage, Clay, pp. 229–31.
- 133. Orlando Brown to Crittenden, April 19, 1850, John J. Crittenden MSS (LC); Republic, May 6, 9, 1850, quoted in Bearss, "'How All Occasions Do Inform,' "pp. 71–72.
- 134. Poage, Clay, pp. 230–31; ZT:SWH, p. 334; Horace Greeley to James S. Pike, May 16, 1850, Pike MSS; Charles T. Russell to William Schouler, May 18, 1850, Schouler MSS.
 - 135. ZT:SWH, pp. 335–36; Nevins, Ordeal: Fruits, p. 319.
- 136. Roger S. Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, May 22, 1850, BFP; Seward to Weed, May 22, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 134; Orlando Brown to John J. Crittenden, May 23, 1850, Crittenden MSS (LC); Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, May 23, 1850, MFP-O; Henry Clay to James B. Clay, May 27, 1850, Thomas J. Clay MSS.
- 137. The fullest account of this aspect of Clay's decision is Bearss, "' 'How All Occasions Do Inform,' "' pp. 74–89.
 - 138. ZT:SWH, pp. 336-37; Poage, Clay, p. 233.
- 139. Johannsen, Douglas, p. 287; Webster to Franklin Haven, May 18, 1850, and to Peter Harvey, May 29, 1850, Webster MSS.
 - 140. Seward to Wife, June 3, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 137.
- 141. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, May 13, 18, 1850, Outlaw MSS; Truman Smith to John Wilson, May 9, 1850, Wilson MSS; Seward to Wife, July 1, 17, 1850, in Seward at Washington, pp. 141–43; Crittenden to John M. Clayton, April 6, 1850, Clayton MSS; Crittenden to Orlando Brown, April 30, June 7, 1850, Crittenden MSS (Duke); Patrick Henry to Gustavus A. Henry, June 30, 1850, Henry MSS.
- 142. C. B. Strong to Berrien, May 19, 1850, Bartow to Berrien, May 21, 1850, Charles Jenkins to Berrien, May 15, 29, 1850, Iverson Harris to Berrien, June 1850, Berrien MSS; for the bad blood between Mangum and Badger, see David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, December 9, 1849, Outlaw MSS.

- 143. Eliza (Mrs. John) Davis to James S. Pike, June 9, 1850, Pike MSS; Horace Mann to Lewis Campbell, July 3, 1850, Campbell MSS (OHS); Lewis Campbell to Seward, July 2, 11, 1850, Schuyler Colfax to Seward, April 27, 1850, Philo Shelton to Seward, May 9, 1850, Seth C. Hawley to Seward, May 14, 1850, William James to Seward, May 20, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 144. Seward to Wife, June 13, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 139; T. M. Brewer to William Schouler, April 26, 1850, Schouler MSS; Joseph Root to Joshua R. Giddings, June 12, 1849, Benjamin Mumford to Seward, April 10, 1850, and James Wilson to Seward, May 26, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Webster to Peter Harvey, April 7, 1850, Webster MSS. For the belief that the House would never allow the organization of territorial governments without the Proviso, see Thomas Corwin to J. A. Briggs, March 20, 1850, Corwin MSS (OHS); Weed to William M. Meredith, March 10, 1850, Meredith MSS; Winthrop to Everett, March 17, 1850, Everett MSS; Alexander H. Stephens to Crittenden, May 7, 1850, Stephens MSS (Duke); Webster to Franklin Haven, May 18, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 145. Foner, Business & Slavery, pp. 21–33; Hamilton Fish to Seward, February 9, 1850, A. Herr Smith to Seward, July 5, 1850, Augustus P. Steele to Seward, August 6, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to Weed, March 12, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 129; Roger S. Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, March 5, 1850, BFP; Webster to Peter Harvey, April 15, May 29, June 2, 1850, Webster MSS; J. O. Charles to Fillmore, June 27, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 146. D. G. Eshleman to Seward, April 9, 1850, James Bowen to Seward, February 3, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, May 28, June 6, 14, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 147. Horace Greeley to James S. Pike, May 16, 1850, Pike MSS; Greeley to Seward, May 17, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Van Deusen, Greeley, pp. 136–39; John H. White to Fillmore, July 3, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 148. Nathan G. King to Fillmore, June 11, 1850, Fuller to Fillmore, June 14, July 9, 1850, Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, July 9, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 149. On Detroit and Michigan, see Josiah Snow to Seward, January 16, 31, March 27, September 16, 1850, Seward MSS (RU). On Pittsburgh and Philadelphia, see Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 86–87; James Cooper to Fillmore, March 31, 1851, MFP-BHS; and S. Coryell to Samuel Calvin, June 28, 1850, Calvin MSS. For the split among Illinois Whigs over the omnibus, see Thomas L. Harris to C. H. Lanphier, June 24, August 12, 1850, Lanphier MSS. In Boston the Courier and the Advertiser remained loyal to Webster and plumped for compromise. The Boston Atlas, edited by William Schouler who had federal printing contracts and employed rabidly antislavery correspondents in Washington like T. M. Brewer and James S. Pike, virulently and persistently attacked Webster, Clay, and the very idea of compromise. Numerous letters in the Webster, Schouler, and Pike papers detail this rift.
- 150. For example, see Philo Shelton to Weed, May 9, 27, 1850, and Philip Greely, Jr., to Weed, September 4, 1850, Weed MSS (RU).
- 151. Shelton wrote Weed on May 9 that Webster had told southern Whig senators that Greely had written an anticompromise article in the Atlas in order to get those Southerners to vote against Greely's confirmation. Greely himself feared to attack Webster publicly, lest Webster block his confirmation. See Shelton to Weed, May 9, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); and Philip Greely, Jr., to John Davis, May 9, 1850, John Davis MSS.
- 152. Poage, Clay, p. 219; Webster to Willie P. Mangum, May 1, 1850, Webster MSS; William Schouler to James S. Pike, April 25, 1850, Pike MSS; Philo Shelton to Seward, May 9, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 153. Seward to Wife, June 13, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 139; J. Fulton to Seward, July 28, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Isaac Fisher to Samuel Calvin, July 22, 1850, Calvin MSS.
- 154. Morton McMichael to Meredith, May 10, 1850, R. C. Ellmaker to Meredith, June 5, 1850, William D. Lewis to Meredith, June 20, 1850, William F. Johnston to Meredith, June 25, 1850, H. M. Watts to Meredith, June 26, 1850, Isaac R. Davis to Meredith, June 26, 1850, Meredith MSS. Reports on how badly the Cooper and Clay forces were defeated at the state convention varied. Lewis, the Philadelphia customs collector, boasted that the Cooper forces were

- outnumbered by a five-to-one margin on the resolutions committee. Probably more reliable is Watts' tally of the actual votes. A resolution lauding Clay failed to pass on a 15–15 tie vote, one to consider the omnibus bill was defeated 20–10, and the resolution praising Cooper's course in the Senate was crushed 23–7.
 - 155. H. M. Watts to Meredith, July 2, 1850, Meredith MSS.
- 156. Seward to Wife, May 22, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 134; John H. Clarke to Meredith, June 1, 1850, Meredith MSS. Clarke counted Wales of Delaware as a northern Whig and said that Wales' colleague Spruance was undecided. Again, Stegmaier's Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850 provides definitive evidence of the existence of this anticompromise bloc, and his list of anticompromise senators, pp. 328–29, closely resembles Clarke's.
- 157. Volney Howard to John M. Berrien, July 18, 1850, Berrien MSS; Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, July 4, 1850, Webster MSS.
 - 158. Thomas L. Harris to C. H. Lanphier, June 24, 1850, Lanphier MS.
- 159. Seward to Wife, June 16, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 140; A. Gould to Seward, May 18, 1850, Worthington G. Snethen to Seward, May 21, 1850, J. Fulton to Seward, July 27, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 160. James A. Bayard to Clay, July 1, 1850, Henry Clay MSS (LC); H. M. Watts to Meredith, July 2, 1850, Meredith MSS; Foner, Business & Slavery, pp. 21–33; Crittenden to Orlando Brown, June 7, 1850, Crittenden MSS (Duke); James Morse to Caleb Cushing, June 27, 1850, Cushing MSS; Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 283–84; Alfred Gilmore to J. Alexander Fulton, June 26, 1850, Fulton MSS.
- 161. Thomas Dorr to Edmund Burke, October 3, 1849, Burke MSS; William R. King to N. Blue, April 11, 1850, Blue MSS; Henry Barns to Seward, January 18, 1850 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); William H. Bissell to Joseph Gillespie, December 15, 1849, Gillespie MSS.
- 162. Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, November 20, 1849, Nathan G. King to Fillmore, November 30, 1849, MFP-BHS; William L. Hodge to Seward, January 4, 1850, Jacob Morris to Seward, January 11, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 163. Jacob Morris to Seward, January 11, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); ZT:SWH, p. 263; Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, January 24, 1850, Webster to Charles A. Stetson, February 15, 1850, Webster MSS; Philip Greely, Jr., to James S. Pike, January 25, 1850, Pike MSS.
- 164. Webster to Charles A. Stetson, February 15, 1850, Webster to Edward Curtis, June 7, 1850, Webster MSS; Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, June 8, 1850, MFP-O.
- 165. Webster to Franklin Haven, January 24, 1850, Webster MSS; Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, April 9, 1850, MFP-O; Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, January 27, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 166. Webster to Peter Harvey, January 9, 1850, Webster to Franklin Haven, January 24, 1850, Webster to Edward Curtis, June 7, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 167. Josiah Snow to Seward, January 16, 31, March 27, 1850, Henry Barns to Seward, January 18, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 283–84.
- 168. Columbus Delano to Thomas Ewing, June 10, 1850, EFP; H. Reed to Seward, May 2, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 169. John H. Clarke to Meredith, June 1, 1850, Meredith MSS.
- 170. For the similar voting patterns of Morton and Yulee on the procedural votes breaking up the omnibus and the final compromise measures, see Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 192–94.
- 171. William F. Johnston to Fillmore, December 4, 1849, MFP-BHS; James F. Sanderson to Seward, December 21, 1849, Harry Schell, Jr., to Seward, February 23, 1850, Owen Marrin to Seward, July 20, 1850, Seward MSS (LC); William M. Biddle to John M. Berrien, January 2, 1850, Berrien MSS; Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, January 24, 1850, Webster MSS; William D. Lewis to Thaddeus Stevens, January 21, 1850, Stevens MSS; Cornelius Darragh to Meredith, February 1, 1850, Meredith MSS; Simon Cameron to Edmund Burke, June 15, 1849, Burke MSS; Senate Executive Proceedings, pp. 116–19.
- 172. John H. Bryant to Fillmore, December 4, 28, 1849, G. S. Walker to James Cooper, September 6, 1850, with James Cooper to Fillmore, September 1850, and Miller N. Everly to Fillmore, January 6, 1851, MFP-BHS.
 - 173. Weed to Seward, December 19, 1849, March 2, 1850, James Bowen to Seward, December 18, 1849, Richard M. Blatchford to Seward, December 6, 1849, Simeon Draper to Seward, December 7, 1849, Seward MSS (RU).

174. Fillmore to Nathan K. Hall, December 18, 1849, Hall to Fillmore, December 2, 13, 22, 1849, January 27, 1850, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, January 27, 1850, MFP-BHS; Theodore Parmalee to Seward, December 21, 1849, Seward MSS (RU).

175. Weed to Seward, December 2, 1849, Seward MSS (RU).

176. Simeon Draper to Seward, December 7, 1849, Richard M. Blatchford to Seward, December 6, 1849, James Bowen to Seward, December 18, 1849, William H. Scott to Seward, July 3, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); John Young to Fillmore, March 14, 1850, MFP-BHS.

177. John Collier to Fillmore, December 2, 1849, MFP-BHS.

178. Isaac Harrington to Seward, January 8, 1850, Jacob Morris to Seward, January 11, 1850, J. M. Ackley to Seward, March 11, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Nathaniel G. King to Fillmore, November 30, 1849, Lathrop Cook to Fillmore, January 19, 1850, Isaac Platt to Fillmore, January 26, 1850, W. F. Willard to Fillmore, February 13, 1850, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, January 27, 1850, MFP-BHS; N. K. Hall to Fillmore, January 27, 1850, Fillmore MSS (LC).

179. Fillmore to Nathan K. Hall, December 18, 1849, W. F. Willard to Fillmore, January 2, 1850, Russell Sage to Fillmore, February 23, 1850, MFP-BHS; Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, January 25, 31, April 9, 1850, MFP-O.

180. Weed to Seward, February 19, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Weed to Meredith, March 2, 1850, Meredith MSS.

181. Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, January 25, April 10, 1850, MFP-O; Dennis Bowen to Fillmore, March 3, 1850, Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, May 26, 1850, MFP-BHS; Buffalo Morning Express, March 7, 1850, with Elbridge G. Spaulding to Weed, March 11, 1850, Weed MSS (RU).

182. Gideon Hard to Fillmore, January 4, 1850, John C. Spencer to Fillmore, August 7, 1850, MFP-BHS; John C. Spencer to Webster, April 11, 1850, Webster MSS; Summers, Plundering Generation, p. 218.

183. Dennis Bowen to Fillmore, March 8, May 21, 1850, MFP-BHS; Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, February 16, April 2, 9, May 26, June 8, 1850, MFP-O; John C. Spencer to Daniel Webster, April 11, 1850, Webster MSS.

184. John S. Williams to Gideon Welles, June 30, 1850, Welles MSS (LC); Webster to Franklin Haven, July 4, 1850, Webster MSS; David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, June 25, 1850, Outlaw MSS.

185. Eliza Davis to James S. Pike, June 9, 1850, Pike MSS; John S. Williams to Gideon Welles, June 30, 1850, Welles MSS (LC). Berrien's amendment changed the prohibition on territorial legislatures from passing any laws "in respect to African Slavery" to any laws "establishing or prohibiting African Slavery." This revision allowed laws that recognized a property interest in slaves—for example, laws that made theft of a slave a felony. Yulee's amendment explicitly extended the Constitution and the laws of the United States to Utah and New Mexico. It reflected the disputed Calhounite contention that the Constitution guaranteed the right to hold slaves in all federal territories while also implicitly replacing Mexico's antislavery laws. Soulé's said that Congress had to admit any states formed out of Utah and New Mexico with or without slavery as their constitutions prescribed. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 98–99. For the Texas bond lobby, see ibid., pp. 118–32. For the motions to revise the Texas border, I have relied on Anderson, "Texas Boundary Dispute."

186. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 168-73.

187. ZT:SWH, pp. 374-78; Stegmaier, Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, pp. 115-33.

188. Official notice of Bell's call for the special session apparently did not reach Washington until July 24, 1850, but rumors about it began to circulate in June. Stegmaier, Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, p. 182.

189. Ibid.; Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 47–48. Six hundred additional troops had been dispatched to Sante Fe before Taylor sent his June 17 message to Congress, and in a cabinet meeting on July 2 or 3, Taylor told the cabinet that he was going to change the orders for the troops in New Mexico so that they would resist any armed attempt by Texans to seize Santa Fe. Stegmaier, Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, pp. 155–56.

- 190. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, June 21, 1850, Outlaw MSS. On Taylor's actions, see the preceding note.
- 191. David Outlaw to Emily Outlaw, June 25, 1850, Outlaw MSS (quotation); ZT:SWH, pp. 380–82; Poage, Clay, pp. 237–39; Stegmaier, "Taylor versus the South"; Stegmaier, Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, pp. 158–64.
 - 192. Schott, Stephens, p. 120; ZT:SWH, p. 391; Albany Evening Journal, July 9, 1850.
 - 193. Horace Greeley to Seward, May 27, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 194. Weed to William M. Meredith, May 31, 1850, Meredith MSS.
 - 195. Weed to Meredith, June 25, 1850, Meredith MSS.
 - 196. Webster to Franklin Haven, July 4, 1850, Webster MSS.
 - 197. ZT:SWH, pp. 388-89.

CHAPTER 15

- 1. Willie P. Mangum to Charity A. Mangum, July 10, 1850, in The Mangum Papers, V, pp. 180–82; ZT:SWH, pp. 388–93.
- 2. Willie Mangum to Charity Mangum, July 10, 1850, loc. cit.; John Pendleton Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, July 10, 11, 1850, Kennedy MSS.
- 3. Smith, Presidencies of Taylor and Fillmore, dissents from this traditional view for reasons I do not find fully compelling.
 - 4. Harmon Goodrich to William Henry Seward, July 11, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 5. John Pendleton Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, July 10, 11, 15, 1850, Kennedy MSS; Seward to Wife, July 12, 1850, Seward to Weed, July 12, 14, 1850, in Seward at Washington, pp. 145–46; Thomas Ewing to Philemon Ewing, July 10, 1850, Ewing MSS (OHS); Thomas Ewing to Millard Fillmore, July 18, 1850, Henry Hilliard to Fillmore, July 11, 1850, MFP-BHS; Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, July 16, 1850, Everett MSS; Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, July 11, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 6. Millard Fillmore to James Brooks, May 24, 1852, John White to Fillmore, July 3, 1850, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, July 10, 1850, and N. K. Hall to Fillmore, July 9, 1850, MFP-BHS. My guess is that if Fillmore did have such an interview with Taylor, it was on July 2 or 3, after Seward finally came out for Taylor's plan in the Senate, not on July 1, the day before Seward spoke.
- 7. Seward to Wife, July 10, 11, 12, 1850, Seward to Weed, July 12, 14, 1850, in Seward at Washington, pp. 144–46; Weed to Seward, July 10, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 8. Albany Evening Journal, July 10, 1850.
- 9. Garet G. Heermance to Seward, July 14, 1850, Seward MSS; Daniel D. Barnard to Fillmore, July 10, 1850, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, July 10, 1850, Thomas J. Siser to Fillmore, July 10, 1850, James Diefendorf to Fillmore, July 11, 1850, MFP-BHS; Hamilton Fish to Fillmore, July 22, 1850, Fish MSS.
- 10. Daniel D. Barnard to Fillmore, July 10, 1850, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, July 10, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 11. Leslie Combs to Fillmore, July 10, 1850, D. F. Royrdon to Fillmore, July 22, 1850, Henry Hillard to Fillmore, July 11, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 12. William Pitt Fessenden to Fillmore, July 15, 1850, S. Mason to Fillmore, July 17, 1850, John Peterson to Fillmore, August 1, 1850, William Graham to Fillmore, August 3, 1850, MFP-BHS. See also Lindley M. Moore to William H. Seward, July 17, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 13. Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, July 21, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 14. William H. Seward to Wife, July 11, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 145; Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, July 11, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 15. John P. Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, July 12, 1850, Kennedy MSS; Winthrop to Edward Everett, July 16, 1850, Everett MSS; Truman Smith to Fillmore, July 15, 1850, MFP-BHS; Daniel Webster to Fillmore, July 11, 1850, Webster to Franklin Haven, July 11, 1850, Webster MSS; Henry Clay to James B. Clay, July 18, 1850, Thomas J. Clay MSS.
- Webster to Fillmore, July 11, 1850, Webster MSS; Theodore Barnett to Caleb B. Smith, July 15, 1850, Smith MSS.

- 17. John P. Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, July 11, 1850, Kennedy MSS; Winthrop to Everett, July 19, 1850, Everett MSS; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 205–06.
 - 18. Van Deusen, Seward, p. 131.
 - 19. Francis Granger to Fillmore, July 16, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 20. In February and March, Winthrop wrote several friends that he had voted to table Root's motion, yet the House Journal, unless there is a misprint, indicates that he abstained rather than voted against Root. House Journal, 31st Cong., 1st Sess., 452.
- 21. A True Friend to Fillmore, July 16, 1850, MFP-BHS; Webster to Franklin Haven, July 21, 1850, Webster MSS; Dalzell, Webster, p. 205.
- 22. Seward to Weed, July 16, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 147; Dalzell, Webster, p. 204.
- 23. Webster to Fillmore, July 11, 19, 1850, Thomas Ewing to Fillmore, July 18, 1850, MFP-BHS; Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, July 21, 1850, Webster to Fletcher Webster, July 23, 1850, Webster MSS; John Woods to Samuel Galloway, July 23, 1850, Galloway MSS.
 - 24. N. K. Hall to Fillmore, July 9, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 25. N. K. Hall to Fillmore, April 3, 1850, MFP-O; Weed to Seward, July 23, 1850, Seth C. Hawley to Seward, July 27, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 26. Truman Smith to Daniel Webster, August 5, 1850, Webster MSS; Edward Bates to Fillmore, August 1, 1850, Henry Geyer to Fillmore, August 6, 1850, Willie P. Mangum to Fillmore, August 6, 1850, MFP-BHS; Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 168–71.
- 27. James Pearce to Fillmore, July 19, 1850, William B. Reed to Fillmore, March 1, 1849, Thomas McKennan to Fillmore, August 26, 1850, MFP-BHS; Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, July 21, 1850, Webster MSS; David McClure to Samuel Calvin, July 16, 1850, Calvin MSS; John P. Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, August 12, 1850, Edward Stanly to Alex Randall, September 3, 1850, with Alex Randall to John P. Kennedy, September 4, 1850, Kennedy MSS.
- 28. James Pearce to John P. Kennedy, September 26, 1850, Kennedy to Pearce, September 27, 1850, Edward Stanly to Alex Randall, September 3, 1850, Kennedy to Philip C. Pendleton, September 21, 1850, Robert C. Winthrop to Kennedy, September 29, 1850, Kennedy MSS; Daniel Webster to Fillmore, August 26, 1850, Charles Jenkins to Fillmore, September 8, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 29. John Otis to James S. Pike, August 9, 1850, Pike MSS; John Otis to William Schouler, August 10, 1850, Schouler MSS.
- 30. Seward to Wife, July 24, 25, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 149; Seward to Thurlow Weed, July 21, 28, 1850, Weed MSS (RU).
- 31. Thurlow Weed to Mrs. Frances Seward, July 4, 1850, Weed to John L. Schoolcraft, July 5, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Daniel Webster to Peter Harvey, July 19, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 32. A copy of Bell's letter is included in House Executive Documents, 31st Cong., 1st Sess., Doc. No. 82, 6–7; Volney Howard to Fillmore, August 1, 1850, MFP-BHS; Stegmaier, Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, pp. 170, 187.
- 33. Howard to Fillmore, August 1, 1850, MFP-BHS; Stegmaier, Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, p. 164; Potter, Impending Crisis, pp. 110–11, n. 33. Stegmaier, p. 164, states that the cabinet, which met without the dying Taylor, decided on the night of July 7 to press for New Mexico statehood with the boundaries claimed by the just-arrived constitution. The boundary between New Mexico and Texas recognized by the government of Mexico can be found in Hammond's United States History Atlas (Maplewood, N. J.: Hammond, Inc., 1984), p. U-21.
- 34. Seward to Wife, July 31, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 151; Webster to Franklin Haven, July 26, 1850, Webster MSS; Charles Clarke to Thurlow Weed, July 29, 1850, Weed MSS (RU).
 - 35. Anderson, "Texas Boundary Dispute," pp. 40, 55-56.
- 36. Smith, Presidencies of Taylor and Fillmore, pp. 173–75; Anderson, "Texas Boundary Dispute," pp. 41–44. I have relied on Anderson's tables for the Senate votes.
 - 37. Smith, Presidencies of Taylor and Fillmore, pp. 177-78.
 - 38. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 110-117.
 - 39. Orsamus Matteson to Thurlow Weed, August 1, 1850, quoted in ibid., p. 116.

Notes Notes

- 40. Cooper and Samuel Phelps were the missing or abstaining northern Whigs. Eight southern Whigs, including Berrien and Jackson Morton of Florida, supported the Utah bill, as did most southern Democrats. The weary Clay and Mangum were absent, while John Bell and, surprisingly, Pearce joined northern Whigs in the minority. Southern Democrats who voted supported the bill 12–0, as did northern Democrats 12–3.
- 41. Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, August 1, 1850, Everett MSS; Seward to Wife, August 2, 1850, Seward to Weed, August 2, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 151.
- 42. Seward to Weed, July 28, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); Seward to Wife, August 9, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 153; Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 133–37.
 - 43. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 135-36.
 - 44. William Graham to Fillmore, August 2, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 45. Webster to Fillmore, August 1, 3, 5, 6, 1850, MFP-BHS; Smith, Presidencies of Taylor and Fillmore, p. 181; Webster to Franklin Haven, August 9, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 46. Seward to Wife, August 9, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 153; John Otis to William Schouler, August 11, 1850, Schouler MSS. Pearce's original bill did not divide the $10 million compensation to Texas; he did so in an amendment to his own bill on August 9, the day the Texas bill passed the Senate.
- 47. Webster to Franklin Haven, August 9, 1850, Webster MSS; Seward to Wife, August 9, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 153.
 - 48. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 67-73.
- 49. Seth Hawley to Seward, August 8, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Mangum to Fillmore, August 6, 1850, MFP-BHS; Webster to Fillmore, August 7, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 50. Seward to Wife, August 10, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 153; John Otis to William Schouler, August 11, 1850, Schouler MSS.
 - 51. John Otis to William Schouler, August 11, 1850, Schouler MSS.
- 52. Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, August 10, 1850, Kennedy MSS; Winthrop to John H. Clifford, August 11, 1850, Winthrop MSS.
- 53. Thomas L. Harris to Charles H. Lanphier, August 23, 1850, Lanphier MSS; James S. Pike to William Schouler, August 25, 1850, Schouler MSS; Daniel Webster to Peter Harvey, August 11, 1850, Webster to Charles H. Thomas, August 12, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 54. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 138, suggests that abstaining Whig senators may have been paired with absent Democrats rather than purposefully ducking the vote.
- 55. Webster to Franklin Haven, August 9, 1850, Webster to Peter Harvey, August 11, 1850, Webster to Thomas Corwin, September 3, 1850, Webster MSS; John Otis to James S. Pike, August 9, 1850, Pike MSS; Senate Executive Proceedings, p. 234.
 - 56. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 51-55.
- 57. Ibid., p. 155; Thomas Harris to Charles H. Lanphier, August 22, September 4, 1850, Lanphier MSS; Alphonzo Taft to Daniel Webster, August 23, 1850, Webster MSS; E. G. Spaulding to William Schouler, August 31, 1850, Schouler MSS.
- 58. Webster to Fillmore, August 23, 1850, MFP-BHS; Webster to Franklin Haven, September 5, 1850, Webster to William Duer, September 6, 1850, Webster MSS; E. G. Spaulding to William Schouler, August 31, 1850, Schouler MSS.
- 59. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 156–57. Boyd's original motion of August 28 included Utah in his proposed bill, but he deleted it the next day. McDonald, "Politics of Compromise," pp. 11–12. I have relied on this exemplary and remarkably thorough undergraduate paper for much of my discussion of proceedings in the House.
- 60. The other northern Whig "defectors" were James Wilson of New Hampshire, long considered Webster's lackey; James Meacham of Vermont, another New Englander vulnerable to Webster's influence; and Edward McGaughey, the lone Whig in the Indiana delegation. Significantly, Ashmun, who was clearly in Washington, abstained, as he would on all the other crucial roll calls in the House except the vote to pass the District slave-trade bill. Two Pennsylvania and two New York Whigs, including the buffeted Spaulding, also did not vote, thus subtracting their support from the anticompromise ranks. Figures for this and all other House roll calls concerning Boyd's proposal were taken from the tables in McDonald, "Politics of Compromise," Appendixes A and B.

- 61. Stegmaier's exhaustive Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850, pp. 289–90, does note Toombs' amendment, but I decidedly disagree with his characterization of the part of the amendment included in the final Texas-New Mexico statute as a "small addition." I think it changed the meaning of the legislation.
- 62. Toombs' proposed amendment is quoted in McDonald, "Politics of Compromise," p. 15, and it can be found in the Congressional Globe, 31st Cong., 1st Sess., 1753.
- 63. U.S., Statutes at Large, Volume IX, p. 452. For the contrasting argument that the legislation left the power of New Mexico's legislature to bar slavery ambiguous by a historian apparently unaware of Section 19, see Potter, Impending Crisis, pp. 115–17.
- 64. The votes here, as throughout this section, are based on tables in McDonald, "Politics of Compromise," and McDonald relied on the appendixes in Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, for the party identity of House members. Like Hamilton, therefore, his number of northern Whigs totals seventy-four, not seventy-six, the total I list above in the text. My total includes Rufus Goodenow of Maine, who is absent from Hamilton's table and who, for whatever reason, must have been absent from Congress during a considerable part of the session, and Daniel King of Massachusetts, who died in July and was not replaced.
 - 65. William Neal to Seward, September 1, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 66. David Abell to Thurlow Weed, August 5, 1850, Weed MSS (RU). C. B. Stuart wrote Fillmore on September 23, 1850, that he had been in Rochester when the convention renominated Schermerhorn and said, "This was owing to his last vote on the Boundary—which has placed him in the right position with the Whigs of Monroe." MFP-BHS.
- 67. The Pennsylvania Native American Lewis C. Levin provided the other positive vote, and if he is considered a northern Whig, then twenty-three of them backed the Texas-New Mexico hill
- 68. Since the combined Texas-New Mexico bill represented a new piece of legislation, it required action by the Senate, which had passed separate bills. The lopsided margin by which it passed reveals how thoroughly opposition to the compromise in the upper chamber had collapsed. Only six northern Whigs voted in the negative, while Truman Smith and the two Delaware Whigs supported the bill. The remaining northern Whigs abstained. U.S. Congress, Journal of the Senate, 31st Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 612–13.
- 69. Border state Whigs voted unanimously for California, and Tennessee's Whigs favored it 4–1. One Virginian and two of six North Carolina Whigs completed the total.
 - 70. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 182.
- 71. Fillmore to Hamilton Fish, September 9, 1850, Fish MSS; Webster to Daniel S. Dickinson, September 27, 1850, Webster MSS. For Clay, see Remini, Henry Clay, pp. 730–65.
- 72. Philemon Ewing to Thomas Ewing, July 13, 1850, Ewing MSS (OHS); Alex Mann to Millard Fillmore, July 12, 1850, James Cooper to Fillmore, July 15, 1850, "Anti-Reverdy Johnson" to Fillmore, July 17, 1850, D. O. Kellogg to Fillmore, August 5, 1850, MFP-BHS; William H. Seward to Wife, July 10, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 144; John Armitage to Samuel Calvin, July 20, 1850, Thomas McNamara to Calvin, July 26, 1850, Calvin MSS; Owen Marrin to Seward, July 20, 1850, Seward MSS (RU). Numerous other examples of letters from Whigs demanding the replacement of Taylor's appointments can be found in the files for July 14 and 15, MFP-BHS.
- 73. James R. Thompson to Fillmore, July 29, 1850, Aurelius Conkling to Fillmore, August 7, 1850, Daniel D. Barnard to Fillmore, July 12, 1850, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, July 11, September 10, 12, 1850, John C. Spencer to Fillmore, August 7, 1850, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, July 19, 31, 1850, MFP-BHS; James O. Putnam to Fillmore, July 18, 1850, MFP-O.
- 74. Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, July 11, 1850, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, July 31, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 75. Hamilton Fish to Millard Fillmore, July 22, 1850, Fish MSS; A. H. Calhoun to Fillmore, July 11, 1850, Alex Mann to Fillmore, July 12, 1850, Washington Hunt to Fillmore, July 25, 1850, MFP-BHS; James O. Putnam to Fillmore, July 18, 1850, MFP-O.
- 76. John Armitage to Samuel Calvin, July 20, 1850, Calvin MSS; Washington Hunt to Fillmore, July 25, 1850, Joshua Fry to Fillmore, August 12, 1850, MFP-BHS.
 - 77. Senate Executive Proceedings, p. 210; Seth C. Hawley to Seward, August 8, 1850, Seward

MSS (RU). All subsequent information about nominations and Senate actions comes from this Senate journal, pp. 210–72. Elbridge Spaulding may also have been trying to save the job of Franklin Spaulding, Taylor's nominee for customs collector in Niagara, New York, who I assume was related to him. If so, his case well illustrates how the alliance between Fillmore and Senate Democrats worked. Fillmore did not remove Franklin Spaulding, but Dickinson, who controlled the calendar since he chaired the Finance Committee, delayed the Senate vote on him until September 26, well after Elbridge Spaulding had abstained on crucial votes in the House rather than oppose compromise measures like the little omnibus. On September 26, Spaulding was defeated by a vote of 17–23, even though northern Whigs including Seward supported him. Only one Democrat, Thomas Hart Benton, voted to confirm, and nineteen of the twenty-three negative votes came from Democrats.

- 78. Webster to Fillmore, August 7, 1850, Webster MSS; Webster to Fillmore, August 21, 22, 26, September 17, 1850, John A. Collier to Fillmore, August 29, 1850, MFP-BHS. Hannegan, Polk's midnight appointee, resigned as minister to Prussia in January 1850, but no one had been named to replace him until Fillmore nominated Barnard.
 - 79. Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, p. 196.
 - 80. Senate Executive Proceedings, pp. 217-19.
- 81. John C. Spencer to Fillmore, August 7, 1850, MFP-BHS; Webster to Peter Harvey, August 11, 1850, Webster to Thomas Corwin, September 3, 1850, Webster MSS; Josiah Snow to William H. Seward, September 16, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 86–87
- 82. Senate Executive Proceedings, pp. 219, 236; George Welch to Samuel Calvin, August 27, 1850, William K. Hamilton to Calvin, September 3, 1850, Calvin MSS; Thomas Corwin to Fillmore, August 13, 1850, C. R. Starkweather to Fillmore, August 18, 1850, L. Lisle Smith to Fillmore, August 19, 1850, Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, August 19, 1850, MFP-BHS.
 - 83. D. O. Kellogg to Fillmore, August 5, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 84. N. K. Hall to Fillmore, September 2, 1850, John Young to Fillmore, August 21, 1850, D. D. Barnard to Fillmore, September 17, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 85. Webster to ?, September 15, 1850, Samuel Lawrence to Webster, June 19, 1850, Benjamin Curtis to Webster, August 31, 1850, Webster MSS; Webster to Fillmore, September 11, 1850, MFP-BHS.
 - 86. Senate Executive Proceedings, p. 233.
- 87. Webster to Everett, September 26, 1850, Everett MSS; Philo Shelton to Thurlow Weed, May 9, 1850, Philip Greely, Jr., to Weed, September 4, 1850, William Schouler to Weed, September 16, 1850, Weed MSS (RU).
- 88. David Abell to Thurlow Weed, August 5, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); N. K. Hall to Fillmore, September 7, 1850, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, July 31, September 1, 14, 1850, MFP-BHS; Seth C. Hawley to Seward, August 17, September 21, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 89. John Young to Fillmore, August 21, 1850, Daniel D, Barnard to Fillmore, September 17, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 90. Jerome Fuller to Millard Fillmore, September 10, 15, 1850, John Young to Fillmore, August 21, September 12, 1850, Lot Clark to Fillmore, September 6, 1850, C. B. Stuart to Fillmore, September 7, 1850, Daniel D. Barnard to Fillmore, September 17, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 91. Washington Hunt to Fillmore, September 18, 1850, Daniel Ullmann to Fillmore, September 21, 1850, Fillmore to Daniel Ullmann, September 22, 1850, D. D. Barnard to Fillmore, September 30, 1850, MFP-BHS; Samuel Lyman to Thurlow Weed, September 23, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); Senate Executive Proceedings, p. 272.

CHAPTER 16

- 1. William Henry Seward to Thurlow Weed, July 28, 1850, Weed MSS (RU).
- 2. Alex Williams to Thurlow Weed, September 19, 1850, Weed MSS (LC); Seth Hawley to Seward, September 1, 1850 (quotation), Seward MSS (LC).
 - 3. Daniel Webster to Peter Harvey, October 2, 1850, Webster MSS.
- Holt, Political Crisis, p. 88. For the enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Act, see Campbell, Slave Catchers.

- 5. Charles Sumner to George W. Julian, June 6, 1850, Giddings-Julian MSS; Volney Howard to John M. Berrien, July 18, 1850 (quotations), C. B. Strong to Berrien, July 15, 1850, Iverson Harris to Berrien, August 2, 1850, Berrien MSS; Webster to Harvey, October 2, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 6. Unlike the Democrats, the Free Soilers did run a candidate against Anthony, but Anthony outpolled him by a five-to-one margin in a low-turnout election. Whigs also retained over 60 percent of the seats in each house of the legislature. The results for all elections discussed in this chapter, unless noted otherwise, are taken from Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections, and the data on partisan strength in state legislatures were supplied by the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research at the University of Michigan.
- 7. Renda, "The Polity and Party System," pp. 185–190, 207, 214. Renda's splendid dissertation provides an excellent analysis of Democrats' manipulation of state economic issues in the 1850 campaign. Democrats outnumbered Whigs in New Hampshire's tiny state senate by eleven to one.
- 8. Emily Baldwin to Roger Sherman Baldwin, April 4, 1850, BFP. This account of Connecticut is also based on the following sources: Renda, "The Polity and the Party System," pp. 173–76, 206, 215; Gideon Welles to Chauncey F. Cleveland, November 3, December 19, 1849, Chauncey F. Cleveland to Welles, January 16, 1850, Welles MSS (LC); Gideon Welles to Chauncey Cleveland, January 21, February 21, 1850, Welles MSS (Connecticut Historical Society); Emily Baldwin to Roger Sherman Baldwin, February 26, March 2, 13, 23, 24, 1850, Samuel Hubbard to R. S. Baldwin, March 14, 1850, Anson Baldwin to R. S. Baldwin, March 27, 1850, Dennis Kimberly to R. S. Baldwin, April 8, 1850, Roger Sherman Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, March 3, 8, 25, April 5, 1850, BFP.

Since 1848, Whigs from eastern Connecticut had complained that both United States senators, Baldwin and Smith, lived west of the Connecticut River. Since Whigs expected to renominate Baldwin as their senatorial candidate when the legislature met after the election, Whigs tried to appease easterners by replacing incumbent Governor Joseph Trumbull of Hartford, who also lived west of the Connecticut, with Foster, a resident of Norwich. But that action offended Trumbull's friends, and Foster ran behind Trumbull's 1849 totals everywhere in the state except New London County.

- 9. Hartford Courant, March 16, 1850, quoted in Renda, "The Polity and the Party System," p. 175.
- 10. In the legislature, free-soil Democrats helped elect Seymour governor, but they refused to support the Democratic candidate for the Senate, Isaac Toucey, an even more notorious doughface, and instead voted for John M. Niles. That split prevented Democrats from filling the Senate seat, but Democrats also had enough votes to stop Baldwin's reelection.

The changes in the gubernatorial vote and the partisan distribution of seats in the legislature in Connecticut between 1849 and 1850 were as follows.

Popular	Voto	for	Governor
robular	vote	101	Governor

	1849	1850
Whig	27,300 (48.8%)	28,209 (46.9%)
Democratic	25,106 (44.9%)	29,022 (48.3%)
Free Soil	3,520 (6.3%)	2,877 (4.8%)
	Share of Legislative Seats

	House	Senate	House	Senate
Whig	111	13	100	6
Democratic	97	8	108	10
Free Soil	14	0	4	5

11. John Pendleton to Daniel Webster, March 12, 1850, Webster MSS; J. W. Spaulding to Thomas Ewing, May 16, 1850, EFP; White, "Virginia Constitutional Convention," pp. 7–18.

- 12. Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," pp. 59–64, 69–82. The 1850 results left Whigs with fifty-seven seats and Democrats with forty-three seats in the house of representatives; in the senate, Whigs outnumbered Democrats twenty-five to thirteen. In contrast, after the 1848 elections, in which Crittenden was elected governor, the Whigs enjoyed margins of sixty-four to thirty-three in the house and twenty-seven to eleven in the senate.
- 13. Rosenberg, Iowa, pp. 36–54. For the figures on turnout, see Gienapp, "'Politics Seem to Enter into Everything," pp. 18–19. Iowa's turnout rate in August elections was 76 percent in 1846, 78.7 percent in 1847, and 78.4 percent in 1848, falling to 64.8 percent in 1849 and 62.7 percent in 1850.

The changes between 1848 and 1850 in the popular vote for congressmen and partisan representation in the state legislature were as follows:

Statewide Vote for	Congressmen
--------------------	-------------

	1848	1850
Whig	11,478 (47.4%)	11,710 (45.9%)
Democratic	12,266 (50.6%)	13,182 (52.2%)
Free Soil	485 (2%)	408 (1.9%)
	Seats in the Legislature

	House	Senate	House	Senate
Whig	11	8	4	6
Democratic	28	10	35	13
Free Soil	0	1	0	0

14. Van Bolt, "'Eternal Agitation," 358–63; Schuyler Colfax to William H. Seward, March 26, April 27, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Theodore Barnett to Caleb B. Smith, May 6, 1850, Schuyler Colfax to Caleb Smith, February 18, March 8, July 20, August 10, August 21, 1850, Smith MSS.

The changes in the partisan share of seats in the Indiana legislature between 1849 and 1850 were as follows:

	1849		18	50
	House	Senate	House	Senate
Whig	40	21	37	17
Democratic	59	29	55	34
Free Soil	1	0	8	0

- 15. Isaac L. Scribner to William H. Seward, August 31, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Harry Bradley to Millard Fillmore, October 24, 1850, John H. Peck to Fillmore, November 2, 1850, MFP-BHS; E. A. Stansbury to George W. Julian, October 30, 1850, Giddings-Julian MSS.
- 16. Harry Bradley to Fillmore, October 24, 1850, Thomas Hale to Fillmore, April 23, 1852, MFP-BHS; E. A. Stansbury to George W. Julian, October 30, 1850, Giddings-Julian MSS; E. D. Barber to Salmon P. Chase, February 24, 1851, Chase MSS (LC); Justin Morrill to Solomon Foot, September 20, 1850, (description of Phelps), Morrill MSS.
 - 17. William Pitt Fessenden to Fillmore, August 24, 1850, MFP-BHS.
 - 18. Hunt, Hamlin, pp. 35-69.
- 19. James S. Pike to William Schouler, August 25, 1850, Schouler MSS. A veteran newspaper reporter and Whig congressional candidate in 1850, Pike tried to instigate Democratic defections to the Free Soil congressional candidate in his district by secretly writing campaign speeches for the Free Soiler.

20. The changes in the vote for governor and for the share of legislative seats between 1849 and 1850 in Maine were as follows:

Popular	Vote	for	Governor
---------	------	-----	----------

	1849		1850
Whig	28,260 (38.3%)		32,308	32,308 (40.0%)
Democratic	37,534	37,534 (50.9%)		(51.0%)
Free Soil	8,025	(10.9%)	7,271	(9.0%)
		Seats in the	e Legislature
	House	Senate	House	Senate
Whig	59	11	58	6
Democratic	76	14	93	25
Free Soil	16	5	18	0

- 21. Mering, Whig Party in Missouri, p. 138.
- 22. Ibid., pp. 166–80. My discussion in this and the following paragraph relies solely on Mering's pages cited here, and Mering is so interested in splits among Democrats and Whigs that he says nothing about what position Missouri Whig candidates took on the Compromise during the August election. Because the Missouri Whig press later lauded the Compromise, I surmise that Missouri Whig candidates endorsed it as a perfect middle ground between the warring Democratic factions.
- 23. The representation of Whigs and the two Democratic factions in Missouri's legislature after the 1850 elections was as follows:

	House	Senate
Whigs	53	12
Benton Democrats	48	13
Anti-Benton Democrats	27	8

I have reversed the strength of Benton and Anti-Benton Democrats as listed by Walter Dean Burnham in the data he submitted to the Inter-University Consortium. I have done so because of the relative strength of the two factions described in Francis Preston Blair, Jr., to Francis Preston Blair, Sr., August 17, 1850, Blair-Lee Papers.

- 24. In a paper written for a seminar on the Compromise of 1850, one of my students, at my suggestion, calculated indices of support for the Compromise for North Carolina's House delegation. Based on fourteen roll-call votes, including the votes and various amendments on Boyd's motion to combine Texas and New Mexico, as well as the votes on the final measures themselves, his tabulation assigned a score of 2 to every positive pro-Compromise vote, 1 to every abstention, and 0 to every anti-Compromise vote cast. Thus, a perfect pro-Compromise score was 28. The scores of the five orthodox Whigs ranged between 26 and 20. Clingman scored 9. The three Democrats scored 7, 7, and 3. This method, which can be applied to any state's delegation, reveals in a different way the dominant pattern of voting I suggested in the previous two chapters, as well as identifying exceptions to the rule, like Clingman. Hunter, "Delegation Divided," Table 3.
- 25. Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 285–95; Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 124–33; Harris, Holden, pp. 37–41.
 - 26. Edward Stanly to David F. Caldwell, March 1, 1850, Caldwell MSS.
 - 27. Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 65–68, 149–51; Harris, Holden, pp. 51–53.
 - 28. Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 93, 151; Harris, Holden, pp. 35-41. The changes in the popular vote and partisan share of legislative seats between 1848 and 1850 are listed below. I have used Kruman's figures for partisan strength in the legislature rather than those from the Inter-University Consortium.

	1848		18	1850
Whig	42,536	42,536 (50.5%)		42,341 (48.5%)
Democratic	41,682	41,682 (49.5%)		(51.5%)
		Seats in the	e Legislature
	House	Senate	House	Senate
Whig	61	25	55	22
Democratic	59	25	65	28

- 29. For evidence that Whigs blamed the result on state issues, see the letters from Whigs to William A Graham cited in Harris, Holden, p. 40, n. 43. Since Thomas Clingman was one of the victorious Whig candidates in 1851, it may be more accurate to say that Whigs won five of nine districts.
 - 30. Evitts, Matter of Allegiances, pp. 16-38; see also Bowers, "Ideology."
- 31. John P. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, September 9, 1850, copy, Kennedy MSS; Truth to Thomas Corwin, n.d. [October 1850], Corwin MSS (LC).
- 32. John P. Kennedy to J. D. Whelpley, October 3, 1850, copy, Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, October 7, 1850, copy, Kennedy to J. Sherrod Williams, October 22, 1850, copy, Kennedy MSS; James A. Pearce to Thomas Corwin, October 1, 5, 1850, John Pickett to Corwin, October 5, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC).
- 33. Doherty, Whigs of Florida, pp. 35–48. The quotation is from the Jacksonville Florida Republican, September 26, 1850, p. 43.
- 34. Ibid. Doherty provides no popular vote totals for the legislative elections, and I cannot account for the Whigs' defeat in them. Doherty also says that the Democrats had a 31–28 majority on the joint ballot in the legislature, figures that differ slightly from those supplied by the Inter-University Consortium, which I list below. Regression estimates of voter movements between the two elections suggest that about 10 percent (380) of 1848 Democratic voters supported Cabell in 1850, whereas about 9 percent (395) of his 1848 voters defected to the Democrats. The regression estimates are contained in Calabro, "Two-Party System in Florida," pp. 22–23

The changes in the popular vote for congressmen and representation in the Florida legislature between 1848 and 1850 were as follows:

Popular Vote for Congress

	10	240	10	250
	18	1848		1850
Whig	4,382 (4,382 (53.5%)		4,531 (52.8%)
Democratic	3,805 (3,805 (46.5%)		4,050 (47.2%)
		Legislati	ive Seats
	House	Senate	House	Senate
Whig	24	12	19	9
Democratic	16 7 20		20	10

35. Recall that Webster wanted Fillmore to appoint a Missourian to his cabinet to represent the Midwest, not the South. See also Freehling, Road to Disunion, pp. 32, 538–41. In 1850, slaves constituted less than 3 percent of Delaware's population and only about 13 percent of Missouri's.

- 36. James A. Bayard to Henry Clay, July 1, 1850, Henry Clay MSS (LC).
- 37. John M. Clayton to John J. Crittenden, August 8, 1850, Clayton to Edward Stanly, August 23, 1850, Crittenden MSS (LC); John W. Houston to John M. Clayton, December 23, 1850, Clayton MSS; James Pearce to John P. Kennedy, September 2, 1850, Kennedy MSS; Daniel Webster to Richard H. Bayard, October 6, 1850, Webster to Millard Fillmore, October 19, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 38. Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 283–84; Thomas L. Harris to Charles Lanphier, June 24, 1850, Lanphier MSS.
- 39. Thomas L. Harris to Charles H. Lanphier, June 24, August 12, October 18, November 6, 1850, Lanphier MSS; John B. Shaw to Richard T. Yates, August 22, 1850, Yates MSS; Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 299, 303. In 1848, a Free Soiler had drawn 1.1 percent of the congressional vote in the seventh district, allowing Harris to defeat his Whig rival that year by 49.8 to 49.1 percent.
 - 40. Current, Wisconsin, pp. 201-09; Hamilton, Prologue to Conflict, pp. 191-200.
- 41. Nathaniel P. Tallmadge to Millard Fillmore, December 12, 1850, January 6, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 42. Current, Wisconsin, pp. 209–10; William Duane Wilson to Fillmore, October 24, 1851, Nathaniel P. Tallmadge to Fillmore, November 7, 1851, MFP-BHS. Tallmadge claimed that Whig support for and Democratic opposition to a free banking act in Wisconsin had produced the result, and he insisted that Farwell's hostility to the Fugitive Slave Act drove Whig voters away from him. The extent of the revolution in Wisconsin politics in 1851 can be illustrated by the longitudinal change in party strength in the state legislature.

	House		Senat		te
	Whig	Dem.	F.S.	Whig	Dem.	F.S.
1848	16	35	15	4	12	3
1849	17	41	8	4	12	2
1850	11	48	7	3	14	2
1851	35	25	6	6	12	1

- 43. Josiah Snow to Seward, September 16, November 15, 1850, George E. Pomeroy to Seward, October 28, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 44 Ibid
- 45. Josiah Snow to Seward, November 15, 1850, Seward MSS (RU). The change in the three parties' share of the popular vote in Michigan between 1848 and 1850 was as follows:

	Whigs	Democrats	Free Soilers
1848 (Cong.)	30,108 (45.6%)	31,244 (47.4%)	4,567 (7.0%)
1849 (Gov.)	23,561 (45.7%)	27,845 (54.3%)
1850 (Cong.)	30,929 (51.3%)	29,260 (48.7%)

The Whigs' share of seats in the state house of representatives rose from 18.4 percent in 1848 to 29.2 percent in 1849 to 35.3 percent in 1850; in the state senate the change was from 18.1 percent in 1848 to 22.7 percent in 1849 to 27.2 percent in 1850.

46. Salmon Chase to Belle Chase, January 15, 1850, C. R. Miller to Salmon Chase, January 21, 1850, Edward Hamlin to Chase, March 11. 1850, Chase MSS (LC); Aaron F. Perry to Thomas Ewing, December 16, 1849, EFP.

The average indexes of likeness or agreement between Whigs and Free Soilers, on the one hand, and Democrats and Free Soilers, on the other, on roll-call votes concerning economic policy in the Ohio house of representatives during its 1849–50 session were as follows:

Policy Category	No. of Votes	Whig/F.S.	Dem./F.S.
Business incorp.	8	74	50
Altering charters/stockholder liability	8	52	65
Banking and currency	68	83	34
Internal improvements	49	69	65

These figures are drawn from the tables in Shadle, "Consensus."

- 47. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 154–55; Salmon P. Chase to Belle Chase, January 15, 1850, Chase to Edward Hamlin, February 2, 1850, Adams Jewett to Chase, February 3, 1850, Chase MSS (LC).
- 48. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 166; Aaron F. Perry to John McLean, February 14, 1850, McLean MSS (LC); Aaron Perry to Thomas Ewing, May 7, 1850, Van Brown to Thomas Ewing, May 10, 1850, EFP; William Johnson to Thomas Corwin, July 24, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC); John Barr to William H. Seward, July 14, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 49. John Coon to Thomas Corwin, October 24, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC).
- 50. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 168; Aaron Perry to Thomas Ewing, September 4, 1850, EFP; John Miller to Samuel Galloway, September 17, 1850, Galloway MSS. On Corwin's regret at joining Fillmore's cabinet, see John L. Schoolcraft to Thurlow Weed, August 12, 1850, Weed MSS (RU). For reports on the wrangling over economic policy at the state constitutional convention, which continued until the spring of 1851, see Van Brown to Thomas Ewing, May 10, September 11, 1850, Jacob Blickensderfer to Ewing, June 15, 1850, EFP.
- 51. Unlike Chase in the Senate, both Giddings and Root failed to vote on the District slave trade bill. To measure the degree of support members of Ohio's House delegation gave the Compromise as a whole, I used the votes on the five final measures as well as the three procedural roll-call votes on framing the Texas-New Mexico bill, listed in the appendixes of Hamilton's Prologue to Conflict, to construct a composite index. I assigned a score of 2 for every positive or pro-Compromise vote, 1 for every abstention, and 0 for every negative vote. Thus a perfect pro-Compromise score was 16 and a perfect anti-Compromise score was 0. Because both the California and District slave trade bills were viewed as antislavery, pronorthern measures, however, the archetypal northern anti-Compromise score was 4. By this index, both Root and Giddings scored 3. Six of eight Whigs scored 4, and another, 5. John Taylor's composite score was 10. Of the Democrats, four scored 4, one, 8, three, 10, one, 12, one, 14, and Moses Hoagland a perfect 16. Whigs opposed the critical Texas-New Mexico bill by a margin of 1-7, while Democrats opposed it more narrowly 4-5, with two abstentions. All eight Whigs including Taylor voted against the Utah bill; Democrats split 3-4, with four abstentions. Six of eight Whigs voted against the Fugitive Slave Act, Taylor supported it, and Robert Schenck recorded no vote. Democrats split 2-6 with three abstentions. In sum, there were differences between the voting records of Whigs and Democrats, but they were not very dramatic.
- 52. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 241–42. The turnout rate in 1850 was only 57.3 percent. Not only was this rate lower than that in previous off-year congressional races, but it lagged behind the level in odd-year elections when only legislative seats and minor state-wide offices were at stake. See Gienapp, "'Politics Seems to Enter Into Everything," pp. 18–19.
 - 53. See the tables in Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 244-45.
 - 54. Ibid, pp. 156–57.
 - 55. Adams Jewett to Salmon P. Chase, February 3, 1850, Chase MSS.
- 56. The change in the parties' share of the popular vote from 1848 to 1850 was as follows:

	Whig	Democratic	Free Soil
1848 (Gov.)	148,766 (49.9%)	148,452 (49.8%)
1848 (Pres.)	138,656 (42.1%)	154,782 (47.0%)	35,523 (10.7%)
1850 (Gov.)	121,105 (45.1%)	133,093 (49.6%)	13,747 (5.1%)

- 57. J. Dustin Ward to Lewis Campbell, August 28, 1850, Lewis Campbell MSS.
- 58. The size and share of the three parties' statewide vote in the congressional elections of 1848 and 1850 were as follows:

	Whigs	Democrats	Free Soilers
1848	118,193 (43.2%)	136,217 (49.8%)	18,996 (7.0%)
1850	108,913 (42.9%)	127,843 (50.4%)	16,901 (6.7%)

In constructing this table, I have credited the vote of Free Soilers who ran on joint tickets, like Giddings, to the Free Soil column, but I counted Campbell, John Crowell, and Eb Newton, Crowell's successor in 1850, as Whigs. I have also interpolated the size of the Free Soil vote when it was not listed in the returns given in the Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections and the major parties' share did not equal 100 percent.

- 59. B. White to Thomas Corwin, September 30, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC).
- 60. After the election, the jubilant Townshend wrote Salmon Chase, "My election was a damper to the Whigs & whig free soilers of this region. . . . Our opponents both of the Root & Worcester [Whig] parties have been very bitter." Norton S. Townshend to Salmon P. Chase, October 10, 1850, Chase MSS (HSP). Townshend's close alliance with Chase has led me to follow Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 156, in crediting Townshend's victory to the Free Soil rather than the Democratic column, but the Guide to U.S. Elections lists Townshend as a Democrat and Root as the Free Soil candidate in the district, while Blue, Free Soilers, p. 183, argues that "Giddings was the lone Free Soiler from Ohio returned to Congress."
- 61. E. F. Sadler to Thomas Corwin, October 24, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC); Benjamin Wade to Caroline Wade, November 5, 1850, Wade MSS.
- 62. My account of New Jersey in this and subsequent paragraphs is based almost entirely on Renda, "Railroads, Revenue, and Reform," pp. 38–79. I shall eschew specific page citations except for quotations.
 - 63. For a survey of Whig newspaper sentiment in New Jersey, see ibid., p. 60.
- 64. Because Democrats had chartered the Joint Companies and were closely associated with them, Whig attacks on those transportation monopolies seemed a natural issue for the party. But for several reasons many Whigs opposed such attacks. Some represented counties that benefited from the railroad or the canal. Others believed the charters represented a contract that could not be constitutionally breached. Most important, about 90 percent of the state's revenue was derived from fees and dividends the Joint Companies paid the state. Anything that lessened those firms' revenue could necessitate real estate tax increases that many Whigs were loath to levy.
- 65. In 1848, the total Whig popular vote for congressmen was 36,668 (50.2 percent), compared to the Democrats' 36,379 (49.8 percent). In 1850, the comparable figures were: Whigs, 33,299 (45.8 percent) and Democrats, 39,368 (54.2 percent). In 1848, Taylor ran ahead of Cass 40,009 (51.4 percent) to 36,880 (47.3 percent). In 1850, Fort bested Runk 39,723 (53.8 percent) to 34,054 (46.2 percent).
- 66. Newark Mercury, November 6–9, 1850, quoted in Renda, "Railroads, Revenue, and Reform," p. 78 and front quotes.
- 67. I include in this total of Whigs John W. Howe from a western district north of Pittsburgh. Howe was elected on joint Whig/Free Soil tickets in 1848 and again in 1850. He cooperated with the Free Soilers in the speakership election during December 1849 but with Whigs on other votes. Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections lists his affiliation as Free Soil in 1848 but Whig in 1850.

- 68. Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 90–91; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 167, 172–73; H. M. Watts to William M. Meredith, May 31, 1850, Meredith MSS; J. W. Megary to Samuel Calvin, June 10, 1850, S. Coryell to Calvin, June 28, 1850, James T. Hale to Calvin, July 10, 22, 1850, and Thomas McNamara to Calvin, July 22, 1850, Calvin MSS.
- 69. Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 87–91; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 172–74; see also the letters to Samuel Calvin cited in the previous note. Daniel Webster blamed the refusal of southern Whigs to consider tariff revision during the 1850 session on their anger at the fanatical attacks northern Whig congressmen had made on slavery and the South during the compromise debates. See Webster to Edward Everett, September 26, 1850, Webster to Franklin Haven, September 27, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 70. Holt, Forging a Majority, p. 86; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 174–75; S. Coryell to Samuel Calvin, June 28, 1850, Thomas McNamara to Calvin, July 22, 1850, Calvin MSS; William Neal to William H. Seward, September 1, 1850, Seward MSS (RU). For the ferocious opposition of Whig papers affiliated with Johnston to Cooper, see James Cooper to Millard Fillmore, March 13, 1851, MFP-BHS. This long, bitter letter provides a remarkable review of the strife between Johnston and Cooper since 1848.
- 71. Holt, Forging a Majority, p. 85; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 170–71. Five of the eight Democrats compiled perfect pro-Compromise scores of 16, and the other three had scores of 15. The average index of partsian disagreement in the state house of representatives on Democrats' attempt to repeal the 1847 antikidnapping law was at least 35 points higher than the disagreement index in any other issue area in 1850. Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 115–16.
- 72. In late October, Cooper wrote Webster that most Pennsylvanians applauded the settlement of the sectional crisis and that a "sound national feeling . . . begins to prevail throughout this State." Cooper, of course, is a biased source. Cooper to Webster, October 21, 1850, Webster MSS.
 - 73. Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 86-87; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 175.
 - 74. Cooper to Fillmore, March 13, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 75. Holt, Forging a Majority, p. 87; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 175. I infer Ogle's acquiescence in the Compromise from a letter Webster wrote Fillmore in June 1851, after Ogle had been defeated for reelection, describing him as the most able man in the Pennsylvania delegation during the Thirty-First Congress and saying that Speaker Howell Cobb believed the same thing. During 1851, indeed, Ogle became a leader of the anti-Johnston Whigs in the state. See Webster to Fillmore, June 6, 1851, MFP-BHS; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 179.
- 76. Turnout in 1850 was 55.3 percent, in contrast to 70.6 percent in the October elections of 1848 and 57.4 percent in 1849, when only candidates for canal commissioner and the legislature ran. The mean turnout rate for the period 1840–60 was 65.4 percent, so the 1850 participation rate dipped ten points below that average. See Gienapp, "'Politics Seem to Enter Into Everything," "pp. 18–19, 22.
- 77. Not counting Stevens, the average rate of decline in the Whig vote for the six other incumbent candidates was 16.5 percent. Excluding Fuller, who drew more votes than Butler had in 1848, the average rate of decline in the six districts where new candidates replaced Whig incumbents was 20.4 percent.
- 78. On Pittsburgh, see Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 84–113, and Tables 16 and 23, pp. 327, 335. In January 1850 an anti-Catholic demagogue named Joe Barker, who pledged to resist enforcement of local antiliquor laws, won Pittsburgh's mayoral election over both Whig and Democratic candidates by running strongly in working-class wards. In October both Native American and Protestant party congressional candidates competed against the Whigs and Democrats.
 - 79. Alexander K. McClure to John Penn Jones, July 26, 1850, Samuel Calvin MSS.
- 80. J. W. Megary to Calvin, June 10, 1850, Samuel Royer to Calvin, July 20, 1850, James T. Hale to Calvin, July 22, 1850, Thomas McNamara to Calvin, July 22, 1850, John Penn Jones to Calvin, July 24, 1850, Samuel S. Blair to Calvin, July 25, 1850, Alexander K. McClure to Calvin, July 26, 1850, John Armitage to Calvin, August 7, 1850, and David McClure to Calvin, August 7, 1850, Calvin MSS.

- 81. Alexander K. McClure to Calvin, July 26, 1850; Andrew G. Curtin to Calvin, August 12, 1850, Joseph A. Kemp to Calvin, August 20, 1850, Calvin MSS.
- 82. S. Coryell to Calvin, June 28, 1850, James T. Hale to Calvin, July 22, 1850, Joseph A. Kemp to Calvin, August 20, 1850, John Penn Jones to Calvin, September 12, 1850, Calvin MSS.
- 83. William N. Everly to Millard Fillmore, October 19, 1850, MFP-BHS; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 176. Levin's vote fell from 4,897 in 1848 to 4,164 in 1850, while that of his Democratic opponent increased from 4,228 to 5,352. The separate Whig candidate in 1850 attracted 609 votes.
- 84. John H. Bryant to Millard Fillmore, November 11, 1850, James Cooper to Fillmore, March 13, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 85. For Johnston's actions and speeches with regard to fugitive slaves and the southern complaints in 1849 and 1850, see Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 168–74, 181–88; and Slaughter, Bloody Dawn, p. 98.
- 86. On Free Soil opposition to fusion, see Donald, Sumner, pp. 185–89; for the opposition of conservative, pro-Compromise Democrats, see Benjamin Barstow to Caleb Cushing, November 5, 1850, Cushing MSS. Cushing led the Democrats opposed to the alliance with Free Soilers. Charles Allen of Worcester was the Free Soiler elected to Congress in 1848; the fourth district went unrepresented during the entire Thirty-First Congress despite twelve runoff elections because ex-Whig Free Soiler John Gorham Palfrey ran so closely to Whig Benjamin Thompson in the three-way races.
- 87. Whigs explicitly warned voters of this bargain in the address issued by their state convention. Boston Daily Advertiser, October 3, 1850. On the representation system, see Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," 116–37.
- 88. Charles Hudson to John Davis, September 11, 1850, J. Dexter to Davis, September 17, 1850, John Davis MSS.
- 89. Ibid.; Philip Greely, Jr., to Thurlow Weed, September 4, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); Webster to Peter Harvey, October 2, 1850, Webster to Fillmore, October 14, 24, 1850, Webster MSS; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 214–19.
- 90. Webster to Edward Everett, September 26, 1850, Webster to Peter Harvey, October 2, 1850, Webster MSS. I infer what Webster meant by "nationalize" from his letter to Harvey.
 - 91. Everett to Webster, October 5, 1850, Webster MSS.
 - 92. The platform and address are printed in the Boston Daily Advertiser, October 2, 3, 1850.
- 93. See the resolutions of the Eighth District convention, Boston Daily Advertiser, October 31, 1850.
 - 94. Boston Daily Advertiser, October 30, 31, November 5, 1850.
- 95. Webster to Everett, October 8, 1850, Webster to Fillmore, October 24, 1850, Webster to Harvey, August 11, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 96. Amos A. Lawrence to William Appleton, October 25, 1850, Amos Lawrence MSS; Samuel Lawrence to Millard Fillmore, October 26, 1850, Webster to Fillmore, October 24, 1850, MFP-BHS; Boston Daily Advertiser, October 28, 1850; Charles Upham to Henry L. Dawes, September 14, 1850 (quotation), Dawes MSS; Boston Daily Advertiser, August 19, 1850. Daniel King, the Whig elected to Congress from the second district in 1848, died in late July 1850, necessitating the special election. The other August election occurred in the fourth district, where Palfrey's Free Soil candidacy produced continued stalemates.
- 97. Boston Daily Advertiser, October 23, 1850; Humphrey Gould to Henry L. Dawes, November 5, 1850, Dawes MSS; Webster to Fillmore, October 14, 24, 1850, Webster MSS.
 - 98. Winthrop to John Pendleton Kennedy, October 18, 1850, Kennedy MSS.
- 99. Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," 121. The change in the gubernatorial vote between 1848 and 1850 was as follows:

	Whigs	Democrats	Free Soilers
1848	61,640 (49.7%)	25,323 (20.4%)	36,011 (29%)
1849	54,009 (49.3%)	30,040 (27.4%)	25,247 (23.1%)
1850	56,778 (46.8%)	36,023 (29.7%)	27,636 (22.8%)

- 100. Edward Everett to Daniel Webster, May 27, 1851, Webster MSS; John Z. Goodrich to Henry L. Dawes, May 31, 1851, Dawes MSS.
- 101. Charles Upham to Henry L. Dawes, November 20, 1850, Dawes MSS; Webster to Fillmore, November 13, 15, 1850, MFP-BHS; Webster to Corwin, November 13, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC); Boston Daily Advertiser, November 16, 1850.
- 102. B. F. Hall to Fillmore, September 28, 1850, MFP-BHS. Because the bolt took place on the afternoon of September 27, I have assumed that a telegraph operator in Syracuse or Washington misdated the telegram. The bolters did remain in Syracuse overnight and met on the morning of September 28, but many had returned home by that afternoon. This fact and the breathless urgency of the telegram suggest that it was sent on the 27th.
- 103. Hamilton Fish to Fillmore, July 22, 1850, copy, Fish MSS; Washington Hunt to Fillmore, July 22, 25, 1850, MFP-BHS.
 - 104. Alex Mann to Fillmore, July 12, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 105. Hamilton Fish to Millard Fillmore, July 22, 1850, copy, Fish MSS; Washington Hunt to Fillmore, July 22, 1850, Alex Mann to Fillmore, July 12, 1850, D. O. Kellogg to Fillmore, August 5, 1850, Barnard to Fillmore, September 17, 1850, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, September 15, 1850, MFP-BHS; Samuel P. Lyman to Weed, September 23, 1850, Weed MSS (RU). For more on Barnard's relations with Weed, see Penny, "Barnard versus Weed."
- 106. C. B. Stuart to Fillmore, September 7, 1850, John Lorimer Graham to Fillmore, September 9, 1850, Hunt to Fillmore, September 18, 1850, MFP-BHS.
 - 107. Fillmore to Daniel Ullmann, September 22, 1850, Ullmann MSS.
- 108. Lyman to Weed, September 23, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); Fillmore to Ullmann, September 22, 1850, Ullmann MSS.
- 109. Barnard to Fillmore, September 17, 1850, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, September 20, 1850, Hiram Ketchum to Fillmore, September 30, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 110. Alexander B. Williams to Weed, September 19, 1850, John C. Underwood to Weed, September 20, 1850 (quotation), Simeon Draper to Weed, October 2, 1850, Edward Dodd to Weed, October 7, 1850, Weed MSS (RU).
- 111. Washington Hunt to Millard Fillmore, September 18, 1850, MFP-BHS; Minos McGowen to Weed, October 7, 1850, Edward Dodd to Weed, October 7, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); John S. Bowron to Seward, October 5, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 112. C. B. Stuart to Fillmore, September 7, 23, 1850, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, September 14, 1850, Alex Mann to Fillmore, September 16, 1850, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, September 20, 1850, John Young to Fillmore, September 29, 1850, James R. Thompson to Fillmore, October 2, 1850, James Brooks to Fillmore, October 3, 1850, Joseph Hartwell to Fillmore, October 27, 1850, J. Phillips Phoenix to Fillmore, November 6, 1850, Charles Shepard to Robert Rose, October 8, 1850, MFP-BHS; David Abell to Thurlow Weed, August 5, 1850, Orasmus B. Matteson to Weed, September 13, 1850, Samuel P. Lyman to Weed, December 1, 2, 5, 7, 8, 20, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); Seth Hawley to William Henry Seward, September 21, 1850, Simeon Draper to Seward, September 17, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 113. Daniel Ullmann to Fillmore, September 21, 1850, MFP-BHS; Seward to Weed, 1850, in Seward at Washington, p. 156.
- 114. Ullmann to Fillmore, September 21, 1850, MFP-BHS; Fillmore to Ullmann, September 22, 1850, Ullmann MSS; Albany Evening Journal, October 2, 16, 1850; Rayback, "Silver Grey Revolt," 160.
- 115. Daniel D. Barnard to Fillmore, September 17, 1850 (quotation), John Young to Fillmore, September 29, 1850, Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, October 1, 1850, MFP-BHS; Van Deusen, Greeley, pp. 140–41.

- 116. The following account of the convention, which is extensive because of its importance, is based on the following sources: Albany Evening Journal, September 27, 28, 1850; Boston Daily Advertiser, October 1, 2, 1850; John Young to Fillmore, September 29, 1850, Hiram Ketcham to Fillmore, September 30, 1850, MFP-BHS.
 - 117. A candidate for prison inspector was also chosen.
- 118. Boston Daily Advertiser, October 2, 1850; John Young to Fillmore, September 29, 1850, Hiram Ketcham to Fillmore, September 30, 1850, MFP-BHS.
 - 119. Albany Evening Journal, September 28, October 1, 2, 17, 1850.
- 120. John Young to Fillmore, September 29, 1850, MFP-BHS; Simeon Draper to Thurlow Weed, October 2, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); Albany Evening Journal, September 28, 1850.
- 121. Young to Fillmore, September 29, 1850, Haven to Fillmore, September 29, 1850, Cornell to Fillmore, October 7, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 122. Fillmore to Daniel Ullmann, October 3, 1850, Ullmann MSS; Nathan Hall to Fillmore, October 1, 1850, Hugh Maxwell to Fillmore, September 28, 1850, John Young to Fillmore, September 29, October 2, 1850, C. B. Stuart to Fillmore, October 3, 1850, Daniel Ullmann to Fillmore, October 5, 1850, J. R. Mower to Fillmore, October 6, 1850, MFP-BHS.
 - 123. Haven to Fillmore, October 6, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 124. Fillmore to Francis Granger, October 9, 1850, Fillmore MSS (Ontario County Historical Society, in microfilm edition); D. O. Kellogg to Fillmore, October 8, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 125. Daniel Ullmann to Fillmore, October 11, 1850, John Young to Fillmore, October 12, 1850, Hugh Maxwell to Fillmore, October 12, 1850, Daniel D. Barnard to Fillmore, October 14, 1850, Francis Granger to Fillmore, October 19, 1850, MFP-BHS; Robert G. Campbell to Fillmore, October 17, 1850, MFP-O.
- 126. Albany Evening Journal, October 16, 1850. Upon the advice of Granger, Hiram Ketcham, James Brooks, and other Silver Grays, who apparently wanted to deny Weed any more ammunition about federal officeholders orchestrating New York conventions, Campbell did not go to Utica. Instead he contented himself with coordinating Silver Gray forces in Albany and New York City. Robert G. Campbell to Fillmore, October 17, 1850, MFP-O.
- 127. Albany Evening Journal, October 17, 1850; Francis Granger to Fillmore, October 19, 1850, Charles A. Davis to Fillmore, October 19, 1850, MFP-BHS; Hugh White to Thomas Corwin, October 21, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC); B. Thompson to Hamilton Fish, October 21, 1850, Fish MSS.
- 128. D. G. Garnsey to Fillmore, October 28, 1850, Alex Mann to Fillmore, November 6, 1850, William Frary to Fillmore, November 6, 1850, Fish to Fillmore, November 18, 1850, MFP-BHS; Moses H. Grinnell to Thomas Corwin, October 30, 1850, Corwin MSS; Hamilton Fish to Alvah Hunt, November 4, 1850, Knollenberg Collection; Henry Montgomery to William H. Seward, October 6, 1850, Hamilton Fish to Seward, October 24, 1850, Seth Hawley to Seward, November 8, 1850, Orsamus B. Matteson to Seward, November 8, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 129. George J. Cornell to Fillmore, October 7, 1850, MFP-BHS; Cornell to Hamilton Fish, October 23, 1850, Fish MSS; Fish to Alvah Hunt, November 4, 1850, Knollenberg Collection.
- 130. Foner, Business & Slavery, pp. 34–54; Dalzell, Webster, p. 219; Washington Hunt to Alvah Hunt, October 31, 1850, Knollenberg Collection; Hamilton Fish to Seward, October 24, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); James P. Thomas to Hamilton Fish, October 23, 1850, George J. Cornell to Fish, October 28, 1850, A. W. Bradford to Fish, November 9, 1850, Fish MSS; Moses H. Grinnell to Thomas Corwin, October 30, 1850, Simeon Draper to Corwin, November 4, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC).
- 131. Foner, Business & Slavery, pp. 48–50; Fish to Alvah Hunt, November 4, 1850, Knollenberg Collection.
- 132. Foner, Business & Slavery, p. 50; Gienapp, "'Politics Seem to Enter into Everything," p. 18; New York Tribune, November 7, 19, 1850; Alvah Hunt to Hamilton Fish, November 6, 1850, George Cornell to Fish, November 9, 1850, Fish MSS; Alvah Hunt to Thurlow Weed, November 9, 1850, Starr Clark to Weed, November 13, 1850, Lyman Spalding to Weed, November 18, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); D. O. Kellogg to Millard Fillmore, November 16, 1850, Fish to Fillmore, November 18, 1850, MFP-BHS; Lyman Spalding to William H. Seward, November 18, 1850, Seward MSS (RU). The parties' vote for governor in 1848 and 1850 was as follows:

	Whig	Democratic	Free Soil
1848	218,280 (47.9%)	114,457 (25.1%)	123,360 (27.1%)
1850	214,614 (49.6%)	214,352 (49.6%)

133. Charles Shepard to Robert Rose, October 8, 1850, C. B. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, October 21, 1850, D. L. Garnsey to Fillmore, October 28, 1850, MFP-BHS; Hugh White to Thomas Corwin, October 21, 1850, Corwin MSS; Starr Clark to Thurlow Weed, November 13, 1850, Weed MSS (RU).

134. Joseph Hartwell to Fillmore, October 27, 1850, J. Phillips Phoenix to Fillmore, November 6, 1850, MFP-BHS; Moses H. Grinnell to Thomas Corwin, October 30, 1850, Simeon Draper to Corwin, November 4, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC); James Bowen to William H. Seward, November 12, 1850, Seward MSS (RU). Phoenix had won with 5,601 votes, 55 percent of the total, in 1848; Bowen and Rodman together mustered only 3,919 votes, (51.6 percent of the total) in 1850. The disparity suggests either that Phoenix did buy a lot of illegal votes in 1848 or that disgusted conservatives who refused to support either Bowen or Rodman sat out the election.

135. Henry Montgomery to William H. Seward, October 6, 1850, Matteson to Seward, November 8, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); William Frary to Fillmore, November 6, 1850, MFP-BHS.

136. One example of an anti-Compromise Whig who replaced an anti-Compromise Whig incumbent and who was then abandoned by Silver Grays was Russell Sage, a close friend of Weed, who lost in the Troy district north of Albany. His predecessor had won with 6,055 votes (53 percent); Sage lost with 5,594 votes (49 percent). Another example was the successor to the eighth district's Ransom Halloway, who lost in 1850 with 5,942 votes (48.9 percent) compared to Halloway's 6,301 votes (51.2 percent) in 1848. Anti-Compromise incumbents John L. Schoolcraft and Henry Alexander also lost a few votes; Schoolcraft won because Whigs had a normal majority in his district, while Alexander, who had won with 47.2 percent in 1848, lost despite increasing his proportion slightly. On the Silver Grays' knifing of Sage and Schoolcraft, see Alvah Hunt to Thurlow Weed, November 9, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); D. O. Kellogg to Millard Fillmore, November 16, 1850, MFP-BHS; Orsamus B. Matteson to Seward, November 8, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).

137. Spaulding had carried the district with 56.9 percent of the votes; Haven won 55.2 percent. On Sewardite abandonment of and Hunker support for Haven, see Seth Hawley to William H. Seward, November 8, 1850, Seward MSS (RU). Whereas the four renominated pro-Compromise incumbents suffered an aggregate decline of 11.9 percent between 1848 and 1850, the seven anti-Compromise incumbents who ran in 1850 enjoyed an aggregate gain of 8.7 percent.

- 138. Starr Clark to Thurlow Weed, November 13, 1850, Weed MSS (RU).
- 139. Washington Hunt to Millard Fillmore, November 16, 1850, MFP-BHS; Fillmore to Hamilton Fish, November 21, 1850, Fish MSS.
- 140. D. E. Sills to Weed, November 15, 1850, Weed MSS; William Frary to Fillmore, November 6, 1850, James Brooks to Fillmore, November 16, 1850, MFP-BHS; Weed to Thomas Corwin, November 12, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC); Henry B. Northrop to William H. Seward, November 27, 1850, William Wasson to Seward, December 5, 1850, Seward MSS (RU). Silver Grays' conviction that antislavery Whigs were problack is the source of their contemptuous epithet for Sewardites, "Woolly Heads" or "Woollies," in reference to blacks' curly hair.
- 141. Hamilton Fish to Fillmore, November 18, 1850, Daniel Ullmann to Fillmore, October 5, 1850, Joseph B. Varnum to Fillmore, November 22, 1850, MFP-BHS; A. W. Bradford to Hamilton Fish, November 9, 1850, Fish MSS; Weed to Corwin, November 17, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC).
- 142. Seth Hawley to Seward, November 8, 1850, James Bowen to Seward, November 12, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); Alvah Hunt to Weed, November 9, 1850, Charles Stetson to Weed, November 10, 1850, Starr Clark to Weed, November 13, 1850 (quotation), Lyman Spalding to Weed, November 18, 1850, Weed MSS (RU).
 - 143. These summary figures include the seven seats in South Carolina, which I have excluded from my analysis throughout this study. Surprisingly, a Whig candidate won one of those seats in 1850. The total number of seats for 1850 is lower than that for 1848 because Georgia, like Arkansas, rescheduled its congressional elections to odd-numbered years.

- 144. Benjamin Wade to Caroline Wade, November 5, 1850, Wade MSS; Seth Hawley to Seward, September 21, 1850, Seward MSS (RU).
- 145. Samuel Dinsmore to William H. Seward, September 30, 1850, John Bowron to Seward, November 18, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); New York Tribune, November 18, 1850.

CHAPTER 17

- 1. Washington Hunt to Millard Fillmore, November 16, 1850, Hamilton Fish to Fillmore, November 18, 1850, MFP-BHS; Millard Fillmore to Hamilton Fish, November 21, 1850, Fish MSS; Fillmore to Daniel Webster, October 17, 1850, Millard Fillmore MSS (Ind.HSL, in microfilm edition of Fillmore Papers); Fillmore to Webster, October 23, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 2. Fillmore to Hamilton Fish, November 21, 1850, Fish MSS; Fillmore to Webster, October 23, 1850, Webster MSS.
 - 3. Fillmore to Webster, October 28, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 4. Webster to Fillmore, October 14, 1850, Webster MSS; John Pendleton Kennedy to Richard Pakenham, October 13, 1850, letterbook copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 5. Webster to Peter Harvey, October 2, 1850, Webster MSS; Kennedy to Richard Pakenham, October 13, 1850, Kennedy MSS.
- 6. The reference here is to David Donald's famous essay "Abraham Lincoln: Whig in the White House," in his Lincoln Reconsidered, pp. 187–208.
- 7. Webster to Members of the Cabinet, November 13, 1850, draft, Webster MSS; N. K. Hall to Fillmore, January 1851, James D. Merrill to Jerome Fuller, January 31, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 8. Millard Fillmore to Washington Hunt, February 23, 1851, copy with Henry E. Davies to Fillmore, March 17, 1851, MFP-BHS. Secretary of the Treasury Corwin told Cincinnati Whig editor Thomas Stevenson in mid-October 1850 that he personally had made only twelve removals since taking office and that the cabinet had not yet agreed upon any concerted policy with regard to removals. Corwin to Thomas B. Stevenson, October 14, 15, 1850, Stevenson MSS.
- 9. Daniel Webster to Fillmore, October 3, 1850, William Hunter to Webster, October 4, 15, 1850, Webster to Edward Everett, October 20, December 21, 1850, Fillmore to Webster, December 20, 1850, Webster MSS; Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, p. 41. For background on this affair, see Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 327–29, and Dalzell, Webster, pp. 225–27.
- 10. The preceding two paragraphs are based on Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 327–29, and Dalzell, Webster, pp. 225–26.
 - 11. Barnwell, Love of Order, pp. 105-09.
- 12. Shryock, Georgia and the Union, p. 296; May, Quitman, p. 244; Barnwell, Love of Order, pp. 123-24.
 - 13. Webster to Fillmore, October 25, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 14. Alexander H. H. Stuart to Fillmore, November 4, 1850, Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, November 11, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 15. These two paragraphs are based on May, Quitman, pp. 236–52; for later efforts of the administration to enforce the neutrality laws against López and other filibusterers, see Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 321–24. For more on López, see Chaffin, Fatal Glory.
 - 16. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 111-12.
- 17. Webster to Fillmore, October 29, 1850 (quotation), Fillmore to Webster, October 23, 1850, Webster MSS; Fillmore to Webster, October 17, 1850, Fillmore MSS (Ind.HSL). The standard account of the operation of the Fugitive Slave Act is Campbell, Slave Catchers.
 - 18. Slaughter, Bloody Dawn, pp. 43-58 and passim; Nevins, Ordeal: Fruits, pp. 380-89.
- 19. Campbell, Slave Catchers, pp. 114–16, 199; Webster to Fillmore, November 5, 15, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 20. Campbell, Slave Catchers, p. 115; Fillmore to Webster, October 23, 28, 1850, Webster MSS; Webster to Fillmore, October 29, November 5, 1850, MFP-BHS; Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, p. 103. The two Democratic judges were George Kane and Robert Grier.

Fillmore waited for two months after ordering the use of federal troops before he solicited an opinion from Supreme Court Justice John McLean to ascertain if such action was constitutional. Fillmore to John McLean, January 6, 1851, McLean MSS (LC).

- 21. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 78-80.
- 22. Campbell, Slave Catchers, pp. 116, 148–57; the Christiana riot is described in vivid detail in Slaughter, Bloody Dawn.
 - 23. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 101-06, 109-10.
- 24. Webster to Fillmore, November 15, 1850, MFP-BHS. The administration would face the same embarrassing situation after the Christiana riot in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, for the United States attorney for eastern Pennsylvania who had to prosecute the government's case was John Ashmead, a crony of Governor William F. Johnston, who ardently opposed the Fugitive Slave Act. I shall discuss the Christiana riot later in the context of the 1851 Pennsylvania election.
- 25. George Lunt to Webster, March 31, 1851, Webster to Fillmore, April 4, 13, 1851, Webster to Lunt, April 4, 1851, Webster MSS; Webster to Fillmore, April 5, 1851, Henry Sargent to Fillmore, April 5, 1851, MFP-BHS; Campbell, Slave Catchers, pp. 150–51.
- 26. Campbell, Slave Catchers, pp. 117–20; Webster to Fillmore, April 13, 1851, Webster MSS.
- 27. John P. Kennedy to Alexander H. H. Stuart, April 17, 1851, letterbook copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 28. J. S. Skinner to Fillmore, July 12, 1850, MFP-BHS; Charles A. Davis to Webster, August 9, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 29. Daniel Ullmann to Fillmore, October 5, 1850, MFP-BHS; John P. Kennedy to J. D. Whelply, October 12, 1850, Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, October 31, 1850, Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, November 10, 1850, Kennedy to John C. Pendleton, November 12, 1850, letterbook copies, Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, November 12, 1850, Kennedy MSS; T. L. Walters to Daniel M. Barringer, October 7, 1850, Barringer MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, December 31, 1850, Everett MSS; E. M. Wright to Henry L. Dawes, November 27, 1850, Dawes MSS; Josiah Randall to Daniel Webster, November 11, 1850, Webster MSS; Boston Daily Advertiser, November 26, 1850; Dalzell, Webster, p. 219.
- 30. Cassius M. Clay to William H. Seward, October 24, 1850, Seward MSS (RU); draft of Clay's speech to the Kentucky legislature, November 15, 1850, Henry Clay MSS (LC). By Henry Clay's "Executor," Cassius Clay may have meant Fillmore.
- 31. M. C. Fulton to Howell Cobb, November 6, 1850, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 217–18.
 - 32. Alexander Stephens to John J. Crittenden, October 24, 1850, draft, Stephens MSS (Duke).
- 33. Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 275–345; William Law to John M. Berrien, September 11, 1850, James M. Smythe to Berrien, September 12, 1850, Charles Jenkins to Berrien, September 14, 1850, Benjamin Good Stiles to Berrien, September 20, 1850, Berrien MSS; Stephens to Crittenden, October 24, 1850, Stephens MSS (Duke).
- 34. James Meriweather to Howell Cobb, August 24, 1850, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 210–12; Stephens to Crittenden, October 24, 1850, Stephens MSS (Duke); S. T. Chapman to Alexander H. Stephens, August 31, 1850, Stephens MSS (LC); Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 319–36. Shryock's estimate that almost half of the Democrats voted the Union ticket seems plausible. In the 1849 gubernatorial election, Democrats had outpolled Whigs 46,643 to 43,349, while the vote in 1850 stood 46,616 to 24,499. Without statistical analysis, the partisan distribution of the 19,000 1849 voters who stayed home in 1850 is impossible to determine. Nonetheless, the differential between the 1849 Democratic and 1850 Southern Rights votes suggests that those Democrats who voted in 1850 split their vote evenly between the two camps. According to maps in Shryock, pp. 109, 320, moreover, of forty-two counties carried by Democrats in 1848, only eight elected Southern Rights delegates and five others sent divided delegations; twenty-nine sent Union delegates. Conversely, only two of the fifty-one counties Taylor had carried sent Southern Rights delegates, while forty-six sent solid Union delegations.
- 35. Shryock, Georgia and the Union, p. 218; James A. Meriweather to Howell Cobb, August 24, 1850, M. C. Fulton to Cobb, November 6, 1850, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 210–12, 217–18; C. B. Strong to John M. Berrien, July 15, 1850, Charles Jenkins to Berrien, February 5, 1851, Berrien MSS; Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 118–19.

- 36. Cooper, Politics of Slavery; Freehling, Road to Disunion.
- 37. C. B. Strong to John M. Berrien, July 15, 1850, Volney Howard to Berrien, July 18, 1850, Iverson Harris to Berrien, August 2, 1850, Berrien MSS; Shryock, Georgia and the Union, p. 345; Schott, Stephens, pp. 107–08, 118–19.
 - 38. For Democratic gains in the rice belt see Hoisington, "From Whig to Union."
- 39. Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 235–36; Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 145–46; Hoisington, in the M. A. thesis cited above, has discovered that Shryock and Murray err in asserting that the senate redistricting bill was defeated.
- 40. Savannah Republican, November 13, 1849, quoted in Shryock, Georgia and the Union, p. 221; for the legislative roll calls, see ibid., pp. 218–36. The eighth resolution listing California's admission and other grounds for calling a state convention passed 92–28, as did the bill requiring it. Twelve of sixty-three Whigs and sixteen of sixty-six Democrats composed the minority.
- 41. For the Democratic divisions, see Shryock, Georgia and the Union, and Montgomery, Cracker Parties.
- 42. C. F. McCoy to Samuel Calvin, July 11, August 13, 1850, Calvin MSS; C. B. Strong to John M. Berrien, July 15, 1850, Volney Howard to Berrien, July 18, 1850, Iverson Harris to Berrien, August 2, 1850, William Law to Berrien, September 11, 1850, James M. Smythe to Berrien, September 12, 1850, Berrien MSS.
- 43. In addition to the letters to Berrien cited in the previous note, see Benjamin Good Stiles to Berrien, September 20, 1850, and Alfred Iverson to Berrien, October 23, 1850, Berrien MSS. For the newspaper opposition to Stephens and Toombs as compromisers, see Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 247, 312–13; Schott, Stephens, p. 121.
- 44. William Law to Berrien, September 11, 1850, Charles Jenkins to Berrien, September 14, 1850, February 5, 1851, Berrien MSS.
- 45. Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 268–69, 315–17; Berrien's correspondence is filled with invitations to speak at Southern Rights rallies, which he did.
- 46. Shryock, Georgia and the Union, p. 317; William Law to Berrien, November 3, 1850, Berrien MSS.
- 47. Schott, Stephens, pp. 108–26; Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 247, 266; S. T. Chapman to Alexander H. Stephens, August 31, 1850, Stephens MSS (LC); Toombs' House speech in September is quoted in Leibiger, "Georgia and the Compromise of 1850," p. 28.
- 48. Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 334–45; Charles Jenkins to John M. Berrien, February 5, 1851, Francis S. Bartow to Berrien, February 28, 1851, Iverson L. Harris to Berrien, March 12, 1851, C. Doughtery to Berrien, March 31, 1851, Berrien MSS.
- 49. Francis S. Bartow to John M. Berrien, December 16, 1850, Charles Jenkins to Berrien, December 19, 1850, Berien MSS; my summary of, and quotations from, the Georgia platform are based on Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 330–32.
- 50. Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 330–32; Francis S. Bartow to Berrien, December 16, 1850, Charles Jenkins to Berrien, December 19, 1850, February 5, March 21, 1851, Iverson L. Harris to Berrien, March 12, 1851, C. Dougherty to Berrien, March 31, 1851, Berrien MSS.
 - 51. C. Dougherty to Berrien, March 31, 1851, Berrien MSS.
- 52. Cobb defeated McDonald by a margin of 57,414 to 38,824. In contrast, Towns had defeated his Whig rival in 1849, 46,643 to 43,349, while Unionists won in 1850, 46,616 to 24,499. These figures suggest that the 19,000 1849 voters, who abstained in 1850 returned to the polls in 1851 along with 6,000 new voters and that these 25,000 divided 11,000 for Cobb and 14,000 for McDonald. One of my former undergraduate students ran an ecological regression analysis to estimate voter movement between 1849 and 1851. Because he did not weight his county voting data by population, I do not have total faith in his results, but they are plausible. They suggest that of 1849 Whig voters, 82 percent voted for Cobb, 12 percent supported McDonald, and 6 percent abstained. Approximately one-third of 1849 Democrats supported Cobb, while two-thirds went for McDonald; those who abstained in 1849 but voted in 1851 divided evenly between the Union and Southern Rights parties. Bobo, "Revelry, Reorganization, and Ruin," p. 19.
 - 53. Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 354-58; Schott, Stephens, p. 139; Charles J. Jenkins to John M. Berrien, July 23, 1851, C. Doughtery to Berrien, August 24, 1851, Iverson L. Harris to Berrien, September 28, 1851, Francis S. Bartow to Berrien, November 5, 1851, Berrien MSS.

- 54. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 148-49, 169-71, 186.
- 55. Miller, "A New Perspective," pp. 86–90; Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 185–87; May, Quitman, pp. 247–48.
- 56. P. B. Barringer to Daniel M. Barringer, November 18, 1850 (quotation), Barringer MSS; A. Hutchinson to Charles D. Fontaine, April 5, 1851, Fontaine MSS; the books by Cole and May, as well as the thesis by Miller cited above, all document this pattern.
- 57. Even ardent supporters of Quitman recognized that his reputation as an immediate secessionist would doom the Southern Rights cause. See George T. Swann to John A. Quitman, July 18, 1851, and Frederick W. Quackenboss to Quitman, July 23, 1851, Claiborne MSS.
- 58. Miller, "A New Perspective," p. 227, n. 21; May, Quitman, pp. 248, 254–64. The resolution adopted by the Mississippi convention is quoted on p. 264. In 1849, Quitman defeated his Whig rival, 33,117 to 22,996; in 1850, Foote nosed out Davis, 27,836 to 26,301. These figures suggest that about 5,000 Democrats supported Union delegates in the convention election, while about 6,500 abstained in September. Some 5,000 of those abstainers returned to support Davis in November, but Foote held almost all of the 28,277 votes Union convention delegates had attracted.
- 59. Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 180–96, 468–69. In December 1849 Clemens was elected with sixty-seven votes in the legislature, fifty of which came from Whigs, over the choice of the Democratic caucus.
 - 60. Ibid., pp. 182-202.
 - 61. Henry W. Hilliard to Nathaniel Niles, August 13, 1851, Niles MSS.
- 62. Stephens to Crittenden, October 24, 1850, Stephens MSS (Duke); Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 313–15.
 - 63. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, p. 93.
- 64. Fillmore to Washington Hunt, February 23, 1851, with Henry E. Davies to Fillmore, March 17, 1851, MFP-BHS; Seward to Thurlow Weed, December 4, 1850, Weed MSS (RU).
- 65. George Frazier to Millard Fillmore, December 16, 1850, MFP-BHS; Adams, Whig Party of Louisiana, pp. 206–07; John P. Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, Decmeber 9, 10, 1850, Kennedy MSS; Charles Ready to John Bell, January 3, 1851, Thomas A. R. Nelson to Bell, January 10, 1851, John Bell MSS.
- 66. Joshua R. Giddings to Edward Wade, December 28, 1850, Giddings-Julian MSS; Giddings to Milton R. Sutliffe, December 30, 1850, Sutliffe MSS.
- 67. Hiram Ketcham to Fillmore, December 13, 1850, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, December 15, 1850, January 4, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 68. Fish to Fillmore, November 18, 1850, MFP-BHS; Hamilton Fish to Alvah Hunt, November 4, 1850, Knollenberg Collection; A. W. Bradford to Hamilton Fish, November 9, 1850, Fish MSS; Moses Grinnell to Thomas Corwin, October 30, 1850, Thurlow Weed to Corwin, November 17, 1850, Simeon Draper to Corwin, November 26, 1850, Samuel Lyman to Corwin, December 7, 1850, Corwin MSS (LC); Moses Grinnell to John J. Crittenden, November 18, 1850, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 69. Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, December 15, 1850, January 4, 1851, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, January 1, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 70. Washington Hunt to Fillmore, November 16, 1850, Hamilton Fish to Fillmore, November 18, 1850, MFP-BHS. All quotations in the following four paragraphs are from these two letters, unless noted otherwise.
 - 71. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 83-91.
- 72. Samuel P. Lyman to Simeon Draper, January 20, 1850, Weed MSS (RU). A draft note in John M. Berrien's papers declining to sign the Round Robin is labeled, "Answer to Mr. Stephens." From this fact as well as the fact that Stephens was always listed by contemporaries as one of the people circulating the pledge, I have concluded that Stephens wrote the Round Robin. See, for example, E. G. Spaulding to Weed, January 20, 1851, Weed MSS (RU).

A copy of the Round Robin was printed at the bottom of the second page of the Democratic Washington Union on January 22, 1851. Editor Thomas Ritchie did not endorse it, but instead said he printed it to satisfy the curiosity of his readers. A list of those who signed the Round Robin, taken from the New York Express, can be found in the Union, January 30, 1851.

- 73. John Bell to William B. Campbell, January 25, 1851, CFP; Charles Ready to John Bell, January 3, 1851, Thomas A. R. Nelson to Bell, January 10, 1851, John Bell MSS; "Answer to Mr. Stephens," January 24, 1851, draft, Berrien MSS.
- 74. Eliot made his opposition to a Union party clear later. See Eliot to John O. Sargent, November 10, 1851, Sargent MSS.
- 75. Calling Underwood pro-Compromise may be questionable, for he had often voted against Clay's position on roll calls during the session and opposed the final Texas boundary bill. Yet he voted for all the other Compromise measures, including the pronorthern California and District slave trade bills. Similarly, while Delaware's Whigs opposed compromise as long as Taylor was alive, all three voted for the final measures. The absence of Berrien, who declined Stephens' request to sign, and of the anti-Compromise Whigs Senator Jackson Morton of Florida and Representative Thomas Clingman of North Carolina is more understandable.
- 76. Bullard had been elected to fill Charles Conrad's seat when Conrad became Secretary of War.
 - 77. Johannsen, Douglas, p. 340.
- 78. Charles Ready to John Bell, January 3, 1851, Thomas A. R. Nelson to Bell, January 10, 1851, John Bell MSS; Henry Barns to Fillmore, February 10, 1850, MFP-BHS; C. Prentiss to Thomas Ewing, February 8, 1851, R. P. S. Baker to Ewing, February 10, 1851, EFP.
 - 79. Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, January 4, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 80. Democratic Representative Thomas Bocock, for whatever reason, missed all the votes on the Compromise measures recorded in Hamilton's Prologue to Conflict. The other twelve Democrats split 6–6.
 - 81. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 191-92.
- 82. For Whig optimism about the constitution and its impact on their electoral fortunes, see John C. Rutherford to William C. Rives, March 25, 1851, William M. Burwell to Rives, April 1851, Rives MSS; S. R. Mumford to Fillmore, March 25, 1851, MFP-BHS; David Campbell to William B. Campbell, May 19, July 25, 1851, CFP; John Minor Botts to Alexander H. H. Stuart, November 30, 1851, Stuart MSS (University of Virginia).

With good reason, the Virginia constitutional convention of 1850–51 has normally been interpreted in terms of the sectional tension between east (Tidewater and Piedmont) and west (Shenandoah Valley and Trans-Allegheny). Certainly the most crucial issue, reapportionment of the legislature, pitted one region against the other. Yet curiously, historians have overlooked the partisan dimension of many of the votes; Whig and Democratic majorities often voted the same way, but Whigs were usually far more cohesive than the sharply divided Democrats. On the vote on final adoption of the constitution, for example, Whigs divided 32–7 in favor, while Democrats split 43–32. Similarly, while Democrats voted more solidly than Whigs to strike a restriction prohibiting subsidization of internal improvements altogether, on other measures—for example, defeats of efforts to bar loans to railroad corporations or to prohibit bond issues unless taxes to pay them were also imposed—Whigs provided far more support for internal improvements than Democrats. This analysis of votes at the convention relies on White, "Virginia Constitutional Convention," pp. 18, 24.

- 83. White, "Virginia Constitutional Convention," p. 24. The old suffrage requirements applied during the congressional elections. Nonetheless, turnout was exceedingly low. In only one of the nine contested districts did it surpass 8,000 votes, and in most it was less than 5,000.
- 84. The account in this and subsequent paragraphs is based on Evitts, Matter of Allegiances, pp. 13–42; Bowers, "Ideology"; and Green, "Whig Party in Maryland." Green's analysis of roll-call votes in the Maryland legislature shows that in 1848, on five roll calls concerning the question of calling a constitutional convention, an average of 88 percent of the Whigs opposed while Democrats unanimously favored the call. Similarly, on sixteen roll calls in the 1850 session, an average of 85 percent of the Whigs opposed and 96 percent of the Democrats favored the convention call. In the subsequent referendum deciding whether to call the convention in May 1850, as well as the June 1851 ratifying referendum, opposition was concentrated in traditionally Whiggish counties in southern Maryland and on the Eastern Shore.

Notes Notes

- 85. The growing populistic rebellion against the regular parties and the politicians who led them as corrupt, selfish wire pullers was hardly confined to Maryland. It also helped fuel movements to revise and ratify constitutions in Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky. For evidence of this boiling antiparty sentiment in Maryland, see the sources listed in the previous note. For the nationwide phenomenon, see my Political Crisis, pp. 130–38 and passim; and "Politics of Impatience."
- 86. John P. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, November 15, 1851, letterbook copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 87. Alexander C. Bullitt to John O. Sargent, March 6, 1851, Sargent MSS; Solomon Downs to John F. H. Claiborne, September 24, October 8, 1851, Claiborne MSS; Adams, Whig Party of Louisiana, pp. 198–213. The third Democrat in Louisiana's House delegation during 1850, John Harmanson, missed all the votes on the Compromise because he was fatally ill, and he died in November. The only Democratic incumbent who ran again in 1851 was Isaac Morse of the fourth district.
 - 88. Adams, Whig Party of Louisiana, pp. 211–12, 215–16.
- 89. Ibid., pp. 215–19, 251. On p. 211, Adams says that the 1851 legislative elections resulted in a Whig majority in the house of 53–44 and an even 16–16 split in the senate. The figures compiled by Walter Dean Burnham for the Inter-University Corsortium at Michigan indicate even larger Whig gains: a 56–41 Whig majority in the house and 17–15 majority in the senate.
- 90. Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 125–133; James W. Osborne to William A. Graham, June 13, 1851, August 21, 1851 (quotation), John Kerr to Graham, August 6, 1851, in Graham Papers, IV, pp. 120–21, 182–83, 191; Edward Stanly to Millard Fillmore, June 16, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 91. James W. Bryan to William A. Graham, July 7, 1851, John Kerr to Graham, August 6, 1851, James Graham to William A. Graham, August 17, 1851, in Graham Papers, IV, pp. 142–43, 182–83, 187.
- 92. Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 132–33; Rufus Barringer to Daniel M. Barringer, September 7, 1851, Barringer MSS.
- 93. Rufus Barringer to Daniel M. Barringer, September 7, 1851, Barringer MSS; James W. Osborne to William A. Graham, June 13, 1851, in Graham Papers, IV, pp. 120–21.
 - 94. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, April 14, 1851, CFP.
- 95. Felix Zollicoffer to William B. Campbell, March 22, 1851, Hugh Preston to Campbell, May 1, 1851, CFP. I have used the following secondary accounts for the Tennessee election: Bergeron, Antebellum Politics in Tennessee, pp. 119–22; Walton, "A Matter of Timing," 129–48; Walton, "Second Party System in Tennessee"; and Atkins, "'Combat for Liberty,'" pp. 380–437. I am deeply indebted to Professor Atkins for sending me a copy of his valuable dissertation. The Democrats' 1849 platform, which vowed resistance to the Wilmot Proviso "to the last extremity," is quoted on p. 380.
- 96. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, February 9, 1851, Felix Zollicoffer to William B. Campbell, February 9, 1851, CFP. On patronage disputes, see also Parks, Bell, pp. 233–39, 263–67.

The terms of United States senators ended on March 3 of odd-numbered years; Bell's, for example, was due to expire on March 3, 1853. Tennessee's legislature met in October of odd years after the August elections; therefore, while it could elect a senator for the new Congress that began in December of that year, it elected "late" since the new senatorial term officially began on March 4, after the old one expired. Since the new Senate always met in special session during the March following presidential elections to confirm the cabinet and other appointees of the new president, Whigs had an excuse to replace Bell in the 1851 legislative session. Both Meredith Gentry and gubernatorial nominee William B. Campbell wrote letters saying that both Senate seats were at stake in the 1851 legislative elections. Meredith P. Gentry to William B. Campbell, March 9, 1851, William B. Campbell to David Campbell, April 14, 1851, CFP. On the date of senatorial elections, see Walton, "A Matter of Timing."

97. John Bell to William B. Campbell, January 25, 1851, Felix Zollicoffer to Campbell, February 3, 1851 (quotation), February 9, 1851, A. M. Savney to Campbell, February 18, 1851 (quotation), Meredith Gentry to Campbell, March 9, 1851, CFP.

- 98. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, February 9, April 14, September 2, 1851, Felix Zollicoffer to Campbell, February 9, 1851, B. H. Shepperd to Campbell, June 6, 1851, Alex Williams to Campbell, June 17, 1851, Thomas A. R. Nelson to Campbell, July 9, 1851, E. Alexander to Campbell, July 15, 1851, William G. Brownlow to Campbell, July 16, 1851, Rolfe S. Sanders to Campbell, August 10, 1851 (quotation), CFP; Bergeron, Antebellum Politics in Tennessee, pp. 119–22; Atkins, "A Combat for Liberty," pp. 422–31.
- 99. Whigs in Democrat Isham G. Harris's district charged that he had voted against both the California and Texas-New Mexico bills and therefore should be opposed as an anti-Compromise man, but however radical Harris' speeches may have been, he voted for Texas-New Mexico. H. V. Cummins to Gustavus A. Henry, March 15, 1851, Henry MSS.
- 100. The Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections incorrectly lists William H. Polk, who defeated incumbent Democrat James H. Thomas, as a Whig. Polk was instead a unionist Democrat. Because Democrats ran two candidates in two districts where Whigs had no challenger and the Whigs' vote was artificially low in Gentry's district, where he had no opponent, the Democrats far outpolled Whigs in the total congressional vote for the state, 54,158 to 47,957.
- 101. E. Alexander to William B. Campbell, September 18, 1851, David H. R. Campbell to David Campbell, November 20, 1851, William B. Campbell to David Campbell, November 30, 1851, CFP; Gustavus A. Henry to Marion Henry, November 14, 21, 1851, Henry MSS; Bergeron, Antebellum Politics in Tennessee, pp. 111–12.
- 102. Gustavus A. Henry to Marion Henry, November 21, 1851, Henry MSS; David H. R. Campbell to David Campbell, November 20, 1851, William B. Campbell to David Campbell, November 30, 1851, February 15, 1852 (quotation), CFP. In accordance with the reassignment of House seats after the Census of 1850, Tennessee's delegation was reduced from eleven to ten.
- 103. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, August 9, 1851, quoted in Atkins, "'A Combat for Liberty," p. 429.
- 104. Since 1835 Whigs had won sixty-four of the ninety-two elections for the national House of Representatives in Kentucky or 69.5 percent. Only in 1843 had Whigs and Democrats evenly divided the delegation, five to five; Whigs won seven of ten seats in 1845 and six of ten in both 1847 and 1849.
- 105. The Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections lists the returns as Powell, 54,821, and Dixon, 54,023. Yet the closest study of Kentucky, on which I have depended, gives the results as 54,613 to 53,763. Even by the Guide's more generous estimate of Dixon's vote, he ran 10,959 votes behind Crittenden's total in 1848, a drop of almost 17 percent. Cassius M. Clay ran as an independent Emancipationist candidate and attracted 3,621 votes, almost all of which apparently came from Whigs and previous nonvoters. See Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," pp. 96–97.

In the statewide totals for congressmen, Whigs narrowly outpolled Democrats, 50,842 to 50,355. Democrats, in sum, converted the former Whig stronghold into a closely competitive state.

- 106. Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," pp. 87-102.
- 107. Ibid., pp. 98-99.
- 108. J. Speed Smith to John J. Crittenden, January 28, 1851, Crittenden MSS; Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," pp. 99–100; Volz's regression estimates, p. 97, suggest that Dixon retained only about 70% of the Whigs who voted for Crittenden in 1848. A few bolted to the Democratic column, about 7 percent voted for Clay, and almost one-fifth simply abstained.
 - 109. Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," pp. 106-08.
 - 110. Ibid., pp. 108–13.

CHAPTER 18

- 1. Daniel Webster to Millard Fillmore, October 12, 1851, Webster MSS. For their agreement on strict enforcement of the neutrality laws, see Fillmore to Webster, April 16, 1851, Millard Fillmore MSS (LC); Webster to William S. Derrick, acting secretary of state, April 25, 1851, Webster to Fillmore, April 25, 1851, Webster MSS.
- See, for example, Webster to Peter Harvey, May 4, 1851, and to David Henshaw, June 11, 1851, Webster MSS.

- 3. For evidence of these calculations, see Webster to Edward Curtis, May 1851, Webster to Peter Harvey, May 4, 1851, Webster to Franklin Haven, June 11, 1851, Webster MSS.
- 4. Winthrop to Everett, December 31, 1850, Everett MSS; Truman Smith to John Wilson, August 16, 1851, Wilson MSS.
- 5. Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 333–37; Fillmore to the Whig National Convention, June 10, 1852, draft, MFP-O.
- 6. Whigs held majorities of forty-two to twenty-five in the house and nineteen to ten in the senate.
- 7. W. G. Gibbs to Daniel Webster, April 4, 1851, Webster MSS; Thomas Dorr to Edmund Burke, April 9, 1851, Burke MSS. The Biographical Directory of Congress identifies James as a protariff Democrat. It is impossible to tell from the letters cited above whether the Whigs who voted for James were Websterites, but Gibbs blamed Whigs' refusal to accept Whipple for the result.
 - 8. Ibid
- 9. The Whig vote for Jackson dropped by 700 votes (24 percent) from that won by Dixon two years earlier, while King's raw vote was larger in 1851 than in 1849. His margin narrowed because of a dramatic increase in turnout by the rejuvenated Democrats.
- 10. Emily Baldwin to Roger Sherman Baldwin, Jr, November 10, 1850, Emily Baldwin to Roger Sherman Baldwin, December 10, 1850, E. A. Andrews to R. S. Baldwin, July 29, 1850, James F. Babcock to Baldwin, December 14, 1850, BFP.
- 11. James F. Babcock to Roger Sherman Baldwin, February 6, 24, 1851, Roger Sherman Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, February 26, 1851, BFP; Colin M. Ingersoll to Thomas Seymour, February 28, 1851, Thomas Seymour MSS; Renda, "The Polity and the Party System," pp. 177–79.
- 12. Seymour's vote increased from 29,022 (48.3 percent) in 1850 to 30,077 (49 percent) in 1851; Foster got 28,209 (46.9 percent) in 1850 and 28,756 (46.9 percent) in 1851.
- 13. I have found no letter that demonstrates beyond cavil that Webster was behind the Whig opposition to Baldwin, but such a letter might exist in some manuscript collection that I did not examine.
- 14. T. C. Perkins to Roger Sherman Baldwin, June 19, 20, 1851, F. Parsons to Baldwin, July 3, 1851, Roger Sherman Baldwin to Robert C. Winthrop, July 7, 1851, copy, (quotation), BFP; J. D. Baldwin to John M. Niles, September 19, 1851, copy, Welles MSS (LC). Regional jealousies that had long complicated Connecticut's politics also contributed to Baldwin's defeat, for when Baldwin stalled, Lafayette Foster, the defeated gubernatorial candidate from eastern Norwich, tried to marshal support for the Senate seat on the grounds that since Truman Smith had previously taken the East's seat, he deserved Baldwin's. Foster failed because Free Soilers in the house refused to allow any Whig but Baldwin to have the office. See the letter of J. D. Baldwin, who blamed the defeat on "hunker Whigs," to Niles.
- 15. Webster to Fillmore, November 15, 1850, MFP-BHS; Webster to Peter Harvey, May 4, 1851, Webster MSS; Renda, "The Polity and the Party System," p. 192.
 - 16. Renda, "The Polity and the Party System," pp. 190-91.
- 17. Ibid., pp. 191, 214. Dinsmoor's percentage dropped from 55 in 1850 to 47 in 1851. Whigs gained nineteen seats in the house and one in the senate, but because Free Soilers opposed Democrats in a number of house districts and prevented anyone from attaining the necessary majority, Democratic losses in the house totaled fifty-two, far more than the Whig gains. Even so, Democrats retained healthy margins of thirty-four in the house and eight in the senate, ensuring Dinsmoor's reelection as governor.
- 18. Boston Daily Advertiser, October 3, 1850; Donald, Sumner, pp. 183–204. I have relied heavily on Donald's splendid narrative of the election for my account. Walter Dean Burnham's data on file with the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research suggest that the Coalition's majority was forty-three seats in the house and fourteen in the senate. Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," 121, gives the majority as forty-eight seats in the house and ten in the senate. Both Burnham and Sweeney list figures only for the Coalition as a whole and do not break it down by Free Soil and Democratic members. Donald, p. 189, however, states that Free Soilers and Democrats caucused separately and that eighty-five men attended the Free Soil caucus. He does not make it clear whether that caucus included both senators and representatives or only the latter, but either way, Democrats outnumbered Free Soilers by almost two-to-one.

- 19. Donald, Sumner, pp. 182-95.
- 20. I. W. Beard to Caleb Cushing, November 16, 1850, P. W. Leland to Cushing, January 9, 1851 (quotations), B. H. Cheever to Cushing, November 18, 1850, Thomas J. Whittlemore to Cushing, November 29, 1850, John T. Heard to Cushing, November 29, 1850, H. C. Merriam to Cushing, January 25, 1851, Cushing MSS.
- 21. James Morss to Cushing, June 27, 1850, J. S. Colley to Cushing, November 11, 1850, Cushing MSS; Donald, Sumner, pp. 192–93. For evidence of the continuing close relationship between Webster and Cushing, see Fletcher Webster to Cushing, October 14, 1850, Cushing MSS.
- 22. Donald, Sumner, p. 198; Ezra Lincoln to Amos A. Lawrence, February 10, March 7, April 24, 1851, Amos Lawrence MSS.
- 23. H. A. Wise to Edward Everett, February 6, 1851, "Charlie" Wise to Everett, February 9, 1851. Everett MSS.
- 24. B. H. Cheever to Caleb Cushing, November 18, 1850, Cushing MSS; Daniel Webster to T. B. Curtis, January 20, 22, 1851, David Henshaw to Webster, April 21, 1851, Webster MSS; Donald, Sumner, p. 191; Dalzell, Webster, p. 228.
- 25. Charles Upham to Henry L. Dawes, November 20, 1850, Dawes MSS; Moses Stuart to Webster, April 18, 1851, Webster MSS.
- 26. Donald, Sumner, p. 191, asserts that "about 165" Whigs consistently voted for Winthrop. Since Burnham and Sweeney put Whig strength in the house between 171 and 174 votes, Donald's figure suggests that a few Whigs, undoubtedly Websterites, scattered their votes, although it is possible that the deficit simply reflects the absence of some Whig legislators.
 - 27. Ibid., pp. 200-02.
- 28. Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," 124–25; for Whig disgust with, and confidence that they could successfully run against, the record of the Coalition in the legislature, see Moses Stuart to Webster, April 18, 1851, Webster MSS; James M. Barnard to Mark Howard, June 4, 1851, Howard MSS; George T. Davis to Henry L. Dawes, July 11, 1851, Dawes MSS.
- 29. Samuel Hooper to William Schouler, April 12, 1851, Schouler MSS; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 228–31.
- 30. While the senatorial election in the legislature was moving toward its climax in April, it should be recalled, Webster was in Boston to oversee the prosecution of Shadrack's rescuers and the extradition of Thomas Sims. Thus, when Webster sought to speak at Faneuil Hall that month, excitement over the fugitive law was at fever pitch.
- 31. David Henshaw to Webster, April 21, 1851, Fletcher Webster to Daniel Webster, May 2, 1851, Daniel Webster to Fillmore, April 18, 1851, to Franklin Haven, May 9, 1851 (quotation), to Fletcher Webster, May 9, 1851, to Peter Harvey, May 4, June 3, 1851, and to David Henshaw, June 11, 1851, (quotation), Webster MSS; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 228–31.
- 32. Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, July 9, 29, August 6, 1851, Everett MSS; Winthrop to Roger Sherman Baldwin, July 11, 1851, BFP; Winthrop to John Clifford, August 11, 1851, Winthrop MSS; Winthrop to John Davis, September 2, 1851, John Davis MSS; Webster to Peter Harvey, May 4, 1851, Webster MSS; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 231–34.
- 33. Daniel Webster to Edward Curtis, May 1851 (quotation), Webster to Peter Harvey, May 4, 1851 (quotation), Webster to Franklin Haven, June 11, 1851, Webster MSS.
- 34. Winthrop to John H. Clifford, August 11, 1851 (quotation), Winthrop MSS; Edward Everett to Webster, September 2, 1851, Webster to Everett, September 3, 1851 (quotation), Webster MSS; Aaron Hobart to Caleb Cushing, May 30, 1851, John F. Heard to Cushing, June 4, 1851, Cushing MSS; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 232–33.
- 35. Dalzell, Webster, pp. 233–34; Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," 126–29, especially Table VI. After the 1851 elections, Coalition majorities were reduced from ten to six seats in the senate and from forty-eight to ten seats in the house. Issues such as constitutional revision, prohibition, and anti-Catholicism also impinged on the 1851 Massachusetts election, and I will examine it again later in a different context.

- 36. Hunkers wanted to return their leader, Daniel S. Dickinson, to the Senate, while Barnburners wanted to replace him with John Van Buren. Hence members of the rival factions refused to vote for the other's legislative candidates and allowed Whigs to win a majority of seats. Hamilton Fish to Daniel D. Barnard, January 23, 1851, Barnard MSS.
- 37. Lyman A. Spalding to Thurlow Weed, November 18, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); Thurlow Weed to William H. Seward, January 8, 19, 1851, Christopher Morgan to Seward, January 9, 1851, Seward MSS (RU); Joseph B. Varnum, Jr., to Fillmore, November 22, 1850, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, December 21, 1850, January 1, 1851, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, January 4, 1851, MFP-BHS; Thurlow Weed to Samuel P. Lyman, December 5, 1850, copy, Corwin MSS (LC); Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, December 26, 1850, Greeley-Colfax MSS.

Free Soilers had no representation in the state senate; they held two seats in the house compared to the Democrats' forty-four and the Whigs' eighty-two.

- 38. Millard Fillmore to Hamilton Fish, November 21, 1850, Fish MSS; John C. Clark to Thurlow Weed, December 2, 1850, Seward to Weed, December 4, 1850, John L. Schoolcraft to Weed, December 5, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Seward, November 25, 1850, Schuyler Colfax to Seward, December 20, 1850, John L. Schoolcraft to Seward, December 25, 1850, Harry P. Whitbeck to Seward, January 20, 1851, Seward MSS (RU); Samuel P. Lyman to Fillmore, December 8, 1850, Hugh Maxwell to Fillmore, December 25, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 39. Weed to Corwin, November 17, 1850, February 2, 1851, Samuel P. Lyman to Corwin, January 2, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC); Moses Grinnell to John J. Crittenden, November 18, 1850, Crittenden MSS (LC); Samuel P. Lyman to Weed, December 4, 7, 1850, January 2, 3, 4, 1851, John L. Schoolcraft to Weed, December 5, 1850, February 1, 1851, Orsamus B. Matteson to Weed, December 12, 1850, January 23, 1851, William A. Sackett to Weed, January 20, 1851, Elbridge G. Spaulding to Weed, January 20, 21, 29, 1851, Weed MSS (RU).
- 40. Jerome Fuller to Millard Fillmore, December 7, 15, 1850, January 4, 1851, Hiram Ketchum to Fillmore, December 13, 1850, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, December 18, 1850, Daniel Ullmann to Fillmore, December 23, 1850, Hugh Maxwell to Fillmore, December 25, 1850, Alex Mann to Fillmore, January 27, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 41. Samuel P. Lyman to Thurlow Weed, January 8, 13, 1851, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Thomas Corwin, February 2, 1851, Corwin MSS; Samuel P. Lyman to Henry Raymond, January 24, 1851, Raymond MSS; Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, February 4, 1851, Fish MSS; Millard Fillmore to Jerome Fuller, February 3, 1851, copy, Fillmore to Washington Hunt, February 23, 1851, copy, Joseph B. Varnum, Jr., to Fillmore, November 22, 1850, Hugh Maxwell to Fillmore, January 13, 1851, Samuel P. Lyman to Fillmore, February 3, 5, 9, 1851, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, February 7, March 22, 1851, Thomas Foote to Fillmore, February 7, 1851, MFP-BHS.
 - 42. Varnum to Fillmore, November 22, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 43. Fillmore to Fish, November 21, 1850, Fish MSS; James Edwards to Fillmore, January 1, 1851 (Fillmore's notation on back), MFP-BHS.
- 44. Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, December 18, 1850, Joseph Varnum, Jr., to Hamilton Fish, November 22, 1850, Robert G. Campbell to Fillmore, November 27, 1850, John T. Bush to Fillmore, January 6, 1851, Fillmore to Jerome Fuller, February 23, 1851, copy, MFP-BHS.
- 45. Joseph B. Varnum, Jr., to Millard Fillmore, January 13, 26, February 9, 1851, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, March 22, 1851, Samuel P. Lyman to Fillmore, February 3, 4, 5, 9, 1851, MFP-BHS; Alexander Graham to William H. Seward, February 7, 1851, Thomas C. Chittenden to Seward, February 12, 1851, Seward MSS (RU); Hamilton Fish to Daniel D. Barnard, January 23, 1851, Barnard MSS; E. G. Spaulding to Thurlow Weed, January 29, 1851, Weed MSS (RU); Thurlow Weed to Thomas Corwin, February 2, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC).
 - 46. Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, December 15, 1850, January 4, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 47. Washington Hunt to Fillmore, November 16, 30, 1850, February 10, 1851, Hamilton Fish to Fillmore, November 18, 27, 1850, Hiram Ketchum to Fillmore, December 13, 1850, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, January 1, 1851, Fillmore to Washington Hunt, February 23, 1851, copy, MFP-BHS; Morton McMichael to Simeon Draper, December 26, 1850, Simeon Draper to Thurlow Weed, December 30, 1850, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Seward, January 8, 1851, Seward MSS (RU).

- 48. Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, January 4, 1851, John T. Bush to Fillmore, January 6, 1851, Fillmore to Hunt, February 23, 1851, copy, MFP-BHS; Christopher Morgan to William H. Seward, January 9, 1851, Seward MSS (RU).
- 49. Joseph B. Varnum, Jr., to Fillmore, November 22, 1850, Robert G. Campbell to Fillmore, November 26, 1850, John T. Bush to Fillmore, January 6, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 50. In addition to the letters cited in the preceding note, see Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, December 18, 1850, and Joseph B. Varnum, Jr., to Fillmore, January 13, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 51. John Bush to Fillmore, January 6, 1851, Joseph B. Varnum, Jr., to Fillmore, January 13, 15, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 52. Here the distinction between pro-Compromise resolutions that stressed the merits and fairness of the individual measures and acquiescence in the Compromise's finality, which said nothing about the merits of the legislation, must again be stressed. The former praised the substance of the Compromise; the latter simply recognized it as the law of the land without implying approval. Webster would undoubtedly have preferred the former, but given Fillmore's rage at Fuller's demand for positive approval as the price of support for Fish, he dared not go beyond insisting upon acquiescence in finality.
- 53. Thurlow Weed to Thomas Corwin, February 2, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC); E. G. Spaulding to Weed, January 29, 1851, Weed MSS (RU); Daniel Webster to Hiram Ketchum, February 1, 1851, Webster MSS; Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, February 4, 1851, Fish MSS; Joseph B. Varnum, Jr., to Fillmore, January 13, 15, 26, February 9, 1851, Nathan Hall to Fillmore, January 13 and January, 1851, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, February 7, 1851, Samuel P. Lyman to Fillmore, February 5, 9, 1851, Fillmore to Jerome Fuller, February 23, 1851, copy, Fillmore to Washington Hunt, February 23, 1851, copy, MFP-BHS.
- 54. Legislative elections of United States senators required an absolute majority, rather than a plurality, of those voting in each chamber. Thus, in the house, the twenty-three Silver Gray votes, if scattered among different Whigs like Francis Granger or William Duer, combined with the votes of forty-four Democrats for their candidate and the two Free Soilers, could prevent the fifty-nine Sewardites from achieving a majority. In the senate, where Whigs outnumbered Democrats only seventeen to fifteen, the three Silver Grays also held the balance of power.
- 55. In addition to the letters cited in note 53, see Samuel P. Lyman to Fillmore, February 4, 1851, and F. S. Faxton to Fillmore, February 7, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 56. Varnum to Fillmore, February 1, 1851, John T. Bush to Fillmore, February 3, 1851, Samuel P. Lyman to Fillmore, February 4, 1851, F. S. Faxton to Fillmore, February 7, 1851, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, February 7, 1851, Fillmore to Washington Hunt, February 23, 1851, copy, MFP-BHS; Hamilton Fish to Thurlow Weed, February 1, 1851, Weed MSS (RU).
- 57. Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, February 4, 1851, Fish MSS; Samuel P. Lyman to Fillmore, February 1851 (misdated January), Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, January 7, 1851, Joseph B. Varnum, Jr., to Fillmore, February 9, 1851, Hugh Maxwell to Fillmore, February 18, 1851, MFP-BHS; Hamilton Fish to Henry Clay, February 18, 1851, Henry Clay MSS (LC); Fish to Weed, February 20, 1851, Weed MSS (RU).
- 58. Samuel P. Lyman to Thurlow Weed, February 23, 1851, Weed MSS (RU); Lyman to Fillmore, February 5, 9, 1851, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, February 7, 1851, Hiram Ketchum to Fillmore, February 10, 1851, Fillmore to Jerome Fuller, February 23, 1851, copy, Fillmore to Washington Hunt, February 23, 1851, copy, MFP-BHS; Henry J. Raymond to William H. Seward, February 6, 1851, Seward MSS (RU).
- 59. Rayback, Fillmore, p. 285; John T. Bush to Fillmore, March 4, 1851, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, March 19, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 60. Fillmore to Washington Hunt, February 23, 1851, copy, Francis Granger to Fillmore, February 20, 1851, John T. Bush to Fillmore, March 4, 1851, A. K. Hadley to Fillmore, March 4, 1851, John C. Spencer to Fillmore, March 5, 1851, James R. Thompson to Fillmore, March 11, 1851, Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, March 14, 1851, George R. Babcock to Fillmore, March 17, 1851, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, March 19, 26, 1851, MFP-BHS.

- 61. William Duer to Fillmore, March 27, 1850, MFP-BHS.
- 62. John A. Collier to Fillmore, October 4, 9, 1850, John C. Spencer to Fillmore, December 6, 1850, MFP-BHS. Spencer's letter relates the story of Collier's exposing himself to women; Spencer also asked Fillmore to consider what his wife would think of Collier.
- 63. David A. Bokee to Fillmore, May 5, 1851, Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, May 8, 1851, Nathan Hall to Fillmore, May 23, 1851, Hamilton Fish to Fillmore, June 4, 1851, Thomas Foote to Fillmore, June 8, 1851, William L. Hodge to Fillmore, July 7, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 64. Robert G. Campbell to Fillmore, April 9, 1851, Daniel Webster to Fillmore, April 15, 1851, MFP-BHS; Fillmore to Daniel Webster, April 16, 1851, Fillmore MSS (LC); Henry J. Raymond to William H. Seward, February 6, 1851, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 65. Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 285-86; John T. Bush to Fillmore, April 20, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 66. The standard account of the Erie Canal in New York politics in this period is Shaw, Erie Water West. Aside from manuscript sources, however, I have relied primarily on an unusually able undergraduate senior thesis written under my supervision: Reed, "Politics of Internal Improvements."

The Stop-and-Tax Act of 1842 suspended all work on canals, levied a real estate tax to help defray the state's general expenses, and consigned revenue from canal tolls to a sinking fund to pay interest and principal on the existing debt, which in 1842 totaled $26 million.

- 67. Reed, "Politics of Internal Improvements," p. 63. On the attractiveness of revenue certificates to banks and other potential investors, see William L. Marcy to Andrew Jackson Donelson, May 7, 1851, Donelson MSS. Marcy considered the scheme flatly unconstitutional, but he admitted that the arguments for it were so plausible and the financial incentives so irresistible that the bill was bound to pass.
- 68. Samuel B. Ruggles to Seward, January 18, 1851, Seward to Samuel B. Ruggles, January 23, 1851, Seward MSS (RU); Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, March 19, 1851, John T. Bush to Fillmore, April 20, 1851, and George R. Babcock to Fillmore, April 21, 1851, MFP-BHS. Spencer's opinion was printed in the Albany Evening Journal, March 17, 1851. A draft of Webster's brief, dated April 11, 1851, is in the Webster MSS. Both are cited in Reed, "Politics of Internal Improvements," p. 68. Webster's reaction to events in New York and his possible motive for writing this brief at Weed's behest will be discussed below.
- 69. Thurlow Weed to Hamilton Fish, April 6, 1851, Fish MSS; John T. Bush to Fillmore, April 20, 1851, George R. Babcock to Fillmore, April 21, 1850, Thomas Foote to Fillmore, May 2, 1851, M. P. Bemus to Fillmore, May 2, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 70. For additional evidence of Whig confidence in the issue, see Charles Cooke to Thurlow Weed, May 30, 1851, Seth C. Hawley to Weed, May 30, 1851, and Alvah Hunt to Weed, June 6, 1851, Weed MSS (RU). Democrats were correspondingly pessimistic, believing that the canal issue and the resignation of the Democratic senators would crucify them in the fall. William L. Marcy to Andrew Jackson Donelson, May 7, 1851, Donelson MSS; William C. Bouck to Horatio Seymour, June 4, 1851, Fairchild Collection.
- 71. John C. Spencer to Hamilton Fish, June 14, 1851, Fish MSS; Jerome Fuller to Fillmore, June 16, 1851, James Brooks to Fillmore, July 1, 1851, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, July 20, 1851, John C. Spencer to Fillmore, July 22, 1851, Thomas Foote to Fillmore, July 24, August 2, 1851, MFP-BHS; John C. Spencer to John O. Sargent, August 18, 1851, Sargent MSS; Fillmore to Webster, August 4, 1851, Webster MSS.
- 72. Charles W. March to Webster, April 17, 1851, Webster to Edward Curtis, May 1851, Webster to Peter Harvey, May 4, 1851, Hiram Ketchum to Webster, May 10, 1851, Webster to Franklin Haven, June 11, 1851, Edward Everett to Webster, September 2, 1851, Webster to Everett, September 3, 1851, Webster MSS; Philip Greely, Jr. to Fillmore, March 5, June 19, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 73. On Fillmore's disinterest in another race for the presidency, see Fillmore to Isaac Newton, July 31, 1851, Millard Fillmore MSS (Yale University, microfilm edition of Fillmore MSS).
- 74. Foner, Business & Slavery, p. 70; N. K. Hall to Fillmore, August 15, 1851, MFP-BHS; Simeon Draper to Thurlow Weed, August 30, 1851, Weed MSS (RU); Oran Follett to Thomas Corwin, September 14, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC).
 - 75. Oran Follett to Thomas Corwin, September 14, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC); Philo C. Fuller to Millard Fillmore, October 6, 1851, MFP-BHS; George R. Babcock to Daniel Ullmann, October 13, 1851, Ullmann MSS.

- 76. George R. Babcock to Daniel Ullmann, September 4, 13, October 13, 1851, E. G. Spaulding to Ullmann, September 20, 1851, Ullmann to Spaulding, September 24, 1851, copy, E. Andrews to Ullmann, September 29, 1851, S. C. Hart to Washington Hunt, October 1, 1851, with Washington Hunt to Ullmann, October 5, 1851, S. P. Allen to Ullmann, October 23, 1851, Ullmann MSS; Robert Morriss to Hamilton Fish, October 15, 1851, Fish MSS.
 - 77. Foner, Business & Slavery, pp. 69-74.
- 78. Horace Greeley to Daniel Ullmann, September 14, 1851, George R. Babcock to Ullmann, September 13, 1851, B. Thompson to Ullmann, October 25, 1851, James Henry to Ullmann, October 26, 1851, Ullmann MSS; Winthrop Atwell to Dewitt Clinton Littlejohn, September 20, 1851, John L. Schoolcraft to Thurlow Weed, October 28, 1851, Weed MSS (RU); John M. Bradford to Hamilton Fish, October 15, November 8, 1851, Fish MSS.
- 79. Thurlow Weed to George W. Patterson, October 30, 1851, Weed MSS (RU); David A. Bokee to Fillmore, October 30, 1851, Hugh Maxwell to Fillmore, October 31, 1851, Hamilton Fish to Fillmore, November 1, 3, 1851, MFP-BHS; Fillmore to Hamilton Fish, November 2, 1851, Fish MSS.
- 80. After the May 1851 elections, the Whig margin over Democrats in the senate had increased from seventeen to fifteen to twenty-four to eight.
- 81. Gilbert Davis to Millard Fillmore, November 7, 1851, MFP-BHS; Seward to George W. Patterson, November 13, 1851, Hamilton Fish to Thurlow Weed, November 15, 1851, Weed MSS; Fish to Daniel D. Barnard, November 10, 1851, Barnard MSS; Weed to Fish, November 16, 1851, quoted in Carman and Luthin, "Seward-Fillmore Feud," 343.
- 82. Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 167–68; Thomas Corwin to J. D. Ward, December 13, 1850, Corwin MSS (OHS); Aaron F. Perry to Millard Fillmore, March 20, 1851, Daniel Webster to Fillmore, August 10, 1851, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, October 6, 1851, Oran Follett to Fillmore, November 19, 1851, MFP-BHS; ? to Thomas Ewing, January 9, 1851 (quotation), EFP. (The page of this critical letter with the signature is missing.)
- 83. The subsequent account of Ohio's senatorial election is based on the following sources, and I shall eschew further citation except for quotations: Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp.157–64; Trefousse, Wade, pp. 60–69; Aaron F. Perry to Thomas Ewing, October 30, 1850, January 19, 22, 1851, Thomas Ewing to ?, November 13, 1850, draft, John Greiner to Ewing, December 20, 1850, January 10, 15, 18, 23, February 11, 1851, P. B. Ewing to Thomas Ewing, January 11, 1851, A. Banning Norton to Ewing, February 1, March 18, 22, 1851, EFP; Samuel Foner to Thomas Corwin, December 22, 1850, Edwin Corwin to Thomas Corwin, February 6, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC); E. S. Hamlin to Salmon P. Chase, December 23, 1850, George Hoadly to Chase, December 24, 1850, Chase MSS (LC).
 - 84. ? to Thomas Ewing, January 9, 1851, EFP.
- 85. According to the data Walter Dean Burnham compiled for the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research, there were thirty-four Whigs, thirty-two Democrats, and six Free Soilers in the house and seventeen Whigs, sixteen Democrats, and three Free Soilers in the senate.
 - 86. John Greiner to Thomas Ewing, December 20, 1851, ? to Ewing, January 9, 1851, EFP.
- 87. L. Atkinson to Thomas Ewing, February 5, 1851, ibid. Atkinson was not a member of the legislature.
- 88. For evidence of the Whigs' hope of running against the new constitution in the fall elections, see John Greiner to Thomas Ewing, January 18, 1851, Simeon Brush to Ewing, February 4, 1851, EFP. Vinton, it will be recalled, had helped Taylor at the 1848 national convention by persuading Ohio's Whigs to back Scott rather than Clay.
- 89. A. Banning Norton to Thomas Ewing, March 18, 22, 1851, EFP. For Wade's speeches, see the pages in Trefousse's biography cited in note 83.
- 90. Aaron F. Perry to Millard Fillmore, March 20, 1851, MFP-BHS; A. Banning Norton to Thomas Ewing, March 22, 1851, EFP.
- 91. A. Banning Norton to Thomas Ewing, March 22, 1851, Thomas Ewing, Jr., to Hugh B. Ewing, June 8, 1851, EFP; William E. Russell to Thomas Corwin, July 8, December 1, 1851,

Free Soil

Corwin MSS (LC). My description of the new Ohio constitution is drawn from Hampel, "The Ohio Whig Party," pp. 25–31. The constitution passed with 53.5 percent of the vote in June.

92. Williams, Hayes Diary, I, p. 399 (entry for October 15, 1851). The change in the popular vote for governor and the parties' share of legislative seats between 1850 and 1851 was as follows:

Vote	tor	Governor

2

1

	18	1850		1851
Whig	121,105	121,105 (45.2%)		(42.4%)
Democratic	133,093	(49.7%)	145,656 (51.6%)
Free Soil	13,747	13,747 (5.1%)		16,910 (6.0%)
		Seats in I	Legislature
	House	Senate	House	Senate
Whig	34	17	26	9
Democratic	32	16	68	25

The reapportionment of the legislature by the new constitution, which increased the size of house and reduced the senate, clearly worked to the Whigs' disadvantage, as they had feared.

3

- 93. R. W. Clark to John G. Davis, October 20, 1851 (quotation), John G. Davis MSS; E. Connor to Thomas Corwin, October 25, 1851, William E. Russell to Corwin, December 1, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC); William E. Russell to Thomas Ewing, November 2, 1851, EFP; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 171–72.
- 94. For complaints by California Whigs about Fillmore's patronage decisions, see Truman Smith to John Wilson, November 29, 1850, January 5, November 3, December 3, 1851, John Wilson MSS; John Wilson to Millard Fillmore, April 28, 1851, J. H. Clay Mudd to Truman Smith, December 4, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 95. C. L. Hall to Fillmore, November 19, 1850, George Madeira to Fillmore, March 31, November 18, 1851, MFP-BHS.
 - 96. James D. Merrill to Millard Fillmore, January 31, March 22, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 97. Jacob M. Howard to Millard Fillmore, November 12, 1850, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, April 3, 1851, A. M. Baker to Fillmore, December 1, 1850, May 4, June 30, 1851, O. M. Hyde to Fillmore, June 21, 1851, MFP-BHS; Josiah Snow to William H. Seward, March 8, 26, 1851, Henry Barns to Seward, April 22, May 19, October 2, December 4, 1851, Jacob Howard to Seward, September 17, 1851, Seward MSS (RU).
- 98. S. Francis to Millard Fillmore, January 22, 1851, MFP-BHS; John Moses to Richard Yates, November 19, 1851, Yates MSS.
 - 99. Willard Smith, "Colfax," 273, 276–77; Van Bolt, "'Eternal Agitation," 363, 367.
 - 100. Smith, "Colfax," 278; Van Bolt, "Indiana in Political Transition," 151.
- 101. George W. Julian to Henry Hoover, April 23, 1851, copy, Julian MSS; Joseph O. Jones to John G. Davis, July 27, 1851, John Davis MSS; Schuyler Colfax to John O. Sargent, October 27, 1851, Sargent MSS; Van Bolt, ''Éternal Agitation,'' 364; Smith, "Colfax," 276–77.
- 102. This discussion of the background to the convention is based on an analysis of roll-call votes on calling the convention in the Indiana legislature, as well as on a correlation analysis of the votes for delegates in Hampel, "Indiana Constitutional Convention."
- 103. Hampel, "Constitution-Making"; Smith, "Colfax," 273–76; Van Bolt, "Indiana in Political Transition," 136–41; Samuel Brenton to Allen Hamilton, January 23, 1851, William Holman to Hamilton, April 5, 1851, Hamilton MSS.
 - 104. Ibid.
- 105. Between the elections of 1850 and 1851, Whig proportions of seats in the legislature dropped from 37 to 36 percent in the house and from 34 to 20 percent in the senate.

- 106. Schuyler Colfax to John O. Sargent, September 23, October 27, 1851, Sargent MSS.
- 107. The best analysis of the 1851 elections in New Jersey is found in Renda, "Railroads, Revenue, and Reform."
- 108. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 168–69, 181–86; Josiah Randall et al. to Daniel Webster, November 11, 1850, James Cooper to Webster, April 29, 1851, Webster MSS; Joseph P. Sanderson to Millard Fillmore, March 6, 1851, Webster to Fillmore, April 4, 1851, MFP-BHS. Roll-call votes on repeal of the 1847 law provoked higher levels of interparty conflict in the 1851 legislature than did those on any other issue. See Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 115–16.
- 109. W. J. Sanders to Millard Fillmore, February 18, 1851, Joseph P. Sanderson to Fillmore, March 6, 1851, J. G. Moore to Fillmore, March 8, 14, 1851, MFP-BHS; Josiah Randall to Webster, March 21, 1851, Webster MSS.
- 110. John H. Bryant to Fillmore, November 11, 1850, James Cooper to Fillmore, December 21, 1850, March 13, 1851, William D. Lewis to Thomas Corwin, March 19, 1851, MFP-BHS; William F. Johnston to Fillmore, April 11, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC); Josiah Randall to Webster, March 21, 1851, John S. Riddle to Webster, April 7, 1851, Charles Gibbons to Webster, April 28, 1851, Webster MSS.
- 111. Webster to Fillmore, March 17, 1851, Josiah Randall to Webster, March 21, 1851, Webster MSS; Webster to Fillmore, April 4, May 1, 1851, James E. Harvey to Fillmore, June 16, 1851, MFP-BHS; James E. Harvey to Thomas Corwin, April 27, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC). For Johnston's repeated snubs of governors from Maryland, Virginia, and Georgia, see Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 168–69, 186.
- 112. Joseph P. Sanderson to Fillmore, March 6, 1851, James E. Harvey to Fillmore, April 20, 1851, William D. Lewis to Fillmore, April 21, 1851, MFP-BHS; James E. Harvey to Thomas Corwin, April 27, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC); Charles Gibbons to Daniel Webster, April 28, 1851, James Cooper to Webster, April 29, 1851, Webster MSS.
- 113. James Cooper to Fillmore, April 18, 19, 1851, MFP-BHS; Charles Gibbons to Daniel Webster, April 28, 1850, James Cooper to Webster, April 29, 1851, Josiah Randall to Webster, April 30, 1850, Webster MSS.
- 114. James E. Harvey to Thomas Corwin, April 16, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC); William B. Reed to Fillmore, June 7, 1851, James E. Harvey to Fillmore, July 7, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 115. John Ashmead to Millard Fillmore, July 12, 1851, February 27, March 25, 1852, MFP-BHS.
- 116. E. G. Lindsey to Millard Fillmore, January 28, April 7, 1851, Daniel Webster to Fillmore, March 17, 1851, Peter Sken Smith to Fillmore, March 24, April 7, 1851, MFP-BHS; John S. Riddle to Webster, April 7, 1851, Webster MSS.
- 117. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 178; Harvey to Corwin, April 16, 27, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC); William B. Reed to Fillmore, June 7, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 118. Cooper to Fillmore, May 2, 1851, James E. Harvey to Fillmore, April 27, May 28, June 16, 1851, William B. Reed to Fillmore, June 7, 1851, MFP-BHS.
 - 119. Ibid.
- 120. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 179–80; Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 95–100; J. R. Flanigen to Fillmore, June 28, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 121. James Brooks to Millard Fillmore, June 27, 1851, James E. Harvey to Fillmore, July 7, 1851, MFP-BHS; Daniel Webster to Hiram Ketchum, June 27, 1851, Webster MSS.
- 122. Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 98–100; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 181–82; Edward McPherson to J. B. McPherson, June 17, 1851, McPherson MSS; Solomon Krick to J. Alexander Fulton, August 25, 1851, Fulton MSS.
- 123. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 181–90. The best account of the Christiana Riot and its aftermath is Slaughter, Bloody Dawn. Slaughter, however, is obviously unfamiliar with Pennsylvania Whig politics. Thus he fails to realize that one of the reasons Ashmead brought the hopelessly unsustainable charges of treason against bystanders is that he was trying to curry favor with Fillmore and Webster, lest they sack him, as Cooper immediately demanded, because he belonged to Johnston's machine. Nor does he seem to appreciate the delicious irony that Maryland authorities asked none other than Senator Cooper to help Ashmead prosecute the case and that Cooper accepted. Cooper's contempt for Ashmead's incompetence as a lawyer strikingly resembled Webster's disdain for Lunt in Massachusetts. See Cooper to Webster, October 21, 1851, Webster MSS.

Notes Notes

124. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 190–91; Edward McPherson to J. B. McPherson, October 16, 1851, McPherson MSS; Peter Sken Smith to Fillmore, October 15, 1851, J. W. S. to Fillmore, October 18, 1851, James E. Harvey to Fillmore, October 19, 23, 25, 1851, clipping of the Berks County Intelligencer with letter of October 25, William D. Lewis to Fillmore, October 19, 1851, MFP-BHS; E. H. Penniman to William L. Bigler, October 19, 1851, Bigler MSS; William L. Hirst to J. Alexander Fulton, August 26, 1851, Fulton MSS.

In 1848, when there was no separate Native American candidate for governor, Johnston won by about 300 votes, 168,522 to 168,225. In 1851, Bigler garnered 186,459 votes, Johnston, 178,034, and the Native American, 1850.

- 125. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 176–77, n. 4; Francis Wharton to Jeremiah Sullivan Black, September 18, 1851, Black MSS; E. H. Penniman to William L. Bigler, October 19, 1851, Bigler MSS.
- 126. G. G. Wescott to William Bigler, January 16, 1851, William F. Small to Bigler, January 20, 1851, Henry M. Phillips to Bigler, January 28, 1851, Benjamin Brewster to Bigler, February 17, 1851, E. H. Penniman to Bigler, October 19, 1851, James Macmanus to Bigler, October 23, 1851 (quotation), Bigler MSS; Joseph Hemphill to James Buchanan, July 16, 1851, J. C. Van Dyke to Buchanan, October 18, 1851, Buchanan MSS (HSP); N. D. Strong to J. Alexander Fulton, July 22, 1851, R. A. Lamberton to Fulton, July 28, 1851, Fulton MSS; James E. Harvey to Fillmore, October 19, 1851, Miller N. Everly to Fillmore, November 15, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 127. William D. Lewis to Thomas Corwin, October 16, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC); J. W. S. to Fillmore, October 18, 1851, James E. Harvey to Fillmore, October 19, 23, 1851, William D. Lewis to Fillmore, October 19, 1851, Daniel Webster to Fillmore, November 16, 1851, MFP-BHS; James E. Harvey to John J. Crittenden, November 5, 1851, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 128. These figures, taken from Historical Statistics, p. 1063, apparently include Whigs and Democrats elected under Union and Southern Rights labels with their respective major parties.
- 129. In New York and Maryland the senate was evenly divided, and if strength in joint sessions were considered, New York could be added to the Whig list and Maryland to the Democratic one.
 - 130. Henry Clay to Daniel Ullmann, June 14, 1851, Ullmann MSS.
- 131. Benjamin Matthias to William A. Graham, November 21, 1851, in Graham Papers, IV, pp. 216–17.

CHAPTER 19

- 1. Benjamin F. Wade to Caroline Wade, January 28, 1852, Wade MSS; Philadelphia Public Ledger, Washington Correspondence, January 14, 1852.
- 2. Truman Smith to Daniel M. Barringer, May 1, 1852, Barringer MSS; Truman Smith to William B. Campbell, May 15, 1852, CFP.
- 3. For Sargent's interest in a Union party, see James D. Ogden to John O. Sargent, September 17, 20, 1851, Samuel Eliot to Sargent, November 10, 1851, Sargent MSS; for Kennedy's continuing advocacy of the idea, see John P. Kennedy to Henry C. Carey, April 30, 1851, Kennedy to Daniel Webster, July 10, 1851, and Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, December 20, 1851, copies, Kennedy MSS.
- 4. Oran Follett to Millard Fillmore, November 19, 1851, Daniel Lee to Fillmore, July 27, December 4, 1851, February 13, 1852, MFP-BHS.
- 5. Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, November 21, 28, 30, 1851, National Union Party [Benjamin Balche] to Webster, October 20, 1851, Webster MSS; Henry A. Wise to Edward Everett, November 28, 1851, Everett MSS; Benjamin Balche to Howell Cobb, January 10, 1851, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 220–21.
- 6. Aside from having a common desire with Websterites to stop Fillmore from sewing up the city's delegates to the national convention, Seward needed their help to secure the Whig gubernatorial nomination in 1852 for Moses Grinnell, a Manhattan merchant who was close to Webster's friends in the mercantile community and on the Union Safety Committee. Grinnell's nomination, Seward believed, could reunify the state Whig party without giving Silver Grays the governorship. See Simeon Draper to Daniel Webster, January 1852, James Watson Webb to Webster, February 8, 1852, Webster MSS; Henry J. Raymond to William H. Seward, March 15, 1851, Seward MSS (RU).

- 7. An Old Fashioned Webster Man to Webster, Philadelphia, October 28, 1851, Webster MSS; John M. Clayton to John J. Crittenden, October 27, 1851, James E. Harvey to Crittenden, October 28, 1851, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 8. Philadelphia Public Ledger, January 14, 1852; Oran Follett to Millard Fillmore, November 19, 1851, Daniel Lee to Fillmore, December 4, 1851, Webster to Fillmore, December 20, 1851, MFP-BHS; Henry S. Foote to Millard Fillmore, December 22, 1851, MFP-O; John P. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, December 20, 1851, copy, Kennedy MSS; Daniel Webster to Henry Hilliard, April 7, 1851, Edward Everett to Webster, November 22, 1851, Webster MSS; William H. Seward to Thurlow Weed, December 26, 1851, Weed MSS (RU). Foote resigned his Senate seat on January 8, 1852; his successor, Walter Brooke, a Union Whig, was sworn in on March 11, 1852
- 9. Charles March to Daniel Webster, November 23, 1851, Webster to Franklin Haven, November 30, 1851, Webster MSS; Seward to Weed, December 26, 1851, Weed MSS (RU); William Schouler to Seward, December 20, 1851, James B. Swain to Seward, February 24, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Cabell's speech is quoted in Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 230, 233n. The Democratic caucus, which met on Saturday night, November 29, 1851, will be discussed further below.
 - 10. Webster to Everett, March 13, 1852, Webster MSS.
- 11. Webster to Franklin Haven, November 14, 28, 1851, Webster MSS. For other reports that Fillmore intended to announce his withdrawal from the race in December or January, see Joseph C. Kennedy to John M. Clayton, December 10, 1851, Clayton MSS; and the Washington Correspondence in the Philadelphia Public Ledger, January 23, 1852.
- 12. Henry A. Wise to Edward Everett, January 24, 1852, Fillmore to Everett, February 16, 1852, Everett MSS; Webster to Franklin Haven, January 22, 1852, Simeon Draper to Webster, January 1852, Webster MSS; Philadelphia Public Ledger, January 24, 1852.
- 13. Alexander Stephens to Linton Stephens, December 10, 1851, and the letters to Howell Cobb from Robert Toombs, December 2, 1851 [misdated January 2, 1851], Alexander Stephens, November 24, 26, December 5, 1851, Thomas D. Harris, November 29, 1851, and George W. Jones, December 7, 1851, all in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 218–20, 264–74.
- 14. Ibid.; see also Howell Cobb to Alexander H. Stephens, December 3, 22, 1851, Stephens MSS (LC); Daniel Lee to Millard Fillmore, December 4, 1851, MFP-BHS. Brooke is quoted in Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 218.
- 15. Andrew Jackson Donelson to Howell Cobb, October 22, 1851, George W. Jones to Cobb, December 7, 1851, January 25, 1852, John Slidell to Cobb, January 28, 1852, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 262–77. The reason southern Whigs expressed continued faith in the party will be examined below, but Cabell's December speech, in which he proclaimed the Whig party now safer on the finality of the Compromise than the Democrats, can be found in U.S. Congress, Congressional Globe, 32nd Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 8–9.
- 16. In addition to the letters to Cobb cited in previous notes, see Herridon L. Henderson to John Bragg, January 15, 1852, A. Lopez to Bragg, January 24, 1852, Bragg MSS; Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 212–14; Nevins, Ordeal: Fruits, pp. 377–79; Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 195–99; and Shryock, Georgia and the Union, pp. 356–63.
- 17. In addition to the sources cited in the previous note, see Howell Cobb to Alexander H. Stephens, December 22, 1851, Stephens MSS (LC); Stephens to Cobb, November 26, 1851, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 265–67; Edward Everett to Daniel Webster, November 22, 1851, Webster MSS; Arthur F. Hopkins to Millard Fillmore, March 3, 1852, William C. Dawson to Fillmore, March 15, 1852, MFP-BHS; Thomas E. Joby to John Bragg, December 10, 1851, Herridon L. Henderson to Bragg, January 15, 1852, A. Lopez to John Bragg, January 24, 1852, Bragg MSS.
- 18. For Alabama, see Thornton, Politics and Power, pp. 195–97; for Mississippi I have relied primarily on two unpublished papers written by graduate students at the University of Virginia, copies of which are in my possession: Hoerl, "Land, Rails, and Gresham's Law," and Mittendorf, "Mississippi Politics." Both possess tables showing changes in the Rice Indexes of Cohesion over time on various issues that graphically illustrate the disunity of the Union coalition. In 1848, for example, five votes on banking produced an average Whig cohesion score of 85; on two votes on banking in 1852 the Union average was only 6.5. In 1848, the average Whig cohesion on eleven votes concerning the Planters' Bank bonds was 74.5; in 1852, the Union coalition mustered a cohesion index of only 30.9 on ten such votes. In 1848, on twenty-one votes on land policy, Whigs retained an average cohesion score of 73.6; four votes on land policy produced a Union score of only 34.7. In contrast to these votes on state economic policy, the index of Union cohesion on the vote for United States senator in 1852, when Brooke was elected, was 85.2.

- 19. Henry Hilliard to Fillmore, January 26, 1852, Arthur F. Hopkins to Fillmore, March 3, April 22, 1852, William C. Dawson to Fillmore, March 15, 1852, MFP-BHS.
 - 20. Samuel Eliot to John O. Sargent, November 10, 1851, Sargent MSS.
- 21. Philip Greely, Jr., to William H. Seward, March 1, 1852, Seward MSS (RU). These contentions about northern Whigs will be documented more fully below, but see the speeches by Lewis Campbell, James Brooks, and E. C. Cabell, Congressional Globe, 32nd Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 5–9; and William H. Seward to Thurlow Weed, December 26, 1851, Weed MSS (RU).
- 22. Robert Toombs to Howell Cobb, December 2, 1851 [misdated January 2, 1851], in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 218–220; Webster to Franklin Haven, November 30, 1851, Webster MSS; speeches of Brooks and Cabell, December 1, 1851, Congressional Globe, 32nd Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 5–9.
- 23. Congressional Globe, 32nd Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 5–9. Brooks read the Whigs' resolution into the Congressional Record, p. 6. It said that the "adjustment measures" formed the best "system of compromise" possible "and that therefore they ought to be adhered to and carried into full execution, as a final settlement in principle and substance of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embrace."
- 24. Alexander, Sectional Stress, p. 18, lists ninety-two Whigs in the House for this session. To get the figure of eighty-six Whigs, I have subtracted the two Union Whigs from Alabama, the two Union Whigs from Georgia, and the two Southern Rights Whigs from Georgia. The Whig caucus in fact never nominated a candidate for speaker, and Whigs scattered their votes among several people on the House vote.
- 25. Congressional Globe, 32nd Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 5–9; George W. Jones to Howell Cobb, December 7, 1851, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 269–71; John Z. Goodrich to William Schouler, April 26, 1852, Schouler MSS. Goodrich, a Massachusetts Whig at the caucus who dissented from the finality resolution, bitterly complained in this last letter about the false portrait of northern acquiescence in finality that Brooks and Cabell presented on the House floor.
- 26. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, February 15, 1852, CFP; New Orleans Bulletin, July 11, 1851, Memphis Eagle, November 11, 1851, both quoted in Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 227–28. Cole, pp. 223–44, amasses irrefutable evidence that the vast majority of southern Whigs preferred Fillmore or Webster and opposed Scott as untrustworthy. See also Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 322–25.
- 27. Alabama's Joseph G. Baldwin wrote Alexander H. H. Stuart, "Webster won't do. His declaration that there should be no other slave state is fel de re here." Howell Cobb, in replying to a proposed Union party ticket of Webster and Cobb, declared that "no man—Whig or Democrat, great or small—can or ever will receive the support of the South for the presidency who advocates the doctrines avowed by Mr. Webster in his Buffalo speech." Baldwin to Stuart, April 16, 1852, Stuart MSS (University of Virginia); Cobb to C. W. Denison, February 3, 1852, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," pp. 278–79. See also J. Muir to Thomas Corwin, March 11, 1852, Corwin MSS (LC).
- 28. Millard Fillmore to Daniel Webster, November 29, 1851, with answers on back from Webster, Crittenden, and William A. Graham urging Fillmore not to change the section of his annual message on the Fugitive Slave Act, as Fish requested, MFP-BHS; Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 137–39; Dennis Heart to Willie P. Mangum, March 31, 1852, in The Mangum Papers, V, pp. 221–23; Henry A. Wise to Edward Everett, March 20, 1852, Everett MSS.

- 29. Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 333–37; Joseph C. Kennedy to John M. Clayton, December 10, 1851, Clayton MSS; Fillmore to Everett, November 28, 1851, Everett MSS; Fillmore to Whig National Convention, June 10, 1852, draft, MFP-O.
- 30. George Madeira to Fillmore, November 18, 1851, Richard W. Thompson to Fillmore, January 6, 1852, John Ashmead to Fillmore, July 12, 1851, February 27, March 25, 1852, George W. Knight to Fillmore, April 7, 1852, MFP-BHS.
 - 31. Henry Hilliard to Fillmore, December 9, 1851, MFP-BHS.
- 32. Oran Follett to Fillmore, November 19, 1851, Henry Hilliard to Fillmore, December 9, 1851, George R. Babcock to Fillmore, March 8, 1852, MFP-BHS.
- 33. Fillmore to President of the Whig National Convention, June 10, 1852, draft, Fillmore to George R. Babcock, June 12, 1852, MFP-O; Fillmore to Edward Everett, February 16, 1852, Everett MSS.
- 34. William H. Garland to Fillmore, February 17, 1852, Daniel Lee to Fillmore, March 26, 1852, MFP-BHS.
 - 35. See, for example, Lewis Campbell to William Schouler, January 15, 1852, Schouler MSS.
- 36. Savannah Republican, July 1, 1851, quoted in Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 225–26; Christopher H. Williams to William B. Campbell, January 26, 1852, CFP.
- 37. Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, February 12, 1851, quoted in Nevins, Ordeal: House, p. 26; William Bigler to Franklin Pierce, June 26, 1852, Pierce MSS; Joseph C. Kennedy to John M. Clayton, December 10, 1851, Clayton MSS.
- 38. Truman Smith to John Wilson, January 5, August 16, October 14, 1851, Wilson MSS. George C. Gardiner, one-time dentist, land speculator, and spectacularly brazen bunko artist, presented a completely spurious claim to the Mexican Claims Commission created under the terms of the Treaty of Guadelupe Hidalgo to pay off the debts the government of Mexico owed to U.S. citizens. While still in the Senate, Corwin served as Gardiner's lawyer, working on a contingency basis, before the claims commission on which his cousin, Robert C. Corwin, sat. Upon his elevation to the cabinet, Corwin sold his share to another lawyer for $81,000. Thus he netted none of the $484,000 the commission awared Gardiner. Nonetheless, the later revelation that Gardiner's claim was utterly false and the obvious fact that Corwin had been able to sell his share of the claim for so much only because of his presumed influence on his cousin created a scandal. See Summers, Plundering Generation, pp. 159–61.
 - 39. James S. Pike to Thurlow Weed, January 30, 1852, Weed MSS (RU).
- 40. John O. Charles to Millard Fillmore, March 17, 1851, MFP-BHS; Charles A. Dana to James S. Pike, May 1852, Pike MSS; Truman Smith to Daniel M. Barringer, May 1, 1852, Barringer MSS.
- 41. George R. Babcock to Fillmore, March 8, 1852, Thomas Foote to Fillmore, April 19, 1852, MFP-BHS.
 - 42. Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, April 4, 1852, Fish MSS.
- 43. Philadelphia Public Ledger, January 21, 1852. This summary of Whig and Democratic positions on economic policy recapitulates arguments I've already developed in previous chapters, and I see no need for additional documentation here.
- 44. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 123–24. I have documented the argument in this and subsequent paragraphs in Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 106–13, 270–71, 297–99.
- 45. On free banking acts and Democratic support for them in the Midwest, see Shade, Banks or No Banks, pp. 145–88; for Democratic demands on Pennsylvania's Bigler to sign bills chartering new banks, see the letters in the Bigler MSS dated April 10, 13, 17, 19, 1852. Letters from other Democrats dated April 20, 21, 23, 1852, however, applaud his vetoes of the same banking bills. For the diminution of legislative conflict over banking and currency, see Table 3 in Holt, Political Crisis, p. 175.
- 46. In July a Pennsylvania Democrat, after making a trip through the state's iron-making and coal-mining districts, reported: "The tariff people—especially the discontented coal and iron people are satisfied[,] for the increased demand for rail way iron has set them to work & we hear no more complaints." Governor Bigler also told Franklin Pierce that the tariff issue "has lost much of its potency" in Pennsylvania. Benjamin Brewster to Edmund Burke, July 19, 1852, Burke MSS; William Bigler to Pierce, June 26, 1852, Pierce MSS.

For evidence that those involved in railroad construction wanted to keep duties on imported rails low, see Alfred Kelley to Thomas Ewing, February 11, 1851, EFP; and Isaac R. Diller to Stephen A. Douglas, February 2, 1853, Douglas MSS.

47. On Congress, see Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 77–84; and Silbey, Shrine of Party, pp. 121–36. On pp. 115–16 of Political Crisis I provide a table showing the decline of indices of disagreement in various state legislatures in the early 1850s. After I wrote that book, Marc Kruman published indices for North Carolina, while my own graduate students generated figures for Louisiana and Wisconsin and a more complete analysis of votes in Kentucky, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Ohio. The changes in the average indices of disagreement in those states on banking and currency, business incorporations and stockholder privileges, and internal improvements were as follows:

State	1848	1849	1850	1851	1852	1853	1854
			Banki	ng and Curi	rency
Louisiana	42.5		69.7		48.8	40.3	39.1
Ohio	71	100	74	77	50		51
Kentucky	30	29	26	22		31
Connecticut	73	67	48	59	69		43
New Hamp.			No Votes	during The	ese Years
N. Carolina					10.1		21.6
Wisconsin	27	40	36	9	36	6	32
		Business Incorporations and Stockholder Liability
Louisiana	59.1				16.3	26.5	26.5
Ohio	38	76.3	54.5	73.8	44.4		53
Kentucky		19	17	12		42
Connecticut			No Votes	during The	ese Years
New Hamp.	36	31	38	47	25	37	44
N. Carolina	54.6
Wisconsin		15	13
		Internal Improvements
Louisiana	30.5		18.7		18.4	32	14.5
Ohio	65	67	59	61	30		33
Kentucky	33	9	41	10		43
Connecticut	31	33				10	67
New Hamp.		55	57	62	13
N. Carolina	41.8		37.9		10		24
Wisconsin	12	20	31	15	22	18	31

These figures can be found in Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 57, 72, 82–84; Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," p. 143; Renda, "The Polity and the Party System"; Ames, "Conflict and Consensus"; Shadle, "Consensus"; Pilkington, "Louisiana House of Representatives."

48. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 113–39; Kentucky Whig platform, enclosed with Leslie Combs to Millard Fillmore, February 26, 1852, MFP-BHS; Washington National Intelligencer, April 17, 1852; the Whig national platform is reprinted in the appendix to Van Deusen, "The Whig Party," pp. 478–79. For Democratic jeers at the Whig retreat on the tariff and confidence that Whigs could no longer use the issue against them, see William V. Pettit to Franklin Pierce, June 5, 1852, William Bigler to Pierce, June 26, 1852, Pierce MSS; Benjamin Brewster to Edmund Burke, July 19, 1852, Burke MSS; and Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 104–05.

49. Nathaniel P. Tallmadge, Jr., to Thomas Corwin, November 7, 1851, Corwin MSS (LC);

Benjamin F. Wade to Caroline Wade, March 15, 1852, Wade MSS; W. H. Garland to Fillmore, February 17, 1852, MFP-BHS.

- 50. Entry for September 24, 1852, in Hayes Diary, pp. 421–22; Charles Barringer to Daniel M. Barringer, February 4, 1853, Barringer MSS.
- 51. William Bigler to Franklin Pierce, June 26, 1852, Pierce MSS; Jabez D. Hammond to William H. Seward, November 12, 1851, Seward MSS (RU); John Van Buren to Francis P. Blair, February 28, 1852, Blair-Lee MSS.
 - 52. On New Jersey, I have used Renda, "Railroads, Revenue, and Reform," pp. 80-86.
- 53. David McDonald to Henry S. Lane, January 17, 1852, (quotation), D. P. Holloway to Lane, February 3, 1852, Lane to Holloway, February 4, 1852, J. L. King et al. to Lane, February 10, 1852, Lane to J. L. King et al., February 15, 1852, Henry Lane MSS (IU). For the actions of the Whig state convention, see John D. Defrees to John J. Crittenden, February 28, 1852, Crittenden MSS (LC); and Schuyler Colfax to William H. Seward, March 5, 1852, Seward MSS (RU). The complaint about Irishmen referred to the provision in Indiana's new constitution that unnaturalized immigrant aliens could vote. Other Indiana Whigs, as we shall see, feared a huge new German vote even more. Whigs' eventual nominee for governor ran almost 20,000 votes behind Wright in October, winning only 43.3 percent of the vote, the Whigs' worst showing since the party's founding.
- 54. John S. Davis to David F. Caldwell, February 19, 1852, Caldwell MSS; John M. Bradford to William H. Seward, March 3, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Alex Brooks to Benedict Lewis, August 22, 1852, Daniel Ullmann MSS. The best general accounts of the prohibition movement in these years are Tyrell, Sobering Up; and Danenbaum, Drink and Disorder.
 - 55. See Table 3 of Holt, Political Crisis, p. 116.
- 56. Robert H. Morris to Hamilton Fish, February 10, 1852, Fish MSS; William J. Rogers to William L. Bigler, October 4, 1852, Bigler MSS.
- 57. The account of Connecticut in this and following paragraphs is based, in part, on Renda, "The Polity and the Party System," pp. 180–84. Roll-call votes involving the slavery issue had produced sharp polarization in the Connecticut legislature in 1850 and would again in 1854, but no votes concerning slavery were held in 1851, 1852, or 1853. Holt, Political Crisis, p. 116.
- 58. Roger Sherman Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, March 13, 1852, Baldwin to Roger Sherman Baldwin, Jr., March 19, 1852, BFP.
- 59. Roger Sherman Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, April 10, 1852, BFP; Hartford Courant, April 10, 1852, quoted in Renda, "The Polity and the Party System," p. 183; see also Renda's regression estimates of voter movement between 1851 and 1852, p. 213.
- 60. After the Whig national convention, where only two of Connecticut's six delegates consistently backed Scott, Baldwin complained that the other four flouted the wishes of most Connecticut Whigs, who preferred Scott. Roger Sherman Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, June 27, 1852, BFP. For the 1852 spring campaign in New Hampshire, see Renda, "Polity and the Party System," pp. 192–96.
- 61. The evidence of immigrant opposition to prohibition is overwhelming, but for a recent examination of German attitudes, see Levine, Spirit of 1848, pp. 90, 141, 143, 245.
- 62. This assertion about low turnout rates among immigrants, which cannot be conclusively proved, rests on the following information. According to the census of 1850, which I reaggregated from manuscript schedules, there were 11,557 white males aged twenty-one or more living in Pittsburgh. Of these, only 4,137 (35.8 percent) were native born or the adult sons of native-born men living at home. Almost 65 percent of the adult male population, that is, was first- or second-generation immigrant. In the presidential election of 1848, when the estimated turnout rate for Pennsylvania as a whole was 77.5 percent, only 5,365 (46.4 percent of the 1850 total) Pittsburghers voted, and turnout was especially low in the wards with the heaviest concentrations of immigrants. Similarly, in the gubernatorial election of 1851, when statewide turnout was 70.7 percent, the total vote in Pittsburgh was only 4304 (37.2 percent of the 1850 total). That discrepancy between city and state turnout rates suggests that, for whatever reason, immigrants voted at lower levels than the native-born. The data on which these estimates are based can be found in Tables 4, 16, and 23 of Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 319–34; and Gienapp, "'Politics Seem to Enter Into Everything," pp. 18–19.

Pittsburgh's exceedingly low turnout level is hard to square with estimates by Robert W. Fogel that during the 1840s already naturalized immigrants voted at the same rates as the total electorate. Yet Fogel's figures also show that in 1848 little more than half of the male immigrants already in the northern workforce by 1840 had even bothered to take out naturalization papers, a stunning index of immigrants' political disinterest. For the northern turnout figures, see the table in Gienapp, pp. 18–19. For Fogel's estimates, see Tables 2 and 3 in Fogel, "Modeling Complex Dynamic Interactions," 16–17.

- 63. My account of the excitement Kossuth engendered rests primarily on Spencer, Kossuth; for contemporary descriptions of his speaking style and public persona, see John P. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, December 20, 1851, copy, Kennedy MSS; Simeon Draper to William H. Seward, December 19, 1851, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 64. Spencer, Kossuth, pp. 53-54.
- 65. Daniel Webster to Edward Everett, November 21, 1851, Webster to Franklin Haven, November 21, 1851, Webster to Abbott Lawrence, December 29, 1851, Edward Everett to Webster, December 9, 1851, Webster MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to John Davis, December 13, 1851, John Davis MSS; John P. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, January 24, 1852, copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 66. William Cullom to William B. Campbell, January 17, 1852, CFP; Philadelphia Public Ledger, January 8, 1852; Henry A. Wise to Edward Everett, December 12, 1851, Everett MSS.
- 67. Gilbert Davis to Millard Fillmore, December 3, 1851, MFP-BHS; B. H. Cheever to Caleb Cushing, December 12, 1851, Cushing MSS; William H. Seward to Thurlow Weed, December 26, 1851, Weed MSS (RU).
- 68. Webster to Franklin Haven, December 23, 1851, Webster MSS; Ben Wade to Caroline Wade, December 10, 1851, Wade MSS; Henry A. Wise to Edward Everett, January 3, 1852, Everett MSS; Alexander Stephens to John J. Crittenden, February 17, 1852, Crittenden MSS (LC); Seward to Weed, December 26, 1851, Weed MSS; Seward to William Schouler, January 12, 1852, Schouler MSS. For southern attitudes toward Kossuth, see Spencer, Kossuth, pp. 95–106. Although a joint resolution welcoming Kossuth to the United States easily passed the House by a vote of 181–16, a later motion to allow Kossuth to address the House met stiffer opposition, 111–56, when most Southerners from both parties opposed it. See Alexander, Sectional Stress, pp. 217, 220.
- 69. Ben Wade to Caroline Wade, December 10, 1852, Wade MSS; Edwin B. Morgan to Seward, January 27, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 70. Walter Cunningham to Seward, December 7, 20, 1851, Henry J. Raymond to Seward, December 8, 1851, William Schouler to Seward, December 20, 1851, Louis Kossuth to Seward, December 21, 1851, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to Weed, December 26, 1851, Weed MSS (RU); Seward to Schouler, January 12, 1852, Schouler MSS; Seward to Home, December 7, 1851, in Seward at Washington, p. 175; Henry A. Wise to Edward Everett, December 31, 1851, Everett MSS. Seward actually invited Kossuth to stay with him when Kossuth reached Washington, but Kossuth declined because his entourage was so large.
- 71. Van Deusen, Seward, pp. 139–40; Frederick Seward to Thurlow Weed, January 31, 1851, Weed MSS (RU); Richard M. Blatchford to Seward, December 13, 1851, Thomas Doremus to Seward, December 15, 1851, Simeon Draper to Seward, December 15, 26, 1851, William Schouler to Seward, January 1, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to Schouler, January 12, 1852, Lewis Campbell to Schouler, January 17, 1852, Schouler MSS.
- 72. Webster to Fillmore, December 30, 1851, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, January 13, 1852, MFP-BHS; Henry A. Wise to Edward Everett, December 31, 1851, January 2, 3, 1852, Everett MSS; John P. Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, January 7, 1852, Kennedy MSS; Spencer, Kossuth, pp. 87–89.
- 73. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, December 20, 1851, January 24, 1852, copies, Kennedy MSS; Webster to Fillmore, January 7, 1852, MFP-BHS; Robert Bird to John M. Clayton, January 12, 1852, Clayton MSS; Spencer, Kossuth, p. 91.
- 74. Seward to Webster, January 10, 1852, Webster MSS; Robert Bird to John M. Clayton, January 12, 1852, Clayton MSS; Isaac Jones to Fillmore, February 9, 1852, MFP-BHS.

- 75. Walter Cunningham to Seward, December 20, 1851, Simeon Draper to Seward, December 26, 1851, William Cooney to Seward, February 16, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Isaac Jones to Millard Fillmore, February 9, 1852 (quotation), MFP-BHS.
- 76. G. G. Wescott to William Bigler, December 22, 1851 (quotation), James Burnside to Bigler, December 27, 1851, Bigler MSS; E. W. H. Ellis to Joseph Wright, March 19, 1852 (quotation), Wright MSS; William Cooney to Seward, February 16, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); on the division between Germans and Irish Catholics in St. Louis, see Frank Blair, Jr., to Francis P. Blair, January 31, 1852, Blair-Lee MSS; and McCormack, Koerner Memoirs, I, p. 582.
- 77. William Schouler to William H. Seward, February 14, 1852, William Cooney to Seward, February 16, March 8, 11 (quotation), 13, 1852, Charles Lee to Seward March 4, 1852, Peter Walker to Seward, March 4, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); James Shields to Charles H. Lanphier, February 6, 1852, Lanphier MSS. Significantly, Shields told Lanphier that, just like Seward, he intended his pro-Irish speeches to balance his courtship of Germans with pro-Kossuth speeches.
 - 78. Lewis Campbell to Schouler, January 17, 1852, Schouler MSS.
- 79. Schouler to Seward, February 14, 1852, Seward MSS; On the nativism of Massachusetts Free Soilers, see Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform."
 - 80. Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," 129-30.
- 81. Robert L. Martin to James Watson Webb, March 12, 1852 (quotation), Webb MSS; see also George F. Lehman to James Buchanan, October 30, 1851 (quotation), Buchanan MSS (HSP); James E. Harvey to John J. Crittenden, November 5, 1851, Crittenden MSS; and James Burnside to William L. Bigler, December 27, 1851, Bigler MSS.
- 82. On the potential revolt of Catholics in Illinois, who were offended by the Democrats' gubernatorial nominee in 1852, see S. Francis to Richard Yates, May 10, 1852, Yates MSS.
- 83. S. C. Stearns to John McLean, April 9, 1852, McLean MSS (LC); for the conversion of Scott's daughter to Catholicism, I have relied on Gienapp, Origins, p. 22. Yet I dissent from Gienapp's otherwise superb account of the 1852 election in that book and in his important essay "Nomination of Winfield Scott." Gienapp argues vigorously that Scott's strategists did not consider seeking the Catholic vote until after the Whig national convention in June; prior to the convention, they counted instead on wooing Free Soil voters in the North by preventing Scott from making any public statement on the Compromise and then running an antislavery campaign. I disagree for two reasons. First, every letter I have quoted or cited above indicating that Whigs hoped Scott would attract Irish and Catholic votes preceded the Whig convention in June. Second, as I show below, I think Gienapp exaggerates Whigs' reliance on the Free Soil vote and their anticipation of running an antislavery campaign if Scott remained silent on the Compromise. Scott's managers' top priority was to reunite northern Whigs by winning the allegiance of pro-Compromise Silver Grays, not wooing Free Soilers. Thus, while they did hope Scott could avoid a commitment on the Compromise, they had no intention of running an anti-Compromise, antislavery campaign if he won the nomination.
- 84. Miller Pennington to Samuel Galloway, January 14, 1851 (quotation), Galloway MSS; Ben Wade to Caroline Wade, February 8, 1852 ("dead dogs"), Wade MSS; Seward to Weed, December 26, 1851, William A. Sackett to Weed, January 30, 1852, James S. Pike to Weed, January 30, 1852, Weed MSS (RU).
- 85. William A. Sackett to Weed, January 30, 1852, Weed MSS (RU); on the expectation that Deep South states with Union parties would not attend the Whig national convention, see Philadelphia Public Ledger, Washington Correspondence, January 14, 1852.
- 86. Philip Greely, Jr., to Seward, March 19, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Webster to Franklin Haven, November 28, 1851, Webster MSS; Seward to Weed, December 26, 1851, Sackett to Weed, January 30, 1852, Pike to Weed, January 30, 1852, Weed MSS (RU). For arguments to Southerners that only Scott could garner the necessary electoral votes, see Truman Smith to Daniel M. Barringer, May 1, 1852, Barringer MSS; and Smith to William B. Campbell, May 15, 1852, CFP.
- 87. Seward to Weed, December 26, 1851, Sackett to Weed, January 30, 1852, Pike to Weed, January 30, 1852, Weed MSS (RU); Cullom to William B. Campbell, December 9, 1851, January 14, 1852 (quotation), Truman Smith to Campbell, May 15, 1852, CFP; T. M. Brewer to William Schouler, January 11, 1852, Charles Russell to Schouler, April 16, 1852, Schouler MSS; see also Edward Stanly's public letter to the Whigs of North Carolina, Washington National Intelligencer, April 8, 1852.

- 88. Lewis Campbell to William Schouler, January 17, 1852, Schouler MSS; Pike to Weed, January 30, 1852, Weed MSS (RU). T. M. Brewer also reported that southern Whigs only asked for some "assurance" that would do northern Whigs "the least possible harm—the simplest assurance from Scott himself that he will let the compromise remain undisturbed and is opposed to the renewal of agitation." Brewer to Schouler, January 11, 1852, Schouler MSS.
- 89. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 229–34; Meredith P. Gentry to William B. Campbell, December 27, 1851, William B. Campbell to David Campbell, February 15, 1852, CFP.
- 90. In saying that the protests of southern Whigs like Gentry—and one might add as well the letters of Silver Grays—have led historians astray into thinking that northern Whigs affiliated with Scott hoped to run an antislavery campaign in 1852, I count myself among the primary offenders. See my mistaken interpretation of Gentry's letter in Political Crisis, pp. 96–97. But I have plenty of company from other able historians. In his analysis of the strategy of Scott's managers in the works cited above, for example, William E. Gienapp argues that securing Free Soil support for Scott was their primary goal, and he strongly implies that they intended to run an openly anti-Compromise., antislavery campaign to get it. See also Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 322–30.
- 91. Regression analysis of New York's voting patterns suggests, for example, that in 1849 Whigs had already picked up slightly less than a fifth of the 1848 Free Soil vote, or 4 percent of the potential electorate, but that in 1851 the same percentage of 1850 Whig voters bolted to the Democrats and others abstained. Altogether in 1851, Whigs lost one-seventh of their 1850 voters or 5 percent of the potential electorate. Kirn, "Third Party System in New York State," Tables IX, XII, pp. 40, 45.

In Ohio, in contrast, few if any Whigs defected to the Democrats after 1848, but about three-eighths of the Whigs who voted for Van Buren in 1848 were abstaining by 1850 and 1851. See Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, Tables 4, 5, 6, pp. 244–46.

After 1848, Massachusetts Whigs had always won a plurality of the popular vote, which would suffice in presidential but not gubernatorial elections. Thus they were confident about carrying the state for Scott if he were the nominee. When Whigs like Philip Greely spoke about attracting Free Soil votes to break up the Coalition, therefore, their eye was on the state election in 1852, not the presidential contest.

- 92. Congressional Globe, 32nd Cong., 1st Sess., p. 9.
- 93. On Delaware see John Allderdice to John M. Clayton, February 25, 1852 (quotation), Clayton MSS; on Indiana, see Schuyler Colfax to Seward, January 27, March 15, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); John D. Defrees to John J. Crittenden, February 28, 1852, Crittenden MSS (LC). The Illinois Whig convention did not officially endorse Scott, and Fillmore had numerous supporters in it. But it chose a solid pro-Scott delegation and imposed a unit rule on it in part because delegates believed Scott shared their pro-Compromise beliefs. Samuel Lisle Smith to Seward, February 4, 19, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); John Moses to Richard Yates, March 28, 1852, Moses Cassell to Yates, April 24, 1852, J. M. Ruggles to Yates, May 3, 1852, Yates MSS.

At the Whig national convention, John Minor Botts would try to convince southern Whigs that Scott favored finality by pointing to Scott's endorsement of the pro-Compromise New Jersey state platform of 1852.

- 94. John Davis to William Schouler, February 5, 1852, Schouler MSS; Winthrop to Crittenden, May 13, 1852, Crittenden MSS (LC); Truman Smith to Daniel M. Barringer, May 1, 1852, Barringer MSS; Smith to William B. Campbell, May 15, 1852, CFP. Smith sent the same assurances to John Wilson in California even before Congress assembled: "The idea is now disseminated all over the slave states that Genl. Scott is disposed to sympathize with the abolitionists or at least that he is regarded by them with favor. But this is utterly false—I speak as of my own knowledge." Smith to Wilson, October 14, 1851, Wilson MSS.
- 95. William Schouler to Seward, December 20, 1851 (quotation), Joshua R. Giddings to Joseph A. Giddings, June 10, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to Weed, December 26, 1851, Weed MSS (RU); Robert G. Campbell to Fillmore, January 5, 1852, MFP-BHS.

- 96. Thompson to Fillmore, May 12, 1852, MFP-BHS; Colfax to Seward, March 15, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 97. E. A. Stansbury to George W. Julian, September 7, 1851, Giddings-Julian MSS.
- 98. Anthony C. Brown to Seward, February 25, 1852, Philip Greely, Jr., to Seward, March 1, 1852, Alvah Hunt to Seward, March 17, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Lewis Campbell to William Schouler, January 17, March 5, 1852, Schouler MSS; Ben Wade to Caroline Wade, December 10, 1851, February 8, 1852, Wade MSS.
- 99. Schuyler Colfax to Seward, January 27, March 15, April 2, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to William Schouler, January 12, 1852; Schouler MSS; William Cullom to William B. Campbell, December 9, 1851, CFP; James E. Harvey to John M. Clayton, February 15, 1852, Clayton MSS.
- 100. Ben Wade to Caroline Wade, February 8, 1852, Wade MSS; James E. Harvey to John M. Clayton, February 15, 1852, Clayton MSS; Cullom to William B. Campbell, February 26, 1852, CFP; Lew Campbell to William Schouler, March 5, 1852, Schouler MSS; Colfax to Seward, March 15, April 2, 1852, Seward MSS (RU). The text of Colfax's proposed letter for Scott accompanies his March 15 letter. It was cleverly phrased to leave open the loophole that Congress might revise the fugitive slave law.
- 101. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, February 15, 1852, Christopher H. Williams to William B. Campbell, February 19, April 27, 1852, William Cullom to Campbell, February 26, 1852, Meredith Gentry to Campbell, March 24, 1852, CFP; William Cullom to Robert L. Caruthers, March 14, 1852, Caruthers MSS; Andrew Johnson to David T. Patterson, April 4, 1852, in Johnson Papers, pp. 30–31.
- 102. Campbell to William Schouler, March 5, 1852, Schouler MSS; E. C. Cabell to Daniel M. Barringer, March 14, 1852, Barringer MSS.
- 103. Simeon Draper to Seward, March 3, 1852, Philip Greely, Jr., to Seward, March 2, 1852, James Forsyth to Seward, March 4, 1852, Washington Hunt to Seward, April 4, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Meredith Gentry to William B. Campbell, March 24, 1852, CFP.
- 104. Washington National Intelligencer, April 8, 1852; Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 235; Alexander, Sectional Stress, p. 218.
- 105. G. A. Tavener to Daniel Webster, April 8, 1852, Webster MSS; Marshall quoted in Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 235.
 - 106. New York Tribune, April 12, 1850; New York Times, April 12, 1852.
 - 107. New York Tribune, April 10, 1852.
- 108. Washington Union, April 14, 1852. This issue of the Union for Wednesday is misdated April 10. The 10th was a Saturday.
- 109. New York Times, April 14, 20, 1852; Washington National Intelligencer, April 17, 1852; Charles Russell to William Schouler, April 16, 1852, Schouler MSS.
- 110. Greely to Seward, April 14, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Truman Smith to John Wilson, April 12, 1852, Wilson MSS.
- 111. My account of the Whig caucus is based on the reports in the Washington Union, April 23, 1852, and the New York Times, April 22, 1852. The Union attributed its account to the report James Harvey had made to the Philadelphia North American and to other reports to the Baltimore Sun. These accounts, as usual, differed about the total number of men initially in attendance and about how many Southerners, eleven or seventeen, withdrew.
 - 112. Washington Union, April 23, 1852.
- 113. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 239–40; Oran Follett to Millard Fillmore, April 27, 1852, MFP-BHS; Fillmore to Oran Follett, May 3, 1852 (microfilm edition of the Fillmore Papers).
- 114. Philip Greely, Jr., to Seward, May 22, 27, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Edward Stanly to William Schouler, May 10, 1852, John Minor Botts to Schouler, May 19, 1852, Schouler MSS; Philip Greely, Jr., to James S. Pike, May 15, 27, 1852, Horace Greeley to Pike, May 29, 1852, June 13, 1852, Pike MSS; Truman Smith to Daniel M. Barringer, May 1, 1852, Barringer MSS; Smith to William B. Campbell, May 15, 1852, CFP.

The letter Greeley ultimately prepared was enclosed with his letter to Pike on June 13 and dated June 20, so that Scott could issue it after he won the nomination. The letter itself was preposterously verbose and windy, worse than anything the foot-in-mouth Scott could have written.

- 115. Edward Stanly to William Schouler, May 10, 1852, John Minor Botts to Schouler, May 19, 1852, Schouler MSS; Philip Greely, Jr., to James S. Pike, May 15, 1852, Pike MSS. Botts' public letter was dated May 3, the day he said he spoke with Scott, and appeared in the Richmond Whig on May 11. Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 243.
- 116. Philip Greely, Jr., to James S. Pike, May 3 (quotation), May 15, 1852, Charles A. Dana to Pike, May 15, 1852, Pike MSS; Seth C. Hawley to Seward, June 4, 1852 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Israel Washburn, Jr., to William Schouler, May 5, 1852 (quotation), John Minor Botts to Schouler, May 19, 1852, Schouler MSS; William H. Seward to Wife, June 2, 4, 1852, in Seward at Washington, pp. 183–84.
- 117. Campbell to Schouler, March 5, 1852, Schouler MSS. As in 1848, most southern states chose all the district delegates at state conventions. For the multiple representation of southern states, which in effect gave each delegate only a fraction of one vote, see the debates at the convention, New York Times, June 17–23, 1852.
- 118. William C. Dawson to Fillmore, March 15, 1852, Arthur F. Hopkins to Fillmore, March 3, 1852, MFP-BHS; Hopkins to William A. Graham, April 6, 1852, in Graham Papers, IV, pp. 283–87.
- 119. Charles C. Raboteau to David F. Caldwell, March 17, 27, 1852, Caldwell MSS; resolutions of Buncombe and Henderson County meetings, with Marcus Erwin to Thomas Clingman, April 16, 1852, Clingman-Puryear MSS; John H. Bryan to William A. Graham, April 5, 1852, in Graham Papers, IV, pp. 280–81.
- 120. William A. Graham to James W. Bryan, April 17, 1852, James W. Osborne to William A. Graham, May 26, 1852, in Graham Papers, IV, pp. 290, 302–04; Webster to ?, April 13, 1852, Webster to James L. Pettigru, June 5, 1852, George Abbot to Webster, May 15, 1852, Webster MSS; Arthur F. Hopkins to Fillmore, April 22, 1852, Henry Hilliard to Fillmore, June 1, 1852, George S. Bryan to Fillmore, June 3, 1852, MFP-BHS; Joseph G. Baldwin to Alexander H. H. Stuart, April 16, 1852, Stuart MSS (LC); Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 241.
- 121. The District of Columbia was allowed to send a delegation to the convention, but according to newspaper accounts, they did not vote in roll calls on the nominee. The total number of votes at the convention was 296, but since some southern states sent three or more men to represent each congressional district, the total number of accredited delegates was considerably larger.
- 122. S. Lisle Smith to William H. Seward, February 19, 1852, Philip Greely, Jr., to Seward, March 19, May 22, 27, 1852, D. S. Palmer to Seward, March 31, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); S. Lisle Smith to Elihu B. Washburne, February 20, 1852, Washburne MSS (LC); James Kidd to Millard Fillmore, February 27, 1852, MFP-BHS.
- 123. Daniel Webster to Franklin Haven, February 6, 1852, Charles J. Lanman to Webster, March 4, 1852, Webster MSS; John O. Charles to Fillmore, May 8, 1852, W. Channing Gibbs to Fillmore, June 4, 1852, MFP-BHS.
- 124. I have found no explicit complaints about the district system that split northern anti-Taylor Whigs in 1848, but the procedural changes that Scott majorities rammed through in several states certainly suggest that they had learned a lesson in 1848.
- 125. Jacob Howard to William H. Seward, September 17, 1851, Henry Barns to Seward, October 2, December 4, 1851, Seward MSS (RU).
- 126. D. W. C. Clarke to William Schouler, December 16, 1851 (quotation), Schouler MSS; Thomas Hale to Millard Fillmore, April 23, 1852 (quotation), MFP-BHS; Harry B. Stacy to Porteas Baxter, June 11, 1852, Justin Morrill MSS.
- 127. Samuel Lisle Smith to Seward, February 4, 19, 1852, Schuyler Colfax to Seward, March 15, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); John S. Butterfield to Fillmore, June 2, 1852, MFP-BHS; Lew Campbell to William Schouler, March 5, 1852, Schouler MSS; William Pennington to Daniel Webster, June 28, 1852, Webster MSS; New York Herald, June 3, 19, 1852.
- 128. John H. Bryant to Fillmore, March 18, 1852, P. L. Ellmaker to Fillmore, March 26, 1852, George W. Knight to Fillmore, April 7, 1852, MFP-BHS; Charles March to Webster, April 8, 1852, Webster MSS; Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 194, Pittsburgh Commercial Advertiser, May 3, 1852, quoted in Mueller, pp. 195–96; the Whig platform can be found in the Pittsburgh Gazette, March 30, 1852.

- 129. The battles in individual congressional districts can be traced in numerous letters in the Seward and Fillmore Papers. George R. Babcock, Fillmore's ally from Buffalo, who represented the Erie County district at the national convention, promised to attend a meeting of all the state's delegates on June 11, 1852, in New York City, where disputes over seats would be addressed. But he wisely urged Fillmore to let the national convention, where Fillmore's strength would be significantly greater than in this New York meeting, decide these disputes. Babcock to Fillmore, June 3, 1852, MFP-BHS.
- 130. Daniel Ullmann to N. K. Hall, January 27, 1852, R. C. Wetmore, James Price, and Daniel Ullmann to Fillmore, March 6, 1852, Ullmann MSS; Hugh Maxwell to Fillmore, March 6, 1852, Thomas Foote to Fillmore, March 18, 1852, John O. Charles to Fillmore, May 8, 1852, MFP-BHS; James Watson Webb to Daniel Webster, February 8, 1852, Charles March to Webster, April 12, 1852, Webster MSS; Simeon Draper to Seward, March 9, 1852, James Bowen to Seward, March 11, 1852 (quotation), James Kelly to Seward, April 10, 1852, Horace Greeley to Seward April 20, 1852, C. A. Stetson to Seward, May 13, 1852, Seward MSS (RU). For the credentials fights at the national convention, see New York Times, June 19, 1852.
- 131. For the maneuvering prior to, and the decisions of, the Whig legislative caucus, see James R. Thompson to Millard Fillmore, March 29, 30, 1852, MFP-BHS; Henry J. Raymond to William H. Seward, March 15, 27, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); New York Times, April 10, 13, 1852. For reports of the meeting of delegates in New York City stating that "the feeling between the Fillmore and Scott men was very bitter," see the New York Herald, June 12, 1852. Despite an anti-Whig bias, issues of the Herald for May and June also carry helpful accounts of battles over delegates in individual congressional districts.
- 132. Horace Greeley to Seward, April 20, 1852, Seward MSS; George Evans to William Pitt Fessenden, May 22, 1852, Fessenden MSS (WRHS); Philip Greely, Jr., to James Pike, June 4, 1852, John Otis to Pike, June 5, 1852, Pike MSS. Maine's Whig state convention met on June 3 and chose Evans and Fessenden as at-large delegates, as well as the delegates from the first and third congressional districts. The other five districts chose delegates on their own earlier; Pike represented the seventh district. New York Herald, June 4, 1852. The delegation would unanimously favor Scott, the only New England delegation to do so.
- 133. Webster to ?, April 13, 1852, Webster to James L. Pettigru, June 5, 1852, Charles Morehead to Webster, June 11, 1852, Webster to Humphrey Marshall, June 15, 1852, Webster to Richard M. Blatchford, June 22, 1852, Webster MSS.
- 134. Christopher Williams to William B. Campbell, June 3, 1852, CFP; William H. Seward to Wife, June 17, 1852, in Seward at Washington, p. 186; Cabell's speech is quoted in Doherty, Whigs of Florida, p. 53.
- 135. Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 245; New York Times, June 17, 1852; New York Herald, June 17, 1852.
- 136. Fillmore to President of the Whig National Convention, June 10, 1852, draft, Fillmore to George Babcock, June 12, 1852, copy, MFP-O.
- 137. John Barney to Fillmore, June 11, 1852, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, June 11, 1852, E. R. Jewett to Fillmore, June 12, 1852, MFP-BHS. Fillmore told Babcock to keep his letter absolutely secret, and he made no reference in the June 10 or June 12 letter to endorsing Webster. Barney, therefore, must have referred to something Fillmore said, not anything he wrote.
- 138. Barney to Fillmore, June 11, 1852, MFP-BHS; Seward to Wife, June 2, 4, 6, 10, 17, 1852, in Seward at Washington, pp. 183–86; Horace Greeley to James S. Pike, June 13, 1852, Pike MSS.
 - 139. Holt, "Democratic Party," p. 559.
- 140. Unless otherwise noted, all information on the convention proceedings is taken from the New York Times, June 17–23, 1852, and the New York Herald for the same dates. Most secondary accounts have focused primarily on the balloting for president and to a lesser extent the adoption of a platform, and they have largely ignored the three days of bickering that preceded the presentation of a platform. See, for example, Dalzell, Webster, pp. 259–77; Rayback, Fillmore, pp. 354–63; and Gienapp, "Nomination of Winfield Scott," 408–09. For the Whig party as an institution, however, the first three days were as just as important as the ballots on which most historians have focused. Happily, they are treated seriously in Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 245–49, additional testimony to the enduring value of that now eighty-year-old work. Still, my account must give them proper due, and its length reflects the convention's lasting significance.

- 141. Virginia, for example, sent forty-five accredited delegates to cast its fifteen votes. The exception to this pattern of overrepresentation was South Carolina, which had no organized Whig party; only four men claimed the right to cast its eight votes.
- 142. Maine apparently did not vote on this resolution; at least, newspaper accounts did not record a vote by Maine.
- 143. The report in the New York Times, June 18, 1852, listed all eight of Maryland's votes against, while the report of the New York Herald for the same day said that all eight Maryland delegates voted in favor. I assume there was an error in transcription at the Herald office, for the only way to arrive at the total of 144 negative votes on which both papers agreed was to count Maryland as against.
 - 144. For the North I rely on the fuller vote totals in the Herald.
- 145. John Barney to Fillmore, June 17, 1852, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, June 18, 1852, MFP-BHS; see also Raymond's report to the New York Times, June 18, 1852. The basis for Barney's calculations is unclear; perhaps he simply subtracted the six Missouri, four Iowa, and two other votes from the total supporting Jessup's amendment to arrive at the Scott vote. But he wrote before the critical credentials committee reported.
- 146. Despite the questionable proceedings in Pennsylvania, the credentials committee apparently considered nothing other than challenges in New York and Vermont and the propriety of admitting a nonvoting delegation from the District of Columbia.
- 147. Technically, of course, the mover of an amendment cannot withdraw it, if it has been adopted, without another vote. Jessup did not refer to the amended Duncan resolution, but rather to his motion to attach the same amendment to a substitute resolution offered by a Maryland delegate. Since that motion had not yet been voted on, he could do it alone, and the substitute motion, which provided for the one-state, one-vote formula, was adopted in place of the amended Duncan resolution. The northern majority that had adopted Jessup's amendment acquiesced, therefore, by not attempting to introduce something like Jessup's amendment themselves when he withdrew it, a fact commented on specifically by the Herald's correspondent in his report appearing in the June 19 issue.
- 148. Aside from the reports in the June 19 issues of the Herald and the Times, see New York Herald, June 4, 1852; Henry B. Stacy to Porteas Baxter, June 11, 1852, Justin Morrill MSS; Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, June 18, 1852, MFP-BHS.
- 149. The disputes over these individual districts can be followed in the reports in the New York Herald for May and June 1852. But the case involving Raymond, which ignited the convention's most vitriolic debate, requires explanation, for it involved the twenty-second congressional district from the northern part of the state bordering on Lake Ontario, while Raymond lived in New York City. Two men, a Silver Gray named Richardson and a Scott man named Bruce, claimed to represent the district after the two sides tied at the district convention. Both came to Baltimore, but Bruce became sick after the first day (probably because of too much strong drink, if the Herald's reporter can be believed), and he went home. Before he left, Bruce signed a blank proxy and told the chairman of the pro-Scott state delegation to fill in the name that would go before the credentials committee. After two New York Whigs turned down the request to substitute for Bruce, the chairman (probably Simeon Draper, although it is unclear from the reports) approached Raymond, who had come to the convention not as a delegate but to report the proceedings to his newspaper. Raymond agreed to serve, the chairman wrote in Raymond's name, and the proxy was submitted to the credentials committee along with Richardson's claim.

The soap opera did not end there. While its chairman, a Virginian named Watts, was out of the room on Thursday night, the committee agreed to seat both Richardson and Raymond. Watts found this decision so outrageous—he later said Raymond had no more right to represent the twenty-second district than he did to represent California and that neither man had proper credentials—that when he read the committee report on Friday morning, he apparently omitted any reference whatsoever to the disputed twenty-second district, causing both Richardson and Raymond to demand to know who had the right to speak and vote for the district. I say "apparently," for the newspaper reports are unclear as to exactly which portions of the report Watts read, but Richardson's anger was just as evident as Raymond's. See New York Times, June 19, 22, and especially 23, 1852. On the deadlock at the convention in the twenty-second district itself, see the New York Herald, May 15, 1852.

- 150. For grammatical reasons, I have changed the participial form "impairing" in the platform to "impair." Aside from minor changes in the prelude to the platform, the one significant change from the southern caucus' platform occurred in the Compromise plank and constituted a small concession to Northerners. The Southerners' platform singled out the Fugitive Slave Act a second time, thereby highlighting its importance. "And so far as the Fugitive Slave Law is concerned," it read, "we will maintain the same, and insist on its strict enforcement." The committee's platform deleted this second specific reference to the fugitive law and referred to all the Compromise measures when it said that "we shall maintain them and insist upon their enforcement." The two documents can be found in New York Times, June 17, 19, 1852.
- 151. Francis Pulszky to Seward, June 20, 1852, Seward MSS (RU). This letter is misdated June 2 by the staff of the Rush Rhees Library, but obviously it could not have been written until after the platform was adopted.
 - 152. See, for example, Johnson, National Party Platforms, p. 20.
- 153. Recall that a major Whig argument against the Walker Tariff in 1846 had been the absence of specific duties; that Webster, as Ashmun well knew, in trying to arrange a compromise to stop passage of the Walker bill in 1846, had sought above all to protect specific duties even if at lower rates; that Treasury Secretary William Meredith had stressed the need for specific rates in his widely admired report in December 1849; and that Fillmore himself had repeated that emphasis in his December 1850 annual message.
- 154. The account of Botts' speech is much fuller in the Herald than in the Times, although the Herald was especially contemptuous of Botts' supposed blunder.
- 155. James S. Pike to Seward, June 16, 1852, Seward MSS (RU). Pike referred to the letter that Horace Greeley had written on May 29 for Scott to issue after he got the nomination and that he had mailed to Pike on June 13. It contained such a paragraph, and it can be found in the Pike MSS with Greeley to Pike, June 13, 1852. Despite Pike's letter, the evidence I cited earlier clearly indicates that many Scott delegates were eager to conciliate Southerners.
- 156. Most secondary accounts list the vote as 227–66 but do not make clear the source of that total. The embarrassed New York Times, in an obvious attempt to keep from New York's Whigs the extent of northern capitulation, gave no figures at all in its issue for June 19. The New York Herald for that date lists the total as 226–66 and gives the breakdown for each state, but its figures add up only by including California's 4 votes with the majority rather than with the opposition, as the Herald lists them.
- 157. Seward to Wife, June 18, 1852, in Seward at Washington, pp. 187–88; Gienapp, "Nomination of Winfield Scott," 408. Seward's belief that northern Scott delegates had collapsed before southern intimidation raises additional questions about Pike's assertion that they had to be forced to support the platform.
- 158. Jones' speech is quoted in the June 19 issue of the Herald and is omitted from the Times report that day.
- 159. John Barney to Millard Fillmore, June 17, 18, 19, 20, 1852, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, June 18, 1852, B. M. Edney to Fillmore, June 20, 1852, MFP-BHS; Webster to Daniel Jenifer, June 19, 1852, Webster MSS.
- 160. Elihu B. Washburne to Algernon Sydney Washburn, June 19, 1852, A. S. Washburn MSS; John Barney to Fillmore, June 20, 1852, B. M. Edney to Fillmore, June 20, 1852, MFP-BHS; Webster to ?, June 20, 1852, Webster MSS; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 269–73.
 - 161. On Webster's surly mood, see Dalzell, Webster, p. 272.
 - 162. Webster to Fillmore, June 21, 1852, Fillmore to Webster, June 21, 1852, MFP-BHS.
 - 163. Granger to Fillmore, June 30, 1852, MFP-BHS.
 - 164. During Saturday's long session, a clerk from James Watson Webb's New York Courier and Enquirer had telegraphed him and Moses Grinnell that he had seen Raymond's telegraphic dispatch to the New York Times, in which Raymond charged that if Southerners did not vote for Scott after Scott men voted for the platform, it would be "a breach of faith." This telegram fell into the hands of Southerners, who interrupted the balloting on Saturday to read it and charge that Raymond had accused Southerners on the platform committee of making a corrupt bargain to support Scott. This outrageously false accusation, charged a Georgian on Monday, justified Raymond's expulsion. Raymond demanded the floor to defend himself, and there then ensued a long but exceedingly informative debate involving Raymond, Georgians, Cabell, Grinnell, Duncan of Louisiana, who read the telegram to the convention on Saturday, the Virginia chairman of the credentials committee, and members of the platform committee that, among other things, contains the fullest account of how Raymond was named a delegate and what the credentials committee did with his case. Raymond acquitted himself well, and the convention ultimately tabled the motion to expel by voice vote. New York Times, June 22, 23, 1852.

- 165. After the convention W. Channing Gibbs wrote Fillmore that Cranston had betrayed Rhode Island's Whigs by the way he voted at Baltimore. Gibbs to Fillmore, June 30, 1852, MFP-BHS.
- 166. My state-by-state breakdown of the vote and the switches between the first and last ballots is taken from the account in the New York Times. It lists Scott's total as 158, but the individual state votes for him add up to 157.
- 167. Reports of the convention do not identify who cast individual ballots; I have inferred that Grinnell and Draper cast the two Webster votes from New York on the first ballot and that Grinnell stuck by him, as he pledged, at two caucuses of the Webster men.
- 168. With eight votes in Scott's column on the final ballot, Virginia, Scott's native state, was the only slave state aside from Delaware to give him the majority of its votes.
 - 169. Pike to Seward, June 16, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 170. Recall that Webster urged Fillmore to appoint Bates as secretary of war in July 1850 because Bates was considered a Westerner, not a Southerner. Bates got every vote from Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Arkansas. Massachusetts also gave all thirteen of its votes to Bates, evidence that may support the case of some contemporaries and historians that Massachusetts men really wanted Scott nominated even if they stuck with Webster. See, for example, Dalzell, Webster, pp. 274–77.
- 171. For the wonderful "Tar and Feathers" label, see John P. Kennedy to John Morris, July 4, 1852, copy, Kennedy MSS.
 - 172. Charles A. Dana to James S. Pike, June 21, 1852, Pike MSS.

CHAPTER 20

- 1. Charles Gayarre to John F. H. Claiborne, June 29, 1852, William L. Bigler to Franklin Pierce, June 26, 1852, Pierce MSS; Andrew Johnson to Sam Milligan, July 20, 1852, in Johnson Papers, pp. 67–70.
 - 2. New York Tribune, June 21, 1852.
 - 3. E. C. Cabell to Daniel M. Barringer, July 10, 1852, Barringer MSS.
- 4. Charles A. Dana to James S. Pike, June 21, 1852, Pike MSS; Benjamin Wade to Caroline Wade, July 2, 1852, Wade MSS. I have pieced together this list from correspondence in various manuscript collections, especially the Seward Papers.
- 5. Henry C. Carey to John O. Sargent, July 2, 1852, Sargent MSS; W. Channing Gibbs to Millard Fillmore, June 30, 1852, George R. Babcock to Fillmore, July 15, 1852, MFP-BHS; Elliott, Scott, p. 631.
- 6. Elliott, Scott, p. 628; William H. Seward to Frances Seward, August 7, 1852, in Seward at Washington, p. 191.
- 7. William B. Campbell to William Cullom, June 26, 1852, copy, CFP. For an example of a hard-liner angered by Jones' action, see Lewis D. Campbell to William Schouler, July 6, 1852, Schouler MSS.
 - 8. Scott's letter, for example, was first printed in the New York Times on June 30, 1852.
- 9. Benjamin F. Wade to Caroline Wade, June 30, 1852, Wade MSS. Elliott, Scott, p. 625, asserts that the forthrightness, naiveté, and clumsy prose of the letter indicate that neither Seward nor any other Scott manager wrote it.

- 10. New York Times, June 30, 1852. In a letter Schuyler Colfax prepared months before the Whig convention for Scott to issue to reassure Southerners, he had explicitly left open the possibility that Scott would approve any attempt to revise the fugitive slave law. This insistence was common among Scott's northern supporters. Schuyler Colfax to William H. Seward, March 15, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 11. Horace Greeley to James S. Pike, May 29, June 13, 1852, Pike MSS. The letter, dated June 20 by Greeley because he thought the convention would be over by then, is filed with his June 13 letter, but Pike dates it May 29 on the back. We may never know who the two authors to whom Wade alluded were, but my guess is James Pike and Lew Campbell.
- 12. Greeley to Pike, June 13, 1852 (quotation), Pike MSS; Greeley to Seward, June 13, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, June 13, 1852, Greeley-Colfax MSS.
- 13. In its editorial commentary on Scott's letter in the June 30, 1852, issue, the New York Times implicitly noted the omission of a flat call for free land by arguing that the important point was to encourage early settlement favorable to actual settlers. "We hail the introduction of this principle into the creed of the great Whig party as a first step towards a new and beneficent policy in regard to the Public Lands."
- 14. New York Times, June 30, 1852; for Democratic uses of the earlier letters before and immediately after the convention, see Daniel M. Haskell to William H. Seward, June 7, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); and Albany Argus, June 25, 1852; for Greeley's admission that the earlier letters were damaging, see Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, July 15, 1852, Greeley-Colfax MSS. For Whigs' recognition that they must conciliate Germans offended by the platform, see Charles A. Dana to James S. Pike, June 21, 1852, Pike MSS; and Seth Hawley to William H. Seward, June 26, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).

One additional phrase in the acceptance letter hints that others besides Scott wrote it and helps resolve disagreements among historians about what occurred at the Whig convention itself. One reason northern Whigs were so appalled by Scott's statement, which James Jones read on June 21, was that they knew that if Scott committed himself to a pro-Compromise platform prior to the nomination itself, he would be seen as capitulating to southern pressure and accordingly weakened in the North. Jones read the letter as being dated Sunday, June 20, and newspaper accounts like that in the New York Times on June 22 printed that as the date of Scott's message, which was clearly worded in anticipation of a possible nomination: "I will accept the nomination, if tendered to me, with the Platform laid down by the Convention." Since no one at the convention saw the note in Jones' hands and since he spoke some minutes after the final ballot ended (how long after is impossible to determine from newspaper accounts), Scott's Washington managers saw a chance to rectify even this potential embarrassment by postdating Scott's letter to Monday, June 21, after he learned of his nomination. Thus the acceptance letter declared: "Not having written a word to procure this distinction, I lost not a moment after it had been conferred in addressing a letter to one of your members, to signify what would be, at the proper time, the substance of my reply to the Convention." For historians' disagreements about the date of Scott's note to Jones, compare Gienapp, Origins, p. 19, with Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 254-58.

- 15. New York Times, June 30, 1852.
- 16. Nichols, Pierce, p. 206; James Dew to Franklin Pierce, July 14, 1852, Pierce MSS.
- 17. Truman Smith to John Wilson, October 7, 1852, Wilson MSS.
- 18. B. F. Johnson to Elihu B. Washburne, September 16, 1852 (quotation), Washburne MSS (LC); Henry Wilson to Seward, July 8, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); George B. Loring to Caleb Cushing, July 19, September 24, 1852, Cushing MSS; Benjamin Bristow to Franklin Pierce, July 28, 1852, Pierce MSS.
- 19. On Pierce's misfortunes in Mexico, see Nichols, Pierce, pp. 161–66; on Southerners' cult of honor, which made any hint of cowardice so damaging, see Wyatt-Brown, Southern Honor, and Ayers, Vengeance and Justice.
- 20. Elliott, Scott, pp. 629–30, with quotation from "The Crisis" of Quitman's speech; Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 267–68.
- 21. B. B. French to Franklin Pierce, June 27, 1852, James G. Fitzgerald to Pierce, July 20, 1852, Pierce MSS; Henry A. Wise to James Buchanan, July 20, 1852, Buchanan MSS (HSP); Thomas Bragg to John Bragg, July 11, 1852, Bragg MSS; B. F. Dill to Charles D. Fontaine, July

- 6, 1852, Fontaine MSS; A. G. Penn to John F. H. Claiborne, June 25, 1852, John Slidell to Claiborne, July 6, 1852, Claiborne MSS.
- 22. Richmond Enquirer, September 7, 1852, quoted in Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 336–37. Cooper's account of the election in the South, pp. 327–41, is most valuable.
- 23. The card appeared on July 5, 1852. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 259–60; Elliott, Scott, pp. 627–38; Christopher Williams to William B. Campbell, June 3, 1852, Meredith Gentry to William B. Campbell, July 1852, CFP; Cabell to Daniel M. Barringer, July 10, 1852, Barringer MSS.
- 24. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 261–68; Henry Hilliard to Millard Fillmore, August 3, 11, 1852, MFP-BHS; Daniel Webster to Fillmore, July 25, 1852, Webster MSS; John Clemens to Franklin Pierce, September 24, 1852, Pierce MSS; John Barnes to John Bragg, July 22, 1852, F. S. Lyon to Bragg, July 27, 1852, Bragg MSS.
 - 25. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 263-69.
- 26. Ibid., pp. 263–65. The first quotation is from the Milledgeville Southern Recorder, quoted on p. 265; Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 166–67; J. R. Sneed to Alexander H. Stephens, July 13, 1852 (second quotation), Stephens MSS (LC). For some Whigs' intention to vote for Pierce, see W. W. Wigins to A. W. Venable, July 17, 1852, and Herschel V. Johnson to Franklin Pierce, July 21, 1852, Pierce MSS.
- 27. The quotation, apparently from a public letter by Stephens, is in the Milledegeville Southern Recorder, July 13, 1852, quoted in Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, p. 166; John L. Stephens to Daniel Webster, August 3, 1852, Webster MSS; George R. Curtis to Alexander H. Stephens, August 13, 1852, Stephens MSS (LC); Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, August 23, 1852, copy, Winthrop MSS; William H. Seward to William Schouler, August 22, 1852, Schouler MSS. On Webster's bitterness and determination to vote for Pierce, see Dalzell, Webster, pp. 278–304; and George S. Bryan to John Pendleton Kennedy, September 25, 1852, Kennedy MSS. Bryan, a delegate to the Baltimore convention from South Carolina, spoke with Webster in Washington on his way back to Charleston.
- 28. This paragraph is based on Doherty, Whigs of Florida, pp. 51–55, and Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 269.
- 29. Jacksonville News, quoted in Doherty, Whigs of Florida, p. 55. Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 328–29, points out that virtually all southern Whigs stressed the platform and Scott's commitment to it.
- 30. Richmond Whig, June 30, 1852, quoted in Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 261; Richard Pindell to William H. Seward, April 28, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Lewis D. Campbell to William Schouler, July 6, 1852, Schouler MSS. In North Carolina, Whig papers affiliated with the dissidents Clingman and Rayner, the Ashville News and Wilmington Commercial, continued to oppose Scott, but for evidence that the majority of Whigs supported the Scott-Graham ticket, see Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 133–35. While Humphrey Marshall, unlike some other southern Whigs, did not openly denounce Scott, he was clearly crestfallen at the result. He resigned his House seat on August 4, 1852, before the session ended, and temporarily ceased all political activity.
- 31. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 261–63; John Bell to ?, July 13, 1852, Bell to ?, July 31, 1852, drafts, John Bell MSS; Andrew Johnson to David T. Patterson, July 15, 1852, in Johnson Papers, pp. 65–66.
- 32. Andrew Johnson to Sam Milligan, July 20, 1852, in Johnson Papers, pp. 67–70; William B. Campbell to William Cullom, June 26, 1852, and to David Campbell, June 29, July 29, August 17, 1852, CFP.
- 33. As usual, all data on state and congressional elections are calculated from the returns in the Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections and Burnham's figures on the partisan share of state legislative seats supplied by the University of Michigan's Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research.
- 34. David F. Caldwell to John Kerr, June 14, 1852, draft, Seaton Caldwell to David F. Caldwell, Caldwell MSS; Thomas Bragg to John Bragg, July 3, 11, 1852, Bragg MSS; David L. Swain to William A. Graham, July 6, 1852, Samuel F. Patterson to Graham, September 2, 1852 (quotation), in Graham Papers, IV, pp. 341–42, 385–88; Thomas L. Clingman to J. F. E. Hardy, July 18, 1852, draft, Clingman-Puryear MSS. For an expert account of the 1852 state election, see Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 96–100. My assertion that almost one-tenth of previous Whig voters abstained is based on a regression estimate in McFaden, "Sections, Slaveholders, and Safe Concessions," p. 14.

Whigs' share of seats in the lower house of the state legislature changed from 54 percent in 1846 to 50 percent in 1848 to 46 percent in 1850 to 52 percent in 1852. Whereas Democrats controlled the senate twenty-seven to twenty-three after the 1850 elections, their margin increased to twenty-eight to twenty-two in 1852.

- 35. G. B. McGudry to Samuel F. Patterson, September 20, 1852, Patterson MSS; Truman Smith to Thurlow Weed, August 21, 1852, Weed MSS (RU).
- 36. B. H. Shepperd to William H. Seward, September 2, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); John Campbell to William B. Campbell, September 10, 1852, CFP.
- 37. Wyndham Robertson to James Buchanan, November 8, 1852, Buchanan MSS (HSP); Pilkington, "Louisiana House of Representatives," pp. 11–19.

The Louisiana constitution of 1852 changed the basis of legislative apportionment from qualified white voters to total population, white and black. Since the size of the house and senate remained the same, this change forced a reapportionment to increase the representation of plantation areas with heavy slave populations. Whiggish sugar planting regions obviously benefited from this change, as did Democratic cotton regions, but New Orleans would see its legislative delegation reduced in size. In addition, by allowing resident aliens to vote immediately upon naturalization, rather than requiring a two-year delay after naturalization, as did the 1845 constitution, the 1852 document most likely increased the size of the Democratic vote in New Orleans.

- 38. Truman Smith to John Wilson, October 7, 1852, Wilson MSS; for other overly optimistic reports from the national committee about Whig prospects in the South, see Fitz Henry Warren to William H. Seward, September 28, 1852, Arthur W. Fletcher to Seward, September 28, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 39. Roger Sherman Baldwin to Roger Sherman Baldwin, Jr., July 19, 1852, BFP; B. Thompson to Daniel Ullmann, June 26, 1852 (quotation), Ullmann MSS; L. S. Geyer to Elihu B. Washburne, July 11, 1852, Washburne Papers (LC); A. P. Stinson to William H. Seward, July 12, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Joseph K. Smith to Thomas Corwin, June 21, 1852, John G. Love to Corwin, July 28, 1852, Corwin MSS (LC).
- 40. Lewis D. Campbell to William Schouler, July 6, 1852 (quotation), Schouler MSS; Darrius Perrin to Daniel Ullmann, Rochester, June 30, 1852, Ullmann MSS; William H. Seward to Frances Seward, August 7, 1852, in Seward at Washington, p. 191; William Jackson to William H. Seward, June 25, 1852, Seth Hawley to Seward, June 26, 1852, E. Pershine Smith to Seward, July 4, 1852, John Defrees to Seward, July 19, 1852, Schuyler Colfax to Seward, July 24, 1852 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU). Many northern Whigs joined Greeley in openly execrating the platform. The Pittsburgh Daily Gazette, the most influential Whig paper in western Pennsylvania, for example, flatly rejected it, as did that city's Whig ratification meeting. As one Democrat said of Pittsburgh's Whigs, "They almost all curse that platform." See Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 105–06.
- 41. Alexander H. Greene to Frances Seward, July 9, 1852, John M. Radford to William H. Seward, August 5, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 42. Seth Hawley to William H. Seward, August 11, 1852 (quotation), Seward to John Wilson, August 30, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Edward Everett to Millard Fillmore, June 30, 1852, Babcock to Fillmore, July 15, 1852, MFP-BHS; Benjamin Thompson to Daniel Ullmann, June 26, 1852, Darius Perrin to Ullmann, June 30, 1852, Ullmann MSS; Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, June 25, 1852, Fish MSS; Vincent L. Bradford to J. Alexander Fulton, August 10, 1852 (quotation), P. Frazer Smith to Fulton, August 24, 1852 (quotation), Fulton MSS; Francis Granger to Millard Fillmore, August 25, 1852 (quotation), Granger MSS; Truman Smith to Thomas Ewing, September 22, 1852, EFP; John Gordon to John Wilson, July 5, 1852, John Wilson MSS.
- 43. William L. Bigler to Franklin Pierce, June 26, 1852 (quotation), A. D. Wilson to Pierce, September 29, 1852 (quotation), Pierce MSS; Charles Bruner to J. Alexander Fulton, July 11, 1852, Ulysses Mercer to Fulton, July 26, 1852, Isaac Hughes to Fulton, August 13, 1852, Fulton

- MSS; B. F. Sloan to William L. Bigler, September 11, 1852, Bigler MSS; Benjamin H. Brewster to Edmund Burke, July 19, September 3, 1852 (quotation), Burke MSS.
- 44. Henry C. Carey to John O. Sargent, July 2, 1852, Sargent MSS. One of Seward's correspondents expressed the growing lack of faith in the Whig party even more vividly the previous April. Warning Seward that citizens held Congress in "contempt" for its "neglect of the real interests of the nation," he added, "Thousands of Whigs, tired of the present condition of things, are debating in their minds the propriety of abandoning their old association in the hopes that by a new crystallization a better development may be realized." Thus the best course for Whigs in 1852 was to allow the Democrats to win the presidency "and wait patiently for the new organization." George Bacon to Seward, April 14, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 45. E. Pershine Smith to William H. Seward, July 11, 1852 (quotation), Seth Hawley to Seward, August 11, 1852 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Seward to William Schouler, August 7, 1852, Schouler MSS.
 - 46. Marius Schoonmaker to Thurlow Weed, July 29, 1852, Weed MSS (RU).
- 47. See, for example, Isaac Jones to Millard Fillmore, February 9, 1852, MFP-BHS; Truman Smith to William B. Campbell, May 15, 1852, CFP; and especially Edward Everett to H. Jewell, October 20, 1852, Everett MSS. Everett's remarkable letter was an attempt to rouse Whigs from their lethargy by warning of the catastrophic foreign policy consequences should Democrats win.
- 48. See Daniel Webster to Millard Fillmore, August 4, 1852, Webster MSS; and Frederick Seward's editorial note in Seward at Washington, p. 193. When British naval vessels stopped and forced American whaling and fishing boats to leave the contested waters, Fillmore and Webster responded with conciliatory diplomacy rather than the bellicose actions Democrats demanded. The Democratic platform is reprinted in Nichols and Nichols, "Election of 1852," 951–53
- 49. On the fear of Louisiana's Whigs regarding Scott's statement on filibusterers, see Fitz Henry Warren to William H. Seward, September 28, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 50. T. N. Parmalee to John J. Crittenden, July 6, 1852, Crittenden MSS (LC); George Holley to William H. Seward, July 19, 1852, Simeon Draper to Seward, July 20, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Lew Campbell to William Schouler, July 21, 1852, Schouler MSS; Elliot, Scott, pp. 633–34.
- 51. Campbell to Schouler, July 21, 1852, Schouler MSS; Seth Hawley to William H. Seward, August 11, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Thomas Foote to Millard Fillmore, August 7, 1852, MFP-BHS; William L. Marcy to Franklin Pierce, July 19, 1852, Pierce MSS; Marcy to Augustus Campbell, July 30, 1852, Marcy MSS (LC).
- 52. Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, August 23, 1852, copy, Winthrop MSS; Daniel Webster to Fletcher Webster, August 26, 1852, Webster MSS; Elliott, Scott, p. 628; Dalzell, Webster, pp. 274–304.
- 53. Henry Wilson to William H. Seward, July 8, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Winthrop to Kennedy, July 29, 1852, Kennedy MSS; Henry Vose to Henry L. Dawes, August 7, 1852, E. H. Kellogg to Dawes, August 28, 1852, Dawes MSS; Philip Greely, Jr., to Thurlow Weed, October 12, 1852, Weed MSS (RU).
- 54. "Anon" to Daniel Webster, July 14, 1852, Moses Grinnell et al. to Webster, September 24, 1852, Webster MSS; N. S. S. Beman to William H. Seward, July 9, 1852 (quotation), George Foster to Seward, August 9, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); William Kent to Hamilton Fish, July 29, 1852, Fish MSS; George Foster to Thurlow Weed, August 27, 1852, Weed MSS; Carlos Baxter to Justin Morrill, October 6, 1852, Morrill MSS.
- 55. Lewis C. Levin to William L. Marcy, October 15, 1852, Marcy MSS (LC); John McKeen to Franklin Pierce, September 28, 1852, Pierce MSS; E. A. Penniman to William L. Bigler, October 13, 15, 1852, Bigler MSS; Richard J. Mapes to Daniel Webster, October 10, 1852, Webster MSS. For the characterization of Pierce as an embodiment of "Anti-Popery," see the splenetic anti-Catholic letter of Watson G. Hayes to William H. Seward, August 23, 1852, Seward MSS (RU). Scores of letters from Pennsylvania testify to the hatred of that state's Native Americans toward Scott. Whigs' campaign to woo Catholics and immigrants will be discussed below.
- 56. William L. Bigler to Franklin Pierce, June 26, 1852, Pierce MSS; J. B. Turner to William H. Seward, July 8, 1852, Henry Wilson to Seward, July 8, 1852, Joseph Garlinghouse to Seward, July 20, 1852 (quotation), Schuyler Colfax to Seward, August 2, 1852 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Thurlow Weed to William Schouler, August 7, 1852, Schouler MSS.

- 57. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 19–20; Salmon P. Chase to E. S. Hamlin, June 28, August 3, 1852, Chase MSS (LC); see also the following letters to Seward, John Barr, September 9, 1852, Aaron F. Perry, September 9, 1852, John Sherman, September 16, 1852, Fisher A. Foster, September 28, 1852, Arthur W. Fletcher, September 28, 1852, Joseph Warren, October 6, 1852, Seward MSS (RU). Fisher Foster told Seward that before Hale left Washington, he told the New Hampshire member of the Whig national committee "that he wished to make a great many Free Soil votes in Ohio, but he hoped to make them all from the Democratic party—and our accounts from there show that he is doing both."
- 58. On New York, see, for example, Seth Hawley to William H. Seward, August 11, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); and Samuel D. Partridge to George Dennett, June 29, 1852, Pierce MSS.
 - 59. Nichols, Pierce, pp. 209-10; Nevins, Ordeal: House, p. 41.
- 60. See my analysis in the previous chapter; Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 119–27; and Gienapp, Origins, pp. 21–26.
- 61. For Schuyler Colfax's fear that Germans would decide the Indiana election, see Colfax to Seward, July 24, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); for Colfax's belief that the Catholic clergy could lead Germans into the Whig column, see Truman Smith to Thurlow Weed, September 19, 1852, Weed MSS (RU).
- 62. Nichols, Pierce, pp. 181–86, 209–10; John W. Lawrence to Henry Bedinger, July 13, 1852 (quotation), Bedinger-Dandridge Papers; Andrew A. Eyster to Franklin Pierce, June 29, 1852 (quotation), Pierce MSS. Pierce's incoming correspondence for June, July, and August contains scores of letters detailing Whig use of the anti-Catholic charge. See also the numerous letters in the J. Alexander Fulton MSS. Fulton, a Democratic leader, polled Democrats throughout Pennsylvania to see how grave the threat of Catholic defections was. All reported that Whigs actively sought the Catholic vote, many expected to lose it, and some predicted that Protestant Whigs, angered by the blatant courtship of the Catholics they hated, would abstain or defect to Pierce. For Whig expectations of getting the Catholic vote, see Lew O. Edwards to Thomas Corwin, Cincinnati, June 7, 1852, Corwin MSS (LC); William B. Campbell to David Campbell, Nashville, July 29, 1852, CFP; Richard L. Wilson to William H. Seward, Chicago, June 21, 1852, and John I. Fay to Seward, Detroit, September 1, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 63. George Emery to Franklin Pierce, Boston, June 26, 1852 (quotation), George M. Dallas to Pierce, July 3, 1852, Paul R. George to Pierce, July 11, 1852, Thomas McGee to Pierce, July 26, 1852, Pierce MSS; Truman Smith to Weed, September 19, 1852, Weed MSS (RU); Gienapp, Origins, p. 22. Robinson's pamphlet was entitled Franklin Pierce and Catholic Persecution in New Hampshire. Whigs erred about Purcell; he favored Pierce. See J. B. Purcell to William J. Barry, June 25, 1852, enclosed with Barry to Franklin Pierce, July 1, 1852, Pierce MSS.
- 64. Charles A. Dana to James S. Pike, June 21, 1852, Pike MSS; David Nagle to William H. Seward, July 20, 1852, Seward to Schuyler Colfax, July 31, 1852, Henry Barns to Seward, September 6, 1852, Arthur W. Fletcher to Seward, September 9, 1852, Henry H. Booth to Seward, September 15, 1852, William J. Miller to Seward, September 18, 1852, Champion S. Chase to Seward, October 16, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 65. Rutherford B. Hayes to Sardis Birchard, October 12, 1852, in Hayes Diary, I, p. 424.
- 66. George H. Rives to William H. Seward, February 10, 1852, Richard L. Wilson to Seward, June 21, 1852 (quotations), Seward MSS (RU); James Shields to Charles H. Lanphier, February 6, 1852, Lanphier MSS; John Moses to Richard Yates, March 28, 1852, Yates MSS; Richard L. Wilson to Elihu B. Washburne, July 20, 1852, Washburne MSS (LC); Koerner Memoirs, I, pp. 564, 588, 598–99.
- 67. Elihu B. Washburne to Seward, September 17, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Greeley to Washburne, September 15, 1852, Seward to Washburne, September 22, 1852, Nathan C. Greer to Washburne, Waukegan, n.d., Washburne MSS (LC).
- 68. This and the preceding paragraph are based on Elliott, Scott, p. 638; the following letters to Franklin Pierce: George F. Emery, Boston, June 26, 1852, Samuel W. Black, Pittsburgh, July

Notes Notes

- 12, 1852, William J. Brown, Indianapolis, July 14, 1852 (quotation), Edward Lynch, Brooklyn, July 24, 1852 (quotation), Thomas McGee, Buffalo, July 26, 1852, and A. D. Wilson, Williamsport, Pa., September 29, 1852, Pierce MSS; W. W. H. Davis to Caleb Cushing, Philadelphia, September 10, 1852, Cushing MSS; David Nagle to William H. Seward, July 20, August 13, 1852, William J. Miller to Seward, September 18, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); James Campbell to William L. Bigler, September 21, 1852 (quotation), E. A. Penniman to Bigler, October 9, 1852, George W. Woodward to Bigler, October 16, 1852, Bigler MSS. The J. Alexander Fulton Papers also contain many letters on the situation in Pennsylvania.
- 69. William J. Miller to Seward, September 18, 1852, Fisher A. Foster to Seward, September 28, 1852, Arthur W. Fletcher to Seward, September 28, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 70. Elliott, Scott, pp. 635–41. Scott reached Pittsburgh and Cleveland on September 19 and left New York in mid-October. My subsequent remarks on the content of his speeches are taken from the same pages in Elliott.
- 71. Ibid., pp. 640–41; Thurlow Weed to Seward, September 25, 1852 (quotation), Arthur W. Fletcher to Seward, September 28, 1852 (quotation), Fisher A. Foster to Seward, September 28, 1852, W. I. Madeira to Seward, October 9, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 72. P. C. H. Harris to William H. Seward, September 24, 1852 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Jesse Young to J. Alexander Fulton, July 28, 1852 (quotation), J. W. Maynard to Fulton, August 3, 1852, P. Frazer Smith to Fulton, August 24, 1852, Fulton MSS; John H. Brinton to Franklin Pierce, October 6, 1852, John H. Davis to Pierce, October 25, 1852 (quotation), Pierce MSS; Alvah Hunt to Hamilton Fish, August 28, 1852, Fish MSS. For additional quotations and citations, see Holt, Political Crisis, p. 126; and Gienapp, Origins, pp. 25–26. Professor Gienapp and I have examined many of the same manuscript collections, and on this point, as on so many others, we concur.
- 73. G. B. McGudry to Samuel Patterson, September 20, 1852, Patterson MSS. W. I. Madeira of Pittsburgh and Weed, as well as the confident reports from Massachusetts and Ohio, have already been cited. For Seward's confidence about New York, see Anna Ella Carroll to Seward, September 27, 1852, and Arthur W. Fletcher to Seward, September 28, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to Elihu B. Washburne, September 22, 1852, Washburne MSS (LC).
- 74. The Massachusetts elections were also clustered in November, but the crucial state elections were held one week after the presidential and congressional contests on November 2. The referendum on Louisiana's new state constitution was scheduled for November 2 as well, and if it carried, new elections for all statewide officials and state legislators were to be held in December.
- 75. C. N. Bodfish to Franklin Pierce, June 8, 1852, Pierce MSS; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 48–50, 489–90.
- 76. William G. Crosby to Stephen Stark, December 18, 1852, Fessenden MSS (WRHS); B. F. Johnson to Elihu B. Washburne, September 16, 1852, Washburne MSS (LC). Only the state senate voted for governor if no candidate had a popular-vote majority, and sitting senators also decided state senate contests in which no candidate won a majority. Eight seats remained unfilled after the September elections, and those seats could determine control of the senate. Crosby wanted Whigs already in the senate to bargain with Democrats to choose the Whig candidate, rather than a factional rival, in disputed senate districts and thereby give the Whigs a clear senate majority. This deal worked, and Crosby was elected governor in late December 1852 or January 1853. That, in turn, created friction among Whigs, for Whigs brought into the senate by this deal refused to support William Pitt Fessenden, Whigs' candidate for United States senator. See the next chapter and Israel Washburn, Jr., to Fessenden, February 12, 1853, Fessenden MSS (WRHS).
- 77. In addition to the letters to Seward and Weed cited above, see Arthur W. Fletcher to Seward, October 12, 1852, Charles W. Beers to Seward, October 17, 1852, and William Schouler to Seward, October 28, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 78. David Nagle to William H. Seward, July 20, August 11, 1852, William J. Miller to Seward, September 4, 18, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Alvah Hunt to Hamilton Fish, August 28, 1852, Fish MSS; Horace Greeley to Elihu B. Washburne, September 15, 1852, Washburne MSS (LC).

- 79. John Roberts to Salmon P. Chase, June 16, 1852, Chase MSS (LC); Greeley to Washburne, September 15, 1852, Washburne MSS (LC).
- 80. Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, September 25, 1852, James R. Thompson, Rochester, October 2, 1852, MFP-BHS. Haven noted that he had been renominated unanimously, where Sewardites needed Silver Gray help on the presidential ticket, that is, they made no attempt to deny Silver Grays nomination.

Walley's endorsement of the Scott ticket in Massachusetts was extraordinarily grudging. He began his acceptance speech by proclaiming that the Whig party had done Daniel Webster an "irreparable wrong" and had thereby "brought discredit on themselves." New York Times, September 24, 1852.

- 81. Henry J. Raymond to William H. Seward, March 15, June 4, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); A. H. Savage to Benedict Lewis, Jr., August 12, 1852 (quotation), Ullmann MSS; Hamilton Fish to Thurlow Weed, August 18, 1852, Weed MSS (RU). Letters in the Ullmann Papers for July, August, and September are by far the best source for Silver Gray attitudes toward New York's state election in 1852.
- 82. John M. Bradford to William H. Seward, March 3, 1852 (quotation), Horace Greeley to Seward, April 20, 1852 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Alex Brooks to Benedict Lewis, Jr., August 22, 1852 (quotation), D. R. Barker to Lewis, August 27, 1852, Ullmann MSS. The priority that pro-Compromise Silver Grays as well as antislavery Sewardites put on the Maine Law issue corrects the mistaken tendency of some historians to identify prohibitionism and antislavery as complementary attitudes of the same people. The liquor issue cut across the fault line established by the slavery issue.
- 83. Greeley to Seward, April 20, 1852, Raymond to Seward, June 4, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Alex Mann to Benedict Lewis, Jr., August 14, 1852, Ullmann MSS; Washington Hunt to James Watson Webb, July 31, August 22, 1852, Webb MSS.
- 84. Robert G. Campbell to Millard Fillmore, January 5, 1852, MFP-BHS; George Dawson to Thurlow Weed, January 8, 1852, Weed MSS (RU); Seth Hawley to William H. Seward, January 3, 1852, Alvah Hunt to Seward, January 8, 1852, Henry J. Raymond to Seward, January 11, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); George Bancroft to Franklin Pierce, July 9, 1852, Pierce MSS.
- 85. James R. Thompson to Millard Fillmore, March 30, 1852, MFP-BHS; C. A. Mann to George Newell, May 20, 1852, Marcy MSS (NYSL); Lewis Morgan to William H. Seward, May 14, 1852, Seth Hawley to Seward, May 21, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, June 25, 1852, Fish MSS; Hunt to James Watson Webb, July 31, 1852 (quotation), Webb MSS; B. Thompson to Benedict Lewis, Jr., August 11, 1852 (quotation), Ullmann MSS.
- 86. J. T. Hatch to William L. Marcy, July 28, 1852, William J. Russell to Marcy, August 2, 1852, Marcy MSS (LC); J. T. Hatch to George Newell, August 9, 1852, Marcy MSS (NYSL). By 1852 the divisions among New York Democrats were more complex than ever. Hunkers divided into Hardshell and Softshell factions over the question of receiving Barnburners back into the party. To win the support of Barnburners, Softshells, headed by William L. Marcy and Seymour, embraced their hard-line opposition to canal expansion.
- 87. A. C. Flagg to George W. Newell, September 23, 1852, Marcy MSS (NYSL); William L. Marcy to A. Campbell, September 8, 1852, C. Stebbins to Marcy, October 14, 1852 (quotation), Marcy MSS (LC); V. W. Smith to George Dawson, September 3, 1852, Weed MSS (RU); A. Birdsall to Franklin Pierce, September 28, 1852, Augustus Schell to Pierce, September 29, 1852, Pierce MSS.
- 88. William L. Marcy to A. Campbell, September 8, 1852, Marcy MSS (LC); New York Times, September 23, 24, 1852. I have inferred that Weed constructed the ticket because its jewel was William Kent, the widely respected jurist and candidate for lieutenant governor, whom Weed at first approached unsuccessfully about accepting the nomination. Fish wanted Kent to run for Congress to prevent James Brooks' renomination. See William Kent to Weed, August 17, 1852, and Fish to Weed, August 18, 1852, Weed MSS (RU).
- 89. The platform can be found in the Times, September 23, 1852. Raymond's spin on the proceedings appeared the following day.

- 90. Weed to Seward, September 25, 1852 (quotation), Charles W. Beers to Seward, October 17, 1852 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Willis Sumner to George W. Newell, October 31, 1852, Marcy MSS (NYSL).
- 91. Fitz Henry Warren to Seward, September 28, 1852, W. I. Madeira to Seward, October 9, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Truman Smith to John Wilson, October 7, 1852, John Wilson MSS.
- 92. John H. Brinton to Franklin Pierce, October 6, 1852 (quotation), Pierce MSS; David Davis to?, October 17, 1852 (quotation), David Davis MSS; Hayes Diary, I, pp. 421–22; Baltimore County Advocate, September 4, 1852, quoted in Evitts, Matter of Allegiance, p. 49; James Johnston to Edward McPherson, December 3, 1852, McPherson MSS. The quotation about "Genl. Apathy" is taken from Sewell, Ballots for Freedom, p. 249.
- 93. William P. Hills to William L. Bigler, October 8, 1852, Bigler MSS. Democrats won 51.3 percent of the statewide vote in Iowa; in 1850 their majority had been 53 percent.
- 94. Doherty, Whigs of Florida, p. 56. Ward won 4,336 votes compared to 4,626 for James Broome; in 1848 Thomas Brown's 4,147 votes represented 53.3 percent of the active electorate. My assertions about voter movement between elections are based on interyear regression estimates in Calabro, "Two-Party System in Florida," pp. 27–28. According to Calabro's estimates, almost one-fifth (18 percent) of the 1848 Democratic voters supported Ward in 1850.
 - 95. Calabro, "Two-Party System in Florida," Table 8, p. 27.
- 96. James A. Pearce to Thomas Corwin, March 1, 1852, Corwin MSS (LC); Arthur W. Fletcher to William H. Seward, October 22, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 97. W. A. Gorman to Franklin Pierce, October 16, 1852, Pierce MSS. Wright won with 92,959 votes (54.7 percent) to 73,647 (43.3 percent) for Nicholas McCarty, his Whig foe. A Free Soil candidate apparently garnered the balance. In the congressional elections, all of which were two-way races, Democrats won 89,787 votes (53.8 percent) to the Whigs' 76,957 (46.2 percent). For the breakdown of the immigrant vote in Indiana, see Tables 1.9 and 1.10 in Gienapp, Origins, p. 486. Gienapp's estimates are for the presidential vote and apply to all immigrant voters, not just new ones enfranchised by the 1851 constitution. Yet Wright's vote was only slightly smaller than Pierce's in November, almost 16,000 votes larger than his own total in 1849, and 18,000 votes more than Democratic congressional candidates had won in 1851, the last election before the new state constitution enfranchised alien immigrants. Since Indiana's native-born voters tilted Democratic far less disproportionately than immigrants, I assume that newly enfranchised immigrants divided the same way as other immigrants.
- 98. A. F. Perry to Thomas Ewing, October 11, 1852, EFP; Rutherford B. Hayes to Sardis Birchard, October 12, 17, 1852, in Hayes Diary, I, pp. 424–26. The totals in the 1852 popular vote for congressmen were: Democrats, 141,411 (48.1 percent); Whigs, 128,468 (43.7 percent); and Free Soil, 24,044 (7.2 percent). The margin for the statewide vote is taken from Gienapp, Origins, Table 2.16, p. 496. For estimates on turnout in all northern states between 1840 and 1860, see id., "'Politics Seem to Enter Into Everything," pp. 18–19.
- 99. The statewide popular vote in the congressional races was: Democrats, 44,393 (53.7 percent) and Whigs 38,270 (46.3 percent). The totals in the 1850 gubernatorial election were: Democrats, 39,723 (53.8 percent) and Whigs 34,054 (46.2 percent).
- 100. E. A. Penniman to William L. Bigler, October 13, 1852, Bigler MSS. In 1851 the vote for governor was: Democrats, 186,499 (50.9 percent); Whigs, 178,034 (48.6 percent); and Native Americans, 1,850 (0.5 percent). The corresponding totals for canal commissioner in 1852 were: Democrats, 171,551 (51.2 percent); Whigs, 151,601 (45.2 percent); Native Americans, 8,187 (2.4 percent); and Free Soilers, 3,843 (1.2 percent). The turnout rate dropped from 70.7 percent in 1851 to 63.3 percent in 1852.
- 101. Schouler to Seward, October 16, 28, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Allison Owen to Fessenden, October 22, 1852, Fessenden MSS (WRHS); Lewis C. Levin to William L. Marcy, October 31, 1852, Marcy MSS (LC); Dana to James Pike, October 1852, Pike MSS; James Johnston to Edward McPherson, December 3, 1852, McPherson MSS.
- 102. Clifford received only 53,500 votes on the regular Whig ticket, some 11,000 fewer than Winthrop had a year earlier, but he got over 8,000 votes on the anti-Maine Law ticket, raising his total to 9,000 votes more than Scott won a week earlier. That gain indicated how important the prohibition issue was in Massachusetts. See Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," Table IX, p. 131. I have also used Sweeney's figures on the number of legislative seats, pp. 121, 133, rather than those provided by the Inter-University Consortium, which vary sharply from them.

- 103. N. B. Markle to John G. Davis, November 8, 1852, John Davis MSS; Thomas L. Harris to Stephen Douglas, November 22, 1852, Douglas MSS.
- 104. Edwin R. Campbell to William H. Seward, December 15, 1852, F. J. Stratton to Seward, November 22, 1852, Raymond to Seward, November 6, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Stephen A. Hurlbut to Elihu B. Washburne, November 8, 1852, Washburne MSS (LC); John Minor Botts to William Schouler, November 12, 1852, Schouler MSS; Seward to Thurlow Weed, November 4, 1852, Weed MSS (RU); L. R. Davis to T. J. McClellan, December 18, 1852, Buchanan-McClellan Papers.
- 105. N. K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, November 3, 1852, S. J. Wright to Fillmore, November 3, 1852 (quotation), A. S. Linn to Fillmore, December 24, 1852, MFP-BHS; Worthington G. Snethen to William H. Seward, November 4, 1852, William Kent to Seward, November 10, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).
- 106. Rutherford B. Hayes to Sardis Birchard, November 3, 10, 1852, in Hayes Diary, I, pp. 429–32.
- 107. John Davis to William Schouler, November 4, 1852, Botts to Schouler, November 12, 1852, Schouler MSS; Moses Kimball to Henry L. Dawes, November 3, 1852, Dawes MSS; William Schouler to William H. Seward, November 10, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Lewis Campbell to Israel Washburn, November 4, 1852, Israel Washburn MSS (LC).
- 108. Davis to Schouler, November 4, 1852, Schouler MSS; Teesdale to McLean, November 19, 1852, McLean MSS (LC); Browning Diary, pp. 79–80; John Barr to William H. Seward, November 8, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); James Johnston to Edward McPherson, December 3, 1852, McPherson MSS; Pittsburgh Daily Gazette, November 4, 1852.
- 109. While Scott improved on Johnston's 1851 gubernatorial vote in Pennsylvania, he ran over 6,000 votes behind Taylor there, and the Democratic vote grew by four times that amount between 1848 and 1852. Scott also ran slightly behind Taylor in New Jersey, but Democratic gains between 1848 and 1850 provided the margin of victory. Nonetheless, a combination of defeatism after the October elections, apathy, and defection by nativists and Protestant Whigs, who may have voted for Webster had he lived, probably accounted for the reduced Whig vote in both states. The Free Soil vote in New Jersey was negligible, and very few, if any, Pennsylvania Whigs defected to the Free Soilers. See Gienapp, Origins, p. 29, n. 72, and Table 1.8, p. 485.
 - 110. Cooper, Politics of Slavery, p. 340.
 - 111. Kruman, Parties and Politics, p. 136.
- 112. The figures for the North are from Gienapp, Origins, p. 28, n. 69. The average for the fifteen slave states is unweighted, but the turnout rates themselves, of course, are based on a ratio of active voters to the total adult white male population.
- 113. Gienapp's figures on turnout are comparable in the direction, if not the dimension, of change with those I have used in Table 33, with the following exceptions. He finds a slight decrease in Ohio, not an increase, a slight decrease in Connecticut, and a small increase in Michigan between 1848 and 1852.
 - 114. Holt, Political Crisis, p. 129; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 28, n. 68, and pp. 482-85.
- 115. Ibid.; Robert Toombs to John J. Crittenden, December 5, 1852, Crittenden MSS (LC). Gienapp's estimates suggest that 1 percent of Taylor's voters went for Hale in Illinois, Indiana, and Connecticut. In the last state that would equal approximately 300 voters, not enough to overcome Pierce's 3,000-vote margin.
- 116. John A. Bryan and J. A. Noonun to Gideon Welles, November 14, 1852, Welles MSS (LC); Gienapp, Origins, pp. 482–86; Gienapp, "'Politics Seem to Enter Into Everything," Table 4, p. 29. Gienapp's estimates of immigrant turnout in this last table apply only to New York, but it probably increased at comparable rates in other states. See also the citations to Professor Robert W. Fogel's research in the preceding chapter, note 71. Gienapp's estimates of voter movement in New York between 1848 and 1852 suggest that over half of the increased Democratic vote came from people other than ex-Free Soilers.
 - 117. Hayes Diary, I, p. 430; John Barr to William H. Seward, November 8, 1852, Seward

MSS; Gienapp, Origins, p. 30, notes 78 and 80, and pp. 482–85. Although Scott ran only 6,249 votes behind Taylor's total in Pennsylvania, Gienapp's estimates suggest that about 8.7 percent of Taylor's voters, over 15,000 men, abstained.

118. George Bull to William H. Seward, November 6, 1852, William Kent to Seward, November 10, 1852 (quotation), Simeon Draper to Seward, November 12, 1852, Henry Schermerhorn to Seward, January 10, 1853, Seward MSS (RU); Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, November 10, 1852 (quotation), Fish MSS; A. C. Flagg to George W. Newell, November 3, 1852, Marcy MSS (NYSL); Hamilton Fish to Daniel D. Barnard, November 24, 1852 (quotation), Barnard MSS; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 29–30.

Whig congressional candidates were wiped out in Brooklyn and New York City, both Silver Gray bastions. Even though that urban area gained an additional seat under reapportionment, Whigs' total vote for Congress dropped by 17,040 (34.3 percent) between 1848 and 1852. Rochester's Silver Gray candidate also met defeat, but in Buffalo the victorious Solomon G. Haven increased his 1850 vote by almost 25 percent. Undoubtedly Sewardites also refused to vote for well-known Silver Grays like Joseph Varnum and James Brooks, whom they particularly hated. Brooks, whose district was altered under the new apportionment, received only 3,398 votes in 1852 compared to 8,357 in 1850.

- 119. John Davis to William Schouler, November 4, 1852, Schouler MSS; Samuel Bowles to Henry L. Dawes, November 13, 1852, Dawes MSS; Thurlow Weed to Samuel Bowles, January 2, 1853, Bowles MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, January 13, 1853, Kennedy MSS.
- 120. For these states I have used the turnout rates listed by Gienapp in "'Politics Seem to Enter Into Everything,'" pp. 18–19. For prohibition's salience in the Massachusetts state election, see William Schouler to William H. Seward, November 6, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); and R. T. Paine to Roger Sherman Baldwin, November 17, 1852, BFP. For the breakdown of the multiticket gubernatorial vote in Massachusetts, see Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," p. 131. Mann got 3,600 votes on a separate Temperance ticket.
 - 121. Campbell to Israel Washburn, November 4, 1852, Israel Washburn MSS (LC).
- 122. Webster to Moses Grinnell et al., October 12, 1852, quoted in Dalzell, Webster, p. 300; Lewis to Clayton, November 13, 1852, Clayton MSS; James Johnston to Edward McPherson, December 3, 1852, McPherson MSS; E. J. Terry to Richard W. Thompson, November 13, 1852, Thompson MSS (Ind.SL); Gienapp, Origins, pp. 32–33.
- 123. Charles Sumner to William H. Seward, November 6, 1852, George Bull to Seward, November 6, 1852 (quotation), John Bradford to Seward, November 8, 9, 1852, F. J. Stratton to Seward, November 22, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); John Davis to William Schouler, November 4, 1852, Schouler MSS; Daniel Lee to Millard Fillmore, November 5, 1852, MFP-BHS.
- 124. James Bowen to William H. Seward, November 3, 1852 (quotation), Seward to Gerrit Smith, November 10, 1852, William Kent to Seward, November 10, 1852 (quotation), William Schouler to Seward, November 10, 1852 (quotation), Simeon Draper to Seward, November 12, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Thomas M. Howe to Israel Washburn, November 14, 1852, Israel Washburn MSS (LC); Gienapp, Origins, pp. 33–34, Seward to Charles Sumner, November 9, 1852, quoted on p. 34.
- 125. Botts to Schouler, November 12, 1852, Schouler MSS; Kent to Washburn, December 27, 1852, Israel Washburn MSS (Norlands).
- 126. Worthington G. Snethen to Seward, November 4, 1852, John M. Bradford to Seward, November 9, 1852 (quotation), Simeon Draper to Seward, November 12, 1852 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Stephen A. Hurlbut to Elihu B. Washburne, November 8, 1852 (quotation), Elihu Washburne MSS (LC); L. R. Davis to T. J. McClellan, December 18, 1852, Buchanan-McClellan Papers; Hugh Maxwell to Millard Fillmore, November 10, 1852 (quotation), MFP-BHS; John Davis to William Schouler, November 4, 1852, Schouler MSS; William Cullom to William B. Campbell, December 22, 1852, CFP; William Kent to Hamilton Fish, January 29, 1853 (quotation), Fish MSS. Some Democrats also believed that their party must fragment because its majorities were so large, Whig opposition was too weak to exert the necessary "external pressure to keep it together," and the "cohesive ties of public plunder" were inadequate to please the hordes of job seekers. See Andrew Johnson to Sam Milligan, December 28, 1852, in Johnson Papers, pp. 100–103.
 - 127. William Schouler to Seward, November 10, 1852, Seward MSS (RU).

CHAPTER 21

- 1. William Cullom to William B. Campbell, December 22, 1852, CFP; William H. Seward to William Schouler, December 25, 1852, John Minor Botts to Schouler, February 4, 1853, Schouler MSS; John Barr to William H. Seward, January 22, 1853 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Daniel Lee to Millard Fillmore, November 15, 1852 (quotation), Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, February 13, 1853, MFP-BHS.
 - 2. The Tribune is quoted in Van Deusen, Greeley, p. 172.
 - 3. Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, January 18, 1853, Greeley-Colfax MSS.
- 4. Andrew Johnson to Sam Milligan, December 28, 1852 (quotation), in Johnson Papers, pp. 100–04; Truman Smith to James S. Pike, March 27, 1853, Pike MSS; Nathan K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, February 13, 1853, MFP-BHS; Alexander H. H. Stuart to Fillmore, August 1, 1853, MFP-O. The controversy among Democrats caused by Pierce's patronage allocation is examined in Nichols, "Kansas-Nebraska Act"; and Nichols, Pierce, pp. 247–93.
- 5. Wade to Lew Campbell, June 27, 1853, Lewis Campbell MSS; John P. Kennedy to Joseph G. Kennedy, October 6, 1853, copy, Kennedy MSS.
 - 6. Seward to William Schouler, December 25, 1852, Schouler MSS.
- 7. George W. Bull to William H. Seward, November 6, 1852, John M. Bradford to Seward, November 8, 1852, John Barr to Seward, January 22, 1853, April 13, 1853, Henry Sill to Seward, February 24, 1853, and George Olmsted to Seward, February 28, 1853, Seward MSS (RU); Schuyler Colfax to William Schouler, February 1, 1853, Schouler MSS.
- 8. Robert Toombs to John J. Crittenden, December 5, 1852 (quotation), Crittenden MSS (LC); F. J. Stratton to William H. Seward, November 22, 1852 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); William L. Hodge to Millard Fillmore, September 26, 1853, MFP-O; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 343–44; Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 275.
- 9. George W. Bull to William H. Seward, November 6, 1852, John Barr to Seward, January 22, 1853, George Olmsted to Seward, February 28, 1853, Seward MSS (RU); John C. Spencer to Millard Fillmore, September 5, 1853 (quotation), MFP-O; P. J. Wagner to Fillmore, January 6, 1853, MFP-BHS.
- 10. Here as elsewhere in this chapter I use the term "Sewardites" to describe not only Seward's northern Whig correspondents but all northern Whigs who opposed the Compromise in 1850 and 1851, vigorously disputed the presidential nomination of either Fillmore or Webster in 1852, and viewed Whigs' national platform that year as a betrayal of their antislavery principles.
- 11. John Barr to William H. Seward, January 22, 1853, George Olmsted to Seward, February 28, 1853 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Benjamin F. Wade to Milton R. Sutliffe, February 13, 1853, Sutliffe MSS.
- 12. William G. Crosby to Stephen Stark, December 18, 1852, Israel Washburn, Jr. to William Pitt Fessenden, February 12, 1853, Crosby to Fessenden, May 5, 15, 1853, Fessenden MSS (WRHS).
- 13. Morrill, "Presidential Election of 1852," 347; Walton, "Elections in North Carolina," 185–87; Kenneth Rayner to David F. Caldwell, April 4, 1853, Caldwell MSS. During the 1852–53 legislative session, Democrats had a six-seat majority in the senate and Whigs held a four-seat edge in the house. On joint ballots, therefore, Democrats had a narrow eighty-six to eighty-four margin if everyone voted. But everyone did not vote, and abstentions and scattered votes produced the deadlock. Rayner's total from Whigs ranged between seventy-nine and seventy-three votes.
- 14. Thurlow Weed to Samuel Bowles, January 2, 1853, Bowles MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, January 13, 1853, Kennedy MSS; Winthrop to Edward Everett, January 17, 24, 1853, Everett MSS.
- 15. Ewing's absorption in private affairs after mid-1851 is documented by various letters from 1851, 1852, and 1853 in EFP.
 - 16. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, September 23, 1853, CFP.
- 17. Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, January 13, April 14, 1853, Kennedy MSS; Winthrop to Edward Everett, January 17, 24, 1853, Everett MSS.
 - 18. Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, January 24, 1853, Greeley-Colfax MSS; Greeley to

William H. Seward, February 6, 1853, Seward MSS (RU); Truman Smith to James S. Pike, March 27, 1853, Pike MSS; Van Deusen, Greeley, pp. 172–78, New York Tribune, April 30, 1853, quoted on p. 178.

- 19. Truman Smith to James S. Pike, March 27, 1853, Pike MSS.
- 20. Truman Smith to John Wilson, August 28, 1853, John Wilson MSS; Smith to Thurlow Weed, August 29, 1853, Weed MSS (RU).
 - 21. Smith to Weed, August 29, 1853, Weed MSS.
- 22. George Olmsted to Seward, February 28, 1853, Seward MSS (RU). The writer in the North American Review and the New Yorker J. S. McLaury are quoted in Gienapp, Origins, pp. 65.
- 23. Charles Sumner to William H. Seward, November 6, 1852, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to Sumner, November 9, 1852, quoted in Gienapp, Origins, p. 34.
- 24. For evidence that Democrats and Republicans cooperated in many states to adopt the Australian ballot during the 1890s explicitly to deny third parties access to the electorate, see McCormick, From Realignment to Reform, pp. 114–18; Reynolds and McCormick, "Outlawing 'Treachery'"; and Argersinger, "Place on the Ballot."
- 25. Again, I have explored this contrast between the fate of the Whigs in the 1850s and their twentieth-century Republican successors at greater length in "The Mysterious Disappearance of the American Whig Party," in Holt, Political Parties.
 - 26. Cassius M. Clay to Seward, June 9, 1853, Seward MSS (RU).
- 27. F. J. Stratton to William H. Seward, November 22, 1852, Henry Still to Seward, February 24, 1853, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 28. Daniel Lee to Fillmore, November 15, 1852, MFP-BHS.
- 29. George Bacon to Seward, April 14, 1852, Seward MSS. For additional evidence of the mushrooming antipolitician, antiparty sentiment expressed by Bacon, see Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 132–38.
- 30. Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," 31; Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 110–15, 335.
 - 31. William H. Seward to Samuel Ruggles, November 6, 1852, Seward MSS (LC).
- 32. Van Deusen, Seward, p. 147; Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 169–71; Daniel Lee to Millard Fillmore, November 15, 1852, MFP-BHS; Robert Wickliffe to Seward, June 14, 1853, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 33. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, pp. 163-82.
 - 34. Messages and Papers of the Presidents, V, p. 198.
 - 35. John Barr to Seward, April 13, 1853, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 36. J. A. Chesnut to Richard Yates, June 18, 1853, Yates MSS.
 - 37. Samuel Bowles to Henry L. Dawes, May 13, 1853, Dawes MSS.
- 38. For evidence of multiple Democratic candidacies, see Thomas H. Averett to Walter Coles, April 13, 1853, Coles MSS. The data from the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research include no results for Virginia's state senate elections in 1853, but Democrats retained control. Because Whigs failed to contest so many congressional districts, I have not calculated their proportion of the total statewide vote.
- 39. In Rhode Island, Whig candidates had won 45.8 percent of the vote in 1851, and in 1852 Scott had won 44.8 percent. In 1853 the Whige' share sank to 35.1 percent. New Hampshire's Whig candidates won 22,424 votes (42.4 percent) in 1851; two years later they captured 20,871 votes (42.0 percent).
- 40. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 52–55; Julius Clark to Joseph R. Hawley, January 29, 1853, J. R. Stewart to Hawley, March 6, 1853, Moses Pierce to Hawley, March 15, 1853, Hawley MSS; Charles H. Pond to Thomas Seymour, February 11, 1853, March 8, 1853 (quotation), W. S. Carter to Seymour, March 16, 1853 (quotation), Seymour MSS.
- 41. J. R. Stewart to Joseph R. Hawley, March 6, 1853, Moses Pierce to Hawley, March 15, 1853, Joel Fox to Hawley, March 21, 1853, John Boyd to Bartlett & Hawley, March 28, 1853, Findley M. Fox to M. H. Bartlett & Co., March 28, 1853, Hawley MSS. Joseph Hawley and M. H. Bartlett co-edited a Free Soil newspaper in Connecticut.
- 42. Emily Baldwin to Roger Sherman Baldwin, Jr., April 4, 1853, BFP; J. C. Comstock to Thomas Seymour, March 23, 1853, Seymour MSS.

- 43. For a more extensive analysis of the Connecticut vote and its role in punctuating the long-term disintegration of the Connecticut Whig party, see Gienapp, Origins, pp. 52–56, 491–93.
- 44. Joseph Warren to Seward, March 15, 1853, Seward MSS (RU); Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties, pp. 215–29.
- 45. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 62–64. Native-born Democrats had formed a secret club known as the Miami Tribe to stop Germans from getting Democratic nominations; hence, angry Germans called themselves the Anti-Miami party. On pp. 61–62, Gienapp also provides an able discussion of the role of the school issue in the rise of anti-Catholicism. I have offered my own analysis of that phenomenon, which would transform northern politics, in my Political Crisis, pp. 161–66.
 - 46. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 63-64, 495.
- 47. Roger Sherman Baldwin, Jr., to Emily Baldwin, San Francisco, October 31, 1852, BFP; Henry A. Craft to John Wilson, Stockton, June 3, 1853 (quotation), Madison Whitehall to Wilson, Sacramento, June 13, 1853 (quotation), John Wilson MSS.
- 48. Henry Craft to John Wilson, June 3, June 12, 1853, Madison Whitehall to Wilson, June 13, 1853, John Wilson MSS.
- 49. In 1851 Bigler won with 23,175 votes (50.5 percent) to the Whigs' 22,732 (49.5 percent); in 1853 his margin was 38,940 (51 percent) to 37,454 (49 percent). The letters cited above indicate that some Whigs opposed pushing for a new constitutional convention because they feared that former residents of southern states would try to legalize slavery in California. Others opposed dividing the state in two, and still others doubted that Democrats who wanted revision would support it if Whigs alone ran a ticket dedicated to it.
- 50. This and the previous paragraph are based on Current, Wisconsin, pp. 214–17. Neither Current nor Walter Dean Burnham's data for the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research supply returns for Wisconsin's legislative elections, but Democrats presumably retained their majorities. The extent of the defection from the Whigs is suggested by comparing the gubernatorial returns from 1851 and 1853 with the presidential results in 1852. Remember that Farwell won with Free Soil support in 1851 and that Holton ran as a People's, not a Free Soil, candidate even though he had first been nominated by Free Soilers.

	Whig	Democratic	Free Soil
1851	22,319	21,812
1852	22,210	33,658	8,814
1853	3,304	30,405	21,886

- 51. Whigs narrowly won the gubernatorial election in October 1848, and Cass' margin over Taylor in November was 4.9 percent. In 1850 the Democratic margin was 4.5 percent, and it increased to 9.3 percent in 1851. The strong Whig effort for Scott in 1852, however, reduced the percentage difference between Democrats and Whigs to 4.7. Similarly, in legislative contests after 1847, Whigs retained a respectable proportion of the house and senate until they were wiped out under the new apportionment of the 1851 constitution.
- 52. John Barr to William H. Seward, April 13, 1853, Seward MSS (RU); Daniel Peck to Thomas Ewing, January 10, 1853 (quotation), EFP; Gienapp, Origins, p. 57.
- 53. Ben Wade to Milton Sutliffe, February 13, 1853, Sutliffe MSS; John Barr to William H. Seward, July 19, 1853 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Wade to Lew Campbell, June 27, 1853 (quotation), Lewis Campbell MSS.
- 54. John Barr to William H. Seward, April 13, 1853 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Wade to Campbell, June 27, 1853, Lewis Campbell MSS.
- 55. R. W. P. Muse to Salmon P. Chase, July 12, 1853 (quotation), J. M. Tweed to Chase, September 8, 1853, Chase MSS (LC); Lew Campbell to Benjamin F. Wade, August 16, 1853, Wade MSS; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 56–59; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 181–85. According to regression estimates in Gienapp's book, p. 488, during the 1851 referendum on prohibition in Ohio, Whigs split almost two-to-one in favor, Democrats divided one-to-three against, and the Free Soilers who voted were unanimous in support. For evidence that the temperance question also divided the major parties in the Ohio legislature and thus generated less clear-cut partisan conflict on roll-call votes than banking, see Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 115–16.

Notes Notes

- 56. On Whig apathy and resignation to defeat, see Gienapp, Origins, pp. 58–59; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 184–85; and Wade to Campbell, June 27, 1853, Lewis Campbell MSS. The Ohio totals in gubernatorial and presidential elections are conveniently listed in Maizlish, pp. 241–42. I have used the regression estimates of voter movement in Gienapp, p. 494.
- 57. Ohio State Journal, October 14, 1853, quoted in Gienapp, Origins, p. 59. In 1853 Free Soilers added seven seats in the house and one in the senate; they, not Democrats, benefited most from the Whigs' loss of seats.
- 58. M. McDonald to Caleb Cushing, March 11, 1853, Francis O. J. Smith to Cushing, March 14, 1853, E. K. Smart to Cushing, April 14, 1853, Nathan Clifford to Cushing, August 16, 1853, Cushing MSS. Named attorney general by Pierce, Cushing was New England's representative in the cabinet, and the cited letters reveal the linkage between Democratic disputes over patronage and those over prohibition. See also, Gienapp, Origins, pp. 50–51.
- 59. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 48–49, 489. On hearing that pro-Crosby Whig senators had refused to support Fessenden for the Senate, Congressman Israel Washburn, Jr., erupted: "Now if this be so (& I can hardly believe it) ought not these gentlemen to understand that if they desire the cordial, earnest, & effective support of the Whig party for Mr. Crosby they must support its nominations fairly & so as to remove all suspicion of a wish on their part, or his, to defeat you?" Washburn to William Pitt Fessenden, February 12, 1853, Fessenden MSS (WRHS).
- 60. Gienapp, Origins, p. 489. Morrill won 11,012 votes (13.2 percent) and the Free Soiler Ezekiel Holmes, 9,039 (10.8 percent). Crosby took 31 percent in 1852. I have taken the gubernatorial results from the Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections, p. 410. After September, the seat count in the house stood at sixty-five Whigs (43 percent), seventy-six Democrats (50.7 percent), and nine Free Soilers (6.3 percent). In the senate, it was ten Whigs, eight Democrats, and two Free Soilers, with eleven seats still to be filled because no contenders for them had won the necessary popular-vote majority.
 - 61. William G. Crosby to Fessenden, November 18, 1853, Fessenden MSS (WRHS).
- 62. Israel Washburn, Jr., to William Pitt Fessenden, January 30, 1854, ibid.; Fessenden to Crosby, November 20, 1853, Lincoln MSS (IU). I have no idea why this letter concerning Maine politics ended up in this small collection of Lincoln's correspondence.
- 63. Isaac Reed to Israel Washburn, Jr., February 10, 1854 (quotation), Israel Washburn, Jr., MSS (Norlands); William Pitt Fessenden to Governor Crosby, February 11, 1854, copy, S. C. Fessenden to W. P. Fessenden, February 11, 1854, F. H. Morse to W. P. Fessenden, February 12, 1854 (quotation), Fessenden MSS (LC); Gienapp, Origins, pp. 129–30.
 - 64. Ibid
- 65. Justin Morrill to J. H. Harris, August 19, 1853, draft, Morrill MSS; Montpelier Vermont Watchman, April 15, 1853, quoted in Olberg, "Party Formation in Vermont," p. 16. Olberg's roll-call voting analysis indicates that the 1852 license law passed the house by a vote of ninety-one to ninety and that on seven roll-call votes concerning liquor that session, an average of 79 percent of Free Soilers and 59 percent of Whigs took an antiliquor stance, while 64 percent of Democrats took a proliquor position. The referendum, which determined whether the new law should go into effect in March or December—not whether it became law—went in favor of the earlier date by 22,215 to 21,904.
- 66. The totals in the gubernatorial race were: Whigs, 21,118; Democrats, 18,287; Free Soilers, 8,370. In January 1853 Whig Senator William Upham died, and Whig Governor Fairbanks appointed Whig Samuel Phelps to his seat. The term ran until March 1855, but the U.S. Constitution stipulated that no interim appointee could remain in the Senate beyond the next meeting of the state legislature unless it elected him. Thus it was Phelps' seat at stake. When the legislature failed to replace him, Phelps returned to Washington for the Thirty-Third Congress in December 1853, but in March 1854 the Senate's Democratic majority ejected him on the grounds that constitutionally an appointee could not serve in two different congresses.
- 67. My account of Massachusetts rests heavily on Sweeney's superb "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," which is also the source of data on voting patterns.

- 68. For local Democratic reaction to Cushing's letter, see C. B. H. Fessenden to Caleb Cushing, November 2, 1853, J. Nayson to Cushing, November 3, 1853, and George B. Loring to Cushing, November 11, 1853, Cushing MSS. Since pro-Coalition and antislavery Democrats despised Cushing, his appointment to the cabinet marked another of Pierce's extraordinary blunders.
- 69. Edward Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, November 15, 1853 (quotation), copy, Everett MSS; A. M. Ide to Caleb Cushing, November 8, 1853, Cushing MSS.
- 70. I have taken the count of the legislative seats from Sweeney's article. My assertion that wet Democrats, who had supported the Whig (and anti-Maine Law) candidate Clifford in 1852, swung to the Hunker or National Democratic candidate in 1853 is based on arithmetic manipulations of Sweeney's estimates. They indicate that 8 percent of the 44,000 1851 Democratic voters, or 3,520 men, supported Clifford in 1852 on either the Whig or Repeal tickets. They also show that 5 percent of Clifford's 62,200 voters in 1852, or 3,110 men, backed the Hunker Democrats in 1853.
- 71. It is unclear who supplied the ballots for and against the new constitution at the November referendum. But parties distributed their own ballots, and Sweeney's estimates suggest that 98 percent of Whig voters opposed, that 71 percent of Hunker Democrats opposed, and that 94 and 93 percent of Democratic and Free Soil voters, respectively, supported, the new constitution. Therefore it seems likely that parties printed Yes or No on the party ballots they distributed or that their poll workers handed out a ballot on the constitution with a Yes or No vote when they gave voters the party ticket. The vast majority of votes on the constitution, in sum, probably reflected what various party leaders had decided, not what individual voters thought about it. If this surmise is accurate, the decision of Cushing's anti-Coalition Democrats to run a separate ticket proved crucial.
- 72. Sumner to Seward, November 15, 1853, Seward MSS (RU); J. D. Baldwin to Gideon Welles, February 23, 1854 (quotation), Welles MSS (LC); Moses Bates to Caleb Cushing, November 15, 1853, Fisher A. Hildreth to Cushing, November 17, 1853, Cushing MSS; Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform," 136–37. Though the letters to Cushing cited above attributed the defeat to "the foreign vote" and "the Catholics," Sweeney's regression analysis on Boston itself suggests that the Irish abstained rather than voting for or against the constitution.
- 73. These well-known Democratic feuds in New York require no detailed documentation. But they can be followed in the Cushing MSS, the Tilden MSS, the Fairchild Collection of Horatio Seymour Papers, and the Marcy MSS (LC).
- 74. Benjamin Thompson to Daniel Ullmann, June 25, 1853 (quotation), Ullmann MSS; Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, August 21, 1853, September 18, 1853 (quotation), Weed MSS (RU); Gienapp, Origins, p. 41.
- 75. Hunt used these words in his letter to Weed cited in the preceding note, and so did the Silver Gray Benjamin Thompson in his letter to Daniel Ullmann of June 25, 1853. For the Rochester spring elections, see Henry J. Brent to Caleb Cushing, May 18, June 8, 1853, Cushing MSS.
- 76. John C. Spencer to Millard Fillmore, September 5, 1853 (quotation), MFP-O; Henry Genet to William H. Seward, September 23, 1853, Seward MSS (RU); Thompson to Ullmann, June 25, 1853, September 20, 1853 (quotation), N. G. King to Ullmann, August 1, 1853, N. W. Davis to Ullmann, August 27, 1853, Thomas H. Bond to Ullmann, September 11, 1853, Darius Perrin to Ullmann, September 21, 1853, William C. Hasbrouck to Ullmann, September 21, 1853, George B. Warren to Ullmann, September 27, 1853, Ullmann MSS.
- 77. John M. Bradford to William H. Seward, September 10, 1853 (quotation), Lyman A. Spalding to Seward, September 28, 1853 (quotation), Samuel Wilkerson to Seward, October 6, 1853, Seward MSS (RU); John T. Clark to Charles Cook, September 25, 1853 (quotation), Weed MSS (RU).
- 78. John T. Bush to Millard Fillmore, October 6, 1853, Henry E. Davies to Fillmore, October 7, 1853, MFP-O; Samuel Wilkerson to William H. Seward, October 5, 1853, Seward MSS (RU); Van Deusen, Seward, p. 150; Gienapp, Origins, p. 41.
- 79. Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, November 3, 1853, Weed MSS (RU); George E. Baker to William H. Seward, November 15, 1853, Seward MSS (RU).

Notes Notes

- 80. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 42, 487. Although I have tried to extrapolate from Gienapp's regression estimates in the text, it should be noted that they are based on the difference between the presidential vote in 1852 and the 1853 results, while my assertion of a total Whig loss of 80,000 votes used Washington Hunt's vote, which was 7,000 larger than Scott's.
- 81. Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, November 3, 1853 (quotation), Charles Cooke to Weed, November 15, 1853 (quotation), Weed MSS (RU); Millard Fillmore to John P. Kennedy, October 14, 1853, Kennedy MSS,
- 82. The Whig state platform can be found in the Pittsburgh Gazette, March 28, 1853, and the complaints of political indifference in the issues of May 17, 23, 1853. For the economic questions generating interest in the state, see the files for January to June, 1853, Bigler MSS. Roll-call voting patterns for the Pennsylvania legislature in 1853 can be found in Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 115–16.
- 83. Since Whigs held only 38 percent of the house seats in 1853, considerable numbers of Democrats had to support bank bills for them to pass so that Bigler could veto them. For evidence of Democratic anger at Bigler's bank vetoes in 1853, see Holt, Forging a Majority, p. 119. In 1853 the index of partisan disagreement on banking legislation in the Pennsylvania legislature was 70; in contrast, on corporate rights, which involved bills like that for the Pennsylvania Coal Company, it was 46.9 and on railroad bills it was only 38.
- 84. Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, pp. 203–06; Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 116–21; Thomas Houston to J. Alexander Fulton, January 5, 1853, Fulton MSS; Thomas C. Macdowell to Simon Cameron, September 13, 1853, Cameron MSS; James Reynolds to James Buchanan, September 20, 1853, Buchanan MSS (HSP); Charles A. Black to William Bigler, September 2, 23, 1853, G. G. Wescott to Bigler, October 10, 1853, Bigler MSS. The index of partisan disagreement on legislative votes regarding prohibition was only 16.3 in 1852 and 26 in 1853. Prohibition, that is, evoked far less partisan cohesion than any economic issue.
- 85. The 1853 Pennsylvania returns for canal commissioner can be found in Mueller, Whig Party in Pennsylvania, p. 206; those for 1851 and 1852 are on pp. 190 and 200, respectively. For turnout rates, see Gienapp, "'Politics Seem to Enter Into Everything,'" pp. 18–19. The turnout rate in 1853 was 51.3 percent; between 1840 and 1860, only the 41.5 percent rate in 1846 was lower. For the description of the Independent legislative slate in Philadelphia, see William Pettit to John M. Niles, December 8, 1853, Welles MSS (LC).
- 86. Whigs had last carried New Jersey in 1848. New Jersey remains the least studied of all northern states in the antebellum period, and I have relied almost exclusively on Renda, "Railroads, Revenue, and Reform." Renda demonstrates that beginning with the 1849 legislative session, Whigs achieved much less cohesion on roll-call votes concerning economic legislation than Democrats and that not only railroad legislation but also taxes and even public education involved trade-offs between interest groups and localities that utterly fragmented statewide party coalitions. The very complexity of the issues now on the government's agenda, in sum, prevented statewide party organizations from addressing them, lest they lose votes in some communities while attempting to gain them in others.
- 87. Renda, "Railroads, Revenue, and Reform," pp. 125–36; the Gloucester Constitution, November 9, 1852, and Sussex Register, November 6, 1852, are quoted on pp. 124–25.
- 88. Ibid., pp. 137–38; for the background of the temperance issue in New Jersey, see pp. 108–16.
- 89. In addition to Renda's M. A. thesis, I have used Kierner, "'The Motley Party.'" The 1853 election is analyzed on pp. 13–21.
- 90. Robert McLane to Caleb Cushing, October 14, 1853, Cushing MSS; McLane to William L. Marcy, October 21, 1853, Marcy MSS (LC); Evitts, Matter of Allegiances, pp. 57–58.
- 91. McLane to Marcy, October 21, 1853, Marcy MSS; Z. Collins Lee to William H. Seward, October 13, 1853, Seward MSS (RU); John Thompson to James Buchanan, February 20, 1854, Buchanan MSS (HSP). In the 1850 gubernatorial election, the results had been Democrats, 36,349 (51 percent); Whigs, 34,858 (49 percent). In 1853 they were Democrats, 39,087 (52.8 percent); Whigs, 34,939 (47.2 percent). In the legislature, Whigs increased their share of seats in the house from 41 percent in 1851 to 53 percent in 1853; the corresponding change in the senate was from 50 to 64 percent. In heavily Democratic Baltimore, Whigs threw their support to an independent

Maine Law ticket that included five Whigs and five Democrats and that defeated the regular, antiprohibition Democratic legislative ticket. See Evitts, Matter of Allegiances, pp. 61–62; and Bowers, "Ideology," 206–07.

- 92. McLane to Cushing, October 14, 1853, Cushing MSS. In 1851 Walsh won narrowly, 6,683 to 6,453; in 1853, he lost almost as narrowly, 6,440 to 6,792.
 - 93. Baltimore American, November 4, 1853, quoted in Bowers, "Ideology," 208-09.
- 94. Little separated the contending parties in 1853. Democrats asserted that old Whig measures like a national bank and federal internal improvements were now dead letters, and they even praised the deceased Henry Clay to win over former Whig voters. Whigs, in reply, blasted the hypocrisy of the Democrats' crocodile tears for Clay. That the main argument was over a corpse symbolized the bankruptcy of partisan debate. Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," pp. 133–47.
- 95. I have included in the 1853 Democratic total, and thus in the gains Democrats made between 1851 and 1853, 5,590 votes cast for a dissident Democratic candidate in the first district who ran unsuccessfully against Speaker of the House Linn Boyd. A Whig had garnered 3,400 votes against Boyd in 1851, while another dissident Democrat that year had won 1,460. Thus it is likely that Whigs contributed some of the votes I have counted as Democrats.
- 96. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, February 15, 1852, CFP; Felix Zollicoffer to William Schouler, April 4, 1853, Schouler MSS.
- 97. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, July 4, 19, 1853, CFP; Andrew Johnson to David T. Patterson, December 3, 1852, and to Albert G. Graham, December 10, 1852, in Johnson Papers, pp. 92–97. Nathaniel Taylor and Watkins split 9,300 votes (63 percent) between them, allowing Democrat Brookins Campbell to win with 37 percent. Campbell, however, died on December 25, 1853, without ever going to Washington. Nathaniel Taylor won a special election in early 1854 and took the seat in March. The furious Watkins would oppose him again in 1855.
- 98. John Bell to William B. Campbell, January 6, 1853, CFP. For resentment of Bell among Tennessee's Whigs, see above, Chapter 18.
 - 99. Gustavus A. Henry to William B. Campbell, n.d. (1853), CFP.
- 100. Gustavus A. Henry to J. A. Shackelford, June 3, 1853 (quotation), G. A. Henry to Marion Henry, July 3, 1853, Henry MSS; William B. Campbell to David Campbell, July 4, 1853, CFP.
- 101. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, August 10, 1853 (quotation), Thomas J. Campbell to William B. Campbell, September 9, 1853, CFP; Gustavus A. Henry to J. O. Shackelford, June 3, 1853, Henry MSS; Andrew Johnson to David T. Patterson, December 3, 1852, to Albert G. Graham, December 10, 1852, to A. O. P. Nicholson, September 8, 1853, and to the Democrats of Maury County, September 18, 1853 (quotation), in Johnson Papers, pp. 92–97, 167–71.
- 102. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, August 10, 15, 1853, Gustavus A. Henry to William B. Campbell, August 26, 1853 (quotation), CFP. The gubernatorial results in 1851 had been: Whigs, 63,423 (50.7 percent); Democrats, 61,648 (49.3 percent). In 1853, they were: Whigs, 61,163 (49.1 percent); Democrats, 63,413 (50.9 percent). The changes in the legislature, the first to be elected under the Henrymander, were:

	I	House	Senate
	Whigs	Democrats	Whigs	Democrats
1851	39	36	16	9
1853	44	31	12	13

For figures on the legislature, I have relied on Johnson Papers, p. xx; and William B. Campbell to David Campbell, August 15, 1853, CFP.

103. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, August 10, September 23, 1853, John Bell to W. B. Campbell, August 14, 1853, Gustavus A. Henry to W. B. Campbell, August 26, 1853, CFP; G. A. Henry to Marion Henry, October 9, 14, 1853, Henry MSS.

- 104. Cave Johnson to James Buchanan, November 20, 1853, Buchanan MSS (HSP).
- 105. Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 153-54.
- 106. On Winston, see Thornton, Power and Politics, pp. 321–30. The returns from the 1853 legislative elections are apparently missing, but it is clear that while some Whigs were elected, Democrats controlled both chambers. Bolling Hall was elected speaker of the house, and Clement Clay, Jr., expected the race for the Senate seat to be between himself and a Union Democrat like George Houston whom the Whig minority would support. David C. Humphreys to Bolling Hall, September 7, 1853, G. T. Yelverton to Hall, September 9, 1853, Clement C. Clay, Jr., to Hall, September 30, 1853, Hall MSS.
- 107. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 278–80, Jackson, Flag of the Union, January 28, 1853, quoted on pp. 278–79; Joshua Whitman to Charles D. Fontaine, January 7, 1853, Fontaine MSS.
- 108. Under the reapportionment after the census of 1850, Mississippi gained a fifth House seat. Because of a stalemate between the Union-dominated house and the Democratic senate, however, the legislature failed to redraw the districts and the new seat had to be filled in a statewide race in 1853. Mittendorf, "Mississippi Politics," pp. 46–47.
- 109. Albert G. Brown to John F. H. Claiborne, May 6, October 16, November 15, 1853, Claiborne MSS.
- 110. Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 280; N. S. Price to Charles D. Fontaine, June 15, 1853, Fontaine MSS.
- 111. On Fontaine's defeat by a Whig named Scruggs, see the note attached to Joshua Witman to Charles Fontaine, January 7, 1853, Fontaine MSS. The proportions of the vote won by Whig congressional candidates—Union Democrats ran as the Whig candidates in the first and second districts—were as follows: first, 48.4 percent; second, 49.3 percent; third, 44.4 percent; at-large, 45.9 percent. Wiley P. Harris, Democratic candidate in the fourth district, Brown's old bastion and the most heavily Democratic district in the state, ran unopposed.

The shift in legislative seats was as follows:

	1849		1851		1853
	House	Senate	House	Senate	House	Senate
Whig	36	10			37	10
Democratic Union Southern Rights	62	20	63 35	11 21	60	20

- 112. Toombs to John J. Crittenden, December 5, 1852, Crittenden MSS (LC); Howell Cobb to Alexander H. Stephens, February 2, 1853, Stephens MSS (LC); Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 170–71.
- 113. E. C. Cain to John M. Berrien, April 3, 1853, D. R. Mitchell to Berrien, May 5, 1853, William H. Underwood to Berrien, May 9, 1853, Berrien MSS.
- 114. Charles J. Jenkins to John M. Berrien, August 17, 1853 (quotations), Berrien MSS; Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 171–74.
- 115. Charles J. Jenkins to John M. Berrien, August 17, October 7, 22, 1853, William Hunter to Berrien, September 7, 30, 1853, Berrien MSS; Alexander Stephens to John Bird, July 20, 1853, Stephens MSS (LC); Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, pp. 173–75. Jenkins' vulnerability to the charge of privileging the rich stemmed from his support for the so-called Algerine Law, a municipal ordinance passed by his home town of Augusta in 1841 that limited the suffrage in city elections to those who owned property worth $1,000 or more.
- 116. Charles Jenkins to John M. Berrien, October 7, 22, 1853, Berrien MSS; Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, p. 174. The regression estimates come from an undergraduate seminar paper, Bobo, "Revelry, Reorganization, and Ruin."

117. Alexander H. Stephens to John Bird, July 20, 1853, Stephens MSS (LC); Jenkins to Berrien, October 22, 1853, Berrien MSS. The changes in the Whig and Union proportions of seats in the state house and senate between 1849 and 1853 were as follows:

	House	Senate
1849	49% Whig	50% Whig
1851	78% Union	83% Union
1853	45% Union Whig	50% Union Whig

- 118. Murray, Whig Party in Georgia, p. 175.
- 119. No returns for Alabama's 1853 legislative elections are reported in the data from the Inter-University Consortium.
- 120. The total of twenty-three southern Whigs in the House includes Nathaniel Taylor, who was elected in a special election in Tennessee's First District in early 1854.
- 121. Charles Shaler to Caleb Cushing, July 21, 1853, Cushing MSS; Samuel Treat to Stephen A. Douglas, December 18, 1853, Douglas MSS; Douglas to Charles H. Lanphier, November 11, 1853, Lanphier MSS.
 - 122. Hodge to Fillmore, September 26 (quotation), 30, 1853, MFP-O.
- 123. William L. Hodge to Millard Fillmore, October 6, 1853, MFP-O; Fillmore to John P. Kennedy, December 15, 1853, Kennedy MSS.
- 124. Fillmore to John P. Kennedy, October 14, 1853, Kennedy MSS; Samuel Treat to Stephen A. Douglas, December 18, 1853, Douglas MSS.
 - 125. Kennedy to Fillmore, November 26, 1853, copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 126. John P. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, December 4, 1853, copy, Millard Fillmore to John P. Kennedy, January 14, 1854, Kennedy MSS.
- 127. Alexander H. H. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, December 6, 1853, January 3, 1854, MFP-O. The quotations come from both letters, but I have mixed them rather than following Stuart's sequential order.
 - 128. M. Gross to Caleb Cushing, November 14, 1853, Cushing MSS.
- 129. On the origins of Know Nothingism, see my "The Antimasonic and Know Nothing Parties," pp. 593–94; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 92–93; and Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 20–51.

CHAPTER 22

- 1. Alexander H. H. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, December 6, 1853 (quotation), January 3, 1854, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, December 12, 17, 1853, MFP-O; John P. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, December 4, 1853, copy, Millard Fillmore to Kennedy, December 15, 1853 (quotation), Kennedy MSS.
- 2. Jeffrey L. Dugger to Richard Yates, January 22, 1854, Yates MSS; William H. Seward to Thurlow Weed, December 12, 1853, Weed MSS (RU); Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, December 17, 1853 (quotation), MFP-O; John Bell to William B. Campbell, December 13, 1853, quoted in Parks, Bell, p. 282.
 - 3. Handlin, Boston's Immigrants, p. 355, n. 85.
- 4. For an alternative interpretation of the growth of northern Know Nothingism that discounts economic factors, acknowledges even while downplaying nativism and anti-Catholicism, and stresses instead anti-Nebraska or antislavery sentiment, see Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery. Delineating my disagreements with Anbinder's interpretation would require a separate essay. My own interpretation of Know Nothingism is presented in Political Crisis, pp. 154–81, and two essays, "The Antimasonic and Know Nothing Parties" and "The Politics of Impatience." In Origins, pp. 69–102 and passim, William E. Gienapp supports my argument that Know Nothingism grew for reasons independent of the Nebraska Act and that it played a central role in gutting northern Whiggery. Like Anbinder, however, he minimizes the role of economic dislocation and hardship in spawning Know Nothingism. In contrast, Fogel, Without Consent or Contract, pp. 354–80, gives the economic immiseration of native-born laborers and their resulting resentment of immigrant competition top billing in his explanation of Know Nothingism.

- 5. See, for example, the studies cited in the preceding note.
- 6. Stephen A. Douglas to Charles H. Lanphier, November 11, 1853 (quotation), Lanphier MSS; Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 144–48; Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 395–434; and Nichols, "Kansas-Nebraska Act."
- 7. In addition to the sources cited in note 6, see Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 346–52; Freehling, Road to Disunion, pp. 536–65; and Wolff, "Party and Section."
- 8. For an explicit statement of Douglas' hope that his bill "will form the test of Parties," see Stephen A. Douglas to Charles H. Lanphier, February 13, 1854, Lanphier MSS. For his confidence that popular sovereignty embodied "the great principle of self government" and that "surely the people of this country are never going to decide that the principle upon which our whole republican system rests is vicious & wrong," see Stephen A. Douglas to Howell Cobb, April 2, 1854, in Phillips, "Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," p. 343.
- 9. Parks, Bell, pp. 284–85; Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 395–434. I have relied heavily on Johannsen's wonderfully detailed analysis of the Senate's action on the Kansas-Nebraska bill in this and succeeding paragraphs. Like Douglas, northern Whig congressmen recognized that popular sovereignty had far more positive appeal than the negative onus of repealing the Missouri restriction. See, for example, Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, February 18, 1854, MFP-O. That awareness explains why northern Whigs from the start portrayed Douglas' bill as repeal.
 - 10. Johannsen, Douglas, p. 406.
- 11. Ibid., pp. 407–08; Seward to Weed, January 7, 8, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); Jabez Hammond to William H. Seward, February 28, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); for other Democratic reactions to the bill voicing the delight that Hards had established a litmus test for Softs, see Holt, Political Crisis, p. 146. My inference about Seward's calculations regarding southern Whig behavior rests on many contemporary statements that repeal violated the spirit and letter of the platform southern Whigs had imposed on the party. See, for example, Truman Smith to John Wilson, May 26, 1854, John Wilson MSS.

Seward's hope of portraying Douglas' bill as "the repeal of the Missouri Compromise" casts light on his subsequent claim that he later instigated Kentucky Whig Senator Archibald Dixon to try to amend Douglas' bill with an open repeal of the Missouri Compromise restriction. Seward's claim has provoked considerable dispute among historians, if only because the sources, mostly consisting of reminiscences written much later, conflict with each other. William J. Cooper and William W. Freehling both argue persuasively that Dixon needed no prodding from Seward to do what the exigencies of southern politics demanded, and they are surely correct that some Southerner, Whig or Democrat, would have moved for outright repeal without northern prompting. But their argument says nothing about Seward's intentions in January 1854. Seward's supposed intervention with Dixon is compatible with the position he had assumed since 1850 namely, that northern and southern Whigs must once again agree to disagree about slavery issues and take opposite positions in each section when seeking votes. Initially in 1854, however, Seward apparently saw explicit repeal as the best way to force southern Whigs to join northern Whigs in opposing Douglas' bill. But if Seward expected Clayton to rally southern Whigs against repeal, that rally would surely have been less likely if a southern Whig, rather than a Democrat, first proposed it. At the very least, that is, if Seward approached Dixon, as he later claimed, he changed his mind after January 8.

- 12. On southern Whig contempt for squatter sover eignty, see Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 288–92.
- 13. William C. Dawson to Linton Stephens, December 21, 1853, Alexander H. Stephens MSS (LC).
- 14. For Sumner's amendment, see Donald, Sumner, p. 250. In January, when both Dixon and Sumner spoke, the Nebraska bill had not yet been formally placed on the Senate agenda for debate and possible amendment. Thus, on January 16, Dixon did not offer an amendment that required a vote to adopt or reject it. Rather, he only announced his intention of offering an amendment when appropriate. Democrats could thus head off the amendment and a vote on it by changing the bill before it was formally placed on the Senate agenda.

- 15. As Freehling puts it, in Road to Disunion, p. 553, "an exasperated Southern Whig had defied the Democracy to go all the way for the South."
 - 16. Congressional Globe, 33rd Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 239-40.

Dixon's very protests that he did not act for the partisan purpose of embarrassing southern Democrats, of course, may be read as evidence that he did.

17. Freehling, Road to Disunion, p. 555, stresses the parallel between Dixon's proposed amendment and the one moved by Brown in 1844. The overweening Dixon had infuriated many Kentucky Whigs by demanding the party's 1851 gubernatorial nomination, then losing the race because of abstention by disgusted Whigs, and then demanding one of the Senate seats at the disposal of the Whig legislature as a consolation prize for running the gubernatorial race in the first place. Dixon was serving out the term to which Clay had been elected in early 1849, a term that ended on March 3, 1855. In sum, he badly needed to burnish his reputation with Kentucky Whigs or, alternatively, to woo Democrats in order to offset Whig opposition to him. Since Kentucky's Whigs had always been nationalists rather than proslavery extremists, winning favor with Democrats may have been his primary intention, an interpretation supported by his immediate endorsement of Douglas' revised bill on January 24. In any event, his proposed amendment failed to mitigate Kentucky Whigs' animosity. In early February 1854, the legislature elected Dixon's old nemesis, John J. Crittenden, to replace him for the term that began in March 1855. See Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 299, n. 58, citing a February 24 newspaper account of a public dinner in Kentucky honoring Crittenden's election to the Senate.

Jones had outraged many Tennessee Whigs by his naked ambition for the vice presidential nomination in 1852 and his early support for Scott's candidacy when the vast majority of Tennessee's Whigs preferred Fillmore. Since support for Scott prior to the Whig national convention was interpreted as an antislavery, antisouthern stance, moreover, Jones had even more incentive to reaffirm his proslavery credentials by supporting repeal of the Missouri Compromise line. Regardless of Seward's later claims and the likelihood that some Southerner of either party might move for repeal, that is, there were specific political reasons why these two men seized the initiative.

- 18. Johannsen, Douglas, p. 411.
- 19. Freehling, Road to Disunion, pp. 552–60. The quoted passage reaffirming popular sovereignty was actually presented by Douglas in a later amendment on February 7, not in the January 23 version of the bill. That version dropped the twenty-first section and reverted to the original language of the January 4 bill granting the territorial legislatures authority over "all rightful subjects of legislation." Congressional Globe, 33rd Cong., 1st Sess., p. 353; Johannsen, Douglas, pp. 405–18.
- 20. Seward to Wife, January 29, 1854, in Seward at Washington, pp. 217–18. Seward and others could legitimately blame repeal on Hard pressure, for two days before Dixon offered his amendment, the Washington Sentinel, edited by Beverley Tucker, the man Hards had helped elect Senate printer over the administration's preferred candidate, demanded that Douglas change the bill to include overt, direct repeal. Johannsen, Douglas, p. 411.
- 21. William H. Seward to Wife, January 29, 1854, in Seward at Washington, pp. 217–18; Hamilton Fish to Thurlow Weed, January 25, February 3, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); John Minor Botts to William Schouler, March 26, 1854, Lewis Campbell to Schouler, May 22, 1854, Schouler MSS; Truman Smith to John Wilson, April 27, 1854, Wilson MSS; Elihu Washburne to James S. Pike, May 8, 1854, Israel Washburn to Pike, May 13, 1854, Lewis Campbell to Pike, May 14, 24, 1854, Pike MSS.
- 22. On November 26, 1853, before the opening of the congressional session, for example, Ohio's Lew Campbell wrote William Schouler, who had agreed to move from Boston to take over the Cincinnati Gazette, "The hour looks dark for Whigs in Ohio, but the live young fellows can win. The Old Silvers have tried long enough. Let us now go to work and galvanize the concern and put it on the platform it occupied before '48, where it naturally belongs, and will feel easy." Schouler MSS.

- 23. Roger Sherman Baldwin to Truman Smith, February 18, 1854, BFP; Campbell to James S. Pike, May 22, 1854, Pike MSS; William H. Seward to New York Anti-Nebraska Meeting, January 28, 1854, in Seward at Washington, p. 218.
- 24. Edward Kent to Israel Washburn, March 9, 1854, Israel Washburn MSS (Norlands). That Sewardites intended to heavyhandedly remind northern Whig voters of conservatives' fatal mistake in supporting the Compromise was made clear in Seward's letter of January 28, 1854 to a New York anti-Nebraska meeting, cited in note 23. "It is quite clear," he wrote, "that if we had maintained our ground on the laws of freedom which then protected New Mexico and Utah, we should not have been attacked in our stronghold."
- 25. Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, January 29, 1854, MFP-O; Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, February 6, 13, 1854, Millard Fillmore to Everett, February 8, 1854, Everett MSS; Truman Smith to Roger Sherman Baldwin, January 28, 1854, BFP.
- 26. Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, January 29, 1854, MFP-O; Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, February 6, 13 (quotation), 1854, Everett MSS; Winthrop to John Pendleton Kennedy, January 31, February 27, 1854 (quotations), Kennedy MSS; Edward Kent to Israel Washburn, March 9, 1854, Washburn MSS (Norlands).
 - 27. John T. Bush to Fillmore, January 19, 1854, MFP-O.
 - 28. Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, February 12, 1854, MFP-O.
- 29. Ogden Hoffman to William H. Seward, March 5, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); B. Thompson to Daniel Ullmann, May 16, 1854, Ullmann MSS. Democrats also noted that the Nebraska bill induced the previously divided New York Whigs to reunite. See, for example, T. M. Parmalee to Caleb Cushing, February 15, 1854, Cushing MSS.
- 30. Winthrop to Kennedy, January 31, February 27, 1854, Kennedy MSS; Daniel Lee to Fillmore, February 9, 1854, Alexander H. H. Stuart to Fillmore, February 16, 1854, MFP-O
 - 31. Winthrop to Kennedy, February 27, 1854, Kennedy MSS.
- 32. John Bell to William B. Campbell, August 10, 1854, CFP; D. A. Reese to Linton Stephens, May 20, 1854, Alexander Stephens MSS (LC); Schott, Stephens, pp. 163–73. Solomon Haven spoke with Toombs in the Senate chamber on February 17 while Seward was speaking against the Nebraska bill, and he reported to Fillmore that Toombs hoped the bill would produce "the entire separation of the south as a party from the north." Haven to Fillmore, February 18, 1854, MFP-O.
- 33. John P. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, February 19, 1854 (quotation), copy, Kennedy MSS; Alexander H. H. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, February 16, 1854, MFP-O; Truman Smith to John Wilson, January 31, April 27, 1854, John Wilson MSS; Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 285–305 (for Wade's warning to southern Whig senators, see p. 304, n. 77). For evidence that some southern Democrats also believed that repeal of the Missouri restriction was of little practical consequence because slavery would never be established in Kansas or Nebraska, see William B. W. Dent to Herschel V. Johnson, June 13, 1854, Johnson MSS; and J. L. M. Curry to Clement Claiborne Clay, July 5, 1854, Clement C. Clay MSS. "So far as the introduction of slavery [into Kansas or Nebraska] is concerned," Curry wrote Clay in explaining southern apathy about the bill, "such a consummation is hardly hoped for."
- 34. John Bell's long speeches in late May justifying his vote against Nebraska summarize almost all the arguments other southern Whigs made against the bill. They can be found in Congressional Globe, 33rd Cong., 1st Sess., Appendix, pp. 755–57, 939–48, quotation on p. 945. See also John Minor Botts to William Schouler, March 26, April 9, 1854, Schouler MSS; E. R. Jewett to Millard Fillmore, February 18, 1854, MFP-O; J. Wales et al. to John M. Clayton, February 13, 1854, Clayton MSS; Orsamus B. Matteson to Thurlow Weed, May 22, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); John J. Crittenden to Presley Ewing, March 6, 1854, Crittenden to Archibald Dixon, March 7, 1854, Crittenden MSS (LC); Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 285–99; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 351–54; and Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," pp. 168–69.
 - 35. The "Appeal" is quoted in Johannsen, Douglas, p. 418.
 - 36. Oran Follett to Thomas Ewing, May 1, 1854, EFP.
 - 37. Joshua R. Giddings to Joseph R. Hawley, March 13, 1854, Hawley MSS.

- 38. Benjamin F. Wade to Milton R. Sutliffe, April 21, 1854, Sutliffe MSS; Ben Wade to Caroline Wade, May 6, 1854, Wade MSS.
- 39. Fillmore to Everett, February 8, 1854, Winthrop to Everett, February 6, 13, 1854, Everett MSS; Winthrop's public letter of October 15, 1855, is quoted in Gienapp, Origins, p. 73.
- 40. Winthrop to Everett, February 13, 1854, Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, March 21, 1854, Everett to ?, April 24, 1854, Everett MSS; Edward Kent to Israel Washburn, March 9, 1854, Israel Washburn MSS (Norlands).
- 41. Edward Kent to Israel Washburn, March 9, 1854 (quotation), Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, February 13, May 12, 1854, Edward Everett to ?, April 21, 1854, Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, March 21, May 5, 12 (quotation), 1854, Everett MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, February 27, 1854, Kennedy MSS; Donald, Sumner, p. 257.
- 42. The few outright Whigs from the lower South—other than the independent Union Whigs from Alabama and Georgia, James Abercrombie, Alexander Stephens, Robert Toombs, and D. A. Reese—included Representative Theodore G. Hunt of Louisiana and Senators Judah P. Benjamin of that state, William C. Dawson of Georgia, and Jackson Morton of Florida.
- 43. In July a St. Louis Whig wrote Fillmore that nine-tenths of Missouri's Whigs opposed repeal of the Missouri Compromise line but that because Missourians were so anxious to have Nebraska formally organized, Missouri's Whig congressmen were obligated to support the bill. Henry W. Williams to Millard Fillmore, July 1, 1854, MFP-O.
 - 44. E. R. Jewett to Millard Fillmore, February 18, 1854, MFP-O.
- 45. Truman Smith to John Wilson, January 31, 1854, Wilson MSS; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 351–54, Richmond Whig, quoted on p. 354.
- 46. Smith to John Wilson, January 31, 1854, John Wilson MSS; Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, January 29, February 12, 1854, Charles Davies to Fillmore, February 1, 1854, E. R. Jewett to Fillmore, February 18, 1854, MFP-O. Clayton's speech is quoted in Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 293.
- 47. Congressional Globe, 33rd Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 222, 353; Nichols, Blueprints for Leviathan, pp. 99-103; Johannsen, Douglas, p. 428. Clayton's amendment, reflecting the emerging anti-immigrant feeling among Whigs, restricted the right to vote and hold office in the territories to citizens. Since immigrants were thought to be hostile to slavery extension, barring them from political participation in the territories was considered prosouthern. Simultaneously, Clayton's amendment made the bill more difficult for House Democrats from the North to support, and it would be deleted from the version that the House passed. Badger's amendment had a different purpose. Aware of the sensitivity among southern Whigs to Northerners' charge that repeal of the Missouri prohibition marked an aggressive attempt actually to extend slavery—an extension that southern Whigs continually denied would occur—Badger stated explicitly that repeal of the Missouri ban would not automatically reinstate the laws that legalized slavery in the Louisiana Territory prior to the adoption of the 1820 prohibition. Put differently, Badger sought to mollify northern Whigs about the motives of southern Whigs in order to preserve party unity on other issues during the remainder of the congressional session. Unlike Toombs and Stephens, neither he nor other old line southern Whigs saw their support for the Nebraska bill as cause for a permanent sectional rupture of the Whig party. Certainly, they did not intend to precipitate a rupture by supporting the bill.
- 48. James Pearce of Maryland, John Thompson of Kentucky, and Jackson Morton of Florida did not attend. Tennessee's Whig Representative William Cullom later claimed to have been at this impromtu gathering, but he probably confused it with a different, bipartisan caucus a few days earlier that hammered out the final wording of the repeal and popular sovereignty provisions of the Nebraska bill, which the Senate, ironically, adopted on the afternoon of February 15. The caucus, and particularly Bell's role in it, were later angrily debated at great length in both the House and Senate, and those speeches provide the best accounts of it. Congressional Globe, 33rd Cong., 1st Sess., Appendix, pp. 755–57, 902, 939–48.
- 49. For the quotations see Toombs' account of the caucus and William Churchwell's citation of Badger's Senate speech, ibid., pp. 756, 902; Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 293; William Henry Seward to Mrs. Seward, February 16, 1854, in Seward at Washington, p. 219. Churchwell, a Democratic congressman from Tennessee, received a report of the caucus from Toombs and later used it on the House floor to accuse Bell of betraying his word as well as the South when he voted against the bill.

- 50. In May, Pearce supported the revised version of the bill reported back to the Senate from the House, the passage of which was absolutely certain, and in March some newspapers declared that he would have supported the bill had he been present for the vote on March 4. Yet Pearce did not attend the southern Whig meeting on February 15, and on February 17, when Solomon Haven warned him that passage of the bill in its present form would outrage the North and strengthen the antislavery wing of the northern Whig party, Pearce told Haven that he hoped the bill would be modified to mollify northern Whigs prior to its passage. Haven to Millard Fillmore, February 18, 1854, MFP-O.
- 51. Congressional Globe, 33rd Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 532, 550. Everett, James Cooper, and Samuel Phelps of Vermont were the northern Whigs who missed the vote. Joining Bell in opposition were two Free Soilers, four northern Democrats, and only six northern Whigs—Seward and Hamilton Fish of New York, Truman Smith of Connecticut, Solomon Foot of Vermont, William Pitt Fessenden of Maine, and Ben Wade of Ohio. Subsequent attempts by Everett and Clayton to have negative votes recorded were ruled out of order.

Over a month after the Senate vote, John Minor Botts reported that Bell had been so frightened by the anger of other southern Whigs when he spoke against the Nebraska bill in the afternoon of March 3 that he had determined to duck the final vote on it. According to Botts, only pressure from Seward and three Tennessee Whig representatives who were also publicly committed against the bill—William Cullom, Emerson Etheridge, and Robert Bugg—finally persuaded Bell to stand up and cast a negative vote. John Minor Botts to William Schouler, April 9, 1854, Schouler MSS.

52. Edward Kent to Israel Washburn, March 9, 1854, Israel Washburn MSS (Norlands). One might stretch my counterfactual case totally beyond the boundaries of plausibility by adding the vote of Toombs to the negative column. In that case, theoretically, a 24–24 tie would have developed, and with no vice president to break it (William R. King had died in 1853), a tie could have defeated the bill. Yet if one is going to add absent Whigs, one must also add absent Democrats, and three Democratic senators, including Florida's Stephen Mallory, missed the vote. He certainly, and the others probably, would have supported the bill and secured its passage.

Phelps undoubtedly opposed the measure, and he most likely failed to vote because his right to represent Vermont in the Senate was under challenge. He had been appointed in January 1853 to fill the seat upon the death of William Upham, but in the fall of 1853 the Vermont legislature had failed to ratify that gubernatorial appointment by formally electing him. On March 16, 1854, twelve days after the vote on Nebraska, the Senate's Democratic majority expelled Phelps, and the seat would remain empty until the new Vermont legislature, elected in September 1854, chose Lawrence Brainerd, a Free Soiler, to complete Upham's term during the second session of the Thirty-Third Congress.

- 53. Truman Smith to John Wilson, April 27, 1854, John Wilson MSS. The best account of maneuvering in the House is Nichols, Blueprints for Leviathan, pp. 104–21.
- 54. Nichols, Blueprints for Leviathan, pp. 110–20; Schott, Stephens, pp. 166–70; D. A. Reese to Linton Stephens, May 20, 1854, Alexander H. Stephens to Thomas W. Thomas, May 23, 1854, Stephens MSS (LC).
- 55. Congressional Globe, 33rd Cong., 1st Sess., p. 1195; Nichols, Blueprints for Leviathan, p. 116, cites a different vote of postponement that carried 137–66 and set May 20 as the closing date for debate on the Nebraska bill. What explains the discrepancy between his total and the vote listed on p. 1195 of the Globe is unclear.
- 56. Here and elsewhere, unless noted otherwise, my total of twenty-four southern Whig representatives includes the three Unionists, Stephens and Reese of Georgia and Abercrombie of Alabama.
 - 57. Congressional Globe, 33rd Cong., 1st Sess., pp. 1254-55.
- 58. The quotations come from John Bell's speech of May 25, 1854, which can be found in the Congressional Globe, 33rd Cong., 1st Sess., Appendix, p. 948.
 - 59. Eric Foner, for example, has written: "We can date almost exactly the final collapse of the [second-party] system—February 15, 1854—the day a caucus of southern Whig Congressmen and Senators decided to support Douglas' Nebraska bill despite the fact that they could have united with northern Whigs in opposition both to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and to the revival of sectional agitation." Foner, "Politics, Ideology," p. 26. Foner here confuses earlier bipartisan caucuses attended by Whigs from both houses of Congress with the February 15 meeting of southern Whig senators, but he is absolutely correct that the demise of the Whig party was central to the collapse of the second party system. Nonetheless, Foner minimizes the number of Whig leaders who wanted to stop a sectional rupture in the party and thus dates it prematurely. Although he alludes to erosion from local Whig organizations over temperance and nativism in a note on the same page, he also seems to equate the rupture of Whigs' national leadership along sectional lines with the party's death. Yet a sectional rift among Whig politicians in Washington over the Nebraska issue did not automatically necessitate the abandonment of local and state Whig parties in the North and South, spell an end to their competitiveness, or indicate a readiness among Whig voters and politicos to join new sectional parties.

- 60. The most thorough study of roll-call voting patterns during the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress, which documents the continued cohesion among Whigs and Democrats on votes not related to Nebraska, is Wolff, Kansas-Nebraska Bill.
- 61. For the newspaper quotations, see Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 305–06; Cooper, Politics of Slavery, pp. 357–58.
 - 62. Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 306-07.
- 63. For state legislative resolutions from Tennessee, Louisiana, and Georgia, see Nashville Republican Banner, March 3, 1854, and Washington National Intelligencer, March 8, April 1, 1854.
- 64. D. A. Reese to Linton Stephens, May 20, 1854, Stephens MSS; William B. W. Dent to Herschel V. Johnson, June 13, 1854, Johnson MSS; Haven to Millard Fillmore, February 18, 1854, Fillmore MSS (MFP-O); Schott, Stephens, pp. 173–74, and Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 307, for quotations from Stephens in June.
- 65. Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 293; London, "Badger: His Last Years in the Senate," 246–47.
- 66. John Bell to William B. Campbell, August 10, 1854, CFP. Clayton was probably an exception to Bell's generalization. He had broached the possibility of forming a new party in 1853, and his nativistic amendment to the Nebraska bill, as well as one denying immigrants eligibility for homesteads under a bill debated in July, were clearly meant to appeal to the burgeoning Know Nothings, with whom those amendments, and Clayton, were wildly popular. See D. Rodney King to John M. Clayton, n.d., J. W. Wheelwright to Clayton, July 18, 1854, and F. A. Pettis to Clayton, July 19, 1854, Clayton MSS.
- 67. Cole, Whig Party in the South, p. 307; Louisville Journal, July 1, 1854, quoted in Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," p. 171; George S. Bryan to John P. Kennedy, August 23, 1854, Kennedy MSS; Logan Hunter to John J. Crittenden, September 22, 1854, Crittenden MSS (LC).
- 68. Alexander H. H. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, May 18, 1854, MFP-O. For other reports about enthusiasm for Fillmore spawned in different parts of the South by his trip, see John P. Kennedy to Elizabeth Kennedy, Mississippi River, March 23, 1854, George Bryan to John P. Kennedy, Charleston, April 5, 1854, Kennedy MSS; Joseph G. Baldwin to Alexander H. H. Stuart, Mobile, April 15, 1854, Stuart MSS; B. Edwards Gray to Fillmore, Washington, May 26, 1854, MFP-O.
- 69. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, May 18, 1854 (quotation), John P. Kennedy to Fillmore, May 28, 1854, Henry W. Williams to Fillmore, July 1, 1854 (quotation), MFP-O; George S. Bryan to John P. Kennedy, August 23, 1854, Kennedy MSS.
 - 70. John Bell to William B. Campbell, August 10, 1854, CFP.
- 71. William H. Seward to Frances Seward, February 16, 19, 1854, in Seward at Washington, pp. 219, 222; Thurlow Weed to Hamilton Fish, February 19, 1854, Fish MSS; Ohio State Journal, April 19, 1854, quoted in Foner, Free Soil, p. 194; Truman Smith to John Wilson, April 27, May 26 (quotation), 1854, John Wilson MSS. Wade's Senate speech is quoted in Cole, Whig Party in the South, pp. 304–05, n. 79.
 - 72. Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, February 12, 1854, MFP-O; B. D. Silliman to Hamilton Fish, March 4, 1854, Fish MSS; Edward Kent to Israel Washburn, March 9, 1854, Israel Washburn MSS (Norlands); Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, June 1854, Winthrop MSS.

- 73. Samuel Lewis to Salmon P. Chase, April 17, 1854, Chase MSS (HSP).
- 74. A. Willey to William Pitt Fessenden, July 12, 1854, Fessenden MSS (WRHS); Henry Wilson to Israel Washburn, May 28, 1854, Washburn MSS (LC); Gamaliel Bailey to James S. Pike, May 30, 1854, Pike MSS.
- 75. Henry Wilson to William H. Seward, May 28, 1854, Seward to Theodore Parker, June 23, 1854, copy, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 76. Gamaliel Bailey to James S. Pike, May 21, 1854, Pike MSS.
- 77. George E. Baker to William H. Seward, May 14, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); Haven to Fillmore, July 1, 1854, MFP-O. In his letter to James Pike of May 21, Gamaliel Bailey listed Campbell, Washburn, Walley, and Chandler as the Whig negotiators who arranged the multiparty anti-Nebraska caucus. Democrats were represented in those negotiations by Gilbert Dean of New York, Nathaniel P. Banks of Massachusetts, and Senator Charles James of Rhode Island, who voted against the Nebraska bill in the Senate and who, it will be recalled, had been elected by the Rhode Island legislature in 1851 with the help of thirteen dissident Whigs over the choice of the Whig caucus, James F. Simmons. In his letter of July 1 to Fillmore, Haven asserted that within Congress he was the recognized leader of northern conservative Whigs who "would only go where I would go, & would not go beyond me."
- 78. On the revival of conservatives' confidence in preserving an alliance with southern Whigs and nominating Fillmore, see Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, June 29, July 1, 1854, Alexander H. H. Stuart to Fillmore, May 18, 1854, B. Edwards Gray to Fillmore, May 26, 1854, Isaac Hazlehurst to Fillmore, July 7, 1854, William L. Hodge to Fillmore, July 21, 1854, MFP-O. For Truman Smith, see Smith to John Wilson, March 6, April 27, 1854, John Wilson MSS. Smith, who had sneered that the Whig party deserved death throughout 1853, returned to Congress for only one purpose: to work for passage of a federally chartered and subsidized Pacific railroad. In March he concluded that support for the Nebraska bill from California's two senators killed any prospect of passing that legislation, and in April he announced he would resign his seat on May 24.
- 79. Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, February 6, 1854, Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, August 31, 1854, Everett MSS; Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, February 27, 1854, Kennedy MSS; David Davis to Julius Rockwell, July 15, 1854, copy, David Davis MSS.
- 80. J. W. Jones to Thomas Ewing, February 9, 1854, Thomas Ewing to Columbus Anti-Nebraska Convention, March 14, 1854, copy, John Teesdale to Thomas Ewing, April 6, 1854, Oran Follett to Ewing, May 1, 1854, EFP.
- 81. Seward to Weed, May 29, 1854, Seward to Frances Seward, May 31, 1854, in Seward at Washington, p. 231; Gamaliel Bailey to James S. Pike, May 21, 30, 1854, Pike MSS.
- 82. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 89–90; Washington National Intelligencer, June 22, 26, 1854. A committee of seven Democrats and six Whigs apparently drafted the address, but newspapers failed to identify who they were. The address was printed in the June 22 issue of the Intelligencer, and my quotations in this paragraph come from that report.
- 83. Gamaliel Bailey to James S. Pike, quoted in Gienapp, Origins, p. 90; Edward Kent to Israel Washburn, June 25, 1854, Washburn MSS (Norlands); New York Courier & Enquirer, quoted in Washington National Intelligencer, June 26, 1854; William H. Seward to Frances Seward, June 22, 1854, in Seward at Washington, p. 234; Israel Washburn to James S. Pike, June 24, July 1, 1854 (quotations), Pike MSS.
- 84. Gienapp, Origins, p. 89; Gamaliel Bailey to James S. Pike, May 30, 1854, Pike MSS; Lewis Campbell to William Schouler, May 14, 1854, Salmon P. Chase to Schouler, May 28, 1854, Schouler MSS. For Elihu B. Washburne's eager embrace of Free Soil support for his reelection in 1854, see Solon C. Mimms to E. B. Washburne, August 24, 1854, B. Seeholm to Washburne, September 17, 1854, and Zebina Eastman to Washburne, September 18, 1854, Washburne MSS (LC).

As will be argued below, many anti-Nebraska northern Whig candidates welcomed Free Soil support in 1854, but they often believed they could get it without abandoning the Whig party or even seeking separate Free Soil nominations. By itself, in sum, soliciting Free Soil votes by no means indicated a desire to break up the Whigs and join a new party. Washburne was nominated separately by Whigs and Free Soilers, however, and the obvious confidence that Free Soilers like Seeholm and Eastman placed in his sincerity suggests that he, like his Maine brother, sought a new northern party to replace, not just provide additional support to reinforce, the Whig party.

- 85. For examples of northern Whigs' confidence and northern Democrats' fears that anti-Nebraska sentiment would make northern Whigs invincible in 1854, see George Patterson to Thurlow Weed, March 16, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); George E. Baker to William H. Seward, May 10, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); Holt, Political Crisis, p. 149.
- 86. J. B. Turner to Richard Yates, April 8, 1854, Paul Selby to Richard Yates, April 8, 1854, Yates MSS; William R. Larimer to James Pollock, quoted in Pittsburgh Daily Gazette, May 3, 1854; the Pennsylvania Whig address and the editors' reactions to it can be found in ibid., July 20, 22, 1854; for the attempt of Pittsburgh's Whigs to court Free Soil support without abandoning the Whig organization, see Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 136–38; Albany Evening Journal, May 26, July 13, 1854, quoted in Gienapp, Origins, p. 83.
 - 87. Seward to Theodore Parker, June 23, 1854, Seward MSS (RU).
- 88. Data on the returns for Rhode Island's legislative elections for 1854 are missing, so they cannot be compared to the 1853 results. Whigs gained about 900 votes between 1853 and 1854, and some of these may have come from Rhode Island's tiny Free Soil organization, which had no separate candidate in 1854. Disaffection among Democratic voters, however, clearly helped Whigs more than new supporters. Between 1853 and 1854, the Democratic vote fell from 10,371 to 6,484, whereas the Whig vote climbed from 8,228 to 9,112.
- 89. Amos Tuck to Israel Washburn, March 18, 1854, Washburn MSS; J. H. Wright to Caleb Cushing, March 18, 1854, Cushing MSS; Renda, "The Polity and the Party System," pp. 278–85.
- 90. Renda's regression estimates in "Polity and the Party System" suggest that 6 percent of Bell's 1853 supporters switched to Perkins in 1854; Bell lost about 500 votes between the elections, while Democratic turnout declined by about 1,200. I have used Renda's figures, p. 376, for changes in the legislature.
- 91. Renda, "Polity and the Party System," pp. 273–78; for expressions of Whig confidence in the Nebraska issue, see Roger Sherman Baldwin to Truman Smith, February 18, April 4, 1854, Baldwin to Bishop Perkins, March 28, 1854, BFP.
- 92. Roger Sherman Baldwin to Roger Sherman Baldwin, Jr., May 18, 1854, BFP; for the delight of Whig papers, see Gienapp, Origins, p. 85, n. 66.
- 93. For more on the Connecticut election, see Renda, "Polity and the Party System," pp. 285–88; and Gienapp, Origins, p. 85–86. Regression estimates by both Renda and Gienapp suggest that almost half of the 1853 Free Soil voters and one-seventh of the 1853 Democratic voters supported Chapman in 1854 and that he drew far more votes than any other candidate from previous abstainers.
- 94. M. H. Bartlett to Joseph R. Hawley, March 27, 1854, Moses Pierce to Hawley, March 27, 1854, H. Hammond to Hawley, March 30, 1854, C. M. Steele to Hawley, April 11, 1854 (quotation), Edmund Tuttle to Hawley, April 12, 1854, Julius Pratt to Hawley, April 18, 1854, Hawley MSS; Roger Sherman Baldwin to Roger Sherman Baldwin, Jr., May 18, 1854, BFP. The data from the Inter-University Consortium list no legislative returns for Connecticut, so the exact numbers in the senate are unclear. In the letter cited above, however, Baldwin said that the proportion of Whigs to Free Soilers in the senate was about the same as in the house. And in the house, as Lex Renda shows in "Polity and the Party System," p. 375, there were 110 Whigs, 17 Free Soilers, and 7 prohibitionists in opposition to 89 Democrats. After the 1853 elections, in contrast, there had been 145 Democrats, 68 Whigs, and 11 Free Soilers in the house and 15 Democrats, 5 Whigs, and 1 Free Soiler in the senate.
 - 95. The quotation is from Edmund Tuttle to Joseph R. Hawley, April 12, 1854, Hawley MSS.
- 96. Weed to Hamilton Fish, February 19, 1854, Fish MSS; Edwin B. Morgan to Thurlow Weed, March 8, 1854, O. B. Matteson to Weed, April 22 (quotation), May 18, 22, 1854, Weed

MSS (RU); Haven to Fillmore, July 1, 1854, MFP-O; Elihu B. Washburne to James S. Pike, May 8, 1854, Israel Washburn to Pike, May 13, 1854, Pike MSS; Raymond's letter to Fessenden and his editorial are quoted in Gienapp, Origins, p. 83.

Haven, who hated the necessity of cooperating with Sewardite "Woollies," it should be noted, was unimpressed by the favorable notices he got in the Sewardite press. He told Fillmore in the letter cited above that only his influence with other northern conservatives and southern anti-Nebraska Whigs caused those papers to shift from abusing to praising him. Those papers, he wrote, acted "from compulsion & not from love." Haven may have been correct about the motives of Morgan and Matteson, who arranged the favorable press reports, but his analysis only underscores to what lengths Sewardites would go in order to keep conservatives and Southerners under the Whig umbrella.

- 97. Seward to Thurlow Weed, May 29, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); for Seward's Senate speeches, I have relied on the descriptions in Van Deusen, Seward, pp. 152–54; and Nevins, Ordeal: House, pp. 140, 301. Nevins interprets Seward's acceptance of a contest for control of the territories between freedom and slavery as defiant of the South, but what pleased conservatives like Edward Everett, while miffing Free Soilers, was his equanimity and certitude that Northerners would prevail, a certitude that undercut the rationale for forming a new, exclusively northern party.
- 98. Henry Wilson to William H. Seward, May 28, 1854, Henry J. Raymond to Seward, May 30, 1854, Edward Everett to Seward, June 16, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); Gamaliel Bailey to James S. Pike, May 30, 1854, Pike MSS; Edward Kent to Israel Washburn, June 25, 1854, Washburn MSS (Norlands); A. P. Willey to William Pitt Fessenden, July 12, 1854 (quotation), Fessenden MSS (WRHS).
 - 99. John Pendleton Kennedy to M. F. Tupper, October 7, 1854, copy, Kennedy MSS.
 - 100. John Bell to William B. Campbell, August 10, 1854, CFP.
- 101. William H. Seward to Theodore Parker, June 23, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); Thurlow Weed to Hamilton Fish, February 19, 1854, Fish MSS.

CHAPTER 23

- 1. William Larimer to James Pollock, March 28, 1854, in Pittsburgh Gazette, May 3, 1854. Larimer lost the nomination to Pollock in part because he had only recently returned to the Whigs from Free Soiler ranks and Whig delegates, now confident of success, insisted that the nomination go to a Whig regular. For more on how the republican idiom suffused and defined resistance to the Nebraska bill, see Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 151–54; and Gienapp, Origins, pp. 4–5, 72, and passim.
- 2. On Indiana, see L. G. Matthews to William H. English, December 23, 1853 (quotation), English MSS; William Noel to John G. Davis, January 27, 1854 (quotation); A. D. Billingsley to Davis, May 13, 1854, John G. Davis MSS; and S. J. Ensley to Joseph Wright, February 24, 1854, Wright MSS. On New York, see Horatio Seymour to William L. Marcy, February 21, 1854, Marcy MSS (LC); John Austin to George E. Baker, April 18, 1854, Edward C. Delavan to William H. Seward, May 16, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); and George W. Patterson to Thurlow Weed, May 8, 1854, Weed MSS (RU).
- 3. L. R. Shepard to William L. Marcy, January 28, 1854, Marcy MSS (LC); George W. Morton to Hamilton Fish, February 27, 1854, Marcellus Ells to Fish, February 14, March 21, 1854, Fish MSS.
- 4. One index of the longevity of Whig identity and the continued influence of Whig principles on men who had once been affiliated with the party is the frequency with which historians stress the importance of that Whig heritage during the Civil War and Reconstruction. See, for example, David Donald's famous analysis of the Republican Abraham Lincoln's presidency, "Abraham Lincoln: Whig in the White House," in Donald, Lincoln Reconsidered; Boritt, Lincoln; Alexander, "Persistent Whiggery in the Confederate South"; and Perman, Road to Redemption.
- 5. Former Whig voters, of course, also abandoned the Whig party, often before leaders did, and in the analysis of the 1854 and 1855 elections below, I shall attempt to show when they did so and where they went. I focus on leaders here, however, for two related reasons. It is easier to ascertain and document the motives and reactions of leaders than of voters. We must infer the motives of the rank and file primarily from the remarks of contemporary observers and from how they voted. As noted above in the text, however, political leaders limited the range of political expression for voters by nominating the candidates and printing the ballots from which they had to choose. If Whig voters backed candidates who ran in open opposition to formally nominated Whig candidates, we can infer that they were prepared to leave or temporarily bolt the Whig party. But if Whig leaders refused to make formal Whig nominations and instead collaborated in the creation of fusion tickets that eschewed the Whig label, it is difficult to know, other than inferring from the abstention rate of previous Whig voters, whether they approved or disapproved of this leadership decision. Similarly, if, as was often the case, Whigs nominated candidates who afterward joined or accepted secret endorsements from the Know Nothings, we cannot know if Whig voters believed they were voting for a Whig or a Know Nothing. Whatever the insurgent inclinations of the Whig electorate, in sum, it was ultimately Whig leaders who decided to abandon the formal, independent operations of the Whig party, and that is the second reason for focusing on them.

- 6. The tortuously difficult process by which the Republican party was formed from the inchoate anti-Nebraska coalitions and from northern Know Nothings is superbly analyzed in Gienapp, Origins.
 - 7. John Law to William L. Marcy, September 25, 1854, Marcy MSS (LC).
- 8. All the evidence about editors and quotations from Whig papers in this paragraph are taken from Gienapp, Origins, pp. 104, 108, 113–14, 122.
- 9. Columbus Ohio State Journal, June 27, July 27, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 430. For other examples of such statements by the Ohio Whigs Wade, Follett, and Schouler, see the quotations cited in Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 190, 198.
- 10. Ohio State Journal, July 17, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 430-31; Washington National Era, May 22, 1854, quoted in Berger, Revolution, p. 36.
- 11. Ohio State Journal, June 5, 1854, quoted in Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 199. The Michigan Republican platform is printed in Trefousse, "Republican Party," pp. 1185–88. For additional examples of these changes rung on the republican theme, see Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 152–54, 189–91; and Gienapp, Origins, pp. 71–77, 353–73, and passim.
- 12. Charles G. Irish, Jr., to Daniel Ullmann, March 1855, Ullmann MSS. My intention here and in the paragraphs below is not to provide a full-scale analysis of Know Nothingism. I have attempted a more thorough treatment in two articles, "Politics of Impatience" and "The Antimasonic and Know Nothing Parties," and in Political Crisis, pp. 156–70. See also Gienapp, Origins, and Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery.
 - 13. Holt, Political Crisis, p. 162.
- 14. Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 33–51, vigorously assaults arguments I have previously made that economic dislocation made the Know Nothings particularly attractive to young working-class artisans and lower-middle-class shopkeepers because the membership of four northeastern Know Nothing lodges he examined was not confined to those groups. But Anbinder provides no extended analysis of Know Nothingism in Ohio Valley cities, which unquestionably suffered economic dislocation in 1854, or a statistical analysis of Know Nothing voting support anywhere. Granted, some men who voted for Know Nothing candidates never joined the order, but it seems undeniable that the Know Nothing vote was particularly strong in working-class neighborhoods of Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Louisville, and St. Louis, just as it was in the industrial towns of Philadelphia County that had recently been merged with Philadelphia City.

Anbinder's contention, p. xii, that "southern Know Nothingism bore little resemblance to its northern counterpart," also strikes me as untenable. Is it credible that Know Nothingism in Baltimore, Wheeling, Louisville, St. Louis, New Orleans, or even Savannah grew for different reasons than it did in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Cincinnati, or Chicago? After all, even William B. Campbell, president of the Know Nothings' state council in Tennessee, a state with few large cities, wrote on January 4, 1855, "I have been astonished at the widespread feeling in favor of their principles—to wit, Native Americanism & anti-Catholicism—it takes everywhere." William B. Campbell to David Campbell, January 4, 1855, CFP.

Know Nothingism in the South was not different from Know Nothingism in the North, and it is precisely the simultaneous spread of the order in the South in 1854—before it converted itself publicly to the American party—when it was penetrating the North that raises questions about Anbinder's insistence that antislavery sentiment, not nativism, primarily explains that northern growth after May 1854.

Anbinder further contends, pp. 43–45, that until the end of May 1854 the order remained "a small-scale urban movement" and that it extended beyond large cities to small towns and the countryside starting only in June because of temperance and especially anti-Nebraska sentiment. That assertion, too, strikes me as dubious. His own evidence, p. 53, shows the strength of Know Nothings in small Pennsylvania towns prior to June, as do the examples, which I could easily have multiplied, that I give in the text below. Know Nothingism extended well beyond the boundaries of big cities—and of the North—before June, although his corollary contention that anti-Nebraska outrage often influenced the vote for Know Nothings and against Democrats even in the North's local elections is undoubtedly correct.

- 15. John Oscar Lorain to William L. Bigler, January 10, 1854 (quotation), E. A. Penniman to Bigler, June 8, 1854, Bigler MSS. The studies of Know Nothingism listed above all cite considerable evidence that Democrats joined the Know Nothings in droves.
- 16. Rutherford B. Hayes to Sardis Birchard, October 13, 1854, in Williams, ed., Hayes Diary, I, p. 470; Charles B. Ewing to Thomas Ewing, Jr., April 5, 1854, EFP; John M. Bradford to Thurlow Weed, June 24, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); William L. Hodge to Millard Fillmore, July 21, 1854, MFP-O.
 - 17. Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, p. 53.
- 18. Ross Wilkins to John McLean, January 11, 1855, McLean MSS (LC); William G. Brownlow, Americanism Contrasted with Foreignism, Romanism, and Bogus Democracy, excerpted in Silbey, Transformation of American Politics, pp. 53–57. The quotation from Whitney is taken from the excerpt from his Defence included in the appendix of my essay on "The Antimasonic and Know Nothing Parties," pp. 681–82.
- 19. J. H. Shirrard to William C. Rives, December 21, 1854, Rives MSS; Gideon Welles, draft article, October 1859, Welles MSS (Conn.HS).
- 20. George W. Mitchell to Alexander H. H. Stuart, June 20, 1854, Alexander H. H. Stuart MSS (LC); J. J. Henry to Daniel Ullmann, October 10, 1854, Ullmann MSS; Moses Kimball to Henry L. Dawes, August 28, 1854, Dawes MSS; Pittsburgh Gazette, February 24, 1855; Philadelphia North American and United States Gazette, June 8, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 538.
- 21. James R. Thompson to Daniel Ullmann, March 24, 1855, Ullmann MSS; Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, August 24, 1854, Greeley-Colfax MSS.
- 22. I now believe that I myself am probably guilty of such exaggeration in my previous publications on the Know Nothings.
- 23. Nonetheless, many men elected as Know Nothings to state legislatures and local offices were relative newcomers who seemed, especially to Whigs, both socially and politically obscure. Hence the patrician Boston Whig Edward Everett complained that one of the Know Nothings elected to Congress in Massachusetts was "some obscure person whose name I do not recollect," and in the legislature, of which Know Nothings won almost total control in November 1854, "the men brought forward & elected to office are for the most part small traders, mechanics & artisans, wholly unknown to the legislature." Similarly, Emily Baldwin, the extraordinarily perceptive wife of Connecticut's former Whig United States senator, observed that Know Nothings in that state intended to "put an entire set of new men in office who are very little known in any way." "Some of them [are] young men only four years from College and others are quite uneducated and as it now appears unfitted for their places." Edward Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, November 13, 1854, Everett MSS; Everett to Millard Fillmore, December 16, 1854, MFP-O; Emily Baldwin to Roger Sherman Baldwin, Jr., March 17, April 11, 1854, BFP.
 - 24. Haven to Millard Fillmore, December 9, 1854, MFP-O.
- 25. See, for example, many of the letters in 1854 to Daniel Ullmann and other New York Know Nothing organizers in the Ullmann MSS, as well as the correspondence between Millard Fillmore and Haven, Alexander H. H. Stuart, and John P. Kennedy that year.
 - 26. Vivus W. Smith to William H. Seward, September 4, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); William Fuller to John G. Davis, February 4, 1854 (quotation), John G. Davis MSS; William S. Hirst to William L. Bigler, June 10, 1854 (quotation), Bigler MSS; A. Bussey to William H. English, July 13, 1854 (quotation), English MSS; J. Glancy Jones to James Buchanan, July 9, 1854 (quotation), Buchanan MSS (HSP); John Law to William L. Marcy, September 25, 1854 (quotation), Marcy MSS; J. J. Billings to John Bell, December 11, 1854 (quotation), Polk-Yeatman Papers; Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, October 24, 1854 (quotation), Weed MSS (RU).

- 27. The data collected by the Inter-University Consortium list no returns for Arkansas' legislative elections in 1854.
- 28. These two paragraphs on Arkansas are based on the analysis in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 177–86. The quotation from Johnson appeared in a letter dated August 26, 1855, which Burnet found in the Memphis Daily Appeal, October 4, 1855, p. 182.
- 29. In the state house of representatives, Whigs' numbers grew from thirty-nine (31 percent of the total) to forty-eight (37.5 percent); the increase in the Senate was smaller, from eleven (33 percent) to twelve (36 percent).
- 30. In the only district Whigs did not carry, they ran no candidate of their own and instead let pro-Benton and anti-Benton candidates fight it out. The absence of a Whig candidate in the sixth district makes attempts to calculate the proportion of the total statewide vote by the two parties misleading. The more important point is that Whigs carried every congressional district in which they ran a candidate.
- 31. Frank Blair, Jr., to Francis P. Blair, Sr., March 19, 1854, Blair-Lee MSS; Henry W. Williams to Millard Fillmore, July 1, 1854, MFP-O. My analysis of the Missouri campaigns is based largely on Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 94–136.
- 32. Thomas C. Reynolds to Caleb Cushing, July 22, 1854, Cushing MSS; Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 108–111.
- 33. Frank Blair, Jr., to Francis P. Blair, Sr., January 28, October 23, 1855, Blair-Lee MSS. In the latter letter, the younger Blair presents evidence that Atchison joined the order. My analysis of the legislature's attempt to elect a new United States senator is based upon Burnet's research on Missouri, but the inferences as to why Whigs rejected Know Nothings are mine, not his.
- 34. St. Louis Missouri Democrat, December 3, 1855, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 144.
- 35. R. B. Scott to W. L. Scott, July 4, 1854, quoted in Kruman, Parties and Politics, p. 78. In the analysis below, I have relied heavily on Kruman's analysis of the 1854 campaign, pp. 75–79, 100–01.
 - 36. The relevant plank is quoted in Kruman, Parties and Politics, p. 100.
 - 37. Alfred Dockery to David F. Caldwell, March 10, 1854, Caldwell MSS.
- 38. Daniel M. Barringer to Elizabeth Barringer, June 23, 1854, Barringer MSS; see also J. R. Stubbs to David F. Caldwell, May 19, 1854, Caldwell MSS; and William W. Holden to Thomas L. Clingman, June 17, 1854, Clingman-Puryear Papers. For Patterson's 1854 race, see Kruman, Parties and Politics, p. 156.
- 39. The totals in the gubernatorial race were: Bragg, 48,705 (51.1 percent); and Dockery, 46,644 (48.9 percent). In contrast, in 1852 Whig candidate John Kerr had lost to Reid with 42,993 votes (47 percent). It is impossible to pinpoint what determined the outcome of individual legislative races, but at least some Whigs blamed their losses on defections to independent temperance tickets distributed by the Sons of Temperance. See Frank Amfield to David F. Caldwell, June 24, 1854, A. F. McDaniel to Caldwell, July 4, 1854, Caldwell MSS; Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 155–56.
 - 40. George S. Bryan to John P. Kennedy, August 23, 1854, Kennedy MSS.
- 41. For Florida's 1854 election, I have relied on Doherty, Whigs of Florida, pp. 58–61; Calabro, "Collapse of the Two-Party System in Florida"; and Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 306–19.
- 42. Floridian and Journal, July 13, 1854, quoted by Burnet in a draft, not the final version, of "Creating the 34th Congress." My analysis in these paragraphs rests entirely on Burnet's section about Florida and on the pages in Doherty, Whigs of Florida, previous cited.
- 43. These assertions are based upon regression estimates of voter movement in Calabro, "Two-Party System in Florida," pp. 35–39. Calabro ran both statewide estimates based on county-level returns as well as separate regional estimates for counties in eastern, central, and western Florida. The statewide estimates suggest that Brown attracted only four-fifths of Cabell's 1852 vote and three-fifths of his 1850 vote. Erosion was far heavier in middle Florida, conversely, former Whigs were most loyal in the western counties.

- 44. Clayton's October manifesto was printed in the New York Herald, October 4, 1854, and is quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 755. For his correspondence with Know Nothing politicians, see James Pollock to John M. Clayton, October 30, 1854 (quoting an earlier letter of Clayton to him), P. F. Causey to Clayton, November 23, December 22, 1854, June 6, 1855, Edward Joy Morris to Clayton, February 21, 1855, and Daniel Ullmann to Clayton, July 18, 1855, Clayton MSS; and Clayton to Daniel Ullmann, June 26, 1855 (quotation), Ullmann MSS. In December 1854, Solomon G. Haven, who by then had joined the order, told Fillmore that Clayton was not a member. Haven to Fillmore, December 9, 1854, MFP-O.
 - 45. Pollock to Clayton, October 30, 1854, Clayton MSS.
- 46. For evidence that a significant fraction of Delaware's Whigs despised the secrecy of the Know Nothings and were not members of the order, see John W. Houston to John M. Clayton, May 1, 1855, P. F. Causey to Clayton, June 6, 1855, and George Pepper Norris to Clayton, December 17, 1855, Clayton MSS.
- 47. Cullen won with 6820 votes (51.9 percent) to Riddle's 6,334 (48.2 percent); in 1852 Riddle, with 6692 votes (50.2 percent), had defeated Houston, with 6,630 (49.8 percent). Since Riddle's vote declined by 358 votes between the two elections while Cullen ran ahead of Houston by 190 votes, it seems likely that Democratic converts to Know Nothingism made the difference, especially if some Whigs refused to support Cullen because he was a Know Nothing.

The Biographical Directory of Congress does not list any previous political affiliation for, or any previous offices held by, Cullen prior to his election, unlike most of its brief biographical summaries. Hence Cullen may well have been a new man, "fresh from the ranks of the people."

- 48. John P. Kennedy to Millard Fillmore, July 5, 1854, William Christy to Fillmore, August 3, 1854 (quotation), Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, December 20, 1854, January 10, 1855, MFP-O; George S. Bryan to John P. Kennedy, August 23, 1854, Kennedy MSS; J. L. M. Curry to Clement Claiborne Clay, June 30, 1854 (quotation), C. C. Clay Family Papers; John J. McRae to J. F. H. Claiborne, November 10, 1854, Wiley P. Harris to Claiborne, December 8, 1854 (quotation), Claiborne MSS. For more evidence of the order's spread in Virginia, see Alexander H. H. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, November 11, 1854, MFP-O; and J. H. Shirrard to William C. Rives, December 21, 1854, January 29, 1855, Rives MSS.
- 49. On Virginia, for example, see Alexander H. H. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, November 11, 1854, January 1, 1855, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, December 20, 1854, MFP-O; J. H. Shirrard to William C. Rives, December 21, 1854, January 16, 1855, Rives MSS.
- 50. William B. Campbell to David Campbell, January 4, 1855, CFP; Wiley P. Harris to J. F. H. Claiborne, August 30, 1855, Claiborne MSS.
- 51. Alexander H. H. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, November 11, 1854, MFP-O; Albert Gallatin Brown to J. F. H. Claiborne, December 17, 1854, March 29, 1855, Claiborne MSS. For evidence of Democratic support for Know Nothings in Alabama, see George S. Houston to Thomas A. Hendricks, August 19, 1855, John G. Davis MSS; Houston to Thomas J. Key, June 20, 1855, Houston MSS.
- 52. On Virginia, see Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, December 20, 1854, MFP-O; Joseph Segar to Daniel Ullmann, December 9, 1854, Ullmann MSS; J. H. Shirrard to William C. Rives, January 16, 1855, Rives MSS. On Mississippi, see E. L. Acee to Charles D. Fontaine, 1855, William L. Sharkey to Fontaine, May 3, 1855, A. L. McWilliams to Fontaine, May 4, 1855, Fontaine MSS. Fontaine, a young Southern Rights Democrat, was the Know Nothing gubernatorial candidate in Mississippi in 1855.
- 53. William W. Shepard to William H. Seward, September 15, 1854, Seward MSS (LC); Bailie Peyton to John Bell, February 3, 1856, John Bell MSS.
- 54. William W. Shepard to William H. Seward, September 15, 1854, Seward MSS; for the thrust of the Whig campaign in California, I have relied on Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 197–201.
 - 55. John G. Baldwin to Millard Fillmore, September 30, 1854, MFP-O. The two victorious

Democrats garnered 36,819 and 36,542 votes, respectively, and the two Whigs won 34,741 and 34,411. The 45 percent of the house seats Whigs held was the largest share they ever won in that body.

- 56. William W. Shepard to William H. Seward, September 15, 1854, September 18, 1855, Cornelius Cole to Seward, September 19, 1855, Seward MSS (RU); Raul G. Ridley to John Wilson, May 29, 1855, Wilson MSS; Bailie Peyton to John Bell, February 3, 1856, John Bell MSS; John Bigler to William L. Bigler, September 12, 15, 1855, Bigler MSS. Know Nothings won 56 percent of the seats in the state house of representatives in 1855, but they divided the senate evenly with Democrats.
- 57. William W. Shepard to William H. Seward, September 18, 1855, Cornelius Cole to Seward, September 19, 1855 (quotations), and H. S. Love to Seward, October 19, 1855 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Samuel F. May to Nathaniel P. Banks, March 4, 1856, Banks MSS (LC).
- 58. Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, March 12 (quotation), June 5, 20 (quotation), 1854, Greeley-Colfax MSS; Benjamin F. Wade to Milton Sutliffe, April 21, 1854, Sutliffe MSS; and Lew Campbell to William Schouler, May 14, 1854, Schouler MSS.
 - 59. Schuyler Colfax to Kline Shryock, May 23, 1854, Colfax MSS (CHS).
- 60. For the congressional campaigns and lineage of anti-Nebraska congressional candidates I have relied on Burnet's extensive coverage of each state in his "Creating the 34th Congress." In addition, I have drawn heavily from the following secondary sources which the reader should consult for further detail: Gienapp, Origins, pp. 104–21; Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 68–73; Current, Wisconsin, pp. 217–24; Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties, pp. 234–53; Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 187–224; and, for Indiana, Brand, "Know Nothing Party in Indiana"; and Van Bolt, "Fusion Out of Confusion." Assertions about individual states below are based on these sources, and I shall eschew further citations to them except to cite direct quotations.
- 61. Samuel Lewis to Salmon P. Chase, April 17, 1854, Chase MSS (HSP); John D. Defrees to Samuel Judah, September 21, 1854, quoted in Van Bolt, "Fusion Out of Confusion," 377.
- 62. Without regression analysis, it is hazardous to estimate the extent of abstention by Whigs angered at the coalition with Free Soilers in the Republican party, but gross figures suggest very little defection. In 1854 the total vote for the three Republican congressional candidates was 32,321; in 1852 Whig totals ranged from 18,199 votes in the congressional election to 22,240 in the presidential race and the Free Soilers from 9,400 votes in the congressional election to 8,800 in the presidential race. Together, in sum, Whigs and Free Soilers had 31,000 between them in 1852, quite close to the Republican total in 1854. Since the entire Wisconsin congressional delegation, all Democrats, voted against the Nebraska Act in 1854, I assume that Democratic defections to the Republican column that year were minimal, but regression analysis could prove otherwise.
- 63. Joseph Warren to William H. Seward, November 12, 1854, Seward MSS (RU). For the details on Michigan, I have relied on Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties, pp. 217–65.
- 64. Detroit Tribune, quoted in Gienapp, Origins, p. 104; Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties, p. 241.
- 65. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 104–05; Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, July 26, 1854, Greeley-Colfax MSS; for the radicalism of the platform and later Whig meetings, see Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties, pp. 242–43, 244–47.
- 66. Formisano, Birth of Mass Political Parties, pp. 249–53; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 105–06, n. 13. Joseph Warren to William H. Seward, November 12, 1854, Seward MSS (RU).

In the gubernatorial poll in 1854, the Republicans won 43,652 votes (53 percent) and the Democrats, 38,676 votes (47 percent). In contrast, in the presidential election of 1852, the totals had been: Democrats, 41,842 (50.4 percent); Whigs, 33,859 (40.8 percent); and Free Soilers, 7,237 (9.8 percent). Since Democrats lost about 3,200 votes between 1852 and 1854, while the sum of the 1852 Whig and Free Soil votes was approximately 41,000, these figures suggest that most Whigs, whatever the strictures of the Advertiser against fusion, voted the Republican ticket and that former Whig voters constituted about three-fourths of the Republican coalition.

67. Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, July 4, 1854, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 40, 54.

- 68. Ohio's state People's platform did go slightly further by endorsing the Free Soil demand that no more slave states be admitted to the Union.
- 69. Cincinnati Gazette, July 17, 1854, quoted in Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, p. 200; Indiana State Journal, July 20, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 345.
- 70. All my evidence on individual congressional districts is taken from Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 432–76. I have not included Harrison and Campbell among the straight Whig nominees because both were Know Nothings who were publicly endorsed by Know Nothing newspapers prior to the election. Campbell, indeed, joined the order before he left Washington in the summer, and in the third district there were initially separate Whig and Know Nothing tickets, each headed by Campbell. The non-Know Nothing Whig candidates for the legislature and local offices on the separate Whig ticket eventually withdrew before the election, lest they divide the anti-Democratic vote.
- 71. For the statewide voter movement between 1852 and 1854, see Table 4.3 in Gienapp, Origins, p. 500. Inspection of the returns from the first and fourth congressional districts from 1852 and 1854 suggest that it was arithmetically impossible for the victorious People's candidates, both of whom were one-time Democrats, to have rolled up such heavy majorities unless virtually all previous Whig voters supported them, as do Gienapp's regression estimates of voter movement in Cincinnati between 1853 and 1854, ibid, p. 501. In contrast, in Edward Wade's district, total turnout declined by 17 percent between 1852 and 1854, and almost all of that decline apparently came from fractious Whigs. Wade attracted about 2,400 more votes in 1854 than in 1852, when both Whig and Democratic candidates had opposed him, and very few of those additional votes could have come from Democrats. But Whigs had garnered over 4,000 votes in 1852, suggesting that some 1,600 Whigs, or 40 percent of the total, abstained rather than support Wade. Similarly, total turnout plunged by 25 percent in Giddings' district between 1852 and 1854, and his total in the latter year was over 2,800 votes (30 percent) smaller than the combined Whig and Free Soil votes in 1852. Indeed, if those 2,800 voters were all recalcitrant Whigs, they represented over two-thirds of the normal Whig vote.
- 72. For the congressional nominations, Parker's House speech, and events in Parker's and Julian's district, I have relied on Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 332–90. For Julian's humiliation at the People's state convention, see Gienapp, Origins, p. 110. For Colfax's concerns, see Schuyler Colfax to Kline Shryock, July 24, 1854, copy, Schuyler Colfax MSS (Ind.SL); and Horace Greeley to Colfax, June 5, 20, 1854, Greeley-Colfax MSS. For identifications of the previous affiliations of the men on the People's state ticket, see John Law to William L. Marcy, September 4, 1854, Marcy MSS (LC).
- 73. In the presidential election of 1852, for example, when Indiana's voter turnout surpassed 80 percent, the totals for the three presidential candidates were: Pierce, 95,340 (52 percent); Scott, 80,901 (44.2 percent); and Hale, 6,929 (3.8 percent).
- 74. These events are detailed in Van Bolt, "Fusion Out of Confusion." For evidence of Democratic fears that the party's opposition to prohibition and the alienation of Methodists would produce Democratic defeats, regardless of the Nebraska Act, see, S. J. Ensley to Joseph Wright, February 24, 1854, John Hunt to Wright, July 22, 1854, Wright MSS.
- 75. Information on congressional nominations is again taken from Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress." People's conventions nominated candidates in all eleven districts, and in the four where Democrats received them, Whigs had attracted only 47 percent of the vote in 1852 in one and 46 percent in the other three.
 - 76. Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 71-72.
- 77. This paragraph is based primarily on Burnet's systematic study of congressional races, but for the events at Indianapolis, see also Gienapp, Origins, pp. 109–11.
- 78. Indiana State Journal, August 30, October 12, 14, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 344, 383–84; Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, September 29, 1854, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 40, 54–55; John Law to William L. Marcy, September 4, 25, 1854, Marcy MSS (LC).
- 79. John Law to William L. Marcy, September 4, 1854, Marcy MSS; Gienapp, Origins, Table 4.1, p. 498. I waffle in my estimate of how many Whigs abstained because of uncertainty over how to weigh the negative estimate in one of the columns of Gienapp's table.

- 80. Julian's diary entry for August 5, 1854, quoted in Gienapp, Origins, p. 110.
- 81. Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, February 5 (quotation), June 23, 1855, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 40, 62–63, 66; Orth to Will Cumback, April 14, 1855 (quotation), Schuyler Colfax to Cumback, April 16, 1855, Cumback MSS.

When national meetings of the Know Nothings in 1855 and 1856, in order to placate Southerners, refused to call for repeal of the Nebraska Act, Orth, Colfax, and Cumback, like many other northern Know Nothings, would bolt the order and join the new Republican party. Thompson, in contrast, hated the Republicans and was the key leader of the American party's presidential campaign in Indiana.

- 82. On Campbell's presidential ambitions, see Orsamus B. Matteson to William Schouler, December 14, 1854, Lewis D. Campbell to Schouler, December 26, 1854, January 1, February 15, 1855, Schouler MSS. The three letters from Campbell allude to his aspirations for the speakership as well, but see also Samuel W. Parker to Samuel Galloway, May 10, 1855, and Campbell to Galloway, May 16, 22, 1855, Galloway MSS.
- 83. Isaac Tucker to William Schouler, November 27, 1854, Orsamus B. Matteson to Schouler, December 14, 1854, Lewis Campbell to Schouler, December 26, 1854, January 1, 1855, Garrett Davis to Schouler, January 3, 19, 1855, Ezra Lincoln to Schouler, February 21, 1855, Schouler MSS.
- 84. For Iowa's disputes over antiblack legislation, the background of its Free Soilers, and their ultimate merger with Whigs in 1854, see Robert R. Dykstra's brilliant Bright Radical Star. For events in Iowa, I have also relied on Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 160–76, and Rosenberg, Iowa, pp. 84–144.

Of the obstacles inhibiting cooperation between Whigs and Free Soilers in 1854, Dykstra, p. 116, writes "that only a miracle could have brought Whigs and Free Soilers together, given the record of mutual betrayal that so bitterly divided them."

- 85. Dykstra, Bright Radical Star, pp. 116-17.
- 86. James W. Grimes to Elihu B. Washburne, July 13, 1854, Washburne MSS; Grimes to James S. Pike, August 14, 1854, Pike MSS; Dykstra, Bright Radical Star, pp. 126–27. Burnet identifies Thorington as a Know Nothing.
- 87. John T. Henry to David Davis, February 27, 1854, David Davis MSS; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 121–22, and Table 4.7, p. 502; Dykstra, Bright Radical Star, p. 127, and Table B.5, p. 288. Dykstra estimates that almost four-fifths of the Whigs abstained rather than vote for the Free Soilers, who were crushed by their Democratic opponents.

In the state legislative contests, Democrats retained a one-seat margin in the senate, compared to the nine-vote majority they had after 1852, but anti-Nebraska men won a ten-seat margin in the house, and Grimes admitted that there was "a small Whig majority on joint ballot according to old party lines." Grimes to James W. Pike, August 14, 1854, Pike MSS.

- 88. The first quotation is taken from the New York Tribune, August 10, 1854, and is cited by Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," 165. The second is quoted in Rosenberg, Iowa, p. 106, but he gives no date for the issue of the Tribune. For the makeup of Grimes' vote, see Table 4.7 in Gienapp, Origins, p. 502.
- 89. For the senatorial election, I have used Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 166–72; Dykstra, Bright Radical Star, p. 127; and Rosenberg, Iowa, pp. 111–13. Harlan's election was also achieved only because the Whig minority in the senate defied a vote by its Democratic majority not to go into joint session with the house to hold the election. Democrats thus challenged Harlan's election as invalid, and two years later, in January 1857, after Harlan had sat during the first term of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, the Senate's Democratic majority declared Harlan's election illegal.
- 90. The quotes from Grimes and an Iowa Free Soil meeting are in Dykstra, Bright Radical Star, pp. 129–30. Rosenberg, Iowa, pp. 129, suggests that Grimes wrote the initial call for the Republican state convention held on February 22, 1856.
- 91. On Illinois, I have relied primarily on Gienapp, Origins, pp. 122–27, and Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 685–752.
- 92. Solon C. Minns to Elihu B. Washburne, August 25, 1854, B. Seeholm to Washburne, September 17, 1854 (quotation), Washburne MSS (LC).

93. Joliet Signal, quoted in Springfield Illinois State Register, October 2, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 698. Burnet is also my source for the gist of Lincoln's speeches in the district. The party totals for the 1852 and 1854 elections were as follows:

1852		1854
Whig Dem. F.S.	8,268 (46%) 8,092 (45%) 1,603 (9%)	Whig/Republican Democrat	10,474 (62.8%) 6,215 (37.2%)

- 94. Zebina Eastman to Elihu B. Washburne, September 18, 1854, Richard S. Wilson to Washburne, September 19, 1854, Washburne MSS (LC).
- 95. Springfield Illinois State Register, September 23, 1854, quoted by Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 695–96.
- 96. Zebina Eastman to Elihu B. Washburne, December 14, 1854, C. H. Ray to Washburne, December 16, 29 (quotation), 1854, Washburne MSS (LC); J. O. Wilkerson to Richard Yates, December 10, 1854, Zebina Eastman to Yates, January 11, 1855 (quotation), Yates MSS.

According to lists of the new legislature's composition that Lincoln himself drew up, there were nine Whigs and five anti-Nebraska Democrats in the senate; in the house, twenty-eight Whigs, fourteen anti-Nebraska Democrats, and one abolitionist constituted the anti-Nebraska forces. Collected Works of Lincoln, II, pp. 296–98.

- 97. Abraham Lincoln to Elihu B. Washburne, February 9, 1855, in Collected Works of Lincoln, II, pp. 304–06; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 174–75.
- 98. The Whig state platform can be found in the Burlington Free Press, June 8, 1854, and the characterization of Royce can be found in ibid., June 14, 1854. Both are quoted by Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 220–21. Aside from cited correspondence, my account of Vermont is taken wholly from Burnet, pp. 212–35.
- 99. Nathan K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, December 5, 1854, MFP-O. Phelps, it will be recalled, had attended the first months of the Senate session in 1854, but he had refrained from speaking or voting until the Senate decided on his disputed claim to his seat. The Senate's Democratic majority rejected that dubious claim on March 16, 1854, leaving the vacant seat to be filled by the Vermont legislature elected in September.
- 100. For an example of Morrill's pledges of loyalty to the Whig party, see Justin Morrill to_____Barrett, October 11, 1854, draft, Morrill MSS.
- 101. John Abbot to Caleb Cushing, February 24, 1854, Cushing MSS; Israel Washburn, Jr., to James S. Pike, June 24, 1854, Pike MSS; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 129–33.
 - 102. A. Willey to William Pitt Fessenden, July 12, 1854, Fessenden MSS (WRHS).
- 103. Bangor Whig and Courier, May 27, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 249–50; Edward Kent to Israel Washburn, Jr., June 21, 25, July 27, 1854, Washburn MSS (Norlands); William Pitt Fessenden to James S. Pike, August 14, 1854, Pike MSS.
- 104. In order of appearance, the quotations are from George W. Ladel to Israel Washburn, Jr., July 29, 1854, Edward Kent to Washburn, June 25, July 27, 1854, Washburn MSS (Norlands); William Pitt Fessenden to James S. Pike, August 14, 1854, Pike MSS; and Austin Willey to Fessenden, July 12, 1854, Fessenden MSS (WRHS).
- 105. For Maine's congressional races, I have relied heavily on Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 236–304. On p. 300, n. 32, Burnet cites a September 8, 1854, issue of the Portland Eastern Argus as evidence that Know Nothings endorsed Wood and Morrill. Gienapp, Origins of the Republican Party, p. 132, also argues that Know Nothings accounted for the support Morrill would receive from previous nonvoters.
- 106. Kennebec Journal, July 14, 1854, quoted by Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 264; John Perry to William Pitt Fessenden, August 18, 1854, Fessenden MSS (LC).
- 107. Kennebec Journal, August 9, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 268-69.
 - 108. Kennebec Journal, September 8, 1854, quoted in ibid., 269. In 1852, Farley received 5,255 votes (36.4 percent); in 1854, his total sank to 3,587 (26.3 percent). Knowlton won in 1854 with only 5,995 votes, most of which presumably came from non-Whigs.

- 109. For estimates of voter movement from 1852 and 1853 to 1854, see Tables 5.1 and 5.2 in Gienapp, Origins, pp. 503–04.
- 110. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 133, 203–08; Austin Willey to Salmon P. Chase, March 25, 1855, Chase MSS (LC).
- 111. Gienapp, Origins, p. 133, and Table 7.8, p. 512; George R. Ingersoll to William Pitt Fessenden, February 25, 1855, Edward Kent to Fessenden, May 21, June 6, 1855 (quotations), Noah Smith to Fessenden, June 8, 1855, and George R. Ingersoll to Noah Smith, June 12, 1855 (quotation), Fessenden MSS (WRHS).
- 112. In the 1852 presidential election in New Jersey, Free Soilers cast only 350 of the 83,000 ballots deposited.
- 113. Newark Daily Advertiser, October 6, 1854, and Elizabeth New Jersey Journal, November 14, 1854, quoted by Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress." Aside from Burnet's dissertation, for New Jersey I have relied on Kierner, "The Motley Party."

Both abstention by anti-Nebraska Democrats and new support from Know Nothings apparently contributed to Bishop's victory in the third district. In 1852, the respective party totals were: Democratic, 10,193 (55.1 percent); and Whig, 8,315 (44.9 percent). In 1854, they were Whig, 9,051 (54.4 percent); and Democratic, 7,603 (45.6 percent). The Democrat Lilly, in sum, lost about 2,500 votes between the two elections, while Whigs gained 700 votes. It seems likely that Democrats accounted for those gains, but it is just as likely that many of those Democratic defectors had joined Know Nothing lodges, as, of course, did many of the Whig repeaters. As pointed out earlier in the text, nativism and anti-Nebraska sentiment were complementary, not conflicting, reasons for supporting northern Know Nothings.

- 114. Newark Daily Advertiser, October 10, 20, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 766. With Whig aid, Peter Osborne, the anti-Nebraska Democrat, reduced Vail's majority in the district, but Vail still won. In 1852 the party totals were: Democratic (Vail), 9,247 (59.6 percent); and Whig, 6,247 (40.4 percent). In 1854, they were: Vail, 7,281 (51.7 percent); and Osborne, 6,816 (48.3 percent).
- 115. Newark Daily Advertiser, quoting the Trenton State Gazette, August 25, 1854, and reporting on the first district Whig convention, September 15, 1854, cited in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 763.
- 116. The partisan totals in the two elections were as follows: in 1852, Democrats, 7,185 (51.3 percent), and Whigs, 6816 (48.7 percent). In 1854, Whig/Native American, 6,269 (42.9 percent); Democrats, 4,383 (30 percent); Prohibition, 3,949 (27.1 percent).
- 117. The count of legislators elected in 1854 is taken from Kierner, "'The Motley Party,'" pp. 11, 29. For the New Jersey Whig editors' presidential calculations, see Isaac M. Tucker to William Schouler, November 27, 1854, Schouler MSS.
- 118. I use the term "nativist" to describe congressmen who were endorsed by Know Nothings, were members at the time of their election, or are known to have become members by the time the Thirty-Fourth Congress met in December 1855. My count depends heavily on Burnet's dissertation and other secondary works previously cited. It includes Cullen of Delaware, two Missouri Whigs, the two anti-Broderick Democrats elected in California, three Michigan Republicans, the nine People's victors in Indiana (four Democrats and five Whigs), eight Whigs and Timothy Day in Ohio, a Whig and a Democrat elected on Republican tickets in Illinois, James Thorington, the Know Nothing Whig from Iowa, and two Whig Know Nothings from New Jersey. In discussing Ohio in the text, I stated that straight-out Whig conventions that repudiated coalition nominated three of the victors. That is true, but two of those Whigs were subsequently endorsed by Know Nothings.
 - 119. John Bell to William B. Campbell, August 10, 1854, CFP.

CHAPTER 24

- Charles M. Conrad to Millard Fillmore, September 28, 1854, MFP-O. Pennsylvania's Whigs were not on Conrad's list of offenders, but they could have been.
 - 2. George S. Bryan to John P. Kennedy, August 23, 1854, Kennedy MSS.

- 3. Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 131–36, containing the quotations from the Daily Gazette. The March Whig platform can be found in the Daily Gazette, March 20, 1854, and the July Whig address in the Pittsburgh Morning Post, July 21, 1854. Morton McMichael's enthusiasm over Conrad's victory in Philadelphia is described in the preceding chapter.
- 4. Larimer's March letter to Whig gubernatorial candidate James Pollock is quoted at the beginning of Chapter 23. It is printed in the Pittsburgh Daily Gazette, May 3, 1854.
- 5. For an especially devastating Democratic critique of Bigler's tendency to straddle or evade all tough issues, including Nebraska, see Edward J. Fox to Simon Cameron, July 29, 1854, Cameron MSS. See also the following letters to Bigler for warnings about the defection of anti-Nebraska Democrats: David Wilmot, March 3, 1854, E. B. Chase, May 15, June 14, 1854, Henry M. Phillips, May 28, 1854, R. B. Little, June 12, 1854, William J. Garvin, June 14, 1854, John C. Knox, July 6, 1854, Bigler MSS.
- 6. As in other states, prohibitionist pressure had been growing in Pennsylvania for several years, but because the issue divided both parties internally, the Democratic-dominated 1854 legislature refused to pass a prohibition law that might be unpopular. Instead, to test the political winds—and absolve parties from responsibility—it authorized a referendum that would in effect be a public opinion poll. Voters would be given a chance to indicate whether they favored or opposed passage of a stringent antiliquor law by the next legislature.
- 7. Literally scores of letters in the Bigler Papers, the James Buchanan Papers (HSP), and the Simon Cameron Papers (DCHS) could be cited to support these assertions. In addition to my own book on Pittsburgh and Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 525–647, I have used the following secondary sources for Pennsylvania: Gienapp, "Nebraska, Nativism, and Rum"; id., Origins, pp. 139–47; Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 57–68; and Gerrity, "Philadelphia Whigocracy." Unless noted otherwise, evidence for all assertions about the 1854 campaign in Pennsylvania can be found in one or more of these sources.
- 8. An unwieldy system linking railroad track, canals, and inclined planes over the Allegheny Mountains, Pennsylvania's Main Line Canal lost so much freight traffic to the Pennsylvania and Baltimore and Ohio Railroads after their completion that the revenue generated by tolls could no longer pay for the expensive annual repairs, let alone the still unpaid bonds issued to fund its construction. Hence considerable pressure emerged from taxpayers who did not use the canal to sell it. The problem was that only the Pennsylvania Railroad appeared to have the financial resources and economic incentive to buy it, and many people feared giving that railroad company a monopoly over east-west transportation within the state.
- 9. For evidence of Pollock's popularity among Protestants, prohibitionists, and anti-Nebraska men, see J. Patrick to William L. Bigler, June, 1854, W. H. Hutter to Bigler, August 11, 1854, R. B. Little to Bigler, June 12, 1854, and James E. McFarland to Bigler, September 12, 1854, Bigler MSS.
- 10. Pittsburgh Daily Gazette, March 24, 1854; Harrisburg Telegraph, March 18, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 530. That the Telegraph specified "every American" may simply have referred to members of the Native American party, whose support had been crucial to every statewide victory Whigs had won since the mid-1840s; more likely, it indicated a hope that Know Nothings too would support Pollock and other Whig candidates.
 - 11. National Era quoted in Gienapp, "Nebraska, Nativism, and Rum," 433.
- 12. Pittsburgh Daily Gazette, April 19, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 533.
 - 13. Gamaliel Bailey to James S. Pike, June 4, 1854, Pike MSS.
- 14. Gienapp, "Nebraska, Nativism, and Rum," 434–35; Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 136–38. The following two paragraphs are also based primarily on these pages of my Pittsburgh book. Allegheny County, which encompassed Pittsburgh, sent five representatives and one senator to the state legislature.
- 15. In his letter to James Pike of June 4, Bailey cited Errett as one of the Pennsylvanians he would write to in order to get Pollock to take a stiffer antislavery stance.
- 16. Pittsburgh Daily Gazette, June 23 (comments on Allegheny County Whig platform), July 20 (address of state Whig committee), and July 22 (comments on that state address), 1854. Gienapp, "Nebraska, Nativism, and Rum," 435, n. 27, cites a letter from Pollock, dated June 19, endorsing the Whig state committee's address, but it was not published in newspapers until a month later.

17. For reports of the independent prohibition tickets in Erie, York, and Philadelphia, where Maine Law men ran their own candidates against both Whigs and Know Nothings, as well as Democrats, see J. P. Sherwin to Simon Cameron, August 31, 1854, A. Cummings to Cameron, September 13, 1854, D. F. Williams to Cameron, September 25, 1854, and V. S. Eckert to Cameron, October 4, 1854, Cameron MSS; and Henry Welsh to William L. Bigler, October 3, 1854, Bigler MSS. Because Cameron sought Cooper's Senate seat and therefore corresponded with virtually every legislative district in the state, his papers contain a treasure trove of information on the legislative races.

According to D. F. Williams, the Whig county committee in York made a deal with temperance men who distributed their own Temperance assembly ticket. The Whig committee printed Whig tickets with the names of Temperance candidates on it. In retaliation, wet Whigs printed their own tickets under the Whig label, tickets that included the names of a few Democrats. The liquor issue, in sum, utterly shattered York's Whig party.

- 18. J. Franklin Reigart to James Buchanan, July 28, 1854, Buchanan MSS (HSP); Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, p. 53.
- 19. William Larimer to James Pollock, March 28, 1854, in Pittsburgh Daily Gazette, May 3, 1854; for Larimer's induction into the order in June, see John C. Dunn to Simon Cameron, November 25, 1854, Cameron MSS. For Curtin and Pollock, see Gienapp, Origins, p. 144.
- 20. Isaac Hugus to Simon Cameron, August 18, September 24 (quotation), 1854, Cameron MSS; Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 142–44. Not all former Antimasons proved so fastidious in their opposition to secret societies. Thaddeus Stevens, for example, became a Know Nothing.
- 21. J. Ellis Bonham to Jeremiah Sullivan Black, August 29, 1854, Black MSS; Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 58–59; Holt, Forging a Majority, p. 73.
- 22. James Pollock to John M. Clayton, October 30, 1854, Clayton MSS. My assertions about voting support for Pollock and other state candidates are based on the detailed analysis in Gienapp, "Nebraska, Nativism, and Rum." His regression estimates of voter movement between elections indicate, among other things, that almost no Free Soilers voted for the Know Nothing Thomas Baird in the supreme court race, that men who did support Baird against the Whig Smyser in that race constituted 54 percent of Pollock's vote, and that, while previous Whigs divided evenly for and against prohibition in the referendum held on election day, virtually all of the dries voted for Pollock and they outnumbered wets in his column by over five-to-one.
- 23. Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, p. 62, conveniently lists the totals for all three statewide races. I have used Gienapp's estimates of how 1852 Whig voters behaved in 1854. See especially Table 2 on p. 456 of "Nebraska, Nativism, and Rum."
- 24. All of the assertions about congressional races in these paragraphs are based on Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," which analyzes every House race in Pennsylvania, as it does for every state in 1854 and 1855.
- 25. The second and ninth districts will be discussed in more detail below. In the eighteenth, John R. Edie of Somerset, who later emerged as perhaps the most prominent Know Nothing in the state, won the regular Whig nomination after considerable dispute. He was opposed by the Whig J. H. Cresswell from a different county in the district. It is impossible to say whether local jealousies within the district, rather than anti-Know Nothing sentiment, inspired Cresswell's candidacy, but residual Antimasonic sentiment and therefore hostility to Know Nothings was strong there. In any event, Cresswell, Edie's only opponent, was crushed. Edie racked up 72 percent of the vote.
- 26. In addition to Fuller, these Whig congressional candidates included Pittsburgh's David Ritchie; Philadelphia's Edward Joy Morris and William Millward; Samuel Purviance; John C. Kunkel, David F. Robinson; James H. Campbell; John Covode; and John Allison, who was nominated separately by the Free Soilers before Whigs also named him.
- 27. The quotations are from R. M. De France to Simon Cameron, October 12, 1854, and J. R. Anderson to Cameron, October 12, 1854, Cameron MSS. Letters to Cameron in August, September, and October 1854 from the same collection document the presence of independent Know Nothing tickets in counties across the state.

- 28. J. Franklin Reigart to James Buchanan, July 28, 1854, George Sanderson to Buchanan, September 14, 1854, James L. Reynolds to Buchanan, October 23, 1854 (quotation), Buchanan MSS (HSP); Reah Frazer to Simon Cameron, September 26, 1854, Cameron MSS.
- 29. Ritchie's vote increased from 4,939 (52.2 percent) in 1852 to 5,705 (60.6 percent) in 1854. The district encompassed all of Pittsburgh and most of Allegheny County.
- 30. The remainder of the ticket included candidates for state canal commissioner and state supreme court justice, five assembly seats and one state senate seat, and two county offices.
 - 31. Holt, Forging a Majority, p. 145.
 - 32. John C. Dunn to Simon Cameron, June 28, October 15, 1854, Cameron MSS.
- 33. Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 140–53; Alfred B. McCalmont to William L. Bigler, October 16, 1854 (quotation), Bigler MSS.
- 34. Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 151–74. Running as a straight Whig, Volz won the mayorality with 57.5 percent of the vote in January 1854. In 1855, as the fusion anti-Know Nothing candidate, he drew 300 more votes for a total of 2,406, but his percentage fell to 55.3. In 1856, Volz got 1,030 votes (26.5 percent). He ran slightly behind the Democratic candidate, and a Know Nothing won with 1,499 votes (38.6 percent).
- 35. G. G. Wescott to William L. Bigler, July 14, August 25, and September 7, 1854, Bigler MSS; see also Daniel S. Jenks to James Buchanan, September 22, 1854, Buchanan MSS (HSP).
- 36. Gerrity, "Philadelphia Whigocracy." Chandler had also apparently promised not to seek a fourth term, and some Whigs cited his betrayal of that pledge as justification for dumping him.
- 37. Daniel S. Jenks to James Buchanan, September 22, October 13 (quotation), 1854, Buchanan MSS (HSP); speeches at the rump Whig convention appeared in the Philadelphia Public Ledger, September 8, 1854, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 543. The congressional returns listed in the Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections give no vote for Chandler and portray the contest as a two-way race between Tyson and his Democratic opponent. Therefore, I have relied on the returns listed in Gerrity, "Philadelphia Whigocracy," 189, n. 86. Chandler received 1,196 votes to Tyson's 5,655. Chandler had won 6,594 votes in 1852.
- 38. Black to Buchanan, February 17, 1855, Buchanan MSS (HSP). Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 597, lists the figures attending the Whig and Know Nothing caucuses. Accounts of the Pennsylvania senatorial election can be found in Gienapp, Origins, pp. 172–73; and Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 150–54. On p. 153, n. 67, Anbinder says that twenty-six Whigs voted for Cameron and twenty-seven voted against him. Whether those totals include non-Know Nothing Whigs is unclear.
 - 39. Robert J. Arundel to John McLean, October 14, 1854, McLean MSS (LC).
- 40. For evidence of this divergent behavior of Free Soilers in the three states and of the proportionately greater strength of Free Soilers in Massachusetts than elsewhere, compare Table 5.3 with Tables 5.4, 5.6, and 5.7 in Gienapp, Origins, pp. 504–06; for the influence of anti-Catholicism, nativism, and prohibitionism in Massachusetts politics prior to 1854, see Sweeney, "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform."
 - 41. See my analysis of the 1853 election in Chapter 21.
- 42. The secondary literature on Massachusetts, which informs my analysis throughout this section, is extensive and of high quality. In addition to Gienapp, Origins, pp. 133–39, and Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 87–94, see Formisano, Transformation of Political Culture, pp. 329–35; Baum, Civil War Party System, pp. 24–35; and Mulkern, Know Nothing Party in Massachusetts. As with other states, for information on congressional races, I have drawn on the section on Massachusetts in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 839–83.
- 43. For examples of conservative concern about radicalization of the Whig party and a possible merger with Free Soilers, see Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, January 1, February 27, June 1854, Kennedy MSS; Winthrop to Edward Everett, February 6, 13, March 10, 1854, Everett MSS; Winthrop to John H. Clifford, July 25, 1854, copy, Winthrop MSS.
 - 44. Edward Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, June 7, 1854, Everett MSS; Philo C. Shelton to Thurlow Weed, June 6, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); Ezra Lincoln to William Schouler, August 14, 1854, Schouler MSS.

- 45. Gienapp, Origins, p. 134; Ezra Lincoln to William Schouler, August 14, 1854, Schouler MSS. At least two of the regular Whig congressional nominees withdrew prior to the election when Know Nothings endorsed their incumbent rivals, the Free Soiler Alexander DeWitt in the nineth district and Democrat Nathaniel Banks in the seventh district. Last-minute Whig replacements in both districts were slaughtered. De Witt and Banks were both members of the order, and they, like the nine Whig congressmen, voted against the Nebraska bill.
- 46. George B. Loring to Cushing, August 27, 1854, Cushing MSS; Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, August 31, October 9, 1854, Everett MSS.
 - 47. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 134-35.
 - 48. Lincoln to Schouler, August 14, 1854, Schouler MSS.
- 49. Though largely unknown outside of Boston, Gardner was hardly a political neophyte. He had served on the Boston city council, in the state legislature, and on the Whig state committee.
 - 50. John H. Clifford to Robert C. Winthrop, April 9, 1854, Winthrop MSS.
- 51. The deal between Gardner and Wilson was known even before the election, and between November and the legislature's election of Wilson to the Senate, Whigs complained about it even more bitterly. See, for example, Robert C. Winthrop to John H. Clifford, November 1, 1854, Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, December 27, 1854, copy, Winthrop MSS; Edward Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, November 4, 16, 1854, January 13, 1855, Everett MSS.
 - 52. Gienapp, Origins, p. 136; Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 91-92.
- 53. For the aversion of Everett and Winthrop to nativism and secret societies, see Edward Everett to William B. Weis, February 14, 1853, Everett MSS; and Robert C. Winthrop to John H. Clifford, November 16, 1854, Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, December 27, 1854, copies, Winthrop MSS.
- 54. Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, January 3, 1855, copy, Winthrop MSS; Ezra Lincoln to William Schouler, October 28, 1854, Schouler MSS; Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, October 9, 1854, Everett MSS; Everett to Millard Fillmore, December 16, 1854, MFP-O.
- 55. For the estimates of voter movement between 1852 and 1854, see Table 5.3 in Gienapp, Origins, p. 504. Gienapp's estimates suggest that when one includes abstentions and a few defections to the Democrats, approximately 36 percent of the 1852 Scott voters supported Washburn. Gienapp, p. 136, n. 29, lists the gubernatorial returns for 1854 as: Whig, 27,279 (21.1 percent); Democratic, 13,742 (10.7 percent); Republican, 6,483 (5 percent); and Know Nothing, 81,503 (63.2 percent). In 1853, Washburn had garnered 59,224 votes (45.9 percent).
- 56. Sumner's lament is contained in his letter to Julius Rockwell, November 26, 1854, which is quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 851.
- 57. David Davis to Julius Rockwell, March 4, 1855, David Davis MSS; Nevins and Thomas (eds.), Diary of George Templeton Strong, entry for November 15, 1854, II, p. 197; Isaac O. Barnes to Caleb Cushing, November 4, 1854, Cushing MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to John H. Clifford, November 16, 1854, copy, Winthrop MSS.
- 58. George W. Patterson to Thurlow Weed, March 16, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); see also George E. Baker to William H. Seward, May 10, 1854, Seward MSS (RU).
- 59. For evidence of these assertions about Weed and Seward's intentions, see Orsamus B. Matteson to Thurlow Weed, April 22, May 18, 22, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); Henry J. Raymond to William H. Seward, May 30, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); and especially the copy of the Circular of the "New York Central Whig Association," August 1, 1854, in the Weed MSS and Solomon Vurmich to New York Whig Central Association, August 6, 1854, Ullmann MSS. For comments on Whig unity, see Ogden Hoffman to Seward, March 5, 1854, E. Pershine Smith to Seward, May 3, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); B. Thompson to Daniel Ullmann, May 16, 1854, Ullmann MSS.
- 60. The three quoted passages come respectively from B. Thompson to Daniel Ullmann, May 16, 1854, Ullmann MSS; Thurlow Weed to George W. Patterson, July 11, 1854, copy, Weed MSS (RU); and Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, August 2, 1854, Fish MSS.
- 61. Berger, Revolution, pp. 29–31. In addition to Berger's book, which, despite its title, focuses almost exclusively on the years between 1854 and 1856, my main secondary sources for

New York are Gienapp, Origins, pp. 147–60; Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 75–86; and, for the congressional elections, Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 778–838.

- 62. The Softs' platform pronounced the Nebraska Act "inexpedient and unnecessary" but also "opposed . . . any agitation" to restore the Missouri Compromise line or "tending to promote any sectional controversy in relation thereto." The scornful critique of it is from the New York Tribune, September 8, 1854. Both are quoted in Berger, Revolution, pp. 45–48. For an especially illuminating example of Softs' anguish about how to handle the Nebraska issue, see Herman J. Redfield to Marcy, July 15, 1854, Marcy MSS (LC).
- 63. Lyman Spalding to Thurlow Weed, August 3, 1854, Orson Nicholson to Weed, August 10, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); Berger, Revolution, p. 30.
 - 64. I have used an undated copy of the call in the Hamilton Fish MSS.
- 65. Orson Nicholson to Thurlow Weed, August 11, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); Berger, Revolution, pp. 36–37; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 150–51.
- 66. Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, July 30, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, July 26, 1854, MFP-O; James Kidd to Daniel Ullmann, July 15, 1854, Ullmann MSS.
- 67. Washington Hunt to Weed, July 30, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); Hunt to Hamilton Fish, August 2, 1854, Fish MSS.
- 68. Thurlow Weed to George W. Patterson, July 11, 1854, copy, Lyman A. Spalding to Weed, August 3, 1854 [misdated 1853], Orson Nicholson to Weed, August 11, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, August 2, 1854, Fish MSS.
- 69. Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, July 26, 1854, Greeley-Colfax MSS; Gienapp, Origins, p. 152.
 - 70. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 152-53; Berger, Revolution, pp. 39-41.
- 71. B. H. Davis to New York Central Whig Association, August 4, 1854, Sam J. Mills to New York Central Whig Association, August 12, 1854, Ullmann MSS. As will be explained in the text below, the New York Central Whig Association was an organization put together by Daniel Ullmann and other Silver Grays to secure the Whigs' gubernatorial nomination for Ullmann and thereby deny it to one of Weed's allies. Literally scores of other letters from the Ullmann and Weed Papers attest to the salience of nativism and prohibitionism among Whigs.
- 72. Though dries were proportionately more numerous among Whigs than among Democrats, New York's parties, like those of other states, had long divided internally in the legislature when forced to vote on concrete policies affecting drinking. On twenty-two roll-call votes concerning liquor regulation in the New York assembly between 1847 and 1853, for example, the average index of partisan disagreement was only 39.7, the average Rice Index of Whig cohesion was 53.7, and the average Rice Index of Democratic cohesion was 31.9. By contrast, on seventeen roll-call votes on the partisanly polarizing canal expansion question in 1851, the average indexes of disagreement, Whig cohesion, and Democratic cohesion were 81.9, 85.1, and 78.8, respectively. I have taken these figures from Tables A9 and A11 in Kirn, "Second Party System in New York State." Kirn, who is my doctoral student, kindly gave me a copy of this stimulating paper.
 - 73. Herman J. Redfield to William L. Marcy, July 15, 1854, Marcy MSS (LC).
 - 74. Henry S. Randall to William L. Marcy, June 20, 1854, Marcy MSS (LC).
- 75. For Whigs' recognition of Seymour's popularity with wets, see Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, April 8, 1854, Fish MSS; John Austin to George E. Baker, April 18, 1854, Seward MSS (RU).
- 76. Edward C. Delevan to William H. Seward, May 16, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); N. W. Davis to Daniel Ullmann, May 20, 1854, Ullmann MSS, Edwin D. Morgan to Hamilton Fish, May 2, 1854, Fish MSS.
- 77. Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, April 8, 1854, Fish MSS; Eliphalet Nott to Thurlow Weed, April 3, 1854, Weed to George W. Patterson, May 10 (quotation), 29, 1854, copies, Charles Adams to Weed (detailing the publication of Seward's drinking habits), July 14, 1854, Weed MSS (RU).
- 78. George W. Patterson to Thurlow Weed, May 20, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); Harvey Green to Marcellus Ells, August 7, 1854, Ullmann MSS.
 - 79. John M. Bradford to Weed, June 24, 1854, Weed MSS (RU).

- 80. Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, June 29, July 26, 1854, William L. Hodge to Fillmore, July 21, 1854, MFP-O; John P. Kennedy to Fillmore, July 4, 1854, copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 81. Alex Mann to Daniel Ullmann, June 20, 1854, Solomon Vurmich to New York Whig Central Association, August 6, 1854, Ullmann MSS.
- 82. See the following letters, all addressed to Daniel Ullmann in the Ullmann MSS: Darius Perrin, April 28, 1854, B. Thompson, May 16, 1854, N. W. Davis, May 20, 1854, Alex Mann, June 20, July 13, 1854, James Kidd, July 15, 1854, A. Wolcott, August 16, 1854. In the same collection, see also A. Perry to Robert C. Wetmore et al., August 2, 1854, R. B. Warren to Marcellus Ells, August 7, 1854, Socretezo Smith to Ells, August 11, 1854, E. E. Pettengill to Ells, August 8, 1854.
 - 83. I have used the copy of the circular in the Weed MSS (RU).
- 84. E. J. Hoony to Ullmann, June 26, October 17, 1854, H. M. Morgan and G. M. Henry to Ullmann, June 28, 1854, Solomon Vurmich to NYWCA, August 6, 1854, A. Wolcott to Ullmann, August 16, 1854, Ullmann MSS.
- 85. Horace Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, August 24, 27, September 7, 1854, Greeley-Colfax MSS; Alex Mann to Daniel Ullmann, June 20, July 13, 1854, A. Perry to Robert C. Wetmore et al., August 2, 1854, A. J. Calhoun to Marcellus Ells, August 9, 1854, Ullmann MSS; Elbridge G. Spaulding to Thurlow Weed, August 8, 1854, Weed MSS (RU).
- 86. Lyman Spalding to Thurlow Weed, August 3, 1854 [misdated 1853], Weed to George W. Patterson, September 17, 1854, copy, Weed MSS (RU); Charles A. Dana to James S. Pike, September 1, 1854, Pike MSS; Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, August 2, 1854, Fish MSS.
- 87. Greeley to Schuyler Colfax, August 27, September 7, 1854, Greeley-Colfax MSS; Charles Dana to James S. Pike, September 1, 1854, Pike MSS; E. G. Spaulding to Thurlow Weed, August 8, 20, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); George E. Baker to William H. Seward, September 5, 1854, Seward MSS (RU).
- 88. Nathan G. King to Daniel Ullmann, September 8, 1854, Ullmann MSS; Vivus W. Smith to William H. Seward, September 4, 1854, Myron O. Wilder to Seward, November 2, 1854, Seward MSS (RU).
- 89. Elbridge G. Spaulding to Thurlow Weed, August 20, 1854, Weed MSS; L. L. Parsons to Daniel Ullmann, September 16, 1854, Nathan G. King to Ullmann, September 16, 1854, Ullmann MSS. King called Clark and Flavius Littlejohn, another Whig aspirant, "bogus if members." Other Know Nothing contenders for the Whig nomination included Joseph Savage and Judge William Campbell. Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, p. 77.
- 90. David H. Abell to Thurlow Weed, September 10, 1854, Weed to George W. Patterson, September 17, 1854, copy, Weed MSS (RU).
- 91. Thurlow Weed to George W. Patterson, September 23, 1854, copy, Weed MSS (RU); L. L. Parsons to Daniel Ullmann, September 27, 1854, J. P. Faurot to Ullmann, September 27, 1854, Ullmann MSS. Faurot, who was president of Ethan Allen Council No. 113 in Canandaigua, sent Ullmann a copy of the circular from which I have quoted.
 - 92. Myron H. Clark to Thurlow Weed, September 19, 1854, Weed MSS (RU).
 - 93. Gienapp, Origins, p. 154; Berger, Revolution, pp. 53-54.
 - 94. Francis Granger to Millard Fillmore, September 23, 1854, MFP-O.
- 95. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 153–54; Francis Granger to Millard Fillmore, September 23, 1854, MFP-O; Alex Mann to Daniel Ullmann, October 9, 1854, Granger to Ullmann, October 17, 1854, Ullmann MSS; Horace Greeley to William H. Seward, October 25, November 24, 1854, Seward MSS (RU).
- 96. Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, October 21, 1854, Henry J. Raymond to Weed, October 28, 1854, and Weed to George W. Patterson, October 28, 1854, copy, Weed MSS (RU); Warren T. Worden to William L. Marcy, September 23, 1854, Marcy MSS (LC).
 - 97. Hunt to Weed, October 21, 1854, Weed MSS (RU).
 - 98. Granger to Fillmore, September 23, 1854, MFP-O.
 - 99. Gienapp, Origins, p. 154; Berger, Revolution, pp. 56-58.
 - 100. Conrad to Fillmore, September 28, 1854, MFP-O.
- 101. George F. Comstock to Daniel Ullmann, October 6, 1854 (quotation), Ullmann MSS; David O. Kellogg to Millard Fillmore, October 7, 1854, MFP-O.

- 102. Kellogg to Fillmore, October 7, 1854, MFP-O; S. Potter Bradford to Marcellus Ells, August 24, 1854, O. L. Sheldon to Daniel Ullmann, October 10, 1854, Hiram Kling to Ullmann, October 12, 1854, Ullmann MSS.
- 103. Francis Granger to Millard Fillmore, October 19, 24, 1854, E. R. Jewett to Fillmore, October 24, 1854, MFP-O; Fillmore to John P. Kennedy, November 1, 1854, Kennedy MSS.
- 104. Francis Granger to Millard Fillmore, October 24, 1854, E. R. Jewett to Fillmore, October 24, 1854, MFP-O. Granger's letter of October 24 was the conservatives' circular; Jewett's explained what else occurred at Albany. Edward Everett, William A. Graham, and Charles M. Conrad were among the out-of-state Whigs sent copies of this circular.
- 105. Vivus W. Smith to William H. Seward, September 4, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 77–79.
- 106. D. O. Kellogg to Millard Fillmore, October 7, 1854, Stephen Sammons to Fillmore, October 16, 1854, E. R. Jewett to Fillmore, October 24, 1854, MFP-O; Fillmore to John P. Kennedy, November 1, 1854, Kennedy MSS. On the back of Sammons' letter to Fillmore is a notation from Fillmore saying that he answered on October 21 that he could do "nothing."
- 107. See the following letters to Daniel Ullmann in the Ullmann MSS: Charles S. Olmsted, October 11, 1854, E. M. Holbrook, October 12, 1854, Charles G. Irish, October 14, 1854, J. C. Colver, October 14, 1854, J. M. Coley, October 15, 1854, Lyman Bradley to Ullmann, October 17, 1854, S. H. Hammond, October 17, 1854, Stephen Sammons, October 25, 26 (quotation), 1854, L. L. Parsons, November 11, 1854.

The rumor that Ullmann, who was born in Wilmington, Delaware, had been born in Calcutta apparently originated with a man who claimed to have been Ullmann's classmate at Yale College. Although Know Nothings did all they could to refute the charge, it is the reason Know Nothings in New York were often subsequently called "Hindoos" by outsiders. See also Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 81–82.

- 108. L. L. Pratt to Daniel Ullmann, October 19, 1854, J. P. Faurot to Ullmann, October 20, 1854, Ullmann MSS.
- 109. Alex Mann to Ullmann, October 9, 1854, L. L. Pratt to Ullmann, October 19, 1854, Ullmann MSS; Fillmore to John P. Kennedy, November 1, 1854, Kennedy MSS; Fillmore to Alexander H. H. Stuart, January 15, 1855, Stuart MSS (University of Virginia). It is clear from Fillmore's letter to Stuart that he greatly accelerated his efforts to get Silver Grays to join Know Nothing lodges after the November returns came in.
- 110. Alonzo Johnson to Thurlow Weed, October 14, 1854, Rufus J. Baldwin to Alonzo Johnson, October 13, 1854, Weed MSS (RU).
- 111. J. T. Henry to Daniel Ullmann, October 10, 1854, S. W. Button to Stephen Sammons, October 30, 1854, Ullmann MSS.
- 112. Non-Know Nothing Democrats carried two districts. In one, where the Whigs had won only 28 percent of the vote in 1852, a Whig regular and a Know Nothing Whig challenger split 29 percent of the 1854 vote. In the upstate seventeenth district, Francis Spinner, an anti-Nebraska Democrat, won in a three-way race that did not include a Know Nothing. There the share of the Whig vote dropped from only 38 percent in 1852 to 33 percent in 1854.
- 113. See Tables 5.6, 5.7, 5.8, and 5.9 in Gienapp, Origins, pp. 506–07. Gienapp estimates that Presbyterians favored Ullmann over Clark by an almost five-to-one margin and Lutherans did so by almost forty-to-one. In contrast, Baptists, Methodists, and Congregationalists greatly preferred Clark to Ullmann.
- 114. George E. Baker to William H. Seward, November 10, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); John O. Charles to Millard Fillmore, November 25, 1854, MFP-O; John P. Kennedy to J. N. Reynolds, November 18, 1854, copy, Kennedy MSS; Robert Kelley to Horatio Seymour, November 15, 1854, Horatio Seymour MSS.
- 115. James Pollock to John M. Clayton, October 30, 1854, Clayton MSS; Edward Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, November 13, 1854, Everett MSS; Everett to Millard Fillmore, November 10, 1854, William A. Graham to Fillmore, December 3, 1854, MFP-O.
 - 116. George E. Baker to William H. Seward, November 15, 1854, Charles E. Clarke to Seward, November 20, 1854, Thomas Chittenden to Seward, November 21, 1854, Seward MSS (RU); John P. Kennedy to J. N. Reynolds, November 18, 1854, Kennedy MSS.

CHAPTER 25

- 1. George S. Bryan to John P. Kennedy, August 23, 1854, Kennedy MSS.
- 2. John P. Kennedy to J. N. Reynolds, November 18, 1854, copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 3. James W. Taylor to Hamilton Fish, November 11, 1854, Fish MSS; George Cook to Thurlow Weed, January 18, 1855, Weed MSS (RU); George E. Baker to William H. Seward, November 15, 1854, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 4. Orsamus B. Matteson to William Schouler, December 14, 1854, Schouler MSS.
 - 5. Charles A. Dana to James S. Pike, November 22, 1854, James S. Pike MSS.
 - 6. Daniel D. Barnard to Hamilton Fish, December 21, 1854, Fish MSS.
- 7. John T. Bush to Millard Fillmore, November 15, 1854, S. H. Hammond to Fillmore, November 19, 1854, MFP-O; Alex Mann to Daniel Ullmann, November 16, 1854, Ullmann MSS.
- 8. Millard Fillmore to John P. Kennedy, November 1, 1854, Kennedy MSS; Fillmore to Alexander H. H. Stuart, January 15, 1855, Stuart MSS (University of Virginia).
- Charles Conrad to Millard Fillmore, December 24, 1854, MFP-O; Fillmore to Edward Everett, December 13, 1854, Everett MSS.
- 10. Fillmore to Everett, December 13, 1854, Everett MSS; Fillmore to Stuart, January 15, 1855, Stuart MSS.
- 11. Alex Mann to Daniel Ullmann, November 16, 1854, Ullmann MSS; Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, December 9, 1854, MFP-O; Fillmore to Stuart, January 15, 1855, Stuart MSS.
 - 12. Ibid.
- 13. Fillmore to Stuart, January 15, 1855, Stuart MSS; Kennedy to Winthrop, December 25, 1854, copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 14. Albany State Register, January 15, 1855 [misdated 1854], clipping, Stuart MSS (University of Virginia). There is no evidence that Fillmore prompted Hammond, who had apparently become a Know Nothing even before the 1854 election, to write this editorial, but during November and December Fillmore encouraged negotiations by which Know Nothings purchased an interest in the paper to make it an American organ. See John T. Bush to Fillmore, November 15, 16, 23, 25, 1854, S. H. Hammond to Fillmore, November 19, 1854, E. R. Jewett to Fillmore, December 28, 1854, and Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, December 20, 22, 1854, January 10, 1855, MFP-O.
- 15. After the Massachusetts election, Rhode Island's conservative Whig John O. Charles made this remark about Winthrop: he "is sadly disconcerted at events [in Massachusetts] & is I think unwisely vehement in denunciation." John O. Charles to Millard Fillmore, November 25, 1854, MFP-O.
- 16. Millard Fillmore to Isaac Newton, January 3, 1855, in Severance, "Millard Fillmore Papers, Vol. 2," pp. 347–49.
- 17. Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, December 9, 20, 1854, January 10, 29 (quotation), 1855, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, December 14, 1854, Isaac Newton to Fillmore, January 18, 1855, MFP-O; Elbridge G. Spaulding to William H. Seward, August 2, 1856, Seward MSS (RU); Gienapp, Origins, p. 260.
- 18. Haven to Fillmore, December 9, 1854, Alex Mann to Fillmore, December 13, 1854, Isaac Newton to Fillmore, January 18, 1855, MFP-O. For New York Know Nothings' insistence that secrecy be maintained, see Darius Perrin to Daniel Ullmann, November 13, 1854, and E. M. Holbrook to Ullmann, December 21, 1854, Ullmann MSS. On March 14, 1855, Robert J. Arundel, a Philadelphia Know Nothing and a long-time fan of McLean, urged McLean to join the Know Nothings, as Fillmore had (Arundel to McLean, March 14, 1855, McLean MSS, LC). This letter indicates not only that, as Haven had predicted, news of Fillmore's membership spread rapidly among Know Nothings once he joined the order, but also that Arundel knew that Fillmore, as an insider, had a decisive advantage in seeking the Know Nothing nomination over McLean if the latter remained an outsider.

- 19. John McLean to Hector Orr, November 25, 1854, McLean to John J. Prettyman, November 25, 1854, McLean to Robert A. Parrish, March 3, 1855, Ross Wilkins to McLean, January 11, 1855, M. Simpson to McLean, January 13, 1855, Donald McLeod to McLean, March 1, 1855, R. J. Arundel to McLean, March 14, 1855, McLean MSS (LC).
- 20. For Houston's membership in the order and his popularity with Democratic Know Nothings and non-Know Nothing anti-Nebraska northern Democrats, see Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, January 10, 1855, MFP-O; John S. Williams to Gideon Welles, November 25, 1854, Welles to Williams, December 9, 1854, draft, Williams to Welles, January 14, 1855, Welles MSS (LC).
- 21. Alexander H. H. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, November 11, 1854, January 1, 1855, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, December 9, 20, 1854, January 10, 17, 1855, MFP-O; Fillmore to Stuart, January 15, 1855, Stuart MSS.
- 22. John T. Bush to Millard Fillmore, November 25, 1854, MFP-O; John P. Kennedy to John N. Reynolds, February 27, 1855, copy, Kennedy MSS. In the quotation from Bush's letter I have changed his "excluding" to "exclude."
- 23. Godlove Orth to Will Cumback, April 14, 1855, Schuyler Colfax to Cumback, April 16, 1855, Cumback MSS; Orth to Colfax, November 1854, December 1, 1854, February 5, June 23, 1855, in Schauinger "Orth Letters," 40, pp. 56–58, 60–66.
 - 24. Lewis Campbell to William Schouler, January 1, 1855, Schouler MSS.
 - 25. Haven to Fillmore, December 22, 1854, MFP-O.
- 26. Cooper in fact gave a speech in the Senate defending the Know Nothings in January 1855, precisely at the time the Pennsylvania legislature took up the election of his successor. Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, January 29, 1855, MFP-O.
- 27. On the Pennsylvania senatorial election, see Isaac Newton to Millard Fillmore, January 18, 1855, MFP-O; and especially Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 150–54. Anbinder estimates, note 67, p. 153, that in the crucial Know Nothing caucus vote on Cameron's nomination, ex-Whigs split almost evenly, twenty-six for and twenty-seven against, whereas ex-Democrats were solidly for him. Free Soil/Know Nothings solidly opposed Cameron.
- 28. Edward Everett to Millard Fillmore, December 16, 1854, MFP-O; Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, February 18, 1855, Everett MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to John O. Sargent, February 20, 1855, Sargent MSS; Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 146–47, 154–56.
 - 29. Rayner is quoted in Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, p. 148.
- 30. Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, December 20, 22, 1854, January 10, 1855, John T. Bush to Fillmore, November 15, 16, 1854, MFP-O. The precise partisan composition of the New York legislature is difficult to determine. The figures gathered by Walter Dean Burnham for the Inter-University Consortium list eighty-two Whigs, sixteen Democrats, three Free Soilers, and twenty-six "Others" in the assembly and twenty-two Whigs, seven Democrats, and three "Others" in the state senate. Burnham's "Other" category may refer to Know Nothings, but it is more likely that it included Hardshell or Softshell Democrats since the rival Democratic factions ran separate candidates for the legislature as they had for Congress. S. H. Hammond, the Albany State Register's editor, wrote Fillmore on January 12, 1855, for example, that in both houses combined there were 48 Democrats and 30 Whigs who would vote against Seward. In contrast, Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 147–49, states that Whigs lacked a majority in the legislature, and he counts thirty-six Whig and twelve Democratic Know Nothings. If he is accurate in denying that Whig/Know Nothings deserved to be counted as Whigs, non-Know Nothing Whigs therefore held 68 of the combined 160 house and senate seats. But Stephen Sammons, the Know Nothing leader, estimated in December that only sixty-six Whigs in the legislature—whether he meant only the assembly or the entire legislature is unclear—were not Silver Grays and that of those sixty-six, twenty were Know Nothings (S. Sammons to Daniel Ullmann, December 15, 1854, Ullmann MSS). Gienapp, Origins, p. 177, finally, counts 11 Know Nothings in the 32-seat senate and 40 in the 128-seat assembly.
- 31. DeWitt C. Stanford to Thurlow Weed, November 23, 1854, Weed MSS (RU); J. McKeon to Caleb Cushing, November 10, 1854, Cushing MSS; John O. Charles to Millard Fillmore, November 25, 1854, MFP-O; and Edward McPherson to J. B. McPherson, November 8, 1854, McPherson MSS.

- 32. James Kelly to William H. Seward, January 25, 1855, Seward MSS (RU); Seward to Weed, December 24, 1854, Seward to John L. Schoolcraft, December 29, 1854, Weed MSS (RU).
- 33. L. S. Parsons to Daniel Ullmann, November 11, 1854, F. S. Edwards to Ullmann, December 6, 1854, Ullmann MSS; E. R. Jewett to Millard Fillmore, December 28, 1854, S. H. Hammond to Fillmore, January 12, 1855, J. W. Ferdon to Fillmore, January 12, 1855, and Solomn G. Haven to Fillmore, January 29, 1855, MFP-O.
- 34. George P. Avery to Thurlow Weed, November 22, 1854, Charles Cooke to Weed, December 20, 1854, Henry Morgan to Weed, February 8, 1855, Weed MSS (RU); George Geddes to William H. Seward, February 7, 1855, Seward MSS (RU).
- 35. George W. Patterson to Thurlow Weed, February 17, 1855, Stafford C. Cleveland to Weed, February 24, 1855, William H. Burton to Weed, February 26, 1855, Weed MSS (RU); Daniel D. Barnard to Hamilton Fish, January 30, 1855, Fish MSS; E. R. Jewett to Millard Fillmore, February 4, 1855, MFP-O.
- 36. Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 147–50; D. W. C. Clarke to William H. Seward, February 6, 1855, George Geddes to Seward, February 7, 1855, Moses H. Grinnell to Seward, February 7, 1855, Seward MSS (RU). "Sam," like "Hindoo" and "Cayenne," was a popular nickname for the Know Nothings.
 - 37. Myron H. Clark to William H. Seward, February 15, 1855, Seward MSS (RU).
- 38. My account of Rhode Island rests heavily on Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 922-31.
- 39. Providence Daily Journal, March 22, 23, 28, 29, 1855, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 925, 926, 927.
 - 40. Durfee got 72 percent of the vote and Thurston got 88 percent.
- 41. Boston Courier, March 1, 1855, and Concord New Hampshire Patriot, December 27, 1854, both quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 899. In addition to Burnet's section on New Hampshire, my main secondary sources for this account are Renda, "The Polity and the Party System," 292–319; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 173–74; Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 127, 150; and Sewell, Hale, pp. 154–62.
 - 42. John P. Hale to Thurlow Weed, February 2, 1855, Weed MSS (RU).
- 43. The Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections lists no Free Soil vote for 1855, and I have interpolated it from the figures it does list. The regression estimate of the movement of Free Soil voters between 1854 and 1855 is in Renda, "The Polity and the Party System," Table 3.13, p. 376. In 1854, Free Soilers ran Jared Perkins, an unsuccessful Whig congressional candidate in 1853, for governor in order to attract antislavery Whig voters dissatisfied with James Bell, the Whigs' nominee.
- 44. For estimates of Whig voter movement between 1854 and 1855, see the same table in Renda cited in the preceding note.
- 45. Schuyler Colfax to E. W. Jackson, March 15, 1855, Colfax MSS (IU); Joshua Leavitt to Salmon P. Chase, March 13–14, 1855, Chase MSS (HSP). Hale was elected to serve the remaining years of a deceased Democratic United States senator's term. James Bell, the Whig/Know Nothing, was picked to fill a full six-year term.
- 46. Aaron H. Cragin to Thurlow Weed, June 15, 1855, Seward MSS (RU). Cragin, the lone Whig among the three Know Nothing congressmen-elect, announced in this letter that New Hampshire's Know Nothings were already prepared to abandon the nativist party, now that it had successfully shattered the Democrats, for a Republican organization. Later that year the betrayed and outraged Edmund Burke, who had urged anti-Pierce Democrats to vote Know Nothing, also accused Know Nothing leaders of being closet Republicans. "Position of the Old Guard Democracy," undated draft editorial, 1855 folder, Burke MSS.
- 47. Edward Prentiss to Francis Gillette, December 25, 1854, copy, Hawley MSS; George Baldwin to Emily Baldwin, March 14, 20, 1855, Emily Baldwin to George Baldwin, March 17, April 3, 1855, BFP; Gideon Welles to ?, April 23, 1855, draft, Welles MSS (Conn.HS). For more thorough analyses of the 1855 elections in Connecticut, see Renda, "The Polity and the Party System," 299–323; and Gienapp, Origins, pp. 274–78.
- 48. Gideon Welles to Preston King, November 25, 1854, copy, Welles MSS (LC); Joshua Leavitt to Salmon P. Chase, March 14, 1855, Chase MSS (HSP); Lew Campbell to William Schouler, February 15, 1855, Schuyler Colfax to Schuyler, March 2, May 1, 1855, Schouler MSS; Colfax to E. W. Jackson, March 15, 1855, Colfax MSS (IU). For evidence that Chase wanted Ohio's Know Nothings included in, rather than alienated from, a Republican party in Ohio that he hoped would nominate him for governor in July, see Chase to E. S. Hamlin, January 22, February 15, 1855, and Oran Follett to Chase, May 2, 1855, Chase MSS (LC); and Chase to James S. Pike, March 22, 1855, Pike MSS.

- 49. Samuel W. Parker to Samuel Galloway, May 10, 1855, Galloway MSS; Garrett Davis to Lewis Campbell, June 5, 1855, Lewis Campbell MSS; Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, p. 166. Davis' letter to Campbell applauded a proposed platform to be adopted by the June national council meeting that Campbell had sent him and that deplored sectional parties, called for the judiciary to determine the power of Congress over slavery in the territories, and asserted that most questions pertaining to slavery came exclusively under state jurisdiction (Gienapp, Origins, p. 183). The position of Orth and Colfax will be documented below.
- 50. These various southern Whigs, along with the Texas Democrat Sam Houston, are mentioned as having support for the Know Nothing nomination in the following letters to William Schouler in the Schouler MSS: Lew Campbell, December 24, 1854, Henry Wilson, April 16, 1855, Schuyler Colfax, May 1, 1855, Garrett Davis, May 23, 1855, and Ezra Lincoln, May 24, 1855. Wilson, Colfax, and Campbell all stated that they personally did not believe that any Southerner could carry the North. Colfax, as of May 1, favored Pennsylvania's Governor James Pollock for the nomination, and Wilson, intriguingly, said that ex-Senator Truman Smith was Cullom's biggest booster and, just as intriguingly, that "it is hard telling what Weed and the New York politicians go for."
- 51. Schuyler Colfax to William Schouler, October 23, 1854, March 2, May 1, 1855, Lewis Campbell to Schouler, December 26, 1854, February 15, 1855, Schouler MSS; Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, February 25, 1855, MFP-O; Lewis Campbell to Samuel Galloway, May 16, 22, 1855, Samuel W. Parker to Gallloway, May 10, 1855, Galloway MSS; Charles A. Dana to James S. Pike, July 14, 1855, Pike MSS. On Campbell's leadership of the midwestern anti-Nebraska Whig/Know Nothings, see also Salmon P. Chase to E. S. Hamlin, February 9, 1855, Chase MSS (LC).
- 52. Shortly after Seward's reelection by the New York legislature in February 1855, the New York State Know Nothing council adopted a pro-Union platform plank that was then broadcast to the nation to neutralize suspicions that Sewardites controlled the order there. Fillmore's Baltimore friend John P. Kennedy, an outsider, wrote it and secured its adoption through John N. Reynolds and other New York friends in the order. Yet the subsequent actions of New England's Know Nothings mitigated its impact. On Kennedy's role, see John P. Kennedy to John N. Reynolds, February 27, 1855, and especially Kennedy to S. N. Spencer, November 24, 1855, copies, Kennedy MSS.
- 53. Lew Campbell to William Schouler, December 26, 1854, Henry Wilson to Schouler, April 18, 1855, Schouler MSS; Campbell to Samuel Galloway, May 16, 22, 1855, Galloway MSS; Charles Dana to James S. Pike, July 14, 1855, Pike MSS.
- 54. Godlove Orth to Will Cumback, April 14, 1855, Schuyler Colfax to Cumback, April 16, 1855, Cumback MSS; Colfax to E. W. Jackson, March 15, 1855, Colfax MSS (IU); Colfax to William Schouler, May 1, 1855, Schouler MSS.
- 55. Garrett Davis to Lew Campbell, June 5, 1855, Campbell MSS; Davis to Schouler, May 23, 1855, Schouler MSS. For Campbell's hope of southern backing in the impending election for speaker of the House, see Campbell to Galloway, May 16, 22, 1855, Galloway MSS; and Campbell to Schouler, June 26, 1855, Schouler MSS.
- 56. Kenneth Rayner to Daniel Ullmann, May 4, 1855, Ullmann MSS; for the content of the Union membership oath, see Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 162–63.
 - 57. Ezra Lincoln to Schouler, May 24, 1855, Schouler MSS.
- 58. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 169–70; Garrett Davis to William Schouler, May 23, 1855, Schouler MSS; Schuyler Colfax to Will Cumback, April 16, 1855, Cumback MSS; Godlove Orth to Schuyler Colfax, June 23, 1855, in Schauinger, "Orth Letters," 40, 65. The quotation about slavery not spreading to Nebraska comes from Conrad to Fillmore, December 24, 1854, MFP-O, but many southern Whig papers and politicians had publicly declared the same thing since the spring of 1854.

- 59. Charlotte North Carolina Whig, July 6, 1854, and Nashville Republican Banner, July 24, 1854, cited in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 1034, 1095.
 - 60. C. M. Conrad to Fillmore, December 24, 1854, MFP-O.
 - 61. Edward L. Winslow to William H. Seward, July 5, 1855, Seward MSS (RU).
- 62. Bardstown Herald, February 22, 1855; Memphis Daily Appeal, June 14, 1855, quoting Walter Coleman; and Fayette Observer, May 29, 1855, quoting Kerr's public letter announcing his candidacy, all cited in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 1149, 1067, 1112. Like Kerr, Coleman attempted to run for Congress as an independent Whig in 1855, and like him, he was crushed by a Know Nothing opponent. The extent and futility of Whig resistance to Know Nothingism in the South will be examined at greater length below.
- 63. Seth Hawley to Seward, March 30, 1855, Seward MSS (RU); John C. Breckinridge to Joseph A. Wright, April 1, 1855, Wright MSS; William B. Campbell to David Campbell, January 4, February 24, 1855, CFP; Brownlow's Knoxville Whig, April 10, 1855, Greensboro Patriot, May 5, 1855, and New Orleans Daily Picayune, July 27, 1855, all quoted in a preliminary but unpaginated draft of Burnet's "Creating the 34th Congress"; William L. Sharkey to Fontaine, May 3, 1855, Fontaine MSS; public letter of Senator Clement C. Clay, in Huntsville, Southern Advocate, July 25, 1855, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 1186.
- 64. Alexander H. H. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, November 11, 1854, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, January 10, 1855, MFP-O.
- 65. Ibid.; Alexander H. H. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, January 1, 1855, MFP-O; J. H. Shirrard to William C. Rives, January 16, 1855, Rives MSS; for Wise's nomination and campaign, see the superb biography by Simpson, Wise, pp. 106–15. For evidence of Democratic antipathy to Wise in southwestern Virginia, see H. C. Gibbons to Angus R. Blakey, February 5, 1855, Blakey MSS.
- 66. Botts communicated with the Newark dinner by a letter that was printed in the New York Times, November 21, 1854, and is quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 936.
- 67. J. H. Shirrard to William C. Rives, January 29, 1855, Rives to William M. Burwell, March 19, 1855, Rives MSS; Alexander H. H. Stuart to Millard Fillmore, January 1, 1855, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, January 10, 1855, MFP-O.
- 68. Stuart to Fillmore, November 11, 1854, January 1, 1855, Haven to Fillmore, January 10, 17, 1855, MFP-O; Fillmore to Stuart, January 15, 1855, Stuart MSS.
- 69. Know Nothings implicitly endorsed anti-Wise Democratic incumbents Thomas Bayly and "Extra-Billy" Smith in the first and seventh districts after both men praised the Know Nothings' call for banning the foreign-born from public office, even while denying membership in the order and denouncing its secrecy. In the tenth district, Whig/Know Nothing John Imboden initially opposed the incumbent Democrat and future governor, John Letcher, but Imboden apparently dropped out of the race before the May balloting. Two of the remaining Whig/Know Nothing candidates, Connally Trigg in the thirteenth district and the venerable Littleton Tazewell in the fourth (Richmond) district, ran against Democratic incumbents who had been unopposed in 1853, and each attracted less than 40 percent of the vote. The other three, however, attracted vote shares ranging between 47 and 49 percent, and all ran more strongly than their Whig predecessors in 1853. The talented Alex Boteler, indeed, lost the eighth (Winchester) district to incumbent Democrat Charles J. Faulkner, himself an apostate Whig, by only 200 votes. In addition to the results listed in the Congressional Quarterly's Guide to U.S. Elections, this analysis relies on Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 933–89.
- 70. Richmond Enquirer, May 13, 1855, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 959; for more on Wise's campaign rhetoric, see Simpson, Wise, pp. 106–15. As Simpson points out, Flournoy was vulnerable because he had once argued that the presence of slavery inhibited Virginia's economic development. James M. H. Beale, the Know Nothings' candidate for lieutenant governor and a two-term congressman, had voted in 1850 for the bill abolishing slave pens in the District of Columbia.
 - 71. Rives to William M. Burwell, March 19, 1855, Rives MSS.

- 72. Kenneth Rayner to Daniel Ullmann, May 8, 1855, Vesparian Ellis to Ullmann, May 29, 1855, J. Timberlake to Ullmann, May 30, 1855, Ullmann MSS; David Campbell to William B. Campbell, June 6, 1855, CFP; William L. Hodge to Fillmore, June 25, 1855, MFP-O Montgomery Daily Mail, May 29, 1855, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 974. For an example of another Know Nothing who blamed "the increased foreign vote" for Flournoy's defeat, see Nathan Sargent to Richard Yates, May 31, 1855, Yates MSS.
 - 73. I have found no such evidence, but some may exist.
 - 74. On Barker, see Gienapp, Origins, p. 185.
- 75. Kennedy was immensely pround of his success in getting his contacts among New York Know Nothings to adopt his platform, which, he told Robert Winthrop, demonstrated that Know Nothings were a "genuine Union party." See John P. Kennedy to J. N. Reynolds, February 27, 1855, Kennedy to Winthrop, April 22, 1855, and Kennedy to S. N. Spencer, November 24, 1855, copies, Kennedy MSS.
- 76. New York Tribune, May 8, 1855; N. Darling to Thurlow Weed, May 30, 1855, Weed MSS (RU); Henry Wilson to William Schouler, April 16, 1855, Schouler MSS; Wilson's later statement is quoted in Gienapp, Origins, p. 183.
- 77. Albert T. Burnley to John J. Crittenden, June 12, 1855, Crittenden MSS (LC); Kenneth Rayner to Daniel Ullmann, June 2, 1856, Ullmann MSS. Superbly detailed, if slightly different accounts of this meeting, can be found in Gienapp, Origins, pp. 182–86; and Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 167–72.
- 78. A delegation from Louisiana containing Catholics was denied admission, and Section Eight of the platform pledged "Resistance to the aggressive policy and corrupting tendencies of the Roman Catholic Church, in our country" and "jealous resistance of all attempts by any sect, denomination or church to obtain an ascendancy over any other in the State, by means of any special privileges or exemption, by any political combination of its members, or by a division of their civil allegiance with any foreign power, potentate or ecclesiastic." Section Fourteen read: "The National Council declares that all the principles of the order shall be henceforward everywhere openly avowed; and that each member shall be at liberty to make known the existence of the order, and the fact that he himself is a member; and it recommends that there be no concealment of the places of meeting of subordinate councils." The platform is printed in the appendix of Holt, "The Antimasonic and Know Nothing Parties," pp. 701–05.
- 79. Five men signed both the main and Pennsylvania protests, which thus garnered fifteen signatures. This account is based on the passages in Anbinder and Gienapp cited above.
- 80. Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 172–74; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 186–87. The all-important New York state council did not explicitly repudiate Section Twelve or insist on restoration of the Missouri Compromise. But it did condemn that repeal and insist that slavery "should derive no extension from such repeal." Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, p. 183.
- 81. "I shall never cease to thank you for your aid at Philadelphia," Wilson wrote Bowles a week after the council meeting. "To your efforts are we indebted in a great degree for the results." Henry Wilson to Samuel Bowles, June 23, 1855, Bowles MSS.
 - 82. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 186-87, quotation from Bowles, p. 186.
- 83. George E. Baker to Seward, June 19, 1855, Seward MSS (RU); Dana is quoted by Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, p. 172.
 - 84. John P. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, June 18, 1855, copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 85. Kennedy to Winthrop, June 18, 1855, Kennedy MSS; New Orleans Bee, June 18, 1855, and Charlotte North Carolina Whig, June 12, 1855, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 1002, 1102.
 - 86. Jesse M. Jones to Alexander H. Stephens, July 9, 1855 (quotation), Stephens MSS (LC).
- 87. For examples of Johnson's attacks, see his speeches of May 11 and June 5, printed in Johnson Papers, pp. 301–06, 308–15. For evidence of Whig discontentment with Gentry, see Andrew Johnson to David T. Patterson, February 17, 1855, ibid., pp. 258–59; William B. Campbell to David Campbell, August 4, 1855, CFP; and William Cullom to William Schouler, September 16, 1855, Schouler MSS. Two votes in particular left Gentry vulnerable to demagoguery on the slavery issue. At the end of the second session of the Thirtieth Congress in March 1849, he had supported a resolution by Indiana's Richard W. Thompson asserting that Mexico's abolition statutes still retained legal force in the Mexican Cession. And in September 1850, he voted for the bill banning slave pens from the District of Columbia. Johnson defeated Henry in 1853, 63,413 (50.9 percent) to 61,163 (49.1 percent); in 1855, he defeated Gentry, 67,499 (50.8 percent) to 65,332 (49.2 percent).

- 88. Cullom to Schouler, September 16, 1855, Schouler MSS.
- 89. The quoted remarks come from a speech by Preston printed in the Tuscumbia, Alabama, Enquirer, July 20, 1855, which is quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 1152. I have relied on Burnet for the details of all southern congressional elections. Running in Kentucky's seventh (Louisville) district, Preston had amassed 6,609 votes (57.7 percent) in 1853 compared to the Democrats' 4,847 (42.3 percent). In 1855, Preston garnered only 4,378 votes (38.7 percent) to Marshall's 6,932 (61.3 percent). The stunning change in his electoral fortunes testifies to the futility of Whig resistance to the Know Nothing juggernaut in nativist strongholds.
- 90. Fayetteville Observer, May 29, 1855, quoted by Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 1112. In 1853, the popular Kerr swamped his Democratic opponent with 6,037 votes, 86.2 percent of the total. In 1855, his total plummeted to 3,756, 34.7 percent of the total.
- 91. I have counted Alexander Stephens as a Whig in both totals, even though he thought of himself as seceding from the party as early as 1850.
- 92. Montgomery $Daily\ Mail$, July 14, 1855, cited by Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 1187.
- 93. New Orleans Bee, August 4, 1855, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 1293; for evidence that French Catholic Whigs refused to vote Know Nothing in 1855, see J. Livingston to Daniel Ullmann, July 31, 1856, Ullmann MSS.
- 94. Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 1102, 1116; Kruman, Parties and Politics, pp. 169–71. Kruman calculated a statistical correlation of .92 between the 1855 Know Nothing vote and that for the Whigs in 1853, but he omitted Kerr's district because of incomplete returns. The figure, which suggests strong Whig support for Know Nothing candidates, would have undoubtedly been lower had that district been included.
- 95. Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," pp. 1356–57, quotes a copy of Johnson's public letter of September 11, 1855, that he found in the New Orleans Louisiana Courier, September 28, 1855. Burnet, pp. 1355–56, also quotes Pratt's statement from the Baltimore American, September 17, 1855.
 - 96. James A. Pearce to John M. Clayton, September 15, 1855, Clayton MSS.
- 97. Evitts, Matter of Allegiances, pp. 80-91. The St. Mary's and Frederick meetings are quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 1354.
- 98. John P. Kennedy to B. E. Gautt, November 16, 1855, to S. N. Spencer, November 24, 1855, and to R. C. Winthrop, February 21, 1856, copies, Kennedy MSS. The term of Pratt, an open foe of Know Nothings, was due to run through the Thirty-Fourth Congress until March 1857. But seizing their chance, Know Nothings in the Maryland legislature elected his successor in early 1856. On election day violence in Baltimore in 1855 and subsequent elections, see Evitts, Matter of Allegiances, pp. 89–117.
- 99. Quoted in Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," p. 177. Volz has written by far the best study of Kentucky politics in the 1850s, and my analysis of Kentucky is based heavily on pp. 161–230 of his Ph.D. dissertation.
- 100. Danville Kentucky Tribune, March 16, 1855, and Louisville Journal, March 20, 1855, cited in ibid., pp. 188–89.
 - 101. Quoted in ibid., p. 193.
- 102. That Virginia's Flournoy and Tennessee's Gentry were also strong proponents of Taylor's nomination in 1848 is hardly coincidental. Recall that Taylor had been pushed originally as a No Party man in order to attract Democrats to an ostensibly nonpartisan, indeed antiparty, movement. Know Nothingism presented itself in the same way.
 - 103. Cullom to Schouler, September 16, 1855, Schouler MSS.
 - 104. Dated July 8, Jones' letter is quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 1078.

105. Ibid., p. 1077.

106. Ibid., pp. 1064–67. The Whig/Know Nothing candidate, Thomas Rivers, won the election after Whigs in the Know Nothing order forced Coleman to withdraw.

107. My account of this district is based on ibid., pp. 1045–52. Most Whigs apparently stayed with Taylor, but as the Know Nothing candidate, he also garnered some Democratic votes. In 1853, when Watkins refused to step aside for Taylor and they divided the Whig vote, a Democrat won with 5,525 votes (37.1 percent), Taylor ran second with 5,387 (36.2 percent), and Watkins trailed with 3,988 (26.7 percent). In 1855, Watkins got 7,781 votes (50.9 percent) to Taylor's 7,511 (49.1 percent).

Whig divisions in the newly drawn second district also allowed a Democrat to win in 1853, and in 1855, contenders for the Whig nomination from each rival faction both joined the Know Nothings to get their endorsement. When influential Know Nothing editor Parson Brownlow annointed William Sneed, who originally identified himself as "a party man, a Whig all over, of the old guard," as the better champion of Americanism, Sneed won in consecutive order: the Whig nomination from a Know Nothing-dominated Whig convention, a separate American nomination, and the election. Ibid., pp. 1052–58, quotation, p. 1055.

- 108. Schott, Stephens, pp. 158-59.
- 109. H. R. Casey to Alexander H. Stephens, May 29, 1855, Stephens MSS (LC).
- 110. W. W. Paine to Alexander H. Stephens, February 23, 1855, Alfred Iverson to Stephens, June 25, 1855, ? Thwartt to Stephens, June 30, 1855, Stephens MSS (LC).
- 111. Jesse M. Jones to Alexander Stephens, July 9, 1855, James Mercer Green to Stephens, August 9, 1855, Stephens MSS (LC). Green, for example, identified himself as a member of the "Central Executive Committee of the Democratic Anti K. N. Party of Bible" County.
- 112. Schott, Stephens, pp. 184–87; William Reese to Linton Stephens, August 9, 1855, R. G. Harper to Linton Stephens, August 27, 1855, Alexander Stephens MSS (LC).
- 113. Thwartt to Alexander H. Stephens, June 30, 1855, John W. Duncan to Stephens, July 13, 1855, J. Lomax to Stephens, August 4, 1855, and H. Walker to Stephens, October 10, 1855 (quotations), Stephens MSS (LC).
- 114. A third-party Temperance candidate got 6,333 votes (6.1 percent) in the gubernatorial race. For evidence of Democratic converts to Know Nothingism, Andrews' blunders on the campaign trail, and Whig aversion to him, see the following letters, all to Alexander H. Stephens unless specified otherwise, in the Stephens MSS (LC): W. W. Paine, February 23, 1855, Alfred Iverson, June 25, 1855, James Mercer Green to Stephens, August 9, 1855, William Reese to Linton Stephens, August 9, 1855, and H. Walker, October 10, 1855.
- 115. Savannah Daily Georgian, June 19, 1855, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 1240.
- 116. John P. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, June 18, 1855, Winthrop to Kennedy, June 20, 1855, Kennedy MSS.
 - 117. Edward Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, June 18, August 11, 1855, Everett MSS.
- 118. Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, August 10, 1855, Weed MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to John P. Kennedy, August 23, 1855, Kennedy MSS; for Fish, see Gienapp, Origins, p. 226.
- 119. Nathan K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, December 5, 1854, MFP-O; Solomon Foot to Justin Morrill, November 1, 1855, Morrill MSS.
 - 120. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 203-08, quotation p. 206.
- 121. Ibid. and Tables 7.7 and 7.8, p. 512; Edward Kent to William Pitt Fessenden, May 21, June 6, 1855, Noah Smith, Jr., to Fessenden, June 8, 1855, and George W. Ingersoll to Noah Smith, Jr., Fessenden MSS (WRHS).
 - 122. Edward Kent to William H. Seward, October 20, 1855, Seward MSS (RU).
- 123. Developments in Massachusetts receive excellent, though differing, analyses in Gienapp, Origins, pp. 214–223, and Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 187–92. See also, however, Henry Wilson to Samuel Bowles, June 23, 1855 (quotation), Robert C. Winthrop to Bowles, June 21, 1855, refusing to join a fusion movement, and the many letters from Gardner to Bowles over the summer and fall, Bowles MSS; Edward Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, September 25, November 7, 1855, Everett MSS; Julius Rockwell to Israel Washburn, Jr., October 13, 1855, Washburn MSS (LC); and the previously cited letters from Winthrop and Everett.

- 124. Gienapp, Origins, Tables 7.12 and 7.13, pp. 514–15. Washburn got 27,279 votes (20.9 percent) in 1854; Walley's share was 9.7 percent. Since Know Nothings retained control of the legislature, Gardner was elected by that body.
- 125. Edward Everett to Mrs. Charles Eames, November 7, 1855, Everett MSS; Edward L. Pierce to Salmon P. Chase, November 9, 1855, Chase MSS (LC); Henry Wilson to Salmon P. Chase, November 17, 1855, Chase MSS (HSP).
- 126. For the antislavery thrust of Gardner's campaign, see Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, p. 190.
- 127. On this gathering, see Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, p. 196; and the reports in the Cincinnati Gazette, November 21–24, 1855.
- 128. James Elliott to Thurlow Weed, November 27, 1855, Weed MSS (RU); Cincinnati Gazette, November 24, 1855.
- 129. John P. Kennedy to John N. Reynolds, November 18, 1855, Kennedy MSS; Haven to Fillmore, December 6, 1855, MFP-O.
- 130. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 208–13, quotation from McClure, p. 209; Holt, Forging a Majority, pp. 151–74; George Sanderson to James Buchanan, May 2, 1855, Buchanan MSS (HSP).
- 131. Since Whigs and Know Nothings both backed James Pollock for governor in 1854, my phrase "Whig holdouts" refers to those men who voted Whig in the race for state supreme court justice when Know Nothings were backing the Native American candidate.
- 132. H. L. Dieffenbach to William L. Bigler, October 3, 1855, Bigler MSS; George Sanderson to James Buchanan, October 11, 1855, Buchanan MSS (HSP); Gienapp, Origins, Table 7.11, p. 514. I have used the returns listed in ibid., p. 274, n. 74. Ballots were also distributed for the original Know Nothing candidate whom Nicholson replaced, and he got 678 votes (0.2 percent).
- 133. Joshua R. Giddings to George W. Julian, May 30, 1855, Giddings-Julian MSS; Lewis Campbell to Salmon P. Chase, May 28, 1855, Chase MSS (LC). The Chase collections at the Library of Congress and the Historical Society of Pennsylvania are filled with letters relating to this struggle. In addition, the secondary literature on the Ohio race is excellent. See Gienapp, Origins, pp. 192–203; Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 174–80; and Maizlish, Triumph of Sectionalism, pp. 206–224.
- 134. Ben Wade to William Schouler, May 3, 1855, Lewis Campbell to Schouler, May 22, 1855, Schouler MSS. For old line, largely conservative, Whig opposition to Chase, see M. H. Nichols to Salmon P. Chase, April 14, 1855, Chase MSS (LC); and Thomas Corwine to Thomas B. Stevenson, June 17, 1855, Schouler MSS.
- 135. For one Whig/Know Nothing's anger at Spooner's action in destroying separate Know Nothing nominations in June, see William H. Gibson to Samuel Galloway, April 23, 1855, Galloway MSS.
- 136. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 200–01, 509–11. In a postelection letter, Ben Wade sneered that "our Silver Grays" joined with dissident Know Nothings to run the Trimble ticket. Wade to Israel Washburn, Jr., October 13, 1855, Washburn MSS (LC).
- 137. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 229–30; Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 183–84. The Know Nothing candidate won a four-way race for secretary of state with 34.1 percent of the vote. For the optimistic reactions of Haven and Kennedy, see John P. Kennedy to Millard Fillmore and to J. N. Reynolds, both dated November 18, 1855, Kennedy MSS; and Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, December 6, 1855, MFP-O. For examples of Silver Gray/Know Nothings' hostile reactions to Section Twelve, see the following letters to Daniel Ullmann, all in the Ullmann MSS: Killian Miller, June 24, 1855, Congressman-elect F. S. Edwards, June 23, 1855, and James R. Thompson, June 26, 1855.
- 138. William H. Seward to Lucian Barbour et al., July 2, 1855, Weed to Seward, July 23, 1855, Seward MSS (RU).
 - 139. James C. Hopkins to Thurlow Weed, July 17, 1855, Weed MSS (RU).
- 140. Horatio Seymour to William L. Marcy, July 31, 1855, Marcy MSS (LC); Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, June 29, August 15, 1855, Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, August 18, 1855, MFP-O; Washington Hunt to Thurlow Weed, August 10, 1855, Weed MSS (RU).
 - 141. DeWitt C. Stanford to Myron H. Clark, August 2, 1855, Clark MSS; Alonzo Johnson to Thurlow Weed, August 17, 1855, Weed MSS (RU); Weed to Seward, July 23, 1855, Seward to E. A. Stansbury, September 14, 1855, Seward MSS (RU). On Seward's continued hesitancy about abandoning the Whig party in New York in 1855, see Gienapp, Origins, pp. 224–25.

- 142. Seymour to Marcy, July 31, 1855, Marcy MSS (LC).
- 143. Haven to Fillmore, August 15, 1855, Hall to Fillmore, August 18, 1855, MFP-O; James R. Thompson to Daniel Ullmann, September 1, 1855, Ullmann MSS. For a Whig's appalled reaction to the corruption of the canal board in 1855 by the "central clique" of Weed's allies, see W. H. Adams to Fillmore, March 15, 1855, MFP-O.
- 144. S. B. Jewett to Samuel J. Tilden, October 6, 1855, Tilden MSS; Henry E. Davies to Millard Fillmore, October 1, 1855, MFP-O; Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, October 7, 1855, Fish MSS; DeWitt Clinton to Thurlow Weed, October 15, 1855, Weed MSS (RU).
- 145. George E. Baker to William H. Seward, October 5, 8, 1855, Seward MSS (RU); Berger, Revolution, pp. 84–85.
- 146. Seward at Washington, pp. 253-54; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 226-27. I rely heavily on Gienapp's superb account of the two conventions.
- 147. Fillmore's friend Kennedy spotted and rejoiced in this omission. By his logic, Republicans' silence on the matter meant that anti-Nebraska Whig/Know Nothings could also drop it and thus back Fillmore in 1856 without an explicitly anti-Nebraska platform. John P. Kennedy to J. N. Reynolds, November 18, 1855, Kennedy MSS.
- 148. Nathan K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, November 16, 1855, MFP-O; George E. Baker to William H. Seward, October 13, 1855, Seward MSS (RU); Oliver B. Pierce to Thurlow Weed, November 26, 1855, Weed MSS (RU).
- 149. Horatio Seymour to William L. Marcy, November 9, 1855, A. J. Parker to Marcy, November 10, 1855 (quotation), Marcy MSS (LC).
- 150. J. J. Chambers to Myron H. Clark, September 25, 1855, Clark MSS; Gienapp, Origins, p. 232; John M. Bradford to Hamilton Fish, November 8, 1855, Fish MSS.
 - 151. Gienapp, Origins, Tables 7.14-7.17, pp. 515-17.
- 152. Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, October 7, December 20, 1855, Fish MSS; Seward to Lucian Barbour et al., July 2, 1855, Seward MSS (RU).
- 153. Speech on the steps of the New York state capitol, Albany, October 12, 1855, in Seward at Washington, p. 256.
- 154. N. K. Hall to Millard Fillmore, November 16, 1855, Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, December 6, 1855, MFP-O; John P. Kennedy to B. E. Gautt, November 16, 1855, Kennedy to Millard Fillmore, November 18, 1855, Kennedy to J. N. Reynolds, November 18, 1855, Kennedy to S. N. Spencer, November 24, 1855, Kennedy MSS.
- 155. William H. Seward to Fredrick Seward, November 8, 18, 1855, Seward to George E. Baker, November 1856, in Seward at Washington, pp. 258–59.
 - 156. Hunt to Fish, December 20, 1855, Fish MSS.

CHAPTER 26

- 1. Jackson Pilot, July 30, 1870.
- 2. Samuel Eliot to John O. Sargent, November 10, 1851, Sargent MSS.
- 3. Granger to Millard Fillmore, June 30, 1852, MFP-BHS.
- 4. Washington Hunt to Hamilton Fish, December 20, 1855, Fish MSS.
- 5. Belleville Advocate, January 10, 1855, quoted in Burnet, "Creating the 34th Congress," p. 727; Hunt to Fish, December 20, 1855 (quotation), February 17, 1856, Fish MSS.
- 6. John P. Kennedy to Nathan Sargent, July 19, 1855, copy, Kennedy to J. N. Reynolds, November 18, 1855, copy, Kennedy to S. N. Spencer, November 24, 1855, Kennedy MSS.
- 7. Andrew Tracy to Justin Morrill, December 10, 1855, Phlinzy H. White to Morrill, December 29, 1855, Sam S. Billings to Morrill, January 20, 1856, Morrill MSS.
 - 8. George Ashmun to Nathaniel P. Banks, October 11, 1856, Banks MSS (Ill.SHL).
- 9. Daniel D. Barnard to James A. Hamilton, November 23, 28, 1855, copies, Barnard MSS; Robert C. Winthrop to Edward Everett, December 3, 1855, Everett MSS; John P. Kennedy to Robert C. Winthrop, December 23, 1855, copy, Kennedy to James A. Hamilton, December 31, 1855, copy, Kennedy MSS; Robert A. West to Hamilton Fish, January 9, 13 (quotation), 1856,

Washington Hunt to Fish, January 16, 1856, Fish MSS. Kennedy could not attend the meeting, but in his letter to Hamilton of December 31, Kennedy strongly urged the Whigs not to nominate Fillmore and to allow the Americans to do so, lest a prior Whig nomination turn Democratic Know Nothings against Fillmore.

- 10. West to Fish, January 13, 1856, Fish MSS.
- 11. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 239–448, provides by far the fullest and best analysis of the election from the Republicans' perspective. The Democratic campaign is assessed in Nichols, Disruption of American Democracy, pp. 17–62. Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, pp. 194–245, also covers the American and Republican campaigns in the North, but some of his interpretations merit skepticism. I have assessed the strategy behind the Fillmore campaign and the reasons that strategy unraveled in "Another Look at the Election of 1856."
- 12. Anbinder, Nativism & Slavery, p. 197, n. 8, suggests that as many as 124 House members were, or had once been, affiliated with the Know Nothings, making them the largest group among the opposition. But he himself admits that his estimate is shaky.
- 13. An excellent account of the speakership election can be found in Gienapp, Origins, pp. 240–48; the classic traditional account is Harrington, "First Northern Victory." Burnet, after examining the congressional elections in all 234 districts, counts 106 verifiable Know Nothings, while Anbinder gives an upper estimate of 124. Thus I have split the difference with 115. Gienapp, p. 240, counts 118 Anti-Nebraska men.
- 14. Joshua R. Giddings to Gamaliel Bailey, November 11, 1855, Giddings-Julian MSS; Samuel Whitcomb to Justin Morrill, November 22, 1855, Morrill MSS; Schuyler Colfax to Charles Heaton, December 3, 1855, Colfax MSS (NIHS); Preston King to Francis P. Blair, January 3, 1856, Blair-Lee MSS; M. H. Nichols to Salmon P. Chase, December 11, 1855, Gamaliel Bailey to Chase, February 21, 1856, Chase MSS (LC).
 - 15. Schuyler Colfax to Charles Heaton, December 16, 1855, Colfax MSS (NIHS).
- 16. Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, December 6, 13, 1855, January 20, 1856, MFP-O; Schuyler Colfax to Charles Heaton, December 3, 11, 16, 1855, Colfax MSS (NIHS); ? Greene to William Schouler, September 1, 1855, J. H. Clay Mudd to Schouler, September 15, 1855, R. W. Corwine to Schouler, December 8, 1855, William Schouler MSS; Albert Gallatin Brown to John F. H. Claiborne, February 4, 1856, Claiborne MSS; M. H. Nichols to Salmon P. Chase, December 11, 1855, Chase MSS (LC); Israel Washburn, Jr., to J. L. Stevens, December 25, 1855, Washburn MSS (LC).

What particularly embittered Campbell was that Cincinnati editor William Schouler, who helped persuade Campbell to withdraw and who, Campbell believed, had come to Washington to lobby congressmen for him, instead betrayed him. Schouler wanted the House printing contracts more than Campbell's election. Once he discovered Democratic/Know Nothings' antipathy to Campbell, he knew that ex-Whigs from Ohio could never win both the speakership and the printer's post. Thus Schouler urged anti-Nebraska men to dump Campbell for Banks, but he still lost the printing contracts. See Lew Campbell to Schouler, February 16, March 10, 24, 30, 1856, and Schouler to George Harrington, April 10, 1856, Schouler MSS.

- 17. Edward Kent to Israel Washburn, Jr., December 15, 1855, February 9, 1856 (quotation), Washburn MSS (Norlands); G. D. Long to William H. Seward, February 6, 1856 (quotation), Seward MSS (RU); Phlinzy H. White to Justin Morrill, December 29, 1855 (quotation), Sam S. Billings to Morrill, January 20, 1856 (quotation), Morrill MSS; Israel Washburn, Jr., to J. L. Stevens, February 12, 1856, Washburn MSS (LC).
- 18. Most southern Know Nothings voted for Aiken on the crucial final ballots because Aiken, unlike other Democratic candidates, had not attended the original Democratic caucus that denounced Know Nothingism. If all southern Americans had backed him on the final ballot, he, not Banks, would have won the plurality decision. See Albert Gallatin Brown to John F. H. Claiborne, February 4, 1856, Claiborne MSS.
- 19. John H. Houston to Nathaniel P. Banks, September 3, 1855, Banks MSS (LC); G. C. to N. P. Banks, November 21, 1855, Banks MSS (Duke); Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, December 13, 1855, January 20, 1856, MFP-O; Thomas L. Harris to Lanphier and Walker, February 6, 1856, Lanphier MSS; Gamaliel Bailey to Salmon P. Chase, February 21, 1856, Chase MSS (LC).

20. New York's Fillmorites also worried that the wealthy Law, who had already purchased the Albany State Register to turn it against Fillmore and had bribed many New York delegates to the American convention, would lavish enough "cigars Brandy & money" on other delegates at Philadelphia to buy the nomination. Fillmore's lieutenants badly needed additional time to organize delegates against Law's juggernaut.

For the desire of Know Nothings from Delaware, the District of Columbia, Maryland, and Kentucky to postpone the convention to avert the "same devil of [sectional] discord" that had plagued the 1855 Know Nothing convention, see John P. Kennedy to Nathan Sargent, July 19, 1855 (above quotation), Kennedy to Solomon G. Haven, January 29, 1856, Kennedy to Rolfe S. Saunders, February 2, 1856, Kennedy MSS; Thomas L. Harris to Lanphier and Walker, February 6, 1856 (reporting on fears of Kentucky Know Nothing Congressman Humphrey Marshall), Lanphier MSS; Vesparian Ellis to Daniel Ullmann, November 14, 1855, Ullmann MSS; Robert P. Letcher to John J. Crittenden, December 13, 1855 ("fatal"), Crittenden MSS (LC); George Pepper Norris to John M. Clayton, February 23, 1856, Clayton MSS.

For New Yorkers' concerns, see L. S. Parsons to Daniel Ullmann, November 17, 1855 ("cigars Brandy & money"), Stephen Sammons to Ullmann, November 26, 1855, James R. Thompson to Ullmann, January 26, 1856, Ullmann MSS; Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, December 6, 1855, January 20, 1856, Nathan K. Hall to Fillmore, February 4, 7, 1856, MFP-O.

- 21. Vesparian Ellis to Daniel Ullmann, February 17, 1856, Ullmann MSS; Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, February 29 (quotation), March 2, 1856, MFP-O.
- 22. For the Philadelphia meeting of the American national council and nominating convention, I have relied on the reports in the New York Times, February 20–26, 1856. Long excerpts from those accounts are reprinted in the appendix to my "The Antimasonic and Know Nothing Parties," pp. 709–32.
 - 23. Ibid., p. 717; John P. Kennedy to Millard Fillmore, March 18, 1856, copy, Kennedy MSS.
- 24. Fillmore won on the second official ballot with 179 of 241 votes cast, but the New York Times provides no sectional breakdown of the vote. On an unofficial straw ballot, when many delegates abstained, however, Fillmore led various competitors by only seventy-one to seventy. And on the first official ballot, from which Maine, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Iowa delegates totally abstained, as did majorities from Indiana and Illinois, Fillmore got only forty-eight northern votes, compared to seventy-two from the South, while sixty-six Northerners voted for Law, John McLean, Kentucky's Garrett Davis, North Carolina's Kenneth Rayner, New Jersey's Robert Stockton, or Texas' Sam Houston. On that ballot, in fact, Fillmore received no votes at all from nine of sixteen free states.
 - 25. New York Times, February 26, 1856; Gienapp, Origins, pp. 259-63.
- 26. Ibid.; John Paul to Salmon P. Chase, February 24, 1856, Chase MSS (HSP); R. W. Corwine to William Schouler, February 24, 28, 1856, Schouler MSS; Thomas J. Marsh to Nathaniel P. Banks, March 19, 1856 (quotation), Isaac Sherman to Banks, April 4, 1856, Banks MSS (LC); Andrew Tracy to Justin Morrill, March 16, 1856, Morrill MSS.
- 27. Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, March 2, 1856, MFP-O; John P. Kennedy to Fillmore, March 18, 1856, copy, Kennedy MSS; Daniel D. Barnard to Hamilton Fish, February 29, 1856, Fish MSS.
- 28. New York Times, February 26, 1856; Solomon G. Haven to Millard Fillmore, March 2, 28, April 24, May 11, 1856, N. K. Hall to Fillmore, March 23, 1856, John P. Kennedy to Fillmore, March 18, 28, 1856, Henry E. Davies to Fillmore, March 31, 1856, MFP-O; Robert M. Bird to John M. Clayton, March 2, 1856, Clayton MSS; Haven to Daniel Ullmann, May 11, 1856, Ullmann MSS; William G. Brownlow to Andrew Jackson Donelson, May 24, 1856, Donelson MSS
- 29. John P. Kennedy to Joseph F. Randolph, December 1, 1855 (quotation), Kennedy to James A. Hamilton, December 31, 1855, copies, Kennedy MSS.
- 30. John P. Kennedy to Millard Fillmore, March 18, 1856, copy, Kennedy MSS; Solomon G. Haven to Fillmore, March 28, 1856, Henry E. Davies to Fillmore, March 31, 1856, MFP-O.
- 31. On these two developments and their impact on northern public opinion, see Gienapp, Origins, pp. 297–303; id., "Crime Against Sumner"; and Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 192–96.

- 32. Everett to Fillmore, July 9, 1856, MFP-O; T. M. Monroe to Daniel Ullmann, June 13, 1856, Ullmann MSS; E. P. Walton to Justin Morrill, May 28, 1856, Morrill MSS.
- 33. The rigging of the North American nomination is analyzed in the books by Gienapp, Anbinder, and Holt cited above, and it can be followed in numerous letters in the Nathaniel P. Banks Papers at the Library of Congress and the Illinois State Historical Library. On Frémont's ultimate nomination by the North Americans, for example, see S. M. Allen to Banks, June 21, 1856, Banks MSS. Not all North Americans could be hoodwinked into supporting Frémont after Banks declined. A few delegates, primarily from New Jersey, defiantly nominated a ticket of Robert Stockton for president and North Carolina's Kenneth Rayner for vice president.

There was also a divisive controversy, lasting until late August, about Frémont's running mate. Along with Banks, the North Americans had originally nominated Pennsylvania's ex-Governor William F. Johnston for vice president, and they expected the Republicans to run Johnston with Frémont. But the Republicans refused and instead nominated William L. Dayton of New Jersey. Only a direct promise from Frémont himself to North American delegates in New York that Dayton would withdraw in favor of Johnston finally persuaded them to endorse Frémont, but Dayton indignantly refused. Some North American state councils, especially in Connecticut and Massachusetts, but, interestingly, not Pennsylvania, therefore insisted on running Frémont-Johnston, not Frémont-Dayton electoral tickets. Johnston was finally induced to withdraw on August 29, apparently by the promise of a cabinet post in Frémont's cabinet and a cash payoff. Gienapp, Origins, pp. 343–46, 382–86, traces the flap over the vice presidency with his customary expertise, but it can also be followed in letters to Edwin D. Morgan, chairman of the Republicans' national campaign committee, in the Morgan MSS.

- 34. Fillmore's letter was addressed to Virginia's Alexander H. H. Stuart, chairman of the American committee that officially notified him of the nomination, and it can be found in the Stuart MSS (University of Virginia). For evidence of its circulation at the North American convention, see Horace H. Day to Nathaniel P. Banks, June 13, 1856, Banks MSS (LC).
- 35. I provide more detail on these efforts, as well as supporting documentation, in "Another Look at the Election of 1856."
- 36. William L. Hodge to Millard Fillmore, June 21, 1856 (quotations), MFP-O; Washington National Intelligencer, editorial and report of Augusta County, Virginia, Whig meeting, April 7, 1856. "Though shorn of our former strength," vowed the Virginians, "we believe the old line Whigs hold the balance of power in the State, if not the Union, and that we can control the result of the next Presidential election in Virginia."
- 37. R. W. Corwine to William Schouler, February 28, 1856, Schouler MSS; David T. Disney to Stephen A. Douglas, February 26, 28, 1856, Douglas MSS.
- 38. Alexander H. H. Stuart to John P. Kennedy, March 16, 1856, Kennedy MSS; George E. Badger to Jeremiah Clemens, July 30, 1856, copy, Badger MSS (SHC, UNC); Richard K. Call to Andrew Jackson Donelson, April 23, 1856, Donelson MSS.
- 39. James A. Hamilton to Hamilton Fish, March 7, 1856; Daniel D. Barnard to Fish, February 29, April 28 (quotation), 1856, and Washington Hunt to Fish, April 2, 1856, Fish MSS; excerpt from New York Commercial Advertiser, quoted in Washington National Intelligencer, April 7, 1856.
- 40. Vesparian Ellis to Daniel Ullmann, March 2, 1856, Ullmann MSS. Anti-Know Nothing Whig Robert C. Winthrop also advised against early Whig endorsements for fear of alienating Democratic Know Nothings. See Winthrop to Hamilton Fish, March 13, 26, 1856, Fish MSS.
- 41. Edward Everett to William Trescot, January 20, 1856, copy, Everett MSS; A. B. Ely to Millard Fillmore, August 28, September 20 (quotation), 1856, MFP-O; Robert C. Winthrop to Hamilton Fish, March 28, 1856, Fish MSS.
- 42. John T. Henry to David Davis, March 7, 1856, David Davis MSS; Alexander H. H. Stuart to J. P. Kennedy, March 16, 1856, Kennedy MSS; R. A. West to Hamilton Fish, March 22, 1856 (quotation), Fish MSS; Badger to Jeremiah Clemens, July 30, 1856, Badger MSS.
- 43. C. G. Baylor to William L. Marcy, March 28, 1856, Marcy MSS (LC); Charles M. Conrad to Fillmore, April 11, 1856, MFP-O; George S. Bryan to J. P. Kennedy, April 4, May 26, 1856, Kennedy MSS; George Badger to John J. Crittenden, August 9, 1856, Crittenden MSS (LC).

1176 Notes

- 44. James E. Harvey to William L. Marcy, March 9, 1856, Marcy MSS (LC); Edward P. Kelly to Nathaniel P. Banks, March 21, 1856, Banks MSS (LC); William D. Lewis to John M. Clayton, July 28, 1856, Clayton MSS.
- 45. Edwin D. Morgan to Myron H. Clark, April 3, 1856 (quotation), Morgan to John Bigelow, June 2, 1856 (first quotation), copies, Morgan MSS; ? Wales to Nathan P. Banks, July 26, 1856 (quotation), Banks MSS (LC); George T. Curtis to John J. Crittenden, July 10, 1856, Crittenden MSS (LC); D. Worth to George W. Julian, May 13, 1856 (quotation about Indiana), Giddings-Julian MSS.
- 46. John Law to William L. Marcy, October 10, 1855, Marcy MSS (LC); Thomas Hendricks to Allen Hamilton, March 31, 1856, Hamilton MSS; Rufus Brown to James Buchanan, February 18, 1856, Reverdy Johnson to Buchanan, July 8, 17, 1856, Richard Grayson to Buchanan, August 1, 1856, Buchanan MSS (HSP); George Badger to Jeremiah Clemens, July 30, 1856, copy, Badger MSS; Nevins, Ordeal: House, p. 492. Literally scores of additional letters could be cited to document Whig defection to the Democrats. Henry Clay's other living son, Thomas, unlike his brother, James, supported Fillmore and the Americans.
- 47. John C. Breckinridge to Daniel M. Barringer, October 8, 1856, Barringer MSS; William G. Brownlow to Millard Fillmore, October 6, 1856, MFP-O; George S. Bryan to John P. Kennedy, October 23, 1856, Kennedy MSS.
- 48. Richard W. Thompson to T. N. Parmalee, September 10, 1856, Thompson MSS (IU); J. O. Jones to Henry S. Lane, June 25, 1856 (quotation), Henry S. Lane MSS.
- 49. Charles Levi Woodbury to James Buchanan, July 10, 1856, Buchanan MSS (HSP), referring to an address from a Boston meeting of the Massachusetts Whig state committee. The reports from the South come from a meeting of Whigs in Washington, the Norfolk, Virginia, Herald, and the Fayetteville, North Carolina, Observer, all quoted in the Washington National Intelligencer, June 24, 1856. The Intelligencer contains the fullest record of these meetings and editorials, and I have relied on its issues for March 8, 27, April 7, May 25, and June 21, 23, 24, 26, 1856, for reports of them and the quotations I use below.
- 50. All taken from the issues of the National Intelligencer cited above, these quotations come, respectively, from a June editorial of the Richmond Whig, the Augusta County, Virginia, Whig meeting in April; James Jones' speech to the Washington, D.C., Whig meeting on June 21; the resolutions of that meeting; undated April and June editorials from the New York Commercial Advertiser; and an undated excerpt from the Baltimore Patriot in June. At least three of these sources explicitly used the phrase "balance of power" to refer to the Whigs' potential role in 1856.
- 51. Resolutions of Augusta County, Virginia, Whig meeting and editorial of the New York Commercial Advertiser, quoted in the Washington National Intelligencer, April 7, June 24, 1856.
 - 52. Baltimore Patriot, quoted in the National Intelligencer, June 24, 1856.
- 53. H. E. Dummer to Richard Yates, July 9, 1856, Yates MSS; William L. Hodge to Fillmore, June 21, 1856, MFP-O; National Intelligencer, June 23, 24, 1856. Dummer, Hodge, and an editorial of the National Intelligencer cited July 30 as the date. But the Whig meeting in Washington and the New York Evening Mirror, according to reports in that paper, specified July 4.
- 54. Solomon G. Haven to Alexander H. H. Stuart, June 29, 1856, Stuart MSS (UVa.). For other enthusiastic responses to Fillmore's speeches, see George Robertson to Fillmore, July 3, 1856, Haven to Fillmore, July 4, 1856, and Stuart to Fillmore, July 9, 1856, MFP-O.
- 55. Fillmore privately explained his preferred Kansas policy to Anna Ella Carroll while simultaneously arguing that he dare not let Southerners see his views. An attempt to reimpose the Missouri Compromise line, as northern Whig/Know Nothings insisted, he argued, would prolong the sectional crisis by infuriating Southerners, but immediate statehood for Kansas would end it. "I would therefore repeal its obnoxious [proslavery] laws, provide for a fair representation of the people in a new legislature, secure to the people free and safe ingress and egress to the territory, and protect them when there from all external violence or intrusion, until the population of the territory entitled them to be admitted as a state; then I would let them, that is, the resident citizens, form their own constitution, with or without slavery, and admit them into the Union and thus put an end to this unfortunate controversy." Ostensibly neutral, this policy would almost surely have produced a free state. That is why Fillmore feared letting Southerners see it. But it was so eminently sensible and fair that his refusal to publish it was one of Fillmore's two biggest mistakes in the campaign. The other was the speeches in New York and Newburgh to be described below. See Fillmore to Anna Ella Carroll, September 8, 1856, microfilm edition of Fillmore Papers (original in Anna Ella Carroll MSS, Maryland Historical Society).

- 56. For Fillmore's Albany address, see National Intelligencer, July 1, 1856. For his speech at Rochester on June 27, see Severance, "Millard Fillmore Papers, Volume 2," pp. 23–26.
- 57. Washington National Intelligencer, June 27, 1856. I have quoted the newspaper version. The later printed edition of the speech worded the matter differently but was no less emphatic about the final death of the Whig party. In it, Fillmore called Clay's defeat in 1844 "the wound inflicted that began the destruction of the Whig party. There was the canker worm that gnawed it to the heart, and subsequently carried it to the grave. These are painful reminiscences all—and let them pass." See Severance, "Millard Fillmore Papers, Volume 2," pp. 9–10.
 - 58. Washington National Intelligencer, July 1, 1856.
 - 59. The platform is enclosed with Wyndham Robertson to Fillmore, July 23, 1856, MFP-O.
- 60. William C. Rives to Millard Fillmore, July 16, 1856, John S. Carlisle to Fillmore, July 18, 1856, Haven to Fillmore, July 18, 1856, MFP-O; Fillmore to Rives, July 23, 1856, Rives MSS.
- 61. See the letters from William A. Graham, John Kerr, George Robertson, E. C. Cabell, James M. Townshend, Joseph Randolph, George Lunt, and other old line Whigs to Fillmore during July in the MFP-O.
 - 62. Daniel M. Barringer to W. A. Houck, August 6, 1856, Barringer MSS.
- 63. James McCallum to John Bell, June 1856, John Bell MSS; Henry A. Wise to Edward Everett, August 12, 17, 23, 1856, Everett MSS; William L. Hodge to Millard Fillmore, September 20, 1856 (quotation), MFP-O. Wise and Hodge suggested that the hope of winning printing contracts from the Democrat-controlled Senate also explained their refusal to endorse Fillmore.
- 64. Everett to Fillmore, July 16, 1856 (quotation), MFP-O; Baltimore Patriot, quoted in National Intelligencer, June 24, 1856; Thomas Ewing to Thomas Ewing, Jr., July 5, 1856, EFP.
- 65. Fillmore to Everett, July 9, 1856, Everett MSS; Everett to Fillmore, July 16, 1856, MFP-O; Fillmore to Robert C. Winthrop, August 29, 1856, Winthrop MSS. For the Everett and Winthrop endorsements of Fillmore, see Everett to William Trescot, September 12, 1856, and Winthrop to Everett, October 17, 1856, Everett MSS.
 - 66. Haven to Fillmore, July 20, 1856, MFP-O.
 - 67. A. B. Ely to Fillmore, September 6, 20, 1856, MFP-O.
- 68. Hamilton Fish to Thurlow Weed, November 22, 1855, Weed MSS (RU); Haven to Millard Fillmore, July 28 (quotation), August 19, 1856, Francis Granger to Fillmore, August 9, 11, 1856, C. D. Bingham to Fillmore, August 9, 1856, William L. Hodge to Fillmore, September 30, 1856, MFP-O; Fish to Edward Everett, September 15, 1856, Everett MSS; Daniel D. Barnard to Fish, September 23, 1856, Fish MSS.
 - 69. Corwin to Fillmore, July 22, 1856, MFP-O.
- 70. Duncan C. Niven to Fillmore, August 13, 1856, Anna Ella Carroll to Fillmore, August 18, 23, September 6, 11, 23, 1856, Horace H. Day to Fillmore, September 10, 1856, Fillmore to William L. Hodge, September 27, 1856, Corwin to Fillmore, October 5, 1856, MFP-O; Fillmore to Anna Ella Carroll, September 8, 1856, Carroll MSS (microfilm edition of Fillmore MSS).
- 71. Literally scores of letters to Fillmore conveyed these warnings from the South. For New Jersey and Vermont, see Joseph Randolph to Fillmore, September 1, 1856, and Harry Bradley to Fillmore, July 7 (quotation), August 8, 1856, MFP-O. For the quotation about Gales and Seaton of the Intelligencer and Fish's announcement, see Henry A. Wise to Edward Everett, August 17, 1856, and Fish to Everett, September 15, 1856, Everett MSS.
- 72. I rely on the list of delegates printed in the Richmond Whig, September 20, 1856, and reproduced in the appendix of DeScherer, "The Whig National Convention of 1856." Many of these men corresponded with Fillmore in 1856.
 - 73. See accounts, as well, in the Washington National Intellgencer, September 18-20, 1856.
- 74. New York Herald, September 18, 1856, quoted in DeScherer, "The Whig National Convention of 1856," p. 3.
- 75. William L. Hodge to Fillmore, September 20, 1856, William A. Bradley to Fillmore, September 26, 1856, MFP-O.

1178 Notes

76. Hodge to Fillmore, September 20, 30, 1856; Levin to Fillmore, September 26, 1856, Fillmore to Hodge, September 27, 1856, MFP-O.

- 77. Fillmore to William A. Graham, August 9, 1856, microfilm edition of Fillmore MSS.
- 78. Nathan Sargent to Fillmore, November 7, 1856, MFP-O. I have used the estimates of southern voter movement in Alexander, "Voter Partisan Constancy," pp. 98–99.
- 79. On Kentucky, see Volz, "Party, State, and Nation," p. 262. Volz regresses the 1856 results against the larger Whig vote of 1848 rather than against Scott's vote in 1852. For Tennessee, see Bergeron, Antebellum Politics in Tennessee, p. 118. For North Carolina, I have relied on the correlation analysis in Kruman, Parties and Politics, p. 178; and the regression analysis in McFaden, "Sections, Slaveholders, and Safe Concessions," p. 23.
 - 80. "Victorious Defeat" is the title of Gienapp's last chapter in his Origins.
 - 81. Ibid., pp. 527-30.
- 82. William R. Wilson to Fillmore, October 14, 1856, Charles D. Dreschler to Fillmore, October 24, 27, 1856, Andrew Jackson Donelson to Fillmore, October 25, 1856, Andrew Stewart to Fillmore, October 25, 1856, Joseph F. Randolph to Fillmore, October 29, 1856, Benjamin G. Ferris to Fillmore, November 13, 1856, E. B. Bartlett to Fillmore, November 12, 1856, Fillmore to Kenneth Rayner, November 14, 1856 (quotation), and Rayner to Fillmore, November 27, 28, 1856, MFP-O. In his letter to Rayner, Fillmore called for strengthening the American organization. Replying to a letter Fillmore sent him dated November 6, E. B. Bartlett, national president of the American council, told Fillmore on November 12: "You are right in saying that the American party ought, at once, to be re-organized, and new Councils organized where none now exist."

Fillmore's friends hoped to throw the election into the House by depriving Buchanan of Pennsylvania and New Jersey since half of the electors in both states were expected to go for Fillmore. The required majority was at least 149 electoral votes. Had the 34 electoral votes from those two states been shifted from Buchanan and split evenly between Fillmore and Frémont, the totals would have been: Buchanan, 140; Frémont, 132; and Fillmore, 25. But, if all were thrown to Frémont, he would have had exactly 149. Fillmore may have realized that the pressure to do so would have been irresistible, but he had also been warned that 30,000 to 50,000 Americans in Pennsylvania would abstain or go Democratic if the deal was consummated.

- 83. For the movement of former Fillmore voters into the Republican column by 1860, see Gienapp, "Who Voted for Lincoln?" id., "Nativism and the Creation of a Republican Majority."
- 84. Gienapp, Origins; id., "Nativism and the Creation of a Republican Majority in the North"; Silbey, Partisan Imperative, pp. 127–65; and Holt, Political Crisis, pp. 175–81.
- 85. Harry Bradley to Fillmore, July 7, 1856, John Wheeler to Fillmore, October 24, 1856, MFP-O.
- 86. James Kendall to John Fox Potter, July 8, 1856, Potter MSS; W. B. Thrall to Benjamin Wade, August 5, 1856, Wade MSS; D. F. Williams to Simon Cameron, September 24, 1856, Cameron MSS.
 - 87. Fillmore to Edward Everett, July 12, 1856, Everett MSS.
 - 88. On this point, see especially Freehling, Road to Disunion.
 - 89. My reference here is to Freehling's Road to Disunion.
- 90. The literature on southern secession is immense, but for Democratic leadership of the immediatists and Whig opposition to them, see Barney, Secessionist Impulse; McCrary et al., "Class and Party in the Secession Crisis"; and especially Crofts, Reluctant Confederates.
- 91. The best analysis of Seward and the Union party movement during the secession crisis is contained in Crofts, Reluctant Confederates, but see also my "Abraham Lincoln."
- 92. Crofts, Reluctant Confederates; Holt, "Abraham Lincoln"; Cox, Politics, Principle, & Prejudice; and Alexander, "Persistent Whiggery."
 - 93. Perman, Road to Redemption.
- 94. For the reasons for and ramifications of the unique perseverance of North Carolina's Whig party and for Vance's wartime career, see Kruman, Politics and Parties.
 - 95. Vance is quoted in Carter, When the War Was Over, p. 67.

Abbreviations Used in Notes

ADAH Alabama Department of Archives and History
BFP Baldwin Family Papers, Yale University
CFP Cambell Family Papers, Duke University

CHS Chicago Historical Society
Conn.HS Connecticut Historical Society

"Correspondence of Calhoun," J. Franklin Jameson (ed.), "Correspondence of John C. Calhoun,"

Annual Report of the American Historical Association for 1899, Volume II (Washington, 1901).

"Correspondence of Toombs, Stephens, and Cobb," U. B. Phillips (ed.), "Correspondence of Robert Toombs, Alexander H. Stephens, and Howell Cobb," Annual Report of the American Historical Association for 1911, Volume II (Washington, 1913).

Duke Perkins Library, Duke University

EFP Ewing Family Papers, Library of Congress,

Hayes Diary, Charles R. Williams (ed.), Diary and Letters of Rutherford Birchard Hayes, Nineteenth President of the United States (5 volumes; Columbus: Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Society, 1922), Volume I.

HSP Historical Society of Pennsylvania Ill.SHL Illinois State Historical Library Ind.HSL Indiana Historical Society Library

Ind.SL Indiana State Library

IU Lilly Library, Indiana University

LC Library of Congress

Mangum Papers, Henry T. Shanks (ed.), The Papers of Willie Person Mangum (5 volumes; Raleigh: North Carolina Department of Archives and History, 1950–56).

Messages and Papers of the Presidents, James D. Richardson (ed.), Messages and Papers of the Presidents, 1789–1897 (10 volumes; Washington: Government Printing Office, 1897).

MFP-BHS Millard Fillmore Papers, Buffalo and Erie County Historical Society
MFP-O Millard Fillmore Papers, State University of New York at Oswego

NIHS Northern Indiana Historical Society, South Bend
Norlands Washburn Family Library, Norlands, Livermore, Maine

NYPL New York Public Library, New York City NYSL New York State Library, Albany

OHS Ohio Historical Society, Columbus

RU Rush Rhees Library, Rochester University

Senate Executive Proceedings, U.S. Congress, Journal of the Executive Proceedings of the Senate, Volume 8. 1848–1852 SHC, UNC Southern Historical Collection, University of North Carolina Works of Clay, Calvin Colton (ed.), The Works of Henry Clay, Comprising His Life, Correspondence, and Speeches (10 volumes; New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1904).

WRHS Western Reserve Historical Society

ZT:SWH Holman Hamilton, Zachary Taylor: Soldier in the White House, (reprint edition; Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1966).

Bibliography

Manuscript Collections

Adams Family Papers. Massachusetts Historical Society. Microfilm edition.

James Lusk Alcorn Papers. Mississippi Department of Archives and History.

William Allen Papers. Library of Congress.

Nathan Appleton Papers. Massachusetts Historical Society.

George E. Badger Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

George E. Badger Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Baldwin Family Papers. Sterling Library. Yale University.

Nathaniel P. Banks Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Nathaniel P. Banks Papers. Illinois State Historical Library.

Nathaniel P. Banks Papers. Library of Congress.

Daniel D. Barnard Papers. New York State Library.

Daniel M. Barringer Papers, Southern Historical Collection, University of North Carolina.

Battle Family Papers, Southern Historical Collection, University of North Carolina, Bedinger-Dandridge Family Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

James Martin Bell Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

John Bell Papers. Library of Congress. Microfilm edition.

John M. Berrien Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

William Bigler Papers. Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

William H. Bissell Papers. Chicago Historical Society.

William H. Bissell Papers. Illinois State Historical Library.

Jeremiah Sullivan Black Papers. Library of Congress. Microfilm edition.

Blair Family Papers. Library of Congress.

Blair-Lee Papers. Princeton University.

Angus R. Blakey Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Matthew P. Blue Papers. Alabama Department of Archives and History.

Alexander Boteler Scrapbooks. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Samuel Bowles II Papers. Sterling Library. Yale University.

John Bragg Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

Branch Family Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

George N. Briggs Papers. American Antiquarian Society.

Albert Gallatin Brown Papers. Mississippi Department of Archives and History.

Austin H. Brown Papers. Indiana State Library.

William P. Browne Papers. Alabama Department of Archives and History.

James Buchanan Papers. Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

James Buchanan Papers. Library of Congress. Microfilm edition.

Buchanan-McClellan Family Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina

Edmund Burke Papers. Library of Congress.

Benjamin F. Butler Papers. Library of Congress.

Benjamin F. Butler Papers. New York State Library.

David F. Caldwell Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

John C. Calhoun Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Samuel Calvin Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Simon Cameron Papers. Dauphin County Historical Society. Microfilm edition.

Campbell Family Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Lewis D. Campbell Papers. Ohio Historical Society.

Robert Caruthers Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

Zachariah Chandler Papers. Library of Congress.

Salmon P. Chase Papers. Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

Salmon P. Chase Papers. Library of Congress.

John F. H. Claiborne Papers. Mississippi Department of Archives and History.

Myron H. Clark Papers. New York State Library.

Clement C. Clay Family Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Henry Clay Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Henry Clay Papers. Library of Congress. Microfilm edition.

Henry Clay Papers. Lilly Library. Indiana University.

Thomas J. Clay Papers. Library of Congress. Microfilm edition.

Clingman-Puryear Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

Walter Coles Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Schuyler Colfax Papers. Chicago Historical Society.

Schuyler Colfax Papers. Indiana State Library.

Schuyler Colfax Papers. Lilly Library. Indiana University.

Schuyler Colfax Papers. Northern Indiana Historical Society.

Thomas Corwin Papers. Library of Congress.

Thomas Corwin Papers. Ohio Historical Society.

John J. Crittenden Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

John J. Crittenden Papers. Library of Congress. Microfilm edition.

William Cumback Papers. Lilly Library. Indiana University.

Caleb Cushing Papers. Library of Congress.

David Davis Papers. Chicago Historical Society.

John Davis Papers. American Antiquarian Society.

John G. Davis Papers. Indiana Historical Society Library.

Moses M. Davis Papers. State Historical Society of Wisconsin.

Henry L. Dawes Papers. Library of Congress.

Andre De Coppet Collection. Princeton University.

Andrew Jackson Donelson Papers. Library of Congress.

James R. Doolittle Papers. New York Public Library.

James R. Doolittle Papers. State Historical Society of Wisconsin.

James D. Doty Papers. State Historical Society of Wisconsin.

Stephen A. Douglas Papers. University of Chicago Library.

George Dunn Papers. Lilly Library. Indiana University.

William H. English Papers. Indiana Historical Society Library.

Edward Everett Papers. Massachusetts Historical Society. Microfilm edition.

Ewing Family Papers. Library of Congress.

Thomas Ewing Papers. Ohio Historical Society.

Erastus Fairbanks Papers. Alabama Department of Archives and History.

Fairchild Collection of Horatio Seymour Manuscripts. New York Historical Society.

John Fairfield Papers. Library of Congress.

William Pitt Fessenden Papers. Library of Congress.

William Pitt Fessenden Papers. Western Reserve Historical Society.

Millard Fillmore Papers. Buffalo and Erie County Historical Society. Microfilm edition.

Millard Fillmore Papers. Library of Congress.

Millard Fillmore Papers. State University of New York at Oswego. Microfilm edition.

Hamilton Fish Papers. Library of Congress.

M. B. Fleming Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Charles Fontaine Papers. Mississippi Department of Archives and History.

Seabury Ford Papers. Ohio Historical Society.

J. Alexander Fulton Papers. Pennsylvania Department of Archives and Manuscripts.

Samuel Galloway Papers. Ohio Historical Society.

Joshua R. Giddings Papers. Ohio Historical Society. Microfilm edition.

Giddings-Julian Papers. Library of Congress.

Joseph Gillespie Papers. Illinois State Historical Library.

Governors' Records. Alabama Department of Archives and History.

Governors' Records. Mississippi Department of Archives and History.

William A. Graham Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

Francis Granger Papers. Library of Congress.

Horace Greeley Papers. New York Public Library.

Greeley-Colfax Papers. New York Public Library.

Bolling Hall Papers. Alabama Department of Archives and History.

Allen Hamilton Papers. Indiana State Library.

Joseph R. Hawley Papers. Library of Congress.

Gustavus A. Henry Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

Henry W. Hilliard Papers. Alabama Department of Archives and History.

George S. Houston Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Mark Howard Papers. Connecticut Historical Society.

Timothy O. Howe Papers. State Historical Society of Wisconsin.

Jefferson Franklin Jackson Papers. Alabama Department of Archives and History.

Spencer Jarnagin Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

Thomas A. Jenckes Papers. Library of Congress.

Herschel V. Johnson Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

George W. Jones Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

George W. Julian Papers. Indiana State Library.

John Pendleton Kennedy Papers. Enoch Pratt Free Library. Baltimore. Microfilm edition.

Thomas Butler King Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

Knollenberg Collection. Sterling Library. Yale University.

Henry S. Lane Papers. Indiana Historical Society Library.

Henry S. Lane Papers. Lilly Library. Indiana University.

Joseph Lane Papers. Lilly Library. Indiana University.

Charles H. Lanphier Papers. Illinois State Historical Library.

Abbott Lawrence Papers. Houghton Library. Harvard University.

Amos A. Lawrence Papers. Massachusetts Historical Society.

Abraham Lincoln Papers. Lilly Library. Indiana University.

Willie P. Mangum Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Willie P. Mangum Papers. Library of Congress.

Willie P. Mangum Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

William L. Marcy Papers. Library of Congress.

William L. Marcy Papers. New York State Library.

James McDowell Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

Duncan McLaurin Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

John McLean Papers. Library of Congress.

John McLean Papers. Ohio Historical Society.

Edward McPherson Papers. Library of Congress.

Samuel Medary Papers. Ohio Historical Society.

William M. Meredith Papers. Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

Edwin D. Morgan Papers. New York State Library.

Justin Smith Morrill Papers. Library of Congress.

Murdock-Wright Family Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

Nathaniel Niles Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Godlove S. Orth Papers. Indiana State Library.

David Outlaw Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

Robert T. Paine Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

Samuel F. Patterson Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Franklin Pierce Papers. Library of Congress. Microfilm edition.

James S. Pike Papers. University of Maine. Microfiche edition.

Polk-Yeatman Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

John Fox Potter Papers. State Historical Society of Wisconsin.

William Ballard Preston Papers. Virginia Historical Society.

John A. Quitman Papers. Mississippi Department of Archives and History.

Henry J. Raymond Papers. New York Public Library.

Albert G. Riddle Papers. Western Reserve Historical Society.

William C. Rives Papers. Library of Congress.

William Rockhill Papers. Indiana Historical Society Library.

John O. Sargent Papers. Massachusetts Historical Society.

William Schouler Papers. Massachusetts Historical Society.

Langhorne Scruggs Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Thomas Settle Papers. Southern Historical Collection. University of North Carolina.

William H. Seward Papers. Library of Congress.

William H. Seward Papers. Rush Rhees Library. Rochester University. Microfilm edition.

Horatio Seymour Papers. New York State Library.

Thomas H. Seymour Papers. Connecticut Historical Society.

Caleb B. Smith Papers. Library of Congress.

Alexander H. Stephens Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Alexander H. Stephens Papers. Library of Congress. Microfilm edition.

Thaddeus Stevens Papers. Library of Congress.

Stevenson Family Papers. Library of Congress.

Thomas B. Stevenson Papers. William Henry Smith Collection. Indiana Historical Society Library.

Alexander H. H. Stuart Papers. Library of Congress.

Alexander H. H. Stuart Papers. Alderman Library. University of Virginia.

Milton Sutliffe Papers. Western Reserve Historical Society.

Lyndon Swaim Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Nathaniel P. Tallmadge Papers. State Historical Society of Wisconsin.

Zachary Taylor Papers. Library of Congress. Microfilm edition.

Richard W. Thompson Papers. Indiana State Library.

Richard W. Thompson Papers. Lilly Library. Indiana University.

Richard W. Thompson Papers. Lincoln National Life Foundation. Ft. Wayne.

Waddy Thompson Papers. South Carolinian Library. University of South Carolina.

Samuel J. Tilden Papers. New York Public Library.

Jesse Turner Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Lyman Trumbull Family Papers. Illinois State Historical Library.

Daniel Ullmann Papers. New York Historical Society.

Benjamin F. Wade Papers. Library of Congress. Microfilm edition.

Algernon Sydney Washburn Papers. Perkins Library. Duke University.

Israel Washburn, Jr. Papers. Library of Congress.

Israel Washburn, Jr. Papers. Washburn Family Library. Norlands. Livermore, Maine.

Elihu B. Washburne Papers. Library of Congress.

Elihu B. Washburne Papers. Washburn Family Library. Norlands. Livermore, Maine.

James Watson Webb Papers. Sterling Library. Yale University.

Daniel Webster Papers. Dartmouth College. Microfilm edition.

Thurlow Weed Papers. Library of Congress.

Thurlow Weed Papers. Rush Rhees Library. Rochester University.

Gideon Welles Papers. Connecticut Historical Society.

Gideon Welles Papers. Library of Congress.

Gideon Welles Papers. New York Public Library.

Henry Wilson Papers. Library of Congress.

John Wilson Papers. Bancroft Library. University of California at Berkeley.

Robert C. Winthrop Papers. Massachusetts Historical Society. Microfilm edition.

Joseph A. Wright Papers. Indiana State Library.

Richard Yates Papers. Illinois State Historical Library.

Government Documents

- U.S. Bureau of the Census. Historical Statistics of the United States: Colonial Times to 1970. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1975.
- U.S. Congress. Congressional Globe. 27th-33rd Congress.
- U.S. Congress. House Executive Documents. 31st Congress, 1st Session, Volume 2. Documents 4 and 82.
- U.S. Congress. House Journal. 31st Congress, 1st Session.
- U.S. Congress. House Miscellaneous Documents. 30th Congress, 2nd Session, Document 6.
- U.S. Congress. Journal of the Executive Proceedings of the Senate, Volume 8, 1848-1852.
- U.S. Congress. Senate Committee Reports. 31st Congress, 1st Session. Report 123.
- U.S. Congress. Senate Documents. 28th Congress, 2nd Session, Volume II. Documents 59 and 173.
- U.S. Congress. Senate Journal. 31st Congress, 1st Session.
- U.S. Statutes at Large. Volumes 5 and 9.

Newspapers and Contemporary Periodicals

Albany Evening Journal

American (Whig) Review

Boston Daily Advertiser

Harrisburg Telegraph

Nashville Republican Banner

New Orleans Bee

New York Herald

New York Times

New York Tribune

Niles Register

Philadelphia North American and United States Gazette

Philadelphia Public Ledger

Pittsburgh Commercial Journal

Pittsburgh Daily Gazette

Pittsburgh Morning Post

Raleigh Register

Richmond Enquirer

Richmond Whig

Tribune Almanac

Washington National Intelligencer

Washington Union

Published Correspondence, Diaries, Memoirs, and Public Papers

Basler, Roy P., ed. The Collected Works of Abraham Lincoln. 9 volumes. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1953–55.

Coleman, Mrs. Chapman. The Life of John J. Crittenden. 2 volumes. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1871.

Colton, Calvin, ed. The Works of Henry Clay, Comprising His Life, Correspondence, and Speeches. 10 volumes. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1904.

- Dyer, Oliver. Great Senators of the United States Forty Years Ago. New York, 1889.
- Flippin, Percy Scott, ed. "Herchel V. Johnson Correspondence," North Carolina Historical Review, 4 (January 1927), 182–201.
- Graf, Leroy P., and Ralph W. Haskins, eds. The Papers of Andrew Johnson, Volume 2, 1852–57. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1970.
- Hamilton, J. G. de Roulhac, and Max R. Williams, eds. The Papers of William Alexander Graham. 6 volumes to date. Raleigh: State Department of Archives and History, 1957–.
- Hamlin, L. Belle, ed. "Selections from the Letters of Oran Follett," Quarterly Publications of the Historical and Philosophical Society of Ohio, Vol. 9 (1914), 71–100; Vol. 10 (1915), 4– 33; Vol. 11 (1916), 5–35; and Vol. 13 (1918), 42–78.
- Hamlin, L. Belle, ed. "Selections from the William Greene Papers," Quarterly Publications of the Historical and Philosophical Society of Ohio, 13 (1918), 4–38.
- Jameson, J. Franklin, ed. "Correspondence of John C. Calhoun," Annual Report of the American Historical Association for 1899, Volume II. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1900.
- McClure, Alexander K. Recollections of Half a Century. Salem: The Salem Press Company, 1902. McCormack, Thomas J. Memoirs of Gustave Koerner, 1809–1896. Two volumes. Cedar Rapids: The Torch Press, 1909.
- McIntosh, James T., et al., eds. The Papers of Jefferson Davis: Volume 3, July 1846–December 1848. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981.
- Nevins, Allan, and Milton H. Thomas, eds. The Diary of George Templeton Strong. 4 volumes. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1952.
- Parks, Joseph H., ed. "Letters from Aaron V. Brown to Alfred O. P. Nicholson, 1844–1850," Tennessee Historical Quarterly, 3 (1944), 170–79.
- Pease, Theodore Calvin, and Randall, James G., eds. The Diary of Orville Hickman Browning; Volume I, 1850–1864. Collections of the Illinois State Historical Library. Volume 20. 1925.
- Phillips, Ulrich Bonnell, ed. "The Correspondence of Robert Toombs, Alexander H. Stephens, and Howell Cobb," Annual Report of the American Historical Association for 1911, Volume II. Washington: Government Printing Office, 1913.
- Richardson, James D., ed. A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents, 1789–1897. 10 volumes. Washington: Government Printing Office, 1896–99.
- Samson, William H., ed. Letters of Zachary Taylor from the Battlefields of the Mexican War. Rochester, 1908.
- Schauinger, J. Herman, ed. "The Letters of Godlove S. Orth: Hoosier Whig," Indiana Magazine of History, 39 (1943), 365–400; 40 (1944), 51–66.
- Severance, Frank H., ed. "The Millard Fillmore Papers," Publications of the Buffalo and Erie County Historical Society, 10–11, (1907).
- Seward, Frederick W., Seward at Washington as Senator and Secretary of State, Volume II. New York: Derby and Miller, 1891.
- Shanks, Henry T., ed. The Papers of Willie Person Mangum. 6 volumes. Raleigh: North Carolina State Department of Archives and History, 1950–56.
- Tyler, Lyon G. The Letters and Times of the Tylers. 2 volumes. Richmond: Whitter & Shepperson, 1884.
- Williams, Charles R., ed. Diary and Letters of Rutherford Birchard Hayes, Nineteenth President of the United States, Volume I. Columbus: The Ohio Archaeological and History Society, 1922.

Books and Articles

- Adams, William H. The Whig Party of Louisiana. Lafayette: University of Southwestern Louisiana, 1973.
- Alexander, Thomas B. "Persistent Whiggery in the Confederate South, 1860–1877." Journal of Southern History, 27 (1961), 305–29.
- Alexander, Thomas B. Sectional Stress and Party Strength: A Computer Analysis of Roll-Call

- Voting in the United States House of Representatives, 1836–1860. Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press, 1967.
- Alexander, Thomas B. "Dimensions of Voter Partisan Constancy in Presidential Elections from 1840 to 1860." Essays on American Antebellum Politics 1840–1860. Ed. Stephen E. Maizlish and John J. Kushma. College Station: Texas A & M University Press, 1982.
- Alexander, Thomas B. "Harbinger of the Collapse of the Second Two-Party System: The Free Soil Party in 1848." A Crisis of Republicanism: American Politics during the Civil War Era. Ed. Lloyd Ambrosius. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1990.
- Anbinder, Tyler. Nativism & Slavery: The Northern Know Nothings and the Politics of the 1850s. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Appleby, Joyce. "The Social Origins of American Revolutionary Ideology." Journal of American History, 64 (1978), 935–58.
- Appleby, Joyce. Capitalism and the New Social Order: The Republican Vision of the 1790s. New York: New York University Press, 1984.
- Appleby, Joyce. Liberalism and Republicanism in the Historical Imagination. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1992.
- Argersinger, Peter H. "A Place on the Ballot: Fusion Politics and Antifusion Laws." American Historical Review, 85 (1980), 287–306.
- Ayers, Edward L. Vengeance and Justice: Crime and Punishment in the Nineteenth-Century American South. New York: Oxford University Press, 1984.
- Baack, Bennett D., and Edward J. Ray. "Tariff Policy and Income Distribution: The Case of the United States, 1830–1860." Explorations in Economic History, 11 (1973), 103–21.
- Bailyn, Bernard. The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1967.
- Bain, Richard C., and Judith H. Parrish. Convention Decisions and Voting Records. Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1973.
- Banning, Lance. The Jeffersonian Persuasion: Evolution of a Party Ideology. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1978.
- Barnes, Gilbert Hobbs. The Anti-Slavery Impulse, 1830–1844. Reprint edition. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1964.
- Barney, William L. The Secessionist Impulse: Alabama and Mississippi in 1860. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1974.
- Barnwell, John. Love of Order: South Carolina's First Secession Crisis. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1982.
- Bauer, K. Jack. Zachary Taylor: Soldier, Planter, Statesman of the Old Southwest. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1985.
- Baum, Dale. The Civil War Party System: The Case of Massachusetts, 1848–1876. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Baum, Dale, and Dale T. Knobel. "Anatomy of a Realignment: New York Presidential Politics, 1848–1860." New York History, 65 (1984), 61–81.
- Benson, Lee. The Concept of Jacksonian Democracy: New York as a Test Case. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1961.
- Benson, Lee. "The Mistransference Fallacy in Explanations of Human Behavior." Historical Methods, 17 (1984), 118–31.
- Benson, Lee, Joel H. Silbey, and Phyllis Field. "Toward a Theory of Stability and Change in American Voting Patterns: New York State, 1792–1970." The History of American Electoral Behavior. Ed. Joel H. Silbey, Allan G. Bogue, and William H. Flanigan. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1978.
- Berger, Mark L. The Revolution in the New York Party Systems, 1840–1860. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1973.
- Bergeron, Paul H. Antebellum Politics in Tennessee. Lexington: The University Press of Kentucky, 1982.
- Billington, Ray Allen. The Protestant Crusade 1800–1860: A Study of the Origins of American Nativism. Chicago: Quadrangle Books, 1964.

- Binkley, Wilfred E. American Political Parties: Their National History. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1942.
- Birkner, Michael. Samuel L. Southard: Jeffersonian Whig. Rutherford, N.J.: Farleigh Dickinson University Press, 1984.
- Bloom, Howard S., and Douglas Price. "Voter Response to Short-Run Economic Conditions: The Asymmetric Effect of Prosperity and Recession." American Political Science Review, 69 (1975), 1240–54.
- Blue, Frederick J. "The Ohio Free Soilers and the Problems of Factionalism." Ohio History, 76 (1967), 17–32.
- Blue, Frederick J. The Free Soilers: Third Party Politics, 1848–1854. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1973.
- Bolchin, Hal W. "Caleb B. Smith's Opposition to the Mexican War." Indiana Magazine of History, 69 (1973), 95–114.
- Booraem, Hendrik V. The Formation of the Republican Party in New York: Politics and Conscience in the Antebellum North. New York: New York University Press, 1983.
- Boritt, Gabor. "Lincoln's Opposition to the Mexican War." Journal of the Illinois State Historical Society, 67 (1974), 79–100.
- Boritt, Gabor. Lincoln and the Economics of the American Dream. Memphis: Memphis State University Press, 1977.
- Bowers, Douglas. "Ideology and Political Parties in Maryland, 1851–1856." Maryland Historical Magazine, 64 (1969), 197–217.
- Brand, Carl F. "The History of the Know Nothing Party in Indiana." Indiana Magazine of History, 18 (1922), 47–81.
- Brauer, Kinley J. Cotton versus Conscience: Massachusetts Whig Politics and Southwestern Expansion. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1967.
- Brock, William R. Parties and Political Conscience: American Dilemmas, 1840–1850. Millwood, N.Y.: KTO Press, 1979.
- Brown, Norman D. Daniel Webster and the Politics of Availability. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1969.
- Brown, Richard H. "The Missouri Crisis, Slavery, and the Politics of Jacksonianism." South Atlantic Quarterly, 65 (1966), 52–72.
- Buel, Richard, Jr. Securing the Revolution: Ideology in American Politics, 1789–1815. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1972.
- Burnham, Walter D. Presidential Ballots 1836–1892. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1955.
- Campbell, Stanley W. The Slave Catchers: Enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Law, 1850–1860. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1968.
- Carman, Harry J., and Reinhard H. Luthin. "The Seward-Fillmore Feud and the Crisis of 1850." New York History, 24 (1943), 163–84.
- Carman, Harry J., and Reinhard H. Luthin. "The Seward-Fillmore Feud and the Disruption of the Whig Party." New York History, 24 (1943), 335-57.
- Carroll, E. Malcolm. The Origins of the Whig Party. Reprint edition. Gloucester: Peter Smith, 1964.
- Carter, Dan T. When the War Was Over: The Failure of Self-Reconstruction in the South, 1865–1867. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1985.
- Carwardine, Richard. "Evangelicals, Whigs, and the Election of William Henry Harrison." Journal of American Studies, 17 (1983), 47–75.
- Carwardine, Richard. Evangelicals and Politics in Antebellum America. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1993.
- Chaffin, Tom. Fatal Glory: Narcisco López and the First Clandestine U.S. War against Cuba. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1996.
- Chambers, William N. "The Election of 1840." History of American Presidential Elections, Volume I. Ed. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., and Fred Israel. New York: Chelsea House, 1971.
- Chitwood, Oliver Perry. John Tyler: Champion of the Old South. New York: D. Appleton-Century Company, 1939.

- Clubb, Jerome M., William H. Flanigan, and Nancy H. Zingale. Partisan Realignment: Voters, Parties, and Government in American History. Beverly Hills: Sage Publications, 1980.
- Cohen, Henry. Business and Politics in America from the Age of Jackson to the Civil War: The Career Biography of W. W. Corcoran. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1971.
- Cole, Arthur C. The Whig Party in the South. Reprint edition. Gloucester: Peter Smith, 1962.
- Cole, Donald B. Jacksonian Democracy in New Hampshire. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1970.
- Congressional Quarterly. Guide to U.S. Elections. Washington: Congressional Quarterly, Inc., 1975.
- Cooper, William J., Jr. The South and the Politics of Slavery, 1828–1856. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1978.
- Cooper, William J., Jr. "The Only Door': The Territorial Issue, the Preston Bill, and the Southern Whigs." A Master's Due: Essays in Honor of David Herbert Donald. Ed. Michael F. Holt, William J. Cooper, Jr., and John McCardell. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1985.
- Cox, Lawanda, and John H. Politics, Principle, & Prejudice, 1865–1866: Dilemma of Reconstruction America. Glencoe: The Free Press, 1961.
- Crofts, Daniel. Reluctant Confederates: Upper South Unionists in the Secession Crisis. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1989.
- Current, Richard. The History of Wisconsin: Volume II, The Civil War Era, 1848–1873. Madison: State Historical Society of Wisconsin, 1976.
- Curtis, James C. The Fox at Bay: Martin Van Buren and the Presidency. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1970.
- Dalzell, Robert F., Jr. Daniel Webster and the Trial of American Nationalism, 1843–1852. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1973.
- Dalzell, Robert F., Jr. Enterprising Elite: The Boston Associates and the World They Made. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1987.
- Danenbaum, Jed. Drink and Disorder: Temperance Reform in Cincinnati from the Washingtonian Revival to the WCTU. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1984.
- Darling, Arthur B. Political Changes in Massachusetts 1824–1848: A Study of Liberal Movements in Politics. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1925.
- Doherty, Herbert J., Jr. The Whigs of Florida, 1845–1854. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1959.
- Donald, David. Charles Sumner and the Coming of the Civil War. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1960.
- Donald, David. Lincoln Reconsidered: Essays on the Civil War Era. New York: Vintage Books, 1961.
- Dykstra, Robert R. Bright Radical Star: Black Freedom and White Supremacy on the Hawkeye Frontier. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1993.
- Eiselen, Malcolm Rogers. The Rise of Pennsylvania Protectionism. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1932.
- Elkins, Stanley, and Eric McKitrick. The Age of Federalism: The Early American Republic, 1788–1800. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993.
- Elliot, Charles Winslow. Winfield Scott: The Soldier and the Man. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1937.
- Ellis, David M. Landlords and Farmers in the Hudson-Mohawk Region, 1780–1850. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1946.
- Ellis, Richard E. The Jeffersonian Crisis: Courts and Politics in the Young Republic. New York: W. W. Norton and Company, 1971.
- Ellis, Richard E. The Union at Risk: Jacksonian Democracy, States' Rights and the Nullification Crisis. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Erickson, Leonard. "Politics and the Repeal of Ohio's Black Laws, 1837–1849." Ohio History, 82 (1973), 154–75.
- Ershkowitz, Herbert, and William G. Shade, "Consensus or Conflict? Political Behavior in the - State Legislatures during the Jacksonian Era." Journal of American History, 58 (1971), 591-622.

- Evitts, William J. A Matter of Allegiances: Maryland from 1850 to 1861. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1974.
- Feldberg, Michael. The Philadelphia Riots of 1844: A Study of Ethnic Conflict. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1975.
- Finkelman, Paul. An Imperfect Union: Slavery, Federalism, and Comity. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981.
- Fiorina, Morris P. Retrospective Voting in American National Elections. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981.
- Flinn, Thomas A. "Continuity and Change in Ohio Politics." The Journal of Politics, 24 (1962), 524–37.
- Fogel, Robert W. Without Consent or Contract: The Rise and Fall of American Slavery. New York: W. W. Norton and Company, 1989.
- Fogel, Robert W. "Modeling Complex Dynamic Interactions: The Role of Intergenerational, Cohort, and Period Processes and Conditional Events in the Political Realignment of the 1850s." Working Paper Series on Historical Factors in Long Run Growth. National Bureau of Economic Research. Working Paper No. 12. March 1990.
- Folsom, Burton, II. "Party Formation and Development in Jacksonian America: The Old South." Journal of American Studies, 7 (1973), 217–29.
- Folsom, Burton, II. "The Politics of Elites: Prominence and Party in Davidson County, Tennessee, 1835–1861." Journal of Southern History, 39 (1973), 359–78.
- Foner, Eric. "The Wilmot Proviso Revisited." Journal of American History, 56 (1969), 262-79.
- Foner, Eric. Free Soil, Free Labor, Free Men: The Ideology of the Republican Party before the Civil War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1970.
- Foner, Eric. "Politics, Ideology, and the Origins of the American Civil War." A Nation Divided: Problems and Issues of the Civil War and Reconstruction. Ed. George Fredrickson. Minneapolis: Burgess Publishing Company, 1975.
- Foner, Philip S. Business & Slavery: The New York Merchants & The Irrepressible Conflict. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1941.
- Forgie, George. Patricide in the House Divided: A Psychological Interpretation of Lincoln and His Age. New York: W. W. Norton and Company, 1979.
- Formisano, Ronald P. "Political Character, Antipartyism, and the Second Party System." American Quarterly, 21 (1969), 683–709.
- Formisano, Ronald P. The Birth of Mass Political Parties: Michigan, 1827–1861. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1971.
- Formisano, Ronald P. "Deferential-Participant Politics: The Early Republic's Political Culture, 1789–1840." American Political Science Review, 68 (1974), 473–87.
- Formisano, Ronald P. "Toward a Reorientation of Jacksonian Politics: A Review of the Literature, 1959–1975." Journal of American History, 63 (1976), 42–65.
- Formisano, Ronald P. "Federalists and Republicans: Parties, Yes—System, No." The Evolution of American Electoral Systems. Ed. Paul Kleppner. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1981.
- Formisano, Ronald P. The Transformation of Political Culture: Massachusetts Parties, 1790s-1840s. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Formisano, Ronald P. "The New Political History and the Election of 1840." Journal of Inter-disciplinary History, 23 (1993), 661–82.
- Fox, Stephen C. "Politicians, Issues and Voter Preference in Jacksonian Ohio: A Critique of an Interpretation." Ohio History, 86 (1977), 155–70.
- Fox, Stephen C. "The Bank Wars, the Idea of 'Party,' and the Division of the Electorate in Jacksonian Ohio." Ohio History, 88 (1979), 253–76.
- Freehling, William W. Prelude to Civil War: The Nullification Controversy in South Carolina, 1816–1836. New York: Harper & Row, 1966.
- Freehling, William W. The Road to Disunion, Volume I, Secessionists at Bay, 1776–1854. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.

- Friedman, Jean E. The Revolt of the Conservative Democrats: An Essay on American Political Culture and Political Development, 1837–1844. Ann Arbor: UMI Research Press, 1979.
- Gatell, Frank Otto. "'Conscience and Judgment': The Bolt of the Massachusetts Conscience Whigs." The Historian, 20 (1959), 18–49.
- Gatell, Frank Otto. "Spoils of the Bank War: Political Bias in the Selection of Pet Banks." American Historical Review, 70 (1964), 35–58.
- Gatell, Frank Otto. "Money and Party in Jacksonian America: A Quantitative Look at New York City's Men of Quality." Political Science Quarterly, 82 (1967), 235–52.
- Gerrity, Frank. "The Disruption of the Philadelphia Whigocracy: Joseph R. Chandler, Anti-Catholicism, and the Congressional Election of 1854." Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, 111 (1987), 161–94.
- Gibson, George H. "Opinion in North Carolina Regarding the Annexation of Texas and Cuba, 1835–1855." North Carolina Historical Review, 37 (1960), 1–21.
- Gienapp, William E. "The Crime Against Sumner: The Caning of Charles Sumner and the Rise of the Republican Party." Civil War History, 25 (1979), 218–45.
- Gienapp, William E. "'Politics Seems to Enter Into Everything: Political Culture in the North, 1840–1860." Essays on American Antebellum Politics 1840–1860. Ed. Stephen E. Maizlish and John Kushma. College Station: Texas A & M University Press, 1982.
- Gienapp, William E. "The Whig Party, The Compromise of 1850, and the Nomination of Winfield Scott." Presidential Studies Quarterly, 14 (1984), 399–415.
- Gienapp, William E. "Nativism and the Creation of a Republican Majority in the North before the Civil War." Journal of American History, 72 (1985), 529–59.
- Gienapp, William E. "Nebraska, Nativism, and Rum: The Failure of Fusion in Pennsylvania, 1854." Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, 109 (1986), 425–71.
- Gienapp, William E. "Who Voted for Lincoln?" Abraham Lincoln and the American Political Tradition. Ed. John L. Thomas. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1986.
- Gienapp, William E. The Origins of the Republican Party, 1852–1856. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Gilley, B. H. "Polk's War and the Louisiana Press." Louisiana History, 20 (1979), 5-23.
- Gilley, B. H. "Tennessee Whigs and the Mexican War." Tennessee Historical Quarterly, 40 (1981), 46–67.
- Goodman, Paul. Toward a Christian Republic: Antimasonry and the Great Transition in New England, 1826–1836. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Goodrich, Carter G., ed. Canals and American Economic Development. New York: Columbia University Press, 1961.
- Graebner, Norman A. "Thomas Corwin and the Election of 1848: A Study in Conservative Politics." Journal of Southern History, 17 (1951), 162–79.
- Graebner, Norman A. "Party Politics and the Trist Mission." Journal of Southern History, 19 (1953), 137–56.
- Gunderson, Robert Gray. The Log-Cabin Campaign. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1957.
- Hall, Kermit L. The Politics of Justice: Lower Federal Judicial Selection and the Second Party System. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1979.
- Hamilton, Holman. Prologue to Conflict: The Crisis and Compromise of 1850. New York: W. W. Norton and Company, 1964.
- Hamilton, Holman. Zachary Taylor: Soldier in the White House. Reprint edition. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1966.
- Hamilton, Holman. Zachary Taylor: Soldier of the Republic. Reprint edition. Hamden, Conn.: Archon Books, 1966.
- Handlin, Oscar. Boston's Immigrants: A Study of Acculturation. New York: Atheneum Press, 1968.
- Hargreaves, Mary. The Presidency of John Quincy Adams. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press,
- Harrington, Fred Harvey. "The First Northern Victory." Journal of Southern History, 5 (1939), 186–205.

- Harris, William C. William Woods Holden: Firebrand of North Carolina Politics. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987.
- Hays, Samuel P. "Politics and Society: Beyond the Political Party." The Evolution of American Electoral Systems. Ed. Paul Kleppner. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1981.
- Hibbing, John R., and Alford, John R. "The Electoral Impact of Economic Conditions: Who Is Held Responsible?" American Journal of Political Science, 25 (1981), 423–39.
- Hofstadter, Richard. The Idea of a Party System: The Rise of Legitimate Opposition in the United States, 1780–1840. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1970.
- Holt, Edgar A. "Party Politics in Ohio, 1840–1850." Ohio Archaeological and Historical Publications, 38 (1929), 47–402.
- Holt, Michael F. Forging a Majority: The Formation of the Republican Party in Pittsburgh, 1848–1860. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1969.
- Holt, Michael F. "The Antimasonic and Know Nothing Parties." History of U.S. Political Parties. Volume I. Ed. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. New York: Chelsea House and R. W. Bowker, 1973.
- Holt, Michael F. "The Democratic Party, 1828–1860." History of U.S. Political Parties. Volume I. Ed. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. New York: Chelsea House and R. W. Bowker, 1973.
- Holt, Michael F. "The Politics of Impatience: The Origins of Know Nothingism." Journal of American History, 60 (1973), 309–31.
- Holt, Michael F. The Political Crisis of the 1850s. New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1978.
- Holt, Michael F. "Winding Roads to Recovery: The Whig Party from 1844 to 1848." Essays on American Antebellum Politics, 1840–1860. Eds. Stephen E. Maizlish and John J. Kushma, College Station: Texas A & M University Press, 1982.
- Holt, Michael F. "Abraham Lincoln and the Politics of Union." Abraham Lincoln and the American Political Tradition. Ed. John L. Thomas. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1986.
- Holt, Michael F. Political Parties and American Political Development from the Age of Jackson to the Age of Lincoln. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1992.
- Holt, Michael F. "Rethinking Nineteenth-Century American Political History." Congress & the Presidency: A Journal of Capital Studies, 19 (1992), 97–111.
- Holt, Michael F. "Another Look at the Election of 1856." James Buchanan and the Political Crisis of the 1850s. Ed. Michael J. Birkner. Selingsgrove, Pa.: Susquehanna University Press, 1996.
- Howe, Daniel W. The Political Culture of the American Whigs. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1979.
- Howe, Daniel W. "Virtue and Commerce in Jeffersonian America." Reviews in American History, 9 (1981), 347–53.
- Howe, Daniel W. "The Evangelical Movement and Political Culture in the North during the Second Party System." Journal of American History, 77 (1991), 1216–39.
- Hummel, Jeffrey R. Emancipating Slaves, Enslaving Free Men: A History of the American Civil War. Chicago: Open Court Press, 1996.
- Hunt, H. Draper. Hannibal Hamlin of Maine: Lincoln's First Vice-President. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press, 1969.
- Innes, Stephen. Creating the Commonwealth: The Economic Culture of Puritan New England. New York: W. W. Norton and Company, 1995.
- Inscoe, John C. "Thomas Clingman, Mountain Whiggery, and the Southern Cause." Civil War History, 33 (1987), 42–62.
- Jeffrey, Thomas E. "Internal Improvements and Political Parties in Antebellum North Carolina, 1836–1860." North Carolina Historical Review, 55 (1978), 111–56.
- Jeffrey, Thomas E. "'Thunder from the Mountains': Thomas Lanier Clingman and the End of Whig Supremacy in North Carolina." North Carolina Historical Review, 56 (1979), 366–95.
- Johannsen, Robert W. Stephen A. Douglas. New York: Oxford University Press, 1973.
- Johannsen, Robert W. To the Halls of the Montezumas: The Mexican War in the American Imagination. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Johnson, Donald B., ed. National Party Platforms: Volume I, 1840–1956. Revised edition. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1978.

- Johnson, Paul E. A Shopkeepers' Millennium: Society and Revivals in Rochester, New York, 1815–1837. New York: Hill & Wang, 1978.
- Kallenbach, Joseph E., and Kallenbach, Jessamine S., eds. *American State Governors 1776–1976:*Volume I (Electoral and Personal Data). Dobbs Ferry: Oceana Publications, Inc., 1977.
- Kelley, Robert. The Cultural Pattern in American History: The First Century. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Kernell, Samuel. "Presidential Popularity and Negative Voting: An Alternative Explanation of the Midterm Congressional Decline of the President's Party." American Political Science Review, 71 (1977), 44–66.
- Kirwan, Albert D. John J. Crittenden: The Struggle for the Union. Lexington: University of Kentucky Press, 1962.
- Kleppner, Paul. The Third Electoral System, 1853–1892: Parties, Voters, and Political Cultures. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1979.
- Kraditor, Aileen. "The Liberty and Free Soil Parties." History of U.S. Political Parties. Vol. I. Ed. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. New York: Chelsea House and R. W. Bowker, 1973.
- Kruman, Marc W. Parties and Politics in North Carolina, 1836–1865. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1983.
- Kruman, Marc W. "Thomas L. Clingman and the Whig Party: A Reconsideration." North Carolina Historical Review, 64 (1987), 1–18.
- Kruman, Marc W. "The Second American Party System and the Transformation of Revolutionary Republicanism." Journal of the Early Republic, 12 (1992), 509–38.
- Kutolowski, Kathleen. "Antimasonry Reexamined: Social Basis of the Grass-Roots Party." Journal of American History, 71 (1984), 269–93.
- Lander, Ernest M., Jr. Reluctant Imperialists: Calhoun, the South Carolinians, and the Mexican War. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1980.
- Larson, John L. "Jefferson's Union and the Problem of Internal Improvements." Jeffersonian Legacies. Ed. Peter S. Onuf. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1993.
- Latner, Richard B. "A New Look at Jacksonian Politics." Journal of American History, 61 (1975), 943–69.
- Leonard, Ira M. "The Rise and Fall of the American Republican Party in New York City, 1843–1845." New York Historical Society Quarterly, 50 (1966), 151–92.
- Levine, Bruce. The Spirit of 1848: German Immigrants, Labor Conflict, and the Coming of the Civil War. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1992.
- Levine, Peter D. The Behavior of State Legislative Parties in the Jacksonian Era: New Jersey, 1829–1844. Rutherford, N.J.: Farleigh Dickinson University Press, 1977.
- Livermore, Shaw. The Twilight of Federalism: The Disintegration of the Federalist Party, 1815–1830. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1962.
- London, Lawrence F. "George Edmund Badger in the United States Senate, 1846–1849." North Carolina Historical Review, 15 (1938), 1–22.
- London, Lawrence F. "George Edmund Badger: His Last Years in the Senate, 1851–1855." North Carolina Historical Review, 15 (1938), 231–50.
- Maizlish, Stephen E. The Triumph of Sectionalism: The Transformation of Ohio Politics, 1844–1856. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1983.
- Marshall, Lynn L. "The Genesis of Grass-Roots Democracy in Kentucky." Mid-America, 47 (1965), 269–88.
- Marshall, Lynn L. "The Strange Still-Birth of the Whig Party." American Historical Review, 72 (1967), 445–68.
- May, Robert E. John A. Quitman: Old South Crusader. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1985.
- Mayfield, John R. Rehearsal for Republicanism: Free Soil and the Politics of Antislavery. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1980.
- McCormick, Richard L. From Realignment to Reform: Political Change in New York State, 1893–1910. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1981.
- McCormick, Richard P. "New Perspectives on Jacksonian Politics." American Historical Review, 65 (1960), 288–301.

- McCormick, Richard P. The Second American Party System: Party Formation in the Jacksonian Era. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1966.
- McCormick, Richard P. "Political Development and the Second Party System." The American Party Systems: Stages of Political Development. Ed. William N. Chambers and Walter Dean Burnham. New York: Oxford University Press, 1967.
- McCormick, Richard P. "Was There a 'Whig Strategy' in 1836?" Journal of the Early Republic, 4 (1984), 47–70.
- McCoy, Drew R. The Elusive Republic: Political Economy in Jeffersonian America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1980.
- McCoy, Drew R. The Last of the Fathers: James Madison & the Republican Legacy. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- McCrary, Peyton. Abraham Lincoln and Reconstruction: The Louisiana Experiment. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1978.
- McCrary, Peyton, Clark Miller, and Dale Baum. "Class and Party in the Secession Crisis: Voting Behavior in the Deep South, 1856–1861." Journal of Interdisciplinary History, 8 (1978), 429–57
- McCrary, Royce C. "Henry W. Hilliard and the Southern Caucus of 1848–49: A Letter to John MacPherson Berrien." Alabama Historical Quarterly, 37 (1975), 151–53.
- McFaul, John M. The Politics of Jacksonian Finance. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1972.
- Mering, John Vollmer. The Whig Party in Missouri. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1967
- Merk, Frederick. Manifest Destiny and Mission in American History. New York: Vintage Books, 1963.
- Merk, Frederick. Slavery and the Annexation of Texas. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1972.
- Meyers, Marvin. The Jacksonian Persuasion. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1957.
- Montgomery, Horace. Cracker Parties. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1950.
- Morgan, Robert J. A Whig Embattled: The Presidency under John Tyler. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1954.
- Morrill, James R. "The Presidential Election of 1852: Death Knell of the Whig Party of North Carolina," North Carolina Historical Review, 44 (1967), 342–59.
- Morrison, Chaplain W. Democratic Politics and Sectionalism: The Wilmot Proviso Controversy. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1967.
- Morrison, Michael A. Slavery and the American West: The Eclipse of Manifest Destiny and the Coming of the Civil War. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Morse, Jarvis M. A Neglected Period of Connecticut's History, 1815–1850. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1925.
- Mueller, Henry R. The Whig Party in Pennsylvania. New York: Columbia University Press, 1922.
- Mulkern, John R. The Know Nothing Party in Massachusetts: The Rise and Fall of a People's Movement. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1990.
- Murray, Paul. The Whig Party in Georgia, 1825–1853. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1948.
- Nathans, Sydney. Daniel Webster and Jacksonian Democracy. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1973.
- Nevins, Allan. Ordeal of the Union: Volume I. Fruits of Manifest Destiny, 1847–1852 and Volume II. A House Dividing, 1852–1857. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1947.
- Nichols, Roy F. Franklin Pierce: Young Hickory of the Granite Hills. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1931.
- Nichols, Roy F. The Disruption of American Democracy. New York: Collier Books, 1962.
- Nichols, Roy F. "The Kansas-Nebraska Act: A Century of Historiography," Mississippi Valley Historical Review, 43 (1956), 187–212.
- Nichols, Roy F. Blueprints for Leviathan: American Style. New York: Harper & Row, 1966.
- Nichols, Roy F., and Nichols, Jeannette. "The Election of 1852." History of American Presidential Elections. Volume I. Ed. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., and Fred Israel. New York: Chelsea House, 1971.

- Niven, John. Gideon Welles: Lincoln's Secretary of the Navy. New York: Oxford University Press, 1973.
- Niven, John. Martin Van Buren: The Romantic Age of American Politics. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Oakes, James. The Ruling Race: A History of American Slaveholders. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1982.
- Oakes, James. Slavery and Freedom: An Interpretation of the Old South. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1990.
- Parks, Joseph H. "John Bell and the Compromise of 1850." Journal of Southern History, 9 (1943), 328-56.
- Parks, Joseph H. John Bell of Tennesssee. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1950.
- Paul, James C. N. Rift in the Democracy. New York: A. S. Barnes and Company, 1961.
- Penny, Sherry. "Dissension in the Whig Ranks: Daniel Dewey Barnard versus Thurlow Weed." New York Historical Society Quarterly, 59 (1975), 71–92.
- Perman, Michael. The Road to Redemption: Southern Politics, 1869–1879. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Pershing, B. H. "Membership in the General Assembly of Ohio." Ohio Archaeological and Historical Quarterly, 40 (1931), 222–83.
- Pessen, Edward. Jacksonian America: Society, Personality, and Politics. Homewood, Ill.: The Dorsey Press, 1978.
- Peterson, Merrill D. Olive Branch and Sword: The Compromise of 1833. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1982.
- Peterson, Merrill D. The Great Triumvirate: Webster, Clay, and Calhoun. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Phillips, Kim T. "Democrats of the Old School in the Era of Good Feelings." Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, 95 (1971), 363–82.
- Phillips, Kim T. "The Pennsylvania Origins of the Jackson Movement." Political Science Quarterly, 91 (1976), 489–508.
- Pletcher, David M. The Diplomacy of Annexation: Texas, Oregon, and the Mexican War. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1973.
- Poage, George Rawlings. Henry Clay and the Whig Party. Reprint edition. Gloucester: Peter Smith, 1965.
- Potter, David M. The Impending Crisis, 1848–1861. Edited and completed by Don E. Fehrenbacher. New York: Harper & Row, 1976.
- Ratcliffe, Donald J. "The Role of Voters and Issues in Party Formation: Ohio, 1824." Journal of American History, 49 (1973), 847–70.
- Ratcliffe, Donald J. "Politics in Jacksonian Ohio: Reflections on the Ethnocultural Interpretation." Ohio History, 88 (1979), 5–36.
- Rayback, Joseph A. Free Soil: The Election of 1848. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1970.
- Rayback, Robert J. "The Silver Grey Revolt." New York History, 47 (1949), 151-61.
- Rayback, Robert J. Millard Fillmore: Biography of a President. Buffalo: Henry Stewart, 1959.
- Redard, Thomas E. "The Election of 1844 in Louisiana: A New look at the Ethnocultural Approach." Louisiana History, 22 (1981), 419–33.
- Remini, Robert V. The Election of Andrew Jackson. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1963.
- Remini, Robert V. Andrew Jackson. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1966.
- Remini, Robert V. Andrew Jackson and the Bank War. New York: W. W. Norton and Company, 1967.
- Remini, Robert V. "The Election of 1832." History of American Presidential Elections, Volume I. Ed. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., and Fred Israel. New York: Chelsea House, 1971.
- Remini, Robert V. Andrew Jackson and the Course of American Freedom. New York: Harper & Row, 1981.
- Remini, Robert V. Henry Clay: Statesman for the Union. New York: W. W. Norton and Company, 1991.

- Renda, Lex. "Retrospective Voting and the Presidential Election of 1844: The Texas Issue Revisited." Presidential Studies Quarterly, 24 (1994), 837–54.
- Reynolds, John F., and McCormick, Richard L. "Outlawing Treachery': Split Tickets and Ballot Laws in New York and New Jersey, 1880–1910," Journal of American History, 72 (1986), 835–68.
- Rich, Robert. "'A Wilderness of Whigs': The Wealthy Men of Boston." Journal of Social History, 4 (1971), 263–76.
- Risjord, Norman K. The Old Republicans: Southern Conservatism in the Age of Jefferson. New York: Columbia University Press, 1965.
- Robbins, Roy M. Our Landed Heritage: The Public Domain, 1776–1970. Second edition revised. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1976.
- Roll, Charles. Colonel Dick Thompson: The Persistent Whig. Indianapolis: Indiana Historical Bureau, 1948.
- Rosenberg, Morton M. Iowa on the Eve of the Civil War: A Decade of Frontier Politics. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1972.
- Ross, Stephen J. "The Transformation of Republican Ideology." Journal of the Early Republic, 10 (1990), 323-30.
- Russo, David J. "The Major Political Issues of the Jacksonian Period and the Development of Party Loyalty in Congress, 1830–1840." Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, 62 (1972), 3–49.
- Sartori, Giovanni. Parties and Party Systems: A Framework of Analysis, Volume I. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1976.
- Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr. The Age of Jackson. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1945.
- Schott, Thomas E. Alexander H. Stephens of Georgia: A Biography. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1988.
- Schroeder, John H. Mr. Polk's War: American Opposition and Dissent, 1846–1848. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1973.
- Seager, Robert, II. And Tyler Too: A Biography of John and Julia Gardiner Tyler. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1963.
- Sellers, Charles G., Jr. "Banking and Politics in Jackson's Tennessee, 1817–1827." Mississippi Valley Historical Review, 41 (1954), 61–84.
- Sellers, Charles G., Jr. James K. Polk: Jacksonian, 1795–1843. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1957.
- Sellers, Charles G., Jr. James K. Polk: Continentalist, 1843–1846. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1966.
- Sellers, Charles G., Jr. "The Election of 1844." History of American Presidential Elections, Volume I. Ed. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., and Fred Israel. New York: Chelsea House, 1971.
- Sellers, Charles G., Jr. The Market Revolution: Jacksonian America, 1815–1846. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Sewell, Richard H. John P. Hale and the Politics of Abolition. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1965.
- Sewell, Richard H. Ballots for Freedom: Antislavery Politics in the United States, 1837–1860. New York: Oxford University Press, 1976.
- Shade, William G. "Pennsylvania Politics in the Jacksonian Period: A Case Study, Northampton County, 1824–1844." Pennsylvania History, 38 (1971), 313–33.
- Shade, William G. Banks or No Banks: The Money Issue in Western Politics, 1832–1865. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1972.
- Shade, William G. "Political Pluralism and Party Development: The Creation of a Modern Party System, 1815–1852." The Evolution of American Electoral Systems. Ed. Paul Kleppner. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1981.
- Shade, William G. Democratizing the Old Dominion: Virginia and the Second American Party System, 1824–1861. Charlotteville: University Press of Virginia, 1996.
- Shalhope, Robert E. "Toward a Republican Synthesis: The Emergence of an Understanding of Republicanism in American Historiography." William & Mary Quarterly, 29 (1972), 49–80.
- Sharp, James Roger. The Jacksonians versus the Banks: Politics in the States after the Panic of 1837. New York: Columbia University Press, 1970.

- Shaw, Robert E. Erie Water West. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1966.
- Shenton, James P. Robert John Walker: A Politician from Jackson to Lincoln. New York: Columbia University Press, 1961.
- Shryock, Richard H. Georgia and the Union in 1850. Durham: Duke University Press, 1926.
- Silbey, Joel H. The Shrine of Party: Congressional Voting Behavior, 1841–1852. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1967.
- Silbey, Joel H. The Transformation of American Politics, 1840–1860. Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall, 1967.
- Silbey, Joel H. "The Election of 1836." History of American Presidential Elections. Volume I. Ed. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., and Fred Israel. New York: Chelsea House, 1971.
- Silbey, Joel H. The Partisan Imperative: The Dynamics of American Politics before the Civil War. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Simms, H. H. The Rise of the Whigs in Virginia, 1824–1840. Richmond: William Byrd Press, 1929.
- Simpson, Craig M. A Good Southerner: The Life of Henry A. Wise of Virginia. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1985.
- Skowronek, Stephen. The Politics Presidents Make: Leadership from John Adams to George Bush. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1993.
- Slaughter, Thomas P. Bloody Dawn: The Christiana Riot and Racial Violence in the Antebellum North. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Smith, Elbert B. The Presidencies of Zachary Taylor and Millard Fillmore. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1988.
- Smith, Willard H. "Schuyler Colfax: Whig Editor, 1845–1855." Indiana Magazine of History, 34 (1938), 262–82.
- Snyder, Charles M. The Jacksonian Heritage: Pennsylvania Politics 1833–1848. Harrisburg: Pennsylvania Historical and Museum Commission, 1958.
- Spencer, Donald S. Louis Kossuth and Young America: A Study of Sectionalism and Foreign Policy. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1977.
- Stanley, John L. "Majority Tyranny in Tocqueville's America: The Failure of Negro Suffrage in 1846." Political Science Quarterly, 84 (1969), 412–35.
- Stegmaier, Mark J. "Zachary Taylor versus the South." Civil War History, 36 (1987), 219-41.
- Stegmaier, Mark J. Texas, New Mexico, and the Compromise of 1850: Boundary Dispute & Sectional Crisis. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1996.
- Stephenson, George M. The Political History of the Public Lands from 1840 to 1862. Boston: Richard G. Badger, 1917.
- Stewart, James Brewer. Joshua R. Giddings and the Tactics of Radical Politics. Cleveland: Press of Case Western Reserve University, 1970.
- Stewart, James Brewer. Holy Warriors: The Abolitionists and American Slavery. New York: Hill & Wang, 1976.
- Stewart, James Brewer. "Abolitionists, Insurgents, and Third Parties: Sectionalism and Partisan Politics in Northern Whiggery, 1836–1844." Crusaders and Compromisers: Essays on the Relationship of the Antislavery Struggle to the Antebellum Party System. Ed. Alan M. Kraut. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1983.
- Streeter, Floyd B. Political Parties in Michigan, 1837–1860. Lansing: Michigan Historical Commission, 1919.
- Summers, Mark W. The Plundering Generation: Corruption and the Crisis of the Union, 1849–1861. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.
- Sundquist, James L. Dynamics of the Party System: Alignment and Realignment of Political Parties in the United States. Washington: The Brookings Institution, 1973.
- Sweeney, Kevin. "Rum, Romanism, Representation, and Reform: Coalition Politics in Massachusetts, 1847–1853." Civil War History, 22 (1976), 116–37.
- Temin, Peter. The Jacksonian Economy. New York: W. W. Norton and Company, 1969.
- Thornton, J. Mills, III. Politics and Power in a Slave Society: Alabama 1800–1860. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1978.
- Timberlake, Richard. "The Specie Circular and Distribution of the Surplus." Journal of Political Economy, 68 (1960), 109–17.

- Timberlake, Richard. "The Specie Circular and Sales of Public Lands: A Comment." Journal of Economic History, 25 (1965), 414–16.
- Tomlins, Christopher L. Law, Labor, and Ideology in the Early American Republic. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Trefousse, Hans L. Benjamin Franklin Wade: Radical Republican from Ohio. New York: Twayne Publishers, 1963.
- Trefousse, Hans L. "The Republican Party, 1854–1864." History of U.S. Political Parties. Volume II. Ed. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. New York: Chelsea House and R. W. Bowker, 1973.
- Trester, Delmer J. "David Tod and the Gubernatorial Campaign of 1844." Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Quarterly, 62 (1953), 162-78.
- Tutorow, Norman E. Texas Annexation and the Mexican War: A Political Study of the Northwest. Palo Alto: Chadwick House Publishers, 1978.
- Tyrell, Ian R. Sobering Up: From Temperance to Prohibition in Antebellum America, 1800–1860. Westport: Greenwood Press, 1979.
- Van Bolt, Roger H. "Sectional Aspects of Expansion, 1844–1848." Indiana Magazine of History, 48 (1952), 119–40.
- Van Bolt, Roger H. "The Hoosiers and the 'Eternal Agitation,' 1848–1850." Indiana Magazine of History, 48 (1952), 331–68.
- Van Bolt, Roger H. "Fusion Out of Confusion." Indiana Magazine of History, 49 (1953), 353–90. Van Bolt, Roger H. "Indiana in Political Transition, 1851–1853." Indiana Magazine of History, 49 (1953), 131–60.
- Van Deusen, Glyndon G. The Life of Henry Clay. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1937.
- Van Deusen, Glyndon G. Thurlow Weed: Wizard of the Lobby. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1947.
- Van Deusen, Glyndon G. Horace Greeley: Nineteenth Century Crusader. New York: Hill & Wang, 1964.
- Van Deusen, Glyndon G. William Henry Seward. New York: Oxford University Press, 1967.
- Van Deusen, Glyndon G. "The Whig Party." History of U.S. Political Parties. Volume I. Ed. Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. New York: Chelsea House and R. W. Bowker, 1973.
- Varon, Elizabeth R. "Tippecanoe and the Ladies, Too: White Women and Party Politics in Antebellum Virginia." Journal of American History, 82 (1995), 494–521.
- Volpe, Vernon L. "The Anti-Abolitionist Campaign of 1840." Civil War History, 32 (1986), 325–39.
- Wallace, Michael. "Changing Concepts of Party in the United States, 1815–1828." American Historical Review, 74 (1968), 453–91.
- Walton, Brian G. "The Elections to the Thirtieth Congress and the Presidential Candidacy of Zachary Taylor." Journal of Southern History, 35 (1969), 186–202.
- Walton, Brian G. "The Second Party System in Arkansas, 1836–1848." Arkansas Historical Quarterly, 28 (1969), 120–55.
- Walton, Brian G. "The Second Party System in Tennessee." East Tennessee Historical Society Publications, 43 (1971), 18–33.
- Walton, Brian G. "A Matter of Timing: Elections to the United States Senate in Tennessee before the Civil War." Tennessee Historical Quarterly, 31 (1972), 129–48.
- Walton, Brian G. "Elections to the United States Senate in North Carolina, 1835–1861." North Carolina Historical Review, 53 (1976), 168–92.
- Walton, Brian G. "Georgia's Biennial Legislatures, 1840–1860, and Their Elections to the U.S. Senate." Georgia Historical Quarterly, 61 (1977), 140–55.
- Watson, Harry L. Jacksonian Politics and Community Conflict: The Emergence of the Second American Party System in Cumberland County, North Carolina. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981.
- Watson, Harry L. "Conflict and Collaboration: Yeomen, Slaveholders, and Politics in the Antebellum South." Journal of Social History, 10 (1985), 273–98.
- Watson, Harry L. Liberty and Power: The Politics of Jacksonian America. New York: Hill & Wang, 1990.

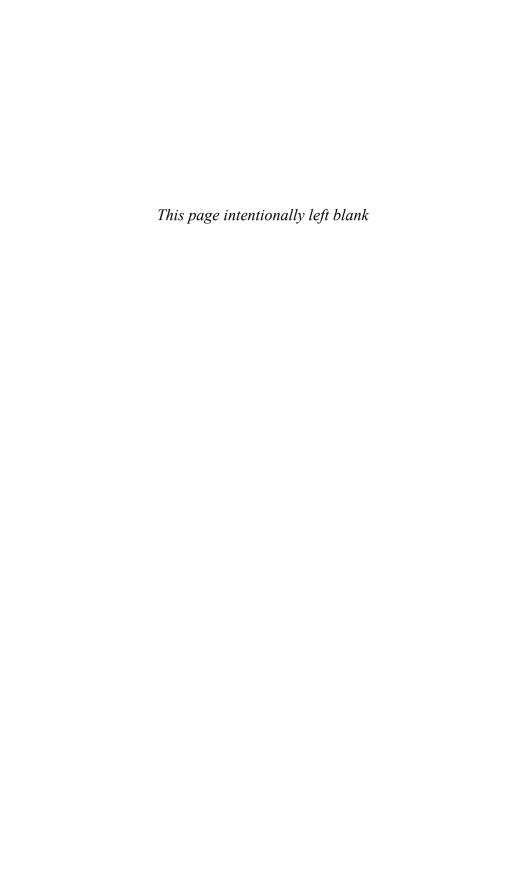

- Wellington, Raynor G. The Political and Sectional Influence of the Public Lands, 1828–1842. Boston: The Riverside Press, 1914.
- Welter, Rush. The Mind of America, 1820–1860. New York: Columbia University Press, 1975.
- Wilburn, Jean. Biddle's Bank: The Crucial Years. New York: Columbia University Press, 1967.
- Wilentz, Sean. Chants Democratic: New York City and the Rise of the American Working Class, 1788–1850. New York: Oxford University Press, 1984.
- Williams, Max R. "William A. Graham and the Election of 1844: A Study of North Carolina Politics." North Carolina Historical Review, 45 (1968), 23–46.
- Williams, Max R. "The Foundations of the Whig Party in North Carolina: A Synthesis and a Modest Proposal." North Carolina Historical Review, 47 (1970), 115–29.
- Wilson, Major L. "The Concept of Time and the Political Dialogue in the United States, 1828–1848." American Quarterly, 19 (1967), 619–44.
- 1848." American Quarterly, 19 (1967), 619–44.
 Wolff, Gerald. "Party and Section: The Senate and the Kansas-Nebraska Bill." Civil War History,
- 18 (1972), 293–331. Wolff, Gerald. The Kansas-Nebraska Bill: Party, Section, and the Coming of the Civil War. New York, 1977.
- Wood, Gordon. The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1969.
- Wood, Gordon. The Radicalism of the American Revolution. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1992.Woodward, C. Vann, ed. Responses of the Presidents to Charges of Misconduct. New York: Dell Books, 1974.
- Wooster, Ralph A. Politicians, Planters, and Plain Folk: Courthouse and Statehouse in the Upper South, 1850–1860. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1975.
- Wyatt-Brown, Bertram. "The Antimission Movement in the Jacksonian South: A Study in Regional Folk Culture." Journal of Southern History, 36 (1970), 501–29.
- Wyatt-Brown, Bertram. Southern Honor: Ethics and Behavior in the Old South. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.

Unpublished Dissertations, Papers, and Theses

- Ames, Tim. "Conflict and Consensus: The Wisconsin General Assembly, 1848–1854." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1978.
- Anderson, Chace. "The Compromise of 1850 and the Texas Boundary Dispute in the Senate." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1988.
- Atkins, Jonathan Moore. "'A Combat for Liberty': Politics and Parties in Jackson's Tennessee, 1832–1851." Ph.D. Dissertation. University of Michigan. 1991.
- Bearss, Sara Beth. "'How All Occasions Do Inform": Henry Clay's Open Break with Zachary Taylor over the Compromise of 1850." Master's Thesis. University of Virginia. 1984.
- Birkner, Michael J. "Politics, Law and Enterprise in Jacksonian America: The Career of Samuel L. Southard." Ph.D. Dissertation. University of Virginia. 1981.
- Bobo, Frank R. "Revelry, Reorganization, and Ruin: The Fate of the Whig Party in Georgia from 1848 to 1853." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1992.
- Bruser, Lawrence. "Political Antislavery in Connecticut, 1844–1858." Ph.D. Dissertation. Columbia University. 1974.
- Burnet, Robert Scott. "Creating the 34th Congress: House and Senate Elections, 1854–1855." Ph.D. Dissertation. University of Virginia. 1997.
- Calabro, David J. "The Collapse of the Two-Party System in Florida: 1845–1858." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1978.
- Campbell, Ballard C. "Party, Policy, and Political Leadership in Congress during the Nineteenth Century." Paper delivered at the Project '87 Conference on Congress. February 1981.
- DeScherer, Chris. "The Whig National Convention of 1856." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1992.
- Green, Stephen. "The Collapse of the Whig Party in Maryland." Seminar Paper. Yale College. 1973.

- Hampel, Robert M. "The Ohio Whig Party, 1848–1854." Senior Thesis. Yale College. 1972.
- Hampel, Robert M. "Constitution-Making at Mid-Century: Indiana, 1850–1852." Seminar Paper. Cornell University. 1973.
- Hampel, Robert M. "The Origins of the 1850 Indiana Constitutional Convention." Seminar Paper. Cornell University. 1973.
- Harp, Gillis. "The Character of Party Dialogue: Democrats and Whigs in New York State, 1844–1852." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1980.
- Hoerl, Hank G. "Land, Rails, and Gresham's Law: The Politics of the Delta, 1842–1854." No place or date. In my possession.
- Hoisington, Daniel J. "From Whig to Union: The Whig Party in Georgia, 1849–1853." Master's Thesis. University of Virginia. 1976.
- Hunter, Thomas. "A Delegation Divided: North Carolina Politics and the Compromise of 1850." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1989.
- Jeffrey, Thomas E. "Party Alignment and Realignment in North Carolina, 1836–1850." Paper presented to the Annual Meeting of the Southern Historical Association. 1979.
- Kierner, Cynthia. "'The Motley Party: The Know Nothing Interlude and New Jersey's Anti-Democratic Opposition." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1983.
- Kirn, John R. "The Third Party System in New York State: Patterns of Electoral Behavior, 1848–1876." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1985.
- Kirn, John R. "Elections, Roll Calls, and the Decline of the Second Party System in New York State, 1846–1853." Paper delivered at the Social Science History Annual Meeting. 1995.
- Leibiger, Stuart. "Georgia and the Compromise of 1850." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1987.
- Lemley, Jane. "The Passage of the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1989.
- Lucas, Melvin Philip. "The Second Party System in Mississippi, 1836–1844." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1975.
- Lucas, Melvin Philip. "The Period of Political Alchemy: Party in the Mississippi Legislature, 1835–1846." Master's Thesis. Cornell University. 1981.
- Maizlish, Stephen. "The Triumph of Sectionalism: The Transformation of Politics in the Antebellum North, Ohio 1844–1860." Ph.D. Dissertation. University of California at Berkeley, 1978.
- McDonald, Justin Toby. "The Politics of Compromise: The Compromise of 1850, The Texas Boundary Settlement, and the House of Representatives." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1989.
- McFaden, Carlton D. "Sections, Slaveholders, and Safe Concessions: The Demise of the Whig Party in North Carolina from 1848 to 1856." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1992.
- Merkel, Philip. "Party and Constitution Making: An Examination of Selected Roll-Calls from the New York Constitutional Convention of 1846." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia.
- Miller, Thomas W. "A New Perspective on Southern Whig Decline: A Comparison of the Mississippi and North Carolina Whig Parties, 1848–1856." Master's Thesis. University of Texas at Austin. 1992.
- Mittendorf, Brad. "Mississippi Politics, 1848–1852: The Decline of Partisan Politics." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1990.
- Morrison, Christopher. "For Buncombe or Principle: Georgia's Congressional Party Politics in the Crisis and Compromise of 1850." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1990.
- Olberg, Peter. "Coalition Politics: Party Formation in Vermont, 1848–1855." Seminar Paper. Yale College. 1972.
- Pilkington, Kirk. "Interparty Conflict in the Louisiana House of Representatives, 1848–1854." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1978.
- Reed, J. Eric. "The Politics of Internal Improvements: New York's Canals and the Second Party System, 1834–1854." Senior Thesis. University of Virginia. 1987.
- Renda, Lex. "Railroads, Revenue, and Reform: Decline of the New Jersey Whigs." Master's Thesis. University of Virginia. 1984.

- Renda, Lex. "The Polity and the Party System: Connecticut and New Hampshire, 1840–1876." Ph.D. Dissertation. University of Virginia. 1991.
- Shadle, Kurt P. "Consensus and the Decline of the Second Party System: Ohio, 1848–1854." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1978.
- Thornton, J. Mills, III. "The Ethic of Subsistence and the Origins of Secession." Public Lecture. University of Florida. November 1987.
- Tutorow, Norman E. "Whigs in the Old Northwest and the Mexican War." Ph.D. Dissertation. Stanford University. 1967.
- Volz, Harry A., III. "Party, State, and Nation: Kentucky and the Coming of the Civil War." Ph.D. Dissertation. University of Virginia. 1982.
- White, Stephen. "The Partisan Political Elements in the Virginia Constitutional Convention of 1850–51." Seminar Paper. University of Virginia. 1980.

abolitionism: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 861; and blurring of party lines, 912; and Fillmore, 358; and Free Soilers, 342; and Fugitive Slave Act, 605; and future of Whig party, 211, 822; Harrison's views about, 110, 111; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 816; post office bans literature about, 44; and slavery in D.C., 43, 44, 61, 155, 182–83, 358; and Texas annexation, 178–79, 180–81, 200; and third parties, 773; Van Buren's views about, 44; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 488. See also abolitionism—and election; Free Soilers; Liberty party; specific person abolitionism—and election: of 1836, 43, 44, 55; of 1840, 95–96, 97, 99–101, 110, 111, 156; of 1844, 156, 178–83, 185–86, 189, 195–96, 200; of 1848, 267, 313, 331, 342, 358; of 1849, 443; of 1852, 699; of 1854, 833, 861, 871–82, 896, 903; of 1855, 900

Abominations Act (1828), 8, 20, 43

ad valorem duties, 128, 148, 184, 234, 246, 446, 448, 619–20, 687, 718, 775–76

Adams, Charles Francis: and demise of Whig party, 983; and elections, 282, 333, 339, 381, 452, 890; and Free Soilers, 339; on Republican party, 890; and slavery, 333, 339, 381; and Texas, 227; as Young Whig, 226

Adams, John Quincy, 26, 31, 149; censure of, 156; and "Corrupt Bargain," 7; death of, 341; and demise of Whig party, 983; and elections, 5–7, 9–10, 45–46, 107, 341; and Missouri Compromise, 5; as secretary of state, 4; and slavery, 44, 156, 168–69, 341

Adams [John Quincy] Select Committee (U.S. House), 149

"Address to the People" (New York Whigs, 1836), 45 agriculture/farmers, 4–5, 13, 25, 63, 83, 139, 241, 246, 447, 686, 690

Alabama: Calhounites in, 71, 73; Democrats in, 71, 73, 733, 800–801; and future of Whig party, 774; internal improvements in, 136; Know Nothings in, 855–56, 933–34; National Republicans in, 17, 43; national versus state issues in, 55; patronage in, 422–23, 678; political realignments in, 71, 73, 607–8

reapportionment in, 159, 163; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80; and rise of Whig party, 35; secession threat in, 601–2, 607; and Southern Rights, 268; state rights in, 20, 43, 55, 73; and Texas annexation, 180–81, 200, 219; Union party in, 607, 613, 616, 620–22, 633, 636, 676–78, 681, 707, 774, 821, 955, 958; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675, 677–78; Whig strength in, 32, 116, 213, 215, 609; and Wilmot Proviso, 268. See also Alabama—election in; specific person

Alabama—election in: of 1824, 6; of 1832, 12, 17, 46; of 1835, 36, 43; of 1836, 42–43, 46, 50, 55; of 1838–39, 73, 98, 101; of 1840, 73, 101, 108, 112, 196, 198; of 1841–43, 139, 148, 151, 159, 200; of 1844, 180–81, 196, 198, 200, 215, 368, 370; of 1845–47, 215, 219, 224, 440; of 1848, 268, 290, 298, 323, 325, 329, 351, 355, 359, 368, 370–71; of 1849, 440; of 1851, 616, 622, 633; of 1852, 636, 676–78, 680–81, 683, 697, 703, 707, 733, 756, 758, 760, 958; of 1853, 796, 799; of 1855, 933–34

Alabama Letters (Clay, 1844), 180-83, 186, 192-93, 196, 205, 275, 278

Albany Platform, 654-56

Albany Regency machine, 31, 38, 77, 430, 433-34, 905

Alexander, Thomas B., 372

Allen, Charles B., 226, 227, 321, 326, 327–28, 380, 582, 583

Allen, Levi, 432, 467, 514–17, 545–46, 549, 550, 584, 600

Allen, Orlando, 652

Allen, Philip, 638, 778

Allen, William, 398, 400, 401, 569

Allison, John S., 309-10, 361

1204 INDEX

Allison Letters (Taylor, 1848), 310, 314, 330, 344, 345, 351, 361, 382, 415, 701

Allston, John, 616

American Colonization Society, 95, 458

American party: and demise of Whig party, 960; disintegration of, 980; Fillmore as candidate of, 963–65, 967, 978–81; Fillmore's views about, 980; and future of Whig party, 837, 865; and House speakership, 962; Know Nothings as predecessor of, 849, 852; and Missouri Compromise, 964; North Americans bolt from, 964–65; and patronage, 422, 427; Philadelphia nominating convention of (1856), 963–65; and Republican party, 965; and rise and demise of Whig party, 954; and southern Whigs, 969. See also American party—and election; Know Nothings; Know Nothings—and election; nativism; specific person or state

American party—and election: of 1851, 667–68, 670–71; of 1852, 681, 684, 697, 711, 730, 738, 741–43, 746, 753, 756, 761, 847, 848; of 1853, 803, 767, 786–87, 790; of 1854, 835, 844–45, 850, 854, 857–58, 863–66, 869–71, 873, 875–78, 880–902, 904–7, 909–10, 912, 957; of 1855, 857, 912, 915–22, 932–49; of 1856, 877, 898–99, 908–15, 963–68, 973–74, 978–81. See also Know Nothings; nativism; specific person or state

American Republican party: and Democrats, 192; disintegration of, 980; emergence of, 190–91; and future of Whig party, 213; and patronage, 422, 427; and Philadelphia riots, 191; platform of, 190–91; as proposed name for Whig party, 211; proposed Whig alliance with, 191, 193–94, 205, 212, 228; and Taylor, 270. See also American Republican party—and election; nativism; specific person or state

American Republican party—and election: of 1843, 191; of 1844, 187–94, 205–7, 275–76, 302, 318, 730; of 1845, 228–29, 302; of 1846, 302; of 1847, 302; of 1848, 261–62, 270–73, 276, 292, 302–3, 307–8, 318, 319, 320, 328, 330, 364–65, 367, 375, 381, 667, 674; of 1849, 454; of 1850, 579. See also nativism; specific person or state anti-Jacksonians: and banks, 24–25, 27, 29, 32; Democrats as, 46, 50; and elections, 26, 33–36, 49–55; and executive tyranny, 46; expansion in ranks of, 20–25; and liberty, 29; and patronage, 29; and republicanism, 28; and state rights, 20–21, 25; and tariffs, 21, 25; Whig party as amalgam of, 28–30, 46, 121. See also specific person or topic anti-Nebraska coalitions: and demise of Whig party, 957; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 914–16, 919, 922–23, 929; and Free Soilers, 836, 841, 896, 903; and future of Whig party, 859–66, 878, 922; and House speakership, 924, 963; and Houston, 914; and Know Nothings, 845, 859–66, 914–16, 919, 921–23, 929–30, 940; and northern Whigs, 836; and Republican party, 922; and republicanism, 844; and southern Whigs, 843, 865. See also anti-

The American Review, 212, 234, 247, 349 American System, 2, 13, 15, 19, 46, 94, 447 Americus Letter (Scott, 1844), 318, 730, 745

Anthony, Henry, 556

Nebraska coalitions—and election; specific state or anti-Nebraska coalitions—and election: of 1854, 837, 841–45, 858–77, 885–86, 893–904, 906, 908, 925, 957; of 1855, 915–16, 919–22, 932, 937, 941–45; of 1856, 923

Anti-Rent movement (New York), 240-42, 299, 591-92, 647, 655-56

anti-Van Buren Democrats, 150, 164, 172-75

antimasonry: as anti-Jacksonian, 19, 26, 28–32; and banks, 16–17; and egalitarianism, 14; and evangelical Protestants, 13, 30; and executive tyranny, 29–31; and farmers, 13; and Fillmore, 299, 911; formation of, 12; Free Soilers compared with, 340; and Harrison, 50, 52; and Jackson, 13; and National Republicans, 13–14, 19; platform of, 12–13; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 77, 79–80; and republicanism, 12–13, 28–30; and rise and expansion of Whig party, 26, 28–32, 34, 37–39, 46; slavery compared with, 336; and state party development, 49, 52, 54–55. See also antimasonry—and election; specific person or state antimasonry—and election: of 1832, 14–15, 17–18, 914; of 1836, 38–41, 46, 52, 953; of 1838, 98; of 1840, 91, 97–101; of 1848, 299; of 1854, 884, 887 antipartyism/nonpartisanism: and demise of Whig party, 957; and future of Whig party, 837; and organization and expansion of Whig party, 59; and patronage, 422, 509; and political culture of Whig party, 30–32; and republicanism, 347; of Taylor, 270–73, 280, 290, 306–10, 327, 331–32, 345–47, 350–52, 354–55, 361, 365, 413–14, 422, 674, 729; and Van Buren, 31; and voter turnout, 154. See also antipartyism/nonpartisanism—and election; Know Nothings antipartyism/nonpartisanism—and election: of 1836, 31, 39, 43, 55; of 1840, 104, 109; of 1848, 270–73, 280, 290, 301, 306–10, 327, 331–32, 345–47, 350–52, 354–55, 361, 365, 674; of 1852, 674, 729; of 1853, 793–94, 797; of 1854, 898, 957

Appleton, Nathan, 227, 235, 341, 462, 506, 931, 939 Appleton, William, 581, 583, 892

Archer, William S., 132, 133, 221, 228, 718, 734 Arkansas, 50, 71, 181, 200, 213–14, 733, 751, 850. See also Arkansas—election in; specific person

Arkansas—election in: of 1830s, 71; of 1840, 101, 103, 112; of 1841–43, 151, 154, 200; of 1844, 200, 368, 370; of 1846–47, 213; of 1848, 322–23, 325, 351, 368, 370; of 1850–51, 561, 563, 622, 632–33; of 1852, 683, 713, 733, 751, 757; of 1854, 850, 877 Ashe, William, 626–27

Ashmead, John, 428, 600, 667, 670, 681

Ashmun, George, 327, 348, 504, 539, 582, 716, 717, 718, 960

Atchison, David R., 531, 851–52 Atwood, John, 730

Babcock, Charles, 511, 549, 661
Babcock, George, 649, 650, 653, 656, 684, 711, 721–22, 788

Babcock, James F., 436

Badger, George E.: and Calhoun's third party efforts, 386; and Clay Plan, 486; and Clayton compromise, 392; and elections, 108, 306-7, 311, 392-93, 703-4, 769, 968-69; and expansionism, 311; and future of Whig party, 768, 824-27, 910; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 817-19, 824, 826-27; and Know Nothings, 910; and launching of new sectional party, 825-26; and Mangum, 306; and Mexican laws, 530; and Mexican War, 311; and omnibus bill, 495, 504, 530; and patronage, 424; and Republican party, 910; Republic's endorsement of, 501; and Round Robin, 621; as secretary of navy, 125; and slavery, 386; and Southern Rights, 392; and southern Whigs, 487; style of, 306; and Taylor administration, 457, 495; and Union party, 621; and Wilmot Proviso, 392

Bailey, Gamaliel, 826–27, 834, 844, 882–83, 916, 962–63

Baird, Thomas H., 884, 885

Baker, Edward D., 420, 426, 437, 467

Balche, Benjamin, 675

Baldwin, Roger Sherman: and Compromise of 1850, 557; and demise of Whig party, 983; and elections, 324–25, 557, 638–639, 690–91, 761, 832; and Free Soilers, 341–44; and future of Whig party, 832; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 811; and Know Nothings, 921; and Mexican War, 311; and New Mexico, 537; and omnibus bill, 483; and patronage, 420; and secession, 483; and temperance, 690–91, 832; and Texas boundary dispute, 536; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 638–39; and Wilmot Proviso, 344–45

Baltimore, Maryland: election of 1844 in, 228; voter fraud in, 228; Whig conventions in, 712–25, 976–78

Bancroft, George, 82, 174, 749

Bank of the United States: charter for, 2; and corruption, 16; and economy, 37, 62; and elections, 15–18, 38, 40, 44, 54–55, 60, 100, 108; and executive tyranny, 17; and expansion of Democratic party, 84; Jackson's appointments to, 26; Jackson's views about, 15–17, 23, 24, 62; rechartering of, 15–16, 23, 27, 32, 42; removal of deposits from, 23–27, 32, 34–35, 49, 56, 62, 67; and republicanism, 16–17; 3nd rise of Whig party, 34; state charter for, 54–55; Webster's involvement with, 22–23, 26, 41, 92 Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania, 64, 79 bankruptcy, 126, 129, 130, 135, 139–40

Banks, Nathaniel P., 892, 923, 963, 964, 966, 967, 970
banks: and anti-Jacksonians, 24–25, 27, 29, 32;
branch, 129–34; central, 64; chartering of, 65, 68, 77, 129, 133–34; Democrats' views about, 66, 68, 84, 164; and economy, 4–5, 61–65, 84; and equalitarianism, 5; and Ewing amendment, 129, 131–34; and executive tyranny, 27; and Fillmore, 396; and Harrison administration, 41, 108, 110, 126; Jackson's views about, 37; and Jeffersonian Republicans, 2; national, 65–66, 108, 126, 128–36, 146, 161, 166, 184, 272; and Old Republicans/Radicals, 3; and Polk, 32, 175; regulation of, 5; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 76–82; and role of government, 69, 952; state, 2, 25, 32, 66; and state rights, 24; and Taylor, 272, 308, 415; and Tyler, 128–37, 139, 146, 151; and Van Buren, 23, 65–66; Whigs' views about, 67–69, 87–88, 129–36, 139, 161. See also banks—and election; Independent Treasury plan; specific person, state, or bank banks—and election: of 1830s, 44, 56; of 1840–41, 94, 108, 110, 139, 155; of 1844, 132–33, 165–66, 175, 184; of 1848, 272, 308; of 1851, 659–60; of 1852, 685, 687, 736, 739; of 1853, 777, 781–82, 790; of 1854, 868, 881

Barbour, James, 10, 40, 49

Barbour, P.P., 12, 44

Barclay, David, 885, 886

Barker, James W., 901, 904, 910, 929

Barnard, Daniel D.: and abolitionism, 462; and Clay Plan, 488; and demise of Whig party, 959, 972; and elections, 348, 491, 584–85, 918, 961, 968, 972; and Fillmore administration, 524, 546, 549–50; and future of Whig party, 910; and Know Nothings, 910; and Republican party, 910

Barnburners: and canals, 749–50; and Free Soilers, 338–39, 341–43; and Geddes Resolutions, 492–93; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 806–7; and organization of territorial governments, 492; readmission to Democratic party of, 485; and Union party, 606; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 644–45, 650; and Wilmot Proviso, 332–33, 491. See also Barnburners—and election; specific person

Barnburners—and election: of 1846, 239–40, 242; of 1847, 245; of 1848, 319, 332, 338–39, 341–43; of 1849, 453, 491; of 1850, 584–85, 591, 593–95; of 1851, 644–45, 650, 653, 655; of 1852, 684, 748–51, 760; of 1853, 787; of 1854, 894–95, 902–3

Barnett, Theodore, 559

Barney, John, 712, 714, 715, 720-21

Barns, Henry, 621, 861

Barr, John, 756, 761, 777, 782

Barringer, Daniel M., 289, 301, 306, 412, 420, 424– 25, 853, 970, 974

Barrow, Alexander, 132

Barrow, Washington, 426

Bartlett, E.B., 942, 965

Barton, Ira, 583

Bartow, Francis S., 503-4, 938

Bates, Edward, 525, 527, 723, 724, 923, 977

Bates, Isaac, 132

Battle, William M., 391, 392

Baxter, Porteas, 716

Bayard, James A., 565, 566

Beach, Ebeneazer, 587, 592

Bebb, William, 236, 295, 296, 297, 309, 316, 321

Beekman, James, 649, 650

Bell, James, 778, 832, 920-21

Bell, John: and Bullitt's firing, 502; and California statehood, 482, 537; and Clay Plan, 483, 486, 503; and Committee of Thirteen, 495; and Compromise of 1850, 627; and Democrat-Whig alliance, 516; as Fillmore supporter, 630; and future of Democratic party, 804; and future of Whig party, 768, 821,

1206 INDEX

Bell, John (continued)

824–25, 828, 833, 835, 878; and House speakership, 32, 42; and Jackson, 42; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 807, 813–14, 817, 819, 828, 833; and Know Nothings, 937; and launching of new sectional party, 824–25; and omnibus bill, 495, 503, 512, 516; and patronage, 426, 495, 512, 628; Republic's endorsement of, 491, 501; and Round Robin, 621; as secretary of war, 125; and Taylor administration, 483, 495, 503; and Texas, 482, 488; and Union party, 617, 621

Bell, John—and election: of 1840, 104; of 1848, 273, 289, 294, 308, 321; of 1851, 627–28, 630; of 1852, 704, 707, 735, 794; of 1853, 794–95; of 1855, 937; of 1856, 977

Bell, Peter H., 518, 529, 533, 534, 602

Benedict, Lewis, 514, 548, 550–51, 584, 586, 589–91, 600, 645, 899

Benjamin, Judah P., 625, 734, 736, 819, 934

Benson, Samuel, 873-74, 875

Benton, Thomas Hart: and California statehood, 497, 537; Clayton compared with, 565; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 771; and elections, 181, 338, 561, 565, 735, 792, 850–52; and Free Soilers, 495; and Fugitive Slave Act, 497; and Know Nothings, 850–52; and land revenues, 136; and Mexican laws, 530; and Mexican War, 249; as Missouri champion, 50; and omnibus bill, 494, 530–31; and Oregon, 338; role in Missouri politics of, 565; and slavery in District of Columbia, 538; and southern Democrats, 495; and Taylor Plan, 561; and Texas issues, 221, 474, 494, 497, 518, 530–31

Berrien, John M.; and banks, 132; and Calhoun's Southern Address, 387; and Calhoun's third party efforts, 386; and California statehood, 450-51, 464-65, 469-70, 481, 494, 500, 503-4, 611-12; and Clay, 476, 504; and Clay Plan, 470, 481; and Committee of Thirteen, 495; and Compromise of 1850, 546, 612; Dawson's relationship with, 286; and economic issues, 612; end of career of, 612-13; and expansionism, 252-53; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 527-28; and Galphin Claim, 497-98; and House speakership, 469-70; and Know Nothings, 937-38; and Mexican Cession, 443, 451, 464-65, 469, 481, 540, 611; and Mexican War, 252-53, 256, 311; and Nashville Convention, 469; and naturalization laws, 228-29; and New Mexico, 451, 517, 540; and omnibus bill, 494-95, 500, 503-4, 508, 517; and organization of territorial governments, 500, 517, 540; and patronage, 465, 546; Republic's endorsement of, 501; resigns Senate seat, 733; and rise of Whig party, 35; and secession threat, 469-70, 612; and slavery, 286, 337, 386-87, 450-51, 481, 540, 609; and Southern Rights, 469-70, 481, 611-12, 614; and state rights, 21, 35; Stephens' and Toombs' rivalry with, 222, 286, 450, 469-70, 540; and tariffs, 167, 222-23; and Taylor administration, 457, 470, 495, 503; and Texas issues, 179, 218, 220-23, 481; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 132; and Union party, 611-13; and Utah, 517, 540; and Wilmot Proviso, 281, 450-51, 464, 469, 500. See also Berrien, John M.—and election

Berrien, John M.—and election: of 1830s, 35; of 1845–47, 218, 222–23, 286; of 1848, 273, 277, 281, 285–87, 304, 313–14, 337; of 1849, 450–51; of 1851, 611–13, 615; of 1852, 704, 733; of 1853–55, 797–98, 937–38

Biddle, Nicholas, 25, 26, 98. See also Bank of the United States

Bigler, John, 660, 781, 789-90, 858

Bigler, William—and election: of 1851, 668–71; of 1852, 685–86, 726, 741, 744–45, 753; of 1854, 880–81, 883–84, 886

Binney, Horace, 408, 409, 413

Bird, Robert M., 407, 408

Birney, James G., 187, 195, 196, 343

Black, Jeremiah S., 884, 885, 889

black laws (Ohio), 399, 400, 401 blacks, 118, 663, 984; suffrage for, 227, 229, 239, 240, 299. See also Fugitive Slave Law

Blair, Francis P., 23

Booz, E.G., 107

Bliss, William, 308, 309

Bokee, David A., 430, 434, 504, 543, 586, 593, 651, 656, 709, 721, 977

Boston, Massachusetts: elections in, 228, 364, 452, 581, 696, 743, 805; Fugitive Slave Act in, 604–5; Irish in, 696, 743, 786–87; nativism in, 229; patronage in, 537; Union party in, 606, 637; Whig constituency in, 116

Botts, John Minor, 134, 149, 305–6, 764–65, 814, 927. See also Botts, John Minor—and election

Botts, John Minor—and election: of 1848, 273, 285, 287, 318, 321, 348; of 1851, 622; of 1852, 706, 714, 718–20, 724, 728, 729, 734, 755; of 1856, 765

Bouck, William C., 164

Boutwell, George S., 582-83, 640, 644

Bowen, James, 593-94, 595-96

Bowie, G.W., 858

Bowie, Richard I., 624, 792, 977

Bowie, Thomas, 933, 935

Bowles, Samuel, 770, 777, 832, 931, 941

Boyd, Linn, 486, 539-42, 678

Bradbury, James W., 510, 511, 530, 531, 533, 534, 560, 769

Bradford, John M., 898

Bradley, Harry, 329, 708

Bradley, John H., 441

Bragg, Thomas, 852-53

Branch, John, 21, 35

Brashear, William, 320, 322

Breckinridge, John C., 630-31, 793, 926, 970

Brenton, Samuel, 662, 663

Briggs, George N., 229, 341, 362, 376, 380, 452, 527, 579–80, 582, 593

Bright, Jesse, 335, 338, 485, 495, 506, 509, 510, 511, 559, 863

Broderick, David, 857, 858

Bronson, Greene, 894, 897, 900, 903, 904, 905, 907

Brooke, Francis, 27, 93

Brooke, Walter, 677, 704

Brooks, Erastus, 239

Brooks, James: and elections, 353, 358, 586, 593, 595, 648-49, 678, 694; and Fillmore-Seward rivalry, 430; and Fugitive Slave Act, 543; and Kossuth, 694; and New York constitution, 239; and omnibus bill, 504; and Round Robin, 620

Brooks, Preston S.: caning of Sumner by, 966, 978 Broom, Jacob, 885, 886, 888, 963

Broomall, John, 885

Brown, Aaron V., 168, 172, 223, 795

Brown, Albert Gallatin, 449, 796, 797, 856

Brown, Milton H., 220, 221, 222, 262, 286, 809

Brown [Milton] plan, 220, 221-22, 286

Brown, Neil S., 244, 273, 356, 440, 628

Brown, Orlando, 285, 304, 308, 314, 419-20, 456, 501-3, 716

Brown, Thomas, 564, 723, 734, 751, 854

Brownlow, William G. "Parson," 294, 734, 847, 926, 937, 970

Bryan, George S., 824, 825, 853-54, 879, 880, 909, 968, 969, 970

Buchanan, James, 96, 174, 368, 883, 889; and election of 1856, 965-67, 970-71, 975-76, 978-81 budget, federal, 128, 130-31, 135, 146-47. See also debt, national

Buel, Alexander, 568

Buena Vista Festival (Philadelphia, 1848), 301-3, 413 Buffalo, New York: Democratic-Whig alliance in, 516; election of 1850 in, 550; Free Soil convention in (1848), 333-36, 338-39, 342; Niagara Falls rally in, 739-40; patronage in, 516, 545-46, 548-50; Webster speech in, 680, 693

Bugg, Robert, 821, 827

Bullard, Henry, 621, 625

Bullitt, Alexander C.: and Clay Plan, 501; and Compromise of 1850, 625; and elections, 285, 309, 456, 625; firing of, 501-2; and omnibus bill, 503; and patronage, 424; as Republic editor, 406, 415, 501-2; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 491; and Taylor administration, 403, 446, 456, 501; and Webster Plan, 501

Burnley, Albert T., 285, 397, 406, 415, 446, 501, 930, 936, 937

Burr, Alfred E., 436, 437, 557 Bush, John T., 433, 587, 650-51, 653, 910 Butler, Andrew Pickens, 481, 496, 497 Butler, Chester, 577, 578

Butler, William O., 174, 344, 352

Cabell, Edward Carrington: and Compromise of 1850, 564; and Galphin scandal, 519; and House speakership, 467; and patronage, 421, 546; retirement of, 854; and Union party, 675, 676, 677; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675, 676, 677. See also Cabell, Edward Carrington-and election

Cabell, Edward Carrington-and election: of 1848, 289, 391; of 1850, 564; of 1852, 676-78, 698-99, 702-4, 711, 711, 716, 722, 727, 733, 734, 751-52, 854; of 1854, 854 cabinet: of Fillmore, 522, 523, 524-28, 565-66, 637; of Harrison, 124-25; of Jackson, 11, 24; and patronage, 457, 637; of Pierce, 766; of Tyler, 127, 128, 129, 132, 133, 137, 150. See also cabinet (Tavlor); specific person cabinet (Taylor): and apprehensions about Fillmore, 522, 523, 524-25; and Bullitt's firing, 501; and California statehood, 498; and Clay-Taylor relationship, 502; confirmation of appointments to, 390; consequences on Whig party of, 413; criticisms of, 410-13, 420, 424, 456-57, 524-25; Crittenden's influence on appointments to, 394, 403-10; and election of 1849, 442; and Fillmore, 403, 410, 522-25; and Galphin Claim, 497-99, 524; and loyalty to Taylor, 407; and omnibus bill, 498, 502, 520; and patronage, 391, 420-23, 426-28, 430-31; resignation of, 524; sectional balance in, 391, 409-10, 413; selection of, 402-13; and Seward's influence, 432; and southern Whigs, 495, 524; Stephens-Toombs' influence on selection of, 404-5, 468; and Taylor Plan, 412; and Taylor Republicanism, 406-8, 413; Taylor's loyalty to, 498-99, 501; Taylor's relationship with, 418-19; and Whig factionalism, 385, 403-10, 412-13; and Wilmot Proviso, 405, 407, 412

Caldwell, David F., 167

Caldwell, Joseph, 626, 795

Calhoun, James S., 437, 439

Calhoun, John C.: ambitions of, 89, 268; as anti-Jacksonian, 25, 26; antipartyism of, 170-71; and banks/monetary policies, 4, 16, 27, 65, 68; and California statehood, 484; Clay's relationship with, 95-96; death of, 484; and demise of Whig party, 140; and Democrats, 88, 95; and economy, 131; and executive tyranny, 27; and internal improvements, 4; Jackson's relationship with, 11, 12; and land revenue, 147; Mason reads speech of, 484-85; and Mexican War, 252, 270; and Nashville Convention, 449, 468, 469; and National Republicans, 4, 11; and nullification, 12, 39; and party system, 95; and political realignments, 7; and secession threat, 484-85; as secretary of war, 4; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 490-91; six resolutions of, 96; Southern Address (1849) of, 387, 388, 435, 437, 450, 467, 470, 610; and Southern Rights, 95, 268, 270, 387, 484; and tariffs, 11-12, 21, 147; and Texas annexation, 170-72, 174; third party efforts of, 268, 270, 281, 386–87; as Tyler cabinet member, 150, 170– 71; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 147; and Van Buren, 11; as vice president, 5, 21; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 488; and Whigs as failure, 123; and Wilmot Proviso, 268, 270. See also Calhoun, John C.—and election

Calhoun, John C.-and election: of 1820s, 5, 7; of 1830s, 16, 39, 40, 45; of 1840, 88, 95–96; of 1844, 164, 171-72, 174; of 1848, 268, 281, 335-36

Calhounites: and Chivalry, 610; and conservative Democrats, 71, 73, 88; and elections, 15, 39, 271-72, 313, 337; and rise of Whig party, 35; and slavery, 313, 337; and Taylor Plan, 475; and Texas annexation, 172

California: and apprehensions about Fillmore, 523; Berrien plan for dividing, 611; and blurring of party lines, 484; boundaries of, 463, 479, 500-501; 1208 INDEX and Clay Plan, 479, 481-83, 486; constitution of, 437-39, 461, 463, 472, 474, 483-84, 781; Douglas' proposal about, 385-86, 388-89; Fillmore's support for, 617; gold strikes in, 412, 435, 673, 685-87, 776, 790, 804, 955; House debate and vote about, 484, 538; and House speakership, 467-70; immigrants/ Catholics in, 858; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 857; King's journey to, 443-44, 449-51; Know Nothings in, 858; and little omnibus bill, 539; and Mexican Cession, 385-86, 388-89, 439, 464-65; and Mexican War, 233, 248-50, 252, 310; and northern Democrats, 475, 485, 501, 535, 538; and northern Whigs, 483-84, 487, 489, 533, 536; and omnibus bill, 481, 487, 494-97, 499-501, 503, 506-7, 517, 523, 526-27, 531; patronage in, 547, 660; and Polk administration, 233, 248-50, 252; as pro-northern, 535; reform themes in, 857; Republican party in, 980; and secession threat, 463-64, 484-85, 503, 601, 610, 612; Senate votes about, 537, 542; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 490-91; and slavery, 335-37, 385-86, 388-89, 412, 439, 459, 461-62, 464-65; and southern Democrats, 463-64, 474, 484-85, 494-97, 501, 517, 531; and Southern Rights, 484, 611; and southern Whigs, 464, 476, 482, 484-85, 495, 503, 517, 531, 542; and Taylor administration, 385, 386, 388-89, 412, 437, 438-39, 443-44, 449-51, 459, 461, 463, 472-76, 479, 482-84, 487, 489, 491, 496-98, 501-2; and Texas boundary dispute, 531, 533-36; and Utah, 437-39; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 488-89; and Wilmot Proviso, 385, 436, 459, 463. See also California-and election; specific person or state

California (continued)

California—and election: of 1849, 449–51; of 1850, 565, 569–70, 576, 581, 588; of 1851, 627, 629, 660; of 1852, 708, 713, 715, 719–20, 723, 738, 754, 756, 780–81; of 1853, 780–81, 799, 957; of 1854, 857–58; of 1856, 979–80

Call, Richard K., 854

Calvin, Samuel, 340, 578-79

Camden and Amboy Railroad, 53-54, 455, 573-74, 791

Cameron, Simon, 512, 886, 889, 917

Campbell, David, 181, 200, 250, 928

Campbell, James, 670–71, 696–97, 744, 745, 845, 880, 881

Campbell, Lewis D.: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 859, 863, 866; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 916; and Free Soilers, 340; and future of Whig party, 763, 827, 829–30; and House speakership, 923–24, 962–63; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 811, 827; and Know Nothings, 866, 916, 922, 929, 944; and Kossuth, 696; and southern Whigs, 962; and temperance, 782–83. See also Campbell, Lewis D.—and election

Campbell, Lewis D.—and election: of 1848, 296–97, 316, 322, 327–28, 340; of 1850, 571; of 1852, 696, 698, 701–3, 706, 709, 728, 737, 740, 752, 755, 763; of 1853, 782–83; of 1854–55, 829–30, 866, 944

Campbell, Robert, 590-91, 701

Campbell, William B.: and California statehood, 464; and Clay's senate return, 397; and Compromise of 1850, 630; and Henrymandering, 795; and Know Nothings, 856, 901; and Mexican War, 253; and New Mexico statehood, 464; retirement of, 770; and slavery, 464. See also Campbell, William B.—and election

Campbell, William B.—and election: of 1848, 355–56; of 1851, 628–30; of 1852, 679–80, 699, 728, 735, 754; of 1853–54, 794, 901

Canada, 97, 101, 604, 700, 739, 750

Canadian Americans, 185, 188, 204 canals, 76, 77, 80–81; and election of 1851, 647, 650– 55; and election of 1853, 788–90, 799. See also specific state

Canandaigua Circular (New York, 1854), 901, 904–5 Cannon, Newton D., 43, 56

Carey, Henry C., 738

Carlisle, John S., 974

Caroline (ship) incident, 97

Carroll, William, 43, 56

Carruthers, Samuel, 821, 850, 851

Casey, Joseph, 504

Cass, Lewis: and Clay, 543; and Committee of Thirteen, 495; and confirmation of Taylor's appointments, 506, 510–12; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 515–17, 543, 548; Democrats refuse to support, 609; and elections, 172; and expansionism, 350; and Fillmore, 515–17; and Free Soilers, 339–40, 342–44; and fugitive slaves, 496; and Kossuth, 693, 695; and Mexican War, 350; and New York politics, 515–17; and omnibus bill, 495–96, 506, 509, 511–13, 516; and patronage, 510–12, 515–17; and popular sovereignty, 475, 513; and slavery, 333–34, 338–44, 350–52, 356–60, 363; and southern Democrats, 495; and Taylor Plan, 485; and Texas annexation, 172; and Wilmot Proviso, 357–60, 485. See also election of 1848

Castle Garden (New York): Clay demonstration at, 301; Union party meeting at, 591–92, 606, 617–18, 637, 762

Catholics: and constituencies of political parties, 117–18; and demise of Whig party, 956–58; education of, 155, 779, 842, 845; evangelical Protestants antipathy to, 30; and expansion of Democratic party, 83; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 911; and future of Whig party, 775, 837; and Know Nothings, 845–50, 856; and Kossuth, 695–97; as more feared than slavery, 909; and nativism, 187–88, 190, 205; and northern Whigs, 837; and reassessment of Whig party, 206–7; and Republican party, 946, 948; and southern Whigs, 792; and temperance, 691, 696, 742; and Whig morality image, 188. See also Catholics—and election; Know Nothings; nativism

Catholics—and election: of 1844, 190, 192, 203–7, 275; of 1848, 276, 328; of 1849, 436; of 1851, 670–71; of 1852, 691, 695–97, 730, 741–48, 752–53, 756, 761, 775, 956, 958; of 1853, 779–80, 786–87, 792, 800, 803; of 1854, 837, 858, 880–84, 887–91,

897–900, 904, 957; of 1855, 921–22, 932, 934–35, 946, 948; of 1856, 965, 967

Causey, Peter F., 855

censure: of Adams, 156; of Foote, 615; of Giddings, 156; of Jackson, 24, 27, 32, 44, 54, 58, 149; of Taylor, 519

Chandler, Anson, 747, 762

Chandler, Joseph R., 784, 827, 829, 888, 969

Chapel, Absalom, 167

Chapman, Charles, 639, 832, 833

Chapman, John G., 713, 716

Charles, John O., 638, 918

Chase, Salmon P.: and confirmation of Taylor appointments, 459; and Free Soilers, 339, 398–401, 443; and Fugitive Slave Act, 570; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 815; and Know Nothings, 922; and Liberty party, 332, 568; and New Mexico, 570; and omnibus bill, 512; and patronage, 512; and slavery, 333, 339, 362. See also Chase, Salmon P.—and election

Chase, Salmon P.—and election: of 1848, 333, 339, 362; of 1849, 398–402; of 1850–51, 568–70, 572, 658; of 1852, 741; of 1853–55, 782, 868, 944

Chatfield, Levi, 655, 656

Choate, Rufus: appointed to Webster's seat, 149; and demise of Whig party, 959; and economy, 132; and elections, 341, 643, 644, 718–19, 721–22, 916, 959; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 916, 931; and Free Soilers, 341; and Fugitive Slave Act, 605; and Know Nothings, 916, 931; and patronage, 425; and slavery, 341; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 643–44. See also Choate, Rufus—and election

Choate, Rufus—and election: of 1848, 341; of 1851, 643–44; of 1852, 718–19, 721–22, 959; of 1855–56, 916, 970, 975

Christiana Riot (Pennsylvania, 1851), 670

Cincinnati, Ohio: and election of 1852, 743–44; nativism in, 228; northern Know Nothings meeting in, 942–45

Citizens Union Party, 805

Civil War, 124, 981-84

Clark, Bayard, 963

Clark, John C., 74, 432, 549, 651

Clark, Myron H.: and election of 1854, 898, 900–5, 907, 908; and election of 1855, 918, 948; and election of 1856, 970; and Republican party, 946, 948; and Seward's reelection, 918

Clarke, John H., 508, 535-36, 537, 556

Clawson, Isaiah, 876-77

Clay, Cassius M., 182–83, 458, 606–7, 630, 631, 773 Clay, Clement C., 926

Clay, Henry: and abolitionism, 156, 180–83; ambitions of, 20, 89, 123, 126–27, 280–81, 309, 330, 956; and American System, 2, 13, 15, 19, 46, 94, 447; and antimasonry, 13–14, 100; and banks, 5, 16–17, 27, 94, 100, 108, 129–32, 134, 161; biography of, 1; and California statehood, 484, 487, 497; character of, 185–86, 188–90, 196, 198, 202–3, 206, 275–76; commemorations of, 725; and Compromise of 1850, 543, 554, 557–58; and conservative Democrats, 98; and "Corrupt Bargain," 7, 15; death of, 725-26, 728, 763, 770; and demise of Whig party, 956, 982; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 486, 502, 543, 565-66; and economy, 3, 27, 123, 126-32, 134, 136, 161, 163, 165, 278, 458; as embodiment of Whig principles, 1, 188, 259, 286, 298, 312; and executive tyranny, 27-29; and expansionism, 278-79, 291; and Fillmore, 523-24, 529, 565-66; and Force Bill, 21; and Free Soilers, 458; and Frelinghuysen nomination, 189; and Fugitive Slave Act, 477, 497, 607; and future and viability of Whig party, 60-61, 207, 212, 459, 477; Hall's views on, 395; and Harrison administration, 41, 124-27, 397; and immigrants/Catholics, 212, 275-76; and Independent Treasury plan, 129; and internal improvements, 2, 5, 15, 94; and Jackson and Jacksonians, 10, 19, 23-24, 26-28, 33; as Jeffersonian Republican, 2; land revenues proposal of, 28, 41, 44, 54, 57, 60, 94, 108, 129, 136, 146, 161, 175; as lawyer, 284; as leader of Senate and Whigs, 459-60, 476-77, 504-5; legislative talent of, 236; as Lincoln role model, 288; and Mexican Cession, 458, 497; and Mexican War, 249, 276, 278-79, 283, 291, 312; motivations of, 477; and National Intelligencer, 415; as National Republican, 4, 261; and nativism, 191, 194, 207, 212, 275-76, 302, 318; and northern Whigs, 94-95, 394, 493; and nullification, 21, 125; Old Republicans as anti-, 4; and patronage, 127, 150, 419, 425-27, 458, 548; on Polk administration, 234, 243; on power of Whig party, 207; and principles of Whig party, 105, 161; on proposed name change for Whigs, 212; and religion, 275-76; and republicanism, 4, 10, 191; retirement of, 269, 275; and rise and expansion of Whig party, 27-28, 32, 34-35, 105; and Round Robin, 620-21; and secession, 477, 484; as secretary of state, 1, 7; Senate resignation of, 146, 632; Senate return of, 457-60; senatorial appointment of, 397-98; and slavery, 94-96, 99, 178, 183, 196, 266, 275-76, 278, 280, 313-15, 332, 338-39, 458, 477; and slavery in District of Columbia, 477, 497, 538; and southern Whigs, 27, 94, 96; as Speaker of House, 4; and state rights, 94; style/image of, 2, 4, 25-26, 127, 130, 291, 381, 476, 517, 558, 665; and tariffs, 5, 15, 21, 108, 125, 129, 146, 161, 167, 175, 184, 243, 264; and Taylor administration, 403-5, 409, 411, 412-13, 476-77, 487, 489, 495, 502; and Taylor Republicanism, 384, 408, 456; Taylor's relationship with, 277-78, 309, 316, 398, 456-60, 494, 497, 502-5, 508, 517, 519, 525; and Texas, 95-96, 126, 169, 171-72, 176-83, 186-87, 190, 195-96, 278, 477, 497, 518; and Tyler, 104, 123, 127-31, 134, 137-38, 140, 146-47, 161, 163, 165, 397, 457, 477; and Union party, 606-7, 620-21; on Van Buren's inauguration, 60; and voter fraud, 275; Webster compared with, 25-26; Webster's relationship with, 21, 26, 93, 97, 124, 125–27, 132, 137–38, 151, 198, 264, 397, 477–78, 680, 712; and Wilmot Proviso, 278, 280–82, 291, 314, 317, 458. See also Alabama Letters; Clay, Henry—and election; Clay, Henry—and election of 1848; Clay, Henry-and omnibus bill; 1210 INDEX

Clay, Henry (continued)

Clay Plan; election of 1844; Raleigh Letter; specific person

Clay, Henry—and election: of 1820s, 2, 5–7, 10; of 1832, 2, 12, 14–15, 17–18, 38, 45–46, 52; of 1834–35, 33, 35–36; of 1836, 1, 26, 39–41, 44; of 1840, 1, 88, 90–105, 108–9, 156; of 1841–43, 140, 154, 161; of 1846, 242; of 1849–51, 456, 477, 559, 565–66, 569, 575–76, 631–32, 649; of 1852, 672, 680, 712

Clay, Henry—and election of 1848: and campaign, 332, 338–39, 347–49, 352–55, 361, 363–65, 367; as candidate for nomination, 215, 259–60, 264–66, 269, 271–300, 309, 313, 318, 630–32; and criticisms of Clay, 381; and Democratic support, 323; and New York insurgency, 352–53, 361; Taylor repudiated by, 332, 347–48, 353, 355, 398, 755; as vice presidential candidate, 318–19

Clay, Henry—and omnibus bill: and apprehensions about Fillmore, 523; and Clay-Taylor relationship, 495; and Clay's influence, 504–5; and Committee of Thirteen, 495–96, 498; and election of 1848, 314; and frustration about deadlock, 517, 532; and introduction of bill, 487, 494, 530; and Mexican laws, 530; and Pearce's proviso, 531–32; and revision of Clay Plan, 499–501; and Texas boundary dispute, 531, 532; unraveling of, 531–32

Clay, James B., 398, 419, 425, 458, 476–77, 502, 936–37, 970

Clay Plan: and California, 479, 481-83; and Fillmore, 488; and fugitive slave law, 478-79, 482; and House speakership fight, 467, 470; and interstate slave trade, 478-79; introduction of, 478, 486; and Mexican laws, 479-83, 486; and northern Whigs, 478-79, 483; and omnibus bill, 460, 478, 480, 481-82, 486; and organization of territorial governments, 479-80, 482-83; and popular sovereignty, 486; provisions of, 477-82; and secession threat, 478; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 490-91; and slavery in District of Columbia, 478-79, 481; and southern Democrats, 479, 481-82; and Southern Rights, 481; and southern Whigs, 478-79, 482, 487, 494, 554; Taylor Plan compared with, 478-79, 482-83, 502; and Texas, 480-82, 486, 488; and Webster-Clay relationship, 477-78, 487; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 488-89, 493-94; and Wilmot Proviso, 479-83. See also omnibus bill

Clayton, John M.: and American party, 865, 884, 908; Benton compared with, 565; and Calhoun's third party efforts, 386; and California, 437–38, 565; and Clay, 397, 458, 476; and Compromise of 1850, 565; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 913; and Free Soilers, 335; and future of Whig party, 763, 824, 826, 884, 908; and Harrison, 41, 125; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 807, 814, 817–18, 826, 855; and Know Nothings, 855, 913; and launching of new sectional party, 824; and Mexican Cession, 388, 407, 412; and nativism, 191, 205, 855; and New Mexico, 438, 565; and omnibus bill, 495; and Oregon, 335; and patronage, 418–22, 424–29, 431–32, 457, 544, 565; and rise and expansion of Whig party, 35; role in Delaware politics of, 565–66; as secretary of state, 407–9, 411–13; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 490; and slavery, 266, 335–37, 386, 407; style of, 566; and Taylor Plan, 439, 487, 565; and Taylor Republicanism, 407–8, 411, 414–15, 421–22, 442, 444, 446, 456, 510, 575–76, 668, 968; and Taylor's cabinet, 409–13; and Taylor's message to Congress, 472; and Texas annexation, 218; and Wilmot Proviso, 320, 335, 407, 412, 436. See also Clayton, John M.—and election

Clayton, John M.—and election: of 1836, 41; of 1840, 104; of 1844, 175, 189, 190, 205; of 1845, 218; of 1848, 260, 262–64, 266, 300, 302, 310, 317, 320–25, 328, 335–37, 413; of 1850–51, 565–66, 575–76, 597, 671; of 1852, 665, 671, 699, 701–2, 712, 716, 728, 763

Clayton Compromise (1848), 335–38, 343, 357, 392, 462

Clemens, Jeremiah, 616, 621

Clifford, John, 754, 762, 786, 787, 931

Clinch, Duncan L., 220, 222, 286-87

Clingman, Thomas: ambitions of, 956; and California statehood, 464, 476, 484, 503; and Compromise of 1850, 561; and demise of Whig party, 956, 982; as Democratic supporter, 733, 736; and elections, 561, 626, 632–33, 704, 733, 736, 769; and little omnibus bill, 541; and Mexican Cession, 464, 476; and omnibus bill, 500–501, 503–4; and patronage, 424, 465; and Raleigh Clique, 391–93; and reapportionment, 391–92; and secession, 484; and slavery, 464; and Taylor Plan, 476; and Wilmot Proviso, 484

Clowes, Thomas, 514–15, 548–49, 584, 586, 600, 650–51

Cobb, Howell: and California statehood, 484, 538; and Compromise of 1850, 610; and Democrats' compromise plan, 486; and divisiveness among Georgia Democrats, 610; and elections, 449, 613–14, 616, 675, 677, 733, 797–98; and House speakership, 470–72, 484; and little omnibus bill, 539–40; and omnibus bill, 486, 509; and Round Robin, 621; and slavery, 386; and Southern Address, 470; and Southern Rights, 613; and Union party, 613, 617, 620–21, 675, 677, 733, 797; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 677

Colby, Anthony, 231, 639, 640

Cole, Orasmus, 379, 567

Coleman, Walter, 937

Colfax, Schuyler: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 842, 859, 929; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 916; and Free Soilers, 466, 559; and future of Whig party, 842; and Galphin scandal, 498; and House speakership, 923, 924; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 925; and Know Nothings, 864, 916, 921–25, 929; and Taylor cabinet, 411, 426, 456; and Taylor Plan, 466. See also Colfax, Schuyler—and election

Colfax, Schuyler—and election: of 1844, 162, 165; of 1850–51, 559, 662–63; of 1852, 700–702, 741, 743; of 1854–55, 864, 896, 916, 921

Collamer, Jacob, 391, 410–12, 421–23, 432, 442, 510, 872, 940

Collier, James, 294, 297

Collier, John A., 326, 329, 395, 430–32, 514–16, 544, 546, 651–52

Colton, Calvin, 69, 109, 120

Colton, George H., 207

Combs, Leslie, 199, 205, 218, 398, 456, 524, 687. See also Combs, Leslie—and election

Combs, Leslie—and election: of 1840, 103; of 1844, 194, 199, 205; of 1845, 218; of 1848, 299, 304–5, 318, 321, 326, 381; of 1849, 456; of 1851, 630, 793; of 1852, 687

Committee on Territories (U.S. House), 484, 486, 539, 820

Committee on Territories (U.S. Senate), 486–87, 494, 804–5

Committee of Thirteen: Foote's proposal for, 486–87, 494, 496; and omnibus bill, 486–87, 494, 496, 497; report of, 495–96, 503

Committee of the Whole (U.S. House), 539, 820 common law: applied to slavery, 540–41

Common Sense moral philosophy, 30, 31

Compromise of 1850: and blurring of party lines, 461, 508, 510-17, 542, 954; and Clay Plan, 460, 478, 480-82, 486; Clay proposes, 554, 557-58; and Clay-Taylor relationship, 460, 505, 508; and demise of Whig party, 955, 958, 974; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 543, 551, 565-66; and Fillmore, 543, 548, 551, 558-59, 617, 619, 633-34, 955, 974; and finality issue, 619, 633-34, 664, 676-81, 698-706, 712, 714, 716, 718, 767, 773, 798, 806, 811, 816, 823, 903; and future of Whig party, 633-34, 823, 843; impact on Whig party of, 543, 551-52; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 806-7, 809, 811-12, 816, 821; and national and state policies connection, 460; and northern Democrats, 554; and northern Whigs, 551, 553-54, 633-35, 819; and party conflict, 533; and patronage, 537, 539, 544-51, 555, 567, 579; and Scott, 667; and secession threat, 554, 601, 608, 612; and Southern Rights, 561; and southern Whigs, 546, 554, 633; as standard of Whig principles, 606; and Union party, 608, 613-14, 620-21; and Webster-Fillmore relationship, 635; and Whig party platform, 553-56; Whig repudiation of, 562. See also California; Compromise of 1850-and election; District of Columbia, slavery in; election of 1850; Fugitive Slave Act; little omnibus bill; New Mexico; omnibus bill; Round Robin; Utah

Compromise of 1850—and election: of 1850, 508, 533, 537, 550, 553, 567–68, 576–77, 583–96, 614; of 1851, 614–16, 622–23, 625–30, 632, 638–43, 645–48, 651, 653–55, 657, 661–64, 668, 672; of 1852, 551–52, 597, 633, 672–76, 680–84, 697–706, 708–9, 711–31, 737, 739, 748–50, 760, 762, 903, 958; of 1854, 863, 903

Compromise Tariff Act (1833), 20–21, 68, 94, 108, 125, 128, 130, 146, 148, 184

Congress, U.S.: Democratic control of, 800; Fillmore's messages to, 534–35, 546, 604–5, 617–20, 662, 680, 681, 775–76; Fillmore's relationship with, 525, 533;
Harrison's relationship with, 122; Jacksonian domination of, 10, 19; and Jackson's censure, 24, 27,

44, 54, 58, 149; Jackson's messages to, 11, 15; Johnson's relationship with, 124; Lincoln's relationship with, 124; Polk's messages to, 232, 256, 386; presidential relations with, 124; right to ban slavery of, 474–75, 479, 490; special sessions of, 65, 67, 126–27, 128–36, 148, 151; Taylor's messages to, 384, 466, 472, 474–77; Taylor's relationship with, 457, 461, 466; Taylor's views about, 361, 415; Tyler's messages to, 128, 146, 170; Tyler's relationship with, 123–24, 128–36, 140, 146–50, 163; Union party in, 616; Whig control of, 122; and Whig economic program, 127–36. See also House of Representatives, U.S.; Senate, U.S.; specific person, legislation, or committee

Conkling, Roscoe, 594

Connecticut: abolitionism in, 833; antimasonry in, 13, 37, 38, 46; and Compromise of 1850, 638-39, 690; conservatives in, 920; and expansionism, 175, 311-12; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 920-21; Free Soilers in, 341-42, 344, 366-67, 378, 398, 402, 435-37, 442, 556, 622, 639, 760-61, 778-79, 800, 832, 833, 921; and future of Whig party, 922; immigrants/Catholics in, 436, 691, 921; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 833; Know Nothings in, 920, 922; Liberty party in, 157; and Mexican Cession, 442, 557; and Mexican War, 244, 311-12; national versus state issues in, 52; nativism in, 229, 448; patronage in, 420, 423, 600; reapportionment in, 159, 163; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80; and tariffs, 225, 230, 244, 366; temperance in, 230, 690-91, 778-79, 800, 832-33, 921, 956; and Texas annexation, 225-26, 230; Union party in, 622, 638-39; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 638-39, 675; Whig organization in, 37, 38, 52, 230-31; Wilmot Proviso in, 436, 556. See also Connecticut—election in

Connecticut—election in: of 1830s, 17, 36, 38, 45, 46; of 1840, 100–103; of 1841–43, 148, 151, 154, 157, 159–60; of 1844, 167–68, 175, 288, 376; of 1845–47, 225, 230, 244, 288, 557; of 1848, 281, 288, 311–12, 320, 324–25, 341–42, 344, 366–68, 375–76, 378, 436; of 1849–51, 405, 436–37, 462, 556–57, 596, 600, 638–39, 672; of 1852, 675, 683–84, 690–91, 700, 707–8, 713, 715, 719–20, 751, 756, 760–61, 779; of 1853–55, 777–79, 800, 832, 920–21; of 1856, 980

Conrad, Charles M.: and elections, 625, 707, 727, 742, 745, 879–80, 903, 908, 969; and Fillmore's cabinet, 528; and future of Whig party, 879–80, 908; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 925–26; and Know Nothings, 926, 969; and omnibus bill, 528; as secretary of war, 625; and Texas boundary dispute, 519, 528 Conrad, Robert T., 847, 880, 883, 888

Conscience Whigs. See Young Whigs

conservative Democrats: as anti-Van Buren, 67–68, 88; and Calhounites, 71, 73, 88; and Clay, 98; and economy, 67–68; and elections, 68, 88, 98–99, 164, 187, 262, 272; and executive tyranny, 68; and expansion of Democratic party, 87; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 77–79; and Tyler, 164. See also specific person or state conservative Whigs: abandonment of Whig party by, 910; and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 861; and Anti-Rent movement, 241; and Clay, 488, 493-94; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 801; and executive tyranny, 28; and filling of Fillmore's New York seat, 395–96; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 910– 16, 919-20, 923; and Free Soilers, 334; and future of Whig party, 768, 774, 828-29; and Geddes Resolutions, 492-93; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 810-13, 816-18, 825-28, 924; and Know Nothings, 908, 910-17, 920, 922, 939-40; and Kossuth, 694; and launching of new sectional party, 828-29; and nativism, 229; and party loyalty, 348; and resurrection of Whig party, 960; and Seward, 493; and slavery, 334, 491-92; and Taylor Plan, 494; and Union party, 678; and Webster Plan, 488; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 678; and Wilmot Proviso, 462. See also conservative Whigs-and election; National Whigs; New York conservatives; Silver Grays conservative Whigs-and election: of 1840s, 239, 334, 348, 353, 453; of 1851, 669; of 1852, 678, 738, 761-62; of 1854-55, 861, 865, 871, 873, 908, 917, 919, 920; of 1856, 923, 967-71

Constitution, U.S.: and acquisition of foreign territory, 219-20; and Congress' right to ban slavery, 474, 475, 479, 490; loose/strict construction of, 2, 5, 11, 16, 128, 130; and omnibus bill, 499; and principles of Whig party, 121, 212; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 491; and slavery, 335, 337, 463-64, 474-75, 479, 499, 540, 712; and suffrage, 349; three-fifths clause of, 292; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 488

Constitutional Union party, 733 constitutions, state, 211, 687. See also specific state conventions, 31-32, 102, 103, 236, 292-93. See also specific party or election

Cook, James, 947

Coolidge, Carlos, 380, 451, 716

Cooper, James M.: and California, 535; and Committee of Thirteen, 495, 507; and Compromise of 1850, 665; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 549; and Fillmore, 528, 917; and Fugitive Slave Act, 664; and Johnston, 393-94, 506-7, 528, 573, 575-77, 579, 668, 670; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 819; and Know Nothings, 917; and New Mexico, 536, 537; and omnibus bill, 495, 504, 506-9, 512-13, 531, 535; and patronage, 416, 417, 420, 427-30, 433, 512-13, 544, 547, 549, 577, 666-68, 684; and Round Robin, 620; and secession, 507; and slavery in District of Columbia, 538; and southern Democrats, 495; successor to, 881; and Taylor administration, 409, 457, 458, 495, 506-7; and Texas boundary dispute, 531; and Union party, 620, 621; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675; and Wilmot Proviso, 537

Cooper, James M.-and election: of 1848, 393-94; of 1850, 573, 575-77, 579; of 1851, 666-70; of 1852, 675, 684, 738; of 1854-55, 881, 917

Cornell, George J., 587, 589, 590, 591, 592 Cornwell, William, 587-88

"Corrupt Bargain" (1825), 7, 15, 40 corruption, 6, 16, 24, 45, 111, 150, 219, 233, 547-48, 683. See also voter fraud

Corwin, Thomas: and abolitionism, 267; and demise of Whig party, 976; Ewing fills seat of, 527; and expansionism, 254, 255, 267; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 526, 527; and Free Soilers, 340; and future of Whig party, 910; and Gardiner claim, 683; and Know Nothings, 910; and Mexican Cession, 389, 527; and Mexican War, 249, 265-67, 283, 291, 294, 295; and omnibus bill, 512; and patronage, 420, 512, 546, 548, 583, 666, 668; political career of, 265; regrets joining cabinet, 569; and Republican party, 910, 976; and slavery, 254, 255, 266, 267, 274, 291, 315, 340; and Taylor administration, 405-6, 456, 526; and Texas boundary dispute, 534; as Treasury secretary, 527; and Wilmot Proviso, 254, 255, 312, 526, 527. See also Corwin, Thomas—and election

Corwin, Thomas-and election: of 1840, 108; of 1848, 255, 262, 263, 265-69, 274-75, 277, 282-83, 291, 294-97, 299-300, 311, 314-17, 321, 340, 362; of 1849-51, 456, 569, 645, 657-58, 671; of 1852, 683, 727; of 1856, 975-76

Craige, Burton, 934

Cravens, Joseph, 441

Crawford, George W.: and Calhoun's third party efforts, 268; and elections, 164-65, 223, 238, 559, 938; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 523, 525, 527; and Galphin Claim, 497-99, 502; as governor, 223; and Know Nothings, 938; and Mexican Cession, 412; and patronage, 421-22, 450; as secretary of war, 409, 411-13; and Taylor's cabinet, 404, 409, 411-13; and Texas boundary dispute, 519; and Wilmot Proviso, 412

Crawford, William H., 4, 5-6, 7

Crittenden, John J.: as attorney general, 125, 527; and banks, 133–34; and California, 388, 389, 438, 443; and Clay, 126, 397-98, 502, 631-32; and expansionism, 255; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 525, 527, 528; and Fugitive Slave Act, 604; as governor, 304-5; and House speakership fight, 468; as influence on Taylor, 406, 407, 409; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 814, 821; and Know Nothings, 936, 937; legislative talent of, 236; and Mexican Cession, 388, 389, 407, 437, 443; and need for Whig action in 1841, 122-23; and New Mexico, 438; and omnibus bill, 503; and patronage, 418-22, 424, 425, 427; and Republic, 415; reputation of, 528, 630; and slavery, 255, 266, 274, 353, 386, 389, 407, 459; and special session of Congress, 126; and Taylor administration, 386, 388, 389, 437, 439, 443, 487, 503; and Taylor Republicanism, 408, 414, 444, 446; and Taylor's cabinet, 394, 403-7, 409, 410, 413; and Texas annexation, 169, 172, 177, 180; and Tvler-Congress relationship, 133-35, 147; and Union party, 607; and Wilmot Proviso, 255, 312, 389, 407. See also Crittenden, John J.-and election

Crittenden, John J.-and election: of 1836, 39; of 1840, 93; of 1844, 147, 164, 180; of 1848, 255, 260, 262-64, 266, 269-72, 274, 277-78, 285, 304-5, 308, 312, 321, 324, 353-54, 363, 413, 630-32; of 1851,

631–32, 671; of 1852, 681, 707, 712, 723–24, 727, 740; of 1855, 936–37

Crosby, William G., 747, 769, 783–85, 872–73, 875 Crosswell, Edwin, 516

Cuba, 602-3, 739, 776

Cullen, Elisha D., 855, 878

Cullom, William: and elections, 693, 698, 702, 705, 734–35, 795, 932, 937; and future of Whig party, 765, 827–28, 833; and House clerkship, 962–63; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 821, 827, 828, 833–34; and Know Nothings, 923, 932, 937; and northern Whigs, 962; presidential ambitions of, 923

Curtin, Andrew, 578-79, 883, 889, 917

Curtis, Edward, 125, 126, 138, 299, 425

Curtis, George R., 733

Cushing, Caleb, 149, 150, 509, 546, 641, 642, 644, 786, 787, 800

customs collectors, 416, 417, 421, 423, 429, 430, 432, 446, 448

Dallas, George M., 172-73, 182, 199, 386

Dana, Charles A., 724, 753, 931

Darragh, Cornelius, 394, 427-29

Darsie, George S., 884, 885

Davis, David, 374, 828, 893

Davis, Garrett, 866, 916, 923, 924, 929

Davis, George, 582, 583

Davis, Isaac R., 427, 429, 446, 447

Davis, Jefferson: and California statehood, 481; and Clay Plan, 481; and Compromise of 1850, 616; and elections, 449, 616, 797; and little omnibus bill, 541; and Mexican Cession, 481, 540; and omnibus bill, 530; as secretary of war, 776; and slavery in District of Columbia, 481; and Southern Rights, 481; and Taylor's cabinet, 409; and Texas boundary dispute, 481

Davis, John: and California statehood, 539; and Mexican Cession, 539; and New Mexico, 536; and omnibus bill, 506; and organization of territorial governments, 539; and tariffs, 243; and Texas issues, 22, 226, 227, 535–36, 539, 582; and Tyler administration, 150; as Webster rival, 226. See also Davis, John—and election

Davis, John—and election: of 1840s, 161, 189, 190, 237, 243, 341; of 1850s, 582, 583, 662, 663, 700, 755–76

Dawson, William C.: Berrien's relationship with, 286; and Democrat-Whig alliance, 516; and elections, 286, 613, 704, 707, 716, 733, 937–38; and House speakership fight, 468; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 808, 819; and Know Nothings, 937–38; and omnibus bill, 495, 516, 530–31; and patronage, 421; and Round Robin, 621; and Taylor administration, 421, 457, 468, 495; and Texas boundary dispute, 530–31, 534; and Union party, 613, 621

Dayton, William L., 397, 537, 573, 574, 709

De Witt, Alexander, 892

debt, national: and elections, 139–40, 177, 339, 350, 685; and Harrison administration, 126; and Mexican War, 248; and Taylor administration, 415, 447, 448; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 135, 148; Tyler's views about, 128, 146; and Whig economic program, 126, 128, 135

Defrees, John D.: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 842, 860, 864, 865; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 916; and future of Whig party, 842; and Know Nothings, 865, 916; and patronage, 418; and People's party, 863; and Taylor's cabinet, 406, 426. See also Defrees, John D.—and election

Defrees, John D.—and election: of 1848, 294, 305–6, 308, 312, 316; of 1849, 441; of 1851, 662; of 1852, 700, 701; of 1854–55, 860, 863, 864, 865, 916

Delano, Columbus, 251, 252, 274, 294–97, 340, 443 Delaware, 34–35, 52, 200, 509, 565–66, 761, 854–55. See also Delaware—election in; specific person

Delaware—election in: of 1820s, 8, 9; of 1830s, 17, 45, 52, 98; of 1840s, 101–2, 197–98, 200, 238, 323, 368; of 1850, 564–66, 596; of 1852, 699, 707, 713, 715, 719, 720, 734, 737, 747, 754, 756, 757, 760, 761; of 1854, 850, 854–55, 877

Delaware and Raritan Canal, 53-54, 455, 573

Dellet, James, 220, 221

Democratic party: anti-Jacksonians in, 46, 50; anti-Van Burenites in, 150, 164, 172, 173-74, 175; and Compromise of 1850, 621; constituencies of, 115-19; decline of, 838, 889; and Democrats as Free Soilers, 338, 341-43, 384; and Democrats as Know Nothings, 856-57, 905, 907, 914-16, 927, 938-39; and Democrats for Taylor, 346-47, 351, 354, 355; expansion of, 83-87, 196-98, 200; future of, 800-804, 806, 838; ideology of, 64-70; and Know Nothings, 856-57, 905, 907; and nonpartisanism of Taylor, 413; as obsolete, 912; principles of, 163-64; as shapers of Whig party, 310, 384, 556, 765, 796, 894, 953, 955, 965-66; and Southern Rights, 614; and Taylor administration, 270, 406-7; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 147, 150; Tyler's courtship of, 150, 151, 160, 161, 164, 174-75; and Union party, 621; Whig alliance with, 543-52. See also conservative Democrats; northern Democrats; southern Democrats; specific person or topic

Deposit Act (1836), 60, 65

depressions, financial, 4, 69, 83-84, 235, 446

Derbigny, Charles, 933

Dew, Thomas R., 128

Dickinson, Andrew Bray, 587, 716

Dickinson, Daniel S.: and Barnburners, 485; and Committee of Thirteen, 495; and Compromise of 1850, 543; and confirmation of Taylor's appointments, 506, 510, 511, 514–17; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 514–17, 543, 547, 548, 550, 618, 802–3; and Fillmore, 514–17; and Geddes Resolutions, 494; and omnibus bill, 494, 495, 506, 509, 511–13, 516; and patronage, 433, 510–17, 547, 548; and popular sovereignty, 485, 494, 512, 513; and southern Democrats, 495; and Taylor Plan, 485; and Webster, 543, 547, 645, 646; and Wilmot Proviso, 485. See also Dickinson, Daniel S.—and election

Dickinson, Daniel S.—and election: of 1848, 335; of 1850, 584, 592, 593, 595; of 1851, 514, 618, 633, 645, 646; of 1853–54, 787, 894

Dickinson, Edward, 827, 829 Dinsmoor, Samuel, 640

District of Columbia, slavery in: and abolitionism, 43, 44, 61, 155, 182–83, 358; and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 861; and Clay Plan, 478–79, 481; Fillmore's views about, 533; and Free Soilers, 344; and House speakership fight, 467–68, 471; House vote about, 543; and Know Nothings, 930; and launching of new sectional party, 828; and Nashville Convention, 463; and New York politics, 492; and northern Whigs, 538; and omnibus bill, 481, 497, 499; and secession threat, 463, 601; Senate vote on, 537–38; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 490; and southern Democrats, 479, 497, 538; and Taylor administration, 385, 388, 477, 492; and Union party, 614. See also District of Columbia, slavery in—and election

District of Columbia, slavery in—and election: of 1840, 95, 96; of 1844, 182–83; of 1848, 339, 344, 358; of 1849–51, 441, 442, 566, 570, 614, 629, 658; of 1854, 861, 862, 874

Dix, John A., 363, 379

Dixon, Archibald: ambitions of, 956; and Clay's resignation, 632; and demise of Whig party, 956; as Democrat, 970; and future of Whig party, 826; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 808–9, 810, 813, 814, 819; and Know Nothings, 936, 937; replaces Clay in congress, 632. See also Dixon, Archibald—and election

Dixon, Archibald—and election: of 1848, 304; of 1851, 630–32, 795; of 1852, 760; of 1854–55, 809, 936, 937; of 1856, 970

Dixon, Nathan, 638

Dobbin, James, 769

Dockery, Alfred, 244, 705, 795, 852-53

Dodge, Augustus, 495, 804, 868

Dodge, Henry, 334

Donelson, Andrew Jackson, 969, 977

Dorr, Thomas, 230, 259, 283, 312, 330

Doty, James, 483-84, 486, 567

Douglas, Stephen A.: and California statehood, 385, 386, 388, 389, 494, 499, 503, 533; and Committee of Thirteen, 495; and Compromise of 1850, 532, 566; and Democrat-Whig alliance, 516; and elections, 566, 693, 695, 965; and Free Soilers, 385; and future of Democratic party, 800-803, 806; and Kossuth, 693, 695; and Mexican Cession, 485; and New Mexico, 494, 499, 533, 534; and omnibus bill, 486, 494, 495, 499, 508, 509, 511, 513, 516, 532; and organization of territorial governments, 806; and patronage, 511, 516; and popular sovereignty, 485, 494, 513, 806-7; and southern Democrats, 495; and Taylor Plan, 485; and Texas boundary dispute, 533, 534; and Union party, 621; and unraveling of omnibus bill, 532; and Utah, 494, 499; and Wilmot Proviso, 485. See also Kansas-Nebraska Act

Dow, Neal, 873

Dowling, Thomas, 284, 321 Downs, Solomon, 481, 495, 510, 511, 617, 625 Dox, John L., 491, 492, 900 Draper, Simeon, 299, 431, 694, 710, 719, 723, 740, 748, 749, 764

Duer, William: and elections, 586–95, 648–49, 651; and Fugitive Slave Act, 543; and House speakership fight, 471; and little omnibus bill, 542; and Mexican War, 311; and patronage, 651; and Round Robin, 620; and Texas boundary dispute, 539; and Union party, 620

Duncan, Garnett, 322, 324 Duncan, James, 542, 582, 583 Duncan, T.B., 714, 715, 716 Dunn, George, 289, 308, 345, 441, 864 Durfee, Nathaniel, 919 Durkee, Charles, 567, 860, 878 Dutton, Henry, 778, 779, 832, 921

Eaton, John H., 6 Eaton, Peggy, 11

economy: and anti-Jacksonians, 24-25; and blurring of party lines, 955; and conservative Democrats, 67-68; and constituencies of political parties, 116; and demise of Whig party, 954, 955; and Democrats, 69, 83-87; and divisions with Whig party, 28; as factor in agendas of 1830s, 61; and Fillmore, 687; and future of Whig party, 208, 211; and Harrison administration, 126-27; and immigrants, 805; and Jeffersonian Republicans, 2, 4; and Know Nothings, 805; Meredith plan for, 446-49, 458, 472, 473-74; and northern Whigs, 688; and party differences, 245-47; and philosophies of political parties, 65; and Polk administration, 175, 233-37, 245-47, 954; and principles of Whig party, 105, 113; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 76-81; and republicanism, 3; and rise and expansion of Whig party, 64, 87-88, 954, 955; and role of government, 66, 69-70, 952; and state constitutions, 687; and Taylor administration, 272, 415, 446–49, 458, 472-74; and Texas annexation, 178-79; and Tyler administration, 128, 130, 165; voting patterns according to, 118, 119; and Whig control of Congress, 122-23; and Whig unity, 161; Whigs' views about, 67, 69–70, 127–36. See also American system; banks; depressions, financial; economyand election; monetary policies; panics; speculation economy—and election: of 1830s, 55, 71, 73, 76, 79-80, 83-87, 98; of 1840, 79-80, 83-87, 90-92, 94, 103, 105, 107-9, 112, 332; of 1841, 139, 155; of 1844, 165–67, 172, 175, 178–79, 184, 185, 187, 190, 203; of 1846–47, 239, 245, 247, 262, 264; of 1848, 269, 272, 278, 287, 312, 329, 350, 356, 362-68, 372, 376, 684; of 1849, 441, 443, 452, 454; of 1851, 619, 659, 669; of 1852, 673, 684–88, 726, 738; of 1853, 789-91

Edney, B.M., 424, 720-21

education/schools, 155, 362, 779, 842, 845, 880, 881 election: of 1824, 2, 4–8; of 1826–27, 8; of 1828, 7–9, 11–12, 107, 261; of 1830, 11; of 1831, 11–12; of 1832, 2, 11–18, 20, 45–46, 211; of 1834, 33–38, 50, 56; of 1835, 35–37, 42, 49–50, 52, 56, 58; of 1837, 64, 67, 71, 75–76, 91, 124; of 1838, 49, 67, 71, 73, election of 1836: and anti-Jacksonians, 26; election of 1848 compared with, 332; and expansion of Democratic party, 84; issues versus personality in, 90; and political realignments, 45–49; results of, 45–49; and rise and expansion of Whig party, 38–45, 113, 953; and slavery, 55–58; and state offices, 48; and state party development, 49–50, 52; voter turnout for, 45–46, 58, 75–76, 112; Whig candidates in, 38–45; Whig strategy for, 33. See also specific person, state, section of country, or issue election of 1840: campaign in, 105-11; and conservative Democrats, 68, 98, 99; election of 1848 compared with, 332, 368; and future of Whig party, 208; and Harrison's one-term pledge, 110; and liberty, 110, 111; as measure of Whig strength, 174; as non-issue election, 90, 332; and political realignments, 71, 88; and principles of Whig party, 121; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 79-80; results in, 111-13; and rise and expansion of Whig party, 87-88, 113, 953; and role of government, 110, 112; slogans and songs in, 89, 104-6, 108-9, 111-13, 190; and South, 94, 101, 103, 105, 111; and southern Whigs, 94, 96, 104, 109-10; state and congressional, 90, 112-13; and two-party system, 109; Van Buren nominated in, 103; voter turnout in, 75-76, 90, 112-13, 165, 196, 332; Webster withdraws from, 100; Whig convention for, 88-90, 92-93, 101-5; Whig nominations for, 90-93; Whig strategy for, 88, 104-5; women at rallies for, 177, 188. See also specific person, state, section of country, or issue election of 1844: Clay nominated in, 172, 259; and Clay's reputation, 185–86, 188–90, 196, 198, 202–3, 206, 275; and demise of Whig party, 954, 974; Democratic convention for, 164, 172–73; Democratic platform and strategy for, 173, 196; election of 1848 compared with, 368–76; and expansion of Whig party, 113; Fillmore's views about, 974; and future of Whig party, 1, 208–13; and Harrison's one-term pledge, 124; as indication of Whig strength, 213; issues versus candidate in, 259, 332; new voters in, 196–98, 200–201, 203; and party differences, 120, 161, 165-66, 168, 175-76, 183-84, 196, 199, 359, 954; and party loyalty, 195, 199; Polk nominated for, 164, 172-73; and principles of Whig party, 161, 165; results and analysis of, 194-207; and southern Democrats, 171-72, 178, 184, 199; and southern Whigs, 166, 176-83, 189-90, 199; state and congressional, 165-68, 181-82, 206; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 132, 147, 149; and Tyler's endorsement of Polk, 175; Tyler's withdrawal from, 174-75, 192, 205; vice presidential candidates for, 188-90, 205-6; voter fraud in, 198-99, 202-7, 228, 275; voter turnout for, 174-75, 196, 215, 332, 368-69, 372-76, 378-81; as watershed election, 195; Whig convention for, 163, 172; Whig optimism about, 162-68, 173, 176, 178, 194; Whig platform for, 172; Whig strategy for, 165, 175-76, 179-80; women at rallies for, 177, 188. See also specific person, state, section of country, or issue election of 1848: abandonment of issues in, 326; and Calhoun's third party efforts, 268, 270, 281; candidates for, 209, 211, 215, 247, 260-330; Clay as independent candidate in, 352-53; Clay repudiates ticket in, 332, 347-48, 355; Clay's character as issue in, 275-76; and comeback of Whig party, 208-11; and demise of Whig party, 954; Democratic convention for, 319, 334; Democrats for Taylor in, 346-47, 351, 354-55; elections compared with, 332, 368-76, 572-73, 674, 684; and expansion of Whig party, 113; and expansionism, 286, 291, 296, 308, 311–12, 327; and future of Whig party, 208; impact on Whig party of, 326, 330; and national debt, 339, 350; and national versus state issues, 398-402; and new voters, 373; as no-issue election, 332, 354-55, 365; and northern Whigs, 674; and party differences, 257-58, 342, 349-50, 356; and party loyalty, 298, 340, 348-49; and Polk's record, 372, 376; and principles of Whig party, 209, 326-27, 360-61, 381-82; reasons for voting in, 417; and reassessment of Whig party, 207; results and analysis of, 331, 368-82, 383, 455; and southern Democrats, 281, 337, 371; and southern Whigs, 266-69, 274, 278, 280-82, 337-38, 345-46, 356-60, 370-72, 387; state and congressional, 208, 354-56, 359-60, 361-65; state conventions for, 292-307; and Taylor as military hero, 356, 365; and temperance, 362; and third party efforts, 321, 327, 332, 352; and vetoes, 350-51, 372, 381; vice presidential nominations for, 320, 326-29; voter mobilization in, 312, 330, 332, 356-68; voter turnout in, 332, 360, 368-76, 378-81; Whig campaign as two-faced in, 332, 343, 357; Whig convention for, 215, 271, 277, 280, 284-85, 288-93, 297, 301, 319, 320-30, 332, 334, 347-48, 365, 425, 427; Whig platform in, 208, 329. See also specific person, state, section of country, or issue election of 1850: and blurring of lines among parties in, 537, 577; and Clay-Taylor relationship, 508; election of 1850: and blurring of lines among parties in, 537, 577; and Clay-Taylor relationship, 508; election of 1848 compared with, 572–73; Fillmore blamed for losses in, 598; and Fillmore's impact on Whig party, 522; Fillmore's role in, 577, 584–85;

75-78, 98, 124, 155; of 1839, 49, 67, 71, 73, 75-76, 93, 124, 155; of 1841, 123-24, 139-40, 154-55, 160-61, 165, 199-200, 953; of 1842, 123-24, 146, 148, 150-51, 154-56, 160-61, 163, 165, 199-200, 953; of 1843, 123-24, 146, 150-51, 156, 160-63, 165, 199-202, 953; of 1845, 213-14, 218-26, 228-31, 238-39, 244, 262, 557; of 1846, 208, 213-14, 222, 236-45, 251-52, 257, 259, 262-64, 275, 287-88, 619, 954; of 1847, 208, 213-14, 222, 238-39, 243-45, 252, 257, 259, 263, 275, 288, 455, 557, 673, 954; of 1849, 388, 390, 414, 417, 422-24, 435-37, 439-43, 445-46, 449-57, 459, 461, 463, 955; of 1853, 766-69, 777-78, 791-92; of 1860, 980-81; of 1866, 124; as contests of principles, 283; debates in, 120; and economy, 71, 73, 76, 83-87; importance of, 349; and property restrictions, 8; sports analogy for, 119-20; Whig strategies and tactics in, 113. See also specific candidate, state, or issue

election of 1850 (continued)

impact on election of 1852 of, 596–97, 673–75; impact on Whig party of, 596–97; and internal struggle for control of Whig party, 555–56; national versus state issues in, 574–75; nominating conventions for, 549–51; and northern Democrats, 556; and northern Whigs, 554–55, 596, 598; and partisan realignments, 554–55; and patronage, 545, 549–51, 558, 561, 563, 565–67, 577, 579–80, 583–84, 589–90, 595–96; and preservation of Whig party, 555; and reapportionment, 609–10; results of, 556, 563, 568, 596; and Southern Rights, 564; and southern Whigs, 596–97; Whig platform for, 555–56. See also specific person, state, section of country, or issue election of 1851: and Fillmore's impact on Whig party, 522; and future of Whig party, 667, 672; impact on election of 1852 of, 661, 671–75; impact on Whigs of, 632–33; and northern Whigs, 554–55, 633, 671–72; and patronage, 646, 650–51; and political realignments, 614; and preservation of Whig party, 555; and southern Whigs, 622, 633, 671–72; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 636, 637–72; Whig platform for, 555–56. See also specific person, state, section of country, or issue election of 1852: attempts to unify Whigs during, 728, 729; blurring of party lines in, 674, 688; campaign for, 727-51; caucuses for, 702-5, 707, 713; character and reputation as issue in, 683, 726, 730-32, 737, 742; delegates for, 706-14, 716; and demise of Whig party, 956, 958; Democratic convention and platform for, 712, 739, 806, 811; elections compared with, 674, 684, 978-80; Ewing's nomination in, 426; and expansion of Whig party, 113; and finality issue, 676-81, 698-706, 712, 714, 716, 718, 806, 811, 903; Free Soiler convention for, 741; and future of Whig party, 674, 763-64; Hale as candidate in, 730, 741, 758, 761, 762; impact of election of 1850 on, 596-97; impact of election of 1851 on, 661, 671-75; and internal struggle for control of Whig party, 555-56; issues in, 684-88, 689-92, 697-706; and Jessup amendment, 714-17; national committee for, 728, 745-46, 751; national convention for, 551-53, 703-25; and Niagara Falls rally, 739-40; and northern Whigs, 674-76, 678-79, 681-84, 689, 697, 699-702, 704-5, 708, 711, 719, 726-27, 737-39, 741-51, 761; Pierce nominated for, 712, 730; platform for, 680-81, 683, 700, 705-6, 711-19, 723-24, 726-30, 732, 737-38, 744, 747, 750, 755, 761, 811, 814; results and analysis of, 752-60, 766; and Scott convention letter, 702, 705-6, 711-12, 714, 718-19, 723, 725; Scott organization for, 697-701, 704, 710, 712; Scott tours during, 742, 745-46; and Scott-Jones letter, 728, 737; and Scott's acceptance letter, 718-19, 723-25, 728-30, 732, 734, 743, 745; Scott's nomination fight in, 597, 634, 656, 661-62, 665-69, 671-72, 682-84; Seward as possible candidate in, 328; and Seward-Scott relationship, 682, 698, 728, 732; southern bolters in, 704-7; and southern Democrats, 726, 732; and southern manifesto, 705, 709; and Southern Rights, 735, 756; and southern Whigs, 636, 674–78, 680–82, 697–703, 705, 711, 724–25, 727–28, 730–37; state and congressional, 747–53, 775; and Union party, 674–79; vice presidential candidates for, 702, 712, 723–24, 730; voter turnout for, 726–27, 758–62; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 636, 637–72. See also Webster, Daniel—and election of 1852; specific person, state, or issue election of 1852—and Fillmore: and Baltimore convention, 713, 715, 720–22; and delegate selection, 708–10; early support for, 555, 598, 599, 630, 663, 665–67, 671, 672; and Fillmore's cabinet, 637; and Fillmore's impact on Whig party, 522; and Fillmore's support for Scott, 727, 728; and Fillmore's withdrawal, 680–82, 697–98, 711–12, 721–22; and patronage, 661; and Scott campaign, 730, 738, 742, 745, 749, 750, 755; and southern Whigs, 680, 699, 703, 705–7; and Union party, 675–77; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 676–77 election of 1854: and demise of Whig party, 957, 959; factors affecting, 838–41; and Fillmore, 903, 905; and future of Whig party, 825, 830, 835, 837–41, 877–78, 907–8; impact of, 910, 912; and Know Nothings, 835; in New England, 830–34; and northern Whigs, 836, 837, 841, 844–45, 857; results of, 877–78; and southern Whigs, 838, 871, 872, 875, 877, 879, 880, 907–8 election of 1855: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 915; and demise of Whig party, 959; and election of 1856, 910, 921–22; and elitism of Whigs, 959; factors affecting, 838–41; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 909–21; and future of Whig party, 838–41; and northern Democrats, 915; and southern Whigs, 916, 919, 922, 925, 933–34 election of 1856: Buchanan's nomination in, 965-66; and caning of Sumner, 966, 976, 978; competition for Know Nothings' nomination in, 913-14; and demise of Whig party, 950, 959-60, 968, 971-72, 980; Democratic-Whig alliance in, 970-71, 975, 978; election of 1852 compared with, 978-80; and elections of 1854-55, 910, 921-22; Fillmore nomination in, 963-65; Fillmore's letter of acceptance for, 965; Frémont's nomination in, 966–67; and future of Whig party, 822; and Kansas, 973, 975, 976, 978; and Know Nothings, 898–99, 908; and political realignments, 838; and quiescent policy, 765; results of, 978-81; Seward as possible candidate in, 681; and southern Whigs, 969, 979; vice presidential nominations in, 968; Whig convention for, 866, 960-61, 971-72, 976-78; Whig dilemma in, 967-72. See also Buchanan, James; election of 1856 and Fillmore; Frémont, John election of 1856—and Fillmore: and American party nomination, 963–65; and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 922–23; and campaign, 972–76; and demise of Whig party, 961; and Donelson as running mate, 968; early supporters for, 824, 828, 829; and election of 1855, 919–21; and Fillmore's ambitions, 801–2, 813; and Fillmore's commitment to Know

Nothings, 974; and Fillmore's European tour, 913; and Know Nothings, 898–99, 909–15, 919–21, 922–23; and letter of acceptance, 965, 967; and new national party, 879; and Newton letter, 965; and northern conservatives, 828; as possible candidate, 893; and results of election, 978–81; and resurrection of Whig party, 960; and Silver Grays, 904; and southern Whigs, 829, 914–15, 922–23, 979; and southerners, 912–13; Whig views about, 967–71, 972, 973, 974–78

Eliot, Samuel, 542, 581, 620, 642, 643, 678, 956 Eliot, Thomas D., 827, 829, 892

elitism of Whiggery, 951-52, 958-59, 961, 968, 975, 977-78

Ellis, Vesparian, 927, 928, 968

Ells, Marcellus, 899

Ellsworth, William, 229

Emancipationist party (Kentucky), 631

Embree, Elisha, 316, 441

England. See Great Britain

equality/equal rights, 3–4, 5, 12–13, 14, 67, 69–70, 562

Erie Canal, 62, 166, 592, 647, 651-52

Errett, Russell, 830, 882-84, 943

Etheridge, Emerson, 795, 821, 827, 828, 833, 937 ethnicity, 36, 37, 43, 83, 117–19, 203, 204, 206, 207. See also German Americans; Irish Americans; nativism evangelical Protestants, 13, 30–31, 117, 185–87, 742 Evans, George, 132, 189, 404, 410, 411, 560, 561, 710, 717

Everett, Alexander, 15, 18

Everett, Edward: and Austrian matter, 600; and demise of Whig party, 959, 975; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 910, 912, 915, 931; and Free Soilers, 341; and future of Whig party, 151, 828, 834, 890–92, 908, 910–11; as Harvard president, 261; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 807, 816–17, 819, 828, 834; and Know Nothings, 891–92, 910–12, 915, 931, 939, 968; as minister to England, 151, 170; and Republican party, 910; resignation of, 817, 828, 853; and Seward, 939; successor to, 891, 917; and temperance, 82; and Tyler, 170; and Union party, 911; and Webster, 261, 525, 549, 581, 641. See also Everett, Edward—and election

Everett, Edward—and election: of 1848, 315, 341; of 1850–52, 549, 581, 641, 681; of 1853–55, 770, 787, 908, 941; of 1856, 967–68, 975–76

Ewing, Presley, 821

Ewing, Thomas: and appointment to Allen's senate seat, 400, 401; and bank amendment, 129, 131–34; and California statehood, 501, 535, 570; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 975; and Fillmore, 522, 525; and Free Soilers, 340, 344–45, 443, 828; and Fugitive Slave Act, 570; and future of Whig party, 828–29; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 828; and Mexican Cession, 412, 435, 443; named to Corwin's seat, 527; and nativism, 205–6; and New Mexico, 537, 570; and omnibus bill, 501, 512; and patronage, 420–21, 423, 425–26, 428, 430, 457, 512, 546; presidential ambitions of, 828; retirement of, 770;

as secretary of treasury, 125; and slavery in District of Columbia, 570; and special session of Congress, 127; and Taylor administration, 405–6, 409–13, 621; and Texas boundary dispute, 536, 570; and Union party, 621; and Utah, 570; and Wilmot Proviso, 412, 435, 440, 443. See also Ewing, Thomas—and election

Ewing, Thomas—and election: of 1844, 164, 205–6; of 1848, 294, 296–97, 307, 328, 340, 344–45, 362, 413; of 1849–51, 441–43, 452, 568, 570, 657–59; of 1852, 426, 752; of 1856, 828, 975

executive tyranny: and banks, 17, 27; and conservative Democrats, 68; Democrats' views about, 69; Harrison's views about, 41; of Jackson, 24–30, 38–39, 41, 44–46, 55, 137, 952; of Polk, 234, 350, 376; and principles of Whig party, 27–30, 49, 60, 67, 69, 110, 952; and rise and expansion of Whig party, 27–30, 35, 46; and state party development, 50; of Tyler, 130, 135, 137–38, 166; of Van Buren, 67, 109; and Whig control of government, 122. See also executive tyranny—and election executive tyranny—and election: of 1830s, 38–39, 41, 44–45, 55–56; of 1840s, 109–10, 166, 172, 347, 350–51, 363, 372

expansionism: and Mexican War, 248–57, 291; and nativism, 250; and northern Whigs, 335; and Pierce administration, 776; and Polk administration, 232–33, 248–50, 291; and popular sovereignty, 319; and principles of Whig party, 952; and republicanism, 250; and slavery, 250–55, 257; and southern Whigs, 311; Taylor's views about, 308; and Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, 310–11. See also expansionism—and election; Oregon; Texas, annexation of; specific person expansionism—and election: of 1844, 174–76, 184–85, 203, 360; of 1847, 244, 247; of 1848, 255, 266–67, 275, 278–80, 283, 286, 291, 296, 308, 311–12, 327, 335, 350, 376; of 1852, 739

Fairbanks, Erastus, 747, 785, 871

Farley, E. Wilder, 827, 873, 874–75 farmers. See Agriculture/farmers

Farwell, Leonard, 567, 781

Faulkner, Charles J., 622, 732

Federalists, 2, 7, 43, 233, 299, 404
Fessenden, William Pitt, 341, 524, 785, 826, 834, 872–
73. See also Fessenden, William Pitt—and election
Fessenden, William Pitt—and election: of 1848, 315;

of 1850, 560–61; of 1852, 710, 716, 753; of 1853– 54, 769, 784–85, 872–75

filibusterers, 602-3, 693, 739, 776

Fillmore, Millard: apprehensions about, 521–24, 544, 558; ascension to power of, 521; as comptroller, 396; Congress' relationship with, 525, 533; as congressman, 99, 147; and demise of Whig party, 956, 974, 983; European tour of, 913, 915, 931; and future of Whig party, 763–64, 824–25, 827–29, 835; and generational differences among Whigs, 397; goals of, 598–99, 606–7, 633–34; messages to congress of, 534–35, 546, 604, 617–20, 662, 680–81, 775–76; party harmony as priority of, 524, 526–29,

Fillmore, Millard (continued)

545, 547–48, 550–51, 584, 633–34; prediction about Civil War of, 981; problems facing, 599–600, 617–18; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 78; Senate messages of, 605; southern tour of, 802, 824, 854; and special session of Congress, 126; strategy of, 599, 60–3; style/image of, 431–32, 521–22, 527, 545–46, 635; Tyler compared with, 521–23, 553, 572; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 135. See also election of 1852—and Fillmore; election of 1856—and Fillmore; Fillmore, Millard—and election; specific person or topic

Fillmore, Millard—and election: of 1838, 78; of 1840, 99; of 1844, 186–87, 189–90, 193–95, 203, 205; of 1846, 242; of 1848, 299, 315–16, 325–26, 328–30, 336, 341, 344, 346, 348, 351–53, 357–58, 361, 366; of 1850, 577, 584–85. See also election of 1852—and Fillmore; election of 1856—and Fillmore

Fish, Hamilton: and Anti-Rent movement, 242; and Compromise of 1850, 543, 618; and demise of Whig party, 959–60; and elitism of Whiggery, 961; and filling of Fillmore's New York seat, 396; and Fillmore, 523–24; and Fugitive Slave Act, 592, 619; and future of Whig party, 618, 764, 826, 833, 910, 939–40; as independent of Whig factions, 587; and Know Nothings, 837, 910; and omnibus bill, 524; and patronage, 431, 545, 550, 618, 651; and Republican party, 910, 946–47, 976; and resurrection of Whig party, 960; and Taylor administration, 440; and Union party, 618–19; and unity in Whig party, 550; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 656; and Wilmot Proviso, 440. See also Fish, Hamilton—and election

Fish, Hamilton—and election: of 1846, 242; of 1848, 363–64, 376, 379; of 1850, 550, 584, 587, 591–92, 595; of 1851, 618, 645–53, 656; of 1852, 680, 761; of 1854, 833; of 1856, 950, 967–68, 975–76

Florida: American party in, 854; and Compromise of 1850, 564; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 854; and Nashville Convention, 564; and omnibus bill, 494, 512; patronage in, 512, 546; senatorial decisions in, 391; and slavery, 96, 314; and Southern Rights, 268, 564; and Texas boundary dispute, 564; Union party in, 621; and Wilmot Proviso, 268, 385. See also Florida—election in Florida—election in: of 1846, 370; of 1848, 268, 309, 323, 368, 370, 391, 564, 752; of 1850–51, 564, 566, 596, 672; of 1852, 680, 713–14, 734, 737, 751–52; of 1853–54, 854, 877, 957

Flournoy, Thomas S., 286, 287, 305–6, 321, 622, 928, 933

Follett, Oran, 15, 401, 675, 828-29, 842-44

Fontaine, Charles D., 796, 797

Foot, Solomon, 329, 560, 940

Foote, Henry S.: and American party, 858; and Calhoun's third party efforts, 386; and California statehood, 474, 481; censure of, 615; and Clay Plan, 481, 494; and elections, 615, 616, 676–78, 731, 796–97, 858; and Fugitive Slave Act, 496; and Mexican Cession, 481, 530; and New Mexico, 474; and omnibus bill, 530; and Round Robin, 621; select committee proposal of, 486–87, 496–97; and slavery in District of Columbia, 481; and Southern Rights, 481; and Texas boundary dispute, 474, 481, 535; and Union party, 621, 676–78; and Utah, 474; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675, 677–78; Whig support for, 615

Foote, Thomas, 299, 430, 432, 647, 653, 681, 684, 693, 700

Force Act (1833), 20, 21, 24, 35, 42, 45, 99

Ford, Seabury, 297, 362–63, 373, 399–400, 527, 571, 657

Ford, Thomas, 942, 944, 945 foreign affairs: and elections, 692–95, 717, 739, 750, 776; Fillmore's views about, 776; and Pierce administration, 776; in Polk administration, 232–33; and Taylor, 415, 472–73; and Union party, 776; and Webster-Fillmore relationship, 635. See also Kossuth, Louis foreign territory: acquisition of, 219–20. See also expansionism

Forward, Walter, 137, 428, 429

Foster, Ephraim H., 160, 177, 221, 223, 294, 426, 427 Foster, Lafayette, 557, 639, 833

Fowler, Orin, 582, 583

Free Soilers: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 836, 841, 860-63, 896, 903; Buffalo convention of (1848), 335-36, 338-39, 342; as challenge to Whigs, 339-46, 352, 376, 378-82, 384-85; and Clay Plan, 483; constituency of, 338–43; and demise of Whig party, 955-57, 983; Democrats as, 338, 341-43, 384; disbanding of, 575; and Fillmore, 341, 344, 526, 920; and Fugitive Slave Act, 604, 828; and future of Whig party, 763-64, 768, 772-74, 826-28, 833-35, 842; and House speakership, 466-68, 470-72, 962; impact on Whig party of, 331, 337, 339-45; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 804-5, 810-12, 815-18, 820, 822, 826-28, 836, 957; and Know Nothings, 915-16, 922, 931; and launching of new sectional party, 826-30; and little omnibus bill, 539; and Mexican Cession, 390, 443; and New Mexico, 538; and northern Democrats, 485; and northern Whigs, 483, 841; and omnibus bill, 504, 506, 508-9, 532; organization of, 331, 333-34; and organization of territorial governments, 483, 532, 538; and Pierce administration, 766; platform of, 339; and political realignments, 618; and Republican party, 909-10, 944, 948; revival of, 810; and Sewardites, 768, 773, 811-12, 909-10; and Silver Grays, 782, 833; and slavery in District of Columbia, 828; slogan of, 333-34, 339; and southern Democrats, 495; and Taylor administration, 388, 390, 438-39, 459, 465-66, 473, 475, 483, 485; and temperance, 696, 782, 785-86; and Union party, 599, 622; and Utah, 538; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 638–41, 677– 78; Webster's views about, 604; and Wilmot Proviso, 388, 390, 440, 462, 532, 538. See also Free Soilers—and election; specific person or state

Free Soilers—and election: of 1848, 338–45, 360, 362, 364, 366–67, 369–70, 373–81, 383–84, 730; of 1849, 442–43, 449, 461; of 1850, 554, 556–57, 568, 581; of 1851, 638–41, 657–59, 661–63, 672; of

1852, 661–62, 677–78, 684, 696, 699–701, 727, 729, 731, 741–42, 744, 752–55, 760–61, 763, 775; of 1853, 767, 777–79, 781–87, 791, 800; of 1854, 830–32, 836, 841, 857, 859–61, 863, 867–68, 870–75, 877–78, 880–84, 887, 889–93, 895, 898, 902–3, 906; of 1855, 915–16, 920, 944, 945, 947–48; of 1856, 903, 970, 979

Freehling, William W., 983

Frelinghuysen, Theodore, 188-92, 205-7, 262

Frémont, John C.: and election of 1856, 966–67, 970–73, 975–76, 978–81

Fugitive Slave Act (1850): and Clay Plan, 478-79, 482; constitutionality of, 605; enforcement of, 425, 554, 579, 581, 583, 592, 598-99, 602-5, 617, 619, 635, 659, 667; and Fillmore, 533, 598-99, 602-3, 617, 619, 667, 680; and future of Whig party, 828; House vote about, 542-43; and impact of election of 1850, 595; and Know Nothings, 930; Mason introduces bill about, 474, 488, 496-97; and Mexican Cession, 496; and Nashville Convention, 463; and northern Democrats, 538; and northern Whigs, 538, 542-43, 553-54, 598; and omnibus bill, 482, 496-97, 499; and secession threat, 554, 598, 602-3; Senate vote on, 537-38; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 490; and Slave Power, 554; and southern Democrats, 496-97; and Taylor administration, 477; and Union party, 607, 614; and Webster-Fillmore relationship, 635; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 488. See also Fugitive Slave Act (1850)-and election

Fugitive Slave Act (1850)—and election: of 1850, 554, 560, 566–70, 572, 576–77, 579–83, 585, 587–89, 591–92, 594–96; of 1851, 614, 639–40, 643–44, 646–47, 649, 656–58, 662, 664, 666, 669–70; of 1852, 680, 682, 699, 703, 706, 710–12, 717, 728–31, 748; of 1853, 788; of 1854, 861–62, 869, 871, 873–74, 882, 890–91, 894, 901, 903–4; of 1855, 917 Fuller, Henry, 577, 578, 886, 962

Fuller, Jerome, 430, 432–34, 493, 505, 514, 524, 550, 586, 618, 622; and election of 1851, 645–50, 653 gag rule, 44, 155, 156, 164, 168, 186, 358, 953

Gales, Joseph, 974–75, 978
Galloway, Samuel, 295, 322, 327, 340, 923
Galphin, George, 497, 502, 519
Galphin Claim, 497–99, 519, 524
Gardner, Henry J., 891, 893, 929, 941
Garrison, William Lloyd, 227
Gartell, Lucius, 314, 320
Gates, Seth M., 168–69, 186
Gayle, John, 43, 289, 358, 420
Geddes, George, 492, 494, 585
Geddes Resolutions, 492–93, 494

Gentry, Meredith P.: on economy, 269; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 528; and House speakership fight, 470–71; and Know Nothings, 932, 937; and omnibus bill, 503; and patronage, 425–26; and slavery in District of Columbia, 543; and tariffs, 247; and Taylor, 321, 409, 413, 503. See also Gentry, Meredith P.—and election

Gentry, Meredith P.—and election: of 1848, 247, 289,

308, 313–14, 321, 329, 331, 346, 413; of 1851, 628–30; of 1852, 698–99, 702–4, 711, 727, 732–35, 794; of 1853, 794–95; of 1855, 932–33, 937

Georgia: and banks/monetary policies, 35, 166; and California statehood, 450-51, 463-64, 469; and Compromise of 1850, 614; as crucial to Fillmore's hopes, 607; and demise of Whig party, 607; Democrats in, 469, 610, 614; destruction of Whig party in, 615; and District of Columbia slavery, 463; economy in, 71, 160, 612, 798; and expansionism, 256, 279; financial issues in, 608; Free Soilers in, 760; and future of Whig party, 774; and Galphin Claim, 497-98; internal improvements in, 234; Know Nothings in, 855-56, 933-34, 937-39; land issues in, 798; and Mexican Cession, 443, 450-51; and Mexican War, 256, 279, 286; and Nashville Convention, 463; National Republicans in, 17; and national versus state issues, 223; new voters in, 200; and omnibus bill, 494, 509; patronage in, 421-23, 427, 450, 611; political realignments in, 607-15; reapportionment in, 159, 238, 244, 451, 609-10; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80; relief in, 160; and rise of Whig party, 35; secession threat in, 450, 464, 469-70, 601-2, 607-8, 610-12, 614, 798; and slavery, 450-51, 469; social class issues in, 200; and Southern Address, 449-50; Southern Rights in, 268, 450, 607, 609-14, 798; state rights in, 20, 35, 55, 103; tariffs in, 238; and Taylor Plan, 443; and Taylor's Mercer speech, 444-45, 451; temperance in, 451, 798, 800; and Texas annexation, 172, 179, 200, 222-23; Union party in, 35-36, 607-15, 617, 620-22, 633, 636, 676-78, 681, 707, 733, 740, 756, 774, 797-99, 801, 821, 955; voter fraud in, 198; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675, 677-78; Whig strength in, 116, 215, 242, 609-11, 733; and Wilmot Proviso, 268, 444-45, 450-51, 463, 464. See also Georgia—election in; specific person

Georgia—election in: of 1824, 7–8; of 1830s, 12, 17, 35, 36, 45, 50, 55, 71, 101; of 1840, 101, 103, 198; of 1841–43, 139–40, 151, 159–61, 200; of 1844, 149, 159, 162, 165–66, 182, 194, 198, 200, 223, 360, 368, 370; of 1845–47, 222–23, 238, 242, 244–45, 287, 360, 609; of 1848, 215, 268, 272–73, 279, 281, 286–87, 292, 314, 323, 346, 348, 355, 360, 368, 370, 375, 413, 450, 607, 609; of 1849, 442, 449–51, 455, 609; of 1850, 607, 609, 614; of 1851, 608, 611–15, 622, 633; of 1852, 636, 676–78, 681, 697, 703, 707, 733, 740, 756, 758, 760, 798; of 1853, 792, 796–800, 938; of 1855, 933–34, 937–39

Georgia Platform, 613-14, 798, 813

Georgia Resolutions, 469-70

German Americans: and constituencies of political parties, 117–18; and expansion of Democratic party, 83; and Kossuth, 693, 695–97; and temperance, 691; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 600. See also German Americans—and election

German Americans—and election: of 1844, 204; of 1852, 691, 693, 695–97, 717, 728, 730, 737, 739, 742–46, 750, 761; of 1854, 851, 867, 881

Geyer, Henry S., 527, 561, 566, 676, 817, 819, 851

Gibbons, Charles, 666, 667-68, 669, 670

Giddings, Joshua R.: and appointment to Allen's senate seat, 400–401; and California statehood, 570; on Clay-Taylor relationship, 477; and demise of Whig party, 983; and expansionism, 252; and Free Soilers, 340, 341; and House speakership, 467, 962; influence of, 341; and internal improvements, 169; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 815; and Know Nothings, 944; and land revenues, 169; and Mexican War, 249; move to censure, 156; and Republican party, 944; and slavery, 44, 168–69, 252, 267, 282, 319, 331, 333, 340, 341, 385, 401; and slavery in District of Columbia, 570; and tariffs, 169; and Texas annexation, 168–69; and Union party, 617–18, 621; and Wilmot Proviso, 253. See also Giddings, Joshua R.—and election

Giddings, Joshua R.—and election: of 1840, 100; of 1844, 162, 182, 186; of 1848, 266–67, 282, 284, 294, 319, 331, 333, 340–41, 363; of 1850–51, 570, 572, 657–59; of 1852, 700–701; of 1853–55, 782, 863, 868, 944

Gienapp, William E., 948, 979, 980 Gillette, Francis, 778, 779, 832, 833 Gilmer, Thomas R., 128, 149, 150, 168 Gilpin, Charles, 408, 429 Goggin, William L., 622, 977 Goodenow, Robert, 560, 561 Goodrich, John Z., 582, 583, 827, 891, 892 Gott, Daniel, 385, 441

Gott [Daniel] resolution, 385, 386, 388, 441 government, role of, 66–67, 69–70, 110, 112, 447, 952 Graham, William A., 40, 132, 149, 392, 424; and demise of Whig party, 959; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 525, 527, 528; and future of Whig party, 908, 910; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 814; and Know Nothings, 910; as Navy secretary, 527; and Republican party, 910. See also Graham, William

Graham, William A.—and election: of 1852, 707, 723–25, 728, 730, 732, 735–36; of 1854, 853, 908; of 1856, 968, 977–78

A.—and election

Granger, Francis, 102, 125, 340, 526, 911, 959, 971. See also Granger, Francis—and election

Granger, Francis—and election: of 1838, 98–99; of 1840, 98–99, 102; of 1844, 173; of 1850–51, 583, 587–91, 649–50; of 1852, 722, 738, 959; of 1854, 901–2; of 1856, 977

Great Britain: and Anglophobia in U.S., 184–85, 188; and Canadian border clashes, 97; and Canadian fisheries, 739; contract of credit by, 63, 64; and expansionism, 184–85; investments in U.S. of, 686; and Maine boundary question, 126, 137; and Oregon territory, 232–33; and Texas annexation, 169–71, 176, 177; Van Buren as minister to, 11

Greeley, Horace: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 859, 861, 863; and Anti-Rent movement, 241; and Compromise of 1850, 586; and demise of Whig party, 983; and economy, 234; and election of 1854, 861, 863; and election of 1855, 925; and expansionism, 254–57; and Free Soilers, 340–41; and future of

Whig party, 768, 770-71, 832, 895, 896; and ideology of Whigs and Democrats, 70; and immigrants, 205, 229; on Independent Treasury plan, 234, 247; and Know Nothings, 847, 896, 899, 900, 916; and Mexican War, 249, 254-57; and morality, 199; and nativism, 193, 207, 229, 276, 318, 900; on New Hampshire election, 231; and New Mexico, 520; and New York constitution, 239; and omnibus bill, 520; and party conflicts, 212; on Polk administration, 234; and principles of Whig party, 165; and quiescent policy, 768; and Republic, 501; and Republican party, 859, 868, 896, 925; and slavery, 251, 254-55, 274, 278, 281, 340-41, 434; and suffrage, 227, 239, 240; and tariffs, 167, 183, 184, 195, 224, 235; on Taylor, 411, 413; and temperance, 898; and Texas, 183, 186, 195, 203, 224, 520; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 138; and voter fraud, 204, 212; on voter mobilization, 256-57; and Weed and Seward, 770, 902; and Whig party as amalgam, 46; and Wilmot Proviso, 251, 254-55. See also Greeley, Horace—and election

Greeley, Horace—and election: of 1840, 106, 109; of 1844, 166–67, 175, 181, 183–84, 186, 192–93, 195, 199, 203–5, 212, 224, 278; of 1845–47, 215, 231, 239–42; of 1848, 266–67, 274, 276–79, 281–82, 284, 297–301, 303, 316, 318, 320–21, 326, 328, 340–41; of 1849–50, 434, 586–87; of 1852, 682, 699, 705–6, 710, 726, 729–30, 737, 744, 747–48, 755, 766; of 1853–54, 768, 832, 868, 895–96, 898–900, 902

Greely, Philip Jr., 425, 548–49, 605; and elections, 580, 654, 678, 698, 701, 704–5; and patronage, 506, 580, 600

Green, Duff, 39, 168, 170, 171 Greene, Albert, 535–36, 556, 638 Greene, Alexander H., 728

Grimes, James W., 867, 868-69

Grinnell, Joseph, 506, 582

Grinnell, Moses, 299, 431, 710, 716, 719, 723, 748, 749

Griswold, Hiram, 658, 659 Gwin, William, 621, 857, 858

Hadley, A.K., 586, 587, 977 Hale, E.J., 281, 306, 307–8

Hale, John P., 230–31, 333, 339, 459; and election of 1852, 730, 741–42, 745, 758, 761–62; and election of 1855, 920–21, 929

Hall, Allen A., 502, 517, 628

Hall, Nathan K.: and apprehensions about Fillmore, 523; and California statehood, 506, 527; and Clay, 395, 397, 502; and demise of Whig party, 946; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 515, 548; and Fillmore, 527, 913; influence of, 493; and Know Nothings, 913; and Mexican War, 311; and New Mexico, 506, 527; and omnibus bill, 505–6, 523, 527; and patronage, 430, 432, 514–17, 544, 548, 600; and Pierce administration, 766; as postmaster general, 527; and Republican party, 946; and secession, 602; on Seward as senator, 395; and slavery, 388; style of, 527; and Taylor administration, 510, 514–17; and Taylor Plan, 493, 505–6, 523, 527; and Texas boundary dispute, 534; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 648–49. See also Hall, Nathan K.—and election

Hall, Nathan K.—and election: of 1848, 273, 282, 289, 299; of 1850–51, 573, 590, 600, 648–49, 654; of 1852, 712, 755; of 1855, 946

Hall, Willis, 140

Hamilton, James A., 960-61, 968, 977

Hamlin, Hannibal, 560

Hammond, Samuel H., 912, 914, 965

Hampton, Moses, 340, 367, 420, 575, 578

Hannegan, Edward, 422-23, 424-25, 546

Hard, Gideon, 493

Harlan, James, 320, 321, 868, 878

Harrington, Isaac, 514, 515, 516, 545, 546, 548, 549, 550

Harris, Ira, 241, 242

Harris, Iverson L., 313, 476

Harris, Thomas L., 536, 566, 567

Harris, Wiley P., 796

Harrison, J. Scott, 863, 963

Harrison, William Henry: ambitions of, 91; biography of, 41, 106; death of, 127, 132; in Jackson administration, 41; nickname for, 111; one-term pledge of, 110, 124; and rise and expansion of Whig party, 64; and slavery, 95; and state party development, 52–53, 54. See also election of 1840; Harrison, William Henry—and election

Harrison, William Henry—and election: of 1836, 41–46, 49–50, 52–55, 59, 91, 99; of 1840, 89–104, 106–13, 149, 180–81, 187, 193–94, 196, 198, 203–4, 332, 367–68

Harvey, James E., 262, 284, 309, 316, 321, 422–23, 445, 458, 668–69, 671, 701–2

Haven, Franklin, 425, 547, 643

Haven, Solomon G.: and anti-Nebraska coalition, 896; and demise of Whig party, 974; and elitism, 975; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 913, 915–17, 927, 942–43, 963, 964; and future of Whig party, 823, 825–29, 833; and House speakership, 924, 962, 963; and Hunkers, 618; and Kansas raids, 966; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 812–13, 816, 825–27, 833–34; and Know Nothings/American party, 848, 856, 898–99, 911, 913, 915–18, 927, 942–43, 963, 964; and launching of new sectional party, 829; and New York politics, 945, 946; and patronage, 430, 432, 515, 545, 550; and Republican party, 945, 946, 976; and Taylor Plan, 493; and Union party, 804. See also Haven, Solomon G.—and election

Haven, Solomon G.—and election: of 1848, 299; of 1850, 546, 550, 584, 589–91, 594; of 1852, 716, 720–21; of 1854, 896, 898, 906; of 1855, 915–18, 928, 945–46; of 1856, 963–64, 973–76

Hawley, Seth, 591, 738

Hayden, William, 425, 721

Hayes, Rutherford B., 660, 688, 751, 755, 761, 846

Hayne, Robert, 12, 21, 22

Haywood, Joel, 791

Heister, Isaac, 886

Henderson, John, 132, 133, 178, 221, 603

Hendricks, John, 864

Henry, Gustavus A., 162, 182, 280, 294, 424, 629–30, 794–95, 932

Henrymandering, 629-30, 632, 793, 794, 795

Henshaw, David, 82, 150, 643

Hibbard, Harry, 640

Hickman, John, 885, 886

Higher Law speech (Seward, 1850), 489–91, 493–94, 512, 514–15, 526, 585, 588, 682, 809

Hill, Benjamin, 450, 451

Hill, Clement S., 793

Hilliard, Henry: and Compromise of 1850, 616; and elections, 329, 355, 616, 676, 681, 707, 934; and Fillmore, 524; and House speakership fight, 467–70; and Know Nothings, 934; and patronage, 420, 424; and Round Robin, 621; and Union party, 616, 621, 676; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675; as Young Indian, 289

Hoagland, Moses, 571

Hoar, E. Rockwood, 333

Hodge, William L., 351, 464, 768, 801, 846, 977-78

Holden, William W., 562, 627

Hone, Philip, 104, 203, 432, 433, 651 Hoppin, William W., 831, 919, 920

House of Representatives, U.S.: and Bell-Polk election for speaker, 42; Jacksonian control of, 26; Northern domination of, 541; speakership of, 466–72, 923– 24, 944, 961–63; Whig control of, 387. See also gag rule; specific person, legislation, or committee

Houston, John W., 565, 566, 855

Houston, Sam, 338, 537, 538, 914

Howard, Volney, 529, 530, 533

Howe, Daniel W., 30

Howe, John W., 379

Howe, Thomas M., 578

Hubbard, John, 560, 747, 762, 783, 784

Hudson, Charles, 274, 425, 506, 548–49, 580, 583, 600, 605, 654, 705

Hughes, John (archbishop), 188, 695, 744, 946, 948

Hülsemann, J. G., 600-601

Hülsemann letter (Webster), 601, 635, 693, 694, 750 Hunkers: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 860; and Democrat-Whig alliance, 516; and Free Soilers, 342; and Geddes Resolutions, 492–93; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 806, 807, 812; and National Whigs, 622; and omnibus bill, 494; and organization of territorial governments, 492; and patronage, 511, 515; and Silver Grays, 595, 617, 618; slogan of, 333–34; and Taylor's cabinet, 406; and Union party, 606, 617, 618, 622, 801; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 644–45, 649, 650; and Wilmot Proviso, 491. See also Hunkers—and election; specific per-

Hunkers—and election: of 1846–47, 239–40, 242, 245; of 1848, 333–34, 342; of 1849, 453, 491; of 1850, 570, 584, 593–95; of 1851, 622, 644–45, 649–50, 652, 655; of 1852, 684, 710, 748–51, 754; of 1853–55, 786–88, 860, 894, 900, 941

Hunt, Alvah, 596

Hunt, Theodore G., 795, 820-21, 827, 828, 833-34, 932

Hunt, Washington: and anti-Nebraska coalition, 896; and apprehensions about Fillmore, 523; and Compromise of 1850, 591, 618–19; and comprtollership, 396, 453; and demise of Whig party, 945, 946, 948–50, 959; and elitism of Whigs, 959; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 950; and Fugitive Slave Act, 591, 592, 619; and future of Whig party, 618–19, 910, 939–40; and impact of election of 1850, 595; and Know Nothings, 910, 950; and patronage, 431, 545, 546, 550, 600, 618; and Republican party, 910, 945, 946, 948–50; and resurrection of Whig party, 959–60; and secession, 617; and temperance, 902; and unity in Whig party, 550; and Wilmot Proviso, 343. See also Hunt, Washington—and election

Hunt, Washington—and election: of 1844, 186–87; of 1848, 307, 317, 343, 684; of 1849, 453; of 1850, 550, 584–87, 589–92, 595, 748; of 1851, 646–47, 651–53; of 1852, 748–50, 754, 761–62, 899; of 1853–55, 789, 896, 899, 902, 946, 948–49; of 1856, 950, 959–60, 967–68, 977

Hunton, Logan, 309, 419, 603 Hyde, Oliver M., 511, 548, 549, 661

Illinois: anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 860, 867, 869, 870-71, 916; canals in, 80-81; and Compromise of 1850, 566, 662; conservatives in, 870; constitution for, 273, 374, 777; corruption in, 548; Democrat-Whig alliance in, 515; economy in, 80; and expansionism, 175, 184-85; Free Soilers in, 342-43, 379, 485, 566, 744, 754, 760, 777, 866, 869-71; and Fugitive Slave Act, 566, 604, 662, 869; immigrants/ Catholics in, 697, 742, 744; internal improvements in, 234; judgeships in, 374; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 830; Know Nothings in, 869, 870, 878, 942; Liberty party in, 197; national versus state issues in, 50, 53; and omnibus bill, 509, 512; patronage in, 374, 426, 512, 515, 548; reapportionment in, 157, 163, 568; Republican party in, 869-71, 980; and slavery in District of Columbia, 566-67; and state party development, 50, 53; temperance in, 777; and Texas annexation, 201; voting behavior and policies relationship in, 80-81; Whig strength in, 32, 213, 214-15; and Wilmot Proviso, 485. See also Illinois-election in

Illinois—election in: of 1824, 6; of 1830s, 33, 35–36, 46, 81, 98; of 1840, 96, 101–3, 112; of 1842–43, 148, 151; of 1844, 175, 184–85, 197, 201, 215, 373; of 1845–47, 215; of 1848, 215, 273, 319, 325–26, 342–43, 346, 354–55, 373–74, 378–79, 566; of 1850–51, 561, 566–67, 596, 662; of 1852, 567, 684, 697, 700, 708–9, 713–14, 717, 719–20, 739, 742, 744, 747, 751, 754, 756, 760–61, 870, 980; of 1853–55, 777, 781, 866–67, 869–71, 878, 916; of 1856, 980 immigrants: Anglophobia of, 185, 188; and Austrian-Hungarian matter, 600; and constituencies of political parties, 117–18; and demise of Whig party, 956–58; and economy, 805; and expansion of Democratic party, 83; and Fillmore, 203, 911; and future of Democratic party, 838; and future of Whig party, 211, 212, 837; illegal, 198, 203–7, 228; as Jackson supporters, 204; and Know Nothings, 805, 845–50; and Kossuth, 692–96; and northern Whigs, 837; Polk's views about, 204; and railroads, 686; and reassessment of Whig party, 206–7; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 78, 81; and republicanism, 228; and temperance, 691, 742; and voter fraud, 691; voting patterns of, 118–19. See also German Americans; immigrants—and election; Irish Americans; nativism immigrants—and election: of 1844, 175, 185, 187, 190, 192, 198–99, 202–7, 275, 318; of 1848, 276, 318, 328; of 1851, 663, 664, 670–71; of 1852, 684, 691–97, 711, 727, 741–42, 745–48, 756, 845, 956, 958; of 1853, 792, 803; of 1854, 837, 858, 883, 887, 889, 891, 897–99, 904, 957; of 1855, 934 impeachment, 147, 149, 150, 498, 519

Impracticables. See Virginia Cabal

Independent Treasury plan: Democrats' support for, 66, 68, 84; implementation of, 246; and party differences, 234; passage of, 67, 68; and political realignments, 68, 71, 73; and Polk administration, 175, 233, 234, 236, 237, 242, 247; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 77, 78, 80–82; repeal of, 67, 129, 135; and role of government, 67; and Taylor administration, 308, 415, 446–48, 472, 473; and Tyler, 128, 129, 135; Van Buren's proposal for, 65; and Whig economic program, 129, 135. See also Independent Treasury plan—and election

Independent Treasury plan—and election: of 1837–40, 67, 78, 80, 94, 108; of 1844, 166–67, 175, 183; of 1846–47, 237, 242, 244; of 1848, 263, 308, 349, 363–66, 381; of 1852, 686

Indiana: abolitionism in, 195; anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 858–65, 916; canals in, 80–81; and Compromise of 1850, 559, 662, 663, 863; constitution of, 442, 662, 663, 688, 958; economy in, 80, 81, 441; and expansionism, 175, 184-85, 279; free blacks in, 663; Free Soilers in, 342-43, 373, 379, 398, 402, 435, 441-42, 462, 559, 662-64, 761, 859-63, 970; Fugitive Slave Act in, 604, 662, 862; immigrants/ Catholics in, 663-64, 691, 742, 752; internal improvements in, 230; Know Nothings in, 859, 864-65, 878, 916, 922, 942, 970; Liberty party in, 156, 185, 202; and Mexican Cession, 441-42; and Mexican War, 279; national versus state issues in, 53; nativism in, 859, 864-65; and omnibus bill, 509, 512, 559; patronage in, 422-23, 426-27, 512, 546, 662; People's party in, 862-65, 916; Quakers in, 318, 355, 662; railroads in, 663; reapportionment in, 159, 568, 752; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80-81; Republican party in, 861, 945, 970, 980; and slavery in District of Columbia, 862; state debt in, 663; and state party development, 53; and Taylor Plan, 441; temperance in, 689, 691, 859, 863-65; and Texas annexation, 185, 201, 224; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 138; Whig strength in, 215, 230, 231; and Wilmot Proviso, 441. See also Indiana-election in internal improvements: Adams' views about, 7; Democrats' views about, 66; and economy, 62, 687; Fillmore's support for, 619, 620; Harrison's views about, 41; Jackson's views about, 11; and Jeffersonian Republicans, 2; and principles of Whig party, 951–52; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 79, 81, 82; and role of government, 66, 69, 952; sectional splits in Congress about, 5; and Slave Power, 169; and Taylor administration, 272, 310, 415, 448; Tyler's views about, 128; Whigs' views about, 69. See also internal improvements—and election; specific person or state internal improvements—and election: of 1824, 5; of 1830s, 15, 41; of 1840, 94, 109; of 1844, 166–67, 176, 184; of 1848, 272, 310, 350, 363, 381; of 1851, 623, 627–29, 659; of 1852–53, 686, 736, 739, 796 interstate slave trade, 463, 478–79

Indiana—election in: of 1824, 6; of 1832–35, 33, 35–36, 45; of 1836–39, 45, 50, 81, 100, 103; of 1840, 91, 93, 96, 100, 102, 196–97; of 1841–43, 139, 151, 154, 159–60; of 1844, 149, 175, 184–85, 194–97, 201–2, 206, 301, 373, 376; of 1845–47, 230–31, 238, 244, 440–41, 559; of 1848, 215, 264, 279, 281, 293–94, 309, 316–19, 323, 325–26, 328, 332, 342–43, 355, 368, 373, 376, 379, 441; of 1849–51, 440–43, 462, 559, 596, 662–64, 672; of 1852, 672, 681, 683–84, 688–89, 691, 699–700, 708–9, 713–14, 717, 719–20, 739, 742–43, 747, 751–52, 756, 760–61, 859; of 1853–55, 781, 841, 860–65, 878, 916; of 1856, 970, 978, 980

Ingersoll, Joseph, 302

Interior Department, U.S., 410, 528

Iowa: anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 860, 867, 868; and Compromise of 1850, 558, 661; and demise of Whig party, 971; Free Soilers in, 376, 866–69; immigrants/Catholics in, 691, 867; Know Nothings in, 868; and Missouri Compromise, 868; patronage in, 426, 661; railroads in, 867; reapportionment in, 568; Republican party in, 868–69; temperance in, 691, 867, 868; voter turnout in, 559; Whig organization and expansion in, 237–38. See also Iowa—election in

Iowa—election in: of 1846, 237; of 1848, 273, 281, 293, 325, 373, 376; of 1850–51, 558, 561, 596, 661, 663; of 1852, 681, 683–84, 691, 707, 712–13, 715, 719–20, 723, 747, 751, 756, 867; of 1853–54, 781, 866–69; of 1856, 971

Irish Americans: Anglophobia of, 185, 188, 203; and constituencies of political parties, 117–18; and expansion of Democratic party, 83; and Kossuth, 693, 695, 696; and nativism, 191; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 81; and temperance, 691, 696, 775; and Webster's presidential ambition, 600. See also Irish Americans—and election

Irish Americans—and election: of 1844, 185, 188, 203–4; of 1851, 670; of 1852, 691, 693, 695–97, 730, 742–46, 752–53, 756, 775; of 1853–54, 786–87, 890–91

Irvin, Alexander, 428, 430, 547 Irwin, William, 548 Jackson, Andrew: annual messages to Congress of, 11, 15; appointments of, 26; censure of, 24, 27, 32, 44, 54, 58, 149; as defining shape and thrust of Whig party, 40, 58–59; health of, 22; loyalty to, 407; military reputation of, 6; military veterans as supporters of, 100; nickname for, 111; political cartooning of, 17; and republicanism, 16; retirement of, 58; style of, 24; and Texas annexation, 168. See also anti-Jacksonians; Jackson, Andrew—and election; Jacksonians; specific person or topic

Jackson, Andrew—and election: of 1824, 6–7; of 1828, 9–10, 17, 261; of 1832, 11, 14–18, 45–46; of 1844, 175

Jackson, William, 548, 549

Jacksonians: Clay's views about, 30; as common cause among Whigs, 44; control of Congress by, 10; and elections, 8, 9, 14–15, 107; factions among, 10–11; and National Republicans, 10, 11, 12, 14–18; and nullification, 23; organization of, 9; and political realignments, 7; and republicanism, 10, 14; and soldiers as presidents, 286; and state rights, 24; unification among, 7. See also anti-Jacksonians

James, Charles, 638

Jarnagin, Spencer, 179

Jefferson, Thomas, 288, 382

Jeffersonian Republicans, 2, 3, 4, 347, 413. See also American system; specific person

Jenkins, Charles J.: and California, 469; and elections, 281, 451, 733, 797, 798, 937–39, 970; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 528, 546; and future of Whig party, 910; and Know Nothings, 910, 937– 39; and Republican party, 910; and secession threat, 612; and Southern Rights, 612; and Union party, 612, 613; and Wilmot Proviso, 464

Jessup amendments, 714-15, 716, 717, 724

Jewett, E.R., 817, 918

Johnson, Andrew, 124, 630, 735, 793, 794, 932, 984 Johnson, Herschel, 798, 938, 939

Johnson, Reverdy: ambitions of, 956; as attorney general, 409, 411–13; and Clay's return to Senate, 397; and demise of Whig party, 956; as Democrat, 970; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 528; and Galphin Claim, 497–98, 502; and Know Nothings, 934–35; and Mexican Cession, 412; and patronage, 427, 432, 544; and Pearce, 495; and Taylor's cabinet, 409, 411–13; and Wilmot Proviso, 412. See also Johnson, Reverdy—and election

Johnson, Reverdy—and election: of 1840, 104; of 1844, 168; of 1848, 263, 267, 292, 324, 413; of 1850, 563–64; of 1855, 934–35; of 1856, 970

Johnson, Richard M., 31, 43, 111

Johnson, William, 569, 570, 571

Johnston, J. Neely, 858

Johnston, James, 420, 428, 544, 753, 763

Johnston, William F.: ambitions of, 956; and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 929; and Compromise of 1850, 664–65; and Cooper, 393–94, 506–7, 528, 573, 575– 77, 579, 668, 670; and demise of Whig party, 956, 983; and Fugitive Slave Act, 579, 669–70; as Hunker, 393–94; and Know Nothings, 917, 929, 930, 942; and omnibus bill, 506–7, 512–13; and patronage, 394, 416, 417, 421, 427–30, 432, 507, 512–13, 544, 547–49, 577, 664–65; as Scott supporter, 665–67; and slavery, 364, 375, 376, 507; and southern Whigs, 666, 682; and Taylor Plan, 506–7; and Taylor Republicanism, 408; and Texas boundary dispute, 669; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 638, 665–67. See also Johnston, William F.—and election

Johnston, William F. (continued)

Johnston, William F.—and election: of 1848, 303, 364–65, 367, 375–76, 393–94, 454; of 1850, 573, 575–77, 579; of 1851, 579, 638, 665–71; of 1852, 682, 684, 705, 709, 714, 716, 718–19, 753; of 1855, 917

Joint Companies, 53-54, 455, 573-74, 791

Jones, James "Lean Jimmy": ambitions of, 630; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 808, 809, 813, 819, 937; and Know Nothings, 937; and patronage, 417, 426. See also Jones, James "Lean Jimmy"—and election

Jones, James "Lean Jimmy"—and election: of 1843, 160; of 1848, 294; of 1851, 628–29, 795; of 1852, 630, 698–99, 702, 705, 718, 720, 723–26, 728–29, 734–35, 737, 937; of 1855, 937; of 1856, 970

Jones, William S., 938

judiciary, 150, 336, 670

Judiciary Committee (U.S. House), 191

Judiciary Committee (U.S. Senate), 228, 386, 496 Julian, George W.: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 86

Julian, George W.: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 863, 865; on Clay-Taylor relationship, 476, 477; and elections, 441, 662, 663, 741, 863, 865; and Taylor administration, 472, 487

Kane Letter (Polk, 1844), 184

Kansas: border raids into, 966, 973, 975, 980, 981; constitution of, 973; and elections, 925, 973, 975, 976, 978; Fillmore's views about, 966, 973, 976; popular sovereignty in, 925; and Republican party, 980. See also Kansas-Nebraska Act

Kansas-Nebraska Act: and "Appeal of Independent Democrats," 815-18; and Buchanan, 965; and Compromise of 1850, 806, 807, 809, 811, 812, 816, 821; and demise of Whig party, 957, 983; Dixon amendment to, 808-10, 814; Douglas reports bill about, 807; and Douglas' revision of initial bill, 809-10, 814; and Fillmore, 804, 812, 813, 816, 817, 966, 973; finality of, 823; and future of Whig party, 814, 818-19, 821-23, 825-30, 834-35, 908; and House speakership, 962; House votes on, 820-21, 827; introduction of, 804; and Know Nothings, 805, 924, 929-31, 942; and Missouri Compromise, 806-12, 816, 818; and northern Democrats, 809, 811, 817, 820; and northern Whigs, 810-21, 825, 827, 830, 925; and Pierce administration, 809, 810, 815, 829, 965; Pierce signs, 822; and political realignments, 821-35; and popular sovereignty, 806-10, 812, 814, 816, 818, 821; and Republican party, 844; and republicanism, 844; revision of initial bill, 818; Senate votes on, 819-20; and southern Democrats, 806-9, 818; southern disinterest in, 823; and southern Whigs, 805, 808, 810, 813, 814, 816-21, 824, 825, 827, 833, 835, 923-26, 957, 962; spread of, 856. See also anti-Nebraska coalitions; Kansas-Nebraska Act—and election

Kansas-Nebraska Act—and election: of 1854, 809, 811, 831–33, 836, 850–51, 855, 859–66, 879–84, 888–90, 892–97, 899, 901–2, 904, 957; of 1855, 917, 932, 937, 941; of 1856, 964–65, 973–74

Kelley, William D., 670

Kellogg, Palmer V., 417, 432, 545, 549, 584, 586, 600, 650–51

Kendall, Amos, 23

Kendrick, Green, 690, 778, 779

Kennedy, John Pendleton: and demise of Whig party, 949, 950, 961; and Democratic factionalism, 965; and economy, 473-74; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 528; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 599, 605-6, 909, 912, 913, 915-17, 929, 931, 935; and future of Whig party, 767, 824, 825, 835, 879, 907; and justification for survival of Whig party, 212-13; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 813, 825; and Know Nothings/American party, 856, 907-9, 912, 913, 915-17, 929, 931, 932, 934, 935, 939, 945, 949, 964, 965, 968; and Kossuth, 695; and naturalization laws, 229; and omnibus bill, 495; and reading out of Tyler, 137; and revival of Whig party, 960, 984; southern tour of, 854; and Texas annexation, 182; and Union party, 599, 606, 675, 676, 801, 802, 804, 929; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675. See also Kennedy, John Pendletonand election

Kennedy, John Pendleton—and election: of 1844, 182; of 1845, 229; of 1848, 272, 301–2; of 1850–51, 563–64, 625; of 1852, 675–76, 695; of 1854, 879, 907–8; of 1855, 916, 934–35; of 1856, 835, 908, 960–61, 964–65, 968

Kent, Edward, 425, 826, 873, 875, 940, 941, 963 Kent, William, 755, 764

Kentucky: Catholics in, 932, 935-37; class issues in, 117; Clay appointed senator from, 397-98; and Compromise of 1850, 558; constitution of, 305, 440, 458, 558, 596, 630, 663, 958; and demise of Whig party, 926, 971; economy of, 81; and emancipation, 458, 631; internal improvements in, 81, 108; Know Nothings in, 855, 926, 932-37, 972; national versus state issues in, 52; nativism in, 228; and omnibus bill, 509; patronage in, 305, 419, 422-24, 427, 558; reapportionment in, 163, 630; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 81; and rise of Whig party, 34-35; and state party development, 52; and tariffs, 446; temperance in, 936; and Texas annexation, 180, 219; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 138; Union party in, 620-21, 936; Whig constituency in, 116, 117. See also Kentucky—election in; specific person

Kentucky—election in, 630–32, 672; of 1824, 7; of 1832–35, 17–18, 33, 35–36, 45–46, 52; of 1836–37, 45–46, 52, 81; of 1840, 81, 96, 101–2, 108, 113; of 1841–43, 148, 151, 154, 160; of 1844, 149, 174, 180–82, 198; of 1845, 219, 223–24; of 1847, 244, 440, 630; of 1848, 270–71, 277, 285, 298, 300–301, 303–6, 314, 323, 329, 354, 368, 370–71, 630; of 1849–51, 397–98, 440, 558, 596, 630; of 1852, 680,

707, 715, 719, 723–24, 734, 736–37, 743, 753–54, 757, 760; of 1853–55, 792–93, 799, 932–37; of 1856, 969, 971–72, 978–79

Kerr, John L., 163, 624, 735, 736, 821, 926, 933

Ketchum, Hiram, 299, 315, 321

Ketchum, William, 432, 546, 550, 584

Kidd, James, 433, 434, 550, 586, 896, 899, 977

King, George G., 504, 542, 638, 777

King, Preston, 120-21, 466, 827, 896, 947

King, Rufus, 426, 661, 861

King, Thomas Butler: and California, 437, 438–39, 443, 444, 449, 450, 451; Democrats fill seat of, 469; and elections, 237, 243, 262, 265, 322; and patronage, 660; resignation of, 609; and Taylor administration, 403–4, 412, 498

King, William R., 481, 495, 511, 712, 733

Know Nothings: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 845, 859-66, 914-16, 919, 921-23, 929-30, 940; antipartyism of, 865, 914; and blurring of party lines, 912; and conservative Whigs, 908, 910-17, 920, 922, 939, 940; and demise of Whig party, 926, 949-50, 957-60, 968, 975; Democrats as, 856-57, 905, 907, 914-16, 927, 938-39; and economy, 805; emergence of, 805; endorsements by, 849, 864, 906; Fillmore initiated into, 913; Fillmore's commitment to, 974; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 898-99, 902-5, 908-23, 929, 930-31, 937, 942-43; and Free Soilers, 915-16, 922, 931; and Fugitive Slave Act, 930; and future of Whig party, 835, 837, 843, 878, 908, 939-40; and House speakership, 924, 962, 963; and immigrants/Catholics, 805, 845-50; impact of, 805; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 805, 924, 929-31, 942; and Missouri Compromise, 930; national council meeting of (1855), 916, 919-20, 923-25, 929-32; and North American party, 966-67; and northern Whigs, 909, 931-32, 939, 942; and Republican party, 909, 922, 930, 931, 940, 942, 943, 964-67; and republicanism, 844, 845; rise and spread of, 845-50, 865; secrecy of, 845, 848, 849, 855, 865, 884, 908, 911, 913, 931; and Sewardites, 909-11, 922, 923, 931, 940; and Seward's reelection in 1855, 917-19; and Silver Grays, 896, 900, 904-5, 910, 911, 916, 929; and slavery in District of Columbia, 930; in South, 856, 914, 916, 930; and Southern Rights, 937-38; and southern Whigs, 857, 909, 914-16, 919, 922, 923, 926, 932-34; spread of, 906; strength of, 841; and temperance, 805, 957; as Union party core, 805, 909-12, 914, 916, 922-23, 928, 929, 931, 936, 949. See also American party; American party and election; nativism; North American party; specific person or state

Knowlton, Ebeneazar, 874-75

Koerner, Gustave, 744

Kossuth, Louis (Lajos): and election of 1852, 692–97, 700, 717, 730, 737, 739, 742, 744, 750; and Fillmore, 693–95, 776; invited to visit U.S., 601; release of, 601; and southern Whigs, 695; speaking tour of, 695

Lane, Henry S., 688 Langdon, C.C., 320, 325 Larimer, William, 836, 838, 844, 880, 881, 883–84, 889

Law, George, 914, 964, 965

Law, John, 865

Law and Order party, 230

Lawrence, Abbott: and economy, 366; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 931; and Know Nothings, 931; and omnibus bill, 506; and patronage, 425, 506; and Taylor's cabinet, 404, 408, 409, 413; and Texas annexation, 226–27, 235; and Webster, 149–50, 226–27, 321. See also Lawrence, Abbott—and election

Lawrence, Abbott—and election: of 1840, 97, 149; of 1844, 189; of 1848, 321, 326–29, 341, 366, 413

Lawrence, Amos A., 641

Lawrence, James R., 432, 514

Lawrence, Kansas: sack of, 966

Leavitt, Joshua, 342

Lee, Daniel, 675, 774, 776, 813

Legaré, Hugh S., 137

Leigh, Benjamin Watkins, 21, 35, 36, 104

Letcher, Robert P., 33, 129, 135, 147, 164, 174, 285, 304, 409, 425, 793

The Letters of Wyoming (Jackson and Eaton), 6 Levin, Lewis C., 365, 471, 575, 579, 668, 741, 753, 978

Lewis, Dixon H., 21, 73

Lewis, Samuel, 782, 783, 826

Lewis, William D., 407, 427, 429–30, 512–13, 544, 549, 579, 600, 969; and election of 1851, 665–68, 671; and election of 1852, 763

Lexington Address (Clay, 1847), 280–81, 283–87, 290, 300, 312–15

Liberation party, 230

Liberty party: as arm of abolitionism, 155–57; and demise of Whig party, 954; and Free Soilers, 338, 340, 341; and future of Whig party, 213, 224; impact on Whig party of, 155–57, 159, 160; and reassessment of Whig party, 206; rise and expansion of, 196, 332; and Texas annexation, 169, 219, 224, 226, 227; and Whig factionalism, 227–28, 229

Liberty party—and election: of 1840, 112, 156; of 1844, 176, 182–83, 185–87, 191, 194–97, 201–3, 206, 368; of 1845–46, 219, 221, 238–40; of 1848, 261, 266, 315, 319, 332, 334, 338, 340–41, 368; of 1850, 568, 571, 585

Lincoln, Abraham: and cause of Civil War, 983–84; Clay as model for, 288; Congress' relations with, 124; and demise of Whig party, 983–84; and equal rights, 69–70; and Free Soilers, 344, 345; and land revenues, 288; and patronage, 420, 426; and Republican party, 870–71, 983–84; and Shields' senate seat, 870–71; and tariffs, 288; as Taylor supporter, 215; as Young Indian, 288. See also Lincoln, Abraham—and election

Lincoln, Abraham—and election: of 1840, 108; of 1846, 215; of 1848, 215, 288–89, 301–2, 308, 321, 344, 345; of 1854, 869, 870; of 1860, 980

Lincoln, Ezra, 890, 891, 892

Lippard, George, 351-52, 361

Lippard Letter (Taylor, 1848), 351-53, 361

little omnibus bill (1850), 539-42, 546

Loco Foco: meaning of, 109. See also Barnburners; Democratic party; Hunkers

López, Narcisco, 602-3

Louisiana: anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 932; apprehensions about Fillmore in, 524; Catholics in, 934; and Compromise of 1850, 625; constitution of, 224, 625, 736, 760; economy in, 63; ethnicity in, 35-36; internal improvements in, 736; Know Nothings in, 846, 855-56, 933-34; and Mexican Cession, 443; national versus state issues in, 52; nativism in, 228; patronage in, 36, 419; reapportionment in, 36, 159, 625; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80; and rise of Whig party, 34-36; secession threat in, 625; Southern Rights in, 625; and state party development, 52; and tariffs, 446; and Taylor administration, 403, 443-45; and Texas annexation, 181, 200; Union party in, 617, 621, 625; voter fraud in, 198, 206; voter turnout in, 368; voting rights in, 36; Whig strength in, 116, 215; and Wilmot Proviso, 444-45

Louisiana—election in: of 1824, 6, 8; of 1830s, 35–36, 46, 52; of 1840, 198; of 1842–43, 148, 151, 159, 182, 200; of 1844, 149, 181–82, 194, 198, 200, 206, 224, 368, 370; of 1845–46, 224, 228; of 1848, 215, 293, 309, 322–23, 329, 346, 368, 370, 375, 449; of 1849, 442, 449; of 1851, 624–25, 632, 672; of 1852, 680, 707, 732, 734, 736–37, 739, 753–54, 756–57, 760, 856; of 1853, 795–96, 799, 957; of 1855, 932–33, 934; of 1856, 969

Louisiana Purchase (1803), 116, 335 Lumpkin, John H., 449 Lunt, George, 325, 425, 426, 506, 548, 549, 605, 977 Lyman, Samuel, 649 Lyman, Theodore, 321

McClernand, John, 317, 486, 494, 539 McGaughey, Edward, 317, 421, 441, 662, 663 McKay tariff bill (1844), 167, 235 McKennan, Thomas, 528

McLean, John: and antimasonry, 261, 914; and antipartyism, 261, 262, 271–72, 914; as Democrat, 42; and election to Allen's senate seat, 400; and expansionism, 266, 296; and Free Soilers, 339, 340; and Jackson, 261; and Know Nothings, 913–14; and Mexican War, 266, 283, 294, 295–96; and nativism, 318, 847; political career of, 261; presidential ambitions of, 261, 913–14; and Taylor's cabinet, 403, 405, 406, 412–13; and Texas annexation, 262; and Wilmot Proviso, 296. See also McLean, John—and election

McLean, John—and election: of 1832, 15, 261, 914; of 1836, 19, 40, 99, 261, 914; of 1844, 163, 189; of 1848, 261–72, 275, 280–84, 294–97, 299, 301–302, 316–18, 320–23, 328, 339–40, 406, 914; of 1852, 756

McMichael, Morton, 302, 407, 427–28, 445, 454, 665, 668, 847

McPherson, Edward, 666, 670, 918 Madison, James, 2, 4, 288, 382 Maine: anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 872-75, 940; boundary of, 126, 137; and Canadian border clashes, 97; and Compromise of 1850, 560, 561; conservatives in, 940, 942; and demise of Whig party, 971; Democrats in, 800; economy in, 184; and expansionism, 175; Free Soilers in, 341, 373, 378, 380, 451-52, 509, 760, 783-85, 873, 874, 877, 940; and Fugitive Slave Act, 560, 873, 874; immigrants in, 204; Know Nothings in, 871, 873, 875; Liberty party in, 156-57, 186, 228; and Mexican Cession, 452; and Missouri Compromise, 873, 874; national versus state issues in, 50; nativism in, 192, 875; and omnibus bill, 508-9; patronage in, 423, 561; reapportionment in, 157; Republican party in, 874, 875, 940; and rise of Whig party, 34-35; and slavery in District of Columbia, 874; and state party development, 50; and Taylor Plan, 560; temperance in, 689, 747, 762, 783-84, 837, 872-73, 874, 941, 956; and Texas annexation, 185, 201; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675; Whig strength in, 213, 215; and Wilmot Proviso, 560. See also Maine-election in

Maine—election in: of 1830s, 36, 46, 98, 103; of 1840, 102, 112, 196, 204; of 1841, 139; of 1843, 151, 157, 160, 186; of 1844, 149, 175, 184–86, 192, 196–97, 200–201, 204, 215, 373; of 1845–47, 213, 215, 228, 238, 245; of 1848, 317, 319, 325–26, 332, 334, 341, 355, 368, 373, 378, 380; of 1849–51, 442, 451–52, 559–61, 597, 672; of 1852, 637, 672, 675, 683–84, 708, 713, 715, 719–20, 747, 754, 760–62, 783, 980; of 1853–55, 769, 783–85, 799, 871–75, 877, 940–41, 957; of 1856, 971, 976, 980

Maine Law, 792, 832-33, 837, 842. See also Maine Law—and election

Maine Law—and election: of 1852, 689–91, 696, 749, 762; of 1853, 778–79, 782–86, 788, 790–92, 799, 800; of 1854, 832–33, 863–65, 867, 871–72, 873–74, 883, 888, 891, 895, 897–99, 901, 904, 907; of 1855, 921

Mallory, Francis, 128, 149

Mangum, Willie P.: as anti-Jacksonian, 25-26, 28; and Badger, 306; and banks, 24, 25, 27, 129-31; and Calhoun, 96; and California statehood, 464; as chair of Whig caucus, 129; and Clay-Webster relationship, 125; and Committee of Thirteen, 495; and demise of Whig party, 140; and economy, 28; and executive tyranny, 27; and Fillmore, 521, 528; and Jacksonians, 20-21; and naming of Whig party, 29; and nullification, 20-21, 96; and omnibus bill, 495, 500-501, 504; and patronage, 423-24, 465; and reapportionment, 392; resignation/retirement of, 36, 60, 769; and rise and expansion of Whig party, 32, 35; and Round Robin, 621; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 491; and state rights, 96; and tariffs, 167; and Taylor administration, 457, 495; on Taylor's death, 521; and Texas boundary dispute, 535; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 129-31, 147, 149; and Union party, 621; on Whig factionalism, 131. See also Mangum, Willie P.—and election

Mangum, Willie P.—and election: of 1830s, 33, 38-40,

45, 48, 60; of 1840, 104; of 1842, 149; of 1844, 165, 168, 173, 182, 189, 193; of 1848, 260, 262-63, 266-67, 285, 306-7; of 1852, 698-99, 703-5, 724, 728

Manley, Charles, 307, 354, 391, 562

Mann, Alex, 433, 545, 584, 586, 901, 905

Mann, Horace, 341, 582, 583, 696, 762, 787

Marcy, William L., 34, 44, 77-78, 87, 263, 318, 750, 837, 894, 895, 945, 946

Marshall, Alexander, 936

Marshall, Humphrey, 519, 631, 698, 703-4, 711, 727, 734, 793, 933, 936

marshals, U.S., 416, 417, 428, 432, 434

Maryland: antipartyism in, 792; Catholics in, 934-35; and Compromise of 1850, 558, 623; constitution of, 563, 596, 623-24, 752, 958; and demise of Whig party, 971; Democrats in, 800; economy in, 166; immigrants/Catholics in, 752; Know Nothings in, 855, 933, 934-35; and Mexican Cession, 443; National Republicans in, 12; national versus state issues in, 52; nativism in, 192, 228, 229; and omnibus bill, 494, 509; party conflict in, 454-55; patronage in, 427, 544, 563; reapportionment in, 163, 563, 624; and rise of Whig party, 34-35; and state party development, 52; and Taylor Plan, 443; temperance in, 229, 792, 800; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 138; Union party in, 621, 676; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675; Whig strength in, 231. See also Maryland-election in

Maryland-election in: of 1828, 9; of 1830s, 17-18, 36, 45, 52, 98; of 1840, 96, 101-2; of 1841, 139-40; of 1843, 160-61; of 1844, 166, 192, 194, 198, 224; of 1845-47, 224, 229, 238, 245, 288-89, 454; of 1848, 272, 292, 298, 301, 323-25, 368, 370, 413, 427; of 1849-51, 442, 454-55, 558, 563-64, 596, 623-25, 632; of 1852, 676, 680, 724, 734, 736-37, 752, 757, 760-61; of 1853, 792-93, 799-800; of 1855, 933-35; of 1856, 971-72, 978

Mason, James M.: Calhoun speech read by, 484-85; and California statehood, 481, 495-96; and Clay Plan, 481; and Committee of Thirteen, 495-96; and Compromise of 1850, 386, 558; and election of 1850, 558; and fugitive slaves, 474, 488, 496-97, 499; and Mexican Cession, 481; and omnibus bill, 495-96, 499; and slavery in District of Columbia, 481; and Southern Rights, 481; and Texas boundary dispute, 481

Mason, John Y., 150

Massachusetts: abolitionism in, 95, 773; American party in, 892; anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 878, 941-42; antimasonry in, 13, 37-38, 46; apportionment in, 380, 453; Catholics in, 786-87; and Compromise of 1850, 549, 642-43, 762; conservatives in, 160, 381, 506, 941-42; constitution of, 189, 786-87, 799, 889; and demise of Whig party, 971; economy in, 71, 82, 160; and expansionism, 175; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 916-17, 942; Free Soilers in, 341-43, 366, 378, 380-81, 402, 435, 452-53, 462, 506, 579-83, 622, 640-41, 696, 731, 740, 754, 760-62, 775, 786-87, 828, 889-93; Fugitive Slave Act in, 425, 580-81, 583, 604-5, 640,

643-44, 890-91, 917; and future of Whig party, 939; immigrants/Catholics in, 696-97, 743, 889-91; internal improvements in, 82; Irish in, 696, 775, 786–87, 889–91; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 889– 90, 892, 917, 939, 941; Know Nothings in, 871, 878, 880, 889-93, 916-17, 928, 939, 941-42; Liberty party in, 156-57, 202, 227, 229, 380; and Mexican Cession, 581; and Mexican War, 233, 249, 254; Missouri Compromise, 941; National Republicans in, 12-13, 36; National Whigs in, 581; nativism in, 192, 228-29, 786-87, 889, 892; and New Mexico, 581; and omnibus bill, 506, 509-10, 527; and organization of territorial governments, 506; patronage in, 160-61, 425-26, 506, 546-49, 580, 583, 600, 637, 721; reapportionment in, 160; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 82; Republican party in, 890-91, 917, 941-42, 970; and rise of Whig party, 34-35; and tariffs, 243, 446, 580; taxes in, 160; and Taylor Plan, 581; temperance in, 82, 696, 762, 775, 786, 837, 889, 891, 956; and Texas, 224, 226-27, 260, 581; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 138; Union party in, 622, 642; and Utah, 581; Webster as favorite son in, 52, 93, 98; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 640-44, 675; Webster's role in politics of, 580-83, 636, 640-44; and Wilmot Proviso, 254, 452, 506. See also Massachusetts-election in; Young Whigs; specific person

Massachusetts-election in: of 1831-32, 13, 17, 45; of 1834-35, 36, 82; of 1836, 42, 45-46, 52, 82; of 1837-39, 71, 82, 98, 103; of 1840, 82, 95, 97-98, 102, 108, 156, 196; of 1842-43, 151, 157, 160; of 1844, 149, 174-75, 189, 192, 196-97, 201-2, 368, 376; of 1845-47, 228-29, 238, 242, 245, 380; of 1848, 260-61, 266-67, 319, 326, 327, 332, 334, 341-43, 361-62, 366, 368, 376, 378, 380-81, 572-73, 579, 582-83; of 1849-51, 442, 452-53, 549, 572-73, 579-83, 600, 640-44, 672; of 1852, 675, 683, 696-97, 707, 713, 715, 719-20, 723, 731, 738, 742-43, 746, 751, 754, 760-62, 775, 892, 958-59, 980; of 1853, 769-70, 786-87, 799, 889, 957; of 1854, 871, 878, 880, 889-93, 907-8; of 1855, 916-17, 928, 939, 941-42; of 1856, 970-71, 975, 980

Matteson, Joel A., 441, 744

Matteson, Orsamus B., 431-32, 531, 586, 593-94, 827, 833, 906, 909

Maxwell, Hugh, 433-35, 514, 550, 618, 650, 764, 956. See also Maxwell, Hugh—and election

Maxwell, Hugh—and election: of 1850, 550, 586, 589, 590, 592-93, 595; of 1851, 618, 645-46, 649-50, 656; of 1852, 709-10

Meacham, James, 872

Medary, Samuel, 401, 485

Mercer, Pennsylvania: Taylor speech in, 444-45, 451, merchants, 83, 447, 473-74, 494, 497, 504, 656, 738 Meredith, William M.: and economy, 446-49, 458, 472-74; and election of 1849, 442, 445; and factionalism in Pennsylvania, 394; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 528; and Galphin Claim, 497-

Meredith, William M. (continued)

98, 502; and Mexican Cession, 412; and omnibus bill, 507; and patronage, 416, 420–21, 423, 428–29, 434, 457, 544; and tariffs, 445–47; and Taylor administration, 408–9, 411–13, 473–74, 492; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 489; and Wilmot Proviso, 412, 489

Merrick, William D., 132, 221

Merrill, James D., 661

Mexican Cession: and California, 385-86, 388-89, 439, 464-65; and Clay Plan, 479-83; and Committee of Thirteen report, 496; and demise of Whig party, 955, 982; and Democrats' compromise plan, 486; Douglas' proposal for, 385-86, 388-89; and Fillmore administration, 522-23, 526-27, 530, 533-35, 538-39; and Free Soilers, 390, 443; and fugitive slaves, 496; and House speakership, 467, 469; and little omnibus bill, 540-41; and Missouri Compromise, 335, 386; and New Mexico, 439, 533; and northern Whigs, 398, 462-63, 533; and omnibus bill, 460, 482, 496-97, 499-500, 512, 522-23, 526-27, 530; Polk's views about, 386; Root proposal concerning, 483; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 490-91; and southern Democrats, 386, 463, 497, 499; and Southern Rights, 611; and southern Whigs, 388, 443-44, 464-65, 476, 499; and Taylor administration, 359, 386, 388-89, 402, 407, 412, 415, 435, 437, 439, 443-44, 457-58, 461-62, 472, 475-76, 482, 491; and Texas boundary dispute, 389, 480; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 488-89; and Whig factionalism, 457; and Wilmot Proviso, 334, 338, 407, 412, 435, 437, 443. See also Mexican Cession-and election; specific person or state

Mexican Cession—and election: of 1848, 312, 314–15, 330, 334–36, 338, 359; of 1849, 417, 435, 439, 441–42, 449–50, 452; of 1850, 557, 569, 576, 581 Mexican laws: and Clay Plan, 479–83, 486; and little omnibus bill, 540–41; and omnibus bill, 497, 499–500, 530; and slavery, 462–63, 465, 469; and southern Whigs, 494, 530; and Taylor Plan, 475–76; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 488. See also Mexican Cession

Mexican War (1846–48): and California, 233, 248–50, 252, 310; and demise of Whig party, 954, 982; and expansionism, 244, 248–51, 255–57; financing of, 269, 296, 339, 365, 447; morality of, 249, 253, 261, 274, 318; and New Mexico, 249–50, 310; and northern Democrats, 251; and northern Whigs, 249; and party differences, 257–58; peace in, 255–57; as Polk's war, 448; and slavery, 249–55; and southern Democrats, 251; and southern Whigs, 252, 311; Taylor's views about, 308, 310; and Texas annexation, 219, 233. See also Mexican Cession; Mexican War (1846–48)—and election; Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; Wilmot Proviso

Mexican War (1846–48)—and election: of 1846, 242, 245; of 1847, 243–45, 247; of 1848, 248–49, 255–58, 263, 265–67, 270, 274, 276, 278–80, 283, 286, 288, 291, 302, 310–12, 317, 330, 339, 343, 350, 356, 362, 365; of 1852, 731, 739–40, 745–46, 762

Mexico, 176–77, 179, 697, 776. See also Mexican Cession; Mexican War

Michigan: abolitionism in, 195, 213; anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 858-62, 916; and Compromise of 1850, 566-68, 661; constitution of, 37; corruption in, 548; Democrat-Whig alliance in, 515; Democrats in, 800; ethnicity in, 37; and expansionism, 184-85; Free Soilers in, 342-43, 373, 379, 452, 462, 566-68, 661, 663-64, 760, 860-61; Fugitive Slave Act in, 568, 604, 861; and future of Whig party, 842; immigrants/Catholics in, 742, 779, 862; internal improvements in, 234; Know Nothings in, 859-60, 862, 914, 942; Liberty party in, 156-57, 202, 228; and omnibus bill, 511-12; patronage in, 426, 506, 511-12, 515, 547-49, 567, 661, 667; reapportionment in, 163, 568; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80; religion in, 37; Republican party in, 842, 844, 861-62; and slavery in District of Columbia, 861; temperance in, 800, 859; and Texas annexation, 225; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 138; Whig strength in, 32, 37, 213, 215; and Wilmot Proviso, 485. See also Michigan-

Michigan—election in: of 1830s, 36–37, 80; of 1840, 101–3, 196, 213; of 1841, 139; of 1843, 151; of 1844, 183–85, 187, 194–96, 200–202, 206, 215, 373, 376; of 1845–47, 215, 228; of 1848, 332, 342–43, 345, 368, 373, 376, 379, 567–68; of 1849–51, 442, 452, 566–68, 573, 596, 661–62, 672; of 1852, 672, 683, 707–8, 713–14, 717, 719–20, 739, 742, 747, 751, 754, 756, 760–61, 859; of 1853–55, 779, 800, 842, 860–62, 916; of 1856, 970

Milledgeville Convention (1850), 613-14

Miller, Jacob, 487, 709

Miller, Stephen, 180

Mississippi: and California statehood, 463; Democratic strength in, 85, 449, 615-16, 733, 800, 801; economy in, 71, 85, 678; and Force Bill, 35; Know Nothings in, 855-57, 933-34; and Mexican Cession, 443, 449; and Nashville Convention, 463; National Republicans in, 17; national versus state issues in, 50, 52-53; nonpartisanship in, 797; patronage in, 422-23; political realignments in, 71, 73, 607-8; reapportionment in, 163; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80; and rise of Whig party, 35; secession threat in, 449, 601-3, 607, 615; social class in, 85; Southern Rights in, 268, 796; and state party development, 50, 52-53; state rights in, 20, 35, 50, 55, 616; and Taylor Plan, 443; and Taylor's Mercer speech, 444–45; and Texas annexation, 177, 200; Union party in, 607, 613, 615-16, 620, 622, 633, 636, 676-78, 681, 707, 796-97, 955, 958; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675, 677-78; Whig strength in, 116, 213-15, 609; and Wilmot Proviso, 268, 444-45. See also Mississippi—election in

Mississippi—election in: of 1824, 6; of 1832, 12, 17, 46; of 1834, 35; of 1835, 36, 50; of 1836, 46, 50, 52, 55, 85; of 1837–39, 71, 98, 101; of 1840, 80, 85, 101, 108, 198, 615; of 1841, 139, 154; of 1843, 151,

200; of 1844, 166, 181, 198, 200, 215, 368, 370; of 1845–47, 215, 224; of 1848, 268, 298, 323, 346, 351, 368, 370, 449, 615; of 1849, 442, 449, 616; of 1851, 615–16, 622, 633; of 1852, 636, 676–78, 680–81, 683, 697, 703, 707, 733, 758, 760, 958; of 1853, 796–97, 799; of 1855, 933–34

Missouri: and Compromise of 1850, 565; Democrats in, 800; Germans in, 851; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 817, 851–52; Know Nothings in, 850–52, 855, 878; national versus state issues in, 50, 53; nativism in, 851; and omnibus bill, 561; patronage in, 426; reapportionment in, 163, 792; and state party development, 50, 53; and tariffs, 446; and Texas annexation, 200; Union party in, 676; voter turnout in, 371; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675; Whig strength in, 213. See also Missouri—election

Missouri—election in: of 1830s, 33, 36, 46, 50; of 1840, 101–2, 112, 198; of 1842–43, 148, 200; of 1844, 181, 198, 200, 354; of 1846, 354; of 1848, 323, 346, 354, 370–71; of 1850–51, 561, 563, 565–66, 596, 672, 735; of 1852, 676, 680, 715, 717, 722–23, 734–35, 757–58, 760; of 1853, 792, 799, 957; of 1854, 850–52, 878

Missouri Compromise (1820): and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 859; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 945; and future of Whig party, 825, 829, 834, 842– 43; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 806–12, 816, 818, 825, 829, 834; and Know Nothings, 930, 942; and Mexican Cession, 335, 386; and Nashville Convention, 517; and Old Republicans, 5; and Oregon territory, 335; and Republican nationalists, 5; and sectional splits in Congress, 4; and southern Democrats, 806; and Southern Rights, 608; and Taylor administration, 386; and Texas annexation, 220

Missouri Compromise (1820)—and election: of 1824, 5; of 1854, 851, 862, 868, 871, 873–74, 882, 904; of 1855, 941, 945, 947; of 1856, 964 monetary policies: and buying of public lands, 37; Democrats' views about, 66; in 1820s, 4; and elections, 108, 112, 166–67, 310, 365, 685–86; of Jackson, 37, 62; and Old Republicans, 3; and panic of 1837, 64; of Polk administration, 246–47; and recession of 1833–34, 37; and role of government, 952; Taylor's views about, 310; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 148; and Union party, 608; and Van Buren, 62, 65, 81, 148; Whigs' views about, 67. See also Independent Treasury plan

Monroe, James, 4, 261, 288, 382

Moore, Henry D., 728, 743, 746

Moore, John, 698

Morehead, Charles S., 436, 439, 443, 471, 631, 932, 933, 936, 937

Morehead, James, 304, 705

Morehead, John M., 853, 977

Morey, George, 643, 740

Morgan, Christopher, 130-31

Morgan, Edwin B., 827, 833, 902

Mormons, 438, 439

Morrill, Anson P., 783, 784, 785, 940, 941

Morrill, Justin, 183, 346, 708, 785, 872, 873, 874, 875, 960, 963

Morris, Edward Joy, 302–3, 407, 427, 428, 430, 888

Morton, Jackson, 391, 503, 508, 512, 519, 536, 564, 704, 854

Morton, Jeremiah, 437, 467, 468, 469

Morton, Marcus, 82, 108, 157, 160

Mott, Henry S., 884, 885 Mower, John B., 262

Mower, John B., 262

Mudd, J.H. Clay, 237-38

Muhlenberg, Henry, 174, 187, 192

Munroe, John, 529

Nashville Convention (June 1850): Calhoun's call for, 449, 463; and California boundaries, 501; and elections, 554, 562, 564, 627; as failure, 518; and fugitive slaves, 463; Georgia delegates to, 610; and House speakership, 468, 469; meeting and implication of, 517, 601; Sharkey as chair of, 528; and slavery in District of Columbia, 463; and southern Democrats, 486; and Southern Rights, 611; and southern Whigs, 464, 554

National Conservative party, 769, 782, 798

National Intelligencer (Whig newspaper): and Clay Plan, 482; and elections, 39, 732, 971–72, 975–77; and future of Whig party, 818–19; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 814, 818–19; and omnibus bill, 520; and Taylor administration, 406, 415, 482; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 489

National Republicans: and antimasonry, 13–14, 19; and banks, 4–5, 15–17, 23; demise of, 19–20, 27, 211; election strategies of, 14; emergence of, 2–5; and executive tyranny, 24; and Jacksonians, 10–12, 14–19, 21, 24–25, 32; and McLean candidacy, 261; and modernization, 30; and nullification, 12, 21; and republicanism, 14, 17; reputation of, 25; resurrection of, 397; and rise of Whig party, 28–30, 34, 38–39, 46; self-annihilation of, 17; and South, 18–19, 27; and state party development, 49, 52; and tariffs, 11–12, 21; and Taylor's cabinet, 404. See also specific person or state

National Republicans—and election: of 1828, 10; of 1830–31, 11; of 1832, 12, 15–18, 46, 211; of 1834–35, 35, 52; of 1836, 38–41, 52; of 1848, 287, 299

National Whigs: abandonment of Whig party by, 911; conservative Whigs as, 599; and Democrats, 970; and future of Whig party, 908; and Hunkers, 622; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 812–13, 819; and Know Nothings, 910, 915; principles of, 581, 599; and Union party, 606, 622, 675. See also National Whigs—and election; Silver Grays

National Whigs—and election: of 1851, 622; of 1852, 699–701; of 1853–54, 789, 868, 875, 902–4; of 1856, 968, 970, 976

Native American party. See American party; American Republican party

nativism: and demise of Whig party, 953, 959; and expansionism, 250; and Fillmore, 193–94, 205, 207, 912–13; and future of Whig party, 211, 212; and morality, 190; and northern Whigs, 742; and patronage, 428–29; and reassessment of Whig party, 206–7; and republicanism, 190–91; rural-urban attitudes about, 118; and spread of Know Nothings, 856; as state issue, 155; and Taylor administration, 307–8, 408, 413, 428–29, 448, 454, 456. See also American party; American party—and election; American Republican party—and election; Know Nothings naturalization: and elections of 1840s, 203–4, 207, 250, 260, 730; and elections of 1850s, 663, 691, 741, 743, 745, 756; and Know Nothings, 846; and nativism, 191–92; reform of, 228–29

nativism (continued)

Navy Department, U.S., 525, 527, 528

navy yards, 417, 423, 428, 430, 432, 433, 446 Nebraska Act. See Kansas-Nebraska Act Neighbors, Robert S., 518, 519, 520 Nelson, Thomas A.R., 621, 628, 629, 795 neutrality, 101, 601, 602–3, 619, 635, 692, 693, 694, 732, 776

New England: antimasonry in, 13–14, 52; constituencies of political parties in, 117; and demise of Whig party, 981; economy in, 366, 446; Free Soilers in, 338, 344, 374, 378, 380, 556; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 837; Liberty party in, 156; National Republicans in, 13, 46, 52; national versus state issues in, 52; patronage in, 423, 537; and state party development, 52; and tariffs, 446; temperance in, 837; and Texas annexation, 203; voting patterns in, 118. See also New England—election in; specific person or state

New England—election in: of 1830s, 14, 40, 46, 52; of 1840, 97, 100; of 1844, 197, 203, 372; of 1848, 263, 274, 319, 329, 336, 338, 344, 346, 361, 366, 368, 372–74, 378, 380; of 1849, 380, 455; of 1852, 636–37, 707, 711, 715, 717, 720, 723–24, 742, 760; of 1853–55, 777–78, 791, 830–34, 837, 912, 921

New Hampshire: anti-Nebraska coalition in, 920; and Compromise of 1850, 639-40, 730; constitution of, 742-43; economy in, 184; and expansionism, 175; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 920-22; Free Soilers in, 378, 380, 436, 556, 639-40, 777, 831-32, 920-21; and Fugitive Slave Act, 639-40; immigrants/Catholics in, 691, 743; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 831; Know Nothings in, 920-22, 928-29; Liberty party in, 156-57, 228, 230-31; national versus state issues in, 50; and organization of territorial governments, 556; patronage in, 423; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80; Republican party in, 921; and rise of Whig party, 34-35; and state party development, 50; temperance in, 691; and Texas annexation, 226, 230-31; Union party in, 639-40; voter turnout in, 196, 231; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 639-40, 675; Whig strength in, 213, 215; and Wilmot Proviso, 436. See also New Hampshire-election in

New Hampshire—election in: of 1830s, 36, 46; of 1840, 102, 112–13, 196; of 1842–43, 148, 151; of 1844, 175, 184–85, 196–97, 215, 231, 376; of 1845–47, 213, 215, 228, 230–31, 244; of 1848, 261, 319,

368, 373, 376, 378, 380; of 1849–51, 436, 556, 639–40; of 1852, 675, 691, 700, 707, 713, 715, 719–20, 723, 730, 742–43, 760–62; of 1853–55, 777–78, 831–32, 920–21, 928–29

New Hampshire Alliance, 230-31

New Jersey: anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 875-77; banking in, 53-54; and Compromise of 1850, 573, 664; corporations in, 455, 574; economy in, 53, 166, 185, 688, 791; and expansionism, 175; Free Soilers in, 340, 374-76, 378-79, 462, 760, 875; gerrymandering in, 53; internal improvements in, 53-54, 455, 664, 791; Know Nothings in, 866, 871, 876-77; National Republicans in, 12, 52; national versus state issues in, 52-54, 953; nativism in, 303, 375, 448, 791, 875-77; patronage in, 664; reapportionment in, 157, 159, 573; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80; religion in, 37, 54; Republican party in, 980; and rise of Whig party, 34-35; and state party development, 52-54; and tariffs, 184, 367, 445-46; taxes in, 455, 664; temperance in, 791, 800, 875-77; and Texas annexation, 185; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 138; voter turnout in, 367; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 663-64; Whig organization in, 37

New Jersey—election in: of 1820s, 7, 9; of 1830s, 36–37, 45, 52–53, 98; of 1840, 101–4, 107–8; of 1843, 151, 157, 159; of 1844, 149, 166, 168, 175, 184–85, 189, 194, 373–75; of 1846–47, 238, 245, 288–89, 302; of 1848, 263, 274, 302–3, 317, 319–20, 325, 334, 340, 367–68, 373–76, 378–79, 455, 572–7; of 1849–51, 442, 454–55, 572–75, 596, 664, 672; of 1852, 683–84, 688, 700, 708–9, 713–14, 717, 719–20, 741, 747, 751, 753, 756, 760–61; of 1853–54, 791, 799–800, 866, 871, 875–77; of 1856, 877, 979–80

New Mexico: and blurring of party lines, 537; constitution of, 437, 462, 474, 518, 520, 526, 529-30; and debate about territorial governments, 474; and Fillmore, 523, 617; and House speakership, 467-68; House votes about, 541-42; and little omnibus bill, 539-42; and Mexican Cession, 439; and Mexican War, 249-50, 310; and northern Democrats, 106; and northern Whigs, 520, 537-38; and omnibus bill, 494, 499, 506-7, 517, 519-20, 523, 525, 527, 529-30; and patronage, 547; as pro-southern, 535; and Santa Fe confrontation, 518-20, 529-34, 536-38; Senate votes about, 537, 542; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 491; and southern Democrats, 464, 474, 496, 499; and southern Whigs, 464, 533, 537; statehood for, 518, 520, 529-30, 533, 558; and Taylor administration, 385, 412, 437-39, 443-44, 459, 461, 474, 518-20; and Taylor Plan, 472-75, 489, 491, 496-97, 502, 520; territorial status for, 389, 439; and Toombs amendment, 540-41; and Union party, 614; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 488; and Wilmot Proviso, 385, 459, 535, 537-38. See also New Mexico-and election; Texas boundary dispute

New Mexico—and election: of 1849, 451; of 1850, 558, 565, 569–70, 576, 581, 585–87, 594; of 1851, 614, 629

New York: abolitionism in, 95, 97, 100, 195, 227-28, 396, 589, 748, 773, 879, 896, 900, 912; anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 837, 878, 895-96, 900, 903, 906, 945; Anti-Rent movement in, 240-42, 299, 591-92, 647, 655-56; antimasonry in, 13, 16-17, 34, 77, 97-100; antipartyism in, 898; blacks in, 227, 229, 239-40, 299; and California issues, 492, 523; canals in, 62, 76-78, 87, 108, 155, 166, 240, 242, 299, 453, 584, 647, 651-55, 749-51, 788, 799; Clay Whigs in, 493-94, 505-6, 542; and Clay-Taylor relationship, 505; and Compromise of 1850, 550-51, 553, 583-96, 618-19, 645-46, 648, 653, 655, 748, 903; comptrollership in, 395-96; constitution of, 227, 229, 239-40, 299, 652; corruption in, 516; and demise of Whig party, 971; Democratic-Whig alliance in, 513-17, 549-51, 592, 618; Democrats in, 16-17, 83, 164, 453, 800-801, 894, 905; economy in, 61, 63-64, 74, 76-77, 239-40, 247, 363-64, 651-53, 687; ethnicity in, 83; and expansionism, 175, 247; filling of Fillmore's seat in, 394-96; and Fillmore administration, 523-24, 526, 529; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 910-11, 916-19, 945, 949; Fillmore's role in politics in, 394-96, 430-35, 491, 493, 505, 513-17, 523, 527, 542, 544-46, 549-51, 584-86, 589-90, 618, 636, 644-54, 789, 898-99, 902; Free Soilers in, 340-41, 373-74, 376, 378-80, 452-54, 492, 584-85, 592, 594-95, 622, 684, 760-61, 833-35, 878, 895-96, 898, 902-3, 906, 917, 945, 947-48; Fugitive Slave Act in, 585, 589, 591, 604-5, 619, 644, 646-47, 649, 748, 788, 894, 901, 903-4; and future of Whig party, 801-2, 833-34, 908, 910, 939-40; and Geddes Resolutions, 492-93; immigrants/Catholics in, 187, 203-5, 229, 239-40, 747-48, 897-900, 904, 946, 948; and Independent Treasury plan, 242, 247, 363-64; internal improvements in, 78, 234, 240, 363, 750; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 833, 893-95, 897, 899, 901-2, 904; Know Nothings in, 846, 848, 849, 871, 877-78, 880, 893-902, 904-7, 913-19, 922, 929, 945-47; law and order in, 241; Liberty party in, 156, 185, 191, 202, 227-28, 239-40, 585; and little omnibus bill, 542; and Mexican Cession, 492-93; and Mexican War, 242; and Missouri Compromise, 904, 945, 947; morality as issue in, 118; National Republicans in, 34, 52; national versus state issues in, 52; nativism in, 192-93, 228-29, 239, 276, 299, 741, 894, 896-97, 899-901, 904, 906, 917-19; and New Mexico issues, 523; Nine Million Loan in, 652-53, 655, 687, 788; and omnibus bill, 505-6, 509, 513-17, 523-24, 529; and organization of territorial governments, 492, 505, 591; progressives in, 299; reapportionment in, 157, 163; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 76-79; Republican party in, 868, 894-96, 903, 945-49, 970, 976; and rise of Whig party, 34, 52; Seward's reelection in, 917-19; and slavery in District of Columbia, 492; suffrage in, 227, 229, 239-40, 299; and tariffs, 184, 187, 205, 240, 242, 247, 750; taxes in, 131, 155, 166; and Taylor administration, 403, 444, 492-94, 505-6, 588; temperance in, 689, 748-49, 788, 800, 837, 893-902, 904, 907, 946-47; and Texas annexation, 185–87, 203, 224, 239; and Texas boundary dispute, 492, 585–86, 591, 618–19; Union party in, 591–92, 617–18, 622, 646, 649, 656; and Utah, 585; voter fraud in, 198, 204; voter turnout in, 74, 78, 368; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 644–54, 656; Whig strength in, 116, 215, 231; and Wilmot Proviso, 363, 434, 453, 485, 492–93, 526, 589. See also Barnburners; Hunkers; New York City; New York conservatives; New York—election in; Silver Grays; specific person

New York-election in: of 1820s, 7, 8, 9; of 1832, 14, 16; of 1834-35, 34, 36, 41, 52; of 1836, 45, 46, 52, 78; of 1837–39, 74, 77–78, 87, 93, 98, 103; of 1840, 95-104, 108-9, 112, 196-97; of 1841-43, 139-40, 151, 155, 191; of 1844, 118, 149, 166, 175, 184-87, 191-98, 200-206, 276, 299, 301, 368, 372, 376, 592; of 1845-47, 227-29, 238-43, 245, 247, 363, 373; of 1848, 215, 263, 274, 277, 293, 298–301, 309, 317– 18, 320-21, 323, 326, 328-30, 332-34, 336, 340-41, 348, 351-53, 361, 363-64, 368, 372-76, 378-80, 453, 572-73, 584, 592-94; of 1849, 394-96, 433-35, 442, 452-55, 491, 584; of 1850, 549-51, 553, 572-73, 583-96, 600; of 1851, 514, 600, 618, 633, 637, 644-56, 672; of 1852, 637, 672, 681, 683-84, 687, 689, 705, 707-11, 713-17, 719-20, 737-42, 746-51, 754, 756, 760-62, 789, 903, 906-7, 958, 980; of 1853, 768, 787-89, 799-801, 957; of 1854, 833-34, 837, 871, 878-80, 893-908, 910; of 1855, 916-19, 945-49; of 1856, 970-71, 976-77, 979-80 New York Central Whig Association (NYCWA), 899-900

New York Central Railroad, 747

New York City: and Clay as independent candidate, 361; conservatives in, 353; education in, 190; Free Soilers in, 338; immigrants in, 78; Know Nothings in, 837; nativism in, 190, 191–93, 203, 205, 228, 741, 837; North American convention in, 964–67; and panic of 1837, 61; patronage in, 138, 419, 425, 430–31, 433; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 78; Republican party in, 946–47; and rise of Whig party, 34; and Taylor administration, 394; Union party in, 654, 656, 676; voter fraud in, 228; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675; Webster's strength in, 91, 93, 97; Whig convention (1856) in, 960–61. See also merchants; New York City—election in

New York City—election in: of 1840, 79, 91, 93, 97; of 1842, 150; of 1844, 191–93, 203, 205, 228; of 1845, 228; of 1848, 281, 299–301, 308, 338, 348, 353, 361, 364; of 1849–51, 435, 592–93, 656; of 1852, 676, 709–10, 740–41, 762; of 1853, 803

New York conservatives: and Anti-Rent movement, 241; and banks, 68, 77–78, 87; and demise of Whig party, 959–60; and Democrat-Whig alliance, 515; and Fillmore, 491, 515, 523, 545, 547, 550, 919; and Geddes resolutions, 492–93; and Kossuth, 694; and nativism, 299, 900; and omnibus bill, 506, 512–13, 529; and patronage, 433–35, 512–15, 545, 547, 550; and Republican party, 946–47; and state constitution, 239; Weed-Seward rivalry with, 433–35, 491;

and Weed's manifesto, 523. See also New York conservatives—and election; Silver Grays

New York conservatives—and election: of 1837–40, 68, 74; of 1849, 434–35, 453; of 1850, 550, 573, 584–86, 589–92, 595; of 1852, 682, 694, 740–42, 748, 761–62; of 1853, 768; of 1854, 890, 899–900, 903–4, 910; of 1855, 919, 946–47; of 1856, 959–60

Newell, George, 749, 750

Newton, Isaac, 912-13, 965

Newton, Willoughby, 220, 223

Nicholson Letter (Cass, 1847), 357

Niles, John M., 341, 344, 360, 366, 436

Nine Million Loan (New York), 652-53, 655, 687, 749, 750, 788

Nisbet, Eugenius, 938

nonintervention policy, 692, 693, 694, 696, 737, 739, 750, 776

nonpartisanism. See antipartyism/nonpartisanism Norris, William B., 428

North American party, 964-65, 966-67

North Carolina: and Compromise of 1850, 494, 561-62, 626-27; constitution of, 57, 958; demise of Whig party in, 392-93; economy in, 56-57, 71, 166; and expansionism, 247, 279; and Fillmore, 525, 627; gerrymandering in, 626; and Independent Treasury plan, 247; internal improvements in, 57, 81-82, 109, 118, 391, 562; judiciary in, 391-92; Know Nothings in, 933-34, 969; land revenues in, 795, 799; and Mexican War, 247, 279; and Nashville Convention, 562; National Republicans in, 35; national versus state issues in, 953; patronage in, 422-24, 427; railroads in, 155, 244, 562, 795, 852-53; and Raleigh Clique, 391-93; reapportionment in, 149, 157, 163, 354, 391-92, 707, 853; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 81-82; and rise of Whig party, 35; secession threat in, 626-27; senatorial decisions in, 391-93; and Southern Rights, 561, 626; state rights in, 20, 35; suffrage in, 391, 853; and tariffs, 244, 247; and Texas annexation, 181, 219; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 148-49; Union party in, 607, 621; voter turnout in, 57-58, 196, 354, 359-60, 368, 371; voting rights in, 354; Whig constituency in, 56-58, 118; Whig revival in, 984-85; and Wilmot Proviso, 392. See also North Carolina—election in northern Democrats, 338, 339–40, 440, 465, 486, 983. See also northern Democrats—and election; specific person, state, legislation, or topic northern Democrats—and election: of 1844, 173–75; of 1848, 338–40, 360, 369–70, 384

North Carolina—election in: of 1824, 7; of 1832, 12, 46; of 1834–35, 35, 36, 56; of 1836, 46, 56–58; of 1837–39, 71, 81, 98, 100–101; of 1840, 101–2, 108–9, 196; of 1841–43, 148–49, 151, 155, 157, 160–61; of 1844, 149, 166, 174, 181–82, 194, 196, 198, 200, 354, 368, 370; of 1845–47, 219, 223, 238, 242–44, 247, 354, 440; of 1848, 247, 279, 285, 298, 300–301, 303–4, 306–7, 323, 348, 354, 359–60, 368, 370–71, 413, 562; of 1849–51, 440, 561–63, 596, 626–27, 632; of 1852, 627, 680, 703, 707, 715, 723–24, 734–37, 756–58, 760; of 1853–55, 769, 792, 795, 799, 852–54, 877, 933–34; of 1856, 969, 972, 978–79

northern Whigs: as challenge to saving Whig party, 633; and Clay, 94–95; and Fillmore, 524, 527–29, 598–99, 602; and Free Soilers, 334, 339–40, 342–45; and future of Whig party, 773–74, 823, 835, 909; and launching of new sectional party, 826; and third parties, 773–74. See also New York conservatives; northern Whigs—and election; specific person, state, legislation, or topic northern Whigs—and election: of 1840, 92, 94–95, 100; of 1844, 162, 176, 180, 183–87; of 1845, 221; of 1848, 273–75, 277–78, 280–82, 291, 298, 309, 312–20, 330, 334, 338–40, 342–45, 352–53, 360–68; of 1849, 459, 461

Northwest Ordinance (1787), 343-45, 469

nullification: and Clay-Webster relationship, 125; in early 1830s, 20–21; and elections, 38–40, 44, 96; and expansion of anti-Jacksonians, 20, 25; and Georgia Democrats, 610; Jackson and, 20–23, 472, 518; and National Republicans, 12; and rise of Whig party, 32, 38–39, 46; and Webster's ambitions, 91. See also Nullification Proclamation (1833); specific person

Nullification Proclamation (1833), 20–23, 35, 39, 91, 104, 125

Ogden, James, 349

Ogle, Andrew Jackson, 577

Ogle, Charles, 107

Ohio: abolitionism in, 95, 400, 443, 773; anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 858-63, 865, 916, 943-44; antimasonry in, 34, 40; apportionment in, 399-402; black laws in, 399-401; blurring of political parties in, 570; and California statehood, 569; and Compromise of 1850, 568-72, 657-58; conservatives in, 658, 768-69, 865, 944; constitution of, 362, 400-402, 443, 452, 570, 658-60, 663, 782, 958; corporations in, 401-2; Democrats in, 85, 164, 658, 800; economy in, 53, 85, 362, 400-401, 443, 452, 568, 570, 659; and expansionism, 175, 256, 279; and Fillmore, 524, 527, 945; Free Soilers in, 340-43, 362-63, 374, 378-79, 397-402, 435, 443, 452, 462, 485, 568-72, 657-59, 664, 752, 761, 781-83, 800, 860–63, 878, 944; and Fugitive Slave Act, 569, 570, 657-59, 862; gerrymandering in, 399; Hunkers in, 571; immigrants/Catholics in, 696, 742-46, 779-80; internal improvements in, 234, 402, 659; Know Nothings in, 846, 859, 863, 865, 878, 914, 916, 942; Liberty party in, 156-57, 185, 187, 238, 332, 400, 568, 571; and Mexican Cession, 452, 512, 569; and Mexican War, 254, 256, 266, 279, 294, 362; and Missouri Compromise, 862; monetary policies in, 402; National Republicans in, 34, 52; national versus state issues in, 52-53, 953; nativism in, 859, 944; and New Mexico, 569; and omnibus bill, 512, 524; and organization of territorial governments, 569-70; patronage in, 401, 512, 546, 600, 658-60; People's party in, 844, 862-63, 865, 944; and popular sovereignty, 569; primacy of state issues in, 398-402; printing contracts in, 401, 657; Quakers in, 318, 362; reapportionment in, 157, 159, 163, 362, 659, 781; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80; Republican party in, 861, 944, 945; and rise of Whig party, 34; and secession threat, 494; and senatorial appointment for Allen, 398-402; and slavery in District of Columbia, 658, 862; and state party development, 52-53; tariffs in, 160; taxation in, 401, 659-60; and Taylor Plan, 569; temperance in, 362, 781-83, 800, 859, 956; and Texas issues, 185, 224, 226, 570; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 138; Union party in, 617-18, 657; and Utah, 570; voter turnout in, 363, 570-71; voting patterns in, 118; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 657-60; Whig unity in, 230; and Wilmot Proviso, 400, 401, 569, 570. See also Ohio-election in; specific person

Ohio-election in: of 1824, 7; of 1832, 14, 45; of 1834-35, 33-34, 36, 53; of 1836, 40, 45, 50, 52-53, 85; of 1838-39, 98, 100, 103; of 1840, 85, 91-93, 95-97, 100, 102-4, 108, 110; of 1841-43, 139, 151, 157, 159-60, 570; of 1844, 164, 166, 174-75, 185, 187, 194, 363, 368, 374, 376; of 1845-47, 230, 238, 242, 245, 256, 363, 374, 570-71; of 1848, 262, 265-67, 274, 277, 279, 294-98, 309, 315-18, 321, 323, 326-28, 330, 332, 334, 341-43, 361-64, 368, 373-74, 376, 378-79, 399-400, 413, 571; of 1849, 397, 435, 442-43, 452, 456; of 1850, 568-72, 596, 600; of 1851, 600, 637, 657-60, 663, 672; of 1852, 637, 658, 672, 683-84, 696, 708-9, 713-14, 717, 719-20, 723, 737-46, 751-54, 756, 760-61, 980; of 1853, 768-69, 777, 779-83, 800, 859; of 1854, 860-62, 865, 878; of 1855, 916, 943-45; of 1856, 980 Old Republicans/Radicals, 3-4, 5-6, 11. See also specific person omnibus bill (1850): amendments to, 523, 530-31; and apprehensions about Fillmore, 521-24; and Clay-Taylor relationship, 505, 508; as "Clay's compromise," 499; Clay's revision of, 499; Committee of Thirteen as basis of, 486-87, 494-8, 503; and Constitution, 499; deadlock over, 517, 520, 530; and Democrat-Whig alliance, 508, 510-17; Democrats propose, 485-86; and elections, 508, 559, 561, 576, 755; and Fillmore, 505-6, 514, 516, 521-23, 525-29, 533; Foote proposal concerning, 487; and Free Soilers, 504; and Galphin Claim, 497-98; House debate about, 504; introduction of, 486-87, 498-501, 507, 530, 558; and northern Democrats, 494-95, 501, 506, 509, 531; and northern Whigs, 499-500, 504-5, 508, 510, 517, 519-20, 523-24, 530-32, 535; and patronage, 503, 505-6, 510-17; revision of initial, 499-501; Senate debate about, 482-504; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 489-91; and southern Democrats, 481-82, 486, 494-96, 499, 501, 508, 517, 531; and southern Whigs, 486, 496-97, 499-500, 503-5, 508, 517, 519, 531; and Taylor administration, 497, 499-503, 519-20; unraveling of, 531-33, 535, 538; votes concerning, 532, 535. See also California; Clay Plan; Compromise of 1850; District of Columbia, slavery in; election of 1850; Fugitive Slave Act; little omnibus bill; Mexican Cession; Mexican laws; New Mexico; Texas boundary dispute; Utah; Wilmot Proviso; specific person or state

Order of the Star Spangled Banner, 803, 904

Order of United Americans. See Know Nothings Oregon, 232–33, 251, 334–35, 336, 337–38, 343. See also Oregon—and election

Oregon—and election: of 1844, 173, 184–85, 188,

203, 206; of 1847, 244; of 1848, 232, 312, 335–38, 343, 350, 357

Orth, Godlove, 230, 264, 273, 290–91, 308, 312, 318, 348, 862, 864–66, 916, 923, 925

O'Sullivan, John L., 232, 603

Otis, Harrison Gray, 97, 98

Otis, John, 535, 536, 560

Outlaw, David: and Calhoun's third party efforts, 386; and California, 464, 483; and Clay Plan, 482–83; and Clay-Taylor relationship, 519; and Free Soilers, 342; and Galphin Claim, 498; and House speakership, 471; and Mexican Cession, 482–83; and Mexican War, 257, 311; and omnibus bill, 500–501, 517, 519; and Oregon, 337–38; and Taylor administration, 483, 498–99, 519; and Texas boundary dispute, 519. See also Outlaw, David—and election

Outlaw, David—and election: of 1848, 273, 289–90, 303, 338, 342; of 1852, 703–5, 734; of 1853–54, 795, 853

Owen, Allen, 467, 468, 469, 519, 613, 621

Pakenham, Richard, 171, 599

Pakenham Letter, 171, 172

Palfrey, John Gorham, 226, 333, 341, 380–81, 385, 583 Panic of 1819, 4–5

Panic of 1837–38: banks as cause of, 61, 62–65, 84, 87; as beginning of economic cycle shaping political agenda, 61; effect on Whig political fortunes of, 61, 70, 84, 952; and elections, 64, 70, 84, 92; and expansion of Whig party, 64–65, 70, 87–88; Jackson blamed for, 62; and political realignments, 71; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 76, 80, 82, 84; Van Buren's views about, 65

Parker, Samuel W., 441, 662-63, 703, 923

Parker, Theodore, 826, 830

patronage: of Adams administration, 7; and confirmation of appointments, 430, 433; and demise of Whig party, 956-57; and future of Whig party, 211; of Harrison administration, 122-25; and House speakership, 963; of Jackson administration, 24, 29, 42; of Johnson (Andrew) administration, 124; and nepotism, 420; and party differences, 418; of Pierce administration, 765, 787, 800, 965; and policies, 427, 435; of Polk administration, 175, 251, 422, 436, 448; purposes of, 416-18, 421; of Tyler administration, 127-28, 132, 137-38, 150, 154, 160-61, 163-64, 170; and Van Buren administration, 441, 452-53; and Whig control of government, 122, 123. See also patronage (Fillmore); patronage (Taylor); patronage—and election; printing contracts; specific person or state patronage (Fillmore): and apprehensions about Fillmore, 522–23; and blurring of party lines, 552; and patronage (Fillmore) (continued)

cabinet, 637; and California statehood, 547; and canals, 650; and Compromise of 1850, 537, 539, 545–51, 555, 567; and confirmation of appointments, 537, 546–47, 549; and corruption, 547–48; and demise of Whig party, 954; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 543–44, 547–48, 552; and New Mexico, 547; and New York politics, 416–17, 425, 430–35, 505–6, 513–17; and northern Whigs, 599, 633; and preservation of Whig harmony, 547; as problem, 599–600; as punishment, 396, 550–51, 600, 633; and Taylor's appointments, 544–49; and Texas boundary dispute, 537, 539, 547; and Webster-Fillmore relationship, 635; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 661, 663–67, 677 patronage (Taylor): and blurring of party lines, 460–61, 517; and Compromise of 1850, 544–46; and confirmation of appointments, 505, 510–17, 544, 546–49; and control of Whig party, 384, 390; and demise of Whig party, 954, 956; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 510–17; importance of, 442; and nonpartisanism, 437, 440, 509; and northern Whigs, 483; and omnibus bill, 461, 503, 505–6, 509, 510–17, 531; and policies, 465; and southern Whigs, 511; and Taylor Plan, 506; and Taylor Republicanism, 414–35, 454, 456–57; and Texas boundary dispute, 537; Whigs' anger about, 448, 457 patronage—and election: of 1848, 327; of 1849, 440, 442, 450, 454; of 1850, 545, 549–51, 558, 561, 563, 565–67, 577, 579–80, 583–84, 589–90, 595–96, 600, 628; of 1851, 600, 628, 646, 650–51, 653, 656, 658–60, 662, 664, 667–68; of 1852, 597, 637, 661, 674, 677, 681, 721; of 1853, 787

Patterson, George W., 300, 321, 339, 363, 431, 655, 898, 900–902, 906

Patterson, Samuel F., 853

Payne, Henry, 658, 659

Pearce, James: and California, 537; and demise of Whig party, 959; and Democrat-Whig alliance, 516; and elections, 292, 413, 563–64, 724, 752, 934–35, 970; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 525, 527–28; and future of Whig party, 910; and Johnson [Reverdy], 495; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 817, 819; and Know Nothings, 910, 934–35; and omnibus bill, 495, 516, 531–32, 534; and patronage, 427, 430, 433, 458; and Republican party, 910; and Round Robin, 621; and slavery in District of Columbia, 538; and Taylor administration, 427, 430, 433, 457–58, 495; and Texas boundary dispute, 531–32, 534–36, 538–39, 559

Pearce, J.J., 885, 886

Pearce amendment, 559, 570

Pendleton, John C.: and Clay's return to Senate, 397; and elections, 243, 286–88, 424; and House speakership, 469; and Mexican War, 243; and patronage, 420, 424; and Southern Address, 437, 469; and tariffs, 243; and Taylor Republicanism, 398; and Taylor's cabinet, 403

Pennington, Alexander C.M., 876, 962-63

Pennsylvania: anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 878, 885; antimasonry in, 13, 16–17, 37–38, 42, 54–55, 79–

80, 91, 97-98, 100-101, 884, 887; and California statehood, 507, 576; canals in, 80, 789-90; and Clay Plan, 506-7; Clay Whigs in, 507-8; and Compromise of 1850, 549, 573, 576-77, 664-65, 667-68. 671, 709; conservatives in, 79, 669, 917; corruption in, 364; Democratic party in, 16-17, 79, 83-84, 148, 163, 800, 889; Democratic-Whig alliance in, 515, 549; economy in, 166, 185, 393, 454, 669, 789-90; education in, 192, 880-81; ethnicity in, 83; and expansionism, 175, 256-57; and Fillmore, 524, 666-68, 671, 912-13, 916-17; Free Soilers in, 340, 364, 374, 376, 378–79, 462, 485, 575, 760, 866, 878, 880-84, 887; Fugitive Slave Act in, 576-77, 579, 604-5, 665-67, 669-70, 882, 943; and future of Whig party, 667, 907-8; gerrymandering in, 79; immigrants/Catholics in, 187, 205, 670-71, 684, 696-97, 743-45, 753, 880-84, 887-89; internal improvements in, 54, 79, 230, 446, 789-90; judiciary in, 670; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 880-81, 883-84, 887-88; Know Nothings in, 846, 866, 871, 877-78, 880, 883-84, 912-14, 916-17, 942-43, 969; and land revenues, 191; Liberty party in, 156, 376; and Mexican Cession, 576; and Mexican War, 256-57; and Missouri Compromise, 882; National Republicans in, 408; national versus state issues in, 54-55; nativism in, 191-92, 228-29, 238, 245, 276, 302-3, 319, 328, 364-65, 367, 375, 408, 427-29, 448, 454, 513, 544, 579, 667-68, 670-71, 684, 697, 741, 753, 761, 767, 790, 880, 882-88, 943, 969; and New Mexico, 507, 576; and omnibus bill, 506-9, 512-13, 524, 576; and organization of territorial governments, 507; patronage in, 150, 161, 175, 375, 394, 416-17, 421, 427-30, 454, 512-13, 515, 544, 547-49, 577, 579, 600, 664-68, 684; and popular sovereignty, 576; reapportionment in, 157, 159; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 79-80; Republican party in, 888, 943, 980; and secession threat, 485, 494; state debt in, 669; state party development in, 54-55; tariffs in, 148, 161, 163, 183-84, 187, 191-92, 243, 247, 256, 264, 302, 350, 365, 367-68, 375, 393, 444-47, 454, 507, 578, 669, 738, 882; and Taylor Plan, 506-7, 575-76; Taylor Republicanism in, 408, 454, 505, 969; Taylor's trip to, 444; temperance in, 790, 800, 881-83, 886, 888; and Texas issues, 185, 205, 226, 669; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 138; Union party in, 665, 668-69; and Utah, 576; voting in, 79, 118, 161, 198, 238, 257, 367-68, 454, 577; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 663-72, 675; Whig organization in, 37, 215, 231; and Wilmot Proviso, 365; Young Whigs in, 394. See also Pennsylvania election in; Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; specific per-

Pennsylvania—election in: of 1824, 7; of 1832, 14, 16, 46; of 1834–35, 36, 38, 42, 54–55, 79; of 1836, 41–42, 46, 54–55, 60, 79, 84; of 1837–39, 79, 98, 100, 103; of 1840, 79–80, 91, 93, 97, 100–104, 108, 112–13, 193, 196–97, 367, 375; of 1841, 139–40; of 1843, 151, 157, 159–60; of 1844, 166–68, 174–75, 183–85, 187, 191–94, 196–98, 200–201, 205, 276, 301, 367–68, 373–75; of 1845–46, 228, 230, 238, 242, 302, 375; of 1847, 245, 247, 256, 288–89, 302, 364, 367, 375; of 1848, 215, 247, 263, 266, 274, 277, 282, 301–3, 317–20, 323, 326, 328, 330, 340, 343–44, 346, 350, 361, 364–65, 367–68, 373–76, 378–79, 454, 572–73, 575, 577–78, 667; of 1849, 393–94, 442, 445–47, 449, 454–56, 577; of 1850–51, 572–73, 575–79, 596, 664–72, 790; of 1852, 394, 672, 675, 681, 683–84, 696–97, 708–9, 713–14, 717, 719–20, 723, 738, 741, 744–47, 751, 753–54, 756, 760–61, 790, 958, 980; of 1853, 789–90, 800; of 1854, 846, 866, 871, 878, 880–89, 907–8, 968; of 1855, 888–89, 916–17, 943; of 1856, 969, 978–80

Pennsylvania Railroad, 230, 789, 881

Penrose, Charles B., 100-103, 428

People's party, 781, 794, 841–42, 844, 862–65, 877, 916, 944

Perkins, Jared, 640, 831, 920

Perkins, Thomas C., 420

Perrin, Darrius, 432

Peters, Samuel J., 322, 419

Peyton, Bailie, 309, 322, 397, 418, 425, 431, 449, 456, 858

Peyton, Joseph H., 219, 220

Phelps, Samuel, 336, 495, 501, 535–36, 538, 559–60, 786, 819, 853, 871–72

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: American party convention in, 963–65; education in, 190; Know Nothings national council meeting in, 922–25, 929–32; Kossuth in, 694; nativism in, 190–93, 205–6, 228; Republican convention in, 963–65; Taylor rally in, 301–3, 413; Union party in, 606, 637; voter fraud in, 228; Whig convention in (1848), 284–85, 288–93, 297, 301, 305–6, 319–30, 332, 347–48, 365. See also Philadelphia, Pennsylvania—election in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania—election in: of 1844, 191–93, 205–6, 228; of 1848, 281, 367; of 1849, 454 Phillips, Stephen C., 226–27, 333, 341–42, 366, 380 Phoenix, J. Phillips, 430, 586, 593

Pierce, Franklin, 230–31, 731, 742–43, 776; and Democratic divisiveness, 765–67, 774, 800–801, 804; and future of Democratic party, 800–803. See also election of 1852

Pike, James S., 771, 826, 872–73. See also Pike, James S.—and election

Pike, James S.—and election: of 1850, 560–61; of 1852, 697–99, 703–4, 710, 712, 719, 723, 728–29, 753; of 1854, 872–73, 882

Pillsbury, Albert G., 783, 784

Pitman, Charles, 577

Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, 116, 228, 263, 340, 343, 367, 741

Platt, Isaac, 432, 515

Pleasants, John H., 212

policies: and patronage, 427, 435, 465; relationship between voting behavior and, 76–82 political parties: in 1820s and 1830s, 12, 64–65; blurring of lines among, 460, 484, 508, 510–17, 537, 542, 552, 554, 570, 577, 688, 821–22, 912, 954, 955; and first party system, 2; and identity as shaper of behavior, 119; ideological differences between, 87–

88; and launching of new sectional party, 821–35; and launching of third parties, 772–75; loyalty to, 154, 195, 199, 226, 298, 340, 348–49; and republicanism, 349; role of, 212–13; Taylor's views about, 473. See also antipartyism/nonpartisanism; political parties, differences between; political realignments; third party efforts; specific party political parties, differences between: and Compromise of 1850, 533; and demise of Whig party, 953–54, 955; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 543; and disintegration of parties, 800; and economy, 245–47; and expansionism, 250; and Free Soilers, 342; and future of Whig party, 209–13, 224, 231–32; importance of, 115, 120–21; and Mexican War, 250, 257–58; and national versus state issues, 223; and party ideology, 69; and patronage, 418; and Polk administration, 226, 231–38; and republicanism, 120–21, 349; and tariffs, 234–36; and Texas annexation, 226; and voting, 154–55, 533; weakening of, 460; and Wilmot Proviso, 250–55. See also political parties, differences between—in election political parties, differences between—in election: of 1844, 120, 165–66, 168, 175–76, 183–84, 196, 199, 359, 954; of 1848, 257–58, 342, 349–50, 356; of 1852, 674 political realignments: in 1828, 7, 11; and Compromise of 1850, 554–55, 606; in early and mid-1830s, 20–32; Fillmore's views about, 618; and institutionalization of Whig party, 122; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 821–35; in late 1830s, 71–76; and state rights, 23–24; and Taylor Republicanism, 510. See also American party; political realignments—and election; Republican party; Union party political realignments—and election: of 1836, 45–49; of 1840, 71, 88; of 1850s, 554–55, 614, 618

Polk, James K.: annual messages of, 232, 256, 386; as dark-horse candidate, 173, 174; and elections, 84, 139–40; and House speakership, 32, 42; inaugural address of, 232; legacies of, 350. See also election of 1844; specific person or topic

Pollock, James, 830, 836, 844, 881-85, 908

Pond, Elias, 650-51

popular sovereignty: and Clay Plan, 486; Democrats conceptualization of, 319; Democrats repudiation of, 400–401, 438, 485; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 806–10, 812, 814, 816, 818, 821; and northern Democrats, 485; and northern Whigs, 475; and omnibus bill, 486, 494, 499, 513; and southern Democrats, 385–86; and southern Whigs, 499; and Taylor Plan, 475; and Toombs amendment, 541. See also popular sovereignty—and election popular sovereignty—and election: of 1848, 335, 338, 360, 475; of 1849–50, 436, 441, 452, 569, 576; of 1855–56, 925, 964, 967

populism. See antimasonry

Porter, David R., 79-80, 150

Porter, Gilchrist, 851

postmasters, 111, 391, 405–6, 416–17, 421, 423, 428, 432–33, 526, 527

Powell, Lazarus, 354, 630, 631

Pratt, Thomas G., 495, 563, 621, 817, 819, 935, 970 Prentice, George D., 304, 936, 937

Preston, William Ballard: and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 525; and future of Whig party, 910; and impeachment threats against Taylor, 519; and Know Nothings, 910, 933, 936–37; and Mexican Cession, 412; and patronage, 421, 434; and Republican party, 910; as secretary of navy, 389; and Taylor's cabinet, 409, 411–13; and Wilmot Proviso, 389–90, 398, 412; as Young Indian, 286, 321. See also Preston, William Ballard—and election

Preston, William Ballard—and election: of 1848, 268, 272, 286–88, 305–6, 321, 330, 413; of 1855, 933, 936–37

Preston, William C., 94–95, 103–4, 107, 132 Preston amendment, 435–38, 450, 474 printing contracts: and Compromise of 1850, 537, 551, 567, 577, 579; and editors as postmasters, 416; and elections, 567, 577, 579, 583, 600, 657, 661, 666; and Fillmore administration, 537, 547, 551, 567, 577, 579, 583; and Fugitive Slave Act, 657; importance of, 401, 450; and omnibus bill, 506; and Taylor administration, 511 prohibition. See temperance protectionism. See temperand

Protestantism, 117, 118, 188, 959. See also evangelical Protestants

Public Warehouse Act, 234, 237, 246, 366, 446-48, 473-74, 497

Purcell, John B., 743, 780

Purvear, Richard, 820, 827, 934

Quakers, 37, 54, 318, 355, 362, 507, 662 quiescent policy, 765–69, 772, 800, 957 Quitman, John A., 449, 601–3, 607, 615–16, 731–32

Radicals/Old Republicans. See Old Republicans railroads, 247, 455, 686, 738, 806, 955; and elections, 663–64, 775, 789–91, 795. See also internal improvements; specific railroad

Raleigh Clique, 391-93, 424, 562

Raleigh Letter (Clay, 1844), 172, 176–77, 179–81, 186, 267, 278–279

Randall, Josiah, 408, 606, 665-69

Randolph, Joseph F., 977

Rantoul, Robert, Jr., 175, 583, 641

Raymond, Henry J., 492, 648, 694, 770–71, 832, 834, 901, 983. See also Raymond, Henry J.—and election

Raymond, Henry J.—and election: of 1851, 648; of 1852, 704, 716, 719–20, 722–23, 730, 750, 755; of 1854, 832, 901–3

Rayner, Kenneth, 769, 917, 923–24, 929–30

Ready, Charles, 795, 821

reapportionment: and census of 1850, 568; in early 1840s, 149, 151, 157, 159–60; and elections, 151, 163, 354, 362, 568, 609, 610, 659, 852; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 149. See also specific state recession: of 1833–34, 24–25, 27, 37, 50; of 1848, 365–67, 416; of 1854–55, 805

Reed, Isaac, 873–75, 940–41

Reed, Isaac, 675–75, 940–4

Reed, William, 668-69

Reese, David A., 798, 939

Reid, David, 354, 562, 627, 707, 735–36, 760, 852 Republic (Whig newspaper): Bullitt fired from, 501– 2; and Clay Plan, 482; and economy, 458; and election of 1852, 676–77, 703, 727–28, 731; founding of, 415; and Galphin Claim, 498; and northern Whigs, 501; and omnibus bill, 501, 509; and Sew-

Whigs, 301; and offinious onl, 301, 305; and seward's Higher Law speech, 491; and Taylor, 415, 424, 482, 501, 505; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 489

Republican party (first). See Jeffersonian Republicans; National Republicans; Old Republicans/Radicals

Republican party: and American party, 965; and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 922; as antisouthern, 858; and blacks, 984; Clayton's proposal for new, 575; and demise of Whig party, 957-60, 980-81, 983-84; emergence of, 805, 841-42, 859; and Free Soilers, 909-10, 944; Frémont nominated by, 967; and House speakership, 962-63; and Kansas, 980; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 844; and Know Nothings, 909, 922, 930-31, 940, 942-43, 964-67; and northern Whigs, 843, 980; Philadelphia convention of, 963-65; Pittsburgh organization meeting of, 963; post-Civil War years of, 984; and republicanism, 844; and revival of Whiggery, 984; and Sewardites, 910, 946-48; and Slave Power, 980; and southern Know Nothings, 856; strength of, 980-81; and Whig dilemma in 1856, 969-70. See also Republican party—and election; specific person or state

Republican party—and election: of 1854, 841–42, 862, 868–71, 874–75, 877–78, 888, 890–91, 894–96, 903; of 1855, 917, 921–22, 925, 940–43, 945; of 1856, 963–67, 970, 973, 975–76, 978–81

republicanism: and agrarian economy, 3; and anti-Jacksonians, 28-32; and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 844; and antimasonry, 12-13, 29-30; and antipartyism/nonpartisamism, 31-32, 347; and bank issue, 16-17; and character of society, 3; and corruption, 6; and demise of Whig party, 958; Democrats' views about, 66-67, 69; and egalitarianism, 3-4; and expansionism, 250; and future of Whig party, 212-13; and immigrants, 228; institutions needed for, 3; and Jackson/Jacksonians, 10, 14, 16; Johnson [Andrew] as champion of, 794; and Know Nothings, 844–45; and modernization, 30; and morality, 190; and National Republicans, 14, 17; and nativism, 190-91; and northerners, 981; and Old Republicans, 4; and party differences, 120-21, 349; and patronage, 418; persistence of values of, 836; and political parties, 349; post-revolutionary, 3; and principles of Whig party, 28, 29, 31, 844, 951-52; purpose of, 952; and Republican nationalists, 4; and Republican party, 844; and rise of Whig party, 29-30; and role of government, 67, 952; and slavery, 252, 343-44, 981; and Southern Rights, 252. See also republicanism—and election republicanism—and election: of 1820s, 6, 9; of 1830s, 14, 17, 44–45; of 1840s, 105, 109–11, 190–91, 343–44, 347, 354, 382 revolutions of 1848, 600-601

Rhode Island: anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 919–20; antimasonry in, 13, 37–38, 46; and Compromise of 1850, 638; and demise of Whig party, 971; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 919–20; Free Soilers in, 378, 556, 622, 638; Know Nothings in, 919–20, 942; national versus state issues in, 52; patronage in, 423, 600; Republican party in, 920; state versus national issues in, 230; and tariffs, 230; and Taylor Plan, 556; and Texas issues, 202, 556; Union party in, 622; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 637–38, 675; Whig organization in, 37, 38, 52, 230, 231; and Wilmot Proviso, 436. See also Rhode Island—election in

Rhode Island—election in: of 1830s, 17, 36, 38, 45, 46; of 1840, 96, 100–102; of 1842, 148; of 1844, 162, 202, 230, 376; of 1845–47, 230, 244; of 1848, 281, 293, 320, 325, 368, 376, 378; of 1849–51, 436, 556, 564, 600, 637–38, 672; of 1852, 675, 683–84, 707–8, 713, 715, 719–20, 751; of 1853–56, 777–78, 831, 919–20, 971

Richardson, William A., 486, 723

Ritchie, Thomas, 43, 111, 163, 481, 486, 558

Ritner, Joseph, 54, 79, 97, 98 rivers and harbors: and Polk administration, 234, 236, 244, 251, 261, 265, 338; and Taylor administration, 472. See also rivers and harbors—and election rivers and harbors—and election: of 1840s, 166, 184, 244, 263, 265, 338; of 1852, 700, 738, 739, 750

Rives, William C.: and banks, 35, 133; and Clay, 99; as conservative Democrat, 68; and demise of Whig party, 959; and future of Whig party, 910; and Know Nothings, 910, 928; and Mexican War, 258; and patronage, 424–25; and political realignments, 73; and Republican party, 910; resignation of, 35; and state rights, 132; and tariffs, 167; and Texas annexation, 179, 181, 218–19, 221; and Tyler, 104, 132–33; and Wilmot Proviso, 358. See also Rives, William C.—and election

Rives, William C.—and election: of 1838, 99; of 1840, 98–99; of 1844, 181; of 1845, 218, 223; of 1848, 258, 262, 266, 268, 272, 282, 287–88, 301–2, 330, 347, 358, 370; of 1856, 974

Roberts, Anthony E., 428, 886

Robertson, George, 277, 285, 304, 631, 632

Robertson, Wyndham, 977

Robinson, John, 786

Robinson, William E., 249, 743

Rockwell, John A., 420

Rockwell, Julius, 476, 506, 582, 828, 891, 916, 941 Rogers, Sion, 820, 827

Root, Joseph: and elections, 294, 331, 363, 556, 557, 570, 572; and Free Soilers, 340, 341; and House speakership, 467; and Mexican Cession, 483; and Mexican War, 294; and organization of territorial governments, 483, 526, 557, 572; ousting of, 572; and Taylor administration, 457; and Wilmot Proviso, 572; and Winthrop, 572

Rose, Robert, 430, 542, 543, 586

Round Robin (1851), 620-22, 625, 647, 698, 729

Royce, Stephen, 871, 872, 940

Rusk, Thomas, 481, 530, 621

Sackett, William A., 594 Sage, Russell, 827, 906 Sammons, Stephen, 899, 904

Sanderson, Joseph P., 665

Santa Fe, New Mexico: federal-Texas confrontation in, 518-20, 529-34, 536-38

Saratoga Springs convention (1854), 895-96, 898, 899, 901

Sargent, John O., 415, 501–2, 675, 678, 727, 738. See also Republic

Sargent, Nathan, 420-21, 978

Schenck, Robert C., 265, 294, 297, 316

Schermerhorn, Abraham, 430, 542, 550, 586, 591, 593

Schoolcraft, John L., 431, 594, 728

schools. See education

Schouler, William: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 842, 862–63, 866; and Compromise of 1850, 506, 547, 549; and future of Whig party, 764, 842; and Know Nothings, 865–66, 923, 929, 942; and Kossuth, 696; printing contracts of, 537, 580, 600; and Republican party, 942; and temperance, 696; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 642–43. See also Schouler, William—and election

Schouler, William—and election: of 1850–51, 580, 583, 642–43; of 1852, 683, 696, 700–701, 706, 738, 740–41, 753, 755; of 1854–55, 862–63, 865–66, 944; of 1856, 923

Scott, Winfield: "Americus" letter of, 730, 745; biography of, 728; and Canadian border clashes, 97; as figurehead of northern antislavery Whigs, 932; and Irish, 696; and Kossuth, 693–94; and Mexican War, 233, 245, 249, 255, 263, 265, 284, 697; as military hero, 316, 317, 682–83, 726, 731, 740; and nativism, 318; style/image of, 271, 683; Taylor's relationship with, 318; and Wilmot Proviso, 318. See also election of 1852; Scott, Winfield—and election

Scott, Winfield—and election: of 1840, 101, 102, 103; of 1844, 163; of 1848, 207, 215, 249, 262–65, 269, 282, 297, 299–300, 303, 316–24, 326, 328, 330, 364. See also election of 1852

Scudder, Zeno, 582, 583

Seabrook, Whitemarsh, 601

Seaton, William W., 974-75, 978

secession: and California statehood, 463, 464, 484-85, 503, 610, 612; and Clay Plan, 478; and Compromise of 1850, 554, 601, 608, 612; and demise of Whig party, 983; and District of Columbia slavery, 463; Fillmore's views about, 617; and Fugitive Slave Act, 554, 598, 602-3; and House speakership, 467-70; and northern Whigs, 483-84, 504, 598, 602; and omnibus bill, 486, 503-4; as problem facing Fillmore, 598-99, 601-2, 617; and revival of Whig party, 984; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 490; and southern Democrats, 463, 602; and Southern Rights, 601, 611-12, 614; and southern Whigs, 484, 503, 602; and Taylor administration, 386, 472-73, 484; and Union party, 599, 607, 614; and Wilmot Proviso, 464. See also Nashville Convention; secession-and election; specific person or state secession—and election: of 1849, 449–50; of 1851, 614–17, 625–27; of 1853, 798

Section Twelve (Know Nothings platform), 931, 940, 942, 945, 964

Select Committee (1850). See Committee of Thirteen Senate, U.S., 26. See also specific person, legislation, or committee

Sergeant, John, 189, 408, 409

Seward, William Henry: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 945; and Anti-Rent movement, 241-42; and antimasonry, 30, 41; and banks, 34; and Calhoun, 491; and California statehood, 490-91, 526, 533; and canals, 108; and Clay, 97-99, 101; and Clay Plan, 490-91; and Compromise of 1850, 553, 585; and congressional ban on slavery, 490; and conservatives, 396, 453, 939; and Constitution, 490-91; and demise of Whig party, 945, 948-49, 983; and Democrat-Whig alliance, 514-16, 802-3; and education, 155; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments. 523, 527, 529; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 919; Fillmore's rivalry with, 328-29, 394-96, 430-35, 491, 505-6, 522-24, 573, 835, 911, 949; and Free Soilers, 340-41, 344, 829-31, 833-35, 896, 945; and fugitive slaves, 490, 894; and future of Democratic party, 804; and future of Whig party, 755, 763-64, 768-69, 772-74, 825-27, 829-35, 895, 922; and Galphin Claim, 498; as governor, 78-79, 98, 108, 131, 155; and Greeley, 770, 902; and Harrison, 91, 100; Higher Law speech of, 489-91, 493-94, 512, 514-15, 526, 585, 588, 682, 809; and House speakership, 468; and Jackson, 34; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 807-13, 827, 834; and Know Nothings, 847-49, 899-900, 917-19, 921, 928, 949; and Kossuth, 694-96, 700; and launching of new party, 763, 825-26, 829-31; and little omnibus bill. 541; and Mexican Cession, 412, 490; and Mexican War, 283; and Missouri Compromise, 834; and nativism, 193, 229, 318, 900, 911, 918; and need for compromise, 460; and New Mexico, 491, 526, 537, 541, 586; and New York constitution, 239; and omnibus bill, 491, 503-6, 508-9, 511, 513-16, 523, 529-31; and organization of territorial governments, 526, 533, 541; and patronage, 125, 328, 416-19, 430-34, 461, 511, 513-16, 544-45, 548-51, 651; and political realignments, 74; as political strategiest, 236; and quiescent policy, 765, 768; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 76-77; and Republican party, 945-49, 976, 983; and rise of Whig party, 30; Scott's relationship with, 728, 732; and secession, 472, 490, 983; and Silver Grays, 618; and slavery in District of Columbia, 490; and Smith (Truman), 404, 405; and southern Whigs, 666, 682, 917; style/image of, 431-32, 491, 506; and suffrage, 227, 240; and tariffs, 183, 240, 504, 775-76; and taxes, 131; and Taylor administration, 394-96, 408, 410, 413, 432, 440, 461, 472, 491, 682, 728; and Taylor Plan, 523, 526, 529; and Taylor's cabinet, 405, 407, 410-11, 523; and Texas issues, 183, 186, 461, 490, 533, 535-36, 586; and Tyler, 137; and Union party, 617; and Webster, 92, 489-91, 548, 645; and Wilmot Proviso, 453, 490, 493, 526, 541. See also Seward, William Henryand election

Seward, William Henry—and election: of 1830s, 36, 41, 52, 74, 77–78, 98; of 1840, 78–79, 91–92, 97–101; of 1841–42, 155; of 1844, 183, 186, 193–94; of 1845–46, 239–42; of 1848, 263, 275, 277, 282–85, 289–91, 299–300, 318, 320–22, 328–29, 336, 340–41, 344, 351, 395; of 1849, 394–96, 453–54; of 1850, 533, 537, 549–50, 553, 568–69, 573, 585–88, 593, 595; of 1851, 645, 651, 656, 666; of 1852, 328, 681–82, 694–96, 698–702, 704–6, 709, 712, 717, 719, 728, 730, 732, 734, 737–39, 741–44, 746, 747–49, 751, 753, 755–56; of 1853, 768, 775, 788; of 1854, 812, 831–35, 848, 894–96, 898–903, 905, 908, 910; of 1855, 894, 896, 900, 907, 917–19, 922, 928, 945, 947–49; of 1856, 681, 893, 976

Sewardites: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 861; and California, 462; and Clay Plan, 488; and Collier appointment, 395; and Compromise of 1850, 546; and comptrollership, 395-96; and demise of Whig party, 945, 956, 958-59; and Dickinson, 515; and Fillmore, 523, 916; and Free Soilers, 768, 773, 811-12, 909-10; and future of Whig party, 763, 768, 773-74, 835, 908-9, 919; and Geddes Resolutions, 492-93; and impact of election of 1850, 595, 597; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 810-13, 816-17, 827, 835, 894; and Know Nothings, 848-49, 900, 909-11, 922-23, 931, 940; and Mexican Cession, 462, 493; and omnibus bill, 505, 512-16, 532; and organization of territorial governments, 492; and patronage, 512-16, 544, 546, 548-51, 600, 618, 650-51, 667; and Republican party, 909, 910, 946-48; and Seward's reelection, 918; Silver Gravs split from, 595-96; and suffrage, 239; and tariffs, 242; and Taylor Plan, 492, 505; and Texas boundary dispute, 461; and Union party, 606, 675, 801; and Utah, 532; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675; and Weed's manifesto, 523; and Wilmot Proviso, 492-93, 526. See also Sewardites-and elec-

Sewardites—and election: of 1840s, 240, 242, 453; of 1850, 549–51, 583–97; of 1851, 645–56, 661; of 1852, 675, 697, 701, 705–6, 708–11, 716, 737–38, 740, 748–49, 755, 761, 956, 958–59; of 1853, 768–69, 782, 788, 798; of 1854, 811, 833, 861, 893–95, 898–99, 901–7, 910; of 1855, 900, 916, 918–19, 945, 947–48

Seymour, Horatio—and election: of 1850, 584, 592; of 1852, 750–51, 754; of 1854, 894–95, 897, 902–5, 907; of 1855, 945–46

Seymour, Thomas, 436, 437, 556–57, 639, 690, 778, 779, 832

Shadrack rescue, 604, 605

Shafter, Oscar, 871, 872

Sharp, James Roger, 85

Sherman, John, 328, 713-14

Shields, James, 495, 508, 744, 867, 870

Shunk, Francis, 184, 187, 192, 193, 205, 364, 393

Silver Grays: abandonment of Whig party by, 911–12; and canals, 801, 812; and Compromise of 1850, 590; and demise of Whig party, 945; emergence of, 588; as Fillmore allies, 617–18; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 910, 916, 929; and Free Soilers,

782, 833; and future of Whig party, 755, 763, 768, 774, 908, 919; and Hunkers, 595, 617–18; and impact of election of 1850, 595–96; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 812–13, 894; and Know Nothings, 849, 896, 900, 904–5, 910–11, 916, 929; and Kossuth, 694; and patronage, 618, 650, 651; principles of, 589; and Republican party, 946; and Round Robin, 620; and Seward's reelection, 917–19; split from Sewardites of, 595–96; and Union party, 606, 617–18, 620, 801; Utica convention of, 588–91. See also Silver Grays—and election

Silver Grays—and election: of 1850, 588–91, 593–95; of 1851, 644–56, 661; of 1852, 678, 694, 700–701, 705, 709–10, 712, 716, 728, 737–38, 741–42, 748–50, 755, 761–62; of 1853, 768, 782, 788–89, 801; of 1854, 833, 894–96, 898–908, 910; of 1855, 907, 917–19, 945–46: of 1856, 967, 977

Simmons, James F., 230, 638

Slade, William, 169, 186

Slave Power: and demise of Whig party, 957, 959; and elections, 266, 313, 339, 441, 699, 701, 741, 755, 836, 874; and expansionism, 250; and Free Soilers, 338–39; and Fugitive Slave Act, 554; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 811, 813, 957; and Mexican War, 266; northern hatred of, 981; and northern Whigs, 843; and Republican party, 843, 980; and Texas annexation, 169, 225 slave trade: interstate, 96, 358 slavery: and blurring of party lines, 460, 468; and censure of antislavery Whigs, 156; common law applied to, 540-41; and constituencies of political parties, 118; and Constitution, 337, 463-64, 474, 540, 712; and demise of Whig party, 390, 953, 956; and Fillmore, 336, 341, 344, 351-53, 357-58; and Harrison, 110, 368, 375; and morality, 156; and party system, 95, 340; politics of, 58; and Polk, 208, 336, 343, 350, 363-64, 370, 372-73, 375-76; and republicanism, 252, 343-44, 981; Supreme Court decisions about, 358; and Taylor administration, 274-75, 308, 352, 384-90, 402, 407, 412, 415, 457-58; and third parties, 773; and Tyler, 156, 352; and Van Buren, 44, 55, 58, 110, 334, 339-45, 353, 355, 359-60, 362-63, 368-81; and Whig party platform, 553-56. See also Clayton Compromise; Compromise of 1850; Fugitive Slave Act; Kansas-Nebraska Act; Mexican Cession; Mexican laws; Missouri Compromise; popular sovereignty; Texas, annexation of; Wilmot Proviso; specific person, state or territory slaves: White southerners treated as, 465

Smith, Caleb B.: and elections, 273, 308, 316, 321, 441, 456; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 525; and patronage, 420, 426; and Taylor administration, 405–6, 409–12, 420, 426, 456

Smith, Gerrit, 227, 815

Smith, Lisle, 426, 548

Smith, Noah, 874, 875, 940

Smith, Peter Sken, 191, 276, 277, 307, 308, 310, 351, 668, 670

Smith, Truman: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 843; and California statehood, 481; and Clay Plan, 481; and expansionism, 776; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 525, 528; and Free Soilers, 342, 344-45; and future of Whig party, 771, 774, 779, 825, 827-28, 830, 832-33, 843; influence of, 405; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 811-12, 814, 818, 820, 825, 827-28; and Mexican War, 258, 288; as national chairman, 236-38, 288-89, 342; and New Mexico, 537; and patronage, 420, 424, 428; and Pierce administration, 766; resignation of, 832-33, 853; and slavery in District of Columbia, 538; and Taylor administration, 413, 420, 424, 428, 456, 483, 487, 489, 557; and Taylor Republicanism, 408; and Taylor's cabinet, 403, 404-5, 407, 409-10, 411, 413; and Texas boundary dispute, 535-36, 539; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 636. See also Smith, Truman—and election

Smith, Truman—and election: of 1846–47, 236–37, 288; of 1848, 258, 282, 288–89, 301–2, 308, 321, 324–25, 342, 344–45, 357, 404, 413; of 1849–50, 456, 557; of 1852, 636, 673, 683–84, 700–701, 703–4, 706, 728, 731, 736–37, 740, 743, 745, 751; of 1854, 832

Smythe, James M., 610, 611

Snow, Josiah, 511, 568

social class: and constituencies of political parties, 116, 118; Democrats' views about, 68–69; and elections, 107–9, 111, 200; and expansion of Democratic party, 83, 85–87; and nativism, 190, 191; and Texas annexation, 200; voting patterns according to, 118; Whigs' views about, 68–69. See also elitism

Sollers, August R., 934

Soulé, Pierre, 517, 625, 776

South: and Adams administration, 7; and constituencies of political parties, 116–17; Fillmore's tour through, 802, 824, 854; and Jackson, 11, 20–21; as major impetus for Union party, 599, 607; and National Republicans, 18, 19, 27, 49; and recession of 1833, 25; repudiation of Taylor in, 445; and rise of Whig party, 27–28; and state party development, 49; and Van Buren, 359; voter turnout in, 370–72. See also secession; South—and election; southern Democrats; Southern Rights; southern Whigs; Union party; specific person, state, or issue

South—and election: of 1820s, 6, 9; of 1830s, 18, 38, 40, 42, 46, 91; of 1840, 94, 101, 103, 105, 111; of 1844, 164, 190, 197–98, 206, 370–72; of 1845, 222; of 1848, 285, 290, 323, 325–26, 332, 354–56, 368, 370–72, 374

South Carolina: Democratic strength in, 733; and Know Nothings, 850; nullification in, 20, 518, 602; and rise of Whig party, 35; secession threat in, 601–2, 607; tariffs in, 7, 11–12; and Texas annexation, 174; Union party in, 676, 707; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675; Whig constituency in, 118. See also South Carolina—election in South Carolina—election in: of 1820s, 7, 8; of 1830s, 16, 45; of 1840s, 101, 103, 112, 174, 181, 323, 352, 361; of 1852, 676, 683, 697, 703, 707, 711, 733; of 1854, 850, 854, 877

South Carolina Exposition and Protest (1828), 11-12 Southard, Samuel L., 9, 26, 35, 104

Southern Address (Calhoun, 1849), 387, 388, 435, 437, 449, 450, 467, 469, 470, 557, 610 southern Democrats, 44, 150, 337, 385–86, 388, 440, 824. See also specific person, state, legislation, or topic

Southern Rights: and Calhoun's Southern Address, 387; and California statehood, 484, 611; and Clay Plan, 481; and Clayton Compromise, 392; and Compromise of 1850, 561; and Democratic party, 614; and House speakership, 469, 470; and Know Nothings, 937–38; and Mexican Cession, 611; and Nashville Convention, 611; and Pierce administration, 766, 776, 801; and republicanism, 252; and secession threat, 601, 611–12; and southern Democrats, 463; and Taylor administration, 385, 387–88; and Taylor Plan, 438; and Texas annexation, 809; and Union party, 607–8, 610–13, 801; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 675, 677–78; and Wilmot Proviso, 392. See also Southern Rights—and election; specific person or state

Southern Rights—and election: of 1840, 95; of 1848, 268, 281, 285, 324–25, 356, 358, 368, 371–72; of 1849–50, 449–50, 564; of 1851, 613–15, 623–28, 633; of 1852–55, 676–78, 735, 756, 796, 798, 937–38

southern Whigs: and apprehensions about Fillmore, 524; and Calhoun's third party efforts, 386; and Civil War, 984; and demise of Whig party, 957; and Fillmore as president, 526, 527, 528-29, 546, 598-99, 633, 824-25; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 914-16, 919, 922-23, 937; and future of Whig party, 768, 774, 823, 833, 835, 838, 843, 877; and House speakership, 962; and launching of new party, 824-25, 829; post-Civil War years of, 984; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 491; and Taylor administration, 444, 495; and white slavery, 465. See also specific person, state, legislation, or topic Spaulding, Elbridge G.: and elections, 545, 550, 586, 594, 900-902; and Fillmore, 431-32, 434; and little omnibus bill, 542; and patronage, 432, 544-46, 550; and Texas boundary dispute, 539

Specie Circular (1836), 37, 60, 62, 63
Spencer, John C., 137, 491, 652, 653, 654, 788
Spooner, Thomas, 942, 944, 945
Sprague, William A., 379, 567, 568, 638, 661
Spruance, Presley, 338, 495, 537, 565 squatter sovereignty. See popular sovereignty
Stafford, Edward, 951, 952–53, 958, 968, 975, 984
Stanly, Edward: and elections, 307, 392, 626, 698,

703, 705, 706, 724, 795; and House speakership, 471; and omnibus bill, 503; and patronage, 421, 424; and Round Robin, 621; and Taylor Plan, 503; and Union party, 621

Stansbury, Edward A., 701, 946 Stanton, Frederick, 795

state government, 12, 155, 160, 390, 398–402, 442, 952. See also specific person, state, or election state party system: development of Whigs, 49–55 state rights: and anti-Jacksonians, 20–21, 23–26, 28–32; and banks, 24; Crawford as rallying point for, 4; and executive tyranny, 29–30; and Jackson/Jacksonians, 11, 20, 24; and Old Republicans, 5; and political culture of Whig party, 31; and political realignments, 23–24; and rise of Whig party, 28, 29–30, 32, 38–39, 46; and Tyler, 21, 104, 128, 130, 132, 137, 150, 164; and Van Buren, 23. See also nullification; state rights—and election; specific person or state state rights-and election: of 1828, 7; of 1836, 38-39, 40, 55, 953; of 1840, 94, 96, 99, 103; of 1851, 616 Stephens, Alexander H.: Berrien's rivalry with, 222, 286, 450, 469-70, 540, 611-13; and Calhoun's third party efforts, 386; and California, 450, 468-70, 483-84, 486, 500, 503, 612; and Clay Plan, 482-83, 494; and Clay's return to Senate, 397; and Compromise of 1850, 612-13; and demise of Whig party, 956, 958, 982; as Democrat, 970; and expansionism, 252-53; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 527; and Fugitive Slave Act, 617; and future of Whig party, 823-24; and Galphin Claim, 497; and House speakership, 467, 469-70, 471; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 813, 814, 820, 823-24; and Know Nothings, 933, 937-38; and Kossuth, 693; and launching of new sectional party, 823-24; legislative talent of, 236; and Mexican Cession, 412, 451, 467, 482-83, 486; and Mexican War, 252-53; and Nashville Convention, 469; and New Mexico, 519, 540; and omnibus bill, 486, 494, 500, 503, 509, 519, 520; on party differences, 120; and patronage, 421-22, 611; and politics of slavery, 609; and popular sovereignty, 494; and secession, 467, 470, 477, 484, 503, 612; and Southern Rights, 611; and Taylor administration, 386, 403-5, 413, 468, 519; and Taylor Plan, 483; and temperance, 798; and Texas issues, 172, 176-77, 218-22, 519; and Union party. 607, 612-13, 617, 620-21, 677, 797, 799, 956; and Utah, 540; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 677; and Wilmot Proviso, 412, 451, 467, 486, 500; as Young Indian, 286-87. See also Stephens, Alexander H.—and election

Stephens, Alexander H.—and election: of 1843, 160; of 1844, 120, 164–65; of 1845, 218–19; of 1848, 272–73, 286–87, 337, 381; of 1849–50, 450–51, 609; of 1851, 609, 611–15; of 1852, 677, 693, 704, 733, 938, 958; of 1853, 797–99; of 1855–56, 933, 937–38, 970

Stephens, Linton, 938, 970

Stevens, Thaddeus: as antimason, 54; and Free Soilers, 340, 344; and Fugitive Slave Act, 543; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 887; and Know Nothings, 917; and slavery, 340, 344. See also Stevens, Thaddeus—and election

Stevens, Thaddeus—and election: of 1836, 54; of 1840, 97, 101–4; of 1848, 340, 344, 577; of 1849–50, 393–94, 577–78; of 1852, 699, 703; of 1854–55, 886–87, 917

Stevenson, Thomas B., 254, 273-74, 309, 314-15, 333, 405-6, 422, 426

Stewart, Andrew, 28, 445, 446 Strother, James F., 622, 734, 928

Stuart, Alexander H.H.: and elections, 681, 707, 734, 927–28, 964, 973; and Fugitive Slave Act, 604; and future of Whig party, 824–25; as interior secretary, 528; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 813, 824–25; and

Know Nothings/American party, 856, 911, 927, 964; and Mexican War, 257; and secessionist threat, 602; and Union party, 801–2, 804, 911

Stuart, C.B., 432, 590

Sturgeon, Daniel: and Compromise of 1850, 576; and Democrat-Whig alliance, 509, 512–13; and elections, 575–77; and Free Soilers, 485; and omnibus bill, 495, 506, 509, 512–13; and popular sovereignty, 485, 513; and Taylor Plan, 485

Sturgeon, Samuel, 538, 549

Summers, George, 623, 928

Sumner, Charles: caning of, 966, 976, 978, 980–81; and future of Whig party, 763–64, 772; and House speakership, 466; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 808–9, 815; and slavery, 266, 274, 333; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 640–42; as Young Whig, 332. See also Sumner, Charles—and election

Sumner, Charles—and election: of 1848, 266, 274, 333, 381; of 1851, 640–42; of 1852, 741; of 1853–54, 787, 892–93

Supreme Court, U.S.: Jackson's appointments to, 44; and slavery, 335, 336, 358; and Texas boundary dispute, 475, 518, 519, 535

Syracuse convention (New York, 1850), 585–87, 590–91, 595, 646, 902–4

Talbott, Albert G., 933, 936, 937

Tallmadge, Nathaniel P., 68, 74, 98–99, 104, 187, 189, 272, 567, 687

Taney, Roger B., 26, 27, 44

Tariff Act (1816), 2

Tariff Act (1828), 8, 20, 43

Tariff Act (1832), 12, 20

Tariff Act (1833). See Compromise Tariff Act (1833) Tariff Act (1841), 135

Tariff Act (1842): and economy, 160; Fillmore as author of, 242; and party differences, 235; and Polk administration, 175, 184–85, 235, 243; and Taylor administration, 272, 393, 446–48; and Tyler administration, 161; Webster's proposed compromise to, 260–61. See also Tariff Act (1842)—and election

Tariff Act (1842)—and election: of 1842, 148; of 1844, 166–67, 184, 264; of 1845–46, 223–24, 238; of 1848, 264, 272, 365–67, 375; of 1849, 445–46 Tariff Act (1846). See Walker Tariff tariffs: Adams' views about, 7; and anti-Jacksonians, 21, 25; and Clay-Webster relationship, 125; and Democratic party, 66, 68, 147-48; and economy, 129-31, 135-36; and Fillmore, 135, 147, 242, 619, 775-76; and Harrison administration, 126; Jackson's views about, 11, 12; and Jeffersonian Republicans, 2; and land revenues, 135-36, 147; and National Republicans, 11-12; and omnibus bill, 504, 507; and panic of 1837, 65; and party differences, 234-36; and Polk administration, 175, 183-84, 233-36, 247, 251; and principles of Whig party, 161; and role of government, 69, 952; sectional splits in Congress about, 5; and Slave Power, 169; and South, 7, 11-12, 164; and southern Democrats, 184; and southern Whigs, 147, 167, 199, 235, 504; and Taylor administration, 272, 308, 310, 375, 415, 446-47, 472-73; and Tyler, 128-31, 135-36, 14647; and Van Buren, 8, 65; and western region, 147. See also nullification; tariffs—and election; specific legislation tariffs—and election: of 1824, 5; of 1832, 15; of 1840–41, 108, 139–40; of 1844, 164, 166–67, 175, 183–85, 187, 192, 195, 199, 224; of 1846–47, 237, 243–45, 247; of 1848, 243, 263–64, 272, 302, 308, 310, 327, 339, 343, 349–50, 363–64, 365–68, 375, 381; of 1849, 417, 445–46, 454; of 1851, 669; of 1852, 685–87, 717–18, 738–39, 750; of 1853–54, 775–76, 882

Taylor, James, 398, 780

Taylor, John L., 3, 542, 570, 571, 827, 863

Taylor, Joseph, 284, 321, 328, 329, 432

Taylor, Nathaniel G., 821, 827, 933, 937

Taylor, Zachary: censure of, 519; commitment to Whig party by, 361; Congress' relationship with, 461, 466; and Democratic party, 270; illness/death of, 520–21, 556, 588; impeachment threats against, 498, 519; inauguration of, 384, 390, 415; loyalty to, 414; messages to Congress of, 384, 466, 472, 474–77; and Mexican War, 233, 244–45, 248–49, 259, 263, 270–71, 283–84; as military hero, 269–70, 310–11, 346, 354–56, 359, 365, 414; nonpartisanism of, 270–73, 280, 290, 306–10, 327, 331–32, 345–46, 347, 350–52, 354–55, 361, 365, 412–14, 422; Pennsylvania-New York trip of, 444; as politician, 271; style/image of, 271, 286–87, 306, 410, 419, 456, 472, 499, 588, 647. See also election of 1848; Taylor Plan; Taylor Republicanism

Taylor Plan: and blurring of party lines, 461; and cabinet appointments, 412; and California, 437-39, 463, 472, 474-76, 479, 482-83, 489, 491, 496-97, 501; Clay Plan compared with, 478-79, 482-83, 501; conception of, 437-39; and Congress-Taylor relationship, 461, 466; and demise of Whig party, 955; and Fillmore, 505, 522-23; and Free Soilers, 465-66, 483; and House speakership, 467-68, 470, 472; immediate reactions to, 475-76; lack of support for, 487; and Mexican Cession, 443-44, 475-76, 482, 491; and New Mexico, 437-39, 472-75, 489, 491, 496-97, 502, 520; and northern Democrats, 461, 465, 475, 485; and northern Whigs, 462-63, 465-66, 475-76, 483, 487, 500, 505, 530, 536; and omnibus bill, 497, 499–503, 520; and organization of territorial governments, 482-83, 502, 509; outline to Congress of, 472–75; and patronage, 506; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 489-91, 493; and slavery in District of Columbia, 492; and southern Democrats, 461, 464, 482; and southern Whigs, 463, 465-66, 476, 482, 487; and Texas boundary dispute, 475-76, 482, 492, 502, 518, 520; and Utah, 437-39; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 488; and Wilmot Proviso, 475, 479-80, 492, 502, 503. See also Taylor Plan-and election

Taylor Plan—and election: of 1849, 440–41, 443; of 1850, 556–58, 560, 561, 565, 569, 575–76, 581, 588
Taylor Republicanism: and Clay, 398; Clayton's promotion of, 407–8, 411; and demise of Whig party, 956; and Democrats, 406–7; and elections, 442, 444, 446, 448–49, 454, 456, 575–76; and Fillmore, 446; and future of Whig party, 763; and patronage, 41–

Taylor Republicanism (continued)

15, 421–22, 427–29, 435, 457; and realignment of political parties, 510; as replacement for Whiggery, 406–8, 968; and Taylor's cabinet, 413, 422

Tazewell, Littleton W., 21, 35, 128

Teesdale, John, 263, 265, 266, 295, 297, 756

temperance: and Catholics, 742; and constituency of Whig party, 117; and demise of Whig party, 953, 956–59; Democrats' views about, 68–69; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 915; and Free Soilers, 696, 782, 785–86; and future of Whig party, 211, 775; and immigrants, 691, 742; and Irish, 691, 696, 775; and Know Nothings, 805, 957; and northern Whigs, 689; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 82; and southern Whigs, 792; Whigs' views about, 68–69. See also temperance—and election temperance—and election: of 1840s, 111, 229, 362, 451, 557, 566; of 1852, 689–92, 696, 742–43, 747–49, 762, 775, 958; of 1853, 777–86, 788, 790–92, 799–800; of 1854, 832–33, 837, 857, 859, 861, 863–65, 867–68, 871–83, 886, 893–902, 904, 907, 957; of 1855, 921, 936, 946–47

Tennessee: anti-Nebraska sentiment in, 932, 937; antipartyism in, 794; apportionment in, 760; and Compromise of 1850, 627-30; economy of, 160-61, 244; expansion of Democratic party in, 84-85; Fillmore support in, 628, 630; gerrymandering in, 629; governorship of, 628; Henrymandering in, 793-95; internal improvements in, 43, 56, 627-29; Jackson's popularity in, 42; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 932; Know Nothings in, 855, 933-34, 937; land revenues in, 799; and Mexican War, 244; and omnibus bill, 494, 512; patronage in, 42, 161, 422-24, 426-27, 512, 628; political realignments in, 71, 73; railroads in, 760, 793; reapportionment in, 157, 163, 627, 629-30, 793-94; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80; and rise of Whig party, 35, 43; Southern Rights in, 627; tariffs in, 161; temperance in, 800; and Texas annexation, 181, 219-20, 223; Union party in, 607, 617, 621; voter turnout in, 56, 84, 196; Whig constituency in, 116, 118; and Whig principles, 161

Tennessee—election in: of 1832, 45; of 1835, 36, 56; of 1836, 42–43, 45–46, 56, 84; of 1837, 84; of 1839, 84–85, 100–101; of 1840, 101, 103–4, 196; of 1841–43, 139–40, 151, 157, 160–61; of 1844, 181–82, 194, 196, 198, 200, 220, 370; of 1845, 219, 223; of 1847, 243–45; of 1848, 247, 273, 290, 292–94, 309, 314, 323, 329, 346, 348, 355–56, 368, 370; of 1849, 427, 440, 442, 629; of 1851, 627–30, 632, 672; of 1852, 680, 702, 719–20, 723–24, 734–37, 753–54, 757–58, 760; of 1853–55, 792–95, 799–800, 932–34, 937; of 1856, 978–79 territorial governments, organization of: and Clay Plan, 479–80, 482–83; and Committee of Thirteen report, 496; and Democrats' compromise plan, 486; and election of 1850, 556–57, 569, 588, 591, 596; and Fillmore, 523, 525, 533, 535; and Free Soilers, 483; House vote about, 538; and northern Democrats, 501, 539; and northern Whigs, 536, 539, 541; and omnibus bill, 487, 494, 496, 499–501, 505–7, 517, 525, 530; powers of legislatures in, 482; Root proposal concerning, 483; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 526; and southern Democrats, 499, 501, 539; and Taylor administration, 385, 482–83, 502, 509, 536; Webster's 7th of March speech about, 488. See also Compromise of 1850; Kansas-Nebraska Act; Mexican Cession; Wilmot Proviso; specific person or territory territories: judges in, 336; Whig party organization in, 237. See also Mexican Cession; territorial governments, organization of; Wilmot Proviso; specific territory

Texas: debt of, 219–20, 480–81; Democratic strength in, 213, 237, 733; Know Nothings in, 933; and Walker Tariff, 237. See also Texas—election in; Texas, annexation of; Texas, annexation of—and election; Texas boundary dispute; Texas boundary dispute—and election

Texas—election in: of 1840s, 322, 422; of 1850s, 622, 632–33, 683, 713, 733, 756, 933

Texas, annexation of: and abolitionism, 178-81, 200; and British, 169-71, 176-77; and Brown plan, 220-22, 286, 809; and Clay, 94, 96; and Clay-Webster relationship, 91-92, 94, 126; Congressional votes on, 173, 220-21; and corruption, 219; and demise of Whig party, 954, 982; and economy, 178-79; and future of Whig party, 224-25; and Mexico, 176-77, 179, 219-20, 233; and migration to new lands, 178-79; and northern Democrats, 173, 175, 221, 224, 226; and northern Whigs, 176, 180, 219-21, 224; and party differences, 224-26; and party loyalty, 226; and Polk, 175-76, 183, 185, 219, 221-22, 224; and social class, 200; and southern Democrats, 168, 171-72, 178, 199; and Southern Rights, 809; and southern Whigs, 168, 171, 176-83, 199, 218–22; and Tyler, 168, 170, 175, 218–19, 221–22, 224; and Van Buren, 96, 168–69, 171, 180, 185; and Webster's ambitions, 91-92, 94; and Whig factionalism, 219-22, 226-27, See also Texas, annexation of-and election

Texas, annexation of—and election: of 1840, 91–92, 94; of 1844, 168–88, 190, 195–96, 199–203, 206, 211, 218–19, 224, 278, 359, 372; of 1845, 218–26, 239; of 1848, 343; of 1852, 741

Texas boundary dispute: Bell's proposal about, 482; Bradbury proposal about, 530-31, 533-34; and California statehood, 531, 533-36; and Clay Plan, 480-82, 486, 488; and compensation, 177, 220, 481-82, 488, 500, 517, 534-35, 538-39; Dawson amendment about, 530-31, 534; and Fillmore, 524, 529-35, 617; Foote-Benton debate about, 474; House votes about, 538-39, 541-42; and little omnibus bill, 539-42; and Mexican Cession, 389, 480; and New Mexico, 439, 462, 480-81; and northern Democrats, 537-39; and northern Whigs, 461-62, 500, 520, 531, 533, 535-39; and omnibus bill, 481-82, 486-87, 494, 497, 500-501, 517-20, 524, 528-31; and patronage, 537, 539, 547; and Pearce amendment, 531-32, 534-36, 538-39, 559, 570; and Santa Fe confrontation, 518-20, 529-34, 536-

38; and secession threat, 601; Senate votes about, 535–37, 542, 547; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 490; and southern Democrats, 495–97, 501, 531, 535–36, 538–39; and southern Whigs, 476, 519, 531, 534–36; and Supreme Court, 475, 518–19, 535; and Taylor administration, 389, 438, 475–76, 482, 492, 502, 518–20, 528, 535; and Webster-fillmore relationship, 635; Webster's 7th of March speech about, 488, 490; and Wilmot Proviso, 520, 531. See also Texas boundary dispute—and election; specific person or state

Texas boundary dispute—and election: of 1850, 556, 559–60, 564, 570, 581–82, 585–87, 591, 594; of 1851, 629, 669

third party efforts: of Calhoun, 268, 270, 281, 386–87; and demise of Whig party, 957–58; and election of 1848, 321, 327, 332, 352; encouragement of, 772–75; of Tyler, 150, 164, 170, 172–73, 175; of Wilson (Henry), 321, 327

Thompson, James R., 588, 650-51, 701 Thompson, John B., 631, 632, 817, 936

Thompson, Richard W., 244, 253, 316, 347, 420, 441, 971

Thorington, James, 868 Thurman, John, 593, 594 Thurston, Benjamin, 919 Tilden, Daniel R., 327, 329 Tod, David, 174 Todd, Charles, 91, 100

Todd, Lemuel, 885, 886 Toombs, Robert: Berrien's rivalry with, 222, 286, 450, 469-70, 540, 611-13; and Calhoun's third party efforts, 386-87; and California, 389, 435-36, 450, 467-70, 500, 503, 612; and Clay Plan, 494; and Clay's return to Senate, 397; and demise of Whig party, 956, 958, 982; as Democrat, 970; and Democrats' compromise plan, 486; and Fillmore's cabinet appointments, 527-28; and finality issue, 677; and Free Soilers, 760-61; and future of Whig party, 768, 823-24, 826; and Galphin Claim, 497; and House speakership, 467-71; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 813-14, 819-20; and Know Nothings, 937-38; and launching of new sectional party, 823-24, 826; and little omnibus bill, 540-41; and Mexican Cession, 389, 412, 451, 467; and Nashville Convention, 469; and New Mexico, 467-68, 519, 540-41; and northern Whigs, 528; and omnibus bill, 486, 494, 500, 503, 509, 519; and patronage, 611; and politics of slavery, 609; and popular sovereignty, 494; and secession threat, 467-68, 470, 477, 484, 503, 612; and slavery in District of Columbia, 467-68; and Southern Rights, 611; style of, 468; and tariffs, 167; and Taylor administration, 386-87, 389, 397, 403-4, 413, 468; and Texas issues, 220, 222, 519; and Union party, 612-13, 617, 621, 797, 956; and Utah, 540; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 677; and Wilmot Proviso, 358, 389, 412, 435-36, 451, 461, 467-68, 484, 500; and Winthrop, 468; as Young Indian, 286-87. See also Toombs, Robertand election

Toombs, Robert-and election: of 1844, 162, 166-67; of 1845, 222; of 1848, 286–87, 313, 337, 358; of 1849–50, 450–51, 609; of 1851, 609, 611–15, 633; of 1852, 677–78, 704, 732–33, 760–61, 938; of 1853, 797–99, 958; of 1855–56, 937–38, 970

Toombs amendment, 540-41

Toucey, Isaac, 436, 437, 639, 832

Towns, George, 449-51, 601, 607-8, 610, 612

Townshend, James M., 977

Townshend, Norton, 401, 572

Tracy, Andrew, 960, 965

trade, 61-62, 63, 167, 246. See also tariffs; specific tariff act

Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo (1848), 310-11, 313, 330, 334, 534

Trimble, Allen, 944, 945, 947

Trousdale, William, 627-28, 629

Trumbull, Joseph, 436

Trumbull, Lyman, 869, 871, 878

Tuck, Amos, 436, 556, 640, 831

Tucker, Nathaniel Beverly, 94, 128

Turney, Hopkins L., 512, 627, 629

Tyler, John: accession of, 127; ambitions of, 164; betrayal of, 352; Clay's relationship with, 104, 123, 127–31, 134, 137–38, 140, 147, 150, 161, 457, 477; courtship of Democratic party by, 164, 174–75; and demise of Whig party, 953–54, 982; and devastation of Whigs, 521–22, 523; excommunication of, 137, 140, 149; Fillmore compared with, 521–23, 553, 572; forced resignation of, 60; impeachment of, 147, 149–50; influence on election of 1848 of, 273; style/image of, 127–28; third party efforts of, 150, 164, 170, 172–73, 175; vetoes by, 130–34, 137–39, 146–50, 166; Whig repudiation of, 348, 406; withdrawal in election of 1844 by, 192, 205. See also Tyler, John—and election; specific person or topic

Tyler, John—and election: of 1830s, 36, 60; of 1840, 99, 104, 113, 174–75; of 1844, 130, 138, 140, 163–64, 172–73, 175, 192, 205

Ullmann, Daniel, 584, 910, 917. See also Ullmann, Daniel—and election

Ullmann, Daniel—and election: of 1848, 264–65, 284, 353; of 1850–51, 586, 588, 590, 595, 655–56; of 1852, 709, 748–49; of 1853–54, 788, 899–901, 904–5, 907, 911, 948

Underhill, Walter, 543, 586, 593

Underwood, Joseph R., 386, 495, 536, 538, 621, 631, 936, 937

Uniform National Bankruptcy Act, 126, 129–30, 135
Union party: and Barnburners, 606; and Castle Garden meeting, 591–92, 637; collapse of, 40, 614; and Compromise of 1850, 608, 613–14, 620–21; in Congress, 616; and conservative Whigs, 908; and demise of Whig party, 955, 957–58, 983; and Democratic party, 621, 801; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 801–3; expansion of, 606, 617–18, 620; and Fillmore, 599, 605–15, 617–20, 675–77, 774, 801–
4; and financial issues, 608; and foreign affairs, 776; formation of, 613–14, 675; and Free Soilers, 599, 622; and Fugitive Slave Act, 592, 607, 614; and

Union party (continued)

future of Whig party, 774, 801, 828, 843; and Hunkers, 606, 617-18, 622; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 805, 812, 821, 828; Know Nothings as core for, 805, 909-12, 914, 916, 922-23, 928-29, 931, 936, 949; and launching of new sectional party, 823-24; national convention for, 613, 620; and National Whigs, 622; and northern Whigs, 621; and omnibus bill, 504; and Pierce administration, 776; platform of, 613-14; revival of, 984; Round Robin of, 620-22, 624-25; and secession, 599, 607, 614; and Sewardites, 606, 801; and Silver Grays, 606, 617-18, 620, 801; South as major impetus for, 599, 607; and Southern Rights, 607-8, 610-13, 801; and southern Whigs, 621-22, 633, 801-2; supporters of, 599, 774; and Taylor Plan, 621; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 636-37, 639-40, 642-44, 646, 649, 665, 668, 669. See also Union partyand election; specific person or state

Union party—and election: of 1850, 591–92; of 1851, 610–16, 622, 625, 632–33, 639–40, 642–44, 646, 649, 654, 656–57, 668–69; of 1852, 613, 636, 674–81, 707, 733, 740, 756, 956; of 1853–55, 796–97, 908, 936

Union Safety Committee (New York City), 581–82, 591–92, 600, 606, 613, 649, 654, 710 unit rule, 102, 103, 715

Upham, Charles, 581-83, 642, 872, 892

Upham, William, 391, 536, 538

Upshur, Abel P., 128, 137, 168, 170, 171

Utah: and California, 437–39; and elections, 570, 576, 581, 585, 587, 594, 614; Fillmore's support for, 617; and Free Soilers, 532; and little omnibus bill, 540–41; and northern Democrats, 537; and northern Whigs, 532, 535, 537–38, 542; and omnibus bill, 494, 499, 517, 532; as pro-southern, 535; Senate votes about, 532, 542; and Taylor Plan, 437–39; and Union party, 614; and Wilmot Proviso, 532, 535, 538

Utica convention (New York, 1850), 588-91

Van Buren, John, 688

Van Buren, Martin: and Albany Regency, 31, 38; Clay's views about, 60; as Free Soil candidate, 334, 339–45, 353, 355, 359–60, 362–63, 368–70, 372–81, 730, 761; inauguration of, 61; as Jacksonian, 343; as Jackson's successor, 22, 25, 38, 42, 44, 49, 58; as minister to England, 11; as Old Republican, 5; as secretary of state, 11; style/images of, 109, 111; Whig antipathy to, 58–59. See also Van Buren, Martin—and election; specific person or topic Van Buren, Martin—and election: of 1832, 11–12; of 1836, 25–26, 31, 38–46, 48–50, 55–58, 104; of 1840, 98, 103, 106–13, 164, 199; of 1844, 164–65, 170–71, 173–74, 180; of 1848, 334, 339–45, 353, 355, 359–60, 362–363, 368–70, 372–81, 453, 571, 730, 761

Van Burenites, 7, 173, 175, 221, 239, 319, 333–34 Vance, Joseph, 53, 321, 327, 406

Vance, Zebulon, 985

Varnum, Joseph, Jr., 646, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652 Venable, Abraham, 626, 627 Vermont: abolitionism in, 560, 871–72; anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 871–72; antimasonry in, 13, 37-38, 52; and Compromise of 1850, 559; and demise of Whig party, 980-81; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 916; Free Soilers in, 341, 355, 378, 380, 390-91, 398, 402, 435, 442, 451, 509, 559-60, 760, 762, 785-86, 791, 800, 866, 871-72, 877; and Fugitive Slave Act, 560, 871; Know Nothings in, 871-72, 940, 942; Liberty party in, 156, 186, 202, 228, 238, 355; and Missouri Compromise, 871; national versus state issues in, 52; nativism in, 192; reapportionment in, 157, 163, 708; Republican party in, 940, 946, 980-81; senatorial decisions in, 390-91; and state party development, 52; temperance in, 785-86, 800, 837, 871-72; and Texas issues, 186, 560; voter turnout in, 196; Whig strength in, 37-38, 231. See also Vermont-election in

Vermont—election in: of 1824, 8; of 1830s, 14, 45, 52; of 1840, 101–3, 196; of 1842–43, 157, 160; of 1844, 149, 186, 192, 196–97, 202, 376; of 1845–47, 228, 238, 245, 355; of 1848, 320, 329, 332, 341, 355, 366, 368, 376, 378, 380, 451; of 1849–51, 390–91, 442, 451, 559–60, 672; of 1852, 637, 683, 708, 713, 715–16, 719–20, 741, 747, 751, 754, 760–62; of 1853–56, 785–86, 791, 799–800, 866, 871–72, 877, 940, 976

vetoes: and election of 1848, 350–51, 372, 381; Harrison's pledge about, 110; and Taylor, 310, 350–51, 473; of Tyler, 128, 130–34, 137–39, 146–50, 166

Vinton, Samuel F., 526, 658, 660, 667, 671

Virginia: Calhounites in, 73; and Clay Plan, 557; and Compromise of 1850, 622-23; conservative Democrats in, 68, 73, 87; constitution of, 558, 622-23; and demise of Whig party, 971, 977; economy in, 85; and expansion of Democratic party, 85–87; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 915, 925-27; internal improvements in, 56, 85, 118; Know Nothings in, 846, 855-57, 915, 926-29, 931-32; and omnibus bill, 558; patronage in, 422-24, 437; political realignments in, 71, 73; reapportionment in, 157, 159, 623, 777; relationship between voting behavior and policies in, 80; religion in, 117; and rise of Whig party, 35; secession threat in, 386; social class in, 85–87; and Southern Address, 557; Southern Rights in, 268, 623; state rights in, 20, 35, 55-56; suffrage in, 758; and tariffs, 167; and Taylor administration, 386, 557-58; and Texas annexation, 200, 219; and Tyler-Congress relationship, 138; Union party in, 621-22; Whig constituency in, 117-18, 215, 223; and Wilmot Proviso, 268, 385. See also Virginia—election in

Virginia—election in: of 1824, 7; of 1832, 12, 46; of 1834–35, 35–36, 55–56; of 1836, 42, 46, 56, 73, 85–87; of 1837–39, 73, 87, 98; of 1840, 85–87, 99, 102, 108, 112, 198; of 1842–43, 148, 151, 159–60, 200; of 1844, 167, 182, 194, 198, 200, 368, 370; of 1845, 219; of 1847, 244, 287; of 1848, 215, 268, 272, 287–88, 290, 298, 300–301, 303–6, 323, 347–48, 368, 370, 413, 557; of 1849–51, 437, 557–58, 622–23, 632–33, 777; of 1852, 680, 707, 715, 719–20, 723,

734, 736–37, 757–58; of 1853–54, 777, 791–92, 799, 927; of 1855, 857, 915, 925–29, 931–32; of 1856, 971–72, 974, 977

Virginia Cabal, 128, 133, 134, 137, 156, 168 "Virginia policy," 423

voter fraud, 212, 691; in election of 1844, 198-99, 202-7, 228, 275 voting: and black suffrage, 227, 229, 239–40, 299; and Constitution, 349; and ethnicity, 36; importance of, 349; and property, 8; reasons for, 417–18; relationship between policies and, 76–82

Vroom, Peter D., 66-67

Wade, Benjamin F.: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 843, 859; and demise of Whig party, 983; and economy, 687; on Fillmore, 572; and Free Soilers, 340; and future of Whig party, 767, 825, 829–30, 834, 843; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 814–15, 825, 834; and Know Nothings, 944; and southern Whigs, 682; and Taylor administration, 444. See also Wade, Benjamin F.—and election

Wade, Benjamin F.—and election: of 1848–49, 340, 381, 444; of 1851, 659, 663; of 1852, 673, 682, 701–2, 728–29; of 1853–55, 782, 829–30, 944

Wade, Edward "Ned," 475, 863

Wales, John, 495, 565, 814

Walker, Robert J., 168, 172, 235, 248, 269, 497–98. See also Walker Tariff

Walker Tariff (1846): Fillmore's views about, 619, 775–76; initial implementation of, 246; introduction of, 234–35; and party differences, 235–36; passage of, 235–36; and Polk administration, 233–34, 238, 240, 242, 246, 247; and Taylor, 308, 415, 446, 447–48; and Webster's proposal, 260–61, 264. See also ad valorem duties; Walker Tariff (1846)—and election

Walker Tariff (1846)—and election: of 1846–47, 237–38, 240, 242, 302; of 1848, 263, 302, 308, 349, 364–67, 375; of 1849–50, 445–46, 575; of 1852, 686

Walley, Samuel, 582, 583, 643-44, 748, 827, 829, 892, 941, 975

Walsh, Thomas, 703, 792

Walton, E.P., 785, 871-72

War of 1812, 1, 2, 4, 6, 101, 682, 740

Ward, George T., 391, 734, 751, 752

Warren, Fitz Henry, 426, 432, 489, 697, 728, 751, 868

Warren, Joseph, 842, 861, 862, 865

Washburn, Cadwallader, 859-60

Washburn, Emory, 786, 787, 890, 892, 941

Washburn, Israel, Jr.: and future of Whig party, 763–64, 826–27, 829; and House speakership, 923, 963; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 827, 873; and launching of new sectional party, 829; and temperance, 872

Washburn, Israel, Jr.—and election: of 1850, 560–61;
of 1852, 701, 705–6, 710; of 1853–54, 784, 872–75
Washburne, Elihu B., 456, 721, 744, 747, 827, 829–30, 867–69

Washington, D.C.: Taylor supporters' meeting in (1847), 289; Whig senators meet in (1845), 212. See also District of Columbia, slavery in Watkins, Albert G., 793, 933, 937 Ways and Means Committee (U.S. House), 24, 32, 135, 235, 486

Webb, James Watson: and Anti-Rent movement, 242; as conservative Whig, 227, 239; and elections, 280, 299–301, 321, 710; and Fillmore, 431; as Greeley rival, 770; and Mexican War, 280; and New York constitution, 227, 239; and patronage, 425, 431; and suffrage, 227

Webster, Daniel: and abolitionism, 488, 581; ambitions of, 20, 22, 89, 123, 127, 132, 137-38, 264, 330, 583, 600, 606, 634, 636, 637-72, 956; and antimasonry, 22, 42; attempted banishment of, 149-50; and Austrian-Hungarian matter, 600-601; and banks, 16, 22-24, 26-27, 41, 92; biography of, 21-22; Buffalo speech of, 680, 693; and California, 487-89; Clay compared with, 25-26; and Clay Plan, 477-78, 487-89, 493-94, 503; Clay's relationship with, 21, 26, 93, 97, 124-27, 132, 137-38, 151, 198, 264, 397, 477-78, 680, 712; and Committee of Thirteen, 495; and Compromise of 1850, 553, 557-58, 580-82, 635-36, 816; and conservative Whigs, 488, 678; and Constitution, 488; death of, 756, 763, 770; and demise of Whig party, 956; and Democratic-Whig alliance, 543, 547; and economy, 92, 132, 134, 366; and expansionism, 254, 261, 315; and Federalists, 7; Fillmore compared with, 635-36, 644, 654; Fillmore's relationship with, 525, 661, 721-22; as Fillmore's secretary of state, 525-27, 529, 600-601; and Force Bill, 21; and Free Soilers, 341, 604; and Fugitive Slave Act, 425, 488, 553, 604-5, 636-37, 666; and future of Whig party, 211-12, 636, 763; and Galphin Claim, 499; and Harrison, 124-25, 138; Hayne's debate with, 12, 21-22; Hülsemann letter of, 635, 693-94, 750; and immigrants/nativism, 192, 205, 228, 260; impact on Whig party of, 636-37; and internal improvements, 261; and Jackson/Jacksonians, 10, 22-26; and Liberty party, 230-31; and little omnibus bill, 542; and Maine boundary question, 137; and Massachusetts politics, 149-50, 226-27, 321, 580, 581-83; and Mexican Cession, 488-89; and Mexican War, 248-49, 254, 261, 283, 311; on military heroes as presidents, 286; and National Intelligencer, 415; as National Republican, 261; and nationalism, 601; and nationalization of Whig party, 580; and New Mexico, 487-88, 525, 542; new party movement of, 22-23; and New York politics, 516, 543, 547, 652; and northern Democrats, 506; and northern Whigs, 41, 526-27, 596-97, 602, 621, 636-37, 672; and nullification, 12, 21-22, 91, 125; and omnibus bill, 494-95, 503-6, 509, 520, 523, 525-26, 529–30, 532; and organization of territorial governments, 488; and patronage, 126, 138, 419, 425-26, 433, 506, 537, 544, 546–49, 566, 573, 583, 600, 636-37, 661, 666, 721; and political culture of Whig party, 31; and republicanism, 10; and rise and expansion of Whig party, 35; and secession threat, 487, 601-2; 7th of March speech of, 487-89, 493-94, 506, 514, 557-58, 581-82, 718, 721; and Seward, 548; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 491; and southern Democrats, 495; and southern Whigs,

Webster, Daniel (continued)

22, 40-41, 506, 596-97, 636, 698, 724; and special session of Congress, 127; style/image of, 22, 25-26, 150, 526-27, 558, 635-36, 665; and tariffs, 21-22, 125, 235-36, 243, 247, 260-61, 264, 367; and Taylor administration, 384, 457, 488, 495, 510-11, 525; and Taylor Plan, 487-90, 503, 520; and Taylor's cabinet, 403-5, 407, 410-13, 499; and Texas annexation, 91, 94, 126, 224, 226-27, 260, 488, 490, 680; and Texas boundary dispute, 488, 529-30, 534-37, 539, 542; and Treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, 315; and Tyler, 132, 134, 137-38, 140, 149-50, 170, 189; and Utah, 542; and Van Buren, 23, 61; and Wilmot Proviso, 254, 261, 315-16, 488-89, 526, 553, 817. See also Webster, Daniel-and election; Webster, Daniel-and election of 1852; Webster, Daniel-and Union party; specific person Webster, Daniel-and election: of 1836, 40-42, 44-45, 52, 91, 93; of 1840, 91-95, 97-98, 100-101, 108; of 1842-43, 151, 160; of 1844, 123-24, 127, 132, 138, 163, 186, 189, 192, 198, 205; of 1845-46, 227, 264; of 1848, 248-49, 254, 260-61, 265-66, 270, 275, 281-83, 299, 300-301, 315-16, 319, 322-26, 330, 341, 366-67, 381, 755; of 1850, 549, 557, 559-61, 569, 573, 579, 580-83, 592; of 1851, 600, 637-44, 663-72

Webster, Daniel—and election of 1852: and convention, 707–15, 720–22; as "dead dog," 697; and Fillmore-Webster relationship, 721–22; and Fillmore's withdrawal, 681–82; and Kossuth, 692–95; and northern Whigs, 676; and patronage, 677; and southern Whigs, 676, 680, 698, 724; and Union party candidacy of Webster, 555, 675–79, 733–34, 740–41; votes for, 756; and Webster's ambitions, 634, 636, 637–72; and Webster's bitterness, 727

Webster, Daniel—and Union party: and Castle Garden meeting, 592, 637; and demise of Whig party, 956; and election of 1851, 654; and Webster as 1852 Union candidate, 555, 675–79, 733–34, 740–41; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 599, 606, 621, 636–37, 639–40, 642–44, 646, 649, 654, 665, 668–69

Webster, Fletcher, 321, 328, 404, 419, 425–26, 487, 506, 547–48

Webster-Ashburton Treaty (1842), 137

Websterites, 41, 958–59. See also Websterites—and election

Websterites—and election: of 1851, 669–70; of 1852, 708, 713, 721, 738, 761–62, 958–59; of 1853–54, 770, 891; of 1856, 975

Weed, Thurlow: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 896, 945; and Anti-Rent movement, 241–42; as anti-mason, 41; and banks, 34; and California statehood, 489; and Clay, 97–104; and Compromise of 1850, 553; and conservatives, 453, 618; and denise of Whig party, 945, 983; and Democrat-Whig alliance, 514, 516; and Fillmore's presidential ambitions, 919; Fillmore's rivalry with, 352, 394–96, 433–34, 491, 493, 505, 515, 523–24, 527, 531, 573, 589–90, 911; and Free Soilers, 339, 830–31, 835, 945; and Fugitive Slave Act, 894; and future of Whig party, 771, 825, 830–31, 833–35, 895, 917–

18, 922, 939-40; and Galphin Claim, 498-99; and Greeley, 770, 902; and Harrison, 91, 93, 100, 103; and impact of election of 1850, 596; influence of, 506; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 807, 825; and Know Nothings, 846-47, 849, 899-900, 905, 911, 920-21, 929; and launching of new sectional party, 825, 830-31; manifesto of, 523-24; and Mexican War, 283; and nativism, 193, 205, 212, 229, 318, 900; and New Mexico, 489, 520; and New York constitution, 239; and omnibus bill, 505-6, 513-16, 520, 531; and patronage, 125, 138, 395-96, 416, 418-19, 430-34, 513-16, 544-45, 548, 550, 650, 651; as political strategiest, 236; power and influence of, 299; and relationship between voting behavior and policies, 76-77; and Republic, 501; and Republican party, 945-47, 976; and republicanism, 17; and Scott, 101-3; and secession, 472; and Seward-Taylor relationship, 491; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 489-91, 493; and Seward's reelection, 917-19; and Smith (Truman), 404-5; and special session of Congress, 126; and suffrage, 227, 239-40; and tariffs, 195; and Taylor administration, 394-96, 410, 416, 418-19, 430-34, 456, 472, 498-99; and Taylor Plan, 490–93, 520; and temperance, 897–98; and Texas issues, 177, 186, 195, 520; third party efforts of, 352; and Tyler, 137-38, 148; and unity in Whig party, 550; and voter fraud, 204; and Webster, 92-93, 489, 548; and Wilmot Proviso, 453, 489, 520. See also Weed, Thurlow-and election

Weed, Thurlow—and election: of 1830s, 14, 36, 40–41, 74, 77; of 1840, 91–93, 97–104, 107; of 1844, 166, 183, 186, 189, 193, 195, 203–5; of 1845–46, 239–42; of 1848, 263, 270, 275, 277, 281–83, 289, 299–301, 307–8, 317–18, 320–22, 324, 327–29, 336, 339, 348, 351–53, 361, 363; of 1849, 394–96, 453–54, 456; of 1850, 549–50, 553, 573, 583–92, 595; of 1851, 645–51, 653–54, 656; of 1852, 709, 736, 739, 741, 743, 746, 748–51, 755; of 1853, 770, 788; of 1854, 830, 833–34, 894–903, 905, 908, 910, 917; of 1855–56, 917–20, 945, 947, 976

Weller, John B., 362-63, 858

Welles, Gideon, 436, 787, 847, 921–22

Wentworth, John, 379, 566, 870

West, Robert A., 592, 947, 960–61, 968, 971–72 West, 49, 60, 147; and bank issue, 16; and elections, 6, 9, 41, 46, 206, 354; and Jackson, 11; and land revenues, 135, 147; and recession of 1833, 25

Whig Congressional Executive Committee, 165 Whig National Committee, 236

Whig party: as anti-Jacksonian, 20–21, 26–34, 44, 46, 121; anti-Van Burenism as basic to, 61; basic principles/character of, 17, 27, 28–32, 64–70, 105, 113, 119–21, 154–55, 161, 165, 188, 207–9, 212, 234, 264, 326–27, 360–61, 413, 843–44; centrifugal and centripetal forces in, 951–54; challenges facing, 59; Clay as embodiment of, 188; Compromise of 1850's impact on, 543, 551–52; constituencies of, 115–19; dating of demise of, 822; decline/demise of, 208–9, 383, 765–66, 805, 822, 839–41, 951–85; Democrats as defining shape and thrust of, 40, 58–59, 310, 384, 765, 796, 894, 953, 955, 965–66; denationalization of, 822, 823–35; early thoughts of jettisoning, 770-71; elections' impact on, 206-7, 326, 330, 596-97; epitaph for, 614; evolution of, 2-3; as ex-Federalists, 2; expansion of, 32-45, 49, 60, 64, 87-88, 112-13, 236-38, 764; as failure, 123, 151, 154-57; Fillmore's commitment to, 524, 526-29, 545, 547-48, 550-51, 555, 598, 606, 618, 633-34; Fillmore's impact on, 521-22, 524; fragmentation of, 774; future of, 208-11, 384-85, 763-64, 767-75, 800-803; image of, 190, institutionalization of, 122; justification for survival of, 212-13; nationalization of, 580-81; "political culture" of, 30-32; prediction of demise of, 140; proposed name change for, 207, 211; radicalization of, 828; reassessment of, 195, 206-7; resurrection of, 959-61, 980, 984-85; rhetoric of, 1; rise of, 2, 20-21, 26-30, 46, 105; selection of name for, 27-28; state development of, 49-55; structure of, 236; Taylor's attempted transformation of, 384-85, 398, 406-8, 413; Tyler's effects on, 137, 140, 149, 521, 522; Webster's impact on, 636-37

Whig party (British), 3

Whitcomb, James, 495, 559

White, D.N., 830, 881-84, 887, 943

White, Hugh Lawson, 251, 542–43. See also White, Hugh Lawson—and election

White, Hugh Lawson—and election: of 1836, 42–46, 49–50, 52, 55–59, 84, 91, 99, 104; of 1840, 94, 104; of 1850, 593

White, Joseph L., 277, 339

White House: as election issue, 107, 174

Whitney, Thomas R., 847, 906

Wickliffe, Charles, 125, 137, 271

Williams, Alpheus S., 511, 661

Williams, Christopher H.—and election: of 1851, 629; of 1852, 682, 698, 702–4, 727, 732–35, 794; of 1853, 794

Wilmot, David, 251, 340, 376, 379, 466, 470–71, 575, 882

Wilmot Proviso (1846): and California, 436, 459, 463; and Clay Plan, 479-83; Clayton's vote for, 565; and Fillmore, 358; and Free Soilers, 336, 340, 343-44, 388, 390, 440, 462; and House speakership, 467-69; and Hunkers, 491; introduction of, 263; and Mexican Cession, 338, 407, 412, 435, 437, 443, 458; and New Mexico, 459, 535, 537-38; and northern Democrats, 251-52, 440, 462, 501; and northern Whigs, 251, 317, 319, 343, 357, 360, 376, 385, 389-90, 462, 465, 483, 537-38, 541, 553; and Northwest Ordinance, 469; and omnibus bill, 482, 494, 499-501, 503, 506, 520, 526-27, 531-32; and party differences, 251-55; passage of, 251; and Preston amendment, 389-90, 398, 412, 435-38, 450, 474; provisions of, 251; and secession threat, 464; and Seward's Higher Law speech, 490, 493; and southern Democrats, 440, 463; and Southern Rights, 392; and southern Whigs, 252, 317, 319, 388, 462, 464, 468, 499; and Taylor administration, 274-75, 286, 317, 344-45, 357, 359, 360, 365, 385, 388-90, 402, 405, 407, 412, 415, 435-40, 443-45, 450, 458-59, 461-62, 473-75, 479-80, 484, 489, 492, 502-3; and Texas boundary dispute, 520, 531; and Treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, 311, 313, 334; and Utah, 532, 535, 538; and Webster's 7th of March speech, 488. See also Wilmot Proviso (1846)—and election; specific person or state

Wilmot Proviso (1846)—and election: of 1846–47, 251–52; of 1848, 252, 256–57, 261, 263, 266–70, 274–75, 278–82, 286, 291, 296, 311–12, 314–20, 327–30, 333–36, 338, 340, 343–45, 357–60, 363, 365, 368, 372; of 1849, 434–35, 441, 450–53, 491; of 1850, 556–57, 560, 565, 569–70, 572, 588–89; of 1854, 869

Wilson, Henry: and anti-Nebraska coalitions, 929–30; and demise of Whig party, 983; and Free Soilers, 341; and future of Whig party, 826, 834; and Know Nothings, 917, 928–31; and launching of new sectional party, 826; and slavery, 266, 274, 319, 333, 341; third party efforts of, 321, 327; as Young Whig, 332. See also Wilson, Henry—and election: of 1848, 266–67, 274, 319, 321, 327, 333, 341; of 1852, 741; of 1853–55, 786–87, 890–91, 893, 917, 921, 928, 941–42

Wilson, James, 436, 504, 542, 543, 556

Wilson, John, 344, 438–39, 771, 781, 858

Wilson, Richard S., 548, 870

Winthrop, Robert C.: appointed to Webster's seat, 527, 580; and California, 483, 501, 536, 539; and demise of Whig party, 959, 975-76; and Democratic factionalism, 163; and Fillmore, 522, 525-27, 911-12, 915-16, 931; and Free Soilers, 812; and Fugitive Slave Act, 582; and future of Whig party, 826, 828, 910, 917, 940; and Galphin Claim, 498; and House speakership, 255, 280, 467–68, 470–72; and Kansas-Nebraska Act, 812-13, 816-17, 826, 828; and Know Nothings, 891-92, 910-12, 915-17, 931, 935, 939-40, 968, 975-76; and Kossuth, 693; legislative talent of, 236; and Mexican Cession, 539; and Mexican War, 233, 249, 254, 261; and New Mexico, 536; and omnibus bill, 501, 506, 525; and organization of territorial governments, 539, 556-57, 582; and Republican party, 910; retirement of, 770; Root's contempt for, 572; style/image of, 526, 770; and Taylor administration, 404, 409, 411, 487-88, 501, 526; and Texas boundary dispute, 535-36, 539, 582; and Toombs, 468; and Union party, 606, 675, 802; and Webster's presidential ambitions, 638-44; Webster's relationship with, 582; and Wilmot Proviso, 255, 526. See also Winthrop, Robert C.—and election

Winthrop, Robert C.—and election: of 1844, 162–63, 189; of 1848, 346, 361; of 1850, 556–57, 572, 580, 582–83; of 1851, 638–44; of 1852, 636, 675, 693, 700; of 1853–55, 770, 891–93, 916, 941; of 1856, 950, 968, 975–76

Wirt, William, 7, 13, 14, 52

Wisconsin: anti-Nebraska coalitions in, 858–61, 916; and Compromise of 1850, 566; Free Soilers in, 342–43, 373, 376, 379, 452, 566–67, 661, 663–64, 781, 800, 860–61; and Fugitive Slave Act, 567, 861; immigrants/Catholics in, 691, 742–43, 761; internal improvements in, 320; Know Nothings in, 859, 942; nativism in, 859; and omnibus bill, 508–9; patronage in, 426, 661, 667; reapportionment in, 568;

Wisconsin (continued)

Republican party in, 842, 861; temperance in, 691, 800, 859, 861, 956. See also Wisconsin—election in

Wisconsin—election in: of 1846, 237; of 1848, 320, 325, 342–43, 373, 376, 379; of 1849–51, 442, 452, 566–67, 596, 661, 672; of 1852, 683, 691, 707–8, 714–15, 719, 722, 739, 742–43, 747, 754, 756, 761; of 1853–55, 781, 799–800, 842, 858–61, 916

Wise, Henry A., 128, 149, 168; and election of 1855, 528, 927, 929, 931–32; and Know Nothings, 528, 927, 929, 931–32

Wood, John, 873, 875

Wood, Reuben, 569, 570, 571, 658

Woodward, George W., 744

Wright, Joe, 663, 664, 688, 752

Wright, Silas, 44, 169, 185, 203, 241. See also Wright, Silas—and election

Wright, Silas—and election: of 1836, 44; of 1844, 174, 185, 187, 192–93, 203, 205–6, 363; of 1846, 240

Yates, Richard T., 566, 567, 830, 869 "Young America," 776 Young Indians, 285–90, 308–9, 321, 413. See also specific person

Young, John: ambitions of, 956; and Anti-Rent movement, 241; confirmation of, 547; and conservatives, 491; and demise of Whig party, 956; and Democrat-Whig alliance, 514–16, 550, 618; and Dickinson, 514–16; and Mexican War, 280; and omnibus bill, 514; and patronage, 430, 433–34, 514–16, 650; as subtreasurer for New York City, 514; and Webster Plan. 488

Young, John—and election: of 1846, 242; of 1848, 280, 299–300, 363; of 1849, 435; of 1850, 586, 589–90, 592–93; of 1851, 618, 645–46, 649–50, 656

Young Whigs: as abolitionists, 226–27, 332, 334; and elections, 252–53, 261, 267, 334, 341–43, 680; emergence of, 226–27; and Free Soilers, 341–43; and Mexican War, 233, 249, 261; and tariffs, 235; and Texas annexation, 226–27, 254; third party efforts of, 321; and Wilmot Proviso, 252–53

Yulee, David, 508, 512, 517, 531, 564, 854

Zollicoffer, Felix K., 628, 716, 795, 821, 937