Hickman was not able to enjoy the fruits of his gruesome crime for long. He drove to Seattle, Wash. where local police, armed with a description of the kidnapper given by Parker and flashed across the country, noticed his free-spending activities and arrested him. Hickman did not deny the crime and was put on a train for the trip back to Los Angeles. Thousands of curious onlookers gathered at each station stop to catch a glimpse of the vicious murderer. Hickman waved to them. Some simply gawked, but others waved back.

Along the way, Hickman made two superficial attempts to take his own life in the train's washroom, which authorities later insisted were merely efforts to lay the groundwork for a plea of insanity. That was how Hickman pleaded, but he failed to convince a jury. He was hanged at San Quentin on October 19, 1928.

Hickok, James Butler "Wild Bill" (1837–1876) gunfighter and lawman

In some respects James Butler "Wild Bill" Hickok was a genuine Western hero despite the fact that he was a master of the art of back-shooting as he demonstrated in his great gun battle with the "McCanles Gang" in 1861. However, most of his so-called great accomplishments, except for those during his tour as an army scout, were probably false. Sifting out the truth from Hickok's tall tales could occupy a lifetime. As a scout in 1868, he saved 34 men in an Indian siege in the Colorado Territory by riding through the attackers' ranks to get help. But he did not, as he boasted to the Eastern press, knock off 50 Confederate soldiers with 50 bullets fired from a new-fangled rifle.

Born in Troy Grove, Ill. in 1837, Hickok was originally called "Duck Bill" because of a long nose and protruding lip. Once he had demonstrated his great ability with a gun, however, the other young blades thought it wiser to call him Wild Bill.

The Hickok legend began in 1861, when, as was described later in a ridiculous profile in Harpers Monthly, he wiped out the so-called McCanles Gang of nine "desperadoes, horse-thieves, murderers and regular cutthroats" in "the greatest one-man gunfight in history." In fact, there was no McCanles gang. Dave McCanles was a rancher who was owed money by a freighting company for which Hickok was working.

Wild Bill Hickok's reputation as a fearless lawman was built on the numerous ridiculous stories told of him by dime novel writers who overlooked his many less laudable traits.

With his 12-year-old son in tow, McCanles, probably unarmed, came to the branch office at Rock Creek Station, Neb. for his money. Two of his ranch hands, most certainly unarmed, waited outside. An argument ensued inside the building between the manager and McCanles; Hickok, hiding behind a calico curtain, shot the rancher dead. The two ranch hands outside the building were then killed by other members of the depot crew; one possibly was shot by the depot manager's wife. McCanles' 12-year-old son survived only by running away. Hickok was charged with murder, but the boy was not permitted to testify and the charge got lost in the shuffle.

A few years later, Hickok demonstrated he did have great shooting ability by gunning down Dave Tutt in a face-to-face duel at a distance of 75 yards. As his fame in that exploit spread, the Hickok legend grew and was expanded on with every retelling. Tutt, like McCanles, became a savage outlaw, when in fact he and Hickok had been friends since youth and their quarrel was over a girl.

In 1869 Hickok was elected sheriff of Ellis County and promptly killed two men in Hays City, the county seat. One of these killings was a remarkable performance. He had his back turned on a troublemaker named Sam Strawan when the latter started to draw. Hickok whirled, drew and shot first, killing Strawan. That November, in spite of these accomplishments, Hickok was voted out of office, apparently for taking more graft from brothels and gaming saloons than the average sheriff.

Hickok left town but returned in July 1880 and promptly got into a drunken brawl with five cavalry troopers. He shot two, one fatally; the others backed off. Hickok fled town again.

In April 1871 he was hired as city marshal of Abilene, Kan. with orders from the city fathers to clean up the town. Wild Bill did some shooting, but basically, he found it more gratifying to take protection money from gamblers and pimps rather than to interfere with their business. He spent his afternoons at the card table and almost every night in the town's red-light district.

In October 1871 Wild Bill got into a gunfight with a gambler named Phil Coe and mortally wounded him. As Coe fell, Hickok's deputy, Mike Williams, came rushing through the crowd, guns drawn, to help Hickok. Hearing Williams' footsteps, the marshal whirled and fired off two quick shots before he saw who it was. Williams died instantly of two bullets in the head. That was all the citizens of Abilene could take, and within a few weeks Wild Bill was fired and forced to leave town. Although his record in Abilene actually was a sorry one, it is still sighted today as one of the greatest reigns by a lawman in the history of the West.

The remaining five years of Hickok's life were pretty much downhill. He joined Buffalo Bill Cody's Wild West Show for a time but found the work both tiresome and degrading. He quit and tried his hand at prospecting and gambling, not having too much success in either. He was arrested several times in the Wyoming Territory, said a newspaper report, "as a vagrant, having no visible means of support."

In June 1876 Hickok turned up in Deadwood, Dakota Territory with Calamity Jane, an amazon whore. Hickok, who had accumulated a spot of cash, ensconced himself at Mann's Saloon Number 10 along the main street. On August 2, 1876 Wild Bill was playing poker and mulling over what to do with his hand—two pairs, aces and eights—when a saddlebum named Jack McCall slipped up behind him and shot him through the brain. Thereafter, the hand of aces and eights became known as a "dead man's hand." McCall claimed he was avenging his brother, whom he said Hickok had killed. Asked why he hadn't met Hickok face to face, McCall shrugged. "I didn't want to commit suicide," he said.

One of New York's most legendary thugs in the 1850s was Albert Hicks, a freelance gangster who eschewed working with any of the great gangs of the period because he felt he could fare better as a lone wolf criminal. The record bears out his judgment; he lived a care-free existence and never appeared to worry about money. The police suspected Hicksie, as he was called, of a number of robberies and possibly a dozen murders but, as he often said, "suspecting it and proving it are two different things." His reputation was such that when he was working a certain street along the waterfront, gangs of footpads knew they would be wise to move elsewhere.

Remarkably, Hicksie's downfall came about simply because he was not recognized by a Cherry Street shanghaier in whose establishment he had wandered dead drunk. The crimp operator put laudanum in his rum, and when Hicksie awakened the next morning, he was aboard the sloop E. A. Johnson, headed for Deep Creek, Va. on an oyster run. After ascertaining that the captain, named Burr, had a money bag along to pay for his cargo, the unwilling sailor resolved to murder the skipper and the other crewmen, two brothers named Smith and Oliver Watts. He did so in particularly bloody fashion, decapitating two of them and dazing the other and then chopping off that victim's fingers and hands as he clutched the rail in a futile attempt to avoid being thrown overboard.

After looting the sloop and letting it drift off, Hicksie returned to Manhattan with quite a substantial booty. Soon, he fled the city for Providence, R.I. with his wife and child. But he left a trail. Having flashed large sums of money, he came under suspicion when the bloodstained Johnson was discovered and put under tow five days after the murders. Hicksie was located in Providence and found in possession of the personal belongings of the captain and one of the Watts brothers.

He was tried for piracy and murder on the high seas and sentenced to be hanged on July 13, 1860. About a week before his scheduled execution, he made a full confession to the warden of the Tombs. Hicks was certainly one of the most celebrated villains of the day and his confession made him all the more infamous. There was a steady stream of visitors to the Tombs to see the noted blackguard shackled to the floor of his cell. For a small fee paid to the jailers, a visitor was permitted to speak a few words with the murderer.

Among those calling on Hicksie was Phineas T. Barnum, the great showman, whose American Museum enjoyed enormous popularity. Barnum told the flattered villain that he wished to obtain a plaster cast of his head and bust for display in the museum. After haggling the entire day, Hicksie agreed to pose for $25 and two boxes of 5¢ cigars. After the cast was made, the magnanimous Barnum returned with a new suit of clothes, which he traded to Hicks for his old suit, with which he wished to adorn a display dummy. Later, Hicks complained to the warden that Barnum had cheated him, that the new suit was shoddy and inferior to his old one.

Hicks was to be hanged on Bedloe's Island. He was ushered from the Tombs to the mainland dock by a fife and drum corps and a procession of carriages full of dignitaries. Thousands lined the procession route and cheered Hicksie, who graciously waved back to them. His only protest was that his suit did not fit, for which he cursed Barnum, but the warden informed him there was no time for alterations.

It was estimated that at least 10,000 persons witnessed the execution on Bedloe's Island. The scaffold was positioned only 30 feet from the water and hundreds of boats, from small craft to large excursion vessels, formed a solid line offshore. Hicksie's body was left suspended for half an hour and then cut down and transported back to Manhattan. His corpse was buried in Calvary Cemetery, but within a matter of days it was stolen by ghouls, who sold it to medical students more than willing to pay a premium for the chance to study the brain of such a notorious and bloodthirsty criminal.

Much is made that imprisoned sex murderers, especially those whose victims are children, are among the most hated by other inmates. Compounding that hatred, however, is a genuine fear that such a vulnerable prisoner could be forced by his keepers to turn snitch. In Hicks' case it was not illogical that he should be suspected of snitching on an elaborate escape plan worked out by his cellmate. According to the plan Hicks and the cellmate were to be rescued from Leavenworth Penitentiary by a helicopter pilot who would swoop down in the prison yard and pick up the two of them. Negotiations were said to be going on for hiring a pilot when suddenly prison officials swept down on the pair.

As punishment for having conceived the plot—which obviously never got off the ground—the cellmate was sent to the federal penitentiary in Marion, Ill., where he would be locked up in an individual cell 23 hours a day and denied virtually all privileges. Hicks was moved to an isolation cell in Leavenworth for a time. The thought of many inmates was that Hicks had snitched.

Still no retribution was taken on Hicks since it was not absolutely certain that he had snitched—or had a reason to snitch. Hicks had been an inmate in a Michigan state prison when suddenly he was transferred to Leavenworth. In general there were only two reasons for that to have happened: he was a problem prisoner Michigan couldn't control or he was in personal danger.

The truth surfaced when a prisoner came across an issue of Inside Detective that reported on the case of a sexual sadist who had snatched a 13-year-old boy off his bicycle in Green Oak Township, Mich., in October 1986 and driven away in his jeep. The boy's naked body was found in the woods a few days later. He had been molested and strangled. The magazine referred to other kidnappings and molestation to which he had subjected other young boys.

Hicks was sentenced to life plus 65 to 100 years and was serving his time in state prison. It was obvious to Leavenworth convicts that Hicks had to be transferred to Leavenworth for his own protection, and according to accepted criminal protocol, such a prisoner is accepted only when it is made clear to him that in return for "sanctuary," he must turn informer. Naturally in such cases prison authorities deny any such deal has taken place.

In Hicks' case the harassment became so intense that it was only a matter of time before he would be murdered. He disappeared from Leavenworth, undoubtedly transferred to a much lower-security federal prison in another state where he could hope no one would learn of his past so that he might live to serve his sentence without constant fear.

Higgins, John Calhoun Pinckney "Pink" (1848–1914) rancher and gunfighter

A fiery Texas rancher of the "I am the law" school, John Calhoun Pinckney "Pink" Higgins was probably as mean and sadistic as Print Olive, perhaps the West's most notorious big-spread owner. Higgins had the good sense to confine his excesses to Texas, which tolerated a lot from the high and mighty. Olive, also a Texan, made the mistake of shifting his operations, including his practice of "man burning," to Nebraska, a state that eventually sided with the homesteaders.

In the art of killing, Higgins was cut from the Olive mold. Typical was his treatment of a cowboy he caught butchering one of his cows just after he had shot it. Higgins gunned him down with a Winchester at 90 yards, disemboweled the dead animal and stuffed the would-be rustler's corpse inside. He then rode to town and informed authorities of a miracle he had just witnessed: a cow giving birth to a man.

From the time he was a young man, Pink exhibited a penchant for direct action. He was twice wounded by Indians and was an officer in the Ku Klux Klan. When he started his own ranch, he was brutal in his treatment of rustlers or those he considered rustlers. Pink also was the key figure in the bloody Horrell-Higgins feud that shook Lampasas County in the 1870s. On the surface, the feud started after the owners of a huge neighboring spread, the Horrells, killed three lawmen, including one of Pink's kin. But the real reason was the disappearance of cattle. When the fighting broke out, Pink took up his Winchester without hesitation. He gunned down Zeke Terrell, a rider for the Horrells, and then gave him the cow-birth treatment. Next, he shot Ike Lantier, another Horrell cowboy, for having the temerity to use the same water hole for watering his stock. Higgins' most callous act in the feud was the murder of Merritt Horrell as he sat in a saloon. Horrell was unarmed when Higgins marched in through the back door and pumped four slugs into him without giving his foe a fighting chance.

Lampasas became a regular battleground for the feudists, with Higgins and his men ambushing the Horrells as they rode in. A major shoot-out occurred in the town on June 14, 1877, when Higgins and three of his men took on seven of the Horrells. The gunfight lasted for several hours. It finally ended when the townsfolk convinced both sides to stop shooting and ride out their separate ways, but not before Higgins' brother-in-law died in the fighting. The following month Higgins led all his riders in an attack on the Horrell ranch. The siege ended after 48 hours, as the Higgins men started running low on ammunition.

The Texas Rangers arrived in the region in July and prevailed upon Higgins and the Horrells to sign a treaty, bringing peace to the county. Despite his excesses, Higgins did not suffer any major loss of popularity, since the Horrells were not exactly models of virtue. Two of the brothers, Mart and Tom Horrell were lynched the year after the truce for some other indiscretions they were suspected of having committed.

Higgins' last known killing, one of his fairest, occurred in 1903, when Pink met up with Bill Standifer, a longtime opponent of his. Both expert riflemen, they exchanged shots at a distance of 60 yards. Standifer hit Higgins' horse, but Pink put a Winchester bullet through his foe's heart. Higgins died of a heart attack in 1914.

highbinder societies Chinese gangs

Highbinder societies were strong-arm groups that engaged in blackmail, kidnapping and murder on assignment. These gangs never achieved the power or influence of the Chinese tongs, although their hatchet men were often hired by the tongs. Little Pete, the infa-

hijack word origin

During Prohibition, when the commandeering of trucks loaded with illegal booze became a common occurrence, the usual greeting given by an armed gunman sticking up was a terse “High, Jack”—meaning raise your hands high, Jack; hence hijack.

In its various forms, hijacking goes back to early colonial times, but it hit a peak during Prohibition, when the stealing of liquor shipments by one gang from another reached bloody and epidemic proportions. Today, hijacking is a highly professional art committed by gangs that limit their criminal activities to this one lucrative field. The theft of entire shipments of television sets, refrigerators, furs, clothing, cigarettes, drugs, oil and liquor is handled with smooth efficiency based on precise advance planning. By surveillance or bribery, a hijack gang will learn a truck’s schedule and type of cargo and plan exactly when and how to steal that cargo. One Chicago gang had special “scouts” to tip them off about valuable shipments, and its “work cars” were equipped with high-powered engines, police radios and switches to extinguish rear lights when desired. A special “crash car” was utilized to cut off the arrival of police during the operations.

Usually, hijackers are thought to work on lonely stretches of road in the middle of the night, but some of the lushest operating areas for these thieves are crowded business centers in broad daylight, a typical example being New York’s garment district. Two members of a hijacking mob will climb up to the cab of a truck, perhaps when it is halted at a red light or still parked at the curb on a side street, and force the driver and his helper to get out at gunpoint. They will be ordered to walk quietly to a car right behind the truck. Inside the car, the driver and helper are bound and blindfolded. They are then driven off to some quiet spot to cool their heels for three or four hours while one of the hijackers drives the truck away, empties its load into another truck—or a warehouse—and finally disposes of it. Once the job is over, the driver and helper are released.

A particularly daring breed of hijacker is the so-called switch man. This operator drives through the garment district in his own truck looking for another truck that the driver has had to park and leave for some reason. The switch man generally likes to see the driver go into a luncheonette where he will be sure to stay for several minutes. While the driver is gone, the switch man and a helper or two will clean the truck out in a matter of minutes and load the contents in their own truck. The switch man, of course, does not operate like the sophisticated crook of the more traditional hijacking gangs, but he does get the job done.

Another approach has been perfected in recent years by a New York area crook who takes jobs with parcel delivery companies under assumed names. His first day on the job, he is given a truck full of merchandise and sent out on his assigned rounds. It is the last the delivery service sees of the driver or the merchandise. All that is ever recovered is an abandoned delivery truck.

Overall figures on hijacking indicate it is a relatively “low incidence, high profit” crime. Losses, according to insurance officials, probably exceed $100 million a year, but estimates are inexact because of the difficulty of determining whether an actual hijacking or a case of employee theft has occurred. When an area experiences a sudden increase in hijackings, insurance firms and associations may send in undercover agents who use trucks as bait. A single arrest can cause hijacking in an area to cease for a considerable time, as apparently the news spreads rapidly. Similarly, insurance groups sometimes pass the word among truckers that an area is under surveillance, and as a result complaints of hijackings usually decrease. In such cases it is suspected that the drivers themselves are doing the looting and decide to “cool it” for a while.

Probably the greatest hijacking gang in history was Detroit’s Purple Gang, which during Prohibition sent convoys of liquor from Canada across the border into the United States and hijacked the trucks of rival shippers to augment their supply. Police believe that remnants of the old Purples are still responsible for much of the hijackings in Michigan and neighboring states.

Hill, Joan Robinson (1930–1969) alleged murder victim

One of the most notorious, headline-provoking murder cases in modern American history was the alleged “murder by omission” of beautiful and wealthy Joan Robinson Hill by her husband, a leading plastic surgeon in Houston, Tex. After he walked out free as a result of a mistrial, he was assassinated by a paid gunman, which kept the case boiling for years.

Joan Robinson was the daughter of oil multimillionaire Ash Robinson, a man who epitomized Texas-style money and power. Robinson was highly influential in state politics and had the ability to get what he wanted. But few things meant as much to him as Joan. She had been through a couple of marriages when she met Dr. John Hill in 1957. The two were married in a mammoth, Texas-sized wedding paid for by Ash Robinson. Hill's career kept him away from his wife a good deal, but Joan, an accomplished horsewoman, didn't seem to mind and old Ash was perfectly happy because he still had his daughter around so much of the time.

By 1968, however, the marriage was breaking up. Joan became aware that Hill was seeing other women. They argued often. In March 1969 Joan grew ill, and after considerable delay her husband put her in a small hospital, which didn't have the facilities to handle what developed into a very serious condition. During the course of her treatment, she had a sudden heart failure and died. The following morning a most peculiar event occurred. When doctors arrived to perform an autopsy, they found the body had been sent to a funeral home "by accident." Upon reaching the funeral home, they discovered the body had already been drained of fluids and was partly embalmed, making a really thorough autopsy most difficult. Back at the hospital a brain said to be Joan Hill's showed signs of meningitis, but there was some reason to suspect it was not Joan's brain since the brain stem in the body failed to produce the same symptoms.

From the time of Joan's funeral, old Ash Robinson pressured the district attorney to get a murder charge brought against Hill. In addition, Robinson had a parade of his important friends approach the DA with the same demand. Then, three months after the death of his first wife, John Hill married a woman with whom he had been linked while his marriage to Joan was disintegrating. That galvanized Robinson to further action. He hired detectives to follow Hill and lined up medical testimony, even bringing in the New York City medical examiner to reexamine the body. Two grand juries were convened but both refused to indict Hill. A third grand jury, however, received some additional material. By that time, Hill's second wife, Ann, had divorced him and testified Hill had confessed to her that he had killed Joan. Moreover, she claimed Hill had tried to kill her on more than one occasion. Hill was indicted for murder by neglect, technically "murder by omission," in that he willfully denied his wife adequate medical attention.

Hill's murder trial ended in a mistrial when his second wife blurted out that Hill had told her he had killed Joan. Such a statement could not be permitted in court, since under the law she could only testify about the period before she married Hill.

Before a new trial could be held, Dr. Hill married a third time. Just after returning from his honeymoon in September 1972, he was shot and killed by an assassin wearing a Halloween mask. The murderer was identified as a young Houston hood, Bobby Vandiver, who had brought along a prostitute to keep him company while he waited to ambush Hill in the latter's home. Vandiver confessed he had gotten $5,000 for the job, and his story implicated a number of people, among them Ash Robinson. The killer said that Ash had let it be known he would pay for the execution of his ex-son-in-law and that his intermediary in the hit contract was a Houston woman named Lilla Paulus, a former prostitute and madam. The Paulus woman was indicted, but before her trial began, Bobby Vandiver was killed while attempting to escape jail. Despite this development, Paulus was convicted on the testimony of the young prostitute who had accompanied Vandiver. The prostitute, however, could produce no admissible evidence linking anyone else to the crime. Lilla Paulus was sentenced to life imprisonment but refused to implicate anyone else in the murder.

Following the verdict, Ash Robinson continued to deny to the press any involvement in Hill's murder. He successfully fended off a civil suit against him by the Hill family, and it appeared that with Joan Robinson dead, John Hill dead and Ash Robinson growing old, the Hill-Robinson murders were destined to remain one of the most bizarre mysteries of modern times. In 1981 a four-hour miniseries dramatization of the case was shown on television; it had already been the subject of a best-selling book, Blood and Money by Thomas Thompson. Joan Robinson was played by Farrah Fawcett, and the actress, or her publicity agent, took special pains to let it be known that Ash Robinson, the surviving principal in the case and then 84 years old, had voiced his "casting approval" of Farrah as the "ideal choice" to play his deceased daughter. Rumor also had it that Robinson had suggested he portray himself in the film.

Hill, Joe (1879–1915) labor organizer and alleged murderer

A handsome Swedish immigrant, Joel Hagglund became the troubadour of the Industrial Workers of the World, a radical labor union founded in 1905. Soon the songs of "Joe Hill" were known throughout America. He composed many of the Wobblies' favorite songs and is perhaps most famous for the refrain of "pie in the sky" in "The Preacher and the Slave."

In 1915 two Salt Lake City policemen were shot in a grocery store holdup. Hill was charged with the crime, convicted and sentenced to die. The verdict was most controversial and the IWW and the rest of the American left considered it a frame-up. Just before he was executed by a Utah firing squad, Hill wired Big Bill Haywood, the head of the IWW: "Don't waste any time in mourning. Organize."

Hill, Virginia (1918–1966) syndicate girlfriend and bagwoman

Mistakenly dubbed the Queen of the Mob by newspapers in the early 1950s during the Kefauver Committee hearings into organized crime, Virginia Hill was no more than a trusted bedmate to many of the syndicate's top gangsters and a bagwoman for the mob, delivering funds to secret Swiss bank accounts or elsewhere as instructed. From the time she arrived in Chicago to be a cooch dancer in the 1934 World's Fair Hill took a series of husbands and lovers. First came Joe Epstein, the bookmaking king and tax expert for the Capone mob, followed by the brothers Fischetti, Tony Accardo, Murray Humphreys, Frank Nitti, Joe Adonis, Frank Costello, and lastly her true love, Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel.

Hill was truly in love with Siegel, yet was conveniently away in Europe when the Bug was shot to death in her living room by an underworld assassin in 1947. After his death she still spoke lovingly of Siegel (he had named the Flamingo Hotel in Las Vegas in honor of her nickname) without being critical of the syndicate, which had ordered his execution because his Las Vegas deals had cost them a fortune.

Virginia Hill, the so-called Queen of the Mob, added a touch of glamour and, at one point, violence to the Kefauver hearings.

She provided the Kefauver hearings with one of its high points as she parried questions about why so many gangsters gave her money. (It was strictly because of her personal charms, she said.) She also added some off-the-stand excitement by tossing a right cross to the jaw of reporter Marjorie Farnsworth of the New York Journal American and screaming at other reporters: "You goddamn bastards. I hope an atom bomb falls on all of you."

After that dramatic peak in her life, Virginia took a new husband and wandered the pleasure spots of Europe. According to some, she oversaw the Swiss bank accounts of several mobsters. It is generally believed that Hill supplied much of the funds that allowed Lucky Luciano to live out his exile in Italy in comfort.

But Hill missed the action of the old mob days and hated growing old. She attempted suicide a number of times, and finally, in March 1966 she swallowed a large number of sleeping pills and lay down in the snow outside Salzburg, Austria to watch the clouds as death closed in on her.

"Hillside Strangler" duo Bianchi and Buono

In addition to being more adept than other serial killers, the so-called Hillside Strangler eluded apprehension for some time due to the fact that the law enforcement authorities were not suspecting two perpetrators of the crimes. The Strangler's modus operandi was readily recognizable: it started out in imitation of that of Caryl Chessman, California's notorious "Red Light Bandit" of the 1940s. Chessman would approach parked couples in lonely spots, flashing a red light resembling that on a police car. He robbed the drivers and sometimes took off with their female companions and forced them to perform sexual acts with him.

Chessman never killed his victims, but the Hillside Strangler murdered at least 10 women, starting in 1977. What prevented the police from catching him sooner was, again, the fact that the Hillside Strangler was not one man but two—cousins Kenneth Bianchi, born in 1952, and Angelo Buono, Jr., born in 1935. At times, the cousins killed together. They first planned their murder rampage after a long drinking bout in which they speculated how it would feel to kill someone. (This statement may be giving them the benefit of the doubt. It is still not clear whether one or both had previously committed murders on their own.) Both decided that Chessman's method of pretending to be a law officer was the perfect way to grab women.

Their technique was to stop women motorists or streetwalkers, flash badges, demand identification, and force them into their car, supposedly an undercover police vehicle. The women were invariably raped, sodomized, then strangled to death. Most of the bodies were left in spots where they were certain to be found. The bodies were generally washed clean—apparently at Buono’s suggestion—so as to leave no clues for the police to follow.

After a while, Bianchi decided a change of scene was called for, and he moved to the state of Washington, where, in Bellingham, he found work as a security guard. Eventually, he was linked to the murder of two young women who had been lured by him to investigate a nonexistent house-sitting job. A search of Bianchi’s home turned up evidence tying him to the killings, and cooperation with California authorities linked him to at least five Hillside Strangler slayings. Fearful of a possible death penalty in Washington State, Bianchi offered to identify his cousin as the “real” Hillside Strangler. Based on Bianchi’s evidence, Buono was convicted in 1983 of nine murders. Despite Buono’s care in always fixing up the death scene after one of the pair’s murders—he always cleaned his home after Bianchi left so that no fingerprints of any victims were found—a meticulous scientific search turned up a single eyelash from one of the murder victims. Also, some strands of fiber from a chair in Buono’s home were discovered on one body.

One witness in the Buono trial was 27-year-old Catherine Lorre, who identified the two cousins as the men who had stopped her on a Hollywood street in the late 1970s and demanded identification. She had produced her driver’s license, next to which was a picture of herself as a little girl sitting on the lap of her proud father, actor Peter Lorre. Bianchi testified that he decided not to ensnare her, for fear that murdering the daughter of a celebrity might put too much heat on the homicidal partners.

Buono was sentenced to nine terms of life imprisonment without parole, while Bianchi was returned to Washington to a life sentence with no possibility of parole before 2005.

Like several other serial murderers, the Hillside Strangler—or at least Bianchi—maintained a romantic liaison, with a woman drawn to him because of his crimes as Carol Bundy was to Douglas Clark. While Bianchi was in California prior to Buono’s trial, a 23-year-old poet and aspiring playwright named Veronica Lynn Compton sought Bianchi’s opinion of her new play about a female serial killer. Correspondence and conversations followed, which reveal how close Veronica’s tastes came to serial killing. Bianchi then concocted a plan to spring him from his own guilty verdict in the Bellingham murders by having Veronica strangle a woman and leave specimens of Bianchi’s semen at the scene to convince authorities that the real killer was still at large.

Compton visited Bianchi in prison and got from him a book in which he had hidden part of a rubber glove containing his semen. Compton went to Bellingham and attempted a murder but botched the job. She was convicted and was sent to prison with no hope of parole before 1994. For a time, she continued to correspond with Bianchi, but finally her ardor for him cooled, and she shifted to corresponding with Douglas Clark, then in San Quentin waiting execution as the Sunset Slayer. A typical ghoulish passage in one letter to Clark read: “Our humor is unusual. I wonder why others don’t see the necrophilic aspects of existence as we do.”

In 1988 Compton escaped from prison and disappeared.

Hinckley, John W., Jr. (1955–) accused assailant of Ronald Reagan

On March 30, 1981 Ronald Reagan became the eighth sitting president of the United States to be subjected to an assassination attempt and the fourth—after Andrew Jackson, Harry Truman and Gerald Ford—to survive. Reagan was shot by a 25-year-old drifter, John W. Hinckley of Evergreen, Colo., as he left the Washington Hilton Hotel, where he had addressed a labor audience. The assailant was seized immediately after having fired four to six shots from a .22-caliber revolver, a type known popularly as a Saturday Night Special. The president was hit by a bullet that entered under the left armpit, pierced the chest, bounced off the seventh rib and plowed into the left lower lobe of the lung. Reagan froze for a moment at the door of his limousine and then was brusquely pushed inside the car by a Secret Service agent. Remarkably, the president did not realize he had been shot but thought he had simply been injured when shoved into the car. Only upon arrival at the hospital was it determined that he had been shot.

Also wounded were three others: the president’s press secretary, James S. Brady; a Secret Service agent, Timothy J. McCarthy; and a District of Columbia police officer, Thomas K. Delahanty. All three survived, although Brady remained hospitalized for many months after the assassination attempt.

Hinckley turned out to be the son of an oil executive who had grown up in affluence in Dallas and moved with his family to Colorado in 1974. He had attended Texas Tech University on and off through 1980 but never graduated. At times he had traveled across the country, and in 1978 he had enrolled himself in the National Socialist Party of America, generally known as the Nazi Party of America. A spokesman for that organization said the group had not renewed Hinckley's membership the following year because of his "violent nature."

Hinckley had evidently flown from Denver to Los Angeles on March 25 and then boarded a Greyhound bus for Washington the following day, arriving March 29, the day before the attack. Following Hinckley's arrest for the attack on President Reagan, it was discovered that he had been in Nashville, Tenn. on October 9, 1980, when then-President Jimmy Carter was there. Hinckley was arrested at the airport in Nashville when X-ray equipment disclosed he had three handguns and some ammunition in his carry-on bag. The weapons were confiscated, and he paid a fine of $62.50. Despite his arrest, federal authorities did not place Hinckley under security surveillance thereafter. Four days after his release, Hinckley turned up in Dallas, where he purchased two .22-caliber handguns in a pawnshop. One of these weapons was alleged to have been used in the attack on Reagan.

A bizarre sidelight to the case was the discovery that Hinckley had been infatuated with movie star Jodie Foster, then a student at Yale University. He had written her several letters, and an unmailed letter dated March 30, 1981, 12:45 P.M.—one and three-quarter hours before the attack—was found in his Washington hotel room. It read:

Dear Jody,

There is a definite possibility that I will be killed in my attempt to get Reagan. It is for this very reason that I am writing to you now.

Hinckley went on to say he loved her and that although we talked on the phone a couple of times, I never had the nerve to simply approach you and introduce myself . . . Jody, I would abandon this idea of getting Reagan in a second if I could only win your heart and live out the rest of my life with you, whether it be in total obscurity or whatever. I will admit to you that the reason I'm going ahead with this attempt now is because I just cannot wait any longer to impress you. I've got to do something now to make you understand in no uncertain terms that I am doing all this for your sake. By sacrificing my freedom and possibly my life, I hope to change your mind about me.

It appeared that Hinckley had been influenced in his alleged actions by the film Taxi Driver, in which Foster had played a child prostitute. At one point in the film, the protagonist, a taxi driver, is planning to assassinate a presidential candidate.

In August 1981 Hinckley was indicted by a federal grand jury in Washington, D.C. on charges of attempting to kill President Reagan as well as the other three men. The FBI reportedly concluded that Hinckley had acted alone. In a verdict that shocked the nation, he was acquitted by a jury on grounds of insanity. He was then committed to a mental institution.

Hite, Wood (1848–1881) James gang outlaw

A cousin of Jesse and Frank James, Wood Hite was shot and killed in 1881 in what has been characterized by some as a "dress rehearsal" for Jesse James' murder some four months later.

Born in Logan County, Ky. in 1848, Hite rode with the James gang from 1870 until 1881. By that year the gang was in disarray. Many of its key members had been killed or imprisoned while others had apparently contacted law enforcement officials about betraying Jesse James in return for leniency. In 1881 Hite had the misfortune to choose the home of a relative of Bob Ford, James' eventual assassin, as a hideout. Also seeking refuge there was Dick Little, another gang member who like the Fords, was seeking to turn traitor. According to certain accounts Hite somehow got wind of the plot or came to suspect that the Fords and Little were planning to turn him in. He accused them of it and died in a blazing gun battle in the kitchen. Other accounts, such as that of contemporary James biographer Frank Triplet, insist the killing was more dastardly: "Creeping one night lightly to his room, Dick and Bob Ford put a pistol to his head, and he was soon weltering in his gore."

Jesse James partisans have since maintained that had Hite managed to get his information to Jesse, the latter would have trusted the Ford brothers even less than he already did and thus might have saved his own life.

Hobbs, James (1819–1879) scalp hunter

Together with James Kirker, James Hobbs was a partner in America's most lethal scalp-hunting team.

As a boy Hobbs was taken prisoner by Indians and instead of being killed was adopted by them. Thereafter, he seems to have had a love-hate relationship with the Indians, living with them, marrying them, deserting them, scalping them for bounties and aiding them against other white men. Hobbs had the same sort of attitude toward whites. He might help them against Indians, or if they happened to be dark-skinned and dark-haired, he was just as likely to scalp them since their hair would be indistinguishable from that of an Indian and would bring the same bounty.

Hobbs left his original tribe, the Comanche, in 1839 and became a trapper and hunter of both buffalo and scalps. He formed an alliance with another scalp hunter, James Kirker, and together they took scalps by the hundreds. In one Indian village, aided by Shawnee friendly to Hobbs, they lifted 300 scalps. Eventually they accumulated an extremely valuable load, which they took to Mexico to turn in for a bounty. Kirker stole the down payment they received for the scalps and deserted Hobbs, but in time Hobbs received the balance of the money due from the Mexican authorities, which made him a wealthy man. He also gained added fame when he started killing Navajo, much to the Mexicans' delight. Later though, Hobbs joined the American cause in the war against Mexico and came out of the conflict a captain. He then headed for the gold fields of California, getting as far as Yuma Indian country. He settled with the tribe for a while, and in 1850 he even helped them to dispose of a vicious scalp hunter named John Glanton. Hobbs lived out his life in this contradictory fashion, sometimes scalping Indians and sometimes joining their cause, until his death in Grass Valley, Calif. in 1879.

Hoch, Johann (1855–1906) mass murderer

In 1905 Chicago police inspector labeled a Chicago packinghouse employee named Johann Hoch “the greatest mass murderer in the history of the United States.” No accurate list of victims could ever be compiled, so the claim cannot be verified statistically, but Hoch’s record was certainly formidable in many respects. From about 1890 until 1905 it was estimated that he married bigamously as many as 55 women. The lucky ones he robbed of all their possessions and deserted; the unlucky ones he not only robbed but poisoned as well. While the more sensationalist newspapers placed his murder toll at about 25, diligent police work determined the number to be about 15. He was convicted of only one homicide, however, that of his next-to-last known bride, 46-year-old Marie Walcker, the owner of a small candy shop. His other 14 unfortunate spouses all died rather quickly after exchanging vows with him. All their bodies were found to contain traces of arsenic, but virtually all embalming fluid at the time contained some arsenic, and Hoch always saw to it that each of his dearly departed was very heavily embalmed.

Hoch located his victims by simply advertising in German-language newspapers. The ad that attracted Mrs. Walcker read:

WIDOWER, quiet and home-loving, with comfortable income and well-furnished house wishes acquaintance of congenial widow without children. Object, matrimony. Write Box B-103.

Mrs. Walcker did write and within days became Mrs. Hoch. She managed to live only a month following the wedding, taken mysteriously ill shortly after she’d transferred all her life savings to her husband. In keeping with Hoch’s record of the most marriages in the shortest period of time, he promptly married his widow’s sister four days later. He did not kill her, but instead took her money and ran. Unaware of his intentions, Hoch’s new wife reported him missing. In the ensuing police hunt, Hoch’s picture appeared in newspapers around the country, and woman after woman came forward to say he, under the name of Hoch or various other aliases, was her husband as well. Other persons came forward to identify Hoch as the short-term husband of a departed member of their family. Hoch was finally located in New York City as he was popping his favorite question to the landlady of a boardinghouse.

By this time, authorities were convinced they had a monstrous mass murderer on their hands. The newspapers named him Stockyard Bluebeard, a reference to his sometime work in Chicago packinghouses. Arsenic traces were found in a number of Hoch’s dead wives, and he was returned to Chicago to be tried for Marie Walcker’s death. It was a prudent choice, the one case in which Hoch could not use his pat defense that the traces of arsenic in the dead body came from the embalming fluid. By this time science had made advances in the undertaking field, and the newest embalming agents contained no arsenic. The undertaker who’d embalmed Marie Walcker had switched to one of the new fluids just two weeks before. That fact and the testimony of several of Hoch’s wives about how he had absconded with their money—one told of him stealing off in the night, even taking the gold bridge-work she had left in a water glass beside her bed—sealed the verdict against the defendant. He was hanged on February 23, 1906 before 100 witnesses at the Cook County Jail.

Forty-nine years later, some very old human bones were found in the wall of a cottage where Hoch had lived. The police had searched the premises at the time hoping to find evidence of additional killings by Hoch but had discovered nothing.

Hoffa, James R. (1913–1975?) labor leader and alleged murder victim

Theoretically, the disappearance in 1975 of former Teamster labor boss James R. Hoffa is still under investigation by federal and local law enforcement agencies in Michigan. Actually, the handful of FBI agents still assigned to the Hoffa case do little more than check out an occasional lead. In fact, the FBI considers the case—one of murder—solved.

Hoffa had for decades been a controversial union leader, one with established links to organized crime. Yet despite his underworld connections and a long list of nefarious dealings, he remained immune to prosecution until he became the target of Robert F. Kennedy, first as chief counsel to the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, more popularly known as the McClellan Committee, and later as attorney general.

Subjected to a persistent “Get Hoffa” campaign by Kennedy, the labor leader was finally brought to trial in 1962 for demanding and receiving illegal payments from a firm employing Teamsters. The result was a hung jury, but Hoffa was later convicted of attempting to bribe one of the jurors and sentenced to eight years. In 1964 he was also convicted of misappropriating $1.7 million in Teamster pension funds. Finally entering prison in 1967, Hoffa served a total of 58 months.

In 1975 Hoffa was in the midst of a struggle to retake control of the union from his former protégé, Frank Fitzsimmons. His sentence had been commuted in 1971 by President Richard Nixon with the provision that he stay out of union politics for 10 years. He was challenging that legal stipulation and, perhaps more critically, the will of various organized crime fiefdoms within the Teamsters whose leaders did not want a strongman like Hoffa back in power, fearing he would upset or take over their operations.

On July 30, 1975 the 62-year-old Hoffa left his suburban Detroit home and drove to a restaurant, Manchus Red Fox, allegedly to meet a member of the Detroit underworld, a Detroit labor leader and a power in New Jersey Teamster affairs. Hoffa arrived for the meeting at 2 P.M.; at 2:30 P.M. he called his wife to tell her the others had not yet shown up. That was the last ever heard from him. He was seen getting into a car with several other men in the restaurant parking lot about 2:45. According to the most popular police theory, he was garroted and then his body was run through a mob controlled fat-rendering plant that was later destroyed by fire.

The government’s list of suspects, gathered through information received from underworld characters and convicts seeking to reduce their own sentences, has long included reputed Pennsylvania crime kingpin Russell

Bufoalino, Anthony “Tony Pro” Provenzano and two of his underlings, Gabriel Briguglio and Thomas Andretta. Another suspect, Gabriel’s brother, Salvatore Briguglio, was reported to be talking to the FBI when he was shot to death in front of a New York City restaurant in March 1978. According to the FBI scenario, Tony Pro set up the so-called peace meeting with Hoffa and instead ordered him murdered. Provenzano denied even being in Detroit on the date of the Hoffa disappearance and produced an alibi that placed him in Hoboken N.J., visiting various union locals.

One of the more curious aspects of the case is the question of why, if he had ordered Hoffa’s execution, would Tony Pro link himself to the murder by setting up a meeting with the victim, a fact that Hoffa had made known to a number of individuals. Even more confusing is why Hoffa’s killers would pick him up some 45 minutes late, an unlikely display of tardiness for mob hit men. However, the FBI’s theory, backed up by such facts as the finding of traces of Hoffa’s blood and hair in the back seat of the abduction car, appears more convincing than any other plausible explanation. One Teamster foe of Hoffa under suspicion told investigators, with a perfectly straight face, he had it on good authority that the missing union leader “ran off to Brazil with a black go-go dancer.”

Since the former union leader’s disappearance, those suspects mentioned most often have either started serving sentences or been convicted of other crimes, some on evidence uncovered during the Hoffa investigation. But convictions in the Hoffa case clearly will depend on the authorities’ ability to get some lower-level hoodlum in organized crime to talk or the possibility that one of the conspirators will say the wrong thing to the wrong person. Otherwise, the authorities have no court case. “We all know who did it,” one unidentified Teamster vice president has been quoted as saying. “It was Tony with those guys of his from New Jersey. It’s common knowledge. But the cops need a corroborating witness, and it doesn’t look like they’re about to get one, does it?”

Hoffman, Harold Giles (1896–1954) governor and embezzler

One of the most flamboyant politicians in recent American history, Harold G. Hoffman lived a double life, that of an elected public official and an embezzler, whose total depredations remain undetermined. At the high point of his career, in 1936, he was groomed by New Jersey Republicans for president of the United States. At the low point in his life, in 1954, investigators closed in on him and he became an almost certain candidate for prison.

Hoffman was an army captain in World War I, a small-town banker, mayor of South Amboy, assemblyman, congressman, state commissioner of motor vehicles and, lastly, governor of New Jersey. At the age of 33, he began looting money. By the time he left the governorship in 1937, he had stolen at least $300,000, a considerable sum in Depression dollars. He spent the last 18 years of his life juggling monies in order to cover his embezzlements.

As near as could be determined, Hoffman started stealing from his South Amboy bank, dipping into dormant accounts to keep up his free-spending ways. Whenever an inactive account became active, Hoffman was able to shift money from another quiet account to cover his looting. Some of Hoffman's stolen funds went to promote his political career. Eventually, he reached Congress. Happily, Washington was not too far away from South Amboy, so he could keep a lid on things at the bank. When Hoffman suddenly left Congress to take the post of state commissioner of motor vehicles, which to many seemed a political step-down, some observers theorized that the move was part of Hoffman's plan to eventually run for governor, but the real reason was that he needed access to public funds. Sooner or later, an examiner might discover the shortages at the bank, so it was extremely advantageous for Hoffman to be able to juggle the funds of the motor vehicle department. When money had to be at the bank, it was there; when it had to be in the state coffers, it was there. In the process, more and more stuck to Hoffman's fingers.

When Hoffman won the governorship at the age of 39, he enjoyed wide popularity in his state and grew to be a national political power. However, he became a center of controversy in the sensational Lindbergh kidnapping case. His interference and attempts to reopen the investigation after Bruno Richard Hauptmann was convicted brought him widespread criticism. When he granted Hauptmann a few months' reprieve, he provoked a storm of criticism. He would never again be elected to any public office. Upon completing his term, Hoffman was named director of the unemployment compensation commission, an agency with a budget of $600 million, and he was able to continue his money-juggling operations.

While still governor, Hoffman had become president of the Circus Saints and Sinners, a group devoted to the twin duties of providing help to old circus folk and providing themselves with a good time. Hoffman became known as a boisterous buffoon, but inside he must have been a frightened, lonely man trying to keep his crimes hidden.

In 1954 newly elected Gov. Robert B. Meyner suspended Hoffman pending investigation of alleged financial irregularities in his department. Exorbitant rentals were apparently being paid for some department offices, and the state's attorney general subsequently found that favored groups stood to make nearly $2 million from a modest investment of $86,854. Other irregularities appeared in the purchase of supplies.

Hoffman put up a joyous front. The day following his suspension he appeared before the Circus Saints and Sinners. Harry Hershfield, the famous wit, cracked, "I knew you'd get into trouble in Jersey, fooling with a Meyner." Hoffman answered, "I can't even laugh." And he broke into raucous laughter.

The next two months, however, were lonely ones for Hoffman as he waited for the ax to fall. One morning in June he got up in the two-room Manhattan hotel suite provided by the Saints and keeled over with a fatal heart attack.

Later, more and more facts came out. The state became concerned when they discovered Hoffman had deposited $300,000 of public money in his own bank in a non-interest-bearing account. Officials then learned that not only was the interest missing but so was the principal.

Hoffman had written a confession to one of his daughters to be opened only upon his death. It said, ". . . until rather recently I have always lived in hope that I would somehow be able to make good, to get everything straight."

Holdberg Technicality legal technicality

Much has been made of criminal cases being thrown out on technicalities, sometimes with sound legal justification but sometimes for what seem the most absurd of reasons. Probably the leading example of the latter was a criminal case in Illinois in 1919 in which a man named Goldberg was indicted on 50 criminal counts and convicted on all of them. However, the conviction was reversed on appeal and the case remanded because on one of the 50 court documents, the defendant's name was spelled Holdberg instead of Goldberg, a simple typographical error. To this day a discussion of the Holdberg Technicality is part of the regular course work at a number of law schools.

Known by various names in different penal institutions, the hole is reserved for "incurable inmates." Few persons have ever understood the horrors the hole represented until the courts in recent years started taking up the question of whether such cells were unconstitutional.

They have steadily rejected the claims of prison administrators that such cells are a necessary part of institutional discipline.

The strip cell at California's Soledad Prison was one that the courts have closed down. Each such cell measured 8 feet 4 inches by 6 feet, with side and rear walls and floor of solid concrete. One prisoner, cited in a court case, spent his first eight days totally naked, sleeping on the floor with only a stiff canvas mat that "could not be folded to cover the inmate." The only other furnishing was a toilet which was flushed by a guard outside the cell, once in the morning and once at night. The cell was without light or heat and was never cleaned, so that the floors and walls were "covered with the bodily wastes of previous inhabitants."

A federal court found solitary confinement cells at New York's Dannemora Prison little different, although the cells did have sinks ("encrusted with slime, dirt, and human excremental residue"). The court also found that the prisoners were kept entirely nude for days while the windows just across from the cell were left wide open during the night—even in subfreezing temperatures.

A University of Connecticut professor of law, Leonard Orland, has a program in which his students are sent to prison for a weekend as part of their class work. He himself once spent 24 hours in the hole in a Connecticut institution. His cell was a windowless 4 by 8 foot steel box, with a single lightbulb and a small peephole controlled from outside. He was not alone in the cell—there were three cockroaches in the sink. In his book Prisons: Houses of Darkness, Orland described his experience as being confined in a "very small stalled elevator." And he added:

Its effect on me was devastating; I was terrified; I hallucinated; I was cold (I was nude and the temperature was in the low 60's). When the time came for my disciplinary hearing, I was prepared to say or do anything not to return to the hole. And yet I could not have experienced a tenth of the desperation of those men for whom the situation is a genuine one.

Hole in the Wall Western outlaw stronghold

Probably the best known of all the Western badman hideouts, Hole in the Wall was located in Wyoming some 50 miles south of Buffalo and about a day's ride from Casper. East of the Hole lay the lush grazing lands of the Powder River country.

At first strictly a refuge for outlaws, particularly horse thieves and renegade Indians, Hole in the Wall soon became a haven for unemployed cowboys, especially after the drought of 1883. For a while, it appeared that Hole in the Wall was getting bigger and badder, but in reality, it was being civilized. Some of the cowboys did pilfer a cow or two, but they were homesteading the land and slowly pushing the badmen out. Still, people spoke of something called the Hole in the Wall Gang, a band that never existed. There were many gangs that periodically headquartered at Hole in the Wall, but the concept of a specific "gang" was an oversimplification. Certainly, there was little loyalty among the resident thieves, as full-time and part-time bandits shifted allegiance from one outfit to another whenever a new leader looked like he was about to produce something worthwhile. In time, Butch Cassidy lost his taste for Hole in the Wall and hid out thereafter in Brown's Hole or Robber's Roost. When the Hole in the Wall Gang is mentioned, what is meant is the Wild Bunch, of which Cassidy was the acknowledged leader. Other Hole-in-the-Wallers included the Black Jack Ketchum gang and the Laughing Sam Carey gang.

Laughing Sam might well be considered the founder of the outlaw community at Hole in the Wall, turning up there some time before 1880. Carey, a mean-streaked bank robber and train robber who killed a number of men, fled to the Hole whenever a posse was closing in on him. Somehow he never had trouble recruiting renegades and cowboys to follow him on forays, even though he was not really a very successful bandit. Once when he and his gang attempted to hold up the Spearfish Bank in South Dakota, Laughing Sam was the only one to get away alive, and he was badly shot up. He struggled back to Hole in the Wall, where a cowboy took three slugs out of him. Ten days later, he was off again with a full complement of men to hold up a train. As Butch Cassidy is supposed to have said to the Sundance Kid, "Kid, there's a lot of dummies at Hole in the Wall."

Hole-In-The-Wall Saloon 19th-century New York dive

One of the toughest saloons in New York City between the 1850s and the 1870s was the legendary Hole-In-The-Wall, located at Dover and Water Streets in the heart of the crime-ridden Fourth Ward. A stranger happening into the Hole-In-The-Wall, operated by One-Armed Charley Monell, could be mugged while standing at the bar. If he survived, he was tossed out into the street; if he was wise, he dusted himself off and left without further protest. When such an assault proved fatal, the mugger was expected to bring a cart to the side door after dark and carry the corpse away.

The dive was famous for its two women bouncers, Gallus Mag and Kate Flannery. Gallus Mag would have been enough on her own. A 6-foot Englishwoman of indeterminate age, she earned her nickname because she wore galluses, or suspenders, to hold her skirt up. She always carried a pistol in her belt and a bludgeon strapped to her wrist. While she was expert with either weapon, Gallus Mag's routine method for maintaining order in the dive was to beat a troublesome customer to the floor, grab his ear with her teeth and drag him to the door. If the man still resisted, Gallus Mag would bite his ear off. She kept these trophies in a jar of alcohol behind the bar.

It was at the Hole-In-The-Wall that one of the underworld's most infamous duels was fought in 1855 by Slobbery Jim and Patsy the Barber, two vicious members of the violent Daybreak Boys. The pair had mugged a portly immigrant by the seawall at the Battery, knocking him unconscious and relieving him of all his wealth, 12¢. Then Slobbery Jim lifted the unconscious victim over the wall and deposited him in the harbor, where he drowned. The two killers adjourned to the Hole-In-The-Wall to divide their loot, such as it was. Since he had done the heavy labor of lifting the victim over the wall, Jim insisted he should get 8¢. Certainly, he would not settle for less than 7¢. Patsy the Barber was furious, pointing out that he had done the original clubbing of the victim and was thus entitled to an equal share.

The dispute turned violent when Slobbery Jim bit down and chewed on Patsy the Barber's nose. Patsy promptly drew a knife and stuck it in Jim's ribs. The blow had no effect on Jim, however, and the pair wrestled on the floor. The fight went on, incredibly, for some 30 minutes without interference from Monell or Gallus Mag or anyone else, since this, after all, was no drunken brawl but a professional dispute. The battle finally ended in Slobbery Jim's favor when he got hold of the knife and slashed his opponent's throat. As the blood gushed from the wound, Jim proceeded to kick the Barber to death. It was the last seen of Slobbery Jim, who fled the city and was not heard of again until the Civil War, when some New York soldiers insisted they'd seen him in the uniform of a Confederate Army captain.

The Hole-In-The-Wall was too deadly a place even for the Fourth Ward and it was finally shut down by the police in 1871 after the occurrence of seven murders in two months; no one knew how many other unreported slayings had happened there.

Holliday, John Henry "Doc" (1852–1887) gunfighter and dentist

Suffering from tuberculosis, John Henry "Doc" Holliday, an Atlanta, Ga. dentist, came west in 1873 seeking to extend his life span after being given no more than a year or two to live. He practiced dentistry now and then when he could be coaxed out of a saloon but spent most of his time gambling, usually as a house gambler, and gunning men down. Of the so-called Dodge City Gang, Doc Holliday was one of the few genuine killers, unlike Wyatt Earp, who exaggerated his kill record, and Bat Masterson, who only killed once. Doc killed often and cruelly. During the infamous gunfight at the O.K. Corral, in which he stood with the Earps, Holliday pulled a shotgun out from under his long coat and blasted Tom McLowery, who stood by his horse unarmed except for a rifle in his saddle scabbard.

Friends of the Earps never approved of their association with Holliday, whom they considered a pathological killer, but the Earps appreciated a man who was always there when they needed him. Holliday first met Wyatt Earp during the latter's days as a lawman in Dodge City, and Earp credited Doc with saving his life once when he was surrounded by a bunch of gunslinging Texas cowboys. From then on, the friendship was never to be broken. In 1879 Holliday left Dodge at about the same time as Earp departed. He ran a saloon for a time in Las Vegas, New Mexico Territory by the rule of the gun. When a love-struck former army scout named Mike Gordon tried to lure one of the saloon's prostitutes away to a better life, Holliday shot him dead.

When Wyatt Earp located in Tombstone, Doc Holliday drifted in and took a job as a gambler-bouncer at the Oriental Saloon, a lavish gambling joint in which Earp had an interest. Holliday rode out of town a lot—coincidentally while he was out riding, stagecoaches seemed to get robbed quite frequently. In March 1881 the Kinnear and Co. stage was held up near Conception. Holliday was suspected of having pulled the job, and the Earps were suspected of having planned it. The charge may have been false and spread by the Earp-hating Clanton gang, but it was indicative of Holliday's low esteem among the public.

In Griffin, Tex., Holliday got into an argument over cards with a man named Edward Bailey and killed him with a bowie knife. Doc was arrested by the town marshal. The town of Griffin having no jail available, he was locked up in a hotel room. By early evening the locals were getting liquored up and talking about a lynching. Big Nose Kate Elder, a prostitute and long-time girlfriend of Holliday, heard the rumblings and distracted the forming mob by setting fire to a shack.

While the crowd was busy with the fire, Kate helped her lover escape.

Kate's devotion to Holliday rose and fell depending on how much he beat her. At the time of the Kinnear stagecoach robbery, Doc had been particularly unkind to her, so she signed a statement that he had pulled the job and committed the murders involved. After the Earps got her away from their enemy, Sheriff John Behan, and put her in a cell in Tombstone to sober up, she retracted her statement and said her fancy man was innocent. Later, Holliday reputedly married her, a fortuitous arrangement since a wife could not testify against her husband.

After the O.K. Corral battle, Virgil Earp was injured and Morgan Earp killed by Clanton men. Holliday rode with Wyatt Earp to gun down the suspected assassins. In the Hollywood version of what followed, one Clanton supporter is depicted sneaking up on Earp in the train yard at Tucson to shoot him in the back. In truth, Earp, Holliday and three other horsemen ran the Clanton supporter down in the Southern Pacific yards and pumped 30 bullets into him. Two days later, Holliday helped corner another Clanton follower, Florentino Cruz, and executed him with 10 or 12 shots.

Over the next few years Holliday drifted around the West gambling and gunfighting, but it was apparent he was losing his big battle in life. He entered a sanatorium at Glenwood Springs, Colo. in the spring of 1887 and lasted another six months. Just before he died, on November 8, 1887, he downed a large glass of whiskey, looked at his bootless feet and said, "I'll be damned!" He had fully expected—and perhaps hoped—to die with his boots on. He was 35.

Alexander Holmes was a robust, handsome Finnish seaman who became involved in one of the greatest legal decisions in American history.

Holmes' ship, William Brown, hit an iceberg in April 1841 on its voyage from Liverpool to Philadelphia. In the rush for the two lifeboats, far fewer than could accommodate all those on board, the captain and eight seamen took refuge in one, a jolly boat, while First Mate Francis Rhodes, Holmes and seven other sailors crammed 32 passengers and themselves into the other, a longboat designed to carry 20 persons. The survivors then watched the William Brown go under, as they listened to the pitiful cries from the four men, eight women and 19 children stranded on board.

The two boats drifted together for a while until Capt. George L. Harris cut the jolly loose, saying he was going to try to make Newfoundland. He ignored pleas from Rhodes to take a few more from the longboat aboard the jolly. Instead he told Rhodes he was in charge and to do whatever he had to do but "only as a last resort."

At dusk it started to rain and the seas began to rise. Finally, giant waves battered the longboat. All aboard bailed water, which rose steadily to within 4 or 5 inches of the gunwales. It was soon evident that another giant wave would capsize the boat. Rhodes, who seemed about to collapse, said to Holmes, "We must go to work." Holmes looked away. Another wave slapped at the boat. "Men, fall to work or we will all perish," Rhodes screamed hysterically. This time Holmes motioned to another seaman and together they seized a passenger, Owen Riley, and heaved him overboard. Then a second man went. A third asked to be allowed to pray first and then let himself be thrown over the side. Several women clawed their way to the far end of the boat to get further away from Holmes. Even though the craft had been lightened by some 500 pounds, it still sat perilously low in the water. A man named Frank Askins was heaved overboard, and immediately, his two screaming sisters followed him. Later, there would be a dispute about whether Holmes had ordered them cast overboard or whether they had hysterically jumped after their brother. In the next 10 minutes, eight more men were jettisoned.

By morning the longboat was riding easier, now weighing a full ton less. Then crewmen found two more male passengers hiding under women's skirts. Holmes ordered them forward to bail. After a while, the sea grew rough again and the danger of sinking returned. Without a word, Holmes and three sailors seized the two men and cast them over the side. "How cruel, how cruel!" a voice moaned. It was Rhodes. He was no longer capable of clear thought after nine hours of killing. It was obvious that Seaman Holmes was in charge of the craft. Some sailors wanted to throw some of the women over, but Rhodes stopped them, saying, "No, we will go before the women."

A little after 9 o'clock, the sun appeared in brightening skies, and Holmes said to the passengers, who still eyed him warily: "Be of good cheer. There will be no more killing. We will all live or perish together." An hour later, they were picked up by a passing schooner bound for Le Havre. After reaching Le Havre, the survivors were put on another vessel and sent to New York. When they got there, they discovered that Capt. Harris and the jolly boat had made it safely and the news of their survival and the ordeal had preceded them. Public debate was raging over whether or not the frightful events aboard the longboat had been justified.

Newspapers throughout the country demanded murder trials be held. The New York Courier wrote, "Every soul aboard that boat had the same right to such protection as she afforded as the mate and the seamen and until a fair and equal chance was given by lot for a decision as to who should be sacrificed, no man could throw his fellow man overboard without committing murder." And the Philadelphia Public Ledger declared, "No human being is authorized to kill another in self-preservation unless against an attempt of that other to kill."

U.S. attorney William Meredith brought murder indictments against Rhodes and Holmes in Philadelphia. Capt. Harris was allowed to leave and immediately shipped out. Rhodes disappeared and was believed to have left with Capt. Harris. Only Holmes surrendered to face trial. The prosecution, aided by the testimony of three women, hammered away at the point that no seaman had died and no lots had been drawn. However, most of the survivors testified in Holmes' behalf. The defense was headed by David Paul Brown, the Clarence Darrow of his day, who was hired to represent Holmes by the Female Seamen's Friend Society. Brown hit hard at the prosecution charges:

Whoever heard of casting lots at midnight in a sinking boat, in the midst of darkness, of rain, of terror, and of confusion. This case, in order to embrace all its horrible relations, ought to be decided in a longboat, hundreds of leagues from shore, loaded to the very gunwales with 41 half-naked victims, with provision only sufficient to prolong the agonies of famine and of thirst, with all the elements combined against her, leaking from below, filling also from above, surrounded by ice, unmanageable from her condition and subject to destruction from the least change of wind and the waves—most variable and most terrible of all elements. Decided at such a tribunal, nature would at once pronounce a verdict not only of acquittal but of commendation.

Following an eight-day trial, the case went to the jury. After 16 hours the jury advised the court it couldn't agree and was sent back for more deliberations. Ten hours later, the jury returned a verdict of guilty, with a recommendation of mercy. By this time, public opinion had shifted entirely in Holmes' favor. Before he was sentenced, even the Philadelphia Public Ledger—the very newspaper that had once said, "An act of greater atrocity could scarcely be conceived of"—now warned that an effort would "be made to have him pardoned by the President if anything more than a nominal sentence be passed upon him."

Holmes got six months and was fined $20, and even this light sentence brought many protests. He served his time and then disappeared back to sea. His six-month punishment established the precedent that a sailor "is bound to set a greater value on the life of others than on his own."

Holmes, H. H. (1858–1896) mass murderer

His real name was Herman Webster Mudgett, but he became infamous as H. H. Holmes—probably the greatest mass killer in American history. At various times, he admitted killing anywhere from 20 to 27 persons, being a master of inconsistency, and undoubtedly he murdered many more. Some wild-eyed biographers credit him with killing 200 women in his "murder castle" in Chicago during the 1890s, while a more reasonable count would fall somewhere between 40 and 100.

If there was any question about his arithmetic, there was none about his dedication. Holmes killed with a bizarre fervor to make the last possible cent out of his victims, mostly marriage-starved women whom he murdered for their money. He kept a keen eye out for newspaper ads requesting skeletons, and when he found such an ad, he would scrape his latest victim's bones clean and sell the skeleton to an interested medical student or institution.

As a medical school student, Herman Mudgett had always shown the greatest interest in bodies, more so in those of women than those of men. However, he lost interest in his studies of female anatomy and in time, despite a marriage before he was 20 and a second bigamous one before he was 30, became adept at such additional careers as horse thieving, forging and swindling. He finally went into murder in a big way. With the proceeds from his various crimes, he built a massive "hotel" in 1892 at Sixty-third and Wallace, in anticipation of the Columbian Exposition the following year.

The first floor consisted of stores and the second and third floors of about 100 rooms. Holmes used several as his office and his living quarters. The remaining rooms were for guests, many of whom were never seen alive again. A newspaper subsequently described one of the rooms as an "asphyxiation chamber" with "no light—with gas connections." The room had no windows; the door was equipped with stout bolts; and the walls were padded with asbestos. All Holmes had to do was get a victim in the room and turn on the gas. Most of the rooms featured these gas connections and certain ones had false-bottom floors, which covered small airless chambers. Some of the rooms were lined with iron plates and some had blowtorchlike appliances. Various rooms had chutes that carried human cargo to the basement. Here, Holmes maintained a crematory, complete with vats of corrosive acid and quicklime pits. The pits later yielded up bone and skull fragments of many women he had held prisoner and killed. All the “prison” rooms had an alarm that buzzed in Holmes’ quarters if a victim attempted to break out. The evidence indicated that he kept many of the women prisoners for months before he decided to dispose of them.

Holmes obtained most of his victims through ads offering good jobs in a big city or through offers of marriage. If the offer was for a job, he would describe several in detail, and a young woman on her first visit would select the one she wanted. Holmes then sent her home to pack her things and withdraw all her money from the bank since she would need the money to get set up. He would require that the woman not reveal his name to anyone and he would not tell her where the job was until she returned with her money, claiming he had business competitors who were trying to steal his clients. When the woman returned and Holmes was satisfied she had revealed nothing about him, he would take her prisoner. If he was not satisfied, he would say the job had been canceled and send her away. Those whom he offered to marry got the same sort of line. If they came back with less than all their worldly goods, Holmes would use various types of torture apparatuses to make them reveal the whereabouts of their remaining valuables. He then would imprison the women while he went to get their property.

Amazingly, Holmes was able to keep his wholesale murder operation secret for four years. His trouble started when he got involved in an insurance swindle with a shady character named Benjamin F. Pitzel. To pull it off, they both traveled around the country, and in the process Holmes was arrested in St. Louis. He revealed part of the insurance scam to a cell mate, a notorious bank robber named Marion Hedgепeth. Holmes offered Hedgепeth money to put him in touch with a good lawyer. Hedgепeth obliged and Holmes got out, promptly forgetting to pay Hedgепeth. He went to Philadelphia and met up with Pitzel. The two had a falling out, and Holmes killed his partner in crime. About this time, Hedgепeth decided his former cell mate had stiffed him and told the authorities what he knew. Holmes was captured and the Pitzel murder discovered. When Chicago police searched his “hotel,” the results were awesome.

Before he was hanged in Philadelphia on May 7, 1896, for the Pitzel murder, since that city refused to surrender him to Chicago for his more gruesome deeds, Holmes made a number of confessions concerning the women he had killed. He accepted an offer of $5,000 from a Chicago newspaper for his story and then perversely concocted a death list that included several women who were still alive and omitted others who had been identified among his victims.

Honeymoon Gang 19th-century New York gang

One of the most brutal New York gangs in the mid-1800s was the Honeymoon Gang, whose members were considered so beyond the pale that they were denied protection by the politicians who took care of most other organized gangsters because of their value as electoral enforcers.

By 1853 the Honeymooners had so terrorized the East Side’s 18th Ward that it became literally unsafe to walk there. Every evening the gang would place their men at each corner of Madison Avenue and 29th Street and attack every well-dressed citizen who came along. At midnight the Honeymooners’ “basher patrol” would adjourn to a drinking establishment to spend a portion of the night’s ill-gotten gains.

The Honeymooners were not molested by police until George W. Walling was appointed captain of the district in late 1853. Organizing the city’s first Strong Arm Squad, he picked out his six burliest men, put them in plain clothes and sent them into the Honeymooners’ turf armed with locust clubs. The beefy officers simply walked right up to the gangsters and battered them senseless before they could bring their own bludgeons and brass knuckles into play. A few nights of this treatment convinced the Honeymooners to evacuate their ambush posts. But this did not satisfy Walling, who then provided every policeman on his roster with the identifications of all the Honeymooners. Whenever one was sighted, he was attacked and beaten mercilessly. Within two weeks the Honeymoon Gang vanished, its members scattering to other wards where police tactics were not so rough.

Hoodlum is as American as apple pie. The word refers to a member of any gang of thugs. The explanations for its origin are varied and many, but there is no doubt that the term was first applied to the San Francisco underworld in the late 1860s. One theory holds that the term was initially used to describe several vicious brothers whose name was Hoodler and that the name was corrupted into “hoodlum” with the passage of time. Another explanation is that it arose from the street thugs’ practice of turning up the collar and lapels of their jackets to act, as much as possible, as a hood while they stalked and molested their victims.

The Los Angeles Express of August 25, 1877, seemed to offer the most plausible theory:

A gang of bad boys from fourteen to nineteen years of age were associated for the purpose of stealing. These boys had a rendezvous, and when danger threatened them their words of warning were 'Huddle 'em! Huddle 'em!' An article headed 'Huddle 'Em' describing the gang and their plans of operation, was published in the San Francisco Times. The name applied to them was soon contracted to hoodlum.

The Hook Gang was composed of thugs who worked the East River area around the Corlears' Hook section of New York from the late 1860s to the late 1870s.

Known as the daffiest of all river pirates, the Hookers were captained by Terry Le Strange, James Coffee, Tommy Shay and Suds Merrick. Neither the gang nor its individual members thought any job was too big for them. Coffee and Shay once rowed up to the boat of an eight-man rowing club and, with guns leveled, ordered them to head for the Brooklyn shore. When they got within 50 yards of shore, they forced the rowers to jump and swim for it and headed back to Manhattan with their prize boat. Long before the rowers got back to sound the alarm, the pair had transported the out-sized craft to the Hudson docks and sold it to the skipper of a canal boat.

Another gang member, the redoubtable Slipsey Ward, finally overstepped himself when he mounted the deck of a schooner at Pike Street and attempted single-handedly to overpower the crew of six. He had downed three before he was stopped; he ended up with a long sentence at Auburn Prison for this crime. On more than one occasion, the Hookers would pull a number of wagons up to a likely boat in dock and, after simply cordoning off the street, loot it at their leisure. Once, an officer a few blocks away saw their barricades and, thinking there was some authorized work going on, helpfully diverted traffic onto a side street.

In a manner of speaking, the Hookers had no one to blame but themselves for their eventual demise. It all started when one of their number, Nigger Wallace, tried to rob three men in a rowboat. They turned out to be three detectives taking the sun on their day off, and Wallace ended up dunked and towed off to jail. This started the police thinking that if they had some decoy craft on the river, they could catch the pirates in their act. Thus, in 1876 the Steamboat Squad was organized. By the end of the decade, the police had cleared the Corlears' Hook area. Many of the Hookers were imprisoned, others scattered and the rest shifted their activities to safer, onshore thefts and burglaries.

Hoover, Herbert Clark (1874–1964) Al Capone's nemesis

"That bastard," Al Capone was to repeat many times after his conviction on income tax charges. "That bastard got me." He was referring to President Herbert Hoover; underworld opinion held that Capone had been railroaded because of the personal vindictiveness of a bitter president of the United States. According to mob legend, Hoover had come to hate Capone for either of two reasons or both. One was that shortly after his victory over Al Smith in the 1928 election, Hoover had visited the J. C. Penney estate on Belle Isle in Florida, not far from the Capone retreat on Palm Island. As the story went, there was so much shouting, females screaming and shooting during the night from the Capone compound that Hoover could not fall asleep, and he vowed to crush the mobster once he took office. According to the second story, Hoover watched in chagrin as a crowd of newsmen in a Miami hotel lobby deserted the president-elect for what they regarded as a more important interviewee, Capone.

In fact, both stories are apocryphal, but it is true that Hoover had determined to bring down Capone, whom he regarded as a blot on the national honor. The method used was suggested to Hoover by Col. Frank Knox, publisher of the Chicago Daily News, who came to him in despair over the unwillingness or inability of local and state authorities to jail Capone. He suggested to Hoover that the best way to catch the mobster was to charge him with two federal offenses: bootlegging and income tax evasion.

Thereafter, Hoover hounded the Treasury Department to eliminate Capone. Andrew Mellon, who was secretary of the treasury at the time, later recalled the activities of Hoover's so-called Medicine Cabinet, a small group of high officials the president invited to the White House each morning to toss around a medicine ball. "Every morning when the exercising started, Mr. Hoover would bring up the subject," Mellon said. "He'd ask me, 'Have you got that fellow Al Capone yet?' And at the end of the session, he'd tell me, 'Remember now, I want that Capone in jail.'"

In another era, or in another economic climate, Herbert Hoover might well have won the reelection just for successfully putting Capone behind bars. But not in the early 1930s. The public clearly agreed with a minor Capone follower quoted by the press as saying, "President Hoover should be worrying more about putting people to work than sending a simple bootlegger to prison."

Hoover, J. Edgar (1895–1972) FBI director

For better or worse, the history of the Federal Bureau of Investigation can be told in the life of its longtime director, J. Edgar Hoover. Hoover more than typified the agency, he was in a very real sense the FBI. The agency's successes were attributable to him, just as its excesses and abuses often resulted from his personal failings. Despite scandals that were revealed after Hoover's death, such as the agency's deliberate attempts to destroy individuals not accused of crimes by leaking damaging information—sometimes true, often false—about them, the FBI is recognized as one of the most brilliant and efficient investigative forces in any country.

It was not always that way, especially when Hoover joined the U.S. Department of Justice in 1917 as a young attorney. The agency, then known as the Bureau of Investigation, was a disorganized body of about 200 poorly supervised agents, some political hacks, others outright crooks. The agency was virtually worthless in any battle against crime and proved totally incapable of preventing sabotage during World War I. The great sabotage and espionage ring organized by German ambassador Johann von Bernstorff had almost a free hand to operate in this country. Defense plants were wrecked and wheat fields in the West set afire. The great "Black Tom" explosion in New York Harbor destroyed the nation's biggest arsenal, producing a tremendous roar heard more than 100 miles away.

Hoover rose rapidly in the ranks and became special assistant to Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer.

Despite his later denials, Hoover played a vital role in the Palmer Raids inspired by the postwar Red Scare. He planned and executed mass raids against aliens, built up a card file on 450,000 radicals and organized his first informer network, a technique Hoover developed to the level of a science, far better than any other American law official.

By 1924 the Bureau of Investigation was mired in scandal, much like the late Harding administration. Hoover was named to head the agency and cleanse it. To his credit, he did so with ruthless efficiency, forcing out scores of incompetents and cheats and establishing professional standards for agents, such as the requirement that new recruits have training as either lawyers or accountants. During the 1930s Hoover toughened the FBI into a highly mobile crime-busting organization. He laid heavy emphasis on scientific detection methods and established the FBI Laboratory. The FBI National Academy was formed to train local police officers in the newest law enforcement techniques.

In 1933 Hoover launched a highly publicized war on the so-called public enemies—Dillinger, the Barkers, Alvin Karpis, Pretty Boy Floyd, Baby Face Nelson, Machine Gun Kelly and others of their ilk, all 20th-century versions of the desperadoes of the Old West. They were relatively easy targets, certainly compared to the Mafia and the emerging national crime syndicate formed by the great ex-bootlegging gangs of the Prohibition era. Since he was a Republican holdover in a Democratic administration, Hoover needed some sort of spectacular display. Speaking of the campaign years later, a high ex-FBI official, William C. Sullivan, said, "The whole of the FBI's main thrust was not investigation but public relations and propaganda to glorify its director."

Hoover needed all the public relations he could get in the 1930s. When John Dillinger was killed, a conservative Virginia newspaper editor assailed the FBI's work on the case. "Any brave man," he editorialized, "would have walked down the aisle and arrested Dillinger . . . why were there so many cowards afraid of this one man? The answer is that the federal agents are mostly cowards."

Later it was revealed that the Secret Service was secretly investigating the conduct of FBI agents in the Dillinger case and the case of another gang member, Eddie Green, who had been described as shot while attempting an armed escape from FBI custody. Green was found to be unarmed, however. Clearly, the Secret Service was trying to show that the G-men were trigger-happy amateurs at best. In 1936 Hoover himself came under rigorous attack in Congress. Sen. Kenneth D. McKellar of Tennessee grilled him at an appropriations hearing about his background and experience, bringing out the fact that Hoover had never personally handled an investigation or made an arrest.

Hoover reacted to this attack on his courage and competence the following month by personally arresting public enemy Alvin “Creepy” Karpis in New Orleans. Karpis was later to insist that Hoover had hidden out of sight until after other agents had seized him in a car and called to Hoover that it was safe to approach. On the other hand, Don Whitehead in The FBI Story credited Hoover as having “reached into the car and grabbed Karpis before he could reach for a rifle on the back seat.” There is some question about this accomplishment, since the car had no back seat. The arrest proved to be a bit of a fiasco when none of the dozens of agents present could carry out Hoover’s orders to “put the handcuffs on him.” None of them had thought to bring along handcuffs.

In 1939 Hoover’s FBI was handed the responsibility of guarding the nation against sabotage and subversion. It was these wartime duties, carried out with efficiency, that did the most to upgrade Hoover’s image to one of unquestioned authority and wisdom. By 1943 Sen. McKellar was calling him a “grand man.”

In the post-1945 cold war years, Hoover rediscovered the Red Menace that had launched his career. The FBI’s war on the Communist Party reached the stage of the ridiculous when agency informers in the organization probably outnumbered bona fide members. As the party dropped in size and influence, Hoover assured conservatives this merely indicated that the members were going underground and that more concentrated efforts—and larger budgets—were needed to combat the remaining threat. Hoover long ago had discovered that while conservatives might bewail the crime menace, their hold on the purse strings did not loosen much to combat such danger. However, given a good Red Scare, the money simply gushed forth.

In all, Hoover served under eight presidents, none of whom dared take the political consequences of attempting to oust him. Few attorneys general, technically his superiors, countered his views, especially in the 1940s and 1950s. The first to give Hoover genuine orders was Robert Kennedy in 1961, when he insisted the FBI concentrate on battling organized crime, truly an affront to its director, who for years had denied the existence of organized crime and the Mafia. Critics of Hoover said he took this tack because fighting the syndicate was not an easy matter, certainly more difficult than battling the great threat to the Republic posed by car thieves, probably 90 percent of whom were joyriding teenagers.

In the early 1960s it was clear that President John Kennedy wished to replace Hoover, who had reached retirement age, but having been elected by a thin majority, he felt incapable of withstanding the political repercussions. Undoubtedly, though, Kennedy planned to oust him if reelected to a second term. After Kennedy’s assassination Lyndon Johnson is said to have exploited his power to force Hoover to step down by demanding the director perform illegal political investigations for him. According to ex-FBI official Sullivan, “There was absolutely nothing Johnson wouldn’t ask of the FBI, and Hoover hotfooted it to Johnson’s demands.”

By the time he reached his late sixties, Hoover had turned crotchety and vindictive, launching secret operations against real and perceived personal enemies, including a particularly vicious campaign to discredit Martin Luther King based on sexual misbehavior. A lifelong bachelor, Hoover was never tainted by any innuendos of sexual improprieties.

Perhaps the best example of the tenor within the FBI in this period occurred during a top-level FBI meeting in 1968 presided over by Clyde Tolson, the number two man in the agency and Hoover’s alter ego. When Robert Kennedy’s name came up, Tolson declared, “I hope someone shoots and kills the son of a bitch.” Shortly thereafter, someone did.

By 1970 President Richard Nixon had resolved to get rid of Hoover. The president invited him to the Oval Office to inform him that his tenure was at an end. Sullivan, who obviously was Nixon’s man within the FBI, wrote in his book The Bureau—My Thirty Years in Hoover’s FBI that Hoover “started talking non-stop. It was his usual line of conversation, starring Dillinger, Ma Barker and a cast of thousands, and he kept talking until the President ended the interview.

“Assistant Attorney General Robert Mardian called me later and said: ‘Christ almighty, Nixon lost his guts. He had Hoover there in his office, he knew what he was supposed to tell him, but he got cold feet. He couldn’t go through with it.’”

Later, when Hoover forced Sullivan out of the FBI, Nixon, Mardian, John Mitchell, John Ehrlichman and Bob Haldeman determined that Hoover would go after Nixon’s reelection. Hoover died, however, in May 1972, six months before the election. Had he lived, he undoubtedly would have survived this new threat to his reign, as his would-be purgers became immersed in the Watergate scandal, from which none would survive politically. They would have needed Hoover more than he would have needed them.

After Hoover’s death and especially after the disclosure of his latter-day excesses, such as the notorious COINTELPRO program aimed at punishing Hoover targets who were neither convicted nor even suspected of illegal activities, some of his critics demanded Hoover's name be taken off the new FBI headquarters building. It was a senseless exercise. To separate Hoover from the FBI in such fashion would be a silly attempt to rewrite history. The FBI itself, not the building, was Hoover's monument. The agency in 1972 was and, indeed, still is—"warts and all"—the embodiment of J. Edgar Hoover.

Hope, Jimmy (1840–?) police fixer and bank burglar

One of the most important underworld figures of the 19th century, Jimmy Hope was a crooked ex-cop in New York who handled "the fix" for the Shang Draper–George Leonidas Leslie mob of bank burglars.

Maintaining a fifth column of crooked officers within the New York Police Department, Hope could get the law to do anything he wanted, an ability he demonstrated stunningly in the great $2,747,000 looting of the Manhattan Savings Institution in 1878. In preparation for that job, he paid off many of the officers in the Detective Bureau just as he had in the past. Ordered to ensure the bank watchman would not interfere, Hope determined that the man could not be bribed. He solved the dilemma by having him hired away to a better-paying job on the recommendation of several police officers. When Manhattan Savings officials asked the police department to suggest a replacement, Hope saw to it that a 60-year-old Irishman named Patty Shevlin got the job. Shevlin was perfect. Whenever safecracker George Leonidas Leslie wanted to study the layout of the bank or the safe, Shevlin was told to take a nap in the basement and stay there until morning.

Hope also arranged that on the day of the burglary, Sunday morning, October 27, the policeman on the beat, John Nugent, would remain at a suitable distance away from the bank, yet close enough to guard the retreat of the burglars and, if necessary, to delay or mislead pursuit. As it was, the mob had so much loot packed in their small satchels that Nugent had to be summoned to carry one of them.

It took almost a year for the police to make arrests in this case. Two of the gang, Abe Coakley and Banjo Pete Emerson, were acquitted, but Bill Kelly and, ironically, Jimmy Hope were convicted. Patrolman Nugent was said to have won his freedom by bribing a juror, but within a few months he was convicted and sent to prison for highway robbery. Kelly and Hope got long prison terms. When the ex-fixer was set free near the turn of the century, he quickly disappeared.

In recent years there have been efforts by some writers and even by Hollywood—in a 1980 movie—to "rehabilitate" Tom Horn, probably the most callous hired gun and bushwacker the Old West ever saw. Much is made of Horn's early years and his heroism as an army scout under the celebrated Al Sieber and as a lawman and cowboy. Some of the more unquestioning also applaud his four years as a Pinkerton, although during that period he can only be described as a roving gun for the agency, with a toll of victims reputedly amounting to 17. Horn quit the Pinkertons, announcing he "had no more stomach for it." Agency apologists said that indicated he found the job too boring; others thought it meant Horn felt he was underpaid for the work. Immediately thereafter, he offered his lethal services to Wyoming cattlemen. There was no one Tom Horn wouldn't kill for $500. "Killing men is my specialty," he once remarked. "I look at it as a business proposition and I think I have a corner on the market."

Born in Missouri in 1860, he left home at about age 13, after an altercation with his father, and headed west. A tough, headstrong youth, he is believed to have had a row with Billy the Kid and slapped his face. No one was ever to accuse Horn of lacking guts. At 15 he was a stagecoach driver and from 1875 to 1886 he worked off and on for Al Sieber, chief army scout at the San Carlos Indian Reservation. It was Horn who arranged the final surrender of Geronimo to Gen. Nelson Miles in 1886. After that, he became a deputy sheriff in the Arizona Territory.

By the time he went to work for the Pinkertons, he had quite a reputation, one that only worsened while he served in the agency. He ached with the desire for big money, but his only real talent was his skill with guns. The law paid peanuts, the Pinks somewhat more. The real money lay in working directly for the big cattlemen, settling old scores for them and eliminating small ranchers and rustlers (in Cheyenne's cattle baron circles the two terms were used interchangeably). Members of the Wyoming Cattlemen's Association bid high for Horn's services and Horn gloried in their attentions. He smoked their cigars, drank their liquor, backslapped with them and murdered for them.

Horn was a tidy butcher and regarded his assassinations as works of art. Testimony at his later trial would reveal how even in a driving rain, he waited for hours chewing on cuds of raw bacon, to get the one sure shot at a victim. After the kill he always left behind his trademark, a small rock under the victim's head, so that there could be no argument over who had carried out the assignment.

Horn once even offered his deadly services to Gov. W. A. Richards of Wyoming. The governor, who owned a large ranch in the Big Horn country, was fearful of having the gunman seen at his office in the state capital, so he used the premises of the state Board of Livestock Commissioners. Another big stockman, William Irvine, who took part in the meeting, later recollected:

The Governor was quite nervous, so was I, Horn perfectly cool; told the Governor he would either drive every rustler out of the Big Horn County, or take no pay other than $350 advanced to buy two horses and a pack outfit; that when he had finished the job to the Governor's satisfaction he should receive $5,000 because, he said in conclusion, "Whenever everything else fails, I have a system which never does." He placed no limit on the number of men to be gotten rid of.

Irvine said the governor clearly got cold feet when Horn matter-of-factly made his murder proposition. The killer saw this immediately and tactfully ended the discussion by saying: "I presume that is about all you wanted to know, Sir. I shall be glad to hear from you at any time I can be of service."

Horn's murder dealing became so well known that rustlers and other desperadoes often cleared out of an area when he appeared on the scene. But the small rancher, his entire life tied up in his meager holdings, could not. And if a big cattleman said a small rancher was rustling his cattle, that was good enough for Horn.

Because of his powerful connections, Horn was considered immune from the law. But in 1901 he murdered a 14-year-old boy, Willie Nickell, from ambush. Hired to shoot the boy's sheepman father, Horn mistook the youth for the father in the early dawn light. The case remained unsolved until Joe Lefors, a deputy U.S. marshal who led the famous posse that chased Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid, took over the investigation. He wormed his way into Horn's confidence, and when the latter was drinking heavily, he got him to boast of his killings, including the Nickell affair, while hidden witnesses and a stenographer listened.

Horn was thrown in jail. When he sobered up, he insisted he had merely been telling tall tales and accused the stenographer of adding statements he had not made. Horn had brilliant legal talent defending him at his trial, with some $5,000 donated to his defense fund by an unknown "admirer." However, the case against him was overwhelming and he was sentenced to hang.

While he awaited execution, people wondered if Horn would start naming all his powerful employers, and it appears that employers wondered too. In August 1903 someone smuggled a pistol to him, and he escaped with another prisoner. He was quickly recaptured, however, and spent much of the rest of his time hurriedly penning his memoirs, leaving out, of course, all references to his murderous "range detecting." With the streets of Cheyenne patrolled by militiamen, Tom Horn was hanged on November 20, 1903, his lips still sealed.

A Wyoming cattleman was to recall, "He died without 'squealing,' to the great relief of many very respectable citizens of the West."

In recent years some effort has been made to discredit the Lefors testimony. Dean Krakel, Horn's chief biographer and author of The Saga of Tom Horn, insists the Horn confession was a frame-up and would be inadmissible in modern courts and that Horn was innocent of the Nickell shooting.

Horrell-Higgins feud

One of Texas' bloodiest feuds, the Horrell-Higgins conflict broke out in central Texas in 1873 over charges of cattle rustling around the frontier town of Lampasas, northwest of Austin. Suspicion centered on the men of the Horrell spread. When the sheriff attempted to arrest one of the Horrell men, he was promptly killed. A squad of state officers were dispatched to Lampasas to take care of the Horrells, once again with fatal consequences for the law officers. A group of Horrells were found in the Gem Saloon and ordered to give up their guns and surrender. Shooting broke out immediately. When the gunsmoke cleared, four officers lay dead or dying. Only Mart Horrell, who was wounded, was arrested. However, when he was placed in the jail at Georgetown, his friends and brothers broke in and freed him. The Horrells then moved their herds into New Mexico to avoid further problems with the Texas authorities.

Finding themselves ensnared in similar rustling disputes in New Mexico, the Horrells returned to Texas, where two of them were tried and acquitted in the killing of the four law officers. Meanwhile, new suspicions about the Horrells rustling cattle were voiced, especially by the Higgins clan, which had lost a considerable amount of stock. Pink Higgins led his family in a war against the Horrells. Higgins, a fiery gunfighter, threatened to wipe out every Horrell. In January 1877 Pink killed Merritt Horrell at the Gem.

With all sorts of legal charges against both clans, someone broke into the courthouse one night in July 1877 and removed the records of all pending criminal cases. The families then prepared to settle the matter between themselves. Later that same month the two factions fought a bitter gun battle for several hours in the streets of Lampasas. At least one innocent bystander was among those killed.

Finally, in July the Texas Rangers moved into the area in force. A detachment under Sgt. N. O. Reynolds entered the Horrell ranch house before dawn and captured the family and its supporters without a fight. Other Rangers simultaneously captured the Higgins clan. Realizing that a few prison sentences would hardly end the shooting, the Rangers had long discussions with each group. Eventually, members of both families signed a formal peace treaty. Such agreements had been tried in other feuds without success, but in this case all the participants faithfully observed the treaty and the Horrell-Higgins feud ended.

Common during the early decades of this century in New York, horse poisoning was one of the most detested of all crimes, viewed with horror by the public, the police and even much of the underworld. The horse was the lifeline of many businesses, such as the produce, ice cream, beer and seltzer trades. Businessmen faced with stiff competition would often hire gangsters to destroy the competition's trade. The simplest way to do this was to poison a rival's horses, thus destroying his distribution system. It was a common sight on the Lower East Side to see a produce seller with two dead horses desperately trying to sell his stock at half price to clamoring housewives before it was all ruined.

By 1913 three gangs of horse poisoners under the leaderships of Yoske Nigger, whose real name was Joseph Toplinsky, Charley the Cripple, whose real name was Charles Vitoffsky, and Johnny Levinsky dominated the field. They would steal or poison horses to order. Unlike their clients, these three did not engage in cutthroat competition among themselves. Instead they divided the field into separate monopolies, with Yoske Nigger handling the produce markets, truckmen and livery stables; Charley the Cripple the seltzer and soda water dealers and manufacturers; and Levinsky the ice cream trade. Whenever an order came in from some area not covered by this jurisdictional agreement, the three handled the matter jointly.

A defecting member of one of the gangs finally revealed to the police the trio's scale of fees:

Shooting, fatal	$500
Shooting, not fatal	$100
Poisoning a team	$50
Poisoning one horse	$35
Stealing a horse and rig	$25

The first two items, of course, referred to human victims and were much higher than the rates a client could find elsewhere. Since many gangsters at the time hired out to do a murder for as little as $10 to $20, it was not surprising that most of the trio's business was limited to horses. Yet the horse poisoners were hated by other gangsters who had no qualms about shooting humans but found the poisoning of dumb beasts despicable.

Eventually, the three poisoners felt the full wrath of the law when a chicken dealer named Barnett Baff was shot to death in 1914. According to the police theory, Baff's competitors had paid the staggering sum of $4,200 for his violent demise. This money, was supposedly given to Levinsky, Yoske Nigger and Charley the Cripple, who divided it up after paying a mere $50 to the actual hit man. Under close surveillance and harassment by the police, the trio abandoned their poisoning practices and retired to reputable business lives in the wilds of Brooklyn, remaining honest, it was said, until the bootlegging era beckoned them back to criminality.

As an old quip has it, "One day the first man tamed the first horse; the next day another man stole it." Certainly, horse stealing was one of the most prevalent crimes in colonial America, and horse thieves flourished during the Revolution, selling animals to both sides and often the same beasts at that. However, horse stealing in America is most often associated with the West, where it was considered a crime without equal. Stealing horses was regarded as murder, and indeed, it often amounted to as much since a man without his horse in open spaces was at the mercy of the elements or of Indian raiders as well as vulnerable to death by starvation or thirst.

T. A. McNeal in When Kansas Was Young summed up the utter necessity of a horse:

A horse was about the only means of conveyance, and in the cattle business it was essential. It was necessary, too, to let the horses run on the range unguarded. The cattlemen reasoned that unless the men who lusted for the possession of good horses were restrained by fear of prompt and violent death, no man would be sure that when he turned his horses out at night he would be able to gather any of them in the morning.

In 1878 a Houston, Tex. newspaper bemoaned the fact that 100,000 horses had been stolen in the state during the preceding three years.

It further estimated that 750 men are regularly engaged in this business and that not more than one in ten is ever captured and brought to justice. By common practice in the rural districts, every man caught is either shot on the spot or hanged to the nearest tree. No instance is yet recorded where the law paid the slightest attention to lynchers of this kind. It is conceded that the man who steals a horse forfeits his life to the owner. It is a game of life and death. Men will pursue these thieves for 500 miles, go any length, spend any amount of money to capture them, and fight them to the death when overtaken. That they will be totally exterminated admits of no doubt. The poor scoundrels cannot last long when the feeling of all civilization is so much aroused against them as it now is in Texas.

When vigilantes in Fort Griffin hanged a horse thief from a pecan tree and put a pick and shovel there for anyone with a mind to bury him, a correspondent for the Dallas Herald recorded the event and added: "So far, so good. As long as the committee strings up the right parties, it has the well wishes of every lover of tranquility."

Lynching of horse thieves became common throughout the entire West, but it was not a very effective deterrent. The horse thieves thrived. One, Dutch Henry, known as the King of the Horse Thieves, had some 300 men working during one period for him. Because horses could easily be recognized on sight by former owners, thieves would often drive them hundreds, even a thousand miles, to sell them. The famed Horse-Thief Trail ran from Salt Lake City in the north to the Mexican border in the south without ever once following the frequently used commercial trails. Horse thieves worked both ends of their run: a gang stealing horses in Texas would drive them to Kansas and in Kansas collar a herd and drive it back to Texas.

Perhaps the futility of using the death penalty as a deterrent is illustrated by the history of this crime. Even the threat of hangings on the spot did not deter horse thieves from stealing thousands of horses each year. Their ranks were slowly thinned only after the development of efficient range detective methods and, more important, after the invention of the horseless carriage.

Horse-Thief Trail

In the post-Civil War West it was possible for outlaws to drive stolen horses all the way from Salt Lake City, Utah through Arizona, New Mexico and Texas to Mexico without once running into the law or an honest rider. The route they followed was the famous but unmarked Horse-Thief Trail, and any man who knew the entire route had his fortune made, the only source of danger being other horse thieves.

Hotsy Totsy Club New York speakeasy

Among all the notorious New York speakeasies that thrived during Prohibition, none had a worse reputation than the Hotsy Totsy Club, a second-floor joint on Broadway between 54th and 55th Streets. Although Hymie Cohen fronted as the proprietor, a big chunk of the place was owned by gangster Legs Diamond. Diamond utilized the club to hold court and directed several rackets from there. He also used it as an execution site. Many crime figures whom Diamond wished to prevail upon would be invited there for some revelry and a business discussion. If they failed to go along with Diamond's view of things, they were murdered in a back room and later carried out "drunk."

The Hotsy Totsy's bloodiest claim to fame came in 1929, when Diamond and sidekick Charles Entratta gunned down a hoodlum named Red Cassidy. Also killed in the wild shoot-out at the bar was an innocent bystander, Simon Walker, who nonetheless happened to be wearing two loaded revolvers in his belt. Unlike the pair's other murders in the club, a great number of witnesses were present during the shooting causing Diamond and Entratta to flee.

From hiding, Diamond directed a reign of killings to clear his name. That meant the bartender had to be rubbed out, along with three customers who had seen what had happened. The cashier, a waiter, the hat check girl and another club, hanger-on disappeared, although their fate was not entirely a mystery to police or the newspapers. But suspicions meant little. Diamond and Entratta surrendered and were charged with the killings at the club. But they were soon freed because the authorities had no witnesses to present evidence against them.

Hounds 19th-century San Francisco anti-foreigner gang

Officially bearing the high-sounding title of the San Francisco Society of Regulators, the Hounds, as they were more commonly called, were a collection of young thugs organized to contain the peril to Anglo-Americans presented by Spanish Americans in San Francisco in 1849.

Under the pretense of a fiery patriotism, flamed by the influence of the Know Nothings, the Hounds set about driving the foreigners out of the gold fields, a goal that had a good deal of public support. They beat, stabbed and shot helpless Mexicans and Chileans whenever they had the chance and extorted money and gold from those few who had managed to accumulate any wealth. Officials made no effort to stop these outrages until the Hounds got the idea that the good people of San Francisco should pay them for their protection of the community. Then no man's property or life—be he Spanish or Anglo-American—was safe. The Hounds roamed the streets in bands, robbing stores and pedestrians in broad daylight. Merchants trying to stop them were stabbed. The gang victimized saloons, gorging themselves on the best of food and drink and telling the proprietor to collect from the city as they walked out. If there were objections, the building was set on fire. The Hounds increased their atrocities against the “greasers” and blacks. They cut off the ears of a black man who had accidentally brushed a Hound in passing. A Mexican who talked back to a Hound had his tongue ripped out by the roots.

In the summer of 1849 the Hounds, in full battle array—almost all were veterans of the Mexican War—made their most violent onslaught against the Mexican tents and shanties. The authors of a contemporary account wrote:

These they violently tore down, plundering them of money and valuables, which they carried away, and totally destroying on the spot such articles as they did not think it worth while to seize. Without provocation, and in cold blood, they barbarously beat with sticks and stones, and cuffed and kicked the offending foreigners. Not content with that, they repeatedly and wantonly fired among the injured people, and amid the shrieks of terrified women and the groans of wounded men, recklessly continued their terrible course in different quarters, wherever in fact malice or thirst for plunder led them. . . . There were no individuals brave or foolhardy enough to resist the progress of such a savage mob, whose exact force was unknown, but who were believed to be both numerous and desperate.

This outrage at last galvanized the whole town. Money was collected for the relief of the destitute Spanish-Americans and 230 volunteers were deputized to round up the Hounds. Many of the gang immediately fled the city, but 20-odd Hounds, including one of their leaders, Sam Roberts, were taken. Several witnesses, including a number of injured Spanish-Americans who later died, testified against the prisoners. Roberts and a man named Saunders were sentenced to 10 years at hard labor, while others drew shorter punishments. But within a few days political supporters of the gang won their release and none of the sentences were ever carried out. However, the Hounds were too frightened ever to reorganize and within a short time virtually all of them left the area.

House of All Nations celebrated brothel

While the Everleigh Club was undoubtedly Chicago's, America's and perhaps the world's most famous brothel, another much more reasonably priced contemporary at the turn of the century was almost as well known in the Windy City. It was the celebrated House of All Nations, a bordello on Armour Avenue that was considered a must-stop for on-the-town sports.

The House of All Nations was famed for two qualities: its employees allegedly came from all parts of the globe (or at least could affect the proper accents) and they came in different price ranges. There was both a $2 and a $5 entrance, and in typical whoredom flim-flammery, the ladies of the house all worked both entrances, dispensing the same services for either price tag. One commonly held belief in Chicago was that Asian prostitutes working in the house plied their profession during the winter months clad in long underwear because they were unable to take the chilly Chicago climate. The practice gave the Oriental harlots an added “exotic” quality that made them even more popular, but it should be noted that for a small additional fee they would strip down to the skin and brave the elements.

The House of All Nations was shuttered prior to the start of World War I, a victim of the great vice cleanup of the notorious Levee section on Chicago's South Side.

Houston, Temple L. (1860–1905) criminal lawyer

The son of Texas patriot Sam Houston, Temple Houston became one of the West's most colorful lawyers. Tall, with hair down to his shoulders, he cut a flamboyant figure in long Prince Albert coats, white sombreros and ties fashioned out of rattlesnake skin.

As a courtroom orator, Houston had few equals. Defending a prostitute named Millie Stacy for plying her trade in 1899, he mesmerized the jury with oratory. Proclaiming that, "where the star of purity once glittered on her girlish brow, burning shame has set its seal forever," he begged the all-male jury to let Millie "go in peace." They did.

Some of his tactics were most unusual. Representing a man who had shot first when facing a skilled gun-fighter, Houston, in an effort to demonstrate the speed the victim possessed, whipped out a pair of Colt .45s and blazed away at the judge and jury. When peace was restored, the lawyer got around to mentioning that the guns had been loaded with blanks. It was an effective demonstration, but the jury still convicted his client. Undismayed, Houston argued for a new trial on the grounds that when the jurors had scattered after he started shooting they had mingled with the courtroom crowd and therefore could no longer be considered sequestered. The lawyer won his appeal and the eventual freedom of his client.

Houston was himself an expert gunman and easily outpointed Bat Masterson in a shooting contest. Besides being called on many times to lead posses after criminals, he fought several duels and never sustained a wound. Once, he got into a saloon shoot-out with another lawyer at the conclusion of a trial and killed his opponent. He then defended himself successfully in court, pleading self-defense.

Temple Houston died of a stroke in Woodward, Okla. A newspaper called him "a mingling of nettles and flowers" and observed that the Southwest "probably will never see his counterpart."

Howard, Joseph See CIVIL WAR GOLD HOAX.

Howe and Hummel shyster lawyers

Howe and Hummel were easily the grandest shysters ever to seek out a loophole, suborn a witness or free a guilty man. Practicing in New York from 1869 to 1906, they made a mockery of the law. Rotund, walrus-mustached William F. Howe was a great courtroom pleader who could bring sobs to any jury. Young Abe Hummel was a little man who was marvelously adept at ferreting out loopholes in the law, to the extent that once he almost succeeded in making murder legal.

At the age of 32, Howe came to America from England, where his career as a medical practitioner had terminated in a prison term for performing an illegal operation on a woman patient. He studied law and within three years he opened up shop on New York's Centre (later called Center) Street. Howe was an instant success because of his resonant voice and a face that could turn on and off any emotion he wished to display for a jury. Years later, David Belasco, the theatrical producer, watched Howe's tearful performance winning an acquittal for a woman who had shot her lover full of holes. "That man," he said, "would make a Broadway star."

In the late 1860s Howe hired young Abe Hummel as his law clerk and in almost no time promoted him to partner. Anyone so adept at finding holes in the law was too good to lose. One case that illustrated Hummel's ability involved a professional arsonist named Owen Reilly. Hummel suggested they save the prosecution the trouble of a trial by pleading Reilly guilty to attempted arson. Only after the plea was accepted did anyone notice that there was no penalty for the crime of attempted arson. However, the statutes did say that the sentence for any crime attempted but not actually committed was to be one-half of the maximum allowable for the actual commission of the crime. Since the penalty for arson at the time was life imprisonment, obviously the defendant's sentence had to be half a life. Howe made nonsense of that standard.

"Scripture tells us that we knoweth not the day nor the hour of our departure," he told the judge. "Can this court sentence the prisoner at the bar to half of his natural life? Will it, then, sentence him to half a minute or to half the days of Methuselah?" The judge gave up and set Reilly free; the state legislature rushed to revise the arson statutes shortly thereafter.

On another occasion the pair almost managed to make murder legal in New York State. It happened in November 1888, when a client named Handsome Harry Carlton was convicted of having killed a cop. Since the jury failed to recommend mercy, the death penalty was mandatory. Little Abe studied the statutes very carefully and pointed out to Howe that in the month of November there was no death penalty for murder on the books, the state having abolished hanging the previous June, with the provision that it be replaced by the electric chair. The new death-dealing apparatus was to start functioning on the following

January 1, and as Hummel noted, the law specifically said that electrocution should apply to all convictions punishable by death on and after January 1.

When Carlton came up for sentencing, early in December, Howe objected as the judge prepared to pronounce the death penalty. In fact, he objected to any sentence being passed on Carlton. If the jury had recommended mercy, Carlton could be sentenced to life imprisonment, the lawyer noted. "However, my client has been convicted of first-degree murder with no recommendation of mercy and there is no law on the books covering such a crime.

He then read the precise language in the new law and concluded that all the judge could do was turn his client free. Nonplussed, the judge delayed sentencing while the case moved to the state supreme court. Quite naturally, Howe and Hummel's contention made headlines across the country. In New York the public reaction was one of utter shock. According to the lawyers' contention, anyone committing murder between June and the new year could not be executed. Other murderers confined in death cells clamored to be released on the ground that they were being wrongfully held and could not be executed.

The district attorney's office vowed to fight the matter, and Inspector Thomas Byrnes of the New York Police Department's Detective Bureau pledged to the public that his men would continue to clap murderers behind bars, law or no law.

In the end, Howe and Hummel lost out on their interpretation; the high court ruled that no slip in syntax could be used as an excuse to legalize murder. Harry Carlton swung from the gallows two days after Christmas, a nick-of-time execution. However, if Carlton had lost out, Howe and Hummel did not; their crafty efforts brought many felons and murderers to their office door.

Buoyed by the publicity, the two shysters coauthored a book entitled In Danger, or Life in New York: A True History of the Great City's Wiles and Temptations. They explained in the preface that it was published in the interest of justice and to protect the innocent from the guilty, but what they actually turned out was a primer on every type of crime—blackmail, house burglary, card sharpening, safecracking, shoplifting, jewel thievery and, of course, murder.

It became an immediate best-seller, with bookstore owners noticing a lot of traffic in their shops by persons who did not appear to be frequent book buyers. The book became required reading for every professional or would-be lawbreaker, from streetwalkers to killers. More and more when Howe and Hummel asked a new client, "Who sent you?" the stock reply was, "I read about you in the book."

No one ever computed exactly what percentage of murderers Howe and Hummel got off scot-free, but a prosecutor once estimated it was at least 70 percent, and "90 percent of them were guilty."

Whenever they had a client who was obviously as guilty as could be, the pair went into their bandage routine, having the defendant appear swathed in yards of white bandage, as though to suggest so frail a mind that his brains might fall out at any moment. One contemporary account tells of a Howe and Hummel client who simulated a village idiot's tic by "twitching the right corner of the mouth and simultaneously blinking the left eye." As soon as he was cleared, the defendant's face "resumed its normal composure, except for the large grin that covered it as he lightly removed the cloths from about his forehead." Another client, whose supposedly blithering insanity was accompanied by muteness and an ability to communicate only by sign language, seized Howe's hand gratefully when the verdict was announced in his favor and boomed, "Silence is golden."

The pair did not always resort to such trickery. When it was more convenient, they simply bribed witnesses and appropriate officials to get records changed, yet somehow they never ran into deep trouble until after Howe died in 1906. The following year Hummel was caught paying $1,000 to facilitate a divorce action. He was sentenced to two years in prison. Released at the age of 60, Hummel retired to Europe and died in London in January 1926, a regular to the end in the visitors' section during trials at the Old Bailey.

Hoyt, George (?–1877) Wyatt Earp victim

George Hoyt, a Texas cowboy and alleged outlaw, was killed by Wyatt Earp in Dodge City, which in itself was a distinction. Despite the reputation he gained there as a gun-toting lawman, Earp killed only one man in Dodge City, and his chief deputy, Bat Masterson, killed none. The fact that Earp and Masterson were nicknamed the Fighting Pimps perhaps indicates what they meant by "cleaning up" the town. Not that Earp's brand of justice didn't include plenty of violence, especially against cowboys, for whom he always showed considerable contempt. Earp proudly recalled, "As practically every prisoner heaved into the calaboose was thoroughly buffaloed (crowned with a revolver barrel) in the process, we made quite a dent in cowboy conceit."

One cattleman subjected to this treatment was Tobe Driskill. Following his experience Driskill supposedly put, in true Texas style, a $1,000 reward on Earp's head. There was some indication that a couple of drunken cowboys tried to collect that reward, but they missed Earp and he missed them. Finally, George Hoyt gave it a try. Hoyt was allegedly a wanted outlaw in Texas, and as a further inducement to kill Earp, Driskill is said to have promised to use his influence in order to get the charges against Hoyt dropped. On July 26, 1877 Hoyt rode into the town's plaza and fired six shots at Earp, who was standing in front of the Comique Theater, where Eddie Foy was at the moment singing "Kalamazoo in Michigan." Three of the bullets whizzed by Earp and plowed through the door of the theater and into the audience section, hitting nobody but causing Foy to drop flat on his face. Hoyt's mount bucked furiously, making him a poor target, but Earp still spilled the cowboy in the dirt with his third shot. Hoyt lingered a month before dying and never told Earp who had hired him to do the job.

Hughes, John R. (1855–1946) Texas Ranger

Illinois-born John Hughes was one of the most productive of all Texas Rangers. He compiled an outstanding record of captures, even crossing the Rio Grande, with or without permission, to bring back an outlaw. In 1877 Hughes gave up running his Texas horse ranch after he had been forced to go after a gang of six rustlers who had taken his stock. He killed four of them and captured the other two, but he also realized that as the sole operator of his ranch, he would continue to suffer losses from his herd. Hughes eventually decided that if he had to chase rustlers, he might as well get paid for it, and he joined the Rangers.

By 1883 Hughes had risen to captain, a high rank in the law organization, and single-handedly had brought in the notorious outlaw Juan Perales. Over the years he was also responsible for wiping out such gangs as the Ybarras, Friars and Massays. Hughes ended his career in 1915 at the age of 60 and died in 1946.

It is perhaps futile to attempt to single out the most hideous and brutal torture ever practiced on the inmates of prisons in the United States, but "the hummingbird" was certainly among the worst. This innocuous-sounding name was applied to a technique that involved placing a prisoner, chained hand and foot, in a steel bathtub filled with water. He was then rubbed down with a sponge attached to an electric battery. According to one description of the torture's agonizing effects, "Two or three minutes and the victim is ready for the grave or the mad house."

Bloody riots at the Oregon State Prison at Salem during World War I were in large measure aimed at eliminating this cruel instrument of torture. Needless to say, the leaders of riots were subjected to the humming bird, although its use in Oregon prisons was discontinued shortly thereafter.

Hunt, Sam "Golf Bag" (?–1956) Capone mob enforcer
Together with Machine Gun McGurn, Sam "Golf Bag" Hunt was perhaps the toughest of the Capone mob enforcers, or "blazers," as they were more commonly called. Placed on the Chicago Crime Commission's list of the city's public enemies, Hunt was often described as the killer of no less than 20 men. He got his nickname as a result of one of his more colorful assassinations, the victim of which remains a mystery.

One day in 1927 a Chicagoan was taking an early morning stroll along Lake Michigan's beautiful South Shore when the boom of shotgun blasts disturbed the tranquil air. He hurried in the direction of the shots and found a corpse, so recently rendered dead that blood was still oozing forth. The morning stroller rushed to a telephone and informed the police. The officers who responded came across Hunt and McGurn less than a half mile away. When asked about the golf bag he was carrying, Hunt gave a reasonable explanation: "Jack and I were going out to play a little golf."

This answer, however, did not prevent the policemen from peering into the bag and finding among the golf clubs a semiautomatic shotgun. The weapon was still warm, a fact that convinced the police they had a hot clue. But it didn't turn out that way. The good citizen led them to the spot where he had found the body, but it was no longer there. Either the dead man had walked away or he had been carted away, and all that remained was a splatter of blood on the dewy grass.

In any event, there was nothing to link Hunt to a crime, and the only thing he was tagged with was a permanent nickname. The athletically inclined assassin outlived his mentor Capone and most of the other blazers, dying in 1956 in his late fifties.

hurrahing the town cowboy custom

In the quiet lives of Western town dwellers, one of the most disruptive events was when the cowboys came into town, "yippeeing" their ponies along the plank walks and into the saloons. These "ruffians" on horseback would later ride out of town firing their six-shooters in the air. Undeniably there was gunplay, drunken brawling and wanton vandalism, the same that existed back east in the infamous dives of New York, Cincinnati and Chicago, where huge street gangs literally would take apart a saloon or a whole row of saloons when the notion struck them. Indeed, Western cowboys, even when “hurrahing the town,” were restrained by comparison.

Historian Ramon F. Adams describes the practice from the cowhand’s perspective:

Let’s follow a newly paid-off puncher with $100—three or four months’ pay—burning a hole in his pocket. First he visits a barber, has a tangle of beard removed and his hair cut. Then he drops into a dry goods store and buys himself a new outfit. Now he is ready to celebrate. The saloon men, the gamblers, the pimps, are all waiting to filch his hard-earned pay. The bartender sets out a bottle of cheap frontier whiskey, “two bits a throw.” A little heady after a few drinks, the puncher heads for the poker table, where a flashy gambler is waiting with his marked cards. Our puncher watches the dealer’s pile of chips grow and his own melt away. Convinced he is being robbed, he can’t prove it. Finally, pockets empty, he pulls away from the table, mounts his pony, races up and down the street and blazes a few indignant shots at the stars. Then, with a yell, he spurs the pony and gallops out of town, heading for the security of his cow camp. And yet, because of this type of conduct, he became known to the Easterner as a bloodthirsty demon, reckless and rowdy, weighted down with guns and itching to use them.

Writers of the day insisted the cowboys were semisavages and lionized the likes of Hickok, Earp, Masterson and Holliday—the men who regarded the gamblers, whoremasters and saloonkeepers as clients and the cowboys as foes. Wyatt Earp especially held the cowboy in contempt. For some time he operated a con game with Mysterious Dave Mather in Mobeetie, Tex. selling phony gold bricks to gullible trail hands.

Can a person under hypnosis be made to commit murder or another crime? For years the possible use of hypnotism in murders and other crimes has been a subject of debate in scientific circles, with the weight of opinion apparently slowly shifting to the side of those who think it possible. Even legal authorities have admitted the need to deal with the problem. In the 1950s a New York prosecutor, Assistant District Attorney Sheldon S. Levy, raised the possibility of law-abiding citizens being hypnotized against their will and made, by various means, to commit acts they would not do if they had their usual control over themselves. Writing in the Journal of Criminal Law, he quoted findings of some psychologists that “a hypnotist who really wished a murder could almost certainly get it.”

Of course, it has never been proven that a hypnotist can actually get another person to commit a murder for him, since such a test, obviously, cannot be carried out. Yet numerous stage hypnotists have demonstrated the ability to get people to commit other crimes against their conscience. In a well-publicized demonstration at New York City’s Carnegie Hall, one hypnotist called several people to the stage and induced them to rob members of the audience when they returned to their seats. He did so by hypnotizing them and giving them cards that read: “You must raise money for a charity that will save hundreds of children from starvation. The people from whom you are taking things are wicked and do not deserve their ill-gotten gains. You cannot possibly be caught.”

The hypnotized persons returned to their seats without the audience being informed about what they had been instructed to do. When they were told to return to the stage, they had with them a number of wallets and a woman’s handbag, all stolen without the victims’ knowledge.

The note, according to student of hypnotism, had broken down all mental resistance by the subjects. While no one can be forced to perform an act that he knows is wrong, they say, he can be induced to commit an illegal act if he is convinced it is right. The note had the added value of assuring the subjects they would not be caught, thus overcoming any fear factor. Similarly, in tests at various universities hypnotized subjects threw sulfuric acid into a person’s face, which unknown to them, was protected by an invisible sheet of glass. Some subjects threw the acid with an obvious pleasurable display of violence, while others shuddered and only threw it after considerable hesitation.

Disbelievers say such experiments prove nothing because the subject, although in a trance, is still aware that the experiments are being conducted in a laboratory or entertainment atmosphere and thus knows he will not be permitted to do anything wrong. Since a hypnotized person “knows” he won’t be called upon to commit murder, he will pick up a gun and fire it, reasoning the weapon will be loaded with blanks. Assistant District Attorney Levy countered this view by pointing out that all a hypnotist bent on homicide would have to do was convince a person that he was merely undergoing a psychological test and that the gun contained blanks and then substitute real bullets.

Occasionally newspaper stories report a person’s claim that he or she was hypnotized into committing a crime, but there is no recent record of any such story being accepted. Indeed, the California Supreme Court once said that “the law of the United States does not recognize hypnotism.”

One classic murder case that seems to come closest to proving the murder by hypnosis theory occurred in Minnesota in 1894. Harry Hayward was a young blade about Minneapolis who was known as a lady’s man as well as a hard-drinking, heavy-gambling, all-around sport. He was also a student of hypnotism, having taken a course on the subject. Some students of crime are convinced that he used this power to win the favors and money of Katherine Ging and to get her to assign her insurance—$10,000 worth—over to him.

Hayward was also practicing his power of hypnosis on a local handyman named Claus Blixt, whom he convinced to carry out relatively minor crimes, such as burning down a small factory on which Kitty Ging held a mortgage. Kitty collected the insurance money, and Hayward collected from her. Soon, the lady was down to no assets but her life insurance. For days Hayward talked to the handyman, always making him look into his eyes as he spoke. Hayward later confessed, “I would repeat over a few times how easy it was to kill someone, and pretty soon he would be saying right after me, ‘Sure, that’s easy; nothing to that.’”

Whether the handyman was actually under hypnosis at the time he murdered Katherine Ging or whether his will to resist the idea had simply been broken by suggestions made during earlier trances was never made clear. But either way, Blixt committed the murder while Hayward was miles away establishing an alibi. Hayward was later hanged for the killing, but the handyman, a relatively pathetic character, was allowed to plead guilty and drew a lesser sentence.

Another supposed hypnotic murderer, convicted in 1894, was Dr. Henry Meyer, who left a string of corpses from New York to Chicago. Before setting himself up as a doctor in the Midwest, Meyer had studied hypnotism in Leipzig, Germany under Professor Herbert Flint, one of the celebrated mesmerists of the era.

Meyer murdered several persons to collect on their insurance policies. He killed his first wife and then the husband of another woman so that he could marry her. When he saw a chance to kill his second wife for $75,000, he conceived a murder plan involving hypnosis. Meyer chose as the tool of his plot a plumber named Peter Bretz, an ideal hypnotic subject who soon fell under his spell. He convinced the plumber that he was in love with Mrs. Meyer, who apparently was ready herself for an affair of the heart, and should run away with her. Bretz was to take the second Mrs. Meyer to Arizona, offer to show her the Grand Canyon and, when nobody was around, shove her over the canyon lip. The plumber and the intended victim had actually reached the Grand Canyon when he broke out of the spell. The couple then returned to Chicago and revealed the plot to authorities. But since the authorities at that time could not possibly get a grand jury to swallow such a tale, Meyer went free to commit another murder before being brought to justice. Students of hypnotic crime insist the Meyer case deserves closer study. Basically, despite the claims of some believers in the feasibility of hypnotic murder, the justice system continues to ignore the question.

Experts agree that hypnotism, if properly used, can play an important role in fighting crime, far greater than the potential danger that it may be when employed in the commission of crimes. In the 1976 kidnapping of 26 children in a school bus in Chowchilla, Calif. hypnosis helped the bus driver remember part of the license plate number of a van used in the kidnapping so that the police were able to trace the vehicle to the criminals. New York police made an arrest in the murder of a young female cellist at the Metropolitan Opera House after a ballerina who had seen a man with the musician was enabled by hypnosis to give a description for a police sketch. Part of what convinced police that Albert DeSalvo was the Boston Strangler was his description under hypnosis of gory details concerning the sex murders and the tortured thoughts that made him commit his terrible crimes.

Similarly, hypnotic examination of a young man, Allen Curtis Lewis, who had admitted to pushing a young woman, Renee Katz, onto the New York City subway tracks in 1979, as well as of a Connecticut teenager, Peter Reilly, who had confessed murdering his mother, helped clear them, revealing, among other things, how their confessions had been produced by subtle coercion.

There are, however, a number of obstacles to widespread police use of hypnosis. One is that attempts have been made to interrogate suspects under hypnosis against their will. The second objection is that hypnotized persons do not necessarily give reliable information. In the $2.7 million Brinks robbery during the 1950s, police traced a license plate number furnished under hypnosis only to find it belonged to a college president who had an iron-clad alibi not only for himself but for his car as well. In another case a man charged with the murder of a child supplied “hypnotized” evidence that indicated his wife, rather than he, was the guilty party. However, discrepancies turned up indicating that the suspect had used the opportunity to try to shift the guilt away from himself.

A classic example of the perils of accepting as legal evidence a confession obtained by hypnosis is the case of Camilo W. Leyra, Jr., who was convicted and sentenced to death for the 1950 hammer slaying of his 74-year-old father and 80-year-old mother. He was released from the death house in 1956 after an appeals court overturned his conviction for a third time because the only evidence against him was his original confession obtained through hypnosis. Stated the New York Court of Appeals:

The prosecution has produced not a single trustworthy bit of affirmative, independent evidence connecting the defendant with the crime. Under the circumstances, a regard for the fundamental concept of justice and fairness, if not due process, imposes upon the court the duty to write finis to further prosecution against the defendant. . . . It seems quite probable that the police and the District Attorney, relying too heavily on the confessions that they had obtained . . . failed to do the essential careful and intensive investigation that should be done before a defendant is charged with a crime, certainly one as serious as murder.

Despite the dangers of misuse, there is little doubt that the practice of hypnosis will continue to grow. The New York Police Department has firm rules against using the method on any person even slightly suspected of being guilty of the crime. At one time Los Angeles police had 11 officers trained in hypnosis and have used the method in 600 cases. In 90 percent of the cases the hypnotic probes were said to have provided information that led to an arrest.

Ice Cream Bar Robbery minor crime, major sentence

Few minor crime convictions in the 1990s provoked more nationwide anger than what was facetiously dubbed in the media “The Great Ice Cream Bar Robbery.” A black teenager, Dehundra Caldwell, a first offender, was convicted in 1992 for stealing ice cream bars from the cafeteria of a Thomaston, Ga., middle school.

White superior court judge Andrew Whalen sentenced the 17-year-old to three years in prison. Following outcries throughout the country that the judge had been racist and unfair, Caldwell was released after serving 10 days of his sentence. The board of pardons then put Caldwell on two years’ probation.

ice pick kill murder technique

Long a favorite rub-out method of Mafia hit men, the so-called ice pick kill is employed to make a murder victim’s death appear to be the result of natural causes. Generally, the victim is forced into a men’s room or some isolated place, and while two or three of the hit men hold him still, the killer wielding the ice pick jams the weapon through his eardrum into the brain. The pick produces only a tiny hole in the ear and only a small amount of bleeding, which is carefully wiped clean, but massive bleeding occurs in the brain, causing death. Examination of the victim by a doctor generally results in a finding that the person has died of a cerebral hemorrhage. Only expert medical examiners are capable of uncovering murder. When a gangland murder victim is found with numerous ice pick wounds, police generally theorize the victim struggled so much that the normally meticulous execution proved impossible and the victim was simply ice-picked to death.

Ida the Goose War New York underworld feud

If Homeric Greece had its Helen of Troy, the New York underworld had its Ida the Goose. Despite her rather unromantic name, the only one that has come down through posterity, Ida the Goose was a noted beauty, a maiden whose favors were traditionally reserved for the leaders of the notorious Gopher Gang of Hell’s Kitchen. Ida was the last woman, so far as is known, to have caused a full-scale gang war over an affair of the heart.

In the early 1900s the Gophers were one of the most prominent gangs of the city, especially following the fractionalization of the powerful and bloody Eastman gang as a result of the imprisonment of their leader, Monk Eastman. One group of Eastmans, perhaps 400 to 500 strong, rallied to the banner of Chick Tricker, who maintained his headquarters at his own Cafe Maryland on West 28th Street. The Tricker gangsters engaged in all sorts of criminality from robbery to homicide. Their main battles generally were fought against other former members of the Eastman gang who had joined up with Big Jack Zelig or Jack Sirocco. Tricker hardly wanted an additional war with the Gophers, but he proved powerless against the momentum of events that bore down on him.

It started when a tough Tricker gangster, Irish Tom Riley, who, despite his name, was probably a Spanish Jew, won the heart of Ida the Goose and lured her from the bosom of the Gophers to the Cafe Maryland. The enraged Gophers sent a delegation to retrieve their lost princess, but both she and her new lover refused to agree to her return to Hell's Kitchen. Tricker merely shrugged. He would not order the surrender of Ida, since that would represent a loss of face. Over the next several weeks the Gophers and the Trickers had numerous hand-to-hand confrontations, including a few non-fatal stabbings, but after a while finally it appeared the Gophers had lost interest in launching a total war to regain Ida the Goose.

Thus, it was a surprise when on a snowy night in October 1909 four Gophers brazenly strolled into the Maryland and ordered beer at the bar. About a half-dozen Trickers, their noted leader absent, sat at tables eyeing the intrusion with both shock and disbelief. Had Tricker himself been present, he probably would have ordered an immediate attack on the hated intruders. As it was, only Ida the Goose spoke up with indignation. "Say! Youse guys got a nerve!"

The Gophers silently drained their mugs and then one said, "Well, let's get at it!"

They whirled around, each man holding two revolvers, and opened fire. Five of the surprised Trickers went down, several mortally wounded. Only Ida's lover was unscathed, and he scrambled across the floor and dove under his lady's voluminous skirts. The Gophers made no move to shoot him, instead watching Ida the Goose to see what she would do.

The lady surveyed the scene a moment, shrugged and contemptuously raised her skirts. "Say, youse!" she said. "Come out and take it!"

Trembling on his hands and knees, her lover crawled out to the middle of the floor. Four revolvers barked, and he fell dead with four slugs in him. One of the Gophers strode forward and put another bullet in his brain. The four assassins then turned and walked out to the street, followed at a respectful distance by Ida the Goose. She fully understood the honor bestowed on her by having been the cause of such a great battle, and it was said that she nevermore strayed from her place of adornment in Hell's Kitchen.

In Danger primer for criminals

Probably no book ever published in America was more blatantly an instruction guide to criminality than In Danger, or Life in New York: A True History of a Great City's Wiles and Temptations, which appeared in 1888. The book was signed, "Howe and Hummel, the Celebrated Criminal Lawyers." Howe and Hummel indeed were celebrated attorneys and probably the most corrupt New York has ever seen. As they declared in a moral-toned preface, the two wrote the book after being moved by a clergyman's sermon in which he had declared, "It had been well for many an honest lad and unsuspecting country girl that they had never turned their steps cityward nor turned them from the simplicity of their country home toward the snares and pitfalls of crime and vice that await the unwary in New York." That was the last piece of high-minded drivel to appear in the book, the rest of which was given over to a detailed guide on what to steal and how.

By way of invitation, Howe and Hummel wrote of "elegant storehouses, crowded with the choicest and most costly goods, great banks whose vaults and safes contain more bullion than could be transported by the largest ships, colossal establishments teeming with diamonds, jewelry, and precious stones gathered from all the known and uncivilized portions of the globe—all this countless wealth, in some cases so insecurely guarded."

Having thus whetted the appetites of novice and would-be criminals, they hastened to add that "all the latest developments in science and skill are being successfully pressed into the service of the modern criminal." The ever-helpful authors went into detailed technical descriptions of various devices used by jewel thieves and shoplifters, such as "the traveling bag with false, quick-opening sides . . . the shoplifter's muff . . . the lady thieves' corsets." There were instructions for making one's own burglar tools and descriptions of the methods used in various skin games and the mathematical formulas used for rigging cards. And did crime pay? Howe and Hummel never said so in so many words, but, e.g., of shoplifting they stated, "In no particular can the female shiplifter be distinguished from other members of her sex except perhaps that in most cases she is rather more richly and attractively dressed."

The great shysters also touted certain legal services available at "what we may be pardoned for designating the best-known criminal law offices in America."

In Danger was severely criticized by the police and denounced from the pulpits, but each fresh denunciation merely produced more sales of the book.

Indian police

One of the few techniques of self-government introduced by the white man to the Indian that had a modicum of success was the Indian police force and court system. The system proved popular with the Indians themselves because it took them away from the white man's justice, which for the red man simply did not exist.

The first to experiment with the concept of Indian police were Gen. George Crook and Indian agent John P. Clum, both of whom persisted despite being called the “Indian lovers.” Even the anti-Indian Interior Department saw that the Indian police had value because they relieved the government of the need and expense of supplying troops to preserve peace on the reservations. Indians charged with committing crimes against other Indians were brought to Indian courts for trial and given justice that average Indians would accept as valid.

Clum made the most effective use of Indian police, and with their aid he brought in Geronimo in April 1877, scoring a great coup. Shortly thereafter, he informed the government he was prepared to supervise all the Apache in Arizona without the help of army troops provided he be allowed to raise two companies of Indian police. The government, however, would not accept the proposal because it was assuming a more restrictive policy, including forced migration of the Indians. During those later migrations the loyal Indian police were treated as roughly and unfairly as any other Indians. By then Indian police were hated by most other Indians. From a certain perspective, they played the same sort of role performed by the police of the Warsaw ghetto during World War II. Certainly, the murder of Sitting Bull in 1890 by a number of Indian police was done at the instigation of white men wishing to avoid any direct involvement.

Next to spouse slaying, the most common type of murders within families is infanticide. It is estimated that parents kill about 600 or 700 children a year, or about 3 percent of the total murder toll. However, if killings not reported as murders could be counted, the infanticide rate would probably be much higher.

Very few cases of infanticide are committed by fathers, but experts agree this is simply because they have far less contact with babies than mothers have. Mothers who murder their offspring usually suffer from emotional disturbances and build up to the deed over a long period of time. Generally, less severe forms of child abuse provide warning signals of the impending tragedy. Some mothers become fearful of the possibility of what they might do to their children and have themselves committed. A California mother recently signed herself into Napa Hospital after trying to kill her two tiny sons. She received some therapy and was sent home. Later she killed both boys and then failed in a suicide attempt.

Judith Catchpole may or may not have been the first woman tried for infanticide in America, but she did establish a first of a kind. While surviving details of the case are somewhat sketchy, it is known that in September 1656 the first all-female jury in the colonies was empaneled in the General Provincial Court at Patuxent, Md. to hear evidence concerning the charge that she had murdered her child. Catchpole claimed she had never even been pregnant, and after hearing her evidence, the jury acquitted her.

In a bizarre case in Maryland in 1976, a 19-year-old mother killed her baby boy as she was dressing him to go to church service, while a young woman friend watched in horror. The mother started screaming she could see the devil trying to enter her baby and she tried to stop him by slapping the child and scratching at his navel—while he screamed in agony—and, finally, wringing the baby’s neck. When the mother appeared in court five months later, all the parties—prosecution defense and psychiatrists—agreed she had been insane at the time of the act, and an insanity plea of not guilty was accepted. However, when the judge asked for testimony on her current condition, psychiatrists would not certify her as insane, and she was freed. Yet, the horror of society toward the crime of infanticide was exhibited in the legal treatment accorded to the woman friend who had watched the killing. Because she had not attempted to stop the mother’s insane acts, for whatever reason, she was sentenced to a seven-year prison term.

When fathers do commit infanticide, the victim is almost always a boy, rarely either a daughter or a baby. The underlying motive may be an attempt to gain supremacy in the household, but occasionally, the motive has been monetary. On Halloween night 1974, in Pasadena, Tex. Ronald O’Bryan poisoned his eight-year-old son, Tim, with cyanide to collect the boy’s $65,000 life insurance policy. O’Bryan was sentenced to the electric chair.

Because of the close-knit relationships involved and the horror of the crime, experts agree that a large number of infanticide cases are hushed up by families that, having one loss, see nothing to be gained from having another. Thus, it is generally believed that the rate of infanticide is greatly understated. Society also simply ignores other forms of infanticide. In a classic study of the subject, Infanticide: Past and Present, Maria W. Piers refers to babies who are “forgotten,” or left behind, by their young mothers immediately after delivery. This happens especially in impoverished sections. Piers states: “Many of them probably assume that their babies will survive, but the assumption is incorrect. Because of insufficient hospital staff and the inefficiency of adoption procedures, human babies die in

Ingalls, Oklahoma Territory, Battle of

One of the great gunfights of the West, the Battle of Ingalls on September 1, 1893 added significantly to the folklore of a dying era. The battle resulted from a disastrous effort by the law to capture the Bill Doolin gang, a hell-for-leather outfit that probably enjoyed greater down-home esteem than was ever achieved by the James gang or Butch Cassidy's Wild Bunch.

One of the gang's many headquarters was the clapboard town of Ingalls, some 10 miles east of Stillwater. In Ingalls they felt safe because the locals were friendly and sympathizers would hurry in with reports whenever a posse approached.

On the night of August 31, the U.S. marshal's office in Guthrie got a tip that the Doolin gang was carousing in Ingalls, and the following day a posse of marshals slipped into town in a covered wagon to wipe out the gang in one swoop. The lawmen might have succeeded in their mission had not one of the gang, Bitter Creek Newcomb, spotted them as he came out of Murray's Saloon. There is some indication that Newcomb had been tipped off. What followed was the celebrated Battle of Ingalls, which proved to be a resounding triumph for the outlaws. Three deputy marshals were killed, while all of the gang survived and only one of them, Arkansas Tom, who was asleep in his hotel room at the time, was captured as the rest were escaping. Bill Dalton's horse went down. Bill Doolin rode back for him, and the two of them shared the same mount in a daring dash to freedom. The most amazing escape of all, however, was Bitter Creek Newcomb's, who for a time was literally enveloped in mushrooming dust caused by the posse's bullets. He was wounded but survived to get away, an accomplishment so incredible that a very special savior was invented for him. The legend developed that Newcomb had lived through the battle because a daring young lass who loved him came charging to his rescue with an extra gunbelt of ammunition, that she shielded him with her own body and that she even provided protective fire for him. The best evidence is that there was no girl involved in any way in the fighting, but the myth grew nonetheless.

The Battle of Ingalls became the Doolin gang's greatest feat, the lore of it persisting even after the outfit had disbanded and each member had been blasted into extinction. They sang praises of the great fight, and song and story recorded the heroic love of Newcomb and the "Rose of Cimarron," who supposedly had saved his life.

Innocents western outlaws

A particularly inappropriate name, the Innocents were members of the most efficient gang of the frontier West, bossed by a magnetic personality, Henry Plummer, doubling as the Montana sheriff whose duty it was to contain the sudden rampage of criminality. The full story of the Innocents can never be told since it is impossible to pinpoint each of the hundreds of crimes they committed; the murders attributed to the band have been fixed by most historians at 102.

In 1862 Plummer, a lawman in California until he got into trouble because of a couple of messy murders and other, lesser infractions, drifted into what is now southwest Montana, where gold had been discovered. He assembled a large group of outlaws, including a number he had used in previous criminal endeavors in Idaho. Most were in their teens or early twenties. Plummer himself, a handsome rogue who had a way with women, was only 25 or so. Some historians have insisted that the Plummer gang was composed of murderous juvenile delinquents. But this overlooks the fact that it was traditional in the West for men to hit the outlaw trail at an extremely young age.

The Innocents operated with a certain childlike fervor and enthusiasm, terrorizing stagecoaches and miners hauling ore in and out of Bannack. Since at one time the Innocents totaled over 100 men, they needed secret ways of identifying themselves to one another and thus wore red bandanas with special sailor knots. They used a secret handclasp and the password innocent when meeting, under the assumption that saying such a word could hardly imply any kind of guilt.

The only recourse for the victims of the Innocents was the local sheriff, Henry Plummer, who, while sympathetic, seemed incapable of stemming the criminal tide. The Innocents, however, were too vast an organization not to spring leaks, and in time, suspicion spread to Plummer himself. A Montana vigilante movement sprang up, and in a six-week period in late 1863 and early 1864, they hung no less than 26 outlaws, including Plummer, who met his doom on a scaffold he had built himself as part of his legal duties. The rest of the gang scattered, although some others were to receive the same rough-hewn justice throughout the rest of the year.

Over the years Henry Plummer and his Innocents became the inspiration of a near-endless string of stories, books and movies depicting the nefarious activities

Most jurisdictions have statutes that protect insane or incompetent persons from criminal prosecution, but the legal responsibility of such persons varies considerably from place to place. Courts recognize that a person afflicted with insanity or a mental disorder may not be responsible for his actions and therefore not liable to prosecution. However, the legal tests for insanity have long been the subject of much confusion. Some states apply the "wild beast test," which requires that to be judged insane, the defendant must be so devoid of reason that he no more knows what he is doing than would an infant, a brute or a wild beast. Others call for a "delusion test," whereby an accused criminal must be shown to have been suffering from delusions before he can be cleared of responsibility. A little over half the states abide by M'Naghten Rules, which hold an accused not responsible if he "was laboring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature and the quality of the act he was doing, or if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong."

Some states adhere to the "right and wrong test," which centers on a defendant's ability to tell right from wrong. Another standard used is the "irresistible impulse test," which requires that in order to be considered sane there needs to exist, in addition to the capacity for intellectual judgment, the possibility of doing what is considered right and to refrain from doing what is thought to be wrong.

A striking case was that of William Milligan who was charged in 1977 with raping four Ohio State University coeds. Milligan was found to have 10 distinct personalities, only one of which was criminal. The four coeds had the misfortune of meeting the wrong one of the 10. He was found not guilty by reason of insanity and shipped off to a mental institution. Similarly, Howard Unruh, the New Jersey mass murderer who killed 13 neighbors and strangers in the streets of Camden in 1949 never faced trial for his crimes. Instead, he was sent to the Trenton State Hospital where some three decades later he was described as quiet and withdrawn, a man in his late fifties who mostly read or sat around.

The law's treatment of insane persons charged with crimes has been the subject of much criticism because such persons are frequently released from confinement.

If it were merely a simple choice of finding a murderer, for instance, either guilty and sending him to prison or finding him insane and sending him to a mental institution, such criticism would be muted. However, the decision is not always so clear-cut. A not unusual case, which occurred in California in 1976, involved a mother who had killed her baby in a religious frenzy. She pleaded guilty on the ground of insanity, a contention of considerable merit considering her many previous acts of crazed violence. It appeared logical that she would simply be sent to a mental institution when the judge accepted her plea. However, while a number of mental experts agreed the woman had been of unsound mind when she killed her infant, the preponderance of opinion on her "current condition" was that she was not certifiably insane. Under the circumstances, the judge was forced to release her and, legally, could not even require her to undergo psychiatric treatment.

Because of numerous publicized cases of this type, jurors have developed a form of "sophistication," rightly or wrongly, leading to their refusal in many cases to bring in a verdict of insanity for fear the defendant might at some later date be inflicted upon society again. As a result, several observers agree, obviously insane persons are being convicted and placed in prison, a terrible ordeal both for the person and the institution.

A typical example of this sort was mass murderer Herbert William Mullin, who, between October 1972 and February 1973, killed at least 13 persons. Mullin called his victims "sacrifices" and killed them because he was convinced their deaths were necessary to ward off a predicted cataclysmic earthquake in California. Mullin's record showed five previous hospital releases after he had voluntarily committed himself each time. The jurors were described as fearful of what would happen if they judged him insane and he was later discharged from the hospital for the sixth time. Consequently, they were said to have ignored all the evidence concerning his mental condition when they brought in a guilty verdict, requiring him to be sent to prison.

Perhaps because of this trend, the courts in recent years have become more concerned with protecting the rights of allegedly insane persons charged with crimes. Juan Corona was convicted in 1972 for the murders of 25 itinerant farm workers, whose mutilated bodies had been found in shallow graves in the peach orchards around Yuba City, Calif. However, in 1978 the courts ordered a new trial for Corona on the ground that his attorney had failed to provide him with proper representation. Corona had a history of hallucinations and mental illness, but his lawyer had refused a psychiatric examination for him and presented no witnesses on the subject of his mental state. The appeal judges made it clear they did not doubt the evidence against Corona, but ruled he was entitled to mental competency hearings. At the time of the ruling, a number of California legal authorities predicted Corona would never be returned to prison. He was sent to a mental institution but then retried, convicted and sent back to prison to serve 25 life sentences. Because of the state of the law on insanity questions, a number of new causes célèbres will no doubt emerge in the coming years.

Among the most grandiose swindlers of the 20th century, Samuel Insull built up a multibillion-dollar Midwest utility empire, one of the great financial marvels of the 1920s, by merging troubled small electric companies into an apparently smooth-running combine. He was hailed by the nation's press as the financial genius of the age, and lucky was the banker from whom Mr. Insull deigned to borrow money.

Clearly outdoing even Horatio Alger, Insull began his career as a 14-year-old dropout in his native London and rose to the pinnacle of high finance. He first worked as an office boy for $1.25 a week and later became a clerk for Thomas A. Edison's London agent. He was so impressive that he was recommended to Edison as a youth worth bringing to America, and the great inventor made him his secretary in 1881; Insull was 21 at the time.

Soon, Insull was handling the organization of several Edison companies, and by 1902 he was president of Chicago Edison. In 1907 he merged all the electric companies there into Commonwealth Edison. He then struck out on his own, joining small, often poorly run utilities into one operation. By the 1920s he was among the nation's richest men, worth $100 million, and people felt they were making the smartest investment in America when they purchased his stock.

The secret of Insull's success was to have one of his electric companies sell properties to another of his companies at a handsome profit over the original cost. The second company would not be hurt because it would later sell other properties to yet another Insull company. Thus, even in 1931, at the depths of the Depression, Insull's Middle West Utilities group reported the second most profitable year in its history. Of course, by this time Insull had to do more than sell properties to himself. He started cutting depreciation allowances in his various utilities or eliminating them entirely.

Then Insull had to spend huge sums—which he took in from gullible investors—to fight off takeover bids from other Wall Street operators eager to latch onto a strong financial organization. The problem was that if a takeover occurred the buyers would soon discover that Insull had done it all with mirrors. The swindler spent $60 million in the battle and won, but his financial empire was now so weak the bubble had to burst. The collapse came in June 1932, with investor losses estimated at $750 million.

Broke at the age of 72, Insull fled to Paris, where he lived on a yearly pension of $21,000 from a few companies of his that hadn't gone under. Facing extradition back to the United States on embezzlement and mail fraud charges, the old man left France and went to Greece. The Greek government let him stay a year but then bowed to U.S. pressure and ordered him out. For a time Insull drifted about the Mediterranean in a leased tramp steamer, but he finally had to put in at Istanbul for supplies. The Turks arrested him and shipped him back home for trial.

Because Insull's financial capers were so involved and often fell into areas where the law was not really clear, the government failed to prove its charges and he was able to go back to Paris. He dropped dead on a street there at the age of 78. At the time, he had assets of $1,000 cash and debts of $14 million.

Cases of “dead men” turning up alive are common in insurance company fraud files, although the industry has never seen the virtue of publishing any statistics on the subject. There is, of course, even less information on those who have gotten away with such fraud. One of the most publicized disappearance frauds of all was perpetrated in the 1930s by John H. Smith, who had once run for governor of Iowa. Smith made it look as if he had been burned to death in an auto accident, substituting an embalmed body in his fire-gutted car. Mrs. Smith later confessed her husband had faked his own death to fleece an insurance firm out of $60,000 stating, “Under our plan, I was to collect the insurance or accept it when the insurance company paid it to me, and then meet John when he got in communication with me, which might be from one to two years.”

Smith might have gotten away with his plot had he not developed a roving eye. He committed bigamy during his disappearance by marrying an 18-year-old Kansas farm girl. That was something Mrs. Smith hadn't agreed to, and since her wounded pride meant more to her than $60,000, she screamed for the law as soon as she learned what her husband had done.

Probably the longest successful insurance disappearance was pulled off by socially prominent Thomas C. Buntin of Nashville, Tenn. who vanished in 1931. Shortly thereafter, Buntin's 22-year-old secretary also disappeared. Buntin had $50,000 in insurance, and after waiting the customary seven years, the insurance company paid off the claim. However, the firm, New York Life, did not close the case. It kept up a search for Buntin, and in 1953—some 22 years after he vanished—the company found him living in Orange, Tex. with his ex-secretary under the name Thomas D. Palmer. For 22 years the couple had posed as Mr. and Mrs. Palmer and had even raised a family.

A trust fund had been established with the money from Buntin's insurance policy, and there was still $31,000 left when he turned up alive. The insurance company immediately launched legal action to get the money. As for Buntin, he obviously had not benefitted personally from the fraud. What was the reason? Very often a husband wishing to leave his wife and knowing he cannot expect a divorce will use a disappearing act to get out from under. Along with acquiring his freedom, the man can feel he has discharged all his duties as a husband and father by defrauding an insurance company into providing for his family. In the end, Buntin and his former secretary suffered no penalties from the law. In fact, after they were exposed, their neighbors sent them flowers.

Of course, producing a dead body will make a faked death even more convincing, but this often entails murder. In the 1930s Philadelphia's notorious Bolber-Petrillo murder ring specialized in killing off husbands so their wives could claim the insurance. Occasionally, they worked with a loving couple who wanted to enjoy the fruits of the husband's life insurance policy while he was still alive. In such cases the ring would kill an itinerant stranger and use him as a stand-in corpse for the husband.

Another famous insurance fraud murderer was Charles Henry Schwartz, a sort of mad scientist. When Schwartz ran his business into the ground in the 1920s, he looked for someone to use as a substitute corpse so that he could collect $200,000 in insurance. He settled on a traveling evangelist, Warren Gilbert Barbe, and murdered him in his Berkeley, Calif. laboratory. Since Barbe didn't look much like him, Schwartz worked hard on his substitute. Because Schwartz had a scar on his own chest, he burned away a section of Barbe's chest. He pulled out two teeth from the murdered man's upper jaw to match his own missing teeth. To take care of the difference in eye color between the two, Schwartz punctured his victim's eyeballs, and then for added protection, he blew up the laboratory. Despite all this, the corpse was soon identified as someone other than Schwartz and the latter was exposed. To avoid imprisonment he committed suicide.

Beyond doubt the prize victim of all insurance swindles was a beautiful but gullible model named Marie Defenbach. She was persuaded by a Dr. August M. Unger to join him and two accomplices in a fraud in which she was to take out $70,000 worth of life insurance and then fake her own death. The men were to be her beneficiaries and were to give her half the money. Dr. Unger assured Marie he would personally handle her "demise." He would give her a special medicine of his own that would induce a deathlike sleep. Later, the doctor convinced her, she would be revived in the back room of an undertaking establishment and spirited away, with an unclaimed body left in her place for cremation. If Marie had had any sense, she would have realized that it would save the man a lot of bother and money if they just fed her some old-fashioned poison. But Marie was already mentally counting her loot.

On the evening of August 25, 1900, Marie blithely informed her Chicago landlady she was feeling ill, and she sent a messenger to get her some medicine. Fifteen minutes after taking it, she died in terrible agony. In due course, the true nature of Marie's death was uncovered by a suspicious uncle, whose investigation finally led to the arrest and conviction of the culprits.

In a curious sidelight to insurance frauds, the man responsible for the fact that few insurance company investigators carry weapons while on the job was a New Jersey man named J. R. Barlow, who had a wife and a $200,000 life insurance policy. One day he swam out from a beach and never swam back. His wife reported him as missing and applied for the insurance. The insurance company was suspicious, however, and after an intensive investigation traced Barlow to Mexico. When he was confronted by an insurance agent, Barlow turned violent, and in the ensuing struggle the investigator was forced to shoot him. Ironically, the insurance company was then compelled to pay off on his death. Soon after, the company issued a rule forbidding investigators to carry weapons.

Internet crime keyboards beat guns

A 28-year-old Los Gatos, Calif. woman suddenly discovered she was much "richer" than she thought. She possessed a new $22,000 Jeep, five credit cards, an apartment and a $3,000 loan listed in her name. The trouble was she never asked for any of it. It turned out the woman had been a victim of "identity theft" via the Internet.

Another woman was impersonating her. All the second woman needed was to get hold of the woman's employee-benefits form and it was shopping time. The victim spent months and months straightening out the mess. There were scores of angry phone calls, court appearances and lots of legal expenses. And she constantly had to demonstrate she was the real her, rather than her impersonator!

Internet identity theft is getting to be a very common crime, committed by very sophisticated swindlers. One expert calls it “the next growth industry in crime.” All a crook has to do is have a keyboard—no guns necessary. All he or she needs is your full name or Social Security number to access Internet databases that spew out your address, phone number, name of employer or driver’s license. Then they use your good name to get great credit, and leave you to explain later if you can.

Everyone notes how amazingly the Internet is growing. Well so is Internet fraud. The Internet Fraud Watch, operated by the National Consumers League, reports that complaints from 1997 to early 1999 shot up by an astonishing 600 percent. The number one complaint involves auctions. In 1997 auctions made up 26 percent of the total frauds reported, and the following year increased to 68 percent. The top auction companies work with authorities to try to cut auction scams, but the fact is as a Internet Fraud Watch spokesperson notes, “More people are online, and more people are being scammed. Consumers need to remember that con artists are everywhere—even in cyberspace.”

While most frauds on the Internet are in auctions, many consumers do well in auctions, but with the traffic soaring the need for consumer protection and increased education is a must.

The top 10 scams on the Internet in order are auctions, general merchandise sales, computer equipment and software, Internet services, work-at-home, business opportunities and franchises, multilevel marketing and pyramids, credit card offers, advance fee loans and employment offers.

Anyone can be a target for Internet frauds, even those who don’t have a computer. Hacker programs have turned up on the Web allowing people to generate credit card numbers using the same algorithms as the ones used by banks. Crooks open accounts with created numbers and then order products on-line—without even having the plastic.

In some cases consumers using auto-buying services have paid money on the assumption the service will search auctions looking for the car they want. Result: no car and no money back.

Irving, Clifford (1930–) Howard Hughes book forger
In 1971 writer Clifford Irving pulled off what was undoubtedly the most celebrated literary hoax of the 20th century when he swindled the McGraw-Hill Book Co. out of $765,000 for a fake autobiography of billionaire recluse Howard R. Hughes. Irving also conned Life magazine, which planned to print excerpts of the book with 20 pages of handwritten letters by Hughes. After examining the letters, a number of handwriting experts had declared all of them to be genuine.

Together with a friend who was a children’s book author, Richard Suskind, Irving wrote an engrossing 1,200 page book, which veteran newsmen who had long covered the enigmatic Hughes found to be most “authentic.” The scheme was so daring and so outrageous it was widely accepted even after Hughes said in a telephone call from his hideaway in the Bahamas that he had never met with Irving and that the work was “totally fantastic fiction.” Irving’s hoax was finally wrecked when a Swiss bank broke its vow of secrecy to reveal that a $650,000 check from the book publisher to Hughes had been cashed in one Swiss bank by “H. R. Hughes” and deposited in another under the name “Helga R. Hughes”—actually Irving’s wife.

On March 13, 1972 Irving pleaded guilty to federal conspiracy charges. He was forced to return what was left of the publisher's money and was sentenced to two and a half years in prison. He served 17 months.

In 1977 Irving was asked by the editors of the Book of Lists to compile a list of the 10 best forgers of all time. He listed Clifford Irving as number nine.

Israel, Harold (1901–?) wrong man

One of America's most famous "wrong man" murder cases wrecked the elective political career of a prosecutor named Homer S. Cummings in the 1920s. The case was the murder of a popular minister in Bridgeport, Conn.

In 1924 an unidentified person shot Father Hubert Dahme, pastor of St. Joseph's Episcopal Church, in the back of the head, throwing the city into an uproar. Both the city government and a local newspaper offered rewards, and the public demanded the police come up with a solution to the crime. This they appeared to do by arresting an itinerant young man, 23-year-old Harold Israel. After many hours of questioning, Israel made a confession. He later tried to retract it, but there was no denying that when apprehended, he had been carrying a gun of the same caliber as the murder weapon. In addition, police had the testimony of a ballistic expert that Israel's gun had been the murder weapon.

Since Father Dahme was one of Bridgeport's most popular citizens, the pressure on prosecutor Cummings was enormous. There was press speculation that a conviction in the case would earn the state's attorney a sure nomination for governor. Cummings was a former chairman of the Democratic National Committee, keynote speaker at the 1920 national convention in San Francisco and, indeed, Connecticut's favorite son for the presidential nomination. Under the circumstances, it would have been quite logical for Cummings to have accepted the sure conviction handed him. Amazingly, he did not.

Even though the public defender announced that Israel would plead guilty by reason of insanity, Cummings had strong misgivings about the case. The prosecution regarded some of the witnesses who had sworn Israel was the priest's killer as less than reliable. When he checked the area where the murder had occurred and where the witnesses said they had been standing, he determined it would have been too dark for them to recognize anyone. Cummings also had his doubts about the ballistics expert, who struck him as overly anxious to help the police solve the crime. He asked six other experts in the field to make their own findings without telling any of them that others were doing the same work. All six agreed that Israel's gun had not fired the fatal bullet.

When Israel's case came to trial, Cummings made an opening presentation outlining the findings that had weakened the prosecution's case. He then calmly proceeded to load the so-called murder gun. He aimed it downward at a 45° angle—the position the murder gun had been in—and pulled the trigger. Nothing happened. The gun, Cummings explained, had a defective firing pin and would not fire when held in that particular position.

On Cummings' motion, Israel was released. The prosecutor personally escorted the happy youth to the train station and saw him off to his home in Pennsylvania. It's possible that Cummings felt his presence was necessary to keep the police from rearresting Israel.

Years later, the Israel case was made into a movie called Boomerang. While Cummings won considerable praise in many circles for his work in the case, he did not get quite as much as he deserved in his native state. When Israel was cleared, Cummings' chance for the governorship fizzled. In 1933, however, he was named by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to be attorney general. As for Israel himself, he faded into obscurity, to which Cummings felt he was entitled. Still, Cummings wondered if his clearing of the young man had paid off and in the late 1930s he ordered the FBI to make a secret check on him. The agency reported that Israel was a respectable miner in Pennsylvania, a married man, the father of two children and a pillar of the Methodist Church.

Italian Dave gang 19th-century New York pickpocket gang

From the 1840s to the 1860s the most notorious Fagin in America was the New York criminal mastermind named Italian Dave. He always had some 40 or so boys aged nine to 15 whom he instructed in the art of pickpocketing and sneak thievery. He provided the boys with room and board in an old tenement on Paradise Square and conducted daily classes in various techniques of theft. They were shown how to pinch articles from store windows and counters, how to beg and, with the aid of fully dressed dummies of men and women in various positions, how to pick pockets and snatch purses and muffs. Whenever a boy fumbled his assignment, Italian Dave would ceremoniously dress himself in a policeman's uniform and work him over with a nightstick. Other thieves and gangs would rent out squads of boys for specific criminal assignments such as lookouts, with all money paid directly to Italian Dave.

Dave took advanced students out into the streets himself and would point out victims to be robbed, observing his pupils' modus operandi with a most critical eye. When a student failed to use a club on a mugging victim with sufficient stunning effect, Italian Dave would step forward and demonstrate how to do it properly. His most apt pupils deserted him within a couple of years because he was so miserly, giving them only pennies out of what they stole. However, long after Italian Dave passed from the scene, his pupils continued to benefit from his harsh lessons; among his students were master pickpockets Blind Mahoney and Jimmy Dunnigan and the redoubtable gang leader Jack Mahaney, who later became known as the American version of Jack Sheppard, the famous British escape artist, because of his ability to escape from custody.

Izzy and Moe revenue agents

Prohibition brought many things to the American scene: speakeasies, rot-gut liquor, gangsters, hijacking and "the ride." But Prohibition had its comic side as well, as demonstrated by the merry antics of those dry clowns Izzy and Moe. They were the greatest and wackiest Prohibition agents of all time and they fit right into the Roaring Twenties. The newspapers gave front-page coverage to their capers, one joyously announcing, "IZZY IS BIZZY AND SO IS MOE." Hundreds of hilarious newspaper stories were written about the pair, and a great many of them were no doubt true.

In 1920 Isadore Einstein was a short, smiling cherub of 225 pounds who worked as a clerk for the New York Post Office. Previously, he had been a dry goods salesman. One day Izzy showed up at the Federal Prohibition Bureau headquarters and announced his availability. That got a laugh. "Izzy," one official said, "you don't even look like a Prohibition agent." On reflection, it was decided that Izzy might thus be handy to have around, and he got the job. A product of the polyglot Lower East Side, he could speak fluent Yiddish, Hungarian, Polish, German and Italian.

Bureau officials figured the worst that could happen was that a few tough assignments would send Izzy in hasty retreat back to the post office. They decided to send him out to hit a 52nd Street speakeasy. A dozen agents had previously tried and failed to bust the place. A few had gotten past the front door, but they were served nothing stronger than beer because they couldn't produce a regular customer as a sponsor.

Izzy talked his way into the speakeasy, waddled up to the bar, plunked down his newly acquired badge and said to the bartender, "How about a good stiff drink for a thirsty revenue agent?"

Bizzy Izzy and Moe, as the newspapers dubbed them, were the clown princes of Prohibition enforcement, using many disguises to make their busts.

The bartender nearly doubled up with laughter. "Get a load of this funny fat man!" he called to his customers. Then, fingering Izzy's badge, he asked, "Where did you buy this?"

"Give me a drink and I'll take you to the place sometime," Izzy replied.

The bartender obliged. So did Izzy. He took the man down to the Revenue Office.

Izzy's superiors were stunned . . . and immediately assigned him to another tough case. Izzy made that pinch as well.

After a few weeks on the job, Izzy started to miss his old coffeehouse buddy, Moe Smith. He asked if they had a job for Moe as well. The only trouble was, Izzy noted, that Moe didn't look like an agent either; he was fat like Izzy. Moe got the job, and the pair worked as a team, a sort of Laurel and Hardy of the Revenuers—except both were Hardy. They were so effective that some speakeasies posted pictures of the two, but that proved futile. The pair disguised themselves with false whiskers and noses. On occasion they wore blackface. Once, they donned football uniforms to bust a joint serving the thirsty athletes playing in Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx. To crack a Coney Island speakeasy in midwinter, Izzy went swimming with a polar bear cub and was then carried quivering into the establishment by a solicitous Moe. “Quick,” Moe cried, “some liquor before he freezes to death.” A tenderhearted bartender complied and was arrested.

Another time, the pair marched into a speakeasy arguing loudly about the name of a particular revenue sleuth. Was it Einstein or Epstein? The bartender agreed it was Einstein. Nonsense, said Izzy, and bet the bartender double the price for two drinks. The bartender won the bet and got pinched.

Because they needed to produce liquor served them as proof of a crime, Izzy and Moe designed special funnels to be strapped inside their vests. One time, they started out at 5 A.M. and made 24 arrests by 9 A.M., just working up an appetite for breakfast. The pair’s all-time record was 65 raids in one day. Their standard line when making a pinch was “Dere’s sad news here.” Over a five-year period their combined score was 5 million bottles of liquor confiscated, 4,392 persons arrested and convictions achieved in 95 percent of their cases, which was 20 percent of all the successful illegal liquor prosecutions in the New York district. Everybody loved Izzy-and-Moe stories. Stanley Walker once said, “Izzy and Moe almost made prohibition popular.”

Once Izzy met his namesake—Albert Einstein. He asked him what he did for a living. “I discover stars in the sky,” the scientist replied. “I’m a discoverer too,” Izzy said, “only I discover in the basements.”

Izzy and Moe became so famous that other bureaus began asking for the pair’s help in busting some problem spots in their cities. In Pittsburgh they made a pinch within 11 minutes of leaving the train depot. In Atlanta it took 17 minutes, and Chicago and St. Louis, 21. They set their record in New Orleans: 35 seconds.

Unfortunately, Izzy and Moe were called on the carpet often because of their penchant for publicity. They were warned that the service had to be dignified in its procedures. Finally, in November 1925 the boys turned in their badges. Izzy explained, “I fired myself,” because they were to be transferred away from their beloved New York to the wilds of Chicago. Bureau officials insisted they had been dismissed “for the good of the service.”

Both men went into the insurance business and soon numbered among their clients many of the people they had arrested for liquor violations. Izzy even published an autobiography, Prohibition Agent Number 1, which didn’t sell very well. It seemed the public had had enough of Prohibition.

Jackson, Andrew victim of assassination attempt

On January 3, 1835 the first attempt on the life of a United States president took place when Andrew Jackson was attacked in the rotunda of the Capitol while attending the funeral of a South Carolina congressman, Warren Ransom Davis. A house painter named Richard Lawrence stepped up to President Jackson and, at a distance of 6 feet, fired two pistols at him. Both misfired and Jackson's would-be slayer was seized. Lawrence, who believed he was the rightful heir to the English throne, was committed to an insane asylum.

Among authorities on the subject, there are those who say that Eddie Jackson was the most proficient pickpocket America has ever produced. Jackson lifted his first poke when he was 14 and is said to have been the greatest “kiss-the-sucker” operator of all times. Kissing the sucker is walking right up to the victim, bumping him in front and lifting his wallet from his inside coat pocket in one quick motion. It is not a technique that many pickpockets, or “dips,” like to employ since there are far easier and safer methods. Of course, Jackson used other techniques as well. Generally operating with three or four accomplices, he would use his nimble fingers to lift a victim's money while the others jostled him and diverted his attention. He usually worked Chicago's Loop district, often making as much as $1,500 a week, an incredible sum for the 1890s and early 1900s.

Jackson kept a famous lawyer and politician, Black Horton, on retainer, and when he and his mob were working, they would report to Horton every hour. Whenever they failed to report, Horton immediately hurried to the police station with bail money and a writ of habeas corpus. Over a career that spanned 40 years, Jackson was arrested some 2,000 times. Pickpockets are subject to frequent arrests, especially on loitering charges but he generally avoided prosecution by giving back a portion of his loot. He was only convicted twice, sentenced once to 10 days and another time to a year. In later years the “Jackson touch” abandoned him, and he died a pauper in 1932.

Jackson, Frank (1856–?) Texas outlaw

In the folklore of Texas outlaws, Frank Jackson is remembered for his refusal to betray his legendary outlaw chief, Sam Bass, and perhaps more important, as a man whose loyalty was probably rewarded with the secret of Bass' hidden treasure troves.

Born in Llano County, Texas, in 1856 and orphaned when he was seven, Jackson grew up with relatives, training as a tinsmith. The occupation held little attraction for the youth, and by 1876 he was working as a cowhand at the Murphy Ranch in Denton County. From time to time, the Murphys harbored the notorious outlaw Sam Bass. Making the outlaw's acquaintance, Jackson quickly enlisted in the gang, thereafter taking part in all the gang's Texas train robberies.

Bass accumulated a considerable amount of his loot in the form of $20 gold pieces and buried it in several places in the hills and hollows northwest of Dallas. Frank Jackson's last ride with Sam Bass occurred in July 1878, when he, Bass and Seaborn Barnes attempted to hold up a small bank in Round Rock. They were betrayed by another gang member, Jim Murphy of the ranching family. Barnes was killed and Bass badly wounded in the ensuing gun battle. With Jackson's help Bass was able to ride out of town. The next day trackers found Bass dying in a woodland. For 24 hours lawmen questioned the outlaw, trying to get him to reveal his accomplices on various robberies and the hiding places of his loot before he died. Bass kept his silence to the end, and Frank Jackson was never seen again. The circumstances fueled speculation in Texas cow country that Bass must have encouraged the steadfast Jackson to leave him to die and told him where the gang's accumulated loot had been buried. Jackson was presumed to have retired from the outlaw trail a wealthy man.

Jackson, Humpty (?–1914) New York gang leader and murderer

One of New York's most feared gang leaders at the turn of the century, Humpty Jackson was an odd combination of cold-blooded murderer and bibliophile. A man with a superior education, although a hazy past, he bossed some 50 gangsters, many of whom later became notorious in their own right. Among them were Spanish Louie, Nigger Ruhl, the Grabber and the Lobster Kid.

Humpty was never without a book on his person. His favorite writers were Voltaire, Darwin, Huxley and Spencer, and he often read various tomes in Greek and Latin. His scholarly pursuits, however, did not carry over into his professional life, which was thoroughly dedicated to crime. He always carried three revolvers on his person—one in his pocket, another slung under his hunchback, which is why he was called Humpty, and the third in a special holder in his derby hat.

Jackson’s headquarters was an old graveyard between First and Second Avenues bound by 12th and 13th Streets. Sitting on a tombstone, he would dispense criminal assignments to his thugs. If a customer wanted someone blackjacked or otherwise assaulted, he or she simply approached Humpty, and for $100, in the case of blackjacking, he would see the job was done. Naturally, Jackson never soiled his own hands on such chores but merely handed them out to one of his men. Similarly, he would plan burglaries or warehouse lootings but seldom lead the forays himself. Nevertheless, Jackson was a man with a volatile temper who committed many acts of violence, which earned him more than 20 arrests and convictions. In 1909 he was sentenced to 20 years for ordering the execution of a man he’d never met. He died behind bars in 1914.

Jackson, Mary Jane “Bricktop” (1836–?) female ruffian and murderess

Nicknamed Bricktop because of her flaming red hair, Mary Jane Jackson was reputedly the most vicious street criminal, male or female, New Orleans has ever produced. Any number of the Live Oak gangsters, the city’s toughest gang, backed off from confrontations with her. In about a decade of battling, Bricktop Jackson never lost a fight, killed four men and sent at least two dozen more to the hospital, from which many emerged permanently maimed. When she took up living with a notorious criminal named John Miller, the pair became known as New Orleans’ toughest couple.

Born on Girod Street in 1836, Bricktop, a husky, well-endowed girl, became a prostitute at age 13. The next year she attained a measure of security when a saloon keeper took her as his mistress. When he tired of her after three years and threw her out, she charged into his saloon and gave him a fearsome beating, sending him to the hospital minus an ear and most of his nose. Bricktop then entered a Dauphine Street whorehouse, where, while she gained a following with the customers, she terrified the other girls. She was turned out of the Dauphine Street establishment and subsequently, several other brothels. Bricktop was headed for the dance halls of New Orleans’ toughest thoroughfare, Gallatin Street, and got a job with the redoubtable Archie Murphy in his notorious Dance-House. Nothing was considered too rough for Murphy’s place, but Bricktop Jackson proved the exception to the rule. She had to be forcibly evicted from there as well as many other tough dance houses, whose owners had foolishly thought they could control her. Bricktop finally became a freelance prostitute and street mugger. In 1856 she killed her first man and in 1857 her second; one had called her a “whore” and gotten clubbed to death for the insult, and the other, Long Charley, had been cut down with Bricktop’s made-to-order knife following an argument over which way he would fall if stabbed (the nearly 7-foot-tall Charley was reported to have fallen forward when Bricktop tested her hypothesis).

One of Bricktop’s more famous murders occurred on November 7, 1859, when she visited a beer garden with two other vicious vixens, America Williams and Ellen Collins. A man at the next table, Laurent Fleury, objected to Bricktop’s language and told her to shut up. Bricktop cursed even more and threatened to cut Fleury’s heart out. Fleury, who had not recognized the scourge of Gallatin Street, slapped her. In a second the three women were all over him, and the luckless Fleury disappeared in a mass of flailing hands, swirling skirts and flashing knives. Joe Seidensahl, the owner of the beer garden, tried to come to his rescue but was driven back, severely cut up. A Seidensahl employee shot at the women from a second-floor window, but they drove him off with a barrage of bricks. By the time the police arrived, they found Fleury dead and his pants pocket cut out. The pocket, with money still inside, was found tucked under Bricktop’s skirt. She was locked up in Parish Prison but eventually freed when an autopsy failed to show the victim’s cause of death. Bricktop’s lawyer contended he had died of heart disease.

It was in Parish Prison that Bricktop Jackson met a man who was, for the time, the love of her life, a jailer and ex-criminal named John Miller. The pair became a colorful item, even by Gallatin Street standards. Miller had lost an arm in a previous escapade and now walked about with a chain and iron ball attached to his stump, which made an awesome weapon. The couple supported themselves by close teamwork based on their respective skills. Bricktop would start up a romance with a stranger in a French Quarter dive and repair to the back streets with him. The man would end up with a very sore skull, no recollection of what happened and empty pockets.

The romance between Bricktop and Miller was marred by a dispute over who was the master of their nest. One day in 1861 Miller came home and decided to bullwhip Bricktop into subservience. She snatched the whip away from him, however, and gave him a bloody beating. He lashed out with his iron ball but she seized the chain in midair and began dragging him around the room. Miller pulled out a knife and slashed at Bricktop, who bit the knife free, grabbed it and then stabbed her lover five times. It was a fatal end to their relationship and one that caused Bricktop to be sent to prison for 10 years. She was released after only nine months when Gen. George F. Shepley, the military governor of the state, practically emptied the penitentiary with blanket pardons. Upon her release, Bricktop Jackson disappeared from New Orleans, a loss that went totally unlamented by honest and dishonest citizens alike.

Jackson-Dickinson duel

In the famous, or infamous, duel between Andrew Jackson and Charles Dickinson in 1806, there was no quarter given. Although Dickinson was considered to be the best shot in Tennessee, Jackson had challenged him after he had made disparaging remarks about Jackson's wife, Rachel. The duel was fought at a range of 24 feet. Dickinson got off the first shot, which crashed into Jackson's chest, missing his heart by only an inch. Blood gushed through his clothes, but Jackson managed to keep his feet, though unsteadily. He took dead aim at Dickinson, who broke and ran from the line of fire. The seconds ordered Dickinson back to his previous position, as the dueling code required, and he stood awaiting Jackson's shot with his arms crossed to protect his heart. Jackson aimed a bit lower at his target and fired, hitting Dickinson in the groin. Death came slowly and excruciatingly to Dickinson. Jackson carried the lead ball he had received until the end of his days, it being too close to the heart to be removed.

jailhouse shopping network convict's credit card con Credit card fraud is a billion-dollar business, but there are some frauds, in a manner of speaking, more fraudulent than others. That is perhaps the only way to describe the scam that became known as the "nationwide jailhouse shopping network" in the early 1990s. It was conceived in Miami's Dade County jail, where there was a legal requirement that inmates be provided with access to telephones. The scam was thought up by Danny Ferris, a shrewd con man convicted of murder who, for more than four years, made local calls and 1-800 calls free of charge.

What Ferris did was simply order all sorts of merchandise over the telephone and steal an estimated $2 million in that fashion. It turned out that Ferris' accomplices on the outside provided him with hundreds of credit card numbers (retrieved from hotel dumpsters and the like), and the convict in turn used the numbers to order from catalogs by telephone. He arranged to have the goods delivered overnight to his accomplices who then sold the goods and split the profits with Ferris. Ferris ordered incredible numbers of video camcorders, Rolex watches, champagne, gourmet gift baskets and gold and silver coins and raked in a fortune.

Later he admitted to interviewers, "I split right half with everybody. I mean, I never took more than half. I got robbed a lot, but, again, you kind of take it on the chin. You know what I mean? It was like you said, 'Heck, it was all free.'"

When at last Ferris was exposed, jail officials found they could not legally deprive him of his phone rights. They did, however, raid his cell and confiscate hundreds of credit card numbers.

That failed to knock Ferris out of business, as he managed to salvage a single number and used it to order a newspaper ad and a telephone answering service. He ran the ad in USA Today offering, "Cosmetics package, $89.95 value for only $19.95. All major credit cards accepted. Please call Regina Donovan Cosmetics." Danny supplied a 1-800 number but never sold any cosmetics. But he got what he really was after—a brand new batch of credit card numbers.

Eventually Danny Ferris was sentenced to five years for credit card fraud. Since that was in addition to the life sentence he was already serving, that hardly upset him. However, he was transferred to a tougher Florida state prison, where more stringent controls were placed on telephone calls. Meanwhile, back at Dade County jail it was discovered that other inmates were pulling Danny's surefire scam, one con even operated in the departed Danny's personal cell. Finally after the CBS television program 60 Minutes featured the case, Dade County jail officials removed the in-cell telephones, requiring prisoners to make their calls in open corridors and the like, figuring that would put a serious crimp in their operations.

Without the old master's tutelage, the restrictions appeared to work.

James brothers

The James brothers, especially Jesse, who was born in 1847, were probably the best-known outlaws in America, leading a gang of robbers from 1866 to 1882, when Jesse was assassinated for the reward on his head. Since then his niche in American folklore has remained secure, perhaps typified by a ballad that surfaced instantly after his death. It started:

*Jesse James was a lad who killed many a man.
He robbed the Glendale train.
He stole from the rich and he gave to the poor.
He'd a hand and a heart and a brain.*

Jesse James was the American version of Robin Hood, as the loving tales told about him reveal. He was the holdup man who stole money from the wicked banker about to foreclose and gave it to the poor widow to pay off her mortgage (and then—perhaps to embellish the fantasy—he restole the money from the banker). He fought for the oppressed, saved the frail from the bully and so on. But the truth is that he and his brother Frank, four years his elder, never once gave a penny to the poor. What they stole they kept. They were ruthless, desperate men who killed anyone who got in their way.

Yet they were popular. Reflecting the political alignment of a border state in the aftermath of the Civil War, Jesse became a hero to the defeated Rebels and those who had sympathized with the South and was invariably described as having been driven to his crimes because of persecution of Northerners, particularly businessmen. Ex-Unionists and abolitionists called the Jameses and their frequent allies, the Youngers, murderers and thieves and said they were deserving of hanging.

The James boys were born in Clay County, Mo., the sons of a preacher, the Rev. Robert James, who died when Jesse was three. During the Civil War, Frank joined Quantrill's Raiders and continued to ride with him even after it became apparent he was nothing more than a plunderer and butcher. In 1864, at the age of 17, Jesse hooked up with Confederate guerrillas under Bloody Bill Anderson and took part in the Centralia massacre that year, in which he is reputed to have brutally murdered a Union officer.

Jesse came out of the war badly wounded and was nursed back to health by a cousin, Zerelda Mimms, whom he would eventually marry. Even though the conflict was over, neither the James boys nor Cole Younger and his brothers saw any reason to stop their looting. They formed a gang and robbed $17,000 from a bank in Liberty, Mo. on February 13, 1866, killing a bystander in the process. It is known that they committed a number of additional bank robberies, but later practically every bank job in Missouri from 1866 to 1869 was attributed to them. There is no doubt that the James-Younger gang robbed the bank at Gallatin in 1869, since all of them were well identified. After that, they ranged as far afield as Alabama and Iowa. Jesse often provided a touch of verve to the capers. Once, they hit a bank while a political rally was taking place, and Jesse, on the way out, stopped in front of the crowd and earnestly informed them he thought there might be something wrong back at the bank. Perhaps their most audacious outing occurred at a fair in Kansas City where Jesse and his men rode right up into a crowd of 10,000 people and robbed the box office of $10,000. Many persons thought it was all part of the show until a little girl was shot.

What made the James boys popular in much of Missouri was their harassment of railroad officials, perhaps the most hated group in the state because of their seizure of private lands under condemnation orders, for which they paid a mere pittance. The gang's first known train robbery was in 1873, when they derailed the Chicago and Rock Island express near Adair, Iowa. As happened during many of their jobs, someone died during the holdup, in this case the engineer when the train derailed.

The James-Younger move into train robberies put them in the big time and the Pinkertons on their trail. In January 1875, the Pinkertons were convinced the

The alliance between the James brothers and the Youngers eventually foundered over Jesse's readiness to sacrifice any member of the gang as the price for escape.

James brothers were holed up in their mother's home and laid siege to it. In an effort to flush them out, the detectives threw in a bomb—the agency later insisted it was only a flare—and when the smoke cleared, Frank and Jesse's nine-year-old brother, Archie, was dead and their mother, Mrs. Zerelda Samuels, had had most of her right arm blown off. The incident stoked great resentment toward the Pinkertons and brought forth a rash of sympathy for the James boys, not only in Missouri but throughout the country. Lost in the shuffle of support for the outlaws was any recollection of their own long list of victims. The bungling Pinkertons had done as much as anybody to make them respectable.

In 1876 disaster struck the gang when they attempted to rob the First National Bank of Northfield, Minn. Of the eight gang members, including the James brothers and three Younger brothers, only Jesse and Frank escaped when things went wrong and the citizenry came out shooting. The rest were either killed or captured there or in the ensuing chase.

For the next three years the James boys were relatively inactive, living off accumulated loot, but in 1879 Jesse reconstituted the gang. Although he didn't feel comfortable with some of the new men, including Bob and Charles Ford, he made do. After two more murders by the gang in 1881, the state of Missouri posted $5,000 rewards on each of the James brothers. The Fords then made a deal with Gov. Thomas Crittenden to assassinate Jesse James for a $10,000 reward.

On April 3, 1882 Jesse summoned the Fords to his home in St. Joseph, where he was living under the name of Howard, to plan their next job. When Jesse climbed up on a chair to straighten a picture, Bob Ford shot him dead.

The James legend didn't die with Jesse. He was lionized by much of the press. The Kansas City Journal headlined his death with a mournful farewell: "GOOD-BYE JESSE."

He was buried in a corner of his mother's yard and later an inscription was put on the marker:

*Jesse W. James,
Died April 3, 1882.
Aged 34 years, six months, 28 days.
Murdered by a coward whose name is not worthy to appear here.*

Of course, few killers ever get their names inscribed on the headstones of their victims. But no matter, a legend was being constructed, one that continues to the present day.

In October 1882 Frank James, tired of running, walked into Gov. Crittenden's office and surrendered his guns. He too was now part of the legend, and he was treated like one. Mobs cheered him as he stood on train platforms during a trip back to Clay County to stand trial for a couple of murders. The authorities were wasting their time; there was no way Frank James was going to be convicted. He was then shipped to Alabama to stand trial for a robbery charge but was found not guilty. Missouri tried again on another robbery count. Again he went free.

Thereafter Frank James lived in retirement from crime, working at a number of jobs, such as a horse race starter, shoe salesman and farmer. He died in 1915, a much respected citizen.

James, Jesse—impostors

Almost from the time Jesse James was laid in his grave, impostors came forth claiming to be the real Jesse James, insisting he hadn't been shot at all. Most were proven liars and disappeared. Oddly, the last one seemed to be the most convincing. In 1948 a man named J. Frank Dalton, citing his age at 101, claimed to be the real Jesse James. At the time he was bedridden in Lawton, Okla.

Rudy Turilli, a noted authority on Jesse James, asserted that Bob Ford hadn't killed Jesse but rather another member of the gang, Charlie Bigelow. According to this theory, Bigelow looked like Jesse, having often passed himself off as the famous outlaw. He was due for extinction anyway because he was suspected of being an informer. Among those involved in the hoax, said Turilli, were James' mother and wife, the Ford brothers, and even Gov. Thomas Crittenden, who, he alleged, was a longtime friend of the James family.

In 1966 Turilli published a booklet, in cooperation with the Jesse James Museum of Stanton, Mo. entitled I Knew Jesse James, relating how he had found Dalton in Oklahoma through a tip. Turilli rounded up two of Jesse's old cronies: 108-year-old James R. Davis, a former U.S. marshal, and 111-year-old John Trammell, a black who had cooked for the James gang. Both men identified Dalton as Jesse James. Dalton was interviewed by dozens of reporters; writer Robert Ruark spent three days with Dalton and the other old-timers and was absolutely convinced that Dalton was no hoaxer.

One of those not convinced was Homer Croy, among the more reliable Jesse James' biographers. He visited Dalton before the old man had a chance to school himself on all the details of Jesse's life that unbelievers might ask about. When Croy asked him who or what was Red Fox, Dalton identified the name as that of a scout for Quantrill, a part Indian. Actually, Red Fox was Jesse's race horse.

The real stumbling block, however, was the fact that the tip of Dalton's left-hand middle finger was intact. Supposedly, Jesse accidentally had blown part of that finger off while cleaning his pistol during the period in the Civil War when he rode with Bloody Bill Anderson, though some experts are unsure whether the fingertip was really shot off or not. Turilli challenged anyone to produce a photo of Jesse showing a missing fingertip. Probably because of the dearth of photographs of Jesse James, the challenge went unanswered. However, at the coroner's inquest into Jesse James' death, several witnesses testified they recognized the dead man as James, including Sheriff James H. Timberlake of Clay County, who knew well what Jesse looked like. Timberlake, who had last seen the outlaw in 1870, said he recognized Jesse's face. And he stated, "He had the second joint of his third finger shot off, by which I also recognize him." Other witnesses besides Timberlake mentioned the missing part of the finger.

J. Frank Dalton died on August 16, 1951, just short of Jesse James' 104th birthday.

Jennings, Al (1864–1961) alleged outlaw

One of the classic frauds in American crime writing is the effort to paint Al Jennings as the "last of the Western outlaws." He was not, despite a famous lurid article on his career in the Saturday Evening Post and a Hollywood movie about him and the so-called Al Jennings gang, whose rampage one authority described as "the shortest and funniest on record."

Jennings grew up one of the four sons of a frontier judge in the Oklahoma Territory. In later years he said he began his life of crime at the age of 16, but we have only his word for it. No court or law enforcement records list any charges against him or against his brothers, who, he stated were his partners in crime. The fact that all four were admitted to the bar tends to cast suspicion on Jennings' later claims. Two of his brothers did end up in a murderous affair, but as victims rather than perpetrators. Ed and John Jennings got into a saloon dispute with flamboyant lawman-gunman Temple Houston in 1894. Ed was shot dead while John was badly wounded and died a short time later.

People who didn't know Al Jennings—and thus were unaware that he was a notoriously poor shot—expected him to go after Houston. He never did. Instead, he and brother Frank hit the outlaw trail together with three stumblebums. The road agents "ran riot" for 109 days, during which they abandoned two efforts to hold up trains before finally robbing a Rock Island train on October 1, 1897. This achievement, on which Jennings subsequently built his reputation, netted the five outlaws $60 apiece. Four of the gang, including Al and Frank Jennings, were arrested single-handedly by lawman Bud Ledbetter without firing a shot. When he cornered the two brothers, he told them to drop their guns and tie themselves up. They did.

For their trivial crime the Jennings brothers got life sentences, this was a period when long sentences were meted out and later reduced (the pardon business was thriving and lucrative). Al did five years and Frank seven. After that, both returned to the straight life, Al even running unsuccessfully for governor of Oklahoma. He also hit the lecture circuit, far from Oklahoma, where folks knew better about his wild and wooly past. The Post article eased his way into Hollywood, where filmmakers and afterward, the filmgoers simply ate up the tales of his fanciful life of crime. Highly intelligent, Jennings proved a huge success as both an author and a film producer.

In 1948 Jennings was able to carry his outlaw hoax a little further. In that year 101-year-old J. Frank Dalton turned up, announcing he was the real Jesse James. He was brought together with 85-year-old Jennings, who said: "Boys, there isn't a bit of doubt on earth. It's him. It's Jesse James." Of course, Jennings had never even met Jesse James. It was the reverse side of the pot calling the kettle black. When he died in 1961, the obituary writers paid due tribute to Al Jennings, "last of the Western outlaws."

Jewett, Helen (1813–1836) murder victim

The murder of Helen Jewett in 1836 remains one of New York's most infamous unsolved cases, particularly since it was all too evident that the public didn't want the case solved. Helen Jewett at the time was the city's most desirable and most sought-after prostitute, always the "star woman" in whatever scarlet establishment she deigned to grace, and she was, according to one contemporary biographer, "kind to excess to all who required her assistance." However, she did have a troubling side to her nature, being quick to defend her rights whatever the consequences.

When a drunken British naval officer ripped up all her dresses and drowned her pet canary, she hauled him into court and collected damages. And when a wealthy rake got annoyed with her and knocked her down in a theater, she promptly had him arrested for assault and battery, charges ladies of her profession seldom brought, regarding such affronts as one of the perils of the profession.

Raised in a New England foster home under the tutelage of a kindly judge, she had grown up in an atmosphere of music, literature and the social graces that undoubtedly put her a cultural cut above most of her customers. Helen handpicked many of her lovers. If a man proved attractive to her, she would attempt to seduce him by missive. Taking a liking to an actor she had seen in Othello, she wrote:

Othello is in my opinion a great lout and a great fool, and has not one half so much to cry about as Iago. . . . I should like to see you in Damon or in Romeo. I should like above all things to be your Juliet, or to rehearse the character with you in private, at any rate. I have some notions on the philosophy of her character and likewise on that of Romeo, which would perhaps amuse you.

In 1834 Helen enticed a young rake named Richard P. Robinson into her regular army of admirers. Like many other blades of the day, he conducted much of his nightlife under an alias, that of Frank Rivers, but as his affair with Helen bloomed, he readily revealed to her his true identity. Robinson also developed a jealous streak, the thought of her having an interest, other than financial, in any other man obsessed him. Of course, Robinson never gave a thought to marrying Helen, and when he decided to wed a respectable young lady of considerable means, a second note of friction entered his relationship with the haughty harlot.

For whatever reason, at 3 o'clock on Sunday morning April 10, 1836, Robinson entered Mrs. Rosina Townsend's famed brothel, where Helen Jewett was in residence. He was wearing his usual flashy visored cap and billowing Spanish cloak so that Madam Townsend and another prostitute readily recognized him. What they didn't know was that Robinson carried a hatchet under the cloak. Helen Jewett was found brutally murdered several hours later, her skull savagely hacked in.

Helen Jewett's death exposed New York's false morality. At first, the newspapers treated the murder as a sensational affair, but it soon became evident that nobody wanted Robinson arrested, including the police and several important protectors of Madam Townsend. Robinson apparently felt so safe that he did not bother to flee the city. Finally, after what can only be described as a lethargic investigation, he was arrested.

A public cry of sympathy went up, with one newspaper regretting that so young a person as Robinson should be sacrificed for "ridding the city of so great a disgrace to her sex." A Methodist minister pleaded from the pulpit for mercy for him, and young rakes adopted a new heroic dress, striding up Broadway in "Frank Rivers" caps and "Robinson" cloaks and chanting, "No man should hang for the murder of a whore."

No man did. Robinson's trial was a five-day farce, with most newspapers printing nothing but laudatory comments about the accused and somber warnings to prostitutes to stay away from the City Hall area because of threats of violence. By his attitude, it was clear Mayor Philip Hone considered the accused innocent; he later wrote in his diary, "He certainly looks as little like a murderer as any person I ever saw."

During the trial prosecution witnesses who had furnished damaging evidence against Robinson, both regarding the murder and his general dissolute life, became shaky in their testimony. A grocer named Robert Furlong gave the defendant a dubious alibi, but his subsequent suicide somewhat spoiled the effect. Just to make sure nothing went wrong, a few of Robinson's more ardent supporters bribed at least one juror. The effort proved unnecessary, as a not-guilty verdict was quickly brought in. That evening Robinson was honored at a great celebration.

Obviously, good had triumphed over evil, although James Gordon Bennett's Herald, which alone held Robinson guilty wrote:

The evidence in this trial and the remarkable disclosure of the manners and morals of New York form one of those events that must make philosophy pause, religion stand aghast, morals weep in the dust, and female virtue droop her head in sorrow.

A number of young men, clerks in fashionable stores, are dragged up to the witness stand, but where are the married men, where the rich merchants, where the devoted church members who were caught in their shirts and drawers on that awful night? The publication and perusal of the evidence in this trial will kindle up fires that nothing can quench.

Nonetheless, the good burghers of New York had an unsolved mystery on their hands and obviously preferred it that way. After Richard Robinson was freed and left the city, rumor had it that he became a desperado along the Mississippi.

Jewish Mafia

There has been a long-standing argument over whether or not the Mafia, Italian style, exists. Of course, the real argument lies in the definition of the term Mafia and how close a relationship can be assumed to exist among various "crime families." Certainly, in a looser context, there is an Italian Mafia, and years ago there was a Jewish Mafia. Like the Italian Mafia, there were Jewish gangs that cooperated with one another, and this did not change just because a Monk Eastman or a Jack Zelig, to name two brutes, or an Arnold Rothstein, to name a brain, were removed from the scene. Meyer Lansky was able to put the pieces back together again and lead a new Jewish Mafia in cooperation with the Italian Mafia. Lansky first did some missionary work around the country, bringing in the Moe Dalitz forces from Cleveland and the Purple Gang from Detroit, among others. Then he organized a convention of East Coast forces at the Franconia Hotel in New York City on November 11, 1931. Those attending included Bugsy Siegel, Joseph "Doc" Stacher, Louis "Lepke" Buchalter, Hyman "Curly" Holtz, Jacob "Gurah" Shapiro, Philip "Little Farvel" Kovalick, Louis "Shadows" Kravitz, Harry Tietelbaum and Harry "Big Greenie" Greenberg.

The conference closely followed a revolutionary change in the operation of the Italian Mafia. Just two months earlier, Lucky Luciano had effectively seized control of the Italian underworld by the assassination of Salvatore Maranzano, the so-called boss of bosses. Luciano's plan, which was at least 50 percent Lansky's idea was to establish a new "combination," or national crime syndicate. Lansky's job was to bring in the Jewish mobsters, and the final scene in that act was the Franconia conference, which established the firm rule that "the yids and dagos would no longer fight each other."

The new "interfaith" combination was to be paramount. If there were any doubters, they were converted when one of the Franconia participants, Big Greenie, was eliminated by Bugsy Siegel, filling a contract that came down from the national board of the syndicate. When Siegel was later erased for defying the same board, his erstwhile tutor and partner Lansky would simply say with a shrug, "I had no choice."

Johnny Behind the Deuce (1862–1882) gambler and killer

One of the West's most colorful and deadly gamblers, Johnny Behind the Deuce won a fortune at cards, killed several men, was saved from a lynch mob by Wyatt Earp and went to his own reward in a blazing gunfight—all before he reached his 21st birthday.

Nothing is known of his early life, but Johnny turned up in Tucson, Arizona Territory in early 1878 at the age of 16, giving his surname, at various times, as O'Rourke and his Christian name as either Michael or John. He worked as a hotel porter and seemed to spend all his free moments learning to manipulate a gun and a deck of cards. By 1880 he was famous throughout the territory as Johnny Behind the Deuce, a hard man to beat at any game of cards. In time, a suspicion developed that as he sat in the saloon gambling, Johnny would watch for a man passing out from drink and then leave the table for a short period. When the drunk sobered up the next day, he would find his belongings had been burglarized. Hardly anyone accused Johnny Behind the Deuce of such crimes, since he had already demonstrated a deadly knack for dealing with critics.

In January 1881 in Charleston a miner named Henry Schneider dared to call Johnny a thief when he found his poke had disappeared from his shack. He died with a bullet between the eyes after, Johnny Behind the Deuce alleged, drawing a knife. Marshal George McKelvey hustled the gambler off to Tombstone before the miners could start thinking of a lynching. Upon his arrival in Tombstone a crowd quickly gathered but a shotgun-armed Wyatt Earp held them off long enough for the prisoner to be moved to Tucson, where he was able to break out of jail. Since Johnny Behind the Deuce often dealt in the Oriental Saloon, of which Earp owned a piece, it is very likely that the latter felt he owed the young gambler something.

What happened next is guesswork, but a popular theory that summer was that the fugitive gambler came across the notorious Johnny Ringo, Wyatt Earp's mortal enemy, sleeping off a powerful drunk under a gnarled oak in Turkey Creek Canyon. Johnny Behind the Deuce supposedly figured he owed Earp one, so he shot the outlaw through the head. Whether true or not, the story was generally believed by Ringo's gunfighter friends. One of these, Pony Deal, got into a card game with Johnny Behind the Deuce in Sulphur Springs Valley. After a few hands Deal called Johnny a four-flusher, cheater and murderer. Angered, the gambler went for his gun, but Deal outdrew him and shot him dead.

Since George Johnson was lynched for a murder that didn't happen, his case pricked the conscience of Tombstone, Ariz. Not that Johnson didn't deserve hanging, as old-timers would relate years later, but it didn't seem quite just.

In October 1882 Johnson held up, or at least attempted to hold up, the Tombstone-Bisbee stage, firing a shot to bring it to a halt. Inside the coach one of the two passengers, Mrs. M. E. Kellogg, felt her husband slump down beside her when the shot was fired. He was dead. The woman screamed, and that frightened the would-be bandit's horse, which then bolted, unseating its rider. Johnson lost his weapon on hitting the ground and then did the only thing he could do under the circumstances: he ran off on foot.

The stage driver jumped down and seeing that Mr. Kellogg was dead, unhitched two horses. He put the new widow on one horse and sent her back to Tombstone to request aid while he took off after the bandit on the other. Mrs. Kellogg got back to Tombstone in hysterical shape but was able to tell the sheriff what had happened. He and a doctor headed for the scene of the crime. Meanwhile, the stage driver ran Johnson to earth and brought him back to town. Unfortunately for Johnson, they came back by a different road and missed the sheriff.

By the time the sheriff, the doctor and the corpse returned, they found Tombstone justice had been done. Johnson had been strung up by a lyncher mob. The sheriff was angry and the doctor upset, and for good reason. The dead man had not been shot at all. He had suffered a heart attack and died when the stagecoach was stopped. George Johnson had not killed anyone; he hadn't even robbed anyone. Under the circumstances a necktie party did seem somewhat extreme. Business in the saloons and brothels reportedly was a bit subdued that night. Conscience finally got the better of folks and a collection was taken up. The sum of $800 was presented to Johnson's widow to ease her loss. In addition, the words "Hanged By Mistake" were put on his tombstone.

Johnson, John (?–1824) murderer

John Johnson's crime in 1824 was in many respects a most pedestrian murder; at the same time it was probably the most publicized homicide in New York City's history.

When Johnson's roommate, James Murray, collected his pay, Johnson decided to appropriate it. Splitting Murray's skull with an ax he packed the dead man in a blanket and lugged his grim load toward the harbor to dispose of it. On the way he was challenged by a suspicious police officer. Johnson dropped his gory bundle and ran, managing to elude capture.

Stuck with a corpse they could not identify, officials ordered the dead man put on display at City Hall Park in the hope that someone would recognize it. For days an estimated 50,000 persons made the trek to view the body, many of them using the occasion as an excuse for a picnic in the area. Finally, a neighbor identified Murray, and the police quickly arrested Johnson. His execution was held at Second Avenue and 13th Street on April 2, 1824. Due to the previous publicity the murder had attracted, the execution drew a crowd of 50,000.

Perhaps the most successful black gambler in America, John V. "Mushmouth" Johnson dominated black gambling enterprises in Chicago from the mid-1880s until his death in 1907. Johnson, a flamboyant man with the obligatory cigar in mouth, controlled the city's policy racket, as well as scores of faro, poker and crap games in the black sections. His influence also extended over the Chinese quarter, where he charged all gambling enterprises a fee for protection. Mushmouth had considerable clout with the law as a result of his ability to deliver large blocks of black votes in elections.

Generally believed to have been a native of St. Louis, Mushmouth Johnson first appeared on the Chicago scene as a waiter at the Palmer House in the 1870s. In the early 1880s Andy Scott hired him as a floor man in his gambling emporium on South Clark Street and soon became so impressed with Mushmouth's abilities that he gave him a small interest in the operation. Mushmouth decided that what Chicago needed was a good nickel gambling house. A few years later, he opened his own place at 311 South Clark and did a thriving business with tables that catered to all races, offering bets as low as 5¢ in any of the games. Mushmouth sold off his interest in the place in 1890 and opened a saloon and gambling hall at 464 State Street, which operated without interruption for the next 17 years despite reform waves that shut down other gambling resorts at various times.

Together with two other big-time gamblers, Bill Lewis and Tom McGinnis, Mushmouth opened the Frontenac Club on 22nd Street. The club catered strictly to whites, and to be admitted, one was required to display a certain amount of cash. The fact that the Frontenac excluded blacks did not hurt Mushmouth's standing with his fellows; on the contrary, his success in the white world was a matter of black pride.

A total nongambler himself, Mushmouth is generally believed to have accumulated a quarter of a million dollars, a sizable sum for any man in that day and a colossal sum for a black man. Yet, shortly before his death in 1907, Johnson told a friend he had only $15,000, all the proceeds of his saloon business, and that he had lost money on his gambling ventures through the years. He said that he had spent $100,000 on fines and that police protection had always drained him, claiming, "I have had to pay out four dollars for every one I took in at the game." Johnson also implied he had been forced to pay more than his white counterparts because of the color of his skin.

When the claim gained currency following Mushmouth's death, an unnamed police official was outraged, denouncing Mushmouth Johnson as a "whiner" and a "damnable liar." It was unclear whether the official objected to Johnson's statement that he had paid for protection or, simply, that he had been discriminated against in the rates charged.

Johnson County War range conflict

In 1892, under the guise of driving out "rustlers," the great cattle barons of Johnson County, Wyo. waged a war of extermination against small ranchers and homesteaders. There is no question that the big stockmen, mostly absentee owners residing in Cheyenne and members of the Wyoming Stock Growers' Association, had been losing cattle and that some had been taken by the "long rope," which was the traditional way most ranchers got started, picking up mavericks on the open range, and, indeed, the way most of the big stockmen themselves had gotten started. However, there were other reasons for the losses, including poor management and overstocking of the ranges, prairie fires, grass-destroying grasshoppers and bad weather. Traditionally too, many foremen on absentee-owner ranches built up small herds of their own and blamed the shortages on outside rustlers.

tionally too, many foremen on absentee-owner ranches built up small herds of their own and blamed the shortages on outside rustlers.

The stockmen followed the usual procedure of sending in "range detectives" to kill a few rustlers but found the results in Johnson County unsatisfactory. Whenever a small rancher or homesteader was arrested on rustling charges, a friendly jury of homesteaders invariably released him. The stockmen soon discovered, however, they could control not only the state administration, which they already owned, but the press as well. Their newfound power came about after a posse of cattlemen lynched a prostitute named Cattle Kate because she apparently had accepted beef from cowboys in payment for services rendered, and the beef the stockmen alleged, was stolen. To avoid any legal repercussions as a result of the lynching, they claimed Cattle Kate was a "bandit queen" who had masterminded a vast rustling operation. The press eagerly accepted the story and printed ridiculous accounts about the depredations of Cattle Kate. Encouraged by the public relations coup, the cattle barons decided to launch a full-scale war of extermination by going into the county in force with an army of gunmen to wipe out their arch enemies, one or two at a time.

For a period of a few months, members of the Wyoming Stock Growers' Association were invited to forward the names of deserving victims to the secretary of the organization. The executive committee then selected who would go on the death list (it was later estimated that a total of 70 victims were chosen), and sent 46 "regulators" under command of Col. Frank Wolcott and Frank H. Canton, a wanted murderer, into the county on a brutal murder mission.

Their first victims were two small ranchers, Nick Ray and Nate Champion who were killed in cold blood. Sickened by the murders, a doctor and one of the reporters accompanying the invaders left the expedition. But the shootings delayed the murder army and word spread of their presence. They soon found themselves besieged by a posse of 200 county residents.

The stockmen's army was forced to seek refuge in a ranch 13 miles south of Buffalo. They faced certain extinction until the U.S. Cavalry rode to their rescue. The killers then laid down their arms, surrendered to the army and were escorted back to Cheyenne. The local sheriff, Red Angus, unsuccessfully requested that the invaders be turned over to his custody. Had they been, there undoubtedly would have been 40-odd lynchings that evening.

The Johnson County "war" ended in a total disaster for the stockmen, who spent the next few years attempting to conceal their culpability. When a muckraker of the period, Asa Mercer published The Banditti of the Plains the following year, the cattle barons used their power to have the book suppressed; its plates were destroyed and Mercer was even jailed for a time for sending “obscene matter” through the mails. Copies of the book were torn up and burned and even the Library of Congress copy vanished.

While the stockmen had failed to exterminate the homesteaders of Johnson County, none were ever prosecuted for their offenses.

Johnston, James A. (1876–1958) warden of Alcatraz

In 1934 James A. Johnston, a veteran penologist, was appointed by the U.S. Department of Justice to be the first warden of a new maximum-security, minimum-privilege federal prison on Alcatraz Island in San Francisco Bay. Johnston had previously served as warden of both Folsom and San Quentin prisons, California’s toughest, but he had a reputation as a reformer. As such, his appointment caused something of a surprise. Old prison hands wanted someone tougher in the job, and many of Johnston’s supporters were perplexed that he had accepted the post, which by the nature of the prison, had to be a repressive one.

From the beginning, Alcatraz was Johnston’s creation; he personally designed the cell blocks and composed the most restrictive regulations ever used in a federal prison in the United States. In the popular press, Johnston was referred to as being “tough but kindly.” The convicts thought differently, however, calling him Saltwater Johnston because they considered him as bitter as saltwater.

The rules that Johnston laid down were so severe that they are credited with having driven any number of convicts “stir crazy.” For the first four years a rigid “rule of silence” prohibited the convicts from speaking a word in the cell blocks, in the mess hall or at work. A single word uttered without permission meant instant punishment, often in solitary confinement for periods up to several months. It was an abrupt change for a warden who in a dozen years had reformed San Quentin in more ways than had been accomplished in the previous 50. There, he had introduced individual treatment of convicts, established honor camps, abolished corporal punishment and did away with the ugly striped prison uniform. At Alcatraz the hole became a standard punishment. In the cramped space a convict slept on concrete and received only water and four slices of bread a day. Solitary was a little better, since the prisoner got a bunk and one regular meal a day.

During the so-called Alcatraz Prison Rebellion of 1946, really just an escape attempt by six convicts, Johnston proposed an all-out attack on the cell blocks by armed guards and grenade-tossing marines. When his superior in Washington, Bureau of Prisons head James Bennett, said he was worried about “what public reaction will be if a large number of innocent inmates were unnecessarily killed,” Johnston responded rather stiffly, “Mr. Director, there are no innocent inmates in here.”

The investigation following the 1946 rebellion revealed that one prisoner had been held in total isolation for more than seven years. Johnston bristled when asked how much longer the man would remain there and said, “As long as necessary for discipline.” The warden insisted that the FBI agents preparing a murder case against three members of the six-man escape team interview them in the dungeon, relenting only when the officers explained that any statements they got from the prisoners under those conditions might not be admitted in court.

There is little doubt that Johnston was personally brave. Even in periods of unrest—and Alcatraz was almost constantly beset by strikes, sit-ins and riots—Johnston always entered the dining hall alone and unarmed; of course, machine-gun toting guards patrolled the catwalk outside. He would taste the soup and then take his position by the door, exposing his back to the convicts marching out. During a strike in September 1937, a young convict known to be mentally deficient attacked the 61-year-old warden, battering his face in, knocking out several teeth and stomping on his chest before guards could tear him away. It was a week before Johnston could get out of bed. His assailant went to the hole for a long stay. As a lifer, he faced death for attacking a prison officer, but the warden never brought charges.

Johnston retired as warden in 1948, a man who had believed in rehabilitation but who had during 14 years molded a prison incapable of rehabilitating anyone. Summing up his tenure, he said: “Atlanta and Leavenworth had sent me their worst. I had done my best with them.” Johnston died at the age of 82, having outlived many a younger con who had sworn to celebrate on the day the warden died.

Johnstown flood looting

The flood that struck Johnstown, Pa., in 1889 was easily the worst disaster to occur in the United States during the late 19th century. When a 100-foot-high earthen dam broke, the resulting cataclysm killed at least 2,000 people—an average of about one out of every 10 persons living in the way of the flood—and bodies were still being found as late as 1906. However, much as the public was upset by the tragedy and the almost certain criminal negligence in the construction and supervision of the dam, it became more outraged by the looting, especially of the bodies of dead victims, that took place in the aftermath of the disaster.

As soon as the waters started to settle, hordes of looters descended on the scene to pillage business establishments and to strip the dead of cash, watches, wedding rings and the like. Dozens of looters were arrested, but they were the lucky ones. Outraged citizens killed others on the spot.

A Miss Wayne from Altoona, Pa. reported she was swept off a ferryboat by the rampaging waters and ended up on a beach, where she awakened to find herself stripped naked by looters. She feigned death and watched bands of thieves “slice off with wicked knives” the fingers of women to get their rings.

So outraged was the citizenry over this story that many persons lost interest in rescue work and set out in vigilante style to hunt for looters. One looter captured with a ring-bearing severed finger in his pocket was summarily drowned. Others were shot. Even the police, overburdened with rescue work, were caught up in the frenzy of catching looters. A publication of the period reported:

A trap was laid for a crook undertaker, who was robbing the bodies in the Fourth Ward morgue. A female was brought in, and before it was dressed for burial a diamond ring was placed upon one of her fingers, and the pseudo undertaker was assigned to take charge of the body. He was detected in the act of stealing the jewelry, and was promptly arrested by the chief of police.

Jon, Gee (?–1924) first gas chamber victim

In 1924 Gee Jon became the first man to die in the gas chamber in Carson City, Nev. Reformers in that state were sure they had come up with a humane execution method when they pushed through a bill to have condemned men killed by poison gas that would be piped into their cells. The idea was that the execution would take place while the prisoner was asleep so that no prior notice would have to be given. Jon, the first man facing such a fate, would thus be spared the macabre preparations for the execution as well as having to await a preestablished time of death. However, these well-laid plans had to be scrapped because prison officials couldn’t figure out how to carry out such an execution without having the gas spread and kill off a considerable number of the prison population. An airtight chamber was then constructed, and Jon had to endure all the frightful preparations the reformers had hoped to spare him. He was led into the chamber with a stethoscope attached to his chest and strapped into a chair under which cyanide pellets tied in a gauze sack hung on a hook. The chamber was cleared and a lever was pulled allowing the cyanide “eggs” to drop into a pan filled with a mixture of water and sulfuric acid. Within a matter of seconds, deadly fumes rose and, in a short time, the condemned man’s heartbeat stopped. An effusive Carson City reporter informed his readers that Nevada had moved “one step further from the savage state.”

Jones, Frank (1856–1893) Texas Ranger

One of the most colorful and storied Texas Rangers, Frank Jones had become a Ranger in his native Texas at the age of 17 and a hero in the organization at 18. Sent after a gang of Mexican horse thieves, Jones saw the two Rangers accompanying him cut down in an ambush. Carrying on alone, he killed two of the enemy and took one prisoner. Later, as a sergeant, he led a seven-man force after a group of rustlers. In a bitter gunfight three Rangers were killed, and Jones and three others were captured. Then, in an act of heroism befitting the storybook reputation of the Texas Rangers, Jones managed to seize the rifle of one of the rustlers and shoot his five captors dead. In 1880, as a captain, Jones was sent out with a murder warrant to arrest the notorious Scott Cooley, the instigator of the Mason County War of 1875. In a rare failure, Jones did not find Cooley (no one ever did and there is some reason to believe Cooley was dead at the time), but he did turn up three other desperadoes, one of whom he gunned down, the others he captured. After a while, Jones killed a rustler in a stand-up gun duel in a saloon, and in another barroom shoot-out he wounded and captured a notorious gunman named Tex Murietta. The list of Jones' daring accomplishments lengthened until June 29, 1893, when he went after a father-son outlaw team named Olguin. In a withering gun battle Jones, long regarded as "unkillable," was riddled with bullets. Ironically, the gunfight took place on an island in the Rio Grande that was actually on the Mexican side of the border, where the Olguins were immune to Texas justice.

Jones, William "Canada Bill" (?–1877) gambler

Probably the greatest three-card monte cheater this country has ever produced and a fine all-round gambler, Canada Bill Jones cut a mangy figure along the Mississippi in the middle of the 19th century. In his autobiography Forty Years a Gambler on the Mississippi, George Devol, another legendary gambler, described Canada Bill as a character one might travel the length and breadth of the land and never find his match, or run across his equal. Imagine a medium-sized, chicken-headed, tow-haired sort of a man with mild blue eyes, and a mouth nearly from ear to ear, who walked with a shuffling, half-apologetic sort of a gait, and who, when his countenance was in repose, resembled an idiot. His clothes were always several sizes too large, and his face was as smooth as a woman's and never had a particle of hair on it.

Canada was a slick one. He had a squeaking, boyish voice, and awkward gawky manners, and a way of asking fool questions and putting on a good natured sort of a grin, that led everybody to believe that he was the rankest kind of sucker—the greenest sort of country jake. Woe to the man who picked him up, though. Canada was, under all his hypocritical appearance, a regular card shark, and could turn monte with the best of them. He was my partner for a number of years, and many are the suckers we roped in, and many the huge roll of bills we corralled.

Normally, three-card monte favored the dealer two-to-one, but Canada Bill seldom gave a sucker such a decent break. He was probably the century's greatest manipulator of cards and could show a victim two aces and a queen and then, virtually in the act of throwing the cards, palm the queen and introduce a third ace so that the sucker could never find the queen. About 1850 Canada Bill formed a partnership with Devol and two other talented gamblers, Tom Brown and Hally Chappell. The larcenous quartet operated on the Mississippi and Ohio and other navigable streams for close to a decade. When the partnership dissolved, each man's share of the profits was more than $200,000.

As quickly as both he and Devol made their money, however, they squandered it, both being suckers for faro. Canada Bill, who truly loved gambling for its own sake, was the originator of what was to become a classic gamblers' comment. He and a partner were killing time between boats in a small Mississippi River town when Bill found a faro game and started to lose consistently. His partner, tugging at his sleeve, said, "Bill, don't you know the game's crooked!"

"I know it," Bill replied, "but it's the only game in town!"

When river traffic dwindled and then virtually disappeared by the start of the Civil War, Canada Bill shifted his operations to the rails. The railroads, however, did not always exhibit the same tolerance for gamblers that the riverboats had, and three-card monte players were ejected when spotted. In 1867 Canada Bill wrote to one of the Southern lines offering $25,000 a year in exchange for the right to operate without being molested. He promised to give the railroad an additional percentage of the profits and said he would limit his victims to very rich men and preachers. Alas, his offer was refused.

Alternately flush and broke Canada Bill continued his itinerant gambling style until 1874, when he settled in Chicago and, with Jimmy Porter and Charlie Starr, established some very lucrative and dishonest gambling dens. Within six months he was able to pull out with $150,000, but in a short time, he lost his entire poke at faro. Canada Bill worked Cleveland a bit, winning and then losing, and in 1877 he wound up in Reading, Pa., an area noted as a refuge for gamblers. While down on funds he was committed to Charity Hospital and died there in 1877. He was buried by the mayor of the city, who was later reimbursed by Chicago gamblers for the cost. As two old gambling buddies watched Canada Bill's coffin being lowered into the grave, one offered to bet $1,000 to $500 that the notorious cheat was not in the box.

"Not with me," the other gambler said. "I've known Bill to squeeze out of tighter holes than that."

Juanita (1828–1851) first woman hanged in California

The hanging of a Mexican woman named Juanita, who comes down through history by that name alone, in the town of Downieville, Calif. in 1851 brought denunciations of American border justice from as far away as England.

Downieville was at the time a mining camp full of violent miners and harlots of all ages and hues, but Juanita was unquestionably the prize beauty. One account testifies: "Her dusky hair, long and glossy, was pulled low over delicate olive features and knotted loosely at the nape of her graceful neck. It gave her a Madonna-like expression. No doubt, many a rough miner stood in awe of her beauty and bared his head in reverence mingled with a certain human admiration." But she also had some faults, being described as, among other things, "a live volcano, an enraged lioness, a fighting wildcat."

In mid-1851 Juanita found true love with a young Mexican miner and set up housekeeping. She was henceforth not available as in the past. On the Fourth of July a celebrating miner named Jack Cannon came knocking on Juanita's door, brandishing a bag of gold dust. Juanita screamed at him in Spanish to let her alone. Cannon ignored her protestations and forced his way into the cabin, actually smashing the cabin door from its hinges. A knife flashed in the Mexican girl's hand, and Cannon fell bleeding to death on the floor.

Cannon was known in the camp as a rowdy, but he was a popular one, and an angry crowd soon gathered and began talk of lynching. Juanita was dragged to Craycroft's saloon for what was supposed to be a trial, but in the meantime some of her clothing had been dipped in Cannon's blood so that her crime would be more evident. A "prosecutor" was appointed to present the case, and a young unidentified lawyer who had journeyed over the mountains from Nevada to hear the Fourth of July speeches in Downieville was permitted to defend Juanita. While the "trial" proceeded, a number of miners argued over whose rope should be used for the girl's execution. When the young attorney started making a strong case of self-defense, he was knocked off the barrel he was standing on and flung out to the street. The jury then was ready to bring in a verdict, which, of course, turned out to be guilty.

Then a Dr. C. D. Aikin, who had come to the camp only weeks before, interrupted the proceedings to declare he was treating Juanita for pregnancy. An angry murmur arose in the crowd, which numbered in the hundreds. Three other local medical men were charged with examining the girl and came back to announce the claim was a hoax. Dr. Aiken quickly was held in contempt for his humane effort to save the girl and was given 24 hours to get out of town or be hanged himself.

Juanita was dragged back to her cabin and given an hour to prepare for her fate, while a crowd gathered outside the cabin and started shouting curses at her and stoning the flimsy structure. A priest was not allowed to go to her. After the hour was up, Juanita was marched to Durgan Bridge, from which a noose hung out over the wide Yuba. Extending from the bridge was a 6-foot plank, on which the condemned woman was to stand. As she took her position, Juanita was silent, unlike during her courtroom appearance when she volubly had attacked the kangaroo proceedings in Spanish. Now she merely observed the crowd and smiled in contempt. When she spotted a friendly face, she called out, "Adiós, amigo, adiós." Then the plank was kicked out from under her.

When news of the execution reached the outside world, the press from one end of the country to the other condemned the bloodthirsty affair. Even the Times of London printed severe and caustic criticism of the manner in which border justice had been dispensed. Juanita was described as the first and only woman ever hanged in California, which was not true. Many Mexican and Indian women had been hanged, but hers was the first to follow a "trial."

Winnie Judd was called the Tiger Woman by a devoted press, which kept her supplied with clippings for 40 years after her conviction in the trunk murders of two young women in Phoenix, Ariz.

Winnie had been friendly with 27-year-old Agnes LeRoi, a nurse who worked at the same medical clinic as herself, and Hedvig Samuelson, with whom Agnes shared an apartment, and often stayed with them. On October 16, 1931, screams were heard coming from the apartment. The next day Winnie showed up for work but Agnes did not. On October 18 Winnie went by train to Los Angeles with a large trunk and a small one. Upon her arrival she asked a baggage room employee to help her load them in her car. The employee noticed a dark red fluid dripping from a corner of one of them and demanded to know what was inside, suspecting the trunks might contain contraband deer meat. Winnie said the keys were in the car and went to get them. She drove off, but the baggage clerk managed to write down her license number.

When authorities opened the trunks, they found the body of Agnes LeRoi in the large one and most of the dismembered body of Hedvig in the smaller one. She had been cut up to make her fit. An alarm went out for Winnie, who finally surrendered five days later after an appeal from her Los Angeles husband, from whom she had been separated for some time.

The public was enthralled by the trunk murderess, but it was difficult to tell whether people were more taken by the grisliness of the crime or letters that Winnie had written but never sent to her husband, which revealed strange heterosexual, bisexual and homosexual activities that were common at the LeRoi-Samuelson apartment.

Winnie insisted she had killed in self-defense after Hedvig pulled out a gun and shot her in the hand following a bitter argument. She said she had struggled for the gun, managed to wrest it from Hedvig and in the ensuing melee shot both women. At her trial the prosecution made the point that no one had noticed the gun wound in Winnie's hand until two days after the killings.

Winnie was found guilty and sentenced to hang. Pressure around the country built up for Winnie to be spared the death penalty in light of her claims of self-defense and her lawyer's insistence that she was mentally ill. Thirty state legislators and 34 priests and ministers signed a petition, and thousands of letters poured in on her behalf, including from Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt.

The governor granted her a stay and a sanity hearing 72 hours before her scheduled execution. At the hearing the Tiger Woman put on a show that delighted the newspapers. She clapped, laughed and yelled at the jury. She got up once and told her husband she was "going out the window." Winnie's mother testified that she herself was feeble-minded and that her daughter had "been more or less insane all her life." Her father produced a family tree that traced insanity back 125 years to Scotland. Winnie emphasized the point by ripping at her hair and trying to pull off her clothes. She finally had to be removed from the hearing room and ultimately was judged insane and sentenced to life imprisonment in the state mental institution.

When she arrived at the institution Winnie no longer acted crazy. She was quiet, helpful and plotting. She fashioned a dummy of herself, put it in her bed and escaped. She was found some days later, and it was discovered that strangers had helped her on a number of occasions.

Winnie was brought back and tightly confined. It did no good. Over the years she escaped seven times, each time sparking headlines. One of her escapes lasted six years. It got so that in newsrooms on dull news days an editor would say, "Well, maybe Winnie Ruth Judd will escape again." One of the more sensational crime publications warned its readers. "When you read this story, the country's cleverest maniac may be at large again, perhaps walking down your street, or sitting next to you!"

In 1969, after one of her long-term escapes, attorney Melvin Belli fought Winnie's extradition from California to Arizona, but Gov. Ronald Reagan ordered her returned. Doctors then ruled Winnie was perfectly sane and she was sent to prison. In 1971 Winnie won a parole. She was then in her 60s and no one seemed to be upset about the Tiger Woman being on the loose, possibly because she had had so much free time before.

judicial corruption

The roster of corrupt judges in the American judicial system is, sadly, a long one. It is least serious in the federal judiciary. As Donald Dale Jackson states in Judges (1974), "Manton, Kerner, Ritter, perhaps three dozen others in the history of the republic is not bad." But Jackson goes on to add: "Corruption in state courts is oceanic in comparison to federal courts. Salaries are lower, prestige is lower, and inevitably the quality declines. Most important, the state courts are too often havens for failed politicians and mediocre lawyers. Character, given these limitations, is a sometime thing."

Unscrupulous judges have for generations taken advantage of the opportunity to milk estates through their authority to appoint special guardians and appraisers. This practice can profit a judge's political allies, personal friends, members of his family and others. Some have believed in garnering the rewards more directly. Clem McClelland, a probate judge in Harris County, Tex. even went so far as to set up a dummy corporation, the Tierra Grande Corp. in which his appointees could buy stock and thereby contribute to his personal fortune. The judge was finally convicted of stealing $2,500 from an estate in his court and in 1965 was sentenced to 10 years imprisonment.

About the same time as the McClelland affair broke, the judicial system of Oklahoma was rocked by a scandal involving four justices of the state's nine-man Supreme Court. In his confession one of the jurists, Nelson S. Corn, said he and three other members of the court had shared $150,000 for reversing a tax decision against an investment company. Corn and Justice Earl Welch avoided impeachment by resigning. Another judge died before the plot was revealed and the fourth, Justice Napoleon Bonaparte Johnson, a part-Cherokee honored as Indian of the Year in 1964, was impeached by the state senate. Perhaps the most sordid testimony of the investigation occurred when Corn was asked if there had been any year during his 24 on the bench when he had failed to take a bribe. He answered, "Well, I don't know."

Perhaps the most prolific fixer ever to preside over a court was the late New York Circuit judge Martin T. Manton. Manton's method of trying a lawsuit was to decide in favor of the highest bidder. He told one prospective victim, "While I'm sitting on the bench, I have my right and my left hand." This particular victim, who happened to be as underhanded as Manton himself had the judge's fix offer wire-recorded. After Manton heard the recording, he rushed back to court and handed down the required verdict for not so much as a thin dime. Manton was not caught on that particular caper, but he was on some 17 others. He served a prison term, was disbarred and died in disgrace.

The last federal judge impeached and removed from office by the U.S. Congress was Halsted L. Ritter in 1936. Among other charges brought against him were continuing to practice law while serving on the federal bench and giving his former law partner an excessive $75,000 fee as receiver of a Palm Beach hotel and taking in exchange a kickback of $4,500. He also accepted a number of other kickbacks and appointed his sister-in-law manager of a bankrupt hotel where he then received free room and board and other services. Ritter had failed to report any of these items on his income tax returns.

Removed from office, Ritter ignored the removal order of the Senate and refused to leave his office until forcefully ejected by a U.S. marshal.

Judson, Edward Z. C. (1823–1886) writer and rioter

While Edward Judson is best remembered as Ned Buntline, the author of those hokey, bloodcurdling dime novels that brought fame to Buffalo Bill Cody and Wild Bill Hickok, he also had a long record in the annals of crime. Among other things, he killed a cuckolded husband in a messy love triangle, was shot at while on the witness stand by his victim's brother, narrowly escaped a lynching and was imprisoned for his part in inciting New York's notorious Astor Place Riots of 1849.

Born in Stamford, N.Y. in 1823, he went to sea at the age of 10 as a cabin boy after quarreling with his father, a minor writer named Levi C. Judson. He returned to land at the age of 20 and, almost overnight, became a writer. By late 1843 he was publishing a gutter journal in Nashville, Tenn. called Ned Buntline's Own.

In Nashville, Judson had an affair with a married woman whose husband, Robert Porterfield, came after him with a gun. While he was testifying at a hearing into the killing in magistrate's court, the dead man's brother fired three shots at him, all of which gave him skin burns but did no other damage. Judson was released, but the local citizenry felt that justice had not been done and pursued him to his hotel. He was forced to jump from a third-floor window to escape his pursuers, a leap that gave him a permanent limp. Judson was then put in jail for his own protection until the lynch mood subsided. Later on, he wrote that lynchers took him from his cell and actually strung him up, leaving him for dead, and that some friends cut him down before he expired. This, however, might well be taken with the same skepticism due when reading his writings on the heroics of Cody and Hickok. Lynchers seldom left a body before it was stone-cold dead, and sporting bets were usually made over when the victim would twitch his last twitch.

A few years later, Judson moved to New York City, where he became a writer and henchman for the notorious political leader and rogue Capt. Isaiah Rynders. In 1849 Judson was sent to prison for his part in the Astor Place Riots, in which 23 persons had been killed mainly because of the anti-British hysteria whipped up by Rynders and Judson. When Judson came out of Blackwell's Island after serving his one-year term, he published a book called The Convict's Return or Innocence Vindicated. After that, the rest of Judson's life was free of rascality and criminality—except for the hyperbole of his dime-novel writings.

When the desperadoes of the 1920s and 1930s turned to bank robbing as a major occupation, a need developed for the services of a "jug marker," a caser who would know which bank to rob and when. The great bank robber Baron Lamm, who first organized bank gangs into specialized, militarylike units, was his own jug marker, considering it the most important role in the operation. A good jug marker not only learned the particulars of a bank's security system but also ascertained who had responsibility to open which safe and when, as well as what day of the week the most money would be on hand.

John Dillinger's favorite jug marker was Eddie Green, although he sometimes utilized the brash Harry Pierpont who once cased a bank by interviewing the president in the guise of a newsman. Green was perhaps the most thorough at his trade. He kept an "active list" of banks and checked back on them to see if anything had changed since his last go-round. Even while in jail he was able to sell his information to bank-robbing gangs and to receive a share in the profits. When he joined the Dillinger gang, Dillinger asked him to name a good bank. Green cited one in Sioux Falls, S.D. and started rattling off details. The gang then went out and robbed it.

On some jobs Green went so far as to find a reason for visiting bank officials in their homes just to study them more carefully, to be able to judge how they would act under stress. Green found the First National Bank of Mason City, Iowa for the Dillinger mob and discovered the bank's vault contained more than $240,000. Through no fault of Green's the gang botched the operation and got only $52,000. Green was shot dead by FBI agents in St. Paul, Minn. in April 1934. His death put a considerable crimp in Dillinger's short-lived operations thereafter.

With Dillinger's demise, Baby Face Nelson emerged as the great bank-robbing public enemy. Nelson's idea of jug marking was to charge through a bank's front door blazing away. Obviously, an era in bank robbing was ending. Following Green's death probably the greatest jug marker, and some say the only really good one, to appear on the scene was Slick Willie Sutton. In the late 1960s and through the 1970s, the impulsive amateurs took over and, as Sutton noted, "jug marking plain went to hell."

Jukes alleged criminal clan

For many years the Juke clan of New York State was regarded as the most depraved family in America, having produced, from the mid-1700s to the 1870s, seven generations of rapists, thieves, prostitutes, disease carriers and murderers. Begun in the 1870s, a criminal-genealogical study—The Jukes, A Study in Crime, Pauperism, Disease and Heredity by Richard L. Dugdale—established, to the author's satisfaction, that criminal traits could be inherited just as much as hair coloring.

Dugdale started his study with a mid-18th century Dutch tavern keeper he called Max, who was well known as a gambler and drinker and was the father of two sons. The sons in turn married two illegitimate sisters, whom Dugdale described as harlots. He dubbed one of these sisters, "Margaret, mother of criminals" and indicted her as "the progenitor of the distinctly criminal line of the family."

Dugdale traced 540 "blood relatives" and 169 others related by marriage or cohabitation. Of these, 140 were criminals and offenders of various stripes, almost 300 were wards of the state and the remainder generally a debased, foul and diseased lot. Dugdale enraged his readers by estimating that the price of imprisonment, public assistance and the like had cost the taxpayers something like $1.3 million.

During the early 20th century, critics began to question Dugdale's research methods and findings. The famous prison reformer Thomas Mott Osborne marveled at Dugdale's supposed ability to trace family bloodlines among the illegitimately born. Not a scientific researcher but merely a functionary of the Prison Association of New York, Dugdale seemed to rely very heavily on reciting the criminal backgrounds of various unnamed wretches who, he was satisfied, were related to the original Margaret. Osborne soon became convinced that Dugdale had simply operated under the assumption that every criminal he happened upon must have been a Juke and every Juke was probably a criminal. The shoddiness of Dugdale's research was shown by some of the "criminals" he unearthed: "a reputed sheep-stealer"; a man "supposed to have attempted rape"; an "unpunished and cautious thief"; "a petty thief but never convicted"; and a particularly offensive lad about whom it was "impossible to get any reliable information, but it is evident that at nineteen he was a leader in crime."

Many sociologists attacked the Juke thesis, but it received a new lease on life when in 1916 Arthur H. Estabrook took up the Dugdale mantle, claiming that since the 1870s the Jukes had continued to spawn more criminals and unworthiness. Estabrook admitted there was a lot of "good" Jukes around but insisted that since in recent years the Jukes had taken to marrying outside the breed, the theory of hereditary criminality and immorality was not weakened. Today, Dugdale and Estabrook alike enjoy little support because of their failure to give any weight to the influence of cultural and environmental factors on the development of criminal behavior.

Julian Street Cripple Creek, Colorado vice center

Cripple Creek, the last of the Colorado gold towns, was as wicked as any of its predecessors and perhaps even a bit more open about it. Train travelers passing through the town were treated to a full view of Myers Avenue and its "line," replete with such signs as "MEN TAKEN IN AND DONE FOR." A leading turn-of-the-century journalist, Julian Street, exposed the shame of Myers Avenue to a national audience in a searing article in Colliers magazine, calling the thoroughfare a disgrace to the entire country. The outraged city fathers of Cripple Creek fought back by bestowing a special honor on the journalist: they renamed Myers Avenue "Julian Street."

Jump, John (?–1943) murder victim

When one December morning in 1943 the dismembered body of John Jump was found on the train tracks near Fort Valley, Ga., the authorities' first theory was that the man had obviously been drunk and fallen in front of the train. However, the police soon discarded this theory and began looking for a murderer.

Inspection of the Jump home showed that the kitchen walls had recently been washed halfway to the ceiling and chemical tests revealed blood stains on the walls. Finally, Jump's young widow admitted killing him, claiming self-defense. After splitting the victim's head open with an ax, she cut the body in three parts and in two trips in the dark, carried the pieces to a desolate section of train tracks.

Given a long prison term for second-degree murder, she might well have gotten away with the crime but for one glaring miscalculation. There were three sets of tracks on the right-of-way where the body was found, but she had chosen to place its parts on the one set of tracks over which no train had run for eight months.

In one sense, juvenile delinquency was not a problem in early colonial times. Until the Revolution settlers in this land lived under English common law, which held that juvenile offenders from the age of seven were accountable for their acts and could face the same penalties imposed on adults for various offenses. While a judge had discretion to determine the culpability of children between seven and 14 years of age, there were numerous executions of children as young as one eight-year-old hanged for burning a barn with "malice, revenge, craft and cunning." One well-known case was that of 12-year-old Hannah Ocuish, hanged for the murder of a six-year-old child. A contemporary account, which in tone approved of the execution, did comment that "she said very little and appeared greatly afraid, and seemed to want somebody to help her." Protests that she was too young to die drew very little public support.

Still, the punishment of juveniles was much more lenient in the colonies than in England. Corporal punishment and incarceration were gradually replacing the hangman's rope, especially in the post-Revolutionary

An early 19th-century woodcut depicts Boston authorities in pursuit of suspected youthful thieves who flooded the town. Not even the sight of a hanging figure (in background) could deter the juvenile criminals, many of whom were homeless.

War period. The Society for the Prevention of Pauperism was established in New York in 1817 to improve the lot of "those unfortunate children from 10 to 18 years of age, who from neglect of parents, from idleness and misfortune have . . . contravened some penal statute without reflecting on the consequences, and for hasty violations, been doomed to the penitentiary by the condemnation of the law." Funded by private donations, the House of Refuge was established in 1825 in New York to admit children convicted of crimes and those so destitute or neglected that they were in imminent danger of becoming delinquent. This marked the first time that children and adults were jailed separately.

By today's standards, the House of Refuge was a harsh institution, but it merely reflected the general practices of the day, when children were often put in irons, whipped, placed in solitary confinement, forced to survive on a reduced food supply and subjected to the silent treatment. The institution had the right to act as a parent for neglected or criminal children, and parents who objected were generally unable to win the release of their offspring. Houses of refuge were set up in Boston and Philadelphia, and both instituted reforms in treating juveniles. Boston prohibited corporal punishment; Philadelphia housed each child in a cell of his own. By 1834 the New York house took the revolutionary step of accepting black children. In 1856 the first girls' reformatory, the Massachusetts State Industrial School for Girls, opened.

In the 1860s, an ill-fated experiment was attempted with “ship schools,” whereby young offenders were sent to sea on special vessels. Disciplinary problems, heavy operating expenses and protests from adult seamen fearful of losing jobs dealt the ship schools a quick death. In the 1870s and 1880s the so-called child-saving movement started under the leadership of a number of women’s clubs. As a result of such efforts, separate courts for juveniles were established in 1899 in the states of Illinois and Rhode Island and the city of Denver, Colo.

The first federal effort to combat juvenile delinquency came with the establishment of the Children’s Bureau in 1912. Under federal encouragement many states and large cities opened special reformatories for juveniles. These institutions did not solve the juvenile delinquency problem or clarify how juveniles could be rehabilitated through confinement. To this day, brutality, homosexuality and rioting remain ever present problems. Following the new approaches to aiding troubled juveniles expounded by John Dewey, Karen Horney, Carl Rogers, Erich Fromm and others, a new era of get-tough approaches to juvenile delinquency began in the 1970s.

The new public attitude was bolstered by such horrors as New York City’s “laugh killing” in July 1978, the senseless slaying of a 16-year-old seminary student by a 13-year-old boy, a tragedy some experts say will have as great an impact on America’s attitude toward juvenile crime as any offense has ever had. The killing took place in front of Teachers College at Columbia University when the 13-year-old and a 15-year-old companion came up to the seminary student, Hugh McEvoy, and a friend, Peter Mahar, 15, who were sitting on a railing. According to later testimony, the 13-year-old boy asked McEvoy, “What are you laughing at?”

With that, the 13-year-old pulled out a .22-caliber pistol, placed it to McEvoy’s head and pulled the trigger. McEvoy was fatally wounded.

Under the existing law, the 13-year-old, who had a record of 10 arrests, nine within the previous 18 months, could only be tried in family court and receive a maximum sentence of 18 months in a “secure facility,” with the option that his sentence could be renewed. After the first 18 months the 13-year-old would automatically be able to receive home passes and furloughs. The uproar over the laugh killing brought speedy passage of what some reporters called “Carey’s law,” named after New York governor Hugh L. Carey, which allowed juveniles to be tried for murder like adults and to be sentenced to life in prison. It was predicted that the laugh-killing law would spread throughout the country.

The chief deficiency in any serious study of juvenile delinquency (as pointed out in the entry on Age and Crime) is the absence of reliable statistics concerning juvenile crime in the 19th century, or even the first three decades of the 20th until the first appearance of the FBI’s Uniform Crime Reports. Even use of the Uniform Crime Reports is not that helpful and can cause misleading conclusions about a “juvenile crime wave” based on increase in juvenile arrests. Certain types of crimes both violent and nonviolent, are typically juvenile offenses and explode upward when a crop of baby boom youths hits the crime-prone ages.

Kahane, Rabbi Meir (1932–1990) murder victim

It was a November 5, 1990, meeting for the supporters of Rabbi Meir Kahane in the conference room of a Midtown New York hotel. The turnout was approximately 70 persons who generally agreed with the extremist founder of the Jewish Defense League in the United States and the anti-Arab Kach Party in Israel. Kahane outlined his proposal for the “transfer” or expulsion of Arabs from Israel and the occupied territories.

Just as Kahane finished his speech, a shot rang out and a bullet hit him in the neck that then exited through his cheek. It was a fatal shot.

A member of the audience ran from the room, gun in hand. According to police, the gun-toting man shot and wounded an elderly bystander as he fled the room. Out on the street he commandeered a taxi at gunpoint. A block later he jumped out of the cab and came face-to-face with an on-duty Postal Service policeman, Carlos Acosta. The police said the gunman fired a shot that bounced off the officer’s bulletproof vest and wounded the policeman in the arm. Acosta returned fire and his bullet hit the gunman in the neck and lodged in his chin.

The alleged assailant was identified by police as Sayyid A. Nosair, an Egyptian immigrant who had become a U.S. citizen the previous year and at present worked for a city agency. Nosair was hospitalized in serious condition, but recovered. On November 20 Nosair was charged with multiple crimes: second-degree murder, second-degree attempted murder, aggravated assault of a police officer, second-degree assault, three counts of criminal possession of a weapon, reckless endangerment and coercion. Investigators also warned six prominent New York City Jews that their names appeared on a list held by Nosair, but at the time nothing developed to prove he had ties to Palestinian groups or international terrorists.

As a matter of fact, officials were going to have great difficulty tying Nosair to the murder, even though they felt their case was overwhelming and the press openly described Nosair as Kahane’s murderer. On December 21, 1991, Nosair was acquitted of the main charges against him, those of killing Kahane and shooting the post office policeman Acosta.

Later it was determined the jury felt the prosecution had not presented sufficient evidence to prove that Nosair had shot Kahane, and in interviews some noted no one testified to seeing Nosair firing a shot. All one witness testified to was to seeing Nosair pointing a gun at Kahane moments after the shooting. Jurors also said the state did not prove that the gun found in the street near Nosair was the one that had been used in the murder.

The noted defense attorney William M. Kunstler insisted Kahane had been killed by a dissident member of the JDL in a financial dispute. After the verdict several newspaper accounts noted that Kunstler seemed quite stunned that he had basically won his case.

Nosair did not go free, however, and in 1995 he was tried with a number of defendants in the World Trade Center bombing and was also convicted on federal charges for the Kahane murder.

KANSAS City Massacre

Rabbi Meir Kahane, extremist founder of the Jewish Defense League in the United States, was shot dead before 70 persons at a conference in a New York hotel after he outlined his proposal for the “transfer,” or expulsion, of Arabs from Israel and the occupied territories.

Kansas City Massacre

Just as the St. Valentine’s Day Massacre in 1929 marked the turning point in the public’s tolerance of Al Capone, so too did the Kansas City Massacre signal the beginning of the end to the public’s glorification of the early 1930s gangsters. Ironically, while the massacre was considered a gangland depredation perpetrated by public enemies, it may well have been something entirely different—a political rub-out.

Ostensibly, the crime was an effort to free a federal prisoner, gangster Frank “Jelly” Nash, whom FBI agents had captured in Hot Springs, Ark. and were escorting to Kansas City, Mo. on June 17, 1933. Nash knew a lot about instances of corruption, certainly about political-criminal relationships in Hot Springs and more importantly, in Kansas City, where the Boss Pendergast machine’s ties with the underworld had reached shocking proportions. There were powerful forces who wished Nash out of the law’s hands—one way or another. That was accomplished in particularly bloody fashion.

As the officers and Nash piled into a car at Union Station, a large man carrying a machine gun appeared—it wasn’t clear from where—and yelled, “Get ’em up!” Two other gunmen showed up and, for a moment, Nash thought his deliverance was at hand. Suddenly, the trio cut loose a fusillade of bullets, spraying the car and Nash. The supposed object of a rescue died screaming: “For God’s sake! Don’t shoot me.”

With Nash died four lawmen, and two others were wounded. One FBI agent survived by feigning death.

The identities of the murderous threesome became a matter of some dispute. Several witnesses thought the machine gunner was Charles “Pretty Boy” Floyd, but during this period every machine-gunning was thought to be Floyd’s. It was firmly established that one of the trio was Vern Miller. If another was in fact Pretty Boy Floyd, then the third had to be his sidekick Adam Richetti. That was the FBI’s position.

Floyd, a fugitive on the run, was furious over this charge against him and wrote indignant letters to authorities and the newspapers vehemently denying any involvement. The fact that he never showed such indignation over other crimes ascribed to him led some to think he might be innocent. Certainly, he was not worried that the crime would send him to the gas chamber; the law already had enough on him to execute him several times over.

Five months later, Miller’s bullet-riddled and mangled nude body was found on the outskirts of Detroit. Speculation arose that he had been punished for botching the Nash rescue or, after having murdered Nash intentionally, had been killed to prevent him from ever revealing who had ordered the attack. Floyd was killed by FBI agents in October 1934, and Richetti was captured that same month. With his dying breath Floyd refused to admit involvement in the Kansas City Massacre, and Richetti continued to deny it until his execution in 1938. In addition, most of the witnesses failed to identify him as one of the gunners.

In 1954 an underworld informer named Blackie Audett presented a new theory—or facts, as he insisted. Audett said he himself had seen the killers escape and he identified them as Miller, Maurice Denning and William “Solly” Weisman. It developed that two weeks after Miller’s corpse had been discovered, the body of Weisman also had been found on the outskirts of Chicago. He had been murdered in the same fashion as Miller. Denning was never seen again after the massacre either dead or alive and could be assumed to have been murdered. Audett added a bizarre fillip. He claimed everyone in the Kansas City power structure seemed to know about the impending killings. He said he had been invited by City Manager Henry McElroy’s daughter to come down to the station with her to witness the event. McElroy was Pendergast's "front man" in Kansas City.

"Me and Mary McElroy watched the whole thing from less than fifty yards away," Audett claimed. If true, Audett's charges give a distinct political flavor to the massacre. They also show that Floyd and Richetti were innocent and that more shocking things than a mere underworld massacre happened in the Kansas City of that era.

Karpis, Alvin "Creepy" (1907–1979) public enemy

None of the public enemies of the 1930s upset FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover more than did Alvin "Creepy" Karpis. Hoover always referred to him as a "rat," and Karpis sent word to the head G-Man that he intended to kill him the way his agents had killed Freddie Barker and his mother Ma Barker, during a famous shoot-out in Florida in 1935. According to Karpis, Ma Barker was never a criminal mastermind but just a dumpy little middle-aged woman trying to take care of her wild—and murderous—boys as well as she could. That same year Karpis resurrected the virtually defunct art of train robbery, holding up a train in Garrettsville, Ohio, partly because he knew it would be regarded by Hoover as a personal affront. Once a crime had been wiped out, no one was supposed to bring it back.

A Montreal-born, Kansas-raised gangster, Karpis met Freddie Barker in prison, where the former was doing a term for safecracking. Barker brought him home to Ma Barker, who took an instant liking to the sallow, dour-faced, "creepy"-looking Karpis, and treated him like another son, probably because Freddie was the only one not imprisoned or dead at the time.

As some of the other sons came back from prison, the Barkers and Karpis organized a formidable gang. They robbed a number of banks and in 1933 kidnapped a St. Paul brewery millionaire, William Hamm, for whom they got $100,000 in ransom. Six months later, the gang abducted a Minneapolis banker, Edward Bremer, and netted $200,000. The FBI fostered a myth that Ma Barker was the brains of the gang, a claim for which there is no evidence whatsoever. It is also doubtful any criminal as capable as Karpis would have taken orders from a middle-aged woman. Karpis' version of the real Ma Barker was that she "just didn't have the brains or know-how to direct us on a robbery. It wouldn't have occurred to her to get involved in our business, and we always made a point of only discussing our scores when Ma wasn't around. We'd leave her at home when we were arranging a job, or we'd send her to a movie. Ma saw a lot of movies."

When Freddie Barker, along with Ma, was fatally shot in 1935, the Barker-Karpis mob was finished. Doc Barker had been captured shortly before and was already in Alcatraz. Karpis carried on with minor criminals, robbing a train that was supposed to have a $200,000 payroll on board but had only $34,000.

During a Senate committee hearing in April 1936, Sen. Kenneth D. McKellar of Tennessee subjected Hoover to a savage grilling about the performance of the FBI and the director's own competence, stressing the point that Hoover had never made an arrest. After the hearing Hoover vowed to take Karpis personally.

When word was received the following month that Karpis was holed up in New Orleans, Hoover flew to the scene to be in on the arrest. FBI agents swarmed all over Karpis' car and captured him as he was about to drive away from the house. Hoover himself announced that he was under arrest. "Put the handcuffs on him," Hoover snapped, but among the horde of agents not one had remembered to bring handcuffs. An agent had to pull off his necktie to tie Karpis' hands.

According to Karpis' memoirs, published in 1971, his arrest, which had made Hoover a national hero, was not quite as heroic as it was made to appear. In The FBI Story, which is at least a semi-official history of the agency, author Don Whitehead states that Hoover grabbed Karpis before he could reach for a rifle on the backseat. Yet the car Karpis was captured in was a 1936 Plymouth coupe, which, as he asserted, had no backseat.

"The most obvious flaw in the FBI story, though," Karpis wrote, "lies in Hoover's own character. He didn't lead the attack on me. He hid until I was safely covered by many guns. He waited until he was told the coast was clear. Then he came out to reap the glory. . . . That May day in 1936, I made Hoover's reputation as a fearless lawman. It's a reputation he doesn't deserve."

Sentenced to life imprisonment, Karpis entered Alcatraz in 1936 and remained there until transferred to the McNeil Island Penitentiary in Washington in 1962. When transferred he had served more time on the Rock than any other inmate. In January 1969, after doing almost 33 years, Karpis was released on parole and deported to his native Canada. His book appeared in 1971. In the late 1970s he lived in quiet retirement in Spain.

Keating, Charles H., Jr. (1923–) savings and loan scandal figure

Throughout the entire savings and loan (S&L) scandal, which rocked American finance in the late 1980s, Charles H. Keating Jr. remained the most blatant participant. Keating's case—estimated to have cost U.S. taxpayers some $2.6 billion—even jeopardized the reputation of the U.S. Senate because of the actions of the so-called Keating Five. It was a prime example of unfettered S&L officials living high on the hog and playing fast and loose with depositors' and investors' money.

February 1984—American Continental Corp., formed by Keating, buys the Lincoln Savings and Loan of California for $51 million.

March 1986—The Federal Home Loan Bank in San Francisco starts an examination of Lincoln's rapid growth and hectic investment activities.

Mid-1986—San Francisco bank examiners urge Washington officials to come down hard on Lincoln for questionable accounting and loan procedures.

November 1986—Five U.S. Senators—Alan Cranston of California, John Glenn of Ohio, Donald W. Riegle of Michigan and Dennis DeConcini (all Democrats) and Republican John McCain of Arizona—meet with examiners on behalf of Keating, who has made large political contributions to them.

May 1987—Examiners recommend that Lincoln be seized for operating in an unsound manner and dissipating its assets. Nothing happens.

April 12, 1989—American Continental files for bankruptcy protection, making its junk bonds worthless.

April 14, 1989—The government now takes control of Lincoln and puts the bailout at an eventual cost of $2.6 million, the most expensive in history.

September 1990—A California grand jury charges Keating and three others with securities fraud, saying they had deceived investors into buying junk bonds without telling them the risk. Many Lincoln investors thought they were buying government-insured bonds.

February 1991—After a three-and-a-half month investigation, the Senate Ethics Committee renders a verdict in the case of the Keating Five. It declares there was "substantial credible evidence" of misconduct by Senator Cranston (leading to a severe rebuke from the Senate in November). Riegle and DeConcini are described as giving the appearance of impropriety, but no further action is taken against them. Glenn and McCain are criticized less severely.

December 4, 1991—After a four-month court case, Keating is convicted of securities fraud and sentenced to a 10-year state jail term in California. He still faces federal charges.

July 3, 1993—Keating, convicted of federal charges of fraud, is sentenced to 12 years and seven months, the sentence to run concurrently with the state sentence.

The S&L scandal provoked a tightening of regulations against such institutions, which took their investments far afield. The impact on politics was immense so that by 1999 only John McCain of the Keating Five still was in the Senate.

Keating-Holden Gang 1930s St. Paul gang

Perhaps the most brutal gang of kidnapers, bank robbers and murderers to operate during the 1920s and early 1930s was the Keating-Holden mob, sometimes called the St. Paul Outfit.

Longtime holdup men in Chicago before moving to St. Paul, Minn., Francis Keating and Tommy Holden had a habit of surrounding themselves with criminals who were considered flaky—and thus more likely to be feared by helpless victims. The gang was forced into temporary retirement in the late 1920s, when Keating and Holden were sentenced to 25 years at Leavenworth for a $135,000 mail robbery. By using stolen trustee passes, the pair escaped on February 28, 1930. They may have been supplied the passes by a minor criminal named George Kelly, later famous as Machine Gun Kelly, eager to do a favor for a couple of big-timers. Keating and Holden promptly returned to St. Paul and reorganized their old gang. Among its members were the likes of Frank "Jelly" Nash, who was to die in the Kansas City Massacre, Alvin "Creepy" Karpis, Harvey Bailey, Shotgun George Zeigler, Verne Miller and Freddie Barker. For sheer flakiness the last three could hardly be surpassed. According to underworld legend, Keating and Holden were suspicious when considering Miller for membership since he had once been a sheriff. As a test of his trustworthiness, Miller was told to work over a hood whom the gang leaders did not particularly like. Miller promptly kidnapped the hood, drove him out to the country and broke all of his fingers. Then he let the man go. Keating and Holden were duly impressed that Miller was a "nut" and deserving of membership in the gang.

The reconstituted gang terrorized parts of the Midwest for about a year and a half until Keating, Holden and Bailey were captured on July 7, 1932, while playing golf at the Old Mission Golf Course in Kansas City. But what the arresting team of FBI agents and city police didn't realize was that the trio had teed off as a foursome. Jelly Nash, a terrible golfer, was trailing far behind. By the time he played through 18 holes, he could only wonder what had happened to his comrades.

Holden and Keating returned to prison under life sentences and their gang disintegrated, but three surviving members—Alvin Karpis, Freddie Barker and Shotgun Ziegler—went on to form the infamous Barker-Karpis gang of bank robbers and kidnapers.

Keeler, Leonarde (1903–1949) lie detector expert

The father of the polygraph, Leonarde Keeler was considered the nation's foremost authority on deception tests. His version of the lie detector was developed in collaboration with Dr. John A. Larson, a pioneering criminologist who was once a policeman in Berkeley, Calif. and later assistant state criminologist of Illinois.

The pair met when Keeler was a student at Stanford University working on a machine of his own. Keeler gladly became Larson's junior partner and the two developed a lie detector that was embraced by August Vollmer, the founder and chief of Berkeley's celebrated "scientific police department."

Their first lie detector used pens to record on a moving strip of graph paper the variations of a suspect's blood pressure, pulse and respiration. Keeler later added galvanic skin response, measured by electrodes attached to the fingertips, which are said to show evidence of perspiration when a person is answering falsely or is under emotional stress.

Keeler's record of success as a lie detector expert was probably unequalled. In many cases his expert testimony led to the freeing of defendants either already convicted or facing certain guilty verdicts.

Keeler, like many other supporters of the polygraph, insisted that when the testing was done by skilled interrogators, his method of detecting lies was far more reliable than the testimony of eyewitnesses. At the time of his death he was bitterly disappointed that the polygraph had failed to gain widespread judicial recognition, although he himself was frequently called to testify as an expert witness. Unlike certain other exponents of the polygraph, Keeler did admit the machine could be "beaten" and that he himself could do so.

Few swindlers have ever deceived their victims and the public longer than ex-carnival pitchman John Keely of Philadelphia. In 1874, he convinced four top financiers, Charles B. Franklyn, an official of the Cunard steamship line, Henry S. Sergeant, president of the Ingersoll Rock Drill Co., John J. Cisco, a leading banker, and Charles B. Collier, a lawyer, that he could convert a quart of water into enough fuel to power a 30-car train a mile a minute for 75 minutes. Over the next 24 years he held frequent demonstrations in his workshop that seemed to confirm he was about to revolutionize the entire field of energy. The previously mentioned foursome organized the Keely Motor Co. and over the years advanced him large sums of money for his research. Company stock was traded on exchanges in this country and Europe and Keely proved adept at getting money out of people besides his primary backers. Clara Jessup Moore, a wealthy widow, not only invested an estimated half-million dollars in Keely's so-called invention but also authored a book entitled Keely and His Discoveries. At one stage, John Jacob Astor "wanted in" to the tune of $2 million.

The Scientific American attacked Keely's claims as ridiculous, but this did nothing to cool the ardor of thousands of investors. Finally, after Keely's death in 1898, investigators dismantled his house and found Keely's mysterious force was nothing more than compressed air. Buried under the kitchen floor of the house was what The Scientific American in its February 4, 1899 issue described as "a steel sphere forty inches in diameter, weighing 6,625 pounds." This sphere was "an ideal storage reservoir for air . . . at great pressure." The compressed air traveled upward to a second-floor workshop, where Keely gave his demonstrations, through steel and brass tubes nine inches in diameter with a three-inch bore, strong enough to withstand the tremendous pressure. Between the ceiling of the room on the first floor and the floor of the workshop was a 16-inch space "well calculated to hide the necessary tubes for conveying the compressed air to the different motors with which Keely produced his results." It was a setting in which "for a quarter of a century the prince of humbugs played his part." Concealed in the walls and floor of the workshop were spring valves that could be operated by foot or elbow to "run" a motor whenever desired. Clearly, the whole setup was similar to the fun and mystery houses Keely had seen during his carnival days.

Had there been a 10 Most Wanted List during the Civil War, John Keene most likely would have made both the Union and Confederate rosters, each for a different set of crimes.

Keene's early background is unknown, but before the outbreak of hostilities he was working in Memphis, Tenn. Immediately after Fort Sumter, he joined the Confederate Navy and was assigned to a ram. Hardly the material with which wars are won, Keene's first hostile action was directed against his own captain, whom he brained with a marlinespike.

Viewing his act as a sort of informal resignation, Keene went on the run. While being hunted by the Southern authorities, Keene allegedly killed a man or two along the way. He eventually made his way back to Memphis, which at the time was in the hands of the Union. This circumstance provided Keene with a new lease on life, but in almost no time, he killed a man named Dolan and was again forced to flee. Changing his name to Bob Black, Keene organized a gang of highway robbers and terrorized the Tennessee countryside, with Union troops in constant pursuit.

Finally captured by Union forces, Keene broke out of the guardroom and headed north. For a while, Keene-Black ran a saloon in St. Paul, Minn. which was little more than a cover for fencing and other criminal activities. When the law closed in on him, he took the only escape path open to him—west. Not surprisingly, he fell in with the wrong sort of people, got in trouble in Salt Lake City and had to make for Montana. There he had a minor association with those notorious outlaws the Innocents, but the Montana Vigilantes soon ordered him out of the territory.

Instead of leaving Montana directly, he headed for Helena, where a short time later he spotted a former acquaintance named Harry Slater sleeping off a jug or two outside a saloon. Back in Salt Lake City, Slater had made it clear that he disliked Keene and intended to do something about it. Keene, a man who always believed in seizing an opportunity, shot the sleeping Slater dead. He was apprehended for the crime and brought before a miners court, which dispensed justice with lightning rapidity. They gave him an hour's grace and then hanged him high from a giant pine.

Kefauver investigation organized crime hearings

Probably the most important probe of organized crime in America was that conducted by the 1950–51 Senate Special Committee to Investigate Crime in Interstate Commerce, more commonly known as the Kefauver investigation. Because the hearings appeared on television, the investigation drew more public attention and had far greater impact than other such probes. Scores of crime figures and politicians came under the camera's gaze as the hearings moved from one major city to another. Headed by Democratic Sen. Estes Kefauver of Tennessee, the five-man panel included fellow Democrats Herbert O'Connor of Maryland and Lester C. Hunt of Wyoming and Republicans Alexander Wiley of Wisconsin and Charles W. Tobey of New Hampshire. Brought before them by chief counsel Rudolph Halley were more than 600 witnesses, including underworld figures from minor hoods to major racketeers and public servants from policemen to mayors.

The Kefauver Committee hearings made the phrase "taking the Fifth" part of the American vernacular, as many witnesses invoked the constitutional right against self-incrimination, although not always eloquently. Gambler Frank Erickson took the Fifth "on the grounds it might intend to criminate me" and Jake "Greasy Thumb" Guzik of the Chicago syndicate felt that his replies could well "discriminate against me."

In Chicago viewers watched police Capt. Dan Gilbert, chief investigator for the state attorney's office in Cook County and often referred to as "the world's richest cop," admit his office had not raided Chicago bookie joints since 1939. In the New York area the cameras focused on New Jersey top underworld fixer Longie Zwillman, from whom former Republican Gov. Harold G. Hoffman had personally solicited support in 1946. Three years later, Zwillman had offered to give $300,000 to the Democratic candidate for governor, Elmer Wene, in exchange for letting him name the state's attorney general. The offer had been refused.

In Louisiana the committee turned up county sheriffs and other lawmen who refused to enforce gambling laws because they insisted their communities would die without gambling revenues and that thousands of people, many old and underprivileged, would lose their jobs in the illegal casinos. By coincidence, these same sheriffs and marshals somehow had gotten very rich, as had the New Orleans chief of detectives, who—on a salary of $186 a month—managed to squirrel away some $150,000 in a safe-deposit box. In Detroit the committee found some important mob figures, such as Joe Adonis and Anthony D'Anna, maintained important business concessions with the Ford Motor Co. despite their notorious backgrounds. The panel charged that a meeting between D'Anna and Harry Bennett, at the time Henry Ford's chief aide, was held at the latter's request to instruct him [D'Anna] not to murder Joseph Tocco, who had a food concession at a Ford plant. . . . Bennett entered into an agreement that D'Anna would refrain from murdering Tocco for five years in return for the Ford agency at Wyandotte. As a matter of record, Tocco was not murdered until seven years after this meeting. Also as a matter of record, D'Anna did become a 50 percent owner in the Ford agency at Wyandotte within a matter of weeks after the meeting.

The highest entertainment point of the hearings occurred in New York City, where Virginia Hill, the lady friend of a number of top mobsters and reputed bag lady for the mob, provided a bit of comic relief as she denied any knowledge of the mobsters' business. She also contributed a touch of violence when, leaving the hearings, she threw a right cross to the jaw of reporter Marjorie Farnsworth. Turning to the remaining horde of reporters and photographers, she screamed: "You goddamn bastards. I hope an atom bomb falls on all of you."

Frank Costello added to the drama at the hearings when he refused to give testimony before the television cameras and threatened to walk out. He finally testified after it was agreed his face would not be shown: the cameras instead focused on his hands, making them the most famous pair of hands on television. The committee looked closely into Costello's far-flung criminal activities: his interests in gambling rackets and casinos in Louisiana, his connection with a harness racing track, from which he received an annual stipend to keep bookies off the premises; and his power in Manhattan politics, which included the ability to name judges to the bench. When asked why Tammany boss Hugo Rogers had once said, "If Costello wanted me, he would send for me," Costello stated he was totally mystified.

When the questioning got too tough, Costello staged a famous walkout, and by the conclusion of his testimony, it was obvious that he would never return to his high position in the underworld syndicate. He had been too badly damaged by evidence presented in the probe and was faced with constant legal battles. He was sentenced to 18 months for contempt and later did another term for income tax evasion.

Probably even more damaged by the hearings was former New York City Mayor William O'Dwyer, who came out of the inquiry a symbol of civic corruption. Accommodation with organized crime was a hallmark of O'Dwyer's reign both as mayor and earlier as district attorney in Brooklyn. Indeed, even before the hearings the revelations concerning O'Dwyer's association with criminal elements forced him to resign the mayoralty to seek the relative sanctuary of the ambassadorship to Mexico.

The committee produced evidence that O'Dwyer was friendly with top mobsters Joe Adonis and Costello and had often visited the latter's home. Sworn testimony that envelopes of money were passed to O'Dwyer by leaders of city unions brought hazy or contradictory recollections from the ex-mayor. In its report the panel excoriated O'Dwyer:

A single pattern of conduct emerges from O'Dwyer's official activities in regard to the gambling and waterfront rackets, murders and police corruption, from his days as district attorney through his term as mayor. No matter what the motivation of his choice, action or inaction, it often seemed to result favorably for men suspected of being high up in the rackets. . . . His actions impeded promising investigations. . . . His defense of public officials who were derelict in their duties and his actions in investigations of corruption, and his failure to follow up concrete evidence of organized crime . . . have contributed to the growth of organized crime, racketeering and gangsterism in New York City.

When the investigation ended, the Kefauver Committee offered a number of suggestions to tighten up the laws against racketeers and crooked politicians. Among the recommendations adopted were the formation of a racket squad in the Justice Department, increased penalties for the sale of narcotics, various curbs on gambling and the dissemination of gambling information and increased efforts to deport gangsters. Cynics claimed that within a few months the syndicate was running as smoothly as ever, but this was not so. There were several far-reaching changes. Costello's power was broken; Adonis was deported (voluntarily to avoid prison); gambler Willie Moretti was executed by his comrades, who feared his bantering testimony indicated that mental illness was loosening his tongue; and reform movements gained in a number of cities. While the underworld was hardly destroyed, it was badly wounded. Furthermore, the FBI, which had for years denied the existence of a “Mafia” or of “organized crime” at last joined the battle against them.

Daniel Kelley was a Western outlaw who was captured in a standoff with a barber.

Kelley was one of five holdup men who staged Arizona’s infamous Bisbee Massacre, a robbery in 1883 in which four innocent bystanders, three men and a woman, were killed. The massacre sparked one of the West’s greatest manhunts, with each of the five men eventually tracked down. Kelley got as far as Deming, N.M., by then sporting a heavy beard. He visited a barber shop to have his heavy stubble removed, not knowing that he had been identified as one of the murderers and his identity telegraphed throughout the Southwest. When the barber, Augustin Salas, set about shaving off the beard, he recognized Kelley and immediately planted the razor across his throat and yelled out for a passersby to go for help. For several minutes the two waged a strange duel, with the barber holding the razor to Kelley’s Adam’s apple and the latter fingering his revolver, until the outlaw was taken into custody.

It is a part of western folklore that the circumstance of Kelley’s capture spawned the term “close shave,” but the claim is probably disputable. In any event, Kelley was hanged on March 8, 1884.

Kelly, George R. “Machine Gun” (1895–1954) public enemy

Of all the public enemies of the 1930s, George “Machine Gun” Kelly enjoyed the best press. Everyone insisted he was a very bad man, especially his wife Kathryn and the FBI’s J. Edgar Hoover, but calling Kelly Public Enemy No. 1 was an insult to hundreds of far more dangerous criminals. One candid profiler called him “a good-natured slob, a bootlegger who spilled more than he delivered,” referring to his criminal activities before he met and married the flamboyant Kathryn Shannon. She gave him his reputation, making him into something supposedly big in big-time crime, but the fact is that Kelly never fired a shot at anyone and he certainly never killed anyone, a remarkable statistic for a public enemy dubbed Machine Gun.

Kelly met Kathryn in Oklahoma City, where he was already out of his element just trying to make it as a simple bootlegger. She had excellent underworld connections thanks to a “fugitive farm” her parents ran on their small Texas ranch, where criminals on the run could hide out for a price. Determined to make Kelly into a fearless crook, Kathryn gave him a machine gun as a gift and had him practice shooting walnuts off fence posts. It must have been exciting for Kelly, who already had a “bum ticker.” Kathryn passed out cartridge cases in underworld dives, remarking, “Have a souvenir of my husband, Machine Gun Kelly.” Machine Gun, she would say, was at the moment “away robbing banks.”

Machine Gun did break in with a few small bank holdup gangs and took part in some capers in Mississippi and Texas. Fortunately for Kelly, he never had to prove his mettle under fire, since the jobs went off smoothly. Soon, Kathryn insisted they go big time like some other mobs and get into kidnapping. They formed a kidnap gang with a rather mild-mannered middle-aged crook named Albert Bates. The two men, armed with machine guns, broke into the home of millionaire oil man Charley Urschel in Oklahoma City. The Urschels were playing cards with a neighboring couple. Kelly, not exactly a master at planning a job, hadn’t the least idea which one was Urschel, never having seen or even obtained a picture of him. When no one would say who Urschel was, the kidnappers were forced to take the two men. After they drove for a while, Kelly had both men produce their wallets and identified Urschel. He tossed the other, Walter Jarrett, out on an empty road.

After a number of false steps and missed signals, the kidnappers collected $200,000 in ransom. Once they had the money, Kathryn demanded they protect themselves by “killing the bastard,” but Kelly, in the one time he stood up to his wife, convinced the others in the gang that their victim should be freed or it would “be bad for future business.”

The FBI ran the gang to earth thanks to victim Urschel, who turned out to have a brilliant memory. Although he had been kept blindfolded throughout his ordeal of several days, he was able to remember so many details that the agents soon identified the place where he had been held as the ranch of Kathryn’s parents in Texas. Once the gang members were identified, they were readily captured. Bates was picked up in Denver. Kelly and Kathryn were cornered a little later in a hideout in Memphis. According to the version later given by Hoover, Kelly cringed in a corner of the room, hands upraised, and pleaded: “Don’t shoot, G-men,—don’t shoot.” This dramatic incident supposedly gave the FBI agents their popular name. The tale was sheer hogwash, however. The name “G-men” had been used years earlier to describe government workers and agents, and Kelly was actually captured by Detective Sgt. W. J. Raney and Detectives A. O. Clark and Floyd Wiebenga of the Memphis Police. After the three broke down the bedroom door, Raney shoved a shotgun into Kelly’s paunch, and Kelly said, “I’ve been waiting for you all night.”

Shipped off to Alcatraz under a life sentence, Kelly soon became known as the easygoing man he always had been (Pop Gun Kelly to some) and was eventually transferred out of that prison of toughs to Leavenworth, where he died of a heart attack in 1954. Kathryn Kelly was released from her life sentence in 1958 and faded into oblivion with her aged mother.

For a quarter century beginning in the late 1890s, John Kelly was known as the most honest gambling house operator in the country, an attribute that did not stand him well with the police, since he was famous for refusing to pay for protection.

Honest John earned his sobriquet when he was a baseball umpire. In 1888 he refused a $10,000 bribe to favor Boston in an important game with Providence. Thereafter, he became the darling of the big gamblers and was trusted to be the dealer in games where tens of thousands of dollars were riding on a turn of a card. In the late 1890s Honest John opened his own gambling house in New York City and became so prosperous that he soon had operations at several locations, all renowned for being totally honest. His best-known house was a brownstone at 156 West 44th Street, where he fought many battles with the police, boasting he constantly had to buy new doors and windows to replace those smashed by indignant detectives. The worst raid occurred in 1912, when the police descended on the gambling house with crow bars and fire axes and smashed doors, windows, gambling equipment and furniture. The raid succeeded only in making Kelly a hero to the public, and when he opened the Vendome Club on West 141st Street, his business boomed. After Kelly closed the West 44th Street brownstone, the police remained convinced he was still operating it for gambling purposes and stationed an officer at the front door. Sight-seeing buses took visitors past the brownstone, and guides pointed out the gambling house that wouldn’t pay off the police. The guides insisted patrons entered it through trapdoors from other buildings, but further police raids never uncovered any gambling. In the early 1920s Honest John sold the building to a Republican Party organization and relocated to Palm Beach, Fla. where he operated a place with only limited success because of his refusal to pay protection. He died on March 28, 1926.

Kelly, Joseph “Bunco” (1838–1934) shanghaiier and murderer

Oddly, the two greatest shanghaiers in America were named Kelly—Shanghai Kelly and Joseph “Bunco” Kelly. At age 26, Joseph Kelly of Liverpool, England set up in Portland, Ore. in 1859 and for the next 35 years made thousands of men into unwilling seamen, filling orders from crew-short sea captains. Totally without conscience, he hesitated at sending no one to sea, recruiting his victims from anywhere along the waterfront. He often used two doxies, Liverpool Liz and Esmeralda, as sex lures to coax drunks from Erickson’s Saloon, where it took 15 men to tend the block-long bar, or from the Paris House, the city’s biggest brothel, or from Mark Cook’s Saloon. If such tactics failed, he simply bludgeoned hapless passersby and carted them off to a ship ready to sail.

Kelly sometimes had trouble acquiring accomplices, and for good reason. After once receiving an order for 10 men, he and two assistants deposited eight drunks into a ship’s hold. “Here,” said the skipper, “I need ten men, I told you.”

Kelly nodded, battered his two aides senseless and collected for a full consignment. The profitability of the procedure was unassailable: in addition to collecting a fee for his assistants—as well as the other shanghai victims—he also saved the money he would otherwise have had to pay them.

Kelly picked up his nickname Bunco for another of his double-dealing deeds. He would bring an apparent victim wrapped in a blanket aboardship and deposit him directly in a bunk, telling the captain, “drunkenest sailor I ever seen.” Kelly would collect his $50 stipend as the ship set sail. Not until the next morning would the angered captain discover Kelly had slipped him a cigar store Indian instead of a drunken sailor.

Bunco’s biggest coup occurred when he came across 24 waterfront bums either dead or dying in the basement of an undertaking establishment, where they had partaken of barrels filled with embalming fluid under the illusion they were inside the next building, which was a saloon. At the time Bunco found them, he had an order outstanding for 22 shanghai victims at $30 a head. The master of the craft was extremely pleased when Kelly oversupplied the order by two, and gratefully handed him $720 for the bunch. The next day the redfaced captain had to dock in order to unload 14 corpses and another 10 men whose lives could be saved only by energetic stomach pumping. The captain vowed never again to do business with Bunco Kelly, but he probably broke his resolutions, since in Portland a ship's master almost had to deal with Kelly, even if wisdom required a close inspection of any goods purchased from him.

Despite actions by the police, which varied from largely indifferent to modestly determined, Kelly continued his nefarious trade until 1894, when he was apprehended for murdering a retired saloon keeper, 73-year-old George Washington Sayres. Kelly denied the charge, claiming it was a frame-up by competitors who wanted to take over his business. "I am being tried not as the person who killed poor old George Sayres," Bunco said in a statement. "I am being tried for all the crimes ever committed in the North End. I am on trial because I am operating a successful sailor's boardinghouse—the finest on this coast. I am being tried because I have no influence with the city's politicians. I had nothing against George Sayres."

That last statement, at least, was accurate. The jury concluded Kelly had committed the murder for $2,000 given him by Sayres' enemies.

Kelly did 13 years in the Oregon State Penitentiary and was released in 1907. He got a newspaperman named John Kelly, no relation, to help him write a book, Thirteen Years in the Oregon Pen, in which he continued to proclaim his innocence. Kelly left Portland in 1909 and eventually was said to have ended up in South America, where, as proof of the adage that only the good die young, he lived until the ripe old age of 96.

Kelly, Shanghai (1835–?) shanghaier

Without doubt the most-feared name wherever Pacific sailors gathered in the 19th century was that of Shanghai Kelly, a stubby, red-bearded Irishman who became the most prodigious shanghaier on San Francisco's Barbary Coast.

Kelly maintained a saloon and boardinghouse at 33 Pacific Street. There is no way to precisely estimate how many men passed through his notorious shanghai pipelines but it was at least 10,000. He got the best deal from shipmasters because he generally provided bona fide sailors rather than unsuspecting landlubbers who happened to stumble along. Not that Kelly didn't turn a dishonest dollar in his shanghai operations whenever he could. Occasionally, among a boatload of drugged victims, Kelly would toss in a corpse or two. Since the usual transaction only allowed time for a head count of men in various degrees of stupor, it is easy to see how a captain might not discover he had been "stuffed with a stiff," as the saying went, until he was well out into the Pacific. Police could only wonder how many murder victims were turned over to Kelly to be disposed of for a price, thus providing him with a double fee. The master shanghaier knew that such a corpse would receive a quick and unrecorded burial far out at sea.

Feared as he was, Kelly still had no trouble keeping his boardinghouse stocked with sailors, many of whom knew the fate that lay in store for them. The popularity of Kelly's place rested on his reputation of providing free women to go along with his free liquor. To many a sailor the price of their next voyage was little enough to pay. Once, in the 1870s, though Kelly received an order for 90 sailors at a time when he was understocked. Chartering a paddle-wheel steamer, he announced he would celebrate his birthday with a picnic at which there would be all the liquor a celebrant could drink. Naturally, there was an admission charge, since Kelly firmly believed in getting all he could out of any deal. He kept a close count of the willing celebrants clamoring aboard and as soon as the number reached 90 the gangplank was pulled up and the steamer paddled off. Barrels of beer and whiskey were opened and the happy picnickers toasted Kelly's health. Of course, all the drink was heavily drugged and within a couple of hours everyone aboard except Kelly and his men was sound asleep. The paddle steamer pulled up to the two ships that had ordered crews, and Kelly handed over the agreed-on number to each and collected his pay. On his way back, he rescued survivors from the Yankee Blade which had sunk off Santa Barbara. Luckily for Kelly, the landing of the rescued men caused great stir and nobody noticed that his picnic guests were missing. Of course, he would have felt even luckier if he had been able to sell the rescued seamen as well.

Kelly was active in his trade till near the end of the 19th century, when he faded from sight.

Kemmler, William (1861–1890) first victim of electric chair

The first man to die in the electric chair, William Kemmler was an illiterate Buffalo, N.Y. huckster who took an ax to his mistress, Tillie Ziegler. His case became a cause celebre only because of the novel method of execution ordered for him.

On death row Kemmler became a minor pawn in a major economic battle between two industrial giants, Thomas Edison and George Westinghouse. Edison had developed the first electric power system through the use of low-tension direct current (DC). Westinghouse then devised his alternating current (AC) system, which was much superior because it was easier and less costly to install. Edison sought to discourage the use of AC by pointing out its death-dealing potential. His arguments were so telling that Westinghouse's system was adapted for use in the new electric chair. Fearful that the use of AC for executions would affect its general acceptance by the public, Westinghouse waged a long, expensive campaign to save Kemmler from death. He hired top legal talent, including Bourke Cochran, then considered the leading lawyer in the country, and spent well over $100,000 in a losing cause.

While an appeal was sent to the Supreme Court for a ruling on the constitutionality of the punishment, Edwin F. Davis, the electrician at Auburn Prison, started building the chair in the institution's wood-working shop. Although authorities tried to keep the work a secret, newspapers presented diagrams that closely resembled what the real chair looked like. The papers also hastened to inform their apprehensive readers that the contraption "was not at all uncomfortable to sit in." Finally, on August 6, 1890, Kemmler went to the chair. As one observer wrote later, "His manner indicated a state of subdued elation, as if he were gratified at being the central figure of the occasion." The execution was botched badly. After the current was turned off, Kemmler's body moved and frantic officials rushed to apply more current. Newspaper comment on the execution was universally unfavorable. The Buffalo Express predicted in an editorial, "Kemmler will be the last man executed in such a manner."

Kemper, Edmund Emil, III (1948–) California's "coed killer"

In 1972 and 1973, 25-year-old Edmund Kemper, a 280-pound, six-foot-nine giant, terrorized Santa Cruz County, Calif., particularly female students at the Santa Cruz campus of the University of California. Kemper killed six women, decapitating them and performing sex acts that could not be fully reported in the newspapers.

Kemper had an earlier history of murder. In 1964, at the age of 16, he was living with his grandparents when he started wondering what it would be like to shoot his grandmother. So he did. Then he shot his grandfather and called his mother to inform her that both her parents were dead. Judged insane, Kemper was confined at the Atacadero State Hospital. In 1969 the medical board at the institution found him "fully recovered," and he was released over the strenuous objection of the prosecuting attorney in his case.

Apparently free of antisocial tendencies, Kemper expended considerable effort to have the record of his earlier murder sealed and convinced four psychiatric specialists to support him in court. During his last two psychiatric interviews, the head of his most recent victim was in the trunk of his car parked just outside the psychiatrist's office.

Because Kemper's mother worked for the university, Kemper was able to obtain a school parking sticker, which allayed any suspicions of hitchhiking coeds when he offered them a ride. Kemper always kept large cellophane bags in his car so that if he killed and dismembered a girl, the upholstery would not be stained. He safely delivered many more girls than he actually killed, making certain not to harm any who had been seen getting into his car. Kemper generally decapitated the victims with a power saw and kept some of the bodies in his room for a day or two before disposing of them.

On April 20, 1973 Kemper bludgeoned his mother to death as she slept and dismembered her body, severing her hands and throwing them into the garbage disposal. He shoved the headless torso into a closet and then invited over a woman neighbor, his mother's best friend, and strangled her also. He threw her body in with his mother's and went to a local bar called the Jury Room, where he often drank with a number of off-duty police officers. After a time, Kemper got in his car and drove off. Three days later, in Pueblo, Colo., he called Santa Cruz police, who still knew nothing of the murderers, and gave himself up, warning he might kill more unless he was taken.

Convicted of eight counts of first-degree murder, Kemper was asked what he considered to be a fit punishment. He replied, "Death by torture." He was sentenced to life imprisonment and first became eligible for parole in 1980.

Kerryonians 19th-century New York Irish gang

Among the gangs of the Five Points, the worst crime district in 19th-century New York City, were the Kerryonians, who were organized around 1825. A collection of thugs, pickpockets, thieves and murderers no better than the Plug Uglies, Chichesters, Roach Guards or Dead Rabbits, the Kerryonians, natives of County Kerry, Ireland, had one distinction: they made it a rule only to victimize Englishmen, or at least individuals who looked English. Eventually, absorbed into other gangs, the aging

Ketchum, "Black Jack" Tom (1862–1901) train robber and murderer

Black Jack Ketchum and his brother Sam were Butch Cassidy's chief rivals as leaders of the various Hole in the Wall gangs in the 1890s. It was a situation that bewildered Cassidy, since he regarded the Ketchums as about the most stupid outlaws he'd ever met. And it was hard to fault his logic: after all Black Jack often beat himself over the head with his own six-shooter when things went wrong. Yet somehow Ketchum managed to blast his way into prominence in the annals of outlawry, so that when he was hanged even the New York Times felt the event deserved special coverage, a fortuitous decision since the affair proved memorable.

Tom and brother Sam rode out of their native Texas Panhandle in the early 1880s and made their way north, punching cattle and doing various odd jobs, until they reached New Mexico, where the brothers turned to crime. They held up a store-post office in Tucumcari, and when the angry owner, Levi Herzstein, took up their trail, they murdered him. The Ketchums next turned up in Hole in the Wall country in Wyoming and soon led a number of other outlaws on various robbery sprees. Late in 1898 Black Jack and his men robbed a train, the Twin Flyer, near Twin Mountains, New Mexico Territory of less than $500. If the robbery hadn't exactly been lucrative it had at least worked. Convinced he had a winning formula, Black Jack stuck up the same train at the same spot three more times, the last on July 11, 1899. But on that day the law was ready. A posse captured most of the robbers at Turkey Canyon, near Cimarron. During the gun battle Sheriff Edward Farr of Huerfano County, Colo. and W. H. Love of Cimarron were killed. Although shot through the shoulder Ketchum escaped capture, but only for a few days. He was caught and brought to trial in Santa Fe.

The apprehension of the most-wanted man in the Southwest aside from Butch Cassidy caused a sensation, and newspapers from coast to coast covered Ketchum's trial. He was found guilty of "attempted train robbery." Since the penalty for that offense was death, indicting him for murder had been considered unnecessary. Delays in the case put off Black Jack's hanging until April 26, 1901. Ketchum watched the building of the scaffold for his hanging outside his cell window. "Very good, boys," he yelled to the workmen when it was completed, "but why don't you tear down that stockade so the boys can see a man hang who never killed anyone."

On the day of his execution, the condemned man "leaped" up the gallows steps, the Times correspondent reported. Black Jack helped in adjusting the noose around his neck and said cheerfully, "I'll be in Hell before you start breakfast." After the black cap was placed over his head, Ketchum called out "Let 'er go."

The trap was sprung, but the weights had been amateurishly adjusted and Ketchum's head was torn from his shoulders. Later, some writers found it necessary to improve on the ghoulish story, so they changed Black Jack's last words to "Let her rip!"

Ketchum, Sam (1860–1899) train robber and murderer

Sam Ketchum, the brother of the infamous "Black Jack" Tom Ketchum, basked in his younger brother's glory and, in fact, was considered by some lawmen to be the real Black Jack. Actually, he was little more than a follower of his brother, as he demonstrated after Black Jack's capture in July 1899. Black Jack had daringly and stupidly held up Train No. 1 at Twin Mountains, N.M. four different times. He was finally caught. That left Sam in charge of the gang back in Hole in the Wall. It was an awesome responsibility for him since he had to plan a robbery without his brother's guidance. In what stands as a monument to outlaw obtuseness, Sam Ketchum came up with a grand scheme: the gang would hold up Train No. 1 at Twin Mountains. On August 16, 1899 the last of the Ketchum gang staged the suicidal undertaking. Sam Ketchum was shot by conductor Frank Harrington. With pursuers hot on his trail, he made it to a ranch, where a cowboy amputated his shotgun-shattered arm. It was a botched job and his captors could not save him from dying of blood poisoning.

key racket B-girl swindle

The so-called key racket, where a bar-girl gives a customer the supposed key to her apartment in exchange for cash, is still practiced.

Shortly after its birth in San Francisco, it reached the proportions of a minor industry in that city. The practice began in the Seattle Saloon and Dance Hall, perhaps the lowest dive on San Francisco's Barbary Coast after the earthquake of 1906. The second floor of the Seattle was an assignation floor, where the 20-odd "waiter girls" could adjourn with customers. The ladies developed a lucrative sideline making dates to meet drunken customers after the Seattle closed at 3 A.M. In this scam a woman would promise to spend the night with a customer but only if the meeting were kept secret from her boyfriend, who met her each night after the saloon closed and escorted her home. It would therefore be impossible for the customer and the woman to leave the resort together. Instead, she would offer to sell the man a key to her flat for a price ranging from $1 to $5, depending on what she thought the traffic would bear, so that he could join her an hour after closing. If the customer objected that he was paying for a pig in a poke, the woman would counter that since she did not know him, she would be stuck with the expense of changing the lock on her door if he didn't show up. To a man with a liquor-logged brain, the argument often made sense. After handing over the cash, the customer would write down the woman's address, which would be some nearby building but, of course, not the one where she really lived.

Some popular waiter-girls at the Seattle often sold a dozen keys a night. The custom was soon picked up in most of the other Barbary Coast resorts, so that on a typical night, long after the dance halls closed, scores of furtive figures would be seen staggering through the streets, key in hand, trying to find a door that would open. For a time, watching the "key men" became a slumming sport for those San Franciscans who were rather proud of their city's reputation as the vilest this side of decadent Paris. The lucrative practice continued for about a year until the police cracked down on it as a result of newspaper exposés that published hundreds of complaints from reputable householders plagued by drunks trying to unlock their doors.

"kicking the habit"

The term kicking the habit refers to the process drug addicts undergo to conquer their addiction to narcotics. In the first days of withdrawal, an addict suffers only minor symptoms, such as yawning, watery eyes, running nose and sweating. During the peak period of withdrawal, which starts 48 to 72 hours after the last dose, the addict becomes irritable and restless. He is unable to sleep and has no desire to eat. He suffers gooseflesh, tremors and severe sneezing and yawning. Then he is wracked by nausea and vomiting and often suffers stomach cramps and diarrhea. The addict alternately feels flush and chilled and enormous pain builds up in the bones and muscles of the back and in the extremities. Usually, he will experience muscle spasms and kicking movements, hence the expression kicking the habit. Even when this period of suffering subsides, there is no guarantee that the addict is cured, as restoration of physiological and psychological equilibrium vary in individual cases.

Kid Curry (1865–1904) robber and murderer

Perhaps the most feared of the Wild Bunch, Harvey Logan, better known as Kid Curry, probably killed more lawmen than any other Western outlaw. He killed and wounded several law officers in the Wyoming, Arizona and Utah territories. Before he joined the Wild Bunch he had killed eight men in street gunfights. As a Buncher, he had to be contained by Butch Cassidy or his murder toll would have been much higher.

One of four Logan brothers, Harvey hailed from Missouri. At 19, he and two younger brothers and a cousin headed for Wyoming, where the four became rustlers, soon gathering enough stock to start their own ranch. Harvey learned the art of rustling from Big Nose George Curry, who was the top stock thief in Wyoming's Powder River region during the 1870s.

Harvey so admired Big Nose that upon his lynching in 1882, he adopted the older man's surname as his own, becoming known as Kid Curry. In the mid-1890s Kid Curry turned up at Hole in the Wall, the notorious outlaw hideout, and hooked up with the Wild Bunch. Cassidy liked Curry's raw nerve and dependability, but he often found it necessary to put himself between the Kid and train guards to prevent needless slaughter.

When Cassidy and the Sundance Kid decided in 1901 that the West was getting too hot and opted for South America, Kid Curry promised to join them but instead went on robbing banks and trains to become the most-hunted outlaw in the country. He worked his way east as far as Knoxville, Tenn. where he got involved in a shoot-out with the police, wounding three of them, and although wounded himself, he managed to escape. Tracked by a posse using bloodhounds, he was captured 20 miles outside the city.

Placed in the Knoxville Jail pending transfer to an "escape-proof" prison in Columbus, Ohio, he executed one of the most sensational jail breaks in criminal history. He used a noose he made of wire from a broom to strangle a jail guard, tied up two others, and forced another to saddle him up a horse, on which he made his escape. Where Curry went is a matter of some dispute. Some say he went on to South America and joined up with Cassidy and Sundance. Others, including the Pinkertons, insisted he returned to the West and formed up a new gang in Colorado. According to this theory, over a period of 12 days he traveled 1,400 miles, hooked on as a ranch hand with a brand new identity, formed a gang, robbed a train and spent two days on the run before being trapped by the law.

Curry was cornered near Glenwood Springs. Rather than be captured again, he put a bullet through his head. The Pinkertons identified the dead man as Kid Curry. Others, including a number of deputies and chief agent Canada of the Union Pacific, objected. The dead man's picture was taken back to the jail in Knoxville, where those guards who had been in daily contact with the jail's most famous prisoner unanimously agreed it was a photo of Kid Curry. A federal court ordered the case "closed by virtue of suicide."

For a time in the early 1920s, the premier gangster in New York City was Kid Dropper, born Nathan Kaplan, who literally murdered his way into the position of top labor slugger-extortionist during the post-World War I period. He had come a long way from his lowly position as a minor ally of the last great New York criminal gang before the advent of Prohibition, the Five Pointers.

In his youth he earned the sobriquet Kid Dropper from his scam of dropping a wallet filled with counterfeit money on the street. He would then pick it up in front of a potential victim, pretend it was an accidental discovery and, claiming to be in a great hurry, offer to sell it to the mark, who in turn would be able to return it to its rightful owner for a reward to keep it.

As late as 1911, when he was sentenced to seven years in prison for robbery, Kid Dropper was not considered a major criminal. When he came out, however, there was a void in the labor slugging field left by the passage from the scene of Dopey Benny Fein and Joe the Greaser Rosensweig. Kid Dropper organized a gang with another Five Pointers alumnus, young Johnny Spanish, a vicious killer with perhaps more nerve than the Dropper. Previously, they had had a falling out over a woman and Spanish had done seven years for shooting her. That rift indicated the two could not work together for long, especially since each obviously intended to become "top dog."

Soon, a war broke out between the two rivals, and both fielded platoons of killers. Bullet-ridden corpses became commonplace, particularly in the garment district. The war was concluded on July 29, 1919, when three men, one always presumed to have been the Dropper, walked up behind Johnny Spanish as he left a Second Avenue restaurant and emptied their revolvers into his body.

Thereafter, the Kid headed all the important labor slugging rackets in the city, working either for the unions or the employers or both. Between 1920 and 1923 the Dropper was responsible for at least an estimated 20 murders. He became a notorious sight along Broadway in his belted check suit of extreme cut, narrow pointed shoes, and stylish derby or straw hat slanted rakishly over one eye, and at all times he was surrounded by a bevy of gunmen.

By 1923 the Dropper was beset by new and even tougher opponents than the late unlamented Johnny Spanish. They were headed by Jacob "Little Augie" Orgen, a bloodthirsty gangster with such supporters and "comers" as Jack "Legs" Diamond, Louis "Lepke" Buchalter and Gurrah Shapiro. The Dropper's men and Little Augie's followers began open warfare over control of the wet wash laundry workers and were soon involved in wholesale shoot-outs all around the town.

Finally, in August 1923 Kid Dropper was picked up on a charge of carrying a concealed weapon and hauled into Essex Market Court. The arrest of the great gang leader attracted a large number of newsmen and onlookers. When the Kid's arraignment was transferred to another court, he was led to the street by a phalanx of policemen. As he was entering the car, a minor and particularly lamebrained hoodlum named Louis Kushner jumped forward and shot him through the windshield. Kushner had been properly "stroked" by the Little Augie's gang into believing that such a daring act would make him an important gangster and member of their outfit.

The Dropper crumpled up inside the car, while his wife fought her way through the police guards wrestling with Kushner. "Nate! Nate!" she cried. "Tell me that you were not what they say you were!" Instead, the Kid managed only to moan, "They got me!" and died.

Kushner in the meantime announced triumphantly: "I got him. I'd like a cigarette."

In due course, Kushner got 20 years and Little Augie absorbed the Dropper's illicit enterprises. He held them only until 1927, when he too was violently removed from power, apparently by Lepke and Shapiro, who then took over the union rackets.

Kid Twist (1882–1908) New York gang leader

Long the right-hand man of Monk Eastman, perhaps the most notable Jewish gangster in American history, Kid Twist succeeded to the leadership of the Eastmans when the Monk was sent to prison in 1904. The Eastmans were the last Jewish gang to dominate crime in New York City. Eastman showed great pride in the Twist because he never failed to carry out a murder assignment, the total variously estimated at between 10 and 20, and could be counted on to perform any other important job.

Born Max Zweiback, or Zwerbach, he was aptly nicknamed Kid Twist because of his treacherous nature, which he demonstrated in dealing with another Eastman lieutenant, Richie Fitzpatrick, in the struggle for the Eastman throne. Fitzpatrick was an accomplished killer in his own right and was not prepared to settle the question of succession by any method other than a test of arms. The Kid suggested a conference to settle all differences, and Fitzpatrick agreed to a meeting in a Chrystie Street dive. The talks had barely begun when the lights went out and a revolver blazed. When the police arrived, no one was in the place save Fitzpatrick, who lay dead on the floor with a bullet in his heart and his arms folded on his chest. Kid Twist sent flowers to the funeral and wore a mourning band on his sleeve for months thereafter. The underworld toasted the Kid's finesse and acknowledged his leadership of the Eastmans.

Had a matter of the heart not distracted him, Kid Twist's savage cunning probably would have maintained the 1,200-man Eastman gang's supremacy over the various Irish gangs, the new Italian Mafia gangs and Paul Kelly's Five Pointers, which already included the likes of Johnny Torrio and would soon add such luminaries as Al Capone and Lucky Luciano. The Twist took time out from the systematic murder of Fitzpatrick's top supporters to fall in love with Carroll Terry, a Coney Island dance hall girl of striking beauty. It so happened that Carroll was also being pursued by Louis Pioggi, better known as Louie the Lump, one of the Five Pointers' more vicious killers.

Since Louie the Lump was rather undersized, Kid Twist took to battering him around at times when Louie could not draw his gun because of the number of Eastmans on hand to blast him. The rivalry between the two reached a climax on May 14, 1908, when the Kid found the Lump in a second-floor Coney Island dive. He decided to torment Louie. "Carroll says you is an active little cuss, always jumpin' around," the Kid remarked. "Let's see how active youse is, kid. Take a jump out of the window!"

When Louie the Lump hesitated, Kid Twist and his companion, Cyclone Louie, a local strongman and hired killer, moved menacingly toward their weapons. Louie jumped and landed on all fours, avoiding serious injury. Determined to exact vengeance, he hurried to a telephone and called Five Pointer headquarters to report Kid Twist was about with only one companion for protection. Within the hour, 20 Five Pointer gunmen appeared on the scene. Given the honor of gunning down the hated foe, Louie the Lump shot Kid Twist through the brain when he eventually came out of the dive. Cyclone Louie tried to run, but a hail of Five Pointer bullets sent him spinning down atop his fallen chief. Just then Carroll Terry came rushing out and the love-thwarted Louie shot her in the shoulder and watched her collapse next to her dead lover.

The death of Kid Twist was to have profound effects on the New York underworld over the next few years as the Eastman gang broke into factions. Ethnically, the top position in the underworld would pass to the Italian gangsters and to the next generation of Jewish gangsters, such as the 1920 Bug and Meyer gang, headed by Bugsy Siegel and Meyer Lansky, who found it more profitable to work in concert with other ethnic groups than to oppose them. None of this was foreseen in 1908, however, when New York City seemed delighted to have the likes of Kid Twist depart the scene, a sentiment expressed rather obviously by Louie the Lump's punishment for two counts of manslaughter: 11 months in the Elmira Reformatory.

Probably more songs, legends and ballads have been composed about Capt. William Kidd than any other villain on land or sea, but more recently, some biographers have attempted to paint him as more sinned against than sinning, a man virtually forced into piracy. The facts are that Capt. Kidd was indeed a pirate and that he killed ruthlessly in the course of his criminal pursuits.

Born in Scotland sometime around 1645, Kidd started out as a peaceful trader and shipowner. After settling in America in 1690, he distinguished himself routing French privateers marauding the coast in the New York area. For this the state assembly awarded him a citation and a cash bounty of 150 pounds. Capt. Kidd settled down in New York, marrying a wealthy widow and becoming a leading citizen and church member.

In 1695 a private syndicate authorized by King William III of England and several leading Whigs commissioned Kidd as a privateer to run down pirates preying on British shipping and to attack French vessels of commerce, with the prizes going to the syndicate. Capt. Kidd set sail for the East Indies in 1696 aboard his Adventure Galley, but he was stymied by a severe shortage of enemy shipping. According to some historians, his crew, composed mostly of wastrels, sea rats and cutthroats, virtually forced him into attacking friendly ships. Kidd did indeed attack his own nation's shipping and kept the lion's share of the booty for himself.

Kidd returned to New York in 1698 with a shipload of gold, jewels and silks, some of which he buried on Gardiners Island, off Long Island.

Kidd was confident that his privateer's commission would shield him from a charge of piracy, but news of his acts reached London and charges were lodged against him, partly at the instigation of the Tories, who were eager to find fault with their Whig enemies. Kidd was sent back to England, where he probably could have gotten off lightly and perhaps even scot free if he had agreed to implicate his Whig associates. Instead, he insisted on both their innocence and his own. Numerous deserters from his crew were brought forth to testify against him, no doubt embellishing their testimony with fanciful accounts of his cruelty. At his trial Kidd declared: "I am the innocentest person of them all. Only I have been sworn against by perjured persons." He was hanged on May 23, 1701.

Part of Capt. Kidd's booty was found on Gardiners Island, but treasure hunters have continued to hunt there ever since. Legend has it that more of Captain Kidd's treasure is still buried in such places as Deer Isle, Maine; Clarke's Island in the Connecticut River; Stratford Point, Conn.; Rye Beach, Fishers Island and Capt. Kidd's cave on the lower Hudson River, all in New York; and Block Island, R.I., where through the years some old coins have been found.

Kidnapping for ransom was hardly an American invention, the practice dating back to ancient times. However, probably nowhere else was the crime committed as frequently as it was in the United States during the early 1930s, typified best by the Lindbergh baby kidnapping in 1932.

Although there were many early kidnappings in America, especially of children—girls for the purposes of prostitution—and free blacks, the first major kidnapping for ransom case in this country is generally regarded to have been that of four-year-old Charley Ross, who was abducted on July 1, 1874. Technically, the case was never solved and "little Charley Ross," which became a household phrase, was never found. It is almost certain that he was murdered by his kidnapers, two notorious criminals named William Mosher and Joey Douglass and an ex-policeman named William Westervelt.

The question kidnappers always face is whether or not to kill the victim. When the victim is murdered the crime usually occurs immediately after the abduction. Conversely, the victim's family must decide whether or not to pay the ransom, since paying may only lead to the killing of the victim. A general rule of thumb is that a so-called amateur kidnapper will tend to kill the victim, but a true professional will let him or her live, realizing that murdering the victim lessens the chance of collecting a ransom for the next kidnapping. This perspective evolved in the 1920s, when organized criminals were kidnapped by other organized criminals and held for ransom. Killing the victims under such circumstances would have eliminated the "goose that lays the golden eggs." Underworld ransom kidnappings were very profitable because the racketeer-victims seldom were able to appeal to the law for assistance. Equally important, such victims hardly wished to let it be known that they had been unable to defend themselves. As a result, their kidnapers received scant public attention. Around 1930 organized kidnap rings started to victimize private citizens, and the public not only grew aware of kidnappings but demanded the authorities put a halt to them. The FBI's success in smashing several kidnapping gangs did much to alter that agency's tarnished image.

1900: Edward A. Cudahy, Jr., 16, in Omaha, Neb. Released after $25,000 ransom paid. Pat Crowe confessed but acquitted.

1927: Marion Parker, 12, in Los Angeles, Calif. $7,500 ransom paid but victim had already been murdered and dismembered. Edward Hickman convicted and executed.

1932: Charles A. Lindbergh, Jr., 20 months, in Hopewell, N.J. $50,000 ransom paid but victim had already been murdered. Bruno Richard Hauptmann convicted and executed.

1933: William A. Hamm, Jr., 39, in St. Paul, Minn. Released after $100,000 paid. Alvin "Creepy" Karpis convicted and sentenced to life.

1933: Charles F. Urschel, in his forties, in Oklahoma City, Okla. Released after $200,000 paid. Kathryn and George "Machine Gun" Kelly and four accomplices convicted and sentenced to life.

1936: Charles Mattson, 10, in Tacoma, Wash. $28,000 ransom demanded but never collected. Victim found dead. Case remains unsolved.

1937: Charles S. Ross, 72, in Franklin Park, Ill. $50,000 ransom paid but victim then murdered. John Henry Seadlund convicted and executed.

1953: Robert C. Greenlease, six, in Kansas City, Mo. $600,000 ransom paid but victim had already been murdered. Carl A. Hall and Bonnie Brown Heady convicted and executed.

1956: Peter Weinberger, 32 days old, in Westbury, N.Y. $2,000 ransom demanded but not paid. Victim found dead. Angelo John LaMarca convicted and executed.

1963: Frank Sinatra, Jr., 19, in Lake Tahoe, Calif. Released after $240,000 ransom paid by father. John W. Irwin, Joseph C. Amsler and Barry W. Keenan convicted and sentenced to prison.

1968: Barbara Jane Mackle, 20, in Atlanta, Ga. Released after $500,000 paid. Gary Steven Krist and Ruth Eisemann-Schier convicted and sentenced to prison.

1974: Patricia Hearst, 19, in Berkeley, Calif. $2 million ransom paid but victim not released and later charged with joining her captors. Except for William and Emily Harris, all of victim's kidnappers killed in gun battle with police. HARRISES convicted and sentenced to 10 years to life.

1974: E. B. Reville of Hepzibah, Ga. and wife, Jean, kidnapped; $30,000 ransom paid. E. B. found alive; Jean Reville found dead.

1974: J. Reginald Murphy, 40, an editor of Atlanta Constitution, freed two days later after $700,000 ransom paid. William A. H. Williams arrested and most of the money recovered.

1976: 26 children and bus driver in Chowchilla, Calif. Ransom demanded but victims escaped. Frederick Newhall Woods, IV, James Schoenfeld and Richard Allen Schoenfeld convicted and sentenced to life.

1992: Sidney J. Reso, oil company executive, seized April 29; dies May 3. Arthur Seale and his wife, Irene, arrested June 19. Seale pleads guilty and is sentenced to life; Irene Seale gets 20-year prison term.

1996: Marshall J. Wais, 79, owner of two San Francisco steel companies, kidnapped from his home and released unharmed the same day after half-million dollar ransom paid. Thomas Taylor and Michael Robinson arrested the same day.

kidnapping of free blacks

Throughout the decades preceding the Civil War, kidnapping of free blacks in the North and shipping them to the South to be sold as slaves was a thriving criminal enterprise. Kidnapping rings operated with impunity despite laws in Southern states prohibiting the practice. Such laws were mere shams since blacks were disqualified as witnesses and thus could not incriminate their captors. Entire families were abducted but many kidnap rings preferred dealing only in children and young women because such captives could be more easily contained. Some enterprising kidnappers used the ruse of marrying mulatto women and then selling them off as slaves at the first opportunity. Unscrupulous federal magistrates cooperated in schemes to seize blacks and transport them to the South under the pretext of enforcing the fugitive slave laws.

Kilpatrick, Ben (1865?–1912) last of the Wild Bunch

In addition to being the handsomest of the Wild Bunch and a ladies' man, Ben Kilpatrick, known as the Tall Texan, was lightning quick on the draw and, as Butch Cassidy said, absolutely fearless. He was also to meet an ignoble end because he tried to carry on a form of outlawry whose day had past, when all the other Bunchers were dead, imprisoned or wisely retired.

Kilpatrick rode into the famous outlaw hideout Hole in the Wall about 1890. Thereafter, he scoured the Southwest, often with fellow Texans the Ketchum brothers and then more and more with Cassidy's Wild

An 1851 proclamation warned free blacks of the activities of “slave catchers.”

Bunch. When at times he suddenly would disappear, his fellow outlaws knew he had lost himself in the fleshpots of the West and would return only when his money ran out. Usually, he came back with a mistress in tow. His last was the celebrated Laura Bullion, alias Della Rose, the Rose of the Bunch.

During a bank or train robbery, Cassidy always preferred to station Kilpatrick at his back, knowing he could be counted on to carry out his assignment and stick to his post no matter what complications arose. His steel nerve was not necessarily matched by his brainpower, however; in November 1901, after taking part in the robbery of a train at Wagner, Mont., Kilpatrick took the Rose to St. Louis on a spree, expending Bank of Helena (Mont.) currency, which was very uncommon in Missouri, like water. Local police and Pinkertons crashed into their hotel room and found $7,000 from the Wagner job. Kilpatrick confessed to taking part in the train robbery and was sent to the federal penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga. Della Rose got five years as an accomplice of the gang.

As Kilpatrick left the penitentiary on June 11, 1911, he told prison mates he intended to resume his outlaw ways. But the Wild Bunch was gone. Cassidy and Sundance had vanished, apparently in South America; Kid Curry was dead; Elzy Lay had reformed; and Matt Warner had even turned lawman. In addition, his woman Della had disappeared. The days of the Wild Bunch were over, and the West was no longer the place it had been.

Nonetheless, the Tall Texan teamed up with another outlaw, Ed Welch, alias Howard Benson, and set out to bring back the good old days. They pulled a couple of minor stickups just to get in shape. Then on March 14, 1912 they boarded the express car of the Southern Pacific’s Sunset Limited and quickly got the drop on the Wells Fargo messenger, David Truesdale. In the old days express guards were generally cowed by bandits and offered no resistance, but times had changed. When Welch moved into the baggage car for a moment and Kilpatrick turned his gaze for a split second, the guard picked up an ice mallet and slammed Kilpatrick in the head, killing him with one blow. He then picked up Kilpatrick’s rifle and when Welch stepped back into the car, he shot him dead. For a time Truesdale enjoyed great national notoriety and newspaper cartoonists reveled in caricaturing Kilpatrick’s humiliating end.

The murder of playgirl Dot King in New York in 1923 was the classic Broadway drama which, as Russel Crouse wrote, “might easily be credited to a hack and his typewriter. Its characters are creations at a penny a word—the Broadway butterfly, the ‘heavy sugar daddy,’ the dark, sinister lover, the broken-hearted mother, and even the Negro maid, for comedy.” Countless books on the “sins of New York” have described the Dot King case with varying degrees of accuracy.

Born into an Irish family living in an uptown slum, Anna Marie Keenan married a chauffeur when she was 18 but dumped him shortly afterwards as she began making it big as a model. To fit her new image, she changed her name to Dot King and, with her stunning looks, natural blonde hair and sparkling blue eyes, became a hostess in a plush speakeasy. It was here that she met “Mr. Marshall,” the sugar daddy who made her the envy of her nightclub coworkers. Within a year after she met Mr. Marshall, he had showered some $30,000 in cash and jewelry on her.

On March 15, 1923 Dot King was found dead on her bed, at first glance an apparent suicide. An empty bottle of chloroform lay nearby, and the telephone had been shifted away from the bed as far as the cord would stretch. On closer inspection, the police noticed Dot's arm was twisted behind her back as if it had been put in a hammer lock, and the suicide theory was discarded for one of murder. But who had done it? There were many suspects, but the most logical one was the missing Mr. Marshall, whom the victim's maid described and who had written scores of "spicy" letters. One, which the newspapers delighted in publishing, read: "Darling Dottie: Only two days before I will be in your arms. I want to see you, O, so much, and to kiss your pretty pink toes."

And there was Dot's "kept" man, a Latin named Alberto Santos Guimares, upon whom the Broadway butterfly seemed to bestow gifts with almost the same frequency as she received them from Mr. Marshall. Police soon had evidence that Guimares, who apparently survived by petty swindling and exploitation of women, repaid Dot for her generosity by beating her up regularly. As a suspect, however, Guimares had drawbacks. He claimed that at the time of the murder he was in the arms of another woman, a leading socialite who backed up his story. If the tabloid readers suffered any disappointment over that development, they were overwhelmingly compensated by the identification of Mr. Marshall, who had already revealed his identity to the police. They had tried to shield him because they accepted his word that he had nothing to do with the murder—and because he was someone worth protecting. However, an enterprising newspaper reporter learned who he was.

His name was J. Kearsley Mitchell, the wealthy son-in-law of E. T. Stotesbury, the most prominent millionaire on Philadelphia's Main Line. Gossip writers ran amok with tales of twisted passions and plots of blackmail. Had Kearsley wanted to leave Dot and was she blackmailing him? The police said no, but their theories weren't respected since they had admitted attempting to hide Kearsley's identity to protect the millionaire's socially prominent wife and their three children from scandal.

Eventually, the police fell back to a theory that was safest of all, although devoid of social scandal, lurid romance and the like. It was that Dot had been the victim of robbers who had chloroformed her a bit too thoroughly. About a year later, another Broadway butterfly, Louise Lawson, suffered the same kind of death. Police learned that Louise, whose apartment, like Dot's, was stuffed with cash and baubles from an admirer, had opened the door to two men who said they had a package for her.

Undoubtedly, a woman—like Dot King—who had a sugar daddy would almost certainly open her door for someone saying he was bearing gifts. Of course, the public did not like the robbery theory. They much preferred a story of Main Line society, twisted and violent jealousy, and since the Dot King case remained unsolved, they never had to abandon that version.

King, Kate (1842–?) Quantrill's mistress and madam

The young woman who was soon to become the mistress of Confederate guerilla leader William C. Quantrill was about 20 when she was kidnapped by the Raiders in Missouri. The facts of her life and even her identity are uncertain; her name was either Kate Clarke or Kate King, the name she was to use later in life. Young Kate willingly became Quantrill's lover, living in the brush with him. When the rebel raider was taken prisoner by Union forces in May 1865, he made out a will that gave Kate half his estate, mostly the loot from the war.

Kate took her good fortune to St. Louis and opened a fashionable brothel. According to a piece of the folklore passed on about Kate, she allegedly shot a client who had referred to the late Quantrill as a butcher. Kate is said to have attended a number of annual reunions of veterans of Quantrill's Raiders, where she would hand out her business card, before she married a man named Woods and passed into obscurity.

Nineteenth-century America produced a special breed of pickpocket called a kirkbuzzer, whose modus operandi was picking pockets in church. Andy Craig, a noteworthy Chicago pickpocket, was considered a past master of the art. In his somber Sunday best, he would go through a church crowd, psalm book in hand, relieving at least a half dozen of the worshipers of their money purses. For a time Craig organized a group of kirkbuzzers, but in 1893 he gave up this racket as part of a deal between the underworld and the city's politicians that gave certain dips the pickpocketing rights to the World's Fair of 1893 in return for their promise that they would no longer victimize churchgoers. Soon kirkbuzzers around the country were forced to give up their church beats once police came to regard their activities as exceeding normal criminality and verging on blasphemy. According to some old-time pickpockets, the first “BEWARE OF PICKPOCKETS” signs appeared on church fronts.

Kirker, James (1810–1852) gunrunner and scalp hunter

In the history of scalp hunting, James Kirker stands as one of America’s greatest mass murderers, taking an estimated 300 scalps personally and a great number more in alliance with another Indian killer, James Hobbs. There was perhaps some mitigating explanation for Kirker’s crimes in that his parents had been killed by the Apaches in what is now Arizona while he was in his teens; he spent the decade in a private war with them. When in 1837 Kirker heard about scalp hunters killing 400 Mimbreno Apaches in one swoop and taking a fortune in scalps, he realized he wasn’t getting full mileage out of his scalp taking. In 1842 he teamed up with James Hobbs to lift scalps on a wholesale basis but left the partnership to run guns to Chief Mangus Colorado of the Apaches. That activity ended when the Mexican governors of Sonora and Chihuahua placed a reward of 10,000 pesos on his head. Deciding that scalp hunting was safer, Kirker again hooked up with Hobbs, who had been living with the Shawnees and had recruited a band of these Indians to help him take Apache and Navaho scalps. In one village alone, the Kirker-Hobbs forces took 300 scalps. The partners then hauled the scalps to Chihuahua to collect the bounty. To hide his identity, Kirker shaved off his beard and dressed differently. The total reward came to some 23,000 gold pesos. Since the local treasury at that moment held only 2,000 pesos, they were given a written receipt for the balance. Kirker seemed nervous about the arrangement, no doubt realizing that Hobbs could turn him in and take the whole 23,000 pesos, a kingly sum, for himself. So he slipped off to California with the 2,000 pesos, which was more than enough money to allow him to retire from running guns and lifting scalps. Kirker settled down near Mount Diablo and proceeded to drink himself to death, dying of alcohol poisoning in 1852.

kiss of death Mafia execution signal

The kiss was always important in the Mafia. During the old days in New York, it was considered a form of greeting whenever one member met another. The custom was ordered stopped by Lucky Luciano on his ascendency to power in 1931. “After all,” he is alleged to have declared, “we would stick out kissing each other in restaurants and places like that.” The kiss of death, however, was never too popular in this country because all it accomplished was to alert the potential victim; the practical American Mafia found that symbolism had little to recommend it. The kiss of death was given occasionally, however, when the real purpose was to demonstrate the power of the one either doing the killing or ordering the killing. Vito Genovese used the kiss of death while behind bars in the federal penitentiary at Atlanta to prove that he was still the “boss of bosses.” That stratagem backfired when Genovese told another prisoner and soldier in the Mafia, Joe Valachi, that he wanted to give him a kiss for “old time’s sake.” All the convicts took that for what it was, a death sentence, because Valachi was widely suspected of being an informer for the Federal Bureau of Narcotics. Valachi was not, or so the official record states, but, realizing that Genovese was marking him for death, he took refuge in solitary confinement and there, supposedly for the first time, considered becoming an informer. When he finally did, Valachi rocked the criminal structure of the country.

A traditional underworld archetype is the kiss of death girl, a sobriquet newspapers apply to women whose lovers seem to die at a much more frequent rate than the mortality tables and laws of chance would allow.

The origin of the term “kiss of death” girl is not clear. There is some indication that the first such female was Ida the Goose, an inamorata of the New York City underworld in the early part of this century who provoked the 1909 Ida the Goose War between the Gophers and the equally murderous Chick Tricker gang. Ida the Goose, a noted beauty despite her rather unromantic name, was the plaything of one Gopher Gang captain after another, generally upon the demise of a prior lover. Her crowning kiss of death caper occurred when, after defecting to the Tricker ranks, she was reclaimed by the Gophers after they assassinated her Tricker gang lover along with several of his fellow gang members in a celebrated cafe shoot-out.

Another famous lady who jinxed her lovers was Mary Margaret Collings, dubbed Kiss of Death Maggie by an appreciative Chicago press during the Capone era. The lady had the misfortune of losing no less than six husbands, underworld characters all, either in gang battles or confrontations with the police. It got so that guests at her weddings made wagers on how long her newest spouse would last. One reporter calculated that “six months was about par for the course.”

The most famous of the breed was Evelyn Mittleman, who was labeled the Kiss of Death Girl of Murder, Inc. because of her love affair with Pittsburgh Phil

Strauss, the organization's most-dedicated killer. Actually, Evelyn just seemed to be a luscious blonde who attracted men who were equally attracted by violence. At an early age, Evelyn, who came from the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn, New York City, attracted the attention of newsmen covering the breeding spots of criminality. When the Murder, Inc. investigation broke in 1940, Eddie Zeltner, a columnist for the New York Daily Mirror, wrote: "I knew Evelyn ten years ago, when she was barely sixteen, a gorgeous blonde who used to come from Williamsburg to Coney Island to swim, and dance in the cellar clubs which are grammar schools for gangsters."

When she was 18, Evelyn was in California with a fellow named Hy Miller, who was enamored of her. One night at a dance another man was struck by her looks. A violent disagreement ensued between him and Miller, who lost Evelyn and his life that very night. The same sort of thing happened a couple of years later back in Brooklyn. She was then dating one Robert Feurer when she caught the eye of Jack Goldstein, a Brownsville gangster involved in the wholesale fish market racket. Goldstein promptly killed Feurer when the latter objected to his attention to Evelyn. Thereafter, Goldstein proudly paraded around with Evelyn in tow until one day they happened to pass a Brownsville poolhall and were seen by Pittsburgh Phil. Phil liked what he saw and said so. Goldstein took exception to the remark and complained about his behavior. Phil quickly went back inside the pool hall and emerged with a billiard cue. He gave Goldstein a vicious going over, completely altering his features and his romantic notions about Evelyn.

Goldstein did not come around much after that, but it was not until four years later that he succumbed to the kiss of death curse. He was murdered by Pittsburgh Phil, but it was not over Evelyn's affections. A contract was put out on him because of his racket activities, and a number of killers headed by Phil, were assigned to the hit. The hit men were ordered to hammer Goldstein into unconsciousness, but not to kill him, and to bring him directly to Phil, who insisted on drowning Goldstein personally.

Pittsburgh Phil proved to be Kiss of Death Evelyn's last victim. She was the final visitor in his death cell before he was executed in 1941. Thereafter, Evelyn, the greatest of the kiss of death girls, faded into obscurity.

From time to time, kissing has been considered a crime in certain jurisdictions of the United States and there are still various laws on the books forbidding this nefarious practice. Thus, in Indiana it is illegal for a man with a mustache to "habitually kiss human beings" and in Cedar Rapids, Iowa the kissing of a stranger is clearly a crime. A health ordinance in Riverside, Calif. bars kissing on the lips unless both parties first wipe their lips with carbolyzed rosewater.

These legal restrictions on kissing have long been thought humorous since the mores of the country changed and attitudes on kissing altered. All of which no doubt would be of small comfort to a Captain Kemble, who was placed in the public stocks in Boston in 1656 for kissing his wife in public on the Sabbath. The only extenuating circumstance the captain could present, which was promptly rejected by the law, was that he had returned from a three-year voyage at sea.

Kitty and Jennie Gang Chicago two-woman gang

From 1886 until the turn of the century, Chicago men were menaced by what the police called the Kitty and Jennie Gang. Actually, the "gang" consisted of only two members, Kitty Adams and Jennie Clark, but their depredations befitted a criminal combine much larger in size. Kitty Adams first appeared in Chicago around 1880. She was the wife of a noted pickpocket, George Shine, but soon tossed him over and won a reputation of her own as the Terror of State Street. Although white, she did a short stint in a black brothel and there mastered the use of the razor, a weapon she always hid in the bosom of her dress and used when the need arose. Once when a lover of hers became overbearing, she whipped out her razor and sliced off both his ears.

About 1886 she set up a streetwalker's crib in the Levee, Chicago's segregated vice area, but really supported herself as a footpad. She started working with a very attractive young woman named Jennie Clark, who would pick up men on the streets and lead them into alleys. Here, Kitty Adams would seize the victim and put a razor to his throat while Jennie took his valuables. Between 1886 and 1893, Kitty and Jennie staged, at a minimum, 100 such robberies a year. Finally, in 1893 a victim was able to shake off enough of his fright to testify against Kitty Adams and she was sent to Joliet Prison.

Jennie Clark instantly petitioned Gov. John P. Altgeld for a pardon on the ground that Kitty was dying of tuberculosis. Altgeld ordered an investigation, and when Kitty appeared before the Board of Pardons, she had cut her gums with a toothpick so badly that she spat and coughed blood at a rate that convinced the board's members she would soon die. The pardon was forthcoming and Kitty returned to Jennie. The pair were soon back in action.

KLUTAS, Theodore “Big Jack”

In 1896 they were both arrested for robbing a man. Kitty jumped bail, but Jennie appeared for trial before Judge James Goggin, a jurist noted for making astounding decisions. In the Jennie Clark case, Judge Goggin made his celebrated ruling that a man who went to the Levee deserved to get himself robbed. Jennie was released and the fugitive warrant against Kitty was withdrawn. Two years later, Kitty was caught again and this time a more tradition-bound jurist sent her back to Joliet, where ironically, she died of tuberculosis. Without Kitty Adams as a confederate, Jennie Clark faded from the crime records.

Knapp, Captain Joseph (c. 1770–1830) murderer

The conviction and execution of Captain Joseph Knapp in Massachusetts in 1830, following a trial in which Daniel Webster personally led the prosecution, deeply divided public opinion. Although there was no doubt about Knapp’s guilt, he could have gone free had he not refused to testify against his brother. As it was, both brothers were executed.

Joseph Knapp, his brother John Francis Knapp, Richard Crowinshield and, most likely, his brother George Crowinshield had conspired to rob a retired sea captain, Joseph White, of his hoarded wealth. One or more of the four entered the old man’s bedroom and clubbed and stabbed him to death. The Crowinshield brothers, who both had unsavory reputations, were immediately suspected and taken into custody. While in jail, they revealed their part in the crime to another prisoner, who, upon his release wrote a letter to the Knapp brothers, demanding money from them. The authorities, watching the released convict, seized the letter and, in time, got Joseph Knapp to confess under a promise of immunity provided he would testify against the others. Learning of this development, Richard Crowinshield, the main culprit and the actual murderer, hanged himself in his cell. George Crowinshield went free despite Joseph Knapp’s testimony, at which point the authorities insisted Joseph testify against his brother John. Joseph refused to do so, but his brother was found guilty and hanged anyway. Webster then declared that Joseph Knapp had lost his immunity because he had failed to aid in the conviction of his brother. He therefore prosecuted Joseph Knapp, and he too was convicted and hanged, despite considerable outcry from those who felt that since John Knapp had been found guilty and executed without his brother’s testimony, it was vindictive to prosecute Joseph.

Like earlier investigations of the New York City police, the Knapp Commission (1970–72), appointed by Mayor John Lindsay, found corruption and bribe taking in the department. Police officers had accepted bribes, the commission reported, from organized crime, particularly for narcotics and prostitution violations. Even building contractors declared that bribes to police added a full five percent to construction costs. Testimony was given that one policeman had held out $80,000 worth of heroin and $127,000 in currency when he seized a large amount of the drug. A rogue cop, William Phillips, who had been caught accepting bribes and trying to fix court cases, was recruited by the commission and supplied with a tape recorder; the evidence collected by Phillips indicated that New York police officers took at least $4 million in bribes annually.

The Knapp Commission did not win unanimous approval, however. Some civil libertarians attacked it, charging that much of the testimony was tainted by use of methods that violated the privacy and rights of the persons being investigated. Many hours of the hearings were wasted on debates over the “rotten apple” defense offered by the police establishment. Police Commissioner Patrick V. Murphy, who had been outspoken in opposition to police corruption, insisted the commission had gone too far and was ruining the reputation of thousands of honest officers. He attacked the use of Phillips as a witness, denouncing him as a rogue cop caught in the act and “squirming to get off the hook.” The same criticisms, however, certainly did not apply to two honest officers, Sergeant David Durk and Detective Frank Serpico, who gained considerable recognition for their roles in the investigations.

It is difficult to gauge the work of the Knapp Commission based on indictments of police officers because the police department and various New York district attorneys moved at about the same time, often claiming their actions were based on independent investigations. However, 37 Brooklyn plainclothesmen were indicted by the Kings County district attorney, and 19 officers in the Bronx were indicted or brought up on criminal charges for operating a “pad,” through which regular payments were received from area gambling establishments and divided into a monthly “nut” of $800 per officer. Within two days of the opening of the commission’s hearings, 113 plainclothesmen were transferred.

efforts to promote honesty and counter graft within the police department. In its final report, made public in 1972, the commission stated:

The present situation is quite like that existing at the close of previous investigations. A considerable momentum for reform has been generated, but not enough time has elapsed to reverse attitudes that have been solidifying for many years in the minds of both the public and the police.

After previous investigations, the momentum was allowed to evaporate.

The question now is: Will history repeat itself? Or does society finally realize that police corruption is a problem that must be dealt with and not just talked about once every 20 years?

Not expectedly, newspapers conducting surveys about a year after the hearings reported plenty of quotes from cabdrivers, small businessmen and the like that indicated little had changed. That sentiment could in part be attributed to the general cynicism of the average New Yorker about any kind of official honesty. About a decade later, knowledgeable newsmen more or less agreed that while corruption and graft still existed, abuses definitely had not reached pre-Knapp Commission levels and that in terms of big-city police corruption, New York City was probably cleaner than other metropolitan forces.

A sound language now used in nearly all jails of the world, the “knuckle voice” was introduced in America late in the 19th century in the dungeon at San Quentin Prison by Ed Morell, generally considered to be one of the most remarkable prisoners in the history of the United States. Morrell, sentenced to life in solitary confinement in the dungeon, did not invent the system, having learned it from an escaped convict from Russia, where it was first used by Nihilist prisoners being held in the St. Peter and Paul fortress in St. Petersburg. The code used in the knuckle voice was based on a pattern called the Siberian Square.

The vertical numbers indicate the number of knuckle raps that precede a short pause, the horizontal numbers indicate the number of raps that follow this pause. Thus, the code for letter A is one rap, pause, one rap. Letter B is one rap, pause, two raps. Letter F is two raps, pause, one rap. Letter O is three raps, pause, five raps. Letter Z is five raps, pause, six raps.

	I	2	3	4	5	6
1	A	B	C	D	E
2	F	G	H	I	J
3	K	L	M	N	O
4	P	Q	R	S	T
5	U	V	W	X	Y	Z

Morrell needed several months to teach the system to Jake Oppenheimer, who was the only other man in the history of San Quentin to be sentenced to life imprisonment in solitary confinement. Oppenheimer was 13 cells away from Morrell in the dungeon and at first could neither grasp what the tappings meant nor understand the code. Finally, after many months, he solved the puzzle and the two rapped away to each other. It was years before the guards realized the men were communicating, assuming instead that both of them had simply gone crazy.

When Morrell was later freed from solitary confinement and returned to the general prison population, he taught the knuckle voice code to other convicts, and the system quickly spread to virtually every prison in the country.

Koehler, Arthur (1885–1967) wood detective

Shortly after Bruno Richard Hauptmann was convicted in the 1932 kidnap murder of the Lindbergh baby, Edward J. Reilly, the chief defense counsel, told an interviewer: “We would have won an acquittal if it hadn’t been for that guy Koehler. What a witness to ring in on us—somebody they plucked out of a forest. Do you know what he is? He’s a— a xylogotomist.” While the dictionary defines a xylogotomist as one who studies wood anatomy and is proficient in the art of preparing wood for microscopic examination, the lawyer said the word as if he were mouthing an obscenity.

Arthur Koehler was not an obscenity but the nation’s foremost wood detective. Until his retirement in 1948 Koehler spent 36 years with the U.S. Forest Service including 34 years at the famous Forest Products Laboratory in Madison, Wisc., where he was the chief wood identification expert for the government. While Hauptmann’s counsel had not heard of him, law officials in the Midwest had long relied on Koehler to crack perplexing criminal cases. His evidence was vital in convicting a Wisconsin farmer named John Magnuson for the 1922 dynamite-by-mail murder of Mrs. James A. Chapman and the crippling of her wealthy farmer husband. Fragments of the wood portions of the bomb were given to Koehler, who identified the pieces as elm. Although the suspect denied he had elm lumber on his farm, the police swept up wood shavings from the floor of his workshop. Koehler identified the sweepings as particles of elm and matched up their cellular structure with the wood used in the construction of the bomb. Magnuson was convicted.

Koehler's reputation in the Midwest became so great that on one occasion the mere mention that he was being brought into an investigation caused an arsonist to confess. In another case his testimony trapped a tree rustler who had made off with a huge amount of choice logs. Koehler traced the logs back to a certain valuable timberland and even identified which log was cut from which tree by matching saw cuts and the structure of the annual rings to the tree stumps. He also was instrumental in convicting Michael Fugmann, a triple murderer whose bomb packages had terrorized a Pennsylvania coal mining town during a union dispute in 1936.

In the Lindbergh case Koehler presented the damning evidence that one of Hauptmann's tools had been used to construct the kidnap ladder and that one of the ladder's rails came from Hauptmann's home. Despite many subsequent attempts by certain writers to prove Hauptmann's innocence, Koehler's expert evidence has never been successfully challenged.

Koehler had spent 18 months tracing the wood used in the kidnap ladder. At one point, about six months before Hauptmann's capture, he was so close on the trail of the culprit that the two men were in the same lumberyard at the same time. Hauptmann, apparently warned by instinct, had fled the yard, leaving behind a 40¢ plywood panel he had paid for. If one of the yard employees had mentioned the matter to Koehler, it is conceivable that the Lindbergh case would have closed six months earlier in a most dramatic fashion.

A contemporary of Charles Ponzi, Leo Koretz is not as well remembered today as a notorious swindler, certainly not as well as he should be. True, Ponzi is believed to have netted something like $7 million while Koretz appears to have stolen a mere $5 million. But Koretz carried off his scheme for much longer and, unlike Ponzi, who preyed to a great extent on unsuspecting immigrants, Koretz robbed the elite of the Chicago business world. In fact, Koretz' depredations may well have been greater than Ponzi's since a number of businessmen were known to have taken their losses in silence, fearing that any revelation that they had been swindled would damage their reputations as shrewd businessmen.

Koretz' scam was based on stock in the Bayano Timber Syndicate of Panama, which had supposedly garnered a fortune in mahogany from its vast land holdings and then discovered oil on its property. Koretz started selling stock in Bayano in 1917. Within no time at all the company was rewarding its stockholders with a quarterly dividend of 5 percent on their original investment. In reality, there was no Bayano Timber Syndicate. The swamp land it allegedly held was owned by the Panamanian government, since no one had any interest in mining or having anything to do with its only known commodity, mosquitoes.

Koretz' ignorant stockholders were happy with their dividends. Of course, in theory, he had to pay the investors their dividends out of their original investments, creating the same kind of impossible pyramid structure that eventually brought Ponzi to grief. The more cunning Koretz solved that troublesome matter by encouraging his investors to take their dividends in additional stock, each certificate as worthless as the originals.

The stockholders adored Koretz, even as the news of Ponzi's fraud was breaking; in fact, they started calling him "Lovable Lou . . . Our Ponzi." They regarded him as the first true financial genius to come down the pike since John D. Rockefeller. Once, Koretz was feted at a sumptuous dinner at Chicago's Congress Hotel. Sitting next to him was Arthur Brisbane, William Randolph Hearst's top editorialist and himself a big Koretz sucker. During the dessert, newsboys broke into the hall with an extra announcing, "Leo Koretz' oil swindle." For a moment everyone was stunned. Then Brisbane rose laughing. He had had phony newspapers printed up as part of the evening's entertainment. Then, embracing Koretz, he shouted, "Mr. Koretz is a great and honorable financier!" Everyone learned differently at the end of 1923, when his great hoax was exposed.

In 1922 a large group of happy stockholders thought it was about time that they visited the company's vast holdings. Koretz succeeded in stalling them for almost a year, but when they sailed from New York in November 1923, Koretz knew his time had run out. Taking $5 million with him, he fled to Canada and assumed an identity he had established there years ago as Lou Keyte. What brought Koretz down was his diabetes, for which he had to take insulin, then a rare and expensive commodity. He was traced thanks to his dependency on the drug and finally arrested in Halifax.

In the ensuing investigation, it was found that his elderly mother had invested $50,000 in his scheme and his brother $140,000. Even his secretary had parted with $3,000. Koretz said he had accepted the investments because he didn't know how to turn them down without arousing suspicion.

Koretz spent only about a month behind bars for his crimes. He induced a lady friend to bring him a five-pound box of chocolates. He ate the entire box on January 9, 1925 and promptly keeled over dead, certainly one of the most bizarre prison suicides in history.

Kosterlitzky, Colonel Emilio (c. 1853–1928) Mexican police official

Although Col. Emilio Kosterlitzky was only a Mexican police official he had an important effect on Mexican-U.S. relations. Born in Russia, Kosterlitzky emigrated to the United States to join the army. By 1873 he had moved on to Mexico, where he enlisted in the cavalry as a private. A soldier of exceptional ability, he rose rapidly to become the commander of the dreaded la cordada, an elite cavalry unit that patrolled the Arizona and New Mexico borders. He worked closely with various American law officers and especially the Arizona Rangers, helping them to round up a great many wanted renegades.

Kosterlitzky commanded the buckskin-clad rurales, cutthroat troops many of whom were ex-bandits, welding them into the only effective police force on the Mexican border. The colorful colonel, noted for leading his troops on a striking white charger, ruthlessly enforced the federal policy of Porfirio Díaz, not only doing battle with bandits and Indians but suppressing the peons. Kosterlitzky endeared himself to American peace officers by often arranging to hand over wanted men without protracted legal hearings. It is suspected that he often exported some of Díaz' political problems by turning over revolutionary peons to American lawmen as supposed transnational bandits.

After the fall of Díaz in 1911, the rurales became an isolated force without government approval, but Kosterlitzky maintained order among them for a number of months until it became apparent they could not stand against the nation's social revolution. Finally, he fled across the border at Nogales, placing himself under American protection. Because of his strong support among U.S. lawmen, there was no chance that Kosterlitzky would be returned to the Mexicans, and in fact, he worked several years for the Department of Justice in Los Angeles up to his death in 1928. During those years he remained a thorn in relations between the two countries.

The kidnapping of 20-year-old Barbara Jane Mackle, the daughter of a Florida real estate developer, on December 17, 1968 was one of the most bizarre plots in the history of American crime. Her kidnapers, Gary Steven Krist and Ruth Eisemann Schier, buried her alive in a nine-foot pit inside an elaborate coffinlike box for three days while they negotiated a $500,000 ransom. The woman's prison box was equipped with light, a fan and two flexible tubes extending to the surface that allowed her to breathe. She was also supplied with a small amount of food and water. After 83 hours the ransom was paid and agents in Atlanta were notified the victim could be found in a box in a pine forest in Gwinnett County, Ga. By the time Mackle was rescued, the light had failed and her food and water were about gone.

The kidnapers had dropped a suitcase and abandoned a blue 1966 Volvo near the first spot where the ransom money was to be picked up. The car and the suitcase were traced to George C. Deacon, which turned out to be an alias for Gary Steven Krist, an escaped convict from California. The FBI also ascertained that Krist was associating with 26-year-old Ruth Eisemann Schier, and both were put on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list, making Eisemann Schier the first woman fugitive to gain that distinction. Krist was apprehended in an alligator-infested Florida swamp with almost all of the ransom money still intact. Eisemann Schier was caught when her fingerprints were sent to the FBI for a routine check after she had applied for a nursing service job.

Eisemann Schier was sentenced to seven years in prison and Krist was given life. In May 1979 he was granted a parole which drew considerable adverse criticism from the press as well as the judge and prosecutor in the case. Under the conditions of his parole, Krist had to live in Alaska, where his family ran a fishing village at Sitka. Krist praised the parole board's "courage" in releasing him, saying they recognized the remorse he had felt during his 10 years behind bars. "I've learned that a conscience can be a bigger burden than anything anyone else can put on you," he said. He also made a public statement to Barbara Mackle: "Thank you for not opposing my parole and having the Christian charity to forgive me for something I did that was unforgivable."

Ku Klux Klan

As a movement, or more correctly, three different movements, the Ku Klux Klan dates back to 1866, when it was organized in Pulaski, Tenn., in response to radical Reconstruction. By their night-riding tactics against blacks, the white-hooded Klansmen did much to bring about the "redemption" of Southern state governments by white conservatives. Officially, the original Klan disbanded in 1869, but it did not die in most areas until years later, when this recapture of political power was completed.

Despite continuing instances of violence and killings, by the 1950s the Ku Klux Klan had lost some of its former fearsomeness, as some blacks in the South showed up at rallies to watch the festivities.

The second and largest Klan was formed in Atlanta, Ga. in 1915 by Colonel William J. Simmons. It remained largely a local antiblack movement until 1920, when two professional publicity agents, or hustlers, Edward Y. Clarke and Mrs. Elizabeth Tyler, launched a nationwide membership drive under the slogan of “native, white, Protestant”—an effective rallying cry during a period of rampant nationalism, red-baiting and xenophobia. By 1925 total Klan membership stood between four and five million and fiery crosses, the symbol of the movement, appeared in every part of the country. So did the whip and the rope, by which the Klan’s moral position was enforced with floggings and lynchings. Among those facing the often fatal wrath of the hooded terrorists were blacks, Jews, Catholics, bootleggers, pacifists, Bolsheviks, internationalists and evolutionists. Despite numerous exposés, the Klan became a potent political force and in many states, such as Oklahoma, Texas, Louisiana, Maine, Kansas and Indiana, unscrupulous politicians rose to power as “Klan men.” Many of their administrations, especially in Indiana, proved unusually corrupt and did much to discredit the movement. By 1928, when the Klan abandoned its secrecy, the organization’s power was in rapid decline.

The third Klan was born in the 1950s in response to the civil rights movement. It was actually a proliferation of competing Klans that independently engaged in a certain amount of unrestrained terrorism in the rural and small-town Black Belt South. By the mid-1960s many of these Klans had been brought more or less under control without ever having achieved anywhere near the murderous impact of their predecessors.

In 1969 seven Klan leaders were jailed for contempt of Congress for refusing to bare details about membership. In 1978 and 1979 there was a resurgence of violent-type Klan activities in the northeastern states as well as the South.

The modern Klan is divided into three main groups: Robert Shelton’s United Klans of America, headed by Robert Shelton, which is believed to be the largest of the three groups and the most secretive of the hooded organizations; David Duke's Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, which is reportedly the fastest-growing organization; and Bill Wilkerson's Invisible Empire, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, the most violent of the three. While there is intense rivalry between the Klan leaders and a lack of cohesive ideologies, the trinity still maintains a certain bond because of the unifying belief in white supremacy.

Wilkinson, a 37-year-old former electrical contractor and a onetime associate of David Duke, runs his Invisible Empire out of Denham Springs, La. He flies his private plane from state to state to appear on radio shows, organize demonstrations and recruit new members. A former navy man, Wilkinson has spearheaded drives to recruit members among U.S. Navy personnel and he claims that a KKK incident aboard the U.S.S. Concord involved sailors who were "and still are my men." In Decatur, Ga. about 100 Wilkinson men disrupted a parade sponsored by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and it was at an Invisible Empire rally in Plains, Ga. that a drunken opponent of the Klan drove a car through the demonstrators, injuring several.

Journalism in the Old West was without doubt one of the more dangerous professions, given as it was to personal reporting and a readership who took things personally indeed. In that context it was perhaps amazing that Charles Kusz, a rabble-rousing bigot, lived as long as he did.

A native New Yorker, Kusz came west at the age of 26 to strike it rich. Within five years, he made $150,000 mining in Colorado. Kusz then moved on to Manzano, New Mexico Territory, where he founded a newspaper. It was an extraordinary publication even for the West. Perhaps its title, The Gringo and the Greaser, tells it all, but it should be noted that in addition to a strong dislike for many cowboys and all Mexicans, Kusz also passionately hated Roman Catholics, rustlers and the educational structure of the area. He constantly exercised his First Amendment rights to express his hatreds in diatribes published in the paper, which incidentally was printed entirely in italics.

Kusz' journalistic efforts lasted for about four years until he was assassinated on March 26, 1884 by two rifle shots through a window of his home while he was eating dinner. Motive became a key factor in the Kusz murder, but when the law got around to eliminating those not likely to have a motive, they still had enough of the community left to constitute a fairly complete census. Not surprisingly, the case was never solved.

About 1911, as unionization efforts in New York intensified, especially in the needle and allied garment industry trades, both labor and management started utilizing thugs to achieve their goals, providing the underworld with a lucrative source of income. This produced a strange underworld conflict rooted as much in class loyalties and political philosophy as in the desire for illicit revenues. Union leaders hired thugs to blackmail and murder strikebreakers and to convince recalcitrant workers to join the unions. Employers hired the gangsters to guard strikebreakers, slug union pickets and raid union meetings.

A number of gangs vied for the labor slugging business, but all clearly preferred working for the unions rather than the employers. In some cases this was undoubtedly because the unions often paid better than the employers, but it was also due to the fact that most of these labor sluggers were Jews and Italians, just as were the workers of the area. There was an inclination to help your own as long as it wasn't too unprofitable.

By about 1912–13 the labor slugging trade was dominated by an alliance of gangs headed by Dopey Benny Fein and Joe the Greaser Rosensweig. So feared was Dopey Benny that some employers once offered him $15,000 to remain neutral in a strike. Deeply offended, he replied he would accept no offer from them and stood ready to provide his gangsters to the union because his heart was always with the workingman. In fact, this was not always the case. Dopey Benny and Joe the Greaser divided up lower Manhattan into districts and assigned a vassal gang to each, and it was possible to see their men in one district supporting the union while those in another engaged in antilabor skull bashing.

In the process of establishing their monopoly, Dopey Benny and Joe the Greaser froze several rival gangs out of working for the unions. Finally, the leaders of these gangs, including Billy Lustig, Pinchey Paul, Little Rhody, Punk Madden, Moe Jewbach, and others, banded together to declare war and establish their right to support unionism. In late 1913 the two sides staged a running gun battle at Grand and Forsyth streets. Surprisingly, no one was killed, although many store windows were shot to pieces and business was generally brought to a halt.

Later battles resulted in fatalities and, more commonly, maimings. Eventually, one of the dissident leaders, Pinchey Paul, was murdered and Nigger Benny Snyder, a Fein-Rosensweig henchman, was accused of the killing. While in jail Nigger Benny concluded that he was being abandoned by the Fein-Rosensweig forces and confessed to the murder, saying it had been assigned to him by Joe the Greaser, who had tipped him $5 upon its successful completion.

In time, the dissidents were wiped out in a series of gunfights outside of various factories, but the victors had their own problems. Dopey Benny was arrested on a murder charge, and Joe the Greaser got sent away for 10 years. Benny recognized his predicament and decided to make a pitch for leniency by informing on his labor connections and fellow sluggers. On the basis of Dopey Benny's statements, 11 gangsters and 23 union officers were indicted, but in the end, none were convicted. Under his deal with the law, Benny was tried on only one murder charge and was released when the jury failed to reach a verdict.

However, Dopey Benny's power was broken, as was that of his rivals. Because of the disclosures, a number of unions thereafter refused to hire sluggers. As a result, the New York labor scene was relatively peaceful through the war years until about 1920, when the notorious Kid Dropper, formerly Nathan Kaplan, reorganized the slugger trade with those unions still willing to use such methods. In 1923 the Kid's power was disrupted by a challenge from forces aligned with Jacob "Little Augie" Orgen.

Little Augie won this second sluggers war by arranging the assassination of Kid Dropper while he himself was under police guard, thereby becoming the new king of the labor sluggers. Two other men allied with Little Augie at this time were Louis "Lepke" Buchalter and Gurrah Shapiro, both would rise high in the ranks of the national crime syndicate established in the 1930s. Lepke, in fact, became head of that organization's enforcement arm, Murder, Inc.

Little Augie milked the labor slugging racket as well as he could, although fewer unions were willing to resort to his organizing tactics, until he began shifting his operations into bootlegging. He rejected a suggestion from Lepke that if the unions would not use sluggers, then the gangsters should move and physically take over union locals, milk the members with heavy dues and extort tribute from employers to insure against strikes. Little Augie, faced with tightened police surveillance, looked upon this as a high-risk operation. Besides, he saw he could earn enough from bootlegging to retire a rich man in a few years. So he ordered Lepke to cease such activities.

In 1927 Little Augie was machine-gunned to death either by Lepke and Shapiro or by bootlegging rivals whose customers he had stolen. Lepke soon became the king of the labor extortion racket in New York.

Lady Gophers New York female gang

Often referred to by the press as the ladies auxiliary of the Gophers, an early 20th century gang that controlled Hell's Kitchen in New York City, the Lady Gophers were officially known as the Battle Row Ladies' Social and Athletic Club. Its members were the first organized gang of women to engage in what may be called the "social crimes" of the 20th century.

The Lady Gophers fought side by side with the Gophers in many battles against the police. Their leader, Battle Annie, was said to have been the sweetheart of practically the entire Gopher Gang, 500 strong. In many respects, she was much smarter than her male counterparts. Known as the Queen of Hell's Kitchen, Battle Annie soon saw the special uses for an army of gangster women. She approached both labor unions and employers who had started to hire gangsters and explained the value of utilizing women sluggers. Thereafter, for a number of years Battle Annie enjoyed a handsome living supplying female warriors to either side in local industrial disputes. Her women might appear on the scene posing as either the enraged wives of the strikers or as the wives of the strikebreakers—sometimes even playing both roles—and end up scratching, biting and clawing the picketers, the strikebreakers or both.

The Lady Gophers failed to survive, however, when the male Gopher Gang disintegrated between 1910 and 1912.

Probably no man in the annals of American crime is more controversial than Jean Lafitte. He can and has been described as a villain, pirate and murderer, yet there are others who have portrayed him as a much misunderstood man, a true patriot, a gentleman-smuggler, in an era when such a combination was possible a legally sanctioned privateer. At the far end of his spectrum of admirers was a former president of the Louisiana Historical Society who insisted "there is no character to compare him with except that of Robin Hood, whom he surpassed in audacity and success."

No one is certain of Lafitte's birthplace, but the present consensus is that he was born in 1780 in Bordeaux, France. It is still in dispute whether his father was a footloose sea dog or a titled aristocrat. There is also a wide discrepancy about Lafitte's appearance. One historian insists he wore a beard clean shaven from the front of his face, i.e., no mustache; another pictures him as a tall, handsome man with a mustache. He is also depicted as rather slight of build with almost feminine hands and feet or as a huge man with an appearance most harsh.

One certainty is that Jean and his brother, Pierre, turned up in New Orleans in 1806, after having accumulated considerable funds (preying on ships in the Indian Ocean or, again according to another version, pimping for a number of years in Paris). The brothers Lafitte opened a large mercantile establishment that was rather obviously devoted to the sale of smuggled goods. They had as partners some of the most prominent millionaires in the city, and Lafitte maintained close connections with the "privateers" sailing under the commission of the so-called Republic of Cartagena, which the Spaniards still considered a part of the Spanish Empire. About 1809 Lafitte went to sea, taking a commission as a privateer from Cartagena; his brother was left in charge of operations in New Orleans. Lafitte took charge, by both persuasion and raw power, of all the privateering vessels operating out of Baratavia Bay and the island of Grand Terre off the Louisiana coast. Among those privateers or pirates who fell under his sway were Captain Dominique, Rene Beluche, Cut Nose Chighizola and Vincent Gambi, the mad killer of the Gulf whose allegiance to Lafitte was often tenuous and stormy.

Under Lafitte's command, the pirates thrived as never before. Grand Terre, the home of some 500 ruffians and perhaps another 200 whores who catered to them when they came ashore, became a great trading center. Merchants from New Orleans and other southern cities flocked there, via a tortuous two-day journey by pirogue and barge through marshes and bayous, to buy goods stripped from the holds of plundered Spanish merchantmen. Soon, more cargo came into New Orleans from Grand Terre than from any other source. For a time the U.S. authorities allowed the trade, which was certainly good business for the Louisiana merchants, but the government eventually came to realize that the illicit trade was greatly reducing the tax revenues from incoming goods that would normally go to national and local coffers. In late 1813 the government served notice on Lafitte that the pirates would have to leave. He gave some thought to resistance, but he faced a major problem with his men: many of his captains wanted to strike at all shipping, including that owned by Americans. Lafitte had to use brute force to suppress such sentiments, publicly shooting down Vincent Gambi's top lieutenant for questioning his orders. When U.S. troops moved into the Baratavian islands in 1814, Lafitte wisely ordered his men to flee without shooting back.

Lafitte returned to New Orleans, spurning the courtship of the British, then at war with the United States. Instead, he brought Gen. Andrew Jackson intelligence about the British plans to attack New Orleans and offered his services and those of pirates in fighting them off. With considerable doubts, Jackson accepted the offer and Lafitte and his crews performed in the victory over the British. In the aftermath of the war, Lafitte and his Baratavian crews won full pardons and the opportunity to remain in the United States with all the rights of citizenship.

Lafitte stayed ashore about a year, but wearying of a land existence he and most of his old comrades sailed off to start a new pirates' colony along the shore of what was then northeastern Mexico. In 1816 Lafitte and 1,000 followers set up a colony on a small island they called Galveztown, which was to become Galveston, Tex. Resuming his privateering against the Spanish, Lafitte seized $2 million in silver from the brig Santa Rosa. It was a colossal haul and Lafitte's last act of piracy. Unfortunately some of his associates were to lose the silver hoard in a lake during a confrontation with Mexican troops.

Lafitte continued his career as a smuggler, mostly bringing in slaves to Louisiana, by then against the law but still a thriving business in the south. He seldom bought his slaves at the markets in Cuba, preferring to steal them from Spanish ships. By 1819 Lafitte had lost control of some of the pirates, who started attacking American shipping, and a large number of them were caught and hanged that year in New Orleans despite his intercession. After two more years of depredations, the Americans became exasperated with the pirates, and U.S. naval forces dispersed the Galveztown colony. Lafitte was still considered a hero in New Orleans and could have returned there, as did some of his men, but he sailed off in search of a site for yet another colony further down the Mexican coast. With his ship Pride, he continued smuggling but the facts about the last few years of his life are hazy. He was perhaps murdered by his own men or was killed in a sea battle with a British man-of-war or died of fever somewhere in the West Indies. The most meticulous research indicates he probably passed away alone, forgotten and bitter in the Yucatan village of Teljas in 1826.

Lafitte could have died an honored and revered hero in New Orleans. His aide Captain Dominique lived out his remaining years in that city, a popular figure in the cafes and coffeehouses. Although he died poor in 1830 at the age of 55, on the day of his death the city's flags were lowered to half-staff and all business places were shut. Dominique's funeral was given full military honors. New Orleans honored its pirate heroes and has lionized Lafitte ever since.

Lager Beer Riot

The so-called Lager Beer Riot, also known as the German Riot, in Chicago in 1855 was that city's first great mob disturbance. The cause of the riot was the city's attempt to enforce the Sunday closing law for saloons and increase their license fees from $50 to $300 a year, exacerbated by an antiforeign attitude, which in Chicago at the time meant anti-German. The Germans, clannishly isolated on the North Side, stuck to their own language, maintained their own schools and newspapers and, of course, had hundreds of their own beer gardens. The Sunday closings and fee increases were but a prelude to a vote that summer on a drastic prohibition law. The German populace, especially the saloon keepers, saw the moves as an effort to destroy their rights. "The excitement throughout the city ran high," a contemporary historian wrote, "but the Nord Seite was in a perfect ferment. Meetings were held, speeches made, resolutions adopted, and pledges registered that the Germans of Chicago would die, if need be, rather than submit to this outrage upon their rights." Because they were likewise affected, the Scandinavians and Irish residents joined the German protest. The first Sunday the closing law was enforced, the German beer gardens and saloons were shut down tight by the police but American-owned bars on the South Side were allowed to carry on business via their side and back doors. The following Sunday the German saloon keepers opened for business and refused to shut down; 200 of them were immediately arrested. Later, they were freed on bail and representatives of the city and the German district agreed to a single test case that would be binding on both sides. The trial opened on the morning of April 21, 1855. As the contemporary account continues:

The liberated saloon-keepers had collected their friends on the North Side, and, preceded by a fife and drum, the mob, about five hundred strong, had marched in solid phalanx upon the justice shop, as many as could entering the sacred precincts. After making themselves understood that the decision of the court must be in their favor if the town didn't want a taste of war, they retired and formed at the intersection of Clark and Randolph Streets, and held possession of these thoroughfares to the exclusion of all traffic. Crowds gathered from all sections of the city, friends and enemies, and the uproar was deafening.

The mob retreated after a brief but bloody fight with a score of police that left nine prisoners in custody. By 3 o'clock the protesting mob had reached 1,000 men, armed with rifles, shotguns, knives and clubs, and they advanced again, this time to be met by 200 police, who had formed a solid line across Clark Street. Amidst cries of "Shoot the police!" the mob attacked, firing guns, and the police returned the fire. Officially, only one German was killed, a police officer had his arm blown off by a shotgun and perhaps 20 others were seriously wounded. The mob carried off many of their own injured and the Chicago Times reported, "A few days later there were several mysterious funerals on the North Side, and it was generally believed that the rioters gave certain victims secret burial."

In all, 60 prisoners were taken by the police in what came to be called the Lager Beer Riot. Of these, 14 were brought to trial. Eventually, two Irishmen named Halleman and Farrell were convicted of rioting. A 19th century historian summed up the public reaction: "It seemed little less than a travesty on justice that in a sedition notoriously German, the only victims should be two Irishmen." The two men were granted new trials but they were never held. By then the powerful prohibition forces no longer cared. The temperance movement was gaining around the country, and an easy victory was expected in the Chicago balloting. Instead, the vote went antiprohibition by a huge margin. Many voters said they had been fearful of lawless German reaction to a "yes" vote, but Chicago was apparently thoroughly "wet" in sympathy. In any event, the Lager Beer rioters had won.

Lahey-Claffey feud New Orleans family rivalry

Rivaling in many ways the more famous feud of the Hatfields and McCoys, two clans, the Laheys and the Claffeys, each composed of several families, kept the so-called Irish Channel, the district where Irish immigrants concentrated in New Orleans in the 1840s, in turmoil for more than two decades.

The newspapers of the day reported several alleged causes of the feud, but simply stated, it was bad blood that led to the many killings and maimings. When violence broke out between the clans, who both lived on Corduroy Alley, no one was safe. In 1861 the True Delta described the area:

St. Thomas Street is keeping up with its ancient reputation, especially that portion of it which boasts of Corduroy Alley. The inhabitants of the Alley appear for the most part to be an intemperate and bloodthirsty set, who are never contented unless engaged in broils, foreign or domestic, such as the breaking of a stranger's pate or the blacking of a loving spouse's eye. These are the ordinary amusements of the Alley. . . . Honest people, doubtless, live on St. Thomas Street, but they must have a hard time of it if they manage to keep their skulls uncracked and their reputations unstained.

On July 4 of that year, Bill Claffey, the leading thug of his clan, decided to wipe out the Laheys in one drunken onslaught. He stabbed several Laheys as well as a half-dozen innocent bystanders with a long razor-sharp knife before being shot by a policeman whom he had attacked. It was said that several of the wounded Laheys died later, but the clans were generally close-mouthed about such matters. The Civil War effectively ended the feud, as several of the most aggressive young men on both sides entered the Confederate army. Apparently, the police then launched a crackdown on both clans, making arrests for the slightest provocation, with the result that many of the families moved from the area. Corduroy Alley was not completely tamed, but it was possible for a stranger to make it through without being caught in a flurry of brickbats.

It is understood in law enforcement circles that when a serial killer links up with a like-minded individual, the horror of their predations becomes especially gruesome, each killer feeding off the other's pathological behavior. This was especially true in the case of Leonard Lake and Charles Chitat Ng.

Lake was a veteran who served for two years in Vietnam as a marine spotter for air strikes and returned to the States to what had previously been a rather bizarre lifestyle. At a young age he was bent on photographing nude girls, which soon degenerated into an obsession for pornography. He frequently spoke of the joys of collecting sex "slaves," and apparently he did so during his military service, which might explain why, following his two-year stint in Vietnam, he underwent two years of psychiatric therapy at Camp Pendleton for unspecified mental problems.

Lake was discharged in 1971 and proceeded to participate in a strange series of activities. He became known to others as a gun buff, "survivalist," and sex freak with a passion for making bondage films. He spoke constantly of impending war and acknowledged keeping a cyanide capsule with him so that he could commit suicide if he was ever taken by the enemy; this proved not to be an idle comment. Lake also spent some time in offbeat communal groups, including one that was engaged in collecting unicorns, or, rather, surgically altered young goats, that they could worship. Lake liked the group but in the end was kicked out for being too strange for the other members.

Charles Ng, born of wealthy parents from Hong Kong, was seemingly always in trouble. Sent off to England by his exasperated parents, he attended Oxford for a time until his family disowned him for unspecified reasons. Ng headed for the United States and contacted Lake through an ad the latter had apparently placed in a soldier-of-fortune-type publication. This occurred after Ng had joined the marines and was confined to prison at Leavenworth. The pair corresponded while Ng was still confined. Lake liked what he knew about Ng. He was looking for someone who could help him with his future murderous plans.

When they got together in 1984 the pair went on a monumental kidnap-murder spree, much of which occurred at a cinderblock bunker that Lake constructed on two-and-one-half acres of woodland near Wilseyville, California, in Calaveras County. Lake lived in a wooden cabin, and his neighbors actually helped him build his bunker, which he alleged was to be fortified solely in preparation for a potential foreign invasion.

Lake and Ng stockpiled a huge store of illegal weapons and stolen video equipment that could presumably warn them of a surprise attack. The bunker, they said, could survive a nuclear holocaust. Actually it was set up to hold prisoners, both men and women, until the duo got around to killing them.

How many victims did the pair dispatch? No one will ever know the exact tally. The authorities dug up about a dozen complete or partial skeletons in the woods near the bunker, but eventually they retrieved 50 shopping bags of broken human bones as well as infant teeth. It proved to be a nightmare to try to identify all of these ghoulish remains. Eventually police felt that Lake and Ng were responsible for the disappearance of at least 25 people.

Authorities found a considerable number of videotapes and diaries that indicated some of the frightening practices that were carried out in the bunker. Some would qualify as "snuff tapes," involving sadistic rapes of several women who were then murdered—to accommodate new victims.

Lake left written entries in various diaries of his opinion of the women and how they were to be converted to sex slaves, which he thought would be a vital need if there were to be a nuclear holocaust. He wrote, "God meant women for cooking, cleaning house and sex. And when they are not in use, they should be locked up." Even before he started imprisoning women, he recorded his plans. The female captives were to be brainwashed in order to submit to sexual servitude. Their babies, husbands or boyfriends were also to be held captive and threatened with death if the women did not comply. If the women showed any hesitation of submitting to complete depersonalization their families would be killed. (In actuality, killing of the families of female victims was carried out immediately without the women knowing. Ng was known to have killed two babies in such a manner.) One tape records a woman being forced to undress while pleading for her baby to be returned to her. Her pleas produced only laughter. The baby had undoubtedly been killed, and the woman would suffer the same fate.

In a short time Lake and Ng dispatched a dozen victims, some of them neighbors, without arousing suspicion. One neighbor who got suspicious was Brenda O'Connor, who lived in a nearby cabin. She told friends she saw Lake in the woods burying what she thought was a woman's body. Rather than inform the police, her husband invited a Guardian Angel named Robin Stapely to move in with the couple and their infant son. That proved no impediment to Lake and Ng. In May 1985 all four disappeared (Brenda ended up in a snuff videotape).

Another family that came to a frightful end was Harvey and Deborah Dubs. Dubs was a San Francisco photographer who disappeared in 1984 with his wife and infant son. Dubs' equipment ended up being used for some of the snuff tapes, including one of Deborah Dubs.

Almost anyone coming in contact with the serial killer duo could end up dead. In November 1984 a car dealer named Paul Cosner left his San Francisco home saying he was going to sell his car to "a weird guy." Weird-guy Lake ended up with Cosner's car and Cosner ended up among the permanently missing.

A stranger fate awaited 23-year-old Mike Carroll, who had done time with Ng in Leavenworth and had come west to join him. Carroll sought to ingratiate himself with Ng and Lake by offering to dress up in "fruity" clothes and lure homosexuals who the pair could rob and kill. The duo liked the idea and the trio carried out a few such killings, but Lake and Ng tired of the routine and pulled the plug on the operation by dispatching Mike Carroll.

That left the matter of 18-year-old Kathleen Allen, who had become Carroll's girlfriend. Lake got her to quit her job in a supermarket and go to Carroll who had supposedly been shot and wounded near Lake Tahoe. Actually Carroll was no longer in this world and Kathleen ended up as yet another snuff-tape "actress."

Other victims had only the most tenuous connection to their murderers. One, a 25-year-old man, simply made the mistake of offering to help Ng move some furniture. For that act of kindness he ended up dead.

By contrast, at least six girls who had been taped by the duo were released rather than killed. However, none of them ever went to the authorities, so terrified were they of the cruel pair.

As a matter of fact, none of their murders led to Lake and Ng's exposure, but rather an almost silly burglary of a south San Francisco lumberyard. Ng grabbed the loot and flipped it into a car that Lake was driving. He was observed and Lake was apprehended, although Ng got away. Unfortunately for Lake the car he was driving was the one taken from Paul Cosner, who was a missing person. Inevitably, Lake realized, police would check out his cabin and discover the bunker and its gruesome secrets.

Brought in for questioning, Lake realized this was the "enemy attack" he had long awaited. He asked for a glass of water, slipped his cyanide capsule in his mouth and lapsed into a coma, dying four days later. Now the Lake-Ng atrocities were discovered and the hunt was on for Charles Ng. Ng had flown to Chicago and made it into Canada. He was arrested in Calgary, Alberta. Ng fought being returned to the United States but in 1989 the courts ruled he could be extradited to California. It was not until mid-1999 that Ng was convicted of a number of murders that prosecutors could prove he had committed, that of six men, three women and two baby boys. He was sentenced to death.

Lamm, Herman K. "Baron" (1890?–1930) bank robber tactician

America's most brilliant bank robbery planner, one whose technique John Dillinger studied intently, was a young ex-German army officer, Herman K. Lamm, who brought Prussian precision and discipline to the art.

Shortly before World War I, Lamm was caught cheating at cards and forced out of his regiment. Emigrating to the United States, he put his military training and study of tactics to the best possible use as a holdup man in Utah. He was caught in 1917 and sent to prison for a short stretch. In prison he worked up what became known as the Baron Lamm technique of bank robbery.

It was Lamm's belief that a bank job required all the planning of a military campaign, with a full range of options to allow for unforeseen developments. When he got out of prison, Lamm organized a bank robbery gang and drilled the members in a fashion that would have done a Prussian sergeant proud. He always spent many hours in a bank before robbing it, drawing up a detailed floor plan, noting the location of the safes and whose duty it was to open them. Then the Baron put his men through a complete series of rehearsals, sometimes even using a full mock-up of the bank's interior. Each man was given a specific assignment, a zone of the bank to survey for possible trouble and an exact time schedule for his duties. Lamm's cardinal rule was that the job had to be performed on schedule and the gang had to leave the bank at the specified time no matter how little or how much loot had been collected.

The next phase of the operation, the getaway, received meticulous attention from the Baron. He always obtained a nondescript model car with a high-powered engine and his driver was usually a veteran of the racetracks. Lamm pasted a chart on the dashboard for the driver to follow. The escape route, with alternate turns and speedometer readings, was marked block by block. Before the robbery Lamm and the driver clocked the route to the second under various weather conditions.

From the end of World War I until 1930, Baron Lamm's men were the most efficient gang of bank robbers in the business, pulling dozens of jobs without a hitch. Finally, things went wrong during the robbery of the Citizens State Bank of Clinton, Ind. on December 16, 1930. The gang successfully robbed the bank of over $15,000, but when they got to the getaway car, the driver noticed the local barber approaching the bank with a shotgun. The barber, who was one of thousands of Indiana vigilantes organized to help police fight the growing number of bank holdups, was coming to investigate the presence of four strangers in the bank. The driver panicked and pulled a quick U-turn that caused the car to jump a curb and blow a tire. Lamm and his men were forced to seize another car, which, unfortunately for them, had a secret governor installed by a man to prevent his elderly father from driving recklessly.

They switched to a truck but it had very little water in the radiator; so they commandeered another car, which happened to be down to just one gallon of gas. The gang was cornered in Illinois by a horde of 200 police officers and vigilantes. In the wild gun battle that ensued, Lamm and the driver were killed. Another member of the gang, 71-year-old Dad Landy shot himself rather than spend his final years in prison. Two others, Walter Dietrich and Oklahoma Jack Clark, were caught and sent to prison.

In prison the two were permitted to join the Dillinger mob and escape with them under one proviso: they had to provide the details of Baron Lamm's technique. It was a system Dillinger used extensively throughout his career.

The Western land frauds of the late 19th and early 20th century remain one of the great raids on the public purse in the history of the United States. Almost 40 million acres of valuable public land were set aside as forest reserves and the General Land Office was put in charge of protecting this natural treasure. Almost immediately, land office agents began peddling the rich forest acreages to private parties, who then turned around and made a quick killing reselling the property to lumber companies.

By the time of Theodore Roosevelt's administration, these land looters had become so influential in Congress that they were able to strip the Department of Justice of an investigative force charged with collecting evidence against the wholesale frauds. Finally, however, an investigation launched by Secretary of the Interior Ethan A. Hitchcock uncovered the manipulations carried out by members of the General Land Office, including the agency's own detectives. Much of the evidence in the land frauds cases were gathered by William J. Burns, then the star agent of the Secret Service, and in a total of 34 cases that went to trial, 33 ended in conviction. Among those convicted were U.S. Sen. John H. Mitchell and Rep. John N. Williamson, both of Oregon. Sen. Mitchell appealed his conviction but he died in 1905 before his case was reviewed by a higher court. The Senate departed from custom and did not adjourn its session or send a delegation to Mitchell's funeral.

In later years some of the prosecutions were found to be politically tainted and corrupt. Many charges were brought against Burns, among them that witnesses had been intimidated into providing perjured testimony. In 1911 a report made to President William Howard Taft by Attorney General George W. Wickersham said there was no doubt that Burns had stage-managed the selection of jurors. Although the same accusation was made against the flamboyant Burns in numerous cases over the years, there is little doubt about the guilt of most of those charged in the land frauds.

Lansky, Meyer (1902–1983) syndicate leader

Despite a rash of publicity before his death, Meyer Lansky remained the most shadowy of the organized crime leaders. Yet he was, next to Lucky Luciano and perhaps even ahead of him, the godfather of the national crime syndicate that emerged in the early 1930s as the successor of the warring Prohibition gangs as well as of the old-line Mafia, headed by the so-called Mustache Petes, particularly Giuseppe "Joe the Boss" Masseria and Salvatore Maranzano. Of course, the Mafia still exists today but its present shape and prosperity were as much influenced by Lansky, a Jew from Grodno, Poland, as by the Sicilian Luciano.

They made a perfect pairing: the well-read, studious Lansky, who could survey all the angles of any situation, and the less-than-erudite Luciano, who nonetheless possessed a magnificent flair for organization and the brutal character to put any plan into operation.

Not that Lansky was less given to violence. Together with "Bugsy" Siegel, he formed the Bug and Meyer gang, the most vicious of the Prohibition mobs, working alternately as booze hijackers and protectors of liquor shipments for bootleggers who were willing to meet their price. The Bug and Meyer boys were also available for "slammings" and rubouts for a fee and were the forerunners of Murder, Inc., the enforcement arm of the syndicate. Indeed, Lansky probably had as much to do with forming Murder, Inc. as anyone, proposing the enforcers to be put under the command of a triumvirate composed of Louis Lepke, Albert Anastasia and Bugsy Siegel. Other leaders of the emerging national crime syndicate objected to the kill-crazy Siegel, feeling he would be too loyal to Lansky and more likely give the latter too powerful a weapon should the confederation fall apart in a war of extermination. Bugsy was removed from the murder combine, but Lansky's influence was not lessened. It is said no major assignment for Murder, Inc. was ever approved without consulting him, including the elimination of Siegel in 1947 for spending too much of the syndicate's money on his Las Vegas hotel operation. "I had no choice," Lansky reportedly told friends. Other versions say he pushed hard for a vote to kill his former partner, although he did suggest the mob hold execution of the verdict in abeyance while pressure was put on Siegel to produce profits from his Las Vegas ventures.

Luciano and Lansky together had planned the formation of a new syndicate as early as 1920, when Luciano was in his early 20s and Lansky was only 18. Together they survived the crime wars of the 1920s by shrewd alliances, eliminating one foe after another, even though they lacked the firepower of other gangs. When Luciano-Lansky effected the assassination of Masseria and Maranzano, they stood at the pinnacle of power in the underworld. Not even Al Capone thought of challenging them.

As Luciano later said, "I learned a long time before that Meyer Lansky understood the Italian brain almost better than I did. That's why I picked him to be my consigliere. . . . I used to tell Lansky that he may've had a Jewish mother, but someplace he must've been wet-nursed by a Sicilian." Luciano often said that Lansky "could look around corners," i.e., anticipate what would happen next in underworld intrigues, and that Although forced to return to the United States after being denied permanent sanctuary in Israel, Meyer Lansky, aging and ill, successfully fought off several legal efforts in the 1970s to jail him.

"the barrel of his gun was curved," i.e., he knew how to keep himself out of the line of fire. Through the years these were Lansky traits.

He never begrudged Luciano the top role, realizing that with it went the obvious dangers of notoriety, such as losing one's cover and becoming an inviting target for the law. Lansky preferred the safety of the shadows and for years avoided almost all publicity. As late as 1951, when his name popped up during the investigation of bookmaking czar Frank Erickson, the New York Times, despite one of the best news libraries in the world, did not know who he was, identifying him in print as "Meyer (Socks) Lansky," mistaking him for Joseph (Socks) Lanza, a waterfront gangster. During the Kefauver Investigation, Lansky was considered so unimportant that he was not even called to testify. Nor was he mentioned in the committee's first two interim reports. Only in the final report did the Senate investigators correct their oversight and declare: "Evidence of the Costello-Adonis-Lansky operations was found in New York City, Saratoga, Bergen County, N.J. New Orleans, Miami, Las Vegas, the west coast, and Havana, Cuba."

Finally, Lansky's role as "the brains of the combination" became known. The "little man," as he was called by his underworld associates, held together Luciano's crime empire when he went to prison in the late 1930s. Lansky was the money man trusted to hide or invest millions for the syndicate, and he saw to it that Luciano got his share of the profits even after he was deported to Italy. It was Lansky who opened up what was for a time the syndicate's greatest source of income, gambling in Havana. He alone handled negotiations with dictator Fulgencio Batista for a complete monopoly of gambling in Cuba. Lansky was said to have personally deposited $3 million in a Zurich, Switzerland bank for Batista and arranged to pay the ruling military junta, namely Batista, 50 percent of the profits thereafter.

In the rise and fall of underworld fortunes, Lansky survived because he was considered too valuable to lose. Thus, he could agree with Vito Genovese that Albert Anastasia should die and later take part in an incredible conspiracy that would deliver Genovese to the Feds and still enjoy immunity from retribution.

Lansky's arrest record over the years was minor-league stuff. It was not until 1970 that the federal government made a concerted effort to get him on income tax charges and deport him as an undesirable alien. In 1970 Lansky fled to Israel, settling in the plush Dan Hotel in Tel Aviv and claiming Israeli citizenship under the Law of Return which offers citizenship to anyone born of a Jewish mother. Lansky invested millions of dollars in the country to win public support, but he proved an embarrassment to the Israeli government. After a long battle in the courts and intense debate by the public, Lansky was forced to leave Israel.

In 1973, after undergoing open heart surgery, Lansky was brought up on income tax charges in Miami, Fla. but, much to the government's chagrin, was acquitted. In December 1974 the federal government abandoned its efforts to put the then 72-year-old organized crime legend behind bars. Although he faced other charges for violations of state laws, it was generally conceded he would never go to prison.

Larn, John M. (?-1877) crooked sheriff

A man with a murky past, John M. Larn showed up in Fort Griffin, Tex. about 1870 and went on to become famous as that state's notorious "outlaw lawman."

Larn didn't talk much about his previous history when he signed on as a cow puncher. He prospered in Fort Griffin, eventually marrying his boss' daughter. By early 1876 Larn was regarded as one of the more substantial citizens of Shackelford County and, as such, rode with other men of property in Texas' most active and effective vigilance committee. He is believed to have been the man in charge of a vigilante group who strung up a horse thief from a pecan tree and then left a pick and shovel underneath the swaying corpse for anyone who might want to dig his grave.

In April 1876 Larn was elected county sheriff and for a time he seemed to do a good job. Meanwhile, his ranching enterprise thrived, especially after he signed a contract to deliver three steers a day to the military garrison at the fort. Neighboring ranchers noticed their herds dwindling while Larn's seemed to stay as large as ever. He resigned from office under pressure, but the cattle disappearances continued. Vigilantes began watching the Larn ranch, and finally, in June 1877 a nester found a water hole near Larn's slaughter pens where the former lawman was dumping the branded hides of the stolen cattle. Larn shot the nester but the man escaped.

Larn was arrested by his successor in office, Sheriff William Cruger, and placed in a flimsy jail in Albany. Because of rumors that his supporters intended to break him out, the sheriff had the local blacksmith shackle the prisoner's legs to the cell floor. The Fort Griffin vigilantes did not think the peril of Larn's possible escape had been sufficiently eliminated, however; just before midnight on June 23, 1877, they overpowered the jail guards. But the shackles frustrated their plan to string Larn up. So instead, they finished off the outlaw lawman with a firing squad execution in the jail cell.

Las Vegas

Las Vegas was built on mob money. During World War II it was a jerkwater town with a few greasy spoons, filling stations and some slot machine emporiums. Gangster Bugsy Siegel first conjured up the idea of Las Vegas as a glittering gambling mecca in the desert. Using $6 million in mob funds, he built the Flamingo Hotel, which was initially a bust, largely because it took time to build up public interest. The mob was upset with Siegel due to the lack of return on its investment, and when it learned that Bugsy had pocketed some of the construction money, he was killed.

Nonetheless, the Bug's idea still made sense. Slowly, the Flamingo began to flourish and once the public accepted the idea of trekking through the desert to dice and roulette tables, one casino after another sprang up. State authorities adopted strict oversight measures to ensure the new casinos would not fall under mob domination, but to little avail. Syndicate money was traced directly to many major gambling establishments. Meyer Lansky financed much of the Thunderbird. Although some others fronted as its proprietors, the Desert Inn was largely owned by Moe Dalitz, head of the syndicate's Cleveland branch. The Sands was controlled—from behind the scenes—by Lansky, Joe Adonis, Frank Costello and Joseph "Doc" Stacher. The Sahara was launched by the Chicago mob—the Fischetti brothers, Tony Accardo and Sam Giancana. The Dunes was a goldmine for New England mafioso Raymond Patriarca.

When Frank Costello was shot in 1957, police found tallies in his coat pockets that matched the revenues of the Tropicana for a 24-day period. Up until then, presumably only the Nevada Gaming Control Board was unaware that the Tropicana provided a great source of income for Costello and his New Orleans partner, Dandy Phil Kastel. The word on Caesar's Palace was that almost everyone in the mob had a piece of it. Comedian Alan King said of its decor: "I wouldn't say it was exactly Roman—more kind of early Sicilian.”

The value of Las Vegas to organized crime is difficult to measure. Its casino-hotels made huge profits, and when some of the revenues were skimmed off the top so that taxes would not have to be paid on them, the take was much greater. It was later alleged that in an eight-year period Lansky and some of his associates skimmed $36 million from the Flamingo alone. In addition, the vast exchange of money across the gaming tables offered a perfect opportunity to launder funds from other, illegal enterprises. Jimmy Hoffa invested Teamsters' pension funds in the hotels in the form of interest-free “loans” that were never paid back, providing the mob with additional capital.

One thing Vegas proved was that given the opportunity to run a gambling setup honestly, the mob would still operate it dishonestly. Despite the huge profits, by the mid-1950s the mob had started selling off some of its properties to individuals and corporations. In the 1960s billionaire Howard Hughes started buying one casino after another.

In the early 1970s the mob's interest in Vegas was reportedly at a low point, but by the close of the decade, many observers concluded, mobsters were returning to the scene.

Probably the most striking advances in criminal investigation methods until the year 2000 will come from laser technology, which has already helped solve a number of crimes. Laser light can pick up fingerprints that chemical powders can't. Two men who recently robbed a New York City bank wore ski masks to hide their faces and plastic gloves to prevent fingerprint identification. Nonetheless, their prints were identified by use of a laser beam. In 1980 the FBI used laser beam technology to find 215 sets of fingerprints that standard methods of detection had failed to reveal.

When the two New York bank robbers fled with their loot, they used a stolen car for the getaway and then transferred to a second car. In the process one of the robbers discarded his plastic gloves on the floor of the first car figuring the static electricity on the gloves would prevent the detection of any fingerprints. But that was before the era of the laser. Light directed inside the fingers of the gloves revealed a perfect set of prints and subsequently led to the robbers' apprehension and conviction.

The FBI's 215 fingerprint findings by laser led to positive identifications in 45 cases. One suspect left his prints on plastic electrician's tape in a bomb threat case and another on the plastic stock of a sawed-off shotgun.

Perhaps an even more exotic use of laser light was involved in the Case of the Purlained Bicentennial Coin Collection. A rare silver certificate in the middle of the coin collection had been taken along with the coins. No fingerprints were found but the laser brought out the outline of the missing bill and was even able to “read” the shadows of the serial numbers. With that information the bill was traced and recovered along with the stolen coins.

Although the laser has been used regularly as a clue detector since the mid-1970s, it has never been tested by the judicial process, because there has never been need for a test. All of the suspects identified by use of the laser have confessed to their crimes and pleaded guilty.

LaTempa, Peter (1904–1945) Vito Genovese murder victim

The death of Peter LaTempa in 1945 ranks second only to the demise of Abe Reles, the Murder, Inc. informer, in 1941 as an example of the long reach of the Mafia. Crime kingpin Vito Genovese had fled from New York to Europe in 1937 to avoid being charged with the murder of Ferdinand Boccia. He was finally returned in 1945, after he was found working for the U.S. Army in Italy. The key witness linking him to Boccia's murder was Ernest “the Hawk” Rupolo, who had gone to the authorities with the story because he was in trouble for other offenses. However, lacking supporting circumstantial evidence, the law needed at least one other witness. That man was Peter LaTempa, a small-time hoodlum who had witnessed the Boccia killing. Under pressure, LaTempa finally implicated Genovese, but only after he knew that the crime leader had left the country and was unlikely ever to be prosecuted.

With Genovese's unexpected return, LaTempa, figuring the best place to be was in jail, asked to be placed in protective custody. He was lodged in a Brooklyn prison. On the evening of January 15, 1945 LaTempa swallowed some of the painkilling tablets he regularly took for a stomach disorder and went to sleep. He died in his sleep. An autopsy revealed he had taken enough poison “to kill eight horses.” It was never established who had arranged to put the poison in the bottle of tablets, but logic pointed to Genovese. Without LaTempa's testimony, the evidence against him was insufficient to warrant a trial. Not only had the government obligingly brought him back to the United States but now it had to release him, setting the stage for his eventual emergence as the top figure in the Mafia.

It was hardly surprising that after Robert Irving Latimer murdered his 60-year-old mother on the family estate in Jackson, Mich., the newspapers in due course would refer to him as Bungling Latimer. Latimer had constructed what he considered a brilliant murder plot so that he could inherit the family fortune and collect this insurance. On the morning of January 25, 1889, Latimer was seen, as per plan, leaving Jackson on his way to Detroit. Later that night he slipped back into Jackson, murdered his mother and returned to Detroit. It was a simple enough alibi: he couldn't possibly kill his mother if he was in Detroit at the time of her death. That was the plan, but Latimer bungled it from start to finish.

Shortly after he checked into a hotel in Detroit, a porter saw him slipping out a back door, which struck the man as a strange move for a newly arrived guest. Then Latimer took a Michigan Central train to Ypsilanti, where he caught another train to Jackson. By not taking a direct train to Jackson, Latimer risked being remembered by not one but two conductors. (And both did.) After locking up the small family dog in a room, something only a nonstranger could have done without causing the dog to bark, Latimer killed his mother and slipped back to the train station under cover of darkness. On the return trip to Detroit the bungling murderer got into a shouting match with a conductor because at first he was unable to get a sleeper. The following morning Latimer went to a barber shop next to his hotel. The barber noticed that his shirt cuffs were missing and that there was blood on his coat. Furthermore, the chamber maid had found Latimer's bed unslept in; he had not even thought to rumple it. Latimer was convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment, still proclaiming his innocence for years afterward. A cartoonist aptly characterized Latimer painting a sign reading, "I WENT THIS WAY."

Latimer was doing life in the Michigan State Prison when he became a cause celebre for those who wanted to introduce the death penalty in Michigan. A model prisoner, he became a trusty and was put in charge of the prison pharmacy. On the night of March 26, 1893, he served a couple of guards a midnight lunch of sardines and lemonade. To the lemonade he had added prussic acid and opium, obtained from the pharmacy. Within 20 minutes one guard was unconscious and the other, George Haight, dead. Latimer escaped and went to the home of relatives expecting to be hidden, only to be turned away. Recaptured a few days later, he insisted that he had not meant to kill the guard, that he had unwittingly put too much prussic acid in the drink. Latimer was saddled with another life sentence, which capital punishment proponents thought insufficient. They asked what would happen if he murdered another guard; under the law, he could only be given yet another life term.

However, the death penalty storm passed, and Latimer went back to being a model prisoner. Ironically, he was popular with the guards, who felt he had simply made a miscalculation. By 1907 he had been made a trusty again and put in charge of landscaping the prison grounds. In the mid-1920s Latimer, who had progressed to the position of "senior con," often was interviewed by the press about his two murders and his attitude toward the newer convicts, who, he said, lacked the class and style of the old boys. Later on, when the prison was to be moved to a new location, he protested having to leave. His cell, fixed up as a library with many plants and a desk, was his home. He asked to be permitted to stay. Considered harmless, Latimer was appointed a watchman for the deserted prison. Finally, after spending 46 years in prison, Latimer was released in 1935. Picked up as a vagrant a few times, he was taken into a state home for the aged and died there in 1946.

Lawes, Kathryn (1885–1937) Angel of Sing Sing

No fiction writer would ever dare to invent a character like Kathryn Lawes, the so-called Angel of Sing Sing and pass off as plausible the tear-jerking story of her death. It simply would not be believed.

The first wife of Sing Sing Warden Lewis E. Lawes, Kathryn was the mistress of the prison on the Hudson for 17 years after Lawes took over. She was known to the prisoners as a kind, understanding woman who wrote letters for them, helped many of their families and cared for them in the prison hospital. Her deeds became so legendary that she was considered an angel of mercy.

In 1937 Kathryn Lawes was killed in an automobile accident. The prisoners of Sing Sing were stunned, and their grief was real. There was genuine anguish among them when it was announced her funeral would take place in a church outside the prison walls. A committee of prisoners went to Warden Lawes to protest and insist on the convicts' right to pay their last respects.

Lawes was willing to gamble on his men. He had in the past allowed many prisoners to go home on emergency visits without escorts, a practice that had left him open to possibly ruinous criticism if anything had gone wrong. The warden took a much greater risk now by declaring he would comply with the prisoners' request.

The night before the funeral, the south gate of Sing Sing swung open and out trudged a silent procession of murderers, swindlers, thieves and crooks of all kinds—marching out of the prison to the warden's house, a quarter of a mile away. There were no guns trained on them and not a single guard accompanied them; yet not one man strayed from line, nor looked for the chance to escape. When the men entered the house, they silently passed the bier, many uttering a short word of prayer, and then walked outside, reformed their ranks and marched silently back to their prison.

Lawes, Lewis Edward (1883–1947) warden of Sing Sing Probably the most reform-minded and certainly the best known of all prison wardens in America, Lewis E. Lawes was in charge of Sing Sing Prison in Ossining, N.Y. for 21 years, where he became a strong voice for the philosophy that prisons should try to rehabilitate prisoners.

The son of a prison guard, Lawes became one himself at the age of 22, but unlike the old-time guards and most of the new ones, he viewed and studied penology as a science and soon rose through the system building a reputation as a realistic reformer. In 1915 he became superintendent of the New York City Reformatory, and in 1919 Gov. Alfred E. Smith named him to the difficult position of warden of Sing Sing.

Within a short time, Lawes accomplished the near impossible in penology, gaining the respect of both the guards and the convicts. He rapidly reduced the incidence of corporal punishment. Lawes once said:

It became quickly apparent to me that under conditions as they were, the prison warden, to be effective, would have to constitute himself not as an instrument of punishment but a firm, frank friend in need. He would have to stretch humanitarianism to the limits of the law, with a stiff punch always in reserve. I have been charged, since my incumbency, with being too kind. I wish I could plead guilty to the accusation, but my sense of duty will not permit it. My job is to hold my men and, as far as possible, to win them over to sane, social thinking. And I judge the effectiveness of that job not so much by obedience to rule, for rules can be enforced, but by the humor of the general prison population.

Lawes set up a system for prisoner self-government which for him had a very precise meaning—the government of self. Under Lawes, the prisoners' Mutual Welfare League was charged with regulating the leisure hours of the inmates, subject only to the warden's approval. But unlike methods used in other prisons, the prisoners did not have power over other prisoners, a sure way to create friction. Machinery was established whereby a convict with a pressing problem could get to see him. Lawes placed great trust in the convicts, often allowing them leave to visit home for a funeral or to go to the bedside of a dying relative. They were honor-bound to return, and they did. Lawes often loaned money to prisoners being discharged, and almost always they would return it, some coming to the prison gate years later with the money. Lawes could thus dedicate one of his books "to those tens of thousand of my former wards who have justified my faith in human nature."

Although he was forced to officiate at many executions, Lawes was a bitter foe of capital punishment and toured the country campaigning to abolish it. He opposed the death penalty because of the infrequency and the inequity of its application and martyrdom it provided a convicted murderer. He felt all these problems weakened the entire structure of social control and actually encouraged the desperate criminal toward the extreme penalty. "He knows," Lawes said, "that his gamble with the death penalty is safer than with a long term in prison for a lesser offense."

When Lawes retired in 1941, he had held the post for 21 years, longer than any other warden. His predecessor had lasted only six weeks.

Not long ago a crooked Otsego County, New York, lawyer tacked a nonexistent heiress onto a late client's will. He then proceeded to construct a paper trail for her by dressing in drag and checking into a Little Falls motel under her name. At a later probate hearing the judge did not buy the masquerade after a clerk from the motel described the previously unknown woman as being 6 feet tall, weighing 200 pounds and being "a Bea Arthur look-alike."

The attorney was only one of a long list of New York lawyers who had ripped off their clients in recent years. There was Robert B. Anderson, a former U.S. secretary of the Treasury, who stole a widow's retirement money. There was also Jack B. Siolerwiz, whose 86 victims cost the state's Lawyers Fund for Client Protection the sum of $3 million.

Almost every state has some sort of fund established to protect clients from thieving lawyers. By the early 1990s it became clear that lawyer scams looting clients' funds had skyrocketed. The North Dakota fund, faced with a boom in claims, went bankrupt. In one year in Florida payouts by the Client Security Fund quadrupled over the rate of previous years, with the result that the fund was forced to reduce the size of all repayments so that all claimants would get at least some money. New York, which had had a $100,000 cap, reduced it to $50,000.

LAY, Elza, or Elzy

The causes of the rise in lawyer scams are at least threefold: (1) hard economic times (for the lawyer); (2) drug and alcohol abuse; and (3), perhaps most important, the ease with which cheating lawyers can get away with their crimes.

A New York lawyer, Sergio Taub, was unmasked in 1991 only after he had been murdered in an unrelated love triangle plot. When officials sifted through his estate, they found about $200,000 missing from his clients' trust accounts, with most of those funds going for down payments of about $3,000 each on a number of homes in Queens.

When North Dakota's fund went belly up, there were six unpaid claims, all against lawyers who were satisfying their cocaine habits.

A New York lawyer, Steven Winston, declared: "I can tell you as an addict, all that matters is your drugs. You don't think of your wife or kids, so the last thing you think about is your career or your clients." The New York fund paid a Winston client $12,500, which Winston repaid. He then became general counsel for Daytop Village Inc., where he had undergone drug treatment himself.

Actually, very few lawyers steal, or at least are caught at it. A survey of 45,000 lawyers in New Jersey has shown that only one half of 1 percent are ever involved—or at least known to be involved. And of 126 claims of theft in one year, 36 lawyers were responsible.

Still, the fact remains, few persons can break the law quite like a lawyer. There is the New York career of Jerome Spiegelman, who secretly settled dozens of personal injury cases and simply pocketed all the money, leaving clients without a penny. Because of the Spiegelman cases, the law since 1988 has required insurance companies to notify clients whenever they send a settlement check to their lawyers. In many states trustees of clients' security funds are pushing for various changes, such as requiring banks to report when checks bounce against attorney trust or escrow accounts. Without that, a fast-moving crook can shift funds from another trust account and continue to cover his tracks.

Called "the educated member of the Wild Bunch" by Butch Cassidy, slim, handsome, "Boston-educated" Elzy Lay was the man responsible for planning the most successful of the gang's bank and train robberies. He was the outlaw closest to Cassidy, far closer than was the Sundance Kid, despite popular legend. In fact, in a 1975 book, Butch Cassidy, My Brother, Cassidy's last surviving sister, Lula Parker Betenson, insisted that most episodes in the movie Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid really involved Lay rather than Sundance. But, she asked, "who would go to a movie entitled Butch Cassidy and Elzy Lay?"

Lay was born in MacArthur, Ohio and was not "Boston-educated," as many writers have stated. In fact, there is no record of his ever having been to Boston. Furthermore, it has never really been established whether he went to college or was merely smarter than the rest of the Wild Bunch. Of all the members of the Bunch, it was always evident that neither Cassidy nor Lay were killers by nature. They had met while doing ranch work in Wyoming. Both were looking for excitement and became lifelong friends. They pulled many two-man holdups. Whenever they separated, Lay would team up with the Black Jack Ketchum gang and pull other jobs, although Ketchum never really appreciated that Lay would be considered the mastermind of the band.

Lay's last holdup with the Wild Bunch was the robbery of a Union Pacific train at Wilcox, Wyo. on June 2, 1899. On July 11, 1899, Lay, as part of the Ketchum gang, robbed the Texas Flyer at Twin Mountains, N.M. They were pursued by a posse headed by Sheriff Ed Farr, who was killed in a gun fight at Turkey Creek Canyon, N.M., with the fatal shot attributed to Lay. The Ketchum gang then split up, and Lay headed south. On August 17, 1899 he was cornered by another posse near Carlsbad, N.M. and captured following a spirited battle. He was sentenced to life imprisonment at New Mexico State Penitentiary. In prison he underwent a complete reformation and won a governor's pardon in 1906.

After his release Lay went straight. For a while, he operated a ranch for the father of a girl he married and then became interested in oil geology. He found what he thought was a large oil deposit and claimed the land, but he eventually had to give it up because of the high production costs involved. Standard Oil of California took over the claim and struck oil.

There has been considerable speculation about whether Butch Cassidy ever visited Lay after his return from South America (many historians now doubt the story of his and the Sundance Kid's death in Bolivia in 1909) and several persons in Baggs, Wyo. insisted they saw Cassidy and Lay together on many occasions in 1929–30. Lay refused to admit anything, even under the coaxing of Western novelist Zane Grey. Just before Lay died on November 10, 1934, however, he told his wife, "Mary, get hold of Zane because I'm not going to live much longer." He died before Grey reached him.

Along with Madame Moustache, Kitty Le Roy represented the best of the West's woman gamblers. Texas-born Kitty first came to public attention as a jug dancer in Dallas at the age of 10. Over the next decade her beauty bloomed, and she became the toast of Dallas. Her attractiveness and personality helped her win a role in local society comparable to that played by Lily Langtry in Victorian London. Kitty also took up a theatrical career but eventually gave up the stage in favor of working as a faro dealer, an occupation in which she became most proficient. As the profession demanded, Kitty became accomplished at pistol shooting and scored many a deliberate near-miss to settle disputes at the gambling table. She reportedly was always armed with several bowie knives and revolvers and, in fact, had an arsenal of 12 knives and seven guns. By the time she was 26, Kitty had run through four husbands. She married the first because he was the only man in town sporting enough to let her shoot apples off his head as she galloped by on horseback. She supposedly ran him out in favor of a wealthy German; she chased the latter away when he ran out of funds. Sometime later, Kitty shot up an admirer who annoyed her with his persistence. Fickle or guilt-stricken, she married her victim a few hours before he died of his wounds.

In 1876 Kitty moved to Deadwood, Dakota Territory with another spouse and opened the Mint Gambling Saloon. The Mint was known to be a regular calling point for the likes of outlaw Sam Bass and Wild Bill Hickok, both of whom Kitty is said to have entertained on a number of occasions. Kitty's husband killed her and himself in 1878, presumably out of jealousy.

leatherheads first New York police

The first policemen of post-Dutch New York City were little more than watchmen. Called leatherheads because of their heavy leather helmets, which were rather similar to those of today's firemen, they patrolled the streets at night to enforce a rigorous curfew. After 9 o'clock anyone caught outside his house without a plausible reason automatically was considered to be of "bad morals" and locked up until daylight on general principle. In fact the main duty of the watch was to sing out each hour that all was well, for the most part, which it was in 18th century New York.

There were a few watch houses that served as area headquarters and some sentry boxes that provided shelter from time to time during the long cold nights. The leatherheads, of which there were no more than 30 or 40, supervised by a high constable, were never accused of being overly bright, overly sober or overly alert.

They were, in fact, very prone to sleeping on duty, and it was a favorite sport of the roisterers of the era to hunt for one dozing in his sentry box, lasso the box and drag it through the streets, whooping over the plight of their trapped victim.

While such antics were often the worst lawlessness to be reported on many evenings, New York in that era was not entirely crime-free. There were hangings enough for drunken murderers, forgers, counterfeiters and others found guilty of the long list of capital crimes, including church robbery. But the fact remained that New York was a sleepy little town, only reaching 50,000 inhabitants in 1799. The crime pace quickened early in the next century with the appearance of the great criminal gangs, and a more professional police force than the leatherheads was needed to cope with the new lawlessness.

LeBlanc, Antoine (?–1833) murderer

Although the claim may be dubious, Antoine LeBlanc is generally known as the fastest murderer in America.

LeBlanc arrived from France on April 26, 1833, and by May 2, 1833 he had committed three murders. Upon his arrival he had gone to work on the estate of the Sayre family in rural New Jersey and apparently could not cope with his lowly position which required him to sleep in the woodshed. On May 2 LeBlanc crept up on Mr. and Mrs. Sayre, battered them to death with a shovel and buried their bodies under a pile of manure. LeBlanc thought the Sayre's black maid was away, but when he discovered her presence in the attic of the house, he murdered her as well. He did not immediately flee the area, believing he could remain a while and say that his employers had gone away for a short time. The more scandalous purveyors of the news in that era later reported that LeBlanc, a tall, handsome rogue, entertained a number of young ladies in the Sayre home. In any event, friends of the missing couple found the bodies and captured the Frenchman. He was quickly tried and convicted and hanged on September 6, 1833 on the Morristown green before a crowd of 12,000. It is unclear how many were attracted by his savage crimes and how many by his romantic reputation since, as one historian of the day related, of those in attendance "the majority were females."

Lechler, John (?–1822) murderer

As the odd man out in a tawdry love triangle, John Lechler of Lancaster, Pa. killed his wife, Mary, and her lover's wife, Mrs. John Haag, in 1822. He would not be worthy of note save that the facts in the case were so bizarre the area's newspapers conducted what was apparently the first "poll" ever taken on the public's reaction to a trial verdict.

Mary Lechler's morals were never too high. When John Lechler returned home and found her in bed with neighbor Haag, he threatened to kill the two of them. The shaking Haag offered to buy him off with a promissory note. After some haggling over the amount, Lechler accepted the settlement but flew into a rage some days later when Haag refused to honor his commitment. Lechler rushed home and strangled his wife until she was unconscious and then hanged her in the attic. Armed with two pistols, the doubly cheated husband went to Haag's home and called on him to come out. When Haag refused, Lechler fired through the door, fatally wounding the cowering Mrs. Haag rather than her husband. Lechler was convicted and hanged in Lancaster on October 25, 1822.

The sentence in the case evoked considerable public debate. Readers of several publications cast a divided vote on the appropriateness of the death penalty. Although the farming community strongly believed in the sanctity of written contracts, and many of its members were sympathetic to Lechler's outrage a majority of the readers questioned favored his execution. Their attitude probably was best summed up by a farmer who said, "If he'd killed Mr. Haag instead of the missus, I would say he would have deserved a less severe sentence."

There is a certain ritual to a prison inmate using the toilet in his cell. He is supposed to sit with one leg out of his pants and one leg in. This "leg in, leg out" precaution can be a life saver.

As related by one convict in Pete Earley's The Hot House, perhaps the definitive book on life in an American prison, ". . . two dudes busted in on this guy in the cell next to mine and stuck him twenty-six times with shanks. He was sitting on the crapper when they killed him, and he couldn't fight back because his pants were wrapped around his legs. Stupid bastard. Anyone who don't know better than to take a leg out of his pants in prison before he sits down on a toilet deserves to die."

There are other protective strategies required behind bars. This same con noted, "I saw a guy get stuck while he was walking out of the shower wearing those rubber thongs. Soon as they hit 'im, he fell over 'cause the floor was wet and he didn't have any footing. I always go to the shower barefoot."

Leibowitz, Samuel S. (1893–1978) defense attorney and judge

A flamboyant lawyer who built his reputation with highly remunerative defenses of gangsters, Samuel S. Leibowitz ran up an amazing record: he represented 140 persons charged with murder and lost only one to the electric chair. However, he won international fame for his defense of the Scottsboro Boys, nine young blacks charged with the rape of two "Southern ladies"—actually hobo-style prostitutes—aboard a freight train in Alabama in 1931. In a total of 10 trials and retrials, the stirring defenses by the "New York Jew nigger lover," as he was called by many citizens and much of the press in the South, resulted in the dropping of charges against four of the nine and played a huge part in winning paroles for four others; the last, Haywood Patterson, the alleged ringleader, escaped but eventually was captured and sent to prison for another crime. One of Leibowitz' most important accomplishments was winning a Supreme Court decision that the exclusion of blacks from jury service was unconstitutional, a finding that over the years was to have a profound effect on the administration of justice in the South.

Leibowitz was born in Romania and came to the United States at the age of four. He worked his way through law school and became a lawyer in 1916. Within a few years he established himself among criminal defendants as a miracle lawyer, with a knack for assembling "friendly juries" and an ability to demolish eyewitness testimony.

Leibowitz firmly believed in prescreening jurors, an entirely legal procedure few defense lawyers bother with because of the expense and tediousness of the research involved. Leibowitz wanted to know how many times each prospective member of the panel had served on a criminal case jury, how they had voted and much about their personal life and beliefs, and he was usually blessed with high-paying clients who had no trouble financing such research. The prosecution, aided by the vast investigative machinery at its disposal has always engaged in the screening of potential jurors, often to a far greater extent. Once Leibowitz had the background information, picked jurors whom he felt would be sympathetic to the defense and disposed of those more likely to vote for conviction. Even district attorneys admitted no lawyer could pick a more "friendly" panel than Leibowitz.

Leibowitz generally had contempt for eyewitness testimony, knowing how faulty it could be. He firmly believed circumstantial evidence was, on the whole, more dependable. Out of court, Leibowitz delighted in exposing the unreliability of eyewitness evidence, staging events to show the contradictory stories told by witnesses. In one classic demonstration he performed at legal seminars and at law school lectures, Leibowitz would ask regular smokers of Camel cigarettes, "Is the man leading the camel or sitting on its back?" In one typical result, two out of five said the man was leading the camel, two out of five that he was sitting on the camel and only one in five correctly stated there was no man in the picture.

In his famous defense of Vincent "Mad Dog" Coll, a gangster who had gunned down five children on a Manhattan street, one of them fatally, Leibowitz got his client off by shifting the focus of the trial to eyewitnesses of the tragedy until it almost seemed as if they were the defendants.

Leibowitz successfully represented many of the top mobsters of the day, once rather easily getting Al Capone acquitted of a murder charge. He secured acquittals for Pittsburgh Phil Strauss, Abe Reles, Bugsy Goldstein and Bugsy Siegel, admittedly before the existence of Murder, Inc. and he turned down a $250,000 fee to defend Louis Lepke when that investigation was breaking in 1939. By that time Leibowitz had tired of the role of defense attorney and was seeking appointment to a judgeship.

When in 1940 the Democratic Party of Brooklyn proposed him for judge of the King's County Court, his nomination brought forth vigorous opposition. "Elect Leibowitz and he'll open the doors of the jails," his political opponents cried. "He'll turn loose every crook who comes before him."

It was a fear never realized. He turned out to be what is known as a "hanging judge," meting out extremely harsh sentences to professional criminals. On his retirement from the bench in 1970, eight years before his death, he observed, "I was tough with hardened criminals, toughness is all they understand."

Still, Leibowitz remained true to his belief in the right of every defendant to proper counsel.

In a typical scene in his court, a defendant would be brought up on robbery and assault charges.

"Let's see now," the judge would say. "You first appeared in juvenile court when you were fifteen. Since then you've been charged with crime, twelve times; everything from petty larceny to manslaughter. You've been convicted four times, and you've spent ten years behind bars. Bail is fixed at fifty thousand dollars. Have you got a lawyer?"

"I got no money to pay a lawyer," the defendant would reply.

"You need a good lawyer," Leibowitz would declare. "I'm going to appoint the best defense lawyer I know to represent you, without pay."

That was the law, according to Sam Leibowitz.

Lenox Avenue Gang New York gang of burglars and killers

One of the most ferocious New York City gangs of this century was the Lenox Avenue Gang, formed as an independent venture by Gyp the Blood, the chief underling of Jack Zelig. They operated around 125th Street, terrorizing the neighborhood with daytime muggings, nighttime burglaries and killings-for-pay around the clock.

As the gang's chief, Gyp the Blood was a natural at his calling and could bring out the worst in any recruit. Jacob "Whitey Lewis" Seidenshner had been a third-rate boxer, but under Gyp the Blood's patient instructions, he became a master of the blackjack, neatly denting a skull without causing fatal results when they were unwanted or unpaid for. Louis “Lefty Louie” Rosenberg was mainly a pickpocket but with Gyp’s guidance, became renowned as an expert gunman. Francesco “Dago Frank” Cirofisi was the meanest of the mob, more vicious than even Gyp the Blood himself, which was saying a lot. Dago Frank sneered at any job that didn’t promise at least some likelihood of shooting. Val O’Farrell, one of the city’s most famous police detectives, labeled Dago Frank “the toughest man in the world.” Police laid six killings directly to Frank but could prove none of them in court, and had no idea how many others he had committed. Dutch Sadie, Dago Frank’s girlfriend, was the main female member of the Lenox Avenuers. She carried a large butcher knife in her muff and would come howling to help Dago Frank whenever an intended mugging victim offered serious resistance. Her bloodcurdling shrieks were enough to freeze most men into total inaction.

The Lenox Avenue Gang came to an abrupt end in 1914, when Gyp the Blood, Lefty Louie, Dago Frank and Whitey Lewis all went to the electric chair as the triggermen in the murder of gambler Herman Rosenthal.

Leopold and Loeb thrill murderers

One day in May 1924 two youths, the sons of two of Chicago’s wealthiest and most illustrious families, drove to the Harvard School for Boys in the suburb of Kenwood, Ill. to carry out what they regarded as the “perfect murder.” Eighteen-year-old Richard “Dickie” Loeb, the youngest graduate of the University of Michigan, was a postgraduate student at the University of Chicago, and 19-year-old Nathan “Babe” Leopold, a Phi Beta Kappa from Chicago, was taking a law course there. The pair had perpetrated several minor crimes before they decided to commit the perfect murder. The killing, they felt, would be fun and an intellectual challenge, one worthy of their superior mental abilities.

Working out their plot for seven months, they picked as their victim 14-year-old Bobby Franks, the son of millionaire businessman Jacob Franks and a distant cousin of Loeb. The Franks boy, who was always flattered when the pair took note of him, happily hopped into their car when they pulled up in front of his school. They drove the boy to within a few blocks of the Franks residence in fashionable Hyde Park and then grabbed him, stuffed a gag in his mouth and smashed his skull four times with a heavy chisel. Following the murderous assault Leopold and Loeb casually motored to some marshy wasteland and carried the body to a culvert along tracks of the Pennsylvania Railroad. After dunking the boy’s head under swamp water to make sure he was dead, they poured hydrochloric acid on his face to complicate identification and then stuffed the body in a drain pipe.

Satisfied with their work, the pair repaired to Leopold’s home, where they played cards and drank liquor. At midnight they called the elder Franks and informed him he would receive instructions on how to ransom his missing son. By the time their typewritten note demanding $10,000 was received, workmen had found the boy’s body. Despite their self-proclaimed mental abilities, the two young killers weren’t very good criminals. They were easily caught. Leopold had dropped his eyeglasses near the spot where the body was hidden and police checked the prescription until it led back to him. Furthermore, the ransom note was traced to Leopold’s typewriter.

Dickie Loeb broke first, and then Leopold confessed as well. A shocked city and nation fully demanded and expected that the pair would be executed.

The parents of the two called in famous lawyer Clarence Darrow to defend them. For a fee of $100,000 Darrow agreed to seek to win the best possible verdict, one that would find them guilty but save them from execution. The trial began in August. Both sides produced psychiatrists to prove or disprove their mental competence. Darrow had less trouble with the opposing psychiatrists than he did with his clients, who turned the court proceedings into a circus. They clowned and hammed through the sessions, and the newspapers caught their frequent smirks in page-one pictures. The public, always against the two “poor little rich boys,” became even more hostile.

Still Darrow prevailed. He put the human brain on trial and presented evidence that Leopold was a paranoiac with a severe manic drive; Loeb was pictured as a dangerous schizophrenic. He derided their supernormal intelligences and portrayed them as having the emotional capacities of seven-year-olds. For two days Darrow talked. “Do you think you can cure the hatreds and the maladjustments of the world by hanging them?” he asked the prosecution before Judge John R. Caverly, chief justice of the Criminal Court of Cook County, who was hearing the case without a jury. “You simply show your ignorance and your hate when you say it. You may heal and cure hatred with love and understanding, but you can only add fuel to the flames with cruelty and hating.”

Then Darrow wept. In macabre detail he described how the state planned to hang the defendants. He invited the prosecution to perform the execution. Even the defendants were gripped by Darrow’s presentation. Loeb shuddered, and Leopold got hysterical and had to be taken from the courtroom for a time. The lawyer refused to let up. He wept for the victims and he wept for the defendants and he wept for all other victims and defendants. In the end, Darrow won. Sentenced on September 10, the defendants got life for the murder of Bobby Franks plus 99 years for kidnapping him. Ironically, Darrow was paid only $40,000 of the much larger fee due him, and most of that only after he had dunned the two families a number of times.

The public was not through with Leopold and Loeb, however. There were subsequent exposés of the favored treatment they received in prison. Unlike many other prisoners at Joliet, each was put in a separate cell. They were provided with books, desks and filing cabinets. Loeb kept two canaries. They ate in the officers' lounge, away from the other prisoners, and had their meals cooked to order. They freely visited one another and they were allowed to keep their own garden.

Over the years Loeb became an aggressive homosexual, noted for pursuit of other convicts. In January 1936 he was slashed to death in a brawl.

Leopold, on the other hand, made tremendous adjustments in his behavior. Nevertheless, his appeals for parole were rejected three times. During his fourth appeal poet Carl Sandburg pleaded his case, saying he would be willing to allow Leopold to live in his home. Finally, in March 1958 Leopold was paroled. He said: "I am a broken old man. I want a chance to find redemption for myself and to help others." He published a book, Life Plus 99 Years, and went to Puerto Rico to work among the poor as a $10-a-month hospital technician. Three years later, he married a widow. Leopold died of a heart ailment in 1971.

Leslie, Frank "Buckskin" (1842-?) gunfighter

The prototype western gunfighter who took his calling seriously, paying loving care to his guns and always practicing his aim, Frank "Buckskin" Leslie, was a pitiless gunslinger officially credited with some 10 to 14 kills.

A mystique has developed around Leslie. He has been described as a man who was never crossed twice by the same person. When the much-feared Johnny Ringo impertinently asked Leslie, "Did you ever shoot anybody in front?" Leslie had nothing to say. He still had nothing to say when they found Johnny Ringo resting under a tree with a bullet in his head, and nobody asked him any impertinent questions about that, although he remains the only suspect in Ringo's murder.

Little is known of Leslie's early life because of his habit of telling contradictory stories about himself—he was born in Kentucky or he was born in Texas; he studied pharmacy or he studied medicine in Europe. In the 1870s Leslie served as an army scout in several Indian campaigns, and in 1880 he turned up in Tombstone, Ariz. with enough funds to open the Cosmopolitan Hotel. He had a reputation as a gunfighter and in June he demonstrated his prowess by killing a man named Mike Killeen in a dispute over Killeen's wife. A few months later, Leslie married the widow.

At this time, Tombstone was immersed in the Earp-Clanton feud. Leslie's position in the matter is unclear. More often than not he appears to have sided with the Clantons, but according to the record, he shot up more Clantons than Earps. One Clanton gunner who made the mistake of crossing Leslie was Billy Claiborne. Claiborne, a survivor of the gunfight at the O.K. Corral, had been insisting everyone call him Billy the Kid, in honor of that late lamented outlaw, and had gunned down three men for laughing when he demanded they address him this way. In November 1882 Leslie was working at the Oriental Saloon as a barman-bouncer when Claiborne walked in one day and told him what he wanted to be called. Leslie just gave him a sour look. Claiborne then ordered him to step outside. Leslie did, shot Claiborne dead and returned to the bar.

Leslie was a maverick in the Earp-Clanton disputes and a gunfighter pure and simple. He strode the streets with his pistol lodged in a quick-fire rig, attached by a stud to a slotted plate on his gun belt so that it could be fired by swiveling it from the hip. He also used his wife for target practice, tracing her outline with bullets along a wall in their home. This may explain why the marriage didn't last. Leslie formed a relationship with one of the town's leading whores, Mollie Williams, but that affair didn't survive either. He shot her dead in 1889.

Leslie was sent to prison for killing Mollie but was paroled in 1896. After that, he traveled to the Klondike, and when he showed up in California in 1904, he had quite a poke. He apparently drank up most of that money and then worked as a bartender in a number of saloons. From 1913 to 1922 he operated a pool hall in Oakland, but thereafter, Leslie fades into obscurity. Some say he ended up working as a janitor, and there were many reports that he committed suicide, but the facts are not clear one way or the other.

Unquestionably, the greatest bank robber (although, strictly speaking, most of his capers were burglaries) of the 19th century, notwithstanding the likes of Mark Shingburn, George Bliss and other notables, was George Leonidas Leslie, who New York Superintendent of Police George W. Walling held to be the mastermind of 80 percent of all bank thefts in America from 1865 until his violent death in 1884. Leslie's gang, according to Walling, stole somewhere between $7 and $12 million. In addition, this criminal genius was called in as a consultant on bank jobs by underworld gangs all over the country. His consultation fees ranged from $5,000 to $20,000, payable in advance regardless of the take.

Leslie was contemptuous of most criminals, regarding them as too stupid to make crime pay to its full potential. Typical was the Ace Marvin gang in San Francisco. In late 1880 they gave him $20,000 to help plan a bank job. The plan was to rob a bank over the weekend so that the theft would not be discovered until Monday; that was the only part of the caper Leslie liked. All the rest was awful. Ace Marvin was not a bank man but rather a jack of all crimes who thought a bank job would be a great way to make a big score. Leslie shook his head at such amateurism. Then too, Ace's "pete" man if allowed to follow his blasting technique, probably would blow half the town into the Bay. And Marvin didn't even have a fix in with the law. Leslie generally preferred to have a police license before he staged a heist. It made things simpler for everybody, and besides, the law came rather cheap. Finally, Marvin had not adequately planned the getaway. Leslie liked things laid out so that the escape route went down a narrow street where a carriage could be pulled out at just the right time and left in the way of any pursuers.

After listening to Ace's exposition of the robbery, Leslie junked the whole thing. He conceived a plan that called for the thieves to enter the bank not once but twice.

One night Leslie, Ace and six henchmen, including a skilled locksmith, forced the lock on the bank's side door and entered. The locksmith immediately set about replacing the lock on the door with a duplicate so that there would be no evidence of any forced entry. Meanwhile, Leslie carefully pried the dial off the safe lock with a small file. It was difficult work because he had to avoid leaving any marks or scratches. At last, the dial popped off. Then Leslie drew out a weird-looking instrument made of thin steel wire, arranged it inside the surface of the dial and then replaced the knob securely on the safe.

Even Ace Marvin understood. "Well, I'll be," he said. "That wire is going to cut out grooves under the dial every time the combination is worked!"

Leslie nodded proudly. He explained the device was called the little joker. If Leslie had not invented it, he certainly refined it and used it to perfection. "The deepest cuts will indicate the numbers of the combination. You just won't know which order the numbers are in and will have to try all the various possibilities, but there can only be a few dozen, so you'll have the right combination in a matter of minutes."

The next morning Leslie hopped a train back to New York. When he got home, he read in the newspapers about a $173,000 burglary of a bank in San Francisco. Leslie shook his head in disgust. Everyone had estimated the loot would be well over $200,000. If he had run the job, he would have counted the money on the spot and finding it short, he would have left it in the safe and returned another time, especially since it was only a few weeks until Christmas. If Marvin had waited a while bank deposits by businessmen would have soared. In fact, Leslie might have broken in three or four times before making the haul. But Ace Marvin was not George Leslie; he just wasn't in the same class.

That year, 1880, Leslie was at the height of his fabulous career. He had come a long way since graduating from the University of Cincinnati with high honors. Everyone knew he would go far but they assumed it would be in architecture, the field in which he had earned his degree. He was born in 1838, the son of a well-to-do Toledo brewer who put him through college and set him up in an office in Cincinnati. In 1865 both Leslie's mother and father died, and he closed his office in Cincinnati, perhaps because of the resentment there by people who considered him a war slacker, and went to New York.

With his experience and background, Leslie could have walked into almost any architect's office and secured a good position. Instead, in almost no time at all, he was knee-deep in crime. Demonstrating a remarkable knack for pulling bank capers, he soon gathered around him such desperate and cunning criminals as Gilbert Yost, Jimmy Brady, Abe Coakley, Red Leary, Shang Draper, Johnny Dobbs, Worcester Sam Perris, Banjo Pete Emerson and Jimmy Hope. He pulled off bank jobs of an unprecedented magnitude, among them the theft of $786,879 from the Ocean National Bank at Greenwich and Fulton streets and $2,747,000 from the Manhattan Savings Institution at Bleeker Street and Broadway. The take in the Ocean Bank robbery would have been even higher had not his men left almost $2 million in cash and securities on the floor beside the vault. The gang also wandered afield to pull off such lucrative capers as the burglaries of the South Kensington National Bank in Philadelphia, the Third National Bank of Baltimore, the Wellsbro Bank of Philadelphia and the Saratoga County Bank of Waterford, N.Y.

Despite all his jobs, Leslie never spent a day behind bars. When in trouble, he was represented by Howe and Hummel, the notorious criminal lawyers, to whom he once paid $90,000 to square a charge. His fame spread, both in police circles and in the underworld, and he sat in the place of honor at the dinner parties given by Marm Mandelbaum, America's most notorious fence, through whom Leslie laundered great sums of cash and securities. At the same time, Leslie led a double life, posing as a man of inherited means who, with his family background and education, was readily accepted in New York society. He held memberships in prestigious clubs and was known as a bon vivant and man about town. He could be seen at openings of art exhibits and theater first nights and gained quite a reputation as a bibliophile, possessing an excellent collection of first editions and being frequently consulted by other collectors.

Leslie seldom associated with fellow criminals except when planning jobs or visiting the Mandelbaum mansion, but he did have a way with their women. With his wife ensconced in Philadelphia, he carried on numerous affairs in New York with women belonging, in one way or another, to other criminals, most notably Babe Irving, the sister of Johnny Irving, and Shang Draper's wife, and lavished much time and money on them.

It was probably his amatory activities that proved to be the death of him, although some of Leslie's capers started going awry about a year before he was killed. He was known to have become quite rattled after J. W. Barron, cashier of the Dexter Savings Bank of Dexter, Maine, was killed in one of his ill-fated schemes. When several criminals were arrested for the Manhattan Bank job and police gained knowledge about the Dexter matter, many felt Leslie had arranged the leaks to protect himself.

Early in May 1884 Leslie returned to Philadelphia and told his wife he planned to get out of crime and that they would move elsewhere to start a new life. He admitted he was worried about being assassinated. Against his wife's protests, however, he returned to New York City. She would never again see him alive.

During the last week of his life, Leslie was seen on a number of occasions in different locations. He seemed to make a point of never sleeping two nights at the same place.

On May 29 Leslie stopped in Murphy's Saloon on Grand Street and was given a letter addressed in a woman's handwriting. He read it and said something about doing an errand "over the water," meaning Brooklyn. On June 4 his decomposing body was found at the base of Tramps' Rock, near the dividing line between Westchester and New York counties. He had been shot in the head.

The murder was never officially solved, although the accepted theory is that he was killed by Shang Draper, Johnny Dobbs, Worcester Sam Perris and Billy Porter, all residents of the Williamsburg section. Furthermore, it seems probable that Draper's woman was forced to write the letter that lured Leslie to his death. Clearly Leslie had gone off in expectations of a pleasant tryst. There were no bloodstains on his clothing when his body was found, and he had apparently been dressed after his death. The King of the Bank Robbers, the man who had stolen millions, was buried in a $10 plot in Cypress Hill Cemetery, a fate little better than that of the city's paupers.

It was the "singing" of Dennis Levine that broke open the 1986 Ivan Boesky scandal that exposed the boundless avarice existing on Wall Street. The Securities and Exchange Commission discovered that Boesky, a millionaire hard-ball stock trader and arbitrager, had agreed to pay Levine a total of $2.4 million for his illegal tips. But Levine was also an illegal stock trader in his own right.

Over a period of five years Levine illegally traded in at least 54 stocks and stashed away $12.6 million in profits. At the time he was unmasked, Levine was a hotshot managing director of the investment banking firm of Drexel Burnham Lambert. He conducted his personal trading through a secret bank account in the Bahamas.

Using his Wall Street position, Levine profited from information about various companies' dealings before that information reached the public. The extent of Levine's ease in making illegal profits was typified by his 1985 activities in Nabisco stock. With inside information he had obtained, Levine made two phone calls on the stock and walked away with almost $3 million in illicit profits. Later Levine would tell the CBS news show 60 Minutes: "It was this incredible feeling of invulnerability. . . . That was the insanity of it all. It wasn't that hard. . . . You get bolder and bolder and bolder, and it gets easier, and you make more money and more money, and it feeds upon itself. And looking back, looking back

I realize that I was sick, that it became an addiction, that I lived for the high of making those trades, of doing the next deal, making the bigger deal."

After he was caught, Levine pleaded guilty to securities fraud, perjury and tax evasion, and cut a deal for himself by exposing Boesky and his own circle of wheeler-dealers. Levine gave up $11.6 million in illegal profits and served 15 months in the federal penitentiary in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania. He was released in 1988 and thereafter claimed to have turned his life around, lecturing college students around the country about what he'd learned from his past mistakes and operating his own financial consulting firm.

Some questioned how much Levine had changed. Since that time Levine was involved in a number of dubious "up-front" deals, bringing together struggling businesspeople needing financing and supposed financial institutions willing to make money available in exchange for an up-front commission. For his part Levine also received thousands of dollars in fees. The only trouble was no monies were ever advanced and some Levine clients said they were out almost $200,000. One Levine client said he had been told by Levine that a person named Jim Massaro could help out on the deal. The client said Levine described Massaro as a friend he'd done business with during his days at Drexel. Levine actually met him at Lewisburg where they had been jailmates.

Levine insisted he had exercised the required "due diligence" in all cases and that it was not accurate for him to be described as the consummate con man. He insisted, "I have never conned anybody in my life. . . . People are entitled to their own opinions, but it's not true. I have to live with myself. I don't think I've done anything wrong."

Levine, Peter (1926–1938) kidnap-murder victim

The second oldest unsolved kidnapping—after the Charles Mattson abduction—carried in the FBI's files, the Peter Levine case began in New Rochelle, N.Y. about 3:30 P.M. on February 24, 1938, when the 12-year-old boy left school and started home. At 5 o'clock his mother received a telephone call informing her that her son had been kidnapped and that she should go to a vacant house in town for further instructions. Under the front door of the house, the distraught mother found a note that said her son was safe and demanded a ransom of $60,000.

Four days later, the Levines received a letter telling them the money was wanted quickly. A penciled note on the back of the letter in Peter's identifiable scrawl read: "Dear Dad, Please pay, I want to come home. I have a cold. Your son, Peter." After two more days a third note, reducing the demand to $30,000, directed that someone other than the parents should bring the ransom money to a certain spot in nearby Mamaroneck. Two intermediaries made four trips with the money along the route indicated but they were never met by the kidnapper.

The boy's father made several appeals over the radio and in the newspapers to the kidnapper for additional communications, but there was no further word. After three months the headless body of a boy floated ashore in New Rochelle from Long Island Sound. It was identified as that of Peter Levine.

A team of 30 FBI agents closely investigated dozens of suspects. Nine persons were convicted of attempted extortion, posing as the kidnappers and promising to return the boy if money was paid. But the real perpetrator was never caught. The closest identification the authorities ever made was the kidnapper was likely to be a man with an Italian or German accent.

Lexow Committee New York police corruption investigation

In the first major investigation of a police department in the United States, the Lexow Committee of 1894 uncovered mass corruption in New York City. Later inquiries in that city as well as in other major cities proved this to be the norm rather than the exception.

Corruption in the New York Police Department was revealed to be handled by a highly organized machine called the system. The study showed the system flourished under both parties but had become most blatant under the Tammany Hall reign of Richard Croker. Anyone opposing the system—businessman, private citizen or honest policeman—was “abused, clubbed and imprisoned, and even convicted of crime on false testimony by policemen and their accomplices.” Great steamship companies and even lowly pushcart peddlers were required to pay graft.

Naturally, the underworld was a prime source of funds; the committee set the figure at $7 million annually. By allowing streetwalkers and thieves to operate on their beat, crooked patrolmen and detectives earned more in graft than in salary, and the revenue dishonest officials received from gamblers, illegal liquor dealers and brothel keepers produced a corps of millionaires. Fixed set monthly levies ran as follows: saloons, $2 to $20; poolrooms (actually horsebetting parlors), $200; policy shops, $20 on each of the 1,000 in operation; brothels, a minimum of $5 per prostitute; new brothels, $500 to open. The graft was broken down so that the patrolman or detective-collector got 20 percent; the precinct commander pocketed 35 to 50 percent and the inspector took the balance. Appointments to the police force did not come cheaply, especially considering the value of the 19th century dollar. Becoming a patrolman cost $300 and an equal sum was necessary to be promoted to roundsman; making sergeant cost $1,600; and reaching the heights of captaincy required as much as $15,000.

While the head of the Lexow Committee was State Sen. Clarence Lexow, a Republican, the general success of the group was attributed to the work of its counsel, John W. Goff, a Democrat. The following November the Republicans, out of office for many years, were swept into full power in both the city and state because of public revulsion over the disclosures. Inspector Alexander “Clubber” Williams, often called the most dishonest cop in America (he insisted he became wealthy by speculating in real estate in Japan), was eventually forced out. Many reforms were instituted, but it soon became obvious that although camouflaged, the system continued, subsequently as revealed by the Charles Becker-Herman Rosenthal murder case of 1912, the Seabury Investigation of the 1930s and the Knapp Commission of the early 1970s.

The lie detector dates back to 1921, although man's effort to expose liars is centuries old. Some ancient peoples used tests based on principles that are considered at least somewhat sound even today, and that, indeed, provide the basis for the modern lie detector. In parts of the Orient a suspect was given a handful of rice to chew. If he could spit it out, he was innocent. If it remained dry and he could not spit it out, he was guilty. The reasoning was that fear caused by guilt would dry up his flow of saliva.

The technique Solomon used when two women claimed the same child would be hard to beat. He reasoned that the real mother would rather deny her claim than have her child killed. But most other tests of long ago were brutal and senseless. Tibet had a quaint custom of detecting liars in cases where two individuals made conflicting claims. Two stones, one white and one black, were put in a pot of boiling water. The two disputants plunged their arms in, and the individual who got the white stone was declared the honest one. If nothing else, the system probably cut down the number of lawsuits. Medieval methods were as brutal and relied even more on chance. In the trial by water, the suspect, tied with rope, was thrown in a vat of holy water. If he sank, he was innocent. If he floated, it was reasoned that the holy water had refused to receive him, and he was declared guilty. Trial by fire took a little longer. The suspect, after appropriate church rituals, either drew a stone from a pot of boiling water or carried a hot stone for a prescribed number of feet. After the ordeal his hand was bandaged by a priest, and if after ten days the wound was healing cleanly, he was declared innocent. If the wound festered, he was guilty. One wonders how many germs convicted innocent men in those unhygienic days.

By these standards, the present-day lie detector is a scientific marvel. Much scientific research on the detection of lying was carried out both in Europe and the United States by scientists and criminologists, such as the Italians Cesare Lombroso and Vittorio Benussi and Americans William Moulton Marston and Fr. Walter G. Summers of Fordham University. The first practical lie detector fashioned for police work was ordered by August Vollmer, the legendary police chief of Berkeley, Calif. In 1921 he assigned a colleague, John A. Larson, followed later by Leonarde Keeler, to develop what has become known as the polygraph, a machine that measures various bodily reactions to questions requiring a yes or no answer. Among the measurements graphed were variations in blood pressure, breathing, pulse and electrodermal response, a minute electrical discharge from the skin. Simply stated, changes in the norm of these indicators show a subject is lying, according to the test.

Lie detector experts like to cite the many instances when a lie detector test ferreted out a guilty man and produced a confession. They are somewhat more reticent about discussing well-known failures. A case in point was Paul Joseph Altheide, age 26, who was charged with murdering a tailor in Phoenix, Ariz. in the 1950s. Altheide claimed to have been 500 miles away in Texas at the time. A lie detector test indicated he was lying when denying his guilt. This more than satisfied the law but did not satisfy a reporter, Gene McLain of the Arizona Republic, who went to Texas and eventually turned up witnesses who proved Altheide's innocence. He was released after spending 137 days in jail for a crime he had not committed. His incriminating polygraph test had clearly dissuaded the law from making further efforts to clear him. In a number of other cases, suspects have been cleared by lie detector tests only to be proved guilty later by other evidence.

Lie detector proponents like to proclaim their tests are 97 percent accurate with a three percent "gray area," in which the operator cannot form a definite conclusion. However, at least two independent studies, one by the Stanford Research Institute and the other by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, put the accuracy figure at 70 percent.

The lie detector does not blow a gasket or flash "tilt" when a suspect is caught in an untruth. It isn't that simple. Leaders in the field, like John Reid, operator of the nation's largest commercial polygraph agency, had long regarded the machine itself as only one component of three needed to get at the truth: the polygraph, an operator who can interpret it correctly and a foolproof questioning technique. The importance of this last point has been shown often in cases where a rapist was asked if he had raped the victim and was able to deny it successfully, having rationalized in his own mind that all he had used was "excessive persuasion." Polygraph experts say the question in such cases should be worded to ask if the suspect has had "sexual intercourse" with the victim, since the machine merely records whether the suspect thinks he's lying. However, even this formulation of the question may not be sufficient. Some men do not consider themselves to have had sexual relations if they have failed to achieve an orgasm.

Similarly, a farmer once "beat" the machine by denying that he had stolen some barbed wire. What had happened was that the roll of barbed wire had been lying around unused for months, and when the farmer appropriated it, he was, in his own mind, merely putting it to good use instead of letting it rust.

Many guilty parties have been able to beat the machine through a concerted effort. The late polygraph expert Leonarde Keeler admitted he could beat his own machine. Lesser intellects than Keeler have also been successful. Gerald Thompson, who confessed to and was later executed for the murder of Mildred Hallmark, passed a lie detector test with flying colors. When his questioner specifically asked him, “Did you kill Mildred?” he just concentrated on another Mildred and denied it.

Another murderer, Chester Weger, who killed three wealthy matrons in Starved Rock State Park, Ill. in 1960, later claimed he had twice passed polygraph tests by first swallowing a lot of aspirin and washing them down with Coca-Cola. The late director of the FBI, J. Edgar Hoover, frequently denounced the lie detector (although the agency now relies on it to an increasing extent), once commenting: “The name lie detector is a complete misnomer. The machine used is not a lie detector. The person who operates the machine is the lie detector by reason of his interpretation. Whenever the human element enters into an interpretation of anything, there is always a possibility of error.”

No more than a handful of states have laws requiring the licensing of polygraph operators. In most states a person can become an “expert” by buying a machine and a handbook telling him how to use it. There are no accurate estimates of how many persons in the country regularly give lie detector examinations, but the figures are well into the hundreds, perhaps thousands. It has been estimated that at least 80 percent of these are “unqualified.” An acknowledged leader in the field grudgingly concedes that competent operators probably comprise anywhere from 10 to 40 percent of the total. Most unqualified operators, who don’t know how to interpret a chart and really don’t care, are what is known in the trade as “sandbaggers,” relying on coercion and bluster to get a confession. “I know you done it,” they say. “The machine says so, so come clean, you sonovabitch!”

One prominent lie detector operator tells of another “expert” who worked for several Midwestern police departments. He was called in to doublecheck the other man’s findings and came to the exact opposite conclusions in 12 cases. This writer once interviewed a so-called expert who was often consulted by police departments in the East. He sported a business card that showed he was a man of many talents. The card read: “Hypnotist—Relieve Insomnia—Stop Smoking—Stop Drinking—Many Other Benefits.” And in addition to his lie detector work, he was also licensed as a private eye.

Generally, lie detector findings have not been admitted, save in rare instances, as evidence in trials. Objecting to this practice, lie detector proponents cite the 1920 landmark murder case of a Washington, D.C. physician that resulted in the conviction of a young black, James Alphonse Frye, despite attempts by the defense to present testimony by Dr. William Marston about findings of a polygraph test given to Frye. Marston’s findings indicated Frye was innocent, but the test results were barred as evidence and he was convicted. Later on, another man was found to be the real murderer and Frye was freed. The ruling barring lie detector evidence in the Frye case stood, however, and since then courts have repeatedly refused to admit polygraph findings. An exception was a 1972 case in California in which a judge permitted lie test evidence that a man accused of possession of marijuana had refused police permission to search his suitcase. The judge declared that lie detector equipment and techniques had improved so much that rules against the use of evidence obtained by polygraph should be changed. The ruling, however, proved to be an isolated one and gained little acceptance.

Michael Martin was only 17 in his native Ireland when he ran away from home and turned to a life of crime, becoming the infamous Captain Lightfoot. After fleeing he made an attempt at reform but soon resumed his criminal career, becoming the most-hunted outlaw of the post-Revolutionary period.

Following a 16-year career in Ireland and Scotland as Captain Lightfoot, Martin found the countryside teeming with troops determined to put an end to highway robbery. On April 12, 1818 he made it aboard the brig Maria shortly before he would have been cornered by pursuers. On June 17 Lightfoot landed in Salem, Mass., where he decided to live out his days in honest toil. However, efforts to make a go of it working a farm and, later, operating a small brewery failed, thanks to what he later told a biographer was the sharpness of Yankee tradespeople.

Following an unhappy love affair, Lightfoot returned to his former occupation as a highwayman. Over the next three years he became the scourge of all New England, committing one holdup after another. No traveler was safe anywhere in New England and even far into Canada. Indians too fell victim to Lightfoot’s call to “stand and deliver.” On the road to Boston, he committed his most famous crime. When a young woman passenger on a coach tried to hide her watch, Lightfoot doffed his hat and said, “Ma’am I do not rob ladies,” making him a Robin Hood figure in the storytelling at country taverns. In time, it finally dawned on authorities that the scoundrel was Europe’s notorious Captain Lightfoot, and efforts to catch him intensified. The highwayman was finally captured in a stable near Springfield by a slow-closing ring of posses. In October 1821 Lightfoot was sentenced to death, but the next day he escaped by sawing through his chains with a file supplied by a friend. However, he was quickly recaptured, and this time the chains were forged to his ankles and wrists and attached to his cell floor.

Lightfoot was now a national legend. In interviews his jailers praised his quiet bravery, and the balladmakers were composing tributes to the “brave Captain Lightfoot” even before he was dead. A writer, Frederick W. Waldo, was permitted to stay with him long enough to gather material for a full-length biography, Captain Lightfoot, the Last of the New England Highwaymen. He was described as “calm and serene” at his execution on December 22, 1822; when the hangman fumbled with the noose, he gallantly assisted by putting the rope around his own neck. He also relieved the sheriff of the task of dropping the handkerchief as a signal to the hangman. Captain Lightfoot held the handkerchief aloft in his hand and, as the crowd hushed, let it flutter free. Before it came to earth, Lightfoot had swung to his death.

One of the most hellish tortures ever used in American prisons was the so-called lime cell, which remained quite popular in a number of institutions well into the 20th century. A prisoner would be led to a cell where the white coating of lime was some three inches thick. A guard would sprinkle the cell with a hose, resulting in a white mist from the exploding chloride of lime filling the cell, and then the prisoner would be shoved inside.

The convict would clutch his burning throat with both hands, reeling and toppling to the floor. He would claw at the walls, trying to struggle back to his feet. One convict who underwent this ordeal graphically described it as feeling as if he were in the middle of a volcano. Cramping pains tore at his bowels and his breath seemed to sizzle. When he was pulled from the cell, he had to be hosed down to stifle the burning fumes. The misery never lasted more than five or six minutes, but sometimes a severely punished convict would be given the lime cell treatment for as many as 10 days in a row. At the end of this ordeal, the mucous membranes of his mouth, nose and throat would be seared, his voice reduced to a whisper and his eyebrows and eyelashes completely burned off.

Despite official denials, the lime cell remained a favored form of punishment in a great number of prisons until recent years, when nationwide prison reform supposedly ended the inhuman practice. Yet reports indicate it is still practiced in isolated instances.

Lincoln, Abraham (1809–1865) assassination victim

By present-day standards, the protection of Abraham Lincoln at the time of his assassination in 1865 bordered on the criminally negligent. On the night of April 14 President and Mrs. Abraham Lincoln attended the performance of Our American Cousin at Ford's Theatre in Washington, D.C. Attending with them as substitutes for Gen. and Mrs. Ulysses S. Grant, who had canceled (because Mrs. Grant could not abide Mrs. Lincoln), were the daughter of Sen. Ira Harris and his stepson, Maj. Henry Rathbone. Earlier that day the president had asked the War Department to provide a special guard. Oddly, the request was refused, a matter of considerable puzzlement to historians. The only presidential bodyguard that night was a shiftless member of the Washington police force, who after the start of the performance, incredibly left his post outside the flag-draped presidential box to adjourn to nearby Tal-tavul's tavern for a drink.

While there, he may well have rubbed elbows with another imbibor, John Wilkes Booth, who had been drinking heavily for several hours, determined that tonight he would kill Lincoln. At 26 Booth, a noted Shakespearean actor, had long made no secret of his Southern sympathies. The War Department undoubtedly knew of his drunken boasting about a plot to kidnap Lincoln and drag him in chains to Richmond, where he would be held until the Union armies laid down their arms. As a matter of fact, Booth and a small group of conspirators had waited in ambush about three weeks earlier to attack the Lincoln carriage outside the city limits but were thwarted by the president's change of plans.

After that failure Booth shifted to the assassination attempt. The plan called for him to kill Lincoln while other members of the group simultaneously attacked Vice President Andrew Johnson and various Cabinet members.

At 10 o'clock Booth left the bar and went to the theater, pausing long enough to bum a chew of tobacco from a ticket taker he knew. In the foyer of the theater Booth caught the eye of actress Jennie Gourlay, who later recalled he had appeared pale and ill and distraught with “a wild look in his eyes.”

Booth entered Lincoln's unguarded box, leveled his one-shot Derringer behind the president's left ear and pulled the trigger. As Lincoln slumped, Booth cried out, “Sic semper tyrannis” (“Ever thus to tyrants”), dropped his gun and pulled a dagger. He slashed Maj. Rathbone as the officer lunged for him. Booth hurdled the rail of the box in what he undoubtedly visualized as a dramatic appearance on the stage, shouting, “The South is avenged.” However, his spur caught in the flag outside the box and he almost fell on his face. Somehow he kept his footing and limped on a fractured left leg across the stage and out into the street. There he mounted his horse and rode off.

Were it not for his leg injury, Booth might have made good his escape, crossing the Potomac and losing himself among the soldiers being demobilized following Lee's surrender. But the pain slowed his flight. He met up in Maryland with David Herold, another of the conspirators, who had failed in a simultaneous attempt on the life of Secretary of State William Seward, and the pair located Dr. Samuel Mudd. After Mudd set Booth's leg the two left the doctor's home and made it to the Potomac River awaiting an opportunity to cross into Virginia.

Meanwhile, the hunt for the assassin was pressed, some observers said later with considerable incompetence. Certainly, greed for the reward money being offered and hysteria hindered the search, and it was not until April 26 that the fugitives were cornered in a tobacco shed on a farm near Port Royal, Va.

The commander of the Union troops, a Lt. Baker, ordered the pair to surrender or the building would be set on fire. Booth called out, "Let us have a little time to consider it."

Five minutes later Booth declared: "Captain, I know you to be a brave man, and I believe you to be honorable; I am a cripple. I have got but one leg; if you withdraw your men in one line one hundred yards from the door, I will come out and fight you."

Baker rejected the offer and Booth then shouted, "Well, my brave boys, prepare a stretcher for me."

Then the soldiers heard loud voices from the shed and Booth's voice could be heard saying: "You damned coward, will you leave me now? Go, go; I would not have you stay with me." Then Booth yelled, "There's a man in here who wants to come out."

A trembling Herold surrendered himself.

The structure was set afire, and the troopers could see a dark figure hobbling about. Suddenly, there was a shot—possibly by Booth himself and possibly by a Union zealot, a soldier named Boston Corbett—and Booth fell. Soldiers rushed into the barn and pulled Booth outside.

“Tell mother I die for my country,” Booth whispered before breathing his last.

Even before Booth’s death, the government had implicated eight other persons in the assassination—Herold, George A. Atzerodt, Lewis Paine, Mary E. Surratt, her son John H. Surratt, Edward Spangler, Dr. Mudd and Michael O’Laughlin. All except John H. Surratt, who eluded capture, were tried before a military commission, on the ground that Lincoln was the commander in chief and had fallen “in actual service in time of war.” The trial, which ran from May 9 to June 30, was a bizarre spectacle conducted under decidedly unfair conditions and amidst postwar hysteria. Somehow the defendants were linked to the deeds of the Confederate government and Jefferson Davis. Many of the charges dealt with such irrelevancies as starvation of Union prisoners in notorious Andersonville Prison and the plot to burn New York City.

At the same time, important witnesses were never called to testify. John F. Parker, who negligently left Lincoln unguarded, was not summoned (nor was he dismissed from the police force or even reprimanded). Even men who had harbored Booth for a week after the assassination were not forced to appear. Most observers felt that the case against Mrs. Mary Surratt was singularly weak, depending largely on the word of a known liar and an infamous drunkard. Her sole offense seems to have been owning the rooming house where much of the plotting had taken place.

Nonetheless, Mrs. Surratt was sentenced to hang along with Paine, Herold and Atzerodt. Mudd, Arnold and O’Laughlin received life sentences and Spangler got six years. The executions were carried out on July 7, 1865, ironically with umbrellas held over the prisoners’ heads on the gallows to protect them from the sweltering sun. To the very end, it was thought that Mrs. Surratt would be pardoned. Paine told the executioner: “If I had two lives to give, I’d give one gladly to save Mrs. Surratt. I know that she is innocent, and would never die in this way if I hadn’t been found at her house. She knew nothing about the conspiracy at all. . . .” However, there was no last-minute reprieve and the four were executed at the same moment.

The hunt for John Surratt became a world chase and he was finally located in Italy serving in the Swiss Guards. Brought back to trial in 1867, when the hysteria had died down, Surratt went free when the jury could not agree on his guilt.

The weakness of the case against the imprisoned men also became apparent in time, and by March 4, 1869

President Andrew Johnson had pardoned all of them except O’Laughlin, who had died in prison in 1867.

Lincoln, Abraham defense attorney

Attorney Abraham Lincoln of Illinois “rode the circuit” around Springfield in the practice of his profession. While most of his cases were civil, involving land disputes, livestock claims and financial matters, he also defended a number of clients on criminal charges. Most of these cases involved prosaic allegations, such as theft, drunkenness and the like, but he conducted a murder defense that brought him statewide fame.

William “Duff” Armstrong was accused along with James Norris of killing James “Pres” Metzker in a drunken brawl near Havana, on August 29, 1857. It was established beyond doubt that Norris had hit Metzker with an ox-yoke. Tried separately, he was convicted and given eight years in the penitentiary. However, young Armstrong denied he had struck the victim another deadly blow with a slung shot, insisting he had done all his fighting with his fists.

Lincoln took the case without fee because, as he would tell the jury, the defendant was the son of Jack and Hannah Armstrong, who had provided the now-famous lawyer with a home when he was “penniless, homeless, and alone.” The inference Lincoln would make was that such a fine couple could not possibly have raised a killer.

The trial opened in Beardstown, Ill. on May 7, 1858. The prosecution’s case was based primarily on the testimony of a housepainter named Charles Allen, who said he had seen every detail of the murder, which had occurred at 9:30 in the brilliant light of a full moon. Lincoln took Allen over the details of the crime several times, drawing from the witness again and again a description of the brilliant moonlight that had enabled him to see the events so clearly. Then Lincoln produced a farmer’s almanac and turned to the page for August 29, the day of the murder. It showed that the moon had been just past its first quarter, providing little help for the witness. In addition to discrediting Allen’s testimony, Lincoln stressed that the mark on Metzker attributed to Armstrong’s lethal blow could have been caused by the victim falling to the ground after being struck by Norris.

As the jury filed from the courtroom, Lincoln is reported to have turned to Mrs. Armstrong and said, “Aunt Hannah, your son will be free before sundown.” The acquittal came quickly. When it did, Lincoln said thoughtfully, “I pray to God that this lesson may prove in the end a good lesson to him and to all.”

Lincoln, Abraham target of body snatchers

After Abraham Lincoln was buried in 1865, authorities found it necessary to move his casket 17 times, mainly to prevent it from being stolen and held for ransom. That feat was almost achieved in 1876 by Big Jim Kenealy and his gang of counterfeiters. They concocted a weird plot to steal the body, rebury it elsewhere and then return it in exchange for money and the release of the outfit’s master engraver, Ben Boyd, then doing 10 years in prison. Their plot was foiled when an informer working on counterfeiting matters infiltrated the gang and tipped off the Secret Service.

The would-be body snatchers were thwarted just as they were moving the casket, then kept in a mausoleum in a lonely section of forest two miles outside of Springfield, Ill. Nevertheless, the gang succeeded in eluding the Secret Service agents who swooped down on them. After 10 days all were rounded up, but Kenealy suddenly had a surprise for the authorities. He had previously determined that there was no law on the books making it illegal to steal a dead body, not even that of a martyred president. However, all the gang members were convicted and given the maximum sentence, one year in prison, for attempting to steal a coffin.

For the next two years the casket remained hidden under a pile of scrap lumber until it was moved again. Finally in 1901, it was locked in a steel cage and buried 10 feet below the floor of a national shrine in Springfield.

Lincoln, Warren (1870–1941) murderer

When Chicago defense lawyer Warren Lincoln retired to the pleasant surroundings of Aurora, Ill. just after reaching 50, he was anticipating a happy existence. But the faults of his wife, Lena, which Lincoln had ignored as long as he had the hustle and bustle of criminal court life to distract him, now became his obsession in the solitude of Aurora. She opposed, not necessarily in order, liquor, tobacco and sex. In short, she was a bore. Adding to his misery was Byron Shoup, his brother-in-law, who moved in as something of a permanent guest. Since Lincoln was used to the workings of a criminal mind, it was perhaps inevitable that he should come to think of murdering the two of them. No doubt, he felt he could get away with it. In Chicago he had once won acquittals for five very guilty murderers in a row. One day both Lena and Shoup were missing. Lincoln sadly told friends that his wife had left a letter saying she was running off with another man. That being the case, Lincoln said, he had ordered Shoup out of the house. Lincoln then went back to tending his garden. He used lots of fertilizer much of which he mixed himself. His special mixture contained a great deal of ashes, including those of Lena and Shoup.

In time, suspicions were voiced and Lincoln was caught in a number of lies concerning his missing wife and brother-in-law. Police dug up his garden searching for their bodies but found nothing.

The only parts of Lincoln’s victims that he hadn’t burned were their heads, which he’d planted in flower boxes on his porch and later covered with cement. But Lincoln wasn’t worried about any trace of the heads, since he had covered them with quicklime. Eventually, the police dug up the flower boxes and found two perfectly preserved heads. Unfortunately for Lincoln, he once had employed a rather dimwitted greenhouse helper who had mistakenly transposed a barrel of quicklime with a barrel of slaked lime. Instead of covering the heads with quicklime, which would have disintegrated them quickly, Lincoln had covered them with slaked lime, which acted as a preservative. He was sentenced to life in Joliet Prison and died there in 1941.

Lincoln County War

While the Lincoln County War is most remembered because of the prominence it provided to Billy the Kid, the conflict itself had much greater significance. Indeed, it was a full-scale war conducted by rival banking, mercantile and ranching interests with insignificant cowboys comprising most of the casualties. There were passions and personal hatreds involved that gave it aspects of a blood feud: such was the case for Billy the Kid as the result of the cold-blooded murder of his adopted father, a newcomer from England who had joined one side in a quest for the wealth of the county and indeed much of the New Mexico Territory.

Lincoln County was a remote and extremely lawless section of the territory when one of the West's greatest cattlemen, John Chisum, pushed his herds into the area in the early 1870s and preempted huge sections of government land. At the time, the area was economically dominated by a hard-nosed businessman named Lawrence G. Murphy, who ran a huge mercantile store in Lincoln called The House. Because of the economic importance of his store, Murphy virtually named public officials and lawmen. He later sold his business to two tough Irishmen James J. Dolan and James H. Riley, who forcefully increased The House's predominance in the county.

The key to power in the county lay in control of government contracts for supplying beef to army posts and Indian reservations. Through The House's close ties with influential territorial officials in the capital—the notorious Santa Fe Ring—the profits on such contracts were kept at enormous levels. The Santa Fe Ring was comprised of corrupt Republican officeholders, while the owners of The House, Dolan and Riley, headed a county Democratic machine. Their alliance was probably the first proof that Republicans and Democrats could work together if there were profits to be gained.

John Chisum resented this control of the cattle marketing business by mere merchants and formed an opposing alliance with lawyer Alexander McSween, a former Murphy adherent, and John Tunstall, a young, ambitious Englishman who had established a large ranch. It was Tunstall who recruited Billy the Kid as a cowboy and gunman. In the ensuing conflict a number of small ranchers were caught in the middle. Many resented Chisum for seizing public lands and thus lined up with The House, but others who detested the businessmen, to whom they sold their cattle at low prices and under harsh credit terms, sided with Chisum and the insurgents.

The owners of The House held most of the trump cards, including Sheriff William Brady, a puppet who willingly harrassed their opponents, charging the cattle barons with innumerable offenses. Tunstall countered by opening a rival store in Lincoln that offered better terms to farmers and small ranchers, so that more of them rallied to the Chisum-McSween-Tunstall banner. In early 1878 Sheriff Brady was ordered to execute an arrest warrant against Tunstall. He handed the job over to a posse of hastily deputized gunmen, remaining conveniently in the background. The posse rode out to the Tunstall spread and, catching the Englishman helpless on foot, shot him to death.

Much has been made of Tunstall's death turning Billy the Kid into a killer. Such a conclusion, of course, ignores the fact that Billy was already a murderer, but after the Tunstall slaying his homicidal activities had a "purpose." The Kid pledged to avenge Tunstall's death. The two members of the posse who had done the actual shooting, William Morton and Frank Baker, were caught by a rival posse of "regulators," which included Billy the Kid. The pair surrendered on the posse leader's promise that they would be returned to Lincoln alive. Along the way, Morton was allowed to mail a letter to a relative in Virginia. It said in part, "There was one man who wanted to kill me after I had surrendered and was restrained with the greatest difficulty by others." That man was Billy the Kid, and he wasn't about to keep his guns holstered through the long trip. On the third day the Kid shot down both Morton and Baker as well as a member of the posse who evidently had tried to protect the prisoners.

With Tunstall dead, Billy the Kid transferred his loyalties to McSween and became the gunfighting leader of the faction. In the spring, he led his forces in a memorable battle against Brady and his men at Tunstall's store and killed the sheriff. In July the two factions fought a four-day pitched battle, with the Kid and his forces barricaded in McSween's adobe house in the center of Lincoln. On the fifth day most of them escaped, but lawyer McSween was shot dead.

With the death of McSween, the owners of The House and the Santa Fe Ring won the Lincoln County War. Chisum remained a powerful cattle baron but never achieved the complete domination of the Pecos Valley he so desired. With the end of the war, Billy the Kid lost his "purpose" but went right on killing.

Lindbergh kidnapping

No kidnapping in American history achieved more notoriety or produced more public clamor than the abduction of the Lindbergh baby in 1932. By its very nature, the crime inspired an incredible array of swindles, hoaxes and controversies. At the time, the depths of the Depression, Charles A. Lindbergh—Lucky Lindy—was a hero in an era of few heroes. He had enjoyed that stature since his epic flight from New York to Paris in May 1927. “Lindbergh,” Frederick Lewis Allen was to write in his book Only Yesterday, “was a god”—and indeed he was. Consequently, the kidnapping of 20-month-old Charles A. Lindbergh, Jr., from the family’s home near Hopewell, N.J. was little short of sacrilege, a crime that outraged the public far more than even the Leopold-Loeb case of the previous decade.

The night of the crime, March 1, was particularly windy, and after Mrs. Lindbergh and the baby’s nurse, Betty Gow, put the child to bed, the nurse remained with him until he was asleep. A short while later, Lindbergh heard a noise, but not hearing it again, he and his wife dismissed the sound as the wind. At about 10 p.m. the nurse, making her customary check, found the baby’s bed empty. Searching around the house, Lindbergh discovered a homemade wooden ladder with a broken rung outside the nursery window, and he called the police.

Near the window sill he found a note written in broken English that indicated the writer might be German.

Have fifty thousand dollars ready, 25,000 in twenty-dollar bills, 15,000 in ten-dollar bills, and 10,000 in five-dollar bills. In 4-5 days we will inform you where to deliver the money. We warn you for making anyding public or for notify the police. The child is in gut care. Indication for all letters are signature and three holes.

But by that time the authorities had already been called in, and inevitably, the press and the nation soon learned of the crime. From then on, the case was nothing short of a three-ring circus. Everyone from the well-intended to a legion of crackpots and hoaxers got into the act. Police on various levels jockeyed for position in the investigative process. No one was clearly in charge, except possibly Lindbergh himself, who was impressed by certain investigators and unimpressed by others.

Initial theories about the crime revolved, quite naturally, around the possibility that the underworld was responsible for the kidnapping. Hearst columnist Arthur Brisbane championed the idea of releasing the notorious gangster Al Capone from prison to help find the child and return him to the Lindberghs. Since Brisbane had only a short time before he had to square a $250,000 tax claim, he quite possibly felt a sort of kinship with another man convicted on income tax charges. Within federal law enforcement circles, it was suggested that the aid of Lucky Luciano should be sought. Officially at least, nothing became of these proposals, although there is considerable reason to believe that the Capone mob had set about framing an ex-convict, Robert Conroy, who had labored on the fringe of the outfit. He was found shot dead in August and there was later speculation that the mob had intended to pin the kidnapping on Conroy with manufactured evidence.

About a month after the abduction, a retired school principal, Dr. John F. “Jafsie” Condon, published a letter in the Bronx Home News in New York City offering to act as go-between in the return of the missing baby. Probably much to his surprise and that of the editor, the offer was accepted. A letter from a man who became known as Cemetery John provided facts that only the kidnapper could have known. A meeting was held in a cemetery between Jafsie and John, who raised the ransom demand to $70,000. John promised to send the baby’s night clothes to prove he was the real kidnapper. Further negotiations dropped the ransom back down to $50,000.

At another meeting, with Lindbergh on hand, Jafsie handed over the money; all the bills had been marked, including $20,000 in gold certificates. The kidnapper said the baby could be found on a boat at Martha’s Vineyard, Mass. A frantic Lindbergh rushed there but found no boat and no child. He had been duped.

On May 12, 1932 the body of a baby, identified by Lindbergh as his child, was found in a shallow grave just a few miles from the Lindbergh home. The ransom money eventually trapped the kidnapper, Bruno Richard Hauptmann, in September 1934, when an alert filling station attendant recognized a gold certificate given him by a customer as one of the marked bills and noted down the man’s car license number. Hauptmann was traced through the license and over $11,000 of the ransom money was found in his garage. A U.S. Forestry Service “wood detective,” Arthur Koehler, eventually identified the lumber yard that had cut the wood used to make the kidnap ladder and matched a rung of the ladder to a board in Hauptmann’s attic.

Hauptmann’s trial was held in January 1935 in Flemington, N.J., amidst a carnival atmosphere. Crowds stayed up all night to get seats in the courtroom, vendors sold Lindbergh baby dolls. During the trial Jafsie Condon identified Hauptmann as Cemetery John, and Lindbergh, who had been present at the second meeting with the kidnapper, identified the voice. A number of handwriting experts linked the kidnap notes to the defendant, and wood expert Koehler’s testimony proved unshakable.

Hauptmann was convicted despite his continued pleas of innocence. Yet there were many who felt Hauptmann had not been the only one involved in the plot. Among those dissatisfied with the verdict was New Jersey Gov. Harold Hoffman, whom others would accuse of using the case as a launching pad for a possible presidential bid. Gov. Hoffman clearly had need to move up higher in government so that he would have greater authority to conceal his current and past embezzlements of public funds. Gov. Hoffman stayed Hauptmann’s execution to hear what was considered evidence of a new solution, but nothing developed. He also fired H. Norman Schwarzkopf as superintendent of the New Jersey State Police, calling the Lindbergh case “the most bungled police job in history.” That assessment was not shared by many others, including Lindbergh, who remained a firm friend of the lawman.

For a time, until Hauptmann’s capture, Dr. Condon was suspected of being a confidence operator who had swindled Lindbergh out of the $50,000 ransom money. Gaston B. Means, a notorious political rogue who had for years operated in the shadowy fringes of law enforcement agencies in the federal government, swindled a scatterbrained socialite, Mrs. Evalyn Walsh McLean of Washington, D.C., out of $104,000 on the premise that he would use his underworld connections to retrieve the missing child. In another bizarre episode, one of the most-fabled detectives of the era, Ellis Parker, was convicted of kidnapping and torturing a disbarred lawyer, Paul H. Wendel, and of forcing him to confess that he and others and not Hauptmann were involved in the kidnapping. Both Means and Parker died in prison on charges arising out of the Lindbergh case.

Perhaps the most bizarre aspect of the case was the long hours before Hauptmann's execution on April 3, 1936. A leading news commentator of the day, Gabriel Heatter, offered a play-by-play, minute-by-minute radio commentary to a public eager to hear about the final act in the drama and to learn whether Hauptmann would talk and implicate others during his final minutes. Hauptmann did not, denying his own guilt to the end.

Over the years many efforts have been made to shed more light on the case, including numerous attempts to portray Hauptmann as a mere scapegoat. The most formidable effort was a 1976 book by Anthony Scaduto, Scapegoat, The Lonesome Death of Bruno Richard Hauptmann, in which the author presents many contradictions in the evidence. According to the Scaduto thesis, police faked evidence against Hauptmann, and prosecution witnesses, state attorneys and even Hauptmann's own defense lawyers took part in distorting or suppressing evidence. However, despite the unearthing of considerable discrepancies, Scaduto failed to present solid proof that Hauptmann was the victim of a miscarriage of justice. Similarly, recent efforts to prove a New England man to be the "real" Lindbergh child—not at all an uncommon occurrence in celebrated cases of this type—have foundered.

Lindbergh Law

The Federal Kidnapping Statute, enacted in June 1932 as a reaction to the kidnapping of the Lindbergh baby and popularly known as the Lindbergh Law, declares it a federal offense to take a kidnapped person across a state line for the purpose of ransom, reward "or otherwise." In the 1930s the last stipulation proved to be a powerful weapon against bank robbers and escaped convicts because they often took hostages with them. By treating the hostages well, however, the outlaws frequently defused much of the public's outrage, and the locally directed hunts for them were often ineffective.

Twenty-four hours after a kidnapping, a legal presumption is made that the victim has been transported out of the state, permitting the FBI to enter the case. However, if it becomes apparent that no state line has been crossed, the FBI will drop its active involvement. An amendment to the Lindbergh Law states that it is a federal offense to kidnap a foreign official or an official guest of the United States whether or not the victim has been taken across a state line.

Lingle, Alfred "Jake" (1892–1930) reporter and murder victim

When Alfred "Jake" Lingle, a police reporter for the Chicago Tribune, was murdered on June 9, 1930, it became one of the city's most sensational crimes, uniting the local newspapers in a joint denunciation of the murder of a courageous reporter who had waged a relentless battle against the underworld. But this unity soon fell apart as the newspapers turned on each other.

The cause of this dissension was the double life of Jake Lingle, whose peculiar style of living somehow had never provoked the suspicion of his employers. Despite the fact that his highest salary as a legman was only $65 a week, Lingle owned both a house in

LITTLE, Dick

Chicago and a summer bungalow in Indiana. He wintered with his family in Florida or Cuba and owned a Lincoln, for which he employed a chauffeur. He kept a room for himself in the Stevens Hotel on Michigan Avenue and was an inveterate gambler, sometimes betting as much as $1,000 on a single horse race.

Lingle's explanation for his lifestyle was that he had inherited $50,000 or $160,000 (his stories varied) and that before the market crashed he had sold a lot of stocks for triple the price he had paid for them in 1928.

Lingle's value as a Chicago Tribune reporter lay in his friendship with both the underworld and the law. He could get stories from the Bugs Moran North Siders, from the Capone people and from the police. He was especially close to Police Commissioner William P. Russell, their friendship dating back to Russell's days as a patrolman. He and Lingle went to sporting events and the theater together; they golfed together; they borrowed money from each other. Later on, people began to speak of Lingle as "Chicago's unofficial chief of police."

On June 9, 1930 Lingle left the Tribune city room after informing his editor he was going to try to contact Bugs Moran about a gang war story. A few minutes later, he was seen at "the corner," the intersection of Randolph and Clark streets, a meeting place for gamblers, mobsters and racetrack touts. Then he headed down Randolph to catch a train to the track. He stopped to buy a racing form and headed through the pedestrian street tunnel, carrying the paper under his arm and puffing on a cigar. Suddenly, a nattily dressed young man pushed through pedestrians and got behind Lingle. Coolly, he took a revolver from his pocket, leveled it at the reporter's head and pulled the trigger. Lingle pitched forward dead, still clutching the paper and the glowing cigar.

Immediately after the murder, Lingle became a national hero. Harry Chandler of the Los Angeles Times, president of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, eulogized him as a "first line soldier," and Chicago newspapers and other civic groups posted rewards totaling $55,725.

However, almost immediately upon the launching of an investigation, Lingle's image began to tarnish. Evidence showed that he was a fixer of enormous power who could barter gambling and liquor-selling rights because of his police connections. "I fix the price of beer in this town," he boasted. He not only knew the Moran forces well, he had secret partnerships with some of the local brothel keepers, shaking them down, nonetheless. At the time of his murder, Lingle was wearing an expensive diamond belt buckle presented to him by Al Capone. But the evidence showed he had double-crossed Capone on various deals and had shaken down a number of Capone's followers. He also had promised favors to several political leaders, presumably for hand-some payoffs, and then failed to deliver.

It developed that almost anybody who was anybody in the Chicago underworld hated Jake Lingle. When the facts about Lingle started to emerge, the Tribune's publisher Colonel Robert McCormick, was stunned, and then, reacting to taunts from other papers, he editorialized, "There are weak men on other newspapers." The Tribune ran a 10-part series by a St. Louis reporter, Harry T. Brundige, that named some of these errants of the competition. There was Julius Rosenheim, a legman for the Chicago Daily News who had been hit by gangsters a few months earlier. He had blackmailed bootleggers, brothel keepers and gamblers by threatening to expose them in his newspaper. And there were many others, some working closely with the North Side Gang, others running their own rackets in league with gangsters, still others who junketed to Miami and Havana with Capone and so on.

McCormick had his men dig desperately into probate court records to prove that Lingle had inherited much of the wealth he had spent so lavishly. But it turned out that what he had inherited from his father was not $50,000 or $160,000 but a mere $500.

Four months later the newspapers reported, almost with relief, that police had charged one Leo V. Brothers with the murder. A 21-year-old St. Louis labor terrorist and gangster, Brothers previously had been arrested on arson, bombing, robbery, and murder charges. He was convicted on the basis of eyewitness identifications by four persons and was sentenced to 14 years, which most newspapers denounced as a ridiculously light sentence, insisting that powerful forces had been operating in Brothers' behalf. Certainly, Brothers, although penniless, had mounted a high-pressure and high-priced defense with a staff of five legal experts. There were even hints that Brothers was not the guilty party but had been paid to take the fall thereby diffusing public concern over the case. When Brothers heard the sentence, he smirked, "I can do that standing on my head."

As it turned out, he only had to do eight years before his release, after which he faded into obscurity. Right up until his death in 1951 he refused to say who had paid for his legal defense and, indeed, who had hired him to kill Chicago's tainted knight of the press.

Little, Dick (1852-?) James gang outlaw

In the betrayal of Jesse James, Dick Little played almost as important a role as the Ford brothers did. Shortly before Jesse's assassination, Little sent his mistress to Gov. Thomas T. Crittenden to negotiate his surrender. There is no question that the discussion included a bargain to involve the Fords in betraying Jesse James.

Little, whose real name was reported as Liddil or Liddell, was born in Jackson County, Mo. in 1852. He joined the James gang late, after the disastrous Northfield, Minn. bank raid had decimated the band's original ranks. Following that debacle James was forced to work with "second-raters," such as the Fords and Little, men who felt no great devotion to him. When Wood Hite, another member of the gang, became suspicious of the loyalty of Bob Ford and Dick Little, Little murdered him, later explaining to James that there had been an argument about the division of the proceeds from a small robbery they had pulled together.

When Little surrendered to the law, the story made news throughout Missouri, but it was nothing compared to the headlines a few days later when Jesse James was shot. The James family never had any doubts about the role Little had played in Jesse's assassination. At the inquest into James' death, newspapers reported, the moment of highest drama came when Jesse's mother, Mrs. Zerelda Samuel, confronted Little.

"Oh you coward, you did all this," she was quoted as crying. "You brought it all about. Look upon me, you traitor. Look upon me, the broken-down mother, and this poor wife and these children. Ah, you traitor, better for you that you were in the cooler where my boy is than here, looking at me. Coward, that you are, God will swear vengeance upon you." While listening to this diatribe, Little covered his face with his hat.

After the James killing, Little was sent to an Alabama prison for eight months, as much for safe-keeping as anything else. In 1883 he was brought back to Missouri to testify in the trial of Frank James, who had since surrendered. By that time public sentiment was so much against Gov. Crittenden, the Fords and Little that the jury acquitted Frank James on all counts.

A short time later, Little and Bob Ford bought a saloon in Las Vegas, N.M. Business was bad, however, since as one historian observed, "Even the rough frontier town objected to a Judas drawing its beer or pouring its shots of whiskey." Bob Ford went on from there to meet his own assassination, but Dick Little's trail simply disappears.

Little, Joan (1954–) accused murderer

In a murder case that indicated the profound changes occurring in the administration of justice in the South,

Joan Little, a young black woman convict, was acquitted by a jury in North Carolina of charges that she had murdered her jailer, 62-year-old Clarence T. Allgood, on August 27, 1974.

During her trial, which attracted international attention, Little graphically described an oral sex act she said Allgood had forced her to perform while he held an ice pick to her face in her cell at the Beaufort County Jail. She stated that she had been able to seize the ice pick when the jailer's grip loosened on it and that she had stabbed him with it 11 times when he tried to get up from the bunk where he had been sitting, with Little on her knees before him. She then escaped from the jail, where she had been serving seven to ten years for breaking and entering, and surrendered eight days later to the state Bureau of Investigation with the stipulation that she not be returned to Beaufort County. The prosecution insisted she had lured the jailer into her cell and killed him in an escape plot, but the jury of six whites and six blacks returned a not-guilty verdict in just 78 minutes.

Sent back to serve her original sentence, Little escaped from a prison for women in Raleigh in 1978 and fled to New York. Before being apprehended and extradited to North Carolina she worked for the National Council of Black Lawyers. Civil rights advocates opposed her return to North Carolina, fearing that she would suffer mistreatment. In June 1979 Joan Little was paroled and returned to New York to work as a file clerk in a law firm.

Perhaps the most amazing gadget used by 19th century bank thieves was the little joker, invented by either of two of the most-esteemed criminals of the day, George Bliss or George Leonidas Leslie.

According to Bliss, he designed a steel wire contraption that could be fitted inside the combination knob of a bank safe. He related that after breaking into the bank,

All I had to do was to take off the dial knob of a lock, adjust the wire on the inside surface of the dial, and replace the knob; returning later to the bank. The lock in the meantime having been used by the bank people to open the vault or safe, I had only to remove the knob and examine the marks made by the wire, and I had the combination numbers. All that remained between me and the right combination was to figure out the order in which the numbers were used, and that was not difficult.

It took almost 10 years before the police and the safe manufacturers discovered the technique and new dial knobs were designed. For many years Bliss and Leslie engaged in a feud over who had invented the joker. The dispute remains unresolved, neither of them having patented the invention.

Little Pete (1864–1897) tong warrior

With the possible exception of Mock Duck, the resourceful tong warrior who dominated the West Coast, Fung Jing Toy, or Little Pete, as the English-language press dubbed him, may have been the greatest fighter in America's Tong wars. Coming to the United States at the age of five, he was raised in the tong way of life and death. From the balcony of his San Francisco home at Washington Street and Waverly Place, he watched the great fight between the Suey Sings and the Kwong Docks in 1875. He is said to have plotted then how the tide of battle could have gone differently; at the time he was 10.

By 1885 Fung Jing Toy was Little Pete, a man of considerable wealth accumulated by peddling opium, dealing in female slaves, running gambling enterprises and filling murder contracts. He soon became the owner of a shoe factory on Washington Street, which gave him honest cover in the eyes of the law. Meanwhile, he had become a legend in San Francisco's Chinatown. On contract, he once chopped down a high-ranking member of the Suey On Tong. Immediately, the Suey Ons sent three warriors after him to avenge the killing. They cornered him in an alley and one swung a hatchet down on his skullcap, but instead of Little Pete collapsing, there was just a metallic clang. His assailants then swung at his chest and again drew clangs rather than blood. The attackers' puzzlement didn't last long, for Little Pete drew his own hatchet and quickly dispatched two of them.

Some of the hatchet men taken into custody for the murder of Little Pete. Even Little Pete's coat of mail (center) failed to prevent his assassination.

The last one fled. Following the attempted assassination, word quickly spread that Little Pete was indestructible. In fact, he wore a coat of chain mail and inside his hat was a curved sheet of steel fitted around his head.

By the time he was 25, Little Pete controlled the Sum Yop Tong, bringing it immense wealth, much at the expense of the Sue Yop Tong, which had previously been the major power in Chinatown. This brought about one of San Francisco's bloodiest tong wars, in which Little Pete directed his forces with the genius of a Napoleon. He is believed to have been responsible for the death of at least 50 rival hatchet men.

Little Pete slept in a windowless room, and on each side of his bolted door was chained a vicious dog. In addition, a minimum of six heavily armed hatchet men were nearby at all times. When he went out, he wore his suit of chain mail and employed a bodyguard of three white men, one in front, one beside him and one bringing up the rear. The whites were symbols Little Pete found useful. It implied to his enemies that he had great influence with white law authorities, which indeed he had. His payoffs to the political leaders of San Francisco, especially to Christopher A. Buckley, the blind political boss of the city, were said to be enormous.

Little Pete's end came in a moment of carelessness. On the evening of January 23, 1897, he went to a barber shop. He had left his home hurriedly with only one bodyguard and then sent this man to buy him a newspaper. Two hired killers, Lem Jung and Chew Tin Gop, entered the shop as Little Pete was bending his head under a faucet so the barber could wet his hair properly for plaiting. Lem Jung shoved the barber aside, grabbed Little Pete by the hair and jammed the muzzle of his revolver down the back of the tong leader's neck, inside the coat of mail. He pulled the trigger five times, and Little Pete hit the floor dead, with five bullets in his spine. His murderers fled to Portland, Ore., where they were greeted as great warriors, and then went back to China to live out their lives in luxury on the blood money they had received.

Little Water Street New York vice district

Historians generally agree that the single most notorious street in early 19th century New York was Little Water Street, in the crime-infested Five Points section. Many an outsider who entered Little Water Street was never seen again, being killed and robbed and then buried in the walls of wretched tenements or in underground passages connecting them. A more dismal thoroughfare could hardly be imagined, the filth in the street generally reached shoe-top depth. On Little Water Street one found houses with such sinister names as Gates of Hell and Brick-Bat Mansion. In his description of the Five Points, Charles Dickens wrote of “hideous tenements which take their names from robbery and murder.”

A mid-19th-century book, Hot Corn, by an anonymous author takes the reader on a tour of Little Water Street, advising one to saturate your handkerchief with camphor, so that you can endure the horrid stench, and enter. Grope your way through the long, narrow passage—turn to the right, up the dark and dangerous stairs; be careful where you place your foot around the lower step, or in the corners of the broad stairs, for it is more than shoe-mouth deep of steaming filth. Be careful, too, or you may meet someone, perhaps a man, perhaps a woman, who in their drunken frenzy may thrust you, for the very hatred of your better clothes, or the fear that you have come to rescue them from their crazy loved dens of death, down, headlong down, those filthy stairs. Here, one would find as many as four or five couples living in a single, squalid room, wearing, eating, drinking nothing that most of them did not steal.

Live Oak Boys New Orleans gang

Probably the outstanding example of the mindlessly brutal criminal organizations that plagued America’s big cities during the mid-19th century was the Live Oak Boys of New Orleans. Lasting about a generation, most of them met a bitter fate.

Formed about 1858 by Red Bill Wilson, a vicious thug who always concealed a knife in his bushy red beard, the Live Oakers were not a gang in the usual sense of the word. There was no recognized leader, no regular organization and no division of loot. They often committed crimes on the spur of the moment, allying themselves with whatever other Live Oakers happened to be handy, and each kept what he stole. Sometimes they even stole from one another. In 1867 this unwholesome trait cost the gang two of its most-noted brutes.

Live Oaker Henry Thompson had been asleep at the shipyard the gang utilized as a rendezvous (the shipyard owner had long since desisted from trying to evict them because of their threat to burn the place down) when he awoke to find fellow Live Oaker Jimmy O’Brien, with whom he had tied on a drunk the night before, searching his pockets. Thompson started struggling, whereupon O’Brien jammed a knife into his heart and continued the search, being rewarded with a few coins. Unfortunately for the latter, a black and a small boy had witnessed the murder, and O’Brien was sent to the penitentiary, where he later died.

The Live Oakers devoted their nights to robbing and killing. They were feared throughout the city for their vicious forays, but most of their activities were confined to Gallatin Street and the surrounding area; in its dives they loafed, slept and planned their crimes. They were particularly the bane of dance house proprietors, raiding at least one such establishment almost nightly, either out of sheer devilry or because they had been hired to do so by a business rival. When the Live Oakers stormed a place brandishing the oaken clubs that gave them their name, bartenders, customers, musicians and bouncers quickly repaired out the rear exit and harlots fled upstairs. They then would take apart the establishment at their leisure, smashing furniture, gouging up the dance floor, destroying the musical instruments and, quite naturally, emptying the till and carting off all the liquor they desired.

The only place safe from their depredations was Bill Swan’s Fireproof Coffee-House on Levee Street. Swan was a former member of the gang who had acquired enough money to go into business. His resort enjoyed the protection of the Live Oakers, partly for old time’s sake but also because Swan always provided the gang with free drinks.

Among the more notable members of the Live Oak Boys, in addition to Red Bill Wilson, Bill Swan, Henry Thompson and Jimmy O’Brien, were Jimmy’s brother Hugh and his two sons, Matt and Hugh, Jr.; Crazy Bill Anderson; Jack Lyons; the three Petrie brothers, Red-head, Henry and Whitehead; Yorker Duffy; Barry Lynch; Jack Lowe; Tommy Lewis; Charley Lockerby and his son Albert; and Billy Emerson. Most of these were either killed, sent to prison or became drunken derelicts.

The most ferocious of all was Charley Lockerby, a short, powerful man who was credited with several murders. He was mortally wounded in a gun duel with a saloon keeper named Keppler, whom he killed. Doctors at Charity Hospital marveled over how long Lockerby lasted despite his fatal head wound. Hugh O’Brien was killed after robbing a fisherman of a row-boat and setting out on the Mississippi with the whiskey-besotted idea of becoming a pirate.

In a way, the lucky ones were those of the gang who were killed or imprisoned. With the passage of years the others turned into derelicts. While in earlier days there was no record of the New Orleans police standing up in combat to the Live Oakers, that changed as the gang members aged and turned helpless. In 1886 the New Orleans Picayune made the following comment about Crazy Bill Anderson, who generally was arrested for drunkenness 10 or 12 times a month:

LOANSHARKING

Now he is handled without gloves by the police, and is kicked and cuffed about like any other common drunkard. Yet, there was a day . . . when the police really feared to approach him with hostile intentions, and it usually occupied all the time, strength and attention of four able-bodied policemen.

By the late 1880s it was common for the young toughs of the city to seek out old Live Oakers to beat and torture. In time, only Bill Swan, the entrepreneur of the bunch, remained of a gang known as the terror of New Orleans for almost three decades.

After gambling, loansharking is probably the most profitable activity of the Mafia today. Known in the underworld as shylocking or six for five, the loanshark racket generally nets its operators 20 percent profit—per week. For every $5 borrowed the amount that must be repaid the following week is $6, or $1 if the borrower wishes just to pay the interest and not retire the principal. The standard short-term Mafia loan is for six weeks, which means the borrower must pay back a total of $11 dollars for each $5 borrowed: 120 percent interest for 42 days. Generally, the borrower must have permission to extend the payment date of the loan. One investigation in New York found that some syndicate loans brought back as much as 3,000 percent interest. Naturally with such profit margins, some loan sharks have been tempted to reduce their rates to stimulate business. In Dallas, Tex. in 1938 a loan shark was found to be making loans to destitute customers for only 585 percent annually. One man borrowed $20 to pay a medical bill and was charged $2.25 in weekly interest. Nine years later, he had paid a total of $1,053 and still owed the original $20.

While the Mafia first viewed loansharking as a way to victimize the poor or gamblers having a bad run of luck at a dice game, they soon discovered that it was easy to find potential victims among businessmen. A neighborhood store owner with his bank credit overextended and in need of quick cash often had no choice but to deal with a loan shark. Today, however, the Mafia's thrust is to use the racket to gain a foothold in legitimate businesses. A garment manufacturer may guess wrong on the season's line, a home builder is caught in a credit squeeze, a Wall Street securities house is hit in a sudden shift in market prices—the short-term solution is offered by the mob; in return, a piece of the business is demanded. Once the Mafia has an investment in a legitimate company, it protects it to the limit, perhaps terrorizing the competition or at least obtaining an advantageous labor contract through its connections with corrupt union officials.

At times, the gangsters may decide to simply loot a company, an operation perfected under the aegis of a cunning Mafia operator named Joseph Pagano. In the 1950s a large meat wholesaler got into financial trouble and had to borrow mob money. In time, he was forced to accept Pagano as the firm's new president "to safeguard the loan." Pagano's people bought up a huge amount of poultry and meat on credit and then resold it at cut-rate prices, collecting $ 1.3 million. Having milked the company and its suppliers the mob simply ordered the firm to go into bankruptcy.

lockstep surveillance harassment technique

Although illegal, lockstep surveillance, or rough shadowing, as it is sometimes called, is a form of harassment frequently practiced against important members of organized crime.

One of the most famous recent incidents of this harassment involved the late boss of the Chicago mob Sam Giancana. Since the old days Giancana had been known as Mooney, which meant he at times acted erratically. Hoping to make him lose his control and commit mistakes, FBI agents subjected Giancana to a 24-hour "rough."

Everywhere Giancana went he was followed. FBI cars were constantly parked outside his house, even when his daughters were having girl friends over to visit. There were times on the golf course when as many as six FBI agents watched him putt and often deliberately tried to upset his game with caustic remarks. In one effort to shake off his followers, the crime boss slipped into a church. The FBI men followed and verbally abused him when he exhibited rustiness on what to do during the services, taking his cues on when to stand, sit and kneel from his neighbors. The agents would whisper to him: "Kneel, asshole. . . . Sit down, asshole."

In desperation, Giancana took the FBI to court to force them to stop lockstepping him. Amazingly, he won, and the FBI was enjoined from practicing the technique. The decision, however, was later vacated for technical reasons, and lockstepping continues today. Important gang figures do not generally go to court to challenge the treatment because they will be required to testify that none of their activities warrants police surveillance. Having so testified, they can be cross-examined on their activities and alleged criminal acts, thus opening the door to a possible perjury conviction.

The courts are more inclined to protect a private citizen from any form of rough shadowing and have often upheld complaints of this type. Still, such cases do occur.

One classic example involved the late author Iles Brody, whom private detectives jostled in crowds and awakened with mysterious midnight phone calls. They had been hired to do so by rich friends of the Duke and Duchess of Windsor in an attempt to prevent the publication of Brody's gossipy book Gone With the Windsors.

Lombardo, Antonio "The Scourge" (1892–1928)

Capone aide

Part of Al Capone's success as a crime boss rested on his ability to obtain advice and support from men more brilliant and cunning than himself. Antonio "The Scourge" Lombardo, an urbane, levelheaded Sicilian who had prospered in Chicago as a wholesale grocer, was a typical example. Capone followed much of Lombardo's advice following the departure of Johnny Torrio, his original mentor, and eventually made the Scourge his consigliere. Lombardo played a key role in arranging a famed peace conference that led to a brief period of tranquility in the Chicago underworld. He counseled Capone to seek accommodation with the North Siders, a predominantly Irish gang, even after the murder of their leader, the celebrated Dion O'Banion, by Capone gunners. To bring about peace between the two mobs, Lombardo told the North Siders he would arrange to have O'Banion's killers, the murderous team of Albert Anselmi and John Scalise, turned over to them. But Capone rejected this deal, declaring "I wouldn't do that to a yellow dog." The everplotting Lombardo promptly turned this rare show of mercy into a propaganda coup, declaring it proved that "Big Al's the best buddy any of his boys could ever hope to have."

Still, overall, Capone followed Lombardo's advice and even picked up his practice of using court tasters; Lombardo was so fearful of being fed poison in his food that he always insisted on having an underling sample his meals before he ate them. In 1925 Capone rewarded Lombardo for his faithful service by making him, through gangland muscle, president of Chicago's huge branch of the Unione Siciliane. Despite his close ties to Capone and the fact that he had ordered many a man's death, Lombardo received rather fine press. In honor of his appointment, he issued a glowing testimonial to himself:

Chicago owes much of its progress and its hope of future greatness to the intelligence and industry of its 200,000 Italians, whose rise in prestige and importance is one of the modern miracles of a great city.

No people have achieved so much from such small beginnings, or given so much for what they received in the land of promise to which many of them came penniless. Each life story is a romance, an epic of human accomplishment.

Antonio Lombardo is one of the most outstanding of these modern conquerors. . . . He was one of hundreds who cheered joyously, when, from the deck of the steamer, they saw the Statue of Liberty, and the skyline of New York, their first sight of the fabled land, America. With his fellow countrymen he suffered the hardships and indignities to which the United States subjects its prospective citizens at Ellis Island without complaint, for in his heart was a great hope and a great ambition.

Mr. Lombardo . . . accepted the hardships as part of the game, and with confidence in his own ability and assurance of unlimited opportunities, began his career. . . ."

Such glowing testimony did not prevent Lombardo from falling victim in the vicious battle between Capone's followers and enemies for control of the criminal-dominated fraternal organization. On September 7, 1928 Lombardo was gunned down on Madison Street in the midst of a dense crowd of shoppers and office workers, two dum-dum bullets ripping away half his head. If it was any comfort to Lombardo, Capone saw that the Aiello mob, "the dirty rats who did the job," paid for it.

Loneragan, Wayne (1916–) murderer

In one of New York City's most sensational murder cases, Patricia Burton Loneragan, a 22-year-old heiress to a $7 million brewery fortune, was murdered in her bedroom on October 24, 1943. She had been strangled, bludgeoned by a pair of antique candlesticks and left naked on her bed.

Two months earlier, her husband had departed for his native Canada to join the Royal Canadian Air Force. However, it was discovered that he had been staying in a friend's apartment in New York City on the weekend of the murder. He was traced back to Toronto, arrested and returned to New York. At first, Loneragan, a bisexual, insisted he had spent the time in New York hunting for soldiers, but after 84 hours of interrogation he supposedly confessed that he had gone to Patricia's apartment and, after a quarrel, killed her, throwing his bloodstained uniform into the East River. His confession received a terrific play in the press, in part because of the concurrent admission that he had taken part in sex orgies and the fact that he had been the acknowledged lover of Patricia's father prior to their wedding. At one point Lonergan claimed to have killed his wife in self-defense during a fight.

The case against Lonergan was not the tightest on record. The police had neglected or failed to get Lonergan to sign his so-called confession. Moreover, there was no conclusive proof to show that he had visited the apartment or handled the candlesticks. Some legal observers felt he was convicted as much because of bisexuality as because of the evidence. The jury found him guilty of second-degree murder and he was sentenced to 35 years to life. After doing 21 years in Sing Sing, Lonergan was paroled in 1965 and deported to Canada.

The powerful Kingfish of Louisiana politics, first as governor and then as a U.S. senator, flamboyant Huey P. Long was shot to death in 1935. At the time, he was among the most-beloved and most-hated men in the state and nation. His supporters called him "the one friend the poor has," while his foes considered him a "demagogue," a "madman" and the "destroyer of constitutional government." One group that was solidly in Huey's camp was the underworld, with whom he could always reach accommodation. When New York City Mayor Fiorello La Guardia started busting up the syndicate's slot machines, Long told Frank Costello, in effect, to bring his business down. The underworld shipped in one-armed bandits by the thousands, making New Orleans the illegal slot machine center of the country. The payoffs supposedly contributed the grease that kept the Long machine running.

On September 8, 1935, Long, although a U.S. senator at the time, was attending a special session of the Louisiana House of Representatives in Baton Rouge. As he walked down one of the capitol corridors with five bodyguards in attendance, a 29-year-old man, Carl Weiss, who was considered a brilliant medical doctor, stepped from behind a pillar and shot Long with a .32 caliber automatic. The Kingfish screamed and clutched his side as he ran down the hall. His bodyguards knocked Weiss to the floor, shooting him twice. As he struggled, a fusillade of 61 shots turned his white linen suit red with blood.

Weiss died on the spot. Long lived about 30 hours, as doctors vainly struggled to save his life. Weiss' exact motive for killing was never learned, other than that he and his family had long hated the Kingfish. However, there was another version of the assassination: Weiss had not killed Long at all.

An artist's conception of the assassination of the Kingfish

There were two variations of this theory. According to one of them, a cut on Long's lip had come from a punch in the mouth Weiss had given him. The enraged bodyguards, so the story goes, pulled their guns and started shooting wildly, and one of their shots fatally wounded the Kingfish. After killing Weiss, they took his gun and fired it. Since the bullet that killed Long passed right through his body, it was impossible to tell which of the many discharged bullets was the fatal one. In the other variation, Weiss had intended to kill Long but was gunned down before he could get off a shot. In either case the consensus was that Long's aides and bodyguards had put the blame on Weiss to protect themselves.

Long was buried on the landscaped grounds of the capitol he had built. A novel based on his career, All the King's Men, won the Pulitzer Prize, and the movie version won an Academy Award in 1939.

Long, Steve (?–1868) lawman and thief

A man with an obscure past, six-foot six-inch Big Steve Long drifted into Laramie, Wyo. in 1867. Having the reputation of a gunman, Long rather quickly was made a deputy marshal. He soon became known as one of the bloodiest lawmen in Wyoming history, killing eight men in a two-month period. On October 22, 1867 four boisterous cowboys decided to roust four green-horn Easterners. Although they had no guns, the newcomers were not cowed by their foes, wading into them with fists flying. Long arrived on the scene and demanded a halt to the action. When the participants ignored him, he drew his two .44s and began pumping shots into the battling horde. When the smoke cleared, two cowboys and three of the newcomers lay mortally wounded.

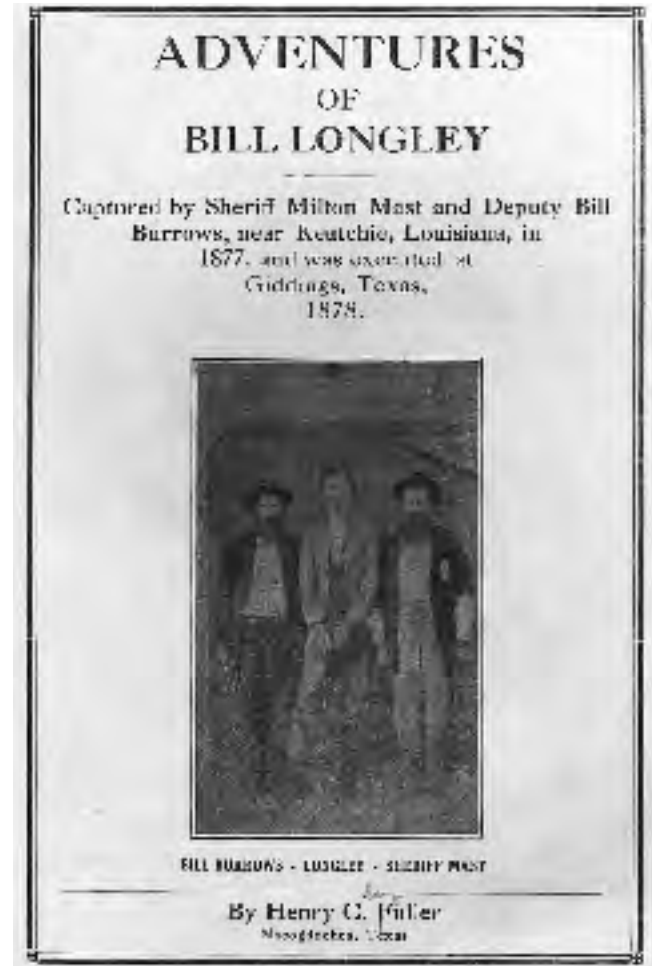

Despite all of Deputy Marshal Long's firepower, Laramie remained a lawless place, and local vigilantes had to take over some of the more important functions of the law, which Long seemed unable to manage. The reason for his inefficiency became evident the following year when it was discovered that the deputy marshal was moonlighting as a highwayman. In October 1868 Long was wounded by a prospector he tried to waylay. He made it back to town and had his wounds treated by his fiancée, a young lady proud of having a law officer for her future husband. When she discovered the cause of his wound, however, she immediately informed the vigilantes and the following day Long was hanged from a telegraph pole. Apparently retaining some fondness for him, she erected a marker to his rather tarnished memory.

Among Western gunfighters, William "Wild Bill" Longley probably stands second only to another Texas killer, Wes Hardin, in total "notches." Hardin had an estimated 40 and Longley, by his own admission, had 32.

Like Hardin, Longley had a pathological hatred for blacks, Yankees and carpetbagging lawmen. At the age of 15, he killed his first victim, a black state policeman who had asked Bill in an "arrogant manner" to identify himself. After that, he gunned down another black lawman and a Yankee sergeant. Then he rode with Cullen Baker's so-called Confederate Irregulars, who were really just a bunch of farm looters. After a year Wild Bill left the gang and headed west, traveling from the Rio Grande to the Black Hills and out as far as

The life story of Bill Longley became a best-seller in Texas.

Wyoming. Almost everywhere he went he managed to shoot someone.

Although a much-hunted man, Longley slipped back into Texas in 1875 and murdered Wilson Anderson of Evergreen, who, Longley was convinced, had shot a cousin of his. He managed to elude capture for more than two years but was finally apprehended in 1877 and taken to Giddings, Tex., where he was convicted and sentenced to death. While the decision was being appealed, Longley wrote an angry letter to the governor demanding to know why Wes Hardin was sent to prison for "only twenty-five years" for his many murders while he, Longley, was doomed to the gallows. The governor did not respond. The night before he was hanged, Longley told a guard about many of his killings. "He said that he didn't regret killing but one man," the guard later reported. "They were in camp together and Bill said it seemed like the feller was watching him. He said he had had a hard day and he was sleepy, but he wasn't going to sleep with the feller watching him. Well, he said, that kept up until midnight, when he got plumb tuckered out, so he got up and shot the feller in the head and went to sleep. The next day he found out that the feller was on the dodge just like him, so he always felt sorry about killing him."

Longley was his cool, dapper self mounting the gallops. He surveyed the crowd of 4,000 and said, "I see a good many enemies around, and mighty few friends." After the execution a number of the witnesses found amusement in the observation that Longley's head could be rotated until his billy-goat beard rested between his shoulder blades.

Loomis gang criminal family

For the better part of the 19th century, crime in upper New York state, especially in the Mohawk and Chenango valleys, was dominated by a sinister family gang, the large Loomis brood. Indeed, had Richard L. Dugdale focused on the Loomis clan rather than the largely fanciful Juke family in his controversial theory that immoral behavior could be passed on genetically from one generation to the next, his detractors probably would have had a much tougher time demolishing his position.

The Loomis family's roots in the area were planted by George Washington Loomis, Sr., who was forced out of Vermont in 1802 by a posse cleansing the area of horse thieves. In 1812, just before he went off to war, Loomis married Rhoda Marie Mallett, a young schoolteacher. Rhoda's father was an illicit distiller and forger, so that both sides of the Loomis family contributed to its later criminal tendencies. Rhoda mothered 12 children and served as the female Fagin for her brood. As her devoted son, Washington Jr. (born 1813), better known as "Wash," lovingly said, she approved of the children "stealing little things—and as long as we were not caught it was all right. If we got caught we got licked."

By the 1840s Wash was the leader of a great crime family, giving orders to brothers Grove, Bill, Wheller, Denio and Plumb and sister Cornelia. Three other sisters engaged in minor criminality, such as luring strangers into traps where they would be waylaid and robbed, but Cornelia was a true hellion who could ride and jump horses and shoot as well as any of her brothers.

The headquarters for the family's illegal enterprises was the miasmal Nine-Mile Swamp, from which no posse was ever able to dislodge them. From here, they could strike out on criminal raids, terrorizing communities, murdering, burning and robbing. As a sideline the family masterminded the distribution of counterfeit money. To their banner the Loomis brothers and sisters recruited a strong band of escaped fugitives and runaway slaves and ran massive sheep-, cattle- and horse-stealing operations.

In 1857 a large posse of citizens enraged by the gang's ever-growing operation, bore down on the Loomis farmhouse and seized most of the family. Huge quantities of stolen goods were found behind trapdoors and in sealed-off rooms. More than a dozen sleighs were needed to haul off the evidence to Waterville, where members were arraigned on larceny charges. Those Loomis brothers who had not been apprehended led the gang in a night raid on the courthouse to burn the records and re-steal much of the evidence. Some witnesses against the Loomis brothers disappeared and were not released until the arrested members of the family were freed, there no longer being any case against them.

When Grove Loomis was grabbed a short time later for running the gang's counterfeit money distribution network, newspapers in Utica reported that the local district attorney carried the evidence on him rather than leave it unguarded in his office. So the gang simply kidnapped him, took the evidence and beat him severely. Without the evidence, Grove had to be released.

In 1858 the gang's first important nemesis appeared. He was James L. Filkins, a blacksmith who had been elected constable of the town of Brookfield. More than anyone else, he was responsible for destroying what had become one of the most powerful gangs in the nation. Even when his fellow citizens wouldn't back him up, he tackled the gang alone, more than once using his fists to subdue a Loomis.

At first, the Loomis gang regarded Filkins as little more than a nuisance, even though he constantly raided their farmhouse. They were too busy running a massive horse-stealing venture, especially when the price of horses escalated with the outbreak of the Civil War. The gang shipped hundreds of horses, suitably disguised, to markets in Albany, Scranton, Pa. and various places in Canada, where they commanded top prices. To dispose of their other loot, they ran "thief boats" along the Erie Canal and down the Hudson River to New York City, where such famous fences as the notorious Marm Mandelbaum handled their resale.

When another mass trial for several members of the gang was scheduled in the North Brookfield Courthouse, the Loomis clan fell back on "smoking" to solve the problem. The courthouse was set afire and the fire hoses cut. The evidence burned, and once more, several Loomis boys and their followers walked away free. Afterward, another set of indictments and evidence on still other charges were kept in a safe in the town clerk's office in Morrisville. It was burglarized and the papers burned right in the town clerk's own potbellied stove.

By 1865 Constable Filkins decided extralegal means were needed to destroy the gang. He organized a vigilante committee and they descended on the Loomis farmhouse. A hand-to-hand battle ensued, and Wash Loomis was literally stomped to death. The vigilantes thought they'd also killed Plumb and tossed his body on a fire outside the house as they left. Ma Loomis pulled Plumb from the flames, and although he was badly seared, he survived. Denio and Plumb took charge of the gang and it was soon operating as ruthlessly and efficiently as it had under Wash. In 1867 the vigilantes staged another raid. This time, they hung Plumb and Grove by their hands over a fire until they confessed their crimes. The vigilantes then roused the women from the Loomis house and burned it to the ground. In the ensuing confusion, Grove slipped away while Plumb was taken off to a jail.

In 1870 Grove Loomis died, but the gang, led by Denio continued operating into the 1880s, when both Denio and Plumb died. Cornelia took charge of the gang then, masterminding its still vast operations, especially horse and sheep stealing. She died in 1897 and a few months later the gang's great foe, Constable Filkins, also passed away. It didn't matter; the Loomis gang was just about finished. By 1911 the last of the minor Loomises disappeared from the valley, 99 years after George Washington Loomis, Sr., started raising his brood.

Los Angeles Times bombing

In 1910 few cities in the United States had a more firmly antilabor climate than Los Angeles, Calif. One reason for this was the labor-baiting views of Harrison Gray Otis and his Los Angeles Times. Otis was the prime mover behind the Merchants and Manufacturers Association, which was violently opposed to labor unions and the closed shop and proudly proclaimed, "We employ no union men."

It was an era when many segments of the labor movement believed that the only answer to such intransigence was bombs and dynamite. For protection, Otis strapped a small cannon to his car's running board.

On the morning of October 1, 1910, the Times was hit by an explosion. The entire south wall of the Broadway Street side of the building crumbled, and the second floor collapsed under the weight of linotype machines and crashed down on office workers below. The first floor then smashed into the basement, shattering the building's gas mains and heating plant. Flames soon turned the structure into an inferno. Printers, clerks, reporters, editors, typesetters, old scrubwomen, young copy boys—21 in all—died, and at least an equal number suffered permanent injuries.

An enraged city demanded a solution to the crime. Mayor George B. Alexander brought in the famed private detective, William J. Burns, to aid in the investigation. Eventually, although under attack by some officials, union leaders, rival newspapers and others, Burns solved the case through clues found in other bombs delivered to Otis' home and the home of the secretary of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association. He arrested Ortie McManigal, an Indianapolis resident, James B. McNamara; and his brother John J. McNamara, secretary-treasurer of the International Union of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers. In addition, two anarchists named David Caplan and Matt A. Schmidt were not caught until 1915. Burns struck a deal with McManigal under which he would testify against the McNamara brothers.

The arrest of the McNamaras mobilized organized labor against what they considered to be an outrageous antilabor plot. American Federation of Labor President Samuel Gompers hired Clarence Darrow, fresh from successes defending Eugene Debs of the Railroad Brotherhoods and Big Bill Haywood of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), to conduct the brothers' defense. Darrow proceeded to call the McNamaras "pawns in a vast industrial war," victims of a "capitalistic conspiracy." He said the great frame-up was being financed by "the steel trust with its gold." The labor unions even utilized what was at the time still a novelty, the motion picture, and produced a movie about the McNamaras and their plight. Buttons were sold proclaiming, "THE McNAMARAS ARE INNOCENT." There were torchlight parades and rallies.

Burns countered by saying, "If Mr. Gompers will just sit down with me, at his convenience, I am certain I can convince him this is strictly a criminal case and does not concern organized labor. If need be, I will even show him evidence that cannot be made public as yet."

Gompers spurned the offer, reminding reporters that private detectives had often planted evidence and bought false confessions in the past to discredit unions. Nevertheless, by the time the trial opened, Darrow realized the McNamaras were guilty and sure to be convicted. His options were to fight a hopeless case in order to protect the union movement or to plead the defendants guilty in the hope of saving their lives. He chose the second course, which had a devastating effect on the Western labor movement. Gompers considered Darrow a traitor, and most of the country was numbed with shock.

LOVEJOY, Elijah

James McNamara got life (as did Caplan and Schmidt after they were apprehended), but John J. McNamara got 15 years because he could not be linked directly to the Los Angeles bombings. Having won their case against union violence, the Otis forces then decided to try to eliminate Darrow's future service as a labor defender. He was charged with attempting to bribe a juror.

Darrow was alone, having lost his support from the unions, indeed not having received even his $50,000 fee in the case. However, following a trial that lasted several months, thanks to a prosecution strategy to stretch out the time in order to drain Darrow's dwindling finances, the master of the courtroom was acquitted after making a moving summation, lasting a day and a half, in his own defense. Undaunted, the prosecution simply indicted him for the attempted bribery of a second juror. This case ended in a mistrial when the jury failed to reach a verdict. The state had no interest in attempting to prosecute Darrow yet another time and settled for an agreement whereby Darrow promised never to practice law in California again.

Some historians consider the case Otis' greatest triumph. Although Darrow was to win many a great legal battle thereafter, he never defended another union man.

Lovejoy, Elijah (1802–1837) abolitionist and murder victim

Few murder victims have ever encountered the merciless hatred reserved for abolitionists by proslavers who felt their way of life threatened.

Typical was the fate of abolitionist Rev. Elijah P. Lovejoy, who was lynched by a proslavery mob in Alton, Ill. on November 7, 1837. As editor of the Alton Observer, Rev. Lovejoy had written, "Abolitionists, therefore, hold American slavery to be a wrong, a legalized system of inconceivable injustice, and a SIN . . . against God."

A "posse" upholding "law and order" broke into the newspaper's office, seized the printing press and threw it into the river, set the building aflame and shot Lovejoy. The next day the posse returned for Lovejoy's mutilated corpse and dragged it through the streets to the cheers of crowds of proslavers. In the final analysis, Lovejoy's martyrdom advanced the abolitionist cause.

Loving, Cockeyed Frank (1854–1882) gambler and gunfighter

A cockeyed gambler who worked the Colorado circuit, Frank Loving went down in history as the victor in one of the West's most famous gun duels, one that went far to establish the myth that triumph belonged to the man who fired slowly and last.

The gunfight was the culmination of a long-standing feud over a woman between the gambler and Levi Richardson, a hard case reputed to have killed three men. On April 5, 1879 words turned to lead at Dodge City's Long Branch Saloon. Richardson, being the much faster draw, started firing first, fanning his pistol as the pair waltzed around a gaming table and a stove. With the men so close together that their pistols almost touched—Richardson got off some five shots but, except for one shot that scratched his opponent's hand, did no more than hit the wall.

There is some confusion about Loving's shooting, but apparently, his first three shots also hit nothing but wall. Finally, at a distance of no more than a couple of feet, he found the mark with three shots, and Richardson dropped, fatally wounded. Loving hung around Colorado bars for the next three years, telling of his exploit and expounding his theory that a "cool head" will always prevail in a gunfight. In April 1882 in Trinidad, Colo. he met up with a former lawman named Jack Allen. In one duel the pair exchanged 16 shots and every one missed. When they met again the next day Allen shot first and more accurately and Cockeyed Frank fell dead, although he lives on today as the epitome of the great Western duelists.

Lowe, Joseph "Rowdy Joe" (1846?–1899) gunfighter and brothel keeper

Rowdy Joe Lowe was a tough and mean gunman, brothel and saloon keeper and gambler. As a procurer, he could well be described as the Lucky Luciano of the Plains. He and his wife, known as Rowdy Kate, ran what was described as the vilest dive in the cow camps. While Kate reputedly gave an occasional stray girl money to go back home in order to escape a life of shame, Rowdy Joe could never be accused of such soft-heartedness.

Little is known of Lowe's early life except that he was probably born in Illinois in 1846. Various historical accounts place him in Quantrill's guerrillas during the Civil War and in the Texas Rangers in 1866. There are doubts about these stories but none that Lowe deserved his nickname of Rowdy. Once in a saloon battle between Lowe and another man, the local lawmen intervened and demanded the two apologize to one another. Lowe told his opponent: "Come here. I want to kiss and make up." He promptly bit off the end of the man's nose.

In 1869 Lowe was run out of Ellsworth, Kan. where he had been operating a combination saloon and brothel, on suspicion that he had donned a mask and held up customers after they left the dive. Two years later, Lowe and his wife opened a wicked dive in Newton, Kan. Killings and shootings were frequent there, and in 1872 Rowdy Joe shot and killed Jim Sweet, who had been paying too much attention to Rowdy Kate. The Lowes then moved on to Delano, Kan. and opened another establishment. Among the new admirers of Rowdy Kate, there was another saloon keeper named E. T. "Red" Beard, whom Lowe killed in a 50-shot duel, thus wiping out in one swoop a romantic and business rival. Because of confused and contradictory testimony about what had happened, Lowe was acquitted of the murder but lesser charges were then brought against him. The Lowes got out of town fast. After that, they plied their trade in bad whiskey, bad women and crooked cards in such places as Fort Worth and Fort Griffin, Tex. Dodge City, Kan., Tombstone, Ariz., and several boom camps that sprang up and later disappeared when the veins ran dry.

In the early 1880s Lowe was reported killed several times, once while robbing a train, once by outlaws, and once by scalp-taking Indians. All these reports were erroneous. He turned up in Kansas in the 1880s to help Luke Short and Wyatt Earp make their play during the Dodge City War. Lowe finally came to a much-deserved violent end in 1899, when E. A. Kimmel, an ex-police-man, shot him in a Denver saloon over an old grudge. It is part of Western folklore that after Rowdy Kate buried her husband, she moved on to San Francisco, married a millionaire railroad tycoon and became an honored member of Nob Hill society.

Lucas, Henry Lee (1936–) Baron Munchhausen of serial killings

In the 1980s the American public and media were in a frenzy over serial killings due to the increasingly brutal confessions of a weak-minded drifter named Henry Lee Lucas. Born to dysfunctional parents in 1936 and subjected to considerable family abuse, Lucas led an early life of lawbreaking spent in prisons and mental institutions. Upon his latest release in 1975 Lucas roamed the country carrying out robberies and the like and, at least according to his later claims, wholesale murders.

In 1980 Lucas hooked up with another drifter named Ottis Toole and the pair went around the nation on a robbery and burglary spree. Each told the other of the weird murders they had allegedly committed. In retrospect the claims seemed to be a sort of bizarre one-upmanship.

In 1983, Toole created a nationwide sensation when he confessed to the kidnap-murder of six-year-old Adam

Walsh in 1981. His confessions were at first embraced by law officials, with the obligatory declaration that Toole had offered details no one else could have. But within a few weeks, all charges against Toole were dropped, an obvious indication that Toole had become regarded as a "full mooner."

In the meantime, Lucas, being held on a weapons charge and suspicion of murder, went Toole many times better. With incredible perversity he started making confession after confession. He said he personally knocked off 69 men and women and with the aid of Toole some 20 or so others. In later statements to Texas Rangers Lucas kept raising the total as though it was some sort of macabre auction. The law wanted details, Lucas gave them hair-raising details. He said he engaged in mass torture and willy-nilly slaughters all around, and claimed he crucified some unfortunate victims and "fileted" others. Lucas boasted, "If I wanted a victim, I'd just go get one. I had nothing but pure hatred."

Law agencies around the country were overjoyed and started "clearing the books" on grisly crimes by the score. It seemed Lucas had made it a habit to travel about visiting murder scenes and the like and later picked up vibes when the reaction of police indicated he was around the area when a corpse had been found. Ever-obliging, Lucas pleaded guilty to killing an 80-year-old woman in a robbery in Texas and he was sentenced to 75 years.

When Toole recanted his killing of Adam Walsh, the law continued its acceptance of Lucas' claims. In late 1983 police from 19 states decided his confessions had solved 210 slayings. Later it was estimated Lucas' death toll was definitely at least 100. Of course, during that time Lucas just kept confessing more and more murders. Would they like 250 . . . 300 . . . 400? Soon Lucas topped the 500 mark and then he said he was responsible for at least 600 murders—and worldwide at that, including Spain and Japan. And, oh yes, he had delivered poison to the People's Temple cultists in Guyana.

Then reporter Hugh Aynesworth wrote a series of articles in the Dallas Times-Herald blasting Lucas' confessions as "a massive hoax." Previously, it would be fair to say Aynesworth had been a believer, having signed a book contract to write Lucas' biography in 1984. In February 1985 Aynesworth did an interview in Penthouse magazine. Later Lucas got around to denying the killings and had supplied alibis that Aynesworth could check that indicated Lucas was clearly elsewhere at the time.

Predictably, Lucas then recanted his recantations, claiming he had been drugged and forced to lie.

While there were police agencies still clinging to Lucas' confessions, most observers had had enough, and his statements had taken on a comic quality unworthy of much newspaper space.

In an interesting climax to the Lucas saga, he was sentenced to be executed for one murder in Texas. However, in that generally unforgiving state, the sentence of weak-minded Henry Lee Lucas was reduced to life imprisonment, indicating some further possible uneasiness about him.

Perhaps more significantly it is obvious that the murders had indeed occurred (except for some people Lucas said he had killed who turned out to be alive) and, if Lucas hadn't done them, a legion of murderers had got away with their crimes.

Overall, it could be said that the Lucas saga had been ghoulish fun while it lasted.

Lucas, James (1908–?) bank robber and murderer

Jimmy Lucas, once described as “the most vicious slugger on the Rock,” typified the “new social order” that developed in Alcatraz after it was set up as a super-prison for supercriminals. Famous criminals, such as Al Capone, Machine Gun Kelly, Alvin Karpis, became minor characters while toughs such as Lucas became kings of the Rock. Lucas won his fame in a confrontation with Capone.

One day a number of convicts including Capone, were lined up at the barber shop. After a while, the famous mobster got tired of waiting and moved to the front of the line, just ahead of Lucas, a mean Texas bank robber doing 30 years.

Lucas was not impressed by Capone and said, “Hey, lard ass, get back at the end of the line.” Capone put on a mean look and said, “You know who I am, punk?” Lucas was enraged. He grabbed the scissors from the convict cutting hair and stuck the point into Capone’s fat neck. “Yeah,” he said, “I know who you are, greaseball. And if you don’t get back to the end of that fucking line, I’m gonna know who you were.” Capone went to the back of the line and never again acted like anything but just another con on the Rock.

In 1938 Lucas, Whitey Franklin and Sandy Limerick took part in one of the most daring and brutal escape attempts from Alcatraz. After murdering a guard, they climbed to the roof of the furniture work shop and tried to storm a gun tower. Limerick was killed, Franklin wounded and Lucas surrendered when he saw the situation was hopeless.

Franklin and Lucas were convicted and sentenced to life for the murder of the guard. Franklin, who had done the actual killing, spent the next seven years in solitary confinement without a break until the Alcatraz Prison Rebellion of 1946. After the revolt was squelched, he was returned to solitary. Lucas was treated mildly better, although he too did long stretches in solitary and following the trio’s escape attempt was subjected to what was called “the worst grilling in Rock history” to try to make him reveal who else had been involved. Although his reputation had been tarnished badly in the prisoners’ eyes because he had given up without a fight, Lucas won back their esteem when he refused to talk.

Subsequently, Lucas and Franklin became nonpersons in the federal penal system. In addition, Franklin was to become the most ill-treated prisoner on the Rock, even more so than the Birdman of Alcatraz, Robert Stroud. However, Stroud, who had also killed a federal prison guard, was too famous to be turned into a nonperson. Both Lucas and Franklin are probably dead. It is doubtful if either was ever paroled. In 1977, in response to queries by author Clark Howard, the U.S. Bureau of Prisons simply stated that neither man was at the time incarcerated within the federal system. If by some chance Lucas was free, the bureau was not about to admit it.

Of the five crime families in the New York area established after the murder of the last boss of bosses, Salvatore Maranzano, the Gagliano-Lucchese combine was always recognized as the most efficient and relatively peaceful crime family, especially after the death—from natural causes—of Tom Gagliano and the coming to power of underboss Thomas Lucchese. Lucchese was also known as Three-Finger Brown—after a leading pitcher of the same name—ever since 1915, when he had lost three fingers in an accident.

The generally peaceful development of the Lucchese family was rather remarkable considering its leader’s penchant for violence during his early years. In the 1920s he had served as a bodyguard for Lucky Luciano when both were working under Giuseppe “Joe the Boss” Masseria and he became Luciano’s favorite killer. He murdered several Maranzano men during the war for control of the New York Mafia and is believed to have been involved in a total of 30 murders, although his only important arrest was for grand larceny in 1923.

After Luciano had Masseria assassinated and made a shaky peace with Maranzano, he used Lucchese as the fingerman in Maranzano’s murder on September 10, 1931. From the lowly status of a Sicilian gunman, Lucchese thus rose to the high councils of the modern Mafia. One of the most popular crime bosses, he exerted great power in the garment industry rackets and ran smooth operations in the narcotics, gambling, loansharking and construction rackets. As a corrupter, he was the equal of Frank Costello and had friends and connections at all branches and levels of local government. When the mob wished to make its desires known to judges and legislators, Lucchese was the most important pipeline. Of all the Mafia leaders, he was probably the best at remaining out of the lime-light. When Lucchese died of cancer, his funeral was one of the biggest in underworld history, with a turnout of over 1,000 mourners, including politicians, judges and businessmen as well as hit men, loansharks, narcotics peddlers and Mafia leaders. Because it was known that the FBI and police were going to monitor the funeral on film, the Lucchese family let out word they would not be offended if important mafiosi stayed away. Many did but sent emissaries to deliver their money envelopes out of respect. Despite the warning, others, including Carlo Gambino, then the most powerful boss in New York, Aniello Dellacroce, Crazy Joe and Vincent Rao, insisted on coming in person to show how much they thought of Lucchese. Perhaps what they respected most about him was that for the last 44 years of his life he had never seen the inside of a courtroom.

Charles "Lucky" Luciano is generally regarded as the most important figure in the development of organized crime, even more important than Al Capone. As the guiding genius along with Meyer Lansky, Luciano, by a campaign of double-dealing and, where necessary, murders, cleansed the Italian underworld of its narrow-minded old-line leaders and took it into alliances with other ethnic groups. Thus, in the early 1930s he established the national crime syndicate that has dominated many aspects of American life ever since. Despite public misunderstanding of the subject, Luciano's creation is not the Mafia, but something even bigger and more powerful. In a manner of speaking, he can be credited with killing off the Mafia.

Luciano was born Salvatore Luciana in the Palermo area of Sicily. He came to this country in 1906 at the age of nine and was arrested at 10 for shoplifting. At this tender age he started a racket that would later produce millions for him; for a penny or two a day, he offered younger and smaller Jewish kids his personal protection against beatings on the way to school. Of course, he slugged those who would not pay. One runty little Jewish kid who wouldn't pay was a youngster from Poland, Meyer Lansky. At first the two fought and then they became the best of friends, a relationship that was to continue long after Luciano had been sent into exile.

By 1916 Luciano was a full-fledged member of the notorious Five Points Gang and was listed by police as the prime suspect in a number of murders. Early on, Luciano developed an unabiding hatred for the "Mustache Petes," the old-timers who ruled the Mafia gangs, and by the 1920s he was plotting their elimination. At that time, Luciano was already an important figure in the underworld, a power in bootlegging rackets in cooperation with Lansky and his erstwhile partner Bugsy Siegel as well as Joe Adonis, Vito Genovese and, especially, Frank Costello. Costello put him in contact with other ethnic gangsters (much to the displeasure of the Mustache Petes): Irishmen like Big Bill Dwyer and Jews like Arnold Rothstein, Dutch Schultz and Dandy Phil Kastel. What impressed Luciano most about Costello was the way he could buy protection from city officials and the police, which Lansky had for years stressed to Luciano was an absolute requirement for a successful underworld existence.

By the late 1920s Luciano had risen to the number two position in the family of Giuseppe "Joe the Boss" Masseria, the top Italian gangster of the era. Luciano detested Joe the Boss' Old World ways, steeped in the rituals of the Sicilian Mafia that stressed "respect" and "honor" for the chief and distrust and hatred of all non-Sicilians. The things Luciano respected and honored were ways to earn more money from crime, and in Masseria's prejudice against other gangsters, Sicilian as well as non-Sicilian, he saw an unconscionable obstacle to achieving greater profits. Instead of cooperating with other criminals to make more money, Joe the Boss fought them, even waging old-fashioned feuds with fellow Sicilians based on which town or village they had come from.

In 1928 the Castellammarese War broke out between the forces of Joe the Boss and those of the second most powerful mafioso in New York, Salvatore Maranzano, and over the next two years dozens of gangsters on both sides were killed. While the fighting was going on, Luciano was cementing relationships with the younger, second-line leadership within the Maranzano camp, and it soon became clear that both groups were merely waiting to see which of the two leaders would die first so they could make plans to get rid of the other.

When after a time neither had been assassinated, Luciano took matters into his own hands. Three of his men and Bugsy Siegel on loan from Meyer Lansky, shot

LUCIANO, Charles “Lucky”

Joe the Boss to death in a Coney Island restaurant after Luciano had stepped into the men’s room. Luciano then became number two man under a seemingly grateful Maranzano, who proclaimed himself the “boss of bosses” of New York. Actually, Maranzano intended to make himself the supreme boss of the entire Mafia in the U.S. and, to that end, drew up a death list of those who would have to be eliminated because they stood in his way. The top name on the list in Chicago was Al Capone, in New York, Luciano.

Unfortunately for Maranzano, Luciano anticipated his actions, in fact learned of them in advance, and avoided walking into a death trap in the gang leaders’ office, where he and his aide Vito Genovese had been summoned for a conference. Maranzano had arranged for a homicidal Irish gunman, Mad Dog Coll, to assassinate the pair in his office. Instead, moments before Coll arrived to set up the ambush, four of Lansky’s gunmen, pretending to be law officers, entered the office and shot Maranzano to death.

In a practical sense, Maranzano’s death marked the end of the “old Mafia,” at least in the United States. It has long been rumored that Luciano followed up the assassination with the murders of 40 other “Mustache Petes” across the country, but no list of victims was ever compiled and probably no such deluge of killings was necessary. In the years prior to Luciano’s revolt, many of the old-timers had already passed away: either as the result of natural causes or assassinations.

The remnants of the old Mafia were incorporated into a new national crime syndicate, a more open society that combined all the ethnic elements of organized crime. The new syndicate included among its directors Lansky, Joe Adonis, Dutch Schultz, Louis Lepke and Frank Costello. There was no boss of bosses, although Luciano was really the boss in everything but name. The syndicate moved to control the bootlegging, prostitution, narcotics, gambling, loansharking and labor rackets.

Luciano was at the top of the heap, becoming a dandy dresser and a well-known sport along Broadway. He still looked menacing, however, thanks to a famous scarring he had received in 1929, when knife-wielding kidnapers severed the muscles in his right cheek, leaving him with a drooping right eye that gave him a sinister look. Luciano told various stories about how he was kidnapped and by whom, alternating culprits from gangland rivals (including the Maranzanos), to drug smugglers who thought he knew about a big incoming shipment and wanted to hijack it, to rogue cops who tried to get information from him by torture. More likely than any of these stories was a theory that he had been kidnapped by a policeman and his sons because he had been playing around with the cop’s daughter. Since he had survived a “ride,” something few gangsters ever did, he was nicknamed Lucky.

Lucky Luciano’s downfall started in 1936, when special prosecutor Thomas E. Dewey succeeded in getting him convicted on prostitution charges, which the underworld has always insisted were a “bad rap,” claiming Dewey had framed the case with the perjured testimony of pimps and whores who would say anything to avoid going to jail themselves. The conviction was especially ironic in view of the subsequent disclosure that Luciano had had Dutch Schultz murdered because that flaky and brutal gang leader had been planning to assassinate Dewey. The prosecutor had been putting heavy pressure on the syndicate in general and on Schultz in particular, and the latter appeared before a board meeting of the syndicate to demand that Dewey be eliminated. Luciano led the opposition to Schultz’ demand, insisting Dewey’s death would cause more problems than it would solve. When the enraged Schultz insisted he would go it alone in the “hit,” Luciano pressed for a vote to kill the Dutchman for the good of the syndicate. It was done.

Luciano got 30 to 50 years for the prostitution charges, the longest sentence of its type ever given to anyone. Nevertheless, he continued to run syndicate affairs from his cell until he was paroled in 1946 for his so-called war services, especially for ordering security tightened on the mob-controlled New York waterfront (which was true) and for enlisting the aid of the Mafia in Sicily during the Allied invasion (which was nonsense). Upon his release, Luciano was deported to Italy. He was able to sneak back to Cuba for a time to continue his involvement in American criminal affairs, and at a top conference there in 1947 he approved the execution of Bugsy Siegel for looting the mob’s funds while constructing his dream, the Flamingo Hotel, in the hopes of making Las Vegas a plush gambling mecca. When his presence in Cuba was revealed, Luciano was forced to return to Italy because of protests from the U.S. government. He continued to issue orders and receive his cut of racket funds through underworld couriers, including Virginia Hill. With the assassination of Albert Anastasia and the attempted assassination and forced retirement of Costello in 1957, Luciano lost two of his most ardent supporters within the syndicate. Genovese turned against him and there is reason to believe he even planned to eliminate him. Lansky remained semi-loyal, seeing that syndicate money continued to be funneled to Luciano—but in decreasing amounts.

Luciano was in no shape to mount a serious protest, having suffered a number of heart attacks in his later years. Gradually, he began to reveal to journalists his version of many of the past criminal events in the United States. In 1962 he died of a heart attack at the Naples airport. Finally, Luciano was permitted to come back to America—for burial in St. John's Cemetery in New York City.

Luetgert, Adolph Louis (1848–1911) murderer

Few murders have ever shocked the citizens of Chicago as much as the gruesome killing in 1897 of Louisa Luetgert by her husband, Adolph, the owner of a leading sausage-making business.

Luetgert had emigrated from his native Germany in the 1870s and, over the years, had acquired three distinctions: he made just about the best German sausages in the city; he was a man of enormous appetite and considerable girth, weighing about 250 pounds, and he had sexual appetites that equalled or exceeded his culinary one, having three regular mistresses at the time of his wife's demise and a bed installed at his plant for his many trysts.

Luetgert was relatively happy except for one thing: his hefty wife, Louisa. She annoyed him, so much so that he often felt, as he told one of his lovers, "I could take her and crush her." Actually, as the police were to surmise in 1897, he probably stabbed her to death with a huge knife. That much is conjecture because almost nothing of Louisa's body was ever found. After Adolph killed her, he did something that was to damage the sale of sausage meat in Chicago for a long time. He melted her body down in a vat at his meat plant and made her part of his sausages.

Louisa turned up missing on May 1, 1897. Adolph told her relatives that he had hired private detectives to find her and that he would not go to the police because, as a prominent businessman, he could not afford to have any scandal. Eventually, his wife's relatives went to the police, who in turn searched Adolph's sausage factory. After several searches the police emptied one of many steam vats and found some pieces of bone, some teeth and two gold rings, one a wedding band with the initials "L. L." engraved on it. Both rings belonged to Louisa Luetgert. Although Adolph insisted the bone fragments were animal, analysis identified them as human. The wedding ring was even more damning because the sausage maker's wife suffered from swollen joints in some of her fingers and had been unable to remove the ring for years. However, as the police theorized, she could have been melted out of it.

Luetgert's trial was sensational, although most unsavory. The evidence against him was formidable, especially when one mistress after another took the stand to testify against him. Convicted, Luetgert was sentenced to life at Joliet Prison, where he died in 1911.

Lufthansa robbery

The biggest holdup in the history of American crime occurred on December 11, 1978, when six or seven men wearing ski masks and armed with shotguns and automatic weapons staged a bold predawn raid on the Lufthansa Airlines cargo facility at New York City's Kennedy International Airport and made off with $5.85 million in cash and jewelry. Although the caper has not been completely solved, authorities have made a number of arrests and pieced together a scenario of the daring heist, which has since resulted in a trail of corpses.

Investigators now know through certain confessions that the robbers had inside aid and information. Louis Werner, a Lufthansa cargo agent, was convicted and sentenced to 16½ years in prison for giving the robbers crucial inside assistance. Because of fear of retribution, Werner has refused to give testimony against others involved in the crime. Within a year after the crime, authoritative counts of persons rubbed out because they had knowledge of various aspects of the caper rose to a minimum of nine and perhaps as many as a dozen.

The crime, authorities are certain, was planned at Roberts Lounge, a bar near the airport where known cargo thieves, airline cargo handlers and undercover cops congregated to drink and bet on horses. The bar's ownership has since changed hands but its current customers still gossip about the huge theft and whisper alleged new revelations about it.

There seems little doubt that the crime was a "Mafia operation," planned by members of the crime family of the late Tommy Lucchese. According to the FBI, the Lucchese group supervised the plot and then handled the disposition of the money and jewels. It is said the mob secured the cooperation of the inside employees by the standard Mafia method of encouraging them to gamble beyond their means, then pressuring them to pay up, lending them money at exorbitant rates and finally pointing out they could cancel their debts and come out ahead by helping pull off the heist.

While only 10 persons are believed to have been directly involved in the robbery, the circle of those who took part in the overall operation may amount to as many as 30 or 35. A key suspect in the investigation has been James “Jimmy the Gent” Burke, the former operator of Roberts Lounge. Shortly before the Lufthansa job, Burke was released from prison, where he had been serving time for another cargo caper. He reputedly was the “coach” on the job, tirelessly training the holdup men during methodical rehearsals of the robbery. Burke refused to answer any questions about the heist and eventually was returned to prison for parole violation.

Other leading suspects were Thomas DeSimone, believed to have been one of the holdup men, and a big-time bookmaker named Martin Krugman, who is said to have passed on the idea of the scheme to the men who carried it off. Both DeSimone and Krugman went missing. Some law officials believe they are dead, but others are doubtful and point out that no effort was made to hide other victims’ bodies, probably indicating the mob wanted the various deaths to act as a deterrent to those who might talk.

The only murder victim whose identity the killers tried to conceal was Theresa Ferrara, a 27-year-old part owner of a Long Island beauty shop who had shared a house with an associate of Burke. Her dismembered body washed ashore near Toms River, N.J. and could only be identified by X rays.

Police thought they had a major break in the case when they got a tip that another body was buried in the yard behind Roberts Lounge but when they dug up the ground, they found only the body of a horse. A year after the robbery, FBI agent Steve Carbone was optimistic about eventually breaking the case. “It took the Brink’s people five years to solve that case, so we still have four to go,” he said. “We’re very confident.”

Lupo the Wolf (1870?–1944) Black Hander and murderer
From the 1890s until 1920, Ignazio Sietta, better known as Ignazio Lupo, or Lupo the Wolf, was the most important Black Hander in New York City. The Black Hand was not an organized society but a mixed bag of amateur and professional extortionists who terrorized various Italian communities throughout the United States, threatening victims with death unless they paid to stay alive. The victims would receive letters demanding money and at the bottom of the letter there would usually be the outline of a hand that had been dipped in black ink, a sign sure to produce icy terror. Lupo the Wolf fostered and perfected the Black Hand technique, promoting himself into the embodiment of evil in the Italian section of Harlem.

Lupo came from Sicily as a grown man and soon won a reputation as one of the most desperate and bloodthirsty criminals in the history of American crimes. His followers knew they had to kill without questioning his authority, so terrified were they of him. It was the custom in Italian Harlem for a resident to cross himself on the mere mention of Lupo's name and extend his fingers to ward off the spells of this evil creature. Many of Lupo's killings took place in the infamous Murder Stable at 323 East 107th Street, where eventually the bodies of some 60 murder victims were found. Some of these were individuals who had refused to meet Lupo's Black Hand demands, but more were victims of murder-for-pay jobs done for other gangs, secret societies or private individuals who had contracted with Lupo for an old-country vendetta killing.

Included among the victims were gang members who had strayed, such as the 18-year-old stepson of Giuseppe Morello, Lupo's chief ally. The youth was tortured and slaughtered because he was suspected of having betrayed the gang's counterfeiting activities. Using fear and intimidation, Lupo continued to operate through the first two decades of the 20th century seemingly immune to arrest for his various murders and extortions. Finally, in 1920 Secret Service agents caught him in a counterfeiting plot in which dollars were forged in Sicily and then smuggled into this country.

Lupo the Wolf was sent to prison for 30 years. Released in the late 1930s, he emerged to find much of the criminal world altered. Black Hand operations had long since ceased because of the increased sophistication of the Italian community whose members now would go to the law if pushed. There was no longer any room for Lupo in other rackets. Mafia racketeers had joined in an organized crime confederation that used murder only as a last resort and in accordance with sound business procedures. Clearly, Lupo the Wolf, with his crude methods, did not belong, and he was so informed. Terror and murder as he practiced them would only cause serious legal and political problems for the organization and simply would not be tolerated. Lupo took the warning to heart and went into retirement until his death in 1944.

Lustig, "Count" Victor (1890–1947) con man

Probably the only confidence operator who could be classed as the equal of the legendary Yellow Kid Weil was "Count" Victor Lustig, a remarkable rogue who not only pulled the most outrageous swindles of the 1920s and 1930s but also constantly courted danger by victimizing the top gangsters in America, including Al Capone and Legs Diamond.

Born in 1890 in what is now the Czech Republic, Victor Lustig soon established himself as the black sheep of the family (although when he became a successful international confidence swindler, his brother Emil followed in his footsteps).

Lustig pulled a number of swindles in Europe as a young man and was hunted by police in several countries. Consequently, he came to the United States just after World War I and immediately emerged as the leading practitioner of the "money-making machine" swindle. A sucker would be informed that the Count had discovered a secret process for making real currency out of plain paper that he fed into a machine. He demonstrated the process several times, although what came out were other genuine bills that he had secreted in the machine earlier. As outrageous as the dodge was, Lustig had such a gift for grift that he sold the machine—often for sums up to and even exceeding $10,000—to bankers, businessmen, madams, gangsters and small-town lawmen.

An incorrigible rascal, Lustig believed in flimflaming as a matter of principle, and no one was exempt. He originated one of the con man's favorite petty swindles, that of "fishing a lady." Lustig was a habitue of brothels and paid extremely well, at least in a manner of speaking. Upon taking leave of a lady, he would produce a $50 bill, fold it up, lift up her skirt and pretend to tuck it in her stocking. Actually, he would palm the bill and stuff in a wad of tissue paper. Then the Count would explain to the woman that it was trick money and that if she removed it before morning, it would turn to tissue paper. The lady would promise to leave it there but after Lustig's departure she would eagerly retrieve her pay—and indeed, it had turned to tissue paper!

In the mid-1920s Lustig returned to Europe and twice succeeded in selling the Eiffel Tower. He had read in the newspapers that the great tourist attraction was in need of repairs and would be very costly. The Count had a brainstorm. When he arrived in Paris, he sent out letters to six leading scrap metal dealers inviting them to a secret government meeting in a luxury hotel. Lustig introduced himself as "deputy director-general of the ministry of mail and telegraphs," and explained to the dealers that since it was too costly to repair the Eiffel Tower, it would have to be torn down and sold for scrap. However, the government was fearful of public reaction, so the plans had to be kept secret. Then when the government announced how much money would be saved, the public would accept the idea.

The dealers were invited to bid for the scrap metal from the tower. All turned in secret bids. Then Lustig informed one of the dealers that for a fee his bid would be accepted. The dealer paid eagerly, and Lustig immediately fled to Vienna. When the story of the swindle failed to make the newspapers, he realized the dealer had been too frightened or too ashamed to go to the police. So he returned to Paris and swindled another dealer. This one, however informed the law when he realized he had been taken and Lustig realized he couldn't sell the Eiffel Tower again and returned to America.

For a time Lustig operated in the worthless security field, selling bogus paper that he often presented as "stolen." He found a number of underworld buyers who agreed to take the hot stuff off his hands for as little as 10¢ on the dollar, with the idea of holding it several years before disposing of it. Among those so taken were Big Bill Dwyer, Nicky Arnstein and Legs Diamond, who actually thought he was buying some retirement security. Oddly, when the gangsters found out they had been taken, they could do nothing because Lustig said he would spread the word on how they'd been suckered, making fools of them. Even the maniacal Diamond saw the humor of the situation and left Lustig alone.

The Count once swindled Al Capone out of $5,000 and the famous gangster never realized he had been taken. Lustig asked Capone for $50,000, promising to double it in 60 days in a scam he was working. Capone gave him the money, warning what he did to welchers and swindlers. Lustig simply put the money in a safe-deposit box for the allotted time and then dolefully informed him his plan had failed and he had not made any money. Capone was about to explode, thinking he had been taken, when Lustig returned his $50,000, keeping up a spiel of apologies. Capone was not prepared for this situation. Initially figuring Lustig had swindled his money, he now was faced with the obvious fact that the Count was playing square with him.

"If the deal fell through," Capone said, "you must be down on your luck." He peeled off five $1,000 bills and handed them to Lustig. "I take care of guys who play square with me." The Count gratefully left with the $5,000, which was what he was after from the beginning.

One of the Count's prize patsies was a renowned madam of the period, Billie Scheible, operator of a string of very plush houses in Pittsburgh and New York. He once sold the madam a moneymaking machine for $10,000 after telling her he was too impatient with it since it could only turn out one $100 bill every 12 hours. When Billie determined she had been hoaxed, she had some of her strong-arm boys run the Count down in Philadelphia.

Lustig refunded Billie's $10,000 and then turned on the charm full voltage to sell her $15,000 in worthless securities. "The Count had a way with him," Billie once explained.

Since many of Lustig's swindles involved money schemes, it was only natural he would also venture into counterfeiting. But counterfeiting was another matter and the Count, who had never done time for any of his cons, was caught in 1935.

On September 1, the day before he was supposed to go on trial in New York City, Lustig, using a rope fashioned from nine bed sheets tied together, climbed out a lavatory window of the Federal House of Detention and started his escape descent. Part way down, Lustig noticed lunch-hour pedestrians watching him. Immediately, he began to go through the motions of cleaning the window. Down he went, floor by floor, scrubbing every pane he passed. When he hit the sidewalk, he ran. It was several minutes before one puzzled onlooker approached the small wicket in the formidable jail doors and asked, "Do you know your window cleaner has run away?"

The Count's fantastic escape made headlines throughout the country, as did the ensuing manhunt for him. Billie Scheible was questioned but knew nothing. Perhaps Arthur "Dapper Don" Collins did. Collins, reputed to be one of the country's greatest con men, had been pals with Lustig before his arrest. But he was not too helpful either. It turned out Lustig had swindled him out of several thousand dollars and, quite naturally, failed to keep in touch.

Finally, Lustig was run to earth in Pittsburgh. He was convicted and sentenced to 15 years for the counterfeiting charge and five more for his escape. He died in prison in 1947.

Lynch, William (1724–1820) first lyncher

The origin of lynching has been attributed to many persons named Lynch, some who did the hanging and some who were hanged. Many texts credit a Virginia planter, Colonel Charles Lynch, who with his brother founded Lynchburg, as the first lyncher. His activities, however, seem to have been limited to the flogging of criminals and Tories during the American Revolution; there is no evidence that he ever hanged anyone by extralegal means. Most likely, the first lyncher was another Virginian named Lynch, Captain William Lynch, who used the rope to cleanse Pittsylvania County of a ruffian element. In a sense, Captain Lynch did only what the community required, since in the frontier the law was either weak or entirely lacking.

Writing in 1836, Edgar Allen Poe discovered the date the first lynching organization was formed when he found a compact signed by Lynch and a number of his supporters. It read:

Whereas, many of the inhabitants of Pittsylvania . . . have sustained great and intolerable losses by a set of lawless men . . . that . . . have hitherto escaped the civil power with impunity . . . we, the subscribers, being determined to put a stop to the ubiquitous practices of those unlawful and abandoned wretches, do enter into the following association . . . upon hearing or having sufficient reason to believe, that any . . . species of villainy (has) been committed within our neighborhood, we will forthwith . . . repair immediately to the person or persons suspected . . . and if they will not desist from their evil practices, we will inflict such corporeal punishment on him or them, as to us shall seem adequate to the crime committed or the damage sustained. . . . In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands, this 22nd day of September, 1780.

The compact did not specifically mention hanging but hangings occurred, especially after floggings had stimulated confessions, true or imaginary. The hangings were carried out indirectly, as described by an acquaintance of Lynch:

A horse in part became the executioner . . . the person who it was supposed ought to suffer death was placed on a horse with his hands tied behind him and a rope about his neck which was fastened to the limb of a tree over his head. In this situation the person was left and when the horse in pursuit of food or any other cause moved from his position the unfortunate person was left suspended by the neck—this was called “aiding the civil authority.”

The extent of lynching in the United States had never been accurately measured. Before 1882 there were no reliable figures at all. Since then the records have been reasonably accurate. Statistics compiled at Tuskegee Institute indicate that from 1882 to 1936 at least 4,672 persons were lynched in this country; of this total, almost three quarters, or 3,383, were blacks, and 1,289 were whites. Between 1886 and 1916 lynch mobs killed a minimum of 2,605 blacks, and in 1892 alone the figure was 160.

A contemporary drawing of the lynching of two black men and three black women for the killing of a white man in Greenville, Ala. in 1895. One account assured readers that the 100 men in the lynching party were “all cool and brave.”

By the 1890s the frontier was being tamed and lynchings in the West started to decline, but in the South they started to increase. In that decade 87 percent of all lynchings occurred in the South; from 1930 to 1937 the South had 95 percent of all lynchings. While the standard assertion in the region was that lynchings were necessary to protect white womanhood, less than 30 percent of black lynch victims during the seven-year period were accused, let alone proved guilty, of rape or attempted rape.

Obviously, these figures give an incomplete picture of the extent of lynching. Omitted entirely is any reference to Chinese or to Indians, probably the most common victims of lynchings in the West. While the literature and history of the West describe the lynching of murderers, claim jumpers, rustlers and thieves, it has always been members of minority groups who have most felt the lynch mob’s wrath. The early German settlers seem to have had a particularly strong bent for lynching Indians. In 1763 German settlers, fired up by the passions of the French and Indian War, butchered 20 peaceful Conestoga Indians, many women and children, near Lancaster, Pa.

This lynching, hardly the first to occur in the colonies, preceded the activities of two Virginians, Colonel Charles Lynch and Captain William Lynch, both of whom are credited in various texts as being the first lyncher and the one who lent his name to the practice. The evidence appears to favor William Lynch.

Whoever deserves the credit, lynching became a widespread practice in America, employed for whatever reasons the lynchers thought just. The Vicksburg Volunteers in the 1830s used it to get rid of the gamblers who were driving the residents of that Mississippi port city to poverty with their crooked games. The Vigilantes of San Francisco did much to clean up San Francisco, ridding the city of a number of cutthroats and crooked politicians. Probably the greatest lynching rampage in the West occurred in the 1860s, when the Vigilantes of Montana wiped out the Innocents, a massive outlaw gang run by a sheriff, the notorious Henry Plummer. During six weeks in late 1863 the vigilantes hanged an estimated 26 Innocents as well as the sheriff himself. Many lynchings were probably stage-managed by private detectives, railroad detectives and range detectives, who would take suspects into custody and make a point of jailing them in an area where the feeling of the community ran high against the detainees. Their apparent strategy was to fan the public's ire and then stand to one side as a lynch mob took over.

The various Ku Klux Klans that were established starting in 1866 aimed to keep the South under the control of white Protestants. Naturally, blacks were the most frequent victims of the Klan, but others who felt the whip and the hangman's rope included Jews, Catholics, bootleggers, pacifists, "Bolshevists," internationalists and evolutionists. While hangings and shootings were the most common methods of lynching in the South, methods of shocking cruelty were often used. In 1899 thousands of whites took special excursion trains to Palmetto, Ga. to watch a black man being roasted alive.

Two of the most outrageous lynchings of this century involved white victims. One was Leo Frank, a pencil company executive in Georgia who was lynched in 1915. Frank was taken from a prison where he was serving a life sentence for the murder and rape of a young girl, a crime of which he was almost certainly innocent. What he was not innocent of was being Jewish and rich. Frank was hanged by vigilantes calling themselves the Knights of Mary Phagan, the name of the girl whom Frank had been convicted of murdering. Shortly thereafter, most of the Knights were initiated into a "reincarnated" Invisible Empire of the Knights of the Ku Klux Klan.

The other shocking case occurred in the aftermath of the 1933 kidnap-murder of California department store heir Brooke Hart in 1933. A huge mob broke into the jail in San Jose where Hart's two confessed murderers, John Maurice Holmes and Thomas Harold Thurmond, were being held, and hanged the pair after brutally mis-treating them. The tenor of the times was best articulated by Gov. James "Sunny Jim" Rolfe, who announced the lynch mob provided "the best lesson ever given the country. I would pardon those fellows if they were charged. I would like to parole all kidnappers in San Quentin and Folsom to the fine patriotic citizens of San Jose."

But despite such publicized mob executions of whites, the vast majority of lynching victims in the 20th century have been blacks. From its inception in 1909, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People fought mob violence and campaigned for a federal antilynching law, but congressional action was always frustrated by filibusters in the Senate. About 1935 the number of lynchings started to decrease, and by 1952–54 there was, for the first time in the nation's history, a three-year period without a reported lynching. Since then there have been some lynchings, but by and large, they have become a thing of the past. While no antilynching statute has ever been adopted, the 1968 Civil Rights Act, which makes it a federal offense for two or more persons to join in a conspiracy to violate a citizen's constitutional rights whether or not death occurs, has been considered effective in preventing lynchings.

Lynds, Elam (1784–1855) Sing Sing's first warden

He was regarded in his day—not particularly an era of enlightenment in the treatment of convicts—as the wickedest warden ever to run an American penitentiary, and still today, many historians trace almost every evil committed in the history of American penology to Elam Lynds, the first warden of Sing Sing. If that was perhaps too sweeping a judgment, it can at least be said that whatever evil he did not originate, he most certainly refined. A full century after Lynds' reign, another warden of Sing Sing, Thomas Mott Osborne, wrote, "We are just now getting rid of the Lynds' influence." And another, Lewis E. Lawes, added, "Bit by bit, one reform at a time, the memory of Captain Lynds is being scrubbed out of the stones at Sing Sing."

The atrocities committed in the new prison Lynds built with convict labor at the village of Sing Sing, N.Y. in the 1820s gave the community such a bad reputation that the local citizens changed the village's name to Ossining.

It was Lynds who originated the use of striped uniforms and who developed the technique of lockstepping (close marching) convicts. He initiated the practice of having prisoners pass each other with downcast eyes so that no inmate would come face to face with another; of prohibiting prisoners from talking, in or out of their cells; and of making prisoners perform hard labor from dawn to dusk. Above all, he believed in the whip. "Whip 'em till they drop," he commanded his guards until he won the sobriquet the Whip of Sing Sing.

Born in 1784 in Litchfield, Conn., Lynds entered military service while in his teens. By the beginning of the War of 1812, he had gone from private to lieutenant and was subsequently promoted to captain for valor in action. After the war the government cut the size of the army and Lynds was mustered out. Finding a job suited to his talents, he became principal keeper of the new state prison at Auburn, N.Y. The warden was a political appointee with no background in penology and he turned over the running of the institution to Lynds, who immediately introduced a series of severe practices. One that he was not allowed to implement was the equipping of all guards with rawhide whips so that they could mete out instant punishment. In 1821 the warden died and Lynds succeeded him, initiating the darkest period in penal history. Auburn Prison became known as the harshest in the country, which made Lynds the darling of the prison discipline societies throughout the nation and their allies in the legislature.

Lynds gave them exactly what they wanted. The New York legislature approved a plan that allowed Lynds to pick 80 prisoners to be kept in solitary confinement in the first of 550 individual cells being constructed at the prison. The inmates were to remain there for the entire duration of their sentences. If any of them broke their silence, they tasted Lynds' whip. Within the first two years of this cruel experiment, only two of those among the 80 who were not lucky enough to win their freedom survived, the rest either died or went hopelessly insane.

Lynds transferred more men into the newly completed cell blocks—the first of their kind in the world and upon which all others have been patterned. Six days of the week the men were allowed out of their cells from dawn to dusk to do hard labor and then returned to their unlit, unheated and unsanitary confines for the long silent night. The seventh day they were kept locked up the entire 24-hour period.

The Rev. Louis Dwight, head of the Boston Prison Discipline Society, wrote admiringly of Lynds' concept of labor, beatings and silence:

The whole establishment, from the gate to the sewer, is a specimen of neatness. The unremitted industry, the entire subordination and subdued feeling of the convicts, has probably no parallel among an equal number of criminals. In their solitary cells they spend the night, with no other book than the Bible, and at sunrise they proceed in military order, under the eye of the turnkeys, in solid columns, with the lock march, to their work-shops; thence in the same order, at the hour of breakfast, to the common jail, where they partake of their wholesome and frugal meal in silence. Not even a whisper is heard through the whole dining area. The convicts are seated in single file, at narrow tables, with their backs towards the center, so that there can be no interchange of signs. If one has more food than he wants, he raises his right hand, and the waiter changes it. When they have done eating, at the ringing of a little bell, of the softest sound, they rise from the table, form the solid columns, and return under the eye of their turnkeys to the work-shops. . . .

At the close of day, a little before sunset, the work is all laid aside at one and the convicts return in military order to the solitary cells; where they partake of the frugal meal, which they are permitted to take from the kitchen, where it was furnished for them, as they returned from the shops. After supper, they can, if they choose, read the Scriptures undisturbed, and then reflect in silence on the errors of their lives. They must not disturb their fellows by even a whisper. . . . The men attend to their business from the rising to the setting sun, and spend the night in solitude."

Despite such glowing testimonials, there were several critics who were appalled at the sufferings of the prisoners and Lynds' dedication to whipping. In one case he actually flogged a prisoner 500 blows. He lashed convicts who had fits and those who were insane. Indeed, there is no way of knowing how many men went insane because of Lynds' brutal practices.

The huge increase in insanity cases and suicides plagued Lynds. Prison reform associations were springing up and all railed against his oppressive rule. They were especially revolted by one case in which a guard, acting on Lynds' orders, entered the cell of a woman prisoner, one of 100 kept in the segregated south wing of the prison, and whipped her severely. Within a month she died. When her body was later shipped to a medical college, it was ascertained that her death had not been from natural causes. Finally, even Lynds' devoted supporters in the legislature couldn't protect his Auburn post. They arranged for him to be put in charge of the construction of a new prison at Sing Sing on the Hudson River. The transfer proved irresistible when Lynds pledged to build the prison free of cost to the state.

The site at Sing Sing was picked out because it was accessible by boat and had large quantities of marble rock and good building stone that were not difficult to quarry. Lynds arrived there in the spring of 1825 with 100 prisoners from Auburn. All the convicts were given striped uniforms, the first time such outfits were used. Lynds decided on the uniforms because they would stand out against the background of trees if any prisoners tried to escape.

It took the work force three years to complete the prison, constructing individual cells for themselves and for 400 other convicts and a chapel room for 900 more. It was quite an accomplishment. The convicts had labored without an enclosing wall and yet none had escaped. Lynds had driven them hard, never coddled them. During the winter months the men worked fewer hours because there was less daylight. Since they worked less, Lynds cut their food rations, reasoning they did not need the same level of nourishment. Of course, the government had provided the same amount of rations. Lynds had simply sold the "surplus" to outside merchants, a practice he was to continue during his long reign and which was to supplement his $1,000 annual salary and make him a rich man.

And Sing Sing was built without cost. While quarrying stone for building their own cells, they were also cutting beautiful slabs of light gray stone, almost like granite, for sale to state and local communities all over New York and New England. State legislative inspectors were so thrilled by the pay-as-you-go construction of the prison that they ignored additional tons of stone continually stacked on the river's bank for shipment to private builders at special cut-rate prices.

Lynds was given a free hand in the prison he had built, and he, in turn, loosed his guards on the inmates. "Punish! Punish!" he ordered them. "I don't believe in reformation of an adult criminal. He's a coward, a willful lawbreaker whose spirit must be broken by the lash. Why is it that one guard, armed with a whip, can control twenty convicts? They are afraid of him. I'll teach them to fear my guards. And all of them, guards included, to fear me. That is the only way to conduct a prison."

Lynds personally met every new batch of prisoners shipped up from New York City. He would look over the commitment papers to find the new arrival with the worst record, pull that man out of line and have him strapped to the whipping post. He would then lash him 10 times. Such was the greeting newcomers received in Lynds' grim fortress on the Hudson.

"You'll be back for more," Lynds told a man who had assaulted a brutal guard at Newgate Prison in Greenwich Village, from where he had been transferred. "I know my men." Thereafter, Lynds found special cause for singling out the convict for punishment. One day at the rock quarry, the man found lasting freedom from the whip by refusing to run when some explosives were set off.

Such was the fear that Lynds could inspire. For no matter what the prisoners thought of him, he was no coward, as he proved constantly by parading in their midst.

Once when Lynds learned the prison barber, a murderer named Wilde, was threatening to kill him if he ever got the chance to put a razor to his throat, he sent for the barber. Leaning back in his office chair, he told Wilde to shave him. By the time the shave was completed, the barber was a nervous wreck. Lynds laughed. "I know you threatened to kill me, Wilde," he said. "But I knew you wouldn't. Unarmed, I'm stronger than you are with a weapon. Now get out."

If Lynds was a terror to the prisoners by day, he was far worse by night. Two French writers, G. de Beaumont and A. de Tocqueville, who visited Sing Sing related in their famous book, On the Penitentiary System of the United States, published in 1833, how Lynds, a barrel of a man, prowled on tiptoes through the silent galleries of the prison, at night, his ever present whip in hand, listening for violators of the no-whispering rule:

It was a tomb of living dead. . . . We could not realize that in this building were 950 human beings. We felt we were traversing catacombs. A faint glow from a lantern held by an inspector on the upper galleries moved slowly back and forth in the ghostly darkness. As it passed each narrow cell door we saw, in our imagination, the gateway to a sepulcher instead. . . . The watchman wore woolen moccasins over his shoes to deaden even the faint scrape of his shoes on the gallery floor. There was not a sound.

Not a sound until some unfortunate cried out in anguish when his cell door was thrown open and that awesome whip cracked. Some prisoners, apparently guilty of no more than talking in their sleep, told later of being jarred awake by the first slash of rawhide.

Eventually, Lynds was removed from his post, but it was not because of his unhumane treatment of convicts. Rather, it was due to financial and other forms of malfeasance. It was found that contractors who supplied the food for the inmates billed the prison for a certain quality of meat but supplied a much cheaper grade. Lynds insisted on half the difference in value as his kickback. Another revelation was that the garbage swill from the convicts' food was sold to pig farmers, but since they insisted on a certain quality, Lynds dumped part of the prisoners' rations directly into the garbage.

Perhaps the most telling case against him was made by Colonel Levi S. Barr, an ex-army officer and lawyer who was sent to Sing Sing for three years. His accusations against Lynds took on added weight when, after his release, he proved the criminal charges against him had been unwarranted. "In my three years of confinement," he declared in a petition to the legislature, "I ate no butter, cheese, milk, sugar, no turnips, beets, carrots, parsnips or vegetables of any kind save potatoes, no soups or strengthening drinks. . . . I have gladly eaten the roots of shrubs and trees that I dug from the ground in which I labored. . . . I saw no exception among individuals around me. . . . There were some who told me they ate the clay they worked in. . . . It at least filled their stomachs."

Additional charges were brought by John W. Edmonds, an inspector of prisons, who uncovered evidence that some prisoners had thrived, enjoying double food rations provided they had the money to pay the warden for them. It was also discovered that Lynds had hushed up several escapes. Inmates who had broken out were still carried on the books.

Lynds finally was forced to resign in 1845. He lived out his remaining years in comfortable retirement, buying a fashionable home and making numerous business investments, all presumably financed by savings from his $1,000-a-year salary. While the man died in personal disgrace, his penal beliefs and practices lived on after him and many would say they have yet to be totally eradicated.

Lyons, Danny (1860–1888) murderer

A leading member of the Whyos, easily the most murderous gang in New York City during the late 19th century, handsome Danny Lyons was available to do any job at a price. He would blacken both eyes of a victim for a $4 fee, break his leg for $19, shoot him in the leg for $25 or "do the big job" for $100 and up. A strutting rooster, he kept three women in prostitution on the streets: Lizzie the Dove, Bunty Kate and Gentle Maggie. When they failed to bring in the revenues that Lyons felt were necessary to maintain him properly, he recruited a fourth Kitty McGown. But Kitty already had a lover, Joseph Quinn, who vowed to get Lyons for stealing his inamorata and meal ticket. The two prowled lower New York for months and on July 5, 1887 their paths finally crossed. They blazed away at each other, and Quinn dropped with a bullet in his heart.

Lyons went into hiding but was caught some months later and hanged on August 21, 1888. In underworld circles there was much denunciation of the execution for what was considered a bum rap. The story was that Quinn had shot first, and Lyons had merely acted in self-defense. Certainly, the authorities had been hoping to get a noose around Lyons' neck and such a God-sent opportunity was not to be lost because of a quibble over who had shot first.

Kitty McGown and Bunty Kate immediately found themselves new protectors, but Lizzie the Dove and Gentle Maggie put on widow's black and canceled all business engagements while they went into mourning. One night toasting their departed lover in a Bowery dive, they got into a heated argument over which of them he had loved more and whose sadness was greater. Gentle Maggie won the argument by plunging a cheese knife into Lizzie the Dove's throat. As she lay dying, Lizzie told her rival, "[I will] meet you in hell and there scratch your eyes out."

Lyons, Haze (1840–1864) road agent and murderer

A minor member of Sheriff Henry Plummer's huge gang of crooks, Haze Lyons ended up celebrated because of a sentimental ballad bewailing his misfortunes.

A young cowboy, Lyons made his way from California to Montana and there joined Plummer's gang of Innocents, who plundered the area in robberies plotted by the sheriff himself. Lyons did whatever ordered, no less so when told to help take care of Sheriff Plummer's deputy, Bill Dillingham, a peace officer suffering from a terminal incorruptibility. However, Lyons and two other Plummer gunmen botched the job and were caught. Lyons tried to argue that he was just an innocent bystander but was quickly tried and convicted before a miners court and sentenced to hang. The rope was round his neck when someone started reading aloud a last letter he had been permitted to write to his mother. It was a sentimental bit of prose that, it is said, reduced the tough miners to tears. The miners untied Lyons' hands, put him on a horse and told him to "git" back to mother. Lyons made the mistake of going only as far as Bannack and reporting back to Plummer. He pulled some more jobs for the sheriff and just a few months later, on January 14, 1864, was taken prisoner by vigilantes who were not impressed by sentimental letters. They hanged him the same day. Much was made of the gunman who wouldn't go home to mother. A ballad celebrated his fate, but the verse is lost, as is, perhaps more sadly, that heartrending letter that saved a killer's life, at least for a time.

Jack McCall is remembered as one of the two meanest and vilest assassins in Western history, the other being Bob Ford, “the dirty coward” who shot Jesse James. McCall arrived in Deadwood, Dakota Territory in the spring of 1876, using the name of Bill Sutherland, probably because he was suspected of having stolen range stock in Nebraska. He was a cross-eyed, broken-nosed, whiskey-besotted saddle tramp who was always getting into scrapes. It was said he got his cross eyes in a dispute with a sheriff whom he went after with a couple of .45s. The lawman simply picked up a hefty piece of lumber and cracked him over the head, rendering him unconscious for 24 hours and leaving him with scrambled eyes thereafter.

Wild Bill Hickok, himself a notorious back-shooter, drifted into Deadwood about a month after McCall. They apparently got to know each other over the town’s poker tables. Thus, it came as a shock when on August 2, 1876 at about 4 P.M., McCall walked into Carl Mann’s Saloon Number 10, stepped up behind Hickok, who was playing cards, and put a bullet through his head. Hickok slumped forward dead, still clutching his cards, a pair of aces and a pair of eights, thereafter to be known as a “dead man’s hand.”

As soon as everyone realized what had happened, there was a mad rush for the exits. McCall tried to shoot twice at the fleeing figures, but his gun misfired both times. He rushed out the door and hopped on the first horse he saw. Unfortunately for McCall, its owner had slackened the saddle cinch because of the heat, and he was sent sprawling in the dust. He ran into a butcher shop to hide, but someone stuck a rifle in his back and forced him out.

McCall faced a miners court the following day and pleaded self-defense. He also said he was avenging the death of his brother, whom Hickok had killed. By a vote of 11 to one the jury declared him not guilty and set him free, indicating despite what the makers of the Hickok legend have said, how people really felt about Wild Bill.

McCall quickly left town, ending up in Laramie, Wyo., where he often bragged of killing Hickok in a duel. Finally, he was arrested for the Hickok killing by a federal marshal and brought to trial at Yankton, Dakota Territory. McCall’s protest that he’d “done been tried” was ignored, since miners courts had no official standing. In a real court of law there was not much chance of his being found not guilty on the grounds of self-defense. His claim about avenging his brother’s death wasn’t too effective either after it was established he had three sisters but no brother. There was some speculation that McCall felt Hickok had cheated him out of $25 in a card game, but that was doubted on the ground that McCall rarely possessed such a bountiful sum. Some evidence indicated that the pair had had words over whether McCall owed Hickok 25¢. That may well have been the real motive for the shooting. McCall was asked why he had shot Hickok from behind rather than face-to-face. For that at least, he had a perfectly logical answer, “I didn’t want to commit suicide.”

On March 1, 1877 McCall was hanged and buried with the rope still around his neck.

McCanles gang Wild Bill Hickok foes

The Wild Bill Hickok legend began in Rock Creek, Nebraska Territory in 1861, when he wiped out the “McCanles gang” of nine “desperadoes, horse-thieves, murderers and regular cut-throats,” as Harper’s Monthly called them, in “the greatest one-man gunfight in history.” In the battle Hickok supposedly made use of a six-gun, rifle and bowie knife and took 11 bullets in his own body.

The true facts were a little less spectacular than the magazine reported, however. The so-called McCanles Gang actually consisted of David C. McCanles, a 40-year-old rancher who had sold his previous homestead to a stage and freight company for use as a relay station, and his 12-year-old son, a cousin and a youthful employee. The four went to the company’s office in the McCanles’ former home to demand the payments beyond the first, which were long past due. In charge of the station was a man named Horace Wellman, who had as his assistant a 24-year-old stock tender named James Butler Hickok. McCanles, who was something of a community bully and appears to have had some conflict with Hickok over a woman, demanded to see Wellman, informing Hickok that if he didn’t send him out he would come in after him. Hickok entered the depot and in a few minutes McCanles was summoned to follow. There is some dispute over whether McCanles was even armed at the time and over why he would have brought his young son along if he expected a shoot-out. While McCanles was belaboring Wellman, Hickok apparently shot the rancher while hiding behind a calico curtain. McCanles’ son rushed into the building and cradled his dying father in his arms while the other two young men, both almost certainly unarmed, were murdered, one hacked to death with a hoe and the other killed by a shotgun blast. Both were killed by other members of the relay station crew. The McCanles boy avoided being murdered only because he was fast afoot. There is no indication that the “McCanles forces” ever fired a shot, and Hickok certainly was not wounded.

Hickok, Wellman and a man named J. W. “Doc” Brink were charged in the three deaths, although there was considerable evidence that Mrs. Wellman was responsible for at least one of the killings. The record doesn’t reveal whether they were ever brought to trial. Well into the 20th century, each time a new scrap of evidence was discovered by historians, the facts of the McCanles killing were dredged over again and again. At no time, has Hickok ever come out looking heroic. Still, the myth of a “McCanles gang” persists.

McCarty gang Wild Bunch outlaws

The McCartys were a flaky band, fitting in well with Butch Cassidy’s Wild Bunch, with whom they often rode. On March 30, 1889 Tom McCarty, Cassidy and an unidentified member of the gang walked into the First National Bank of Denver, where McCarty told the bank president he had just overheard a plan to rob the bank.

“My God,” the bank officer cried. “How do you know about this plot?”

“Because I planned it,” McCarty said. “Hands up!”

The McCartys fared well under Cassidy’s wing, but when they struck out on their own in 1893, it was a different story. They bungled a holdup of the Merchant’s Bank in Delta, Colo. Overhearing cries for help, a young hardware store owner, W. Ray Simpson, instantly seized a rifle and some shells and stepped out to the street. In an incredible display of shooting, Simpson blasted the top of Bill McCarty’s head off, put a bullet through the heart of Fred McCarty, Bill’s son, and killed Tom McCarty’s mount. Still, this last McCarty managed to get away. He later sent a messenger to inform Simpson he was going to come back to kill him.

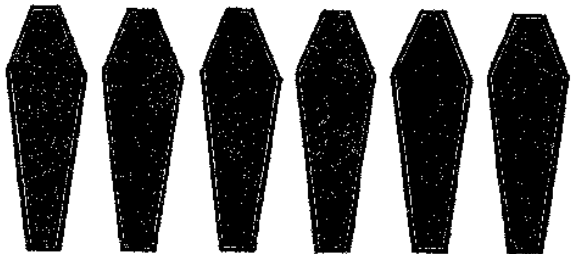

Simpson’s response was laconic. McCarty’s messenger left Delta bearing a small piece of cardboard, about the size of a playing card, with 10 bullet holes in it. The card read, “Made at 225 feet.” Tom McCarty never returned to Delta to settle the score.

McConaghy, Robert (1810–1840) mass murderer

Robert McConaghy’s 1840 crime—the murder of his wife, his mother-in-law and four of her other children in a mindless frenzy—won enormous notoriety thanks to a best-selling publication that focused on the bizarre events at his execution.

McConaghy went on his murder spree on May 30, 1840. Throughout his trial, he refused to admit his guilt, but he was nonetheless convicted and sentenced to hang. On November 6, 1840 McConaghy mounted the gallows at Huntington, Pa. The large crowd in attendance gasped loudly when the rope broke. McConaghy, in a state of shock, was carried up the scaffold again. The ordeal proved too much for him, and he started babbling out the full confession he had refused to make earlier. This time the rope held. The drama of McConaghy’s execution inspired a pamphlet about his case.

The scene that confronted military police in the early morning of February 17, 1970, when they were summoned to the Fort Bragg, North Carolina, home of Dr. Jeffrey Robert MacDonald, was horribly bloody. MacDonald, a medical officer at the fort and a captain in the Green Berets, was found semiconscious, but the rest of his family had been butchered. The doctor's 26-year-old wife Colette, pregnant with her third child, lay dead in the master bedroom. She had been stabbed a total of 21 times in the chest with an icepick and battered in the head at least a half-dozen times with a club. Both her arms had been broken, apparently while she attempted to defend herself. Her husband lay on the bed next to her, not moving but alive. The word "PIG" was scrawled in blood across the headboard of the bed.

In other bedrooms, the two MacDonald children, five-year-old Kimberly and two-year-old Kristen, had similarly been slaughtered, stabbed many times with a knife and ice pick and Kimberly clubbed repeatedly. MacDonald said he had been sleeping on the living room couch when he was awakened by the screams of his wife and older daughter. He then found himself attacked by four intruders, including a black man in army garb, two white men and a blonde female wearing "hippie style" clothing and carrying a candle. The woman kept chanting "Acid is groovy" and "Kill the pigs."

MacDonald said he remembered struggling with his attackers and then passed out. When he came to, he went from room to room and discovered the full dimensions of the massacre. He declared he had tried mouth-to-mouth resuscitation without success. He said he then staggered to the bathroom and checked out his own injuries, then staggered to the telephone and reported the crime.

Investigators were not impressed with MacDonald's claims, feeling there were inconsistencies with the physical evidence, such as bloodstain patterns and the location of fibers from MacDonald's pajama tops. In addition, the doctor's wounds were rather superficial, the worst being a small stab in the chest that caused a partial collapse of the right lung.

Later that year MacDonald was charged with the murders, but at the outset of the court-martial proceedings, defense counsel made a shambles of the army's charges, noting disturbance of evidence by MPs, loss of evidence, and the failure to establish roadblocks to hunt for possible intruders. There were charges that the military investigators failed to fully investigate another possible suspect. The defense was complemented by character witness testimony, including that of Colette's stepfather, Freddy Kassab.

MacDonald was cleared and left the service with an honorable discharge.

Within a few years, however, Freddy Kassab, having long reviewed all the evidence, changed his mind and determined his son-in-law was guilty. For two years he fought a lonely fight to get the charges reinstated. In 1975 MacDonald was indicted by a federal grand jury.

At the subsequent trial the prosecution charged that MacDonald had engaged in an extramarital affair, that he was drug dependent and that a number of domestic problems led him to decide to murder his wife. The defense produced Helena Stoeckley whom it charged was the "kill the pigs" female at the crime scene.

Stoeckley had been diagnosed as a substance abuser and a paranoid schizophrenic. However, she insisted she had never been in the MacDonald home and had never even seen the doctor until that day in court.

MacDonald was found guilty of second-degree murder in the cases of Colette and Kimberly and first-degree murder in the case of Kristen, and drew three consecutive life sentences.

The MacDonald case would not go away, however. In 1980 a federal court threw out the conviction on the grounds that MacDonald had not had a speedy trial. Later, the U.S. Supreme Court, by a 6-3 vote, ruled MacDonald’s constitutional rights had not been violated, and the sentence was restored.

In 1983 Joe McGinniss’ book Fatal Vision became a best-seller. McGinniss had been asked by MacDonald before his trial to tell his story. Unfortunately for MacDonald, the writer came to the conclusion that the doctor was guilty, and perhaps committed the brutal murders because of exhaustion, amphetamine use and a psychological disorder. The outraged MacDonald unsuccessfully attempted to prevent NBC from doing a miniseries based on the book, and he continued to assert his innocence.

A $15 million lawsuit by MacDonald against McGinniss for breach of contract and fraud ended in a deadlocked jury and a mistrial. In August 1987 MacDonald settled out of court for $325,000.

The murder verdict continued to be a matter of dispute, and a 1989 documentary by filmmaker Ted Landreth entitled False Witness probed the drug culture around Fayetteville at the time the murders occurred and the alleged involvement of Helena Stoeckley. MacDonald continued serving his sentence but by the turn of the century, the number of his supporters kept on growing amid claims that newly discovered scientific evidence was being developed that would inevitably result in yet another reversal of the case that refused to die.

McDonald, Michael Cassius “Mike” (1832–1907)
gambler and fixer

Chicago gambling, confidence swindling, vice and the political fixing during the 30 years after the fire of 1871 starred Michael Cassius McDonald.

A professional gambler while still in his early teens, Mike became the King of the Bounty Jumpers during the Civil War, heading an organized gang of crooks who reaped a fortune collecting bounties for enlisting in the Union Army and promptly deserting to repeat the process elsewhere. McDonald masterminded the movements of his men, keeping track of their “enlistments” on a large war map. He came out of the war with a stake large enough to open a gambling house at 89 Dearborn Street.

In 1869 McDonald swindled $30,000 out of an assistant cashier who, in turn, was embezzling money from the large company he worked for. McDonald was arrested for the swindle but beat the rap by hiring scores of witnesses to testify that his gambling place ran honest games and that his victim had begged him, with tears in his eyes, to be allowed to play. However, the trial drained McDonald’s finances, and he was unable to keep up protection payments to the police, which resulted in raids on his establishment several times a week. The experience left him with a hatred for policemen, which continued into his later life when he was the greatest fixer in the city and even named police chiefs. Years after, a patrolman came to him and said: “We’d like to put you down for two dollars, Mike. We’re burying a policeman.”

Like all other gambling and vice operators, McDonald was wiped out by the Chicago Fire, but because he was one of the quickest to get back in business, he was able to “build a poke” before the police became organized enough to collect protection payments again. By 1873 he and two partners had opened a four-story resort in a building that would later become the home of the Hamilton Club. The first floor was a top-notch saloon; the second floor housed McDonald’s office and a large set of gambling rooms. The third and fourth floors were run by his wife Mary, who rented furnished flats to select gamblers and bunco men, such as Kid Miller, Snapper Johnny Malloy, Dutchy Lehman, Jew Myers, Charley Gondorf, Boss Ruse and Black-Eyed Johnny. Another of his cronies, Hungry Joe Lewis, took Oscar Wilde for several thousand dollars during the English writer’s tour of the United States in 1882. The same year two others, Johnny Norton and Red Jimmy Fitzgerald, swindled diplomat Charles Francis Adams out of $7,000.

In this famous resort, called The Store, McDonald uttered a number of phrases that were to become part of the American vernacular. When a partner objected that his plans were too lavish and that they would never attract enough customers, McDonald replied, “There’s a sucker born every minute.” While later writers would attribute the remark to P.T. Barnum, it was McDonald who coined it as well as another equally famous saying: “Never give a sucker an even break.”

By 1880 McDonald’s stature had grown to the extent that he controlled all vice operations except for prostitution, a business activity he found repulsive. “A crook has to be decent to work with Mike,” a friend of his once explained. And working with Mike meant making good money. McDonald moved into politics, refining the political fix to a fine art. A criminal wishing to operate freely had to pay Mike as much as 60 percent of his take, which was then divided among the police, various city officials and judges and McDonald's own syndicate. McDonald became close friends with such Chicago mayors as Harvey Colvin and Carter Harrison. During the terms of these two mayors, Mike's minions were allowed to run wild. In 1882, during one of the mayoral reigns of Carter Harrison, McDonald flexed enough muscle to have Superintendent of Police Simon O'Donnell, who was both honest and efficient, reduced in rank to captain and replaced by his own man, William J. McGarigle. McGarigle later had to skip town following the disclosure of a cleaning and painting swindle of a governmental building that netted McDonald's company $67,000. While some of the governmental grafters went to prison, McDonald remained untouched.

McDonald continued to control the Chicago rackets until the turn of the century, pulling in his horns whenever a reform administration came in and then swinging back into action when the heat was off. After accumulating several million dollars, he started to lose interest in his business because of marital problems. In the mid-1880s his wife ran off with a minstrel singer. McDonald finally tracked her down in San Francisco and brought her home, but in 1889 she took off again, this time with a Catholic priest who used to say mass at a private altar in the McDonald mansion. The lovers went to Paris, where they lived for six years until the priest entered a monastery and McDonald's wife returned to Chicago to operate a boardinghouse. Mike meanwhile had obtained a divorce and married Dora Feldman, four decades his junior. In the ninth year of this second marriage, Dora shot and killed a young artist named Webster Guerin, who, it developed, had been her secret lover during almost all of the marriage. The now-retired political fixer never recovered from the shock of the disclosure and his wife's comments to the press that she had always disliked him; he died on August 9, 1907. Nevertheless, McDonald had left his second wife a large portion of his estate and had set up a special defense fund of $40,000 for her murder trial. Chicago being Chicago, Dora McDonald was acquitted in 1908.

During the boom years of Dodge City, Kan., from about 1877 to 1887, the nefarious Luke McGlue committed more crimes in the "wickedest little city in America" than anyone else. If a man had his hotel room looted, it was most likely the work of Luke McGlue. If a man's luggage disappeared, it was that damnable Luke McGlue again. If a man's trousers disappeared while he was visiting a harlot in a crib, she would tell him—with a straight face—it was the work of Luke McGlue. Luke McGlue specialized in robbing greenhorns or constantly playing practical jokes on them, and they would leave town happy to have seen the last of him. Well, not literally, since they had never seen Luke McGlue. Nor could they have. Luke McGlue didn't exist. He was invented by the denizens of Dodge City as an explanation for the many practical jokes and petty thefts greenhorns were subjected to. Even Wyatt Earp assured such victims he was on the lookout for Luke McGlue and would deal with him severely when he caught him.

McGuirk's Suicide Hall New York underworld dive

Few dives on New York's Bowery ever descended to the depths of McGuirk's Suicide Hall, the favorite haunt of the lowest female criminals and prostitutes around the turn of the 19th century.

Men were permitted in Suicide Hall, and if they were fortunate enough not to be drugged and robbed, they could very likely find sexual companionship for as little as a nickel. Gangsters low on their finances, however, were always welcomed as patrons and fawned over by women desperate to obtain a sponsor or protector. The place teemed with "lush workers" (women who robbed drunks), pickpockets, purse snatchers, burglars, panhandlers, beggars, drug addicts and female thieves of all descriptions.

The only real competition Suicide Hall faced for the patronage of these dregs of female humanity was Mother Woods' on Water Street. The two establishments often engaged in price wars and sought additional business by permitting almost any unwholesome activity on their premises. Suicide Hall won out, allowing McGuirk to make his famous boast that more women had killed themselves in his place than in any other house in the world. After seven years of existence, the establishment passed from the scene in 1902, a victim of constant police raids and better economic conditions, which reduced female criminality and generally destroyed the low Bowery dives. The Suicide Hall building later housed the Hadley Rescue Mission.

McGurn, Machine Gun Jack (1904–1936) hit man Machine Gun Jack McGurn was the kind of subject Hollywood embraced for its gangster movies of the 1930s. James De Mora was 19 when his father was murdered in Chicago's Little Italy. Legend has it that the son soaked his hands in his father's blood and vowed vengeance. He started practicing to take his revenge by shooting birds off telephone wires with a Daisy repeating rifle.

Meanwhile, he tried boxing, becoming a reasonably good welterweight, under the name of Jack McGurn. When it was apparent he didn't have the stuff of a top-notch fighter, McGurn's manager dropped him, and he went back to hunting his father's killers, whose identities were, in fact, hardly a dark secret. McGurn's father had been an alcohol cooker for the vicious Genna gang, which controlled illegal booze production in Little Italy. When he made the mistake of supplying alcohol to the competition, he was killed. Young McGurn could hardly expect to learn which Genna gunmen had done the job, so he decided to kill any and all Genna men. The best way to do that was to join the Capone outfit, which sooner or later would have to make war on the Gennas.

McGurn became one of Capone's most reliable hit men, exceedingly proficient with a machine gun, hence he was called Machine Gun McGurn. The police supposedly attributed 28 killings to McGurn, including about six of the Genna gang. In the hand of each of these, McGurn had placed a nickel to show his contempt for the dead men, lousy nickel-and-dimers. His devotion to killing for Capone knew no limits. He is said to have personally held the heads of Albert Anselmi, John Scalise and Hop Toad Guinta as Al Capone battered their brains out with an Indian club at a famous party thrown in their honor. He also is generally believed to have been one of the machine gunners and certainly one of the chief planners of the St. Valentine Day's Massacre. But charges against him had to be dropped when Louise Rolfe, a showgirl, insisted he had been with her at the time of the massacre, thus winning her fame as the Blonde Alibi. Later, the police were able to prove the story was false and charged McGurn with perjury, but he beat that rap by marrying Louise Rolfe, who, as his wife, could not be forced to testify against him.

McGurn was a great nightclub crawler. With the shoulders of his suit heavily padded and his hair pomaded, he did his best to look like Rudolph Valentino. He so prospered in his criminal endeavors that he soon owned a number of Loop nightclubs. One of his entertainers was a young comer named Joe E. Lewis, who eventually deserted him to work in a rival club. A week later, Lewis was waylaid by three of McGurn's men. Two of them pistol-whipped him while the third worked him over with a knife, carving up his face and slashing his throat and tongue. Somehow Lewis survived. He had to learn to talk all over again, and it was 10 years before he once more rose to the top of his profession.

After Al Capone was convicted of income tax evasion, McGurn went into a slow decline. By 1936 things had really gotten tough for him. He was being edged aside by other Capone gang members and his nightclubs had folded because of the Depression. On February 13, the eve of the anniversary of the St. Valentine's Day Massacre, McGurn was in a bowling alley with two other men when three gunmen entered. The trio drew their guns, as did the two men with McGurn. All five turned their weapons on him and opened fire. In his right hand they pressed a nickel, perhaps indicating McGurn's killing was an act of revenge for his earlier slayings of Genna gang members. On the other hand, the fact that the murder occurred on the night before the anniversary of the massacre may mean it was the work of Bugs Moran and remnants of the O'Banion gang. Then again, both touches could have been deliberately staged by the Capone mob to cover their tracks. In any event, neither the police nor the public seemed too concerned about who had been responsible.

McIntyre, Charles (1858–1874) lynch victim

Lynched at the age of 16, Charles McIntyre may have been one of the youngest labor union martyrs in the country's history, but he is little remembered, mainly because he didn't live long enough to accomplish much.

A native of Pennsylvania, McIntyre was working in the Nevada mines at 16. He was also making noise about the miners organizing into a union, and for that he earned the enmity of mining interests. On May 20, 1874 McIntyre was in the company of a friend, John Walker, who wounded a man named Sutherland in a gunfight. Although McIntyre had been hardly more than a disinterested spectator, he was placed in the Belmont, Nev. jail along with Walker. Eleven days after their arrest the pair broke jail and hid out in an abandoned mine shaft. They were found two days later, and about midnight of June 2 a mob stormed the jail and hanged McIntyre and Walker in their cell. The hangings, credited to the 301 Vigilante Movement, stand out as flimsy cases even for lynch justice. Walker's victim had not died and, of course, McIntyre had not killed or robbed anyone; in fact, he had done nothing worse than break out of jail, which was seldom regarded as a hanging offense. The miners speculated that McIntyre had brought on the vigilante action because of his organizing talk, but that speculation was done in whispers.

McKINNEY Touch

McKinney Touch sadistic trademark

A Western term that for the most part became extinct when the frontier tamed down, the McKinney Touch was named after James McKinney, who won fame from Leadville, Colo. to California's San Joaquin Valley as, for want of a better description, a mad buttocks mutilator.

Born in Illinois in 1861, McKinney is officially credited with killing his first man in Leadville. In a display of gratuitous sadism, he then shot off the nipples of his victim's girlfriend. Moving westward, he introduced the McKinney Touch when he deliberately decorated a can-can dancer's rump with bullet ridges. In California he whittled off a bit of a schoolteacher's ear and knifed two lawmen, the last offense earning him seven years in San Quentin. Within a short time after he got out, McKinney had refined his trademark to the point that folks started calling it the McKinney Touch. On December 13, 1901 McKinney shot and killed a man named Sears. When a lawman hearing the shooting bounded out of an outhouse gun in hand, McKinney sent him scurrying with two shots that grazed his rump. Amazingly, McKinney was held blameless in these shootings: it was ruled he had acted in self-defense when Sears tried to kill him and that he had taken due care not to maim the officer when he came at him without first ascertaining the facts.

That was the last time the McKinney Touch was considered a mere prank. After he killed a man named William Linn and wounded two lawmen, McKinney fled California with a posse hot on his heels. He crossed into Mexico but soon returned to California and killed two prospectors. The law knew the killings were McKinney's work because of where the two had been shot. Finally, on April 18, McKinney was cornered in a Chinese opium den in Bakersfield, Calif. City Marshal Jess Packard and five deputies stormed the den. When the smoke cleared, McKinney, Marshal Packard and Deputy Marshal William Tibbett, the father of Lawrence Tibbett, the future Metropolitan Opera star, lay dead.

McLowery brothers Clanton gang members and O.K. Corral gunfight victims

The McLowery, or McLaury, brothers were important members of the Clanton gang, which terrorized parts of Texas, the Arizona Territory and Mexico in the 1870s. Both ended up shot to death in the famed gunfight at Tombstone's O.K. Corral.

The elder brother, Frank, was as mean and vicious as Old Man Clanton and Curly Bill Brocius, taking particular delight in torturing to death Mexican mule pack drivers after the gang robbed them of their silver. Tom McLowery, the tamer of the pair, was never tied to any particular killings, although he joined the Clantons in many cattle-rustling operations.

In the gunfight at the O.K. Corral, the Earps concentrated most of their early firepower on Frank McLowery, since he was considered by far the most dangerous opponent. There has been much dispute over whether or not Tom McLowery was even armed when the shooting started, although somehow he did obtain a gun during the next 30 seconds. It is unclear whether he had a concealed weapon or whether a weapon was passed to him by a comrade. After the fatal shootings the McLowerys and Billy Clanton were laid out in caskets at the undertaker's under a large sign that read, "MURDERED IN THE STREETS OF TOMBSTONE."

McNelly, Leander H. (1844–1877) Texas Ranger

A sickly law officer who often had to direct his men from a wagon bed, Leander McNelly nonetheless was one of the most-fabled and fearless of the Texas Rangers.

A former captain in the Confederate Army during the Civil War, he later served in the Texas State Police. When the Texas Rangers were reorganized in 1874, he won command of the Special Battalion, which was charged with running down rustling rings and international smugglers and assigned whatever unusual missions came up. For this task McNelly recruited an unusually tough band of Rangers, who were willing "to follow him to hell and back if we can make it."

McNelly's assignments were, first, to cool the bitter Sutton-Taylor feud in De Witt County and then, to do battle with the American outlaws infesting the Nueces Strip near the Mexican border. In that area McNelly also faced the Mexican bandit army of Juan Cortina, which had plagued Texas for some 15 years.

In June 1875 Cortina's men stole a large herd of cattle from the King Ranch and headed for the safety of the border. McNelly and his men caught up with them, killed 12 of the rustlers and headed the cattle back north. Later on, determined to break Cortina's hold on the border, McNelly took 36 Rangers across the Rio Grande in an illegal invasion. The Rangers and Cortina's men fought several engagements, including one in which the Rangers routed a band of 300 Cortinastas. McNelly's daring raid was given credit for ending large-scale rustling sorties into Texas by Mexican outlaws.

McNelly then turned his attentions to other outlaws, but tuberculosis compelled him more and more to direct his troops from a wagon bed. In February 1877 he was forced to resign and he died on September 4 of that year.

McParland, James (1844–1919) undercover detective

Probably no private detective was more hated by the radical labor movement in America than Irish-born James McParland, who gained credit as the man who broke the secret labor society known as the Mollie Maguires.

McParland emigrated to the United States in 1863. After working as a coal company wagon driver, he joined the Pinkerton National Detective Agency in the early 1870s. After distinguishing himself in a number of cases, McParland was assigned to a case that eventually would bring him worldwide notoriety. The Pinkertons were hired by the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad to help crush a secret labor society known as the Mollie Maguires, which was terrorizing the railroad's coal fields. These agitators had taken the name of an earlier Irish land reform group called the Mollie Maguires.

Allan Pinkerton sent McParland into the anthracite-mining region of eastern Pennsylvania with orders that he infiltrate the Irish-Catholic community there. The undercover man gained membership in the fraternal Ancient Order of Hibernians, some of whose lodges in the area were under the control of the Mollies. He gained the confidence of the Mollie leadership and was able to make daily spy reports on their activities, which included sabotage against the coal operators and, occasionally, murder. In all, McParland was responsible for the conviction of more than 60 men, including Mollie chief John "Black Jack" Kehoe and 10 other of the 19 men who were hanged.

The hardest moment for McParland during a series of sensational trials in 1876–77 came when defense attorneys forced him to admit that he knew of planned murders and did nothing to prevent them, although he had ample time to do so. McParland's defense, which at least satisfied the antilabor forces, was that he feared he would have been assassinated if he had tried to prevent the killings. McParland was lionized in a number of contemporary books and other accounts of his exploits, and in later years the McParland legend was further enhanced by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, whose melodramatic The Valley of Fear, was based on the detective's work.

After the destruction of the Mollie Maguires, McParland became the head of the detective agency's Denver office. Following the turn of the century, he starred in his second world-famous labor case, which involved the prosecution of the labor leadership of the Western Federation of Miners and the Industrial Workers of the World. After the 1905 murder of Frank Steunenberg, ex-governor of Idaho, McParland uncovered two informer-assassins, Steve Adams and Harry Orchard, whose statements led to the arrest of union leaders William D. "Big Bill" Haywood, Charles H. Moyers and George A. Pettibone. Later, Adams withdrew a confession he had made involving the trio and insisted his false statements had been Pinkerton-inspired. Clarence Darrow, presenting the defense, made a shambles of the prosecution's case and Orchard's written confession, which included a number of inked corrections, many believed to be in McParland's hand. In the end, all the defendants were acquitted, and only Harry Orchard was condemned to death (his sentence was later commuted to life imprisonment).

Whatever excuses could be made for the loss of the case—and the Pinkertons and McParland had many—the fact remained that the Orchard-Haywood case could hardly be viewed as a great success. So of his two great labor cases McParland won one (the Mollie Maguires) and lost one (Orchard-Haywood). Sixty years later even that score had to be revised. In January 1979 John Kehoe was granted a full state pardon a century after his hanging, a sort of final determination that the Mollie Maguire leader had been subjected to a frame-up by detectives and spies in the employ of the mining company.

McPherson, Aimee Semple (1890–1944) evangelist and alleged kidnap victim

For a decade before 1926, Sister Aimee Semple McPherson was America's most successful, if controversial, female evangelist, billing herself the World's Most Pulchritudinous Evangelist, until a bizarre "kidnapping" started her career in decline.

Born near Ingersoll, Ontario, Sister Aimee married a Pentecostal evangelist, Robert Semple, with whom she served as a missionary in China. When he died, she returned to the United States and remarried. She left her second husband, Harold McPherson, in favor of a life of preaching that took her all over the United States, Canada, England and Australia. When she finally settled in Los Angeles, she was without funds but had a large, devoted following, which she organized into a religious movement called the International Church of the Four-Square Gospel. The church appealed especially to transplanted midwesterners and southerners who had difficulties coping with California life.

Raising $1.5 million from her devout followers, Sister Aimee built the huge Angelus Temple, where 5,000 of the fervent could attend her meetings, which featured faith healing, adult baptism by immersion, an aura of hope and Cecil B. DeMille-style spectacle. Sister Aimee would appear in a white silk gown, her hair adorned with flowers and colored lights dancing on her figure. A 50-piece band played patriotic songs and rousing religious music. Sister Aimee's lectures were broadcast live from the group's own radio station in the church. The sheer size of the operation required a weekly payroll of $7,000.

As well known as Sister Aimee was, she became even more famous in the spring of 1926, when she went to a lonely section of beach near Venice, Calif. and disappeared after being seen entering the water. Her mother, active in the temple, summoned the faithful and bade them to pray for her. "We know," she said, "she is with Jesus." Besides praying, the faithful kicked in $25,000 as a reward for anyone helping Sister Aimee to return. About 100 of her devoted followers hurled themselves into the waters where Sister Aimee had disappeared. One drowned and another died of exposure. A young girl became so distraught at the loss of her spiritual mentor that she committed suicide. A plane scattered lilies over Sister Aimee's watery departure spot.

Then, 32 days after her disappearance, Sister Aimee limped out of the desert near Douglas, Ariz., the victim of an alleged kidnapping. She said that while she was on the beach, her secretary having returned to a nearby hotel, she was kidnapped by a couple and a second man who said they wanted her to say prayers over a dying baby. Instead, they drugged her and imprisoned her in a hut in Mexico. They told her that if she didn't raise a half-million dollars in ransom, they would sell her to a Mexican white slaver. One of the men burned her with cigars when she would not answer all his questions. On June 22 the trio had gotten careless in their vigil and Sister Aimee was able to slip away, hiking for 13 hours across the desert to Douglas, Ariz.

While several of the faithful gathered outside the hospital, Sister Aimee showed burns on her fingers and assorted bruises and blisters she said she had gotten while tied up and during her long trek to freedom. The story did not sit too well with many, however. Her shoes and clothing didn't seem scuffed enough for such a hike across sun-baked sands, and some thought it odd that after such an ordeal Sister Aimee hadn't even asked for a drink of water.

Los Angeles District Attorney Asa Keyes investigated and was dubious, so dubious that in due course he indicted Sister Aimee and her mother for obstruction of justice because of their story of the "disappearance" and "kidnapping." Keyes produced evidence that while the evangelist's flock was praying for her return, the good Sister was trysting with the married radio operator of her temple, Kenneth G. Ormiston, at various hotels. At her trial Sister Aimee announced, "I am like a lamb led to slaughter," and she blamed her troubles on "the overlords of the underworld." Keyes ignored such comments and called to the stand a parade of hotel maids, house detectives and others who identified Sister Aimee as the woman who accompanied Ormiston on various stopovers while the nation puzzled over her disappearance.

Keyes also had flushed Ormiston out of hiding in Harrisburg, Pa. Previously, he had supposedly mailed an affidavit to Keyes admitting to the hotel trysts but insisting his companion was really "Miss X" whom he would not embarrass by identifying. The district attorney had been unimpressed by the paper since it bore a signature that closely resembled the hand of Sister Aimee. However, Keyes failed to call the radio operator to testify, and midway through the trial he suddenly moved for an acquittal. Keyes never explained why, but it is worth noting that in later years the district attorney himself went to prison for taking bribes in a number of strong cases that had been dropped or plea-bargained.

Officially cleared, Sister Aimee returned to her spiritual work, but the ardor had gone out of many of the faithful. She took to touring Europe and the Orient but never fully recaptured a style one historian described as fusing "economies and ecstasy, showmanship and salvation, carnival and contrition." Sister Aimee later had a short marriage with a radio man named Dave Hutton and then dropped from public view. In September 1944 she died in Oakland, Calif., apparently from an overdose of sleeping pills.

bootlegger and murderer

The transformation of Owney "The Killer" Madden from a vicious young thug, who was called "that little banty rooster out of hell," into a sleek, dapper sophisticate of crime was truly remarkable. During the early 1900s Madden was known as a heartless, mindless murderer. He killed his first victim at the age of 17 and had done in five by the time he reached 23. During the 1920s and 1930s he was one of the top bootleggers and gang leaders in New York, a debonair character who was still capable of murder—but with a certain flair.

Owney came to New York from his native Liverpool, England when he was 11 and soon enrolled in one of the major gangs of the day, the Gophers. He ran up a total of 44 arrests in his youthful escapades without ever doing any time in prison. In the process he became accomplished with a slung shot, a blackjack, brass knuckles and his favorite weapon, a piece of lead pipe wrapped in a newspaper. Because of his callousness and daring, Madden quickly gained the nickname the Killer and advanced to the leadership of the gang. In that exalted position he raked in an estimated $200 a day for the robberies, labor beatings, killings and inter-gang attacks he planned. By the time he was 20, he was receiving extortion money from scores of merchants eager to pay “bomb insurance” to avoid having their storefronts blown out.

The police charged but couldn't prove that Madden had killed his first man, an Italian, for no other reason but to celebrate his rise to power in the Gophers. Some of his homicides, on the other hand, resulted from affairs of the heart. When he learned in 1910 that an innocuous clerk named William Henshaw had asked one of his girls for a date, Madden followed him onto a trolley car at Ninth Avenue and West 16th Street and shot him in front of a dozen other passengers. Before departing the trolley, he paused to toll the bell for his victim. Henshaw lived long enough to identify Madden, who was captured after a chase across several roof tops in Hell's Kitchen. He was not convicted of the murder, however, since all the witnesses thought it wise to vanish.

In November 1912 a youthful Owney the Killer almost had his career cut short during a confrontation in a dance hall with 11 gunmen from the rival Hudson Dusters. When he tried to outdraw and outshoot the bunch of them, he ended up with five bullets in his body. Rushed to the hospital, Madden refused to tell the police who had shot him. “It's nobody's business but mine,” he said.

By the time he got out of the hospital, his men had knocked off six of his assailants. However, Owney the Killer had other pressing problems to deal with. Little Patsy Doyle had moved to take over the Gophers, spreading the false word that Owney was crippled for life. Little Patsy was motivated by more than blind ambition; the Killer had appropriated his woman, Freda Horner, and made Patsy a laughingstock. Little Patsy played tough, shooting up a number of Madden loyalists. In due course, Owney ended Little Patsy's bid for power and his entire insurrection by filling him with bullets. For this offense Madden was imprisoned in Sing Sing from 1915 to 1923.

By the time Owney the Killer got out of prison, he had undergone a sort of metamorphosis. He had attained a measure of finesse and respectability. Owney went into rumrunning and into the coal and laundry rackets, proving such a dependable crook that Tammany's Jimmy Hines stood behind him. Owney the Killer moved in the top criminal circles with such ascending powers of the 1920s as Lucky Luciano, Dutch Schultz, Frank Costello, Waxey Gordon, Longy Zwillman, Louis Lepke and the Bug and Meyer team of Bugsy Siegel and Meyer Lansky. Despite his rise in status, Madden had not lost his instinct for violence. When Mad Dog Coll was running around Manhattan kidnapping and murdering top criminals, it was Owney who kept him talking on the telephone one day until gunmen arrived to cut off the Mad Dog's connection.

In the 1930s Madden moved into the world of sports, promoting the dimwitted Primo Carnera into the heavyweight boxing championship. Carnera ended up stone broke, but Madden was said to have made a million, taking a 100 percent cut of the Italian fighter's earnings.

Owney was picked up in 1932 for a parole violation, but after a short stay in prison he was back on the town. The police kept the heat on him with all sorts of minor arrests until in the mid-1930s he decided to retire. If 20 years earlier a veteran cop had been asked what young punk would most assuredly end up on a slab in the morgue, more than likely he would have picked Owney the Killer. Instead, Madden retired to the good life in Hot Springs, Ark., a famous underworld “cooling-off” spot where his protection by the local law was to become legendary. The local cops performed heroic work keeping him from being annoyed by pesky journalists. If they didn't, Owney warned them, he would have them transferred and broken. By the time he died in 1964, Owney the Killer had almost achieved the stature of a southern gentleman.

A Dane who led a truly adventurous life, Deputy Marshal Chris Madsen became one of the West's legendary peace officers as one of the Oklahoma Territory's famed Three Guardsmen, along with Heck Thomas and Bill Tilghman.

Madsen was a far more honest and productive lawman than the likes of Wild Bill Hickok or Wyatt Earp. Born in Denmark in 1851, red-haired, cherubic-faced

MAFIA

Madsen served in the Danish army, fought with the forces of Italian rebel Garibaldi and for the French Foreign Legion before the lure of gold brought him to America in the 1870s. He joined the 5th Cavalry and took part in a number of Indian campaigns before pinning on a nickel-plated deputy's star in the Oklahoma Territory.

As a law officer in what was called the worst badlands in America, Madsen became the scourge of rustlers, whiskey peddlers, thieves, train robbers and murderers. Either by himself or working with others, he played a key role in rounding up members of the Dalton gang, killers Kid Lewis and Foster Crawford and train robber Henry Silva. In the campaign against the Doolin gang, the three Guardsmen were each assigned a portion of Bill Doolin's known territory and given the task of cleaning it up. Madsen got much of the credit for running down and killing two of Doolin's worst toughs, Tulsa Jack Blake and Red Buck Waightman.

In 1898 Madsen resigned his post to join Teddy Roosevelt's Rough Riders. Although he contracted yellow fever in Cuba, he was able to resume his law enforcement career after the war until 1907, when Oklahoma became a state. Afterward, he settled in Guthrie, Okla., and lived to the ripe old age of 92. He died on January 9, 1944 as the result of a fall, a far more peaceful end than many of his friends and enemies experienced.

Mafia

Referred to by several names, the Mafia first became known to American officials in New Orleans during the 1880s, when some mafiosi murdered the city's chief of police. The society had been founded in Italy some six centuries earlier to fight the oppression of the French Angevins. Its slogan then was Morte alla Francia Italia anela! ("Death to the French is Italy's cry!") The word "Mafia" was taken from the first letters of each word of the slogan. The Mafia turned to crime in the 19th century, sometimes victimizing wealthy landowners but more often hiring out to them as oppressors of the peasants. The society spread to the rest of Italy and, to a lesser extent, to other European countries. Its arrival in the United States came in two great waves, the first during the last two decades of the 19th century and the other in the 1920s, after Benito Mussolini declared war on the Mafia and forced hundreds of criminals to flee the country.

The first known Mafia victim in America was a Neapolitan named Vincenzo Ottumvo, who was killed in New Orleans while playing cards on January 24, 1889. He was the victim of Sicilian gangsters in what was the opening of a bloody war between Neapolitans and Sicilians for control of the New Orleans waterfront. When the police—or at least some of the top brass—seemed to be favoring the Neapolitan element, the city's police chief, David Hennessey, was ambushed and shot-gunned to death in 1890. A grand jury considered the evidence in the case and found that "the existence of a secret organization known as the Mafia has been established beyond doubt."

Nineteen Sicilians were indicted for conspiring to murder Hennessey. However, a Mafia reign of terror silenced most of the 60 witnesses scheduled to testify at the trial, with the result that none of the accused was found guilty. After the trial the defendants were returned to their cells awaiting final disposition of their cases.

Public outrage, fueled by anti-Italian feelings in general, mounted to fever pitch. Headed by 60 of New Orleans' most prominent citizens, mass protests were held, and finally a mob of several thousand marched on the parish prison and killed 11 of the defendants. Newspapers headlined the "Destruction of the Mafia," a somewhat overly optimistic statement. Part of the Mafia simply went underground for a time while other important elements moved on to different cities, establishing "beachheads" in a number of southern cities and as far north as St. Louis. Still others moved to New York. The Mafia was neither destroyed nor contained by the bloody events in New Orleans.

In city after city the police proved incapable of stopping Mafia gangsters, in part from pure ignorance, if not indifference, to most matters Italian. A few urban police forces organized Italian squads to oversee the sprouting Little Italy sections, but even these units made only limited headway because of the attitude of the Italian immigrants toward police, whose help they shunned. In the old country the police were ineffective against the Mafia. Could the American police be any better? Thus the Mafia was able to grow.

Many mafiosi became Black Hand extortionists, threatening death to those who would not pay for protection. Others committed various forms of robbery and mayhem—most always against Italian victims, especially newly arrived immigrants. The son of an immigrant-criminal once explained this propensity:

Can you imagine my father going uptown to commit a robbery or a mugging? He would have had to take an interpreter with him to read the street signs and say 'stick 'em up' for him. The only time he ever committed a crime outside Mulberry Street was when he went over to the Irish section to steal some milk so my mother could heat it up and put it in my kid brother's ear to stop an earache.

As early as the first decade of the 20th century, the U.S. government began trying to deport Mafia criminals. Lt. Joseph Petrosino of the New York Police Department's Italian Squad did considerable work along these lines until he was murdered by gangsters in Italy in 1909.

In New York City the Manhattan Mafia fought a bloody war in 1916–19 with the Brooklyn Camorra, the main Neapolitan underworld organization. Under the leadership of Don Pelligrino Morano, the camorristi controlled most of the Brooklyn waterfront rackets and extracted protection money from Italian businessmen, including storekeepers and ice and coal dealers. Mafia gangsters ran similar extortion rackets in Manhattan, chiefly in the Greenwich Village and East Harlem areas. Whenever either side made a move into the other's territory, the killing would start.

The leader of the Manhattan Mafia, Nicholas Morello, thought it was foolish for the two sides to carry on their bloody Old World rivalry, and when Morano suggested a peace conference, Morello agreed. It was held in a cafe on Brooklyn's Navy Street. Morello was still suspicious of Morano and thus showed up with just a bodyguard and not his top lieutenants, on the assumption that their absence would frustrate an assassination plot. Although Morano was disappointed when he saw Morello's top guns were missing, he nonetheless had a five-man execution squad cut the pair down after pledging eternal peace.

Morano's strategy backfired. In this case witnesses actually talked. Several camorristi went to the electric chair and Morano was sentenced to life imprisonment. After the gang leader's trial the Brooklyn Eagle reported: "Morano was surrounded by a dozen Italians who showered kisses on his face and forehead. On the way to the jail other Italians braved the guard and kissed Morano's hands, cheeks and forehead."

The war continued, but without Morano's cunning leadership, camorristi were murdered by the dozens. By 1920 many of the gang's surviving members gave up the struggle and even joined various Mafia outfits. In a sense, the 1920s was the heyday of the old Mafia, but already new problems were arising. The aging leaders of the Mafia continued to follow the society's old-fashioned customs. Fundamentally, this meant limiting their activities to exploiting Italians. Young Mafia members saw that the gravy lay in broadening the base of criminal activity and forming alliances with other ethnic gangster groups, mostly with the still potent Irish gangs and the great Jewish gangs of the 1920s.

The last of the big-time "Mustache Petes" were Giuseppe "Joe the Boss" Masseria and Salvatore Maranzano, who sought to eliminate Joe the Boss in order to establish himself as the "boss of bosses" of the Mafia. Maranzano fought a bitter war against Masseria, which he won in 1931, when underlings of Joe the Boss, led by Lucky Luciano, murdered their leader and made peace. The peace lasted only a few months until Luciano, working in cooperation with non-Italian gangsters, mainly Meyer Lansky, successfully directed the liquidation of Maranzano. Luciano and Lansky then brought together various criminal elements—Italian and non-Italian—from around the country and formed the national crime syndicate.

The fall of the last "Mustache Petes" could be regarded as the end of the old Mafia and the establishment of the new one, which reached new levels of wealth as the most dominant force within the national crime syndicate. In the next few decades the Mafia prospered as never before, meeting little opposition on the federal level. For years FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover denied the existence of the Mafia, claiming that it was a mere figment of the imagination of crime writers. In a sense, informer Joe Valachi got Hoover off the hook by referring to the new Mafia as Cosa Nostra, "Our Thing." Hoover readily conceded there was a Cosa Nostra, neglecting to explain why he had failed to note that point all the years he had insisted there was no Mafia.

Today, the Mafia has some 5,000 men, just as it had during the time Hoover was saying it didn't exist, belonging to 24 separate organizations, or "crime families," located in major cities around the country. New York City has five families, which generally function independently of each other and in relative peace, except when the leader of one family attempts to enlarge his territory at another family's expense or even tries to take control of all five families, as the late Carmine Galante did in 1979. As a result of his efforts, Galante was shot dead by hit men in the garden of a Brooklyn restaurant before the last course of his meal.

By the late 1960s a third great wave of mafiosi had begun to arrive from the old country, this one fostered by the crime bosses in America, who had come to realize that a new infusion of toughness was needed to keep the Mafia going. Too many second- and third-generation Italians were proving incapable of serving as soldiers. Crime family head Joseph Bonanno (Joe Bananas) was particularly irate on two occasions when soldiers begged off assignments because they had promised to spend the evening with their wives. As more and more aliens were imported to staff Mafia operations in the 1970s, police were forced to admit they were losing touch with mob operations.

Then came the great crackdown that shifted into full gear after the death of J. Edgar Hoover and his earlier pronouncements that there was no Mafia. Throughout the 1980s mafiosi in New England, New Jersey, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Kansas City, Cleveland and many other localities were jailed on a scale never before witnessed. In 1992 the government claimed that the power of the Mafia was finally broken with the conviction of John Gotti, the head of the Gambino family. It had taken prosecutors four tries to convict Gotti, but the fact was that at age 52, the crime boss would never see freedom again. With his victory, U.S. Attorney Andrew J. Maloney declared the death knell to have sounded for organized crime.

This, however, was an old saw repeated since the crime-buster days of Tom Dewey in New York and the imprisonment of Al Capone in 1931. Five years later the fall of Lucky Luciano and the destruction of Murder, Inc. elicited the some sort of remarks, as did the exposures and mass jailings that followed the Kefauver crime committee, and the disclosures of mob informer Joe Valachi a decade later. Yet the mob continued to thrive. Would it again?

Following in the wake of the first criminal gangs to appear in America were "junior contingents," youth gangs, such as the Little Dead Rabbits and the Little Forty Thieves, whose members eagerly awaited the opportunity to move up to the "big boys." Oddly, the great gang of today, the Mafia, no longer seems to have this abundant pool of youthful reserves.

As late as the early 1960s, the newspapers still wrote feature stories about a "Mafia, Jr.," comprised of youngsters schooled by the mob to step into the rackets. Indeed, there had been a Mafia youth auxiliary from virtually the beginning of the century. Mafia leaders of the 1930s, such as Lucky Luciano, Frank Costello, Al Capone, and Joe Adonis, had been weaned in the old Five Points Gang. There were always juvenile toughs eager to do gangsters' bidding in the hopes of stepping up. The mob leaders actively searched out such young talent.

A case in point was Harry "Pittsburgh Phil" Strauss. The word got around about him when he was a 16-year-old student at Brooklyn's Jefferson High School in New York City. Jefferson was scheduled to play an important basketball game in the Bronx against James Monroe High School, which had a star player named Hank Greenberg, destined to become one of the top baseball players of all time. Strauss went to the Bronx with the bright idea of perhaps knifing Greenberg so he wouldn't be able to play. Although he wasn't able to pull off the assault, young Harry became the talk of the Brownsville section of Brooklyn. The story reached Louis Capone, Louis Lepke's righthand man in Brooklyn, who related it to his boss. Lepke mentioned the story to Albert Anastasia, and everyone got a big laugh out of it. The word came back to Capone to "keep your eye on that kid. We might be able to use him." Strauss eventually became the star killer of Murder, Inc.

For years the New York Mafia could recruit all the eager punks it needed from Bensonhurst, Brownsville and the Bath Beach districts of Brooklyn, drawing most of its new blood, quite naturally, from the Italian population and, by necessity, from the Jewish population as well. By the 1960s all this had changed. Mafia leaders were bewailing the fact that the native-born youths were not good enough to keep the crime families functioning and that the organization was hurting. By 1971 some two-thirds of the 5,000 Mafia members identified in the McClellan Committee reports less than a decade before were in jail, facing trial or dead. The youthful hoods put in charge of Mafia operations were proving totally inept. Crime boss Carlo Gambino complained that most of the young Italian-American criminals seemed primarily interested in moving to the suburbs.

The Mafia was forced to go back to Sicily for new recruits, picking up youths who still believed in the old Mafia traditions and who could and would follow orders. Some 300 young Sicilians were smuggled into New York via South America, while a much larger number came in from Montreal via a pipeline run by the Cotroni gang.

However, if today's Mafia, Jr. speaks more Scidgie, the Sicilian dialect, than English, it is as much the fault of the crime elders as it is of the easy life. Contrary to popular belief, nepotism is virtually nonexistent in the Mafia. The dream of virtually every mob parent is that his children will become lawyers, doctors or legitimate businessmen; few will allow their offspring to mix in Mafia matters. There are of course the exceptions, like Bill Bonanno, the son of Joe Bananas, and Tony Zerilli, the son of Detroit boss Joe Zerilli.

And sometimes there are subterfuges involved. Carlo Gambino set his two sons up in what he said was a legitimate trucking business. He also said he would see to it that their legs were broken if they got into illegal activities. So the boys went into the garment district. Now, who ever would think Mafia progeny would go into that area for anything but lawful purposes? Only the law was an exception, and the Gambino brothers were smacked down.

Mafia, New Orleans mass execution of

While it is difficult to determine with certainty, the first significant appearance of the Mafia in America seems to have been in New Orleans during the late 1800s. Between 1888 and 1890 the New Orleans Mafia achieved so much power that its members were able to terrorize much of the city, committing an estimated 40 murders without serious opposition. During this period Antonio and Carlo Matranga, two top Honored Society members from Palermo, Sicily took control of the Mississippi River docks. Tribute had to be paid to them before a freighter could be unloaded. However, the Matranga operations were challenged by the Provenzano brothers, leaders of another Mafia group.

War broke out between the two groups and killings along the docks became a regular occurrence. The police appeared unable to stop the slaughter until flamboyant Chief of Police David Peter Hennessey personally took charge and launched an investigation. Soon, the Matrangas found themselves pressured everywhere by the police while the Provenzanos were left relatively unbothered, raising some question about the fairness of Hennessey’s investigation. The Matrangas sent warnings to the chief to lay off. When that tactic failed, they tried to bribe Hennessey. The police leader rejected the offer, convincing the Matrangas that the Provenzanos had offered him more and that Hennessey was determined to have a piece of the riverfront rackets for himself.

At this stage the Mafia in America had no real understanding of what they could get away with and what they couldn’t. Back in Sicily they had killed their enemies, each other and any government official who had dared to interfere. They resolved to do the same to an American police chief if it became necessary.

Ironically, Hennessey’s fatal provocation occurred when police conducting a routine murder investigation charged two Provenzano brothers with involvement in the killing of a Matranga gangster whose head had been cut off and stuffed in a fireplace. Seeing a great opportunity to eliminate their hated rivals, the Matrangas hired some of the leading lawyers of the city to aid the prosecution. Then Chief Hennessey interfered. He announced to the press that he had uncovered the existence of a criminal society known as the Mafia in the city and said he planned to introduce his evidence at the Provenzanos’ trial. On October 15, 1890 Hennessey left the Central Police Station and started for his home. He was cut down by a shotgun blast a half block from his house. Hennessey managed to get off a few shots at several of his assailants as they fled. When asked who had shot him, he whispered, “Dagoes,” collapsed and died.

Hennessey was an enormously popular official despite his flamboyance—or because of it—and his murder outraged the city. A grand jury was convened and announced that “the existence of a secret organization known as the Mafia has been established beyond doubt.” Nineteen members of the Mafia were indicted as principals and conspirators in the police chief’s murder, but their trial proved to be an affront to any concept of justice. A large number of the 60 potential witnesses were intimidated, threatened or bribed and several members of the jury were later found to have taken bribes as well. Despite overwhelming evidence against at least 11 of the defendants, all but three were acquitted, and the jury could not reach a verdict on these three.

All the defendants were returned to the parish prison to await final disposition of their case and release. The Mafia organized victory parades and celebrations in the Italian section, but there was a cry of public outrage and protest meetings in other parts of the city. Two days after the verdicts, a mob, several thousand strong, headed by 60 leading citizens, marched on the jail. They had a death list composed of the 11 defendants against whom the evidence had been the strongest; yet the mob was under instructions not to touch those defendants, including the Matranga brothers, against whom the legal case had been weakest. Two of the mafiosi were dragged out to the street and hanged from lampposts. Seven others were executed by firing squads in the yard of the women's section of the prison, and two others were riddled with bullets as they hid in a doghouse built for the jail's guard dog. The lynch mob contained a large number of outraged blacks, making it perhaps the most unusual lynching ever to take place in the South. While some newspapers denounced the hangings, the citizens of New Orleans were, on the whole, rather proud of their accomplishment and a new song by a popular poet named Fred Bessel became a best-seller. Entitled "Hennessey Avenged!" the song started:

*Chief Hennessey now will lay at rest, his soul will be at ease,
It would be useless without their lives his spirit to appease,
They have killed and robbed among themselves, that all of us do know,
They cannot do it among us, for our power we now do show. . . .*

It concluded:

*Great praise is due those gentlemen whom we all do know,
Who called upon the citizens for them their power to show.
No more assassins we will have sent from a foreign soil,
In New Orleans we've proved to all we're honest sons of toil.*

In an interview with the St. Louis Globe Democrat, Mayor Joseph Shakespeare declared: "I do consider that the act was—however deplorable—a necessity and justifiable. The Italians had taken the law into their own hands and we had to do the same." Resolutions endorsing the lynchings were adopted by the Sugar Exchange, the Cotton Exchange, the Stock Exchange, the Mechanics', Lumbermen's and Dealers' Exchange and the Board of Trade.

For a time the lynchings threatened international complications. Italy recalled its ambassador, severed diplomatic relations with the United States and demanded reparations and punishment for the lynchings. Eventually, the matter was settled when Washington agreed to pay $25,000 to the dead men's relatives in Italy.

Meanwhile, newspapers announced, "The Mafia Exterminated." The report was a bit exaggerated, although it took some two decades before the New Orleans Mafia regained full strength.

Mafia at the turn of the century

If the Mafia was regarded to be in its death throes in 1992, the death rattle continued in December 1997 when Vinnie "The Chin" Gigante, the head of the Genovese crime family, the only group larger than the Gambinos, was also tucked away behind bars for a long period, perhaps the equivalent of a life sentence.

However, the following month, given the claims of prosecutors that the Gambino family was finished, it was something of a surprise when John Gotti Jr. was seized along with 39 others in what was alleged to be a massive strike at the Gambino family.

The New York Times observed, "Although prosecutors portrayed the indictments as a triumphant blow to organized crime, the allegations also testified to the resiliency of the Mafia, which despite repeated indictments has been able to continue its hold on lucrative ventures and enter into new ones, like telecommunications fraud." Even the triumphant Mary Jo White, the U.S. attorney for Manhattan, noted, "What this case graphically shows is the power, profit and reach of the Gambino crime family in business and industries, both legitimate and illegitimate, throughout the metropolitan New York area."

Clearly, the families were still around even though they had lost considerable clout and power in the fish and construction industries and to a lesser but growing extent in trash-hauling and the garment industry. Officials essentially conceded that even as the Mafia loses ground in some areas, it gains ground in others. Certain old reliables as loan-sharking, chop-shop rings and gambling were still there. A new crop of mobsters, however, were focusing on lucrative white-collar crimes, such as stock swindles, the sale of fake prepaid telephone cards, and medical-insurance frauds. According to Lewis D. Schiliro, the head of the FBI's New York office, "The families are in transition, trying to figure out how to redirect their criminal activities in a new environment."

While it may be said, quite logically, that John Gotti bossed the Gambinos down in power, other families have thrived. That was certainly true of the Bonanno family, which had fallen into disrepute among mafiosi. They had been deeply involved in drug trafficking and fought numerous brutal turf wars among themselves for internal rackets and spots in the mob power structure. But under boss Joseph Massino, the family made a remarkable comeback with well over 100 active members and no top leaders in prison or even under indictment. Massino could be said to have been a Gotti protegee—and according to some a "smarter John Gotti." By 1998 the family had gained so much strength that they were close to rivaling the Gambinos as the second most powerful crime group in the East. With 100 made men and another 1,000 "associates" clearly Massino was the boss of a powerful organization. Of course, the law shifted major attention to the Bonannos, but it remained obvious that the family's growing strength was additional testimony to organized crime's resilience.

It was to be expected that the law would continue to harass the mobs and imprison deserving criminals, and RICO (the 1970 Racketeer-Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act) would roadmap the way to king-sized sentences. And confiscation of mob profits would continue, but perhaps to an underwhelming extent. As many wise guys noted, there were more riches where the previous came from.

Still, despite all the arrested and imprisoned, the two biggest families, the Genoveses and the Gambinos, still had, it was estimated, hundreds of made men, virtually all of them millionaires. Despite claims to the contrary, there has never been a period when the Mafia didn't have more applicants than needed. Ironically, it has been argued that prosecutions of leading mafiosi provide the lifeblood of the organization because they create golden chances for advancement. There remained a constant need for a new boss, a new underboss, new capos, new soldiers every time there was a top-level conviction or erasure.

How fast can these replacements be found? Gotti from his prison was videotaped in family conversations with visitors as being amazed how fast newcomers had arrived. He said he had never heard of his son's codefendants. "Where did these people come from? I'm not away for 100 years! I'm only away seven years! Where did these people come from?"

On one level the answer could be that "crime marches on." On a real basis it could indicate that prosecutions cannot eliminate the mob, not when there are millions of illicit dollars to be made daily. The most educated guess could be that organized crime remains with us and will continue to be a growth industry in the 21st century.

Mafia families

Any discussion of the Mafia in America soon boils down to the question of whether or not there is a "boss of bosses." There does not appear to be, and such discussions often beg the more serious question as to who is the acknowledged boss of each of the various crime families around the country.

In New York City the authorities label the five local families by the names of their long-ago or more recent leaders, even though they may now be dead. A discussion of the current leaderships often entails getting into a morass of partial or inaccurate information and guesswork. Thus, it is generally said that the five crime families in New York are the Genovese (né Luciano) family, the Gambino (né Anastasia) family, the Profaci family, the Bonanno family and the Lucchese (né Gagliano) family.

In other localities there tends to be just one Mafia family in operation and it is easier to identify the boss. In 1978 the FBI's list of crime leaders, subject to attrition through assassination, retirement and death due to old age or other ailments (heart disease is definitely a peril of the profession) included:

Baltimore: Frank Corbi

Binghampton, N.Y.: Anthony Frank Guarnieri

Boston: Raymond Patriarca, also believed to control all of New England

Buffalo: Joseph Angelo Tieri

Chicago: Anthony Accardo (retiring); Joe Aiuppa (in charge)

Cleveland: James Licavoli

Denver: Clarence M. Smaldone

Detroit: Anthony Zerilli

Kansas City: Joseph N. Civillo (in prison); Carlo De Luna and Carlo Civillo (contending)

Las Vegas: Tony Spilotro

Los Angeles: Louis Dragna

Milwaukee: Frank Balistrieri

New Orleans: Carlo Marcello

Niagara Falls, N.Y.: Benjamin Nicoletti

Philadelphia: Angelo Bruno

Pittsburgh: Sebastian La Rocca

Rochester, N.Y.: Sam J. Russotti

Rockford, Ill.: Joseph Zammuto

St. Louis: James Giammanco

San Francisco: Anthony Lima

Syracuse, N.Y.: Joseph Falcone

In addition, Miami and Atlantic City are considered “open cities,” with many forces active. In Miami the Genovese and Gambino families are prominent. In Atlantic City the Gambino and Bruno families are active.

Mafia gun

The date of the first appearance of the Mafia in this country was not fixed by identification of any specific individuals but rather by the appearance of a typically Italian shotgun, which became known to the New Orleans police as the “Mafia gun.” It was first used in 1869 by what the New Orleans Times called a group of “notorious Sicilian murderers, counterfeiters and burglars, who, in the last month, have formed a sort of general co-partnership or stock company for the plunder and disturbance of the city.” This “co-partnership” consisted of four Italian mafiosi who had been driven out of Palermo by the Sicilian police. They came to New Orleans and established a Mafia branch after a savage war against a number of gangsters from Messina who were trying to organize crime in the Delta city.

The war was won by a number of efficient assassinations committed with a unique shotgun, one with the barrels sawed off to about 18 inches and the stock sawed through and hollowed out very near the trigger. The stock was then fitted with hinges, so that the gun resembled a jackknife, and was carried inside a coat hanging on a hook. It had a certain, if messy, fatal effect up to a distance of 30 yards.

As the executions with the weapon continued and the authorities learned more about the Sicilian version of the Mafia, the weapon was christened the Mafia gun. Because a slaying with such a gun was instantly labeled a Mafia job, the organization in time greatly reduced its reliance on the weapon in favor of more American murder techniques.

The motive for the killing of Lloyd Magruder was a common one, greed. But the murder case was to become famed in the literature of psychic happenings, since the crime could be said to have been solved as the result of a dream.

Magruder was a mule train operator who traveled the Montana-Idaho gold camps in the early 1860s. His closest friend was Hill Beachy, a lifelong acquaintance who ran a hotel, the Luna House, in Lewiston, Idaho Territory. In October 1863 Magruder set out back through the Bitterroot Mountains to pick up a new load of gold. His party consisted of five muleteers, including a man named Bill Page; three guards, David Howard, Chris Lowery and James Romaine; and two prospectors. As the party crawled into their sleeping bags one night, the three guards killed Magruder, the two prospectors and four of the teamsters—all except Bill Page. Page was not part of the murder plot, but the three killers decided they needed someone to lead them through the snow-driven passes.

Bad weather forced them, against their plan, to come into Lewiston. There, they ran into Hill Beachy, who looked at them with amazement. Several nights earlier, Beachy had had a horrifying dream that some men had killed Magruder out on the trail. The men who had just come into town looked like the killers in the dream. Of course, Beachy felt silly; he had no proof that Magruder was even dead and could hardly go to the law with a demand that the men be held. So, he watched them leave Lewiston.

A few days later, someone found a few of Magruder’s pack animals shot to death. They also discovered Magruder’s six-gun and some other personal effects. Beachy was now convinced the men he’d seen were Magruder’s killers, since they had ridden into town from the same direction Magruder would have been traveling. Even if they had not seen Magruder, they should have at least noticed the dead pack animals. Getting himself deputized, Beachy swore out warrants for the arrest of the four men and tracked them through Washington Territory, Oregon and into California, where he finally caught up with them and brought them back to Idaho. He coaxed Page into testifying against the other three. Page was given his freedom, but on March 4, 1864 the rest were hanged in a ravine outside Lewiston before a crowd of 10,000, most of whom wanted to see the outcome of the “dream murder.”

Much was made of the psychic import of Hill Beachy’s dream. Yet the area around where the killings had occurred was violent country, rife with murders; e.g., one band of holdup men committed over 100 murders there in less than a year. Given those grim circumstances, nightmares like Hill Beachy's must have been common enough occurrences.

Mahaney, Jack (1844–?) thief and great escape artist

One of the most colorful and famous American criminals in the 19th century, Jack Mahaney was called the American Jack Sheppard because of his constant and daring escapes from captivity. Twice he was locked up in Sing Sing and twice he escaped. He also escaped from New York City's Tombs Prison on two occasions and broke out of several other Eastern prisons. Several times he leaped from speeding trains and somehow avoided what seemed certain death without even suffering serious injury. His numerous exploits made him one of the regulars to grace the illustrated covers of the National Police Gazette.

Born to a wealthy family in New York in 1844, he was sent to boarding school at the age of 10, where he was an "undisciplined terror" despite numerous floggings. Jack ran away from the boarding school and joined up with a gang of notorious young dock rats. Caught by the police, he was sent to the House of Refuge and promptly made his first escape from incarceration, taking a dozen youths with him.

Eventually, Mahaney came in contact with Italian Dave, an infamous Five Points Fagin who gave him a liberal education in crime. In a rickety tenement on Paradise Square, Italian Dave ran his own boarding school for some 40 youths, instructing them in the art of sneak thievery. The boys, aged nine to 15, learned how to pick pockets with the aid of fully dressed dummies. Italian Dave quickly came to regard young Mahaney as his prime pupil and allowed him privileges extended to no other youth. Mahaney was permitted to accompany Italian Dave on his more important jobs. On other occasions they would walk the streets together and young Jack was given the opportunity to pick out a logical mugging victim. If the master approved, they would fall on the unfortunate pedestrian, rob him and adjourn back to Paradise Square.

Young Jack soon tired of working with Italian Dave because of the latter's unwillingness to share the loot, and he severed connections with the Fagin. Italian Dave was supposedly shattered by the loss of his protege and tried to win Mahaney back by offering him 10 percent of all future earnings, a truly magnanimous gesture, at least by Dave's standards. However, Jack Mahaney was ready for bigger and better things, first organizing his own gang of butcher cart thieves and then becoming an accomplished burglar and all-around crook. It was in this period that he achieved his fame as a great escaper, becoming a hero to the urchins of the New York slums. In later years, Mahaney joined a group of confidence men and appears to have adopted a number of aliases, so that his subsequent exploits are shrouded in mystery.

One of the most willful and vicious crimes, maiming has a long history in America. The early Irish gangs of the 1820s were notorious for not only robbing Englishmen but cutting off their ears or noses as well. If the gang members were in a more bestial mood, they might blind the victim or cut out his tongue. Eye gouging became an art form in the underworld and many criminals carried special devices to pluck out eyes with studied efficiency. The Whyos, a New York gang of the late 19th century, hired out for maiming jobs as well as murder. For a trifling $15 a client could arrange to have an enemy's "ear chawed off," certainly an economic alternative to the staggering $100 fee for "doing the big job," murder.

Black Hand extortionists in big-city Italian communities seldom killed the first time a blackmail victim refused to pay. Instead, they would chop off one of the victim's fingers or the finger of a relative of his. Organized crime long used maiming as a "convincer." In his youth, Tony Accardo, a Chicago crime boss, was nicknamed Joe Batters for his proficiency with a baseball bat, one of the favorite arguments used during the Prohibition era to sell mob beer and liquor. The Green Ones, the Mafia branch in Kansas City during Prohibition, were dedicated bat maimers, even working over victims with clubs after they had been shot dead.

Entertainer Joe E. Lewis was the victim of an underworld maiming when he switched from one Prohibition nightclub to another. The offended owner of the club he left, Machine Gun Jack McGurn, demanded he return; when he refused, three of McGurn's men burst into Lewis' hotel room and pistol-whipped him. One of them drove a knife into his jaw and then forced it upward along his face to his ear. Lewis was stabbed a dozen times, his throat and tongue severely gashed. For many months the comedian could barely speak at all and the pummeling administered to his head left him unable to recognize words. Through an incredibly determined effort Lewis learned how to talk and sing again, although it took him 10 years to regain his top form.

Labor columnist Victor Riesel was blinded with acid in 1956 on the orders of gangster Johnny Dio, who at the time was seeking to curry favor with Teamster leader Jimmy Hoffa. The acid thrower was identified as Abraham Telvi, but he never got a chance to admit anything. He was found lying on a street in New York City's Lower East Side with a bullet hole in the back of his skull.

MAISON Coquet

Just as some gangsters become accomplished hit men, others become specialists at delivering beatings that leave the victim maimed but still alive. There have even been cases of such underworld maimers losing their fee because the victim inadvertently died; a maimed victim is often considered a better advertisement for cooperation with the mob than is a mere corpse.

In New York state anyone who permanently injures, disables or disfigures another is subject to imprisonment for up to 15 years. Maiming oneself to escape performing a legal duty, such as military service, or to escape or protest odious prison work assignments is also a felony. Often with the passage of time, the victim may recover from his disability or disfigurement, in which case the offender cannot be convicted of maiming but rather of a lesser charge of assault.

Maison Coquet “legal” bordello

Around 1800 the Maison Coquet, a lavish gambling den and brothel, opened on Royal Street in the center of New Orleans, advertising itself on street corner placards as operating with “the express permission of the Honorable Civil Governor of the city.” In point of fact, the so-called legal status of the establishment was accomplished more by daring than decree. At the time, New Orleans was in the process of being transferred from Spanish to French rule, creating a power vacuum. The Spanish owned but no longer reigned, and the French were doubtful of their status. It may well be that bribes were paid to someone, but in any case, the resort opened and operated with impunity.

When the American flag was raised over New Orleans in December 1803 following the Louisiana Purchase, the Maison Coquet was an established reality, as were a number of other fancy brothels. By their simple, though dubious, assertion of official recognition, the Maison Coquet and its imitators established a quasi-legal existence that gave New Orleans the nearest thing to legalized prostitution anywhere in America. So firmly rooted was this tradition that it did not disappear until World War I.

Majczek, Joseph (1908–) accused cop killer

On December 9, 1932 two men holding up a small grocery store in Chicago shot and killed a police officer named William Lundy. In due course, two men, Joe Majczek and Theodore Marcinkiewicz, were convicted of the crime and sentenced to life imprisonment. They would have stayed in jail had it not been for Joe’s mother, Tillie. She scrubbed floors to raise money to fight for her son’s release. When she had saved

$5,000, she appeared at the Chicago Times to place an ad reading, “Five thousand dollars reward for killers of Officer Lundy on December 9, 1932. Call Gro-1758, 12-7 p.m.” Classified tipped off the city desk that Tillie might be worth interviewing and the newspaper sent a reporter to see her. The story led to a full-scale investigation that finally established Joe’s innocence and showed he had been the victim of an official frame-up. The police had gotten the woman owner of the grocery to identify Majczek and Marcinkiewicz by threatening to arrest her for selling liquor. She later admitted she had no idea what the two robbers looked like. The police, it developed, were under pressure at the time to solve murders because the Chicago World’s Fair was to open the following year and a poor police record might discourage visitors. Naturally, if any case should be solved it was that of a cop killing. Finally, after 12 years behind bars, Joe Majczek was freed and awarded the sum of $24,000 for the miscarriage of justice—$2,000 for each year in prison. Ted Marcinkiewicz was not released until 1950 and he never got a penny. The Majczek story was used as the basis for the movie Call Northside 777.

Malcolm X (1925–1965) murder victim

The murder of Malcolm X in New York City on February 21, 1965 remains steeped in controversy, although three men were convicted of the killing and sent to prison for life. Within the black community there remains a conviction that the police investigation was superficial, that one or more of the men charged were not the right men and that the crime itself may not have been the work of the Black Muslims or not of that group alone.

Malcolm X had risen to become the second most powerful figure in the Nation of Islam, at the time the official name for the Black Muslim separatist movement. He had been converted to the Black Muslims 15 years earlier while serving a prison term for burglary. A glib and powerful speaker, Malcolm X clearly represented a threat to the leader of the movement, Elijah Muhammad, and to his presumptive successor and son-in-law, Raymond Sharrief.

In 1964 Malcolm split away and formed his own group, the Organization of Afro-American Unity, after being suspended from his post by Elijah Muhammad. Tension built up between the two groups, and a week before his assassination Malcolm X’s home was bombed. The next Sunday, February 21, he arrived at a mosque in Harlem to deliver a speech. As he stepped before the audience of 400, a disturbance broke out near the front rows. One man yelled to another, “Get your hands off my pockets—Don't be messin' with my pockets!"

As four of at least six bodyguards moved forward, Malcolm X said, "Now, brothers, be cool." At that moment another disturbance erupted further back in the audience. A smoke bomb was set off, and at that instant a black man with a sawed-off shotgun charged toward the stage and blasted Malcolm X in the chest. Two other blacks rushed forward with handguns and fired several bullets into the black leader's prone body.

For a moment the audience and most of Malcolm X's bodyguards froze and the killers raced off. One of the assailants, however, was shot in the thigh by a bodyguard. As he dropped at the front stairway exit to the ballroom, members of the audience surrounded him and started beating him until he was rescued by police officers.

Immediately after the assassination, the police, the media and Malcolm X's supporters believed the killing was the work of the Black Muslims, and a Muslim mosque was burned in retaliation. However, the assailant trapped at the scene, 22-year-old Talmadge Hayer, married and the father of two children, could not be identified as a Black Muslim. Two other men arrested later by the police and tried with Hayer were Black Muslims, but both denied any involvement. Hayer admitted his guilt and said he had three accomplices, whom he refused to name, but declared neither of the other two defendants, Norman 3X Butler, 27, and Thomas 15X Johnson, 30, were part of the plot.

After a while, most blacks agreed that Butler and Johnson were the wrong men, since both were well-known Black Muslims and, as such, would have had difficulty penetrating the security at the mosque. In addition, Norman 3X Butler had been treated at Jacobi Hospital in the Bronx on the morning of the assassination for thrombophlebitis; he had had his right leg bandaged and had been given medication. Some observers who claim no real investigation was made find the idea of a physically impaired assassin being used in the plot unbelievable. Oddly, several of those present, including three of Malcolm X's lieutenants and bodyguards, vanished.

Annie Maledon was an 18-year-old hangman's daughter who was killed in a lover's quarrel that provided Hollywood filmmakers with the basis for an endless variety of dramatic situations.

Annie's father was George Maledon, the fearsome executioner for Hanging Judge Parker, who presided over the federal court in Fort Smith, Ark. and later administered justice in the rough-and-tumble Indian Territory. Annie died with a bullet in her spine, the end result of an ill-fated love affair with a married adventurer named Frank Carver. There was an argument, a desperate struggle and finally a gun went off. Judge Parker was incensed at the killing and forthwith sentenced Carver to hang. A grim George Maledon started oiling up his rope and thousands prepared to attend the festivities, which were sure to provide some moments of high drama. At the last minute, however, the execution was canceled. Carver's death sentence was thrown out on appeal as being excessive for what did not appear to be premeditated murder.

Judge Parker was outraged by the reduction of Carver's sentence to a prison term. He had looked forward to seeing Carver swing for killing little Annie, who had played with the two Parker boys in her childhood. Maledon too was enraged. And the community had lost a wonderful Sunday afternoon's entertainment and could only speculate whether Maledon would have done his usually brilliant job of dispatching a victim with merciful quickness, or whether in this one case the hangman's handiwork would have resulted in what was referred to as the long twitch.

The saying around Hanging Judge Parker's court in Fort Smith, Ark. was that Parker sentenced men to death and George Maledon "suspended sentence." Maledon was Parker's executioner and, during their 21-year association, hanged almost all of the 88 men Parker sent to their doom. Maledon's ambition knew no bounds. He constructed a 12-man gallows for special no-waiting occasions, although the most ever to "stretch rope" at the same time was six, in the notorious Dance of Death, a multiple execution that brought vigorous criticism to both Parker and Maledon for being excessively bloodthirsty and gave the former his nickname the Hanging Judge.

Born of German immigrant parents, Maledon left the industrial grime of Detroit to seek a new occupation. He found it as an officer of the Fort Smith Police Department. During the Civil War, Maledon joined the Union Army and afterward held a number of lawman jobs, including that of a deputy U.S. marshal working out of Fort Smith. He distinguished himself by volunteering to act as hangman whenever there was an execution, a service that earned him extra pay. When federal Judge Parker arrived in 1875, Maledon's future was assured. The hangman got what he considered a good fee for his services, $100 a man, minus the pittance it cost him to bury the dead.

MALLOY, Indestructible Mike

Maledon regarded multiple hangings as a special challenge, demanding a certain drop that would dispatch all the victims with the same lethal quickness. He never quite understood the outrage of much of the rest of the country, especially the eastern press, whenever he staged one of these multiple dances of death. But he also could not understand why much of the community shunned him nor why even some of his own family shrank from him. Mrs. Maledon was most upset by his labors and would not let him post press clippings and photographs of the men he killed in the living room.

After Judge Parker died, Maledon continued to work as an executioner for a few more years and then retired, taking his ropes, traps, photographs and newspaper clippings on the road for the curious to see. He also tried his hand at farming but was a failure at it. He died on May 6, 1911.

Malloy, Indestructible Mike (1872–1933) murder victim

Perhaps the most durable American murder victim, Indestructible Mike Malloy was an unheralded barfly who achieved fame and earned his nickname posthumously. He was selected to be murdered in 1932 by a Bronx, New York insurance murder ring headed by a speakeasy operator named Tony Marino. Marino was assisted by his barkeep, Joe Murphy, and two others, Frank Pasqua and Dan Kriesberg. They had killed their first victim the previous year, a young blonde named Betty Carlsen. Marino had befriended Betty, who was down on her luck. He brought her into the speak, gave her drinks on the house and even set her up in a room nearby. Betty had never been treated so well. She couldn't do enough to thank Marino, even signing some papers so he could run for public office. Actually, what she signed was an insurance policy naming her newly found benefactor her beneficiary. One frigid night Betty passed out in the speakeasy and the boys carried her back to her room, laid her out on the bed naked, poured cold water over her and left the window wide open. When she was found dead the next morning, the coroner declared her death the result of pneumonia compounded by alcoholism. The boys collected $800, not an inconsiderable sum in that Depression year.

Then the murder ring started glad-handing Mike Malloy, a derelict more accustomed to getting the bum's rush whenever he entered the speakeasy. Now, he was greeted like an old buddy. They gave him a back room to sleep in so that he would not have to freeze in some drafty hallway. By the way, did Mike think it was a good idea for Marino to run for office? Absolutely, Mike's life was soon insured for a total of $3,500 under a double-indemnity clause. The boys shrewdly figured they would not avail themselves of that provision but settle for $1,750, thus allaying suspicions.

At first, the four tried to get Malloy to drink himself to death, but the more he drank the more he seemed to thrive. Since that method appeared to offer only bankruptcy for Marino, they switched to giving Malloy some "new stuff" that had come in, actually automobile antifreeze, which of course was poisonous. After consuming some of the new stuff, Malloy commented that it was quite smooth. A couple of hours later, Mike collapsed on the speakeasy floor and they dragged him out back to let him expire in privacy. An hour later, a beaming—and thirsty—Malloy was back at the bar. Over the succeeding days the boys kept lacing his drinks with ever stronger doses of antifreeze and finally, in desperation, with turpentine. Malloy downed shot after shot and lived. Even when the four took to using diluted horse liniment laced with rat poison, nothing happened. They had to wonder what Malloy had been drinking all his life.

The boys decided nothing liquid would kill Malloy. They switched to food and started giving him raw oysters, tainted and soaked in wood alcohol. Malloy downed two dozen at once and gave the treat his approval. "Tony," he told Marino, "you oughta open up a restaurant, you know first-class food."

After several days of tainted oysters followed by rotten sardines, with which Malloy always requested some of that "new booze," the plotters were ready to throw caution to the wind. They got him drunk and then lugged him to Claremont Park, where they stripped off his coat, opened his shirt, poured a five-gallon can of water on him and dumped him in a snowbank.

The next day the boys scanned the newspapers for a report of a corpse being found in the park, but there was nothing. Pasqua, sneezing fiercely as a result of his battle with the elements while carrying Malloy to the park, was most upset. Finally, that evening Malloy appeared wearing a new suit. He explained he had really tied one on the previous night and wound up practically clothesless in the park. But it had all turned out well. The police had found him and had a welfare organization outfit him with new clothes before he was released to the world.

Truly desperate, the would-be murderers hired a criminal who was working as a cab driver to kill their seemingly indestructible victim. Once again, they got Malloy into a drunken stupor and then took him at 3 A.M. to the deserted intersection of Gun Hill Road and Baychester Avenue. They held him upright as the cab driver backed his taxi up and then roared forward at 45 miles per hour. At the last instant they jumped back leaving the weaving Malloy standing in the path of the oncoming cab. When struck by the vehicle, Mike catapulted into the air. To make absolutely sure that he had done the job right, the cabbie backed his taxi over Malloy’s prone body.

This time their victim was surely dead. But nothing appeared in the newspapers. They visited the morgue looking for his body. No Malloy. They contacted the hospitals. No Malloy. In fact, Malloy didn’t show up again for three weeks. When he did, he said he had been in the hospital after having a car accident. The hospital had listed him under the wrong name. Seeing how downcast his friends were, Mike assured them he was all right, that he had suffered a concussion of the brain and had a fractured shoulder. “But I’m all right,” he said, “and I sure could use a drink.”

At this point, the boys were beyond desperation. They even contacted a professional hit man about machine-gunning Malloy on the street. The explanation would be that he was a poor unfortunate caught in the crossfire of a gangland battle. Unfortunately, the hit man wanted $500 for the job and the boys were getting close to having a losing proposition on their hands as it was. The plan was abandoned. The four decided that only straightforward murder would work. They rented a furnished room for Malloy and, on February 22, 1933, ran a hose from a gas jet to his mouth and held it there until he stopped breathing.

Unfortunately for the killers, they had to get a corrupt doctor to sign a phony death certificate citing lobar pneumonia as the cause of death.

By now there were just too many people involved in the plot. A cab driver was complaining to friends that he had been hired to run down a guy and had been paid so little it failed to cover the cost of fixing the dents in his cab. A gunman told of losing out on a hit contract with some pikers. The police got wind of an insurance ring killing people in the Bronx and started checking around. They learned of an Irishman being buried within four hours of his death. And without a wake? That was unusual. They exhumed the body and started asking questions. Everybody started talking—the doctor, the cab driver, the hit man, even the undertaker. When accused, each of the four murderers tried to shift the blame to the remaining three. On various dates in June and July 1934, the four—Marino, Pasqua, Kriesberg and Murphy—died in the electric chair at Sing Sing, none of them nearly as well remembered as Indestructible Mike Malloy.

Mandame, Mary (c. 1639) Pilgrim sex offender

Mary Mandame of the Plymouth colony was the first American woman to be forced to wear a mark on her clothing for a sex offense. Specifically, she was charged in 1639 with “dallyance diverse tymes with Tinsin, an Indian” and “committing the act of uncleane with him.” Her punishment was to be whipped through the streets of Plymouth and thereafter to always wear a badge of shame on her left sleeve. Since Mary Mandame’s name does not appear again in historical records, it would seem that she obeyed the terms of her punishment. Had she not, she would have been branded in the face with a hot iron. In 1658 the punishment given to Mary was extended to wives found guilty of committing adultery. This cruel punishment became the basis for Nathaniel Hawthorne’s The Scarlet Letter (1850).

The most notorious fence, or receiver of stolen goods, in the 19th century was Fredericka Mandelbaum, better known to the underworld as Marm because of her often maternalistic attitude toward criminals. Indeed, the sobriquet Ma Crime, as she was called by the press, was well justified since, unlike the fences of today who insulate themselves from the actual commission of crimes, she was an active plotter and bankroller of many of the great capers of the period.

It would be difficult to put a dollar value on the loot Marm handled in her three decades of activity, from 1854 to 1884, but it certainly was in the tens of millions. In fact, it could be said that Marm Mandelbaum, rather than the later-arriving Lucky Luciano and Meyer Lansky, first put crime in America on a syndicated basis. She angled, or bossed, the operations of several gangs of bank robbers, blackmailers and confidence men, gave advanced courses in burglary and safe blowing and outdid Dickens’ Fagin with a special school for teaching little boys and girls to be expert pickpockets and sneak thieves.

Fredericka came to America from her native Prussia in 1849 with her rather meek husband, Wolfe, whom she supposedly had induced to embezzle funds from his employer. Arriving in New York City, they bought a home and dry goods store at 79 Clinton Street in the teeming Kleine Deutschland section of Manhattan’s East Side. Wolfe Mandelbaum would have been content to be an honest businessman, but Fredericka soon began dabbling in stolen goods, and by 1854 the store was nothing more than a front for her illegal operations. Soon, she required several warehouses in Manhattan and Brooklyn in which to keep her stolen articles and remove their labels, trademarks and other means of identification. She retained the famous criminal law firm of Howe and Hummel to keep herself and her growing legion of thieves out of serious trouble. Other flunkies handled her direct payments to the police.

Upon her arrival in New York, Fredericka weighed 150 pounds, a weight she was to double as she grew in stature, literally and figuratively, in the underworld. She had a sharply curved mouth, unusually fat cheeks, small, beady black eyes, bushy brows and a high, sloping forehead. She generally wore a tiny black bonnet with feathers over her mass of tightly rolled hair. Although far from a raving beauty, she was lovingly regarded by the underworld. One leading thief, Banjo Pete Emerson, was quoted as saying, “She was scheming and dishonest as the day is long, but she could be like an angel to the worst devil as long as he played square with her.”

While she was undoubtedly the leading criminal in America during the latter part of the 19th century, Marm was—by her own standards—a lady. She was treated with respect by the ruffians with whom she dealt on a daily basis. Vile language was definitely not permissible. A party at the Widow Mandelbaum’s—Wolfe died in 1874—was definitely the highlight of the underworld social season, and Marm was not above, or below, playing gracious hostess to the better half of town, whose homes and purses her thugs robbed regularly. Her parties were also attended by judges, police officials, politicians and the like. Marm, ever on the lookout for ways of improving the social life and mores of the underworld, judiciously mixed into these gatherings the best of the criminal lot. Thus, at the dinner table the wives of a judge and an important City Hall figure might well find themselves flanking someone like Mark Shinburn, a burglar of distinction and one of Marm’s favorites. Shinburn, insisted that he was an aristocrat at heart and detested associating with crooks even for business reasons.

Marm took an intense interest in all her flock, constantly trying to improve them in mind and manners. When it came to finances, however, she dropped any pretensions of being a lady and was as tightfisted as they came, seldom if ever granting a thief more than 10 percent of the value of any stolen article he sold her. Yet, after completion of a deal, Marm might turn right around and hand that same individual several hundred or thousand dollars for a needed operation or as a retirement kitty. It was Marm who counseled Shinburn to save his money, go back to Europe and live out his life in luxury. Buying himself a title with a portion of his loot, Shinburn became Baron Shindell of Monaco and lived aristocratically ever after.

Following the Civil War Draft Riots in New York, Marm was the biggest receiver of the goods looted, much of which she disposed of as far away as Chicago; fittingly enough, a good portion of the loot taken during the Chicago Fire a few years later ended up in Marm’s New York warehouses.

Besides Shinburn and Emerson, some of the top criminals who worked at her beckon were George Leonidas Leslie, the King of the Bank Robbers; Sheeny Mike Kurtz, burglar extraordinary; Shang Draper, master of the panel game rackets; Ned Lyons; Johnny Dobbs; Jimmy Irving; and Bill Mosher and Joe Douglas, these last two the confessed kidnapers of little Charley Ross. There was no loot Marm could not handle, including stolen horses shipped in by the Loomis gang from upstate New York.

Marm became the queen mother of the leading lady crooks. There were Queen Liz and Big Mary, the top shoplifters of the day and instructors in one of Marm’s schools for the underworld juniors; Black Lena Kleinschmidt, blackmailer, pickpocket and sneak thief; Sophie Lyons, wife of bank robber Ned Lyons and a renowned con lady; Old Mother Hubbard; Kid Glove Rose; Little Annie; and Ellen Clegg. Marm liked all these ladies because they shared her desire for respectability and because, above all, they recognized her as their social queen. Only Black Lena ever challenged Marm’s position. It happened when Marm started courting the rich. Black Lena moved to Hackensack, N.J., posed as the wealthy widow of a South American mining engineer and began giving elaborate functions that rivaled Marm's.

Although the social columns of the day referred to Black Lena as the Queen of Hackensack, she continued to spend two days a week in New York working her illegal trade to replenish her coffers. She was finally dethroned when she wore an emerald ring that one of her dinner guests recognized as having been stolen from a friend's handbag. Marm read the news of Black Lena's arrest and exposure with pure delight. "It just goes to prove," Marm told the tittering ladies of her court, "that it takes brains to be a real lady."

Marm's own fall from grace came in 1884, a seemingly unlikely event considering the amount of protection money she paid the police. Her problem came in the form of one Peter B. Olney—a sort of oddity for his day—a district attorney without a price. Convinced the police would never catch Marm, Olney turned to the Pinkertons. After four months of intensive work, one of the agents gained her confidence by posing as a thief. Soon after, thieves working with Marm stole a supply of silk from the store of James A. Hearn and Sons on 14th Street, but the bolts had been secretly marked by detectives. Later the same night a task force of Pinkertons smashed through the doors of Marm's house and found the stolen silk. But that was nothing compared to what else they found. As one reporter put it:

It did not seem possible that so much wealth could be assembled in one spot. There seemed to be enough clothes to supply an army. There were trunks filled with precious gems and silverware. Antique furniture was stacked against a wall and bars of gold from melted jewelry settings were stacked under the newspapers. There were scales of every description to weigh diamonds.

Marm, her son Julius and her clerk Herman Stroude were clapped behind bars. It was the first and only night Marm spent in jail. The following day she posted $21,000 bail and got her lawyer Bill Howe working on a fix so that she could continue operations. However, Tammany Hall was having problems with reformers and Marm was advised her day was over. She shrugged, gathered up what was believed to be $1 million in cash and fled. When she didn't show up for her trial, the newspapers berated the police for not keeping her under constant surveillance.

The Pinkertons were put back on the job and within a month they located her in Toronto, Canada, but under existing extradition laws, she could not be forced to return to the United States. She did come back twice, however. In disguise and weeping profusely, she turned up in 1890 for the funeral of her daughter in Kleine Deutschland. The local papers learned of it, but the police professed to be skeptical—until Marm was safely across the border again.

In 1894 Marm came back to New York for burial, dead at the age of 76. The newspapers reported that several of the mourners at the cemetery had their pockets picked.

Mann Act white slavery control statute

The White Slave Traffic Act, introduced in 1910 by Rep. James Robert Mann of Illinois and popularly known as the Mann Act, outlawed the transport of women across state lines for immoral purposes. The direct cause of the legislation was the disclosure that a Chicago vice couple, Alphonse and Eva Dufaur, had imported 20,000 women and girls into the United States to stock their many brothels. The first prominent person to run afoul of the act was Heavyweight Champion Jack Johnson, the first black to hold the heavyweight boxing title, who in 1912 persuaded a white woman, whom he later married, to leave a house of prostitution where she was working and travel with him to another state. Johnson was sentenced to one year in prison but fled the country after posting bail. He finally returned in 1920 to serve his time.

While the Mann Act has been successfully used to prosecute a number of minor criminals over the years, it has not been an unqualified success. Some enterprising prostitutes turned it into a valuable blackmail foil, and the act failed miserably in stopping the prostitution activities of the Capone mob. With the decline of prostitution as an organized crime activity, the result of changing sexual mores rather than effective law enforcement, the Mann Act has been relegated to relative unimportance.

Manson, Charles (1934–) murder cult leader

The highly publicized leader of a "family," or self-aggrandizing cult, Charles Manson burst on the California scene in shocking style, even in a state long thought inured to bizarre bloodletting. On August 9, 1969 Charles "Tex" Watson and three female accomplices, Patricia Krenwinkel, Susan Atkins and Leslie Van Houten, entered the Beverly Hills estate of film director Roman Polanski, who was away at the time, and murdered his pregnant wife, actress Sharon Tate, and four others—Abigail Folger, heiress to the Folger coffee fortune; Voyteck Frykowski, a Polish writer and producer, who was living with Folger; Jay Sebring, a hairstylist; and 18-year-old Steven Earl Parent. The five were shot, stabbed and clubbed to death, with Sharon Tate begging to be allowed to live for the sake of her unborn baby. The killers used the victims' blood to scrawl crazed slogans and words like "Pig" and "War" on the walls. During the slaughter Watson kept screaming, "I am the devil and I have come to do the devil's work!"

Two nights later, the shocking process was repeated at the home of Leno and Rosemary La Bianca; they were butchered and the same sort of bloody messages were scrawled all over their home.

The murderers were soon traced back to the Manson family. Manson, at 34, had done time in several prisons and reform schools for such charges as procuring and forgery. After his last release from prison, he had set up a sort of commune for a cult of shiftless hippies and drifters at the Spahn Ranch outside Los Angeles, once a filming location for Hollywood studios. At the ranch the cult practiced free love, experimented with drugs and conducted pseudo-religious ceremonies built around Manson as a Christlike figure. When Manson ordered guerrilla tactics, his followers practiced guerrilla tactics, and when he told them to kill, they killed.

After their capture none of the actual killers or Manson, who had directed them, showed any sign of remorse over the horrifying crimes. At their trial—during which a number of Manson's shaved-head female followers kept daily vigil outside the courthouse—the prosecutor called Manson "one of the most evil, satanic men who ever walked the face of the earth." For a time the three women defendants offered to admit their guilt if Manson was declared innocent. Manson waved off their offer, telling the court: "I have done my best to get along in your world, and now you want to kill me. I say to myself, 'Ha, I'm already dead, have been all my life . . . I don't care anything about any of you.'"

All were found guilty and sentenced to die, but they were spared the death penalty because of the Supreme Court ruling outlawing capital punishment and were given life instead. They have been eligible for parole since 1978. In 1980 Manson was turned down on his third annual application for parole. The parole board advised him to train for a trade as part of his rehabilitation, but Manson said: "I'll stay here forever. I'm too old. I can't do too much. I like to sit around, smoke grass, read the Bible now and then."

The only federal judge ever imprisoned for corruption, Martin T. Manton was something of a courtroom wunderkind. When Woodrow Wilson named him district court judge, he was, at the age of 36, the youngest federal jurist in the country. Within a year and a half he had moved up to the appellate court; in 1922 it was said that he missed an appointment to the Supreme Court by an eyelash. Over a 10-year period Manton produced 650 opinions, an output very few judges have ever equaled. However, it developed that his opinions were for sale. Soliciting a bribe in one case, Manton was quoted as saying, "While I'm sitting on the bench, I have my right hand and my left hand."

In 1939 Manhattan District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey accused him of taking bribes with both hands and even employing an agent to negotiate the sale of verdicts. The charges against Manton were considered so incredible that he had no trouble convincing Judge Learned Hand and two former presidential candidates, Al Smith and John W. Davis, to appear as character witnesses at his trial. Nonetheless, he was found guilty. Pleading his own appeal before the Supreme Court, Manton came up with a novel argument: "From a broad viewpoint, it serves no public policy for a high judicial officer to be convicted of a judicial crime. It tends to destroy the confidence of the people in the courts." The High Court was unimpressed, however, and turned down his appeal. Manton served 19 months at the federal prison in Lewisburg, Pa. and died a broken man in 1946.

Maranzano, Salvatore (1868–1931) Mafia "boss of bosses"

For four months in 1931, Salvatore Maranzano was probably the most important criminal boss in the United States, even more important than Al Capone, whom Maranzano put on a list of mobsters to be eliminated in order to solidify his authority throughout the entire country. Maranzano founded what came to be known as the Cosa Nostra.

Maranzano was a "Mustache Pete," an old-line Mafia leader who held to the criminal society's traditions of "honor" and "respect" for the gang boss and bloody feuds with foes of decades past. Nevertheless, he had modern ideas about crime and wanted to institutionalize it in America—with himself on top. If he had survived 1931, organized crime in America today would operate much differently.

Maranzano had come to the United States late in his criminal career, around 1918, but he had been an established mafioso in Sicily (he had fled because of a murder charge and because the older Mustache Petes resented his new ideas and probably would have killed him if he had stayed). His magnetism quickly made him a gang power and he surrounded himself with gangsters from his hometown in Sicily, Castellammare del Golfo. College-trained and originally a candidate for the priesthood, he was a far cry from the standard mafiosi. Within a few years he had grown so powerful he was becoming a threat to the acknowledged Mafia boss of New York, Giuseppe "Joe the Boss" Masseria.

Masseria was a glutton, both in personal habits and in the way he ran criminal affairs, demanding enormous tribute from his subchiefs. Maranzano shrewdly used the resentment this produced to lure many leading gangsters away from Joe the Boss. But he could not bring in the biggest prize, a rising young mobster named Lucky Luciano, a brilliant strategist whose reorganization of much of Joe the Boss' empire resulted in greatly increased profits.

When Maranzano seemed to be getting too strong, Joe the Boss declared war on him. The police, having no way of separating gang war killings from other underworld executions, never knew how many men died in what was called the Castellammare War; the toll between 1928 and 1930 may well have been 50. Because he could field probably 200 more gunmen than his foe, Joe the Boss did not take the threat seriously at first. But Maranzano kept winning defections by promising Masseria men a better share of the loot if they joined him.

While Maranzano and Masseria fought their two-sided war, a third side was developing. Luciano had been cultivating the younger gangsters within the Maranzano forces, telling them an entirely new crime setup, one that would really bring in big money. He had developed contacts with the Jewish gangs that would lead to the formation of a new crime syndicate and end the Mafia's internecine struggles as well as its battles with other ethnic groups involved in crime. Luciano, through Frank Costello, had also established rapport with the New York police, sending $10,000 a week directly to police headquarters (the sum was doubled in the late 1920s), and he could thus supply better protection than either Joe the Boss or Maranzano.

For a time Luciano had hung back waiting to see which of the two leaders would eliminate the other. When a stalemate developed, he decided to help matters along by getting rid of Joe the Boss, who would be easier to kill since he trusted Luciano. On April 15, 1931 Luciano and Masseria had lunch in a Coney Island restaurant. About 3:30 P.M. Luciano went to the men's room. Just then four assassins stepped up to Masseria and fired a fusillade of 20 shots at him, hitting him six times. Joe the Boss lay dead.

Luciano had handed the crown to Maranzano. Now, he bided his time to allow Maranzano to think he was secure. As a supposed act of gratitude, Maranzano gave Luciano the number two position in his new organization. In a memorable conclave he summoned 500 gangsters to a meeting in the Bronx and outlined his great new scheme for crime. The New York Mafia would be divided into five major crime families, with a boss, a sub-boss, lieutenants and soldiers. Above them all would be a "boss of bosses"—Salvatore Maranzano. He called this new organization La Cosa Nostra, which meant nothing more than "Our Thing." Years later, the phrase "Cosa Nostra" would be used to get J. Edgar Hoover out of a bad hole of his own making. For decades Hoover had insisted there was no such thing as organized crime and no Mafia. Oh yes, he was able to announce, there was a Cosa Nostra.

While Maranzano was constructing his new empire, he was aware that not all those under him were loyalists. He knew better than to trust the ambitious Luciano, who was too worldly and was setting up a partially non-Italian power base. Maranzano composed a death list that, when carried out, would guarantee his rule. On that list were Luciano, Costello, Vito Genovese, Joe Adonis, Willie Moretti, Dutch Schultz and the "fat guy" in Chicago, Al Capone, who was friendly with Luciano.

It would be a prodigious undertaking to eliminate them all, and Maranzano realized it would be dangerous to trust other Italians with the task—whomever he picked might be a secret ally of Luciano. So, he decided to have the job handled by a non-Italian. He enlisted the notorious young killer Vince "Mad Dog" Coll and arranged for him to come to his office in the Grand Central building at a time when Luciano and Genovese would be present. Coll was to kill them and then get as many of the others on the list as possible before the murders became known. Maranzano gave Coll $25,000 as a down payment and promised him another $25,000 upon successful completion of the assignment.

The boss of bosses then invited Luciano and Genovese to a meeting in his office. Unaware of how many gunmen Luciano had won over to his cause, Maranzano made the mistake of trusting a gangster named Tommy Lucchese, who had been a secret friend of Luciano for years and his chief spy in the Maranzano organization. Lucchese learned of the murder plot and warned Luciano. On the day set for the meeting, Lucchese innocently dropped into Maranzano's office a few minutes before Luciano and Genovese were due. Just then four men walked in flashing badges and announced they had some questions to ask. The four were Jewish gangsters Luciano had borrowed for the plot because they were unknown to Maranzano and his bodyguards. On the other hand, since the gunmen did not know Maranzano, Lucchese was there to ensure they got the right man.

The phony officers lined the bodyguards up against the wall and disarmed them. Then two went into Maranzano's office and shot him to death. The assassins charged out, as did the bodyguards after ascertaining their boss was dead. On the way down the emergency stairs, one of them ran into Mad Dog Coll coming to keep his murder appointment. Appraised of the new situation, Coll exited whistling. He had $25,000 and nothing to do for it.

The death of Maranzano meant a new deal for crime in America. The forces of Luciano, Meyer Lansky and Dutch Schultz would form a national crime syndicate. Over the years Schultz would be killed by the others, but the apparatus was there to stay.

Marion Penitentiary highly restrictive federal prison While today the Administrative Maximum Facility in Florence, Colorado, better known as the Alcatraz of the Rockies or Super Max, is the top maximum-security prison in the nation, Marion Penitentiary in Illinois is still viewed by many as the worst institution of the type and has been labeled as inhumane by Amnesty International. Super Max is mainly used for holding the most violent prisoners, while Marion has more high-profile criminals.

Chief among them in recent years was Mafia kingpin John Gotti, confined at Marion since his conviction in 1992. Gotti's status could be described as total isolation. When Gotti arrived at Marion there were a number of other underworld types there, but unlike as in other prisons, he would never get to see them. There was "Nicky" Scarfo, the brutal former boss of the Philadelphia crime family, and Jimmy Coonan, the equally brutal ex-head of the Westies, the New York Irish mob affiliated with the Mafia, and many others of organized crime's most ardent killers.

There were equally notorious prisoners, including John Walker, the navy man who sold classified information to the former Soviet Union; Edwin Wilson, a U.S. government employee who sold weapons to Qaddafi's Libya and conspired to kill eight witnesses who could expose his crimes, and Jonathan Jay Pollard, who spied for the Israelis. It was debatable whether these prisoners were at Marion because they constituted a continuing menace to the nation and society or because they were thought to have deserved greater punishment.

The matter was rather clear in the case of Gotti, held in the top level of restrictive confinement in an 8-by-7-foot underground cell for 22 to 23 hours a day. Gotti got no work, no communal education classes, no communal recreation. Food was delivered through a slot in the cell door. His cell consisted of no more than a single cot, a basin, a toilet, a radio and a black-and-white TV. He had no chair to sit on. To avoid spending all his hours prone on his cot, Gotti folded his mattress into an L shape, which he propped against the wall to simulate a chair. He was described as spending his time reading, watching television (mostly talk shows) and exercising by doing about 1,000 push-ups a day. When he was allowed to shower, he was transported shackled in chains inside a movable cage. His outside-world contact was limited to five visits per month by his lawyers and those by his son Junior, until he was incarcerated himself. The FBI conceded Gotti had continued to rule the Gambino family through his son, who served as acting boss of the family, passing along his father's instructions.

While most lifers sent to Marion are kept there 30 months and then transferred to a regular maximum-security prison elsewhere, Gotti continued to be held there. The legal scuttlebutt was that his lawyers were fearful of making an issue of the matter because Gotti might end up being transferred to Super Max.

Some speculated that authorities kept Gotti in Marion in hopes that the conditions would finally cause him to "break" and inform on his own mob to gain leniency. Another view was that Gotti was a valuable object lesson to other mafiosi of what could happen to them if they refused to cooperate.

Maris, Herbert L. (1880–1960) defense attorney

A Philadelphia lawyer whose cases became the basis of a television series called "Lock-Up," Herbert L.

Maris cleared an estimated 500 unjustly convicted persons during a half-century career. His record was probably one of the best arguments for abolition of the death penalty because it highlighted the grave possibility of judicial error. Time after time he demonstrated how often justice erred, freeing men originally sentenced to death but lucky enough to win a commutation to life. Only after Maris took their case was justice finally rendered and wrong man after wrong man set free. Almost every convict in Pennsylvania recognized his name. Maris became known as "a lifer's last hope."

Such was the situation in what came to be called the Case of the Beer Bottle that Never Was. It started one evening on a Philadelphia street corner when a young man met his girlfriend, allegedly had an argument with her and hit her across the back of the neck with a beer bottle. The prosecution produced three witnesses who said they had observed the assault. The jury ignored the man's story that he had merely embraced the girl and was stroking the back of her neck when suddenly she lurched against him and collapsed on the sidewalk, blood spurting from her mouth. In a matter of seconds the girl had died.

The supposed killer was sentenced to life imprisonment and served three years before he got in touch with Maris. The lawyer soon demolished the case that had sent the man to prison. With the aid of the coroner's report, he showed that the girl had died of an aneurysm in the aorta; in this heart condition the blood vessel can burst, fatally, at any moment, and shock or excitement can cause the rupture.

Checking the court transcript, Maris found that the judge and district attorney had accepted the testimony of the witnesses at face value, and the court-appointed defense counsel hadn't challenged anything the witnesses had said. The findings of the coroner's report simply had not been considered at the trial.

Then Maris broke down the witnesses one by one, establishing that none of them had heard what the couple had been saying, thus none could really swear there had been an argument between the two. And no one had seen a bottle in the man's hand. The witnesses "thought" he had something in his hand. One state witness, coached to elaborate on the incident, had testified that the man had struck the girl with a beer bottle. Yet no beer bottle had been found.

In case after case Maris proved the so-called beer bottle murder was hardly a unique miscarriage of justice. He constantly cited instances of where official indifference, incompetence, suppression of evidence or even the invention of evidence that had resulted in the conviction of innocent men.

MARTIN, Michael

A farmer from near York, Pa. was given the death penalty, later commuted to life, and did 10 years before Maris cleared him of a murder charge. It turned out that two local constables and two civilians had decided it would be fun to “arrest” the farmer, ride him off 18 miles and force him to walk home. But the farmer, thinking it was a kidnapping, shot and killed one of the constables. When the joke turned into tragedy, the survivors decided to cover the matter up by stating that at the time of the shooting, the farmer was being arrested on a warrant for stealing a calf. The warrant the slain constable was allegedly carrying was produced in court and the farmer was convicted.

Maris proved the warrant hadn't been prepared until three months after the killing. In addition, he found that the prosecutor had managed to introduce the phony warrant in court without naming the complainant. When that man was questioned, he denied having had a calf stolen. He had not come forward at the time of the trial, he stated, because he didn't even know he was involved.

Maris declared, “I am convinced, on the basis of my long experience, that the guilt of fully 20 percent of those in our prisons is extremely doubtful,” and he liked to say he always had at least 10 cases on hand in which the convicted individuals were “absolutely innocent.” Even in his late seventies, he still put in 80- or 90-hour weeks trying to help as many of these unjustly convicted persons as he could, often without fee.

Martin-Tolliver feud

Far more disruptive to the life of its community than the more famous Hatfield-McCoy feud, the dispute between the Martins and the Tollivers, which had begun as an election argument, in Morehead, Ky. erupted into bloodshed in 1884, when Floyd Tolliver shot John Martin. Before the law could act, Martin shot Tolliver to death. While Martin was being held under arrest, members of the Tolliver clan killed him. For the next three years a bloody feud enveloped Rowan County. The resulting anarchy provoked an exodus of hundreds of residents from the county; the county seat at Morehead saw its population drop from 700 to 300. Because of close marital ties, the Logan family was drawn into the struggle on the side of the Martins. By 1887 the death toll stood at 23, with the number of wounded kept secret by the close-mouthed clans. The feud ended on June 22, 1887, when Daniel Boone Logan led a large Martin-Logan force into Morehead and, in a pitched battle, killed the Tolliver leaders.

Mason, Sam (c. 1755–1803) highwayman and murderer

A brawling river man who for a time had been one of George Rogers Clark's rangers, Sam Mason was the greatest terror of the Mississippi, beginning in 1800. He collected a large gang of cutthroats, who seldom let a robbery victim live to tell about it. Mason would often leave his trademark at the scene of the crime, carving on a tree, “Done by Mason of the Woods.”

Like the Harpe brothers, a pair of brutal killers of the same era, Mason often killed indiscriminately. But he might turn around and let his next hapless victim go with no more than a boot in the pants. The governors of both the Louisiana and the Mississippi territories put him at the head of the list of wanted men. Mason was captured early in 1803 but escaped before he was identified.

Meanwhile, a bearded man named Setton joined the Mason gang and took part in a number of forays and killings. Mason did not know it, but Setton was the much-sought Little Harpe, whose older brother, Big Harpe, had been captured by the law and executed earlier that year. There was a handsome reward out for Mason and Harpe-Setton had designs on it. One day in late 1803, Harpe, with the aid of another gang member named Sam Mays, waited until Mason was separated from the rest of his men and then tomahawked him to death. Harpe and Mays took Mason's severed head to Natchez to claim their reward. Unfortunately, Little Harpe was recognized and they, like their victim, ended up with their heads cut off.

Although not as bloody as the Graham-Tewksbury feud in the Arizona Territory, the Mason County War in Texas was another violent confrontation in which the underlying causes (cattle rustling) soon were forgotten, swept aside by blind passion, hatred and brutality, with friends coming to the aid of friends.

The first victim of the 1875 war was Tim Williamson, a cattleman not averse to shooting his enemies or mixing cattle from other herds together with his own stock. Arrested for stealing livestock, he was on his way to jail when a mob of his enemies abducted him and shot him to death despite the efforts of John Worley, a deputy sheriff of Mason County. Worley's attempt to save Williamson did not impress a number of the deceased's friends, especially Scott Cooley, an ex-Texas Ranger turned gunman who had worked for Williamson and other cattlemen for some time. Cooley, who had developed a warm friendship with Williamson, became convinced that Deputy Worley had conspired in the mob killing. He took his revenge by not only shooting the lawman but cutting off his ears as well. Cooley exhibited his grim prize, promising publicly to kill every man involved in the Williamson murder. When Cooley and a number of friends killed Daniel Hoerster on suspicion of being part of the mob that had attacked Williamson, full-scale war broke out. Unable to corner Cooley, his enemies set upon two friends of his, the brothers Elijah and Pete Backus, and hanged them from a tree. Cooley’s forces dispatched a pair of mob law advocates, Pete Bader and Luther Wiggins. The other side then shot to death Moses Beard, a Cooley man. By that time the conflict had been named the Hoodoo War. In all, the eye-for-eye struggle officially resulted in the killing of at least a dozen men and the wounding of many more. There is little doubt that some other killings were wrongly attributed to unknown desperadoes and road agents.

After more than a year, the war came to an abrupt end when a company of Texas Rangers was sent into Mason County to prevent further bloodshed. Cooley, the main instigator, disappeared, and only a few minor characters had to face charges. One of these was a then little-known friend of Cooley’s, Johnny Ringo. Ringo had killed an anti-Williamson man after the latter had invited him to sit down and eat with him. Jailed for murder, Ringo broke free from his cell in Lampasas and quickly left Texas.

Masseria, Giuseppe “Joe the Boss” (c. 1880–1931)

Joe the Boss Masseria was the undisputed boss of the New York Mafia in the 1920s, a rank he achieved by knocking off a number of rivals for the throne. Masseria had come from Sicily in the early years of the 20th century with solid Mafia connections. He soon teamed up with Lupo the Wolf, often regarded as the cruelest mafioso in the country and the owner of the infamous Murder Stable in East Harlem where his foes or victims were hung on meat hooks.

Masseria looked like a round little cherub except for his cold eyes, which betrayed a fearsomeness that made him a worthy partner of Lupo. When the pair made extortion demands of Italian immigrants, their victims paid whether they could afford to or not. In 1920 Lupo went to prison on a counterfeiting charge and Masseria fell heir to his operations, the most important of which, with the onset of Prohibition, was control of the liquor stills and wine-making vats that were common in many Italian households.

The revenues from bootleg booze made Masseria richer than any Mafia leader before him, and he moved quickly to consolidate his power. Whenever any leader appeared to be gaining strength, Joe the Boss had him killed. He too was the subject of numerous assassination attempts. Once, two gunmen sent by his archrival, Umberto Valenti, shot at him as he left his Manhattan apartment on Second Avenue. Joe the Boss darted into a millinery shop, trailed by the gunners, whose bullets shattered windows and mirrors and hit Masseria’s straw hat twice. But they missed the Italian gangster, who thereby gained the mystique of being able to dodge bullets.

In due course, Joe the Boss announced he wanted to make peace with Valenti and asked for a conference to discuss terms. The pair met in an Italian restaurant on East 12th Street and Masseria pledged his loyalty to his new “brother.” As they left the restaurant, Masseria draped his arm over Valenti’s shoulders. On the sidewalk Joe the Boss suddenly moved away and Valenti was cut down by a hail of bullets.

Masseria ruled supreme for several years until he received a challenge, the most serious of all, from Salvatore Maranzano, who wanted to be the “boss of bosses.” Masseria was upset by the effrontery—after all, he was Joe the Boss. Soon, war broke out and bodies littered the streets in all the boroughs of New York.

Masseria felt secure. He had twice as many gunners as Maranzano had and some very able assistants as well. His top aide was Lucky Luciano, and among others were Joe Adonis, Frank Costello, Carlo Gambino, Willie Moretti and Albert Anastasia. And under them was a host of savage killers. Masseria especially liked Anastasia, who shared his own instincts for solving matters by murder, but he had to admit Luciano was his most cunning assistant, a brilliant planner and organizer. All these young hoods had one problem: they kept telling him the gang had to abandon the ways of the old country and make deals with other ethnic gangsters, like the Irish and the Jews. Luciano insisted everyone could make more money if they cooperated, and he and Adonis were working their bootleg rackets with the Bug and Meyer gang—Bugsy Siegel and Meyer Lansky. Joe the Boss did not trust Siegel and Lansky, and he bridled at working with Dutch Schultz, even if he had converted to Catholicism. Moreover, he disliked the fact that Costello was paying off all the politicians. It was all right to bribe an official now and then when needed, but one should not “sleep with them” all the time. The politicians would eventually corrupt you, Masseria felt, even though Luciano insisted it was the other way around.

Joe the Boss didn't realize that these younger mafiosi hated him as intently as they hated Maranzano. They looked forward to the day when they would be rid of all the "Mustache Petes," as they disdainfully called old country mafiosi. They even had secret contacts within the Maranzano organization, especially with Tommy Lucchese and Tom Gagliano, intended to stop the senseless killings between the groups so that everyone could just concentrate on making money.

Luciano counseled the others to bide their time until either Masseria killed Maranzano or vice versa, but by 1931 both leaders were still around and others were doing the dying. That year Luciano decided something had to be done. Since it would be easier to kill someone who trusted him rather than one who did not, he decided Joe the Boss would have to die first. On April 15, 1931 Luciano suggested to Masseria that they drive out to Coney Island for lunch. Joe the Boss agreed and they dined at a favorite underworld haunt, Nuova Villa Tamaro, owned by Gerardo Scarpato, an acquaintance of a number of gangsters. During lunch Joe the Boss gorged himself, and after the rest of the diners cleared out, he and Luciano played pinochle while owner Scarpato went for a walk along the beach.

About 3:30 P.M. Luciano went to the toilet. As soon as he left, four men came marching through the door. They were Vito Genovese, Joe Adonis, Albert Anastasia and Bugsy Siegel, loaned especially for the operation by Meyer Lansky, who was destined to become Luciano's closest associate. All pulled out guns and fired at Masseria. Six bullets hit home, and the reign of Joe the Boss came to an abrupt end.

In newspaper reports of the sensational assassination, Luciano told the police he had heard the shooting and, as soon as he had dried his hands, went out to see what was going on. Actually, Luciano's recollection was not accurately reported, possibly a form of self-censorship by the press. What he told the police was: "I was in the can taking a leak. I always take a long leak."

In any case, the first significant step in the Luciano-Lansky plan to establish a new national crime syndicate had been completed.

Massie Case Hawaiian murder case

Few criminal cases provoked as much racial hatred in the 1930s as Hawaii's Massie Case. Thalia Massie, the pretty wife of a young U.S. naval officer, Lt. Thomas H. Massie, was allegedly raped by five Hawaiians in Honolulu in 1931. News of the alleged crime led to racial tensions between Hawaiians and Americans and American sailors rioted in the streets. Thalia Massie was the daughter of socially prominent Mrs. Grace Fortescue of Long Island, N.Y., who promptly rushed to her daughter's side. Five beach boys were arrested and charged with the rape, but the case against them was weak. After the jury became deadlocked, a mistrial was declared. More battles between Hawaiians and Americans immediately broke out.

At this stage Mrs. Fortescue and Lt. Massie decided to take matters into their own hands, and together with two sailors, E. J. Lord and A. O. Jones, they made plans to force a confession out of one of the defendants. They grabbed Joseph Kahahawai right off the street and shoved him into a car. But a friend of Kahahawai had witnessed the abduction and provided police with the car's license number. About an hour and a half later, police located the vehicle bound for Koko Head, a bluff overlooking the sea. Inside they found Lt. Massie, Mrs. Fortescue, the two enlisted men and the body of Joe Kahahawai. He had been shot in the chest.

An investigation revealed the four had taken the man to the Massie home and questioned him there about the rape. Someone had shot him, but the four insisted they were in a "daze" and didn't know what had happened.

All four were charged with murder. The charge created such a sensation in Honolulu that a Marine detachment was assigned to maintain order. Reaction on the mainland was also strong. One day Mrs. Fortescue received what was described as a boatload of flowers from well-wishers. A Hearst newspaper headlined the case, "The Honor Slaying," and the American press in general reported all sorts of atrocity stories, later proved to be false, of rapes and assaults that had, according to a Hearst report, "forced decent white folks to take up arms to protect the honor of their women."

Mrs. Fortescue hired the aged Clarence Darrow to represent herself and the other three defendants, in what was to be one of the most sensational trials of the century. Darrow's task was enormous. He tried to establish that Lt. Massie had been suffering from "temporary insanity" but he would not admit that Massie had fired the fatal shot. In the end, the jury of five whites, three Europeans, three Chinese and one juror of mixed white-Oriental ancestry was partly swayed by Darrow's tactics and voted only a manslaughter conviction. The native population was satisfied when the defendants were all given 10 years, but the sentence caused an explosion back in the States.

Various congressmen demanded a presidential pardon be issued. A military boycott began, damaging the local economy, and soon, the territorial governor and Darrow engaged in intense negotiations over the sentences. In the middle of their talks, the governor received a call from President Herbert Hoover. The end result was one of the strangest sentencing agreements in American judicial history: the governor ordered the prisoners brought into court and had them “held” one hour before he commuted the remainder of their sentences. Part of the agreement called for the Massies and Mrs. Fortescue to leave the islands immediately.

Officially, the case ended there, but on reflection, much of the public decided the original rape case was not all it had seemed. Thalia Massie’s gynecologist was quoted as saying, “If I had . . . to tell everything I knew . . . it would have made monkeys out of everybody.” Two years after the incident the Massies were divorced. Lt. Massie eventually remarried and left the navy for private business. Thalia Massie’s later life included several suicide attempts and hospital confinements. She finally remarried before committing suicide in 1963.

Masterson, Edward J. (1852–1878) lawman

Ed Masterson, Bat Masterson’s older brother, enjoyed far more respect as a lawman than did Bat, who mainly was respected for his gunslinging prowess. Ed was inclined to rely more on talking than on gunfighting to uphold the law. It was a point of dispute between the brothers, with Bat insisting a lawman must inspire fear and, to that end, use his gun often.

Ed, like his brother, worked at a number of jobs before turning up as assistant city marshal of Dodge City, Kan. in 1877. There, he followed, as much as possible, a policy of keeping his gun holstered. Late that year he was wounded in the chest while arresting a drunken Texas cowboy named Bob Shaw in the Lone Star Dance Hall. Before the year was out, Ed had recovered sufficiently to take over as city marshal. Clearly, the citizens of Dodge City appreciated Ed’s style of settling things peacefully, unlike the style of brother Bat, who in the meantime had been elected sheriff of Ford County, which included Dodge.

Ed Masterson’s term of office was to last a little over four months, during which time he cajoled cowboys out of “hurrahing the town” and organized a “vagrant patrol” to arrest tramps, who then worked off their jail time by cleaning rubbish that accumulated on the streets. Ed Masterson was obviously a different kind of lawman.

Late on the evening of April 9, 1878, Marshal Masterson hurried over to the Lady Gay Dance Hall to try to disarm two drunken cowboys, Jack Wagner and Alf Walker. His gun, as usual, was in its holster. As both cowboys leveled their guns at him, Ed seized one of them and pinned him to a wall. Just then Bat Masterson came charging across the Sante Fe tracks to the rescue, taking a quick shot at the other cowboy. Finally, Ed Masterson felt he had no choice but to draw, and as he did, so did the cowboy he had been holding. In the next two seconds the two Mastersons shot both cowboys fatally, but Ed Masterson also suffered a mortal gunshot wound, which the Ford County Globe reported, was fired from such close range that “his clothes were on fire from the discharge of the pistol, which had been placed against the right side of his abdomen and ‘turned loose.’”

Ed Masterson’s funeral was one of Dodge City’s biggest. All businesses were closed and draped in mourning. The Dodge City Fire Company, to which Ed belonged, conducted the funeral. A choir stood by the marshal’s coffin in the parlor of the fire company and sang somber dirges. It was said that every buggy and wagon in workable condition joined the cortege to Masterson’s burial site in the military cemetery at Fort Dodge. The entire city council preceded the hearse, with Bat Masterson riding directly behind it. Behind Bat rode the 60 members of the fire company.

It was an outpouring of respect that Dodge City never gave another law official, and one that the city never would have given Bat Masterson, who was voted out of office the following year.

Masterson, James P. (1855–1895) lawman and gunfighter

The youngest of the three Masterson brothers, Jim Masterson engaged in far more shooting scrapes than his more famous brother, Bat, and was a more-accomplished lawman as well. Like Bat, he generally used his guns to serve the important political powers as a law officer in Dodge City and Ford County, Kan.

When not working as a law officer, Jim frequently operated saloons, in which capacity he had a number of gun battles with clients and partners alike. In one such confrontation, Jim shot and killed Al Updegraff, a bartender hired by his partner. As a result of this fray, both Jim and Bat, who also took part in the proceedings, were forced to leave Dodge City. However, Jim went on to hold a variety of law enforcement jobs, including that of U.S. marshal. In 1889 Jim was working in Ingalls, Kan., as a “deputy sheriff,” i.e., hired gunman, during that town’s bloody war with Cimarron over which would become the county seat.

In the early 1890s Masterson played a key role in cleansing the Oklahoma Territory of numerous outlaws and performed heroically against the Doolin gang at the famed Battle of Ingalls. Shortly thereafter, he developed “galloping consumption” and died in 1895.

There probably have been more lies told about Bat Masterson's gunfighting than that of any other Wild West character. A Kansas newspaper said of him in 1884: "He is credited with having killed one man for every year of his life. This may be exaggerated, but he is certainly entitled to a record of a dozen or more. He is a cool, brave man, pleasant in his manners, but terrible in a fight." However, even that newspaper's tally of Masterson's victims was more than a bit excessive; he actually killed only one gunfighter, Mel King, who outdrew him in a dance hall brawl and hit him with a near fatal shot before Bat gunned him down. Bat undoubtedly would have been killed had not a dance hall girl named Molly Brennan shielded him with her own body, absorbing a fatal shot, a situation for which Hollywood would be eternally grateful.

However, Masterson cannot be dismissed as merely a dapper fop. He was a genuine hero during a skirmish in which 35 buffalo hunters made a famous stand at the Battle of Adobe Walls, against 500 attacking Indians, and as a lawman, he was an effective peacemaker. So demonstrably fast on the draw, he simply was not challenged by other gunfighters. Masterson showed his great sharpshooting ability when he captured Spike Kennedy, the murderer of Dora Hand, knocking him off his horse with a rifle shot at what was described as a huge distance. As sheriff of Ford County, Kan., Masterson was part of the Dodge City Gang of Mayor James H. "Dog" Kelley and Marshal Wyatt Earp and he was not above taking his cut of the revenues from various vice operations, figuring such rewards came with the job. In fact, he was voted out of office because the citizens felt he was too free and easy with public money, having somehow managed to spend the then-staggering sum of $4,000 for five months' care and feeding of seven prisoners.

After his Dodge City days Bat drifted around the West, often showing up to help out Wyatt Earp or Luke Short whenever they needed it. His reputation always preceded him. Far more than even Earp's or Doc Holliday's, Bat's appearance was an invitation to silence and respect. This was partly due to sheer showmanship and his ability to tell a tall tale or two. When he didn't, friends of his would. A certain Dr. Cockerell once told the New York Sun how Bat had shot seven men dead in just a few minutes. He also described how Masterson had killed a Mexican father and son badman team and put their bodies in a sack. Dr. Cockerell, however, went on to tell how Bat had lost out on the reward for the pair because, after a ride of two days, the sun had "swelled and disfigured the heads so that they were unrecognizable, taking advantage of which the authorities refused to pay the reward."

A myth about Masterson which has persisted up to the present is that he carried a walking stick, or "bat," hence his nickname, which served either as a repository for a secret gun or as a club. Actually, his use of the walking stick was restricted to his later gambling days and did not account for his sobriquet, which he coined himself because he could not abide his given name of Bartholomew, which he officially changed to William Barclay.

In later years the once hard-drinking Masterson became an ardent prohibitionist and, as a special officer, even tried to close down the Dodge City saloons. This odd conversion occurred in 1885, just a year after Masterson, as one of the so-called Dodge City Peace Commissioners, had—by threat of force—brought back Luke Short to that town and reopened Dodge to all matters of vice and prostitution. Masterson's conversion did not last long; by 1886 he was working with Short at the White Elephant Saloon in Fort Worth, Tex.

Later, Masterson moved to Colorado, where he occasionally wore a badge but spent most of his time as a gentleman gambler and sport. He continued to drink heavily, and in 1902, no longer the expert gunman, he was run out of Denver by force. He went to New York City, where President Theodore Roosevelt, who had met him years before, appointed him a deputy U.S. marshal, a desk job entailing no old-style gunslinging. When President William Howard Taft refused to reappoint him, Masterson, through the intercession of Alfred Henry Lewis, established a name for himself as a writer, turning out a series of articles on his gunslinger acquaintances. Lewis later helped him become sports editor of the New York Morning Telegraph.

In a sense, Masterson achieved a greater measure of respectability than any of his gunfighter pals. In 1921 he died of a heart attack working at his desk on his next column. It read: "There are many in this old world of ours who hold that things break about even for us. I have observed, for example, that we all get about the same amount of ice. The rich get it in the summer-time and the poor get it in the winter."

Mather, Cotton (1663–1728) promoter of Salem witch trials

The American colonial clergyman Cotton Mather, it has been said, was simultaneously the most intelligent and the most stupid man this country has ever produced. He was the author of no less than 450 books on many erudite subjects, but he was also obsessed by witches. With his fiery sermons, Mather was probably the man most responsible for the Salem witchcraft mania of 1692. He encouraged the persecutions, which finally ended only because of public revulsion. Among the many contributions Dr. Mather made on the general subject of witchcraft was the theory that the devil spoke perfect Greek, Hebrew and Latin, but that his English was hampered by an odd accent.

Mather, Mysterious Dave (1845–?) lawman and outlaw

outlaw, serving as marshal of several frontier towns and spending as much time in their jails.

Little is known of Mather's life before he reached the age of 28 except that he was from Massachusetts and appears to have been, as he claimed, a direct descendant of Cotton Mather. Mather earned his nickname Mysterious not so much because his escapades were unknown but because it was a mystery how he got away with so many of them. It was pretty well established that Mather became involved in cattle rustling in 1873. The following year in Dodge City, Kan. he worked sometimes as a gambler and sometimes as a peace officer. Dave kept drifting in and out of Dodge City over the years and ran up quite a record as a killer and a lawbreaker in general. It was often said—and believed—that he once killed seven men in a single gunfight, but the facts are hard to pin down.

In one of his law-abiding phases, Mather headed a vigilance committee that strung up horse thieves. Operating on the other side of the law, he and Wyatt Earp ran a con racket in 1878 in which they sold "gold bricks" to gullible cowboys in Mobeetie, Tex. The following year Mather was accused of train robbery but the charge was dropped because of insufficient evidence. Mysterious Dave was again on the side of the law in 1880, aiding Las Vegas Marshal Joe Carson battle the Henry gang. In the gunfight, in which the marshal was killed, Mather shot dead one of the gang and wounded another, who was taken off to jail. Three days later, he killed a third member. When the last two gang members were rounded up and put behind bars, Mather led a lynch mob to the local jail and there they dispensed rope justice to the three survivors of the gang. Within a few months Dave left the Las Vegas scene following accusations that he had engaged in "promiscuous shooting." After some drifting and apparently more lawbreaking, he took a job as assistant marshal in El Paso, Tex., but he found the remuneration poor and turned to procuring for a time. Mather was slightly wounded one day for reasons that are unclear. Either because he had tried to skip out with a prostitute's entire wages or because he had attempted to hold up a whorehouse, he was shot and butcher-knifed by an angry madam. In any event, he returned to law work in Dodge City as assistant city marshal.

In February 1884 Mather lost his position following an election, and he suffered the added annoyance of being succeeded in the job by Tom Nixon, with whom he had never gotten along. By this time Mysterious Dave had set himself up in the saloon business, the same activity Nixon engaged in after his normal working hours. The two got into a price war over beer, and when Mather got the best of it, Nixon used his law enforcement job to cut off his competitor's beer supply.

The conflict eventually led to a gun battle, but it appears that the immediate cause of the shooting was Dave's attention to Nixon's young wife. As Mather came out of his saloon on July 18, 1884, Nixon took a shot at him and fled, thinking he had killed his quarry. But Mysterious Dave had been hit by nothing worse than flying splinters. Nixon was arrested, but Mather refused to press charges, preferring to exact private justice. Three days later, on July 21, 1884, Nixon was lounging in front of a Front Street saloon. The last words he heard were a whispered "Hello, Tom." Then Mather put four bullets in Nixon's back, killing him instantly.

Mysterious Dave was brought to trial for the murder. In a verdict that could happen only in the American West, he was acquitted on grounds of self-defense. After all, Nixon had started the shooting three days earlier.

The following year Mather killed a man and, in a separate shooting, wounded two others. He was finally run out of Dodge by the town's fearless marshal, Bill Tilghman. Moving on, Mather did short stints as city marshal in a couple of small towns in Kansas and Nebraska. After that, his trail disappears. According to unconfirmed accounts, he served in the Canadian Mounties, but other reports say he became an outlaw up north. There was a story that he was alive in Alberta, Canada as late as 1915. Mather's final years remain a mystery.

mattress girls prostitutes

Almost from its founding, New Orleans became the sex capital of America and the mecca for countless traveling prostitutes seeking to make a living in the world's oldest profession. Competition was so intense and the houses so crowded that many prostitutes could not find lodgings and took to carrying a mattress on their heads, ready to set up for business in an alley or open field. Some of them branched out from New Orleans, trekking up the Mississippi or westward with their trusty mattresses on their heads. The call "Mattress girl a-comin'" often caused considerable excitement. In time, reform elements in various communities, including New Orleans, either drove such prostitutes away or into houses where it was felt they belonged, and a quaint, if demeaning, custom vanished from the scene.

Mattson, Charles (1926–1937) kidnap murder victim

Few kidnap-murder cases upset America as much as that of 10-year-old Charles Mattson. With Christmas just two days past, three of the Mattson children and a young playmate were happily planning the rest of the holiday season in the Tacoma, Wash. home of Dr. W. W. Mattson. As the children—the three Mattsons, Charles, 10, William, 14, and Muriel, 16, and their visitor, Virginia Chatfield, 16—talked, they were unaware of a shadowy figure watching them from the darkness outside the French doors. Suddenly, the intruder, a scarf masking his face, pushed through the glass doors and entered the room, brandishing a .38 revolver.

At first, the man demanded money, but when the children told him they had none, he announced, "All right, I'll take the kid." As he seized Charles, his scarf dropped and the other children saw a coarse-featured man of 25 to 35 years old with a break in the bridge of his nose. He was about five feet eight and wore a tan checked cap, dark trousers and a zippered jacket. He readjusted the scarf and then backed from the room, holding his prisoner. Just before he left, he threw a prepared ransom note on the floor, indicating that kidnapping was his intention from the first.

The note, prepared with what appeared to be a toy printing set, demanded a $28,000 ransom. Charles Mattson was never to be seen alive again. Negotiations for the child's release were carried on through personal ads in the newspapers. The parents were harrowed not only by the kidnapping but also by unrelenting coverage of the press, radio and newsreels. In fact, some authorities have always felt the circuslike atmosphere created by the media finally panicked the kidnapper into killing his young victim.

On January 11, 1937 a rabbit hunter found little Charles' body in an open field near Everett, Wash. Bits of orange pulp were found in the child's mouth, indicating that the killer had murdered the boy as he was eating.

In the ensuing years the FBI questioned some 26,000 suspects in the case but failed to come up with a solution. Among the 400 kidnap cases the FBI has investigated since given that duty in 1932, the Mattson case is one of only four that the agency has failed to solve. Ironically, young Charles had been a playmate of George Weyerhaeuser, who had been kidnapped in 1935 but released when his father, wealthy lumberman John Philip Weyerhaeuser, paid a $200,000 ransom. In that case the kidnapers were captured and convicted. After Charles Mattson's death Weyerhaeuser established an endowment in his memory at the Children's Orthopedic Hospital in Seattle.

Maury County, Tennessee jail fire

One of the most bizarre jail fires in American history occurred on June 27, 1977 at the Maury County Jail in Columbia, Tenn. The fire was all the more tragic in that it took place during visiting hours.

A juvenile prisoner started the fire in his cell. As the plastic padding in the young arsonist's cell burned, it produced cyanide and carbon monoxide gases, which were quickly transmitted to all parts of the jail through the ventilation system. As the poisonous smoke came pouring out of the air ducts into the prisoners' cells, panic ensued and visitors stampeded blindly through the corridors. When a prison guard realized what was happening, he hurried to unlock the cell block doors, but he was bowled over by the panicked visitors and the keys disappeared among the shuffling feet. There was another set of keys in the jailer's office but no one had the presence of mind to locate them. By the time the cell doors were battered open, 42 persons, virtually all prisoners or their relatives, had died from the poisonous fumes. In some cases entire families were wiped out; one inmate, for instance, died along with his parents, his wife and his sister. Ironically, many of the prisoners had not even been convicted but were awaiting trial.

While the 1980s have been called the decade of the superswindler—producing such financial felons as Michael Milken, Ivan Boesky, Charles Keating, and the like—Robert Maxwell was in a class of his own.

Maxwell, a flamboyant Czech-born British publisher, was regarded by many as a brilliant ringmaster who fought his way up from poverty and personal tragedy to build a financial empire that made him one of the business world's most feared operators. In the 1980s Maxwell eagerly sought the mantle of savior of downtrodden newspapers, such as Britain's Mirror Group newspapers and New York's Daily News.

Then began what may be called Maxwell's "Operation Siphon." It will take years into the 21st century to unravel the full extent of Maxwell's depredations, but it became clear that he and perhaps a few others siphoned off at least $1.63 billion from pension funds and the two flagship companies of his publishing empire, Mirror Group and Maxwell Communications Corp. The total losses to the pension funds and other creditors will at some point escalate by many billions of dollars more.

Maxwell died at sea, having either fallen, been pushed or jumped from his luxury yacht, Lady Ghislaine. Was he murdered to be silenced? Had he died accidentally? Or had he finally decided the jig was up and taken his own life? Of the alternatives, the last seems the more likely since, according to investigators, he faced certain exposure in a matter of days.

Actually the most amazing aspect of his crimes was that Maxwell had gotten away with them for so many years, considering that 20 years earlier Great Britain's Superswindler Robert Maxwell was for a time hailed as the savior of the ailing New York Daily News when he took it over. Then he began what was later called "Operation Siphon," looting pension funds at the News and his other holdings and cheating creditors out of many billions.

Board of Trade found that he was not "in our opinion a person who could be relied on to exercise proper stewardship of a publicly quoted company." Nevertheless, Maxwell continued to thrive, proving that nothing succeeds in fraud like excessive success. Even while picking up the nickname "The Bouncing Czech," Maxwell blithely went from one megadeal to the next, using looted assets to keep afloat the heavily indebted private companies at the heart of his empire.

In the firestorm after Maxwell's death, even the most austere elements of the British press descended to colorful and livid terms to denounce him as a "fraudster on a grand scale." Whittam Smith, editor of The Independent, declared, "He was a crook. Shareholders other than his family were lambs to be fleeced; pensions were fair game." Peter Jenkins wrote in the same publication: "Ask anyone with knowledge of financial matters the secret of his success, and they would explain how he could make money move from bank to bank, company to company, faster than the eye could see. Some called this wizardry business, but most knew in their hearts that Maxwell was simply not kosher, no friend of widows and orphans."

Within a month of Maxwell's death, his financial empire had crumbled in bankruptcies. Perhaps Maxwell knew the house of cards was rushing headlong to collapse. In a television interview shortly before his death, Maxwell said in response to a question that in the hereafter he couldn't say if he would meet his "maker . . . or the banker."

MAXWELL Street police station

Maxwell left a few somewhat laughing—but far many more stone-cold broke.

Maxwell Street police station Chicago's most corrupt precinct

When in the early 1920s Charles C. Fitzmorris, Chicago's chief of police, publicly stated, "Sixty percent of my police are in the bootleg business," he was not referring to the Maxwell Street police precinct in the heart of Little Italy. There, the percentage was placed, according to a popular saying, at 110 percent, which was not a mathematical impossibility. Chicago's Little Italy at the time was the heart of the city's bootleg alcohol production and was for thousands of immigrant families a sort of cottage industry that earned them a rather fine living. This racket was controlled by the notorious Gennas, a family of five ruthless brothers. The Gennas induced Italian families to set up portable copper stills in their kitchens or the back rooms of their stores for extracting alcohol from corn sugar. In return, they received a set fee of $15 a day, far more than immigrants could make as simple laborers. Those families that refused usually changed their minds quickly when they received Black Hand threats. So pervasive was the "alky cooking" that all of Little Italy was enveloped in the stink of fermenting mash.

It was an activity that could hardly be kept secret from the police of the Maxwell Street precinct, a matter the Gennas easily handled with bribes. There was plenty of money available for police graft, since a home still could produce 350 gallons of raw alcohol a week for considerably less than $1 a gallon and the Gennas, after processing the alcohol further in their plant at 1022 Taylor Street, sold the product wholesale for $6 a gallon.

The Maxwell Street cops got their cut out of this huge gross, being paid $10 to $125 a month depending on their importance and length of service. There were regular payoffs to some 400 officers plus larger stipends for plainclothesmen, detectives attached to the state attorney's office and five police captains. All day on the monthly payday, police officers would troop in and out of the Taylor Street plant, many openly counting their graft on the street. The Gennas found they had to contend with a particularly venal form of police dishonesty, officers from other precincts showing up and pretending to be from the Maxwell Street station, hence the 110 percent figure. The local police brass solved this dilemma by furnishing the gang with a list of badge numbers to check all claims against. Because an occasional Genna truck would be seized by police in other parts of the city while making deliveries, the Maxwell Street precinct also supplied police escorts through such dangerous zones. The police tried to shut down those alky cookers not working for the Gennas but were generally put off when the independents insisted they were operating Genna stills. To solve that problem, the Gennas supplied the police with a complete list of their stills. Whenever a private operation was unearthed, the police would move in with axes and destroy it, often alerting the newspapers in advance so that the precinct's aggressive fight against crime would be publicized.

Michael Meager and his twin brother, John, came to America from their native Ireland with their father, Timothy, and settled in Kansas. Both brothers became local lawmen. Mike eventually won fame as the marshal who taught Wyatt Earp all he knew.

Mike served several years as city marshal of Wichita with John as his deputy. John later was elected sheriff but quit after one year to follow the gambling trail, eventually becoming the owner of several saloons. After a short stint as a deputy U.S. marshal tracking down horse thieves, Mike again became city marshal of Wichita, which had grown into a rip-roarin', shot-em-up cattle town in need of taming. One of his deputies was Wyatt Earp. Meagher managed to quiet Wichita down and reduce the size of his force at the same time.

In 1877 Meagher shot and killed Sylvester Powell, who had wounded the marshal while resisting arrest. The killing weighed on Meagher, and he decided not to run for reelection later that year. All through Wichita's worst shooting years, Meagher had kept order without ever having to kill a man, but now his record had been bloodied. Killing was not something Meagher was proud of, a feeling he failed to instill in Wyatt Earp. Meagher moved on to Caldwell, Kan. and was its mayor for a time. He quit politics to open a saloon. When murders became common in Caldwell, the townspeople asked him to take the marshal's job, but Meagher refused, telling them he no longer wanted to be a lawman. He would, however, leave his saloon to put on a badge temporarily when the marshal called for help. On one such mission in 1881, Meagher was murdered by an unidentified gunman.

In the pecking order of J. Edgar Hoover's pet hates, Gaston Bullock Means stood close to the top of the list and deservedly so, since Means was perhaps the most outrageous figure to appear on the Washington scene in the 20th century.

At one point this rogue of unsurpassed effrontery stood almost at the top of the list of future candidates to become head of what was then called the Bureau of Investigation, later renamed the Federal Bureau of Investigation. He was, in William J. Burns' words, "the greatest natural detective ever known." The word "detective" easily could have been replaced by such terms as con man, swindler, hoaxer, spy, influence peddler, blackmailer and, quite possibly, murderer. His depredations were astonishing. Only Gaston Means, for instance, could do more to besmirch the administration of Warren G. Harding than the Ohio Gang and Teapot Dome. Always the opportunist, he made more money out of the Lindbergh kidnapping than did Bruno Hauptmann.

Means, born in North Carolina in 1880, had a most undistinguished record as, among other things, a towel salesman and sometimes lawyer. When he joined the Burns Detective Agency in 1910, it was in this period that Means so impressed Burns, using such standard private detective cons as "secret informants" and other phony methods indicative of investigative prowess to impress his superior.

In 1915 Means left the agency for bigger and better things, becoming bodyguard and financial overseer for madcap heiress Maude R. King. There is strong reason to suspect that Means gained Mrs. King's confidence by arranging to have a thug fake a robbery attempt on her and some friends on a Chicago street, a crime frustrated by the gallant appearance of Means. In no time at all, the con artist was managing the woman's financial affairs and by 1917, he had bilked her out of some $150,000. Even as flighty a person as Maude King eventually got a bit upset about her losses, but Means solved this problem by taking her on a hunting trip to North Carolina. Mrs. King, unaccustomed to such sport, was shot to death on the trip. Means was tried for murder but acquitted; the conclusion was that the woman had committed suicide.

Means' activities were not confined to swindling heiresses. During World War I he hired out as both a secret agent for the Germans (with duties to disrupt British shipping) and at the same time, as a counterspy for the British against the Germans. Eventually—before the United States entered the war—Means severed his German connections, probably less because of patri-tism than because of the difficulty he encountered in collecting his pay. Quite naturally, he shifted his activities to U.S. Army Intelligence.

When the Harding Administration came to power in 1921, Burns brought his old friend Means into the Bureau of Investigation, which enraged Hoover, who was made assistant director of the agency. Although the bureau was rife with bribe takers during this period, Means upgraded the graft system to a fine art. He was also busy, as he subsequently revealed, in the employ of Mrs. Harding, secretly investigating her husband's love affairs and paternity situation. For a time Means came under such a cloud that he was dropped from his job, but he was quickly reinstated as an "informant" through Burns' good offices. A short time later, Means was indicted for a scheme in which he had swindled a number of bootleggers by telling them he was collecting graft for Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon. During a Senate committee investigation, Means told how he had acted as a go-between in the payment of $50,000 to an associate of Attorney General Harry Daugherty to have a $6 million government suit against an aircraft concern killed.

In this same period Means was also busy attempting to blackmail the Hardings for $50,000 with the accusation that the president had fathered a child by Nan Britton, an undistinguished young poetess from Ohio. After Harding died in office, Means tried to make his money by coauthoring a book with Nan Britton entitled The President's Daughter. Eventually, Means went to prison for his bribery scams. When he emerged in 1930, he further pursued his literary career with a scandalous best-seller, The Strange Death of President Harding, in which he implied Mrs. Harding had poisoned her husband.

Means capped his career of unbridled roguery by concocting a swindle to capitalize on the Lindbergh baby kidnapping. He convinced another flighty heiress, Mrs. Evalyn Walsh McLean, that through his underworld contacts he could recover the child. Mrs. McLean gave him $100,000 for the ransom and $4,000 for his own expenses. The child was not recovered, and Means did not give back the money, instead telling the woman one preposterous story after another. He finally insisted he had returned the money to an associate of Mrs. McLean, but his story was proved false and he went to prison for 15 years.

When Means suffered a heart attack in 1938, Hoover dispatched FBI agents to his prison hospital bed to learn the whereabouts of Mrs. McLean's money. Means gave them a puckish smile and died.

In a century that has seen monumental strides in pharmaceuticals, general medicine and surgery, medical quackery has become among the most lucrative criminal activities in the United States. The public wastes hundreds of millions and probably billions of dollars each year on “miracle” and “sure-cure” medicines, cosmetics, drugs and therapeutic devices. Particularly victimized are persons who have incurable diseases and those with great fear of going to doctors.

Typical cures are those that will grow hair on a bald head and renew sexual vigor in older men. In fact, there are nostrums for every human ailment from hemorrhoids to cancer. Devices offered include a magnetized copper bracelet with magical powers against rheumatism and arthritis, an electric rolling pin that melts fat and a plug-in vibrating cushion that cures arthritis and varicose veins. Concentrated seawater, according to those who sell it, will do away with such varied ailments as diabetes, baldness and cancer, among other things, while offering our bodily glands “a chemical smorgasbord.”

One of the more unique instruments sold some years ago was a set of two small rubber hammers for people tired of wearing glasses all the time. They were instructed to tap their eyes with the hammers 200 times a day as a method of “strengthening” them. Then they were to put a mask over their eyes for total relaxation and rest. When the mask was removed, quite a few of the victims sported two perfect black eyes. But the promoter even turned this development into a plus by insisting that the discoloration indicated the victim was eminently susceptible to the treatment and that if the hammers were used on the male genital organs, such tapping would increase virility.

Probably the biggest con man in the cancer field was Norman Baker, who battled postal inspectors with every available legal delaying tactic for almost a decade before he was put out of business. Baker’s empire mushroomed to include a number of hospitals and radio stations, and he even published a newspaper in Iowa. It was charged that he fed his patients large amounts of flavored waters and acids as a cancer cure. Since he gave the patients in his hospitals no substantial foods, his operating expenses were greatly reduced. In the process, a great many of his patients, understandably, died, but Baker was nonetheless able to accumulate millions of dollars. His achievement was even more monumental considering the punishment he later received: four years imprisonment and a $4,000 fine.

According to postal inspectors, the two main obstacles to successful prosecution of medical quacks are the fact that potential chief witnesses against them often die before the case reaches court and the mistaken belief of many of their victims that they are getting treatment the “medical interests” and the American Medical Association in particular conspire to keep from the public.

Megan’s Law public notice about sex offenders

Because of a growing perception on the part of the public that many sex crime offenders are extremely likely to repeat their offenses and that psychiatry has been unable to reform many, by the mid-1980s there was a move in many localities to alter the laws so that the public would have a measure of protection. Various localities and states put into effect a number of such measures, the most comprehensive being the so-called Megan’s Law, which was enacted by the New Jersey state legislature in 1994 after seven-year-old Megan Kanka was murdered by a twice-convicted sex offender then living across the street from the Kanka home.

Under the statute, notification could be made to community members, school principals, coaches and Scout troop leaders when an ex-offender lived or moved into a community and was classified as “high risk.” By the end of the decade virtually every state in the Union had adopted somewhat similar legislation. The practice, however, was considered spotty in a number of jurisdictions, but perhaps the most public disclosure was made in Alaska, which in 1997 posted a list on the Internet naming every one of the state’s 1,600 paroled sex offenders.

Famed, not entirely accurately, as a “hired killer who never was caught,” Robert Meldrum was, next to Tom Horn, probably the most notorious gunman employed by what Westerners called “the interests,” generally meaning ranchers and mine operators who wanted troublesome nesters and activists neutralized. As was common in such matters, the case or cases against Meldrum were always shrouded in mystery and controversy. When he arrived in Baggs, Wyo. in 1899, Meldrum had the reputation of a paid killer. According to local tales, he was a New Yorker, the son of a British army officer. The following year Meldrum was appointed town marshal of Dixon, Wyo., quite possibly based on his supposed ability to handle troublemakers. During the course of his duties there, he won fame for killing Noah Wilkinson, a Texas outlaw with a price on his head.

In 1901 Meldrum quit being a lawman in favor of more lucrative work as a guard at the Smuggler Union Mine in Telluride, Colo., which was having strike troubles. Shortly after Meldrum’s appearance, a number of the strikers were assassinated, and it was suspected that Meldrum had done the killings. He also had dealings with Tom Horn, another paid killer of the interests. A popular notion was that Meldrum helped Horn with a number of range assassinations. When Horn was hanged for his crimes in November 1903, there was speculation that his silence had saved Meldrum from a similar fate.

Over the next four years Meldrum had two brushes with the law: once, in 1904, when he killed a miner, apparently for the offense of smuggling whiskey into the workings in violation of company rules; and again, in 1908, when he killed another miner, a man named Lambert, who was considered a troublemaker. The first matter did not even reach the indictment stage and the second resulted in a not-guilty verdict. In 1910 Meldrum, back in Baggs, committed a “personal” killing shooting down John “Chick” Bowen because of the attention Bowen was paying to Meldrum’s common-law wife. The personal nature of the killing did not prevent a number of ranchers from raising Meldrum’s $18,000 bail, which he promptly jumped. Six years elapsed before Meldrum surrendered to stand trial, and there was considerable speculation that his friends among the ranchers and mine operators had made a deal for him. That theory seems to have been borne out by Meldrum’s relatively light sentence of five to seven years for a reduced charge of manslaughter. After serving only three months, he was paroled into the custody of an obliging rancher.

Following that experience Meldrum’s gunslinging days appeared at an end, as much due to the general taming of the area as to his own advancing years. For a time he ran a saddler’s business in Walcott, Wyo., but he was still known as a man with a violent temper and one to stay clear of. Meldrum’s business burned down in 1929; some said the fire was the result of one of his rages and others claimed it was the work of enemies. Shortly thereafter, Meldrum disappeared from sight.

Menendez Brothers parent killers

In one of the most explosive California murder cases of the late 1900s—even coming close to rivaling the notorious O. J. Simpson trial—two brothers, Lyle Menendez, 21, and Erik Menendez, 18, shotgunned their wealthy parents to death in 1989. But was it a crime or self-defense?

The boys’ shocking defense was that they had killed their parents, entertainment executive Jose Menendez and Kitty Menendez, because, they said, they feared their parents were going to kill them to prevent them from revealing years of sexual and emotional abuse by the couple. Both brothers said they had been sexually abused by their father between the ages of 6 and 8. So they slaughtered their parents with a pair of shotguns as they watched television in the Beverly Hills mansion. The prosecution charged that the brothers committed their crime to inherit an estate valued at $14 million and pointed to the brothers’ wild spending spree after the slayings. Lyle got himself a Porsche and Erik a private tennis coach. The brothers at first claimed alibis, and it was not until Erik confessed to his therapist, who notified the law, that they were arrested.

The brothers’ first trial was televised and became almost the obsession that the Simpson trial caused not long afterward. A feisty defense lawyer, Leslie Abramson, became a media star as she managed to pull out a hung jury after filling the record with tales of parental mistreatment and provoking nationwide outrage at the “abuse excuse.”

It was charged in some legal circles that the televising of the trial made the sensationalism of the case so compelling that a conviction was impossible. In the second trial however the judge banned television and excluded much of the lurid abuse testimony, which was relegated to the possible punishment phase of the proceedings. The judge also rejected the defense’s argument of “imperfect self-defense,” which reasoned that even if there was no real threat of attack, the brothers’ fears were genuine. The judge ruled the argument was invalid since it was the siblings who had set up the final confrontation with their parents. The brothers had indeed laid in wait for their parents.

On March 20, 1996, the Menendez brothers were convicted of first-degree murder. They were both sentenced to life imprisonment without the possibility of parole. What may have been even more crushing for the brothers was that they were not confined to the same institution. Erik was confined at the California State Prison in Sacramento County and Lyle at the California Correctional Institution at Tehachapi.

“Merrick, Pulling a Dick” saying for a lucky survival In Missouri the saying “pulling a Dick Merrick” was more popular in the 1860s and 1870s than the expression “a Frank Merriwell finish” was in the 1920s and connoted an even more miraculous conclusion to a tight situation.

In 1864 Dick Merrick and Jebb Sharp were convicted and sentenced to hang in Jackson County for the robbery and murder of a horse trader named John Bascum. It was a period of no-nonsense treatment of murderers, and the execution was scheduled to be held the day after the jury’s verdict. Early that morning the condemned pair were rousted out of their jail beds and duly dispatched. On returning to the jail, Deputy Sheriff Clifford Stewart was stunned to find Merrick and Sharp sitting in their cell. It took a few hours for the sad truth to be uncovered. During the night two drunks had been heaved into a cell to sleep off their inebriation, and it was they who had been taken to the scaffold. Since the pair were still so boozed up, they were in no condition to protest, indeed to comprehend, what was being done to them. Quickly, the matter was rushed to the sentencing judge, who ruled that since the men had not been hanged at the prescribed time, they had to be released. Merrick and Sharp wasted no time raising dust on the trail, leaving behind only the folklore about “pulling a Dick Merrick.”

Merrick, Suds (?–1884) burglar and river pirate

For most of the 1860s and into the 1870s, Suds Merrick was one of the most-renowned river pirates in New York City. He was one of the coleaders of the Hook Gang, which plundered the East River docks and cargo boats moored there. The Hookers were at least 100 strong, and many of their crimes were masterminded by Merrick.

In 1874 Merrick, Sam McCracken, Johnny Gallagher and Tommy Bonner boarded the canal boat Thomas H. Brick, tied up the captain and set about looting the cargo at their leisure until they were surprised by police. Merrick escaped by diving overboard, but his three accomplices were captured and sentenced to long terms at Auburn Prison.

After the incident, Merrick fell into disfavor with the Hookers, who were suspicious about the affair. Some thought Merrick must have been in trouble with the law and set up the trio in exchange for his own freedom. Since there was no proof of this, he was simply allowed to resign from the gang. For the next 10 years Merrick operated as a lone wolf, carrying out numerous burglaries and muggings. He was ignored by the rest of the Hookers, and there is no record of other criminals attacking him, which indeed would have been a foolhardy enterprise since Merrick was virtually unbeatable in a fight at anything near even odds. He never ventured abroad without a knife and gun and generally wore brass knuckles or carried a blackjack up his sleeve. In 1884 he was found murdered in the Bowery. There were no clues as to who might have done the killing, and the police seemed singularly unconcerned about solving the case, considering the murder a definite civic improvement.

Metesky, George Peter (1903–1994) New York’s “Mad Bomber”

Starting in 1950, New York’s mysterious Mad Bomber terrorized New York City for eight years, planting 32 homemade bombs in train stations and movie theaters, including Radio City Music Hall. The bombings injured 15 people and created a period of anxiety that was said to have hurt Manhattan’s theater business as much as television did.

Actually, the Mad Bomber had gone through an earlier period of maniacal bombings in 1940–41, virtually all of them duds. Then a decade later, the Bomber started up again, this time more efficient in his production of explosives. The bombings were followed by notes that ranted about the local utility company, Consolidated Edison. He often signed these notes “Fair Play.” Metesky set off bombs in Radio City Music Hall, Grand Central Station, Penn Station and several theaters. A train porter at Penn Station was permanently crippled by one of the bombs and seven persons suffered serious injuries from a blast in a theater.

The hunt for the Mad Bomber got nowhere for years until he wrote a letter to a newspaper in which he once more castigated Consolidated Edison and charged the company had caused him to contract tuberculosis. Finally, a close study of the firm’s records turned up a former employee, George Peter Metesky, who in 1931 had had an accident working for the company and had previously made a claim of having developed tuberculosis on the job.

Metesky was taken into custody at his home in Waterbury, Conn. and accused of attempted murder. The assortment of charges against Metesky made him liable to a total of 1,235 years imprisonment, but he was found criminally insane and incarcerated in a mental hospital in New York state. Pronounced cured some 15 years later, Metesky was set free in 1973 and had the charges against him dropped. A bachelor in his seventies, Metesky went home to take care of his ailing sister and later rejected a marriage proposal from a pen pal.

Named after a Chicago barkeep, a Mickey Finn is a drink used to put a victim into a state of collapse so that he can be robbed. Mickey Finn did not originate the drink but bought the recipe of a secret voodoo mixture that could be added to alcohol and water.

Finn, who operated the Lone Star Saloon and Palm Garden on Chicago’s notorious Whisky Row during the Gay Nineties, ordered his employees to give the drink to any lone customer. Two of the employees, Isabelle Ffyffe and Gold Tooth Mary Thornton, eventually testified before a special crime commission. Gold Tooth Mary, so named because her single tooth was crowned with the precious metal, explained the potency of the drink: “When the victims drink this dopey stuff, they get talkative, walk around in a restless manner, and then fall into a deep sleep, and you can’t arouse them until the effect of the drug wears off.” While so incapacitated, the victim would be lugged into the back room, where Finn, in an odd ritual, would be waiting in a derby hat and a clean white apron to “operate.” The victim would be searched to the skin for valuables, and if articles of clothing were deemed to have any worth, they too would be taken. The victim would then be dressed in old rags and dumped in an alley. When he awoke, he seldom had any recollections of what had happened. Eventually, Finn lost his license and was put out of business. He thereupon sold his secret recipe to several other eager saloon keepers and use of Mickey Finns soon spread throughout the country.

Midnight Rose’s “office” of Murder, Inc.

Midnight Rose’s was a seedy little Brooklyn candy store, at the intersection of Saratoga and Livonia avenues under the elevated New York subway tracks, where probably more murders were planned than anywhere in the world. In the late 1930s the store was owned by a woman who kept it open 24 hours a day and was thus called Midnight Rose. Early in the morning and late at night, the gunmen, knife specialists and garroters of Murder, Inc. gathered on the corner and in the store. Midnight Rose’s was the assembly room and dispatch office for homicide specialists who worked out the details for the elimination of an estimated 300 to 500 victims.

Midnight Terrors Gay Nineties New York gang

One of the most mindless, vicious street gangs in New York in the 1890s was the Midnight Terrors, named for their nocturnal muggings. Overflowing with self-esteem, the Terrors decided to form a baseball team. They raised money for uniforms and equipment in their home territory, the First Ward, by robbing and beating anyone who seemed likely to have money; as one of the Terrors said, “Dat’s de way we was to get the uniforms for de ball club.”

The Terrors enjoyed considerable freedom from a police department not eager for confrontations as long as they confined their depredations to their own area and to their “own kind.” The Terrors, however, carried their actions to the public parks and even to their baseball games. Watching them was not the safest activity for a baseball fan, as some of the bench warmers would circulate in the crowd looking for potential mugging victims. The Terrors disappeared around the late 1890s, victims of their own crude operating methods, which resulted in their repression.

As a result of the scandals and prosecutions of the 1980s and early 1990s a debate left unsettled was who among the perpetrators did the most damage and walked away with the most loot. For a time Ivan Boesky was labeled by the press as the most “successful.” However, Boesky could make the point that he was nowhere near being the biggest crook in American finance. He could point to Michael R. Milken, the junk bond king of Drexel Burnham Lambert, Inc., who was nailed after Boesky’s cooperation.

Milken had risen to fame as the main force creating the huge market for junk bonds, the high-yield, high-risk debt securities that marked the corporate takeover boom of the 1980s. Milken did not go down easily, spending an estimated $1 million a month for several years fighting the federal government’s case against him. He finally reversed his tactics and pleaded guilty in 1990 to six felony counts involving securities fraud and agreed to pay the lion’s share of a cash settlement by himself and his cohorts, which was eventually fixed at $1.3 billion in fines and restitution costs to victims.

Still, there were those who objected to the deal, insisting that Milken had forced the government to drop the more serious charges of racketeering and insider trading. They also complained about his being able to keep about $125 million of his personal fortune. In addition, his immediate family maintained more than $300 million in assets, meaning that the settlement could leave the convicted junk bond dealer with close to a half billion dollars. Milken drew a 10-year prison term, with sentencing judge Kimba M. Wood declaring, “When a man of your power in the financial world, at the head of one of the most important banking houses in this country, repeatedly conspires to violate, and violates, securities and tax laws in order to achieve more power and wealth for himself and his wealthy clients, and commits financial crimes that are particularly hard to detect, a significant prison term is required in order to deter others.”

The 10-year sentence was not permanent. Milken negotiated with the government and provided evidence against others (although critics said his offerings were less than adequate). For his cooperation Judge Wood reduced Milken’s sentence to 33 months and 26 days so that he could be released on parole after 24 months. The judge said she also took into account Milken’s good behavior in prison, where he had been tutoring other prisoners and had set up a prison library. Milken was also sentenced to 1,800 hours of community service. Barred from doing any more stock deals, Milken hardly maintained a low profile in business matters.

Miller, Bill “The Killer” (1905–1931) partner of Pretty Boy Floyd

A remarkable young criminal, William Miller, better known in the underworld as Bill the Killer, molded Charles “Pretty Boy” Floyd into a future public enemy.

It was not an easy task, since Floyd, four years older than Miller, was a trigger-happy punk who preferred to shoot first and think afterward. In 1930, after jumping out of a train window while en route to the Ohio State Penitentiary, Floyd made his way to Toledo to hook up with Miller, who had been recommended by another criminal as a man who could be trusted. Floyd immediately suggested they start robbing banks. However, the younger hood was dubious. Floyd’s past criminal record was hardly inspiring. In 1925 he had been caught following a $5,000 holdup of a paymaster and had served 15 months. Earlier in the current year, 1930, Floyd had been convicted of bank robbery and sentenced to 10 to 25 years. It was while on his way to serve this sentence that Floyd had staged his escape. In between these two relatively big but bungled crimes, he had been arrested several times on such charges as vagrancy and possession of firearms.

Bill the Killer on the other hand, was a young Missouri gangster with a rather amazing record. Before meeting Floyd, he had killed five men and had broken out of prison. Furthermore, in 1929 in Detroit, he pulled off one of the most incredible escapes on record. Charged with the murder of Detective Frank Tradeau, he was in a long line of prisoners all handcuffed together. Suddenly, he ran out of the line with his handcuffs dangling on one wrist and made a clean getaway. It was never learned how he had gotten himself free from the manacles.

Miller finally agreed to join up with Floyd, but he decided they needed considerable “seasoning” to work as a team. The pair moved on to Michigan, where they stuck to small scores, holding up farmers and filling stations. In no case did their take come to more than a couple of hundred dollars. They pulled three minor bank holdups in the northern part of the state and then headed for safety in Kansas City, where they holed up at Mother Ash’s place, a whorehouse of some standing. At this establishment love came to both men, Floyd falling for Mother Ash’s daughter-in-law, Rose, and Miller for Rose’s sister, Beulah Bird. The fact that Wallace Ash was married to Rose and his brother, William, had been keeping company with Beulah didn’t prevent the two young hoods from marching the women out of the house under Mother Ash’s hateful glare. Wallace and William Ash, besides being bouncers at their mother’s establishment, were deeply involved in Kansas City crime and announced they planned to kill Floyd and Miller. A short time later, Wallace Ash received a telephone call from a woman asking him and William to rendezvous with their two former loves. The brothers left for the appointment. When next seen again on March 25, 1931, they were lying in a ditch beside a burning automobile; each had a bullet in the back of his head. According to a weeping Mother Ash, Miller and that “pretty boy” had killed her sons.

Miller and Floyd went back to bank robbing, hitting three banks in Kentucky for sums of $4,000, $2,700 and $3,600. With their lady friends in tow, they then repaired to Bowling Green, Ohio to enjoy the loot. When they attracted too much attention buying suits and dresses, especially with Floyd flashing a fat roll of bills, Chief of Police Carl Galliher was notified and he and an assistant, Ralph Castner, investigated. They found Miller and the two women about to enter a store. Pretty Boy Floyd was stationed across the street, on Miller’s theory that it was always a good idea to have someone maintaining watch even when they were relaxing.

When Galliher ordered Miller to stop, the gangster dropped to the ground so that Floyd would have a clear view of the officers. Pretty Boy opened up with a pair of pistols and Castner fell dead. Miller then tried to run to Floyd’s side but Chief Galliher shot him through the neck, killing him instantly. Floyd drove the police chief to cover with a barrage of shots, broke for his car and sped out of town. After the battle Miller and Castner lay dead and both women were wounded. From then on, Floyd would have to make his legend without instructions from his young tutor, Bill the Killer.

Miller, John (1829–1861) New Orleans criminal and jailer

One of the most colorful, if deadly, scourges of antebellum New Orleans was John Miller, a one-armed brute with a chain and iron ball attached to the stump that was left of his other arm. It proved to be a most effective weapon in his criminal endeavors.

Miller was born in Gretna, across the river from New Orleans, and became that community’s principal ruffian. So far as can be determined, he never did an honest day’s work in his life, making enough by venturing over into the French Quarter two or three times a week to fall on some unsuspecting visitor and make off with his purse.

In 1854 Miller branched into fight managing, taking under his wing a heavyweight named Charley Keys, who soon became the champion of the Gretna side of the Mississippi. He arranged a bout between Keys and Tom Murray, the so-called bruiser of Gallatin Street. Miller wagered a considerable sum on his man, who was soon being belted mercilessly by Murray. It became apparent that if the fight continued, Murray would surely win. Realizing this, Miller stuck a knife into Murray's chief backer. A general riot ensued, enabling Miller to keep his money but resulting in the loss of his left arm. After the riot he attached a chain and iron ball to the remaining stump of his left arm, and with a knife in his right hand, he was as fearsome an opponent as one could meet in the back alleys of the city. He proved this in 1857, when he killed a man in a fight. Since Miller was "disabled," he got only two years for this offense. If that struck the citizenry as unusual, it didn't compare to the stir caused by what happened to him when he completed his term in the parish prison. In an ironic turnabout arranged by the parish politicians of the day, Miller was kept on as a prison guard. While some claimed that there had been a genuine "reformation of his character," Miller's case was widely credited as a prime cause of the creation of the New Orleans Vigilance Committee for the purpose of "freeing the city of thugs, outlaws, assassins and murderers."

Miller left his position more or less voluntarily, having discovered there his true love, a prisoner named Mary Jane Jackson, better known in the vicious slums and dives of the city as Bricktop Jackson, who was also doing a stint for murder. When she was released, the couple repaired to a love nest in Freetown. A mean street fighter, Bricktop gave away nothing in a match with any of the tough bullies of Gallatin Street. While there is no absolute proof that she was the toughest female in the city, there is no doubt that as a couple Bricktop and Miller were unequaled in viciousness by any other husband-wife team in the city. A half-dozen Live Oak gangsters were known to have backed off from a battle with Bricktop Jackson and Miller, swinging his iron ball.

In keeping with Miller's past history, there is no record of the couple ever supporting themselves honestly. They would strut through the French Quarter arm in arm, with many a man staring at Bricktop, who was a most attractive woman. Finally, Miller would leave her alone, and it was usually just a matter of moments before she would attract a male admirer. She and her new friend would then be seen departing for a destination unknown but reasonably deduced. When next seen, if ever, the gentleman involved would be sporting a very bruised head, not surprising considering the bruising potential of an iron ball.

The love of Bricktop Jackson and John Miller ended on December 5, 1861, when Miller came home with a cowhide whip and announced to the entire neighborhood that Bricktop was in need of a thorough thrashing. It soon became clear which of the pair was the toughest. Bricktop took the whip away from him and beat him unmercifully. Miller tried to brain her with his iron-ball, but she grabbed the chain in midair and pulled him around their living quarters. In desperation, Miller drew a knife and tried to slash her. Bricktop wrestled the knife free and, shoving him against the wall, stabbed her lover five times. Miller was dead when his body hit the floor.

The New Orleans Picayune commented, "Both were degraded beings, regular penitentiary birds, habitual drunkards, and unworthy of any further notice from honest people." Bricktop Jackson served nine months for the killing.

Miller, William F. (1874-?) swindler

A 24-year-old Brooklyn, New York City bookkeeper, William F. (520%) Miller was one of the greatest swindlers this country has ever produced. Charles Ponzi did nothing but lift Willy Miller's modus operandi; and while the latter could not be credited with having originated the idea of robbing Peter to pay Paul, he certainly carried it to dizzying heights during 11 incredible months in 1899, while he trimmed an array of suckers out of well over $1 million.

For years Miller was an insignificant bookkeeper who tried in vain to make a killing in the stock market. He made small investments, in the hundreds of dollars, with money borrowed from friends in his community. Miller was good for it, though, and always repaid his debts promptly—by the simple expedient of borrowing a slightly larger sum elsewhere. It took Miller some time to figure out this robbing-Peter-to-pay-Paul tactic was one of the great secrets of high finance.

One day he posted a sign in his window:

WM. F. MILLER

Investments

The way to wealth is as plain as the road to market.

—B. Franklin

Miller was a great admirer of Benjamin Franklin.

By the following Sunday everyone in the neighborhood had seen the sign and Miller was asked about it in the adult Bible class he ran at the local church. With a very earnest expression he said, "It's not fair that the Morgans and the Goulds and the Vanderbilts are making so many millions when us little people are making so little—and I've decided to do something about it.”

Then he confided a great secret. Everyone knew he was always hanging around Wall Street. Well, he had learned the investment secrets used by the big boys. Naturally, he couldn't tell what they were, but he was now in a position to pay 10 percent interest on money invested with him. A few persons expressed interest, since that rate was substantially more than what the banks were paying.

“You don't understand,” Miller said matter-of-factly. “I don't mean ten percent a year. I mean ten percent a week.”

“Holy smoke!” one parishioner exclaimed. “That's 520 percent a year!”

“I suppose it is,” Miller said modestly.

Now, many of his students were impressed and wanted to invest right on the spot. Righteously, Miller said he wouldn't take any investments on the Sabbath. The next night when he got home from work, there was a line of investors waiting at his door. True, many had only tiny sums, undoubtedly cautious about so remarkable an investment opportunity. Miller took many amounts of less than $10, but he told each investor to return in one week for their first interest payment.

Sure enough, after seven days an investor who had given $10 got $1 back as interest. By the time 10 weeks passed, all the original investors had made back initial investments and were still drawing more. All of these people were investing larger sums now, as were others who had joined the eager procession as soon as Miller started making payments.

Miller's fame spread far beyond his Brooklyn community. He was known as 520% Miller and money flowed in much more rapidly than he was paying it out. Some investors thought they were being rather shrewd by promptly reinvesting their interest as soon as Miller handed it to them. In 11 glorious months Miller trimmed his suckers for well in excess of a million dollars. According to some later accounts, while he lived high on the hog, he managed to salt away $480,000 and possibly more, considering that in one month in 1899 he made an estimated $430,000 profit.

But Miller never did get to enjoy his money. The great con man was himself conned out of half of the $480,000. A fixer named T. Edward Schlesinger told Miller that for a cut of the take, he would show him how to keep the law off his neck. Gullible Miller, the genius swindler, dutifully handed over the money. Schlesinger, however, didn't offer Miller any foolproof method to avoid legal harassment. He simply took his $240,000 and caught a fast boat for Europe, finishing out his days in Baden-Baden.

Miller's turn at playing the sucker would come again. His second bit of gullibility resulted from his meeting with a slick lawyer named Robert Ammon. He hired Ammon to give him legal advice on how to stay out of jail once it became known that when new investments stopped coming in, Miller would be unable to pay any more juicy 10 percent dividends.

Ammon's advice was that Miller leave the country. As for the $240,000, Miller said he had left, Ammon suggested he leave it with him “because if you are caught and have the money in your possession, it would be proof of your guilt.”

Miller went to Canada after getting Ammon's firm promise that he could have his money sent to him whenever he wanted it. He never did get a penny of the loot he left with Ammon and was eventually caught and sent to prison, but only for 10 years, a surprising ending to one of the most fabulous crime careers in American history. Well, maybe not quite the ending. Miller was sent to Sing Sing, where he finally was able to make a deal with the law to get out of prison in 1907, having served only five years. The authorities were very much interested in lawyer Ammon and Miller told everything he knew about him. Ammon screamed that Miller had given him nowhere near $240,000. In any event, Ammon went to Sing Sing and Miller got out. He returned to Brooklyn and, for a time, worked again as a bookkeeper. But after a few years Miller just sort of faded away, perhaps going off to enjoy the underestimated fruits of his crime.

Mina, Lino Amalia Espos y (1809–1832) impostor and murderer

An impostor for whose favor much of early 19th century Philadelphia society vied, Lino Amalia Mina was a young man who passed himself off in that city as the son of the Spanish governor of California. He claimed to be stranded without funds until the arrival of a clipper rounding the Cape. Of the several important families that offered to house him, Dr. and Mrs. William Chapman won out. Dr. Chapman's wife, Lucretia, was overjoyed; she was very socially conscious and she thought having Mina as a houseguest would be a triumph. Within a week Mina's presence developed into a triumph in more ways than one. The servants saw Mina kissing Mrs. Chapman on a number of occasions, and the 41-year-old matron offered no resistance at all. If Dr. Chapman noticed anything, he said nothing, and within another month he was not able to say anything.

Mina went to a Philadelphia pharmacy and bought a huge amount of arsenic—for “stuffing of birds.” Four days later, Dr. Chapman suddenly became ill and died. Two weeks after the funeral, Mina and the widow Chapman traveled to New York and were married. When they returned home, valuables in the mansion started disappearing. So did much of Lucretia's jewelry, and Mina set about cleaning out certain bank assets. He also posed as Dr. Chapman to complete certain financial dealings. This brought him to the attention of the authorities. Now suspicious, they ordered an autopsy performed on Chapman's body. Massive amounts of poison were found, and both Mina and Lucretia were charged with murder. Mrs. Chapman wept at the trial, insisting she had been totally taken in by Mina. A male jury was swayed and freed her but condemned Mina to death.

It was reported that a number of important personages attended Mina's hanging, perhaps more incensed over how the cad had bamboozled the city's high society than over the murder he had committed.

Miner, Bill (1847–1913) stagecoach and train robber

Although he had one of the longest careers of any stagecoach and train robber, running from the 1860s until 1911, colorful Old Bill Miner seldom gets the recognition he deserves in histories of American crime. He was, so far as can be determined, the man who invented the phrase "Hands up!"—an Americanism as distinctive as the English road agent's order "Stand and deliver!"

At the age of 13 young Bill ran away from his Kentucky family, which his footloose father had abandoned a few years earlier, and went West to become a cowboy. He ended up in the California gold fields, but the only place he ever searched for gold was in the pokes he stole from sleeping miners. In 1863 he did a stint as an army dispatch rider and then set up his own business as a mail rider. Bill made good money carrying the mail but invariably spent more than he earned. By 1869 he had hit the outlaw trail (although he may have been at it as early as 1866), robbing a stagecoach near Sonora, Calif. of a few hundred dollars. Pursued by a posse, Bill was captured when his horse dropped dead in his tracks. He probably avoided being lynched only because he looked so young; prudently, he announced his age as 16.

Bill was sentenced to 15 years in San Quentin. Behind bars he became an avowed religionist and in 1879 the authorities released him early for good behavior. But instead of leading a saintly existence thereafter, Miner headed for Colorado and became a train robber. He and a hard case named Bill Leroy made a daring duo, notching up a long string of train and stagecoach holdups until Leroy was captured in a gun battle with vigilantes and strung up. Bill fought his way free in the same gunfight, leaving three bullet-ridden possemen behind him. That brush with death had a sobering effect on Miner, who promptly made for San Francisco and from there to Europe, where he became a free-spending tourist on the proceeds of his Colorado crimes.

Miner actually plotted out some train robberies in England but wisely decided his American style would stand out too much and assure his apprehension. He bounced around the continent for a while and finally wound up in Turkey, where he joined up with desert bandits in the slave trade. When the law started looking for a light-haired American, Bill hightailed it for Africa, finding his way to South Africa. In Capetown he considered the idea of holding up a diamond train, a thought he abandoned, as he said in his memoirs, "when I saw they [the guards] would be too much for me."

The next stop was South America and a stint at gun-running, but Miner hankered for the Western outlaw trail and by November 1881 he was back in business in California as a road agent, holding up the Sonora stage for $3,000. Pretty soon, Bill had posses on his trail again and fled to Colorado, where he pulled another holdup before returning to California to rob the Sonora stage once more, this time with a partner named Jimmy Crum. They were caught shortly thereafter and Miner was sent back to San Quentin under a 25-year sentence. He emerged from prison in 1901, again a reformed man determined to follow the Good Book. By 1903 he and two others were holding up trains in Oregon and Washington. With the law hot on his trail, Old Bill moved into Canada to continue his unlawful activities. He was finally arrested there after a train robbery and, at the age of 60, was put away for life. When he heard the sentence, Bill just smirked at the judge, declaring, "No jail can hold me, sir." He was right. A year later, in August 1907, Miller tunneled under the prison fence and escaped.

For the next four years Old Bill, now stoop-shouldered and white-haired, pulled off several bank and train jobs in Washington and Oregon. The Pinkertons sent out an alert for his apprehension, figuring he would be easy to catch since there weren't too many stoop-shouldered, white-haired old codgers robbing trains and banks. By February 1911 Bill had worked his way to White Sulphur, Ga., where he led a gang of four others in the holdup of the Southern Railroad Express. Even though he had put some 3,000 miles between that robbery and his previous job, Old Bill was identified and eventually run down in a Georgia swamp by a Pinkerton-led posse.

Once more, he received a life sentence, this time at the state penitentiary at Milledgeville, Ga. On three occasions in 1911–12, Old Bill escaped, but he was soon recaptured each time. When caught the last time, he was up to his waist in swamp water with bloodhounds bay-ing at him, Bill confided to his captors, “Boys, I guess I’m getting too old for this sort of thing.”

He returned to the prison and spent his final year and a half tending a flower garden and dictating his adventures to a detective who had come to admire the incorrigible old crook. One day he told a fellow pris-oner he had a plan for getting out, but he died peace-fully while asleep in his cell in late 1913.

Minkow, Barry (1966–) teenage wolf of Wall Street

One cunning teenager who left Wall Streeters with very red faces—to say nothing of flattened portfolios—was Barry Minkow, who at the tender age of 16, launched his own rug-cleaning business from his parents’ garage in Reseda, California. In less than four years, the still barely postadolescent punk engineered a stock scam that conned top Wall Street firms with a bald-faced ploy no different than the classic one used by legendary swindler Charles Ponzi—that of robbing Peter to pay Paul.

Ponzi was known to his gullible victims as the “man who invented money.” Barry was hailed in the financial press as the kid wonder who “invented profits.” Barry did not earn profits the old-fashioned way—by work-ing for them; he hardly worked at all. His most labori-ous exertions seemed to have been naming his company, which was ZZZZ Best. After that the youth-ful entrepreneur simply went about convincing Wall Street that his tiny company had grown into a financial cash cow. In retrospect, Barry’s company might have been a little more impressive if his business had actually earned a dime.

Daniel Askt, his biographer, said, “There was always a quality about Barry that suggested he held an MBA from the Dada School of Business.”

Business methods to get capital had no restraints. He staged burglaries to collect insurance. He borrowed $2,000 from his grandmother and then stole her pearls for good measure. In 1984 he forged $13,000 worth of money orders from a liquor store.

ZZZZ Best prospered by such methods. By 1985 Barry hit on a lush source of income, opening up a mer-chant’s account at a local bank, thus allowing him to take credit card payments. Whenever he needed money, he added bogus charges to customers’ credit card accounts and got cash from the bank. If a customer noticed and complained, Barry ranted about forgeries by crooked employees, made refunds and then simply took from other accounts.

Since Barry wanted to eventually float stock in his company, he set up another firm called Interstate Appraisal Services. This company was headed up by a weirdo friend who collected guns and had a special fondness for Hitler and SS jewelry. Interstate’s only activities were confirming ZZZZ Best’s job contracts, which allegedly included large orders from insurance compa-nies to repair fire-and-water damage in large buildings.

The phony revenues convinced banks and investors to put money into ZZZZ Best. Those who got in early reaped wonderful returns, which were of course pro-vided by the investments of those who hopped on the bandwagon a bit later.

As late as 1986 nobody had actually seen a site where any of ZZZZ Best’s work had taken place. Barry blandly explained that such information was confiden-tial. Finally, an auditor for Ernst & Whitney insisted he’d have to see a site. Barry and his aides thus leased office space and put up signs indicating that ZZZZ Best was doing work on the premises. The actual work was handled by an outside contractor who was paid a big bonus to do the work. The ploy worked.

Barry enjoyed a massive success. He was featured in fawning newspaper stories, indulged on the Oprah Winfrey show and just about ready to make a smash entrance on Wall Street. He lived in high style with all the trappings of a successful millionaire and then some. Fostering an apparent smoldering hatred for his par-ents, he put them on the ZZZZ Best payroll just so he could have the pleasure of threatening to dismiss them. Always a believer in the fix, he coached a girls’ softball team with which his girlfriend was involved and passed out up to $100 a piece to spectators to cheer for his team.

Barry negotiated with the securities firm of Rooney, Pace (a company that would soon be defunct) to take his company public, so that he could start shearing thousands of small investors who saw him as epitomiz-ing the American Dream. In December 1986 ZZZZ Best stock made its debut on Wall Street, and Barry got a hero’s welcome. By the following March the shares were worth $64 million and a month later $100 mil-lion. At its peak ZZZZ Best commanded a stock mar-ket valuation of $200 million without having any actual value. Eventually its assets would be auctioned off for $64,000.

Oddly, it was Barry’s credit card frauds, not the nonexistent fire-and-water jobs revenues, that were exposed. Biographer Askt, a former reporter for the Los Angeles Times and the Wall Street Journal, had originally been conned by Minkow and wrote a flatter-ing article in 1985, which helped establish the myth of Barry’s acumen. On May 22, 1987, he revealed the credit card skulduggery in a story headlined: “Behind ‘Whiz Kid’ Is a Trail of False Credit-Card Billings.” The next day ZZZZ Best stock fell 28 percent and contin-ued plummeting straight to nowhere. In December 1988 Barry Minkow was convicted of 57 counts of fraud and sentenced to 25 years in prison. Barron's, the financial weekly, stated: "ZZZZ Best had earned a chapter in the long history of financial scams written by the 'Eighties."

When Barry was released with good behavior time off, he followed a hallowed trail of many con artists and hit the lecture circuit, warning folks not to be taken by the likes of him.

Miranda decision prisoner's rights ruling

Probably no Supreme Court ruling has been more bitterly attacked by law enforcement officials than the Miranda decision, which mandated new procedures for interrogating prisoners. For years the courts decided the validity of confessions on a case-by-case basis, taking into account the individual circumstances. Then on June 13, 1966 in Miranda v. Arizona, the High Court changed that approach.

In 1963 an unemployed 22-year-old man named Ernesto Miranda was arrested for stealing $8 from a bank employee in Phoenix, Ariz. While in custody, he was picked out of a lineup by a young girl who said he had kidnapped and raped her. Miranda at first denied the charge, but two steady hours of police interrogation produced a written and signed confession by the suspect. The Supreme Court threw out this confession because the police had failed to advise Miranda of his right against self-incrimination under the Fifth Amendment.

In its decision, the court laid down certain rules the police had to follow in questioning suspects. Failure to follow four basic rules, said the court, meant that a confession made by a suspect could not be used against him even if it appeared to be voluntary. First, the prisoner taken into custody must be advised he has the right to remain silent. Second, he must be informed that if he says anything, it can and will be used against him. Third, he must be advised of his right to have a lawyer present while he is being questioned. Finally, he must be told that if he cannot afford a lawyer, the court will appoint one before he is questioned.

Additionally, on the matter of counsel, the defendant can indicate "at any stage of the process that he wishes to consult with a lawyer before speaking (or continuing to speak)."

Quite naturally, the police strenuously attacked the new rules for questioning prisoners as placing an impossible burden on them during a "national crime crisis." Voting in the minority on a more recent Miranda-type decision, Chief Justice Warren Burger called the majority opinion "weird" and "intolerable" and said it punished the public "for the mistakes and the misdeeds of law-enforcement officers." Most legal experts agree that future court rulings may dilute certain aspects of the Miranda decision but that the main thrust of guaranteeing the rights of arrested persons could not be totally reversed. The need for this guarantee is itself somewhat dubious in light of the aftermath of the Miranda decision, something seldom mentioned by opponents. Despite the quashing of the confession, Miranda was later convicted of the rape charge and sentenced to a 20- to 30-year term. Later freed on parole, he was killed in 1975 in a brawl in a Phoenix bar. In 2000 the Supreme Court took on another Miranda case, one that ultimately left the original decision more or less intact.

The prohibition of and criminal penalties against interracial marriage were largely American ideas. England, for instance, had no such bans when it colonized America. The concern that developed in the colonies sprang not only from revulsion at the idea of marriage between black slaves and whites (especially indentured white women) but also from the economics of the situation, since children of such a union were free under the law.

Maryland and Virginia adopted antimiscegenation laws in the 17th century and other colonies soon followed suit. The typical law prohibited only interracial marriages that included a white person and one of another color, not those involving, for example, an Indian and a black. By the 1950s about 30 states carried such laws on the books, but court rulings thereafter began stripping them away on constitutional grounds. Finally, in the 1967 Loving decision the U.S. Supreme Court declared unconstitutional laws that restricted, solely on the basis of race, a person's "fundamental freedom" to marry. The High Court ended antimiscegenation laws once and for all by declaring it would only uphold racial classifications when they were "shown to be necessary to the accomplishment of some permissible state objectives independent of the racial discrimination which it was the object of the Fourteenth Amendment to eliminate."

Mississippi bubble 18th-century fraud

Although the fraudulent Mississippi Bubble was developed in France and felt most there, the scourge of criminality it introduced into the New World left its mark for decades to come.

The Bubble was a swindle conceived by a resourceful and unscrupulous Scot named John Law, who founded the Mississippi Company in 1718 to extract the supposedly vast riches of French Louisiana and convinced the French government to back his scheme. With the aid of the French regent, Law soon had all of France caught up in a frenzy of speculation. Frenchmen invested their entire savings in the glorious company that was to yield enormous riches, and the national currency was inflated to further the bogus operation. In fact, a few who sold at the right time made 36 times their investment. Unfortunately, most held out for more. Not only was there no more, there was just plain nothing, except Law's lavish promises. Millions of Frenchmen were wiped out, and France itself tottered on the brink of ruin. Law, disguised as a beggar, barely escaped the country before being lynched.

But what of Louisiana itself? In its zeal to reap the wealth of this new land, the government had peopled it with a type of colonial not found anywhere else in the New World, at least not in comparable numbers. Historian Albert Phelps noted

The government went boldly to the task of ransacking the jails and hospitals. Disorderly soldiers, black sheep of distinguished families, paupers, prostitutes, political suspects, friendless strangers, unsophisticated peasants straying into Paris, all were kidnapped, herded, and shipped under guard to fill the emptiness of Louisiana. To those who would emigrate voluntarily the Company offered free land, free provisions, free transportation to the colony and from the colony to the situation of their grants, wealth, and eternal prosperity to them and their heirs forever; for the soil of Louisiana was said to bear two crops a year without cultivation, and the amiable savages were said so to adore the white man that they would not allow these superior beings to labor, and would themselves, voluntarily and for mere love, assume all the burden of that sordid necessity. . . . And now the full tide of the boom began to reach Louisiana. The emigrants, hurried out to fill seigniorial rights, began to arrive in swarms and were dumped helplessly upon Dauphin Island. . . . Crowded, unsheltered and unfed, upon that barren sand heap, the wretched emigrants sickened, grew discontented, starved and died. . . .

The seed of the Mississippi Bubble planted in Louisiana, particularly in New Orleans, bloomed into a level of criminality that for the next 100 years was unmatched in any locale on the North American continent.

mistaken identity

The annals of crime are filled with cases of mistaken identity, pointing up the unreliability of eyewitness testimony.

Christopher Emanuel Balestrero was arrested on the eyewitness testimony of four women clerks at a New York insurance company that he had twice robbed the office. He was finally cleared when the real robber confessed the crimes along with 26 others. Alfred Hitchcock made Balestrero's story into a movie, The Wrong Man. However, as a case of mistaken identity, it was hardly startling. A far more incredible case involved a man named Hoag who arrived in Haverstraw, N.Y., where he acquired a job, a large circle of friends and a wife. Six months later, he got out of town fast when he was revealed to be a bigamist who had a spouse in another city. Some two years after his departure a man named Parker settled in Haverstraw and suddenly found himself identified as Hoag and brought to trial. The prosecution presented more than a dozen witnesses who identified him as Hoag. Hoag's former boss recognized Parker as his onetime employee and Mrs. Hoag positively identified him as her husband. Winding up her testimony, Hoag's wife declared that her husband had a long red scar on his right foot. Parker immediately took off his shoe and rolled up his pants leg. There was no scar. Naturally, the case was dismissed. "He lies like an eyewitness" is a common saying around courtrooms. The statement is, as the late Judge Jerome Frank noted in his book Not Guilty, a study of 36 cases in which innocent men had been convicted, "made in jest. But it does point up an important fact: Any witness, being human, may be fallible."

"Eminent lawyers and judges have expressed awareness of this fact. A well-known judge said, 'It has been profoundly observed, that of all the various sources of error, one of the most copious and fatal is an unreflecting faith in human testimony.' Another judge wrote: 'It must be admitted that at the present day the testimony of even a truthful witness is much overrated.'"

Certainly overrated was the testimony of five bank tellers who agreed that Bertram Campbell was the forger who passed worthless checks for more than $4,000. After Campbell served three and a half years and emerged from prison a broken and sick man, it was discovered that the real forger was a professional check passer named Alexander D. L. Thiel, whose appearance could not be regarded as very similar to Campbell's (see comparison photographs under Bertram Campbell).

How could five honest persons make such an error? There is a case on record of a man being convicted as a swindler on the testimony of 19 eyewitnesses and later proved innocent. There have been numerous instances of police "helping" a witness make an identification by combing the suspect's hair the way the witness described it. Or they let the witness see the suspect before he or she was put in a lineup. One of the four women who testified against Manny Balestrero picked him out of a lineup that included the woman's own husband. Nor do the cards have to be so strongly stacked against a defendant. If a witness picks out a possible suspect from a police mug shot and then confronts him or her in person, is the witness identifying the person from his or her memory of the crime or from the memory of the mug shot?

A famed private detective, John Terry, who often worked for defense lawyer Sam Leibowitz, a master at breaking down witnesses who had made positive identifications, once observed: “Eyes make a helluva lot of mistakes. Put a man in handcuffs and to a witness he immediately looks like a guilty man. A witness is in an abnormal state of mind during a robbery and it’s the same thing when he goes into a station house. The average person isn’t around jails all the time. In that atmosphere, plus seeing a man in handcuffs, he could name anyone a crook.”

A lawyer particularly distrustful of eyewitness identifications was Clarence Darrow. He would question a witness very closely for several minutes and suddenly turn his back on him. Then he’d snap, “All right, let’s just test your memory. You’ve looked at me for some time now. Is the scar on my face on the left or the right cheek?” Often the witness made a guess—and the wrong one. Darrow had no scar.

Rape victims, not surprisingly, make very poor eyewitnesses. In Chicago a woman guest in one of the better hotels was slugged in her darkened room and raped “by a big giant of a man at least six feet three inches in a bellhop’s uniform.” That was all she could tell about her assailant. John E. Reid, inventor of the Reid Polygraph, tested the bellhop most matching the victim’s description and cleared him. Seven other bellhops were also tested and cleared. Reid then asked the hotel manager if there were any bellhops he hadn’t seen.

The manager said he hadn’t bothered to send him one. Reid demanded to know why, and the manager replied, “Because Shorty is Shorty.”

Reid nonetheless tested Shorty and got a confession. He was the rapist—five feet two inches.

mob pistol

A four-barrel flintlock pistol of foreign make, the mob pistol was much used in the first half of the 19th century, as its name implies, to quell mobs. All four barrels were fired at once and covered such a broad range that there was always an excellent chance that someone would be hit by one of the balls. The gun found its way to California thanks to sailing masters who used the weapon to tame mutinous crews. When sailors abandoned their ships to hunt for gold there, a number of guns, quite naturally, went with them. The gun apparently violated the “code of the West” and was not much used in gunfights. It was deemed acceptable, however, for use in attacks on the mining camps of “greasers,” or Latin Americans, who seemed to have arrived at the promising sites first, and a great many fell dead under its terrifying blast.

Mock Duck (1878–1942) tong leader

Recognized as the greatest tong warrior ever to appear in any American Chinatown, Mock Duck became the top Chinese gangster in the nation, exerting power from New York to Boston and all the way to San Francisco. He led the upstart and relatively small Hip Sing Tong in their great battles against the On Leong Tong, the rich and powerful society that dominated Chinese rackets, especially opium, gambling and prostitution, until Mock Duck’s appearance in New York City in 1900.

To wrest control of the rackets, the rotund, 22-year-old Mock Duck had to topple the near-legendary Tom Lee, who had cultivated a reputation as the unofficial mayor of Chinatown. Tom Lee was celebrated in the white press because of his massive payoffs not only to the police but to newspapermen as well. With no more than a handful of supporters, Mock Duck approached Tom Lee and blandly informed him that he desired half the revenues from all gambling and singsong girl (prostitute) operations, adding, “If this is not agreeable with your honorable self and that of your wonderous tong, we shall have to fight.”

Tom Lee stared at Mock Duck for a long time, then laughed and walked on without saying a word to this upstart. By that evening all Chinatown was laughing over Mock Duck’s impudence.

Mock Duck waited only 48 hours before demonstrating he was very serious about his demands. A fire started in an On Leong boardinghouse on Pell Street, killing two tong members. Tom Lee could not be absolutely sure this was the work of Mock Duck and his Hip Sings, but he could be certain of who was responsible for the next attack. An On Leong member walking on Doyers Street was set upon by a pair of Hip Sing boo how doys, or hatchet men. The next day his head was found in the gutter.

Tom Lee countered with orders to kill all Hip Sings, especially Mock Duck. What followed was an incredible series of survivals by Mock Duck that was to win him the nickname Clay Pigeon of Chinatown and to convince many Chinese that he was truly unkillable. Two On Leongs waylaid him late one night, jabbing daggers into his shoulders. Mock Duck lunged free, shot them both and ran back to the Hip Sing battle headquarters on Pell Street with the two knives still embedded in him.

In the next assault the On Leongs used guns. Mock Duck was walking out of Hip Sing headquarters when an On Leong gunman grazed his coat with one shot and hit him square in the midsection with another. Remarkably, Mock Duck escaped injury, as the bullet struck his belt buckle.

After these two attacks Mock Duck took to wearing a bulletproof vest made of chain mail. Now, he was a match for the boo how doys. Whenever he met three or four enemy hatchet men, he would go into a squat, clamp his eyes shut and start blazing away with two pistols. As a terror tactic, the routine was unbeatable. Mock Duck was not a very accurate shot, but that was the beauty of his tactic. If he had taken careful aim and fired, the boo how doys might have moved in on him without fear, figuring that with his poor marksmanship, he never would hit them. But with his eyes shut and both guns singing in mad tattoo, their fate was in the hands of luck. Invariably, they broke ranks before the unorthodox assault and fled. Indeed, the gods seemed to be on the side of Mock Duck. Despite his wild shooting—high, low and to the side—he almost always drew blood from his foes.

In desperation, Tom Lee placed a $1,000 bounty on Mock Duck's head and lesser sums, all the way down to $25, on the heads of lesser Hip Sings. This action set off a war among the Chinese the likes of which had never been waged in America. Mock Duck proved to be the better strategist. He formed an alliance with the Four Brothers, one of the oldest and most-respected family guilds in China. In America the family guilds had been undermined by the tong organizations, a fact that annoyed many members of the Four Brothers. After Mock Duck promised them renewed cultural power once the On Leongs were eliminated, the Four Brothers joined the battle.

Mock Duck added to his fighting power by importing two incredible boo how doys from San Francisco. One was Sing Dock, among the most fiendish killers the tong wars ever produced. The other was Yee Toy, a pasty-faced little executioner often called "the girl face." Many a hatchet man met his end because he did not regard the one with the effeminate features as much of a threat. It was estimated that Sing Dock and Yee Toy murdered close to 100 men in the tong wars. They followed Mock Duck unquestioningly. Yee Toy later killed Sing Dock in a private quarrel, only to be stabbed to death himself a year later by his best friend, who had been bribed by the On Leongs.

Mock Duck had other weapons in his arsenal. While Tom Lee had the police on his side, Mock Duck keenly realized that with New York in a spasm of reform, the crusading Rev. Charles Parkhurst made a better ally. He went to see Parkhurst and told him that as a decent Chinese trying to make an honest living, he was being persecuted by the gangsters of Chinatown. He described the terrible gambling dens and singsong girl houses. Parkhurst was enraged and forced the authorities to raid every address furnished by Mock Duck. One On Leong establishment after another on Pell and Doyers streets was hit. Mock Duck cunningly outmaneuvered Tom Lee by not giving Parkhurst information on the locations of On Leong establishments on Mott Street. Thus, Tom Lee realized he could not loose the police on Hip Sing places, for Mock Duck would then turn the white crusader on his Mott Street dens, which at the time were the On Leongs' prime source of income.

Tom Lee was totally outfoxed and finally solved his problems by going on an extended vacation. In 1906 a truce was arranged but it lasted only about a year, giving Mock Duck the opportunity to consolidate his power. Then he struck again. Tom Lee returned to try to rally the On Leongs but lost what remained of his influence after their decisive defeat during the great war of 1909–10.

Mock Duck was now the supreme power in Chinatown. However, occasional bad luck dogged him. In 1912 an On Leong hatchet man invaded a Hip Sing gambling house on Pell Street while Mock Duck was conducting tong business in the basement. Two plain-clothes police detectives walking by a short while later heard the sounds of shooting.

Rushing into the basement, the officers found Mock Duck sitting at a table reading a Chinese pamphlet on the origins of feudalism. Another Chinese stood nearby with his hands up his sleeves. A third sat at the table opposite Mock Duck with his head slightly bowed, as if in deep thought. Mock Duck allowed he had heard some shots but said he had just entered the place by the back door. The second Chinaman was equally evasive. The officers turned to the third man but he wouldn't talk either—he couldn't, having expired with a bullet in his heart.

The police couldn't prove that Mock Duck had killed the On Leong warrior but they were able to pin something on him. In his pockets they found a mass of slips of paper with Chinese characters on them and proved in court that these were policy slips.

Mock Duck was convicted and served two years in Sing Sing. When he came out, the invigorated On Leongs struck with full fury. Numerous attacks on Mock Duck failed. The police arrested him on several occasions and he was accused of murder a dozen times, but the charges were always dropped for lack of evidence. In 1918 Mock Duck disappeared, leading to conflicting reports that he had retired from the rackets or that he had been murdered. Both stories were proved erroneous when he reappeared in 1921, announcing a new peace in Chinatown. He did the same thing in 1924 and 1928.

It was clear that Mock Duck's enemies, within Chinatown and without, could not depose him. Finally, however, in 1932, U.S. officials, together with representatives of the Chinese government, prevailed upon him to make peace. By that time Mock Duck was ready to retire, satisfied that the affairs of Chinatown had become so institutionalized that his followers could no longer be overthrown.

Mock Duck left Chinatown, taking up residence in a lavish home in a remote section of Brooklyn. Until his death in 1942, he returned to Chinatown once a week to visit a relative who ran an importing firm on Pell Street. He arrived in a chauffeured limousine, which waited with motor running while Mock Duck joined his kin in partaking of tea and dried octopus flakes. Always, about 10 young Hip Sing stalwarts stood guard outside until he left. The protection was not necessary, however, for even the On Leongs had long realized that Mock Duck was indestructible.

Molasses Gang 19th-century New York hoodlums

The Molasses Gang, composed of relatively small-time thugs, operated in New York City for a half-dozen years starting in 1871 and are best remembered for their comic behavior. Captained by Jimmy Dunnigan, they never rose beyond the level of sneak thieves and till-tappers who victimized small store owners. After several members of the gang entered a store, one would remove his soft hat and ask for it to be filled with sorghum molasses. The explanation would be that it was a bet on how much the hat would hold. When the hat was filled, the thugs would clap it on the proprietor's head and pull it down over his eyes, practically blinding him. While the proprietor wrestled with that sticky problem, the gang would leisurely loot the establishment.

Other gangs regarded the Molasses Gang as flaky and undependable men, who might just walk away in the middle of an important caper if they thought of something more entertaining to do. By 1877 the law had had enough of the gang's outrageous behavior and clapped the last of them in jail.

Molineux, Roland B. (1868–1917) accused murderer

The least-remembered figure involved in the murder of Mrs. Katherine Adams, which proved to be one of New York's most sensational and most enduring mysteries, was the victim herself. All she did was drink some poison, die and get buried. Instead, the "Molineux Case" was named after the handsome and dashing young man who, depending upon which verdict one believes, either did or did not poison the elderly widow.

In 1898, at the age of 30, Roland Molineux moved with grace and ease in the city's high society. He was the son of Brigadier Gen. Edward Leslie Molineux, who had served with considerable honor in the Civil War and was a leading citizen of Brooklyn and a power broker within the Republican Party. With an excellent education behind him, Roland had a brilliant future as a chemist. He also possessed considerable charm—attested to by the fact that he had been named correspondent in a divorce case at the tender age of 15.

A fine physical specimen, Molineux was a member of the Knickerbocker Athletic Club and national amateur horizontal bar champion. Because of his social standing and athletic prowess, he exerted considerable influence on club affairs and usually got his way. One member he apparently didn't get his way with was Henry C. Barnet, who annoyed Molineux by courting a young lady named Blanche Cheeseborough even after she had become engaged to Molineux. However, in November 1898 Barnet died under mysterious circumstances. There was rumor that he had taken poison sent to him through the mail, but nothing came of the charge and Molineux and Blanche were married.

Meanwhile, Molineux developed a new feud, this time with Harry Cornish, the athletic director of the club. Actually, they had been at odds for a couple of years, mainly because Cornish did not seem to show the proper deference to the officious Molineux. Then Cornish bested Molineux in a weightlifting tournament, and the angry Molineux went to the club's board of directors and demanded Cornish be fired for various offenses. The board rejected Molineux' demands and the young athlete resigned in a huff.

On December 23, 1898 Cornish received a bottle of Bromo Seltzer in the mail from an anonymous donor. He considered it the work of a club wag, twitting him not to overdrink during the holidays. On December 28 Mrs. Adams, his landlady, complained of a splitting headache and the helpful Cornish fixed her a Bromo. She drank it and complained of its bitter taste. Cornish took a tiny sip and said he noticed nothing. Moments later, Mrs. Adams writhed in agony on the floor and died a half hour later. Cornish became deathly ill from his small sip.

Cornish had retained the wrapping the Bromo Seltzer had been mailed in, and suspicion soon centered on Molineux when a number of handwriting experts identified the writing on it as his. Other handwriting samples linked him to the poison that apparently had been sent to Barnet. Molineux was charged with the Adams killing, and press indignation and public hysteria ran high against him by the time he was brought to trial. The trial lasted three months and cost a staggering $200,000. Five hundred potential jurors were questioned before 12 could be selected. After eight hours of deliberation they found Molineux guilty and he was sentenced to die.

At this point Molineux' father financed a massive appeal effort. John G. Milburn, the Buffalo lawyer in whose home President William McKinley had died of an assassin's bullet, finally won a retrial on the ground that the judge had allowed the jury to hear evidence about the Barnet matter although it had no bearing on the case under consideration.

During his 18 months on death row Molineux had written a book of prison tales called The Room with the Little Door, which critics hailed as the work of a most sensitive and gifted writer. By the time the new trial began, the public atmosphere had changed. The previous hysteria had faded and Molineux was now viewed as a talented man of letters. The defense marshaled just as many handwriting "experts" on its side as the prosecution had in the previous proceedings, not a difficult accomplishment considering the state of that art at the time. Molineux' lawyer also produced a woman named Anna Stephenson, the wife of a policeman, who said she had been at the General Post Office when the poison was originally mailed. She assured the court she had seen a man mail a package addressed to Harry Cornish at the Knickerbocker Club and that man was not Molineux. In fact, the man had looked something like Cornish himself.

It turned out the woman could not see very well, but she insisted her vision had been perfect in 1898. Her husband was called to the stand and he advised the jurors to pay his wife no mind. The jury did not follow his advice and acquitted Molineux in four minutes.

Molineux was now a greater celebrity than ever. Newspapers hired him to write about other murder trials and he published a number of books. In the meantime, his wife, who had stood by him during his ordeal, divorced him. Later, she tried to appear in vaudeville as Blanche Cheeseborough Molineux, but her former husband took legal action to prevent it. In 1913 Molineux wrote a play, which David Belasco produced, called The Man Inside, about a reformed criminal. During its run Molineux, demonstrating his own ordeal had not left him unscathed, caused scenes at the theater and had to be ejected on a number of occasions.

Later that year he was committed to an asylum, where he died in 1917. Upon his death a police official declared the Adams murder had been considered closed since the time of Molineux's second trial.

Mollie Maguires secret labor terrorist organization

A secret organization of Irish immigrant miners in the anthracite region of Pennsylvania, the Mollie Maguires fought against what some experts have described as perhaps the worst working conditions in 19th-century America. Taking their name from an old-country group of anti-landlord agitators in the 1840s led by a widow named Mollie Maguire, the Pennsylvania version, also known as the Buckshots and the Sleepers, undoubtedly used illegal means, including terror, sabotage, intimidation and murder of police and mine officials, to attain their goals.

In 1874–75 the Mollies conducted their devastating Long Strike against the mines, and the owners determined to destroy their influence forever. An undercover Pinkerton detective, James McParland, was sent into the coal fields to gain evidence against the Mollie Maguires, or, from the Mollies' point of view, to act as a provocateur.

McParland's testimony in a series of trials from 1875 to 1877 led to the conviction of more than 60 Mollies, including 19 men who were hanged on murder charges. According to McParland, he was present when a number of murders were planned by the Mollies but did nothing to warn the intended victims, although he had had ample time to do so. McParland's explanation was that he himself would have been murdered if he had warned them.

The testimony given by McParland proved sufficient to destroy the Mollies, although a considerable number of observers believed much of it was tainted. Three decades later, McParland was less successful in his investigation of the murder of ex-Gov. Frank Steunenberg of Idaho. The detective had been instrumental in bringing murder charges against three radical union leaders: Big Bill Haywood, Charles Moyers and George Pettibone. The famous lawyer Clarence Darrow made a shambles of the charges by showing that the written confession of the prosecution's main witness, Harry Orchard, contained many corrections in McParland's handwriting.

Thus, throughout the 20th century there were many moves to clear the Mollies who had been convicted on McParland's evidence. In 1979 Jack Kehoe, the leader of the Mollies, was granted a full state pardon, a century after his hanging.

Mona Lisa swindle

Probably the most audacious—and still unsolved—art swindle ever perpetrated in this country was the sale of six copies of the famed Mona Lisa to American art collectors in 1911–12.

In 1908 an international art crook, using a variety of aliases, came to America and befriended a number of millionaire art collectors. He made separate secret agreements with six of them to sell each one the Mona Lisa if he could steal it from the Louvre Museum in Paris. Meanwhile, he had an expert art forger make six copies of the Da Vinci masterpiece and had the fakes stored in New York. Then in 1911 the genuine Mona Lisa was stolen by a Louvre employee named Vincent Peruggia, who kept the painting in his apartment for two years. To this day it is unclear whether the art crook had arranged this theft or whether it happened coincidentally while his own plans were afoot. In any event, Peruggia was arrested in Italy in 1913, when he attempted to sell the original for $95,000. In the meantime, the cunning art crook had sold each of the six millionaires a copy of the masterpiece, collecting a total of $2 million. At his trial in Florence, Peruggia based his defense on patriotism, claiming he merely wanted to return the painting to the land of its creator, and got off with a mild sentence of a year and 15 days in prison. The art crook who had swindled the six American collectors was never caught.

A racket that dates back to the 19th century is the “money-making machine,” which is sold to a victim with a bizarre tale that it can duplicate a bill of currency so exactly that no expert can tell the real from the fake. The only thing that is different is the serial number, which the machine changes with a special “scrambling” device. However, this particular part of the process is very slow, and it takes the machine six hours to complete the entire procedure for duplicating a single bill. The swindler demonstrates the machine by placing a plain piece of white paper on a tray inside the machine and closing it up. He then places a genuine bill in another compartment of the machine and inserts it into the machine. Then he and the victim remain by the machine until the entire procedure is finished. After the six hours have elapsed and the victim is convinced that no trickery has taken place in the meantime, the genuine bill is removed and the tray in which the plain paper was inserted is opened. Inside is a new, apparently perfect bill. The victim is advised to take the bill to a bank and change it. He does and it is readily accepted. Naturally, the victim is now most eager to buy the machine. The swindler is at first loathe to sell it, but he does allow that he is impatient with the machine because it takes so long to produce a new bill. At the rate of only four in a 24-hour period, the machine will produce just $400 a day at most. Perhaps if he got a good offer. . . .

There are cases of the machine being sold or leased for as much as $50,000. The deal is closed as soon as the gullible buyer brings the money. The swindler leaves and the eager victim waits for his first new bill. It comes out right on schedule. Merrily, he puts in another plain sheet of paper. Six hours pass . . . out comes the same blank piece of paper. The victim tries it again but gets the same results. Finally, it dawns on him that he has been conned. By that time, of course, the crook has had a minimum of 12 hours to get away. The secret of the money machine is the tray in which the plain paper is loaded. As the swindler closes the tray, he presses a pin that drops a false top which holds a real bill previously concealed there. When the tray is opened six hours later, this is the bill that appears.

MONK, Maria

In the 19th century, money-making machines were quite the vogue both in America and England. As late as the 1930s, one American operator, “Count” Victor Lustig, is reputed to have made well over a million dollars with the scheme. Even today, police bunco squad experts estimate that the swindle is worked hundreds of times annually in this country. Bankers, stockbrokers and other professional men are the usual victims. Because of the advances made in photocopying techniques, authorities say, supposedly sophisticated individuals are now more likely to become victims.

Monk, Maria (1817–1849) anti-Catholic hoaxer

One of the most infamous impostors of her time, a young girl named Maria Monk became a rallying point in the 1830s for American Protestants against what was regarded as the evils of popery, fanning emotions that were later exploited fully by the Know-Nothings. Maria arrived in New York in January 1836 in the company of a Canadian clergyman, the Rev. W. K. Hoyt, who told all who cared to listen that he had saved her from a life of sin in the famous Hotel Dieu nunnery in Montreal. More likely, Rev. Hoyt had, as Maria was to admit in moments of candor, met her following a street corner solicitation.

The pair had with them the first draft of what they claimed was Maria’s memoirs of her years as a novice and nun at the Hotel Dieu. When published under the title of The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, it was to say the least most shocking in its charges. According to Maria, the remote cellars of the nunnery were strewn with the bones of nuns who had resisted the advances of amorous priests. She said the sisters were called upon nightly by priests from a nearby monastery, who ventured through subterranean passages to conduct their amorous and abusive exercises. Maria had a tiny tot with her whose origin she traced to these nocturnal visits from the neighboring clergyman. A later investigation by Canadian authorities turned up rather convincing evidence that the gentleman who had fathered the child—though not in the nunnery—was a Montreal policeman.

Maria and Hoyt found as sponsors for the book the Society for the Diffusion of Christian Knowledge, especially its president, Dr. W. C. Brownlee, pastor of the Collegiate Dutch Reformed Church and himself the author of a militant anti-Catholic best-seller, Popery. Dr. Brownlee thought so highly of this supposed refugee from a nunnery that he took her into his own house under the care of his wife, leading in time to complaints by the Rev. Mr. Hoyt that Maria was a “damned jilting jade.”

By that time Maria was worth fighting over; her book sold an astonishing 20,000 copies almost immediately. Anti-Papists could delight in a variety of chilling charges; for example, one nun’s punishment for some minor infraction was to be stretched out on a mattress with her face upwards, and then bound with cords so that she could not move. In an instant, another bed [mattress] was thrown upon her. One of the priests, named Bonin, sprang like a fury first upon it with all his force. He was speedily followed by the nuns until there were as many on the bed as could find room, and all did what they could do, not only to smother, but to bruise her. Some stood and jumped upon the poor girl with their feet: and others, in different ways, seemed to seek how they might beat the breath out of her body. After the lapse of fifteen or twenty minutes, Father Bonin and the nuns ceased to trample on her and stepped from the bed. They then began to laugh. . . .

Maria assured her readers “speedy death can be no great clamity to those who lead the lives of nuns,” and she offered to visit the Hotel Dieu “with some impartial ladies and gentlemen, that they may compare my account with the interior parts of the building, and if they do not find my description true, then discard me as an impostor.”

Her challenge was not taken up, but in time even firm believers in Maria developed doubts. Maria’s mother in Montreal denied that her wastrel daughter had ever entered a nunnery. Moreover, she insisted that she had been visited in 1835 by the Rev. Mr. Hoyt, who offered her $500 to say such were the facts. Eventually, Dr. Brownlee concluded he had been hoodwinked; not only did the girl’s story appear contradictory but she had also run off in the meantime with his young clergyman protege, John J. L. Slocum. In 1836 Slocum brought suit against the publishers of the book for Maria’s share of the royalties, all of which had been appropriated by the Society for the Diffusion of Christian Knowledge. The resulting trial clearly demonstrated Maria’s story to be a hoax.

This, however, did not stop Maria. In August 1837 she turned up at the house of a Dr. Sleight, a Philadelphia clergyman, and told a tale of being kidnapped by a group of priests and held captive in a nearby convent. She had escaped, she said, by promising one of the priests that she would marry him. The result of all this was, of course, a sequel to her first book, Further Disclosures of Maria Monk.

The second publication also did rather well, but Maria evidently saw little of the financial rewards. Slocum persuaded her to sign over to him a number of rights to both publications and he then decamped for London to arrange for their foreign publication.

Maria's life plunged downward. She became a habitue of the dives of the Bowery, a drunken hag before she was 30. She was confined in jail for picking a man's pocket in 1849 and died that year at the age of 32, although her true identity went unnoticed for some time. But The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk has outlived her. To date, well over 300,000 copies have been sold.

Monsieur New York (c. 1822–?) hangman

The most famous American executioner of the mid-19th century was "Monsieur New York," that state's official hangman, whose true identity was a closely guarded secret. For years newspapers referred to him by that nickname or a more prosaic one, George. He was considered a master of his craft, and one of the few executioners of the era who could dispatch a condemned person with a minimum of disconcerting suffering, prolonged strangling or, the most embarrassing of circumstances, unwarranted decapitation.

Monsieur New York got his start in the profession in the early 1850s, when he approached the sheriff of New York and offered to carry out the hanging of a black convicted of murder. At the time, he was about 30 years old and a butcher's assistant at the Washington Market. He had read about and sought to emulate Jack Ketch, the renowned high executioner of Great Britain. Because the previous hangman had abruptly walked away from the job, a not uncommon occurrence, since few could cope with the public attitudes and comments once they were identified, George's offer was accepted. The job was his, subject of course to a demonstration of his efficiency.

Observers described the execution as a "beautiful job" and George was named a deputy sheriff, although only a handful of officials knew his real identity. As he performed further commendable jobs, his fame spread and Monsieur New York was soon in demand in many parts of the country. His standard fee was $100 per execution plus all expenses, which often included a carpenter's charge for constructing the proper gallows and the price of a sound rope. Newspapers in communities he visited somberly informed their readers that "his daily visits to the slaughterhouse had made him familiar with the use of the windlass to the perfection of an application for the humane accommodation of the law-breaking community."

Even the army made use of Monsieur New York's unsurpassed abilities, calling on him in 1861 to execute one Capt. Beale, a Confederate officer charged with nefarious activities, and a Capt. Kennedy, a Union officer who had burned down a hotel in New York. Like many artists, Monsieur New York had a temperament and in 1869, in a moment of pique, refused to do any hangings for the current sheriff. As a result, the Police Gazette reported, "the departure of John Real was sadly bungled." Needless to say, the sheriff placated his star hangman shortly thereafter.

Possibly because of rivalry, neighboring New Jersey for a time refused to avail themselves of Monsieur New York's services. During this period one Bridget O'Brien was scheduled to die in New Brunswick for the murder of her mistress. While the master hangman was professionally ignored, he was extended the courtesy of an invitation to the hanging.

"Boys, that Jerseyman will make a mess of the job," was his immediate comment when he viewed the gallows; disaster loomed, he warned.

"What are you trying to do, you damned fool!" he cried out in dismay when he saw how the Jersey hangman was handling the rope. "Then," one account of the event stated, "unable to restrain himself, the scientific strangler pushed his way through the crowd and saw to it that Bridget was sent out of this vale of tears in as laudable style as conditions would permit and the hand of an artist could assure."

In the 1880s, Monsieur New York's last decade of service, a newspaper revealed he lived with his family in a house near the East River in the vicinity of 125th Street and that he was a member of the Methodist Church. The neighborhood was rife with speculation about his identity and many a family man, determined to lay to rest any suspicions about himself, made it a point to be seen on a street in his neighborhood whenever an execution was taking place downtown. To the end, the identity of Monsieur New York remained a secret.

Mooners moon-affected criminals

An official publication of the New York City Police Department reads: "Mooner. A mentally disturbed person who is activated during a full moon."

It is neither a novel nor a new belief. Sir William Blackstone, the great British jurist, was the first to define the mooner theory in legal terms.

A man who is a lunatic or non compos mentis is one who hath understanding, but by disease, grief or other accident, hath lost the use of his reason. A lunatic is indeed properly one that hath lucid intervals, sometimes enjoying his senses and sometimes not, and that frequently depending upon the change of the moon.

And backing up these two authoritative views is the experience of numerous cops on the beat who believe that a full moon spells trouble for them. At the time of the full moon, it invariably seems that more screwballs and more drunks are abroad, more family quarrels erupt and more false fire alarms are sounded. Veteran newspapermen claim that during the full moon a higher percentage of crackpots turns up in city rooms with tips of zany stories. A survey made in Connecticut showed that during the period of the full moon some types of crimes increased by as much as 200 percent. Violent robberies rose about 100 percent and breaking and entering went up some 78 percent. Drunk cases doubled and fatal accidents quintupled.

Arsonists are notoriously affected by the full moon. Some years ago investigators for the National Board of Fire Underwriters solved a mysterious string of fires in a Pennsylvania town by tracking the cycle of the moon. Explaining the firebug's capture, the investigators remarked, "The majority of the fires set by this man falls within the full-moon cycle, and his apprehension was brought about by surveillance based on the theory that the person responsible for the fires would set another during the next full moon."

This country's classic moon murderer was DeWitt Clinton Cook, who by the age of 20 had committed 300 burglaries and numerous attacks on women in California. During Cook's crime rampage a leading expert on abnormal behavior, police psychiatrist Dr. J. Paul de River, warned the authorities they were dealing with a mooner whose "attacks on women will continue every month until he is caught." On February 24, 1939, the night of a full moon, Cook killed Anya Soseyeva, a pretty young drama student at Los Angeles City College. He was not captured until a moon burglary in August. When Cook was caught, Dr. de River diagnosed him as "a nocturnal prowler who likes to wander in lonely places at night."

While more and more evidence accumulates indicating that "moon madness" may be a genuine affliction, jurors are not prepared to hand down insanity verdicts on such ground. Cook went to the gas chamber, and the Pennsylvania arsonist, a 24-year-old fireman, was sentenced to 30 to 60 years.

Mooney case labor frame-up

The Mooney case, which was to become a labor cause celebre for more than two decades, began in deadly violence on July 22, 1916 during a Preparedness Day parade in San Francisco. A bomb exploded on the sidewalk, killing outright or mortally wounding 10 persons and injuring 40 others. Among those charged with the bombing were two labor organizers, Thomas J. Mooney and Warren K. Billings. During a strike in 1913, Mooney, his wife, Billings and two others had been arrested on a charge of unlawful possession of explosives. In a subsequent trial Mooney had been found not guilty while Billings had been sent to prison for two years. Thereafter, Mooney was marked as an agitator.

Following the Preparedness Day parade massacre, the case against Mooney was extremely weak but both he and Billings were found guilty. Mooney was sentenced to death; Billings drew life imprisonment. Their trial had taken place during a period of mounting anti-Red sentiment. Revelations in 1918 that much of the testimony against Mooney had been perjured and that other evidence was highly questionable eventually caused even the trial judge to join in the long fight to clear him. President Woodrow Wilson prevailed on Gov. William Stephens to delay the execution, and the governor eventually commuted Mooney's sentence to life imprisonment. Labor unions and other organizations kept up the battle for Mooney. One California governor after another was petitioned for either a rehearing or a pardon. Finally, in January 1939 Gov. Culbert L. Olson, shortly after being inaugurated, pardoned Mooney and later that year released Billings by commuting his sentence. Upon his release Mooney declared he probably had been more valuable to the labor movement behind bars than he could have been if he had stayed out of prison. Mooney died in 1942 at the age of 59 and Billings in 1972 at age 79.

Moore, Flossie (1866-?) female mugger

Described by a police biographer as "the most notorious female bandit and footpad that ever operated in Chicago," Flossie Moore, a black woman, appeared in the Levee and other vice districts in Chicago in the late 1880s and soon was making much more money than any of her male counterparts. She openly declared that a holdup woman in Chicago had to make at least $20,000 a year or be a disgrace to the profession. Flossie did considerably better than that, earning $125,000 from late 1889 to mid-March 1893, when she was sent to Joliet Prison for five years for a particularly vicious mugging of an elderly farmer who had been visiting the city.

Flossie considered herself the black queen of crime in Chicago and got extremely jealous when her rival for that crown, a strong-arm woman named Emma Ford, made a bigger score. Often, the next man down the street had to pay for that. As befitting a crime queen, Flossie always carried a huge roll of bills in the bosom of her dress and another in a stocking, sported a white lover named Handsome Harry Gray, to whom she gave an allowance of $25 a day, an astonishing figure for the era, and appeared at balls staged by brothel keepers in gowns costing $500 and more. To handle her legal problems, she paid a lawyer $125 a month, but the man had to work for his money. Flossie was arrested as often as 10 times in a single day, and in one year alone she was scheduled for trial in criminal court three dozen times. Once when fined $100, she laughed at the judge and said: "Make it two hundred. I got money to burn!"

When she was sent to Joliet in 1893, Flossie quickly proved to be the most uncontrollable woman ever imprisoned there, twice almost killing a matron and serving a good portion of her sentence in solitary confinement. Flossie Moore returned to Chicago after serving her sentence but soon complained she was a marked woman, constantly watched by the police. About 1900 she left Chicago for New York; thereafter, no more is known of her.

Moore, Lester (?-?) mystery subject of epitaph

Lester is a real question mark. Did he ever live? More importantly, did he ever die? No devotee of graveyard humor is unfamiliar with the inscription on Lester's tombstone in the Boot Hill Cemetery at Tombstone, Ariz. It reads:

*Here lies Lester Moore
Four slugs
From a forty-four
No Les
No More*

According to one story, a Wells Fargo guard was responsible for sending Lester to his poetic reward, but there seems to be no written record of that fact. Western historian Denis McLoughlin destroys a humorous,

MOORE, Nathaniel Ford

if morbid, bit of Americana by suggesting that no one is buried there, pointing out, “The aroma of the prankster emanates from this plot of ground; no date of death accompanies the verse, and had the latter originated during Tombstone’s lead-swapping period, ‘four balls from a .44’ would have been apt for the time.”

Moore, Nathaniel Ford (1883–1910) suspected murder victim

Few deaths aroused as much gossip and scandal in Chicago as that of playboy Nathaniel Ford Moore, the 26-year-old son of James Hobart Moore, president of the Rock Island Railroad and one of the nation’s most influential capitalists. There were many back in 1910 who firmly believed Nathaniel Moore had been murdered and that belief persists to this day.

Young Moore supposedly found a check for $100,000 under his breakfast plate on his 21st birthday and became a playboy that night, visiting Chicago’s and America’s most-renowned and fabulous bordello, the Everleigh Club. For the next five years he was a regular there. His final visit was the night of January 8, 1910, when he showed up drunk. The strict rule of the Everleigh Club prohibiting the admittance of any customer in an inebriated condition was relaxed in Moore’s case. However, one of the Everleigh sisters, Minna, refused to allow him to be served any more wine, which set off an argument between her and one of her girls, Moore’s favorite, whom the playboy always tipped lavishly. The harlot marched out of the club, vowing vengeance on the Everleighs.

Moore himself left about 1 A.M. About 30 hours later, at dawn of January 10, Minna Everleigh received a telephone call from the harlot who had paraded out of the club in such a rage. Tearfully, the girl told Minna that Moore had died in a fashionable brothel run by Madam Vic Shaw. She also imparted the intelligence that Madam Shaw and some other madams along South Dearborn Street, members of the Friendly Friends, a society of brothel owners who constantly plotted against the Everleigh sisters because their club siphoned off so much of the “playboy money,” had come up with a bizarre plot to plant Moore’s body in the Everleigh Club furnace.

Minna Everleigh, accompanied by some supporters, marched on the Shaw brothel and forced her way in. She confronted Madam Shaw, who finally admitted to the presence of young Moore’s corpse. Minna insisted the police be called and stood by while the young heir’s body was removed to the family’s Lake Shore Drive home, rather than her furnace. According to Minna Everleigh, Moore had died of a murderous overdose of morphine in his champagne, but the official investigation indicated death was due to heart disease. The investigation’s finding, however, did not stop the whispering that there had indeed been a murder but that the family had used its power to limit the scandal to the proportions it had already achieved. The facts were never fully established to everyone’s satisfaction.

The furnace plot became a part of Chicago folklore, adopted by the Capone gang for use when an unwanted stiff had to be removed from a mob resort called the Four Deuces. The boys would haul the corpse to the cellar of a competing establishment and put it in the furnace. Then the manager of the Four Deuces would complain to the police that the competition was running an illegal crematorium. In the ensuing investigation the rival resort would be so ripped up by police looking for additional “bodies” that it could never reopen.

By 1927 Al Capone’s control of Chicago crime, including bootlegging, was almost complete. The only major force still in his way was the bloodied but still powerful O’Banion gang from the North Side. O’Banion and his successor Hymie Weiss had already departed the scene in a hail of Capone bullets and the next boss, Schemer Drucci, was killed by a policeman. That left George “Bugs” Moran as the only North Sider tough enough to continue the battle against the Capones, and in fact, he was still capable of forcing Big Al to stay under cover for fear of attack.

Bugs earned his nickname for his flaky behavior as the sometimes clown prince of the gang, but he was also committed to violence. O’Banion’s North Siders pulled no shooting caper in which Moran did not participate. He was the first to put a bullet in the head of a riding academy horse the O’Banions snatched and “executed” after it had thrown and killed their celebrated compatriot Nails Morton. He was also the gunman who rushed across the street to finish off Johnny Torrio after Torrio had been hit four times out of a barrage of shots fired at his limousine. But Bugs’ gun misfired and Torrio survived. Moran was also in the lead car when the North Siders made their famous 11-car convoy attack on the Hawthorne Inn in Cicero, pouring 1,000 bullets and shotgun slugs into the building in a vain effort to assassinate Capone.

Upon his assumption of the gang’s leadership, Moran continued his policy of frequently making peace with Capone but breaking it several hours later. Moran’s hatred for Capone was almost pathological.

He considered Capone a lowly type and never could resist taunting him in public. Bugs held to the high moral tone of the O'Banions, permitting no whorehouses to operate in the gang's territory. He told of Capone's frequent entreaties for permission to introduce prostitution, offering to pay Moran 50 percent of the profits. "We don't deal in flesh," Moran thundered. "We think anyone who does is lower than a snake's belly. Can't Capone get that through his thick skull?"

Before turning 21, Moran had committed 26 known robberies and served three prison sentences. O'Banion loved Moran like a brother, mainly because he had a similarly murderous "wit." Once, Moran ran into Judge John H. Lyle, one of Chicago's few honest and courageous judges of the period, at a baseball game and said: "Judge, that's a beautiful diamond ring you're wearing. If it's snatched some night, promise me you won't go hunting me. I'm telling you now I'm innocent."

This puckish style made Moran good copy for the newspapers and gained him acceptance by the public as sort of a jolly good killer, with far more enviable characteristics than Capone. And probably more citizens were rooting for Moran to win the war of survival with Capone. As a matter of fact, each managed to survive the onslaughts of the other. Moran's closest call was the infamous St. Valentine's Day Massacre.

In early 1929 Capone used a Detroit front man to pretend he had a load of hijacked booze available. Moran agreed to take delivery of the shipment at the gang's headquarters, a garage at 2122 North Clark Street, on the morning of February 14, 1929. Arriving a little late for the transaction, Bugs noticed three men dressed as policemen and two others in plain clothes entering the premises. Figuring it was a police shake-down, Moran hung back, waiting for the law to depart. Minutes later, machine-gun fire erupted inside the garage, leaving six gangsters and an innocent bystander dead. Moran took off.

The St. Valentine's Day Massacre decimated the North Side mob. Although Moran vowed vengeance, wailing, "Only Capone kills like that," his power was gone. The North Siders fell apart, some drifting away, others joining Capone. Moran may have had one small victory thereafter. He has often been credited, although the fact has never been established, with the assassination seven years later of Machine Gun Jack McGurn, a Capone enforcer popularly believed to have been one of the perpetrators of the massacre.

After that, Moran's crimes turned petty. He was involved in a number of burglaries about on a par with his teenage capers. In 1946 he and two others robbed an Ohio bank messenger of $10,000, a sum that the former millionaire bootlegger would have looked on as pocket money in his palmy days. Arrested by the FBI for the job, Moran served 10 years. On his release from prison, he was rearrested for an earlier bank robbery and sent to Leavenworth, where he died of cancer in 1957. Unlike his compatriots, O'Banion, Weiss and Drucci, who had all been given lavish gangster funerals, Moran was buried in a plain wooden casket in a potter's field west of the prison's walls.

Moran, Dr. Joseph Patrick (1895–1934) underworld's doctor

A promising young Illinois doctor, Joseph Patrick Moran wrecked his career through drinking and performing abortions. He was sent to prison in 1928 following the death of a girl on whom he had performed an abortion. In Joliet, Moran befriended a number of leading gangsters and removed a bullet that one of them had been carrying around for 10 years. When he was released, convicts with strong political connections sent him to a Chicago ward committeeman who arranged to get him a new medical license. He became the doctor for a Teamsters local involved in labor racketeering wars and treated many members for bullet wounds sans the obligatory report to the authorities. He also treated wounded holdupmen and other criminals sent to him by former Joliet cell mates.

By the early 1930s Moran was known as the underworld's family doctor and did considerable work for the Barker-Karpis gang as well as for the Dillinger mob. He performed especially painful plastic surgery operations on Alvin "Creepy" Karpis and Freddie Barker, leaving the pair in agony for weeks but hardly altering their appearances other than to give them a number of new facial scars. Moran also attempted to remove their fingerprints but after a few months the same whorls reappeared. Operating in unsanitary hotel rooms and cellars, Doc Moran's patient survival rate was naturally less than that of the average medical man, but he saved the life of many a hoodlum and murderer and thus was seldom begrudged his fee, which was almost never less than $1,000 and often two or three times that amount.

In the end, Moran's drinking habit did him in again. He needed several shots before he could probe a wound. The most pointed critique of his ability was made by the notorious Shotgun George Zeigler, who said: "I can't shoot straight when I'm pie-eyed. It stands to reason that a doctor can't cut straight when he's that way." Zeigler was rather upset because a gunman buddy of his had died after gangrene set in following an operation performed by Doc Moran.

Still, under the theory that even an incompetent sawbones was better than none, the Barkers took Doc Moran on the lam with them after the FBI identified him not only as an underworld medical man but also as one of the handlers of the ransom money in the Edward George Bremer kidnapping. Unfortunately for Moran, one night in 1934 he got drunk at the Casino Club near Toldeo, Ohio and informed members of the gang: "I have you guys in the palms of my hand. One word from me and your goose is cooked."

A doctor who drank and sometimes botched operations was one thing but a doctor who drank and sometimes botched operations and had a loose lip as well was quite another. The gang quieted the Doc down and later he left the club with two of them for a cooling-off boat ride on Lake Erie. Doc Moran was never seen again. As Freddie Barker later informed an associate: "Doc will do no more operating. The fishes probably have eaten him up by now."

Thomas "Butterfingers" Moran picked his first pocket at the age of 14 and then went on to pick an estimated 50,000 more over the next 65 years, winning the title King of the Pickpockets.

What made him exceptional was that he eschewed working with a gang, which meant he had no "framers" to distract his victims while he pulled his light-fingered routine. Furthermore, Moran, unlike most pickpockets, had taught himself his trade. "All you gotta do," he once said, "is do it." He did it first in 1906 on the day of the great San Francisco earthquake. "Nobody was worried about getting their pockets picked then, and I picked several and got myself all the confidence I needed for the rest of my career."

Moran's career took him to all the 48 states and Canada, and he was caught in every one of them, doing short stints that added up to about seven years of imprisonment. However, he seldom was caught more than once in a state, and out of 50,000 "scores," some 60 "wrong ones" did not add up to a bad record. His nickname Butterfingers was really meant as a compliment, since he could "slide in and out of a pocket like pure butter."

Moran never tried to make big scores around banks and in business districts, because he knew police surveillance was tougher there. Instead, he would work racetracks, subways, buses. One of the best spots, he reported, was union meetings since "everyone's a brother there." Moran's most impressive talent was his ability to "kiss the sucker," which means lifting a victim's wallet from his inside coat pocket while facing him. It is the hardest maneuver for a pickpocket to pull but it is also the one that a victim least expects because he considers his wallet invulnerable inside his coat pocket.

Moran's last arrest was in 1970, when he was 78 years old. When he was released, police noted he had only $2 in his pocket. He shrugged and said: "I'll get on a bus and get out of this town and get off with some sucker's wallet. I've never worried about money. I can get some anytime." Shortly before his death in a charity ward in Miami, Fla. on September 14, 1971, he said he was going to the races the next day because he was "feeling lucky."

Morello, Nicholas (1866–1916) Mafia leader and murder victim

The leader of the New York mafiosi during the first of the Mafia wars, Nick Morello was a crafty and brilliant gang leader, one of the first to conceive the idea of a great criminal syndicate, each of its elements at peace with one another and in control of all the rackets in the country. But in spite of his goal, Morello, the last of that notorious family to come to power, found himself at war with the Brooklyn camorristas, immigrant criminals from the Camorra gangs of Naples. While the Sicilian mafiosi controlled the rackets of East Harlem and Greenwich Village in Manhattan, the camorristas, under Don Pelligrino Morano, had consolidated their power in Brooklyn, collecting protection money from Italian storekeepers, ice and coal dealers and sundry businessmen as well as controlling the Brooklyn docks.

The conflict between the two organizations ostensibly flared because of an attempt by the Morano forces to move into the East Harlem rackets, but it was more likely a continuation of a bloody Old World rivalry. Morello believed it was silly to keep fighting such battles and sent out peace feelers. The Morano forces spurned these offers, and by 1916 tensions between the two syndicates had become so intense that no mafioso or camorrista would dare set foot in the other's territory.

Finally, Morano abruptly sent word that he had seen the merit of Morello's idea for an armistice. Morello was cautious about accepting Morano's invitation to come to Brooklyn for a peace conference. It took six months for Morello to show up, and he failed to bring his top aides, as Morano had suggested. When Morello and his bodyguard stepped out of their car in front of the meeting place, a cafe on Brooklyn's Navy Street, Morano was clearly disappointed, but he decided to make the best of a poor situation. He gave an order and a five-man execution squad stepped forward and cut down the pair in broad daylight.

Later court testimony revealed Morano had done the job in such a brazen fashion because he was under the assumption that the payoffs he had made to a New York police detective, Michael Mealli, had “cleared the operation with the cops.” Some of the killers talked, and Morano and a number of his top aides went to prison for life. When his sentence was pronounced, the Brooklyn Eagle reported, “Morano was surrounded by a dozen Italians who showered kisses on his face and forehead. On the way to the jail other Italians braved the guard and kissed Morano’s hands, cheeks and forehead.”

With Morello dead and Morano in prison, the first Mafia war ended and with it the dreams of Nick Morello for a “great combination” of the gangs. The Italian underworld was forced to continue its pattern of Old World organization, but a number of new faces in the gangs had heard Morello and listened. One of these was Salvatore Luciana, then only a young thug in the Five Points gang. He would Americanize his name to Charles “Lucky” Luciano and he would Americanize the Mafia 15 years after Morello’s murder.

It is difficult to decide whether Giuseppe Esposito or the Morello family was the first to introduce the Mafia to this country. Both Esposito and the Morellos were vicious killers. Esposito had the greater range, with his activities stretching from New York to New Orleans, more because of the pressure of police pursuit than by design, while the Morellos had the more firmly established power base in New York. The Morellos were a cunning and vicious clan of brothers, half-brothers and brothers-in-law from Corleone, Sicily. They were numerous enough by themselves to constitute a Mafia “family.”

The head of the clan was Antonio Morello, the eldest brother of the main branch of the Morello family; Antonio was credited with some 30 to 40 New York murders in the 1890s. Another brother, Joe Morello, killed often and ghoulishly and eventually became the boss of the New York Mafia. Their younger brother Nick died in 1916 in a war with the Neapolitan gangs, the Camorra, that controlled crime in Brooklyn. Other important members of the Morello gang included Ciro Terranova, an important mafioso until the 1930s, and his brother-in-law, the notorious Lupo the Wolf, until 1920 the most-feared gangster in all the Italian communities of the city.

The early crimes of the Morellos included Black Hand terrorism, contract killings, waterfront thefts and counterfeiting. The Secret Service found it difficult to break up their counterfeiting operation because it was carried out in Sicily, with the bills being shipped over hidden in legitimate freight. The Morellos could easily retrieve the caches of bogus bills through their control of the docks.

A great number of the Morellos’ descendants are involved in New York-New Jersey Mafia rackets today.

Moretti, Willie (1894–1951) syndicate chief

A boyhood friend of Frank Costello, Moretti was, in his younger days, as tough as any ganster. By 1943, however, he was starting to act strangely, exhibiting the first signs of mental illness brought on by syphilis, for which he never had been treated. Moretti loved to gamble and began talking wildly about betting and winning millions of dollars on horses that didn’t exist in big races that were never run. He rambled on about syndicate affairs that shouldn’t have been mentioned in public. Some of the Mafia capos, those otherwise loyal to Costello, began to grumble that Willie was a threat to everyone.

Costello had been best man at Willie’s wedding and had a genuine affection for him. He prudently decided to head off trouble by getting Moretti out of the line of fire, sending him on a long vacation out West with a male nurse. While Willie was away, he pleaded regularly with Costello, in conversations wiretapped by the police, to be allowed to return. Costello refused and continued to protect Willie from himself. Only when he became less voluble was he allowed back.

When Moretti was called before the Kefauver Committee to testify in 1950, pressure built up for his assassination, but Costello again prevented it. After much stalling Moretti finally appeared before the Senate committee and proceeded to talk and talk and talk. However, he really said very little, aside from offering the probers such pearls of wisdom as, “They call anybody a mob who makes six percent more on money” and, on gangsters he knew, “well-charactered people don’t need introductions.” He also patiently explained to the senators that he could not be a member of the Mafia because he didn’t have a membership card.

him on his forthrightness and Sen. Charles Tobey found his frankness “rather refreshing.” “Thank you very much,” Willie replied to the praise. “Don’t forget my house in Deal if you are down on the shore. You are invited.”

While Willie had handled himself to the mob’s satisfaction, his condition further deteriorated in 1951. He became friendly with a number of New Jersey newspapermen and was threatening to stage a press conference to talk about gambling in New Jersey. One who considered Willie dangerous was the ambitious Vito Genovese, who saw in the elimination of Moretti a chance to enhance his own position, with his men taking over Willie’s operations and thus eroding the power of Genovese’s prime enemy, Costello. He argued Moretti was losing his mind and was endangering the entire organization. “If tomorrow I go wrong, I want you to hit me in the head too,” Genovese said. Finally, even such a Costello loyalist as Albert Anastasia was convinced that a “mercy killing” was necessary for the sake of both Willie and the syndicate.

On October 4, 1951 Willie sat down in a New Jersey restaurant with four men. When the waitress stepped into the kitchen, they were chatting amiably in Italian. Suddenly, she heard several gunshots. She peered through the swinging doors. All the customers but one were gone. Willie Moretti, 57, lay dead on the floor, his left hand on his chest. Moretti’s assassination, like virtually all syndicate rub-outs, remains unsolved.

While it may be presumptuous to single out any one man as the most-tortured prisoner in the history of American penology, that distinction has frequently been assigned to Ed Morrell, the so-called Dungeon Man of San Quentin. He had been the youngest member of a gang known as the California Outlaws, which made war on the land-grabbing Southern Pacific Railroad in the 1880s and 1890s. Many of Morrell’s torturous experiences in Folsom and San Quentin prisons formed the basis of Jack London’s The Star Rover.

Pennsylvania-born Morrell arrived in California in 1891. He found injustices in the area little different from those he had witnessed in his own anthracite region of Pennsylvania, where the Mollie Maguires, a secret labor terrorist society, came into existence. The beautiful San Joaquin Valley of California appeared to offer hope for a new life. Instead, he found, as in his native state, law and order were on the side of money and might. Life in the valley was a bitter experience. Land agents working for the railroad were swindling the settlers with the help of the law. Anything perpetrated by the gunmen of the railroad, popularly called the Octopus, was considered legal, including such atrocities as the Slaughter of Mussel Slough, in which seven settlers had been shot and killed in 1880. The result was a virtual civil war. Railroad undercover agents moved in among the settlers to spy on them and report any troublemakers, who were dealt with brutally. Under the circumstances, it was inevitable that an organization like the California Outlaws would spring up in the valley. They existed solely to steal from the Southern Pacific Railroad, robbing its express car but never victimizing any of the passengers or stealing the mail.

Bribes and threats were made to area residents in an effort to force them to betray the Outlaws. The gang countered by planting 20-year-old Ed Morrell as their own spy in the employ of the notorious railroad detective Big Bill Smith. In time, the ranks of the gang dwindled down to 25 men, 24 regular Outlaws, headed by Chris Evans and the Sontag brothers, George and John, plus Morrell. When Evans was finally captured, a conspiracy was hatched to have the badly wounded Outlaw leader killed attempting to escape, and Smith assigned Morrell a key role in the plot. Instead, Morrell staged a real escape for Evans and went with him. Morrell carried, or half-dragged, Evans through the valley and surrounding hills for weeks, with hundreds of railroad agents, Pinkertons and Wells Fargo men in pursuit. They were sheltered by one hill family after another but finally betrayed by a man enticed by the big reward offered for them. Both were captured and Evans was sentenced to life. All Morrell was guilty of was aiding Evans to escape, an offense normally punishable by just a few years in prison. Smith, however, pointed out that Morrell had taken the police chief's revolver during the escape, which constituted robbery. As a result, Morrell was sentenced to life at hard labor in Folsom Prison. Folsom at the time was known as the private lockup of the Southern Pacific. The warden of Folsom was a former railroad detective, as were many of the guards. Sometime later, it was discovered that the warden was still carried on the railroad's payroll despite his state position.

Folsom was a mankiller with a blood curdling, awesome history. Many convicts not tough enough to endure its brutal labor conditions and tortures were known to have deliberately charged the armed guards or even hurled themselves into the surging waters of the American River to achieve at least a more merciful death.

Morrell was assigned to rock pile work under the sweltering sun and supervised by guards who went out of their way to discipline him for imaginary infractions. Finally, for stepping out of line in formation, a minor infraction at best, Morrell was given 50 hours on the derrick. Few men at Folsom were given 50 hours of this treatment, the usual punishment calling for 10 hours spread over a two- or three-day span. The derrick was a block-and-tackle contraption whereby a prisoner was suspended with his arms bound behind his back and the tips of his shoes barely resting on the dungeon floor. The pain, needless to say, was excruciating and often resulted in severe bleeding from the kidneys. For that reason a prisoner normally would be subjected to no more than two 2 1/2-hour sessions a day. On one occasion Morrell's punishment lasted for 13 days because he bled so badly he could not do the full five hours a day.

Punishment after punishment was heaped on Morrell and the warden informed him he would never get any respite until he revealed the identities of the California Outlaws still at large. Morrell endured his punishment and said nothing. Once, the California Outlaws bribed a guard to look the other way so that Morrell could escape. Another guard learned of the plot and alerted the warden, who decided to let Morrell make the attempt and stationed guards outside the wall to gun him down. But Morrell never came out. The warden's wife, known as the Angel of the Prison, saved him. She had overheard her husband's plan and sent word to Morrell through another convict. Morrell had to endure additional tortures because he would not reveal details of the escape plan or say who had warned him.

For this stubbornness Morrell was subjected to a number of sessions in the "lime cell," a fiendish torture chamber lined with a coating of lime. A guard would hose down the walls and a white mist from the exploding chloride of lime would fill the cell. Tossed inside, the prisoner would feel as though his throat was on fire and would actually think his breath was aflame. Once subjected to 10 days in a row of such punishment, Morrell ended up with his eyebrows and eyelashes completely burned away, and his nose, throat and mouth so seared that his voice was reduced to a faint whisper.

Through all these ordeals, Morrell's spirit never broke and he even organized other escape attempts and riots. Finally, he was transferred to San Quentin. There too, Morrell was subjected to very special treatment. When he arrived, he was given 20 days in solitary for "looking at" a guard. The day after he was released, he was sent back for 30 more days on a complaint from the same guard.

Morrell was regularly punished with the "San Quentin overcoat," which resembled a supertight full-length straitjacket. The overcoat was a coffin-shaped piece of coarse, heavy canvas with brass eyelets along the sides and two inside pockets for the hands. First, Morrell would be wrapped in a blanket, not to ease the pain but rather to avoid leaving too many marks and bruises in case he died and also to make the overcoat fit more tightly. Then the garment was fitted around him and laced tight.

Later, in his autobiography, The 25th Man, Morrell described his first experience in the overcoat:

Jungle travelers have described the awful agony of a native victim being squeezed to death by a giant boa-constrictor. It is all too terrible for the human mind to contemplate, but even this inconceivable spectacle must pale before the death terrors of the jacket.

I had not been in it fifteen minutes when pain began shooting through my fingers, hands and arms, gradually extending to my shoulders. Then over my whole body there was a prickling sensation like that of millions of sharp needles jabbing through the tender flesh. . . . Hour after hour I endured the pain and as the time passed the anguish became more and more unbearable. I slept neither night nor day, and how slowly my torture went on when all was silent in the prison! The hours dragged as if weighted with lead.

Now a new horror came. The bodily excretions over which I had no control in the canvas vice ate into my bruised limbs. My fingers, hands, and arms grew numb and dead.

Thus I suffered incessantly for four days and fourteen hours. . . . Released from its pressure I attempted to gain my feet, but was too weak. My limbs were temporarily paralyzed. After a time, mustering all my strength, I reached a sitting posture and finally managed to drag off my saturated clothes.

“What a sight I beheld! My hands, arms, and legs were frightfully bruised. My body was shriveled like that of an old man, and a horrible stench came from it.

After enduring this punishment, Morrell was framed on a charge of having a gun smuggled in to him for an escape. For this alleged infraction he was ordered to spend the rest of his life in solitary confinement in San Quentin’s dungeon. There was only one other prisoner undergoing the same treatment there, Jake Oppenheimer, who was known as the Tiger of the Prison Cage.

The two, who had never seen each other, were separated by 13 cells, but they eventually learned to communicate using a form of “knuckle talk,” with various knocks on the steel walls indicating different letters. It was the first use of such a method of communication in an American prison and has since been adopted in almost every prison in the world.

In 1903 San Quentin’s most brutal and villainous warden, Martin Aguirr, disgraced by prison scandals, was forced to resign. The next warden learned from the captain of the yard, John C. Edgar, that Morrell had been framed on the gun charge and made an investigation. As a result, Morrell, now famed as the Dungeon Man, was returned to the general prison population. In 1906 Edgar became warden and worked unceasingly for Morrell’s release. Edgar did not live to see the fruition of his efforts, but two years later, the acting governor, Lt. Gov. Warren Porter, personally came to San Quentin to present a pardon to Morrell.

It was a different San Quentin that Ed Morrell left. The new warden, John E. Hoyle, was the first of California’s progressive penologists, and his term marked a new era in the treatment of prisoners, one made possible by the publicity given to Ed Morrell. For the first time the American public took an interest in the administration of prisons and demanded humane treatment for inmates.

Morrell became a national hero. He lectured on prison reform, arguing primarily for the abolition of corporal punishment. He organized the American Crusaders to promote changes in the administration of prisons nationwide. He spoke before the legislatures of California and Pennsylvania and, in 1918, became the only ex-convict ever to be called to Congress to advise on inmate labor problems. Jack London’s The Star Rover and Morrell’s own autobiography further popularized the man on whom was visited almost all forms of evil practiced in America’s prisons. Much of the improvement later achieved in the nation’s prisons was due to Morrell’s dogged determination to survive the whip, the dungeon, the derrick, the lime cell and the San Quentin overcoat. He died in 1946.

Morse, Charles W. (c. 1860–1942) swindler

One of the most proficient American swindlers and confidence operators was Charles W. Morse, a Midwesterner who pulled off hundreds of crooked deals and bilked victims out of millions of dollars with every conceivable financial scam.

His greatest coup occurred two years after he was arrested, for the first and only time, in 1910 and sentenced to 15 years for tampering with the books of the Bank of North America. In 1912 President William Howard Taft granted him a full presidential pardon after government physicians reported he was dying of Bright’s disease. To the amazement of the medical men, the cunning swindler thrived and lived for 30 years after his release. It was finally discovered he had faked the symptoms of the disease with a special concoction composed mainly of different soaps.

Morton, Samuel J. “Nails” (?–1924) Chicago mob gunman

Nails Morton was a top gun in the Dion O’Banion gang, which from 1920 to 1924, the year of O’Banion’s death, fought the Italian mobsters even. Morton was held in awe by other Chicago mobsters because in World War I he had won the Croix de Guerre in France and received a battlefield promotion to first lieutenant.

Morton was an inventive sort of killer, but he was to become more noteworthy because of the way he died and the act of revenge that followed. Nails was fond of horseback riding in Lincoln Park, “where the society swells ride.” One day, in what the mob considered vicious treachery, a horse threw him and kicked him to death. The O’Banion gang took the required vengeance. Four of them, Bugs Moran, Schemer Drucci, Little Hymie Weiss and Two Gun Alterie, went to the riding stable and, with drawn guns, snatched the animal. After leading it to the spot where Morton had been killed, the animal was dispatched, in proper underworld style, with four slugs in the head, the incident later forming the basis for an episode in Mario Puzo's The Godfather.

Mossman, Burton C. (1867–1956) first head of Arizona Rangers

One of the Southwest's most successful ranchers, Burt Mossman was also one of its most illustrious lawmen, as the first head of the Arizona Rangers.

Born in Aurora, Ill., he was ramrodding his first spread in the New Mexico Territory by the age of 21. Nine years later, he was manager of the huge Hash Knife ranch, containing 60,000 cattle. He proved to be an action-oriented manager who cleared the Hash Knife range of rustlers. In 1901 Gov. Nathan O. Murphy named Mossman the first captain of the newly organized Arizona Rangers, specifically assigned to clear the state of rustlers and, above all, to "get Chacon." Augustine Chacon, a Mexican killer, was said to have notched his gun 30 times in shooting frays on both sides of the border.

Getting Chacon was not easy, and Mossman first had to take care of business closer at hand. In one stand-up gun duel he killed a vicious robber and killer named Juan Saliveras. In other exploits he rounded up a number of rustling gangs and chased several more far out of the state. Then in a daring mission in 1902, Mossman went to Mexico and managed to bring Chacon back to the hangman after wheedling his way into the bandit's confidence and suggesting a raid on the San Rafael ranch in the Arizona Territory.

Later in that year Mossman resigned his post to return to ranching, which was now a much safer activity in the area thanks to him and his rangers. Mossman was one of the Southwest's biggest ranchers until he retired in 1944. He died at Roswell, N.M. in 1956.

Mother Carey's Chickens slang for brothel inmates

One of the most popular terms for referring to a brothel inmate, the phrase set off a hunt by some social historians and writers to find the original Mother Carey, who was assumed to be a western madam since the term originated in the West. The term "Mother Carey," however, seems to be a corruption of mata cara, meaning dear mother.

Mountain Meadows Massacre religious mass killing

One of the worst crimes in Mormon history occurred on September 7, 1857, when a westbound wagon train of 140 men, women and children was attacked by Indians at Mountain Meadows, Utah Territory.

Some fanciful accounts contend that the attackers were not Indians at all but disguised white Mormons. There is little doubt, in fact, that some Mormons were acting in concert with the Indians. After about 20 of the emigrants had been killed in the first assault, the battle was interrupted by the arrival of Mormon Bishop John D. Lee, who was also Indian agent for the area, with a large group of his men and some Indian auxiliaries. Lee offered to escort the wagon train to Cedar City, Utah provided they would lay down their arms. The wagon train party gratefully agreed. However, as soon as the emigrants had put down their weapons, Lee and his men, in collusion with the attacking Indians, shot down all the men, including the wounded. The killing of the women and children was left to the Indians. Only 17 very young children, too young to bear witness, were spared in the massacre.

When Brigham Young learned what had happened, after being told false versions by Lee, he decided to do nothing to aid the authorities in their investigation, out of fear that all the men of the Mormon community would be implicated. Later, he excommunicated Lee and several other leaders of the massacre. It took the federal government 18 years to gather enough evidence to bring Lee to trial in July 1875. On March 23, 1877, having been found guilty, Lee was taken to the site of the massacre and executed there by a firing squad.

A Maryland practitioner, Dr. Samuel Mudd became implicated in the Lincoln assassination conspiracy after he set the leg of John Wilkes Booth during the latter's flight from Washington. Although Mudd was in no way involved in the crime, as was proved in later years, the hysteria of the times resulted in a vengeful trial in which Mudd was convicted of conspiring to kill the president. He was sentenced to life imprisonment in what was at the time the nation's most-dreaded federal prison, Fort Jefferson in the Dry Tortugas off Florida, where he was subjected to vicious treatment by his guards. Under orders from superiors, the guards kept Mudd chained to the floor of his cell and abused him regularly.

The Dry Tortugas Prison, as it was called, was a pesthole of illness and the scene of frequent yellow fever epidemics. Following a particularly deadly outbreak in 1867, in which another of the convicted Lincoln assassination conspirators, Michael O'Laughlin, and all the army surgeons died, Dr. Mudd surprised officials by offering to treat the prisoners, soldiers and guards. Mudd treated the prison population throughout the epidemic, even after contracting the disease himself.

Because of his humanitarian efforts and a four-year campaign by his wife, Mudd was released from prison in 1869 and returned to Maryland. In recent years an effort was made to obtain a complete pardon to clear his name, and in 1979 President Jimmy Carter sent a telegram to Dr. Richard Mudd, grandson of Dr. Mudd, affirming his belief that his grandfather had been unjustly convicted. President Carter regretted that the military commission's guilty verdict was not one that could be set aside by a president.

In the 19th century, gunmakers produced a whole series of .22 caliber firearms seldom longer than three or four inches. Because a lady could easily conceal one in her muff, they were known as muff pistols. Of course, not too many ladies carried these weapons but quite a few female criminals, such as Babe Irving of New York and Kitty Adams of Chicago (who often stuffed two in her muff), did. The muff pistol fell into general disrepute because of newspaper campaigns that blamed them for fostering criminality, much like the drives launched in the 1970s against the so-called Saturday Night Special.

mugging

The crime of mugging—sneaking up on a hapless victim, incapacitating him and robbing him—is as old as man himself. Practitioners of the art in early America were called footpads, because they padded out the soles of their shoes or boots with cloth or some other material to deaden the sound of their footsteps.

The term “mugger” itself appears to have originated in the 1830s in Buffalo, N.Y. on Canal Street, one of the most vile of all the sin streets of the 19th century. Crime ran rampant on Canal Street after the completion of the Erie Canal, and violence was always considered the quickest and easiest solution when a gentleman ran so short of money that he could not even afford to buy a mug of beer. He would simply walk out into the darkness of Canal Street and waylay, or “mug,” an unsuspecting passerby.

Mullin, Herbert (1947–) mass murderer

Voted most likely to succeed by his 1965 high school class, young Herbert Mullin went on to become a college dropout, dope addict and all-round weirdo. Late in 1972 he went on a four-month murder spree, during which he killed at least 10 persons because he somehow believed this would prevent a major earthquake popularly, if not scientifically, predicted to happen in early 1973. According to his later confession, Mullin said that he had been telepathically “ordered” to kill and that only human sacrifices could prevent the impending tragedy. He stated, “I’m a scapegoat person made to carry the guilt feelings of others. . . . Every day people die. There’s a steady flow of death in order to keep the coast free of cataclysmic earthquakes and the earth in orbit.”

Declared legally sane, Mullin was found guilty of murdering three women, one man and six boys in the Santa Cruz Mountains of northern California and was sentenced to life imprisonment. He was not tried for three additional murders to which he confessed, including that of a Catholic priest in Los Gatos, Calif., whom he had stabbed to death, he said, after having second thoughts about a confession he had made to him.

Mullinen, Joe (?–1781) colonial Robin Hood bandit

A daring colonial bandit, Joseph Mullinen clearly got his inspiration from the tale of Robin Hood; he stole from the rich and gave to the poor, at least to some extent. Mullinen began his depredations in southern New Jersey around the start of the American Revolution. He made gifts of part of his loot to the needy, seeking to build up a sympathetic network of well-wishers who would help him avoid the law. It worked for several years, as he made his forays out of the Pine Barrens, a 1,000-square-mile wilderness of woods and swampland, his own Sherwood Forest. Mullinen kept the major portion of his loot and, as we know from his confederates, buried it in various spots in the Pine Barrens.

A womanizer and drinker, Mullinen might have avoided capture had he not been so dedicated to having a good time. He was apprehended at a barn dance in New Columbia, N.J. and in August 1781, hanged. Those attending his execution came not so much to see him swing as in the hope that at the last minute he might reveal the hiding places of his booty. He did not, however, and New Jerseyites have gone on Mullinen treasure hunts right up to the present day.

Municipal Brothel San Francisco bordello

The nearest thing to a governmental whorehouse in America was San Francisco’s infamous Municipal Brothel in the early part of the 20th century. Because it soon became common knowledge that virtually all of the profits of the establishment flowed into the pockets of city officials and their political sponsors, the famous house, officially known just as 620 Jackson Street, soon won its more recognizable name. Saloon keepers and other businessmen who sought political favor advertised the brothel to customers. When strangers in town asked policemen where women could be found, they were obligingly directed to it; an officer who failed in that assigned task could count on being transferred to a less favorable beat. The house was a regular stop for Jackson Street trolleys, and if no ladies were aboard, the conductors shouted, “All out for the whorehouse!”

The brothel was first opened in 1904 as a three-story affair with some 90 cubicles. Recruitment of women was the duty of Billy Finnegan, a veteran character in San Francisco vice. He rented out space at a daily rate ranging from $2 to $5 per crib with a guarantee of immunity from arrest. After the place was destroyed by the earthquake and fire of 1906, a four-story and basement structure containing 133 cribs and a saloon was erected in its place. The prices varied according to floor and the beauty of the individual women. The basement was given over to Mexican harlots, who charged 25¢. The first, second and third floors were occupied mostly by American and French women, with the prices rising from 50¢ to 75¢ and up, to $1 on the third floor, which was populated exclusively by what customers were assured were “genuine Frenchies.” The fourth floor was given over to black prostitutes at 50¢.

Not only were the inmates protected from arrest under the political rule of Boss Abe Ruef and his puppet mayor, Eugene Schmitz, but most other brothels in the immediate area were shuttered to guarantee a good return for the political figures. Testimony before a grand jury in December 1906 established that Herbert Schmitz, the mayor’s brother, owned a one-quarter interest in the brothel and that, despite their denials, both the mayor and Ruef took a cut of the profits, in Ruef's case $250 a week. The indictment of Mayor Schmitz, Boss Ruef and several members of the Board of Supervisors, whom Ruef himself described as "being so greedy for plunder that they'd eat the paint off a house," led to the fall of the administration in 1907. None of the indictments in the case was acted upon, although Ruef eventually went to prison for bribery.

MURDER

Despite the wave of reform that hit San Francisco, the brothel continued to operate for a time, but from early 1907 it was subjected to many police raids, under pressure from a grand jury and the newspapers. The pervasiveness of the bribery involved was indicated by the fact that at first the harlots were simply driven off rather than arrested. When they finally were arrested, they were permitted to post small bonds, which they promptly forfeited. In September 1907 Chief of Police William J. Biggy visited the resort personally and ordered it closed when he found it swarming with boys as young as 14 years of age. The following year Chief Biggy crossed San Francisco Bay in a police launch to attend a conference. Later, he reembarked and was never seen alive again. His body was found floating in the bay a week later.

With Biggy's death, efforts were made to reopen the brothel but they were soon abandoned because of the opposition of a crusading priest, Father Terence Caraher, the San Francisco Globe and the new chief of police, Jesse B. Cook, formerly an acrobat and tumbler with the troupe of Renaldo, Cook and Orr.

Official FBI statistics shows that something like 19,000 or 20,000 murders are committed in the United States each year. The figures are not to be taken seriously, however, since such a raw compilation has little to do with the actual murder rate. As far back as 1953 William F. Kessler, M.D., and Paul B. Weston, a deputy inspector in the New York Police Department, said in their authoritative study The Detection of Murder: "Nowhere in the world is the investigation of unexplained or unexpected death so casual and haphazard as it is in the United States." They pointed out that murder is proved in only one-third of one percent of all unexplained and unexpected deaths. The ambiguous "fell, jumped or pushed," and "apparent suicide" are standard newspaper terms that undoubtedly cover a multitude of sins.

How many mass murderers walk free among us? How long do they get away with their crimes? Among the greatest known mass murderers in recent years has been John W. Gacy, an Illinois building contractor, who from 1972 to 1978 murdered 33 boys and young men he had lured to his home. After having sexual relations with his victims, he killed them and buried most of them in the crawlspace under his house. Of course, none of Gacy's victims caused a "recount" of the murders reported for the years in which they died. Such recording problems indicate how it is almost impossible to put a handle on the true number of murders committed in a year.

Who gets caught? Dr. Alan R. Moritz, longtime head of Harvard's Department of Legal Medicine, says, "Usually only the stupid ones are caught and convicted." Certainly, it is difficult to argue with estimates that for every murder discovered, there is another that is not even noticed. The Journal of the American Medical Association states, "With reasonable certainty it may be said that several thousands of murders pass unrecognized each year in the United States." In Virginia, which is considered to have one of the best medical examiner systems in the nation, it has been estimated that there are at least 50 murders a year that pass as natural deaths. Unquestionably, murders are more readily recognized in states like New York and California, but in a great many states, especially those still saddled with a nonscientific, often politically dominated coroner system, the procedures used in determining the cause of deaths are woeful. Some coroner's offices are as competent as any medical examiner's office, but in many parts of the country there is no requirement that the coroner even be a medical man. Some are dentists or undertakers or political hacks. Thus, death certificates contain, as surveys have shown, such comments as "Could be diabetes or poison," "Died in a shanty," or "The deceased died suddenly. Might be heart trouble."

Some states do not specifically require that the coroner be able to read and write. A university study once discovered a report by a coroner, presumably the highest medical man in the county, that read, "So far as I could ascertain, I found She came to her death from A natur cause comely called hart failure, and I found no cause to suspect any foul play."

Ignoring the ineptitude of certain coroner systems, a number of actual cases have perplexed medical examiners over the years. A 60-year-old New York man was sitting on his porch one day, minding his own business, when he suddenly slumped down and died. His grieving relatives told the medical examiner what had happened. "He suffered an attack and apparently struck his head on the stoop when he pitched over." It made sense, a natural death with no blood spilled.

That conclusion might have stood if the man's killer had not confessed. He was a mentally deranged man with a 20-year record in psychiatric institutions. He was caught in a spree of shooting people through windows with a .22 caliber rifle. After his apprehension he kept upsetting the police by insisting he had killed a man even though they had no such murder victim. He repeatedly furnished the date and place of the crime but nobody would believe him. Finally, a check was made. The 60-year-old man's body was dug up and an autopsy performed. Only then was a .22 caliber bullet found deeply imbedded in the dead man's brain.

There is a cynical police saying that goes, "If there ain't no murder suspect, well then there might not have been any murder." That sentiment may explain why the "cleared by arrest" record in murder cases is so superior to other types of crimes. While the police make an arrest in only one out of five crimes in general, the arrests in murder cases are better than 70 percent, an average undoubtedly helped by the fact that investigators simply fail to recognize many violent or unexpected deaths as murder.

In some instances they may simply not want to recognize a death as a possible murder. Such was the case with Mrs. Jeanne Brown, about age 30, in New York City. She was found dead, her jugular vein cut, sitting on the floor propped up against her bed. There were a number of empty beer bottles and one empty whiskey bottle in the room. Although the telephone wires had been ripped from the wall, no signs of a struggle were evident. At the time of her death, Jeanne's husband was aboard a ship in the Persian Gulf, and the police found no indication that she had ever entertained any male visitors while her husband was away. The woman had a history of alcoholism and had been under treatment a few months earlier.

The medical examiner first labeled the case a "definite homicide" and later a "possible homicide." However, the police and the district attorney did not agree. First of all, they had no suspect. They said the woman had had a past history of ripping telephone wires from the wall. As the police reconstructed the case, the woman had been drinking and had a beer can opener in her hand when she ripped out the telephone wires. As she jerked the wires free, her arm swung around and the opener slashed her throat. Not realizing how badly she had been hurt, she grabbed some facial tissues, placed them against the wound and dropped off to sleep. Within 30 minutes, she had bled to death.

It was a convenient theory. But the fact remains the woman's death could have been an accident, it could have been suicide or it could have been murder.

In an equally baffling case, in Milwaukee, Wis., a despondent housewife apparently crawled inside an oil furnace, let the door swing shut, then used a cord and rubber band device she contrived to turn on the controls and cremate herself. At least that was the theory, one that the county medical officer admitted was possible but added he could not rule out the possibility of a bizarre murder. It was not the usual sort of suicide, especially not for a woman. Usually, women suicides prefer sleeping pills or gas. A furnace death is almost always a case of murder.

Either of these two cases could have been a suicide or a murder and so could dozens of other violent, unexplained or sudden deaths that occur daily. There can be little doubt that some are murders.

Police in a large eastern city know of one case recorded as accidental death that was really murder—yet the murderer remains forever free. The victim was found in a pool of blood diluted with whiskey on the landing at the top of a flight of stairs. He was lying on his left side. There were pieces of shattered glass sprinkled about in the slowly coagulating blood. The first detectives on the scene quickly theorized what had happened: "The fellow is coming up the stairs and trips and falls. The broken bottle cuts him up."

The medical examiner arrived and soon agreed with the comment that "here's one guy who died of booze the hard way."

The body was carted off to the morgue, an autopsy was performed, the blood and glass on the landing cleaned up and the case marked closed. When the man fell, the official view went, the weight of his body caused several glass fragments to lacerate the left armpit and death resulted from loss of blood.

It took a year for the truth to surface. One night a woman, the dead man's part-time lady friend, got drunk and boasted how she had killed him. She said she had grasped the bottle of whiskey she was bringing home for them by its neck and smashed it against the stair railing. As the man raised his arm to hit her, she rammed the jagged end of the broken bottle into his armpit and just took off.

MURDER

As Kessler and Weston noted: “She was never prosecuted. There were no eye-witnesses, no fragments of glass, and no testimony as to the location of the various fragments. No one had ever processed the larger pieces of glass for fingerprints, no one had bothered to photograph the scene—in fact no one had bothered to conduct anything more than a cursory investigation.”

Thus another murder failed to make the crime tables. Murder remains a most serious problem, and undoubtedly far more serious than official statistics would indicate.

Some crime writers have said that murder is more diverse and complicated than any other offense. That is hardly the case. Rather it is one of the most monotonously consistent. Often the method of murder tells who did it. A single girl is stabbed two dozen times in a murderous frenzy. The police know immediately to look for her boyfriend or a secret admirer. If she is married, they zero in on her husband. If he is cleared, they then start looking for a lover. Not long ago in New York City a young mother was stabbed to death in her hospital bed. Was there a maniac loose in the hospital? That frightening theory was played up in the newspapers until police arrested a young man who lived across the street from the woman. He had been secretly enamored of her for a long time.

Murder is largely a family affair. In his book Crime in America, former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark warns, “If you are afraid of being murdered, there is more safety in deserting your family and having no friends than in additional police, who rarely have the opportunity to prevent friends and relatives from murdering each other.”

While Americans are concerned about being murdered by a stranger, the truth is that murders committed by persons unknown to the victim account for no more than 20 percent of all homicides. Perhaps two-thirds of all aggravated assaults are committed by relatives, friends or neighbors of the victim. Murder is a crime of hate and to hate someone it is helpful to know the person.

When John Godwin, the author of Murder USA, asked a veteran New York City patrolman what was the most dangerous situation facing a police officer, the patrolman unhesitatingly replied, “Trying to stop a family brawl on a hot night.” In fact, out of every five officers killed in the line of duty, one dies as a result of intervening in a domestic dispute.

Not surprisingly most in-home homicides take place in the bedroom (where there is often a gun handy) or in the kitchen (where there is always a knife). The basic disputes are, of course, over money and sex and often follow considerable drinking. Quite naturally, most domestic murders occur on a Saturday and in the hot summer months.

Handguns are by far the most common murder weapons, used in about 50 percent of all such cases. Adding in shotguns and rifles, guns account for perhaps 65 percent of all killings. Part of the debate over gun control is whether guns or people kill people. The fact is that the National Rifle Association notwithstanding, people with guns kill people.

It is popularly thought that murder is currently at its highest rate ever in this country. But it is not very likely. While statistics are limited, there is little doubt that murders were more frequent in the 19th century, especially when the great street gangs were springing up in the 1820s and in the period from the 1860s to the 1880s. Then murders seemed to slack off until the 1920s and 1930s, when they increased again. The first fairly reliable nationwide statistics date from 1933; the murder rate then was 14 percent higher than in 1967. Since that time murders have increased ever so slightly. The rise may be because more murders are being detected or reported to the police than an increase in violence.

Murders are much more frequent in the United States than in the nations of Western Europe or in Japan, which have more homogenous societies and are thought to be less subject to the pressures of industrial life. However, this country's murder rate is considerably lower than that of the Latin American countries, where the warmer climate is considered a contributing factor.

One of the most popular, if fruitless, pastimes of crime buffs is to try to figure out who was the greatest mass killer in American history. As mentioned earlier, John Gacy stands high on the list with 33, but no one is sure of his actual total. Some supporters of Belle Gunness, the Lady Bluebeard of La Porte, Ind., credit her with 40, but others place her total at 14 to 17. Probably the top killer of all was H. H. Holmes, the keeper of the notorious Murder Castle in Chicago during the 1890s. Estimates of his kill count range from 20 to 200; all of his victims were women. Holmes complicated matters by taking delight in misleading the police. He confessed killing women who later turned up alive and denied murdering others who had been found dead. In any event, it seems likely he dispatched somewhere between 40 and 100.

Of course, that is hardly a record if one considers John A. Murrel, who may have killed hundreds of kidnapped black slaves. He was in the business of stealing and selling slaves, but he sometimes got confused and sold slaves back to the same parties he had stolen them from. Whenever Murrel found himself in doubt about where he had gotten certain slaves from or had to dispose of those he couldn't sell quickly, he drowned them in the river.

John Billington is generally recognized as America's first murderer. At least he was the first found guilty of murdering a white man. Billington was one of the original band of 102 pilgrims on the Mayflower, a rowdy who many said would come to a bad end. He did in 1630, when he waylaid and killed a fellow settler and was duly hanged.

Murder, Incorporated syndicate's professional hit squad Murder, Inc., a gang of professional killers who carried out homicides on assignment in the 1930s, was hardly a new criminal idea. Professional killer gangs existed in the American underworld in the 19th century and murders were committed for pay, with prices generally ranging from $100 down to $5 and even $2. But the Brooklyn "troop" of killers, dubbed by the press Murder, Inc., was an elitist outfit. Not available for hire by outsiders, they were solely at the disposal of the emerging national crime syndicate formed primarily by Lucky Luciano and Meyer Lansky, an ethnic conglomerate composed of "young Turk" mafiosi and the great Jewish and, to a lesser extent, Irish gangs that blossomed in the Prohibition era. The purpose of the new syndicate, especially after Repeal, was to divide up such criminal activities as gambling, loansharking, labor racketeering, prostitution and narcotics in some sort of acceptable and orderly fashion. Of course, what was acceptable to one gang was not necessarily acceptable to others and thus there developed a need for an enforcement arm to put muscle in the national board's edicts.

Murder, Inc. killed only for business reasons and was never to be used against political figures or reporters—Meyer Lansky and Moe Dalitz, then the criminal power in Cleveland, were most insistent on this point—because of the public stir and "heat" such assassinations caused.

A whole new vocabulary was developed by the troop of killers. The assassins accepted "contracts" to "hit" "bums." Perhaps the most significant term was "bums," meaning marked victims. Psychiatrists could see in this a rationalization for the killers' crimes, one that allowed them to regard victims as subhumans deserving of dying. Thus, a Murder, Inc. killer could, as happened, go directly from a cold-blooded killing to the bedside of a dying grandparent and weep real tears over the sad event.

Operating commanders of the troop were Albert Anastasia, its so-called Lord High Executioner, and Louis Lepke, the nation's number one labor racketeer and a member of the crime cartel's national board.

However, none of the estimated 400 to 500 murders committed by the outfit was ever allowed to proceed without the concurrence, or at least the absence of any negative votes, of other top executives, especially Luciano, Lansky, Joe Adonis and Frank Costello. Bugsy Siegel probably best summarized the top gangsters' attitude toward Murder, Inc. as merely a necessary business device when he told construction executive Del Webb he had nothing to fear from the mob because "we only kill each other."

Directly below Anastasia and Lepke were a number of lieutenants, such as Louis Capone (no relation to Chicago's Al), Mendy Weiss and Abe "Kid Twist" Reles. Instructions on a specific contract generally were only given to one underling, who then passed the word on, so that no legal proof of the top men's involvement could be found. Some of the quaint killers of the mob included Vito "Chicken Head" Gurino, who sharpened his shooting skills by blasting off the heads of chickens; Frank "the Dasher" Abbando; Happy Maione, who wore a permanent scowl; Bugsy Goldstein; Blue Jaw Magoon; and, the most notorious of all, Pittsburgh Phil Strauss. Pittsburgh Phil was the troop's most prolific and resourceful killer and was named in 58 murder investigations around the country. His actual kill toll was most likely about twice that figure. The boys would hang around a certain 24-hour candy store in the Brownsville section of Brooklyn called Midnight Rose's, awaiting assignments, and then hit the trail for wherever in the country their victim happened to be. More often than not, the assigned killer had never before met the "bum," creating a difficult situation for the police. Murder by a stranger with no personal motive presents a puzzle that is seldom solved.

Probably the most famous victim of Murder, Inc. was top gang lord Dutch Schultz, himself a founding member of the crime syndicate. In 1935 Schultz had become the chief target of special prosecutor Thomas E. Dewey and responded with a demand to the national board that Dewey be hit. This was in direct defiance of the founding rules that no politicians were to be murdered. When Schultz' demand was rejected, he stormed away, vowing to handle the job himself. Immediately, a contract was voted on Schultz to prevent him from carrying out his desperate and dangerous-for-business plot.

In 1940 Murder, Inc. came apart when a number of lesser mob members were picked up on suspicion of various murders. Abe Reles got the idea that somebody would talk and implicate him, so he started singing first. He eventually gave details of some 200 killings in which he had either participated or had knowledge of. In the ensuing investigation several top killers went to the electric chair, including Pittsburgh Phil, Mendy

MURDER Stable

Weiss, Louis Capone, Happy Maione and Frank Abbando. Also executed was Lepke, the only top-level syndicate leader to suffer that fate.

In November 1941 Reles was still doing his canary act and was considered the key witness in a case against Bugsy Siegel and Albert Anastasia, but before he could testify, he “went out the window” of a Coney Island hotel, where he was being held under police protection. Whether Reles’ death was suicide, accident or murder has never been established, although in his later years Luciano insisted that he gave the orders from his prison cell to kill Reles before he doomed Siegel and Anastasia and that money was paid to certain members of the New York Police Department to make sure “the canary who could sing couldn’t fly.”

Of course, Murder, Inc. did not end with the breakup of the Brooklyn troop. The syndicate has kept right on ordering contracts and having them filled.

Murder Stable early Mafia burial site

The accidental discovery of the infamous Murder Stable in New York City in 1901 drove home to Americans that there was a “Mafia” or a “Black Hand,” or at least some kind of organized gang of Italian criminals.

In the spring of 1901 the U.S. Secret Service began investigating rumors of an anarchist plot to kill President William McKinley. Among those asked to aid in the investigation was a New York police detective named Joseph Petrosino, who would become legendary for his battles with the Mafia and with various Black Handers. Petrosino reported there was no organized conspiracy but there was much talk among anarchists of an individual possibly attempting such an assassination. McKinley was killed by such an “independent,” Leon Czolgosz, in Buffalo, N.Y. some three months later. During the course of the investigation, Petrosino and the Secret Service had stumbled onto the so-called Murder Stable, a property located in Italian Harlem at 323 East 107th Street. Digging up the premises, they found the remains of approximately 60 murder victims. The property was owned by one Ignazio Sietta, better known in Italian crime circles as Lupo the Wolf. When it became apparent the victims had been killed as part of an effort to consolidate Italian control of the waterfront, the Secret Service dropped out of the investigation. It was left to local officials to contain Lupo and the notorious Morello gang he worked with. Lupo successfully insisted he

Murieta, Joaquin (c. 1830–1853 or 1878) bandit

The greatest desperado of the early gold rush days in California may have been the Mexican-born Joaquin Murieta, or Murrieta or Muriati. There is considerable confusion about his last name and indeed even over whether such a person existed, notwithstanding the fact that his pickled head was later brought in by California Rangers.

The Murieta legend seems to be a mixture of fact and folklore. The most likely version is that Murieta was born about 1830 of Spanish parents near Alamos, Mexico and studied in the Jesuit school there. He took up arms in a revolt against the Mexican government by many of his native Sonorans as well as Mayo and Yaqui Indians. In 1848 Murieta, now married, joined thousands of Sonorans on a trek to California to escape their war-ravaged province.

Murieta apparently turned to crime after seeing the way the Americans, who had won California in the Mexican War, treated his countrymen. After supposedly being run off a number of gold claims, he vowed vengeance, organized a gang of cutthroats and outlaws and cut a swath of terror through California. In 1853 the state legislature established the California Rangers and commissioned them to bring in not one but five “Joaquins”: Joaquin Ocomorenia, Joaquin Valenzuela, Joaquin Botellier, Joaquin Carrillo and Joaquin Murieta. The Rangers, under Capt. Harry Love, set forth on their mission, inspired by the $1,000 reward posted for Murieta’s capture. Love and his men did have an encounter with Manuel “Three-Fingered Jack” Garcia and killed him and another unidentified Mexican. The more Love contemplated this second man the more he reckoned he was the notorious Joaquin. Garcia’s mutilated hand and “Joaquin’s” decapitated head were placed in jars of preserving fluid and transported to San Francisco.

Although newspapermen were skeptical of the claim, the governor was impressed and paid out the reward. After that, the head of Joaquin and the hand of Garcia went on tour around the country. Murieta’s head was on display until it was destroyed in the San Francisco earthquake of 1906.

Of course, the Mexicans of California never acknowledged that the head was that of the celebrated Joaquin. They said he escaped his pursuers and eventually settled down to a life of farming in Sonora, where he died in 1878. To the Mexicans his looting and killing of Americans were not acts of banditry but of active warfare against a foreign invader. In the barrios of California, Murieta is still referred to as el Patrio, or the Patriot, perhaps on the assumption that if he had not existed, he should have.

Murphy, J. Reginald (1935–) kidnap victim

J. Reginald Murphy, editor of the Atlanta Constitution, was kidnapped on February 20, 1974, ostensibly by members of a right-wing group called the American Revolutionary Army, and held for $700,000 ransom. Murphy was abducted by a man calling himself Lamont Woods, who had contacted the newspaper with a request for help in anonymously distributing $300,000 worth of fuel oil to the needy. Murphy met with Woods to sign papers for the fuel distribution. As they drove outside Atlanta, Woods pulled a gun and told the editor: “We’re going to straighten out this damn country. We’re going to stop these lying, leftist, liberal news media.” Despite talk about an American Revolutionary Army with 223 members and chapters in the Southeast and Northeast, Woods appeared to be acting alone as he held Murphy captive for three days until the newspaper paid the $700,000 ransom.

Murphy was released on February 23 and six hours later William A. H. Williams, a building contractor in Lilburn, Ga., was arrested in his home, where the authorities found suitcases containing the ransom money. Williams turned out to be the fanciful Lamont Woods. He had been linked to the kidnapping even before Murphy’s release because of a tip the FBI received from a man to whom Williams had tried to sell $300,000 worth of nonexistent fuel oil the previous December. Williams was sentenced to 40 years imprisonment.

Murphy, Jim (1861–1879) outlaw and informer

Just as Missourians built a legend around Jesse James, Texans made a folk hero of Sam Bass, their renowned train robber of the 1870s. Similarly, Texans had their own Bob Ford (“the dirty little coward that shot Mr. Howard and laid Jesse James in his grave”) in the person of Jim Murphy, who betrayed Bass. As one Texas Ranger put it, Murphy was a “veritable Judas in every sense of the word.”

One of two sons of Henderson Murphy, a Denton county rancher, Murphy was close to the Bass gang of outlaws, so close that on six different occasions he made overtures to the law to turn in Bass for various considerations. Meanwhile, the Murphy family harbored the gang from time to time, and on May 1, 1878 father and sons were arrested because of this and charged with being accessories after the fact in Bass’ robbing of the U.S. mails. Murphy won his release from Ranger Capt. Lee Hall by agreeing to turn Bass in.

Murphy had no trouble throwing in with Bass and took part in planning a robbery of a bank in Round

MURPHY game

Rock, Tex. On the way to Round Rock, Murphy slipped away long enough to wire the Rangers about the gang's plans. The gang was ambushed, and although he escaped for a time, Bass was mortally wounded. The following day, July 20, 1878, Bass was found in a woodland and brought back to Round Rock, where he died the next morning. Before he died, Bass was questioned about his accomplices but refused to betray them, saying: "It is agin my profession to blow on my pals. If a man knows anything, he ought to die with it in him."

The contrast between Bass' dying words and Jim Murphy's actions made the latter as unpopular as Bob Ford was to become. Even Ranger Hall labeled him a traitor. Murphy was to outlive Sam Bass by less than a year. He returned to Denton County and his family was released from jail, but he found hatred wherever he went. Often, he was so overcome with fear that he asked to sleep in the local jail for his own protection. He died in June 1879 after swallowing some very poisonous eye lotion. Considering that his death was most painful and slow, it seemed likely that taking the lotion was not Murphy's idea. A few years later, a ballad writer produced an epitaph for Murphy:

*And so he sold out Sam and Barnes and left their friends to mourn,
Oh, what a scorching Jim will get when Gabriel blows his horn!
Perhaps he's got to heaven, there's none of us can say;
But if I'm right in my surmise, he's gone the other way.*

Murphy game confidence swindle

Originally conceived during the 19th century as a sex swindle, the Murphy game has changed with the times. It was apparently named after an engaging rogue named Murphy who had the face of a pimp a man could trust. In the swindle the con artist would describe the delightful and talented young lady he had in store for the lascivious pigeon. Then the "pimp" would convince the pigeon to leave the money for the whore with him so that the woman would not be liable to a bust for accepting money in exchange for services rendered. The pigeon would be sent up the stairs of a building to a nonexistent apartment, and by the time he returned to the street, either puzzled or enraged, the Murphy man had disappeared.

Today, the original Murphy game is fast dying out but a substitute sex object has been found in the form of what is often called the "$75 Sony Trinitron." A pair of hustlers will start patronizing a bar, actually several in different parts of town, and one will make a big show of delivering to the other an expensive radio or other electronic item for something like a dime on the dollar. Then the boys will let slip that the seller has a contact at a wholesaler's warehouse and can get almost anything. But right now he has a big deal cooking. The inside man at the warehouse has found a way to cover up the disappearance of 10 Sony Trinitrons in perfect condition. The only thing is that he has to move them all at once. Naturally, all the barflies are interested when they hear the price for the $600 sets is only $75 apiece, or $750 for all 10.

Naturally, the deal falls in place and the suckers are taken to the warehouse in a rented van. The con artist collects all the money and disappears into the warehouse to make the payoff and have the sets brought out on the loading platform. The suckers in the van wait and wait and wait. What else can they do? Go into the warehouse and ask, "Where's that crooked employee of yours who's going to heist ten Trinitrons for us?" Meanwhile, the con artist has long since disappeared via another exit.

Murrel, John A. (1794-?) mass murderer

Murrel has often been described as the most extraordinary criminal America has ever produced. Certainly, as a wholesale murderer, not even H. H. Holmes or Murder, Inc.'s Pittsburgh Phil was a match for him, even taking into account their highest estimated kill totals. Murrel may have killed over 500 victims.

With his brother, Murrel owned a very profitable plantation in Tennessee, which he used as a cover for his activities. Murrel found he could make it more profitable by stealing slaves, whom he would then resell. If he couldn't make a fast sale on a slave or if he had stolen the same slave so often that another sale might be dangerous, he would have the slave murdered. Murrel became known as a rich, if eccentric, visitor to the gambling dens and bordellos of New Orleans. Actually, he would be on scouting missions looking for money-laden travelers who would be leaving the city along the Natchez Trace. When they left, Murrel left and only Murrel would be seen again. His technique for getting rid of a victim was to disembowel him, fill his stomach cavity with sand and stones and sink his body in a creek or river.

But even Murrel's estimated 500 killings was minor compared to what he had in mind. He concocted an incredible scheme, probably the most grandiose ever developed by a criminal mind. It called for fomenting a slave rebellion; while the authorities would be battling to quell it, Murrel and 500 underworld confederates would sack New Orleans, Nashville, Memphis, Natchez and a number of other cities. He actually planned to establish an underworld empire in the captured cities and become the supreme ruler, with New Orleans as the capital. The trouble with the scheme was that it involved too many people and too many mouths. The slaves had to be drilled for their uprising and some were overheard discussing the plot. Various criminals were also overheard discussing their part in the bizarre operation. Then a man named Virgil Stewart, whom Murrel thought he had convinced to join his "army," defected and talked to authorities. Following Stewart's disclosures, Murrel was taken into custody. By this time it was too late to stop the uprising, which was scheduled for July 4, 1835, but without Murrel's leadership the campaign foundered. Authorities easily contained outbreaks in the criminal districts of Nashville, Memphis and Natchez. In Tennessee about 20 slaves and 10 white men were hanged for their part in the conspiracy.

After the grandiose plan collapsed, Murrel sulked in prison under a 10-year sentence. He served his term, but by the time of his release, he had degenerated to the level of an imbecile. When last seen, he was a derelict in the Gut, the red-light district of Memphis.

Musgrove, Lee H. (?–1868) outlaw leader

The Musgrove gang of road agents and livestock thieves plundered the Colorado Territory in 1867–68. The group was noted for a barbarity that was even more pronounced in their leader, Lee Musgrove, a native Mississippian who had cut a wide trail of violence when he came west in the 1850s.

Settling first in the Napa Valley of California, Musgrove developed a reputation as a mean man with a gun. He was suspected of a number of robbery-murders, but it was a killing in 1863 over "a matter of honor"—a man who did not share Musgrove's rabid Confederate sympathies—that forced him on the run. Musgrove moved on to Nevada but had to flee again after two more killings. Musgrove then operated as an Indian trader and alleged dealer in stolen goods in the Idaho Territory. When he notched another victim, he headed for the Wyoming Territory, where he organized a gang of cutthroats whose holdups and stolen beef and horse flesh operations ranged from Kansas to Texas. At least a dozen killings were attributed to the gang, but their days were numbered when a Colorado lawman named Dave Cook started tracking them. Cook chipped away at the outfit, dispatching permanently or arresting them one after the other.

Cook followed Musgrove to the Wyoming Territory and finally nailed him in the midst of preparations for a job. After Musgrove was tucked away back in Denver, Cook learned that the outlaw chief's top sidekick, Ed Franklin, had escaped from Fort Sanders, Wyoming Territory, where he was being held after attempting to make off with a herd of army mules.

Cook figured rightly that Franklin would head for Denver to try to free his boss and intercepted him in the nearby mining camp of Golden. Lying in his hotel bed wearing only his long johns and gun belt, Franklin was just able to jump off the bed before Cook sent a bullet through his heart.

Franklin's failure to free Musgrove was to prove fatal to the latter. A mob of heavy drinkers got to thinking that other members of Musgrove's gang surely would try the same things. Under the circumstances, the logical thing to do was to string up the outlaw leader before such a tragedy could befall the town, and on November 23, 1868 Musgrove was duly dispatched without benefit of a court conviction. Cynics were to observe that some cattle interests had fired up the mob because they believed such drastic action was the best answer to livestock thievery. Other suspicious souls were to point out that Dave Cook himself had an amazingly consistent record of losing his prisoners to lynch mobs.

Musica, Philip (1877–1938) swindler

As a 20th century swindler, Philip Musica in many ways surpassed the great Charles Ponzi. He stole more money, and while Ponzi lasted only a matter of months, Musica lasted years. In his prime he was a pillar of society, a patron of the arts, a bosom friend of the great tenor Enrico Caruso and a charming, cultured gentleman. On Wall Street he was known as a financial genius, in the midst of the Morgans, Astors and Rockefellers. Not at all bad for a man who had previously been, among other things, an ex-convict, stool pigeon, swindler, forger, rumrunner, smuggler, bootlegger, gunrunner, hijacker and briber. With a record like that, it might seem odd that Musica was able to make Who's Who in America, but then again, that illustrious publication is better known for judging people for what they appear to be rather than what they are.

Musica had qualified for Who's Who under one of his other identities (he used several during a long criminal career).

It was his final and greatest identity, that of F. Donald Coster, about whom the book of the nation's notables declared:

COSTER, Frank Donald, corp'n. official; b. Washington, D.C., May 12, 1884; s. Frank Donald and Marie (Girard) C.; Ph.D., U. of Heidelberg, 1909, M.D., 1911; m. In 1883 six-year-old Philip Musica came to America from Italy with his parents, and by the time he was in his early twenties, he had become the most Americanized of all the children as well as the active head of the family. He kept telling Papa Antonio that things were different here than in the old country and that there were different standards of ethics. Quickly, he involved his father and a number of brothers and sisters in dishonest schemes, starting off with an imported cheese business made all the more lucrative by bribing customhouse weighers. Soon, the Musicas could afford a mansion in the fashionable Bay Ridge section of Brooklyn, complete with landscaped grounds, horses, stables and a carriage house. In 1909, however, the roof fell in on Musica's financial empire. Several customhouse weighers confessed to taking bribes and young Musica was sentenced to a year in prison. He served only a few months, however, before winning a presidential pardon, apparently because he came across as somewhat gallant, shielding his father from a jail term by accepting all the blame himself.

Once freed, Musica moved immediately into a new line of business, that of importing human hair from Italy to supply the needs of American females. By 1913 he had established a thriving business and was once more a leader in Italian-American social and financial circles. Then the William J. Burns Detective Agency dug up evidence that Musica had swindled 22 banks out of $1 million by taking loans on hair shipments based on phony invoices. When the cases of supposedly long hair were opened, they were found to contain tissue paper and short hair, worth no more than $1 a box and known as trash in the field.

The entire Musica family was captured in New Orleans shortly after boarding a liner for Honduras. One of Musica's sisters tried to throw overboard $18,000 she had stashed in her girdle. Musica had $80,000 in cash and $250,000 in other money instruments on him. Again, he accepted full blame for the swindle. He was lodged in the Tombs Prisons in New York City because he promised to make full restitution and said that from there he could better help authorities round up his assets. While in prison, Musica endeared himself to a succession of prosecutors by becoming a professional stool pigeon who spied on other prisoners. It paid off. In 1918 these grateful officials got him a suspended sentence for the hair fraud.

That was the last seen of Philip Musica until he emerged from his final cover, F. Donald Coster, in 1938. Musica became "William Johnson," an "investigator" for the district attorney's office, a career that was cut short when he was indicted for perjury in a murder trial in which he had testified against two men. William Johnson promptly disappeared.

He was replaced by "Frank Costa," a copartner in a firm called the Adelphi Pharmaceutical Manufacturing Co., which was entitled to 5,000 gallons of alcohol a month during Prohibition for production of its hair tonics and the like. The innovative Mr. Costa so scented and colored Adelphi's products that running them through a simple still would return them to high-proof straight alcohol. Cut with water and spiked with the proper coloring and flavoring and presto—"great stuff right off the boat." Eventually, Adelphi's real business was discovered by revenue agents and one of the owners was caught, but not Costa, who disappeared.

Musica reemerged as F. Donald Coster, president of Girard and Co., and obtained a new alcohol license. By this time Papa Musica was dead and Philip was the acknowledged leader of the family. Because he was still being hunted on the perjury charge, Philip severed all ties with his Musica past. Girard was the new family name he gave to Mama Musica and her daughters—save for one, who, in Philip's words, "disgraced our whole family by running off and marrying a gardener." Girard and Co. also gained three new officials, "George Vernard," "George Dietrich" and "Robert Dietrich"—really Musica's three brothers, Arthur, George and Robert.

By 1925 F. Donald Coster had become a man of high society, more than 13 years after Philip Musica had cavorted about so flashily. Of course, "Doctor Coster" was nothing like Philip Musica. He was starting to gray on top and in his trim mustache, and he was American-born and a Methodist now, not Italian and a Catholic.

In 1926 he moved to the pinnacle of the Wall Street heap by buying the 93-year-old drug firm of McKesson and Robbins. He did so after obtaining a loan against Girard and Co., an easy matter since its books, thanks to bootlegging activities, were in excellent shape. Once in control of McKesson and Robbins, Coster swung a stock flotation and money flowed in. A large portion of this new money was used to establish a Canadian "crude drug" department. It was Coster's master swindle. George Vernard became fiscal agent and representative in charge of the department, which proved to be the world's easiest job. The Canadian crude drug department consisted of large inventories of drugs in half-a-dozen warehouses. But there were no drugs and no warehouses in Canada. There was just George Vernard—and he wasn't even Vernard. Unwittingly, through its new owner the reputable McKesson and Robbins “bought” drugs from phantom companies and shelled out hard cash, which wound up in the pockets of F. Donald Coster. Receipts, inventories, invoices, bills of lading and the like from the crude drug department carried the names of Coster, Vernard and Dietrich, and no questions were asked.

The Depression of 1929 hit McKesson and Robbins as hard as most companies but the firm continued to look robust because of its inventories of crude drugs, which rose in value by several million dollars. Coster became known as the wizard of the drug field. “No one can match Coster when it comes to crude drugs,” honest directors of McKesson told one another.

Up in Fairfield, Conn., Coster relaxed in the splendor of his 16-room mansion and aboard his 135-foot oceangoing yacht. He contributed lavishly to charity and even established a free heart clinic in Bridgeport, Conn. out of his own money. Why not, there was plenty more where that had come from. But beneath the facade of luxurious tranquility, Coster was troubled. Business was crashing downward and more and more he had to cover up his lootings with forgeries. By 1935 he was paying $25,000 a year in blackmail money to those who knew him as Philip Musica and Frank Costa. Then there were reports that he used McKesson facilities to smuggle guns and munitions to Franco Spain. Franco received rifles packed in cases labeled, “Milk of Magnesia.” However, there were indications that Coster was rather impartial. He appeared to be selling to the Loyalists as well, although there were also reports that the Franco forces were informed—for a price—where the Loyalists' shipments were going so that they could seize them, allowing Coster to collect twice.

Coster's undoing came from two quarters. First, he took to adulterating his own drug products, and in September 1938, agents of the Pure Food and Drug Administration seized some of the firm's adulterated quinine in New Jersey and New York. Meanwhile, the business recession of 1937 had battered the firm and Julian F. Thompson, a Wall Street figure whom Coster had hired as the window-dressing treasurer (George Dietrich was assistant treasurer and handled all illegal matters), demanded that Coster reduce the crude drug inventories to give the company more cash assets. Coster stalled. He couldn't produce something out of nothing. After a year of stalling, Thompson launched a quiet investigation of his own and found that an alleged $21 million worth of inventories carried no insurance.

Checking further, he discovered they weren't insured because they didn't exist.

Thompson took his findings to the New York Stock Exchange and early in December 1938 all trading in the firm's stock was halted. Each of McKesson's 82 vice presidents shuddered, but none more than George Vernard and George and Robert Dietrich. The master swindler remained calm as story after story about him hit the newspapers. Inevitably, tips about Coster came in and authorities took a deep interest in his past. On December 14 Coster was fingerprinted in his home. “This is a pesty business,” he grumbled.

Within 24 hours newspapers revealed the life story of Philip Musica, a long-vanished swindler and perjurer. On December 16 government agents arrived at his house to place him under arrest, but he had shot himself to death in the bathroom.

Musica left two notes, one to his wife pleading for her forgiveness and the other, eight pages long, trying to rationalize his underhanded dealings.

McKesson, he insisted, would have gone into receivership in 1930 and 1932 had he not bolstered its paper profits. He asserted all the alleged “lost” millions were merely fictional “profits to save the company . . . what is missing is the alleged profits plus expenses and blackmail money paid to maintain it. . . .”

“As God is my judge,” he concluded, “I am the victim of Wall Street plunder and blackmail in a struggle for honest existence. Merciful God bring the truth to light! F. D. Coster.”

For their part in the swindle, Musica's three brothers got off with mere three-year sentences, possibly because not all of Coster's claims were hogwash. True, he had indeed siphoned off $8 million or $10 million for his own use, but the rest of the “loot” probably never existed, being mere figure juggling to keep up the firm's profit margins. The conventional wisdom on Wall Street was that without Coster's shady dealings McKesson and Robbins would have been forced into bankruptcy years earlier and the stockholders wiped out. Instead, the firm weathered the storm and the stockholders had been both robbed and saved.

Mussolini Shuttle deportation of mafiosi

As a result of Benito Mussolini's war on the Sicilian Mafia and other gangsters in the 1920s, perhaps hundreds of young mafiosi were forced to scurry to the safety of the United States, where they provided fresh blood for the criminal legions of the “Mustache Petes,” who had begun emigrating to America around the 1890s. Journalists named this mass deportation effort the Mussolini Shuttle.

MUSTACHE Petes

Mussolini's campaign against gangsters cost him heavily in support from Americans of Italian descent, who saw the new criminal migrations as fostering more crime in their communities and stirring fresh anti-Italian feelings among the general populace.

Mustache Petes old-line mafiosi

The early leaders of the Mafia in America were called "Mustache Petes" by younger Italian gangsters, a term coined to deride their elders' inability to adapt to the new society and their insistence on extraction of "respect" from those beneath them. These old-line criminal leaders were eliminated by the rising young gangsters of the 1920s and 1930s, Lucky Luciano, Frank Costello, Joe Adonis, Vito Genovese, Albert Anastasia, Tommy Lucchese and others.

There can be little doubt that their forceful elimination was a sign of progress for the Italian underworld. The younger gangsters felt the Mustache Petes had to go for Italians to become powerful and perhaps even to dominate crime in America, a situation eventually accomplished when the national crime syndicate was formed in the 1930s. What especially upset these younger criminals was that the older mafiosi insisted on exploiting only their Italian compatriots and distrusted other ethnic criminals as well as politicians. The Luciano types understood the need to work with Jewish gangsters, such as Meyer Lansky and Bugsy Siegel, the heads of New York's Bug and Meyer Gang, and such other non-Italian groups as Cleveland's Mayfield Road Gang and Detroit's Purple Gang. The old Morello-Lupo the Wolf-Joe the Boss Masseria-Salvatore Maranzano approach of bleeding the Italian communities was by nature limited since the Italians as a whole were the poorer "outs" of American society.

As these old-time leaders fell or were pushed from power and were succeeded by the "new-breed" Italian leaders, a more-Americanized and a more lucrative Mafia emerged.

Mutilation was certainly never used to punish criminals in the United States to the extent it was used in Europe. However, the practice was not totally uncommon, especially in New England and the South. For contempt of court or perjury, the punishment in both areas could be losing part of an ear or having one's tongue pierced with a hot iron. In colonial Virginia one convicted of slander might have his or her tongue bored through with an awl, while the possible punishments for criticizing the colonial authorities included losing both ears or, for lesser offenders, having one's ears nailed to a pillory. A runaway slave often received the latter punishment, which produced enormous pain but allowed the slave owner's property to remain pretty much intact. Castration was a penalty reserved for a slave found guilty of attempting to rape a white woman.

The frontier West used mutilations in a more practical sense, often coupling such punishments with expulsion from the area in cases where the death penalty was judged too harsh. Many Three-Fingered Jacks got that way as a result of the actions of vigilante tribunals. A Nevada miners court once needed to protect the community from a miner who would start shooting indiscriminately when drunk. Because the offender was otherwise rather popular, hanging was deemed inappropriate; instead, the trigger finger on each of his hands was cut off. He was thereafter referred to as Eight-Fingered Bill.

Branding the face was practiced legally as late as 1844, although ranchers continued to use it long after as an extralegal punishment for rustlers, considering it a "humane" alternative to lynching. A rancher's brand on a thief's face identified him as a cattle rustler and warned him to stay away from that range or face the rope the next time.

Nash, Frank “Jelly” (1884–1933) gangster and Kansas City Massacre victim

Frank “Jelly” Nash was one of the most-accomplished robbers and murderers of the early 20th century and had a remarkable ability to gain his freedom from prison one way or another. In his hometown of Hobart, Okla. people thought Nash would have a brilliant future if he could conquer a violent temper. As it was, he could not. Implicated in a murder in 1913, Nash was put on trial but acquitted. He then murdered a witness who had testified against him in the trial, and for that, he was sentenced to life imprisonment. Early in 1918 his sentence was commuted to 10 years and in July he was granted a full pardon. Within a short time, Nash robbed the Corn State Bank in Corn, Okla. He was apprehended and sentenced to 25 years at McAlester Penitentiary. Remarkably, the former lifer got another reduction in sentence. On December 29, 1922 the governor signed an order commuting Nash’s 25-year sentence to a mere five years, and the next day he was freed.

Over the next eight months Nash is believed to have committed a number of murders and robberies. On August 20, 1923 he took part in the holdup of a mail train in Osage County, Okla., during which he brutally assaulted a mail custodian. On March 3, 1924 Nash was sent to the federal penitentiary at Leavenworth; back in Hobart there was general agreement that Nash would receive no political clemency at the federal level. Nash did not, but he did enjoy some unusual privileges despite his past record. He became a model prisoner and was made a trustee. After being given an outside assignment in October 1930, he simply walked away from the prison.

Exactly what Nash did after his escape is not clear. He is known to have spent considerable time in Chicago and to have become involved in the affairs of the Capone mob. There is some evidence that he also got involved in Kansas City rackets, sometimes with elements tied to the Pendergast machine and sometimes with those operating without political support.

Nash was almost bald, with only a fringe of hair around his head, and had very distinctive features: prominent ears, a pointed chin and a large, hooked nose. He attempted to alter his appearance by getting a nose job, which bobbed off a bit of the hook. He grew a bushy mustache, wore glasses and put on a toupee. He also got married, unconcerned that there already was a Mrs. Nash. He and his young bride moved to Hot Springs, Ark., then considered to be the country’s safest haven for criminals. Nash, apparently under police protection, seemed to be working various rackets and would occasionally venture out of town for a robbery.

On June 16, 1933 two FBI agents and the police chief of McAlester, Okla., Otto Reed, captured Nash in Hot Springs and spirited him out of town, realizing that if he was turned over to local authorities he would probably “escape” immediately. The gangster was escorted to Kansas City, where a very special welcome awaited him, the infamous Kansas City Massacre. As several officers and Nash climbed into an automobile at Union Station, a large man carrying a machine gun ordered them to “get ’em up!” Two other gunmen appeared and suddenly the three opened up, spraying the car thoroughly. Nash died screaming, "For God's sake, don't shoot me!"

Also killed were four lawmen, and two others were wounded. One FBI agent survived by playing dead. It has been debated for years whether the shooting was an attempt to free Nash or to kill him because of information he could give the government. The identity of the murderers remains in dispute as well.

Natchez-under-the-Hill Mississippi vice center

One of the most crime-ridden river ports of 19th century America, Natchez-under-the-Hill was separated from the tamer part of the city, which was located on a high bluff. Because of this separation, the under-the-hill district was not subject to the same type of reform movements that had swept the better part of town in previous years. Simply stated, there was "no reason for decent folks to go down to that hell." Providing the coarse rivermen with whatever they wanted and could pay for, lower Natchez shocked the few decent visitors who ventured into it. One John Bradbury said in 1810, "For the size of it there is not perhaps in the world a more profligate place." Another described it as "the safest place in America to kill another human being with no threat of retribution." Gamblers and prostitutes always did a thriving business, with as many as 150 flatboats and keelboats tying up there on an average day in 1808. Baby girls were said to have been born in certain whorehouses and grown up there to become working prostitutes by the age of 12. Some of these unfortunate girls reportedly never even saw upper Natchez, knowing no more of the world than the rough rivermen who stormed ashore each day.

Among the most famous citizens of Natchez-under-the-Hill were a tavern owner named Jim Girty and his paramour, Marie Dufour, the leading madam of the town. Girty was regarded by rivermen as unkillable, having survived a number of gun and knife fights. Legend had it that Girty's chest was not ribbed but solid bone that deflected pistol ball or blade. Marie Dufour was also known for her prowess in battle. She invariably won wrestling contests with rivermen, the loser taking a traditional dunking in the Mississippi. Despite her ruggedness, Marie was also known for her womanly charms and ran the high-class house of prostitution in Natchez. The couple came to a tragic end when Girty proved not completely unkillable, being shot down from ambush after a gambling dispute. Marie Dufour rushed to his side and, finding him dead, committed suicide by shooting herself in the mouth.

In 1835 vigilantes tried to clean up lower Natchez, driving off and killing a number of gamblers, while many of the prostitutes escaped with the rivermen aboard their flatboats. However, immediately after each raid the gamblers and the harlots set up business again. Such occasional forays by the outraged citizens were not likely to drive out criminal elements when vice could make its organizers rich in just a year or two. Some prostitutes who knew how to save money soon had enough to buy themselves a flatboat and sail down to New Orleans in comfort, where they would set up a floating bordello and, perhaps in due course, open a lavish house in the French Quarter.

Natchez-under-the-Hill continued in its violent ways until the Civil War, but the decline of the steamboat cut off its lifeblood, and it gradually became just another prosaic and dreary river port with no more than legends to remind visitors of its tawdry past.

Nathan, Benjamin (1813–1870) murder victim

The murder in 1870 of philanthropist Benjamin Nathan, described inaccurately as "the richest man in New York," remains to this day a tantalizing unsolved crime.

At 6 A.M. on July 28, 1870, Washington Nathan went downstairs in the family mansion at 12 West 23rd Street for a drink of water to soothe his regular hang-over. He passed his father's bedroom, looked in and received, presumably, a shock. Benjamin Nathan lay dead on the floor, his features and clothing covered with blood and gore. He had been repeatedly struck on the head with an 18-inch carpenter's "dog." A safe in the room had been opened and there were signs of a struggle. There were also indications that the killer, rather than hurrying from the place after the crime, had leisurely washed up in a basin on the dresser. The murderer had not been very neat, leaving a bloody handprint on the wall.

While within 24 hours rewards totaling $47,000 were offered, the case was never solved. Police suspicion centered on dissolute Washington Nathan, who was known to have had terrific rows with his father over his lavish spending, but a case against him could never be proved. Washington was provided with an alibi for part of the time when the murder may have been committed by a "lass of the pavements," as the papers called her.

In 1879 Washington Nathan, still keeping up his dissolute ways, was paying court to an actress named Alice Harrison when a former inamorata named Fanny Barrett, who had followed him, whipped out a revolver and shot him in the neck. When it appeared that Washington would require an operation to remove the bullet,

Chief of Police George W. Walling worked out a plan to have him questioned after the operation as he was coming out of the anaesthetic in the hope he would say something about his father's murder. But the bullet came out by itself, thwarting that strategy.

A much better technique became apparent too late, some three decades after the murder, when incredulous New York police were prevailed upon by Scotland Yard to take the thumb smudge of a man arrested for a New York hotel theft and send it to London. There, it was matched up to a print found on a jewel case in a robbery. Some New York police historian then remembered the bloodstained prints of all five fingers on one hand of Nathan's murderer had been left on the wall, but the fingerprinting detection method had not yet been developed.

Nation, Carry A. (1846–1911) saloon smasher

Carry Nation's saloon-smashing crusade was inspired by the Brahma Bull and Red Hot Bar in Richmond, Tex., where her second husband, David Nation, was badly beaten by hard-drinking patrons. This caused such revulsion in 53-year-old Carry that she went on her famous bar-smashing campaign in Kansas, where the couple had moved after the ugly event. She had had an earlier tragic experience with demon rum when her first husband had died of alcoholism within two years of their marriage.

On June 5, 1900 Carry wrapped a number of stones and bricks in old newspapers and drove her horse and buggy 20 miles to Kiowa, Kan. She entered one saloon and announced, "Men, I have come to save you from a drunkard's fate!" She thereupon set out to smash every bottle in the place and finished up by destroying the bar's mirror and front glass window. She went through Kiowa like a tornado, destroying six saloons. Amazingly, no one thought of having her arrested, apparently because Kansas was, in law if not in fact, a dry state. Carry then moved on to Wichita, where, among others, she wrecked the elegant bar located in the basement of the Hotel Carey. "Glory to God," she announced to stunned onlookers, as she went about her work. When she finished, she said, "Peace on earth, good will to men." This time, Carry was arrested. She promptly drew a large number of supporters, who pointed out that the saloons she had smashed were all illegal. She was thereupon released.

Carry Nation spread her wrath throughout Kansas and then beyond the state's borders. When she arrived in a town, many saloon keepers immediately closed down. One did try to stop her at gunpoint, but she swung a hatchet at his head and the man dropped his weapon and ran. Carry was arrested more than 30 times but paid her fines with a shrug, financing their cost by selling souvenir hatchets bearing her name.

Now famous, Carry launched a new career as a public speaker (she climaxed her speeches by leading members of the audience on a saloon-busting expedition) and began publishing a weekly newspaper called The Hatchet. She became a leader of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, whose militant marching song was "A Saloonless Nation in 1920." Carry's most famous raid was in Washington, D.C., where she wreaked havoc in the Union Station bar with her three trusty hatchets, dubbed Faith, Hope and Charity.

Worn out from a decade of intense activity, Carry Nation collapsed while making a speech in Eureka Springs, Ark. and died in a hospital in Leavenworth, Kan. on June 9, 1911. While others could claim greater credit for bringing about Prohibition in 1919, Carry Nation had established the militant tone of the campaign.

Neagle, David (1847–1926) saloon keeper and lawman

Although little more than the typical gunman-lawman of the West, David Neagle became famous for a landmark U.S. Supreme Court decision, In re Neagle, which has been described as "the most relevant utterance of the court on the extent of executive authority under the Constitution."

Boston-born Neagle grew up in the San Francisco Bay area. He dropped out of school in 1860, when he was 13, and headed for mining camp country. While a teenager he became proficient with a six-shooter and pursued a checkered career as a gunman, miner, gambler, saloon keeper and lawman. In 1880 Neagle served as a deputy sheriff in Tombstone, Arizona Territory during the period of the Earp-Clanton feud. Although his boss, Sheriff John Behan, clearly sided with the Clantons, Neagle managed to hold to a neutral line. After the Earps were forced to leave Tombstone, Neagle became city marshal. Beaten in a race for sheriff late in 1882, he moved on to other boom towns.

Neagle later became a lawman in San Francisco and, in 1888, got involved in the famous Hill-Sharon-Terry-Fields case, one of California's wildest legal battles. Originally, the dispute centered on whether or not Sarah Althea Hill was married to William Sharon, a millionaire and senator from Nevada. The dispute continued even after Sharon's death and Sarah's marriage to flamboyant David Terry, one of her attorneys and a former, controversial member of the California Supreme Court. When a court decision went against Mrs. Terry, a melee broke out in court, and as Sarah was being ejected into the hallway, David Terry drew a knife to come to her aid. Among those disarming Terry was David Neagle. The case had been tried by an old political rival of Terry, Stephen J. Field, an associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court.

Terry subsequently made several threats against Field's life, and when Field returned to California the next year, Deputy Marshal Neagle was given the job of protecting him. On August 14, 1889 Terry confronted Field at the Lathrop railroad station. In the ensuing argument Terry threatened the jurist and Neagle shot and killed Terry. Neagle was charged with murder but was freed after a habeas corpus hearing. Afterward, Field presented Neagle with a gold watch for having killed Terry.

California appealed the freeing of Neagle and the case went all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court with the state insisting that its homicide laws gave it jurisdiction over the case. The opposing claim was that under a broad interpretation of the law, Neagle had not acted improperly in killing Terry, since he was a deputy marshal, despite the fact that no federal statute authorized marshals to protect judges. The High Court's decision upholding Neagle's freedom greatly enhanced the authority of the executive branch by declaring that the word "law" could be interpreted to mean "any obligation fairly and properly inferable" from the Constitution.

Neagle remained a lawman in the area for another decade and then faded into obscurity, but the legal decision named after him heralded, under Theodore Roosevelt, the development of the strong presidency.

Nelson, Earle Leonard (1892–1928) mass murderer

For almost a year and a half, Earle Leonard Nelson terrorized the nation with a series of vicious rape-murders. His official murder toll between February 1926 and June 1927 stands, by most counts, at 20.

Born in 1892 in Philadelphia, Nelson was orphaned at an early age and raised by an aunt. He suffered a head injury in a childhood accident that would cause him intense pain from time to time. As a teenager, he exhibited a streak of meanness and violence usually directed at children or women. At other times, he became a Bible fanatic, spending hours either reading the Bible alone in his room or loudly lecturing others with long quotations from it. His aunt would point to his devout character whenever one of his more antisocial peccadilloes got him in trouble with the law.

Nonetheless, in 1918 he was placed in a home for mental defectives after raping a young Philadelphia girl. Nelson promptly escaped but was soon caught and placed on a state prison farm. He escaped from there but was captured again and this time was sent to the state penitentiary, from which he quickly escaped yet again.

That was the last time the law would have him in its hands for nine years. In 1919, under the alias of Roger Wilson, he married a young schoolteacher. Life for Mrs. Wilson was a horror; Nelson lectured her constantly from the Bible and accused her of consorting with other men. She finally had to be hospitalized because of a nervous breakdown. Nelson visited her in the hospital and had to be ejected from the building when he was caught trying to rape her in her bed. Thereafter nothing was heard from or of him for seven years. Considering his prior record and his bloody record afterward, if he was entirely law-abiding during that time, it would have been one of the greatest self-rehabilitative efforts in the annals of crime.

On February 20, 1926 Nelson entered a San Francisco rooming house in search of lodgings. As the landlady, Mrs. Clara Newman, ushered him up the stairs to the third floor, a murderous urge overcame Nelson. He strangled the woman with her own pearl necklace before they even entered a room. Then he dragged her body into an empty room, raped the dead woman and left. Over the next few months Nelson strangled, killed and raped three other landladies in the San Francisco-Oakland area. By now the police had a description of the killer as a short, blue-eyed, dark-complexioned man. But they didn't catch him.

Nelson moved on to Portland, Ore., where in two days he killed two more landladies. A few weeks later, he killed another landlady. Then he went back to San Francisco for his next murder, after which he returned to Portland and killed again. Nelson moved toward the East Coast, killing more women all the way to Philadelphia. By June 1927 authorities all over the country were hunting for the man who had definitely murdered 20 landladies and was strongly suspected of having killed two others.

Feeling the pressure of the police hunt, Nelson fled into Canada and took lodging in a rooming house in Winnipeg. His landlady remembered him as a very devout gentleman who always carried a Bible. Nelson did not kill his landlady, realizing that would only open up his trail again, but the blood urge in him could not be stilled. Within a few days of his arrival in Winnipeg, the city was rocked by two murders. One was of a teenaged girl living in the same house as Nelson. In another section of town, the raped and strangled body of Mrs. Emily Paterson was found by her husband.

Nelson had killed them both, but this time he left a trail that could be followed. He had stolen a number of items from the Paterson home and left some of them at a second-hand clothing dealer where he purchased a change of clothes. A description of the killer led to his capture within four miles of the border, which he was preparing to recross to evade pursuit.

Although the vast majority of Nelson's crimes were committed in the United States, he was tried, sentenced to death and, on January 13, 1928, hanged in Canada. On the gallows the man whose aunt had predicted he would grow up to become a minister turned biblical one final time. "I am innocent," he said. "I stand innocent before God and man. I forgive those who have wronged me and ask forgiveness of those I have injured. God have mercy!"

Nelson, George "Baby Face" (1908–1934) public enemy

None of the "public enemies" of the 1930s more thoroughly deserved the description "mad dog" than did George "Baby Face" Nelson. All the gangsters of the 1930s, Dillinger, the Barkers, Pretty Boy Floyd and others, killed to escape capture, but Nelson was addicted to violence, much as were Bonnie and Clyde. Even the latter were a bit more restrained, frequently turning from murderous to maudlin because of a potential victim's white hair. Nelson was vulnerable to no such sentimentalism, as demonstrated by his approach to bank robbery, which was to come through the door shooting and then simply force the lucky survivors to hand over the loot. Once when Dillinger henchman Homer Van Meter, a believer in a slightly more thoughtful approach, laughed sarcastically at Nelson's ideas on a robbery, only the quick intervention of John Dillinger prevented Baby Face from punishing such disdain with a submachine gun.

Chicago-born Lester J. Gillis, a name he discarded as too "sissy," preferred to be known as Big George Nelson, a ludicrous sobriquet considering his five-foot five-inch stature. Behind his back he was called Baby Face Nelson. He started his criminal career in 1922, when he was sent to a home for boys after being arrested for auto theft. Paroled in April 1924, he was in and out of custody thereafter for parole violations and other crimes. By 1929 Nelson was working for the Capone mob as a goon in the union field. Apparently he took the work too earnestly and was dismissed as unreliable because he sometimes killed when he was only supposed to injure.

Nelson was caught pulling a bank job in 1931 and got one year to life. He escaped from a prison guard in 1932 while being escorted back to the penitentiary from Wheaton, Ill., where he had been tried for another bank robbery charge. Now accepted as a "big-timer," something he always wanted, Nelson hooked up with the Dillinger mob. Dillinger was not overly fond of Nelson and his quick temper and even quicker trigger finger, but when several of his gang, including Harry Pierpont, Russell Clark and Charlie Makley, were clapped behind bars, he was forced to make do. Inevitably, Dillinger's capers became bloodier after the arrival of Nelson, who often needlessly shot down bank guards and bystanders.

As his victim toll mounted, Nelson grew to resent the fact that Dillinger got more notoriety than he got and that the latter had a bigger price on his head. He did all he could to change that. In the famous shoot-out at the Little Bohemia Resort in northern Wisconsin in April 1934, Nelson separated from the rest of the Dillinger gang and shot it out at close quarters with FBI agents, killing Special Agent H. Carter Baum and escaping in an FBI Ford.

Later, Nelson rejoined Dillinger and they pulled several more capers. By now, Dillinger wanted no more of Baby Face but was so "hot" himself that he had no chance of recruiting new help. On the night of July 2, 1934 Dillinger was shot dead by FBI men outside a Chicago movie house. Thereafter, Nelson, who had not been with Dillinger that night, became Public Enemy No. 1. His reign, however, was destined to be short.

Just as Dillinger fell, so did other members of the gang. Tommy Carroll was killed in a gunfight in Iowa and in separate incidents in St. Paul, Minn., G-men caught up with Eddie Green and police gunned down Homer Van Meter. The only support Nelson had left was his wife, Helen, and his longtime faithful sidekick, John Paul Chase. Still, the insane Nelson decided to become the greatest criminal the country had ever known, one who would make the public forget about the fabled Dillinger. He started organizing a gang with the intention of robbing every day for a month straight.

That grandiose scheme never came to fruition, however. On November 27, 1934 two FBI agents, Sam Cowley, who played a key role in catching Dillinger, and Herman E. Hollis, came upon Nelson, his wife and Chase in a stalled car near Barrington, Ill. Hollis, armed with a shotgun, crouched behind an FBI car while Cowley rolled into a nearby ditch with a submachine gun. Nelson opened up with his trusty submachine gun while Chase started firing an automatic rifle. As the wild gunfight began, Helen Nelson ran for cover and several highway construction workers hugged the ground.

Finally, Nelson grew impatient with the standoff, stood up erect and announced, "I'm going down there and get those sons of bitches."

NELSON, George “Baby Face”

He strode forward, his weapon spewing bullets.

“It was just like Jimmy Cagney,” one of the workers later recalled. “I never seen nothing like it. That fellow just came right a’coming at them two lawmen and they must of hit him plenty, but nothing was gonna stop that fellow.”

From his place in the ditch, Cowley fired desperately as Nelson advanced. The gangster took a bullet in the side but came plodding on. He sprayed the ditch with bullets, cutting Cowley almost in half, even as he absorbed more lead himself. Then Nelson turned his fire on Hollis. The agent dropped his empty shotgun and ran for cover behind a telegraph pole, where he drew his pistol. Hollis scored several hits on Baby Face before being fatally shot in the head.

Nelson walked to the FBI car, got in and backed it up to his wife and Chase, who loaded their arsenal inside. “You’ll have to drive,” Nelson told Chase. “I’ve been hit.”

He had been hit—17 times.

The next day Nelson’s body, stripped nude to prevent quick identification, was found in a ditch some 20 miles away. He got the same mawkish coverage from the press that Dillinger had received. An interview with Helen Nelson, who had surrendered two days later, read in part:

‘Baby Face’ Nelson died in the arms of his wife with a smile on his lips, but with tears in his eyes for his two young children.

Those were the high-lights of a thrilling story told by Nelson's pretty widow, in which she gave a heart-broken account of his death at the hands of federal agents.

Such journalistic excess greatly upset the FBI's J. Edgar Hoover, but he could revel in the knowledge that the last important member of the Dillinger gang had been eliminated. Chase was captured a short time later in California and sent to prison for life.

Nelson Tombstone libelous epitaph

When H. Lawrence Nelson of Raleigh, N.C. was killed in 1906, his friends and relatives had inscribed on his tombstone: "H. LAWRENCE NELSON, born Dec. 16, 1880. Murdered and robbed by Hamp Kendall, Sept. 25, 1906."

Indeed, a farmer named Hamp Kendall had been convicted of the crime and sentenced to life imprisonment. However, 11 years later, in 1917, Kendall was pardoned; the real murderer had confessed. Then began the great Battle of Nelson's Tombstone. Kendall petitioned the courts to have the offending tombstone altered, but the courts said they had no jurisdiction. County officials declined to take action, pointing to a state law that made it a felony to tamper with a tombstone. The Board of Deacons of the church that owned the graveyard property also insisted they had no power to act. Kendall then appealed to the governor, stating, "No man can stand under the scandal of this tombstone in the town where he is making an honest living." He was informed that it was not a state matter and had to be handled by county or city authorities. After years of trying, Kendall finally succeeded in convincing the legislature to pass a law declaring illegal "any tombstone which charges anyone with a crime." In 1950 the accusing inscription was removed, clearing Kendall's name 33 years after he was pardoned for the crime.

Ness, Eliot (1902–1957) "Untouchables" leader

One of the most-storied law officers in American history, Eliot Ness was the young head of the so-called Untouchables. This 10-man team has been credited in the more melodramatized crime histories in print and on television with laying waste to Al Capone's underworld empire in Chicago. No doubt Ness and his raiders caused the Capone organization grievous financial harm and serious inconvenience, but the claims made by the lawman and his eager biographers were a bit bloated. Certainly, the Untouchables never dried up Chicago or put the mob out of business. In fairness, however, Ness did justify his reputation as the head of an incorruptible unit of officers in an era when honest law enforcers were not easy to find.

A University of Chicago graduate, Ness was 26 years old in 1928 when he was placed in charge of a Prohibition detail specifically created to harass Capone. At the time, he knew full well the dishonest and venal record of the Prohibition agents who had worked under the Treasury Department until responsibility for enforcing the law was shifted to Justice. Ness weeded through hundreds of files before he came up with nine agents who had "no Achilles' heel in their make-ups." All were in their twenties and were experts in such activities as wiretapping, truck driving and, especially, marksmanship. These men were dedicated to their task, defied all threats and violence and proved unbribable. They were dubbed the Untouchables by the underworld, which was shocked to come across law officers who could neither be bought nor frightened.

Ness, who reveled in personal publicity, informed the press whenever a major raid on a brewery was planned. The horde of cameramen who descended on the scene often got in the way, but Ness' superiors did not interfere. The resultant coverage showed the citizenry and members of the underworld that Capone was not invulnerable. The Untouchables also distracted Capone while other revenue agents infiltrated his organization to gain the evidence of income tax evasion that eventually resulted in his conviction.

After the fall of Capone, Ness became the Justice Department's chief investigator of Prohibition violations in the Chicago area and later in the "moonshine mountains" of Tennessee, Kentucky and Ohio. In 1935 a reform administration in Cleveland, Ohio installed Ness as its new Public Safety Director. Cleveland was then mired in crime, and its police force was generally acknowledged to be "on the pad," i.e., taking graft from the underworld. A vicious gang known as the Mayfield Road Mob controlled gambling operations, bootlegging and prostitution, which blighted virtually every neighborhood in the city. The building trades were being strangled by labor racketeers. Violence was endemic; gang killings and the one-way ride were almost as prevalent as they had been in Chicago during its worst period.

Ness quickly established a new environment in the city and rooted out corruption in the police department, ordering mass transfers and firing officers for such offenses as taking bribes or being drunk on duty. During his six-year tenure, Ness was the object of shootings, beatings, threats and an attempted police frame-up. In the end, he won the battle of Cleveland, changing it, as one crime historian put it, "from the deadliest metropolis to 'the safest big city in the U.S.A.” The Mayfield Road Mob was crushed, and such Syndicate big shots as Moe Dalitz were forced to move their gambling operations outside the city limits to the surrounding counties and eventually, because of continuing pressure, into northern Kentucky.

NEUTRAL ground

Ness left his Cleveland post during World War II to become federal director of the Division of Social Protection for the Office of Defense. After the war he went into private business until his death in 1957.

neutral ground crime area during American Revolution

During the American Revolution probably the most crime-ridden and violent area in the colonies was a section of Westchester County in New York, the so-called neutral ground between the American lines to the north and the British forces in New York City to the south. While both sides occasionally ventured into this no-man’s land, it generally was left to be ravaged by “cowboys,” who rode for the British, and “skinners,” who rode for the Americans. Both groups, composed mainly of rough farmhands, lived off the land by stealing horses and cattle and whatever else the local populace had to offer at the point of a musket. The word “cowboy” derives from these rugged and often vicious fighters and meant “thief” as much as anything else.

New Orleans axeman uncaptured mass murderer

From 1911 to 1919 New Orleans was plagued by a series of gruesome murders. Most of the victims were Italian grocers and/or their relatives. The murderer had a set pattern, always chiseling in through a door panel and wielding an axe as a murder weapon, very often one that was found on the premises. In all cases, the bloodstained axe was left behind.

In 1911 there were six axe murders, the victims being three Italian grocers and their wives. The next murderous onslaught came in 1918. The first victims were Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Maggio, who owned a small grocery business and lived over the store. A bloodied axe was found outside their back door. Despite the similarity to the earlier murders, the police decided their best suspects in this attack were two of Maggio’s brothers who had been living with the couple, and they arrested both. Meanwhile, the press became convinced that the various murders had been committed by one axeman. This theory was bolstered when the Maggio brothers produced alibis and were released.

On June 28 there was another axeman attack; the victims were grocer Louis Besumer and a Mrs. Harriet Lowe, who were living together as man and wife. Each survived the onslaught, Besumer suffering a deep gash on his head and Mrs. Lowe a more serious skull wound. Besumer was released from the hospital the next day. Then the case became slightly twisted. The newspapers, which had thought Louis Besumer to be Italian, discovered he was Polish, spoke several languages fluently and received considerable mail from abroad. In 1918, a war year, that meant Louis Besumer might not only be the vicious Axeman but a German spy as well; at the time there was little distinction drawn in New Orleans between Poles and Germans. Mrs. Lowe compounded the mess by declaring from her hospital bed, “I’ve long suspected that Mr. Besumer was a German spy.” The police arrested Besumer.

The next day the woman made a new statement: “I did not say Mr. Besumer was a German spy. This is perfectly ridiculous.” The police released Besumer.

About a month after the attack, Mrs. Lowe died, mumbling rather incoherently about Louis hitting her with an axe. Besumer was rearrested.

That same night the Axeman struck again. Edward Schneider returned home to find his pregnant wife lying unconscious on the bed in a pool of blood. Mrs. Schneider recovered and recalled seeing the dark form of a tall, heavyset white man wielding an axe. She remembered the axe coming down at her. On August 10 Joseph Romano was fatally wounded by an axe assailant, who was seen fleeing by the victim’s young niece. This time the Axeman had varied his pattern somewhat: Romano was not a grocer but a barber. Otherwise the technique was the same, with a door panel chiseled out and the death weapon abandoned nearby.

A wave of hysteria swept New Orleans, especially in the Italian section and most especially among grocers. Families set up night watches, and the police received constant calls from nervous grocers who reported seeing a man with an axe near their home. On March 10, 1919 the Axeman struck again, severely wounding Charles and Rosie Cortimiglia and killing their two-year-old daughter, Mary. All the usual signs were present, but in this instance one of the victims announced she knew the identity of the assailant, or, more properly, the assailants. Mrs. Cortimiglia said the murderous attack was the work of 69-year-old Iorlando Jordano and his son, Frank, rival grocers from down the street. The police, happy to have a positive identification, arrested both Jordanos despite Mr. Cortimiglia’s vehement statements that the rival grocers were not the attackers.

All this gave the police too many Axemen in custody. Poor Louis Besumer was still incarcerated, awaiting trial. When his case came up in April, the prosecution looked rather inept as it attempted to introduce hearsay and rumor as evidence. Federal agents testified they had no facts linking Besumer to cases of espionage. In her lucid moments Mrs. Lowe had indicated Besumer had not attacked her; only when delirious had she stated otherwise. Louis walked out of court a free man, not a killer, not a spy and, certainly, not the Axeman.

By now the entire city was seized by an "Axeman craze." People held Axeman parties, and a new song, "The Mysterious Axeman's Jazz," became a local best-seller. Then the New Orleans Times-Picayune received a letter signed, "The Axeman," announcing that he planned to stalk the city on the night of March 19 and that he loved jazz and would not invade any house playing such music. On the 19th, bars and nightclubs were packed, and the city echoed to the sound of thousands upon thousands of record players blaring at full blast. The sound must have mellowed the Axeman into passivity; at least no one was axed to death that night.

In May 1919 the Jordanos came to trial. They were convicted solely on Mrs. Cortimiglia's testimony, even though her husband, now separated from her, repeated his story that the Jordanos had not attacked them. Frank Jordano was sentenced to hang and the elderly Iorlando drew a life term. There were some in New Orleans who felt the Axeman terror had ended. But on August 10 a grocer named Steve Boca was attacked. A few weeks later, in another apparent Axeman attack, someone started working through a door panel of the home of an Italian druggist. The assailant fled when the druggist fired a revolver. The following night a 19-year-old woman was found wounded and unconscious in her bed and an axe was discovered outside her window. She recovered but could not say who had attacked her.

The last suspected attack by the Axeman occurred on October 27, 1919, when Mrs. Mike Pepitone, the wife of yet another Italian grocer, walked into her bedroom and found her husband dead, with his blood stains all over the walls and ceiling. She started screaming, and the Axeman, who was still in the room, rushed out past her.

The more recent assaults made it appear that the Jordanos, convicted in the Cortimiglia case, quite possibly were not responsible for the Axeman rampage. Then in December, Rosie Cortimiglia rushed into the city room of the Times-Picayune in tears, dropped to her knees and admitted she had lied about the Jordanos. Within a few days they were released.

Happily for the police, the Pepitone murder was the last foray of the mysterious Axeman. Aside from the Jordanos, the sum of their detective work in about a half-dozen cases had been to arrest whomever had discovered the body or bodies. Then a new development took place 2,000 miles away in Los Angeles. A man named Joseph Mumfre was shot dead by a woman who turned out to be Mrs. Mike Pepitone. She announced that Mumfre was the Axeman and had killed her husband. The police checked Mumfre's record, which showed he had constantly been in and out of prison around New Orleans but had always been on the loose when an Axeman killing took place. Still, the police had been burned too often to label the Axeman case closed. The Los Angeles authorities were unimpressed with Mrs. Pepitone's tale and charged her with Mumfre's murder. Sentenced to 10 years imprisonment, she was paroled after doing three.

Did the Mumfre killing solve the Axeman case? Or was there more than one Axeman, up to a dozen or so, each stealing the idea from the other? Or was it all a Mafia plot aimed at extorting money from members of the Italian community in New Orleans? None of these questions has ever been answered.

New Orleans procuresses

Even in cities that openly allowed prostitution in the 19th century, the crime of procuring was frowned upon even by the corrupt police who took bribes from brothel owners. Many officers in such wide-open cities as Cincinnati and Chicago never thought twice about breaking up a procuring ring preying on young innocents. The exception to this rule was post-Civil War New Orleans, where the procuring trade was largely in the hands of women who seemed to have little or no trouble with the law despite the particularly unsavory character of their profession, giving rise to the term "New Orleans procuresses."

The activities of the procuresses went back a long time in the city's history, but they received little public attention until 1845, when it was revealed that Mary Thompson was doing a thriving business selling virgins out of a cigar store blind on Royal Street. She sold these inexperienced girls for sums of $200 to $400, depending on their looks. In March 1845 she became friendly with 15-year-old Mary Fozatte and gave her presents of clothes, toy jewelry and candy. Then she sold the girl to an elderly gentleman for $350. As she was taking her merchandise to a house on Burgundy Street, young Mary broke away and ran home. Most indignant, the procuress charged the girl with stealing. The case against her was dropped, however, and in turn, she was awarded $50 damages. The police, as one writer put it, "told Mary Thompson that if she tried to sell another girl she might be punished."

In the post-Civil War era the procuresses were kept busy supplying girls for houses of prostitution in several cities besides New Orleans: Atlanta, Memphis, Galveston and a number of other southern cities. They took orders for "stock" and "fresh stock," which meant inexperienced children worth very high fees. In the late 1860s a schoolteacher-procuress, Louisa Murphy, had a set price of $800 for a young girl.

NEW York fire of 1835

By the 1880s the procuresses operated with increasing boldness. Such notables as Miss Carol, Mother Mansfield, Spanish Agnes, Emma Johnson and Nellie Haley, called the Queen of the Procuresses, sent out mail circulars of their stock. By that time the competition was so fierce that the price for virgins sometimes dropped as low as $50.

Spanish Agnes got into only minor difficulties when in 1890 police discovered she had sold the owners of a Galveston brothel two girls who had been reported missing by their parents. In a newspaper interview, Agnes said:

I frequently receive orders from the keepers of fashionable places. These ladies ask me to send them girls, or women for that matter. I always prefer to have experienced women than virtuous girls, because there is less fear of trouble. I am in correspondence with women like Molly Waters and Abbie Allen of Galveston; these people write to me for girls. Some time ago I received an order from Miss Abbie Allen to send her some girls, and soon after Miss Lena Smith informed me that she could secure two nice young girls. . . . I do not like to have anything to do with innocent girls. . . . Not a very long time ago a mother brought her three daughters to me and offered them for sale. Two, she said, were bad, and the youngest still unacquainted with vice and the wickedness of the world. She demanded $25 for the girls, and expressed her belief that she ought to get more for the guileless maiden.

The procuress added she bought all three girls and realized a substantial profit.

In 1892 a newspaper reporter doing an exposé on the work of procuresses approached Emma Johnson about buying a 15-year-old girl, then demurred at making the actual purchase. The Johnson woman was incensed: "You're a fool! The girl's a virgin! You'll never get another chance like this in New Orleans!"

There was no record of Emma Johnson coming to grief because of the revelations, and in fact, the New Orleans procuresses continued to prosper until 1917, when Storyville and much of the brothel operations in New Orleans were shut down by the military as a wartime health measure.

New York fire of 1835 looting spree

The New York Fire of December 16–17, 1835 produced an orgy of looting as well as the saying, "I'm a firefighter and well-to-do, thank you."

The fire started in a five-story building on Merchant Street in the fledgling financial district. By the time the alarm was sounded at 9 A.M. on the morning of December 16, it had already spread to surrounding buildings. Most of the city's 49 engines and six hook-and-ladder units responded, but because of the weather they faced a brutal task. The temperature was 17° below zero, and hydrants had frozen solid, while the engine pumps froze over with ice unless constantly heated. The ice covering the river was broken through and bucket brigades formed, but these efforts were unavailing. By 11 P.M. the fire had swept into Water and Pearl streets and Exchange Place, the home of the stock exchange at the time. Within another hour 13 acres of Manhattan were ablaze, and the glow could be seen as far away as Philadelphia.

By the early morning hours of December 17, the tenement dwellers and criminals of the Bowery and the Five Points had descended on the scene and engaged in incredible looting. While Marines from the Navy Yard dynamited buildings to form firebreaks around the financial district, many of the firefighters joined the looters and were seen carrying goods out of burning shops and disappearing. Looters made off with hoards of clothing, jewelry and furniture, which had been heaped in the street without adequate guards. Thugs set afire those buildings that weren't already burning to cover their criminal activities. A group of irate citizens caught one thug as he was firing a store on Broad Street and hanged him from a tree. It was three days before harried police got around to cutting down the frozen body.

The fire was finally contained at the end of the second day, but by that time much of New York was in ruins. Almost 700 buildings were gutted and losses, estimated at $22 million, bankrupted most insurance companies and were credited with bringing on the Panic of 1837.

During the week following the blaze, the police staged numerous raids on the hovels of the poor and criminal classes of the Bowery and Five Points districts, repossessing huge amounts of loot. Moving vans were required to handle the booty in several individual buildings. No raids, however, were made on the homes of firefighters, although Fire Chief Handsome Jim Gulick was dismissed for failing to curb the spreading of the fire or the illegal activities of many of his men. However, when the firefighters threatened to go on strike, the fire-panicked city reinstated him. In the Bowery and Five Points a bitter greeting came into vogue: "I'm a firefighter and well-to-do, thank you."

New York Lottery swindle

One of the earliest lottery swindles in America was unearthed in New York in 1818, when it was found that lottery operators had arranged for certain numbers to win in return for kickbacks from the prearranged winners.

The lottery, much of whose proceeds were allegedly slated for the unfortunate, was exposed by Charles Baldwin, the editor of the New York Republican Chronicle, who wrote:

It is a fact that in this city there is SWINDLING in the management. A certain gentleman in town received intimation that a number named would be drawn on Friday last and it was drawn that day! This number was insured high in several different places. A similar thing had happened once before in this same lottery; and on examination of the managers' files the number appeared soiled as if it had been in the pocket several days. . . .

Baldwin was sued for libel by several of the operators and a select committee was appointed to look into the matter. What they found was that one of the complainants, John H. Sickles, was a secret supplier of the lottery forms and had provided certain politicians with the winning numbers in advance. By using political figures in the scheme, Sickles and others assured that the lottery would enjoy general governmental approval and support. Based on these findings, Baldwin was acquitted and became famous as the first of New York's journalistic muckrakers.

New York World's Fair bombing

A baffling bombing case, one that the New York police spent more man-hours on than any other, was the attempt to blow up the British Pavillion at the New York World's Fair on July 4, 1940. Two days earlier, on a Tuesday, an anonymous telephone call warned a telephone operator of the coming explosion, and immediately, a dozen extra detectives were placed on duty at the building. On Wednesday afternoon, a pavillion employee noticed a suitcase in the engine room but disregarded it because, incredibly, he had not been made aware of the warning. At about 4 o'clock Thursday afternoon, the man saw the suitcase again, but this time, passing closer to it, he heard a ticking sound coming from inside and informed officials. Within minutes four members of the New York police bomb squad arrived on the scene and carried the suspect suitcase to an open field, where two minutes later, as they started to inspect it, the case exploded, killing two of the officers, Detectives Joseph J. Lynch and Ferdinand A. Socha, and wounding the other two. Despite endless hours of police work tracking down every possible lead, the case remained unsolved. To this day, a reward of $26,000 awaits the person who can supply information leading to a solution of the case.

Newcomb, George "Bitter Creek" (1866?–1895) outlaw

Handsome, extravagantly mustached George Newcomb was perhaps the most devilish member of that often likable bunch of hell raisers the Doolin gang and also the tragic hero of the supposedly authentic tale of the Rose of Cimarron.

Newcomb appears to have been born in Kansas. He left home early, moving to Texas, where he herded cattle for rancher John Slaughter and was known as Slaughter's Kid. In the 1880s Newcomb drifted into the Cherokee Strip, working as a cowboy and then becoming an outlaw. He rode with the Daltons near the end of their days and then with Bill Doolin, who had been a part-time member of the Dalton gang. During one train robbery Newcomb put three lawmen-guards out of commission, allowing him and his accomplices to get away safely with their booty.

Newcomb always had a way with the ladies and was noted for singing his own verse:

*I'm a wild wolf from Bitter Creek,
And it's my night to howl.*

It was apparently such sterling talents that turned the head of 15(?) -year-old Rosa Dunn, whom he met at a dance, and the pair soon became lovers. Young Rosa was often in the company of various members of the Doolin gang, and she evidently was the legendary Rose of Cimarron, who allegedly intervened to aid the gang when they were ambushed at the famous Battle of Ingalls in the Oklahoma Territory. When Newcomb took a bullet in the leg during that conflict, Rosa supposedly brought him more ammunition, shielded his body with hers and helped him escape. Aside from the fact that Newcomb was wounded and escaped, little of the legend is true. According to most trustworthy accounts by various combatants, neither Rosa nor any other Rose of Cimarron was on hand to perform "angel of mercy" rescue.

However, probably because of his legend rather than his criminal deeds, Bitter Creek Newcomb soon sported a $5,000 reward on his head. In May 1895 Newcomb, with fellow outlaw Charlie Pierce, returned to Cimarron River country to visit his Rosa. An added inducement may have been the fact that Rosa's brothers owed him $900. Arriving at the Dunn ranch, the two had barely dismounted when Rosa's two brothers opened up on them, dropping both men in their tracks. When the Dunns moved in on their victims, they found Pierce still breathing and immediately shot him again.

The following morning the Dunn brothers had loaded the two apparent corpses on a wagon and were heading for Guthrie, Okla. to collect the reward money when Bitter Creek started moaning and asked for a drink of water. The Dunns responded with another bullet, this time a fatal one.

Newton Massacre Kansas shoot-out

The great Western shoot-outs were seldom calculated, eyeball-to-eyeball confrontations but rather spontaneous explosions of violence. Certainly, such was the case with what became known as the Newton Massacre. The trouble developed in early August 1871, when ex-railroad tough Mike McCluskie shot and killed a gunfighter named Willie Wilson, apparently in an argument over who was buying drinks for whom. McCluskie was warned that Wilson had a lot of friends who would be looking for vengeance, but he just shrugged.

On August 11 McCluskie was in a saloon-dance hall in Hide Park, Newton's bordello area, talking to some railroaders for the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe. A group of Texas cowboys headed by Hugh Anderson, the son of a wealthy cattleman, stormed in, firing as they came. Anderson shot McCluskie in the neck, but the latter lived long enough to get off a shot that wounded Anderson. For a moment there was a shocked silence in the place and then a frail-looking youth of no more than 18 got up from a table, picked up both Anderson's and McCluskie's guns and walked to the door. He locked it and whirled around shooting. In less than two minutes four of the Texas cowboys were dead and several others wounded. By the time the smoke cleared, the youth, known only as Riley and dying of tuberculosis, had vanished, leaving the citizens of Newton with a roomful of corpses. It was, in the words of a local newspaper editor, "worse than Tim Finnegan's wake."

Nicknames, criminal

More than the rest of us, criminals often pick up colorful nicknames, many of which spotlight their illegal activities or, in effect, describe their modus operandi. Thus, the Snowman is a notorious New York dope peddler. Bunko is an ace con man. And Kissing Sam is a pickpocket who can perform the toughest trick in that line of work, lifting a victim's billfold from an inside coat pocket while staring him right in the eye, close enough, in fact, to kiss him.

Years ago, Billy the Clock was an arsonist who developed a special celluloid timing device to touch off fires, and slow-paying clients of a New York loan shark called Gas Pipe Sam Bianculli soon found out, to their regret, how he had earned his nickname. Waxey Gordon, who grew up to become one of the most powerful bootleg kings, traced his nickname back to his youthful days as a dip, slipping in and out of people's pockets as though his hands were coated with tallow. Jack "Legs" Diamond gained his monicker as a youth by displaying a speedy grab-and-run technique in New York's fur and garment district.

Other nicknames are bestowed in deference to a prominent personal characteristic or appearance. Duck Walk was a Chicago gun moll whose strut was greatly affected by the two .38s she kept holstered to her knees. "Tough Tony" was tough, and Nails was as hard as same. Vince Coll, a wild killer, certainly earned the sobriquet Mad Dog. Scarface Al Capone got his scar, and his resulting nickname, from a fight with a Brooklyn longshoreman, although he always attributed it to a bayonet wound he suffered in combat during World War I, a distinction the military records did not bear out. Golf Bag Sam Hunt, a Capone gunman, got his tag because of his habit of packing an automatic shotgun with his golf clubs. The accuracy of some nicknames in describing those honored by them has been debatable, to say the least. If Slick Willie Sutton, for example, was so "slick" why did he spend most of his adult life behind bars?

Prostitution has proved a rich source of quaint nicknames over the years. Jennie the Factory was a New York brothel inmate whose name described her productivity. Mike "de Pike" Heitler was a top brothel keeper who earned the label de Pike because he ran the cheapest fancy house in Illinois and was thus considered a piker. Actually, Mike de Pike resented being so dubbed because he thought of himself as a skilled manager who had been able to hold prices down by the introduction of modern, assembly line business methods. Also appropriately named was Mike's assistant, Monkey Face Charlie Genker, who, in addition to being no beauty, matched the agility of the jungle creature for whom he was named by scampering up doors and peering over transoms to encourage the ladies and their customers to speed things along.

Women have won their own share of underworld nicknames. Over the years there have been numerous Kiss of Death girls, such as Mary Margaret Collins, who was labeled Kiss of Death Maggie by reporters because she had run through six husbands, all killed in battles with either the underworld or the police. Several other women who traveled in similar company found themselves tagged with the same nickname. Louise Rolfe won fame in the press as the Blonde Alibi during the trial of Machine Gun Jack McGurn for murder. McGurn insisted he had been on an amorous trip out of town with Louise, a nightclub entertainer. The alibi won him his freedom, but the prosecution later found proof that McGurn had been lying and indicted him for perjury. Louise was slated to be the chief witness against him, and his conviction seemed certain. But McGurn solved that problem by making Louise his permanent Blonde Alibi; he married her, confident in the knowledge that a wife could not be forced to testify against her husband.

Many criminal nicknames have stemmed from a single but dramatic incident. "Titanic" Thompson was a con man operating aboard the Titanic when it sank in 1912. Thompson and three of his confederates, who had been fleecing passengers in card games, managed to get aboard lifeboats and survive the tragedy. Thompson not only put in maximum claims for lost baggage and valuables but also obtained the names of deceased passengers so that fellow con men could make bogus claims. Before Lucky Luciano achieved his high status in organized crime, he earned his nickname by supposedly surviving a "ride" given him by a rival gang. Yet there is some suspicion that Luciano had never been marked for death by other gangsters but had been kidnapped and beaten by a family whose daughter he had dishonored. According to this theory, when he was finally let go, he contacted Meyer Lansky and together they concocted the tale about Luciano surviving an underworld hit because they felt a reputation for invincibility would be helpful in winning the respect of other criminals.

Several underworld nicknames have been highly laudatory, such as Frank (the "Prime Minister") Costello's and Johnny ("the Brain") Torrio's. Complimentary in its own fashion was the sobriquet, Hot Stove given to Jimmy Quinn, an ex-convict whose record did not prevent his election as a Chicago alderman in the early part of this century. Quinn was, as a saying of the day had it, "so crooked he'd steal a hot stove."

But some criminals have deeply resented their nicknames. Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel's friends called him Ben; he would go bugs if anyone called him Bugsy to his face. Charles "Ice Wagon" Connors was equally annoyed by his nickname, which was given after he smashed a robbery getaway car into an ice truck.

Harry Guzik, a longtime procurer and the man who handled payoffs to the police for the Capone mob, was called Greasy Thumb Guzik because, according to his version, he had to peel off so many bills from the huge roll he always carried that he could never get the grease off his thumb. The Chicago police had another, more self-serving explanation for the origin of his handle. It went back to his days as a waiter, when he couldn't seem to serve a plate of soup without getting his thumb in it. Whichever the case, when Harry died, the newspapermen transferred the nickname to his younger brother Jake, who became the top payoff man for the syndicate. Some nicknames are just too good to die.

Night of the Sicilian Vespers alleged Mafia killings

The purge of the old Mafia's "Mustache Petes" that began during the Castellammarese War was completed on September 10, 1931 with the assassination of Salvatore Maranzano, the "boss of bosses." An old myth repeated by a number of crime historians, including former Attorney General Ramsey Clark, was that on the same day no less than "forty members of La Cosa Nostra died by gunfire" around the country. It makes for an intriguing tale, but Lucky Luciano, the supposed mastermind behind this rash of killings, which came to be called the Night of the Sicilian Vespers, often challenged anyone to present a list of supposed victims and his challenge was never answered.

The only killings that could be tied in with Maranzano's were those of Jimmy Marino, a Maranzano underling who was shot six times that afternoon as he stood in the doorway of a Bronx barbershop, and Louis Russo and Sam Monaco, whose bodies washed ashore in Newark Bay three days later. The men, who were identified as Maranzano faithfuls, had had their throats cut and their heads crushed. They were wrapped in sash cord and weighted with sash weights.

Later, informer Joe Valachi asked Vito Genovese why these men had been killed. He was told that when a "big boss dies, all his faithful have to go with him."

Nineteenth Street Gang pro-Catholic New York gang

In the 1870s a pack of juvenile criminals, whose members continued in the gang until they reached their mid-twenties, terrorized New York City's Poverty Lane, the area from 19th to 34th Streets around Second Avenue. The leader of this band, called the 19th Street Gang, was an incredibly mean punk named Little Mike. What made this gang of pickpockets, sneak thieves and muggers unique was its unswerving religious affiliation. Violently pro-Catholic, it often attacked Protestant missions and schools. But the gang's main purpose was stealing and its members victimized cripples, blind men and children as well as storekeepers. The only defense against these attacks was for a potential victim to prove he was Catholic. Thus, a man being waylaid might be asked to give his baptismal name, recite his catechism, name his parish priest or reveal his Easter duty. Even this was not always a complete defense. As Little Mike is quoted as having said to one victim: "You're a good Catholic all right, but we haven't made a score in a long time. We're taking half your money." Happily for the public, the gang faded away by the mid-1880s.

Nitti, Frank (1884–1943) Capone mob lieutenant

The importance of Frank Nitti, whom Al Capone supposedly chose as his successor when he went to prison, has been highly exaggerated; in fact, his greatest claim to fame probably was the television show "The Untouchables," which often cast him in the role of the mob's mastermind. Yet when the national crime syndicate was being established in the early 1930s, its founders dealt with Paul "the Waiter" Ricca as the head of Chicago's Capone mob—without Nitti's knowledge. No one thought it important that he be informed.

Born in 1884, Frank Nitti was a barber whose customers included a number of crooks. He became a fence, eventually getting involved with the Capone forces at the onset of Prohibition. He was a skillful organizer and Capone relied on him to see that his orders were transmitted and carried out. After Big Al's fall, the newspapers hailed Nitti as the new boss of the Capone mob. Nitti probably thought he was, but men like Ricca, Tony Accardo, Jake Guzik, the Fischetti brothers, Murray Humphreys and others were not going to follow him.

However, Nitti was valuable as a front man, someone who could take the heat from the authorities. In 1932 two police officers, under orders from Mayor Anton Cermak, shot and severely wounded Nitti. Cermak was determined to wrest control of Chicago from the Capone mob and replace it with his own group of criminals, headed by Teddy Newberry.

Although near death at one point, Nitti survived and the legend about him grew. When the mob became deeply involved in its shakedown of the film industry, Nitti's name was often used by Willie Bioff and George Browne to frighten movie moguls. Finally, federal rackets investigators succeeded in getting Nitti, Ricca and several others indicted. Ricca, who with Accardo was more openly assuming leadership of the Capone mob, demanded that Nitti "take the rap," but Nitti refused. He had served 18 months in the early 1930s for income tax violations and he was terrified by the thought of going back behind bars.

"Frank, you're asking for it," Ricca is said to have raged at him during a gang conference in Nitti's home.

Ricca's words, Nitti knew, were as good as a death sentence. The next day, March 19, 1943, Nitti took a walk along some railroad tracks. He drew a pistol from his pocket and shot himself to death.

nobles labor musclemen

During the heyday of union organizing, especially in the needle and allied garment industry trades, it became common for both fledgling unions and employers to hire thugs to win their battles. Employers used goons to guard strikebreakers, slug union pickets and raid union meetings; the labor unions used them to blackjack and murder strikebreakers and pressure those workers who did not wish to join the union. Yet even these thugs had some loyalty, and although they seldom let their feelings interfere with business, they basically considered themselves in sympathy with the workers.

During this period a group of workers in New York haunted the employment agencies of the Bowery and Sixth Avenue looking for work as strikebreakers, since the pay for such efforts was much higher than normal wages. Ironically, the thugs assigned to protect these strikebreakers held them in such ill repute that they referred to them as "finks." They, on the other hand, considered themselves so superior, despite their evil work, that they called themselves "nobles."

These nobles so preferred practicing their art on behalf of the unions, which generally paid better than the employers, many of whom were penny pinchers, that from 1913 to 1915 they engaged in open warfare among themselves for the right. This conflict came to be known as the Labor Sluggers War.

No-Man's Land outlaw refuge area

Through a boundary quirk in the latter part of the 19th century, an area of some 800 square miles just north of the Texas Panhandle was neither incorporated into the states of Texas, Colorado or Kansas nor included within the territorial limits of New Mexico or the Indian Territory, which eventually became part of Oklahoma. Thus, outside the law enforcement jurisdiction of either white or Indian law, it was referred to as No-Man's Land and became a safe refuge for wanted men, such as Ned Christie and various other outlaws. No-Man's Land was eventually eliminated in 1890, not as an anti-outlaw measure but rather as a consequence of the Oklahoma land rush, which also resulted in the taking of the Cherokee Strip from the Indians.

Norfleet manhunt

In 1919, while stopping at a Dallas hotel, a Texas rancher named Frank Norfleet was taken by a group of confidence men. Using a variation of the “big store” racket, they roped Norfleet in by letting him “find” the lost wallet of an obviously rich man. When Norfleet returned the wallet, he was offered a $100 reward, which he refused. The wealthy man, a supposed speculator on the Dallas Cotton Exchange, then said that he would invest the money for him and let him have the winnings. Soon, Norfleet’s “winnings” totaled $73,000. However, it developed he had to post some $45,000 as security before he could get his money. Norfleet was “put on the send,” i.e., sent back home to empty his savings account and put a mortgage on his ranch. He returned with the money and gave it to the five crooks, who soon decamped with it.

Norfleet so far had behaved like the ideal sucker, but he didn’t continue to. Vowing vengeance, he went after the gang. After raising another $30,000, he spent the next four years on a private manhunt, running down the confidence men one by one. His prize catch was the gang’s leader, Joe Furey, a legendary swindler. In Denver, while on the trail of another of the crooks, W. B. Spencer, Norfleet infiltrated a phony stock exchange operation and gathered evidence that led to the arrest and conviction of three dozen con men. But his quarry was not among them. He later caught up with Spencer in Salt Lake City. When caught, Spencer complained bitterly, “None of us had a minute’s peace since you got on our trail.”

Also caught in the Norfleet net were two lawmen who provided protection for confidence operators. In all, Norfleet covered 40,000 miles and spent $30,000 in his four-year vengeance hunt. The Texas legislature took note of the plucky rancher’s tenacity and daring and appropriated a small amount of expense money for him, but the action was ruled illegal. The matter was taken under advisement in 1923 by the governor and the legislature, seeking to find some way to reimburse Norfleet. In 1960, at the age of 95, Frank Norfleet said whimsically, “Far as I know, the thing is still ‘under advisement.’”

Normandie, S.S. sabotage case

On the night of February 11, 1942 a spectacular fire at a pier in the Hudson River lit up the blacked-out skies of New York. The blaze was aboard the French luxury liner S.S. Normandie, interned after the fall of France and in the process of being converted into a troopship. The vessel burned for days, finally listing and turning on its side. There was much speculation about the cause of the fire, ranging from worker carelessness to possible Nazi sabotage. The truth was not revealed until more than three decades later, when the posthumous memoirs of Lucky Luciano explained that the ship had been sabotaged by the underworld.

The motive behind the act was to establish a climate of fear that would force the military authorities to request aid from the then-imprisoned Luciano in return for certain considerations. During the early months of the war, navy intelligence was all over the New York waterfront seeking the aid of workers in protecting ships and cargo. The first man to see the opening this could provide Luciano was Albert Anastasia, Luciano’s longtime dotting underling. Albert consulted with his brother, Tough Tony Anastasio, and then brought the plan to Frank Costello, who immediately presented it to Luciano in Dannemora Prison. Luciano agreed that if the Normandie burned, the navy, fearful of similar acts, would be forced to ask the underworld to help guard the waterfront. And that would mean dealing with Luciano.

The result was predictable. Years later, Luciano said: “That god-damn Anastasia—he really done a job. Later on, Albert told me not to feel too bad about what happened to the ship. He said that as a sergeant in the Army he hated the fuckin’ Navy anyway.” The reaction by the navy and Washington was equally predictable. Almost instantly, Operation Underworld was launched, with the intention of enlisting underworld leaders to help the war effort. The navy soon found final approval for such a plan lay in Luciano’s prison cell, and the gang leader exacted a price for his cooperation, demanding to be moved from “Siberia,” as Dannemora was known in prison circles. He was transferred first to Sing Sing and then to Great Meadow Prison, considered the most pleasant of all the state’s penal institutions.

It must be recorded that for the balance of the war the New York waterfront remained immune to any major security problems. After the war the rest of Luciano’s price was met. On January 3, 1946 Thomas E. Dewey, the man who had put Luciano away for 30 to 50 years on a charge of compulsory prostitution, announced his approval of Luciano’s release provided he was deported. Operation Underworld, born in a flaming ship at a New York pier, was concluded successfully, at least from the underworld’s point of view.

During World War II the burning of the S.S. Normandie was considered by many to be Nazi sabotage. Later revelations indicated it was more likely a case of Mafia sabotage, part of a successful effort to “spring” Lucky Luciano from prison.

Norris, Charles (1867–1935) medical examiner

Charles Norris, New York City’s first medical examiner after the city abandoned the outdated and generally inept coroner system in 1918, became a living legend who inspired an endless amount of material for feature writers. He was a reliable source for authors of crime material based on facts and was the model for the brilliant, philosophical medical wizard of many a detective novel. Despite numerous difficulties, both financial and political, Norris created the nation’s model medical examiner’s office. As a pathologist, he provided evidence that altered many a police investigation.

When Joseph B. Elwell, a famous bridge expert, was found slain in his West 70th Street apartment, the death was described as a suicide until Dr. Norris ordered a detailed study of the body at the morgue. He then determined that Elwell had been shot by a revolver held directly in front of his forehead, in a position that would have made it impossible for the victim to have pulled the trigger. In the Dot King murder case a few years later, Dr. Norris not only deduced the cause of death as chloroform asphyxiation but also supplied police with the information that whoever had applied the chloroform had exceptional strength and that “the position of the body suggests that a hammerlock hold had been applied.”

Both the Elwell and King murders remained unsolved. But in hundreds of other homicides Dr. Norris gave expert testimony that resulted in guilty verdicts.

In a number of other cases, he saved innocent men. In 1919 Mrs. Bessie Troy was found dead on the sidewalk in front of her apartment on Amsterdam Avenue. Her husband, Michael, was charged with murder on the complaint of Bessie’s relatives that he had flung the body from a window to cover up her killing. Dr. Norris was able to testify that the woman had been alive when her body hit the pavement, and her husband went free.

In an even more bizarre case, in 1926, a policeman on patrol along the waterfront noticed a man carrying a heavy bundle, which he flung into New York Bay. The officer stopped the man, who insisted the bundle had contained only old clothes, but the officer had the bundle fished from the water. It contained parts of a woman's body. The man, Francisco Trapia, was taken back to his flat, where the rest of the body was found. Trapia immediately confessed that he had killed the woman after a long drinking bout. By the time Dr. Norris arrived, he had been taken away.

"No doubt about this one, is there, Doc?" an officer greeted the medical examiner.

Dr. Norris viewed the scene with an experienced eye, observed the cherry-red color of the remaining torso and agreed, "No doubt at all," he said, "But it isn't murder, you know."

Dr. Norris quickly determined that death had resulted from carbon monoxide poisoning caused by fumes from a faulty kitchen stove in the one-room flat. As Norris reconstructed the events, Trapia awakened from a drunken sleep (before he too was killed) and found the woman's body. He remembered slapping her about and assumed he had killed her. He then decided to get rid of the body.

It was one of the few cases in which the police took a case to court in opposition to the medical examiner. They had, they felt, a perfect case, complete with a confession. However, based on Dr. Norris' testimony, the defendant was cleared, or at least almost. He was charged and convicted of transporting a body through the public streets without a license.

A volatile individual, Dr. Norris zealously guarded his domain from political encroachments. He announced his resignation on a number of occasions, the last time in 1932, when Acting Mayor Joseph V. McKee ordered a 20 percent cut in his office's budget. Public outrage mounted, Mayor McKee retreated and Dr. Norris returned. He died in 1935 at the age of 67 while still in office.

North, John (?–1835) alleged Vicksburg insurrection leader

Although John North may never have planned the capture and sacking of Vicksburg, Miss. in 1835, he was definitely caught up in the hysteria over a plot that year by John A. Murrel to combine a slave uprising with the takeover by lawless elements of several southern cities. North would have been the logical man to handle such a plot in Vicksburg, being the big man of the Landing, the pesthole that held most of the city's large criminal element. North ran a dishonest gambling house and saloon-brothel in the Landing area and controlled many criminal endeavors. Word got out that on July 6, 1835 he was going to unleash a large army of thieves and gamblers to loot the city. Whether the rumor was true or false, vigilantes struck first and routed the criminals of the Landing. Whether they really broke up a budding revolt or simply got rid of a festering criminal mob is debatable, but in any event, they hanged undesirables by the dozen. North fled but was captured the next day and hanged on a hill above the city, with most of the citizens in attendance. His body was left hanging with a "fixed" roulette wheel tied to it, an indication that dishonest gambling may well have been just as much cause for capital punishment as leading an insurrection.

Northfield, Minnesota bank raid James gang's downfall

The 20-minute raid on the First National Bank of Northfield, Minn. on the afternoon of September 7, 1876 marked the virtual end of the James brothers' gang. Ironically, the gang had originally intended to hold up the First National Bank at Mankato, Minn., but street repairs outside the bank had caused a last-minute change in plans.

Riding south, the eight members of the gang—Jesse and Frank James; Jim Cole and Bob Younger; Charlie Pitts, Clell Miller and 19-year-old Bill Chadwell—stormed into Northfield, never expecting to find strong resistance from honest citizens who were not awed by the "greatest revolver fighters in the West." Inside the bank, cashier Joseph Heywood insisted that the safe could not be opened because of a time lock. Jesse accused him of lying and pistol-whipped him to the floor. Then one of the clerks made a mad dash out the back door, escaping with a wound in his arm from a bullet fired by Pitts.

That shot alerted the citizenry. Rather untypical for a Western town of the era, Northfield had a limited number of firearms. A citizen named Elias Stacy, grabbed a shotgun loaded with only bird shot and blasted one of the lookouts, Miller, off his horse. His face bloodied, Miller remounted and charged at Stacy. Meanwhile, a medical student on vacation from the University of Michigan, Henry Wheeler, had located a carbine and taken a position in a second-floor window of the Dampier Hotel. When he saw Miller trying to ride Stacy down, he shot him out of the saddle, this time fatally.

Inside the bank the bandits prepared to flee, but on the way out, Jesse James paused long enough to place his revolver to the temple of cashier Heywood and blow his brains out. Amidst chaos and gunsmoke the desperadoes fought their way out of town, but not before young Chadwell was shot through the heart by the town's hardware merchant, A. E. Manning. Manning also hit Cole Younger in the shoulder and Bob Younger in the thigh.

As the gang thundered out of town, Bob Younger's horse was shot dead, leaving the dismounted outlaw screaming: "Hold on, don't leave me! I'm shot." Cole

NOTCHED weapons

The disastrous bank raid in Northfield, Minn., as depicted in a contemporary print, marked the destruction of the James-Younger gang, although Jesse James stayed alive and free for another six years.

Younger wheeled his horse and reached Bob just as the latter had his left elbow shattered by a load of buckshot. Cole pulled his brother up on his mount and raced to catch up with the rest of the fleeing bandits. Following in their heels, citizens who lacked firearms threw rocks at the raiders.

Only two of the gang had been killed but the battle was not over. Aroused posses were formed throughout the state, and the route the bandits were traveling was reported by telegraph. Somewhere along the getaway trail, the James brothers split off from the Youngers and Charlie Pitts. Some of the friendlier Jesse James historians claim this was a deliberate tactic to split the pursuers, but it is more likely that Jesse and the slightly wounded Frank James resented the fact that the badly bleeding Youngers were slowing the flight. Jesse supposedly made a remark about “finishing off” the seriously injured but was faced down by the Youngers and Pitts.

A few days after the split, the Younger group was cornered in a thicket of willows and plum trees. In the ensuing battle Pitts was killed and the three Youngers all received multiple bullet wounds. Finally, only Jim Younger, with five wounds, remained standing, and he cried out: “The boys are all shot to pieces. For God’s sake, don’t kill me!”

The brothers were taken into custody and felt certain they would all be lynched. They weren’t and seemed almost relieved when sentenced to life in the state prison.

Jesse and Frank made good their escape but the James gang was finished. Thereafter, Jesse formed a second gang but was forced to accept such unreliaables as Bob and Charlie Ford, who later killed him. The new gang did pull off a few more train robberies but the glory years were over. For the next six years their main accomplishment was evading capture, a feat they admittedly carried out with considerable flamboyance, adding greatly to the James brothers’ legend. However, the disastrous Northfield bank raid remained proof that their day had ended.

Western gunmen supposedly notched their six-guns after each killing, but actually very few of them ever did. Openly advertising their criminal record would have served only to attract the attention of the law or vigilantes. Many guns, however, were notched after a gunfighter's death to enhance his reputation. One celebrated fake is a Colt .45 initialed "W. B.," which allegedly belonged to Billy the Kid. Bat Masterson, among others, did a thriving business in notched guns, selling them to admirers even after he came to New York to finish out his days as a sportswriter for a newspaper. He combed hock shops for suitable guns on which to carve 20 or more notches. Today, there are scores of collectors who own a notched six-gun "belonging to Bat Masterson."

One true tale of a notched weapon concerns the legendary turn-of-the-century New York City gangster Monk Eastman, who began his career as a bouncer in an East Side dance hall. Eastman enforced the peace with a huge bludgeon and he proudly notched it every time he laid open the skull of a rowdy customer. One evening Eastman approached a quiet little man drinking a beer at the bar and cracked him over the head. As they carried the man out, Eastman was asked why he had made the unprovoked attack; he replied, "Well, I had forty-nine nicks in me stick, an' I wanted to make it an even fifty."

Novarro, Ramon (1899–1968) Hollywood murder victim

During Hollywood's golden age, revelation of a male star's homosexuality could destroy his career. Two stars subjected to such sexual disclosure were the great "Latin lovers" Rudolph Valentino and Ramon Novarro. There is little doubt that the speculation was correct. The two were fast friends and in 1923 Valentino presented Novarro with what was described as "a black lead, Art Deco dildo inscribed with Valentino's silver signature." Newsmen capitalized on such intelligence to infer that the two great lovers were not "real men," and the more outspokenly homophobic referred to them as "faggots."

Upon Valentino's death in 1926, the dark, often brooding Novarro inherited the mantle as the world's greatest Latin lover. The Hollywood publicity mill linked him romantically with Greta Garbo and Myrna Loy, which Novarro outspokenly denied. So publicists switched to presenting him as a deep, pensive man. They apparently both started then quashed the rumor that Novarro was considering entering a monastery, brooding over Valentino's death. If he were indeed considering such a move, more likely it was by the mid-1930s when Novarro's popularity was on the wane. He left Hollywood and performed for some years abroad as a singer. When he returned to California to try to reinvigorate his screen career, he was disappointed by the public's lack of interest and took more to drinking in his lavish home in North Hollywood. He was seldom seen in the company of women and was well known to young male prostitutes, who he picked up cruising Los Angeles.

In October 1968 two runaway brothers from Chicago, Paul and Tom Ferguson, accompanied Novarro to his home. Their interests, however, were not the same as those of Novarro. After several hours of drinking, Paul Ferguson ended up naked in the Novarro home, where he became enraged at the aging actor. Paul was notorious for his contempt for "faggots." In a vicious attack he seized Novarro's trademark ivory-tipped cane and beat the film star into unconsciousness. Paul continued battering Novarro until finally Tom begged him to stop. By then Novarro was certainly mortally wounded.

The panicky brothers tried to make the situation look like a robbery, smashing furniture, emptying drawers and binding the bloody Novarro's wrists and ankles and jamming the cane between his thighs. They further sought to leave a false clue by scrawling "Larry" around the house. In another tact, they wrote on a mirror: "Us girls are better than fagits [sic]."

The pair dressed themselves in some of Novarro's elegant clothes and foolishly dumped their own bloody clothes in a neighbor's yard where the police readily found them. The clothes aided the police search that located the pair. Tried for murder, they were sentenced to life imprisonment. The Fergusons, however, were paroled after seven years, at the time a typical term, especially in light of the prevailing homophobia.

numbers racket

The numbers game remains without doubt the biggest and most profitable racket of all. It is estimated that at least 20 million people a day engage in this illegal activity and that the total annual take is in the billions, with organized crime reaping a quarter billion in profits in New York City alone. The numbers game is not an American invention, having been played, in one form or another, in England since the 18th century. So-called policy shops, where people went to play the numbers, showed up in the United States in the 1880s. One New York operator, Al Adams, had about 1,000 policy shops in the city, and his bribery payments to Boss Tweed's Tammany Hall were said to be enormous. With his protection thus assured, Adams not only ran the game but rigged the results as well. After he finally went to prison following the removal of Tweed by a reform movement, the winning numbers were most often based on Treasury Department figures, released daily by telegraph, offering players the assurance that the results could not be fixed.

The term "policy" derived from the penny insurance that was then highly popular—both were a cheap gamble on the future. Each day the winning number was a three-digit figure and a bettor was allowed to pick any three numbers from 000 to 999. The payoff usually was based on odds of 600 to one. Since the mathematical odds against winning were 1,000 to one, the operator's potential profit margin was far higher than in any other gambling venture.

Over the years this huge cut has allowed numbers operations to support an entire bureaucracy, from the "banker" on top down through operators, distributors, agents and runners. Only the bottom two rungs face any risk of arrest, and even then it is the duty of the higher-ups to see that underlings are immediately bailed out, that the fix is put in to prevent convictions and, at worst, that the families of those sent to prison are provided for.

Because numbers could be played for as little as a nickel (and in some places a penny), the game naturally was embraced by the poor. From the turn of the century on, New York's Harlem has been the most lucrative area for the numbers racket. One Harlem operator, Madam St. Clair, offered a policy wheel that allegedly also provided a magical potency to the players. After it became known that the racket had made her a millionaire, she required several bodyguards.

Prohibition beer boss Dutch Schultz was responsible for organized crime's takeover of the numbers racket. He moved into Harlem, which then had some 30 competing policy banks, with his accustomed fierceness, terrorizing individual bankers into paying him protection and then simply announcing he was assuming control of their business. After Schultz was murdered on orders from a new crime syndicate formed by Lucky Luciano and Meyer Lansky, the numbers racket was run by Vito Genovese, Luciano's aide.

So lucrative has the numbers racket been that probably as many murders can be laid to conflicts generated by it as can be attributed to the old bootleg wars. Numbers money is most likely still the greatest source of illegal payoffs to the police and politicians in most parts of the country.

Today, the numbers racket is undergoing an ethnic revolution. Using increasing force, black racketeers have pushed the Mafia out of numbers operations in New York's Harlem and Brownsville sections and several similar ghettos around the country.

Of all the Prohibition-era Chicago gangsters, Dion O'Banion is credited with the greatest number of remarkable traits. Indeed, he may have been the most pious killer in that city of gangsters, carrying his rosary with him on murder assignments. He was a cheerful swashbuckler who was never without a carnation in his buttonhole and three pistols tucked away in special pockets of his expensive made-to-order suits. Although labeled by Chief of Police Morgan Collins as "Chicago's archcriminal" and declared the murderer of at least 25 men, a figure that may have been underestimated by 35, O'Banion, at the pinnacle of his power, was celebrated by the Democrats, who reveled in his ability to get out votes until he switched to the Republicans for more money. A contemporary joke asked, "Who'll carry the Forty-second and Forty-third wards?" The answer was, "O'Banion, in his pistol pocket."

The more cynical members of the city's press corps saw O'Banion as a man of humor. One of his funnier stunts, at least from Dion's viewpoint, was his shotgun challenge. The gangster would fill a shotgun with hard-packed clay and then wager an unsuspecting victim that he could not hit the side of a barn some 30 feet away. Naturally, the challenge would be accepted and O'Banion would load the weapon, hand the gun to the sucker and move far away. When the man pulled the trigger, the backfire would cause him to lose an arm or an eye or perhaps most of his face. The gang boss would still be laughing about it the next day.

O'Banion, the son of a Chicago plasterer, grew up in a section of Chicago's North Side known as Little Hell. He was an altar boy and a choir boy at Holy Name Cathedral, but outside the church he learned the law of the street jungle in a tenement district jammed with unruly saloons and whorehouses. Thanks to his voice, trained in church, he launched on a career as a singing waiter in a number of tough dives, including McGovern's Cabaret at Clark and Erie. While bringing tears to the customers' eyes with sentimental ballads of the old country, he would pick their pockets. After hours, young Deanie was a street mugger. While pursuing this trade one night, the 16-year-old met a youthful Lou Greenberg, who was destined to become the multimillionaire owner of the Seneca Hotel on Chicago's Gold Coast, when both sprang out of the shadows to crack the skull of the same victim. A moment of suspense followed as each of the attackers tried to decide who would get the proceeds of the mugging. With the wisdom of Solomon, they divided the loot evenly and formed an alliance for the rest of the night, sharing the revenues from additional skull rappings of unsuspecting revelers.

The O'Banion-Greenberg combine continued for several months until Deanie was convicted of robbery in 1909 and was sent to Bridewell Prison for three months. In 1911 Deanie was arrested for carrying concealed weapons (a set of brass knuckles, a revolver, a sheath knife and a leather blackjack) and sent away for another three months. It was the last sentence O'Banion ever served, although he was arrested often thereafter. He learned how to work the fix, Chicago style,

Quickly, O'Banion progressed from street mugging and robbery to slugging newspaper dealers for Maxie Annenberg, Moe Annenberg's brother, when Maxie was circulation manager for the Chicago Tribune. After learning the techniques of this brutal trade, O'Banion abandoned the Tribune for a higher-paying position with the Hearst papers. At the same time, he became adept at safecracking, picking up that art from the top man of the era, Charlie "the Ox" Reiser. He got caught cracking safes a few times, but he was so prized by his newspaper employers that on at least one occasion an executive of Hearst's American put up $5,000 bail to secure his release on a safecracking charge.

By the time Prohibition arrived, O'Banion had formed an impressive gang on the North Side, including such stalwarts as Bugs Moran, Frank Gusenberg, Two-Gun Louis Alterie, Dapper Dan McCarthy, Hymie Weiss and Schemer Drucci (the only Italian O'Banion ever liked and vice versa). The O'Banions, who were primarily Irish, ran the 42nd Ward and soon formed an alliance with the Jewish gangsters of the old 20th Ward, especially those attached to Nails Morton. Morton's demise in a riding accident resulted in the O'Banions' execution of the horse that had thrown him.

Seeing the profits Prohibition promised even before the law went into effect, O'Banion began hijacking booze while its distribution and sale was still legal. At first, O'Banion saw no great economic rewards in making his own booze. "Let Johnny Torrio make the stuff," he was quoted. "I'll steal what I want of it." However, as soon as he realized that thievery would never be enough to take care of the demand in the North Side, he started buying up some of the area's best breweries and distilleries.

As O'Banion started making his own liquor instead of stealing Torrio's, a major irritant between the North Siders and the Torrio-Capone mob was removed. As aggressively as the Italian gangsters sought to take over Prohibition rackets in Chicago and much of the surrounding suburbs, they were very content not to tangle with the North Siders, who were known, justifiably, as fierce killers. O'Banion could have continued operating in peace, even though his refusal to allow any bordellos on the North Side angered the Torrio-Capone combine and cut the Chicago underworld's revenues by millions of dollars annually. O'Banion was too pious to allow the sale of bodies, although he had no qualms about filling them with bullets.

While he tolerated a wide variety of other ethnics within his own gang, O'Banion bore an unabiding hatred for Sicilians. He robbed and murdered bootleg liquor deliverers employed by the Terrible Gennas, a brutal family of Sicilians who organized moonshining as a cottage industry in Little Italy and worked closely with Torrio. O'Banion listened to and often agreed with Torrio's appeals for peace and tranquility to allow all elements of the underworld to make their profits without harassment, only to resume hijacking the supplies of the other gangs almost immediately thereafter.

The final affront to the Torrio-Capone forces came when O'Banion, announcing his retirement from the rackets, sold an illegal brewery to Torrio for $500,000. Literally just minutes after the transaction was completed, federal agents swooped down on the brewery, closed it and seized Torrio for violation of Prohibition laws. Torrio, who later received a nine-month sentence, was out the $500,000, which O'Banion refused to return even after it was learned that he had received advance warning of the raid. When Hymie Weiss advised O'Banion to make peace with Torrio and Capone and the Gennas, O'Banion, with huge contempt, rejoined, "Oh, to hell with them Sicilians."

The phrase made war inevitable, although Mike Merlo, an important Italian political figure and head of Unione Siciliana, prevailed for a time in his efforts to achieve a peaceful solution. However, when Merlo died a natural death on November 8, 1924, no one else was capable of maintaining peace among the various factions—the Italians, the Jews, the Irish, the Poles, the Greeks, the blacks—reaping profits from Prohibition. O'Banion did not understand how rapidly his opponents would strike.

Deanie ran a florist shop on North State Street, directly opposite the cathedral where he had once been an altar boy as well as a choir boy, partly because he wanted a legitimate front and partly because he genuinely loved flowers and found he could make a small fortune supplying them for many gangland funerals.

Merlo's death supposedly cast a pall over underworld activities and O'Banion busied himself supplying wreaths for the funeral, some of his creations selling for hundreds or thousands of dollars. On the night of November 9, O'Banion received a telephone order to prepare a special wreath for the following morning. The next morning three men, all apparently unknown to O'Banion, entered the flower shop. "Hello, boys," Deanie said. "You from Mike Merlo's?"

The man in the middle, decked out in an expensive overcoat and fedora, nodded and grasped O'Banion's hand in a firm handshake, so firm that O'Banion could not pull free. Immediately, the man's two companions pulled out pistols and pumped several bullets into the Irish gangster. The last shot, through the left cheek, was fatal. O'Banion was given one of the grandest underworld funerals in Chicago's history.

The O'Banion murder was never officially solved, although the killers were identified as two Capone gunmen named Albert Anselmi and John Scalise and the man with the firm handshake as Frankie Yale, imported specially for the job by Torrio and Capone.

The Torrio-Capone combine fought many bloody battles with the remaining O'Banions until the new leaders, first Weiss and then Drucci, came to violent ends. However, in the process Johnny Torrio was badly wounded and retired back to Brooklyn. The O'Banion gang's last leader, Bugs Moran, saw his power broken by the Capone-ordered St. Valentine's Day Massacre in 1929. The North Siders were finished and Chicago belonged to Big Al.

The O'Banion assassination marked the beginning of the great Chicago gang wars of the 1920s and led to the eventual dominance of the Windy City by Al Capone. But the real importance of O'Banion's death was that it and the resulting battles came to be viewed by the Chicago underworld as senseless bloodletting which prevented the formation of a national crime syndicate in which all factions—Italians, Irish, Jews—could achieve enormous profits.

Oberholtzer, Madge (1897–1925) murder victim

While the death of 28-year-old Madge Oberholtzer was billed in the newspapers as the KKK's sex scandal murder, its real significance was that it resulted in a landmark legal decision which ruled the defendant was guilty of murder even though his victim had died as the result of a suicide attempt.

Thirty-four-year-old David Curtis Stephenson was a maverick member of the Ku Klux Klan who rose to Grand Dragon of the Realm of Indiana. He feuded with the Klan's Imperial Wizard, Hiram Evans, and led his group out of the national organization. Stephenson was accused of skimming off a portion of membership fees collected from 300,000 Klansmen and of immoral behavior.

On March 15, 1924 he and two other men kidnapped 28-year-old Madge Oberholtzer of Indianapolis, drove her to a railroad station and put her in a private berth aboard a train, where Stephenson, who had been sexually attracted to the woman for some time, stripped, beat and raped her.

The three men and their captive left the train at Hamilton, Ind. and registered at a hotel. Because she was in severe pain, Oberholtzer got one of the men to let her buy some medication in a drug store. She then swallowed six bichloride of mercury tablets in an attempt to commit suicide. On March 17 the kidnapers brought their victim, now extremely ill, back to her parents' home. They explained her bruises by saying she had been involved in a car accident. Oberholtzer recovered from her wounds but died the following year from the effects of the poison she had swallowed.

Stephenson and his two accomplices were charged with murder, although the woman had clearly died as a result of her own suicide attempt. The prosecutor, however, argued that by their acts "D. C. Stephenson and his cohorts became murderers just the same as if they plunged a dagger into her throbbing heart." Stephenson's accomplices went free but the KKK leader was sentenced to life imprisonment, his unusual conviction upheld by higher courts.

O'Brien, John Patrick (1873–1951) New York mayor

In 1932 John P. O'Brien became a one-year mayor of New York City, having succeeded Jimmy Walker, who resigned in disgrace. O'Brien was another of the corrupt pre-La Guardia chief executives who took orders from Tammany leaders like James J. Hines and Albert Marinelli, who in turn got their orders from Prohibition gangsters. Thus, when the new mayor was asked who his new police commissioner would be, he said, "I haven't had any word on that yet."

In 1933 O'Brien was succeeded in office by Fiorello La Guardia and underworld payoffs to City Hall and to the police commissioner's office ceased, with "business as usual" not returning until the corrupt administration of William O'Dwyer in 1945.

O'Connor, "Terrible Tommy" (1886–?) escaped murderer

Although the electric chair became the mode of execution in Illinois in 1928, the scaffold it replaced remains stored in a basement room of the Chicago Criminal Courts Building, available for a final hanging should an escaped murderer ever be caught. His name is Terrible Tommy O'Connor, a convicted murderer who in 1921 escaped custody just four days before his scheduled execution by feigning illness and, while being taken to the prison medical office, pulling a gun that apparently had been smuggled to him. Since then the authorities have been required by a court order to retain the gallows until the gangster's fate has been definitely determined.

For a time after his escape Terrible Tommy probably received more newspaper coverage than any other gangster except Al Capone. Speeches bemoaning his escape were made in the U.S. Senate and there were serious proposals that the army be used to hunt him down, but despite the uproar, Tommy was never caught. Through the years newspapers have run feature stories on the manhunt and on the rope that still awaits O'Connor. If he is still alive and if he is ever caught, Terrible Tommy's advanced age (he would be over 100) and the Supreme Court's ban on executions ordered before 1972 make his hanging rather unlikely.

According to a stipulation made by the Illinois legislature at the time the electric chair was adopted, the gallows will one day be removed from its storage room and set up in the galleries of the Chicago Historical Society. But before it could become an exhibit of grim things long past, the death of Terrible Tommy had to be a certainty. The law remained bound to enforce the court's sentence: "You shall hang by the neck until you are dead." Finally it was decided that the exhibit no longer needed to be put on hold.

O'Connor's Gunners police machine gunners

In 1927, when Chicago gang killings were at their peak, the new chief of detectives, William O'Connor, felt obliged to offer some measure of reassurance to the public; so he announced the formation of an armored car force to do battle with gangsters. He recruited volunteers from the ranks of policemen who had seen action during the war and could handle machine guns.

His orders to the squad—probably the height of irresponsibility even for those zany times were:

Men, the war is on. We've got to show that society and the police department, and not a bunch of dirty rats, are running this town. It is the wish of the people of Chicago that you hunt these criminals down and kill them without mercy. Your cars are equipped with machine guns and you will meet the enemies of society on equal terms. See to it that they don't have you pushing up daisies. Make them push up daisies. Shoot first and shoot to kill. If you kill a notorious feudist, you will get a handsome reward and win promotion. If you meet a car containing bandits, pursue them and fire. When I arrive on the scene, my hopes will be fulfilled if you have shot off the top of their car and killed every criminal inside it.

Some observers wondered about the possibility that O'Connor's Gunners, as they were called, might kill some innocent bystanders. It proved to be a groundless fear, as did any fears among gangsters; the Gunners were seldom in the right place at the right time.

Ocuish, Hannah (1864–1876) America's youngest execution victim

Because records on criminal matters prior to the 20th century were not adequately kept, it is difficult to determine with certainty the youngest person ever executed in America. But it may well have been Hannah Ocuish, a 12-year-old girl with Indian blood who was tried in 1876 for murder in New London, Conn. and sentenced to death.

The girl, living on her own after having been long abandoned by her parents, was apprehended for killing six-year-old Eunice Bolles after the younger child had accused her of stealing strawberries. Despite a defense based on her tender age, Hannah was quickly convicted and hanged on December 20, 1876. A reporter on the scene noted "she said very little and appeared greatly afraid and seemed to want somebody to help her."

O'Folliard, Tom (1859–1880) accomplice of Billy the Kid

Like Charlie Bowdre, Tom O'Folliard is more famous for the company he kept both before and after death than he is for his crimes. O'Folliard is buried along with Bowdre and Billy the Kid in a fenced-in grave at old Fort Sumner, New Mexico Territory under a granite marker inscribed, "PALS."

O'Folliard, born in Uvalde, Tex. in 1859 and orphaned the following year when both his parents died of smallpox, was raised in a number of foster homes. At the age of 17 he went off on his own to New Mexico. Early in 1878 O'Folliard met up with Billy the Kid and from then until his death he faithfully followed the Kid.

O'Folliard may have been as accomplished a killer as Billy the Kid. He and the Kid took part in innumerable gunfights after which it had been impossible to determine whose bullet had killed whom. O'Folliard was a member of the ambush committee that gunned down Sheriff William Brady, the sheriff of Lincoln County, N.M. on April 1, 1878; although Billy the Kid was officially charged with the crime the fatal bullet could have been O'Folliard's.

O'Folliard was so closely identified with Billy's saga that he was to share his young mentor's fate, being shot in the dark by the crafty lawman Pat Garrett. Garrett had laid plans to ambush Billy the Kid one night in December 1880, when the Kid would be leading his outlaw band. At the last moment, the Kid dropped off from the lead position and ordered O'Folliard to take his place while he went for a chew of tobacco. Garrett and his men opened up on O'Folliard, sure they were aiming at Billy the Kid. After a murderous volley O'Folliard lay dead in the winter snow. The Kid outlived his follower by a mere seven months. Then he too was killed in the dark by Garrett.

Ohio Gang Harding Administration grafters

Without doubt, the so-called Ohio Gang, a group of political cronies from Ohio who put Warren G. Harding in politics and eventually in the White House, took more from the public coffers in their two-year and five-month stay in Washington than any other corrupt group in American history. Including Teapot Dome, their total depredations have been estimated to total as much as $300 million, or five to 10 times what the Tweed Ring made off with.

The unofficial head of the Ohio Gang was President Harding's attorney general Harry M. Daugherty, who had guided Harding's political career from 1900 until his triumphant arrival in Washington in 1921. The Ohio Gang, as the group was soon labeled, let it be known that they had come to Washington for only one reason, to make money. A price tag was placed on everything they controlled. Judgeships, lucrative Prohibition-agent jobs, public lands and oil reserves were all up for sale. Bribes and payoffs were made at the House on 16th Street. The Little Green House on H Street featured poker games, bathtub gin and women to convince the dubious to join the graft game.

Daugherty and his Ohio henchman, Jess Smith, are believed to have a hand in every payment of graft, and there is little doubt that Harding knew much and suspected more. "My God," he told William Allen White, "this is a hell of a job. I have no trouble with my enemies. I can take care of them all right. But my damn friends, White, they're the ones that keep me walking the floor nights."

Harding didn't really spend much time walking the floors; he sat in on the poker games. Actually, the president didn't know how to control Daugherty and was a little afraid of him. Daugherty knew of Harding's illegitimate child and he had also advanced him $100,000, which he dropped in the stock market. As the stocks dipped, Daugherty's hold on Harding tightened.

The Ohio Gang's plundering was so massive that scandals started to break even before Harding died in 1923. There were rumors of frauds in the Veterans Bureau running as high as $200 million. Eventually, Colonel Charles R. Forbes was sent to prison for taking kickbacks from contractors building veterans hospitals. Jess Smith, the Ohio Gang's bagman, killed himself and the newspapers speculated whether it was because of pangs of conscience or whether he had been murdered to ensure his silence. Albert B. Fall, Harding's secretary of the interior, served his time for his part in the Teapot Dome scandal along with oil man Harry Sinclair. Harry Daugherty narrowly escaped conviction in a bribery complicated case involving the alien property custodian. In the final analysis, the Ohio Gang could not have functioned if Harding had been a strong president, but Daugherty probably would not have promoted him if he had possessed that potential. As Sen. Frank Brandegee of Connecticut said at the time of his nomination, Harding was "no world-beater but he is the best of the second-raters."

Ohio State Penitentiary fire

The most tragic fire in American penal history occurred at the Ohio State Penitentiary in Columbus on April 21, 1930.

The ancient, fortresslike institution was situated in the downtown area and was vastly overcrowded, holding 4,300 convicts in accommodations originally designed for 1,500. Coping with this situation and a recent rash of escapes had made the administration and guards extremely edgy. Recognizing that such conditions could not continue, the state had begun construction to expand the facility, which left many of the cell blocks filled with scaffolding and littered with piles of tar paper and wood scraps. After the prisoners had returned to their cells following the evening meal, flames suddenly spouted from the construction rubble and flashed up the scaffolding. Within seconds the top two tiers of the six-tier cell block were enveloped in fire and smoke.

Dumbfounded by the conflagration and somewhat suspicious that it was part of a planned breakout, the guards failed to open the cell doors. The warden, Preston Thomas, shared their suspicion and his first call for help did not go to the fire department but to the National Guard, whose aid he requested to help contain the prisoners. Were it not for a passerby outside the prison who sounded the alarm, there is no telling when the fire department would have been called.

Finally, faced with a fire of frightening proportions, the warden ordered the cell doors opened, but the intense heat warped the locks and the keys would not open them, leaving the prisoners trapped in their cages. Finally, one convict managed to force his door open and, seizing a sledgehammer, started smashing other cell doors open. Some 135 prisoners were freed in this manner before the flaming roof crumbled. A total of 320 men were burned alive.

In the prison yard guardsmen with drawn bayonets broke the freed prisoners into small groups that could be watched easily. Meanwhile, a new panic developed outside the prison walls, as those prisoners' relatives who lived in Columbus attempted to storm the jail to save the threatened men. Soldiers had to be sent to all entrances to keep people from breaking into the prison. If authorities did a poor job saving lives, they did an excellent one maintaining security. Only one prisoner escaped; after obtaining some civilian clothes, he managed to walk off with some onlookers. Three and a half hours after the fire started, it was brought under control.

The public uproar over the tragedy continued for many months. It was found that the prison guards had not been trained to handle such emergencies—at all. Not a single fire drill had been held, and scores of fire regulations had simply been ignored. There were a number of cries for the dismissal of Warden Thomas, but in the end, no action was taken. The warden and his superiors insisted the fire had been started by the prisoners, but evidence indicated the real cause had been an electrical short circuit.

O.K. Corral infamous gunfight scene

There have probably been more exaggerations and lies told about the gunfight at the O.K. Corral in Tombstone, Arizona Territory on October 26, 1881 than about any other shoot-out in the history of the West. Undoubtedly, the biggest lie of all was that the Earps—Wyatt, Virgil and Morgan—and Doc Holliday were heroes of the day in some sort of “moment of truth.” Anti-Earp observers, then and now, have regarded the shootings at the O.K. Corral as outright murder, and one has to conclude that what happened was indeed more homicidal than heroic. Popular versions of the event often put guns in the hands of men who more than likely had none and insist that some men fired their guns before they themselves were hit when in fact they had never drawn them.

The gunfight was in part an outgrowth of a long-smoldering feud between the Clanton gang and what should be called the Earp gang, the same bunch that the citizens of Dodge City referred to as the Fighting Pimps. The out-country Clanton cowboys were not welcome in Tombstone except to be taken in the gambling joints and whorehouses either run or protected by the Earp crowd.

In previous months tensions had increased as more and more people in the town started to suspect that the Earps and Holliday, despite Virgil's position as town marshal, were behind a series of stage robberies and other crimes. Holliday had actually been indicted for a particularly vicious Wells Fargo stage robbery in which two men had been killed, but he was released for lack of evidence. Wyatt Earp saw in that robbery an opportunity to be elected sheriff of Cochise County—the region's prime graft position—if he could pin the charges on others and, in the process, clear Holliday of suspicion.

It was this motivation, rather than alleged desire to clean up a rash of livestock rustling, in which the Clantons were clearly involved, that led directly to the confrontation at the O.K. Corral. One man had been captured and charged with the stage robbery but he had escaped under unusual and suspicious circumstances. The Earp brothers declared three known outlaws were responsible for the crime and, thereafter, conducted an intensive hunt for them. After failing to find the three, Wyatt went to Ike Clanton, the most important of the clan, and offered to give him the $6,000 reward money posted by Wells Fargo in return for his help in capturing the outlaws. All Earp wanted was the credit.

A deal was apparently struck whereby Clanton was to betray the hunted men, but it collapsed when the three outlaws were killed, one ambushed along with Ike's father while on a cattle-rustling foray into Mexico and the other two during an attempted store robbery in New Mexico. Now, the secret negotiations between Wyatt and Ike posed a danger to both of them. Wyatt attempted to extricate himself by having acquaintances spread the story that Ike had tried to sell out his friends; Ike charged Wyatt with fabricating and circulating the story and vowed vengeance.

What followed were a number of clashes and near gun battles involving adherents of both factions until the morning of October 26, when the Earps “buffaloed,” i.e., pistol-whipped the heads of, both Ike Clanton and Tom McLowery, a member of the Clanton gang. Clanton was then hauled into court, had his weapons confiscated and was fined $25.

The stage was thus set for further violence. In court Morgan Earp had taunted Ike Clanton, offering to pay his fine if Ike would agree to fight him. The reason was obvious. Few of the Clantons or their associates were considered adept in the use of handguns, while certainly all the Earps and Holliday were.

Thus, on October 26, having learned that Ike Clanton and Tom McLowery were rendezvousing near the O.K. Corral with Billy Clanton, Ike’s younger brother; Frank McLowery, Tom’s older brother; and Billy Claiborne, another Clanton gunman, the three Earps and Holliday came hunting for them, determined to disarm them because, they claimed, the Clantons wanted to kill them. On their way to Fremont Street, where the corral was situated, Virgil Earp deputized Holliday, thus making the shotgun he carried beneath his white duster a legal weapon. The four men ignored the pleas of Sheriff John Behan, who was friendly with the Clantons, to stop and allow him to get the Clantons’ guns and persuade them to leave town.

The gunfight, or slaughter, lasted a mere 30 seconds. It started with Virgil Earp’s somewhat confused command to the Clantons: “Give up your arms or throw up your arms!”

In answer, Billy Clanton and Frank McLowery touched their weapons but did not draw. “Hold,” Virgil cried, “I don’t mean that. I have come to disarm you.”

At that moment Tom McLowery threw open his vest and declared: “I have nothing.” Pro-Earp historians later insisted Tom really had a gun concealed on his person, but if he had, he never shot any of his enemies with it. The best evidence indicates that he and Ike Clanton, as Ike claimed, had no weapons.

In any event, the shooting started, although who shot first is another matter of dispute. Some say Billy Clanton drew and fired at Wyatt Earp first. If so, it was a remarkable feat by the youth, outdrawing the great Earp. And if he did shoot, he missed. More likely, Wyatt drew first and, ignoring Billy Clanton, who was a mere six to eight feet from him, fired at Frank McLowery, considered to be the only adequate gunslinger among the Clantons. Earp’s shot hit McLowery in the stomach and he staggered toward the street with his gun still holstered.

At this point, Billy Clanton was definitely shooting at and definitely missing Wyatt. Meanwhile, Tom McLowery, seeing his brother hit, took cover behind Frank’s horse. Billy Claiborne, who was farthest from the action, kept it that way by dashing to the safety of Fly’s Photograph Studio after firing off a few shots into the street. Indeed, many historians consider Claiborne’s activities so peripheral they do not include him in their description of the gunfight.

The second man to go down was Billy Clanton, shot by Morgan Earp, first in the right wrist and then in the chest. He hit a wall and slid slowly to the ground but, in the process, managed to shift his pistol to his left hand. Half-lying, half-sitting, he rested the gun barrel across his arm and kept shooting. Meanwhile, Ike Clanton grabbed Wyatt Earp’s arm and tried to wrestle away his weapon. Wyatt shoved him aside and said, “Go to fighting or get away,” a fair enough challenge if Ike had been armed.

Ike took it as an invitation to race for Fly’s, as Doc Holliday sent a shotgun blast after him. The shooting caused Frank McLowery’s horse to shy and then burst out into the street, exposing Tom McLowery as he tried to get Frank’s rifle out of the saddle scabbard. Holliday had missed Ike but he didn’t miss Tom. Doc’s buckshot ripped into Tom’s chest, and he stumbled to the street and collapsed, dying.

Now, only Billy Clanton and Frank McLowery were left. Somehow the latter, despite his stomach wound, stood erect and as his horse rushed by, he attempted to pull his rifle out of its scabbard. But like his brother, he failed and finally drew his pistol. By this time Holliday was almost upon him, having discarded his shotgun in favor of a six-shooter. The two fired simultaneously and Holliday went down, hit in the hip. Morgan Earp then shot Frank just below the ear, finishing him off. At the same instant, Billy Clanton shot Virgil Earp in the leg and then turned his fire on Morgan Earp, hitting him in the shoulder.

Billy tried to rise to his feet but shots fired by Wyatt and the downed Morgan sent him crashing to the ground again. Even as he lay dying, he kept trying to cock his six-shooter. “Give me some more cartridges,” Billy begged photographer Camillus Fly, who had rushed to the scene. Fly solemnly pulled the pistol from his weakening hold. Until he expired, Billy kept pleading for one more shot at the Earps.

The gunfight was over, to be embellished by historians in succeeding decades. It did not enjoy so fine a reputation for gallantry at the time, however. In fact, the Tombstone Epitaph, the pro-Earp newspaper, reported the event on page three and devoted less than two full columns to it. The story failed to preempt the item in the opening column, which reminded the readers that the Knights of Pythias were meeting that night at 7:30 for regular drill, or such newsworthy notes as “Winter underwear, of every conceivable kind, at Glover’s.”

Clearly, the Epitaph played down “YESTERDAY’S TRAGEDY” because it felt the Earps and Holliday could well face murder charges. Indeed, when the three corpses—the two McLowerys and Billy Clanton—were laid out at the undertaker’s, a huge sign was placed over the caskets reading, “MURDERED IN THE STREETS OF TOMBSTONE.”

Eventually, Wyatt Earp and Doc Holliday were brought up on murder charges, but they were cleared by a justice of the peace, ending the legal bickering. The shoot-out, however, did not help the Earps’ standing in the community, which was already divided in its opinion of them. Virgil Earp was fired from his post and, in time, the Earps, after being subjected to a number of assassination attempts, one of which (against Morgan) was successful, finally pulled out—some would describe it as ran out—of Tombstone.

Nonetheless, the legend of the gunfight grew over the years, enhanced greatly by the colorful, if fanciful, 20th century writings of Walter Noble Burns and Stuart N. Lake, who elevated the killings into an epic moment of heroism in the history of the West.

O’Kelly, Edward (?–1904) murderer of Bob Ford

Bob Ford, the “dirty rotten coward who shot Mr. Howard,” i.e., Jesse James, outlived that noted outlaw by 10 years. In 1892 he was running a tent saloon in Creede, Colo. when, on the afternoon of June 8, a woman came into the tent collecting money to bury a local girl who had committed suicide. Ford donated $10. As the woman left, a man carrying a double-barreled shotgun stepped inside and let Ford have it with both barrels, killing him instantly. The murderer turned out to be Edward O’Kelly (sometimes listed as Edward O. Kelly), who was related by marriage to the Youngers and thus, in a way, kin to Jesse. Whether O’Kelly killed Ford to avenge his murder of Jesse is open to question. There was some talk that Ford had accused O’Kelly of stealing his diamond stickpin, but whatever the cause, O’Kelly killed the man who had killed Jesse James and was therefore a hero to some. He was sentenced to 20 years in the Colorado State Penitentiary. Because of his popularity, the sentence almost immediately was reduced to 18 years, and in 1894 he got a full pardon. In all, he had served just two years for murdering Bob Ford. O’Kelly didn’t seem to understand that killing Ford might be tolerated but committing other criminal acts would not be. He was shot dead by a police officer during a holdup in Oklahoma City in 1904.

Oklahoma City bombing

It was in many respects a bomb blast heard in every corner of the country, so devastating were its results. On April 19, 1995, the explosive fashioned into a truck bomb in a Ryder truck literally vertically sheared off half of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City, Okla. The death toll was horrendous, numbering 150 men and women and 19 children. Hundreds more were wounded. Rescue workers did all they could, in one case a rescuer trying to save a woman yelled to a companion to turn off a dripping faucet. It was not water, but blood.

Who could have caused such a horror? The instant response by many Americans was that it could only have been the work of foreign terrorists. But it was to turn out to be a homegrown conspiracy, carried out by two and probably not more than three men. Descriptions of the man with the rented Ryder truck quickly made 27-year-old Timothy McVeigh the lead suspect. McVeigh was described as a minor right-wing protester known for his militant criticisms of government actions against terrorists and heavily armed cultists such as the Branch Davidian cult in Waco who were attacked by government agents with the resulting death of more than 67 men, women and children of the group.

Actually McVeigh was taken into custody less than an hour and a half after the devastating explosion in Oklahoma City, although he was not recognized as having any connection with the bombing. He was picked up by a state trooper, Charles Hangar, driving a dirty yellow car outside Billings, Oklahoma. He was charged with carrying a concealed gun and a six-inch knife. Two days later, just as he was about to be released on $500 bond, Trooper Hangar recognized a composite sketch of the Oklahoma City bombing suspect, had him kept in custody and then turned over to federal authorities.

Charged with the bombing, McVeigh admitted nothing but was outspoken in his rage toward the government for the raid on the Branch Davidian compound in Waco. McVeigh was described as a model teenager from a good family in Lockport, New York, near Buffalo. He joined the army and was awarded a Bronze Star in the Gulf War. In the hours following the bombing, McVeigh’s army buddy, Terry Nichols, was seen dusting his lawn in Herrington, Kansas, with ammonium nitrate fertilizer, the same substance that was used to make the deadly bomb. Authorities declared he was not interested in taking care of the lawn but rather seeking to destroy evidence. Nichols was charged in the case as well, although he had not been in Oklahoma City at the time.

The two men were tried separately. One graphic account apparently reflecting McVeigh's mindset was printed in a Texas newspaper, which said that where he was asked by one of the lawyers defending him why he had not bombed the federal building at night so that the death toll would have been vastly reduced, McVeigh dismissed the idea, saying, "That would not have gotten the point across to the government. We needed a body count to make our point."

Both defendants were found guilty, and McVeigh was sentenced to death. When the judge passed sentence on him, McVeigh quoted a dissenting opinion by the late U.S. Supreme Court justice Louis Brandeis: "Our government is the potent, the omnipotent teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example." McVeigh added, "That's all I have to say."

For his part in carrying out the bomb plot, Terry Nichols drew a life sentence. Many relatives of the victims of the bombing express anger that Nichols has not been given the death sentence also.

Old Brewery tenement of death

No other building in America, perhaps the world, had as many murders committed within its walls—a police estimated average of one killing a day for 15 years, or well over 5,000—as a 19th-century New York tenement called the Old Brewery. Built in 1792 as Coulter's Brewery in the old Five Points section of lower Manhattan, it produced a beer famous throughout the eastern states. Condemned for use as a brewery in 1837, it was transformed into a filthy tenement of 100 rooms, housing at least 1,000 persons. The building was five stories in height but only three floors had windows; many rooms had no windows and received neither sunlight nor fresh air. Some children born there literally did not see the outside world until their early teens.

In this nightmare existence, men, women and children committed murder and were, in turn, murdered, their bodies often left to rot or buried under the floors or in the walls. The occupants were divided about equally between blacks and immigrant Irish. All the basement rooms were occupied by blacks, many of whom had white wives, while the Irish tended to populate the upper floors. On the first floor was a large room called the Den of Thieves, where more than 75 men, women and children, black and white, lived without furnishings of any kind or any conveniences. Many of the women were prostitutes who entertained their customers there, at least the brave ones who risked entry.

Throughout the upper floors ran a long corridor, aptly called Murderers Alley, that led off to the individual rooms. In the 1850s, 26 people dwelled in one room no more than 15 feet square. In this room a little girl was once foolish enough to show a penny she had begged and was promptly stabbed to death, her body shoved in a corner for five days until her mother dug a shallow grave in which to bury her. In 1850 an investigator discovered not one of the occupants had been outside the room for a week, although some had stood in the doorway waiting to attack a more fortunate dweller passing through the alley with food.

Throughout the Old Brewery every imaginable criminal roamed—thieves, pickpockets, whores, murderers. Twenty-four hours a day there were fierce fistfights and drunken orgies; screams of luckless victims and cries of starving children; and men, women and even children writhing on the floor with delirium tremens.

While the police knew murder was common and that many wanted criminals hid out in the Old Brewery, they seldom entered its vile confines; when they did, they went in groups of 40 or 50. If only five or six policemen entered together, they knew they might never emerge alive. More than likely, they would be murdered and every stitch of clothing stripped from their bodies.

Just as the police could not enter safely in small groups, the building's residents could not leave safely in daylight hours, unless they took some underground tunnels that snaked out through the Five Points. So greatly were these residents hated and feared that a denizen leaving the Old Brewery in daylight would be pelted with brickbats thrown by pedestrians determined to drive him or her back inside. Many of the inhabitants of the Old Brewery had previously been persons of some importance. It was said that the last of the Blennerhassetts, the second son of Harman Blennerhassett, who had joined Aaron Burr in the great conspiracy to establish a Western dictatorship, vanished into the Old Brewery never to be seen again. He and other persons of some consequence soon sank to the level of the rest of the residents, living and dying amidst the violence, insanity and sexual promiscuity that were accepted facts of life within the Old Brewery.

Occasionally, missionaries tried to alter conditions in the Old Brewery, but being mostly Protestant, they were driven away by the Irish inhabitants who considered them heathens. Finally, the Missionary Society, with money from a fund drive headed by Daniel Drew, succeeded in buying the building for $16,000; the city contributed $1,000 toward the purchase. In December 1852 the society asked the police to drive the inhabitants out so that the building could be razed in preparation for the construction of a mission house. The police had to fight many battles at close quarters to clear out the residents and gangsters, and at least 20 wanted murderers fell into their net. Children, never having seen the light of day, blinked in terror when brought outside. As the building was ripped down, laborers carried out several sacks filled with human bones that they had found inside the walls, beneath the floorboards and in the cellars.

Probably more murders were committed within the walls of the Old Brewery, a five-story tenement that had windows on only three floors, than in any other building in the United States.

Although the destruction of such buildings was hardly a solution to the problem of city slums, the Old Brewery was beyond redemption.

Old Shakespeare (?–1891) alleged American victim of Jack the Ripper

Incongruous though it may seem, the killing of an aged alcoholic prostitute in a run-down New York hotel became one of the 19th century's most-celebrated murders.

Old Shakespeare was an otherwise unidentified Bowery habitue who won her nickname for her ability to quote the bard once she had consumed sufficient drink. Whatever slight fame her literary knowledge had brought her was eclipsed by the notoriety over her violent end. On April 24, 1891 Old Shakespeare's mutilated body was found in her locked room, Room 31, in the squalid East River Hotel off the Bowery, where she had registered as "Carrie Brown," one of several names she had used for business purposes.

The newspapers jumped at the opportunity to headline the case as the "arrival" of Jack the Ripper in New York, direct from his awesome string of brutal killings in London. These headlines presented a direct challenge to New York Police Department's Chief Inspector Thomas F. Byrnes, who had previously chided Scotland Yard for failing to apprehend the mass murderer of London. If Jack the Ripper committed a murder in New York, Byrnes had declared with his typical bombast, he would be apprehended and imprisoned within 36 hours. That being the case, the pressure was on Byrnes' police to solve the Old Shakespeare murder forthwith. So they quickly arrested Ameer Ben Ali, an Algerian Frenchman generally known as Frenchy.

The case against Frenchy was circumstantial at best, consisting of little more than opportunity and the fact that bloodstains had been found on both sides of the door to his room, which was directly across the hall from Room 31. Frenchy was convicted of second-degree murder despite his protestations of innocence and sentenced to life imprisonment. He served 11 years before a group of citizens dug up evidence that proved he was the wrong man. First, they produced witnesses who said there were no bloodstains on Frenchy's door until many hours after the murder had been discovered. Furthermore, no effort had been made to find the key to the locked door of Room 31 or the man who was known to have accompanied the victim to her room late the night before. The committee of citizens found that this missing companion had been recognized from newspaper descriptions as a man who lived in a New Jersey boardinghouse. He had disappeared but in his bureau drawer a bloody shirt and a key to Room 31 had been discovered. Frenchy, who was clearly innocent, was released and immediately sailed back to his native Algeria. Thus, New York's Jack the Ripper case remained just as unsolved as any of its London counterparts.

O'Leary, Big Jim (c. 1860–1926) Chicago gambler

Jim O'Leary, the son of the Mrs. O'Leary of cow and Chicago Fire fame, grew up to be one of the city's most prominent gamblers and a millionaire. He started out as a handyman for the bookmaking syndicates, quickly learned the ropes and soon made a try at operating a gambling resort of his own. Its blueprints called for stockades, barbed-wire fences, alarm boxes, lookout posts for armed sentries, cages for ferocious watchdogs and a whole network of tunnels. Situated in Long Beach, Ind., 23 miles from the center of Chicago, the ambitious resort failed to draw the crowds O'Leary hoped for and it folded.

O'Leary moved back to the Windy City and opened a gambling house on South Halsted Street near the stockyards. He then set up a string of bookie operations and poolrooms. Big Jim, as he became known because of his stature in the business, fostered the idea of a floating gaming resort. He outfitted the steamboat City of Traverse as the first vessel in American history strictly devoted to gambling. Each afternoon about 1,000 horse players came aboard for a leisurely sail on Lake Michigan and remained out on the lake until all the day's races were run. Results were flashed to the boat by wireless. The police finally grounded the City of Traverse by arresting passengers as they disembarked and by scrambling the wireless messages giving the odds and results of the races.

O'Leary returned to his South Halsted Street house determined to make it the premier gambling resort in the country. It certainly became one of the most lavish, complete with a restaurant, a Turkish bath, bowling alleys and a billiard room. But its main attraction was the horse parlor, outfitted with plush couches and chairs, servants to provide refreshments and charts showing the odds and results of every race in the United States and Canada. Action was also taken on every other kind of sporting event as well as on elections and even the weather. Big Jim once won a $10,000 bet that there would be 18 days of rain during the month of May.

What was amazing about O'Leary was that he prospered without the usual payoffs to the police. He once was quoted by a newspaper reporter as saying: "I could have had all kinds of it, [protection] but let me tell you something. Protection that you purchase ain't worth an honest man's dime. The police is for sale, but I don't want none of them." His South Halsted Street resort boasted massive iron-bound oaken doors layered over with zinc and were, as Big Jim put it, "fire-proof, bombproof and police-proof." During the gamblers' war of 1907, the doors held against bombs from rival operators. At times the police did breach the doors with sledgehammers and axes and even arrested some of O'Leary's bookies and customers, but usually the reward for their efforts was hilariously anticlimactic. Once they found the grand betting parlor devoid of furniture save for a kitchen table at which an old man was sitting reading a prayer book. When the police took to axing through his inner walls looking for hidden rooms and exits, Big Jim countered by loading the walls with red pepper. When the police axes penetrated the wall's zinc covering, they were so blinded by the pepper that several required long hospital treatment for inflamed eyes. When Big Jim O'Leary died in 1926, he was a millionaire several times over and perhaps as famous in Chicago as the family cow.

Olinger, Robert (1841–1881) victim of Billy the Kid

A killer both with and without a badge, Bob Olinger has come down in the folklore surrounding Billy the Kid as the young outlaw's least lamented victim. Most folks seemed to agree that Olinger deserved to be shot.

A drifter from Ohio, Olinger punched cows all around the New Mexico Territory until, in 1876, he got the job of town marshal in Seven Rivers. When word soon got around that Olinger was working with outlaws, he was back punching cattle. As a lawman, Olinger developed a knack for gunning down men from ambush, and it is generally believed he used the same method to commit a few murders for personal reasons. His dispatch of Pas Chavez in Seven Rivers in 1878 was an exception. The pair had had a violent confrontation about a week earlier, and when they met on the town's main street, Olinger indicated all was forgotten and he extended his hand. When Chavez held out his hand, Olinger suddenly pulled him off balance, stuck his revolver into Chavez' stomach and pulled the trigger. Chavez died cursing him.

Despite Olinger's unsavory background, Pat Garrett had no compunctions about enlisting him as a deputy. When Billy the Kid was captured in 1881, Olinger was assigned to guard him in jail. Olinger evidently regarded this assignment as an opportunity to attain lasting glory by killing Billy during an escape attempt, and he went out and bought a brand new breech-loading shotgun. Taunting the Kid, he advised him to try to escape and take a fatal load of buckshot, an easier death than he faced shortly at the hands of the hangman. Just to add to the provocation, Olinger marked off the days on a calendar until Billy's hanging date and then waved the shotgun in his face and again urged him to try to escape.

As it turned out, on April 28 Billy the Kid did attempt to escape, successfully. While Olinger was across the street taking his meal at La Rue's Bar, Billy somehow got hold of a revolver and gunned down his other guard, J. W. Bell. Olinger heard the shots and came running across the street. By this time Billy had grabbed Olinger's shotgun and was waiting in a second-floor window. As Olinger came into view, Billy called out cheerfully, "Hello, Bob!" Olinger barely had time to look up at his executioner before Billy cut loose with both barrels, dropping his tormentor in his tracks. Billy hurled the shotgun at the dead man, shouting, "You won't follow me any more with that gun!" Billy the Kid then rode off to freedom.

OLIVE, Isom Prentice “Print”

Such was the mystique surrounding Billy the Kid that his murder of lawman Bob Olinger, shown in a contemporary print, was rather popular.

Olive, Isom Prentice “Print” (1840–1886) murderer

The epitome of the arrogant big rancher, Texas-born Print Olive and his brother Bob owned one of Nebraska’s greatest spreads. For many years he was a law unto himself, directing a brutal war against the homesteaders who, in his view, were crowding his range. Print Olive cut fences, destroyed crops and employed a cowboy army of over one hundred to terrorize the homesteaders, but the state of Nebraska kept siding with these settlers, a development that made the Olive brothers even more violent.

In November 1878 Bob Olive was killed in a shootout with two homesteaders, Luther Mitchell and Ami Ketchum. The two men were arrested but, while being taken to a hearing, were handed over to Print Olive’s men in exchange for cash. They were brought to the Olive ranch, where Print meted out his own version of frontier justice, shooting, hanging and—after dousing them with whiskey—burning them. For this outrage, which earned Print Olive the label “man burner,” the cattle baron was brought to trial and, along with one of his chief aides, Fred Fisher, was sentenced to life imprisonment. When Olive’s private army of cowboys threatened to break him free, President Rutherford B. Hayes, at the behest of the governor of Nebraska sent in several companies of mounted soldiers. Still, Print Olive bragged he would not remain in prison, and he proved right. Within two years, during which he spent $250,000 in legal fees, he was released and a new trial was ordered. It was never held, however, because the witnesses had “scattered.”

Print Olive soon moved on to Colorado, where he gained a reasonable amount of acceptance over the next few years. However, his code remained as violent as ever. In 1886 in Trial City, Colo. Olive came across a former cowhand employee named Joe Sparrow, who owed him $10. Olive demanded the money in a saloon confrontation. When the smoke cleared, the cattle baron was dead.

omertà Mafia code of silence

Omertà is, we are told, the time-honored underworld code of silence dating back to the birth of the Mafia in Sicily in the 13th century. The Mafia was formed to rid the island of the Spanish and French invaders who looted the Sicilians’ homes and villages. However, this secret society soon began committing its own crimes and, later on, hired out to wealthy landowners who wanted to terrorize the farmers. The Mafia grew in power until it began to corrupt the government of Sicily and then that of Italy. The Mafia was able to rule because it was prepared to kill and was protected by the code of omertà.

The code forbade all members to say anything to the authorities or to call on the police for help in settling accounts against others. They had to handle such matters themselves. However, far more importantly, omertà sealed the lips of victims and witnesses alike. This was the real power of omertà in Sicily, a power the Mafia brought with it to America. It was through this code of silence that the Mafia and various Black Hand extortionists could victimize hapless Italian immigrants. For a minor violation of omertà, the penalty might be a slit tongue; for a major violation, it was a slit throat or a bullet-riddled body.

In America, omertà has become almost totally reserved for Mafia victims and those of its lower echelon who believe it really exists. Nearly everything we know about the Mafia comes from only one source: the Mafia itself. The organization was quick to learn that one of the simplest ways to get rid of criminal competition was to "rat" to the police. The cops would break up the rival gang and the Mafia could then step in and take over. Mafia leaders, schooled in treachery, learned to break omertà to suit their own purposes. On one occasion Lucky Luciano, having been caught with some narcotics, is known to have "squared" the matter with the police by fingering a big load of drugs that a rival mob was moving. It was such maneuvers that enabled Luciano to become the biggest of the big crime bosses.

While it is true that the mob punishes many informers with death, it is equally true that far fewer corpses are found with a canary stuffed in their mouth, or their genitals cut off and similarly placed than was the case a few decades ago. In recent years informers have been treated more gently, if they have value. A case in point was Jack Mace, reputedly the biggest mob fence in the East. He supposedly got in trouble with the law in New York and squared accounts by fingering some crooks. A few New York gangsters exacted punishment by putting him in the hospital for a long time. He was not killed because he was considered too valuable. Mace had, after all, moved millions of dollars in mob money and he had all the connections. Furthermore, he had made a great deal of money for the underworld, and since it has always honored money more than omertà, he was merely taught a lesson for his infraction.

The extent to which omertà has collapsed within the Mafia and, for that matter, outside of it is attested to by the fact that during the late 1970s the federal government had under its protection about 700 informers, including many Mafia men of the Joe Valachi stripe. Omertà obviously doesn't exert the power it once did. As Vinnie Teresa, the biggest Mafia informer since Valachi, said, "But looking back on my life with the Mafia members, I realize now that omertà—the code—was just a lot of bullshit."

O'Neil, Jack (?–1898) innocent execution victim

On January 7, 1898 Jack O'Neil was hanged for the murder of Hattie McCloud at Buckland, near Shelburne Falls, Mass. To the end, O'Neil insisted he was innocent and that he was the victim of anti-Irish bigotry. Going to his death, he said, "I shall meet death like a man and I hope those who see me hanged will live to see the day when it is proved I am innocent—and it will be, some time."

Just a few months after the execution, a Shelburne Falls soldier fighting the Spanish in Cuba with the Sixth Massachusetts Militia confessed to the McCloud murder and cleared O'Neil. An ace reporter of the day, Eddie Collins, interviewed the soldier and arranged to have him sign a deathbed confession. He flashed the story to Dan W. Gallagher of the Boston Post. By that time, of course, it did O'Neil little good. Gallagher had already covered his execution. But O'Neil's dying words proved true.

O'Neill, William O. "Buckey" (1860–1898) lawman and Rough Rider

Generally regarded as one of the best lawmen the West ever produced—a rather remarkable achievement for a peace officer who never killed a man in the course of his duties—Buckey O'Neill has been described by Western author William McLoed Raine as "the most many-sided man Arizona ever produced." Making his way west in 1879 from his native Washington, D.C., O'Neill, in a short, crowded life, became famous as a gambler, lawyer, journalist, lawman, judge, mayor, conservationist and soldier. His nickname Buckey derived from his habit of constantly bucking the odds at the faro tables.

O'Neill's first experience as a lawman was his tour as a part-time deputy to City Marshal Henry Garfias in Phoenix. One day when a dozen Texas cowboys "treed" Phoenix, i.e., ran citizens of the town up trees by shooting at their heels, Garfias tossed O'Neill a badge and the two went out to restore order. Garfias killed two of the troublemakers, while O'Neill, perhaps shooting a bit more carefully, wounded two others.

After becoming one of the Arizona Territory's youngest lawyers, publishers and judges, O'Neill was elected sheriff of Yavapai County in 1888. During his one-year term crime in the area declined. Even more remarkably, the year passed without a single fatal shooting by anyone connected with the sheriff's office. When four ex-Hashknife Ranch cowboys turned train robbers, O'Neill went after them with a posse whose members understood there would be no killings unless absolutely necessary. The four were tracked down after a 600-mile chase that ended in a nonfatal shoot-out in the Utah Territory.

After his term as sheriff, Buckey O'Neill conducted some highly valuable explorations of the Grand Canyon, discovered a copper mine and ran several Populist political campaigns that culminated in his election as mayor of Prescott, Arizona Territory in 1898. He left that office to become a Rough Rider with Teddy Roosevelt in the Spanish-American War. After serving heroically in the skirmish at Las Guasimas, he was shot dead by a sniper at San Juan Hill on July 1, 1898. Roosevelt wrote glowingly of Buckey O'Neill on several occasions, and undoubtedly, his exposure to O'Neill led to his later patronage of other former Western lawmen, such as Pat Garrett and Bat Masterson, neither of whom were nearly as deserving as the remarkable Arizona sheriff.

Hymie Weiss, the number two man in Dion O'Banion's gang, which dominated Chicago's North Side in the early 1920s, has been credited with coining this quaint underworld euphemism. In 1921 Steve Wisniewski offended the O'Banions by hijacking one of the gang's loaded beer trucks. Weiss was given the duty of imposing the proper punishment. He invited Wisniewski for a drive in the country by Lake Michigan, from which the latter never returned. Later, Weiss bragged to friends, "We took Stevie for a ride, a one-way ride."

Orchard, Harry (1866–1954) murderer

Either Harry Orchard, whose real name was Albert E. Horsley, was the greatest labor assassin in history or he cooperated in a monumental conspiracy with the Pinkertons to frame America's radical labor leadership and save himself from execution in the process.

Orchard was convicted of the 1905 murder of ex-governor Frank Steunenberg of Idaho, and his confession made nationwide headlines when he insisted he had killed Steunenberg on specific orders from William D. "Big Bill" Haywood, a leader in the Western Federation of Miners, and others. Orchard eventually admitted he was a paid labor bomber and had often bombed and killed on union orders, specifically Haywood's. Organized labor has always scoffed at Orchard's confession, pointing out he was assisted in preparing it by Pinkerton detective James McParland of Mollie Maguire fame. In any event, the trial of Haywood, Charles H. Moyers and George A. Pettibone foundered when the prosecution failed to corroborate Orchard's charges. Furthermore, another man, who had admitted taking part in the murder, Steve Adams, repudiated his own confession, which he said was Pinkerton-inspired. The Haywood trial in 1907 won fame for Clarence Darrow, who, as defense attorney, charged the prosecution with attempting to turn a murder case into a condemnation of the American labor movement.

Harry Orchard alone was convicted and sentenced to hang, but his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. Years later, he would transmit a message to William A. Pinkerton requesting aid in winning a parole. Pinkerton refused, a startling move since the agency generally attempted to win freedom for its informers whether or not their testimony had helped win the conviction of others. In an internal agency memo Pinkerton wrote, "I know that McParland always thought Orchard should have been released for testifying, but I still regard Orchard as a cold-blooded murderer who killed many innocent persons and who testified only to save his own skin." Orchard died in jail on April 13, 1954.

Oregon boot shackle for prisoners

The so-called Oregon boot was a cruel device that made the Oregon State Prison one of the most feared by 19th century criminals. Invented by Warden J. C. Gardner, who required that all prisoners wear it during their entire term, the contraption, which weighed over 15 pounds, consisted of a heavy iron band that fastened around the leg above the ankle and held in place by a steel ring with a pair of braces that were attached to the heel of the wearer's boot. While it no doubt cut down on escape attempts, it could also produce permanent deformities on those serving long terms.

Warden Gardner patented the device in 1866, firmly expecting other prisons to adopt the shackle. He was surprised when none did, most considering it too sadistic. After another decade, as a result of mounting criticism, the device was only applied to the more desperate criminals in the Oregon State Prison. Slowly and quietly, the use of the Oregon boot tapered off and finally ended even in the state that gave it its name.

Orgen, Jacob “Little Augie” (1894–1927) gang leader and killer

Jacob “Little Augie” Orgen was one of the last big-time independent gangsters to fall victim to the national crime syndicate. When Little Augie was assassinated in 1927, his union racketeering in New York’s garment district was taken over by the notorious Louis Lepke. Lepke refined the racket into a smoother and more professional operation and gave it syndicate support, cutting in such Italian gangsters as Tommy Lucchese, Lucky Luciano, Joe Adonis and Albert Anastasia and such non-Italians as Meyer Lansky and Bugsy Siegel. Little Augie had failed to appreciate such grandiose schemes, a shortsightedness that may well have proved to be the death of him.

Jacob Orgen was the son of highly religious Jewish parents, whom he shamed by becoming a labor slugger for Dopey Benny Fein shortly before the outbreak of World War I. Dopey Benny, the top labor racketeer of his day, carried out sluggings and murders both for unions seeking to recruit new members and terrorize strikebreakers and for employers attempting to intimidate workers and introduce strikebreakers. By 1915 effective police action had put Dopey Benny out of business, and for about four years thereafter, the labor slugging racket almost ceased. During that period of tranquility Little Augie returned to the bosom of his family and was accepted as a reformed sinner.

In 1919 Orgen, tired of leading an honest life, organized a gang called the Little Augies. At that time, labor slugging, which had recently resurfaced, and extortion of employers were controlled by the premier New York gangster of the day, Kid Dropper, who had attained his success after a savage war that culminated in the assassination of another leading mobster and killer, Johnny Spanish. Kid Dropper was notorious for not sharing any of his income and for leaving only scraps for the Little Augies of his entourage.

Augie learned the virtue of patience, slowly gathering around him some of the future big-name criminals of the era. Among those who flocked to his banner were Jack “Legs” Diamond, Gurrah Shapiro and Louis Lepke. By 1923 the Little Augies initiated open warfare with the Droppers, fighting vicious gun battles with them to control the wet wash laundry workers and, later, other groups of employees. In strength, firepower and reputation, Kid Dropper seemed invincible, but Orgen finally emerged victorious after convincing an unimportant and gullible hood named Louis Kushner that he could become a leading member of the gang by killing the Dropper. Kid Dropper, then in police custody for a minor charge, was being transferred by car from one court to another when Kushner walked up to the vehicle and shot Dropper through the windshield.

Little Augie and his lieutenants were arrested for the murder, but Kushner insisted he had done the whole thing on his own and proudly went off to prison for 20 years. Augie immediately took over the union slugging racket. However, after assuming power, he was constantly harassed by the police. Moreover, the racket was becoming less lucrative, as more sophisticated union leaders moved away from using such brash violence to achieve their goals. Lepke, who had gauged this decline, strongly urged Little Augie to move from working for unions and employers to seizing control of locals, milking their treasuries and exacting tribute from employers who wished to avoid strikes or operate nonunion shops.

Lepke saw the potential for untold riches in this method of operation, but Little Augie was moving more into bootlegging and was even thinking of retiring within a few years, with the hope that he could again win favor with his parents and family. He gave Lepke strict orders to stay away from union rackets and stick to bootlegging. Augie probably saw little reason to fear Lepke as long as he had the murderous Legs Diamond as a trusted bodyguard, but in October 1927 he was murdered as he was walking on Norfolk Street with Diamond at his side. It is to this day unclear whether Lepke was behind the murder or whether it was the work of bootlegging rivals.

Little Augie was buried in a satin-lined red coffin bearing a silver plate that read:

*JACOB ORGEN
Age 25 Years*

Actually, the gangster was 33 years old, but his father had considered him dead since 1919, the year he organized the Little Augies.

Oriental Saloon and Gambling House

Tombstone, Arizona Territory was long known as the nastiest mining town the frontier ever saw, and in Tombstone the place to go for drinking, fighting and shooting was the Oriental Saloon Gambling House. One Western chronicler estimated that “200 men held their last drink, poker hand or conversation in and around the Oriental’s precincts before being carted off to a resting place in Tombstone’s Boot Hill, their corpses filled with various bullet and buckshot holes.” While it might be difficult to verify such an estimate, there is no doubt that the Oriental was the site of some of the West’s most memorable, if pointless, gun duels. A case in point was the time Johnny Ringo invited Louis

Hancock to have a drink with him. "All right," Hancock said, "I'll have a beer." Whereupon Ringo replied: "No man drinks beer with me. I don't like beer." It was teeth-gritting time. "Well," Hancock said, "I like beer." And Ringo responded, "I don't." Hancock faced Ringo menacingly. "Barman," he said, "I'll have a beer." The two went for their guns and Hancock lost. They buried the loser holding a bottle of beer. Some historians have questioned that last touch, but Westerners liked their anecdotes tidy and the ending provided a nice conversation piece for the Oriental.

The Oriental's history began when Jim Vizina set up for business in a canvas tent with two wagonloads of whiskey. He later erected a building, which he eventually rented to Mike Joyce, who gave the Oriental a lavishness seldom found in Western saloons. The main gambling hall and bar were decorated sumptuously and a piano was hauled all the way from Denver through blazing heat, storms, flash floods and Apache country.

After being shot in the arm by Doc Holliday, Joyce sold out to a sharp operator named Lou Rickabaugh, who then gave Wyatt Earp a one-quarter interest in the Oriental. This was not as unselfish an act as it seemed. Once the deal was struck, Rickabaugh did not have to worry about getting shot up by Earp's friend Holliday or about providing security for the Oriental, which came under Earp's protection. The barman was a skilled gunslinger named Buckskin Frank Leslie. Two other proficient gunmen, Bat Masterson and Luke Short, ran gambling tables, and the Earp brothers and Holliday were often on the scene.

Clara Brown, a famous reporter of the era, visited Tombstone in 1880 to describe it from a woman's point of view. She called the town a hellhole but she was ecstatic about the Oriental. She wrote: "The Oriental is simply gorgeous. The mahogany bar is a marvel of beauty, the gaming rooms carpeted with Brussels, brilliantly lighted and furnished with the latest reading matter and fine writing materials for its patrons. Every evening there is the music of a violin and a piano, and the scene is most gay." Clearly, she was happy to find one haven amidst the wretchedness of Tombstone. The very day after Miss Brown left, the entertainment at the Oriental picked up. Rog King called Johnny Wilson a liar, as they stood at the bar, and emphasized his point by putting a .45 slug through Wilson's forehead.

The Oriental was such a prize money-maker it required firepower to keep it. In an attempt to seize control of the establishment, Johnny Tyler sent one of his ace gunslingers, Charlie Storms, to the Oriental for the express purpose of getting into a shoot-out. Storms picked on Luke Short, a little man but one of the West's deadliest duelists. They stopped outside where Storms announced, "I'll give you the first shot." That was just what Short had in mind, having already emptied his holster as Storms was uttering his offer. He fired three shots and then stepped over Storms' body on his way back into the Oriental to resume dealing faro. Shortly thereafter, Tyler learned of Earp's interest in the Oriental and backed off from further efforts to take over.

The Earps and Doc Holliday left Tombstone shortly after the gunfight at the O.K. Corral. Contrary to common belief today, it was not a voluntary departure, especially since it meant giving up the Oriental, but they were given strong hints to "git" and they got. The day of the vigilantes had not yet passed.

When the silver ran out, the Oriental died along with the town. The population of Tombstone dropped from 15,000 to a few hundred and the deserted saloon was stripped clean.

Osborne, George O. (1845–1926) Father of Prison Reform

The first prison warden to make wholesale changes in prison conditions, not simply to reduce cruelty but in an attempt to reform inmates was George O. Osborne. Warden of the New Jersey State Prison for more than 20 years in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, Osborne inaugurated a number of reforms that were widely adopted in succeeding years. Among these were establishment of prison schools with practical courses, improvements in the parole system and more emphasis on religious life. Osborne was perhaps the first warden to eliminate a number of dehumanizing practices found in virtually all prisons: the ball and chain, shaved heads, striped uniforms and so-called dark cells, or dungeons. Osborne's work earned him the title Father of Prison Reform. He died in retirement in Florida.

Osborne, Thomas Mott (1859–1926) prison reformer

Perhaps the greatest prison reformer in America in the 20th century, Thomas Mott Osborne was a successful manufacturer who left the business world to campaign for prison reform. "The prison must be an institution where every inmate must have the largest practical amount of individual freedom because," he said, quoting British statesman William Ewart Gladstone, "it is liberty alone that fits men for liberty."

Osborne was appointed to the New York State Commission on Prison Reform in 1913. To gain a better appreciation of the prisoners' lot, he spent a week inside Auburn Prison as inmate "Tom Brown." The following year he was appointed warden of Sing Sing, whose administration was subject to political influence and intrigue. Because he altered the status quo, Osborne's enemies had him indicted on a charge of perjury and neglect of duty, but the case was dismissed and he triumphantly returned to his post. At Sing Sing, Osborne introduced the Mutual Welfare League, which was to be widely imitated. Under it prisoners established their own system of discipline, were paid for their work and received improved recreational and job-training services. While Osborne's pioneer work drew praise from other penologists, he was constantly subjected to political criticism for "coddling criminals" and in 1917 he resigned his wardenship. Ironically, when Lewis E. Lawes became warden of Sing Sing, he instituted almost all of Osborne's ideas.

Osborne's three books, Within Prison Walls (1914), Society and Prisons (1916) and Prisons and Common Sense (1920), which answered the "coddling" charge, are considered classics of prison reform literature. One of Osborne's greatest contributions was his critical analysis of Richard L. Dugdale's famous but highly suspect study of the Juke family, in which Dugdale attempted to prove his theory of hereditary criminality. After Osborne's death in 1926, his work was continued by the Osborne Association of New York, a national organization dedicated to prison reform.

Oster gang counterfeiters

Among the great counterfeiting operations in this country, perhaps the most durable was a New Orleans band formed in 1872. The gang, which lasted almost 50 years, was organized by Phil Oster, who started counterfeiting money in his mid-twenties and was still at it in his mid-seventies. He was arrested many times, but invariably, within 24 hours of gaining his freedom, he would be back in business. Oster's last appearance in New Orleans, shortly before his death, took place in November 1917, when the Secret Service caught him with some excellent counterfeiting apparatus in his room on Bourbon Street. The old counterfeiter told a newspaper reporter:

I've been in the penitentiary five times. I've been pardoned as many times, and I'm proud of my record. I started making counterfeit money forty-five years ago. It took 'em fifteen years before they got me, and after I had made and spent enough money—if I had it now, well, there would be few, if any, men in New Orleans more wealthy.

Oswald, Lee Harvey (1939–1963) assassin of John F. Kennedy

At 12:30 P.M. on November 22, 1963, President John F. Kennedy was shot to death in Dallas, Tex. with a mail-order rifle belonging to Lee Harvey Oswald. Oswald was an employee of the Texas School Book Depository and, as such, had access to a sixth-floor window that provided a perfect vantage for the sniping. As the motorcade passed, Oswald apparently fired three times, killing Kennedy and badly wounding Texas Gov. John B. Connally, who was sitting directly in front of the president in the executive limousine.

Ever since, there has been a dispute over whether or not Oswald was the only gunman and whether additional shots were fired by others. Critics of the Warren Commission, which investigated the assassination and concluded that Oswald had acted alone, have insisted, with varying degrees of plausibility, that the commission's reconstruction of the events was based on fallacies and physical improbabilities such as the commission's theory that a single bullet hit both Kennedy and Connally.

After the shooting Oswald concealed his rifle among some crates and casually walked from the building. He went home, secured a pistol and went out again. When stopped by Dallas policeman J. D. Tippit, Oswald shot the police officer four times, killing him. He took refuge in a movie house without purchasing a ticket and was apprehended there by police officers. When approached by the officers, he pointed his gun at them but it misfired.

Oswald consistently denied having killed either Kennedy or Tippit, although several witnesses identified him as Tippit's killer and his palm print was found on the weapon used to kill Kennedy. A check into Oswald's background produced a picture of a misfit and an apparent on-again, off-again believer in communism. He had received a hardship discharge from the marines in 1959 because of an injury his mother had suffered, but he did not stay home long to help her. Instead, he traveled to the USSR using funds the source of which has never been identified. He gave up his American citizenship, went to work for the Soviets on radar installations and married the daughter of a KGB colonel. After two and a half years Oswald tired of life in the Soviet Union and decided to move back to America with his family. After obtaining a loan from the U.S. State Department, he returned and settled in New Orleans, where he seems to have divided his political affiliations between such diverse groups as the right-wing China Lobby and the left-wing Fair Play for Cuba Committee. He also had links with persons who were known conduits for arms and money provided by the CIA to counterinsurgency forces. Thus, Oswald may have been a Soviet agent, a CIA agent or plant or just a plain kook.

Oswald did not live long enough to provide an answer to that question or why he had killed the president. Two days after his apprehension he was shot to death by Jack Ruby, a Dallas nightclub operator, as police were transferring him to the county jail. The murder was shown live on television, as the media covered Oswald's movements. That such a valuable prisoner could be so easily assassinated was shocking and led to a bitter denunciation of Dallas law officials.

While the Warren Commission found that Oswald had acted alone in his assassination of the president and that Jack Ruby similarly had killed Oswald on his own, the controversy was not stilled. Dozens of books have been written attacking the conclusions of the commission, all pushing various conspiracy theories. New Orleans District Attorney James Garrison put forth the most fantastic claims of a vast plot to eliminate Kennedy from power.

In December 1978 the House Select Committee on Assassinations issued a report that challenged the Warren Commission's findings. Much of the committee's conclusions that Kennedy "was probably assassinated as a result of a conspiracy" was based on a study of the noises in Dallas' Dealey Plaza at the time of the murder. The acoustical study led the probers to conclude "the evidence established a high probability that two gunmen fired" at Kennedy that day. The panel said, however, that it was "unable to identify the other gunman or the extent of the conspiracy." Another conclusion, based on the evidence available, was that the Soviet Union, Cuba, organized crime or anti-Castro groups had not been involved. The committee flatly stated that none of the U.S. intelligence agencies—the CIA, the FBI or the Secret Service—were implicated. However, the agencies were criticized for their failings prior to and at the time of the assassination and during the ensuing probes.

At the time some members of the panel objected to the findings, protesting that they represented a rush to judgment precipitated by the acoustic evidence. After the panel's report, the matter was put in the hands of a new scientific panel that became known as the Committee of Ballistic Acoustics of the National Research Council and was funded by a grant from the National Science Foundation. Staffed by top-drawer experts from Harvard, MIT, the University of California, Columbia and Princeton as well as from research centers at Bell Telephone Laboratories, Xerox, IBM and Trisolar Corporation and an expert from the Firearms National Laboratory Center of the Department of the Treasury, the group concluded that there was no extra shot fired that would have suggested a conspiracy. The firm finding was, "The acoustic analyses impulses attributed to gunshots were recorded about one minute after the president had been shot and the motorcade had been instructed to go to the hospital."

It must be said, a number of conspiracy theorists conceded the point. However, others did not. A story made the rounds that they could not abandon their claims concerning the acoustics since they had written entire books on the premise. To concede the point meant their books would have to be moved from the nonfiction to the fiction shelves.

Similarly, conspiracy theorists who found Oswald innocent, or misused or framed, pointed to the staggering fate of so many material witnesses in the affair. In the three years following the Kennedy and Oswald murders, no fewer than 18 witnesses died. Six were shot to death, two committed suicide, three died in car accidents, one was killed by a karate blow to the neck, one bled to death from a throat slashing, three suffered fatal heart attacks and two expired from natural causes. The reserved London Sunday Times engaged an actuary to determine the mathematical probability of these occurrences. He concluded their odds were 100,000 trillion to one.

The newspaper killed the story after just one edition and amended its findings, most probably having gotten a storm of scientific protest. A spokesman for the Times later told the House Select Committee on Assassinations, that the claim was "a careless journalistic mistake and should not have been published. . . . There was no question our actuary having got his answer wrong."

He explained the actuary was asked about such a number of people out of the United States dying within a short period of time, to which he replied the odds were very high. However, if he had more correctly been asked about the odds of that happening from a pool based on the Warren Commission Index dying within a given period, the result would have been much lower. The newspaper's spokesman said, "Our mistake was to treat the reply to the former question as if it dealt with the latter—hence the fundamental error in our first edition report, for which we apologize."

Indeed, a chief researcher for the HSCA reported, "We had thus established the impossibility of attempting to establish, through the application of actuarial principles, any meaningful implications about the existence or absence of a conspiracy."

Despite the Sunday Times retraction and the Select Committee's findings, critics still cite the 100,000 trillion figure—typical is Robert J. Groden's 1993 book The Killing of a President, which sports a foreword by Oliver Stone, which used the Sunday Times figures with no reference to the newspaper's retraction—or at least claim the death rate is far above the norm. Of course, a supposedly abnormal death rate is a vital part of the thesis of Stone's movie, JFK.

It is rather easy to compile a collection of 100 theories that Oswald did not do it or most certainly, did not do it alone. The problem is that these theories are contradictory to one another, and that hardly makes the remaining one any more right than the 99 others.

Thus we are left with Oswald, a man frustrated with the idea that he was a failure and was sexually at odds with his wife. And we are left with the conclusion of Professor James W. Clarke in American Assassins: The Darker Side of Politics, which views Oswald as "a mercurial, anxiety-ridden young man who, the facts suggest, could have been turned away from his deadly assignment with a kind word and loving embrace."

Outlaw Exterminators, Inc. western bounty hunters

Five hard-riding, fast-shooting bounty hunters, dubbed Outlaw Exterminators, Inc. by the press because they never brought 'em back alive, contributed greatly to clearing the Arizona Territory of badmen in the 1870s and 1880s as anyone.

Clay Calhoun and Floyd Davis were deputy sheriffs, but the other three members of the group were part-timers—Ben Slack and Dick Hunter, cattlemen, and Fred Beeber, a bartender—who laid aside their mundane jobs whenever the prospects of a nice reward thundered across the mesa. Since rewards at the time were paid on a "dead or alive" basis, the Exterminators decided "dead" was easier and just as profitable.

The band's prize catch was probably bad John Allman, so-called Cavalry Killer who went on an orgy of murder in the Arizona Territory in 1877. When Clay Calhoun brought in Allman, the body contained four bullet holes: one in the groin, stomach, chest and mouth. The holes were in such a perfect line that Calhoun's story about a shoot-out was almost certainly a fabrication. More likely, the bounty hunter had killed Allman while the outlaw was asleep. But like the dozen-odd other victims of the Exterminators, Allman was not exactly popular and nobody worried much about such details. Despite numerous gunfights and the fact that they made a lot of enemies, the Exterminators lived out full lives, the last survivor, Clay Calhoun, dying on November 21, 1948, at the age of 97.

Owens, Commodore Perry (1852–1919) lawman

As a flamboyant lawman, Commodore Perry Owens—with blonde locks reaching almost to his waist, a wide-brimmed sombrero, hand-tooled chaps, a long-barreled Colt .45 and a gunbelt that held a double row of ammunition—put even Wild Bill Hickok to shame. At gun play, he surpassed anything the more famous Hickok ever achieved; in one classic Arizona gun battle, Owens killed three men and wounded another in less than a minute.

Born in Tennessee in 1852, he was christened in honor of naval hero Commodore Oliver H. Perry. After spending his youth in Indiana, he drifted west in his late teens to follow the cattle trails. By the time he rode into Apache County, Arizona Territory in 1881, he was a skilled gunman. Having earned a reputation for honesty, he was named sheriff in 1886. Apache County was rough country, an area of big cattle ranches like the Hashknife whose men enjoyed taking apart saloons, and the home of a tribe of Navaho, who engaged extensively in horse stealing. While he was able to keep both these elements under control, Owens had a major problem in quelling the Graham-Tewksbury feud.

On September 4, 1887 Owens rode into Holbrook in search of Andy Blevans, a member of the Graham faction who was wanted for horse stealing. When Owens found him on his porch and told him he was under arrest, Blevans ran in the house, slamming the door behind him. Andy fired one shot through the door before the sheriff's fatal answering blast knocked him across the room. Owens jumped from the porch just as brother John Blevans charged around the side of the house firing at him. The sheriff felled John with one shot and pivoted in time to shoot Moses Roberts, a brother-in-law of the Blevans, through the head. Almost at the same time, Sam Houston Blevans, the youngest of the three brothers, came out the door, but Owens cut him down before he could level his six-shooter. Of Owens' four victims, only John Blevans survived; he was sent to prison for five years.

The bloody shoot-out gained Owens a fine reputation, but over the next few years the public's opinion of him changed. The day of the gunfighter was passing, and a man who could or would kill so quickly and so efficiently was more to be feared than honored. In 1896 Owens quit, disgusted over the new attitude toward him. He lived out his days working non-descript jobs and drinking heavily. He died on May 10, 1919.

Packer, Alfred (1842–1907) cannibal

The person who became famous in Colorado as The Man Who Ate Democrats made his first recorded appearance on the Western scene as a prospector in southwestern Colorado; he was in his mid-twenties at the time. In 1873 Alfred Packer guided a party of 20 men from Salt Lake into the rugged San Juan Mountains. Described as a “tall man, with long, dark curling hair, dark mustache and goatee, deep set dark grey eyes,” Packer had a reputation of knowing Colorado as well as any man. Thus, it was surprising that, having brought the party to Chief Ouray’s camp on the Uncompahgre, near the Los Pinos Indian Agency, Packer rejected the chief’s advice against pushing on through the heavy snows. Because they offered to pay him well, Packer continued the trek with five men, Israel Swan, Frank Miller, Shannon Bell, George Noon (or Moon) and a man named Humphrey.

Some weeks later, Packer staggered back to Los Pinos, claiming his five companions had abandoned him when he became footsore and snowblind. Suspicion, however, buzzed around Packer. He was found in possession of a Wells Fargo draft belonging to one of his companions as well as the gun and skinning knife of another member of the party. He seemed to have money enough to spend freely at the bar. Perhaps the most damning comment reported came from Chief Ouray, who looked at Packer and grunted, “You too damn fat.”

Months later, search parties turned up the bodies of the five missing men. Four had had their skulls crushed, apparently while they slept, and the fifth appeared to have been shot after a struggle. Four of the skeletons had been totally stripped of flesh and the other was partially so. According to one of several stories that Packer then told, 60-year-old Swan had been the first to die of starvation when the party ran out of food, and the others had eaten him to stay alive. Next, Shannon Bell, Packer related, killed Humphrey to replenish the group’s food supply. Then Miller was murdered, and a few days later, Bell shot Noon. When Noon was finished, Bell tried to kill Packer, but the latter got him first. Packer said he carved off strips of Bell’s flesh to provide him with enough food to make it back to the agency.

Packer was found guilty of murder and sentenced to 40 years at hard labor. So awesome was his crime that he became a legend celebrated in story and song as The Man Who Ate Democrats, an accolade given him by the judge who leaned down from the bench and cried, “Packer, you depraved Republican son of a bitch, there were only five Democrats in Hinsdale County, and you ate them all!”

Packer served 17 years before being released. He died in 1907 at the age of 65.

Palmer Raids roundup of alleged Red subversives

Two headlines run by the Boston Herald in 1920 probably best reflected the anti-Red hysteria then sweeping the United States. They were “BOLSHEVIST PLAN FOR CONQUEST OF AMERICA!” and “BRIDE THINKS REDS KIDNAPPED MISSING GROOM.” In the post-World War I period, violent strikes swept the country and bombs were mailed to many prominent citizens, most of whom had a well-known antipathy toward organized labor. One bomb was sent to the attorney general, A. Mitchell Palmer. Although it exploded harmlessly on his stoop, Palmer swore revenge, determined to quash the impending “Bolshevik revolution.”

On New Year’s Day 1920 Palmer, who harbored strong presidential ambitions, utilized the wartime Sedition Act to authorize hundreds of agents to invade homes and union halls in 33 U.S. cities. More than 4,000 persons—American citizens and aliens alike—were swept up in the net. In some places individuals were kept in jail for up to a week without being charged. In Hartford, Conn. people who came to visit those arrested as suspected subversives were also placed under arrest, on the theory that they too were likely to be revolutionaries or “Bolshies.”

Palmer enjoyed considerable popular support but soon became embroiled with the legal community and various members of the Wilson administration over the capriciousness of his acts. Secretary of Labor William B. Wilson, authorized under the Sedition Act to deport anarchists or other advocates of the violent overthrow of the government, demanded fair hearings for the accused. The result was that the overwhelming majority was released because of the total lack of evidence. Although Palmer had assured the public that an insurrection was virtually at hand, the menacing horde had yielded but three pistols and nary a bomb. Undeterred, Palmer pressed on with his fight, warning that radicals were planning a nationwide uprising on May Day, 1920. When the day passed quietly, Palmer’s star began to wane, although he continued to make loud noises for many months and was instrumental in the deportation of some 600 aliens, including anarchists Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman.

Historians Charles and Mary Beard in The Rise of American Civilization offer two conclusions concerning the Palmer Red Raids:

The first is that not a single first-class German spy or revolutionary workingman was caught and convicted of an overt act designed to give direct aid and comfort to the enemy. The second is that, as in England during the period of the French revolution, the occasion of the war which called for patriotic duties was seized by emotional conservatives as an opportunity to blacken the character of persons whose opinions they feared and hated.

Panamint City, California lawless mining town

Born in the California silver boom of 1872, Panamint City had four lusty years of existence, during which it became known as a suburb of hell.

Located in a box canyon in the Panamint Mountains just west of Death Valley, Panamint was virtually inaccessible other than by a narrow trail between towering walls of rock. But for the silver find, it would never have existed. Wells Fargo soon wished it didn’t exist; stages and bullion shipments were held up with such regularity that finally even that hardy express company declined to handle Panamint’s business. In time, the locals solved the problem by casting the bullion into gigantic balls that could only be moved down the canyon at an extremely slow pace. Seizing the bullion in this form was pointless, since robbers couldn’t move the loot fast enough to evade capture.

Panamint, set between confining canyon walls, was a one-street town about a mile long. Within its narrow boundaries all the evils of a wild mining town were contained. There were at least 40 gambling halls and a somewhat greater number of saloons, with much of the rest of the real estate taken up by institutions such as Madame Martha Camp’s fancy bordello and an uncounted number of cribs operated by free-lance bawds.

Legend has it that Madame Camp’s establishment had a silver plaque to mark the spot where a character named Barstow expired from three bullet wounds inflicted by Bill McAllister, the owner of the Snug Saloon, in a dispute over who would be the first to enjoy the favors of one of the madam’s new arrivals. The Oriental and Dexter saloons were famous for their shoot-outs. Patrons of the adjoining establishments had to face the disconcerting possibility that lead fired in one saloon might penetrate the walls and kill an imbibor in the other. To solve this problem, the two managements jointly installed a wall of sheet iron between their premises so that a man hit in the Oriental could be sure it was Oriental lead and vice versa.

The silver boom in Panamint was short-lived, the veins starting to run out in 1875. In 1876 a flash flood destroyed the town.

panel house brothel specializing in robbing customers

The panel house, a bordello designed more for robbery than for prostitution, may not have been an American invention, but its operation was certainly raised to a fine art in this country. In these dens, sliding panels were installed in doors and walls so that a prostitute’s customer could be robbed while he was otherwise occupied. A chair for the customer’s clothing would be placed right near a panel. If the man deposited his clothes elsewhere, a hooked pole was used to retrieve them. One advantage of the operation was that the prostitute normally could not be charged with robbery, since she clearly had not done the robbing.

PANTAGES rape trials

A 19th-century print warns readers to beware of panel houses.

A New York and Philadelphia madam named Moll Hodges, who operated during the 1850s and 1860s, is generally credited with becoming the first panel house operator. In 1865 Lizzie Clifford, a former employee of Moll Hodges in New York, opened a panel house in Chicago, and by 1890 there were an estimated 200 such establishments in that city. A police report in 1896 calculated the amount of money stolen in Chicago panel houses at $1.5 million a year. For several years complaints of such robberies came in at the rate of 50 to 100 every 24 hours. The establishments were finally eliminated around 1900 thanks to the efforts of a single Chicago police detective, Clifton Wooldridge, a colorful and resourceful character who came up with the idea of arresting the property owners who rented buildings to the panel houses operators. No property owner appears to have been imprisoned, but as police bore down on them, the practice came to a quick end.

Pantages rape trials Hollywood frame-up scandal

He was called Alexander the Great, perhaps a remarkable sobriquet for Alexander Pantages, who emigrated from Athens, Greece, and worked as a shoeshine and newspaper boy. Although he could hardly read or write English, through cunning, hard work and a moderate stroke of luck, Pantages made a small fortune in the Alaska gold rush around the turn of the 20th century. That gave him enough of a stake to become a leading force in the American entertainment industry.

He bought a run-down Seattle theater and staged vaudeville entertainments. He was so adept at this, he soon accumulated 60 very profitable theaters. Early on he grasped the enormous profits to be gained by use of Thomas Edison's motion picture projector, and he added movies to his theaters to complement his stage shows. In the 1920s, Pantages merged his theaters with those of Radio-Keith-Orpheum (RKO) into one of the richest theatrical operations in America. Pantages became a true financial powerhouse; when he talked many in Hollywood listened and even quaked.

Slight at 128 pounds, the 54-year-old Pantages knew how to run roughshod over other Hollywood giants and made scores of enemies. One primary example was Joseph Kennedy, the father of the future U.S. president. Joe Kennedy was eager to become an important Hollywood player. He had a relatively small-potatoes investment in a studio—FBO Pictures—and if he could buy the Pantages chain, he could realize his ambitions.

Kennedy approached Pantages with a buyout offer. By that time—the late 1920s—Pantages had at least mastered broken English, had no interest in selling his theaters to Kennedy, but, he said, according to Hollywood scuttlebutt, “I sella you a ticket.”

Pantages was well known as a womanizer and had a casting couch on which many would-be starlets secured performances in his stage shows and perhaps the movies. Following his affront to Kennedy, Pantages became mired in scandal.

A 17-year-old stagestruck high-school dropout, Eunice Pringle, claimed Pantages had raped her in his office, or more exactly in a janitor's broom and mop closet in the office. The Hearst and Chandler newspapers had a field day with the story, as well as the subsequent trial with its graphic details of how the alleged rape was carried out. At the trial the newspapers discovered “the sweetest 17 since Clara Bow” and “a full-blown beauty,” “An Innocent Defiled.” Descriptions of Pantages offered different characterizations. He was “The Great God Pan” . . . “His Foreign Goatedness Caught Out!” . . . “Lechery Exposed” . . .

Pringle appeared at the trial as “Miss Innocent” from Central Casting. She had a long bowed pigtail, a blue dress with Dutch collar and cuffs, black stockings, black felt “Mary Jane” shoes, gloves and a wee purse. She could have passed, observers agreed, for 12 or 13. And she sobbed throughout her testimony.

The defense was handled by a young Jerry Giesler, who would become Hollywood's most flamboyant and effective defense lawyer. Giesler ridiculed Pringle's story of the rape—that the frail Pantages held her mouth with his right hand, knocked her to the floor, managed to undress himself and rip away her clothing with his left hand alone without the healthy girl being able to get away. Pervading this line was the fact that Pantages could easily have had sex with any number of willing females any day of his choice.

To break down Pringle's Mary Jane pose, Giesler insisted she wear the outfit she had on when the alleged attack took place. Pringle appeared before the jury in a provocative red dress, clinging and low cut, fully made up and looking very much the sexy female rather than the virginal little girl. Then Giesler sought to introduce evidence that Pringle was a sexual sophisticate who lived "in sin" with her agent, dancer Nick Dunaev, a man reputed to skate on the line between right and wrong, and that she had sexual affairs with many other men. However, the judge ruled such matters irrelevant.

After being deadlocked for some time, the jury voted to convict, and the judge sentenced Pantages to 50 years in San Quentin. Giesler appealed the conviction on the basis that the judge had prevented him from presenting vital evidence and that three women jurors claimed they had been pressured into voting to convict. The California Supreme Court ordered a new trial.

This time around the jury found Pantages not guilty. One juror described how the panel had gone through the process of "eliminating the witnesses we believed had not told the truth until we got to the testimony we felt was acceptable." None of the jurors believed Pringle's testimony.

Pantages left San Quentin a free man, his reputation restored. In Hollywood there was much speculation whether Pringle and Dunaev were capable of concocting the fake story on their own. There was strong belief that someone else was behind the plot, and that person was named in private but not in print.

Some years later when Pringle was on her deathbed, she confessed that Joe Kennedy was behind the frame-up and that besides paying her and Dunaev he had promised that after he had absorbed Pantages' empire, he would take care of Pringle by making her a star performer on the Pantages circuit.

Panzram, Carl (1891–1930) mass murderer

Among America's most vicious mass murderers, Carl Panzram was a study in hatred and violence, a self-confessed killer of 21 persons and sodomizer of at least 1,000.

Panzram's first arrest came at the age of eight, when he was charged with being drunk and disorderly in his native Minnesota. Many of his early years were spent in correctional facilities, where the brutal treatment he received almost guaranteed that his vicious instincts would blossom. By the time he completed a term in Fort Leavenworth Prison in 1910, he said, "All the good that may have been in me had been kicked and beaten out of me long before." Thereafter, Panzram spent his life robbing, sodomizing and killing his victims. He did time in various institutions and frequently escaped.

Panzram said, "I don't believe in man, God nor devil. I hate the whole damned human race including myself." Many of his crimes were done in revenge for the treatment he had received behind bars. At the Montana State Training School he had been beaten on the bare back, legs and buttocks with a baseball bat; at Leavenworth Prison he had been chained across the chest and by the arms and left dangling for hours; at the Oregon State Prison he had been chained naked to a wall and given the water hose treatment with such force that his eyes blackened, his genitals swelled enormously and his body welted all over. Also at Oregon he had been tortured with the "humming bird," which involved placing an inmate in a steel bathtub filled with water, chaining him hand and foot and rubbing him down with a sponge electrified by a battery.

If such treatment was intended to reform Panzram, it failed miserably. Each time he got free, he robbed, sodomized and murdered.

Finally in 1928 Panzram was sentenced to Leavenworth for burglary and murder, whereupon he announced, "I'll kill the first man who bothers me." On June 20, 1929 Panzram bashed in the skull of the prison laundry foreman. Sentenced to death for the murder, he was incensed when the Society for the Abolishment of Capital Punishment sought a commutation for him, citing as one of its arguments Panzram's previous mistreatment. Panzram wrote to President Herbert Hoover insisting on his "constitutional rights" to be hanged. As for the reformers, he said, "I wish you all had one neck, and I had my hands on it. . . . I believe the only way to reform people is to kill them."

On September 5, 1930 Panzram went to the gallows. When the hangman asked him if he had anything to say, he replied: "Yes, hurry it up, you Hoosier bastard! I could hang a dozen men while you're fooling around!" He spat twice at his executioner before the trap was pulled.

Pardon and amnesty

The power to pardon or offer amnesty or commutation of sentence resides with the president of the United States and the governors of the states, within their specific jurisdictions, although in a number of states the pardoning power is shared between the chief executive and a council or board of pardons.

Commutation, or the reduction of a sentence to a less severe one, is the most common modification of a criminal penalty, but it does not wipe away guilt in the eyes of the law. In the past, many governors have used this power to change death sentences to life imprisonment. A pardon, on the other hand, excuses the person from all penalties and often indicates removal of guilt and restoration of the full rights and privileges of citizenship. President George Washington established the broad precedent when he granted a blanket pardon, or amnesty, to all those involved in the Whiskey Rebellion provided they swore allegiance to the government. In individual cases James Madison pardoned, reluctantly, Jean Lafitte and all his pirates who could prove they had fought with Andrew Jackson at the Battle of New Orleans; Warren G. Harding pardoned labor leader and Socialist Eugene V. Debs, who was imprisoned for opposing World War I; and President Gerald Ford granted a full pardon to former President Richard M. Nixon for all federal offenses he might have committed in office. President Ford also offered limited amnesty to about 28,500 Vietnam war draft evaders provided they return to the United States and perform up to two years of some community work. Some observers feel the latter move was intended to make the Nixon pardon more acceptable.

In the past pardons were most frequently used as a way to rectify judicial wrongs, offering the simplest way for innocent persons to be restored to freedom and the rights of citizenship. In practice, pardons have been used as a method of extending mercy to convicted persons believed to have suffered sufficient punishment. At times, this use of pardons had brought charges of corruption or misuse of power. Such misuse was alleged against retiring Gov. Ray Blanton of Tennessee in January 1979, during the final days of his administration, when Blanton outraged the public and stunned state officials by granting pardons to or drastically reducing the sentences of 52 prisoners, including 24 convicted murderers.

Among those released were a 32-year-old man who had shot his ex-wife and her lover 18 times, reloading his two-shot derringer eight times to do so; two men who had tortured a cabbie for a whole night before shooting him to death, and a woman who had poisoned her mother and father-in-law by spiking their Jell-O with arsenic. Because it was feared that Blanton would release even more felons, Lamar Alexander, the governor-elect, took office three days earlier than had been scheduled. Meanwhile, Nashville's country music industry memorialized Blanton's deeds in a tune that swept Tennessee:

*Pardon me, Ray
Are you the cat that signs the pardons?
Cause you're an old friend of mine
Just put your name on the line.
Double-murder and rape
That's all the jury put me in for.
And I'm sure you'll agree
They took advantage of me.*

Parish, Frank (?–1864) outlaw

When the Montana Vigilance Committee was in its prime, Frank Parish was one of its less important victims, but one whose final word spoiled the intended effect of his execution.

The vigilantes had no evidence connecting Parish with any crimes, but they nonetheless voted to hang him one day in January 1864 along with five other proven criminals. In their deliberations the vigilantes thought it would be wise to hang one man with a bad reputation even though he was not known to have committed any crimes. Such a “preventive hanging” would serve as an example for others, they reasoned. Since Parish associated with the wrong sort of people and was an “outsider,” he was regarded as well cast for such an object lesson. The point of the plan, however, was lost when Parish used his last moments to confess his sins, including livestock theft and a $2,500 stagecoach robbery the year before. To their disappointment, the vigilantes discovered they were hanging just another guilty man.

Parker, Bonnie See BONNIE AND CLYDE.

Parker, Ellis (1873–1940) detective

Often referred to as the county detective with a worldwide reputation and the Cornfield Sherlock, Ellis Parker, as chief of detectives of Burlington County, N.J., was one of this country's leading investigators. Over a career that spanned four decades, he solved thousands of crimes—226 murder mysteries out of 236—using a combination of scientific detection methods and brilliant deductive reasoning. His reputation was such that homicide investigators in all parts of the country asked his advice when stumped on a case. Often, Parker would decide during the early part of an investigation who the guilty party was and stubbornly pursue only that party. In his stubbornness he was almost always right, but his career was to end in shambles because of one case in which he was wrong.

One of Parker's key tenets was that professional criminals always have alibis whereas innocent persons often do not. He once quickly solved the murder of a soldier at Fort Dix, N.J. in a case that involved well over 100 soldiers as likely suspects. Three months after the soldier's disappearance, his body was found. After it was established that he had been murdered, the soldiers in his outfit were asked to come up with alibis and only one was readily able to do so. Parker found it difficult to believe anyone could remember what he had been doing that far back. So he immediately concentrated on that soldier, produced holes in his alibi and developed enough evidence to charge him with the crime and obtain a confession.

In 1920 Parker solved the David Paul murder, a case that students of crime consider to be a classic example of detective logic. When Camden County, N.J. authorities couldn't solve the case, they asked Parker to help. Paul, a 60-year-old runner for a Camden bank, had disappeared with a pouch containing about $100,000 in cash and securities; the logical assumption was that he had absconded. His friends said they had not seen him since the night before his disappearance. Then, 11 days after his disappearance, Paul's body was found in a shallow grave near a stream. Mysteriously, while the ground around the corpse was dry, Paul's overcoat and clothing were sopping wet. He had been shot through the head, and a medical examination showed he had been dead from 48 to 72 hours. It now appeared that Paul actually had absconded with the money and was later killed for it by others or that he had been kidnapped at the start but was kept alive for eight or nine days before being killed.

Stubbornly, Parker refused to accept this latter theory. He was convinced Paul had been murdered eight or nine days earlier than the date set by the medical examination and soon came to believe the solution lay in Paul's wet clothes. At this point the police theorized that Paul's killers, probably unsure about whether the gunshot had killed him, had made certain he was dead by "drowning" his body in a nearby stream, Bread and Cheese Run. Parker found that illogical and stupid and said so. Finally, he discovered there were a number of tanning factories upstream from where the body was found. That gave him the key. He had a chemical analysis made of the water from the stream and learned it had a high percentage of tannic acid, enough to act as a preservative on a human body, so that after a week or more in the water it would show hardly any sign of decomposition.

Now, Parker could zero in on Paul's friends, especially on two men named Frank James and Raymond Schuck, both of whom had alibis for the time when the medical examination estimated the murder had taken place. James had been in a convention in Detroit and Schuck had gone downstate to stay with friends for several days. It was another case of criminals having alibis, according to Parker's pet theory. But they had no alibis for the real time of death, which they had gone to such great lengths to try to hide. That and the fact they had spent a considerable amount of money right after Paul's disappearance strengthened the case against them. Both later confessed and went to the electric chair.

The Lindbergh kidnapping proved to be Parker's last case. A vain man, he was offended when authorities who had so often relied on him failed to ask for his help in solving the nation's most important case. Partisan politics in the state administration and in the state police force were partly responsible. Parker brooded over this snub and then exploded to reporters about the incompetence of the investigation. When Bruno Hauptmann was arrested for the kidnapping, Parker stubbornly held to the theory that he was the wrong man and that the real culprit was a Trenton man named Paul Wendel.

In his investigations Parker had often broken into the homes and offices of suspects in the search for clues. In the Lindbergh case he went even further, actually kidnapping Wendel and holding him captive in various hideaways in Brooklyn, New York City and parts of New Jersey until he extracted a "confession." In court Wendel was able to repudiate the so-called confession, and Parker was open to a federal charge of abduction. He was convicted and sentenced to six years in federal prison and died in confinement in 1940, while a number of his admirers were conducting a campaign to get him a presidential pardon.

Parker, Isaac C. "Hanging Judge" (1838–1896)

The famous "hanging judge" of Arkansas, Isaac Parker was named to the federal bench in 1875 by President Ulysses S. Grant after serving four years as the Republican congressman from Missouri. During the first session of his court, which lasted eight weeks, he tried 91 defendants, including 18 for murder. Of the latter, 15 were convicted, and of these, eight got long prison terms, one was shot trying to escape and the remaining six were sentenced to death. When pronouncing the death sentences, Parker bowed his head and declared: "I do not desire to hang you men. It is the law." Then he started weeping. In time, people came to realize that Judge Parker really enjoyed weeping.

The jurisdiction of his court was the Western District of Arkansas, including the crime-ridden Indian Territory. Over the next 21 years, Parker would sentence 172 persons to death, 88 of whom were executed. Parker's will in the remaining cases was frustrated by presidential pardons and by the acts of other judicial officials. His record of imposing the death sentence was unequaled by any other jurist. Those defending Parker have always claimed that his was a rough jurisdiction and, consequently, a rough court. While 88 men were hanged, no less than 65 of his deputy marshals, "the men who rode for Parker," were killed in the performance of their duty. As a judge, Parker leaned more toward the Bible's eye-for-an-eye precept than toward the finer points of American jurisprudence.

He clearly let everyone in his court, especially the jurors, know where he stood during a case. "I have been accused of leading juries," he once remarked. "I tell you a jury should be led! If they are guided they will render justice. They must know that the judge wants enforcement of the law." Parker's juries certainly knew. The conviction ratio in his court, again a record, was about 8,600 convictions to 1,700 acquittals, or an astonishing 5 to 1.

The one charge he was absolutely rigid on was murder. While hanging was not the only possible sentence for this offense, it was the one Parker insisted on. He would, of course, weep while passing sentence and then weep again as he watched the hanging from the window of his chambers—but he always watched. It would be difficult to read through Parker's sentencing speeches without detecting a strong sense of sadism. Multiple hangings became common and thousands flocked to see three, four, five or even six men do their "dance of death" under the watchful eye of George Maledon, Parker's trusty hangman. Such exhibitions brought Parker nationwide publicity; what surprised him was that very little of it was favorable. His court was referred to as the Court of the Damned, and legal authorities demanded his conduct be tempered.

After 1889 the Supreme Court for the first time allowed appeals from Parker's Indian Territory court, and the results were astonishing. Of 46 doomed persons whose cases reached the High Court, 30 were found to have had unfair trials; of these, 16 were later acquitted and the rest received only prison terms. At one point the Supreme Court informed Parker that the rules of evidence were the same in all parts of the country, despite his well-known concern for rigorous law enforcement in his particular jurisdiction. Angrily, Parker responded, in an interview in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, "During the twenty years that I have engaged in administering the law here, the contest has been one between civilization and savagery being represented by the intruding criminal class." Parker railed on, expressing criticism still heard today, about "the laxity of the Courts" and the Supreme Court's preoccupation with the "flimsiest technicalities." In a sense, Parker was in the same category as the old gunfighter of the West, who also could not see that his day had passed.

Even as Parker held their life in the balance, prisoners began to sneer back at the judge. In 1895 he was about to embark on one of his dramatic death-sentence pronouncements when the defendant, a bandit named Henry Starr, broke in:

Don't try to state me down, old Nero. I've looked many a better man than you in the eye. Cut out the rot and save your wind for your next victim. If I am a monster, you are a fiend, for I have put only one man to death, while almost as many men have been slaughtered by your jawbone as Samson slew with the jawbone of that other historic ass.

Parker was struck speechless, for in a sense what had just happened reflected the change in his court over the past two decades. He sentenced Starr to death, but the case was later reversed by the Supreme Court. Finally, in 1895 Congress had had enough and removed the Indian Territory from Parker's jurisdiction. Parker became ill and died before the formal transfer of authority took place.

In the Fort Smith jail news of his death was greeted with jubilation: yet a number of distinguished citizens throughout the country came forward to praise Parker as the greatest judge in the history of the West. Among those with the highest praise for the Hanging Judge were the Indians under his jurisdiction, and a chief of the Creeks attended his funeral. The Indians, like many whites of earlier years, understood the justice Parker imposed.

Parker, William H. (1902–1966) Los Angeles police chief For 16 years, until his death in 1966, Chief William H. Parker led the Los Angeles Police Department, shaping it into what many reformers regarded as the nation's preeminent law enforcement agency. Although he was a crusty cop and often accused of "shooting from the lip," Parker was, in his time, probably the most-respected law enforcement official in the country after J. Edgar Hoover, and his views on law enforcement, Parker on Police, became required reading for officers in all parts of the country.

Parker, a teetotaler and nonsmoker, joined the force at the age of 25 and later won a law degree studying at night. Not well liked by other officers in what was then a pretty loose department, Parker nonetheless rose rapidly, becoming chief in 1950. It was a position with less than glowing prospects; the average tenure of his predecessors was 18 months. Parker lasted 16 years, through three city administrations, and was still going strong when struck by a fatal heart attack.

He did much to raise the level of professionalism and efficiency of his officers. Parker set a minimum IQ of 110 for members of the force. A survey in 1965, a year before his death, showed the department had one officer with a doctorate, 15 with master's degrees, 15 with law degrees, 208 with bachelor's degrees, 228 with two-year college certificates, 375 with police academy diplomas and 2,000 officers taking college courses. This was a level of educational achievement that few police departments of any size had attained. Chief Parker created TV's "Dragnet" image and firmly believed his men were carrying it out.

After the Watts riots Martin Luther King remarked that "there is a unanimous feeling that there has been police brutality," a statement that incensed Parker. In 1962 a Civil Rights Commission delegation investigating the riots was unable to cite any specific evidence of flagrant physical brutality by the police. A frequent charge by blacks at the time was that most of the officers were southerners, but in fact, the vast majority were from the West Coast.

Chief Parker produced a wholesome improvement in his police department and thanks to his efforts the Los Angeles police were rated near the top of any list of good big-city police forces.

Parkhurst, Reverend Charles H. (1842–1933) reformer

In the 1890s the chief spokesman against all forms of urban vice, especially police corruption, was the Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, head of the Society for the Prevention of Crime in New York City.

After preaching in New England for a number of years, Parkhurst became pastor of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church in 1880. He attracted very little attention until 1892, when he delivered a blistering sermon against New York City's municipal government in general and Tammany Hall in particular, denouncing the men who ran them as "a lying, perjured, rum-soaked and libidinous lot." Parkhurst also lashed out at the police department for giving protection to and making profit from the city's racketeers, gamblers and prostitutes. He thundered, "While we fight iniquity, they shield or patronize it. While we try to convert criminals, they manufacture them."

When the New York World printed almost the entire sermon, Parkhurst's charges took the city by storm. Astonishingly, much of the newspapers' comments about him were unfavorable. The press and various public officials demanded substantiation of his charges, and the following week, when he was hauled before a grand jury, he was ridiculed because he could not present legal evidence to back up his charges. In the end, the grand jury denounced the clergyman for making unfounded charges.

The experience, however, did not silence Parkhurst, who was determined to gather all the evidence he needed by going disguised into the devil's den. With the aid of a private detective, Parkhurst transformed himself into a dandy who could pass without suspicion. The private detective who accompanied Parkhurst related, in a pamphlet called The Doctor and the Devil, that "Dr. Parkhurst was a very hard man to satisfy. 'Show me something worse,' was his constant cry. He really went at his slumming work as if his heart was in his tour." A case in point was Parkhurst's visit to Hattie Adams' brothel on 27th Street near Fifth Avenue, where he and the detective hired five girls to perform a "dance of nature." Parkhurst and the detective seemed to get into the spirit of things by engaging in a game of leapfrog with the young ladies, an incident that caused considerable consternation among Parkhurst's parishioners and led to a ribald tune that became extremely popular. It went:

*Dr. Parkhurst on the floor
Playing leapfrog with a whore,
Ta-ra-ra-Boom-de-ay
Ta-ra-ra-Boom-de-ay.*

The detective provided earnest assurances that the clergyman removed none of his clothing other than his hat and permitted none of the usual variations in this form of recreation. Indeed, during most of the exercise, the detective assured his readers, "the Doctor sat in a corner with an unmoved face, watching us and slowly sipping at a glass of beer."

When on Sunday March 13, 1892 Dr. Parkhurst preached his second sermon on vice and corruption, he was armed with a number of affidavits from private detectives to back up his charges. Despite the feelings of some that he had demeaned his cloth by his visits to such awful dens of iniquity, his charges could not be ignored and led directly to the famed Lexow and Mazet committees, which based much of their evidence on Parkhurst's findings. In the wave of reform, 14 police officers were indicted or dismissed and many more resigned. Reformers swept into office over Tammany Hall candidates, but the movement proved short-lived. By 1897 Tammany forces were back in power, and they celebrated their victory with an all-night torchlight parade, featuring anti-Parkhurst signs and snake-dancing men and women who chanted, "Well, well, well, reform has gone to hell!"

Parkhurst continued his fight against crime, vice and corruption, and his efforts were very much responsible for the removal from office of Chief of Police Big Bill Devery. Parkhurst retired as a preacher in 1918, and in 1930, at the age of 90, he was honored by a gathering of leading new reformers. He called for the overthrow of the "new Tammany," which he denounced for being as corrupt as the forces he had exposed in the 1890s.

PARKS, Robert F

Parkhurst lived long enough to watch the Seabury Investigations confirm his charges. He died in 1933 after plunging from his second-floor bedroom window while sleepwalking.

Parks, Robert F. (1910–1950) alleged murder victim

Police files are filled with examples of attempts to make murders seem like accidents, but there also have been cases in which accidents have appeared to be murders, resulting in the near conviction of innocent persons. The death of Robert F. Parks in 1950 is often cited by criminologists as a case in point. On the night of February 13 police in Luray, Va. were summoned to the Parks home, where they found Parks, a former army captain, dead in a bedroom, an open door of which led to the dining room. He had been shot, and because of the absence of powder burns and the direction in which the bullet had entered his body, it appeared that Parks couldn't have shot himself. A bullet had gone through his right arm, passed through his heart and halted in his right side. In the dining room the police found an automatic pistol lying against the far wall from the bedroom door. A cartridge case had jammed in the gun.

Given the circumstantial evidence, the tale Mrs. Parks told was not very convincing. "I was in the kitchen," she said, "when I heard the shot. I ran to the bedroom and Bob was standing there. He looked at me and said, 'Honey, the gun backfired.' And then he fell."

Because the statement didn't square with deductions the police had made about the shooting and because evidence was found that the couple had had violent arguments on a number of occasions, Mrs. Parks was charged with murdering her husband. In all likelihood, the case would have been handled as a typical domestic quarrel leading to homicide had not a sharp-eyed policeman noticed a fresh dent on a metal grille over a hot-air duct in the doorway between the two rooms. The brown paint on the grille had been chipped, and there was brown paint on the rear of the gun slide.

The police sent everything—gun, bullet, cartridge case and grille—to the FBI laboratory. There, experiments showed that the gun would go off if it was dropped on the rear part of the slide and hammer if that part of the gun hit against something. The brown paint on the grille and the gun slide proved to be identical, and the indentations in the grille could have been made by the rear sight and knurling of the hammer. When scientists fitted the rear sight and hammer into the markings on the grille, it was obvious that in the Parks home the gun would be pointing in the direction of the bedroom where Parks had been standing.

The truth was now apparent. Parks had managed to kill himself accidentally. In an apparent fit of temper, he had thrown the gun against the grille and it had fired, hitting Parks. The gun had then dropped to the floor and slid across the dining room, coming to rest against the far wall from the bedroom.

The murder charge against Mrs. Parks was dismissed.

parole

Of the 200,000-plus adults confined in the nation's prisons about 140,000 are eligible for parole in any given year. Approximately 50,000 are granted parole annually, and almost two-thirds will be paroled before completion of their sentences. Parole is, in a manner of speaking, American in origin in that English felons, beginning in the 1650s, were granted early release from their prison sentences provided they went to America, where they were sold to the highest bidders as indentured servants. In effect, this was a parole system. Our contemporary parole system developed out of the concept of "good time" laws, which shortened prisoners' sentences for good behavior. This led to the introduction of indeterminate-term sentences (e.g., one to 10 years) with the opportunity for release before completion of the sentence. Under this system, which began about 1870 and still exists, the prisoner was required to adhere to certain rules after his release and was subjected to supervision.

Within a half century the system of parole became an ingrained part of all American prison systems. Invariably, when concern over crime has risen, attacks on the parole system have increased. Edward R. Hammock, chairman of the New York State Parole Board, said the public has a "silly notion" that such a board "releases criminals back into the community willy-nilly. It's not true but we're still getting the blame for the fact that people don't feel safe on their streets and in their parks."

Experts insist the idea that parolees commit a great number of new crimes is false. In New York state in 1979 only 3.4 percent were returned to prison for committing new crimes while on parole. Another 8.5 percent were sent back for parole violations. This compares favorably with the overall figure of 30 percent of all ex-prisoners being sent back to prison within five years of their release. Despite these statistics, the parole system is under stronger attack now than at any time during the last 50 years. There has been an obvious shift in national opinion about the method and purpose of sentencing. Concluding that prisons simply do not rehabilitate, more and more judges, prosecutors and even penologists now insist that if criminals cannot be reformed, they should be given uniform, predictable jail sentences and kept off the streets until they have paid for their crimes. Of course, this theory raises the problem of prisons becoming even more crowded and more costly to maintain without much assurance that the public will really be any safer. By 1980 the number of inmates in state prisons had doubled in less than 10 years. "But we're still scared to get on the subway at night," chairman Hammock noted.

In the final analysis, the parole system will probably survive because of recognition that its screening process and supervision of released convicts provides a measure of control over ex-prisoners that would be abolished by a system of fixed jail terms.

Parrot pimp

For some 25 years around the end of the 19th century, Carrie Watson's brothel at 441 South Clark in Chicago was famed for its beautiful inmates, its luxurious trappings and its high prices. So renowned was the resort that Carrie Watson never had a need to advertise. There were no red curtains on the windows and certainly no red light over the doorway. However, Miss Watson did feel a need to add a touch of homey distinction to her premises, so she placed an expensive trained parrot in a cage outside the door. This hustler, who soon was dubbed the Parrot Pimp, would beckon: "Carrie Watson. Come in, gentlemen."

parsley racket underworld extortion method

One of the underworld's fastest growing, if little-known, rackets is the parsley shakedown. For years in New York many Manhattan restaurants have been forced to buy mob parsley to use as a garnish for their meals. In addition to serving it with meats and salads, they have been under considerable pressure to put it in some mixed drinks as well.

As the price was jacked up from 5¢ to 40¢ a bunch, some restaurateurs found their parsley tab amounting to $150 a month. In the early 1980s a number of restaurant owners hit on a money-saving tactic. Since most diners simply shoved aside the greenery, they ordered busboys to put the parsley aside, and then it was washed for reuse.

This affront to good health and the Mafia caused considerable anguish to a 75-year-old mafioso known to New York restaurateurs as Un Occhio, or One Eye, a name given him because of an injury suffered back in 1934 in the bombing of an East Side bakery. Un Occhio, who handled both parsley and murders for the mob out of his East Harlem headquarters, walked into a few restaurants and expressed outrage at this disgraceful recycling of parsley. On the spot one steak house owner ordered 150 new bunches. New York Daily News columnist Jimmy Breslin commented, "That night, as they will forever, the steak house and all other midtown restaurants served meals that appeared to be growing lawns."

There has never been much doubt that New York's fondness for parsley will eventually spread around the country. At the same time the mob squashed the parsley rebellion in Manhattan, the Montana State Crime Control Commission was investigating the bombings of two restaurants in Butte. The commission reported it had intelligence that a New York "parsley king" was involved in the bombings.

Un Occhio is reported to control vast acres of parsley in Ventura County, Calif. that can be cut five times a year, enough to feed not only New York but a green-hungry nation.

Pat Lyon at the Forge painting of accused criminal

Virtually none of the visitors to Boston's Museum of Fine Arts who pause to admire an early 19th-century painting, Pat Lyon at the Forge, by John Neagle, are aware that the blacksmith it portrays was, in his time, famous as one of America's first "wrong men," accused of a crime he did not commit.

Pat Lyon was a leading Philadelphia-area blacksmith who did many jobs for local banks and wealthy citizens, designing strongboxes and repairing locks and bars. Shortly after he performed this latter task for a Philadelphia bank, it was entered surreptitiously and looted.

The police could think of only one likely suspect, blacksmith Lyon. Despite his anguished denials, he was thrown into jail on the theory that he alone could have gotten by those locks and bars. After three months the real criminals were caught and Lyon was released. But he had much to be bitter about. There were still whispers that he must have been involved, and he discovered his business suffered because of this rumor. Finally, after enduring the malicious talk for some years, he brought suit against his more virulent defamers. The courts ruled in the blacksmith's favor, and he was granted $9,000 in damages.

It was an enormous sum of money in that day, and Lyon could have retired on his fortune, but he found a better use for a large portion of his new-found wealth. He commissioned John Neagle, the finest portrait painter he could locate, to paint the real Pat Lyon, an honest blacksmith toiling at his honest labors. Pat Lyon at the Forge is the way this wrongly accused man wished to be remembered by posterity.

Patriarca, Raymond L. S. (1908–1984) New England Mafia boss

The Mafia boss of New England, Raymond Patriarca was probably almost as feared as Vito Genovese was; like Genovese, he was able to keep running his crime empire even while serving time in prison for his part in a murder conspiracy in the early 1970s.

He was regarded as totally ruthless, as he demonstrated during the Irish wars in Boston when a young upstart Irish gangster named Bernard McLaughlin tried to muscle in on the mob's loansharking rackets. McLaughlin and his supporters were totally eradicated. On one occasion, Patriarca allegedly even threatened his own brother with death because, while in charge of mob security, he had failed to catch an FBI bug planted in Patriarca's office.

As a young gangster, Patriarca showed a remarkable ability to avoid trouble with the law, only going to prison once, for armed robbery in 1938. He was sentenced to five years but won a pardon after serving only 84 days. The resulting newspaper publicity forced an examination of the facts surrounding the pardon. It was found that a key factor behind the pardon was an imploring letter from one Father Fagin, who turned out to be a nonexistent priest. Patriarca was ordered back to prison to do his time.

During the 1940s and 1950s, Patriarca set about building his crime empire from his base in Providence, R.I., concentrating on vice, gambling and loansharking enterprises. Remarkably, as his empire grew over the next 25 years, he was seldom mentioned in the press. Finally, though, because of Joseph Barboza, a hit man turned informer, Patriarca was convinced of conspiracy to commit murder for ordering an underling in 1966 to kill Rocco DiSiglio, a young mafioso who was fingering mob crap games for a stickup gang.

After a number of appeals he went to prison in 1970 to serve five years. During that time Patriarca continued to run Mafia affairs in New England, and he warned other Mafia bosses to stay out of his area. They did.

When he came out, Patriarca resumed full leadership of the organization. He controlled his people through fear, yet he did enjoy loyalty where it might not be expected. A new informer, Vinnie Teresa, who crippled much of the mob with his testimony in a number of trials, refused to testify against him. Raymond, he informed prosecutors, had always treated him fairly, and he would not cross him. There were very few men who would have said that about Patriarca. He died in 1984.

Patterson, Nan (1882–?) accused murderer

The 1904 case, one the New York newspapers dubbed The Girl in the Hansom Cab, had everything the readers of the new yellow journalism could want: a Floradora Girl, at the time the most dazzling of Broadway figures; a big-spending gambler and race horse owner; a jealous wife, and a murder mystery.

Gorgeous Nan Patterson was a Floradora Girl, not a member of the original sextette but a replacement for one who had married a millionaire. All Floradora Girls, the public believed, were destined to marry millionaires. Nan, a doll-faced, stagestruck young thing, had made it to the Great White Way after eloping in her teens. She later fell for, instead of a millionaire, a married gambler, Francis Thomas Young, known to his friends as Caesar. Young, who was what might be called a cad, and Nan were constantly seen together at the races, at gambling spas and at all the top hotels and restaurants. However, Young also had a wife, whom he wouldn't or couldn't give up. He kept his wife in one New York hotel and Nan in another on the same block. It made the gambler's life a hectic one. He paid for Nan's divorce, and in 1904 he finally decided to divorce his wife and run off with Nan. But his wife talked him out of that plan and the couple reconciled. Feeling she could win back her husband from Nan by separating them, she convinced Young to sail to Europe with her on June 4.

The day before his departure, Young spent his time with Nan Patterson. The pair drank heavily and quarreled, Nan still trying to get him to change his mind. Early the following morning, they had a make-up breakfast and entered a hansom cab for a ride down Broadway. Suddenly, there was the sound of an explosion inside the cab. Nan was heard to cry out: "Look at me, Frank. Why did you do it?"

What Nan Patterson claimed Young had done was shoot himself in the chest, out of anguish over having to leave her. It was a peculiar story in that, as newspaper sketches would explain to their eager readers, Young would have had to have been a contortionist to have inflicted the wound that had killed him. In addition, somehow the dying man had managed to put the gun back in his pocket.

Nan was arrested for murder. The state's version was that she had pulled out a gun, and when Young grabbed it, she had pulled the trigger. During two sensational trials Nan took the stand and stuck to her story despite vigorous cross-examination. In neither case could the prosecution get better than a hung jury, and speculation arose that the state simply would never be able to get a jury of 12 men to visualize a smoking pistol in such a lovely woman's hand. The district attorney's office tried a third time, with the same predictable result. In her prison cell Nan was deluged with messages of sympathy and not a few offers of marriage. It was all too much for the authorities. Ten days after the third trial, the judge granted a motion that she be discharged, and a crowd of 2,000 persons cheered her as she was released. Children sang in the streets:

*Nan is free, Nan is free,
She escaped the electric chair,
Now that she's out in the open air.*

That night Nan Patterson got gloriously drunk at one plush Broadway spot after another. She soon was offered starring roles in top musicals, but her career collapsed when theatergoers discovered she had no acting or other talent. Nan then reconciled with her ex-husband and they remarried. However, the union again soon ended in divorce, and The Girl in the Hansom Cab just faded away.

Peacemaker, The Wild Bill Hickok's gun

Certainly one of the most-storied weapons of the Old West was Wild Bill Hickok's Peacemaker, a single-action Colt, serial no. 139345. Wild Bill reportedly killed 14 men with the gun in the two years he owned it before his death on August 2, 1876, when Jack McCall shot him in the back of the head while he was playing poker in Deadwood, Dakota Territory. Hickok's personal belongings, including the Peacemaker, were sent to his sister, Mrs. Lydia M. Barnes of Oberlin, Kan.

Over the next six years nothing was heard about Wild Bill's famous pistol. On the night of July 14, 1882, it was fired in a darkened room in old Fort Sumner, New Mexico Territory and a youthful man lay dead on the floor. The dead man was Billy the Kid. The man holding the Peacemaker was Sheriff Pat Garrett. Legend has it that when Hickok was killed by McCall, Billy the Kid had been riding to Deadwood with the intention of forcing a duel with Wild Bill. In an extraordinary coincidence, the gun that might have killed the Kid then was responsible for his death six years later. It turned out that Wild Bill's sister had given the Colt to a family friend, Pat Garrett, who wore it while hunting down Billy the Kid.

When Garrett retired from law enforcement, he gave the weapon to Fred Sutton of Oklahoma City, a collector of historical firearms. Since then the Peacemaker has passed from one eager gun collector to another, becoming perhaps the most famous gun in Western history.

Peach, Arthur (?–1638) murderer

The first white man executed in America for the murder of an Indian, Arthur Peach was, according to a contemporary account, a "lustie and desparate yonge man" who murdered an Indian youth of the "Narigansett" tribe returning from the Massachusetts Bay Colony with cloth and beads he had acquired in trade. Three runaway servants had helped Peach commit the crime; two of them were caught with him. The capture of Peach and his two confederates led to an argument about whether three white men should be executed for the killing of one Indian. Gov. William Bradford wrote that during the affair "some of the rude & ignorante sorte" among the colonists raised the question as to whether "any English should be put to death for the Indians."

It was finally decided that Peach and his confederates should die, and most certainly, the decision was not made on moral grounds alone. The more level-headed colonists warned that if the crime was not quickly avenged, "it would raise a war." The authorities invited a number of Indians to the hanging, "which gave them & all the countrie good satisfaction." It was an application of justice seldom repeated over the next 250 years in this country.

Peacock, Dr. Silber C. (1896–1936) murder victim

Few murdered persons have ever been more unjustly maligned than was Dr. Silber C. Peacock, a successful and wealthy Chicago pediatrician who was killed on the night of January 2, 1936.

Dr. Peacock had left his home at 10:05 P.M. to answer what was to prove to be a fake emergency call about a sick child. Hours later, he was found dead in his Cadillac, shot, slashed and viciously clubbed. Dr. Peacock did not appear to have been robbed of his money or valuables (it was subsequently discovered that $20 had been taken), and the public and the newspapers soon began a series of speculations about him. Among other things, he was said to have been the victim of a narcotics robbery, a leading narcotics dealer, the keeper of a secret love nest, a habitue of underworld dives and a society abortionist. All these allegations eventually proved groundless. For example, the charge of keeping a "swank love nest," as one newspaper put it, started because his wife could not identify an apartment key that was found in his possession at the time of his death. Eventually, the police discovered it was the key to the apartment of the parents-in-law of a Chicago deputy coroner, who, during his investigation, had somehow inadvertently dropped it among the effects found on the dead man.

PEDIGREED dog swindle

Finally, 10 weeks after the slaying, four young men were arrested and confessed to the murder. They had plotted to rob a physician, selected Peacock's name out of hundreds of doctors listed in the classified telephone directory and lured him to his death with a telephone call. When he had resisted, they killed him and fled. Three of the culprits—Emil Reck, Robert Goethe and Durland Nash—went to prison for 199 years plus four consecutive terms of one year to life. The fourth, 17-year-old Mickey Livingston, drew a 30-year sentence.

pedigreed dog swindle

A short con, or quick hustle, the pedigreed dog swindle is less important for its own sake than it is for the more lucrative swindles it fathered.

The 19th century victim of such a caper was often a bartender, who was approached by a strange customer with a dog, most often a mongrel terrier. The customer would explain that the dog was a prize winner and produce some impressive-looking papers to prove the point. "Look," he might say, "this dog is really valuable and I have an important meeting with some bankers and I can't take him with me. I'll give you ten dollars to watch him for a couple of hours."

Naturally, the bartender would agree. After the dog owner left with a final word about how valuable the dog was, another customer would walk in. He would pretend to be very impressed by the dog, declaring he really liked the animal and that his kids would be wild about it. After this buildup he would offer the bartender $50 for the animal. The bartender would explain the dog was not his, but the man would only grow more insistent, raising the offer to $100. Patiently, the bartender would refuse and keep refusing as the ante was raised. Finally, the customer would say, "Listen, I'll stop conning you. I know my dog flesh. That's a valuable dog. If you'll sell it, I'll go to five hundred dollars."

By now the bartender would be in agony, turning down such an offer. The customer would then say, "Look, I'm from out of town. If you can swing a deal for me for the dog, I'll give you the five hundred, but I have to catch a train in an hour and I'll stop back just before I have to leave."

A half an hour later the dog's owner would reappear, looking downcast, and order a drink. The bartender would serve him, asking if anything was wrong. Sorrowfully nodding, the dog owner would explain that his business deal had fallen through. "I was really counting on that deal, now I don't know what I'll do."

The bartender, trying to curb his enthusiasm, might then offer to help the poor dog owner. He had taken a liking, he would explain, and was willing to pay $100 for it. The dog owner wouldn't consider it, again pointing out how valuable the animal was. The bartender would have to raise the bid to $300 before the owner would agree to part with the valuable animal, but only with the proviso that he could buy the dog back the following month for $400 if he solved his financial problems. That detail wouldn't worry the bartender. He could always say the dog had been trampled by a horse.

The bartender would take the money from the register and exchange it for the mutt. Now, with the original owner gone, he only had to wait for the return of the prospective buyer to realize a $200 profit. Of course, this proved to be a wait considerably longer than the dog's life span.

The pedigreed dog swindle was a favorite with the short con operators for decades, and eventually, it evolved into a bigger con, with the profits increasing 10- to 100-fold. The victim changed from a bartender to a greedy banker or businessman, and instead of selling a pedigreed dog, the con man would offer a gold mine or some oil stock, invariably worthless, which, for some reason, he could no longer keep.

Peel, Fanny (1828–1858) famous 19th-century prostitute

Perhaps the most famous 19th century American prostitute was "the notorious Fanny Peel," as the New Orleans newspapers labeled her.

The daughter of a Troy, N.Y. clergyman and a graduate of the Troy Female Seminary, she had been "soiled" at the age of 15 and thereafter became a prostitute, at the time virtually the only fate possible for one so ruined. After working in a number of brothels, her uncommon beauty attracted the attention of a rich man and he made her his mistress. Thereafter, she became the mistress of a number of millionaires from New York to Chicago, acquiring a considerable fortune for herself in the process.

In 1857 Fanny came to New Orleans rich enough to employ a coachman, a free black. Ever on the lookout for more money, she sold him as a slave to a Louisiana planter and entered a fashionable brothel on Dauphine Street. She was soon hailed by the press as easily the most beautiful courtesan ever to appear in New Orleans. Disenchantment set in rather quickly, however, as Fanny rejected the money of the city's leading bloods, declaring the men visiting the brothel were not good enough for her. Finally, she was dismissed by the brothel and left New Orleans for Mobile, Ala., where she died the following summer.

Pendergast, Thomas Joseph (1872–1945) Kansas City political boss

For several decades Boss Tom Pendergast of Kansas City ran a political machine whose record for graft, fraud, strong-arm tactics and murder probably surpassed that of any other machine in the country. During the underworld meetings of the 1920s and 1930s that culminated in the formation of the national crime syndicate, Pendergast was the only political boss invited to take part in the deliberations. Generally, he was represented in crime circles by the king of Kansas City's North Side wards, Johnny Lazia. Pendergast, who became a power in state and national politics, once said, "People work for a party because they can get a job or get a favor."

The Pendergast machine was first organized around the turn of the century by Tom's older brother James, a former saloon keeper who built a base in the Catholic blue-collar wards of the city. When James died in 1910, Tom took charge and slowly extended his influence throughout the city. By the 1920s he was in firm control. He quickly converted Kansas City into a truly open town, parceling out control of horse racing wires, liquor, vice and gambling. In 1922 Pendergast launched the political career of Harry S. Truman by aiding his election as county judge. Later on, many opponents of Truman attempted to tar him with the Pendergast brush, failing to understand that most political machines utilize a few incorruptible types to provide a touch of class to their operation. Almost inevitably, these individuals are backed, as Truman was, for positions such as U.S. senator or others of little importance to a machine compared to those at city hall or at the state house.

While the Pendergast machine mainly achieved its goals by fraud, it made use of violence if deemed necessary. When Lazia was convicted of tax evasion in 1934 and was threatening to inform on the machine, his lips were sealed by machine-gun bullets in an execution almost certainly ordered by the Pendergast forces. It has long been theorized that the infamous Kansas City Massacre in June 1933 was actually a planned rub-out of Frank "Jelly" Nash, the man whom the machine-gunning gangsters were allegedly trying to free. Nash knew the ins and outs of the machine as well as all facets of crime in Kansas City; if he had talked, many important figures would have faced jail. While the FBI charged the crime to Verne Miller, Pretty Boy Floyd and Adam Richetti, considerable evidence developed later indicated the agency was wrong and that the real killers were Miller, Maurice Denning and William "Solly" Weissman. The bodies of Miller and Weissman turned up later that year but Denning disappeared. It seemed evident that they were killed not because they had murdered Nash but because they knew who had ordered his execution. This version was backed up by the later statements of underworld figure Blackie Audett, who said that almost everyone in power in Kansas City knew about the impending rub-out. At the time, one of Pendergast's closest associates was City Manager Henry McElroy. Audett stated that Mary McElroy, Henry McElroy's daughter, knew about the shooting hours before it occurred and, in fact, invited him to come with her to Union Station to watch the execution. He said they had witnessed the massacre from about 50 yards away. Even if Audett's story was apocryphal, it still captured the flavor of Pendergast's domain, where anything could happen.

For a time it seemed Tom Pendergast's hold on Kansas City's politics and underworld was untouchable, but the federal government started a massive crackdown in the late 1930s thanks to the machine's effrontery in the 1936 elections. Although the city had a population of under 400,000, it managed to come up with an astonishing total of about 270,000 registered voters. Federal Judge Albert L. Reeves ordered a grand jury investigation, stating:

I can't sit quietly in my district here, charged with responsibility as I am, and allow my fellow countrymen who stand for the law, and the citizens who stand for the law, to witness some man going with dripping fingers to the ballot box. A corrupt vote is akin to a gun pointing at the very heart of America.

The FBI uncovered damning evidence of vote theft, stuffed ballot boxes and intimidation of voters. There was clear proof that erasures had been made on ballots. Indentations on many ballots revealed they had been marked one on top of the other. One precinct captain, complaining about his hard day, stated: "I've been in the basement and those damn Republicans certainly write heavy. It was a tough job erasing."

No less than 256 Pendergast followers were convicted in the vote fraud case, marking the beginning of the end of the Pendergast machine. The boss himself was convicted of tax evasion in 1939. Although he served only a year, his control over Kansas City was broken. He died in 1945.

As a method of forced labor to pay off debts, peonage continued in the United States after the end of slavery. The system, introduced in the New World by the Spaniards, was applied in both North and South America. Well into the 20th century it was possible for an employer in some states in this country to swear out a warrant against a poor, unsophisticated workman, arrange his release on bail and force him to work on a plantation or farm under the threat of being sent back to prison. In certain states employers were allowed to pay off a prisoner's fine and then require him to work off the debt. The federal government finally moved in to protect the civil rights of such laborers.

The case that probably caused more public revulsion over the practice and led to a major crackdown occurred in Georgia in 1921. A farm owner, John S. Williams, "bought" black prisoners from state and county road gangs and bound them to work out the so-called purchase price on his farm. When agents of the Bureau of Investigation (the forerunner of the FBI) started probing into Williams' operations, evidence indicated he had killed at least a dozen of the ex-prisoners in an attempt to eliminate witnesses who might testify against him. He was convicted of murder and imprisoned for life. To this day reports of peonage continue to turn up in connection with various share-cropping systems in the South.

The newest form of peonage involves the illegal importation of Mexican workers. Produce growers of California's lush San Joaquin and Imperial valleys pay smugglers to bring in the illegal aliens at so much a head. These smugglers also collect money from the aliens, who are unaware they are being sold into a form of near-slavery. The growers and ranchers find these imported workers to be docile and pliant. They are totally isolated on the farms and remain under the threat of arrest and deportation. They are not permitted to read newspapers and are generally worked 10 to 12 hours a day for incredibly small pay and their keep.

Prosecutions for this crime have been virtually nonexistent, certainly in view of the scope of the activity.

pepperbox revolver

The pepperbox revolver was one of the most popular small handguns of the 19th century, generally selling for about $5.75, which today would be considered the price range of a Saturday Night Special. Only two and a half to three inches long, this multibarrel weapon generally came in two styles: stationary barrels with a rotating firing pin or with barrels that revolved into a position over the firing pin. The caliber of the gun varied from .22 to .36, the larger size certainly enough to blow much of a victim's head off at close range. Christian Sharps produced the most popular pepperbox, a four-barrel model, in 1859; over a 20-year period Americans bought 150,000 of them. While the weapon was very inaccurate beyond a few feet, holdup artists found sticking four barrels into a victim's face was a most effective convincer.

As a result of the 1968 Gun Control Act, a 20th century copy of Sharps' four-barrel model using .22-long ammunition and selling for under $30 was placed on the embargo list.

Percy, Valerie (1945–1966) murder victim

Senatorial candidate Charles H. Percy's 21-year-old twin daughter Valerie was killed in the family's mansion in Kenilworth, Ill. on September 18, 1966. At about 5 A.M. Percy was awakened by his wife's screams. He immediately turned on a switch that set off a piercing burglar alarm atop the 17-room suburban home and rushed to Valerie's bedroom, where he found the girl still alive but mutilated by numerous stab wounds. She died shortly thereafter. Hearing a noise, Valerie's stepmother had investigated and come upon a shadowy intruder standing over the girl's bed. He had shined a flashlight in the woman's face and, while she was temporarily blinded, successfully made his escape.

The case shocked the country and for a time its political impact in the Senate race between Percy and 74-year-old Senate Democrat Paul Douglas was hard to gauge. Some political observers concluded the tragedy produced a significant sympathy vote for Percy that helped him win the election although Douglas later admitted that Percy had already pulled ahead of him in the summer.

From the beginning, there appeared to have been a sexual motive behind the Percy murder, indicating the act of a person harboring a strong sexual animosity toward the girl. Over the next several years the case remained unsolved despite Sen. Percy's offer of a $50,000 reward and an intensive police investigation, in which 14,000 persons were questioned and 1,317 leads followed up. A total of 19 confessions were made—all false. A youth in Tucson, Ariz. confessed to the murder in October 1966 but later denied it. In 1971 police in South Yarmouth, Mass. reported that a 24-year-old man had admitted committing the Percy killing and 17 other murders as well. Confession number 18, another phony, was made by a 26-year-old suspect in a Las Vegas murder case. The final one came from a 27-year-old man in Miami, who not only claimed he had killed Valerie but John F. Kennedy, Robert F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King as well.

By 1973, the authorities considered the murder solved, although they agreed there would probably never be a prosecution. Reporter Art Petacque of the Chicago Sun-Times broke the case by obtaining a statement from a Mafia operative, 58-year-old Leo Rugendorf, who oversaw the activities of a gang of cat burglars that had robbed the homes of wealthy people all over the country. Rugendorf, near death from heart disease, fingered burglars Francis Hohimer and Frederick Malchow, who had plunged to his death from a railroad trestle in 1967 after escaping from a Pennsylvania prison. Hohimer at the time was doing 30 years in the Iowa State Penitentiary for armed robbery.

Rugendorf said Hohimer told him shortly after the murder: "They'll get me for the Valerie Percy murder. The girl woke up, and I hit her on the top of the head with a pistol." In addition, the reporter was able to get corroboration of Rugendorf's claim from Hohimer's younger brother, Harold, who reported Frank was "real nervous and uptight" the day after the murder. Harold said his brother had told him he "had to 'off' a girl."

Harold Hohimer further stated: "I asked him why he had to do someone in, and he said it was because the girl made a lot of noise and they got in a fight. I asked him, 'What score are you talking about?' and he said, 'It's all in the newspapers and on the radio today.' He was talking about the Valerie Percy thing."

Yet another acquaintance of Frank Hohimer claimed Frank had told him two weeks before the murder that he had cased the Percy mansion and intended to rob it. After maintaining his silence for a while, Frank Hohimer consented to answer questions put to him by Petacque and investigators. He denied killing Valerie and denied being in the Percy mansion. Instead, he accused Malchow of the murder, stating that on the morning of the crime Malchow had come to his flat in blood-soaked clothes.

In 1975 Frank Hohimer wrote a book about his criminal past, The Home Invaders, admitting a number of burglaries, including a robbery of Elvis Presley's mansion in Memphis, but holding to his version of the Percy murder.

Without physical evidence linking Malchow or Hohimer to the murder, officials admit, there is no chance anyone will ever be prosecuted for the murder of Valerie Percy. The offer of $50,000 reward has been withdrawn. Reporter Petacque won a Pulitzer Prize for his work on the story.

Perkins, Josephine Amelia (1818–?) horse thief

Following a series of misadventures in her native England, a young woman named Josephine Amelia Perkins arrived in New York in the 1830s without any money or a place to stay and only the clothes on her back. She immediately stole a horse, thereby taking the initial step toward becoming notorious as America's first female horse thief. In 1839 she published her confession, which included the following description of herself:

A young woman, who, in early life was deservedly esteemed for her exemplary behavior, yet for three years last past (friendless and unprotected) has been unhappily addicted to a criminal propensity, more singular and surprising in its nature (for one of her sex) than can be found on record; in the commission of which, she has been four times detected, twice pardoned on account of her sex, once for reasons of supposed insanity, and the fourth and last time, convicted and sentenced to two years imprisonment in Madison county jail, Kentucky. Annexed is a well-written Address to Parents and Children.

She did not total up her thefts but they apparently numbered in the hundreds.

Since horse-theft was considered no minor crime, Perkins apparently decided any future infractions would bring severe punishment, and so far as the record shows, she appears to have retired from the profession in 1841.

Perry, Oliver Curtis (1864–1930) train robber

Train robbery was often thought of as a western crime, but probably the greatest train robber of all practiced his art in the East. His name was Oliver Curtis Perry and he was described by the New York World as "one of the most spectacular train robbers the country has ever known." The accolade was well-deserved. Perry was a former Wyoming cowboy who had come east to make his dishonest fortune. In a series of incredible one-man capers, he displayed a daring never equaled by any other train robber.

Perry, who claimed to be a descendant of Oliver Hazard Perry, the hero of the Battle of Lake Erie in 1812, committed his first train robbery on September 29, 1891. With a small saw, he cut out a square in the wooden end of the express car of the New York Central's Fast Flyer No. 31 out of Albany and crawled through a pile of packages to overpower the messenger inside. After tying up the messenger, he broke open the safe and took $5,000 in cash and $3,000 in jewelry. Then, hanging by one hand, sawed through the air hose between the express car and the adjoining car, bringing the crack train to a halt. Perry jumped down and fled into the nearby woods, making good his escape.

Pinkerton detectives learned the identity of the robber when he turned up in Rochester spending too much money in saloons and whorehouses and dropping boastful hints. Knowing Perry's identity and catching him, however, were two different matters. The Pinkertons just missed catching him after each of two more robberies he pulled.

Perry's wildest train robbery took place near Lyons, N.Y. in 1892, a spectacular attempt that even Hollywood would have rejected as too far-fetched. Having learned that a New York Central train departing Syracuse on September 20 would contain $100,000, he somehow got on top of the icy roof of the train's express car during the height of a hailstorm, slid down a rope and kicked in a side window. Firing a shot over the head of the messenger in the car, he jumped through the window. In a savage fight Perry pistol-whipped the messenger into unconsciousness, but not before his victim managed to pull the bell rope. The bandit worked feverishly at cracking open the safe until he was interrupted by an investigating conductor. Perry fired a shot at the conductor and fled, stopping just long enough to rifle the unconscious messenger's pockets and empty the petty cash box.

Flinging open the door, he jumped out of the train, which had ground to a stop near Jordan, N.Y. He intimidated the crew and passengers with several more shots and ordered the train to move, warning that otherwise he would shoot to kill. The train picked up speed and headed for Lyons, N.Y. When it got there, a 50-man posse was formed to return to Jordan and hunt for the train robber. Just as the posse was about to leave on a special train, the conductor who had interrupted Perry in the express car spotted him moving briskly through the station. After he had ordered the train to pull out in Jordan, Perry had hopped aboard the last car and pretended to be a passenger. But for the conductor noticing him, he would have made good his escape in Lyons.

Perry wasn't through yet. He raced through the train yards, with the posse after him, and jumped aboard a freight engine already moving out under a full head of steam. He forced the engineer and fireman to jump and took off with the throttle wide open. His pursuers mounted a faster engine on a parallel set of tracks and gave chase, quickly closing ground on him. As they neared several members of the posse opened up with pistols and shotguns. Perry threw his engine in reverse and headed in the opposite direction. As the two engines passed each other, Perry exchanged shots with the posse men, who then put their engine in reverse. Again the two cars met, with more shots exchanged. Perry's engine and that of his pursuers flew back and forth through the train yards, bullets filling the air. Finally, the steam supply in Perry's locomotive dropped and he was forced to make a run for the woods.

The posse chased Perry into the swamps. He probably still would have escaped had not another posse under Wayne County Deputy Sheriff Jeremiah Collins cut him off. Interviewed by a reporter after his capture, Perry said, "I had to take a bold stroke with big chances and I guess I lost."

He was sentenced to 49 years in Auburn Prison. Even following his confinement the press continued to fawn over him, quoting Pinkertons Superintendent George Bangs' description of the Lyons caper as "the most daring train robbery attempt in criminal history. I would call Perry the nerviest outlaw I ever heard of. There are few western badmen who possessed his courage."

In prison, Perry was deluged by mail from women, including many proposals of marriage. One even sent him a saw hidden inside a Bible. After causing a number of disturbances, he was removed to the State Hospital for the Criminally Insane at Matteawan. In 1895 Perry received another saw hidden in a Bible from the young lady who had sent him the same type of gift while he was in Auburn. He sawed through the bars of his cell and, after releasing a number of other prisoners, slid down 80 feet of drainpipe to freedom.

With no money and a huge posse tracking him, Perry made his way to New York City and then slipped aboard a ferry to Weehawken, N.J. The town policeman there caught him as he huddled sick and hungry over a small fire.

Perry was sent to the maximum-security prison at Dannemora, but he still dreamed of making another escape. After several futile efforts he was put in solitary confinement, where he was to remain for a quarter of a century. In 1920, having long since given up hope of escaping, Perry constructed a device consisting of a block of wood and two nails and used it to pierce both of his eyes. Permanently blinded, he dictated a letter to his lawyer: "I was born in the light of day, against my will of course. I now assert my right to shut out that light. In plain words I wanted to tear out my eyes."

Perry tried to starve himself to death during his last six years but was kept alive by forced feedings until he passed away in 1930. In those final years he refused to say a word to his guards. It was a gruesome end for a man who, according to the New York World, had "electrified the nation with his daring exploits."

Perry, Phenie (1917–1937) murder victim

Few killers have ever gone to such great lengths to frame someone else for their crime as 23-year-old Arthur Perry did for the murder of his 20-year-old wife, Phenie. In the event his wife died, Perry stood to collect $1,000 in insurance money, a not inconsequential sum in the Depression year of 1937. A passing pedestrian found the body of Phenie Perry in a lot on 157th St. in Jamaica, New York City. Her dress was torn down the front and her knees were dirt-smearred and scarred. She had been bludgeoned and kicked to death, and her body lay in a pool of blood. There were plenty of footprints belonging to the murderer. Better yet, there was even one of his bloodstained shoes.

All this was part of Arthur Perry's unique plot. The Perrys shared a home with another couple, the Ulysses Palms. Perry had decided to frame Palm, a church deacon, precisely because he was an unlikely suspect and an illogical choice for anyone to attempt to frame.

First, he forged a love letter to his wife and signed Palm's name to it. In the letter Palm demanded that Phenie Perry be nice to him. It was an excellent forgery and respected handwriting experts would dispute whether Palm or Perry had written it. On the night of the murder, Arthur Perry put on a pair of shoes he had stolen from Palm and waylaid Phenie as she was coming home from a movie. He did it at a time when he knew Palm was home alone, while Mrs. Palm was visiting friends on church business. After killing his wife, Perry left one of Palm's shoes at the scene of the crime. He also had stolen some papers and personal letters from Palm as well as one of his shirts. He then ripped the pocket from the shirt and planted it and the papers under the body so that it would appear Phenie Perry had ripped off the pocket in her death struggle. All Perry had to do then was slip back home with one shoeless foot and plant the remaining shoe and the torn shirt in one of Palm's closets while he was sleeping.

It was an intricate and cunning plot and it almost worked. At first, investigating officers had little doubt that Palm was their man. The only thing that bothered them was the deacon's strong denials and his spotless reputation. That made them look at Arthur Perry a little more closely, and they eventually found evidence that he had staged the murder to make it look like the act of his neighbor. Perry had slipped on one minor point, which proved enough to send him to the chair. Dirt particles on his sock were found to match a sample of dirt taken from the scene of the murder.

Peters, Frederick Emerson (1885–1959) check passer

Probably the most prolific passer of bad checks in American history, Frederick Emerson Peters, starting at age 17, cashed thousands of bad checks all over the United States, using hundreds of different names. One of his favorite ploys was to pose as the son or some other relative of a well-known figure, especially Theodore Roosevelt, whose appearance he could somewhat emulate. He would engage a shopkeeper in conversation, casually let drop his identity and then make a purchase with a check for a somewhat larger amount. Few small shopkeepers, impressed by having a celebrity as a customer, would turn him down; in fact, any number of them would eventually frame the bad check and proudly recall the time they "got took by Teddy Roosevelt's kid."

Asked once why he continued to write bad checks after a number of convictions, Peters shrugged and said it was so easy that it would take the "rock-like willpower of the Sphinx to resist such temptation." He stated his record achievement was to pass 30 worthless checks in one day in a small Indiana town whose name he could no longer remember. Much of his life was spent behind bars; during those tours he often helped establish prison libraries. One day while he was making his check-passing rounds in New Haven, Conn., he suffered a fatal stroke; Peters was 74 years old at the time. He was given a pauper's funeral, although it was observed that with some advanced warning he could have given the undertaker a handsome check.

Peters, Philip (1868–1941) murder victim of Denver's Spiderman

On the evening of October 17, 1941, a Denver, Colo. couple became worried about an elderly neighbor, Philip Peters. They broke into his home and found him murdered. It turned out to be one of the most bizarre cases in that city's history, with the killer to become famous as the Spiderman of Moncrieff Place. What the police couldn't figure out was how the murderer had escaped. All the doors and windows had been locked from the inside, but no one was found hiding in the house.

About a month earlier, 59-year-old Theodore Coneys, a tramp who had known Peters years before, approached the house to beg for food. Just then Peters came out and entered a car to visit his sick wife in the hospital. Coneys slipped into the house to steal money and food but made an opportune discovery: a trapdoor, only about 2 1/2 times the size of a cigarbox lid, which led to a narrow attic cubbyhole. Rounding up a pile of rags, some food and an old crystal radio, Coneys settled into his newly found hiding place.

He planned to become a permanent uninvited boarder. Whenever Peters left the house, Coneys would descend from his attic hideout and eat, bathe and shave, using Peters' razor. On October 17 Coneys was in the kitchen eating. He thought Peters had gone out, but the old man was just taking a nap. Suddenly, the kitchen door popped open, and Peters stood there gaping. Coneys panicked. He grabbed an iron stove shaker and attacked Peters, who was screaming and had obviously not recognized him. Peters collapsed on the floor dead.

Coneys did not flee the house, feeling he had nowhere to go. He climbed back up into his hiding place and was there when the murder was discovered and the police searched the house. The officers had noticed the trapdoor but decided a man could not fit through it. They were partially right: an average-sized man couldn't but a thin man—like Coneys—could.

When Mrs. Peters returned from the hospital, she and her housekeeper kept hearing strange sounds in the house, and the tale soon spread in the area that the house was haunted. One night the housekeeper caught a glimpse of a shadowy figure creeping around. She convinced herself that it was Mr. Peters' ghost and talked Mrs. Peters into moving.

Even with the house vacant, Coneys did not leave. The electricity was left on and he had stored up some food and could get water by scraping snow from the gutters. Often, a passerby would notice an eerie light coming from the top of the house, but whenever the police investigated, they found nothing, as Coneys, hearing them arrive, would flip off the tiny light he maintained in his lair. The police were sure children were playing in the house and deliberately attempting to frighten passersby. Still they made periodic checks on the house and on July 30, 1942 two detectives heard a lock click on the second floor. They charged upstairs just in time to see the legs of the Spiderman slip through the trapdoor.

The most bizarre case in Denver's history was solved, and Coneys was sent to the penitentiary for life.

Philadelphia anti-Catholic riots

Perhaps one of the worst series of anti-Catholic riots in the United States took place in Philadelphia over a two-month period in 1844.

The initial battles erupted on May 3, when several thousand Protestants, calling themselves Native Americans, attempted to stage an anti-Catholic street rally in the Irish section of Kensington. Forced out by the Catholics in the first round of fighting, the Protestant mob stormed back into the area on May 8, setting fire to a number of houses, churches, a Catholic rectory and a schoolhouse. The violence was finally controlled after the cavalry was called out and martial law declared. During the next several weeks sporadic fighting broke out, and there was much ill-feeling on the part of the Native Americans, who resented the fact that the military was being used to protect the Catholics. The Nativists and the army fought the final battle of the conflict on July 4, with each side making use of batteries of cannon. The soldiers proved better cannoners, scattering the Nativists. The next day a dazed city totaled up the casualties in the two-month confrontation: 30 dead, 150 wounded and 220 families burned out. The financial losses were put in the millions of dollars.

Phillips, David Graham (1868–1911) murder victim

David Phillips, one of the most popular novelists of the first decade of the 20th century, achieved posthumous fame as the only writer ever to be murdered because of a character he created.

One day late in 1910 a neurotic 21-year-old member of Philadelphia society, Fitzhugh Goldsborough, picked up one of Phillips' novels, The Fashionable Adventures of Joshua Craig, which was plotted largely around a scatterbrained, selfish young socialite. Goldsborough had an elder sister, a frivolous member of Philadelphia society who seemed to match Phillips' character in one unflattering detail after another. He also had an explosive temper and had often come to blows with persons who had said anything he took to be unkind about his sister. Goldsborough whipped himself into a murderous frenzy over Phillips' apparent insult.

On January 23, 1911 Phillips left his Gramercy Park apartment in New York City; as he walked through the park, he was confronted by a disheveled, haggard-looking young man. Fitzhugh Goldsborough pulled out a pistol and screamed, "Here you go!" and then shot the author several times. As Phillips fell to the ground mortally wounded, Goldsborough glanced at horrified passersby and said, "Here I go!" He put the gun to his temple and pulled the trigger, killing himself. Police soon uncovered the motive for Goldsborough's act, but never found any indication that the victim had ever known or even heard of the murderer's sister.

It happens very quickly. The "stall" bumps the "mark" and makes him look his way. The second that happens the "hook," or "mechanic," comes along on the other side and "fans" his pockets. The hook immediately "dukes the poke" to the "caretaker," who starts traveling.

There in a nutshell is a typical pickpocketing operation. It can happen on a subway platform, in a crowd at a racetrack or any place else a victim can be easily jostled.

It's really quite simple. The first man bumps into or may even speak to the victim to distract him. The second man, the actual pickpocket, expertly brushes the victim's pockets to locate his wallet in the event the trio hasn't already spotted its location, as is more often the case. Once the pickpocket takes the wallet, he has committed a crime, and the evidence is on him. If he is inexperienced in his movements, the victim will notice and probably grab him and start yelling. So, almost in the same motion, the pickpocket passes the wallet to the third man, who is never close enough to the victim to come directly under suspicion. It is the third man's assignment to get away quickly with the loot.

There are many different pickpocketing operations. One that is often used in subways involves a caretaker who is also an initial spotter, noting in which pocket a potential victim has placed his wallet or roll of bills. A good place to make this observation is the token booth. The spotter follows the victim to the platform and stuffs an envelope into the same pocket in which the victim has his money. This signals the stall and the mechanic, who wait for the train to pull into the station before making a move. As the train doors open, the stall, often a fat man, crowds in front of the victim, blocking his entrance, and the mechanic comes up behind him. The stall stops dead in his tracks, as though realizing he is about to get on the wrong train. As he turns to get off, there is a pileup and the victim, nailed between the stall and the mechanic, is stripped clean. The handoff is made to the caretaker and the three take off. The victim rides away on his train, probably cursing out that stupid fat man under his breath. He will curse even more when he discovers he's been robbed, but by that time he will be far from the scene of the crime.

It is very difficult to estimate how much money is lost to pickpockets. Authorities in New York City roughly estimate the losses there are probably at least $1 million annually. Not everyone reports such a theft; many victims never know they've had their pockets picked, believing they simply lost their money through carelessness.

The bluebloods of pickpocketing are the "live cannons," or "pit workers," who can flip your wallet out of your "pit," or pocket, as easily as they can peel a banana. The best of them can "kiss the sucker," which means face the victim directly—close enough to kiss him—and lift his wallet from his inside coat pocket, the hardest location of all. Naturally, in such an operation the pickpocket needs some "togs," or cover for his nimble hands. It may be a coat over his arm, a package or a newspaper.

PICKPOCKETS

The New York City Transit Police Pickpocket Squad is one of the finest in the nation. Our sophisticated system is about the world's largest, and presently incorporates a system of five "pickpocket" squads. You can stop most pickpocketing by being aware of their activities and taking these simple precautions:

HOW TO RUIN A PICKPOCKET'S DAY

- 1 Carry your wallet inside coat or under the pocket—never in back pants pocket.
- 2 Observe people that look guilty, and carry them accordingly.
- 3 Beware of loud arguments or commotion. Pickpockets can be staged to harass you while your pockets are picked.
- 4 If you're jostled in a crowd, be aware that a pickpocket might be responsible.
- 5 Avoid traveling in the back of the subway car doors when entering or exiting. Doing this will minimize the chance of your losing your property to a pickpocket.

A PICKPOCKET GLOSSARY

Block: One-way street.
Bridge: Longway from station.
Corner: A small, often crowded, area of a street.
City: Pickpocket's home.
Club: Pickpocket's junk store.
Feeling: Longway from station.
Light: To make things worse.
Mark: Victim.
Pat: Revolving pocket.
Shut: Revolving pocket.
Stall: Revolving pocket.
Stuck: Revolving pocket.
Stuck: Revolving pocket.
Stuck: Revolving pocket.

WHAT TO DO IN AN EMERGENCY

If you are picked, do not panic. Try to keep the crowd around you and everyone else. If you are picked, do not panic. Do not try to fight.

Some tips from the New York City Transit Police Pickpocket Squad on foiling light-fingered thieves.

PIERRE hotel robbery

When a top cannon starts losing his “grift sense,” or nerve, he has to limit his action to that of a “moll buzzer,” one who specializes in opening women’s handbags and lifting a wallet or change purse. The lowest a pickpocket can fall is to the ranks of a “lush worker,” i.e., one who rolls drunks who have passed out or, if need be, conked out.

According to police, few women make good pickpockets. Most women pickpockets are lush workers, but some are good moll buzzers. The reason for this is that in most cities there are laws against jostling, a must for a dip. “If a guy jostles a woman, she thinks he’s on the make,” one detective says. “She screams and the dip’s facing a morals charge. A woman bumps a woman and they both let it pass with maybe an icy stare.”

There is no such thing as a pickpocket who doesn’t get caught. They are usually arrested scores of times, but seldom with the loot in their hands. So they are generally convicted of no more than jostling and usually they plea-bargain for a suspended sentence or possibly a small fine.

Perhaps the dean of pickpockets was Thomas “Butterfingers” Moran, who died in 1971. He stole an estimated $500,000 over a career of more than four decades. He also had the distinction of being arrested in every continental state of the union plus Canada.

Some rules for foiling pickpockets that were developed by the New York City Transit Police Pickpocket Squad are shown in the accompanying illustration.

To this should be added one more: beware of “BEWARE OF PICKPOCKETS” signs. Dips deliberately hang around these signs because many persons will automatically touch their money or wallet when they see such a warning. It is thus a boon for pickpockets.

Pierre hotel robbery

The greatest hotel robbery in history was that of the stately Hotel Pierre on New York’s Fifth Avenue in the early morning hours of January 2, 1972. Six robbers with dyed hair and wearing false beards and mustaches and rubber noses stole, according to most estimates, $4 million in jewels, cash and securities from 54 safe-deposit boxes. An assistant district attorney felt as much as an additional $4 million in cash might have been taken and not reported by the victims.

At 3:45 A.M. the robbers pulled up in a limousine at the side entrance of the hotel and stepped to the door. They stuck a .38 into the doorman’s chest, pushed their way inside, where they rapidly rounded up 18 hotel employees who were on the ground floor and pushed them into an office near the room containing the safe-deposit boxes. Each employee was handcuffed and bound and their mouths taped. The side door was left locked so that any late-arriving guests would have to use the Fifth Avenue entrance to enter the hotel.

At that late hour, only three hotel guests came into the area where the robbery was taking place; they too were bound and gagged and shoved in with the other prisoners. No shots were fired at any time and none of the prisoners was hurt. After two hours of steady labor the satisfied thieves walked out with their loot. Had they had more time they could have opened the remaining 146 boxes, which would have made the haul even more monumental. Still at the rate of at least $2 million an hour, their time was rather well rewarded.

Although the robbery has never been solved, the police did capture one man in possession of approximately $1 million worth of the stolen gems and another when he attempted to pass a smaller amount of the jewels to a fence who made the mistake of dealing with an FBI informant. However, the two could not be connected with the actual robbery and were liable to conviction only for possession of stolen property, a minor charge. Both men plea-bargained for second-degree burglary and got off with very short sentences.

The police have never identified the rest of the robbers, and it is now too late. The statute of limitations has passed.

pigeon drop con game

Probably the most-practiced confidence game of all time, the so-called pigeon drop comes in many varieties but all follow a basic pattern. Con man number one finds a wallet, purse, attache case or even a paper bag apparently filled with money. An unsuspecting victim standing nearby witnesses the discovery. Just then con man number two appears and claims he is also entitled to a share of the booty as much as the other two. If it hasn’t occurred to the victim as yet, he now realizes he ought to share in the proceeds. An argument ensues about whether they should divide the money immediately or first check to find out if it is stolen. Con man number one says his “boss” has police connections and can check. This is done by phone and the report comes back that the money was probably dropped by some big gambler or tax evader and that the three should share it. The “boss” offers to hold the money until all three can produce a substantial amount of their own money to demonstrate that they are acting in good faith and are responsible enough to keep the secret. Con man number two, apparently determined not to be cut out of the deal, produces a large sum of money on the spot to prove his reliability. Con man number one and the victim then hurry off to get their money. When the victim returns and hands over his share, it is the last he sees of the two con men or the “boss.”

While the plot appears almost incredible, it must be remembered that the acting is high powered; in particular, the bickering between the two con men makes the victim fearful he will be “left out” unless he abides by all the conditions of the agreement. The reliability of the employer—in some scams he is alleged to be a police detective—is the convincer. The money involved is always so great that the victim wants to believe. In a 1979 incident in the Bronx, New York City, two sisters in their sixties leaped to their deaths in a joint suicide after realizing they had been swindled out of their life savings of $17,000 by a version of the pigeon drop.

Miss Piggott Special knockout drink

During the 1860s and 1870s a ferocious old woman known only as Miss Piggott operated one of the worst saloon-boardinghouses on San Francisco’s Barbary Coast, from which men were regularly shanghaied for long sea voyages. The secret of her success was the Miss Piggott Special, which was generally enough to lay any man low. She employed a runner to lure likely victims into her Davis Street saloon, where they would be served the Special, a drink composed of equal parts of gin, whiskey and brandy with a liberal lacing of laudanum. Such a drink would almost instantly leave a man shivering and defenseless, whereupon Miss Piggott would reach over the bar and clout the helpless man with a club. The victim would always be positioned over a trapdoor, and as he crumpled to the floor, Miss Piggott would push a lever that would open the trap and send the victim hurtling down to the basement onto a mattress, generously provided to safeguard the merchandise. When the man awoke, he would find himself aboard a ship standing out to sea from the Golden Gate, usually with no memory of what had happened to him. Regulars at Miss Piggott’s saloon were aware of where the trapdoor was and never stood on it, because it was understood that anyone fool enough to do so deserved to be dropped. Even when Miss Piggott passed from the scene in the 1870s, the Miss Piggott Special lingered on for many years as a tool of most shanghai operators until the advent of the more powerful Mickey Finn.

pillory colonial punishment method

Within the first year of its establishment, every new colony in America is believed to have used the pillory as a form of punishment. Usually consisting of a wooden frame with boards containing holes through which were placed the head and hands, and sometimes the legs, of an offender, it became one of the most common methods of punishing criminals in early America. New Orleans had two such devices, used, in turn, by the Spanish, French and Americans. One was the standard head and hands arrangement; the other held only the fingers of one or both hands with the first joints bent. A convicted man sentenced to the pillory sat on a platform, usually with a sign dangling from his neck that read:

My name is ———.

I am a thief [or whatever].

I stole from ———.

Sentenced to ——— days exposure at the pillory.

Someone undergoing such punishment was subjected to the ridicule of the town, and it was common practice for young boys and various riff-raff to hurl rotten fruit or garbage at the prisoner. The pillory fell into disfavor first in the South, where it was considered bad form to allow blacks to see whites so abused. Generally speaking, it continued as a punishment for whites until about 1839. New Orleans abandoned the practice in 1827 for whites but used it to punish blacks for another two decades.

Pineapple Primary 1928 Chicago election

A rash of political violence marred the 1928 Republican primary in Chicago, one that the press dubbed the “Pineapple Primary” because of the wholesale use of “pineapples,” or bombs, to intimidate voters and office seekers alike. Professional terrorists were employed by both sides, with the Capone gang supplying many or most of the tossers. The homes of candidates were bombed and several campaign workers killed.

In the primary, Sen. Charles S. Deneen’s wing of the party opposed the faction headed by Mayor Big Bill Thompson and State’s Attorney Robert E. Crowe. The latter forces, combined with those of Gov. Len Small, who was known as a friend of mobsters, controlled much of the patronage jobs in the state. On March 21, 1928 cafe owner and racketeer Diamond Joe Esposito was killed by a bomb. Esposito, the power behind the Genna bootlegging gang, was also close to Sen. Deneen. On the day of Esposito’s funeral, bombs were placed at the homes of Sen. Deneen and Judge A. Swanson, Deneen’s candidate for state’s attorney.

In addition to attracting worldwide attention, the violence of the Pineapple Primary roused Chicago voters the way no other of the city’s recent disruptive elections had, and the Deneen forces won easily despite Al Capone’s backing of the Thompson-Crowe machine. It was a stunning upset and one that sobered

PINKERTON, Allan

Capone. In the autumn of that year, crusader Frank J. Loesch, the 75-year-old president of the Chicago Crime Commission, called on Capone in an effort to ensure peaceful elections. He asked the gangster if the Pineapple Primary indicated what would happen in the general election.

Capone's response was flamboyant and arrogant. "I'll give you a square deal if you don't ask too much of me."

"Now look here, Capone," Loesch said. "Will you help me by keeping your damned cutthroats and hoodlums from interfering with the polling booths?"

"Sure," Capone responded. "I'll give them the word because they're all dagos up there, but what about the Saltis gang of micks on the West Side? They'll have to be handled different. Do you want me to give them the works, too?"

If Capone was trying to shock Loesch, he failed. The crusader said that would make him very happy.

"All right," Capone said. "I'll have the cops send over squad cars the night before the election and jug all the hoodlums and keep them in the cooler until the polls close."

Capone, who had often bragged, "I own the police," kept his word. On election day, police squad cars toured the polling places, and there was not a single irregularity. Actually, there was little need for Loesch to make the appeal, which only gave Capone a chance to grandstand, since the candidates were all anti-Thompson and thus anti-Capone. The mobster was merely making the best of a bad situation. Besides, he knew his position would not be significantly altered by the election; he would remain top man in Chicago until federal agents nailed him for income tax evasion.

Pinkerton, Allan (1819–1884) private detective

Although he was later to epitomize the establishment private detective, Allan Pinkerton, the founder of the agency that still bears his name, was something of a revolutionary in his youth. An agitator for labor reforms in Scotland, he evaded arrest only by emigrating to America at the age of 23. Settling in Kane County, Ill. he supported himself as a cooper while becoming an ardent abolitionist and an important cog in the "underground railroad" that smuggled runaway slaves to Canada. Pinkerton joined the Chicago police force and was appointed its first detective. Gaining fame in a number of cases, including the smashing of a large counterfeiting ring, he opened his own agency in 1850.

As a private detective, Pinkerton developed new police methods and techniques. He devised what was in effect the first rogues' gallery, compiling detailed descriptions of known criminals, including physical characteristics, peculiarities, background, friends and hideouts. He also devised methods of psychological warfare to use against offenders. Brought in to solve the 1856 murder of a bank teller, Pinkerton assigned a detective very similar in looks to the dead man to shadow a suspect named Drysdale. Faced with the constant sight of what appeared to be the man he had killed, Drysdale finally confessed and then, still shaken, committed suicide.

Pinkerton won a contract with the Illinois Central Railroad to supply it with guards and, in the process, became acquainted with its lawyer, Abraham Lincoln. At this time Pinkerton probably could have been described as being to the left of Lincoln. In 1859 John Brown hid out in his home with 11 runaway slaves. Pinkerton gained national fame when he uncovered a plot to kill Lincoln on a train scheduled to take Lincoln to Washington for his first inauguration and outwitted the plotters by putting Lincoln on an earlier train. He was then put in charge of Civil War secret service operations under Gen. George B. McClellan.

After the war Pinkerton came to be regarded as the ally and tool of big business interests in the North, especially by the unreconstructed Confederates of the border states and by workingmen attempting to organize. Pinkerton's men were also involved in unsuccessful hunts for the James-Younger gang. The James gang killed a Pinkerton spy trying to infiltrate the group, and in 1874 a top Pinkerton agent, Louis J. Lull, and Sheriff Ed Daniels of Osecola, Mo. died following a shoot-out with the Younger Brothers. Pinkerton earned the personal enmity of Jesse James when in 1875 his agents, thinking they had found the gang's hideout, open fired on a cabin and killed Jesse's eight-year-old half-brother and wounded his mother. On one occasion James went to Chicago expressly to kill Pinkerton but gave up when he was unable to corner the detective alone. James later said, "I know God some day will deliver Allan Pinkerton into my hands."

After Pinkerton died in 1884, the firm continued under the leadership of his sons, William and Robert.

Pinkerton's National Detective Agency

Started in 1850 by Allan Pinkerton, Pinkerton's National Detective Agency remains the premier organization of its type in the United States. Its organizational structure was used as a model for the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Initially, the Pinkertons handled cases that were criminal in nature and were called on by many communities whose own law enforcement capabilities were limited, corrupt or incompetent. In later years the agency accepted labor-management assignments. As numerous court cases were to prove, Pinkerton agents employed by management did not hesitate to promote violence that would discredit unions and frame and convict union leaders. Included among the agency's more unsavory episodes were Jay Gould's use of dozens of spies to break a strike against his Texas and Pacific Railroad in 1888; the infiltration of the mine workers organization at Coeur d'Alene, Idaho by agent Charles Siringo in 1894; and the efforts of the Pinkertons to involve labor leader William "Big Bill" Haywood in the murder of ex-Gov. Frank Steunenberg of Idaho in 1905. Finally, after a 1937 resolution by Congress declared labor spying unfair and illegal, the agency officially abolished its industrial division.

Piper, Thomas W. (1849–1876) mass murderer

In the 1870s, about 90 years before the Boston Strangler began his rampage, a mass murderer terrorized the city of Boston with a series of sex-related murders.

He committed four brutal murders and raped a number of young girls. The first victim was a girl named Bridget Landregan, who was attacked as she passed some bushes lining a snow-covered road on the night of December 5, 1873. The killer had clubbed her to death and was about to attack her body when a passerby happened along. The murderer, with black cloak flowing, fled. Later that same night, apparently the same assailant beat another girl bloody and raped her before being frightened off. Again, he was described as a black, batlike figure with a flowing cape. At the time, Boston Chief of Police Savage remarked to the press, "It was unseemly queer that only the nicest and most modest young ladies seem to get themselves raped."

When this fiend in black later killed two other girls, one in her own bedroom, the police and the public knew they had a real crime wave on their hands. As hysteria gripped the city, Chief Savage issued an order that all lone men seen wearing cloaks about the streets after dark were to be stopped and questioned, and for the following season opera cloaks fell out of fashion among the young blades of the town.

It was only after the killing of yet a fourth victim, a five-year-old girl named Mabel Hood Young, that the strange killer was found. His identity was a terrible shock to proper Bostonians. Little Mabel was murdered in the tower of the old Warren Avenue Baptist Church, and the murderer, 26-year-old Thomas W. Piper, the church sexton, had been seen taking her there. After the girl's body was discovered, Piper was arrested and soon confessed not only Mabel's murder but the previous murders as well.

Piper was tried and convicted only for the murder of little Mabel and sentenced to hang; he had in the meantime retracted all his confessions. Before he died, Piper once more admitted his crimes to Chief Savage, who asked him to commit them to paper. "I'll be hanged if I will," Piper snapped. Then he was hanged. There was no doubt Piper was the mass murderer, for the brutal killings by a man in a black cape ceased after his execution. In due course, opera cloaks returned to favor.

pipers police spies

The use of spies within police departments has been a rather common practice. Generally, such operators are referred to as "shoo flies" by police officers. In Chicago, however, they have been known as "pipers."

The origin of the term goes back to 1903, when the Chicago City Club brought in Capt. Alexander Piper of the New York Police Department, a former U.S. Army officer and future deputy police commissioner of New York, to conduct a secret study of the local force. The study, released to the newspapers on March 19, 1904, found that on the whole, the Chicago police force was both insufficient and inefficient. Many policemen were declared unfit for work "by reason of viciousness and bad habits." Ten percent of police personnel were either too fat or decrepit for active duty. Even worse, Piper concluded, the force was operating with no discipline, officers were afraid of crooks and lacked the intelligence to cope with criminal minds and many officers loafed and spent most of their tours of duty in saloons or soliciting bribes.

Under such severe criticism police officials gave Piper authority to establish a spy system within the department to root out wrongdoing. The work of these undercover operatives, who became known as "pipers," was hardly an unqualified success. While a few dishonest officers were identified, the pipers were often tricked by frame-ups of honest cops, who were then thrown off the force so that they would no longer interfere with various "fixes." Capt. Piper left Chicago hoping that curing the ills of the New York police would prove an easier task.

Piracy plagued the United States from early colonial days until almost the middle of the 19th century, when its practitioners were finally eliminated not so much by legal suppression as by advancing technology. Fast-moving steamships simply proved too large and quick for pirate attack.

Boston-based Dixey Bull, who raided the Massachusetts coast during the 1630s, is regarded as the first American pirate, and the 1632 expedition that unsuccessfully tried to catch him was the first effort by colonists to deal with piracy. Colonial sea lanes were a natural preying ground for pirates and the North American coastline provided an endless number of islands where the pirates could find sanctuary. Furthermore, colonial merchant vessels were, at best, lightly armed. During wartime the governors of various colonies licensed privateers to plunder enemy ships, and these violent men simply continued their activities against friendly shipping when peace arrived. Others, like Capt. William Kidd, who were commissioned to hunt down pirates simply turned to the activity themselves, finding it far easier to prey on helpless shipping than risk death in battle against genuine pirates. Pirates received aid from corrupt colonial governors, who offered their protection in exchange for a portion of the booty taken. Typical was the arrangement between the notorious Blackbeard (Edward Teach) and Carolina Gov. Charles Eden. Blackbeard was finally rooted out of his sanctuary on Ocracoke Island when Gov. Alexander Spotswood of Virginia, whose shipping the pirate often attacked, commissioned an expedition against him. Blackbeard was killed in 1718.

The early 18th century was the golden era of piracy along the North American coast, marked by the activity of Kidd, Stede Bonnet, the so-called Gentleman Pirate, and Capt. Calico Jack Rackham, whose crew featured two infamous woman pirates, Anne Bonney and Mary Read. The two women, who fought alongside the men, were finally captured by a British government ship in October 1720. Rackham was hanged but both women escaped the noose by claiming, falsely, to be pregnant, a condition that legally precluded their execution. Read, however, died of "prison fever" in her cell.

A new wave of piracy developed in North American coastal waters during the post-Revolutionary period, especially by privateers once again turned pirate. The actions of French "privateers" led to an undeclared naval war with France in the late 1790s. In the early 1800s the Gulf of Mexico was the preying ground of a number of pirates, the best known being Jean Lafitte, who received a pardon for his role in defeating the British at the Battle of New Orleans in 1815. However, a number of Lafitte's followers continued to plunder American shipping. Between 1814 and 1825 they and other pirates mounted over 1,500 attacks on U.S. ships, operating from the Gulf islands, Cuba and Puerto Rico. By 1827 they were finally driven from the last of their Caribbean strongholds by the U.S. Navy. Thereafter, thanks to the arrival of steamboats, piracy steadily diminished, although the last American pirate, Capt. Nathaniel Gordon, was hanged as late as 1862.

Pirates' Home corsair refuge

During the early years of the 19th century, an entire section of Louisiana shoreline, especially the many islands in the Bay of Barataria as well as the island of Grand Terre, became known collectively as Pirates' Home. Headquartered here were pirates, privateers and smugglers, including not only the legendary Jean Lafitte but also Rene Beluche, Dominique You (Captain Dominique), Cut Nose and the bloodthirsty Vincent Gambi. The Bay of Barataria afforded them a safe anchor for their ships from which they could sweep out and attack Spanish vessels in the Gulf of Mexico. U.S. shipping was not molested since Americans were the prime buyers of the stolen loot. Merchants from New Orleans and other southern cities trekked regularly to Pirates' Home to buy the expensive merchandise at bargain prices. The high point of local pirate activity occurred from 1810 to 1813, but in the following year the U.S. Army destroyed the pirate settlements. This action was not taken to accommodate other seagoing nations but because the illicit trade in Pirates' Home was materially reducing the governmental tax-revenues on incoming goods. Afterward, only those pirates who fought with Jean Lafitte at the Battle of New Orleans were allowed, for a time, to operate off the American coast.

Pittsburgh Phil (1908–1941) Murder, Inc.'s top hit man

Probably the most prolific and certainly the most cold-blooded professional hit man this country has ever seen, Harry Strauss, better known as Pittsburgh Phil, was the top killer of the national crime syndicate's enforcement arm, Murder, Inc. So far as is known, Strauss was never in Pittsburgh in his life, having been born and bred in Brooklyn; he just liked the sound of the name. He also liked committing murder; he often volunteered for murder contracts, as Brooklyn District Attorney William O'Dwyer once said, "sometimes just for the lust to kill."

“Like a ballplayer, that’s me,” he once told a friend, explaining his enthusiasm. “I figure I get seasoning doing these jobs. Somebody from one of the big mobs spots me. Then, up to the big leagues.”

And that’s just what happened. He made it into the Murder, Inc., and it got so that whenever a call came in from one of the out-of-town mobs for someone to fill a special “contract,” Phil was almost always the one requested. Phil would pack his briefcase with a shirt, a change of socks, underwear, a gun, a knife, a length of rope and an ice pick—he was an artist at a multitude of murdering methods—hop a plane or train to his port of call, pull the job and catch the next connection back to New York. More often than not, Phil didn’t even know the name of the person he had killed, and generally it didn’t matter to him. It was the killing that counted. If, by chance, he was curious about or particularly proud of a job, he would buy an out-of-town paper when he got back to New York and read all about it.

When the Murder, Inc. story broke wide open in 1940, O’Dwyer’s staff had concrete evidence linking Phil to 28 killings. In addition, an equal number of murders had been positively identified as Phil’s work by law enforcement officials from Connecticut to California. And those were just the known killings. A present-day crime historian gives serious credence to an estimate that Phil killed at least 500 persons from the late 1920s until 1940. The figure is sheer nonsense, but there seems little doubt his total kills probably exceeded 100. This is an incredible figure, especially considering the next two most active killers in the “troop”—Kid Twist Reles and Happy (so called because of his surly expression) Maione, probably did no more than 30 apiece.

Phil was the dandy of the troop. His love affair with Evelyn Mittleman, a Brooklyn beauty who was to be dubbed the Kiss of Death Girl, was one of the underworld’s more touching affairs, climaxed by Phil’s eradication of a rival for her affection. Tall, lean and handsome, Phil was a fashion plate. He wore the best suits $60 could buy—$60 in Depression times—and became known to the police and his colleagues alike as the Beau Brummel of the Underworld. Phil and his dandy dress, in fact, were what led to Police Commissioner Lewis J. Valentine’s famous “muss them up” orders against hoodlums. One day the commissioner had come over to Brooklyn to look at a lineup and blew his top when he saw Phil standing against the white wall radiant in a well-fitting Chesterfield, pearl-gray fedora, blue shirt with tie to match, blue striped suit and gleaming black shoes. “Look at him!” the commissioner raged. “He’s the best dressed man in the room and he’s never worked a day in his life!”

The commissioner was wrong about that. Phil was working very hard. In fact, he had the Brooklyn police toiling over one of his murders at that moment. The victim was George Rudnick, whom labor extortionist Louis Lepke had suspected of being an informer.

After getting a contract to hit Rudnick, Phil and a few of his confederates snatched the suspected stoolie one afternoon as he walked along Livonia Avenue. It was a short drive to the execution chamber, a garage at Atlantic Avenue and Eastern Parkway. A few hours later, Rudnick’s body turned up in a stolen car on the other side of the borough.

Deputy Chief Medical Examiner Dr. Edward Marten’s autopsy report detailed Phil’s savagery.

This was a male adult, somewhat undernourished; approximate weight 140 pounds; six feet in height. There were 63 stab wounds on the body. On the neck, I counted 13 stab wounds, between the jaw and collar-bone. On the right chest, there were 50 separate circular wounds. He had a laceration on the frontal region of the head. The wound gaped, and disclosed the bone underneath. His face was intensely cyanic, or blue. The tongue protruded. At the level of the larynx was a grooving, white and depressed, about the width of the ordinary clothesline. When the heart was laid open, the entire wall was found to be penetrated by stab wounds. My conclusion was the cause of death was multiple stab wounds, and also . . . asphyxia due to strangulation.

When the Purple Gang in Detroit marked a local gangster, Harry Millman, for death, they found him hard to kill; one attempt failed, and Millman thereafter was on his guard. Outside talent was needed and Pittsburgh Phil was one of two killers sent from Brooklyn. Millman was in a crowded restaurant eating dinner one evening when two men walked in, fired 12 slugs into him, wounding five other diners in the process, and paraded out. Sweet, direct and simple was the way Pittsburgh Phil liked it.

Phil could, at times, carry out a job with a touch of poetic irony. Walter Sage ran the syndicate’s coin machine racket in the Catskills until he became what the mob called a trolley car conductor, shortchanging the organization on its profits. Phil ice-picked him 32 times. He got rid of the body by lashing it to a pinball machine and dumping it in a lake. Phil was very proud of that touch. “It’s a symbol,” he asserted proudly.

A week later, however, the grisly package rose to the surface because of buoyancy from gases in the decomposing body. As Phil learned, perforations made with a small weapon, like an ice pick, are virtually sealed by blood pumping from a still-beating heart. “How about that,” Phil philosophized. “With this bum, you gotta be a doctor, or he floats.”

So far as is known, Phil failed on only one job. Traveling to Florida to fill a contract, he followed his intended victim into a movie theater, where the man sat down in the last row. Rather than use a gun, which would attract attention, Phil secured the fire ax kept in a glass case. However, by the time he’d gotten the ax, his intended victim had moved ahead several rows. Angered, Phil walked out. As he complained later to the troop, “Just when I get him set up, the bum turns out to be a goddamn chair hopper.”

Usually, though, he could get the job done regardless of any obstacles. In another Florida hit assignment, the victim was a Mafia old-timer who couldn’t speak a word of English. That didn’t faze Phil at all. Conversing with the man in sign language, Phil showed him his briefcase of weapons and led him to believe he’d come to kill someone else and wanted advice. The old-timer picked a rope and showed the hit man a dark street where the killing could be done safely. Phil strangled him there and went home.

How long Phil would have gone on with his killing had Kid Twist Reles not turned stoolie is something awesome to contemplate. Today, it seems incredible he could have operated for a decade without getting caught. Reles talked because he figured the law was closing in and if he didn’t, someone else in the troop would and he would get the chair.

Reles later horrified a Brooklyn jury with a description of how Phil had killed one Puggy Feinstein. Puggy was decoyed to Abe Reles’ house, where Phil was hiding behind the door, his trusty ice pick in hand. When Puggy walked in, Phil threw him on the couch and went to work with the pick. Puggy, fighting for his life, managed to bite Phil’s finger. Enraged by such foul play, Phil yelled: “Give me the rope. I’ll fix this dirty bum.”

Reles then described Phil’s mastery of the art of rope murder.

I give Phil one end of the rope, and I hold the other end. Puggy is kicking and fighting. He is forcing his head down, so we can’t get the rope under his throat. Buggsy [Buggsy Goldstein, another of the murder troop] holds his head up, so we can put the rope under. Then me and Phil exchange ends . . . cross them, so we make a knot . . . a twist. Then we cross them once more. Then we rope around his throat again, to make two loops.

Buggsy gets Puggy by the feet, and me and Phil get him by the head. We put him down on the floor. He is kicking. Phil starts finishing tying him up . . . [and] gets his feet tied up with the back of his neck. He ties him up like a little ball. His head is pushed down on his chest. His knees are folded up against his chest. His hands are in between. The rope is around his neck and under his feet. If he moves the rope will tighten up around his throat more.

And so Puggy Feinstein died with Phil kicking him for biting his finger. “Maybe I am getting lockjaw from being bit,” Phil yelled defensively.

Later, they dumped Puggy’s body in a vacant lot and set it ablaze. But even after the boys adjourned to Sheepshead Bay for a seafood dinner, Phil was unhappy about his finger and barely finished his lobster.

The break in the Murder, Inc. case came when a few minor hoods were arrested and started talking. Phil, Reles, Maione and Goldstein were picked up on suspicion and the word went out that one or the other was “ratting.” None had, but Reles decided to tell all, and when he did, Murder, Inc. was smashed. Big shots like Louis Lepke, Mendy Weiss and Louis Capone were to die in the electric chair before Reles’ trilling came to a sudden end when he “went out the window” of a Brooklyn hotel while under police guard. Pittsburgh Phil was also doomed. He and Buggsy Goldstein were indicted for the Puggy Feinstein murder.

The authorities secured five more murder indictments and, if necessary, were ready to try him on those as well. It wasn’t. Since he had no real defense, Phil did the next best thing: he feigned insanity. He refused to shave or change his clothes. When put on the witness stand and asked to give his name, he merely licked his lips. Sent back to the defendant’s chair, he spent most of the rest of the trial nibbling on the leather strap of a lawyer’s briefcase. It was a great act. The newspapers loved it. The jury didn’t. They found him guilty.

Phil kept up his crazy act in the death house in the hope of winning a commutation. It wasn’t until his last day that he gave up the act, combed his hair and became his old swaggering self. He said goodbye to Evelyn, the Kiss of Death Girl. On June 12, 1941 Buggsy Goldstein went to the chair. Moments later, at 11:06 P.M., Phil followed him. The best enforcer the syndicate ever had was dead.

Only later was it revealed that prior to his trial Phil had offered to turn state’s evidence if he was allowed to talk to Reles first. The request was rejected. The authorities had no intention of letting Phil get in the same room with informer Reles. It was a wise precaution. As Phil said on his last day in the death house, he really had no intention of singing. “I just wanted to sink my tooth into his jugular vein. I didn’t worry about the chair, if I could just tear his throat out first.”

No one doubted he would have tried to.

Place, Etta (1880?–?) “associate” of Wild Bunch

Probably the most beautiful woman in the outlaw West, Etta Place was described in a Pinkerton dossier as an “associate of outlaws.” More precisely, she appears to have been associated with two prime members of the Wild Bunch, Butch Cassidy and Harry Longbaugh, the Sundance Kid, although most of her affections seem to have been reserved for Sundance. She was tall and stately with raven black hair. Even the other women at Robber’s Roost commented on her beauty when she first appeared there during the winter of 1896–97. Some historians insist she was a schoolteacher at the time she first met Butch and Sundance and rode with them on the outlaw trail. That hardly seems likely considering that she was, by fairly reliable accounts, born in or near Denver about 1880, making her a bit young for that profession. According to other historians, Etta was a former prostitute from Fanny Porter’s bordello in Fort Worth, Tex., a far more logical place than a schoolhouse for Cassidy and Sundance to find a female companion.

Etta is credited with having been an expert rider and a first-rate shot with both a Colt .45 and a Winchester. She rode with the gang on a number of jobs but hung back from direct involvement. Her total devotion to the pair may best be illustrated by the fact that she always tagged along with them on their fleshpot forays, waiting dutifully in a hotel room for their return. Her forgiving or unjealous nature is further attested to by the Sundance Kid’s known propensity for “catching cold,” a whorehouse euphemism for contracting venereal disease, and Etta’s understanding aid in caring for him during such periods of illness.

In 1901, with the law hot on their trail, Cassidy and Sundance decided to leave outlaw country and, with Etta in tow, headed first for New York City and then, the following year, for South America. From here on, the Cassidy-Sundance-Place story is conjecture. One account has Etta sticking with the pair for some time while they hit the South American bandit trail and finally returning to New York to get medical treatment for “acute appendicitis”—quite likely an ailment more social in nature. The Sundance Kid supposedly accompanied her to New York but returned to Cassidy in time for the two of them to get killed in a battle with Bolivian soldiers. In this version, Etta Place simply fades away.

Another version states that she stuck with the pair until she and Sundance got separated from Cassidy with no way of resuming contact. Years later, according to Butch Cassidy’s sister, Lula Parker Betenson, the outlaw returned to the West and drifted down to Mexico. One day he was sitting in a bar in Mexico City when suddenly he felt a grip on his shoulder. His first thought plastic surgery for criminals criminality “cure”

Many criminals, such as John Dillinger, Alvin “Creepy” Karpis and several of the Barkers, among others, have attempted to alter their appearance by undergoing plastic surgery so as to avoid detection. Overall, these attempts have been failures, but plastic surgery has been used quite successfully to rehabilitate criminals, both professionals and amateurs.

Does an ugly face or a disfigured body help mold an ugly character? Ever since the time of Homer, poets and novelists have contended as much and today psychiatrists and criminologists tend to agree. One leading department store in New York City employs a psychiatrist to examine persons caught shoplifting provided they are not known professional crooks. Very often, these persons are respectable middle-aged women with no economic pressures forcing them to steal. This is not an unusual phenomenon, according to psychiatrists. Shoplifting, they recognize, is largely a woman's crime that often stems from psychological problems related to a growing dissatisfaction with marital relations. As a wife grows older and wrinkles start to develop, they theorize she may feel she is losing her husband and turn to shoplifting as an exciting way to forget her gnawing self-doubts.

The New York department store psychiatrist frequently gives such women what may seem like odd advice: have your face lifted. "Where such recommendations are followed, I have never heard of the woman reverting to shoplifting," the psychiatrist observes.

For many years a unique plastic surgery program run by Dr. John Pick was instrumental in rehabilitating inmates in the Illinois prison system. The theory is that a new face makes a new man, and the records of hundreds of released convicts bear out that claim. On average, only about one in 25 returns to prison, an impressive record compared to the general rate of recidivism. Typical of those Dr. Pick reformed through surgery was a man who had led an entirely respectable life until he lost his nose in an accident. He soon wound up in prison. Then there was the man with a broken nose and mastiff jowls who took to crime after his seven-year-old son remarked: "Daddy, you look just like a bad man. Why don't you change your face?" Pick did precisely that at Joliet, and Daddy became a law-abiding delicatessen owner.

When Dr. Pick first started taking a day off from his lucrative private practice in the 1940s to help out convicts while testing his theory that ugliness breeds crime, he met considerable official indifference. Most prison officials were concerned with only three things, in the following order: keeping prisoners safely behind bars; controlling unruly prisoners, and rehabilitating prisoners, very often with programs that had been scaled down as a result of insufficient funds.

Fortunately, the warden of Joliet at the time Dr. Pick began his work was James E. Ragen, then regarded as one of the most enlightened wardens in the country. Ragen gave Pick his full support and cooperation. The doctor's first patient was a youth who was born with upside-down ears. It seemed hardly surprising that someone with such a disfigurement would wind up a criminal. Pick's surgery was a success and the young man, for the first time, lost his hostility toward society. Once the door of Joliet swung open for him, he never returned.

"Ultimately, of course," Dr. Pick once recalled, "the fellows down at Springfield [the state capital] heard about the project and began to wonder if we were lifting faces and changing fingerprints. Naturally, we take careful before-and-after pictures, recording all changes in appearance."

The project won over the doubters as its astounding results gradually became more evident. Warden Ragen, for one, reported that convicts who had undergone plastic surgery became much more manageable prisoners.

The files at Joliet bulge with hundreds of testimonials from released prisoners. Some typical messages have been: "I have a new life," "Nobody laughs at me any more" and "I can hold a good job now."

Once asked why he had ever started his prison work, Dr. Pick explained:

First of all there was a chance to make a contribution to society which also might bear scientific fruit. Then there was a sense of guilt. I long ago became convinced that the reasons why a man becomes a criminal rest only half within himself. The other half of the story is within society. We do nothing about the fact that society rejects the deformed, but at least we owe them understanding.

Of course, Dr. Pick did not always succeed in bringing about a reformation of his patients. Sometimes the physically improved criminals went right back to their wrongful ways, and formerly ugly criminals who had worked as sneak thieves and burglars were able to promote themselves into dapper confidence operators and rubber check artists. This did not destroy Dr. Pick's basic beliefs, however, nor alter the fact that most of his operations were successful. Among those criminals who did not reform, physical disfigurement was obviously not the basis for their criminal behavior.

Still, Dr. Pick realized his work was to some extent too little and certainly too late. Physical disfigurements, he found, weigh most on children from six to 16 and this is the critical period in determining whether or not a child goes bad. "The reform school is the place to begin," he once said. "We could hope thus to stop a criminal career right at the start."

A survey conducted in the 1950s by Dr. Anna Brind, a consulting psychologist on the staff of the American Institute of Family Relations, supported Dr. Pick's observations. Brind made a detailed analysis of the cases of 180 children who were suffering from personality disorders. All of them had a facial disfigurement of one sort or another. In 85 percent of the cases, it was concluded that facial defects were the main cause of the children's misbehavior.

It should be noted that Bonnie Parker of Bonnie and Clyde fame was often called horse face when she was a girl, and as a child, Pretty Boy Floyd had sought to dandify himself because he was unhappy about his appearance. Had Pretty Boy Floyd actually been pretty he might never have become a public enemy.

The unfortunate aspect of the Illinois plastic surgery rehabilitation program is that to this day it remains almost unique despite a long record of remarkable achievement.

plea bargaining

The principle of plea bargaining, the reduction of a criminal charge to a lesser offense in exchange for a guilty plea, has long been accepted in the criminal justice system, although not without misgivings by many judges, prosecutors, defense lawyers and defendants.

The Supreme Court has in effect approved of the process. In a 1970 case it said:

For a defendant who sees slight possibility of acquittal, the advantages of pleading guilty and limiting the probable penalty are obvious—his exposure is reduced, the correctional processes can begin immediately, and the practical burdens of a trial are eliminated. For the State there are also advantages—the more promptly imposed punishment after an admission of guilt may more effectively attain the objective of punishment; and with the avoidance of trial, scarce judicial and prosecutorial resources are conserved for those cases in which there is a substantial issue of the defendant's guilt or in which there is substantial doubt that the State can sustain its burden of proof. It is this mutuality of advantage that perhaps explains the fact that at present well over three-fourths of the criminal convictions in this country rest on pleas of guilty.

Against this might be the view of Alice in Wonderland, who was offended by the Queen of Heart's logic that the sentence should come first and the verdict and trial later. What is plea bargaining other than setting the sentence first with the trial and verdict not simply postponed but eliminated from the process? In effect, plea bargaining is seldom a "bargain" for either side; usually, the prosecution has the best of it because it can set the standards to be applied in each case. It does not bargain if it does not want to, and the system allows a prosecutor to insist one defendant must be brought to trial while another is not. Even if the decisions in both cases are right, only one side is making them.

In every jurisdiction in the country the percentage of felony cases reduced to misdemeanors is enormous, but this does not necessarily indicate excessive leniency is the rule in prosecutors' offices. To induce plea bargaining, many district attorneys deliberately file excessive charges against a defendant to frighten him. Another trick used by prosecutors is to ask for extremely high bail, because it is well established that a prisoner kept in jail for a time is more likely to accept a lesser charge. And a system geared to plea bargaining arrangements actually is more prone to convict innocent persons. An innocent man, opponents of plea bargaining argue, is even more frightened of the prospect of going to jail than a guilty person and will tend to grasp at any offer that suggests the possibility of a mere suspended sentence. It has been shown that fear of the death penalty has led innocent suspects to plea bargaining.

In recent years probably a majority of judges, prosecutors and defense attorneys have felt that plea bargaining is a poor practice, but they also feel trapped by the sheer volume of cases and the shortage of courts and personnel.

In 1980 it was revealed that more than 99 percent of all persons subjected to felony arrests in New York state—not an atypical jurisdiction—never served a day in a state prison. The chance of a given felony arrest ending in a sentence to state prison was put at about one in 108. The year before in New York City, 88,098 felony arrests out of a total of 104,413 were dismissed by district attorneys or treated as misdemeanors. In trying to determine who is to blame for the excessive use of plea bargaining, disputes have broken out between prosecutors and the police. District attorneys insist police tend to "overcharge" (one explanation for this practice is that officers win promotions for felony arrests, not for misdemeanor arrests), while the police deny this and point to the classification by prosecutors of certain offenses as "technical felonies," which are charges the DAs simply refuse to prosecute.

A spokesman for the Queens County district attorney in New York City said: "Every felony is not a felony when someone looks at it in detail. A judgment has to be made. How serious was it? Does the guy have a record? All this has a bearing on it."

Yet essentially, in deciding not to prosecute certain charges, i.e., technical felonies, the district attorney is substituting his judgment of what constitutes a crime for that of the legislature. Asked to justify this, Manhattan District Attorney Robert M. Morgenthau stated: "We try to make the best use of limited resources. The public does not benefit from presenting a case to the grand jury, getting an indictment and having it end up as a misdemeanor plea."

Clearly, the trend throughout the nation is more and more toward plea bargaining. A typical case might be that of a burglar caught breaking into a building with the intent to steal silver. Facing a charge for which he could be sentenced to seven years in prison, he would probably be allowed to plead guilty to trespass and possession of burglar's tools, both misdemeanors, and get off with no more than a few months in jail. Only the most enthusiastic supporter of plea bargaining would argue that such an arrangement would "more effectively attain the [State's] objective of punishment."

Plug Uglies 19th-century New York gang

One of the very first gangs spawned by the notorious Five Points section of New York, the Plug Uglies were fierce both in action and in appearance. They looked like tall, black-clad versions of Uncle Sam. Some writers insist they maintained membership standards on height that prohibited anyone who was not at least six feet tall. More likely, it never occurred to a short thug to try to become a Plug Ugly. The gangsters got their name because of the high plug hats they wore, which, stuffed with wool and leather scraps, was pulled down over the ears to serve as a most effective helmet. Nothing could stir quite as much fear in 1825 New York as the sight of an approaching Plug Ugly looking for trouble or loot. In one hand the giant gangster might carry a brick, in the other a heavy bludgeon. He would have a pistol tucked in his belt and he would be wearing heavy hobnailed boots, ideal for trampling a fallen victim or enemy gangster.

The Plug Uglies remained awesome figures in the New York underworld for decades, taking an active part in the Civil War Draft Riots of 1863. They began disappearing toward the end of the 19th century, being merged into the then dominant gangs, such as the Whyos and the Five Points Gang.

Plummer, Henry (1837–1864) renegade lawman

Probably the inspirational protagonist of more tales, novels and films than any other American, Henry Plummer was the original devious sheriff unmasked at the end of a drama as the villainous leader of the badmen. However, few novelists or screenwriters have dared to ascribe to their characters all the villainies attributable to Plummer himself. While not all of Plummer's depredations have been unearthed, the popularly held belief that he personally killed 15 men may be reasonably accurate. There is little doubt that his gang of outlaws—most of whom were several years younger than Plummer, who was only in his mid-twenties—killed 102 victims during its brief existence.

Plummer was a handsome, well-spoken and ingratiating young man who had a magnetic effect on the pioneer people of several regions. When he ran away from his New England home at age 15, Plummer showed little of his future tendencies. He worked his way to California, where he went into partnership in a bakery. In 1856, when he was only 19 years old, he became marshal of Nevada City, Calif. While in office he killed an irate husband who objected to the young lawman having an affair with his wife and was sentenced to 10 years in prison. Within a year Plummer had wrangled a pardon and went back to the bakery business. His troubles with the law multiplied as he continued sweeping ladies off their feet and committing various mayhems. He apparently robbed a Wells Fargo office in Washoe and eventually murdered another man. He was apprehended but escaped by bribing a jailer before being brought to trial.

Plummer moved on to Oregon, where he is believed to have shot a sheriff to death. He later carried out a number of criminal and amorous affairs in Washington and then turned up in Orofino, Idaho, where he definitely took part in the murder of a man. In the spring of 1861 Plummer worked in a gambling emporium in Lewiston, Idaho but spent his spare time recruiting a band of thieves and road agents. As the gang's depredations grew, the local citizenry organized a vigilance committee, of which Plummer was a leading member. In an effort to break up the vigilantes, Plummer had one of their leaders assassinated.

In the fall of 1862, Plummer shifted his base of operations to Bannack, Mont., where miners were making rich strikes. Portraying himself as a fearless vigilante from Lewiston and a former lawman in California, Plummer was soon elected sheriff. As the Plummer gang, or Innocents, as they were called, increased its activities, the sheriff somberly erected a scaffold from which to hang malefactors. The few who were executed by Plummer were not his henchmen, some of whom served as deputy sheriffs. The Innocents were such a huge organization that not every member knew all the others, so that they had to operate with secret identifications and handshakes. Some worked only as spies, learning which stagecoach or wagon carried loot worth robbing and marking them with coded symbols.

Plummer soon expanded his operations into Virginia City, becoming the town's marshal by forcing the previous holder of the post to flee the area. Plummer's fatal flaws, which were shared by his gang, were that he operated with what one historian called "an almost juvenile fervor" and that he failed to cover his tracks sufficiently. The end came when a former confederate, Jack Cleveland, attempted to blackmail Plummer into giving him a large portion of the profits from the gang's lucrative crimes. Plummer gunned him down in a saloon but didn't realize he was still breathing. A local butcher, Hank Crawford, took Cleveland to his home, where, over the next several hours the dying outlaw whispered a number of facts about Plummer.

Crawford, in turn, began whispering these same facts to others until Plummer drove him from the area. Soon, the settlers of the Bannack and Virginia City area formed another vigilance committee, one that did not include Sheriff Plummer in its counsels. What followed was one of the most notable outbreaks of lynch law in America. From late 1863 through the end of the following year, the Vigilantes of Montana hanged dozens of Innocents and other suspected criminals. Oddly, even when some of his key men were strung up, Plummer himself made no effort to flee, apparently convinced he could brazen it out. A theory embedded in Montana folklore holds that Plummer made a deal, or thought he made a deal, with some of the leading vigilantes: immunity in exchange for a portion of the outlaw loot. If that was the case, he was double-crossed.

On January 10, 1864 a weeping Plummer and two of his henchmen were hauled to the very gallows the rogue lawman had built himself. Plummer begged for mercy, pleading that instead of hanging, he should have his tongue cut out and his legs or all his limbs cut off and be left in a cabin in the hills. Unimpressed, the vigilantes placed a rope around the neck of each man, hoisted them on their shoulders and flipped them into the air; they slowly strangled to death.

Poker Alice (1851–1930) gambler and madam

One of the few great female gamblers of the West, Poker Alice Ivers was also one of the few gamblers who was an accomplished gunfighter.

Born in England the daughter of a schoolmaster, Alice came to America with her family at the age of 12 and married an engineer named Frank Duffield in Colorado Territory when she was 19. Her husband died in a mining accident the following year, and Alice began supporting herself by teaching school. She also took up poker and was soon dealing cards in a saloon on a percentage basis. Any traces of schoolmarm decorum soon vanished completely as she began toting a gun and smoking big black cigars. She became famous for two sayings "I'll shoot you in your puss, you cheating bastard!" and "I never gamble on Sundays."

Poker Alice, as she was by then known, worked the railroad gambling circuit, beating fellow travelers in high-stake card games. She later settled in Creede, Colorado and dealt cards in a saloon belonging to Bob Ford, the man who killed Jesse James. From there Poker Alice moved on to Deadwood, S.D., where she demonstrated her shooting prowess one night when a drunken miner accused another dealer, William Tubbs, of cheating and went at him with a bowie knife. Poker Alice drew her gun and fired, shooting the miner in his arm and knocking the knife from his hand.

Alice and Tubbs were married in 1899 and retired from gambling to run a chicken farm until 1910, when Tubbs died of pneumonia. Poker Alice then took up her gun, cigars and cards and headed back for the gaming tables, opening her own place near Fort Meade, S.D. Realizing that men do not live by gambling alone, she stocked the second floor with ladies who offered other diversions. Poker Alice's place was a gold mine, relying on a clientele of soldiers from the fort. But Alice held to her old-fashioned ways. On Sundays drinks were served but there was no gambling and the ladies upstairs did no entertaining. It was this reluctance to be completely accommodating that got Poker Alice in trouble. One night in 1920 a bunch of drunken soldiers tried to break into her place after closing time. Alice fired through a door and a soldier fell dead. She was tried and found guilty of killing the soldier, but the judge let her go, saying, "I cannot find it in my heart to send a white-haired lady to the penitentiary." Once outside the court and beyond the judge's view, Poker Alice lit up a victory cigar.

The army was not so compassionate, however, and declared Alice's place off limits. That and Prohibition drove Poker Alice out of business and she retired to a ranch to smoke cigars and recall the good old days. She died in 1930.

The colonies and later the young nation muddled through with rather amateurish crime-fighting methods until the 1830s, when in city after city near anarchy forced the introduction of more professional techniques. The police department system that developed at this point was intended to battle mob rule rather than what is recognized as ordinary, or pedestrian-type, crime: theft, mayhem and murder.

The first policing procedures adopted by the colonies were patterned after the English parish constable system. In England noblemen appointed constables, that country's first local law enforcement figure, to police rural parishes. The counties traditionally were policed by a sheriff.

POLICE

From 1608 to 1783 American sheriffs and constables were large landowners appointed by the colonial governors. Many of them had the added duty of being the chief local financial officer, who collected taxes and other fees and kept 10 percent of the proceeds as recompense. This method of policing was sufficient only until the crime problem started to increase. In Boston additional means of policing proved necessary in the 1630s, when the first night watch was formed, consisting initially of a military officer and six soldiers. Later, the night watch was expanded and, probably as an economy measure, was staffed with citizens appointed by the town government. Philadelphia and New Amsterdam armed their night watches with rattles, probably the first effort at crime prevention, rather than crime detection. The ratelwacht, or rattlewatch, as the patrols came to be known, used their rattles not so much to corner felons as to warn of their own presence and thus, hopefully, put any nocturnal marauders to flight.

These methods continued to be used throughout the 18th and into the 19th century, although some localities hired their night watchmen and supplemented them with special "day forces" to assist the constable. Of course, more stringent measures were adopted in areas where the crime problem became more acute. In Virginia's backwoods frontier during the 18th century, the practice of lynching won its name as a result of the activities of Colonel William Lynch, whose band of law enforcers exacted their own punishment, including the ultimate penalty, on a number of evildoers.

Overall, however, through the 17th century criminality was not a major problem in most localities. In New Amsterdam the first recorded police activity was by one Johan Lampo, a provincial Dutch authority who had arrived in 1620. His first known arrest was the collaring of a pig thief. In post-Dutch New York the first salaried officers on the night watch were known as leatherheads, because of the heavy leather helmets they wore, similar in style to those worn by today's firemen. The leatherheads were supposed to patrol the streets but some spent far too much time in their sentry boxes.

This relatively peaceful era ended a few decades into the 19th century with the appearance of the first great city gangs, mostly immigrant Irish toughs jammed into the new slums. New York's Cherry Street, where George Washington and John Hancock had strolled so peacefully just a few decades earlier, was now the domain of criminals. These gangs made the area unsafe not only by night but by day as well. In the mid-1830s riots took place in city after city. There were food riots, election riots and the first mob attacks on abolitionists. At the same time, Catholic immigrants fought Protestant nativists in street battles that lasted for days. Since the constables and watches could not cope with such anarchy, professional police forces came into being.

These new police were generally a ragtag, motley crowd. Law enforcement jobs were given strictly on a political basis, and officers usually served only a one-year term and could thus be fired at whim by local aldermen. No training was given to them and they usually had no uniforms, which were considered too European and undemocratic in style. An officer could only be recognized by the badge he wore, and when prudence dictated, he could hide the symbol of his authority. These policemen were, at best, only marginally more successful than their predecessors, and it was not until the 1850s that reform movements succeeded in making police forces efficient and effective crime fighters. In 1855 the Boston Police Department was reorganized and reformed into what became a fairly efficient organization.

The evolution of the police department in New York City was somewhat more troubled. The Municipal Police were formed in 1853 but by 1857 they were considered so corrupt and inefficient that the state legislature set up a new force called the Metropolitans. Many officers remained loyal to the Municipals, who refused to disband, and soon, they and the Metropolitans faced each other in open warfare on the streets, much to the benefit of criminals and the detriment of the public. The rivalry between the two forces led to a great battle at City Hall, in which 52 officers were injured. Public pressure and a Supreme Court decision finally led to the disbanding of the Municipals.

State police forces held sway for the next 13 years, with such cities as Baltimore, St. Louis, Kansas City, Detroit, Cleveland and Chicago utilizing state-controlled police. Eventually, local forces reappeared in virtually every jurisdiction in the country.

Often in the West formal policing methods were unavailable and citizens banded together to protect their lives and property through such institutions as miners courts and vigilante committees, both of which dealt out instant justice. Many of the latter groups were not lynch mobs but honest men forced to take collective action. Later on, more formal policing took place under the leadership of such legendary law officers as Wyatt Earp, Bat Masterson, Wild Bill Hickok, Pat Garrett and others, whose achievements were often wildly exaggerated. Many lawmen habitually crossed over to the outlaw trail and back again, their final reputations often being determined on which side of the law they were operating at the time of their demise.

Women were slow to enter police work and were initially restricted to police matron duties. Lucy Gray, the first Los Angeles police matron, was a pioneer woman in the criminal justice system. By the 1880s Gray, who had come west with her family in a covered wagon, had set up a police department position to aid women and children, both victims and offenders, who were not getting appropriate care. Fearless and kind, she was renowned for her ability to calm unruly prisoners and eventually earned the title of City Mother. Technically, she was not a policewoman, although she performed many of the duties associated with that job.

The first uniformed policewoman in the United States, and most likely in the world, was Mrs. Alice Stebbins Wells, who joined the Los Angeles police force in 1910. Within six years 16 other departments that had monitored the Los Angeles experiment hired policewomen. Buffalo hired the first black policewoman in 1924. (There seems to be no accurate record of where the first black policeman appeared.)

Police scandals and reform movements have occurred in almost every major city. In New York, investigations of the police department take place about once every generation; the next one should be due about 2000. Two future U.S. presidents led local police reform movements and occupied law posts themselves, Grover Cleveland in Buffalo, N.Y. and Theodore Roosevelt in New York City.

Lewis J. Valentine stands out as a towering figure in uprooting corruption in the New York Police Department during the tenure of Fiorello La Guardia. William H. Parker, head of the Los Angeles force for 16 years until his death in 1966, is credited by many reformers with building the nation's preeminent law enforcement agency and substantially raising the professional quality of his men. Undeniably, J. Edgar Hoover accomplished miracles in upgrading the FBI to a position of national respect from the morass of venality, corruption and incompetence that characterized the agency during the Wilson and Harding administrations, when it was known as the Bureau of Investigation.

Through the decades cases of police brutality continued to escalate. And in the 1990s, they could be said to have reached a crescendo on the night of March 3, 1991, when a black motorist named Rodney King was savagely beaten by four policemen while a number of other members of the Los Angeles Police department looked on. In many respects the case should have remained routine, with police denying any untoward actions. Indeed King himself told his lawyer that he doubted his claims would be accepted—the word of a black man against a number of white officers.

However, there was a unique wrinkle in the case. It turned out an amateur videotape of the incident had been made by George Holliday. The sight of the policemen, at least three of them, repeatedly clubbing and kicking the prostrate King became one of the most viewed videos, not only in this country but around the world. After a disputed first trial, King was vindicated by a jury verdict that convicted two officers and won King a multimillion dollar award. The city of Los Angeles also had been wracked by social disorder, and possibly for the first time the vast majority of Americans of all hues condemned police brutality. A Newsweek poll indicated that 62 percent of those polled believed that police brutality was a significant problem for minority communities.

A case that would be regarded even more horrendous occurred in New York in 1997 when 32-year-old Haitian immigrant prisoner Abner Louima was brutalized in a police station house bathroom. Officer Justin A. Volpe, white, was convicted of ramming a stick up Louima's rectum, inflicting severe internal injuries that required three operations, an attack that inflamed racial tensions in the city. Volpe was sentenced to 30 years, a penalty that did not please many in the black community who thought a more appropriate punishment would have been life without parole. A second white officer, Charles Schwarz, was convicted of aiding Volpe in the bathroom and faced a lengthy sentence.

The Louima case crystallized other charges against the New York police by minorities that officers constantly engaged in aggressive suppression against them and resulted in a number of unwarranted deadly shootings against blacks and Hispanics. A case that heightened minority tensions was the shooting death February 4, 1999 of Amadou Diallo, a West African immigrant. Police gunned Diallo down in a fusillade of 41 bullets in the vestibule of the victim's apartment building. The police claimed their shooting was not excessive since they mistakenly thought Diallo, who had no criminal record, was reaching for a gun. Diallo was guilty of no offense.

When the trial was ordered moved out of the Bronx, a community with only 35 percent whites and 38 percent African-American and 51 percent Hispanic (who could be of any race) to Albany with 88 percent whites and only 12 percent African-American or Hispanic, outrage consumed the New York minority community. They were ever mindful when such a transfer of a case to what they called a "lily white" community had resulted in the state acquittal of Rodney King's attackers in their first trial. Although the court handed down an acquittal, the verdict did not lead to the predicted wide-scale violence in protest.

If so certainly minority tensions with the police tactics could only increase, as it has in what African-Americans feel is also the case in matters of "racial profiling." For years black voices have protested a police tactic whereby black motorists appeared to be far more likely to be stopped on highways than were whites. In some such cases shooting deaths resulted. Standardly, police agencies have consistently denied racial profiling, but finally in New Jersey the Whitman administration admitted that the state police had done so on a regular basis. This followed in the aftermath of two troopers shooting four minority men on the New Jersey Turnpike. Lawyers for the men insisted the men had be stopped in a racial profile tactic. The two troopers faced trial on charges of attempted murder in the matter in 2000, and in another case they were indicted on charges of falsifying records to conceal racial profiling in other traffic stops.

Polls showed the public in general thought law agencies had engaged in racial profiling in many areas.

Despite many continuing charges of police corruption and brutality, there is little doubt that the policeman of today is far superior, professionally and morally, to his counterpart of earlier years. Much of today's abuse of power by the police is directed at such ethnic groups as blacks and Hispanics, but the fault may lie less in the role of the policemen than in the prejudice and indifference of society in general.

It is estimated that about 400 police agencies in the United States employ police dogs, or K-9 squads, as they are popularly known. The first use of dogs in police work occurred in Ghent, Belgium in 1900. Since then the duties of police canines have expanded. Each year "pot hounds" for the U.S. Customs Service sniff out a minimum of $100 million to $200 million in contraband narcotics. Intrepid, a golden retriever, became the Florida drug-sniffing champion by uncovering $16 million worth of drugs in Dade County in less than two years.

The most-used breed of police dog is the German shepherd, which has an excellent nose and can pick up scents as tiny as one-millionth that discernible by a human. Dogs have a better record of locating explosives than do bomb-detecting machines, and at a total cost of about $4,000 for training and $3 or $4 per day for maintenance, they have proved to be a bargain for cost-conscious police departments, which have also found that a policeman accompanied by a dog is a far greater crime deterrent than two officers. The armed forces use a great number of dogs for sentry duty and department stores keep them to sniff out thieves who try to hide until after closing time, loot the store and slip out the following morning.

Police Riots of 1857, New York

warring police forces

The Police Riots of 1857 in New York between two rival forces of law officers climaxed several months of terror in New York City during which policemen battled policemen while criminals attacked citizens with impunity. Even when apprehended, a criminal could escape if a member of the rival police force happened on the scene and got into an altercation with his counterpart.

The Municipal Police was formed by the state legislature in 1853, but within four years, during the second term of Mayor Fernando Wood, it was considered so chaotic and corrupt that the legislature intervened to abolish the force it had created. In its place the state lawmakers installed the Metropolitan Police, with the governor appointing a board of five commissioners, who in turn named a superintendent, Frederick Talmadge. The new Metropolitan Police Board then called on the mayor to disband the Municipals. Mayor Wood refused, however, even after the Supreme Court ruled in May 1857 that the law creating the new force was constitutional. Superintendent George W. Matsell of the Municipals stood by the mayor, as did 15 captains and 800 patrolmen.

Things came to a head when Capt. George W. Walling, who had pledged his loyalty to the new force, was sent to place Mayor Wood under arrest. When Wood refused to submit, Walling tried to take him in by force, but with 300 Municipals inside City Hall, he had no chance and was tossed into the street. Immediately thereafter, a troop of 50 Metropolitan police officers marched on City Hall, a striking image in their plug hats and frock coats. The Municipals swarmed out of the building and attacked them and the battle was on, eventually extending to the corridors of the City Hall. Finally, the Metropolitan police officers were routed. In all 52 policemen were injured, one Metropolitan was so badly beaten he was invalided for life.

The mayor and his police supporters held out until the members of the Metropolitan Police Board used the power granted them to call out the National Guard. The Seventh Regiment surrounded City Hall. Only when a platoon of infantry with fixed bayonets marched into the building and surrounded Mayor Wood in his office did he submit to arrest. He was released on nominal bail on a charge of inciting to riot and returned to his office.

Confrontations continued the entire summer, with each of the two forces attempting to carry out its functions. The public itself was to bear the heavy brunt of the dispute. When a Municipal arrested a criminal, a Metropolitan would come along and release him and vice versa, as the feud became more important than the protection of the citizenry. While the police argued the criminals simply went about their business. Pedestrians were held up on Broadway in the middle of the day, while rival officers attacked each other with clubs to determine who had the right to interfere. Soon, large gangs of thieves plundered stores and other places of business and robbed passengers on stagecoaches in the city's midst. The gangs turned on each other, fighting for the robbing rights in certain areas, and a great battle between rival gangs broke out in the Bowery. A handful of Metropolitan police officers tried to stop the fighting but were severely beaten. The Municipals simply said the battle was none of their business, leaving it to the Metropolitan police officers.

Whenever a Metropolitan arrested a criminal and succeeded in bringing his charge to the police station, he would find an alderman and magistrate who supported the mayor waiting there to hold an immediate hearing and release the prisoner on his own recognizance. Officials who favored the Metropolitan police officers did the same thing in Municipal station houses.

Such was the public outcry over this breakdown in police protection that an appeal of the Supreme Court decision was rushed into court. When the original decision was upheld, Mayor Wood abolished the Municipals. Several months later, about 50 of the officers, both Municipal and Metropolitan, who had been injured in the City Hall riot filed suit against the mayor. Each received a judgment of $250 but Mayor Woods never paid. Finally, the city paid the claims, together with the legal costs involved.

policewoman first killed in line of duty

Not for 64 years after Mrs. Alice Stebbins Wells became the first uniformed policewoman in the United States was a female officer killed in the line of duty. In September 1974 Gail A. Cobb, 24, a member of the District of Columbia police force, was shot and killed by a robbery suspect whom she had pursued into a garage. Officer Cobb's distinction was based on FBI files that dated back only to 1960, when apparently it was first deemed possible that a policewoman might someday be killed. Only in recent years has it become more common for policewomen to be assigned to general "line" duty.

While some use was made of women police matrons in the 19th century, police officials generally were greatly biased against female officers. Indeed, authorities usually reacted with horror to such suggestions, not merely because women were considered too "weak" for such work but also because of the opinion that they would be "too sympathetic" to defendants. When they finally made the ranks, policewomen proved such fears groundless.

A former social worker, Mrs. Alice Stebbins Wells, became the first uniformed policewoman in the United States, and probably the world, when she joined the Los Angeles Police Department on September 12, 1910. Her chief duties consisted of enforcing the regulations concerning "dance halls, skating rinks, penny arcades, picture shows and other similar places of public recreation." Other duties specifically assigned to her were "the suppression of unwholesome billboard displays, searches for missing persons, and the maintenance of a general information bureau for women seeking advice within the scope of police departments." The official enthusiasm over having a policewoman on the force was reflected in a regulation that read: "No young girl can be questioned by a male officer. Such work is delegated solely to policewomen, who, by their womanly sympathy and intuition, are able to gain the confidence of their younger sisters."

Mrs. Wells encountered difficulty when she attempted to ride free on street cars, as the city's police officers were entitled to do. She was constantly accused by conductors of misusing her husband's badge and was threatened with arrest if she did so again. To rectify this problem, she was issued "Policewoman's Badge No. 1" and allowed to design her own official uniform.

POLLARD, Edward

Mrs. Well's performance was watched closely by other law enforcement agencies, and because of her record 16 other police departments added women in the next six years. In 1924 Buffalo hired the first black police-woman.

Some sources list a Mrs. Marie Owen as the first policewoman, hired by Superintendent Morgan A. Collins of the Detroit Police Department in 1893. However, the Detroit police have no record of Superintendent Morgan A. Collins much less a Mrs. Owen.

Pollard, Edward (c. 1845–1885) murder victim

The biggest mistake Edward Pollard and George Brassfield ever made was taking on two hired hands, James Lamb and Albert O'Dell, at harvest time in 1885 on the farm they leased together in Lebanon, Indian Territory (later Oklahoma). Had the ensuing events occurred in a major city and enjoyed massive news coverage, it would have doubtless have become a legendary American murder case.

Mrs. Pollard took Lamb as a lover and Mrs. Brassfield couldn't stay away from O'Dell. The affairs could not be kept secret in an area where everyone knew everyone's business, and finally, Brassfield took off, leaving his wife and his share of the farm to O'Dell. Edward Pollard was more stubborn and refused to leave, remaining "in possession of his chattels, if not his wife."

On December 30, 1885 a preacher was called to the Pollard home to marry Lamb and Mrs. Pollard, the woman explaining her husband had deserted her and "would not be back." The preacher refused to perform the marriage under those circumstances, and the next day the two couples left the area. Two months passed before the murdered body of Edward Pollard was found in a shallow grave off the trail, and warrants were issued for the two farmhands and the two errant wives. The quartet were found 50 miles away at Buck Horn Creek, where they had set up house. Both women were pregnant by their lovers.

O'Dell and Lamb had been close throughout their period of courtship and crime, but now each hired his own counsel. The two men were tried before the famous Hanging Judge, Isaac C. Parker, who seemed as much taken aback by their outrageous romantic behavior as by the murder. Each defendant's lawyer seemed to be prosecuting the other defendant along with the prosecution, which was armed with the testimony of the two women. Sitting in judgment of them, Hanging Parker was determined to see legal vengeance wrought. It was a case with no defense, and both men were hanged together on January 14, 1887.

pollos illegal Mexican immigrants

Pollos, or "chickens," are impoverished migrants attempting to sneak into the United States. The name was given to them by border bandits, who consider the migrants no more than chickens to be plucked and, at times, slaughtered.

Most pollos attempt to enter the country through the so-called corridor, a stretch running five and one-half miles along the California border from the San Ysidro-Tijuana port of entry to the Pacific Ocean. Since the chain-link fence separating the two countries is full of holes, three times as many illegals get in as are captured by the border patrol. However, evading the border patrol hardly means the pollos have made it. Far greater danger is posed by the border bandits, young Chicanos from San Diego and Los Angeles who waylay the migrants in the corridor at night. These bandits are out to seize the migrants' money and pitifully small possessions, knowing the pollos can hardly call on the authorities for protection.

Border crossings by pollos are carefully organized affairs. They pay a "coyote" in Mexico to arrange for their transportation and for a "mule," or guide, to lead them. The coyote often collects another bounty of about $15 a head from California growers to deliver the migrants straight to their farms where they are paid wages well under the legal minimum. Again, the pollos can hardly complain to the authorities, since the alternative is deportation.

Before the pollos reach this stage of exploitation, they first face the treachery of the mule. He too looks for an extra payment and will often lead them to an ambush by the border bandits in return for a portion of the loot. These robberies are generally brutal affairs, marked by bone-breaking, pistol whippings and an occasional fatal knifing. In a recent two-year period the reported crimes in the corridor included 251 robberies, seven rapes and seven murders. Of course, the unreported crimes are many times greater.

polygamy

Few marital practices have engendered more violence in America than that of polygamy as engaged in by the Mormons. It resulted in the mob murder of Joseph Smith in 1844, after that Mormon leader had enunciated the religious concept of pluralism. Actually, what Smith had advocated was polygyny, plural marriage for men only, which he saw as a solution to the problems of adultery and prostitution. The 1856 Republican platform called for the elimination of "the twin relics of barbarism," slavery and polygamy, and a number of laws were passed calling for heavy fines and long prison sentences against practitioners of polygamy.

Between 1885 and 1900 more than 1,000 Mormon men were convicted of the crime of polygamy. The practice did not cease until the closing years of the 19th century, when court tests upheld laws that disincorporated the Mormon church, forcing Mormon President Wilford Woodruff to issue a manifesto directing church members to cease engaging in pluralism. Certain fundamentalist Mormon sects, officially excommunicated, have continued the custom in isolated parts of Utah and Arizona. However, some recent, and no doubt exaggerated estimates, have claimed that perhaps 30,000 Mormons today live in secret polygynous marriages despite the ever present threat of fine and long imprisonment.

Pomeroy, Jesse H. (1860–1932) murderer and prisoner Jesse Pomeroy’s prison sentence is often cited as one of the cruelest ever imposed in this country. Convicted of murder at the age of 16, young Pomeroy of Boston was sentenced to be hanged, but after two years of controversy the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment in solitary confinement. The stipulation of solitary confinement was to satisfy those who wanted to exact the death penalty because of Pomeroy’s long record of previous offenses. He spent 41 years in solitary before finally being permitted to mingle with the general prison population. Although still imprisoned, Pomeroy was, in a sense, reborn when he came out of solitary into the new world of electricity, moving pictures, the automobile, the phonograph and the telephone.

Porvenir Massacre murder of Mexican-Americans

The Porvenir Massacre was probably the worst instance of police murder in American history, an early equivalent of the more recent police Death Squads in Brazil. During World War I the exposure given to such alleged plots as the Plan of San Diego and the Zimmerman Note, both calling for Mexican uprisings and the annexation of portions of the United States and both almost certainly hoaxes, created hysteria among superpatriotic vigilante groups, particularly in the Texas borderlands and especially among the Texas Rangers. A virtual reign of terror was launched against local Chicanos. The lowest estimate of the number of Mexicans killed was 500, and some counts put the death toll at 5,000.

In 1919, acting on charges brought by State Rep. J. T. Canales, a Texas House-Senate committee found that the Texas Rangers had widely violated the civil rights of Mexicans, entered private houses illegally, made improper arrests, killed needlessly while making arrests and executed prisoners. An uncontested charge was that the Rangers had executed five prisoners arrested after a train robbery near Brownsville. The local sheriff managed to save the lives of two other prisoners by refusing to turn them over to the Rangers. In Cameron County the sheriff had threatened to arrest any Texas Ranger who illegally took firearms belonging to a Chicano without just cause. The most serious charge of all involved the massacre in the little village of Ponvenir in Big Bend country.

On December 25, 1917 between 40 and 50 bandits raided Brite's store, located outside Porvenir, killing two Mexican passengers and the driver of a stagecoach when they happened along at the wrong moment. The bandits also attempted to raid a ranch house but were repelled, suffering heavy losses. The Texas Rangers were called in to investigate and supposedly learned that Chicanos in the village of Porvenir were wearing new shoes of the same type stolen from Brite's store. Capt. J. M. Fox then organized a group consisting of eight Rangers and four civilians to conduct a raid on the village.

It was later determined that the raiders had terrorized the town. While getting drunk, they had rounded up 25 men and tortured them. In addition, the raiders had commissioned professional Mexican bravos to shoot a couple of villagers and worst of all, had brought together 15 unresisting villagers and massacred them.

The Rangers' version differed considerably. They stated that after they had taken a number of prisoners, other Chicanos had opened fire on them from the cover of brush, beginning an all-night firefight. By morning the Chicanos had disappeared. The Rangers claimed they had then gathered up some stolen goods as evidence and returned to their headquarters. They said they were not in a position to know if they had killed anyone during the long fight but assumed they had. The Texans had suffered no losses themselves.

The Rangers' defense was one that very few could swallow. Although no murder charges were ever brought against any of the raiders, Capt. Fox and all his men were dismissed from the Rangers.

Ponzi, Charles (1877–1949) swindler

Among the greatest swindlers ever to prey on the American public was Charles Ponzi—ex-dishwasher, ex-forgery, ex-alien smuggler—who came to America from his native Italy in 1899. And for a time, he was also the most-beloved, especially among those who got in early on his fantastic scheme and actually made money. Once when Ponzi was being hauled before an official hearing to explain his money-trading operations, he was cheered by crowds in front of the State House in Boston. A voice from the crowd called out, "You're the greatest Italian of them all!"

"No, no," Ponzi responded, "Columbus and Marconi. Columbus discovered America. Marconi discovered the wireless."

"Yes, but you discovered money!"

That last claim was to prove debatable indeed. Not that Charles Ponzi didn't have money-making acumen. He discovered he could buy up international postal-union reply coupons at depressed prices in some foreign countries and sell them in the United States at a profit of up to 50 percent. It was, in fact, a classic get-rich-slowly operation, and as such, it bored Ponzi. So he figured out a better gimmick. He simply told everyone how he was making the money and said he needed a lot of capital to make a lot of money. For the use of their funds, he offered investors a 50 percent profit in three months. It was an offer they couldn't refuse, and the funds just came rolling into Ponzi's Boston office. In a short time, he had to open offices in neighboring states.

When Ponzi actually started paying out interest, a deluge followed. On one monumental day in 1920, Ponzi's offices took in an incredible $2 million from America's newest gamblers, the little people who squeezed money out of bank accounts, mattresses, piggy banks and cookie jars. There were days when a Ponzi office looked like a hurricane had hit it. Incoming cash had to be stuffed in closets, desk drawers and even in wastebaskets. Of course, the more that came in, the more Ponzi paid out. In that sense, Ponzi was merely following the example of the legendary Billy "520 percent" Miller who had pulled the same caper in Brooklyn, New York some two decades earlier.

As long as investors kept pouring in new funds, Ponzi could continue to pay the interest on the old funds. After about six months the newspapers started to investigate his operation, but he was able to buy more time by hitting them with huge lawsuits. Meanwhile, Ponzi became a great dandy. His wardrobe consisted of 200 suits; he sported more than two dozen diamond stickpins; and he owned an elegant mansion. But Ponzi's bubble had to burst. The Boston Post dug up his past record, which showed he had spent time in prison in Montreal for forgery and in Atlanta for smuggling aliens. It was enough to make large numbers of eager investors hesitate to put in more money; the moment that happened, Ponzi's fragile scheme collapsed, since it required an unending flow of cash. His books, such as they were, showed a deficit of somewhere between $5 and $10 million, or perhaps even more. No one ever knew for sure.

Ponzi went to federal prison for four years for using the mails to defraud and was then sentenced to seven to nine years in Massachusetts for theft. When he emerged from prison in 1934, he was sent back to Italy. At this point the picture of Ponzi blurs. Some accounts, apparently not all fanciful, have him furnishing his "financial genius" to the Mussolini regime. If he did, the Fascists obviously did not profit from the experience, for within a few years Ponzi had to leave the country. He ended up in Rio de Janeiro, working for an Italian company until 1939, when the war put him out of work. Ponzi's last years were filled with extreme privation. He became partially blind and paralyzed and ended up in the charity ward of a Brazilian hospital, where he died in January 1949.

population density and crime

A person living in an American city of 250,000 or more has a three to 10 times greater chance of being a crime victim than someone living in a rural area. This is hardly surprising since urban life in the United States is more and more one of anonymity, crowded living conditions and a spirit of alienation. Middle-class flight from the inner cities to the suburbs results in an eroded tax base and forced cuts in police protection, as the crime problem worsens. Naturally, crime is most pervasive in the ghetto sections. In the 28th precinct in New York's Harlem section, about one out of every 500 residents will become a homicide victim. The nationwide ratio is one in 10,000.

Cities in all modern societies, in this country and abroad, have always been the breeding ground for crime. Comparisons between 19th and 20th century crime rates in the United States are hampered by the lack of anything near reliable crime figures for the period before the 1930s. The one thing that is apparent even from fragmentary figures, however, is that there is less crime in the cities of today compared to those of yesterday. In 1862 New York City, then comprising only the island of Manhattan, had a population of about 815,000. In that year the police arrested 82,072 men and women and estimated the number of criminals residing in the metropolis at between 70,000 and 80,000. Both the arrest total and the estimated number of criminals represented almost 10 percent of the entire population. If that percentage held true today, the term "crime wave" would not be adequate to describe what American cities would be facing.

Crime in New York and in other major cities has merely reflected the activity of the criminal element in the ghettos. In an attempt to categorize the Draft Riots of 1863 as strictly a criminal matter—a contention that need not be accepted—historian Herbert Asbury argued that the reason the rioters were mostly Irish was "simply because the gangsters and the other criminal elements of the city were largely of that race." Then, as now, it was the ghettos that produced crime, and the shifting ethnic and racial composition of their occupants determined the ethnic and racial composition of criminals as a whole. Today's ghetto residents are blacks and Hispanics and, to a large extent, so are the cities' arrestees.

Former Attorney General Ramsey Clark notes in his book Crime in America that on the average an American is likely to be the victim of a violent crime only once in 400 years, but that the estimated figure for a resident of the black ghettos is once in 80 years, or five times more probable. However, since ghetto crime is vastly under-reported, Clark raises the possibility that a slum dweller may well be a violent crime victim about once every 20 years.

By contrast a white middle-class urban dweller, living in a good section of the city, will probably be a violent crime victim only once in about 2,000 years, and among the upper middle class and rich suburbanites, the odds dip to once in 10,000 years. Ironically, it is the perception of crime by these latter two groups that leads to the heralding of "crime waves." Today, much of white New York eschews traveling in the city's subways. Yet it has been established that the subways are safer than the city streets and a person is far less likely to be murdered, robbed, assaulted or raped on a subway platform than above ground.

Fear of crime is said to be the prime reason for middle-class flight from the cities to the suburbs (actually, such factors as soaring rents and housing costs, racial bias and filth are also major considerations). If so, the migration is proving to be a mistake. The suburbs are becoming less and less havens from crime, and murders in even rural areas are rising so rapidly that they now run only about 20 percent below the figures for the standard metropolitan statistical areas. Clearly, where a person lives affects his or her vulnerability to crime, but the tensions that produce crime, especially violent crime, are becoming universal.

PRAIRIE Queen

Prairie Queen fancy Chicago brothel

In the 1850s Chicago was still a frontier town, a fact apparent in the rough quality of its brothels along Wells Street. A few more pretentious houses appeared, but none to match the luxurious bordellos that would soon become a municipal legend. The first of the fancy brothels, opened in 1854, was the Prairie Queen on State Street, run by Eleanor Herrick, more generally referred to as Mother Herrick, a mainstay in Chicago's red-light district for 30 years. Besides such attractions as plush carpeting and melodeons in the parlors, the Prairie Queen was renowned for its entertainment. There was dancing every night, of a type shocking to Chicago's more genteel element, and a special erotic show once a week. In a further effort to attract clients, the Prairie Queen added regularly scheduled prize-fights, fought with bare knuckles and for a purse of $2 and a night with one of Mother Herrick's ladies. The police had been ignoring the dancing and the erotic shows, but the fights were too much to be tolerated. On June 3, 1857, they swept down on the Prairie Queen and arrested the two fighters, Billy Fagan and Con McCarthy, on that night's card and shut down the brothel for going too far.

Prescott, Abraham (1816–1836) murderer

Eighteen-year-old Abraham Prescott was a New Hampshire youth who committed an ordinary crime of passion and then made legal history with the first claim of sleepwalking as a defense.

On June 23, 1833 Mrs. Sally Cochran rejected Prescott's advances, and the enraged youth beat her to death with a stake. He was quickly identified and arrested as the killer. At his trial Prescott's defense lawyers announced the defendant was a confirmed somnambulist and that whatever he had done had occurred while he was asleep. News of the claim evoked general outrage. Of course, this was an era when any defense based on lack of mental competency received short shrift. Not surprisingly, the jury quickly rejected the defense and found Prescott guilty. However, because of the novelty of the claim, Prescott's lawyers were able to keep the case on appeal until the first days of January 1836.

At last, Prescott was slated to die, and a great mob attended his scheduled execution. When a short time before the start of the proceedings it was announced that the condemned man had been granted a temporary stay of execution, the crowd rioted, resulting in a number of injuries. Prescott was moved to Hopkinton, N.H., where authorities decided public tranquility superseded legal precedents and niceties; so on January 6 Prescott was hanged.

prisons and prison riots

One of the first institutions brought to the New World was the jail, a place where lawbreakers could be held while awaiting trial and punishment, which for about 150 offenses was death. Lesser crimes were punished by whipping, branding, maiming or public humiliation. The jail was basically not a place where prisoners were kept for punishment. In fact, the idea of a penitentiary or state prison was a purely American invention that was to have a profound effect on correctional policy in this and many other countries.

The first state prison was the notorious Newgate, established at Simsbury, Conn. in 1773. It was actually an abandoned copper mine in which prisoners were chained together to live and labor some 50 feet beneath the earth. Many of the prisoners were Tories incarcerated there during the Revolution. The first prison riot at Newgate occurred in 1776, when prisoners set fire to a massive wooden door in an attempt to reach a drainage channel that led to freedom. The riot failed, as smoke filled the mine, choking a number of prisoners to death and disabling the rest.

Newgate set the pattern of hellhole prisons in this country. Almost immediately, prison reformers appeared, but it is debatable whether their early efforts to achieve humane treatment of those imprisoned benefited or harmed prisoners. The first reform of prison practices was attempted in 1790 at Philadelphia's Walnut Street Jail, which was renovated through the efforts of a group of Quakers called the Philadelphia Society to Alleviate the Miseries of Public Prisons, an organization that exists to the present day as the Philadelphia Prison Society. A 19th-century historical account describes the unreformed Walnut Street Jail in its early days as a scene of "universal riot and debauchery . . . with no separation of those accused but yet untried, nor even of those confined for debt only, from convicts sentenced for the foulest crimes . . . no separation of . . . age or sex, by day or night."

After the jail was remodeled in 1790, men and women for the first time were housed separately in large, clean rooms. Debtors were segregated from other prisoners, and children were removed from the jail entirely. Hardened offenders were placed in solitary confinement in a "penitentiary house" and prisoners were given work and religious instruction. Within a short time, however, the Walnut Street Jail became overcrowded and a new institution had to be built.

About the same time, two new prisons were built, which were soon to function as the models for what became known as the Pennsylvania and Auburn prison systems. Eastern Penitentiary was built at Philadelphia in 1829 to further the Quaker idea of prisoner isolation. Prisoners were confined in windowless cells about eight by 12 feet with running water and toilet facilities. Each prisoner had his own “exercising yard,” about eight by 20 feet, surrounded by a high brick wall. The walls between the cells were thick and virtually sound proof, so that an inmate never saw another inmate, only a few guards, chaplains and an occasional pious person who came by to pray and offer spiritual advice. Needless to say, great numbers of prisoners went insane under the Pennsylvania system, but that did not stop it from becoming popular both elsewhere in the United States and around the world.

Also in 1829, a rival system, which eventually gained wider acceptance, was launched with the building of a new prison in Auburn, N.Y. The trouble with the Pennsylvania system, said the New York prison experts, was that the convicts spent too much time praying and working alone and thus could not “pay for their keep” through convict labor. At Auburn the prisoners were permitted to work together by day fulfilling convict labor contracts, but in all other aspects the isolation of the Pennsylvania system was maintained.

Inmates were forbidden ever to talk to one another, even when working together in the prison’s shops. The prisoners marched in lockstep, their gaze always downward. In Warden Elam Lynds, the system had a devoted champion. Lynds felt the purpose of the system was to break the prisoners’ spirits. He personally flogged prisoners and urged his guards to treat the men with contempt and brutality. A typical, and sometimes lethal, punishment instituted by Lynds was the water cure. The punishment consisted of fastening a prisoner’s neck in an iron yoke and then pouring a stream of icy water on his head. In a variation of the water cure, the prisoner was shackled naked to a wall and a high-pressure water hose was turned full blast on his back. The man was plastered to the wall by the force of the water and the pain was almost unbearable. However, the torture left no marks.

The Auburn system was rapidly adopted throughout America because it was more economical to operate than the Pennsylvania system. In Auburn the cells were only seven feet high, seven feet long and 3 1/2 feet wide. As the Auburn system spread, the methods of repression mushroomed. The striped uniform was introduced at Sing Sing, and floggings, the sweat-box, Prisons, whether of the old wooden variety or the more modern type, have had the same general effect—nonreformation of the convict.

the straitjacket, the iron yoke, the thumbscrew and the stretcher became widespread. The latter device had a number of variations. A man could be handcuffed to the upper bars of his cell so that his toes barely touched the floor, and usually he would be left that way the entire day. In another version, inmates had their ankles chained to the floor and their wrists tied to a rope that was passed through a pulley attached to the ceiling.

PRISONS and prison riots

When the rope was pulled, the prisoners were stretched taut. Some prisons built sweatboxes right into the cell door, actually a double door in which a prisoner could be placed in a space so small that he could barely move. In other prisons this type of sweatbox was not considered stern enough. It was, after all, much more effective if the sweatboxes were placed near a fireplace so that the suffering could be intensified.

The Auburn system was based on cruelty and repression, with the idea that such treatment would reform the prisoners. It was a failure, but some of the Auburn system's practices have been adopted in varying degrees by more modern prisons.

In the post-Civil War period, however, penologists did begin experimenting with the new ideas. In 1870, mainly through the efforts of penologists like Enoch Cobbs Wines and others who formed the American Prison Association, the reformatory system came into being. Because of these penologists the Elmira Reformatory opened in New York in 1876. Although the reformatory plan was originally intended for all ages, at Elmira it was limited to prisoners between the ages of 16 and 30. The chief principle of the Elmira system was reformation, rather than expiation of guilt, and it was hailed as the greatest advance in penology since the substitution of the prison for the medieval method of maiming and/or execution.

When a prisoner entered Elmira, he was automatically placed in the second of three grades. If and when he showed improvement, he was moved to the first grade, and upon continued improvement he won parole. If he turned out to be a troublemaker, he was dropped to the third grade and had to work his way back up. Many of the prisoners were sentenced to indeterminate terms so that they could be afforded the full benefit of the reformatory concept.

By the turn of the century, 11 states had adopted the reformatory system, but by 1910 this innovation was all but dead. Most guards and even wardens proved incapable of administering a complex grading program, and in the majority of systems, the advancement of prisoners was based on favoritism or their ability to get along in the institution rather than their progress in achieving a full-scale reformation. As a result, most reformatory graduates went out and committed new crimes.

Today, many prisons retain the name of "reformatory" but are merely part of the general prison system. Despite the claims of penologists, there has been little general advance in prisons since the introduction of the reformatory. Currently, prisons are divided into three classes: maximum security, medium security and minimum security. Because of reform wardens like Thomas Mott Osborne and Lewis E. Lawes, both of Sing Sing, who had an impact on penological theories, much of the blatant cruelty and squalor of the 19th century prisons has been considerably reduced. Still, extremely punitive concepts have persisted, as indicated in the 1930s by the establishment of Alcatraz as a "super prison" for the worst federal prisoners, an American Devil's Island. It proved a total failure. According to some estimates, almost 60 percent of the inmates went stir crazy there. Alcatraz unquestionably left its mark not only on many of the prisoners but on many of the guards as well. The prison soon lost its original purpose as a place of confinement for escapers and other troublemakers and became a place to lodge inmates simply deemed deserving of harsher treatment, such as Al Capone and, later on, Morton Sobell, of the Rosenberg atom bomb spy case. By 1963 Alcatraz was abandoned, having proven an unqualified failure.

Yet there are those who consider the entire American prison system a failure. Overall, various critics have charged, prisons have failed to reform criminals or even to act as a crime deterrent. Moreover, prisons are generally conceded to be schools for crime, where lesser offenders learn from their "betters." It is this last fact that makes unfeasible the idea of simply using prisons as places of confinement and retribution. Sooner or later, prisoners must be released, if for no other reason than a shortage of space.

And without rehabilitation programs the problem of prison riots would increase manyfold. Such riots have become commonplace in the 20th century, evidenced especially in the three great waves—1929–32, 1950–56, 1968–73—of prison rebellion. The most tragic riot, if indeed it was one, occurred at the Ohio State Penitentiary in Columbus on April 21, 1930. More than 300 prisoners died in a fire that, prison officials claimed, was started by inmates. More likely, an electrical failure caused the fire, which the prison guards were poorly trained to handle. Certainly, there was reason enough for a riot, since the prison was jammed with 4,300 inmates in accommodations designed for 1,500.

The worst riot of the 1950s occurred at the overcrowded Southern Michigan State Prison at Jackson. Guards were seized as hostages and prisoners roamed the prison setting fires and smashing thousands of windows. The damage toll was put at $2.5 million.

The worst two-year span of prison rioting occurred in 1970–71. Among the major disturbances were the following:

January 1970: Soledad Prison, Salinas, Calif. Three black convicts and a white guard killed during a race riot among prisoners.

July 1970: Holmesburg Prison, Philadelphia, Pa. Eighty-four prisoners and 29 guards injured in riot with pronounced racial overtones.

October 1970: Tombs Prison, New York, N.Y. Convicts hold 26 hostages to protest overcrowded conditions.

November 1970: Cummings Prison Farm, Grady, Ark. About 500 convicts riot to demand separate facilities for whites and blacks.

August 1971: San Quentin, Calif. Three inmates, including black militant George Jackson, and three guards killed in what was described as an escape effort.

September 1971: Attica Prison, Attica, N.Y. Thirty-two prisoners and 11 guards being held hostage killed by prison guards and state police rescuers in aftermath of four-day protest over prison conditions.

Various studies indicate that there are many causes for prison riots, some of the main ones being inconsistent sentencing and parole policies; prisoner-perceived unfair sentencing; overcrowding; pent-up anger; racial tensions; public and official indifference to conditions; idleness; lack of rehabilitative programs; and most recently, the activity of radical and revolutionary groups in the inmate population that regard all convicts as political prisoners.

private eye slang for private detective

The term “private eye” originated from the symbol of Pinkerton’s National Detective Agency, founded in 1850, which featured an eye and the slogan “We never sleep.” As the fame of the agency spread, criminals began expressing fear of the “Eye” and later of the “private eye,” as distinguished from the eyes of the police.

probation

It would seem that probation, rather than imprisonment, is the standard method of punishment used in this country; far more people are on probation than behind bars.

The father of the probation movement was a wealthy Boston businessman named John Augustus, who, because of his interest in drunkards, persuaded a judge in 1841 to release a “common drunkard” in his custody. Augustus took him home, gave him clothes and found him a job. Weeks later, Augustus returned to court with the man, now totally changed in both appearance and manner, and the judge, thoroughly impressed, released the prisoner from the charge with a fine of 1¢.

Over the last 18 years of his life, Augustus won probation for almost 2,000 persons. At first, he labored solely on the behalf of drunks but then expanded his activities to include defendants charged with more serious crimes. Augustus’ record was superb, far better than those achieved by later probation programs. Less than a dozen of his charges ran away and only a few committed new crimes. Another Bostonian, Fr. Rufus W. Cook, and a Philadelphian, William J. Mullen, who eventually worked as a prison agent for the Philadelphia Prison Society, became leading exponents of probation.

Probation departments today generally claim a rehabilitation success rate of more than 70 percent. The National Probation and Parole Association states:

Far more effective than deterrence as an objective of sentencing is rehabilitation, the satisfactory adjustment of the offender to law-abiding society. Whether it takes the form of probation—proved to be the most practical approach where circumstances warrant its use—or of commitment and ultimately parole, it is based on the principle that the best way to protect society is to change convicted offenders into law-abiding citizens.

Not all observers accept in full the rehabilitative value attributed to probation. Aryeh Neier, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, notes:

There is no evidence that probation rehabilitates people any more than if people were simply left alone. Probation is punitive, however, and its principal use should be as an alternative to prison for people who have committed minor crimes and who deserve some punishment.

One of the actual motives for granting probation is to reward police informers. But it is also used to allow the probationer to work and provide restitution to the victim for his or her loss or injury or to keep the prisoner’s family intact and off the charity rolls.

Probation is considered an effective way to promote guilty pleas, and most judges agree it is necessary to provide them with a way to invoke a relatively mild form of punishment for first offenders. Above all, probation is necessary to reduce prison overcrowding. The cost is about one-tenth that of maintaining him or her in a penal institution. This last fact alone should guarantee the system a future.

A double standard toward vice held by much of society views prostitution itself tolerantly but regards procuring, the recruitment of girls and women to serve as prostitutes, a vital part of the overall business, as far more unwholesome. In almost every major city in the United States during the 19th century, vice operators had no trouble paying off crooked police officers, and, indeed, entire police units and departments for permission to run houses of prostitution, but the enforcers of the law were less accommodating when it came to allowing procurers to supply young girls for these establishments. Some corrupt officers who accepted payoffs for almost anything else rebelled when happening upon “break-in” houses, where male specialists indoctrinated, by repeated rapes, young victims lured to the big city by the promise of well-paying jobs.

In New York’s so-called Grabber Scandal in 1875, the notorious Hester Jane Haskins, better known as Jane the Grabber, was arrested by enraged police because she was recruiting girls from the better portion of society to satisfy the demands of higher-priced bordello patrons for young ladies of refinement and education. Jane the Grabber had been allowed to operate for years, recruiting gullible girls right off the boat or from upstate farm country and publishing a monthly circular that advertised her wares to whorehouse clients. But when she started kidnapping the daughters of the well-to-do, she was carted off to prison.

Procurers emerged in America shortly after the arrival of the white man. Their first victims were Indian maidens, who were bought or stolen from their tribes to be used as prostitutes. Soon, they flourished in every port city, attracting an endless stream of young girls and women, including those who spoke not a word of English. Other procurers, operating sometimes in gangs, worked the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, again either kidnapping or buying young females from their impoverished parents and selling them down river at the infamous flatboat auctions in Natchez and New Orleans. Perhaps the most famous of the procurer gangs was the one led by white slaver Sam Purdy, whose heyday was around the start of the 19th century.

By 1805, however, the gang was wiped out as a result of assassinations carried out or instigated by a colorful reformer named Carlos White, the scourge of fleshpots from St. Louis to New Orleans.

In the 19th century New Orleans was probably the most tolerant of procurers with several of that city’s famed procuresses being allowed practically a free hand in recruiting and despoiling young virgins, some barely in their teens. The New Orleans procuresses supplied not only houses of prostitution in the French Quarter and elsewhere in the city but also bordellos in Atlanta, Memphis, Galveston and a number of other southern cities. In their lavish brochures “fresh stock” indicated inexperienced girls, who thus commanded the highest prices. In time, fierce competition drove the prices of a virgin down as low as $50, but by the late 1860s Louisa Murphy, a schoolteacher-procuress, was commanding $800 for a young girl. Murphy had little trouble with the police whom she paid off regularly. Similarly, Nellie Haley, considered the Queen of the Procureses in the 1880s, was never arrested in New Orleans; later in her career Nellie did run afoul of the law when she attempted to ply her trade in Chicago.

Chicago gave a mixed welcome to procurers; many operated without interference but others were harassed whenever certain policemen experienced a sudden infusion of righteousness. Still, Chicago’s vice trade required so many women that procurers operated there with or without approval, and the city became the supply point for many other cities in the Midwest.

Some procurer gangs dealt solely in foreign women, among them the band headed by French Em Duval and her husband. The Duvals ran their own brothel in Chicago on Armour Avenue but maintained a stockade outside the city on Dearborn Street, where women shipped in from New York were kept awaiting sale to buyers. The stockade had barred windows and the inmates were not permitted any street wear until they were being transported to the brothel which had purchased them. The Duval operation was broken up in 1908 by federal authorities utilizing immigration statutes, the only legal weapon available for use against vice operations prior to the Mann Act.

Another important procurer mob of the era was the Dewey Hotel Gang, considered the most efficient operation in the city. The gang, comprised of Russian Jews, specialized in providing, not surprisingly, Russian Jewesses, a prize attraction in American bordellos. The gang maintained break-in rooms and a stockade on the top floor of a hotel on Washington Boulevard. They held regular auctions, at which women were stripped and inspected by brothel keepers and sold to the highest bidders. At an auction in 1906, 25 women were sold for sums ranging from $25 to $100 apiece. This sale did not constitute the gang's total profits, however, since for a considerable time thereafter each woman had to turn over her share of the money she earned to the procurers.

No account of procuring in this country would be complete without mentioning Harry "Greasy Thumb" Guzik and his wife Alma, perhaps the most proficient procurer couple in America. One of five brothers who as youngsters earned nickels running errands and hustling for Chicago prostitutes in the Levee district, Harry was a full-time pimp before he reached his teens. After getting busted early in his career, he started paying off virtually every politician and policeman who came into view. A ward politician once said, "Harry's fingers are always greasy from the money he counts out for protection." Thus, he won the nickname Greasy Thumb.

Harry eventually accumulated a string of whores in the Levee and married one of them, Alma. Thereafter, the couple became the chief procurers for all the important brothel operators in the city, men like Big Jim Colosimo and women like Victoria Moresco.

Harry and Alma combed the rural areas of Illinois, Indiana and Wisconsin in search of new girls, particularly those who dressed "city style" and obviously wanted no part of farm living. After finding a likely prospect, Harry would go to bed with her and be joined by Alma. Afterwards, Alma would regale Harry about being a cheapskate and insist he give the girl $10. Later the girl would be invited to visit Chicago. Once again, she would end up in bed with the couple, but this time a male friend of Harry's would show up and the threesome would become a foursome. Upon leaving, Harry's friend would insist on giving Alma and the girl $10 each. Generally, by the next day the girl was working in a whorehouse. The Guziks sold each recruit for $100 plus expenses and a percentage of the girl's future earnings. They often procured some 10 girls a month in an attempt to keep up with the demand for "fresh bodies."

In 1921 the Guziks had trouble convincing a farm girl to turn prostitute; so they made her a prisoner, took away her clothes and had her forcibly indoctrinated. After many months the girl got word out to her family and was rescued by her brothers. The couple tried to fix things by bribing the father of the girl, now a mental and physical wreck, not to press charges. But the attempt didn't work and they were convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary. Out on bail while the case was being appealed, the Guziks stepped up their recruiting activities to raise a large sum of money. These funds found their way to Illinois Gov. Len Small, who abruptly granted them a full pardon before the judicial process was completed.

After Harry Guzik joined the Capone syndicate, he was put in charge of prostitution and procuring and became the chief funnel for much of the mob's payoffs to police and politicians. Eventually, brother Jake Guzik handled even bigger payoffs for the Capone gang, and upon Harry's death the Greasy Thumb monicker passed on to him.

Two Chicago newspapermen once overheard a conversation between Guzik and a young Willie Bioff, then primarily a procurer known for slugging whores who attempted to hold out on him. It was Guzik's observation that "they're so dumb (prospective prostitutes) you have to teach them never to give away what they can sell." The pair then discussed the best technique for convincing women to "go horizontal." The first step was to seduce a woman, then lavish money on her and finally wake up one morning and declare bankruptcy. Bioff told Guzik: "Then I hint that if she really loved me, she'd lay a friend of mine who wanted to give me a hundred dollars if he could just get in her pants once. She always cries. She always tells me she loves me and she could not possibly lay anybody else. But I tell her I wanted to buy such wonderful things for her—and here we are without even breakfast money. She comes around."

"And," rejoined Harry Guzik, "once she's laid one other guy for money, she's hooked. After that you can put her right into a house and she'll turn over her earnings to you every night. If she tries to hold out, you just slap her around a little."

A mistaken belief today is that most procurers are black, a perception fostered, according to Richard Milner, coauthor of Black Players, perhaps the most definitive study of black pimps, by the fact that the blacks are primarily street operators and thus more visible than white procurers. In New York the role of black procurers in recruiting runaway girls around the Port Authority bus terminal on Eighth Avenue has been the subject of numerous studies.

According to Milner, most important procurers are whites. It is they who recruit women for the legalized whorehouses in Nevada and for the "massage parlors" in various major cities. By abandoning the streets to the blacks, the same as has occurred in drug distribution, the white procurers have been able to shift attention away from their activities.

Profaci, Joseph (1896–1962) Mafia family head

Of all the longtime crime family bosses of the New York Mafia, the least Godfatherly was undoubtedly Joe

PROHIBITION

Profaci, one of the original five bosses who formed the modern Mafia after the assassination of the boss of bosses, Salvatore Maranzano, in 1931.

A vicious young gunman, Profaci became the head of the Mafia family in Brooklyn while in his twenties and ruled it in the strict old Sicilian manner, requiring every member of the family to kick in $25 in monthly dues to him. In theory, this was to build a slush fund to take care of legal fees, bribes and support money for a soldier's family in the event he was sent to jail. It was an old custom that had long been abolished in other families, but Profaci, a multimillionaire with a huge mansion on a 328-acre estate on Long Island, complete with hunting lodge and private airport, could not resist gathering up extra pennies in this fashion. The gang boss ran all the rackets hard and leaned on his men for a heavy percentage of their illegal profits. In other families the smarter operators cut the head of the family in for a slice of whatever racket they ran, but it was offered as a form of "affection" or a "token of respect." Profaci demanded it, and he demanded plenty.

Profaci was able to run his family with an iron hand because he killed ruthlessly whenever anyone objected to his techniques. For years Brooklyn was littered with corpses of those who did not play according to Profaci's rules.

But while the Brooklyn underworld knew the dark side of Profaci, the respectable community had a different view of him. Probably more than any other top mafioso, Profaci was a religious man. He regularly attended St. Bernadette's Catholic Church in Brooklyn and even had a private altar built in his cellar so that mass could be celebrated at family gatherings by a priest who was a close friend of the Profacis. In 1949 a group of leading Italian-Americans petitioned Pope Pius XII to confer a knightship on Profaci, a "son of Sicily" who had become America's leading importer of tomato paste and olive oil and who, as the principal owner of more than 20 other prominent businesses, was a kindly employer of hundreds of his fellow countrymen. Profaci was also cited as a generous donor to many Catholic charities. The petition was denied after Miles McDonald, the Brooklyn district attorney, pointed out to the Vatican that Profaci was a top racketeer, extortionist, murderer and Mafia leader.

While this may have left Profaci disappointed, it did not dampen his religious zeal. When a young thief stole a jeweled crown from St. Bernadette's, an act that in his eyes was probably the greatest possible sacrilege not only against the church but against the mob itself, the word was passed that the crown had to be returned or blood would flow. The thief returned the crown but first removed a few diamonds. Thus, the matter remained a capital offense, and a death sentence was issued and carried out. Vincent Teresa, the biggest Mafia informer since Joe Valachi, summed up the rationale: "If Profaci hadn't had the kid put to sleep, Profaci would have lost a lot of prestige in the community. After all, he owned Brooklyn, he was the boss."

During the last three years of his life, from 1960 to 1962, the Brooklyn Mafia boss was involved in the famed "mattress war" with the Gallo brothers, young upstart members of the family who resented Profaci's greed and the fact that he had not rewarded them for services rendered, especially carrying out the execution of the dreaded Albert Anastasia on orders passed down from Vito Genovese. The Gallos were under the assumption that this hit would entitle them to a piece of Brooklyn's gambling and narcotics action. Finally, open warfare broke out when the young rebels kidnapped five of Profaci's leading gang members. They were returned when Profaci promised to deal with the Gallos' complaints. Instead, in typical Profaci manner, he attempted to have them killed. In the later warfare far more Gallo men were murdered than were Profaci gangsters, but the aging Profaci did not live to see the eventual demise of the Gallos. He died in 1962 of quickly advancing cancer, and his family was eventually taken over by Joseph Colombo.

Prohibition

"Goodbye John. You were God's worst enemy. You were Hell's best friend. . . . The reign of tears is over." Using those words, the Rev. Billy Sunday held a mock funeral in Norfolk, Va. for John Barleycorn when the 18th Amendment took effect on January 16, 1920. The supporters of Prohibition were confident that it was the panacea for all the social ills in America. In retrospect, Prohibition accomplished the exact opposite. As far as crime was concerned, the cure proved far worse than the ailment; in part, this was because Prohibition simply wouldn't work and, to a larger extent, because it fostered corruption. Law enforcement agencies became open to bribes to an extent unheard of even in the less than pristine years that preceded it. Worse yet, Prohibition was the midwife of organized crime in America.

The great gangs of America—born in the 1820s and continuing up to World War I—operated in two major fields, committing various forms of violent crimes and acting as bully boys for the political machines of the big cities. By 1914 these violent gangs had just about been wiped out. In New York City the 1,500-member Eastman gang was in disarray, with their leader in prison. The Eastmans' arch rivals, the Five Pointers, were scattering and their leader Paul Kelly, understanding that an enlightened public would no longer tolerate gang violence in elections, moved into relatively minor labor racketeering activities. Prostitution, another gang operation, was also in decline. During World War I the federal government shuttered the country’s most infamous vice centers, especially those in San Francisco, New Orleans and Chicago.

However, now the huge profits of illegal activities spawned by Prohibition gave criminal organizations a new lease on life. Across the country 200,000 speakeasies sprang up and giant bootlegging organizations were required to supply them. In New York City alone, 15,000 saloons were replaced by 32,000 speakeasies. Bootleggers and rumrunners brought in liquor from outside the borders. The production of alcohol became a cottage industry in many cities, producing foul odors that lay heavy over entire neighborhoods.

The Purple Gang of Detroit, up until then more interested in robberies and murders, became one of the most important of the Prohibition gangs, controlling much of the liquor supplies smuggled in from Canada. In Cleveland, the violent Mayfield Road Gang emerged as an extremely potent force, and of course, Chicago’s Al Capone gained recognition as the nation’s most prominent Prohibition gangster. It has been estimated that Capone himself made $60 million from bootlegging and rumrunning.

With the incredible profits from Prohibition rackets, the mobs found they could corrupt federal agents, police, politicians and judges to an extent never before considered possible. In fact, in the pre-Prohibition era it was the politicians who controlled the gangsters. With their newfound wealth the gangsters were able to reverse this role; they now gave the orders and the politicians jumped.

Disrespect for the law grew as it became fashionable for respectable citizens to drink bootleg liquor in their homes and in speakeasies. After all, President Warren G. Harding paid lip service to Prohibition while turning the White House into a private saloon. It was widely and correctly assumed that most Prohibition agents themselves violated the law and accepted enormous bribes. The Treasury Department reported that between 1920 and 1928 the government fired 706 agents and prosecuted another 257 for taking bribes. Head T-man Elmer L. Irey called the agents a “most extraordinary collection of political hacks, hangers-on and passing highwaymen.” In New York, Capt. Daniel

PROSTITUTION

During Prohibition, the well-shoed lady could carry a tube of liquor in her heel for emergency partying.

Chapin ordered a lineup of all agents and announced, “Now everyone of you sons of bitches with a diamond ring is fired.” Half were.

By 1928 a large segment of the population realized that Prohibition had to be abolished. New York Gov. Al Smith, a vocal opponent of the 18th Amendment, won the Democratic nomination for president. Smith lost but Prohibition was doomed, although it lasted another five years. In 1931 President Herbert Hoover established a bipartisan panel, the Wickersham Commission, to study the question. It found that Prohibition was unenforceable but still suggested it be maintained. Finally, in 1933, with the Democrats in power, Prohibition was repealed by passage of the 21st Amendment.

The effects of Prohibition however, did not end with its repeal. The great gangs that had fed on it were so big and powerful and had such excellent political connections that they simple moved into new rackets, especially those that enjoyed considerable public approval, such as gambling. With the end of Prohibition, the national crime syndicate was organized to save the mobs from destruction. The expertise the criminals gained during that era has helped them to thrive ever since.

prostitution

Prostitution came to America with the white man; the Indians had never heard of the custom, but they were soon to learn it. The first colonists in Massachusetts and Virginia tried to suppress the practice, and Virginia had a set policy of shipping back to England any arriving females believed to be prostitutes. However, when in the early 1700s both the English and French began sending over their bawds along with criminals, vagrants and beggars, the New World was simply overwhelmed. Soon, New York, New Orleans and other port cities sported large European-style brothels. By the time of the American Revolution, some leaders considered the fight against prostitution hopeless. To Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson it was an inescapable aspect of life. In his proposal for the establishment of the University of Virginia, Jefferson boldly included a house of prostitution, arguing a well-regulated house would be better than the unregulated ones that would otherwise develop. But he was forced to drop that part of his proposal.

As the nation moved west during the 19th century, prostitution became more tolerated in “man’s country,” and indeed, it was much more of a civilizing force there than in all the large eastern cities, where prostitution was tolerated and even encouraged by the politicians and police because of the tremendous graft involved. Scarlet women first tamed the rough miners of the West, who visited not only for the pleasures of the flesh but to have their socks mended and buttons sewed on as well.

A look at the numbers quickly reveals why prostitution was inevitable in the West. In San Francisco, after gold was discovered, the population consisted of 65,000 men and only 2,500 women, and those figures were hardly as disparate as the ones in other communities. In 1880 Leadville, Colo. had an even poorer male-female ratio than San Francisco and boasted a bordello for every 148 inhabitants. The town that was an exception to the rule was Salt Lake City, where the Mormon male and female populations were almost even and there was no prostitution.

Tokens like these were used as currency in the pleasure houses of the Old West. (From the Milner Collection.)

With the influx of “respectable women,” advocacy or tolerance of prostitution was replaced in some Western towns by active opposition. In Denver an ordinance was passed requiring prostitutes to wear yellow ribbons on their arms as a mark of shame. The city’s madams ordered their women to wear nothing but yellow, from bonnets to shoes, and to carry yellow parasols. It created such a bizarre sight that the law had to be rescinded.

In other cities and towns prostitution was deeply rooted and appreciated. A Topeka newspaper commented on the attitude in Ellsworth, Kan.:

The city realizes $300 per month from prostitution fines alone. . . . The city authorities consider that as long as mankind is depraved and Texas cattle herders exist, there will be a demand and necessity for prostitutes, and that as long as prostitutes are bound to dwell in Ellsworth it is better for the respectable portion of society to hold prostitutes under restraint of law.”

When the noted muckraker Julian Street witnessed blatant prostitution on Market Street in Cripple Creek, Colo., he wrote a scathing denunciation of the town in Colliers magazine. In response, the city fathers changed the name of the bawdy thoroughfare to . . . Julian Street. But in a sense, that was open prostitution’s last hurrah. The celebrated madams of the 19th and early 20th century were passing from the scene—Julia Bulette of the Comstock, Tessie Wall and Madame Atoy of San Francisco, Josie Arlington of New Orleans, the Everleigh Sisters of Chicago, Mattie Silks and Jennie Rogers of Denver and Babe Connors of St. Louis.

While these women gave the illegal activity a certain glamour and mystique, they could not hide the grim reality of prostitution, its almost exclusive reliance on exploiting poorer girls, often immigrants who spoke no English. They lived drab lives, often entertaining as many as 50 men a day and ending up with very little money after paying off madams, pimps, drug pushers, and the police. A great myth was that many prostitutes eventually married and settled down to raise families, but these were the exceptions. The more common experience was for such women to deteriorate, moving lower down the scale of whorehouses as their bodies and looks showed the ravages of years at the profession. When they were unacceptable to the madams of brothels, they were thrown out to survive as best they could as street-walkers. Suicide exceeded alcoholism and drug overdoses as a cause of death among prostitutes. In Denver it was common for at least two or three girls a week to take poison.

A depression-era sign that was a bit more blatant than most.

The passage of the Mann Act in 1910, forbidding the transportation of women across state lines for immoral purposes, marked the swing of public opinion in favor of suppressing prostitution. Over the next seven years law enforcement agents closed down most organized vice areas in big cities. Naturally, such moves didn’t wipe out prostitution, and houses of ill repute continued to thrive although in lesser numbers. They still exist in some big cities, sometimes in the form of “massage parlors” or “rap studios,” but the trade no longer draws the traffic it once enjoyed. Some modern madams attribute the decline to the Sexual Revolution, specifically objecting to the amateurs who are “killing business by giving it away.”

Occasionally, a madam has been lionized in recent years, as was the case with Polly Adler, whose doings and quotes were dutifully reported by the Broadway columnists of the 1930s and 1940s. In 1980 a lesser madam in Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., Ethel Brand, received nationwide publicity—and an increase in patronage—when it was revealed that she paid all taxes due on her income and that of her women.

The only state that allows prostitution is Nevada, which had outlawed the practice for a time during and after World War II. Now, it is considered one of the state’s most important tourist attractions. In 1980 Joe Conforte, the owner of the state’s most famous brothel, the Mustang Ranch, sold it to Madam Gina Wilson for a reported $19.8 million. Even allowing for considerable hype in the price quoted, it is evident that the wages of sin remain most rewarding.

prostitution, male

It is perhaps one of the archetypal male fantasies that there be houses of prostitution staffed by male harlots who would service female clients. The first such brothel for this purpose was Aunt Josie's Place in San Francisco. In 1906 Aunt Josie, an old black madam, opened her unique brothel on Mason Street, in what was known as the Uptown Tenderloin area. Madam Josie hoped to attract the ladies of society as clients but appears to have had only limited success despite a relatively lavish two-story setup with great guarantees of privacy, including the furnishing of silk masks to clients so that even the lady's partner did not have to see her face unless she wished it.

Customers were offered a book of photographs of male harlots along with related copy that supplied pertinent physical statistics. Once the woman made her selection, the lover was then summoned to the house by telephone or runner. The fee for his services was set at $10, two to 40 times the going rate in female brothels. Quite naturally, the story spread that many of these men refused to take any money, feeling their reward was already sufficient.

It was never determined how many women availed themselves of the exotic offerings of Aunt Josie's place other than female prostitutes who enjoyed the idea of having their usual role reversed. The brothel closed in 1907 mainly because of threats from pimps who said their girls were spending too much of their (the pimps') money on such silly diversions, whereupon Aunt Josie ended her experiment and converted her place into a more normal house of sin.

In more recent times male prostitution has continued to a minor extent. Advertisements in the underground press in such cities as New York, San Francisco and Las Vegas offer male prostitutes for women, usually on an outcall arrangement, but these are more often homosexual operations. In the 1930s Hollywood was reputed to have a number of gay houses, but in actuality, gay prostitution activities are generally more suited to "bath houses" than to brothels as such. While Hollywood has contributed films about the male prostitute who services women, the fact remains, as Aunt Josie discovered, that this type of brothel product just won't sell.

prowling brigades Civil War plunderers

Probably the worst crime wave ever to hit the Southern states occurred during the Civil War, when groups of deserters and draft dodgers hid out in the hills and survived by burning, plundering and confiscating the property and livestock of Confederate citizens. While virtually all Southerners, the members of these so-called prowling brigades occasionally took in a stray Union deserter as well. They maintained a number of strongholds, especially in western North Carolina and Alabama, and were very active in the wake of Sherman's march through Georgia. Many of the prowling criminals were able to go back to their homes after the war by simply posing as returning soldiers or former prisoners of war, but others chose to head for the outlaw trails of the West.

Pruett, Moman (1872–1945) attorney of criminal law

There are those who maintain that Moman Pruett was the greatest practitioner of criminal law this country has ever produced, far superior, they say, to Clarence Darrow. It was a sentiment Pruett himself always shared. He was an ex-convict who had never spent a day in law school; in fact, his formal education, accomplished in his boyhood, added up to a mere nine months. He became a lawyer without passing a bar examination, but his record shows that out of 343 defendants charged with murder—the majority of whom he later freely admitted had been guilty as could be—won acquittals for 303. Of the other 40, only one was given the death sentence, and afterward, Pruett went to Washington to present President William McKinley with a phony record of the case and had his client's sentence commuted to life.

In the Oklahoma-Texas panhandle, where Moman Pruett set up practice, families would travel from miles around to attend court when he was slated to be the defense counsel in a murder case. And Old Moman, as he became affectionately known, never disappointed his fans, always putting on a good show. At the beginning of a trial, Moman made an impressive appearance, nattily dressed in a custom-tailored suit with a high batwing collar. But by the time he reached summation, one of his contemporaries recalled, he was partly disrobed, his collar was always awry and his disheveled hair fell over his forehead to meet his bushy eyebrows. His piercing black eyes automatically sought and stared unwaveringly into a juror's eyes, holding them until Moman felt that he controlled the person. He reenacted death struggles with grunts and shouts. While explaining how one of his clients had killed a rival, supposedly in self-defense, he lunged at the jury with a metal-tipped pencil as he claimed the victim had done with a knife at the defendant. Several jurors were so under Moman's spell that they became convinced he had a knife and bolted out of the jury box in fright. On returning, they promptly brought in a verdict of not guilty.

Pruiett was born prematurely on a steamboat on the Ohio River in 1872. His childhood was troubled and at the age of 16 he was convicted of forging bills of lading in connection with a freighting job he had. He served six months and then he and his mother moved to Texas. Two years later, he was convicted of rolling a drunk for $3,000, a charge Pruiett insisted to his dying day was false. He was convicted and sentenced to five years in prison. The 18-year-old was stunned at the verdict. He shook his fist at the judge and jury and cried: "You'll all regret this. I'll empty your damned jails, and I'll turn the murderers and thieves loose in your midst. And I'll do it in a legal way."

Pruiett served two years before his mother's tearful pleas to the governor won his freedom. Upon his release he went to work for some lawyers. A federal judge took an interest in his case, became convinced he was innocent and, because of his work in lawyers' offices, granted him permission to practice law before the federal courts, not an unusual procedure in the 19th century. Young Pruiett then won the right to practice in state courts and launched what was to be an astounding 50-year legal career. Throughout it his credo was to win his cases, no matter how. In a candid autobiography published shortly before his death, Moman Pruiett, Criminal Lawyer, he admitted faking evidence, jury tampering and suborning perjury. More than once, he was forced to flee a town to escape an angry mob because he had succeeded in acquitting an obvious killer. But Pruiett did not always have to utilize trickery and illegal means; he was extremely well versed in the law and knew the intricacies of every legal argument.

In the 343 murder cases he handled, Moman never pleaded a client guilty. When Clarence Darrow waived a jury trial and admitted the guilt of Leopold and Loeb, Pruiett snorted derisively. He said he would have taken the case to a jury. "I would have got them off with a defense of temporary insanity mixed up with a few other things."

Among the other defenses used by Pruiett was justifiable homicide. When Lottie Baker shot her husband for carrying on an affair with another woman, Moman defended her right to shoot him. He crouched before the jury box, holding an imaginary pistol. "I'd have taken my gun and shot him through the heart," he cried. "As he fell to the earth, I would have placed my ear over his bloody bosom and listened with relish and satisfaction while I heard his soul yelping its way into hell." He ended his summation on his hands and knees, head cocked sideways, with an ear over an imaginary bosom. His client was found "free of guilt."

Insanity was Moman's favorite plea and he got scores of killers off with such a defense. One prosecutor refused to release a prisoner after Pruiett had won him an acquittal. "If he's crazy, then he belongs in an institution," the prosecutor told Pruiett. Moman was flabbergasted. "You know that defense is just so much words," he said, making it clear he felt the prosecutor wasn't playing fair. Contradiction didn't really bother Pruiett. A week after he convinced one jury his client was insane, he went back to the same courtroom and proved to another jury the man was absolutely sane.

While awaiting a verdict in another case, Pruiett admitted his client was a murdering maniac and a menace to peace and safety. "Then he ought to be hanged," a listener noted.

Pruiett shook his head. "If the jury says you're not guilty when you are, why then you're not guilty."

He would use any means to gain a not-guilty verdict. In one case he had the defendant's half-sister seduce a juror to win an acquittal. He could always spot the troublesome juror. Once hearing that a jury was deadlocked 11 to one for acquittal, he smuggled a note to the recalcitrant juror, allegedly in the hand of the juror's employer, reading, "Don't hold out any longer, turn the poor devil loose." The juror did.

In another case Pruiett defended a woman who was accused of shooting her husband, a popular Klansman, on a Miami street. After allowing the jury to be packed with members of the Ku Klux Klan, he put his client on the stand and had her reveal her husband was born in Sicily. That statement brought the xenophobic Klansmen to attention. Then the woman told how her husband, this alien, had beaten her and sent all her money to his relatives back in Sicily. During his summation Pruiett argued it was the duty of American manhood to protect American womanhood from the alien beast. He ended his summation by shouting the secret password of the Klan, "All's well on the Potomac."

The jury freed the woman, only learning much later that the victim's body had been shipped back to his birth place in Davenport, Iowa, to be buried by his Anglo-Saxon family.

Pruiett became rich in his practice. The woman who had killed her Klansman husband willed him her home and her husband's life insurance policies. He received a 1,600 acre farm for winning another acquittal and stocked it with 200 head of cattle given him by a couple whom he had defended from a charge of poisoning their own child. In another case he demanded $25,000 from a man accused of killing his father. The client at first offered him $10,000 but finally agreed to a sporting proposition. If Pruiett got him off scot free, the lawyer would get $40,000. If the man were found guilty and got any kind of a sentence, the lawyer wouldn't get a dime. Pruiett got the full $40,000. Yet, while he relished a high fee, he never forgot his oath to "empty your damned jails." The same week he collected the $40,000, he provided his services free to a prostitute who had killed a lover. She too went free.

Moman never kept track of how much money he earned. He lived lavishly, provided for his parents and his own family in grand style and was always a sucker for a touch. Many of the clients he defended for free ended up putting the bite on him after the trial. When a hurricane hit Florida and the land boom there collapsed, Pruiett lost almost all of his considerable fortune. He returned broke to Oklahoma, where a short time later, he was accused of trying to shake down a wealthy hotel owner. He was disbarred, but in 1935 the Oklahoma Supreme Court changed the penalty to a one-year suspension. Pruiett, however, never practiced again. Wracked by illness, he lived out his last years in frugal retirement, alleviated only by the publication of his autobiography in 1944, a year before his death.

public enemies

A term invented by J. Edgar Hoover, director of the FBI, the “public enemies” were little more than armed stickup men of the 1930s who had thousands of predecessors in the big-city gangsters of the previous century and those who rode on horseback in the Wild West. To magnify such creatures into supervillains took the cooperation of a story-hungry press. Many crime experts view the immediate post-Prohibition period as marking the breakup of the old bootleg mobs and the formation of the new criminal syndicate. Had the full energies of the FBI at the time been devoted to the more difficult task of containing this emerging element, it has been argued, the effectiveness of organized crime today would be greatly reduced, if not eliminated.

Instead, Hoover and his men concentrated on the likes of John Dillinger, a holdup man of considerable flair to be sure but hardly the menace to society that the syndicate was (and is). The total loot accumulated by the Dillinger mob probably came to far less than $300,000—the Chicago syndicate made that in a day. Clyde Barrow and Bonnie Parker were the bloodiest of the public enemies, killing 13 to take the highest estimate; yet Al Capone was responsible for killing 500 victims, directly or on his orders, but was not troubled by the FBI. While the likes of Baby Face Nelson, Pretty Boy Floyd, the Barkers and Alvin “Creepy” Karpis were being either killed or imprisoned by the FBI, mobsters like Frank Costello, Lucky Luciano, Louis Lepke, Albert Anastasia and Meyer Lansky were consolidating their power, claiming more victims in a month than all the public enemies managed in their criminal careers.

Possibly the closest the FBI came to nailing an organized crime figure was the case they made against Roger “the Terrible” Touhy, who was convicted of kidnapping in the early 1930s. However, the agency work in trapping Touhy proved futile years later when the courts freed him, labeling the kidnapping charge an underworld fabrication accomplished with connivance of the victim.

Puente, Dorothea (1929–) mass murderess with a “heart of gold”

Dorothea Gray, or, to use her third of four married names, Dorothea Puente, was in the 1980s much celebrated in Mexican-American circles as a rich woman who did much to help the down and out in Sacramento. She made large contributions to the Mexican-American Youth Association and was much respected at social events connected with the Mexican-American community and called “La Doctera” for her solicitude of the needy, especially men and women facing a lonely old age. The fact that she danced at charity balls with Governor Jerry Brown increased her status in the eyes of the Mexican community.

In reality Dorothea, in her fifties, was a killer, in many respects similar to the infamous Belle Gunness, who at the turn of the 20th century killed would-be suitors for their money and buried them in her farmyard in La Porte, Indiana. Dorothea buried her victims in the yard of her mansion. Her victims weren’t suitors but down-and-outers she made so much a show of giving care and comfort in their declining years.

Dorothea had been an outlaw in many ways for many years, but no one knew that, as she had gone through several marriages with new identities. She came from a family of cotton pickers and was raised off and on by a drunken mother. She was sent to an orphanage when she was nine and later lived with a variety of relatives, including some of her older brothers and sisters.

In her teens she worked as a waitress and later moved on to prostitution. She engaged in various confidence games and more prostitution so that by the 1960s she owned a half-dozen brothels. In fact, her mansion previously had been a rather imposing bordello. She ran through four husbands but in her supposed good works for the lonely aged, she had hit upon a good thing.

She lived lavishly on the top floor of her white Victorian mansion while all her “boarders”—as she liked to call them—lived below. Her lodgers seemed to have few complaints. They received good care, good food and their own color TV sets. To them Dorothea was an angel, the soul of compassion. Dorothea lived well herself and was also an ardent gardener. The source of her seemingly endless wealth was that garden. It was where she buried her victims.

Dorothea saw to it that her lodgers filed their Social Security payments when they were due, but she would show up at the Social Security office to arrange that she be named payee on the checks, explaining that her lodgers were not competent to handle their own money and that, as a relative, she was taking care of them. A typical instance was that of Alvaro (Burt) Montoya, who was, Puente informed the government, her cousin and somewhat retarded. So Montoya's $637 stipend went directly to Dorothea and would keep on coming until Montoya died.

That was a problem for Dorothea; she had to ensure that Montoya and her other lodgers went on living, or better still, that they died without the government knowing. This created the best circumstance for Dorothea, since it left her with vacancies to fill in her mansion—and additional payments from more retirees. The only hitch would be if a pensioner died outside of the mansion, on the street or in a hospital, and a death certificate was made out. That would end Puente's control of the money. Therefore, Dorothea killed her boarders and while everyone else in the mansion was asleep, she would plant the bodies in holes other lodgers dug in her ever-expanding garden to accommodate more new "plants."

For a time various social workers were quite happy to send their clients to Dorothea, but in time they found the elderly persons were disappearing. Sometimes, Dorothea explained this away by saying they had gone to stay with relatives in Mexico—or in fact with some of Dorothea's in-laws who seemed to have the same desire to help the unfortunate of the world.

The juggling of so many disappearing oldsters had to make some social workers suspicious, and eventually the police were notified. At first the authorities were thrown off by the very fine surroundings Puente offered the lonely oldsters, but finally her criminal past emerged, and while she insisted she had turned her life around years earlier, authorities asked for permission to do some digging in her yard.

Puente had to comply, and soon searchers turned up a deposit of lime 18 inches from the surface in a corner of the yard. Digging further, they found bits of clothing and a leg bone with bits of skin. That, however, was not sufficient evidence to prove Puente had committed murder. She explained that a shallow hole had been dug where the bone was recovered and that she had poured lime in it merely to soften the earth.

Before any charges could be filed, the law would have to find more evidence of foul play. Crime scene technicians, heavy-equipment operators, forensic anthropologists and other diggers scoured the yard. In the meantime, Puente left the mansion with one of her lodgers, allegedly to meet a cousin. She didn't return. Just after she left, a second body was uncovered, then another and another. In a few days a total of seven bodies were found, and there was every indication that more were to come, one lodger ending up in a box on the side of the Sacramento River.

Puente had escaped the city by taxi, first to Stockton and then, by Greyhound bus, to Los Angeles. Even with the hunt for her on, Dorothea could not resist trying a scam on a retired handyman named Charles Willgues. Her intended victim grew suspicious and called the Los Angeles CBS news bureau, which sent out a film crew together with local police. Puente was captured and brought to trial, and on August 26, 1993, a jury—after almost six weeks deliberation—found her guilty of killing three of the victims, making use of the drug flurazepam.

The jury's real hangup was agreeing on a sentence. The judge then sentenced Puente to life imprisonment without parole.

Purdy, Sam (?–1805) white slaver

The most notorious white slaver operating in America at the beginning of the 19th century, Sam Purdy has been given credit by some writers with being the originator of the phrase “sold down the river” referring to the practice of “stealing” young girls along the Ohio and upper Mississippi and selling them down river, especially at Natchez. The most infamous of these sales took place on flatboats with spirited bidding from bordello keepers and “floating hogpen” operators. Not all the girls sold had been kidnapped; many were purchased from their impoverished farmer parents. Purdy, an unscrupulous Kentuckian, was the king of the trade, specializing in particularly good-looking girls and commanding sums well in excess of the average $125 price. In one case Purdy's ring of procurers, which included Lou Evans, Blackie Coe, James Feeney, Johnny Gaines, Joe Bontura and Tommy McMurren, collected the astonishing sum of $1,650 for an 18-year-old girl.

Purdy finally ran afoul of a reformer named Carlos White, who effectively destroyed his operations by rescuing a number of girls, including the famed Beckett sisters, whom he spirited out of a New Orleans den of iniquity known as The Swamp. How rough reformer White got is a matter of conjecture, but in 1805 Sam Purdy was found stabbed to death in his own bed. After that, one after another of the Purdy gang was shot to death, either in bed or from ambush. The exception to this bloodbath was 60-year-old James Feeney, who was given a 10-year jail term after being hauled into court by White. The Purdy white slavers having been eliminated, Carlos White moved to the Louisiana countryside and established a sprawling cotton plantation, which, it must be noted, was worked by black slaves.

Purple gang Detroit bootlegging gang

One of the most vicious bootlegging mobs of the Prohibition era, the Purple Gang, under the notorious Abe Bernstein, dominated the rackets in Detroit. In the city's bootleg wars the gang was responsible for upwards of 500 killings. Detroit was an important prize because it was the funnel for supplies of liquor coming in from Canada.

The killers of the Purple Gang became legendary as the most proficient in the underworld, and three of them, George Lewis and the brothers Phil and Harry Keywell, were believed to have been borrowed by Al Capone for use in the St. Valentine's Day Massacre in 1929. In addition to bootlegging, which earned the gang millions of dollars, the Purples' major interests included extortion, hijacking and jewelry thefts plus an occasional foray into another city to pull off a big robbery.

When the national crime syndicate was formed in the 1930s, the Purple Gang was invited to join. It was strictly an invitation, since the gang was considered too dangerous to be forced into anything. The Purples accepted willingly and assumed a strong position in the crime cartel's gambling empire.

Purple gang modern New York gang

A new crime gang that arose in Manhattan in the late 1970s, the Purple Gang, named after the Prohibition mob of the same name, has reached the point of becoming New York's sixth crime family.

A decade earlier, its members had been no more than teenage errand boys for major narcotics traffickers, but they had organized, according to a 1976 report by the Drug Enforcement Administration, with an "enormous capacity for violence" and a "lack of respect for other members of organized crime." The gang, with an estimated strength of 110, is an outgrowth of an Italian-American youth gang from Pleasant Avenue, an underworld stronghold in East Harlem, that served as a link between the old-line crime families and the new black gangs that had taken over the street sale of drugs.

Law enforcement agencies fear that the Purple Gang will declare war on both the Mafia families and the blacks and seek to establish supremacy in New York and, in fact, on the entire East Coast. In December 1977 the New York Times attributed to the gang the following activities: (1) large-scale distribution of drugs in Harlem and the South Bronx; (2) muscle jobs for two organized crime families' extortion networks; (3) the murder, and often the dismemberment of 17 individuals with criminal backgrounds, including two police plants; and (4) international gunrunning, with alleged ties to Latin-American terrorists.

Membership in the gang is restricted to young Italian-Americans who were raised on Pleasant Avenue between 110th and 117th streets. This membership policy is much more restrictive than those of the five established New York crime families and could have an explosive impact within the crime establishment, even leading to warfare with Mafia groups who seek to import new blood from Italy.

purse snatching

Purse snatching is an increasingly common crime. There is an estimated 50 to 100 purse snatchings each month in the New York City subways, the number often swinging widely because of the depredations of a single teenager. When such a professional is in custody, the snatchings decrease by more than 50 a month. One of the favored techniques is to stand between two subway cars and, as the train starts pulling out of the station, reach out and pull free a woman's purse.

Recently, a crime analysis officer for the New York Police Department found that purse stealing in Manhattan's top restaurants was up 35 percent over the previous year. When a woman puts her purse on a vacant chair at a table or at her feet beside her chair, she is inviting a purse snatcher to take it. Purse snatchers often work in pairs. When a target in a restaurant is sighted, one of them will create some kind of disturbance to gain the victim's attention. While the woman is looking away from her table, the actual snatcher will lift the purse. A popular technique is for the thief, man or woman, to carry an umbrella with the curved handle down. The umbrella handle suddenly hooks the bag and in an instant it is on the thief's wrist, or under the coat over his arm if he is a man, and on its way out of the restaurant. Police advise that women in restaurants keep their purses either on their laps or on the floor between their legs.

Other purse snatchers who operate in theaters are called "seat tippers," victimizing women who put their purses down on an adjacent empty seat. Yet others specialize in snatching purses from ladies' rooms. When a woman is in a toilet stall, her purse should never be placed on the floor or hung on the coat hook on the door. Thieves simply dive under the door and grab the purse on the floor or stand on the toilet in the next stall and reach over and take the purse off the hook. The snatcher has ample time to escape since the victim can't immediately pursue the thief.

Purvis, Melvin (1903–1960) FBI agent

In 1934 Melvin Purvis, the young special agent in charge of the Chicago office of the FBI, was voted eighth in a Literary Digest poll of the year's outstanding world figures, coming in ahead of Rear Adm. Richard E. Byrd and Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins. He was hailed by the New York Times as the nemesis of public enemies. Purvis captured more public enemies than any other FBI man, directing the hunts that netted such gangsters as Baby Face Nelson, Verne Sankey, Thomas H. Robinson, Jr., and Pretty Boy Floyd. He won the most acclaim, however, as the man who set the trap for John Dillinger outside a Chicago movie house on July 22, 1934. It was Purvis who called out, in his famed squeaky voice, "Stick 'em up, Johnny, we've got you surrounded." As Dillinger went for a gun in his trousers pocket, he was shot to death by FBI agents.

As acclaimed as he was, Purvis' years with the FBI, from 1927, after a brief law career in his native South Carolina, until 1935, were not always happy ones. He had his share of failures and his ego, as towering as that of his superior, J. Edgar Hoover, put him in constant conflict with the director. Of all the regional offices of the FBI, the Chicago office was the only one that did not begin its press releases with the obligatory "J. Edgar Hoover announces. . . ." Purvis' name was substituted for Hoover's in such releases.

This competition between Purvis and Hoover developed after Purvis was appointed to the Chicago office in 1932, following five years of duty in various field offices. Chicago was the hub around which both the great Prohibition gangs and the more flamboyant of the desperado-type "public enemies" worked. The latter were typified by members of the Dillinger gang and the Terrible Touhys. The Touhys' leader, Roger Touhy, represented one of Purvis' greatest failures. In 1933 Purvis arrested Roger Touhy and three henchmen for the $100,000 kidnapping of St. Paul millionaire brewer William Hamm, announcing, "We have an ironclad case." A jury acquitted them, however, and later, the Hamm job was found to be the work of the Barker-Karpis gang.

Immediately after that failure, Purvis charged Touhy and his men with kidnapping a mysterious figure, Jake "the Barber" Factor. "This case," Purvis said, "holds a particular interest for me because it represents a triumph of deductive detective work. We assumed from the start, with no material evidence, that the Touhy gang was responsible for the crime."

Some observers were not sure whether Factor had really been kidnapped or not. Touhy was sentenced to 99 years in prison, and it was not until many years later that the truth came out: the Capone mob had faked the Factor kidnapping in order to use the FBI to get rid of Touhy, an uncooperative competitor.

Probably Purvis' most trying experience was the famed shoot-out between FBI agents and the Dillinger gang at the Little Bohemia resort in Wisconsin in April 1934. In the gun battle an FBI agent was killed by Baby Face Nelson and a local police officer was wounded. All the agents captured were three of the gang's molls, but they shot two innocent bystanders, a salesman and a Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC) cook and killed another young CCC worker.

The day after the debacle newspapers demanded Purvis' badge. Somberly, he offered his resignation, which Hoover refused to accept, as much to save the agency as Purvis. Even when Purvis did trap and kill Dillinger, he and the FBI were subjected to considerable abuse. A Virginia newspaper editor commented: "Any brave man would have walked down the aisle and arrested Dillinger . . . why were there so many cowards afraid of this one man? The answer is that the federal agents are mostly cowards."

It was a bad rap on Purvis, who frequently had exhibited (and would continue to exhibit) great personal courage—trading shots with Baby Face Nelson; dragging then-Public Enemy No. 1 Verne Sankey out of a Chicago-area barbershop with lather still in his ears; stalking Pretty Boy Floyd across an open cornfield; tackling, together with another agent, gangster Volney Davis as he was about to drive off in a stolen car. However, it was not unwarranted criticism that led to Purvis' resignation from the FBI in July 1935.

There is little doubt that this departure was the result of continuing friction with Hoover, especially in the aftermath of the Dillinger case. Dillinger had been betrayed by a madam named Anna Sage, "the Lady in Red," who had made a deal with the FBI to deliver Dillinger in exchange for a promise that a deportation move against her would be dropped and that the reward money would be given to her. Purvis agreed to help her on these matters. She got most of the reward money but was deported despite Purvis' intervention. It was widely believed that Hoover had not joined in the effort to save the Sage woman so that Purvis would be placed in an awkward position. Hoover was also believed to have been behind the decision by Attorney General Homer Cummings to prohibit the making of a Hollywood movie about Purvis' career. When Purvis tendered his resignation "for purely personal reasons,"

PURVIS, Will

Hoover had to issue a denial that a rift existed between them.

After that, Purvis picked up some quick money organizing the Melvin Purvis Junior G-Man Corps for a breakfast cereal firm, an act that further strained relations with Hoover.

Purvis also wrote a book on his FBI career entitled American Agent, fully demonstrating the ill feelings between him and Hoover by never mentioning the director's name. Hoover did not get a chance to answer in kind until 1956, with the appearance of The FBI Story, a best-seller by Don Whitehead. The book is as near to an "authorized" history of the agency as has ever been written and one that Hoover obviously exerted considerable control over. In Whitehead's book Hoover's pride and prejudices show through. For example, Hoover hated William J. Burns, his predecessor in the Bureau of Investigation, which was replaced by the FBI. Whenever Whitehead touches on Burns' many successes, credit is given only to some unnamed former Secret Service operative. It would have been impossible to drop all reference to Purvis in discussions about the agency's war on the public enemies but the agent's name is omitted from the extremely thorough index.

During World War II Col. Melvin Purvis was assigned to the U.S. Army War Crimes Office. In November 1959 Roger Touhy was released from prison following a ruling by a federal judge that the kidnapping charge against him had been a fabrication of organized crime. Twenty-three days after he was freed, Touhy was murdered by underworld assassins. A few months later, on February 29, 1960, Purvis, who had been practicing as a lawyer, committed suicide in his home in Florence, S.C. At the time he was 56 years old and had been in poor health.

Purvis, Will (1874–1943) wrong man

Will Purvis' escape from execution in Mississippi in 1894 has long been cited by opponents of capital punishment as an example of the danger of error in dealing out the death penalty.

A 19-year-old farmer in Mercer County, Miss., Purvis was arrested and charged with the murder of Will Buckley in what appeared to have been an internal dispute within the White Caps, a Ku Klux Klan-type organization of the period. Purvis had joined the White Caps some three months before Buckley was shot to death. After Buckley's murder bloodhounds traced a cold trail to near the Purvis farm. Jim Buckley, the dead man's brother, identified Purvis as the murderer, and he was indicted and quickly found guilty.

Purvis' execution by hanging was scheduled for February 7, 1894, and on that day about 3,000 persons jammed the area around the scaffold to watch the events. Many in the crowd, however, still insisted Purvis was being executed for a crime he had not committed and were there to show their support for him. At the moment a preacher implored heaven, "God save this innocent boy," the hangman severed the rope holding the trapdoor shut, but Purvis just tumbled to the ground below, as the rope around his neck unwound.

His hands still tied, Purvis jumped back up the gallows steps, crying, "Let's get this over with!" Officials were about to oblige, but the crowd grew unruly. The preacher asked for a show of hands of "all who are opposed to hanging Will Purvis a second time." A sea of hands rose and hundreds of men moved forward menacingly. Purvis was then returned to his jail cell.

After a time, the Mississippi Supreme Court ruled that Purvis had to be executed, but before the second attempt could be made, friends of the condemned man helped him to escape. He remained in hiding until 1896, when a new governor, A. J. McLaurin, took office. McLaurin had campaigned on a promise to reduce Purvis' sentence to life imprisonment. In 1898 Purvis was pardoned when Jim Buckley admitted he was not sure Purvis had been the killer.

Then in 1917, 24 years after the murder, an old man named Joe Beard came forward at a religious revival meeting to purge his soul before taking to his deathbed. He said he and another White Capper, Louis Thornhill, had been chosen by lot to kill Will Buckley. Beard offered enough independent proof to indicate he had information about the crime that only the real murderer or murderers would have. In 1920 the Mississippi legislature awarded Will Purvis $5,000 compensation "for a great wrong done you" and removed "all stain and dishonor from your name."

pyramid schemes confidence racket

Among the oldest con games, pyramid rackets have been used to swindle millions of dollars annually, employing everything from dollar bills in chain letters to more sophisticated schemes that sell franchises to unsuspecting individuals who then must sell more franchises to other victims and so on. In theory, pyramid schemes can continue on indefinitely, but in reality, the bubble eventually collapses from the sheer weight of the numbers involved.

A typical operation was the pyramid financial scheme that swept California in the late 1970s, leaving a trail of broken families and wrecked friendships. In the scheme each player paid an entry fee of $1,000. Then that player was required to bring in two new players, who contributed $1,000 apiece. Half of this amount, or $500, went to the top of the pyramid while the remaining $500 from each of the two newer players went to the player who recruited them. Thus, the first player got his money back and then waited to move up another rung on the pyramid as each of the second two players recruited two more players so that they could recover their original $1,000 investment. As each such step on the pyramid was mounted, the initial player moved from the number 16 rung, to the number eight rung, to the number four rung, to the number two rung and finally, to number one rung. Upon reaching number one or top rung, the player received the money that accumulated at the top for him, $16,000.

While it might seem simple for each player in a pyramid scheme to induce two others to join, the mathematics soon become astronomical. In essence, each player on the number 16 rung is responsible for the creation of two new pyramids and this progression of twos keeps getting bigger and bigger, for there are 16 players on the bottom rung, and it takes 32 players to get them to advance to the next rung. Each of these 32 players must now recruit two players, or a total of 64. The 64 then must recruit a total of 128. The total jumps to 256, at which point the first set of 16 players have reached the top of their pyramids. However, for the next set of players who started on the 16 rung, the total of new recruits needed jumps to 512, and for the next group the number required is 1,024.

It is thus apparent why, by June 1980, the mass pyramid craze in California collapsed. Even that state ran dry of enough gullible people to keep the scheme going. A member of the state attorney general's office reported that a number of operators had been arrested attempting to start new pyramids in New York, Florida and Canada. Ironically, such pyramid rackets even attract sophisticated victims who fully understand that a scheme must eventually collapse. No matter what the actual stage of recruitment is, they are told they are "getting in at the start, so there's no way you can lose."

Rablen, Carroll (1895–1929) murder victim

The murder of Carroll Rablen in 1929 resulted in one of California's most sensational murder trials, so sensational it had to be held in an open-air dance pavilion to accommodate all those eager to attend.

Carroll Rablen of Tuttletown, Calif. was deaf because of an injury received during World War I. His wife Eva was a vivacious, fun-loving woman who enjoyed dancing. While Carroll didn't dance, he took her to affairs and didn't object to her dancing with other men. On April 29, 1929 the couple went to the town's weekly ball. Carroll stayed outside in their car while Eva went inside to enjoy herself. About midnight Eva pushed through the crowd to bring her husband a cup of coffee and then returned to the dance. Moments later, Carroll was writhing in agony on the floor of the car; his cries brought his father and several others to his side. He complained of the way the coffee had tasted. A doctor was summoned but Carroll died before he arrived.

Carroll's father was sure Eva had poisoned her husband for his insurance, but when the contents of the dead man's stomach were sent to a chemist for analysis, no trace of poison was found. However, a subsequent search of the dance hall area uncovered a bottle marked, "Strychnine." The bottle was traced to a pharmacy in a nearby town, where records showed it had been bought by a Mrs. Joe Williams, allegedly to kill some gophers. The druggist identified Eva Rablen as Mrs. Williams. She was charged with her husband's murder and her trial drew one of the largest crowds ever to attend a formal judicial hearing in the state. The weakness in the prosecution's case was that no poison had been found in Carroll Rablen's body. Consequently, the prosecutor called in one of the most famous chemists in the nation, Dr. Edward Heinrich, who was recognized as a brilliant forensic expert.

Heinrich found traces of strychnine in the dead man's stomach as well as in the coffee cup. He also theorized that since Eva Rablen had carried the coffee through a packed dance hall, she might have spilled some on the way. An appeal for help produced a woman who remembered that Eva had bumped into her and spilled coffee on her dress. The coffee stains on the dress also contained traces of the poison. Faced with this damning evidence, Eva Rablen changed her plea to guilty and was sentenced to life imprisonment.

race and crime

Even a cursory study of criminal statistics makes it apparent that blacks, comprising less than 13 percent of the population, commit a high proportion of most crimes, especially those of a violent nature. Despite their inferior numbers, blacks commit more murders than whites (generally about a five to four ratio), more robberies (a five to three ratio) and more rapes (a 10 to nine ratio). On a proportional basis, blacks also commit more aggravated assaults, burglaries, larceny-thefts and car thefts. Probably the only serious crime with a low black participation is kidnapping. These figures, however, are based on arrest records as compiled by the FBI, and most crime experts admit that blacks are arrested more frequently and on less evidence than whites and are more often victims of mass, or sweep, arrests. On the other hand, it is well-established that violent crime is less frequently reported in the ghetto than elsewhere, and since this is clearly black-committed crime, the aforementioned black-white ratios should probably be more pronounced than they are.

The figures do not prove that blacks are any more crime-prone than other ethnic groups. They are simply behaving the way every other ethnic group behaved when it dominated the ghettos. The Irish were the main residents of the big-city ghettos in the 19th century, and they were far and away the prime perpetrators of crime. Until late in the century, most of the great gangs were Irish. When the Irish were replaced or supplemented in the ghettos by the Italians, Jews and Poles, these ethnic groups were responsible for most of the crime.

Perhaps the most salient point about any study of ethnic crime is that whoever occupies the ghettos commits the crimes and almost always against their own kind. The Jews victimized Jews; Italians victimized Italians. This was somewhat less true of the Irish, who brought with them certain basic hatreds that put them in conflict with many “native Americans,” which in the early 19th century often meant those of British descent.

Today, ethnic or racial crime follows the same pattern. Blacks victimize blacks; Hispanics victimize Hispanics. This is not necessarily what the media report, for the simple reason that black victimizing black is not considered important, but black victimizing white—especially in a white-oriented media—is.

While it is widely reported that more than half of all murders are committed by blacks, it is seldom added that nine times out of 10, the victims are also black. The statistics of ghetto crime, now and in the past, are frightening. Among young blacks aged 10 to 14, homicide is the second leading cause of death, exceeded only by motor vehicle accidents. From ages 15 through 34 homicide is the number one cause of death among black males. It is also the leading cause of death among black females between 15 and 29.

Overall, a ghetto black male is 10 times more likely to be murdered than a white man. A black female is five times as likely to be raped as a white woman, and both black males and females are four times as likely to get assaulted than are whites of either sex. Among females, white women are murdered at a higher rate than black women, a ratio of 5 to 3. Indeed this is in contrast to male murders when more blacks are murdered than whites. Among women, of course, the vast number of offenders are whites. Among black women the offenders are vastly black.

Contrary to popular opinion, black women are the least likely murder victims. They constitute about 19 percent of black victims; white women by contrast represent over 30 percent of white victims. In short, whites are more homicidal toward white women than blacks are to black women—and to women in general.

As John Godwin notes in Murder U.S.A.:

The newspapers of both races tend to skirt the psychic impact of this black-on-black carnage, albeit for different reasons. The white press knows that its readers worry about black crime only when it affects them. Black papers prefer to dodge the issue because they consider it “too sensitive”; they fear it may cause further stigmatization of their race. Together they have created what resembles a conspiracy of semi-silence surrounding one of the most explosive problems of our time. They are chiefly responsible for the wondrous ignorance of most whites concerning the terror haunting black communities—terror far starker than what they suffer.

While it is difficult for white America to reject the contention that blacks are simply more “criminal,” the fact is that the black experience to a great extent mirrors that of other ethnic groups in earlier periods, typically the Irish and Italians before they left the ghettos. It is readily apparent that the black crime rate varies with socioeconomic status and geographic region. As Peter W. Lewis and Jack Wright, Jr., professors of criminal justice, state in Modern Criminal Justice: “Criminologists generally consider race to be a significant factor in the explanation of crime rates insofar as it affects the nature of social experience and social interaction.”

Ragen, James M. (1881–1946) gambling czar and murder victim

From 1940 to 1946 James M. Ragen was the most powerful man in gambling in America, having taken control of the horse-racing wire business following the imprisonment of Moe Annenberg. Ragen waged war with the Chicago syndicate and held his own for a time until he became the victim of a mob execution.

Like many other members of the Chicago underworld in the early years of the 20th century, Ragen got his start as a circulation slugger for the Chicago Tribune during the period of the great newspaper wars, when Max Annenberg, Moe’s older brother, was circulation manager. Among Ragen’s coworkers were such criminals as Dion O’Banion, Frankie and Vince McErlane, Walter Stevens, Mossy Enright and Tommy Maloy—part of the roster of killers who kept the city of Chicago bloody for decades thereafter. Ragen managed to outlive most of his fellow sluggers and future gang bosses while maintaining a certain independence from the Capone mob.

RAGEN'S Colts

When Moe Annenberg went to prison in 1940, the federal government was sure that the dismantling of his Nation-Wide News Service would be a crippling blow to illegal race horse betting throughout the country. But Ragen quickly moved in to fill the void. His Continental Press Service became the dominant racing wire in the nation, providing the latest results from scores of tracks directly to thousands of bookie joints. The Chicago mob had never tried to move in on Annenberg, perhaps because he was considered too powerful or because of some secret accommodation, but it soon informed Ragen they were dealing themselves in.

Ragen had survived the Chicago scene too long to just give up his business, even when he was offered a fine price to sell out. He told acquaintances he knew the ways of the mob, that even if he sold, he would not be permitted to live to enjoy his profits. Under Bugsy Siegel the mob set up Trans-American Publishing and News Service and forcibly gained control of the California market, supplying bookies with the necessary racing information for $100 a day. Ragen, however, held on to the rest of the country, and it soon became apparent that the only way to take over his empire was to kill him. In June 1946 he was hit by a fusillade of bullets from a passing car, but he survived and was rushed to a hospital.

From his hospital bed Ragen accused the mob of trying to eliminate him in order to assume control of his racing wire. His accusations proved an embarrassment to the mob. In September he died, apparently of his wounds. An autopsy later revealed he had been poisoned by mercury. The mob obviously had found a way to penetrate Ragen's around-the-clock police protection, and his death was listed as a gangland slaying. Several leaders of the mob were questioned, especially Jake Guzik, but nothing much developed from the investigation.

Ragen's murder became just another digit added to the column of unsolved gangland killings, which, during a period of a little over three decades, totaled more than 970.

Ragen's Colts Chicago gang

One of Chicago's huge Irish gangs, Ragen's Colts achieved their height of power during the first two decades of the 20th century. The gang's fate was typical of the pattern of absorption of Irish gangs into what became part of the national crime syndicate.

Dominating Chicago's South Side around the stockyards, the Colts were political sluggers, racists, jingoists, bootleggers and killers. Formally called Ragen's Athletic and Benevolent Association, the gang started, as did a number of others in that era, as a baseball team. Frank Ragen was the star pitcher and also the star political operator. He soon was offering the gang's services to Democratic Party candidates throughout the entire city. With the Colts' muscle and firepower, elections proved easy to win and many members of the city council and state legislature owed their victories to the gang. "When we dropped into a polling place," one Colt bragged, "everybody else dropped out."

By 1902 Ragen's Colts numbered 160, and by 1908 the gang's motto was "Hit Me and You Hit 2,000." Over the years the gang launched the careers of aldermen, sheriffs, police brass, county treasurers and numerous other officeholders as well as some notable ballplayers. Ragen himself became city commissioner. However, the Colts' main product was accomplished criminals. Its notables included Gunner McPadden, who committed a long string of homicides; Harry Madigan, the owner of the notorious Pony Inn, a Cicero saloon, who was charged—but never tried because of the Colts' political connections—with several kidnappings and assaults during various elections; Dynamite Brooks, another saloon keeper who often killed in a drunken rage; Danny McFall, who was made deputy sheriff, in the mysterious ways of Chicago politics, despite having murdered a couple of business competitors; Stubby McGovern, a deadly triggerman whose assignment to a hit was a guarantee of success; Yiddles Miller, a boxing referee and notorious white supremacist who once called the members of the Ku Klux Klan "nigger lovers"; and Ralph Sheldon, a fearless bootlegger and hijacker.

In addition to furnishing political strong-arm services and running a number of South Side rackets, the Colts took it upon themselves to defend the white race, provoking a great race riot in 1919. It started one day when a black youth swimming off a South Side beach encroached on segregated waters. He was stoned and drowned by white bathers. As tensions mounted between the races on the South Side, members of Ragen's Colts baited blacks. Later that night the Colts stormed through the Black Belt, shooting blacks on sight, firing and dynamiting homes and looting shops. Black war veterans dug out their service weapons and returned the fire. Rampaging blacks overturned autos and streetcars carrying whites and destroyed property belonging to whites. Before the fury on both sides subsided from sheer exhaustion after four days, 20 whites and 14 blacks were dead and the injured toll stood at 1,000, about equally divided between the races.

After the riot the Colts turned to more profitable pursuits, namely bootlegging, although a contingent of the gang under Ralph Sheldon exhibited little interest in making booze, preferring simply to hijack it from others. Despite having to fight a number of bootlegging wars with the gang, Al Capone showed considerable patience toward the Colts and eventually a large portion of the gang was absorbed into his organization. The descendants of the original Colts are important members of organized crime today.

Ramsey, JonBenet (1990–1996) young beauty pageant queen murder victim Few murders during the late 1900s drew more attention—and public outrage—than that of JonBenet Ramsey, the six-year-old beauty pageant queen. Her body was found the day after Christmas 1996 in her family’s opulent home in Boulder, Colorado. John Ramsey, the girl’s father, told authorities he found a ransom note but then discovered the little girl’s lifeless body in a windowless basement room. The child had been beaten and strangled, but had not, as later often stated, showed signs of sexual assault.

Mr. and Mrs. Ramsey informed investigators that they frequently left their doors unlocked at night, a common behavior in the area. The house did have an alarm system but it generally was not set since JonBenet and her older brother had accidentally set it off on a number of occasions.

JonBenet’s murder achieved international notoriety, because she had been brought up as an adult-style beauty pageant queen and to many as a sex symbol. Rumors fed on rumors that she had been sexually abused for some time. Indeed for many the exhibiting of the beautiful young child in such pageants was in itself a form of child abuse.

However, the criminal investigation foundered over the next years. There were reports of deep friction between police investigators and the prosecuting attorney’s office. It was claimed that the initial police investigation was so flawed and the crime scene so compromised the gathering of credible forensic evidence was impossible. After working on a number of avenues, investigators kept returning to the parents since there seemed to be no one else to investigate. There were charges made in the media that the Ramseys had failed to cooperate with the authorities in their investigation. More than a year after the murder, John and Patsy Ramsey turned over the clothing they had been wearing the night before their daughter’s body was found. The long continuing inquiry got no further in a grand jury investigation which failed to come up with any finding.

Finally the Boulder County D.A. Alex Hunter concluded the grand jury proceedings, although the word was the investigation was “not over by any means.”

The seeming stalling of the case did not please public opinion which by vast majorities wanted a criminal trial to proceed. In the ensuing furor, Colorado Governor Owens announced he was considering appointing a special prosecutor to continue the case. However, in the end it appeared there was at the moment no credible evidence with which to proceed, and the governor later dropped this plan. He did however point the finger at the Ramseys, which proved popular with the public if not with considerable segments of the legal community.

By the turn of the century the murder remained unsolved. If a helpless child was not accorded justice, she did suffer yet another indignity. On October 21, 1999 it was reported that vandals had defaced JonBenet’s tombstone.

range detectives hired guns

They were known as range or cattle detectives or stock inspectors, but most Westerners simply called them hired guns. They enforced the rules as laid down by their employers, the big ranchers who wanted the range cleared of “rustlers,” and a rustler was anyone the boss labeled as such. In the infamous Johnson County War, every small rancher and nester on the range who ever roped an unmarked maverick was considered a rustler, or bandit, to be killed on sight, and common whores were lynched as “bandit queens.”

The stockmen who employed these hired guns, of course, had money and influence. They could fix matters if a so-called stock inspector did anything that the law took exception to. Equally important, they could pay very well. Range detectives earned $100 to $150 a month, which was two to three times what a deputy U.S. marshal could hope to earn. In some cases the pay went as high as $250 a month, plus bonuses for every horse thief or cattle rustler who was convicted. And if a suspect was arrested and somebody organized a necktie party for him, the bonus came through all the quicker. With these premium pay scales the stockmen got the best gunslingers money could buy, including the notorious Tom Smith; Frank Wolcott; Frank Canton (a wanted killer gone “respectable”); Pat Garrett, the slayer of Billy the Kid, and former Texas Ranger John Armstrong, the captor of Wes Hardin.

The most notorious range detective of all was Tom Horn, a former roving gunman for the Pinkertons. His score in four years with the detective agency was put at 17. When he later showed up in Wyoming, he denied having killed anyone for the detective agency and, at the same time, offered his services to Wyoming cattlemen, pegging his rate at $500 for each rustler shot. He was finally hanged for killing a 14-year-old boy while on an assignment to kill the boy’s father. A leading rape

Statistics on rape are probably the least reliable of all crime figures. According to the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports, the rate of forcible rape virtually doubled from 1970 to 1979. This finding, however, is probably unreliable, as is the FBI's report of 75,989 such offenses per year. The figure is generally regarded as a gross underestimate. In fact, rape is so consistently underreported that all such statistics are meaningless. It may well be that the entire doubling of the rape average during the 1970s is attributable to the fact that more women have been reporting such offenses, mainly because many police departments now have more sympathetic rape squads and complaints are more frequently handled by female officers.

Still, even with these improvements, the fact remains that the vast majority of rapes are not reported. Among the main reasons are the public embarrassment facing the victim if she presses charges and a fear, often not unfounded, that the offender will take revenge. It is therefore hardly surprising that some rapists commit hundreds of rapes before ever being arrested. Of rapes reported to the police, about half are "cleared by arrest." Of these, approximately three out of five are brought to trial and about half of the defendants are found guilty of rape or a lesser charge.

Despite talk of a new attitude on the part of the police, they still are often suspicious of rape claims, feeling there is frequently a hazy line between a woman's "yes" and "no" and "please." In about 15 percent of all cases reported, according to law enforcement officials, the charge of forcible rape is ultimately determined to be unfounded. Some of these cases involve complaints made by jilted sweethearts, and others are charges lodged by prostitutes who have not been reimbursed for services rendered.

The public's greatest misconception about rape concerns the reasons behind it. Many people view the rapist as someone overcome with sexual desire. Others believe the fault lies with the victim: she was dressed too seductively; or she "asked for it"; like all women, she wanted to be raped. On the contrary, rape is basically a crime of violence, a hostile attack, motivated by a desire to hurt and humiliate. Sex is only the weapon. When someone asks, "What kind of creep would be turned on by an 80-year-old woman?" he or she is missing the point. As targets of violence, anyone can be a rape victim—children, mothers, grandmothers.

Another false notion is that rape only happens in certain high-risk situations—walking alone at night, going alone to a bar, hitchhiking. While rapes do occur in such situations, they also take place in ordinary, seemingly safe places. One-third happen in or near the victim's home. Rapists are not always strangers to the victims. In over one-third of the cases reported, the rapist is an acquaintance, neighbor, friend or relative. It is suspected that an enormous number of such cases are never reported to the police, and many, in fact, are not even revealed to other members of the victim's family.

The public tends to remember rape cases involving celebrities, such as Hollywood's Fatty Arbuckle or Errol Flynn; those with a bizarre or unusual twist, such as the crimes of William "Theo" Durrant; or those with racial overtones, such as Hawaii's Massie case or Alabama's Scottsboro Boys case. Readily forgotten are rapists responsible for committing literally hundreds of rapes. Among the less-publicized rapes are those of black women, who are five times more likely to be raped than white women.

One typical mass rapist was Colorado's Richard Turner, who ran up a string of rapes in the mid-1970s before being convicted of the rape and brutal assault of two teenage girls. In 1976 he murdered a family of five and raped the three female members—the mother and her two young girls—before or after killing them. Turner always committed his crimes under the influence of liquor and it was clear his real desire was to hurt people.

rattelwacht first American police force

On August 12, 1658 New Amsterdam established the first police force in America. Called the rattelwacht, or rattlewatch, because of the rattles they carried as signal devices, members of this force were little more than night watchmen. They were paid 24 stuyvers, or about 50¢ a night, with the levy for their services collected each month from the city's inhabitants. A guard caught sleeping on duty was fined 10 stuyvers, and there were varying penalties for such on-duty offenses as swearing, drinking and fighting.

Rawley, R. C. (?–1864) Montana vigilante victim

The life and death of R. C. Rawley, which is believed to have been an assumed name, provides a good example of the virtue of knowing when to keep one's mouth shut. Rawley arrived in Alder Gulch, Montana Territory in late 1863 and became a habitue of the town's saloons. Allegedly, he had been a merchant elsewhere and was looking for a business to buy. Actually, it seems quite likely that he functioned as a spy for Sheriff Henry Plummer and his Innocents, who ravaged the area with their robberies and murders. Rawley made a wise move when he disappeared a few months before Sheriff Plummer was hanged by vigilantes in January 1864. In September Rawley returned, satisfied that the Montana Vigilantes had finished their grisly business. He guessed right; the vigilantes had forgotten their earlier suspicions about him. For two months Rawley drank unmolested in saloons in Bannack and Virginia City. Unfortunately for him, however, his elbow bending loosened his tongue, and he made some tactless comments about the "strangling bastards" who'd killed Plummer. Now that was a capital offense and Rawley was seized and hanged from the same gibbet where Sheriff Plummer had swung.

On April 4, 1968 the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., the acknowledged leader of the black civil rights movement and an advocate of Gandhian principles of nonviolent resistance, was in Memphis, Tenn. to lend support to a controversial strike by the city's sanitation workers. That evening King stepped out onto the balcony of his room at the Lorraine Motel and was shot and mortally wounded by an assassin firing from a bathroom window of a nearby rooming house. A .30.06-caliber rifle bullet struck King in the right side of the jaw, penetrated his neck and severed his spinal cord. The force of the bullet was so powerful it ripped his necktie completely off his shirt.

Items left by the assassin were traced to cities as far away as Los Angeles and Atlanta. Through fingerprints the murderer was identified as a white man named James Earl Ray, a minor criminal who had no apparent reason for killing King. After the murder Ray fled to Canada and in May he went to London on a Canadian passport, showing a remarkable sophistication at eluding capture. He took a mysterious side trip to Lisbon, came back to London and was about to fly to Brussels when he was apprehended on June 8. He was returned to the United States in July.

Over the years Ray has continued to be a controversial figure. Certainly, a number of details appear to indicate the existence of a broad plot to kill King. Some have even claimed that the FBI was involved in his death and that Ray was merely a scapegoat. Nothing of the sort has ever been proved, although there is no doubt that the agency did much to besmirch King's character both before and after his death.

A retired FBI man who had worked in the agency's Atlanta office at the time of the King assassination told of deep anti-King feelings prevalent there and how one agent literally had leaped for joy when he learned King had been killed. The FBI was forced to admit it had wiretapped King's home and sent Mrs. Coretta King letters that implied her husband was involved sexually with several other women. When King was scheduled to receive the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964, the FBI had even sent a letter to him intimating he should commit suicide before the award was given. It read in part: "King—there is only one thing left for you to do. You know what it is. You have just 34 days in which to do it. It has definite practical significance. You are done. There is but one way out. . . ."

J. Edgar Hoover had been incensed by the thought of King getting the Nobel Peace Prize and had called him "the most notorious liar in the country." Hoover had authorized the investigation of King's sex life and ordered many of the illegal harassments used against him. The director had even inspired a news story that caused King to switch from his initial choice of a white-owned hotel to the Lorraine Motel, where he was shot.

James Earl Ray seemed too much of a misfit to be involved in so monumental a case as the King assassination. A 10th-grade dropout, he held nothing but menial jobs until 1946, when he joined the army. He was discharged in December 1948 for "ineptness and lack of adaptability to military service." After that, he had a string of arrests for some bush-league armed robberies, small-time smuggling and burglaries. He also served three years for forgery. He broke out of the Missouri State Prison in April 1967 but was considered such an unimportant criminal that the reward for his capture amounted to only $50. While Ray was being hunted for the King murder, his father insisted that if he had done the job, "he couldn't have planned it alone; he wasn't smart enough for that."

After he was apprehended and brought back to the United States, Ray pleaded guilty to murdering King and drew 99 years. Within 24 hours he attempted to reverse his plea and insisted on dropping his original attorney, Percy Foreman, and getting a new lawyer. He maintained he was innocent and that "Raoul," a shadowy figure known only to Ray, had sent him to Memphis to take part in a gun-smuggling operation and had passed him money and orders. He said he did not know who had killed King.

During hearings on the King murder held by the House Select Committee on Assassinations in 1978, a St. Louis man, Russell G. Byers, told the panel he had been offered $50,000 in late 1966 or early 1967 to arrange King's death. He said the offer had come from two men, John Kauffmann and John Sutherland, acting on behalf of a group of businessmen. Both Kauffmann and Sutherland were now dead and their widows said they did not believe they could have taken part in such a plot. It developed that the FBI had been aware of Byers' allegations in 1973, but the information had not been passed on to agents investigating the King assassination. A spokesman for the FBI said that the handling of the information was in "violation of established rules and procedures," but that the bureau was satisfied a simple misfiling had occurred through "administrative error," rather than a deliberate attempt to block the investigation. Since the agent responsible for handling the information had retired, there was, the spokesman said, no need for a formal inquiry into the matter.

In any event, Byers said he suspected that Sutherland and Kauffmann had planned to recruit him as a dupe who would take the blame for the murder but not actually carry it out. Byers' story prompted House investigators to look for links between Byers or Kauffmann and Sutherland and Ray's escape from the penitentiary in April 1967. The committee heard testimony that Ray had committed the murder in the hope of collecting a $50,000 bounty, and in December 1978 it concluded there was a "likelihood" of a conspiracy. The panel found that "no federal, state or local government agency was involved in the assassination of Dr. King," although it did say the Domestic Intelligence Division of the FBI was guilty of "gross" abuse of its legal authority in its surveillance of King and that the Justice Department had "failed to supervise adequately" that division.

James Earl Ray remains the only person ever convicted in the King murder case and has been behind bars since 1969 save for a three-day period when he escaped from prison. On that occasion his escape lacked the financing and planning which had marked his flight following the murder of King and he was quickly retaken.

Reading Game famous illegal crap game

The biggest crap game in the history of gambling on the East Coast, and perhaps in the country, was the so-called Reading Game, operating out of Philadelphia from 1959 to 1962, when the Federal Bureau of Investigation finally smothered it.

Each night big gamblers from all over the East would gather at a restaurant in the heart of Philadelphia. There, they would be picked up by "luggers" and driven 50 miles to Reading, where a million dollar dice game was played on three high-rolling "California tables."

A reformed hood later commented: "Everybody made a buck on that game. They rented their limousines from a funeral director, because they only used them from ten at night until seven in the morning." He indicated how much freedom organized crime had in Philadelphia at the time, stating: "They even had a cop out in front of the restaurant—he'd blow a whistle like a hotel doorman to signal a limo when he had a full load coming in for the game. It looked like opening night on Broadway. The cops never touched them."

Reavis, James Addison (?–1908) swindler and baron of Arizona

A former St. Louis streetcar conductor, James Addison Reavis went on to become the most colossal swindler-forger in American history, laying claim in 1881, as baron de Arizonaca and caballero de los Colorados, to 10.8 million acres of the Arizona Territory, including all of its largest city, Phoenix. As such, his claims were recognized as legitimate for over a decade, and he would point out to railroad executives, mine owners and big ranchers that they were trespassing on his property. However, he was willing to discuss rents. The tab for the Southern Pacific's right-of-way was set at $50,000 annually.

The origin and intricacies of Reavis' amazing fraud were never fully learned because he steadfastly refused to make a confession. However, it was revealed that as a youth in the Confederate Army, he had developed a knack for forging his commanding officers' signatures. After the Civil War, while working as a streetcar conductor in St. Louis, he used his skillful writing ability to forge a fraudulent real estate document that earned him a large sum. He moved west before he could be caught.

In Santa Fe Reavis got a clerical job in the records division of a special governmental commission that handled claims on property annexed by this country following the Mexican War. A treaty settlement required the United States to honor all legitimate claims of Spaniards and Mexicans and return to them the title of their lands. It was in this office that Reavis laid the groundwork for his incredible claim. He learned the pure Spanish used on ancient documents and eventually produced one that indicated he was the undisputed owner of a grant given by the Spanish Crown in 1758 to a nobleman, Miguel Silva de Peralta de la Cordoba, for military services rendered in the New World. In addition, Reavis presented himself as the husband of the last of the mythical Peraltas, a young woman he found working as a serving girl on a California ranch. The girl became convinced she really was a long-lost Peralta.

Government experts and others studied Reavis' documents, which he had forged, and checked them against historical records, which he had doctored over a five-year period, in Madrid, Seville and Mexico City. They concluded his claims were valid. As a result, until he was exposed in 1894, Reavis collected some $10 million in rent from hundreds of companies and thousands of families.

Finally, two tiny errors he had made were discovered. Reavis had used old inks and had found paper that appeared to be old, but a printer who was suspicious of him discovered that the watermark on the paper had not been designed until 1878. In addition, part of Reavis' hoax rested on proof that a pair of Peralta twins had been born long ago near San Bernardino, Calif. Their births were listed in the birth register at the Mission of San Salvador. Somehow Reavis had removed an entire page from the register and forged a substitute that included the names of the twins in place of the names of two other babies. What Reavis did not know was that births were also recorded each day in a separate volume that was kept hidden. Instead of the names of the twins, the secret volume listed two different names.

Reavis fought the case against him with the great wealth he had accumulated, but in the end, he was convicted and went to prison for six years. When he came out, he was a broken man, with no money left from his years of lavish living. He returned to Phoenix, once the scene of his great criminal triumph, as a vagrant. Until his death in 1908, he spent most of his time in the library reading old newspaper accounts of himself during his period of grandeur.

A massive study by the FBI of almost 88,000 persons arrested in 1966 and 1967 revealed that at least 82 percent had been arrested previously, 70 percent had been convicted previously and 46 percent of those convicted had been imprisoned for three months or more. Among those arrested for murder, rape, robbery and felonious assault, 75 percent had already been convicted of a crime. Other studies also showed a high repeater rate. Eighty-five percent of male felons imprisoned in California in 1969 and the same percentage imprisoned in Massachusetts in 1971 had been in correctional institutions before.

By contrast, most studies of recidivism among parolees put the repeater rate at 25 percent. However, this is not considered a reliable calculation since it represents only those cases of recidivism known to parole officers, and in many areas the parole staff simply does not have the manpower needed to assemble complete information. In states where there is more supervision, the percentage of reported crime repeaters increases significantly.

All agencies involved in various forms of custody, prisons, probation or parole, experience a large number of recidivists, a situation that often provokes public cries for "throwing the book" at criminals and the elimination of parole. Objective studies comparing the recidivist rate among like groups of prisoners serving long and short terms have been difficult to set up. However, a landmark decision of the U.S. Supreme Court presented a unique opportunity for analyzing just such a situation. The court, in Gideon v. Wainwright, threw out the convictions of more than 1,000 indigent Florida prisoners on the ground that they had not been represented by lawyers. The Florida Corrections Department used this special situation to set up two groups of 110 recently released inmates, the first 110 being composed of those who had completed their original sentence and the other 110 being composed of inmates who had been abruptly released far short of their original sentences as a result of the Gideon decision. Care was exercised to match up the individual characteristics of the members of the two groups as much as possible. In the 28 months following their release, 25.4 percent of those who had fulfilled their sentences had committed another crime. During that same period the prisoners freed by the Gideon ruling showed a repeat crime rate of only 13.6 percent.

Many who considered long imprisonment as the answer to the recidivism problem have, in the words of Leonard Orland, professor of law at the University of Connecticut, found the "logical conclusion of this research . . . shocking." The researchers at the Florida Corrections Department concluded, "Baldly stated, it is that if we, today, turned loose all the inmates of our prisons without regard to the length of their sentences and, with only some exceptions, without regard to their previous offenses, we might reduce the recidivism rate over what it would be if we kept each prisoner incarcerated until his sentence expired.”

Clearly, studies in the future need to focus on the repeat crime rates under programs of amnesty and pardon.

red-light district name for vice areas

The custom of calling a place of prostitution a red-light house appears to have started in Dodge City, Kan., one of the most wide-open towns in the Old West. It was the custom of train crews of the Santa Fe to leave their red lanterns outside when entering a Dodge City bordello so they could be located quickly in case of an emergency. The enterprising brothel keepers soon realized this was excellent advertising comparable to the flashing neon lights of the 20th century—and the red-light custom spread quickly, becoming a national code. It was one of the few early American customs to work its way from west to east.

Red Light Saloon

Called “violent, obscene and godless” and the “worst whorehouse in Kansas,” Caldwell’s fabled Red Light Saloon had a mere two-year run, but for sin and violence its record was hard to match anywhere in the West. Two town marshals were murdered on its premises while a third was killed as he staggered from it after a night of carousing.

Mag and George Woods, who had run an establishment of low repute in Delano, arrived in Caldwell in 1880 and opened a two-story saloon, dance hall and bordello on Chisholm Street. Just so there would be no doubt as to the entertainment offered, they called the place the Red Light. The first floor was occupied by a saloon and ballroom and the couple’s living area in the rear; the entire second floor was given over to the resident whores.

Caldwell was a wide-open town but the blatant violence of the Red Light was too much even for it, and numerous attempts were made to shut the establishment down. While sharpers skinned cowboys inside, women lured some of them outside to be knocked unconscious and robbed. The whores of the Red Light were as hard a bunch as could be found in any resort in the West. Once after a cowboy was shot and killed at the bar, a harlot who had entertained him earlier stripped off his bandana and dipped it in his blood. Although she had bewailed the fact that he had paid her so poorly, she seemed placated because “now I have a souvenir from the cheap-skate.”

In August 1881 a cowpoke named Charlie Davis rode into town to savor the pleasures of the Red Light. During the evening he got into an argument with one of the bawds. George Woods intervened and Davis put a pistol to his chest and shot him dead. Davis rode off and was never caught, even though a tearful Mag Woods put a $500 reward on his head.

Compared to his wife, George Woods had been relatively inoffensive, and after his death the Red Light became an even worse den of sin without his restraining influence. On June 22, 1882 two celebrating cowboys killed young Marshal George Brown when he came after them. It was the last straw as far as Caldwell was concerned. A regular headline in the Caldwell Standard was, “The Red Light Must Go.” The new marshal was given authority to clap down on bawdy entertainment in the saloons, mainly the Red Light, and an ordinance was passed allowing the local courts to run undesirables out of town. Mag Woods realized it was only a matter of time until she was banished, so one August morning in 1882 she sold off all her liquor and fixtures, boarded up her resort and headed for the train station with her women and bartenders, amid jeers from the townspeople. The citizens, however, did not have time to give her a final hoot as her train pulled out. Suddenly, they were aware of flame and smoke and had to rush back to contain the fire Mag Woods had set to burn down the Red Light. Her vengeance was not all that successful: the saloon burned to the ground but the fire was extinguished before more than minor damage occurred to the buildings surrounding it.

Red Sash Gang alleged rustling gang during Johnson County War

The Red Sash Gang remains a controversial subject in Wyoming to this day, but the weight of evidence seems to indicate it was a figment of the imaginations of the Pinkertons and the great cattle barons of the lush Cheyenne Club to justify a bloody effort to clear the Johnson County range of plows and barbed wire. According to the charges, a small rancher named Nathan Champion, later murdered by the cattlemen’s hired guns, was the head of a gang of rustlers who wore red sashes around their waists, a rather silly practice since it would only have helped to identify them.

red shirts prison toughs

In convict lingo, a “red shirt” is a prisoner whose spirit cannot be broken even when consigned to the “hole,” or dungeon, and can in fact by his or her own measure cope with guards on a more equal basis. The term may have originated in the 1920s in the Michigan City state prison, where determined convicts effectively countered the deadly boredom, the beatings and privations to which they were subjected. Even when forced to sleep naked on bare cement floors in the hole, these rebellious prisoners hardened themselves by not eating their daily ration of a half-loaf of bread, instead molding a few of them into a pillow. They suffered severe pangs of hunger during the first three days of this strategy but by then were said to have achieved an almost pleasant state of euphoria that would numb them and left them unconcerned by other harsh treatment. The secret was they had found they were capable of punishing themselves more severely than the establishment.

The red shirts also used play to endure solitary confinement, using the game of Battleship for one. Two prisoners in separate cells could mark off 100 squares numbered A to J laterally and 1 to 10 horizontally. Each man had five groupings valued from one to five ships, which could be positioned along connecting squares. One of the contestants would “commence firing” by calling out something like “B-8.” And if the opponent had a ship located on that square, he would announce it was hit. Says one description of this prison game: “For years the more obtuse guards wondered what was being plotted when they heard men calling, ‘B-7.’ ‘Miss.’ ‘C-8.’ ‘Destroyer sunk.’”

The game of course depended on the personal honesty of the players, a trait not usually associated with convicted criminals, but prison old-timers insisted the game was on the square since the convict code regarded the game itself as a flouting of the prison’s “no communication” rules. Some convict-historians insist the game of Battleship was invented behind bars, but this probably can be disputed. Nevertheless it did prove to be a valuable weapon in the red-shirt arsenal.

Red-shirt tactics continue to the present in updated versions. In some maximum-security prisons convicts use a special form of sign language, such as eye movements, to get around prison rules.

Reed, Ed (1871–1895) murderer

Although he was never convicted of the crime, there is little doubt that Ed Reed murdered his own mother, Belle Starr. Reed was the offspring of a common law union between Belle and Jim Reed, an outlaw-lawman who rode with the infamous Tom Starr. Like both his parents, Ed Reed was a bad character. He was an alcoholic at 13, a bootlegger at 14, a horse thief at 15 and the murderer of his mother from ambush at 18. The crime most probably resulted from their incestuous relationship, although some folks said it was due to the fact that Belle was always whipping Ed because of his dishonesty.

At 20 Reed was doing time in prison for horse stealing. Within three years, in one of those minor miracle conversions in the Old West, he turned up as a deputy marshal at Fort Smith. His most famous accomplishment as a lawman was the killing of two former deputy marshals for the crime of being drunk. At age 24 lawman Reed was shot dead in a drunken tavern brawl.

Reed, Jim (1845?–1874) outlaw

Jim Reed is remembered as one of the many “husbands” of Bandit Queen Belle Starr, but of the two Reed was much more the outlaw. Belle was infatuated with him, as she later was with so many others, mainly because she simply adored badmen.

Born in Vernon County, Mo., Jim Reed was occasionally a lawman, but more often an outlaw who rode with old Tom Starr’s band of killers. After he started living with young Myra Belle Shirley, Reed killed a man named Shannon, and he, Belle and their young daughter fled to California. There, Jim supported his family and a newborn boy named Ed (who 18 years later was suspected of murdering his mother) by the best trade he knew, highway robbery. Finally identified in a stagecoach holdup, Reed took his family back east. He and two other outlaws made a big score by torturing an old Creek Indian until he revealed where he’d hidden a $30,000 gold hoard. With that loot Reed took Belle to Texas, where she first began playing the role of the Bandit Queen. Belle opened a livery stable while Jim rode off to Oklahoma Indian Territory with the Tom Starr gang of horse thieves. The result was that Belle always carried a handsome supply of stock.

Reed was killed in August 1874 by Deputy Sheriff John T. Morris of Lamar County, Tex., who shot him in the back. Just a few years earlier, Morris had been Reed’s partner in various stock thefts and stagecoach robberies. After she buried Reed, Belle parked her two young children with relatives and rode off to enhance her own legend.

Reed, Nathaniel “Texas Jack” (1862–1950) train robber

Texas Jack Reed was one of a very few Western badmen who had more than modest success, especially in later years after his reformation.

A long-haired Arkansas youth, Reed turned outlaw at the age of 23 after punching cattle for a few years in the Oklahoma Territory. To go along with his newfound profession, he adopted an alias, Texas Jack. He was successful from the start, joining in with several others to hold up the express car of a train in Colorado, earning some $6,000 for his first criminal effort. By comparison, the notorious Reno gang of train robbers netted less than $2,000 per man in their inaugural caper. From then on, Texas Jack pulled a few bank and stage robberies in Texas interspersed with other lucrative holdups in the Arizona Territory, Colorado and California.

After a decade of criminal activity, Texas Jack finally came to grief during an attempted train holdup in the Oklahoma Territory. Instead of looting what they expected would be $60,000 in the express car, he and accomplices Buzz Luckey, Tom Smith, Tom Root and a few others were greeted by an ambush party under the command of Deputy U.S. Marshal Bud Ledbetter. Texas Jack was badly shot up in the fracas and limped home to Arkansas. Root and Luckey stopped to battle pursuers a short time later and killed lawman Newton LaForce. When they were captured, however, Root turned informer, leading to a murder charge against Luckey and the capture of Texas Jack.

Luckey was sentenced to death by Hanging Judge Parker and Texas Jack faced a stiff sentence, which was put off while Luckey's appeal was heard by the U.S. Supreme Court. Luckey's murder conviction was overturned, and he was convicted solely of involvement in the train robbery. Texas Jack got a lighter sentence than Luckey because he had not been present at the time of the LaForce killing.

Jack served only about two years before being released on parole. He did not go back to the outlaw trail, instead setting out with a crime-does-not-pay roadshow entitled Texas Jack, Train Robber. It was even more profitable than his crime career, and the reformed outlaw followed that up with an autobiography. The Life of Texas Jack sold 70,000 copies, and Nathaniel Reed became living proof that there were indeed ways to make crime pay. The redoubtable Texas Jack died in 1950 in Oklahoma City.

Rees, Melvin David (1933–1961) mass murderer

In the late 1950s Melvin David Rees, a professional musician, terrorized Maryland and Virginia with a total of nine murders, most accompanied by sexual assault on his women victims.

In June 1957 near Annapolis, Md., Rees drove alongside a car bearing an army sergeant and his girl, Margaret Harold, and forced their car off the roadside. When Rees tried to caress the woman, she resisted and he shot her. The sergeant bolted and, after running about a mile, reached a farmhouse, from which he called the police. They found Margaret Harold's body and the car, but no trace of the deadly marauder, whom the sergeant had described as tall and thin-faced. Nearby, the police found the basement walls of an unoccupied cinderblock building literally papered with pornographic photographs. They theorized that the murderer might have been using the basement building as his hideaway.

The Harold murder was still unsolved in January 1959 when a 29-year-old truck driver, Carroll Jackson, driving his wife and two young children home after a stay with relatives, was forced by another car to the side of a road near Fredericksburg, Va. The driver ordered the family at gunpoint to climb into the trunk of his car and drove off with them. Two months later, the body of Carroll Jackson was discovered in some underbrush. There was a bullet in his head. The Jacksons' 18-month-old girl was found suffocated under her father's body. A few weeks after that discovery, the bodies of Mrs. Jackson and her four-year-old daughter were found near the scene of Margaret Harold's death. The child had died of a fractured skull while Mrs. Jackson had been strangled, after having been repeatedly raped.

A massive manhunt followed, based on the description given in the Harold killing. Finally, the widespread publicity produced information from a Norfolk, Va. man who said he suspected a young musician named Melvin David Rees had committed the murders because of things Rees had said to him. Rees was arrested in West Memphis, Ark., where he was working as a piano salesman. He denied the charges but was identified by the army sergeant in the Margaret Harold case. When investigators searched the home of Rees' parents near Washington, D.C., they turned up the murder gun and long, written accounts of his treatment of Mrs. Jackson before he murdered her. He had killed the woman in a most brutal fashion. Other evidence linked Rees—now known in the press as the Sex Beast—to four other murder victims not originally connected with the Harold and Jackson cases. Marie Shomettee, 16, and Ann Ryan, 14, both of whom had been sexually assaulted and murdered near College Park, Md., and Shelby Jean Venable, 16, and Mary Elizabeth Fellers, 18, whose naked bodies had been found floating in Maryland rivers.

For his Maryland crimes Rees got a life sentence, but he was then tried in Virginia for the Jackson family killings, found guilty and executed in 1961.

regulators and moderators historic vigilante factions

One of the earliest forms of vigilantism in America appeared in the backwoods of South Carolina in 1767 following a militia campaign against the Cherokee Indians. A great number of poorer settlers and farmers who had been uprooted by the conflict turned to various forms of disobedience against authority, including outlawry. This soon aroused the ire of many of the large property owners, who determined to bring about a return to tranquillity by organizing as "regulators" and summarily executing several of the "troublemakers." While other men of wealth and standing shared a common hatred for the backcountry settlers, the violent behavior of the Regulators and the fact that they acted without legal authority frightened them into organizing as "moderators." The Moderators also operated outside the law but substituted the lash for the hangman's rope. Colonial justice never brought a single Regulator or Moderator to the dock, and by the time the American Revolution began, the backcountry had been violently pacified by their efforts.

Throughout the history of America, the establishment of Regulator groups in various parts of the country has often resulted in the formation of Moderator groups. The most prominent cases were in eastern Texas in 1840–44, southwestern Missouri in 1842–44 and southern Illinois in 1846–50. At times the struggle between the two groups became so intense that shooting erupted between them, and the lawbreakers were virtually ignored; in fact, especially in eastern Texas, the lawbreakers would often join one side or the other.

Reiser, Charles "The Ox" (1878–1921) Safecracker and killer

Charlie "the Ox" Reiser led a Jekyll-and-Hyde existence. Under the name of Shopes he was known as a reliable family man and a friendly landlord. Yet the underworld and the police regarded him as the premier safecracker in America during the early 20th century. He was also a brutal killer and indoctrinated many of the notorious Chicago gangsters of the 1920s into the ways of big-time crime, among them Dion O'Banion, Bugs Moran, Hymie Weiss and John Mahoney.

The Ox, a mountain of a man, could single-handedly shove a safe from one end of a room to the other. He was a brilliant "peterman," or handler of nitroglycerine. Reiser first ran afoul of the law in Chicago in 1903, when he was charged with safecracking. Out on bail, he killed the witnesses against him, and the case was dropped. In 1905 he was arrested again. The witness disappeared and there was no case. He beat another rap in 1907 and then was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon and did 30 days. In 1909 police from Seattle, Wash. apprehended him on a charge of burglary and murder. Thereafter all the witnesses died, and Reiser returned to Chicago.

During World War I he became friends with O'Banion and used that deadly Irishman and a number of his pals in several safecrackings. All this time, Reiser was living a double life under the name of Shopes and pouring his ill-earned money into real estate, becoming the owner of a large apartment building. He was known to tenants as a prince of a landlord; while he expected his rent, he did not hound a man if he got a little behind. He was considered to be a fine husband to his second wife. His first wife had not fared so well. Reiser boasted to his underworld acquaintances that when the woman had threatened to get the law after him, he promptly beat her to death. The coroner's jury thought she had died of asphyxiation.

Clarence White, who aided the Ox in the cracking of a Standard Oil Co. safe, was invited by the police to come in for questioning. White said he would but first telephoned the Ox, who rushed right over to White's apartment and shot him through the heart, making it look like a suicide. This intelligence came from another errant gang member, John Mahoney, who turned informer after being caught cracking safes on his own. Mahoney provided considerable evidence against Reiser, all of which proved useless when Mahoney was murdered in April 1921.

On October 10, 1921 the Ox entered the premises of a cold storage firm, planning to bust open its safe after first killing the watchman. He shot the watchman but took two bullets himself, one through the lung. Reiser was hospitalized and charged with murder. He became the subject of some bizarre newspaper stories, in which reporters informed their readers that if Reiser was convicted, his property would be confiscated and turned over to some of his past robbery victims. Although untrue, the stories may in some way have contributed to Reiser's death. His wife, who found the prospect of his property being confiscated rather souring, showed up at his hospital room and was admitted even though the police guard stationed outside the room had been instructed to let no one enter. A few moments later, there was "a rattle of shots." Mrs. Reiser-Shopes tearfully related that her husband had committed suicide. One thing was certain: the Ox was very dead, with 10 bullets in him.

Understandably, the police found the death suspicious, especially since Reiser had had both his right hand and his left arm broken in the storage firm robbery, making use of a gun rather difficult. Murder charges were brought against the widow, but Chicago being Chicago, a coroner's jury ruled Reiser's death a suicide after all. Reiser's estate of over $100,000 went to his wife.

RELES, Abe

Reles, Abe (1907–1941) Murder, Inc. killer and informer

What was so amazing about the criminal career of Abe Reles, better known as Kid Twist within Murder, Inc., was how long he remained out of serious trouble despite the fact that he personally took part in at least 30 murders. Until the Kid started “singing,” the law did not even know about Murder, Inc., the enforcement arm of the national crime syndicate that committed an estimated 400 to 500 murders during roughly the decade of the 1930s. Once Reles went into what was called the most famous “canary act in underworld history,” goggle-eyed investigators cleared up no less than 49 murders in Brooklyn alone, some of which they hadn’t even known about. Reles was in a position to know. He was a second-rung leader of Murder, Inc., ranking just below the top leaders of the extermination “troop”: Louis Lepke and Albert Anastasia. As an underworld stoolpigeon, he was much more highly placed than Joe Valachi, for instance.

Reles’ police rap sheet in 1940 listed 42 arrests over 16 years, including many charges of assault, robbery, burglary, possession of narcotics, disorderly conduct and murder (only six). He had done six minor stretches but had never once talked to the authorities. However, when he was picked up in 1940, along with a number of other major and minor members of Murder, Inc., on a homicide charge, he feared someone else would talk. The Kid decided to save his own skin by talking first.

Reles revealed that he and other members of the troop, such as Pittsburgh Phil, Happy Maione, Dasher Abbandando, Chicken Head Gurino and Bugsy Goldstein, were given assassination assignments not only in New York but elsewhere around the country, at times not even knowing the identities of their victims. He made a deal with the prosecutors that he would walk away clear from any murder he had participated in provided he furnished them with all the details including the names of his accomplices, an easy task for the Kid since he had the most phenomenal memory of any informer prior to John Dean.

It was Reles’ testimony that doomed Abbandando and Maione for the brutal killing of a loan shark named Whitey Rudnick. They had stabbed him more than 60 times, cracked open his skull and then, just to be sure, strangled him. With a perfectly straight face, Kid Twist said Rudnick had deserved his fate: he had been a stoolpigeon.

Reles gave chilling testimony against Pittsburgh Phil, who also took part in Rudnick’s murder plus perhaps 100 others, and Bugsy Goldstein that sent them to the chair for the vicious garroting of a minor gambler named Puggy Feinstein. He provided key information about Charlie Workman, accused of murdering Dutch Informer Abe Reles jumped, fell or was pitched out a sixth-floor window of a Coney Island hotel.

Schultz, so that when Workman heard all the testimony against him, he switched to a plea of guilty to get a life sentence instead of the electric chair.

The Kid's testimony helped build a successful case against the great crime boss Louis Lepke as well as underlings Mendy Weiss and Louis Capone, who were accused of murdering a garment industry foe named Joseph Rosen, even though Reles was no longer around to testify by the time of their trial.

Reles appeared at a number of trials for more than a year, during which time he was kept under protective custody in the sixth-floor wing of the Half Moon Hotel in the Coney Island section of Brooklyn. Then, in the early morning hours of November 12, 1941, despite the fact that he was always guarded by six officers and never left alone in a room even while he slept, Reles jumped, fell or was tossed out the window to his death. Several sheets tied together were found, and the police theorized that Reles had climbed out the window to escape; to climb down one floor in order to play a prank on his guards; or to commit suicide, although the sheets were hardly necessary for that option. One problem with all the police theories was that the Kid's body had landed a good 20 feet away from the wall of the hotel building.

Twenty years later, an ailing Lucky Luciano, the chief founder of the national crime syndicate in the early 1930s, stated that Frank Costello had arranged for Reles' demise and that $50,000 had been distributed within the police department to have Reles sent out the window. The murder had been necessary because at the time the Kid was about to give information that would have doomed two leading underworld leaders: Albert Anastasia and Bugsy Siegel. Subsequently, William O'Dwyer, then Brooklyn district attorney and later mayor of New York City, received much criticism for failing to proceed with the prosecution of Anastasia in what was described as a "perfect case" based on Kid Twist's testimony. O'Dwyer claimed that case "went out the window" along with informer Reles.

In 1945 a Brooklyn grand jury charged that there had been "negligence, incompetence and flagrant irresponsibility" in O'Dwyer's handling of the Anastasia prosecution. The jury stated O'Dwyer was in possession of competent legal evidence that Anastasia was guilty of first degree murder and other vicious crimes. The proof admittedly was sufficient to warrant Anastasia's indictment and conviction, but Anastasia was neither prosecuted, indicted nor convicted. . . . The consistent and complete failure to prosecute the overlord of organized crime . . . is so revolting that we cannot permit these disclosures to be filed away in the same manner the evidence against Anastasia was heretofore "put in the files."

Other ugly rumors swirled around Reles' death, including the charge by Ed Reid, a prize-winning reporter for the Brooklyn Eagle, that "Reles served several purposes besides being a fount of information about gang activities. Some of the information he gave out was used by unscrupulous persons connected with law enforcement in Brooklyn—to shake down gangsters."

In any event, Reles did not live long enough to fulfill his potential as a stoolpigeon. While Murder, Inc., or at least its Brooklyn branch, was destroyed, the crime syndicate continued in business.

Remus, George (1874–1952) murderer

Often cited as one of the most farcical murder trials in American history, the conviction of George Remus for the murder of his wife, Imogene, in Cincinnati on October 6, 1927 should have been a cut-and-dried affair.

When Remus finished a prison term in the federal penitentiary at Atlanta for bootlegging, he returned home convinced his wife had been unfaithful during his years behind bars. So he shot her. As a lawyer, albeit disbarred, Remus insisted on his right to handle his own defense and won the judge's agreement despite his plea of not guilty on the basis of his own insanity.

While the prosecution paraded alienists to the stand to testify to Remus' sanity, the defendant set about proving, by his own behavior and by the testimony of his witnesses, that he was insane. The jurors were treated to the spectacle of a defendant getting his witnesses to say he was deranged and dangerous. In the end, they were convinced by his performance, taking only 19 minutes to bring in an acquittal by reason of insanity. The prosecution was not caught off guard by the verdict, however, moving quickly to get the judge to commit Remus to a state asylum on the basis of his witnesses' testimony that he was dangerously insane.

The Remus case was to have one more astonishing twist. Just four months later, Remus stood before the Ohio Court of Appeals, proved he was totally sane and walked out a free man.

Reno Gang

The Reno brothers—Frank, John, Simeon and William—led a gang of about two dozen outlaws, who had previously limited their activities to saloon holdups, burglaries and highway robberies on the first train robbery in this country, near Seymour, Ind., on

RESTELL, Madame

October 6, 1866, taking $10,000 from the express car. Over the next two years they robbed a number of banks and trains; in 1868, e.g., they boarded a train as it paused to take on water at a whistle stop outside Marshfield, Ind., and seized the unheard of sum of $96,000, much more than Jesse James and his gang ever got.

While many later train robbers developed a romantic air about them and achieved an uncommon popularity with the public, such was not the case with the Renos. They tended to be too brutal and too kill-crazy. Relying on sheer terror, the Renos operated rather openly around Seymour and often met in the train station. Private detective Allan Pinkerton and six of his men managed to arrest John Reno during a lightning attack at the station and hustle him aboard an outbound train. When the rest of the gang realized what had happened, they jumped on another train and forced the engineer to give chase. The frantic race continued into Illinois, where Pinkerton was able to divert his prisoner to authorities and John Reno was sent to prison.

In March 1868 Pinkerton tracked the gang after a bank robbery and, with a huge posse, surrounded them at Council Bluffs, Iowa. After their apprehension the prisoners were jammed into a small local jail, but they escaped on April 1, after painting the words "APRIL FOOL" on the side of the building.

Outraged at the law's inability to contain the Renos, and agreeing with the Seymour Times that "Seymour has a carnival of crime," a number of citizens formed a vigilance committee. Shortly afterward, the Pinkertons nabbed three of the gang—Lefty Clinton, Volney Elliott and Charlie Roseberry—and were moving them by rail to Seymour when the train was flagged down by masked vigilantes, who seized the prisoners and hanged them from the nearest tree. The Renos were outraged and sent threats to known vigilance committee members and accused the Pinkertons of having cooperated with the lynchers.

Meanwhile, the Pinkertons tracked down the rest of the Reno brothers and several other gang members in Indianapolis and Canada and brought them back to stand trial. They were first placed in the Jackson County Jail, but because of vigilante rumblings, they were shifted to the more substantial Floyd County Jail in New Albany. The fugitive members of the gang declared open war on suspected members of the Southern Indiana Vigilance Committee. There were night ambushes, beatings, unspeakable tortures and mutilations. Messages attached to rocks thrown through windows of local and state officials' offices warned, "If the Renos are lynched you die."

Such moves did not deter the vigilantes, and on December 11, 1868—the Night of Blood as it became known—100 masked vigilantes took over the town of New Albany, wounded the sheriff, dragged Carl Anderson and Frank, William and Simeon Reno from their cells and hanged them from an iron ceiling beam in the jail. After the vigilantes left, Simeon Reno revived and, clawing at the rope, tried to pull himself up to relieve the pressure on his neck. The other prisoners screamed for the jailers but all had fled. Simeon Reno kept up his struggle for almost half an hour until his strength gave out and he slowly strangled to death.

In the meantime the vigilantes pulled out of New Albany by train, giving a local official a cell key so that the wounded sheriff could be freed and treated by a doctor.

Ten days after the Night of Blood, the vigilance committee issued a warning:

We are well aware that at the present time, a combination of the few remaining thieves, their friends and sympathizers, has been formed against us, and have threatened all kinds of vengeance against persons whom they suppose to belong to this organization. They threaten assassination in every form, and that they will commit arson in such ways as will defy detection. The carrying out in whole, or in part, of each or any of these designs, is the only thing that will again cause us to rise in our own defence. The following named persons are solemnly warned, that their designs and opinions are known, and that they cannot, unknown to us, make a move toward retaliation.

Wilk Reno, Clinton Reno, Trick Reno, James Greer, Stephen Greer, Fee Johnson, Chris. Price, Harvey Needham, Meade Fislar, Mart Lowe, Roland Lee, William Sparks, Jesse Thompson, William Hare, William Biggers, James Fislar, Pollard Able.

If the above named individuals desire to remain in our midst, to pursue honest callings, and otherwise conduct themselves as law abiding citizens, we will protect them always.—If however, they commence their devilish designs against us, our property, or any good citizen of this district, we will rise but once more; do not trifle with us; for if you do, we will follow you to the bitter end; and give you a "short shrift and a hempen collar." As to this, our actions in the past, will be a guarantee for our conduct in the future.

That marked the end of the Reno menace.

Restell, Madame (1812–1878) Madame Killer

"The wickedest woman in the city," Ann Trow Lohman, better known as Madame Restell, was New York's most infamous abortionist in the 19th century.

Born in poverty in England, she emigrated to the United States in 1831 with her first husband, a tailor named Henry Summers who died two years later as a result of yellow fever, typhoid and alcoholism. In 1836 she married "Doctor" Charles R. Lohman, a former compositor who had prospered as a quack physician selling medication that supposedly inhibited conception and aborted unwanted fetuses. Soon, Lohman's new wife turned up in newspaper advertisements as "Madame Restell, female physician and professor of midwifery."

Madame Restell opened an establishment on Greenwich Street where she sold various contraceptive devices, performed abortions and delivered babies who were later put up for adoption by their single mothers. To stay in business, Madame Restell paid enormous sums to the police. The superintendent of police, George W. Matsell, was widely believed to have been on her payroll. Concurrently, Matsell's private company was proprietor of the National Police Gazette, which regularly ranted about Madame Killer and her establishment. Clearly, Matsell used his publication as leverage to raise the ante on his bribes. Madame Restell became so notorious that while Boss Tweed allowed her to operate, he refused, in a rare burst of virtue, to take her money and declined invitations to parties at her lavish Fifth Avenue mansion.

Madame Restell prospered despite her numerous expenses. It was said, for example, that more than 100 wealthy men paid regular tribute to her establishment for the right to send young girls there for various forms of "treatment." She was arrested on a number of occasions, especially when a young girl sent to her died from an abortion, but she never served more than a year in prison for any offense. A far more serious threat to her were the angry mobs that frequently gathered outside her establishment and threatened to destroy it. Whenever she went forth in her carriage, street boys followed it shouting: "Yah! Your house is built on babies skulls!"

While Madame Restell could hardly stand as a tragic heroine, she was probably less of an abortionist than a purveyor of contraceptives and the operator of an undercover maternity hospital and adoption center. In the 19th century there was a great semantic confusion concerning abortion and contraception, both officially viewed as the same evil.

After her husband died in 1876, Madame Restell led a lonely life. Because of her notoriety she was abandoned by her brother and a stepdaughter by her first marriage. She lived for the affection shown her by her two grandchildren, for whom she entertained high social ambitions. She was elated when her granddaughter married extremely well in 1878.

The following month, however, Madame Restell was trapped by Anthony Comstock of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, who purchased a number of contraceptive items from her. He then had her arrested for possession of articles used for "immoral" purposes. Facing a sensational trial and fearing the publicity would lead to estrangement from her grandchildren, Madame Restell climbed into her bathtub and slit her throat with a carving knife. She left an estate of $1 million, a stupendous sum for that era.

Reynolds Gang Colorado outlaws

The Reynolds gang, a moderately successful group of Civil War bandits, or Confederate "irregulars," won a permanent niche in Colorado folklore in part because of the belief that they buried a great treasure but also because of the way they were eradicated. As historian Henry Sinclair Drago put it, their execution "stands as one of the blackest pages in Colorado history."

Jim and John Reynolds, two brothers, first appeared in the Colorado Territory around Bayou Salado (South Park) about 1863. Although they never worked, they always seemed to have good horses and money, and the suspicion grew that they were highwaymen. There was no hard evidence against them, but since the Reynolds were from Texas, it seemed like a good idea to put them in an internment compound in Denver for Confederate sympathizers. The brothers soon escaped and returned to their native Texas, where they came up with the idea of functioning as Confederate irregulars in the Colorado Territory, stealing gold for the cause.

Whether the Reynolds gang, which consisted of 20 members, ever intended to turn over any loot to the South is moot. Their first strike on the Santa Fe Trail netted some $40,000 in gold. Then the gang moved into Colorado's Spanish Peaks section. Here, Jim Reynolds mumbled something about the loot belonging to Jeff Davis, a contention disputed by most of the gang. In the end, about a dozen men pulled out, each taking his own share. According to some accounts, the Reynolds brothers buried the balance of the gold; other reports maintain it was divided among the remaining members of the gang. The Reynolds outfit pulled several more robberies with moderate success, including a stagecoach holdup that yielded $10,000 in gold dust.

In the late spring of 1864 the gang was badly shot up; one man was killed and Jim Reynolds and four of his men were captured. Only John Reynolds and Jake Stowe got away. Tried in Denver, Jim Reynolds and his four accomplices were sentenced to life imprisonment (the death sentence was not considered because the gang had never killed anyone). They were kept in jail in Denver until the middle of the summer, although local authorities expressed the fear that Southern sympathizers might try to break them out.

In August, Col. John M. Chivington of the 3rd Colorado Cavalry took charge of the prisoners and had them tried secretly. They were sentenced to be hanged as conspirators against the United States. However, because the military tribunal feared it was exceeding its authority, an announcement was made that the prisoners would be sent to Fort Leavenworth, Kan. for a review of their case. A troop of the 3rd Cavalry under Capt. George Cree set off with the prisoners on August 19.

A few days later, Capt. Cree returned to report the five prisoners had been shot trying to escape. The truth came out when Dick Wooten, the famous scout, discovered the bodies of the five men lashed to trees and filled with bullet holes near the ghost town of Russelville, Colorado Territory. Capt. Cree then tried to explain his actions by claiming he'd been given oral orders to shoot the prisoners at the first opportunity. That claim was not believed because it obviously reflected on Chivington, a fine officer and also a Methodist preacher. Three months later, after Chivington's infamous massacre of Cheyenne Indians at Sand Creek, a wave of revulsion over the barbarous execution of the Reynolds gang had swept the territory.

A final chapter in the Reynolds gang saga occurred in 1871, when John Reynolds returned to the Colorado Territory, it was said, to retrieve the gang's hidden loot in Spanish Peaks and Handcart Gulch. He committed a number of additional holdups and was finally mortally wounded, but not before allegedly imparting the secret of the hiding places to his companion, a two-bit outlaw named Brown. Since he died a drunken vagrant in the Wyoming Territory, it's almost certain Brown never found the loot.

Thus, the story of the Reynolds gang remains both a blot on the history of Colorado and a tantalizing tale of lost treasure. On this last point, Perry Eberhart was to write, about a century after the Reynolds gang rode, in Treasure Tales of the Rockies: "Fortune hunters have torn down fences and fence posts, trampled fields and dug holes up and down three gulches. They [the Colorado natives] wish they had never heard of 'The Bold' Reynolds and his infernal treasure."

Ribicoff, Sarai (1957–1980) murder victim

The murder of Sarai Ribicoff, a 23-year-old member of the socially prominent Connecticut Ribicoffs and the niece of Senator Abe Ribicoff, was to have an immense affect on the attitudes of Californians toward crime and indeed led to a surge in the purchase of guns for personal use in the state which was to last for years.

Graduated from Yale the previous year, Sarai had become a staff reporter for the Los Angeles Herald Examiner and was recognized as a talented member of the staff. On November 12, Sarai had dinner with John Shoven, 33, a Stanford economics professor, at Chez Hélène, a fashionable French restaurant on a busy thoroughfare in Venice. They left the restaurant about 10 P.M. and were but a few steps outside when a horrific incident ensued. They were confronted by two African-American youths, one of whom was waving almost nonchalantly a 9-mm automatic. It was obvious that the gunman was under the influence of some sort of drug.

In an effort to avoid a confrontation, Shoven led his date into the street, in the hope there would be oncoming traffic. The two youths followed menacingly. The couple then moved, ill-advisedly, in the shadow of an unfenced lawn. Thinking better of the situation, they made a beeline back toward the restaurant but were overtaken as they reached the sidewalk. The gunman had clearly been studying Shoven's gold watch and Sarai's gold chain with a small gold pendant with a diamond chip. It had been a gift from her mother.

Cut off from the restaurant, the couple was menaced by the gunman, who kept saying repeatedly: "This is for real. This is for real." As the gunman's companion grabbed Shoven's wallet containing about $200 in cash, the latter asked that his assailants leave his credit cards and I.D.

Meanwhile the gunman shoved Sarai to the sidewalk and demanded her purse, which she did not have. She struggled as her attacker seized the pendant. Shoven stared in horror, as perhaps did his assailant who was yanking his gold watch free, when the gunman cocked the pistol poised in Sarai's back. He pulled the trigger and the shot echoed off the pavement. Sarai gasped what were to be her dying breaths. The gunman fired two more shots into his helpless victim and took off with his booty, as did his companion.

Next door in a crêpe restaurant kitchen, 22-year-old Oscar Benitez, an illegal immigrant from Salvador, heard the shots and took off after the fleeing pair. He saw them run into a nearby vacant building on Fifth Avenue. Police, informed by Benitez when they arrived, followed a trail of blood to the second floor but found no one. They did recover Shoven's empty wallet.

Back at the crime scene a clue turned up. There was a bloodstain just below Sarai's knee, where she had not been hit. It turned out to be Type O blood; the victim's blood type was A. The bullet that had killed Sarai had bounced off the concrete and nicked the killer's arm.

Checking at nearby emergency rooms, the police found one where Frederick Jerome Thomas, having Type O blood, had been treated. Thomas was well known to police. A high school graduate, although functionally illiterate, he was baron of the Venice angel dust pushers and a leader of the Crips, the city’s most dangerous street gang. He was taken into custody at midnight. His accomplice, Anthony LaQuin McAdoo, surrendered the following day. McAdoo, 19, had never been in serious trouble and had never been known to use drugs, unlike Thomas, who was popularly held to have consumed almost as much PCP as he sold. McAdoo had been in Thomas’ company because he desperately needed cash to repair his car.

The murder of Sarai Ribicoff sent shock waves through Los Angeles’ citizenry, including the liberal community that counted Sarai as one of their own. The Herald Examiner, noted as a liberal voice, became outspoken in favor of vigorous prosecution of criminals. It fueled more outrage when it dug up the fact that Thomas had been arrested six months earlier for possession of four ounces of PCP and that the district attorney’s office had not prosecuted him.

The prosecution made a deal with McAdoo to testify against Thomas in exchange for a sentence of 25 years with the chance of parole in 17. Thomas seemed to be a certain candidate for the gas chamber, but he escaped the death penalty. McAdoo’s testimony proved to be an aid to Thomas when he explained to the jury that just before Thomas shot Sarai she tried to resist as he attempted to pull the gold pendant free of her neck. Apparently, that was regarded by the jury as a somewhat extenuating circumstance for Thomas. The jurors, including seven women, voted narrowly to decline the death penalty, opting to sentence Thomas to life imprisonment with no chance for parole.

Now once again shockwaves swept the city, the outrage perhaps equaling that felt by whites years later when O. J. Simpson was acquitted on criminal murder charges. Belle Ribicoff, Sarai’s mother, expressed her horror: “Have we reached the point as a society where someone who struggles with an attacker becomes responsible for his own murder?”

Even Los Angeles’ large liberal community, long in favor of gun control, now focused increasingly on the city’s crime rate, which was exceeding that of New York City. Actor Sylvester Stallone became one of the cofounders of the Beverly Hills Gun Club, which showed patrons how to pick calibers for maximum stopping power as well as the secrets of fast and accurate shooting. And in the half-year following Sarai’s murder, the number of women in California applying for tear gas permits soared from 26,000 to 341,000.

Eventually, support for gun control soared as the memory of the Ribicoff murder faded against the spate of more recent violent shootings. By 1999 however, California was easily in the forefront for gun control and in that year the state enacted the nation’s toughest and most comprehensive ban on assault-style weapons.

Ricca, Paul “The Waiter” (1897–1972) Chicago mob leader

For 40 years after the fall of Al Capone in 1931, the newspapers argued about who was in charge of the Chicago mob, with speculation centering first on Frank “the Enforcer” Nitti, followed by Tough Tony Accardo, Sam “Momo” Giancana and Paul “the Waiter” Ricca.

Ricca was a power even in the Capone days, with Big Al standing up as best man for him at his wedding in 1927. In the mid-1930s Nitti assumed control, but Ricca’s influence continued to grow and by about 1939 he had gained the leadership. Within the Chicago syndicate power always fell to the man strong enough to seize and hold it, not only by force, but by sheer personality. That was Al Capone’s strong suit; it was Ricca’s as well. He could dominate almost any planning session of the mob and was regarded, along with Accardo and Jake “Greasy Thumb” Guzik, as one of the most intelligent and cunning mobsters.

Ricca’s power was based on force. He had a long string of syndicate killers allied with him, many of them psychotics who would do anything to curry his favor. And Ricca never hesitated to use violence. It was not so much his ability to order executions but the quiet manner in which he did so that made him so feared. “Make’a him go away,” he would order softly and the object of his rage was a dead man.

Ricca came to America in 1920. In 1917 he had been sentenced to 2 1/2 years in prison in Ottavino, Italy, near Naples, for the murder of Emilio Parrillo. The chief witness against him was Vincenzo Capasso. The first thing he did when he got out was kill Capasso. Then he fled. Ricca was tried in absentia for the murder and given a 21-year sentence. Arriving in Chicago, he worked first as a theater usher and then did a short stint as a waiter. He earned his nickname the Waiter not so much because he had briefly waited on tables but because that occupation was cited in testimony at immigration hearings to prove he was a worthwhile citizen and not a criminal. Ricca and Capone had mutual friends in Italy, and Capone soon took Ricca into his organization.

Throughout his career Ricca was known as a great fixer. He paid off politicians at almost every level of government. Although he went to prison several times, Ricca always seemed to get off with very short sentences. Along with almost the entire top leadership of the Chicago mob, he went to prison for the huge shake-down of the motion picture industry in the early 1940s. Ricca and most of the others were sentenced to 10 years in 1943 but released in August 1947 because of the intercession of Attorney General Tom Clark. The early paroles enraged the Chicago newspapers, which published Ricca's claims that his influence reached into the White House. Printed accounts had Ricca telling his lawyers to find out who had the final say in granting him a speedy release, adding: "That man must want something: money, favors, a seat in the Supreme Court. Find out what he wants and get it for him."

Granted that several of the Chicago newspapers were bitter enemies of President Harry Truman, the facts were that Attorney General Clark had allowed the early parole of Ricca and the others to go through and that Clark was appointed to the next opening on the Supreme Court. In 1952 the Chicago Tribune called for Clark's impeachment because of his "utter unfitness for any position of public responsibility and especially for a position on the Supreme Court bench." The editorial went on to state: "We have been sure of [his] unfitness ever since he played his considerable role in releasing the four Capone gangsters after they had served the bare minimum of their terms."

In any event, Paul Ricca was back in circulation and became the real power in the Chicago underworld. While he was in prison, Tough Tony Accardo had visited him in his cell by masquerading as his attorney. Accardo had kept Ricca informed of syndicate activities and had gotten his decision about whether to go ahead or to pull back. After his release Ricca, when he was so inclined, allowed Sam Giancana to give syndicate orders but later took away that power. In its hearings on organized crime, the Kefauver Committee in 1950 labeled Ricca "the national head of the Crime Syndicate" and the McClellan Committee in 1958 referred to him as America's "most important" criminal. Ricca's testimony on the witness stand before each committee was punctuated by frequent citations of the Fifth Amendment.

In 1957 Ricca was stripped of his citizenship and two years later he was ordered deported. Ricca started all sorts of appeals and delaying actions. He got a court stay on deportation to Italy by bringing an action before an Italian court, demanding that his Italian citizenship be dropped. In what can only be described as an incredible action, the Italian government decided that Ricca was such a despicable character and had been so unwholesome of behavior in America that it did not even want him back to serve out his old murder sentence, presumably because he would contaminate its prisons. Immigration authorities then ordered Ricca to find a country to which he wished to be deported. Ricca dutifully obeyed and sent letters to more than 60 countries, supposedly seeking asylum but always including a packet of news clippings to indicate how undesirable he was in the United States. No country expressed any willingness to accept him. The government was still trying to get rid of Ricca when he died in 1972 at the age of 74.

Rice, William Marsh (1816–1900) murder victim

One of Texas' more famous millionaires, William Marsh Rice had but one ambition in his later years: to give his adopted state, which had made him rich, an institution of higher learning as a memorial to himself. His life was ended by a bizarre murder plot to rob his estate, most of which was intended for the founding of that institution.

Rice had garnered a fortune in oil, land and hotels. At the age of 80, he had buried two wives, had no children and was living alone in New York. He hired 23-year-old Charles F. Jones as a combination nurse and secretary and by 1900 he so trusted Jones that he allowed him to handle all his banking affairs.

At the time, Rice was involved in a legal dispute over part of his fortune. Before his second wife died, she made up a will disposing of half of Rice's money, to which she was entitled under the community property law in Texas, where the couple had been living. Rice countered that he was actually a resident of New York and only visited Texas and that therefore all the money rightfully was his. Nonetheless, he made out a will leaving almost all of his estate to establish "The Rice Institute." One of Rice's adversaries was a brash Texas lawyer with a shady past, a man named Albert T. Patrick, who went to New York to gather proof that Rice's claim of residency in that state was a fraud. In fact, Patrick had something else in mind. He was out to get the Rice millions for himself. After promising secretary Jones a fortune, he drew him into the plot.

Although Rice had made a will in 1896 for the establishment of the school, Patrick set about producing a new will that would name him the chief beneficiary. In this new will Rice's relatives would receive much more money, making them far more likely to support it than the original. He also left $5,000 to each of the prospective trustees of the new school, whom Rice had named in the authentic will. "They'll be glad to forget about the school," Patrick told Jones. "Every man has his price. You know, any man in Houston can be bought for five thousand dollars."

On September 24, 1900 Patrick sent an office boy to Rice's bank with a check for $65,000. It was made out to Albert T. Patrick but endorsed by Albert T. Patrick. Because of the faulty endorsement, it was rejected. When the boy returned with the correct endorsement, the bank became suspicious and called Rice to verify his signature. Jones answered the phone call and said the check was authentic, but he was nevertheless asked to put Mr. Rice on the phone. The secretary replied that Rice was not available. Later that same day the bank called again; this time Jones said his employer had died.

As a matter of fact, Rice had been dead when the check was first presented for payment. Jones had tiptoed into Rice's room while he was asleep and covered his face for 30 minutes with a sponge soaked in chloroform. Then he called Patrick, who in turn arranged for a Dr. Walter Curry to examine the body. Dr. Curry signed a death certificate that declared Rice had succumbed to "old age, weak heart and collocratal diarrhea with mental worry."

Meanwhile, Patrick informed Rice's bank that he held another check for $65,000 as well as an assignment of all his bonds and securities. The bank wondered why Rice had left everything to Patrick. Patrick said: "Frankly, the old gentleman admired me. He was just stuck on me. He thought I was the most wonderful man in the world. Said he never met anyone he liked better."

Nevertheless, the bank and a number of Rice's relatives and proposed trustees of the school insisted on a post-mortem, which revealed traces of mercury in the dead man's organs and congestion of the lungs caused by "some gas or vapor." On October 4 Patrick and Jones were arrested on charges of forgery and confined in the Tombs Prison. Patrick, who until then had exercised considerable authority over Jones, ordered his accomplice to confess to the murder and assume the entire guilt. Jones slit his throat with a pen knife and spent two weeks recuperating in Bellevue Hospital.

When he was returned to the Tombs, Jones first stated that Patrick had administered the fatal chloroform to the old millionaire. Then he admitted he had done it after Patrick had showed him a picture of his two smiling daughters and said he could not kill anyone.

Patrick was brought to trial for murder in January 1902. The proceedings lasted 10 weeks and the testimony filled 3,000 pages. Jones turned state's evidence and, in exchange, was not charged with anything. He spent five days on the witness stand. Patrick was convicted and sentenced to death in the electric chair.

Patrick's long fight for freedom has been described as one of the blackest chapters in New York's legal history. A wealthy brother-in-law reportedly poured thousands into the battle. Patrick spent four years and seven months in the death house, during which time he saw 17 others go to the chair. Finally, in December 1906 Gov. F. W. Higgins commuted his sentence to life imprisonment. Patrick, the star boarder on death row, announced: "I refuse to accept the governor's commutation. I propose to continue my fight for freedom."

He shuttled back and forth to various courts with all sorts of arguments. In one court he argued that he was legally dead and, as such, could not be kept in Sing Sing. It could be that everyone wearied of the entire matter, but in any event, on November 28, 1912 Gov. John A. Dix gave Patrick a complete pardon, noting in a brief comment that "an air of mystery has always surrounded the case." The governor's act was, to say the least, controversial, but so was the fact that Jones, the actual killer, had not even been tried for the murder.

In a certain sense, all the parties in the case came out fairly well off. Rice Institute was endowed and grew to be the nation's wealthiest school on a student per capita basis. Patrick eventually became a man of property before he died in 1940 at the age of 74. Ironically, even Jones ended up with a fair sum of money, which he inherited from his family. When he committed suicide in 1954 at the age of 80, his neighbors in Baytown, Tex. had no idea he was the Jones who had been involved in the Rice murder. However, it was not a guilty conscience that prompted him to take his life but fear of becoming an invalid and dependent on strangers.

Rich Men's Coachmen's Club criminal organization

One of the strangest criminal organizations in history was the Rich Men's Coachmen's Club, which appeared in Chicago in the 1880s. Among the city's coaching set the true sign of social importance was to have English grooms and coachmen, since English fashion still represented the ultimate authority in the Gem of the Prairie. The social order became somewhat scrambled as many of these English grooms and coachmen who flooded Chicago attempted to exploit and bully their employers, getting away with such behavior, because the crowning disaster in the city's society was to lose one's English servant.

The field became so lush that a number of Yankee imposters posed as Englishmen to get coachmen's jobs. A leading faker of this ilk was one John Tilbury, who won a position with Victor Fremont Lawson, the owner of the Chicago Daily News. Tilbury's real name was James McGraw and he really hailed from New York City, but he affected a perfect accent and had provided himself with impressive forged credentials. Tilbury saw there were enormous opportunities for dishonest coachmen if their activities could be properly organized.

He formed the Rich Men's Coachmen's Club, headquartered in Lawson's barn, where both business and social meetings were held. The latter activities included drinking and carousing and betting on dog and cock-fighters. Business meetings consisted of reports on mansions that could be burglarized; valuable dogs that could be stolen and sold, trained as fighters or returned to their owners for ransom; and family secrets that could be used for blackmail. Honest servants of rich families were appalled by the actions of Tilbury's gang. They informed their employers and wrote anonymous letters to the police accusing various coachmen of being former inmates of British jails or deserters from the British army. However, most employers refused to believe such charges against their coachmen, restrained by their own pride in having British servants or the threat of blackmail. Nonetheless, Lawson may have breathed a sigh of relief when Tilbury left his employ to join the staff of Mrs. Hollis M. Thurston, a leading figure in Chicago society. No doubt Mrs. Thurston was proud of her catch of a coachman who claimed to be a former guards officer and the disinherited member of a titled family.

Some three months later, Tilbury had gathered enough dirt on the Thurston family to approach his mistress and inform her he wanted $12,500 to remain silent about certain family scandals. Mrs. Thurston was made of stern stuff and informed private detectives, who seized Tilbury at the mansion as the blackmail money was paid to him. The detectives then turned him over to the police. When the story broke in the newspapers the next day, the Chicago Times reported: "Chicago society has turned white with dread."

At Tilbury's trial, Mrs. Thurston was subjected to a withering cross-examination, which attacked her conduct and character. In the end, Tilbury was freed on the ground that the private detectives hired by the woman had violated his rights. However, the police thereafter hounded Tilbury and some other crooked coachmen until they finally left town and the Coachmen's Club was dissolved.

Ridley, Edward Albert (1847–1933) murder victim
Few unsolved murders in America have provoked as much speculation as that of 86-year-old millionaire Edward Albert Ridley.

A New York real estate tycoon, Ridley maintained his office in the subcellar of a garage on Allen Street. In 1931 Ridley entered his office and found the body of Herman Moench, 60, his bookkeeper and rent collector for some 30 years. Moench had been shot twice but the police were unable to learn the identity of his killer or killers. Then two years later, on May 10, 1933, business associates of Ridley found that the millionaire's office phone was not being answered. They investigated and discovered the bodies of Ridley and Lee Weinstein, Moench's successor. Weinstein had been shot seven times and Ridley had been beaten to death with a stool. Ballistics tests revealed the same weapon that had killed Moench two years previously had also killed Weinstein. The murders of Moench, Weinstein and Ridley, who left an estate of $3 million, have never been solved.

"right to bear arms" gun owners' slogan

Opponents of gun control legislation frequently cite what they insist is a fundamental right guaranteed by the Constitution: "the right to bear arms." However, few constitutional scholars find any such "right" in the document, insisting that meaning is derived only when the words are taken out of context. The Second Amendment reads: "A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed." Historian Irving Brant notes:

As the wording reveals, this article relates entirely to the militia—a fact that was made even clearer by a clause dropped from Madison's original wording: "but no person religiously scrupulous of bearing arms should be compelled to render military service in person." It was made clearest of all in the congressional debate on the amendment. Why was a militia necessary to "the security of a free state"? Elbridge Gerry asked and answered that question: "What, sir, is the use of the militia? It is to prevent the establishment of a standing army, the bane of liberty." Thus the purpose of the Second Amendment was to forbid Congress to prohibit the maintenance of a state militia. By its nature, that amendment cannot be transformed into a personal right to bear arms, enforceable by federal compulsion upon the state.

Of course, if the opponents of gun control laws really feel there is merit in their claim, there are any number of gun restrictions on the law books that could be challenged, thus allowing a final determination on the matter by the courts.

Riley, James "Butt" (1848–?) San Francisco hoodlum
Butt Riley grew up as a hoodlum in New York and then, after a stint as a sailor, ended up in San Francisco, where police soon labeled him King of the Hoodlums.

Certainly, he was one of that city's principal, if less sophisticated, criminals. He never led any specific gang, but most of the city's toughs would flock to join him whenever he called.

Riley was known as a vicious fighter who was always armed with a long knife, brass knuckles, a slungshot and a hickory bludgeon. However, his principal weapon was his head, which he claimed had the thickest skull in Christendom. He would disable a foe by charging him and butting him in the stomach or on the chin, rendering the man helpless. When Butt Riley led raids on Chinese opium houses or slave dens, he always batted the doors down with his head, and when his men grabbed a Chinese victim, Riley would see how far he could butt him. Records were kept on such matters, and according to them, Riley once butted a 160-pound man exactly 10 feet. Riley has been described as an extraordinarily handsome man, and it is a matter of record that he was eagerly sought after by prostitutes and that when he bestowed his favors, the usual procedure was reversed and he collected a fee. He even sold female admirers his photograph for 25¢; for his favorite harlots only, a photo of him in the nude was available for 50¢. It was quite common for clients of some of the city's most popular prostitutes to find themselves making love under an autographed picture of the King of the Hoodlums. Riley would have new photos taken of himself each week and on Mondays he would make a picture-selling tour of the red-light areas, his merchandise in a black satchel slung over his shoulder.

In 1871 Riley butted the wrong victim, a 22-year-old carriage painter named John Jordon, who took two vicious butts to the stomach and then pulled a revolver and shot Riley in the chest. Doctors at the county hospital said the wounds were fatal but Riley recovered. Unfortunately, his health was poor thereafter, and he lost the strength and beauty the harlots admired. He also lost his standing with the hoodlums and degenerated to a common housebreaker. In 1876 he was caught breaking into a house and sent to San Quentin Prison for 15 years. After that San Francisco's King of the Hoodlums disappeared.

Ringo, John (1844?–1882) outlaw

Little is known of the early life of outlaw Johnny Ringo, who, with the possible exception of Curly Bill Brocius, was the most dangerous member of the Clanton gang, the bitter foe of the Earps in Tombstone, Arizona Territory.

Ringo, whose real name may have been Ringgold, is believed to have been the black sheep of a leading southern family and is definitely known to have been college educated. Cultured, able to quote Shakespeare at length (in their desire to make the "good guys"—the Earps—good and the "bad guys"—the Clantons—bad, some historians of the Tombstone legend transferred this literary attribute to Doc Holliday), Ringo epitomized the ideal gentleman outlaw. He was known to be a man of his word, and when he promised to surrender to the law, he did so. However, none of these laudable characteristics prevented Ringo from being a murderous bandit. His record, though shadowy at times, included participation in Texas' bloody Hoodoo War in the 1870s, during which he did his share of killing as a sidekick of the notorious Scott Cooley.

Later, as a member of the Clanton gang, Ringo ran up a string of vicious and often senseless killings. One Louis Hancock came to a bad end in a Tombstone saloon for having the temerity to order beer when Ringo offered to buy him whiskey. Ringo participated in the bloody Guadalupe Canyon Massacre of Mexican silver miners by the Clantons, took part in the attempt on the life of Virgil Earp and was the lookout when Morgan Earp was assassinated. He was the only member of the Clantons with the nerve to challenge Doc Holliday to a one-on-one duel, a confrontation prevented by the arrival of lawmen. In the Tombstone area's twisted political setup, Ringo was a sheriff's deputy in the posse that chased the Earps out of the county for the last time.

James "Butt" Riley was frequently used by contemporary newspaper artists as a model for what the "more exquisite-type" hoodlum looked like.

RIPPER gangs

Despite his rather checkered and deadly career, Ringo won a sort of admiration from Tombstonians as a brooding, silent and tragic loner with a past that probably outshone his present and future. That future seemed to be short in 1882 when Ringo turned more dependent and started drinking heavily. Early in July of that year, Ringo went off on a long drinking bout with Frank Leslie, a gunman with a reputation for killing a number of Clanton supporters. The two had not been on friendly terms earlier, particularly after Ringo had asked Leslie, "Frank, did you ever shoot someone not in the back?"

Ringo was soon found dead in Turkey Creek Canyon with a bullet in his head. Leslie was a prime suspect, although officially the death was classified as a suicide, an odd verdict since no powder burns were found around the entrance wound. Pony Deal, an outlaw friend of Ringo's, felt the likely murderer was a gambler named Johnny Behind the Deuce and shot him to death in retribution. Years later, Wyatt Earp claimed he had killed Ringo for his involvement in the plots against his brothers, but most historians have written off Earp's claim as the words of a "blowhard" who was in Colorado when Ringo died. In any event, the true story of Ringo's demise remains as steeped in mystery as much of his earlier life.

ripper gangs serial killers acting in concert

Among serial killers, so-called ripper gangs are considered by many law officials to be the most frightening. Because they operate in a group, one member can frequently egg his companions into more and more terrifying acts. Probably the most hideous ripper gang of the 1980s was one in the Chicago area, headed by Robin Gecht, a terror who was to be called the Midwest's Charles Manson. While the gang's victims were often disfigured before or after they were killed, the term "ripper" seems to have gained its meaning in part from the way women victims were "ripped" off the street. In some cases the victim was ripped right out of her shoes and driven away in a van to a gruesome fate, the only clue to her disappearance was the shoes left in a mall parking lot or at the side of a highway where she might be waiting to be picked up by a friend or relative.

The shoe routine was also the mark of another ripper gang, led by Lawrence Sigmund Bittaker and Roy Lewis Norris, operating in California. Besides luring young girls into their new silver GMC van with promises of drugs or job offers, the boys simply maced their intended victims or ripped them out of their shoes and sped away in their van, called their "Murder Mack."

The Murder Mack's radio blared loudly to cover the victim's screams as they drove into the mountains to complete their crimes at leisure.

The Gecht rippers in Chicago were more brazen, not hesitating to rip women right off North Lake Shore Drive along Lake Michigan. One such victim was Rosemarie Ann Beck, abducted, tortured and left to die in a building along the Drive. Most of his followers were of more limited intelligence than Robin Gecht, who some said dominated his gang with his eyes and hypnotic ways. He was 28 years old in 1981, five to seven years or so older than most of his followers. As the mutilated bodies of some of their victims started turning up, newspaper speculation ran rampant, but one sure thing was that there seemed no way to conduct an accurate body count. The full extent of Gecht's predations was never really determined, and the media had to be satisfied by reporting a near-endless string of "cannibal murders," a description that was not inaccurate.

The rippers' last attempted kill involved a female hauled into the gang's van, stuffed with drugs and then mutilated and dumped still alive from the vehicle. She survived and identified some of the abductors while still in the hospital. One by one the rippers were picked up by police. Several of them broke and talked. Soon a trail led to Gecht. Gecht was found mentally competent to stand trial in March 1983 and in September he confessed to murder in court. One identified victim of the gang was 42-year-old Carole Pappas, the wife of the Chicago Cubs' pitcher. However, her remains were never found.

Robin Gecht was convicted and sentenced to 120 years in prison. Other members of the gang got life sentences, and one, Andrew Kokoraleis, drew a death sentence.

Ritter, Halsted Lockwood (1868-?) impeached judge

As of 1981, the last federal judge to be impeached and removed from office by Congress was Halsted L. Ritter, who had supplemented his $17,300 salary with kickbacks.

After appointment to the bench by President Calvin Coolidge in 1929 despite bipartisan opposition, Ritter continued to practice law, receiving a $2,000 fee from the Mulford Realty Corp., which had considerable holdings in his Florida judicial district. He gave his former law partner, A. L. Rankin, an excessive $75,000 fee for acting as receiver for a bankrupt Palm Beach hotel. In return, Ritter accepted $4,500. Other kickbacks on receiverships netted him at least $7,500. In one case he made his sister-in-law manager of another bankrupt hotel and then received free room and board as well as valet service there. Ritter, however, neglected to report any of these “supplementals” on his income tax returns and was eventually charged with tax evasion for the years 1929 and 1930.

In 1936 Ritter became the 13th government official in American history to be impeached by the House of Representatives, which passed seven articles of impeachment against him. In the Senate, he escaped conviction on the first charge by one vote. Acquitted of the next five articles by larger margins, he was then narrowly convicted of an omnibus charge, including major features of the previous six charges, and thus removed from office. But by a unanimous vote of the Senate he specifically was not “disqualified from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.”

Ignoring the order of the Senate, Ritter refused to leave his office and had to be ousted by a federal marshal. He took his case to the U.S. Court of Claims, declaring his ouster unconstitutional because he had been convicted on a composite charge but cleared on the individual counts. His petition was denied. Ritter faded into obscurity thereafter and no public announcement was made of his death, which apparently occurred some time in the 1950s.

During the heyday of the riverboat on American waterways in the mid-19th century, it was estimated there were between 2,000 and 2,500 riverboat gamblers plying their trade. The first of the breed had appeared along the Mississippi near the beginning of the century. Far from the courtly gentlemen of Hollywood legend, they were tough, slovenly dressed characters who serviced the rugged flatboat sailors of the day both ashore and afloat. These gamblers were murderous types who would often kill those they couldn't cheat.

When the first steam packets appeared on the river to cater to higher strata of society, professional gamblers were not wanted and were usually heaved over the side or stranded on some lonely shore or sandbar. Slowly, the boat operators began to realize that during a long card session, players tended to spend huge sums on liquid refreshments. During one poker game in 1858 the liquor tab for the players came to $791.50. Soon, the gamblers, now often done up in exquisite finery, were welcomed with great respect and many owner-captains would not cast off until they were sure there was one aboard.

There is little doubt that some gamblers paid off captains for the privilege of being allowed to practice their art. Naturally, such overhead required most card sharks to ensure that winning wasn't left to mere luck or skill. One contemporary expert on the subject estimated that of the 2,000-odd gamblers, he could think of only four who were honest all the time.

Tom Ellison, a gambler turned honest in his later years, said:

I've seen fellows pick every card in a pack, and call it without missing once. I've seen them shuffle them one for one all through from top to bottom, so that they were in the same position after a dozen shuffles that they were in at first. They'd just flutter them up like a flock of quail and get the aces, kings, queens, jacks and tens all together as easy as pie. A sucker had no more chance against those fellows than a snowball in a red-hot oven. They were good fellows, free with their money as water, after scheming to bust their heads to get it. A hundred didn't bother them any more than a chew of tobacco would you.

Ellison told of a planter who lost his whole tobacco crop in one night and get up and never mind it particularly. Many a time I've seen a game player just skin off his watch and ring and studs and play them in. Men often lost their goods playing in their way bills. I've seen them betting a bale of cotton at a crack, and it wasn't at all uncommon to hear an old planter betting off his Negroes on a good hand. Every man who ever ran on the river knows that these old planters used to play in their lady servants, valuing them all the way from $300 to $1,500. I saw a little colored boy stand up at $300 to back his master's faith in a little flush that wasn't any good on earth.

Few riverboat gamblers exercised their dishonesty alone. They either paired up or operated in groups of up to half a dozen. Often, one member of a crooked combination would disembark at a stop to be replaced by another gambler coming aboard there, thus allaying any suspicions that might be building up among the victims. A common procedure would be for a confederate to stand among the interested spectators and signal his partners what cards the suckers held. This trickery, known as “iteming,” might be achieved by puffing on a cigar or by scratching certain parts of the anatomy to indicate certain hands. One such confederate used a walking stick as a signal, indicating various hands by the angle of the stick. Perhaps the most ingenious was a gambler's partner who played coded snatches of music on a violin while masquerading as a half-wit.

Among the top riverboat gamblers were Canada Bill Jones, perhaps the greatest practitioner of three-card monte; George Devol; and Dick Hargraves, the richest of the square gamblers. Another honest gambler was John Powell, the beau ideal of his river colleagues. Tall, handsome and always strikingly, though not vulgarly, dressed, Powell was well educated and a close friend of Andrew Jackson and Stephen A. Douglas. Although he turned down a chance to run for Congress from his native state of Missouri, Powell took a keen interest in politics. His advice was sought frequently by Louisiana politicians when he was ashore in the lavish home he maintained in New Orleans.

Powell once took part in a three-day poker game aboard the steamer Atlantic, during which he won more than $50,000 from a rich Louisiana planter named Jules Devereaux. It was said that in his most successful years—from 1845 to 1858—he netted at least $100,000 a year. In the fall of 1858 Powell won $8,000 from a young Englishman, who turned up on deck the next morning, shook hands with fellow passengers and, putting a pistol to his temple, blew his brains out. The gambler was so unnerved by the event that he sent the $8,000 and the lad's luggage (he had won that as well) to his family in England and retired from gambling for an entire year. When he returned to the river, his luck and skill deserted him and he went through his entire fortune within a year. Powell died in extreme poverty a few years later, a symbol to other gamblers of the perils of a guilty conscience.

Rizzo, Frank L. (1920–1991) Philadelphia police chief and mayor

A longtime police chief who became mayor of Philadelphia for eight years, Frank Rizzo built, nurtured and protected that city's police force until some regarded it as one of the toughest and most effective crime-fighting forces in the country while others, including officials of the Justice Department, regarded it as "the most brutal in the nation."

The son of a policeman, Rizzo left high school without graduating and joined the force in 1943, becoming—in his own words—"the toughest cop in America." Immensely popular with the public because of his outspoken calls for law and order, he moved steadily up the ladder to the post of commissioner and in 1972 became mayor, the first incumbent police chief ever elected to that office.

Although the department then came under the nominal rule of Joseph F. O'Neill, in fact it remained the exclusive province of Rizzo. "When it comes to the police department," Rizzo said, "I'll be there to defend them even if they make errors in judgment. Nobody will get to them while I'm mayor." Included among the "errors in judgment" charged against the police was a record of interrogating suspects in a way that produced confessions out of innocent men. According to sworn testimony, police interrogators would put a telephone book on a suspect's head and then hammer on it. In some cases questioning would continue for 24 hours straight, with many suspects allegedly beaten in the back, ribs, kidneys and genitals.

A few of Rizzo's pithy comments reflected his regime's attitude toward law and order. When a mentally retarded white man was proved to have been wrongfully convicted of murder because of police intimidation and beatings, Rizzo kept the guilty officers on duty, saying, "These were good men who did nothing wrong." When 10 policemen broke nightsticks over a prostrate black man, Rizzo was led to a whimsical observation: "It's easy to break some of these nightsticks nowadays." During a religious pilgrimage to Rome in the midst of student riots, he drew worldwide attention when he invited Italian officials to send some of their police to Philadelphia for training on such disturbances. "We'll show them how to eat those guys up," he said, adding in Calabrese, "Spacco il capo!" Roughly translated the phrase means, "Break their heads."

Reelected easily to a second term in 1975, Rizzo moved in 1978 to put through an amendment to the city charter that would have allowed him to run for a third term the following year. At first, his proposal was considered a shoo-in, but as the campaign progressed, the issue of police brutality came to the fore. Rizzo's proposal lost by two to one.

Roach Guards early 19th-century New York City gang

Originally formed in the 1820s as a street gang that protected certain New York liquor sellers in the Five Points section, the Roach Guards were Irish toughs who would often rampage through the city committing robberies and murders.

When not working as murderers and thieves, the Roach Guards fought pitched battles with other gangs, especially the hated Bowery Boys and the Dead Rabbits, the latter being an offshoot of their own organization. The Roach Guards, who could call on perhaps 500 warriors, even had a battle uniform consisting of pantaloons with a blue stripe. The Dead Rabbits were a group of dissidents who wanted a more-disciplined attitude toward organized crime activities and more onslaughts into the Bowery area. Of about equal size, the two gangs fought many great "slugger battles," but whenever some hated outside gang would invade the Five Points, they would immediately unite against the new threat. The Roach Guards started to decline in importance in the 1850s and failed to survive the Civil War as an important gang.

road agent spin gunman's trick

A Western gunman's deadly deception when surrendering his shooting iron, the "road agent spin," or "border roll," involved extending the weapon butt first but keeping the index finger in the guard and suddenly spinning the gun back into firing position. It was not an easy maneuver and many who tried fumbled it and lost their lives in the process.

Perhaps the most famous feat of this type—real or imaginary—involved the notorious Texas killer Wes Hardin and Marshal Wild Bill Hickok of Abilene. According to the legend, Hickok found Hardin and some buddies playing tenpins in a bowling alley. Seeing the Texan was wearing pistols in defiance of a local ordinance, Hickok ordered Hardin to surrender them, at the same time drawing his own six-gun.

"I said all right," Hardin recalled later, "and pulled them out of the scabbard, but while he was reaching for them, I reversed them and whirled them over on him with the muzzles in his face, springing back at the same time. I told him to put his pistols up, which he did."

Hickok's more ardent admirers were enraged that someone could make such a claim about their hero, but the story may well have been true. Hardin apparently wore his guns quite a bit in Abilene and evidently the marshal never, or never after that incident, attempted to take them from him.

robber's roost western outlaw hideout

Along with Hole in the Wall and Brown's Hole, Robber's Roost was one of the nearly impregnable hideouts used by the bandits of the West.

Located in Wayne County in southeastern Utah, Robber's Roost lay high on a plateau on the summit of the San Rafael Swell. Bounded on the east by the Green River, it was a desolate and arid place with no more than four or five springs where water could be obtained. Other than the Green River, there were only two routes into Robber's Roost: by way of Hanksville and the other from Dandy Crossing. It was futile for lawmen to enter Robber's Roost, because their quarry, perched in their vantage point, would have too much advance warning and the chances of even a large party making it out safely were poor. Bandits could enter the roost, lick their wounds and plan new jobs in safety.

Among the many leading bandits who often made Robber's Roost home were Butch Cassidy, the Sundance Kid, Black Jack Ketchum, Elza Lay, Bob Lee, George Curry, O. C. Hanks, Harry Tracy, Dave Lant and the Logans of Missouri.

Robert's Hill stagecoach robbery biggest holdup until Great Brink's robbery

Stagecoach robberies were common in the Old West, but the really successful jobs, including the greatest of all, were the holdups of "six-horse limiteds" carrying gold dust—a cargo that shippers tried to keep secret—to the mint in San Francisco.

A special 10-horse limited belonging to the Oregon and California Stage Co. left Jacksonville, Oregon Territory in May 1857 carrying the almost unheard-of sum of $500,000 in gold dust. The company's deception, or attempted deception, was even more elaborate than usual in such cases: while the stage was scheduled to arrive in San Francisco, it would instead head for Portland, and from there the cargo, and the fooled passengers as well, would be sent on by boat to San Francisco.

The added horsepower would make the stage almost immune to road agents trying to catch it in the open expanse of the Rogue River Valley, especially since it would be driven by the legendary Jack Montgomery, just about the best driver in the business. As added protection, extra guards had joined the stage outside of Jacksonville, so as not to attract attention. The only danger would be in hill country, where an ambush was possible.

By the time the stage thundered toward Robert's Hill in the middle of the night, only 10 minutes away from the Mountain House Stage Station, Montgomery and the guards relaxed. The road on Robert's Hill was too narrow to allow for an ambush; and once down the hill the stage would again be in open country and unstoppable under Montgomery's drive.

But at the bottom a band of road agents waited while one of the gang climbed high above the road. As the stage passed beneath him, the man detonated a large explosive charge that set off an avalanche of rock and dirt, burying the horses. Montgomery managed to save his own life by dropping the reins, kicking the boot cover loose, drawing his knife and cutting the driver's belt—all in one motion. He leaped clear and tumbled down a steep grade, a lighted cigar still clenched in his teeth. His shotgun rider was a bloody, mangled corpse and the hind-boot guard was thrown clear but left unconscious. Three of the passengers were killed while the rest were also knocked unconscious.

As the road agents charged up Robert's Hill, only Montgomery was in any shape to offer resistance. As the driver later revealed, he fired until he ran out of bullets and then he fell silent, as several road agents came down the grade looking for him. One stumbled over him in the darkness, and the pair struggled until Montgomery jammed his still burning cigar into the man's eye. As the bandit screamed in agony, Montgomery pulled a knife from his boot and plunged it between the man's shoulder blades. The stage driver then tossed himself further down the grade. The other outlaws found their comrade and threw him across one of the team mules they had brought to haul off the gold.

By the time Montgomery reached the stage station and a posse could be mounted, it was dawn and the road agents and their mules had vanished. The bandits' trail lasted only a short distance before the mule tracks divided in several directions, moving into hill country. The gold or parts of it could have gone in all, several, few or only one of the directions the tracks indicated; there was no way of telling and the robbers got away clean.

The Robert's Hill holdup galvanized the citizens of Oregon and, as much as any single event, led to the formation of the famed Oregon Vigilantes. Far more secretive than other vigilante groups, the Oregon Vigilantes were noted for meting out swift and terrible punishment and never revealing their deeds. There are few written accounts of their acts. Rumor had it, however, that the Robert's Hill bandits were eventually caught and punished.

According to the story, in 1869 some Umpqua Indians reported to the vigilantes that a group of suspicious-looking whites were holed up in a cave in the Siskiyou Mountains. The vigilantes caught them and a fair amount of gold dust in their possession. The suspects claimed they had accidentally stumbled across the hoard in the cavern. However, according to a longheld theory, the road agents had buried their loot in several spots and would return from time to time to retrieve parts of it. What really doomed this band was the fact that one of them was missing an eye, as though it had been burned out, perhaps with a cigar. That was proof enough for the vigilantes and they strung up their prisoners on the spot.

The story may well be apocryphal. What is certain is that the Robert's Hill stage robbery was the largest of its kind and held the record as the most lucrative armed holdup in this country for 90 years until the Brink's job in 1947.

Robles, Richard See JANICE WYLIE.

Rogers, Earl (1870–1922) defense lawyer

One of the most colorful defense lawyers ever to grace a courtroom, Earl Rogers compiled an enviable record of 183 acquittals in murder cases against less than a score of convictions and became known as an attorney who had a penchant for freeing murderers. In California courtroom circles the saying went, "A guilty man is guilty unless he hires Earl Rogers." Some prosecutors, no doubt in part out of pique, insisted that around the turn of the century Rogers seldom went to a murder trial without having bribed at least one juror on a murder panel. When he secured an acquittal in a case that the prosecution had considered ironclad, an assistant prosecutor is said to have cracked, "The bastard has bought all twelve this time!"

Rogers did play fast and loose with facts and evidence and could drive judges and prosecutors wild by the way he juggled testimony; swiped or switched incriminating exhibits; and went through fits of anger, passion, hysteria or ecstasy, as the situation required, to divert the attention of the jury from important elements of the case. However, he was also a brilliant lawyer, quick, sharp, resourceful. When he was sober, which probably was less than half the time, he was virtually unbeatable. As Bill Fallon, at the time noted as the Great Mouthpiece of Broadway, put it, "Even when he's drunk, Earl Rogers is better than any other stone-sober lawyer in the whole damned country."

Fallon no doubt was attracted to his West Coast colleague because of their great similarities. He, like Rogers, was addicted to the good life, liquor and the ladies, and both had the oratorical ability to cast a spell over jurors. But Rogers went one step better than Fallon: he really studied his cases and his juries. He was a pioneer in compiling files on prospective veniremen and generally knew plenty about a prospective juror before he even asked him a question. Often he ingratiated himself with a juror-to-be by asking him not a single question, as though he found the man's appearance and demeanor most acceptable.

Rogers had a knack for throwing the prosecution off the scent by sometimes querying a prospective juror about a phase of the case that he intended to ignore. While the prosecution scurried about gathering facts on that element, Rogers struck elsewhere.

There never was a client too venal for Rogers to defend or for whom he would not try every trick, honest or not, to win an acquittal. Once, Rogers conned a jury into releasing a procurer who had murdered his wife, and then brushed away the man's ardent thanks. "Get away from me, you slimey pimp," he said. "You know you're guilty as hell!"

Another of his defendants was a man named William Alford, who had shot and killed a prominent attorney, Jay E. Hunter, after an altercation in an office building corridor. Alford, who was seen by several witnesses standing over the victim with the smoking gun in his hand, quickly confessed to the police. Then Rogers, a young lawyer still in his twenties and much in need of clients, entered the case. He had not graduated from law school, having first worked as a reporter on several California papers and then served an apprenticeship with a law firm. Admitted to the bar in 1897, he took cases most lawyers refused to handle, considering them lost causes. Rogers quickly gained a reputation by pulling miracles in a number of them, including the Alford case. Preparing for the trial, he studied medical texts day and night and consulted with a number of doctors about a man's insides. He even visited a hospital to examine a human stomach in a glass jar.

Alford retracted his confession. It had, Rogers announced, been beaten out of him. The lawyer did not bother to dispute the prosecution's contention that bad blood had existed for some time between the victim and the defendant. What he demanded was that the victim's stomach be brought into court. Why was that necessary? the judge asked.

"Why, to prove that the state's case is false. My client, Your Honor, was not standing when he shot Hunter. He was lying face up on the floor. Hunter knocked him down with the heavy cane he always carried and was leaning over beating him when my client shot in self-defense."

When the victim's stomach was presented in court, Rogers demonstrated to the somewhat awed jurors how the bullet could have entered the victim's navel and traveled upward through the intestines if the man had been bent over administering a beating to his poor client. The prosecution made the mistake of trying to counter Rogers' claims, so that in the end the jury was so fascinated about how the killing could have occurred that it did not consider how it had occurred. Self-defense was the verdict.

Rogers had his own way of riding roughshod over opposing witnesses, in an era when restraints on lawyers were somewhat less strictly enforced than in later years. Often, he would ask a witness if it were not a fact that he was in the pay of the district attorney. When the witness indignantly denied the accusation, Rogers would then mention a name and ask if it was not true that the witness had been convicted under that alias in another state on some charge in "the year of 1904."

The witness would scream a denial, and Rogers would say: "My mistake. I meant 1905."

Another denial and Rogers would ask, "1906?" Yet another denial and Rogers would smile. "1907?"

The point was driven home to the jury that somehow the witness was unsavory, without the presentation of any facts to substantiate the implication.

One time, Rogers accused William J. Burns, founder of the Burns International Detective Agency, of pulling a sword out of a cane as he was cross-examining him. Rogers was standing near Burns and Burns shifted in the witness chair, causing the cane he carried to rise in the air a bit.

"Your Honor!" Rogers shouted. "The witness has a sword in that cane!"

Burns was stunned, too stunned to respond as Rogers continued: "Make him open that cane, Your Honor! Make him take out the sword and give it to the bailiff."

Burns surrendered his cane, finally finding words to deny the preposterous charge.

Rogers shrugged. "My mistake," he said. "But he does carry a sword in a cane that looks just like this one." Then Rogers glanced at the jury. He had scored points with a very silly charge.

Rogers was just as flamboyant in his private life as he was in court. He affected wine-red dressing gowns. In restaurants he selected his own steaks and mixed his own salads. He used perfume. By 1911, however, he was more a drinker than a bon vivant, but his reputation was still great enough that Clarence Darrow hired him as his main defense counsel when he was brought to trial in the aftermath of the Los Angeles Times bombing case, in which 21 persons had died. Darrow was accused of having his associate, Bert Franklin, offer a $5,000 bribe to a juror. Under pressure from Burns detectives, Franklin, a former law officer who had set up an agency to investigate prospective jurors, said he had done so on orders from Darrow.

The case reeked of frame-up, and Rogers jumped at the chance to defend the great Darrow. "I've been slipping somewhat," he told acquaintances, "and I need Darrow almost as much as he needs me. Selecting me to defend the nation's acknowledged premier criminal lawyer will eventually place me in Darrow's class."

As it was, Darrow got off, but it is a moot question as to who was responsible. Darrow and Rogers feuded constantly about courtroom tactics and the former became upset with Rogers because of his constant drinking and the fact that he acted like a lawyer who considered his client guilty. By the end of the trial, Darrow had taken over much of his own defense and made an eloquent 1 1/2 day summation in his own behalf that is generally credited with winning him an acquittal. Yet Rogers added a terse few sentences to the jury that obviously made a most telling point. He said:

Will you tell me how any sane, sensible man who knows anything about the law business—and this defendant has been in it for thirty-five years—could make himself go to a detective and say to him: just buy all the jurors you want. I put my whole life, my reputation, I put everything I have into your hands. I trust you absolutely. I never knew you until two or three months ago and I don't know much about you now. But there you are. Go to it.

That made for a solid one-two punch that brought victory, but the two lawyers parted less than friends. Thereafter, Rogers scored more courtroom wins but took some losses as well, especially when he was “on the sauce.”

Late in 1918 his second wife left him because of his drinking, the second spouse to do so, and the rest of the way was downhill. Sometimes, Rogers had funds after a legal victory but more often he did not. In one of his last notable wins, he cleared a man charged with willfully avoiding the draft during World War I. The man had gone to a professional nurse who was a scout for an optometrist who specialized in supplying glasses that weakened rather than improved the sight of wealthy cowards.

The optometrist and the nurse were tried along with the alleged draft dodger but the pair had their own counsel. When Rogers finished with the jury, they agreed with him that it was not his client's fault he went to an eye man who was so incompetent that he was fitted incorrectly. Why had he gone to the optometrist to get his vision improved so he could fight for his country. The jury cleared the defendant but convicted both the optometrist and the nurse.

In Rogers' last trial he lost his client to the gallows. A few days later, he was picked out of the gutter dead drunk and sent to an institution. When he came out, he opened a shabby little law office but was evicted for nonpayment of rent. In February 1922 Rogers died. He was living in a cheap lodging house on the edge of Los Angeles' Chinatown. A few minutes before he died, he had bummed a quarter from the house clerk to get a drink.

Rogers, George W. (1898–1958) hero and murderer

Few men have gone from such heights of heroism to depths of villainy as dramatically as George Rogers. He first achieved national fame when the luxury liner Morro Castle caught fire enroute back to New York from Havana, Cuba on September 8, 1934. One hundred thirty-four passengers perished. Rogers, the ship's radioman, sent the SOS that brought help and saved many lives, remaining at his post with flames licking close to him and his shoes actually starting to smoke. He suffered superficial but very painful burns. When Rogers returned to his hometown of Bayonne, N.J., he was greeted by a brass band, heaped with flowers, embraced by the mayor and presented with a $200 gold medal.

Rogers was hired by the Bayonne police force as an assistant to Lt. Vincent J. Doyle, chief of the police George Rogers (right) emerged as the hero in the Morro Castle tragedy, having to be dragged from his wireless key aboard the burning ship. He testified against William Warms (left), the acting captain, and the chief engineer, both of whom were sentenced to prison but subsequently had their verdicts reversed. Later evidence also pointed to Rogers as the real villain in the ship fire.

radio bureau. Four years later, he was on his way to prison after seriously wounding Doyle with a planted bomb in an effort to take over his job. Labeled a “psychopathic personality” by a psychiatrist, Rogers got 12 to 20 years. In 1942 he was released from prison because his skills as a radio technician were needed by the armed forces to aid the war effort. However, once the services got a look at Rogers’ record, they refused to take him. Nevertheless, the disgraced hero was permitted to remain on parole.

In sentencing Rogers for the attack on Lt. Doyle, the judge accused him of having “the mind of a fiend,” and after his release the former hero went about proving him right. In 1953 in Bayonne Rogers murdered 83-year-old William Hummel, to whom he owed $7,500, and Hummel’s 58-year-old unmarried daughter. Just before the killings, Hummel had been pressing him for the money because he was preparing to retire to Florida. Hummel had drawn his savings from a bank and had $2,400 in his home when he and Rogers had an argument about the debt. Rogers picked up a footstool and crushed the old man’s skull with it. He then went upstairs and did the same to Hummel’s daughter, who was unaware of what had happened.

Well-known to the Bayonne police, Rogers, who had been deeply in debt just before the murders, was quickly identified as the slayer of the Hummels when he went on a spending spree with the stolen $2,400. For the second time Rogers was sent to the New Jersey State Prison at Trenton, this time for life, which proved to be a little over four years. He died there of a heart attack on January 10, 1958. Obituary writers at the time felt obliged to repeat the facts about his heroism aboard the Morro Castle, but a 1972 study of the disaster, Shipwreck: The Strange Fate of the Morro Castle by Gordon Thomas and Max Morgan Witts, produced some very damning evidence which indicated that Rogers, the much-acclaimed hero, may well have been the villain behind it all. They suggested he had poisoned the ship’s captain and then started the fatal fire with a small time bomb. His supposed heroism at the radio, according to their version, had been nothing more than a cover-up.

Rogers, Mary Cecilia (1820–1841) murder victim

Twenty-one-year-old Mary Cecilia Rogers was a celebrated New York murder victim in 1841 who gained immortal fame as the model for the victim in Edgar Allan Poe’s classic story The Mystery of Marie Roget. Mary, a beautiful woman, worked as a clerk in a tobacco shop and it seemed that Poe and several other famous literary lights patronized the place just to exchange a few words or a smile with her. Among them were James Fenimore Cooper and Washington Irving. Fitz-Green Halleck was so taken with her that he wrote a poem to her loveliness.

On Sunday morning July 25, Mary left her mother’s boardinghouse on Nassau Street to visit her sister. Three days later, her body was found in the Hudson River near Hoboken. The case was never solved, although there were several theories about the murder. According to one popular version, Mary had been abducted, raped and strangled by one or more unknown assailants. Another theory had her going aboard a ferry to Hoboken with “a dark complexioned young man,” perhaps a naval officer, who choked her to death for some unexplained reason. Yet another theory was that she had died during an illegal abortion and her body had been dumped in the river. An autopsy performed by a coroner indicated she had been sexually attacked several times just prior to her death and before that time she had been “of chaste character.” Later, the coroner was to say the autopsy had been rushed and not performed under optimum conditions and that some of his findings might have been wrong. Exactly which ones it was never made clear.

Very little was revealed by the so-called police investigation of the affair. First, the New York police didn’t even want to investigate the murder because the body had been found in New Jersey and was thus none of their affair. New Jersey felt the body had simply been dumped there and it was New York’s problem. Such was the sorry state of the police system at the time. The city had no real crime-fighting forces. At night, the streets were patrolled by leatherheads, who were little more than night watchmen and not even very effective at that, earning a little over $1 a day. During the day protection was provided by roundsmen, who were unsuccessful stevedores, wagoneers, laborers and porters and certainly not criminologists. They got no salary at all, making their living from the fees they received serving legal papers and from the rewards they might get from robbery victims whose property they recovered. Murder cases got short shrift from the roundsmen since there was no profit in them unless the city or some private party posted a reward.

In the case of Mary Cecilia Rogers, the newspapers caused such a storm of protest that the roundsmen were forced to make an investigation. Not surprisingly, they made no arrests. The closest they came to a solution was bringing in for questioning a young married man who had picked up a girl, taken her to Staten Island, caused her to miss the last ferry back by manipulating her watch and then made some advances. The young lady spurned him, and he left her peevish with frustration. After the murder was revealed, he told a friend he feared the girl might have been Mary Cecilia

ROGER'S Barracks

Rogers and that he was fleeing the city because he didn't wish to get involved. He was apprehended and returned to New York, but the real lady of that misadventure came forward and cleared him, quite proud that the newspapers had duly informed their readers of her most honorable behavior.

A year after the murder Poe published Marie Roget, setting the story in Paris. He solved the Roget murder with some brilliant deductive processes that had little relevance to the Rogers case, although several of the characters were clearly copied from real life. Later on, Poe's editors appended a footnote to the story claiming that the author's version was fully confirmed in the Rogers case by two subsequent confessions. In fact, there never were any confessions worthy of belief. Over the years interest in the case was revived periodically whenever a principal or assumed principal died or otherwise came to public attention. When Mary's employer in the cigar store died, it was revealed that he had said he knew the identity of her killer. But it turned out Mary's ghost had been the source of his information and the octogenarian was more than a touch senile.

While the Mary Cecilia Rogers case remained unsolved, it had an important impact on New York. The stir over the lack of effective police protection and the inefficiency of the roundsman system sparked a reform movement. By 1845 the police force was entirely reconstituted. It did not become a totally efficient operation at once, but at least a start was made in the development of a professional police system.

Roger's Barracks underworld refuge and vice area

In the 1850s a diminutive Englishman from Yorkshire, Roger Plant, came up with the idea that what Chicago needed was the Compleat Underworld Refuge, which he set about establishing at the northeast corner of Wells and Monroe streets. He started with just a single two-story house and then expanded straight down the block, adding one rookery after another until he had what a journalist of the day called the "very core of corruption." By the mid-1860s Plant's dives lined both sides of the street for almost a block. The police came to call the conglomeration Roger's Barracks. Journalist Frederick Francis Cook described it as "one of the most talked about if not actually one of the wickedest places on the continent" and as "a refuge for the very nethermost strata of the underworld—the refuse of the Bridewell."

A tunnel led from Roger's Barracks under Wells Street to the various underworld strongholds between that street and the Chicago River. All sorts of stolen goods were funneled through it and out the various dives. It was said that the underworld's first bomb was manufactured in a room in the barracks, leading the Chicago Times to comment in December 1870, "Such a discovery in a civilized community seems almost incredible, but there is not the slightest doubt of its truth."

Plant collected exorbitant rents for making his premises available for such nefarious purposes, but he also garnered considerable revenues from so-called straight rackets, including dance halls, brothels and deadfalls, i.e., saloons that specialized in robbing strangers. Special cubicles were rented out to streetwalkers, male degenerates and procurers, who would have young girls raped in the cells by a half-dozen men as a preparation for their assignment to bordellos.

Plant weighed barely over 100 pounds but was known as a vicious fighter. Although always armed with knife, pistol and bludgeon, his favorite weapon was his own teeth, which he would readily use on a foe's ears or nose with maiming efficiency. The only person Plant could not control was his wife, a fearsome creature of 250 pounds who would often pick him up with one hand and spank him with the other. Mrs. Plant ran the family's brothel interests and lent a hand herself during peak hours. She also produced an estimated 15 children, all of whom were cunning little rascals credited by journalists with being able to pick a pocket almost before they could walk.

Roger's Barracks was seldom bothered by the police because, as Cook recorded, "Roger paid his toll with exemplary regularity." By 1870 Plant had collected a fortune, and he abruptly shuttered all his establishments and moved to the country to become a gentleman of leisure and patron of the turf. The Plant children, however, appear to have carried on the criminal tradition of the family, several finding their way onto the police blotters for robbery and sundry other crimes while in their teens. In 1894 English journalist William T. Stead published the Black List of Chicago property, which named Roger Plant, Jr., as the operator of three saloons and two bordellos and listed two sisters, Daisy and Kitty Plant, as the operators of adjoining brothels on South Clark Street. It was said that a secret passage allowed harlots to pass from one of these establishments to the other as needed and that it was quite possible a customer venturing from one place to the next might well find himself being entertained by the same female clad in a different colored wig.

Roosevelt, Theodore (1858–1919) would-be assassination victim

On October 14, 1912 Theodore Roosevelt, then running for the presidency as the Bull Moose candidate, left a dinner at Milwaukee's Hotel Gilpatrick to deliver a campaign speech at the Milwaukee Auditorium. As he entered an open car, a plump, short little man with receding light brown hair stepped to within six feet of him and fired a .38 Police Positive. The bullet hit Roosevelt in the chest, and he lurched into the backseat of the car. When the assailant leveled his gun for a second shot, an associate of Roosevelt, Elbert E. Martin, downed him with a flying tackle. Several policemen pounced on the would-be assassin and dragged him off.

Fortunately for Roosevelt, the bullet had penetrated a metal spectacles case in his breast pocket and gone through a 50-page speech manuscript that had been folded twice. It had then smashed into a rib but most of its lethal force had already been spent.

Roosevelt's assailant was a 36-year-old ex-saloon owner named John Nepomuk Schrank, who was suffering from a severe mental illness. On September 15, 1901, the day after William McKinley had died of an assassin's bullet and Roosevelt succeeded to the presidency, Schrank dreamed that McKinley's ghost came to him and accused Roosevelt of the murder. From that day on, Schrank hated Roosevelt, and when Roosevelt dared to run for what Schrank considered to be a third term, he loathed him even more. Then one night in 1912 McKinley's ghost reappeared in Schrank's dreams and begged him not to let a "murderer" become president. Schrank determined to kill Roosevelt, and he left his home in New York and followed the candidate around the country. He got close enough in Chicago and Chattanooga to get in a shot, but he lost his nerve. In Milwaukee his nerve did not fail him.

The bullet had entered Roosevelt's chest so deeply that doctors decided against removing it and the ex-president carried it in his body until his death from natural causes in 1919. He said the bullet bothered him no more than if he were carrying it in his vest pocket. Schrank was declared insane and spent the rest of his life in mental institutions in Wisconsin. When Theodore Roosevelt died, Schrank said he was sorry because "he was a great American." However, when Franklin Delano Roosevelt ran for a third term in 1940, Schrank was enraged. He told doctors that if he were free he would shoot this Roosevelt also. Schrank died of a heart ailment on September 15, 1943, exactly 42 years after he first dreamed of McKinley's ghost.

Roosevelt, Theodore (1858–1919) New York police commissioner

Theodore Roosevelt's reputation as a reformer originated during his three years as a police commissioner in New York City, from 1895 to 1897. He was instrumental in rooting out departmental corruption in the entrenched, politically protected regimes of Chief Inspector Alexander S. Williams and Big Bill Devery, who for a time even held the post of chief of police. Roosevelt won acclaim for starting the process of promotion based on merit rather than politics, a revolutionary idea in 19th century New York. He also pioneered a bicycle squad, a telephonic communications system and special training for new recruits, another unheard-of procedure. Later, Roosevelt lent powerful support to the Pennsylvania State Constabulary, which was to become the model for modern state police organizations. In 1908, as president, he set up the Bureau of Investigation, the forerunner of the FBI.

An admirer of men of action, Roosevelt made some lamentable mistakes, for example, naming Pat Garrett, the killer of Billy the Kid, to the post of customs collector. Garrett was murdered in 1908. In 1905 he had tried to appoint the aging Bat Masterson to the post of U.S. marshal for the Oklahoma Territory. Masterson, who realized the president did not understand that an era had ended, declined the offer as diplomatically as possible. "I am not the man for the job," he wrote Roosevelt, ". . . and if I were marshal some youngster would try to put me out because of my reputation. I would be bait for grown-up kids who had fed on dime novels. I would have to kill or be killed. No sense to that. I have taken my guns off, and I don't ever want to put them on again."

Rose, Della (1873–?) dance hall girl and Wild Bunch companion

Della Rose was more of a hard-riding lass than Etta Place, the companion of Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid (Harry Longbaugh). She shared a sleeping bag with many a Hole-in-the-Waller after her husband, real or assumed, Edward Bullion, brought her to the outlaw hideout in 1889.

Della was a veteran dance hall girl from the Wyoming Territory. Her real given name was Laura, and she had grown up near Austin, Tex. She had six brothers, at least two of them rustlers, and three sisters. Her mother was an industrious, God-fearing ranch widow who in one letter complained she could not cope with her litter. "I can't stand another minute of it," she wrote Laura, whom she regarded as the prize of the brood, perhaps indicating the extent of her ordeal.

Shortly after taking up residence in the Hole, Della started making the rounds with the boys, Bullion either disappearing or getting lost in the shuffle. Around 1896 she made a permanent alliance with a bank robber named Bill Carver, who had recently joined up with the Wild Bunch. Thereafter, she and Carver rode side by side when the gang went out on raids. This happy partnership ended abruptly in April 1901, when Carver was killed in Sonora, Tex.

Della grieved suitably for some weeks before attaching herself to another Buncher, the Tall Texan, Ben Kilpatrick. This romance was definitely the real thing, but it was to last only until November of that year, when she and Kilpatrick were caught in a St. Louis hotel room with $7,000, what was left of their share of the loot from a Wild Bunch train robbery in Montana. Kilpatrick got sentenced to 15 years and Della to five. Naturally, the Rose of the Bunch promised the Tall Texan she would be waiting for him upon his release. That turned out to be in 1911, but by that time Della Rose had just faded away.

Rose Man of Sing Sing (1858–1930) editor and murderer

Warden Lewis E. Lawes once described murderer Charles Chapin as “among the outstanding personalities of Sing Sing’s prison population.” Chapin has gone down in prison folklore as the Rose Man of Sing Sing. For 20 years before he entered prison, Chapin was known as the most autocratic and tyrannical city editor in the New York newspaper industry, famed as the New York Evening World executive who would fire a reporter on Christmas Eve. Once when his men uncovered a murder that had been labeled an accident, he chortled that it had “been a good day. . . . I’ve started a man on the way to the electric chair.”

Staffers repaid Chapin in kind. When he was reported as too ill to come to work one day, a member of his staff, reporter Irvin S. Cobb, volunteered, “I hope it’s nothing trivial.”

Chapin loved to hobnob with the extremely wealthy and lived far beyond his means; early in his life he ran through $50,000 left to him by his great-uncle, Russell Sage, the famous Wall Street financier. Chapin lost far more than he could afford in the stock market, and in the summer of 1917 he was faced with a mountain of debt. He was also not in the best of health and worried about leaving his wife, Nellie Beebe, penniless. He had been married to her for 35 years and had been an affectionate, though neither a faithful nor a particularly thoughtful, husband.

Chapin took his wife on a trip to Washington, D.C. after borrowing a revolver from an aide to the New York City police commissioner. He planned to put a gardenia in his buttonhole, escort his wife to a musical show and then kill her and himself. However, he lost his nerve and the couple returned to New York. Somehow, Chapin survived another year on his job while his financial situation worsened. He had owned a car, a yacht, even a couple of race horses, but they were all gone now. He managed to hold off creditors only by borrowing heavily from his employer, Joseph Pulitzer.

Finally, one night in September 1918 he shot Mrs. Chapin in her sleep, putting the revolver to her head as they lay in bed together. In the morning Chapin dressed and set off for Central Park, where he was determined to shoot himself. Instead, he wound up the next day in Prospect Park reading his own press notices after his wife’s body had been found. Then he surrendered, telling police: “This is the first time in five years that I have been happy. The sooner I go to the electric chair the better.”

Chapin did not get the chair but rather 20 years to life in Sing Sing, where he was to become a most unusual prisoner. He was made editor of the prison newspaper, The Star of Hope, later called The Bulletin. It became a prison version of the flamboyant World, filled with spicy confessions of Sing Sing inmates. Among the typical stories was one of a bigamist named Wilson who had had seven wives at the same time. Chapin urged Wilson to keep his tale “heavy on the human interest; tell ’em all about love.” Chapin headlined the account, “The Man with the Seven Wives.” Wilson told too much and a stir was created in Albany, the state capital. The Bulletin folded, and Chapin was out of his last editorial job. However, he claimed proudly that under his tenure circulation of the prison newspaper had soared.

Warden Lawes kept a file of letters he received about Chapin, few of which were favorable. One read:

I knew Mr. Chapin long and from a certain angle intimately in the years he was at the New York World. That is, I knew intimately the anguished stories of the hundreds and thousands of young writers whose lives he made a living hell. He was the worst curse our reportorial craft ever enjoyed. I used to think him a sort of devil sitting on enthroned power in the World office and making Park Row gutters flow red with the blood of ambitious young men. If you enjoy him I hope you keep him long and carefully.

Yet over the years Lawes and his wife and, indeed, the inmates of the prison saw a different Chapin. Although for a time despondent at losing his prison newspaper, he came to the warden with another suggestion, asking that he be allowed to replace the gravel, cinders and crushed rock on some of the prison grounds with “a little garden.” Lawes agreed but said there were no funds available. That was no problem for Chapin.

He wrote to garden magazines and soon bone meal, fertilizer, rose plants, tulip bulbs and hundreds of pounds of seed rained down on Sing Sing from manufacturers and suppliers. Chapin grew rose plants, cannas and dahlias all over the prison, even around the death house. Both Ruth Snyder and Judd Gray paused in turn to inhale the fragrance of Chapin's roses before entering the death house in 1928.

Some of Chapin's old coworkers visited him in prison and stared in disbelief at the gardens of the now-famed Rose Man of Sing Sing. Cobb, Arthur Brisbane and others made the trek up the Hudson to visit and marvel at the new Chapin, a man whom scores of convicts now called Uncle Charlie. Horticulturists visited Sing Sing to view Chapin's work. So did Adolph Lewisohn, the philanthropist, who then sent a truck load of plants from his own gardens.

Then in 1930, while a new drainage system was being installed in the prison, a steam shovel gutted much of Chapin's beloved gardens. In 20,000 Years in Sing Sing Lawes wrote: "I think it affected him deeply. He was never the same. He was suddenly the helpless invalid, unable to carry on."

Chapin died on December 13, 1930. His last words to Lawes were: "I want to die. I want to get it over with."

Lawes got scores of letters from journalists around the country who had once served under Chapin. After his death, none were critical of him. One wrote, "As an old Evening World man who owes whatever success he has attained to the fact that he received his early training under the greatest newspaper general in the world, I send you this word in memory of Charles Chapin."

Rose of Cimarron western outlaw heroine

Fabled in story and song, the Rose of Cimarron provided sundry joys and a touch of glamour to the Oklahoma Territory's Doolin gang. She became a legendary figure following the Battle of Ingalls on September 1, 1893 by going to the aid of her lover, Bitter Creek Newcomb, after he had been downed with a leg wound. Most sources claim she dashed to his side with a new supply of ammunition and/or shielded his body with her own as lawmen tried to finish him off. According to other reports, she picked up a gun and covered Bitter Creek as he hobbled to safety. There are many more versions, some who were there in the thick of the fighting even contending that there was no woman on the scene at all.

Such doubts have never dampened the enthusiasm of the myth makers and balladeers, and they have trotted forth several likely females as the genuine Rose. One was named Rose O'Leary, who has been characterized variously as a tough Western gun moll or a tender angel of mercy. Then again, the Rose of Cimarron was said to have been Rosa Dunn, who at least had some connection with the Doolin gang and supposedly lost her virtue to Bitter Creek Newcomb when she was 12, 13, 14 or 15 years old or thereabouts, according to various chroniclers.

Bitter Creek Newcomb himself gave some credence to the heart-rending tale of the Rose of Cimarron when, some 20 months after the gunfight, on May 2, 1895, the much-hunted outlaw returned to the Dunn Ranch on the Cimarron River to visit with Rosa. Here, the tender tale ends in harsh reality. Bitter Creek was shot dead by Rosa's brothers, who then claimed the $5,000 reward on his head. Rosa went off and married another beau.

Roselli, John (1905–1976) Mafia leader

Like his mentor, Chicago mafia boss Sam Giancana, John Roselli was tied closely, by his own admission, to CIA plans to assassinate Fidel Castro of Cuba, who had closed down the mob's gambling operations in Havana upon taking power. Roselli at the time was running the swank Sans Souci gambling casino in that city. In July 1975 he testified before a special hearing of the Senate Intelligence Committee that he and Giancana had been recruited to kill the Cuban leader, something he looked upon as a "patriotic" endeavor. According to his testimony, both poisoned pills and poisoned cigars had been considered by the CIA, but for some reason the mobsters had bungled the mission. Roselli's testimony came five days after Giancana was murdered in his Oak Park, Ill. home. Apparently, Roselli felt he was safe about implicating the CIA but refused to discuss Mafia matters.

Being one of the more adventurous of the Mafia leaders, Roselli had long been successful at carrying off daring missions. In the late 1930s Roselli, as the Chicago mob's Hollywood man, had extorted $1 million from movie companies by threatening to have a Mafia-controlled stagehands union slow down production. He did three years in prison for that caper but remained a Hollywood luminary, helping to produce some crime films, such as He Walked by Night. Despite his past, Roselli made it into the Friars Club, much to the regret of a number of other members. In 1968 he and four others were convicted of swindling a number of Friars, including singer Tony Martin and comedians Phil Silvers and Zeppo Marx, out of some $400,000 in a typical Mafia crooked card game. Observers on an upper floor used peepholes to read the cards the players were holding; they then signaled key information to a confederate in the game, who picked up the messages on equipment he wore in a girdle under his clothes.

ROSS, Charles Brewster

After his CIA testimony Roselli laughed at his lawyer's advice to hire a bodyguard. He still apparently was supervising the Chicago mob's gambling interests while living quietly in Plantation, Fla. "Who would want to kill an old man like me?" he said. Whoever did went about it in the classic manner. Sometime in the summer of 1976, he was killed and his body was sealed in an empty 55-gallon oil drum. Heavy chains were wrapped around the drum and holes punched in its sides. It was dumped in the waters off Florida and should have stayed down indefinitely, but decomposition of the body produced gases that lifted the drum to the surface.

Ross, Charles Brewster (1870–?) kidnapping victim

When four-year-old Charley Ross was taken from his Philadelphia home on July 1, 1874 and held for ransom, it was the first case of this type to achieve nationwide notoriety; "poor little Charley Ross" soon became a household phrase.

The boy's wealthy father, Christian K. Ross, received a note demanding $20,000 and immediately contacted the police, although he had been cautioned

"What happened to poor Charley Ross?" became one of the most haunting and persistent questions of the late 19th century.

William Mosher and Joey Douglas were both shot in a burglary attempt in Brooklyn. Before dying, Mosher admitted the pair had been involved in the Ross kidnapping, but he would not reveal the whereabouts of the child.

not to. Ross then entered into tortuous negotiations with the kidnapers, who set up three separate meetings over the next few months to collect the ransom. The criminals did not keep any of these appointments, apparently because they correctly suspected the police had set traps.

Meanwhile, New York City police identified a known criminal, William Mosher, as one of the kidnapers by matching his handwriting with that on the ransom notes. On the night of December 13, 1874, Mosher and another notorious burglar, Joey Douglass, were both fatally wounded while attempting a burglary in Brooklyn. Before dying, Mosher admitted the kidnapping and named Douglass as an accomplice. He would not reveal the whereabouts of the child, however. Suspicion now centered on William Westervelt, an ex-New York policeman with an unsavory reputation. Westervelt was soon identified as the man seen near the Ross home before the crime who had asked numerous questions about the financial worth of Christian K. Ross. Despite this evidence, Westervelt would admit nothing about the kidnapping, even after being found guilty of charges related to the abduction and sentenced to seven years.

Upon his release Westervelt faded into obscurity, but the Ross case would not, despite underworld rumors that Westervelt had definitely been in charge of holding the child and, as the hunt had intensified, had panicked and drowned the boy in the East River. The Ross family spent the next 20 years tracking down leads, spending a fortune on some 500 separate journeys. But the era's most haunting question, "What happened to poor little Charley Ross?" remained unanswered.

Ross, Mrs. Hannah (c. 1880s) medium

Fake spirit mediums have used many tricks to make “spirits” appear before gullible victims, but none have matched the feat of a noted Boston medium, Mrs. Hannah Ross, in 1887. She actually seemed to make a long-dead baby materialize literally in the flesh. Mrs. Ross would seat herself in a cabinet in a darkened room and call the baby back from the beyond, and sure enough the baby’s image would appear at the front of the cabinet. The grieving and awestruck parents of a departed baby would be able not only to see their baby but touch and kiss it as well. The baby would actually appear to be alive. And for good reason, as reporters from a Boston newspaper and the police discovered when they uncovered Mrs. Ross’ act. She had a baby’s face painted on her breast and would poke her breast through a slit in the curtain on the cabinet. With this exposure of her racket, Mrs. Ross decamped from the Boston area, undoubtedly to ply her trade in another venue.

Rothstein, Arnold (1882–1928) gambler and fixer

He was Mr. Big, the Brain, the Big Bankroll, the Man Uptown and the Fixer. Arnold Rothstein was all of that and more, the man to see on Broadway for about a decade and a half until his murder in 1928. Operating strictly in the background, Rothstein may well have been the leading criminal in America at the time, but he always managed to avoid trouble with the law. At various times he bankrolled the operations of such criminal kingpins as Waxey Gordon and Legs Diamond, and he was one of the early tutors of such young underworld types as Lucky Luciano, Meyer Lansky and Frank Costello. He preached to them the virtues of forming alliances independent of ethnic consideration and of remaining behind the scenes to pull the strings and, above all, taught them the ins and outs of the political fix.

Rothstein was known on Broadway as the man who could fix anything. His political and police contacts were the best and he could clear almost any nefarious activity with the right powers. He proved his mettle during Prohibition, when for a fee he would fix almost any bootlegging rap. He was close to Tammany boss Charley Murphy and his heirs. In fact, during the Rothstein years, of the 6,902 liquor-related cases that went before the New York courts, 400 never made it to trial and another 6,074 were dismissed. The largest individual credit for these incredible statistics went, of course, to A. R., as knowing court observers referred to Rothstein.

For a time A. R. was the biggest illegal importer of Scotch whiskey in the country, an activity he often pursued in partnership with Charles A. Stoneham, sportsman and owner of the New York Giants baseball team. Baseball was, in a manner of speaking, one of Rothstein’s passions, especially considering his involvement in the so-called Black Sox Scandal in 1919, when several players of the Chicago White Sox succeeded in throwing the World Series to the underdog Cincinnati Reds. It has never been clear whether Rothstein financed the big bribe and betting coup through ex-featherweight boxing champion Abe Attell or turned down the deal when it was offered to him and then, knowing the fix was in, simply bet $60,000 on Cincinnati and won $270,000.

That was always A. R.’s way—staying in the background while taking a major portion of the loot. Realizing early in Prohibition that bootlegging was too big to be dominated by one man or one gang, he took control of the importing racket, the safest part of the business and one in which he could also insulate himself from arrest. He closed deals with European distilleries and made himself immune to gangland assassination—if he was killed, the flow of good liquor would stop. A. R. made himself too valuable to be allowed to die.

He kept the various gangs happy by cutting all of them in for a share of the supplies, especially filling the needs of Luciano and his young associates. Luciano saw firsthand how Rothstein separated himself from personal involvement and paid heed to Rothstein’s lectures on the need to remain less visible. It was A. R. who got Luciano to drop the loud dress, which marked, for example, members of Chicago’s Capone mob, in favor of the refined attire of a gentleman. It was no simple task. Once, Rothstein told Luciano, “I want you to wear something conservative and elegant, made by a genteel tailor.”

Luciano was taken aback. “What the hell are you talkin’ about?” he said. “My tailor’s a Catholic.”

Still, Luciano paid Rothstein a noteworthy compliment. “If Arnold had lived a little longer, he could’ve made me pretty elegant; he was the best etiquette teacher a guy could ever have—real smooth.”

By the mid-1920s Rothstein was probably completely out of the booze racket—selling out for a huge sum—save perhaps for lending money to a bootlegging operation or arranging a fix. He immersed himself in his first love, gambling, operating a number of betting parlors in many of the city’s best speakeasies.

For some reason Rothstein seemed to come apart in 1928. Physically, he started to deteriorate, and as a gambler, he suddenly became a heavy loser. From September 8 to 10 A. R. took part in a fabulous poker game with two gamblers from California, Nigger Nate Raymond and Titanic Thompson, and lost $320,000. The story shocked Broadway but not nearly as much as the news that Rothstein then refused to pay up, claiming the game had been fixed. The word that A. R. was welching really shook up the town.

ROTTEN apple theory

On November 4, 1928 Rothstein sat in Lindy's restaurant making election bets. He wagered almost $600,000 that Herbert Hoover would beat Al Smith and that Franklin Roosevelt would win the governorship. In a few days he would have collected more than enough to pay off his poker losses, and indeed, he could have anyway, since he held assets, mostly in real estate, totaling $3 million. In any event, later that night A. R. was shot to death at the Park Central Hotel.

The prime suspects were Thompson and Raymond. But both of them had perfect alibis and were never prosecuted. Yet on Broadway there was no doubt who had been behind Rothstein's murder.

Rotten apple theory police corruption

Following any exposure of widespread police corruption a standard defense offered is that such evildoing is the work of no more than "a few rotten apples" in an otherwise good barrel. However, most major investigations of police corruption have found that the opposite was true.

In New York the Lexow Committee of 1894–95 discovered graft to be part of the system itself rather than the acts of individual wrongdoers. A generation later, the Seabury Investigation reached the same conclusion. In 1950 the Kefauver Committee revealed an unchanging pattern of graft and payoffs by criminals to law enforcement officials. Twenty years later, New York's Knapp Commission found police corruption widespread instead of merely the product of a few rotten apples. The commission found almost all policemen accepted various favors as a "natural prerequisite of the job." Some officers were found to be "grass eaters," i.e., they took payoffs under the right circumstances, and others "meat eaters," i.e., they aggressively sought out shakedown situations. Within the Narcotics Division extortion had been developed to a fine art, with a number of officers automatically sharing in a "score" whenever a drug dealer was victimized. Indeed, the general understanding among Greenwich Village dealers was that a bust could be "squared" by the police appropriating two-thirds of a pusher's inventory and allowing him to keep one-third. The police share was then funneled back into trade through other pushers. As has generally been the case, gambling payoffs involved the most-sophisticated system, with specific amounts paid to individual officers according to rank.

The New York story has been constantly retold elsewhere. In 1973 the Police Foundation, attempting to measure the extent of police corruption throughout the country, ordered a clipping service survey. In two months, clippings accumulated from 30 states reported allegations of corruption at all levels, in small-town, suburban, big-city, county and state police forces. In Philadelphia it was reported that police felt they were "operating in a world where 'notes' are constantly floating about, and only the stupid, the naive, and the fainthearted are unwilling to allow some of them to stick to their fingers."

Not unreasonably, police sometimes attempt to justify corruption by pointing out that police graft is a trifling part of a pattern that includes much greater graft taking by public officials in such fields as building permits, liquor licenses, zoning ordinances, franchises, condemnation cases, land and waterfront leases and the like. It is clear that elimination of police corruption would require a general improvement of ethics at all levels of public government.

Rough and Ready, California lawless mining town

Rough and Ready was a wild mining camp in California's Grass Valley that more than lived up to its name. It was probably the most rebellious of the gold towns that sprang up in the California Mother Lode country in 1849.

The Rough and Readyites believed in only two things: gold and the gun. Nothing took precedence over the former. On one occasion the townspeople had gathered on the local cemetery hill to bury a recently departed citizen when the gravedigger revealed a high amount of "color." The burial service was instantly forgotten as the mourners hustled about staking out claims amid the graves and heaving out corpses that interfered with their hunt for gold.

In 1850, before the Civil War, Rough and Ready "seceded" from the Union. What upset the populace was not the slavery issue but rather the fact that nearby Nevada City had been named the seat of Nevada County, a distinction Rough and Ready had wanted. To show their displeasure, the citizens drove all federal employees out of town, destroyed the post office and all its mail and burned all governmental furnishings. Eventually, the Rough and Readyites got over their pique and accepted the return of federal authority. The U.S. Post Office Department, however, was not about to let bygones be bygones and refused to furnish the town with a mail-handling facility for an entire century, finally relenting in 1954.

roundsmen early detectives

The first nighttime police protection in American cities was provided by watchmen, who in most places were referred to as leatherheads because of the leather helmets they wore. These leatherheads were only capable of watching property and perhaps apprehending a criminal in the performance of a crime. Solving crimes was supposed to be the work of the day men, or roundsmen, as they were called. These men were considered detectives, or plainclothesmen in the sense that they did not wear helmets that would have identified them as police officers. But they certainly were not detectives in the modern sense of the word, being seldom able to solve a real crime and, in fact, having little incentive to do so.

The average roundsman was no more than an unsuccessful stevedore, porter, cartman or laborer, and he drew no pay. While a leatherhead was paid about $1 a night, a roundsman was expected to earn his keep strictly from the fees he garnered for serving legal papers and from rewards posted by citizens for the return of stolen property. But since roundsmen rarely solved crimes, collecting such rewards by legitimate means proved difficult. Most roundsmen overcame their problem by forming alliances with gangs or individual thieves. First, the criminals would steal some goods and then the victim would post a reward for the return of the loot. The roundsman would magically recover the goods and collect the reward, which he would then split with the thieves. This, to a very large extent, was the basis of law and order in the 18th and 19th century in most American cities.

Under such a system the crime of murder got a low priority since rewards were rarely posted in such cases and someone would have to be arrested. In that era most murderers who were caught either were captured in the commission of their crime or had murdered someone from a family that could afford to post a reward. Occasionally, a case got enough publicity to make its solution worthwhile. After all, if a roundsman could find a murderer, an unlikely prospect, he might be counted on to serve a summons on some elusive bounder.

When a crime did receive widespread publicity, it often served to underscore the incompetence of the roundsmen. Such was the case in the famous New York murder of Mary Cecilia Rogers in 1841, an incident later immortalized in American literature when Edgar Allan Poe used it as the basis of his brilliant story The Murder of Marie Roget. Poe solved his mythical case; the New York authorities failed miserably with the real one. The public at last came to understand that the roundsmen system hardly ensured the maintenance of law and order, and by 1845 reformers had entirely revamped the police force. Other cities copied the New York system and the day of the modern policeman dawned as the era of the roundsmen dimmed.

Rubinstein, Serge (1909–1955) financier and murder victim

In 1955 financial wizard and convicted draft dodger Serge Rubinstein was not considered a very likable person. In fact, the government was trying to deport him as an undesirable. Someone considered him even less desirable and on January 27 bound and strangled him to death in his luxurious five-story home on New York's Fifth Avenue.

A White Russian émigré, he burst upon the American scene a few years before World War II as the enfant terrible of the financial world and fattened an already swollen personal fortune by destroying, through devious means, a succession of companies and their stockholders. He was forced to take time from that unsavory activity to do 2 1/2 years in prison for failure to serve in the army during World War II, having falsely claimed Portuguese citizenship.

Upon his release Rubinstein went right back to his financial double-dealing. In 1949 he was indicted for stock fraud, mail fraud and violation of the Securities Acts. It was charged that he had made $3 million profit by buying Panhandle Producing and Refining stock at less than an average of $2 a share, driving the price up with false rumors and having the company pay dividends it hadn't earned and then, after he had liquidated his holdings, selling short when the public found out the truth and the stock started to fall. After a vigorous two-year battle, Rubinstein was acquitted of stock fraud and was ready for more capers.

He also led the life of a man-about-Manhattan, recruiting a large selection of lady friends, most of whom had keys to his home and whom he would often summon in the middle of the night to make a quick visit.

Early on the morning of January 27, 1955, Rubinstein returned home with a blonde he had taken to dinner. After a short time the blonde left. Apparently, Rubinstein read for a while and then telephoned another blonde acquaintance and asked her to come over. The woman, roused from her sleep, said she was too tired.

Excluding his murderer or murderers, the second blonde was the last person Rubinstein spoke to in his life. A little after 8 A.M. Rubinstein's butler brought a breakfast tray to his bedroom and found him dead. Clad in black silk mandarin pajamas, he lay sprawled on his back, his hands and feet bound with Venetian-blind cord. Strips of wide adhesive tape were plastered across his mouth and wound around his throat. It was obvious he had been strangled and the early theory was that the adhesive tape had done the job, perhaps inadvertently. At first, it was thought Rubinstein had been the victim of a kidnap attempt and had been killed in error. However, the autopsy showed he had died by manual strangulation. He had been throttled by someone with powerful hands.

Police developed many theories. One postulated that business enemies had been responsible; another claimed it had been “a mob job—a syndicate job”; yet another attributed the murder to a robbery attempt gone awry. The previous August, Rubinstein had filed charges against three men for attempting to extort $535,000 from him. In all, the police questioned literally thousands of persons whose names Rubinstein had written in several loose-leaf notebooks. It appeared he was in the habit of writing down the name of every person he met who might ever be useful to him, either for business or pleasure. Business contacts, friends, enemies, associates, prison mates and girlfriends, both past and present, were hauled in and interrogated, all to be caught in the limelight of intensive newspaper coverage.

The more sensational newspapers had a field day with several of the murdered man’s lady friends because of his written comments about them or because of the fact that he seemed to have kept a number of them under surveillance. In one case Rubinstein had even hidden a small battery-operated transmitter under a woman’s bed to record her bedside conversations. Later, he had confronted her with the recording of her amorous conversation with a date. When the story of the recorder broke in the newspapers, the girl said, with a certain ingenuousness, “Now everyone in New York knows my bed squeaks.”

Despite a flurry of investigative activity, the murder remained unsolved.

rub-out slang for a killing

Although well known as the underworld term for gangster killings, the word “rub-out” goes back much further in American history. According to Samuel Eliot Morison’s The Oxford History of the American People, the term was used by white trappers in the early 1800s, with the same meaning it has today. Presumably, since rub-out connotes a certain disdain or lack of respect for the victim, it may be that it was first applied to the killing of Indians.

Ruby, Jack (1911–1967) killer of Lee Harvey Oswald

Even as the nation was still in shock over the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, millions watched on television as the president’s accused killer, Lee Harvey Oswald, was shot to death in the Dallas, Tex. city jail on November 24, 1963. The murderer was 52-year-old Jacob Rubenstein, better known as Jack Ruby, a local nightclub operator.

Oswald, flanked by lawmen, was being escorted through the basement of the municipal building to a waiting armored truck that was to take him to the county jail when Ruby stepped out from a cluster of newsmen, thrust a snub-nosed .38-caliber revolver at Oswald’s left side and fired a single shot. Clutching his side, Oswald slumped to the concrete floor, writhing in pain. He lost consciousness without saying a word and 86 minutes later, at 1:07 P.M., he died while undergoing emergency surgery.

Ruby was described as an ardent admirer of President Kennedy and his family who had become distraught about his murder. In the ensuing controversy over the assassination and whether or not Oswald had acted alone, as the Warren Commission later found, Ruby was pictured as a player involved in an intricate plot to kill Kennedy and, later, to silence Oswald, who may have been the actual killer or merely a scapegoat. Despite several scenarios arriving at these various conclusions, no positive link between Oswald and Ruby has ever been established.

Ruby was convicted of Oswald’s murder. While awaiting a retrial on appeal, he was transferred in December 1966 to a hospital where he was found to be suffering from cancer. He died the following January 3 of a blood clot in his lung.

That same day a three-minute conversation between Ruby and his brother Earl tape-recorded in the hospital in December was made public. In it Ruby said he had known that Oswald was going to be transferred to the county jail the morning of November 24 but added that his presence at the jail was due to his having made an “illegal turn” behind a bus that put him in the jail parking lot. He said he had no recollection of the moment he shot Oswald. “It happened in such a blur . . . before I knew it . . . the officers had me on the ground.”

Ruby angrily denied a rumor that he had met Oswald at his nightclub before the assassination, saying, “It’s fabrication.” He told his brother he always carried a gun because of various altercations he had had in his club and because he carried fairly large amounts of cash at times.

Ruby’s demand that he be given a lie detector test to prove he had acted alone in the murder of Oswald was denied because, it was said, his physical condition would make such a test valueless.

Rudabaugh, Dave (1841–1886) western outlaw

One of the few outlaws ever to ride with Billy the Kid on a more or less equal basis, Dave Rudabaugh began his criminal career while still in his teens, first in his native Missouri and then in Kansas. In the 1870s, while doing a bit of cattle rustling and highway robbery, Rudabaugh hit on a lucrative career holding up the construction-gang pay trains of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad. Finally tracked down in 1878 through combined manhunts led by Wyatt Earp and Bat Masterson, Rudabaugh won his freedom by implicating his accomplices and then moved on to Texas and the New Mexico Territory. Together with Billy Wilson, a Texas outlaw who later won a presidential pardon from Theodore Roosevelt and lived out his days as a lawman, Rudabaugh formed the Dodge City gang, committing a number of crimes in Texas and the New Mexico Territory.

In 1880 Rudabaugh joined up with Billy the Kid, considering himself the Kid's equal. Both were captured together at Stinking Springs, New Mexico Territory, in December 1880, and both were to make separate escapes, the Kid eventually being killed by Sheriff Pat Garrett. Rudabaugh was sentenced to 40 years imprisonment, but an old murder indictment was still pending against him and he faced the possibility of being hanged. He solved that problem by tunneling his way out of jail in San Miguel on December 3, 1881.

Crossing the border into Mexico, Rudabaugh organized a gang of gringos and Mexicans that terrorized the province of Chihuahua for the next five years. On February 19, 1886, he and his band made the mistake of trying to victimize the village of Parral, whose citizens, in an uncommon display of resistance, met them with gunfire. Rudabaugh was shot dead. In a subsequent town fiesta, his head was cut off and stuck up on a pole.

Rudabaugh, like many other criminals in American history, was resurrected by the popular imagination. In his case, the tale was that just one of his men had been killed in Parral and that he had returned north of the border and lived out his days as an honest rancher in Oregon. Similar stories have also been told about Jesse James and John Dillinger, among others.

Ruef, Abraham (1864–1936) political boss

Abe Ruef, the political boss of San Francisco in the early 1900s, ran his domain as a "wide open city" that rivaled such bastions of sin and corruption as New Orleans and Chicago.

Born of moderately wealthy French-Jewish parents, Ruef was a brilliant student, graduating with high honors from the University of California at age 18. He earned a law degree and then entered politics as an enthusiastic Republican reformer. However, witnessing the depredations of machine rule during the period of the Southern Pacific Railroad's domination of California, he soon lost his reformer zeal and turned opportunist.

In 1901 Ruef gained leadership of the newly formed Union Labor Party and seized control of the city government, installing musician union head Eugene E. Schmitz as mayor. Then the Ruef machine proceeded to loot the city in every way possible. Boss Ruef even described his handpicked members of the Board of Supervisors as "being so greedy for plunder that they'd eat the paint off a house." Of course, he did all right himself. Typical was the graft derived from a "cow-yard" on Pacific Street, which housed 48 prostitutes in little cribs and was operated by six politically connected individuals, including a cousin of the mayor. The operators paid city officials $440 a week for protection and Ruef $250 a week.

Ruef apportioned grafting rights in almost every field of endeavor, with much of the vice operations run by one of the San Francisco underworld's most colorful, if distasteful, characters, Jerome Bassity. The political boss handled the more important illegal revenue sources personally. As investigations by reformers, such as special prosecutor Francis J. Heney and his assistant, Hiram Johnson, and by private undercover operatives of William J. Burns showed, Ruef received incredibly large lawyer's fees from public utilities and doled out part of these funds to most of the supervisors.

The final destruction of the Ruef machine must be credited to the newspapers and, especially, to editor Fremont Older of the San Francisco Bulletin, which ran almost daily exposés of local government machinations. In 1908, with a reform administration now in power, Ruef was convicted of bribery and eventually served time in San Quentin from 1911 to 1915. He had been sentenced to 14 years but his term was considerably shortened because of the intercession of the Bulletin, which by then was convinced of his reformation. The newspaper published his jail cell memoirs, entitled The Road I Traveled; an Autobiographic Account of My Career from University to Prison, with an Intimate Recital of the Corrupt Alliance between Big Business and Politics in San Francisco. Upon his release from prison Ruef entered the real estate business.

The destruction of the Ruef machine presaged the abandonment of San Francisco's gold-rush tradition, which had required it to be a wide-open town. The Barbary Coast soon withered away.

RULE of silence

rule of silence prison disciplinary method

Probably the harshest form of discipline ever attempted in American prisons was the so-called rule of silence, which was first enforced at Auburn Prison in the 1830s and later refined at Alcatraz Prison in the 20th century.

As originally practiced, the rule of silence was imposed on inmates when they were let out of their cells by day to work in the shops. Maintaining silence, they had to march in lockstep with downcast gaze. Violators of the rule were flogged. But at least prisoners were allowed to talk in the cell blocks.

Such was not the case at Alcatraz, where it was first used in 1934 as a punishment for problem prisoners. The rule of silence was to be enforced to the extent that it was conceivable a convict could forget what his own voice sounded like. Prisoners could not talk in the dining room; they could not talk in the workshops; they could not talk in the cell blocks. The attempt was ludicrous; prisoners still found ways to talk to one another despite the risks of punishment, which could take the form of being sent to the hold.

But the prisoners could use the rule of silence against the authorities at critical times. During an early escape attempt at Alcatraz, one convict hit a prison guard over the head with a hammer seven times, and then two others dragged the bleeding, dying victim across the floor into a corner, where they covered him with some old work clothes. A half-dozen other convicts were present at the time, but none stirred or said a word. They were obeying prison rules.

Within four years of its opening, Alcatraz greatly modified the rule of silence, as a number of areas were eliminated from the no-talking restriction. Still, long periods of silence were enforced and Alcatraz maintained its premier spot as the hellhole of federal prisons, where enforced monotony drove many inmates insane.

Rum Row bootleg fleet

With the onset of Prohibition in 1919, the easiest way to smuggle liquor into the United States was along the Atlantic coastline, especially from Maine to New Jersey. Vessels carrying liquor could drop anchor just outside the three-mile limit, where they were safe from government interference, and await the arrival of smaller, speedier boats to take on their illicit cargo and make a fast dash for shore. These little craft were known as rumrunners and engaged in many duels with government gunboats known as rumchasers. Meanwhile, the long line of liquor-laden vessels, often stretching for miles, rolled on the swells awaiting completion of unloading. This line of vessels, everything from old fishing boats to luxury yachts and cruisers, became known as Rum Row, always visible and embarrassing proof that Prohibition was unenforceable.

Rupolo, Ernest “The Hawk” (1908–1964) Genovese murder victim

Before his last arrest in 1958, Vito Genovese slowly schemed and murdered his way to the top post in the Mafia following the deportation of Lucky Luciano. He achieved his position with little interference from the law because very few individuals were ever willing to testify against him. One who did testify was a lowly New York hoodlum named Ernest “the Hawk” Rupolo, whom Genovese had hired to carry out the murder of Ferdinand Boccia in 1934. Harassed by the numerous charges lodged against him, Rupolo implicated Genovese, who fled the country in 1937. Finally brought back to stand trial in 1945, Genovese beat the rap after the only witness other than Rupolo who could tie him to the crime, Peter LaTempa, conveniently swallowed some poisoned pills in his jail cell. The crime boss was released for lack of evidence and that left Rupolo, as the boys said, “with the meat in his mouth and the sauce on his shirt.”

As a reward for his useless testimony, Rupolo was set free, but the authorities warned him that he was practically committing suicide by leaving prison. For years Rupolo led a terror-filled life, never knowing when Genovese would take his vengeance. Within the Mafia it was recognized that Genovese was delaying the death sentence just to increase Rupolo’s suffering. Finally, in August 1964 Rupolo disappeared. On August 27 his mutilated corpse washed ashore from New York’s Jamaica Bay; his body was pockmarked with ice pick holes and the back of his head had been blown away. Not surprisingly, the case has remained unsolved.

Russian Bill (1855–1881) outlaw

William Tattenbaum was a colorful character who turned up in Tombstone, Arizona Territory in 1880 claiming to be the son of Countess Telfrin, a wealthy Russian noblewoman. He also said that as a young lieutenant he had deserted the Czar’s Imperial White Hussars when faced with a court-martial for striking a ranking officer. Decked out in the finest and flashiest Western clothing and gear, Tattenbaum was quickly dubbed Russian Bill by the citizens of Tombstone, who did not believe a word he said about himself. Nevertheless, Russian Bill managed to ingratiate himself with Curly Bill Brocius, the head of the notorious Clanton gang, and rode with the outlaws for about a year. There is no record of Russian Bill engaging in any overt banditry and he seems to have served mainly as a “horse holder,” but Curly Bill insisted on keeping him around so that he could watch him groom his own hair for hours “just like a Chinaman” and listen to him quote the classics. Russian Bill comes down to us, thanks to Hollywood depictions, as a comic character. Quite possibly to escape that very reputation in Tombstone, he struck off for the New Mexico Territory on a horse-stealing enterprise of his own. The result was not a happy one, as he was soon captured by the Law and Order Committee of Shakespeare, New Mexico Territory. Russian Bill and another malefactor named Sandy King were given a fast trial by the committee in the banquet room of a local hotel. In keeping with the group’s reputation for quick justice, he was hanged from a beam in the room without further ado.

In 1883 inquiries from the Countess Telfrin about her son confirmed that all of Russian Bill’s tales had been true. The town of Shakespeare was a mite chagrined about having hanged “an honest-to-God son of a countess.” To spare the Countess’ feelings and a troublesome investigation by Washington, it was duly reported to the authorities that Russian Bill had met with an accidental death.

Sacco-Vanzetti case murder trial and conviction of anarchists

No murder trial in America has ever caused more worldwide turmoil than that of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, two acknowledged anarchists who were convicted of being members of a five-man bandit gang that held up a shoe factory in South Braintree, Mass. on April 15, 1920. The gang robbed the factory's $15,776.51 payroll and killed the paymaster and a guard. Sacco and Vanzetti were found to be in possession of two guns, and supposedly expert ballistics testimony tied their weapons to the crime.

In retrospect, no fair judging of the facts can deny that the two men were prosecuted more for their politics than their alleged crimes; they were foreign-looking, Italian-looking, and worst of all, they were anarchists. After one of the most unfair trials in American history, Sacco and Vanzetti were found guilty on July 14, 1921 by a jury sitting under Judge Webster Thayer, a rock-ribbed pillar of Back Bay aristocracy and opponent of anything he deemed radical, and sentenced to death. Out of court the judge often referred to the defendants as "dagos" and "sons of bitches." During a Dartmouth football game he asked a friend, "Did you see what I did to those anarchist bastards?"

Ignored at the trial were instances of possible perjury committed by state police officers and strong indications that the crime had been committed by members of the Boston Mafia, a version alleged by a professional criminal during Sacco and Vanzetti's years in the death house and later confirmed by underworld informer Vinnie Teresa, a New England gangster whose information to authorities in recent years has probably exceeded in importance that supplied by Joe Valachi.

Despite all the prosecution's claims, its tenuous case against the defendants centered on the testimony of two ballistics "experts." One expert was state police Capt. William Proctor, who demonstrated on the stand that he could not even take apart and reassemble Sacco's pistol. Proctor said that one of the murder bullets had markings “consistent with being fired by that pistol,” but he later admitted in an affidavit that he merely had meant the bullet “could” have been fired by Sacco’s weapon—but that he did not believe it had been. He also revealed that he had been coached by the prosecution.

The state’s other ballistics authority was Charles Van Amburgh, who presented much of the damning evidence against the defendants. By 1924 Van Amburgh was exposed in other cases as an expert witness who fitted his testimony to the needs of the prosecution if he thought other evidence had already proved the defendant guilty. Many ballistics experts and legal authorities were certain that in one case he knew he was giving false evidence but felt it did not matter because he was convinced of the defendant’s guilt. Later, the defendant was proved totally innocent.

The real question surrounding the case is not whether a certain bullet was fired from a certain gun barrel—the subject of much scientific inquiry over the years—but, more basically whether the evidence against the pair was rigged by the substitution of a bullet.

None of this mattered at the time, however. More significant was the tenor of the era, which dictated the verdict that was reached. One of the witnesses made a sworn statement that before the trial the man later picked to be foreman of the jury had said, “Damn them, they ought to hang anyway.”

Subsequent accusations about doctored evidence, testimony by phony experts and the like led to worldwide demonstrations against the verdict and the death sentence. Finally, in 1927 Gov. Alvan Tufts Fuller appointed a special commission to study the case. It included Abbot Lawrence Lowell, president of Harvard University; Dr. Samuel Stratton, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology; and Robert Grant, an ex-probate judge.

The Lowell Commission studied the official record of the trial, which some witnesses protested contained errors made by the court interpreter in translating key testimony, and heard some prosecution witnesses recant their original statements to the jury. However, in the end, the commission found nothing to indicate a miscarriage of justice, although it seemed rather upset by Judge Thayer’s “grave breach of official decorum.”

The governor accepted the Lowell Commission findings and, on August 10, 1927, granted a legal 12-day reprieve to allow for final, though obviously futile, legal moves. Around the world the protests turned violent. Forty persons were hurt in a demonstration in London and there were disorders in front of the U.S. consulate in Geneva. Street fights broke out in Paris and an American flag was burned in Casablanca. Other riots occurred in Berlin, Warsaw, Buenos Aires, Brest, Marseilles and various localities in Japan, Mexico, Argentina and Cuba. Among the voices raised in protest were those of George Bernard Shaw, H. G. Wells, Romain Rolland, John Galsworthy, Anatole France and Albert Einstein. Up to the last minute throngs marched in Boston and New York.

On August 23, 1927 Sacco, the factory hand, and Vanzetti, the fish peddler, were executed.

Their deaths did not still the controversy about the case. It would be impossible to compile a complete bibliography of all the books and magazine and newspaper articles written about the case. In 1977 Sacco and Vanzetti had their names cleared in a special proclamation signed by Massachusetts Gov. Michael S. Dukakis.

safecracking

Few crimes have gone into such a precipitous decline in recent years as that of “box busting” or safecracking. It’s not difficult to see why given the following recent news items:

- In New York a safecracking gang used too much explosives trying to blow a safe and set off more than two dozen alarms in surrounding buildings.

SAFECRACKING

- In the Chicago area a so-called torch man burned his way into four safes in a row and succeeded in burning the money inside all of them to a crisp.
- In New Jersey a pair of “yeggs” worked over a safe with acetylene torches for three hours and managed to weld the safe permanently shut.

Yeggs is the word generally used to describe the crop of modern-day safecrackers, shadows of the old-timers who accomplished crooked miracles and had safe makers and law enforcers in a state of nervous anxiety for decades.

There indeed have been safecrackers who could open some safes by manipulation, and there have always been fewer manipulation-proof safes than manufacturers have claimed. There are a few men with such skills today, but there is no need for them to be dishonest. They command top fees performing legal “safecrackings,” such as opening safes for tax officials investigating evasion cases and for estates when the deceased has failed to leave a record of the safe combination. Of course, it takes years of practice and an intimate knowledge of combination locks—thousands of them—to be successful at manipulation. On the outside of a safe there is a knob and dial and inside the lock a set of metal disks, or tumblers. The tumblers have a small cut out of them and revolve on a spindle controlled by the knob. When the correct combination is dialed, the slots fall in line and a metal level drops into the opening and releases the bolt mechanism, allowing the safe to be opened. Good safes have at least 100 numbers on the dial and four tumblers, creating some 100 million combination possibilities. Spending one minute on each combination possibility of a four-tumbler, 100-number lock, a safecracker could take something like 200 years to get the right one. As a result there are indeed few Jimmy Valentines in real life.

Through the years the safe maker and the safecracker have battled for the technical advantage. When combination locks were first introduced a century or so ago, crooks developed the “drag,” a screw setup that mashed the walls around the lock. Safe manufacturers got around this by strengthening the walls. The box busters retaliated with the “jackscrew,” a rig that by the turn of a screw forced the safe door with a series of steel wedges of varied thicknesses, from the thinness of a razor blade to the thickness of a fist, until the door popped from its hinges. The manufacturers responded by making doors that shot bolts into the jamb of all four sides and devising dovetailed arrangements joining the door to the jamb to block the wedges. The crooks countered with an air pump that distributed a fine grade of gunpowder all around the crack of the door. The air pump was placed at the bottom of the door and a funnel of powder at the top and then the rest of the crack was puttied up. When the pump sucked air from the safe and created a vacuum, the powder was sucked around the crack. A pound of powder set off by a cap blew the door.

A top safecracker, Langdon Moore, developed a safe-busting tool consisting of a back brace with adjustable extension legs. The brace was bolted to the floor and adjusted to dial height, and a crank with a one-quarter inch diamond-pointed drill was then fitted into a head piece at the top of the legs. The drill could bite through two inches of solid chilled steel and lock casing in about a half hour. Using a small bellows, a charge of powder was blown through the hole into the lock, a short fuse was attached and lighted. There would be a very dull blast, and the door would swing open.

No less inventive and a little more subtle was safecracker George Bliss, who found an easy way to open safes. He would remove the dial knob of a lock, adjust a tiny instrument of thin steel wire inside the surface of the dial and replace the knob. Some days later, he would return to the safe and remove the knob. By examining the marks made by the wire, he could determine the combination numbers and then had only to try them in different order until he found the correct sequence—all in a matter of minutes.

For a time safe makers were sure they had come up with an uncrackable box nicknamed the cannonball. The money container was a large egg-shaped compartment attached to a lower stand of four-foot-thick steel. The door consisted of 12 steel plates, each two inches thick and bolted to another. Instead of swinging open, the door “unscrewed” when the wheel attachment was turned according to the combination. The way the door was made, it was impossible to penetrate the first door to place explosives inside. The cannonball was the bane of safecrackers for years until perhaps the greatest safecracker of all, Herb Wilson, recalled his Boer War days in South Africa and the way soldiers would break open large ostrich eggs found on the veld. “With a small hatchet we’d crack the shell on the large end, going completely around the egg. Then one last blow with the hatchet, a little pressure with one hand while the other seized the opposite end of the egg, and the two pieces came apart as the contents went into the frying pan.”

Wilson imagined the cannonball as a giant ostrich egg. Using a specially designed oxygen-acetylene torch, he cut a one-inch groove around the big end of the “egg,” pouring cold water on the heated metal. Holding the edge of a specially-made hatchet in the groove, he had an accomplice bang the hatchet with an eight-pound copper hammer (copper against steel makes little noise). Once a full circle had been completed, Wilson took aim with the hatchet and delivered a sharp blow to the groove at the top of the safe. Just as happened to ostrich eggs, the big end of the cannonball safe cracked off. Wilson's largest bust netted $170,000.

For Wilson safecracking was an art, a compulsion. The same was true of Dion O'Banion, a top Chicago mobster of the 1920s who made millions annually out of bootlegging and other rackets. O'Banion had started as a safecracker and could never give it up, even when he no longer needed the money. Captured on one such a caper (which he promptly bought his way out of), O'Banion was asked why he bothered. "Aw," he said, "it's like playing the horses. Once it's in your blood you can't give it up."

The old-fashioned approach to safecracking has not entirely disappeared. When the Mosler Safe Co. put out a booklet titled "What You Should Know About Safes," it got a request for a copy from a man whose return address was TSPF, Snipe, Tex. TSPF stood for Texas State Prison Farm, and the man was a safecracker still trying to further his knowledge of the field. Unlike the new yeggs, however, he is of a vanishing breed. The old-timers complain the new crop just don't take the trouble to really learn their trade properly.

Sage, Russell (1816–1906) would-be murder victim

On December 4, 1894 a bearded stranger entered the offices of Russell Sage, the financial tycoon. He carried a carpetbag containing, he informed a secretary, bonds from John D. Rockefeller for personal delivery to Mr. Sage. There was a small meeting going on in Sage's office, but Mr. Rockefeller's bonds were always welcome and the messenger was ushered in. Silently, the bearded man handed Sage a typewritten note that read: "I hold in my hands ten pounds of dynamite. If I drop it on the floor it will tear the building to pieces and everyone with it. For $1,250,000 it shall not drop. Yes or no?"

Sage reacted with the ruthlessness for which he was infamous. He grabbed one of his low-paid clerks, shoved him toward the bearded man and, at the same time, broke for the door. There was a deafening explosion. A secretary and the bearded stranger were killed. Five others, including the clerk Sage used as a human shield, were badly injured. The clerk later sued Sage and was awarded $40,000.

The only clue the police had was the head of the bearded stranger, but they could not identify him. Investigators theorized that there was a gang of mad anarchists on the loose aiming "to rid the country of millionaires." Meanwhile, Ike White, a legendary reporter for the New York World sifted through the wreckage and found a button. He washed it off and determined it bore the identification of a Boston tailor. In time, White was able to identify the bomber as Henry L. Norcross, a frustrated inventor. The World broke the story with a huge picture of the bearded head and a one-word headline: "IDENTIFIED!" It was one of the most sensational scoops in American newspaper history.

St. Paul layover hideout arrangement for criminals

From the beginning of the century to the 1930s, St. Paul, Minn. was regarded as the safest hideout town for American criminals, even better protected than such places as Hot Springs, Ark. and Joplin, Mo. Some insisted that this distinction was of enormous benefit to local citizens, since for 30 years St. Paul was free of gangland violence and robberies.

Around the turn of the century, Police Chief John J. O'Connor let it be known to out-of-town criminals that they were welcome to "lay over" in St. Paul and spend their money freely. The only proviso to the St. Paul Layover, as it became known, was that no crime of any sort was to take place in the city. As a result, the city's crime statistics were absolutely unbelievable. Burglaries were almost nil, and St. Paul was one of the few cities during the era where lone women could walk the streets late at night without fear.

When an out-of-town criminal visited the city, he reported to Paddy Griffin's lodging house on Wabasha Street, where he was assigned a place to stay at a healthy rental. Griffin kept Chief O'Connor informed on all visitors, and the chief saw to it that the criminals did not misbehave and, just as importantly, were not subject to any police interference. O'Connor's operation was made possible by the political clout of his younger brother, Richard O'Connor, the boss of the city and state Democratic Party. Richard O'Connor was known for his dedication to protecting the poor, something the layover system complemented.

It is believed the O'Connor brothers never accepted any protection money from these out-of-town criminals, content to run the system simply for the satisfaction expressed by the public at living in a crime-free community. The O'Connor family income came from the saloon business—they were the official and unofficial owners of an entire string—and from a well-regulated prostitution industry that paid large sums to the police for the privilege of operating without harassment. A particularly lavish brothel was allowed to conduct business directly behind police headquarters.

ST. Valentine's Day Massacre

The golden era of the layover system ended around 1920. By then Dapper Hogan had taken over Griffin's role and ill health had forced Chief O'Connor to retire. Richard O'Connor shifted his interests to national politics, paying little attention to St. Paul matters. The layover system was so ingrained, however, that it continued even under a police chief who opposed it; the operation was supervised by other brass, and incoming criminals now checked in at the Green Lantern saloon on Wabasha Street, within sight of the state capitol.

Hogan's supervision of the layover system came to an explosive conclusion on December 5, 1928, when a bomb went off as he stepped on the starter of his car. He was succeeded by his ambitious partner, Harry Sawyer, who indeed had a motive to dispatch Hogan. Hogan's death marked the end of the peaceful era of the layover system, and once the lid came off, the violence continued. Sawyer lacked the muscle Hogan had used to maintain the peace and soon was making less and less out of layover revenues. Outside elements no longer saw any reason to exempt St. Paul from criminal endeavors, and in time, Sawyer joined with various underworld gangs in planning many local capers. He threw in with several kidnap mobs that worked the St. Paul area and later went to prison on a life sentence for his part in the Barker-Karpis gang's kidnapping of banker Edward Bremer. With his departure the St. Paul Layover passed into memory.

St. Valentine's Day Massacre gangland killings

No underworld atrocity, not even the Kansas City Massacre, in which a number of lawmen were killed in an allegedly botched attempt to rescue an arrested gangster, ever upset the public more than the St. Valentine's Day Massacre in Chicago on February 14, 1929. There is no doubt that the crime, technically never solved, was the work of the Capone mob, although none of the actual killers, except for Fred "Killer" Burke, could be definitely linked to the job.

The massacre was the outgrowth of a long-standing war between the Capone mob and the heirs of the North Side Gang organized in the early 1920s by Dion O'Banion. By 1929 a number of the North Siders, including O'Banion, had been killed and only George "Bugs" Moran remained to oppose Capone's takeover of the gang's lucrative area.

The North Siders were set up for the kill by a Detroit gangster who told Moran he had a load of hijacked booze available. Moran agreed to take delivery of the stuff at the gang's headquarters, a garage at 2122 North Clark Street. Early on Valentine's Day, a group of five men, three in police uniforms, pulled up in front of the garage in a black Cadillac, similar to the unmarked cars used by police, and rushed into the garage. Quickly, they lined the men they found there against a wall: six Moran henchmen—Adam Heyer, John May, brothers Frank and Pete Gusenberg, Al Weinshank and James Clark—and Dr. Reinhardt H. Schwimmer, an optometrist and something of a gangster groupie who just happened to be on hand. Then two of the raiders cut loose with Thompson submachine guns, killing all seven.

The only foul up was that the killers had not gotten Moran. He and two others, Willie Marks and Teddy Newbury, had just rounded a corner near the garage when they saw what appeared to be policemen entering it. Figuring it was a police shakedown, they remained out of sight, waiting for the officers to leave. When the machine gunning started, they fled.

The killings broke the power of the North Siders, and all Moran could do was wail, "Only Capone kills like that."

Actually, it was a long time before the theory that Capone had ordered the massacre won acceptance. There was much public speculation that the killings had been the work of real policemen. The Chicago police were held in such disrepute that Frederick D. Silloway, the local Prohibition administrator, was quoted as telling the press:

The murderers were not gangsters. They were Chicago policemen. I believe the killing was the aftermath to the hijacking of 500 cases of whiskey belonging to the Moran gang by five policemen six weeks ago on Indianapolis Boulevard. I expect to have the names of these five policemen in a short time. It is my theory that in trying to recover the liquor the Moran gang threatened to expose the policemen and the massacre was to prevent the exposure.

The next day Silloway retracted the charge, insisting he had been misquoted, certainly a monumental misquotation if there ever was one. His superiors in Washington transferred him out of Chicago as a sop to the local authorities, but a cloud of suspicion continued to hang over the police. The country's leading authority on forensic ballistics, Major Calvin H. Goodard, was brought in from New York to clear up the situation. He announced that according to his tests the bullets used in the massacre had not been fired from any machine gun in the possession of the Chicago police, still not a definitive exoneration. Almost a year later, the police located the murder weapons in the home of a professional killer, Fred Burke. In April 1930 Burke was captured in Michigan. Instead of being brought to trial in Illinois for the massacre, where if convicted he could have gotten the death penalty, he was tried in Michigan for the murder of a policeman and sentenced to life there. This led some underworld sources to whisper that the Illinois authorities had been fearful of trying him because testimony would have revealed the weapons had been planted in his home.

The St. Valentine's Day Massacre shocked the nation as few other Capone mob excesses had. So great was the public interest in the massacre that many helpful publications ran an upside-down version so readers could identify the dead without having to turn their newspapers around.

Despite such accusations, the St. Valentine's Day Massacre was a Capone operation. Through the years a changing cast of characters has been listed as the actual killers. Almost certainly, the chief planner of the job was Machine Gun McGurn, one of Capone's most-trusted henchmen.

Chicago, in its own style, memorialized the massacre. The garage on North Clark became a tourist attraction. Newspapers printed close-ups of the corpses upside down so that readers would not have to turn the page around to identify the victims. In 1949 the garage was bought for use as an antique furniture storage business and in 1967 it was finally ripped down. However, the bricks from the bullet-pocked wall were saved for posterity by a Canadian businessman. In 1972 he opened a night spot with a Roaring 20s theme and rebuilt the wall, for some odd reason, in the men's room as a tourist attraction. Three nights a week women patrons were allowed to enter that sanctum for a quick peek. The club continued for a few years, and then the businessman supposedly put the bricks in storage, preparing to market them together with a written account of the massacre for $1,000 apiece. Of course he couldn't possibly afford to sell the bullet-scarred bricks at that bargain price.

Salem witchcraft trials

The witchcraft executions in Salem, Mass. in 1692 were not the first in America—a witch was hanged in Charlestown in 1648 and another in Boston in 1655—but they were the most awesome. It all started when a group of young girls suddenly gave every evidence of having been bewitched. Ten girls, aged nine to 17, gathered in the kitchen of the Rev. John Parris' house and listened to the stories of his West Indian slave, Tituba. Although Tituba had been converted to Christianity, she had grown up steeped in the secrets of magic and voodoo. She taught the girls fortune-telling and palm reading and told bloodcurdling tales of spells and murder. The stories seem to have had a terrifying effect on the girls, who grew up in a particularly God-fearing society. Little Elizabeth Parris, the minister's daughter, awoke one night in a screaming frenzy and insisted there were awful creatures in her room. The doctor was called and he quickly gave his diagnosis: an evil spell had been cast on the child. Someone in Salem was practicing witchcraft. The news rocked Salem. Then the other girls who had been involved in the meetings with Tituba began having seizures. It has long been debated whether the girls were simply pretending or had actually deluded themselves into thinking they had been bewitched. Perhaps with most, what had started out as a way to get attention developed into a form of hysteria. All the girls no doubt believed in witchcraft, as did the townspeople, who were also mindful of the biblical injunction, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live."

At first, three women—Tituba, Goodwife Osburn and Sarah Goode—were charged, and the mad frenzy of the witch hunt began. Trials were held and a number of men and women were accused of practicing witchcraft. When the impact of what was happening hit her, one of the girls, Mary Warren, confessed that it was all pretense. But the other girls then accused her of witchcraft and said they had seen her ghost. Mary withdrew her confession, but no one had believed her in any case because of the fact that she had been bewitched. Far more impressive to the people of Salem was the spectacle of the other girls proving their affliction by convulsing on the floor of the courtroom, biting their arms and screaming, and accusing witch after witch.

A five-year-old girl, Dorcas Goode, confessed to being a witch and admitted keeping a black snake as a familiar spirit. Little Dorcas was kept in heavy chains in jail for eight months. The restraints were considered necessary to keep her from casting evil spells. She was the daughter of Sarah Goode, who had been hanged, along with Tituba and Goodwife Osburn, after denying she was a witch. Only those who denied being witches were executed. Although some who confessed died in jail, all the others who admitted being witches were eventually released. In all, 19 persons were hanged and one, 80-year-old Giles Corey, was pressed to death when he refused to plead guilty or not guilty.

By September 1692 the witch delusion had faded away. People had become concerned that innocent persons had been executed. The girls continued their hysterics but were generally ignored. One of them, Anne Putnam, declared that she had accused guiltless persons and had her confession read from the pulpit. As opinion turned against the girls, judges and jurors publicly declared they had been mistaken. The jurors signed a declaration that they had been "under the power of a strong and general delusion." For many years thereafter a day of repentance and fasting was held in Salem.

salting mine swindle

Easily the most prevalent form of larceny in the Old West and later in Alaska was the "salting" of worthless mining i.e., making an area of land appear to be rich in gold ore or other minerals. As Mark Twain once put it, "There was nothing in the shape of a mining claim that was not salable."

There were many ingenious ways to salt an area, a quite common one being to shoot gold dust into the ground with a shotgun. This method worked well in mine shafts, where the gold specks would convince a potential buyer/victim that a particular vein was not as yet played out. Shotgun salting on the surface could only be successful if some way was found to induce a sucker to search in the right area; salting a huge area would have been an expensive proposition.

According to one California mining legend, some prospectors stuck with a poor-paying claim devised an ingenious scheme to unload it on a group of Chinese fortune hunters. Unable to guarantee that the would-be buyers would look in the right spots, the miners hid one of their number in a gulch with a dead snake. When the Chinese arrived, the miners suggested areas for them to search, and as was to be expected, the potential victims, wary of a salting plot, said no and pointed into a far corner of the claim. As they approached the spot, the miner with the snake heaved it out of his hiding place. Quickly, a miner with the Chinese leveled his shotgun and shot the reptile. The fortune hunters became convinced of the miners' trustworthiness, for not only had they been saved from the snake but, after digging the area, they also found strong traces of gold.

One of the greatest silver saltings ever was that of a worthless hole called the North Ophir in the Comstock field in Nevada. During the 1860s great nuggets of silver turned up there and stock belonging to the North Ophir claim went through the ceiling. The bogus claim's promoters had cut silver dollars into pieces, pounded them into lumps, blackened the lumps and then salted the claim. The bubble burst when a "nugget" turned up with "ted States of" printed on it.

Many miners, looking ahead to the day when their claims would be played out, used a special technique to prepare a salting for a future sucker. Since in the last century gold salts were widely used in the patent medicines miners took religiously for kidney ailments brought on by heavy drinking, they would urinate over large stretches of their claim so that traces of gold would still show up when they were ready to move on.

No tale was too tall for gold salters. A Calistoga Springs, Calif. promoter advertised that the local water was so rich in tiny particles of gold that he was filtering $5 to $10 worth out of each barrelful. While so-called flour gold was sometimes so fine that it would float in water, the Calistoga Springs water had none—except what this promoter had put there. It remained for Mark Twain to demolish the scam as only a master storyteller could. In response to an account about the claim, Twain wrote:

I have just seen your dispatch from San Francisco in Saturday evening's Post. This will surprise many of your readers but it does not surprise me, for once I owned those springs myself. What does surprise me, however, is the falling off of the richness of the water. In my time the yield was a dollar a dipperful. I am not saying this to injure the property in case a sale is contemplated. I am saying it in the interest of history. It may be that the hotel proprietor's process is an inferior one. Yes, that may be the fault. Mine was to take my uncle (I had an extra one at that time on account of his parents dying and leaving him on my hands) and fill him up and let him stand fifteen minutes, to give the water a chance to settle. Well, then I inserted an exhaust receiver, which had the effect of sucking the gold out of his pores. I have taken more than $11,000 out of that old man in less than a day and a half.

I should have held on to those springs, but for the badness of the roads and the difficulty of getting the gold to market, I consider that the gold-yielding water is in many respects remarkable, and yet no more remarkable than the gold-bearing air of Catgut Canyon up there toward the head of the auriferous range. This air, or this wind—for it is a kind of trade-wind which blows steadily down through 600 miles of richest quartz croppings—is heavily charged with exquisitely fine, impalpable gold.

Nothing precipitates and solidifies this gold so readily as contact with human flesh heated by passion.

The time that William Abrahams was disappointed in love he used to sit outdoors when the wind was blowing, and come in again and begin to sigh, and I would extract over a dollar and a half out of every sigh.

I do not suppose a person could buy the water privileges at Calistoga now at any price, but several good locations along the course of Catgut Canyon gold-bearing trade-winds are for sale. They are going to be stocked for the New York market. They will sell, too.

Twain was right; almost any kind of salting plot would work because of the irresistible lure of easy treasure that had affected Western prospectors ever since the gold rush of 1849.

Sandbar Duel birthplace of bowie knife

Probably the most famous, and certainly the bloodiest, duel ever fought on the Mississippi was the so-called Sandbar Duel of September 19, 1827. Although many men died the battle is remembered chiefly as marking the debut of the bowie knife.

In August of that year a duel was arranged between two Natchez men, a Dr. Maddox and Samuel Well, to be fought on the Vidalia sandbar in the Mississippi near Natchez. Each combatant appeared with a number of supporters, all heavily armed. The duelists fired two exchanges without suffering injury, but before the affair could be ended, heated quarrels started among the supporters of the two men. Suddenly, mass shooting broke out. One of the participants wounded by the gunfire was frontiersman Jim Bowie. Although badly hurt, Bowie drew a homemade knife, fashioned either by himself or his brother Rezin, and killed Major Norris Wright, a local banker with whom he had been having a financial dispute. In all, six men died and 15 others were severely wounded in the post-duel melee, but the main notoriety went to Bowie and his fearsome weapon, with which he had so efficiently, as one account stated, "disemboweled" his opponent.

Sands Chicago vice area

In the 1850s the worst vice district in Chicago was called the Sands, lying just about where the Tribune and Wrigley buildings are now situated. At the time, the Sands consisted of about 40 buildings, every one of which was a brothel, a gambling den, a thieves' hideout or a saloon partly used for prostitution. The Chicago Tribune called the Sands the vilest and most dangerous place in Chicago. For some years past it has been the resort or hiding place of all sorts of criminals, while the most wretched and degraded women and their miserable pimps [are] there in large numbers. A large number of persons, mostly strangers in the city, have been enticed into the dens there and robbed, and there is but little doubt that a number of murders have been committed by the desperate characters who have made these dens their homes. The most beastly sexuality and darkest crimes had their homes in the Sands. . . .

Typical of the establishments found there was a saloon-bagnio operated by Freddy Webster. It was noted for both its viciousness and vileness. One of Webster's inmates was a prostitute named Margaret McGuinness, who was described as never having been sober or out of the house in five years and never having had clothes on in three years. She entertained anywhere from 15 to 40 men a night. When she died on March 8, 1857 of "intemperance," hers was the seventh death to occur in the Sands in the previous seven days.

The Sands, or at least its women, were the cause of the so-called Whore War of 1857, when a group of madams on State Street attempted to lure away some of the area's star prostitutes. Led by a brutal young prostitute, Gentle Annie Stafford, the forces of the Sands prevailed.

Numerous political figures vowed to wipe out the Sands but never did, mainly because its inhabitants insisted they would fight to the death to remain there. Finally, in 1857 Mayor Long John Wentworth accomplished the deed on a day when all the men and many of the women had left the Sands to attend a great dog fight at a nearby racetrack. Accompanied by some 30 policemen and two horse-drawn wagons loaded with hooks and chains, the mayor ordered the flimsy structures of the Sands pulled down. As the work progressed, a fire company arrived and destroyed several shanties with streams of water. Some of the buildings were burned, and by the time the inhabitants of the Sands returned, they found nothing left but rubble and ashes. The area eventually became a prime business location, but whether the destruction of the Sands represented civic progress is debatable. Its several hundred undesirable residents simply spread themselves around Chicago.

Sangerman's Bombers bombers-for-hire gang

While bombings in late 19th and early 20th century America were always considered the work of foreign elements, such as Black Hand extortionists or black-bearded anarchists, the fact is that the bombers were just as often dyed-in-the-wool Americans.

The first criminal gang of bombers was Chicago's Sweeney gang, which carried out wholesale bombing attacks during and after World War I until its members were arrested by police in 1921. Sweeney's Bombers, as the newspapers labeled them, were succeeded by Sangerman's Bombers, who raised the practice to new technical heights, carrying out terrorist labor bombings as well as selling their services to politicians and elements of organized crime. The kingpin of the operation was Joseph Sangerman, a leading manufacturer of barber shop supplies as well as head of the barbers' union. The Illinois Crime Survey called him "the directing genius of the bombing trust, the contractor of bombing." As an officer in the barbers' union, he began by hiring bombers to discipline barber shop owners who refused to operate their stores in accordance with union rules. Finding that this gang could do a job effectively and escape detection, he began to accept commissions in other fields. Arrested in 1925, Sangerman admitted to police that he maintained a full-time staff of six bombers, including one woman, and that his rates ran from $50 to $700 a job.

One star member of Sangerman's crew was George Matrisciano, described as the best bomb maker in Chicago's history. Matrisciano always carried two sticks of dynamite in his pockets. When several indictments were drawn against him, fear grew that he might talk, as Sangerman had, and he was killed, according to the crime survey, by "the guns of the officers of the barbers' union."

With the breakup of Sangerman's Bombers, the incidence of bombing in Chicago started to decline. The bombings in the 1916–21 Aldermen's Wars and the 1928 Republican primary proved to be too loud in more ways than one. As the Capone mob and its successors learned, bombings were spectacles that drew too much attention. The gun, knife and ice pick were more pedestrian but, in the long run, safer.

Saturday Night Special cheap handgun

Saturday Night Special is the name applied to the small, easily concealed, usually illegal handguns that have been used in millions of crimes by persons, including youths, who cannot afford to spend more than $5 or $10 for a weapon.

Its birthplace was Detroit, Mich., one of the nation's most violent cities but not necessarily one where guns were easy to purchase. In the late 1950s and early 1960s mayhem-minded Detroiters began making one-hour car trips to Toledo, Ohio, a gun buyer's paradise where weapons could be bought at shoeshine stands, filling stations, candy stores and even flower shops. Harassed Detroit lawmen found that the purchases made during these trips were often used in stickups on Saturday nights and thus dubbed the weapons Saturday Night Specials.

It is wrong to try to categorize these handguns as merely cheap foreign imports, since many of them are produced by American gun manufacturers.

Testifying before a Senate committee in 1971, New York City's police commissioner, Patrick V. Murphy, spoke of the perils of Saturday Night Specials and other guns as well.

What kind of guns are used by our criminals? . . . Of the 8,792 illegal weapons seized by the New York City Police Department in 1970, 24 percent of them were classified by our ballistics section as of this type. In one recent sixteen-month sampling we were able to establish that such weapons, retailing for as little as five or ten dollars, were used in at least 36 murders, 68 robberies, and 117 felonious assaults.

There is absolutely no legitimate reason to permit the importation, manufacture, or sale of these weapons, or their parts. They are sought only by people who have illicit motives, but who may have some difficulty securing a better gun. . . .

But Saturday Night Specials are only one part of the handgun problem, and by no means the most significant part. Most of the guns we seized are quality weapons manufactured by reputable foreign and domestic companies. . . .

Scalice, Frank "Don Chreech" (1894–1957) Mafia underboss

The number two man in Albert Anastasia's New York crime family, Frank Scalice died in a web of Mafia intrigue that probably will never be unraveled.

As second in command to Anastasia in what had originally been the Mangano crime family, Scalice became most active in recruiting new members into the Mafia beginning in 1954, when the "books," or membership rosters, were opened for the first time since the early 1930s. It was later charged that Scalice was taking kickbacks of up to $50,000 from successful applicants. When Anastasia heard the accusations against his aide, he immediately ordered his murder, and Scalice was cut down by four bullets in the neck and head as he stood in front of a Bronx fruit store. Anastasia's motive for acting with such unseemly haste apparently was due to a widely circulated rumor that he himself was getting a cut of Scalice's kickbacks.

One theory has it that Scalice was innocent of the charge and that it resulted from a frame-up by Vito Genovese, then involved in a struggle with Anastasia for the top position in the New York Mafia. Genovese is believed to have formulated the plot to discredit Anastasia, but the latter simply outwitted him by killing Scalice. In any event, the official police report on the slaying summed up the only hard facts ever determined about the crime: murder bullets were "fired by two unknown white males who fled in an automobile."

scalp hunting

Contrary to what has now become the widely accepted view, American Indians did not learn scalping from white settlers. But while they indeed started the practice, the introduction of steel knives and tomahawks by Europeans made scalping easier and helped spread the custom. Scalp hunting became a business when whites introduced a system of paying for scalps as a way of getting rid of hostile or unwanted Indians. The bounties offered at various times by colonial governments and then by Mexican and U.S. government agencies in the West were pretty much standard: $100 for a male Indian scalp; $50 for a female; $25 for a child. Naturally, such a system was an invitation to commit wholesale slaughter. One of the more terrible instances occurred in 1837, when a scalp hunter named James Johnson devised a scheme whereby the Mimbreno Apaches were invited to a lavish feast in the town plaza of Santa Rita del Cobre, just south of the Rio Grande. After the Indians had been plied with food and whiskey and were no longer alert, two howitzers as well as rifles, pistols and bowie knives were used to slaughter them. Four hundred scalps were taken.

Besides Johnson, probably the most proficient of the Western scalp hunters were John Glanton, James Kirker and Jim Hobbs, none of whom was known to be above taking the hair of Mexicans or dark-skinned Americans. Operating under the doctrine of Manifest Destiny, government bounty payers seem to have been not very particular.

Schmid, Charles Howard (1942–) mass murderer

Often called the Pied Piper of Tucson, Charles Schmid was 22 years old in 1964 when he led a weird clique of admiring young people on forays of rape and bizarre behavior, ending in a series of meaningless murders.

Even in his high school days Schmid behaved strangely. Only five feet three inches, he padded his cowboy boots to make him taller, dyed his red hair black, wore cosmetics and designed a phony mole on his face to make him look meaner. He told wild tales that somehow made him very popular, attracting a number of girls who prostituted themselves to provide him with money. One girl went to work in his parent's nursing home and faithfully deposited most of her week's pay in Schmid's bank account.

Schmid rented a cottage on the outskirts of Tucson, bought a beat-up car and became a fixture of the Speedway Boulevard area, a strip that attracted race-happy motorcyclists, souped-up car enthusiasts and rock-and-roll music lovers. On May 31, 1964 Schmid was drinking with two young friends, Mary French and John Saunders, when he announced he felt like killing a girl. "I want to do it tonight," he said. "I think I can get away with it!"

Mary French invited 15-year-old Alleen Rowe to join them late that night and they went for a drive in Schmid's car. After stopping in the desert, Mary stayed in the car while Schmid and Saunders took the girl to a secluded spot. Schmid raped her and then casually told Saunders to "hit her over the head with a rock." Saunders started to obey but the horrified girl ran off. After catching up with her, Schmid knocked her to the ground and smashed her skull in with a rock. They buried the girl in a shallow grave and went off to do some more drinking.

In August 1965 a girlfriend of Schmid's, 17-year-old Gretchen Fritz, disappeared with her 13-year-old sister, Wendy. Like Alleen Rowe, the Fritz girls were listed as runaways by the police, but a short while later, Schmid boasted to a friend, Richard Bruns, that he had strangled both sisters and thrown their bodies into a ditch. Since Bruns refused to believe the story, Schmid showed him the corpses.

Bruns kept silent about the matter for a while until he got it into his head that Schmid was going to kill his, Bruns', girlfriend. He started having nightmares about Schmid and finally went to the police. Schmid was arrested on November 11, 1965, as were French and Saunders, The latter two turned state's evidence against their bizarre hero. Schmid got 55 years for the rape-murder of Alleen Rowe and the death sentence for the slayings of the Fritz girls. French got four to five years and Saunders life imprisonment for their parts in the Rowe crime. When the Supreme Court abolished capital punishment, Schmid was resentenced to two terms of life imprisonment.

On November 11, 1972 Schmid escaped from the Arizona State Prison along with another triple murderer, Raymond Hudgens. The pair held four hostages on a ranch near Tempe, Ariz., and then separated. Both were recaptured within a few days and returned to prison.

school killers rampage of the 1990s

In 1993 a Kentucky high school teacher found out something about an honor student in her English class, something that few others appeared to have grasped. The teacher, Deanna McDavid, was convinced that the student, Scott Pennington, was extremely dangerous. She found that thoughts of death ran through the student's journals. McDavid told a fellow teacher that someday the young student was going to bring a gun to school and shoot himself—or somebody else. She was right.

On a Monday afternoon Scott Pennington shot English teacher McDavid to death. It was one of the nation's first school shootings. Pennington was sentenced to life imprisonment. That verdict was hardly a deterrent to school killing sprees that permeated the 1990s, climaxing in the April 20, 1999, massacre of 12 students and a teacher and the wounding of 23 others at Columbine High School in Littleton, Colorado. The killers were two students, Eric Harris, 18, and Dylan Klebold, 17. Most of the shootings took place in the school library and cafeteria. The pair shot some students they knew and some they knew only casually. One girl, wounded in their attack, begged for help. She was asked if she believed in God. When she said she did, she was blown away. The pair had clearly determined to kill as many as they could, and they expected to be killed themselves. Instead, they killed themselves in an apparent double suicide.

The sheer horror of the massacre shocked the nation, and for that matter the entire world, as news media from many nations descended on Littleton. But except for the scope of the tragedy, the student killings had previously reached almost a monotonous drum-beat, Scott Pennington's 1993 attack being merely a forecast of tragedies to come.

Over a timespan of just about a year and a half prior to the killings at Columbine High, there was a frightening parade of similar murder sprees:

October 1, 1997—A 16-year-old boy in Pearl, Mississippi murdered his mother, then went to his high school and shot two students to death and wounded seven others. The boy was sentenced to life imprisonment, and the alleged mastermind of the affair was still awaiting trial. According to authorities, the teenagers were part of a cultlike group.

December 1, 1997—A 14-year-old boy killed three students and wounded five others in a hallway of Heath High School in West Paducah, Kentucky. The boy pleaded guilty but mentally ill and following trial, drew a life sentence. Asked the reason for his crime, he said he did not know.

March 24, 1998—At a middle school in Jonesboro, Arkansas, four female students and a teacher were killed and 10 other people were wounded from gunfire coming from adjacent woods following a false alarm that brought students outside. Two boys, aged 11 and 13, were convicted in juvenile court for murder and could be held to age 21.

April 24, 1998—A 14-year-old was charged with having shot a science teacher to death in front of students at an eighth-grade dance at a banquet hall in Edinboro, Pennsylvania. Awaiting trial, the student's motive was unclear.

May 19, 1998—Three days before graduation, an 18-year-old honor student was charged with opening fire in a parking lot at a Fayetteville, Tenn. high school and killing a classmate who was dating his ex-girlfriend.

May 21, 1998—Two teenagers died and more than 20 were wounded when a 15-year-old boy allegedly opened fire at a Springfield, Oreg. high school. The boy's parents were murdered in their home. On a police videotape, the boy was asked why he began firing. He said, "I had no other choice."

If these preludes to the Columbine massacre were frightening enough, they were matched by the "copycat" shootings that followed. Just eight days following the events in Colorado, a 14-year-old dropout in Taber, Alberta, Canada, came to his high school wearing a three-quarter length parka. Someone smirked, "Do you have a gun under there?" Moments later, the boy whipped out a .22-caliber rifle, killed a 17-year-old boy and wounded another. The Columbine shooting had offered troubled and misguided kids a new way to grab attention for themselves. Said Elissa Benedek, professor of clinical psychiatry at the University of Michigan, of a considerable number of school students, ". . . there are lots of unhappy ones who want their moment in the sun, and this is one way to do it."

Some of the Columbine copycats were very serious in their plans but were thwarted. A quartet of 14-year-olds in Wimberly, Texas, were arrested just three days after the Columbine incident for allegedly plotting to blow up a local junior high school. They were turned in by other students, undoubtedly affected by the killings in Littleton, after they heard the four eighth graders bragging about their plans. Searches of their homes by authorities turned up gunpowder and bomb-building instructions downloaded from the Internet. The boys were charged with conspiracy to manufacture explosives and commit murder and arson. There were other cases where boys were arrested and charged with conspiracy despite their claims they were only joking. And in Bakersfield, California, a 13-year-old boy was taken out of school after other students noticed him loading a .40-caliber handgun. He was carrying a hit list of 30 names with "they deserve to die" written at the bottom.

All these cases led to what some saw as a near-hysterical and not-well-thought-out reaction to the problem. The American Civil Liberties Union received a flood of complaints from parents around the country whose children were suspended for wearing black (since Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold had done so in their deadly rampage). There were calls in Congress for the posting of the Ten Commandments in schools despite the dubious constitutional aspects of the move. Among those supporting such acts was George W. Bush, then the leading candidate for the Republican nomination for president. When newsmen asked him which Ten Commandments he favored—the Catholic, Protestant, Jewish or Muslim—Bush appeared nonplussed, then replied, "The regular ones."

At the same time it was revealed the Secret Service began a detailed review of the various school shootings that was said to complement their findings about political assassins. The Secret Service developed a number of caveats to various effects to improve security at schools. These included the use of armed guards, video cameras, metal detectors, dress codes and the use of special phone numbers for reporting threats.

Concerning the use of police officers to patrol the halls: The worry was that since many school killers later told investigators and psychologists that part of their motive is to be killed, such security could be either a deterrent or a "magnet for suicide."

SCHULTZ, Dutch

Concerning surveillance cameras: The worry was that since many killers wanted to become famous, such cameras could be either a deterrent or a way to record on film the acts that were planned to make the potential killers famous. This could make them stars of a morbid video, almost a “yearbook video,” some said.

On dress codes and the like: One member of the Secret Service study noted, “It would be much easier if all the people who did this dressed weirdly or were outcasts.” But most killers themselves said they sought to blend in, rather than give such “warning signs.”

In its own method of preventing political assassination, the Secret Service has studied all 83 people who tried to kill a public official or a celebrity in the United States in the last half century and they found not one of them had actually made a threat. Still, the Secret Service must take all threats seriously. What does turn up is that political assassins and school killers do have some common traits. Killers study security and acquire weapons. They become knowledgeable about the history of assassination. They make plans for their escape or their own deaths.

The Secret Service once looked out for people who fit a popular profile of dangerousness: the hater, the loner, the threatener, the lunatic—as being potentially dangerous. That profile has been more or less shattered. There is a recognition today that it is not a matter of whether a person is capable of violence. In the new view people can be more or less violent as determined by circumstances. People have to make a decision to kill.

Thus what is looked for is whether a person is on a path toward attacking someone. Then it has to be determined how likely it is that they will attack. The question becomes how might they be prevented from doing so. Harris and Klebold gave many signs of danger. They copied school keys, acquired weapons, made bombs and put their plans in a diary. They also apparently changed their mind about who their victims would be—not uncommon among school killers. In the case of Columbine a student who previously had been hated was warned to leave the school before the massacre.

Of other such school killers, a psychologist involved in Secret Service studies said, “Some write about their ideas and activities, in a journal or diary. Others tell friends, family or colleagues—but usually not the target—about their thoughts and intentions. Often their plans go on hold until some painful event occurs—a lost opportunity or the end of a relationship. This sends them into despair.”

Eric Harris was the son of a career military man and laid out his plans for a full year. His attack came within a week of his being rejected by the U.S. Marine Corps.

Concerning those special phone numbers for the report of threats or concerns, the Secret Service is concerned that almost no schools or the police have gotten any training on assessing a possible violent act. The goal is to provide training materials that the schools and police can utilize.

The Secret Service is recommending asking a number of questions about a person’s motivation and behavior. Besides learning what a person has said about his or her intention, it should be determined if he or she shows an interest in assassins and weapons and militant groups. Does the person have a history of mental illness or acting on delusions or hallucinations.

There is no sure answer to how to end school killings, but in the meantime, one question must be asked: “Is this something that might do more harm than good?”

Schultz, Dutch (1902–1935) underworld leader

Among the great underworld leaders spawned by Prohibition, Dutch Schultz was one of the flakiest, probably the cheapest and often the most cold-blooded. In the end, he had to be executed by his fellow gangsters because he threatened the status quo established between organized crime and the law. Born Arthur Flegenheimer in the Bronx, New York City, he tended bar and had only a minor criminal record until the mid-1920s, when he formed a gang and took over much of the beer trade in the Bronx. Tough, aggressive and probably keener in his appreciation of potential sources of illicit revenues than even Lucky Luciano, he was the first to see the fortune to be made out of the numbers racket in Harlem. He moved in on the independent black operators there and, using force and violence, turned them into his agents in a new multimillion dollar racket. Through a mathematical genius named Otto “Abbadabba” Berman, he figured out a way to fix the numbers game so that the smallest possible payout was made when someone hit.

Few other gangsters, including most of his own men, either liked or respected him, but they feared him. Schultz was a miser who paid his gangsters as little as he could get away with, and he would almost fly into a rage whenever he was asked for a raise. The only man in the organization he paid really well was Abbadabba, who got $10,000 a week, though only after he threatened to take his mathematical skills elsewhere.

Schultz never spent more than $35 for a suit or $2 for a shirt. “Personally,” he once told an interviewer, “I think only queers wear silk shirts. I never bought one in my life. A guy’s a sucker to spend fifteen or twenty dollars on a shirt. Hell, a guy can get a good one for two bucks!”

Lucky Luciano once said of him: “Dutch was the cheapest guy I ever knew. The guy had a couple of million bucks and he dressed like a pig, and he worried about spending two cents for a newspaper. That was his big spending, buying the papers so’s he could read about himself.”

Schultz was somewhat of an expert on newspapers. He admitted that he took the name of Dutch Schultz because “it was short enough to fit in the headlines. If I’d kept the name of Flegenheimer, nobody would have heard of me.” Once, he raged at Meyer Berger, the star crime reporter of The New York Times, because Berger had described him as a “pushover for a blonde.”

Actually, only one offense truly enraged Schultz. His famous “mouthpiece” Dixie Davis, later said of him: “You can insult Arthur’s girl, spit in his face, push him around—and he’ll laugh. But don’t steal a dollar from his accounts. If you do, you’re dead.”

Among those who did and died for it was the murderous Jack “Legs” Diamond, who became known as the underworld’s clay pigeon in his wars with various gangsters, especially Schultz. When Diamond expired in an upstate New York hotel room with several bullets in his head, Schultz was quoted as saying, “Just another punk caught with his hands in my pockets.” Vincent “Mad Dog” Coll, a former underling with a fiery temper and raging ambitions, also challenged Schultz. Coll staged wholesale raids on Schultz’ beer drops and policy joints, and while he matched the Dutchman at killing, he was forced into hiding by the Schultz organization’s superior firepower. On February 8, 1932 he ventured forth to use a telephone booth and was gunned down by Schultz’ machine gunners.

After that, no one really wanted to take on Schultz. He would fight to the last man and had powerful political protection, mainly through Jimmy Hines, the Tammany boss who would later go to prison for his protection of the Schultz forces. Although Luciano, Meyer Lansky and the other founders of the national crime syndicate dealt the Dutchman in, considering him too powerful to leave out, they secretly sought to get rid of Schultz because they considered him too erratic and because they wanted to take over his lucrative beer and policy rackets. While Schultz was awaiting trial after being indicted on tax charges, Luciano and his associates moved quickly to take over his rackets through the cooperation of Schultz’ top aide, Bo Weinberg. Amazingly, Schultz beat the case against him and returned to reclaim his domain. Rather than fight him, the syndicate leaders gave back large chunks they had gobbled up, explaining they had been simply minding the Dutchman’s holdings in his absence. Schultz was almost forgiving, but not toward Weinberg. Shortly thereafter, Weinberg became a permanent missing person. According to one underworld report, Schultz personally put a bullet in his head, but in another version Weinberg was fitted with a “cement overcoat” and dropped—still alive—into the Hudson River. Either story could be true.

Schultz’ demise came about because of his desire to get rid of special prosecutor Thomas E. Dewey, whom Gov. Herbert Lehman had appointed in 1935 to investigate racketeering and vice. When Dewey started cracking down on the mobs, particularly on Schultz and his gang, the Dutchman, seeing his revenues decline, went before the national board of the syndicate to demand that Dewey be assassinated. The proposal was quickly turned down by Luciano, Lansky, Louis Lepke, Costello and others, who were convinced it would bring an avalanche of police pressure on the entire underworld.

Undeterred by the strong vote against him, Schultz stormed out of the meeting, defiantly declaring: “I still say he ought to be hit. And if nobody else is gonna do it, I’m gonna hit him myself.”

When the syndicate learned Schultz was really going ahead with the plot and had even picked a murder site, they quickly put out a quick contract on him.

On October 23, 1935 Schultz, Abbadabba Berman and two bodyguards, Abe Landau and Lulu Rosenkrantz were in a favorite hangout, the Palace Chop House and Tavern in Newark, N. J. Schultz left his three henchmen sitting at a table in the back and went into the men’s room. While he was in there, two gunmen entered the Palace. One of the two burst into the men's room and shot to death a man standing at a urinal, not realizing the victim was Schultz. He then charged at the table where Berman and the two bodyguards were seated and, with two guns blazing, killed them all. Only at that point did the gunmen discover that Schultz was not among the three. However, when they checked the men's room, they found Schultz was the man who had been shot simply to ensure that the pair were not surprised from behind. The gunman who had done all the shooting lifted a considerable amount of cash from Schultz' pockets and then fled.

Schultz lingered in a hospital for two days before dying. Eventually, one of his killers was identified as Charles "the Bug" Workman. He was tried and sentenced to 23 years for the crime.

Schuster, Arnold (1928–1952) murder victim

In February 1952 Arnold Schuster, a 24-year-old Brooklyn clothing salesman, made the front pages of newspapers from coast to coast after he spotted the notorious bank robber Willie "the Actor" Sutton while riding on a New York City subway. He followed Sutton out of the subway, watched him enter a garage and then notified the police. Sutton was captured on the street as he was removing the battery from his stalled car. On March 9, 1952 Arnold Schuster was back on the front pages: a gruesome picture displayed his corpse lying on the Brooklyn street where he lived. He had been shot four times: twice in the groin and once in each eye.

An unsuccessful police manhunt was organized for a 37-year-old murderer and escaped convict named Frederick J. Tenuto after he was tentatively identified by a witness who had seen the assassin leaving the site of the crime. Tenuto was already on the FBI's list of the 10 most-wanted criminals. Years later, an unexpected source, Mafia informer Joe Valachi, confirmed that Tenuto had killed young Schuster on orders from the Mafia's most-feared executioner, Albert Anastasia. Watching Schuster being interviewed on television after Sutton's capture, the crime boss had become enraged and had exploded, "I can't stand squealers!" He ordered Schuster executed for informing on Sutton, even though the bank robber had no connection with organized crime. Anastasia removed any risk of being connected with the Schuster murder by having Tenuto assassinated.

At the Mafia's famous Apalachin meeting in November 1957, Vito Genovese justified the barber shop killing of Anastasia on the grounds of his maniacal rages and his capacity to have almost anyone murdered at any time. The Schuster killing was clearly one of the things Genovese had in mind.

scolds

Punishment of women for being common scolds, i.e., vituperative females who rebuke others so rudely and loudly that they frequently disturb the public peace, was long practiced in America right up to the middle of this century.

A typical example was Anne Royall of Washington, D.C., who in 1829 was made to pay a $10 fine and post a $50 good-behavior bond. In 1947 a woman in Greensburg, Pa. was forced to pay court costs and was given a suspended sentence for being a scold. That same year three sisters in Pittsburgh were sent to jail on scolding charges for terms ranging from three to 23 months.

Scopes, John T. (1900–1970) "monkey trial" defendant

In 1925 John T. Scopes, a 24-year-old biology teacher in Dayton, Tenn., violated state law that forbade the teaching of "any theory that denies the story of the Divine Creation of man as taught in the Bible, and to teach instead that man has descended from a lower order of animals." Since there was no question that by teaching evolution Scopes had broken the law, he played only a minor role in the ensuing criminal trial, which pitted three-time presidential candidate William Jennings Bryan, age 65, against defense lawyer Clarence Darrow, age 68.

The trial became a worldwide media event, as more than 100 journalists descended on the small hamlet to watch the philosophical battle, which reached its highest drama when Darrow called the great believer, Bryan, to the stand. Bryan based his testimony on a literal interpretation of the Bible, accepting the creation of Eve from Adam's rib. When Darrow asked, "Did you ever discover where Cain got his wife?" Bryan answered, "No, sir; I leave the agnostics to hunt for her." As Darrow proceeded with questions about the origins of the earth and the ages of rocks, Bryan was reduced to shambling contradictions, finally falling back completely on fundamentalist beliefs.

By the time the 11-day trial ended, newspapers around the nation and around the world were treating Bryan with contempt. Nonetheless Scopes was convicted and fined $100, and fundamentalists cheered the news that the monkey was on the run. The decision was later reversed on a legal technicality, and the authorities didn't dare bring the matter to court again.

Bryan was shocked at the scorn heaped on him and drowned his sorrow in food. Five days after the trial, he sat down to a breakfast that consisted of a large stack of hotcakes soaked in syrup, six fried eggs, three thick slices of ham, an immeasurable amount of fried potatoes, seven corn muffins and six cups of coffee with sugar and cream. Then he died.

Darrow was quite solicitous of his rival's death and mumbled a few words of respect until a reporter told him, "They say that Mr. Bryan died of a broken heart and that you were the cause of it."

Darrow snorted. "Broken heart, hell," he snapped. "He died of a busted belly."

Scotto, Anthony M. (1934–) union leader

Anthony M. Scotto emerged as a force in New York longshoremen's union affairs during the 1960s after the death of Anthony "Tough Tony" Anastasio, to whom he was related by marriage. At the time, Scotto was hailed as a new-breed leader who would bring respectability to waterfront unionism. It was not to be so. In 1979 federal investigators, insisting labor racketeering was still a way of life on the waterfront, arrested Scotto, then general organizer of the AFL-CIO International Longshoremen's Association and president of the union's Local 1814 in Brooklyn, one of the top three posts in the 100,000-member union, representing dock workers from Maine to Texas. He was charged with labor racketeering.

In November, Scotto was convicted of taking more than $200,000 in cash payoffs from waterfront businesses despite his claim that he had "never taken a cent" for himself from anyone. He insisted he had accepted a series of political contributions, not payoffs, totaling $75,000, which he claimed he then gave to New York Lt. Gov. Mario M. Cuomo for his unsuccessful 1977 bid to become mayor of New York City and to New York Gov. Hugh L. Carey for his successful 1978 campaign to win reelection.

In 1980 U.S. District Judge Charles E. Stewart, Jr., sentenced Scotto to five years in prison and fined him $75,000. The judge said he had been "extremely impressed" by letters from prominent politicians and labor and business leaders requesting leniency for Scotto, who could have gotten 20 years. Among those who had testified as character witnesses at his trial were Gov. Carey, and two former New York mayors, Robert Wagner and John V. Lindsay. Convicted along with Scotto was his father-in-law, Anthony Anastasio, the late Tough Tony Anastasio's nephew.

Scottsboro Boys accused rapists

The greatest civil rights battle of the 1930s was the Scottsboro Case, in which nine black youths, aged 13 to 20, were tried and convicted of raping two "Southern ladies" aboard a freight train in Alabama in 1931.

The incident started on a Memphis-bound freight train when the nine blacks got into a fistfight with a number of white youths also riding the rails in search of work. The blacks defeated the whites and tossed them off the slow-moving train. One of the whites reported the clash to authorities and the order was given to "round up every Negro on the train and bring them to Scottsboro."

The freight was halted and the nine youths were taken in by deputies. Also netted were two white females clad in overalls: Victoria Price, 19, and Ruby Bates, 17. Fearing they would be charged with vagrancy, the two declared they had been gang-raped by a dozen blacks, three of whom had jumped from the train. The nine were tied together and hauled to Scottsboro to await Alabama justice, while Victoria Price and Ruby Bates were transformed into the epitome of Southern womanhood. As the story spread, the youths were nothing but "black brutes" who had, among other things, chewed off one of Ruby Bates's breasts.

A whirlwind trial took place within 12 days of the alleged crime. During the trial the defendants were under constant threat of being lynched and National Guardsmen were sent to protect them. Lawyers were finally provided for the nine on the day the trial began; one of the counsels appeared to be drunk during the entire proceedings. At one point in his presentation to the jury, the prosecutor declared, "Guilty or not, let's get rid of these niggers." The jury voted guilty despite medical evidence that while both females had had sexual intercourse, the acts had not occurred as recently as the day of the alleged incident and there was none of the usual signs indicating force had been used. Eight of the nine were sentenced to death, and the youngest, aged 13, was given life imprisonment because of his age, although seven jurors had voted for his execution.

In the succeeding months and years the Scottsboro case was in and out of various courts, with the defendants now represented by attorney Samuel S. Leibowitz, the "New York Jew nigger lover," as he was called. The original verdict was thrown out by the

SEABURY investigation

Supreme Court in 1932 on the basis that the defendants had been denied adequate counsel.

Several trials ensued involving various of the defendants. In that of Clarence Willie Norris, Leibowitz charged that Victoria Price was a prostitute, and Ruby Bates admitted no rapes had occurred. Nevertheless, Norris was convicted. Leibowitz then succeeded in getting several of the convictions set aside by winning a Supreme Court decision that the exclusion of blacks from jury service was unconstitutional. More trials followed. The so-called ringleader, Haywood Patterson, was convicted and given 75 years.

Meanwhile, international protests mounted. Albert Einstein and Theodore Dreiser were in the forefront of the protests. Europeans stoned a number of U.S. consulates and an American bank in Cuba was bombed. Finally, the state, under intense pressure from the public and the press, dropped charges against four defendants, and by the 1940s four more had been paroled. In 1948 Patterson escaped from prison and fled to Michigan, where two years later he was convicted of manslaughter in the stabbing death of a black man. He died in prison in 1952.

By 1980 Norris was the only Scottsboro boy known to be alive. He had jumped parole in 1946, escaped to Ohio and eventually moved to New York. In July 1976 Norris, still a fugitive under Alabama law, applied to Gov. George Wallace for a pardon, which was granted in October. When he went to Alabama early in 1977 to accept his pardon, Norris was hailed by blacks and a great many whites as something of a hero. A few months later, the Alabama House Judiciary Committee voted down a bill to pay him $10,000 compensation.

Seabury investigation New York corruption probe

In 1930 a former jurist, Samuel Seabury, took leave from his lucrative private legal practice to launch a series of probes into New York City's scandal-racked administration, the first important such probe since the much-heralded Lexow Committee investigation of 1894–95. Essentially, the Seabury Investigation arrived at the conclusion that little had improved in a generation, that graft taking, for instance, was a common practice within the police department rather than the acts of a few corrupt officers, or "bad apples."

Seabury's probe of the vice squad was sidetracked for a time when the leading potential witness, a high-priced prostitute and blackmailer named Vivian Gordon, was found strangled to death in Van Cortlandt Park after she had started providing investigators with extensive evidence of corruption. Eventually, 20 members were dismissed.

Seabury determined that bribery of public officers was vital to obtaining special privileges for waterfront leases, bus franchises and variances from building zoning law and in condemnation cases, and was needed to conduct many other activities as well. Day after day the Seabury hearings exposed payoffs, venality and crime, linking the worst criminal elements with the political powers of Tammany Hall, various police commissioners and, especially, Mayor Jimmy Walker. Magistrates squirmed as they tried to explain the special considerations shown to gambling figures and others possessing good political connections.

Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt was accused in some quarters of giving Seabury less than full support, causing Walter Lippmann to write, "Franklin D. Roosevelt is no crusader." Roosevelt at the time was campaigning for the Democratic nomination for president and was wary of offending Tammany. While denouncing civic crime, Roosevelt said he did not feel a strong enough case had been made against Mayor Walker to warrant executive action on his part. However, once the nomination was locked up, with the support of Tammany's Jimmy Hines, Roosevelt reversed himself and fully backed Seabury, declaring that Walker and all other city officeholders had to answer all questions put to them or get out of office.

Seabury hauled a parade of city officials and politicians before the committee and grilled them relentlessly. Caches of money, clearly bribes, turned up all over, and many were linked to the mayor. Walker appeared in the hearing room and brashly announced, "Little Boy Blue is going to blow his horn—or his top." He did neither, proving to be an unimpressive witness as one juicy piece of evidence after another was placed before him.

Walker was forced to admit that at one time he had shared a joint bank account with a broker who had made a $246,692 cash deposit to the account, allegedly the profits from stock transactions, although there was no evidence of this. Later, the mayor had withdrawn the money and put it in his safe. "Not in a tin box," he said, not without a measure of charm. What happened to the money? he was asked. He and his wife had "just spent it."

As more and more evidence piled up against Walker, he lost a lot of his jauntiness. When Roosevelt gave strong indication he was preparing to remove the mayor from office, Walker acted quickly, sending off a telegram to Albany: "I HEREBY RESIGN AS MAYOR OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK . . . JAMES J. WALKER."

The Seabury probe was credited with paving the way for the reform administration of Mayor Fiorello La Guardia. After the investigation Seabury returned to private practice. He died in 1958.

Secret Band of Brothers reputed 19th-century crime syndicate

The first “Mafia” in the United States may not have been the one that originated in Sicily but a mysterious organization said to have started in the 1830s. Not much is known about it other than what appeared in a modest book published in 1847, The Secret Band of Brothers by Jonathan F. Green, who could be described as a 19th-century Joe Valachi. According to Green’s thesis, this secret band was set up and run almost exactly the way Valachi would describe the operations of the Cosa Nostra more than 100 years later. The band had initiation rituals, codes and orders that had to be obeyed without question. Within the ruling organization there were grand masters and vice-grand masters and, above all, a boss of bosses called the worthy grand. The group, Green said, was “pledged to gambling, thievery and villainy of all kinds” and members “wandered from place to place, preying upon the community in the character of barkeepers, pickpockets, thieves, gamblers, horse players, and sometimes murderers.” Orders from the top were written in secret ink and left at message drops in caves and hollow trees.

Among those who believed the story of this secret band was Horace Greeley, who employed Green as the chief undercover agent for his New York Association for the Suppression of Gambling. Green was a reformed gambler and passer of “queer,” or counterfeit money. The Secret Service considered him reliable enough to use as a plant in New York’s Tombs Prison to seek evidence about counterfeiting.

The Secret Band of Brothers was never fully exposed, but that does not necessarily cast doubt on Green’s story. It must be remembered that in this period there was no national police organization to counter such a group and that local police organizations, even if not corrupt, were not equipped to handle such a task. If Green fantasized his secret band, he was a clairvoyant of some skill, given what is known today about the workings of organized crime.

Secret Service federal law enforcement agency

The fastest-growing federal law enforcement unit, the Secret Service is charged with protecting the president of the United States, detecting and arresting counterfeiters and guarding the buildings and vaults of the Treasury Department, of which it is a branch.

Created in 1865 to combat counterfeiters, the Secret Service was the first general law-enforcement agency of the federal government. Abraham Lincoln approved the establishment of the organization during his last cabinet meeting. At various times the service took on added duties, battling opium smuggling, the Ku Klux Klan, extortion rackets, espionage rings and land frauds and even foiling a plot to steal Lincoln’s body from its tomb. These duties were transferred over the years to newer agencies, leaving the Secret Service solely concerned with anticounterfeiting activities until 1901, when presidential protection was added to its chores in the aftermath of the McKinley assassination.

In succeeding years the agency’s presidential protection function was expanded to cover the president-elect, the president’s immediate family, the vice president and vice president-elect, the former presidents and their wives and widows and their children until they reach the age of 16. In 1968 Secret Service protection was extended to include major presidential and vice presidential candidates and, in 1971, the protection of visiting heads of state and other foreign dignitaries.

As such, the Secret Service is seemingly immune from budget-cutting efforts. In 1963, when John F. Kennedy was assassinated, the Secret Service had 389 agents and a budget of $5.4 million. In 1980 it had 1,552 agents and a budget of $157 million. The agency’s Protective Research Section processes some 14,000 cases a year, and in 1978, a typical year, it made 406 arrests and secured 351 convictions or commitments of persons found guilty of threatening the lives of the people—chiefly the president—whom the section is assigned to protect.

Much of the service’s time is consumed checking on potential assassins from a computer list of about 30,000 “risk types” and an even more closely screened roster of “400” prime suspects. Before the president visits a city, the agency checks on each of the “400,” many of whom are mentally disturbed and/or have a history of violence, and puts several under 24-hour surveillance, which may require the use of 14 or 15 agents full time.

The Secret Service had successfully guarded all presidents in its care until the Kennedy assassination in 1963, after which it was severely criticized by the Warren Commission for being ill prepared in manpower and facilities to handle presidential protection under complex modern conditions. This resulted in rapid increases in budget and staff.

Today, the agency considers its protective procedures about as foolproof as they can be made.

The president is often shielded by bulletproof glass shields on stands and the floor of his review stand is fitted with heavy armor plating to protect against bombs. Helicopters fly overhead to keep the sky safe and to watch for rooftop snipers. Secret Service agents have perfected a car with bulletproof hood, windows and tires and now arm themselves with powerful miniature walkie-talkies, .357 magnum revolvers and Israeli-made Uzi submachine guns or M-16 rifles. They are regularly schooled by psychiatrists on the profile of an assassin, although until the two attacks on Gerald Ford in 1975 the classes did not cover females.

Before the president goes near any water, military frogmen check undersea for bombs and the Coast Guard provides vessels for offshore patrols. A week before any presidential visit to a city, agents pour into the area to construct a “sanitized zone.” They work out routes where motorcades can flow freely with a number of sudden turnoffs, should they prove necessary, and crowds can be easily observed. Travel time is computed and the number of men needed to watch rooftops and windows is estimated. Agents closest to the president memorize the faces of “400” suspects believed to be in the area so that they can spot them in a crowd. To prevent the crowd from knowing where agents are looking, they often wear sunglasses, even during heavy rain.

The agency probably feels it can handle threats close to the president as well as those from rooftops. As in the case of Oswald, the biggest danger is spotting a window sniper in time.

White House protection is generally considered to be impregnable. Agents closely examine all food and packages that enter the White House and scrutinize the long lines of tourists. The visitors are constantly watched by TV cameras buried in the ground, hidden under bushes and disguised as lanterns. There is no way anyone can slip across closed-off sections of the White House lawn—seismic sensors planted in the grass will pick up even a baby’s footsteps. Ever since a helicopter unexpectedly came down on the South Lawn, White House police have been armed with Redeye shoulder-fired anti-aircraft guns. All the White House gates have been reinforced ever since an intruder crashed through them one Christmas. And if things ever got really serious, there is a bomb shelter in the East Wing and a tunnel leading from it to a helicopter waiting nearby for sudden evacuation.

Proof of the thoroughness of White House protection was furnished in 1950, when an attempt was made on the life of Harry Truman. At the time Truman was staying across the street in Blair House while repairs to the White House were being made. Two Puerto Rican terrorists, Oscar Collazo and Griselio Torresola, tried to storm Blair House and kill Truman. They managed to kill one guard and wound two others before Torresola was killed and Collazo was brought down wounded. However, the would-be assassins had failed to penetrate even the outer rim of presidential protectors. Had they gotten into Blair House, they would have had to kill at least 20 agents before reaching the president.

The ability of the Secret Service to dictate to a president what he can and cannot do is more myth than reality. Presidents are generally strong-willed individuals used to having their own way, at times forcing agents to cope with situations as best they can. After the two attempts on his life, Gerald Ford proved more amenable to Secret Service dictates, but other presidents have been notoriously uncooperative. Most guilty of wading into crowds on the spur of the moment was Lyndon Johnson. Even Truman, no paragon of security-consciousness himself while in office, lectured Johnson on his lack of cooperation with the guards assigned to protect him. When John Kennedy was shot, no agents were perched on his automobile because of his request. Had they been there, they conceivably could have blocked the assassin’s line of vision to the president.

While it is hardly ever discussed, many agents come to realize that some presidents exhibit latent hostility toward their protectors simply because they resent their constant presence. Even Calvin Coolidge was known to play cruel jokes on the Secret Service.

During his early days in the White House, Coolidge happened to poke behind some curtains and noticed a button on the wall. He pressed it and sat down at his desk to see what would develop. Suddenly, the door flew open and a flock of agents bounded into the room. Coolidge looked up innocently and asked what the rumpus was all about. The men mumbled their apologies and left.

Coolidge had happened on to an alarm the agents had installed throughout the building to signal danger. He immediately pressed the button again. Over the next week, one remembered by the service as a nightmare, he tormented his guards, making the puffing agents charge and recharge into his office while he kept a straight face. Finally, a suspicious agent stayed behind out of sight and watched the president in action. The agent said nothing to Coolidge, but the wires to the button were cut. Thereafter, whenever Coolidge pushed the button, nothing happened, much to his disappointment. And that, at least according to Secret Service folklore, is why Silent Cal never smiled again during the rest of his White House years.

seduction

Generally speaking, there are relatively few prosecutions today for the crime of seduction, which is the act of persuading a chaste female to have sexual intercourse under a promise of marriage or by means of a fraudulent representation.

In recent years seduction prosecutions have declined as a result of the Sexual Revolution. In addition, the crime is effectively and legally erased if the man marries the woman. When a man has taken this escape hatch, however, the courts have been loath to release him from his commitment even if he subsequently was able to prove fraud. In cases where the man suddenly developed proof that he was not the only recipient of the woman's favor, the courts have generally held that only a fool involved in an illicit relationship would believe he was the sole individual so favored.

A New Jersey court used a different rationale in the case of an ex-prostitute who had convinced a man to marry her by telling him that she had been chaste and that he had seduced her. After the marriage the man discovered the truth, but he failed to make legal headway in having the union dissolved. The court declared:

Certainly it would lead to disastrous consequences if a woman who had once fallen from virtue could not be permitted to represent herself as continent and thus restore herself to the rights and privileges of her sex, and enter into matrimony without incurring the risk of being put away by her husband on discovery of her previous immorality. Such a doctrine is inconsistent with reason and a wise and sound policy.

Obviously, seduction cases are shunted off court calendars as expeditiously as possible and simply not permitted to return.

Selman, John (1839–1896) gunman and lawman

Many Western historians have puzzled over the fact that lawman John Selman, with an estimated 20 kills to his credit, never won the mass recognition given to other gunfighters. It may be that his record was just too unsavory to gain admirers, even of the perverse sort who honored badmen, such as Jesse James or Billy the Kid, or lawmen of questionable character such as Wyatt Earp or Wild Bill Hickok.

Selman's most famous kill, which was also typical of his others, was the assassination of the notorious gunfighter Wes Hardin in an El Paso, Tex. saloon in 1895. Selman, then a town constable, walked up behind Hardin, who was standing at the bar, and shot him in the back of the head. At the time, Hardin possessed a full pardon and was not wanted for any crime. According to Selman's novel defense, Hardin had seen him in the mirror, and since the constable was fearful that Wes would whirl and draw, he simply shot first. With that flimsy explanation, Selman managed to beat a murder rap.

With or without a badge, Selman boasted a long line of such murders. When he was not working as a lawman, he was generally committing crimes. After growing up in Arkansas and Texas, Selman tried ranching, first in the New Mexico Territory and then in Texas. In Fort Griffen, Tex. Selman became acquainted with such frontier gunmen as Wyatt Earp, Doc Holliday, Bat Masterson, Killin' Jim Miller, Pat Garrett and Jesse Evans. He also became an aide of Sheriff John Larn, whose previous occupation was cattle rustling, and the pair hit it off famously. In a typical case Selman handled for Larn, he shot to death a man named Hampden in a "gun duel." Since Hampden was half-deaf and unarmed at the time, it was murder rather than a duel. Selman had called on Hampden to stop, and when he kept on walking, the lawman emptied his pistol into him.

When Larn retired from office, the pair started a ranch in partnership and built up their herd by the simple and inexpensive method of lassoing other ranchers' mavericks. Eventually, Larn was arrested and lynched for these transgressions. Selman fled.

After that, he organized a gang known as Selman's Scouts and hired out to ranchers who wanted their range cleared of rustlers. They would do an excellent job and then with the field to themselves, start their own rustling operation. When army pressure caused the gang to break up, Selman shifted to West Texas, where he organized another gang of robbers and rustlers. He was arrested in June 1880 along with his brother, Tom Cat Selman, who was subsequently lynched. On his way back to Shackelford County for trial, he bribed his guards and escaped.

Selman fled to Mexico and moved between that country and the New Mexico Territory until 1888, when he learned the old charges against him in Texas had been dropped. He returned to wide-open El Paso, where he stayed relatively honest for a while, leading cattle drives and working in a smelter. He successfully evaded an attempt on his life and, on the basis of being such an upright citizen, was elected constable in 1892, a job he was to hold for the rest of his life, which wasn't for very long.

On April 5, 1894 Selman and Frank Collinson encountered Deputy U.S. Marshal Bass Outlaw and the trio repaired to Tillie Howard's well-known sporting house for some free entertainment, which their high station entitled them to. Outlaw was mean when drunk and he was almost always drunk; in the whorehouse he went wild, put a gun against the head of Texas Ranger Joe McKidric and shot him twice. Then he started shooting blindly, hitting Selman in the leg twice. Selman shot the crazed lawman in the chest and Outlaw staggered off to die. It was just about Selman's most popular kill.

The following year Selman gunned down Wes Hardin, although that killing wasn't popular. After beating the charges against him he continued as constable until April 1, 1896, when he got into a dispute with yet another lawman, George Scarborough. The pair stepped out into an alley and Scarborough shot him dead. Ironically, the shooting was reminiscent of duels Selman had won—no gun was found on the dead man—and it too was listed as “justifiable homicide.”

That didn't seem to upset folks too much. Most felt that Old John had simply been paid back for some of his previous duels. It might also be noted that Scarborough got his in 1900, when he was killed by Kid Curry of the Wild Bunch.

sentencing of criminals

The sentencing of convicted persons remains to this day one of the most trying procedures of the criminal justice system. Perhaps no other aspect—interrogation, arrest, trial or conviction—of the system is more rife with error and lack of balanced judgment than the sentencing process. Some judges sentence “long” and others “short.” In Crime in America former Attorney General Ramsey Clark offers some illustrations of inequality in sentencing, often in different courtrooms in the same courthouse:

Two boys fail to report for military induction—one is sentenced to five years in prison, the other gets probation and never enters a prison. One judge sentences a robber convicted for the third time to one year in prison, while another judge on the same bench gives a first offender ten years. One man far more capable of serious crime than another and convicted of the same offense may get a fine, while the less fortunate and less dangerous person is sentenced to five years in the state penitentiary. One judge, because of his personal values, thinks homosexuality the most heinous of crimes and gives long sentences. Another hates prostitution. A third judge would never jail juveniles for either offense. Some judges regularly give juvenile offenders prison terms for first-offense car theft, while others turn them over to the custody of their parents.

Inevitably involved in the process are diverse judicial temperament and philosophy as well as varying geographical attitudes. Willard Gayling, in his book Partial Justice, relates a story often told by Judge Edward Lumbard:

A visitor to a Texas court was amazed to hear the judge impose a suspended sentence where a man had pleaded guilty to manslaughter. A few minutes later, the same judge sentenced a man who pleaded guilty to stealing a horse, and gave him life imprisonment. When the judge was asked by the visitor about the disparity between the two sentences, he replied, “Well, down here there is some men that need killin’, but there ain’t no horses that need stealin’.”

Certain crimes draw varying penalties depending on the economy of the area. Thus in Oregon, Gaylin, notes, 18 of 33 Selective Service violators were let off with probation and none of the others got a prison term of more than three years. Yet, in southern Texas, a defense-oriented state, 16 of 16 got prison terms, 14 of them the maximum five years allowed under the law.

One of the leading voices against the disparity of prison sentences was James V. Bennett, director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons for 27 years. He cited an almost endless string of unfair sentences. In one case a 32-year-old unemployed man whose wife had just suffered a miscarriage forged a government check. Despite the fact that he had no previous criminal record, he was sentenced to 15 years. In his memoirs, I Chose Prison, Bennett quoted the judge in that case as saying, “This court intends to stop the stealing and forging of government checks.” Yet that same year, another federal judge in the same circuit gave a defendant just 30 days for a like crime.

In an attempt to answer such inequities, Bennett was instrumental in the establishment in 1959 of “sentencing institutes,” where judges could exchange views on sentencing theories. There have been other limited advances. In Crime and Punishment Aryeh Neier, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union, notes, “Sentencing councils’ are another relatively recent innovation. The councils bring together probation officers and judges in an area to review recommendations for sentences by trial judges before the sentences are imposed. While the trial judge can reject the views of his colleagues, the discussions tend to circumscribe extreme disparities in sentencing.” Unfortunately, Neier adds, such programs are only moderately popular in the federal court system and are not used “in most court systems where the great majority of criminals are sentenced.”

There was a period recently when indeterminate sentencing was viewed by reformers as the only viable alternative to sentencing inequities. Ramsey Clark was a promoter of the idea as late as 1970. Since that time the idea of sentencing without a fixed term has fallen into disfavor, although it lifted a great burden off many judges. In 1976 Alan M. Dershowitz, professor at Harvard Law School, wrote: “The era of the indeterminate sentence . . . is quickly drawing to a close. Reaction is beginning to set in.”

Many criminologists now agree that indeterminate sentences actually tend to result in longer prison terms than most judges would mete out and that the disparity in sentencing is often increased rather than reduced. Additionally, such sentences tend to give correctional officials too much control over prisoners’ lives and are psychologically dangerous to many prisoners because they can never be sure when they will be released. These factors are often cited as the reason behind many prison riots.

The most recent proposal calls for the abolishment of the federal parole system and a reduction in the sentencing latitude given judges. Under this proposal, probably best articulated by former Attorney General Edward H. Levi, a permanent federal commission would establish sentencing guidelines for judges. In 1976 Levi said, “If a judge decided to impose a sentence inconsistent with the guidelines, he would have to accompany the decision with specific reasons for the exception, and the decision would be subject to appellate review.”

Of course, even without such a system, appellate review of a sentence is possible, but it is extremely rare. “When it happens,” notes Neier, “it is generally because judges have gratuitously offered their reasons for particular sentences and included impermissible considerations, as when a New Jersey judge cited an antiwhite poem by LeRoi Jones [Imamu Baraka] as the reason for giving him an extended prison term.”

In other cases judges have refused to give shorter sentences or probation because a defendant insisted on a jury trial. It is obvious that justice often goes awry the first instant society attempts to apply fitting punishment. Few experts on crime today would deny that an unfair sentence started John Dillinger down the road to becoming Public Enemy No. 1. In 1924 Dillinger and an older man, Ed Singleton, were quickly apprehended attempting to rob an Indiana grocer. The 21-year-old Dillinger pleaded guilty and drew a sentence of 10 to 20 years, although he had been assured by the local prosecutor that as a first offender, he would be treated lightly if he entered a guilty plea. Singleton, 10 years older than Dillinger, was brought before a different judge and drew a far shorter sentence; he was released after doing two years. Dillinger ended up serving nine years. As Wayne Coy, a state official said in 1934: “There does not seem to me to be any escape from the fact that the State of Indiana made John Dillinger the Public Enemy that he is today. . . . Instead of reforming the prisoner, the penal institutions provided him with an education in crime.”

September Morn “pornographic” painting

In the early years of the 20th century the most famous American “pornographic” painting was born. It was September Morn, a picture of a somewhat immodest young lady taking a bath in a pond. Alas, September Morn really wasn’t a very notable work of art, being a lithograph turned out for a brewer’s calendar, but it fell victim to, and became famous because of, Comstockery, the puritanical view of Anthony Comstock, the “great American bluenose” and head of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice.

In fact, the guiding genius behind making the work a commercial success was Harry Reichenbach, the great publicist. Reichenbach was just beginning his career when he was hired by a Fourth Avenue art dealer to promote a picture of a naked girl taking a bath in a pond. The dealer was stuck with 2,000 prints and had not made a single sale. Reichenbach telephoned Comstock, passing himself off as a minister, and said he had to report a disgraceful situation, the painting of a naked woman. “She’s in the window of an art store on Fourth Avenue, and little boys are gathering around there to look at her.”

Reichenbach rounded up several boys and gave them a quarter a piece to stand in front of the art store and gape at the picture. Comstock arrived and nearly choked in rage. “Remove that filthy picture!” he fumed, and when the dealer refused, he commenced legal action.

Comstock lost the legal case because even in that era the picture was found to be about as suggestive as one of a baby in a family album. But the censorship effort against September Morn made it a national issue. It became the source of songs and jokes as well as the target of attacks by reformers. Over seven million copies were sold at a dollar a piece, and to this day enjoys good sales.

serial killers the new mass murderers

The annals of crime provide an endless parade of mass murderers, but in the early 1980s the public perception grew that there was a new type of mass murderer on the loose, the “serial killer” who seems to engage in homicide for mere “recreation.” It is doubtful that this really was a new phenomenon, but if we accept that perception, one might describe Theodore Bundy as the “godfather” of this new ilk. In an effort to categorize serial killers, researchers have come up with numerous theories of or behavior patterns in such killers. True serial killers, say experts, are “recreational” killers, for whom profit or sexual motives do not exist or are of minor consequence. They take their victims at random, literally for the “sport.” Only about 10 percent of serial killers are “social killers,” that is, operating with one or more accomplices in either the same or mixed sexual groupings.

More important, we are told, is the fact that serial killers—far more than their counterparts among average murderers—have histories of aberrant symptoms in childhood, such as persistent bed-wetting, arson, and cruelty to pets and other animals. However, as psychologists have pointed out, human behaviors and character traits are usually well set between the ages of two and five. To expect society to mobilize for a war on serial killers on the basis of such theories demands too much from the criminal justice system and especially from the police, whose abilities to investigate strong evidence of potential serial killers is woeful, to say the least. When the parents of youths who turned out to be victims of Dean Corll, an infamous serial killer of the 1970s (somewhat before the term came into usage), complained to Houston, Texas, police by the dozens that their sons were missing, the force took little pains investigating, simply informing the worried parents that the boys had probably run off and “joined those hippies in California.” Before he was himself killed, Corll proceeded to murder at least 27 youths—with the Houston police oblivious to the threat of a mass murderer or serial killer loose in the city.

What then is an appropriate estimate of the death toll resulting from serial murders? There are experts who accept an FBI estimate that is truly staggering. Of the approximately 5,000 killers who go unapprehended each year, the agency has indicated that 3,500 could be the work of serial killers, such as the so-called “Green River Killer” who has never been apprehended. Some observers insist we are in the midst of an “epidemic of homicidal mania,” especially as to the barbarity of the crimes committed. Other researchers are less convinced, noting that the depredations of mass murderers of an earlier era, such as at the turn of the century, were probably equally gruesome. What has changed, they feel, is the loss of inhibitions by the media in reporting bizarre sexual practices of the serial killers. Oddly, the Victorian era eschewed such frightful details but allowed descriptions of cannibalism, which was presumed to be nonsexual.

Today we frequently accept the media’s description of a recent carnage as “the crime of the century” to the extent that we can embrace one or more annually, although, some murders achieve this status due to the social significance attached to them.

serial killers—female

If one acknowledges that a new type of serial killer, more prolific, more twisted, and perhaps more puzzling, appeared since the 1980s, one must recognize the phenomenon of the female serial killer. Found occasionally in novels and movies, an example being the crazed prostitute who kills her johns, she does exist in real life. In the early 1990s a Florida hooker named Aileen Wournos was apprehended for murdering seven of her johns and, evidence to the contrary, was labeled by some as the first documented female serial killer. When she was convicted of a first murder, Wournos swore at the jury and stated that she had been a victim of rape.

The hallmark of a female serial killer is that she tends to get away with her crimes over an extended period. Certainly that was true of Stella Williamson, who in some cases kept her crimes hidden for more than a half-century. No one in Gallitzin, Pennsylvania, knew much about Stella other than the ordinary talk between neighbors. Stella tended to keep generally to herself. She attended church and other social functions but never imparted much information about her own life. When she died in 1980 at the age of 76, one of her few acquaintances found a letter in her house that was marked not to be opened until after her death.

The letter informed police to open a battered old trunk in the attic. Inside police found the pathetic withered remains of five infants wrapped in newspapers dated from 1923 to 1933. So far as was known, Stella who had never married, apparently bore the children and disposed of four of them soon after they were born (one was a few months old). The story shocked the town of Gallitzin, the residents having no experience of serial killers, and certainly not a female one.

Starting in the eighties there seemed to be a perceptible increase in female serial killers. Marybeth Roe Tinning of Schenectady, New York murdered eight of her children, and there was a rash of caregiver murderers. Genene Jones, a Texas nurse, killed several babies. A much-publicized serial killing case involved Dorothea Puente, a wealthy California woman who gave much-heralded sanctuary to needy old people in her mansion. Since her borders often had little ability to run their own affairs, Dorothea arranged to get their Social Security checks sent to her. Her only problem was collecting the checks if and when the people died. There was the chance they would go to the hospital and die there so that a death certificate would be made out. Or they might be walking on the street and collapse and die with the same troubling result. Dorothea found it more prudent to kill them herself and bury the bodies in her garden. No complications and the checks kept coming.

One of the more bizarre examples of the new-wave female serial killers was Gwendolyn Graham, a Michigan nursing home nurse who smothered five elderly victims with the assistance of her female lover in 1987. The accomplice, Catherine Wood, made a deal for a conviction of second-degree murder and offered testimony against Graham. According to prosecutors the partnership in the killings was part of a lover's pact.

Seven Group forerunner of the National Crime Syndicate

The bootleg wars of the 1920s were the bloodiest underworld battles in American history, with a death toll that climbed into the thousands. In many parts of the country, peace came with the establishment of the Seven Group.

During the first years of Prohibition various underworld mobs faced a scramble for liquor and had to constantly protect their supplies from being hijacked by other gangs. What was needed was an organization that would set up a central liquor buying office, which would handle all orders for booze and give everyone a fair share. This system would reduce the bloody competition for supplies and cut down on the enormous expense involved in protecting booze shipments, and the organizations could then easily handle any freelance hijackers who might still try to operate.

It is not clear who originated the idea of the Seven Group, but among those pushing it in 1927 were Lucky Luciano, Meyer Lansky, Arnold Rothstein and Johnny Torrio. As originally constituted, the Seven Group were made up of seven distinct power groups. The seven were Luciano and Frank Costello from Manhattan; Joe Adonis from Brooklyn; Longy Zwillman from Long Island, N.Y. and New Jersey; Meyer Lansky and Bugsy Siegel, the bootleg "enforcers"; Waxey Gordon and Nig Rosen from Philadelphia; Nucky Johnson from Atlantic City; and Torrio, who came out of retirement to act as an adviser and counselor.

As the Seven Group quickly proved its viability, it attracted other gangs around the country, such as those headed by Moe Dalitz in Cleveland; Danny Walsh in Providence and King Solomon in Boston. Even Al Capone saw the value of the setup, but the bloodletting in Chicago had gone on too long to be halted by reason. In much of the country, excluding Chicago, a new peace was achieved among the 22 gangs that joined the Seven Group.

However, the historic importance of the Seven Group was that it represented the first real step in establishing nationwide criminal links that would lead, in just a few years, to the creation of the national crime syndicate. The Atlantic City Conference of 1929, at which plans for new criminal enterprises following the end of Prohibition were first discussed, would never have been held were it not for the success of the Seven Group, which was regarded by the conferees as a model for future cooperation.

Shame of Abilene "pornographic" painting

In the days before September Morn was to become the most notorious painting in America, the Shame of Abilene was the West's most shocking work of art and one that indirectly added a notch to the gun of Wild Bill Hickok, the famous lawman of Abilene, Kan.

In 1871 two of the West's most colorful characters, Ben Thompson, a pathological gunman, and Phil Coe, a dapper Texas gambler, arrived in Abilene and opened the Bull's Head Tavern and Gambling Saloon. The establishment was typical of the town's other recreational outlets except for its facade. The owners of the Bull's Head had a representation of a giant bull painted across the front of the building. It was a bull of monumental proportions, with certain anatomical features enlarged even beyond the enormous scale of the rest of the painting.

SHAKUR, Tupac

The fame of Abilene's bull spread with telegraphic speed, and cowboys from hundreds of miles around spurred to Abilene to see the big bull and tarry at the saloon's gambling tables. By the time news of the Shame of Abilene had reached the East, the more straight-laced elements of the town had demanded that the marshal do something about it. Wild Bill had words with Coe, Thompson being out of town at the time, and gave the gambler 24 hours to remove the bull, or at least the objectionable parts. Coe stood pat. The following day, armed with a can of paint and a brush, Hickok painted over the offending section of the picture.

Decency prevailed but bad blood remained. Within days, on October 5, 1871, a shoot-out of sorts developed between Coe and Hickok. It was no contest; Coe was fatally wounded. Puritans and defenders of Wild Bill Hickok have always claimed the cause of the gunfight was the painting. Another group has held that other, monetary reasons caused the battle and that it was pure murder on Hickok's part.

Shakur, Tupac (1971–1996) unsolved murder victim

It has been observed by many that in some cases at least rap music and crime are soul mates. Certainly the point could be made concerning rap star Tupac Shakur. Shakur had frequently romped on the very edge of deadly violence.

Within the parameters of the violent elements in the rap world, Shakur had more than one scrap with violence. In 1994 he was the victim of a shooting at Quad Records in New York. Shakur made no bones about a rap group being involved in setting him up for that near fatal attack.

When Shakur was 10 years old he told a minister of his ambition to be a revolutionary when he was older. His mother, Afreni Shakur, was a founding force of the New York branch of the Black Panther Party, and his father was once suspected in a plot to blow up police stations and department stores. His stepfather was convicted in planning the robbery of a Brink's armored truck in which two guards were killed. If nothing else, Shakur's history helped explain why he was considered to have done a brilliant acting job as a gangster in a 1992 movie, Juice.

By 1996 Shakur was at the top of the heap in the rap music world, but had built up a full line-up of Shakur haters. Some of those haters were obviously in Las Vegas on September 7, 1996 when Shakur arrived to attend the heavyweight battle between Mike Tyson and Bruce Seldon at the MGM Grand Hotel. Shakur and Tyson were to appear later at Club 662. The match ended quickly, Tyson being declared the winner after only 109 seconds. Shortly after the fight Shakur and his bodyguards engaged in a scuffle with a man near the hotel's Grand Garden. Around 11 P.M. Shakur was riding in a new black BMW sedan belonging to and being driven by Suge Knight of Death Row Records to the club where the Shakur-Tyson party was soon to get under way.

About a mile from the Strip a light-colored Cadillac occupied by three or four men pulled up beside the BMW and a man in the backseat of the Cadillac aimed a semiautomatic pistol from the window and let loose a barrage of an estimated 13 shots. One shot grazed Knight's head. Five other slugs ripped into Shakur. Three other cars were in the entourage with the BMW occupied by Shakur's bodyguards and friends, and these vehicles and a couple of others took off in pursuit of the killer Cadillac but that car made it away through heavy Las Vegas traffic.

Shakur and Knight were taken to University Medical Center where Shakur underwent a total of three operations. During the first just after the shooting, Shakur's right lung was removed to halt internal bleeding. In the next days Shakur would have two more operations but on September 14 he died.

Police had no dearth of possible motives, including street gang revenge for the quarrel Shakur had after the match. It turned out that person was allied with the Crips while Knight was a friend of the Bloods. Police also theorized about the group Shakur had accused of the New York City attack on him. There was also speculation that the motive might have been money since Knight had not long ago taken out a $1 million dollar policy on Shakur's life. Other observers felt there probably was yet another motive hidden in Shakur's violent life. In any event the murder of the rap star went unsolved.

Shanghai Chicken (1839–1871) shanghaier's runner

The most famous of the runners who supplied bodies for the shanghaiers of San Francisco was Johnny Devine, better known as the Shanghai Chicken.

Little is known of the Shanghai Chicken except that he was born in New York and was shanghaiied at age 18, turning up two years later in San Francisco, where he became an ornament of the waterfront. He quickly emerged a jack of all crimes, working industriously as a pickpocket, sneak thief, burglar, footpad and, eventually, pimp. He also hired out as a maimer and hit man for anyone who would pay his price, which was around $50. Although he was arrested seven times during his first nine months in San Francisco, he served no more than 50 days in jail.

With a record like that it was inevitable that Devine would soon attract the attention of Shanghai Kelly, probably the greatest kidnapper of sailors the world has ever known. In a few short years the Shanghai Chicken rose to be Kelly's chief of staff. He was one of the few in the trade who violated the rule that forbade stealing another runner's captives. Once, he tried to hijack a drunken sailor from Tommy Chandler, a particularly rough runner for Shanghai Brown. Chandler, a brute of a man, flattened the Chicken with a mighty punch to the jaw. The Chicken climbed to his feet and felled the sailor with a slungshot and then pulled a pistol and put two bullets into Chandler, leaving him incapacitated for months. The Chicken then lugged his prize off to Shanghai Kelly's boardinghouse.

In 1869 the Shanghai Chicken met his match in the person of Big Billy Maitland, another one of Shanghai Kelly's rivals. In an altercation at Maitland's saloon, Big Billy came after the Chicken with a knife; when the latter raised his arm to protect himself, Maitland neatly slashed off his hand at the wrist. Big Billy then tossed him out of his saloon. The Chicken brushed himself off with his one good hand and then screamed out to Maitland: "Hey, Billy, you dirty bastard! Chuck out me fin!"

Maitland flipped the severed hand out to the sidewalk, and the wounded Chicken staggered to Dr. Simpson's drugstore at Pacific and Davis, where he flung the gory hand on the counter. "Say, Doc," he said, "stick that on again for me, will you?"

He fainted before he could be informed that surgery had not yet advanced to that level of sophistication. The Chicken recovered from his wound and medical men attached a large iron hook to the stump of his left arm. Thereafter, he became an even more dangerous battler on the waterfront. While he earlier had earned the name of the Shanghai Chicken for some unknown reason, the hook now allowed him to fight in the manner of a battling cock. Keeping his hook honed to needle sharpness, the Chicken could cut open a foe with one quick thrust. But after his injury he drank so heavily that Shanghai Kelly fired him. Ever looking for ways to make an extra dollar, Kelly promptly attempted to shanghai the Chicken. Kelly's men got the Chicken as far as the boat landing, where he broke his bonds and started slashing away with his iron hook. The kidnapers fled, many bleeding profusely. The Chicken then made off with Kelly's boat and sold it to another shanghaier.

As a loner, the Chicken now had to make a living by rolling drunks and committing small thefts. He made the mistake of thinking a German sailor wouldn't resist; when the sailor did, he shot and killed him. The Chicken stowed away on a steamer scheduled to leave San Francisco but was discovered before the ship sailed.

He was still wearing the victim's cap, since he had left his own hat at the murder scene. The Shanghai Chicken was hanged in 1871.

Shanghai Smoke

In the heyday of the San Francisco shanghaiers, various potions were used to knock out likely victims. Most, like the Miss Piggott Special, were concoctions of various whiskeys and brandies with a goodly amount of opium or laudanum added. It remained for the legendary Shanghai Kelly to come up with something really novel, in the form of a cigar known as the Shanghai Smoke, which he had specially made for him by a Chinese cigar maker. Heavily laced with opium, it rapidly dulled the senses of a potential victim to the point that he could be led into an alley and waylaid, eliminating the need to lure him into a saloon and thereby saving time. The Shanghai Smoke became very popular on the Barbary Coast until cigars became so notorious that men would not accept a stogie unless the donor would smoke one also. Ultimately, the widespread wariness led to the Shanghai Smoke's decline in popularity.

shanghaiing

The custom of kidnapping seamen to fill out a ship's crew was practiced worldwide, but nowhere was the art so perfected as along the San Francisco waterfront.

In early times there were no ships sailing directly from San Francisco to Shanghai and back to San Francisco; the round trip involved a long dangerous cruise, which became known as a Shanghai voyage. When a man in San Francisco was forcibly impressed into a ship's crew, he was thus described as being "sent to Shanghai." This in time was shortened to just plain shanghaiing.

By 1852, 23 known gangs in San Francisco were engaged in the shanghai trade. Some, of course, would waylay men foolish enough to walk the shadowy waterfront alone, but few shanghai gangs would wait so patiently for a fly to enter their web. The gangs employed runners to board incoming ships and induce sailors to come to boardinghouses they operated. As the San Francisco Times of October 21, 1861 reported:

They swarm over the rail like pirates and virtually take possession of the deck. The crew are shoved into the runners' boats, and the vessel is often left in a perilous *situation, with none to manage her, the sails unfurled, and she liable to drift afoul of the shipping at anchor.

SHANNON, Robert K. G. "Boss"

In some cases not a man has been left aboard in half an hour after the anchor has been dropped.*

The runners would all carry the standard gear of their trade: a pair of brass knuckles, a blackjack or slungshot, a knife, a revolver, obscene pictures, several bottles of rum and whiskey spiked with Spanish fly and a flask of liquid soap. If the runners swarmed aboard at meal time, the soap would be slipped into soup or stew simmering on the galley stove. When this awful mixture was served, the seamen would be disgusted and much more receptive to the runner's spiel. First, the runners would offer the sailors some doctored liquor. After that began to take effect, the seamen would be shown obscene pictures and given an enticing, graphic description of what awaited them at a certain boardinghouse as well as the brothels of the Barbary Coast.

Usually, this was enough to convince at least one sailor, and he would be ushered to a runner's boat, where the boatman would give him more to drink. If the sailor showed signs of wavering or attempted to fight, the runner and boatman would club him into silence. Sailors who insisted on staying with their ship were often brass-knuckled or threatened with knives or guns. Often competing runners would settle on the same sailor and each would seize an ear with his teeth and bite down until the frightened man shouted out the boardinghouse he wished to go to. It was considered a serious violation of the runner's code for one runner to steal another's victim.

Some captains would try to protect their crew, but they were helpless when as many as a score of armed men stormed aboard. In addition, shipmasters were often warned by "certain interested parties," as the San Francisco Times put it in 1861, meaning the politicians and city officials who received payoffs from the boardinghouse masters, to look the other way or they would not be allowed to raise a crew when they were ready to sail.

Once a sailor reached the boardinghouse, his bag of possessions would be locked up and he would virtually be held prisoner until he was resold to an outgoing vessel. Captive sailors were sold whiskey laced with opium to keep them docile and, on occasion, prostitutes would be brought in to service them; the boardinghouse master would get a percentage of the prostitutes' fees and whatever they could steal from the sailors. A shipmaster would pay the boardinghouse master between $25 and $100 for each crewman he supplied plus a customary two-months' advance salary to cover the seaman's bill in the boardinghouse. There was seldom any money

Shanghaiing could exist on such an organized basis only because most sailors were brutalized men, long subjected to harsh treatment aboard ship and thus conditioned to receiving the same when ashore. Finally, with the rise of unions and a federal law against shanghaiing, the vicious practice began to disappear after 1906.

Shannon, Robert K. G. "Boss" (1877–1956) criminal hideout proprietor

For the gangsters of the 1920s and 1930s in need of a safe refuge after a prison escape or a big job, the man to see was Robert K. G. Shannon in Wise County, Tex. The so-called boss of the county, Shannon was a gifted political operator who could deliver votes on demand and thus generally had the run of the county. He established his comfortable Paradise ranch as an underworld haven, charging felons hefty sums for the use of a hideout where no local law officials would snoop.

Boss Shannon was the stepfather, late in life, of Kathryn Kelly, and it was through his connections with the underworld that Kathryn's husband, George "Machine Gun" Kelly, finally made it into big-time crime. Shannon's ranch was used to hide Charles Urschel, kidnapped and held for a $200,000 ransom by the Kelly couple and Albert Bates. During this time Shannon irritated Kelly and Bates by giving refuge to three prison escapees, thus endangering a big-money operation for "small potatoes." Bates and Kelly were able to roust two of the fugitives by simply ordering them to leave but were less successful with the third, a leading public enemy named Harvey J. Bailey, who was suffering from a leg wound. Heavily armed, Bailey informed them he was not yet in shape to leave. The kidnapers then tried a different tack, giving Bailey $1,000 traveling money. Bailey took the money and said he would leave when he was able. He was still there when Bates and the Kellys pulled out.

Shannon was so awed by the big-time kidnapping operation that he refused to take any money for providing the kidnapers with a hiding place, saying it would be wrong to take from "family." Later, Shannon and his wife, Ora, Kathryn Kelly's mother, drew life sentences for their part in the crime. Eventually, Shannon's sentence was reduced to 30 years. In 1944 he was pardoned by President Franklin Roosevelt on the grounds of ill health and advanced age. He died at the age of 79 on Christmas Day 1956 at a hospital in Bridgeport, Tex.

Shapiro, Jacob “Gurrah” (1899–1947) labor racketeer One of the most fearsome of all labor racketeers, Jacob “Gurrah” Shapiro worked New York’s garment industry in the 1920s and 1930s with all the finesse of a gorilla run amok. Shapiro was the chief lieutenant of Louis Buchalter, better known as Louis Lepke. The pair had met as teenagers in 1914, when they attempted to rob the same pushcart one day on the Lower East Side. It was the beginning of a murderous friendship. Lepke relied on Shapiro’s muscle and Shapiro certainly needed Lepke’s brain.

Lepke’s plan, developed in the early 1920s, called for the pair to move into the union field and terrorize certain locals by the judicious or even indiscriminate use of beatings and murders. The next step would be to seize control, which would put them in a position to take kickbacks, or skim dues, from union members and then extort big payoffs from garment manufacturers who wanted to avoid strikes. At the same time, Lepke and Shapiro joined with the top labor racketeer of the day, Jacob “Little Augie” Orgen, to provide strike-breaking crews for employers. When Little Augie was assassinated in 1927 (according to one account, Shapiro was behind the wheel of the assassins’ car when Augie was machine-gunned to death on the street), Lepke and Shapiro inherited a major part of the labor extortion racket.

Always, Lepke supplied the strategy and Shapiro the brawn. He was a lumbering hulk, growling orders in rasping bursts of sound. His stock phrase was, “Get out of here,” but in his guttural snarl it came out “Gurra dahere.” So his acquaintances took to calling him “Gurrah.”

Although Gurrah became enormously rich in the rackets, he could never forsake the jobs of the black-jack, the knife, the gun, the bottle of acid—the “persuaders” used by labor racketeers. He was always in the forefront of the skull smashers when anyone tried to organize a legitimate rival union.

When Lepke led his forces into the emerging national crime syndicate, organized mainly by Lucky Luciano, he was put in charge of Murder, Inc., the enforcement arm of the syndicate. His chief aides were Shapiro and Albert Anastasia. Gurrah handled a number of assignments personally and spent the rest of his time searching for the proper young talent to carry out other murders. When racketeer Dutch Schultz, a genuine devotee of violence, went before the syndicate’s ruling board in 1935 to propose killing an ambitious special prosecutor named Thomas Dewey, only Gurrah and Anastasia sided with him. Luciano and Lepke rounded up the votes against the proposal arguing that such a murder would generate too much heat. Gurrah immediately fell in line behind his mentor, as did Anastasia. That left only Schultz holding to the insane plot, but he insisted he would carry out the job alone. As a result, Schultz was wiped out by syndicate killers.

Later, Gurrah saw the syndicate’s decision not to kill Dewey as folly, especially when the special prosecutor turned on the Lepke-Shapiro union rackets. In 1936 Gurrah was sentenced to life for labor racketeering and in 1944 Lepke went to the chair for murder. During Lepke’s trial Gurrah had managed to smuggle a message to him from the federal penitentiary at Atlanta. Its sulfurous introduction recalled Schultz’ 1935 plan to assassinate Dewey and it ended with a triumphant “I told you so.”

The embittered Gurrah died in prison in 1947, still convinced his only failing was not being violent enough.

Sheeler, Rudolph (1916–) victim of false confession

When Officer James T. Morrow was shot and killed by an unknown gunman on November 23, 1936 the Philadelphia homicide squad swung into action to solve the cop killing. They demonstrated a remarkable ability to extract confessions from a number of suspects. First to confess was a man named Joseph Broderick, but on second thought, the police released him and arrested George Harland Bilger, a criminal well known to them. Obliging, Bilger also confessed and was sent off to the penitentiary. After about three years the police had another thought: they decided a mad-dog gunman named Jack Howard was the killer. However, they could not extract a confession, since sometime previously Howard had been shot dead in a gun battle with a detective. Thereupon the police apparently concluded that Howard had had an accomplice, one Rudolph Sheeler, who at least was still alive.

Sheeler vanished into the recesses of police headquarters. A week later he confessed and was in due course sentenced to life imprisonment. After that, Bilger was pardoned and released.

It took Sheeler 12 years to clear himself. After seven years in prison, he told the institution’s chaplain how he had been battered with questions for hours on end until he could no longer stand it. Sheeler’s wife had produced records that proved her husband was at work in New York at the time of the killing in Philadelphia. The priest promptly passed the facts on to the authorities, but they took no action. Sheeler stayed in jail for five more years until he won a new trial through the efforts of a University of Pennsylvania criminal law professor named Louis B. Schwartz. Finally, in 1951 Sheeler got a directed verdict of not guilty from Judge James Gay Gordon, Jr., who called the case “a black and shameful page in the history of the Philadelphia police department and an ominous counterpart of what occurs daily behind the Iron Curtain.”

SHEEP killing

sheep killing

Some of the bitterest conflicts in American history were the sheepmen-cattlemen wars that embroiled the West well into the 20th century, spawning a rich trove of literature and films. However, it is doubtful that many more than 20 or 30 murders can be attributed to such range wars. The true barbarity of the struggle was the incredible slaughter of sheep. Essentially, the conflict was started by cowmen who were determined not to be “sheeped out”; the sheep allegedly destroyed the grass and polluted the streams to the detriment of cattle and horses. The cattlemen wouldn’t listen to the claims of sheepmen that with proper management both animals could be grazed on the same land without problems. Instead, they launched terror raids in which sheepmen were driven off and sometimes killed, but primarily they focused on the sheep themselves. The animals were shot, clubbed, stabbed, dynamited, poisoned, burned, drowned and stampeded over cliffs, a tactic called rim-rocking.

In the 1880s, Charles Hanna, who had introduced sheep to Texas, one morning found his entire herd of 300 dead with their throats cut, and in the Arizona Territory cattlemen drove some 4,000 sheep into the Little Colorado River, causing hundreds to perish in quicksand. In Garfield County, Colo. raiders stampeded 3,800 sheep over a bluff into Parachute Creek in 1894. In another raid in that same county, only one sheep survived the slaughter of a flock of more than 1,500. The greatest killings occurred in Wyoming, where raiders once slaughtered 12,000 sheep in a single night. At Tie Siding the raiders set fire to the wool of 2,600 sheep, killing virtually all of them. In 1905 the secretary of the Crook County Sheep Shooters Association in Oregon boasted that the group had slaughtered 8,000 to 10,000 sheep the previous season and promised they would improve on that record in the year ahead. The same year, 10 masked Wyoming raiders shot or clubbed to death more than 4,000 sheep belonging to Louis Gantz. They destroyed the sheepman’s wagons and provisions and tied two sheepdogs to the wagons and burned them to death. Gantz did not attempt to prosecute the raiders, knowing they would not be convicted in a Wyoming court.

By 1909 public opinion had started to turn against the raiders. After a score of them attacked a herd of 5,000 sheep, murdering three herders and killing dogs and sheep with kerosene and fire, Herbert Brink and six others were indicted. Four confessed and Brink was sentenced to death, but his punishment was later reduced to life imprisonment. Organized sheep killing nonetheless continued for a number of years until cowmen finally discovered that sheep could indeed share the same range with cattle. The sheep actually improved the sod with their hoofs, and their droppings fertilized the ground. The cowmen started raising sheep along with their cattle and found them an economic lifesaver in the years beef prices fell.

shell game swindle

The shell game—under which of the three shells is the pea?—is as old as America itself. Gambling authority John Scarne insists the first “thimble-rigger,” as an operator of the shell game was called, arrived on these shores shortly after the Mayflower. The game itself is much older and was no doubt practiced by crooked gamblers in ancient Egypt and perhaps earlier in other places. Alciphron of Athens wrote an excellent description of the cups and balls, a forerunner of the shell game, in the 2nd century A.D.

In its standard form the game can never be won by the sucker, since the pea is not under any of the shells when he is making his selection. After the operator clearly places the pea under one shell and starts shifting all three around, he gingerly lifts the shell so that the pea is stuck between the back of the shell and the table top (generally a felt surface). He then pops the pea out between his thumb and first finger, and when he takes his hand away, his finger is covering the pea. After the sucker makes his pick of the shells and loses, the operator pulls the other two shells back toward him as he turns them over, in the process slipping the pea under one of them and announcing, “If you’d picked this shell, you would have been a winner.”

The principle of the shell game is never to allow the sucker to win even once, the theory being that a loser will become more desperate and bet even greater amounts in a futile effort to get even. The greatest thimble-riggers were such 19th century gamblers as Canada Bill Jones (“Suckers have no business with money, anyway”), who is reputed to have won the deeds to several plantations with the shell game, and Soapy Smith, who made a fortune with the game before being shot dead by a vigilante in Alaska in 1898. There is only one recorded case where Smith lost at a shell game. A knowledgeable victim placed a gun on the little table, made a huge bet and announced he was wagering on which two shells the pea was not under. He turned them over himself and, naturally, found no pea. “I reckon there’s no need to turn over the last shell,” he said, taking his money. Smith folded up his table and left.

There have been numerous exposés of the shell game, the first by a reformed Mississippi gambler named Jonathan F. Green, who, beginning in 1843, wrote several books on cheating. Despite this exposure, the shell game has continued to prosper and can still be seen at carnivals, horse races and other sporting events and, in recent years, on the streets of major cities. The shell game is often played in New York’s Wall Street area, especially on payday.

Shepard, Matthew (1977–1998) gay murder victim

The 1998 murder of 21-year-old University of Wyoming student Matthew Shepard, an acknowledged homosexual, has in recent years come to signify the true horrors of murderous “gay bashing.” Shepard was picked up in a bar by three young men who took him to an isolated area, robbed him and abused him horribly, and trussed him up to die a slow pitiful death.

Eventually, all three perpetrators were convicted of murder, during which the judge in one trial tossed out one defendant’s claim that his fear of gays caused him to suffer “sex panic.”

Public sympathy in Wyoming was for the most part favorable for the murder victim—with some exceptions—and while many Wyoming citizens petitioned for the addition of a hate crimes bill that included sexual orientation, others insisted the legal status quo was sufficient, little really changing because of the horrible murder of Matthew Shepard.

Undoubtedly most Wyoming citizens were truly upset by Matthew Shepard’s fate, but there was a public sense by many people around the country who held the view that gay bashing remains a relatively isolated occurrence. Speaking for the National Coalition of Anti-Violence Programs, Jeffrey Montgomery noted that the number of gay bashings appeared to be holding relatively constant but “what we’re seeing has been a marked and terrible increase in the severity, viciousness and brutality of the crimes.”

Reflecting on this, Judy Shepard, Matthew’s mother and now a spokesperson in antigay bashing activism, said, “I think some people are feeling more threatened now. I’m just hoping it’s a last gasp.” What the public does not fully grasp is that gay bashings are exceedingly common. In the year since Matthew Shepard’s murder, there were no less than 28 others of equally horrendous characteristics, most hardly reported in the media. Only the truly ghoulish seem to pass muster as worthy of publicity. In February 1999 Billy Jack Gaither was found in Alabama with his throat slashed, his head smashed open with an ax-handle and his body set ablaze on kerosene-soaked tires. Just a few weeks later, Henry Edward Northington suffered decapitation with his severed head toted a mile from his body to be placed on a busy footbridge in a noted gay cruising area.

Judy Shepard was shocked by the number of such killings, saying, “We should all know about these deaths. It’s unfortunate that the media isn’t reporting them.”

The fact remains that homophobic reactions, violent or otherwise, remain alive and well throughout the country. At the very time Matthew Shepard lay dying a group of students at Colorado State University spray painted antigay graffiti on a scarecrow on a Homecoming parade float, as reported by Salon Newsreal.

Sheppard, Samuel H. (1924–1970) accused wife murderer

A leading osteopath in the Cleveland area, Dr. Samuel Sheppard was convicted of murdering his wife, Marilyn, on July 3, 1954 after a sensational trial that attracted national and international attention.

Marilyn Sheppard had been slain with more than 25 blows to the head in the upstairs bedroom of the couple’s suburban home, which fronted on Lake Erie. She was 31 at the time and four months pregnant. Dr. Sam, as the newspapers labeled him, said he had been awakened by his wife’s screams and the sounds of a terrible fight. When he came to his wife’s aid, he said, he had been knocked unconscious by a “bushy-haired stranger.”

The murder took on a sex scandal tone when Sheppard admitted he had been having an affair with Susan Hayes, a young, attractive medical technician at Bay View Hospital, where the doctor worked. Both Dr. Sam and Miss Hayes admitted their relationship on the witness stand. Probably this fact as much as any of the evidence resulted in a guilty verdict and a life sentence for Sheppard. Meanwhile, many voices were raised proclaiming Dr. Sam’s innocence. Newspapers and magazines took up the crusade, as did the noted mystery writer Erle Stanley Gardner. With the aid of a new lawyer, F. Lee Bailey, Dr. Sam was released from the Ohio State Penitentiary in 1964 pending a new trial. The Supreme Court upheld his release, sighting “prejudicial publicity” and a “carnival atmosphere” at the first trial.

Bailey kept his client off the stand at the second trial, which was held in 1966, and attacked the prosecution’s case as “ten pounds of hogwash in a five pound bag.” The jury agreed, finding Dr. Sam innocent 12 years after his first conviction.

Sam Sheppard had to be wheeled to his wife's funeral with his neck in a brace, allegedly the work of a "bushy-haired stranger" who had murdered his wife. Sheppard was convicted of her murder but cleared 12 years later.

Following his acquittal, Sheppard married a woman who had befriended him by mail during his time in prison, and regained his medical license. However, in 1968 Sheppard's second wife sued for divorce, saying she feared for her safety living with him. Subsequently, Dr. Sam turned professional wrestler, but his health began to fail and he died in 1970.

In 1995 Sam Reese Sheppard filed suit seeking monetary damages for his father's 10 years of wrongful imprisonment. In 1998 Sheppard's body was exhumed and, according to the son's attorney, new DNA evidence excluded Dr. Sheppard as a suspect. However, the State of Ohio, which had apparently exhibited little interest in doing DNA checks earlier decided to exhume Marilyn Sheppard's body to check her DNA, an official saying, "Right now, there is no positive profile of Mrs. Sheppard's DNA, and we need that so we can start answering some of the questions being raised by the plaintiffs."

Under Ohio law, the state could be required to pay $25,000 for each year of imprisonment, plus lost income and other expenses. In 2000 a court ruled in favor of the state, but the ruling was subject to appeal.

sheriff's ball hanging

Before the Civil War many executions gave local sheriffs in big cities the opportunity to make considerable sums of money. The sheriff or other high officer charged with sending out invitations to hangings, called sheriff's balls, would sell tickets for on-the-scaffold or front-row seats to scalpers who would resell to the highest bidder, often for sums of $5 to $25, a significant amount of money in the period. It became customary for underworld friends of the condemned man to buy these choice tickets, either to pay their final respects to a fellow criminal or to ensure by their presence that the condemned man would not offer a last-minute confession naming them.

The hanging of Albert Hicks, a noteworthy murderer, in New York City on July 13, 1860 was one such ball for which tickets went at a premium. Some 10,000 onlookers watched the hanging, mostly from boats since the execution site on Bedloe's Island was less than 30 feet from shore. Another lucky 1,000 got invitations to the island, many of which were sold through scalpers. It was said that the federal marshal, Capt. Isaiah Rynders, who was in charge of the arrangements, made a profit well in excess of $1,000 after paying out all commissions to his agents.

Shinburn, Mark (c. 1833-?) aristocrat of bank burglars

Perhaps the most colorful of all New York criminals in the 1860s, Mark Shinburn was a dapper bank burglar who complained at length that he was at heart an aristocrat and that he was repelled by the crooks with whom he was forced to associate. Shinburn was a particular favorite of Marm Mandelbaum, the great fence, and would attend her famous dinner parties, where she entertained society's better half with a number of underworld personalities mixed in for spice. Shinburn always acquitted himself perfectly when the wife of a judge or an important City Hall figure happened to be sitting next to him. He would inform them, with somber earnestness, that he was involved in banking.

Some of Shinburn's crimes were truly spectacular. After he and a confederate robbed a bank in Saint Catharines, Ontario, they found all routes across the border blocked by Canadian police. The only unguarded point was a half-constructed suspension bridge over Niagara Falls. The pair started across on a snowy and sleety night after tying ropes around their waists and securing another rope to a girder. If one slipped off, his partner was to try to pull him back, but if the task proved impossible, each agreed to cut the other loose, letting him drop into the chasm below rather than letting him remain suspended in the air to freeze to death. Twice Shinburn slipped over the side but was pulled back to safety by his partner. Amazingly, the pair made it across to American soil and escaped.

Shinburn was also a member of the infamous Bliss Bank Ring, which corrupted the New York Police Department detective bureau and paid off officers following every big caper pulled by the gang. However, Shinburn did not like sharing in big operations because he wanted to accumulate as much loot as he could in the shortest possible time in order to return to his native Prussia. He engaged in several two-man jobs, the largest being a $170,000 Maryland bank caper with gang leader George M. Bliss, one of the few criminals he respected. Shinburn then announced his retirement from crime and, after being bid a fond farewell from Bliss and Marm Mandelbaum, set sail for Europe.

Using some of his loot, Shinburn managed to buy a title and became Baron Shindell of Monaco. He lived quite well for many years, but his lavish lifestyle eventually took its toll and he was forced to return to crime. He was caught attempting to rob a Belgium bank and imprisoned. When finally released he managed to scrape up enough money to return to the United States, where he apparently intended to return to his version of the bank business. However, he soon discovered that some of his real estate holdings in Chicago had grown enormously in value, and he was once more able to retire in luxury under another assumed name. Since no more was heard of him, it is assumed his second retirement was permanent.

ship schools confinement method for juvenile delinquents

At the beginning of the 1860s, a new experiment aimed at rehabilitating young male juvenile delinquents was tried. It was felt that what these errant youngsters needed was the discipline and training of military life, not in any army-style camp but at sea, aboard a ship, from which there obviously could be no escape. On these so-called ship schools, boys under the age of 16 divided their time between studying and working. At the latter their time, according to one contemporary account, was spent in “domestic employments; in repairing sails and rigging; in going through sheet and halyard, brace and clewline, and the technical language of sailors; in short, in becoming practical seamen.”

The ship schools proved to be disasters. There were rumors of these young gangsters often seizing control of the vessels, putting into shore and staging mass escapes. The system limped on into the post-Civil War period before being abandoned because of the disciplinary problems, enormous operating expenses and anger over honest adult seamen being thrown out of work.

Shirt Tails early 19th-century New York gang

One of the meanest and most brutal of the early gangs to appear in New York City in the 1820s was the notorious Shirt Tails. So called because they wore their shirts outside their trousers in the Chinese style, the Shirt Tails never looked as violent as, for instance, the Plug Uglies, who carried brickbats and clubs and glared menacingly from under their plug hats. But in a murderous brawl or street mugging the Shirt Tails were just as well armed and just as deadly as other gangs. They had discovered that concealing their weapons under their long shirt tails did much to allay the suspicions of would-be victims. It is doubtful that the average Shirt Tail would venture abroad with less than three or four weapons on him. Fierce battlers, whose total number was somewhere in the low hundreds, the Shirt Tails finally disappeared as an organized force before the Civil War. The members joining other gangster organizations.

Shockley, Sam Richard (1909–1948) bank robber and murderer

One of the first two men to die in San Quentin’s gas chamber, Crazy Sam Shockley was executed for his role in the famous Alcatraz Prison Rebellion of 1946.

By any norm, Sam Shockley was crazy. No authoritative estimate was ever made of the percentage of Alcatraz prisoners who were insane or went stir crazy while there, but interviews with former inmates show that they considered at least 60 percent to have been deranged. It is amazing that Shockley—who believed the police had given him stomach cancer by using special light rays on him and who constantly heard “radio voices” in his head—was ever sent to Alcatraz at all and even more so that he was not transferred to an asylum.

In 1938 Shockley, a farm laborer, had robbed $2,000 from a bank in Paoli, Okla. and kidnapped the bank president and his wife to use as hostages during his escape in their car. Shockley had a special need for hostages since he didn’t know how to drive. He released the couple unharmed eight hours before he was caught. Convicted of bank robbery and kidnapping, he drew a life sentence and was sent to Leavenworth. There, doctors determined he had an IQ of 54, the level of an eight-year-old. He frequently erupted in throwing, yelling and breaking fits, thereby earning the nickname Crazy Sam. It was decided he was incapable of coping with the stress of a normal prison environment; so Leavenworth solved the problem by sending him to Alcatraz.

In 1941 Crazy Sam joined the one convict who had befriended him, Dutch Cretzer, a former Public Enemy No. 4, in an unsuccessful escape attempt. For the next five years Crazy Sam was in and out of solitary confinement. In 1946 he participated in the great escape attempt organized by Bernie Coy and Cretzer. The would-be escapees took nine guards hostage, and when it was apparent the escape was going to fail, Crazy Sam and another convict, Buddy Thompson, goaded Cretzer into shooting the hostages. Cretzer shot several, killing one. Later court testimony revealed that Crazy Sam cackled for joy over the shooting. Both Coy and Cretzer were killed in the breakout attempt.

Thompson and Shockley were tried and sentenced to death for their parts in the escape and murder. As they left the courtroom, Shockley grinned moronically at reporters and said confidently: "They'll never gas me. I'm crazy." He died on December 3, 1948, along with Thompson, to the disgust of his fellow prisoners, who regarded Sam as insane even by Alcatraz standards.

shoplifting

Shoplifting is a major problem in all types of retail stores. Its precise extent is difficult to measure, complicated by the fact that "inventory shrinkage" also results, to a great extent, from employee theft. In 1970 J. Edgar Hoover called shoplifting "the fastest growing larceny in the country," and most recent estimates put the take at upwards of $2 billion a year. Undeniably, shoplifting arrests have soared, but this is more due to an attempt to discourage additional practitioners of the art by having offenders arrested and publicizing arrests. Previously, most stores preferred not to make arrests, letting the offender off with a stern lecture and, in many cases, even urging him or her to return as an honest customer.

There are two basic types of shoplifter: the professional and the amateur. The professional steals for profit and generally has a fence waiting to take the loot off his hands. The professional concentrates on higher-priced, resalable items and can cause a store heavy losses, but it's the amateur who gives retailers the greatest headaches. No one can say how many Americans indulge in shoplifting, either regularly or occasionally. Stores in college towns know to beware of student shoplifters late in the month, when many students are low on funds and awaiting their next allowance check from home.

There have been some attempts at estimating the percentage of persons who enter the larger department stores in a city in order to steal something. In one survey in New York City, it was found that about one person in 10 who were followed swiped something. However, the study was conducted by a private security agency offering its shoplifting prevention services to stores; so it could well have had a vested interest in the results. Since the average shopper may well visit three or four stores on a shopping expedition, the one in 10 ratio would have a devastating effect on mercantile operations.

Women shoplifters outnumber men by four or five to one. Some shoplifters are said to net as much as $1,000 a week. Well known to New York police is a female "booster" who dresses herself exclusively in originals hand-picked at the very best stores. "I always wear my boosting drawers"—king-sized bloomers slung by suspenders under her full skirt—"just in case I see something I want," she has been quoted as stating. Like many other ladies of her profession, she sells to fences—and to individual customers who have placed specific orders with her.

While professionals steal for profit, amateur shoplifters steal for their own use—or for family or friends—and the profit motive never enters into it. They steal for "kicks," to balance the budget, to "get back" at the store for some previous unsatisfactory purchase or simply to get back at the "Establishment." Quite logically, shoplifting thefts increase dramatically in periods of high inflation. To the shoplifter some items are just not worth the purchase price.

The most popular shoplifted merchandise are clothes, especially sportswear and knits, portable TV sets, fur coats, air conditioners, radios, small electrical appliances, liquor, cosmetics and health products.

For a time during the height of the miniskirt craze, fashions were in favor of the store, since the short skirts cut down on "legging," sticking small items under the skirt between the legs and walking out of the store. Among professionals, this dodge is known as the crotch walk.

Store detectives are particularly on the lookout for women carrying shopping bags, especially empty ones, large handbags and umbrellas. Also subject to close scrutiny is a woman pushing a baby carriage, a convenient conveyance for hauling away a goodly amount of loot. Next under suspicion are young persons, teenagers and subteens. The average young person, like many parents, sees nothing wrong in stealing from a big store. If caught, he or she usually acts like it's a joke; if the store does decide to prosecute, most judges will let the offender off with a reprimand, particularly for a first offense.

While many stores have adopted a new “get tough” policy, others are reluctant to take a shoplifter to court. For one thing, it means the store detective or guard who made the arrest must be away from the job to testify, thus leaving the store that much shorter of protection. However, the main worry is false arrest suits. Juries are notoriously sympathetic toward false arrest plaintiffs, and awards have gone as high as $100,000. Even the fact that more than 40 states have changed their shoplifting laws so that shoplifters can be picked up inside the store by detectives, instead of being followed out to the street, has not resulted in many convictions. It remains difficult to prove to a jury that the person had not intended to pay for the merchandise. A particularly telling defense is a woman’s claim of having become so exasperated over her inability to get the attention of a salesperson that she walked out without paying for the item she wanted.

Still, there have been some successful prosecutions. Take the case of the four Hoboken housewives who ventured to New York City each week for lunch and a matinee. They also set aside an hour or so of their outing for shoplifting. All were prosperous-looking matrons and thus drew no suspicion for some time, but they were finally caught in the act. All were from comfortable backgrounds and could easily have paid for the items they stole. Their defense was that the store would hardly be affected by their pilfering. All were convicted and given jail sentences.

In recent years shoplifters have been foiled by various electronic transistorized plastic devices attached to store items. These devices set off buzzers and blinking lights when a customer attempts to wander off with the goods. Some stores have found that many customers resent such devices and complain they prevent them from trying on clothing properly to judge how the items look and fit. In deference to this complaint, the devices are sometimes attached to a garment’s edge. Resourceful shoplifters have used razors to snip them off.

The traditional protection against shoplifting has been the old-fashioned convex mirror. It is, however, a method that often helps a thief more than it hinders him. Some thieves insist they will not steal in a store without such mirrors. Merchants tend to overlook the fact that while the mirror will let them see what a person is doing, the shoplifter can just as well look up and see whether the merchant is watching.

Cases of family “togetherness” in shoplifting are an old story, with all the children, from the youngest to the oldest, “working” a store while mom or dad wait outside in the getaway car. Recently, a member of Atlanta police larceny unit said: “Men haul women around in cars, park and wait while the women shoplift. Then take off on the double when the women get back with the loot.”

Perhaps the greatest shoplifting family in history was the White, or Weiss, family of Chicago, which from the 1890s to World War I was probably the most proficient clan in the business. One member of the family, Eva Gussler, was in charge of teaching the children to steal as soon as they could walk. A typical dodge involved a woman member of the family strolling through a store with a little child hidden under her long skirt. When the woman found an item worth stealing, she’d knock it to the floor and the child would retrieve it and slip it into specially sewn pockets in the lining of the skirt.

Things have not changed much since then. In San Francisco gaping store detectives recently watched two shoplifting mothers showing their little daughters “how to roll a suit” so that it would be as compact as possible.

Short, Luke (1854–1893) gambler and gunfighter

Luke Short, an undersized gambler, legitimately won the sobriquet the Undertaker’s Friend by being one of the quickest, trickiest and meanest gunfighters who ever settled an argument with a fast draw—fair or otherwise. Once, a man he was arguing with objected when Short put his hand under his coat. Short said: “I’m not trying to pull a gun. I haven’t got a gun there, see!” Then Short pulled a gun and shot the man dead.

Luke Short was one of the Dodge City Gang, headed by Wyatt Earp and Bat Masterson, which either controlled or protected much of the vice in the Gomorrah of the Plains. After growing up in Texas, he hit the cowboy trail at about the age of 16 and by 1876 he had become a bootlegger, selling whiskey to the Sioux Indians—a federal offense. It was also a deadly profession, and Short had to kill at least six men defending his self-proclaimed franchise. He was finally put out of business by the army and barely escaped a troop of arresting soldiers.

With a little distance and time behind him, Short turned army scout. Tiring of that occupation, he took to the gambling tables at Leadville, Colo. In a manner of speaking, he came up with one of the surer winning systems. When he won, he collected; when he lost, he welshed; when men he owed money to protested, he outdrew and killed them.

In late 1879 he drifted into Dodge City, Kan., where he befriended Wyatt Earp, and when Earp later moved on to Tombstone, Arizona Territory, Short ended up there as a dealer at the Oriental Saloon. Short did his share of gunfighting at the saloon, and seldom needed help. Once, though, a hard case named Charley Storms called Luke a cheat and got the drop on him. Bat Masterson intervened and got Storms to leave the place peacefully. Later that afternoon Storms returned and, before Short noticed his presence, walked up to him and began tracing the outline of Short's mustache with his .45. Short watched his tormentor through slitted eyes, and then in a lightning movement that was to make him a shooting legend, he whipped out his Colt and fired three bullets into Storms, who died without being able to squeeze the trigger.

In 1881, weary of dodging lead for small pay, Short went back to Dodge City, where in time he purchased the Long Branch Saloon and turned it into one of the town's great moneymakers, offering everything a man could possibly want: liquor, gambling and women. About this time a "reform" movement took over the government of the town. The first thing it ordered was a ban on women employees in saloons. Such a law would have had the effect of putting Short out of business, especially since the ordinance was not enforced against saloons owned by the so-called reform element.

Short tried to fight the enforcement of the law the way he fought everything—with his gun. However, he and his supporters, clearly outnumbered, were run out of town. The angry Short lodged a complaint at the state capital, Topeka. When he got no satisfaction from the governor, he started sending wires around the West. Soon, the townspeople nervously watched the arrival of a stream of Short's friends—Earp, Masterson, Doc Holliday, Charlie Bassett, Shotgun Collins, Neal Brown and others—all gunmen.

Dodge City panicked. Short's enforcers adopted the name of the Dodge City Peace Commission, but in fact, they threatened war. Each day more fierce gunmen came to town to back up the "commissioners," who had taken such effective control of the town that folks said not even the state militia could dislodge them. While a nervous governor hesitated, the Dodge City reformers caved in. They "invited" Luke Short to reopen the Long Branch and run it the way things had been run before.

After a time Short sold out and took his gambling business to Fort Worth, Tex., where he ran the White Elephant Saloon and a number of other places in outlying sections. When gambling was declared illegal, Short became the most prosperous of the underground gambling house owners. In 1887 Longhair Jim Courtright, a former city marshal in Fort Worth and by then head of his own detective agency, started shaking down saloons and gambling places for protection payoffs. Despite Courtright's reputation as a top gunslinger, Short laughed him off and easily beat him to the draw.

He shot off Courtright's thumb as Longhair Jim tried to trip back the hammer of one of his guns. When Courtright attempted to draw his other gun, Short killed him with three shots.

In 1890 Short had to defend his empire against a local saloon owner named Charles Wright. As Wright came at him with a shotgun, Short put the challenger out of commission by shooting him in the wrist. In 1893 Short died of natural causes; he was 39 years old.

shortchange artists

Shortchanging has long been a highly developed American swindle. As late as 1900 it was common among a number of small circuses traveling the country not to pay ticket sellers and in fact to charge them as much as $35 a week for the job because it gave them such a lucrative opportunity to shortchange the excited patrons. Police bunco squads have estimated there are as many as 5,000 professional shortchange artists who frequently take jobs as cashiers, ticket sellers, bartenders, checkout clerks and check cashiers simply because of the opportunities for stealing these jobs afford. However, probably an even more common form of shortchanging involves cheating clerks in stores.

The classic con of this type is the twenty and one. It calls for a gypster to make a purchase in a store for less than 50¢ and pay with a $20 bill. He starts talking about something: the weather, the news, anything. When the clerk puts the change down, it's usually in a standard form: a $10 bill, a five, four singles and a dollar in silver. The crook then makes another purchase of 10¢ or so, paying for it with a quarter from the silver change lying on the counter. He has made no effort to pick up the paper money. While this is going on, the slickster finds an apparently overlooked $1 bill in his pocket. He tells the clerk he's sorry for having forced him to change a twenty when he had the single. The customer then acts as though he is going to pick up the $10 bill from the paper money while putting down the single, but he does neither and continues talking.

Next, he shoves the $10 in bills across the counter and requests a $10 bill in exchange for the pile. When the clerk gives him the $10 bill, the con artist pretends he's going to leave. At this point the customer seemingly has been gypped out of $9. Most of the time the clerk doesn't even realize he or she is shorting the customer. And it makes no difference if they do or not, for at that moment the gyp pretends to have discovered the error. He asks the clerk to check on the money he has given him. The clerk does so and, red-faced, realizes the customer is right. Psychologically, the clerk has been put on the defensive, as the mistake is obvious. The gyp brushes off the matter but keeps up a steady flow of words to further confuse the clerk.

Now, he once more withdraws a dollar bill from his pocket and this time puts it on the bills on the counter and says: “Actually this whole mixup is my fault. I never should have given you the twenty in the first place. Here’s twenty in change. You give me back the twenty and we’ll be square.” By this time the clerk, either still embarrassed or exasperated, is ready to do anything to be rid of the troublesome customer. He usually will hand over the twenty at this point, completely forgetting about the $10 the gyp has already picked up. Only a very alert clerk can keep up with such banter and not be talked out of the money. Even if the clerk does so, he does not accuse the customer of trying to swindle him, since the customer has already demonstrated his confused state of mind by almost getting gyped out of $9.

Despite the fact that security firms urge stores to educate employees to this most basic shortchanging racket, it remains perhaps the most successful of all such stings, with a success rate of far better than 50 percent. It accounts for a large amount of the estimated $500 million a year taken by all types of shortchangers.

Shotgun Man (?-?) unidentified Black Hand hit man

America’s best-known murderer, in the sense that literally thousands of people could have identified him—but didn’t—was Chicago’s infamous Shotgun Man, an assassin who worked for Black Hand extortionists. If the police were aware of his name and identity, no case could be built against him, and little of his past was known in Chicago’s Little Italy, even though he openly plied his trade there. Most Black Hand gangs did not do their own killings but farmed them out to free-ance hit men who owed no loyalty beyond doing the job they were paid for. Between January 1, 1910 and March 26, 1911, the Shotgun Man killed 15 Italians and Sicilians on orders from various Black Handers. By comparison, the total number of unsolved Black Hand murders during that period was 38. In March 1911 the Shotgun Man assassinated four victims within a 72-hour period, all at the intersection of Milton and Oak streets. Before and after his killings he walked freely through the streets of Little Italy, his gun always for rent to the highest bidder. Although he was well known, no one in Little Italy identified him to the Chicago police. It was generally believed that the Black Handers who hired him had considerable political influence and that if arrested, the Shotgun Man would be back on the streets within a short time, a prospect likely to give any potential informer second thoughts.

Black Handers supposedly paid the Shotgun Man extremely well for his services, since he made a fearsome walking advertisement for them. It may have been that he had accumulated all the wealth he wanted or just that the Black Hand menace was starting to recede anyway, but after a period of eight or nine years the Shotgun Man left Little Italy.

Siegel, Benjamin “Bugsy” (1906–1947) syndicate leader

“We only kill each other,” the notorious Benjamin “Bugsy” Siegel once told construction tycoon Del Webb. Whether or not Webb took this assurance on the mores of syndicate gangsterism at full value is not known, but Siegel’s own life and death certainly gives his statement some credence. Bugsy Siegel was simultaneously the most colorful, the most charming and the most fiery-tempered of all syndicate killers. As the saying went, he charmed the pants and panties off Hollywood, while at the same time functioning as a mob killer. It was an incredible act right up to the moment he got his head blown open by three .30.30 caliber bullets from a hit man’s rifle.

Bugsy grew up on the crime-ridden Lower East Side and formed an early alliance with a runty little youth four years his senior, Meyer Lansky, already a criminal genius in his teens. By 1920 the Bug and Meyer Gang was running gambling games, stealing cars and getting into bootlegging. On occasion the gang hijacked booze shipments from other outfits until Lansky and Siegel realized it was a lot easier to hire out their gunmen as protectors for these shipments. They soon began working with rising young Italian gangsters such as Lucky Luciano, Joe Adonis, Frank Costello and Tommy Lucchese. The gang provided much of the muscle and, in Lansky’s case, the brains for Luciano’s big push to topple the old “Mustache Petes” of the Mafia: Giuseppe “Joe the Boss” Masseria and Salvatore Maranzano.

The emerging national crime syndicate assigned Siegel to carry out numerous murders aimed at gaining control of the important avenues of crime. He was so enthused about killing, he was called “Bugsy,” but not in his presence. Face to face, he was just plain Ben.

Bugsy was sent to California to consolidate the syndicate’s West Coast operations. There, in his quieter moments, he was a genuinely suave, entertaining sort, hobnobbing with Hollywood celebrities and becoming close friends with such personalities as Jean Harlow, George Raft, Clark Cable, Gary Cooper, Wendy Barrie, Cary Grant and many others, some of whom invested their money in his enterprises. Siegel sometimes left his “class” friends at a party to go on a murder mission,

SILENCE in prisons which he did one night in 1939 when he, Frankie Carbo, later the underworld's boss of boxing, and Murder, Inc. wheelman Allie Tannenbaum assassinated an errant criminal named Harry Greenberg, better known as Big Greenie.

Big Greenie had had the death sentence passed on him by the syndicate board in New York. When Greenie fled to Los Angeles, it was decided to "let Ben handle it." Siegel was happy to, doing the job personally, although he was only supposed to arrange matters. Los Angeles County Deputy District Attorney Arthur Veitch later explained why Siegel had to lend a hand personally: "In gangster parlance Siegel is what is known as a 'cowboy.' This is the way the boys have of describing a man who is not satisfied to frame a murder but actually has to be in on the kill in person."

Others would say Siegel's craziness explained his bizarre actions. For example, there was the time he and one of his mistresses, Countess Dorothy diFrasso, trekked to Italy to sell Benito Mussolini a revolutionary explosive device. While staying on the diFrasso estate, Siegel met top Nazi officials Hermann Goering and Joseph Goebbels. According to underworld legend, Bugsy took an instant dislike to the pair—for personal rather than political reasons—and planned to knock them both off, relenting only because of the countess' frantic pleas. When the explosive device fizzled, the Bug returned to Hollywood.

His main syndicate business was running the rackets and directing narcotics deals on the West Coast as well as overseeing the delivery of West Coast racing results to East Coast bookmakers. In the process Siegel dreamed up the idea of turning Las Vegas into a legal gambling paradise. He talked the syndicate into investing some $6 million in the construction of the first truly posh legal gambling establishment in the United States, the Flamingo (which was the nickname of Siegel's mistress, Virginia Hill). Unfortunately for Bugsy, he was a man ahead of his time, and the Flamingo proved to be a financial white elephant. Reportedly, the syndicate demanded he make good its losses, but Bugsy was guilty of more serious infractions than just losing the mob's money. He had skimmed off the Flamingo's construction funds and had been dipping into its gambling revenues.

The syndicate passed the death sentence on Siegel, the key vote being cast by Meyer Lansky, Bugsy's life-long buddy ("I had no choice," Lansky reputedly said later). Lucky Luciano approved the decision at a 1947 conference in Havana, Cuba. On June 20 Siegel was sitting in the living room of the $500,000 Beverly Hills mansion of Virginia Hill, who had been sent on a syndicate mission to Europe, when a killer pumped nine shots through the window. Three hit Siegel in the head, killing him instantly.

Silks, Mattie (1847–1929) madam

One of the "grand madams" of American prostitution, Mattie Silks brought "class" to harlotry in Denver, a city whose fleshpots for a time rivaled those of New York, New Orleans, Chicago and San Francisco. By 1911 her House of Mirrors, at 1942 Market Street, was almost as famous in the West as was Chicago's Everleigh Club in the Midwest and points east. At that time, Mattie was in her sixties and considered one of Denver's most famous, if perhaps not most upstanding, citizens.

Other than that she was born in Indiana, little is known of her early years, including her real name, which she never revealed to anyone. It is established that she "turned tricks" in Springfield, Ill. while still a teenager. Thereafter, she traveled the western mining camp route, going to wherever the discovery of gold or silver allowed men to enjoy some leisure entertainment. About 1876 Mattie, at the age of 29, decided there was much more money to be made in operating houses of pleasure than in handling all the business personally. She opened her first whorehouse in Denver and kept at it for the next four decades. Each time she opened a new house it was a step up in grandeur, climaxing in the House of Mirrors, a three-story mansion that included four parlors, a ballroom and 16 bedrooms. Its prize attraction was the main parlor of mirrors, with floor-to-ceiling mirrors on all sides and a large crystal chandelier. A five-piece black orchestra offered every kind of music from the classics to ragtime.

Mattie offered clients a small but select group of "boarders," never more than a dozen, and competition for employment at one of her houses was intense. Although she may or may not have first coined the phrase, her credo definitely was that each of her women had to "be a lady in the drawing room and a whore in the bedroom." Consequently, her boarders were not permitted to smoke or curse and they were never allowed to sit on a customer's lap in the grand parlor or any of the other open rooms. A customer was to be treated like a gentleman and shown the same respect he would receive at home from his wife and children. Only in the upstairs bedrooms could Mattie's women play the role of whore.

After retiring, Mattie, at age 79, granted a newspaper interview, in which she stated:

I went into the sporting life for business reasons and for no other. It was a way for a woman in those days to make money, and I made it. I considered myself then and I do now—as a businesswoman. I operated the best houses in town and I had as my clients the most important men in the West.

I kept the names of my regular customers on a list. I never showed that list to anyone—nor will I tell you the names now. If a man did not conduct himself as a gentleman, he was not welcome nor ever permitted to come again. My customers knew I would not talk about them and they respected me for this. . . .

My houses were well kept and well furnished. They had better furnishing than any of my competitors—gilt mirrors, velvet curtains.

I never took a girl into my house who had no experience of life and men. That was a rule of mine. . . . No innocent young girl was ever hired by me. And they came to me for the same reasons that I hired them. Because there was money in it for all of us.

By this time, 1926, the former Queen of the Red Lights had achieved dowager status. She died three years later.

Simpson case “Trial of the Century”

The trial for murder of former football star O. J. Simpson was not without reason called the “Trial of the Century.” In the “starring role” was O. J. Simpson, who gained well-deserved fame in college and professional football and later remained in the public eye as a television sportscaster and pitchman and as a supporting actor in a number of films, especially the comic Naked Gun movies. Clearly he had hurdled the color barriers and was a huge and popular success in the world at large. He had a beautiful wife, Nicole Brown Simpson, and seemed to live an ideal life among the rich and famous in the Los Angeles–Hollywood scene.

That clearly changed when Simpson’s wife was murdered and he was charged with the crime. There were other unusual aspects to the case, such as the preponderance of DNA evidence introduced and discussed. Above all, the Simpson trial became a media event, millions of people from coast to coast listened to every word of the trial broadcast in what was undoubtedly television overkill.

The violence in the case was gruesome enough. Nicole, 35, and her friend Ron Goldman, 25, were killed on June 12, 1994, outside the doorway of Nicole’s condominium at 875 South Bundy Drive in Brentwood. The evidence appeared to be that Goldman had been savagely stabbed first, and then Nicole. After the crime Los Angeles police followed Simpson’s car in what became known as the “slow speed chase.” There was speculation that Simpson, a passenger in the car driven by an old football buddy, was near to killing himself—the pro-Simpson people insisting that was because he was suffering from the loss of his wife while the anti-Simpson group attributed his despair to guilt resulting from what he’d done. The chase became a long spectacle, with viewers along the freeway cheering Simpson and yelling “Juice!” an old accolade from his football days. Finally Simpson in effect gave himself up, and the whole spectacle shifted to the legal system. While Simpson did remain the center of attention, other players from Judge Lance Ito to colorful prosecution figures as well as defense attorneys hired by Simpson and dubbed by the media as the “dream team,” became very recognizable and in some cases idolized or reviled.

The prosecution insisted Simpson had the time and inclination to commit the murders in a jealous rage, while the defense made the investigators into sort of defendants themselves. The defense claimed the police used shoddy investigative techniques and fabricated evidence. They sought to dismiss the DNA evidence submitted by the prosecution as not credible and compromised by controversial handling of evidence, such as by one detective carrying around with him for more than a day a vial of Simpson’s blood. The defense mocked Detective Mark Fuhrman’s claim that he found a glove containing blood carrying the DNA of Simpson and the victims. (In one trial highpoint, Simpson was asked to put on the glove, but he could not, because it was too small, giving birth to a famous quote to the jury by lead defense attorney Johnnie Cochran Jr.: “If it doesn’t fit, you must acquit.”)

The defense lawyers claimed Fuhrman was a racist and that the white officer harbored a grudge against Simpson stemming from a 1985 incident in which he smashed the windows of his wife’s car with a baseball bat. The defense inferred to the jury that Fuhrman had sprinkled blood found on the crime scene from a blood sample Simpson had given when the bodies were discovered.

The jury acquitted Simpson quickly, which brought charges that since 10 members of the panel were African-American, the jury was itself prejudiced. The reaction to the verdict followed racial lines, with 64 percent of whites and only 12 percent of blacks believing Simpson was probably guilty, while 59 percent of blacks and 11 percent of whites thought he was probably innocent.

SILVER, Frankie

After the murders of Nicole Simpson and Ron Goldman, the most famous picture of O.J. Simpson was not of any of his football exploits, but the LAPD mug shot of his arrest.

As time passed, public opinion against Simpson solidified and when Simpson was sued in civil court by relatives of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ron Goldman, he was convicted, a result that involved no criminal consequences. However, a judgment for $33.5 million for wrongful death was imposed on Simpson, and virtually all his wealth was taken from him by law, and he was stymied in various efforts to resume any kind of career.

It could not be said that the racial divide widened by the case narrowed subsequently.

Silver, Frankie (?–1831) murderess

Although many historians refer to Mary Surratt of the Lincoln assassination conspiracy as the first white woman hanged in America, that fate befell Frankie Silver some 35 years earlier in North Carolina.

Frankie hacked her husband to death with an ax as he slept before the fireplace. She then cut his body into small pieces, burned all she could and stuffed the unburnable portions into a hollow log.

Mounting the gallows, she showed little remorse. In fact, she munched on a slice of cake and held up the execution until she had eaten every last crumb.

Silver Street Capone mob stronghold

For several decades one of the most vice-ridden streets in America was Silver Street in Hurley, Wis. Starting in the 1920s, the Capone mob ran a crime school there that thrived as long as the organization remained a power in B-girl bars and brothels. Silver Street was largely given over to honky-tonks in which teenage girls, imported from Canada and elsewhere in the Midwest, were taught the fine arts of “mooching and dipping.” From there they were sent out to underworld dives all over the country.

Some of the girls were lured from Canada by the promise of dancing jobs. When they got to Silver Street, they were told the jobs were gone. Stranded without return fare home, the girls were ripe for offers to pick up some change drinking with honky-tonk customers. After a time it was suggested to the girls that if the customers were drunk, they wouldn't notice someone picking a few bucks from their wallets. A woman “dip” taught the girls in dressing rooms backstage how to “swift dip” a man's wallet—taking it, removing the money and returning it to his pocket. The girls who proved to be apt pupils were taught the subtle uses of the Mickey Finn. Those with less intelligence were forced to become prostitutes.

Especially eyed as promising recruits were young runaway girls, who were suckers for a get-rich-quick line. Many were held as virtual slaves, kept in tow by their mob masters as long as they were pro-ductive. Some became strippers on the underworld's burlesque lounge route. Attempts to leave were met with violence, usually simple beatings or knifings but sometimes acid in the face, if the girl was to be made into an example for others. Eventually, most of the girls were put on dope to make them more compliant.

The heirs of the Capone mob have long since abandoned Silver Street, not because of a reform drive or their own consciences but as a result of the changing nature of vice, which largely has moved away from whorehouses to independent call girl operations that are much more difficult to control.

Singleton, Ed (1893–1937) John Dillinger's first partner

A small-time hoodlum and drunk, Ed Singleton was young John Dillinger's first partner in crime and a man whose treatment by the law probably did much to turn Dillinger into a public enemy.

In 1924 the 30-year-old Singleton talked 20-year-old Dillinger into attempting to rob a 65-year-old grocer named Frank Morgan, whom John had known since childhood. Together they slugged Morgan, but when the elderly man fought back, they ran. Eventually, both were caught. Dillinger was tried first and sentenced to 10 to 20 years in prison. Singleton later claimed he was drunk and was released after serving only a two-year term. Dillinger brooded in prison about the lighter sentence given to a man 10 years his senior and the acknowledged planner of the crime.

When Dillinger became a leading gangster, Ed Singleton gained a measure of fame as the public enemy's first partner. In 1937 Singleton, in a drunken stupor, fell asleep on a railroad track and was run over.

Sirhan, Sirhan Bishara (1944–) assassin of Robert F. Kennedy

The early morning of June 5, 1968 was a moment of triumph for Senator Robert F. Kennedy, brother of President John F. Kennedy, who had been assassinated in 1963. He had just won the California presidential primary, defeating Senator Eugene McCarthy, and emerged for the first time as the likely winner of the Democratic nomination. That evening he delivered a victory speech in Los Angeles' Ambassador Hotel. After the speech the senator was walking toward a rear exit when a 24-year-old Palestinian, Sirhan Bishara Sirhan, approached carrying a Kennedy campaign poster, behind which he had concealed a .22-caliber eight-shot Iver Johnson pistol. He fired several shots at Kennedy, three of which hit home. Two struck Kennedy in his armpit and would not have been fatal. The third entered the side of his head behind the right ear. Kennedy fell, mortally wounded, while his assailant was wrestled into submission by the senator's bodyguards, including former sports stars Rafer Johnson and Rosey Grier. As they did so, Sirhan wildly emptied his weapon into the crowd, wounding five persons.

Kennedy died at 1:44 the following morning.

Sirhan was proud of his act. He joked with police officers, made them taste his coffee to make sure it was not poisoned and even spoke sorrowfully about how violent the society had become. He was particularly upset about the terrible things the Boston Strangler had done.

Meanwhile, some witnesses claimed 10 shots had been fired, leading to speculation that Sirhan might not have acted alone. A possible explanation was that some of Kennedy's bodyguards' guns had been accidentally discharged in the melee.

During Kennedy's speech, a campaign worker, Sandy Serrano, stepped out onto a hotel balcony to escape the smoke and heat. While she was there, two men and a young woman in a white polka-dot dress went by her into the building. Later, after the shooting, the trio rushed out and Serrano was "nearly run over." The woman wearing the polka-dot dress shouted, "We shot him!" When Serrano asked whom they had shot, the woman replied, "We shot Kennedy!"

The police eventually turned up a woman named Cathy Fulmer, but Serrano was unable to identify her as the one in the polka-dot dress. Fulmer was found dead in a motel room some days after Sirhan was convicted of the assassination.

Sirhan freely confessed his act and was convicted and sentenced to death, a fate he escaped when the Supreme Court abolished capital punishment in 1972. In the streets of Arab capitals throughout the Middle East, posters appeared hailing "Sirhan Bishara Sirhan, a commando not an assassin." "Commando sources" were quoted as saying the posters were designed to convey the idea that in shooting Kennedy, Sirhan was acting on behalf of all dispossessed Palestinians by striking at a supporter of Israel—Kennedy.

SIRINGO, Charles Angelo

Currently, Sirhan remains in prison, actively pursuing a parole.

Siringo, Charles Angelo (1855–1928) range detective

Regarded by many, including Butch Cassidy, as the greatest of the Pinkerton detectives, Charles Siringo started working as a cowhand in his native Texas at the age of 13. At 22 he first exhibited his taste for man-hunting by going out alone in search of a 17-year-old killer known as Billy the Kid. He was forced to abandon the chase after being separated from his money at a gaming table. It was back to the range for Siringo, followed by two dull years working as a grocer in Kansas. Then, on a visit to Chicago, Siringo was told by a blind phrenologist that his skull indicated he had the makings of a detective; shortly thereafter, he joined the Pinkerton agency.

Siringo proved to be a masterful bloodhound with an incredible record of getting his man. He tracked desperadoes through blizzards and across scorching deserts; he lived with moonshiners; he masqueraded as a wanted man to persuade Elfie Landusky, a Hole in the Waller, to tell him the hiding place of the notorious Harvey Logan; he infiltrated the union involved in the Coeur d'Alene labor riots of the 1890s, escaping assassination by minutes.

After 20 years with the Pinkertons, Siringo retired to write about his experiences. He turned out a number of fairly successful books but died "in poor circumstances" in Los Angeles in 1928. He had always worked as a loner, and he died the same way. Perhaps the title of a pamphlet he wrote summarized his views most succinctly: Two Evil Isms: Pinkertonism and Anarchism.

Skaggs, Elijah (1810–1870) crooked gambler

Few dishonest gamblers or swindlers went through more pains to learn their craft or left such a mark as did a 19th century Kentuckian named Elijah Skaggs. In fact, before the Civil War the term "Skaggs patent dealer" came to mean any practitioner of fraud and deception at a gaming table.

Before reaching the age of 20, Skaggs had determined to become the country's greatest dishonest gambler. He worked hard at his ambition, learning various card tricks and studying other successful dishonest gamblers until he learned their tricks. If he could not discover their techniques, he would pull them aside and offer them large sums of money to teach him. If they refused, seeking to protect their secrets, he would threaten to expose them to their victims.

In time, Skaggs became a master, perhaps the greatest of his profession. He traveled the Mississippi from St. Louis to New Orleans and soon had a gang of confederates working the river boats with him, fleeing the gullible. Biographers agree that Skaggs' income at times hit $100,000 a month, especially after he began operating crooked faro games.

By the mid-1840s Skaggs was a millionaire and retired, clearly knowing when to quit. He had become notorious; it was said that no honest man was allowed to leave one of his games a winner. At 37 Skaggs became a gentleman planter in Louisiana. During the Civil War the master gambler made his worst bet, investing heavily in Confederate bonds, and lost his entire fortune. He died an impoverished alcoholic in Texas in 1870.

Skinner, Cyrus (?–1864) outlaw

One of the most important members of Sheriff Henry Plummer's gang of Innocents during the days when they terrorized what is now Montana, Cyrus Skinner was a California and Idaho area saloon owner whom Plummer imported in the early 1860s to open a similar business in Bannack. The clapboard saloon Skinner bought became a meeting place for the Innocents, but it also served Plummer in a more practical sense. It was an ideal place to learn when gold was being shipped out from the mines by wagon or stagecoach. A bit too much liquor would loosen a man's tongue, and Skinner would hear enough to tip off the Innocents. Because of the importance of Skinner's information, there has been a tendency among some writers to refer to him as the brains behind Plummer, but that description is not accurate.

Skinner himself seldom went on jobs, but on one occasion he learned, on very short notice, about a shipment which sounded so lucrative that he joined an Innocent named Bob Zachery in holding up the stagecoach and murdering the driver; the loot was $250,000 in gold.

Skinner was a cold-blooded character. When another gang member shot a friendly Bannack Indian, Skinner promptly lifted the dead man's scalp and displayed it over the bar to add atmosphere.

It is inexplicable why Skinner remained in the Bannack area after Henry Plummer was hanged by vigilantes on January 10, 1864. As the lynching continued, it was obvious that some of the condemned men would talk and implicate the saloon keeper. Apparently, Skinner thought he could brazen it out. The vigilantes came and got him the morning of January 25 as he was sunning himself in front of his cabin. Despite his insistence that all they had was a "heap of suspicions" but no proof, the vigilantes thought otherwise and led him to the gallows the same day. Faced with imminent death, Skinner broke and ran, begging his captors to shoot him rather than subject him to the often lingering death by the rope. They dragged him back and hanged him.

Skull, Sally (1813–1867?) multiple murderess

Her name was Sarah Jane Newman, but through a succession of marriages—or as near as it got to that in the Wild West—she became Sarah Jane “Doe”-Robinson-Skull-Doyle-Watkins-Harsdoff. However, she was generally called Sally Skull, the surname of one of her several husbands who came to mysterious and/or violent ends.

In 1821 Pennsylvania-born Sally and her family settled in what would become the state of Texas. By the age of 13 the future Sally Skull had blossomed enough to catch her first husband, whose name is unrecorded. So is his fate. Sally said he went off to fight Indians. Whatever the reason for his departure, he was never seen again. Her second husband was one Jesse Robinson, who married Sally in 1838 and left her bed and board in 1843, describing her as a “common scold” and a woman with a violent temper apt to shoot a little too close to him. Sally found her next husband within a few months, a horse trader named George Skull. He set Sally up on a ranch near Goliad, Tex., where the couple ran a profitable horse business and Sally became one of the area’s more colorful sights, sporting her six-gun and bullwhip. George Skull disappeared but no one ever knew exactly when. All of a sudden he just wasn’t around and hadn’t been for some time. Sally simply said she wasn’t going to talk about him. In 1852 John Doyle became another of Sally’s ill-fated husbands. Folks said it was kind of predictable what would happen to him after blonde Sally was seen in the company of the famed Mexican bandit chief Juan Cortina. In any event, Doyle took to drinking and one day, presumably liquored up, fell into the Nueces River and drowned. For some reason rumor spread that Sally had drowned him in a barrel of whiskey.

During the Civil War, Sally Skull sported a new husband, whom she referred to as Mr. Watkins, but he didn’t last long enough for the locals to learn his first name. Mr. and Mrs. Watkins went on a trip to Corpus Christi, where Mr. Watkins was shot to death by his spouse. There was some dispute about whether Sally had shot him because she thought he was an intruder or out of annoyance at his having the temerity to awaken her. But the lady’s account of what had happened was taken and Sally Skull was free to marry again. In 1867 she married William Harsdoff. The couple set off for Mexico on a combination honeymoon and horse-buying trip and were never seen again. Some months later, the badly decomposed body of a woman was found on the road the pair had taken. It was never officially identified as that of Sally Skull, and it may well be that her saga did not end there.

Although skyjackings occurred elsewhere in the world as early as the 1930s, the crime did not become a problem in the United States until the early 1960s, when hijackers forced a number of planes to be flown to Cuba. Often, these skyjackings were for political reasons, but a number of criminal fugitives looked upon Cuba as a logical place of refuge. Invariably, the crews and passengers of skyjacked planes were well treated by the Cubans, although Premier Fidel Castro imposed a steep landing fee for all such aircraft.

Countermeasures were soon taken, and laws were passed making it illegal to carry a weapon onto a passenger plane. Some airlines placed guards on planes, and the Federal Aviation Administration ordered cockpits locked during flight. Soon, the number of skyjackings dwindled, but a new rash erupted in 1968–69, when a total of 63 attempts were made. Not all attempts were Cuba-bound; some were extortion plots calling for the payment of a huge sum of money in exchange for the safety of the passengers and plane. One extortion skyjack that has become legendary was made by a man known only as D. B. Cooper, who took control of a November 1971 Northwest Orient Airlines flight out of Portland, Ore., and demanded a $200,000 ransom. When the plane landed in Seattle, Wash. the $200,000 was sent aboard and the 36 passengers were released. Cooper then ordered the plane to fly to Reno, Nev., and somewhere in the flight he parachuted to earth with the money. The case remains unsolved.

Because of a new outbreak of plane hijackings in the late 1960s, “sky marshals” were introduced on many flights and a program was launched to detect weapons and explosive devices carried by passengers, either on their person or in their hand luggage. In 1969 airline pilots staged a strike and demanded that there be an air travel boycott of countries allowing skyjackers to enter. A 1973 U.S.-Cuban agreement aimed at stopping air piracy was the most effective measure of all. Castro voided the pact in October 1976, charging the CIA was involved in the bombing of a Cuban passenger jet. In 1980 there was a fresh spate of skyjackings to Cuba, these by Cuban refugees disenchanting with their life in America.

SLADE, Joseph “Jack”

Slade, Joseph “Jack” (1824–1864) murderer

When sober, Jack Slade was a vicious killer; drunk, he was considerably worse. Born in Illinois the son of a congressman, Slade had to flee west after killing a man during an argument. Thereafter, he left a trail of corpses wherever he went. He worked on and off as a stagecoach driver, a station agent for the Central Overland and, finally, a district superintendent for that line. But his main occupation was killing. Some biographers insist that Slade was a regular Jekyll and Hyde, being one of the kindest men around when sober. The truth is that his killings were only a little less cruel when he was not under the influence. A typical sober killing was that of a teamster named Andrew Farrar, who pulled a gun on Slade one day when the latter entered a saloon. Farrar could have shot him dead at that point, but he let Slade taunt him with the accusation that he was too cowardly to fight with his fists. Farrar rose to the bait and flipped his gun aside. As he was rolling up his sleeves, Slade shot him dead.

Alcohol seemed to make Slade go crazy. He once got intoxicated and shot up the army post at Fort Halleck, Colorado Territory, sending armed soldiers ducking for cover. Worse than that, Slade under the effects of whiskey engaged in acts of unparalleled cruelty. One of his victims was a larcenous Frenchman named Jules Beni, who had tried to kill Slade and made the mistake of failing. Slade caught up with Beni and tied him to a fence post. Between swigs on a bottle of whiskey, he shot Beni full of holes, aiming at his legs and arms to keep his victim alive. When finally he tired of the game, Slade jammed his gun into Beni’s mouth and pulled the trigger. He then cut off Beni’s ears, one of which he reputedly used as a watch fob. He sold the other as a souvenir for drinking money.

Slade was a matchless marksman with a navy revolver. The legends say that one morning at Rocky Ridge, when he was feeling comfortable, he saw a man approaching who had offended him some days before—observe the fine memory he had for matters like that—and, “Gentlemen,” said Slade, drawing, “it is a good twenty-five yard shot—I’ll clip the third button on his coat!” Which he did. The bystanders all admired it. And they all attended the funeral too.

Slade had the misfortune of performing some of his unwholesome deeds in Montana vigilante country, where the practitioners of the noose had cleaned out the Plummer gang and were looking to find other guests of honor for their necktie parties. Slade was warned to “get his horse and be gone,” but he failed to heed the warnings, apparently figuring his reputation was enough to scare off any attackers. On the night of March 3, 1864 he went on one of his monumental drunks and shot up a good deal of Virginia City.

A group of vigilantes rushed him and tied him up, and within three hours he was convicted and ordered to be hanged forthwith. When the scourge of the West learned his fate, he crawled around on his hands and knees, crying: “My God! My God! Must I die? Oh, my poor wife, my poor wife! My God, men, you can’t mean that I’m to die!”

Despite his pleas, Slade was hanged, and by the time his wife got to him, he had been laid out to “cool” in a hotel. The widow packed Slade’s body in a tin coffin filled with raw alcohol and set out for Illinois to bury him at his birthplace. By the time the Widow Slade and the coffin got to Salt Lake City, however, the body was decomposing and giving off an awful odor. So Jack Slade was buried in the Mormon Cemetery.

Slaughter, John (1841–1922) cattleman and lawman

One of Arizona’s storied lawmen, John Slaughter was also an enormously wealthy cattleman and living proof of an old Western axiom that if you put a man with much to lose in charge of enforcing the law, the law gets enforced.

Slaughter was born in the Republic of Texas. After 18 months of fighting for the Confederacy, he was discharged for medical reasons. Those reasons, however, did not prevent him from serving six years with the Texas Rangers, during which he won some measure of fame for honesty and efficiency. He was known for his ability to tell a badman to move on and be obeyed. Slaughter took up ranching in Texas and then moved west to start what would become the 100,000-acre San Bernardino Ranch in southeastern Arizona.

In dealing with rustlers, Slaughter was his own law, burying a notorious “herd cutter” named Bittercreek Gallagher where he gunned him down on a prairie in the New Mexico Territory. In 1886 Slaughter formed a partnership with George W. Lang, and their ranching enterprises boomed. He also established a very profitable packinghouse in Los Angeles. The same year, he became sheriff of Cochise County, Arizona Territory, which contained violent Tombstone. The area had already experienced problems with lawmen: the Earps had been run out of Tombstone in the aftermath of the gunfight at the O.K. Corral, and their enemy Sheriff John Behan took off rather than face a grand jury indictment charging theft of county finances.

Slaughter brought a breath of honesty to the office and soon proved his effectiveness as a lawman. His message to outlaws that they were no longer welcome was simply, “Git.” When Ike Clanton, the last important member of the Clanton gang, returned to Cochise County, it was Slaughter who invited him to leave. Clanton departed, only to continue his cattle-rustling activities in Apache County, where he was killed. Outlaws Cap Stilwell and Ed Lyle were two others who left rather than face Slaughter’s wrath. It must be noted that the Tombstone area was taming down by the time Slaughter took office, but he certainly sped up the process.

When two Mexican outlaws, Guadalupe Robles and another known only as Deron, robbed a train near Nogales, Mexico, killing three crewmen and making off with $15,000, they decided to hide out up north. They made the mistake of picking Cochise County, where they were shot dead by Slaughter and his chief deputy, Burt Alvord, who cornered them in the Whetstone Mountains. Alvord proved to be one of Slaughter’s mistakes. At the time, he was, as one writer later described it, “casting a crooked shadow” and would become one of the leaders of the Alvord-Stiles gang of train robbers while serving as a lawman, although by then Slaughter had put down his badge. Upon his retirement in 1890 he was appointed honorary deputy sheriff of the county and held that post until his death in 1922.

Slaughter Housers 19th-century New York gang

By the late 1840s New York’s Fourth Ward was known as the worst hotbed of crime in the city. In large part, it was run by criminal gangs, one of the most prominent and vicious being the Slaughter Housers. Before the Revolution the area had been the finest residential section of the city, containing the mansions of the great merchant families. But the wave of immigration that followed forced these aristocrats northward and their residences were replaced by shabby tenements where poverty and crime were a way of life. Police entered the Fourth Ward only in groups of a half dozen or more and well-dressed strangers proceeded at their peril. In similar sections of the city, such strangers could count on being robbed—in Slaughter Houser territory they would be lucky to escape with their lives. The Slaughter Housers would try to lure a passing stranger into a dive where he could be robbed and, often, murdered at leisure. But if he would not follow them, they in turn would follow him until he passed below an appointed window, from which a woman would pour a bucket of ashes on his head. As the victim choked, several of the gangsters would shove him through an open cellar door. The victim would be killed or knocked unconscious, stripped of his clothes and tossed naked back on the sidewalk.

A gangster who set the tone of the Slaughter Housers was George Leese, described by a reporter of the day as “a beastly, obscene ruffian, with bulging, bulbous, watery-blue eyes, bloated face and coarse swaggering gait.” Besides his career as a murderous mugger and river pirate, he was a sporting gentleman, serving as an official bloodsucker at illegal bare knuckle prize fights staged in the Fourth Ward’s larger dives and entertaining the crowd at rat fights by biting off the head of a mouse and/or rat for anyone offering a quarter. While he never matched the legendary Jack the Rat at that enterprise, Leese still made quite a bit of money. The practice reinforced the perception of the Slaughter Housers as monsters, which secured their role as kings of the Fourth Ward until the end of the Civil War, when police action finally drove most of the criminals from the area.

slave murderers

The record of murders committed by slaves in America before the end of the Civil War is hazy and inaccurate. In Virginia, however, efforts were made to compile complete statistics, which probably have some validity as a guideline for an overall view. Between 1780 and 1864 the following murder convictions of slaves were tabulated by the type of victim:

Master	56
Mistress	11
Overseer	11
Other whites	120
Free Negroes	7
Other slaves	85
Children killed by mother	12
Victim not described	60
Total	362

These figures include the 57 whites slain in Nat Turner’s rebellion of 1831.

sleepwalking and crime

Sleepwalking is one of science’s deepest mysteries. It has been estimated that as many as two million Americans walk in their sleep, engaging in all sorts of activities, from writing letters, reading books and driving automobiles to robbing houses, committing murder and taking their own lives. It has been demonstrated that a sleepwalker can kill and then awaken unaware of what he or she has done.

SLEEPWALKING and crime

In a classic case early in this century, a 16-year-old Kentucky girl shot and killed her father and six-year-old brother and wounded her mother during the night while in a somnambulistic trance. The girl, who had a long history of somnambulistic behavior, had suffered a nightmare that intruders had broken into the house and were going to kill her family. She had gotten out of bed, gone downstairs through the living room and kitchen into the pantry, where she placed a chair by a closet so that she could reach the top shelf, the place her father kept two revolvers. Then she had gone upstairs, entered her parents' bedroom and opened fire—at her family. Based on the testimony of doctors, the girl was acquitted of homicide charges.

Writing in the legal journal Case and Comment, Dr. Edward Podolsky, a member of the psychiatric staff at Kings County Hospital in Brooklyn, New York City, cited the case of a Mt. Vernon, N.Y. man who shot and killed his wife while in a somnambulistic state. Brought to trial, the man swore to the jury that he had been sleepwalking and that he hadn't awakened until several hours after the slaying. The jury appeared unconvinced until several doctors testified the man's claims were not illogical, that a somnambulist can indeed sleep through virtually anything.

This fact is further attested to by the odd case of a civil engineer in Denver. He stabbed himself four times in his sleep and bled to death. Just before he died, he awakened and told his wife about a weird dream he had had. He had dreamed he was surrounded by enemies who were trying to ruin him and that finally an evil spirit persuaded him to kill himself in order to spite them. The man had thereupon sliced himself up. Remarkably, he had not been disturbed by the excruciating pain he had inflicted upon himself.

But can a person who would not kill when awake commit murder during a sleepwalking session? According to Podolsky:

During somnambulism the individual commonly lives through a vivid experience, little or not at all related to his surrounding, and therefore hallucinatory in character. Although such persons appear to be walking in their sleep, they are not really asleep.

While it is necessary for a person to have consciousness before any cortical function is possible, it is not necessary to have complete awareness. During somnambulism activity is so completely organized that it can function without awareness. There is a complete disassociation of behavior patterns from the patterns of awareness. The disassociation is in that part of the brain known as the diencephalon.

Automatic movements occur in a pathological sense without the subject's being aware of their meaning, and even without his being aware of their happening at all. They have not the full cooperation of the personality and do not involve interest and attention. They may, in fact, when generalized, occur in the complete abeyance of the normal personality.

And Dr. Lewis R. Wolberg, a New York psychiatrist has noted:

A sleepwalking person has enough discrimination to perceive right from wrong. Unless he harbored a murderous hostility he would not kill, even when sleepwalking. This hostility might be so deep he would be unaware of it, of course. It would be transmitted more easily when he was partially conscious.

Another expert, Dr. Abraham Weinberg, has written: "True somnambulists have no recollection of an incident when they awake, but at the time they are aware of what they are doing."

Some persons are capable of fighting off urges toward kleptomania while awake but not when they are asleep. In one such case a sleepwalker would constantly steal his roommate's wallet in his sleep. If he were staying in a hotel, he would wander through the corridors asleep looking for an open door so that he could enter a room and pilfer something.

The extent to which a sleepwalker will break away from his moral code is best illustrated in the case study of a pastor compiled by the 19th century neurosurgeon Baron von Krafft-Ebing, who did much psychiatric research in the realm of somnambulism. Charged with having caused the pregnancy of a teenage girl, the pastor was acquitted after proving that he was a sleepwalker and that the forbidden relationship had taken place while he was in such a state. In another case a monk dreamed he had gotten out of his bed, walked down the corridor to the room of his prior, stabbed the prior three times and returned to his own bed. The next morning the monk excitedly ran to the prior's room and was relieved to see him alive. He told him of his dream, adding that he had dreamed that the prior had killed his mother and voices had called on him to take revenge. The prior told the astounded monk that he hadn't been dreaming, that he had indeed entered the room and gone through the actions he'd described. Fortunately, the prior had been unable to sleep and had been reading at his desk when the monk entered, walked to the bed and stabbed the rumpled blankets. Of course, to a psychiatrist, the monk's attempt to kill the prior was a subconscious expression of hostility. Because the monk was bound by the commandment “Thou shalt not kill” his subconscious had produced a justification for his violence, i.e., the prior’s alleged murder of his mother.

Apparently, the first legal case in the United States in which a sleepwalking defense was upheld was that of Albert J. Tirrell, a very improper Bostonian and the black sheep of his wealthy family, in 1845. He slit the throat of his mistress, Maria Bickford, in a rooming house and then tried to burn the place down. Tirrell had been seen leaving the room moments before the fire broke out. Later, friends of his had seen him walking around in a sort of daze, mumbling to himself, “They broke in and tried to murder me . . . someone came into my room and tried to murder me . . . I’m in a scrape.”

When Tirrell was brought to trial for murder, he maintained he knew nothing of what had happened. Provided with the top lawyers of the day, his defense was that he must have killed Maria Bickford during a sleepwalking hallucination and his attorneys had doctors testify that he was a chronic somnambulist. It took the jury just two hours to find him not guilty. Public opinion subsequently turned against Tirrell’s novel defense and his family had him committed to an institution.

Controversy still surrounds the Tirrell case. Was sleepwalking the cause of his act or had he merely been intoxicated and killed the girl in a drunken rage? Only a few sleepwalking defenses have been offered over the years, and in those that succeeded, the defense generally had proved the existence of a long history of the disorder prior to the crime.

Slickers Missouri vigilantes

In 1845 Lincoln County, Mo. was the most crime-ridden county in the state, mainly because gangs of horse thieves and counterfeiters came up with a way of thwarting arrest or, in the event of an arrest, conviction. The technique involved engaging obliging witnesses beforehand to provide the lawbreakers with alibis for the time of the crime. As a result, subsequent prosecutions proved futile.

Finally, the citizens of the county formed a vigilante group that called on suspected criminals and their backup witnesses and, if they decided the individuals were guilty of crimes, proceeded to “slick them down” with hickory sprouts, “slick” being slang for thrash. The punished individuals were then given a specified time to leave the county, generally no more than a few hours. The so-called Slicker Campaign of 1845–46 spawned an opposition group called the Anti-Slickers, but the vigilante movement proved an eminent success, probably the most successful ever in this country. It took only a few hangings to convince the county’s troublesome characters that a slicking was a clear and pressing reason “to pull up stakes fast.”

slot machines

With the end of Prohibition, gangsters who had engaged in bootlegging went into slot machines in a big way. These so-called one-armed bandits provided much of the revenue needed to hold criminal organizations together in the post-Prohibition era.

The American slot machine dates back to 1887, where a skilled German mechanic in San Francisco made a machine that took in and paid out nickels. It quickly became popular and was set up in saloons around the city. The house takeout was usually set at 25 percent. Since gambling devices could not be patented, the mechanic’s idea was lifted freely. In Chicago, Herbert Mills began making machines for distribution throughout the country, and by 1906 he was known as Mr. Slot Machine. A slot machine is a very complicated mechanism, with over 600 parts, including one very reliable apparatus whose adjustment determines the house percentage.

The biggest Mafia operator of slot machines in the 1930s was Frank Costello, who saturated New York City with them. Each Costello machine sported a special sticker, which protected it wherever it was set up. If a freelancer tried to install machines without Costello stickers, the color of which changed regularly, they would be subject to attack by the mob or to police seizure. Police officers who made the mistake of interfering with the operation of Costello’s machines could count on departmental harassment, such as transfer to the far reaches of Staten Island.

Costello’s hold on the New York slot machine racket was secure during the administration of Mayor Jimmy Walker, but when reformer Fiorello H. La Guardia became mayor, an all-out war was launched against the machines. Costello used all his political pull to get a court injunction restraining La Guardia from interfering with the slots, but the Little Flower simply ignored the order and sent special squads of police around town to smash the machines. Costello did not know how to react to this “illegal” behavior by the mayor and eventually pulled his valuable machines out of the city. He found a new location for them—thanks to an invitation from Gov. Huey Long of Louisiana—and set up a slot machine empire in New Orleans. Years later, when an aggressive and ambitious young hood named Joe Gallo demanded, “Who the hell gave Frank Costello New Orleans?” the answer was, of course, “ole Huey did.”

Today, slot machines are legal only in Nevada and Atlantic City, N.J. For some reason, a myth persists that the casinos pay off at 95 percent. The actual payoff is much nearer to 75 percent. What the casinos generally do is put one 95 percent payoff machine in a line to draw in the suckers. Sometimes a player will work three machines at once. What money he gets back from the middle one is quickly swallowed up by those on the left and right.

slungshot mugger's weapon

A most brutal weapon favored by 19th-century footpads and muggers, the slungshot consisted of a weight of shot or other heavy material attached to a flexible handle or strap. When swung, the weapon picked up tremendous force and would invariably lay a victim low, sometimes even killing him.

Slungshot gangs controlled many streets in several large cities. One of the most fearsome of such groups was the teenage killer gang of Quincy, Ill. in the 1850s, whose members made up for their lack of size and age by such effective use of the weapon that they drove other criminal outfits from the scene. Changing gentlemen's fashion led to the decline of the weapon, since its concealment required the suits and long coats popular in the last century. During that era no underworld dandy would venture abroad without a slungshot to complement a brace of pistols.

smack game matching coin con

Among the most enduring of all con games is one called "smack." It involves two swindlers and a victim and is often worked at bus and train stations, airports and bars.

Con man A joins con man B, who has already lined up a victim, and suggests they pass the time matching coins for drinks or smokes. Soon, they are playing for money. The game calls for each to flip a coin with the odd coin the winner, such as one tails collects from two heads and so on. When con man A goes off to the men's room for a moment, con man B informs the victim how much he dislikes A and suggests they cheat him. Con man B says that whatever he calls, heads or tails, the sucker should call the opposite. That way A has to lose to one of them.

What happens, of course, is that A does lose each flip but most of the time B wins the money, especially on large bets, and thus collects not only from A but from the sucker as well. Suddenly, A gets suspicious and declares he thinks B and the sucker are cheating him. Both B and the sucker deny the charge, but A is not satisfied. If they aren't working together, he says, he would like them to leave in different directions. Con man B gives the sucker the high sign and whispers to him a place where they can meet nearby. The sucker goes off gleefully, looking forward to the division of the loot. Naturally, B never shows, and when the sucker returns to the scene of the swindle, A has disappeared as well. It is a great learning experience for most victims.

Small, Len (1862–1936) "Pardoning Governor" of Illinois

It would be futile to attempt to single out the most dishonest politician ever to hold office, but Len Small, governor of Illinois during the 1920s, stands as the most blatantly corrupt. A Kankakee farmer and puppet of Chicago Mayor Big Bill Thompson, Small took office in 1921 and was indicted a short time later for embezzling $600,000 during his previous term as state treasurer, an activity that before and after Small was a time-honored tradition in Illinois.

Facing trial, Small said he had an abiding faith in the jury system. As it turned out, he had very good reason to. While his lawyers fought the standard courtroom defense, Small's behind-the-scenes support came from Walter Stevens, then regarded as the dean of Chicago's gunmen; Jew Ben Newmark, a former chief investigator for the state's attorney who found greater prosperity as a counterfeiter, extortionist and all-around thief; and "Umbrella Mike" Boyle, a corrupt Electrical Workers' Union official. This trio successfully molded the jurors' opinions with bribes and, when that technique did not work, with threats against them and members of their family. Small was acquitted.

Duly grateful, the governor shortly thereafter was able to repay his debt to the three by granting all of them pardons for sundry offenses—Boyle and Newmark for jury tampering and Stevens for murder. Thereafter, Small ran up a pardon-granting record unparalleled in American history.

During his first three years in office, he pardoned about 1,000 felons. And that was only the warm-up. Over the next five years Small freed another 7,000 on a strictly cash basis. A longtime Chicago newspaperman, George Murray, explained the operation most succinctly:

The Republican party machinery of the state was then in the hands of Len Small as governor, Robert E. Crowe as state's attorney of Cook County, and William Hale Thompson as mayor of Chicago. . . . When Crowe would convict a wrong-doer the man could buy a pardon from Small. Then Small and Crowe would split the take and Crowe would go into court for more convictions. The voters returned this team to office year after year.

That incredible electoral streak came to an end in the infamous Pineapple Primary of 1928. Despite the support of the Capone mob, the Small-Crowe ticket went down to a resounding defeat, as enraged voters turned out in record numbers. “It was purely a revolt,” concluded the Illinois Crime Survey, “an uprising of the people, expressing themselves through the ballot. The birth of ‘Moral Chicago’ was hailed throughout the world.”

The accolade may have been somewhat overly enthusiastic but with the removal of Small from office, the citizens of Chicago and the rest of Illinois could at least entertain the hope that a convicted felon might actually be required to put in some time behind bars.

Smith, Edgar Herbert (1933–) murderer

Probably few “wrong man” cases have taken as many twists as that of Edgar Smith, who was sentenced to death for the 1957 bludgeon murder of a 15-year-old New Jersey girl, Victoria Zielinski. Smith established a longevity record on death row, 14 years at Trenton State Prison. During that time he never ceased proclaiming his innocence and soon started a correspondence with conservative columnist William F. Buckley, Jr., which eventually totaled some 2,900 pages. Buckley encouraged Smith to write an impressive book, Brief Against Death, in his cell. The book, aided by Buckley’s columns, made Smith a national cause celebre. Smith followed up with a second book, A Reasonable Doubt, which made belief in his innocence still more compelling.

Finally, in 1971 Smith won a new trial, at which he admitted his guilt and was sentenced to 25 to 30 years for second-degree murder. With time credited for good behavior, he was released on probation. As he left the prison, Smith was picked up by Buckley’s car and driven to New York, where before TV cameras he again assured people he was innocent of the killing. His second trial had come about as the result of plea bargaining, which he was convinced was the only way he could get out of prison. “It was a difficult choice,” he said, “but I wanted to be free.”

Smith set to work writing his third book, Getting Out, in which he stated in the prologue:

In the Prologue to Brief Against Death, I ended with the question: “Did Justice triumph?” Today, four years later, my fight ended and my freedom a reality, that question remains as valid as when it was first asked.

Did Justice triumph?

Each reader will have to find his own answer.

As it turned out, readers had to wait until October 1976 to make up their mind. In that month San Diego, Calif. police began a hunt for Smith to answer charges of assault, kidnapping and attempted murder. Smith had forced a young woman into his car at knifepoint, and when she fought him, he stabbed her. The women kept on battling and finally hurled herself out of Smith’s car onto the freeway. Smith then drove off.

About a week later, Smith telephoned Buckley from Las Vegas. The columnist was out, so Smith left a number where he could be reached. Buckley promptly notified the FBI and Smith was arrested in a hotel room.

Taken into custody, Smith readily admitted his assault on the San Diego woman and then added a bombshell. He admitted he really had murdered Victoria Zielinski 19 years earlier. “For the first time in my life, I recognized that the devil I had been looking at the last forty-three years was me,” he said. “I recognized what I am, and I admitted it.”

Smith was sent back to prison for life.

Smith, James Monroe “Jingle Money” (1888–1949) college president and embezzler

A member of the Huey Long regime, Dr. James Monroe Smith, president of Louisiana State University, was credited by that state’s press with making education profitable—for himself—and won the journalistic sobriquet Jingle Money Smith.

Born in Jackson Parish, La. in 1888, Smith served as dean of the College of Education at Southwest Louisiana Institute from 1920 to 1930 and as president of LSU from then until 1939. For part of his academic years, he was an adviser and lackey to Huey Long. As it developed after his tenure at LSU, Smith could have taught the state’s political dictator a few things about making money. While serving at the university, Smith had become known as a rather wild liver and free spender.

In 1939 Dr. Smith resigned his post and fled the state as an investigation began delving into missing school finances. In due course, the sum was found to be extensive, and by the time Smith was found hiding out in Canada, he had been dubbed Jingle Money Smith. He was arrested on a charge of embezzling $100,000 in university funds and was indicted on 36 counts, which indicated the theft was far greater. Convicted on the $100,000 embezzlement charge, Smith was sent to the penitentiary. He was released in February 1946 in poor health and died on May 26, 1949.

Smith, Jefferson Randolph “Soapy” (1860–1898) con man

An incorrigible con man and gambler, Jefferson “Soapy” Smith worked his trade—everything from three-card monte, the shell game and various other scams—throughout the West and in the goldfields of Alaska, areas where the suckers were plentiful but could prove unforgiving.

Soapy got his nickname from one of his famous cons. It involved selling soap to the hicks in the cow towns, where Smith would stand on a soap box and announce that several of the bars of soap he was selling had a $10 or $20 bill inside the wrapper. The suckers would rush to buy, especially after one buyer, one of Smith's skills, waved a $20 bill and yelled he had just pulled it out of a wrapper.

Soapy was in his early teens when he ran away from his Georgia home and ended up in Texas punching cows. He was separated from six months' pay by a shell game artist. Far from taking it badly, he decided to learn that con himself, eventually teaming up with a venerable old con man named V. Bullock-Taylor. When Bullock-Taylor died, Smith became the king of the con circuit throughout the West. He opened up a gambling hall in Denver that became famous for never giving a sucker an even break and recruited an organization that enabled him to control virtually all the city's con rackets, including gold brick swindles and phony mining stock. Later, he moved the center of his operations to Creede, Colo. to take advantage of the silver wealth pouring into that town. Smith took over most of the rackets there with only some opposition from saloon keeper Bob Ford, the assassin of Jesse James. Eventually, it was said, Soapy forced Ford to accept him as a secret partner. After Ford was killed by a man named O'Kelly, it was said that Smith had paid for the job.

Eventually, the silver ran out and Soapy and his gang headed for the Alaskan gold fields, setting up in Skagway to trim the miners just arriving and the big-strikers on the way home. Soapy's capers in Skagway became legendary. He trimmed suckers in his gambling saloon, robbing many of valuable claims. Too greedy to pass up any form of revenue, he set up a sign over a cabin that read "Telegraph Office" and charged $5 to send a telegram to anywhere and another $5 to receive a reply. Miners flocked to send out messages and paid their money for responses, never learning there were no telegraph wires out of Skagway.

Soapy also ran an "Information Office" to provide newcomers and travelers with whatever intelligence they needed. Inquirers imparted more information to Soapy's men than was wise and Skagway burglars and footpads became famous for their clairvoyance in locating sums of money. On some nights Skagway had as many as a dozen holdups, virtually all executed by Soapy's men. One of Soapy's most famous swindles involved a man of the cloth who was seeking funds to build a church. Smith was the first to contribute, giving the surprised clergyman $1,000. With the impetus from Soapy's contribution, the clergyman collected a total of $36,000, only to have it all stolen. Soapy thought 36 to one was a rather good return on his initial investment.

Efforts to control Smith's avarice were unavailing as he took control of the town, naming his own marshal and judges. A vigilance committee, called the Committee of 101, plastered up signs reading:

NOTICE

To all gamblers and bunco men:

We have resolved to run you out of town and make Skagway a decent place to live in. Take our advice and get out before action is taken.

Soapy laughed at the warning and promptly formed his own Committee of 303 to indicate he had the power and was not about to relinquish it. The Committee of 101 quickly lost heart and failed to act. In July of 1898, however, Soapy's men robbed a miner of $2,500 in gold in a daylight mugging that sparked an instantaneous uprising. With the men of the Committee of 101 in the lead, hundreds of angry miners armed with picks and shotguns stormed into Soapy's saloon. Soapy tried to con his way out; the vigilantes listened for a while and then shot him to pieces. Most of Soapy's supporters were rounded up and what would have been Alaska's greatest lynching was prevented only by the arrival of U.S. infantry troops and the establishment of martial law.

With Soapy dead, the citizens enjoyed telling tales of his wild cons and observing how fitting it was that someone had ceremoniously tossed three shells and a pea into his grave as he was being lowered into it.

Smith, Joseph (1805–1844) Mormon leader and murder victim

Joseph Smith has been described as America's most charismatic religious leader. Certainly, as the founder of the Mormon Church, he inspired great love in some and incredible hatred in others. The hatred ended in his brutal murder.

Smith claimed he had received divine revelations when he was 15 and living with his family in Manchester, N.Y. The revelations continued through the 1820s until he published The Book of Mormon in March 1830. The following month he officially established the Mormon Church. Mormon beliefs stirred anger in virtually all non-Mormon religious circles, and Smith and his followers were forced to move constantly, from New York to Ohio, to Missouri and to Illinois. In various communities anti-Mormonism culminated in virtual civil war, as mobs attacked Mormon settlements, leaving a trail of arson, rape, pillage and murder. Gov. Lillburn W. Boggs ordered the Mormons out of Missouri under threat of annihilation, and Smith barely escaped execution there. The Mormon leader then established a community in a new city called Nauvoo in an area north of Quincy, Ill. Rumors about the practice of polygamy plagued the Mormons, particularly after Joseph Smith openly advocated the practice in 1843. In 1844 a split developed in the church, and a splinter group started publication of a newspaper attacking Smith, who in turn ordered its printing presses destroyed. Rioting followed, and Smith and a number of followers were jailed in Carthage, Ill. on charges of polygamy, arson and treason. Late on the afternoon of June 27, 1844, an angry mob broke into the jail and shot Joseph Smith and his brother Hyrum, patriarch of the church, to death.

Smith, Susan (1971–) child murderer

It was pathetic high drama. A black carjacker seized a young white mother's Madza Protege with her two toddlers late at night on a rural Union County, South Carolina highway. The frightened children howled in fear as they were driven off, while their poor mother, Susan Smith, could do nothing but scream after them, "I love y'all!"

It was an incident that shocked not only the county and state but the entire nation. The citizens of Union County formed private search parties and prayer chains in hopes that 3-year-old Michael and 14-month Alex would be found alive.

The community rallied to 23-year-old Susan Smith. She helped a police artist produce a mugshot of the attacker, the drawing distributed nationwide by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children and the Adam Walsh Foundation.

Young black men between the ages of 20 and the early 30s were mass subjects of suspicion. Later a black named Hester Booker would say, “It was hard to be black this week in Union. The whites acted so different. They wouldn’t speak, they’d look at you and then reach over and lock their doors.”

People in Union held out sympathy for the mother and hoped to the very end that the boys would be found alive. That end came nine days later on November 4, 1994. The story Susan Smith had told was a deadly hoax. She confessed to having killed the two toddlers by driving her car into a lake so that they drowned. The motive: She had a lover who she feared losing if she was saddled to two small children.

Rage from both the black and white community was intense. It was the same around the country where a poll indicated 63 percent favored Smith’s execution. In fact, because Union County was a rather impoverished area, outside donations were made from around the country to aid in the prosecution. The county had to return the donations because many of the donors insisted on a quid pro quo—Smith had to be sentenced to death.

The murder verdict was handed down and the punishment phase also revealed that Smith had sex with a total of four men in a short period before her crime. This further enraged many but in the end the decision was for a sentence of life imprisonment. Smith would be eligible for parole in 30 years.

Smith, Thomas “Bear River” (1830–1870) lawman

As a town tamer of the Old West, Tom “Bear River” Smith had few equals. He had, for instance, tamed Abilene, Kan. before Wild Bill Hickok appeared on the scene, and he did it with his fists rather than the two guns he carried. Such titles as “Bear River Smith: Two-Fisted Marshal of Abilene” have appeared from dime novel days down to today’s adventure magazines.

Smith’s early history is clouded, although most of his biographers say he was a New York City policeman for six years in the 1850s or early 1860s and that he learned how to use his fists on a rough Bowery beat. Some writers describe Smith performing heroically in the New York Draft Riots of 1863, while others have him moving west before the Civil War. Beginning in 1865, Smith’s trail becomes clear. He worked for a number of freighting outfits in the territories of Utah, Colorado and Wyoming until 1868, when he turned up as a construction worker in Bear River, Wyoming Territory, the “end of track” of the Union Pacific Railroad. The railroad workers were, of course, “hell on wheelers” and friction inevitably developed between them and the more conservative “townies,” who soon organized a vigilance committee. When the vigilantes seized three railroaders and seemed intent on hanging them, Smith led a railroader counterattack. They set the jail on fire and then trapped most of the vigilantes in a store. A peace parley was held, but it ended abruptly when Smith shot a man named Nuckles, who may or may not have tried to shoot him first. In the ensuing battle 14 men were killed and Smith was badly wounded before the U.S. Cavalry from Fort Bridger restored order. He was never tried for his offenses, and after the battle the nickname Bear River stuck to him. The Union Pacific showed its appreciation by giving him the job of end-of-the-track marshal.

In 1869 Smith took on the marshal’s job at Kit Carson, Colorado Territory, where he won the praise of Billy Breakenridge, another famous lawman, as “the bravest man I ever had the pleasure of meeting.” By this time Smith had developed the practice of never using his guns. As the fame of Bear River Smith spread, the mayor of Abilene, Kan. appointed him marshal of that turbulent town. Smith immediately made his mark by declaring it illegal to carry a gun within the town limits and using his fists to enforce the edict. Within a few months Abilene experienced a startling transition. The Texas cowhands who used to shoot up the town were tamed, and Smith gained their admiration and respect. Had Bear River Smith’s tenure lasted, Abilene’s mention in chronicles of the lawless West might have been only a footnote. On November 2, 1870, as a favor to a neighboring sheriff, Smith rode out of Abilene to arrest a nester named Andrew McConnell on a murder charge. He found the wanted man with his partner, Moses Miles, but never got within fist range of them. The two men cut Smith down with rifle fire, and as he lay dying, they nearly decapitated him with an ax.

With Bear River Smith’s death, Abilene returned to its bloody ways and remained so until Hickok arrived on the scene in 1871.

Smith, Thomas L. “Pegleg” (1801–1866) mountaineer, thief and swindler

One of the legendary mountain men who roamed the American West a law unto themselves, Pegleg Smith could also be described as a slaver, thief, rustler and con man. William Caruthers in Loafing Along Death Valley Trails says:

Smith may be said to be the inventor of the Lost Mine, as a means of getting quick money. The credulous are still looking for mines that existed only in Pegleg's fine imagination. . . . [He] saw in man's lust for gold, ways to get it easier than the pick and shovel method. . . . When his money ran out he always had a piece of high-grade gold quartz to lure investment in his phantom mine.

Born in Crab Orchard, Ky. on October 10, 1801, Smith ran away from home in his teens. After a stint of flatboating on the Mississippi, he headed for St. Louis, where he worked for a fur merchant and met such trappers and mountaineers as Jim Bridger, Kit Carson and Milton Sublette. When Alexander Le Grand made his first expedition to Santa Fe, Smith went along and got a taste of living in the wild, an experience he found most satisfying. He picked up several Indian tongues and, like the majority of mountain men, some Indian enemies. One shot him just below his right knee, which was how Smith acquired his peg leg. He remained as good a horseman as ever despite his handicap, and during most of the 1830s was one of the most successful of the fur trappers.

Near the end of the decade, the value of pelts dropped through the floor and Smith went into a more nefarious trade, stealing Indian children and selling them to wealthy Mexicans looking for slaves. In time, the Indians were on the lookout for this mysterious child stealer with a wooden leg; so Smith moved on to California, where for the next decade he became an accomplished horse thief, one time leading a group of 150 Utah Indians across the Sierra Nevada into California, where they stole several hundred horses. With two other famous mountaineer scouts, Old Bill Williams and Jim Beckwourth, Pegleg Smith formed one of the biggest horse-stealing rings California ever saw. In time, pressure from the law became so intense that they disbanded.

Following the discovery of gold in California, Smith developed his mining swindle, insisting that he had found rich samples of gold-bearing black quartz before he had to flee from vicious Indians somewhere in the Chocolate Mountains or the Santa Rosa Mountains or the Borego Badlands. The locale kept changing as Pegleg changed his story, but the gullible still listened; some staked him while others bought maps showing the alleged location of the gold. Even after Smith died in the county hospital in San Francisco in 1866, men kept searching for the Lost Pegleg Mine and they still do today, a lasting tribute to the old reprobate's snake-oil charm.

Smits, Claes (?–1641) first white murder victim in New York

The first murder in what is now New York occurred either in 1626 or 1641, depending on whether or not Indians are counted as murder victims. In 1626 an unidentified Indian started out for a Dutch trading post in New Amsterdam with a string of pelts for sale. He was accompanied by his young nephew. At Fresh Water Pond they came across three Dutch farm laborers chopping wood. The Indian made the mistake of showing off his furs, and with typical greed, the trio quickly dispatched him with an ax and took the furs, while the victim's young nephew ran off. This is the first recorded account of blood being spilled in the colony of New Netherland. Although it would have been a simple matter for the authorities to solve the murder, there appears to have been no consensus that a crime had been committed, since the dead man was only an Indian.

Thus, Claes Smits, a white man who was murdered in 1641, was considered the first genuine homicide victim. Ironically, Smits' murder had a direct relationship with the one 15 years earlier, for the culprit was the nephew of the murdered Indian. He too had been on his way to the settlement to trade some furs when he came upon the hut of a Dutch settler—Smits—who, as coincidence would have it, was also chopping wood. Smits, a wheelwright, took an interest in the pelts and brought out several blankets and, apparently, a hatchet to trade for the furs. The Indian noticed, perhaps mistakenly, a similarity with previous events and quickly axed and slew Smits.

This act, of course, was a genuine murder, considering the color of the victim's skin, and the Dutch authorities demanded that the Indians turn over the killer to face punishment. The Indians refused, declaring Smits' killer had merely followed tribal law and avenged the death of his relative after the whites had refused to act. The result of the dispute was a full-scale war, in which many on both sides died, a tragedy that could have been avoided had Dutch officials taken the position in 1626 that a murder had occurred.

Smoky Row, New Orleans prostitution area

Possibly the worst center of prostitution in New Orleans' French Quarter in the 1870s was a short row of dilapidated old houses on Burgundy Street between Bienville and Conti, which teemed with black prostitutes. The press was constantly printing warnings to visitors of the city to avoid the area and reported on the brawling and violence of such battling bawds as One-Eyed Sal, Fightin' Mary, Gallus Lu and the redoubtable Kidney-Foot Jenny. These women would often fight one another over a potential customer; if the gentleman made the error of trying to settle the argument by making a selection, he would very likely end up being savaged by the other woman.

The whores of Smoky Row came in all sizes and ages, from 10 to 70 and wore only loose Mother Hubbards cut very low. When not entertaining a customer or fighting each other, they sat in rocking chairs in the doorways, chewing tobacco and smoking pipes. When a man passed, they tried to drag him inside, and if he resisted, they grabbed his hat. When the man went after it, one of the women would very often blind him with a well-aimed spit of tobacco juice and another would club him unconscious. He was then robbed of all money and things of value and tossed out on the street. Smoky Row continued in its wicked ways for about 15 years until 1885, when numerous complaints and a growing list of missing men forced the police to clean out the area. After the harlots were driven out, police searchers discovered piles of men's clothing and bloodstained wallets. They dug up the backyards of the houses in search of corpses but found none, concluding the code of Smoky Row called for all dead victims to be removed and buried in other parts of the city.

There is no way to measure the extent of sneak thievery or to describe the many techniques sneak thieves use, but it is safe to say that the great majority of people have no idea how skilled most professional sneak thieves are. A few examples from the "sneak thief paradise," New York's garment district, will demonstrate the skills involved, especially those of the "packies," "readers" and "slashers."

A packy is a sneak thief who has "rhythm," or the ability to steal directly under the noses of workmen and guards. Many of them are drug addicts (knowledgeable observers say addicts make the best packies). A police detective once told the story of a packy with amazing timing who beat four men loading a truck.

This guy watches the movements of the four men very carefully, timing them. They were working in a rhythm, and you actually see this packy swaying to it. Then, at just the right moment, he stepped in and beat them for a package. A few minutes later, when I told them what he'd done, they could hardly believe it.

Since the value of a package may range from $20 to $750 or more, a first-rate packy can obviously earn himself a decent living, but it is an ability few thieves possess.

Less proficient than a packy but skilled in his own right, a reader relies more on acting ability than on timing and dexterity. This type of sneak thief spots a likely-looking package in the hands of a delivery boy, reads the address on it and gets there first. When the boy arrives, the reader is waiting in front of the building, often in shirt sleeves with a pencil over his ear, anxiously pacing back and forth. When the reader sees the delivery boy, he goes into his act, demanding: "Where the hell have you been? Do I have to wait all day for one little package?" The reader complains that unless the service gets better he is going to take his business elsewhere, or else he declares he may call the boy's boss to complain he's too slow. He grabs the package away from the boy, signs a receipt for it, bawls the kid out a little more and then stalks into the building. The delivery boy naturally figures he's done his job. Meanwhile, the reader heads out the back door with a package that may contain expensive fur collars, meaning about $1,000 or $2,000 profit for a couple of minutes of playacting.

A slasher, by comparison, is a bush-league thief, but not without talent. He walks behind the big dress racks as they are pulled through the streets of the garment district. At the proper moment he slashes the canvas cover on the rack and yanks out an armload of dresses. He does it so neatly and quickly that the man pulling the rack never suspects anything has happened.

snitch boxes prison metal detectors

Today, metal detectors are a common sight at airports, courthouses and many public buildings, but more than a half-century ago their use was in the main restricted to prisons, where they were used to spot knives or guns in the possession of anyone passing through them. Referred to by inmates as "mechanical stool pigeons" or "snitch boxes," they were affected by any metal so that a green line danced on an oscilloscope and a buzzer sounded.

Unfortunately, the machines could not discriminate between lethal and harmless metal. While Al Capone did time in Alcatraz, the snitch boxes were constantly going off. It turned out that Big Al's metal arch supports were the source of the trouble, and exasperated officials finally had their prize prisoner turn them in for a plastic pair.

Even more frustrating was when Mama Capone showed up to see her "good boy" on visiting day. The electric pigeon blared away and guards pounced on the old lady in a frantic hunt for a gun or hacksaw. Nothing. Mrs. Capone was sent through the machine again and the alarm went off once more. It took a quarter of an hour to finally solve the problem. Mrs. Capone was wearing an old-fashioned full-length corset with metal ribs. Mama Capone was allowed to proceed, but on subsequent visits the entire routine had to be repeated, for fear this time the old lady might be armed with lethal contraband. Prison officials made no effort to dissuade her from wearing such a corset, since that would have been regarded as most disrespectful.

Snyder, Ruth (1895–1928) murderess

Ruth Snyder, a wife who, with her lover, murdered her husband, became probably the most reviled woman of the 1920s; even her death in the electric chair was subjected to indignity. Her sin was not so much being a conspirator in the murder plot but being the active planner and the more active participant in the crime. Her trial was so spectacular that the press contingent included such unlikely personalities as Mary Roberts Rinehart, David Belasco, D. W. Griffith, Billy Sunday, Peggy Hopkins Joyce, Dr. John Roach Straton, Aimee Semple McPherson and even Will Durant, then at the top of the best-seller list with The Story of Philosophy.

Albert Snyder never realized how many close calls he had at the hands of Ruth. She had resolved to kill him in 1926, a year after she met corset salesman Judd Gray and found true happiness in an adulterous affair. Gray, not the strongest of personalities, called her “queen,” and “my momsie.” She referred to him as “lover boy.”

Ruth took out a $48,000 life insurance policy on Snyder with a double-indemnity clause. Then she set about trying to kill him, but he seemed to live a charmed life. Twice, she disconnected the gas while Snyder slept and slipped from the room, but both times her husband awoke and saved himself from asphyxiation, never even suspecting his wife. Another time she closed the garage door while he was inside with the automobile’s motor running. He nearly fell victim to carbon monoxide poisoning but managed to survive. On two occasions she put bichloride of mercury in his whiskey, but he poured the stuff out, commenting that they had to change boot-leggers. Twice she added powerful narcotics to his medicine while he was ill, but he still recovered.

In February 1927 Ruth convinced Gray to help her murder her husband. Gray hid in a bedroom closet before the Snyders returned home one night, and after Snyder fell asleep, he slipped out and hit him over the head with a sash weight. But the blow woke Snyder up. He struggled with Gray and cried out for his wife to help him. Ruth came to the aid of her lover, picking up the sash weight and hitting her husband again. As he slipped into unconsciousness, Ruth chloroformed him and strangled him with picture wire. Finally, Albert Snyder was dead. Gray then tied Ruth up and when the police arrived, she told them she had been attacked by burglars.

The police became suspicious because her bindings had been tied rather loosely, as though not to cause her discomfort. When they found Gray’s name a number of times among her possessions, they decided to tell her Gray had been arrested and had confessed. The trick worked and she talked. Hearing that Ruth had confessed, Gray admitted his part in the murder. Both attempted to make the other the principal party in the murder, but it was well established that the credit belonged to Ruth Snyder.

Both were convicted and sentenced to death in the electric chair, a fate they met on January 22, 1928 at Sing Sing Prison. Just as the executioner pulled the switch on Ruth Snyder, photographer Thomas Howard, sitting in a front-row seat, crossed his legs and snapped a picture with a camera strapped just above his ankle. The next morning the New York Daily News devoted the entire front page to the horrifying shot of the current coursing through Ruth

SOCCO the Bracer

Snyder's body, perhaps the most famous picture in tabloid journalism.

Socco the Bracer (1844–1873) gangster

One of the leaders of the notorious Patsy Conroy gang that terrorized New York's East River docks in the 1860s and 1870s, Joseph Gayles, better known as Socco the Bracer, was described by a police inspector as the most ferocious thug on the docks. Socco was generally conceded to have killed more than 20 men and always prowled the streets with at least two guns and an assortment of knives. According to waterfront legend, Socco once was so disappointed with the loot he and three other Conroys netted during a raid on a brig that he lashed the lone seaman on watch to a sea chest, gagged him and heaved him overboard after filling the sea chest with several small sacks of sugar. "If the sugar melts fast, you'll be all right," he said. It didn't.

Socco the Bracer came to a fitting end on the night of May 29, 1873, when he and two other pirates, Bum Mahoney and Billy Woods, attempted a raid on the brig Margaret, which was tied up at Pier 27 waiting to take on cargo. While ransacking a sea chest, they made such a racket that the captain and two crewmen awakened. In a bitter fight the looters were forced over the side to their boat and they rowed off in the mist. However, as they neared shore, two policemen patrolling the river in a rowboat spotted them and exchanged fire with Socco the Bracer. One of the officers' bullets hit Socco in the chest and he collapsed in the boat. Mahoney and Woods kept to the oars, rowing to the middle of the river, where they decided to lighten their load by tossing Socco overboard.

Socco the Bracer swam back to the rowboat, clung to the gunwales and begged his companions to haul him back aboard. Woods told Mahoney to crack the wounded man on the knuckles, but Mahoney, in a fit of tenderheartedness, pulled the wounded gangster in. However, before the boat had gone another 50 feet, Socco the Bracer expired, and his two disgusted accomplices once more heaved his body over the side. The corpse floated to shore four days later at the foot of Stanton Street.

Soldier of Fortune hit man want ads magazine's liability

In 1985 Robert Black, 35, a former U.S. Marine Corps captain decided he had to be rid of his wife, Sandra, and so hired a hit man to carry out the crime. How did Black locate such a character? He simply consulted the ads in Soldier of Fortune, a right-wing publication devoted to the art of force to, among other things, defend the American way of life, and in this case, death.

The plot was successful, but afterward uncovered, and the killer, John Wayne Hearn, plea-bargained a life sentence for himself and testified against Black. Black was executed in 1992.

In 1990 businessman Richard Braun was murdered by gunman Michael Savage. In this case as well the plot did not remain undetected. However, in a sense the solutions to both murders became secondary to whether or not there was a degree of guilt beyond that of the plotters themselves. Braun's sons ended up suing Soldier of Fortune, claiming business associates of their father hired Savage to kill the senior Braun through a "gun-for-hire" advertisement in the publication. Similarly the victim's estate in the Black case had sued on the same grounds.

Initially both suits against the magazine were successful, but these decisions were later overturned. In the Black case an appeals court overruled the previous finding, holding that the ad in question was ambiguously worded, and therefore cleared the magazine against having to pay damages. In 1992 a judgment for $4.37 million for the Braun family was upheld by the U.S. 11th Circuit Court of Appeals. The court ruled that Savage's ad had implied a willingness "to use his gun to commit crimes," and therefore was outside the commercial free-speech protections of the First Amendment.

Son of Sam (1953–) serial killer

Few cases of mass murder have ever generated the level of hysteria produced by the notorious "Son of Sam" killings that terrorized New York City from July 1976 to August 1977. During that period the killer fired a total of 31 bullets into 13 young women and men, killing six and severely wounding seven in eight separate attacks. Generally, the victims were young girls or couples parked in cars at night.

At first, the murderer was labeled the ".44 Caliber Killer" because of the weapon he used. Later, he started writing letters to newspapers and signing them Son of Sam, which became his new nickname. Sam, the killer wrote, was the person really responsible for the crimes because he kept ordering him, the Son of Sam, to do his bidding. Next he asserted "demons" were responsible. The city was in a state of terror. Son of Sam's first female victims were brunettes, so thousands of women became blondes. But then he killed a blonde. His victims had long hair, so women with long hair cut their hair short. Son of Sam then shot women with short hair. Parents who had previously lost control of their teenage daughters suddenly reasserted that control and refused to let them out at night.

Vigilantism ran amok. In Brooklyn a burglar was caught carrying a large-caliber gun. A mob formed, and a noose was hung from a lamppost. It took a dozen police officers to rescue the hapless burglar. Another man caught speeding in a yellow Volkswagen was hauled into the street and nearly beaten to death—all because rumor had it that Son of Sam had driven a yellow Volks. Mob rule was starting to take over; Mayor Abe Beame subsequently admitted he had been just about ready to call for the National Guard to maintain order.

As the hysteria mounted, the newspapers set about making Son of Sam even larger than life. When the anniversary of the killer's first attack neared, the press was filled with speculation about whether he would observe the date with more killings. "DEATHDAY," one newspaper proclaimed. "Tell Us Sam, What Have You Planned for Us Tonight?" another echoed. Two days later, the killer struck again.

Subsequently, the police publicly expressed gratitude to the newspapers for cooperating with them on the release of information. Actually, they were stunned by the coverage given to the case, much of it fanciful. Police activities that never happened were reported to a breathless public.

Then on August 10, 1977, just 11 days after he had killed his last victim, 20-year-old Stacy Moskowitz of Brooklyn, and blinded her escort, Robert Violante, Son of Sam was captured.

His name was David Richard Berkowitz, a mailman and former city auxiliary policeman. At the time of his arrest, he was carrying the .44-caliber Bulldog revolver he used in his eight attacks. Berkowitz' capture resulted from seemingly unrelated clues—a parking ticket issued the night of July 30–31 in the vicinity of the Moskowitz murder, threatening notes he had sent to his Yonkers neighbors, and information provided by a neighbor, Sam Carr, who was believed to be the "Sam" referred to by the Son of Sam. Carr's dog had been wounded April 27 by a .44-caliber bullet, two days after Carr had received threatening letters.

Berkowitz pleaded guilty to the crimes, and three state supreme court justices, from the different counties—Bronx, Queens and Kings (Brooklyn)—where the murders had been committed, followed each other to the bench in one court to pass sentences on him. For the murders in their jurisdictions, they each passed terms of 25 years to life, the maximum allowed under the law, and additional sentences were added for the seven attempted murders. All three justices said they wished they could pass harsher sentences, and made some of the sentences consecutive, but under the law the sentences had to be merged into a cumulative penalty not exceeding 30 years. This meant the then 25-year-old murderer had to be released when he was 54 years old.

Plans were made to allow publication of an "official biography," with the full authorization of the surviving victims and the families of the dead as well as the courts. The author, Lawrence Kausner, was to receive $150,000 in salary and expenses, his agent $25,000 and a conservator appointed to manage the killer's affairs $75,000. Beyond the $150,000, all the author's future royalties would go to the conservator and two charities. It was estimated that $10 to $11 million would accrue from book and movie sales, and all funds received by the conservator would be turned over to the court to be given to the surviving victims and the families of the dead.

When Berkowitz heard of this arrangement, he announced from behind bars that he would not cooperate "in any way" with the book or movie project. He said, "Maybe after some disturbed person sees the movie, he too will go out and kill some people and then someone will make a movie about him, then another and another."

In any event, Berkowitz was not going to be able to claim any share of the future proceeds. The state legislature passed the "Son of Sam Law," which prohibited a criminal from profiting financially from his crimes.

Sontag brothers train robbers

George and John Sontag, one-time owners of a quartz mine in California, became train robbers bent on carrying out a vendetta against the Southern Pacific Railroad. There is some dispute about whether the Sontag brothers committed train holdups at Kosota, Minn. and Racine, Wis. in the spring of 1892, but there is no disagreement that they, together with Chris Evans and a gang known as the California Outlaws, held up a number of Southern Pacific trains.

The Sontags and Evans have been described as common criminals, but that is not entirely true. The California Outlaws came into existence because of the avarice of the railroad, particularly its practice of virtually stealing the property of small landowners for railroad rights-of-way. In none of their robberies did the Outlaws take any money from passengers nor did they touch the U.S. mails. Their sole loot was always the contents of the train safe in the express car.

The Sontags' exploits in eluding huge posses of railroad detectives, generally with the aid of the local residents, made them a part of California folklore.

SPANISH, Johnny

John Sontag, one of the leaders of the California Outlaws, lies mortally wounded after an eight-hour gunfight with a railroad posse.

Finally, after another train robbery, the Sontags and Chris Evans were cornered in the high country. Evans and John Sontag shot their way out, killing a deputy sheriff, but George Sontag was captured and given a life sentence at Folsom Prison. Evans and John Sontag kept up their war with the railroad and the Pinkertons by stopping stagecoaches to see “if there are any detectives aboard we can kill.” In June 1893 a large posse located the robbers’ hideout and an eight-hour battle, later known as the Battle of Sampson’s Flats, ensued. When the smoke cleared, John Sontag was shot full of holes and bleeding profusely and Evans was also badly wounded. Evans recovered to be sentenced to life imprisonment, but John Sontag died of his wounds on July 3. When George Sontag got news of his brother’s death, he led a revolt at Folsom and was shot down trying to scale the wall.

Spanish, Johnny (1891–1919) gangster and murderer
Johnny Spanish was one of the bloodiest criminals during the first two decades of the 20th century.

A Spanish Jew (his real name was John Weyler), he is said to have been involved in a murder at the age of 17. For a time he operated as an independent slugger and killer, taking on all assignments, until he finally formed his own gang, which was attached to New York’s notorious Five Pointers.

Spanish reportedly always ventured forth with two revolvers stuck in his belt and, on serious missions, two more in his coat pockets. When staging a holdup, he often had an accomplice, a man weighted down with additional guns who acted strictly as a weapons bearer.

Johnny Spanish gained considerable underworld fame for his daring, a classic example being the robbery of a saloon on Norfolk Street belonging to Mersher the Strong Arm. Spanish gave notice that he would appear at a certain time to empty the till, and he turned up on the dot with his trusty gun bearer. The daring Spanish did exactly what he said he would, shooting out the mirror over the bar as he entered and pistol-whipping several customers who objected to contributing their wallets.

In 1909 Spanish became fast friends with Kid Dropper, destined to be for a time the leading gangster in New York. They committed a number of jobs together before becoming deadly enemies when the Dropper stole the affections of Johnny Spanish's girlfriend. In order to provide for the woman of his affections, Spanish determined to take over the stuss games on the Lower East Side, then a popular form of illegal gambling. In his efforts to absorb one such operation with his usual fast shooting, Spanish killed an eight-year-old girl who happened to be playing in the street. He was forced to flee the city for several months until things quieted down. When he returned, he was chagrined to find that the woman he had done the shooting for had left him for Kid Dropper.

Determined to take vengeance, he snatched the woman off the streets one night and drove to a marsh near Maspeth, Long Island. There, he put her up against a tree and fired several shots into her abdomen, which he considered appropriate revenge since she was pregnant at the time. The woman was found alive but unconscious several hours later and, in the meantime, had given birth to a baby with three fingers shot off. For this offense Spanish was sent to prison in 1911 for seven years. His only solace was that about the same time Kid Dropper also was put away for seven years on a robbery count.

Remarkably, when both were freed in late 1917, they hooked up again as partners in crime. However, the inevitable jealousies soon surfaced and the pair and their followers split into separate gangs, each determined to take over what was virtually the sole source of income for organized criminals at the time: labor racketeering and slugging. Each gang sought to service the unions who wanted strikebreakers maimed or killed or the employers who wanted union pickets and organizers eliminated. Both the Dropper and Johnny Spanish fielded large contingents of gunmen to control the rackets and a shooting war broke out that led to dozens of deaths. Johnny Spanish was suspected of carrying out a number of torture-murders himself.

On July 29, 1919 the Dropper forces learned that Spanish was dining in a Second Avenue restaurant without his usual collection of bodyguards. When Spanish stepped into the street, three gunmen, one said to be Kid Dropper himself, emptied their revolvers into his body. With Johnny Spanish's demise, Kid Dropper became the top racketeer in New York City, a position he held until 1923, when he too was assassinated.

Spanish Louie (?–1900) thug and hit man

Few New York gangsters have ever inspired the awe that a strange individual known only as Spanish Louie did at the turn of the last century. Spanish Louie was a trusted underling of a colorful gang leader named Humpty Jackson, who presided over a collection of thugs headquartered in an old graveyard between First and Second avenues in the block between 12th and 13th streets. Humpty Jackson was a mysterious figure with a hunchback (under which he concealed a gun). His gang was a substantial power on the East Side, responsible for a large number of robberies and burglaries as well as beatings and murders on assignment. Jackson would take on a beating or murder mission and parcel it out to one or more of his 50 thugs. It is believed he handed most of the difficult murder assignments to Spanish Louie, who accomplished them with closed-mouth efficiency.

Little was known of Spanish Louie's background. While he talked of noble Portuguese and Spanish ancestors, some speculated that he was really an Indian. His knowledge of weapons indicated that he had served in the army or navy, and while Spanish Louie hinted so himself, he never divulged any specifics. He was always armed with a brace of revolvers and was referred to by a writer of the era as the most artilleried man in gangland. He also wore two scabbards containing eight-inch daggers concealed in his trousers. Spanish Louie always dressed in funereal black—jacket, trousers, neck-high sweater topped off with a large sombrero. When he stalked the streets, he cut an awesome figure. It was an outfit well calculated to strike fear in men and a different emotion in women. When he was not at work, Spanish Louie always seemed to have at least three beautiful women in tow and was never short of spending money.

One day his bullet-ridden body turned up on 12th Street. While his murder was never solved, there was speculation that he had either been killed in a dispute with another gang member, the Grabber, over the spoils of a crime or that Humpty Jackson had done him in for botching a murder assignment in Chinatown. In his pockets he had $70, in one shoe $700 and in the other a bank book from the Bowery Savings Bank showing $3,000. The only mystery about Spanish Louie that was ever solved was the matter of his forebearers. His body was claimed by a tight-lipped man from Brooklyn and taken off for an orthodox Jewish burial.

Spanish Prisoner Swindle

The Spanish Prisoner Swindle has been worked in America for at least 150 years. Most common now is a version initiated in a letter describing an alleged prisoner held captive in Mexico or Cuba. If he is a Cuban prisoner, he is in a Castro prison, a pity since he is a rich man who, before his incarceration, smuggled out of the country something like $250,000, which is now concealed in the false bottom of a trunk laying unclaimed in a U.S. customs house. The trunk can only be claimed by the writer of the letter, or perhaps his 18-year-old daughter. For a mere pittance, say $5,000 or $10,000, the prisoner could bribe his way out of prison and he and his daughter could escape Cuba to claim his fortune.

The letter also contains an offer that is difficult to refuse. If the recipient of the letter will send the bribe money to the address mentioned in the letter, generally a box number in Miami, not only will he get his money back within a month—when the prisoner gets to the United States—but he also will be rewarded by an additional $100,000 or so. Sometimes the letter is more pathetic. The prisoner writes that there is no way he can escape (the letter has been smuggled out at great risk) but by sending the bribe money, the recipient can enable the prisoner's young daughter to escape Cuba and claim the cache in the trunk.

Such letters are sent out by the hundreds and a large number of victims fall for the story. Of course, no money is sent to them, no prisoner escapes from Cuba and no trunk is claimed from customs. The Postal Service has issued constant warnings about the Spanish Prisoner Swindle without much success. Whatever the current situation, the confidence operators come up with a story to match it. In recent years the scam involved Mexican, Cuban or Turkish prisoners. During the 1930s it was Jewish prisoners in Nazi Germany. At least once, letters describing the plight of an "American prisoner" who had hidden $3 million in South America were sent to wealthy Latin Americans. In this particular case the operator employed six typists in New York to pound out letter after letter to be sent to Latin America.

Speck, Richard Benjamin (1942–1991) serial killer

A drifter often high on both alcohol and drugs, Richard Speck was apparently in that condition on July 13, 1966, when he found himself in front of a row house serving as a nurses' dormitory for the South Chicago Community Hospital. After forcing his way into an apartment shared by nine student nurses, he committed one of Chicago's most heinous mass murders. Armed with a knife and a pistol, he trapped six nurses present and tied them up. He waited until three other nurses returned home and bound them also. Then after taking their money, he led eight of the nurses, one at a time, from the room where they were being held and killed them, strangling five and stabbing three. He sexually assaulted one of his victims. The eight were Gloria Jean Davy, Suzanne Bridget Farris, Merlita Gargullo, Mary Ann Jordan, Patricia Ann Matusek, Valentina Pasion, Nina Jo Schmale and Pamela Lee Wilkening. The ninth, 23-year-old Corazon Amurao, managed to hide under a bed and was overlooked. Four hours she cowered there, not knowing what had happened to her roommates or whether the assailant had left. When an alarm clock went off at 5 A.M., the apartment was still. Two hours later, the terror-stricken woman finally crawled out from her hiding place. She found three bodies in the next room and ran screaming from the apartment.

Speck avoided arrest for a number of days until he attempted to slash his wrists and was taken to a hospital, where he was identified as the mass murderer. He was sentenced to the electric chair, but when the Supreme Court voided the death sentence in 1972, he was resentenced to eight consecutive terms of 50 to 150 years. Facing a possible total of 1,200 years in prison, Speck seemed to have received the longest sentence in history. By 1976, however, he was eligible for parole, and although turned down, he was entitled to a review of his case each year thereafter.

sperm fraud preying on desperate would-be parents

As technology marches on, blatant new crimes keep pace with the new advances, even in such unlikely matters as artificial insemination. In a shocking 1992 case, a Virginia fertility specialist, Cecil B. Jacobson, laid claim to having helped scores of desperate, infertile women by supplying them with an "extensive, carefully regulated donor program" involving physical, mental and social characteristics. The doctor always came up with the seemingly perfect donor, always the same one—Cecil B. Jacobson.

Dr. Jacobson had no need to screen donors or store sperm till the proper time. He produced the sperm in the privacy of his office bathroom before each patient arrived at his clinic. The flamboyant Jacobson referred to himself as "the baby maker" and boasted that "God doesn't give you babies—I do."

Some parents started finding out just how right he was. One couple testified in the 55-year-old doctor's trial that they became suspicious and shocked by their daughter's first baby pictures. "We pulled them out of the envelope and both went, 'Whoa, who does she look like?'" the mother said. "And we both had the same feeling—she looked a lot like Dr. Jacobson."

DNA testing proved that the doctor had fathered 15 children for his patients at fees of about $5,000 in many cases. Authorities estimated that some 75 more couples had been hoaxed by the "babymaker" but refused to submit to DNA testing to find out. A very standard response being "Please, we don't want to know."

However, at the time of Dr. Jacobson's conviction there were no laws on the books prohibiting a doctor from donating sperm to a patient or impregnating an unwitting woman with his sperm. Under those circumstances Dr. Jacobson could be convicted of no more than criminal fraud involving the use of telephones and the U.S. mails. He was sentenced to five years imprisonment.

Since this case more stringent rules have been passed concerning sperm donation.

Spinelli, Juanita “Duchess” (1889–1941) murderess

The first woman to be executed legally in California, Juanita Spinelli, dubbed the Duchess of Death by the newspapers, set up a school in California to train young men for crime and masterminded their criminal activities.

Until her middle years Juanita Spinelli’s life is shrouded in mystery. She claimed she was born in a hobo jungle to a drifter and a runaway Sioux Indian girl. Her mother died in childbirth and her father disappeared. It is unclear who raised her, but it is known that she was married once or twice.

Her police dossier began in 1935, when she acted as “finger-woman” in a laundry union strike. She informed on a strikebreaker she knew was wanted by the police. At the time, she was living with Michael Simone, a Detroit hoodlum who served as a bodyguard for some of the city’s leading gangsters.

While Simone’s employers were not directly affected by Juanita’s informant role, they felt uncomfortable about having a female stoolpigeon around. Sensing she was not wanted, Juanita moved on to California. There, she struck up an acquaintance with a young San Francisco car thief named Gordon Hawkins, moved in with him and began giving instructions to Hawkins and some of his friends on how to become big-time gangsters. Among her prize pupils were 23-year-old Albert Ives and 18-year-old Robert Sherrard, a fugitive from a mental institution. In time, she brought in Mike Simone from Detroit to act as her chief lieutenant in the gang.

At first, Juanita, now called Duchess by Hawkins, masterminded small operations—auto thefts, easy burglaries, rolling helpless drunks. Then they moved on to stickups. On April 8, 1940 Simone, Hawkins, Ives and Sherrard held up Leland S. Cash, the 55-year-old manager of a roadside barbecue stand. When they announced it was a robbery, Cash, who was hard of hearing, reached for his hearing aid, and Ives, panicking, shot him fatally in the stomach. The quartet escaped with the paper bags Cash was carrying, which they supposed contained the receipts for the day. Actually, the bags only held some extra meat that the victim was taking home.

The Duchess was furious about the needless murder and then even more furious when Sherrard started showing signs of “coming apart.” Fearful he would talk about the murder, she ordered him killed. The gang knocked Sherrard out with a Mickey Finn, dressed him in swimming trunks and dumped him off a bridge. According to the Duchess, there was a good chance the police would mark the death down to accidental drowning. To be on the safe side, she moved her brood to Reno, where they pulled a few more jobs. Meanwhile, Ives began getting shaky, and he grew even more nervous when the Duchess started intimating he might be disposed of next. Deciding it was only a matter of time until he too was killed, Ives managed to slip away from the mob long enough to inform the police about the gang’s murderous activities.

In the ensuing investigation, every male member of the mob tried to implicate everyone else, especially the Duchess, who sneered at their cowardice. In the end, Duchess Spinelli, Simone and Hawkins were sentenced to die in the gas chamber. Ives was judged insane and committed to a mental institution. He died in 1951.

Duchess Spinelli managed to delay her execution for a year and a half with appeals, including one to Gov. Culbert Olson requesting life imprisonment on the grounds that no woman had ever been legally executed in the state. The governor found the appeal without merit, and the Duchess prepared for death by putting a “curse” on the authorities, the judge and the jurors. She told reporters, “My blood will burn holes in their bodies, and before six months have gone by, my executioners will be punished.”

However, an hour before she died on November 21, 1941, the Duchess relented, saying, “I have asked God to forgive them.”

Spiritualism

The birthplace of modern American Spiritualism, the belief that the dead can communicate with the living through physical phenomena, was Hydesville, N.Y.

In 1848, 15-year-old Margaret Fox developed the ability to snap her big toe so loudly that it resembled a sharp rap on wood. She and her younger sister Kate kept the ability a secret and decided to play a prank on their parents. One night they called their mother and father to their bedside and said they could not sleep because of some strange rappings. The girls said they were sure the sounds were being made by the ghost of the former owner of the house, who had been murdered. Kate shut her eyes and went into a sort of trance and asked if the ghost was in the room. Margaret answered yes by snapping her toe twice under the blankets (one snap meant no). Mr. and Mrs. Fox excitedly put more questions to the strange spirit and got answers via the girls. The parents concluded their daughters had supernatural powers.

News spread rapidly through the surrounding area and hundreds of people descended on the Fox home seeking to get in touch with deceased relatives. By now the hoax had gotten so big that the girls dared not confess. They ended up becoming famous mediums for the next 40 years. Meanwhile, other charlatans readily came up with various methods of producing rappings from the dead and the principles of Spiritualism became firmly imbedded in popular belief. Not even a confession by the Fox sisters in 1888 about their toe trick could stop the growth of this new racket.

Spiritualism caught on in America because it coincided with a loss of faith in authoritarian religious doctrine thanks to the profound impact of 19th-century science. Evidence became more and more a requirement and spiritualists seemed to satisfy that criteria through rappings, “spirit lights” and the “materialized spirit.”

Some fakers carried off particularly bald-faced swindles. Typical of these charlatans was Mrs. Hannah Ross, the most popular medium in Boston during the 1880s. Her greatest trick was to make a long-dead baby materialize before her gullible victims’ eyes. Eventually, Mrs. Ross’ con was revealed by an enterprising reporter. She would seat herself in a cabinet in a dark room and allegedly go into a trance. Then she would expose one of her breasts through a slit in the curtain surrounding her and the dead baby would seemingly appear. On her breast she had painted the face of an infant.

Converts from around the world flocked to spiritualism in the late 19th and early 20th century. Among them were William Gladstone, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, John Ruskin and Alfred Russel Wallace. In the late 19th century leading mediums became important international figures despite the fact that exposure of their frauds increased. Henry Slade, the slate-writing medium, was one of the most famous exposed.

Probably the greatest American Spiritualist was Daniel D. Home, who was one of the first to adopt the tapping trick of the Fox sisters. Leaving his home in Waterford, Conn. in 1850 at the age of 17, Home was one of the earliest swindlers to cash in on the spirit communication craze. He went to Europe in 1854 and, over the years, conducted thousands of seances, many by invitation in royal courts and the houses of nobility. At the court of Emperor Napoleon III of France, Home pulled off one of his most acclaimed performances. Knowing for a certainty that the empress would want to communicate with her departed father, Home smuggled in a rubber replica of the dead man’s right hand.

On touching it in the dark, the empress “recognized it at once” because of the missing third finger.

One of Home’s greatest tricks, which convinced many of his supernatural powers, was having a chair he was sitting in rise and carry him around the room over the heads of his guests. Home retired in 1871 an extremely wealthy man. While all of his supposed psychic powers have been exposed as tricks, true believers in Spiritualism still celebrate him as the greatest medium of all time.

Spooner, Bathsheba (1746–1778) murderess

Bathsheba Spooner, the Tory Murderess, was convicted and sentenced to death in 1778 in the first capital case tried in American jurisdiction in Massachusetts, and quite possibly, her subsequent ill fate was the result of her lowly political repute. Not that Bathsheba was innocent of the charges against her. She admitted conspiring with and assisting her lover and two escaped British soldiers in the murder of her husband, the elderly Joshua Spooner, but she most likely would have earned herself a lesser punishment had she possessed more revolutionary fervor.

Bathsheba was the daughter of Timothy Ruggles, chief justice of the Massachusetts Court on Common Pleas under crown rule. With the onset of the Revolution, Ruggles had been forced to flee to Canada. Bathsheba remained behind in that fateful year of 1776 and married 63-year-old Joshua Spooner, a retired merchant. Although old Spooner was rather apolitical, he was soon branded as a Tory sympathizer because of his marriage to the daughter of a leading Tory. It was not a situation to his liking and probably explained why he was so happy when he came home one day in the winter of 1778 to find his 31-year-old wife had taken in Ezra Ross, a handsome 20-year-old soldier in the Revolutionary Army who had been wounded in the chest during a recent campaign. Ross had literally collapsed outside the Spooners’ door in the hamlet of Brookfield, near Worcester. With his wife, a suspected Tory, now nursing a Revolutionary hero, Spooner knew that the wagging rebel tongues would still.

Of course, his wife’s care for the soldier had little to do with political sentiments; within a few months she would inform her recuperating patient that she was “with child.” Bathsheba also told young Ross they would have to kill her husband before he learned of their affair and cast them both out of his lavish keep. Ross agreed to her suggestion in the abstract, but in practice he proved unavailing. She suggested poisoning her husband, but Ross, who said he could face any man musket to musket, backed off from such a low deed.

Then Spooner had to journey to Boston to look after his investments and Ross went with him. Bathsheba's lover was supposed to kill her husband on the return trip and blame the murder on the British, but the pair returned together.

By this time Bathsheba Spooner had decided her young lover just wasn't going to do her bidding; so she recruited two passing British soldiers to carry out the plot. Whether James Buchanan and William Brooks were deserters or escapees from Revolutionary custody was of small consequence to Mrs. Spooner. The important thing was that they were willing to perform any deed which would earn them some gold. With Buchanan and Brooks backing him, Ross waylaid Spooner as he came staggering home one midnight from Ephraim Cooley's tavern. The three clubbed the old man to death and dumped his body into a well at the side of the house.

A maid fetching water the next morning discovered the bucket covered with a film of blood and sounded the alarm. Old Spooner's body was raised and it was found to be devoid of purse, snuff box, silver shoe buckles and watch. Obviously, he had been murdered and robbed. Perhaps if they had kept a low profile, Ross, Brooks and Buchanan might have escaped detection, but with foolish abandon, they took to wearing their loot, and within days the trio was arrested. Servants in the Spooner household then came forth with tales of having heard the three in conspiratorial conversations with Mrs. Spooner. One servant, coachman Alexander Cumings, said he had come into the parlor and observed the men burning their clothing, which appeared to be bloodstained in the fireplace. The victim's money box lay open on the table and its contents divided up in neat piles.

It was, to say the least, a rather open-and-shut case, especially when Bathsheba confessed she had masterminded the murder of her husband to keep him from learning of her affair with young Ross. The case was tried by William Cushing, chief justice of the Massachusetts Supreme Court and later a member of the U.S. Supreme Court, and prosecuted by Robert Treat Paine, a signer of the Declaration of Independence. Defense attorney Levi Lincoln, who was to become attorney general under Thomas Jefferson, came up with the rather novel defense that since the plot had been so openly planned and botched, Bathsheba must have been "insane." He added that because only one of the three men had struck the fatal blow, the jury could not convict more than one of them and, lacking absolute proof against any of the three, it would have to release them all. Unmoved by the defense attorney's arguments, the jury found the four guilty. They were all sentenced to be hanged.

The sentences were scheduled to be carried out on June 4, 1778 but were postponed through the intercession of the Rev. Thaddeus MacCarty, a Worcester minister, who visited the condemned woman in her cell to discuss her spiritual future. Mrs. Spooner once more admitted her part in the crime but for the first time confessed the full story, including the fact that she was pregnant. If that were so, and the Rev. MacCarty was certain it was, both English law and custom forbade her execution. Urged on by MacCarty, the Massachusetts Council granted a stay until July 2 and ordered that "two men midwives and twelve discreet lawful matrons" conduct an examination "by the breast and by the belly" to determine the accuracy of the claim.

Their unanimous finding was that Bathsheba Spooner was not pregnant, which led MacCarty to charge that their opinion had been colored by their political sympathies. He empaneled his own jury of three men midwives and three lawful matrons. After they conducted an examination, all the men and one of the women declared Bathsheba was pregnant, but the two other women said she was not. In any event, the MacCarty panel had no legal standing, and even Bathsheba gave up the fight.

She made a final request in a letter to the council that my body be examined after I am executed by a committee of competent physicians, who will, perforce, belatedly substantiate my claims. I am a woman, familiar with my bodily functions, and am surely able to perceive when my womb is animated. The midwives who have examined me have taken into greater account my father's Royalist leanings than they have the stirrings in my body which should have stirred their consciences. The truth is that they want my father's daughter dead and with her my father's grandchild.

Thousands attended the four hangings in Worcester on July 2, the dispute over Bathsheba's condition still raging. The crowd did not disperse until later that afternoon when a committee of surgeons completed an autopsy and rather reluctantly made their report public. In the executed woman's womb they had found "a perfectly developed male foetus, aged between five and six months."

Some latter-day historians have insisted that the Spooner case was so etched on the conscience of the citizens of Massachusetts that never again was a female condemned to death in the state, with or without a plea for mercy because of pregnancy. That theory is certainly open to debate, but one definite result of the affair was that certain male midwives and discreet lawful matrons needed a lengthy period of remorse before they could once more walk the streets of Worcester without downcast eyes.

Springfield (Illinois) race riot

Probably no false rape story in American history had as much impact as one told in 1908 in Springfield, Ill. After a white woman claimed she had been raped by a black named George Richardson, whites rioted and 4,200 militia had to be called in to stop the violence. Richardson was spirited out of town to save his life, but during the two days of rioting—August 14 and August 15—two blacks were lynched, six other blacks were killed and over 70 blacks and whites were seriously wounded. Some 2,000 blacks fled the city. The instigators of the riot never were punished, although a number of people were arrested and indicted.

George Richardson also went free after his accuser admitted to a special grand jury in 1909 that it was a white man who raped her, although she refused to identify him. Prompted by the Springfield riot, a biracial group, including William Dean Howells, Jane Addams and W. E. B. Du Bois met in New York City the following year and agreed to form the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

squealer slang term for “informer”

There are many theories on the origin of the slang term squealer as a synonym for “informer.” The simplest is that a lawbreaker squeals like a pig when caught, and in this squealing he often names his accomplices. Another theory traces the origin of the term to the case of an unfortunate stock thief who was making off with a pig when the animal’s squeals betrayed him. Whatever the etymology of the word, squealers are the chief source of information by which crimes are solved.

No matter how necessary informers may be to police, the public has never thought highly of them. In the 1870s four members of a gang that had robbed a train in Kansas were convicted on the testimony of a fifth member, Dave Rudabaugh. The Kinsley Graphic was much taken with the ethical question involved, commenting: “Rudabaugh testified that he was promised entire immunity from punishment if he would ‘squeal,’ therefore he squole. Some one has said there is a kind of honor among thieves. Rudabaugh don’t think so.”

In an infamous holdup in the Arizona Territory in 1883 called the Bisbeen Massacre, the mastermind of the operation, John Heath, turned informer to save himself and named his five confederates, all of whom were hanged. As a reward for his assistance, Heath was let off with a life sentence, a decision that did not sit well with the local populace. A large mob overwhelmed Heath’s jailers before he was due to be shipped off to the penitentiary, and a short time later, the squealer’s dead body was found dangling from a telegraph pole.

Over the years law enforcement officials have come to rely heavily on informers. Detective Lt. Jack Osnato broke the Murder, Inc. investigation by coaxing leads out of minor killers in the group until the trail led to Abe Reles, probably the most important informer in the history of American crime. In 1941 Reles “went out the window” of a sixth-floor hotel room, where he was being kept under police protection.

More recent informers have fared better. The celebrated Joe Valachi died in prison of natural causes in 1971. Vinnie Teresa, the New England Mafia songbird, remains hidden under the Justice Department’s Witness Relocation Program, and is probably the informer most wanted by the underworld, with a reputed price of $500,000 on his head.

By 1976 the controversial relocation plan, sometimes called the Alias Program, had hidden away under new identities an estimated minimum of 2,000 witnesses and members of their families. Its origin and procedures have never been discussed in Congress, and critics have charged that the program’s protection of witnesses is less than efficient. Indeed, in one incredible blunder a witness and several members of his family were given new identities and issued new Social Security cards—in sequential numbers. A private investigator tracking the witness eventually found him after hearing a story about a husband and wife who had sequential Social Security numbers. In other cases witnesses have walked away from their covers, finding them ineffective. Certainly, the most infamous squealer of recent years, mafioso Sammy “the Bull” Gravano, was not impressed with the Alias Program and walked away from it.

Stacher, Joseph “Doc” (1902–1977) syndicate leader

Born in Poland in 1902, Stacher came to the United States at the age of 10. A few years later, he was a minor-league pushcart thief in Newark, N.J. During this period he formed friendships with future leading Jewish gangsters, such as Longy Zwillman and Meyer Lansky. In the 1920s Stacher ran many of Zwillman’s gambling enterprises and in 1931, at Lansky’s behest, brought together a number of the top New York Jewish gang figures for a conference at the Franconia Hotel, which resulted in the merger of the Jewish Mafia and the Italian Mafia into a new national crime syndicate. Lansky then assigned Stacher to handle gambling activities on the West Coast and in the Caribbean. Later, he oversaw gambling in Las Vegas for Lansky and was connected with such casinos as the Sands and the Fremont.

Federal agents finally nailed Stacher for income tax evasion, and he was sentenced to five years. Although the government wanted to deport him, the law prohibited sending anyone to an Iron Curtain country. As a Jew, Stacher was entitled, under the Law of the Return, to go to Israel. The gangster accepted this form of exile and emigrated in 1965. Scores of other mobsters of Jewish descent followed him. Lansky himself tried to emigrate to Israel in 1971, but he proved to be too notorious and was expelled. Doc Stacher was allowed to remain.

Stafford, Annie (1838–?) Chicago madam

Annie Stafford, better known as Gentle Annie in her younger, more voluptuous days, was the leading fighter in Chicago's Whore War in 1857, representing the forces of the Sands, a sinkhole of vice, against an incursion by the madams of the better State Street district, who were looking for attractive talent to stock their house with. Annie at the time was merely a 50¢ prostitute in the house of Anna Wilson, but she nevertheless took on the brunt of the fighting, which eventually resulted in a victory for the Sands area. Somewhere along the line Annie got tired of doing all the work while others were making the money. She resolved to become the madam of her own establishment, and by the early 1860s she was running what she described as a "classy place with 30 boarders."

For close to two decades Annie was a principal figure in Chicago vice and her lovelife and business enterprises were duly recorded by the newspapers. Annie had been the longtime mistress of Cap Hyman, a leading Chicago gambler, who enjoyed her company and charms but didn't see the need for making it legal—until one September day in 1866 when Annie stormed into his gambling house carrying a rawhide whip. She found Hyman sleeping on a sofa, threw him down the stairs and chased him up the street, her whip cracking on his shanks with every stride. Shortly thereafter, Cap Hyman proposed marriage. The wedding was an elegant affair that attracted not only the Chicago underworld but also representatives from as far away as Cincinnati and New Orleans. Immediately following the ceremony, Cap Hyman announced he was giving his wife a very special present, a tavern outside the city limits called Sunnyside, which would be turned into "a high-toned roadhouse."

The opening of Sunnyside was a gala event, with guests of honor including city and county officials, young businessmen with sporting interests, big-time gamblers and reporters from each of the newspapers. Also invited were other leading Chicago madams, while some three dozen of Annie's young ladies were trained thoroughly on the proper etiquette for the occasion. The reporters were brought to Sunnyside in a huge four-horse sleigh.

Frederick Francis Cook, there as a reporter for the Chicago Times, reported that the festivities started in a most decorous fashion. "You were ceremoniously introduced, engagement cards were consulted, and all the rest of the little formalities that distinguish like functions in the haut monde were strictly observed. Yes, the make-believe was quite tremendous." One young redheaded lady of Annie's staff walked around looking gentlemen in the eye and asking, "Who's your favorite poet? Mine's Byron."

The tone couldn't last. Before the night had finished, case after case of champagne had been consumed, Cap Hyman had shot out the lights, Annie had had to reprimand other madams for passing out business cards, and several harlots had set up business on a freelance basis in a number of the upstairs rooms.

While Sunnyside was a great social success, it flopped as a commercial enterprise. Annie Stafford noted that gentlemen just wouldn't travel that far even for high-class strumpets. So the couple returned to their Chicago haunts. In 1875 Cap Hyman suffered a complete physical and mental collapse. He died the following year, with Annie at his bedside. Annie continued to run a brothel until about 1880, when she dropped from sight.

Standard Oil Building, Battles of the

Probably more than any other events, the two so-called Battles of the Standard Oil Building in 1926 were what people thought of when they heard the words "Chicago gangsters."

On the morning of August 10 Hymie Weiss and Schemer Drucci, who took control of Dion O'Banion's North Side Gang after O'Banion's assassination, were on their way to make a payoff to Morris Eller, political boss of the 20th Ward, in order to secure protection for their numerous speakeasies. The meeting was to take place at 910 South Michigan Avenue, the new 19-story Standard Oil Building. Just as the pair reached the bronze Renaissance-style doors of the building, four Capone gunmen, the North Siders' sworn enemies, jumped from a car and charged at them. Seeing the attackers' drawn guns, Weiss and Drucci ducked behind a parked car and pulled their own weapons from shoulder holsters. The area, which at that hour teemed with pedestrians, erupted in gunfire. One pedestrian was hit in the volley of 30-odd shots, as bystanders either dived for cover or stood frozen with horror.

STAR Route frauds

Weiss started to retreat from car to car, but Drucci headed for his hated foe. The Capone gunmen backed off to a sedan parked on the other side of the avenue and then pulled away, with a still-angry Drucci firing after them. He jumped on the running board of a passing car, put his gun to the driver's temple and ordered, "Follow that goddamn car." Just then a police flivver pulled up and officers yanked the crazed Drucci to the pavement.

Drucci told the police there had been no gang battle, that it had merely been a case of some punks "trying for my roll." The police brought Louis Barko, whom they had recognized as one of the Capone gunmen, before Drucci for identification. In keeping with underworld tradition, Drucci shrugged, "I never seen him before." Barko and all other suspects were released.

Five days later, on August 15, Weiss and Drucci were again attacked at almost the same spot. This time they were driving in a sedan when rival gangsters trailing in another auto opened up on them. Although their car was riddled with bullets, the two gangsters were not hit. They dashed from their car to the sanctuary of the Standard Oil Building, firing wild shots over their shoulders.

On September 20 Weiss and Drucci retaliated with the famous attack on the Capone headquarters at the Hawthorne Inn in Cicero. A convoy of eight cars loaded with gunmen poured lead into the building in a vain effort to kill Al Capone. In addition to wounding some pedestrians, the gunmen shot Louis Barko in the shoulder. Later, police picked up Drucci on the suspicion that he had fired the shot which downed Barko. When asked if he could identify Drucci as his assailant, Barko returned a past favor by announcing, "Never saw him before."

About this time Lucky Luciano, Capone's Brooklyn schoolmate, visited Chicago on crime business. "A real goddam crazy place!" he told associates upon returning to the quiet of New York. "Nobody's safe in the streets."

Star Route frauds

One of the greatest frauds in U.S. postal history involved the so-called Star Routes, roads built in the 19th century West for mail delivery via wagon and horseback. The situation was ripe for fraudulent claims and a combine of crooked Postal Department officials, contractors, subcontractors and politicians set up a vast conspiracy. The combination lobbied for congressional appropriations to start new and useless routes and upgrade old ones. One road was improved for faster travel at a cost of $50,000 despite the fact that its use brought in only $761 in postal income annually. A single fraudulent affidavit, unopposed by postal officials, netted one contractor $90,000. A later investigation of the road improvement claims made by another contractor, John M. Peck, revealed that to equal the distance he claimed could be traveled in a day a man would have to ride for 40 hours.

Probes by congressional investigators, special agents and Pinkerton detectives resulted in more than 25 indictments. Trials held in 1882 and 1883 uncovered frauds related to 93 routes. However, not a single conviction was obtained. It was estimated that the government had been defrauded out of at least $4 million.

Starkweather, Charles (1940–1959) serial killer

Charley Starkweather, Nebraska's mass murderer of the 1950s, killed his first victim on December 1, 1957. On that day the red-haired youth robbed a gas station attendant, Robert Colvert, at gunpoint in Lincoln, drove him to an open area outside the city and executed him with several shots in the head. He did nothing more for almost two months until January 21, 1958, when he drove to the home of 14-year-old Caril Ann Fugate.

Finding the girl not at home, he sat down to wait for her, toying with a .22 hunting rifle he had brought with him. Caril's mother, Velda Bartlett, yelled at him to stop fooling around with the weapon—whereupon he shot both her and Caril's stepfather, Marion Bartlett. When Caril Ann came home, Starkweather went to her two-year-old sister's bedroom and choked the child to death. He then dragged the parents' bodies outside and put Marion Bartlett's corpse under newspapers and rags in the chicken coop and Velda's in an abandoned outhouse. He dumped the child into a cardboard box and then went into the kitchen, made some sandwiches and joined Caril to watch television.

They put a sign on the door reading: "STAY AWAY. EVERYBODY IS SICK WITH THE FLU. MISS BARTLETT." When Caril's older sister came by and wanted to help, Caril Ann sent her away. Later, Caril Ann's lawyer would argue she had saved her sister from being killed by Starkweather, who was lurking behind the kitchen door as the two sisters talked.

Caril's older sister told her husband, who became suspicious and notified the police. When two officers came to the house to investigate, Caril Ann told them everyone inside was sick. They left. Two days later, Caril turned her grandmother away, and she went to the police. The police returned to the house and found it empty. They then searched the premises and found the three bodies.

An alert went out for Starkweather and the girl, and in the following week of terror, Little Red, the bow-legged teenager who modeled himself after movie star James Dean, played the role of a murderer without a cause, shooting and stabbing seven more people to death. When his car got stuck on a muddy road, a high school couple stopped to lend a hand, Starkweather shot them to death and he and Caril Ann transferred to the victims' car. He then shot a friend, August Meyer, for his guns and ammunition.

Back in Lincoln, Starkweather and Caril Ann entered the house of wealthy steel executive C. Lauer Ward and marched his wife and housekeeper upstairs. The two women were tied up and gagged and then Starkweather stabbed them to death. When Ward returned home, he was murdered before he had time to take off his coat.

The couple took Ward's smooth-running Packard and drove to Wyoming. Twelve miles outside of Douglas, they came upon shoe salesman Merle Collison catnapping in his new Buick at the side of the road. Caril Ann slipped into the backseat while Starkweather walked over to the driver's side of the car and shot the sleeping victim nine times in the head. It was his last killing. Thinking someone was in trouble, an oil company worker named Joe Sprinkle stopped to offer a hand. When Starkweather leveled a rifle at Sprinkle, the oil worker charged him and struggled for possession of the weapon. By luck, a deputy sheriff happened by and Caril Ann ran to him, screaming: "It's Starkweather! He's going to kill me. . . ."

Starkweather managed to break free, jump into the Packard and speed off. After gunning his car to 110 miles an hour and crashing through one roadblock, he was finally stopped when officers shot out his windshield.

Starkweather blandly announced he had killed everyone in "self-defense" and tried to defend Caril Ann. "Don't take it out on the girl. She had no part of it." He claimed she was a hostage. But when the girl started calling him a killer, he changed his attitude. "She could have escaped any time she wanted," he said. "I left her alone lots of times. Sometimes when I would go in and get hamburgers, she would be sitting in the car with all the guns. There would have been nothing to stop her from running away. One time she said that the hamburgers were lousy and we ought to go back and shoot all them people in the restaurant."

"After I shot her folks and killed her baby sister, Caril sat and watched television while I wrapped the bodies up in rags and newspapers. We just cooked up that hostage story between us."

Starkweather was condemned to death and Caril Ann Fugate was sentenced to life imprisonment, tearfully proclaiming her innocence as she left the courtroom. Starkweather went to the electric chair on June 25, 1959, after turning down a request from the Lions Club of Beatrice, Neb. that he donate his eyes to their eye bank following his death.

"Hell no," he said. "No one ever did anything for me. Why in the hell should I do anything for anyone else?" The 19-year-old's execution took four minutes.

Caril Ann Fugate was released on parole in 1977, considered completely rehabilitated.

Starr, Belle (1848–1889) Bandit Queen

Although the eastern press dubbed her the Bandit Queen, the Lady Desperado and the female Robin Hood, Belle Starr was simply a hatchet-faced horse thief, a frontier fence and, whenever times got tough, a whore. It seems likely that naive makers of legends often confused her with Belle Boyd, the truly heroic Confederate spy.

Born Myra Belle Shirley in Carthage, Mo., or thereabouts, to "Judge" John Shirley (her father's judgeship may have been a product of her imagination) and his wife Elizabeth, Belle associated with some pretty mean characters in her teens. Her brother Ed Shirley rode with the James-Younger gang, and Belle formed a rather close attachment to some of the boys. Her first illegitimate child was a daughter named Pearl, born after a brief courtship by Cole Younger. After that, Belle took up with another badman, Jim Reed, by whom she had another child, a boy named Ed, who was born after the couple had trekked to California, where Reed engaged in highway robbery. After a while, there was a price on Reed's head, and he headed back east with his family.

With $30,000 in loot, Reed took Belle to Texas, where she opened a livery stable and ranch and played her role of Bandit Queen. As a member of old Tom Starr's gang, Jim rustled horses in Indian Territory in what is now Oklahoma, and Belle's stable always had a fine supply of stock.

Reed was killed in 1874 by a lawman who had previously ridden the outlaw trail with him. From 1875 to 1880 Belle was the acknowledged leader of a rustler band that forayed out of Indian Territory (Oklahoma). She had a succession of lovers but seemed most fond of her first love, Cole Younger. Cole, however, vanished from her life following the ill-fated bank raid at Northfield, Minn. in September 1876. Shot up in the raid, he was captured soon after and sentenced to life imprisonment.

Belle consoled herself with others. In 1876 another "husband" started making the rounds with Belle. He was a flatfaced Indian, half-breed or white man—there are conflicting stories—with the odd alias of Blue Duck. Subsequently, a lot of tales were told about this period in Belle's life. She supposedly rode with Blue Duck on rustling sprees, although there is no proof of that, and she was later said to have killed a Dallas lawman, a story without foundation.

Belle Starr's reputation as the Bandit Queen was born in the pages of the sensationalist eastern press, which portrayed the hatchet-faced horse thief and, when times were tough, prostitute as a comely, hell-for-leather lass.

In any event, before long Blue Duck was replaced by Sam Starr, with whom Belle broke tradition by legally marrying. Sam, a Cherokee, was apparently the son of horse thief Tom Starr, and after the marriage Belle resumed selling stolen livestock. Soon, the U.S. government had a $10,000 reward out for the capture of Sam and Belle Starr "dead or alive." This would seem to indicate that Belle was a genuine outlaw. However, in 1883, when they were captured and hauled before Hanging Judge Parker, who was notorious for handing out stiff sentences, Parker gave Belle only a six-month prison term, indicating she was probably guilty of no more than being a receiver of stolen beef and horseflesh. Sam Starr got a year. When he came out of the penitentiary, he found his wife had changed. She was now a celebrity. Richard Fox's Police Gazette had immortalized her as a "female Robin Hood and a Jesse James." Much was made of her past relationship with Jesse James, whom she knew from the old days and to whom she had evidently offered a refuge on her ranch around 1881. Belle got a job in a Wild West show playing the part of an outlaw who held up a stagecoach, which carried among its passengers none other than Judge Parker. Goggle-eyed audiences ate up this presentation with the same gusto they accepted the public-relations build-up of Buffalo Bill.

All this upset Sam Starr, but he may have been more hurt by the fact that Belle had a long line of lovers. He shot one of them and disappeared for a time. By 1886 the two were back together in the horse-stealing business. Taken into custody, Belle granted long interviews to the press, in which she indicated she wasn't worried about going before Judge Parker again on a rustling count. She proved right, as the judge released her for lack of evidence. Belle rode out of town, smiling graciously at the citizens of Fort Smith.

That Christmas, Belle became a widow when Sam Starr got into a drunken shoot-out with an Indian deputy. Both men died of their wounds. With Sam gone, Belle was no longer the Bandit Queen. She had a number of lovers, at least some of whom came cash in hand. Her last was an outlaw Creek Indian named Jim July. When he was charged with larceny, Belle talked him into surrendering at Fort Smith, pointing out that since the case against him was very weak, Judge Parker would have to set him free.

Belle rode with him to Fort Smith. Returning home alone she was bushwhacked on a lonely road near Eufaula, Indian Territory (Oklahoma) on February 3, 1889. A neighbor of hers, Edgar Watson, with whom she was on bad terms, was accused of the crime, but the charges were eventually dropped. Most historians now agree she was probably murdered by her 18-year-old son, Ed Reed, whom she alternately attacked with a bull whip and made love to in an incestuous relationship.

However, Belle Starr went to her grave with her Bandit Queen reputation firmly established. Belle's daughter Pearl had a short elegy inscribed on her tombstone that read:

*Shed not for her the bitter tear,
Nor give the heart to vain regret,
'Tis but the casket that lies here,
The gem that fills it sparkles yet.*

Starr, Henry (1873–1921) bank robber and murderer

The last of the Starrs, a remarkable criminal clan that included Tom, Sam and by marriage, Belle Starr, Henry

Starr was born in Indian Territory in what is now Oklahoma on December 2, 1873. For a time he appeared to be the “good Starr,” avidly reading the classics and shunning such vices as smoking and drinking. In 1891, however, he was arrested for trading whiskey to the Indians, and after that, he was charged with stealing horses. Finally, he started his own Starr gang in late 1892 and pulled off several train and store robberies. During the course of one escape from the law, Starr killed Floyd Wilson, one of Hanging Judge Parker’s deputies, a crime for which he was captured in 1893. On October 20, 1894 Starr was sentenced by Parker to be hanged, but a series of appeals kept putting off the execution and, it was reported, “gave Judge Parker fits.”

After a string of reversals and new trials, the authorities acquiesced to a prison term for Starr. He served less than five years before being pardoned by President Theodore Roosevelt, a stroke of good fortune that Starr celebrated by sticking up a bank in Bentonville, Ark. By 1909 he was in custody again and throughout the next decade he was in and out of prison for various offenses. Remarkably, in 1919 Starr won another pardon. For a while, he seemed to have found a new career, appearing in a number of movies that, in one way or another, had the same theme: crime does not pay. In between movie chores, Starr, as it happened, was still robbing banks.

In 1921 the last of the Starrs, Henry, parked his car—instead of tethering his horse as his forebears had done—held up an Arkansas bank and got himself shot to death.

On February 18, 1921 he parked his car, which he now used instead of a horse, in front of the People’s Bank at Harrison, Ark. and tried to rob the bank at gunpoint. Banker W. J. Myers answered Starr’s demands with a shotgun blast that ended his career on and off the screen. He died of his wounds four days later.

Starr, Tom (1813–1890) outlaw and murderer

A full-blooded Cherokee Indian, Tom Starr was among the West’s most violent characters, and he certainly passed along his bad traits, fathering a bloodthirsty brood of eight boys and two girls, who—with their children and cousins and nephews—formed the “Starr clan gang.”

“Uncle Tom” Starr was easily the most vicious. Born in Tennessee, Tom was brought by his parents to the Indian lands of what is now Oklahoma. In his twenties, he was a strapping six feet seven inches and an expert with a bowie knife, a skill that came in handy in the factional warfare that beset the Cherokee nation. When Tom Starr killed a rival tribesman named David Buffington, nothing much happened to him; no one seemed capable of doing anything about it. For no apparent reason, Tom burned a whole family to death in 1843. By then he had become a full-time outlaw, leading a mixed group of Indians, whites and half-breeds on many murderous horse-rustling raids. In 1845 his enemies attacked the Starr homestead and slaughtered his father and 12-year-old brother, Buck. Starr dropped his desperado career temporarily and went about taking fatal vengeance on the 32 raiders involved. He is said to have killed all of them, save those lucky enough to die of other causes before he could get to them; Starr was not a man who believed in ending an enemy’s life quickly.

Having avenged his kin, Starr went back to crime for profit. It was considered an honor by outlaws of any race to be accepted into the Starr band. Among those accepted was Jim Reed, whose younger paramour would later become known as Belle Starr when she married Uncle Tom’s son, Sam. Until his retirement from active criminal behavior in the 1880s, Uncle Tom’s territory, now a part of Adair County, Okla., was considered to be the most unsafe in the entire region, although Starr often struck deep into Texas on criminal forays. Overall, he is believed to have personally killed more than 100 men. When he died in 1890, members of his clan insisted to journalists that he was a delightful old man “full of fun and eager to josh folks.”

State Street Crap Game

Few gambling operations were more important to organized crime than Brooklyn's State Street Crap Game, operated by the mob in the 1930s. It was located in a building just off the busy corner of State and Court streets in downtown Brooklyn, New York City. No nickel-dime setup, it attracted men of considerable wealth and prominence and was said to have been responsible for "sucking in" politicians and police brass, in time making them beholden to the underworld when they suffered big losses. The game was also one of the most important methods of financing Murder, Inc., the national crime syndicate's assassination "troop." The killers of Murder, Inc. did not receive a fee for each job but were paid on retainer and given rights to certain crooked operations. Abe "Kid" Reles aided by Pittsburgh Phil, one of the two most important hit men in the organization, was declared the official shylock of the game; his aides would circulate among the players, fists full of money, making loans at a mere 20 percent—per week.

It has been estimated that the play each night probably exceeded $100,000. Reles' nightly profit from the shylock operation was generally between $1,000 to $2,000. Druggists, clothing merchants, liquor store proprietors, dentists and shoe manufacturers were found to be paying incredible amounts of "or else" interest. In a manner of speaking, they were actually bankrolling the operations of Murder, Inc. When Reles started singing to the authorities, it was said the loss of the State Street game was almost as troublesome to the mob as was the exposure of Murder, Inc.

Stead, William T. (1849–1912) journalist

During the 19th century citizens of Chicago launched several reform movements aimed at cleaning up that city which was considered the most crime-ridden in the nation. But Chicago's greatest reform wave of all was started by an English muckraking journalist, William T. Stead, in 1893.

Before his arrival in this country, Stead enjoyed a reputation as an uncompromising investigative gadfly. In 1885, to expose prostitution in London, he bought a 13-year-old girl for £10 and placed her in a brothel. Although his purpose was to expose the evils of prostitution in a series of articles, he was sent to prison for the act. That experience did not curb Stead's enthusiasm for exposing evil, after visiting the 1893 World's Fair in Chicago, he remained to expose graft, corruption and vice in the city. Thousands thronged to his platform speeches, and in 1894 he published If Christ Came to Chicago, which became a runaway best-seller, eager readers subscribing to 70,000 copies before publication and buying 140,000 immediately thereafter. Stead named names long considered above reproach in his Black List, which showed who owned, rented and paid taxes on property used for illicit purposes.

He highlighted evidence of the extent of political corruption with a quote from a corporation lawyer: "There are sixty-eight aldermen on the City council, and sixty-six of them can be bought; this I know because I have bought them myself."

Readers were shocked when they read the following description of City Council graft:

How much does it cost to pass a franchise through the City Council? There is no set price, because one franchise may be worth more than another. The highest price ever paid for aldermanic votes was a few years ago when a measure giving valuable privileges to a railway corporation was passed in the face of public condemnation. There were four members of the Council who received 25,000 dollars each, and the others who voted for the ordinance received 8,000 dollars each. An official who was instrumental in securing the passage of the measure received the largest amount ever given in Chicago for a service of this kind. He received 100,000 dollars in cash and two pieces of property. The property was afterward sold for 110,000 dollars. In one of the latest "boodle" attempts the aldermen voting for a certain franchise were supposed to receive 5,000 dollars each. One of them, however, had been deceived and was to get only 3,500 dollars. When he learned that he had been "frisked" of 1,500 dollars he wept in anger and went over to the opposition, assisting in the final overthrow of the steal.

The "5,000 dollars per vote" is the high-water mark in the Council for the last four years. During 1891 and 1892 there were a dozen ordinances which brought their "bits," yet in one case the price went down to 300 dollars. In spite of what has been said of the good old times these two years were among the most profitable ever known in criminal circles.

When it becomes necessary to pass an ordinance over the Mayor's veto the cost is 25 per cent more than usual.

The upshot of Stead's disclosures was the formation of the Civic Federation of Chicago, the city's first important reform organization to enjoy wide public support. Stead remained a thorn in the side of corrupt politicians and vice operators for close to two decades until his death aboard the Titanic in 1912.

Steamboat Squad 19th-century New York police unit

Until the mid-1870s river pirates were the scourge of both the Hudson and East rivers in New York City. They preyed on cargo craft tied up at piers, boarded boats in the river and even sailed up the Hudson for many miles to loot riverfront businesses, stores and homes. In 1876 the New York Police Department organized the Steamboat Squad, first using the steamboat Seneca and, after that proved successful, then several others, to patrol the rivers in search of gangsters. When pirates were spotted, a score or more of officers hidden in the cabin of a police steamer would set forth in rowboats to run them down. The story was often told of one small police boat being boarded by four river toughs in search of loot and ready to clout the few crew members. But when the hapless quartet opened the cabin door, they suddenly found themselves surrounded by two dozen club-wielding officers.

Later, steam launches were added to the fleet of the harbor police, which subsequently developed into the present-day Marine and Aviation Division, a unit recognized as probably the most efficient in the police department. Several high officers during the early years of the Steamboat Squad were dispatched to other cities to demonstrate their effective techniques. Within a few years the death knell was sounded for the long-lived profession of river piracy, a crime that had plagued the country since early colonial days.

Steunenberg, Frank (1861–1905) Idaho governor and murder victim

Had union leader Big Bill Haywood been convicted of the bombing murder of Frank Steunenberg, a former Democratic governor of Idaho, there is little doubt that the history of the American labor movement would have been quite different.

A native of Keokuk, Iowa, Steunenberg was chosen governor of Idaho in 1896 and reelected in 1898. As the state's chief executive he earned the enmity of the union movement for his probusiness actions during the bitter labor struggle in the Coeur d'Alene mines. After retiring from public office, Steunenberg devoted himself to the lumber company that eventually grew into Boise Cascade.

Late in 1905 Steunenberg was assassinated by a bomb placed in his home by Harry Orchard, a labor activist whose real name was Albert E. Horsley. Orchard, some say in exchange for a promise of leniency, named Big Bill Haywood, a leader of the Western Federation of Miners, as a conspirator in the assassination. The trial of Haywood attracted national and international attention and pitted prosecutor and future senator, William E. Borah, against the renowned defense lawyer Clarence Darrow. Darrow scored a stunning victory that gave new strength to the union movement in the West. Orchard, a killer whose main claim to fame was his role in the "get Haywood" effort, served a life sentence.

Stevens, Walter (1867–1939) hit man

One of the most proficient killers in a city of killers, Walter Stevens was known as the Dean of Chicago Gunmen.

Stevens turned up first in Chicago shortly after the turn of the century as a slugger and killer for Mossy Enright's union-busting mob. After Enright was murdered in 1920, Stevens became a freelance hit man, often renting his guns out to Johnny Torrio and Al Capone. There was direct evidence linking Stevens with more than a dozen murders (although it was believed he had committed at least 60), but he only went to prison for one, the killing of a policeman in Aurora, Ill. However, he was pardoned shortly after his incarceration by Gov. Len Small, evidently for past services rendered. Years before, Small had been accused of embezzling more than $500,000 while serving as state treasurer. Stevens bribed and threatened a number of jurors and Small was acquitted.

While Stevens can only be described as ferocious in his profession—he once did a killing as a favor for a mere $50—he displayed an entirely different manner in his home life. Well-educated, he enjoyed the works of Robert Burns, Robert Louis Stevenson and Jack London. He neither drank nor smoked until he was 50, and for 20 years he took excellent and doting care of his invalid wife. He adopted three children and gave them a good education. Stevens was also a prude. He censored his children's reading material, tearing out pages of books that he considered immoral. When he found stage plays and movies not up to his puritanical standards, he ordered his children not to attend them. His daughters were not allowed to wear short skirts or use lipstick or rouge.

After an attempt was made on his life, Stevens retired, earning the same description as Johnny Torrio: "He could dish it out but he couldn't take it." Still, no one ever said it to Stevens' face during the last dozen years of his life.

Stewart, Alexander Turney (1803–1876) grave-robbing victim

The nation's most sensational grave robbery was the removal of the bones of A. T. Stewart, two years after Body snatchers turn over a bag containing the bones of the late merchant prince A. T. Stewart for $20,000 ransom.

he died in 1876, from the churchyard of the venerable St. Mark's-in-the-Bouwerie in New York City. Since Stewart was the greatest of the merchant princes of his era and a multimillionaire, the grave ghouls demanded a ransom of $200,000 for the return of the body. Negotiations over the ransom continued for two years through newspaper personal columns until finally the ghouls agreed to accept $20,000.

The transaction was made at midnight on a lonely country road. The chief ghoul, using the assumed name of Henry Romaine, and two others took the money in exchange for a bag of bones, which were later definitely established as Stewart's. The identities of the grave robbers were never learned, although various police authorities claimed the crime was the work of either the notorious bank robber George Leonidas Leslie or the fence Travelling Mike Grady.

The Stewart family reburied A. T. Stewart's bones in the mausoleum of the Cathedral of the Incarnation in Garden City, Long Island, protected thereafter by an intricate burglar alarm system.

Stiles, Billie (?–1908) lawman and outlaw

Along with Burt Alvord, another law officer, Billie Stiles headed the notorious Alvord-Stiles gang, which terrorized the Southwest around the turn of the century. Both used their lawman positions as cover for their nefarious activities.

Very little is known of Stiles' early life except that he was born in the Arizona Territory in the 1870s and was said to have killed his father at the age of 12, an event that eventually had an ironic sequel. Handy with a gun, Stiles hired out as a deputy to various lawmen until he became an assistant to Burt Alvord, marshal of Wilcox, Arizona Territory. Both men had experience in chasing train robbers and both had the idea that it was an easy crime to commit. The pair recruited a gang of hardened gunslingers, including such leading desperadoes of the area as Three-Fingered Dunlap, Bob Brown, Bravo Juan Yaos and George and Louis Owens.

The gang thrived on a number of train robberies and other holdups until 1900, when they were all identified as perpetrators of a Southern Pacific train robbery near Cochise on the previous September 9. All the gang members denied their guilt except Stiles, who admitted his part in the crime and was released on his offer to testify against the others. However, he soon slipped into the county jail, wounded the jailer and released his confederates.

Stiles and Alvord returned to the outlaw trail and avoided capture for three more years. Finally retaken, they escaped again and tried to cover their trail by faking their deaths; they even shipped coffins supposedly bearing their remains to Tombstone. However, the Arizona Rangers continued their pursuit of the pair, finally cornering them on an illegal raid into Mexico. Alvord was wounded and captured in a gunfight but Stiles got away. Eventually, Alvord went to prison for two years and then vanished from the scene.

In January 1908 a Nevada deputy sheriff named "William Larkin" shot and killed a fugitive from justice. When the officer rode back to his victim's house, the dead man's distraught 12-year-old son seized a shotgun and shot Larkin dead with a double blast. Larkin was subsequently identified as the wanted Billie Stiles, a man who had killed his own father at the age of 12.

Stiles, William C. "Bill" (1850–1939) James gang outlaw

Bill Stiles was the last surviving member of the James gang. Born in New York, Stiles, by his own admission, spent his youth rolling drunks. He then journeyed west, freelancing along the outlaw trail until 1876, when he joined the James gang. Some historians insist that Stiles was killed on September 7, 1876, when the James-Younger gang was cut to pieces in the raid on the First National Bank of Northfield, Minn. The man killed was not Stiles but Bill Chadwell, a youth of 19 who had joined the gang only a few weeks before. There was some confusion thereafter about whether Bill Chadwell and Bill Stiles were one and the same.

Sometime after the breakup of the James gang, Stiles worked his way east. In 1900 he was sent to Sing Sing for killing an unarmed man in New York City. Released in 1913, he kept his James gang membership a secret until shortly before his death in Los Angeles on August 16, 1939, when he made a confession. The facts he told about his past life seem to stand up, one of the few cases of a long-lost old-timer's tale doing so.

sting

undercover law enforcement operation

The definition of the word "sting" has undergone a number of changes through the decades. In the 1970s it came to mean undercover operations by law enforcement agencies to gather evidence against criminals, such as phony fencing setups or offers of political payoffs to government officials.

In the 1812 edition of J. H. Vaux's Glossary of Cant the verb "to sting" is defined as "to rob or defraud a person or place." By the 1880s the term was obsolete in Britain, but according to Eric Partridge's Dictionary of the American Underworld, it survived in America as a noun meaning "a cheat, a swindler" or a "criminal coup," especially one involving a sudden, brilliantly successful move.

The word gained considerable prominence as a result of the 1973 film The Sting, in which Paul Newman and Robert Redford played confidence men operating in Chicago.

Sting soon became a media buzz word. It was first used in its most recent meaning to describe a warehouse fencing operation run by the District of Columbia Police Department in which undercover officers bought a wide range of stolen goods from criminals. Eventually, about 140 persons were arrested. Between 1973 and 1980 there were 93 federally assisted stings in 47 cities, in which local police departments made 7,134 arrests and recovered $236 million in stolen goods.

stock thefts

It is probably accurate to say that all stock thefts, except for an isolated instance or two, in the United States are sponsored by organized crime. Syndicate gangsters alone have the know-how and technical ability to launder and disseminate stolen negotiable securities. The extent of underworld activity in this field was revealed during hearings of the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee in 1971, when witnesses testified that $400 million in securities had been stolen without detection in the two previous years. Murray J. Gross, an assistant district attorney for New York County, said that organized crime operated its “virtual monopoly” in the disposition of stolen securities often in collusion with certain New York banks. According to the prosecutor, some banks added stolen securities to their assets to improve their financial position, and loan officers were bribed to take stolen securities as collateral for loans. It was also reported that some small brokerage houses, generally the over-the-counter variety, were suspected of being “created and controlled” as conduits for organized crime. Knowledgeable crime observers have often noted organized crime’s ability, through its loan-sharking activities, to force financially distressed Wall Street firms to do its bidding.

Part of the 150 cars, vans and trucks swept up in a recent "sting" operation by Indiana state police.

STOLEN car racket

stolen car racket return of the professionals

When J. Edgar Hoover was running the FBI and ignoring organized crime, he never stopped crowing about the agency’s success in running down car thieves. He was criticized by many experts because he was trumpeting success against “criminals” who were often joyriding teenagers who hot-wired cars, had several hours of fun and then abandoned them.

Joyriding has not completely disappeared in recent years, but it occurs less frequently, mainly because newer protective methods have made vehicles tougher pickings for amateurs. Today, cars are stolen by pros, many of whom are part of or working for organized crime groups. What put the crimp in joyriding were very sophisticated protective devices. One particularly effective design places a miniature radio transponder inside the base of each key. When the key is turned in the ignition, a weak electrical current flows from the car battery through the lock, and the key broadcasts a coded signal over a two-inch range. The signal is enough to be picked up by a sensor in the steering column, and the engine is permitted to turn on. If there is no signal, nothing happens, even with a hot-wire start.

At first more adept thieves were able to solve this problem by transmitting all the available codes, which might be no more than a dozen combinations on some models. Since then the technology has been vastly improved. Ford, for example, has keys that have 10 quadrillion combinations, and engines won’t accept any signal that takes more than 0.0007 seconds to come through.

Insurers are happy with these car-theft-prevention devices and have seen the theft rate on some models cut by two-thirds from one year to the next. That is largely due to the loss of amateur illegal activity. The pros survive, utilizing tow trucks and flatbeds to move vehicles. If the cars are slated for export (which is true for about 40 percent of all cars that are never recovered), the criminals replace the antitheft devices with about $400 of replacement parts. Organized crime still runs some “chop shop” operations, stripping car parts for resale, but it now prefers to steal cars that enjoy huge demand in other countries, to which they can be shipped in sophisticated big-time operations.

True, stolen vehicles have for years been shipped to Latin American markets, but now a much bigger market exists in Europe, especially eastern Europe and Russia. Most cars stolen for export are concealed in the big steel containers used to ship goods on trucks, flatbed rail cars and cargo ships. It has not proven difficult to conceal such shipments from customs agents since the government obviously concentrates on seizing illegal imports rather than watching exports.

The stolen vehicles that bring the most lucrative prices overseas are luxury sport utility vehicles, such as the Mercedes M-class and the Lexus RX-300, which can best negotiate bad roads in countries like Russia, China and Colombia. Says a spokesperson for the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety: “Some drug lord in Colombia says, ‘I want a Mercedes M-class,’ and poof, a Mercedes disappears in San Antonio or San Diego and it shows up in Colombia in a crate.”

Car owners frequently receive inaccurate advice on what model cars are most likely to be stolen. The standard information is that prime targets are Honda Accords and Toyota Camrys. While it is true that such numbers are accurate, they are really largely a reflection of the number of such vehicles on the road. If one instead goes by the percent of thefts by model, a recent study shows the most stolen vehicle is the Jeep Wrangler. In a recent year 1.7 percent of this small sport utility vehicle disappeared. Other top models in such a real-steal list are the Suzuki Sidekick, 2-door; Toyota Land Cruiser, Geo Tracker, 2-door; Acura Integra, 2-door—all snatched almost as often as the Jeep Wrangler.

As Kim Hazelbaker, senior vice president of the Highway Loss Data Institute, notes, “If you don’t have a luxury sports car or a sport utility vehicle, you’re not really at risk, except in high-crime neighborhoods.”

None of this indicates that drivers are not generally in harm’s way. There is a troubling downside to the technological war on car thieves. That very success has apparently led to a big increase in carjackings. “If it’s not going to run without a key, they’re going to walk up and put a gun to your head and demand the key,” says Edwin P. Sparkman, senior manager for vehicle theft at the National Insurance Crime Bureau, an industry group. In 1999 the Justice Department said a survey of 49,000 carjackings occurred annually over a recent five-year period. The figure was twice as high than criminologists had been expecting.

Actually carjackings are an even bigger problem elsewhere, especially in poorer countries. In South Africa, one manufacturer sells flame-throwers to be attached below a car's doors so that marauders can be incinerated. American auto companies say they have no interest in devices that would injure car thieves. They note that such devices are illegal in the United States, in any event.

Stompanato, Johnny (1926–1958) “justifiable homicide” victim

The death of Johnny Stompanato, a 32-year-old ex-bodyguard for gambler Mickey Cohen, in April 1958 was labeled a case of “justifiable homicide,” harkening back to Hollywood's real life murder and scandal days in the 1920s and 1930s. For a year prior to Stompanato's death, he had been the romantic interest of Lana Turner, at 38 still one of Hollywood's most glamorous actresses. Then, as the saying went, Turner “didn't pick up his option.”

On the night of April 4 Cheryl Crane, the 14-year-old daughter of Lana Turner and Stephen Crane, the second of Turner's four husbands, was present when an argument broke out between her mother and the gangster. As the girl later related to police:

I was in my room talking to mother when he came in and began yelling at her. She told him “I don't want to argue in front of the baby.”

Then mother and he went into mother's room and I went to the door to listen. He kept saying that he was going to have her cut and disfigured. I thought he was going to get her.

I ran downstairs to the kitchen and grabbed the first big knife I could find and raced back upstairs.

I stood outside the bedroom door, right around the corner.

Then I heard him say, “I'll get you if it takes a day, a week or a year. I'll cut your face up. I'll stomp you. And if I can't do it myself I'll find somebody who will—that's my business.”

I went into the room and I said, “You don't have to take that, mother.” Then I pushed the knife into his stomach with all my might.

The husky gangster crumpled without a word, according to both mother and daughter.

At a coroner's inquest, a week later, Lana Turner was the star performer, describing the killing as well as her relationship with Stompanato. The gangster had been advised to get out of England in 1957 after he had threatened Turner with a razor. Despite this difference, the pair reconciled, and shortly before Stompanato's death they had returned from a two-month stay in Acapulco, Mexico.

The actress said:

. . . I swear, it was so fast. I truthfully say I thought she had hit him in the stomach.

As best I remember, they came together. But I still never saw the blade. Mr. Stompanato grabbed himself here [indicating the abdomen].

And he started to move forward, and he made almost a half-turn and he dropped on his back and when he dropped, his arm went out, so that I still didn't see that there was blood or a wound until I ran over to him and I saw his sweater was cut.

And I lifted the sweater up and I saw this wound. I remember only barely hearing my daughter sobbing. And I ran into my bathroom which was very close. And I grabbed a towel. I didn't know what to do. Then I put a towel on Mr. Stompanato.

A medical report indicated the knife had severed the aorta and that the victim had died within minutes.

After hearing the evidence, the coroner's jury returned a verdict of justifiable homicide.

Cheryl Crane was a heroine, Lana Turner was a heroine and Johnny Stompanato was memorialized by Hollywood screenwriters who found ways to incorporate the drama into movie scripts.

Stone, John (1806–1840) murderer

John Stone, Chicago's first legally executed man, couldn't claim he hadn't been warned. In 1839 the Chicago American, perhaps reacting to a Jackson, Mich. newspaper's comment that “the population of Chicago is said to be principally composed of dogs and loafers,” issued a warning to “suspicious loafers about the city,” including Stone, that they “had better, as soon as possible, make themselves scarce, or the city watch will be at their heels.” Stone had already made quite a mark as a “loafer” since arriving in Chicago in 1838. He had served prison sentences in his native Canada for robbery and murder and in New York for horse stealing. In Chicago he occasionally worked as a wood chopper but spent much of his time in the city's liquor groceries and in a particularly frowned-upon establishment, the city's first billiard hall, one flight above Couch's Tavern at Lake and Dearborn streets.

Almost a year to the day after the newspaper warning, Stone was arrested for the rape and murder of a

STORYVILLE

Cook County farmer's wife, Mrs. Lucretia Thompson. A 19th century historian summed up the case against Stone and the verdict at his trial, noting:

A bit of flannel torn from a shirt which was proved to have belonged to the accused and which was found near the body of the victim, the burning by him of the clothes worn in the earlier part of the day of her disappearance, the club used as the instrument of killing to which still adhered, when found, a bunch of her hair, and a remembered threat by him against her virtue, sworn to by a single witness, in the absence of any circumstances pointing toward any other neighbor, were deemed sufficient to warrant a verdict of murder in the first degree. Nor has there been any doubt of its justice, although John Stone stolidly asserted his innocence to the last.

On July 10, 1840, handcuffed and chained, Stone was placed in a wagon and escorted by 260 mounted men under the command of Colonel Seth Johnson, who "appeared in full uniform," to a spot on the lakeshore about three miles from the courthouse, where he was hanged before a large and festive group of spectators. The American described the event in full detail:

The execution took place about a quarter after three. The prisoner ascended the scaffold, dressed in a loose white gown, and with a white cap upon his head, as is usual in such cases. He evinced much firmness upon the gallows, under the circumstances, and in the presence of the spectators (among whom we regretted to see women enjoying the sight) he persisted to the last in the assertion of his innocence—which declaration was publicly made in his behalf by the Sheriff, together with his acknowledgement, as requested, of the satisfactory manner in which he was treated in the jail. He stated that he was never in the house of Mrs. Thompson, and did not see her on the day she was murdered. He also stated that he believed two individuals were engaged in the murder, but on being asked if we knew them, he replied in substance, that if he did he would swing before their blood should be upon him. The Rev. Mr. Hallam, Isaac R. Gavin, Sheriff, and Messrs. Davis and Lowe, deputies, attended the prisoner on the scaffold. The Sheriff seemed particularly affected, even unto tears. After the beautiful, solemn and impressive services of the Episcopal Church for such occasions had been performed by Mr. Hallam, and the appropriate admonitions bestowed, the death warrant was read by Mr. Lowe, the knot adjusted, the cap pulled over the face of the prisoner, and he was swung into another world. After he was hung until he was "dead, dead," a wagon containing a coffin received his body, which was delivered by Drs. Boone and Dyer, pursuant to the order of the court, for dissection. It is supposed that he died from strangulation and that his neck was not broken in the fall, which was about four feet.

Storyville New Orleans red-light district

For 20 years, from 1897 until 1917, Storyville in New Orleans was the most famous red-light district in the United States.

Long before Storyville emerged, New Orleans had achieved the "almost universal reputation as the promised land of harlotry," as social historian Herbert Asbury put it. Prostitutes from all over the country flocked there. Eventually, the entire citizenry realized that unless prostitution was somehow suppressed or regulated, the entire city would become one vast brothel. However, all the proposed solutions were shot down in the cross fire between what might be called the brothel lobby and the equally powerful lobby representing the clergy and respectable southern womanhood, which argued that a law licensing prostitutes would legitimize vice. Finally, in January 1897 the city council adopted an ordinance introduced by Alderman Sidney Story, a leading broker, that provided for the containment of prostitution in a prescribed area. After considerable maneuvering, including lawsuits by landlords in other parts of the city who would be left tenantless if the harlots moved elsewhere, a quasi-legal red-light district was established. It consisted of five blocks on Customhouse, Bienville, Conti and St. Louis streets and three on North Basin, Villere, Marais, North Franklin, North Robertson and Treme streets. As a result, a total of 38 blocks were to be occupied exclusively by brothels, assignation houses, saloons, cabarets and other types of businesses that depended on vice for their prosperity. It was Alderman Story's misfortune that the area took his name.

Inside of a year Storyville became the top attraction of the city. Tours took visitors "down the line" so that they could see the richly furnished parlors of the plush, even palatial mansions of sin. Inside the cabarets they could be shocked by the bawdy shows and dancing and later they could peek through the shutters of the hundreds of cribs in the cheaper houses where naked girls lay waiting for customers. Actual pleasure seekers could find houses to meet any purse. In most of the crib-type brothels, flimsy one-story wooden shanties, the price varied from 25¢ up to $1. These establishments dominated St. Louis and Franklin streets and others could be found on Conti, Customhouse and North Robertson. A step up in class, $2 and $3 houses were located on Villere, Marais, Customhouse and North Liberty streets. Most of the $5 establishments were on North Basin Street. A good number of them were imposing mansions, where liaisons were conducted with great ceremony and elegance. Customers were expected to refrain from any rudeness or bawdy behavior and no drunken gentlemen were accommodated. Naturally, these finer houses sported such trappings as rooms with mirrored walls and ceilings, ballrooms with fine hardwood floors and curtained platforms for special circuses, indecent dancing and other forms of erotic entertainment. Top houses had bands, consisting of two to four musicians, who played in the ballrooms from about seven o'clock in the evening until dawn. It was these musicians who created jazz in the brothels on North Basin Street.

Storyville even developed its own newspapers. One such publication was the Mascot. A 5¢ tabloid that appeared weekly starting in 1882, the Mascot was a vigorous weekly on the liberal end of the political spectrum. While it devoted considerable space to crime and scandal in the vein of the Police Gazette, the newspaper also performed valued service in exposing high-level corruption. In the 1890s, however, the Mascot shifted more toward a Storyville orientation, instituting a column called "Society," which consisted of personal items about prostitutes, a sort of harlot gossip column. The column reported such news as:

Madame Julia Dean has received a draft of recruits, and the fair Julia is bragging loudly of her importation. She seems to forget that the ladies played a star engagement here last winter at Mme. Haley's, and they all carry their diplomas with them.

It is safe to say that Mrs. (Madeleine) Theurer can brag of more innocent young girls having been ruined in her house than there were in any other six houses in the city.

Several amateurs have been enjoying quite a good time of late in the residence at the rear of a grocery store on Derbigny Street.

The Sunday Sun was perhaps more explicit in covering bawds. The following excerpts were taken from the column "Scarlet World":

Miss Josie Arlington is suffering with a bad cold, but she is on deck all the same attending to business.

Jessie Brown is expecting two girls from Atlanta, Ga.

Stella Clements, who now calls herself Stella Moore, has taken the name of a performer in Haverly's Minstrels. Are you going to do the couche-couche, Stella?

Lou Raymond, better known as Kackling Lou, ought to attend to her own business and quit poking her nose into her neighbors' affairs. The way Kackling Lou has put the devil in a couple of young girls, who were doing nicely with a neighbor of hers, was a caution. Such conduct on the part of a woman as old as Kackling Lou is most mortifying. Now will you be good, you naughty old girl, and attend to your own business?

Storyville's most famous publication was the Blue Book. It was published regularly from 1902 on and had a complete list of all prostitutes in residence in Storyville. The girls were coded by race, sometimes listed alphabetically and sometimes by street. There was a special listing of "Late Arrivals." The publication was 40 to 50 pages in length and sold for a quarter. It was on sale at hotels, railroad stations and steamboat landings and was of course available in saloons. The Blue Book was read as much for its advertisements as for its editorial content. The ads went straight to the point:

Martha Clark, 227 North Basin. "Her women are known for their cleverness and beauty. Also, in being able to entertain the most fastidious of mankind."

Diana and Norma, 213-215 North Basin. "Their names have become known on both continents, because everything goes as it will, and those that cannot be satisfied there must surely be of a queer nature."

Eunice Deering, corner of Basin and Conti Streets. "Known as the idol of the society and club boys. . . . Aside from the grandeur of her establishment, she has a score of beautiful women."

The Firm, 224 North Villere Street. Kept by Miss Leslie. "The Firm is also noted for its selectness. You make no mistake in visiting The Firm. Everybody must be of some importance, otherwise he cannot gain admittance."

Mary Smith, 1538 Iberville. "A pleasant time for the boys."

Taps was sounded for Storyville when America entered World War I. The army and navy issued orders forbidding open prostitution within five miles of any army cantonment or navy establishment. Federal agents visited Storyville and ordered it closed. When New Orleans mayor Martin Behrman went to Washington to lodge a protest, he was told that if the city didn't close Storyville, the army and navy would. After all manner of legal appeals—by city officials, madams, whores—failed, a final appeal was made to the Supreme Court, but it too was rejected and Storyville passed into history.

Stoudenmire, Dallas (1845–1882) lawman

Dallas Stoudenmire is one of the best real-life examples of a Western lawman who came to be feared by the citizens he was supposed to protect, inspiring scores of novel and movie plots thereafter.

A former Texas Ranger, Stoudenmire became city marshal of El Paso in 1881 at the height of that community's boomtown violence. He quickly established his reputation as a lawman who shot first and talked afterward. In one case Stoudenmire avenged the shooting of a constable by gunning down his killer, John Hale, a partner of the Manning brothers, who controlled much of the town's saloon business. In the melee Stoudenmire also killed George Campbell, another friend of the Mannings, although Campbell had cried out he didn't want to fight. And somewhat embarrassingly, the marshal also fatally shot an innocent bystander. Despite this last mishap, the city fathers for some time approved of their new marshal, who gained the reputation of the toughest lawman in Texas.

Stoudenmire continued to turn El Paso into a shooting gallery and his private feud with the Mannings erupted into a number of gunfights. The lawman turned into a brooding drinker who frequently shot up the streets. Some citizens began to see the choice between the marshal and the Mannings as "picking between two hells." In April 1882 Stoudenmire and the Mannings signed a "truce," but even that pact, which was doomed to failure, did not save the marshal's job; he was forced to resign the following month. Two months later, he bounced back with a deputy U.S. marshal's badge.

Stoudenmire's hatred for the Mannings continued to fester until September 18, when a barroom dispute broke out between Stoudenmire and George "Doc" Manning. Manning shot first and wounded Stoudenmire, who then wrestled his enemy out into the street, bear-hugging him so that he could not shoot again. Finally, Stoudenmire was able to draw a small belly gun and shoot Doc Manning in the arm. Meanwhile, James and Frank Manning came charging up and James Manning pulled a .45 and shot the struggling Stoudenmire in the head, killing him. Doc Manning then straddled the corpse and viciously pistol-whipped it until lawmen pulled him away. In the subsequent legal proceedings all the Mannings were cleared of any wrongdoing by pleading self-defense.

Stranglers lynch law group

While the term "stranglers" was at times used to describe any lynch mob or vigilante group, it was the official name of one of the smallest group of Regulators ever organized. Headed by a Montana rancher named Granville Stuart, the Stranglers had a total membership of only 14. Nevertheless, between mid-1884 and the winter of 1886, the Stranglers hanged no less than 70 rustlers. This occurred during a period when vigilante justice was no longer accepted as it had been some years earlier. Very few of the Stranglers were ever identified, but they obviously included some of the "best folks" in Montana, meaning the ones who had the most to lose to rustlers. Stuart never officially admitted his role as a Strangler, but his reputation as one certainly didn't do him much harm, as he went on to pursue a successful political career.

Strawan, Samuel (1845–1869) gunfighter

If, as some historians insist, few of Wild Bill Hickok's killings amounted to anything less than cold-blooded murder, at least Sam Strawan can be remembered as one of Hickok's more deserving victims. Strawan was gunned down in what has been called more than a fair fight—Hickok's back was turned as Strawan drew on him. Hickok, however, drew faster, whirled and shot his foe dead.

Strawan was known in Hays City, Kan. as a deadly killer and gunfighter. He not only ignored the formation of a vigilance committee and an order to leave town but pistol-whipped a leading vigilante, Alonzo B. Webster. Yet when Hickok was named sheriff in August 1869, Strawan departed. On September 27 Strawan ended his exile by riding into town with 18 other cowboys and taking over John Bitter's Leavenworth Beer Saloon on South Fort Street. The gunfighter announced he was going to "kill someone tonight just for luck." When Hickok arrived on the scene, the drunken cowboys had taken most of the saloon's glasses out to the street. Smilingly, Hickok retrieved them, saying, "Boys, you hadn't ought to treat a poor old man in this way."

Strawan followed Hickok into the saloon and said he was going to break every glass in the place. "Do," Wild Bill retorted, "and they will carry you out."

According to some reports, Hickok then turned his back on Strawan and faced a mirror. When he saw Strawan draw, he pulled his gun, turned and fired first. Other witnesses say Hickok was not facing a mirror but "sensed" Strawan was about to draw and drew, whirled around and fired before his victim could. If this were the case and Strawan had not gone for his gun, Hickok undoubtedly would have suffered nothing more than embarrassment, as he had in a number of his other quick-triggered gun "duels."

strong-arm squads

It has been an age-old tactic of police forces faced with a serious outbreak of crime to resort to strong-arm methods. Possibly the first strong-arm squad in this country was organized by Capt. George W. Walling of the New York Police Department in 1853. Capt. Walling had long noted that the average city thug would seldom fail to flinch before a policeman armed with a heavy locust club and that what a criminal most feared was a thorough thumping. Walling decided to use a tactic he called "preventive patrolling," ordering his men to club known gangsters on sight.

The first targets of preventive patrolling were a notorious East Side gang, the Honeymooners, who were so brazen that they took control of the intersection of Madison Avenue and 29th Street from dusk to midnight and simply attacked every prosperous-looking man who came along. Walling put his patrolmen in plain clothes and sent them into Honeymooner territory for a pre-emptive strike. It worked like a charm, and within a matter of weeks the Honeymoon Gang disappeared from the area, because to stay meant being beaten with clubs.

Capt. Walling then used his men, now dubbed the Strong Arm Squad, against the English and Irish rioters of 22nd Street. That slum street between Second and Third avenues was the sight of as many as a dozen fights an evening, with the denizens swarming into the street to do battle at the slightest excuse. Police would only enter the area in groups of three or more. Plagued by newspaper demands that something be done to protect innocent pedestrians, Walling one night massed a large troop of men out of sight and waited for a big battle to break out. When one did, the strong-armed waded in, clubbing Englishmen and Irishmen indiscriminately. When the police left the street, scores of rioters lay bleeding on the ground. After that, 22nd Street was a safe and peaceful thoroughfare.

The public approved of Walling's action, and he eventually went on to serve as the city's superintendent of police from 1874 to 1885. However, his strong-arm tactics eventually fell into disrepute, although his theories were carried on by the likes of Alexander "Clubber" Williams, who, like so many strong-armed, was to prove somewhat inept at separating the innocent from the guilty.

Stroud, Robert Franklin (1887–1963) murderer and Birdman of Alcatraz

Probably the most famous prisoner in the history of the federal prison system, Robert F. Stroud, the Birdman of Alcatraz, was the subject of a book, a movie and numerous magazine and newspaper articles about both his accomplishments behind bars and the kind of treatment he received on "the Rock."

A 19-year-old pimp in Juneau, Ala., Stroud shot dead a local bartender who had not only refused to pay for services rendered but had beaten up one of his prostitutes. Stroud drew 12 years in prison, first at McNeil Island and later at Leavenworth. In March 1916, shortly before he was scheduled to complete his sentence, Stroud got into an altercation with a prison guard in the mess hall and stabbed him with a knife. The guard died. There was a controversy over whether Stroud had acted without provocation, as the authorities claimed, or whether the guard had been about to club him, as Stroud said and many of the 300 other prisoners agreed. It was also uncertain whether the guard died of the stab wounds or as the result of a heart condition.

In any case, Stroud was tried and sentenced to death. After Stroud's mother pleaded with President Woodrow Wilson for clemency, Wilson, at the behest of Mrs. Wilson, commuted Stroud's sentence to life imprisonment with the stipulation that he would spend all his remaining years in solitary confinement. In his Leavenworth isolation cell, Stroud gained his Birdman nickname for writing two books on bird diseases and establishing a makeshift laboratory. He developed into one of the country's genuine authorities on bird ailments.

As the years passed, moves to win his release were launched by thousands of supporters, including veterinarians, bird breeders and poultry raisers. However,

STRUCK, Lydia

Stroud had killed an officer of the federal prison system, and government authorities were committed to keeping him behind bars and in isolation for life. There is no doubt that had Stroud been given his freedom, morale among the prison guard cadre would have sagged badly, perhaps affecting the entire operation of the system.

In 1934 Alcatraz Prison opened as the ultimate cage for super criminals. It soon housed convicts deemed to be the most troublesome and dangerous and those considered most likely to attempt an escape. In 1942 Stroud was ordered, on 10-minute notice, to prepare to leave Leavenworth. He was not permitted to take his laboratory, his birds or his books. Since Stroud seemed unlikely to try to escape or to lead a riot, his transfer to Alcatraz smacked of official sadism. Ironically, Stroud became famous as the Birdman of Alcatraz, although he never conducted any of his bird studies there, since he was confined under conditions that prevented him from carrying on such work.

At Alcatraz, Warden James A. Johnston seems to have done what he could to lighten Stroud's burden, at least permitting him to have books and writing material and to communicate with his publisher. Stroud busied himself on a mammoth history of the federal prison system. In 1946 Stroud got out of his isolation cell for the first time in 26 years during the famous Alcatraz rebellion, during which six convicts attempted the most dramatic and bloody escape ever from the Rock. In the riot that ensued, Stroud was released into the cell block. He took no part in the violence and was, in fact, instrumental in getting the authorities to stop their bombing of the cell block by giving the warden his word that none of the prisoners in the block had guns. Even this deed, along with a new rash of news stories about him, did not help Stroud's plight. He was returned to solitary confinement, and in 1948 a new warden, E. B. Swope, who succeeded Johnston, tightened the reins on Stroud, so that he could no longer keep in touch with his supporters or write any more business letters.

The fight for the Birdman, now in his sixties, went on, but his health was shattered. Finally, in 1959, after a string of illnesses, the Birdman was transferred to the Federal Medical Center at Springfield, Mo. His isolation remained as complete as ever. He died in 1963 at the age of 76. He had spent 56 years behind bars, most of them in isolation. The U.S. Bureau of Prisons never permitted the release or publication of his massive study of the federal prison system.

Struck, Lydia (1833–1879) poisoner

Madame Van der Linden, the Leiden poisoner, between 1869 and 1885 attempted, according to the record, to kill 102 persons and successfully poisoned at least 27. Helen Jegado of France officially did in 26 and may well have finished off another dozen or so. In the United States, Jane Toppan nursed and poisoned at least 31 persons in her care, and her final toll may have been over 100. Lydia Struck had a mere eight confirmed poisonings and three more probables. But while she didn't come close to breaking the record, for sheer callousness Lydia may well be at the head of the list.

Lydia's first victim was her husband of 17 years, a rogue cop fired from the New York City Police Department for cowardice. Edward Struck devoted full time to drinking, and when he drank, he got mean, and when he got mean, he beat Lydia. After one of his tears, Ed Struck grew morose and screamed that he was no good and would kill himself someday. Lydia promptly went out and got some arsenic to use as rat poison. Ed Struck died. Apparently, he had gone out of his mind in a fit of remorse and poisoned himself. All the neighbors said that was what had happened and the police agreed. Even the insurance company that carried a $5,000 policy on him as a policeman paid without question.

Lydia took the four young Struck children to live in Connecticut. Since they reminded her of her unlamented husband, she poisoned each of them. The children's deaths attracted no attention since Lydia claimed no insurance on them and was new to the state. After that, Lydia became a nurse for Dennis Hurlbut, a 75-year-old Bridgeport widower who said that if she married him, he'd leave her his entire estate. They were married and Hurlbut lasted only 14 months. It was arsenic that did him in, but no one suspected that anything other than old age had finished him off.

Lydia's next husband was Horatio Sherman of Derby, Conn. In a way, this was a misstep for Lydia. She was sure Sherman was a man of property and considerable wealth. Only later did she learn that he had married her for her money. Moreover, he drank. Even worse he had two children who drove her crazy. Lydia poisoned the children first. Then she poisoned Sherman as well. There was no profit in these last three murders and Lydia simply moved into the home of an apple farmer as a housekeeper. The arrangement soon turned amorous and Lydia was considering a proposal of marriage when the police located her. Somehow they had gotten suspicious about the deaths of Sherman and his two children happening so close together and had exhumed the man's body. His vital organs were sent to Yale University and found to be loaded with arsenic.

Lydia confessed all eight murders. For some reason she would admit the murders of the six children, Struck and Sherman but not that of old Hurlbut, even though he too had suffered the fatal effects of arsenic. She kept insisting he might well have taken the arsenic “accidentally.” Authorities suspected Lydia of dispatching three other men, but she would not confess to those crimes either and there was little point in pursuing the matters. More than enough evidence had been accumulated against her. She was sentenced to life at the Connecticut State Prison at Wethersfield and died there of cancer in 1879, her sixth year of confinement.

Stuart, Charles (1960–1989) the not-so-heroic husband

A murder case that deeply affected the social scene was the 1989 shooting of 29-year-old Charles Stuart and his 30-year-old wife, Carol, who was killed in the incident. It was to stir racial tensions in Boston, since the Stuarts were white and the gunman was allegedly black.

According to the story Charles Stuart gave police at the time, he and his seven-month-pregnant wife had just left a childbirth class at Brigham and Women’s Hospital on October 23, 1989, when a gun-wielding black man jumped into their car. Stuart recounted that the assailant had ordered him to drive to an inner-city neighborhood where he robbed them. The assailant, Stuart said, then shot Carol in the head and Charles in the stomach before fleeing. Stuart managed to maintain consciousness and called the police on his cellular car telephone. Tapes of his dramatic call for help and the frantic search for the car were broadcast on radio and television stations from coast to coast.

When the wounded couple was found, they were hurried to the hospital, but Carol Stuart died the next day. Her baby, named Christopher, was delivered by cesarean section but lived only 17 days. Slowly, Charles Stuart recovered, and the hunt was on for the black killer. It was no exaggeration to say that racial hysteria gripped the city. Black leaders criticized city police, Mayor Raymond Flynn and the local media for their response to the case. The mayor ordered 100 extra officers into the predominantly black Mission Hill neighborhood where the Stuarts had been located. Residents told of police breaking into their apartments and routinely stopping and frisking young black men.

On December 28, Charles Stuart identified a black man in a lineup as resembling the man who had shot him and his wife.

However, shortly thereafter there was a startling twist in the case. Stuart’s brother, Matthew, implicated Charles in the shooting. He said that as part of an arrangement he had made with Charles, he had driven to the area of the shooting and picked up Carol’s purse, together with a revolver that Charles apparently had used to shoot his wife and then wound himself.

Matthew Stuart said he had thrown the evidence into the Pines River in the suburb of Revere. Police recovered the purse and the .38-caliber revolver, which turned out to be the murder weapon.

With the police now zeroing in on him, Charles Stuart killed himself by jumping from a bridge into Boston Harbor. It seemed that Stuart’s motives had been at least twofold: He had taken out a large amount of life insurance on his wife and appeared to have had a romantic involvement with a young woman who had worked in a store he had managed.

suicide by cop deliberately seeking to be shot

While the news media in the 1990s devoted itself to reporting allegations of police brutality that often resulted in death and inevitably led to charges of police out of control, there was another growing phenomenon that put officers in a bad light. The baffling concept is known to police and psychologists as “suicide by cop.”

While firm statistics are not available on the frequency of such suicides, it has been estimated that of the 600-odd fatal police shootings per year, about 10 percent are clearly provoked by individuals seeking to make a police officer shoot—usually under threat of shooting the officers.

Item: A 46-year-old cancer patient who was shot and wounded after pulling a gun on two Jersey City, N.J., police officers eating in a pizza parlor. Clearly, he wanted to die.

Item: A 19-year-old college student with a destructive gambling problem was shot and killed after he pulled a toy gun on officers who had pulled him over for driving erratically on the Long Island Expressway.

Item: A security guard brandished two guns outside a police station in Shelby, South Carolina, and screamed at officers, “Do your job! It’s going to end here.” It did.

Perhaps persons who opt for suicide by cop are essentially no different in motivation from other suicides, but what remains a matter of some bafflement is why they single out cops as their executioners. There are documented cases of persons planning such acts of self-destruction actually telling loved ones or friends that they intended to get the police to shoot them. About one-third of suicides by cop leave notes apologizing to the police for intentionally making them their executioners.

Dr. Deirdre Anglin of the University of Southern California points out, “Suicide is still socially taboo.

SUBMACHINE gun

This way you're not actually killing yourself." Dr. Anglin cites other possible motivations: cowardice, religious prohibitions against suicide, not wishing to jeopardize their families' inheriting insurance money because of policy restrictions, and being simply incapable of committing the act themselves.

Additionally, Clinton R. Van Zandt, a former chief negotiator for the FBI, notes, "What it all comes down to is that people know the police have weapons. If you drive your car into a bridge abutment, you may not die. But provoking a cop—there's good reason to believe that's going to kill you."

Studies of suicide conducted by researchers at the Harvard Medical School and in British Columbia have helped pinpoint the typical suicide by cop figure. He is a white man in his mid-20s with a record of drug and alcohol abuse. His acts are often triggered by a deterioration of an important personal relationship.

A recent study on suicide by cop analyzed by Sgt. John Yarbrough of the L.A. County Sheriff's homicide bureau indicates "a break-up or a divorce with no belief that there can be a reconciliation is often the significant contributing factor. They are helpless to change their situation and they often suffer the frustration of, 'I can't get it back, it's over.'"

One of the chief victims of suicide by cop actions are, although it is often not known to the public, the cops themselves. It is one thing to get involved in a shooting with a real or even a perceived sense of duty or at least self-preservation; however, suicide by cop plots leave the officers with, says expert Bill Geller, "feelings of powerlessness, feelings of being manipulated." Geller, author of Deadly Force: What We Know, adds that most officers in suicide by cop incidents tend to retire prematurely.

suicide investigations

One of the first tasks for police investigating a mysterious or unexplained violent death is to determine whether it is an accident or a case of suicide or murder. Police use their own brand of intuition to come up with the likely answer, aided by the knowledge that suicides tend to act in predictable ways. A man's body is found on a sidewalk outside a tall building, his glasses smashed with slivers of glass imbedded in his face. Murder or suicide? Almost certainly, it is murder. Police know that genuine suicides will invariably take off their glasses before jumping. If they fell with their glasses on, it is because they were pushed.

A man is found in his bathroom with a long butcher knife in his chest, the blade penetrating through the front of his shirt. Suicide or murder? Again, it's probably murder. Suicides don't stab themselves through their clothing. A man will remove his shirt or at least pull it back out of the way. Women who commit suicide by stabbing themselves also will strip bare to the waist or perhaps leave on only a bra. Women rarely stab themselves with long-bladed knives. A female suicide will tend to use a small knife and stab herself 20 or 30 times in the stomach until she passes out from loss of blood and finally dies.

Sumner, Charles (1811–1874) U.S. Senator and assault victim

The halls of Congress have been the scene of numerous acts of violence, most perpetrated by outsiders, of course. Perhaps the most criminal attack by one congressman upon another occurred in 1856 in what was, in a personal sense, a preview of the coming Civil War. On May 19 Sen. Charles Sumner of Massachusetts delivered a fiery attack on the proslavery forces, charging that Sen. Andrew P. Butler of South Carolina had embraced "the harlot, Slavery" as his "mistress." Three days later, Rep. Preston S. Brooks, Butler's nephew and also a native of South Carolina, strode onto the Senate floor to avenge the insult to his uncle. As Sumner sat at his desk writing, Brooks charged at him and proceeded to beat him over the head with the heavy cane he was carrying. Sumner toppled to the floor under the savage barrage, tearing the desk from its moorings as he struggled to move away. Brooks pounded on Sumner's head until his cane broke. Two Georgia senators watching nearby were reported to have chuckled at the attempted murder. Sumner survived the assault, although he was nearly blinded in one eye and was disabled for a number of years. As for Rep. Brooks, he was showered with gifts of canes and whips from southern admirers. From that date until secession, many congressmen appeared on the legislative floor armed with pistols or bowie knives or both.

Sundance Kid (1863–1911?) Wild Bunch outlaw

Hollywood has given us a romantic picture of Butch Cassidy and Harry Longbaugh, the Sundance Kid, as being two of the closest buddies in the outlaw West, but in fact, Cassidy was often ill at ease with Sundance. He preferred the company of such stalwarts as Elzy Lay and Matt Warner. Both were genuine wits, a trait Sundance also displayed but only when sober. Unfortunately, when he was drunk, he was very mean. And Sundance was often drunk.

At the age of 14, Longbaugh was arrested for horse stealing and spent a year and a half in jail in Sundance, Wyoming Territory. Upon his release he was dubbed the Sundance Kid and continued his outlaw ways, becoming a regular resident of such criminal hideouts as Robber’s Roost and Hole in the Wall. By 1892 Sundance was an accomplished train robber. A few years later, he was working on the Bar FS ranch in Wyoming where he became acquainted with Butch Cassidy. The pair often talked of going legitimate as big ranchers. When instead Cassidy organized his Wild Bunch, Sundance eagerly joined up.

After each robbery the gang would ride hell-for-leather to Fannie Porter’s gaudy bordello in Fort Worth, while angry posses would continue to search for them up North. Fannie considered Cassidy a wild one but, on the whole, well behaved. The same could not be said of Sundance. Sober, he was charming, but once he started drinking, he would often lock himself in the brothel for days and shoot up the place. Fanny became particularly angry with him when he shot down the expensive chandelier she had installed in her parlor. After Sundance sobered up the next morning, he sheepishly dug into his pockets to pay for the damages.

In late 1896 Sundance met up with Etta Place, who some say was a former schoolteacher. More likely, she was one of Fanny’s “soiled doves.” Etta was a fine horsewoman and an excellent markswoman. Thereafter, she rode with the Wild Bunch and is believed to have acted as lookout in a number of robberies. There are those who say she divided her favors between Cassidy and Sundance, but the latter was clearly her top choice. She was most understanding of the ways of her man and even rode with him and Butch on their forays to Fannie’s place. When Sundance “caught cold,” i.e., contracted venereal disease, as he often did, Etta nursed him.

In 1901 the Wild Bunch was falling apart. Many had been caught and others shot. Cassidy realized the old days were over. The telegraph, the Pinkertons and the steady advance of civilization spelled the end for the hell-raising cowboy-bandit. So, Cassidy, Sundance and Etta Place headed for South America. It is known that they remained there until 1907, reportedly trying for a while to go straight but soon hitting the outlaw trail, with Etta an active participant in some of the jobs. Then the record begins to peter out. Etta became ill and Sundance took her back to the States for medical treatment, dropping her off in either New York or Denver, and then presumably returning to South America to rejoin Cassidy. For some time it was generally believed that Sundance and Butch were killed in San Vicente, Bolivia in 1911 after hijacking a money-laden mule train. However, since there is some evidence that Cassidy later turned up in the United States and visited often with his family in Utah, that theory has been revised. Perhaps Cassidy survived and only Sundance was killed. According to this version, Sundance had been so shot up by attacking Bolivian soldiers that he gave Cassidy his money belt to give to Etta Place and then had Butch finish him off. However, Butch Cassidy’s sister, Lula Parker Betenson, in a book entitled Butch Cassidy, My Brother (1975), insisted her brother told her Sundance had not been killed and had subsequently joined up with Etta Place in Mexico, where Cassidy later met up with the couple for a happy reunion.

In the late 1990s there was a report that Cassidy’s grave was located in Bolivia, but full confirmation was not offered.

Sunset Laws

During the Reconstruction era, a number of unscrupulous white men financed a crime wave in southern states by establishing stores whose real purpose was to receive stolen corn, cotton and other farm products from thieves, mostly blacks and poor whites, in exchange for whiskey, cheap jewelry and sweets. The thefts became so prevalent that southern lawmakers finally passed statutes, which became known as Sunset Laws, that forbade any trading or purchase of farm products after sunset unless a full written, witnessed record of the transaction was made. Since these laws made the movement of such products after dark automatically suspect, they effectively reduced the thefts that were driving farmers into bankruptcy.

Sutton, Willie “The Actor” (1901–1980) bank robber One of the most-storied criminals of modern times, Willie “the Actor” Sutton started committing burglaries at the age of 10 and went on to be known as the Babe Ruth of Bank Robbers. When asked why he robbed banks, Sutton replied, “Because that’s where the money is,” although some claim that the explanation was actually supplied by a journalist. He earned his nickname the Actor because of the many disguises he used in holding up banks. On his capers, which netted him an estimated $2 million over 35 years, he masquer-aded as a postman, messenger, window cleaner and even bank guard and police officer. “I love it,” Sutton wrote in his memoirs, Where the Money Was. “I was more alive when I was inside a bank robbing it than at any other time in my life.”

Although he committed numerous crimes from the age of 10 to 25, Sutton managed to stay out of prison until 1926, when he was sent to Sing Sing for four years on a burglary conviction. Upon his release he decided to make a career in armed robbery and led many of the country’s most spectacular bank robberies, all committed with far more care and precision than those pulled by the Dillinger mob. However, as if to belie his reputation as a master thief, he was caught quite often but was able to achieve a new dimension of fame by his ability to break out of jail.

Sutton escaped from Sing Sing and from Holmesburg Prison near Philadelphia, though his most famous breakout scheme was unsuccessful. In 1941 he fashioned a plaster head that looked very much like him, and planned to leave it in his bunk while he escaped. Although guards discovered him working on his dummy face and braiding a rope from string to scale the prison wall, they allowed him to continue his efforts until he was almost finished, on the theory that if they stopped him, he would merely start on another plot.

In 1951 Sutton was placed on the FBI’s list of the 10 most wanted criminals and was captured the following year after being spotted on a Brooklyn street by a young salesman named Arnold Schuster. In a bizarre twist, Schuster was murdered by a gunman hired by crime overlord Albert Anastasia, who, although he did not know Sutton, was enraged at Schuster for squealing. Sutton was appalled at the act, mainly because he realized public anger over the killing would doom him to a longer prison sentence. He was right; he drew a term of 60 years to life.

Released from prison in 1969, Sutton became a consultant to banks on security matters. He signed with the New Britain Bank and Trust Co. in Connecticut to promote its new photo credit card. “Now when I say I’m Willie Sutton,” he said during a television commercial, “people believe me.” Looking back, the Actor agreed that his way of life had robbed him far more than he had robbed banks. He had spent 33 of the 43 years from 1926 to 1969, the prime of his adult years, in prison. Sutton died November 2, 1980 in Spring Hill Fla., where he had lived in retirement.

Sutton-Taylor feud

One of Texas’ bloodiest feuds was that between the Suttons and the Taylors. It started in the 1840s, when the two families were neighbors in South Carolina and, occasionally, a member or members of one family would kill someone from the other family. Ironically, both clans pulled up stakes in the 1860s and picked DeWitt County, Tex. as a new home, ending up as neighbors and fellow cattlemen. For a time nothing more lethal than a stray bullet or two passed between them, but in 1868 the feud was rekindled in earnest when Bill Sutton, at the time a deputy sheriff, shot to death Charley Taylor, who was suspected of stock theft. Six months later, he caught Buck Taylor in a saloon in Clinton and gunned him down. The fighting now broke out in earnest, with the county’s gunfighters dividing equally into armed bands of about 200 each. Despite the efforts of the Texas Rangers, the feud could not be contained for another six years, during which a number of famous partisans took up one banner or another. The Suttons rallied to their cause Indian fighter Joe Tumlison, cattleman Shanghai Pierce and the notoriously brutal lawman Jack Helm. The Taylors attracted the violent Clements brothers (Mannen, Gyp, Jim and Joe) and their even more violent cousin, John Wesley Hardin.

Hardin killed Helm in 1873 in a gun duel that was actually closer to an execution. In the various battles at least 40 men died in DeWitt County and adjacent Gonzales County. The Suttons suffered their most grievous loss in 1874 when Bill Sutton was killed. Bill and Jim Taylor had learned that Bill Sutton was aboard a steamboat about to leave Indianola for a trip to New Orleans. The Taylors rode onto the pier and dashed aboard, confronting Sutton and a friend, Gabe Slaughter, as they stood on deck with Sutton's young wife and child. As Mrs. Sutton looked on aghast, Jim Taylor shot Sutton in the head and heart and Bill Taylor fatally wounded Slaughter in the head.

The Taylors escaped, but the following year a band of Sutton supporters cornered Jim Taylor and two companions on a drinking expedition and literally cut them to pieces in a hail of bullets. After that, the fighting between the families petered out, most of the best fighters having been killed. Finally, in the late 1870s Bill Taylor left Texas for Indian Territory, where he became a law officer and later died in a gunfight with a criminal.

Swamp Angels New York gang

Just prior to and during the Civil War, the Swamp Angels were among the most prolific waterfront thieves in New York. Rendezvousing in the sewers under Cherry Street, they would work their way to the East River docks, loot cargo and carry it back underground directly to the headquarters of a fence, where they would sell the stolen property before it was even missed. The police tried to contain the Swamp Angels by posting sharpshooters on the docks. Eventually, officers had to descend into the sewers to do nightly battle with the gang. Regular sewer patrols finally cramped Swamp Angel operations, but the waterfront was a big place, and the gang simply shifted to hijacking cargoes on the streets as they were being delivered to or coming from the piers.

The Swamp Angels were never conquered. They simply changed in composition through the years, so that by the 1920s their descendants were running the notorious White Hand Gang, still looting the docks as well as battling with Italian gangsters.

Swearingen, George (?–1829) murderer

An early Maryland murder, which is still the subject of dispute, had all the ingredients of a spicy love triangle. It involved the local sheriff, George Swearingen, his wife and Rachel Cunningham, described as the loveliest harlot in Washington County.

Complaints against Rachel Cunningham were so numerous that the sheriff was forced to call on her several times to advise her to leave the district. Each time, however, Swearingen became less insistent, and soon the pair were carrying on a torrid affair, which quickly became common knowledge in the county. The sheriff, an extremely wealthy landowner, totally neglected his business affairs as well as his wife. No amount of urging from friends could make him give up his newfound love.

One day early in 1829 Swearingen went out riding with his wife along the Hagerstown Road. He returned bearing her body across his mount. Swearingen insisted that his wife had been thrown from her horse and killed.

The story did not go over well in the community. The authorities questioned the sheriff closely about the matter. One night Swearingen picked up Rachel Cunningham and the pair disappeared. Eventually, they were found living in New Orleans and extradited to Maryland. Although the evidence against Swearingen was insubstantial, he was convicted of murder and hanged at Cumberland, Md. on October 2, 1829, probably as much for his scandalous behavior as for the alleged homicide.

Sweeney's Bombers gang of hired bombers

Criminal bombings in America were probably first practiced by Black Hand extortionists preying on Italians in the big cities and then by rival gamblers in numerous wars between them. However, these were merely the efforts of individual criminals who used bombs just as they would guns or any other death-dealing weapons. The first organized, professional band of bombers was probably a gang in Chicago called Sweeney's Bombers.

The head of the gang was a mean character named Jim Sweeney, who during World War I bossed a gang of bombers and sluggers ready to take on any job for a price. The Sweeney gang was hired frequently during Chicago's laundry union organizing disputes. In 1921 Andrew Kerr, a member of the International Union of Steam and Operating Engineers, confessed that the Sweeney gang had been used to bomb four laundries against which the engineers were conducting a strike. He revealed the membership of Sweeney's Bombers, including Sweeney, Soup Bartlett, the gang's explosive expert, and Con Shea, its labor agitator, whose duty it was to solicit business. Kerr revealed that the union had assigned him to see that the Sweeney outfit carried out all jobs effectively. In one instance Kerr gave the names of 25 individuals to be slugged and the addresses of seven laundries to be bombed. The gang completed the entire mission. For his part Kerr received only the regular $15 strike benefit paid by the union. Kerr’s testimony led to the destruction of the bombing outfit; Sweeney and Bartlett were sentenced to long prison terms at Joliet.

Switzer, Carl “Alfalfa” (1927–1959) shooting victim

From the age of eight, Carl “Alfalfa” Switzer was perhaps the most recognizable kid star in Hollywood with his freckled face, bobbing Adam’s apple, and ever-present cowlick. Featured in the irrepressible Our Gang comedies along with the likes of Spanky, Buckwheat, Darla and Porky, Switzer performed in 60 of these Hal Roach pictures with an endearing off-key singing voice and banjo eyes that earned him the admiration of millions of American kids. But as it must to all kid stars, adolescence overtook him, and in 1942 he could not continue in his role.

Switzer took the end of his juvenile stardom more crushingly than did most young stars, and he became embittered while still trying to string together some sort of screen career—with very little success. A few “mature” roles came his way, but the feeling was that he could not escape his persona as Alfalfa. He had held a few nonacting jobs and drank a good deal by the 1950s. Then the old Our Gang comedies came to television as the Little Rascals. Everyone connected with that operation made money but not the Our Gang kids, who had no TV residuals in their contracts since at the time no one thought television would ever amount to much.

The situation made Switzer even more bitter. If it were not for friends like Henry Fonda and Roy Rogers, Switzer would probably have gotten no more acting work. Rogers booked him for a couple of minor appearances on his television show and Fonda got him a few minor movie roles. Switzer married a Kansas heiress, but that union collapsed after four months.

Switzer had to take bartending jobs and tried to build a career as a hunting guide, being quite a proficient hunter. Through Fonda, he lined up the backing for a good hunting expedition and in need of a good hunting dog, he borrowed one belonging to a friend, a welder named Bud Stiltz. Unfortunately, the dog ran off, which upset his owner, Stiltz. Switzer felt bad himself and posted a $35 reward for the dog.

The dog was found by a man who brought it to the tavern where Switzer tended bar to claim his reward. Elated, Switzer laid out drinks for the man in addition to giving him the reward money. Later, Switzer was upset when the tavern insisted he make good on the drinks.

As an Our Ganger, Carl “Alfalfa” Switzer was at times a gentle bully. In real life he proved later to be more violent, which led to his death.

As days passed, Switzer got it in his head that Stiltz owed him $50. Stiltz objected, pointing out that Switzer had lost the dog and was on his own when he entertained the day’s finder with drinks.

Switzer felt he needed all the money he could get. He’d finally landed a small supporting job in The Defiant Ones and felt if he could hang on in Hollywood, he still might have an acting career. But he kept brooding about Stiltz and finally, after a long drinking bout with a studio buddy, the pair headed to Stiltz’ home. His studio pal flashed a movie police badge at the door and demanded to be let in. When the door opened a crack, the pair pushed their way in.

Switzer demanded the $50, and he and Stiltz engaged in a heated shouting match. Finally Switzer seized a heavy clock from a table, and yelled, “I going to take $50 out of your face!” He swung at Stiltz, smashing him in the forehead just above his right eye, causing a gush of blood. Clutching his forehead, Stiltz retreated into his bedroom with Switzer in pursuit. The dog owner opened a closet and produced a .38-caliber revolver. A struggle ensued, with a wild bullet smashing into the wall.

Switzer forced his foe back into the closet and slammed the door. Fearful that Stiltz would emerge firing from the closet, Switzer drew a switchblade knife from his pocket. Switzer brandished the knife as Stiltz came forward, gun in hand. “He’s trying to kill me,” Switzer cried and swung his knife, hitting only air. Stiltz fired, hitting Switzer in the stomach.

Switzer died in an ambulance on the way to a hospital. It had been a silly dispute, one having about as much logic as the Our Gang kids' pranks.

As Alfalfa Switzer had been known to millions, but even his tragic death garnered him little public recognition, as he had the misfortune to die on the same day as fabled director Cecil B. DeMille. The media splashed DeMille's obituary over all the newspapers and television. Most accounts of Switzer's death ran only a paragraph or two. A friend was quoted as saying later, "I think he would have been happy to have gone out with a splash of front-page publicity, but once again he was reduced to a bit player role."

Stiltz was cleared by a coroner's inquest, which found Switzer's death a case of justifiable homicide.

Swope, Colonel Thomas B. (1825–1909) murder victim

An elderly multimillionaire, Colonel Thomas B. Swope was the central figure in a bizarre 1909 murder plot that shocked Kansas City, Mo.

Swope, a bachelor, lived in a mansion with his brother's widow, a nephew and four nieces. A fifth niece had just moved into her own home nearby, having married a Dr. B. C. Hyde. Dr. Hyde had obviously thought he was marrying into money, so one can understand his sudden dismay when he learned that Swope was preparing to change his will, leaving most of his money to charity. A man of quick action, Hyde gave both Swope and his lawyer such a fast-acting poison that the two men immediately "died of heart failure." Hyde, escaping suspicion for this strange double death, was not satisfied with just his wife's share of the Swope fortune, however, and calmly prepared to murder the other young heirs so that his wife would also inherit their shares of the estate. Before the authorities stopped him, he had fatally poisoned one and almost killed the other four with typhoid germs.

Although the evidence against Hyde was staggering, he was able to avoid conviction in three sensational trials. Found guilty the first time, Hyde won a reversal on technical grounds. The second trial ended in a mistrial and the third in a hung jury. Finally in 1917, the indictment against Hyde was dismissed and he quickly departed, never having spent a single day in prison for one of the most diabolical schemes of the era.

Sydney Ducks San Francisco gangsters

Of all the riff-raff that poured into San Francisco in 1849 after the discovery of gold in California, probably the worst of the lot were former inmates of the penal colony in Australia. They set up their own section, which became known as Sydney-Town. It served as the city's biggest haven for burglars, thieves and killers. Of this section, the San Francisco Herald said:

There are certain spots in our city, infested by the most abandoned men and women, that have acquired a reputation little better than the Five Points of New York or St. Giles of London. The upper part of Pacific Street, after dark, is crowded by thieves, gamblers, low women, drunken sailors, and similar characters, who resort to the grogeries that line the street, and there spend the night in the most hideous orgies. . . . Unsuspecting sailors and miners are entrapped by the dexterous thieves and swindlers that are always on the lookout, into these dens, where they are filled with liquor—drugged if necessary, until insensibility coming upon them, they fall an easy victim to their tempters. In this way many robberies are committed, which are not brought to light through shame on the part of the victim.

Whenever a particular brutal crime occurred in San Francisco, it was labeled, not unreasonably, the work of the Sydney Ducks with the saying "the Sydney Ducks are cackling in the pond." Between 1849 and 1851 more than 100 murders were attributed to them, and they were known to have started many conflagrations that almost consumed the city. This latter tack was essentially a burglary technique. The Ducks would set fire to a number of buildings, and while all attention was diverted to the fires, they would set about looting a nearby section.

Finally, in 1851 the citizens of San Francisco had enough, and the first of the city's great vigilante movements hanged four leading Ducks: James Stuart, better known as English Jim, John Jenkins, Samuel Whittaker and Robert McKenzie. The result of the hangings produced panic in Sydney-Town, and Ducks left the city in droves. Those who remained operated their dives and houses of prostitution with much greater respect for local mores.

table Mafia court of inquiry

When a member of the Mafia is tried for his alleged misdeeds, it is called “going to the table.” A typical trial involves charges that one Mafia soldier has cheated another in some joint criminal enterprise or that a mafioso has violated the “no-hands” rule, whereby no member is permitted to use his hands on another. Although the latter charge may seem ludicrous and trifling for an organization that specializes in cold-blooded murders, it must be remembered that maintaining peace is vital in a place like New York City where there are five Mafia families in operation. Competition is very serious and potentially explosive, and petty quarrels could provoke major gang wars.

Each side at the table may be represented by its “rabbi,” Mafia lingo for an informal lawyer. The verdict rendered is generally accepted as fair. Fair or not, it is final. In one such trial gang leader Albert Anastasia ruled that a mobster was to sell his share in a restaurant to his partner for only $3,500 because he had been stealing money from the business. When the alleged embezzler started to protest, Anastasia cut him off. “I have decided. Take what I allow, or take nothing.”

Even major offenders are given a trial, but they are usually not present for the proceedings or the sentencing, since the mob has never felt it necessary to give a doomed man advanced warning. Bugsy Siegel was sentenced to death in absentia because, among other things, he had rejected an order from the mob to return several million dollars that he had squandered in building the Flamingo casino-hotel in Las Vegas. After the sentence was passed, Siegel’s longtime companion in crime, Meyer Lansky, was reported to have said, “I had no choice”—the verdict was final.

A famous table hearing was held after the murder of Crazy Joe Gallo in Umberto’s Clam House in New York’s Little Italy in 1972. Carlo Gambino, who had ordered the assassination, was infuriated at the messy, saloon-style nature of the execution and demanded the hitman, to this day unidentified, be brought to the table. According to subsequent underworld gossip, the gunman explained he had faced unexpected problems. Gallo had not followed the Mafia custom of seating himself facing the door, which the killer had every right to expect. As a consequence, the killer said, he was forced to start shooting before he was sure which man at the table was his target. The fault clearly was Gallo’s. The court of inquiry accepted the excuse, and the defendant was let off with no more than a harsh reprimand.

Taborsky, Joseph (1923–1960) murderer

On October 7, 1955 Joseph Taborsky walked out of the death house at the Connecticut State Prison in Wethersfield a free man; in convict parlance, he beat the big one.

In 1951 Taborsky was convicted of murdering a West Hartford liquor dealer named Louis Wolfson after his brother Albert confessed that the two of them were responsible for Wolfson’s death. Albert got life because he had testified against his brother, while Joseph was sentenced to the electric chair. Joseph protested he was innocent and his brother was insane; he was half right. Albert soon had to be transferred to a state hospital because of his bizarre behavior. Meanwhile, appeals had kept Joseph Taborsky alive, and now news that his brother had been committed to a state hospital brought forth demands for a new trial from all over the state. When the state supreme court ordered the case retried, Joseph had to be freed—without the testimony of Albert Taborsky there was no case.

Joseph Taborsky shook hands with the people who had fought to free him and bylined his story in a national magazine.

In Connecticut a new murderous crime wave soon dominated the headlines. There was a rash of holdup-shootings that Connecticut police dubbed the Chinese Executions. A 67-year-old Hartford tailor was lucky. On December 15, 1956 a young bandit waving a gun robbed him and then shot him in the back of the neck before leaving. Miraculously, after a delicate operation, the tailor survived. The victims who were struck down 30 minutes later weren't so lucky. Edward Kurpiewski was stuck up in his gas station, ordered into the rest room and made to kneel. Then a bullet was fired into his head. It was Daniel Janowski's misfortune to drive up to the station just as this brutal act was completed. After his wallet was taken, he was ordered into the gas station storeroom, ordered to kneel and shot to death. Eleven days later, liquor dealer Samuel Cohn died the same way. Ten days after that, Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Speyer were killed when they walked into a North Haven shoe store. The owner nearly suffered the same fate when he wrestled with the two gunmen rather than get on his knees. He was battered unconscious, but his assailants fled without finishing him off. Three weeks passed and then a Hartford druggist, John Rosenthal, was slain the same way as the other murder victims.

Finally, the police arrested two men: Arthur Culombe and Joseph Taborsky. The shoe store owner made an identification, and the police got a confession. Taborsky snarled his admission to the six murders, and he had one more to confess: the murder of Louis Wolfson—the crime which he had been cleared of in 1955. Taborsky died in the electric chair in 1960.

Tanner, John (1780–?) “white-Indian murderer”

One of the most tragic figures in American history, John Tanner was captured by Indians as a youth. When he tried to return to white society after 30 years, he was regarded as an outcast both by whites and Indians. He was constantly accused of crimes, including murder. Although he was innocent, Tanner may have been secretly assassinated because of these suspicions.

At the age of nine, Tanner was captured by a Shawnee looking for a child to replace his dead son. Adopted by an Indian woman, he underwent a complete transformation, becoming in effect an Indian. He even forgot his original name and lost the ability to speak English. He fathered several children by two Indian wives but was eventually driven by some inner compulsion to return to his original world. Searching in Kentucky and Ohio, he finally located several relatives who had tried to find him through the years.

Tanner traveled back and forth between the whites and the Indians trying to arrange for his children to live with him. However, he succeeded in convincing only two daughters and his second wife to join him. Tanner settled in Mackinac, Mich. for a time but was unable to find work. In 1828 he moved to Sault Ste. Marie, where he became an interpreter for U.S. Indian Agent James Schoolcraft. Tanner, however, remained an outcast in both worlds: the Indians regarded him as a renegade and the whites suspected him of being steeped in the violent ways of the Indians. Whenever a mysterious crime occurred in the town, Tanner became the first suspect.

Eventually, his eldest daughter was taken from him by legislative order, and his wife returned to her tribe. Tanner then married a white woman, but this marriage ended with the woman claiming Tanner's living habits were intolerable and violent.

In 1846 Schoolcraft was murdered, and Tanner soon became the prime suspect. He fled the community, and troops and vigilantes scoured the countryside looking for him. According to one rumor, some vigilantes caught up with Tanner and decided to kill him secretly to end their “white-Indian” problem. Another story was that he returned to the Indians. In any event, Tanner remained a wanted man for several years until finally an army officer confessed that he had killed Schoolcraft in an argument over a woman. If John Tanner was still alive and heard that he had been cleared, he did not choose to return to the white world.

tar and feathering

Although it was never a legal form of punishment, tar and feathering—pouring molten pitch over a person and then covering him or her with feathers—has a long history in America, practiced especially by mobs against those who violated community standards. It was the treatment given to many Tories at the start of the Revolutionary War and to an occasional abolitionist in the antebellum South.

Perhaps the most famous incident involved Capt. Floyd Ireson, who, according to a New England legend, was tarred and feathered by the women of Marblehead for his refusal to go to the rescue of seamen in distress. In the West tar and feathering was considered to be the proper punishment for wife beaters (followed by banishment from the community, if deemed necessary), for whiskey peddlers who sold to the Indians and for card sharks who won with monotonous regularity. Of course, if the latter were actually caught cheating, they were more likely to receive sterner punishment, such as the rope or at least a spray of buckshot. By the turn of the 20th century the practice had just about vanished, although it was resurrected from time to time by white racists in the South.

Taylor, William Desmond (?–1922) victim of unsolved murder

With Hollywood reeling from the Fatty Arbuckle case, movie executives needed anything but another scandal for which the film industry could be excoriated. But that is what they faced when someone pumped two .38-caliber bullets into the heart of film director William Desmond Taylor the night of February 1, 1922. The case would never be solved, for many, many reasons. Not the least of which was that someone, upon finding the body, thought it was more advisable to notify studio executives than the police. After all, who really ran Hollywood?

Studio brass dispatched their people to the scene to launch an immediate cover-up operation. As a result, much of the potential evidence was in all likelihood tampered with. Taylor, somewhere around 45 years old—his past was hazy—was a notorious ladies’ man, and many who heard about his murder turned up at his house to get rid of any evidence that might involve them in scandal.

Among those who sped to the murder scene was 28-year-old Mabel Normand, a leading comedienne of the day and the chief rival to Mary Pickford, “America’s Sweetheart,” in box office appeal. Mabel was searching for letters revealing she had a $2,000-a-week cocaine habit and that Taylor had helped her out, it was said, by beating up a drug dealer supplying her with the stuff. And there were love letters.

Why hadn’t the police been summoned? It seemed a studio doctor examined Taylor’s body and surmised death had been the result of natural causes, perhaps a chronic stomach ailment. Only later when the body was turned over to authorities was blood discovered, as was a bullet hole. From the doctor’s assessment, Paramount studio brass felt they were right in assuming Taylor’s death had not been a matter for the police.

Normand had been the last person known to have seen Taylor alive. She had dropped in to the director’s bungalow about 7:05 P.M. She said Taylor had seen her off to her chauffeur-driven limousine around 9 o’clock, after lending her a book by Sigmund Freud when he noticed some trashy magazines in the car.

It soon developed Taylor had a string of lady friends. A picture of Mary Pickford occupied a favored spot in his bachelor quarters. She said that not only did she know nothing about the murder but that she was America’s Sweetheart. There were two damsels, one young, one older, who had got to the murder scene too late, their way blocked by police. They were Mary Miles Minter and her ever-watchful mother. They were very much enraged when the police refused them entry. Miss Minter, allegedly 17 years old, had been a rage in a number of Charlie Chaplin films.

One reason the Minters had tried to crash the murder scene soon became apparent. During the police search a scented note on Mary’s stationery fluttered out of a book. The note was short, sweet and very, very passionate. It read:

Dearest:
I love you—I love you—I love you.
XXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXXX!
Yours always,
Mary.

Taylor cataloged the unmentionables of his conquests. Denying they were sexually involved with Taylor were ~~(clockwise from upper left)~~ actresses Mary Miles Minter, Mabel Normand and Mary Pickford. Pickford especially insisted she and Taylor were just friends, and besides, she was "America's Sweetheart."

TEAPOT Dome scandal

The eighteenth X was two inches high so “Dearest” would know how devoted she was.

Mary made it clear that she truly meant what she wrote in the note. She later said, “I loved him deeply, and tenderly, with all the admiration a young girl gives to a man with the poise and position of Mr. Taylor.” She insisted that despite all her devotion, she and Taylor, an ex-British army officer (a matter of some dispute), had merely been good friends.

And Mary insisted she knew nothing about all those bits of lingerie found in the Taylor home. None, she said, was hers. There was, for instance, a mysterious pink silk nightie with a butterfly on the back that was quickly discovered. Then there was a collection of silky, lacy lingerie, nightgowns and underwear, each item meticulously tagged with a date. There were love letters from other actresses and secret photographs of many of them. Taylor seemed to have been a multifaceted collector and connoisseur.

Mary, however, had a way of dominating the Taylor gossip. There was her remarkable performance at the director’s garish funeral, which Taylor would no doubt have liked to use in one of his films. Mary kissed the corpse on the lips and then arose to declare that her dreamboat had whispered something to her even in death. She said it sounded like “I shall love you always, Mary.”

Now the police investigation was in full swing, with the cops off on one wild goose chase after another. In the first two months, some 300 people, some even in South America and Europe, confessed to the murder. The public loved all this but really wanted more specific identification of the owners of all those uncovered unmentionables.

If the authorities identified any or all of those persons, they did not reveal one. Each lead petered out after the other. Studio brass launched a campaign to save Mary. When the public found it upsetting that a 17-year-old girl could get involved with an older man, the studio insisted she was really 21, no, make that 22. The idea of a girl pretending to be younger than she was didn’t wash with the public. Nor did Mabel Normand’s pretending to be older than she was.

Both women ended up almost as tragically as did Taylor himself. American moviegoers exhibited a prudery that has since largely vanished. But at the time they wanted no more to do with Mary Miles Minter, and she was forced to retire. But at least she managed a comfortable retirement from an investment trust her mother had established.

Mabel Normand did try to do some movies, including one in 1923 called Suzanna that was described as her funniest ever. Hardly anyone went to see it. Still there was some belief Normand could weather the storm in time, but in 1924 she happened to be around when her chauffeur put a bullet into another gentleman, apparently in a dispute over her favors. Then she was named corespondent in another man’s divorce suit. Mabel took refuge in more and different drugs. Her health ruined, she died of tuberculosis in 1930.

Perhaps the real legacy of the Taylor murder was that it led to Hollywood “going moral” by launching the Hays Office under the leadership of Will Hays, the Presbyterian postmaster-general of the Harding Cabinet. In due course that experiment would run out of gas.

Teapot Dome scandal

The term “Teapot Dome” has become a catch phrase for governmental corruption and graft taking. Early in the ill-fated Harding Administration, Secretary of the Interior Albert B. Fall declared that the oil reserves at Teapot Dome, Wyo. and Elk Hills, Calif., which had been set aside for use by the U.S. Navy, were being drained by adjacent commercial operations and that consequently they should be leased out to private interests. It so happened that Fall had a number of close friends who would benefit from this decision, and in 1922, without allowing competitive bidding on the property, he secretly signed lease contracts with Edward L. Doheny and Harry B. Sinclair, two oil millionaires known for their freewheeling tactics. The two oil men, who figured to clear as much as $100 million from their leases, found ways to show their gratitude. Doheny slipped Fall $100,000 in a black bag, while Sinclair used a roundabout method to see that the secretary got a $260,000 “loan” in Liberty Bonds.

After the press and a senatorial inquiry headed by Thomas J. Walsh of Montana dug out the facts, the government canceled the leases, a decision eventually upheld by the Supreme Court. Oil man Doheny shocked the nation by dismissing his $100,000 payment as “a mere bagatelle.” Criminal cases involving Doheny and Fall and Sinclair and Fall were tried but resulted in acquittals, although Sinclair was given nine months for contempt of court and Fall, tried separately, was found guilty of bribery charges and drew a one-year prison term. It can be argued that Fall was made the “fall guy” for all the scandals of the Harding Administration, in which even larger sums were siphoned out of the Treasury.

teeth-mark evidence

In 1980 Theodore Bundy, suspected of killing and mutilating perhaps more than 30 young women across the country, was convicted of the brutal slayings of two

Florida State University sorority sisters and sentenced to death. Perhaps the most damning evidence against him was the testimony of dental experts that only Bundy's scraggly teeth could have made the wounds found on the buttocks of the two coeds.

This was not the first case in which the testimony of forensic dentists was admitted in evidence. So far about a dozen states—among them New York, Florida, California, Maryland, Illinois, Texas, California and Connecticut—and the District of Columbia permit such testimony. Dr. Duane T. DeVore, a professor of oral surgery at the University of Maryland, is considered one of the pioneers in the use of teeth-mark evidence in criminal cases. Dr. DeVore said that while bite marks are not as reliable as fingerprints, they usually provide a good idea of who did the biting—or at least who did not—a fact that can be just as important. It is also possible, according to the dental expert, for forensic dentists to determine the general time a bite mark was inflicted and the positions of the bodies during an attack, frequently essential in corroborating the testimony of a defendant or a witness.

Dr. DeVore helped convict some defendants and acquit others. In one case a defendant pleaded not guilty in a Maryland murder case until Dr. DeVore gave him a dental examination. The impression of the suspect's teeth matched the photographs of teeth marks found on the victim's body. The defendant shifted his plea to guilty.

television quiz show scandal

In 1959 the television broadcast industry was rocked by a quiz show scandal when it was established that many big-money winners had been provided with the answers to questions. Several recent highly acclaimed winners were exposed as frauds, perhaps the most shocking being Charles Van Doren, a 33-year-old Ph.D. who came from one of the nation's top intellectual families.

Van Doren, a $5,500-a-year instructor at Columbia University, had won $129,000 on NBC's "Twenty-One" after having been supplied with a trumped-up script in advance. Later, Van Doren said he had been convinced to take part in the quiz show because it would be a boon "to the intellectual life, to teachers, and to education in general." He added, "In fact, I think I have done a disservice to all of them."

On the basis of his new fame as a quiz winner, Van Doren got a $50,000-a-year post with NBC, but in the aftermath of the exposures he lost that position as well as his teaching job at Columbia.

In the ensuing investigation New York District Attorney Frank Hogan found that of 150 persons who had testified before a grand jury about the quiz fixes, about 100 had lied. From 1959 to 1962, 18 contestants who had "won" from $500 to $220,500 on now-defunct quiz shows pleaded guilty to perjury and were given suspended sentences, although they could have been fined and imprisoned for three years. The punishment seemed sufficient, considering the fact that nothing was done to the corporate sponsors, some of whom, according to confessions by the shows' producers, had decided whether a contestant would be bumped or allowed to survive as a contestant.

Abroad the scandal generally was viewed as demonstrating a failing in American life. France's France-Soir saw a parallel between Van Doren's confession and Vice President Nixon's campaign-fund confession and observed: "In America, more than anywhere, contrition is a form of redemption. A sinner who confesses is a sinner pardoned." Nixon would survive to be pardoned again, but Van Doren never returned to public life.

Ten Most Wanted List FBI fugitive roster

Started in 1950, the FBI's Ten Most Wanted list was designed to aid in capturing the country's leading fugitives through extensive publicity. In its first 30 years, the list resulted in well over 300 arrests.

Typical was the case of William Raymond Nesbit, a member of the original "class of 1950." Wanted for robbery and the murder of his partner, whom he allegedly blew up in a powder shack with 3,500 pounds of dynamite, Nesbit went to prison for murder but escaped. He was caught hiding out in a cave by the Mississippi River at St. Paul after being recognized by some boys playing in the area who remembered seeing his wanted picture in the newspapers.

Henry Randolph Mitchell was the only one of the original "Tenners" who was not caught. He was removed from the list when a federal warrant against him was dismissed in 1958. Many criminals were truly terrified of having their names on the list. Put on the list in 1953, armed robber John Raleigh Cooke told FBI agents after being caught that his capture was a "relief." Francis Laverne Brannan, a 1962 listee wanted for the shotgun slaying of an elderly widow, called the Miami FBI office after making the roster and said, "Come and get me, I'm tired of running."

A composite profile of the average Top Tenner would be a 37-year-old, five-foot-nine-inch, 167-pound male. The average stay on the list before capture is 145 days. Most Top Tenners have lengthy criminal records, have served prison terms and have in the past benefited from some form of judicial leniency.

In the 1950s the FBI arrested about 15 Top Tenners a year, but during the early 1970s there was only a total of 12 arrests in four years. In an attempt to improve its efficiency rate, the FBI in 1970 unofficially adjusted the list so that it contained 16 names instead of 10; if any of the 16 was caught, the agency could claim it had captured a Top Tenner. The reason for the FBI’s declining score was that the list became dominated with radical fugitives who could effectively vanish into an organized underground.

Cynics have pointed out that the idea of a Most Wanted list came about in 1950 merely as a response to the Kefauver Committee investigation, which at the time was laying waste to J. Edgar Hoover’s long-espoused denial of the existence of organized crime and the Mafia. The Ten Most Wanted were thus offered up as proof that the FBI was a premier crime-fighting organization. Whatever the motives for establishing the list, with a total of some 400 captures, it must be regarded as an effective publicity device for battling crime.

Tenderloin New York vice area

Every major American city had or has a tenderloin district where crime and vice thrive, but the original term applied to an area in New York City. During the greater part of the 19th century, New York City, by most estimates spawned more crime and vice than any other city in the United States and possibly as much as the rest of the nation combined. And New York City at the time consisted only of Manhattan Island. In the post-Civil War 1860s and the 1870s, some 20,000 full-time professional prostitutes worked the tiny island, and there was at least an equal number of part-timers. Together these two groups accounted for five percent of the population, or one out of every 20 inhabitants. In 1866 Bishop Matthew Simpson of the Methodist Church lamented in a sermon that the city harbored as many harlots as Methodists. One could speak of the lewdness, vulgarity and crime in Chicago and San Francisco, but nothing could compare to Manhattan Island, with its 5,000 open brothels and assignation houses. In some areas of the city brothels and other dives, such as grogeries, concert saloons and dance halls, often numbered as many as 10 per block.

The worst section of all was the Tenderloin, comprising just a part of what was the 29th Police Precinct, covering the area between 24th Street and 40th Street from Fifth Avenue to Seventh Avenue. By the 1890s the Tenderloin was bursting at its seams and by general acceptance, was extended north to 48th Street and as far west as Ninth Avenue.

Twenty straight blocks of Sixth Avenue, then New York's wickedest street, were lined on both sides with nothing but gin mills, dance halls, brothels and other low resorts. Day and night the streets were jammed with streetwalkers and crooks of all sort. So many live sex shows abounded that competition forced down the price of admission from $5 to 50¢. A Brooklyn preacher was so horrified with what he witnessed on Sixth Avenue that he dubbed it "Satan's Circus." In time, it was estimated that one half of all the buildings in the district were given over to some sort of vice.

Illicit fortunes were made in the Tenderloin by landlords, madams, pimps, sneak thieves, pickpockets, footpads, swindlers, burglars, holdup men, murderers and, of course, policemen. In 1876, after long service in relatively quieter precincts, Capt. Alexander "Clubber" Williams took command of the 29th and told a friend: "I've been transferred. I've had nothing but chuck steak for a long time, and now I'm going to get a little of the tenderloin." The new meaning stuck as a description for any area devoted to vice with the connivance of the police. Williams put police graft on a more organized basis than had ever been achieved before. He retired in 1895 under pressure from reformers, including police Commissioner Theodore Roosevelt. By that time Williams was a millionaire.

Tenth Avenue Gang New York train robbers

Two years after the Reno Gang staged the first train robbery in America in 1866, a vicious gang imitated the crime in New York City.

The Tenth Avenue Gang had operated since 1860 under the leadership of Ike Marsh as typical burglars and holdup men. Determined to stage a train robbery because they were "as good as those cowboys," Marsh and a number of his men boarded a Hudson River Railroad train at Spuyten Duyvil, at the northern end of Manhattan in 1868, and forced their way into the express car. Binding and gagging the guard, they threw off an iron box that contained about $5,000 in cash and bonds.

For a time after that caper, the Tenth Avenue Gang was the toast of the underworld. But with a vengeful railroad flooding the city with detectives bent on smashing the gang, Marsh and his men eventually disbanded and sought refuge within the much bigger and more powerful Hell's Kitchen Gang.

Tenuto, Frederick J. (1915–1952?) murderer

In 1952 a young Brooklyn man named Arnold Schuster became a short-lived public hero when he recognized Willie "the Actor" Sutton and notified the police, who promptly arrested the notorious bank robber; two and a half weeks later, Schuster was shot to death on the street where he lived. His killer is believed to have been Frank J. Tenuto, at the time a 37-year-old murderer and fugitive from justice who was on the FBI's list of the 10 most-wanted criminals.

Tenuto had his first run-ins with the law at the age of 16, with several arrests as a "suspicious person." At 18 he was put on probation for three years after being convicted of robbery and burglary. Arrested again, he was sentenced to 10 years in the industrial school at Huntington, Pa. He was in and out of prison several times in the 1930s and in 1940 he was convicted of the hired killing of a Philadelphia man. Sentenced to 10 to 20 years, he escaped two years later but was quickly recaptured. In 1945 Tenuto broke out again and enjoyed a month's freedom before being caught in New York. Sent to Holmesburg Prison on the outskirts of Philadelphia, he escaped once more in 1947 with four other men, one of whom was Sutton.

After that, Tenuto, ironically known as "the Angel" or "St. John," turned up in Brooklyn underworld haunts sporting two guns under his belt and boasting that the only way he would ever be retaken by the police was to be "shot in bed." Around this time, Tenuto apparently came under the wing of gang leader Albert Anastasia, the Lord High Executioner of the Mafia. When Sutton was caught in 1952, Anastasia, who had no connection with the bank robber, flew into a murderous rage at the "stoolpigeon"—Schuster—who had turned him in. Anastasia ordered Schuster killed, and Tenuto carried out the assignment.

It was a foolish thing for Anastasia to do, since he could in no way profit from Schuster's murder and simply left himself open to a possible homicide charge. According to underworld reports, Anastasia decided to make amends for his foolhardy action. He ordered Tenuto killed so that he could never be connected to the Schuster case. Tenuto's body was never found; one version states that he was given a "double-decker funeral"—that is, placed in a coffin with an about-to-be-buried corpse—and buried.

Teresa, Vincent Charles (1930–1990) underworld informer

Joe Valachi is generally considered to have been the most important underworld informer since Abe Reles. The Mafia, however, may well have a different idea about who deserves that distinction. When Valachi started telling what he knew about organized crime, the Mafia set a $100,000 price on his head. When Vinnie Teresa, who had previously been the number three Mafia man in New England, began talking to the authorities a few years after Valachi, the figure was set at $500,000. The price was about right. While Valachi presented a lot of generalized information, Teresa's evidence was harder and more valuable in court. Because of his testimony, some 50 mob figures were either indicted or convicted and valuable information was gathered on hundreds more.

Teresa described the activities of the Mafia from his home area of Massachusetts all the way to the Bahamas. He was the first informer to detail the extent of mob fixes of horse races at New England tracks, and he cleared up several murders that had baffled the authorities. He also did something that few informers had ever dared to do: he testified in court against the much-feared Meyer Lansky. Teresa was able to reveal many Mafia secrets because in his racket activities he had filled the mob's coffers with an estimated $150 million. By his own calculation he ran through $10 million during a 28-year career in crime.

After completing his testimony in the early 1970s, Fat Vinnie was "buried" under the Federal Witness Protection Program with a new identity as Charles Cantino. In 1984, the Cantino address was Maple Valley, Washington. The government itself blew Fat Vinnie's cover in December 1984 by getting a grand jury indictment against him and five members of his family on charges of smuggling hundreds of exotic birds and reptiles into the country. Most of the animals were listed as endangered species. The word in the underworld was that Fat Vinnie had himself once more become an endangered species, with a price still on his head. Teresa eluded underworld vengeance until his death in 1990.

Terranova, Ciro (1891–1938) Mafia leader

An imposing Mafia figure when the Morellos and brother-in-law Lupo the Wolf controlled organized crime in New York, Ciro Terranova went on to make his fortune in New York in two main rackets: numbers, as a junior partner of Dutch Schultz, and artichokes, as "the Artichoke King," a name given him by the newspapers. Informer Joe Valachi said, "He tied up all the artichokes in the city. The way I understand it he would buy all the artichokes that came into New York. I didn't know where they all came from, but I know he was buying them out. Being artichokes, they hold; they can keep. Then Ciro would make his own price, and as you know, Italians got to have artichokes to eat."

Terranova was at the zenith of his power during the 1920s but went into a slow decline after the Maranzano-Masseria war of 1930–31, when Lucky Luciano emerged as the new power. Luciano and his assistant Vito Genovese regarded Terranova as a coward and as someone, as Valachi explained, who could be "stripped [of power] . . . a little at a time."

Luciano's contempt for Terranova was based on the latter's performance in the assassination of Giuseppe "Joe the Boss" Masseria in 1931, which Lucky had engineered. On the day of the planned execution, Luciano, who was Joe the Boss' top assistant, Genovese and Terranova set out with Masseria for a Coney Island restaurant, where the latter was to be killed. During the ride Terranova, who was driving, became so nervous he almost gave away the plot and had to be relieved at the wheel by Genovese. It may even be that Terranova was supposed to have been one of the assassins who entered the restaurant later in the afternoon and gunned down Joe the Boss as he sat alone at a table waiting for Luciano to return from the men's room. The killers were Genovese, Joe Adonis, Albert Anastasia and Bugsy Siegel.

For a time Terranova retained his power, and when Schultz was murdered on orders from the new national crime syndicate, he moved to take full charge of the Dutchman's numbers racket in Harlem. It was at this point that Terranova was informed by Luciano and Genovese that he was now in retirement. Too weak to protest, Terranova retired, and three years later, according to Valachi, "he died from a broken heart." With Terranova's death, the old Morello gang, the first Mafia family established in New York, broke up; its members were absorbed by other groups within the crime syndicate.

Texas Rangers

The Texas Rangers date back to 1826, when Stephen Austin first proposed keeping “twenty to thirty Rangers in service at all times.” Over the years the Rangers have become the most-storied, if controversial, lawmen in the country. The heroic side of the legend is captured in a frequently told tale set in a variety of towns in which a riot broke out; a lone Ranger was sent in to handle matters. When local officials saw a single Ranger ride into town, they expressed alarm. “Why,” said this fabled Ranger, “there’s only one riot, isn’t there.”

The Rangers early activities often involved actions against Indians or Mexicans. Indeed, they showed a remarkable inability to recognize the U.S.-Mexican border, often foraging into Mexico in pursuit of their quarry. During its Wild West period, the force had many heroes and villains and members who turned villain later. The heroes included Ben McCulloch, Big Foot Wallace, Frank Jones, John Coffee Hays and Leander McNelly. Also in its ranks were Bass Outlaw, who was indeed to live up to his last name, the psychotic Ben Thompson and the brutal Scott Cooley.

The Rangers were disbanded in the period immediately following the Civil War but were reestablished in 1874. Over the next decade and a half they reached their peak of acclaim, running to earth such outlaws as King Fisher, Sam Bass and Wes Hardin.

In the 20th century the Texas Rangers came under fierce criticism from a number of different sources. They were described as antiblack, anti-Chicano and antilabor. In 1919 a state House-Senate committee found that the Rangers had consistently violated the civil rights of individuals and groups, killed unnecessarily while making arrests and murdered prisoners. One of the worst offenses was the Ponvenir Massacre during World War I, in which a Ranger captain and eight of his men killed 15 or more Mexicans in cold blood. Although no criminal charges were brought against them, the nine were dismissed from the force.

In the 1930s the Rangers had become so politicized that the entire force was fired by incoming Gov. Ma Ferguson because they had openly supported her opponent. They were all replaced by Ferguson appointees, who brought the agency its greatest disrepute with an unparalleled record of corruption, theft, embezzlement and murder. The only Ranger to escape Ma’s revenge was Frank Hamer, a tough lawman who had taken leave to go on special assignment hunting Clyde Barrow and Bonnie Parker. Hamer and Ranger Manny Gault were members of a party of six lawmen who literally “ventilated” Bonnie and Clyde in a roadside ambush in August 1935.

In 1935 Ma Ferguson’s successor cleaned out the Ferguson Rangers and reconstituted a professional force as part of the Department of Public Safety. Later, it was returned to independent status, but the agency did not remain free of criticism. In 1967 the state AFL-CIO demanded the Rangers be abolished, insisting that instead of fighting smugglers and cattle rustlers, they spent too much time operating as tax-supported strikebreakers. During the effort by Cesar Chavez and his United Farm Workers to lead a strike of melon pickers in Texas, two strike leaders suffered brain concussions after an encounter with the Rangers. Besides the concussions, the men had bruises on their bodies and backs, had their fingernails ripped away and suffered deep cuts. The official Ranger explanation was that the men had hurt themselves by bumping into each other while trying to escape arrest. The Supreme Court upheld a three-judge federal court that had ruled against the Rangers in a suit brought by the union. The lower court had concluded, “It is difficult indeed for this court to visualize two grown men colliding with each other so as to cause such injuries.” It was perhaps a sign of the times that in the 1970s a candidate for governor could run an extremely strong, if losing, race on a platform calling for the abolition of the Texas Rangers.

Thaw, Harry Kendall (1872–1947) murderer

At first, quite a few people felt that railroad heir Harry Kendall Thaw did what was right and proper when he shot Stanford White, the distinguished architect, on the roof garden of New York’s Madison Square Garden in 1906. Revelations showed that millionaire White had a hobby of seducing young girls. One of his amusements, it would be alleged, was having them put on little girls’ dresses and cavort, legs flying, on a red velvet swing in a heavily curtained, lavishly decorated miniature Taj Mahal he maintained on the West Side.

One girl White so despoiled was the beautiful Evelyn Nesbit, who became his mistress at the age of 16, by which time she had already posed for Charles Dana Gibson’s painting The Eternal Question and had adorned the chorus of many hit shows, including “Floradora.” Then in 1905, at the age of 19, Evelyn left White to become engaged to Thaw, whom she married the following year. Thaw was the wastrel heir of a Pittsburgh railroad tycoon who had reduced his allowance to a paltry $2,000 a year. However, he had a doting mother who gave him another $80,000 so that he could pursue the wild life. Among other bad habits that would soon become public knowledge, Thaw maintained an apartment in a New York brothel where he would entice young girls under the promise of winning them a show business career. Once he had them in the apartment, Thaw often would whip the girls, a treatment he soon inflicted on his new bride. Thus, there emerged a bizarre triangle: a lascivious architect with 50 elegant New York City buildings to his credit and a lascivious wastrel with $40 million in his future contending over gorgeous Evelyn, destined to become the fantasy idol of millions of American men and boys. Irvin S. Cobb was to describe her to enthralled newspaper readers as having “the slim, quick grace of a fawn, a head that sat on her flawless throat as a lily on its stem, eyes that were the color of blue-brown pansies and the size of half dollars, a mouth made of crumpled rose petals.” Was it any wonder that the assassination of Stanford White enjoyed as much publicity as had that of President William McKinley a few years earlier?

At age 34 Thaw was no doubt going slowly mad. On a European cruise he finally cracked up and beat Evelyn until she “confessed” all her past sins with White. To stop the whippings, Evelyn was later to admit she told Thaw even more than had happened.

Thaw was now totally insane with jealousy. He forbade his wife to mention White by name but instead refer to him as “the Bastard” or “the Beast.” Being rather on the genteel side, Evelyn more often simply called him “the B.” Then on the evening of June 25, 1906, Thaw and his wife were attending a musical at the dinner theater on the roof of Madison Square Garden. Also in the audience was Stanford White. Suddenly, Thaw arose from his seat and strolled through the audience to within four feet of White. He drew a revolver and fired two times at the architect’s head, killing him instantly. As the victim slumped to the floor, Thaw fired a final shot into his shoulder. Then he announced with evident satisfaction: “You deserve this. You ruined my wife.”

Thaw unloaded his weapon, scattering the cartridges onto the floor, and held the gun aloft, indicating he meant no harm to others. He was quickly arrested and hustled off to jail.

While awaiting trial, Thaw had all his meals catered from Delmonico’s, and his mother announced she was prepared to spend a million dollars to save her son. She hired the famous California trial lawyer Delphin Delmas to defend him. Even before the opening of the trial, Delmas began spreading stories that transformed boulder Thaw into a defender of American womanhood. Various of White’s escapades with teenage girls were leaked to the press and the Rev. Charles A. Eaton, who numbered John D. Rockefeller among his parishioners, delivered a sermon in Thaw’s defense. “It would be a good thing,” Rev. Eaton said, “if there were a little more shooting in cases like this.”

District Attorney William Travers Jerome, the uncle of Winston Churchill, saw what the defense was trying to do and reacted with an angry declaration that he would personally try the case. “With all his millions,” Jerome roared, “Thaw is a fiend. In the conduct of his trial, I shall prove that no matter how rich a man is, he can’t get away with murder in New York County!”

Tickets to the sensational trial were scalped at $100, and 80-odd world famous artists and writers, including Cobb, Samuel Hopkins Adams and James Montgomery Flagg, covered the proceedings. The prosecution’s case was brief and simple: Thaw had shot and killed White. The high point for the defense came when Evelyn took the stand and, as the saying went, told all. Dressed in a plain blue frock with a white collar, big schoolboy tie and black velvet hat, she told, in dewy innocence, of the bizarre love games she played with White, often wearing a little girl dress with her hair hung back. It was a tale that would have enraged a statue. She sobbingly told of her ultimate deflowering, which White had accomplished by giving her drugged champagne that rendered her helpless. In rebuttal, the prosecutor elicited damaging testimony from a leading toxicologist, Dr. Rudolph Witthaus, who pointed out that Evelyn’s story of the drugged champagne was dubious. No drug known to science would have worked as rapidly as she described without also killing the victim.

But what was such evidence worth against the word of Evelyn Nesbit—“a wounded bluebird, a soiled Broadway sparrow,” as the press referred to her.

A group of alienists examined Thaw and pronounced him legally sane, but throughout the trial he alternately scribbled incoherent notes to his lawyers, cried like a baby and flew into rages until his eyes bugged out and “his face would turn purple.”

In a flowery summation, defense attorney Delmas told the jury that his client had been temporarily seized by “dementia Americana . . . that species of insanity which makes every home sacred . . . makes a man believe that his wife is sacred. . . . Whoever stains the virtue of his wife has forfeited the protection of human laws and must look to the eternal justice and mercy of God. . . .”

The gentlemen of the jury could not agree on a verdict. A year later, a new trial was held. Prosecutor Jerome decided his previous tactic of attacking Evelyn’s rape story had boomeranged, so this time he stipulated she spoke the truth. Evelyn looked more lovely and Thaw acted more mad. The jury returned a verdict of “not guilty, on the ground of his insanity at the time of the commission of the act.”

Thaw, however, did not go free. He was declared criminally insane and imprisoned for life in a mental institution at Matteawan, N.Y. His mother spent tens of thousands of dollars on legal hearings trying to win his freedom. Then in 1913 Thaw escaped from the asylum, fled to Canada and was finally retaken. While he was on the loose, Evelyn Nesbit announced: “Harry Thaw has turned out to be a degenerate scoundrel. He hid behind my skirts through two dirty trials and I won’t stand for it again. I won’t let lawyers throw any more mud at me.” She then signed a contract to appear in vaudeville at $3,500 a week.

A battery of lawyers kept Thaw from going back to Matteawan and in 1915 a court declared him sane. The following year he celebrated his new freedom by horse-whipping a teenage boy. Before going off to the asylum once more, Thaw divorced Evelyn. He emerged from Matteawan in 1922 and embarked on a new career of wild living. Evelyn Nesbit continued to appear in vaudeville for many years and, sporadically, in some less austere nightclubs and gin mills. She eventually retired to a career in ceramics in California. Harry Thaw continued to roam the world, spending his millions, until his death in 1947.

Thiel, Alexander (1890–1956) forger

The bible of criminology, Fundamentals of Criminal Investigation by Charles E. O’Hara, labels Alexander Thiel “probably the most accomplished forger of modern times.” It was an accolade few police authorities would dispute. From the 1920s to 1943 Thiel, known throughout the country as “Mr. X,” was thought to be the head of the nation’s most prolific gang of check forgers. Only after he was apprehended did the police discover that Mr. X had no gang, that he was a loner who netted something like $600,000 to $1 million, in an era when a dollar was worth five to 10 times what it is in the 1980s.

What made the authorities sure they were dealing with a gang of criminals was the fact that Thiel was an expert at several different criminal crafts. The man who passed the checks, a dapper look-alike of actor John Barrymore, was a master forger capable of imitating a real signature from memory. Thus, whenever a bank teller requested that he sign the back of a withdrawal slip to verify his endorsement of a check, he always duplicated the signature down to the dotted i’s. Certainly, the second-story man in the mob was a specialist who knew how to break into a business office without leaving a trace. Once inside, he would locate a blank check ledger and rip out a page from near the back of it. He would then stamp the stubs: “Defective Checks. Removed by Printer.” Thus, even if the missing checks were noticed, the explanation was readily at hand. Generally, however, the missing checks weren’t noticed until they were cashed and Mr. X and his “gang” were long gone. Thiel himself handled every step of the operation, including the second-story work. “Accomplices mean extra tongues that can wag,” he told police, a philosophy that permitted him to avoid detection for almost a quarter of a century.

Thiel was born in Chicago in 1890, one of six children. When he was 14, his father, a reasonably successful architect, was wiped out in the bank crash of 1904. That experience was to shape Thiel’s criminal future. As he later told the authorities, “Right then and there I decided banks and bankers were all a bunch of no-goods and someday I was going to get even with them.” He was a delinquent in his teens and was sent to reform school after being caught in a burglary.

In his twenties he was a card dealer and croupier at illegal gambling joints, where he discovered his superior forging ability by sheer luck. A heavy gambler committed suicide; almost by impulse, Thiel hurriedly scrawled out an I.O.U. chit for $2,500, using as a model a marker the gambler had given him earlier in the evening. He tossed the chit into his money box and pocketed $2,500. His employers never suspected a thing, figuring the dead gambler had obviously killed himself because he had lost more than he could afford.

Thiel decided it would be a lot healthier to swindle banks than gambling-joint operators, who tended to be most unforgiving about such matters. He quit the job and went into the bad paper business.

In his first big caper Thiel managed to acquire some blank checks belonging to New York real estate millionaire Messmore Kendall. It was three weeks before Kendall and his bank realized the millionaire’s account had been looted of $162,000. That haul set Thiel up in a style of living to which he was to remain accustomed for about 20 years, although he never again pulled a job on such a grand scale. He came to realize that passing checks of $50,000 or more was too dangerous. Thereafter, he kept his forged checks within a range of $5,000 to $15,000 and simply cashed more of them.

Thiel started living the good life and became a fixture in New York nightclub society. He was a regular at the Stork Club when it was still a speakeasy, where he was known by sight, if not by reputation, by host Sherman Billingsley. However, he had a strong drug habit, one that had started when he was a teenager in reform school, and needed to cash thousands of dollars worth of bad checks annually just to cover his addiction.

THIEVES' Exchange

By the late 1930s Mr. X was being sought by police all over the country. Under the name of George Workmaster, a real stockbroker, Thiel cashed checks totaling $4,160; again, an alert went out for the John Barrymore look-alike. This time the police got their man—or at least thought they had after five witnesses identified Bertram Campbell as the forger. Campbell was sent to prison for five to ten years, despite his anguished claims of innocence. Alex Thiel read newspaper accounts of the supposed criminal career of Bertram Campbell with mixed feelings. It took the pressure off him but, at the same time, he felt sorry for the man.

Thiel wrote a letter to District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey, whose office had prosecuted Campbell, informing him an innocent man had been convicted. He also wrote several letters to newspapers. But, of course, Thiel was not about to come forward and the suspicion grew that a friend of Campbell was perpetrating a hoax in the hope of getting him off. Finally, Thiel tried another tack. He resumed pulling more of his Mr. X capers. Still, the authorities refused to believe they had the wrong man. They formed the theory that Campbell had merely been a front man for a “syndicate” of check forgers and that the gang was still in operation. No one person could pull so many jobs by himself, they maintained.

So, while Campbell rotted in jail, Thiel went on forging checks. He was finally caught, ironically, because of his drug addiction. In 1945 Thiel was “taking the cure” at the United States Hospital at Lexington, Ky. Two New York detectives visited the institution in search of wanted check passers, since drug addiction was recognized as common in that particular profession. Going through pictures of the inmates, they ran across a photo of a John Barrymore look-alike and remembered the Campbell case. Thiel was brought back to New York and confronted with the witnesses in the Campbell case, who admitted they had identified the wrong man. He then confessed to being Mr. X, and cleared Campbell. When the two men were brought together, Thiel said, “I’m sorry for all the trouble I’ve caused you.”

Campbell, in spite of his eight-year ordeal, showed no sign of anger. He simply replied, “I suppose you couldn’t help it.”

Within a few months, Campbell won a full pardon, and a short while later, he was awarded $115,000 for his wrongful conviction. Eighty-two days after getting the award, Campbell died.

Thiel drew jail terms totaling nine years. Freed in his mid-sixties, he went back to Chicago and, for a time, faded into obscurity. Then he forged a check for $100. When located by police, he was in bed near death. The master forger told the cops, “Give me a pen and a blank check and I’ll square my bill with the undertaker now.”

Thieves' Exchange

New York criminal district

No extensive thievery is ever possible without an outlet for the criminals’ plunder. Receivers of stolen goods, or fences, have always existed but perhaps nowhere quite as blatantly as in New York’s notorious Thieves’ Exchange, in the Eighth Ward near Houston Street and Broadway, during the last third of the 19th century.

Each night criminals and fences would gather over drinks to dicker about the price of stolen loot with virtually no attempt at subterfuge. There was little need since all the important fences paid regular stipends to the police for the right to operate in the Thieves’ Exchange. It was said that major politicians and top police officials were even granted commissions on the fences’ gross business.

A criminal down on his luck could shop around at the Thieves’ Exchange for a fence who would supply him with funds in exchange for first option on his future loot. Fences would also listen to specific criminal plots to decide whether or not to supply financial backing.

There was little that could not be handled in the way of loot, big or small, at this criminal marketplace. When in the 1870s a gang stole $50,000 worth of needles and thread from the warehouse of H. B. Caflin and Co., they had little trouble finding an instant buyer for the goods at the Exchange. By the final two decades of the century, the Thieves’ Exchange began crumbling under the assault of police reform movements. The fences, of course, did not disappear; they simply scattered.

third degree

Use of the third degree, whether in the form of brute force or the more subtle torture of protracted questioning or other psychological pressures, by the police to gain confessions has declined greatly in recent years.

In the heyday of the third degree, many police departments had their own favorite ways of extracting confessions from suspects they deemed guilty of an offense. A standard device was the rubber hose, which can inflict terrible pain but leaves no marks. The “water cure” had the same merit; a suspect would be forced to lie down and water would be poured slowly into his nostrils. The victim either suffocated or confessed. Another method was to drill into the nerve of a suspect’s tooth. In his memoirs a police captain described a technique whereby officers would deliver a sharp but not heavy blow on the skull, repeated at regular intervals, so that the regularity of the blows arouses anticipation which increases the torture; assuring the suspect that he will not be hurt, then suddenly felling him with a blow from behind with a club or a slab of wood, followed by further sympathy and reassurance when the man revives, only to have the same thing happen again, the man never seeing who strikes him. . . ."

Widespread use of third degree methods undoubtedly resulted in the wrongful conviction of countless suspects. A report by a committee of the American Bar Association in 1930 stated, "For every one of these cases which . . . find a place in the official reports, there are many hundreds and probably thousands, of instances of the use of the Third Degree in some form or other." In 1947 President Harry Truman's Committee on Civil Rights arrived at the same conclusion.

Apologists for the third degree have often insisted its use is "rare" and it is never directed against "decent" persons. In fact, especially in lurid cases where the public demands a solution, the third degree has been used on prominent and respectable people, although, as the Truman committee put it, "Most of the victims . . . are ignorant, friendless persons, unaware of their rights and without the means of challenging those who violate those rights." Roscoe Pound, former dean of Harvard Law School, once emphasized, "No rich man is ever subjected to this process to obtain proof in violation of antitrust legislation, and no powerful politician is thus dealt with to obtain proof of bribery and graft."

The main impetus for improvements in the treatment of suspects springs from the 1966 Miranda decision handed down by the Supreme Court. Under Miranda the police are required to warn a suspect that he has the right to keep silent; that anything he says can and will be used against him; that if he wishes, he has the right to have his attorney present during any interrogation; and that if he has no attorney or cannot afford one, a lawyer will be appointed to represent him.

Despite the Miranda ruling, the third degree is still practiced in some jurisdictions. In the late 1970s the Philadelphia police were often accused of using excessive force at the time of arrest, a sort of pre-third degree treatment considered helpful in getting a suspect to confess. The city's police officers were found to have engaged in marathon interrogations, in some cases breaking down the resistance of the innocent as well as the guilty. It was revealed that the force also employed the old-fashioned physical third degree, in the form of the "telephone book treatment," whereby a Philadelphia telephone directory was placed on a suspect's head and beaten upon with a steel hammer until his memory improved.

Thomas, Henry Andrew "Heck" (1850–1912) lawman

If one man could be given credit for cleaning up the Oklahoma badlands, he would have to be Heck Thomas, one of the West's most remarkable lawmen. Actually, Thomas would probably have preferred to be remembered as one of the Three Guardsmen, a trio comprised of himself and two other illustrious deputy U.S. marshals, Chris Madsen and Bill Tilghman, although there is no doubt that Heck was the key planner. Among the outlaws Thomas tracked down were Sam Bass, the Daltons and the Doolin gang.

Born in 1850 in Athens, Ga. to a family with a distinguished military tradition, young Heck served as a courier in A. P. Hill's division of Stonewall Jackson's corps; he was 12 years old at the time. A year later, he was mustered out of the Confederate Army when he almost died of typhoid fever. After the Civil War Heck joined the Atlanta police force. Wounded in one of the city's numerous race riots, he won a reputation as a fearless fighter. After becoming bored with his job, he moved to Texas with his wife in 1875 and went to work as an express car guard for the Texas Express Co. During a train robbery in 1876 he prevented holdup men from getting $22,000 by hiding the money in an unused heating stove in the express car. Promoted to detective by the company, he led posses that ran to earth several members of the Sam Bass gang. Tiring too of this work, Thomas became a bounty hunter, his most notable catch being a pair of murderous brothers, Jim and Pink Lee, whom he killed in a shoot-out that established his reputation of always giving a wanted man a chance to surrender first. The Lees declined the offer.

Later that year Thomas became a deputy marshal for Hanging Judge Parker's court in Fort Smith, Ark. His job was to round up badmen in the Indian Territory and bring them to Parker for trial. When Thomas wasn't traveling alone, he rode with another deputy and drivers for two or three "prison wagons," each capable of holding about eight prisoners. On his first trip with a partner, Thomas brought in eight murderers, one horse thief, an illegal whiskey trader and seven other offenders. He soon became famous for the number of his catches. Working alone during the week after Christmas 1886, Thomas brought in four murderers. Not surprisingly, most of the territory's renegades soon recognized him on sight and sought to stay clear of this big man with the flowing brown mustache "who looked easy but fought hard."

During the late 1880s Thomas and Chris Madsen were given the task of running down the Dalton gang. The Daltons made a strenuous effort to avoid confrontations with the two lawmen. Thomas pushed the gang so hard that they decided to pull one big job in order to get enough money to flee to South America. On October 5, 1892 the Daltons staged their famous raid on Coffeyville, Kan. and were almost completely wiped out trying to rob two banks at once. Thomas, hot on the gang's trail, arrived in town just after the shooting. Even though he had taken no actual part in gunning down the Daltons, a Coffeyville banker awarded him $1,500 after the raid for bringing about "the extermination of this gang."

Next, Thomas, Madsen and Bill Tilghman went after the Doolin gang. Although Bill Doolin had been a member of the Dalton gang, he had missed the Coffeyville raid and had thereafter formed his own outfit. Thomas captured or killed several of the Doolin gang in various gunfights. He was also given official credit for finally killing Bill Doolin, supposedly in a nighttime gunfight in 1896. Years after, an apparently more accurate version of what had happened surfaced. Thomas had located Doolin's house and found the outlaw's wife weeping over his corpse, which was laid out on a bed. Doolin had just died of consumption. Without a moment's hesitation, Thomas leveled his shotgun and let the corpse have both barrels. He later told of having shot Bill Doolin as the outlaw went for his gun, and collected a $5,000 reward. Thomas gave the money to Doolin's widow, a penniless woman who had reformed her husband and made him give up his life of crime.

Later, around the turn of the century, Thomas tamed Lawton, Oklahoma Territory, became a hunting companion of Teddy Roosevelt and finally retired in 1909 following a heart attack. He died on August 15, 1912, five years after the territory he had tamed became a state.

Thompson, Ben (1842–1884) gunfighter, murderer and lawman

English-born Ben Thompson was one of the West's more pathological gunfighters (perhaps only trailing his younger, even more trigger-happy brother, Billy), equally mean and murderous whether or not he was wearing a badge.

Raised in Austin, Tex. Thompson's first recorded scrape with the law occurred when he shot a black youth. In a significant departure from the normal judicial custom of the period, he was sent to prison under pressure from the local citizenry, indicating the low repute in which he was held. With the outbreak of the Civil War, Thompson joined the Confederate Army. Aside from the fact that he fought more with his comrades than against the common foe, his service was undistinguished. He was charged with a couple of killings but nothing came of the accusations.

After the war Thompson was accused of another shooting. While in jail in Austin, he bribed two guards, and he, the guards and five others headed for Mexico to join up with the forces of Emperor Maximilian. When Maximilian was executed in 1867, Thompson fled back across the border, barely avoiding capture by the forces of Juarez. In Texas he was acquitted of an old murder charge but soon got two years for another shooting.

Pardoned in 1870, Thompson hit the gambling trail and eventually opened a saloon and gaming establishment in Abilene in partnership with a gambler and old army buddy, Phil Coe. Thompson had a few confrontations with Wild Bill Hickok, but despite some tough talk, neither seemed anxious to have a showdown. No less an authority than Bat Masterson erased any doubt about who would have won. He considered Thompson the best gunfighter of all. "Others missed at times," he wrote later, "but Ben Thompson was as delicate and certain in action as a Swiss watch." The facade of the Thompson-Coe establishment boasted a representation of an enormous bull whose sexual organs were of an even greater dimension than the rest of its parts. Citizens dubbed the painting the Shame of Abilene and pressured Marshal Hickok to do something about it. When Thompson was out of town, Hickok got into an argument with Coe, supposedly over the painting, and killed him in a gun duel. Shortly thereafter, Thompson sold out his interest in the saloon and left Abilene, having suffered an accident in a wagon that left him with a broken leg.

Ben Thompson's death toll may have reached 32; he was just as likely to commit murder with his badge on as with it off.

Thompson returned to Kansas in 1873 and took part in several killings. In one incident Billy Thompson gunned down a sheriff in Kansas and Ben helped his brother get away. Thereafter, Ben Thompson kept on gambling and killing, pausing in 1879 to hire out his gun to the Santa Fe Railroad during its war to gain rights-of-way through Royal Gorge.

In late 1879 he returned to Austin with quite a stake from his gambling and gunfighting days. He opened a string of gambling houses and then, despite his unsavory record, ran for marshal. After being defeated once, he was elected to the post in 1880. Thompson gave the town quite satisfactory law enforcement for a time. The crime rate dropped dramatically and so did the number of arrests. Thompson's very appearance kept things peaceful. Overlooking his habit of getting drunk and shooting out the street lamps when things got too quiet, the voters reelected him in December 1881. However, when Thompson shot and killed an old foe, Jack Harris, in San Antonio in 1882, the citizens of Austin felt that he had gone a bit too far, and he was forced to resign. Thompson stood trial for the Harris killing but was acquitted on a plea of self-defense. When he returned to Austin, his supporters gave him a spontaneous parade of welcome.

Although no longer the town's lawman, Thompson still cut such an awesome figure that other badmen stayed clear of him and the community. Soon, he began to crave action. In March 1884 he met King Fisher, deputy sheriff of Uvalde, who was in Austin on official business, and the pair went on a drunk that took them to San Antonio. There, they entered the Vaudeville Variety Theatre, a gaming joint that the late Jack Harris had partly owned. Thompson and Fisher repaired to an upstairs box from which to watch the show. A short time later, two of Harris' former partners, Billy Simms and Joe Foster, entered with the establishment's bouncer, Jacob Coy. The five had a drink together, with the conversation quickly turning to Harris' death and Thompson viciously taunting the partners about it. As words got heated, he playfully, in a style of play only Thompson was capable of, jammed his six-shooter into Foster's mouth. Bouncer Coy grabbed the cylinder of the revolver and there was a scuffle. Suddenly, gunfire erupted and both Thompson and Fisher fell dead, shot down by Simms, Foster and Coy as well as three gunmen they had stationed in the next box. Thompson took nine bullets and Fisher 13. Fisher had not fired a shot and Thompson only one, which obviously made the killings self-defense, at least according to the official ruling.

Thompson, Billy (c. 1845–1888?) gunfighter

The trigger-happy brother of Ben Thompson, one of the West's most notorious gunmen, Texas Billy Thompson was the more cold-blooded, if less efficient, murderer. On several occasions it was only Ben's intervention that saved Billy from retribution by his enemies or the law. Billy's family came to Austin, Tex. from Yorkshire, England when he was a small child. Growing up in the shadow of his brother, Billy was often moved to gunplay to prove he was worthy of as much attention as Ben.

After a number of shooting scrapes in the Confederate Army, from which Ben always rescued him, Billy turned gambler upon resuming civilian life and spent most of his free time either drinking or trying to shoot someone. In 1873 Billy shot and killed Sheriff C. B. Whitney in Ellsworth, Kan. "For God's sake, Billy," Ben reproached him, "you've shot our best friend."

"I don't give a damn," Billy retorted. "I would've shot if it had been Jesus Christ."

With the help of Ben and some friends, Billy got out of town. Once clear of pursuit, he lay down on the sod and fell into a drunken sleep. When he awoke, he rode back to Ellsworth and found Ben. His brother hid him for five days and then smuggled him out of town again. Billy then made his way to Buena Vista, Colo., where he was hailed as a hero and elected mayor by the outlaw element. Meanwhile, the governor of Kansas posted a reward for him in connection with the Whitney shooting, but he was not apprehended until three years later, when he wandered into Texas and was captured by Texas Rangers. Shipped back to Kansas for trial, Billy was found not guilty. It was said that Ben Thompson made a number of threats and spent a huge sum of money to get the not-guilty verdict.

Billy then traveled a bit, usually under his brother's wing. He was in San Antonio in 1884 when his brother was gunned down there by longtime enemies. Billy rushed to his dead brother's side and, although grief-stricken, made no effort to seek vengeance. After walking the streets in sorrow for several days and nights, he pulled out of San Antonio. There was speculation that without his brother's protection, Billy wouldn't last long. But he did commit another murder in Corpus Christi and managed to hole up in El Paso for many months. What happened to Billy after that is not certain, the most common rumor was that he was shot dead in Laredo about 1888.

Thompson, Gerald (1910–1935) rapist and murderer

Few capital cases in recent history have degenerated into the kind of circus that took place during the rape-murder trial of Gerald Thompson in Illinois in 1935. Angry mobs paraded through Peoria threatening to lynch him, and at one point the defendant had to be secretly shipped out of town until the local citizenry quieted down.

People were incensed by his cold-blooded murder of young Mildred Hallmark as well as his long string of rapes carried out with weird, almost assembly-line efficiency. As far as the authorities were able to determine from the victims who finally came forward, Thompson raped 16 young women between November 1934 and June 1935, ending with the Hallmark murder. However, Thompson once confessed to a friend that he had actually averaged better than one rape a week for well over a year.

In his brutal series of crimes, Thompson followed the same modus operandi. He would pick up a girl in his car and imprison her there. The rapist had rigged up a clever wiring system from the battery to the car door handle so that if his victim attempted to flee, she would be literally jolted back into his arms. With a pair of scissors on hand, he would cut away the victim's clothes and then rape her. Finally, he would switch on his car lights and force the naked girl to get in front of his car, where he would make her perform sexual acts with him in strange positions while a self-timing camera clicked away. These pictures were later used to blackmail his victims into keeping quiet about their experience.

Unlike his other victims, Mildred Hallmark fought back viciously, and in the struggle the rapist brutally beat her and stabbed her several times with the scissors. He then dumped her naked body in a local cemetery. Thompson went about his normal work as a toolmaker at the Caterpillar Tractor plant in Peoria. One of his coworkers was John Hallmark, the father of the murdered girl, and when a collection was taken up to buy flowers for Mildred, Thompson made a large contribution.

Several suspects were questioned by police. After six days they focused on Thompson because of an anonymous tip. Apparently, the informer was one of his many rape victims who had also been attacked in the same cemetery and remembered that her rapist had been armed with a pair of scissors. A search of Thompson's home, which he shared with his grandmother, turned up direct evidence linking him to the murder: blood-stained trousers and a bloodstained car cushion from his auto, samples from which matched the victim's blood type. The police also found hundreds of obscene photos of Thompson with his other rape victims as well as a diary in which he had recorded the identities of his last 16 pickup victims with a description of what had occurred.

An army of newsmen descended on Peoria for Thompson's trial, as did hundreds of angry Illinoisans who were determined to see that Thompson died, whether legally in the electric chair or at the end of a lynch rope. Despite such threats, Thompson's trial was held and he was quickly convicted. He died in the electric chair on October 15, 1935.

Thompson, Miran Edgar "Buddy" (1917–1948)

robber and murderer

Buddy Thompson was one of the most dangerous and daring lone wolf criminals of the late 1930s and early 1940s. A confirmed criminal, Thompson while in his early twenties, left a trail of crimes through his native Oklahoma, Texas, New Mexico, Colorado, Kansas, Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia. Arrested eight times, he engineered eight successful jailbreaks.

His most stunning crime followed the death of his brother, Blackie Thompson, a fugitive from a Texas penitentiary, at the hands of an Amarillo police officer. Thompson sought out the officer and sat waiting for him at the soda counter of a drug store. When the officer noticed Thompson and thought he recognized him from a number of wanted posters, he approached him and asked for identification. Instead, Thompson opened his jacket to reveal an automatic tucked in his belt. He ordered the officer to draw.

It was crazy, something out of a Western movie. "What is this?" the officer asked. "Do I know you or something?"

"No, and you ain't never going to," Thompson said coldly. "You can draw or not, but when I count three I'm going to start shooting. One. Two. Three."

The officer drew but much too slowly. Thompson shot him twice, killing him.

Thompson fled Texas, kidnapping a motorist and forcing the man to drive him to Oklahoma. A month later, he was captured. Found guilty of killing the police officer, Thompson was sentenced to life imprisonment, a light sentence that infuriated Texas officials. They turned him over to federal officers, hoping that under the Lindbergh Law he would get the death sentence for kidnapping. But because the motorist had been released unharmed, Thompson got a 99-year federal sentence and ended up in Alcatraz.

Thompson’s reputation preceded him to “the Rock,” and Bernie Coy, actively plotting the Alcatraz rebellion-escape, was eager to include a man with a record of eight successful jailbreaks. The Alcatraz break of May 1946 foundered at the last minute because of a single missing key, which prevented the escapees from getting to a police launch that would have taken them to the California mainland, where getaway cars were waiting. When Thompson saw the plot had failed, he realized the only officers who could identify him as being in the break were the nine guards held hostage in two prison cells. Thompson goaded another leading member of the escape team, Dutch Cretzer, a former Public Enemy No. 4, to gun down the nine, against Coy’s specific orders. Cretzer did so, and then Thompson slipped back to his cell block, not realizing that Cretzer’s fusillade had killed only one officer; the rest were badly wounded or playing dead. After the revolt was crushed and Cretzer and Coy killed, Thompson thought he was home free, only to be accused by the eight surviving guards. Along with Sam Shockley, another participant in the attempted break and a pathetically insane inmate, Thompson was executed in San Quentin’s new gas chamber on December 3, 1948, the first to die by that method in California. As the door to the chamber was being pneumatically sealed, Thompson said to Shockley, “I never thought this would really happen.”

Three Guardsmen western law officers

Three deputy U.S. marshals who carved out illustrious careers were known in folklore as the Three Guardsmen. Enforcing the law for Hanging Judge Parker’s court in Fort Smith Ark. Heck Thomas, Chris Madsen and Bill Tilghman were instrumental in running to ground members of the outlaw gangs of Sam Bass, the Dalton brothers and Bill Doolin. In the process they gained well-earned reputations as being fair, brave and incorruptible, rare traits among Western lawmen.

Unlike many other peace officers, they even won respect from the outlaws they hunted. Bandit leader Bill Doolin reportedly refused to allow his men to gun Tilghman down from ambush, saying the officer was “too good a man to be shot down like that.” Hollywood’s numerous Western versions of the Three Musketeers in the 1930s and 1940s owed more to the careers of the Guardsmen than to the Dumas tale.

three-card monte gambling con game

Three-card monte is a classic card gyp, whose history in America goes back to the early 1800s. Every few decades it enjoys a big revival because a new crop of suckers has grown up. Since the late 1970s, practitioners of the trade have been flooding most big American cities. On almost any weekday as many as a half-dozen street games may be in progress at one time, for example, on New York’s fashionable West 57th Street from Fifth Avenue to Carnegie Hall, until determined block association campaigning got rid of them.

The idea in three-card monte is to guess which of three face-down cards is the red queen. It looks easy: the dealer shows the winning card, then he does a fast shuffle and places the three cards face down; pick a card and put your money on it. The average victim will watch for a time and invariably spot the correct card every time. Other players try and win at times and lose at other times. These losing efforts are particularly exasperating to the potential victim who recognizes the correct card. Generally speaking, all these early players, winners and losers, are shills for the operation who try to coax outsiders to play. When an outsider does play, the dealer becomes extremely adept at his art and lays the cards out in a way that not only prevents the sucker from spotting the queen but makes another card appear to be the queen.

There are endless variations to the game. A victim may suddenly notice the corner of the queen is bent so that it can be easily identified. When the victim bets, the quick-fingered dealer will first straighten that corner and fold a losing card instead. Sometimes a victim will spot the correct card and try to put down say $50. One of the shills will quickly lay down $100 on a losing card and the dealer will take his bet and tell the victim, “Sorry, only one card can be bet a game.” Should the victim protest his bet was down first, the other supposed bettor will insist his was. The dealer will throw up his hands in disgust and say, “I don’t know whose bet was down first, so all bets are off. New deal.”

“three strikes and you’re out” crime-reduction effort

After his daughter was killed by a five-time offender, Mike Reynolds was responsible for launching California’s 1994 “three strikes and you’re out” movement, which, at least in terms of convictions, quickly became the most successful of such programs. Under the standard description of the program, any career criminal who receives a third conviction does not simply get what that crime calls for as punishment but a life sentence, often with no opportunity for parole. As Reynolds explains the California statute, “What three strikes has done is drawn a line in the sand and said, ‘You’re at a point in your life where you’ve got to decide whether you’re going to be a criminal or a law-abiding citizen.’”

“THREE strikes and you’re out”

California was not the first state to adopt three strikes. Washington State voters overwhelmingly approved such a statute in 1993. Through fiscal 1996 (the last available figures in complete form), 121 career criminals were sentenced to life imprisonment in Washington. By contrast California has obtained 40,511 convictions since the law’s inception.

Yet five years after the first three-strikes law passed, its impact was disputed. True, many state attorneys general and other advocates insist three-strikes laws are reducing violent crime. According to Georgia attorney general Thurbert Baker, “I certainly believe there is a greater sense of security for law-abiding citizens in Georgia. They know these crimes are going to be dealt with severely and will happen less frequently because of how tough [such laws] are.” In fact the law is so popular in Georgia that the state has gone to a two-strikes version, leading some opponents of such statutes to say somewhat puckishly that obviously one-strike laws (or even no-strike laws) would be more effective.

Despite the popularity of three strikes with elected officials, law enforcement officers and voters, a debate has started to rage over whether such laws curb crime and if the programs are too costly to enforce. This opposition clearly runs the gamut from liberal to conservative opponents. They point out most states put such laws on the books and fail to enforce them aggressively. Indeed, some 15 states with laws on the books for three or four years have sentenced no more than six people under supposed three-strike rules.

Critics note the laws are enforced unevenly in enthusiastic California, and many critics, including dyed-in-the-wool hardline conservatives, are warning that the future price tag for enforcing strike laws could be very high.

On the matter of uneven enforcement, some district attorneys zealously apply the three-strikes law, while others use it very infrequently. In some jurisdictions, says Thomas Griffith, a law professor at the University of Southern California, any felony can be a third strike, including “something as small as stealing a pair of pants.”

Obviously, though, the matter of cost is sweeping to the forefront. While it takes about $20,000 to keep a prisoner for a year, costs rise two or three times as sentences lengthen. Because of the worsening health of older prisoners, the costs of keeping them soar. An even more serious problem is the estimate made in late 1998 that California’s jail system would run out of room in two years. A shortage of 70,000 beds will choke the system by 2006. By 2002, 25 percent of California prisoners will be second or third strikers. The estimated cost of the three-strike law will be an estimated $5.5 billion annually.

(As if to confirm these fears of rising costs, there is a concurrent move in many jurisdictions to lower penalties for nonviolent drug offenders. In New York in 1999 a movement grew for tempering the penalties under the state’s Rockefeller-era drug laws. The move drew strong support and leadership from conservative Republicans. While the claimed purpose for the change was fairer sentencing, it was noted the switch among Republicans came as the state’s prison costs climbed.)

An additional criticism made of three-strike laws is that they actually target the wrong offenders. In California, for instance, the average age of a three-strike inmate is 36, but it is well known that most crimes are committed at age 18. After that the number of offenses starts to dip and drops two-thirds by age 30. Critics insist the jails are being filled with people who are unlikely to pose a threat to the community. Exceptions to that rule are viewed by critics as little more than unimportant anecdotal evidence.

Just as in the late 1990s sentiment shifted in favor of treatment as a remedy to drug-use-related offense, foes of three-strike laws call the expenditure of money to enforce them wasteful. The Rand Corp., a California think tank, estimated that for every $1 million spent under the three-strikes law in the state about 60 serious crimes are prevented. This is considered to be way below what other methods could accomplish. Based on pilot programs, Rand concluded that offering cash and other incentives to troubled youths for them to graduate from high school would avert 250 serious crimes per $1 million. And spending $1 to provide counseling for parents of aggressive youths could prevent 150 serious crimes.

Other critics wonder how necessary three-strikes laws are since crime rates throughout the country started dropping before the first law was passed. Running for governor in California, Attorney General Dan Lungren made a centerpiece of his campaign his record on fighting crime and the aggressive use of three strikes. His opponents noted he never mentioned the drop in crime rates before the law went into effect. Seasoned political observers found the crime issue and three strikes was no longer working with voters. As one put it, “That dog won’t bite anymore.”

Even three-strikes proponents find flaws in the laws as passed and enforced, especially in California. David La Course, an activist who helped write the Washington law, says California's broad approach "has hurt the movement." At the same time, he criticizes other states for drafting laws so narrowly that they are "paper tigers" that can hardly be enforced.

Whatever the case, three strikes seemed to have faltered by 1999. At that time the last state to institute a three-strikes law was Alaska in 1996.

Tilghman, Bill (1854–1924) lawman

A two-fisted, fast-shooting lawman, Deputy Marshal Bill Tilghman was one of the most-respected law officers the West ever produced. He once brought in the noted badman Bill Doolin without firing a shot. Together with deputy marshals Chris Madsen and Heck Thomas, Tilghman formed what was popularly known as the Three Guardsmen, a trio of law officers that did more to clean up the Oklahoma badlands than any number of 50-man posses.

Born in Fort Dodge, Iowa on July 4, 1854, William M. Tilghman developed a quick draw but also learned that a man could sometimes use his fists faster than his gun. By the age of 23 he was proving that as a deputy in Dodge City under Sheriff Charlie Bassett. Tilghman, rather than Wyatt Earp, who later became town marshal, established—and enforced—the no-guns-in-Dodge rule. He did it by proving that he was better in a fistfight or a gunfight than any quick-tempered cowboy.

Tilghman held various lawman posts in Dodge, including that of chief of police during the late 1880s, and then became a federal deputy marshal. In 1890 he brought in Kid Donnor, a psychotic young killer who had terrorized the bad lands around the Wichita Mountains for two years, after tracking him for three months. It took him a month to catch up with John Braya, who had murdered an entire family west of Oklahoma City.

Tilghman's next assignment, with Madsen and Thomas, was to get the Doolin gang. While he helped arrest several of them, he earned a reputation for never killing unnecessarily. After shooting and almost killing one gang member, Bill Raidler, Tilghman nursed the outlaw until he was able to travel and then brought him in. While he stalked the Doolins, they knew he played fair and they did too. Once, he walked into a farmhouse where members of the gang, including their leader, were hiding. Several guns were aimed at Tilghman from behind drawn drapes, but Doolin would not let his men gun down the lawman, saying he was "too good a man" for a fate like that.

Tilghman eventually captured Doolin in Eureka Springs, Ark. Most Western lawmen would have shot Doolin first and then asked him to surrender, but Tilghman took him alive. Doolin was lodged in a wooden jail in Guthrie, from which he soon escaped. Later Heck Thomas caught up to the bandit and filled him with lead, perhaps after Doolin was already dead.

Tilghman became sheriff of Lincoln County, Oklahoma Territory in 1900 and chief of police in Oklahoma City in 1911. Three years later, he retired at the age of 60. In 1924 Gov. M. E. Trapp induced Tilghman to take up a badge again to clean up the oil-boom town of Cromwell. Tilghman, at the age of 70, accepted the assignment but it was to be a fatal one. After bringing a large measure of order to Cromwell in two months, he was shot in the back by a drunken Prohibition agent, and died without knowing what had happened to him.

Till, Emmett (1941–1955) murder victim

Following a rumor that he had whistled at a white woman, a 14-year old black youth named Emmett Till was kidnapped sometime around August 28, 1955 from his uncle's home in LeFlore County, Miss. On August 31 the youngster's body, tied in barbed wire, was fished from the Tallahatchie River. Two white men were eventually charged with the murder but were found not guilty by an all-white jury. Till's death inspired at least one of the protest songs of the civil rights movement during the early 1960s and was frequently cited by the leaders of the movement as symbolic of the double standard of American justice.

Tin Cup, Colorado lawless mining camp

It has been said that law and order developed in Western mining camps as bricks and stone began to be used for construction, giving such places a sense of stability. Tin Cup in Gunnison County, Colo., which remained a tent and shack town for all of its existence, certainly could be cited as supporting evidence. Law and order in Tin Cup was, at best, a sometime thing. One jest had it that Tin Cup pinned a badge on a marshal as a prelude to burying him. From 1881 to 1883 three marshals, Frank Emerson, Harry Rivers and Andy Jameson, were shot to death, and a fourth, Samuel Mickey, was shot at and cut up so often that the pressure of daily survival became too much for him and he finally had to be carted off to an insane asylum.

The only lawman to last was a Kansan named David Corsaut. Named marshal number five in 1883, he was famed for shooting “on suspicion.” Mining camp justice was violent but impatient. If the guilty man was found, he was quickly strung up; if the guilty man got away, the crime was as likely to be quickly forgotten.

A gambler hit town once and died in a fight at a gambling table, holding a poker hand in his left hand and a shooting iron in his right. The boys buried him that way and nobody worried about going after his killer. There was gold to be panned and mined and time was short. When the gold ran out, the tents came down, the shacks were deserted and a very crowded boot hill was left to the wind and the dust.

Tinker, Edward (?–1811) insurance swindler and murderer

The first captain of an American cargo ship known to have attempted insurance fraud by sinking his own vessel, Edward Tinker got caught up in his own plotting and finally had to resort to murder. Tinker sold off his cargo and then scuttled his schooner off Roanoke Island, Va., planning to claim the cargo had gone down with the ship. Two members of his crew, named Durand and Potts, readily joined his plot but a third, known as Edwards, expressed some trepidation. Tinker lured Edwards on a duck-hunting expedition and murdered him, weighting down the body with rocks and heaving it into the sea. The corpse, however, was carried back to shore by the tide, and Tinker, as the last person seen with the seaman, was arrested.

The captain then wrote a letter to his coconspirator Durand offering him money if he would testify that Potts had killed Edwards and had sunk the vessel earlier. Tinker explained to Durand that the worst that could happen to him if he was convicted of perjury was that a bit of his ear would be lopped off, the punishment for false swearing at the time. Durand, now terrified of Tinker’s plots, feared that if he refused, Tinker would approach Potts with a plan to put the blame on him. The worried seaman solved his dilemma by revealing the letter to the authorities, and the scheming Tinker was convicted of murder and hanged at Cateret, N.C. in September 1811.

tobacco Night Riders farmer terrorists

During the first decade of this century, hundreds of tobacco farmers in Kentucky and Tennessee turned to violence to try to break the monopolistic hold of the tobacco companies, climaxing in the Black Patch War of 1906–9.

In the early 1900s the farmers formed cooperatives to fight for better prices; those growers who refused to join the campaign had their crops and barns burned. In 1906 more direct action was taken, as armed, mounted Night Riders, also known as the Silent Brigade, swept into the market towns and burned down the tobacco companies’ warehouses in Elkton, Hopkinsville, Princeton and Russelville, Ky. Leaders of the farmers’ association denounced the terrorist acts, at least officially. Although numerous arrests were made, there were no convictions. The tobacco interests charged that judges and jurors acquitted the defendants because of threats or other forms of influence, while supporters of the farmers insisted the acquittals merely reflected the community’s backing of their actions.

Finally, thanks to heavy pressure from Kentucky Gov. Augustus Willson, several of the Night Riders were convicted and imprisoned, while others were successfully sued in the courts. Tainted by the criminal behavior of a number of their members, the cooperatives dissolved during the succeeding decade. Nevertheless, the tobacco firms increased their payments to the farmers.

Todd, Thelma (1906–1935) Hollywood actress and alleged murder victim

She was dubbed the “Vamping Vixen,” the “Hot Toddy,” and the “Ice Cream Blonde,” but she easily outdistanced this sort of Hollywood hype. Beautiful Thelma Todd was recognized as a sparkling comedienne who easily made the transition from silents to talking movies because of her genuine talents. Most remembered for her roles with the Marx Brothers in successful box office hits as Monkey Business and Horse Feathers, she also appeared with Buster Keaton, Laurel and Hardy, Bing Crosby, Cary Cooper, Joe E. Brown, and ZaSu Pitts, her closest female friend. In most of these appearances Thelma was regarded as the real draw. From 1926 to 1935 she appeared in an amazing 109 films, virtually all very successful. The saying was that many actors and directors were ready to kill to get her in their films.

Thelma had a most adoring legion of fans, a situation that made her rich beyond the hope of a young girl with limited acting training. Her road to Hollywood had been amazingly easy. She won a beauty contest as Miss Massachusetts, and a family friend showed pictures of her to Paramount producer Jesse Lasky, who sight unseen, offered her a contract. Thelma was sent to a studio acting school in Astoria, New York, and progressed so rapidly she was ready to move to the top in Hollywood. Her delightfully throaty voice in the talkies soon made her the darling of movie audiences.

When Thelma Todd, the striking heartthrob of the 1920s and '30s, died in her car under mysterious circumstances, the rumor mills never stopped, and murder theories about the case continued into the next century.

Extremely bright, Thelma often told friends she had to realize her fame would have to fade with age and that she had to set herself up for the future. One course she set out on was a half-interest, along with director and producer Roland West, in a swank Palisades roadhouse called “Thelma Todd’s Sidewalk Cafe,” which became a mecca for the rich and famous of the sun-and-beach-loving film colony. Some would later insist that the cafe was the reason for Thelma’s tragic fate, but that was just one theory among many.

On the evening of December 16, 1935, Thelma Todd’s body was found by her maid in her garage, set well atop the cliff above Thelma’s apartment, which was situated above the cafe.

The actress was slumped on the steering wheel of her Packard convertible with its top down. The car’s ignition was turned on. Like other sudden deaths that had upset the big studios in recent years, there was a vested interest by certain forces to see to it that there be no suggestion of foul play. But there were problems in advancing the theory that Thelma had committed suicide—especially since she was very much at the peak of her career. Her face was bloody and there was blood on the evening gown and mink coat she had worn to a late Saturday night party given in her honor at the Trocadero, one of Hollywood’s top nightspots. The blood seemed to raise the possibility that she had been batted about after being driven home by her limousine driver. That in turn raised the possibility that she had been beaten and placed in her car and the ignition turned on.

And there were other whispers. Thelma seemed to be having a secret affair with a very rich and powerful man from San Francisco. She told actress Ida Lupino, who was at the party, about him and said she expected to see him shortly, perhaps right after the party. Thelma inferred it was very, very important that she not reveal his identity, presumably as that would result in a very messy situation.

Then again there was the fact that Thelma did seem quite fearful recently, for a time hiring bodyguards and on some occasions she instructed her driver to pick up speed, fearing they were being followed. Thelma did mutter things about “eastern gangsters.” That element was not unknown in Hollywood. Lucky Luciano operating out of New York had set about targeting spots where the mob could establish secret gambling operations on an upper floor. The mob was very interested in Thelma’s cafe, but Thelma had refused them. Could she have been ordered killed by Luciano as an object lesson to owners of other choice spots so they would be less inclined to refuse similar offers?

A lot of criticism was placed on director West, who although he had his own apartment in the complex had moved in with Thelma. He had not attended the Trocadero affair and said later that he had jokingly warned if she wasn’t home by 2 A.M. he would lock her out. As a point of fact he did lock her out, and he claimed he never heard her come home. And even though he did not see her all day and night Sunday, he had not looked for her.

There were other loose ends. Thelma had had a terrible argument at the party with her ex-husband, talent agent Pat DeCicco, who had shown up with two starlets.

While all these factors were tossed into the mix, an inquest ruled that Thelma Todd had committed suicide, a finding with which Hollywood's brass was most comfortable. The film colony was at the time in its do-good phase, with all scandals deemed detrimental to the industry.

However, because of public opinion a second inquest was held before a grand jury. This time the verdict was that Thelma died "by carbon monoxide poisoning," leaving open that chance that she had not killed herself but had died accidentally because she was curled up in the convertible with the motor on to stay warm through the night. There did seem to be a hole in that theory since she could have curled up not in her open convertible but instead in the car right next to it, a new Lincoln sedan, which obviously would have provided much more warmth.

Then true Hollywood mania raged. In which car had Todd really died, and was her body transferred?

Again criticism centered on her housemate, director West, who insisted he never heard Thelma trying to get in—although neighbors insisted the actress had created a loud ruckus. Also, West failed to locate Thelma Sunday day or evening. West was the only one ever to pay a price in the tragedy. He could not shake off public suspicion and was never able to direct another movie.

In succeeding years the Thelma Todd story never died. Decades later theories are still being advanced, which say powerful forces protected the killer, utilizing perjured testimony and official corruption. Despite claims and counterclaims, it is now firmly established that the verdict on the Todd case still must reside in the "unsolved" files.

Tolson, Clyde A. (1900–1975) associate and friend of J. Edgar Hoover

Longtime assistant to FBI director J. Edgar Hoover, Clyde A. Tolson had served as confidential secretary to three secretaries of war before joining the bureau in 1928. He became Hoover's alter ego and was eventually named associate director of the agency. The two men, both bachelors, dressed alike in conservative suits, lunched and dined together almost daily, went on vacations together and regularly attended the races together. Hoover would start each day by picking up Tolson in his chauffeured, bullet-proof limousine on the way to work. Tolson called Hoover "Eddie," and some said he never took his eyes off the director in public. Not surprisingly, it was whispered that the two were homosexual lovers, charges that Hoover described as coming from "public rats," "guttersnipes" and "degenerate pseudo-intellectuals."

When Hoover died in 1972, he left virtually all his $551,500 estate to Tolson, a situation that reportedly caused considerable bad feelings in the FBI hierarchy. Tolson resigned from the agency two days after Hoover's death.

Ironically, the Hoover-Tolson relationship stories have lived on, even after Tolson's death in 1975. In 1979 author Truman Capote, asked to name for The Book of Lists 2 the persons whose lives he would have most wanted to live in past incarnations, listed Hoover and Tolson as one selection.

Tombs New York City prison

New York City's original prison was built in 1838 on marshland that had been filled in to provide work for the poor, who had threatened to riot and revolt following the business collapse of 1807–08. The draining and filling of the swamp took many years to complete. When it was finished, it covered an area bounded by Mulberry, Lafayette, White and Leonard streets. Most of the landfill was then occupied by the Criminal Courts Building and the Tombs Prison. The official name of the prison was the Halls of Justice, but it was popularly referred to as the Tombs because its design had been copied from that of an ancient mausoleum, which a Hoboken man, John L. Stevens, had illustrated and described in a book, Stevens' Travels, that he wrote after touring Egypt.

From the first, the Tombs was rocked by scandal. Conditions for the average prisoner were described as "harsh and bleak and cold and damp," and calls for the prison's closing appear to have started around 1850 (and were finally heeded about a half century later). However, the first public scandal at the Tombs was not over ill treatment of the many but because of tender treatment of the few. In 1841 a young playboy named John G. Colt was lodged there on a murder charge. Colt and his family knew all the right people. His brother was Samuel Colt, inventor of the Colt revolver and the Colt repeating rifle. Among John Colt's close friends were Washington Irving, James Fenimore Cooper and John Howard Payne, author of Home, Sweet Home. Therefore, it was not surprising that Colt received very special treatment even after being sentenced to death. Charles A. Dana, then a reporter working for the Tribune, wrote of Colt's cell life:

Let us take a stroll through Murderer's Row in the Tombs and glance in on homicide Colt. . . . As the keeper swings open the door of Colt's cell the odor of sweet flowers strikes you. It is no delusion, for there they are in a handsome vase upon the center table. That handsomely dressed little lady with the golden hair and the sorrowful face whom we passed on the stairs has just left them. Tomorrow they will be replaced by fresh ones.

The table itself is a pretty one; there is nothing handsomer in Washington Square. It is of exquisite workmanship, and is covered with a dainty cloth. In a gilt cage hanging against the wall is a canary. . . . A pretty set of swinging shelves, suspended by silken cords, catches the eye. Here are to be found the latest novel, the freshest magazine. Pictures here and there break up the dull wall into gorgeous color. You tread on roses, for the cold stones are concealed by rare Kidderminster.

And Colt, how is with him? . . . In a patent extension chair he lolls smoking an aromatic Havana. . . . He has on an elegant dress-gown, faced with cherry colored silk, and his feet are encased in delicately worked slippers. His clothes are neat and up in style to the latest fashion plate. To one side of him is his bed, a miracle of comfort.

When he is tired of reading or smoking or sleeping he takes a stroll in the yard. His toilet takes considerable time. Finally he appears, booted and gloved. He may have his seal-skin coat on, or he may appear in a light autumn affair of exquisite cut and softest tint. In his hand is a gold-headed switch, which he carelessly twirls during his promenade.

Then comes his lunch; not cooked in the Tombs, but brought in from a hotel. It consists of a variety of dishes—quail on toast, game pates, reed birds, fowl, vegetables, coffee, cognac. Then it is back again to his easy chair with book and cigar.

The public uproar over that revelation was nothing compared to the one that came about as the result of a fire in the Tombs. In the confusion during the fire Colt—or someone else—was found lying on his bed with a knife through his heart. The official verdict was that Colt had committed suicide. Several prisoners had escaped during the fire, and most people believed Colt had too, a theory that facts uncovered afterward seemed to confirm. The body on the bed probably had been a stand-in. The public demanded that the prison's top personnel be replaced and, later, that the Tombs be shut down.

Escapes from the Tombs were common in subsequent years and exposés of mistreatment of minor prisoners appeared regularly. Finally, a new Tombs was built in 1902. Through the years it too was the subject of a number of newspaper exposés, again because of its inhuman living conditions and its security problems. Finally, in 1974 the second Tombs was closed after a federal judge held it to be uninhabitable.

Tombstone, Arizona Territory

The "town too tough to die" was born when a grizzled long-haired prospector named Ed Schieffelin found silver ore on the borders of the Grand Canyon in 1877. He was alone in Apache country when military scouts from Fort Huachuca ran across him. "Whaddya doin' here?" a soldier asked. "Prospectin'," answered Schieffelin. The soldier laughed and said, "All you'll ever find in them hills is your tombstone." So Schieffelin named his claim Tombstone, and a town grew out of the bedrock, one that was to be described as "hell's last wide open resort under the western sky."

By 1881, the population of Tombstone had grown to 10,000, and it had become a mecca not only for miners but for gamblers, rustlers, desperadoes and killers of all stripes. Twice, President Chester A. Arthur sent special messages to Congress about the brutal conditions there and in 1882 he was forced to threaten the town with martial law. No other town in the West could claim a citizenry comparable to the roll of inhabitants—good and bad—who made Tombstone the town too tough to die. Over the years it was populated by the Earps, the McLowerys, the Clantons, Doc Holliday, Frank Leslie, Luke Short, Johnny Ringo, John Clum, Curly Bill Brocius, Sheriff John H. Slaughter, Deputy Sheriff Billy Breakenridge, Sheriff John Behan, John Heath, Pony Deal, Mike Kileen and Bat Masterson.

Tombstone didn't die from an excess of violence but because, after something like $30 million had been stripped from its bountiful hills, the veins ran out and the population faded away. Today there are 1,200, most devoted to keeping the town alive as a tourist attraction.

Tombstone Epitaph newspaper

Known as the "law-and-order" newspaper of Tombstone, the Epitaph founded in 1880 by a former Indian agent named John Clum, certainly played an important role in ridding Tombstone, Arizona Territory of the lawless cowboy element. But whether this opposition to the cowboys represented a real stand for law-and-order or an alliance with the other lawless element in the town, the gambling interests, remains an open question. In any event, Clum's Epitaph could be counted on to support Wyatt Earp in all matters. As a newspaper in one of the Old West's most violent towns, the Epitaph gave the most comprehensive coverage to holdups, rustlings, gunfights and murders of any publication of its era. However, given Tombstone's bustling activity, it became necessary for the paper to file all minor killings, stabbings, robberies and brawls in a daily catch-all column entitled "Death's Doings."

Publisher Clum sold his interest in 1882, apparently feeling it wise to leave town about the same time the Earp brothers left, not entirely willingly. The Epitaph continued publishing and still appears today in what is now the tourist town of Tombstone.

Tombstone Nugget newspaper

Just as the Tombstone Epitaph represented the Earp forces in Tombstone, the Nugget, started in 1879, had a strong "cowboy" bias. While, for instance, the Epitaph described the gunfight at the O.K. Corral as a fair match between the Earps and the Clantons, the Nugget reported it as a case of outright murder. Thus, readers in Tombstone could pick sides between the newspapers, whose locations across the street from each other were appropriate for their typesetting shoot-outs. The Nugget died in May 1882, the beginning of the end of the cowboy era.

The origins of the tongs date back roughly 2,000 years. In ancient China the tongs were bandit or rebel organizations. When first imported into the United States, they served as mutual aid societies. Unfortunately, aiding someone meant attacking someone else and the result was the great tong wars in American cities.

From about the 1860s more than 30 tongs appeared and prospered along the West Coast. San Francisco's Chinatown supported six great tongs. As the Chinese migrated east so did the tongs. Almost all these organizations derived their main incomes from such illegal enterprises as opium dens, gambling, smuggling of aliens, especially slave girls, and prostitution. The tongs tended to concentrate on the same illegal activities, making conflict inevitable. This gave rise to numerous small strong-arm gangs, or enforcers, known as high-binder societies, which were composed of hit men available for hire to tongs that wanted the competition eliminated. The Chinese called these fighting men boo how doy and the American newspapers dubbed them hatchet men, in honor of their favorite weapon. The tong wars raged on and off for more than 50 years, occasionally over the loss of face but far more often over the loss of profits. Great wars were fought at different times between the tongs, although tongs not infrequently changed from one side to the other. It made no matter, skulls were still split and pitched battles fought, while the white man's law proved incapable of stopping them.

When the tong wars got completely out of hand, white society tried unique tactics to restore the peace. After the great tong warrior Fung Jing Toy, better known as Little Pete, was assassinated in San Francisco in 1897, his tong, the Sum Yops, was decimated by the Sue Yops. Finally, some white Americans appealed to the emperor of China, Kwang Hsu, for help, and he called in the great Chinese statesman Li Hung Chang. "The matter has been attended to," Li Hung Chang reported in due course. "I have cast into prison all relatives of the Sue Yops in China, and have cabled to California that their heads will be chopped off if another Sum Yop is killed in San Francisco." Suddenly, one of the greatest tong wars ended. The Sue Yops and the Sum Yops signed a peace treaty that was never violated.

By 1922 the San Francisco Police Department had learned how to apply pressure to the Chinese community as a whole and in that year the presidents of the six great tongs put their signatures on a treaty of lasting peace.

As fierce as the San Francisco tong wars were, they were equaled in intensity and bloodshed by numerous battles in New York City, especially the Hip Sings and On Leongs. One war in 1909–10 over the murder of a beautiful slave girl called Bow Kum, or Little Sweet Flower, resulted in 350 casualties. Lesser wars occurred in Boston and Chicago.

Toppan, Jane (1857–1938) serial killer

As a mass murderer or murderess, nurse Jane Toppan has never received the recognition which she deserved, although she may well have killed 100 victims. One observer who did give her an appropriate amount of attention was Ellery Sedgwick, the distinguished editor of the Atlantic Monthly, who protested: "When it comes to evaluating the histories of famous murderers, Jane Toppan has never received proper recognition.

Without the slightest doubt, she outranks both Bluebeard and Jack the Ripper.” Sedgwick’s interest in Toppan stemmed from the fact that he had been nursed by her through a siege of pneumonia and allowed to live. Many other of her patients did not survive her ministrations.

Nurse Toppan’s poor record with patients did not become apparent for about 15 years, since at the time it was considered normal for sick people to die. In fact, Toppan had a reputation among doctors around Lowell, Mass. as one of the community’s finest and most capable nurses. She was also for a period head nurse at Massachusetts General Hospital until administrators discovered her certificate was forged and that she was not even a graduate nurse.

Jane Toppan poisoned numerous patients with her own recipe of morphine and atropin, a mixture that prevented doctors from suspecting morphine poisoning because instead of the victim’s eye pupils being contracted, as happens with morphine, they would be dilated. Her confession, made after she had taken poison herself in a futile suicide attempt, read: “Everybody trusted me. It was so easy. I felt strange when I watched them die. I was all excited and my blood seemed to sweep madly through my veins. It was the only pleasure I had.”

The first step in her usual ritual was to help build up the patient so that the doctor would be encouraged. Then once the physician stopped making regular visits, she would sit at the patient’s bedside and feed him or her a little of the poison brew, increasing the dosage each day. The patient’s breath would grow short and painful. Then his body would be seized with convulsions, then become lax, then chill and then go into convulsions again. As the climax approached and the patient neared death, Jane would become more and more excited. “It wasn’t my fault,” she later said. “I had to do it. They hadn’t done anything to me and I gained nothing from their deaths except the excitement of watching them die. I couldn’t resist doing it.”

Finally traced through some prescriptions she had forged to purchase the necessary ingredients for her poison, Toppan attempted suicide but was saved by quick medical attention. However, she was told that she was dying and, in that belief, made her confession:

Yes, I killed them. I’m going to die and I can’t face my Maker with this on my conscience. I killed Mattie. Then I killed Annie. I told her father it was suicide. It was poison. I killed Mr. Davis. And I killed Mrs. Mary Gibbs. . . . Oh, I killed so many of them.

In all, she rattled off the names of 31 victims, whose poisonings were later confirmed. The relatives of several dozen others whom she had nursed until their death refused permission to have autopsies performed, so that it was never determined how many of them were also her victims, although the conventional wisdom put the figure at about 100. At Toppan’s trial her pugnacious defense lawyers would concede only 11 murders, but such disclaimers meant little, especially when the defendant told a horrified courtroom, “This is my ambition—to have killed more people—more helpless people—than any man or woman has ever killed.”

Finally, the prosecution agreed to accept a plea of not guilty by reason of insanity when the defense consented to a stipulation that no request for parole would ever be made, even if she was pronounced sane at some future time. On June 23, 1902 Jane Toppan was sent to the State Hospital at Taunton, Mass. for the remainder of her natural life. That proved to be another 36 years. She died there in 1938 at the age of 81.

Torrio, John (1882–1957) underworld “brain” and Capone mentor

Everyone who ever worked with Johnny Torrio called him the Brain. He had taught Al Capone all he ever knew, and he was sought out for advice by Lucky Luciano. In time, the whole underworld would refer to him by that nickname, just as in his youth he was called Terrible Johnny. Both sobriquets were well deserved.

Born in Sicily in 1882 and brought to New York at the age of two, Torrio grew up on the rough Lower East Side. While he was still in his teens, he was a subchief of Paul Kelly’s huge Five Points gang, one of the city’s two most powerful (the other being the Eastmans), and a head of a subgang, the James Streeters. Torrio’s name in that period never made a police blotter but his reputation in the underworld grew. He was cold, cruel and cunning, and when he fought, he used his fists, feet, knives and guns. Although small, he was mean and tough enough to be a bouncer at Nigger Mike’s on Pell Street, one of the wildest joints in Manhattan (coincidentally, Irving Berlin got his start there as a singing waiter).

By 1912 the Bowery no longer drew the money it once did and Torrio opened a bar and brothel for the sailor trade in the even tougher Brooklyn Navy Yard district. Now and then he hired one of his James Street gang youngsters, a big, coarse hoodlum named Al Capone, as a strong-arm man. Torrio, not satisfied with just the whore business began handling other enterprises from hijacking to narcotics. He talked about how crime should and could be made into a big business. He had developed finesse and vision, and Terrible Johnny was being replaced by the Brain.

In 1915, when he was 33, Torrio got an offer from Big Jim Colosimo, his uncle by marriage and the biggest whoremaster in Chicago, to come out and help him with his business. He took over running Big Jim’s flesh-peddling joints, everything from such landmarks as the House of All Nations to the low-cost Bedbug Row joints. Late in 1919 Torrio sent for Capone, figuring he needed Al’s muscle for what he had in mind—bootlegging. The only problem was that Big Jim wasn’t interested, a situation that steamed Torrio. Hadn’t he reorganized the whole business and increased the net enormously? Big Jim nodded, but that was the problem. Torrio had made him so much money, Colosimo couldn’t see the need for any more.

Torrio realized that Colosimo was a drag on the organization and had to go, but neither he nor Capone could handle the job without being suspected. Another old buddy from Brooklyn, Johnny Yale, was brought in to assassinate Colosimo. With Big Jim erased, Torrio stepped in, and anyone who objected had to face Capone. Torrio set about creating a new crime empire. He dreamed of combining all the Chicago gangs under one umbrella and giving each its own area to milk without any competition. He called in the leaders of the other gangs: the Italian gangs, the North Side Irish, the South Side Poles. They’d all make millions and actually live to enjoy their fortunes, Torrio told them. Then he dropped his voice ever so slightly and said that if they didn’t join the new syndicate, he would kill them, sooner or later.

These gang leaders were hard men, but most of them were persuaded, perhaps with a little force tossed in. Some, especially the Irish gangs, said they would but didn’t. War soon developed with the tough North Siders, headed by Dion O’Banion. The Italian Genna gang was a tribulation as well, its members falling one by one. But the big roadblock was O’Banion. Then the Irishman called Torrio; he wished to end the war. In fact, he was getting out completely and wanted to sell the Sieben Brewery. Torrio jumped at the chance. A half-million dollars was a reasonable price to get rid of the murderous O’Banion. A week after the deal was closed, federal agents raided the brewery, and Torrio realized he had been taken. O’Banion had inside information on the raid and stuck Torrio with the loss.

For one of the few times in his life, Torrio lost his cool. He raged around his office brandishing a gun and screaming he’d see O’Banion in hell. Torrio kept his word. Frank Yale was sent for again. Yale and two other hoods, Albert Anselmi and John Scalise, walked into O’Banion’s flower shop, which he ran as a legitimate sideline, to order flowers for an underworld funeral. As Yale shook hands with O’Banion, Anselmi and Scalise drew guns and shot the Irishman to death.

Capone was ecstatic; Torrio was not. He knew the gang wars would now intensify. O’Banion’s men would want vengeance, and the longer they held out, the more others would think of rebelling. Hymie Weiss, one of O’Banion’s top aides, tried to assassinate Torrio while the latter was riding in his limousine. The chauffeur and Torrio’s dog were killed, but all Johnny got were two bullet holes in his gray fedora.

Torrio raced to kill Weiss before he could mount another assassination attempt, but Hymie stayed out of sight. On January 24, 1925, Torrio was ambushed in front of his apartment house. He was hit with a shotgun blast and then another gunman pumped four slugs into him, in his chest, arm and stomach. Torrio hovered between life and death for 10 days while an army of 30 hoods, captained by Capone, threw a security net around the hospital where he was staying.

As Torrio recovered, he had time to take stock of his situation. He was 43 years old, had managed to stay alive for five years at the top of the Chicago gangland hierarchy, no small accomplishment, and he was a millionaire. Torrio decided to get out, telling Capone: “It’s all yours, Al. I’ve retired.”

Torrio walked away from the greatest crime setup ever established, one that allowed him to say, “I own the police force.” The former chairman of the board took off to laze under the Mediterranean sun for a while and then retired in Brooklyn. No one ever knew if he really had retired completely. Luciano and the emerging national crime syndicate often asked him for advice, as did Capone. It is known that his counsel was sought before the decision was made to hit Dutch Schultz because of his idiotic plan to assassinate prosecutor Thomas E. Dewey. There were reports that some Murder, Inc. hits also required his approval. Torrio denied it all and said he just wanted to die in bed.

Some gangsters have died in barbershop chairs. Johnny Torrio, at age 75, had a heart attack in one in April 1957, an unlikely end for one who had ruled from the center of a violent world.

Touhy, Roger “Terrible” (1898–1959) bootlegging king
A powerful bootlegging king in the greater Chicago area whom the Capone mob took years to dislodge, Roger Touhy in some respects resembled a businessman with a keen appreciation of the value of strong public relations. As far as the entire underworld was concerned, the Terrible Touhys’ hold on the Chicago suburban area of Des Plaines was so complete and backed with such firepower as to be unchallengeable. Despite press coverage that often portrayed him and his gang as among the most vicious in the Midwest, the fact is that Touhy was never more than a middle-class type bootlegger who employed no more muscle than was necessary to see that all the saloons and speakeasies in his area bought and used Touhy beer and booze exclusively.

Touhy produced a superior beer, and his kegs, made at his own cooperage, were leak-proof, a fine selling point at the time. Touhy, as much as Johnny Torrio and Al Capone, realized that the way to achieve preeminence in a criminal endeavor was to corrupt the local politicians and police, and he was a past master of the art. In addition to providing the customary cash payoffs Touhy rewarded the local politicians and police brass with bottled beer brewed especially for them and often bearing their own personal labels. Kinky-haired, beady-eyed and with a hawklike face, Touhy had the perfect appearance for toughness. There is considerable evidence that Al Capone personally feared him, and he is said to have been the only gangster who ever made Al back down in a confrontation. Touhy had sold the Capone mob 800 barrels of his superior brew at a special price of only $37.50 a barrel (it cost him $4.50 to $5.50 a barrel to produce), and as was his habit, Capone tried to beat down the price some $1,900 by claiming 50 of the barrels had leaks. Touhy put on his famed hard stare and said firmly, “Don’t chisel me, Al.” Capone paid in full.

Roger was the leader of the Terrible Touhys, a family of six brothers who entered a life of crime after starting out in respectable circumstances. Their father was a Chicago policeman, and many of their playmates on the West Side were later to become police officers. In the early 1920s Roger Touhy went into the trucking business “strictly legit”—until the revenues proved insufficient. Touhy then started filling the trucks with beer, and profits soared.

Touhy took control of the Des Plaines area in the northwest section of Cook County. Since he filled a vital need, he was far from frowned upon. Her further solidified his popularity with the local citizens by keeping brothels out of the area. Whenever a group of mobsters attempted to open a roadside whorehouse, Touhy would relieve the local police of the need to handle the situation, sending in his own toughs to wreck the place. Even when Capone personally noted that Des Plaines was “virgin territory for whorehouses,” Touhy’s answer was his typical hard-eyed stare, which convinced Capone to drop his plans.

Touhy’s headquarters always had the appearance of an armed camp. When rivals made rumblings about moving in, Touhy would invite them for a visit, and they invariably would gawk at walls lined with submachine guns. Little did such visitors know that the arsenal had been borrowed from cooperative local police just for the occasion. While a conference was being staged, one Touhy underling after another would march in and receive orders to “bump off” someone. Touhy’s visitors would be suitably impressed and leave with the overwhelming conviction that war with the Touhys was a foolhardy undertaking. At various times two of Capone’s gunners, Frank Nitti and Murray “The Camel” Humphreys, returned from the Touhy base thoroughly shaken and convinced that the Capones could not hope to handle the Touhys.

None of this prevented the Capone mob from continuing its efforts to take over, however, even when Big Al was sent to prison. Having ruled out direct action, the mob is believed to have used another favorite method to get rid of a problem—tricking the law into doing it for them. First, Touhy and several of his gang were arrested for the kidnaping of William Hamm, Jr. The FBI insisted it had a strong case against Touhy, but a jury thought differently, finding him not guilty. Later, an embarrassed FBI switched the charge to the actual perpetrators, the Barker-Karpis gang.

Then FBI agents arrested Touhy for the alleged 1933 kidnaping of Jake “the Barber” Factor, an international con man with ties to the Capone mob, choosing in the process to ignore word from the underworld grapevine that the abduction had been a put-up job masterminded by Factor and the Capone mob. In what would prove to be a terrible blot on a remarkable career, Melvin Purvis, the FBI special agent who later captured John Dillinger, among others, proclaimed the arrest of Touhy in the Factor case as a hallmark of detection. “This case,” he said, “holds a particular interest for me because it represents a triumph of deductive detective work. We assumed from the start, with no material evidence, that the Touhy gang was responsible for the crime.”

After the first trial ended in a hung jury, Touhy was convicted in a second trial and sentenced to 99 years in Joliet; he was led from court crying frame-up. The Capone mob moved instantly into Des Plaines.”

In 1942 Touhy broke out of prison but was retaken in a short time and given an additional sentence of 199 years.

He continued to protest his innocence, a claim that several newspapermen took up, and in the 1950s he won a rehearing on his original conviction. After an intensive 36-day inquiry, Judge John H. Barnes ruled that Factor had never been kidnaped but had disappeared “of his own connivance.” The judge went on to attack many key parties in the case, including the FBI, the Chicago police, the state’s attorney and the Capone mob. He further noted that despite the FBI’s classification of Touhy as a major criminal, he had never been listed by the Chicago Crime Commission on its roster of public enemies. Furthermore, the judge noted, Touhy had never even been linked to a capital case.

In 1959, after almost a quarter of a century behind bars for a crime that had never happened, Touhy was released. He collaborated on a book about his life entitled The Stolen Years. It was a quick job and for good reason. Twenty-three days after his release, Touhy was gunned down on a Chicago street. As he lay dying the former gangster muttered: “I’ve been expecting it. The bastards never forget.”

It was an open secret in the underworld that the killing had been carried out by Murray “the Camel” Humphreys. Six months after the Touhy murder, Humphreys bought 400 shares of First National Life Insurance Co. stock at $20 a share from John Factor, Touhy’s old nemesis. Eight months later, Humphreys sold the shares back to Factor for $125 a share, realizing a profit of $42,000 in capital gains. The Internal Revenue Service later moved to declare this sum income for services rendered, making the profits subject to straight income tax.

This was not the only unusual happening following Touhy’s murder. Early in 1960, a few months after the slaying, retired FBI man Purvis committed suicide.

town-site fraud 19th-century swindle

One of the most prevalent rackets of the 19th century was the western town-site fraud, whereby gullible easterners were swindled by land sharks into investing their money in property glowingly described in phony prospectuses.

Typical was the Nininger swindle. The city of Nininger, Minnesota Territory in the 1850s, as depicted on large and beautifully engraved maps printed by one Ingenuous Doemly, was a well-built metropolis expected in due course to house some 10,000 people. It had a magnificent courthouse, no less than five churches and was jammed with warehouses and stores to service the surrounding area. Packet companies kept the levee loaded with freight. Here truly was a growth area in God’s Country if ever there was one. And to still any remaining doubts, one only had to peruse the Nininger Daily Bugle. Of all the phony attributes of Nininger, at least the Daily Bugle did actually exist, although it appeared weekly or biweekly or triweekly depending on how energetic its publisher was at any particular moment. The paper was loaded with local advertising—dry goods stores, hardware stores, groceries, millinery shops, blacksmith shops, shoe stores, all obviously thriving. Each issue carried accounts of a new store opening, complete with a total of its receipts for the day. It was very impressive fiction. As a contemporary account put it: “Every name and every business was fictitious, coined in the fertile brain of this chief of all promoters. It was enough to deceive the very elect—and it did. When the Eastern man read that there were six or eight lots, lying just west of Smith & Jones’s drygoods store, on West Prairie Street, that could be had at a thousand dollars per lot if taken quickly, and they were well worth twice that money on account of the advantageous situation, they were snapped up as a toad snaps flies on a summer day.” In fact, some plain prairie land two miles from the river to which the anonymous promoters had not even bothered to obtain title, went for as high as $10,000 per acre. “If the editor or the proprietor had been found in Nininger in the following spring when the dupes began to appear, one or two of the jack oaks with which the city lots were plentifully clothed would have borne a larger fruit than acorns.

Even the printer who set the type was forced to flee for his life.”

An even more tragic swindle was the so-called Rolling Stone colony, also in Minnesota Territory. When some 400 purchasers, mostly from New York, arrived in Rolling Stone in the spring of 1852, they expected to find a thriving metropolis with library, lecture hall, a large greenhouse, a hotel, a large warehouse and a fine dock. That was how they had described the area to steamboat officers, who said they had never heard of such a place. The colonists, however, had produced maps supplied them by one William Haddock and from the maps the boatmen had pinpointed the location some three miles above Wabasha Prairie, on Sioux Indian land. Having insisted on being put ashore there, the colonists built sod houses for themselves or burrowed shelters in the riverbanks, but sickness came and many died through the summer and autumn. With the onset of winter, more died and the area was abandoned.

Tracy, Harry (1876?–1902) desperado and murderer

In 1902 virtually the whole country went, as one editorialist put it, “wild about Harry.” Harry was Harry Tracy, desperado, Hole in the Wall outlaw, bank robber, train robber, murderer and escapee. When he was finally shot down in 1902, after having killed eight men in a bloody chase across Washington and Oregon, his coffin was torn to pieces by avid souvenir hunters. His funeral drew a mob that was to rival Rudolph Valentino’s in ardor. Tracy was a national hero. An editorial writer for the New York World carried this “wild about Harry” adulation to an extreme, writing of him: “This bad man who single-handed has for 30 days ‘stood off’ the State of Washington, its sheriffs, posses and bloodhounds, is undoubtedly a captain of industry—in his peculiar branch of it deserving a badge for superior criminal courage, something corresponding to the Victoria Cross or the Congressional Medal.”

Despite such raves, Harry Tracy really was a rotten character. He most likely was born sometime around 1876, possibly in Pittsville, Wis. or Poughkeepsie, N.Y. It is known that he spent his younger days in Boston where he so intimidated policemen that they refused to attempt to arrest him single-handedly, or, as the joke went, without police protection. In the mid-1890s Tracy headed west, pulled a number of robberies and went to prison for burglary in Utah. In 1897 he escaped with another prisoner and joined the Wild Bunch at one of the famous outlaw hideouts, Brown’s Hole. The boys welcomed Harry, but they soon changed their minds. He was surly, sullen and tight-lipped and readily exhibited a murderous nature. Even the tough men in the Hole made a point of avoiding him.

Tracy rode for a time with Butch Cassidy and the Wild Bunch and was sometimes called the Mad Dog of the Bunch, but he preferred to team up with the more ruthless killers in the Hole. He was apprehended a couple of times for murder, but on each occasion, while authorities in Colorado, Utah and Wyoming argued about who should have custody of him, he escaped, adding to his legend as a great escapee. After Tracy and a convict named Dave Merrill broke out of prison in Oregon, he married Merrill’s sister. In their escape the pair had shot two guards to death and used two wounded ones as shields to get across a bridge outside the prison. Then Tracy finished off one of the guards but ignored the other, who played dead.

Tracy and Merrill engaged in a number of petty crimes to raise money and then pulled a bank robbery. On the run, they hid out in a barn near Puget Sound, where Harry came across a story in a newspaper that reported Merrill had once informed on him in an effort to get a lighter sentence, an incident Tracy had been unaware of. He laid down the newspaper, reached over and choked his partner in crime to death.

In a fishing village, Tracy commandeered a motor launch at gunpoint and ordered the captain to take him to Seattle. On the way he told the seaman at the helm to pass close to McNeil Island Penitentiary which stood out in the Sound, because “I want to pick a few guards off the wall.”

Tracy thought better of that when he realized the guards would likely shoot back. In Seattle, Harry tied up the captain and his crew and walked inland, away from the city. He encountered a 21-man posse during a rainstorm and fought them to a standstill, escaping after killing a deputy sheriff and wounding three other pursuers.

Over the next several days Tracy happened on several young ladies who willingly provided him with food and a place to hide, apparently finding more reasons to be wild about Harry than those mentioned by the newspapers. He forced his way into the farmhouse of Mrs. R. H. Van Horn and made her cook him a meal, warning her politely to keep silent and make no outcry.

“I will today—but not tomorrow,” she said.

When a butcher boy made a delivery, the woman managed to whisper “Tracy,” and the boy notified the law. As Harry slipped out of the house that night and mounted a wagon, a posse closed in on him. Tracy jumped off the wagon firing with uncanny accuracy. He killed three men, two with shots in the brain and another with a slug in the heart, and slipped away in the confused gunfire.

The hunt for Tracy continued through July and into August 1902, with the gunman several times getting the best of posses. On August 5 lawmen learned Tracy was hiding at the Eddy Ranch near Davenport, Wash. and flushed him out of a barn there. Shooting as he ran, Tracy was hit in the leg by a chance rifle shot. He hobbled 75 yards to the edge of a wheat field. Bleeding profusely, he hid behind a rock and exchanged volley after volley with the lawmen. Shortly before night fell, a bullet tore into his thigh. The posse formed a cordon around the field to make sure he wouldn't slip out in the darkness. It was a needless precaution; Tracy couldn't move. As dawn was breaking, Harry raised his gun to his head and pulled the trigger. The lawmen waited until full daylight before carefully approaching. They found Harry Tracy dead.

Trafficante, Santo (1914–1987) Mafia leader

One of the most shadowy but certainly one of the most powerful leaders in the Mafia and the national crime syndicate, Santo Trafficante was the underworld boss of Tampa, Fla. and long regarded to be deeply involved in many of organized crime's endeavors, including gambling and narcotics. At one time he was overlord of the mob-owned casinos in pre-Castro Cuba. Because of his eminence in the Mafia and his longtime close association with Meyer Lansky, it was often said that no important underworld event takes place without Trafficante's knowledge or approval. Accordingly, he was reportedly consulted before Carmine Galante was murdered in 1979.

Any plan by the CIA to utilize the underworld to assassinate Fidel Castro had to have involved Trafficante. Under pressure of a court order granting him immunity from prosecution for anything he might say but threatening him with contempt if he didn't talk, Trafficante admitted to a congressional committee in 1975 that he had recruited other mobsters, such as John Roselli, in the early 1960s to carry out assassination attempts on Castro's life. "It was like in World War II," he said. "They tell you to go to the draft board and sign up. Well, I signed up." Of course, Trafficante had a grudge against Castro for shutting down the casinos in 1959. According to the mobster, he and his fellow underworld conspirators considered "poison, planes, tanks. I'm telling you, they talked about everything." Eventually, they settled on poison pills, but that plot failed.

It has long been a theory among many researchers looking into the assassination of John F. Kennedy that the CIA-Trafficante efforts to kill Castro may have triggered a Castro retaliation against the president.

In 1978 Trafficante testified before a House assassination committee looking into the Kennedy murder. The committee was especially interested in a sworn statement made by Cuban exile leader Jose Aleman to committee investigators that months before the Kennedy assassination Trafficante had told him, "Kennedy's gonna get hit." However, in public testimony, Aleman, admitting he was fearful of Trafficante's wrath, remembered the matter differently. What the mobster probably meant, Aleman testified, was that Kennedy would be hit by Republican votes in 1964—not bullets. Trafficante denied he had made the comment. Trafficante glided through the prose easily and remained until his death in 1987 of a heart ailment a Mafia boss suspected of much but convicted of little.

train robberies

Train robbing is a particularly American crime. While train robberies have occurred in many other countries, the United States provided far and away the most favorable ground for the crime, with its vast open areas along railroad rights-of-way, which gave the thieves ample opportunity to escape without being seen by witnesses.

The first reported train robbery of any magnitude occurred in 1866 between New York and New Haven when an Adams Express car on a New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad train was looted of $700,000. The first actual holdup of a train in the United States, and perhaps the world, was pulled the same year by the Reno gang near Seymour, Ind., where they stopped and boarded an Ohio and Mississippi Railroad train and robbed $10,000 from the express car. They tried to break open the safe but were forced to give up. News of the Renos' deed had an electrifying effect; no one had ever thought of holding up a train before but now an epidemic of train robberies quickly broke out. Other bandits held up a train in Indiana and seized about $8,000. Jealous of their reputation and enraged by their imitators, the Renos organized an outlaw posse, captured two of their rivals and turned them in.

Train robbing became a big business from coast to coast. In the South there were the Farrington brothers and in the Midwest the much-storied James gang. The latter robbed many trains but never came close to equaling the Renos' biggest job, pulled on May 22, 1868, when they stole $96,000 from a train near Marshfield, Ind. In the East the Tenth Avenue Gang preyed on trains even within the city limits of New York. In the Far West there was the Jack Davis gang and Butch Cassidy and the Wild Bunch. In California, Chris Evans, the Sontag brothers and the California Outlaws carried on a private war with the Southern Pacific. Train robbers were frequently lynched, so often, in fact, that some observers have suggested these actions were encouraged by agents of the railroads who were determined to wipe out the crime by dispensing quick, if extralegal, justice.

The last of the train robbers can't be named in an absolute sense as isolated crimes have continued well into this century, but perhaps the last to rob trains on a regular basis was Old Bill Miner. His holdup days ran from the Civil War until 1911, when he was caught in a Georgia swamp after leading a five-man gang on a holdup that netted $3,500 from the Southern Railroad Express near White Sulphur. "I'm getting too old for this sort of thing," he told his captors. The truth was that technology more than the aging of the old-time train robbers was making the crime much more difficult. Trains were faster, news of robberies clicked over the telegraph wires and swift cars could hasten pursuit across a much more populated landscape.

One of the last major American train holdups occurred in November 1935, when a gang headed by public enemy Alvin "Creepy" Karpis, a leader of the Barker-Karpis gang, robbed a train at Garrettsville, Ohio of $34,000. The loot was much smaller than Karpis had expected, but the robbery had its compensations. As he wrote later: "I thought of the great bandits of the old West, the James brothers, the Dalton boys, and all the rest of them. They knocked over trains, and I was going to pull the same stunt." Karpis also admitted a contributing motive was his belief that resurrecting the crime would give FBI director J. Edgar Hoover fits. It did.

transportation exportation of criminals to America

While it is a common belief that the American colonies were populated by persons fleeing political or religious persecution in Europe, the fact is they were peopled as much by the dregs of English jails. The British crown looked upon the American colonies as a convenient dumping ground for criminals and the solution to the English crime problem. During the last four decades of the 17th century, almost 5,000 convicts were transported to America. During the next century the traffic increased enormously; from 1745 to 1775 almost 9,000 convicts were landed in just one port, Annapolis, Md. The local populace could have hardly been pleased when out of one shipment of 26 prisoners, five were convicted murderers.

In Virginia the local citizenry fought back by inspecting incoming female prisoners, and if they had become pregnant on the ship crossing, they were sent back to England on the ground that it was necessary to stamp out promiscuity in the colony. It was often suspected that the British authorities simply reshipped the women to another colony. Other protests took the form of pamphlets tracing the criminal deeds of the new arrivals. Much was made of the case of Thomas Lutherland, a convicted felon sent to New Jersey as a bound servant. Within days of his arrival he was convicted of stealing and punished. That did little to cure him, however, and a short time later, he murdered a boat trader and hid the victim's goods in his home.

Parliament turned a deaf ear to these protests, as it did to an official resolution by the Virginia House of Burgesses declaring that "the peace of this colony be too much hazarded and endangered by the great numbers of felons and other desperate villains sent hither from several prisons in England."

In the half century before the American Revolution, a total of 30,000 convicted felons were deposited in the colonies. The flow only stopped when America broke with England, which in turn merely shifted the bulk of its criminal exports to Australia.

Ironically, the flow of thugs from England went on unabated following independence. Mixed in among those Europeans fleeing to America to start a new life were a great number of criminals seeking to escape arrest in Britain and Ireland. Many newcomers flooded American cities and, instead of finding jobs, found only privation and slums at best the equal to those they had fled. The occupants of the crowded slums banded together and, by the 1820s, formed the first outlaw gangs, becoming the forerunners of organized crime in America.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS

Almost as prevalent as the English custom of transporting adult criminals to America was the even more heinous practice of shipping over juvenile delinquents. There were many in the colonies who welcomed receipt of such wares under the theory that cheap labor was needed and the lash had more effect on young criminals than on the more-seasoned variety. In 1619 the Virginia Company, which prized child labor, eagerly sought to import children from London. That city seized upon the offer and promptly set out to rid its back streets, hovels, jails and poorhouses of paupers, vagrants, petty thieves and orphans. The following year a law was passed permitting the deportation of children without their approval, and large-scale abductions became commonplace in every part of London.

In America the children were apprenticed until they were 21, when, in principle, they were to be freed and given cattle, corn and some public land. In practice, there was no real guarantee that their masters would set them free at the end of their apprenticeship. In addition, the youths were often subjected to cruelty by their masters, who had the law on their side. Thus, children found guilty of lying, swearing, fighting, cheating, stealing and running away were liable to added restraints that could delay their freedom, even though most of these offenses were not punishable if committed by adults.

trapman mob security expert

Not many years ago, long after the mob had disposed of the Flamingo Hotel in Las Vegas, the new owners discovered a secret safe in the hotel floor. It had undoubtedly been built many years earlier by Bugsy Siegel, the explosive partner of Meyer Lansky who had been murdered because he had defied the national crime syndicate. Obviously, Siegel had kept large amounts of money hidden there, but when the safe was found, it contained nothing. Since Siegel had died suddenly, it was hardly likely he had time to make a last-minute withdrawal. Speculation had it that either someone else knew of the existence of the safe or that a “trapman” had talked.

The trapman is one of the most important specialists used by the mob, as vital as hit men and respectable front men. The trapman's function is to build traps, or secret panels or hidden safes, for mob leaders. Knowledgeable police insist no important national crime figure is without one or more traps in his home. Organized crime leaders do not believe much in safe-deposit boxes or, contrary to public opinion, in Swiss bank accounts. They rely on hidden compartments where they can store cash, records and even guns on short notice. Underworld traps have consisted of walls that slide open or even panels in swimming pools.

Trapmen are generally not syndicate or Mafia members, but rather legitimate contractors, although they are often relatives of Mafia figures. Pledged to secrecy, a trapman in Los Angeles may be flown to Chicago or New York to install a special trap. Only he and the man hiring him will ever know the secret of the trap. The trapman has two reasons for keeping the secret: he is extremely well paid and he wants to stay alive.

Persons other than crime leaders use trapmen for illegal purposes. Professional men, such as doctors and dentists, are notorious for installing traps in their homes to hide their “tax-free” funds. Of course, since they do not have access to the same trapmen who service the Mafia, they generally use the contractors who build their homes. The underworld is aware of this practice and makes a special effort to get a loan-shark hold on building contractors. Then in exchange for information about a trap, a contractor's loan is discounted against a portion of the money taken in a robbery of the trap.

Traps are often of extremely clever design. One technique is to place a trap behind another trap. Another is to hide a trap in the basement of a house but install its trigger mechanism in the attic, so that chances of accidental discovery are virtually nil. A unique deception is a fireproof panel built into a stove.

The only time a trapman is permitted to talk is if the party who has hired him suddenly dies, a not infrequent event in the underworld. Since the secret of the trap would otherwise be buried with the dead man, the trapman is permitted to tell the secret to the deceased's associates. If the trap has not already been cleaned out, the trapman is entitled to a portion of the cash found.

trash bag murders California homicide wave

The first of the bodies in one of America's most bizarre murder sprees turned up on Christmas Day 1972; shortly thereafter, plastic-bagged bodies or parts thereof began appearing along the California coastline. Some dismembered parts were discovered in garbage bins, and others were found in ditches along the roadside and on freeway shoulders, obviously hurled from a car. A plastic-wrapped head turned up on a recycling plant's conveyer belt and a left leg was found in a junk heap outside a Sunset Beach saloon. By July 1973 the police had tied five homicides to the Trash Bag Murderer, and over the next four years that number more than quadrupled. Finally, in July 1977 a 38-year-old bearded, bespectacled ex-aerospace worker named Patrick Kearney surrendered to the authorities. Five months later, he pleaded guilty to 21 murders.

Kearney never revealed any motive for the killing spree, and no effort was made in court to discover one. There were seven other murder charges pending against Kearney, but authorities did not proceed on them. If they had, he could have been convicted of a total of 28, which at the time would have made him one of the worst mass murderers in American history. Kearney was given two concurrent life sentences for his crimes.

Tresca, Carlo (1875–1943) syndicalist editor and murder victim

For years the 1943 assassination of syndicalist editor Carlo Tresca on New York's Fifth Avenue has been listed as a great unsolved political murder. It has never been a mystery in Mafia circles, however. Tresca, as the underworld has always known, was gunned down on orders transmitted from Italy by a leader of the American Mafia. Tresca's anti-Fascist, anti-Communist Italian-language weekly, Il Martello, earned him the enmity of both Rome and Moscow. Thus, when the editor went down under a volley of gunfire after stepping out of his office on January 11, speculation arose that he could have been killed by either the left or the right.

He was most likely killed to satisfy the wish of Benito Mussolini, whose hatred for Tresca dated back a long time.

Tresca was born in Pulmona, Italy to a wealthy land-owning family, and, as a youth, gravitated to "lost causes" of the left. After serving as editor of the Socialist Party's newspaper, he was forced to flee the country. In Geneva, Switzerland in 1904 Tresca met another young man who had a reputation for being as much of a hothead as he was, Benito Mussolini. At the time, Mussolini regarded Tresca as not enough of a radical; Tresca regarded Mussolini as a charlatan, a judgment confirmed by subsequent events.

Tresca would later spend much of his energy fighting Mussolini's regime in Italy. The record indicates that Mussolini had put Tresca's name on a death list in 1931, but it was a dozen years before something was done about it. The agent of Mussolini's bidding was Vito Genovese, who had been forced to flee the United States in the 1930s to escape a murder indictment. Arriving in Italy, Genovese knew that Mussolini had vowed to wipe out the Mafia in that country, so he decided his personal comfort and safety required that he ingratiate himself with the Fascist cause. Genovese, who had left America with several million dollars, contributed $250,000 to build a Fascist Party headquarters. When World War II broke out, he further demonstrated his devotion to Mussolini by supervising—and partially financing—the construction of a munitions factory. The Italian leader personally bestowed the title of commendatore on the American gangster.

Another of Genovese's ploys to establish himself with the power elite was to supply Mussolini's son-in-law and foreign minister, Count Galeazzo Ciano, with narcotics, and in this way the gangster also became one of the country's richest narcotics dealers. When Mussolini raged to him about Tresca's anti-Fascist activities in New York, Genovese grandly informed the Italian leader that he would solve the problem. He then sent word through Mafia circles that Tresca was to be hit.

The contract was carried out by Carmine Galante, who, although later to become one of the top Mafia leaders in the country, was described in an account at the time as "a petty Brooklyn hoodlum." Witnesses were able to record the license number of a Ford sedan used in the assassination: 1C-9272. That number led to an ironic discovery. About two hours before the Tresca assassination, Galante, a parolee, was making his weekly report to his parole officer in downtown Manhattan. It was common practice for parole officers to trail parolees out of the office in the hope of seeing them consorting with other criminal types. Galante was followed to a car, which he entered and drove off. His parole officers could not tail the car because of restrictions placed on such activity by the wartime gasoline shortage. All he could do was take down the license number: 1C-9272.

Picked up as a material witness in the Tresca murder, Galante denied everything. He had not entered any such car, he said. He had taken the subway uptown and was at a Broadway movie at the time of the killing, and besides, he asked, "Who is this guy Tresca? Never even heard of him."

Since no witnesses could identify the gunman, the link to Galante and the car was not enough to bring about a prosecution. When Genovese returned to the United States after the war, he had little to fear from the by then stale murder investigation.

trial by touch

As late as the end of the 17th century, American colonists employed the medieval custom of trial by touch in murder cases. It was believed that if the accused was the murderer, the corpse would give some signal.

In a typical trial held in Virginia in 1663, several members of a family were accused of having killed a former black servant. On orders from the court each of the defendants touched Uncle Joe's body, and since it "gave no sign," they were found not guilty. However, in the trial of a man accused of murdering John Clark, a boat trader in New Jersey, who was found dead and his supplies stolen in 1691, the results were somewhat different. The corpse was brought forth in court and the defendant, Thomas Lutherland, was ordered to touch it. It was firmly believed that the corpse would bleed if Lutherland was guilty. It did not, but Lutherland was hanged anyway because the victim's goods had been found in his home.

Tri-State Gang

If the Dillinger mob was noted for its members' loyalty to each other, the Tri-State Gang, a more typical criminal combination of the 1930s, won notoriety for the opposite. Based in Philadelphia and led by Robert Mais, Walter Legenza and Anthony Cugino, known as Philadelphia's Public Enemy No. 1, the Tri-Staters became famous for the short-lived careers of many of their members, most of whom were victims of internal assassinations. Cugino was particularly adept at this pastime, killing, at various times, four of his men and two of their girlfriends.

Cugino's career in crime began at the age of 12, when he was sent to a reformatory. In 1919, barely out of his teens, he committed a $35,000 jewel robbery and, when caught, was sent to prison for 15 years. In prison he killed his cellmate, but he drew no added penalty for the act because he successfully claimed he had acted in self-defense. Released in 1930, Cugino hooked up with Mais, Legenza, Salvatore Serpa, Eddie "Cowboy" Wallace, John Zurkorsky and others to form a holdup and counterfeiting gang called the Tri-Staters. Together with Serpa, Wallace and Zurkorsky, Cugino stole a plant payroll and shot down a police officer guarding it.

A few months after the robbery, Cugino and Serpa, suspecting their partners in crime might betray them to the police to save themselves, took Wallace and Zurkorsky for a ride. Riddled with bullets, the pair were dumped on a roadside and left for dead. Wallace was dead but Zurkorsky staggered upright, hailed a car and was taken to a hospital. From the hospital he called Camden, N. J. police and begged them to go to a rooming house to save two girls with whom he and Wallace had been living. Detectives were too late. They found that the young women, Florence Miller and Ethel Greentree, had just left with two men whose descriptions matched those of Cugino and Serpa. Three weeks later, the bodies of the women were found in a shallow grave in a cornfield near Downingtown, Pa.

Sometime later, Cugino assassinated another gangster, Johnny Horn, who had two marks against him: Cugino suspected him of possible duplicity and regarded him as a rival for a certain young woman's attention. The only members of the gang Cugino seemed to have any loyalty toward (he later also stabbed Serpa to death in Chicago) were Mais and Legenza. When they were convicted and awaiting execution in Richmond, Va. for killing a mail-truck driver during a robbery, Cugino sent them two pistols hidden in a baked turkey. The pair broke out, murdering a guard in the process, and rejoined Cugino.

Back in business, the Tri-Staters robbed $48,000 from an electric company office in Philadelphia. Soon, Mais and Legenza were scouring the city's underworld for a certain hoodlum they believed had betrayed them, but they were informed on by certain other gang members who feared their vengeance would get out of hand.

Returned to Richmond, Mais and Legenza were electrocuted. Meanwhile, Cugino shifted some of his operations from Philadelphia to New York, fearing he too would be betrayed. He still returned to Philadelphia, however, to recruit new Tri-Staters for jobs and to eliminate "weak links" in the operation. He also shot dead Anthony "Musky" Zanghi after a quarrel about how the spoils from a counterfeiting operation were to be divided.

It was the Zanghi murder that doomed Cugino. Convinced that Cugino now believed in nothing but "kill, kill, kill," several gangsters informed Philadelphia police that the gang leader hung around New York's theatrical district a great deal, especially the area of Seventh Avenue and 47th Street. Cugino was captured there just after midnight on September 8, 1935.

Questioned for 15 hours straight, Cugino laughed at police efforts to tie him to a large number of robberies as well as eight murders. Finally, he made some damaging admissions concerning the murder of a New York police detective, James J. Garvey, in 1934. Cugino never paid for any of his crimes, hanging himself in his cell later that night. With his death, the Tri-State Gang, perhaps the most devious and treacherous criminal organization ever, disintegrated.

Truesdale, David A. (1881–1948) Wells Fargo messenger Just before World War I, the most famous Western character was neither a lawman nor an outlaw but an unimposing 31-year-old Wells Fargo messenger named David A. Truesdale. Bars and saloons, east and west, saluted him with the "Truesdale Special." What Truesdale had done to gain such fame was "cash in the chips" of the last active member of Butch Cassidy's Wild Bunch, the Tall Texan, Ben Kilpatrick.

On March 13, 1912, Kilpatrick and a confederate, an ex-convict named Ed Welch, halted the Sunset Limited of the Southern Pacific at Dryden, Tex. by posing as Union Pacific detectives. While Kilpatrick covered Truesdale, the Wells Fargo messenger in the express car, Welch went about looting the mail car. But the Tall Texan got careless and took his eyes off Truesdale. As the messenger later described the events to the New York Herald:

They thought they were such smooth workers at the game. But it made me sore the way they acted, so I decided to take some of the conceit out of them. By a ruse I made the bigger one (Kilpatrick) look the other way; then I struck him on the head with the ice mallet. I picked up his rifle and killed the other one as he walked out of the mail car toward me.

Only afterward did the plucky Truesdale learn that the tall one was Ben Kilpatrick, one of the slickest bandits ever to ride with Butch Cassidy and Black Jack Ketchum. Did that scare him now that he knew who his victim was? He replied, "I am more worried about what to do with the vacation and the reward the company has given me than I am about killing those two."

Of course, Truesdale's moment of glory was short-lived, and the Truesdale Special enjoyed only a brief popularity. A wicked concoction of whiskey and gin (or whatever hard liquor happened to be handy) with just a dash of soda, it offered little to all but the hardest of imbibers; its usual effect could well be described as being hit over the head with a mallet.

In 1930 Truesdale's feat got a replay when it was discovered that he was still waiting for his reward. The neglected payment was finally made and Truesdale, like the badmen of the West themselves, faded into obscurity.

Truman, Harry S (1884–1972) intended assassination victim

On November 1, 1950 a uniformed White House guard, Donald Birdzell, was at his post in front of Blair House, across the street from the Executive Mansion, where President Harry S Truman was staying while repairs were being made at the White House. Suddenly, Birdzell heard a faint, metallic click and turned his head. Ten feet away, a neat, dark man in a pin-striped blue-green suit was silently and carefully aiming a German F-38 automatic pistol at him. It went off just as Birdzell jumped for the street—a prescribed Secret Service action to draw fire away from the house where the president was staying so that he would not catch a stray bullet. The first assault on a president of the United States in his Washington residence was underway.

Birdzell landed on the streetcar tracks on Pennsylvania Avenue, turned and began firing back. The gunman put a bullet in his leg, dropping him to one knee. Another slug ripped into Birdzell's good leg and he pitched forward. As other guards and Secret Servicemen went into action, a second attacker darted up to the guard at the west sentry booth, pulled out a Luger and began shooting at point-blank range. A uniformed sentry, Leslie Coffelt, went down with bullets in the chest, stomach and legs. He died a short while later. Plainclothesman Joseph Downs toppled over, shot in the stomach.

There was one last burst of gunfire. The wounded Birdzell, stretched out flat with his pistol held braced at arm's length on the pavement before him, shot the first gunman in the chest as he frantically tried to reload.

Would-be presidential assassin Oscar Collazo lies wounded at the foot of the steps to Blair House.

The would-be assassin sprawled out, his hat awry, his heels kicking. The second gunman lurched backward over a low boxwood hedge, dead with a bullet through his ears.

In the heavy silence that followed, Secret Serviceman Floyd Boring saw President Truman in his undershirt peering out the window of an upstairs room, where he had been napping.

"Get back, Mr. President!" Agent Boring shouted. "Get back!"

Truman stepped back while a few Secret Service agents converged on the scene. Most remained at their posts, on guard against further attacks.

The wounded gunman was identified as Oscar Collazo and his dead partner as Griselio Torresola. In Torresola's pocket were found two letters from a fiery Puerto Rican nationalist, Pedro Albizu Campos.

While newspaper front pages were filled with details of the assassination attempt, a key factor failed to get the prominence it deserved. Although Torresola and Collazo started with the assassin's greatest asset—the element of surprise—they failed to penetrate even the outer rim of presidential protectors. Backing up the uniformed White House police was an agent sitting in a nearby office building with a clear view of Blair House. His duty was to drop any attacker who made it to the doorway of Blair House. However, even if the attackers had gotten through the door, they would have faced an agent stationed inside the entrance with a submachine gun in his lap.

There was another agent on the stairway, one in front of Truman's door and others in surrounding rooms. It was estimated that the assassins would have had to kill at least 20 Secret Servicemen before getting within sight of the president.

How much faith President Truman placed in the Secret Service was pointed up by the fact that a few hours after the attack he delivered a speech and unveiled a statue before a large crowd in Arlington—all as though nothing had happened.

Collazo recovered from his wounds and was convicted and sentenced to death for the murder of Coffelt. President Truman commuted his death sentence to life imprisonment. On September 6, 1979 President Jimmy Carter, “for humane reasons,” commuted his life sentence to time served and on September 10 he was released from prison.

Trussell, George (1833–1866) gambler and murder victim Known as “a shrewd, cunning Yankee from Vermont,” George Trussell was the dandy of the Chicago gamblers during the Civil War and, as such, the idol of the young sports of the city. Contemporary accounts described his good looks. He was, according to one, “tall, straight as an arrow, and might have stood as model for one of Remington’s Indian-fighting cavalry officers.”

Trussell first appeared in Chicago working as a bookkeeper and then as a bank teller, but he was discharged from that job for gambling. He then worked as a “roper,” or victim hunter, for a faro operation and soon had his own gambling business. By 1862 he was operating two gambling houses, one on Dearborn Street and another on Randolph. From then until 1866 Trussell was at the peak of his power. He was said to be—and indeed claimed to be—the most generous dispenser of bribes to accommodating police.

Trussell constantly walked around armed and is noted for having used his weapon on sore losers who had been taken in his games, which may not have always been operated in accordance with the official rules. In addition to protecting himself against irate losers, he needed to carry a weapon because of what became known as the Hairtrigger Block feud, which he carried on with a rival gambler, Cap Hyman. This was a bullet-pocked yet somewhat humorous duel that went on for years whenever the two got drunk, which was quite often. Bets were always made in gambling circles on who would be killed by whom. As it turned out, Trussell was shot to death, but by a different party.

Since it was almost obligatory that a gambler of Trussell’s station take a mistress from among the madams of the city’s brothels, Trussell selected Irish Mollie, whose real name was Mary Cossgriff. For two years the affair flourished, as Trussell took his Mollie on daily carriage rides around the city, appeared with her at the theater and racetracks and continually showered her with gifts. In 1866 Irish Mollie found herself competing with an unusual rival. Trussell had acquired a half interest in Dexter, a famous trotting horse, and was spending more of his time with the horse than with Mollie. Taunted by her friends that she was losing out to a horse, Mollie’s devotion to her lover turned to insane jealousy and led to bitter quarrels between them. On September 4, 1866, enraged because her lover had forgotten their dinner engagement, Mollie walked into the bar of Seneca Wright’s saloon on Randolph Street (“in a gorgeous white moire dress, with a light shawl thrown over it, and seemed as if she had just come from some dancing party,” according to the Chicago Tribune). When Trussell told her to go home she pulled a revolver from under her shawl and shot him in the side. As Trussell tried to run out a side exit, Mollie shot him again. The gambler staggered into Prince’s livery stable, where Mollie followed him and shot him a third time. Trussell fell dead, and Mollie prostrated herself over his body and sobbed: “Oh, my George! My George! He is dead!”

Irish Mollie was convicted of manslaughter and given a rather mild sentence of one year in prison, which would seem to indicate that the courts did not regard the loss of Trussell as a major civic tragedy. Before serving a day of her sentence, Mollie received a pardon from the governor and returned to her bordello. She never laid claim to Trussell’s estate, which was considerable, even though she contended she had been legally married to him. Friends say it was because she was too grief-stricken at the loss of her lover to concern herself about his money, but more likely her pardon had been granted on the condition that she make no claim to his property.

Although they have been touted in the past as the surest method for both lie and crime detection, the so-called truth serums have proved far from practical for legal purposes. Aside from the constitutional problems raised, the fact remains that none of the truth serums, such as scopolamine, sodium amytal, phenobarbital solution, sodium pentothal and others, has ever been scientifically accepted as a reliable and accurate technique for learning the truth. The theory behind truth serums is that they relieve the subject of inhibitions, so that he or she will make true statements. Although these drugs are used in the field of psychiatry, any attempt to use them on a person suspected of a crime, especially in light of the Miranda decision, which protects a prisoner’s legal rights, draws almost universal opposition from defense attorneys. Not only is it necessary to get a suspect’s permission to use such drugs, but he must also grant a written release of liability to the interrogator and the attending physician in case of unfavorable reaction. It is a level of cooperation few prisoners will accede to.

Even some of those who see value in truth serums for purposes of interrogation, such as criminologist LeMoyne Snyder, object to the use of the drugs alone. They see them as a complement to the lie detector, with neither a valid substitute for the other. Not surprisingly, the Nazis made considerable use of truth serums to interrogate suspected underground agents and other enemies, but the reliability of the results was at best mixed and the drugs never replaced ordinary torture as the most effective method of interrogation.

Tub of Blood Bunch post-Civil War New York criminals

One of the great “cleanups” of gangsters in New York occurred shortly after the Civil War, when the police started to force criminal gangs out of the Fourth Ward. The majority of these criminal elements moved northward along the East River into the Corlears’ Hook district. Perhaps the worst of all were those who congregated in a notorious dive called the Tub of Blood. Some belonged to organized gangs but most were vicious loners who owed allegiance to no one and gave none. Even celebrated thugs like those of the Patsy Conroy gang steered clear of the Tub of Blood Bunch, which included such unsavory characters as Skinner Meehan, Dutch Hen, Jack Cody, Sweeney the Boy, Brian Boru and the celebrated Hop Along Peter.

It was said that Sweeney the Boy and Brian Boru had not slept in a bed in a house for 20 years. By day and late evening they could be found in the Tub of Blood and at night they would adjourn to a marble yard, where they slept. They never had a change of clothes, simply robbing or killing a hapless pedestrian when the clothes they were wearing bored them or got too dirty. The eventual fate of Sweeney the Boy is unknown, but Brian Boru suffered the misfortune of falling asleep in the marble yard one night in such a drunken stupor that he was unable to defend himself. The next morning he was found literally half eaten by the huge gray dock rats that often ranged blocks from the waterfront in search of food.

Probably the oddest of all the Tub of Blooders was Hop Along Peter, a certifiable half-wit, but nonetheless a vicious thug. Other gangsters utilized Hop Along Peter as a lookout because of his habit of flying into a fury whenever he saw a policeman’s uniform and attacking its wearer. This readily afforded the other gangsters sufficient time to make their getaway. Hop Along Peter was, for a period of almost two decades, the most notorious cop fighter on the East Side. When he disappeared in the 1880s the police do not seem to have searched too hard or lamented too long, just as few cops—or criminals—were grief-stricken when the Tub of Blood eventually shut down for lack of patronage.

Tucker Prison Farm scandal incomplete Arkansas penal probe

In early 1967 Arkansas’ Tucker Prison Farm was rocked by scandal when Governor Winthrop Rockefeller fired Superintendent Pink Booher and three wardens, J. L. Markburn, Bob Hensley and H. H. Chadick, in the midst of an investigation of the state’s prison system. However, the governor denied the firings were in any way connected with the death of a 50-year-old inmate from peritonitis. A report issued by Arkansas assistant attorney general Eugene B. Hale described the prison as the scene of “torture, brutality and extortion and gross wrongdoing.” There were reports that Tucker inmates who testified on behalf of investigators were later beaten by “goon squads” of prisoners.

Tom Murton, the new superintendent, later discovered that nearly 200 prisoners were listed as escapees. He heard from prisoners that the prison grounds might contain more than 100 bodies. According to the inmates, the dead were men who had antagonized previous wardens.

On Murton’s orders some sunken ground was dug up and three human skeletons were found in makeshift wooden coffins. The reports on Murton’s investigation filled the nation’s press and airwaves for weeks until officials ordered the digging stopped and Murton fired. This effectively ended any further probes of Tucker.

Tucker Telephone prison torture

Any belief that brutality and torture had disappeared from the American prison system by the mid-20th century was dispelled in the late 1960s following probes of conditions at Arkansas’ Cummings and Tucker prison farms. While all sorts of charges were made and perhaps only partially verified, the investigation established that a particularly awesome torture device, the “Tucker telephone,” was used at the institutions. It was composed of an old telephone, a heavy duty battery and the necessary wiring. A convict would be stripped and one end of the wire fastened to his wrist or ankle and the other end to his penis. Electric shocks would be sent coursing through his body until the agony drove him to unconsciousness.

At the time this torture instrument was in use in Arkansas, the only other official authority in the world known to be employing a similar device was SAVAK, the Iranian secret police.

TUFTS, Henry

Tufts, Henry (1748–1831) horse thief

Henry Tufts was the first American criminal to write an autobiography, appropriately titled The Autobiography of a Criminal, which became, one presumes unintentionally, a manual for horse thieves.

Tufts was the compleat horse thief, developing what was then an unmindful criminal endeavor into a highly skilled profession. He carried an assortment of tools with which to break into locked barns, including corrosives that could soften or eat through iron and, concealed in the soles of his shoes, saw blades, which he also used to saw his way to freedom whenever he was apprehended stealing a horse. Tufts always brought along a variety of paints with which to disguise a stolen steed, and often a black horse he had sold to some unsuspecting buyer would turn chestnut after about a week.

Born in Newmarket, N. H. in 1748, Tufts stole his first horse at age 16. At 18 he performed the unique feat of stealing and selling the same dog three times in one day. But it was the Revolutionary War that really catapulted Tufts into big-time horse stealing, as both sides paid dearly for horses and asked no questions about their source. This was fortunate for Tufts, who often lost track of whether he was selling certain animals to the side he had stolen them from or to their enemies. Whenever constables or sheriffs were hot on his trail, Tufts would elude capture by enlisting in the Continental Army only to desert and return to the horse thief trail once the chase cooled.

In time, Henry Tufts gained the reputation of being the greatest knave and most arrant horse thief in New England. Finally, he retired from the profession in 1807 and, under another identity, published his autobiography. The work permitted him to reenter society as a reformed rogue truly regretful of a misspent life. No one seems to have been too upset or even aware that his autobiography was being used as a primer for would-be horse thieves, who learned from Tufts, for example, how to fashion cork shoes covered with sole leather that could be attached to a horse's hooves to eliminate the sound of its footsteps.

Tufts remained a respectable citizen for the rest of his days, save for a minor lapse here and there. Shortly before he died in 1831, he expressed sadness over the state of the horse-stealing profession. Even such awesome penalties as the lash and branding had failed to halt the crime, and now hanging was becoming the newest punishment. Old Tufts found the situation "most discouraging."

Tunstall, John Henry (1853–1878) murder victim

It was the death of a wealthy young Englishman, John H. Tunstall, that is said to have turned Billy the Kid from a rustler into a mean killer. Tunstall, a much-traveled entrepreneur, arrived in Lincoln, New Mexico Territory in 1876 and was soon embroiled in the Lincoln County War, one of the major violent commercial clashes in America, with the wealth of the entire territory as the spoils.

Tunstall had bought a large ranch and aligned himself with Alexander McSween, an ambitious lawyer, and John S. Chisum, a wealthy cattleman, against the forces of Lawrence G. Murphy, James J. Dolan and others of the so-called Santa Fe Ring, prominent Republicans attempting to dominate every aspect of economic life in the New Mexico Territory, including the revenues from very lucrative government beef contracts. Soon, a war broke out between the two groups, with the fighting done by cowboys such as Billy the Kid.

The Kid was riding for Murphy until, at some point, he met Tunstall and switched sides. Although Tunstall was not much older than the Kid, Billy seemed to regard him as a father, and Tunstall said of him: "That's the finest lad I ever met. He's a revelation to me every day and would do anything on earth to please me. I'm going to make a man out of that boy yet." Quite predictably, latter-day Freudians have seen more to this odd relationship between an unschooled, undisciplined, homeless boy and a cultured foreigner in tweeds, but hard facts about what was to prove their brief encounter are missing.

Through a blatantly political move, Tunstall's business rivals had obtained a court order to seize some of his horses in payment for an alleged debt. When the Englishman refused to comply with the order, the ring's puppet sheriff, William Brady, sent an 18-man posse to seize the horses. When Tunstall rode up to the lawmen to protest their presence, he was ordered to dismount and hand over his pistol. As he complied, he was shot in the head by Deputy Billy Morton, becoming the first victim of the Lincoln County War.

The Kid, who witnessed the killing from a distance, was deeply affected. "He was the only man that ever treated me like I was free-born and white," he said. And when his mentor's body was being lowered into the grave, Billy vowed: "I'll get every son-of-a-bitch who helped kill John if it's the last thing I do."

It was an oath the Kid was quite successful in keeping. There are those who say that Billy was by nature and inclination a killer. In any case, Tunstall's murder made him a killer with a mission.

Turley, Preston S. (?–1858) murderer

"Never hang a preacher" became a pre-Civil War saying in Charleston, Va., which is now West Virginia, following the execution of an ex-minister of the Baptist Church, Preston Turley, in 1858.

Demon rum had led to Turley's being defrocked, and from there on, it was straight down. One night in 1858 both Turley and his wife, Mary Susan, came home drunk. Suddenly, Turley began quoting scriptures and then strangled his wife to death while their three children watched. He disposed of the body in a nearby river, somehow not expecting his children would say anything about the murder. They did, however, and Turley was convicted and given the death sentence.

On September 17, 1858 Turley mounted the scaffold. He was given the right to make a final statement, which he turned into a harangue that lasted three and a half hours. Turley lectured on the wages of sin and the evils of drink, so much so that one account speaks of some members of the audience drifting away—that in a day when executions were considered highly entertaining. We are informed that the ex-minister was visibly saddened when the hangman approached, ending his lecture. He was also disappointed that his children were not present. In one note from his death cell, he had written them, "Don't you want to go and see Pa hung?"

Turner, Nat (1800–1831) leader of slave uprising

In the bloodiest slave uprising in this country, Nat Turner, a 31-year-old slave foreman in Virginia who was permitted by his owner to perform as a preacher to other slaves, led a band of about 70 or 80 blacks on a 48-hour rampage that took the lives of 57 whites.

General Nat, as his followers were to call him, later confessed he had begun plotting his rebellion when, on May 12, 1828, I heard a loud noise in the heavens, and the Spirit instantly appeared to me and said the Serpent was loosened, and Christ had laid down the yoke He had borne for the sins of men, and that I should take it on and fight against the Serpent, for the time was fast approaching when the first should be last and the last should be first. . . .

At 2 A.M. on August 22, 1831, Turner and six other black slaves entered the mansion of Turner's owners, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Travis, and hacked the couple to death in their bed. For the next two days the killing continued, the slave leader murdering only one victim, a frightened woman he battered to death with a fence post.

In his confession Turner stated:

As I came round to the door I saw Will pulling Mrs. Whitehead out of the house, and at the step he nearly severed her head from her body with his broad axe We proceeded to Mr. Levi Waller's. . . . I took my station in the rear, and as it was my object to carry terror and devastation wherever we went, I placed 15 or 20 of the best mounted and most to be relied on in front, who generally approached the houses as fast as their horses could run, this was for two purposes, to prevent the escape of and strike terror into the inhabitants—on this account, I never got to the houses, after leaving Mrs. Whitehead's, until the murders were committed, except in one case. I sometimes got in sight in time to see the work of death completed, viewed the mangled bodies as they lay in silent satisfaction, and immediately started in quest of other victims. Having murdered Mrs. Waller and 10 children, we started for Mr. William Williams'—while engaged in killing him and two little boys that were there, Mrs. Williams fled and got some distance from the house, but she was pursued, overtaken, and compelled to get up behind one of the company, who brought her back and after showing her the mangled body of her lifeless husband, she was told to get down and lie by his side, where she was shot dead. . . .

TWEED Ring

Within two days whites began a massive counterattack. Poses of 2,000 local militiamen scoured the area, aided by a force of 800 federal troops. The succeeding reign of terror claimed an unknown number of blacks, somewhere between 100 and 200. Some were killed on suspicion of being in on the plot, but others were slaughtered, decapitated and had their heads posted on roads merely as a warning to other blacks. Of the actual rebels, a handful escaped the area entirely, many were killed and a total of 55 captured, including Nat Turner, who was caught some two months after the uprising. Seventeen were hanged, 12 were “transported” and 20 were found not guilty. The others died of their wounds before being tried.

Tweed Ring

The Tweed Ring—or, more accurately, the Hall-Connolly-Sweeny-Tweed Ring—stands as the greatest example of civic corruption in American history. Estimates of the loot the ring took from the New York City treasury between 1865 and mid-1871 have been placed as high as $200 million.

The Tweed Ring reached its zenith of power on January 1, 1869, when the city’s robber barons appeared to be unassailable. William Marcy Tweed, the boss of Tammany Hall, had placed his man, John T. Hoffman, in the governor’s seat so that there would be no state interference in city affairs. And in the metropolis, the ring members—Tweed, president of the Board of Supervisors; Mayor A. Oakley Hall, known as the Elegant One; City Comptroller Richard B. Connolly, called Slippery Dick; and City Chamberlain Peter B. Sweeny, alias Bismarck or Brains—ran the city as if it were their personal fief.

As a rule of thumb, the spoilers determined they would steal one dollar for every two paid out by the city. This, of course, meant stealing in myriad ways, including fraudulent bond issues, the sale of all sorts of franchises and the granting of tax forgiveness acts and other favors in return for cash payments. Merchants and contractors could not hope to have dealings with the city unless they paid huge bribes. Even these tributes failed to satisfy the ring, whose arrogance and greed led them to award grants from the city treasury to nonexistent hospitals and charities.

The Tweed Ring might have held power almost indefinitely given its control of the police, the district attorney’s office and the courts and its influence over most newspapers. Even the opposition Republican Party and various reform groups were neutralized by Tweed’s tactic of putting scores of their leaders on the payroll. The ring also controlled the underworld. The muscle of the great gangs of the period was at the disposal of Tweed and his cohorts in exchange for protection of the criminals in their illegal endeavors. During elections the gangsters brought out those who would vote right and scared away those not likely to. Tweed became legendary for his mass production of voters. On one occasion, with the aid of a corrupt judge, Tweed in 20 days naturalized 60,000 immigrants; few of them knew the nature of the oath or a word of the English language. When election day arrived, Tweed hacks showed them how to vote.

Two things finally dislodged the Tweed Ring from power: an incorruptible reform movement, headed by Samuel J. Tilden, and the near bankruptcy of the city as a result of the group’s depredations. No treasury could forever survive paying out $10,000 for $75 worth of pencils, $171,000 for $4,000 worth of chairs and tables and $1,826,000 for plastering a municipal building, a job later estimated to be worth no more than $50,000.

No amount of power could have kept Tweed from being indicted once authorities discovered his own illegal profits totalled $12 million. The first trial of the Tammany leader ended in a hung jury, a number of jurors having been bribed. During the retrial the prosecution took the unprecedented action of having each juror watched by a plainclothesman, each of whom was watched by another police detective, who in turn was watched by a private detective. Each of these watchers were required to send in a daily report so that any variation in any surveillance account would immediately become apparent. Tweed was convicted and given a 12-year prison term and a number of Tweed Ring judges were impeached. It was obvious that Tweed and the judges were being made the scapegoats.

On appeal Tweed’s sentence was reduced and he was released in 1875. Then the state instituted an action against him to regain the money he had stolen, and when he was unable to furnish bail, he was incarcerated again. In December 1875 Tweed fled the Ludlow Street Jail and made his way first to Cuba and then to Spain. Ironically, he was recognized from a Thomas Nast cartoon, taken into custody and returned to the United States.

In 1876 Tweed found himself once more confined in the Ludlow Street Jail. In failing health, he made a partial confession and offered to reveal everything if he was simply allowed to die outside of prison; amazingly, his offer was not accepted. Tweed died in jail in 1878 and with him the full secrets of the Tweed Ring.

Tylenol murders 1980s terror

The first victim in Illinois’ notorious mystery deaths was seventh grader Mary Kellerman who, suffering from a lingering cold, took some medication so she could go to her suburban Chicago school. She collapsed in the bathroom and was rushed to a hospital, where she was diagnosed with cardiopulmonary collapse.

The next victim—that same day, September 29, 1982—was Adam Janus, who took a painkiller and collapsed into a coma. Adam's younger brother, Stanley, and his wife, Teresa, rushed him to a hospital, telling the attending doctor they could not account for his sudden distress. The deeply troubled couple returned to Adam's Arlington Heights home to comfort the rest of the family. Stanley, distraught, saw a container of the painkiller Tylenol in the kitchen, took some and fell to the floor suddenly from oxygen starvation of the brain. Stanley's wife, shocked by that event, promptly seized the Tylenol for some relief. She also collapsed. Then a 27-year-old mother of four, Mary Reiner, suffering from the aftereffects of the birth of her latest baby, took some Tylenol and collapsed.

All of the victims died in their respective hospitals except for Teresa, who was in a coma on life support. While these tragic dramas were being played out, an employee at an Illinois Bell Phone Center developed a terrific headache and took some Tylenol—and promptly collapsed and died. And the next day, a United Airlines attendant bought some Extra-Strength Tylenol in a drugstore after her flight from Las Vegas. She took the tablets in her Chicago apartment. Two days later she was found dead. By this time, only Teresa Janus still clung to life.

Within a brief time medical authorities determined all the victims had taken Extra-Strength Tylenol. Bottles collected from the victims' homes all showed some of the capsules were tainted with cyanide.

There was a massive recall of the drug as authorities feared that someone at the maker of the drug, McNeil Consumer Products Co. in Pennsylvania, had tampered with massive amounts of Tylenol shipped recently. Finally it was determined only bottles in the Chicago area had been tampered with, and since the tainted bottles of Tylenol were from different stores it was obvious that someone had gone from store to store, used an eyedropper to add some cyanide to bottles and screwed the lids back on. The victims thus were random selectees in what the press reported as a deadly game of "American roulette." Psychiatrists were quoted as saying that the Tylenol killer was someone who might have a strong personal hatred for someone near him or her, or that the killer was a rather ordinary person who by the poisonings was achieving a measure of fame.

Meanwhile a massive recall was made of the Tylenol lot involved in the poisoning. Several persons near to using the medication did not because of the publicity and saved their own lives. There were a number of reports around the country of "copycat" hoaxers claiming that they too had poisoned Tylenol in their area stores. In the meantime, Teresa Janus was taken off life support and died, the seventh fatal victim.

The killings spurred efforts by the drug industry for sealed containers for many drugs so that tampering could be spotted. However, authorities made no headway in finding the Tylenol poisoner. The only arrest made was that of James Lewis, who sent an extortion letter to the drug maker, demanding $1 million to stop the killings. He was traced by police and given a long prison sentence.

Tyrrell, John F. (1861–1955) examiner of questioned documents

More than a mere handwriting expert, he was, as numerous biographers and journalists have referred to him, "Mr. E.Q.D." John F. Tyrrell was, until his death in his active 90s, America's leading examiner of questioned documents. For well over half a century, Tyrrell appeared in some of the nation's most famous criminal trials and produced compelling testimony that aided in bringing about guilty verdicts. He could identify handwriting—as well as papers and inks—with unerring accuracy. In addition, he was able not only to trace typed documents to a specific machine but often identify the typist by his or her individual methods of stroking the keys.

Early in the century, in one of Tyrrell's most bizarre cases, he developed the evidence that sent two identical-twin forgers to prison. The Longley brothers, Lloyd and Leon, of Milwaukee, Wis., specialized in writing rubber checks. They not only looked alike, dressed alike and wrote alike but made use of the same signature—L. Longley. Whenever one L. Longley was passing rubber, the other L. Longley would be establishing a firm alibi. For every witness who identified the bum check passer, there were a dozen reputable witnesses who could place L. Longley on the other side of the city when the crime had occurred. It was Tyrrell who established the existence of the two Longleys and sorted out one signature from the other so that both brothers went to prison—separate ones since two men who looked, acted and wrote alike could wreak a unique form of havoc within the walls of the same penal institution.

As a youth in Milwaukee, Tyrrell exhibited a flair for handwriting, and right out of school, he was hired by an insurance company to use his skill addressing envelopes. Young Tyrrell began contributing squibs and sketches to the Penman's Art Journal, then edited by William Kinsley, one of the 19th century's few handwriting experts. Kinsley had once testified in a forgery trial, during which the defense attorney, seeking to trip him up, put before him a large batch of similar-looking handwriting samples and challenged him to pick out the three written by the defendant. Kinsley did so and won great notoriety for the feat. He then ran a contest in his magazine challenging his subscribers to do the same. There were only two winners: Tyrrell and another young handwriting buff, Albert S. Osborn of Rochester, N.Y., who was also destined to become a leading expert in the field and, with Tyrrell, one of the founders of the American Society of Questioned Document Examiners in the next century.

Impressed by Tyrrell's skill, Kinsley began recommending him to authorities as a competent handwriting expert. Meanwhile, Tyrrell had risen to the position of clerk in his employment and started studying signatures of documents received by the insurance firm. He was able to spot several as forgeries, particularly those on medical examination forms. Checking on his findings, the insurance company discovered that a number of insurance applicants were in poor health and were using healthy stand-ins in the examinations. Tyrrell's handwriting detective work put a stop to the practice.

Tyrrell received national attention when he testified as an expert in the sensational trial of Roland B. Molineux in 1899. Molineux was accused of sending poisoned Bromo Seltzer to an enemy, Harry Cornish. Cornish did not use the medication but gave some to his landlady, Mrs. Catherine Adams, who died of cyanide of mercury poisoning. Tyrrell, Osborn and Kinsley all testified for the prosecution and identified as Molineux's handwriting the writing on the poison package and on letters sent to several manufacturers requesting sample powders.

Tyrrell's testimony was the most spectacular of the three. For the first time he demonstrated his courtroom technique, which involved making large, rapid freehand reproductions of all disputed writing. At first the jury could perceive no difference. Then Tyrrell would show tiny variations that pinpointed the writer's specific style. Newspapers promptly dubbed him the Wizard of the Pen.

Molineux was convicted but the case was thrown out because of legal errors. He was retried later by a judge who refused to admit any nonsense, such as testimony from handwriting experts. Without such expert testimony, Molineux was acquitted. He later turned homicidal and died in an insane asylum.

Shortly after Tyrrell appeared in the Molineux case, he testified in another affair that proved even more sensational, the murder of eccentric millionaire William M. Rice in a plot by a corrupt Texas lawyer, Albert T. Patrick, to steal Rice's fortune. Tyrrell proved forgery by showing that Rice's signature on each of four pages of a purported will were identical in every detail, proof that they had been traced. Patrick was convicted.

Thereafter, Tyrrell was called in on almost every major case in which there was a questioned document or sample of handwriting. He solved the dynamite murder of Mrs. James A. Chapman in Marshfield, Wis. in 1922, a case in which Tyrrell had nothing more to work on than a bit of dynamite-charred wrapping paper with part of the address written on it.

In the celebrated case of Leopold and Loeb, defense attorney Clarence Darrow decided to plead the two "poor little rich boys" guilty to kidnap-murder charges only after he heard Tyrrell's evidence linking them to a typewritten ransom note.

Tyrrell was among the battery of experts called in to testify in the Lindbergh baby kidnapping, and he examined all 15 ransom letters. He often painted an amusing portrait of the various handwriting experts during the trial, most of whom refused to discuss their theories, secretly guarding their diagnoses. Tyrrell's evidence was generally regarded to be the best.

Tyrrell frequently said the attempt to forge an old document was often filled with too many boobytraps for the average criminal, or even the skillful one. One resourceful heir to a rich man's fortune sought to improve his minor inheritance manyfold by claiming to find a will, yellowed with age, in a book. The plotter had gone to great pains to make the paper look old and then botched up his hard labors, Tyrrell found, by composing the will on a typewriter with a typeface that had not been designed until some 15 years after the date of the will.

Tyrrell was still being consulted by authorities and other experts until his death at the age of 94.

Unabomber terror through the mail

The first terror bombing occurred at Northwestern University on May 25, 1978 when a cigar box packed with thousands of match heads exploded in the hands of a security officer, injuring him and a graduate student. The package sent through the mail was addressed to a professor on campus, but as it developed, he was not the specific target. It was meant simply for whoever opened the package.

The culprit became known as the “Unabomber” after his reign of terror went on for 17 years. In that time three persons would be killed and 29 others injured when innocent-looking packages were opened. The three fatalities were: Theodore Mosser, an advertising executive, killed December 1994 in North Caldwell, New Jersey; Gilbert Murray, a California Forestry Association lobbyist, killed in April 1985 in Sacramento; and Hugh Scrutton, the owner of a computer rental store, also of Sacramento, murdered in December of the same year.

Whoever was victimized by a bomber attack deserved no sympathy as far as the mysterious terrorist was concerned. A brilliant computer science professor at Yale suffered serious injuries, including loss of vision in one eye, the hearing in one ear and part of his right hand. That attack occurred in June 1993 and almost two years later the Unabomber got around to sending the victim, David Gelertner, a taunting letter.

“People with advance degrees,” he wrote, “are not as smart as they think they are. If you had any brains you would have realized that there are a lot of people out there who resent bitterly the way technonerds like you are changing the world and you wouldn’t have been dumb enough to open an unexpected package from an unknown source.” The Unabomber went on to criticize the professor’s writings. To further show his contempt for authority, the Unabomber even put a return on one of his letters as the Washington, D.C., address of the FBI.

In June 1995 the Unabomber sent a long manifesto to the New York Times and the Washington Post, having previously indicated that if it were published, his bomb attacks would cease. The newspapers complied. In his “manifesto” the Unabomber condemned what he called a corrupt technocracy, which was eradicating human freedom for the benefit of corporate and governmental elite.

The important thing was that the bombing stopped.

And even more important, the Unabomber’s manifesto led to his unmasking. David Kaczynski, a social worker living with his wife in Schenectady, New York, read the manifesto and recognized much of the phrasings as being the same in letters written by his older brother, Theodore Kaczynski. And when David was packing material in his mother’s home in the Chicago suburb of Lombard, Illinois, he came across many more papers written by Ted Kaczynski, with numerous phrasings almost identical to those found in the manifesto. The Kaczynski family shuddered in horror at the thought that Ted was the Unabomber. Ted was a one-time academic, social dropout and now a Montana hermit living in a crude plywood cabin in the remote regions of Stemple Pass.

Kaczynski’s younger brother agonized about what to do and finally contacted a lawyer and then went to the FBI. The FBI put Ted Kaczynski under close observation for two months and finally took him into custody. Authorities even hauled away Kaczynski's shack for display at his later trial.

If capturing the Unabomber had been an enormous ordeal, it was probably just as hard to get him convicted. Kaczynski feuded with the FBI, the prosecutor, the judge, and ignored his family. He also fought with his attorneys when they wished to use an insanity defense. He declared it was well known that many of those who refuse to plead insanity are often less insane than those who do.

Kaczynski asked presiding judge Garland Burrell Jr. for the right to dismiss his lawyers. He said he would rather present his own case than listen to his lawyers question his mental health. The judge, in response, ordered the defendant to undergo mental testing to determine if he could stand trial and defend himself.

Later that same evening county prison authorities who were holding Kaczynski reported that it appeared that the prisoner had attempted to hang himself with his underwear. The effort was so poorly made that some officials felt he was merely trying to fake a suicide attempt. In any event Dr. Sally Johnson concluded that Kaczynski was competent to stand trial, and she also agreed with the defense's mental health experts that Kaczynski was a paranoid schizophrenic.

The judge then rejected the defendant's bid to represent himself. Judge Burrell accused Kaczynski of deliberately using disputes with his attorneys to disrupt and delay the trial proceedings. On January 22 the prosecutors and defense attorneys made a deal under which Kaczynski pleaded guilty to the charges filed against him. The only condition was that he be sentenced to life in prison with no possibility of parole rather than the death penalty. At the sentencing phase, Susan Mosser, the widow of victim Thomas Mosser, urged the court to "lock [Kaczynski] so far down that when he dies he will be closer to hell." In his own statement to the court Kaczynski accused federal prosecutors of distorting his motives, that he was an environmentalist crusading against technology.

Kaczynski, then 55, was sentenced to four life prison terms plus 30 years.

In one postscript to the case, David Kaczynski was ordered to pay taxes amounting to $355,000 on the $1 million federal reward he received for turning in his brother. David said he would use part of the reward money to cover the legal expenses he incurred to help his brother avoid the death penalty and give the rest to the victims of his brother's bombings. Many lawmakers of both parties objected to the requirement that taxes be paid, but said they were forced to accept the provision since it was part of an omnibus bill with crucial spending measures that had to be passed.

Underhill, Wilbur (1901–1934) bank robber

As a gangster roaming the Cookson Hills of Oklahoma, Wilbur Underhill was second in fame only to Arthur "Pretty Boy" Floyd. Actually, he robbed dozens more banks than Floyd did, becoming known as the Tri-State Terror for his forays in Oklahoma, Arkansas and Kansas.

Underhill had been responsible for robbing an unknown number of small-town banks in the late 1920s until he was finally caught and imprisoned at the Kansas State Penitentiary. In September 1933 he broke out of prison with two other inmates, Bob Brady and Jim Clark, and made for the Cookson Hills. Brady and Clark then went their separate ways, which promptly led to their capture by the law, while Underhill joined forces with the Ford Bradshaw gang. Within a short time, Underhill became the real leader of the gang, in fact if not in name, as the group hit bank after bank. The loot was never enormous; in a typical robbery, in November 1933, the gang netted about $13,000 from a bank in Okmulgee, Okla. A short time later, Underhill decided he had enough money to take a vacation from his criminal activities in order to marry his childhood sweetheart over the year-end holidays.

On New Year's Day 1934 FBI agents, having traced the movements of Underhill's bride, surrounded the couple's honeymoon cottage in Shawnee, Okla. and called on the bank robber to surrender. Underhill's answer came from two handguns, and an incredible battle raged for the next 30 minutes, during which at least 1,000 bullets were fired into the cottage. Finally, Underhill, armed with a shotgun and wearing nothing but his long underwear, charged out shooting. Although bleeding from a dozen wounds, he somehow broke through the cordon of lawmen, raced down the street and dove through a store's plate glass window. The officers found him passed out inside the store. He died from his wounds five days later.

Uniform Crime Reports

Since 1930 the FBI has issued the Uniform Crime Reports (UCR), which categorize "crimes known to the police" and arrest statistics. Just as it is charged that the Dow Jones averages don't measure total stock activity and trends, the same can be said about the UCR. The reports use seven felonies to gauge the distribution and trend of crime in the United States; they are murder, forcible rape, robbery, burglary, larceny, aggravated assault and auto theft, probably the seven crimes most likely to be reported to the police.

When the UCRs first appeared, there was much criticism of the quality of the data, which were based on the dubious figures supplied by local law enforcement agencies. Over the years the FBI has pressured local agencies to supply more accurate figures. There is little doubt the UCRs have led to improved law enforcement. For many years it was common for the police in New York City to discard a huge number of complaints in order to make their percentage of arrests look better. If a case appeared relatively easy to solve, it was filed; if it seemed like a hard one, it was discarded and naturally no work was done on it. In some cases citizens checking on the status of their complaints were ordered out of a station house. Because of the FBI's refusal to accept New York crime figures, reforms were finally instituted by the police in that city.

While the UCR figures are now accepted as being more authoritative than in the past, conclusions should be drawn from them only with extreme care. For instance, according to the UCRs, bank robberies in 1932 totaled 609, with the dollar losses amounting to $3.4 million. In 1975 there were 4,180 bank holdups, with the loot totaling $18,179,000. Yet, crime experts would say that bank robbery is much less of a problem now than it was in the Dillinger days. Allowing for inflation, population growth, the proliferation of bank branches that are more vulnerable to robbery, the sudden drop in liquor hijacking as a criminal activity, better crime reporting and other factors, it would appear that crime has not made the dramatic gains which the raw figures would indicate.

Similarly, the annual murder rate, according to the most recent figures, ran around 20,000 until a drop off in the 1990s. This figure, of course, represents reported and detected murder cases. A few decades ago it was estimated that for every murder reported another went undetected. Since then better scientific detection methods and the replacement of untrained coroners with professional medical examiners have no doubt led to the discovery of more murders. On the other hand, improved medical skills and techniques have saved the lives of many persons subjected to homicidal attacks. On balance, one cannot state responsibly that the murder rate has increased in recent years. Undue weight given to UCR statistics can often result in a "crime crisis" that is more apparent than real.

The value of the FBI statistics are not utterly worthless, as some critics have said. But neither are the critics of the UCR system "illogical and inane," as the late J. Edgar Hoover was prone to charge.

Unruh, Howard (1921–) serial killer

A quiet 28-year-old Bible reader who had become infatuated with guns while serving in the army, Howard Unruh killed 13 people in 12 minutes because he felt his Camden, N.J. neighbors were laughing at him behind his back.

On September 5, 1949 Unruh stepped from his home at 3202 River Road. Dressed in a tasteful brown tropical-worsted suit, white shirt and striped bow tie, he entered John Pilarchik's shoe repair shop at exactly 9:20 A.M. He approached within three feet of Pilarchik, who was hunched over nailing a heel to a shoe, pulled out a 9-mm Luger and shot him in the chest, killing him instantly.

Holding his pistol at the ready, Unruh calmly stepped back out in the morning sun, turned left and entered Clark Hoover's barber shop next door. Mrs. Edward Smith was in the barber shop with her young son and daughter. Her six-year-old boy, Orris, was sitting on a wooden hobby horse while Hoover cut his hair. Mrs. Smith, her daughter and two other boys waiting to have their hair cut hardly glanced at Unruh, thinking he was another customer. Unruh approached Hoover and said quietly, "I've got something for you, Clarkie."

Then as one would brush a branch aside, Unruh shot the little Smith boy through the head and chest. Now he could see Hoover better and killed him with shots to the head and body. Ignoring the screaming mother clutching the body of her dead son, Unruh turned and walked out to the street. When he didn't find druggist Maurice Cohen in his store, the crazed killer went upstairs to Cohen's living quarters and shot him to death. Unruh also gunned down pedestrians, motorists and three-year-old Tommy Hamilton, who was peeking out a window of his home. He shot 17-year-old Armond Harris in the right arm after slugging him with the pistol barrel. As his potential victim lay senseless, Unruh pulled the trigger again but there was only a harmless click. Although he had more ammunition in his pocket, he simply shrugged and trotted back home. The massacre, which claimed 13 lives, was over by the time police cars skidded to a stop on the street. Sixty policemen and detectives then laid siege to the Unruh home with pistol, rifle and submachine-gun fire. Unruh fired back only a few times. He was otherwise occupied.

During the siege his telephone rang. Unruh picked it up and calmly said, "Hello." At the other end of the line was Philip Buxton, assistant city editor of the Camden Courier-Post, who had decided to call the Unruh home after hearing about the rampage. He came up with one of the most bizarre interviews in history.

"Is this Howard?" Buxton asked. He could hear the shooting in the background.

"Yes, this is Howard. What's the last name of the party you want?"

"Unruh."

"Who are you and what do you want?"

Mass killer Howard Unruh after he surrendered.

“I’m a friend, and I want to know what they’re doing to you.”

Unruh’s voice was steady. “Well, they haven’t done anything to me yet, but I’m doing plenty to them.”

“How many have you killed?”

“I don’t know yet—I haven’t counted them, but it looks like a pretty good score.”

“Why are you killing people?”

“I don’t know. I can’t answer that yet, I’m too busy. A couple of friends are coming to get me.”

Buxton heard the line click. He dialed the number again but there was no answer. Inside the Unruh home, tear gas cannisters were exploding. Unruh parted the curtains, raised his arms and said he was coming out. He walked out to face the muzzles of several dozen guns. “I’m no psycho,” Unruh said in a formal tone. “I have a good mind.”

His final score fell far short of what Unruh apparently had intended. Except for some ragged shooting by Unruh, the death toll could have been at least 30. There were a lot of people he still wanted to kill. “I’d have killed a thousand if I’d had bullets enough,” he said.

Medical experts did not agree with Unruh’s evaluation of his mind. Never tried for murder, he was judged incurably insane and committed to a mental institution, where he remains.

unwritten law defense against murder charge

A notion long honored in American justice, although certainly not supported by statute, is that a man who has been cuckolded and murders his wife or her lover is somehow exempt from paying the penalty for his crime. This notion or custom, “the unwritten law,” was if not first established firmly rooted in the shocking Sickles-Key affair of 1859, often described as “the case that wrote the unwritten law.”

In 1859 the Honorable Daniel E. Sickles was a congressman from New York with a brilliant future ahead of him. His wife was the former Teresa Bagioli, the daughter of a renowned Italian operatic maestro, and he was a protege of President James Buchanan. Through an anonymous letter, he discovered his wife was being unfaithful, meeting regularly in a house on Washington's 15th Street with Philip Barton Key, district attorney for the District of Columbia and the son of Francis Scott Key, the composer.

Sickles determined the accuracy of the charge and then ordered his wife from his home after making her write a confession of her adulterous behavior. The next morning, February 27, 1859, Sickles was being visited by two close political friends when he looked out the window to see Key parading back and forth across the street, raising and lowering a handkerchief three times, the signal he used to summon Mrs. Sickles. Obviously, Key was unaware that anything untoward had happened concerning his liaison with Sickles' wife.

Abruptly, Sickles left the house and his guests. In a little park nearby, he confronted Key and shouted, "Key, you scoundrel, you have dishonored my house—you must die!" With that Sickles produced a Colt revolver and shot his wife's lover.

Key sank to the ground, wounded. Sickles pulled the trigger a second time but the weapon misfired. He produced another gun, a derringer, and shot Key a second time. Then he pointed the Colt at the fallen district attorney again, whereupon Key, in a weak voice, cried: "Don't shoot me! Please don't shoot me!" Sickles shot him once more, killing him.

Sickles returned home, washed up and then walked to the home of the attorney general and surrendered. The news of the murder and its motive caused a sensation. Sickles was not lodged in a cell but allowed to occupy a comfortable room in the warden's quarters.

Among the steady stream of well-wishers to call on him were many members of the Cabinet, and it was rumored that President Buchanan sent words of support.

Sickles was indicted and selection of a jury began on April 4, 1859. In the three weeks it took to select a jury, over 200 talesmen had to be dismissed after expressing approval of the shooting. During the trial Sickles' lawyers invoked the unwritten law, insisting a husband had the right to kill an interloper in his marriage. The defense offered another relatively new defense, claiming their client had become "temporarily insane" at the sight of Key.

All the prosecution could do was argue that it was against the law to go about murdering people whatever the provocation. It was no contest. Eleven of the 12 jurors said afterward that they didn't even want to leave the jury box, but one did. He prayed in a corner for divine guidance and then joined the other 11 in bringing in a verdict of not guilty.

Sickles went on to become a Civil War hero, losing a leg at Gettysburg. It should also be noted that a few years after his unwritten law acquittal, he took his wife back. To criticism of that, Sickles retorted: "I am not aware of any statute or code of morals which makes it infamous to forgive a woman."

Since Sickles' time, the unwritten law had been more talked about than invoked, as most lawyers regard the temporary insanity plea a much surer strategy. But some defense lawyers have used it often. When a judge once told Moman Pruiett, a famous attorney during the first half of the 20th century, "Moman there ain't no unwritten law," the courtroom wizard replied, "There is if the jury says there is."

Valachi, Joseph M. (1903–1971) informer

Although not a very important member of the crime organization he identified as the Cosa Nostra, Joe Valachi remains to this day one of the few Mafia members who violated omerta, the organization's code of silence. In September and October 1963 the gravel-voiced, swarthy, chain-smoking killer held much of the television public enthralled as he related the inner workings of organized crime, the Mafia and the national crime syndicate to the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee headed by Sen. John L. McClellan.

“Not since Frank Costello's fingers drummed the table during the Kefauver hearings,” The New York Times noted in an editorial, “has there been so fascinating a show.”

The tale Valachi told was a bloody one, including several murders that he himself had committed in the struggle for power within the New York Mafia, which controlled much of the underworld operations not only in New York City but in other parts of the nation as well. During his long criminal career Valachi had worked for Salvatore Maranzano from the late 1920s until the latter's death in 1931 and then for the Lucky Luciano family, whose leader had masterminded Maranzano's demise. Valachi, whose police record started when he was 18, was a “soldier,” or “button man,” whose duties included acting as a hit man, enforcer, numbers runner and drug pusher until 1959, when he was sentenced to 15 to 20 years on narcotics charges.

Valachi was sent to the federal penitentiary at Atlanta, where he was a cell mate of Vito Genovese, who had become the head of the Luciano crime family and, after Luciano's deportation to Italy according to Valachi, the “boss of bosses” within the Mafia. In 1962, Valachi later revealed, Genovese, after being falsely told that Valachi was an informer, gave him the “kiss of death” in their cell to let him know that he, Genovese, had ordered his murder. Valachi was terrified and subsequently mistook fellow prisoner Joe Saupp for Joe Beck (Joe DiPalermo), whom Valachi identified as the man assigned to kill him. Valachi killed Saupp with an iron pipe. After receiving a life sentence for that murder, he decided to turn informer and get federal protection.

When Valachi “sang” for the McClellan Committee, he was guarded by some 200 U.S. marshals. The Mafia was said to have placed a $100,000 price tag on his head. But to the man who admitted participating in five killings the bounty on his life came as no surprise. “You live by the gun and the knife and you die by the gun and the knife,” Valachi said.

While not everything Valachi testified to was new, he had, by the time he was through informing, helped to identify 317 members of the Mafia. Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy called Valachi's testimony “a significant addition to the broad picture” of organized crime. “It gives meaning to much that we already know and brings the picture into sharper focus.” However, other law enforcement officials and some persons with underworld connections derided much of Valachi's testimony as little more than good theater, at least half erroneous and even ludicrous. Many doubted the description of Genovese as the boss of bosses, insisting there was no such animal and if Genovese ever achieved that level of power, he never held it for any length of time. Some said the very expression "La Cosa Nostra" was generally unknown in syndicate circles, or was at best no more than a propaganda slogan aimed at the soldiers on the lowest level of organized crime. The Cosa Nostra label proved exceedingly valuable to the FBI's J. Edgar Hoover, who for decades had insisted there was no such thing as a Mafia or organized crime in America. Suddenly, and with a straight face, Hoover could assert that the FBI knew all about the Cosa Nostra and that "agents have penetrated its workings and its leadership" for "several years."

Yet there can be no doubt that Valachi's testimony, supplemented by his memoirs, The Valachi Papers (1969), had a devastating effect on many mafiosi. It greatly reduced the importance of the Genovese family and loosed a new violent power struggle within the Mafia.

Once Valachi had completed his testimony, he became the most carefully guarded inmate in the federal prison system. He was moved several times before being confined in September 1968 in the La Tuna Federal Correctional Institution at El Paso, Tex. He died there on April 3, 1971. To this day it is not difficult to find underworld characters who insist that Valachi did not die, that the death report was "a con to let the Feds hide him on the outside."

Valentine, Lewis J. (1882–1946) New York police commissioner

Police commissioner of New York from 1934 to 1945 and known during his 42 years in the department as the city's "honest cop," Lewis J. Valentine paired perfectly with Mayor Fiorello H. La Guardia in the latter's efforts to "run out the bums and rats." Valentine had previously seen his fortunes rise and fall depending on the extent of corrupt political and/or criminal influences that infected various city administrations. Joining the force as a patrolman in 1903, he made sergeant after 10 years and later became a lieutenant on the "confidential squad," charged with rooting out corrupt and graft-taking members of the department.

However, while Richard E. Enright was commissioner, Valentine fell from grace and was continually passed over for captain despite achieving the highest score on civil service examinations. He was transferred to the wilds of Brooklyn to satisfy Tammany Hall, which was upset by his constant raids on politically protected gambling operations. Later, under Commissioner George V. McLaughlin, he returned to favor and was promoted to captain, deputy inspector, inspector and deputy chief inspector within a year. He became even more famous for his gambling raids and his incorruptibility. When Grover A. Whalen was named police commissioner by Mayor Jimmy Walker, Valentine was broken to captain and once more returned to Brooklyn. Years after, it would be revealed that Whalen's office received $20,000 a week from the forces of Lucky Luciano, probably the city's most powerful Valentine hater.

Shortly after La Guardia took office, he named Valentine police commissioner. While Valentine's "rough on rats" program occasionally upset civil rights advocates, a spirit of reform swept through the police department. "I'll promote the men who kick these gorillas around and bring them in," Valentine said, "and I'll demote any policemen who are friendly with gangsters." In his first six years he fired 300 policemen, officially rebuked 3,000 and fined 8,000.

Valentine was given credit for filling the higher ranks of the police department with more honest men than ever before in New York's history. Under his command the time-honored police practice of "proving" efficiency, whereby citizen's complaints were simply left unrecorded in order to achieve a higher "solved" record, was eliminated.

Valentine deserved most of the credit for forcing Murder, Inc.'s Louis Lepke to surrender, although J. Edgar Hoover grabbed the limelight. Valentine applied such heat to the underworld that the gangster barely had enough time to breathe, and he warned that he intended to keep it up until the mobs realized control of their operations would be threatened unless Lepke surrendered. When some civil liberties groups protested to Mayor La Guardia that such police harassment was unconstitutional, the Little Flower summoned Valentine to the meeting and said, "Lewie, these people claim you violate the Constitution."

Valentine replied, "So do the gangsters." And on that note La Guardia sent the protesters on their way.

Paying a unique compliment to Valentine during the 1945 mayoralty campaign, all three major candidates for the office publicly promised to retain him in his post. When William O'Dwyer won, Valentine chose instead to retire. He signed a lucrative contract to function as "chief investigator-commentator" for the "Gang Busters" radio show and he made several movie shorts on crime prevention. However, Valentine soon tired of that career and accepted an offer from Gen. Douglas MacArthur to reorganize the Japanese police department along the lines of the New York department.

Valentine returned to this country in 1946, resumed his radio career and wrote his autobiography, Night Stick. He died in December of that year.

VALLEY Gang

Valley Gang early 20th-century Chicago gang

Chicago's Valley Gang was an Irish precursor of Al Capone's mob and later merged into the latter's operations.

What was to become a gang of hardened criminals in this century started out in the 1890s as a neighborhood play group on Fifteenth Street in the Bloody Maxwell section of the city. In the 1900s the Valley Gang began committing burglaries, picking pockets and, later, hiring out for murders. Around the time of World War I, the gang was under the leadership of Paddy Ryan, better known as Paddy the Bear thanks to his physique, who controlled much of the crime in Bloody Maxwell from a saloon he ran on South Halsted Street. Paddy the Bear was killed in 1920 by Walter Quinlan, known as the Runt. After serving only a few years in prison for the crime, the Runt was released and opened a saloon that became a rendezvous for trigger men and gangsters. When on one occasion the police raided the Runt's saloon, they collected a dozen automatic pistols, two machine guns and 10 bulletproof vests. The Runt's defiance of the Valley Gang ended when he was killed by Paddy the Fox, Paddy the Bear's son.

The most important leaders of the Valley Gang took over in 1920. They were Frankie Lake and Terry Druggan, who moved the gang into bootlegging and rum running. In time, the gang was the most prosperous criminal combine in Chicago. Even the lowliest members rode in Rolls-Royces. Naturally, such wealth gave the mob considerable leverage with the law in Chicago. In 1924 Lake and Druggan were sentenced to a year in prison for contempt of court, a punishment that proved to be laughable. A newspaper reporter who went to the county jail to interview Druggan was told, "Mr. Druggan is not in today."

The reporter said he would speak to Frankie Lake instead. The response was: "Mr. Lake also had an appointment downtown. They will be back after dinner."

The reporter's inquiry led to a major newspaper investigation, which revealed that, in consideration for $20,000 paid in bribes, Lake and Druggan were entitled to certain special privileges. They were permitted to dine regularly in the finer Loop restaurants and spent more time in their own apartments than they did in their cells. They came and went as they pleased and used the death cell in the jail as an office, where they met with their troops to give them instructions. The sheriff and jailer were later sent to prison for conniving in this arrangement.

The Valley Gang in subsequent years was absorbed into the Capone operation, in which its members continued to thrive. The Capone men always cited the Valley Gang as proof that Big Al took good care of the gangsters who joined him willingly.

vampires vice extortionists

Among the more loathsome types of extortionists prevalent in big cities during the 19th century were the "vampires," who made their living by victimizing men seen coming from a house of assignation. Vampires were generally young thugs who would follow a man back to his residence and then threaten to stand in front of his house chanting he "has just come from a whorehouse, just come from a whorehouse." In most vice districts the vampires were finally wiped out by the bordello operators themselves, who came to realize such activities were bad for business. They also took offense when vampires tried to extort money from some housewife-inmates returning to their own neighborhoods, where no one knew of their secret occupation.

In Chicago in the 1870s a particularly successful band of vampires was crushed because they harassed patrons of a large bagnio on Biler Avenue belonging to one Dan Webster. Unfortunately for the vampires, they did not know that the secret landlord of the building, and most likely Webster's partner, was Michael C. Hickey, the superintendent of police. The vampires deserted the area when they found that police would lay for them and give them a severe clubbing whenever they came within a block or two of Webster's place.

Vasquez, Tiburcio (1835–1875) bandit

Tiburcio Vasquez, who terrorized California in the 1870s, was a far more proficient robber and killer than the legendary Joaquin Murieta, and unlike Murieta he enjoyed the protection of his own people, mainly because they saw his acts as revenge for their treatment at the hands of the Anglos.

A thief since his teens who had been in and out of prison several times, Vasquez launched a five-year reign of terror after his release from San Quentin in 1870. Together with a large band of men, he carried out scores of robberies of stores, stagecoaches, and travelers. After the gang killed three unarmed men during an invasion-robbery of the town of Tres Pinos, he became the state's most-hunted man.

In one of his most daring raids, Vasquez robbed the hotel and all the stores in the town of Kingston, after his men first had tied up all the male citizens they found in the streets.

The reward on him was raised again after the Kingston raid. But he was finally betrayed, not for money but for love. One of his own men, Abdon Leiva, caught Vasquez, a prolific womanizer, with his wife. After waiting a while, Leiva surrendered to the sheriff and told him where Vasquez could be found. A large posse cornered Vasquez in Cahuenga Pass (now Hollywood). Although wounded in the battle, the outlaw was taken alive. This may be attributed to the reward, which offered $3,000 for him alive but only $2,000 dead.

Transferred to jail in San Jose, Vasquez was honored by his people, as thousands came to visit him. A large number were women, but it was clear he enjoyed great affection as a champion of the Mexican community. Certainly Vasquez thought of himself in that light, declaring before he was hanged on March 19, 1875: "A spirit of hatred and revenge took possession of me. I had numerous fights in defense of what I believed to be my rights and those of my countrymen. I believed we were being unjustly deprived of the social rights that belonged to us."

Vesey, Denmark (1767–1822) slave uprising leader

As a champion of black slaves in this country, Denmark Vesey had greater potential to lead a successful rebellion against white slave masters than Nat Turner was to have nine years later.

Certainly Vesey enjoyed the support of many more desperate slaves. He had become a freedman some 22 years earlier after winning a lottery and purchasing his liberty from his owner for $600. Later, while working as a carpenter, he plotted with Peter Poyas and several other blacks to foment an uprising of all slaves in Charleston, S.C. Slaves from up to 100 miles away joined the plot, making it impossible to keep secret. The uprising was planned for July 2, 1822, but more than a month before that date an informer told the authorities of the plan. Vesey and Poyas were arrested, but they denied all charges. When a third man, a slave, voluntarily surrendered after hearing he was wanted, the authorities tended to doubt the report, and all three were released.

Vesey then ordered the date of the insurrection moved forward to June 16, but once again the authorities were tipped off, this time on the night before the scheduled uprising. When the authorities found black sentinels already on guard at various points, they knew the report was accurate. Vesey, Poyas and 33 slaves were hanged and some 43 other slaves banished, dashing Vesey's bold plan to take control of Charleston and slaughter all slave holders.

Vicksburg "Volunteers" vigilantes

In 1835 the irate citizens of Vicksburg, Miss. formed a law-and-order group and cleaned out the Landing area, which was controlled by an army of whoremasters, con men and gamblers. Theoretically, the Volunteers acted following the great hysteria that gripped the South as a result of John Murrel's grandiose plot to take over a number of southern cities with an army of criminals aided by rebelling slaves. While some local criminals were undoubtedly involved in the plan, how anyone could have believed that the rich gambling elements would have participated much less benefited is a mystery. Yet, the Volunteers didn't discriminate when they swept into the Landing area and dragged known gamblers and hustlers from their saloons and gambling dens, hanging them by the dozen. Among those lynched were gambler John North and several of his aides, including Sam Smith, Dutch Bill, D. Hullum and a steerer known as McCall. North was notorious for having swindled a number of local residents out of their farms and land holdings through his crooked faro tables and roulette wheels. His victims were prominent among the Volunteers, and when he was hanged, his body was left on display for a considerable time with a crooked roulette wheel tied to it.

The vigilante noose became a warning symbol for other potential malefactors following a great many vigilante hangings in the Old West. After a troublemaker was "strung up," he often was buried with one end of the rope still around his neck and the other end running out of the grave as a warning to others. The proponents of this device insisted it worked well and, as one put it, "don't stink up the air with a corpse hanging around for days."

vigilantes of Montana

One of the most notable American outbreaks of vigilantism occurred in late 1863 and 1864 in the Montana Territory. Its aim was to wipe out an outlaw scourge that had brought most commerce, particularly the shipping of ore, almost to a standstill.

The vigilante activity focused on a notorious gang of killers and cutthroats surreptitiously headed by Sheriff Henry Plummer. Called the "Innocents," this criminal group in time had come to number over 100 members. Plummer, who was extremely persuasive and charismatic, was able to diffuse the vigilante movement for a while, but eventually, the activities of the Innocents became too blatant. Many of the gang's members were publicly identified, and Plummer himself was revealed as the brains behind their operations. At that point the vigilante movement formally organized under a covenant which read:

We the undersigned uniting ourselves in a party for the laudible purpos of arresting thieves & murderers & recovering stollen propperty do pledge ourselves & and our sacred honor each to all others & solemnly swear that we will reveal no secrets, violate no laws of right & and not desert each other or our standerd of justice so help us God. As witness our hand and seal this 23 of December A D 1863.

The Montana Vigilantes never wore masks, were not nightriders and generally afforded a suspect a reasonable opportunity to prove his innocence. They also attempted to warn a malefactor to clear out of the territory before he faced sterner action. A paper bearing the numbers 3-7-77 was usually tacked on a suspect's dwelling as a warning to leave. The exact meaning of the numerals is no longer known, but those who took heed were spared the rope.

The vigilantes struck late in 1863. In six weeks an estimated 26 Innocents, including Plummer, were hanged. The reign of vigilante terror continued for another year, during which several other outlaws were hanged without any evidence of a miscarriage of justice. The vigilantes sported their own historian, Thomas J. Dimsdale, an Oxford graduate and English professor whose chronicle of the movement was published in a book entitled Vigilantes of Montana. It was perhaps the most-impassioned tract ever written in support of lynch law. The “best” people of the territory were involved in the vigilance movement, including Nathaniel Pitt Langford, the father of Yellowstone National Park; Colonel Wilbur Fisk Sanders, later one of Montana’s first U.S. senators; and Nelson Story, one of the state’s leading businessmen and ranchers.

A later Montana vigilance movement was launched in 1884 against cattle rustlers but was labeled by some as being no more than a murderous tool of the big ranchers and stockmen against homesteaders. Such criticism never sullied the 1863–64 movement. As Wayne Gard pointed out in Frontier Justice, “Their work had made it easier to set up effective courts and law enforcement agencies when the territorial government was formed a few months later.”

vigilantes of San Francisco

The first justice in the gold camps of California was administered by miners courts. As crime increased, virtually every community of any size in the territory developed its own similar vigilance committees. Of these, the most notable was the one set up in 1851 in San Francisco, where crime was running rampant. In June of that year a former Mormon elder named Samuel Brannan organized the San Francisco Committee of Vigilance, which was unique for groups of its type in that it afforded each accused man a formal and reasonably fair trial before hanging him. Its first act was to hang an Australian highwayman caught in the act of robbing a safe. The local police chief attempted to rescue the condemned man but was shoved aside by the vigilantes to a roar of approval from the thousands who jammed the streets to see the execution. By August three more of the city’s leading lawbreakers received similar treatment before the committee officially disbanded.

By 1855 crime had soared again in San Francisco, and Brannan called for a new vigilance committee. Joining him were such prominent citizens as William T. Coleman and Leland Stanford, who later became governor and eventually U.S. senator. The first victims were two men who had killed a U.S. marshal. They were given an “orderly and dignified trial” and then hanged from the second story of the vigilantes’ headquarters. This was followed by two of the state’s most-celebrated hangings, that of an English criminal, Joseph Hetherington, and a New York hoodlum, Philander Brace.

Whenever a hanging took place, an English journalist reported, the hills were aswarm with humanity. “They seemed to cluster like bees on a tree branch, and for the purpose of seeing a criminal convulsed and writhing in the agonies of violent death! This desire seemed to pervade all classes of Americans in the city.”

In defense of the vigilantes, it must be said that their second appearance was caused by corrupt city officials who had literally turned San Francisco over to the criminals. With the election of an honest city administration, the second committee dissolved after staging a triumphal parade through the streets with 5,000 marchers. The San Francisco Committee achieved worldwide fame, and for the first time, lynch law on the American frontier escaped universal condemnation. Even The Times of London noted it was “seldom self-constituted authorities retire with grace and dignity, but it is due to the vigilante committee to say that they have done so.”

Viking murders

If you grant the Vikings really were the first European discoverers of America, there can be little doubt that they were also the first white men to commit murder in the New World.

According to the Viking sagas, Leif Ericson and his brother Thorvald Karlsefni started a colony in the New World around A.D. 1000 and almost immediately came face to face with a group of nine Indians. Instantly, they killed eight of them. Even if, as was to become an American custom, killing Indians didn’t count, the Vikings still deserve a first for homicide. Freydis, Ericson’s half-sister, and her husband murdered her two brothers and several others in the colony. Freydis personally axed five women in the group to death when her husband refused to do the deed himself. The survivors then returned to Greenland with an agreed-upon story that the others had chosen to remain in the New World.

Virginia City, Montana lawless mining town

No list of the most murderous towns in America would be complete without the mining camp of Virginia City in what is now Montana.

Gold was discovered along Alder Gulch in 1863, and within weeks an estimated 10,000 miners had created the mining town of Virginia City. Like all mining towns, it was plagued by violence, in this case supplemented by the depredations of outlaw Sheriff Henry Plummer and his Innocents. Virginia City had the distinction of having 190 murders within a six-month period. Statistically, the figure worked out to a four percent chance that a man would meet a violent end there within a year and that over a 25-year period he was almost certain to contract lead poisoning.

Perhaps it was fortunate that the placers started running out within just a few years and Virginia City began a steady decline toward becoming a ghost town. Today, with its ghost town features well preserved, it is the state’s top tourist attraction.

voiceprints identification method

Almost certainly in future years, despite misgivings by civil rights proponents, a national computerized file of sound spectrograms or voiceprints will join the archives of fingerprints. Slowly, voiceprints are gaining legal recognition, although not without judicial objections. Advocates insist that for purposes of identification they are as reliable as fingerprints and far more reliable than handwriting comparisons. They insist that no two voices have ever been found to be exactly alike.

The developer of the technique, Lawrence G. Kersta, described his methods before the Acoustical Society of America in 1962. At the time a Bell Telephone researcher, Kersta insisted that after studying thousands of voiceprints, he concluded that no two human voices were exactly alike, not even those of identical twins, and that it was impossible to fool the spectrograph by disguising a voice. Voiceprinting involves the use of a tape recorder and a spectrograph, a device that turns speech sounds into visible diagrams, much as electronic impulses are turned into pictures for television. In one of Kersta’s early tests, involving 25,000 spectrographs, researchers were able to make a correct identification of the speaker with an accuracy rate of over 97 percent. Kersta has since held that with properly trained technicians accuracy would approach 100 percent.

Police have successfully used voiceprints in cracking cases involving telephone extortion demands and obscene phone calls. The findings of voiceprint experts have been allowed as evidence in some court proceedings but not permitted in others. Following the Watts riots, the Columbia Broadcasting System decided to air a TV program in California entitled “Watts: Riot or Revolt,” which included an interview with a 19-year-old black youth who admitted taking part in the riot. As he was interviewed, the youth’s identity was carefully concealed by camera angles and lighting. However, police obtained a sound spectrograph of the interview and, based on Kersta’s findings, eventually made an arrest. Kersta was permitted to testify in court and the youth was convicted and sentenced to a term of one to 10 years. In October 1968 the California District Court of Appeals reversed the verdict, finding: “Kersta’s admission that his process is entirely subjective and founded on his opinion alone, without general acceptance within the scientific community, compels us to rule that voiceprint identification has not reached a sufficient level of scientific certainty to be accepted as identification evidence in a case where the life and liberty of a defendant may be at stake.”

Later that same year a New Jersey court permitted the introduction of voiceprint evidence in support of the defense, although the judge indicated he would forbid such evidence if presented as proof of guilt. Kersta’s testimony in the case was instrumental in gaining the acquittal of a man convicted in a lower court of making obscene telephone calls.

In 1978 courts in Maine allowed spectrographic examiners to testify, applying ordinary evidentiary standards, which call for weighing the reliability and relevancy of the evidence against its tendency to prejudice, mislead or confuse a jury. That same year the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit made a similar decision. On the other hand, Maryland’s highest court, at about the same time, ruled out the use of voiceprint tests. Still, legal experts tend to believe the thrust is toward eventual acceptance of voiceprints as evidence in legal cases.

Perhaps the most famous use of voiceprints occurred in the case of Clifford Irving’s forged biography of Howard Hughes. Although he denied the biography was authentic, Hughes refused to appear in public to attack the book. He did, however, agree to a telephone interview with seven newsmen who had known him. After he had answered their questions, all the newsmen were satisfied that the man they had talked to was Howard Hughes. Anticipating Irving’s certain claim that the man was an imposter, the prosecution retained Kersta and another voiceprint expert, Dr. Peter Ladefoged, to judge the authenticity of the voice after studying sound spectrographs of the telephone conversation and comparing them with those of earlier recordings made by Hughes. Irving later confessed his hoax.

Nevertheless, the possibility of a computer bank of voiceprints has caused apprehension in many quarters. Opponents of the idea cite a report published by the New York Post in 1973 that the FBI, acting on behalf of the CIA, had asked a radio station, WMCA, which featured a “call-in” program, to record all incoming phone calls critical of President Richard Nixon and his associates. Although the station denied there was such a blanket demand, it said that it recorded all conversations and that the CIA had requested a recording of a specific conversation about the administration that was of a threatening nature. It remains clear that voiceprinting probably involves more “police state” potential than most other methods of identification.

Vollmer, August (1876–1955) Berkeley, California police chief

The father of the modern scientific police force, August Vollmer is generally acknowledged today as having been America’s most far-sighted and influential police chief. As chief of police in Berkeley, Calif. from 1905 to 1932, he created a department far ahead of its time. Though not a scientist, he steeped himself in all the latest scientific developments and looked for ways to apply them to police work. He even anticipated police radio communications before the introduction of the radio, devising a method whereby patrol cars could answer emergency calls with incredible speed for that era. Vollmer had special signal lights connected to police headquarters installed at all major intersections. When a crime was telephoned in to headquarters, the signal lights in the area of the crime were blinked on and off. Officers seeing the flashing lights would immediately telephone in for instructions on where to go.

Considering his later distinguished career, Vollmer had an unimpressive background. He had been a Philippine Scout in the U.S. Army and later a postman in Berkeley before becoming a police officer. Once on the force, his rise was meteoric. After he became chief, Vollmer recruited only the best possible candidates for job openings on the force. He had the advantage of having to maintain only a small department, for a long time just a few more than 30 men, and thus could, as he said, “be fussy.” Most of the recruits he picked had at least some college background in the sciences. Early on in his post, he said: “We believe in employing every method known to modern science that will keep us at least one jump ahead of the criminal—not one jump behind.” Under Vollmer’s guidance the country’s first formal training school for policemen was established in Berkeley in 1908. His crime laboratory, though modest in size, became famous as one of the most efficient in the nation, and was consulted by many other departments on matters of identification and development of clues.

Every new scientific development interested him. He was particularly intrigued by the experiments being done in the area of lie detection and assigned a colleague, John A. Larson, to construct a lie detector that the department could use. Larson produced the first polygraph, and when Larson moved on to other law enforcement positions, Vollmer had a brilliant student at the University of California, Leonard Keeler, perfect the device and develop what became known as the Keeler Polygraph.

Vollmer credited many of his solutions to crimes to the fact that he simply was well read in the police sciences. Once, he solved a case without ever leaving his office. At a conference with some of his officers who were making no headway in solving an outbreak of arson cases in a certain neighborhood, Vollmer leaned back in his chair and said: “Well, I’d check the neighborhood very thoroughly. Ring doorbells. I’d look for a feeble-minded person, preferably one who hasn’t been living in Berkeley very long and who might be homesick.”

Without understanding why, the officers followed Vollmer’s instructions and solved the case. A feeble-minded youth who had recently moved to California to live with relatives readily confessed to setting the fires. When the officers later expressed their amazement to Vollmer, he showed them a book, Criminal Psychology by Hans Gross, an Austrian criminologist, and had them read a chapter on nostalgia. Gross expounded on a theory that when a feeble-minded person is uprooted and moved to a new environment, he often becomes homesick. Somehow, he tends to relieve this feeling by starting fires.

After retiring from his post in 1932, Vollmer was active as a writer and lecturer on police work. Perhaps the best measure of his contribution to police work was that in the 1940s there were 25 police chiefs around the country who at one time had served under him in Berkeley.

Von Bülow, Claus (1926–) cleared of attempted murder charges

For some 19 years until late 1999, and presumably much longer, Martha “Sunny” von Bülow had been in a coma in a vegetative state with no medical expectation of ever regaining consciousness. That situation led to two of the most sensational trials of the 1980s, during which her husband, Danish-born socialite Claus von Bülow, was accused of seeking to either kill her or cause her death by denying her required medication to alter her hypoglycemic (low blood sugar) condition.

The prosecution presented the evidence offered by Maria Schrollhammer, Sunny’s longtime private maid, that she had seen a little black bag with a vial of “insulin” and a hypodermic syringe. The maid also testified that von Bülow seemed uncaring when his wife suffered attacks, once waiting until Sunny was “barely breathing” before summoning a doctor. That coma was due to an apparent drug overdose.

Then on December 21, 1980, Sunny was found unconscious on the floor of her bathroom in the couple’s fashionable Newport, Rhode Island, mansion. She was rushed to a hospital, later transferred to a Boston hospital and then to Columbia Presbyterian Medical Center in New York City, where she thereafter remained in a coma, vegetative and in a fetal position.

The prosecution felt it had a powerful case against von Bülow. Von Bülow was well-to-do but not in the same league financially with his wife. Educated in England at Cambridge University, he had worked for a time for J. Paul Getty, advising the oil billionaire on legal and diplomatic matters. When the von Bülows were married they soon became much sought after by the social elite, and were distinguished for their elegant dinner parties. They were both patrons of the arts, and Claus became a profitable investor in Deathtrap, a highly acclaimed Broadway comedy thriller, ironically about a husband who plans to kill his wife for her fortune. That was what the prosecution alleged was von Bülow’s intent in real life. It said von Bülow wanted to inherit his share of his wife’s fortune, amounting to about $14 million, and then marry his mistress, Alexandra Isles, a beautiful socialite and former television soap-opera actress.

The prosecution won the first trial on two counts of assault with intent to murder and von Bülow was sentenced to 30 years imprisonment but was freed under $1 million bail. Von Bülow appealed the verdict, a process he assigned to Harvard professor Alan Dershowitz. In the Rhode Island Supreme Court Dershowitz argued that von Bülow’s “little black bag” and its supposedly incriminating contents had been illegally seized and used against the defendant. Von Bülow’s 1982 conviction was thrown out. However, Sunny’s two children by a previous marriage, Prince Alexander von Auersperg and his sister, Princess Annie Laurie von Auersperg Kneissl, again filed charges that their stepfather tried to kill their mother.

The second trial was held in 1985. A brilliant defense attorney, Thomas Puccio, advised by Dershowitz, brought in experts who testified that drugs and alcohol, rather than insulin, had caused Sunny’s Socialite Claus von Bülow was portrayed in the press as weeping as he entered the mansion he once shared with his comatose wife, Sunny. Actually he apparently was reacting to a greeting given him by the family's two pet dogs (not shown).

comas. It was claimed that Sunny had injected herself with mixtures of Demerol and amphetamines and that von Bülow's extramarital affairs had greatly depressed her. Von Bülow was quoted as saying Sunny had lost interest in sex after their daughter, Cosima, was born in 1967, and that was why he had sought the attentions of another woman. Medical experts for the prosecution testified that only insulin injections could have caused the comas. Thus the jurors were left to debate the testimony of experts on both sides. Even Isles, von Bülow's mistress, testified against him.

In his summation after nine weeks of sensational testimony, which was a delight to the tabloid press, Puccio implored the jury to consider only the real facts in the case. He admitted it was "not a pretty picture. Mr. von Bülow was cheating on his wife and he was stringing Alexandra Isles along. No matter what you think of Mr. von Bülow's conduct of his marriage, please don't hold that fact against him in this case." The jury on June 10, 1985 acquitted the 58-year-old defendant.

Sunny's two children by her previous marriage then filed a $56-million lawsuit against von Bülow. They sought to bar von Bülow from collecting $120,000 a year from a trust fund Sunny had established for him, claiming he had falsely influenced her while planning to do her in. Meanwhile Cosima was disinherited by her maternal grandmother because she had stood by her father and could have provided him with money. In 1986 von Bülow tried to settle the matter by divorcing Sunny and giving up all claims to any of her fortune, estimated in total to be somewhere between $25 and $40 million, if the children dropped the suit against him and gave their half-sister, Cosima, her fair share of the estate left by Sunny's mother. The offer was rejected, but the following year the parties came to an agreement. Von Bülow renounced all claims to Sunny's fortune and agreed not to write any books about the case. Cosima gained one-third share of her grandmother's estate.

Waddell, Reed (1859–1895) swindler

Among the most successful American swindlers to operate both in this country and in Europe during the last century, Reed Waddell was an artful practitioner of the green goods racket and without doubt the greatest of all at the gold brick swindle.

Some historians erroneously credit Waddell with originating the gold brick game in New York in 1880, but there is ample evidence that the racket was pulled before that. It is known, for instance, that Wyatt Earp and Mysterious Dave Mather were selling “gold bricks” to gullible cowboys in 1878 in Mobeetie, Tex. Even though Waddell did not invent the game, he certainly made it pay off more than anyone else had.

The son of a very rich and respectable Springfield, Ill. family, Waddell refused to go into the family business and instead gravitated to gambling circles. In 1880 he turned up in New York with the first gold brick to be offered for sale there. The brick was actually a lead bar covered with three platings of gold and containing a slug of solid gold in the center. Waddell would tell a potential sucker that he was forced to sell the brick. He would then guide the victim to an accomplice posing as an assayer, who would declare the brick pure gold. If the victim was still dubious, Waddell would impulsively dig out the slug of real gold in the center and insist the man take it to a jeweler himself for another test. When the assay turned out positive, the sucker was hooked. Waddell sold his first lead brick for $4,000, never got less than $3,500 and often made twice that price.

Another of Waddell’s cons was the green goods swindle. In this scheme Waddell would show a sucker some real money, tell him it was counterfeit and then offer to sell him a large batch of the bills at bargain prices. Once the sucker was convinced the merchandise was absolutely undetectable, he would eagerly agree to make a big buy. At the time of the transaction he would again be shown real money, but at the last moment the package containing the bills would be switched for a similar-looking one in which there was nothing but cut-up pieces of green paper. From 1880 to 1890 Waddell took in more than a quarter of a million dollars with these two schemes before switching exclusively to gold bricks, a scam whose advantage was the great time lag before the victim realized he’d been taken. Waddell found Europe, especially Paris and London, an ideal locale for pulling the gold brick swindle. In March 1895 he was killed by another swindler named Tom O’Brien in a dispute over the split in one of their capers.

Wagner, John F. (1893–1950) embezzler

It has been said that the motives for most embezzlers are one or more of the three R’s: rum, redheads and race horses. What made one of this country’s greatest embezzlers so different was that he was motivated by none of the three.

John F. Wagner was the cashier of the First National Bank in the little coal town of Cecil, Pa. When the bank examiners came calling one Monday morning in 1950, they found Wagner sprawled dead on the floor next to the vault, a bullet in his head. Soon, they discovered why. The 57-year-old Wagner, a resident of Cecil all his life, was short the sum of $1,125,000.

WAITE, Dr. Arthur Warren

But the motivation for the embezzlement remained a puzzle, since Wagner didn't wench, drink or gamble. In fact, he only owned two winter suits, one of which he was buried in. The examiners solved the puzzle when they found a note in Wagner's handwriting. "The reason for the shortage was because of paying checks that were not good." Appended to the note was a list of persons who had defaulted on their loans or had written scores of rubber checks. Townspeople had an explanation for Wagner's downfall: he was a complete soft touch who never could turn away a friend in need.

Authorities went about trying to make as many people as possible meet their debts. But for Wagner, it was too late.

Waite, Dr. Arthur Warren (1887–1917) murderer

In 1916 Dr. Arthur Warren Waite, a leading New York dental surgeon and a brilliant germ culture researcher at Cornell Medical School, committed two of this country's most-celebrated poison murders. He is remembered, however, not so much for his deeds as for his style, which, if nothing else, proved that a knowledge of medical science doesn't necessarily make a person an efficient killer.

Dr. Waite was an exceptionally handsome man in his late twenties. Tall, athletic and debonair, he had made a considerable impact on New York's Upper West Side society. An expert tennis player, he won several tournaments; Franklin P. Adams and other well-known tennis addicts considered him to be the best player on the local courts. Waite was also devoting a good deal of attention to making himself a millionaire. That he figured to do by wiping out his wife's parents, millionaire drug manufacturer John E. Peck and his wife of Grand Rapids, Mich. When the Pecks, in their seventies, passed away, Waite's wife stood to inherit approximately $1 million.

Mrs. Peck came to visit the Waites for Christmas in 1915. Waite took his mother-in-law out driving with the windshield open in a pouring rain so as to bring on pneumonia. He put ground glass in her marmalade. He sprayed her throat with bacteria and viruses known to cause influenza, anthrax, diphtheria and streptococcus. Some of Mrs. Peck's friends commented on how well she looked, and she did have a nice rosy-cheeked face. Finally, however, the old woman died on January 30, 1916, with doctors attributing her death to kidney disease. Waite wasn't at all sure whether she had died because of or in spite of what he had given her, but he was determined that no one else would know either. He had his mother-in-law cremated, which he said was her last request.

Mr. Peck, saddened by his wife's death, came to visit the following month. While consoling him, Waite filled his galoshes with water, dampened his bedsheets while he slept, opened a container of chlorine gas in his bedroom while he slept and even fed him a mixture of burned flypaper and veronal. When Peck developed a snuffle, Waite gave him a nasal spray laced with tuberculosis bacteria. Nothing happened.

Becoming desperate, he gave the old man 18 grains of arsenic, presumably enough to kill a team of horses. Peck took to bed but did not die. Finally, Waite took a pillow and smothered him to death. That, of course, worked, and Waite went out celebrating with his mistress. He was seen by a woman friend of the family, who thought it was callous of him to be carrying on in such fashion with his father-in-law's body not even cold. In an anonymous letter to the authorities, she accused the dentist of poisoning Mr. and Mrs. Peck. Large amounts of arsenic were found in Mr. Peck, and police investigators traced the poison to Waite, who finally confessed his entire plot.

Waite died in the electric chair at Sing Sing on May 24, 1917. He was annoyed when guards came to escort him to the death chamber because they interrupted his reading of a volume of Robert Browning's poetry. Waite marked with a pencil the last lines he had read:

*"Life's a little thing!
Such as it is, then,
pass life pleasantly. . . ."*

Walker, James J. (1881–1946) mayor of New York

New York's inimitable Night Mayor, Jimmy Walker was the most important municipal chief executive ever forced from office on corruption charges. The silver-tongued politician became mayor in 1925 and soon demonstrated that he enjoyed the high life as well as the nightlife of New York far more than the grueling detail of running the world's richest city. In many respects the glib Walker was right for a fun-loving New York saddled with a Prohibition law that wouldn't work and a wild prosperity that wouldn't last. Under Walker the city sunk to new lows of corruption, with the mayor himself accepting money in both hands.

At the time Walker took office, the Luciano-Costello forces were making their first weekly graft payments to the police commissioner's office, initially $10,000 and within a few years $20,000. For this sum the gangsters' operations were allowed to function without interference as long as no innocent civilians were harmed and sometimes even if they were. Now and then, following negotiations between a police official and Luciano, a "raid for show" would be carried out, with attention given to ways of limiting the damage.

These payoffs were never traced to Walker, since he collected what was considered a better class of money. None of the graft taking and corruption became public knowledge until the various Seabury probes began in 1930, by which time Walker had won reelection, defeating a popular reformer, Fiorello La Guardia, by a huge margin. New York loved their Night Mayor, who paraded down Broadway and could be seen almost every night in the classier speakeasies in town, such as the Central Park Casino. Besides being the Night Mayor, Walker was also the Late Mayor, never arriving at City Hall before noon and almost never being on time for an appointment.

Perhaps the grimness of the onsetting Depression doomed Jimmy Walker as much as the probings of Samuel Seabury, but those investigations certainly took the bloom off his administration. Seabury started out focusing on the misdeeds of the New York Police Department, especially its vice squad, which concentrated on making the city safe for hookers. There were shocking tales of reputable housewives being blackmailed by cops, who told them they would have to pay money or face vice charges that would wreck their lives and marriages. Before she was murdered, a prostitute-madam-blackmailer named Vivian Gordon made even more shocking revelations about police misdeeds.

As the Seabury inquiry widened, the spotlight shifted to general municipal corruption until Walker himself was caught in the glare in 1932. He was summoned to take the stand before the Hofstadter Joint Legislative Committee, counseled by Seabury. It proved to be a difficult and embarrassing day for Walker. He denied allegations by Seabury that an accountant named Russell T. Sherwood—who could not be located—was his front man. It was shown that Sherwood had banked over $700,000 and had on one occasion, just before Walker sailed on a trip to Europe, withdrawn $263,838. Finally, the mayor was forced to concede that over a four-year period he had pocketed $432,677. Nor could Walker satisfactorily explain how he had earned $26,000 in oil stock deals with taxi-cab mogul J. A. Sisto without ever investing a penny of his own money. Evidence was presented that J. Allan Smith, a contact man for a bus company in search of franchises, staked Walker to a $10,000 letter of credit for a European vacation and came through with another $3,000 when the mayor ran over his expense budget. Then there was the $246,000 profit in a joint stock account with Paul Block, a Brooklyn publisher and financier. Block's testimony hardly helped Walker's case; the publisher said his 10-year-old son had once noted that the world's richest city paid its mayor a trifling pittance ($40,000 a year), so Block determined "to make some money for Jimmy."

During the Seabury Investigation, New York's "Night Mayor" of the 1920s, James J. Walker, was forced to make damning admissions about his huge secret income and subsequently resigned from office.

Armed with this testimony, Seabury took the case against Walker to Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt. Walker beat the prosecutor to the punch on September 1, 1932 by wiring Roosevelt: "I HEREBY RESIGN AS MAYOR OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK . . . JAMES J. WALKER."

He then promptly sailed for Europe in the company of his showgirl-mistress. Walker did not return to America until 1935, when the heat from the investigations had cooled and he was certain he would no longer be prosecuted. The ex-mayor found New York in a forgiving mood and he enjoyed considerable popularity. He reminded the city of a time that was colorful, sometimes charming and even elegant, although extremely corrupt. Walker represented the "good old days." It was hard to hate a man who had taken a ton of money and had now rather obviously run through it. Jimmy Walker simply was Jimmy Walker. Even such a hard-nosed exponent of honesty as Mayor La Guardia understood that. He appointed his predecessor to a $20,000 a year job as head of industrial and labor relations with the cloak-and-suit industry. Walker was still remembered fondly for years after he died in 1946.

Walker, Jonathan last legal branding victim

Branding for criminal offenses was a common punishment in America from the 17th century until 1844, when Jonathan Walker became the last man to be judicially branded. He had the initials SS, for slave stealer, burned into the palm of his right hand. Walker had been convicted of attempting to help slaves escape to the Bahamas. Walker's experience was the inspiration for John Greenleaf Whittier's abolitionist poem "The Man With the Branded Hand."

WALL, Tessie

Wall, Tessie (1869–1932) San Francisco madam

The best-known parlor house madam in San Francisco from 1900 to 1917, Tessie Wall was described as a "flamboyant, well-upholstered blonde." Her most famous brothel, at 337 O'Farrell Street, was regarded as the Golden Gate City's greatest fun palace. She stocked it with beautiful, slightly plump girls, remarkably all of them blondes. She charged what was then an outrageous price, $20, for an assignation. But the clients seemed to feel it was worth it and said Tessie Wall's services were "super." Overnight guests could expect to find their clothes pressed and shoes shined when they awoke in the morning. Those who were not staying and had to get back across the bay to Oakland would be interrupted by Tessie and informed, "You just have time to catch the last ferry."

As was true of many famous madams, Tessie Wall in later life was invested with perhaps more colorful accomplishments than she deserved, such as the journalistic credit for inventing the phrase, "Company, girls!"; those words were probably first uttered by an earlier madam, Bertha Kahn. In Tessie's case, this sort of embroidery was pointless since her own legitimate achievements were quite sufficient to make her famous. An incredible drinker, she once drank boxer John L. Sullivan under the table. Tessie was amazingly generous with the police and generally led off the Grand March at the annual policemen's ball on the arm of Mayor Sunny Jim Rolph. She started things rolling at such affairs by slapping a $1,000 bill down on the bar and shouting, "Drink that up, boys!"

Long married to Frank Daroux, a gambler and owner of a number of brothels, she resisted his entreaties that she leave the business and become a country housewife on a lavish estate that he had bought for her in San Mateo County. Once, Tessie told him, "I'd rather be an electric light pole on Powell Street than own all the land in the sticks." After Daroux finally divorced her, Tessie begged him to return. When he refused, she sent word to him that she would fix him so no other woman would ever want him. She did her best to keep her word in the summer of 1916 by firing three bullets into his body from a .22-caliber revolver. When the police arrived, she was standing over him crying, "I shot him because I love him—damn him!"

Daroux survived, and although the shooting permanently weakened him, he refused to testify against Tessie and she was released. Tessie retired from the business in 1917 during a wartime wave of reform that wiped out the Barbary Coast and most of the sordid features of her bailiwick, the so-called Upper Tenderloin, which was the city's best theater and restaurant district. Years of wild living and gambling had reduced her fortunes considerably, but she had enough left to establish herself comfortably in a nice flat on Eighteenth Street, taking with her many of the furnishings from her O'Farrell Street place, including a needlepoint wall motto that read, "If every man was as true to his country as he is to his wife—God help the U.S.A." Tessie died in April 1932.

Wall Street explosion New York bombing

Probably the most intensive police hunt in New York's history followed an explosion on Wall Street at noon on September 16, 1920.

On that day a horse-drawn wagon containing a concealed bomb was left in front of the U.S. Assay Office, opposite the J. P. Morgan Building. As during any other weekday lunch hour, clerks, stenographers, bankers, brokers and messengers choked the narrow streets. The only out-of-the-ordinary activity was the transfer by workmen of gold ingots, worth $15,000 each, to the Assay Office from the U.S. Sub-Treasury building next door.

At 12:01 P.M. the bomb exploded, killing 30 persons and injuring another 300. The pavements were littered with people writhing in agony or deathly still. Many had had limbs ripped off. A number of those still able to walk hobbled to nearby Trinity Church to take refuge. Bomb fragments rained into the House of Morgan, killing one employee inside. Other financial houses were badly damaged. Panic ensued in the New York Stock Exchange, as brokers racing for exits collided with one another, tumbling into heaps.

The disaster sent a shudder throughout New York and, as news wires crackled, stunned the entire nation. There was near unanimous opinion that the explosion had been the work of anarchists or other radical terrorists. Instantly, various public and financial buildings and men of great wealth were placed under heavy guard. In Chicago police cordoned off the Stock Exchange and other buildings in the La Salle Street sector. Similar measures were taken in Philadelphia and Boston. In New York a force of 30 private detectives guarded the J. P. Morgan home on Madison Avenue, and pedestrians were not permitted to pass in front of the mansion. Forty armed guards ringed the Pocantico Hills estate of John D. Rockefeller.

William J. Flynn, chief of the Secret Service, announced: "This bomb was not directed at Mr. Morgan [who at the time was in Scotland] or any individual. In my opinion, it was planted in the financial heart of America as a defiance of the American people. I'm convinced a nationwide dynamiting conspiracy exists to wreck the American government and society."

A large number of suspects were questioned, including the anti-Communist Carlo Tresca and his group of Italian "terrorists." Tresca was later cleared, as were others, mostly foreigners deemed to have a hatred for Wall Street and what it represented. After a time some theorized that the dynamiting was the work of criminals who had planned a bold robbery of the gold bullion. According to this theory, having been slowed by traffic, the thieves were forced to flee the wagon because the bomb had already been activated and was about to go off.

Nothing much came of that theory either. In fact, all the massive investigation ever turned up was a horseshoe. Although it was traced to the manufacturer, the shoe produced no lead to the identity of the owner of the horse and wagon.

Walsh, Adam (1975–1981) classic missing child case

The disappearance and murder of six-year-old Adam Walsh caused an incredible public hysteria about serial killers claiming young children as victims. But the Walsh case, as tragic as it was, seemed not to be an example of a serial killing but, rather, of a child abduction which sometimes results in murder but more frequently in permanent unsolved disappearance that makes homicide seem the likely conclusion.

Young Adam disappeared on July 27, 1981 after his mother left him in the videogame department of a Sears store at a mall in Hollywood, Florida. When Adam's mother returned, her son was gone. In the meantime a security guard had escorted some older boys off the premises and it was possible that Adam had gone with them.

Following frantic searches by hundreds of volunteers, nothing was found for about three weeks. Then the tragic climax occurred when Adam's severed head was found in a canal in Vero Beach some three weeks later.

Adam's father, embittered by law enforcement's failure to find his son alive, embarked on a national crusade for placing photos of missing children in newspapers and magazines and even on milk cartons. Recognized as a relentless proponent of public awareness in preventing these and other crimes, the elder Walsh became the host of the TV show America's Most Wanted.

Then the national crime news became dominated by two strange figures, Henry Lee Lucas and Ottis Toole, who started making bizarre confessions. While being held by police on weapons charges and suspicion of murder, Lucas made confession after confession after confession. He said he had killed 69 people alone and another 20 or so with Toole. Later on Lucas would start raising the total to staggering heights. In the meantime Toole was in prison in Florida for arson, doing 20 years to life. Toole started aping Lucas and allowed he probably killed 50 or so people on his own. Among other things, he declared he was a practicing cannibal, had interest in Satanism and was a member in a cult of death.

On October 21, 1983, Toole really shook up the country, confessing to Florida police that among his victims was Adam Walsh. Assistant Police Chief Leroy Hessler was impressed with the details of the crime, which he said were "grisly beyond belief." Hessler announced to the press that "there are certain details only he could know. He did it. I've got the details that no one else would know. He's got me convinced."

Needless to say parents from coast to coast were shocked and frightened by Toole's confession. Then a few weeks later the public was to be stunned again. The law reversed its stand and declared that Toole was "no longer a suspect" in the Adam Walsh case.

Among other crimes he committed, Toole had said, was the murder of a massage parlor employee in Colorado Springs and the stabbing of another woman in 1974. The authorities now were suspicious of anything Toole said and grilled him extensively, catching him in contradictions. Finally he withdrew that claim also, telling prosecutors, "Okay, if you say I didn't kill her, maybe I didn't."

Eventually Toole was not convicted of any murders at all, and the Adam Walsh case returned to the unsolved files. Toole died in prison of cirrhosis of the liver in 1996.

Walsh, Johnny "The Mick" (?–1883) gang leader and murderer

Leader of the Walsh gang, a power on New York's Bowery in the 1870s and early 1880s, Johnny "the Mick" was a brutal gangster known to kill not only his victims but also any other crooks daring to operate on what he regarded as his turf.

WALSH School feud

The Walshers carried on a war with the Dutch Mob, a rival outfit of sneak thieves, muggers and pickpockets, for supremacy along the Bowery. Walsh personally feuded on a number of occasions with Johnny Irving, one of the Dutch Mob's leaders, and at least three times, the pair engaged in knife fights without doing one another serious damage. The police, for their part, did not interfere in the battles between the two gang leaders. Superintendent of Police George W. Walling was quoted as saying that only good could come of the bad blood between the pair; his words proved prescient. One day in late 1883 Johnny the Mick was standing at the bar of Shang Draper's notorious saloon on Sixth Avenue when Johnny Irving walked in with a friend, Billy Porter. The two gangsters stood glaring at each other for several moments. Suddenly, Johnny the Mick drew a pistol and shot Irving dead. Immediately, Billy Porter drew a gun and killed Johnny the Mick. Whereupon Shang Draper pulled a gun and shot Billy Porter. Porter survived, and no charges were pressed against him or Draper, each of whom claimed he was "keeping the peace." The police were satisfied, being rid of both Johnny Irving and Johnny the Mick.

Walsh School feud

Undoubtedly, the most remarkable schoolboy feud in American history occurred in Chicago at the Walsh School on Johnson Street. A war between two rival gangs of schoolboys broke out in 1881 and continued for almost three decades, during which several boys were killed and more than a score were shot, stabbed or severely beaten with clubs or brickbats. A number of pitched gun battles were fought both inside and outside the school by the two gangs, which were known as the Irishers and the Bohemians, although ethnic origin was not the real touchstone of allegiance. Place of residence was the important factor, with boys living east of Johnson Street constituting the Irishers and those west of Johnson making up the Bohemians.

For years the boys came to school armed with revolvers and knives and on many occasions they would take pot shots at one another in the classrooms. Some of these little gangsters were only 10 years old and so small that they had to use both hands to even lift their weapons to firing position. The last major gunfight between the rival gangs occurred in December 1905, when 25 Irishers and an equal number of Bohemians blazed away at each other outside the school until police arrived. Finally, authorities launched daily searches of all pupils going into or leaving the school and confiscated all weapons found. This continued for several years until the level of violence dropped.

Ward, Return J. M. (?–1857) murderer

Return Ward's execution was said to have attracted the largest crowd to attend a hanging in pre-Civil War Ohio. His crime was regarded as so heinous that the jury found him guilty without allowing him to finish his testimony.

A hulking lout, Ward had often mistreated his wife, Olive, until she finally left him. Early in 1857 she succumbed to his pleas and returned to him, much against the advice of friends and neighbors. When Olive was not seen for 24 hours, a horde of neighbors descended on the Ward home and accused Ward of killing his wife. They could not, however, find her body. The people were entirely right in their suspicions but had not thought to look under the couple's bed, where Ward had stowed his wife's freshly killed body when he heard the crowd approaching.

As soon as everyone left, Ward dragged his wife's corpse into the kitchen, cut up her body with a carving knife and an ax and threw it piece by piece into the fireplace. The next day Ward cleaned out the hearth and placed the ashes outside the house. Neighbors keeping watch immediately searched the ashes and found the dead woman's jaw bone.

Ward was brought to trial within the week, and the multitude that descended on the trial scene in Sylvania expected a hanging forthwith. They were not disappointed, as the trial got no further than Ward's claim that he had killed his wife by accident and in panic had cut up her body. He was going into a detailed description of burning the corpse when the jury simply announced it would listen no more and was prepared to bring in a verdict. They then sentenced Ward to death. While legal scholars in later years might cite the Ward case as an example of an illegal verdict and a "legal lynching," Ohioans of the day felt justice had been served quite well.

Warde, John (1912–1938) suicide victim

Probably no suicide has ever been matched for drama, suspense and the ghoulish interest of the American public as that of 26-year-old John Warde in New York on July 26, 1938.

Warde, who two years earlier had been confined for a time in a mental hospital following a suicide attempt, was in room 1714 of the Gotham Hotel at Fifth Avenue and 55th Street when he told his sister, Katherine, "I'm going out the window." Before she could prevent him, he climbed out on a ledge 18 inches wide and 160 feet above the street. For 11 hours he stood there deciding whether or not to jump and warning police he would leap if any of them came near him. The structure of the building made it impossible for firemen to trap him with a large net, and as the drama continued, a huge crowd gathered to watch. Press photographers, news-reel cameramen and radio commentators set up shop on the street and in offices around the hotel, and the entire nation listened anxiously to reports of every move the slender, curly haired man made. Many of the spectators on the street called on Warde to jump.

Patrolman Charles V. Glasco, sitting on the window ledge with a noose around one leg, seemed to develop a rapport with the disturbed man and kept him talking about everything from sports to poetry while trying to lure him close enough so he could grab him. But as the night wore on, Warde still refused to come to safety. Finally, as Patrolman Glasco left his perch to make room for a boyhood friend of the would-be suicide, a roar went up from the crowd below. Warde had jumped. He landed on the hotel marquee and then bounced to the street, dead before he hit the ground. It was later estimated that the news media had spent $100,000 to cover the event.

Warehouse Brothel

A newspaper article in early 1857 referred to a notorious establishment called the Warehouse Brothel as the most-depraved dive in Chicago; it became even more infamous for what was labeled in retrospect the Little Chicago Fire.

Housed on the second floor of a brick warehouse at 109 South Water Street, the brothel had a large population of resident prostitutes and a long row of cubicles that were rented to streetwalkers. Because of complaints by neighbors, the police raided the warehouse brothel almost continually to break up boisterous drunken orgies. On October 19, 1857 a drunken prostitute kicked over a lamp and in the quick-spreading fire 23 persons died and the brothel and surrounding property valued at a half-million dollars were destroyed. All the victims were either male customers or residents of the area. Being trained, thanks to previous police raids, to make quick escapes, none of the harlots died in the conflagration. It was several days before talk of lynching the harlots died down. After the Great Chicago Fire in 1871, the Warehouse Brothel tragedy was often referred to as the Little Chicago Fire.

Warner, Matt (1864–1938) bank robber and lawman

Willard Erastus Christianson was the hell-raising son of a Mormon bishop who became known as Matt Warner, or the Mormon Kid, a close companion of Butch Cassidy and the other Wild Bunchers.

They say young Warner would not have gone wrong if he had not gotten into a fight in 1878 in which he thought he had killed his opponent. Only 14 at the time he ran off and fell in with rustlers. Later, he worked with outlaws out of Robber's Roost in the Utah Territory and eventually met up with Butch Cassidy. In 1889 Butch, Matt and Tom McCarty held up the Telluride Bank in Colorado, making off with $31,000. After that, Butch, Matt and others earned quite a living robbing banks and rustling cattle and horses.

In the early 1890s Warner used some of his loot to open a saloon in Star Valley, an area on the Wyoming-Utah border. A bit of a wit, he covered the back of the bar with the most expensive wallpaper ever used, stolen bonds and bills, in the center of which was a $10,000 note that the gang had obviously reckoned they would never be able to cash.

In 1892 Warner and George McCarty were arrested in Ellensburg, Wash. for a bank robbery in Roslyn, Wash. While they were in jail, other Bunchers supplied them with tools and pistols, and two days before their trial the pair broke out and got as far as the livery stable, where McCarty was winged. Warner got off a shot that wounded an attacking citizen before the pair was forced to surrender. Remarkably, Warner and McCarty beat the bank robbery charge and were set free, their escape try overlooked because innocent men were sometimes allowed to attempt desperate measures in that era.

In 1896 Warner was arrested for a bank job and faced certain conviction. Cassidy immediately rounded up the Wild Bunch for a raid to free him. After word of the raid was passed to Warner, he talked Cassidy out of the attack on the ground that it was too risky. Instead, Cassidy had the boys rob a bank and contributed a large portion of the proceeds from the robbery to Warner's legal defense. Warner got off with just five years, on the whole a rather light sentence.

By the time Warner got out of prison, the Wild Bunch had busted up, Cassidy and the Sundance Kid fleeing to South America, where they continued in the robbery business. Warner settled in Carbon County, Utah, was elected justice of the peace and became a deputy sheriff. He worked as a policeman in Price, Utah, moonlighting on the side as a bootlegger. At the age of 74, Warner died a much-respected citizen.

There were reports that in his later years Warner often visited with Butch Cassidy, who, according to these reports, had not died in South America as the Pinkertons claimed. If he did see Cassidy, Warner carried that secret with him to the grave.

watered stock swindle

"Watered stock" is the term used to describe a stock swindle in which the assets of a company, real or imagined, have been exaggerated to attract gullible investors.

WATERFORD Jack

The term is believed to have originated out of a time-honored tradition in cattle country. Unscrupulous stockmen would drive their animals to market while giving them all the dry feed stuff they could hold down. Just before reaching the selling yards, the cattle would be allowed to drink all the water they wanted. Since the animals were sold by weight, the watered stock brought in considerable extra profits.

Waterford Jack (1840–?) Chicago streetwalker

Chicago's most industrious, wealthiest, and, paradoxically, most honest streetwalker in the last century was, as the Chicago Times called her, "a notorious old jade known as Waterford Jack." She was also known as the Millionaire Streetwalker and boasted that she had walked the streets every night, regardless of weather, for 10 years, accommodating from five to 25 men a night at prices ranging from $1 to $10.

In 1875 Waterford Jack decided to put streetwalking on a structured level, organized a band of streetwalkers and rented living and working space on the top floors of office buildings in the business district. She became the girls' manager and business agent, seeing to it that they kept themselves attractive and clean and, each day at "shape-up," assigning them to the areas they were to work. The choice girls were sent to the hotels and railroad stations.

Every night the streetwalkers would turn over their earnings to Waterford Jack, who would give each a small amount of spending money for food and clothing. After paying for police protection and, when needed, the services of bondsmen and lawyers, she would subtract a small cut for herself and bank the rest in trust for the girls. Apparently, none of the streetwalkers ever feared that Waterford Jack would steal any of the money and, indeed, she never did. Several, in fact, had enough saved for them to open their own brothels. Waterford Jack entertained no such desires, saying simply she would retire when she had saved $30,000. A red-light newspaper, the Chicago Street Gazette reported in 1877:

Waterford Jack has $22,000 in the bank, every cent of which she had picked up (so to speak) on the streets of Chicago. Jack (her right name is Frances Warren) has made money. It is said to her credit that she never stole a cent and was never drunk in her life. She is a pug-nosed, ugly-looking little critter, but for all that she has prospered in her wretched business, and now stands before the world the richest street-walker in existence.

When Waterford Jack faded from sight in 1880, vice society in Chicago knew she had achieved her magic number of $30,000.

Watson, Ella See CATTLE KATE.

Watson, J. P. (1870–1939) Bluebeard

As a one-man murder machine, J. P. Watson, America's premier Bluebeard, ranks with the world's worst. He had all the charm and verve of France's Henri Landru, the killing efficiency of Germany's Peter Kurten and the utter lack of morals of Gilles de Rais of the 15th century, who is regarded by historians as the original Bluebeard.

Watson killed more women than most of his European rivals, although the exact number is undetermined. He is known to have married at least 40 women and killed at least 25 of them. The rest got off with just losing all the money they had given to Watson in their blind passion to marry him. Several of his wives followed him from one end of the country to the other, and even after he was sent to prison for murder, they remembered him wistfully for his passionate poetry and the grace with which he had wooed them. They were lucky he had not tired of them, but many others were not so lucky. Watson bashed in about a dozen skulls and wrung an equal number of pretty necks. He hid his victims so well that none were ever found except one, whose whereabouts he eventually revealed voluntarily.

Watson was born Charles Gillam in Paris, Ark. He ran away at the age of 12 and, thereafter, always used the pseudonym of J. P. Watson, varying the first name to whatever struck his fancy. He killed his first woman in 1893, a passionate hillbilly girl who had run off with him and then announced she was pregnant. After she mentioned marriage, Watson fed her poison and took off with her possessions. After that, he never murdered another woman before marrying her. Years later, he said he felt his victims were entitled to a measure of happiness before he separated them from the living.

By 1913 Watson had married 10 women and killed four of them. Then he started getting serious about his calling. To attract victims, he advertised:

Gentleman: Neat appearance, courteous disposition, well-connected in business, has quite a little property, also connected with several corporations and has a substantial bank account. Would be pleased to correspond with refined young lady or widow, object matrimony. This advertisement is in good faith, and all answers will be treated with respect.

Watson leafed through hundreds of responses to pick out likely victims. Between about 1915 and 1920 he confined his amorous and murderous activities to the West Coast, from Vancouver, British Columbia to southern California. He dumped wives in such scenic spots as Idaho's Lake Coeur d'Alene and Seattle's Lake Washington. Others went into fast-running rivers. Watson never understood why some murderers had their corpses refloat to the surface. When he weighted a body down, it stayed down. The same was true of the many corpses he buried. He buried them deep, no shallow graves that animals or heavy rains would uncover.

Watson's downfall came about as a result of suspicions that had nothing to do with his murderous activities. One of his wives became suspicious of his constant traveling and, thinking he was two-timing her, hired private detectives to follow him. He was caught by police with a huge amount of loot from previous victims, including at least a dozen diamond rings from different-sized fingers.

Yet, even when the authorities knew they had a master bluebeard on their hands, they could not bring murder charges against Watson. Not a single body could be found. Then while he was in custody in California, the body of a woman turned up in Plum Station, Wash. Watson had done some burying there and he worried that the corpse was one of his victims. So he made a deal with the Los Angeles district attorney to reveal the hiding place of one of his victims provided the DA guarantee him no worse than a life sentence and fight any extradition effort. Since without a body there was no case, the DA consented. The deal was made and Watson led officers out to the desert where he had buried Nina Lee Deloney.

Afterward, Watson confessed to eight other murders and hinted at many more. His confession created a firestorm throughout the country. Dozens of people wrote asking for information on missing loved ones. Watson shunted such requests aside, saying he couldn't be expected to remember every woman he had married or exactly what had become of them.

In 1920 Watson was convicted and drew a life sentence. He died in San Quentin on October 15, 1939. Ironically, his murder confession had been uncalled for; the corpse found in Plum Station proved not to be one of his.

We Boys Mob swindlers

One of the most audacious group of swindlers in America was the so-called We Boys Mob of the 1920s, who consistently hoodwinked the supposedly cynical and savvy journalists of the nation's newspapers. The gang, often no more than two fast talkers, would hit a newspaper city room with a sad tale about the death of some "old-time newspaperman," a story that was fictitious but profitable. The spiel would go something like: "We boys are getting together to see that he gets a decent burial and have something in the pot afterward for the widow, and knowing how all you guys feel about the boys in the business, we were sure all of you would like to make a small donation to build the kitty." There were just a few newsrooms exempt from such flimflams, which would only be discovered when the old reporter would one day saunter into the office. The racket died after newspapers ordered much closer checking of facts whenever the death of a journalist was reported.

Webster, John White (1791–1850) murderer

A crime that might have been spawned by the imagination of an Edgar Allen Poe and has been called "America's classic murder" occurred in Boston on the afternoon of November 23, 1849. Dr. George Parkman, for whom the Parkman Chair of Anatomy had been established at the Massachusetts Medical College, called on Dr. John White Webster at the school to demand repayment of a loan. Dr. Webster (MA, MD, Harvard) who led a rather notorious wild life, said he could not make payment, whereupon Parkman shouted, "I got you your professorship and I'll get you out of it." In a rage Webster grabbed a heavy piece of kindling wood and smashed Parkman in the head. Parkman fell to the floor. When Webster examined him, he found Parkman was dead. The confrontation took place in a laboratory in the basement of the medical college building.

Webster dragged the body into an adjoining room and placed it in a huge sink. He then climbed in the sink and calmly began dissecting the corpse. When he finished, he incinerated the pieces in his assay oven. Some larger pieces he put in a vault used for storing the bones of dissected bodies.

Quite naturally, the disappearance of Dr. Parkman caused a considerable stir and the college posted a reward of $3,000 for the apprehension of his apparent abductors. One of the few leads in the case came from Dr. Webster, who told of Dr. Parkman coming to visit him and accepting a $483 payment on his loan. The authorities theorized that the money provided a possible motive for robbery and continued their search. They did not suspect Dr. Webster. However, a college janitor named Ephraim Littlefield did. He had noticed that on the afternoon of the disappearance the wall behind Dr. Webster's assay oven had been very hot. When he later mentioned the fact to Dr. Webster, the latter seemed nervous and said he had been doing some experiments. The next day, in an uncharacteristic gesture of generosity, Webster gave the janitor a Thanksgiving turkey, but the gift only heightened Littlefield's suspicions. A week after the disappearance, he used a crowbar to take some bricks out of Webster's vault and found a fleshy pelvis and parts of a leg. When the police were summoned, they made other grisly finds, including the most incriminating, that of Parkman's teeth in Webster's oven.

The trial of Dr. Webster in 1850 was a sensation. Among those testifying were Oliver Wendell Holmes, who by then occupied the Parkman Chair, Drs. W. T. G. Morton and C. T. Jackson, the discoverers of ether, and Jared Sparks, president of Harvard. Newspapers as far away as New Orleans sent special correspondents, and instant booklets relating the testimony appeared. Since an estimated 60,000 persons showed up to view the trial, the judge ordered that spectators could sit in the balcony for only 10 minutes at a time.

Webster pleaded not guilty and insisted the cut-up parts belonged to a routine cadaver, but the clinching evidence against him was the positive identification of Parkman's teeth by dentists. After an 11-day trial Webster was found guilty. Prior to his hanging on August 30, 1850, he made a full confession.

Weeks, Robert (1929–) "romantic" serial killer

While Robert Weeks was definitely a serial killer, he cannot be said to have committed his crimes as a "recreational killer." Rather, he seemed to be a man who couldn't take "no" from a woman after he formed an attachment to her. When a woman tried to break off with him, she either ended up murdered or among the missing.

Weeks put himself through college in Mississippi by working as a mortician and a parachute stuntman. In 1954 he married his first wife, Patricia, in Minneapolis and they moved to Las Vegas the following year. Weeks proved to be a successful businessman, starting the city's first limousine service in 1960. By this time Patricia Weeks found her life a living hell, as her husband kept her a virtual prisoner in his home. Extremely jealous, he would not even allow her to do grocery shopping alone. When Patricia took up the piano, Weeks beat her elderly piano teacher in a jealous rage. In 1968 Patricia insisted on a divorce, and Weeks finally granted her wish. Patricia got the family Cadillac and home as part of the settlement. Shortly thereafter, her car was found abandoned in a local shopping center. Weeks informed his daughters their mother had simply abandoned them.

A few years later Weeks married again, but that marriage ended in divorce in 1974. This wife didn't die for that offense since it was Weeks who had developed a relationship with another woman, Cynthia Jabour. That relationship continued for six years. By late 1980 Cynthia had had enough of Weeks' behavior and wanted out. The couple went on a dinner date, October 5, and Cynthia broke the news to Weeks that they were finished. What Weeks said to her at the time is not known, and Cynthia would never be able to tell. The next day her car was found in a Las Vegas parking lot. Weeks was suspected of murder and at first agreed to take a polygraph test, but instead he vanished, surfacing finally in Chile.

He reappeared in the United States in Houston with a Libyan passport under the name of Robert Smith. He then moved on to San Diego, starting a construction business. While on a business trip to Colorado, he met a 43-year-old divorcée named Carol Riley and convinced her to move to Southern California with him. That relationship came to a mysterious end in April 1986 after the pair had a dinner date. It was known to Carol's friends that she was contemplating breaking off with "Smith" and was going to tell him so. As usual the tilting female's car turned up abandoned in a hotel parking lot.

By the end of the year, "Smith" had become "Charles Stolzenberg," living in Tucson, Arizona. When Weeks-Smith-Stolzenberg was featured on NBC's "Unsolved Mysteries" in May 1987, he was spotted by a number of Tucson viewers.

In April 1988 authorities had sufficient evidence to charge Weeks with the murders of Patricia Weeks and Cynthia Jabour. The case involving Carol Riley was not completed and neither were those involving others with whom it was suspected Weeks had formed short-lived relationships. It is possible those females had survived their apparent encounters with Weeks and chosen not to step forward for fear of unwanted publicity. Or of course there could have been another possible explanation. Few cases of serial murder ever uncover all of their victims. In any event, Weeks was convicted of the two murders he was officially charged with, the jury setting his penalty at life imprisonment without parole.

Weger, Chester (1939–) murderer

The savage robbery and murder of three well-to-do Chicago matrons in Starved Rock State Park, Ill. in March 1960 attracted nationwide attention. In investigative circles it is remembered as one of the most embarrassing cases in the annals of scientific detection. Police laboratory tests that should have pointed to the killer did not, and the murderer, 21-year-old Chester Weger, managed to do what many experts had claimed was the impossible, beat the lie detector, not once but twice.

The bodies of the women, Mrs. Lillian Oetting, Mrs. Mildred Lindquist and Mrs. Frances Murphy, wives of prominent businessmen, were found bound with twine and hidden in a cave. Nearby was a bloodied tree limb, some four inches thick, with which their killer had battered them to death. During the long investigation hundreds of persons were questioned. For a time the most promising suspect was Chester Weger, a dishwasher employed at the park's lodge. He was reported to have had a scratched face on the day the women had been murdered.

When police interrogated him, they discovered he had a bloodstained leather jacket, which they immediately sent to the police laboratory. While tests were being made on the jacket, Weger agreed to submit to a lie detector examination. The conclusion was that he was telling the truth when he denied any connection with the brutal crime. Then the laboratory analysis of the jacket found the stains were animal blood, as Weger had claimed. Authorities, reluctant to give up on the youth as a suspect, gave him another lie detector test. Once more, he passed with flying colors.

Weger was dropped as a suspect, as were all other local persons, and the police concluded that the women had been the victims of a transient thief. Two local deputies, Wayne Hess and William Dummett, were not convinced, however. They went back to the twine used on the women, which was originally thought to be of too common a type to be traced. The officers found the twine was a 20-strand variety and compared it with the twine used at the Starved Rock Lodge; it too had 20 strands. The lodge had bought the twine from a Kentucky manufacturer, who informed the officers that very few of his customers purchased that kind of twine. The lodge, in fact, was the only one in Illinois.

The deputies again centered their investigation at the lodge. Since the original investigators had casually dismissed the twine as a clue, the two deputies wondered if perhaps the rest of the inquiry had been just as poorly handled. Among other clues, the officers secured Weger's jacket again but this time sent it to the FBI Laboratory in Washington. Technicians there identified the stains as being human blood and most likely from the same group as that of one of the victims.

Weger was once more a suspect, but there was the troublesome matter of the lie detector tests. A top expert, John Reid of Chicago, was called in to perform a new test. This time the machine clearly indicated Weger was lying when he denied committing the murders. Meanwhile, Hess and Dummett had searched the records of previous crimes in the area and found a case in which a girl had been raped not long before the triple murders. The victim had been tied up with twine exactly like the cord used in the murders. Given a number of photographs of various men, she readily picked out one of Weger as her attacker.

Confronted with this new evidence plus the revised blood analysis and the incriminating polygraph findings Weger confessed. On March 4, 1961, Weger's 22nd birthday, he was convicted of the three murders and was later sentenced to life imprisonment.

Reid was asked how he could account for two previous failures by the lie detector before he, unlike the previous examiner, was able to get the incriminating results. "Simple enough," he said. "It's all a matter of technique—in knowing how to conduct such an experiment effectively." Weger himself had an entirely different rationale. "Before the tests," he said, "I just swallowed a lot of aspirin and washed it down with a bottle of Coke. That calms a guy down, you know. Why I didn't do that before this other guy tested me I'll never know."

Weil, Joseph “Yellow Kid” (1875?–1976) con man

Joseph “Yellow Kid” Weil probably invented and practiced more swindles than any other confidence operator in the history of American crime and was most certainly the greatest con man of the 20th century. The only man to come close to him was Fred “the Deacon” Buckminster, who ironically started out in life as a plainclothes policeman in Chicago working on the vice and bunco squad.

In 1908 Buckminster had a warrant to pick up Weil after a waterproofing cover he had been paid to paint on some city buildings washed off with the first rains. As Buckminster was escorting Weil to the precinct house, his prisoner handed him a wad of bills. Buckminster counted $10,000. “How’d you get this?” he asked. Weil said from his swindles. Buckminster weighed the money in one hand and his badge in the other. He pocketed the money, tossed away the badge and shook hands with the Kid. They became partners in scams for the next quarter century.

Even in his twenties Weil could affect a most earnest and dignified appearance. At the turn of the century he and Colonel Jim Porter, a former riverboat gambler, carried off what became known as the Great Michigan “Free Land” Swindle. Weil introduced Porter around as an eccentric millionaire who was giving away free lots. The pair gave the lots to prostitutes, madams, bartenders, waiters and even Chicago policemen. The two then opened a sales office and showed the usual artist’s concept of a huge vacationland planned for the area, provided the supposed millionaire didn’t give all the lots away before it was completed and ready for sale. Whenever Porter would give away some lots—which he and Weil had purchased at $1 an acre—Weil would sidle up to the sucker and beg him not to tell anyone else or everyone would be wanting free lots. He also advised the recipients of the land to make sure they had the transaction recorded at the county seat in Michigan. That was the key to the swindle. The recording fee was $30 and the recorder happened to be Porter’s cousin. Previously, the fee was $2 but Porter’s cousin had raised it with the understanding that $15 would go to Weil and Porter and he would keep the rest. Weil and Porter made just over $16,000 from this neat little flimflam.

In another of his great cons Weil posed as mining engineer Pope Yateman, who reportedly had garnered a fortune in Chile. Yateman was written up in McClure’s magazine under the title “$100,000 A Year,” together with a large picture of him. For a price a crooked printer who specialized in “first editions” of famous books agreed to substitute Weil’s picture for Yateman’s and reprint the required pages. Weil rebound the pages into actual copies of the magazine and then toured the Midwest trimming the gullible. He and a confederate would zero in on a rich man eager to invest in mining ventures and then Weil’s confederate would mention the article in McClure’s. Unfortunately, the confederate would say, he had no copies of the magazine, but “I’m sure you’ll find one at the local library.”

The swindlers had, of course, pinched the library copy and substituted a doctored one. The gullible victim would rush to the library, find the article with Weil’s picture and be totally convinced. As soon as Weil milked a huge investment from the sucker, his confederate would retrieve the doctored copy of the magazine and return the original. As Weil often recalled later, “You can imagine the victim’s amazement after being swindled, to go to the library and look up that article only to find that the picture did not resemble me at all!”

One of Weil and Buckminster’s greatest coups was renting a vacant bank in Muncie, Ind. and stocking it with con men and their lady friends to act as depositors so that the pair could con financiers into investing in the bank.

Born in Chicago in 1875, Weil started hanging out in underworld dives early in life, almost always with a copy of the New York Journal, which contained his favorite comic strip, “Hogan’s Alley and the Yellow Kid.” Soon, all the crooks in town started calling Weil the Yellow Kid. He married young and had a devoted wife who spent most of her years trying to get him to go straight. Weil often tried for her sake, but even his honest efforts proved tainted. He once attempted to make a living selling a Catholic encyclopedia; using the name Daniel O’Connell, he told a priest in Flint, Mich. that the Holy Father, Pius X, had expressed the wish that at least 2,000 copies be placed in homes in Flint. The priest bought a set, and on the strength of that, Weil sold 80 more sets, earning $1,600 in commissions. Then the priest learned of Weil’s imposture and canceled his order. Weil went back to his basic con rackets, selling phony stock and running phony boxing matches and horse races.

Although extremely glib, Weil, like other con men, was frequently arrested. Usually, he beat the rap because almost always his victim was put in a position of having been knowingly involved in a crooked scheme. “I never cheated an honest man,” Weil often proclaimed, “only rascals.” Still, he was convicted several times and did a number of stretches in prison. In 1934 Weil announced he had retired from the swindle game. Of course, he was lying. He had by then made some $8 million through his cons and was not about to give up the game.

Weil was always ready to lend a hand to a parish for a fund drive. One day he was walking down a Chicago street with a certain monsignor discussing a fund drive when a member of the police confidence squad stopped him and questioned him on his activities. Weil insisted he was on the level. The monsignor joined in to back him up, whereupon the detective turned on him and said, "You, aren't you ashamed to be wearing the cloth for a swindle?" The officer took both of them in and held them for questioning.

In 1948 the Kid decided to write his memoirs with Chicago journalist W. T. Brannon, once again announcing he was going straight. He proceeded to sell the movie rights to his autobiography to Brannon and then to a Hollywood studio.

One of his last attempted coups was to try to establish a little independent republic on a small island made of fill, somewhere in Lake Michigan. His object, he told Saul Bellow in a magazine interview, was to make himself eligible under the foreign aid program.

Weil died February 26, 1976. Newspapers listed his age as 100, a goal he often said he planned to attain. Quite a few printed records, however, indicated Weil was really born in 1877 rather than 1875, as he claimed in his later years.

Weiss, Hymie (1898–1926) gang leader

The man who succeeded the assassinated Dion O'Banion as head of Chicago's North Side Gang during Prohibition, Hymie Weiss continued O'Banion's gang war with the forces of Al Capone. Chicago police credited Weiss with being the one responsible for building O'Banion's bootlegging business into the empire it became. He was more thoughtful, forward-looking and resourceful than the headstrong O'Banion and used reason and bribery more freely than "Deanie" had. Despite the fact that he, like many gangsters, especially members of the North Side mob, regularly attended Mass and was never without crucifixes and rosaries in his pockets, he had a brutal and ugly disposition. He also carried a gun or two and killed without qualm or pity.

Weiss' real name was Earl Wajciechowski, which was soon changed upon his family's arrival in the United States from Poland. He was an accomplished crook in his teens, doing duty as a burglar, car thief, hired slugger and killer for labor unions and as a safe-cracker. The last skill won him a spot in the O'Banion gang, which specialized in jewel thefts and other safe-cracking jobs. The Irish gang leader toasted Little Hymie as the "best soup artist in Chicago." With the onset of Prohibition, O'Banion moved into bootlegging, and Weiss acted as his right-hand man in convincing saloon keepers of the value of O'Banion's merchandise.

Weiss wept openly at O'Banion's grave when the latter was buried in November 1924, following his murder by Capone's gunmen. Although Capone boldly appeared at the services with six bodyguards, Weiss kept the O'Banions in line, having promised the Irishman's widow there would be no violence until their beloved Deanie was under ground. Besides, there were 100 detectives on hand to maintain the peace. A reporter asked Weiss if he blamed Capone for O'Banion's death. The gangster threw up his hands in mock horror and said: "Blame Capone. Why Al's a real pal. He was Dion's best friend, too."

Weiss maintained the fiction of peace with Capone for almost two months, even banishing Two Gun Alterie from the gang because he kept publicly threatening Capone with vengeance. Meanwhile, Weiss lined up more gunners and bided his time. On January 12, 1925 Weiss, Schemer Drucci and Bugs Moran followed Capone's black limousine until it parked in front of a restaurant at State and Fifty-fifth streets. As they drove slowly by, they raked the vehicle with 26 pistol and shotgun blasts, wounding the chauffeur but missing two bodyguards in the back-seat. Capone had stepped into the restaurant 15 seconds earlier.

Weiss' most famous attempt to kill Capone occurred in Cicero on September 20, 1926, when 11 automobiles filled with his gangsters drove past the Hawthorne Inn and poured more than 1,000 bullets and slugs from shotguns, handguns and machine guns into the establishment. A Capone bodyguard and an innocent woman bystander were shot, but Capone again escaped injury.

Three weeks later, on October 11, 1926, Weiss himself was on an undertaker's slab, his wiry body having been ripped open by 10 machine-gun bullets as he crossed the street to his headquarters above O'Banion's flower shop at 738 North State Street. His bodyguard, Paddy Murphy, was killed instantly by the same fusillade, which came from a second-floor room rented by the assassins the day after the Cicero raid. Three others walking with Weiss were wounded.

Weiss was 28 at the time of his death and had a fortune conservatively estimated at $1.3 million. His funeral was lavish, although his wife complained he had only 18 truckloads of flowers while O'Banion had been honored with 26 and a previously departed gangster, Nails Morton, had merited 20. It had to be explained to her that since the onset of the war with Capone, some 30 of Hymie's friends had abruptly departed the world, greatly reducing the number of available flower donors.

Weiss Club Chicago brothel

Located right next door to Chicago’s opulent Everleigh Club, perhaps the most lavish brothel the world has ever seen, the Weiss Club operated in a strange, if luxurious, anonymity. The Everleigh sisters always credited the Weiss Club with being the only establishment that provided their resort with genuine competition. Yet, the name of the Weiss Club was unknown to all but a few vice insiders, and most of the patrons who sampled the pleasures offered there came away believing that they had been in the Everleigh Club.

The club, located at 2135 South Dearborn, was run by Ed and Aimee Weiss. Ed Weiss was a seasoned “male madam” in Chicago, having operated some of the city’s worst dives. He had “stepped up in a class” in 1904, when he married Aimee Leslie, one of the most beautiful courtesans of the Everleigh Club. It was probably Aimee’s idea to buy the brothel next door later that year and turn it into an imitation of the Everleigh Club. They were able to get it for a song from Madam Julia Hartrauft, who had just been robbed of over $3,000 by stickup men. Madam Hartrauft took the couple’s money and left the area, bemoaning the lack of law and order in Chicago.

The Weiss Club was done up with luxurious appointments and stocked with women who would have been at least runners-up at the Everleigh and thus could command high fees. However, the real reason for the success of the resort was the fact that Ed Weiss shrewdly put most of the vice area’s cabbies on commission. Whenever one of them picked up a fare who asked for the Everleigh Club and seemed too drunk to know where he was going, the cabbie would simply bring him to the Weiss establishment. Invariably, the customer would enter the club, be properly entertained and leave all the while thinking it was the Everleigh.

Both the Everleigh and the Weiss Club went out of business about the same time in 1911 during a crack-down on vice ordered by Mayor Carter Harrison, Jr. In an attempt to recapture the old glory, Weiss leased the building of the shuttered Everleigh Club in 1913, making preparations to pay the police $25,000 a year for protection, but the deal never came off because of continued antivice campaigns. Although Weiss remained a force within the Capone brothel empire into the 1920s, his dream of a grandiose new Everleigh-Weiss Club never came true.

Welch, Bernard Charles, Jr. (1940–) master thief and murderer

Described by police as a one-man crime wave, Bernard C. Welch, Jr., was a remarkable master thief whose career ended in December 1980, when he was apprehended for the Washington, D.C., murder of Dr. Michael J. Halberstam, a noted cardiologist and author. Through the years since 1965, when he was 25, Welch was arrested a total of 25 times but avoided confinement on a number of occasions by jumping bail or escaping detention. His main activity was burglary, and often when free on bond, he went about committing additional thefts. He specialized in stealing furs, art objects, rare coins and silverware. Wherever he went, Welch lived in style, paying cash for luxurious houses, in one case almost $250,000 up front.

It can only be guessed how much money Welch made from 1965 to 1980 despite several years in prison during that time; it may have been anywhere from $10 to $20 million. Francis M. Mullen, assistant director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, said of him after his capture in 1980:

Welch has operated as a one-man crime cell; that’s why he has been so hard to catch. . . . He has been so smart, melting much of the stuff to prevent it from being traced. He was a loner, so that it reduced the chance of someone close turning him in. He specialized in burglary, the type of crime hardest to solve. He was lucky, he never walked into one of our sting operations. And he was talented and well-trained.

From 1974—when he escaped from New York’s Dannemora Prison by hiding on the grounds following a softball game and scaling a 25-foot fence after dark—to 1980, Welch was perhaps the FBI’s most-sought criminal, with 15,000 circulars describing him and his method of operation distributed to police.

During those six years Welch continued his big-money capers and lived high on the hog, finally winding up in Great Falls, one of the more affluent suburbs of Falls Church, Va. He lived with his common law wife and three children in a $245,000 house, into which he poured an estimated $750,000 worth of improvements, including a huge indoor swimming pool and an environmental room that allowed for alteration of temperature and humidity to simulate both Arctic and Saharan conditions as well as everything in between. He surrounded his home with a security system, which, one newspaper noted, “the Central Intelligence Agency, 10 miles down the road, might envy.” Spotted under the eaves of the home were a host of remote-controlled closed-circuit television cameras that swept the tree-decorated lawn in all directions. Weight sensors could detect footsteps on the grass and microphones in the outside walls would signal any attempt to enter.

Welch simply informed his neighbors, to whom he proudly exhibited his personal art collection, that he was a stockbroker (so successful that he had no need to take on any new clients). He also maintained a summer home in Duluth, Minn. and told a different story there about his profession. He was a fur dealer to the nation’s wealthiest.

On the night of December 5, 1980, Welch burglarized four affluent homes in the Washington, D.C. area before invading the house of Dr. Halberstam. When Halberstam unexpectedly confronted him, Welch violated his cardinal rule against violent crime and shot the doctor. Halberstam managed to get in his car and was driving to a nearby hospital when he saw his assailant and swerved his car to hit him. Halberstam died on the operating table a short time later.

After Welch’s apprehension, his Virginia home was located and searched. It took some 20,000 pages to catalog the stolen loot found in his basement, more than 50 boxes and crates. About 2,000 burglary victims from the D.C. area were invited to try to claim over $4 million in stolen goods recovered by the police.

In May 1981 Welch was sentenced to nine consecutive terms of life in prison. He would be eligible for parole in 143 years.

Welch, Ed (1865?–1912) western outlaw

A man of many aliases (Howard Benson, H. O. Beck and Ole Hobeck, among others), Ed Welch has often been described as the last member of the Wild Bunch to be gunned down in action. He was not, although his craving to join that legendary outlaw gang did get him killed.

Welch was doing time in Atlanta, where his cell mate was none other than Ben Kilpatrick, the Tall Texan, of the Wild Bunch. When both were released on June 11, 1911, Welch tagged after Kilpatrick in the hope of joining the Bunch. They got as far as Texas and discovered there was no more Wild Bunch, no more Hole in the Wall Gang, no more Black Jack Ketchum gang. Kilpatrick couldn’t find any important badmen to team up with, so he told Welch he would allow him to be his partner despite doubts about trusting his life to an older man whose reflexes might not be quick enough in a pinch.

The pair staged a few small robberies for stake money and then hit a Southern Pacific train at Dryden, Tex. on March 13, 1912. They stopped the train by claiming to be railroad detectives, and entered the express car and got the drop on the Wells Fargo messenger. While Welch was collecting loot, it was Kilpatrick’s reflexes that failed. His attention strayed and the messenger struck him a killing blow with a mallet. The messenger then picked up Kilpatrick’s weapon and shot Welch, who lived only long enough to regret his ambition to run with the big-timers.

Welfare Island prison scandal

In 1934, as New York Mayor Fiorello H. La Guardia’s newly appointed corrections commissioner, Austin H. MacCormick, uncovered scandalous conditions in the prison system on Welfare Island. Built in 1826, the Welfare Island institution was by that time no longer fit for human habitation. It had an “anti-reformer” reputation and was, without doubt, the most bizarre prison this country had seen in a long time. The 1932 murder of convict George Holsoe, better known as Horseshoes, was a case in point. Horseshoes headed one of two prison gangs seeking to control the narcotics business in the institution. A peace conference was called to settle the dispute. Since it was a summit meeting of sorts, it was held in the warden’s office. But the conference was a flop. The anti-Horseshoes forces, headed by a well-known hoodlum, Joie Rao, showed up with knives (made to order in the prison’s machine shop), and suddenly, Horseshoes lay bleeding to death all over the warden’s rug. A general melee followed, with the rival gangs running wild in the prison. Before the dispute was brought under control, 200 policemen had been sent into the prison, with fireboats circling offshore and police planes flying overhead.

The outburst drew front-page coverage. Grand juries were convened and witnesses called, but Horseshoes’ murder remained unsolved. Things soon returned to normal on Welfare Island, which in theory was a tough prison but in reality was a “country club for gangsters.” Like several other prisons, many of the inmates received too little food and almost no heat in the winter while certain kingpins lived in grand style. Rao and about 30 of his cohorts, for example, resided in prison cells with doors that could be lifted off their hinges. This convenience meant they didn’t have to wait for a guard to open the door when they felt like going for a stroll.

Commissioner MacCormick learned about this and more on January 24, 1934, when he ordered Warden

WELFARE Island prison scandal

Joseph A. McCann to his downtown office on a ruse that he had some new appointments to announce. When the warden got there, he was shunted into a car, one of a convoy of vehicles carrying 30 policemen and 25 keepers from other institutions over to Welfare Island for a raid that was dubbed Operation Shakedown. MacCormick wanted Warden McCann along so that he could keep an eye on him.

Operation Shakedown was to shock New York City and the nation. When the raiders swept into the prison, they located Rao not in his nominal cell residence but in the hospital building, where he had usurped an entire floor for his own use. The floor was off limits to anyone who was actually sick. As a matter of fact, when found, Rao was being shaved by his personal barber. Many other residents on the floor were Rao henchmen. Those who weren't had to pay $75 a week for the privilege of staying there, which came with all the luxuries, including the best food cooked by the best chefs available. Rao had his meals served to him on the finest china and dined regularly on such fare as lobster, chicken, shrimp, nuts and fruit. Naturally, his private chef prepared the meals. Rao kept a wardrobe of a dozen suits, and whenever he didn't wish to have his wife trek all the way over to the island for dinner, he would dress up and sojourn to his favorite restaurant in Manhattan. The privileged convict maintained his own garden on prison grounds, complete with a private guard, where trespassing by either convicts or guards was strictly forbidden. Rao also kept a milch goat—which of course required a private shepherd, whose main duty was to keep the goat out of the flower garden.

Rao pretended to be a pigeon enthusiast, perhaps in the style of a nobleman with his falcons, but with the practical advantage of providing him with a way to import narcotics into the prison.

If Rao lived in the splendor befitting an Oriental potentate, Ed Cleary, the number two con in the prison, was not far behind. He also had hospital headquarters, in the Dormitory Hospital in another building. Cleary was listed as a "day nurse," which apparently entitled him to keep a stiletto stuck in the wall over his bed. An animal lover, Cleary had a pet police dog, which he kept chained to his bed. He brazenly named it Screw Hater, with no objection from the guards.

With Rao and about 80 of the top cons in the 1,700-inmate prison confined in a special wing, Operation Shakedown proceeded. Storming through the cells, the raiders tossed out all the contraband they found: knives, lead pipes, meat cleavers, rugs, surgeon scalpels, table lamps, electric grills, huge chunks of uncooked meats, dozens of loaves of bread, canned goods, razors and even tin poker chips made to order in the prison machine shop. Several walking sticks led one reporter accompanying the raiders to conclude that "some aristocrats must be living here."

The bulk of the cells, however, were found to be bare, and bitter inmates eagerly told reporters of the strangle hold the "convict politicians" had on the food that was rightfully theirs.

"All the food you wanted was available from the mob," one of them said. "The prices were steep, but it made life here better than in any other prison—if you could pay the price. The mob controls the distribution of the meat, so most of us guys are nothing but meatless stew. For a fee, the guys who have the dough got regular meat delivery, guaranteed fresh, right to their cells."

Regular delivery entitled a prisoner to have a little electric stove so that he could cook his own steak and onions the way he preferred. Each inmate with a stove received a monthly electric bill, which he paid to the cell block bagman for the privilege of cutting in on a hot wire running through the cells. The bill was higher if a prisoner kept a radio.

"It was the same way with the milk," another convict said. "The big boys would let it stand around till the cream all came to the top and skim it off. For a buck a week you got a half pint delivered to your cell each morning. The rest of us got the bluest milk you ever saw in the mess hall."

"It was a good setup for about 300 cons who, I swear, ain't never been in the mess hall since they been here. They used to laugh at all us others. They said at least we could smell the odor of good food."

The prison guards themselves were demeaned because they had to take orders from important cons. Realizing this, the prisoner elite made life more bearable for them by providing 250 pounds of boneless beef to the keepers' mess each day. This broke down to five pounds per day per guard. The mob wanted the keepers to eat well but made one proviso: the guards had to be careful not to spoil the leftovers, which once more became mob property. For a preferment fee of $2 a week, any con still suffering hunger pangs after eating the regular mess hall fare could slip into one of the keepers' chairs, while it and the food were still warm, and partake of the remains of steak dinners and other fine meals.

In the ensuing days more scandals came to light. The mob even ran a special lingerie and accessory concession to service some of the homosexual population, and there was a special method for reducing one's sentence by "buying out" at the rate of $100 for each month's reduction.

In the wake of the raid, Warden McCann was relieved of all duties, but MacCormick realized that Welfare Island was totally unfit to be a correctional institution. In 1935, with a new penitentiary on Rikers Island ready for full occupancy, demolition work began on the old prison. After serving as corrections commissioner for six years, MacCormick became research director of the Osborne Association of New York, a national organization dedicated to correctional reform.

Wells Street Chicago vice zone

In its frontier days Chicago made more of an effort than most towns to fight the establishment of vice, but it was a losing proposition. In 1835 the town’s Board of Trustees established a fine of $25 for anyone found guilty of maintaining a brothel. In 1838 the fine was raised, but with little effect. Brothels were in open operation on Wells Street between First and Jackson. Although they were rough, shabby dives, they heralded the beginnings of one of the largest red-light districts the country has ever seen. By 1870 Wells Street had become such a pest hole that the Board of Aldermen changed the name of the thoroughfare to Fifth Avenue, so as to no longer defame the memory of Capt. Billy Wells, the famous Indian fighter for whom the street had been named. Things did not improve until after the turn of the century, when the name Wells Street was reapplied.

Welsh, Leila (1921–1941) murder victim

The murder of Leila Welsh in Kansas City, Mo. at about 3 A.M. on March 9, 1941 remains a classic unsolved case. The 20-year-old woman’s head had been crushed with a blunt instrument and she had been stabbed several times with a razor-sharp knife. The police could find no leads—other than dozens deliberately left by the murderer. To confuse investigators, he had littered the room and the backyard with phony clues. First, there was a man’s shirt and trousers that were readily traced to a very prominent citizen. They had been put into a garbage can by the man’s servant and later retrieved by the killer. Then there was a butcher knife bearing fingerprints of yet another man, who turned out to be innocent. The knife, in any event, was not the murder weapon. A stonemason’s hammer found at the scene proved not to have been the heavy instrument used to crush the victim’s skull. Bloody gloves were discovered; it developed they had not been worn during the crime but had merely had blood smeared on them afterward. Over 50 cigarette butts were found; they evidently had been gathered from ashtrays all about town. A book of matches with a telephone number written inside led police to yet another innocent man. Eventually, the police did make an arrest, but the accused man easily won acquittal when brought to trial.

West, Little Dick (c. 1870–1898) Western outlaw

As an outlaw, Little Dick West seemed to carry a curse. Every criminal gang he joined in his checkered career soon lay in ruin, but that is what gave him his claim to fame in a fittingly short-lived ballad called “The Luck of Little Dick.”

Little Dick’s earliest bad luck was being orphaned or abandoned as a child, no one ever knew which. He was found in Indian Territory by cowboys and raised by them on the Oscar D. Halsell HX ranch on the Cimarron River. That was another piece of bad luck since the Halsell spread was rather noted for spawning criminals, and Little Dick was inevitably educated in a life of crime. In the summer of 1892 Little Dick West joined the Dalton gang, just a few months before that outfit’s disaster at Coffeyville. Then West became a member of the Doolin gang, but by 1895 that outfit ceased to exist. Afterward, Little Dick outdid his past failures by joining the Jennings gang, a laughable criminal organization that committed only one robbery, for which West’s cut came to $60. Following Al Jennings’ capture, Little Dick decided the time had come for him to go it alone. He pulled a few minor jobs before being gunned down by a posse near Guthrie, Oklahoma Territory on April 7, 1898.

“West Brothers” criminal look-alikes

One of the modern criminologist’s primary investigative tools is the fingerprint, thanks, in part, to the case of Willie West.

In 1903, when the fingerprinting system was relatively new and little used, the primary system of identification was one developed in the 1880s by the French criminologist Alphonse Bertillon. This system measured various physical features of a subject based on the principle that each person would have a different set of measurements.

But that year a strange coincidence occurred which shook confidence in the validity of the Bertillon system. A new prisoner was brought to Leavenworth, Kan. to start his sentence at the federal prison there. Part of the normal processing included photographing and the taking of the prisoner’s Bertillon measurements. The prison clerk responsible for this process was surprised to see William West enter the room. He did not recall that West had been released from the prison. Already having West’s measurements, he felt that it was not necessary to take them again. But when the prisoner vehemently denied that he had been there before, it was then determined that William West was, in fact, still serving a life sentence for murder.

WET Stock

The measurements of the new man, Willie West, were taken and compared to those of William West. They were identical. A fingerprint expert was called in to take the prints of the two men. They were found to be totally different. So, fingerprints proved to be the only means by which the two men could be distinguished.

The “West Brothers” case provided a shot in the arm for the new fingerprinting system. Sing Sing Prison in New York switched to it that same year. In 1904 Leavenworth received a sum of $60 to fund a changeover to fingerprinting and about the same time St. Louis adopted it. The War Department began fingerprinting military personnel in 1905.

Wet Stock stolen cattle

Many of today’s great cattle fortunes were built by herds of “wet stock.” The owner of a big spread would announce he was going to Mexico to buy cattle and his riders would be put on double or triple pay because of the “danger” involved. It was a shopping trip for which no money was needed, since the rancher would merely locate a large herd of cattle, stampede it away from its Mexican guards and drive the animals to the border, crossing the Rio Grande in the middle of the night. Mexican troops and cowboys might follow the rustlers’ tracks to the river but would hesitate to cross; the United States was intolerant of Mexicans retrieving their stolen property by force on the American side of the border. When the American rustlers felt there was a real chance that the Mexicans might continue the pursuit, the cattle would be driven straight to Kansas for sale. The profits would then be used to make legitimate purchase of American stock.

Occasionally, American rancher-rustlers would make an actual money offer to a Mexican owner. The price, of course, would be insultingly low, but the Mexican would look at the American army of cowboys and judge for himself whether it was prudent to accept some money or none at all.

Whale barroom San Francisco dive

During the 1870s and 1880s the Whale, run by Johnny McNear, was probably the toughest barroom ever to thrive on San Francisco’s Barbary Coast. It was the rendezvous for members of the local underworld. If the police were searching for a burglar, footpad or murderer, they had good reason to look for him at the Whale, but to get him out required a large force of men and probably involved a gun battle.

One Whale alumnus was Cod Wilcox, who once blithely stole a sloop and became an important pirate in San Francisco Bay before finally being sent away to San Quentin Prison for 20 years. Tip Thornton, however, perhaps best typified the clientele of the Whale. Acknowledged to be one of the deadliest fighters on the Barbary Coast, he always carried a long knife with a narrow blade as sharp as a razor. Whenever Thornton got into a fight, his sole strategy was to slice off his foe’s nose. If he couldn’t manage a nose, he’d settle for an ear. Patrons of the Whale used to keep score of the number of noses and ears Thornton severed in and around the Whale, but the count was lost when it got up near 40.

Finally, Thornton cut off a nose too many, and Officer Jack Cleary, one of the very few policemen who ever entered the Whale alone, went to the saloon to arrest him. Cleary had to take care of the bartender and about six other customers before he finally dragged Thornton off at the end of a pair of handcuffs. Thornton was sent to San Quentin and somehow the Whale was never quite the same again.

Whipple, John (?–1827) murder victim

John Whipple had the misfortune of being married to a most promiscuous woman, a problem that worsened in 1825 when he took on Jesse Strang as a hired hand on his estate in Albany, N.Y. Whipple’s wife, Elsie, soon lured Strang into her bed and, among other things, suggested they could have more time together if he would kill her husband. At first, the pair fed Whipple doses of arsenic but apparently without visible results. Then Elsie bought Strang an expensive rifle so he could shoot her husband through the window as he was preparing for bed. After practicing for months with the rifle to perfect his aim, Strang shot Whipple to death on the night of May 7, 1827. The conventional wisdom was that the shot had been fired by a passing drunk, and a coroner’s jury, which included Strang among its members, found that the murder had been committed by “persons unknown.” Imprudently, Strang all but moved in with the grieving widow, setting tongues wagging and arousing suspicion. The two were arrested and Strang, a rather weak individual, soon confessed the plot to the Rev. Lacey, rector of St. Peter’s Church. Strang was convicted at his own trial after admitting his guilt and stating that Elsie Whipple had put him up to the murder. He had hoped to save himself from the gallows by testifying against Elsie at her trial, but he was not permitted to take the stand. She was found not guilty. So, Jesse Strang was hanged on August 24, 1827, found guilty of conspiring to commit murder with his lover, while Elsie Whipple went free, found not guilty of having conspired to commit murder with her lover.

Whiskey Rebellion

Angry grain farmers in the four western counties of Pennsylvania rose up against the Excise Act of 1791, which put a tax on that region’s most profitable product, rye whiskey, in the so-called Whiskey Rebellion, providing the first test of the enforcement powers of the federal government.

After failing to get legal support to block the tax, the Whiskey Boys turned to violence in the summer of 1794. They burned the home of General John Neville, the regional inspector for the tax, and carried out many acts of violence, culminating in a defiant march on Pittsburg. Finally, in the autumn of that year President George Washington federalized the state militia and sent 13,000 soldiers into the rebellious counties to end the violence and enforce the tax. Some of the leaders of the Whiskey Boys were forced to flee into the Spanish lands of Mississippi when the troops, under the command of Secretary of the Treasury Alexander Hamilton, wiped out further resistance and rounded up 20 violators for trial in Philadelphia. Eventually, the offenders were freed and the tax itself repealed in 1802, but by then most of the small distillers had been put out of business by a combination of the tax and competition from larger distilleries.

Whiskey Ring tax evasion conspiracy

The Whiskey Ring conspiracy during the administration of Ulysses S. Grant was one of the 19th century’s biggest political scandals. In that the motivation of the politicians involved was principally the reelection of the president, the scandal had a number of parallels with the Watergate affair during the Nixon Administration.

The plot involved a group of Western distillers who conspired with corrupt officials in the Internal Revenue Service to evade payment of the whiskey tax. Because of their close connections with Grant, the members of the ring appeared immune to prosecution. However, Secretary of the Treasury Benjamin H. Bristow moved in May 1875 to indict more than 230 persons. A total of 110, including four government officials, were convicted. The court cases disclosed evidence that part of the illegally withheld monies went directly to the Republican Party for use in the campaign to reelect Grant to a second term in 1872. More money went to finance a third-term effort, but by then Grant’s private secretary, General Orville E. Babcock, was under indictment and there were strong indications that the president himself was involved. General Babcock, however, was found not guilty, and the public appeared to dismiss any possibility that Grant was personally tainted.

White, Dan (1946–1985) assassin

A double assassination that triggered an unusual outbreak of public violence was the killing on November 27, 1978 of San Francisco Mayor George Moscone and Supervisor Harvey Milk by former Supervisor Dan White. The murder of Milk, an avowed homosexual, had far greater impact than that of Mayor Moscone.

White, a 32-year-old former policeman and fireman, had been an elected supervisor until he resigned because he found his $9,600 salary was not enough to support his wife and infant child. Under pressure from some of his constituents, White asked the mayor to reappoint him. At first, Moscone agreed, but later he changed his mind. Only an hour before the mayor was scheduled to announce a replacement for White, the distraught ex-supervisor went to Moscone’s office and shot him four times. White then walked to the supervisors’ chambers on the other side of City Hall and killed Milk, who had opposed his returning to the board.

White was quickly taken into custody, offering no resistance. At his trial the defense contended that when he committed the murders, White had been suffering from diminished mental capacity because of personal and financial pressures. On May 22, 1979 the jury cleared White of premeditated murder, finding him guilty of manslaughter. The verdict shocked much of the San Francisco citizenry, especially the city’s large gay community. The day of the verdict thousands of homosexuals rioted in the streets to protest the alleged leniency shown the killer, which they said never would have been granted had not Supervisor Milk been gay. Mob violence aimed at homosexuals has occurred fairly frequently in American history, but this was one of a handful of occasions when homosexuals themselves rioted.

White was sentenced on July 3, 1979 to seven years and eight months in prison, the maximum term permitted by the jury’s verdict.

White, Isaac DeForest “Ike” (1864–1943) crime reporter

Ike White of the New York World was among the best crime reporters this country has ever produced. A thorn in the side of the police, he often solved cases in the columns of his newspaper when the official investigation had barely begun.

In the murder of one Melody Brown, White arrived on the scene even before the police and found the woman's body hanging from a rafter. When the law arrived and started musing about the possibility of suicide, White disappeared, suspecting it was a case of murder. From the building superintendent he learned that the woman had a boyfriend who worked as a janitor in a building some blocks away. He found the dead woman's boyfriend sitting on the front stoop, talking to neighbors. "It's no good, George, you didn't do a good enough job of hanging Melody," White told him. "We revived her and she told us everything."

There was a period of silence and then the man said: "Thank God. I must have been crazy to go that wild. I don't really hate her. . . . I'm sorry." The World published the interview with the murderer while the police were still pursuing their suicide theory.

White solved many other mysteries, including the identity of the "bearded stranger" who made the bomb attack on financier Russell Sage in 1891. He also brought to bay a notorious murderer named Dr. Robert Buchanan. When White died in 1943, one obituary credited him with being the greatest crime reporter in the history of American journalism and "perhaps the best detective this city ever had as well."

White Caps vigilantes

The White Cap vigilante movement started in Indiana in the 1880s and, for a time, enjoyed considerable popularity in many rural parts of the country. While certain White Cap organizations may have exhibited anti-black or anti-Mexican attitudes, by and large the whole movement was aimed at taming "white trash." White Caps focused their attention on shiftless characters, prostitutes, drunks and men who did not support their families, and generally attempted to reform them by application of a whip. These organizations are regarded as links between the first Ku Klux Klan, which was started after the Civil War, and the second Klan, which was organized during World War I.

White Caps (Gorras Blancas) Mexican vigilante society

Unlike the other victims of ethnic discrimination and exploitation in this country, the Mexicans of the Southwest formed a vigilante group to battle the encroachments of the Anglos, especially in the New Mexico Territory. They were led by educated, English-speaking Mexicans who had lived in the Anglo world and had learned how to fight back. One of these leaders was Juan Jose Herrera, who had witnessed the tactics labor had used against the railroads and mining companies in Colorado, which included violence, sabotage and murder. When he returned to the New Mexico Territory, Herrera helped found the Gorras Blancas or White Caps, and taught them to employ the same tactics against the Anglos who were discriminating against Mexicans, cheating them and illegally fencing in the lands so that small Mexican farmers could not survive. By 1888 the White Caps had about 1,500 members and were frightening Anglo elements throughout the territory by cutting fences, considered a major offense in the area, and destroying railroad property. Murders and other acts of violence were charged to them, although it is likely that they were blamed for many things they were not guilty of. The ranks of the White Caps started crumbling because of spies working within their structure and a decision by their leaders to shift their attention to the political arena. The Mexican White Cap movement is not to be confused with other White Cap movements, which were somewhat akin to the Ku Klux Klan.

Despite America's growing concern about what is regarded as a surge in crime, one sort of criminal activity, easily the most pervasive and probably the one with the greatest impact on people's everyday life, is usually ignored. It is "white-collar crime," which can be defined as the criminal activities of middle- and upper-class citizens, generally college-educated, who steal in their occupational roles in government, the professions and business.

The crimes include embezzlements, antitrust violations, business swindles, graft taking, income tax evasion, stock frauds, defrauding the government, violations of pure food and drug laws, consumer frauds and union-management collusion. It is impossible to measure the actual extent of white-collar crime. For example, based on arrest records, well over 10,000 embezzlement cases are believed to occur each year. However, many experts are convinced that less than one embezzler in 10 is ever reported to the police or prosecuted. The President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice estimated that $200 million is embezzled each year, and embezzlement is a minor offense in the white-collar crime field.

President Lyndon B. Johnson commented in 1967, "The economic cost of white-collar crime—embezzlement, petty theft from business, consumer frauds, antitrust violations, and the like—dwarfs that of all crimes of violence.”

Edwin H. Sutherland, a sociologist who coined the term “white-collar crime,” wrote in 1940:

The financial cost of white-collar-crime is probably several times as great as the financial cost of all the crimes which are customarily regarded as the crime problem. An officer of a chain store in one year embezzled $600,000, which was 6 times as much as the annual losses from 500 burglaries and robberies of the stores in that chain. Public enemies numbered one to 6 secured $130,000 by burglary and robbery in 1938, while the sum stolen by Krueger is estimated at $250 million; or nearly 2,000 times as much.

Some major white-collar criminals who have been convicted and sentenced in recent years include Billie Sol Estes, who developed a multimillion dollar scheme to swindle money from farmers for nonexistent fertilizer tanks; Eddie Gilbert who fled to South America after stealing $1,953,000 from a company of which he had been president; and Tony DeAngelis, who raised $150 million by showing creditors fraudulent and forged warehouse receipts for vegetable oil that did not exist. In the field of influence peddling, Robert G. “Bobby” Baker went to prison for his illegal activities while secretary to the Democratic majority in the U. S. Senate under President Johnson. From 1955 until he resigned in 1963, Baker’s net worth grew from $11,000 to $1.7 million. Other political influence cases have involved former New York City Water Commissioner James L. Marcus and former Democratic leader Carmine DeSapio. White-collar crime convictions even reached the office of the vice president when Spiro Agnew pleaded no contest to an income tax evasion charge after being forced to resign his vice presidency in 1973.

In addition, there is an almost endless amount of white-collar crime committed by officials of some of the biggest corporate entities in this country. Generally, their punishment is hardly commensurate with their offenses. Yet, while the effect of white-collar crime on the public purse is obviously enormous, very little demand for reform is heard from the public, especially the articulate middle and upper classes.

In The Thief in the White Collar by Norman Jaspán, an expert in the field of security, and Hillel Black, the authors cite a case that perhaps typifies the extent of the problem.

In one suburban store recently we found 29 part-time employees involved in theft. Two were elementary school principals, one a parochial school principal, another a credit manager of a large company, another an insurance adjuster and so on.

The merchandise they voluntarily returned exceeded $50,000. Total loss to the store—over $200,000. Most of the thieves held two jobs so they could afford to live in the new suburban area surrounding the store. The store carried items they needed in their new homes. As they helped each other steal, one would say to the other, “Be my guest.”

White Family Chicago family gang

The White gang, also called the Weiss gang, was an incredible family of Chicago criminals.

In the 1860s the six sons and two daughters of the Widow Margaret Weiss all married into the Renich family of 10 daughters and two sons. The offspring of these marriages intermarried and near the turn of the century the tribe, bolstered by some cousins and other relatives, had grown to about 100 persons, every one of whom, the police claimed, was a criminal. Indeed, at any given moment in the 1890s at least 20 of the family were behind bars. During that decade the boss of the tribe was Mrs. Renich’s sister, Eva Gussler, also known as Eva the Cow. One of the best shoplifters and pickpockets in Chicago, Eva the Cow assigned all the members of the tribe to specific criminal duties.

She also supervised the instruction of the young, seeing that they were schooled in the techniques of stealing as soon as they could walk. A typical use of children by the tribe was revealed in 1903, when Mary Boston and her five-year-old niece were apprehended for shoplifting in a department store. The woman was wearing a large dress with big pockets sewn into the lining. Her technique involved walking slowly through the store with the little girl under her skirts and knocking items to the floor so that the child could retrieve them and slip them into the hidden pockets.

As late as the beginning of World War I, members of the family were still being arrested, and a few of the men eventually joined the bootlegging gangs in the 1920s.

White Front Cigar Store underworld hangout

With the possible exception of the Brooklyn candy store of Murder, Inc. fame, the White Front Cigar Store in Hot Springs, Ark. was perhaps the most notorious underworld hangout of the 20th century. Such an establishment was possible only in a “safe city,” and in the 1920s and 1930s Hot Springs was the safest, with criminals even more immune from arrest there than they were in St. Paul or Kansas City, two other notorious criminal havens. All important underworld elements coming to “Bubbles,” Hot Springs’ underworld slang name, knew they had to report to the White Front. Whenever a sinister type arrived, he could simply tell the taxi driver, “Take me to the cigar store.” The cabbie knew which one he wanted.

The White Front was run by Richard T. Galatas, who acted as liaison between all hoodlums and Dutch Akers, the local chief of detectives, a tall, slender man with stooped shoulders who shuffled around town with a remarkable ability to see no evil. The chief of police, Joseph Wakelin, ran probably the most lax police department in the country. He let Dutch Akers operate freely and for good reason. Akers collected a rakeoff from every prostitute in town and split that and the graft from the city’s numbers racket with Galatas. As a sideline, Akers also sold police guns and equipment to gangsters with the only proviso being that they be used elsewhere.

When a gangster showed up at the White Front, Galatas would introduce him to Akers and explain that the town was wide open to all visiting hoods as long as they did not attempt to undercut local operations. Among the underworld characters to pass through the White Front pipeline were such killers as Owney Madden, Frank “Jelly” Nash, Alvin “Creepy” Karpis, many of the Barkers, the elite of Chicago’s Capone mob and Detroit’s Purple Gang, and Lucky Luciano.

The FBI, which considered the Hot Springs police force one of the most untrustworthy in the country, kept the White Front under almost constant surveillance. On June 16, 1933, agents spotted killer, bank robber and escapee Jelly Nash lounging in front of the cigar store. They trailed him to a horse parlor, where he was placed under arrest and speedily rushed out of town. When news of the arrest reached the White Front, Galatas immediately called Akers to notify him of the “federal snatch.” Akers put out an all-points bulletin stating a man had been kidnapped in Hot Springs and “taken for a ride” by persons unknown. The agents successfully escaped the Galatas-inspired net and got their prisoner as far as Union Station in Kansas City, where three underworld machine gunners allegedly attempting to free Nash killed him and four officers and wounded two others in a savage crime that came to be known as the Kansas City Massacre. With that massacre, Galatas was forced to flee Hot Springs and the White Front went out of business. Caught the following year, Galatas was convicted and sent to Alcatraz for harboring an escaped prisoner, Nash.

White Hand Gang New York waterfront criminals

The last Irish gang of importance to flourish on the New York waterfront, the White Handers terrorized the Brooklyn Bridge and Red Hook sections of Brooklyn after World War I. The gang collected tribute from barge and wharf owners; those who refused to pay were beaten or stabbed and their craft or wharves looted, burned or wrecked. The White Handers also required that longshoremen pay them for the right to work. Besides these criminal pursuits, the gang dedicated itself to keeping the docks clear of Italians, or “dagoes,” as they would have said.

Gang members were exceedingly violent and they would often kill one of their own if they saw a reward in it. The number two man in the gang, Vinny Meehan, was knifed to death by a jealous underling who wanted his crown. Until 1923 the gang was led by Wild Bill Lovett, a pinch-faced gangster who looked harmless even as he killed people. Lovett was shot to death from ambush. It was suspected that the murder was the work of Italian dock gangsters, but it was just as likely the work of Richard “Peg Leg” Lonergan, who subsequently seized leadership of the outfit. A pock-faced killer—the police attributed 20 murders to him—Lonergan would maim any Italian terrorist exacting extortion money on his docks and then charge the hapless victim double for having the effrontery to tread on Irish turf.

On December 26, 1925 Lonergan led a half dozen of his men into the Adonis Social Club, a South Brooklyn saloon controlled by Italian gangsters. Although the Irish thugs were greatly outnumbered, Lonergan sneered at the Italians, including a rather chubby one with a long scar on his face. When he spotted two Irish girls dancing with Italians, Lonergan ordered them out of the place and told them to “get back to the white men.”

Suddenly, the lights in the establishment went out and flashes of gunfire blazed in the darkness. When the lights were switched back on, Lonergan and his two top lieutenants, Aaron Harms and Needles Ferry, lay dead on the floor with several bullets in their heads. Their colleagues had fled. It took the police some time to discover that one of those present during the shooting at the club was Al Capone, back from Chicago on a social visit to his old home ground. Capone denied having anything to do with the killings, saying, “I never met an Irishman I didn’t like.” A cynical newsman added the phrase “to kill” at the end of the sentence.

Leaderless, the White Handers disappeared from the waterfront within another three years.

White Hand Society Italian-American law-and-order group

Black Hand extortionists operated in virtually every Little Italy community in the United States, threatening to maim or kill victims and/or their families unless they paid tribute. Nowhere were the ravages of the Black Hand worse than in Chicago. Year after year during the early 20th century, anywhere from 25 to 50 Black Hand murders occurred in the city. As the Chicago Daily News noted: "A detective of experience in the Italian quarter estimates that ten pay tribute to one who is sturdy enough to resist until he is warned by a bomb. . . . Well informed Italians have never put the year's tribute to the 'Black Hand' at less than half a million dollars." Finally, the Italian community itself organized to battle the Black Hand criminals, forming in 1907 the White Hand Society, an organization of upstanding Italian business and professional men sponsored by the Italian Chamber of Commerce, the Italian newspapers and several fraternal groups.

The White Hand Society actually supplied its own police force and money to carry out the prosecution of Black Handers. White Hand detectives worked together with the police and even traveled to Italy to gather evidence of gangsters' criminal records and thus subject them to deportation. The society found it often had to contend not only with governmental indifference to the plight of Little Italy's residents but with the fear and the entrenched mores of the Italian immigrants. A typical problem was cited by the Chicago Record-Herald in an editorial in 1911:

A murder was committed here in Chicago, and the detectives, native and Italian, were set to work on the case. They succeeded in learning who the murderer was, but in spite of nets and traps, weeks passed in a vain hunt for him. Finally an Italian saw the "wanted man" leave the home of the brother of the murdered man. When the police summoned the brother to explain the strange affair he declared that the murderer had been wounded and that he and his family had shielded and nursed the wretch back to life in order to kill him and thus duly and personally avenge the death of the beloved brother. This sort of story would astonish one in a melodrama; what are practical policemen in real life to make of it? How could it have occurred to them to look for the criminal in the home of the victim's own devoted brother?

Still, the White Handers performed laudable service in battling the extortionists while giving as much protection as possible to witnesses and the families of victims. Several murderers and extortionists were convicted and sent to prison thanks to the efforts of the White Hand Society, almost all of whose officers and members were themselves threatened with death. Unfortunately, nearly every convicted Black Hander was pardoned almost as soon as he entered prison, such being the corrupt quality of Illinois politics in that era. Soon, they would be back practicing their same criminal activities. In 1912 Dr. Joseph Damiani, the president of the White Hand Society, told the Record-Herald that his members "were so discouraged by the lax administration of justice that they were refusing to advance further money to prosecute men arrested on their complaints." After late 1912 nothing more was heard of the White Hand Society. The Black Hand racket continued unabated until about 1920, when a combination of factors—crackdowns by law enforcement agencies, the shifting of gangsters into more lucrative bootlegging activities and a growing sophistication on the part of the Italian community in reporting threats to police—led to its demise.

white slave girl forced into prostitution

The origin of the term "white slave" is often associated with Mary Hastings, a Chicago madam in the 1880s and 1890s. Hastings prowled the Midwest in search of seducible young girls between the ages of 13 and 17. After luring them to Chicago with the promise of a good job, Madam Hastings would quickly lock them in a top-floor room of her establishment and abandon them to professional rapists. Finally, one young victim managed to toss a note out a window to a passerby; it read, "I'm being held as a slave."

The police raided the establishment and freed the girl. The incident inspired a newspaper reporter to coin the phrase "white slave." Madam Hastings suffered no bad effects as a result of the raid, continuing in business for several more years until her activities got too unsavory even for Chicago's graft-hungry police and she had to flee the city.

Whitman, Charles (1942–1966) mass murderer

On August 1, 1966, an enthusiastic Charles Whitman, user of guns, concluded 24 hours of killing by turning the University of Texas campus into a shooting gallery from his vantage atop a 307-foot observation tower, murdering a total of 18 people and wounding 30 others in a 96-minute rampage.

Whitman, a crewcut 24-year-old ex-Marine who maintained a near straight-A average at the school, was later described by his psychiatrist as an all-American boy. On July 31 Whitman typed a note declaring: "I am prepared to die. After my death, I wish an autopsy on me to be performed to see if there is any mental disorder." Then he stabbed his mother with a butcher knife and shot her in the back of the head. A few hours later, after feeding the dog, he picked up his wife from her job at the telephone company and brought her home. Sometime during the night he killed her with three knife wounds in the chest.

On August 1 Whitman hauled a footlocker containing a rifle, a shotgun, a revolver, two pistols and 700 rounds of ammunition to the observation tower, killing a woman at the information desk and then two tourists who happened to come along. Now, he prepared to shoot down at the students swarming over the campus during lunch hour. First, though, he set out his other supplies: sandwiches, Spam, fruit cocktail, Planter's peanuts, water containers, a transistor radio, a roll of toilet paper and a plastic bottle of Mennen spray deodorant.

Then he started shooting. His aim was phenomenal; at a typical distance of about 300 yards, he hit his target on at least one in every three shots. In one case he shot a pregnant student right through her stomach shattering the skull of her unborn baby. Almost 50 persons were hit by Whitman's shots and their bodies lay strewn over the grassy campus. Police efforts to dislodge him failed, as did an attack from a low-flying plane. Finally, officers led by Austin patrolman, Ramiro Martinez, charged up the barricaded stairway and shot Whitman to pieces. Officer Martinez was wounded in the shooting.

Later, an autopsy showed that Whitman had a tumor in the hypothalamus region of the brain, but doctors doubted the condition had caused his violent behavior. Sen. Ralph Yarborough said the man's actions were the result of TV violence, and Gov. John Connally demanded stiffer penalties for insane criminals.

Whitman, John Lorin (1862–1926) jailer

Nicknamed the Boy Guard, John Lorin Whitman won fame with both the convicts of Illinois and the public, no mean accomplishment in an era when “coddling” convicts was not exactly popular.

A photo found in a camera belonging to tower murderer Charles Whitman shows him asleep on a couch with his pet dog at his feet. It was believed that his wife took the shot just a few days before his murderous spree.

Whitman was named a guard at the Cook County jail in Chicago, Ill. when he was 28 years old, but he was so young in appearance and slender in build that the prisoners looked on him as a mere boy and, for some reason, became very affectionate and protective toward him, giving him to no trouble when he was on duty. Whitman, in turn, developed a kindly, compassionate and humane attitude toward prisoners that most of the other guards could not understand. It was not lost on his superiors, however, and Whitman was promoted to jailer, in which position he was able to introduce a number of beneficial reforms in the running of the prison.

In 1907 Whitman was appointed superintendent of the House of Correction in Chicago, where he again instituted a program noted for its kindness and understanding. As a result, the prison had far fewer inmate problems than other penal institutions. Until his death in 1926, Whitman was always affectionately referred to by the convicts as the Boy Guard.

Whitney, Richard F. (1888–1974) financial manipulator
Richard Whitney, former president of the New York Stock Exchange, earned himself two quite different nicknames during his checkered career. The epitome of conservative respectability, he was charged by the Bankers’ Pool with handling the purchase of millions of dollars in stock on Black Thursday in 1929 in an effort to reinforce public confidence in the market; for his efforts he became known as the Strongman of Wall Street. In 1938 it was discovered that Whitney had misappropriated the securities of the clients of his bond company to cover his own losses. Renamed the Wolf of Wall Street, Whitney was sent to Sing Sing. He served three years and never returned to the Street, disappearing from sight for a time and then turning up as the manager of a fiber mill in Florida. He died in obscurity in 1974 at the age of 86.

Whore War Chicago prostitutes’ feud
Jurisdictional disputes as well as ownership of “goods” have always dogged organized prostitution, but never has the business been more marked by violence than during the so-called Whore War in Chicago in 1857.

Pitted against each other were the forces of the Sands, the lowest center of vice in the city, and those representing the more “refined” houses of State Street, such as Julia Davenport’s Green House and Mother Herrick’s Prairie Queen. The spark that ignited the war was a provocative act by Mother Herrick, who lured away from the Sands the fairest specimen in Madame Anna Wilson’s brothel with an offer of more money and a clean dress. Madame Wilson operated the only 50¢ brothel in the Sands, twice the standard rate for that area, and, as such, was considered the natural leader of the bordello forces there. Several pitched battles with harlots and pimps on each side were fought on city streets, as newspapers duly warned their readers to seek cover whenever a large gang of “strumpets and their men” appeared.

The Sands’ forces had an advantage in having on their side a pugnacious young prostitute named Annie Stafford. Totally misnamed Gentle Annie, she was recognized as one of the most brutal fighters in Chicago, male or female. The war continued indecisively for a number of months until April 3, when Gentle Annie, with the aid of a number of henchwomen and their pimps, made a surprise attack on the Prairie Queen. They battered down the door, destroyed furniture and forced customers to flee in varying states of dishabille. Mother Herrick and her supporters were beaten, and Gentle Annie marched back in victory to the Sands, personally driving before her the stolen harlot as well as Mother Herrick’s prize prostitutes as the spoils of victory. The State Street houses never again tried to raid the Sands.

Whyos last great 19th century ruffian gang

A ruffian gang that was to dominate the New York crime scene for two decades after its formation in 1874, the Whyos recalled all the viciousness of such early marauder bands as the Chichesters and the Dead Rabbits. They, like their predecessors, were Irish to the core, but whereas the early gangs reveled in robbing, assaulting, maiming and killing Englishmen, the Whyos would victimize anyone. In fact, the gang functioned as a primitive Murder, Inc., ready to perform any sort of mayhem for a set fee. When one of the top Whyos, Piker Ryan, was apprehended in 1883, he had in his possession what the newspapers called the “official” Whyo price list for services. It read:

Punching	$ 2
Both eyes blacked	$ 4
Nose and jaw broke	$ 10
Jacked out [knocked out with a blackjack]	$ 15
Ear chawed off	$ 15
Leg or arm broke	$ 19
Shot in leg	$ 25
Stab	$ 25
Doing the big job	$100 and up

WICKERSHAM Commission

So powerful were the Whyos that they exacted tribute from many other gangs for permission to operate. The names of Whyo members constituted a full roster of the most vicious thugs of the period: English Charley, Denver Hop, Hoggy Walsh, Big Josh Hines, Fig McGerald, Bull Hurley, Dandy Johnny Dolan, Baboon Connolly, Googy Corcoran and Red Rocks Farrell.

Big Josh, who had the franchise for collecting protection money from the various stuss games, an illegal form of gambling of the era, would parade from one game to another armed with two revolvers to take out the Whyos' portion of the revenues. When some of the stuss operators complained he took too much, Big Josh peevishly told a detective: "Them guys must be nuts. Don't I always leave 'em somethin'? All I want is me share!"

Because membership in the Whyos meant higher income, the more lethal criminals in the city naturally gravitated to it. In the 1880s the gang's two most-celebrated leaders, Danny Driscoll and Danny Lyons, enforced an edict reserving membership only to those who had killed at least one man. Both Driscoll and Lyons were hanged in 1888. Driscoll had been convicted of shooting to death a young prostitute and Lyons of killing another gangster in a street shoot-out. Shortly after Lyons' death, two young prostitutes—Gentle Maggie and Lizzie the Dove—who had toiled hard and long to keep him in the style to which he had become accustomed got into a boisterous argument about which of them missed Lyons the most. Gentle Maggie won the dispute by slitting Lizzie the Dove's throat.

The Whyos headquartered at a low Bowery dive aptly called the Morgue, whose proprietor proudly boasted his liquid refreshments were equally potent as either a beverage or an embalming fluid. It was at the Morgue that one of the gang's most brutal members, Dandy Johnny Dolan, would often display proof of his latest crime. In addition to flashing the appropriate bankroll, he would display his victim's eyes, which he carried around in a pocket. Dolan was the inventor of a new and efficient eye gouger, an apparatus worn on the thumb and available for instant use. He also designed special fighting shoes with sections of a sharp ax blade imbedded in the soles, so that a Dolan stomping was always particularly gory.

The Morgue was the scene of the Whyos' last battle. The gang members were notorious for fighting as much among themselves as with their victims. It started when Denver Hop and English Charley got into an argument over the division of some loot. Suddenly, both started shooting, and soon, at least 20 other Whyos joined in the gun battle. No one was injured, however, since all were drunk; the press reported that the proprietor felt the Whyos had been rather silly to expect to hit anything after imbibing his liquor.

The incident perhaps best explained why the Whyos were to disappear from the scene. While they were certainly the most efficient killers and maimers in town, they did not understand the full value of political influence. A powerful gang, the Eastmans, that came to the fore upon their decline was just as brutal, but its members learned to work with the Tammany Hall powers, providing efficient services at election time. The Whyos simply wanted to crack skulls and, as such, fell victim to the changing times. Without political protection, they were open to arrest and imprisonment.

Wickersham Commission law observance unit

The National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement, popularly known as the Wickersham Commission, was appointed by President Herbert Hoover in 1929. It was headed by George W. Wickersham, a lawyer who had been attorney general in the Taft administration. The commission delved into a number of subjects, such as the costs of law enforcement, the third degree, and other lawless police practices, juvenile delinquency and the belief that criminals were mostly foreign-born. The conclusion was that law enforcement was totally inadequate and that the cost of crime had hit the then-staggering figure of $1 billion a year.

However, the Wickersham report on Prohibition captured the most attention, as a majority of the commission declared the Noble Experiment a disaster and called for its repeal. Wickersham and three commission members favored a continued test of the program, but in 1932 he changed his position and urged the sale of alcoholic beverages under regulation. Wickersham's new stand was considered by many to be the death knell for Prohibition.

Wilcoxson, Bobby Randell "One-Eye" (1929–) bank robber and murderer

An efficient and brutal bank robber, One-Eye Wilcoxson was known as the John Dillinger of the 1960s. While both men planned their robberies meticulously, Dillinger carried his off with a certain lightheartedness, but Wilcoxson was deadly serious. Wilcoxson killed cold-bloodedly; whereas it must be said that Dillinger killed only when he felt his own life was in imminent danger. While casing the Kings Highway branch of the Lafayette National Bank in Brooklyn, New York City, Wilcoxson made it a point to talk with the bank guard while he was eating in a diner across the street from the institution. He jokingly asked the guard, 52-year-old Henry Kraus, what he would do "if I walked in to hold up the bank." The guard smiled and said he would shoot him. One-Eye reported to his confederates that the guard should be a danger because he was a "Wyatt Earp type."

Two weeks later, on December 15, 1961, Wilcoxson and a partner, Peter Curry, walked into the bank. Wilcoxson spotted guard Kraus sitting in a chair, stepped up to him and pulled out a revolver. "Well, here I am with a gun," he said and shot the guard in the chest. When Kraus tried to rise, Wilcoxson shot him three more times, killing him. One-Eye then announced it was a stickup, and he and Curry seized more than $32,000. As they were leaving the bank for a getaway car driven by Albert Nussbaum, a police officer, Salvatore Accardi, appeared on the scene and opened fire. The policeman missed, but One-Eye didn't. His first shot hit the officer in the leg and his second penetrated Accardi's badge and sent him hurtling through the bank's outer glass door to the sidewalk. Later, Wilcoxson said he would have continued firing at the policeman except that he thought the cop was dead. Miraculously, the bullet that hit Accardi in the chest had become embedded in the officer's overcoat, and although stunned, he was not seriously hurt.

Born in Duke, Okla. the son of itinerant farmworkers, Wilcoxson had been in trouble most of his life. He lost his right eye sometime during his boyhood but never talked about it. From the age of 10 he worked the California lettuce fields and by 1953 he had become a "boss" fruit picker. At this point in his life Wilcoxson had a wife and daughter and was frequently in trouble with the law for such offenses as wife beating and car theft. He wound up in Chillicothe Prison in Ohio on an auto theft conviction. In prison he met Curry and Nussbaum, and the three teamed up when they were released in 1959. On December 5, 1960 Wilcoxson and Nussbaum held up a bank in Buffalo and followed that up with another robbery in the same city the following month. It is not known how many bank robberies Wilcoxson pulled. He eventually pleaded guilty to the felony-murder of Kraus and seven bank robberies, in which the total loot taken was $205,873.

Wilcoxson's downfall came when Curry surrendered to police after the murder of Kraus, saying he hadn't counted on any killings when he agreed to take part in the bank robbery. Curry identified Nussbaum and Wilcoxson as his confederates. FBI agents captured Nussbaum in Buffalo on November 5, 1962 and learned that Wilcoxson was traveling with a 19-year-old woman and her baby. The agents traced them to Baltimore, where they were living in a rented house directly across the street from one FBI agent and half a block away from another. A week later, Wilcoxson was captured as he was carrying the baby to a station wagon. Suddenly, 30 agents moved in on him and three tackled him, pulling the baby away. Wilcoxson was quickly subdued, unable to draw the gun tucked in his belt.

Wilcoxson and Curry were sentenced to life imprisonment and Nussbaum got 20 years.

Wild Bunch outlaws

The term Wild Bunch is often used to describe the last great gang, an organization in the loosest sense of the word, that forayed out of such outlaw strongholds as Hole in the Wall, Robber's Roost and Brown's Hole. More specifically, the Wild Bunch came to represent the train-robbing, bank-busting, hell-raising outlaws who followed the celebrated Butch Cassidy. At any particular time the Wild Bunch generally consisted of no more than 10 members, but over the years the cast of characters totaled more than half a hundred. Among the famous gunmen who rode with the Bunch were the Sundance Kid (Harry Longbaugh), Kid Curry (Harvey Logan), Harry Tracy, Matt Warner, Elzy Lay and Ben Kilpatrick, the Tall Texan. The Bunch had more than its share of camp followers, but only two of these women ever rode out of the gang's hideouts on raids. They were Della Rose (the Rose of the Bunch) and Etta Place, both prostitutes, although some historians have described them differently, especially Etta, the companion of both Cassidy and the Sundance Kid, who was depicted as a schoolteacher in a late-1960s Hollywood movie. Etta was extremely understanding and even accompanied the boys back to Fort Worth, Tex. on their regular visits to Fanny Potter's bordello, her alma mater.

Such close-knit companionship was common in the Wild Bunch, whose members were noted for their absolute loyalty to Cassidy and to one another. There is no record of Bunchers deserting one another in time of danger, a common practice among outlaw bands. By about 1902 the Wild Bunch was finished, having flourished for less than a decade, with most of the members dead or behind bars and Butch, Sundance and Etta living in South America. According to one story, Cassidy and the Kid died in a shoot-out with Bolivian troops, but in another version they survived and were reunited years later in Mexico. A third report has only Sundance living through the battle in Bolivia.

The last Buncher to attempt a return to crime was Ben Kilpatrick, who, after doing nine and a half years for a train robbery, informed a newspaper editor that he had reformed, was going to get himself a flock of sheep and prove he could be an upright citizen instead of an outlaw. Shortly thereafter the Tall Texan was

Wilder, Christopher (1945–1984) rich serial killer

Australian-born Christopher Wilder early on showed tendencies of sexual and violent behavior that were not at all mitigated by his family’s wealth which may indeed have placed him in an independent position that allowed him to develop into a frightening serial killer in the United States.

With his Australian mother and American naval officer father, Wilder lived in a number of U.S. cities, as his father’s duties required. The family eventually returned to Australia. At the age of 17, Wilder was accused of taking part in a gang rape on a Sydney beach, for which he was sentenced to one year’s probation with required counseling that involved group therapy and electroshock treatments. These seemed to have had no positive effects. Wilder married at 23, but the marriage soon collapsed, his wife charging sexual abuse. By this time Wilder was into nude photography, which he used in attempts to extort sex from his subjects. Charges stemming from this account were dropped when none of the women thus abused would testify in court.

Wilder felt it was prudent to leave Australia, and in time he relocated to Florida. He had the financial ability to prosper in construction and electrical contracting, and he lived a lavish lifestyle. He then got on to doing the important things in his life, setting up a photo studio in his apartment as a more convenient way to lure women to his photo shoots, which frequently degenerated into sexual attacks. In time Wilder had run-ins with the law as well as his parents, who stayed with him for a time. Not knowing what to do with him, they returned to Australia, after settling a considerable sum of money on their son. On his own, Wilder raped a teenager after lacing her pizza with knockout drops. For this he was sentenced to five years on probation, with the requirement that he undergo psychological counseling and treatment from a sex therapist.

With a net worth estimated at $2 million, Wilder became involved in car racing, competing in the Miami Grand Prix and Sebring races. He also started getting blackouts and would vanish for two or three days, later telling friends he had no idea what he had been doing.

Presumably a number of sexual crimes forced Wilder back to Australia in 1982. He promptly got in trouble in an incident involving two 15-year-old girls and was brought up on charges. His parents put up $350,000 bail, and Wilder took off for the United States once more, where he pretended nothing was wrong.

But now his killer instincts took over. In February 1984 Wilder took part in the Miami Grand Prix and was outraged when he finished 17th. Rosario Gonzalez had a worse fate. She worked at the event distributing samples and was approached by Wilder. By that evening she had disappeared, her body never found. Then Wilder started dating lovely Beth Kenyon, who had been a finalist in the Miss Florida contest. Beth told her parents Wilder, who was known to have a wild reputation, was a perfect gentleman with her. But in March she informed her parents she was breaking off with Wilder. That same month Beth disappeared, and a coast-to-coast manhunt produced no results. Not long after that, Wilder kidnapped Terry Ferguson from a Florida shopping mall. Her body, stabbed numerous times with an instrument resembling a filet knife, was found in a snake-infested creek. Witnesses identified Wilder as the abductor of 21-year-old Terry.

Then Wilder abducted a college co-ed from a shopping mall in Tallahassee, took her to a Bainbridge, Georgia, motel where he sealed her eyes shut with super glue. He continually raped her and subjected her to electrical shocks. Wilder was hitting her with a hair dryer in the bathroom, but the co-ed managed to scream even though her hands and mouth were taped. Panicked, Wilder fled the room, muttering "excuse me" to other motel guests in what they described as a light Australian accent.

The murder spree continued as Wilder kidnapped 21-year-old Susanne Logan in Oklahoma City. Her body was found in the town reservoir in Milford, Kansas. She had been stabbed and raped and had bite marks on her breasts.

A 16-year-old girl kidnapped and stabbed repeatedly near Gary, Indiana, survived Wilder's predation by pretending to be dead. There were other cases, such as a co-ed in Beaumont, Texas, who was stabbed to death and dumped in a canal.

By now the FBI had tied Wilder to many of these slayings and had him at the head of its Ten Most Wanted List. New victims turned up in Colorado and Las Vegas, where Michelle Korfman, a casino executive's daughter, was approached by a man about competing in Seventeen magazine's cover contest. She finally turned up in the Los Angeles County morgue.

Investigators expected Wilder to head for the Australian outback, but he did not. He turned east and in Victor, New York, abducted Beth Dodge, a 33-year-old Sunday school teacher. Her body turned up in Rochester.

Now the manhunt for Wilder concentrated on watching for him to try to slip into Canada. Instead he turned up in Colebrook, New Hampshire. He undoubtedly was looking for another female victim, but he was now being hunted as well. Two state troopers passed a service station where Wilder had stopped for gas. Wilder, who had been sporting a bushy beard, had shaved it off, leaving his tanned face pale where the beard had been. The troopers closed in on Wilder and called out to him to stop. Instead, Wilder ran swiftly to his car and seized a .357 Magnum revolver. One of the officers hurled his body at Wilder and two shots followed as they wrestled for the gun. A bullet passed through Wilder and pierced the officer's chest, coming within an inch of killing him. The second shot killed Wilder.

Williams, Alexander S. "Clubber" (1839–1910)
police officer

Clubber Williams, a New York City police officer, is remembered for a number of reasons. A tough character capable of holding his own against any collection of criminals, Williams was the originator of the famous observation, "There's more law in the end of a policeman's nightstick than in a decision of the Supreme Court." He also coined the word "tenderloin," meaning a lush vice area. However, his most remarkable achievement was accumulating something in excess of $1 million from the time he started in 1866 as a patrolman until he retired in 1895 as an inspector, making $3,500 a year. The exact sum was never pinned down, since Clubber was not too precise in his testimony before investigating committees. Suffice it to say he was probably one of the most-crooked cops the city and the nation has ever seen.

Alexander S. Williams was a Nova Scotian by birth and served his youthful years at sea, becoming a ship's carpenter. At the age of 27 he found himself in New York flat broke. He became a police officer, not a difficult task in those days, the Metropolitan Police Department having a great number of vacancies. Not without reason, the public viewed the police as little better than the criminals they were supposed to be suppressing. At best most police officers were inept, at worst corrupt.

After two years in a quiet part of town, Williams was transferred to the area around Broadway and Houston Street, the stomping ground of many of the city's toughest gangs, including criminals who sportingly kept close count of the number of officers they maimed or killed. Williams was cut of a different cloth than most of their victims, however. Two days after he was assigned his post, he selected two of the most-feared toughs in the neighborhood and deliberately started fights with them, promptly battering them unconscious. He heaved them through the plate glass window of the Florence Saloon, a leading criminal haunt. Immediately, six friends of the disabled thugs issued forth to teach Williams a lesson, but he stood his ground and cut them down with his nightstick. Thereafter, he was said to have had at least one fight a day for almost four years. His prowess with the nightstick became so famed that he was hailed as Clubber Williams.

In September 1871 Williams was promoted to captain and put in charge of the 21st Precinct, the heart of the old criminal-infested Gas House district. He immediately went forth patrolling the streets alone, "invoking the gospel of the nightstick," as a doting writer of the era put it. The next day he took a dozen of his brawniest men and organized a special strong-arm squad. Up and down the district the band roamed, clubbing thugs.

While some objected to his violent methods and the occasional skull rapping of an innocent citizen, most of the public praised Clubber and said the city needed more men like him. Whenever delegations of important citizens and clergymen came around to protest clubbing excesses, Williams had a most impressive way of showing how well his techniques had cleaned up the area. Taking his gold watch and chain, he would hang them on a lamppost at Third Avenue and 35th Street and then lead the do-gooders on a casual walk around the block. When they got back, the watch and chain would still be hanging there.

Williams tamed the 21st and, later, the 8th and 4th precincts. In 1876 he was shifted to the 29th, the Ten-derloin, as he was to call it. After hearing of his transfer, Captain Williams walked around with a huge smile on his rugged face. Asked by a friend the reason for this merriment, he replied, "I've had nothing but chuck for a long time and now I'm going to get the tenderloin."

Until that time Williams was relatively honest by departmental standards. He had, it was true, created a personal benevolent society to which businessmen contributed about one-third the tribute they had been paying protection racketeers (those who didn't pay continued to be harrassed by the criminals), but overall, Williams' former commands just didn't offer great graft possibilities. The Tenderloin was another matter. The area between 24th and 40th streets from Fifth to Seventh avenues contained so much vice it won the name of Satan's Circus. It was once estimated that at least half the buildings in the district were given over to some form of lawlessness. Sixth Avenue was lined with virtually nothing but brothels, dance halls, saloons and gambling joints.

By nature, Williams was not opposed to brothels and the like; they were "fashionable," he often said. What he objected to was that police grafting in the area was such a sorry, catch-as-catch-can spectacle. He assigned brothels a regular payoff rate, determined by the number of prostitutes and customers and the prices charged. Several years later, a woman who owned a chain of such houses testified that she had paid Clubber $30,000 a year in protection money. For others, Williams instituted a $500 initiation fee and monthly charges of $25 to $50. More than 600 policy shops paid Williams' command an average of $15 a month each; $300 was the fee collected from poolrooms (which were basically gambling establishments); and even larger sums were extracted from luxurious gambling joints.

A person opening any kind of business in the Tenderloin district was immediately visited by one of Williams' officers and told how much he'd have to pay if he wanted to do anything not quite legal. Even if the man was interested in operating an honest enterprise, he had to make some payment as a matter of principle.

Williams' chief source of revenue during his Tenderloin reign came from the whiskey business. Together with two partners, he produced a cheap rotgut and had his men force all the area's saloons to take so many cases of the brew a month. It was either that or be forced out of business by one police raid after another.

By mid-1880s Williams had been brought up on brutality or graft charges 18 times and cleared 18 times. Finally, though, the stench got so bad that the Tammany-dominated police brass had to root Clubber out of the Tenderloin by promoting him to the rank of inspector, in charge of almost the entire East Side of Manhattan. Now the third-ranking member of the department, Williams immediately summoned all his captains and gave them strict quotas on how much graft they were expected to collect and what share they were to give him. A captain who wanted to remain honest was threatened with being busted in rank and returned to a beat.

Williams' arrogant behavior made him a target for such crusading newspapers as The Herald, The Tribune and The World. Particularly active against Williams was Lincoln Steffens, the great muckraking reporter, who pointed out that while Clubber got so much credit for cracking the skulls of gangsters and thugs, the fact remained that he and his command were far more active in bashing the heads of strikers, most particularly Russian Jews, for whom Williams had a never-explained antipathy. It was said that a Russian Jew brought into a station house when Clubber was present never left without a bandage on his skull and a limp.

Of course, mistreatment of foreigners and "anarchists" did not necessarily cost Williams much in the way of prestige among upright citizens, but he eventually ran afoul of the Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, who, as head of the New York Society for the Prevention of Crime, started a crusade to get Williams, digging up evidence against him that was presented to the famed Lexow Committee of 1894.

The inspector's entire graft setup was laid bare before the legislative investigating committee. Capt. Max Schmittberger, who had been a sergeant in the Tenderloin, admitted he had collected money from gamblers and keepers of disorderly houses and given it to Williams. Other officers testified to paying Williams as much as $15,000 for promotions. Individual citizens came forth with tales of Williams' corruption; one family, after protesting to Williams about the noise from a nearby bordello, had found themselves evicted.

Inspector Williams took the stand, the picture of innocence. Yes, he had allowed some naughty places to stay open, because sin was fashionable. But, of course, he only allowed "those that were in good taste." No, he could not remember which particular houses had stayed open and which had been forced to close, and since he was bad at numbers, he couldn't estimate how many places he'd actually put out of business.

Yes, he did have several bank accounts; he was a thrifty man, not given to extravagant living. Yes, besides a town house he owned a magnificent country estate at Cos Cob, Conn. No, he couldn't recall how much it had cost him, but shown receipts in the committee's possession, he had to agree that the dock he'd had built for his private yacht had cost $39,000.

All that on his annual $3,500 salary? No, he had made some excellent investments in real estate in Japan.

The committee was never able to locate a map showing the places Williams had mentioned. Despite all the testimony against him, Williams survived the inquiry without even a reprimand from the police department.

Still, the Lexow revelations spelled his end. A reform ticket was elected and a three-man board of police commissioners was established. It was presided over by reformer Theodore Roosevelt. Some students of history say that Clubber Williams was the inspiration for Roosevelt's "Speak softly and carry a big stick." But if Roosevelt did have a certain admiration for Williams' ability to cow the underworld, he also believed it was possible to have a police force that was both tough and honest.

On May 24, 1895 Clubber, realizing there was little point in clinging to his job while constantly under Roosevelt's eye, resigned. He lived out the next 15 years of his life in most comfortable retirement.

Williams, Edward Bennett (1920–1988) defense lawyer

F. Lee Bailey, one of the most famous lawyers in the country once said, "If I ever got in trouble, he's the one I'd want representing me." Bailey was referring to a burly Washington lawyer with the face of a middle-aged cherub, Edward Bennett Williams. Even men who despised Williams, and that included many prosecutors, rival lawyers and even former attorneys general such as Robert F. Kennedy, have admitted he may be the best lawyer in the tradition of Clarence Darrow in recent decades.

Williams was not a "scorecard"-type lawyer, with X number of defendants of whom only a minute percentage go to prison. His success record was once estimated to be about 70 percent, an amazing figure for a lawyer whose clients have included Sen. Joseph McCarthy, Jimmy Hoffa, Adam Clayton Powell, Bobby Baker, Frank Costello, Aldo Icardi, Confidential magazine, and assorted admitted gamblers and accused Russian spies. Costello probably best summed up the attitude of Williams' clients toward the lawyer when he said: "What I like about Ed Williams is that he'll go up against any of 'em—J. Edgar Hoover, Bobby Kennedy, even President Johnson. He doesn't pull back. He's not afraid."

Opponents naturally saw him in a different light; he was called everything from "ruthless" and a "hypocritical trickster" to "the biggest egotist in the law since William Jennings Bryan" and "a man who would have defended Eichmann if there was enough money in it."

Some years ago Williams had a favorite riposte for his critics: "I'm called the Burglar's Lobby in Washington because I defend people like Frank Costello. The Sixth Amendment of the Constitution guarantees the right of legal counsel to everyone. It does not say to everyone except people like Frank Costello.”

Once when Williams was defending Jimmy Hoffa during Robert Kennedy’s tenure as attorney general, Kennedy said he’d “jump off the Capitol dome” if he lost the case. When Hoffa was acquitted, Williams offered to provide Kennedy with a parachute, thus ending a long friendship between the two.

Some of his opponents charged Williams with perverting the Constitution; he saw what he did as defending it. He probably had done more to restrain overzealous congressional committees than any other lawyer. One example was the case of Aldo Icardi, accused of committing one of the most vicious murders in World War II. On a 1944 Office of Strategic Services (OSS) mission, Icardi and OSS Maj. William V. Holohan parachuted behind enemy lines in northern Italy. Holohan, who had taken along a large number of gold coins for use on the mission, disappeared. Six years later, his corpse was fished out of an Italian lake.

Williams told an interviewer:

Shortly thereafter, a Pentagon press release charged Icardi with Holohan’s murder. Five years after that, a Congressional committee called Icardi to testify, and he denied committing the crime. He was promptly indicted on eight counts of perjury, which, if conviction resulted, could potentially have forced him to spend forty years in prison. So I went to court and proved, to the satisfaction of the judge, that two members of the Congressional committee had called Icardi not for any valid legislative purpose, but because they were deliberately looking for a perjury indictment against him. In effect, here were two Congressmen assuming the triple roles of prosecutor, judge, and jury—yet every school-boy knows that our freedom as a nation is protected by a delicate separation of powers between the legislative, judicial and executive branches of government. In acquitting Icardi, the court clearly defined the line between Congress as a lawmaker and Congress as a grand jury.

In his continuing battle against government prosecutors Williams once made shambles of a Treasury agent who had meticulously prepared an income tax case against Adam Clayton Powell. The agent withered under Williams’ fire, admitted errors in the government’s calculations and acted more like a defendant than like the prosecution’s leading witness. In the end, the judge threw out two counts against Powell and the third and final count ended in a hung jury—a remarkable conclusion considering Powell had paid only about $900 in taxes on a gross income of $70,000.

Williams was long a thorn in the side of police investigators engaged in illegal eavesdropping, winning a Supreme Court landmark decision against the practice in the early 1960s. The case involved three gamblers who ran a $40,000-a-day sports betting parlor in a row house on 21st Street, N.W., Washington, D.C. The police moved into the house next door and drove a spike into the common wall between the two buildings. The spike, part of an electronic listening device, was inserted into a duct, converting the entire heating system into a sort of microphone, which allowed police to record scores of conversations involving gambling transactions. Based on that evidence, the three gamblers were convicted and given long prison terms. Williams took over the case and argued before the Supreme Court that the police eavesdropping was “more subtle and more scientifically advanced than wiretapping” and was the grossest sort of violation of the rights of the defendants to be secure from unreasonable searches and seizures. It was no different from the police smashing into a house in the middle of the night without a search warrant. The Supreme Court threw out the convictions.

Williams never saw the contradiction in defending—at approximately the same time—Sen. McCarthy and several of the Hollywood writers accused of communism during McCarthy’s heyday in the 1950s. Certainly, McCarthy wanted Williams because he wanted the best possible defense in his fight to escape Senate censure, but the case against him was ironclad and Williams lost.

Williams undoubtedly took the McCarthy case because he had an abiding hatred for the encroaching power of the congressional investigative committees and what he has called “the legislative lynch.” He later told a reporter: “When Estes Kefauver first ran roughshod over the rights of the hoodlums in 1950, the country was amused. Then the leftist intellectuals, who didn’t spring to the defense of the hoodlums, found that their turn was next. While this was going on labor thought it was funny but they soon discovered that they were being clobbered.” In 1961 Williams was further amused to hear spokesmen for the business community deploring the abuse of business by congressional committees. He commented: “Nobody cares until it hurts him. That’s why I’m interested in stopping such chain reactions—back where they hit the weak and the degraded—before they get started.”

In later years Williams often visited law schools to try to convince young lawyers and students to take up criminal law, to concern themselves with human rights instead of property rights. “You look at the curricula of the top law schools,” he once noted, “and you find that they are stepped in such courses as Real Property, Taxes, Estates, and Torts, all of which are required subjects. You generally find that Criminal Law and Constitutional Law are elective courses, which very few students take.”

He died in 1988.

Williams, William S. “Old Bill” (1787–1849)

mountaineer and thief

Old Bill Williams has been immortalized in the names of the Bill Williams River, the Bill Williams Mountain and the town of Williams, Ariz., but what the names do not reveal is that the mountain man was a scalp hunter, a horse thief and a cannibal.

Ginger-haired Williams was born in Rutherford County, N.C. but grew up in southeastern Missouri. In 1806 he stole a horse and moved west to become a trapper. From 1813 to 1825 he lived among the Osage Indians and later on, scouted for the U.S. Army. In the 1830s Old Bill was taking quite a few scalps for bounties and for a time he teamed up with the notorious scalp hunters James Hobbs and James Kirker. He was reputed to have explained to them that taking scalps could be dangerous and that it was much safer to raid Indian villages when the braves were away, kill some squaws and steal the village’s scalp trophies. The trophies could be sold to scalp buyers who would be none the wiser.

In the 1840s Old Bill teamed up with the mulatto mountaineer Jim Beckwourth and Pegleg Smith to form the biggest horse-stealing gang in California, driving their booty into what is today Utah, where they sold the horses to emigrants heading West, ranchers and traders. When vigilante action against the gang got too intense, Old Bill went back to scouting. In 1848 he acted as a guide for Gen. John C. Fremont on a railroad survey expedition. The trip turned into a disaster and 11 men died in the freezing weather and deep snows of Colorado’s La Garita Mountains. Old Bill was accused of incompetence and cannibalism and as a result, was fired by Fremont. In March 1849 Williams was killed by Ute Indians taking vengeance for killings he had perpetrated against their people the year before.

Wilson, Billy (1858–1911) outlaw and sheriff

Originally a member of Billy the Kid’s gang, Billy Wilson went on, with the aid of President Theodore Roosevelt, a noted Wild West fan, to begin a new life as a sheriff.

Wilson rode out of his native Texas with gunfighter Dave Rudabaugh about 1877. When Rudabaugh joined up with Billy the Kid, Wilson followed and became one of the Kid’s most trusted aides. Wilson may have assisted Billy the Kid in gunning down James Carlyle and he certainly was with him on numerous other forays. He was also in the December 27, 1880 shootout at Stinking Springs, New Mexico Territory, where both he and the Kid were taken prisoner. Wilson was separated from Billy and sent to prison at Mesilla, New Mexico Territory, from which he tunneled his way to freedom. By that time the Kid had been finished off by Sheriff Pat Garrett. What Wilson did over the next few years is not known. But by 1886 he was working as a cowhand for the Hashknife Outfit under the name of Anderson. He then settled down in Terrell County, Tex. married and became a successful rancher. All the while, Wilson-Anderson lived with the fear that some day his New Mexico past would be discovered by visiting lawmen. Yet when the job of county sheriff was offered to him in 1900 he found it impossible to turn down. Shortly thereafter, while in El Paso, Sheriff Anderson was recognized by former lawman Garrett as the long-missing Billy Wilson. Garrett, a close friend of Theodore Roosevelt, who had appointed him collector of taxes for El Paso, did not expose Wilson. Instead, he persuaded the president and the governor of the New Mexico Territory to pardon Wilson for past crimes. The pardons were granted without revealing Wilson’s new identity, and he was able to continue on as Sheriff Anderson until 1911, when he was shot dead by a lawbreaker.

Wilson, Frank J. (1887–1970) Secret Service agent and enemy of Al Capone

While Frank J. Wilson served as chief of the Secret Service from 1936 to 1947 and was regarded generally as the best man to have served in the post up to that time, he was best remembered as the federal agent who got Al Capone.

Wilson was assigned to catch Capone by Elmer I. Irey, chief of the Internal Revenue’s Enforcement Branch, who saw the opportunity to prosecute the gang leader under a 1927 Supreme Court decision that made illegal income subject to income tax. However, it was no simple matter to prove Capone had a gross income of over $5,000, then the standard exemption, for the several years he had filed no return. Big Al had no property in his own name, maintained no bank accounts, endorsed no checks and gave no receipts. This meant Wilson had to gather evidence against him based on an analysis of his “net worth” and “net expenditure.”

Wilson succeeded in planting agents on the periphery of the mob’s activities and, finally, within it. The heat on Capone got really intense; a tipster reported, “The big fellow’s eating aspirin like it was peanuts so’s he can get some sleep.” Finally, against the judgment of others in the mob, Capone imported five gunmen from New York and gave them a contract to get Wilson. Federal agents tried to put pressure on Capone to pull out the hit men, but he disappeared, forewarned by local police that the feds were hunting him. A message was given to Johnny Torrio, Capone’s old mentor, who was in town at the time, that if the gunmen were not withdrawn within 24 hours, agents would start stalking them. With the planned rub-out of Wilson thus exposed, cooler heads among the mob’s ruling circle prevailed on Capone to call off the killers. Torrio telephoned an agent and said, “They left an hour ago.” The plot was Capone’s last attempt to avoid apprehension. Eventually, Wilson presented an air-tight case against Capone that was to send him to prison, permanently removing him from running crime in Chicago.

Wilson went on to further successes. He was the federal representative in the Lindbergh baby kidnap case, and it was upon his insistence that the serial numbers of the ransom money were recorded, a tactic which resulted in the capture and execution of Bruno Richard Hauptmann. From 1936 to 1947 Wilson headed the Secret Service. During his tenure, for the first time in American history, the flood of counterfeit money was reduced to a mere trickle and the crime was virtually wiped out. He also developed presidential security measures that were to become standard procedures. Wilson retired in 1947 and died June 22, 1970.

Wilson, Tug (1862?–1934) hoodlum

A ferocious rowdy and easily the most notorious hoodlum in New Orleans after the Civil War, Tug Wilson was a throwback to an earlier, more uncivilized era. From the time he first appeared in the French Quarter about 1881 or 1882, he became one of the most-publicized ruffians in the city and was a familiar sight in the saloons, red-light districts and speakeasies right up until the time of his death in 1934.

Wilson’s heyday was during New Orleans’ most corrupt period, the last two decades of the 19th century. He was arrested more than 100 times a year throughout most of this time. Wilson had enormous strength.

Of only average height but stocky, he once broke the doors of five jail cells one after another. Why the police bothered to arrest him during this period is something of a mystery, since he actually served very little time, constantly being sprung by politicians who found his services invaluable. Wilson always wore a plug hat and a long coat, in the pockets of which he stored broken mugs and beer bottles for use as weapons. He was particularly fearsome on election day, intimidating voters and, on some occasions, entering polling booths with them to make sure they voted right.

Despite the introduction of some reforms in the city in the early 20th century, Wilson’s brawn was still much in demand in the red-light areas during Prohibition. Shortly before he died, he was still a much-feared bouncer in speakeasies; he was in his seventies at the time of his death.

Winchell, Walter (1897–1972) gossip columnist

A controversial gossip columnist and influential radio commentator, Walter Winchell played an important role in a number of crime stories. He was on speaking terms with several leading gangsters and, at the same time, a close friend of FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover. Even his detractors had to admit Winchell scored numerous crime scoops. He was the first to link Albert Anastasia to the murder of a private citizen, Arnold Schuster, after Schuster had spotted bank robber Willie Sutton and tipped off the police. He came up with a number of scoops in the Murder, Inc. case, and because he was trusted by the underworld, he was chosen to arrange the details of the surrender of Louis “Lepke” Buchalter to Hoover in 1939. Lepke was driven to Fifth Avenue and 28th Street, where he got out of a car and walked over to one in which Winchell was sitting behind the wheel. Winchell stared at Lepke intently for a moment, turned to his stocky companion in the back and said, “Mr. Hoover, this is Lepke.”

Hoover nodded, opened the rear door and motioned for Lepke to get in. Lepke later said he had wanted Winchell to act as intermediary to guarantee he would not be shot down while surrendering.

In his later years Winchell ranted in his column over the level of street crime in New York City and told friends he would not venture out after dark without carrying a gun. Winchell, the King of Broadway, felt hostage on the streets that had been his beat for so many years.

wiretapping and bugging

Any figures on the extent of wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping, or bugging, are as unreliable as even the most suspect crime statistic. With regularity, various government spokesmen appear before congressional committees and state that a small, specific number of taps are presently in place. This presupposes both an honest count and the sudden abandonment of an enduring tactic practiced by officials who simply do not wish to be informed when a wiretap of dubious merit is put into operation. The former point is often gotten around without really telling a lie. While the House Judiciary Committee was considering the impeachment of President Richard Nixon, it was revealed that the late J. Edgar Hoover would regularly have several FBI taps disconnected just before he was to make his annual report to Congress on the number of taps presently in operation. Afterward, the taps could be turned on again.

Electronic eavesdropping has become so sophisticated that it is now extremely difficult to find wiretaps and bugs. American embassies around the world operate under the assumption that all telephones are tapped and the embassy itself bugged. Even organized crime is sophisticated enough to realize that the old hoodlum technique of holding conversations in bathrooms with all the water faucets turned on no longer works. While the “whoosh” of running water may drown out human voices, an eavesdropper can now filter out the interfering frequencies so that the voices come through clearly over the remaining frequencies. A wiretap can be placed so far away from the target telephone that only the most intensive hunt can locate it. The CIA in recent years even bugged telephone connections between the Kremlin and Soviet leaders riding in their limousines.

With all this new expertise available, it would perhaps be the height of gullibility to think it will not be used except under the firmest restraints. When a local police department has advanced wiretap capability, often it is used by rogue officers against narcotics dealers not to make drug arrests but to estimate what the size of their bribe should be. It is well established that in past years in New York City certain officers charged with cracking down on gambling set up wiretaps on bookmaking operations to make sure they were being told the correct gross figures of the business and thus were getting the right percentage in bribes.

In its own way the underworld has often appreciated the joys of wiretapping. Frank Costello for years had his own wiretapper, a colorful character named Gerard “Cheesebox” Callahan. Callahan, a renegade New York Telephone Co. employee, was Costello’s personal “wire man,” an electronic genius who not only fooled the police but underworld bookmakers as well.

Cheesebox got his name from a wooden cream cheese box he used to house his devices in order to mislead the law. The cheesebox was a glorious device, one that allowed a Costello bookie to supply his customers with a telephone number in the Bronx that when dialed was automatically transferred to another phone in Brooklyn, the real location of the bookmaking operation. Meanwhile, the police having wiretapped the line and traced it to the Bronx, broke into an apartment expecting to find an active bank of phone men sifting through betting slips. All they found was a cheesebox with some strange gear inside. Of course, the Bronx drop was watched by a bookmaker’s scout, who reported the police raid to the gamblers. By the time the law located the Brooklyn base, the operation had long ago cleared out and reestablished with perhaps a Manhattan cheesebox drop feeding into a Queens location, or some other variation.

In addition to employing Cheesebox to help him stay one step ahead of the authorities, Costello found it very profitable to use him for “busting out” other bookmakers. A bookmaker’s service line, Nationwide News at the time, would be tapped so that the results of a certain race could be held up for a minute or so, allowing Costello or his agents inside the bookmaking establishment to get down a late bet. Cutting in on the line, Cheesebox would imitate the announcer’s voice running down the late odds and—by code words—reveal the winner. Then the regular transmission of the race, which had been recorded, would be broadcast and Costello would win big.

Some wiretapping exploits have become instant legends. Often mentioned is the job performed by a New York wiretap expert for a midwestern union leader who was being investigated by two separate law enforcement bodies. For three days the expert checked the union president’s home and office and removed no less than seven installations for microphones. Working secretly at night, the wire man also ripped out all the phone cables at union headquarters, rewired the entire telephone system (some 86 lines with 600 connections) and fed all the lines into one sealed terminal box. He gave the only key to the union president.

The union leader was duly impressed and ordered wiretaps set up on a dozen of his underlings whose loyalty he doubted. The listening post for all these calls was set up in his private office.

This did not complete the wiretapper’s chores, however. When a grand jury decided to question eight union lieutenants, the expert designed special eavesdropping and recording devices that worked through wristwatch microphones and shoulder-holster recorders. Outfitted with this gear, the union men entered the supposedly secret chambers of the grand jury and told their tale. Playing back the recordings later, the union president was gratified to hear that all his aides had been completely loyal to him.

WITCHCRAFT

Wiretapping abuses are so widespread that they probably can no longer be controlled. The Watergate disclosures revealed widespread unauthorized or illegal taps during the Nixon Administration. Hoover's activities in this regard, such as the wiretapping of Martin Luther King, Jr., predated the Watergate abuses.

For what the claims are worth, over a seven and a half year period, the American Telephone and Telegraph Co. revealed it had discovered 1,457 wiretaps on customers' telephones, 1,009 of which were illegal. According to the company, the largest number of taps involved matters of marital discord. However, it should be noted that most telephone companies tend to check with federal and local police authorities to make sure they are not interfering with an investigative tap so that the AT & T estimate need not be regarded as completely accurate. Also, most of the taps found by the telephone company are by mere happenstance and on complaint of a telephone user. When the wiretapped victim suspects nothing, the tap is almost never found.

The practice of wiretapping is common among all the nation's investigative bodies. Virtually every federal investigative agency—the FBI, the CIA, the Defense Intelligence Agency, the Secret Service, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, to name only the more prominent ones—has eavesdropping capabilities. So too do state police units and city and county agencies. The “leakage” of such expertise into the private detective market is known to be large.

The federal government not only engages in questionable wiretapping but is also responsible for spreading the practice in nonfederal jurisdictions. The Law Enforcement Assistance Administration funds about three-quarters of local police purchases of surveillance hardware, and some of its outlays go to police agencies without statutory wiretap authority.

witchcraft

Belief in witches and witchcraft was extremely widespread in 17th-century America. The colonists brought this belief with them from the Old World.

Margaret Jones was executed in the Massachusetts colony in 1648, and Mary Parsons of Springfield was later indicted for witchcraft but was executed for the murder of her child. There were other cases in the 1650s. In 1688 Goody Glover was executed in Boston, largely on the testimony of a 13-year-old girl named Martha Goodwin. The case was closely studied by Cotton Mather and the techniques of prosecution were subsequently followed in the Salem witchcraft persecutions. Popular myth to the contrary, no one was burned at Salem. Eighty-year-old Giles Corey was pressed to death under an old English law that called for that punishment if a suspected witch refused to plead guilty or not guilty. In all, 19 persons were hanged and many others imprisoned in Salem as a result of the hysterical accusations of a number of young girls. Finally, saner attitudes called a halt to the persecutions. The judge and 12 jurists involved in the witchcraft trials publicly repented their acts and asked for forgiveness.

Although the Salem experience did not halt witchcraft cases in this country, it undoubtedly reduced them to a mere handful, such as in Virginia in 1706 and in North Carolina in 1712. The last case appears to have occurred in Rhode Island in 1728, but the record of the incident is sketchy.

Wood, Isaac (?–1858) mass poisoner

The largest all-in-the-family poisoning plot in American history was perpetrated by Isaac Wood at Dansville, N.Y. in the 1850s.

The first to die was Isaac's brother David, who owned a huge estate in the area. David Wood was struck down unexpectedly by a strange malady in May 1855. Before the year was out, his wife Rhoda and his three children had died of the same strange sickness. Isaac Wood had slowly poisoned all five so that he could gain control of the estate; he accomplished that goal by acting as administrator. Isaac then took his wife and child to live in New Jersey, where he murdered them as well. Now a rich man, he moved on to a new life in Illinois.

Before leaving for Illinois allegedly to bear his grief alone, Wood had leased his brother's home to a tenant named Welch. Shortly after the murderer departed, Welch found three packs of arsenic in the barn. The arsenic had been wrapped in legal papers that assigned Isaac Wood full authority over the estate after the death of his brother and his family. That link and the fact that all of Isaac Wood's relatives had died under similar circumstances were sufficient evidence to doom him. Wood was brought back to New York, tried and hanged on July 9, 1858 at Geneseo.

wooden gun escapes

Probably nothing is quite as romantic in underworld folklore as a criminal's escaping from prison armed with a fake gun. Few such escapes have excited the public's imagination more than John Dillinger's from the “escape-proof” jail at Crown Point, Ind. on March 3, 1934. In actuality, although the fake gun tale was accepted blindly by most newspapers, Dillinger used a very real gun. The full story of the intrigues behind this wooden gun hoax is told elsewhere in this book. Here, it is sufficient to point out that the Dillinger story, like almost all such reports, was a lie.

One of the few authenticated wooden gun breakouts was pulled by a Cherokee strip outlaw, Ben Cravens, shortly after he was sent to the Kansas State Penitentiary in January 1897 to serve a 20-year term. Cravens was confined for only a short time before he fashioned a wooden gun, covered it with silver paper and bluffed his way past a legion of guards. It is highly likely that Dillinger, who was an avid reader of Western outlaw literature, learned of the wooden gun caper from accounts of Cravens' career.

While Dillinger never used a wooden gun to escape from jail, his fake exploit did serve as inspiration for two of his most loyal gang members, Harry Pierpont and Charles Makley, who attempted to escape from the death house of the Ohio State Prison just a few months after Dillinger's death. They used pistols carved out of soap to overpower one guard and were smashing through a door leading from the death house when other guards opened up on them. Makley was killed and Pierpont was wounded, but he recovered sufficiently to die in the electric chair a month later.

Wooldridge, Clifton (1850–1915) police detective

Undoubtedly the most colorful police officer in American history was Clifton Wooldridge, “that damned little flycop,” as the Chicago underworld dubbed him. Wooldridge, who ornamented the city's police force from 1888 until 1910, made a total of 19,500 arrests, averaging almost three a day every day of his career. At any given time there were hundreds of criminals in Joliet Prison who had been put there by Wooldridge. He recovered hundreds of thousands of dollars in stolen property in the days when an American dollar would buy more than one hearty steak dinner. He personally closed a hundred panel houses, rescued a hundred teenage girls from brothels and white slavery, broke up a hundred phony matrimonial agencies and refused hundreds of bribes from $500 to $5,000. In the process he was shot at on 44 occasions, was wounded 23 times and wounded exactly twice that number of criminals. Although a crack shot, he never once shot to kill, only to wound. “A policeman's duty is to preserve order, not to kill,” he proclaimed—and he meant it.

Originally an office clerk, Wooldridge was in his thirties when he joined the police department. As a police officer, he quickly proved his worth and was made a detective within a year. In many respects he was a comic character, a merry extrovert given to boast and bombast. In his memoirs, Hands Up! In the World of Crime, Wooldridge billed himself as “the World's Greatest Detective, the Incorruptible Sherlock Holmes of America,” adding, “No braver, more honest or efficient police officer ever wore a star or carried a club.” He was probably right. Sometimes his acts were on the zany side. To give an example, a strong-arm character named Adams once lacerated a few citizens and boasted he ate cops for breakfast. Wooldridge took him into custody forthwith and lowered the thug's standing in the underworld several notches by making the crook carry him piggyback seven blocks to the lockup. Adams had little choice in the matter since Wooldridge held the butt end of his revolver a few inches from the brute's skull and threatened to sock him if he so much as stumbled.

Despite this lighthearted approach to law enforcement, Wooldridge was all he claimed to be: the toughest, strictest and most successful detective on the force. He was positively fearless. When a murderer named Henry Foster barricaded himself in a saloon and kept officers at bay by shooting through the door, Wooldridge pulled out his gun and picked up a piece of plank for a shield. Then, screaming at the top of his lungs, he barreled into the saloon and charged right at Foster, who was behind the bar guzzling from a bottle. Panicking, Foster dropped the bottle and did the only thing he could think of doing under the circumstances: he put his gun to his head and pulled the trigger. However, he was so rattled by the sight of Wooldridge that he failed to aim correctly and only received a scalp wound. He died on the gallows July 1, 1895.

Wooldridge was the most energetic campaigner against vice in the Windy City, an unlikely role for an officer during an era when it was rare to find a Chicago mayor or chief of police who wasn't also the landlord of buildings given over to prostitution or gambling. Because of his law enforcement activities, Wooldridge on one occasion was ordered transferred to a quiet residential area, but the newspapers intervened and the order was rescinded. In 1896 a committee from the Civic Federation, armed with evidence furnished by Wooldridge, called upon Mayor George B. Swift to demand he enforce the regulations against bawdy houses. The committee said that the prostitutes were a menace to society and that young boys, drawn to the area by curiosity, could see orgies taking place through the windows.

The mayor, accompanied by Chief of Police J. J. Badenoch, toured Custom House Place and was duly shocked. His Honor ordered the brothel keepers to paint their windows and keep them closed. However, Wooldridge kept plugging away at the issue, and when the houses were finally shut down in the early 1900s, the newspapers gave him much of the credit.

Wooldridge's tiny form became the most-hated sight in the red-light districts. He closed down places no other officer dared touch. In the case of Big Susan Winslow, he made an arrest no other officer could figure a way of making. Big Susan ran a bawdy house in a two-story wooden structure on Clark Street, which was the source of countless complaints to the police, including many from men who were robbed there. Over five years a total of 20 warrants were issued for her arrest. Yet every officer who tried to arrest her gave up, unable to figure a way to get Susan out of the house.

Big Susan was aptly named; she weighed 450 pounds and was wider in every direction than any door or window in her dive. The police never figured out how she got in there in the first place.

Wooldridge drove a patrol wagon through an alley to Big Susan's back door. Standing outside the house, he read a warrant to her as she cackled away. Then Wooldridge removed the back door of the house from its hinges and sawed out the frame and about two feet of wall. He put two oak planks, 16 feet long and a foot wide, between the door sill and the rear end of the patrol wagon. The detective then unhitched one of the patrol wagon horses, attached a rope to its collar and tied the other end of the rope around Big Susan's waist. "Giddap!" he shouted and the horse pounded forward, pulling Big Susan out of her chair. As she slid up the planks, Susan began to shriek; Detective Wooldridge had somehow neglected to get dressed lumber. Big Susan suddenly decided to be cooperative and waddled painfully the rest of the way up the planks and into the wagon. During the ride to the station she lay prone on a bed inside the wagon while one of her girls sat beside her consolingly pulling splinters out of her bottom.

"After this," Wooldridge later noted, "the police had no more trouble with Susan Winslow."

In addition to such lighthearted triumphs, Wooldridge deserved credit for putting a number of big-time procurers, including the notorious Mary Hastings, out of business and behind bars. It can only be estimated how many girls he thus saved from white slavery.

For 22 years Clifton Wooldridge went on entertaining the public with his crime-smashing exploits which included the solving of many murders. In one such case a bartender named Reilly murdered a saloon keeper with the aid of the latter's wife and then tried to pass it off as a stickup murder. Suspicious of the pair's story, Wooldridge broke down the widow by presenting her with proof that the bartender, with whom she was in love, often spent his nights at the home of a certain Mrs. O'Brien. Shocked into a jealous rage, the widow confessed and implicated her lover in her husband's murder. Not until later did Wooldridge get around to explaining that Mrs. O'Brien was the bartender's mother, having reverted to her maiden name.

While Wooldridge was known to be tough on wrongdoers, he was a soft touch for any reformed criminal. He once explained: "There are only two ways of making a criminal reform. One is a helping hand, the other a hard rap on the skull." When Wooldridge retired from the force in poor health in 1910, a Chicago newspaper observed: "His retirement marks the end of one of the most amazing and accomplished records in the history of the police system. It is also sad to see the end of such a source of levity in the grim business of crime battling."

World Trade Center bombing

It came with abrupt suddenness. Shortly before noon on Friday, February 26, 1993, one Mohammad Salameh, a Palestinian living in New York, drove a yellow van into the underground garage of the 110-story World Trade Center in lower Manhattan. At the time, and in fact on any weekday, the twin towers were teeming with 50,000 workers and the usual 80,000 visitors.

Then someone put a lighter to four fuses on a 1,200-pound bomb. The occupant or occupants fled in the yellow van. A scant few moments later the powerful bomb exploded. Six persons were killed and well over 1,000 injured, as steel beams snapped like toothpicks and cinder blocks disintegrated. Employees in various offices were hurled 10, 20 or 30 feet in the air. Automobiles in the parking level were squashed like tin cans. Much of New York was in a panic, and at first there was no way to estimate the related death and destruction. What was clear was that the bombing was the worst terrorist attack carried out on American soil up to that time.

In hindsight it became apparent that the terrorist attack was neither wholly effective nor for that matter well planned, even though it had been a half-year in the making. The mastermind of the attack was Ramzi Ahmed Yousef, who had entered the country in September 1992 through JFK airport claiming political asylum. He was allowed to enter with Mohammad Salameh, who was providing him with a place to stay in his home.

Immediately the pair went about setting up their plans for the attack, and, it would later be revealed, for many more. Money was sent to them from Europe, and Salameh, under a false name, rented a storage locker in New Jersey and used that address to order various bomb parts. The final step almost six months later was acquisition of compressed hydrogen to add power to explosives. Then the conspirators rented a Ryder van. All was ready for the disaster that took place.

One aspect of the disaster not addressed in its wake was the limited amount of deaths resulting. But if there was a touch of amateurism in the bombing, it was unmatched by the later actions of the bombers. Salameh was most concerned about returning the van to recoup his $200 deposit, a remarkably venal attitude, considering that they were engaged in what was regarded by them a holy enterprise. The conspirators were unaware that the yellow van had attracted attention before the explosion and in its aftermath.

Salameh was taken into custody when he tried to return the Ryder van. The plotters proved unable to contain information about their actions, and soon the New York police received information that led to the apprehension of five suspects who were found with what was called a “witch’s brew” of explosives that were intended to be placed under bridges, in tunnels and at New York landmarks, such as the United Nations. It was said other sites around the nation were also targeted.

Among those netted in the investigation of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing was Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, a blind Egyptian cleric known as a fiery fanatic, who was convicted on conspiracy counts for encouraging his followers to engage in violent acts against the United States.

While Yousef was clearly the mastermind of the World Trade operation, evidence provided by FBI informers revealed the broader nature of the plotters’ plans. A number of arrests and trials were held for various offenses. Four involved with the World Trade matter were each sentenced to serve 240 years in prison. Yousef, who was captured in Pakistan, was also sentenced for a deadly bombing of a Philippine Airlines airplane in 1994. He intended his attacks as a test run for blowing up dozens of airliners in the United States. He was later sentenced to life imprisonment plus 240 years. Before his sentence, Yousef ranted, “I am a terrorist and I am proud of it.” He told the judge, “Your God is not Allah. You worship death and destruction.”

The main trial against a total of 10 accused terrorists was done under a Civil War-era seditious conspiracy law that makes it illegal to wage war against the government. Among those charged was Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, a blind Egyptian cleric known as a fiery fanatic. Much of the government’s case was built on tapes secretly recorded by an undercover FBI informant, Emad Salem. The Rahman defense was built around the claim that he was physically incapable of participating in any of the operational aspects of the plot. However, the courts held the conspiracy counts against the blind cleric were valid and, as a review panel put it in 1999, “evidence showed that Rahman was in constant contact with other members of the conspiracy, that he was looked to as a leader, and that he accepted that role and encouraged his co-conspirators to engage in violent acts against the United States.”

The blind cleric and nine others were convicted after a nine-month trial that involved more than 200 witnesses. Among the defendants, all sentenced to life imprisonment, was El Sayyid A. Nosair, accused of the murder of Rabbi Meir Kahane, the militant founder of the Jewish Defense League. He had previously been acquitted of the murder charge by a state court.

Sheik Rahman’s conviction was appealed on the grounds that anything he did was no more than an expression of free speech and violated his rights under the Constitution to his freedom of religion. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit ruled, however, that “freedom of speech and of religion do not extend so far as to bar prosecution of one who uses a public speech or a religious ministry to commit crimes. The evidence justifying Rahman’s conviction showed beyond a reasonable doubt that he crossed this line.”

WYLIE, Janice

One example cited by the court was Rahman's conviction for soliciting the murder of Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak on a planned visit to New York, an attack that never was attempted. The evidence showed that the cleric told Emad Salem, the paid FBI informant who had infiltrated the conspiracy, that he "should make up with God" by "turning his rifle's barrel to President Mubarak's chest and killing him."

All the convictions were upheld.

Wylie, Janice (1942–1963) murder victim

The gruesome murders of Janice Wylie, the 21-year-old daughter of author Max Wylie and niece of writer Philip Wylie, and her roommate, 23-year-old Emily Hoffert, on August 28, 1963 shocked New York City, and caused a legal controversy for years thereafter.

The bodies of the two women were found bound together in their Manhattan apartment. Both had numerous stab wounds and Janice Wylie had been eviscerated. The newspapers depicted the murders as a ritualistic sort of sexual crime. Eight months after the murders the police charged a semiliterate 19-year-old black named George Whitmore, Jr., with the crime. He had been arrested in the Brownsville section of Brooklyn on a charge of attempted rape, which, said the police, he admitted along with the murder of a woman in Brooklyn and the Wylie-Hoffert homicides. A few weeks later, Whitmore repudiated the three confessions, insisting he had been beaten and otherwise coerced into making them. In all, he was brought to trial four times on various charges.

In his own version of how he was made to confess, Whitmore, whose IQ was at various times estimated to be between 60 and 90, wrote: "I am the kind of boy that like to have fun. . . . I don't like to be hurt nor me hurt anyone witch I'd never did. But when I first came to New York I was aquised of doing things I know nothing about."

Whitmore said that when he denied the attempted rape in the Brooklyn precinct house, he was "hit many times." He went on:

Then I was so squared that I was shakeing all over. And before I know it, I was saying yes. I was so squared if they would have told me name was tom, dick or harry I would have said yes . . .

Then I was asked about the killing in the city on 88 St. But I was squared in to saying yes. They would say George Didn't you do so and so here and so and so there. I wouldn't say anything.

They would would say shour you did. Then they would write it down. And go over it with me. Then call in some more men, and ask me the same quition again. I would just repeat what I just learned. . . .

I got enemies witch I never had. But I hope some time he or she will soon find out that I was the wrong boy. God will see to it. . . . God knows that I didn't do these things, and if I keep praying he will help me. . . .

Just bying here it can chang your life it can make you want to make something of your life when you get out it can also make you relazice many other things to. You learn to to fell sorry for other people as well as your self. So take it from me and witch what you are doing. I am a boy who never been in trouble before and went to jail for non-thing. . . .

In 1965 Whitmore was cleared in the Wylie-Hoffert homicides following a confession made by Richard Robles, a 22-year-old drug addict who was subsequently convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment. Whitmore's experiences, especially the discredited confessions, were cited by the Supreme Court in the landmark Miranda decision, which led to curbs on police powers to question suspects, and by the New York legislature in a 1965 statute that largely abolished capital punishment.

Whitmore was also cleared of the third murder accusation after newspapers turned up evidence that the white detectives had been biased against him and the Manhattan and Brooklyn district attorneys' offices found proof that he was innocent. However, he was still convicted three times of the attempted rape charge. In 1973, after Whitmore had served a total of four years in prison, it was found that the prosecution had withheld from the defense evidence which would have cleared him in the rape case as well.

Whitmore filed suit against the city in 1973 charging false arrest and wrongful imprisonment, but in 1979 a judge ruled that the statute of limitations in the Wylie-Hoffert case had run out by 1973 and that in the rape case there was no proof of "actual malice" on the part of the Brooklyn district attorney's office. The judge said he felt an "emotional strain" in ruling against Whitmore and suggested that the wrong-man victim seek redress from the legislature, which had the power to grant him a financial settlement.

Yager, Erastus “Red” (?–1864) outlaw

Red Yager was the 19th century Western precursor of such 20th century underworld informers as Abe Reles and Joe Valachi. Yager’s squealing caused the downfall of the notorious sheriff-outlaw Henry Plummer and his gang of Innocents, which plagued what is now southwestern Montana in the early 1860s. Red’s fate was also indicative of the riskiness of seeking clemency in the American West by turning informer.

A thin little man with a wild mop of flaming red hair and whiskers, Yager probably never killed anyone, but the vigilantes nevertheless suspected him of a number of crimes. As a consequence, he was taken prisoner in late December 1863, and he admitted carrying messages to road agents who held up stages, bullion wagons and individuals carrying large sums of money. Yager revealed to the vigilantes the structure of the outlaw organization and how orders were passed down from Sheriff Plummer, who masterminded the depredations of the outlaws while he was supposedly trying to root them out. He also told them the gang’s password, “innocent,” and identified a total of 26 key gang members. This intelligence enabled the vigilantes to destroy the gang.

After Yager finished telling what he knew, there was some inclination to show him leniency, but it was noted that his life had already been extended a full week from the time he should have been strung up. A solemn vote indicated that that was leniency enough, and on January 4, 1864 Yager was hanged from a cottonwood tree in Stinkingwater Valley.

Yale, Frankie (1885–1927) gangster

Brooklyn-born gangster Frankie Yale’s two dearest friends were Johnny Torrio and Al Capone. Torrio brought his trusted buddy Yale out to Chicago twice to carry out two of his most important hits, on Big Jim Colosimo and Dion O’Banion; Capone sent his killers east to New York to knock off Yale.

In his teens Yale was a partner with Torrio in the old Five Points gang and was said to have killed close to a dozen men by the time he was 20. Around 1908 he and Torrio operated a Black Hand extortion racket in Brooklyn, threatening immigrant Italians with death unless they paid protection money. The pair also ran a bar and brothel in Brooklyn, where Yale hired Al Capone as a bouncer. Yale maintained the establishment after Torrio and Capone both moved on to Chicago.

In the early 1920s Yale moved into the big time on several fronts. He built up major bootlegging and rum running operations and took over control of the national Unione Siciliane, the powerful Sicilian fraternal organization that in large part was turned into a criminal-front organization. He also ran protection rackets and forced New York tobacconists to order the cheap cigars he manufactured; to add insult to injury, Yale’s face appeared on each cigar box. As a result, in Brooklynese “a Frankie Yale” meant any kind of product that was overpriced and lousy. When police demanded to know how Yale made his living, he would say blandly, “I’m an undertaker.”

Torrio used Yale to kill O’Banion because he was unfamiliar to the Irish mobster and could thus approach him in his flower shop without arousing suspicion. As Yale shook hands with O'Banion, he gripped the Irishman's gun hand so that he couldn't draw his weapon while two of Capone's trusty gunmen, John Scalise and Albert Anselmi, pulled out their pieces and shot him to death.

In 1927 Capone, almost regretfully, decided to have Yale knocked off for two reasons. First, he interfered with the running of the huge Chicago chapter of the Unione Siciliane, whose members' alcohol-cooking operations Capone wanted to control. Yale was trying to get part of the chapter's moonshining profits sent to the national organization, and under Capone's puppet president, Antonio Lombardo, those contributions had dwindled to nothing. More importantly, Capone suspected Yale, who was the Chicago mob's biggest East Coast supplier of imported liquors, was hijacking truckloads of booze he had already sold to Big Al and selling the same booze to him a second time.

Capone sent in a spy named James De Amato to find out. Yale found De Amato out and had him shot down on a Brooklyn street, but not before the spy had confirmed Capone's suspicions. Capone sent Yale an anonymous warning, "Someday you'll get an answer to De Amato."

On July 1, 1927 Yale was driving along 44th Street in Brooklyn when gunmen in a black sedan crowded him to the curb and machine-gunned him to death. What really upset New Yorkers about the incident was that it was the first underworld killing with a submachine gun. It was to be the first of many.

Yellow Henry Gang New Orleans criminals

One of the most vicious gangs in New Orleans during the 1870s and 1880s was a group of murderers, thieves and cutthroats bossed by Yellow Henry Stewart.

Stewart earned his nickname because he was afflicted with malaria, which he was convinced, rightly, would shorten his life span. As a result, he was unbridled in his lawless fury. He would as soon kill a victim as manhandle him, and he was equally feared by other criminals and by the police.

In 1877 Yellow Henry inherited the leadership of the gang that took his name when the former leader, Turpo, went to jail for murder. The new leader brought to his banner some of the most desperate criminals that New Orleans ever produced, including Joe Martin, probably the most expert garroter in the city's history; Crooked Neck Delaney, certainly a top-class performer in the same line as Martin; Tom McDonald, better known as Tom the Dog; Prussian Charley Mader, who wore a false beard and a mask whenever pulling a job; George Sylvester; Garibaldi Bolden; the murderous Haley brothers, Red and Blue; Pat Keeley; and the notorious Frank Lyons, who won fame as a police killer.

Yellow Henry attracted these supporters because of his ability to plan successful capers for the gang, including burglaries, holdups and protection rackets. Finally, Yellow Henry and three of his men were caught and sent to the penitentiary in 1884 for the robbery of a Julia Street sail maker. The brutal gang leader died there of malaria in July 1886.

Frank Lyons, in prison at the time, escaped in 1888 and proceeded to reorganize the Yellow Henry gang. He was apprehended again and returned to prison. In an act incomprehensible but typical of Louisiana in that era, Lyons won a pardon in 1890 from Gov. Francis T. Nicholls. The Yellow Henry gang arose once more, this time until 1892, when Lyons was sentenced to prison for killing a policeman, an act that brought down the full wrath of the police on the Yellow Henrys, breaking them up permanently.

Yorky of the Great Lakes murderer who became a legend

For over a century now Yorky Mickey the Clam Man has scoured the Great Lakes on a mission of murder, and, the story goes, he will not give up until vengeance is his.

Yorky Mickey was a real person well-known to the denizens of Buffalo's Canal Street vice area, a jutting piece of land segregated from the rest of Buffalo by 40 feet of murky water called the Erie Canal. In the 1860s and 1870s Yorky ran a clam stand there that offered two main attractions. Yorky, a man of amazing strength, could crush a man's fingers with his grip and often did. Patrons flocked to his stand to watch in wonder as he opened clams with his fingers. After a patron filled up on clams, he could avail himself of the stand's second attraction: women. Yorky was also a procurer, leasing out women by the evening. It was a good deal for his patrons because Yorky was an honest man and never allowed his women to rob a customer.

Everyone liked Yorky and they were happy for him when love came into his life. He fell for one of his own women, a lass known as the Thrush, and they had a wedding that Canal Street—indeed the entire Great Lakes—long remembered. The Thrush, who was famed for her figure, performed at times as a singer in a bar called the Peacock. Her voice was not particularly good but no one seemed to notice.

It was in the Peacock that the pair joined in tragic wedlock. All Canal Street was there—the leading prostitutes, the rival saloon owners, the sporting men and the cooperative politicians. Liquor and beer flowed freely and food was plentiful. A brass band blared without letup. Finally, Yorky and his lady were married by a Canal Street character named Preacher Dobie, a minister who had deserted his flock for the ways of the fleshpots. Preacher Dobie ran through the words in a drunken stupor, but then everyone else was drunk as well—Yorky, his bride, and the guests.

The newlyweds were hustled to the bar as soon as the ceremony was over and served more liquor. Yorky was so happy he couldn't seem to get enough. As a result, the Thrush was being deserted by her groom only minutes after their marriage. The more Yorky drank the less likely it appeared he would be leaving soon. At first the Thrush didn't seem to mind. She had no aversion to the brew herself, but the more she drank, the more her eye would rove.

The Thrush drank until her eye settled on a rakish young sailor who'd just wandered into the Peacock. The fact that the Thrush was garbed in a wedding dress did not deter the young sailor. He was right off his ship, his pockets bulged with a month's pay and he ached to spend some of it. Yorky was so far gone he failed to notice his bride and the sailor slip out of the Peacock.

It took another two hours before Yorky noticed his bride's absence. He stormed forth to look for her, and his anger soared when he heard from others that she had been seen carousing with a young sailor. Yorky lurched from bar to bar, clenching his powerful fists tighter each passing minute. Finally, he found the Thrush. She was sprawled in a drunken stupor on the bed of the two-room flat Yorky had furnished for her. Her lipstick and clothing were in disarray and there was some money pinned to the rumpled pillow.

Later, when others ventured into the flat, they found the Thrush still lying on the bed, but her head had been twisted and she looked like a chicken whose neck had been wrung. She was dead and Yorky was gone.

He was never seen again on Canal Street, but lakers coming in from other ports reported having observed him scouring all the ships of the Great Lakes looking for the young sailor. A couple of times, it was said, Yorky had just missed catching his man.

Apparently he never did. Even today when a dim light is seen in the mist over the Great Lakes, there are some lakers who say it is Yorky still hunting for the sailor who seduced his new bride.

Youngblood, Herbert (1899–1934) fellow escapee of John Dillinger

When public enemy John Dillinger made his fabled "wooden gun" escape from the supposed escape-proof jail in Crown Point, Ind. on March 3, 1934, the only prisoner who accepted his offer to join in the breakout was a black man, named Herbert Youngblood, who was being held on a murder charge.

Having escaped in the sheriff's car with two hostages, Dillinger and Youngblood threw the hostages out when they reached isolated country. Then Dillinger ordered Youngblood to hide down between the seats, since the two of them together, one white and one black, could be easily identified.

The pair soon separated, but their brief contact evidently made a deep impression on Youngblood, who was destined to live only 13 more days. On March 16 he was cornered by three deputy sheriffs in a tobacco store in Port Huron, Mich. Youngblood managed to kill one of the lawmen and wound the other two, but he himself took six bullets. Just before he died, he confessed that Dillinger had been with him the previous day.

Youngblood's dying words triggered a manhunt in the area for Dillinger, and there were soon reports of the noted fugitive crossing the St. Clair River into Canada with two other men. At the time, Dillinger was hiding out with his girlfriend, Billie Frechette, in apartment 303 of the Lincoln Court Apartments in the exclusive Hill section of St. Paul, Minn. Undoubtedly, Youngblood misled the authorities because he figured he owed John Dillinger a favor.

Younger brothers outlaw band

Certainly just as daring, violent and cold-blooded as the James brothers, the Younger brothers terrorized Missouri and the surrounding states until the ill-fated Northfield Bank Raid in 1876 broke the power of the James-Younger gang.

The four outlaw Youngers were part of a family of eight sons and six daughters born to Henry W. and Bersheba Younger; the rest of the Younger children grew up to be law-abiding citizens. Cole (born 1844), Jim (born 1848), John (born 1851) and Bob (born 1853) killed their share of Union soldiers during the Civil War, especially after their father was murdered by Union irregulars in 1862. Bob was only 12 when he took part with his older brothers under Quantrill in the sacking of Lawrence, Kan.; John was just 10 when he helped brother Jim kill four Union soldiers. When he was 15, John, with no assistance, killed a man who had hit him over the head with a dead fish. He was brought to trial but acquitted on the ground of "self-defense."

Bob and John Younger, however, could not match the charm, cunning or deadliness of their elder outlaw brothers, Cole and Jim. Cole, the big bluff sort, was noted for his sense of humor and his way with the ladies. Among his many loves was Myra Belle Shirley, later famous as Belle Starr, who had a daughter by him. With his mannerisms and acting ability, Cole was able to assume almost any identity. Once while hiding from the law in Texas, he sang in a choir and worked as a government census taker.

Jim was regarded as the most handsome of the lot, easygoing, readily influenced by Jesse James, but in the end, he brooded about his misbegotten life and put a bullet in his brain.

The Youngers got together with the Jameses in 1866, when Frank James introduced Cole to Jesse. It marked the beginning of a bloody decade in the Midwest. The six formed the nucleus of a gang that carried out numerous bank and train robberies, killing at least 10 persons and possibly many more, since it was never established which robberies could be attributed to the gang and which could not. After the robbery of a bank in Gallatin, Mo. in 1869, the Youngers were identified as colleagues of the James brothers. In 1872 Bob Younger took part, under Jesse's leadership, in a daring raid on the box office of the Kansas City fairgrounds.

In 1874 Jim and John Younger tangled with three lawmen and killed two of them: Louis J. Lull, a Pinkerton captain of detectives, and Sheriff Ed Daniels of Osceola, Mo. The lawmen, however, shot John to death and wounded Jim Younger, but he managed escape, leaving behind the bullet-riddled corpse of brother John.

The three remaining Youngers had only two years of freedom left, although during that time and thereafter they enjoyed great notoriety. Much of their fame derived from an 1875 book by John T. Appler called The Guerillas of the West; or, The Life, Character and Daring Exploits of the Younger Brothers. Although some parts of it were accurate, other sections were complete fabrication, such as the recounting of an episode during the Civil War when Cole supposedly decided to test out a new Enfield rifle on 15 Union prisoners. Told the rifle could fire a mile, Cole allegedly said that one bullet should be able to kill at least 10 men. According to Appler, he lined up the prisoners one behind the other and kept firing until all were dead.

In 1876 the James-Younger gang robbed a stagecoach in Texas and later a bank in Otterville, Mo. They then headed up into Minnesota, where they robbed a bank in Northfield on September 7, 1876. Up until then the gang seldom encountered much trouble from local citizens while pulling a job, but the Northfield residents were of a different cut. Alerted by gunfire inside the bank, the local citizens rushed out with guns and rocks to stop the bandits. Two of the robbers were killed before the gang could get out of town, and the rest were badly shot up. Bob's elbow was shattered and he was hit in the thigh. Cole took a bullet in the shoulder and Jim had his jaw nearly blasted away. Jesse and Frank James received lesser wounds.

Over the next several days the bandits could not shake pursuing posses. When Jesse suggested to Cole that they put Jim Younger out of his misery because he was slowing their flight, Cole and his brothers faced the two James boys down. Jesse and Frank James split off and threaded their way through the posses, while the three Youngers and the remaining member of the gang, Charlie Pitts, continued on together.

Finally, on September 21 the four were cornered in a thicket of willows and plum trees. Pitts was killed and the three Younger brothers were literally shot full of holes. Yet when they were being escorted in a wagon to the nearest town, Cole Younger, despite 11 bullet wounds, startled a group of gaping women by standing up and bowing to them.

All three Youngers were sentenced to life in prison. Bob Younger, who became a model prisoner, died there of tuberculosis in 1889. Jim and Cole Younger were finally freed in 1901. Unable to find suitable work and despondent, Jim shot himself to death in 1902. Ironically, Cole at the time was selling tombstones for a living.

In 1903 Cole published his autobiography, The Story of Cole Younger, and reunited with Frank James in a Wild West show. They split up after a few years, some said because of ill feelings stemming from the Northfield raid, with Cole continuing to tour with carnivals as a solo act. He died in 1916.

Yulch, Adam (1885–1950) laundry-mark expert

The practice of tracing criminals through laundry marks existed long before Adam Yulch set up a complete Laundry-Mark Identification Bureau in New York's Nassau County Police Department during the 1930s, but acting-Captain Yulch's success in the field made him nationally and internationally famous as the "laundry-mark hawkshaw."

Yulch made his first laundry-mark arrest in 1936 following the robbery of a bank messenger. One of the criminals left a jacket in the getaway car that had a faded dry-cleaning mark on an inside sleeve. Handed the assignment of finding the cleaner, Yulch covered every cleaner, laundry and tailor on Long Island, and then in New York City. Finally, he hit pay dirt in Westchester County at a wholesale cleaner. The mark was traced to a local tailor, who at first could not remember the customer. Yulch prodded the tailor's memory by pointing out the customer was probably a dandy dresser who got his clothes pressed often and who was around a lot in the daytime. Now the tailor remembered. The dapper holdup man was located and the robbery was solved.

When the next case with a laundry-mark clue turned up, the Nassau police immediately turned it over to Yulch. He realized then he should have kept records of all the marks of tailors whom he'd called upon in the previous case. Yulch started assembling such information on 3x5 index cards, organizing what was to become the most complete identification bureau in the country.

To the untrained eye one laundry mark looks like another, but the scrawl is a code that allows a cleaner and his wholesaler to quickly identify the store, the route and, in some cases, even the name of the customer. Laundries use a similar coding system, and many use invisible ink. Slowly, Yulch collected codes from every state in the union and, in time, became so familiar with those in his area that he could read them easily without even referring to his files.

In another case Secret Service agents raided a counterfeiting printing plant but failed to catch the suspect, who escaped through a hidden exit. He had been shaving at the time they arrived and had left his shirt behind. The agents brought the shirt to Yulch, who merely glanced at it, gave them an address and told them the man they wanted was in apartment 3-B. The agents were startled but rushed to the place and captured the suspect busily packing his bags to flee. Yulch understood the laundry's code mark on the shirt, which, in addition to its own indicator, listed the customer's address and apartment number.

Yulch's Laundry-Mark Identification Bureau was always available to other law enforcement agencies, and Yulch helped a number of state police organizations set up their own systems before his death in 1950. He even organized one for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Decades later, the Nassau County bureau was still regarded as the best in the country.

Yuma Penitentiary

Easily the most-feared and hated prison in the Old West was the penitentiary built at Yuma, Arizona Territory in 1876.

Rehabilitation of prisoners was not one of Yuma's objectives. The overriding concern of the prison was restraint—restraint of the prisoners from escaping, rioting or creating any sort of a problem. Inmates were allowed to work and exercise during the daytime, but at night, when the blistering heat of the desert sun gave way to the chilling cold, the convicts were chained to the stone floors of their cells from dusk to dawn. Corruption and brutality were practiced by the guards until this hellhole of a prison was abandoned in the early 20th century. It is now a museum. In a sense, Yuma Penitentiary had at least one claim to innovation. So many escapes were attempted there that it became the first prison to be equipped with Gatling guns.

Zangara, Joseph (1900–1933) assassin

Virtually every presidential assassination or attempt has produced speculation of a deeper and more insidious plot. Joseph Zangara's attempt to kill Franklin D. Roosevelt on February 15, 1933 in Miami is unique in that the conspiracy theory posits the president-elect was not even the target and that Zangara, in fact, killed the man he was supposed to, Mayor Anton J. Cermak of Chicago. According to the majority of experts, the idea that Zangara was a Capone hit man is nonsense. Nevertheless the theory has long been held by many crime historians and Chicago journalists. A leading expert, Judge John H. Lyle, probably as knowledgeable as any non-Mafia man on the subject of Chicago crime, emphasizes "Zangara was a Mafia killer, sent from Sicily to do a job and sworn to silence."

Before the shooting, Cermak had been trying to get rid of the Capone mob so that gangsters under his control could take over crime in Chicago, and a current journalistic theory held that he had fled to Miami because he feared the Capones were going to assassinate him. The fact that Zangara had won several pistol-shooting awards when he was in the Italian army and that he fatally wounded Cermak without even hitting Roosevelt provided additional weight to the theory that the intended victim of the assassination was Cermak. However, when Zangara opened fire on the car carrying Roosevelt and Cermak, he hit four bystanders, casting doubt on his ability as a marksman.

If Zangara kept his silence in a monumental criminal plot, he had not maintained his peace on political matters since his arrival in the country in 1923. Employed off and on as a mill hand in New Jersey, he had railed about “capitalist presidents and kings.” According to his later confession, he would have been just as likely to have tried to kill Calvin Coolidge or Herbert Hoover as Roosevelt; he happened to select FDR only because he was in Miami when Roosevelt was there. “I see Mr. Hoover first I kill him first,” he said at his trial. “Make no difference. Presidents just the same bunch—all same.” Zangara clung to that line to the day of his execution. Of Cermak, he said, “I wasn’t shooting at him, but I’m not sorry I hit him.” Zangara claimed he might have tried to kill King Victor Emmanuel III had he remained in the Italian army.

Joseph Zangara was almost stripped of all his clothing by those who seized him after his unsuccessful attempt to assassinate President-elect Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In the death chamber Zangara said: “There is no God. It’s all below. . . . See, I no scared of electric chair.” Sitting down in the chair, he glared at the witnesses with contempt. “Lousy capitalists.” His last words were: “Goodby. Addio to all the world. Go ahead. Push the button.”

Zelig, Jack (1882–1912) gang leader and murderer

Big Jack Zelig assumed the leadership of the New York criminal empire that had been held first by Monk Eastman and then by Kid Twist. A handsome, brutish killer, Big Jack’s services were always available for hire to any bidder, high or low. There is no record of the gang leader ever turning down any job of violence. A Zelig henchmen once gave the police Big Jack’s price list:

Slash on cheek with knife	$ 1 to $ 10
Shot in leg	$ 1 to $ 25
Shot in arm	$ 5 to $ 25
Throwing a bomb	$ 5 to $ 50
Murder	$10 to $100

If the fee for murder seemed a bit low, it must be remembered that such contracts normally included “fringe benefits,” i.e., whatever valuables were found on the victim. Judiciously, Zelig would wait until a businessman, e.g., was making a deposit at the bank before killing him. A common workman would get his on payday. In one case Zelig held off on the murder of a victim until he ventured abroad to do his Christmas shopping.

Zelig, whose real name was William Alberts, was born in Norfolk Street in 1882 to respectable Jewish parents. He ran away at 14 and joined a juvenile gang of pickpockets under the leadership of the colorful Crazy Butch. Zelig soon figured out that the boy pickpockets did all the dangerous work but Crazy Butch took virtually all the loot. He deserted the Fagin and became very successful on his own as a “lush worker,” rolling drunken men on the Bowery and in Chatham Square. With his childish face and appearance, he was seldom suspected of pickpocketing. And when his youthful appearance was not enough, Zelig could turn on the tears. One man from whom Zelig had stolen a wallet and a diamond ring was so overcome with remorse at having accused him that he bought the baby-faced thief a new suit of clothes and “forced” money on him.

By the time he was in his twenties, Zelig had moved on to muggings and murder for profit, but he never forgot the virtue of tears. Whenever he was arraigned—a frequent occurrence—he hired a frail and consumptive girl to come timidly into the courtroom and weepingly plead with the magistrate, “Oh, Judge, for God’s sake, don’t send my boy husband, the father of my baby, to jail!” The agony in the young “wife’s” voice worked wonders for a number of years: Zelig would be released with a warning to go home to his wife and baby, of whom he had neither.

In the early 1900s Zelig attracted the attention of Monk Eastman and soon became one of his most dependable henchmen. When Eastman went to prison a few years later, Zelig remained loyal to Kid Twist, Eastman’s successor, carrying out a number of murder assignments. After Kid Twist died in a gangland assassination in 1908, Zelig took over control of a large part of the old Eastman gang, while others left to follow the banner of Chick Tricker or Jack Sirocco. Most of the gangsters went with Zelig because he was a genius at organizing criminal activities and getting the most revenues out of them.

At heart, Zelig remained a bully and a brute. Seeking to impress a new sweetheart although short of cash, he marched into an East Side bordello with her and held up the madam for $80. The madam had the effrontery to complain to the police, and Zelig was arrested. Because of previous arrests, Big Jack faced a long prison term; so he sent word to Tricker and Sirocco to return the money to the madam and frighten her into refusing to testify. The pair deliberately did not carry out his orders, hoping Zelig would be sent away and they would inherit his crime empire. Big Jack finally got another gang leader, Jimmy Kelly, to carry his message to the madam, and when the case came up in court, the woman insisted Zelig looked not a bit like the man who had robbed her. Big Jack was released and vowed war on Tricker and Sirocco.

In the ensuing battles at least a score of gunmen on both sides died. In an awesome display of shooting, Zelig shot and killed a hired gunman, Julie Morrell, sent after him by his foes. Zelig’s friends got Morrell drunk and he staggered out onto the dance floor of the Stuyvesant Casino shouting: “Where’s that big Yid Zelig? I gotta cook that big Yid!”

ZERILLI, Joseph

Suddenly, Zelig spoke sharply from a table across the dance floor and the dancers scattered. Just then the lights went out and a single shot was fired. When the lights went on, Morrell lay dead on the floor and Zelig was gone. He had shot Morrell through the heart in the dark.

By this time Zelig was offering protection to many of the top gambling clubs in Manhattan. Finally, he was hired by police Lt. Charles E. Becker for a very special job, that of assassinating a gambler named Herman “Beansie” Rosenthal. Becker and Rosenthal had been partners, but when Becker had failed to protect Rosenthal in the way he wished, Rosenthal decided to blow the whistle on the payoffs delivered by the gambling interests of the city to the political and police powers. Zelig collected $2,000 for murdering Rosenthal. In a division of the spoils that was generous for Big Jack, he passed on $1,000 to four of his killers—Gyp the Blood, Whitey Lewis, Dago Frank and Lefty Louie—who did the actual work. After the killings, they appeared to have gotten away clean, since the investigation of the matter was in the hands of Lt. Becker himself. However, a reform district attorney named Charles Whitman launched his own investigation and easily found witnesses who identified the four murderers.

Gyp the Blood soon confessed. He said he had been hired by Big Jack Zelig and named Becker as the man behind the entire operation.

Zelig also broke the underworld code of silence, testifying before the grand jury on Becker’s links to the crime. On October 5, 1912, the day before he was to appear in court, Zelig was gunned down on a Manhattan trolley car by Red Phil Davidson. The police department was sure the murder of Zelig was related to his feud with the Sirocco and Tricker forces. Everyone else in New York felt it had something to do with his forthcoming testimony against Becker. As it turned out, even without Zelig’s testimony, there was more than enough evidence to convict the four gunmen and Becker as well. All eventually died in the electric chair.

Zerilli, Joseph (1897–1977) syndicate leader

Perhaps the closest thing in real life to the public’s perception of a Mafia “godfather,” Joseph Zerilli was the crime boss of Detroit for decades and the last survivor of that city’s violent Prohibition-era gang wars.

Born in Terrasini, Sicily, he immigrated to the United States in 1914 and started working as a pick-and-shovel laborer. He quickly gravitated into criminal activities and worked his way up to an important position in the Purple Mob, eventually becoming the leader of an illegal operation that took in profits estimated at $150 million a year from such activities as bookmaking, numbers, loansharking, prostitution, extortion, narcotics and labor racketeering. Zerilli lived in a $500,000 home on a 20-acre suburban estate and always insisted he was just a businessman-baker.

While he was known to have been involved in a great many crimes, including murder, Zerilli was convicted of criminal charges only twice. In 1919 he paid fines for carrying concealed weapons and for speeding. As the highest-ranking mobster in Detroit, Zerilli was due to attend the infamous Apalachin summit meeting of syndicate leaders in 1957, but he turned back when he got word that a police raid was under way.

In his early seventies Zerilli retired from crime family business and turned over control to his son, Tony, one of the few Mafia cases where a son succeeded a father in the role of gang leader. However, the elder Zerilli returned to active control in 1975, when his son received a four-year prison sentence for conspiring to obtain a hidden interest in a Las Vegas casino.

Zerilli was implicated in the 1975 disappearance of James R. Hoffa, the former president of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters. When Hoffa disappeared, he was reported to have been on his way to meet Anthony Giacalone, Zerilli’s top lieutenant. Zerilli provided the police with no information concerning the case. When he died October 30, 1977, a high police official observed he probably carried more criminal secrets to the grave than any crime leader who had passed away in the past decade.

Ziegler, Shotgun George (1897–1934) gangster

Perhaps the best educated and certainly one of the smartest of the 1930 gangsters, shotgun George Ziegler (whose real name was Fred Goetz) was for a time the mastermind of the Barker-Karpis gang and was a chief planner in the kidnapping of wealthy Edward George Bremer of St. Paul, Minn. in 1934. He was also for a time one of Al Capone’s most-trusted trigger men, remaining a prime suspect in the famous St. Valentine’s Day massacre of the Bugs Moran gang.

During World War I, Ziegler had been a second lieutenant and pilot. In 1922 he graduated from the University of Illinois, where he had been a football player and an excellent golfer. Famed FBI agent Melvin H. Purvis said of him, “His character was one of infinite contradictions; well mannered, always polite, he was capable of generous kindnesses and conscienceless cruelty.” It may well be that Ziegler became a criminal almost accidentally after being arrested on a rape charge. He jumped bail before his trial and, not wishing his parents to lose the money, decided to get it back quickly. He attempted to hold up a doctor he knew always carried large sums of money. When the physician drew a gun he had permission to carry, Goetz blasted him to death with a shotgun, launching his career as Shotgun George Ziegler.

When next heard of he was a gunman with the Capone mob in Chicago. Besides the St. Valentine's Day killings, Ziegler was credited with six to 10 other mob murders. From time to time he disappeared from the crime scene. During those periods he actually worked as an engineer; he had studied engineering in college. But he regularly departed from the straight life to win fame as one of the best artisans at "cracking a bank" while a member of the Midwest's Keating-Holden gang.

In 1933 Ziegler turned up in the Barker-Karpis mob, where his intelligence soon propelled him into a position of leadership. He picked Bremer as a likely kidnap victim, a caper that netted the gang a $200,000 ransom. Most of the money was turned over to Ziegler, who stashed it in a garage belonging to his wife's uncle, where it was to be left to "cool." That proved to be a fatal error on the Barkers' part. While they trusted Ziegler totally, he was slowly losing his mind. He began to talk wildly in underworld circles, loudly proclaiming credit for the Bremer job. The Barkers realized Ziegler had to be silenced, and on March 22, 1934, just two months after the Bremer kidnapping, four shotguns blasted Ziegler as he stepped out of his favorite cafe in Cicero, Ill. Ziegler fell dead, most of his head blown away. With Ziegler gone, only his widow knew where the ransom money was hidden. Ma Barker was able to cajole the grieving but trusting widow into turning over the money, insisting Ziegler had undoubtedly been killed by enemies from his Capone days. What couldn't be undone was the information the FBI had gained from Ziegler's corpse. On his body were membership cards to the Chicago Yacht Club and the Mohawk Country Club of Bensenville, Ill. Police then found his address and the names and addresses of many members of the Barker-Karpis mob. The Barkers were forced to scatter, all soon to fall victim to the law. Ma Barker and son Fred were killed in a famous shoot-out in Florida the following year.

Zodiac Killer California serial killer

Starting in California in 1966 and extending over the next several years, a weird mass murderer, who became known as Zodiac because of the letters and cryptograms he sent to newspapers, killed a number of victims, mostly young girls, because, he said, he was "collecting slaves for my afterlife." There is considerable dispute over the number of persons Zodiac killed, since he did not claim credit for some murders he definitely committed and the police failed to find the bodies of many he claimed to have killed.

The first murders he acknowledged were those of two high school teenagers, who were parked on a lonely road outside Vallejo, Calif. on December 20, 1968. Carrying a .22-caliber pistol, a lone figure moved to the car and aimed it at the head of 17-year-old David Faraday. Three bullets smashed into Faraday's skull before he could react. Sitting next to the driver, 16-year-old Bettilou Jensen screamed and then bolted from the car. She didn't get far. The attacker dropped her with five bullets. Both youngsters died. The following July 4 Zodiac struck again, killing a young girl sitting in a parked car in a public park near Vallejo. Her 19-year-old companion survived despite four bullet wounds. The killer had shined a flashlight into their car, temporarily blinding the youth, so that he could give only a sketchy identification of the attacker: a fairly heavy man with glasses.

In one of Zodiac's more gruesome killings, he stabbed Cecelia Shepard in the back 24 times, cutting the outline of a bloody cross. The best description of Zodiac was obtained when he killed a part-time college student working as a cab driver in San Francisco. He had shot him from the backseat and set about cleaning up the taxi, presumably to eradicate his fingerprints. Then he cut off a piece of the victim's bloody shirt—to enclose in a future letter to a newspaper—before leaving. Zodiac was seen by witnesses, and with their aid the police put out a composite description of him: a man of 35 to 45, five foot eight inches with short brown-reddish hair and wearing thick glasses.

Zodiac's letters to the police and to the newspapers continued throughout the early 1970s, although some were believed to be fakes. The San Francisco police attributed no more than six murders to Zodiac, although his own count eventually reached 37. A possible confirmation of Zodiac's total came in 1975 from Don Striepeke, sheriff of Sonoma County. Striepeke used a computer study of murder records in the state attorney general's office as the basis for a theory that about 40 murders in four western states could be traced to one killer, perhaps Zodiac. The officer found in these murders what he regarded as threads of similarity, and he even theorized that the murderer was using a huge letter "Z" mapped over several western states as a blueprint for where to commit his crimes. Since the mid-1970s nothing more has been heard from Zodiac, the most common police theory being that he is either dead or confined in some mental institution.

ZWEIBACH, MAX

Zweibach, Max See KID TWIST.

Zwillman, Abner “Longy” (1899–1959) crime syndicate leader

A graduate of the bootleg racket in Brooklyn, New York City, Longie Zwillman emerged as one of the most powerful crime leaders in the country, a member of the Seven Group, the forerunner of the national crime syndicate that began in the 1930s.

Zwillman, an associate of Meyer Lansky, Frank Costello and Willie Moretti, was instrumental in the new combination’s successful efforts to take over Dutch Schultz’s empire. In the process Zwillman became the undisputed boss of crime in New Jersey, where he operated on a grand scale. When considerable heat was put on the syndicate as a result of the Lindbergh baby kidnapping, Zwillman relieved the pressure by posting a large reward for the kidnapper. His political power in New Jersey was impressive. In 1946 Republican Gov. Harold G. Hoffmann personally asked Zwillman’s aid. Three years later, the mobster let it be known to the Democratic candidate for the governorship, Elmer Wene, that he would contribute $300,000; all he asked in return was the right to name the state’s attorney general. Wene declined the offer.

In the early 1950s Zwillman moved much of his millions into legitimate enterprises and attempted to create the image that he was a civic-minded citizen by donating $250,000 for a slum clearance project in Newark. However, his new image didn’t hold up very well when the McClellan Committee’s rackets investigation in the late 1950s began focusing on his activities. Subpoenaed to appear before the committee and being hounded by an IRS probe, Zwillman seemed to be a beaten man.

He also had his problems within the syndicate. He had guessed wrong by supporting the aging Frank Costello when other forces in the organization wanted to retire him. Zwillman then guessed wrong again by siding with Albert Anastasia against Vito Genovese. Other crime leaders began edging into his New Jersey rackets.

Given the sum total of the pressures on him, it was not terribly surprising that Zwillman committed suicide on February 27, 1959, just prior to his scheduled appearance before the McClellan Committee. Perhaps the only troubling detail about Zwillman’s suicide was the way he had done it. Apparently, he had managed to strangle himself with a plastic rope in the basement of his luxurious $200,000 mansion in West Orange, N.J. That clearly seemed the hard way of committing suicide; moreover, there were unexplained bruises on his body and indications that his hands had been tied with wire. Nonetheless, the official verdict was suicide.

Zwillman’s death undoubtedly brought considerable relief to the members of the crime syndicate, especially Meyer Lansky, who feared Zwillman was growing too old to take the pressure and might turn informer.
