His first fictional book, Roar Lion Roar, treated with sensitive compassion the interior lives of disturbed adolescents of minority backgrounds. In the title story, Ishmael Ramos, a janitor at Columbia University, so identifies with the "ivory leak" school that he kills himself when the football team loses. Most of the protagonists of these stories are insane but even the sane have been mind-molded by the mass media or warped by the pressures of recent history. Indeed, Faust's major theme of the forming and deforming of personality by an empty culture in a violent, chaotic world may here have found its most solid embodiment.

The broader canvas of the novel form permitted Faust the breadth and depth needed to convey the specificity of a conflicted culture in its dizzying impact upon the individual. In Faust's first novel, The Steagle, English Professor Harold Weissburg develops a multiple personality while his sense of self disintegrates during the Cuban missile crisis. The title is a composite-name formed from two football teams, the Steelers and the Eagles. Thus, as the United States shifts from "good neighbor" to threatening nuclear power, Weissburg, in desperate flight across the country, becomes Bob Hardy (brother of Andy, of the wholesome movie family), gangster Rocco Salvato, a football hero, a flying ace, and, finally Humphrey Bogart. In The File on Stanley Patton Buchta his protagonist is an undercover policeman, Vietnam veteran, and college graduate who infiltrates both a paramilitary rightist group within the police department and a New Left organization. He is further divided in romantic loyalty to an all-American blonde beauty and a black militant on whom he is spying. Perhaps because the hero is not fully realized, or because the material lacks the historical density which the author prefers, this fairly conventional novel lacks impact.

Faust's next two novels, however, are probably his best to date. Willy Remembers features the redoubtable Willy Kleinhans, who at ninety-three is an embodiment and archive of America in the nineteenth century. The history he recalls is badly scrambled but curiously apt: Grover Cleveland is confused with baseball-pitcher Grover Cleveland Alexander; John F. Kennedy melds with McKinley, another assassinated President; Admiral and Governor Dewey, Franklin and Teddy Roosevelt likewise interchange. The Haymarket Riot, the frame-up of Tom Mooney, prohibition, and T.R. at San Juan hill all whiz by as kaleidoscopic snapshots. Despite Willy's anti-semitism, curmudgeonly judgments and angry confusion, he is a likable and likely representative of his time and place. Although R.V. Cassill rightly praised Willy Remembers for its "overlapping stereotypes of urban and national memory" and the novel's "Joycean complexity," Faust does not always guide the reader adequately along these highspeed, involuted memory-trips. The novel does display, nevertheless, a marked advance in control of point-of-view and the blend of fantasy and realism. With Foreign Devils Faust achieves mastery in weaving together the items of popular culture, the myths by which many Americans live, and the disintegrating personality of a Jewish writer. His hero, Sidney Benson (born Birnbaum), is separated from his wife and living partly off his mother's earnings from a candy store. Inspired by President Nixon's trip to China, Benson, who has suffered from writer's block, begins a novel about the Boxer rebellion. This melodrama, or novel-within-the-novel, is an exquisite parody of the swashbuckling accounts of Richard Harding Davis, and is perhaps the chief attraction of Foreign Devils. The action in the present, except for Benson's reunion at the end with his father (who had deserted his family years ago), is cluttered with topical references, both a shortcoming and an attraction in Faust's fiction.

Faust's A Star in the Family and Newsreel show flashes of power as each book scans recent American history, but he is in danger of repeating himself. The tale of vaudevillian Bart Goldwine, protagonist of A Star in the Family, consists of interviews conducted by Goldwine's biographer, plus longer memoiristic accounts by Goldwine. The reproduction of showbusiness patter, street talk, fan magazine prose, courtship, and family discussions is flawless in evoking the cynicism and innocence of the last generation. Showman Goldwine's impression of John F. Kennedy is abruptly ended by the assassination; his long decline thereafter is symbolically entwined with the decline of American vitality and national will. In Newsreel former Army Captain Manny "Speed" Finestone is again the victim of his times. Linked spiritually with his wartime "chief," Dwight Eisenhower, Speed cannot escape contrasting the purity of the great crusade against Hitler with the materialism of the affluent 1950s, the cold war mentality, and the slaving of President Kennedy (Chapter 29 is simply "11/22/63"). Finestone's inability to write, his failed romances with two Jewish women and an Irish girl, his unraveling into psychosis are all played against national deterioration in a cultural wasteland. Other previous themes and motifs are also present: sex and sports, the abandoning father, the Jew fighting his ethnic identity, the writer supported by his mother, the use of dialogues with other selves or fantasy-heroes. Although their repeated use suggests personal concerns that are insufficiently integrated into fiction, Faust continues to portray both interior individual lives and cultural tension with skill and sincerity.

The protagonist of Jim Dandy, Faust's first novel after a silence of nine years, first appears in the book as a child in 1915, when he is employed as a member of a black minstrel show. In time "Jim Dandy" comes to be known as Hollis Cleveland, and gets into so much trouble as a small-time Harlem gangster that he has to leave the country. His travels take him first to Europe and eventually to an Ethiopia, caught up in war with Fascist Italy. All along the way, he is mistaken for other people—including "Gallifa, the son of Ras Gugsa of Gondar... a Solomonic Prince" of the African kingdom. Despite the fact that it sometimes groans under its magic realist weight—a byproduct of the author's tampering with history—the novel is an enjoyable one, particularly in its first half.

-Frank Campenni

FEINSTEIN, Elaine

Nationality: British. Born: Bootle, Lancashire, 24 October 1930. Education: Wyggeston Grammar School, Leicester; Newnham College, Cambridge, B.A. in English 1952, M.A. 1955. Family: Married Arnold Feinstein in 1956; three sons. Career: Editorial staff member, Cambridge University Press, 1960–62; lecturer in English, Bishop's Stortford Training College, Hertfordshire, 1963–66; assistant lecturer in literature, University of Essex, Colchester, 1967–70. Awards: Arts Council grant, 1970, 1979, 1981; Daisy Miller award, for fiction, 1971; Kelus prize, 1978. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1980. Agent: Rogers Coleridge and White, 20 Powis Mews, London W11 1JN; (plays and film) Lemon Unna and Durbridge, 24–32 Pottery Lane, London, W11 4LZ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Circle. London, Hutchinson, 1970.

The Amberstone Exit. London, Hutchinson, 1972.

The Glass Alembic. London, Hutchinson, 1973; as The Crystal Garden, New York, Dutton, 1974.

Children of the Rose. London, Hutchinson, 1975.

The Ecstasy of Dr. Miriam Garner. London, Hutchinson, 1976.

The Shadow Master. London, Hutchinson, 1978; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1979.

The Survivors. London, Hutchinson, 1982; New York, Penguin, 1991.

The Border. London, Hutchinson, 1984; New York, Boyars, 1989.Mother's Girl. London, Century Hutchinson, and New York, Dutton, 1988.

All You Need. London, Century Hutchinson, 1989; New York, Viking, 1991.

Loving Brecht. London, Hutchinson, 1992.

Dreamers. London, Macmillan, 1994.

Lady Chatterley's Confession. London, Macmillan, 1995.

Daylight. Manchester, England, Carcanet, 1997.

Short Stories

Matters of Chance. London, Covent Garden Press, 1972. The Silent Areas. London, Hutchinson, 1980.

Plays

Lear's Daughters (produced London, 1987).

Radio Plays: Echoes, 1980; A Late Spring, 1982; A Captive Lion, 1984; Marina Tsvetayeva: A Life, 1985; A Day Off, from the novel by Storm Jameson, 1986; If I Ever Get on My Feet Again, 1987; The Man in Her Life, 1989; The Temptations of Dr. William Fosters, 1991.

Television Plays: Breath, 1975; Lunch, 1982; Country Diary of an Edwardian Lady series, from work by Edith Holden, 1984; A Brave Face, 1985; The Chase, 1988; A Passionate Woman series, 1989.

Poetry

In a Green Eye. London, Goliard Press, 1966.

The Magic Apple Tree. London, Hutchinson, 1971.

At the Edge. Rushden, Northamptonshire, Sceptre Press, 1972.

The Celebrants and Other Poems. London, Hutchinson, 1973.

Some Unease and Angels: Selected Poems. London, Hutchinson, and University Center, Michigan, Green River Press, 1977.

The Feast of Euridice. London, Faber, 1980.

Badlands. London, Century Hutchinson, 1986.

City Music. London, Hutchinson, 1990.

Selected Poems. London, Carcanet, 1994.

Other

Bessie Smith. London, Penguin, 1985.

A Captive Lion: The Life of Marina Tsvetayeva. London, Century Hutchinson, and New York, Dutton, 1987.

Marina Tsvetayeva. London and New York, Penguin, 1989.

Lawrence's Women. London and New York, HarperCollins, 1993. Pushkin. Hopewell, New Jersey, Ecco Press, 1999.

Editor, Selected Poems of John Clare. London, University Tutorial Press, 1968.

Editor, with Fay Weldon, New Stories 4. London, Hutchinson, 1979. Editor, PEN New Poetry. London, Quartet, 1988.

Translator, The Selected Poems of Marina Tsvetayeva. London, Oxford University Press, 1971; revised edition, Oxford and New York, Oxford University Press, 1981.

Translator, Three Russian Poets: Margarita Aliger, Yunna Moritz, Bella Akhmadulina. Manchester, Carcanet, 1979.

Translator, with Antonia W. Bouis, First Draft: Poems, by Nika Turbina. London, Boyars, 1988.

*

Manuscript Collection: Cambridge University.

Critical Studies: Article by Peter Conradi, in British Novelists since 1960 edited by Jay L. Halio, Detroit, Gale, 1983.

Elaine Feinstein comments:

My earliest fiction was very much an extension of my poetry, but as the novels have moved away from a single narrative voice to explore a wider territory, I have largely abandoned those rhythms and have come to prefer the traditional clarity of prose.

* * *

Lena, in Elaine Feinstein's first novel, The Circle, realizes à propos her husband "that she would have to take it up again. Her separate life. Her lonely life, the music of words to be played with, the books ... they would be her refuge; her private world. As his was this of the laboratory. And she must now move as securely into that ... and find magic." However, in the general context of Feinstein's work, which shows a progressive widening of focus, this is broader than a feminist prescription. Subsequent novels are dominated by men and women in search of "magic," partly via illegitimate means in The Ecstasy of Dr. Miriam Garner, and both actively and contemplatively through religion in The Shadow Master. "Magic" may be partially embodied in people, as in The Amberstone Exit, with Emily's fascination with the glamorous Tyrenes, the local rich family, and in The Ecstasy of Dr. Miriam Garner, with Miriam's fascination with the brilliant but brutal Stavros; in both novels there is a strong erotic element in the fascination, and Emily's youthful hunger for sexual experience, which comes to focus on Max Tyrene, anticipates Miriam's more sophisticated desire for Stavros. Similarly, in Mother's Girl Halina as a student is infatuated with the brilliant don Janos, while in All You Need middle-aged Nell falls for glamorous, powerful Theo.

The fundamental source of "magic" is inevitably "the music of words." For Lena and Emily it is joy in intoxicating language, and for Nell who aspires to writing poetry, and so it could be for the poet Hans in The Border were he not, as a part-Jew, persecuted by Hitler, while in the title story of The Silent Areas poetry must be "the words that ran in the blood of freezing men without food. Or the minds of the half-mad in lonely cells." In The Shadow Master, before the closing religious acceptance, the search for magic meant apocalyptic action. Thus, unfashionably, Feinstein is concerned with validation for people's lives outside as well as inside human relationships.

Perhaps drawing on her experience as a poet, in her first novel, The Circle, Feinstein used technical devices, notably spaces within paragraphs, intended for immediacy but in practice often distracting, and later abandoned. A staple technique throughout her work is the juxtaposition of different time-sequences. In The Circle this is unstructured, while The Amberstone Exit opens in a maternity ward where Emily is having her baby and swings back over the events bringing her there, with the two time-sequences running together toward the end.

The Glass Alembic is about a more mature woman, Brigid, and for the first time focuses on a group. Two passages from this novel are reworked with different names and alternative endings in the stories "Complicity" and "Strangers" (The Silent Areas). Brigid's arrival in Basel where her husband is a biochemist is a catalyst for various human reactions in the scientific community. The setting of Paracelsushaunted Basel is merely coincidentally metaphoric of the action. By contrast, the settings are integral in Children of the Rose, which evokes Collaborationist tensions in present-day Provence and the reactions of Jews, once refugees, on revisiting Poland.

In The Ecstasy of Dr. Miriam Garner Feinstein plaits a strand of narrative from medieval Toledo with a glamorous female academic's life into a mystery story with spiritual side-lights. The Shadow Master is set mainly in Turkey, where an international religious and political apocalyptic movements begins, leading indirectly to the explosion of 'a small nuclear device.' In The Survivors Feinstein follows two Jewish émigré families in Liverpool, one rich and one poor, from 1914 to 1956, when Diana, the offspring of a surprising marriage linking the families, agonizes 'So many had died in mud and fire for being Jewish. To give it up seemed a gross betrayal.' This two-family saga not only describes the difficulties Jews found in Britain but also delineates both through the successor generations and within generations the characters' very different attitudes to their Jewishness. As the book ends, West Indians are moving into some of the old Jewish quarters.

The Border also draws on Feinstein's Jewish background. Through various narrative devices, notably the use of diaries kept by the scientist Inge and her husband the poet Hans, Feinstein highlights the personal and increasingly the political strains put upon the marriage. The book follows the part-Jewish couple's flight from Vienna to Paris and beyond, in 1983. In this powerful novella, where Walter Benjamin appears, "the border" is metaphoric as well as actual. The book is a technical tour de force, and a deeply moving human text.

Mother's Girl deals with the effect of the Holocaust on the next generation. As a child, Halina was sent to Britain in 1939 from Budapest. The novel is a story within a story, as Halina recounts her life to her much younger American half-sister before their father's funeral: this form brings out the continuing effects of a terrible and incompletely known past. The fate of Halina's mother, an unsung underground heroine, never emerges. Her debonair, womanizing father reappeared after the war though without revealing his wartime experience until dying, nursed by Halina. Meanwhile Halina was temporarily and unhappily married to Janos, who had known her father in wartime Budapest.

If through circumstances of history Halina cannot fully understand herself, neither can Nell in All You Need, through her own fault. Her husband's sudden arrest for fraud precipitates her into moving to London with her 12-year-old daughter and earning her own living. Some readers may feel less sympathy for her climb into the media world of the late 1980s than Feinstein does: middle-class Nell with a Cambridge degree was a privileged person who had chosen to become a housewife.

So far, The Border is Feinstein's major achievement, bringing together all her greatest strengths: the examination of a long-term relationship between a man and a woman, in which both are treated with equal sympathy; a poet's use of language; and a witnessing of history, however dark. A 1999 biography of Aleksandr Pushkin won high praise, overshadowing Feinstein's novels of the recently preceding years: Lady Chatterley's Confession, which continues D. H. Lawrence's erotic story, and Daylight.

-Val Warner

FIGES, Eva

Nationality: British. Born: Eva Unger in Berlin, Germany, 15 April 1932; came to England in 1939. Education: Kingsbury Grammar School, 1943–50; Queen Mary College, University of London, 1950–53, B.A. (honours) in English 1953. Family: Married John George Figes in 1954 (divorced 1963); one daughter and one son. Career: Editor, Longman, 1955–57, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1962–63, and Blackie, 1964–67, publishers, London. Since 1987 coeditor, Macmillan Women Writers series. Awards: Guardian Fiction prize, 1967; C. Day Lewis fellowship, 1973; Arts Council fellowship, 1977–79; Society of Authors traveling scholarship, 1988. Fellow, Queen Mary and Westfield College, 1990. Agent: Rogers Coleridge and White Ltd., 20 Powis Mews, London W11 1JN. Address: 24 Fitzjohn's Avenue, London N.W.3, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Equinox. London, Secker and Warburg, 1966.

Winter Journey. London, Faber, 1967; New York, Hill and Wang, 1968.

Konek Landing. London, Faber, 1969.

B. London, Faber, 1972.

Pantheon, 1987.

Days. London, Faber, 1974.

Nelly's Version. London, Secker and Warburg, 1977; New York, Pantheon, 1988.

Waking. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1981; New York, Pantheon, 1982.

Light. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Pantheon, 1983. The Seven Ages. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1986; New York, Ghosts. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Pantheon, 1988.

The Tree of Knowledge. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1990; New York, Pantheon, 1991.

The Tenancy. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1993.

The Knot. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1996.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Obbligato, Bedsitter," in Signature Anthology. London, Calder and Boyars, 1975.

"On the Edge," in London Tales, edited by Julian Evans. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1983.

Plays

Radio Plays: Time Regained, 1980; Dialogue Between Friends, 1982; Punch-Flame and Pigeon-Breast, 1983; The True Tale of Margery Kempe, 1985.

Television Plays: Days, from her own novel, 1981.

Other

The Banger (for children). London, Deutsch, and New York, Lion Press. 1968.

Patriarchal Attitudes: Women in Society. London, Faber, and New York, Stein and Day, 1970.

Scribble Sam (for children). London, Deutsch, and New York, McKay, 1971.

Tragedy and Social Evolution. London, Calder, 1976; New York, Persea, 1990.

Little Eden: A Child at War (autobiography). London, Faber, 1978; New York, Persea, 1987.

Sex and Subterfuge: Women Novelists to 1850. London, Macmillan, 1982; New York, Persea, 1988.

Editor, Classic Choice 1. London, Blackie, 1965.

Editor, Modern Choice 1 and 2. London, Blackie, 2 vols., 1965–66. Editor, with Abigail Mozley and Dinah Livingstone, Women Their World. Gisburn, Lancashire, Platform Poets, 1980.

Editor, Women's Letters in Wartime: 1450–1945. London and San Francisco, Pandora, 1994.

Translator, The Gadarene Club, by Martin Walser. London, Longman, 1960

Translator, The Musicians of Bremen: Retold (for children). London, Blackie, 1967.

Translator, The Old Car, by Elisabeth Borchers. London, Blackie, 1967.

Translator, He and I and the Elephants, by Bernhard Grzimek. London, Deutsch-Thames and Hudson, and New York, Hill and Wang, 1967.

Translator, Little Fadette, by George Sand. London, Blackie, 1967.

Translator, A Family Failure, by Renate Rasp. London, Calder and Boyars, 1970.

Translator, The Deathbringer, by Manfred von Conta. London, Calder and Boyars, 1971.

* * *

"I am using a different grid which I have first to construct by a painful process of trial and error," writes Eva Figes. In outright reaction against what she sees as the continuing conservative realist tradition of British fiction Figes resumes the modernist task of reshaping the novel and questioning the assumptions on which it is built. In her novels, as in those of Virginia Woolf (surely the greatest influence on her work), Figes seeks to bring together the properties of formal art and the intensities of the inner self. Here, life takes place between the acts, and we catch it unawares in the lives of ordinary people: Janus, the old man dying alone in his council house in Winter Journey, or Lily, the spinster sister and aunt who measures the subtly shifting relationships in Light. As Figes explores the self concealed behind the artifice of manners, the most elusive moments of existence are redefined in her novels as the prerequisite for creative vitality, and continuity is found in the lyric hoard of memories through which her characters resist the flux of time. In Winter Journey the presentation of a series of psychological states in place of a continuous narrative or plot results in an intense poetic lyricism. The same kind of unbroken texture, or openness and continuity, is found in Light (Figes's finest work to date), where Claude, artist and philosopher, explains: "Everything is always in flux ... it was both his overriding difficulty and essential to him."

But there are darker realities here too. A sense of menace underlies the lyrical affirmation of the novels, and there is a corresponding sense that only a continuous style can soothe a narrative which is subject to unexpected disruptions and dislocations. "My starting-point is inevitably Kafka," Figes claims, and there are echoes of Beckett too in her novels' unresolved ambivalence about their own representational activity. The negative energies of solipsism and angst are inseparable from the moments of heightened consciousness in the fragmented autobiography of Janus' winter journey. And in Light, Claude's fragile images of perfection are troubled by the motifs of transience and death. In the final analysis, perhaps the most fascinating and complex aspect of Figes's novels is that they do follow the Modernist tradition of showing art and memory as creative of a new order of reality. But they also remain firmly located in the destructive elements of historical time that many classic modernists would seek to bypass. The power and potency of the recurrent images of holocaust in her novels seem to reveal the author's deepest motivations for writing: "I am a European wrestling with a different reality," she says. "A piece of shrapnel lodges in my flesh, and when it moves, I write."

Much of Figes's work, both in fiction and nonfiction, concerns the history, both internal and external, of women. One of many examples of the nonfiction treatment is Women's Letters in Wartime; more challenging, of course, is the fictional treatment, as when she portrays the seven "ages" of a woman's life in Waking. In The Tree of Knowledge, she turns a feminist light on the world of John Milton—a blind man who nonetheless ruled the women around him.

—Sandra Kemp

FINDLEY, Timothy

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Toronto, Ontario, 30 October 1930. Education: Rosedale Public School, Toronto; St. Andrews College, Aurora, Ontario; Jarvis Collegiate, Toronto; Royal Conservatory of Music, Toronto, 1950–53; Central School of Speech and Drama, London. Career: Stage, television, and radio actor, 1951–62; charter member, Stratford Shakespearean Festival, Ontario, 1953; contract player with H.M. Tennent, London, 1953–56; toured U.S. in The Matchmaker, 1956–57; studio writer, CBS, Hollywood, 1957–58; copywriter, CFGM Radio, Richmond Hill, Ontario. Playwright-inresidence, National Arts Centre, Ottawa, 1974–75; writer-inresidence, University of Toronto, 1979–80, Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario, 1984, and University of Winnipeg, 1985.

Chair, Writers Union of Canada, 1977–78; president, English-Canadian Centre, International P.E.N., 1986-87. Awards: Canada Council award, 1968, 1978; Armstrong award, for radio writing, 1971; ACTRA award, for television documentary, 1975; Governor General's award, 1977; City of Toronto Book award, 1977, 1994; Anik award, for television writing, 1980; Canadian Authors Association prize, 1985, 1991, 1994; Western Magazine award, 1988; Government of Ontario Trillium award, 1989; Mystery Writers of America Edgar Allan Poe award, 1989; National Radio award, 1989, 1990; Gabriel award, 1990; Crime Writers of Canada award, for drama, 1994; Toronto Arts award, 1994; Gemini award, 1995; Knight of the Order of Arts and Letters (France), 1996. D.Litt.: Trent University, 1982; University of Guelph, Ontario, 1984; York University, Ontario, 1989; Lakehead University, Ontario, 1995; Memorial University, St. John's, Newfoundland, 1996. Officer, Order of Canada, 1986. Agent: Virginia Barber Literary Agency, 353 West 21st Street, New York, New York 10011, U.S.A. Address: Stone Orchard, Box 419, Cannington, Ontario L0E 1E0, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Last of the Crazy People. New York, Meredith Press, and London, Macdonald, 1967.

The Butterfly Plague. New York, Viking Press, 1969; London, Deutsch, 1970.

The Wars. Toronto, Clarke Irwin, 1977; New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Macmillan, 1978.

Famous Last Words. Toronto, Clarke Irwin, and New York, Delacorte Press, 1981; London, Macmillan, 1987.

Not Wanted on the Voyage. Toronto, Viking, 1984; New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Macmillan, 1985.

The Telling of Lies. Toronto, Penguin, 1986; London, Macmillan, and New York, Dell, 1988.

Headhunter. Toronto, HarperCollins, 1993; New York, Crown, 1994. The Piano Man's Daughter. Toronto, HarperCollins, and New York, Crown, 1995.

Pilgrim. New York, HarperCollins, 1999.

Short Stories

Dinner Along the Amazon. Toronto and London, Penguin, 1984; New York, Penguin, 1985.

Stones. Toronto, Penguin, 1988; New York, Delta, 1990. Dust to Dust: Stories. Toronto, HarperCollins, 1997.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Island" and "The Long Walk" in The Newcomers, edited by Charles E. Israel. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1979.

Plays

The Paper People (televised 1968). Published in Canadian Drama (Toronto), vol. 9, no. 1, 1983.

The Journey (broadcast 1971). Published in Canadian Drama (Toronto), vol. 10, no. 1, 1984.

Can You See Me Yet? (produced Ottawa, 1976). Vancouver, Talonbooks, 1977.

John A. Himself music by Berthold Carriere (produced London, Ontario, 1979).

Strangers at the Door (radio script), in Quarry (Kingston, Ontario), 1982

Daybreak at Pisa: 1945, in Tamarack Review (Toronto), Winter

The Stillborn Lover (produced London, 1993). Winnipeg, Blizzard, 1993

The Trials of Ezra Pound. Winnipeg, Blizzard, 1994.

Screenplays: Don't Let the Angels Fall, 1970; The Wars, 1983.

Radio Plays and Documentaries: The Learning Stage and Ideas series, 1963–73; Adrift, 1968; Matinee series, 1970–71; The Journey, 1971; Missionaries, 1973; The Trials of Ezra Pound, 1990.

Television Plays and Documentaries: Umbrella series, 1964–66; Who Crucified Christ?, 1966; The Paper People, 1968; The Whiteoaks of Jalna (7 episodes), from books by Mazo de la Roche, 1971–72; The National Dream series (8 episodes), with William Whitehead, 1974; The Garden and the Cage, with William Whitehead, 1977; 1832 and 1911 (The Newcomers series), 1978–79; Dieppe 1942, with William Whitehead, 1979; Other People's Children, 1981; Islands in the Sun and Turn the World Around (Belafonte Sings series), with William Whitehead, 1983.

Other

Imaginings, with Janis Rapaport, illustrated by Heather Cooper. Toronto, Ethos, 1982.

Inside Memory: Pages from a Writer's Workbook. Toronto, Harper Collins, 1990.

From Stone Orchard: A Collection of Memories. Toronto, HarperFlamingo Canada, 1998.

*

Bibliography: Timothy Findley: An Annotated Bibliography by Carol Roberts and Lynne Macdonald, Downsview, Ontario, ECW Press, 1990.

Manuscript Collection: Historical Resources Branch, National Archives of Canada.

Critical Studies: Eleven Canadian Novelists by Graeme Gibson, Toronto, Anansi, 1973; Conversations with Canadian Novelists by Silver Donald Cameron, Toronto, Macmillan, 1973; "An Interview with Timothy Findley," in University of Toronto Review, 1980; "Timothy Findley Issue" of Canadian Literature (Vancouver), Winter 1981; Timothy Findley by Wilfred Cude, Toronto, Dundurn Press, 1982; "The Marvel of Reality" (interview) with Bruce Meyer and Brian O'Riordan, in Waves (Toronto), vol. 10, no. 4, 1982; "Prayers Against Despair" by Gilbert Drolet, in Journal of Canadian Fiction 33 (Montreal), 1982; "Whispers of Chaos" by Eugene Benson, in World Literature Written in English (Guelph, Ontario), Autumn 1982; Second Words: Selected Critical Prose by Margaret Atwood, Toronto, Anansi, 1982, Boston, Beacon Press, 1984; "The Dubious Battle of Storytelling: Narrative Strategies in Timothy Findley's The Wars" by Simone Vauthier, in Gaining Ground: European Critics on Canadian Literature edited by Robert Kroetsch and Reingard M. Nischik, Edmonton, Alberta, NeWest Press, 1985; Timothy Findley's "The Wars": A Study Guide, Toronto, ECW Press, 1990, and "Front Lines": The Fiction of Timothy Findley, Toronto, ECW Press, 1991, both by Lorraine York; Moral Metafiction: The Novels of Timothy Findley, Toronto, ECW Press, 1991; Praying for Rain: Timothy Findley's Not Wanted on the Voyage, Toronto, ECW Press, 1992, both by Donna Pennee; Timothy Findley: Stories from a Life by Carol Roberts, Toronto, ECW Press, 1994; Writing on Trial: Timothy Findley's Famous Last Words by Diana Brydon, Toronto, ECW Press, 1995; The Influence of Painting on Five Canadian Writers: Alice Munro, Hugh Hood, Timothy Findley, Margaret Atwood, and Michael Ondaatje by John Cooke. Lewiston, New York, Edwin Mellen Press, 1996; Timothy Findley by Diana Brydon. New York, Twayne, 1998; Paying Attention: Critical Essays on Timothy Findley, edited by Anne Geddes Bailey and Karen Grandy. Toronto, ECW Press, 1998; Buffalo, New York, General Distribution Services, 1998.

Timothy Findley comments:

There are some who say you should only and always write about what you know. If I had taken this advise, then all my books would be about the theatre, rabbits and cats, a fairly standard version of family life and the road between the farm where I live and the City of Toronto. The fact is, only the rabbits and the cats have made it into my fiction—in one book as the companions of a man in World War I and in another as stowaways on Noah's Ark. Without apology, I must admit that I cannot imagine why I have written what I have. It does occur to me, however, that a thread runs through all my work that has to do with unlikely people being confronted with uncommon events.

. . .

It is an understatement to say that in his writing Timothy Findley engages with the history of the twentieth century. His novels span the Edwardian era, World War I, World War II, the Holocaust, and the end of the millennium. His emphasis on these central historical events is often highly critical. At the end of The Butterfly Plague the narrator paradoxically states "We know that history repeats itself. We also know that it does not." Although reevaluating history is a preoccupation in his writing and although some of his writing has been labeled "historiographic metafiction," Findley's style changes with each novel. He is a literary experimenter—with form, with setting, and with voice—experimenting in the service of social, historical, and political exposition. It is remarkable to think that the stylistically diverse novels Pilgrim, The Piano Man's Daughter, The Wars and Not Wanted on the Voyage are creations of the same author, yet it is less surprising if one considers the similarities in the novels' central thematic concerns.

Although the stories differ dramatically in plot and form, the symbolic content of Findley's work is often predictable. His writing proliferates with scenes of violence, loneliness, animal rights, abuses of power, madness, and apocalyptic visions. Indeed, Findley himself jokingly points to his own recurring images and themes: "It came as something of a shock...to discover that for over thirty years of writing my attention has turned again and again to the same unvarying gamut of sounds and images.... I wish I hadn't noticed this. In fact, it became an embarrassment and I began to wonder if I should file A CATALOGUE OF PERSONAL OBSESSIONS. The sound of screen doors banging; evening lamplight; music held at a distance—always being played on a gramophone; letters written on blue-tinted note paper; robins making forays onto summer lawns to murder worms; photographs in cardboard boxes; Colt revolvers hidden in bureau drawers and a chair that is always falling over." Added to this list should be the butterfly—an image that proliferates in works ranging from the Butterfly Plague to Pilgrim. This catalogue also points to Findley's favorite technique of dramatically placing disturbing elements in an ordinary context (a gun in a drawer).

Findley began professional life as an actor touring Canada, the United States, and Britain but turned to writing in his early thirties with the encouragement of his mentor, the playwright, Thornton Wilder. Over the course of his career he has written several notable plays: John A. Himself, The Stillborn Lover, and Can You See Me Yet? Nevertheless, he is most well known for his fiction, which, indeed, retains a sense of drama in its evocation of startling visual images, its ear for dialogue, and most interestingly, the way in which characters momentarily step out of a scene to comment on their own actions within the scene. This is done with the use of "voices" that follow central characters throughout the narratives. In Not Wanted on the Voyage, the voices of Mottyl the Cat repeatedly come to her rescue, whereas in Pilgrim, the voices of Carl Gustav Jung are his conscience and are always in judgment of his actions. The use of the "voices" technique provides yet another layer of narration in what are already multi-voiced narratives. We know we are never to trust anything as the "truth" in Findley's works and, indeed, we are never really able to know what are "the telling of lies."

In his first novel, The Last of the Crazy People, Findley presents a child, obsessed by the futility of his family's existence in a post-war world, who eventually massacres his entire family as the logic of childhood and the logic of insanity blend together. In The Butterfly Plague Findley takes us into the late thirties in Hollywood, where the fate of a family threatened with an inherited disease parallels the rise of the Nazism and the breakdown of civilization in Europe.

In his next two novels, Findley revisits the horrors of the First and Second World Wars. In The Wars, the story of the breakdown of Robert Ross, a young Canadian soldier, is pieced together by a researcher searching through boxes of letters and photographs that provide only clues to Robert's life. Like his researcher in this novel, Findley's research is impeccable. He knows the periods of which he writes in depth, and in The Wars, he actually creates a deeper illusion of authenticity by presenting the story as the product of an intensive reconstruction of events, even to the extent of inventing taped interviews with survivors of the war who remember Robert and his quixotic attempt to rescue a troop of horses doomed to death.

Moving from the First to the second World War, Famous Last Words is a work of elaborate artifice in which fictional figures mingle with "real" famous people in history. Famous Last Words tells the story of a writer who relates his flirtation with fascism and with fascists such as the Duke and Duchess of Windsor and Ezra Pound by writing on the walls of the Grand Elyseum Hotel. For Diana Brydon, the novel is significant because it tries to understand the attraction of fascism (and other forms of intolerance) without trying to "demonize" it. The novel is narrated by Hugh Selwyn Mauberley, a minor character in the work of Ezra Pound made major by Findley. Mauberley has written his version of history on sixteen walls of the hotel. The story is only found by American soldiers along with Mauberley's frozen, mutilated corpse well after his death.

Not Wanted on the Voyage takes us far back from the world of war to Genesis. A retelling of the Noah's ark story from Genesis, the story features a decrepit lozenge-sucking Yaweh; a domineering, vivisecting, rapist patriarch, Noah Noyes; a marinated blue embittered Japeth; a gin-drinking and Edwardian song piano playing Mrs. Noyes; a largely benevolent androgynous Lucy/Lucifer figure; a blind cat named Mottyl; and a host of other talking animals (including sheep that sing hymns). This novel literally pits the marginalized figures of the lower orders on the lower decks of the ark (women, children, workers, animals) against the upper orders, or those with power. Findley bravely challenges the biblical story of Noah's ark from the opening line of the novel: "Everyone knows it wasn't like that" to the closing line when Mrs. Noyes prays: "She prayed. But not to an absent God. Never, never again to the absent God, but to the absent clouds, she prayed. And to the empty sky. She prayed for rain."

In The Telling of Lies, Findley takes another turn, this time towards mystery. It is the unraveling of the death of pharmaceutical industrialist Calder Maddox. Set in a seaside hotel in Maine, the novel intricately weaves together a story of personal loss and corporate greed. The mystery is complicated by the gradual emergence of the story of the narrator's time in a Japanese concentration camp in World War II.

While The Telling of Lies takes on the pharmaceutical companies, Headhunter addresses the structural problems of psychiatric institutions while delving deeply into intertextual worlds. The novel opens: "On a winter's day, while a blizzard raged through the streets of Toronto, Lilah Kemp inadvertently set Kurtz free from page 92 of Heart of Darkness." The story follows both Kurtz and Lilah through the streets of Toronto as Lilah searches for a Marlow to help her capture Kurtz and return him to Conrad's novel. However, Kurtz has become the head of the fictional Parkin Institute of Psychiatric Research. He has become a modern day "harbinger of darkness...horror-meister...headhunter." Writing about Headhunter, critic Marlene Goldman demonstrates Findley's incorporation and secularization of the apocalyptic paradigm through the recursive use of literary intertextuality; a visionary narrator with a transhistorical perspective; and a small group of "the elect" who battle the corrupt forces at work in their community. Yet, Goldman notes that while this narrative invokes the apocalyptic vision, Findley "simultaneously counters this vision with a more earthly and historically oriented perspective." Even his futuristic vision is somewhat grounded in the problems of

If Headhunter is a horrific vision of the future, then The Piano Man's Daughter is a more optimistic vision of the past. Twenty-nine-year-old piano tuner Charlie Kilworth tells the story of his mother's life, death, schizophrenia, and pyromania and in the process reveals his own story and the story of past and future generations. The novel explores the inheritance of "madness" as a blessing and a curse. Two of Findley's most vividly painted tableaus are in this novel. The first is the act of giving birth in a field and the second is the act of performing emergency brain surgery on a kitchen table. The beauty and precision of each of these scenes remains with the reader well after the story has been read.

Pilgrim is another foray into the world of the insane (and another questioning of what it means to be labeled insane). The central character, Pilgrim, is "a determined suicide who, by all appearances [is] unable to die." The novel shifts between a mental institution in Zurich in 1912 and Florence in 1497. It, too, unravels like a mystery as Carl Gustav Jung, the psychiatrist in charge of Pilgrim, reads the journals of a man who appears to have been as present in 1497 as he is in 1912. The elegance of this novel lies in the manner in which Findley reveals 400 years of stories with such suspense that it is sometimes nearly impossible not to continue reading. The craftsmanship of Pilgrim surpasses Findley's other works, except perhaps Not Wanted on the Voyage, as he beautifully draws us into a world of deceit, betrayal, power, love, and death (again). Somehow, however, although Findley has returned to his favorite obsessions and we know that he repeats himself, we also know that he does not.

—Laura Moss

FISCHER, Tibor

Nationality: British. Born: Stockport, 15 November 1959. Education: Cambridge University. Career: Works as a freelance journalist. Agent: Nicholas Ellison Inc., 55 Fifth Ave., New York, New York 10003, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Under The Frog. Edinburgh, Polygon 1992; New York, New Press, 1994.

The Thought Gang. Edinburgh, Polygon, 1994; New York, New Press, 1995.

The Collector Collector. New York, Metropolitan Books, 1997.

Short Stories

I Like Being Killed: Stories. New York, Metropolitan Books, 2000.

* * *

That Tibor Fischer's first novel was shortlisted for Britain's most prestigious literary award, the Booker Prize, may have had something to do with its subject: Hungary from the end of World War II to the Uprising of 1956. But it is Fischer's treatment of his subject, his specific style as well as his overall approach, that sets the novel apart. Eschewing the elegiac quality of another Hungarian novel that covers much the same period, George Konrad's Feast in the Garden, the absurdist, blackly humorous Under the Frog is closer in tone to Czech novelist Milan Kundera's The Joke and Polish writers Tadeusz Borowski's This Way to the Gas and Ladies and Gentlemen and Tadeusz Konwicki's A Minor Apocalypse.

Fischer's odd title derives from a Hungarian saying meaning 'nothing could be worse.' For the novel's main character, Gyorgi Fischer, things in fact can be worse and usually become so. What this member of the Locomotive basketball team fears is that he may never be 'given a future to lose.' What he wants is to get out of the country; any place will do: if not Sweden, then Poland, and if not Poland, then Rumania or China or even Korea during the war, which, he believes, would be better than postwar Hungary. Pragmatic and apolitical, perhaps to a fault, he occupies the middle ground between idealists like his Polish girlfriend Jadwiga and opportunists like Farago, once a petty thief, then head of his district's 'Nazi franchise,' and now local secretary of the Communist Party. Gyorgi is an opportunist of a different stripe: too cynical to be an idealist, too moral to blow with the prevailing winds. The real horror in this novel is not that good people like Jadwiga who are committed to justice and freedom should die; nor is it that in the world Fischer describes even a little power seems to corrupt absolutely. Rather it is that so many people should find themselves in much the same position as the father of Gyorgi's friend, Tibor Pataki. Arrested in 1951, the elder Pataki must endure interrogation and torture before being released to face a different kind of humiliation, "having been judged too dull" to be a conspirator. In a world of opportunists and optimists, of a Catholic Church that "wasn't too topheavy with brilliance," and of a national infatuation with defeat born of centuries of invasions (from Mongol hordes to Soviet tanks), there is something understandable if not altogether noble in Gyorgi's choosing cynical detachment, self-interest, noncooperation, and, finally, escape. Getting what he wants does not bring relief, however. Once across the border, Gyorgi, like Lot's wife, looks back and turns not to a pillar of salt but to tears.

Fischer has described his second novel, The Thought Gang, as "a short book about all human knowledge and experience." The apparent flippancy of his remark matches the apparent flippancy of this playfully structured but nonetheless serious novel. Pushing his fondness for unfamiliar words and usages even further than he did in Under the Frog and employing a variety of mutually exclusive structural devices, Fischer creates a form that matches perfectly the character of its protagonist-narrator. Born on 9 May 1945 (the day after VE Day), Eddie Coffin has spent the last thirty years "in the thought trade," the philosophy "biz." On the run from the London police, he joins forces with the one-armed, one-eyed Hubert to form the Thought Gang, specializing in bank robberies with a philosophical twist. In a novel this fragmented having a plot this wayward dealing with the misadventures of a hero this antiheroic, the reader may well ask (as the novel does), "What's going on here?" and whether what is going on amounts to anything more than a "good deal of blagging" (nonsense-making). As in the art of Donald Barthelme, another writer fond of collage, blague, and cultural debris, the range of literary and subliterary reference is impressively diverse. The entire novel may be read as a weirdly angled takeoff on Boethius's Consolation of Philosophy, with opening gambit adapted from Kafka's The Trial, plot from Bonnie and Clyde, title from Orwell's 1984, parts of the structure from Nietzsche's The Will to Power, and additional material from the Keystone Kops, Charlie Chaplin, and François Rabelais, among others. All this adds up to a great deal more than just another (and by now belated) example of postmodern plagiarism and randomness. The Thought Gang irreverently takes to task the entire Western philosophical tradition, from the earliest Ionians (Eddie's specialty) to the currently fashionable deconstructionists. In a world in which "brute force works," philosophy is either irrelevant or merely one kind of "biz" among others. Although it lacks Under the Frog's sense of historical immediacy and prefers flights of cartoonish fantasy and intellectual slapstick to direct satire, The Thought Gang is nonetheless a deeply committed work, as the references to other failures of the postwar moral and political imagination—Vietnam, Afghanistan, and Sarajevo—clearly indicate. Near novel's end, Eddie makes his and Fischer's point clearer still. "It's embarrassing that the answer is so simple, so right in front of us. The sages have said so, but like most of the truths, we're bored with it. Change it round, say it backwards, make it foreign: evol, evol, evol. Unstealable money."

-Robert A. Morace

FLANAGAN, Thomas

Nationality: American. Born: Thomas James Bonner Flanagan in Greenwich, Connecticut, 5 November 1923. Education: Amherst College, Massachusetts, B.A. 1945; Columbia University, New York, M.A. 1948, Ph.D. in English 1958. Military Service: Served in the United States Naval Reserve, 1942-44. Family: Married Jean Parker in 1949; two daughters. Career: Instructor, 1949-52, and assistant professor, 1952-59, Columbia University; assistant professor, 1960-67, associate professor, 1967-73, professor, 1973-78, and chair of the Department of English, 1973-76, University of California, Los Angeles; professor of English, State University of New York, Stony Brook, 1978-92, distinguished professor, University of California, Berkeley, 1993—. Awards: American Council of Learned Societies grant, 1962; Guggenheim fellowship, 1962; National Book Critics Circle award, 1979. Named Literary Lion, New York Public Library, 1994. D.Litt.: National University, Ireland, 1994; Amherst College, 1995. Agent: Robin Straus Agency, Inc., 229 E. 79th St., New York, New York 10021, U.S.A. Address: Department of English, State University of New York, Stony Brook, New York 11794, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Year of the French. New York, Holt Rinehart, and London, Macmillan, 1979.

The Tenants of Time. New York, Dutton, and London, Bantam, 1988. The End of the Hunt. New York, Dutton, 1994.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Cold Winds of Adesta" April 1952, "The Point of Honor" December 1952, "The Lion's Mane" March 1953, "This Will Do Nicely" August 1955, "The Customs of the Country" July 1956, and "Suppose You Were on the Jury" March 1958, all in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine (New York).

"The Fine Italian Hand," in *Ellery Queen's Book of First Appear*ances, edited by Ellery Queen and Eleanor Sullivan. New York, Dial Press, 1982.

Other

The Irish Novelists 1800–1850. New York, Columbia University Press, 1959.

* * *

Thomas Flanagan has written three novels of historical fiction that describe some of the most turbulent episodes in the history of Ireland. His first novel, The Year of the French, was based on an actual historical event in which a French military force landed at Killala, County Mayo, Ireland on 22 August 1798. The French, who came ostensibly to free Ireland from British rule, were apparently more interested in embarrassing and harassing the English than in actually aiding the Irish. The French troops were joined by many peasants and various Irish rebel organizations. After marching through much of western and central Eire and winning several battles, they were eventually badly defeated at Ballinamuk, near Longford, by a vastly superior army led by Lord Cornwallis, whose success redeemed his tarnished experience in America. One of the most fascinating aspects of Flanagan's novel, which gives it an epic quality, is his attempt to portray in depth all sides and viewpoints in the conflict: the high-born and the peasants, the Catholics and the Protestants, the French, Irish, and British military units, the clergy, the schoolmasters, the merchants—these and other groups are delineated with flesh and blood realization. At one point Flanagan even switches the scene to England and conveys a memorable portrait of an absentee landlord. Among the personages who beguile the reader are Arthur Broome, the local Anglican clergyman in Killala; Owen MacCarthy, the heavy-drinking itinerant poet and hedgerow schoolmaster; Jean-Joseph Humbert, the wily, pragmatic French general; Malcolm Elliott, an upper-class Protestant estate holder committed to a more equitable economic order; and Captain Ferdy O'Donnell, a courageous, sensitive rebel leader.

Fictional characters are interrelated with real-life figures such as Wolfe Tone, George and John Moore, Dennis Browne, and Maria Edgeworth. The social, political, economic, and historical background and climate are presented and examined in thorough detail. Flanagan effectively intersperses dialogue and description with numerous imaginary diaries and memoirs of the era, and this technique adds immeasurably to the verisimilitude.

The novel is also distinguished by capturing the scene with marvellously rendered poetic lyricism exemplified in both the written and spoken language of the period. The book is a mellifluous delight—many of the pages are sheer poetry glowing with beauty and picturesque phrasing. Further, The Year of the French possesses considerable narrative drive.

The book is not without flaws. Flanagan's portrayal of the Catholic clergy is virulently hostile, whereas the Protestant ministers are always presented as decent individuals. Flanagan also understates the suffering and oppression the common people had to endured. He takes a distastefully snobbish attitude toward them on several occasions. He also unduly fantasizes about a magical humanitarian union between Catholics and Protestants, which is certainly desirable but, as he presents it, totally unconvincing.

Flanagan's second novel, The Tenants of Time, deals with the Fenian Rising in Kilpeder in 1867, the Land Wars, the Phoenix Park killings, and the career of Charles Stewart Parnell. Although Flanagan still conveys vividly the beauty of the Irish countryside and the lilt of the language, this novel does not have the consistency of lyricism that distinguished his previous book. Flanagan's poetic sensibility is effective in portraying the old Fenian schoolmaster Hugh MacMahon; at other times the prose is frequently flat and uninspired. Flanagan tries also to present too many characters in too many different locations. As a consequence, the book frequently becomes sketchy and superficial.

The End of the Hunt, Flanagan's third novel, however, recaptures much of the force, lyricism, and convincing historical re-creation of his first book. He now focuses on the violent years after the 1916 Easter Rebellion when Irish rebel forces fought the English with guerrilla-style warfare and, then, after the British had granted the country Free State status, a civil war broke out between those Irish groups who wanted a Republic, completely independent of England, and their fellow countrymen who were willing to accept the Free State arrangement. Flanagan depicts with considerable force the conflicts, betrayals, terrorism, and treachery that marked this era. Numerous scenes are unforgettable, with Frank Lacy's ambush at Dawson Crossings typical of the intensity of Flanagan's descriptions. Once again, historical personages, such as Eamon DeValera, Winston Churchill, and rebel leader Michael Collins, enter the narrative. Flanagan succeeds once more in conveying the musicality of the Irish language, whether spoken by uneducated farmers or by the intellectual leaders of the rebellion during battles, or in secret hideouts, or in the back rooms of public houses. The realism of speech and characterization is compelling, and the historical events in themselves provide a fast-paced, natural narrative movement.

The novel's only serious weakness is the love story between well-bred rebel Christopher Blake and the widowed Janice Nugent. It is obvious that this material has been superimposed on the narrative to add romantic interest. In general, throughout his writings, Flanagan is not as sure-handed in portraying female characters as he is in describing males.

After the relative failure of his second novel, several critics felt that Flanagan would not continue to write gripping fiction. His latest novel, however, disproves that notion and gives hope for more successful novels in the future.

—Paul A. Doyle

FOOTE, Shelby

Nationality: American. Born: Greenville, Mississippi, 17 November 1916. Education: The University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1935–37. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1940-44: Captain, and Marine Corps, 1944-45. Family: Married Gwyn Rainer in 1956 (second marriage); two children. Career: Novelist-in-residence, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, November 1963; playwright-in-residence, Arena Stage, Washington, D.C., 1963–64; writer-in-residence, Hollins College, Virginia, 1968. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship, 1955, 1956, 1957; Ford fellowship, for drama, 1963; Fletcher Pratt award, for non-fiction, 1964, 1974; University of North Carolina award, 1975; Dos Passos prize for Literature, 1988; Charles Frankel award, 1992; St. Louis Literary award, 1992; Nevins-Freeman award, 1992; New York Public Library Literary Lion, 1994, 1998; Ingersoll-Weaver award, 1997; Richard Wright award, 1997. D.Litt.: University of the South, Sewanee, Tennessee, 1981; Southwestern University, Memphis, Tennessee, 1982; University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1992; University of South Carolina, 1991; University of Notre Dame, South Bend, Indiana, 1994; College of William & Mary, 1999; Loyola University, 1999. Member: Society of American Historians, 1980; American Academy of Arts and Letters, 1994. Address: 542 East Parkway South, Memphis, Tennessee 38104, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Tournament. New York, Dial Press, 1949.

Follow Me Down. New York, Dial Press, 1950; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1951.

Love in a Dry Season. New York, Dial Press, 1951. Shiloh. New York, Dial Press, 1952.

Jordan County: A Landscape in Narrative (includes stories). New York, Dial Press, 1954.

September September. New York, Random House, 1978. Ride Out. New York, Modern Library, 1996.

Plays

Jordan County: A Landscape in the Round (produced Washington, D.C., 1964).

Other

The Civil War: A Narrative:

Fort Sumter to Perryville. New York, Random House, 1958; London, Bodley Head, 1991.

Fredericksburg to Meridian. New York, Random House, 1963; London, Bodley Head, 1991.

Red River to Appointox. New York, Random House, 1974; London, Bodley Head, 1991.

The Novelist's View of History. Winston-Salem, North Carolina, Palaemon Press, 1981.

Conversations with Shelby Foote, edited by William C. Carter. Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1989.

Stars in Their Courses: The Gettysburg Campaign, June-July 1863. New York, Random House, 1994.

The Beleaguered City: The Vicksburg Campaign, December 1862-July 1863. New York, Random House, 1995.

The Correspondence of Shelby Foote and Walker Percy, edited by Jay Tolson. New York, Norton, 1997.

Editor, Anton Chekhov: Later Short Stories, 1888–1903, translated by Constance Garnett. New York, Modern Library, 1999.

*

Manuscript Collection: Southern Historical Collection, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, North Carolina.

Critical Studies: "Shelby Foote Issue" (includes bibliography) of Mississippi Quarterly (State College), October 1971, and Delta (Montpellier, France), 1977; Shelby Foote by Helen White and Redding Sugg, Boston, Twayne, 1982; Shelby Foote: Novelist and Historian by Robert L. Phillips, University of Mississippi Press, 1992.

* * *

Shelby Foote appears to succeed as a historian, not as a novelist; his multi-volume history The Civil War: A Narrative shows his ability to best advantage. However, one should remember that his entree into the literary world came as a promising novelist. His novels show a serious craftsman at work.

Foote experimented with technique. Tournament is a character study—approaching biography—with an objective omniscient point of view. Follow Me Down takes a single plot but incorporates a multiple point of view. This method is interesting because it allows eight characters—including protagonist and minor characters—to comment in a limited first person viewpoint on their reactions to a violent murder. Love in a Dry Season is a tour de force in which the author links two separate stories centered on the subject of money by a character who tries and fails to obtain a place in the financial elite of a small delta town. Shiloh enters the domain of historical fiction as the author recreates that Civil War battle through the eyes of six soldiers from both camps. Unlike the viewers in Follow Me Down, these narrators describe different aspects of the three-day confrontation, and only by adroit maneuvering does the author bring the respective narratives into contact. The battle, therefore becomes the hero of the novel. Jordan County is a collection of seven tales or episodes ranging from 1950 backwards to 1797. In each case the locale is Bristol, Jordan County, Mississippi. As his previous novel focused on a single battle, so this chronicles human drama of a fictional area, which becomes the only constant in a world of flux.

With the exception of his historical novel, all of Foote's novels are located in his microcosm, the delta country around Lake Jordan. This fictive locale includes two counties, Issawamba and Jordan, Solitaire Planatation, and the town of Bristol on the Mississippi River. Through a habit of cross reference, Foote links episodes from one novel to another. For instance, the novella "Pillar of Fire" (Jordan County) relates the story of Isaac Jameson, founder of Solitaire Plantation and a patriarch of the delta, while Tournament supplies information about the man, Hugh Bart, who brought Solitare back from devastation by war and reconstruction.

Foote's use of setting, as well as style, subject matter, themes, and characterization, invites comparison with his geographical neighbor, Faulkner, but Foote's accomplishments suffer thereby. Foote is competent, not great. Normally his style is simple, lean, and direct; it seldom takes on richly suggestive qualities. Most of his themes move in the negative, anti-social direction: violence instead of peace; lust rather than love; avarice, power, and pride instead of self-sacrifice; and loneliness rather than participation in community. At his best Foote deals effectively with dramatic situations and characterizations, for example, the concatenation of episodes in the life of Hugh Bart or Luther Eustis's murder (Follow Me Down); however, Harley Drew's career (Love in a Dry Season) of lust and avarice seems an exploitation of violence rather than art. Foote chronicles events in the realistic tradition without conveying a larger insight than the particular—an insight necessary for him to achieve a significant place in southern literature.

During the 1990s, Foote produced Ride Out, which attracted little critical attention—particularly when compared to his nonfiction efforts. The latter included, in addition to his writing on the Civil War, a book of correspondence with Walker Percy and a collection of Chekhov's stories, which Foote edited.

—Anderson Clark

FORD, Richard

Nationality: American. Born: Jackson, Mississippi, 16 February 1944. Education: Public schools in Jackson, 1950–62; Michigan State University, East Lansing, 1962–66, B.A. 1966; Washington University Law School, St. Louis, 1967–68; University of California, Berkeley, 1968–70, M.A. 1970. Family: Married Kristina Hensley in 1968. Career: Assistant professor of English, Williams College, Williamstown, Massachusetts, 1978–79; lecturer, Princeton University, New Jersey, 1980–81; teacher, Harvard University, 1994. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship, 1977; National Endowment for the Arts fellowship, 1978, 1983; New York Public Library Literary Lion award, 1989; American Academy award, 1989; Echoing Green Foundation award, 1991; Pulitzer Prize for fiction, 1997. Agent: Amanda Urban, International Creative Management, 40 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10023–2031, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Piece of My Heart. New York, Harper, 1976; London, Collins, 1987.

The Ultimate Good Luck. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1981; London, Collins, 1989.

The Sportswriter. New York, Vintage, and London, Collins, 1986.Wildlife. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, and London, Collins, 1990.

Independence Day. New York, Knopf, 1995.

Short Stories

Rock Springs. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1987; London, Collins, 1988.

Women with Men: Three Stories. New York, Knopf, 1997.

Play

Screenplay: Bright Angel, 1991.

Other

Editor, with Shannon Ravenel, The Best American Short Stories 1990. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1990.

Editor, The Granta Book of the American Short Story. London, Granta, 1991.

Editor, The Essential Tales of Chekhov. New York, Ecco Press, 2000.

*

Critical Studies: Perspectives on Richard Ford, edited by Huey Guagliardo. Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 2000; Richard Ford by Elinor Walker. New York, Twayne, 2000.

Richard Ford comments:

I'm stymied in an attempt to introduce my work. I wish I could write something about it that would make it seem wonderful and irresistible. My belief is, though, that anybody's work ought to introduce itself from its first moment, and I would prefer to take my chances that way rather than to put on the critic's cap regarding my own efforts or risk confusing my later opinions about my book or my story or my essay with any of their actual effects. Writers, in my experience, often gain very lofty opinions of their oeuvres once their oeuvres are out of writerly control. Any number of wondrous intentions, structures, and philosophical underpinnings can be made to dress up a simple story after the fact. I've probably been guilty of it myself, though it's only human.

* * *

Near the end of The Sportswriter, Frank Bascombe tells a young woman in whom he's interested that he never lets himself feel sorry for anyone he writes about, "since the next person you're liable to feel sorry for is you, and then you're in real trouble." While the settings of Richard Ford's fiction range from Montana to Arkansas to Mexico to New Jersey, his theme seems to remain constant. Emotional entanglements—with others, with the self—are to be avoided.

In A Piece of My Heart, after eight years of marriage to Jackie, Robard Hewes leaves their home in Bishop, California, and drives his truck to the Arkansas bank of the Mississippi River. There, in the sleepy town of Helena, he takes up again with Beuna, with whom he had a brief affair 12 years earlier. He has been led to do this because for a year Beuna, married to an obsessed minor-league pitcher, has been writing him letters persuading him to come see her and renew their affair. Robard, whose own marriage has lost some of its flavor, knows that fooling with another man's wife is risky business. But having made his decision to do it, he is bent on carrying out his mission

In Arkansas, Robard encounters Sam Newel, just down from Chicago, where he was about to complete his education in the law. The two men end up sharing quarters on an island that is the destination of hunting parties from out of state. Sam has been urged to spend some time on the island by his girlfriend Beebe, who thinks Sam needs to raise his "tolerance for ambiguity" and to learn to keep going "when nothing is very clearly defined," a notion that sounds very much like the poet John Keats's "negative capability."

Although it is obvious that Sam has a precarious hold on life, Robard does not like him or offer him anything resembling pity. Nor does Sam see anything in Robard worthy of his respect. Sam, burdened with intellect and guilt, thinks Robard is an impulsive fool. That Robard is not a reflective person clearly, in the view of the author, is very much to his credit; when called by his instincts, Robard acts. Sam's troubles are due to his willingness to dwell on the same old issues.

A Piece of My Heart is divided into seven parts. The first and last and two parts in the middle are Robard's; three alternate parts in the middle are Sam's. The effect of this path-crossing is that Sam is moved away from his Hamlet-like tendencies and Robard begins to reflect, in particular to realize his mistake in leaving Jackie. His realization, though, comes too late, for he is shot as a trespasser before he can start back to California.

Ford's second novel, The Ultimate Good Luck, is about 31-year-old Harry Quinn's adventures in Oaxaca, Mexico, where he is trying to gain the release from prison of a young American drug smuggler. Quinn is a more thoughtful Robard. Just as Robard left Jackie, Quinn too let a good woman get away from him. But he is given a chance to get Rae back when she writes and asks whether he would be interested in helping to get her brother out of a Mexican prison. As a former Marine helicopter pilot in Vietnam, Quinn has the skills and cast of mind needed for dealing with corrupt prison officials and the Mexican underworld.

Unlike Sam Newel, Quinn, despite the horrors of Vietnam, will not let the past take hold of him. He is determined to live in the present, free of anxiety. Quinn is convinced that the ultimate good luck comes only to those who live in the present. What Quinn learns, though, is that even living in the present is not sufficient for outrunning loneliness. Thus he is glad for the opportunity to win Rae back.

Quinn, whose language is spare and hardboiled, is a typical Ford protagonist. In language and temperament, Quinn is very much a descendent of Ernest Hemingway's heroes. Near the beginning of this novel is one of the best pieces of descriptive prose to be found in all of Ford's writing, and it too is reminiscent of Hemingway. It is a description of two teenage Mexican boys boxing. At first they haven't the heart to hit each other, but the bout ends with one boy poking the other's eyeball out of its socket.

The Sportswriter is Ford's best-known novel. His protagonist, Frank Bascombe, has a Hemingway-esque attraction to contests of strength and skill. But while Hemingway's characters enlist in wars and gather at bullfights, Bascombe is drawn to the safer, relatively antiseptic world of sports. After the death of his young son, Bascombe quits writing fiction (where clearly the more rigorous existential challenges lie) for sports writing because sports teach that there are "no transcendent themes in life": "When a contest is over, it's over, finished. That's the way life is, and any other view is a lie. Athletes are completely happy living in the present."

Though these thoughts echo Quinn's desires to live only in the present, Bascombe is more reminiscent of T. S. Eliot's Prufrock, or Mary McCarthy's Peter Levi, than a Hemingway protagonist. Bascombe thinks and observes but cannot act. When an acquaintance who clearly is suicidal reaches out to him after they have been on a fishing trip off the Jersey coast, Bascombe responds with anything but compassion. His only action is non-action: constant internal philosophizing that helps him maintain his emotional distance but accomplishes little else. He knows that "for your life to be worth anything you must sooner or later face the possibility of terrible, searing regret. Though you must also manage to avoid it or your life will be ruined."

Bascombe returns in Independence Day, the sequel to The Sportswriter. He has changed careers again—he's now a real estate agent—and moved into his ex-wife's house in the fictional town of Haddam, New Jersey. His investment in "homes" suggests a yearning for attachment. Independence Day indeed portrays Bascombe's shift from what he calls his "Existence Period"—detached bachelorhood without crisis—to his consideration of "The Permanent Period" of marriage and a deeper commitment to fatherhood. "Independence" here represents the freedom to move toward such intimacy. But in the end, "The Permanent Period" remains a concept. Like Prufrock pondering the peach, Bascombe does not act. Watching the Fourth of July Parade in the closing scene of the book, he only feels "the push, pull, the wave and sway of others" from a distance.

In Women with Men, a collection of three novellas, Ford's protagonists continue to wallow in these cerebral epiphanies. They think themselves to the truth, or at least to deeper insight, but they either do not act at all, or their actions degenerate into aimlessness. The fruitlessness of his characters' contemplations begs the question: What is the value of epiphany without action?

In "The Womanizer," Austin, a happily married man, leaves his wife to take up with a French divorcee. Certainly this is an action, a way of seizing control of one's romantic fate, of turning decisively away from commitment. Yet this pursuit fails terribly. On an outing, Austin loses sight of his lover's young son. The boy is molested, and Austin's affair ends bitterly as a result. Austin blames himself, then sinks into self-centered rumination: "How could you regulate life, do little harm and still be attached to others?" He might as well be asking, "How do you get everything you want without consequences or mistakes?"—more a childish plaint than a serious existential query.

Ironically, his much younger teenage protagonist in "Jealous" seems more willing to accept limits of desire. He yearns for his flirty Aunt Doris, and even gets close enough to think "she was going to kiss'' him. His heart-pounding panic when she doesn't, though, is short-lived. He tells himself: "it's you who's causing it, and you who has to stop it." He lets himself revel in the closeness she does allow him, a moment of contentment before the selfish hungers of adulthood get a chance to overtake him.

Adult responsibility, in Ford's world, is usually up to female characters. Men leave their children for new lives. Women reject lovers who cannot protect their children. Even when children are not in the picture, women are able to take control in a way Ford's men can only sadly marvel at. Helen in "Occidentals" insists on being responsible for the terms of her life and her death. Matthews is awed by her actions, but, like so many of Ford's male characters, can only ponder what is missing in his own life: the "spiritual component she'd wanted," the dignity and status of a man committed to something beyond himself.

-Paul Marx, updated by Lisa A. Phillips

FORSTER, Margaret

Nationality: British. Born: Carlisle, Cumberland, 25 May 1938. Education: Carlisle and County High School for Girls, 1949–56; Somerville College, Oxford (scholar), 1957–60, B.A. in modern history 1960. Family: Married the writer Hunter Davies in 1960; two daughters and one son. Career: Teacher, Barnsbury Girls' School, London, 1961–63; chief non-fiction reviewer, London Evening Standard, 1977–80. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1975. Agent: Tessa Sayle Agency, 11 Jubilee Place, London SW3 3TE. Address: 11 Boscastle Road, London NW5 1EE, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Dames' Delight. London, Cape, 1964.

Georgy Girl. London, Secker and Warburg, 1965; New York, Berkley, 1966.

The Bogeyman. London, Secker and Warburg, 1965; New York, Putnam, 1966.

The Travels of Maudie Tipstaff. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Stein and Day, 1967.

The Park. London, Secker and Warburg, 1968.

Miss Owen-Owen Is at Home. London, Secker and Warburg, 1969; as Miss Owen-Owen, New York, Simon and Schuster, 1969.

Fenella Phizackerley. London, Secker and Warburg, 1970; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1971.

Mr. Bone's Retreat. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1971.

The Seduction of Mrs. Pendlebury. London, Secker and Warburg, 1974.

Mother Can You Hear Me? London, Secker and Warburg, 1979.

The Bride of Lowther Fell: A Romance. London, Secker and Warburg, 1980; New York, Atheneum, 1981.

Marital Rites. London, Secker and Warburg, 1981; New York, Atheneum, 1982.

Private Papers. London, Chatto and Windus, 1986.

Have the Men Had Enough? London, Chatto and Windus, 1989.

Lady's Maid. London, Chatto and Windus, 1990; New York, Doubleday, 1991.

The Battle for Christabel. London, Chatto and Windus, 1991.

Mothers' Boys. London, Chatto and Windus, 1994.

Shadow Baby. London, Chatto & Windus, 1996.

Play

Screenplay: Georgy Girl, with Peter Nichols, 1966.

Other

The Rash Adventurer: The Rise and Fall of Charles Edward Stuart. London, Secker and Warburg, 1973; New York, Stein and Day, 1974.

William Makespeace Thackeray: Memoirs of a Victorian Gentleman. London, Secker and Warburg, 1978; as Memoirs of a Victorian Gentleman, New York, Morrow, 1979.

Significant Sisters: The Grassroots of Active Feminism 1839–1939. London, Secker and Warburg, 1984; New York, Knopf, 1985.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning: A Biography. London, Chatto and Windus, 1988; New York, Doubleday, 1989.

Daphne du Maurier: A Biography. London, Chatto and Windus, and New York, Doubleday, 1993.

Hidden Lives: A Family Memoir. New York, Viking, 1995.

Rich Desserts and Captain's Thin: A Family and Their Times, 1831–1931. London, Chatto & Windus, 1997.

Precious Lives. Thorndike, Maine, Thorndike Press, 1999.

Editor, Drawn from Life: The Journalism of William Makepeace Thackeray. London, Folio, 1984.

Editor, Selected Poems of Elizabeth Barrett Browning. London, Chatto and Windus, and Baltimore, Johns Hopkins University Press, 1988.

* * *

Since the publication of her first novel, Dames' Delight, more than twenty-five years ago, Margaret Forster has written well over a dozen novels. In all of them she is preoccupied with human relationships or, to put it more precisely, with the impact of one person on another, with the possibility—or impossibility—of any real change in someone's character and outlook on life through emotional involvement with someone else. (She seems to declare her interest in character in the very choice of her titles; it is hardly an accident that so many of her novels carry someone's name, that badge of personal identity, in the title.)

Hers is a characteristically feminine preoccupation; even today love, whether within or outside marriage, or between those tied by the unbreakable blood knot, remains all-important to women, and Forster acknowledges this. Her perception of the impact of love seems to have changed somewhat, grown softer perhaps, over the years. In Georgy Girl behind all the clowning and laughter there hides a bleak, loveless little world, and George herself, so full of fierce, all-embracing love for children, has very little real lasting love to spare for her relationships with adults. In The Travels of Maudie Tipstaff Maudie, disappointed with her visits to her children, readily accepts the explanation of her disappointment offered in her son Robert's chilling words: "Two people are always two people ... I'm on my own, and you, Mother, are on your own." In Mr. Bone's Retreat, however, we sense a change; Mr. Bone retreats indeed from his position of determined non-involvement, and slowly and with hesitation comes to accept the possibility of receiving graciously the love that is offered: "Love had to be accepted. The quality of the gift was what mattered."

The process of change does not, however, culminate in the happy ending of a romantic novel. In The Seduction of Mrs. Pendlebury Alice Oram nearly destroys Mrs. Pendlebury by demanding love and reassurance for her own doubts and insecurities which Rose Pendlebury cannot give. Her demands cannot be met because a personality cannot change totally without breaking in the violence of the change; the relationship between the two women sours into obsession and near madness. As in Mr. Bone's Retreat the young intruder acts as a catalyst, while remaining largely unchanged herself; her resilience and her strength in the possession of a future full of rich possibilities save her from disaster. For Mrs. Pendlebury salvation lies in flight to the isolation of a small seaside bungalow, set well back from its neighbors and screened so well by trees. However powerful human relationships are, they cannot radically alter a person's character, and tampering with people is a dangerous hobby.

In two more recent novels, The Bride of Lowther Fell and Marital Rites, the note of cautious acceptance of love is sounded more clearly. Alexandra, the liberated young woman in The Bridge of Lowther Fell, admits at the very end of her tale: "The lessons are learned. No man is an island, and no woman either." In Marital Rites, though Robert and Anna Osgood come through their marriage crisis shattered and diminished, marriage itself, the conventional and convenient symbol of lasting love, survives triumphant; the value of giving and accepting love, and being altered by it, is tacitly acknowledged. The love between mother and daughter, crippling and even destructive, is the theme of Private Papers and Have the Men Had Enough? Though the emphasis in both novels is on the negative aspects of the relationship, yet affection and love are both there, implicit or openly declared.

There is always a touch of irony in a human relationship, in its misconceptions, its wishful attempts to make others see us as we see ourselves. Forster recognizes this irony and uses it, sometimes as part of the very structure of her novels. Not always as overtly as in Mother Can You Hear Me? where Angela's struggle against the emotional demands of her elderly mother is counterpointed by italicized passages recording her vain attempts to bring up her own daughter free of the crushing burden of filial guilt. A similar device is employed in Private Papers where Mrs. Butler's written record of her family's history is mocked and contradicted by her eldest daughter's interpolations, giving a radically different version of the same events. In The Travels of Maudie Tipstaff, too, Maudie's picture of herself and her children's perception of her behavior are offered with silent irony, the mutual miscomprehensions stressing the theme of human isolation. In The Seduction of Mrs. Pendlebury and in Mr. Bone's Retreat the same technique is used more subtly, and instead of the juxtaposition of two contrasting pictures there are oblique backward glances, slowly altering a remembered incident or conversation.

In all her novels Forster's style is plain, deliberately downbeat, letting the pathos and the irony speak for themselves. The impersonal third-person narrator tells the story in short sentences, except when—as in The Seduction of Mrs. Pendelbury—she is voicing the thoughts of her characters. Then the sentences stretch and curl, following the course of thought. In her more recent novels Forster dispenses with the impersonal narrator, using instead the diary form (in Private Papers) or two first-person narrators speaking in turn (in Have the Men Had Enough?). Though in Lady's Maid the impersonal authorial voice is heard again, it is interrupted by Elizabeth Wilson's letters, the plain, bleak style matching the drab existence of Elizabeth Barrett Browning's maid.

Like so many women novelists writing today, Forster has a sharp eye for domestic detail, for the social comedy of our times. She is very much a town dweller (except in The Bride of Lowther Fell where she clearly draws on her Cumbrian memories, as well as—nostalgically—on those of North London). She can sum up in a few telling phrases the gentrification process in Islington (''large removal van, stacked with pine tables and brass bedsteads''), a council house in Cornwall ("The cheap cotton, flowered curtains had never fitted and let in too much light''), middle-class life in Highgate (instant coffee always offered with apologies, a sluttish daily help tolerated as a sop to social conscience). All this has been done often, but is done here extremely well. (It should be added that in Have the Men Had Enough?, written from personal experience of the effect of senile dementia on a family, comedy turns to tragedy in the well-observed scenes in the geriatric ward of a mental hospital.)

She reproduces variants of speech with equal accuracy. Her characters come to us with full credentials of class and educational background. It is when she moves beyond the everyday that her skill fails her. Larger-than-life characters like the eponymous Miss Owen-Owen and Fenella Phizackerley may astonish us by their behavior, but they do not convince. Over Miss Owen-Owen the shadow of Miss Jean Brodie lies very heavily indeed; Fenella, the reader of popular women's magazines imprisoned inside a creature of breath-taking beauty, remains the impossible heroine of some extravagant fairy tale. The heroine of The Bride of Lowther Fell (a book subtitled "a Romance," and boldly inviting by its very title a comparison with the Victorian novel) is no more convincing than the contrived plot. It is interesting to note here that in her recent novel Lady's Maid Forster turns from pastiche Victorian romance to a realistic, disturbing picture of that endlessly fascinating period.

Forster's skills as a biographer of William Makepeace Thackeray, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, and Daphne du Maurier inform her fiction, particularly in Lady's Maid, a novel centered on the relationship between the Victorian poet Elizabeth Barrett Browning and her maid, Elizabeth Wilson. Issues of character development and the centrality of a well-articulated point of view, especially for her female characters in the novel Shadow Baby, are important features of Forster's work. Experimentation with variations in point of view—a hallmark of her fictionalized autobiographical memoir of Thackerayand a sympathetic treatment of the questions about sexuality in the non-fiction life of Daphne du Maurier influence the innovations and challenges Forster creates for herself as a writer of fiction. Shadow Baby is particularly intriguing in its manipulations of point of view and in its Gothic indebtedness to both du Maurier's example and to the novels of Dickens and Bronte that Forster read when she was growing up. In Lady's Maid Forster also foregrounds issues of class tensions and differences between the poor working class maid and the indulgently comfortable and cripplingly neurotic Victorian lady-concerns about class well-articulated in Dickens's novels.

In a family biography she wrote of her grandmother's life, Hidden Lives, Forster had tried to trace the life history of her grandmother's illegitimate daughter, and details of her inquiry found their way into Shadow Baby, a novel itself suffused with an air of mystery. Because of shifts in point of view between the nineteenth-century mother-daughter pair, Leah and Evie, and the twentieth-century daughter Shona and her mother, Hazel, and the narratives of why these abandoned daughters are, indeed, "shadows," the reader is actively engaged in solving a mystery. The mystery goes to the dark heart of motherhood itself, the trauma of separation for a daughter, and the madness of obsession. In this respect, the concerns of Shadow Baby are the recurrent themes of Forster's earlier work in Private Papers and Have the Men Had Enough? In Forster's work motherhood is, at best, an ambivalently experienced phenomenon.

-Hana Sambrook, updated by Roberta Schreyer

FORSYTH, Frederick

Nationality: British. Born: Ashford, Kent, in 1938. Education: Tonbridge School, Kent. Military Service: Served in the Royal Air Force 1956–58. Family: Married Carrie Forsyth in 1973; two sons. Career: Journalist, Eastern Daily Press, Norwich, and in King's Lynn, Norfolk, 1958–61; reporter for Reuters, London, Paris, and East Berlin, 1961–65; reporter, BBC Radio and Television, London, 1965–67; assistant diplomatic correspondent, BBC, 1967–68; freelance journalist in Nigeria, 1968–70; television presenter, Soldiers series, 1985, and Frederick Forsyth Presents series, 1989–90. Lives in London. Awards: Mystery Writers of America Edgar Allan Poe award, 1971, 1983. Address: c/o Hutchinson Pub Group Ltd., 62–65 Chandos Pl, London WC2N 4NW, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Day of the Jackal. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Viking Press. 1971.

The Odessa File. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Viking Press, 1972.

The Dogs of War. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Viking Press, 1974.

The Shepherd. London, Hutchinson, 1975; New York, Viking Press, 1976.

The Devil's Alternative. London, Hutchinson, 1979; New York, Viking Press, 1980.

The Fourth Protocol. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Viking Press, 1984.

The Negotiator. London and New York, Bantam, 1989.

The Deceiver. London, Corgi, and New York, Bantam, 1991.

The Fist of God. London and New York, Bantam, 1994.

Icon. New York, Bantam Books, 1996.

The Phantom of Manhattan. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1999.

Short Stories

No Comebacks: Collected Short Stories. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Viking Press, 1982.

Play

Screenplay: The Fourth Protocol, 1987.

Other

The Biafra Story. London, Penguin, 1969; as The Making of an African Legend: The Biafra Story, 1977.

Emeka (biography of Chukwuemeka Odumegwu-Ojukwu). Ibadan, Spectrum, 1982.

Editor, Great Flying Stories. Rockland, Massachusetts, Wheeler Publishing, 1996.

* * *

Although he is known exclusively as the author of political thrillers, Frederick Forsyth announced in 1999 that he was forsaking that genre and turning to other forms of fiction. In the twenty-five years between The Day of the Jackal and Icon, Forsyth published a series of novels following the same basic formula: start with a plausible international crisis; keep a number of narrative threads moving at all times; scatter violent and/or erotic incidents liberally through the story; explain in minute detail the techniques employed by criminals, terrorists, undercover agents, police; build toward an explosive climax; end with an unexpected but satisfying twist of plot. The formula has produced nine bestsellers, all a notch above standard popular fare, most made, or likely to be made, into popular films.

The Day of the Jackal, the first in the series and still widely regarded as the best, established the pattern Forsyth was to follow. A group of disgruntled veterans of the Algerian war hire a professional assassin from England, code-named the Jackal, to kill President De Gaulle for betraying the French cause in North Africa. Forsyth adds an abundance of peripheral plots and characters, many based on actual events of the time. We are jolted back and forth between two centers of intrigue: the solitary assassin meticulously planning each step of the murder and the special police unit trying to track him down. Forsyth's fascination with detail draws us into the story. We learn how to acquire false passports, how to obtain a custom-made rifle, how to travel around Europe under a variety of identities, and how, conversely, police forces of different nations coordinate efforts to prevent the assassination. Facing a complex plot and an overabundance of characters, we follow events without understanding the human motives behind them. But though we never get inside the main figure, the Jackal, we are willing to ascribe it to the nature of the character: a professional assassin keeping his own counsel, revealing nothing of himself to anyone. Thus a fundamental shortcoming in Forsyth's work, an unwillingness or inability to create convincing characters, works to his advantage in The Day of the Jackal.

The same flaw is more apparent, but less defensible, in the novels that followed. The Odessa File concerns a young German journalist's attempt to infiltrate an organization of influential former SS officers and to locate one war criminal in particular. The theme of hunter and hunted is repeated from the earlier book, but the absence of full characters seems glaring here. So too with The Dogs of War, a novel about mercenaries overthrowing an African dictator, and The Devil's Alternative, about a series of international events that brings the world to the brink of nuclear war. In The Fourth Protocol, however, as in The Day of the Jackal, the more shadowy the people, the more real they seem. The novel describes an ingeniously complex Soviet plot to undermine the British government, with intelligence experts from each side anticipating and thwarting each other's moves.

The Negotiator follows the Forsyth formula to a point, with the kidnapping and murder of a liberal American president's son serving as the entree into a more complicated story of right-wing conspiracies in both the Soviet Union and the United States to undermine stability in the Middle East. Atypically, Forsyth tries, without much success, to humanize his title character by creating a love interest for the otherwise solitary hero. Another solitary hero is Sam McCready, the unifying figure in The Deceiver, which contains four stories of counterespionage. McCready, a veteran agent of British Intelligence, personally outwits such enemies of freedom as the Soviets, Libyans, IRA, Castro, and Colombian drug lords. A recurring theme is the careerism or ineptitude of MIA and CIA bureaucrats whose rules McCready must violate to defeat an enemy who knows no rules.

Forsyth's plots have the short-term advantages and the long-term problems of dealing with topical world affairs. The Fist of God, set during the 1991 Gulf War, includes, in addition to its fictional characters, inside glimpses of the major players in that conflict: George Bush, Margaret Thatcher, Norman Schwarzkopf, and Saddam Hussein. Here Forsyth finds material to fit his strengths: international intrigue, behind-the-scenes manipulation of events, and weapons derived from high technology. The novel works well because the Gulf War event lends itself to the Forsyth formula.

The latest and, unless he changes his mind, last of Forsyth's thrillers, Icon, describes a right-wing plot to take over the Russian government. Published in 1996 but set in 1999, it describes the chaotic political and economic condition of post-Soviet Russia. The plot is thwarted by an American intelligence agent working with Chechneyans and the Patriarch of the Orthodox Church. Especially interesting is Forsyth's use of the Aldrich Ames case, which is woven into the story, and which provides factual details of the real-life CIA counterintelligence officer who betrayed agents to the KGB. It is interesting to note that Forsyth cites the dissolution of the USSR—the major opposing force in world affairs—as one of the reasons he decided to turn away from the genre that he had mastered.

All Forsyth thrillers include a wealth of detail on matters well beyond the experience of their readers, yet they convey a compelling atmosphere of verisimilitude. We learn how experts make and plant bombs, smuggle weapons, infiltrate secret agencies; we learn how terrorists operate, how world leaders confer and conspire, how spies attend to their daily chores, how politicians manipulate events and their reporting. But all of this detail does not produce convincing human beings. The events seem real, at least plausible, but not the people.

Forsyth's first effort in a different genre, The Phantom of Manhattan, has received neither the critical nor popular success of his earlier books. Conceived as a sequel to Gaston Leroux's Phantom of the Opera (1911) and inspired by Forsyth's friendship with composer Andrew Lloyd Webber, it deals with the Phantom's exile to America, where he emerges as a business tycoon and builds a new opera house. Not unexpectedly, his protégé, Christine de Chagny, arrives with their twelve-year-old son to sing at the premiere. In deliberate contrast to his typical work, this one is considerably shorter (less than a fourth the length of his earlier novels) and is told not by a disinterested narrative voice but by its various characters (most of whom sound alike). The story, despite its potential for plot detail, seems summarized rather than narrated, as if it were an outline for a longer book or a sketch for a new musical. The length and style imitate Leroux's novel, keeping the many flaws of the source but losing its originality.

Forsyth's sense that he had exhausted the potential of his earlier genre is understandable, but his first failed attempt to move in a new direction underscores a point made in all of his political thrillers—that mastering a skill, whether for crime or its detection—requires a lifetime of careful preparation and attention to detail.

-Robert E. Lynch

FOSTER, David (Manning)

Nationality: Australian. Born: Sydney, New South Wales, 15 May 1944. Education: The University of Sydney, B.Sc. in chemistry 1967; Australian National University, Canberra, Ph.D. 1970. Family: Married 1) Robin Ruth Bowers in 1965 (marriage ended); 2) Gerda Hageraats in 1975; has four daughters and two sons. Career: Research fellow, U.S. Public Health Service, Philadephia, 1970–71; senior research officer, University of Sydney Medical School, 1971–72. Awards: Australian Literature Board fellowships, 1973–91; The Age award, 1974; Marten Bequest award, 1978; Australian National Book Council award, 1981; New South Wales Premier's fellowship, 1986; Australian creative fellowship, 1992–95; Miles Franklin Award, 1997. Address: Ardara, Bundanoon, New South Wales 2578, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Pure Land. Melbourne, Macmillan, 1974; New York, Penguin, 1985.

The Empathy Experiment, with D.K. Lyall. Sydney, Wild and Woolley, 1977.

Moonlite. Melbourne, Macmillan, 1981; London, Pan, 1982; New York, Penguin, 1987.

Plumbum. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1983.

Dog Rock: A Postal Pastoral. Ringwood, Victoria, and New York, Penguin, 1985.

The Adventures of Christian Rosy Cross. Ringwood, Victoria, London, and New York, Penguin, 1986.

Testostero. Ringwood, Victoria, and New York, Penguin, 1987.

The Pale Blue Crochet Coathanger Cover. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1988.

Mates of Mars. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1991.

The Glade within the Grove. Milsons Point, New South Wales, Australia, and New York, Vintage, 1996.

The Ballad of Erinungarah. Milsons Point, New South Wales, Australia, and New York, Vintage, 1997.

Short Stories

North South West: Three Novellas. Melbourne, Macmillan, 1973. Escape to Reality. Melbourne, Macmillan, 1977.

Hitting the Wall: Two Novellas. Ringwood, Victoria, and London, Penguin, 1989.

Poetry

The Fleeing Atalanta. Adelaide, Maximus, 1975.

Other

Studs and Nogs: Essays 1987–98. Milsons Point, New South Wales, Australia, and New York, Vintage, 1999.Editor, Self Portraits. Canberra, Australian National Library, 1991.

*

Manuscript Collection: Australian Defence Force Academy Library, Canberra.

* * *

David Foster's background as a scientist is very much in evidence in his fiction, in his interest in concepts such as entropy and in his vast and eclectic vocabulary, which is full of technical words. For instance, his first book, North South West, contains sentences such as "We will fall before their arrows as before the nematocysts of a coelenterate." The stories foreshadow Foster's directions in other ways too, in their ambivalent dichotomy of country and city and in the writer's political conservatism: "I functioned as the opponent of all liberalism," one of his characters says. In "Mobil Medley," a kind of latterday Canterbury Tales, there is again a significant remark from the narrator which is applicable to Foster's fiction in general. "His words never settled fully about the object, but created a diversion to themselves, leaving the naked."

Foster's second book and first novel, The Pure Land, is an unusual and at times parodic example of that familiar Australian fictive stand-by, the generational novel. Divided into three parts, it tells the stories of three generations of a family, with only minor connecting links between the largely discrete sections. Beginning in Sydney it crosses to the United States before returning to its original base and finally petering out in a series of unanswered letters. The Empathy Experiment is set some time in the future and in a city something like Canberra, to judge from its obsessive bureaucracy. It concerns a scientist named FX and his experiments in harnessing the forces of empathic identification with his subjects. Although there are mad puns and various bizarrely comic incidents, the book is less playful than most of Foster's work. What emerges eventually from the novel's frantic improvisation is an angry satire of scientific experimentation which ignores the rights of its victims. Escape to Reality is Foster's only collection of short fiction to date. Like much of his work, it is concerned with outsiders or outlaws of some kind, and is written in a coolly objective, unjudging way, often in the first person. The collection is full of voices, the narrator's and other characters', in the many dialogues. In the longest and best story, "The Job," the narrator Billie is a petty criminal who is picked up on his release by another petty criminal, Brian. The story follows a familiarly circular pattern, with Billie waiting outside the jail at the end to pick up another released man, just as Brian had waited for him.

By now Foster had made a mark as a writer but still gave the impression of a talent of considerable, if somewhat cerebral, intelligence, deeply uncertain as to the direction in which it wanted to go. It is with the novels of the 1980s and especially Moonlite, still probably the best work, that he seems to find that direction and that personal voice. It is a less coldly written but still ingenious narrative of the picaresque adventures of one Finbar ("Moonbar") MacBuffie which amount to something like an allegorical account of the history of immigration to Australia. It is a wittily parodic novel, reminiscent in many ways of John Barth and especially of The Sot-Weed Factor. Foster displays his characteristic fascination with language, using arcane or self-invented words, punning vigorously, giving characters names like the Marquis of Moneymore and Grogstrife and employing a variety of dialects as well as a multitude of satiric targets, from academic scholarship and Christianity through advocates of temperance to Australian myths of heroism and identity.

Plumbum is written in a mode which Foster makes his own from Moonlite onwards, a self-conscious but also surreal, highly inventive but sometimes irritatingly cerebral comedy. It concerns a group of young musicians who form a heavy metal band, but the satiric targets are lost in the medley of competing voices and increasingly frantic pace. Dog Rock is a country town, population 776 of which the narrator D'Arcy D'Oliveres has been postman for ten years. A murderer known only as the Queen's Park Ripper is terrorising the town's citizens by progressively eliminating them. The novel is a parody of the detective genre, with an abundance of improbable clues and an impossibly complicated plot. Foster returned to Dog Rock and D'Arcy D'Oliveres later with the slight but genially witty The Pale Blue Crochet Coathanger Cover.

The Adventures of Christian Rosy Cross, which Foster has said he considers his magnum opus, is another picaresque novel, or parody of one. Its hero is born in 1378, the son of Comte de Rosencreutz who manages to finish off his own wife by immediately after the birth engaging in violent sexual intercourse with her. The novel recounts his adventures up until the age of twenty-three, after which, we are told at the end, "By judicious speculation he acquires a modest income, and spends the remaining years of his life, till his death in 1483, keeping fit, playing the harpsichord, cultivating bulbs, arguing with his neighbour over who should build the new boundary fence, and striving to improve the local breed of dog." Foster speaks in his introduction of his conviction that our present age resembles that of Christian Rosy Cross but the connections he claims with modern parallels are tenuous and much of the humour is built on simpleminded juxtapositions between modern and medieval ("Would you care to see some filthy woodcuts?"). Testostero is sub-titled "a comic novel" but is in fact a laboured, tedious farce involving Noel Horniman, talented but ockerish Australian poet, and Leon Hunnybun, limp-wristed English aristocrat, who discover in the course of the novel that they are twins. Hitting the Wall is actually two novellas of which one, "The Job," is reprinted from Escape to Reality.

Foster revived D'Arcy D'Oliveres for The Glade within the Grove, which chronicles the postman's tenure in the small town of Obligna Creek. There he discovers an intriguing manuscript, by a mysterious author named "Orion"—and this later appeared as Foster's next novel, The Ballad of Erinungarah. Needless to say, the two books are meant to be read together.

On the face of it, Foster would seem to have an imagination as original and inventive as almost any contemporary Australian novelist, and he commands an astounding range of material. But that imagination seems difficult for him to harness, and like Barth and perhaps Thomas Pynchon, he reads better in bits and pieces than in toto. There are brilliantly original gags but no normative centre against which to place them. Perhaps he might do well to take note of one of his own witty scientific analogues from Plumbum: "You will sometimes see a middle-aged man holding the jaws of his mind open with every intellectual prop and pole at his disposal. In such a state he resembles a bivalve mollusc, constrained to sup whatever shit floats by."

-Laurie Clancy

FOWLES, John (Robert)

Nationality: British. Born: Leigh-on-Sea, Essex, 31 March 1926. Education: Bedford School, 1940–44; Edinburgh University, 1944; New College, Oxford, B.A. (honors) in French 1950. Military Service: Served in the Royal Marines, 1945–46. Family: Married Elizabeth Whitton in 1954 (deceased 1990); married Sarah Smith in 1998. Career: Lecturer in English, University of Poitiers, France, 1950–51; teacher at Anargyrios College, Spetsai, Greece, 1951–52, and in London, 1953–63. Awards: Silver Pen award, 1969; W.H. Smith Literary award, 1970; Christopher award, 1981. Honorary fellow, New College, Oxford, 1997. D.Litt., Exeter University, 1983; University of East Anglia, 1997. Address: c/o Jonathan Cape Ltd, 20 Vauxhall Bridge Road, London SW1V 2SA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

 ${\it The~Collector}.~London,~Cape,~and~Boston,~Little~Brown,~1963.$

The Magus. Boston, Little Brown, 1965; London, Cape, 1966; revised edition, Cape, 1977; Little Brown, 1978.

The French Lieutenant's Woman. London, Cape, and Boston, Little Brown, 1969.

Daniel Martin. Boston, Little Brown, and London, Cape, 1977. Mantissa. London, Cape, and Boston, Little Brown, 1982.

A Maggot. London, Cape, and Boston, Little Brown 1985.

Short Stories

The Ebony Tower: Collected Novellas. London, Cape, and Boston, Little Brown, 1974.

Plays

Don Juan, adaptation of the play by Molière (produced London, 1981).

Lorenzaccio, adaptation of the play by Alfred de Musset (produced London, 1983).

Martine, adaptation of a play by Jean Jacques Bernard (produced London, 1985).

Screenplays: The Magus, 1968.

Poetry

Poems. New York, Ecco Press, 1973. Conditional. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1979.

Other

The Aristos: A Self-Portrait in Ideas. Boston, Little Brown, 1964; London, Cape, 1965; revised edition, London, Pan, 1968; Little Brown, 1970.

Shipwreck, photographs by the Gibsons of Scilly. London, Cape, 1974; Boston, Little Brown, 1975.

Islands, photographs by Fay Godwin. London, Cape, 1978; Boston, Little Brown, 1979.

The Tree, photographs by Frank Horvat. London, Aurum Press, 1979;Boston, Little Brown, 1980; published as The Tree; The Nature of Nature: Two Essays, with woodcuts by Aaron Johnson. Covelo, California, Yolla Bolly Press, 1995.

The Enigma of Stonehenge, photographs by Barry Brukoff. London, Cape, and New York, Summit, 1980.

A Brief History of Lyme. Lyme Regis, Dorset, Friends of the Lyme Regis Museum, 1981.

A Short History of Lyme Regis. Wimborne, Dorset, Dovecote Press, 1982; Boston, Little Brown, 1983.

Land, photographs by Fay Godwin. London, Heinemann, and Boston, Little Brown, 1985.

Lyme Regis Camera. Stanbridge, Dorset, Dovecote Press, 1990; Boston, Little Brown, 1991.

The Man Who Died: A Story (commentary) by D. H. Lawrence. Hopewell, New Jersey, Ecco Press, 1994.

Wormholes: Essays and Occasional Writings, edited and introduced by Jan Relf. New York, H. Holt, 1998.

John Fowles and Nature: Fourteen Perspectives on Landscape, edited by James R. Aubrey. Madison, New Jersey, Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1999.

Editor, Steep Holm: A Case History in the Study of Evolution. Sherborne, Dorset, Allsop Memorial Trust, 1978.

Editor, with Rodney Legg, Monumenta Britannica, by John Aubrey. Sherborne, Dorset Publishing Company, 2 vols., 1981–82; vol. 1, Boston, Little Brown, 1981.

Editor, Thomas Hardy's England, by Jo Draper. London, Cape, and Boston, Little Brown, 1984.

Translator, Cinderella, by Perrault. London, Cape, 1974; Boston, Little Brown, 1975.

Translator, Ourika, by Claire de Durfort. Austin, Texas, Taylor, 1977.

*

Bibliography: "John Fowles: An Annotated Bibliography 1963–76" by Karen Magee Myers, in Bulletin of Bibliography (Boston), vol. 33, no. 4, 1976; John Fowles: A Reference Guide by Barry N. Olshen and Toni A. Olshen, Boston, Hall, 1980; "John Fowles: A Bibliographical Checklist" by Ray A. Roberts, in American Book Collector (New York), September-October, 1980; "Criticism of John Fowles: A Selected Checklist" by Ronald C. Dixon, in Modern Fiction Studies (Lafayette, Indiana), Spring 1985.

Manuscript Collection: University of Tulsa, Oklahoma.

Critical Studies: Possibilities by Malcolm Bradbury, London, Oxford University Press, 1973; The Fiction of John Fowles: Tradition, Art, and the Loneliness of Selfhood by William J. Palmer, Columbia, University of Missouri Press, 1974; John Fowles: Magus and Moralist by Peter Wolfe, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, Bucknell University Press, 1976, revised edition, 1979; Etudes sur The French Lieutenant's Woman de John Fowles edited by Jean Chevalier, Caen, University of Caen, 1977; John Fowles by Barry N. Olshen, New York, Ungar, 1978; John Fowles, John Hawkes, Claude Simon: Problems of Self and Form in the Post-Modernist Novel by Robert Burden, Würzburg, Königshausen & Neumann, and Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey, Humanities Press, 1980; John Fowles by Robert Huffaker, New York, Twayne, 1980; "John Fowles Issue" of Journal of Modern Literature (Philadelphia), vol. 8, no. 2, 1981; Four Contemporary Novelists by Kerry McSweeney, Montreal, McGill-Queen's University Press, 1982, London, Scolar Press, 1983; John Fowles by Peter J. Conradi, London, Methuen, 1982; Fowles, Irving, Barthes: Canonical Variations on an Apocryphal Theme by Randolph Runyon, Columbus, Ohio State University Press, 1982; The Timescapes of John Fowles by H.W. Fawkner, Rutherford, New Jersey, Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1983; Male Mythologies: John Fowles and Masculinity by Bruce Woodcock, Brighton, Harvester Press, 1984; The Romances of John Fowles by Simon Loveday, London, Macmillan, 1985; "John Fowles Issue" of Modern Fiction Studies (Lafayette, Indiana), Spring 1985; The Fiction of John Fowles: A Myth for Our Time by Carol M. Barnum, Greenwood, Florida, Penkevill, 1988; The Art of John Fowles by Katherine Tarbox, Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1988; Form and Meaning in the Novels of John Fowles by Susana Onega, Ann Arbor, Michigan, UMI Research Press, 1989; John Fowles: A Reference Companion by James R. Aubrey, New York, Greenwood Press, 1991; Point of View in Fiction and Film: Focus on John Fowles by Charles Garard, New York, P. Lang, 1991; John Fowles's Fiction and the Poetics of Postmodernism by Mahmoud Salami, Rutherford, Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1992; Something and Nothingness: The Fiction of John Updike and John Fowles by John Neary, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1992; Understanding John Fowles by Thomas C. Foster, Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1994; John Fowles by James Acheson. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1998; Conversations with John Fowles, edited by Dianne L. Vipond. Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1999.

* * *

John Fowles is a highly allusive and descriptive novelist. In all his fictions, situations and settings are carefully and lavishly done: the French country landscape of "The Cloud" (The Ebony Tower); the blues and purples of the stark New Mexican mountains, the soft rainy contours of Devon in various greens and greys, the bleak and menacing deserts of Syria, all in Daniel Martin. Most frequently, Fowles's richly painted settings conceal a mystery, as in the title story of The Ebony Tower, in which an old English painter has created his "forest" in France, like that of Chrétien de Troyes, a "mystery island" to break away from the closed formal island into "love and adventure and the magical." The lush Greek island of The Magus conceals mystery and magic, a stage for the complicated and elaborate series of theatricals that enchant, enslave, and instruct a young Englishman who has taken a teaching job there. The five eighteenthcentury travellers in A Maggot go through the deep vales and caverns near Exmoor, which lead to death for one, to a vision of paradise that may have helped establish a new religion for another, and to unknowable disappearance for a third. Often, Fowles's characters, like Nicholas Urfe in The Magus or the interrogating magistrate in A Maggot, try to solve the mysteries, to make sense of what happens as they confront new worlds, but they are not entirely successful. Frequently, as in the short story "The Enigma," in which a solid, stable, middle-aged Tory M.P. simply disappears, Fowles does not resolve the mystery and concentrates on the implications for others in living in terms of what is finally unknown.

In staging his mysteries, in choosing what to reveal and what to conceal, Fowles has often been seen by readers as manipulative. Such manipulation, however, is not merely a matter of tricks, ingenious switches, or "the God-game." Rather, the sense of "reality" as something that has to be manipulated, rearranged, in order to be understood is central to Fowles's conception of both the nature and the function of fiction. When victimized by a mock trial in the culminating theatrical invented for him, Nicholas Urfe realizes that he is only getting what he has deserved, for "all my life I had tried to turn life into fiction, to hold reality away." Mantissa, the title itself suggesting a trivial addition to literature, consists of a debate between the novelist and his erotic muse about the nature of fiction which satirizes simplistic solipsistic positions like "Serious modern fiction has only one subject: the difficulty of writing serious modern fiction." The novelist's manipulation is more complex and immediately recognizable in The French Lieutenant's Woman, which is full of parodies of old novelistic devices, switches in time and history, and frequent interruptions of the Victorian narrative that acknowledge the author's deliberate arrangements. The reader is constantly led to question what "Victorian" means, to recognize the texture of anachronism, parody, research, quotations from Marx, Darwin, Victorian sociological reports, Tennyson, Arnold, and Hardy as various means of demonstrating the conditional nature of time and history, the necessity of locating oneself in the present before one can understand anything of the past. The novel also has three endings, not simply as a form of prestidigitation, but as a demonstration that three different possible resolutions, each characterizing a different possible perspective itself historically definable, are consistent with the issues and characters Fowles has set in motion. A Maggot deploys strategies of similar contemporary interruptions, like the child opening a gate for the travellers on horse-back who is thrown a farthing that falls "over her bent crown of no doubt lice-ridden hair," or the actor playing a London merchant who changes from "anachronistic skinhead" to "Buddhist monk," to present a conflict between legalistic dialogue and the origins of religion or art, later explained as a version of the universal conflict between the left-lobed brain and the right, in terms of its modern genesis in the socially static period of the 1730s. Only in Mantissa and in parts of Daniel Martin do Fowles's speculations about the nature of fiction become arid and modish.

The allusive references of Fowles's ingenious fictions have generally widened and deepened over the course of his development. In his first novel, The Collector, more sensational than those that followed, Fowles attempted to probe psychologically and sociologically on a single plane of experience, to demonstrate what in a young man of one class caused him to collect, imprison, and dissect the girl from another class he thought he loved. The fabrications of The Magus extend further into history, legend, and myth, exploring various kinds of Gods, of perspectives "real" and imaginary (one can never finally draw a line between the two) that negate human freedom. A number of the long stories of The Ebony Tower, like "Eliduc," retell ancient myths or recreate them in contemporary terms. The French Lieutenant's Woman, with all its literary, historical, and artistic allusions, shows what of the story is of the past, what of the present, and what indeterminate, for history, for Fowles, invariably includes much of the time and perspective of the historian. Thematically, Daniel Martin is, in some ways, an expansion of The French Lieutenant's Woman, an analysis of Fowles's own generation, the last in England that might still be characterized as Victorian, "brought up in some degree of the nineteenth century since the twentieth did not begin until 1945." Daniel Martin also makes explicit a theme implicit in Fowles's earlier fiction, the paralyzing and complicated effects of all the guilts originating in the Victorian past, what he calls a "pandemic of self-depreciation" that leads to emotional insularity and to the capacity to live gracefully with loss rather than expending effort to change. In this novel, which ranges geographically (America, Italy, and the Middle East, as well as England) and historically (past wars and cultural legends), the guilt and self-depreciation are also attached to attractions to lost civilizations, the American Indians, the Minoans, the Etruscans, and the contemporary English. A Maggot, following the metaphor of the "larval stage of a winged create," but also, according to Fowles, meaning in the eighteenth century a "whim or quirk ... an obsession," expands its terms historically into a vision of possible humanity, an "almost divine maggot" attempting social and religious change against "reason, convention, established belief."

Until the fictional focus on the mother and the creation of Ann Lee, the historical founder of the Shaker religion, in A Maggot, Fowles's central characters have been isolated, rational, self-punishing males who attempted to join with independent, passionate, and enigmatic women. As the voice of the author in The French Lieutenant's Woman claims, he may be simply transferring his own inabilities to understand the enigmatic female into the safety of his historically locatable Victorian story. The sexual focus, however, with its attendant guilts and metaphorical expansions, is characteristic, and the novels develop the rational and sometimes manipulative means the male uses to try to understand and control the amorphous and enigmatic female. The male is always limited, his formulations and understandings only partial. And, in his frustration, the necessity that he operate in a world where understanding is never complete, he acts so as to capture (The Collector), desert (The Magus), betray (The French Lieutenant's Woman), relate to through art (Mantissa), or both betray and finally recover (Daniel Martin) the female he can only partially comprehend. In A Maggot, the prestidigitating male finally disappears from the fiction entirely, leaving the woman, who incorporates both whore and saint, to bring forth significant life herself. Fowles has treated his constant metaphorical focus on relationships between the sexes with growing insight, sympathy, and intelligence, as well as with a fascinating complexity of sociological, historical, and psychological implications of the incessant human effort involved.

—James Gindin

FRAME, Janet (Paterson)

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Dunedin, 28 August 1924. Education: Oamaru North School; Waitaki Girls' High School; University of Otago Teachers Training College, Dunedin. Awards: Hubert Church Prose award, 1952, 1964, 1974; New Zealand Literary Fund award, 1960; New Zealand Scholarship in Letters, 1964, and Award for Achievement, 1969; University of Otago Robert Burns fellowship, 1965; Buckland Literary award 1967; James Wattie award, 1983, 1985; Commonwealth Writers prize, 1989. D.Litt.:

University of Otago, 1978. C.B.E. (Commander, Order of the British Empire), 1983. Address: P.O. Box 1118, Palmerston North, New Zealand.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Owls Do Cry. Christchurch, Pegasus Press, 1957; New York, Braziller, 1960; London, W.H. Allen, 1961.

Faces in the Water. Christchurch, Pegasus Press, and New York, Braziller, 1961; London, W.H. Allen, 1962.

The Edge of the Alphabet. Christchurch, Pegasus Press, New York, Braziller, and London, W.H. Allen, 1962.

Scented Gardens for the Blind. Christchurch, Pegasus Press, and London, W.H. Allen, 1963; New York, Braziller, 1964.

The Adaptable Man. Christchurch, Pegasus Press, New York, Braziller, and London, W.H. Allen, 1965.

A State of Siege. New York, Braziller, 1966; London, W.H. Allen, 1967.

The Rainbirds. London, W.H. Allen, 1968; as Yellow Flowers in the Antipodean Room, New York, Braziller, 1969.

Intensive Care. New York, Braziller, 1970; London, W.H. Allen, 1971

Daughter Buffalo. New York, Braziller, 1972; London, W.H. Allen, 1973

Living in the Maniototo. New York, Braziller, 1979; London, Women's Press, 1981.

The Carpathians. London, Bloomsbury, and New York, Braziller, 1988.

Short Stories

The Lagoon: Stories. Christchurch, Caxton Press, 1952; revised edition, as The Lagoon and Other Stories, 1961; London, Bloomsbury, 1991.

The Reservoir: Stories and Sketches. New York, Braziller, 1963. Snowman, Snowman: Fables and Fantasies. New York, Braziller, 1963.

The Reservoir and Other Stories. Christchurch, Pegasus Press, and London, W.H. Allen, 1966.

You Are Now Entering the Human Heart. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1983; London, Women's Press, 1984.

Poetry

The Pocket Mirror. New York, Braziller, and London, W.H. Allen, 1967.

Other

Mona Minim and the Smell of the Sun (for children). New York, Braziller, 1969.

An Autobiography. Auckland, Century Hutchinson, 1989; London, Women's Press, 1990; New York, Braziller, 1991.

To the Is-Land. New York, Braziller, 1982; London, Women's Press, 1983.

An Angel at My Table. Auckland, Hutchinson, New York, Braziller, and London, Women's Press, 1984.

The Envoy from Mirror City. Auckland, Hutchinson, New York, Braziller, and London, Women's Press, 1985.

The Inward Sun: Celebrating the Life and Work of Janet Frame, selected and edited by Elizabeth Alley. Wellington, New Zealand, Daphne Brasell Associates Press, 1994.

The Janet Frame Reader, edited by Carole Ferrier. London, Women's Press, 1995.

*

Film Adaptations: An Angel at My Table, 1991.

Bibliography: By John Beston, in World Literature Written in English (Arlington, Texas), November 1978.

Critical Studies: An Inward Sun: The Novels of Janet Frame, Wellington, New Zealand University Press, 1971, and Janet Frame, Boston, Twayne, 1977, both by Patrick Evans; Bird, Hawk, Bogie: Essays on Janet Frame edited by Jeanne Delbaere, Aarhus, Denmark, Dangaroo Press, 1978; Janet Frame by Margaret Dalziel, Wellington, Oxford University Press, 1981; The Ring of Fire: Essays on Janet Frame edited by Jeanne Delbaere, Sydney, Dangaroo Press, 1992; I Have What I Gave: The Fiction of Janet Frame by Judith Dell Panny, New York, Braziller, 1993; Janet Frame: Subversive Fictions by Gina Mercer. St. Lucia, Queensland, University of Queensland Press, 1994; Critical Spaces: Margaret Laurence and Janet Frame by Lorna M. Irvine. Columbia, South Carolina, Camden House, 1995; Gendered Reistance: The Autobiographies of Simone De Beauvoir, Maya Angelou, Janet Frame and Marguerite Duras by Valerie Baisnee. Atlanta, Rodopi, 1997; Wrestling with the Angel: A Life of Janet Frame by Michael King. Washington, D.C., Counterpoint, 2000.

* * *

"All dreams," Janet Frame writes in her 1970 novel Intensive Care, "lead back to the nightmare garden." And all nightmares lead circuitously into truth. In all her novels, the looming threat of disorder, violent and disrupting, persistently attracts those that it frightens, for it proves more fertile, more imaginatively stimulating, more genuine, and more real than the too-familiar world of daily normality. The tension between safety and danger recurs as her characters—voyaging into strange geographies (like the epileptic Toby Withers in The Edge of the Alphabet), or madness (like Daphne in Owls Do Cry, or Istina Navet in Faces in the Water), or other people's identities (like Ed Glace in Scented Gardens for the Blind), or mirrors (like Vic in The Adaptable Man), or death (like Godfrey Rainbird in The Rainbirds)—discover both the mental deliberation that the safe state, in oxymoronic creativity, engenders, and the disembodying that danger contrives. The opening of Faces in the Water demonstrates the author's thematic density and sardonic touch:

They have said that we owe allegiance to Safety, that he is our Red-Cross God who will provide us with ointment and ... remove the foreign ideas, the glass beads of fantasy, the bent hair-pins of unreason embedded in our minds. On all the doors which lead to and from the world they have posted warning notices and lists of safety measures to be taken in extreme emergency .... Never sleep in the snow. Hide the scissors. Beware of strangers .... But for the final day ... they have no slogan. The streets throng with people who panic, looking to the left and the right, covering the scissors, sucking poison from a wound they cannot find, judging their time from the sun's position in the sky when the sun itself has melted and trickles down the ridges of darkness into the hollows of evaporated seas. Nightmares and madness, the education in the nature of Apocalypse and survival, become not mere metaphors of sanity, but direct training in the reactivation of the mind's perceiving eyes.

By "shipwrecking" oneself in mad geographies, however (Frame speaks in one novel of "an affliction of dream called Overseas"—as in another she observes that OUT is in man, is what he fears, "like the sea"), one places oneself on "the edge of the alphabet," in possession perhaps of insight, but no longer capable of communicating with the people who stay within regulated boundaries. Malfred Signal, in Frame's weakest novel, A State of Siege, for example, leaves her old self to live on an island and to find the perspectives of "the room two inches behind the eyes." What she discovers, when the elements besiege her, is fear, but all she can do then is silently utter the strange new language that she clutches, alone, into seacalm and death. Like Ed Glace in Scented Gardens, who researches the history of the surname Strang and (discovering strong, Strange, and Danger along the way) wonders if people are merely anagrams, Malfred lives in a mad mirror world of intensely focused perception that anagrammatic Joycean punning-distorting day-to-day language—tries to render. As Owls Do Cry had earlier specified, in the shallow suburban character of Chicks, the "safe" world deals in language, too, as a defence against upset, hiding in the familiarity of conventional clichés and tired similes. What the brilliant punning passages of The Rainbirds show is what the title poem of The Pocket Mirror implies: that convention will not show ordinary men the "bar of darkness" that are optically contained within the "facts of light"; "To undeceive the sight a detached instrument like a mirror is necessary." Or will her narratives. But even that vantage point is fraught with deceit. Superstition, like convention, and Platonic forms, like safe order, can all interfere with true interpenetration with "actuality." And to find the live language—the "death-free zone" of Thora Pattern, in Edge of the Alphabet—as a novelist inevitably dealing with day-to-day words becomes an increasingly difficult task the stronger the visionary sense of the individual mind on its own. Turnlung, the aging New Zealand writer in New York, in Daughter Buffalo, finds the challenge particularly acute; his exile to "a country of death" brings him into bizarrely creative contact with a young doctor, but in the epilogue to the story, he wonders if he has dreamed everything. What matters, as Turnlung puts it, is that "I have what I gave." To conceive is to create some kind of reality, however unconventional the act, the result, and the language of rendering the experience may seem.

There are passages in France that are reminiscent of Doris Lessing—like the apocalyptic scenes of Scented Gardens and Intensive Care, the one anticipating the atomic destruction of Britain and the birth of a new language, the other observing the destruction of animals in Waipori City (the computerized enactment of the Human Delineation Act which will identify the strong normal law-abiding "humans" and methodically, prophylactically, eliminate the rest), and the ironic intensification of a vegetable human consciousness. In the earlier novel, particularly, the author emphasizes the relationship between the "safety dance of speech" and a kind of Coleridgean death-in-life, and that between winter (the gardenless season) and madness, life-in-death, "Open Day in the factory of the mind." The Rainbirds, the writer's gentlest, most comic (however hauntingly, macabrely, relentlessly discommoding) book, takes up the metaphor in its story of a man pronounced dead after a car accident. Though Godfrey Rainbird lives, the official pronouncement, the conventional language, the public utterance, takes precedence over the individual spiritual actuality, depriving him of his job, his children, public acceptance, and so on. Indeed, he only becomes acceptable when he has "died" a second time, when his story is sufficiently distanced into legend and into the past to become a tourist attraction. But if you visit the grave in the winter, Frame adds, you must create the summer flowers within yourself. Summer gardens are openly available even to the spiritually blind; winter gardens are not. Her quiet acceptance, however, of that (mad, winter) power to change seasons within the mind expresses her most optimistic regard of humanity. And as Living in the Maniototo reaffirms, there is an ordering potentiality in the recognition of any person's several selves.

Intensive Care more broodingly evokes the same theme and provokingly points out the difference between the hospitalization of the body and the intensive care required to keep the mind truly alive. When the second world war is long over and the computer mentality takes over after the next impersonal War, all fructifying abnormality seems doomed; Deciding Day will destroy that which is not named human. Through the sharp memory of the supposedly dull Milly Galbraith, who is one of the few to appreciate an ancient surviving pear-tree, and the damningly conciliatory (and then expiatory) attitudes of Colin Monk, who goes along with the system, valuing Milly too late to save her, the apocalyptic days of Waipori City are told. Behind them both looms the mythical presence of Colin's twin Sandy, the Reconstructured Man, made of metal and transplanted part, who is also the Rekinstruckdead Man, a promise of technological finesse and an accompanying sacrifice of man's animal warmth and spiritual being. Milly is exterminated; Sandy is myth; Colin, declared human, breathes:

I was safe, I had won.

I had lost. I began losing the first day, when the news of the Act came to me and I signed the oath of agreement. Why of course, I said, I'll do anything you ask, naturally, it's the only way, the only solution, as I see it, to an impossible situation, as if situations needed solving, I mean, looked at objectively, as it must be seen to be ....

The skimming words and phrases that need leave no footprints; one might never have been there, but one had spoken; and the black water lay undisturbed beneath the ice; and not a blade of grass quivered or a dead leaf whispered; a race of words had lived and died and left no relic of their civilization.

As it must be seen to be, looked at objectively ....

The ironies multiply around each other. Language reasserts its fluid focus; the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Vegetation plants new pear trees on the Livingstone estate; the computer (not having been programmed for nostalgia) fails to account for the new enthusiasm for old abnormalities; and the Sleep Days cannot erase the time of the fires from the mind of Colin Monk. The mind survives. That her commitment to the spiritual independence of such perception is made so provocative is a tribute to Frame's arresting skill with images. She has an uncanny ability to arouse the diverse sensibilities of shifting moods and to entangle in language the wordless truths of her inner eye.

Language (always a motif in these works) is the central subject of the later novels Living in the Maniototo, with its artificial California setting, and the futuristic The Carpathians. The characters here contend not so much with a world outside themselves as with the kinds of world their imaginations create. Trained in words, they construct fantasies with the power of reality, often mistakenly accepting these ostensible "realities" as fixed truths. While most characters see only what they expect, some are given the gift of transcending their own verbal limitations. Understanding the processes of language is essential. Readers of the later novels are guided into limited insights: once the authoritarianism of their conventional expectations is exposed, they are offered a chance to glimpse alternative possibilities—within themselves, and consequently also in the "ordinary" world.

-W.H. New

FRAME, Ronald (William Sutherland)

Nationality: British. Born: Glasgow, 23 May 1953. Education: High School of Glasgow, 1962–71; University of Glasgow, 1971–75, M.A. 1975; Jesus College, Oxford, 1975–79, B.Litt. 1979. Awards: Betty Trask award, for first novel, 1984; Samuel Beckett award, 1986; Television Industries award, 1986; Scottish Arts Council award, 1987. Address: c/o Hodder and Stoughton Ltd, 47 Bedford Square, London WC1B 3DP, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Winter Journey. London, Bodley Head, 1984; New York, Beaufort, 1986.

A Long Weekend with Marcel Proust: Seven Stories and a Novel. London, Bodley Head, 1986.

Sandmouth People. London, Bodley Head, 1987; as Sandmouth, New York, Knopf, 1988.

A Woman of Judah: A Novel and Fifteen Stories. London, Bodley Head, 1987; New York, Norton, 1989.

Penelope's Hat. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1989; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1991.

Bluette. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1990.

Underwood and After. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1991.

The Sun on the Wall: Three Novels. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1994.

Short Stories

Watching Mrs. Gordon and Other Stories. London, Bodley Head, 1985.

Walking My Mistress in Deauville: A Novella and Nine Stories. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1992.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Rowena Fletcher," in Winter's Tales 3 (new series), edited by Robin Baird-Smith. London, Constable, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1987.

"Trio-3 Stories," in 20 Under 35, edited by Peter Straus. London, Sceptre, 1988.

Plays

Paris: A Television Play; with Privateers (includes story). London, Faber, 1987.

Radio Plays: Winter Journey, 1985; Twister, 1986; Rendezvous, 1987; Cara, 1988; Marina Bray, 1989.

Television Plays: Paris, 1985; Out of Time, 1987.

*

Ronald Frame comments:

My characters are caught between an imagined freedom to determine their lives and the machinations of fate. I write about the circular nature of time as we experience it, about repetitions and coincidences working through generations. About social ritual as a mental stabilizer.

"History" to me is a kind of grand opera bouffe, scarcely believable sometimes. Social contact too is a complex game, perhaps a more serious one, of bluffs and evasions and all graduations of "truth."

I'm interested in the compelling power of imagination. My characters are inward, inhabiting a landscape of memory and desire, but are also ironically aware of how other people see them: I prefer my descriptions to come through, say, self-reflections in mirrors or window glass, or to be read in the facial reactions of others. I try to bring my third-person narratives as close to the first-person perspective as I can.

I hope I don't deal in heroes and villains. I write quite formally, but within that structure I mean to follow illogic where necessary; violence is implied, and it may appear the more desperate by contrast with this ambience of control.

While dissecting, I aim to preserve some essential mystery about my characters, so that not everything should be knowable, to themselves or to us. They partly live through received images—cinematic, for instance—and I appreciate that in writing about a period like the 1950s, as I frequently do, I'm approaching it through its own legend. I don't hold with research and verifiable realism; much more important to me is atmosphere, the evocation of a world—an approximately detailed but spiritually authentic world—which I can use to pit my individuals against the process of historical change. I hope the atmosphere will lure the reader, and induce for a short time a spell that might prove consistent and credible—and enjoyable.

* * *

Ronald Frame belongs to that select group of male novelists who write almost exclusively from the female point of view; indeed he has been described as the poet of thé dansant, obsessed with the minutiae of women's lives. Although in a novel like Sandmouth People he is capable of creating a whole range of characters reflecting different social strata and both sexes—in this case representative of a small English resort town during the 1950s—his preference is clearly for the female personality, and it is noticeable that the most memorable characters are women. In this record of a day in the life of a nondescript English town, Frame creates the milieu of a social comedy in which his characters reveal themselves through their past and present lives. Most notable among these is Nanny Filbert, whose hidden secrets are resurrected once more to haunt her. Other characters also remain in the memory: Lady Sybil de Castellet, representing the old monied aristocracy, who dreams only of death; or Penelope Prentice, middle-class and wealthy, who carries on a covert affair with Norman Pargiter, "Sandmouth's own success story"; or Meredith Vane, the sub-Bloomsbury local author. All these, and a supporting cast of lesser lights, give the novel its knowing tone of a darker existence lying below the surface of a middle-class life so carefully depicted by Frame. It is indicative of the author's wit that he introduces a repertory company visiting Sandmouth to play Terence Rattigan's Harlequinade, a quintessential description of English middle-class life.

Although Sandmouth People is only his second novel—it was preceded by Winter Journey and by two collections of short storiesit is a good starting point for exploring Frame's fictional world. Similar to it in range of experience and in choice of background is A Woman of Judah which was published in a single volume with fifteen short stories. (Indeed, Frame is an excellent creator of shorter fiction.) Once again the time is the past, in this case England during one of the long hot summers of the 1930s, and the background is again peopled with a selection of suitably enigmatic characters. The story is told by Pendlebury, an elderly judge, reminiscing some fifty years after events which had a profound effect on him during his days as an articled clerk in rural Essex. While that is the starting point, Frame's main interest is the friendship Pendlebury strikes up with a couple called Davies: he is the local doctor and she appears to Pendlebury in all her "glowing well-scrubbed voluptuousness." Slowly but surely the novel starts to revolve around her, and young Pendlebury is drawn ever more deeply into her life. Although he desires her, she remains curiously aloof and yet, following her husband's suspicious death, she continues to haunt Pendlebury, allowing him no peace in the years to come. It is a strange and diverting novel, and manages to seduce the reader into joining a claustrophobic and closed society inhabited by basically dishonest people.

In his next two novels, Penelope's Hat and Bluette, the themes Frame had been exploring in his earlier fiction come to fruition in a new and precocious way. Penelope's Hat is the story of an English novelist who disappeared in 1979, leaving only her straw hat as a clue to her fate. Seven years later she resurfaces in Australia, but this is not a literary whodunit; rather, it is a novel of layers which have to be drawn back to reveal the different stages of Penelope's life—her childhood in Borneo and the return to post-war Britain, Cornish summer holidays, her life as a young girl during World War II and the awakening of sexual desire. Different hats at various stages of her life punctuate the passing of the years and provide clues about Penelope, but the novel's real fascination is the central character herself. Here Frame displays an uncanny ability to unravel the strands of her past, to make sense of her obsessions with expensive clothes, silk stockings, even hats. Luxury is a key word in Penelope's life, and Frame revels in the goods that provide it-precious perfumes, fast cars, and designer-labelled clothes. Penelope might have hidden herself under several hats, but Frame has the measure of her personality, and the overall effect is of hearing whispered conversations behind halfclosed doors.

It could be said that in Bluette Frame wrote a sequel; even the opening sentence is a promise of the exotic story that is about to unfold—"Follow the finger of Destiny." Like Penelope in the previous novel, protagonist Catherine Hammond occupies a world that is part reality and part make-believe, and shifts disconcertingly between the two. At different stages she works in a nightclub, as an actress and, later still, in an upper-class brothel, but throughout she manages to retain her integrity—ironically, through her ability to surround herself with the finer things of life. Vast, sprawling and eclectic, Bluette is both a saga and deeply touching story of a woman's search to find something approaching fulfillment and happiness. The book marks Frame as one of the most innovative writers of his generation.

-Trevor Royle

FRANCIS, Dick

Nationality: British. Born: Richard Stanley Francis in Tenby, Pembrokeshire, 31 October 1920. Education: Maidenhead County Boys' School, Berkshire. Military Service: Served as a Flying Officer in the Royal Air Force, 1940-45. Family: Married Mary Margaret Brenchley in 1947; two sons. Career: Amateur National Hunt (steeplechase) jockey, 1946–48; professional, 1948–57: National Hunt champion, 1953-54. Racing correspondent Sunday Express, London, 1957-73. Chairman, Crime Writers Association, 1973-74. Awards: Crime Writers Association Silver Dagger award, 1965, Gold Dagger award, 1980, Diamond Dagger award, 1989; Mystery Writers of America Edgar Allan Poe award, 1969, 1981, 1996; Nibbies award, 1998; Agatha Lifetime Achievement award, 2000. L.H.D.: Tufts University, Medford, Massachusetts, 1991. O.B.E. (Officer, Order of the British Empire), 1984. Agent: John Johnson, 45-47 Clerkenwell Green, London EC1R 0HT, England. Address: P.O. Box 30866 S.M.B., Grand Cayman, British West Indies.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Dead Cert. London, Joseph, and New York, Holt Rinehart, 1962. Nerve. London, Joseph, and New York, Harper, 1964. For Kicks. London, Joseph, and New York, Harper, 1965. Odds Against. London, Joseph, 1965; New York, Harper, 1966. Flying Finish. London, Joseph, 1966; New York, Harper, 1967. Blood Sport. London, Joseph, 1967; New York, Harper, 1968. Forfeit. London, Joseph, and New York, Harper, 1969. Enquiry. London, Joseph, 1970; New York, Harper, 1971. Rat Race. London, Joseph, 1970; New York, Harper, 1971. Bonecrack. London, Joseph, 1971; New York, Harper, 1972. Smokescreen. London, Joseph, and New York, Harper, 1972. Slay-Ride. London, Joseph, and New York, Harper, 1973. Knock-Down. London, Joseph, 1974; New York, Harper, 1975. High Stakes. London, Joseph, 1975; New York, Harper, 1976. In the Frame. London, Joseph, 1976; New York, Harper, 1978. Trial Run. London, Joseph, 1978; New York, Harper, 1979. Whip Hand. London, Joseph, 1979; New York, Harper, 1980. Reflex. London, Joseph, 1980; New York, Putnam, 1981. Twice Shy. London, Joseph, 1981; New York, Putnam, 1982.

Banker. London, Joseph, 1982; New York, Putnam, 1983. The Danger. London, Joseph, 1983; New York, Putnam, 1984. Proof. London, Joseph, 1984; New York, Putnam, 1985. Break In. London, Joseph, and New York, Putnam, 1986. Bolt. London, Joseph, 1986; New York, Putnam, 1987. Hot Money. London, Joseph, 1987; New York, Putnam, 1988. The Edge. London, Joseph, 1988; New York, Putnam, 1989. Straight. London, Joseph, and New York, Putnam, 1989. Longshot. London, Joseph and New York, Putnam, 1990. Comeback. London, Joseph, and New York, Putnam, 1991. Driving Force. London, Joseph, and New York, Putnam, 1992. Decider. London, Joseph, and New York, Putnam, 1993. Wild Horses. London, Joseph, and New York, Putnam, 1994. Risk. Thorndike, Maine, G.K. Hall, 1994. Come to Grief. London, Joseph, and New York, Putnam, 1995. To the Hilt. New York, Putnam, 1996. 10 Lb. Penalty. New York, Putnam, 1997. Second Wind. New York, Putnam, 1999.

Short Stories

Field of Thirteen. New York, Putnam, 1998.

Plays

Screenplays: Dead Cert, 1974.

Other

The Sport of Queens: The Autobiography of Dick Francis. London, Joseph, 1957; revised edition, 1968, 1974, 1982, 1988; New York, Harper, 1969.

Lester: The Official Biography. London, Joseph, 1986; as A Jockey's Life: The Biography of Lester Piggott, New York, Putnam, 1986. Editor, with John Welcome, Best Racing and Chasing Stories 1–2. London, Faber, 2 vols., 1966–69.

Editor, with John Welcome, The Racing Man's Bedside Book. London, Faber, 1969.

*

Critical Studies: Dick Francis by Melvyn Barnes, New York, Ungar, 1986; Dick Francis by J. Madison Davis, Boston, Twayne, 1989; Dick Francis: Steeplechase Jockey by Bryony Fuller, London, Joseph, 1994.

* * *

"Dying slowly of bone cancer the old man, shrivelled now, sat as ever in his great armchair, tears of lonely pain sliding down crepuscular cheeks." Hardly the opening words one expects in a topselling thriller. Yet they are what Dick Francis chose to write at the start of his 33rd novel, Wild Horses, and they tell us at once that the book will be more than a simple thriller—as, though in a less immediately obvious way, were each of its 32 predecessors.

There is perhaps a reason for this. Dick Francis did not come to fiction until he was approaching 40 and had already had a highly successful career in horse racing, ending as Champion jockey. Then, too, his life had not been without profound trouble. So it should be no surprise that his books, though designed first to entertain, each ask, with more pointedness or less, about one aspect of existence or another, the question, "How should we live?"

His method is to write a first version and then to read it aloud on to tape. I suspect that it is this process that accounts for the first of his virtues, the extreme easiness of his style. But easy reading generally comes from hard work first, and Francis has said that producing a novel is "just as tiring" as race riding. Besides the style, there are solid plots underneath the whole; concluding events have reasonable and likely causes. There is the continuing pull of the story, so that you are all the time wanting to know what will happen next. You get told what you want to know, too, and not something just a little bit different, a mistake less skilled authors often make. And at the same time you are made to want to know some new thing.

Then there is the language. Francis chooses straightforward words and never wastes them. (Though in his later books he uses, where needed, something more resonant, such as the "crepuscular" in the passage quoted earlier.) This virtue comes perhaps from his sense of timing, a gift he brought with him from racing to writing. The art of judging at just what moment to put a new fact into the reader's head, whether the fact is as important as the discovery of a body (most adroitly done in Slay-Ride) or just some necessary detail, is one that Francis shares with the masters of his craft.

But more important than the pacing, or plot, or even skillful story-telling, are the people writers invent for their stories. It is through people that the storyteller affects an audience. The people in Francis's books are as real as real-life people. Perhaps the best example of the kind of human being in his pages is the girl the hero either loves or comes to love. There is not one in every book (Francis has succeeded in bringing considerable variety to thrillers that might, with their customary Turf settings or references, have become formula affairs), but she has featured often enough to be easily identifiable as a certain sort of person. She will have some grave handicap, such as needing to live in an iron lung, or simply being widowed, or, as in The Danger, having been the victim of a cruel kidnapping. Many thriller writers would not dare to use such people because the reality of their situation would show up the tinsel world around them. But Francis is tough enough, and compassionate enough, to be able to write about such things.

His knowledge of the effects of tragedy comes from his own experience. While his wife was expecting their first child she was struck down by poliomyelitis and confined to an iron lung. It is from personal experience, too, that the typically stoic Francis hero comes. One of the few complaints that have been made about the books is that the hero (usually a different one each time, a jockey, a horse-owner, a trainer, a painter, a film star, an accountant, a photographer, a merchant banker) is too tough to be credible. But the fact is that most critics are not used to taking actual physical hard knocks; Francis, the jumps jockey, was. So if you look carefully at what he says happens when one of his heroes gets beaten up (as almost invariably they do) you find that, unlike many a pseudo-Bond or carbon-copy private eye, he gets really hurt and recovers only as fast as a physically fit and resilient man would in real life.

A Francis hero will have another important characteristic: he will be a man not scared of judging. He weighs up the police he meets and sees them for what they are: tough men, good men, nasty men, weak men, tough women, greedy women, sensitive women. And, more than this, the Francis books make judgments on a wider scale. By its particular choice of hero each one addresses some particular human dilemma. Slay-Ride, for instance, though it might seem to be no more than a good story about dirty work on the Norwegian race-courses, is in fact a book about what it is like to be the parent of children, to give these hostages to fortune, to be taking part in the continuing pattern of human existence. Similarly Reflex is about the need to accept inevitable change, and Twice Shy is about the acquiring of maturity.

In To the Hilt, a wealthy artist is summoned to be with his stepfather at the latter's deathbed, and events soon hurl the protagonist into a melange of circumstances from which only Francis could untangle him. Less successful is 10-lb. Penalty or its narrator, a 17-year-old naturally lacking in the voice that would compel adult readers to care fully about his work campaigning for his father's parliamentary election. Francis's 40th novel, Second Wind, likewise runs a little thin in spots. Perry Stuart, a TV weatherman, finds himself washed up on a Caribbean island where he discovers a safe containing a mysterious folder. Soon afterward he is rescued—by men in radiation-protection gear.

The Edge, though an exciting puzzle set on a Canadian train with a cargo of bloodstock and a posse of actors playing a "murder mystery," is fundamentally about the need "to retain order," and all its events reflect this. In Straight Francis takes the last yards of a jumps race course, "the straight," as illustrating a man facing the end of a particular career (a jockey, once again), but he also goes deeper by saying something about that human ideal of being "straight." It is such subtle themes that give the Francis books the weight that lifts them right out of the run of good but ordinary thrillers.

-H.R.F. Keating

FRAYN, Michael

Nationality: British. Born: Mill Hill, London, 8 September 1933. Education: Sutton High School for Boys; Kingston Grammar School, Surrey; Emmanuel College, Cambridge, B.A. 1957. Military Service: Served in the Royal Artillery and Intelligence Corps, 1952–54. Family: Married Gillian Palmer in 1960 (marriage dissolved 1990), married Claire Tomalin in 1993; three daughters. Career: Reporter, 1957–59, and columnist, 1959–62, the Guardian, Manchester and London; columnist, the Observer, London, 1962–68. Lives in London. Awards: Maugham award, 1966; Hawthornden prize, 1967; National Press award, 1970; Evening Standard award, for play, 1976, 1981, 1983, 1985; Society of West End Theatre award, 1977, 1982; British Theatre Association award, 1981, 1983; Olivier award, 1985; New York Drama Critics Circle award, 1986; Emmy award, 1990. Honorary Fellow, Emmanuel College, 1985. Agent: Elaine Greene Ltd., 37 Goldhawk Road, London W12 8QQ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Tin Men. London, Collins, 1965; Boston, Little Brown, 1966.The Russian Interpreter. London, Collins, and New York, Viking Press, 1966.

Towards the End of the Morning. London, Collins, 1967; as Against Entropy, New York, Viking Press, 1967.

A Very Private Life. London, Collins, and New York, Viking Press, 1968.

Sweet Dreams. London, Collins, 1973; New York, Viking Press, 1974.

The Trick of It. London, Viking, 1989; New York, Viking, 1990.

A Landing on the Sun. London, Viking, 1991.

Now You Know. London, Viking, 1993.

Headlong. New York, Metropolitan Books, 1999.

Plays

Zounds!, with John Edwards, music by Keith Statham (produced Cambridge, 1957).

Jamie, On a Flying Visit (televised 1968). With Birthday, London, Methuen, 1990.

Birthday (televised 1969). With Jamie, On a Flying Visit, London, Methuen, 1990.

The Two of Us (includes Black and Silver, The New Quixote, Mr. Foot, Chinamen) (produced London, 1970; Ogunquit, Maine, 1975; Chinamen produced New York, 1979). London, Fontana, 1970; Chinamen published in The Best Short Plays 1973, edited by Stanley Richards, Radnor, Pennsylvania, Chilton, 1973; revised version of The New Quixote (produced Chichester, Sussex, and London, 1980).

The Sandboy (produced London, 1971).

Alphabetical Order (produced London, 1975; New Haven, Connecticut, 1976). With Donkeys' Years, London, Eyre Methuen, 1977.

Donkeys' Years (produced London, 1976). With Alphabetical Order, London, Eyre Methuen, 1977.

Clouds (produced London, 1976). London, Eyre Methuen, 1977.

The Cherry Orchard, adaptation of a play by Chekhov (produced London, 1978). London, Eyre Methuen, 1978.

Balmoral (produced Guildford, Surrey, 1978; revised version, as Liberty Hall, produced London, 1980; revised version, as Balmoral, produced Bristol, 1987). London, Methuen, 1987.

The Fruits of Enlightenment, adaptation of a play by Tolstoy (produced London, 1979). London, Eyre Methuen, 1979.

Make and Break (produced London, 1980; Washington, D.C., 1983). London, Eyre Methuen, 1980.

Noises Off (produced London, 1981; New York, 1983). London, Methuen, 1982; New York, French, 1985.

Three Sisters, adaptation of a play by Chekhov (produced Manchester and Los Angeles, 1985; London, 1987). London, Methuen, 1983.

Benefactors (produced London, 1984; New York, 1985). London, Methuen, 1984.

Wild Honey, adaptation of a play by Chekhov (produced London, 1984; New York, 1986). London, Methuen, 1984.

Number One, adaptation of a play by Jean Anouilh (produced London, 1984). London, French, 1985.

Plays I (includes Alphabetical Order, Donkeys' Years, Clouds, Make and Break, Noises Off). London, Methuen, 1986.

The Seagull, adaptation of a play by Chekhov (produced Watford, Hertfordshire, 1986). London, Methuen, 1986.

Clockwise (screenplay). London, Methuen, 1986.

Exchange, adaptation of a play by Trifonov (broadcast 1986; produced Southampton, Hampshire, 1989; London, 1990). London, Methuen. 1990.

Uncle Vanya, adaptation of a play by Chekhov (produced London, 1988). London, Methuen, 1987.

Chekhov: Plays (includes The Seagull, Uncle Vanya, Three Sisters, The Cherry Orchard, four vaudevilles). London, Methuen, 1988.

The Sneeze, adaptation of works by Chekhov (produced Newcastle-upon-Tyne and London, 1988). London, Methuen, and New York, French, 1989.

First and Last (televised 1989). London, Methuen, 1989.

Look Look (as Spettattori, produced Rome, 1989; as Look Look, produced London, 1990). London, Methuen, 1990.

Listen to This: 21 Short Plays and Sketches. London, Methuen, 1991. Audience: A Play in One Act. London, French, 1991.

Here: A Play in Two Acts. London, French, 1994.

Now You Know: A Play in Two Acts (from the novel). London, Methuen Drama, 1995; New York, Samuel French, 1996.

Copenhagen. London, Methuen Drama, 1998.

Screenplays: Clockwise, 1986.

Radio Plays: Exchange, from a play by Trifonov, 1986.

Television Plays and Documentaries: Second City Reports, with John Bird, 1964; Jamie, On a Flying Visit, 1968; One Pair of Eyes, 1968; Birthday, 1969; Beyond a Joke series, with John Bird and Eleanor Bron, 1972; Laurence Sterne Lived Here (Writers' Houses series), 1973; Imagine a City Called Berlin, 1975; Making Faces, 1975; Vienna: The Mask of Gold, 1977; Three Streets in the Country, 1979; The Long Straight (Great Railway Journeys of the World series), 1980; Jerusalem, 1984; First and Last, 1989.

Other

1963.

The Day of the Dog (Guardian columns). London, Collins, 1962; New York, Doubleday, 1963.

The Book of Fub (Guardian columns). London, Collins, 1963; as Never Put Off to Gomorrah, New York, Pantheon, 1964.

On the Outskirts (Observer columns). London, Fontana, 1967.

At Bay in Gear Street (Observer columns). New York, Fontana, 1967. Constructions (philosophy). London, Wildwood House, 1974.

Great Railway Journeys of the World, with others. London, BBC Publications, 1981; New York, Dutton, 1982.

The Original Michael Frayn: Satirical Essays, edited by James Fenton. Edinburgh, Salamander Press, 1983.

Speak After the Beep: Studies in the Art of Communicating with Inanimate and Semi-Inanimate Objects. London, Methuen, 1997. Editor, The Best of Beachcomber, by J.B. Morton. London, Heinemann,

~ ~ ~

Three of Michael Frayn's novels, the first, fourth, and fifth, are highly original, a satire and fantasies; the second and third, on the other hand, are conventional. The second, The Russian Interpreter, concerns an English research student in Moscow who serves as interpreter for a mysterious businessman (he seeks ordinary Russians for exchange visits), and the pair become involved with a Russian girl. Though Moscow's streets and weather are described, soon the action is moving swiftly. Books are stolen and sought, somebody is tricking somebody, espionage or smuggling is occurring, and we read on eagerly, awaiting explanations. Even when the student is imprisoned, Frayn focuses on his comic efforts to obtain a towel, and the novel remains a good, cheerful read.

The American title of the third novel points to opposing inertia and conformity; the English one, only a little more relevantly, to the subject of being in the mid-thirties (the hero "had spent his youth as one might spend an inheritance, and he had no idea of what he had bought with it"). Frayn's 37-year-old is a feature editor, worrying about repairs to his Victorian house with West Indian neighbors in S.W.23 and dreaming of escape, hopefully through appearances on a television panel. The plot is vehicle for comedy about a newspaper office, with a few shrewd observations, as when a girl reflects: "She wasn't a girl at all, in any sense that the fashion magazines would recognize. She was just a young female human being, fit only to be someone's cousin or aunt." Some passages suggest Frayn intends more, a fuller study of his hero's marriage and serious focus on the future of newspapers (a cynical, pushy graduate challenges the office's ways), but these are not pursued.

The Tin Men, the first book, is about the William Morris Institute of Automation Research and its eccentric scientists. A thin plot-line turns on a new wing, the arrangements for the Queen to open it, and the TV company that plans to finance it. Most of the fun is about computers: the automating of football results because the Director believes "the main object of organized sports and games is to produce a profusion of statistics," the programmed newspaper, which prints the core of familiar stories such as "I Test New Car" and "Child Told Dress Unsuitable by Teacher," and Delphic I, the Ethical Decision Machine, which expresses its moral processes in units called pauls, calvins, and moses. Amid clever jokes, Frayn shows anxiety about the dangerous possibilities of computers and the limitations of the men responsible for them.

A Very Private Life begins "Once upon a time there will be a little girl called Uncumber." In her world, "inside people" remain all their lives in windowless houses, supplied by tube and tap and using drugs-Pax, Hilarin and Orgasmin-for every experience. In very brief chapters, Frayn explains how life has grown more private, first physically, then through drugs to cope with anger and uncertainty. Dissatisfied Uncumber meets a man through a wrong number on "holovision" and goes to the other side of the world to visit him. The compelling story is part fairy tale, part fantasy, part morality, so that we ask "Is it plausible?" and "What is the moral?" Frayn's inspiration was contemporary America, where he noticed dark glasses used to hide feelings, and city people buying disused farmhouses to be alone in. He touches on penology, longevity, the treatment of personality, but concentrates on technology making possible a new kind of isolation which excludes uncomfortable realities. And Frayn the moralist never dominates Frayn the story-teller.

Even better is Sweet Dreams—clever, entertaining, dazzling. A typical middle-aged, middle-class Londoner is killed and finds himself in a Heaven where he can fly, speak any language, change his age, and retrieve long-lost possessions. He is set to invent the Matterhorn, returns to England and writes an official report on its condition, drops out to the simple country life and bounces back as right-hand man to God (who proves to be a blend of Freddie Ayer and A.J.P. Taylor, and says "To get anything done at all one has to move in tremendously mysterious ways"). Slowly we realize the hero's Heavenly evolution is markedly similar to his earthly one. Frayn tells with wit and flourish his shrewd, sardonic and deceptively charming fable.

After sixteen years during which Frayn established a big reputation as a playwright, and also translated Chekhov's plays, he returned to the novel in 1989 with a highly original work which, however, was linked more closely with a real world than the fantasies. The Trick of It is told through the letters of a young lecturer in English to a friend in Australia. These describe how he first meets the successful woman novelist he studies (he refers to her as a "MajWOOT," a major writer of our time) and marries her. He thinks that he can improve her next novel; is disturbed that the work which follows is about his mother and does not mention him; tries to write fiction himself, then discovers he has not "the trick of it"; finally values his letters (which we are reading) only to learn that the recipient has lost them. The tone is playful, yet Frayn has insights into creativity and the relation of critic to creator.

A Landing on the Sun is less ingenious, although it cleverly unfolds as narrative and explores significant ideas. A civil servant investigates a mysterious death from seventeen years earlier, of a man involved with a "policy unit" on "the quality of life," headed by an Oxford philosopher. Frayn writes of the bureaucratic world while pursuing the concept of "happiness" and the intriguing way in which the searcher becomes caught up with the object of his search.

Now You Know is about an elderly man with a varied past who runs an organization devoted to freedom of information. Gradually all the characters emerge as having something to hide and as misinterpreting the behaviour of others. Frayn's subject this time seems to be truth and when lying may be justified. Audaciously, the novel resembles a play, being told in a series of dramatic monologues.

These three novels have in common wit, elegance, page-turning storytelling, and a playful treatment of serious themes. Headlong is another witty comedy, but the intellectual details—e.g., information on the work of Peter Bruegel, and the world in which his paintings were conceived—threaten to weigh down the airy plot. This is a pity, since the story itself, of how art historian Martin Clay attempts to take a suspected Bruegel from its unsympathetic owner, is plenty enough to occupy readers' attentions.

-Malcolm Page, updated by Judson Knight

FREEMAN, Gillian

Nationality: British. Born: London, 5 December 1929. Education: The University of Reading, Berkshire, 1949–51, B.A. (honors) in English literature and philosophy, 1951. Family: Married Edward Thorpe in 1955; two daughters. Career: Copywriter, C.J. Lytle Ltd., London, 1951–52; schoolteacher in London, 1952–53; reporter, North London Observer, 1953; literary secretary to Louis Golding, 1953–55. Lives in London. Agent: Richard Scott Simon, Anthony Sheil Associates, 43 Doughty Street, London WC1N 2LF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Liberty Man. London, Longman, 1955.

Fall of Innocence. London, Longman, 1956.

Jack Would Be a Gentleman. London, Longman, 1959.

The Leather Boys (as Eliot George). London, Blond, 1961; New York, Guild Press, 1962.

The Campaign. London, Longman, 1963.

The Leader. London, Blond, 1965; Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1966. The Alabaster Egg. London, Blond, 1970; New York, Viking Press

The Alabaster Egg. London, Blond, 1970; New York, Viking Press, 1971.

The Marriage Machine. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Stein and Day, 1975. Nazi Lady: The Diaries of Elisabeth von Stahlenberg 1933–1948.
London, Blond and Briggs, 1978; as The Confessions of Elisabeth von S, New York, Dutton, 1978; as Diary of a Nazi Lady, New York, Ace, 1979.

An Easter Egg Hunt. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Congdon and Lattès, 1981.

Love Child (as Elaine Jackson). London, W.H. Allen, 1984. Termination Rock. London, Unwin Hyman, 1989. His Mistress's Voice. London, Arcadia, 1999.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Soufflé" in Courier (London and New York), May 1955.
- "Pen Friend," in Woman's Own (London), December 1957.
- "The Changeling," in London Magazine, April 1959.
- "The Polka (Come Dance with Me)," in Woman's Own (London), December 1962.
- "Kicks," in Axle Quarterly (London), Summer 1963.
- "Dear Fred," in King (London), June 1965.
- "Venus Unobserved," in Town (London), July 1967.
- "A Brave Young Woman," in Storia 3, edited by Kate Figes. London, Pandora Press, 1989.

Plays

Pursuit (produced London, 1969).

Screenplays: The Leather Boys, 1963; That Cold Day in the Park, 1969; I Want What I Want, with Gavin Lambert, 1972; Day after the Fair, 1986.

Radio Plays: Santa Evita, 1973; Field Day, 1974; Commercial Break, 1974.

Television Plays: The Campaign, 1965; Man in a Fog, 1984; Hair Soup, 1991.

Ballet Scenarios: Mayerling, 1978; Intimate Letters, 1978; Isadora, 1981.

Other

The Story of Albert Einstein (for children). London, Vallentine Mitchell, 1960.

The Undergrowth of Literature. London, Nelson, 1967; New York, Delacorte Press, 1969.

The Schoolgirl Ethic: The Life and Work of Angela Brazil. London, Allen Lane, 1976.

Ballet Genius: Twenty Great Dancers of the Twentieth Century, with Edward Thorpe. Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, Thorsons, 1988.

*

Manuscript Collection: University of Reading, Berkshire.

Critical Study: Don't Never Forget by Brigid Brophy, London, Cape, 1966, New York, Holt Rinehart, 1967; Friends and Friendship by Kay Dick, London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 1974.

Gillian Freeman comments:

I have always been concerned with the problems of the individual seen in relation to society and the personal pressures brought to bear because of moral, political or social conditions and the inability to conform. This is reflected in all my work to date, although I have never set out to propound themes, only to tell stories. After 12 novels I am able to make my own retrospective assessment, and I find recurring ideas and links of which I was unconscious at the time of writing.

My first six novels are in some way concerned with the class system in England, either as a main theme (The Liberty Man, Jack Would Be a Gentleman) or as part of the background (The Leather Boys). Although the rigid class patterns began to break up soon after the last war and have changed and shifted, they still remain subtle delineations that I find absorbing. In The Liberty Man there is the direct class confrontation in the love-affair between the middle-class school teacher and the cockney sailor. In Fall of Innocence I was writing about the sexual taboos of the middle class attacked by an outsider, a young American girl. This element, the planting of an alien into a tight social structure, reappears constantly in my novels atheist Harry into the Church of England parish in The Campaign; the Prossers in Jack Would Be a Gentleman from one class area into an elevated one in the same town; the cross-visiting of Freda and Derek in The Liberty Man; strongest of all, Hannah in The Alabaster Egg, transplanted from Munich of the 1930s to postwar London. This is the theme pursued in The Marriage Machine, with Marion, from rural England, unable to adapt completely to life in the United States and battling against her-in-laws (also uprooted from Europe) for the mind of her young son. In Jack Would Be a Gentleman the theme is the sudden acquisition of money without the middle- or upper-class conditioning which makes it possible to deal with it. The Campaign has the background of a seedy seaside parish, against which the personal problems of a cross-section of individuals (all involved in a fund-raising campaign) are exacerbated; God and Mammon, the permissive society, the Christian ethics. The Leather Boys is the story of two working-class boys who have a homosexual affair; The Leader explores fascism in a modern democracy, which, on both sides of the Atlantic, throws up a sufficient number of people who are greedy, ruthless, intolerant, bigoted and perverted enough to gravitate towards the extreme right. In Nazi Lady the socially climbing heroine, Elisabeth, records in her diary her joy in meeting Hitler. in The Alabaster Egg, which I consider my best work to date, Hannah also meets Hitler and there is another fictitious diary, an historical memoir of a lover of Ludwig II. This earlier novel contains several of my recurring themes-fascism, homosexuality, the main characters all victims of the prevailing political scenes. There are parallels between Hitler's Germany and Bismarck's reflecting in two love affairs which end in betrayal. I used real as well as imaginary characters, linking fiction and reality closely, and did so, too, in Nazi Lady. An Easter Egg Hunt is concerned with the disappearance of a schoolgirl during Word War I-another character wrenched from her normal environment, a refugee from France now living in England's Lake District where the war harshly changes the lives of the four main protagonists. Love Child, in the psychological thriller genre, is about the problem of surrogate motherhood in both England and the United States. Once more, the heroine, feckless and easygoing Gwen, is thrust into a new society. In Termination Rock the narrator, Joanna, finds herself with an alter ego, Victorian Ann, the two stories paralleled as both of them travel to and in America. Whether Joanna's journey is into the paranormal or whether there is a psychological and logical explanation, is for the reader to decide. This novel, with its double time scale, has links with both The Alabaster Egg and The Marriage Machine, and also continues my fascination with the United States. The Marriage Machine, Love Child, and Termination Rock, in different ways and in different periods, deal with the adaptation to life in North America.

My choice of Einstein for a children's biography—a highly individual man whose life was spent in trying to eliminate the frontiers of prejudice—and the thesis of The Undergrowth of Literature (the need for fantasy in the sexually disturbed) illustrate my interest in and compassion for those unable to conform to the accepted social mores. To some extent my film writing has also dealt with social and sexual distress, as did my short play for The National Theatre, Pursuit. The ballet scenarios for Kenneth MacMillan, although the subjects were not selected by me, again present individuals who are "outsiders"—Prince Rudolf in Mayerling and the strong, passionate and wayward Isadora Duncan.

* * *

Since her first novel, The Liberty Man, Gillian Freeman has shown an outstanding ability to get inside the skin of characters from very different social backgrounds. It should be remembered that The Liberty Man was considerably in advance of its time in its truly empathic conveyance of a working-class character (Derek, a naval rating) who becomes involved in an affair with an intellectual and middle-class woman. This book appeared when the prevailing literary method of portraying working-class people still tended to be by projecting the image of the well-intentioned but clumsy, scruffy, and inarticulate "little man." The unusual power of The Liberty Man, however, does not rest only in its portrait of Derek, but in his relationship with Freda, the middle-class school teacher, through which Freeman analyses resonances between people from extremely diverse social groups, and between the inner experiences of the individual and the externals that he sees in operation around him.

Freeman is, in a sense, the writer of the archetypal anti-Cinderella story. She has acute honesty and a flair for precise, almost wickedly unerring observation of detail and motive. In her novels, despite changes of fortune (Jack Would Be a Gentleman is a good example) people's lives are not transformed, and their basic inadequacies remain. Her novels are preoccupied with frustration and fallibility; she frequently manages, however, by well-timed injections of compassion, to lift a book's mood of inadequacy and doubt into warmth and well-being that are almost physical in the strength of their expression.

Freeman observes and analyses the vagaries of human nature but rarely makes moral judgments. She highlights complexities in apparently "ordinary" or superficial characters, and makes her jaded sophisticates capable of sudden deep and challenging emotions. She explores conflicts between ambition and conscience, and the primitive feelings that underlie the veneer of our civilization. Permeating some of her narratives is a sense that the protective social structure we strive to perpetuate is deeply flawed. She is, in this context, extremely concerned with nonconformity—the healthily truculent attitudes of the working classes; the bewildered responses of the unconscious homosexual; the rootlessness of the young that can sometimes find expression only in violence (The Leather Boys).

Freeman's novels are synonymous with power and panache, though these qualities are often expressed in low-key and even throwaway language. She is in this respect quintessentially English, and until The Alabaster Egg her preoccupations were with issues particularly pertinent to English society. The Alabaster Egg is her most trenchant and telling work. It is about the pursuit of political power, and this is counterpointed by a probing of the exploitation of human beings at the personal level. Her setting is wider than in the earlier novels; it is no longer England but Europe—or the world—and the focus, significantly, is Germany—the vortex of 20th-century "civilization," corruption, and decay.

Her earlier stories were concerned with displacement, in particular with the catalytic effect of an alien presence in a close-knit and apparently secure social structure (Fall of Innocence, The Campaign). The Alabaster Egg highlights an ironic reversal of this theme of dissociation; Hannah, the book's heroine, has the misfortune to be a Jew in Nazi Germany. She does not, however, see herself as an alien. In her own estimation she is as much a German as a Jew. Her situation, of course, stresses one of the most pernicious effects of Nazi racist policies—the enforced separation of certain people from their own communities, from the only group to which they had felt a sense of belonging. Hannah's tragic but resilient story has parallels with happenings in the time of Bismarck. Her love affair with a "real" German is illuminated by her readings from the diary of the homosexual lover of King Ludwig II. This affair—like Hannah's—ends in bewilderment and betrayal.

Having written compellingly from the viewpoint of a sensitive and intelligent Jewish woman caught up in the hideousness of fascism, Freeman goes on to write as if from the inside about a passionate supporter of Hitler's ideologies in Nazi Lady. This originally appeared as a factual diary; it was so convincing that one critic pronounced it "unquestionably genuine." Genuineness, of course, does not have to be a matter of fact but of mood, and in this sense Nazi Lady is genuine, although it is a work of fiction. Freeman says that it was inspired by her publisher's observations on the extraordinary dichotomy between the anguishes of the battles of Stalingrad and the "good life" enjoyed at the same time by influential civilians in Germany.

In Nazi Lady the heroine's initial enthusiasm for Nazism is presented with subtlety and conviction. Elisabeth is German; to English readers she is possibly a slightly glamorized amalgam of Marlene Dietrich, Irma Greeser, and whatever the Nazi slogan "Strength through Joy" suggested. As well as being brittle she is beautiful, and her experiences are macabrely fascinating.

Freeman combines fact and fiction with aplomb. (For example, Elisabeth has to accept expert but distasteful seduction by Goebbels in order to save her husband from the rigors of the Russian Front.) In the end, all her convictions are reduced to ashes, as both her son and her husband become victims of Nazi ruthlessness and fanaticism. But she survives—and marries an American from the liberating forces.

An Easter Egg Hunt is set in a girls' school during Word War I, and it is not only an intriguing mystery story on its own account but memorable for its evocation of Angela Brazil's schoolgirl adventures. School was, of course, regarded by Angela Brazil as the (essentially neatly ordered) world in microcosm; but Freeman recognizes bizarre and eccentric elements even in the innately conservative and sheltered confines of school life. She adeptly creates and manipulates her adolescent characters without excesses or sentimentality, and they are in fact far removed from Brazil's colorful but artless embodiments of schoolgirlishness.

The narrative style of Freeman's novels is perfectly suited to her sensitive but down-to-earth approach. Her prose is robust and direct; her plots are constructed with economy and excellence, and the stories seem to vibrate with energy and insight.

-Mary Cadogan

FRENCH, Marilyn

Nationality: American. Born: Marilyn Edwards in New York City, 21 November 1929. Education: Hofstra College (now University), Hempstead, Long Island, B.A. 1951, M.A. 1964; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, Ph.D. 1972. Family: Married Robert M. French in 1950 (divorced 1967). Career: Instructor, Hofstra University, 1964–68; assistant professor of English, College of the Holy Cross, Worcester, Massachusetts, 1972–76; artist-in-residence, Aspen Institute for Humanistic Study, 1972; Mellon fellow, Harvard University, 1976. Agent: Sheedy Literary Agency, 41 King Street, New York, New York 10014, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Women's Room. New York, Summit, 1977; London, Deutsch, 1978.

The Bleeding Heart. New York, Summit, and London, Deutsch, 1980. Her Mother's Daughter. New York, Summit, and London, Heinemann, 1987.

Our Father. Boston, Little Brown, 1994; New York, Penguin, 1995.My Summer with George. New York, Knopf, distributed by Random House, 1996.

Other

The Book as World: James Joyce's Ulysses. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Press, 1976; London, Abacus, 1982.

Shakespeare's Division of Experience. New York, Summit, and, London, Cape, 1981.

Beyond Power: On Women, Men, and Morals. New York, Summit, and London, Cape, 1985.

The War against Women. New York, Summit, and London, Hamilton, 1992.

A Season in Hell: A Memoir. New York, Knopf, 1998.

* * *

The narrator of Marilyn French's phenomenally best-selling first novel, The Women's Room, leaves the subject of men's pain 'to those who know and understand it, to Philip Roth and Saul Bellow and John Updike and poor wombless Norman Mailer.' French's own most extensive treatment of male suffering appears not in her three long feminist fictions but in The Book as World: James Joyce's Ulysses, where she describes Stephen Dedalus's emotional paralysis and Leopold Bloom's moral heroism. By accepting his "participation in the human condition," Stephen can accept his own feelings and act in ways that will end his crippling numbness. "Such an end," says French, "is not equivalent to reaching some new Jerusalem where everything will become clear; it offers merely survival, the ability to live and grow." Stephen thus anticipates the shell-shocked female survivors of French's novels, who pass through their own nightmarish versions of Joyce's Nighttown.

French suggests that the endurance of Bloom and Stephen is "an affirmation of the human race;" the endurance of her protagonists— Mira, Dolores, and Anastasia—is a tribute to the "feminine principle" that offers the race's best hope for the future. In Beyond Power, French calls for a new synthesis of traditionally conflicting female and male values: "For women, as for society at large, it is necessary to reach out both to the dishonored body, discredited emotion, to blood and milk; and to self-control, power-to, assertive being in the world. Only by incorporating both can we attain integrity." French attributes much of the world's suffering to an obsession with patriarchal structures of power, a major concern too of her second novel, The Bleeding Heart. Pleasure, in the deep sense of felicity, must replace power as society's highest good. French's fictional women have several experiences of delight. Among the most memorable is the New Year's Eve dance in The Women's Room, where men and women, young and fortyish, join in a circle of "color and motion and love." Mira returns to the image as "a moment of grace vouchsafed them by something divine." Unfortunately, episodes of mutual nurturance are much less common than years of lonely anguish. French's central characters undergo agonies so severe that, as she says of Bloom and Stephen, "survival alone is a triumph."

Even as a girl, Mira Ward realizes that "Women are victims by nature." Almost raped by her boyfriend Lanny, she tearfully marries the gentle and intelligent Norm. Disinterested in sex and horrified at Mira's dreams of someday earning a doctoral degree, Norm makes her feel like "a child who had stumbled, bumbled into the wrong house." Almost two decades later, the divorced Mira still feels out of place even though she is finally working toward her long-deferred goal. French's novel opens in 1968 with Mira uneasily enrolled at Harvard. Supported by a women's group, which includes the outspoken Val, Mira gains a strong sense of woman's value that enables her to survive the rape of Val's daughter, Val's death in a confrontation between radical feminists and police, and even the break-up of her passionate affair with Ben, who asks her to delay her career by accompanying him to Africa and bearing his child. Only in the closing pages does it become clear that the somewhat cynical narrator—who considers her protagonist to be "a little ridiculous" —is actually Mira, now "unbearably alone" as she walks a Maine beach and waits for the fall semester to begin at the community college where she teaches English. Haunted by nightmares of a vacant-eyed man who pursues her with a phallic pipe and penknife, Mira nevertheless feels that it is "time to begin something new, if I can find the energy, if I can find the heart."

French's second novel lacks the narrative complexity, the large groups of characters, and the scope of The Women's Room, which traced Mira's growth from a naïve 1950s housewife to an independent woman of the 1970s against the cultural backdrop of the Eisenhower years, the assassinations of the Kennedys and Martin Luther King, Kent State, and My Lai. A tenured professor and author of two books, Dolores Durer—the bleeding heart of the title—seems to have achieved even greater success than Mira in recovering from an even worse marriage and divorce. Yet she feels like a "walking robot," and, celibate for years, her body is "dying of thirst." An affair with Victor Morrissey, an American businessman whom Dolores meets in England, relieves the sexual dryness but reconfirms her belief that "Women always end up paying" because the world follows "Men's rules, still, always." Victor does, however, encourage Dolores to share with him her most terrible memory, the suicide of her daughter Elspeth, thus enabling her to feel again. Freed from her repeated identification with Lot's pillar-of-salt wife, Dolores refuses a potentially numbing marriage to Victor (as Mira refused Ben) and prepares to return to her students and good woman friends.

Her Mother's Daughter, French's most experimental novel, incorporates struggles of three generations: Anastasia Stevens, a world-famous photographer; Belle, her often silent mother, who has a symbolically "defective heart;" and her immigrant grandmother, Frances. Striving to avoid the misery of her mother and grandmother, the twice-divorced Anastasia comes closer than French's earlier women to achieving the freedoms more usually associated with a man's life, but in learning a masculine self-control she so thoroughly masters her feelings that she "cannot find them myself." Anastasia's progress toward emotional recovery begins with the women's movement, a lesbian relationship with Clara Traumer, her reconciliation with the son and daughter who have grieved her, and—perhaps most significant—her mother's unprecedented words of praise: "I will never forget how sweet you were to me."

French's novels illuminate a distinction she makes between the "feminine" plots of comedy and the "masculine" plots of tragedy in "Shakespeare's Division of Experience": "We lose, but we replace, we substitute: we go on. This is as profound a truth as that we lose and cannot replace, we die." Less profound are the "truths" explored in My Summer with George, the story of a sixtysomething romance author's infatuation with an overweight and altogether unromantic newspaper editor. The lesson we learn from the frustrating affair of Hermione Beldame (nee Elsa Schutz) and George Johnson is that notions of romantic love so cherished by women are a lie: as their bodies age, the possibility of achieving even a simulacrum—say, an emotionally clumsy dalliance with a man well past his prime—diminish as well.

-Joan Wylie Hall, updated by Judson Knight

FRIEDMAN, Bruce Jay

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 26 April 1930. Education: De Witt Clinton High School, Bronx, New York; University of Missouri, Columbia, 1947–51, B.A. in journalism 1951. Military Service: United States Air Force, 1951–53: Lieutenant. Family: Married 1) Ginger Howard in 1954 (divorced 1977), three children; 2) Patricia J. O'Donohue in 1983, one daughter. Career: Editorial director, Magazine Management Company, publishers, New York, 1953–64. Visiting professor of literature, York College, City University, New York, 1974–76. Address: P.O. Box 746, Water Mill, New York 11976, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Stern. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1962; London, Deutsch, 1963.
A Mother's Kisses. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1964; London, Cape, 1965.

The Dick. New York, Knopf, 1970; London, Cape, 1971. About Harry Towns. New York, Knopf, 1974; London, Cape, 1975. Tokyo Woes. New York, Fine, 1985; London, Abacus, 1986. The Current Climate. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1989. A Father's Kisses. New York, Fine, 1996.

Short Stories

Far from the City of Class and Other Stories. New York, Frommer-Pasmantier, 1963.

Black Angels. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1966; London, Cape, 1967.

Let's Hear It for a Beautiful Guy and Other Works of Short Fiction. New York, Fine, 1984.

Collected Short Fiction. New York, Fine, 1995.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Pitched Out," in Esquire (New York), July 1988.

Plays

23 Pat O'Brien Movies, adaptation of his own short story (produced New York, 1966).

Scuba Duba: A Tense Comedy (produced New York, 1967). New York, Simon and Schuster, 1968.

A Mother's Kisses, music by Richard Adler, adaptation of the novel by Friedman (produced New Haven, Connecticut, 1968).

Steambath (produced New York, 1970). New York, Knopf, 1971. First Offenders, with Jacques Levy (also co-director: produced New York, 1973).

A Foot in the Door (produced New York, 1979).

Sardines (produced New York, 1994).

Have You Spoken to Any Jews Lately? (produced New York, 1995).

Screenplays: Stir Crazy, 1980; Splash, with others, 1984; Dr. Detroit, with others, 1988.

Other

The Lonely Guy's Book of Life. New York, McGraw Hill, 1978. The Slightly Older Guy. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1995. Even the Rhinos Were Nymphos: Best Nonfiction. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 2000.

Editor, Black Humor. New York, Bantam, and London, Corgi, 1965.

*

Critical Study: Bruce Jay Friedman by Max F. Schulz, New York, Twayne, 1974.

Theatrical Activities: Director: Play—First Offenders (co-director, with Jacques Levy), New York, 1973.

* * *

For good or ill, Bruce Jay Friedman seems destined to be forever linked with the literary phenomenon of the 1960s known as "black humor." In his foreword to Black Humor, an anthology he edited in 1965, Friedman ducks the business of rigid definition, insisting that each of the 13 writers represented is separate and unique, but he does suggest that "if there is a despair in this work, it is a tough, resilient brand and might very well end up in a Faulknerian horselaugh." For

Friedman, style is a function, an extension, of the disorderly world that surrounds him. As he puts it, there is a "fading line between fantasy and reality, a very fading line, a god-damned, almost invisible line." Friedman's slender fiction—as well as his drama and his screenplays—are pitched on this precarious edge. In such a world, the New York Times is "the source and fountain and bible of black humor," while television news convinces Friedman, perhaps too easily, that "there is a new mutative style of behavior afoot, one that can only be dealt with by a new, one-foot-in-the-asylum style of fiction." We are hardly surprised when a contemporary novelist declines rather than develops, when he or she adds increasingly smaller additions to the original house of fiction. For Friedman, Stern doubled as his debut and his most accomplished novel. It's all there in Stern: the uneasy Jewishness, the ulcers, the suburban situation. But the sense of terror it generates is actualized, altogether convincing, located in a compactness that never quite appears again in Friedman's fiction

Stern is, in short, the angst-ridden apartment dweller, nose pressed against suburbia while visions of extra rooms dance in his head: "As a child he had graded the wealth of people by the number of rooms in which they lived. He himself had been brought up in three in the city and he fancied people who lived in four were so much more splendid than himself." Alas, as Stern quickly discovers, he is not one of the Chosen People who can make the exodus from the bondage of crowded apartments to the Promised Land of suburban living. He is, at best, a reluctant pioneer, a man who misses the cop on the beat, the delicatessen at the corner.

Stern is a contemporary variation on the classical schlemiel, one victimized by darkly comic fantasies of his own making, rather than by accidents. Besieged by problems on all sides—caterpillars devour his garden, neighborhood dogs attack him on a nightly basis— Stern pictures the police as "large, neutral-faced men with rimless glasses who would accuse him of being a newcomer making vague troublemaking charges." Especially if he complains about the threatening dogs: "They would take him into a room and hit him in his large, white, soft stomach." And so he swallows his impulse to protest, only to imagine himself "fighting silently in the night with the two gray dogs, lasting eight minutes and then being found a week later with open throat by small Negro children." Friedman's subsequent works confirmed two facts: that he is equally at home in the novel (A Mother's Kisses), the short story (Far from the City of Class), or the play (Steambath); and that he is a flashy writer of limited scope. For example, in A Mother's Kisses, the psychodynamics of black humor shrink to Momism and the difficulties of getting into college. As always, excess is the heart of Friedman's matter:

He [Joseph] saw himself letting a year go by, then reapplying only to find himself regarded as a suspicious leftover fellow, his application tossed onto a pile labeled 'repeaters,' not to be read until all the fresh new ones had been gone through. Year after year would slip away, until finally, at thirty-seven, he would enter night school along with a squad of newly naturalized Czechs, sponsored by labor unions and needing a great many remedial reading sessions.

Joseph's American-Jewish mother begins as a vulgar cliché, and Friedman's touch merely raises it to a second power. When Joseph went away to summer camp, mother struck a camp of her own just across the lake; when Joseph finally sets off for Kansas Land Grant Agricultural (where courses like "the History and Principles of Agriculture" and "Feed Chemistry" comprise the curriculum) Mom insists on coming too.

And yet, there are moments in A Mother's Kisses when the terrors of contemporary life are rendered with sharp, metaphysical precision:

A long line had formed in the men's room, leading to a single urinal, which was perched atop a dais. When a fellow took too long, there were hoots and catcalls such as "What's the matter, fella, can't you find it?" As his turn came nearer, Joseph began to get nervous. He stepped before the urinal finally, feeling as though he had marched out onto a stage. He stood there a few seconds, then zipped himself up and walked off. The man in back of him caught his arm and said, "You didn't go. I watched."

Little of Kakfa's flavor is lost in the translation. And the hand that descends to unmask our smallest deception strikes us as real, all too real.

The problem, of course, is that Friedman throws off brilliantly comic moments without the inclination to turn them into sustained, comic fictions. He remains the perennial sophomore, chortling at what can only be called sophomoric jokes. In The Dick, for example, Friedman means to draw a parallel between sexuality and crimefighting, as the title of the novel and the name of its beleaguered protagonist, LePeters, suggest. One bad joke begets another. When LePeters has his psychological interview, the conversation owes more to Hollywood than to Henry James:

"What do you think all these guns around her represent?" he asked LePeters in a lightning change of subject.

"Oh, I don't know," said LePeters. "Phalluses, I guess." Actually, he had dipped into a textbook or two and was taking a not-so-wild shot.

"Not bad," said Worthway, lifting one crafty finger in the Heidelberg style and making ready to leave. "But some of them are pussies, too."

About Harry Towns focuses on a moderately successful screenwriter, one given to verbal razzle-dazzle, urbane irony, and just enough innocence to be amazed about the money producers stuff into his pockets and the girls who fall into his bed. One shorthand way of putting it might be this: the Sexual Revolution caught Harry Towns with his pants up. The result is a man in his forties (formerly married, now anguishing through a permanent ''temporary separation'') trying too hard to be trendy and protesting too much about enjoying it. No doubt Friedman's biographer will, one day, point out just how ''biographical'' the stories in fact were.

In Tokyo Woes, Friedman introduces Mike Halsey, a more circumspect protagonist—at least in the sense that he is more routinized, more circumspect, than the likes of Harry Towns: "Normally, Mike was a fellow who liked to stay close to his beat. Once he bought newspapers in one place, that's where he bought them." In short, Halsey "was a fellow who kept to the center of the road, although he had to admit that every time he swerved off a bit it had worked out nicely." A short chapter later (indeed, all the chapters in Tokyo Woes run to fewer than ten pages), Halsey is on his way to Tokyo, where comic misadventures and sexual peccadilloes will follow him like the night the day. For Friedman followers, the highjinks are all to predictable, all too self-consciously offered up.

With The Current Climate, Friedman returns to Harry Towns, the Hollywood wordsmith he had invented as a comic projection of the writing business and himself. Harry is still crazy after all these years—still frisky, still foolish, and still likely to be found in a writers' bar where sex and drugs are the major attractions. Friedman relates Harry's escapades in short, choppy sentences and with appropriately coarse language, but if the result has its comic moments, they tell us precious little about the scriptwriting racket and even less about who the Harry Towns under the highjinks really is.

For nearly two decades, Friedman has been a steady worker in the vineyards of Hollywood. One learned to look quickly as his name, and the other credits, rolled over the silver screen. The heyday of the black humorist was over. Some, like Ken Kesey, dropped out. And some, like Bruce Jay Friedman, apparently found the medium their "message" had been looking for all along.

-Sanford Pinsker

FRIEDMAN, Kinky

Nationality: American. Born: Richard Friedman, near Kerrville, Texas, 1944. Education: University of Texas, B.A. Career: Peace Corps, Borneo, 1966–68; leader of the country-western band Kinky Friedman and the Texas Jewboys; actor. Agent: Esther Newburg, International Creative Management, 8942 Wilshire Boulevard, Los Angeles, California 90211, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Greenwich Killing Time. New York, Beech Tree Books, 1986. A Case of Lone Star. New York, Beech Tree Books, 1987. When the Cat's Away. New York, Beech Tree Books, 1988. Frequent Flyer. New York, Morrow, 1989. Musical Chairs. New York, Morrow, 1991.

The Kinky Friedman Crime Club (includes Greenwich Killing Time, A Case of Lone Star, and When the Cat's Away). London, Faber, 1992; published in the United States as Three Complete Mysteries. New York, Wings Books, 1993.

Elvis, Jesus, and Coca Cola. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1993.Armadillos and Old Lace. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1994.God Bless John Wayne. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1995.The Love Song of J. Edgar Hoover. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1996.

Roadkill. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1997. Blast from the Past. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1998. Spanking Watson: A Novel. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1999.

Other

Sold American (musical recording). New York, Vanguard, 1973. Lasso for El Paso (musical recording). New York, Epic, 1976.

Under the Double Ego (musical recording). Austin, Texas, Sunrise Records, 1984.

Afterword, Daddy-O: Iguana Heads and Texas Tales by Bob "Daddy-O" Wade with Keith and Kent Zimmerman, foreword by Linda Ellerbee. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1995.

*

Critical Studies: Eat, Drink, and Be Kinky: A Feast of Wit and Fabulous Recipes for Fans of Kinky Friedman by Mike McGovern, New York, Simon & Schuster, 1999.

* * *

Kinky Friedman is the author of a dozen mystery novels that star himself as a detective with a distinctive persona—a Texas Jew, a country singer and songwriter turned amateur detective, living in a converted New York loft with a lesbian dance class that practices in the room above, fond of cats, cigars and cracking jokes, and of parading his sometimes politically incorrect prejudices. Friedman's first-person narratives are fuelled by the force of their fast-moving, streetwise, hip style which hardly gives the reader time to draw breath as it moves from one scene and set of characters to another. His work is notable for its combination of comedy with casually-strung plots that are not always easy to follow; Friedman himself has said that he is not interested in intricate plotting and that the secret of a good mystery is that nothing is what it appears to be. He both employs and consciously sends up the conventions of the hardboiled thriller and the detective novel, of Raymond Chandler and Agatha Christie, but he updates Chandler and Christie to postmodern America and his gumshoe narrator has a sharp eye for the energy and oddity of the contemporary U.S.A.

Most of Friedman's novels are set in Manhattan and provide a kind of metropolitan picaresque as their hero follows complicated trails of crime across the city. His tone and manner were immediately established by his first book, Greenwich Killing Time, in 1986. Seeking to solve a murder in which the corpse is found holding eleven pink roses, Kinky takes a voyage into the lower depths of New York in pursuit of a strange group of suspects. In his second novel, A Case of Lone Star, he investigates a series of murders of performers at a country and western cafe in Manhattan, while in his third, When the Cat's Away, a friend's stolen cat leads him into a world of murders, gang warfare and illicit drugs trading.

With his fourth novel, Frequent Flyer, Friedman extends the reach of his work. Although Kinky is still largely based in New York, his visit to a friend's funeral in Cleveland, Ohio, where he seems to be the only person to notice that the body in the coffin is that of a total stranger, leads him into what he himself calls a grotesque puzzle that stretches back nearly fifty years to the Nazi era and spans three continents. In Musical Chairs the members of Kinky's own former band, the Texas Jewboys, are the murder targets, which understandably sharpens his investigative zeal, while in Elvis, Jesus and Coca-Cola the victim is a maker of documentary films about Elvis impersonators.

Armadillos and Old Lace sees Kinky, unusually, leaving New York for Texas, where he investigates a series of deaths of elderly ladies, while in The Love Song of J. Edgar Hoover, a wife—in what Kinky recognizes as one of the most stereotyped of thriller devices—asks him to find her missing husband and starts him off on a complex inquiry that takes him to New York and Chicago. In Roadkill, he sets out to save an old friend from a Native American curse, while Blast from the Past, as its title suggests, returns to his younger days in New York, recalling his transformation from country singer to detective and the origins of his "Village Irregulars," McGovern, Rambam, and Ratso. Spanking Watson pursues the theme of the Village Irregulars when Kinky tries to find out which of the three would best serve as his Dr. Watson by asking each of them to find out who wrote a death threat to the teacher of the lesbian dance class that practices in the room above his loft; the writer of the threat is Kinky himself—but he then discovers that the teacher is really under threat from another, unknown source.

Friedman's fiction is not to everyone's taste. His novels are carried on his persona rather than on their plots, and the plots are not, in themselves, compelling—indeed, they can sometimes seem to be simply a pretext for the display of Kinky's personality. The other characters in his novels are very much refracted to us through that personality rather than emerging in their own right. Readers who find the personality engaging will enjoy the novels; others may find it oppressive or offensive. But there can be no doubt that Kinky Friedman has put an inimitable stamp upon the mystery thriller of the 1980s and 1990s and has acquired a devoted following. It remains to be seen whether his future work will continue to play variations on his well-established formulae or develop in new directions.

-Nicolas Tredell

FRUCHT, Abby

Nationality: American. Born: Huntington, New York, 27 April 1957. Education: Washington University, A.B. 1979. Family: Married Michael Zimmerman; one son. Career: Writer in residence, Cleveland State University, Cleveland, Ohio, 1988. Awards: Ohio Aid to Individual Artists fellowship, 1985; National Endowment for the Arts fellowship, 1987; short fiction award (University of Iowa Press), 1988. Agent: Tom Hart, 20 Kenwood Street, Boston, Massachusetts 02124, U.S.A. Address: 152 South Cedar Street, Oberlin, Ohio 44074, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Snap. New York, Ticknor & Fields, 1988.

Licorice: A Novel. St. Paul, Minnesota, Graywolf Press, 1990.

Are You Mine? New York, Grove Press, 1993.

Life Before Death. New York, Scribner, 1997.

Polly's Ghost: A Novel. New York, Scribner, 2000.

Short Stories

Fruit of the Month. Iowa City, University of Iowa Press, 1988.

* * *

Abby Frucht is a mistress of minutiae. In her novels and stories, love, lust, commitment, and betrayal are driven by detail. That oft-repeated dictum of fiction writing courses—''show not tell''—rules the roost in Frucht's work. She creates understated, highly visual worlds in the tradition of Anne Beattie: light on plot, heavy on tastes and smells and glimpses and the pondering of possibilities.

In her short story collection, Fruit of the Month, the character's epiphanies reside in sensual impression. In "How to Live Alone," the newly-widowed Nancy is trailed by a sense of her late husband's egocentric presence until she discovers a hidden stash of marijuana. While high, she rubs lotion into her skin and "watches as the cream disappears beneath her hands, into her skin, which has a reptilian look from the salt and sun." This moment of sensual indulgence allows her to keep her husband's ghost—and an eager male lover—at bay. She feels "self-absorbed and private," able to dream of a future all her own. In "Nuns in Love," Cynthia comes to accept the pretentious man who's courting her when she discovers they both appreciate pigeons, with their "noble heads." In "Fate and the Poet," the protagonist is so disappointed by her husband's gift, a tacky wilderness calendar—"the slick, bright images make her miserable"—that she's tempted to pursue a poet with whom she had an affair many years before. The question Frucht seems to pose is: are these sensually-inspired epiphanies frivolous, or born out of such deep existential angst that the sensual is the only way these characters can connect with the world?

In Snap, her first novel, Frucht lets Ida, one of her main characters, wise up to the potential emptiness of sensual impression. Her husband, Ruby, is so smitten with her that everything she does is a small miracle, including breaking an egg: "Ruby had never considered that such an act ... could be so moving." Ida is put off: "I've turned my husband into a maniac. The way he touches me in bed, like a piece of Steuben glass." But this is also a woman who makes wedding cakes. When her husband engages in an affair she's practically wished upon him, she wants him back. Her desire to reunite with him is expressed through her gorging on a wedding cake, "the most beautiful she has ever made."

Much of Frucht's work is preoccupied with the shortcomings and triumphs of monogamy and the ways it satisfies the yearning for stability, yet cannot conquer the fundamental instability of desire. Licorice gives this theme a magical realism twist. Scores of people, initially women, are vanishing from a small midwestern town, driven by their desire for the sensual unknown. Liz, a temporary letter carrier, does not leave her husband and son, though she is drifting away from them emotionally. She sublimates her own lust for a local redneck by consuming unhealthy quantities of licorice. Here Frucht's juxtaposition of the serious with the frivolous raises the question: Is desire a primal force that mysteriously sucks us away from what we thought we were committed to? Or is it like candy—tempting, silly, unhealthy (but not very), all about sweet sensation and eroding tooth enamel?

In Are You Mine? Frucht takes her investigation of the nature of desire into new territory. In her earlier works, her characters are caught up in the offerings of their lovers. The poet in "Fate and the Poet" is imagined to offer a life of glamour and freedom; the redneck in Licorice represents "something primitive." In Are You Mine? Frucht explores unintended pregnancy as the ultimate unknown possibility, the fetus a tabula rasa ready to be inscribed with Cara's love and dreams. Frucht reveals the many ways desire can, both literally and figuratively, determine an existence. As Cara considers whether to have an abortion, she can want or not want this baby, humanize or not humanize it. Isn't this what Frucht's earlier protagonists do with the lovers they take and abandon? To Ruby in Snap, Linelle fulfills him until he realizes he wants to return to his wife.

Then she is forgotten, her tears unheard, her importance in his life aborted.

In Life Before Death, the sensuousness of life takes on an existential importance for Isobel, who discovers she's dying of cancer. Herbal tea—the ultimate symbol of dilute sensation—is no longer enough for her. Where once "she thought the steaming mug contained all that was required of the whole galaxy, a swirling hot eddy of subtle tart flavor," now it is the "shard" in her breast that determines her universe. The cancer is both destructive and sexy; as it kills her it serves her as a metaphor of her own untapped wildness. The lump in her breast, her "surprise," "spread(s) rapturously through me." Frucht's prose in Life Before Death is more startling and less understated than ever before. Frucht's investment in minutiae undergoes a radical transformation; by exploring the true minutiae of life, the cell-level ravages in a cancer victim, Frucht tackles the greatest of paradoxes: the will to live despite the certainty of death.

In Polly's Ghost Frucht further develops the suburban magical realism she first explored in Licorice. Polly is a ghost who longs to participate in the life of the son she died giving birth to. As the prospect of death emboldens Life Before Death's Isobel, the 'real thing' transforms the always-in-control living Polly with the overeager, awkward dead one. She's the sort of ghost who, while attempting to entertain her son with a falling meteor, crashes a plane into a lake. Despite this ethereal clumsiness, Polly embodies our ultimate fantasy about the dead: that they are pure feeling, missing us and caring for us just as fiercely as we do them. In Life Before Death, Isobel describes a row of old-fashioned porcelain dolls, recently burned by a museum fire, as 'more alive dead than alive.' It's a description Isobel herself will fit once the cancer slays her and all we're left with is the memory of her vibrant spirit. Polly, too, is at her best once she's a ghost, struggling to connect with the world in a way she never could while alive.

—Lisa A. Phillips

G

GAINES, Ernest J(ames)

Nationality: American. Born: Oscar, Louisiana, 15 January 1933. Education: Vallejo Junior College; San Francisco State College, 1955–57, B.A. 1957; Stanford University, California (Stegner fellow, 1958), 1958–59. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1953-55. Career: Writer-in-residence, Denison University, Granville, Ohio, 1971, Stanford University, Spring 1981, and Whittier College, California, 1982. Since 1983 professor of English and writer-in-residence, University of Southwestern Louisiana, Lafayette. Awards: San Francisco Foundation Joseph Henry Jackson award, 1959; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1966; Rockefeller grant, 1970; Guggenheim grant, 1970; Black Academy of Arts and Letters award, 1972; San Francisco Art Commission award, 1983; American Academy award, 1987; National Book Critics Circle award, 1994, and Pulitzer prize, 1994, both for A Lesson Before Dying. D.Litt.: Denison University, 1980; Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, 1985; Bard College, Annandale-on-Hudson, New York, 1985; Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge 1987; D.H.L.: Whittier College, 1986. Agent: JCA Literary Agency, 242 West 27th Street, New York, New York 10001. Address: 128 Buena Vista Boulevard, Lafayette, Louisiana 70503–2059, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Catherine Carmier. New York, Atheneum, 1964; London, Secker and Warburg, 1966.

Of Love and Dust. New York, Dial Press, 1967; London, Secker and Warburg, 1968.

The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman. New York, Dial Press, 1971; London, Joseph, 1973.

In My Father's House. New York, Knopf, 1978.

A Gathering of Old Men. New York, Knopf, 1983; London, Heinemann, 1984.

A Lesson Before Dying. New York, Knopf, 1993.

Short Stories

Bloodline. New York, Dial Press, 1968.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Turtles," in Transfer (San Francisco), 1956.
- "Boy in the Doublebreasted Suit," in Transfer (San Francisco), 1957.
- "My Grandpa and the Haint," in New Mexico Quarterly (Albuquerque), Summer 1966.

Other

A Long Day in November (for children). New York, Dial Press, 1971.Porch Talk with Ernest Gaines, with Marcia Gaudet and Carl Wooton.Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1990.

*

Manuscript Collection: Dupree Library, University of Southwestern Louisiana, Lafayette.

Critical Studies: "Human Dignity and Pride in the Novels of Ernest Gaines" by Winifred L. Stoelting, in CLA Journal (Baltimore), March 1971; "Ernest J. Gaines: Change, Growth, and History" by Jerry H. Bryant, in Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Louisiana), October 1974; "Bayonne ou le Yoknapatawpha d'Ernest Gaines" by Michel Fabre in Recherches Anglaises et Américaines 9 (Strasbourg), 1976; "To Make These Bones Live: History and Community in Ernest Gaines's Fiction" by Jack Hicks, in Black American Literature Forum (Terre Haute, Indiana), Spring 1977; "Ernest Gaines: 'A Long Day in November" by Nalenz Puschmann, in The Black American Short Story in the 20th Century edited by Peter Bruck, Amsterdam, Grüner, 1978; "The Quarters: Ernest J. Gaines and the Sense of Place" by Charles H. Rowell, in Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Louisiana), Summer 1985; Critical Reflections on the Fiction of Ernest J. Gaines, edited by David C. Estes. Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1994; Wrestling Angels into Song: The Fictions of Ernest J. Gaines and James Alan McPherson by Herman Beavers. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995; Ernest J. Gaines: A Critical Companion by Karen Carmean. Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1998.

Ernest J. Gaines comments:

I have tried to show you a world of my people—the kind of world that I came from.

* * *

The fictive world of Ernest J. Gaines, as well as certain technical aspects of his works, might be compared to that of William Faulkner. But useful as such a comparison may be, it should not be pursued to the point of obscuring Gaines's considerable originality, which inheres mainly in the fact that he is Afro-American and very much a spiritual product, if no longer a resident, of the somewhat unique region about which he writes: south Louisiana, culturally distinguishable from the state's Anglo-Saxon north, thus from the nation as a whole, by its French legacy, no small part of which derives from the comparative ease with which its French settlers and their descendants formed sexual alliances with blacks.

Gaines's Afro-American perspective enables him to create, among other notable characters both black and white, a Jane Pittman (The Autobiography of Miss Jane Pittman) whose heroic perseverance we experience, rather than a housekeeping Dilsey (The Sound and the Fury) for whom we have little more than the narrator's somewhat ambiguous and irrelevant assurance that "She endured." In general, Gaines's peculiar point of view generates a more complex social vision than Faulkner's, an advantage Gaines has sustained with dramatic force and artistic integrity. Gaines's fictive society consists of whites, blacks, and creoles, presumably a traditionally more favored socio-economic class of African American given to fantasies of racial superiority to those of darker skin, fantasies of the kind the Martinican psychiatrist Frantz Fanon explores in Black Skin, White Masks.

The Gainesian counterparts of the Sartorises and Snopeses (the moribund aristocracy and parvenu "poor white trash" respectively of Faulkner's mythical Mississippi county) are the south Louisiana plantation owners, mostly of French extraction, and the cajuns, of French extraction but of lesser "quality." The cajuns are inheriting and spoiling the land and displacing the creoles and blacks, the former tragically though not irrevocably doomed by a persistent folly, the latter a people of promise who have never really betrayed their African heritage.

All Gaines's works reflect the inherent socio-economic intricacy of this quadruplex humanity, though we are never allowed to lose sight of its basic element of black and white. In his apprentice first novel Catherine Carmier, for instance, we see the sickly proscribed love of Jackson, who is black, and Catherine, daughter of an infernally proud creole farmer, as a perverted issue of the miscegenation that resulted from the white male's sexual exploitation of black people. This mode of victimization assumes metaphoric force in Gaines's works, figuring forth in historical perspective the oppression of black people generally. The fictive plantation world, then, is uniquely micro-cosmic. It is south Louisiana, the south, the nation as a whole. This aspect is explored, for example, in the title story of Bloodline. Copper, a character of mythopoeic proportion, the militant young son of a now deceased white plantation owner and a black woman field hand, stages a heroic return, presumably from his education in school and in the world at large, to claim his heritage: recognition of kinship by an aristocratic white uncle and his rightful share of the land. In In My Father's House, and for the first time, Gaines deals with the black father-son relationship, and explores a neglected aspect of African American life: the perplexities of the public vs. private person relative to individual responsibility. The Reverend Phillip Martin, a grass roots Civil Rights leader in the fictional south Louisiana town of St. Adrienne, is forced to confront his wayward past when his estranged son Etienne, reminiscent of Copper, comes to claim paternal recognition and redress of grievances.

In A Gathering of Old Men Gaines extends the thematic concerns of his earlier novels into a new South setting, employing a multiple first-person point of view in the manner of Faulkner's As I Lay Dying. The conflict between blacks and cajuns comes to a cinematically stylized, somewhat surrealistic climax and resolution as several old black men gather in mutual militant defense of one of their number who has been accused of killing Cajun farmer Beau Boutan, confronting the local sheriff as well as the slain man's avenging father, 'retired' nightrider Fix Boutan. The result is a gripping allegorical tale of race relations in the new South resonant with the Gainesian theme of individual responsibility, this time for holding ground in the wake of the civil rights gains of the 1960s and 1970s.

In Gaines's 1993 novel A Lesson Before Dying, set in 1940, individual responsibility is highlighted again. Wiggins, the novel's narrator, is a young school teacher and one among a number of Gainesian tutelary figures. Wiggins is pressured by his elders into assuming the responsibility of mentor to Jefferson, a young black manchild who awaits execution for having taken part in the murder of a white storekeeper, a crime for which he is apparently unjustly convicted in a racist environment. A National Book Critics Circle award winner and recipient of the Pulitzer Prize for fiction in 1994, A Lesson chronicles the young Jefferson's gradual assumption of responsibility, under Wiggins's increasingly committed mentorship, for assimilating the attributes of manhood before he dies in the electric chair. In one of Gaines's characteristic ironies, Wiggins's mentorship of Jefferson contributes to his own edification as well.

-Alvin Aubert

GALLANT, Mavis

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Mavis de Trafford Young in Montreal, Quebec, 11 August 1922. Education: Schools in Montreal and New York. Career: Worked in Montreal, early 1940s; reporter, Montreal Standard, 1944–50; has lived in Europe since 1950, and in Paris from early 1960s. Writer-in-residence, University of Toronto, 1983–84. Awards: Canadian Fiction prize, 1978; Governor-General's award, 1982; Canada-Australia literary prize, 1984; Canada Council Molson Prize for the Arts, 1997; Medaille de la Ville de Paris, 1999. Honorary degrees: Université Sainte-Anne, Pointe-de-l'église, Nova Scotia, 1984; Queen's University, 1992; University of Montreal, 1995; Bishop's University, 1995. Officer, Order of Canada, 1981. Agent: Georges Borchardt Inc., 136 East 57th Street, New York, New York 10022, U.S.A. Address: 14 rue Jean Ferrandi, 75006 Paris, France.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Green Water, Green Sky. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1959; London, Deutsch, 1960.

A Fairly Good Time. New York, Random House, and London, Heinemann, 1970.

Short Stories

The Other Paris. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1956; London, Deutsch, 1957.

My Heart Is Broken: Eight Stories and a Short Novel. New York, Random House, 1964; as An Unmarried Man's Summer, London, Heinemann, 1965.

The Pegnitz Junction: A Novella and Five Short Stories. New York, Random House, 1973; London, Cape, 1974.

The End of the World and Other Stories. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart. 1974.

From the Fifteenth District: A Novella and Eight Short Stories. New York, Random House, and London, Cape, 1979.

Home Truths: Selected Canadian Stories. Toronto, Macmillan, 1981; New York, Random House, and London, Cape, 1985.

Overhead in a Balloon: Stories of Paris. Toronto, Macmillan, 1985; London, Cape, and New York, Random House, 1987.

In Transit: Twenty Stories. Markham, Ontario, Viking, 1988; New York, Random House, 1989; London, Faber, 1990.

Across the Bridge: Stories. New York, Random House, 1993.

The Collected Stories of Mavis Gallant. New York, Random House, 1996.

Plays

What Is to Be Done? (produced Toronto, 1982). Montreal, Quadrant, 1984.

Other

The Affair of Gabrielle Russier, with others. New York, Knopf, 1971; London, Gollancz, 1973.

Paris Notebooks: Essays and Reviews. London, Bloomsbury, and New York, Random House, 1988.

*

Bibliography: By Judith Skelton Grant and Douglas Malcolm, in The Annotated Bibliography of Canada's Major Authors 5 edited by Robert Lecker and Jack David, Downsview, Ontario, ECW Press, 1984.

Manuscript Collection: Fisher Library, University of Toronto.

Critical Studies: "Mavis Gallant Issue" of Canadian Fiction 28 (Prince George, British Columbia), 1978; Mavis Gallant: Narrative Patterns and Devices by Grazia Merler, Ottawa, Tecumseh Press, 1978; The Light of Imagination: Mavis Gallant's Fiction by Neil K. Besner, Vancouver, University of British Columbia Press, 1988; Reading Mavis Gallant by Janice Kulyk Keefer, Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1989; Figuring Grief: Gallant, Munro, and the Poetics of Elegy by Karen E. Smythe, Montreal, McGill Queens' University Press, 1992; Mavis Gallant by Danielle Schaub. New York, Twayne, 1998.

* * *

The characters who move through the fiction of Mavis Gallant are unwilling exiles and victims, born or made. Her first collection of short stories, The Other Paris, clearly sets the tone of her work: in a series of impersonal, almost clinical sketches the lonely and displaced struggle against an indifferent or hostile world. A naive American girl, engaged to a dull American in Paris, wonders why her colorless days have no connection with the legendary "other Paris" of light and civility; a pathetic American army wife in Germany faces her stale marriage and a rootless future; a bitter, unforgiving set of brothers and sisters gathers after the funeral of their mother, a dingy Romanian shopkeeper in Montreal; a cow-like Canadian girl with Shirley Temple curls is repeatedly deceived by seedy fiancés; a traveler staying in a Madrid tenement watches a petty bureaucrat trying to justify the new order "to which he has devoted his life and in which he must continue to believe." These anti-romantic glimpses of dislocation and despair are rendered in deliberately hard, dry prose, reminiscent, like their subject matter, of Joyce's Dubliners. The narrative manner is flat, unadorned, without any relieving touches of wit—or, it seems, compassion (save for the best of the stories, "Going Ashore," in which a sensitive child is dragged from port to port by a desperate, amoral mother). Although there is an admirable consistency of theme and feeling in these stories, and a high degree of professional skill, there is little here to suggest the brilliance of Gallant's later work and her gradual mastery of longer, more demanding fictional forms.

The title of the next collection, My Heart Is Broken, reveals a continuation of the same concerns. Yet there is a good deal more vigor here, and an indication as well that the author, if not her characters, may be taking some pleasure in the sharpness of her perceptions. There is also the first clear suggestion of a problem which is to become of major importance in Gallant's later work: the eccentricity and near-madness to which her losers may be driven by want or isolation. Gallant has an appallingly accurate eye for the desperation of the shabby genteel, the Englishwomen who live at the edge of poverty in unfashionable pensions out of season, and a shrewd eye as well for the vulgarities of those who try to keep up the pretense of well being. And there is at least one completely successful story, "An Unmarried Man's Summer" which manages to combine many of the earlier preoccupations with a degree of wit and energy not present before.

Gallant's first experiment with longer fiction, Green Water, Green Sky, despite a vivid central section, suffers from an uncertainty of focus. Three of the four parts of the novella offer peripheral views of the breakdown of a young American wife, raised abroad and now living in Paris. The reasons for her drift into madness are never fully explained, although the blame must in part rest with a vain and foolish mother. Florence remains an intriguing and pathetic puzzle; our questions are unanswered, our sympathies largely unresolved. A second short novel, "Its Image on the Mirror" (My Heart Is Broken), is an unqualified success, partly because the point of view is strictly limited to one character—a device which is the source of some ambiguity here as well as consistency. The faintly repressed family hostilities which have appeared in various guises in the earlier work are now given sustained treatment. The narrator, Jean, who has always suffered from a sense of drabness and compromise in contrast to her beautiful younger sister, tries to come to terms with her ambivalent feelings. After years of apparent freedom and romance the spoiled Isobel makes what seems to be an unhappy and confining marriage; looking back, Jean is able to move towards compassion and acceptance. But to what degree is she using the narrative as a kind of revenge for the years she was forced to take second place? Is her sympathy finally untainted by satisfaction? The reader has no means of deciding, precisely because the author makes no comments on Jean's reminiscences. The uncertainty we feel at the end of the work, however, is entirely appropriate: Jean herself is still divided between love, pity and jealousy.

A Fairly Good Time is a splendidly complex full-length novel. Again the plot is familiar and simple in outline: a well-off, still young Canadian woman passes over the borders of sanity as her second marriage, to a Parisian journalist, dissolves. The reasons for her collapse, again, are hinted at rather than developed: an eccentric, domineering mother, a happy first marriage cruelly ended by a freak accident, the frustrating sense of isolation in a foreign world of would-be intellectuals and amoral opportunists—all of these play a partial role. This time, however, Gallant operates directly inside the mind of her heroine, and the result is a spectacular tour de force: the writing is disconcertingly vivid, full of the unmediated poetry of nearhallucination, yet nothing is irrelevant or misplaced. Shirley's madness has a kind of honesty about it which attracts the users and manipulators around her. The sane world of her husband's family and the Maurel family, into whose civil wars she is thrust, seems finally to offer much less integrity than her own world of memories and fantasies. At the conclusion there is just a hint that Shirley may be returning to reality, as she learns to moderate her hopes: "if you make up your mind not to be happy," runs the epigraph from Edith Wharton, "there's no reason why you shouldn't have a fairly good time."

There are no ideas in Gallant's work, no set of theses. The strong and willful may or may not succeed; the sensitive will almost certainly pay for their gifts. And if they endure, as Shirley may, or as Jean does in ''Its Image on the Mirror,'' the only wisdom is a kind of expensive stoicism:

We woke from dreams of love remembered, a house recovered and lost, a climate imagined, a journey never made .... We would waken thinking the earth must stop now, so that we could be shed from it like snow. I knew, that night, we would not be shed, but would remain, because that is the way it was. We would survive, and waking—because there was no help for it—forget our dreams and return to life.

This is not exactly hopeful, but neither is it completely despairing: perhaps if we learned to moderate our hopes we might have a fairly good time. But Gallant's more recent collections The Pegnitz Junction and From the Fifteenth District seem to deny even this modest possibility. The mood here is that of The Other Paris; the effect is considerably more oppressive, however, since Gallant has extended the range of her style. The relatively dry, understated manner of the first books has now been replaced by a highly poetic technique in which feelings are conveyed by sudden, uncanny, and yet astonishingly precise images. Yet as before, her characters do not act, they are acted upon; they suffer, but in the end it hardly seems to matter. Life dwindles away and with it everything which gave pleasure, so perhaps nothing had much substance to begin with. The conclusion of "An Autobiography" (The Pegnitz Junction) is typical. A middle-aged woman thinks about her failure to hold onto the love of a shiftless young man called Peter (the cause of the failure is left undefined, these things just "happen"):

These are the indecisions that rot the fabric, if you let them. The shutter slams to in the wind and sways back; the rain begins to slant as the wind increases. This is the season for mountain storms. The wind rises, the season turns; no autumn is quite like another. The autumn children pour out of the train, and the clouds descend upon the mountain slopes, and there we are with walls and a ceiling to the village. Here is the pattern on the carpet where he walked, and the cup he drank from. I have learned to be provident. I do not waste a sheet of writing paper, or a postage stamp, or a tear. The stream outside the window, deep with rain, receives rolled in a pellet the letter to Peter. Actually, it is a blank sheet on which I intended to write a long letter about everything-about Véronique. I have wasted a sheet of paper. There has been such a waste of everything; such a waste.

"The only way to be free," reflects one of the battered characters in From the Fifteenth District, "is not to love." This is the freedom of isolation, madness, and death, but perhaps any escape from being is preferable to the pain of living. Thus Piotr, for example, the central figure in the novella "Potter," welcomes the imagined prospect of his death: "Oh, to be told that there were only six weeks to live! To settle scores; leave nothing straggling, to go quietly." Yet even death may offer no release. In "From the Fifteenth District," a truly harrowing prose-poem—it can hardly be called a story—the pathetic ghosts of the dead complain to the "authorities" that the memories of life and the intrusions of the still-living make any final rest impossible.

-Elmer Borklund

GALLOWAY, Janice

Nationality: Scottish. Born: Kilwinning, Scotland, 2 December 1956. Education: Glasgow University, M.A. 1978. Family: Has one son. Career: Welfare rights worker, 1976–77; teacher of English, Strathclyde Regional Council, Ayrshire, Scotland, 1980–89. Awards: Scottish Arts Council book award, 1990, and MIND book of the year/ Allan Lane award, 1991, both for The Trick Is to Keep Breathing; Cosmopolitan/Perrier award, 1991, for short story writing; Scottish Arts Council book award, 1991, for Blood; E. M. Forster award in literature (American Academy of Arts and Letters), 1994; McVitie's prize for Scottish Writer of the Year, 1994; Times Literary Supplement research fellow, British Library, 1999. Agent: Cathie Thomson, 23 Hillhead Street, Hillhead, Glasgow G12 8PX, Scotland. Address: 25 Herriet Street, P.O. Hokshields, Glasgow G41 2NN, Scotland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novel

The Trick Is to Keep Breathing. Edinburgh, Polygon, 1989; Normal, Illinois, Dalkey Archive Press, 1994.

Foreign Parts. London, Vintage, 1995; Normal, Illinois, Dalkey Archive Press, 1995.

Where You Find It. London, Jonathan Cape, 1996.

Short Stories

Blood. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Random House, 1991.

Other

Editor, with Hamish Whyte, New Writing Scotland 8. Aberdeen, Aberdeen University Press, 1990.

Editor, with Hamish Whyte, Scream, If You Want to Go Faster. Aberdeen, Association for Scottich Literary Studies, 1991.

Editor, with Marion Sinclair, Meantime. N.p., 1991.

Editor, with Hamish Whyte, Pig Squealing. Aberdeen, Association for Scottich Literary Studies, 1992.

Editor, with Hamish Whyte, New Writing Scotland 9. Aberdeen, Aberdeen University Press, 1991.

Editor, with Hamish Whyte, New Writing Scotland 10. Aberdeen. Aberdeen University Press, 1992.

* * *

Hailed by novelist John Hawkes as "a Scottish Poe of the lower middle class," Janice Galloway writes a grimly detached yet eerily familiar fiction that combines minimalist style, formal innovation, contemporary subject matter, and Gothic sensibility. In a bleak and sometimes blackly humorous manner, she chronicles various forms of social and psychological oppression, particularly as experienced by women.

The Trick Is to Keep Breathing creates an unnerving atmosphere of fragility and menace as it traces one woman's efforts over the course of several weeks to deal with the death of her married lover. "This Is the Way Things Are" in the post-Trollope world of the novel's ironically, indeed oxymoronically named narrator-protagonist, Joy Stone: straitened, empty, in-between in every sense, caught for the most part (as is the reader) in a perpetual, numbing present. On the one hand, Joy is too independent and intelligent to accept the bromides dispensed by the modern therapeutic community; on the other, she cannot entirely escape feeling that she is the problem: inadequate and therefore guilty, insufficiently persistent in her behavior or "realistic" in her attitude. Compounding her situation is the fact that she is a woman (depression and suicide run in the family on the female side) and a Scot. "Love/Emotion = embarrassment: Scots equation. Exceptions are when roaring drunk or watching football. Men do rather better out of this loophole." Joy does rather worse in any and all of her roles: teacher, friend, patient, lover, Other Woman, "harridan," and would-be princess awaiting the arrival of her prince.

Withdrawing further into herself, perhaps dangerously so, and out of necessity making do with the little that is financially and psychologically available to her, she fills in the blank that her life has become with writing that proves just as compelling as it is disturbing. At once highly fragmented and omnivorously, obsessively multifarious, her narrative includes the postcards she receives from her one (geographically distant) friend, the replies she writes, the lists she compiles, the pop-song lyrics she hears on the radio, the advice columns she reads in the tabloids, dramatized scenes depicting her brief encounters with others, painful memories, even marginalia. Surveying the contemporary wasteland from her bleak council housing estate on the outskirts of Glasgow, shoring the fragments against the ruin but without benefit of T. S. Eliot's "mythic method" and all it metaphysically implies, Joy seems less the latest version of the hysterical woman, the madwoman in the attic, than the female writer in a room not quite her own (it belongs to her dead lover) but able nonetheless to write in a voice at once entirely original yet filled with the echoes of Galloway's literary precursors, chief among them Plath, Kafka, Scheherazade, Stevie Smith, James Kelman, the Dickinson of "After Great Pain," the Beckett of The Unnamable, and Krapp's Last

Where Galloway's novel takes something comparatively small and expands it, minutely and almost unbearably, the twenty-two stories that make up Blood move in the opposite direction toward an equally intense and unnerving compression. Long or short, Galloway's goal remains the same: giving voice to repressed narratives. In the novel Joy claims that she cannot actually scream; she can only write "it" down. In the collection, "Things stick ... in her throat that she would never say," her "voice full of splinters." The five "Scenes from the Life" take the form of little plays having little or no dialogue. In "Two Fragments," a woman remembers her mother's macabre versions of how her father lost two fingers and her grandmother an eye—not during the war but while hungrily eating fish and chips, not while breaking a piece of coal but while trying to kill a cat by boiling it alive. "Faire Ellen and the Wanderer Returned" retells the Odysseus myth from a contemporary Penelope's point of view. Stories such as "Love in a Changing Environment" take literary minimalism to a chilly and chilling extreme, whereas the phantasmagoric "Plastering the Cracks" recalls the repressed protagonist of Roman Polanski's Repulsion. Throughout the collection there is the sense of trust and especially of innocence betrayed: The father who tricks his young son into falling from the fireplace mantle in order to teach him the lesson, "Trust nae cunt," the woman who comes to the aid of an elderly man who has stumbled only to have him strike out at her. In the title story that opens the collection a young girl's having a tooth extracted becomes a horrific study in female shame, and in the haunting novella-length "A Week with Uncle Felix" at collection's end, speechlessness and sexuality come together in a particularly suspenseful and disturbing manner wholly characteristic of Galloway's larger aesthetic and unprogrammatically feminist concerns.

Foreign Parts is, for all its broad hints of comedy—two friends and opposites, Rona and Cassie, take to the French countryside on holiday—imbued with more than a wisp of tragedy. "The knight on the white charger is never going to come, Rona," Cassie says. "You know why? Because he's down the pub with the other knights, that's why."

-Robert A. Morace

GANGEMI, Kenneth

Nationality: American. Born: Bronxville, New York, 23 November 1937. Education: Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, Troy, New York, B.Mgt.E. 1959; San Francisco State College (now University), California. Military Service: Served in the United States Navy, 1960–61. Family: Married Jana Fisher in 1961. Awards: Stegner fellowship, 1968; PEN grant, 1975; Creative Artists Public Service fellowship, 1976. Address: 211 E. Fifth St., New York, New York 10003, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Olt. New York, Orion Press, and London, Calder and Boyars, 1969.Corroboree: A Book of Nonsense. New York, Assembling Press, 1977.

The Volcanoes from Puebla. London, Boyars, 1979. The Interceptor Pilot. London, Boyars, 1980.

Poetry

Lydia. Los Angeles, Black Sparrow Press, 1970.

* * *

A literary innovator whose works have often had their first appearance in French translation or in British editions, Kenneth Gangemi has distinguished himself as an uncompromising perfectionist whose fiction makes none of those gestures toward popularity that made similar developments part of mainstream American fiction in the later 1960s and 1970s. Without foregrounding techniques or dramatizing his pose as an anti-illusionistic writer, Gangemi has fashioned a style of narrative that at times questions itself comically and always highlights the pleasure of having referential materials from the world being transformed into the makings of literary art.

His short novel Olt remains the best introduction to Gangemi's fiction. Although it qualifies as anti-fiction (in the terms of refusing to capitalize on the effects of suspended disbelief), not a single convention of traditional fiction is violated. The characterization of Gangemi's protagonist, Olt, is coherent, and the narrative action of his adventures is linear. Gangemi's style is clear and concise. Yet none of these familiar aspects is used to accomplish the customary aim of narrative. There are no flashes of insight or moments ponderous with great meaning, and certainly no accumulation of wisdom that might add up to a conclusive point. Instead Gangemi fashions a narrative life in which his on-going language constitutes an experiential flow of life, as Olt's existence is generated by the fact that he lives within a sentence structure capable of accommodating an infinite series of actions. "Olt knew he would never see a meteor striking an iceberg, a bat falling into snow, or a clown on a nun," for instance. "He knew he would never go to a party and talk to thunderstorm experts, rollercoaster experts, vampire experts, sailplane experts, dinosaur experts, or volcano experts. He knew that he would never design bear grottos, furnish a time capsule, live in an orange grove, wade in a vat of mercury," and so forth. Even though all of these objects exist in the world, and even though syntax makes it possible to combine them, what readers know about the world confirms that seeing a bat fall into snow is among the unlikeliest of possibilities. Yet these sentences of Gangemi's have linked them linguistically, the word "not" preserving the narrative from utter nonsense. Readers can therefore delight in the combinatory action of language without having to suspend disbelief. Free of any obligation to add up to something, these fictive objects can be appreciated in and of themselves.

In Corroboree—like Olt, a short novel of about sixty pages—Gangemi uses similar found objects to constitute a style. These objects predominate over narrative, and where narrative exists it is often for the sake of a self-referential joke, such as the quickly summarized story of a man who makes a fortune in the shipping industry by realizing cargoes of ping-pong balls need not be insured against sinking. Gangemi's talent for construing off-base situations leads to such real-life observations as noting a woman at the Hong Kong Hilton suggesting a trip to Chinatown and considering the effect of filling a cello with jello. As a result, language is allowed to become its own subject without such artificial devices as concrete forms on the page or devices such as featuring a writer writing a story about a writer writing a story about a writer writing a story about a Gangemi's most successful work is The Volcanoes from Puebla. As a transfictional narrative, it combines the most useful aspects of both the novel and the travel memoir by discarding those factors which prove overly determining for each form: in the case of fiction, the need for a developing story, and in the memoir a dedication to the chronology of time and integrity of space. In The Volcanoes from Puebla, the only true narrative results from the reader coming to an appreciation of Mexico as a sensual experience, while the autobiographical element of this experience is countered by the adventure being broken down by alphabetical points of reference. The references themselves are various, as idiosyncratic as a system devised by Jorge Luis Borges to show off its own infinite cleverness. While "Calle Bolivar" rates a description as a street in Mexico City, so do "Helmets" (as part of a motorcyclist's gear) and "Mexican Day" (as a reflection on typical daily rhythms). Read in this jigsaw-puzzle manner, the book stresses the materials of experience themselves, apart from any of the typical travelog conventions which by prioritizing such materials tend to falsify the experience. The test of Gangemi's effectiveness as a writer is how well he is able to hold this experience together, fragmented as it is by the alphabetical structure and antisystematics of its categories. Soon the reader sees how the author himself is experiencing Mexico free from traditional constraints—letting buses pass by while he appreciates the pleasure of waiting at the bus stop, seeing a beautiful girl walk by with a baby coati-mundi on her shoulder and not knowing whether to look at her or at the coatimundi. The Volcanoes from Puebla is itself experienced by the reader just this way, free of both fictive narrative and biographical consequence.

The ultimate effect of Gangemi's art is seen in what is his most conventional narrative, a full-length novel titled The Interceptor Pilot. Its plot is traditional and has the interest of a politically pertinent action thriller: during the Vietnam War an American pilot volunteers his service in defense of the North against bombing by his own countrymen. The key to this novel is that it is told as simply and as sparely as possible; indeed, the form implied is that of the film treatment, a bare-bones, present-tense indication of how the camera is supposed to capture the action ("The scene is ...," "The time is ..."). Here Gangemi has taken just the element that his earlier fiction discarded, and now employs it to do the work that in other cases would be accomplished by detailed characterization, careful imagery, and complexly contrived action (all of which the movie treatment assumes will be displayed for the camera). Again like a film The Interceptor Pilot ignores every element except what can be seen; being so limited, it must rely on such cinematic devices as montage and quick cutting. What happens in the narrative becomes a dynamic collage in which each object remains itself just as much as it functions as an agent of action: kills stenciled beneath an airplane cockpit railing, a copy of Le Monde tossed on the seat of a French journalist's car, TOP SECRET stamped on an Air Force document. Just as the objects of Olt, Corroboree, and The Volcanoes from Puebla function as narrative and not just referential materials, the lightness and clarity of Gangemi's prose allows similar objects to take on similar artistic importance in The Interceptor Pilot.

-Jerome Klinkowitz

GARCIA, Cristina

Nationality: Cuban-American. Born: Havana, Cuba (immigrated to United States in 1960), 4 July 1958. Education: Barnard College, B.A. 1979. Family: Married Scott Brown in 1990; one daughter. Career: Reporter and researcher, Time magazine, 1983–85, correspondent, 1985–90, bureau chief in Miami, 1987–88. Awards: Hodder fellowship (Princeton University), 1992–93; Cintas fellowship, 1992–93; Whiting Writers Award, 1996. Agent: Ellen Levine, 15 East 26th Street, Number 1801, New York, New York 10010, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Dreaming in Cuban. New York, Knopf, 1992. The Agüero Sisters. New York, Knopf, 1997.

Other

Cars of Cuba (essay), created by D.D. Allen, photographs by Joshua Greene. New York, Abrams, 1995.

* * *

Cristina Garcia's literary reputation is based on the publication of two novels in the 1990s, Dreaming in Cuban and The Agüero Sisters. In these two works, she explores similar themes—how the actions of different generations affect each, sibling differences, geographic displacement, political and personal deterioration, delusion, and the implausibility of emotional intimacy between the sexes—though the second work takes a stylistically more mature approach.

Born in Cuba in 1958, Garcia arrived in the United States in 1960 during the first wave of Cuban emigration. She was educated at Barnard College, studied at the School of International Affairs at Johns Hopkins, and worked as a reporter for Time magazine. Garcia was the first Cuban-America woman to publish a novel written in English; her work reflects the ongoing sensibility of those Cuban-Americans whose loyalties oscillate between Cuba and the United States.

Dreaming in Cuban focuses on three generations of Cuban and Cuban-American women whose ineffectual spouses and lovers often lead them to delusion and insanity. Women dominate the book, which is written in brief first and third person narratives. The inability of men to satisfy the basic desires of women—sexual and otherwise leads them to unfulfilled fantasies and obsession. Matriarch Celia continues writing letters to an absent Spanish lover, despite her subsequent marriage and mental deterioration. One of her daughters fantasizes about having sex with "El Líder," as Garcia dubs the phantom Fidel Castro. Madness has led this daughter to dispose of three spouses or lovers by violent means. A second daughter escapes Cuba for the United States after the revolution, grows grotesquely fat, makes unrealistic sexual demands on her husband-who in turn retreats from emotional intimacy-and is haunted by her father's ghost. The third generation is rootless, plagued by and rebelling against a sense of nonspecific loss and political and personal disinterest that perhaps will be overcome only by an exchange of Cuba for the United States or vice-versa, though Garcia ends the book ambiguously. Cuba's political situation comes under a critical microscope, though Garcia interweaves the political and the personal, blaming neither exclusively for the deterioration of the characters' lives. From the opening pages and throughout the book, Garcia undermines assumptions that Dreaming in Cuban is a political novel by leading the reader to that assumption and then abruptly switching focus onto the personal events of a character's life, which may take equal blame in the evolution of his or her situation.

The Agüero Sisters is a much more mature effort, focusing to a great extent on personal search and redemption. Though generational effects continue, as in Dreaming in Cuban, in The Agüero Sisters Garcia pares the story down to that of two sisters, one in the United States, the other in Cuba, and their parents. Men are again ineffectual, though the father, Ignacio, is permitted to speak for himself through diary entries that describe events leading up his wife's murder by his own hand. Madness, delusion, and an overwhelming desire to reach an uncharacterized essence of life through a direct relationship with the earth bring her to abandon her husband and child, humiliating the former. Her actions, his over-intellectualism, and the resulting inability to understand her or meet her needs drive him to murder and suicide. Garcia unfolds the story gradually through the intermittence of the diary entries. The Agüero Sisters also benefits from Garcia's linguistic maturity in choosing the appropriate rather than the significant word, as she had done in Dreaming in Cuban. Though Dreaming in Cuban had a few comic episodes, The Agüero Sisters has almost none. The Afro-Cuban religion of santería also plays a smaller role.

Critical reaction to Garcia's work has been limited by the small number of works to date, but has been exceptional. Thulani Davis, reviewing Dreaming in Cuban in the New York Times, compared Garcia's use of language to that of Louise Erdrich, writing that "Ms. Garcia has distilled a new tongue from scraps salvaged through upheaval." Margarite Fernández Olmos, writing in Bendíceme, America, noted the powerful link between politics and Latina sexuality in Garcia's work.

-Harold Augenbraum

GARLAND, Alex

Nationality: English. Born: London, England, 1970. Education: Attended Manchester University. Awards: Betty Trask prize, 1998. Address: c/o Putnam Publishing Group, 200 Madison Avenue, New York, New York 10026, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Beach. New York, Riverhead Books, 1997. The Tesseract. New York, Riverhead Books, 1999.

* * *

Alex Garland creates exotic entertainments that have inspired comparisons to the work of Graham Greene and even Joseph Conrad with their mix of psychological exploration, moral conundrum, and suspenseful plotting. If these comparisons seem a bit generous, they can be seen as the natural consequence of Garland's phenomenal commercial success.

The Beach is a dystopian fantasy rooted in the very rootlessness of contemporary society. It is narrated by a young drifter whose affectless voice masks deep dissatisfactions and troubling, all-too-human drives. When he finds and joins other western culture refugees in a secret island commune off the coast of Thailand, this narrator proves to be the catalyst who ignites an emotional conflagration that destroys their idyll.

The Beach is a familiar tale of a perfected community raised by noble aspirations and felled by basic human failings, a tale whose most notable modern example is William Golding's Lord of the Flies, which has also been cited as a discernible precursor to Garland's work, although The Beach, for all its dead-on critiques of contemporary life, lacks Golding's primal resonance. Where Lord of the Flies plumbed the inherent barbarities of human nature, The Beach merely depicts humanity's pervasive pettiness. Indeed, one of the most telling and consequential conflicts in The Beach concerns two characters' claims over which of them is the discoverer of a wild mango orchard. Such a conflict might have serious import if starvation were at stake, as it is in Lord of the Flies, but The Beach is set in a geographic cornucopia of edible flora and fauna, so that the largest consequence of this argument is the loss of dessert and, of course, pride. Another misunderstanding stems from a chaste kiss given to a sick girl, a strangely immature dilemma given the ages of the commune-dwellers and the fact that they all came to this place to ostensibly escape the bounds of society. In fact, of all the appetites given free rein in the commune, the libidinous is hardly even mentioned. As The Beach concludes, the prevailing question is not so much how such a perfect place could be so terribly dismantled; it is how such a place ever got built at all.

In The Tesseract Garland creates a more complex and more ambitious narrative that still contains enough taut pacing to be packaged, like The Beach, as a thriller. Unlike its predecessor, however, The Tesseract eschews first-person, linear narration. Instead, Garland constructs and interweaves four separate narrative lines that come together in a violent and nihilistic climax. Set in the Philippines, The Tesseract involves a drugged-out English sailor, a Filipino mafioso and his henchmen, a doctor waiting for her husband to come home, a pair of street-urchins, and a grieving psychologist who studies dreams, all in a chase plot lifted right out of hard-boiled pulp.

In terms of craft, The Tesseract represents a more formal mode for Garland, as its narration jumps from character to character, often looping back in time to provide context and characterization. Where The Beach offered oblique commentary on contemporary life through its characters' use of pop-culture metaphors (the Vietnam War as a movie, death as the end of a video game), The Tesseract has a more overt message linked to its title, which refers to a type of shape that is the two-dimensional representation of something that exists in four dimensions, a mathematical construct called a hypercube. As Alfredo, the psychologist, tellingly muses about the shape's significance, Garland makes him an embedded critic of the novel itself, thinking, "A hypercube is a thing you are not equipped to understand ... This means something ... We can see the thing unraveled but not the thing itself." In The Tesseract's climax, this thought is meant to have a kind of prophetic resonance, but it comes off as a redundancy, given Garland's masterful construction itself.

—J.J. Wylie

GARNER, Helen

Nationality: Australian. Born: Helen Ford in Geelong, Victoria, 7 November 1942. Education: Manifold Heights State School; Ocean Grove State School; The Hermitage, Geelong; Melbourne University, 1961–65, B.A. (honors) 1965. Family: Married 1) William Garner in 1968, one daughter; 2) Jean-Jacques Portail in 1980. Teacher, Werribee High School, 1966–67, Upfield High School, 1968–69, and Fitzroy High School, 1971–72, all Victoria; journalist, Digger, 1973; lived in Paris, 1978–79. Career: Writer-in-residence, Griffith University, Nathan, Queensland, 1983, and University of Western Australia, Nedlands, 1984. Melbourne theater critic, National Times, Sydney, 1982–83. Since 1981 feature writer, Age, Melbourne. Since 1985 member of the Australia Council Literature Board. Awards: Australia Council fellowship, 1978, 1979, 1980, 1983; National Book Council award, 1978; New South Wales Premier's award, 1986. Address: 849 Drummond St., North Carlton, Victoria 3054, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Monkey Grip. Melbourne, McPhee Gribble, 1977; London, Penguin, 1978; New York, Seaview, 1981.

Moving Out (novelization of screenplay), with Jennifer Giles. Melbourne, Nelson, 1983.

The Children's Bach. Melbourne, McPhee Gribble, 1984.

Cosmo Cosmolino. Ringwood, Victoria, McPhee Gribble, 1992; London, Bloomsbury, 1993.

Short Stories

Honour, and Other People's Children: Two Stories. Melbourne, McPhee Gribble, 1980; New York, Seaview, 1982.

Postcards from Surfers. Melbourne, McPhee Gribble, 1985; New York, Penguin, 1986; London, Bloomsbury, 1989.

My Hard Heart: Selected Fiction. Ringwood, Victoria, Viking, 1998.

Plays

The Stranger in the House, adaptation of a play by Raymond Demarcy (produced Melbourne, 1982; London, 1986).

Other

La Mama: The Story of a Theatre. Melbourne, McPhee Gribble, 1988.The First Stone: Some Questions About Sex and Power. Sydney, Pan Macmillan Australia, 1995; New York, Free Press, 1997.

True Stories: Selected Non-Fiction. Melbourne, Australia, Text Publishing, 1996.

•

Critical Study: "On War and Needlework: The Fiction of Helen Garner" by Peter Craven, in Meanjin (Melbourne), no. 2, 1985; Helen Garner by Kerryn Goldsworthy. New York, Oxford University Press, 1996.

* * *

Helen Garner's novels deal with the fractured relationships of "alternative" living in Melbourne. Against a background of communes and shared houses, the drug scene, rock bands, cooperative movies, suburb, and beach, her characters try to form relationships and cope with their inevitable failure. Her fiction explores the point at which freedom stops and irresponsibility begins. It is a world in which women with love to spare try to deal with men who have "the attention span of a stick insect' who monopolize them one minute and ignore them the next. There is a sympathetic, fatalistic cast to her writing. Most of her characters could be summed up by the line: "Their mother was dead and they were making a mess of things." Monkey Grip is Nora's account of her obsessive love for Javo, a junkie. They belong to a subculture where drugs define the real and the tolerable, where there is no tomorrow only today, and therefore where commitments to another person are infinitely redefinable. "I'm not all that worried about futures. I don't want to love anyone forever." Nora's love, her habit of "giving it all away," is as addictive as Javo's heroin habit, and makes her as vulnerable. She supports and is supported by other women, sometimes finding herself consoling or being consoled by a sexual rival. The pain and the jealousy are intense but in the curiously reticent unreticence of this culture, protest about exploitation is limited to declarations as inadequate as, "That makes me feel bad." By the end of the novel Nora has achieved some degree of detachment from Javo, but there is no guarantee that the cycle will not be repeated with another exploitingly helpless male.

Honour, and Other People's Children is a pair of novellas which show characters similar to those in Monkey Grip at a later stage in their lives. Each involves separation. In "Honour" a woman who has been separated for five years from her husband is shocked by his asking for a divorce in order to remarry. Instead of the commune life he now wants "a real place to live, with a back yard where I can plant vegies, and a couple of walls to paint, and a dog-not a bloody room in a sort of railway station." Despite their five-year separation Elizabeth still feels a residual bonding which is now threatened. Relationships in this book are much more richly delineated than in the first novel. Here they are products of shared experience, shared jokes and personal rituals, family connections and mutual awareness. When Frank's father is about to die, it is Elizabeth who accompanies him on the visit. Their child stands in the middle of an awkward triangle wanting all to live together and not comprehending the nuances and difficulties of the situation. However her instinct is right, and ex-wife and future wife tentatively feel towards some sort of acquaintance, even friendship, symbolized by the balanced seesaw of the story's conclusion.

"Other People's Children" moves the focus away from heterosexual relationships to the declining friendship between two women who have been the nucleus of a shared house, and have gradually become abrasive towards each other. Over years in the same household Scotty has come to love Ruth's daughter, Laurel, and hers is the greatest loss when the house breaks up. Loving other people's children gives no rights, not even the limited access granted to the non-custodian parent by the divorce court. Ruth's relationship with the self-protective Dennis shows the same sort of male manipulation used by Javo in Monkey Grip, while Madigan, to whom Scotty turns for companionship, is so torn between misogyny and the need for acceptance that he ranks as the most destructive of Garner's male characters.

The Children's Bach extends Garner's range of characters, and puts them in a new arrangement. Whereas previous novels concentrated on the isolation of characters and on the failures of bonding, this novel offers at least one couple in a successful relationship: "She loved him. They loved each other. They were friends." Dexter and Athena embody an innocence which characters in the earlier novels seem never to have had. Their marriage is stable and caring despite the strains put on it by their retarded second son who has a musical sense but not speech. Set against them are Dexter's old friend from university days, Elizabeth, her lover Philip, and her younger sister, Vicky. There is a clash of values in this novel, and a sense that characters are redefining their perspectives instead of being depicted at a stage when they are already locked into a fixed way of seeing, and surviving in, the world.

Music has always been an important motif in Garner's books, and here it becomes dominant. In earlier works it offered, like sex or drugs, a way of immersion or escape. It is associated with most of the characters in this novel, and it generally suggests sanity and harmony. While Philip uses music to exploit people, it is a mark of Athena's unglamorous dedication to making life work, and of Dexter's uncomplicated gusto.

Postcards from Surfers is a collection of stories which offers vignettes on the ways people relate and report themselves to others. In the title story a woman holidaying with her parents who have retired to the seaside writes a series of postcards to a former lover which she does not post because it's "too late to change it now." Other stories tell of chance meetings, visits, trips in Europe and Australia. Males in this collection continue to be selfish, manipulative, and arrogant but Garner ends some of the stories more hopefully in the manner of The Children's Bach. Women trying to make something of their lives ("The Life of Art") are always going to find males unsatisfactory, but they can support each other. Women are always going to be racked by passion for men who want them less continuously and exclusively, but it is possible to "hang on until the spasm passes."

Cosmo Cosmolino, with its eponymous novella and two short stories—all three of which are interrelated—explores themes familiar to Garner's readers, but uses new motifs such as magic realism. Such developments may be an outgrowth of the author's deepened interest in spiritual matters.

—Chris Tiffin

GARRETT, George (Palmer, Jr.)

Nationality: American. Born: Orlando, Florida, 11 June 1929. Education: Sewanee Military Academy; The Hill School, graduated 1947; Princeton University, New Jersey, 1947-48, 1949-52, B.A. 1952, M.A. 1956, Ph.D. 1985; Columbia University, New York, 1948–49. Military Service: Served in the United States Army Field Artillery, 1952–55. Family: Married Susan Parrish Jackson in 1952; two sons and one daughter. Career: Assistant professor, Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut, 1957-60; visiting lecturer, Rice University, Houston, 1961-62; associate professor, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, 1962-67; writer-in-residence, Princeton University, 1964–65; professor of English, Hollins College, Virginia, 1967–71; professor of English and writer-in-residence, University of South Carolina, Columbia, 1971-73; senior fellow, Council of the Humanities, Princeton University, 1974-77; adjunct professor, Columbia University, 1977-78; writer-in-residence, Bennington College, Vermont, 1979, and University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, 1979–84. Since 1984 Hoyns Professor of English, University of Virginia, Charlottesville. President of Associated Writing Programs, 1971–73. United States poetry editor, Transatlantic Review, Rome (later London), 1958-71; Contemporary Poetry Series editor, University of North Carolina Press, Chapel Hill, 1962–68; co-editor, Hollins Critic, Virginia, 1965-71; Short Story Series editor, Louisiana State University Press, Baton Rouge, 1966-69. Since 1970 contributing editor, Contempora, Atlanta; since 1971 assistant editor, Film Journal, Hollins College, Virginia; since 1972 co-editor, Worksheet, Columbia, South Carolina; since 1981 editor, with Brendan Galvin, Poultry: A Magazine of Voice, Truro, Massachusetts; since 1988 fiction editor, The Texas Review; contributing editor, Chronicles, Rockford, Illinois. Vice-chancellor, 1987-93, chancellor, 1993-97, Fellowship of Southern Writers. Awards: Sewanee Review fellowship, 1958; American Academy in Rome fellowship, 1958; Ford grant, for drama, 1960; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1967; Contempora award, 1971; Guggenheim fellowship, 1974; American Academy award, 1985; New York Public Library Literary Lion award, 1988; T. S. Eliot award, 1989; PEN/Malamud award for short fiction, 1990; Aiken-Taylor award, 1999. Cultural Laureate of Virginia, 1986; Hollins College medal, 1992; University of Virginia President's Report Award, 1992. D. Litt.: University of the South (Sewanee), 1994. Agent: Jane Gelfman, John Farquharson Ltd., 250 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10107, U.S.A. Address: 1845 Wayside Place, Charlottesville, Virginia 22903, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Finished Man. New York, Scribner, 1959; London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1960.

Which Ones Are the Enemy? Boston, Little Brown, 1961; London, W. H. Allen, 1962.

Do, Lord, Remember Me. New York, Doubleday, and London, Chapman and Hall, 1965.

Death of the Fox. New York, Doubleday, 1971; London, Barrie and Jenkins, 1972.

The Succession: A Novel of Elizabeth and James. New York, Doubleday, 1983.

Poison Pen. Winston-Salem, North Carolina, Wright, 1986.

Entered from the Sun. New York, Doubleday, 1990.

The Old Army Game: A Novel and Stories. Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1994.

The King of Babylon Shall Not Come Against You. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1996.

The Elizabethan Trilogy (includes Death of the Fox, Entered from the Sun, and Succession), edited by Brooke Horvath and Irving Malin. Huntsville, Texas, Texas Review Press, 1998.

Short Stories

King of the Mountain. New York, Scribner, 1958; London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1959.

In the Briar Patch. Austin, University of Texas Press, 1961.

Cold Ground Was My Bed Last Night. Columbia, University of Missouri Press, 1964.

A Wreath for Garibaldi and Other Stories. London, Hart Davis, 1969. The Magic Striptease. New York, Doubleday, 1973.

To Recollect a Cloud of Ghosts: Christmas in England. Winston-Salem, North Carolina, Palaemon Press, 1979.

An Evening Performance: New and Selected Short Stories. New York, Doubleday, 1985.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Other Side of the Coin," in Four Quarters (Philadelphia), (6), 1957.
- "The Rare Unicorn," in Approach (Wallingford, Pennsylvania), (25), 1957.
- "The Only Dragon on the Road," in Approach (Wallingford, Pennsylvania), (31), 1959.

- "3 Fabliaux," in Transatlantic Review (London), (1), 1959.
- "The Snowman," in New Mexico Quarterly (Albuquerque), (29), 1959.
- "Two Exemplary Letters," in Latitudes (Houston), (1), 1967.
- "Jane Amor, Space Nurse," in Fly by Night, 1970.
- "There Are Lions Everywhere," "How Can You Tell What Somebody's Thinking on the Telephone," and "Moon Girl," all in Mill Mountain Review (Roanoke, Virginia), Summer 1971.
- "Here Comes the Bride," in Gone Soft (Salem, Massachusetts), (1), 1973.
- "Live Now and Pay Later," in Nassau Literary Magazine (Princeton, New Jersey), 1974.
- "Little Tune for a Steel String Guitar," in Sandlapper (Columbia, South Carolina), (9), 1976.
- "Soldiers," in Texas Review (Huntsville), (3), 1982.
- "Wine Talking," in Quarterly West (Salt Lake City), (20), 1985.
- "Ruthe-Ann," in Texas Review (Huntsville), (6), 1985.
- "Genius Baby," in Chattahoochie Review (Dunwoody, Georgia), 1986.
- "Dixie Dreamland," in South Carolina Review (Clemson), (19), 1986
- "The Confidence Man," in Necessary Fictions, edited by Stanley W. Lindberg and Stephen Corey. Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1986.
- "Captain Barefoot Tells His Tale," in Virginia Quarterly Review (Charlottesville), Spring 1990.
- "Velleities and Vicissitudes," in Sewanee Review (Tennessee), Fall 1990.

Plays

Sir Slob and the Princess: A Play for Children. New York, French, 1962.

Garden Spot, U.S.A. (produced Houston, 1962).

Enchanted Ground. York, Maine, Old Gaol Museum Press, 1981.

Screenplays: The Young Lovers, 1964; The Playground, 1965; Frankenstein Meets the Space Monster, with R.H.W. Dillard and John Rodenbeck, 1966.

Television Plays: Suspense series, 1958.

Poetry

The Reverend Ghost. New York, Scribner, 1957.

The Sleeping Gypsy and Other Poems. Austin, University of Texas Press, 1958.

Abraham's Knife and Other Poems. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1961.

For a Bitter Season: New and Selected Poems. Columbia, University of Missouri Press, 1967.

Welcome to the Medicine Show: Postcards, Flashcards, Snapshots. Winston-Salem, North Carolina, Palaemon Press, 1978.

Luck's Shining Child: A Miscellany of Poems and Verses. Winston-Salem, North Carolina, Palaemon Press, 1981.

The Collected Poems of George Garrett. Fayetteville, University of Arkansas Press, 1984.

Days of Our Lives Lie in Fragments: New and Old Poems, 1957–1997. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1998.

Other

James Jones (biography). New York, Harcourt Brace, 1984.Understanding Mary Lee Settle. Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1988.

My Silk Purse and Yours: The Publishing Scene and American Literary Art. Columbia, University of Missouri Press, 1992.

The Sorrows of Fat City: A Selection of Literary Essays and Reviews. Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1992.

Whistling in the Dark: True Stories and Other Fables. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1992.

Bad Man Blues: A Portable George Garrett. Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1998.

Editor, New Writing from Virginia. Charlottesville, Virginia, New Writing Associates, 1963.

Editor, The Girl in the Black Raincoat. New York, Duell, 1966.

Editor, with W.R. Robinson, Man and the Movies. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1967.

Editor, with R.H.W. Dillard and John Moore, The Sounder Few: Essays from "The Hollins Critic." Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1971.

Editor, with O.B. Hardison, Jr., and Jane Gelfman, Film Scripts 1–4. New York, Appleton Century Crofts, 4 vols., 1971–72.

Editor, with William Peden, New Writing in South Carolina. Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1971.

Editor, with John Graham, Craft So Hard to Learn. New York, Morrow, 1972.

Editor, with John Graham, The Writer's Voice. New York, Morrow, 1973.

Editor, with Walton Beacham, Intro 5. Charlottesville, University Press of Virginia, 1974.

Editor, with Katherine Garrison Biddle, The Botteghe Oscure Reader. Middletown, Connecticut, Wesleyan University Press, 1974.

Editor, Intro 6: Life As We Know It. New York, Doubleday, 1974. Editor, Intro 7: All of Us and None of You. New York, Doubleday, 1975.

Editor, Intro 8: The Liar's Craft. New York, Doubleday, 1977.

Editor, with Michael Mewshaw, Intro 9. Austin, Texas, Hendel and Reinke, 1979.

Editor, with Sheila McMillen, Eric Clapton's Lovers and Other Stories from the Virginia Quarterly Review. Charlottesville, University Press of Virginia, 1990.

Editor, with Mary Flinn, Elvis in Oz: New Stories and Poems from the Hollins Creative Writing Program. Charlottesville, University Press of Virginia, n.d.

Editor, with Susan Stamberg, The Wedding Cake in the Middle of the Road. New York, Norton, 1992.

Editor, with Paul Ruffin, That's What I Like (About the South). Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1993.

*

Bibliography: In Seven Princeton Poets, Princeton University Library, 1963; "George Garrett: A Checklist of His Writings" by R.H.W. Dillard, in Mill Mountain Review (Roanoke, Virginia), Summer 1971; George Garrett: A Bibliography 1947–1988 by Stuart Wright, Huntsville, Texas Review Press, 1989.

Manuscript Collection: Duke University, Durham, North Carolina.

Critical Studies: By James B. Meriwether, in Princeton University Library Chronicle (New Jersey), vol. 25, no. 1, 1963; "George Garrett Issue" of Mill Mountain Review (Roanoke, Virginia), Summer 1971; "Imagining the Individual: George Garrett's Death of the Fox" by W. R. Robinson, in Hollins Critic (Hollins College, Virginia), August 1971; "The Reader Becomes Text: Methods of Experimentation in George Garrett's The Succession" by Tom Whalen, in Texas Review (Huntsville), Summer 1983; "George Garrett and the Historical Novel" by Monroe K. Spears, in Virginia Quarterly Review (Charlottesville), Spring 1985; To Come Up Grinning: A Tribute to George Garrett edited by Paul Ruffin and Stuart Wright, Huntsville, Texas Review Press, 1989; Understanding George Garrett by R.H.W. Dillard, Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1989.

George Garrett comments:

(1972) I feel I am only just beginning, still learning my craft, trying my hand at as many things, as many ways and means of telling as many stories as I'm able to. I hope that this will always be the case, that somehow I'll avoid the slow horror of repeating myself or the blind rigor of an obsession. I can't look back, I'm not ashamed of the work I've done, but it is done. And I am (I hope) moving ahead, growing and changing. Once I've seen something into print I do not re-read it. I have tried always to write out of experience, but that includes imaginative experience which is quite as "real" to me and for me as any other and, indeed, in no way divorces from the outward and visible which we often (and inaccurately) call reality. I only hope to continue to learn and to grow. And to share experience with my imaginary reader. I use the singular because a book is a direct encounter, a conversation between one writer and one reader. Though I couldn't care less how many, in raw numbers, read my work, I have the greatest respect for that one imaginary reader. I hope to manage to please that reader before I'm done, to give as much delight, or some sense of it, as I have received from reading good books by good (1986) Years and scars, and various and sundry books, later, I would not change much in my earlier statement, innocent as it was. Now that I am in my mid-fifties I would not use the word hope so much. Naturally I have less hope for myself; though I insist on maintaining high hopes for the best of the young writers I teach. And I have every intention, with and without hope, to continue working, trying to learn my craft always (never to master it), still seeking, sometimes finding my imaginary reader. I know more than a decade's worth of darker, sadder things than I did in 1972. So does the world. So goes the world. Well, I have learned a full deck of new jokes, also, and never ceased to taste good laughter. If some hopes have faded and been abandoned, faith, which is altogether something else, has replaced them. And the old dog learns new tricks. One: to turn to the light and live on it until it's gone. Another: to be as open as I can until my book is closed.

(1991) In 1989 I was suddenly 60 years old, older than I had planned to be or ever imagined. Not that a whole lot has changed (I was and am still a viable candidate for the American Tomb of the Unknown Writer); but I did finish my Elizabethan trilogy; and now I have a new publisher and have embarked on three related American novels, coming out of our recent history. I am not planning to live forever, but I would like to finish telling these stories and some others on my mind. Meantime I'm a grandfather and have the pleasure of seeing a generation and a half of former students writing and publishing books on their own. And I am sometimes surprised by the kindness of strangers. The world is not (all claims to the contrary) a kinder or gentler place; but, somewhat to my cynical chagrin, I keep discovering worthy and amazing creatures in it.

(1995) Is there anything to add? Years-now I'm 65 and counting. And still working as hard as I can, hoping to get the work done, hoping, from here on, the work will simply speak for itself.

* * *

Directness, seriousness, a Chaucerian comic sense which in no way conflicts with that seriousness, imaginative vigor, sheer intelligence, and a rich variety of matter and manner—these qualities mark the fiction of George Garrett. An American, a southerner, Garrett has published seven novels, a collection of short novels, five collections of stories (including the major collection of new and selected stories, An Evening Performance), seven books of poems (including The Collected Poems), plays and screenplays, and a respectable body of critical work (including a biography of James Jones and a monograph on the fiction of Mary Lee Settle). This output reveals his energy and the scope of his interests, and they offer some indication of the seriousness with which he pursues his vocation as writer. Garrett approaches his world and his work with an Elizabethan forcefulness and range, directly and with all his strength.

Garrett is a Christian artist—not a pietist, but a writer whose very sense of the living world is infused with an Augustinian Christian understanding. He is a realist and not a fabulist, but, because of his Christian belief, his work is never far from parable, his direct reality always shaped by the enigmas of the spirit. His seven novels are very different each from each in subject and texture, but together they form a quest for a narrative structure sufficient to the expression of his increasingly more complex view of the ways of the world. The Finished Man is a novel of modern Florida politics; Which Ones Are the Enemy? takes place in Trieste during the American occupation following World War II; Do, Lord, Remember Me concerns the shattering visit of an evangelist to a small Southern town; Death of the Fox is an account of the events, exterior and interior, of the last two days of Sir Walter Raleigh's life; The Succession is a synoptic recreation of the events surrounding the succession of James I to the throne of Queen Elizabeth; Poison Pen (a new novel built upon the ruins of a larger, unfinished novel to have been called Life with Kim Novak Is Hell) is an acidly satirical examination of American public lives, illusion and reality, and the real and illusory nature of fiction itself; Entered from the Sun is an Elizabethan mystery novel which explores the illusion and impenetrable reality surrounding Christopher Marlowe's death. But they are all products of the same central concerns—a blessing of the dark and fallen world, a knowledge of the power of the imagination to enter that dark world and create and sustain values in it, a faith in the possibility of redemption and salvation even in the very process of the fall into sin and death, and a commitment to the individual moment as the sole window on eternity.

Garrett's major works thus far are the novels in his Elizabethan historical trilogy. In Death of the Fox all of his major thematic concerns come together in the person of Ralegh, the soldier, the politician, the sailor, the poet, and the morally creative man. In his imaginative union with Ralegh, Garrett fuses present and past into an artistic whole which is both truth and lie—the disappointing truth which nevertheless burns ideally in the imagination and dreams of the beholder (as in Garrett's earlier short story, "An Evening Performance") and the saving lie of love (as in his poem "Fig Leaves") which enables us "to live together." The Succession both extends and fulfills the stylistic and formal advances of Death of the Fox by presenting a thoroughly researched and vividly written account of English and Scottish life in the years succeeding, following, and pivoting upon the succession in 1603, and at the same time developing an aesthetic meditation on the creation and revelation of meaning in the succession of moments that makes up the nexus of time. Set in 1597, Entered from the Sun brings the trilogy round full circle, allowing Ralegh to be viewed this time from the outside rather than from within, and commenting both upon the way time conceals truth and the way the fictive imagination attempts to penetrate those concealing veils—commenting, therefore, upon itself and upon the trilogy as a whole.

How he will develop as he moves beyond these major milestones of his career (the Elizabethan trilogy, the collected stories, and the collected poems) is fascinating to contemplate. Garrett has always continued to grow and change in his work while so many of his contemporaries have faltered or simply repeated themselves book after book. His importance becomes clearer year by year as the magnitude of his exploration of reality (outward and inward) reveals itself with each new and startlingly original book.

-R.H.W. Dillard

GASS, William H(oward)

Nationality: American. Born: Fargo, North Dakota, 30 July 1924. Education: Schools in Warren, Ohio; Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio, 1942-43, 1946-47, A.B. 1947; Ohio Wesleyan University, Delaware, 1943; Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, 1947–50, Ph.D. 1954. Military Service: Served in the United States Navy, 1943–46: Ensign. Family: Married 1) Mary Pat O'Kelly in 1952, two sons and one daughter; 2) Mary Alice Henderson in 1969, two daughters. Career: Instructor in Philosophy, College of Wooster, Ohio, 1950-54; assistant professor, 1954-60, associate professor, 1960–65, and professor of philosophy, 1966–69, Purdue University, Lafayette, Indiana. Since 1969 professor of philosophy, now David May Distinguished University Professor in the Humanities and director, International Writers Center, both Washington University, St. Louis. Visiting lecturer in English and philosophy, University of Illinois, Urbana, 1958-59. Awards: Longview Foundation award, 1969; Rockefeller fellowship, 1965; Guggenheim fellowship, 1969; American Academy award, 1975; Award of Merit medal, 1979; National Book Critics Circle award, for criticism, 1986. L.H.D.: Kenyon College, 1973; George Washington University, Washington, D.C., 1982; Purdue University, 1985. Member: American Academy, 1983. Agent: International Creative Management, 40 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10019. Address: International Writers Center, Campus Box 1071, One Brookings Drive, Washington University, St. Louis, Missouri 63130-4899, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Omensetter's Luck. New York, New American Library, 1966; London, Collins, 1967.

Willie Masters' Lonesome Wife (essay-novella). New York, Knopf, 1971.

The Tunnel. New York, Knopf, 1995. Cartesian Sonata and Other Novellas. New York, Knopf, 1998.

Short Stories

In the Heart of the Heart of the Country and Other Stories. New York, Harper, 1968; London, Cape, 1969.

The First Winter of My Married Life. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1979.

Culp. New York, Grenfell Press, 1985.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Clairvoyant," in Location 2 (New York), 1964.
- "The Sugar Crock," in Art and Literature 9 (Paris), 1966.
- "We Have Not Lived the Right Life," in New American Review 6, edited by Theodore Solotaroff. New York, New American Library, 1969
- "The Cost of Everything," in Fiction (New York), vol. 1, no. 3, 1972.
- "Mad Meg," in Iowa Review (Iowa City), Winter 1976.
- "Koh Whistles Up a Wind," in Tri-Quarterly 38 (Evanston, Illinois), 1977.
- "Susu, I Approach You in My Dreams," in Tri-Quarterly 42 (Evanston, Illinois), 1978.
- "August Bees," in Delta 8 (Montpellier, France), May 1979.
- "The Old Folks," in The Best American Short Stories 1980, edited by Stanley Elkin and Shannon Ravenel. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1980.
- "Why Windows Are Important to Me," in The Best of Tri-Quarterly, edited by Jonathan Brent. New York, Washington Square Press, 1982.
- "Uncle Balt and the Nature of Being," in The Pushcart Prize 7, edited by Bill Henderson. Wainscott, New York, Pushcart Press, 1982.
- "Family Album," in River Styx. St. Louis, Big River Association, 1986.

Other

Fiction and the Figures of Life. New York, Knopf, 1970.

On Being Blue. Boston, Godine, 1976; Manchester, Carcanet, 1979.

The World Within the Word: Essays. New York, Knopf, 1978.

The House VI Book, with Peter Eisenman. Boston, Godine, 1980.

Habitations of the Word: Essays. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1985.

Words about the Nature of Things. St. Louis, Washington University, 1985.

A Temple of Texts. St. Louis, Washington University, 1990. Finding a Form: Essays. New York, Knopf, 1996.

Reading Rilke: Reflections on the Problems of Translation. New York, Knopf, 1999.

Editor, with Lorin Cuoco, The Writer in Politics. Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.

Editor, with Lorin Cuoco, The Writer and Religion. Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.

*

Bibliography: "A William H. Gass Bibliography" by Larry McCaffery, in Critique (Atlanta), August 1976.

Manuscript Collection: Washington University Library, St. Louis.

Critical Studies: "Omensetter's Luck" by Richard Gilman, in New Republic (Washington, D.C.), 7 May 1966; "The Stone and the Sermon" by Saun O'Connell, in Nation (New York), 9 May 1966; "Nothing But the Truth" by Richard Howard, in New Republic (Washington, D.C.), 18 May 1968; interview with Thomas Haas in the Chicago Daily News, 1 February 1969; City of Words by Tony Tanner, London, Cape, and New York, Harper, 1971; "The Well Spoken Passions of William H. Gass" by Earl Shorris, in Harper's (New York), May 1972; "But This Is What It Is Like to Live in Hell," in Modern Fiction Studies (Lafayette, Indiana), Autumn 1974; "Against the Grain: Theory and Practice in the Work of William H. Gass" by Ned French, in Iowa Review (Iowa City), Winter 1976; The Metafictional Muse: The Works of Robert Coover, Donald Barthelme, and William H. Gass by Larry McCaffery, Pittsburgh, University of Pittsburgh Press, 1982.

William H. Gass comments:

I think of myself as a writer of prose rather than a novelist, critic, or storyteller, and I am principally interested in the problems of style. My fictions are, by and large, experimental constructions; that is, I try to make things out of words the way a sculptor might make a statue out of stone. Readers will therefore find very little in the way of character or story in my stories. Working in the tradition of the Symbolist poets, I regard the techniques of fiction (for the contemporary artist) as in no way distinct from the strategies of the long poem.

* * *

William H. Gass, a philosopher and literary critic as well as a fiction writer, derives from and is closely allied to the symbolistes, Gertrude Stein, Ortega y Gasset, John Crowe Ransom and the New Critics generally, Borges, Robbe-Grillet, Sarraute, and the structuralists. He believes that language is all in all; that words are not agents to instruct or direct us in fiction but that they exist there for their own sake; that the novelist must keep us imprisoned in his language, because there is nothing beyond it; and that the only events in novels are linguistic events. Metaphor is the means by which concepts are expressed in fiction. The writer, furthermore, does not simply render a world; he makes one out of language, creating imaginary objects and imaginary lives. He works toward the purity of prose fiction and the autonomy of art. He works against the concept of mimesis, that is the imitation of "reality," partly because it is futile for the artist to strive for the illusion of life, and partly because he has no obligation to life. His commitment is to aesthetic satisfaction achieved through metaphorical language; it is to writing as process.

Omensetter's Luck, is accordingly, an exercise in the use of language, which in this instance is a prose that strives constantly to be like poetry or music. The words are better than experience, are, indeed, the experience, and the book is intended to be about language and writing. To give himself ample opportunity to exercise his writing capabilities, Gass designed the novel in three sections, each written in a different mode: the first in the narrative, the second in the lyric, and the third in the rhetorical and dramatic modes. The rhythms and images of the Bible, the baroque qualities of Sir Thomas Browne, the technical virtuosity of Flaubert, the stream of consciousness of Joyce all contribute to the writing of the novel in full freedom from the conventional principles of realism and the traditional values of humanism. Nevertheless, lurking behind this dedication to process are narrative and theme, those Gass-identified enemies to the purity of art. The novel dramatizes a conflict between Omensetter, a natural force who represents being-in-nature, and Jethro Furber, a man of religion and thought, obsessed with death and sex. Attractive as he is, Omensetter demonstrates the inadequacies of mindless and spiritless being, while Furber shows us the failure to fuse successfully word, belief, and action in such a way as to elevate the spirit. In short, Gass has drawn, perhaps despite himself, upon the mythological dimensions of Christianity.

While the title story in Gass's In the Heart of the Heart of the Country is confessedly modeled on reality, the collection as a whole is experimental. "The Pedersen Kid" is deliberately designed to call into question the nature of reality and the possibility of truth, matters that must live side by side with Gass's concern for the shape of his sentences and the relation of sentence to sentence in the paragraph. In the stories generally, the narrative voice struggles to get inside the characters and with words, magic words, steal their souls away and play with them.

But even more thoroughly committed to experimentalism is Willie Masters' Lonesome Wife, in which conventional narrative is largely discarded. The book offers instead a pastiche of various materials: reminiscences of the narrator, little essays on words and the imagination by the author, a variety of typographical play, authorial abuse of the reader, a parody of pornography, and footnotes. All this is designed to destroy the character and form of traditional fiction and to offer opportunities, once the old patterns of linear and logical thought, linear time, and linear print are broken up, for free-wheeling use of the imagination. The book is an experience in art, as Gass tells us at the end, where he inserts a motto: You have fallen into art—return to life. In Willie Masters' Lonesome Wife Gass gives himself to self-indulgent play, maximizing the freedom that the author, a god-like figure in Gass's view, justifiably claims in his dedication to the autonomy of art.

Cartesian Sonata, which contains four novellas written over the course of three decades, is, in typical Gassian form, long on style and short on emotion. To an even greater degree, this can be said for The Tunnel, promoted as a magnum opus that was, like Cartesian Sonata, three decades in coming. But whereas at least the earlier narratives possessed a recognizable shape, The Tunnel is so weighted by narrator William Kohler's world-weary observations that a plot is only barely discernible.

—Chester E. Eisinger

GAY, William

Nationality: American. Born: Hohenwald, Tennessee, 1943 or 1944 Military Service: U.S. Navy, 1960s. Family: Divorced; four children. Career: Worked variously as television tube assembly line worker, post-hole digger, roofer, painter, bricklayer, drywall hanger, and carpenter. Lives in Hohenwald, Tennessee. Awards: William Peden prize (Missouri Review). Agent: Amy Williams, New York, New York, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Long Home. Denver, MacMurray & Beck, 1999. Provinces of Night. New York, Doubleday, 2001.

* * *

After two novels and a handful of short stories, William Gay has emerged as one of the most important new Southern voices in American literature. However, the word "new" must be taken in context. Although The Long Home and Provinces of Night appeared recently in rapid succession, they are the mature works of a mature man who has spent a lifetime honing his craft.

Set in and around the small rural Tennessee town of Ackerman's Field during the early 1940s, The Long Home weaves in and out of a large cast of characters but centers on the relationships among four main figures: Nathan Weiner, a young carpenter still marked by the disappearance of his father; Dallas Hardin, the bootlegger who, unknown to Nathan, murdered Nathan's father; William Tell Oliver, an older man who befriends and mentors Nathan; and Amber Rose, the daughter of Hardin's mistress who is pursued by both Hardin and Weiner. Provinces of Night returns to Ackerman's Field in 1952 to tell the story of E.F. Bloodworth, a gifted but violent man who returns home late in life to make his peace with the town and the family he deserted twenty years earlier. Although he cannot mend his relationships with his three grown sons, he establishes a strong bond with his grandson Fleming, an aspiring young writer.

Such quick summaries do not, of course, begin to convey the richness and complexity of these novels. While Gay's work has been compared to such late twentieth-century Southern writers as Harry Crews, Barry Hannah, Larry Brown, and Cormac McCarthy (whose Child of God provides an epigraph and title for Provinces of Night), it is William Faulkner who most strongly informs these two novels, and both books bear up well under the burden of such a comparison. Through remarkable talent and, seemingly, sheer force of will, Gay has taken the potentially exhausted material of the Faulknerian South—the rhetorically dense narrative of the rural Southern poor and reworked it into something immediately recognizable yet undeniably his own. Gay's characters are as timeless and elemental in their passions as Faulkner's; however, theirs is not an enduring world, but a landscape subject to cracks, ruptures, and nearly inexpressible changes. The Long Home begins with an earthquake that leaves both a literal and metaphorical crack in the world; Provinces of Night concludes with the Bloodworth land disappearing under the waters of a TVA project. As Fleming muses near the end of Provinces of Night, "the world had little of comfort or assurance .... there were no givens, no map through the maze .... Life blindsides you so hard you can taste the bright copper blood in your mouth then it beguiles you with a gift of profound and appalling beauty."

The residents of Ackerman's Field confront these changes with varying degrees of success, failure, bravery, cowardice, violence, and humor, and they do so within stories remarkable for their simultaneous density of detail, clarity of narrative, and seriousness of intent. As Tony Earley correctly observed in the New York Times, "Gay is unafraid to tackle the biggest of the big themes, nor does he shy away from the grand gesture that makes those themes manifest." His first two novels are grand gestures indeed.

-F. Brett Cox

GEE, Maggie (Mary)

Nationality: British. Born: Poole, Dorset, 2 November 1948. Education: Horsham High School for Girls; Somerville College, Oxford (open scholarship), B.A. 1969, M.Litt. 1972, Ph.D. in English 1980. Family: Married Nicholas Rankin in 1983; one daughter. Career: Editor, Elsevier International Press, Oxford, 1972–74; research assistant, Wolverhampton Polytechnic, 1975–79; Eastern Arts writing fellow, University of East Anglia, Norwich, 1982; since 1987 honorary visiting fellow, Sussex University, 1987. Lives in London. Agent: Anne McDermid, Curtis Brown, 3 Queens Square, London WC1, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Dying, In Other Words. Brighton, Harvester Press, 1981; Boston, Faber, 1984.

The Burning Book. London, Faber, 1983; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1984.

Light Years. London, Faber, 1985; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1986.

Grace. London, Heinemann, 1988; New York, Grove Weidenfeld, 1989.

Where Are the Snows. London, Heinemann, 1991; New York, Ticknor and Fields, 1992.

Lost Children. London, HarperCollins, 1994.

The Ice People. London, Richard Cohen Books, 1998.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Rose on the Broken," in Granta 7 (Cambridge), 1982.
- "Mornington Place," in London Tales, edited by Julian Evans. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1983.

Plays

Over and Out (broadcast, 1984). Published in Literary Review (London), February 1984.

Radio Plays: Over and Out, 1984.

Other

How May I Speak in My Own Voice?: Language and the Forbidden. London, Birkbeck College, 1996.

Editor, For Life on Earth. Norwich, University of East Anglia, 1982.

*

Maggie Gee comments:

My chief twentieth-century models are probably Woolf, Nabokov, and Beckett. But I was also raised on the great nineteenth-century writers like Dickens and Thackeray. And I loved stories: I read and re-read my mother's copy of Hans Christian Andersen. I wanted to write stories myself; and I always felt that the difficulty of much twentieth-century "serious" writing must be a problem, not a virtue. If I was difficult, it was despite myself. On the one hand I wanted to write new things, and tell the absolute truth according to my perception of it, which often seems to demand new ways of writing: on the other hand, I've become increasingly aware of the importance of an audience.

My first published novel, Dying, In Other Words, is probably the most difficult technically. It is a bizarre kind of thriller. Moira's body is found on the pavement one morning. The police assume it is suicide; yet the milkman who found the body turns out to be a massmurderer, far too many of Moira's surviving acquaintances start to die in their turn, and increasingly often the sound of typing can be heard in Moira's "empty" room ... is she still alive, and writing the story? The novel is a circle; and when it returns inevitably to the point of Moira's death, we find it was neither suicide nor murder, after all....

The Burning Book is a variation on the family saga. Two English working families, the Ships and the Lambs, shop-keepers and railway-workers, try to live their own lives, interrupted by two world wars and the threat of a third. One theme of the book is the stupidity of nuclear weapons, which endanger all stories and the continuity embodied in families. There are flashbacks to Hiroshima and Nagasaki. The family itself isn't perfect; violence and frustration inside it counterpoint violence and frustration outside. On a small scale, though, humans can learn to do better. The central couple, Henry and Lorna, finally learn to love each other by the last chapter of the book, when they go for a winter picnic in an earthly Eden, Kew Gardens. By a stupid irony, the public world of war-like headlines breaks in on their "happy ending." Light Years is an inverted romance, set in 1984. The lovers, Lottie and Harold, split up on the first page of the novel, and are apart through the year (and 52 chapters) that the book lasts, though perhaps things change in the very last chapter .... The longer they are separated, the more they love each other. Meanwhile, the earth turns full circle, and the seasons, the stars, and the planets play their part in the very formal structure of this book. It is my "easiest" book I think-short chapters, short sections within the chapters, with much "lighter" looking pages: all of which was intended to help express a rather rare commodity in twentieth-century literature—happiness.

Retrospectively, I realized that each of these three books was an attempt to write a new version of a popular genre—thriller, family saga, romance—to appeal to basic emotions, and use basic narrative drives, but to re-work the genre in my own way, and to surprise my readers. All I am conscious of at the time of writing, though, is a desire to show the truth, in ways I never can in speech, and a desire to make structures as beautiful as I can.

(1995) Grace is an anti-nuclear thriller, whose form and themes both depend on ideas of splitting and one-ness—splitting of the atom, of the male and female sides of ourselves, of families, of society.

Where Are the Snows is a panoramic global love-story, the story of Christopher and Alexandria, a bourgeois couple who give up family and roots for love. They are both archetypal tourists—thinking they can buy the planet and use it as a backdrop for their personal drama—and embodiments of the "transcendental homelessness" that Georg Lukacs saw as central to the novel form. I was writing about a fantasy of eternal youth and romance that runs aground on the rocks of bodily aging, and about our human need for something wider than a couple bond; about the loneliness and greed of contemporary western society; about our selfish desire to have everything for ourselves, within our own individual life-spans, and a consequent contempt for the future and the past, most obviously shown in my central couple's abandonment of Christopher's teenage children, and Alexandra "forgetting" to have children of her own—until it is too late.

Lost Children is a British book, like Grace. It is about the process of dealing with loss—of a teenage daughter, Zoe, who runs away from home, in the first instance. But the bereaved mother, Alma, is driven back to her own lost childhood as she tries to understand what has happened; is it the working-through of an older pattern of unhappiness that has driven her daughter away in 1993? The 1990s London of the novel is full of poverty and literal lost, homeless children, a darker city than the already troubled London of Light Years, a decade earlier. The personal question the book asks is one that particularly concerns the middle-aged, like Alma—how can we understand our parents? How can we understand and forgive ourselves as parents?

The Keeper of the Gate (work in progress) is about the difficult transition between centuries, and that between life and death. One of London's last Park Keepers has a stroke and faces death. In his absence in the hospital, a racial murder takes place in a park which for a hundred years has never known a major crime. Meanwhile, the middle-class children of this working-class man jostle for position around his bed and try to understand their parents, themselves, and the frightening future. The sub-text of this book is the loss of public space, the breakdown of public order, the lost notion of truly shared society—and how black and white can live together.

* * *

In her as yet short career as a novelist Maggie Gee has gained the reputation of an experimentalist. Technically innovative would be the way I would prefer to describe her work, and this is certainly true of her first novel Dying, In Other Words. Beginning with the dramatic suicide of a young writer, Moira Penny, Dying, In Other Words could have been a brightly written but run-of-the mill suspense thriller, and in some ways it is. But it is considerably more than that, for Penny's suicide is dropped, as it were, into the pool of lives around her and the ripples spread and impinge on the lives of others and, what makes the novel remarkable, on the continuum of the past and present of those lives. Dying, In Other Words has been described as a "Chinese box of a novel" and that is well put. As the novel progresses the implications of Penny's suicide reach further and further into the lives of others. But while the past impinges, the future overshadows, and in Dying, In Other Words there are already dark hints of the Armageddon to come. What her characters are unaware of is as important as that of which they are aware: "What Bill didn't know was that the girl he evoked, with her long brown limbs and her full yellow rose bud skirt and her underwear smelling of lemon perfume and seaweed died six months later in a car crash." Gee encourages an awareness that her characters exist in a fiction. She pushes beyond this and writes in her second novel The Burning Book: "All of us live in a novel, and none of us do the writing. Just off the stage there are grim old men planning to cut the lighting." Thus Gee can be seen, in spite of (or perhaps because of) her experimentation, to be in the tradition of Fielding and Dickens where the author is ever-present, ready to comment or intervene.

If the ghost of the future is fleetingly glimpsed in Dying, In Other Words, it positively haunts The Burning Book. Indeed that is its theme and purpose as it explores the loves, joys, frustrations, quarrels, hates, degradations and pettinesses of Lorna and her family. "In an ordinary novel," Gee interpolates, "that would be the whole story," but the shadow cast on the future by Hiroshima and Nagasaki darkens the final episode in this everyday story of ordinary folk. It is to Gee's purpose that they are so ordinary, even petty, in their thoughts and relationships, and it is a tribute to her narrative skills that she carries us with them through their dull and messy lives. Because it is their very dullness and messiness that allow us to identify with them and make their final pointless agonizing destruction so telling and poignantly horrifying. As a nuclear warning the book certainly succeeds; and it succeeds as a work of literature as well.

Nevertheless, The Burning Book leaves two largish questions. One is that if Gee wishes her fears and anxieties for our future to be more universally understood, and the passion I sense behind her novels suggests she does, then she may well have to find less sophisticated means to her end. The other question is that having written the terminal novel where does she go? Where she went immediately was to her novel Light Years. "An oddly simple and old fashioned love story" one reviewer has described it. But all Gee's stories as such are simple and old fashioned: the story of a mysterious suicide in Dying, In Other Words, an everyday family saga in The Burning Book. It is what she makes of this material that leaves it far from simple and old fashioned. The narrative of Harold and Ottie in Light Years can be enjoyed on the story level alone, but Gee's intentions are more involved. She can entertain and does, but she has no wish to entertain alone: her narratives reflect a wider, less immediate, context. Sometimes, in order to do this, she has to rely on her author's interpolations and interventions and there is a danger that these can become digressive or intrusive and defeat their purpose. But there is no danger that Gee will cease to look with a compassionate but unblinking eye at a world in which there are no happy endings.

In her novel Grace there are signs that Gee is solving the problem posed by The Burning Book. Grace has the pace and structure of a superior thriller in the style of Ruth Rendell. The threads of the story and the lives they describe gradually and skillfully converge and intermesh. In addition Grace is finely written. Take this description of the seaside town where much of the action takes place:

They do not have their grandeur, these white hotels, set square to the waves, with their flags streaming backwards, flying in splendor from the prevailing winds. Salt eats the paint every winter, and the wood and plaster underneath; each spring they repaint it, and if the walls have shrunk you would hardly detect it from one year to the next ... in a few decades, the loss might show.

Coming each year to the white hotels—The Empire, The Sandhurst, The Majestic, The Windsor—the regular guests never notice. Though may be the porter looks older, and that waitress is no longer here, retired, they suppose, to the country cottage she chatted about as she served the soup.

The description is graphic, but it is more than a visual description for there is something of the continuity of decay in it and in it something of the spirit of place. Though in this case we might call it the dispirit of place! Whatever we call it catches the place and its atmosphere beautifully. I quote this as an example of the quality of Gee's writing in Grace. But as her earlier novels have led us to expect the context of Grace and the lives of its characters is a much wider one. The context is of a world of fall-out from Chernobyl, of the trains running through our suburbs carrying nuclear waste, and of the murder of Hilda Murrell. The drama of Grace with its overlapping and interlocking lives and situations is played out against this background which impinges and is as fundamental to the story as Hardy's countryside is to his novels. Grace can be seen as an exciting and considerable advance in the art of Gee's novels.

-John Cotton

GEE, Maurice (Gough)

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Whakatane, 22 August 1931. Education: Avondale College, Auckland, 1945–49; University of Auckland, 1950-53, M.A. in English 1953; Auckland Teachers College, 1954. Family: Married Margaretha Garden in 1970, two daughters; one son from previous relationship. Career: Schoolteacher, 1955-57; held various jobs, 1958-66; assistant librarian, Alexander Turnbull Library, Wellington, 1967-69; city librarian, Napier Public Library, 1970–72; deputy librarian, Teachers Colleges Library, Auckland, 1974–76. Since 1976 full-time writer; writing fellow, Victoria University of Wellington, 1989. Awards: New Zealand Literary Fund scholarship, 1962, 1976, 1986, 1987, and Award of Achievement, 1967, 1973; University of Otago Robert Burns fellowship, 1964; Hubert Church Prose award, 1973; New Zealand Book award, 1976, 1979, 1982, 1991; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1979; Wattie award, 1979, 1993; New Zealand Children's Book of the Year award, 1984; New Zealand Library Association Esther Glen Medal, 1986. D.Litt.: Victoria University of Wellington, 1987. Agent: Richards Literary Agency, P.O. Box 31240, Milford, Auckland 9. Address: 41 Chelmsford Street, Ngaio, Wellington, New Zealand.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Big Season. London, Hutchinson, 1962.

A Special Flower. London, Hutchinson, 1965.

In My Father's Den. London, Faber, 1972.

Games of Choice. London, Faber, 1976.

Prowlers. London, Faber, 1987.

The Burning Boy. London, Faber, 1990.

Going West. London, Faber, 1992.

Crime Story. Auckland, Viking, 1994; London, Faber, 1995.

Loving Ways. Auckland and New York, Penguin, 1996.

Live Bodies. Auckland, Penguin, 1998.

Orchard Street. Auckland, Viking, 1998.

Short Stories

A Glorious Morning, Comrade. Auckland, Auckland University Press-Oxford University Press, 1975.

Collected Short Stories. Auckland and London, Penguin, 1986; New York, Penguin, 1987.

Fiction (for children)

Plumb. London, Faber, 1978.

Under the Mountain. Wellington, London, and New York, Oxford University Press, 1979.

The World Around the Corner. Wellington, Oxford University Press, 1980; Oxford and New York, Oxford University Press, 1981.

Meg. London, Faber, 1981; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1982.

The Halfmen of O. Auckland and Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1982; New York, Oxford University Press, 1983.

Sole Survivor. London, Faber, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1983.

The Priests of Ferris. Auckland and Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1984; New York, Oxford University Press, 1985.

Motherstone. Auckland and Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1985. The Fire-Raiser. Auckland, Oxford University Press, 1986.

The Champion. Auckland, Oxford University Press, 1989.

The Fat Man. Auckland, Viking, 1994; New York, Simon & Schuster, 1997

Plays

Television Series: Mortimer's Patch, 1980; The Fire-Raiser, from his own story, 1986; The Champion, from his own story, 1989.

Other

Nelson Central School: A History. Nelson, Nelson Central School Centennial Committee, 1978.

*

Bibliography: "Maurice Gee: A Bibliography" by Cathe Giffuni, in Australian and New Zealand Studies in Canada (London, Ontario), no. 3, Spring 1990.

Critical Studies: "Beginnings" by Gee, in Islands (Auckland), March 1977; Introducing Maurice Gee by David Hill, Auckland, Longman Paul, 1981; Trevor James, in World Literature Written in English (Guelph, Ontario), vol. 23, no. 1, 1984; Lawrence Jones, in Landfall (Christchurch), September 1984; Maurice Gee by Bill Manhire, Auckland, Oxford University Press, 1986; Leaving the Highway: Six Contemporary New Zealand Novelists by Mark Williams, Auckland, Auckland University Press, 1990.

* * *

Maurice Gee established himself as one of New Zealand's best writers with the trilogy of novels comprising Plumb, Meg, and Sole Survivor, published between 1978 and 1983. In his adult and juvenile fiction, he examines provincial and small-town mores, realistically evoking life in New Zealand. Favorite themes include isolation and loneliness framed in stories that discuss the effects of aging, the conflict between conformity and nonconformity, the emotional/spiritual claustrophobia of a middle-class society underscored by philistine aggression, and the moral wisdom of his youthful heroes. His style reverberates with subtle implications that transcend the surface realism and the immediate situations toward a universal symbolism.

Gee first attracted attention in the late 1950s with short stories published in New Zealand's major literary periodical, Landfall, and was highly praised by British reviewers for two stories, "The Losers" (1959) and the even more memorable "Eleventh Holiday" (1961). Gee's initial success with the publication of his short stories was followed by a bildungsroman, The Big Season, about protagonist Rob Andrews's search for identity in a stifling environment. A rebellious streak disturbs Rob's progress in rugby, his father's business, a future marriage, and his family's anticipation that he will become a pillar in their blinkered community. The short prologue, set in 1946 and 1947, describes Rob's voyeuristic interest as a child in a local boarding house, a den of iniquity and vice. Rob's involvement with ex-convict Bill Walters, a boarding-house resident, leads to the eventual rejection of his childhood values with a public act of defiance.

Structurally and technically Gee's second novel, A Special Flower, is more complex and adventurous than the straightforward prose of The Big Season. Gee uses shifting perspectives among characters from chapter to chapter in the overall third-person narration and an unconventional handling of time to tell the story of Donald Pinnock's failed marriage to Coralie Marsh, and her relationship with his family after his death. The ending optimistically reconciles the misunderstandings caused by Coralie's lower social status and lack of propriety as she awaits the birth of her baby in the inhibiting confines of New Zealand's middle-class with Donald's mother and sister.

The parent-child relationship plays a prominent part in Gee's third novel, In My Father's Den, which opens with a murder and ends with the identification of the killer, but is only incidentally a story of mystery and detection. After a prologue in the form of a newspaper cutting about the 1969 killing of Celia Inverarity, a schoolgirl at Wadesville College near Auckland, the novel intercuts two narrative strands as told by Paul Prior, an unmarried teacher at Celia's school, who is a prime suspect. One narration describes a few days during the time of the murder, while the other tells his life story in biographic slices such as "1928–1937." The crime prompts Paul to review his entire life and the effects of returning to his small town as a literary intellectual and stranger. Even though the town suspects Paul because he has become an outsider, the killer is Paul's conventional brother, Andrew, stunted by his Oedipal relationship with his mother and by the pressures of New Zealand society.

Games of Choice is Gee's examination of a family as it disintegrates during a few days over Christmas, acquiring something of the intensity of Greek tragedy. The events are much less bloody and extreme than those tragedies, despite the brutal killing of a pet cat with a garden fork. The sham marriage of Kingsley Pratt, a provincial bookseller, and his wife, Alison, dissolves after their two children leave home. Kingsley's wife leaves him for another man, his student daughter has an affair with a much older lecturer, and his son chooses to join the army in defiance of the family's commitment to pacifism. Kingsley remains with his elderly father, Harry, whose memories describe his political activities as a youthful idealist and socialist.

Since the late 1970s, Gee has written a substantial body of fiction for adolescents. His principal imaginative undertaking has been the extremely ambitious trilogy of novels about the Plumb family, Plumb, Meg, and Sole Survivor. Many of the ingredients of the trilogy are present in his earlier novels: the emotional complexity of family life with its blend of loyalty and antagonism; the relationships between individual and community and between private and public life; and the relativity of viewpoint. Gee expands his scale to a saga that covers a century, from the late nineteenth century to the 1980s, and including six generations while concentrating on three. Because the trilogy incorporates so much of New Zealand's short history since British colonization and includes a number of real-life politicians and major events, it takes on the air of a national epic.

As in earlier novels, the narrators survey their lives from the vantage point of a fictional present, providing a framework to reconsider the past. Approximately twenty years separate the time lines of the three novels. Plumb covers the 1940s, while Sole Survivor brings the cycle to a conclusion in the early 1980s. Gee acknowledges that his family history was an important source of inspiration, especially for the first novel, in which the eponymous narrator, George Plumb, is partly based on Gee's maternal grandfather. In a trilogy containing a number of memorable characters, George Plumb is certainly the most extraordinary and interesting. He is a flawed hero, a failed saint, a dedicated idealist of religious and political vision whose moral integrity and over-active conscience blind him to the truth about himself and the world he inhabits. His quest for absolutes and his desire to build a New Jerusalem in New Zealand are undermined by the fanaticism that motivates him. Although not a tragic novel, Plumb is full of tragic irony.

After the spiritual and ideological crises of Plumb, Meg seems restrained, but, in its own way, is equally panoramic. The narrator, Meg Sole Plumb, is the youngest of George and Edith's twelve children and very much her father's favorite. A considerable part of her narrative overlaps chronologically with her father's in Plumb; however, Meg offers her own view of events previously mentioned while introducing a wide range of new material. The enormous size of the Plumb family does, of course, mean that there are many parallel strands, only a few of which can be given prominence in any one novel. By the end of her memoir, which Meg accurately calls "a tale of deaths," the novel conveys a characteristically mid- and late twentieth-century sense of entropy in contrast to the passionate nineteenth-century romanticism and utopianism Plumb embodies in the earlier novel, although that too runs down as the century advances.

Just as George Plumb's death is reported in Meg, Meg's horrific death by fire in a domestic accident is described in Sole Survivor as narrated by one of her three children, the journalist Raymond Sole. This is another "tale of deaths," triggered by the murder of Douglas Plumb, a cabinet minister and George's grandson, making him one of Raymond's numerous cousins. If Plumb is the most religious of the three novels and Meg the most domestic, Sole Survivor is the most political, occasioned by Douglas's membership in Muldoon's National Government.

In Sole Survivor, Raymond interweaves a selective account of his own life from childhood to middle age with a parallel account of Douglas's career. Raymond recalls his cousin's ruthless pursuit of advantage and power, from the sexual to the political. Douglas's opportunism perverts his grandfather's high-minded dedication, and the ascent to prominence, almost to the premiership, becomes, paradoxically, a story of decline—the collapse of George Plumb's unrealistic, yet noble, ideals. The ending of Sole Survivor and the trilogy as a whole is open-ended rather than pessimistic, but the emphasis is on the failure to realize the New Zealand dream, the slide from heroic vision to debased materialism. The trilogy's major arc may be the universal story of the twentieth century.

Two adult novels Gee has published since the trilogy, Prowlers and The Burning Boy, draw on his home town of Nelson. Prowlers, a family saga, spans much of the twentieth century and is narrated by a distinguished scientist and public servant, the octogenarian Sir Noel Papps. His grandniece Kate researches the past in order to write a biography about Noel's equally famous sister, Kitty, a leading figure in the Labor Party for many years. In their different ways Noel and Kate prowl through history and memory, focusing on aspects of their private lives. What emerges is a series of interrelated vignettes and episodes cohering into a panoramic tapestry of Jessop, the fictional town modeled on Nelson.

In both the trilogy and Prowlers, Gee offers a broad historical overview of his characters' lives. In The Burning Boy, he orchestrates his narrative around the four elements of fire, water, air, and earth in sections titled "Spring Rain," "Dry Times," and "Fire." A devastating bush fire, which threatens the town of Saxton and kills one of the main characters, concludes the story, which begins with the burned boy of the title, a badly scarred victim of an accident in which another boy dies.

During the 1980s, Gee also wrote several works in the fantasy science-fiction genre for his juvenile readers, including the "O" trilogy. Most of his latest novels, including Fat Man, The Champion, and The Fire-Raiser, all published in the 1990s, are for young adults. Fat Man, set during the Great Depression, is a disturbing psychological thriller with its young hero, Colin Potter, rescuing his family and town from the revenge of a sadistic bully, the fat man, who returns from a life of crime in the United States. Gee's young characters prove themselves against the likes of cunning and unbalanced adults like Muskie, the fat man. Once Colin's disillusionment is replaced with a steely courage, he assists Muskie to his own doom by helping him fall into a gorge.

The Champion evaluates racism when an African-American soldier, Private Jackson Coop, recuperates in Kettle Creek during World War II. When twelve-year-old Rex compares Jackson's brand of heroic conduct with the racism the soldier's presence causes among the adults, he allies with New Zealand blacks to help Jack. Gee's juvenile fiction teaches impressionable readers about the superficiality of social status and the unjust evaluations of individuals created by such arbitrary designations of status as race.

The Fire-Raiser takes place during World War I and tells the story of four children who unravel the mystery of arson in their town. Kitty Wix, Irene, Noel, and Phil try to stop the arsonist after seeing him flee the scene of a fire at Dargie's stables. Gee's enthralling pageturner highlights the sick thoughts inside the arsonist's mind while shedding light on wartime attitudes in 1915 New Zealand. As with all of Gee's novels, whether written for adult or juvenile readers, the well-rounded characters are genuine and inhabit a vividly painted community.

Gee's novels offer the post-colonial world a gateway into New Zealand, a mysterious land to most because of its relatively brief history of independence from Britain. Cultural awareness about the network of islands that comprise New Zealand is often superceded by stereotypes based on Australian culture. Gee's fiction often presents cross-sections of the towns in which the stories take place through a variety of characters struggling with the contradictions inherited from the puritanical British and the realities of the ancient island life they claim. The complexity of the situation is reflected in the complexity of Gee's characters. Their inner conflicts and interpersonal tensions, which are analyzed in his fiction, illustrate New Zealand's specific culture while linking the country to the mainstream of the twentieth-century struggle typical in all Western societies.

—Peter Lewis, updated by Hedwig Gorski

GHOSE, Zulfikar

Nationality: British. Born: Sialkot, Pakistan, 13 March 1935. Education: Keele University, England, B.A. in English and philosophy 1959. Family: Married in 1964. Career: Cricket correspondent, the Observer, London, 1960–65; teacher in London, 1963–69. Since 1969 professor of English, University of Texas, Austin. Awards: Arts Council of Great Britain bursary, 1967. Agent: Aitken, Stone and Wylie, 29 Fernshaw Road, London SW10 0TG, England. Address: Department of English, University of Texas, Austin, Texas 78712, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Contradictions. London, Macmillan, 1966.

The Murder of Aziz Khan. London, Macmillan, 1967; New York, Day, 1969.

The Incredible Brazilian:

The Native. London, Macmillan, and New York, Holt Rinehart, 1972.

The Beautiful Empire. London, Macmillan, 1975; Woodstock, New York, Overlook Press, 1984.

A Different World. London, Macmillan, 1978; Woodstock, New York, Overlook Press, 1985.

Crump's Terms. London, Macmillan, 1975.

The Texas Inheritance (as William Strang). London, Macmillan, 1980.

Hulme's Investigations into the Bogart Script. Austin, Texas, Curbstone Press, 1981.

A New History of Torments. New York, Holt Rinehart, and London, Hutchinson, 1982.

Don Bueno. London, Hutchinson, 1983; New York, Holt Rinehart, 1984.

Figures of Enchantment. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Harper, 1986.

The Triple Mirror of the Self. London, Bloomsbury, 1991.

Short Stories

Statement Against Corpses, with B.S. Johnson. London, Constable, 1964.

Veronica and the Gongora Passion. Toronto, Tsar, 1998.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Absences," in Winter's Tales 14, edited by Kevin Crossley-Holland. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1968.

"A Translator's Fiction," in Winter's Tales 1 (new series), edited by David Hughes. London, Constable, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1985.

Poetry

The Loss of India. London, Routledge, 1964. Jets from Orange. London, Macmillan, 1967.

The Violent West. London, Macmillan, 1972.

Penguin Modern Poets 25, with Gavin Ewart and B.S. Johnson. London, Penguin, 1974.

A Memory of Asia. Austin, Texas, Curbstone Press, 1984. Selected Poems. Karachi, Oxford University Press, 1991.

Other

Confessions of a Native-Alien (autobiography). London, Routledge, 1965.

Hamlet, Prufrock, and Language. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1978.

The Fiction of Reality. London, Macmillan, 1983.

The Art of Creating Fiction. London, Macmillan, 1991.

Shakespeare's Mortal Knowledge. London, Macmillan, 1993.

*

Critical Studies: Zulfikar Ghose issue of The Review of Contemporary Fiction, 9 (2), Summer 1989; Structures of Negation: The Writings of Zulfikar Ghose by Chelva Kanaganayakam, Toronto, University of Toronto Press, 1993.

* * *

Zulfikar Ghose's five stories in Statement Against Corpses repeatedly concern the metaphysics that unites thought with action, life with death, success with failure, aspirations with accomplishment. "The Zoo People" is the best of these. Thematically complex, linguistically assured, subtle in its evocation of character, delicate in its responses to landscape, provocative in its approach to time, it probes the mind of the English émigré Emily Minns, as she comes to terms with physical and metaphysical perception in an India alien to her upbringing. Is an animal more beautiful in the wild than in a zoo, she asks—and what happens if, taking a cage away, one discovers "primitive wildness" instead of beauty? Her ultimate answer arises from her increased sensitivity to Indian paradoxes and her adaptation of them to her "European Enlightenment" patterns of thought:

Absolute barrenness was a reality with which she now felt a sympathy. There were rocks and rocks: each, whether a pebble or a boulder, was a complete, homogeneous, self-sufficient mass of matter in itself; each stood or lay in the dust at perfect peace with the universe which did no more to it than round its edges; each was there in its established place, a defiant mass of creation, magnificently aloof, without ancestry and without progeny.

Order, in other words, is within her mind's eye.

The Contradictions not only continues the metaphor of barrenness, but also structures itself on East-West logical oppositions. The "assertions" that open the book explore an Englishman's inhibited barriers against India, and India's human fecundity nonetheless. The "contradictions" that close it are set in England and pick up each theme and symbol from the first half of the book—not in order to refute them, but to complete them. The English rationalist philosophers must be blended with India's atemporality; material welfare must be glimpsed concurrently with the nominal importance of the colour of silk squares; Sylvia's English miscarriage must encourage her to appreciate what her experience of India did not directly allow: that an "area of nothingness" might possess "an odd attraction, and in this darkness, a disturbing power."

Attached ambivalently to a landscape of heart as well as a landscape of mind, Sylvia spirals towards a point of balance between antitheses. For Ghose himself, as his autobiography clearly announces, the point of balance is represented by the tenuous hyphen in 'native-alien.' Pakistan, India, British India, Britain, and the USA are all part of his experience, and all necessary to him, in conjunction. In another short story, ''Godbert,'' the antithesis is conveyed by a different metaphor: ''Donald ... looked at horizons whereas John examined the texture of cobblestones.'' Later in the story, in a similar tense vein, Ghose writes: ''One chooses a way of life. Or life imposes its own pattern upon one despite oneself.'' Such a dilemma lies at the core of Ghose's ambitious and moving novel The Murder of Aziz Khan, about a peasant farmer's futile effort to preserve his traditional land from industrial expansion, political roguery, blatant thuggery, and the power of money in other people's hands.

The metaphysics of perception and cultural tension continues to preoccupy Ghose in his later novels. Though Crump's Terms, the reflections of a London schoolteacher, is a weak foray into wry social comedy, the three volumes of The Incredible Brazilian show the author to be highly imaginative. Influenced by Márquez and others, these three books—The Native, The Beautiful Empire, and A Different World—tell the marvelous, almost picaresque narratives of a single character named Gregório, who in a series of reincarnations is variously native, explorer, soldier, planter, merchant, marketeer, writer, and revolutionary. In writing out the three "lives" of the three books, Gregório confronts various ethical, historical, and mythological claims to both the territory and the idea of Brazil: native land, European colony, and new nation. Beyond the claim to the land lies the claim to the future, he writes, and he asks if cultural contact must necessitate corruption, if power is really man's only motivation, and in a closing and magnificently eloquent irony, if efforts to prevent violence inevitably prove destructive. This knot of abstract ideas gives the work its breadth of vision; its success derives also from Ghose's skill in telling a vivid, concrete narrative.

Even more successful are Ghose's further forays into patterns of imaginative adventure. A New History of Torments and Don Bueno take prototypical quest cycles and turn them into contemporary adventures of the psyche. A New History of Torments follows the life of a young man from his rural South American home to a pleasure-palace island, only to watch him destroy himself after he becomes unwittingly entangled in an incestuous love. With a related setting, Don Bueno watches generations of young men grow up to inherit their fate: inevitably they pursue, kill off, and then replace their fathers—secure only in their blindness to the effects of time on their own ambition.

Figures of Enchantment, using metatextual and magic realist techniques, turns more consciously to analyze artifice, and probes the experience of exile in yet another way. Focusing on the figures of representation and imaginative understanding (each of the characters, or "figures," for example, exists as a "figure" or "type" in other character's eyes), the novel draws the attention to its own syntax. It makes clear that "figurative" language both constructs versions of reality and removes people from any "natural" or "unmediated" relation with the external world.

The stories of Veronica and the Gongora Passion take place against a varied backdrop, both in time and space, that includes South America, the Indian subcontinent, and Spain during the Muslim period in the Middle Ages. By turns poetic, comic, and dramatic, Ghose's stories and novels are engaging narratives. They also constitute a continuing analysis of power: of its workings, and of its basis in the economics of ownership and desire.

-W.H. New

GHOSH, Amitav

Nationality: Indian. Born: 11 July 1956. Education: Delhi University, India, B.A. in history, M.A. in sociology; Oxford University, diploma in social anthropology, Ph.D.; Institut Bourguiba des Langues Vivants Tunis, diploma in Arabic. Family: Married Deborah Ann Baker in 1990. Career: Since 1986 lecturer in sociology, Delhi School of Economics, Delhi University. Contibutor to Indian Express (New Dehli), Granta (Cambridge), and The New Republic (Washington, D.C.). Award: Academy of Letters, India, annual prize, 1990. Agent: Wylie, Aitken and Stone, 250 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10107, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Circle of Reason. London, Hamilton, and New York, Viking, 1986.

The Shadow Lines. New Delhi, Ravi Dayal, and London, Bloomsbury, 1988; New York, Viking, 1989.

The Calcutta Chromosome: A Novel of Fevers, Delirium and Discovery. New York, Avon Books, 1995.

Countdown. Delhi, Ravi Dayal Publisher, 1999.

The Glass Palace. New York, Random House, 2000.

Other

The Relations of Envy in an Egyptian Village. Trivandrum, Centre for Development Studies, 1982.

In an Antique Land. New Delhi, Ravi Dayal, 1992; New York, Knopf, 1993; London, Penguin, 1994.

Translator, The Slave of Ms. H. Calcutta, Centre for Studies in Social Sciences, 1990.

*

Critical Studies: The Novels of Amitav Ghosh, edited by R.K. Dhawan. New Delhi, Prestige Books, 1999.

* * *

Amitav Ghosh's fictional world is one of restless narrative motion. His central figures are travelers and diasporic exiles: exemplars of "the migrant sensibility" that Salman Rushdie calls "one of the central themes of this century of displaced persons." If in Rushdie's metaphor "the past is a country from which we have all emigrated," Ghosh's conflation of time and space—and of distinct times and distant places—is even more extreme. He treats national borders and conceptual boundaries as permeable fictions to be constantly transgressed. Through the multiple criss-crossings enabled by a freeranging narrative, discrete binaries of order and category give way to a realm of mirror images and hybrid realities. Reason becomes passion, going away is also coming home, and the differences between us and them, now and then, here and there are disrupted by the itinerant maps of a roaming imagination.

The Circle of Reason follows Indian characters from a Bengali village to an Egyptian town to an outpost in the Algerian Sahara. This first novel begins as a comic tale of unlikely conjunctions. The scientific Reason with which Balaram is obsessed combines Hindu ideas of purity and Western notions of cleanliness with Louis Pasteur's microbiology; Balaram's vision of social progress through weaving suggests both Gandhi's nationalist self-sufficiency and a global multinational economy in which technology 'recognizes no continents and no countries.' However, this eccentric version of Reason is almost wiped out in the novel by forces of unreason: ambition, paranoia, territoriality, and violence.

Balaram's last disciple, the mysterious Alu, is chased across oceans and continents as a narrative of shifting, spooling time within fixed village space gives way to a linear-time, picaresque story spread across the international space of diaspora. In al-Ghazira, Alu's charismatic socialism quixotically links the eradication of germs with the elimination of money. The final scenes in El Oued are more earnest and down-to-earth, favoring the migrant's adaptive "making do" and "being human" over the purist strictures of science and religious tradition. Nevertheless, Reason and the past both circle back in the form of Balaram's favorite book, the Life of Pasteur, which has also traveled from Bengal to Algeria, and which Alu can now "reverently" cremate.

Ghosh's second novel is more somber, less fanciful in its politics, and quite stunning in the power with which its formal experiments in sequence and location resonate thematically. The Shadow Lines traces nearly a half-century of interlocking relations among three generations of two families, one Indian and one British, giving perhaps the definitive fictional demonstration of Benedict Anderson's dictum that nations are "imagined communities." When the same Hindu-Muslim conflict can take place simultaneously in Dhaka and Calcutta, the unnamed narrator must abandon his common-sense assumption "that distance separates, that it is a corporeal substance," and his belief "in the reality of nations and borders." The self, like the cosmopolitan cities it lives in, becomes a palimpsest, sedimented with history, memory, and others that the self has absorbed. The narrative mode echoes this intricate layering with its looping, Russian-doll-like nestling of story within story, place within place, memory within actuality.

The unnamed narrator, with his internationalized consciousness, wallows in an empowering sense of simultaneity and correspondence. Growing up with Tridib in Calcutta, he can "know" war-time London neighborhoods and see the English boy Nick Price as a spectral mirror image. His grandmother's confusion between her childhood Dhaka and the present-day foreign city becomes symptomatic of the violence done to people by artificial borders and partitions (poignantly allegorized in her family's divided house). If the novel valorizes the search for unbounded space and co-existing time, however, it refuses to endorse self-serving appropriations of "other" realities. When IIa compares her pleasure at bohemian living with that of war-time radicals, the narrator criticizes the "easy arrogance" by which she assumes "that times and places are the same because they happen to look alike, like airport lounges." But after a futile argument about whether her London or his Calcutta is the site of real history and important politics, he realizes the shaky ground on which he too claims possession of people and places he has largely invented.

Ghosh thus recognizes the political stakes involved in drawing connecting lines, like airline routes, across the "shadow lines" of national boundaries and historical periods. His globe-shrinking project enables not only integration but also juxtaposition. The controlling metaphor of the airport lounge makes this point brilliantly: as replicated space (they all look alike) and individual place (each one is distinctive); as both attached to and detached from its national home; as a place where departures rub shoulders with arrivals, where everyone is always on the move. Full of complex cross-cultural encounters, The Shadow Lines makes a unique contribution to the debates over "difference" and "otherness" that have galvanized the contemporary post-colonial world.

Ghosh's astonishing third novel, The Calcutta Chromosome, plunges into the colorful medical history of European research into malaria a century ago. It begins with the unlikely discoveries of Ronald Ross, an imperial army doctor in India who, despite ignorance of microbiology and erroneous ideas about how malaria is transmitted, nonetheless managed to win a Nobel Prize for helping understand the disease. In an ingeniously plotted narrative, Ghosh unravels some mind-boggling alternative possibilities for where Ross's knowledge really came from and what it might—very radically—entail. Full of outrageous fantasy and "decentering" impulses that speculatively reroute European knowledges through Indian ones, the book imaginatively ventures into what Brian McHale, in Postmodernist Fiction, calls "secret" or "apocryphal" history. It does so through a genre—the mystery—that makes unlikely mental journeys, startling discoveries, and the revelation of secrets into its narrative life-blood.

Ghosh's protagonist, the Egyptian researcher Antar, works in a near-future New York on a highly advanced computer. The machine, Ava, outlandishly blends the visionary empowerment of recent Internet hype—it really can do anything, speak any dialect, find any document—with the oppressive scrutiny of Orwell's Big Brother—it won't let Antar stop work early, and its invasive hologram technology respects no bounds of privacy. Antar and Ava investigate the disappearance of the long-lost Murugan, a self-styled authority on Ronald Ross, who went to Calcutta in 1995 on the trail of some suspicious anomalies he'd found in Ross's work; he was last seen the day after his arrival. The narrative follows Murugan through two days of unsettling encounters and strange coincidences that augment and clarify his incipient theories; he also discovers an inextricable link between himself and one of Ross's research subjects.

The discovery process shared by Murugan, the reader, and Antar follows a narrative rollercoaster that at times resembles a fun-house, a ''laff in the dark'' ride with a carefully timed sequence of grotesque surprises popping out at every turn. In stylized prose emphasizing dialogue and description, Ghosh employs conventional devices of the mystery, the high-tech thriller, the ''hard-boiled'' detective novel, the science fiction adventure, and the Victorian ghost story—all with such boldness and panache that it can be hard to tell if he is parodying the genres or ''doing'' them in earnest.

But after the novel's controlling plot lays down the last bit of secret knowledge, it turns out to be very much about control, and about knowledge. And although Ghosh typically does not wear his politics on his sleeve, the implication of this novel's secret history is that control of medical knowledge is wrenched away from Europeans in the past and bestowed on Indians in the past, present, and future. Unhoused from the apparatus and methods of European science, malaria is repossessed by the locals—rightful owners, perhaps, since it is they and their ancestors who have most often been possessed by its malign fevers. Understanding of the disease is reclaimed and redefined on distinctly Indian terms; in Ghosh's version it has significance not just for science and bodily health, but also for spiritual health and worship, fate and predestination, reincarnation, time cycles and other notions more dear (by and large) to Indians than Westerners.

Ghosh is remarkable in his use of narrative structure to exemplify thematic interests. The Circle of Reason's itinerant and wayward picaresque echoes the intellectual caprices of its characters, while The Shadow Lines makes impossible coexistences and disrupted metaphysical boundaries into real struggles both for its narrator and its readers. Similarly, The Calcutta Chromosome insists on a reading process that enacts its central ideas. It uses the controlled surprises and circuitous discoveries of the mystery-thriller to convey a story whose initial germ—malaria science—is all about circuitous routes to surprising discoveries. In Ghosh's exacting hands that story becomes a feverish literary journey into a possible world where to find that one is following someone else's agenda—indeed is totally trapped by it—can be paradoxically to achieve new mastery over the future agendas of oneself and others.

—John Clement Ball

GIBBONS, Kaye

Nationality: American. Born: Nash County, North Carolina, 1960. Education: Attended North Carolina State University and the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Family: Married once (divorced); partner of Frank Ward; three daughters. Awards: Sue Kaufman prize for First Fiction (American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters); National Endowment for the Arts fellowship; Nelson Algren Heartland award for Fiction (Chicago Tribune), 1991; PEN/Revson Foundation fellowship. Address: Raleigh, North Carolina, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Ellen Foster. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1987. A Virtuous Woman. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1989.

A Cure for Dreams. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1991

Charms for the Easy Life. New York, Putnam, 1993.

Sights Unseen. New York, Putnam, 1995.

On the Occasion of My Last Afternoon. New York, Putnam, 1998.

Other

Contributor, with others, Pete and Shirley: The Great Tar Heel Novel (serial novel). Asheboro, North Carolina, Down Home Press, 1995

Contributor, Southern Selves: From Mark Twain and Eudora Welty to Maya Angelou and Kaye Gibbons: A Collection of Autobiographical Writing, edited by James H. Watkins. New York, Vintage Books, 1998.

*

Critical Studies: Southern Selves: From Mark Twain and Eudora Welty to Maya Angelou and Kaye Gibbons: A Collection of Autobiographical Writing, edited by James H. Watkins, New York, Vintage Books, 1998.

* * *

Kaye Gibbons is a prolific twentieth-century Southern writer whose fiction has garnered extensive praise from critics and gained national recognition through lengthy stints on the best-seller list. Much of her fiction derives from her experiences growing up in rural North Carolina, a locale which also provides the setting for her novels. She most often writes about women's efforts to become self-reliant despite the restrictive nature of Southern culture, and her use of this theme illustrates the importance of communal support in the development of female voices and independence. Gibbons's fiction also demonstrates the strength that women draw from their familial histories and from passing their oral histories on to generations of women that follow them.

Gibbons's novels examine the conflicts that women face in their marital relationships, as well as the strong bonds that develop between mothers and daughters when the marriages in question are less than satisfying. Gibbons tells her mother-daughter stories from a variety of perspectives and voices, consistently examining the consequences that await women who enter into marriages with the wrong men. Most of these men come from a lower social class than their wives and are emotionally closed, and accordingly, fail to provide the type of fulfilling relationships that their wives crave. Gibbons's novels do not degenerate into mere examinations of the pitiful state of these women's lives, however, but instead demonstrate the ways in which they find contentment after they have "privately withdrawn their affections" from their husbands. Instead, Gibbons's women find this contentment through their relationships with other women. Gibbons ultimately demonstrates the ways in which these women build the best lives that they can with the tools at hand: they do not bemoan the results of their poor choices, but simply learn to live with them and to take happiness where they find it.

Ellen Foster, Gibbons's first novel, is narrated from the perspective of a pre-teen girl who has suffered the suicide of her mother and who attempts to survive life with her sexually abusive, alcoholic father. Ellen finds herself in this predicament because her mother has married a man who is considered beneath her by her family, and because neither she nor her mother has an adequate support system to help her endure this man's abuse. Rather than descending into a pit of self-pity and loathing as a result of her mother's suicide, however, Ellen carves out a life for herself that is ultimately satisfactory, finding her place in a cheerful and loving foster home. She derives her last name, in fact, from the place that becomes her home, mistaking the term "Foster family" for the family's surname. Even in her most desperate state, Ellen manages to maintain a positive outlook, forging friendships with an African-American family that cares for her despite her initially racist attitudes which derive from her Southern heritage. As Ellen grows and finds a place, she develops a strong, independent voice, and comes to important realizations about the value of people—value that exists without regard to race.

A Virtuous Woman tells the story of an abiding love which develops between two unlikely partners, in spite of their widely divergent backgrounds. Ruby comes from a privileged family, which she does not fully appreciate until she runs away with migrant worker John Woodrow. To Woodrow, Ruby is a trophy who, having lost its newness very early on in their tempestuous marriage, becomes the recipient of abuse which results from Woodrow's frustration with his poverty-stricken existence. Following Woodrow's death, Ruby becomes involved with Jack, a tenant farmer who, although beneath her in rank in the Southern social hierarchy, treats her with respect, albeit the type of respect one would show to one's mother. The reader has a sense that Ruby has "settled for" her second husband in part because she is ashamed to return to her family after choosing the abusive Woodrow, but she builds a satisfactory life for herself that is only cut short by the lung cancer that she contracts as a result of a smoking habit that she develops during her first marriage as a means of A Cure for Dreams tells the story of three generations of women. The novel begins with the marriage of Lottie, to which she naively agrees, seeing it as a way to escape the desperate poverty of her Kentucky family. She rapidly learns that she has little in common with her husband, a man with an obsessive work ethic and a stunted ability to interact with other people. Unable to build a fulfilling relationship with her husband, Lottie showers all of her attention on her daughter, who, although devoted to Lottie, fails in her single attempt to thrive outside of the protection of her mother's wing. Lottie's story demonstrates the power of female solidarity through the growth of Lottie's weekly card-playing group. Not only do the members of the group meet expressly to engage in an activity traditionally reserved for men, but their meetings take place during a time when the men's work week would have generally been winding down, thus leaving them with free time. These women choose each other's company rather than that of their husbands, choosing female companionship over their duties to provide comfort for their inattentive husbands.

On the Occasion of My Last Afternoon is a series of flashbacks told from the perspective of an elderly woman who senses that her death is approaching. She relates tales of her childhood with a tyrannical, social-climbing father and a loving but beaten-down mother. Unlike Gibbons's other female protagonists, Emma Garnet finds true happiness in her marriage to a generous and kind-hearted Yankee doctor. Her marriage saves her from her father's evil actions actions which include killing a slave in cold blood and terrorizing his wife, female children, and servants-but simultaneously dooms her mother to a dour and violent life. Emma Garnet ultimately stands up to her father, an event which is precipitated by his hand in her mother's death. Much like the protagonists of Gibbons's other novels, Emma Garnet is able to survive harsh realities: living in her father's home, serving as a Civil War nurse, and watching her beloved husband work himself into an early grave. She survives these devastating events because of a strong, supportive community of women. Clarice is a cherished African-American woman who first raised Emma Garnet's father, and then moved with Emma Garnet to her husband's home to help her set up housekeeping. Clarice provides a much-needed sense of stability which allows Emma Garnet to withstand the trials of war, to develop a relationship with the much-younger sister for whom she has no respect, and to bear the untimely loss of her husband. On the Occasion of My Last Afternoon once again illustrates the necessity of female community for women who would survive the trials of Southern womanhood.

Charms for an Easy Life again tells the story of mothers and daughters, beginning with Charlie Kate. Charlie Kate is a midwife who gains the respect of her community at an early age, and whose folk remedies are revered even above those that have been accepted for years. She raises her daughter alone, following her husband's desertion. The novel follows the developing relationships between three generations of women, illustrating their conflicts and the ways that they resolve them.

Sights Unseen deals with the impact of a mother's mental illness on her young family. Told from the perspective of the youngest child, this novel, much like the acclaimed Ellen Foster, tells the story of Hattie, a child cast adrift from a sense of place and belonging because of her mother's inability to bond with her. Sights Unseen focuses on Maggie's fight to regain her sanity and then to develop a meaningful relationship with her daughter. Gibbons's novel is founded on another long-standing Southern notion: that certain subjects aren't discussed by "nice" people, that odd behavior is accepted so long as it is not too outlandish, and that mental illness should be swept under the rug rather than being openly discussed or treated.

Kaye Gibbons is an important Southern writer in large part because of ways in which she represents Southern womanhood and the expectations placed upon it. Her characters are realistically drawn, demonstrating many of the difficulties that result from cultural mores governing women's behavior. The tightly-knit groups of women, whether familial or based in the larger community, illustrate the ways in which Gibbons's women attempt to control their own destinies within the confines of Southern social mores.

-Suzanne Disheroon Green

GIBSON, Graeme

Nationality: Canadian. Born: London, Ontario. Education: University of Western Ontario. Family: Married 1) Shirley Mann (divorced); 2) Margaret Atwood, q.v.; three sons. Career: Teacher of English, Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, Toronto, 1961–68; writerin-residence, University of Waterloo, 1982–83. Founding member, Book and Periodical Development Council, 1975, chair, 1976, executive director, 1977. Awards: Scottish Canadian Exchange fellowship, 1978. Member: Amnesty International; Federation of Ontario Naturalists; Writers' Development Trust. Address: c/o Writers' Union of Canada, 24 Ryerson Ave., Toronto, Ontario M5T 2P3, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Five Legs. Toronto, Anansi, 1969.

Communion. Toronto, Anansi, 1971.

Perpetual Motion. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1982.

Gentleman Death. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1993.

Other

Eleven Canadian Novelists Interviewed by Graeme Gibson. Toronto, Anansi, 1972.

St. Vincent and the Grenadines: Bequia, Mustique, Canouan, Mayreau, Tobago Cays, Palm, Union, PSV: A Plural Country, with Jill Bobrow, Margaret Atwood, and Raquel Welch; photographs by Dana Jinkins, Stockbridge, Massachusetts, Concepts, 1985.

How to Build a Clone Computer: The Clone Building Seminar. Independence, Missouri, Computer Training Corp., 1993.

* * *

Graeme Gibson has a solid reputation among Canadian novelists, based on both his fictional writings and his activities in cultural politics. His first two novels, Five Legs of 1969 and Communion two years later, are relatively short works, with decidedly modernist styles; Perpetual Motion of 1982 has a more clearly delineated narrative and narrator; and Gentleman Death, published in 1993, cuts between a writer's life and lives in his writings. In 1973 Gibson also contributed a collection of interviews titled Eleven Canadian Novelists; although not itself fiction, this work reveals something of Gibson's concerns about the professional pursuit of writing in questions repeated to different writers.

Five Legs, Gibson's first novel, tells the story of the gathering of several people for the funeral of a student acquaintance. Its first half consists of the perspective of Lucan Crackell, a university lecturer and mentor of the deceased, who has been commandeered into attending the funeral, as well as driving some others to it. The novel's modernist style blends objective dialogue between characters with verbalized thought in a manner that strongly recalls James Joyce. The opening of the novel might almost be a re-presentation of Bloom's breakfast in Ulysses, as Crackell prepares breakfast for his wife and assembles his clothes for the funeral. In the course of his thoughts, we find a realistic psychological portrayal of a petty and critical mind. Gibson uses Crackell's profession as an English lecturer to interweave motifs of literary death and rebirth with the conscious, social, "real-world" action of funeral preparations themselves. Allusions to Milton's "Lycidas," among other elegies, lend texture to the novel. These notes are blended with an ironic tone introduced by Crackell himself, whose thoughts transform the traditional elegiac "Who would not sing for Lycidas?" to the blacker "Who would not weep?" when he thinks of Martin Baillie, nipped in his prime by a hit-and-run driver. Gibson skillfully interweaves hints of Hamlet, Romeo and Juliet, T. S. Eliot's characters in "Prufrock" and "Gerontion," Browning's monologues, and other literary reflections on death. Some risk is taken that the text may become too self-consciously literary, however; readers may not feel like discerning between the literary mind of Crackell and the book itself.

The second half of the novel adopts the viewpoint of one of Crackell's passengers, the dead Baillie's friend Felix Oswald. He, like Crackell, muses about his life and dislikes. The novel leaves an impression of an anarchic despair, tempered with a glimmer of hope.

The brief sequel Communion traces Felix Oswald after his graduation from school, as he works for a veterinarian. In a slightly more coherent diction, Gibson moves toward a static closure that shows Felix breaking a dying epileptic husky from its cage and releasing it into the wild. Themes of abnormality and frustration are symbolically presented, often in analogy between Oswald and the dog.

Perpetual Motion diverges from Five Legs and Communion stylistically and fictionally, telling the story of Robert Fraser, a farmer in nineteenth-century Canada, whose plowing uncovers the skeleton of a mammoth in his field. His discovery brings him into contact with the world of Victorian pseudoscience, and he becomes seduced by the dream of building a perpetual motion machine in the form of an orrery, a working model of the solar system. His pursuit becomes obsessive and appears elusive as well, until he in a moment of inspiration makes the mammoth bone he discovered years earlier a part of his machine. It then starts to move, and gradually gains speed until it flies to pieces.

In Perpetual Motion Gibson investigates the implications of technology from a sophisticated perspective, mixing the dream of total human control over the machine with images of extinction, both of the mammoth and of the passenger pigeon. Gibson also introduces aspects of the tall tale and magic realism into Perpetual Motion: throughout the book, characters tell tales of the fabulous, and the creation of perpetual motion itself falls into this category, making the book itself a version of the fantastic epic. But Gibson's tale is one with a moral: the human costs of technological fixation are seen in Fraser's family, as they suffer under his monomania.

Gentleman Death is Gibson's return to the literary scene after eleven years. Ultimately, this novel reconciles its narrator with mortality, but his growth into this resolution is painful. Gibson essentially triangulates his book between the life of the Torontonian novelist Robert Fraser (coincidentally the great-grandson of the protagonist of Perpetual Motion) and the plot lives of two of his characters, travellers from Toronto to Britain and Germany. The interweaving of elements of Fraser's life with those of the characters he is laboring to bring to life is slightly disorienting, but gradually encircles the great unspoken in Fraser's soul: the source of his writing block and his greatest sadness, the death of his brother. In a conclusion that feels like the resolution of Woolf's To the Lighthouse, Gibson shows how love of people and place can bridge the life of the present and ghosts of the past.

-Ron Jenkins

GIBSON, William (Ford)

Nationality: American. Born: Conway, South Carolina, 17 March 1948. Education: University of British Columbia, B.A. 1977. Family: Married Deborah Jean Thompson in 1972; one daughter and one son. Awards: Hugo award, Philadelphia Science Fiction Society Philip K. Dick memorial award, Nebula award, Porgie award, all 1985, and Australian Science Fiction Convention Ditmar award, all for Neuromancer. Agent: Martha Millard Literary Agency, 293 Greenwood Avenue, Florham Park, New Jersey 07932–2335, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Neuromancer. New York, Ace, 1984, London, HarperCollins, 1994. Count Zero. New York, Arbor House, 1986.

Mona Lisa Overdrive. New York, Bantam, 1988.

The Difference Engine, with Bruce Sterling. London, Gollancz, 1990; New York, Bantam, 1991.

Virtual Light. New York, Bantam, and London, Viking, 1993. Johnny Mnemonic. New York, Ace Books, 1995. Idoru. New York, Putnam, 1996. All Tomorrow's Parties. New York, Putnam, 1999.

Play

Dream Jumbo (text to accompany performance art; produced, Los Angeles, 1989).

*

Film Adaptation: Johnny Mnemonic, 1995.

Critical Studies: William Gibson by Lance Olsen, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1992 (includes bibliography); Cyberpunk and Cyberculture: Science Fiction and the Work of William Gibson by Dani Cavallaro, New Brunswick, New Jersey, Athlone Press, 2000.

* * *

In 1922, T.S. Eliot published a review of Joyce's Ulysses, coining the now famous phrase "mythical method" to describe how Joyce created an effect of order in the chaos of modern fragmentation by invoking old stories and myths as compositional forms. William Gibson has demonstrated the continuing vitality of this "method" and come up with some new developments of his own in his "cyberpunk" trilogy that dominated science fiction of the 1980s, (Neuromancer, Count Zero, and Mona Lisa Overdrive), as well as in a second trilogy in the 1990s (Virtual Light, Idoru, and All Tomorrow's Parties).

There are strong plots in Gibson's novels, but they have little to do with the characters who inhabit them, who for the most part don't know much at all about the plot they are acting in. In Neuromancer, the "cowboy" computer-jockey Case—like the reader—only discovers at the end that he has been acting out a scheme composed by a seemingly omniscient and nearly omnipotent embodiment of artificial intelligence (AI) that merged with another AI to become the "matrix." In the later two novels the AI/matrix chooses to manifest itself in the form of Voodoo beings called Loa. As the initiated Beauvoir explains to the novice Bobby, in Count Zero, we don't have to worry about "whether it's a religion or not. It's just a structure. Lets you an' me discuss some things that are happening. ... What it's about is getting things done." Gibson reports in an interview that all he knows about Voodoo he found by accident in an issue of National Geographic just when he needed to find a way to "get things done" in his second novel: "That probably has a lot to do with the way I write—stitching together all the junk that's floating around in my head." This self-reflexivity in the writing, together with self-effacing creative modesty and tactics of conspicuously parodic pastiche, place Gibson's work within the discourse of postmodernism. Recycled cliches are the staple of his work, shared with the knowing reader who is hip to the ironic game being played with cultural artifacts.

Gibson's publishing career began the same year MTV hit the video market (1981), and his style reflects some of the same tactics and pace, where mundane music is transformed into a montage-collage of rapid-fire imagery in a placeless and timeless stream-of-consciousness continuum. Like the typical MTV presentation, his work seems designed to force a sensory overload onto a reader who can't keep up with the frantic pace. Oft-quoted lines from Neuromancer describe the effect nicely: "Night City was like a deranged experiment in social Darwinism, designed by a bored researcher who kept one thumb permanently on the fast-forward button." The sensory overload is reflected in a stylistic saturation that has been aptly characterized as a "neon epic style," a breathless linguistic texture that sweeps lyrically through mental states of stressed-out tension and drug highs, with an exhilaratingly desperate hallucinatory intensity, in a futuristic reenactment of the film noir cityscape of movies like Blade Runner (1982) or The Terminator (1984).

Things slow down a bit in the second and third novels of the trilogy, to allow for more complex character development and for a shift from major male characters to female ones. Things slow still more in Virtual Light, where we find a female main character who is a bicycle courier in San Francisco, physically transporting bits of information like a rider for the Pony Express. Both Idoru and All Tomorrow's Parties feature brisk capers as part of their plots: the former tells of the efforts of an adult data analyst and a teenage music fan to discover why a pop music performer has declared his intention to marry a virtual pop star, while the latter merges several plotlines at the point of discovery of a coming radical, worldwide change. However, they share with Virtual Light not only recurrent characters and settings, but also a more studied approach to their subject matter.

Gibson's work has an uneasy relationship to the genre of science fiction, comparable to what's called a "crossover" performance in the music world. In the early period of SF, the conventional goal was to expand human consciousness into outer space, under the secure control of scientist adventurers who combined the classical liberal virtues of morality with the forces of technological production. Gibson represents a strong turn away from this outward-bound surge, toward a more problematic contemporary frontier of science that is focused inwards, on an infinity of microcosms rather than the oldfashioned infinity of open space. Gibson's fiction follows the investments of current scientific research in the practical/theoretical fields of communication, data storage, miniaturization, artificial intelligence, bionic prosthetics, neurochemistry, genetics, and surgical interventions while continuing the exploration of paranoid subject positions inaugurated by the "serious" writers who inspired and influence him, like William S. Burroughs, J.G. Ballard, and Thomas

Paradoxically, the fact that Gibson himself knows no science ("I have no grasp of how computers really work," he admits in an interview), enables him to be all the more convincing to the millions of his readers who also know nothing about science. Like Edgar Rice Burroughs, who knew nothing of Africa, Gibson creates characters who glide mentally through cyberspace as effortlessly as Tarzan glided through the jungles of the Dark Continent. "My ignorance had allowed me to romanticize them [computers]," he admits, and our ignorance allows us to accept the romanticized exaggerations. Gibson's famous invention, "cyberspace," is technically sheer nonsense, but since it exists as a form of belief, it also has a certain kind of reality, as "a consensual hallucination experienced daily by billions of legitimate operators, in every nation."

The cyberpunk movement leapt to prominence in the early 1980s, with Gibson at its helm, as an apparent manifestation of countercultural art. Ten years later, his fourth novel was on the New York Times bestseller list, raising an important question: can there be an authentic countercultural literature that achieves popularity and also resists becoming an imitation of itself suitable for mass consumption? Gibson himself has referred to the cyberpunk movement as "mainly a marketing strategy—and one that I've come to feel trivializes what I do." His most recent work makes clear that he is no longer concerned by this "marketing strategy," but instead is quite comfortable writing novels that show an increasingly mature concern for character, a confidently leisure approach to delineating those characters, and a calm acceptance of the fact that the startling innovations of Neuromancer are now simply part of the world—the characters, and the readers.

—Thomas A. Vogler, updated by F. Brett Cox

GILCHRIST, Ellen (Louise)

Nationality: American. Born: Vicksburg, Mississippi, 20 February 1935. Education: Vanderbilt University, Nashville; Millsaps College, Jackson, Mississippi, B.A. in philosophy 1967; University of Arkansas, Fayetteville, 1976. Has three sons. Career: Broadcaster on National Public Radio 1984–85; also journalist. Awards: Mississippi Arts Festival poetry award, 1968; New York Quarterly award, for poetry, 1978; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1979; Prairie Schooner award, 1981; Mississippi Academy award, 1982, 1985; Saxifrage award, 1983; American Book award, 1985; University of Arkansas Fulbright award, 1985; Mississippi Institute Arts and Letters award, for literature, 1985, 1990, 1991; O. Henry Short Story award, 1995. LHD, University of Southern Illinois, 1991. Address: c/o Little Brown, 34 Beacon St., Boston, Massachusetts 02108, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Annunciation. Boston, Little Brown, 1983; London, Faber, 1984. The Anna Papers. Boston, Little Brown, 1988; London, Faber, 1989. Net of Jewels. Boston, Little Brown, and London, Faber, 1992.

Anabasis: A Journey to the Interior. Jackson, University of Mississippi, 1994.

Starcarbon: A Meditation on Love. Boston, Little Brown, and London, Faber, 1994.

Sarah Conley. Boston, Little, Brown, 1997.

Short Stories

In the Land of Dreamy Dreams: Short Fiction. Fayetteville, University of Arkansas Press, 1981; London, Faber, 1982.

Victory over Japan. Boston, Little Brown, 1984; London, Faber, 1985.

Drunk with Love. Boston, Little Brown, 1986; London, Faber, 1987.Light Can Be Both Wave and Particle. Boston, Little Brown, 1989;London, Faber, 1990.

I Cannot Get You Close Enough: Three Novellas. Boston, Little Brown, 1990; London, Faber, 1991.

The Blue-Eyed Buddhist and Other Stories. London, Faber, 1990. The Age of Miracles: Stories. Boston, Little, Brown, 1995.

Rhoda: A Life in Stories. Boston, Little Brown, 1995.

The Courts of Love: Stories. Boston, Little, Brown, 1996.

Flights of Angels: Stories. Boston, Little, Brown, 1998.

The Cabal and Other Stories. Boston, Little, Brown, 2000.

Collected Stories. Boston, Little, Brown, 2000.

Plays

Television Plays: A Season of Dreams, from stories by Eudora Welty, 1968.

Poetry

The Land Surveyor's Daughter. Fayetteville, Arkansas, Lost Road, 1979.

Riding Out the Tropical Depression: Selected Poems 1975–1985. New Orleans, Faust, 1986.

Other

Falling Through Space: The Journals of Ellen Gilchrist. Boston, Little Brown, 1987; London, Faber, 1988.

*

Critical Studies: Ellen Gilchrist by Mary A. McCay. New York, Twayne, 1997; The Fiction of Ellen Gilchrist by Margaret Donovan Bauer. Gainesville, University Press of Florida, 1999.

* * *

Ellen Gilchrist is one of America's best contemporary fiction writers. Throughout her work, some characteristics remain constant. Usually presented from a woman's point of view, the fiction includes convincing male figures. Gilchrist satirizes the foibles and arrogance of both sexes. Her women are not better than men, but their notably bad behavior is more often presented positively—as a sign of strength, a refusal to be victimized, or a daring determination to get pleasure through an outrageous act or verbal exchange. Most of her characters are self-centered, and their egoism can have both positive and negative effects. Gilchrist frequently employs an ironic juxtaposition of agony and comedy. Her stories usually present a series of scenes, with heavy use of dialogue and relatively little narrative comment. The stories generally close abruptly after a climactic episode. Narrators are either the main character, speaking in the first person, or an emotionally detached and critical observer. The settings, frequently in the South, include New Orleans, the rural Louisiana Delta, Oklahoma, North Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, and Arkansas—although some stories in recent books take place in San Francisco, in Maine, and even in Istanbul.

In her first two volumes of stories, In the Land of Dreamy Dreams and Victory over Japan, Gilchrist includes a number of stories exploring the drug culture, alcoholism, diet faddism, and prescription drug abuse. The early stories include some of great violence. Among the early stories related to drugs are "The President of the Louisiana Live Oak Society," which presents child-pushers; "The Gauzy Edge of Paradise," which focuses on drug faddists (a topic pursued later in "The Last Diet" in Drunk with Love); and "Defender of the Little Falaya." In some of these, Gilchrist skillfully contrasts the disorientation and hilarity induced by drugs with the dullness of the individuals' lives in their lucid states. Victory over Japan includes two sequences of compelling stories: one focusing on the engaging ninteen-year-old Nora Jane Whittington, introduced in In the Land of Dreamy Dreams, and the other on Crystal Weiss, who "manages to have a good time" while detesting her rich lawyer husband, Manny. "Miss" Crystal gains a sympathetic dimension, because in four of the stories she is seen through the eyes of her tolerant black maid, Traceleen, the only fully-developed black person in Gilchrist's work. Gilchrist's strengths throughout all of her collections of short stories lie in comic satire and the creation of highly memorable characters. Her satire sometimes misfires in its harshness or repetitiveness, as in her predictable sniping at religion, and she tends to overuse stereotypes—Jewish lawyers, sex-starved wives, black servants, Chinese-Americans, nuns, and tennis players at country clubs. Such stereotypical minor characters function effectively in many of the satiric stories but lessen the impact of the two novels. In The Annunciation Amanda sustains the novel well in her childhood and early adolescence as she innocently enjoys incest and as she suffers a nightmarish and life-changing cesarean at the age of 14. In the final chapters, Amanda also responds with a moving and dramatic range of emotion to the challenge of bearing a child in her forties after more than twenty-five years of infertility. But Amanda is unconvincing both in her conversion to scholarly research at the University of Arkansas and her affair with the working-class student who makes love as beautifully as he plays the guitar. This novel possesses many of the strengths of the stories: forceful scenes, aggressive, stubborn, reckless characters, interesting eccentrics, and abundance of dialogue. In two stories in Light Can Be Both Wave and Particle ("The Song of Songs" and "Life on Earth") Gilchrist has recently provided alternative endings for The Annunciation, which should revive interest in the novel. Gilchrist's second novel, The Anna Papers, lacks the orderly structure of the first. It breaks into several episodic narratives, punctuated by letters, journal notes, and other fragments that comprise the papers of the author Anna Hand. Anna discovers she has cancer, returns home to Charlotte, North Carolina for a final year, and then drowns herself. Her dutiful sister, Helen Abadie, with reluctance and resentment, is sorting through Anna's papers as Anna's literary co-executor. The informing presence of Anna, the pointed statements and questions she left behind in her papers, the re-creation of her life by the friends who gather for a memorable six-day wake, the appearance of the New England poet, Mike Carmichael (literary coexecutor with Helen) and—most of all—the surprising and refreshing renewal of the deadened life and spirit of Helen Abadie blend sorrow, anger, and comedy in The Anna Papers.

Anna Hand is central in Gilchrist's other recent fiction: in "Anna, Part I" in Drunk with Love and in all three novellas (Winter, De Haviland Hand, Summer in Maine) collected in I Cannot Get You Close Enough. She appears also in many references in the other recent publications, especially in Light Can Be Both Wave and Particle. The titles of these last two books by Gilchrist are provided by Anna in her papers, and both refer to the conflict between individualism and connection with others. The words, quoted near the end of A Summer in Maine, are Anna's last words and were addressed to her lover, the "married physician": "I cannot get you close enough .... We never can get from anyone else the things we need to fill the endless terrible need, not to be dissolved, not to sink back into sand, heat, broom, air, thinnest air. And so we revolve around each other." The words imply not only her recognition of the failure of this love affair and of her year's efforts to forge strong bonds within her family before her death, but also her recognition of universal human inability to fully relate to others. Similarly, she chooses Light Can Be Both Wave and Particle to be the title of her "one last book." The title implies again that one is a separate and inconsequential particle in the universe, but it also suggests that one can tenuously or temporarily identify the self with the great waves of nature and of human history. The first two novellas in I Cannot Get You Close Enough chronicle Anna's two major efforts to establish solidity in her unstable family. Winter recounts her journey to the slums of Istanbul to expose the irresponsibility of Daniel Hand's wife, Sheila, in order to assure Anna that custody of her niece, Jessica, now 15, will remain with the Hand family. Jessica, a beautiful and talented pianist and dancer, is a slow learner and despises school. The second novella, De Haviland Hand, describes Anna's efforts, including a trip to a Cherokee community in rural Tahlequah, Oklahoma, to prepare the way for Daniel's other 15year-old daughter, Olivia de Haviland Hand, to join the Hand enclave. (Spring Deer, Olivia's mother, died during childbirth, after her brief marriage to Daniel. Daniel was never notified of Olivia's existence.) Olivia has grown up fearing sex and childbirth as precursors of death, and consequently shuns the attention of boys. Achievement in horseback riding and getting high grades in school have become obsessions. She decides eventually to follow Anna by choosing a career as a writer and also to become a famed research scientist. At the close of A Summer in Maine, Jessica is pregnant and enters an ill-advised marriage. Olivia cries out that, if she is not accepted by Harvard, she will, like Anna, drown herself. This novella allows Gilchrist to gather at the rented house in Maine several figures from New Orleans who appeared memorably in her earlier books. They include the Weiss family (Miss Crystal, her husband, Manny, their children, King and Crystal Anne, their maid Traceleen and her niece, Andria); Lydia, a painter; Noel, an aging actress, who fears possible publication of her intimate correspondence with Anna Hand; and Alan Dalton, a handsome tennis player who causes estrangement between Lydia and Miss Crystal. The formerly inhibited and unimaginative Helen Abadie and the poet/literary co-executor arrive (as lovers), adding to the gossip and excitement in this novella. In other recent books, Gilchrist rewards faithful readers by returning to still more familiar figures. For example, in Drunk with Love Rhoda Manning appears at different ages—childhood, puberty, adolescence, and early marriage—in "Nineteen Forty-one," "The Expansion of the Universe," and "Adoration." Traceleen returns in a monologue, "Traceleen at Dawn," comically recalling Miss Crystal's attempt to quit drinking. In The Anna Papers Miss Crystal and Phelan Manning and other longtime companions enliven a six-day wake. In Light Can Be Both Wave and Particle Rhoda Manning again dominates three stories: as a child in "The Time Capsule," an adult in "Blue Hills at Sundown," and as a 53-year-old woman, "having run out of men" in the very long story, "Mexico." Rhoda, her brother, Dudley, and cousin Saint John attempt to prove in several days in Mexico that they can still have as wild a time as in their youth. The story, however, includes three sobering events: their attendance at a bull-fight, Rhoda's reckless arranging of a liaison with the champion matador, and a disastrous visit to Dudley's insecurely fenced compound, where wild animals are procured by thrill-seeking hunters. In the end, Rhoda finds herself, as in childhood, angry and dependent on her brother, but always willing to take risks for pleasure and excitement. Nora Jane Whittington, the anarchist, bandit, and lover of Sandy in In the Land of Dreamy Dreams and Victory over Japan, also returns in the title story of Drunk with Love—pregnant and with two lovers. She gives birth to twins in "The Starlight Express" in Light Can Be Both Wave and Particle, a story in which Gilchrist also introduces her most intriguing new character, a Chinese geneticist, Lin Tan Sing, who will surely reappear in another volume.

In just five years, from 1995 to 2000, Gilchrist produced no less than six story collections. Not only Rhoda: A Life in Stories but The Courts of Love, half of which consisted of a novella, drew on previously established characters and situations, offering the reader a satisfyingly tactile experience of Gilchrist's fictional world. The tales in Flights of Angels, too, primarily concerned the Manning family and touched on familiar themes and locales. The title story of The Cabal concerns a tightly knit group that controls the social life of Jackson, Mississippi, and it introduces characters that reappear throughout the book. Thus these collections function, essentially, as novels; but Gilchrist also produced a novel in the traditional sense, Sarah Conley. In this, the story of a 52-year-old journalist and National Book Award winner torn by competing relationships and loyalties, she made a refreshing break from the well-worn circles of her earlier work.

-Margaret B. McDowell

GLANVILLE, Brian (Lester)

Nationality: British. Born: London, 24 September 1931. Education: Newlands School; Charterhouse School, Surrey, 1945–49. Family: Married Elizabeth Pamela De Boer in 1959; two sons and two daughters. Career: Literary adviser, Bodley Head, publishers, London, 1958–62. Since 1958 sportswriter for the Sunday Times, London. Awards: Berlin Film Festival award, for documentary, 1963; British Film Academy award, for documentary, 1967; Thomas Coward Memorial award, 1969; Sports Council Reporter of the Year award, 1982. Agent: John Farquharson, 162–168 Regent Street, London W1R 5TB. Address: 160 Holland Park Avenue, London W.11, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Reluctant Dictator. London, Laurie, 1952.

Henry Sows the Wind. London, Secker and Warburg, 1954.

Along the Arno. London, Secker and Warburg, 1956; New York, Crowell, 1957.

The Bankrupts. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Doubleday, 1958.

After Rome, Africa. London, Secker and Warburg, 1959.

Diamond. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Farrar Straus, 1962.

The Rise of Gerry Logan. London, Secker and Warburg, 1963; New York, Delacorte Press, 1965.

- A Second Home. London, Secker and Warburg, 1965; New York, Delacorte Press, 1966.
- A Roman Marriage. London, Joseph, 1966; New York, Coward McCann, 1967.
- The Artist Type. London, Cape, 1967; New York, Coward McCann, 1968.
- The Olympian. New York, Coward McCann, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1969.
- A Cry of Crickets. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Coward McCann, 1970.
- The Financiers. London, Secker and Warburg, 1972; as Money Is Love, New York, Doubleday, 1972.
- The Comic. London, Secker and Warburg, 1974; New York, Stein and Day, 1975.

The Dying of the Light. London, Secker and Warburg, 1976. Never Look Back. London, Joseph, 1980. Kissing America. London, Blond, 1985. The Catacomb. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1988.

Short Stories

A Bad Streak and Other Stories. London, Secker and Warburg, 1961. The Director's Wife and Other Stories. London, Secker and Warburg, 1963.

Goalkeepers Are Crazy: A Collection of Football Stories. London, Secker and Warburg, 1964.

The King of Hackney Marshes and Other Stories. London, Secker and Warburg, 1965.

A Betting Man. New York, Coward McCann, 1969.

Penguin Modern Stories 10, with others. London, Penguin, 1972.

The Thing He Loves and Other Stories. London, Secker and Warburg, 1973.

A Bad Lot and Other Stories. London, Penguin, 1977. Love Is Not Love and Other Stories. London, Blond, 1985.

Plays

A Visit to the Villa (produced Chichester, Sussex, 1981). Underneath the Arches, with Patrick Garland and Roy Hudd (produced Chichester, Sussex, 1981; London, 1982).

Screenplays (documentary): Goal!, 1967.

Radio Plays: The Diary, 1987; I Could Have Been King, 1988.

Television Documentaries: European Centre Forward, 1963.

Other

Cliff Bastin Remembers, with Cliff Bastin. London, Ettrick Press,

Arsenal Football Club. London, Convoy, 1952.

Soccer Nemesis. London, Secker and Warburg, 1955.

World Cup, with Jerry Weinstein. London, Hale, 1958.

Over the Bar, with Jack Kelsey. London, Paul, 1958.

Soccer round the Globe. London, Abelard Schuman, 1959.

Know about Football (for children). London, Blackie, 1963.

World Football Handbook (annual). London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1964; London, Mayflower, 1966–72; London, Queen Anne Press, 1974.

People in Sport. London, Secker and Warburg, 1967.

Soccer: A History of the Game, Its Players, and Its Strategy. New York, Crown, 1968; as Soccer: A Panorama, London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1969.

The Puffin Book of Football (for children). London, Penguin, 1970; revised edition, 1984.

Goalkeepers Are Different (for children). London, Hamish Hamilton, 1971; New York, Crown, 1972.

Brian Glanville's Book of World Football. London, Dragon, 1972.

The Sunday Times History of the World Cup. London, Times Newspapers, 1973; as History of the Soccer World Cup, New York, Macmillan, 1974; revised edition, as The History of the World Cup, London, Faber, 1980, 1984; revised edition, as The Story of the World Cup, London, Faber, 1997.

Soccer 76. London, Queen Anne Press, 1975.

Target Man (for children). London, Macdonald and Jane's, 1978.

The Puffin Book of Footballers. London, Penguin, 1978; revised edition, as Brian Glanville's Book of Footballers, 1982.

A Book of Soccer. New York, Oxford University Press, 1979.

Kevin Keegan (for children). London, Hamish Hamilton, 1981.

The Puffin Book of Tennis (for children). London, Penguin, 1981. The Puffin Book of the World Cup (for children). London, Penguin, 1984.

The British Challenge (on the Los Angeles Olympics team), with Kevin Whitney. London, Muller, 1984.

Footballers Don't Cry: Selected Writings. London, Virgin, 1999. Football Memories. London, Virgin, 1999.

Editor, Footballer's Who's Who. London, Ettrick Press, 1951.

Editor, The Footballer's Companion. London, Eyre and Spottiswoode,

Editor, The Joy of Football. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1986.

Critical Study: "Khaki and God the Father" in A Human Idiom by William Walsh, London, Chatto and Windus, 1965.

Brian Glanville comments:

(1972) There has, I suppose, been some tendency to categorize my work under three headings; that which deals with Italy (Along the Arno, A Cry of Crickets, A Roman Marriage), that which deals with Jewish life (The Bankrupts, Diamond), and that which deals with professional football (The Rise of Gerry Logan and many of the short stories). I think I might accept the categorization of the two Jewish novels, but it scarcely places The Olympian, which uses an athlete as its figure, athletics as its theme, or rather as its metaphor; or A Second Home, which is narrated in the first person by a Jewish actress—and has been bracketed with A Roman Marriage, itself narrated by a young girl. Again, one can, and does, use similar material for widely different purposes.

A large disenchantment with the conventional novel and its possibilities has, I think, led one gradually away from it, to more experimental methods. Like many novelists of serious intentions, one lives uneasily from one novel to the elusive next, always questioning and trying to establish the validity of the form.

Brian Glanville has written of his novels that "large disenchantment with the conventional novel ... has, I think, led one gradually away from it, to more experimental methods." Each novel from this prolific writer has demonstrated that impatience; his need to break away from the manners of the traditional novel and from its central narrative line to a more fluid exposition of his thought has meant that the action frequently unfolds through his characterization instead of through the plot. In A Roman Marriage the story is told by the young English girl who has allowed herself to be trapped into a futile, claustrophobic marriage to a handsome young Italian; and through her outraged consciousness we experience, too, the suffocation of her husband's clinging, over-protective mother as the tentacles of family life cut the girl off from reality and draw her in to a nightmare. Similarly the tensions and cabalistic integrity of the family are strikingly unfolded in his Jewish novels such as The Bankrupts, Diamond, and A Second Home.

A further strength of the novels in this latter group is Glanville's sure ear for the cadences of everyday speech. The Jewish patois is never forced to gain its effect through comic music-hall over-indulgence but is allowed to expose itself through Glanville's feeling for the poetic possibilities of the spoken language. Although the unforced ease of his dialogue gives it a down-to-earth integrity, Glanville never allows it to become mundane or demeaning, and the simplicity of effect is a structural strength of all his writing.

As a commentator on professional sport Glanville has also written several novels about the stamina and passion that make up the modern athlete. In The Olympian a young miler, Ike Low, is torn between his passion for his wife Jill and the almost sexual release that he finds in winning races. Against their uneasy relationship stands the ambiguous figure of Sam Dee, Ike's trainer, who acts as both agent provocateur and chorus over their slowly disintegrating marriage. The narrative is broken up with journalese and taut, film-like dialogue as the drama of Ike's racing career draws to an unexpected climax. The Dying of the Light is perhaps Glanville's most profound and satisfying sporting novel to date. Although it is described as "a football novel," it is in effect a parable of contemporary life. Len Rawlings, a footballing hero in the post-war years, slumps gradually to the bottom of the ladder in a world where the aged and the losers are quickly forgotten. In desperation he turns to petty crime but finds salvation in the love of his daughter, so unlike him in character, but the only one to understand the terrifying loneliness of his personal predicament. As in all Glanville's novels, the moralizing is made manifest by its absence—Rawlings may have broken the law but it is the law of the jungle that is at fault, the "sporting" code that allows a talented man to be driven to despair through no fault of his own.

Contemporary obsessions of another kind are examined in Never Look Back, a novel that explores the world of rock and roll bands and the attitudes of its denizens: the stars, their managers and hangers-on, the agents and the crooks. The documentary detail is impressive but Glanville's mastery of language and skillful handling of dialogue convey subtle shifts of feeling, and they also constantly change his and the reader's focus on this kaleidoscopic world. Above all, Glanville shows that he is one of the few contemporary novelists capable of tackling and expressing the values, or lack of them, in our rapidly changing society.

After Never Look Back, Glanville produced two more novels in the 1980s, Kissing America and The Catacomb. Later years saw an increased production of nonfiction writing on sport, but no additional novels—which, given the outstanding ability shown in his earlier works, must certainly be counted a shame.

-Trevor Royle

GLOVER, Douglas (Herschel)

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Simloe, Ontario, 14 November 1948. Education: York University, Toronto, 1966–69, B.A. in philosophy; University of Edinburgh, 1969–71, M.Litt. in philosophy; University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1980–82, M.F.A. in creative writing. Family: Married Helen Edelman in 1990; two sons. Career: Lecturer in philosophy, University of New Brunswick, Saint John, 1971; reporter, The Evening Times-Globe, Saint John, New Brunswick, 1972; reporter, The Examiner, Peterborough, Ontario, 1973-75; copy editor, The Montreal Star, 1975; copy editor, The Star-Phoenix, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, 1979. Since 1991 lecturer in English, Skidmore College, Saratoga Springs, New York, and since 1994 faculty, Norwich University, Montpelier, Vermont. Writer-in residence, University of New Brunswick, Fredericton, 1987, State University of New York, Albany, 1992-94. Fiction editor, The Iowa Review, 1980-81. Since 1991 editor, with Maggie Helwig, Coming Attractions, Oberon Press, Ottawa. Since 1994 host, The Book Show, National Public Radio, Albany. Awards: Canadian Fiction Magazine annual prize, 1984, and Literary Press Group award, 1986, both for "Dog Attempts to Drown Man in Saskatoon''; Canadian National Magazine awards gold medal, 1990, for "Story Carved in Stone"; New York Foundation for the Arts Artists' fellowship, 1994. Address: R.R. 1, Waterford, Ontario, Canada N0E 1Y0.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Precious. Toronto, Seal, 1984.

The South Will Rise at Noon. Toronto. Viking, 1988; New York, Viking, 1989.

The Life and Times of Captain N. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, and New York, Knopf, 1993.

Short Stories

The Mad River and Other Stories. Windsor, Black Moss Press, 1981.

Dog Attempts to Drown Man in Saskatoon. Vancouver, Talonbooks, 1985

A Guide to Animal Behaviour. Fredericton, Goose Lane, 1991.

Other

Notes Home from a Prodigal Son. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1999. Editor, with Maggie Helwig, Coming Attractions 91–94, 4 vols. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1991–94.

Editor, with Diane Schoemperlen, Coming Attractions 95. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1995.

*

Critical Studies: In Canadian Fiction Magazine, 65, 1989; in Paragraph, 13 (1), 1991; in The New Story Writers edited by John Metcalf, Quarry Press, 1992; in Matrix, 40, Summer 1993.

Douglas Glover comments:

Most of what I write comes from a place so personal, so intimate, and so painful that I cannot write about it except as fiction. Elements of my style—the obsessive repetitions, the phantasmagoria of images, allusions and comparisons, the mix of comedy and violence, the grotesquerie which is the joke of horror—were always present, but have been reinforced by reading the novels of the late great

French Canadian writer Hubert Aquin, especially Blackout and The Antiphonary. Nabokov lurks somewhere. And back of Nabokov the ghost of Viktor Shklovsky telling us to make things "strange."

I like to write stories that touch the mind and the heart at once, stories that don't necessarily mean but which nonetheless refer to the world's miraculous complexity, its unexpectedness, its divine playfulness. I write about love and memory, the weight of memory and history and the multifarious messages of culture and the past which run through us and, briefly, use us before passing on. What is the self that's being used and what is using it? I ask. And how do lovers love? Why are people cruel? And whither the words, when the wind blows ...?

As an individual I find it difficult to separate the rhetorical from the personal. I am a nomad, an expatriate, a wandering Canadian (which is worse than just being a Canadian, I am doubly displaced, a Canadian squared), and I can no longer tell whether that's because I am a writer or why I am a writer. Some mornings I wake up and it's a problem. Some mornings I wake up and it's a dance.

* * *

Since 1981, Douglas Glover has yoked highly cerebral concerns with a witty and passionate style, a steadily growing array of techniques serving an increasingly complex vision. "Life has a way of complicating itself," the narrator says in "The Obituary Writer" (from A Guide to Animal Behavior). In many Glover stories, as in "Pender's Visions" (The Mad River and Other Stories) and in the title story of Dog Attempts to Drown Man in Saskatoon, the writer embraces that complexity in a flexible style that has steadily grown in power and resource. A further example is "A Man in a Box" (A Guide to Animal Behavior) in which a pandemonic, logorrheic universe swirls within the confines of an obsessed derelict's cardboard shelter.

The same growth can be traced in his novels. Precious is a rococo play on mystery-novel conventions, whose antihero is a much-married newspaper reporter in a small Lake Ontario shoreline community (''It seemed to me that I had spent a lifetime, more or less, in towns just like Ockenden, changing buses to get to other towns''). The South Will Rise at Noon, after a start somewhat straining suspension of disbelief, builds to brilliant comedy in telling of one Tully Stamper's misadventures in Gomez Gap, Florida, scene of a preposterous cinematic re-creation of a Civil War battle.

To some extent Precious and The South Will Rise at Noon amount to a novelist's accomplished apprenticeship. But The Life and Times of Captain N., a story of violent border transactions set in the Niagara frontier, 1779-81, marks a breakthrough, the first thirty pages or so of it among the most engaged and involving Canadian prose in recent years. The novel bodies forth a startlingly vivid historical imagination (in a favorable notice The New Yorker said the book belongs to the "Apocalypse The" school of historical fiction), previously only hinted at in a few stories like "Swain Corliss, Hero of Malcolm's Mills (Now Oakland, Ontario), November 6, 1814" in A Guide to Animal Behavior. ("The Indians skinned and butchered Edwin Barton's body, Ned having no further use for it.") Amid a treacherous landscape of shattered alliances, psychological as much as political, Glover tells of Captain Hendrick Nellis, Tory guerrilla and "redeemer" of Indian-abducted whites; his son, Oskar, whom Hendrick kidnaps to fight the Yankee rebels; and Mary Hunsacker, a German immigrant girl captured and culturally assimilated by the Mississauga tribe. Then there are the Mohawk, Oneida, Cayuga, Onondaga, and Seneca—Iroquoian shape-shifters viciously caught in a no-holds-barred conflict between Loyalists and "Bostonians." The narrative language, especially that of the psychically riven Oskar, is a virtuoso mix of period-sensitive verisimilitude and the shifting premises of the postmodern.

Glover has thought and written extensively about the art of fiction; more importantly, his stories and novels are not just five-finger exercises on the theme of extreme situations but work out a deeply felt, still-evolving vision. Complexity is never achieved at the expense of clarity.

-Fraser Sutherland

GODWIN, Gail (Kathleen)

Nationality: American. Born: Birmingham, Alabama, 18 June 1937. Education: Peace Junior College, Raleigh, North Carolina, 1955–57; University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1957-59, B.A. in journalism 1959; University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1967-71, M.A. 1968, Ph.D. in English 1971. Family: Married 1) Douglas Kennedy in 1960 (divorced); 2) Ian Marshall in 1965 (divorced 1966). Career: Reporter, Miami Herald, 1959-60; consultant, U.S. Travel Service, United States Embassy, London, 1962-65; researcher, Saturday Evening Post, New York, 1966; Instructor in English, 1967-70, and lecturer at the Writers Workshop, 1972-73, University of Iowa; instructor and fellow, Center for Advanced Studies, University of Illinois, Urbana, 1971–72; American specialist, United States Information Service, Brazil, 1976; lecturer, Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York, 1977, and Columbia University, New York, 1978, 1981. Awards: National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1974, and fellowship, for libretto, 1978; Guggenheim fellowship, 1975; St. Lawrence award, 1976; American Academy award, 1981; Thomas Wolfe Memorial award, 1988; Janet Kafka award, 1988. Agent: John Hawkins and Associates, 71 West 23rd Street, Suite 1600, New York, New York 10010. Address: P.O. Box 946, Woodstock, New York 12498-0946, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Perfectionists. New York, Harper, 1970; London, Cape, 1971. Glass People. New York, Knopf, 1972.

The Odd Woman. New York, Knopf, 1974; London, Cape, 1975. Violet Clay. New York, Knopf, and London, Gollancz, 1978.

A Mother and Two Daughters. New York, Viking Press, and London, Heinemann, 1982.

The Finishing School. New York, Viking, and London, Heinemann, 1985.

A Southern Family. New York, Morrow, and London, Heinemann, 1987.

Father Melancholy's Daughter. New York, Morrow, and London, Deutsch, 1991.

The Good Husband. New York, Ballantine, and London, Deutsch, 1994.

Evensong. New York, Ballantine Books, 1999.

Short Stories

Dream Children. New York, Knopf, 1976; London, Gollancz, 1977.Mr. Bedford and the Muses. New York, Viking Press, 1983; London, Heinemann, 1984.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Fate of Fleeing Maidens," in Mademoiselle (New York), May 1978.
- "The Unlikely Family," in Redbook (New York), August 1979.
- "Over the Mountain," in Antaeus (New York), 1983.

Plays

The Last Lover, music by Robert Starer (produced Katonah, New York, 1975).

Journals of a Songmaker, music by Robert Starer (produced Philadelphia, 1976).

Apollonia, music by Robert Starer (produced Minneapolis, 1979).

Recordings: Anna Margarita's Will (song cycle), music by Robert Starer, C.R.I., 1980; Remembering Felix, music by Robert Starer, Spectrum, 1987.

Other

Woodstock Landscapes: Photographs by John Kleinhans (text). Woodstock, New York, Golden Notebook Press, 2000.

Editor, with Shannon Ravenel, The Best American Short Stories 1985. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1985.

*

Manuscript Collection: Southern Collection, University of Northern Carolina Library, Chapel Hill.

Critical Studies: "The Odd Woman: Literature and the Retreat from Life" by Susan E. Lorsch, in Critique (Atlanta), vol. 20, no. 2, 1978; "Reaching Out: Sensitivity and Order," in Recent American Fiction by Women by Anne Z. Mickelson, Metuchen, New Jersey, Scarecrow Press, 1979; interview and "Gail Godwin and Southern Womanhood" by Carolyn Rhodes, both in Women Writers of the Contemporary South edited by Peggy Whitman Prenshaw, Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1984; Gail Godwin by Jane Hill, New York, Twayne, 1992; The Evolving Self in the Novels of Gail Godwin by Lihong Xie. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1995; Moving On: The Heroines of Shirley Ann Grau, Anne Tyler, and Gail Godwin by Susan S. Kissel. Bowling Green, Ohio, Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1996.

Gail Godwin comments:

Since I began writing fiction I have been most interested in creating characters who operate at a high level of intelligence and feeling as they go about trying to make sense of the world in which they find themselves, and as they make decisions about how to live their lives.

* * *

In her fiction Gail Godwin depicts the choices that modern women make. Whether within marriage or the single life, motherhood or career, these choices necessitate compromise, and none brings complete happiness. Godwin's characters often explore their options through art as they create or analyze images that may reveal or even change reality. A common crisis that precipitates this artistic endeavor or self-exploration is a death in the family, and within renewed family relationships, either nuclear or extended, Godwin's characters defend, dismiss, or display their choices.

Godwin demonstrates the effects of lack of choice in her first two novels, both violent and oppressive tales. In The Perfectionists Dane Empson's rage against her stifling marriage erupts when she beats her husband's illegitimate son. Obsessed with sexual acts in which she is either completely powerless or powerful, Dane views any relationship as invasive. Francesca Bolt, a passive princess in Glass People, makes not even basic decisions about food and clothes. She may "open out" like a beautiful flower but only if husband Cameron provides the container. Like Dane Empson, Francesca longs for a dark angel to transport her to her "true but unknown destiny." Neither Dane nor Francesca finds the strength to leave her marriage.

In her most insightful novel to date, The Odd Woman, Godwin creates Jane Clifford, an academic who researches life in order to control it. Unlike Dane Empson and Francesca Bolt, Jane believes in relationships, in perfect unions, like that of Marian Evans (George Eliot) and George Henry Lewes, in which men and women can communicate but retain separate identities. If she can analyze her married lover's words, Jane believes she can discover his feelings. And to some extent she succeeds, for in a rare moment Jane experiences Gabriel completely. However, she cannot sustain her moment, and her analyses usually lead her away from reality toward melodramas with faceless villains.

The fictive present in The Odd Woman begins with Jane's grandmother's death, an event that forces Jane's rediscovery of family relationships. Within her family and in George Gissing's The Odd Women, a novel for her next teaching assignment, Jane explores women's choices. Although she hates her aggressive stepfather, the man with whom her mother makes an apparent compromise, Jane still cheers for women who strive for marriage. She destroys the family myth about great-aunt Cleva who ran away with a villain actor in the melodrama The Fatal Wedding. Caught between the world of literature in which every plot seems probable and reality in which married lovers seldom leave their wives, Jane struggles with her own possibilities. She rejects total withdrawal into literature after living in isolation the winter she writes her dissertation. Gerda, her radical feminist doppelgänger, cannot convince her to give up on men, but neither will Jane continue to play the role of Understanding Mistress. Jane's insomnia functions as her muse, and keeping herself open to relationships may free the ending of the Jane Clifford Story, with all its Aristotelian requirements. At the end of the novel, back in her apartment, Jane may not have found an Eliot-Lewes union, but she clings to her belief that one can "organize the loneliness and the weather and the long night into something of abiding shape and beauty."

Moving the reader closer to the main character through firstperson point of view and less reliance on interior monologue than in The Old Woman, Godwin nevertheless continues her reflections on the thin line between reality and imagination, between art and life in Violet Clay. The title character in Violet Clay searches idly for her options in "the book of Old Plots" while she projects herself into the romance novels she illustrates for a living. The death of Violet's Uncle Ambrose serves as catalyst for change when he commits suicide in his Adirondack cabin. Ambrose's note to Violet reads: "I'm sorry, there's nothing left." Violet sketches his face and interprets the punctuation in the note until she realizes that the "nothing" is artistic inspiration. When Violet realizes the meaning of Ambrose's note, she takes up serious art again, and the goal in the fictive present becomes the proper artistic subject. Violet finally remembers Ambrose's advice: write about (or create) something you want to happen. Art is a way of seeing life rather than postponing it, Violet learns. In her portrait of her neighbor Samantha De Vere, a woman who survives incest and rape, Violet captures the human spirit and earns artistic recognition. Exploring relationships and testing possibilities through artistic expression contribute to Violet's growth; as she states, "Sam put me into proportion, as Ambrose put me into perspective." Godwin continues to explore this connection between art and life in her two short story collections, Dream Children and Mr. Bedford and the Muses.

Each female character in A Mother and Two Daughters represents one choice for women. Cate, the academic who chooses abortion, Lydia, the divorcée who returns to school and career, and Nell, the widow who finds contentment in a second husband, all receive narrative attention in Godwin's longest novel to date. Although Godwin reduces her focus on art to a few comments on The Scarlet Letter, the theme of that novel is clearly relevant: "Can the individual spirit survive the society in which it has to live?" The society in A Mother and Two Daughters is that of the family, which Cate and Lydia's sibling rivalry threatens to pull apart after their father's death. Although blinded by misunderstanding, Lydia and Cate experience much the same anxiety and desire, as Lydia writes a research paper on Eros, a "striving for what one lacks," and Cate defines hope as "keeping a space ready for what you did want, even though you didn't know what it would be until it came." Neither daughter wants to close off her possibilities, whatever her destiny might bring.

In the most intense scene in the novel, Cate and Lydia explode at each other in anger. They express their resentment of their childhood roles: Cate as rebel, Lydia as dutiful daughter. After the fight, their neglect causes their father's cabin to burn, the fire taking with it not only childhood possessions but much of the sisters' anger. In the peace that follows, Lydia and Cate incorporate each other into their lives, and the connections between Lydia's real family and Cate's extended one allow each to survive as individual spirits: "Do you remember? ... Does it still hurt here? ... Oh, it all passes, but that's the beauty of it, too." Music written by Lydia's son Dickie unites the family in the final scene.

"Your soul craves that constant heightening of reality only art can give you," Ursula DeVane tells Justine Stokes in The Finishing School and thus continues Godwin's theme of art affecting life. Fourteen-year-old Justine, grieving for her dead father and grandparents, turns to forty-four-year-old Ursula for friendship. Twenty-six years later Justine still struggles to understand that tragic summer. Curiosity about that tragedy, Godwin's portrayal of eccentric Ursula, and her sensitive depiction of adolescent Justine propel the reader through The Finishing School. Much like Muriel Spark's Jean Brodie, Ursula DeVane serves as muse to the innocent. Always "keep moving forward and making new trysts with life," Ursula advises Justine, and you'll never grow old. However, the time comes when the student becomes independent and sees her teacher as flawed rather than ideal. This inevitability forms the essential part of Ursula's definition of tragedy: the "something terrible" that happens when a person lives out her own "destiny." The intensity of their relationship causes Justine to betray Ursula much as Ursula betrayed her own mother. The adult Justine realizes that now she must use "all the fate" that has happened to her and "make possible what still may happen." Her yearnings and torments strengthen her acting talent: "As long as you can go on creating new roles for yourself, you are not vanquished," Justine concludes, much as Ursula would. In Godwin's fictional world, roles for women are artistically created and recreated until they become real.

One senses, reading Evensong, that Godwin did a great deal of research to create a believable account of protagonist Margaret Bonner's daily routines as an Episcopalian priest. The title is apt in more ways than one, since the book is set in the final weeks of 1999, when many fear that the world is on the brink of some sort of cataclysm. (Godwin published the novel about a year before that time.) These fears can even penetrate a seemingly idyllic community in the Smoky Mountains of western North Carolina, but equally endangering of Margaret's peace are circumstances from her past, as well as figures from the present who intrude on her life with husband Adrian, a struggling teacher. Throughout the story, Godwin displays her characteristic grace and nimble talent.

-Mary M. Lay

GOLD, Herbert

Nationality: American. Born: Cleveland, Ohio, 9 March 1924. Education: Columbia University, New York, B.A. 1946, M.A. 1948; the Sorbonne, Paris (Fulbright scholar), 1949–51. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1943–46. Family: Married 1) Edith Zubrin in 1948 (divorced 1956), two daughters; 2) Melissa Dilworth in 1968 (divorced 1975), one daughter and two sons. Career: lecturer in philosophy and literature, Western Reserve University, Cleveland, 1951-53; lecturer in English, Wayne State University, Detroit, 1954–56. Visiting professor, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, 1958, University of California, Berkeley, 1963, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1964, Stanford University, California, 1967, and University of California, Davis, 1973–79. Awards: Inter-American Cultural grant, to Haiti, 1950; Hudson Review fellowship, 1956; Guggenheim fellowship, 1957; American Academy grant, 1958; Longview Foundation award, 1959; Ford fellowship, for drama, 1960; Sherwood Anderson prize, 1989. L.H.D.: Baruch College, City University, New York, 1988. Address: 1051-A Broadway, San Francisco, California 94133-4205, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Birth of a Hero. New York, Viking Press, 1951.

The Prospect Before Us. Cleveland, World, 1954; as Room Clerk, New York, New American Library, 1955.

The Man Who Was Not With It. Boston, Little Brown, 1956; London, Secker and Warburg, 1965; as The Wild Life, New York, Permabooks, 1957.

The Optimist. Boston, Little Brown, 1959.

Therefore Be Bold. New York, Dial Press, 1960; London, Deutsch, 1962.

Salt. New York, Dial Press, 1963; London, Secker and Warburg, 1964.

Fathers: A Novel in the Form of a Memoir. New York, Random House, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1967.

The Great American Jackpot. New York, Random House, 1970; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1971.

Swiftie the Magician. New York, McGraw Hill, 1974; London, Hutchinson, 1975.

Waiting for Cordelia. New York, Arbor House, 1977; London, Hutchinson, 1978.

Slave Trade. New York, Arbor House, 1979.

He/She. New York, Arbor House, 1980; London, Severn House, 1982.

Family: A Novel in the Form of a Memoir. New York, Arbor House, 1981; London, Severn House, 1983.

True Love. New York, Arbor House, 1982; London, Severn House, 1984.

Mister White Eyes. New York, Arbor House, 1984; London, Severn House, 1985.

A Girl of Forty. New York, Fine, 1986.

Dreaming. New York, Fine, 1988.

She Took My Arm As If She Loved Me. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1997.

Short Stories

15 x 3, with R.V. Cassill and James B. Hall. New York, New Directions, 1957.

Love and Like. New York, Dial Press, 1960; London, Deutsch, 1961. The Magic Will: Stories and Essays of a Decade. New York, Random House, 1971.

Stories of Misbegotten Love. Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1985.

Lovers and Cohorts: Twenty-Seven Stories. New York, Fine, 1986.

Other

The Age of Happy Problems (essays). New York, Dial Press, 1962. Biafra Goodbye. San Francisco, Twowindows Press, 1970.

My Last Two Thousand Years (autobiography). New York, Random House, 1972; London, Hutchinson, 1973.

The Young Prince and the Magic Cone (for children). New York, Doubleday, 1973.

A Walk on the West Side: California on the Brink (stories and essays). New York, Arbor House, 1981.

Travels in San Francisco. New York, Arcade, 1990.

The Best Nightmare on Earth: A Life in Haiti. New York, Prentice Hall Press, and London, Grafton, 1991.

Bohemia. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1993.

Editor, Fiction of the Fifties: A Decade of American Writing. New York, Doubleday, 1959.

Editor, with David L. Stevenson, Stories of Modern America. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1961; revised edition, 1963.

Editor, First Person Singular: Essays for the Sixties. New York, Dial Press, 1963.

*

Herbert Gold comments:

Subjects: Power, money, sex and love, intention in America.

Themes: The same. Moral: Coming next time.

* * *

In Herbert Gold's introduction to Fiction of the Fifties, he makes a distinction between fiction which avows and fiction which controls. The fiction which avows is a rather faithful transcription of the immediate and personal experience of the writer; such fiction makes use of the writer's own experience of his past and the section of social life where that experience took place. The other sort of fiction makes an attempt to present the experiences of persons who indeed are not the writer; these experiences are given clarity by an effort of the imagination which takes the writer outside himself and immerses him in circumstances that are not his own. All this is done by the exercise of control.

These interesting categories can be used to classify Gold's own fiction. A great deal of that fiction falls into the first category, that of avowal, as one can see from an inspection of his autobiographical My Last Two Thousand Years. This book is a narrative of Gold's own life, a life that finds its way into several of his novels. It was a life in which, as the son of a Jewish immigrant who settled in Cleveland, Gold experienced a difficult youth in the shadow of a strong father who had found a place for himself in an alien society. Gold's narrative relates his own struggles to detach himself from his father's ambitions for him, and to achieve his own goals, in New York and elsewhere, as student, critic, and novelist. All this was a process of self-discovery that demanded acts of will and personal heroism. This self-discovery, as Gold relates it, also involved a succession of painful relationships: marriage, parenthood, divorce, and a second marriage, with various temporary relationships along the way.

These are all matters that various other novelists would regard as private. So are they for Gold. But they are also the stuff of much of his fiction. These are the novels which avow (or assert) the essentials of the writer's own life. Such fiction contrasts with other novels in which Gold borrows and reshapes elements of other lives; it is in these latter novels that Gold controls the experiences of other persons and also depicts social patterns which the writer does not know directly and immediately.

Gold's frequent adherence to the dictum of Sir Philip Sidney's muse—"Fool ... look in thy heart and write"—is illustrated by an excellent novel, Fathers, which is subtitled "A Novel in the Form of a Memoir." The novel tells of the relation between an immigrant father and his son; it is a vivid recollection of matters that Gold also puts down in My Last Two Thousand Years. Fathers offers homage to a courageous father and to the equally courageous son who chooses to turn aside from his father. The novel offers a convincing texture of loyalty and enmity. The same section of Gold's life appears in Therefore Be Bold which, however, centers attention on "Daniel Berman's" adolescent years in Cleveland: his encounters with poetry and sex and his bitter first experience of anti-Semitism.

Other novels, one can judge, are transcriptions of Gold's own experience of self-assertion and self-discovery in the New York literary world. Thus, Swiftie the Magician displays Gold's creative imagination moving onwards from his youth and assessing a man's attempts to find his own way through the jungles of professional and emotional life that surround a person in the second half of the twentieth century. The novel relates the involvement of a writer with three women: an East Coast innocent, a West Coast "experienced" young woman, and the hard-bitten Swiftie, a "magician" who knows what the score is in a rough world. Salt gives the reader a more complex version of such pursuits of identity. Two men—one a complacent Wasp and the other once more an alter ego for Gold—move from woman to woman, the Wasp learning little and the young Jew from Cleveland a great deal.

Such are the novels in which Gold reworks the stuff of his own life. But there are other novels in which Gold is exercising control is, in more conventional literary language, inventing persons not himself and following the courses of their experiences. Birth of a Hero follows the attempts of a middle-aged business man, Reuben Flair, a faceless cipher, to become a man fully aware of what he has done, in marriage and beyond marriage. As in other novels by Gold, the outlines of Reuben's achievement are cloudy, but a sense of travel and change is conveyed. In The Prospect Before Us Gold moves still farther afield. In this novel the chief person is Harry Bowers, manager of a run-down motel in Cleveland. A level of life—low, raunchy, and cruel, and quite different from the world of the novels of avowal—is presented in colors that convince. And there is no touch of the frequent father-son situation; Harry Bowers allows a black woman to rent a room in his motel and is hounded for what he has done. The Man Who Was Not With It allows us to inhabit the awareness of a carnival worker. Here, however, there is an approach to the themes of the novels of avowal. Bud, the carnie, is saddled with two fathers: one, his real one in Pittsburgh, and the other a carnival barker. The barker delivers Bud from his drug habit (and falls foul of it himself) and hovers like a threatening cloud over the early weeks of Bud's marriage: a relation that links this novel with other work of Gold. In The Great American Jackpot the persona is also not Gold's own (the hero is a Berkeley student of the 1960s), but the student's preoccupations are not unfamiliar. Al Dooley loves and hates his teacher, a black sociologist; Dooley tries to find out who he is in the arms of two girls; and, finally, he asserts his identity by breaking out: in this instance, by robbing a bank and experiencing the farce of American justice. Dooley reappears in Waiting for Cordelia where he is doing a thesis on prostitution in the San Francisco area. A madam (Cordelia) and Marietta, a woman eager to become a reforming mayor of San Francisco, enrich Dooley's research. In the course of writing his study, Dooley faces Gold's usual questions about the nature of love and the sadness and the loneliness which hamper its realization. Similar preoccupations mark the early novel, The Optimist, in which Burr Fuller makes his way through a failed marriage and achieves some mastery of the mysteries of love and career. And similar struggles mark True Love where the subject is the uneasiness of middle age; a "respectable" man is harassed by the dreams of his youth and by his fears about his later life. Will the late discovery of "true love" allay these discontents? In all, a considerable variety. It is a variety bound together by a style that is generally pervasive save for variations that reflect the different social levels reproduced.

In She Took My Arm As If She Loved Me, private eye Dan Kasdan gets a lead on the location of Priscilla, the wife he loved and lost many years before. That lead comes from a sleazy pornographer—yet the real story centers around Dan's enduring love for Priscilla. A certain vigor results from the determined contemporary quality of Gold's references, including commercial products and public diversions, and even turns of speech. What usually holds this variety together is Gold's own sense of the worth of what he is doing. The language of the novels is a considerable support to the portions of wisdom that appear in the novels.

-Harold H. Watts

GOLDMAN, William

Nationality: American. Born: Chicago, Illinois, 12 August 1931; brother of the writer James Goldman. Education: Highland Park High School; Oberlin College, Ohio, 1948–52, B.A. in English 1952; Columbia University, New York, 1954–56, M.A. in English 1956. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1952–54: Corporal. Family: Married Ilene Jones in 1961 (divorced); two daughters. Awards: Oscar, for screenplay, 1970, 1977. Address: 50 East 77th Street, New York, New York 10021, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Temple of Gold. New York, Knopf, 1957.

Your Turn to Curtsy, My Turn to Bow. New York, Doubleday, 1958.Soldier in the Rain. New York, Atheneum, and London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1960.

Boys and Girls Together. New York, Atheneum, 1964; London, Joseph, 1965.

No Way To Treat a Lady (as Harry Longbaugh). New York, Fawcett, and London, Muller, 1964; as William Goldman, New York, Harcourt Brace, and London, Coronet, 1968.

The Thing of It Is.... New York, Harcourt Brace, and London, Joseph, 1967.

Father's Day. New York, Harcourt Brace, and London, Joseph, 1971. The Princess Bride: S. Morgenstern's Classic Tale of True Love and High Adventure: The "Good Parts" Version, Abridged. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1973; London, Macmillan, 1975.

Marathon Man. New York, Delacorte Press, 1974; London, Macmillan, 1975.

Magic. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Macmillan, 1976. Tinsel. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Macmillan, 1979.

Control. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1982.

The Color of Light. New York, Warner, and London, Granada, 1984. The Silent Gondoliers (as S. Morgenstern). New York, Ballantine, 1984.

Heat. New York, Warner, 1985; as Edged Weapons, London, Granada, 1985.

Brothers. New York, Warner, and London, Grafton, 1986.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Something Blue," in Rogue (New York), 1958.
- "Da Vinci," in New World Writing 17. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1960.
- "Till the Right Girls Come Along," in Transatlantic Review 8 (London), Winter 1961.
- "The Ice Cream Eat," in Stories from the Transatlantic Review, edited by Joseph F. McCrindle. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1970.

Plays

Blood, Sweat and Stanley Poole, with James Goldman (produced New York, 1961). New York, Dramatists Play Service, 1962.

A Family Affair, with James Goldman, music by John Kander (produced New York, 1962).

Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid (screenplay). New York, Bantam, and London, Corgi, 1969.

The Great Waldo Pepper (screenplay). New York, Dell, 1975.

Memoirs of an Invisible Man, with Robert Collector and Dana Bodner, 1992.

William Goldman: Four Screenplays with Essays. New York, Applause Books. 1995.

William Goldman: Five Screenplays. New York, Applause, 1996. The Ghost and the Darkness: The Book of the Film. New York, Applause, 1996.

Absolute Power: The Screenplay. New York, Applause, 1997.

Screenplays: Masquerade, with Michael Relph, 1964; Harare (The Moving Target), 1966; Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid, 1969; The Hot Rock (How to Steal a Diamond in Four Uneasy Lessons), 1972; The Stepford Wives, 1974; The Great Waldo Pepper, 1975; All the President's Men, 1976; Marathon Man, 1976; A Bridge Too Far, 1977; Magic, 1978; The Princess Bride, 1987; Heat, 1987; Misery, 1990; The Chamber, Universal, 1997.; Absolute Power, Columbia Pictures, 1997; The General's Daughter. Paramount Pictures, 1999.

Television Films: Mr. Horn, 1979.

Other

The Season: A Candid Look at Broadway. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1969; revised edition, New York, Limelight, 1984.

Wigger (for children). New York, Harcourt Brace, 1974.

The Story of "A Bridge Too Far." New York, Dell, 1977.

Adventures in the Screen Trade: A Personal View of Hollywood and Screenwriting. New York, Warner, 1983; London, Macdonald, 1984.

Wait Till Next Year: The Story of a Season When What Should've Happened Didn't and What Could've Gone Wrong Did, with Mike Lupica. New York, Bantam, 1988.

Hype and Glory. New York, Villard, and London, Macdonald, 1990. The Big Picture: Who Killed Hollywood? and Other Essays. New York, New York, Applause Books, 1999.

Which Lie Did I Tell?, or, More Adventures in the Screen Trade. New York, Pantheon Books, 2000.

不

Critical Studies: William Goldman by Richard Andersen, Boston, Twayne, 1979.

* * *

William Goldman is a successful novelist, film scenarist, playwright, critic, and children's book author who focuses much of his attention on the illusions by which men and women live. These illusions often make existence more miserable than it need be and provide a core from which all of Goldman's protagonists seek to escape. Ironically, what they escape to is more often than not other illusions, which, because of the artificial distinctions society attaches to them, rarely satisfy their human needs.

When Raymond Trevitt's desperate attempts to protect the ideals of his childhood from adult realities in The Temple of Gold inadvertently cause the deaths of his closest friends, he leaves his home, but discovers only frustration and intolerance elsewhere. In Your Turn to Curtsy, My Turn to Bow, Chad Kimberly is driven by his ambitious illusions into believing he is a new Messiah, whose schizophrenic demands frighten the novel's protagonist, Peter Bell, into a life of escapist day-dreaming. Ambition is not the only illusion that drives the characters of Boys and Girls Together to New York; most of them are escaping from the unbearable circumstances of their home lives. Nevertheless, their hopes for self-improvement are dashed by unsuccessful love affairs, domineering parents, professional failures, embarrassing social exposures, and suicide. In Soldier in the Rain, Eustis Clay and Maxwell Slaughter cannot free themselves from the military-economic complex of which they are so much a part.

The great American illusions about success are the central concerns of The Thing of It Is ... and Father's Day, in which the talented, rich, but quirky Amos McCracken spends a tremendous amount of money trying to save his marriage and then his relationship with his daughter. In the end, his guilt-ridden personal failures lead him to create fantasies that enable him to fulfill the images he has of himself but that also pose a serious threat to the safety and well-being of others.

Unlike Amos McCracken or Kit Gil of No Way to Treat a Lady, Westley and Buttercup of The Princess Bride, Babe Levy of Marathon Man, and Corky Withers of Magic cannot retreat to a fabulous land to try to make themselves whole; they already live in fabulous land, where they are constantly assaulted by its empirical and psychological facts. Forced to encounter a vast confusion of fact and fiction, to deal with pain and death, and to seek power against forces that are difficult to pinpoint and consequently understand, the protagonists of these three novels must stay rooted in social systems that attempt to deny their vitality while creating illusions that life is what it should be.

Combining the everyday reality of Goldman's early novels with the fabulous reality of his later works, Tinsel tells the story of three women who desperately try to escape from the boredom of their daily lives to the fame and fortune of movie stardom, which, like all illusions, eludes them. As he did in Marathon Man and Magic, Goldman divides this into many chapters, so short and so different from any other in terms of setting and action that they flash by the reader like scenes in a movie. Because of their length, Goldman can keep simultaneously occurring stories running vividly in the reader's imagination without making any significant connections between them. When the individual stories eventually come together, Goldman continues flashing different scenes containing markedly different actions at such a pace that reading Goldman's story about the film industry becomes as close to a cinematic experience as literature can provide.

With The Color of Light Goldman returned to the themes of innocence and loss that concerned him in his early novels, only this time around he discusses them as subjects for writing. Unfortunately, this serious book, like some of his early serious novels, wasn't as well received as it should have been, and Goldman returned to the fabulist landscape of Marathon Man and Magic in Control and Heat. But he passed through fantasyland on the way just as he did in 1973 with The Princess Bride. The Silent Gondoliers tells us why the gondoliers in Venice no longer sing. Even they have lost their innocence in a world from which there is no escape.

Perhaps because of his popularity or the reputation he has established in Hollywood (many of his novels have been adapted to the screen), many critics have misunderstood or underrated Goldman's works. Perhaps these critics have been confused by Goldman's use of multiple modes—novel of manners, confessional journal, psychological novel, social satire, romantic parody, black humor novel, detective story, spy novel, radical protest novel, soap opera, absurdist novel, and more—within a wide frame of genres. Whatever the reason, Goldman is an extraordinarily talented and prolific writer whose incorporation of cinematic techniques with conventional narrative forms mark a significant contribution to the novel tradition. His success in the screen trade has perhaps influenced a move away from fiction, with a growing number of successful screenplays, along with memoirs of his work in Hollywood, to his credit.

-Richard Andersen

GORDIMER, Nadine

Nationality: South African. Born: Springs, Transvaal, 20 November 1923. Education: A convent school, and the University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg. Family: Married 1) G. Gavron in 1949; 2) Reinhold Cassirer in 1954; one son and one daughter. Career: Visiting lecturer, Institute of Contemporary Arts, Washington, D.C., 1961, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1969, Princeton University, New Jersey, 1969, Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois 1969, and University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, 1970; Adjunct Professor of Writing, Columbia University, New York, 1971; presenter, Frontiers television series, 1990. Awards: W.H. Smith Literary award, 1961; Thomas Pringle award, 1969; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1972; Booker prize, 1974; Grand Aigle d'Or prize (France), 1975; CNA award, 1975; Scottish Arts Council Neil Gunn fellowship, 1981; Common Wealth award, 1981; Modern Language Association award (U.S.A.), 1981; Malaparte prize (Italy), 1985; Nelly Sachs prize (Germany), 1985; Bennett award (U.S.A.), 1986; Royal Society of Literature Benson medal, 1990; Nobel prize, 1991, for literature. D.Lit.: University of Leuven, Belgium, 1980; D.Litt.: Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts, 1985; City College, New York, 1985; Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Massachusetts, 1985; Harvard University, 1986; Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1986; Columbia University, 1987; New School for Social Research, New York, 1987; University of York, 1987. Honorary Member, American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1980; Honorary Fellow, Modern Language Association (U.S.A.), 1985. Agent: A.P. Watt Ltd., 20 John Street, London WC1N 2DR, England; or, Russell and Volkening Inc., 50 West 29th Street, New York, New York 10001, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Lying Days. London, Gollancz, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1953.

A World of Strangers. London, Gollancz, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1958.

Occasion for Loving. London, Gollancz, and New York, Viking Press, 1963.

The Late Bourgeois World. London, Gollancz, and New York, Viking Press, 1966.

A Guest of Honour. New York, Viking Press, 1970; London, Cape, 1971.

The Conservationist. London, Cape, 1974; New York, Viking Press, 1975

Burger's Daughter. London, Cape, and New York, Viking Press, 1979

July's People. London, Cape, and New York, Viking Press, 1981. A Sport of Nature. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1987.

My Son's Story. London, Bloomsbury, and New York, Farrar Straus, 1990.

None to Accompany Me. London, Bloomsbury, and New York, Farrar Straus, 1994.

Harald, Claudia, and Their Son Duncan. London, Bloomsbury, 1996.

The House Gun. New York, Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1998.

Short Stories

Face to Face. Johannesburg, Silver Leaf, 1949.

The Soft Voice of the Serpent and Other Stories. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1952; London, Gollancz, 1953.

Six Feet of the Country. London, Gollancz, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1956.

Friday's Footprint and Other Stories. London, Gollancz, and New York, Viking Press, 1960.

Not for Publication and Other Stories. London, Gollancz, and New York, Viking Press, 1965.

Penguin Modern Stories 4, with others. London, Penguin, 1970.

Livingstone's Companions. New York, Viking Press, 1971; London, Cape, 1972.

Selected Stories. London, Cape, 1975; New York, Viking Press, 1976; as No Place Like, London, Penguin, 1978.

Some Monday for Sure. London, Heinemann, 1976.

A Soldier's Embrace. London, Cape, and New York, Viking Press, 1980

Town and Country Lovers. Los Angeles, Sylvester and Orphanos, 1980.

Something Out There. London, Cape, and New York, Viking, 1984. Crimes of Conscience. London, Heinemann, 1991.

Plays

Television Plays and Documentaries: A Terrible Chemistry (Writers and Places series), 1981 (UK); Choosing for Justice: Allan Boesak, with Hugo Cassirer, 1985 (USA and UK); Country Lovers, A Chip of Glass Ruby, Praise, and Oral History (all in The Gordimer Stories series), 1985 (USA); Frontiers series, 1990 (UK).

Other

African Lit. (lectures). Cape Town, University of Cape Town, 1972.
On the Mines, photographs by David Goldblatt. Cape Town, Struik, 1973

The Black Interpreters: Notes on African Writing. Johannesburg, Spro-Cas Ravan, 1973.

What Happened to Burger's Daughter; or, How South African Censorship Works, with others. Johannesburg, Taurus, 1980.

Lifetimes: Under Apartheid, photographs by David Goldblatt. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1986.

Reflections of South Africa, edited by Kirsten Egebjerg and Gillian Stead Eilersen. Herning, Denmark, Systime, 1986.

The Essential Gesture: Writing, Politics, and Places, edited by Stephen Clingman. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1988.

Conversations with Nadine Gordimer, edited by Nancy Topping Bazin and Marilyn Dallman Seymour. Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1990.

Writing and Being. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1995. Living in Hope and History: Notes from Our Century. New York, Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1999.

Editor, with Lionel Abrahams, South African Writing Today. London, Penguin, 1967.

*

Bibliography: Nadine Gordimer, Novelist and Short Story Writer: A Bibliography of Her Works by Racilia Jilian Neil, Johannesburg, University of the Witwatersrand, 1964.

Critical Studies: Nadine Gordiner by Robert F. Haugh, New York, Twayne, 1974; Nadine Gordimer by Michael Wade, London, Evans, 1978; Nadine Gordimer by Christopher Heywood, Windsor, Berkshire, Profile, 1983; The Novels of Nadine Gordiner: Private Lives/Public Landscapes by John Cooke, Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1985; The Novels of Nadine Gordiner: History from the Inside by Stephen Clingman, London, Allen and Unwin, 1986; Nadine Gordiner by Judie Newman, London, Macmillan, 1988; Critical Essays on Nadine Gordiner edited by Rowland Smith, Boston, Hall, 1990; Rereading Nadine Gordiner by Kathrin Wagner. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1994; Nadine Gordimer by Dominic Head. New York, Cambridge University Press, 1994; From the Margins of Empire: Christina Stead, Doris Lessing, Nadine Gordimer by Louise Yelin. Ithaca, New York, Cornell University Press, 1998; A Writing Life: Celebrating Nadine Gordiner, edited by Andries Walter Oliphant. London and New York, Viking, 1998; Nadine Gordimer Revisited by Barbara Temple-Thurston. New York, Twayne Publishers, 1999; This Is No Place for a Woman: Nadine Gordimer, Nayantara Sahgal, Buchi Emecheta, and the Politics of Gender by Joya Uraizee. Trenton, New Jersey, Africa World Press, 1999.

Theatrical Activities: Director: Television—Choosing for Justice: Allan Boesak, with Hugo Cassirer, 1985.

* * *

Nadine Gordimer, through her courageous and probing search for understanding and insight, has achieved international status as one of the finest living writers in English. Despite this international status, her work has been firmly rooted in her native country, South Africa, where she has remained throughout her career. Her position within the tumultuous social structure of this diverse and divided country—confined within the white, liberal, English, middle class—has been a source of both strength and weakness in her writing. On the one hand, she has been able to effectively make sense of the inextricably intertwined factors of South African social existence—political, sociological, and sexual—focusing on the apartheid regime's excessive intrusion into the realm of the individual. On the other hand, many of her characters, while exposing the limitations of Western, liberal humanism as a way of life, have been unable to escape these very limitations.

Most of Gordimer's main characters are involved in the very serious business of finding suitable moral apparatus to cope with the excruciating mental difficulties of living white—with a conscience—in a minority within a greater South African minority. Viewed as a group, Gordimer's male and female protagonists show a parallel development of consciousness towards a point at which most moral options appear to be exhausted (two of her later heroes end up running away, blindly, to nowhere).

In Helen Shaw, Jessie Stilwell, and Liz van den Sandt, the heroines of The Lying Days, Occasion for Loving, and The Late Bourgeois World, respectively, Gordimer charts the development from the racially exclusive confines of a white childhood in South Africa, to the discovery of—and disillusion with—the "freedom" of adult liberal thinking, and from there to the point where personal sacrifice becomes necessary for the sake of political integrity. In The Lying Days, Helen Shaw triumphs against the provincial narrowness and racial bigotry of her parents' mining village existence, yet she discovers that she, too, is sealed within her social limitations when she watches, from behind the windscreen of a car, a riot in a black township in which a man is shot dead by the police. As is the case with a number of Gordimer's characters, Helen Shaw's sense of moral failure is realized within and suggested by the failure of a love relationship in which certain moral suppositions function as a way of life. She goes away, to Europe, aware of a need for new sustenance, but essentially disillusioned. She is succeeded by Jessie Stilwell, an older version of Helen, back from Europe, now married and running a family, and committed to a makeshift liberal ideology, because the general (white) South African way of life is unacceptable. Yet the action of the novel shows this ideology to be vulnerable and in danger of hypocrisy—Jessie's world is "invaded" by an illicit love affair between a black artist and a young woman from England who, with her white musicologist husband, is a guest in the Stilwell home. The liberal idea of openness is belied by Jessie's wish to be left to her own kind of semi-romantic isolation, and all legitimate human reactions to the situation are bedeviled by a factor the Stilwells profess not to take undue account of-skin color. In The Late Bourgeois World, the developments in The Lying Days and Occasion for Loving find a conclusion. For Liz van den Sandt, the old liberal "way of life" is already dead when the book opens-her liberal-activist former husband has just committed suicide—while her present existence is nothing more than a kind of helpless withdrawal, reflected by a particularly pallid love affair she is conducting. She faces her moment of truth when a black friend, and activist, challenges her to step outside the sealed area of sensibility and conscience, and do something to help, at considerable personal risk. Thirteen years later, in Burger's Daughter, Rosa Burger appears: she is the daughter of the generation that did in fact take the struggle further from where Liz van den Sandt was poised at the end of The Late Bourgeois World. But now the process is inverted: Rosa's father dies while in prison for Marxist "subversion," and Rosa finds herself unable simply to go on from where her father and his kind were stopped by politically repressive authority. She is heir to the failure of left-wing activism among whites in South Africa, and she settles for an occupation as a physiotherapist at a black hospital (treating Soweto riot victims), before she too is detained and committed to trial, merely on the basis of her connections with the nether-world of political dissent.

Gordimer's other major female protagonist, Hillela in A Sport of Nature, encapsulates and transcends all her predecessors. Hillela's story, told in a dingy factual and documentary manner, encompasses an upbringing in a liberal South African household, political activity in exile, and marriages to an ANC activist as well as to the leader of an African State. But the novel awkwardly mixes documentary style with picaresque form (Hillela's travels and adventures). Although Hillela completely breaks free of the barriers that had constrained her predecessors, the novel comes across as stodgy and contrived.

Gordimer's male heroes differ in that they either come in from the outside, or they represent a significantly non-liberal approach to life in South Africa. A World of Strangers, in which the new post-1948 apartheid is anatomized with great clarity, shows the rapid disillusionment of a young Englishman, Toby Hood, who comes to South Africa, determined to live a "private life." An altogether different kind of disillusionment faces the more mature and intellectually well-equipped figure of Colonel Evelyn James Bray, hero of A Guest of Honour. He returns to the newly independent African state to witness the realization of ideals of freedom for which, as a colonial civil servant, he was deported. The political situation gradually slips out of control, and Bray is killed as a result of a misunderstanding that underscores the ambiguity of any European's role in Africa.

It is as though all illusions of a meaningful political existence for whites have been stripped bare when Mehring the technologist appears in Gordimer's Booker prize-winning masterpiece, The Conservationist. This is a novel of immense symbolic power and great descriptive beauty. For once, Gordimer's main protagonist is representative of far more than just the white English liberal: he is simply white, South African, of ambiguous European heritage, rich, and politically conservative. His symbolic struggle in the book is a struggle for possession of the land against its black inheritors. Mehring (and by implication the whole of white South Africa) loses the struggle. It is thus not surprising that the protagonists of July's People find themselves being run off the land. They escape revolution by running away with, and becoming captives of, their lifelong black servant, July.

One of Gordimer's most recent male creations, Sonny in My Son's Story, is a "coloured" activist whose extramarital love affair with a white woman is reconstructed by his writer-son, Will. This is a highly readable and unusual novel for Gordimer, although the parameters of love and politics, of public commitment and personal betrayal, are shown to invade each other tellingly, as often happens in Gordimer's fiction.

Gordimer's novel The House Gun is unique in that it is her first novelistic attempt to delve into the issues—social, political, and emotional—of post-apartheid South Africa. In this work, Gordimer moves beyond the intense political engagement found in her earlier novels to the earnest attempt to expand the cultural interchange in this 'new' South Africa. Through the struggles of Duncan Lindgard—on trial for murdering a gay ex-lover—and his parents, Gordimer both interrogates the persistent violence in modern society and offers a careful observation of the potential oppression that may occur as South Africa asserts its new nationhood. Gordimer's fiction may seem to be shifting its focus here, but the message it conveys is essentially unchanged: interrogate the ills and prejudices of society in an attempt to create a hybrid social blend of cultures and goodwill.

-Leon de Kock, updated by Rima Abunasser

GORDON, Giles (Alexander Esme)

Nationality: British. Born: Edinburgh, 23 May 1940. Education: Edinburgh Academy, 1948-57. Family: Married 1) Margaret Anna Eastoe in 1964 (died 1989); two sons (one deceased, 1994) and one daughter; 2) Margaret Anne McKernan in 1990, two daughters. Career: Advertising executive, Secker and Warburg, publishers, London, 1962-63; editor, Hutchinson Publishing Group, London, 1963-64, and Penguin Books, London, 1964-66; editorial director, Victor Gollancz, publishers, London, 1967-72. Since 1972 partner, Anthony Sheil Associates, literary agents, London. Lecturer in Creative Writing, in London, for Tufts University, Medford, Massachusetts, 1971-76; C. Day Lewis Fellow in Writing, King's College, London, 1974–75; lecturer in drama, in London, for Hollins College, Virginia, 1984-85. Editor, Drama magazine, London, 1982-84; theater critic, Spectator, London, 1983-84, Punch and House Magazine, both London 1985-87, and London Daily News, 1988. Since 1993 books' columnist, London Times. Member: Arts Council of Great Britain Literature Panel, 1966-69, and Society of Authors Committee of Management, 1973-75. Awards: Transatlantic Review prize, 1966; Scottish Arts Council grant, 1976, Fellow. Royal Society of Literature, 1990. Agent: Sheil Land Associates Ltd., 43 Doughty Street, London WC1N 2LF, England. Address: 6 Ann St., Edinburgh EH4 1PG, Scotland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Umbrella Man. London, Allison and Busby, 1971.

About a Marriage. London, Allison and Busby, and New York, Stein and Day, 1972.

Girl with Red Hair. London, Hutchinson, 1974.

100 Scenes from Married Life: A Selection. London, Hutchinson, 1976.

Enemies: A Novel about Friendship. Hassocks, Sussex, Harvester Press, 1977.

Ambrose's Vision: Sketches Towards the Creation of a Cathedral. Brighton, Harvester Press, 1980.

Short Stories

Pictures from an Exhibition. London, Allison and Busby, and New York, Dial Press, 1970.

Penguin Modern Stories 3, with others. London, Penguin, 1970. Farewell, Fond Dreams. London, Hutchinson, 1975.

The Illusionist and Other Fictions. Hassocks, Sussex, Harvester Press, 1978.

Couple. Knotting, Bedfordshire, Sceptre Press, 1978.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Line-up on the Shore," in Mind in Chains, edited by Christopher Evans. London, Panther, 1970.
- "The Partition," in Triangles, edited by Alex Hamilton. London, Hutchinson, 1973.
- "Crampton Manor," in The Ninth Ghost Book, edited by Rosemary Timperley. London, Barrie and Jenkins, 1973.

- "Peake," in The Eleventh Ghost Book, edited by Aidan Chambers. London, Barrie and Jenkins, 1975.
- "Morning Echo," in The Sixteenth Pan Book of Horror Stories, edited by Herbert Van Thal. London, Pan, 1975.
- "In Spite of Himself," in The Twelfth Ghost Book. London, Barrie and Jenkins, 1976.
- "Horses of Venice," in The Thirteenth Ghost Book, edited by James Hale. London, Barrie and Jenkins, 1977.
- "The Necessary Authority," in The Midnight Ghost Book, edited by James Hale. London, Barrie and Jenkins, 1978.
- "Room, With Woman and Man," in New Stories 3, edited by Francis King and Ronald Harwood. London, Hutchinson, 1978.
- "Liberated People," in Modern Scottish Short Stories, edited by Fred Urquhart and Gordon, London, Hamish Hamilton, 1978.
- "The Red-Headed Milkman," in The Punch Book of Short Stories, edited by Alan Coren. London, Robson, 1979.
- "Screens," in Labrys 4 (Hayes, Middlesex), 1979.
- "Mask," in The After Midnight Ghost Book, edited by James Hale. London, Hutchinson, 1980; New York, Watts, 1981.
- "Drama in Five Acts," in New Terrors 2, edited by Ramsey Campbell. London, Pan, 1980.
- "Madame Durand," in Punch (London), 19 November 1980.
- "The Indian Girl," in Winter's Tales 27, edited by Edward Leeson. London, Macmillan, 1981; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1982.
- "Three Resolutions to One Kashmiri Encounter," in Scottish Short Stories 1981. London, Collins, 1981.
- "Your Bedouin," in Logos (London), 1982.
- "The South African Couple," in Scottish Short Stories 1983. London, Collins, 1983.
- "A Bloomsbury Kidnapping," in London Tales, edited by Julian Evans. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1983.
- "Father Christmas, Father Christmases," in A Christmas Feast, edited by James Hale. London, Macmillan, 1983.
- "The Wheelchair," in New Edinburgh Review 61, 1983.
- "The Battle of the Blind," in New Edinburgh Review 65, 1984.
- "Hans Pfeifer," in Winter's Tales 1 (new series), edited by David Hughes. London, Constable, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1985.
- "Mutual of Omaha," in Critical Quarterly (Manchester), Winter 1988.

Plays

Radio Plays: Nineteen Policemen Searching the Sedway Shore, 1976; The Jealous One, 1979; Birdy, from the novel by William Wharton, 1980.

Poetry

Landscape Any Date. Edinburgh, M. Macdonald, 1963.
Two and Two Make One. Preston, Lancashire, Akros, 1966.
Two Elegies. London, Turret, 1968.
Eight Poems for Gareth. Frensham, Surrey, Sceptre Press, 1970.
Between Appointments. Frensham, Surrey, Sceptre Press, 1971.
Twelve Poems for Callum. Preston, Lancashire, Akros, 1972.
One Man Two Women. London, Sheep Press, 1974.
Egyptian Room, Metropolitan Museum of Art. Rushden, Northamptonshire, Sceptre Press, 1974.

The Oban Poems. Knotting, Bedfordshire, Sceptre Press, 1977.

Other

Book 2000: Some Likely Trends in Publishing. London, Association of Assistant Librarians, 1969.

Walter and the Balloon (for children). London, Heinemann, 1973.

The Twentieth-Century Short Story in English: A Bibliography. London, British Council, 1990.

Aren't We Due a Royalty Statement?: A Stern Account of Literary, Publishing and Theatrical Folk. London, Chatto and Windus, 1993.

Editor, with Alex Hamilton, Factions: Eleven Original Stories. London, Joseph, 1974.

Editor, with Michael Bakewell and B.S. Johnson, You Always Remember the First Time. London, Quartet, 1975.

Editor, Beyond the Words: Eleven Writers in Search of a New Fiction. London, Hutchinson, 1975.

Editor, with Dulan Barber, "Members of the Jury —": The Jury Experience. London, Wildwood House, 1976.

Editor, Prevailing Spirits: A Book of Scottish Ghost Stories. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1976.

Editor, A Book of Contemporary Nightmares. London, Joseph, 1977. Editor, with Fred Urquhart, Modern Scottish Short Stories. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1978; revised edition, London, Faber, 1982.

Editor, Shakespeare Stories. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1982.

Editor, Modern Short Stories 2: 1940-1980. London, Dent, 1982.

Editor, with David Hughes, Best Short Stories 1986 [-1995]. London, Heinemann, 10 vols., 1986–95; vols. 4–6 as The Best English Short Stories 1989–1991. New York, Norton, 3 vols., 1989–91.

Editor, English Short Stories: 1900 to the Present. London, Dent, 1988.

Editor, with David Hughes, The Minerva Book of Short Stories 1–6. London, Minerva, 6 vols., 1990–95.

Editor, Cocktails at Doney's and Other Stories, by William Trevor. London, 1996.

Editor, The Fisherman and His Soul and Other Fairy Tales, by Oscar Wilde. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1998.

. . .

Relationships lie at the root of Giles Gordon's novels and short stories, relationships between man and woman, woman and woman, man and man, husband and wife, lover and lover—and also the relationship between the writer and the reader. In his first novel, The Umbrella Man, Gordon was content to view the burgeoning affair between Felix and Delia from the outside, using the technique that a film director might bring to bear in building up a scene from different camera angles. This is a device of which Gordon is particularly fond, and its exposition is seen to good effect in his story "Nineteen Policemen Searching the Solent Shore."

About a Marriage is a more straightforward narrative in which the seeming detritus of modern married life assumes a form that the protagonists, the husband and wife, can understand. A reasonably well-off couple Edward and Ann, move from a bland acceptance of their marriage to a blazing revelation of the strengths of their relationship and of the bond that exists between them. Their love is based not so much on a romantic attachment, although that is also present, as on the many-sided passions and frustrations that ultimately give each partner a vivid insight into their own strengths and weaknesses. Of growing importance in this novel is Gordon's mastery of dialogue and his relaxed ability to enter the minds of his characters who cease to exist as mere ciphers and have grown into stark, living creatures.

Enemies ("A Novel about Friendship") is in the now-familiar Gordon mold of a terse examination of how people relate to each other in familiar and not so familiar circumstances, but its stylistic achievement lies in his ability to strip the central narrative line to a series of scenes which embody sharp dialogue with an internalization of the characters' thoughts and emotions. The Hiltons live in an unspecified European country, and the action centers on the events of a few days while they are being visited by their parents and friends from England. Events outside their house, which at the beginning of the novel seems to be so secure against outside interference, threaten the fabric of their cozy world as it becomes a microcosm of a beleaguered society with all its concomitant stresses. Faced with the center falling away, the adults find their relationships shifting uneasily before they reach the triumphant conclusion of the salving power of their own friendships.

and Ann. The intensity of their love for each other is still apparent, but growing self-doubt and encroaching middle age, with its sense of the loss of youth and vitality, gnaw at Edward's vitals. Interestingly, as if to prove the security of their marriage, Gordon disconcertingly opens the first scene with Edward returning from a week in Venice with his mistress. The novel's title reflects Gordon's debt to Ingmar Bergman's Scenes from a Marriage, and in a series of eighteen scenes he has captured the warm, womblike, yet claustrophobic story of a close relationship. The inscription is from Philip Roth's My Life as a Man: "You want subtlety, then read The Golden Bowl. This is life, bozo, not high art." And there are many echoes from Roth's and John Updike's style in Gordon's low-key examination of the matter of middle-class life.

With those two American writers he also shares an interest in language and the economy of its use. At his best he is able to strip his sentences to an almost surreal invisibility which is allied disconcertingly to a lively, sparkling wit. His first collection of what Gordon calls "short fictions," Pictures from an Exhibition, was stylistically naive but there was a sense of innovatory excitement as he adopted the attitude of the detached observer in his frequently startling revelations. Farewell, Fond Dreams continued many of the same conventions but it showed a surer touch as Gordon risked some breathtaking conceits in his mixture of fact and fantasy, as in the sequence "An attempt to make entertainment out of the war in Vietnam." The Illusionist and Other Fictions showed a return to calmer waters, with Gordon seeming to take a fresh interest in the traditional structure of the short story, although he can never lose sight completely of their liquid, three-dimensional possibilities. Critics have been frequently exasperated by the audacious verve of much of Gordon's writing, but he remains one of the few British writers interested in pushing the possibilities of the novel to their outer limits.

-Trevor Royle

GORDON, Mary (Catherine)

Nationality: American. Born: Long Island, New York, 8 December 1949. Education: Holy Name of Mary School, Valley Stream, New York; Mary Louis Academy; Barnard College, New York, B.A. 1971; Syracuse University, New York, M.A. 1973. Family: Married 1) James Brain in 1974 (marriage dissolved); 2) Arthur Cash in 1979, one daughter and one son. Career: English teacher, Dutchess Community College, Poughkeepsie, New York, 1974–78; lecturer, Amherst College, Massachusetts, 1979. Awards: Janet Kafka prize, 1979, 1982. Address: c/o Viking Penguin, 375 Hudson Street, New York, New York 10014–3658, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Final Payments. New York, Random House, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1978.

The Company of Women. New York, Random House, and London, Cape, 1981.

Men and Angels. New York, Random House, and London, Cape, 1985.

The Other Side. New York, Viking, 1989; London, Bloomsbury, 1990.

Spending: A Utopian Divertimento. New York, Scribner, 1998.

Short Stories

Temporary Shelter. London, Bloomsbury, and New York, Random House, 1987.

The Rest of Life: Three Novellas. New York, Viking, 1993.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Vision," in Antaeus (New York), Spring 1989.
- "Separation," in Antaeus (New York), Spring-Autumn, 1990.
- "At the Kirks'," in Grand Street (New York), Winter 1990.

Other

Good Boys and Dead Girls and Other Essays. New York, Viking, and London, Bloomsbury, 1991.

The Shadow Man. New York, Random House, 1996.

Seeing through Places: Reflections on Geography and Identity. New York, Scribner, 2000.

Joan of Arc: A Penguin Life. New York, Lipper/Viking, 2000.

~ ~ ~

For Mary Gordon, tout comprendre is emphatically not tout pardonner. Guilt rages through her fiction like a prairie fire, sweeping her heroines to and fro between the poles of autonomy and dependence, religious faith and neurosis, greed for life and masochistic self sacrifice. Although reviewers have celebrated her nineteenth-century virtues—irony, intellect, powerful moral themes, and such classically realist skills as an eye for detail, an ear for dialogue, and a gift for the creation of memorable characters—Gordon's overarching concerns are recognizably modern: the exploration of the female psyche, the relations between parents and children, and between feminism and patriarchal religion.

In her first novel, Final Payments, the seductive securities of dependence are explored through the relationship of Isabel Moore to her bedridden father, a Catholic intellectual whom she nurses for eleven years. Trapped by sexual guilt, Isabel is effectively cut off in a time warp, until his death. Set free, she makes a venture into the world of the 1970s, only to recoil again into renunciation, sacrificing her life anew to the odious Margaret Casey as a penance for a second sexual transgression. Although Isabel is ultimately rescued (an embryonic feminist moral) by two close female friends, she has only just begun to learn how to put paid to the obligations imposed by both father and faith. Gordon's heroines tend to rebel against a dominant father figure, adopt a surrogate father, and reconcile themselves in some fashion, learning the deficiencies of patriarchal institutions in the process. Felicitas, the heroine of The Company of Women, is no exception. As the daughter of one of five women (the company of the title) each devoted to Father Cyprian, a conservative Catholic intellectual, Felicitas gets away only temporarily, is impregnated, and returns, to bequeath to her daughter her mixed heritage of Catholicism and liberation. Unfathered (by careful plotting) Linda shares the same group of good and bad fairy-godmothers as Felicitas, but without the patriarch's overriding authority. Catholic values have been feminized and "macho clericalism" crippled and humanized. (The novel's intertextual allusions to Jane Eyre are no accident).

With Men and Angels, however, Gordon leaves behind the subculture of Catholicism, in favor of a broader exploration of women's relation to artistic and social structures. When Anne Foster, dismissed as merely a college wife, has the chance to investigate the life of a (fictional) neglected American painter, Caroline Watson, she faces a dilemma: how to tell a woman's story as fully and as realistically as possible. As biographer Anne sets out to rescue Caroline from obscurity, so her childminder, Laura, in the grip of religious obsession, sets out to save Anne from the lusts of the flesh. The feminist rescue mission is therefore attended with tragic ironies. Just as Anne seeks a nurturing foremother and role model in Caroline, so Laura pursues Anne. The dead female artist is lovingly investigated and re-created at the price of a living girl. Laura's scorn for the "Religion of Art" indicates her potentially strong affiliations with Gordon's father, and makes her a splendid vehicle for an exploration of the tragic consequences of the phallocentric appropriation of religious experience. Dividing its narration between third-person, realist Anne and Laura's fantastic stream of consciousness, the novel sets up a series of mirrorings and doublings, both in terms of character and narrative mode, in order to investigate the utility to women of models and precedents, the means by which a woman's story may best be told, and the benefits of realist modes of representation in dealing with women's issues. Anne's representation of Caroline is represented by Laura, with major events twice told, in realism and in fantasy, to ironic effect. Though Laura's chapters are shorter (as befits the Pyrrhic psychomachia, the body of the text is Anne's) they are technically and psychologically compelling. Laura's experiences are organized according to the fantasies of male culture, and a quality of fascinated horror accrues to them. Gordon often uses fairy tale and melodrama to sharpen the menace of her plots. Domestic horror stalks her characters, whether in the shape of witch-housekeepers (Laura, Margaret), bad fairies, terrible mothers or passive, masochistic victims.

Gordon's own essay on the difference between writing a story as a fairy tale or as realist fiction is memorably embodied in "A Writing Lesson," one of the twenty stories collected in Temporary Shelter. Two others, a five-voiced story "Now I Am Married," and "Delia" anticipate in theme and structure Gordon's latest novel, The Other Side, which marries an Irish family saga with a popularization and updating of two founder figures of Modernism. Ulysses-like, 88-year-old Vincent MacNamara returns after an absence to his wife Ellen, a demented Penelope, now dying. Through the events of one day, 14th

August 1985, the Woolfian narrative recounts their lives, together with those of their children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, moving through the individual consciousnesses of some dozen family members. Gordon's psychological themes now expand to the national stage. Mother Ireland, rather than mothers, is rejected—America is no longer "the other side" but home—yet the dying matriarch remains a brooding presence. Although religion has largely evaporated on the moving staircase of American immigrant striving, Ellen's grand-daughter Cam displays a recognizable mixture of idealism, self-sacrifice, dutifulness and self-love and her awareness that unhappiness is "the sickle-cell anemia of the Irish" pervades the book. Slowly the "other side" to each story comes into focus, as the jigsaw of memories from different individuals finally coheres into a three-dimensional pattern, revealing the inner significance of each apparently contingent event.

Gordon more explicitly explored the question of father-identity in two books from the late 1990s, The Shadow Man and Spending: A Utopian Divertimento. The former sounds like the title of a novel, and the latter vaguely like nonfiction, but exactly the opposite is true: the first book chronicles the ugly truths Gordon discovered about her father. Research into his past revealed that David Gordon, the man who had inspired her to be a writer, was nothing he had claimed to be, and Gordon uncovered many unsavory truths as well: that he had operated a sleazy porn magazine, for instance, and supported Mussolini, radical right-wing priest Father Coughlin, and anti-Semitic causes despite the fact that he had come from a Jewish family. He had even hidden the fact of an earlier marriage from her. Spending suggests that these discoveries had unleashed an almost angry eroticism: protagonist Monica Szabo engages in a dizzying array of sexual encounters on the beach, in an armchair, in the shower, and even in a role-playing game in which her lover pretends to be a wounded soldier and Although critical attention has centered upon her feminist response to Catholicism, Gordon would be a first-rate novelist if she were an atheist. Fiercely intellectual, unafraid to unite modernist irony with popular plot and pace, clearly non-androcentric, Gordon will clearly remain a figure to watch.

—Judie Newman

GOTLIEB, Phyllis Fay

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Phyllis Fay Bloom in Toronto, Canada, 25 May 1926. Education: University of Toronto, B.A. 1948, M.A. 1950. Family: Married Calvin Gotlieb in 1949; one son, two daughters. Address: 29 Ridgevale Drive, Toronto, Ontario M6A 1K9. Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Sunburst. Greenwich, Connecticut, Fawcett Publications, 1964; with a new introduction by Elizabeth A. Lynn, Boston, Gregg Press, 1978.

Why Should I Have All the Grief? Toronto, Macmillan, 1969. O Master Caliban! New York, Harper, 1976. A Judgment of Dragons. New York, Berkley Publishing, 1980. Emperor, Swords, Pentacles. New York, Ace Books, 1981. The Kingdom of the Cats. New York, Ace, 1983. Heart of Red Iron. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1989. Blue Apes. Edmonton, Alberta, Canada, Tesseract Books, 1995. Flesh and Gold. New York, Tor, 1998. Violent Stars. New York, Tor, 1999.

Short Stories

Son of the Morning and Other Stories. New York, Ace, 1983.

Poetry

Within the Zodiac. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1964.

Ordinary, Moving. Oxford University Press, 1969.

Doctor Umlaut's Earthly Kingdom. Toronto, Calliope Press, 1978.

The Works: Collected Poems. Toronto, Calliope Press, 1978.

Plays

Radio plays: Dr. Umlaut's Earthly Kingdom, Anthology, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, 1970; The Military Hospital, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, 1971; Silent Movie Days, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, 1971; The Contract, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, 1972; Garden Varieties, Tuesday Night, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, 1973; God on Trial before Rabbi Ovadia, Best Seat in the House, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, 1976.

Other

Contributor, Poems for Voices, edited by Robert Weaver. Toronto, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, 1970.

Contributor, Visions 2020, edited by Stephen Clarkson. Edmonton, Canada, Hurtig, 1970.

Contributor, To the Stars: Eight Stories of Science Fiction, edited by Robert Silverberg. New York, Hawthorn Books, 1971.

Contributor, The A.M. Klein Symposium, edited by Seymour Mayne. Ottawa, Canada, University of Ottawa Press, 1975.

Contributor (The King's Dogs), The Edge of Space: Three Original Novellas of Science Fiction, edited by Robert Silverberg. New York, Elsevier/Nelson Books, 1979.

Editor, with Douglas Barbour, Tesseracts<sup>2</sup>. Victoria, British Columbia, Canada, Press Porcépic, 1987.

* * *

When most of us approach a text, we expect that it will give us something concrete and that we will be able to uncover that offering through a process that has a distinct beginning and end, as well as a logical progression between the two. In the work of Toronto-born author Phyllis Gotlieb, however, we find an incessant refusal to conform to this established hierarchical structure of discourse. She is a writer who does not depend on binary logic, but instead, spreads out, crisscrosses, makes connections, not just between things that we expect should be connected, but between anything and everything. Her writing, like her career, which spans several decades and numerous genres, is a spinning spiral of juxtaposed pieces that can be layered, stacked, and/or joined in an infinite number of ways.

Gotlieb, the science fiction genre's universally recognized grande dame, has been a significant figure in Canadian science fiction for more than forty years and has been, in more recent years, ranked among the best science fiction writers of the century. Her best known science fiction novels include Sunburst, O Master Caliban!, Emperor, Sword, Pentacles, A Judgment of Dragons, Heart of Red Iron, Flesh and Gold, and Violent Stars. Gotlieb won the Canadian Science Fiction Award for Judgment of Dragons in 1981. In 1987 she coedited Tesseracts<sup>2</sup> with Douglas Barbour.

Her novel Sunburst takes place entirely on Earth, but it hints at what is to come in future works through its whisperings of space travel and introduction to Impers—beings whose minds cannot be penetrated by telepathy. Although there are critics who speak of this novel as unrelated to those that follow, most agree that there are traces of it throughout Gotlieb's work, and her most recent novel, Violent Stars, brings the reader full circle as it traces the beginnings of a galaxy-wide gambling and prostitution ring to Sol-Three—our Earth. From beginning to end, it is obvious that this author has continually centered her work around the idea of planets constantly in turmoil and of the characters of those planets who are set into motion as much to probe the future's potential as to chart the past.

Her poetry, short stories, and novels all look at beings struggling through situations in which the powers that surround them are constantly beating them down, where the hostile environment often wins, an environment in which the reader finds not a happy ending but an ending where the major characters are no better off, and sometimes worse off, at the end of the story than at the beginning. Her work seeks astonishment, terror, ecstasy, speed, power, and dread—all of the elements of real, complex social and metaphysical problems—in a rich, gritty, poetic style.

Her novel Flesh and Gold, considered one of her best, contains a bewildering array of these characters and situations. In this non-linear text, where words such as center, repeat, bubble, curl, swarm, encircle, loop, and cluster resurface continually, the author uses lyrical images, beautifully written, to create various human hybrids and clones that are variations and combinations of things that have existed or do exist in our world and in the world of this author's writings. Here, genres are intertwined, seamlessly weaving the perceived notions of undisciplined, popular science fiction with those of polished, highbrow poetry and thought. Past characters are brought back to life, in a realm where there is no such thing as closure—only circular movement, and prehistoric/futuristic/cyborg beings dip into the minds of those around them in a world of centuries-old mines and ore refineries, guarded ESP, and galactic federation security.

The "streamlined baby allosauruses" known as Khagodi, and the Lyhhrt, fleshy beings, wanting nothing more than to be "lying in a layer with pseudopods entwined under the wet and grey-green skies," were born many worlds (and stories) before we meet them in Flesh and Gold, and again in her latest novel, Violent Stars. They are born and begin their evolutionary process in A Judgment of Dragons, a "novel" comprised of short stories where the later sections, although they each contain a set up, conflict, and denouement, could not coherently stand alone. And they continue to evolve across time and genre because of this author's desire to explore meaning, not in respect to things in a mimetic system of one-to-one correspondence, but relational meaning—meaning built and dissolved through the similarities and differences from other people and worlds.

The Lyhhrt are alive and well in Gotlieb's latest novel as well. Violent Stars is, as all that has come from Gotlieb before, a novel fluid in style, frank in depictions, and adroit in social observations; it is a textual realm where personal and political are symbolically intertwined, where people and worlds continue to be both the same and ever-changing, where we are all always winning and loosing, exploiting and being exploited. It is a novel of intellectually sophisticated interweaving of unresolved stories, stories that are an intricate examination of fate and free will, where past, present, and future all exist simultaneously.

The Lyhhrt, here, as before, stand as an example of Gotlieb's need to slip in and out of time, space, bodies, and scenes, to explore and examine the effects of the past on the future and the future on the past. Her sensitive attention to dialogue, attitude, and poignant realizations in this and all of her work, pulls Gotlieb's readers further and further into a world where themes are subtly drawn, vast technological resources are mobilized to satisfy age-old urges, and science and social problems collide. Her circular movements of the words within the texts, as well as from text to text, lead us through pasts and futures that are palpably real, with continuing concerns, continuing conflicts, and continuing, evolving civilizations. These texts lead us to endings without closure in a vividly imagined universe that we don't want to know but have to work our way through just the same.

—Tammy Bird

GOVER, (John) Robert

Nationality: American. Born: Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, 2 November 1929. Education: Girard College, Philadelphia; University of Pittsburgh, B.A. in economics 1953. Family: Married 1) Mildred Vitkovich in 1955 (divorced 1966); 2) Jeanne-Nell Gement in 1968; two sons. Career: Held a variety of jobs, including reporter on various newspapers, in Pennsylvania and Maryland, until 1961. Address: K8 River's Bend, Carney's Point, New Jersey 08069, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

J.C. Kitten Trilogy. Berkeley, California, Reed, 1982.

One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding. London, Spearman, 1961; New York, Grove Press, 1962.

Here Goes Kitten. New York, Grove Press, 1964; London, May-flower, 1965.

J.C. Saves. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1968; London, Arrow, 1979.

The Maniac Responsible. New York, Grove Press, 1963; London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1964.

Poorboy at the Party. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1966.

Going for Mr. Big. New York, Bantam, 1973; London, Arrow, 1979.To Morrow Now Occurs Again (as O. Govi). Santa Barbara, California, Ross Erikson, 1975.

Getting Pretty on the Table (as O. Govi). Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1975.

Short Stories

Bring Me the Head of Rona Barrett. San Francisco, Hargreaves, 1981.

Other

Voodoo Contra. York Beach, Maine, Weiser, 1985.Editor, The Portable Walter: From the Prose and Poetry of Walter Lowenfels. New York, International Publishers, 1968.

*

Bibliographies: Robert Gover: A Descriptive Bibliography by Michael Hargreaves, Westport, Connecticut, Meckler, 1988.

Manuscript Collection: Boston University.

Robert Gover comments:

His trilogy, One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding, Here Goes Kitten, and J.C. Saves, captures in two characters relations between Black and White in America, especially as it evolved during the 1960s.

J.C. Holland first meets Kitten while he is a university sophomore and she a thirteen-year-old prostitute. In the second book, J.C. is public relations director of the local political party in power and encounters Kitten as a nightclub singer, or "B-girl." In the third, he finds her ducking police gunfire during a "race riot." The Maniac Responsible examines the why of a rape-murder case. The protagonist, Dean, becomes so involved in the invisible mental process that led to the brutal slaying that he becomes "possessed." Gover uses Joycean techniques to vivify his character's mental world.

Poorboy at the Party mythologizes the split between rich and poor in America. Randy, the main character, goes with his wealthy friend to a party in a large mansion containing art treasures. Conflicting emotions and values plant seeds of frustration and the party erupts into a violent orgy of destruction.

Going for Mr. Big is the tale of a pimp and his two ladies and a millionaire and his wife. Luke Small is a self-styled revolutionary with a lust to pull down the rich and powerful, but his "campaign" to conquer Malcolm McMasters first backfires, then resolves itself in a meaningful togetherness that is outside the prevailing economic system.

To Morrow Now Occurs Again, published under Gover's penname O. Govi, is a surrealist romp through a mythical land called all Damnation, which is one big Plantation where Big Money is the Holy Spirit. The protagonist, Big I and little me, soul and ego of one entity, is baffled by the situation he finds himself in. The Rat Doctor, whose experimental maze of millions of rats is periodically studied to show the workings of society and shed light on the religion of Big Money, does not deter Big I from asserting that his currency is eternal.

Victor Versus Mort, a novella published only in Portuguese, pits two archetypal forces against each other in an American social setting. In the end, the main character's worldly successes are eclipsed by death.

Getting Pretty on the Table, also a novella, carries into a suburban orgy a game played by pimps and prostitutes. The game combines psychic therapy and spiritual cleansing.

* * *

In the "After Words" to J.C. Saves (the last volume of the trilogy begun with One Hundred Dollar Misunderstanding and Here Goes Kitten), Robert Gover tell us that at the beginning "I had no preconceived idea where these two characters would lead me, their author." Unfortunately, the reader's sharing of that aimlessness is such that he arrives at the last page of the last volume with the sense that the trilogy is completed only because the author has told him so. There is no reason why the characters might not go on in book after book, ad infinitum, like the Rover Boys. When J.C. Holland, the white middle-class protagonist, and Kitten, his black prostitute love, achieve their partial understanding at the end of J.C. Saves, it is clear that the slightest alteration provided by another time and other circumstances will be enough to set another story in motion. For the fact is that this is formula fiction: shake up the characters, move them to a new starting point, put them in motion, follow the formula, and you have another book. The other works, from Poorboy at the Party through Getting Pretty on the Table, play variations on the same basic themes.

Yet there is an honesty in Gover, a vision of the life about him and a quality of writing that raises him above the level of either the pulp pornographer or the slick composer of bestsellers. However much he taxes the reader's impatience with shallow characterizations, absurd plot manipulations, gratuitous sex, and moral implications that are occasionally downright silly, he is at times an accomplished satirist. One must only imagine his books in the form of Classic Comics, illustrated by cartoonists for Mad Magazine, to be made aware how sure is his touch of the particular grotesque exaggeration that comically, or cruelly, reveals a specific truth. His are not realistic novels, but verbal comic strips, sharing a good many of the virtues and faults of such a paradigm of the genre as Norman Mailer's An American Dream.

In large measure he is a moralist—disgusted at times, bitter and angry at others, but always subordinating the matter to the message. And the message is always the same: the Anglo-Saxon American power structure has created a society in which sex and violence are so perversely twisted together that there is no place for honest respect and affection between individuals, classes, or races. Never showing what society might be, he concentrates his attention on the extremes of actuality that he sees as emblematic of the whole. In some respects his most memorable statement is The Maniac Responsible, where he parallels the movements of a reporter covering a brutal sex murder with the man's movements while attempting to seduce his teasingly voluptuous neighbor. Finally driven by circumstances (the natural circumstances, the author suggests, of the American way of life) and his own sensitivity, he becomes a suspect in the murder and breaks down into an admission that he, himself, is the maniac responsible (as we all are) for the rape and murder of the girl.

Sex is in the forefront of all Gover's novels. However, the human failures he depicts are not to be blamed on sex, but rather on the failure of its right use, the tendency to treat the other human beings as a means rather than an end. Significantly, in the twisted world of Gover's vision the individual who seems best to know how to use her sex is Kitten, the African-American prostitute. Significantly, too, the Kitten trilogy, Poorboy at the Party, and The Maniac Responsible all end in rejections of the middle-class societies they have portrayed.

-George Perkins

GRACE, Patricia (Frances)

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Wellington in 1937. Education: Green Street Convent, Newtown, Wellington; St. Mary's College; Wellington Teachers' College. Family: Married; seven children. Career: Has taught in primary and secondary schools in King Country, Northland, and Porirua. Awards: Maori Purposes Fund Board grant, 1974; New Zealand Literature Fund grant, 1975, 1983; Hubert Church Prose award, 1976; Children's Picture Book of the Year award, 1982; Victoria University Writing fellowship, 1985; Wattie award, 1986; New Zealand Fiction award, 1987; New Zealand Maori Scholarship in Letters, 1988, 1992–93; Literary Fund grant, 1990; Victoria University Archive Project grant, 1993; LiBeraturepreis (Germany), 1994. D.H.L.: Victoria University, 1989. Address: Box 54111, Plimmerton, New Zealand.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Mutuwhenua: The Moon Sleeps. Auckland, Longman Paul, 1978; London, Women's Press, 1988.

Potiki. Auckland, Penguin, 1986; London, Women's Press, 1987; Honolulu, University of Hawaii Press, 1995.

Cousins. Auckland, Penguin, 1992.

Baby No-Eyes. Honolulu, Hawaii, University of Hawaii Press, 1998.

Short Stories

Waiariki. Auckland, Longman Paul, 1975.

The Dream Sleepers and Other Stories. Auckland, Longman Paul, 1980.

Electric City and Other Stories. Auckland, Penguin, 1987.

Selected Stories. Auckland, Penguin, 1991.

The Sky People. Auckland, Penguin, 1994.

Collected Stories. Auckland, Penguin, 1995.

Other (for children)

The Kuia and the Spider. Auckland, Longman Paul, 1981; London, Penguin, 1982.

Watercress Tuna and the Children of Champion Street. Auckland, Longman Paul, 1984; London, Penguin, 1986.

He aha te mea nui?, Ma wai?, Ko au tenei, Ahakoa he iti (Maori readers). Auckland, Longman Paul, 4 vols., 1985.

The Trolley. Auckland, Penguin, 1993.

Areta and the Kahawai. Auckland, Penguin, 1994.

Other

Wahine Toa: Women of Maori Myth, paintings by Robyn Kahukiwa. Auckland, Collins, 1984.

*

Critical Studies: Writing Along Broken Lines: Violence and Ethnicity in Contemporary Maori Fiction by Otto Heim. Auckland, Auckland University Press, 1998.

* * *

Perhaps it is inevitable that, as a New Zealand writer of short stories whose subject matter is the intimate, self-sufficient world of the family, Patricia Grace should suggest certain similarities with Katherine Mansfield. Both deal with themes such as the passing of innocence, the constraints of daily routine and close relationships, and the elusiveness of answers to life's meaning and purpose. Both seek to retrieve the past through a receptive and finely tuned consciousness, and cultivate a narrative style whose modulations extend from childish excitement to crisp exposition.

Yet when a reference to Katherine Mansfield actually occurs in one of Grace's short stories, "Letters from Whetu," it signals not their affinity only, but their separateness as well. For Mansfield (as for the little girl in her "How Pearl Button Was Kidnapped"), Maori life could only be, at best, a momentary escape from the Pakeha values of time, money, and respectability. For Grace, writing seventy-odd years later and from an insider's point of view, the life is binding and vital, qualities that are figured in the recurring images of the extended family (whanau) gathered within the home or at some other spot of cherished ground often located by the sea. The shared activities—feast-making, or gardening, or collecting mussels, or diving for kina—combine the dual aspects of work and play, and participate in the rhythm of the tides, the seasons, growth, and decay.

Even so, the life Grace celebrates bears the ineradicable marks of Pakeha encroachments and Pakeha progress. Old ways and old names are often put aside for the sake of seeming modern; land is abandoned for work in the cities; roads and buildings appear in places that were once held to be tapu. In a number of the short stories ("Transition," "And So I Go," "Letters from Whetu"), an awareness that the world is large and that new ways must be learned is explicitly stated. But running against this, and through all of Grace's writing, is the stronger and more insistent feeling of displacement and loss, and of an obligation to keep alive what remains of the old inheritance. The objective correlative of this burden of consciousness is the land, and in her best work—notably the short story "Journey" and her second novel Potiki—the complexity of this emblem, and therefore of the Maori experience, is fully and imaginatively developed.

At the basis of "Journey" is the very real issue of land ownership, dramatized here as a confrontation between the old Maori who claims the right to leave his land sub-divided among his heirs according to Maori custom, and the government department that has appropriated his land and the entire locality for development. Between the two parties no communication is possible, a situation underlined by the differences in their language. One argues for people and their need for houses, the other enumerates the engineering problems; one speaks from first-hand experience of the nature of the soil and the vegetables it will produce, the other resorts to maps and plans and the abstractions of "aesthetic aspects."

"Journey" is characteristic of Grace's stories in that the action is sited in the consciousness of the main character. Virtually all her early work accesses this consciousness by way of first-person narration. In the first of her novels, Mutuwhenua, the "I" is a young Maori woman who—like the sisters in another celebrated story, "A Way of Talking"—moves between the worlds of Maori and Pakeha, using a different idiom and even a different name in each. In the Pakeha world she is Linda, and she says things like "I happen to like Graeme"—a remark that prompts her grandmother to scold, "Happen to like, happen to like, what's that talk? You talk like them already." But it is Linda's alter ego Ngaio who dominates the story, bringing to it not just a Maori idiom but—for the first half anyway—a distinctively oral structure. The story begins on the eve of Ngaio's marriage to Graeme but continually flashes back as Ngaio recalls episodes from her childhood, so that the marriage does not take place until the book is more than half-way through. Then, disappointingly, the format changes; the traumatic events that follow the marriage are set down in chronological order, with only a few contrived questions and premonitions to suggest the oral mode.

In her subsequent work Grace's narrative technique has become increasingly adventurous and assured. The early reliance on the first person gives place to third and even (in one section of Cousins) second person narratives, the former (e.g. in "Journey") using a species of free indirect discourse that enables her still to suggest oral Maori usage. And the subtle use of Maori myth as an undercurrent (e.g. the Rangi and Papa creation myth in "Between Earth and Sky" and "Sun's Marbles" and the Tawhaki myth in Baby No-Eyes) reinforces this effect.

All these threads come together in her second and most-celebrated novel, Potiki. Grace explains that she "modelled Potiki on the way an orator would structure an oration—which would begin with a chant, go on to greetings, then the main body of the speech, then conclude with awai-ata." Within this overriding structure Grace presents the viewpoints of several members of one family in distinct but overlapping chapters—or (as they are constantly called in Potiki) "stories." The effect is of unity in diversity—the ideal of the Maori whanau. Some of the stories are told in third-person free indirect discourse, but the two principal characters, Roimata and Toko, tell theirs in the first person. Toko is a crippled child with a "special knowing" who epitomizes the state of Maori culture—physically broken but spiritually profound. Given that his death saves his endangered people, that his mother's name is Mary and that his father is either an itinerant called Joseph or a carved figure of great spiritual significance in the wharenui, Toko has obvious affinities with Christ. In other ways—not least his success in catching a huge eel while out fishing with his brothers—he is akin to the mythical Maori trickster Maui.

This blend of Maori and Christian myths may suggest that Grace wants to preach an accommodation between Maori and Pakeha ways. She certainly does so in Mutuwhenua, where Ngaio's mission is evidently to marry the Pakeha Graeme and make him accept traditional Maori customs. She succeeds, and the book can be seen as an allegory that recommends that New Zealand society become a bicultural melting-pot, though the force of the allegory is compromised by the insipid depiction of Graeme, who never challenges Maori ways but simply accepts what he cannot understand. The plot of Potiki, on the other hand, comes to a less comfortable conclusion. The Maori community must adopt aggressive tactics to preserve their integrity and their land from the threat of Pakeha capitalism, and the book ends with an uneasy truce between the two races. The blend of Maori and Pakeha in Toko may be seen as a muted counterpoint to this stand-off, or it may be simply an indication that-like most contemporary Maori authors—Grace takes Christianity to be a traditional feature of Maori culture.

Though Grace claimed in a recent interview that she has "never thought about the political element" in her work, she would seem to have become an angrier, more committed writer between Mutuwhenua and Potiki. And a subsequent novel, Baby No-Eyes, focuses on a series of Pakeha infringements against Maori culture. The ownership and use of land is once again an issue, but there is also a poignant flash-back to the days when the Maori language was banned in schools, and the book's title alludes to a more contemporary problem:

the way in which scientific—especially medical—research can ride rough-shod over cherished Maori beliefs and protocols.

Stories like "Journey," "Going for the Bread," and "House of the Fish" are similarly polemical. But other recent stories (e.g. "Ngati Kangaru") bring a note of levity to the treatment of Maori grievances, while still others (e.g. "Flower Girls" and "My Leanne") show that Grace is not impervious to the darker side of contemporary Maori society to which authors like Alan Duff have recently drawn attention. She is—as a recent critic has observed—"far too good and various a writer to allow herself only one side of any story," and her third novel Cousins bears out this point. Makareta, the most articulate of the three protagonists, becomes a Maori activist, but only after she has escaped the stifling atmosphere of the whanau where she was born and the arranged marriage that its formidable old matriarch sought to impose on her. (She marries instead a Pakeha who is even less substantial than Mutuwhenua's Graeme.) The whanau is not entirely discredited, however; Missy steps happily into Makareta's role (including the arranged marriage), and the return of the book's third protagonist, Mata, after a desolate life in the city, reinforces the enduring value of the communal existence that characterizes the whanau at its best.

—Shirley Chew, updated by Richard Corballis

GRAHAM, Winston (Mawdsley)

Nationality: British. Born: Victoria Park, Manchester, 30 June 1910. Family: Married Jean Mary Williamson in 1939 (died 1992); one son and one daughter. Career: Chair, Society of Authors, London, 1967–69. Awards: Crime Writers Association prize, 1956. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1968. O.B.E. (Officer, Order of the British Empire), 1983. Agent: A.M. Heath, 79 St. Martin's Lane, London WC2N 4AA. Address: Abbotswood House, Buxted, East Sussex TN22 4PB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The House with the Stained-Glass Windows. London, Ward Lock, 1934.

Into the Fog. London, Ward Lock, 1935.

The Riddle of John Rowe. London, Ward Lock, 1935.

Without Motive. London, Ward Lock, 1936.

The Dangerous Pawn. London, Ward Lock, 1937.

The Giant's Chair. London, Ward Lock, 1938.

Strangers Meeting. London, Ward Lock, 1939.

Keys of Chance. London, Ward Lock, 1939.

No Exit: An Adventure. London, Ward Lock, 1940.

Night Journey. London, Ward Lock, 1941; New York, Doubleday, 1968.

My Turn Next. London, Ward Lock, 1942.

The Merciless Ladies. London, Ward Lock, 1944; revised edition, London, Bodley Head, 1979; New York, Doubleday, 1980.

The Forgotten Story. London, Ward Lock, 1945; as The Wreck of the Grey Cat, New York, Doubleday, 1958.

Ross Poldark: A Novel of Cornwall 1783–1787. London, Ward Lock, 1945; as The Renegade, New York, Doubleday, 1951.

Demelza: A Novel of Cornwall 1788–1790. London, Ward Lock, 1946; New York, Doubleday, 1953.

Take My Life. London, Ward Lock, 1947; New York, Doubleday, 1967

Cordelia. London, Ward Lock, 1949; New York, Doubleday, 1950.Night Without Stars. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Doubleday, 1950.

Jeremy Poldark: A Novel of Cornwall 1790–1791. London, Ward Lock, 1950; as Venture Once More, New York, Doubleday, 1954.

Warleggan: A Novel of Cornwall 1792–1793. London, Ward Lock, 1953; as The Last Gamble, New York, Doubleday, 1955.

Fortune Is a Woman. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Doubleday, 1953.

The Little Walls. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Doubleday, 1955; abridged edition, as Bridge to Vengeance, New York, Spivak, 1957.

The Sleeping Partner. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Doubleday, 1956.

Greek Fire. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Doubleday, 1958.

The Tumbled House. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1959; New York, Doubleday, 1960.

Marnie. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Doubleday, 1961.

The Grove of Eagles. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1963; New York, Doubleday, 1964.

After the Act. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1965; New York, Doubleday, 1966.

The Walking Stick. London, Collins, and New York, Doubleday, 1967.

Angell, Pearl and Little God. London, Collins, and New York, Doubleday, 1970.

The Black Moon: A Novel of Cornwall 1794–1795. London, Collins, 1973; New York, Doubleday, 1974.

Woman in the Mirror. London, Bodley Head, and New York, Doubleday, 1975.

The Four Swans: A Novel of Cornwall 1795–1797. London, Collins, 1976; New York, Doubleday, 1977.

The Angry Tide: A Novel of Cornwall 1798–1799. London, Collins, 1977; New York, Doubleday, 1978.

The Stranger from the Sea: A Novel of Cornwall 1810–1811. London, Collins, 1981; New York, Doubleday, 1982.

The Miller's Dance: A Novel of Cornwall 1812–1813. London, Collins, 1982; New York, Doubleday, 1983.

The Loving Cup: A Novel of Cornwall 1813–1815. London, Collins, 1984; New York, Doubleday, 1985.

The Green Flash. London, Collins, 1986; New York, Random House, 1987.

Cameo. London, Collins, 1988.

The Twisted Sword: A Novel of Cornwall 1815–1816. London, Chapmans, 1990; New York, Carroll and Graf, 1991.

Stephanie. London, Chapmans, 1992; New York, Carroll and Graf, 1993.

Tremor. London, Macmillan, 1995; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1995.

Short Stories

The Japanese Girl and Other Stories. London, Collins, 1971; New York, Doubleday, 1972; selection, as The Cornish Farm, Bath, Chivers, 1982.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Circus," in Winter's Crimes 6, edited by George Hardinge. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1974.

"Nothing in the Library," in Winter's Crimes 19, edited by Hilary Hale. London, Macmillan, 1987.

Plays

Shadow Play (produced Salisbury, 1978). Circumstantial Evidence (produced Guildford, Surrey, 1979).

Screenplays: Take My Life, with Valerie Taylor and Margaret Kennedy, 1948; Night Without Stars, 1951.

Television Plays: Sleeping Partner, 1967.

Other

The Spanish Armadas. London, Collins, and New York, Doubleday, 1972.

Poldark's Cornwall, photographs by Simon McBride. London, Bodley Head, 1983.

*

Winston Graham comments:

I look on myself simply as a novelist. I have written—always—what I wanted to write and not what I thought people might want me to write. Reading for me has always been in the first place a matter of enjoyment—otherwise I don't read—and therefore I would expect other people to read my books for the enjoyment they found in them—or not at all. Profit from reading a novel should always be a byproduct. The essence to me of style is simplicity, and while I admit there are depths of thought too complex for easy expression, I would despise myself for using complexity of expression where simplicity will do.

If there has been a certain dichotomy in my work, it is simply due to a dichotomy in my own interests. I am deeply interested in history and deeply interested in the present; and I find a stimulus and a refreshment in turning from one subject and one form to another.

I like books of suspense at whatever level they may be written, whether on that of Jane Austen or of Raymond Chandler; so I think all my books of whatever kind contain some of that element which makes a reader want to turn the page—the "and then and then" of which E.M. Forster speaks. This can be a liability if over-indulged in; but so of course can any other preference or attribute.

Although I have always had more to say in a novel than the telling of a story, the story itself has always been the framework on which the rest has depended for its form and shape. I have never been clever enough—or sufficiently self-concerned—to spend 300 pages dipping experimental buckets into the sludge of my own subconscious. I have always been more interested in other people than in myself—though there has to be something of myself in every character created, or he or she will not come to life. I have always been more interested in people than in events, but it is only through events that I have ever been able to illuminate people.

* * :

Of the forty-odd novels Winston Graham has published over more than sixty years, many of the modern ones are in some way concerned with crime. But they are not, in the usual sense of the term, "crime stories." In them, crime is a kind of catalyst speeding and provoking action, rather than an end in itself or a sufficient reason for the story, as it is in thrillers. It is seen as an aberration in otherwise normal lives, something non-criminal people, generally respectable and middle-class, may slip into or become involved with, gradually, almost imperceptibly, for all kinds of reasons—greed, love, loyalty, even a sudden impulse, but not through a "professional" criminal background. It is not surprising that his novel Marnie became one of Hitchcock's most successful films—since Hitchcock too is interested in the way ordinary people may become entangled in the bizarre.

Graham has written straightforward thrillers, and what Michael Gilbert wrote in choosing The Little Walls for his "classics of detection and adventure" series applies to the other novels equally well. It was, he says, "the very best of those adventure stories which introduce what has come to be known in critical jargon as the antihero ... a useful portmanteau expression to describe someone who undertakes the hero's role, without the hero's normal equipment." The characters in all Graham's novels are, in fact, floundering and all-too-human amateurs, realistically placed in a present-day life that includes jobs and domesticity well observed, and with a normal proneness to fear, indiscretion, and lack of nerve; caught in the end by their moral attitudes, by those who love them, by grief, conscience, and the realistic eye of their creator, who knows that their amateur status fails to give them the professional's coolness, his moral indifference.

Graham's sinners are nearly all racked by their sins, and he is fascinated both by the "congenital" liars and outsiders (Marnie, or the crook-lover in The Walking Stick), who are conditioned by their past yet devotedly loved in the present, and by their victims, or the victims of circumstances, mistakes, impulses, devotions: the narrator of After the Act, for instance, who pushes his ailing wife off a balcony, then finds he cannot face the mistress he ostensibly did it for. Graham values suspense; and, for his own fiction, at least, believes in action rather than analysis as the means to bring his characters to life.

His novels can roughly be divided into two, the modern and the historical. To the historical novels he brings the same kind of realism that he does to the present day. Through Cordelia, the Poldark novels set in eighteenth-century Cornwall, or The Forgotten Story, another tale about ordinary people involved in murder, this time at the turn of the last century, one walks familiarly. Graham has the good historical novelist's ability to suggest, rather than describe, the physical surroundings; above all to avoid gadzookery and picturesqueness. As he can get the feel of an insurance office, a printing works, or an auctioneer's, so he can walk into the past, giving the sense and atmosphere of it rather than the physical detail, making one breathe its air.

Tremor recounts the story of a 1960 earthquake in Agadir, a Moroccan resort town, that killed some 12,000 people. On the surface it is a disaster epic, but in Graham's hands it becomes much more: a penetrating examination of diverse lives brought together by disaster.

-Isabel Quigly

GRAU, Shirley Ann

Nationality: American. Born: New Orleans, Louisiana, 8 July 1930. Education: Booth School, Montgomery, Alabama, 1938–45; Ursuline Academy, New Orleans, 1945–46; Sophie Newcomb College, Tulane University, New Orleans (associate editor, Carnival; Lazarus Memorial medal, 1949), 1946–50, B.A. 1950 (Phi Beta Kappa); graduate study, Tulane University, 1950–51. Family: Married James Kern Feibleman in 1955; two sons and two daughters. Career: Creative writing teacher, University of New Orleans, 1966–67. Awards: Pulitzer prize, 1965. LL.D.: Rider College, New Jersey; D.Litt.: Spring Hill College, Alabama. Agent: Brandt and Brandt, 1501 Broadway, New York, New York 10036. Address: 210 Baranne Street, Suite 1120, New Orleans, Louisiana 70112–4179, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Hard Blue Sky. New York, Knopf, 1958; London, Heinemann, 1959.

The House on Coliseum Street. New York, Knopf, and London, Heinemann, 1961.

The Keepers of the House. New York, Knopf, and London, Longman, 1964.

The Condor Passes. New York, Knopf, 1971; London, Longman, 1972

Evidence of Love. New York, Knopf, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1977

Roadwalkers. New York, Knopf, 1994.

Short Stories

The Black Prince and Other Stories. New York, Knopf, 1955; London, Heinemann, 1956.

The Wind Shifting West. New York, Knopf, 1973; London, Chatto and Windus, 1974.

Nine Women. New York, Knopf, 1986.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Things You Keep," in Carnival (New Orleans), December 1950.
- "The Fragile Age," in Carnival (New Orleans), October 1951.
- "The First Day of School," in Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia), 30 September 1961.
- "The Beginning of Summer," in Story (New York), November 1961.
- "The Empty Night," in Atlantic (Boston), May 1962.

- "The Loveliest Day," in Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia), 5 May 1962.
- "One Night," in Gentlemen's Quarterly (New York), February 1966.
- "The Young Men," in Redbook (New York), April 1968.

*

Critical Studies: Shirley Ann Grau by Paul Schlueter, Boston, Twayne, 1981; Moving On: The Heroines of Shirley Ann Grau, Anne Tyler, and Gail Godwin by Susan S. Kissel. Bowling Green, Ohio, Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1996.

* * *

Shirley Ann Grau may be described as a Southern writer, whose range is sometimes narrowly regional. She may also, therefore, be described as a local colorist whose observations of custom and character suggest an anthropologist at work in a fictional mode. She is a white author who deals with blacks and the black sub-culture, which makes her an anomaly in a period of black militancy. And she is finally a novelist of manners who is sharply aware of the collapse of conventional behavior patterns in modern life. The pervasive style and mood of her work may be summed up best in the terms tough, cold, and realistic. The toughness and the apparent realism seem to reveal a debt to Hemingway. She is never sentimental, and almost always she maintains sufficient distance from her characters to depict them with an objectivity that is sometimes little short of chilling. At her best she displays a kind of cold power. But she is, in general, a limited writer. She lacks originality, especially in her treatment of African-Americans and of the South. More seriously, she lacks the complex vision that enables her both to see around and to penetrate deeply into her subject. She is a competent writer who stands at some distance from the center of the Southern Renaissance.

Her best work to date is The Keepers of the House, a novel about a southern family. The story concerns Will Howland who inherits a great deal of land and acquires more. After the death of his wife, he brings a black girl into his house and has by her three children who survive. Late in the book, it is revealed that Will had secretly married the girl. He is portrayed as a good, compassionate man whose miscegenation arose out of love. His white granddaughter marries a man who enters politics, joins the Klan, runs for governor, and makes racist speeches. One of Will's children by the black woman reveals that his father is related to a racist politician. As a result of the revelation, the latter is ruined and the Howland family estate attacked. The estate endures, and the daughter revenges herself upon the town.

Grau is fully aware that the glamorous past may be a trap, as one of her short stories reveals. But she also knows that family traditions which are rooted in the past may endow life in the present with an illuminating sense of time and a stabilizing sense of place; in these ways the past provides a sense of continuity which enriches life in the present. This novel centers on these conceptions of life, which are characteristically Southern and which mark the work of other contemporary Southern writers as different as Robert Penn Warren and Eudora Welty. The treatment of inter-racial love here, made acceptable by marriage, appears to be an apologia for Southern miscegenation, which is, of course, usually conceived in much harsher terms.

The same is true of the manipulation of racial animosities in politics, which in itself is authentic enough in the novel. But in depicting the defeat of the racist, Grau seems to depart from her characteristically objective stance.

That stance she had maintained in The Hard Blue Sky, which reveals her talent for local color. The scene is an island in the Gulf of Mexico inhabited by characters of French and Spanish descent. The principal conflict is between them and the inhabitants of another island who are Slavic in descent. A boy from one island marries a girl from another; the marriage precipitates a feud. Added to the violence of men is the violence of nature, displayed when a hurricane sweeps through the Gulf. Grau does not dwell on the quaintness of character or place in her novel, and she does not patronize her characters, although the temptation to do so must have been quite real, since she conceives them as primitives. She looks at them coldly and clearly, dramatizing their attitudes toward life but passing no judgment on their behavior. These are people who recognize no canons of respectability, who admit of no restraints on their passions, and who recognize no guilt. Their sexual attitudes are thus quite free, sex being simply in the natural order of things, and their tendency towards violence is always close to the surface, since they believe that a good fight is healthy. Their life is hard and the hazards of nature, whether snakes or wind, make it harder.

Her treatment of the characters in this novel is the same, generally speaking, as her treatment of African-Americans throughout her fiction. Her composite African-American lives an unstructured life in which he obeys appetite and impulse in a naturally selfish movement toward gratification. His morality is virtually non-existent, but casual if apparent at all. His capacity for violence is like that of the islanders. This black does not rise to the level of self-consciousness. Ralph Ellison might say that he is a stereotype, perceived because the white writer suffers from a psychic-social blindness caused by the construction of the inner eye; that is, either Grau is blind or the real African-American is invisible.

Grau's chief contribution to the novel of manners is The House on Coliseum Street. Although it is an inferior work, it demonstrates, as some of her short stories have, that she understands the various kinds of moral corruption that mark modern life. She knows that the contemporary world is without values, and she makes divorce and sexual promiscuity the obvious signs, in this novel, of the disintegration of well-to-do society.

The Condor Passes is another family novel, melodramatic in plot but of interest for its method: much of the story is told from the five points of view of the five major characters. Evidence of Love, like James Gould Cozzen's By Love Possessed, concerns the varieties of love, some a burdensome chore, as Grau shows in the sensitive and effective section on the old mother who, content in her loneliness, awaits the coming of death. The title story of her collection The Wind Shifting West displays Grau's feel of water and sky, but only occasionally do the other stories reveal the detachment and power which distinguish her fictional voice at its best. Roadwalkers offers a powerful dual story, on the one hand of a black child named Baby, and on the other of her daughter Nanda, growing up years later. What we learn about Baby's youth among a group of homeless "Roadwalkers" in 1934 inevitably fuels our understanding of Nanda's first-person account of her own quite different experience.

—Chester E. Eisinger

GRAY, Alasdair (James)

Nationality: Scottish. Born: Glasgow, 28 December 1934. Education: Whitehill Senior Secondary School, 1946–52; Glasgow Art School (Bellahouston traveling scholarship, 1957), 1952–57, diploma in mural painting and design 1957. Family: Married 1) Inge Sorensen in 1962 (divorced 1970); one son; 2) Morag McAlpine in 1991. Career: Art teacher, Lanarkshire and Glasgow, 1958–61; scene painter, Pavilion and Citizens' theaters, Glasgow, 1961–63; freelance painter and writer, Glasgow, 1963–76; artist recorder, People's Palace Local History Museum, Glasgow, 1976–77; writerin-residence, Glasgow University, 1977–79. Since 1979 freelance writer and painter. Address: Dog and Bone Books, 175 Queen Victoria Drive, Glasgow G14 9BP, Scotland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Lanark: A Life in Four Books. Edinburgh, Canongate, and New York, Harper, 1981.

1982, Janine. London, Cape, and New York, Viking, 1984.

The Fall of Kelvin Walker: A Fable of the Sixties. Edinburgh, Canongate, 1985; New York, Braziller, 1986.

Something Leather. London, Cape, 1990; New York, Random House, 1991.

McGrotty and Ludmilla; or, The Harbinger Report. Glasgow, Dog and Bone, 1990.

Poor Things. London, Bloomsbury, 1992; New York, Harcourt Brace, 1993.

A History Maker. Edinburgh, Canongate, 1994; New York, Harcourt Brace, 1995.

Mavis Belfrage: A Romantic Tale, with Five Shorter Tales. London, Bloomsbury, 1996.

Short Stories

The Comedy of the White Dog. Glasgow, Print Studio Press, 1979.Unlikely Stories, Mostly. Edinburgh, Canongate, 1983; New York, Penguin, 1984.

Lean Tales, with Agnes Owens and James Kelman. London, Cape, 1985.

Ten Tales Tall and True. London, Bloomsbury, 1993; New York, Harcourt Brace, 1994.

Plays

Jonah (puppet play; produced Glasgow, 1956).

The Fall of Kelvin Walker (televised 1968; produced on tour, 1972). Dialogue (produced on tour, 1971).

The Loss of the Golden Silence (produced Edinburgh, 1973).

Homeward Bound (produced Edinburgh, 1973).

Tickly Mince (revue), with Tom Leonard and Liz Lochhead (produced Glasgow, 1982).

The Pie of Damocles (revue), with others (produced Glasgow, 1983).

Radio Plays: Quiet People, 1968; The Night Off, 1969; Thomas Muir of Huntershill (documentary), 1970; The Loss of the Golden Silence, 1974; The Harbinger Report, 1975; McGrotty and Ludmilla, 1976; The Vital Witness (on Joan Ure), 1979.

Television Plays and Documentaries: Under the Helmet, 1965; The Fall of Kelvin Walker, 1968; Triangles, 1972; The Man Who Knew about Electricity, 1973; Honesty (for children), 1974; Today and Yesterday (3 plays; for children), 1975; Beloved, 1976; The Gadfly, 1977; The Story of a Recluse, 1986.

Poetry

Old Negatives: Four Verse Sequences. London, Cape, 1989.The Artist in His World: Prints, 1986–1997 (descriptive poems), by Iam McCulloch. Glendaruel, Argyll, Scotland, Argyll Publishing, 1998.

Other

Self-Portrait (autobiography). Edinburgh, Saltire Society, 1988.
Why Scots Should Rule Scotland. Edinburgh, Canongate, 1992.
Editor, Poor Things: Episodes from the Early Life of Archibald McCandless M.D., Scottish Public Health Officer. San Diego, Harcourt Brace, 1994.

*

Manuscript Collections: Scottish National Library, Edinburgh; Hunterian Museum, Glasgow University.

Critical Studies: The Arts of Alasdair Gray edited by Crawford and Naion, Edinburgh, Edinburgh University Press, 1991; Alasdair Gray by Stephen Bernstein. Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, Bucknell University Press, 1999.

Theatrical Activities: Actor: Television—The Story of a Recluse, 1986.

Alasdair Gray comments:

Lanark was planned as a whale, 1982, Janine as an electric eel, The Fall of Kelvin Walker as a tasty sprat. Of the short stories I think "A Report to the Trustees" has the most honestly sober prose, "Five Letters from an Eastern Empire" the most inventive fancy, "Prometheus" the greatest scope.

(1995) My stories try to seduce the reader by disguising themselves as sensational entertainment, but are propaganda for democratic welfare—state Socialism and an independent Scottish parliament. My jacket designs and illustrations—especially the erotic ones—are designed with the same high purpose.

* * *

Alasdair Gray came late to the novel and was in middle life when Lanark his first and most successful novel was published. Prior to that he had been a painter and a scriptwriter and visual influences bear heavily on all his work: even his book jackets are designed by him. His eye for detail and his taste for color combine especially well in his short stories which were published together under the title Unlikely Stories, Mostly. Some stories in this collection are long, such as "Logopandocy" a pastiche in the writings of Sir Thomas Urquhart of Cromartie whom Gray much admires; others short, and two, "A Likely Story in a Non-Marital Setting" and "A Like Story in a Domestic Setting," only five lines long. Some are set in modern everyday life, others in a fantastic other world; above all, they are rich in imaginative background detail. His story "Five Letters from the Eastern Empire" is set in the time of Marco Polo and the letters are supposedly written by Bohum the Chinese emperor's tragic poet, to his parents and they describe the court—"the evergreen garden"—in all its magnificence and all its cruelty. On the other hand it is an evocative description of the lives led by the divinely justified and the sharp, cinematic cuts and finely observed detail make it seem an exercise in scriptwriting. On another level it is a parable of power that oppresses, of a backsliding emperor whom Bohu discovers to be an "evil little puppet, and all the cunning, straightfaced, pompous men who use him."

Although Gray makes considerable use of myth and parable in his fiction and delights in creating imaginative worlds and societies, the matter of Scotland is never far away from the heart of his fiction. In 1982, Janine, the hero, an aging, divorced alcoholic, insomniac supervisor of security installations tells his story while sitting in the dingy bedroom of a small Scottish hotel: to him, his native country and his fellow countrymen are subjects of disgust. "The truth is that we are a nation of arselickers, though we disguise it with surfaces: a surface of generous, openhanded manliness, a surface of dour practical integrity, a surface of futile, maudlin defiance like when we break goalposts and windows after football matches on foreign soil and commit suicide on Hogmanay by leaping from fountains in Trafalgar." Although this novel is only loosely connected to the reality of presentday Scotland, and more concerned with the general human condition as experienced in the narrator's drunken reverie, 1982, Janine is rich in Scottish literary allusions. In one section the narrator meets a pantheon of Scottish poets in an Edinburgh pub; in another Gray's richly lyrical exploration of time, space, and inebriation is reminiscent of Hugh MacDiarmid's long poem, "A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle." That Gray should be so concerned with Scotland and yet repelled by it—a classic theme in Scottish cultural life—should come as little surprise to readers of Lanark. In this phantasmagoric exploration of modern city life Gray has an index of plagiarisms, a recurring literary device in his fiction, and this includes an entry on the Scottish novelist George Douglas Brown (1869-1902): "Books 1 and 2 owe much to the novel The House with the Green Shutters in which heavy paternalism forces a weak-minded youth into dread of existence, hallucination and crime." In Brown's novel, Gourlay, a wealthy selfmade man is ruined by his monstrous self-willed nature and his son is castrated both by his malignancy and by the squalid ethics of Barbie, the mean town in which the Gourlays live. Although Duncan Thaw, the narrator of Lanark is not subjected to similar pressures he has to cope with a loveless family and the dreary drudgery of growing to maturity in a far-from-idealized version of the city of Glasgow. To escape from the numbing mindlessness of his life Thaw finds himself in a world which might yet be; this is the afterlife to which he is condemned after a death which is half accidental and half suicidal. Called Unthank it contains echoes of his life on earth in Scotland but is peopled by creatures which have the power of transmogrification.

For all the brilliance of his imaginative inventiveness, Gray showed himself to be on less secure ground in these fantasy sections and was at his best in dealing with the realities of modern life; indeed his descriptions of life in post-war Scotland have a sure and naturalistic touch. This virtue resurfaces in Something Leather, a quirky meandering novel which examines the nature of female sexuality as experienced by three different women, Senga, Donalda and June. As has become de rigueur in Gray's novels there is also a full cast of supporting characters, including the self-deluding and destructive Tom who bears a close resemblance to Duncan Thaw. Gray has spiced the narrative with a number of erotic cameos—the effect is of reading a number of short stories—but the end result is curiously asexual.

Most of Gray's writing leaves an impression of linguistic inventiveness and artistic energy but his later fiction, including the bizarre McGrotty and Ludmilla, has revealed a growing impatience with the confines of the novel's form. In "Critic-Fuel," an epilogue to Something Leather he made the surprising admission that he had run out of interest in his writing, hence the change to female central characters. "Having discovered how my talent worked it was almost certainly defunct. Imagination will not employ whom it cannot surprise." His Mavis, central figure in the title piece of Mavis Belfrage: A Romantic Tale, with Five Shorter Tales, is an undeniably strong figure who manipulates the men around her. Much the same is true of the other women in the volume—suggesting that they are pushing their creator forward to explore new frontiers in his own literary consciousness.

-Trevor Royle

GRAY, Stephen

Nationality: South African. Born: Cape Town, South Africa, 1941. Education: St. Andrew's College, Grahamstown; University of Cape Town; Cambridge University, B.A. in English, M.A. in English; University of Iowa, M.F.A. in creative writing; Rand Afrikaans University, Johannesburg, D.Litt and d.Phil., 1978. Career: Lecturer in English, Aix-en-Provence, two years; professor of English, Rand Afrikaans University, Johannesburg, until 1991. Since 1991 full-time writer. Editor, Granta, and director, Cambridge Shakespeare Group, both while a student at Cambridge; writer-in-residence, 1982, University of Queensland, Australia. Address: P.O. Box 86, Crown Mines, South Africa, 2025.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Local Colour. Johannesburg, Ravan Press, 1975.

Visible People. Cape Town, Philip, and London, Collings, 1977.

Caltrop's Desire. Cape Town, Philip, and London, Collings, 1980.

John Ross: The True Story. Johannesburg, Penguin, 1987.

Time of Our Darkness. Johannesburg and London, Muller, 1988.

Born of Man. Johannesburg, Justified Press, and London, GMP, 1989.

War Child. Johannesburg, Justified Press, 1991; London, Serif, 1993.

Drakenstein. Johannesburg, Justified Press, 1994.

Plays

Schreiner: A One-Woman Play. Cape Town, Philip, 1983.

Poetry

It's About Time,. Cape Town, Philip, 1974.

The Assassination of Shaka, with woodcuts by Cecil Skotnes. Johannesburg, McGraw-Hill, 1974.

Hottentot Venus and Other Poems. Cape Town, Philip, and London, Collings, 1979.

Season of Violence. Aarhus, Dangaroo Press, 1992.

Selected Poems, 1960–92. Cape Town, David Philip, 1994.

Gabriel's Exhibition: New Poems. Bellville, South Africa, Mayibuye Books-UWC, 1998.

Other

Southern African Literature: An Introduction. Cape Town, Philip, London, Collings, and New York, Barnes and Noble, 1979.

Douglas Blackburn. Boston, Twayne, 1984.

Human Interest and Other Pieces. Johannesburg, Justified Press, 1993.

Accident of Birth. Johannesburg, COSAW, 1993.

Editor, Writers' Territory. Cape Town, Longman Southern Africa, 1973.

Editor, Mhudi, by Solomon T. Plaatje. London, Heinemann, 1978.Editor, Theatre One: New South African Drama. Johannesburg, Donker, 1978.

Editor, Modern South African Stories. Johannesburg, Donker, 1980.Editor, Stormwrack, by C. Louis Leipoldt. Cape Town, Philip, 1980.Editor, Turbott Wolfe, by William Plomer. Johannesburg, Donker, 1980.

Editor, Theatre Two: New South African Drama. Johannesburg, Donker, 1981.

Editor, Athol Fugard. Johannesburg, McGraw-Hill, 1982.

Editor, Modern South African Poetry. Johannesburg, Donker, 1984.Editor, with David Schalkwyk, Modern Stage Directions: A Collection of Short Dramatic Scripts. Cape Town, Maskew Miller Longman, 1984.

Editor, Three Plays, by Stephen Black. Johannesburg, Donker, 1984. Editor, The Penguin Book of Southern African Stories. Harmondsworth, Middlesex, Penguin, 1985.

Editor, Selected Poems, by William Plomer. Johannesburg, Donker, 1985.

Editor, Bosman's Johannesburg. Cape Town, Human and Rousseau, 1986.

Editor, Herman Charles Bosman. Johannesburg, McGraw-Hill, 1986. Editor, Market Plays. Johannesburg, Donker, 1986.

Editor, The Penguin Book of Southern African Verse. London, Penguin, 1989.

Editor, My Children! My Africa! and Selected Shorter Plays, by Athol Fugard. Johannesburg, Witwatersrand University Press, 1990.

Editor, The Natal Papers of "John Ross", by Charles Rawden Maclean. Pietermaritzburg, University of Natal Press, 1992.

Editor, South Africa Plays. London, Hern, 1993.

Editor, Willemsdorp, by Herman Charles Bosman. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1998.

* * *

In addition to his significant work as a poet, playwright, editor, and novelist, Stephen Gray is a prominent literary critic in his native South Africa. Always one to blur the boundaries between categories (be they generic or sociopolitical), Gray frequently combines these writerly personae, revisiting and reassessing his own fiction in his essays. As he has noted on more than one occasion, the legacy of apartheid has forced the South African writer into a position of negotiating between cultural extremes, into crossing multiple and manifold borders. This "hybrid" aesthetic, this "translational" ethic, is well represented in Gray's eight published novels, which regularly transgress the margins of race, class, and sexuality.

Gray's first novel, Local Colour, displays many of the central preoccupations that recur throughout his entire oeuvre: experimentation with form; a facility with the finer details of setting; a penchant for exploring the limits of racial and sexual taboos, in this case socalled miscegenation. A five-part satirical allegory set in Saldanha Bay, a remote outpost near the Cape, the narrative is a fragmentary and complex amalgam of Western literary conventions (interior monologue, epistolary romance) and African modes of oral storytelling (fable, myth). In the main section of the novel, while an American oil tanker burns and lists offshore, Beattie, Chris, and Alex hatch a plot to swindle Beattie's dying Aunt Miriam out of her property. What begins as a mere act of greed soon turns into an epic quest for the truth about Miriam's relationships with the legendary Captain McBlade and Elsabie, her colored maid. This quest motif, which is given even more satirical treatment in Gray's next novel, Visible People, juxtaposes the prejudices inherent in a dominant white mode of perception against the historical contingencies of the indigenous landscape, with decidedly ambivalent results.

The dialectic between past, present, and future operates at some level in all of Gray's novels, but two in particular are concerned with specific watershed moments in South African history. In Caltrop's Desire, on the eve of the 1948 national elections, a dying war correspondent records the waning moments of white liberalism in South Africa and anticipates an even bloodier future for the country under apartheid. In John Ross, Gray writes against the grain of both early-ninteenth-century historical documentation and late-twentiethcentury popular mythmaking (Gray's "novel" was meant as a companion volume to the 1987 South African television serial, John Ross: An African Adventure), offering readers "the true story" of the young, redheaded Scottish lad who was shipwrecked at Port Natal in 1825 and subsequently became a member of King Shaka's Zulu court. Drawing attention to both the factual authenticity and the fictionality of his texts, Gray illuminates the often contradictory ways in which history gets written and stories get told.

The bond between dispossessed child and powerful adult is examined further in Time of Our Darkness. Here, however, Gray reverses the races of his central characters; he also complicates their relationship by introducing homosexual desire into the admixture of competing social differences. Nine years after the 1976 Soweto uprising, Disley Mashinini, a young black boy from the townships, transfers into Saint Paul's, an all-white private school. He is soon receiving more than just extracurricular instruction from his teacher, Pete Walker. Gray maps this potentially explosive territory forthrightly and candidly, underscoring South Africa's erotic investments in the more visible markers of identity, such as race. In this regard, Disley proves to be the wiser of the two protagonists. "You know, but you don't want to know," Pete quotes him as saying at the outset of the novel. "That was the theme of our relationship."

Gay subcultural affiliation receives an altogether more vernacular treatment in Born of Man. Adopting a narrator with a distinctively camp idiom and filling his text with all manner of playful posturing by members of the extended community of Bairnsford Nursery, Gray reinscribes homosexual difference in ways that signify strength, attitude, and ironic pride.

Although most of Gray's novels are highly metafictional (in Born of Man, for example, Gray revisits the epistolary genre via the word processor), Drakenstein is by far Gray's most self-reflexive work to date. Clearly having fun with some of the basic tenets of postmodern theory, he uses the generic codes of the horror story—fictional and cinematic-precisely in order to undermine and subvert them. In confronting the horrific crimes of the past and the present in order to imagine a future for postapartheid South Africa at its time of transition, the narrator, John Raeburn, like the monster in Frankenstein, must also confront the horrors of his own fragmented subjectivity. "Who is this I," he asks at the end of the novel, "impatient but regretful, spitting out his flesh? Which I—I—I—half these sentences begin with I." This referentially unstable first-person pronoun, which surfaces throughout Gray's fiction, has gradually grown more introspective over the course of his career. The autobiographical experiments of Accident of Birth and some of the short pieces in Human Interest are, in many ways, a natural progression from the childhood reminiscences that make up War Child. In the opening sketch of Human Interest, Gray notes that even before he had "grown to any consciousness of how morally wrong apartheid was," he nevertheless understood "that I must become someone who would write about those aspects of life that were not recorded, were never mentioned, not even imagined to exist." Four decades later, decades that comprise a "time of darkness" from which South Africa is only now emerging, Gray has clearly made good on his teenaged vow.

-Peter Dickinson

GREENBERG, Joanne

Pseudonym: Hannah Green. Nationality: American. Born: Brooklyn, New York, 24 September 1932. Education: American University, Washington, D.C., B.A. Family: Married Albert Greenberg in 1955; two sons. Career: Medical officer, Lookout Mountain Fire Department; certified emergency medical technican. Since 1983, adjunct professor of anthropology, Colorado School of Mines, Golden. Awards: Frieda Fromm-Reichman memorial award, 1967; National Jewish Welfare Board Harry and Ethel Daroff award, 1963, and William and Janice Epstein award, 1964, both for The King's Persons; New York Association of the Deaf Marcus L. Kenner award, 1971; Christopher book award, 1971, for In This Sign; Rocky Mountain Women's Institute award, 1983; Denver Public Library Bookplate award, 1990; Colorado Author of the Year award, 1991. D.L.: Western Maryland College, 1977. D.H.L.: Gallaudet College, 1979. J.H.L.: University of Colorado, 1987. Agent: Wallace Literary Agency, 1977 East 70th Street, New York, New York 10021, U.S.A. Address: 29221 Rainbow Hill Road, Golden, Colorado 80401-9708, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The King's Persons. New York, Holt, and London, Gollancz, 1963. The Monday Voices. New York, Holt, and London, Gollancz, 1965. In This Sign. New York, Holt, 1968; London, Gollancz, 1970.

The Dead of the House. Garden City, New York, Doubleday, 1972. Founder's Praise. New York, Holt, 1976.

A Season of Delight. New York, Holt, 1981.

The Far Side of Victory. New York, Holt, and London, Gollancz, 1983.

Simple Gifts. New York, Holt, and London, Gollancz, 1986.

Age of Consent. New York, Holt, and London, Gollancz, 1987.

Of Such Small Differences. New York, Holt, and London, Gollancz, 1988.

No Reck'ning Made. New York, Holt, 1993.

Where the Road Goes. New York, Henry Holt, 1998.

Short Stories

Summering: A Book of Short Stories. New York, Holt, and London, Gollancz, 1966.

Rite of Passage. New York, Holt, 1971; London, Gollancz, 1972.
High Crimes and Misdemeanors. New York, Holt, 1979; London, Gollancz, 1980.

With the Snow Queen and Other Stories. New York, Arcade, 1991.

Other

I Never Promised You a Rose Garden (as Hannah Green). New York, Holt, and London, Pan, 1964.

In the City of Paris (as Hannah Green; for children). Garden City, New York, Doubleday, 1985.

*

Film Adaptations: I Never Promised You a Rose Garden, 1977.

* * *

Joanne Greenberg, also known as Hannah Green, is a writer whose style lends itself to the mature reader yet simultaneously presents themes suitable for all ages. Greenberg addresses the persistent doubts that plague all of us by relating stories of others in need. Though the scenarios in which her characters find themselves may be unfamiliar to the average reader, the emotions they feel while enmeshed in the plotlines are universal in appeal and scope. Her works include magazine publications, short stories, novels, and a movie adaptation of her book, I Never Promised You a Rose Garden.

Greenberg wrote I Never Promised You a Rose Garden under the pseudonym Hannah Green. In this book, she details the struggle of a 16-year-old girl fighting for her sanity. The descriptive and, at times, poetic uses of language bring the reader inside the character's world of fantasy. The depiction of the brilliant psychiatrist grappling with the reality of her own life while immersed in the treatment of her patient is explicitly detailed and well written. As Greenberg's personal encounter with mental problems was a basis for the character's ordeal with psychosis and schizophrenia, her empathy for her character is clearly evident.

Another popular book, In This Sign, was heralded by those both within and outside of the deaf community. The themes of loneliness, isolation, and of being different are dramatically brought to life by the experiences of Greenberg's characters. She transforms the occurrences within the realm of her deaf character into common circumstances with which we can all identify. Readers can gain an affinity for the handicapped through edification and education that is expertly interwoven into the story line.

In another book, Of Such Small Differences, Greenberg expands the reader's mind to encompass the daily trials and tribulations of a character who is not only deaf but also blind. The leading character's experiences and ensuing love affair are portrayed as one might relate a story told by one friend to another. The primary difficulties handled by the protagonist are those of anyone involved in a growing relationship. It is a love story. The physical disabilities are secondary in the development of the characters' union.

In Simple Gifts, we also see people somewhat "out of sync" with the world around them. Their lives are complicated by secrets long thought buried. Love, for them, usually comes after much turmoil, when it is least expected.

One of Greenberg's sadder stories is The Far Side of Victory. This book examines such themes as crime and punishment of the human soul. One's guilt or innocence is primarily determined by the ability to cope with life's adversities. In the search for truth and meaning, there lies the experience of love and loss.

In Age of Consent, Greenberg strongly portrays the mysterious loner no one ever really knew. By examining a character's life following untimely death at the hands of murderers, Greenberg cleverly utilizes the technique of flashback. The investigators are forced to look at their own lives as the impact of both the life and death of the main character is revealed. Once again we see a study in solitude; of being alone in the company of many.

A book that includes references to actual historical events is Founder's Praise. This book details the climb of a family through hard times during the history of the United States. Their belief in the goodness of people through religion and morality guides them into their future. Where the Road Goes has the air of, in the words of one character, a "sixties parody." Sixty-two-year old Tig has been involved in every cause of that decade, and three decades later, as she embarks on a walk across the United States to raise consciousness concerning environmental issues, she is unchanged. At home, however, both her daughters are in need, and the book—written in the form of letters and diary entries—reveals that, in Tig's words, "Were I home, I would be less a part of the family's lives. Our distance has brought us closer to one another."

Greenberg has also written several collections of short stories. In one book, Summering, her tales again reflect the themes of love and misunderstanding, loneliness and friendship. We are subsequently captivated by her imaginative characterizations and narratives that uniquely embody her freshness and innovation. In another book of short stories, With the Snow Queen and Other Stories, she writes of people we know. We can relate to people with basic human needs, even in peculiar situations. In one story, she employs the unconventional tact of having a character break through the "third wall" to "speak" directly to the reader. Her range of unusual topics runs the gamut from time travel to the solemnity of the life of a monk. Another collection, High Crimes and Misdemeanors, utilizes much humor and fantasy. Yet Greenberg is still able to embroil the readers in the particulars of her characters that most closely link us all to the hopes, fears, and dreams of life. Additionally, this book contains several stories that derive from Greenberg's religious background.

Greenberg's popularity lies in both her creativity and her originality. Her ability to incorporate common themes into uncommon situations makes her a most readable author.

—Laurie Schwartz Guttenberg

GRENVILLE, Kate

Nationality: Australian. Born: Kate Gee in Sydney, Australia, 14 October 1950. Education: University of Sydney, B.A. 1972; University of Colorado, M.A. 1982. Family: Married Bruce Petty; one son, one daughter. Career: Arts administrator, Australia Council, Sydney, 1973–74; documentary film production assistant, Film Australia, Sydney; freelance film editor and writer, London, 1974–80; subtitle editor, Multicultural TV, Sydney, 1983–85; instructor in writing, University of Sydney. Awards: Fellowship (International Association of University Women), 1981; Australian/Vogel award, 1984; writer's fellowship (Australia Council), 1985. Agent: C. Lurie, 26 Yarraford Avenue, Alphington, Victoria 3067, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Lilian's Story. North Sydney, Australia, Allen & Unwin, 1984; New York, Viking, 1986.

Dreamhouse. University of Queensland Press, 1986; New York, Viking, 1987.

Joan Makes History. Latham, New York, British American Publishers, 1988.

Dark Places. London, Picador, 1994; published as Albion's Story.New York, Harcourt, 1994.

The Idea of Perfection. South Melbourne, Picador, 1999.

Short Stories

Bearded Ladies. St. Lucia, Queensland, Australia, University of Oueensland Press, 1984.

Other

The Writing Book: A Workbook for Fiction Writers. North Sydney, Australia, Allen & Unwin (Australia), 1990.

Making Stories: How Ten Australian Novels Were Written (with Sue Woolfe). North Sydney, Australia, Allen & Unwin, 1993.

* * *

Kate Grenville first came to prominence when her novel Lilian's Story won the 1984 Australian/Vogel award for the best manuscript by an unpublished writer under the age of thirty-five. By the time it appeared, however, she was already the author of a collection of short stories, Bearded Ladies. The title of the collection is ambiguous. The suggestion of sexual ambiguity is present in some of the stories. In another sense, though, the various but similar young protagonists of these stories are "bearded" by men, subjected to male demands, deprived of the opportunity to grow into selfhood; strongly feminist themes run through all Grenville's work. Many of them have difficulty establishing worthwhile relationships with men or breaking with failed ones. The writing is carefully flat and laconic, the point of view almost always that of a dispassionate observer, even when the observer is also the protagonist.

The eponymous Lilian in Grenville's very well-received first novel goes further than the collection of bearded ladies and breaks free entirely from the conventional demands of society. Based loosely on the life of an eccentric, well-known Sydney woman named Bea Miles (it was originally called Bea's Story) the novel tells the story of Lilian Singer, a grossly fat, engagingly individualistic woman who decides that she will follow her own path wherever it takes her and will not be bound by the conventions of society. She struggles early to escape the two constrictions that bind her-being ugly and, worse still, being a girl, a misfortune that has dogged her literally since the day of her birth. After a period in an asylum, her eccentricity blossoms; she harasses strangers with long recitations of Shakespeare for which she demands payment, boards trains and refuses to buy a ticket, steps into taxis with strangers and exuberantly embarrasses them. But for all its racy energy and strikingly original characterization, the claims Grenville makes for her protagonist—that she has been forced into eccentricity by a patriarchal society and that her eccentricity is in any case a form of greatness—remain arguable.

Dreamhouse sprang from the final, novella-length story "Country Pleasures" in Bearded Ladies and is a blackly satiric comedy about an English couple in Italy and a series of people they encounter who all turn out to be having unorthodox or unnatural affairs. As the novel opens, "Rennie" Dufrey and his beautiful ex-secretary wife Louise are driving towards a house in Tuscany that has been lent to him by his academic mentor Daniel. The house proves to be derelict, with mice, spiders, and even a snake in occupancy. Daniel's children, Hugo and Viola, are unfriendly and behave strangely, and before long Louise begins to uncover a number of curious sexual liaisons. The novel is narrated by Louise in a style that is peculiarly factual, dispassionate, written almost like a report. She herself is an almost disembodied presence, reacting to events in only a muted way. Nevertheless, Grenville piles on the horrors lavishly. Spiders hang over the uncomfortable beds the characters sleep in. Hugo collects and stuffs birds; his cruelties are documented in detail. Loads of revulsion are invested in even the most banal of actions. At the end, Louise's decision to leave her husband seems common-sensed and far from being as momentous as the author seems to think.

Joan Makes History was written in response to a commission from the Bicentennial Authority to write a book that was relevant to the celebration of the white occupation of Australia. It is quite ingeniously conceived. A dozen scenes headed "JOAN" describe the life of a very ordinary woman, Joan Radulesco. Although fiercely conscious of her aspirations to greatness she lives an uneventful life except for leaving her husband and later returning. She accomplishes nothing but eventually realizes that in simply living her own life she is part of history. Against this banal, contemporary Joan there is juxtaposed another historical Joan who is seen in eleven key episodes of Australian history. This Joan can be anyone, go anywhere, she wants to. When Captain Cook claims Australia for the British in the Endeavour in 1770 she is on board as his wife, contemptuous of the passes the foppish Joseph Banks is making at her. She is present at the opening of Parliament in 1901; as an Aboriginal girl she meets the explorer Flinders when he encounters Aborigines for the first time.

Each episode stands in some kind of relationship to the life of the contemporary Joan. For instance, the historical Joan is Mrs. Cook; the contemporary one goes with her husband and child to visit Cook's Cottage. Joan's leaving her husband Duncan and wandering over Australia is paralleled by a black Joan leaving her similarly stolid Warra, and so on. One of Grenville's keenest ambitions is to speak for the silent in Australian history, especially women and Aboriginal people.

Dark Places takes us back to the territory of Lilian's Story and includes many of the same incidents, but this time presented from the viewpoint of Lilian's father, Albion Gidley Singer, whose first person narrative guides the novel. This is both its strength and limitation. To sustain the narrative voice of Singer is an impressive feat but also a somewhat wearying one. Long before the end of the novel we have come to know as much as we need to about his real evil, and although Grenville offers occasional glimpses of the possibility of self-knowledge, it is clear that he will not change radically. He is, in his own words, "an embattled and lonely atom" whose traditional incapacities are established early, though in sparklingly incisive prose. His love of facts, the extinction of feeling and the reduction of all human complexity to things measurable and quantifiable become a prevailing and blackly comic theme in the novel. Added to this is an extraordinarily intense misogyny. Albion is a man brought up to hate and fear women as the mysterious Other. All the sexual encounters in the novel are filled with a sense of abhorrence of the female body and reduced to financial transactions, or else become violent fantasies in which women's protests at his mistreatment of them are totally disbelieved. The pattern emerges in his frequent rapings of his wife and finally in the rape of his daughter. It comes as no surprise that Albion displays traits of a covert homosexual as well. The problem is not one of making Singer believable but of making him dramatically interesting. He is an essentially static character. The only changes that take place in him are cosmetic; they relate only to the appearance of the self that he constructs and then presents to the world.

Kate Grenville's most recent novel, The Idea of Perfection, is a patient, affectionate study of an unlikely romance between a bridge engineer and a quilt maker. Both of them are, on the surface, dysfunctional people. Douglas Cheeseman is the son of a man who died winning the VC. Harley Savage is the only apparently untalented member of a family of gifted artists. Cheeseman's wife left him out of boredom. Harley has been married unsuccessfully three times. He suffers from vertigo; she has had a heart attack. Both are physically unattractive. The couple meet when Cheeseman is assigned to the tiny town of Karakarook to decide whether a scenic bridge needs replacing. Although he soon works out a win-win situation he is too uncomfortable to actually put it to his boss. But the ending of the novel has them getting together as Cheeseman finally asserts himself and wins the hand of his lover. Juxtaposed against these are Felicity Porcelline and her banker husband. Felicity spends a lifetime denying her own needs and desires, including the lust she feels for the local Chinese butcher Freddy Chang. She is obsessed with her appearance and every gesture, every pose, is designed to enhance her skin. Even smiling has to be rationed.

Grenville takes a perhaps excessive time to tease these themes out. The lack of composure, the diffident uncertainty of Harley and especially Cheeseman, are stressed repeatedly, as are Felicity's prurience and superficiality. So are the contrasts between the two women. Harley is the embodiment of unpretentious naturalness. In contrast, Felicity rations her feelings and expression of them. The portrait of her borders on caricature if it hasn't already gone past it, though Grenville does offer her one momentary insight into her own phoniness—"Just for one puncturing moment she saw herself: a cruel smiling child"—before she draws the curtain on her feelings again.

Grenville's The Writing Book, subtitled "A Workbook for Fiction Writers," is exceptionally useful and interesting, not least because it illuminates many of her own practices as a writer.

-Laurie Clancy

GRISHAM, John

Nationality: American. Born: Jonesboro, Arkansas, 8 February 1955. Education: Mississippi State University, B.S. in accounting 1977; University of Mississippi, LL.D in 1981. Family: Married Renee Jones; three children. Career: Practiced law, Southaven, Mississippi, 1981–91; member Mississippi House of Representatives, 1984–90. Address: c/o Doubleday, 1540 Broadway, New York, New York 10036–4039, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Time to Kill. New York, Wynwood Press, 1989; London, Century, 1993.

The Firm. New York, Doubleday, and London, Century, 1991.The Pelican Brief. New York, Doubleday, and London, Century, 1992.

The Client. New York, Doubleday, and London, Century, 1993. The Chamber. New York, Doubleday, and London, Century, 1994.

The Rainmaker. New York, Doubleday, and London, Century, 1995.

The Runaway Jury. New York, Doubleday, 1996.

The Partner. New York, Doubleday, 1997.

The Street Lawyer. New York, Doubleday, 1998.

The Testament. New York, Doubleday, 1999.

The Brethren. New York, Doubleday, 2000.

*

Film Adaptations: The Firm, 1993; The Pelican Brief, 1993; The Client, 1994; The Chamber, 1996; The Rainmaker, 1998.

Critical Studies: John Grisham: A Critical Companion by Mary Beth Pringle. Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1997.

. . .

John Grisham hit the best-seller lists as a kind of publishing phenomenon, a blockbuster novelist whose books are instant hits and are snapped up by Hollywood even before they hit the bookstores. Grisham writes a type of novel that might best be described as a ''legal procedural.'' His books deal with the law and those who practice it. If, as surveys indicate, Americans are antilawyer, they are certainly not antilaw novel. Grisham and others have made the legal novel vastly popular with the American reading public.

There are probably two main reasons for Grisham's popularity among contemporary readers. First, Grisham invites his reader into the often confusing and arcane world of legal practice. He cuts through the "heretofores" and "whereases" to simplify law for the reader. He shows how the law works, how lawyers work, why the law sometimes doesn't work, and what's going on when we can't see legal workings. Furthermore, he does this with a page-turning style that is hard to resist for those curious about the legal system in this country.

Second, Grisham suggests to his readers that the law can be made to work for all of us, even neophytes, even in the face of huge companies with high-priced representation, even against overwhelming odds, even against government oppression. Grisham's protagonists are always underdogs. They may be law students (The Pelican Brief), brand new lawyers (The Firm, The Chamber, The Rainmaker), or practicing lawyers fighting against great odds (A Time to Kill, The Client). Whatever the situation, the message is powerful and seductive. Americans hold strongly and dearly the belief that we are all equal under the law and that all of us have a chance to win if our cause is right, never mind the reality of expensive attorneys.

One of Grisham's gifts is that he is able to make sympathetic to the reader even those characters who might ordinarily have no claim to those sympathies. In The Chamber, for instance, Grisham presents his readers with a character who deserves the death penalty, if indeed anyone ever has. He is a multiple murderer, an unrepentant racist—a virtual compendium of all that could possibly be wrong with a character facing capital punishment. Still, it would be the hard-hearted reader who could reach the end of this book and not feel sorry for the death of an old man who glories in a last gift of Eskimo Pies.

Grisham's first book, A Time to Kill, is probably his weakest, although that could be said of most first novels. He introduces plot lines and characters that he fails to develop sufficiently or to tie up neatly at the end. By his second book, The Firm, he has overcome those problems quite thoroughly. Grisham likes introducing involved plot lines and twists and weaving them into a fast-paced whole. One almost suspects that he considers complexity a personal challenge, taking it on in the way one might consider constructing a puzzle.

Although his novels are generally well edited and fairly seamless, The Chamber showed signs of a syndrome unfortunately common to blockbuster writers, one that sometimes appears after their first few novels. When writers become so valuable to their publishers that publishers are afraid to edit them, sloppiness in the minor aspects of editing may begin to pop out, and that is the case with The Chamber. Yet no such problems surface in The Rainmaker, the novel following The Chamber; perhaps the writer had been made aware of the editing lapses.

The Runaway Jury, with its plot concerning a tobacco-liability lawsuit, could not have been more well-timed when it appeared in 1996, as states sued tobacco companies for billions of dollars. The Testament focuses on a much more localized concern, and as with many another Grisham novel, the premise—a wealthy man sidesteps his greedy children and wives in his will to reward a stranger of good character—is hardly original; but, as is also characteristic of Grisham, his execution of the story is engaging. The book is also the most overtly spiritual work by Grisham, a devout Christian. By contrast, The Brethren offers the first Grisham anti-heroes, with hardly a major character that an audience is likely to cheer for. Absent are the typical underdog heroes, and in their place is a trio of crooked judges serving prison time, a ruthless presidential candidate, and a conniving CIA chief.

Overall, Grisham's work is well constructed, tightly plotted, fast paced, and, if undemanding, certainly exciting for the reader looking for a hard-to-put-down novel.

—June Harris

GROOM, Winston

Nationality: American. Born: Washington, D.C., 23 March 1943. Education: University of Alabama, A.B. 1965. Military Service: U.S. Army, 1965–67: served in Vietnam, became captain. Family: Married Ruth Noble in 1969 (divorced 1974), married Anne Clinton Bridges in 1987. Career: Reporter and later columnist, Washington

Star, Washington, D.C., 1967–76; full-time novelist, 1976—. Awards: Best fiction award (Southern Library Association), 1980. Agent: Theron Raines, Raines & Raines, 71 Park Avenue, New York, New York 10016, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Better Times Than These. New York, Summit Books, 1978.

As Summers Die. New York, Summit Books, 1980.

Only. New York, Putnam, 1984.

Forrest Gump. New York, Doubleday, 1986.

Gone the Sun. New York, Doubleday, 1988.

Gump & Co. New York, Pocket Books, 1995.

Such a Pretty, Pretty Girl. New York, Random House, 1999.

Other

Conversations with the Enemy: The Story of PFC Robert Garwood (with Duncan Spencer). New York, Putnam, 1983.

Shrouds of Glory: From Atlanta to Nashville—The Last Great Campaign of the Civil War. Boston, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1994. Gumpisms: The Wit and Wisdom of Forrest Gump. New York, Pocket Books, 1994.

The Bubba Gump Shrimp Co. Cookbook. Birmingham, Alabama, Oxmoor House, 1994.

Forrest Gump: My Favorite Chocolate Recipes: Mama's Fudge, Cookies, Cakes, and Candies. Leisure Arts, 1995.

The Crimson Tide: An Illustrated History of Football at the University of Alabama. Tuscaloosa, University of Alabama Press, 2000. Foreword, James Jones: A Friendship by Willie Morris. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1999.

Film Adaptations: Forrest Gump, 1994.

* * *

Winston Groom is a Southern novelist in the truest sense of the word. His Southernness permeates both his novels and his non-fiction. His characters speak with Southern voices, and life in his novels moves according to a distinctly Southern timeline. Following the tradition of other Southern writers like William Faulkner, Carson McCullers, and Pat Conroy, Groom lovingly peoples his books with quirky characters who pay homage to Southern history and the modern-day South in a single breath. While the South is more evident in his novels, Groom's non-fiction also echoes his Southern roots.

Groom was born in Washington, D.C., but grew up in Mobile, Alabama, on the Gulf Coast. After a stint in the Army, Groom returned to Washington, D.C., where he worked as a reporter on the now defunct Washington Star, covering the political and court beat. Willie Morris, the newspaper's writer-in-residence believed that young Groom had the potential to become a writer and encouraged him to go to New York. In the Big Apple, the newly single Groom spent little time writing. Most of the time, he hung out with literary cronies like James Jones, George Plimpton, Kurt Vonnegut, Joseph Heller, Irwin Shaw, and Truman Capote. It was an essential learning experience for Groom, but to him New York was alien territory.

Returning to Alabama, Groom settled down to writing and enjoying life with his second wife and his dogs. The return to his native South was beneficial to Groom. His strong sense of place thrived on the day-to-day replenishment of Southern life and Southern people. Groom believes that Southerners make good storytellers because they are surrounded by families and friends who like to relate life's experiences. Sometimes the writer embellishes the story, but the strength of the narrative is found in the absorption of the story into his/her own conscious memory. This interweaving of past and present is an essential ingredient of Southern novels.

The name of Winston Groom will forever be associated with the award-winning movie Forrest Gump. Groom wrote Forrest Gump in 1986, and the novel about an amiable slow-witted Southern man who achieved success and adventure sold a respectable 40,000 copies. When Paramount bought the right to his fourth novel in 1994, Groom's life changed forever. The re-release of Forrest Gump in 1994 sold more than 1.7 million copies. The movie grossed over $657 million worldwide, garnering six Academy Awards, including best picture, best director, and best actor. The immensely popular Tom Hanks brought Forrest Gump to endearing life, and Forrest's assertion that, according to his mama, ''life is like a bowl of chocolates'' became part of the American language.

The Forrest Gump phenomenon so intrigued the American public that Groom wrote Gumpisms: The Wit and Wisdom of Forrest Gump and two Forrest Gump cookbooks. Forrest Gump hats and T-shirts appeared around the country. In the furor over the movie and Hank's almost unheard of back-to-back Oscars, the fact that Groom was a respected author of both fiction and non-fiction works was somewhat overshadowed.

Forrest Gump chronicles the life of the title character, a slow-thinking individual with an I.Q. of 75. Despite what many would see as drawbacks, Forrest becomes an All-American football hero with a knack for being in the right place at the right time. It is obvious that Groom likes Forrest Gump. The author insists that the novel is about dignity. He argues that Forrest was not a symbol of conservatism and had no political agenda. Not everyone liked Forrest Gump. He was perceived by some critics as too simplistic, too unrealistic, and too predictable. It has been said that Southerners celebrate their eccentrics rather than hiding them. It follows, then, that Forrest Gump is a celebration of Southern eccentricities.

Groom's Forrest Gump sequel in 1995, Gump & Co. tied up loose ends in Forrest's life and reportedly made a good deal of money for Groom, but it never achieved the wide appeal of the original. Groom knew that critics would be gunning for him. By the time that Groom wrote Gump & Co., Forrest Gump belonged to America as much as to the author who created him. Forrest, like his creator, had learned a lesson from the success of the movie about his life; and in Gump & Co., he cautions readers "don't never let nobody make a movie of your life's story."

As a result of the years before Forrest Gump became a household name, Groom became a writer who wrote simply to tell a story. His novels published before and after Forrest Gump reveal that he is a master storyteller. Groom determined that he would continue to write whatever he wished. Admittedly an eclectic anachronism, Groom asserted that he would stop writing and practice law when he stopped having fun.

Better Times Than These, Groom's first novel, explored his firsthand experience of the Vietnam conflict where he served 1966–67.

He wrote with heartbreaking reality of the Bravo Company facing a world and a situation that was unlike anything they had ever known. Critics hailed Better Times Than These as a landmark treatment of the American experience in Vietnam. It is from the perspective of a Southern writer who lives daily with the specter of Vietnam that Better Times Than These is written. With the horrors of Vietnam behind him, Billy Kahn realizes that those who survived had inherited a legacy from the dead, a charge to go back to being "bankers or salesmen, or service-station attendants, or farmers, or forklift operators or geologists." He understands that the important thing is "to have a place to go and be with people like themselves, since anyone who hadn't been there probably wouldn't know what in hell you were talking about."

Groom's second novel is set in 1950s Louisiana. As Summers Die tells the story of Willie Croft, a small town lawyer who has settled into an unexciting life where each day follows the next with predictable regularity. Willie's placidity is shaken up when black sharecroppers discover oil. Groom handles the resulting upheaval with a master's touch, presenting a segregated South with a stranglehold on the last vestiges of its glory days faced with a second great battle that will change the fabric of their lives forever. Critics complained that the novel's characters were all either good or bad, which resulted in an overly moralistic novel. However, this is one of the strengths of the novel because the period of desegregation was a time when right and wrong were clearly drawn lines in the sand.

Gone the Sun allowed Groom to explore the experiences of Beau Gunn, a Vietnam veteran who returns home to Alabama to take over a failing newspaper. In the course of his work, Groom finds that the people of Bienville are hiding many secrets. Gunn's determination to see justice done starts him on a journey of self-discovery, where he must deal with unresolved relationships and lost ideals. Groom reveals in Gone the Sun that he can go beyond telling a story to unraveling complex relationships and experiences. With a sure touch, he peoples the town of Bienville with characters that are shaped both by the world around them and a past they can never escape.

Such A Pretty, Pretty Girl signaled Groom's first foray into the thriller genre. Critics saw Such A Pretty, Pretty Girl as Groom's homage to 1940s Hollywood. Groom's protagonist is Johnny Lightfoot, a well-known screenwriter who is obsessed with his former girlfriend Delia Jamison, a Los Angeles news anchor. The lovely Delia has a past strewn with broken hearts and rejected lovers. Johnny Lightfoot is flawed by his inability to redeem himself. He believes that his redemption can be achieved by saving Delia from herself and her pursuers because the success of his quest will prove to both Johnny and Delia that he is worthy of being loved.

A respectable body of non-fiction works by Groom attests to his credibility as a chronicler of fact as well as of fiction. Conversations with the Enemy: The Story of PFC Robert Garwood, written with Duncan Spencer, was nominated for a Pulitzer Prize. PFC Robert Garwood is taken prisoner in Vietnam. Initially, Garwood is placed in a cage by himself with no one to talk to and nothing to relieve the boredom of prison life. Over a period of time, other prisoners appear, and life takes on a survival-of-the-fittest mentality as each of the Americans attempts to survive whatever the cost to his compatriots. Conversations with the Enemy is more indicative of Groom's journalistic career than of his experience as a respected novelist.

Groom's Shrouds of Glory was a labor of love in which he told the Civil War narrative of beleaguered John Bell Hood, a Southern general convinced that his efforts could turn the tide of the war. Reviews of the book were mixed. Some critics claimed that the book was boring in its attention to details, while others argued that Groom made the battles come alive. Groom's own great-grandfather participated in the defense of Atlanta, and his personal interest in the Southern campaign is evident.

The praise for Groom's non-fiction is well deserved, but it is as a chronicler of tales that Groom is at his best. He has a natural gift for well-written dialogue, and his strong sense of place draws the reader into his fictional world. Groom brings the Old South and the New South together in a seamless whole. His writing represents the best of Southern fiction in the latter half of the twentieth century. As Jenny's ghost takes leave of Forrest Gump in Gump & Co., she leaves him with her philosophy of life: "Memories are what count in life, Forrest, when there's nothing else left, it'll be the memories that mean everything." Jenny's parting words sum up Groom's success as a writer. He builds on memories that are the product of his own experiences and that of his beloved South, and he leaves his readers with the memory of well-crafted characters who live on in individual memories.

-Elizabeth Purdy

GRUMBACH, Doris (Isaac)

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 12 July 1918. Education: Washington Square College, A.B. 1939; Cornell University, M.A. 1940. Military Service: U.S. Navy WAVES. Family: 1) married Leonard Grumbach, 1941 (divorced 1972), four children; 2) companion of Sybil Pike. Career: Title writer for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, New York City, 1940-41; proofreader and copyeditor, Time, Inc., 1941–42; associate editor of Architectural Forum, 1942–43; English teacher at Albany Academy for Girls, Rochester, New York, 1952–55; held a variety of positions from instructor to professor of English at College of St. Rose, Albany, New York, 1952–73; literary editor for The New Republic, 1973-75; professor of American literature, American University, Washington, D.C., 1975-85. Columnist for Critic, 1960-64; National Catholic Reporter, 1968-76; New York Times Books Review, 1976-83; Saturday Review, 1977-78; and Chronicle of Higher Education, 1979-84. Contributor of reviews and criticism to New York Times Books Review, Chicago Tribune, Commonweal, Los Angeles Times, Nation, Washington Post, New Republic, National Public Radio, and the MacNeil-Lehrer Newshour. Board of directors, 1984–89, and executive board, 1985–91, PEN/Faulkner. Awards: Lifetime Achievement Award (New England Booksellers Association), 1996. Member: American Association of University Professors, Phi Beta Kappa. Agent: Maxine Groffsky, 2 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York 10011, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Spoils of Flowers. Garden City, New York, Doubleday, 1962. The Short Throat, the Tender Mouth. Garden City, New York, Doubleday, 1964.

Chamber Music. New York, Dutton, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1979.

The Missing Person. New York, Putnam, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1981.

The Ladies. New York, Dutton, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1984. The Magician's Girl. New York, MacMillan, 1987. The Book of Knowledge. New York, Norton, 1995.

Other

The Company She Kept (biography). New York, Coward, 1967.Coming into the End Zone (autobiography). New York and London, Norton, 1991.

Extra Innings: A Memoir. New York, Norton, 1993.

Fifty Days of Solitude. Boston, Beacon Press, 1994.

Life in a Day. Boston, Beacon Press, 1996.

The Presence of Absence: On Prayers and an Epiphany. Boston, Beacon Press, 1998.

The Pleasure of Their Company. Boston, Beacon Press, 2000.

Recordings: The Craft of My Fiction, Archive of Recorded Poetry and Literature, 1985.

*

Doris Grumbach comments:

(2000) I write fiction to make sense of the world I have known in my eighty-two years of life. I use the people I have known, the ones I have thought might have existed, and myself, as I imagine myself to have been or to be, as characters. They live in real places, or places I remember as real, and what happens to them is what seems reasonable or likely to me. The prose I utilize is plain song to suit the reduction I have made of the poetry of existence. There is no lesson in any of these seven novels, unless it is the lesson that life is infinitely varied, that characters (persons) are never typical, and that place/setting is always filtered through the vagaries of memory.

* * *

Immediately apparent in Doris Grumbach's fiction is its decency. She prefaces some of her novels without resorting to the usual disclaimer, "no relationship to anyone living or dead," but declares her characters as typifying numerous individuals: "This novel is a portrait, not of a single life but of many lives melded into one." However, her stereotypes attracted the most pejorative criticism of her work and are likely to be the reason that her most widely acclaimed books are recent nonfictional memoirs.

Her novels' inflammatory scenes and subjects are treated delicately, with an unfashionable sense of niceness. The Ladies is a polite narrative of an eighteenth-century lesbian relationship between Eleanor, who at seven decides to "be a boy, and then a man," and Sarah, whose "steps were prim and careful." Leaving behind authoritarian fathers and hand-wringing mothers, the women spend their first night together in a cold barn where "they put their arms about each other, ignoring the wet discomforts of their clothes, seeking to dry themselves in the heat of their creature love." Later, free and established in Wales, "they lay close together," which does not explain the trouble to which they have gone. More warmth has already occurred in a scene from Eleanor's childhood, masturbating on a stone lion and "never allowing herself to believe that in her ecstasy it was she who dampened his granite back."

Nor are we given more than an implication of a physical relationship between Chamber Music's Caroline and Anna: "the way we moved together at the start of sleep to lie close, often in each other's arms, the sense of creature warmth and security we kindled between our two bodies as we touched." Grumbach relies upon the imagination of her audience to equate "creature love" or "creature warmth and security" with passion.

Lovemaking is more vividly portrayed in The Magician's Girl through Minna's reverie after Lowell has left her bed: "Enlivened by the pressure of his young presence, she greeted his entry with moisture long absent from the unused region of her sex." Readers spoiled by the power of a D.H. Lawrence novel or desensitized by pulp fiction may have jaded tastes, but also Grumbach seems to be writing to an easily offended, past generation. She sacrifices credibility by making scant distinction between friendship, love, and sex.

She is much less ambiguous about other themes, such as the lonely survivor, the wasted lives of those who wait for excitement to come to them. Chamber Music's heroine Caroline is "raised by a lovely, heartbroken mother," and the book concludes with Caroline's observation that, "Conceived in the age of the Centennial's bentwood sofa, I lived an almost empty life into an overcrowded and hectic century." The Ladies' Sarah barely sustains herself with memories, indeed the ghost, of Eleanor. The Magician's Girl leaves the ineffectual Liz musing that she is "the one left. Odd woman out. Or in. Still afloat, still kicking," but without direction.

Sarah alone finds peace with herself: "After a time of crying at her fears and her life's small tragedies, she never shed a tear again." Likewise, in Magician's Girl, Minna loses the fear taught by her mother, and although "Minna Grant's first memory, at five, was of terror," she leaves "fearless." By contrast, Caroline's worst fear is realized as she is "deserted by the single point of light, the one glowing coal, in a long, cold, dark life." Franny has no personality, only her stage persona: "Eddie Puritan, the agent of her real self, the slate man for all her inner takes, was the only one ... who thought Fanny Marker was a person. And then, of course, he died." As a homosexual ("nance"), he was the only man who had not been a sexual threat.

The four principal characters in The Book of Knowledge, which begins in the resort town of Far Rockaway, New York, are unable to overcome the circumstances of their lives, some of which come from outside—the story opens around the time of the 1929 stock market crash—and some of which are internally motivated. Caleb and Kate Flowers are driven by their "twinned sensibility" to become furtive sexual partners, and Kate retains her affection for her brother while Caleb discovers longings that in that time were almost as taboo as incest. Later, at Cornell, he rediscovers childhood friend Lionel Schwartz—the book takes place over a fifteen-year period—and the two embark on a doomed gay relationship. Roslyn Hellman, the fourth friend, discovers that she is a lesbian, but like Caleb she suppresses her desires. Though America recovers from the Great Depression to fight a good war in the 1940s, the characters never recover from their own personal crashes.

Despite all of the unusual, improbable, or unexpected situations that actually happen to people and which Grumbach employs in her novels, she nonetheless maintains a detachment from her characters, unlike Charles Dickens's or John Irving's emotive qualities. Grumbach readers feel little sympathy for those who will cry no more, little arousal from those who snuggle faithfully rather than intimately, little compassion for those who never really lived. What then engages us so deeply about these characters who reveal their worst flaws and banalities, their deepest fears, and self-knowledge, but realism? What Grumbach's critics fault her for is intermixing realism and romanticism. Her books are not intended for readers who need to identify with hyperbolic characters, rather for those with enough sense of self to know that they too are at times ordinary, prudish, or in need of a cuddle.

-Maril Nowak

GUERARD, Albert (Joseph)

Nationality: American. Born: Houston, Texas, 2 November 1914. Education: Stanford University, California, B.A. 1934, Ph.D. 1938; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, M.A. 1936. Military Service: Served in the Psychological Warfare Branch of the United States Army, 1943-45: Technical Sergeant. Family: Married Mary Maclin Bocock in 1941; three daughters. Career: Instructor in English, Amherst College, Massachusetts, 1935-36; instructor, assistant professor, and associate professor of English, 1938-54, and professor of English, 1954-61, Harvard University; professor of literature, Stanford University, 1961-85, now emeritus. Awards: Rockefeller fellowship, 1946; Fulbright fellowship, 1950; Guggenheim fellowship, 1956; Ford fellowship, 1959; Paris Review prize, 1963; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1967, 1974; literature award, American Academy of Arts and Letters, 1998. Member: American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Agent: Clyde Taylor, Curtis Brown, 10 Astor Place, New York, New York 10003. Address: 635 Gerona Road, Stanford, California 94305, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Past Must Alter. London, Longman, 1937; New York, Holt, 1938.

The Hunted. New York, Knopf, 1944; London, Longman, 1947.Maquisard: A Christmas Tale. New York, Knopf, 1945; London, Longman, 1946.

Night Journey. New York, Knopf, 1950; London, Longman, 1951. The Bystander. Boston, Little Brown, 1958; London, Faber, 1959. The Exiles. London, Faber, 1962; New York, Macmillan, 1963. Christine/Annette. New York, Dutton, 1985.

Gabrielle: An Entertainment. New York, Fine, 1992.The Hotel in the Jungle. Stanford, California, CSLI, 1995.Maquisard: A Christmas Tale. Novato, California, Lyford Books, 1995

Short Stories

Suspended Sentences. Santa Barbara, California, John Daniel, 1999.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Davos in Winter," in Hound and Horn (Cambridge, Massachusetts), October-December 1933.
- "Tragic Autumn," in The Magazine (Beverly Hills, California), December 1933.
- "Miss Prindle's Lover," in The Magazine (Beverly Hills, California), February 1934; revised edition, in Wake (Cambridge, Massachusetts), Spring 1948.

- "Turista," in The Best American Short Stories of 1947, edited by Martha Foley. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1947.
- "The Incubus," in The Dial (New York), vol. 1, no. 2, 1960.
- "The Lusts and Gratifications of Andrada," in Paris Review, Summer-Fall 1962.
- "On the Operating Table," in Denver Quarterly, Autumn 1966.
- "The Journey," in Partisan Review (New Brunswick, New Jersey), Winter 1967.
- "The Rabbit and the Tapes," in Sewanee Review (Tennessee), Spring 1972.
- "The Pillars of Hercules," in Fiction (New York), December 1973.
- "Bon Papa Reviendra," in Tri-Quarterly (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1975.
- "Post Mortem: The Garcia Incident," in Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Louisiana), Spring 1978.
- "Diplomatic Immunity," in Sequoia (Stanford, California), Autumn-Winter, 1978.
- "The Poetry of Flight," in Northwest Magazine (Portland, Oregon), 22 January 1984.
- "The Mongol Orbit," in Sequoia (Stanford, California), Centennial Issue, 1989.

Other

Robert Bridges: A Study of Traditionalism in Poetry. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Press, and London, Oxford University Press, 1942.

Joseph Conrad. New York, New Directions, 1947.

Thomas Hardy: The Novels and Stories. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Press, 1949; London, Oxford University Press, 1950; revised edition, 1964.

André Gide. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Press, and London, Oxford University Press, 1951; revised edition, 1969.

Conrad the Novelist. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Harvard University Press, 1958; London, Oxford University Press, 1959.

The Triumph of the Novel: Dickens, Dostoevsky, Faulkner. New York, Oxford University Press, 1976; London, Oxford University Press, 1977.

The Touch of Time: Myth, Memory, and the Self: Stanford, California, Stanford Alumni Association, 1980.

Editor, Prosateurs Américains de XXe Siécle. Paris, Laffont, 1947.

Editor, The Return of the Native, by Thomas Hardy. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1961.

Editor, Hardy: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, Prentice Hall, 1963.

Editor, Perspective on the Novel, special issue of Daedalus (Boston), Spring 1963.

Co-Editor, The Personal Voice: A Contemporary Prose Reader. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1964.

Editor, Stories of the Double. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1967.

Editor, Mirror and Mirage. Stanford, California, Stanford Alumni Association, 1980.

*

Manuscript Collection: Stanford University Library, California.

Critical Studies: The Modern Novel in America by Frederick Hoffman, Chicago, Regnery, 1951; The Hero with the Private Parts by Andrew Lytle, Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1966; "The Eskimo Motor in the Detection Cell" by Paul West, in Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Louisiana), Winter 1979; The Touch of Time, 1980, "The Past Unrecaptured: The Two Lives of Lya de Putti," in Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Louisiana), Winter 1983, and "Divided Selves," in Contemporary Authors Autobiography Series 2 edited by Adele Sarkissian, Detroit, Gale, 1985, all by Guerard; "The New Historical Romance" by David Levin, in Virginia Quarterly Review (Charlottesville), Spring 1986.

Albert Guerard comments:

My work has been notably affected by wartime experience (political intelligence work in France) and by the pressures and ambiguities of the subsequent cold war. I have tried without success to put the political subject aside; thousands of unpublished pages, many of them angry, testify to inescapable contemporary pressures.

Maguisard, written immediately after the 1944 events it describes, is an affectionate record of wartime comradeships among men who had been in the underground. Apologetically subtitled A Christmas Tale, it is the slightest of my novels and was the most warmly received. Night Journey, my most complex and most substantial novel, is more truthful in its picture of the political and moral devastation caused by American-Soviet rivalries in a world as deceptive, and as self-deceptive, as that of 1984. It was, on publication, repeatedly compared to Orwell's book. The confession of Paul Haldan (wandering and evasive, with his final crime left undescribed, and indeed undetected by most readers) is that of a liberal "innocent" who can accept neither his mother's sexual betrayals nor his country's systematic abuse of power and liberal ideology, nor its threatened use of germ warfare. Haldan's night journey into temporary regression takes him into the middle European city of his childhood, disrupted by the two great powers and betrayed by both. The ambiguities of an undeclared war are internalized by Paul Haldan, and his psychosexual anxieties projected onto the screen of public conflict. The Exiles (based on a journey to Cuba, Haiti, and Santo Domingo during the turmoil of 1959) explores deception and self-deception in the tragi-comic context of Caribbean propaganda and political intrigue. It dramatizes the conflict of a quixotic Trujillo assassin incorrigibly drawn to the exiled statesmen he is supposed to destroy. Manuel Andrada appears to be the most winning of my fictional creations.

In The Hunted, an earlier novel and conventionally realistic in technique, psycho-sexual anxieties and monumental vanities reflect public disorders in a small New England college just before World War II. Oedipal conflicts and fantasies, dramatized fairly unconsciously in The Past Must Alter, are central to Night Journey and to The Bystander, another story of romantic love vitiated by immaturity and regression. The technique of The Bystander is that of the French récit, with the motives either concealed or distorted by the narrator-protagonist. But the story is also of a collision between American 'innocence' and European compromise. One of my central aims has been to avoid, while writing fairly complex psychological novels, the deadening burden of explicit and accurate analysis. The Bystander—very easy to read, perhaps too easy to read—requires, to be truly understood, the closest attention to hint, to image, to nuance of voice and style.

In Christine/Annette I wanted to bring a number of perspectives and narrative methods to bear on the ambiguous case of an actress who changes her name and even her personality several times. We see her through fragments of her own journal, her son's reconstructive memoir, a former lover's screen play, brief oral histories by old friends, a few letters. No two versions entirely agree. A good young writer urged me to simplify my novel in accord with contemporary taste by making it more "linear," with a clear story line and third-person narration. But I kept to my ambiguities and contradictory witnesses, knowing they were true to a past that was irrecoverable and had become mythical. I was much pleased by a reviewer who found in this novel a combination of Proust's impressionism and the post-modern qualities of Italo Calvino.

I was bemused by the turbulent self-destructive life of Louise Brooks, but even more by that of Lya de Putti, a Hungarian star of silent films whom I met when I was ten years old. She left husband and infant daughters to become an actress, and the children were led to believe she was dead. More than fifty years later I met the daughters, and was struck by their loyalty to the lost mother and to the father who had kept them in ignorance. I knew none of this family history when I brought a remembered "Lia" briefly into my first novel of 1937. But the loyalty of the daughters, as well as Lya de Putti's turbulent life, is reflected in Christine/Annette.

Gabrielle was subtitled "An Entertainment" after the model of Graham Greene, who thus labeled his less complex novels. The subtitle may have been a mistake. Although structured as a psychological thriller, Gabrielle is a serious political satire. More than ever before I was conscious, as I wrote, of an earlier work as an ideal model: Voltaire's Candide. The immediate provocation for the novel was the misguided and complacent attitude of the State Department toward Latin America.

The Hotel in the Jungle is laid in 1870, 1922, and 1982, with two characters appearing in both 1870 and 1922 and two appearing in both 1922 and 1982. The setting is a resort hotel located in Santa Rosalia, an isolated Indian village in southern Mexico. The novel is based on the premise that the filibuster William Walker might not have been executed after his loss of Nicaragua and on the hypothesis that the poet Mina Loy, looking for her disappeared husband the poet-boxer Arthur Cravan, might have come to Santa Rosalia at the same time as the former heavyweight champion Jack Johnson. Cravan had fought Johnson in Barcelona and hoped to enlist Johnson in a boxing academy in Mexico. In 1982 a woman scholar, bemused by the disappearance of one major character in 1922 and another in 1982, comes to Santa Rosalia to investigate the ambiguous past. The final owner of the hotel was Cyrus Cranfield, an entrepreneur who resembles in some ways Howard Hughes.

* * *

Albert Guerard's seven novels, published over a period of nearly fifty years, have shown a steady progression in technique and a constant reconsideration of theme. Nearly all his novels represent a controlled madness, a largely successful attempt to valorize political/ psychological issues in a modern world where the center cannot hold. Guerard concentrates on intense moments of introspective terror and possibility for brooding protagonists trapped in futile or apocalyptic situations. The subjects of his major works of literary criticism— Hardy, Conrad, Gide, Dickens, Dostoevsky, Faulkner—and his admiration for the macabre humor and sexual fantasies of anti-realists liked Joyce, Kafka, Nabokov, Hawkes, Pynchon, Barthelme lead Guerard to a kind of fiction that refuses linear narration and embraces time distortion, untrustworthy observers, and ambiguous relationships. Dangerously close to the critical praise gained by the academic novelist, with its ensuing commercial failure, Guerard has never wavered from his commitment to the novel as complex experiment. As he states in The Triumph of the Novel, the effects he seeks are inventive fantasy, intuitive psychology, solitary obsessions, and political trauma.

Guerard's first novel, The Past Must Alter, deals with his major theme, a young man fascinated by his abortive desire for a beautiful older woman and bothered by an implausible relationship with a shadowy father. Drives to gamble and to test himself obsess and threaten the youth. The Hunted takes a more traditional fictional approach—the story of a waitress who marries an arrogant college instructor, of her increasing disillusion with his weakness and growing awareness of her own strength. The Hunted has a special quality that comes not from this anti-love story, nor from the New England rural college setting, but from a near-Faulknerian treatment of a violent flood and of a hunt for a doomed mythomaniac, the Bomber, who awakens the aggressions of the truly lost "normal" inhabitants and releases the female protagonist. Equally familiar in form is Maguisard. Subtitled, deliberately, "A Christmas Tale"—and Guerard's most commercial novel—the short book deals with a group of maquis and an American officer during the last months of World War II. Brilliantly compressed, coming close to but ultimately avoiding sentimentality, the novel is Guerard's most positive statement: the personal comradeship, solidarity, and dedication to a cause formed in combat allow the characters to act out their loyalties and sacrifices as well as to discover emotional and political possibilities that can sustain them in the postwar world. The book is warm, dramatic, lyrical.

In Night Journey Guerard creates this postwar world as a surreal one that joins varieties of betrayals. Paul Haldan (even the name echoes Conrad) betrays—deserts, literally—his superior officer in a move that re-enacts Haldan's guilt towards his father's death. Even darker themes of sexual betrayals by a form of projected rape and political betrayal by a military maneuver that alternately liberates and abandons a city qualify Night Journey as a work of inward and outer deception and destruction. Certainly Guerard's most imaginative and ambitious book, this novel is intelligent, probing, and yet, like many works of the psycho-political genre, ultimately lacking in human vitality. The madness is too controlled; the passion is too spent.

The Bystander concentrates on personal relations. Anthony, a young man in France, pursues the actress subject of his adolescent dreams. Poor and self-destructive, Anthony does attain his erotic desires, only to discover in Christiane a fundamental pragmatist who can reject passion for financial support from an older man. The book circles back on itself and is as much about loss as about gain. Tormented, sensual, self-lacerating, this anti-hero remains one of Guerard's most fascinating psychological portraits. The Exiles returns to the Conrad-Greene political arena that Guerard is drawn to as powerfully as to the psychological realm. (Indeed, sections of two unpublished political novels have appeared during the past decade in magazines; Suspended Sentence, which concerns an aging middle-European political exile, and Still Talking, a post-holocaust vision of wandering armies across a destroyed landscape.) Guerard's most comic effort, The Exiles satirizes Central American political refugees and their hangers-on and sympathetically presents a comic/tragic secret agent who combines absolute loyalty to a dictator and emotional commitment to a dissident, quasi-revolutionary poet. The comedy of Manuel Andrada's maneuverings in Boston is effective; the tragedy of his self-immolation in his beloved homeland is moving. Guerard's use of an objective, rather colorless narrator, however, mutes both the laughter and terror.

Constantly dedicated to the writing of fiction despite his careers as professor and critic. Guerard finally achieves his aim of definitively catching his fascination with his earliest subject—the love of an innocent young man for a more experienced lovely actress ... only for Charles Strickland the actress is in reality his lost mother, and the novel Christine/Annette is at once a rewriting of the past and an acceptance of the present. The book is indeed a triumph, easily Guerard's finest. He is lyrical and humorous, wistful and historical, tough-minded and sensitive. Part detective story, part family romance, part bildungsroman, part American and European social history, Christine/Annette is largely about the mystery of identity. The search for the mother, in all its Freudian and Jungian potentials, takes place in the real, richly evoked worlds of Paris and Berlin, Houston and Los Angeles. The narration is equally sure and varied autobiography, movie script, objective frame, letters—and the film trope superbly sustained. The novel displays a confidence that comes from years of successful writing, certainly, but the special quality of this 1985 work is its freshness, its variety, its flexibility, its combination of an open, experimental structure, an authentic voice, and a traditional theme of loss, search, and discovery. Like Shakespeare's The Tempest or Faulkner's The Reivers, Guerard's novel of his mature years recapitulates his earlier concepts and techniques. The book provides as well a sparkle and energy, an argument with himself rather than with others that in Yeats's formulation leads not to political rhetoric but to lyrical achievement.

-Eric Solomon

GUNESEKERA, Romesh

Nationality: British (originally Sri Lankan, immigrated to England). Awards: Rathbone prize for philosophy, University of Liverpool, 1976; Writers' Bursary, Arts Council, London, 1991; Yorkshire Post Best First Work award, 1995.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Reef. London, Granta, 1994; New York, New Press, 1995.The Sandglass. New Delhi, Viking, 1998; New York, Riverhead Books, 1999.

Short Stories

Monkfish Moon. New Delhi, Penguin, London, Granta, and New York, New Press, 1992.

* * *

On a photo depicting "India's leading novelists" that was printed in a 1997 special issue of the New Yorker on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of India's independence, Romesh Gunesekera is half concealed by another writer. Never has the young Sri Lankan received a mass audience's attention like, say, a flamboyant personality such as Arundhati Roy, nor has his work provoked a literary sensation of any sorts. Salman Rushdie's quipping identification of Sri Lanka with a drop of goo dangling from India's nose in Midnight's

Children shows well enough how the notoriously problem-ridden island is regarded by "Mother India." Nonetheless, Gunesekera's quiet and elegant, yet sharp and precise prose deserves without any doubt to be counted among the best writing from the literary flourishing subcontinent, and—as he has made a second home in London—in the same measure among the best young writers in the British literary landscape.

The immigrant experience informs all of Gunesekera's writing, but in a decidedly different vein than Rushdie's comic grotesquerie, V.S. Naipaul's venom, or Bharati Mukherjee's uncompromising disdain. If a comparison had to be suggested, probably Amitav Ghosh comes most closely, especially with regard to Gunesekera's The Sandglass (1998)—which is strongly reminiscent of Ghosh's The Shadow Lines—a fascinatingly controlled novel whose narrator's mind continuously shuttles between home and away, building a kind of uneasy bridge between Sri Lanka and England.

Gunesekera's first volume, the short-story collection Monkfish Moon, received much acclaim. The nine stories revolving around the turmoil of Sri Lanka's civil war are haunted with the striking violence introduced to the Edenic island by the fighting groups. It is only obliquely, however, that the violence enters the stories. Gunesekera focuses on personal misunderstanding and the breakdown of communication, on the parting and fracture of human relationships. So in "A House in the Country," the developing comradeship between master and servant is sundered as the trace of destruction comes closer and closer; "Batik" sees the split between Tamil husband and Sinhala wife (though the story ends on a more optimistic note); the protagonist in "Ranvali" visits her father's beach bungalow after many years and cherishes nostalgic reminiscences of a time before her father turned to political activism and estranged himself from his family; the final story, "Monkfish Moon," elaborates on the whole collection's title. As we learn from the fat, aging business magnate Peter, who always wanted to live like a monk in complete detachment, for good meat you need a good moon. An introductory note informs us that "There are no monkfish in the ocean around Sri Lanka." While there is no political hiding place in the now spoilt paradise, Gunesekera tries to capture and maybe thereby aesthetically to salvage his home country.

Gunesekera's powerful first novel, Reef, shortlisted for the prestigious Booker Prize in 1994, puts even more emphasis on the domestic space while the grim violence of the war looms large in the background. Reef is the story of young Triton, who works as cook and factotum for the marine biologist Mr. Salgado. Throughout the novel the first-person narrator emphasizes an ahistorical perspective, focusing on the different household chores, rather than on the serious political problems of the island. More than anything else, Reef is a culinary novel, a mouthwatering tour through the joys and virtues of the country's cuisine. The reader learns the right temperature for a perfect string-hopper dough, how to prepare coconut kavum, a love cake or a curry in a hurry, and how to disguise the dubious taste of a parrot fish with a sauce rich with chilli sambol. The exoticism that arguably accrues from this gastronomic reduction of Sri Lanka has evoked rather polarized responses. While the novel received high critical acclaim in Britain where it was published, critics from Sri Lanka often took short shrift with Gunesekera's "blinkered attitude" to his country of birth. Gunesekera was accused of merely restating western stereotypes about Sri Lanka. This critique, however, seems overstated, misreading Gunesekera's fine chisel for a broad brush. In fact, Triton, who uncompromisingly idolizes his master, plots against the brute servant Joseph, and eventually leaves Sri Lanka for England where he opens a restaurant "to show the world something really fabulous," is a character whom Gunesekera has quite consciously drafted problematic. Like Monkfish Moon, the novel is powerful in its treatment of personal relations, especially after Miss Nili—with whom Mr. Salgado falls in love—enters the household. The novel, which gets its title from the vanishing coral reef in the south that points to the threat of the encroaching sea, has most convincingly confirmed Gunesekera's promise as a fine writer.

In his second novel The Sandglass, Gunesekera's style seems even more refined, his language even more tactile. The narrative is set in London, on a February day when Prins Ducal arrives from Colombo to attend his mother Pearl's funeral. Again, the story's events are complexly filtered, this time with a strong emphasis on time, as Prins unravels his memories in the company of the narrator, who adds his own flashbacks on the seventeen years he has known the Ducal family. These bits and pieces form a chronicle of four generations of the Ducals, a family that is intricately related to another clan, the Vatunases. The hatred between the neighbouring families, which started after Prins's father Jason had bought a house on Vatunase ground (ironically called Arcadia), reflects the situation on the wartorn island. Once more Gunesekera abstains from depicting "the inferno back home" in terms of bloodshed, but focuses on family warfare, comprador corruption, and political power struggle. The mysterious death of his immensely successful father troubles Prins even forty years later, while the curiously evasive narrator who lives vicariously the Ducals' fate wants to read Pearl's life, "hoping to find something that would make sense out of the nonsense of my life."

-Tobias Wachinger

GUPTA, Sunetra

Nationality: Indian. Born: Calcutta, India, 15 March 1965. Education: Princeton University, A.B. 1987; London University, Ph.D. 1992. Family: Married Adrian Vivian Sinton Hill in 1994; two daughters. Career: Research assistant, Department of Biology, Imperial College, London, 1988–89, principal investigator for grant, 1989–92; Wellcome Training Fellow in mathematical biology, Department of Zoology, University of Oxford, England, 1992–95; junior research fellow, Merton College, Oxford, England, 1993–96; researcher, Wellcome Trust Centre for the Epidemiology of Infectious Disease, Department of Zoology, University of Oxford, England, 1995–99, reader in epidemiology of infectious disease, 1999—. Agent: David Higham Associates, Ltd., 5–8 Lower John Street, London W1R 4HA, England. Address: Department of Zoology, University of Oxford, Oxford OX1 3PS, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Memories of Rain. New York, Weidenfeld, 1992. The Glassblower's Breath. New York, Grove Press, 1993. Moonlight into Marzipan. London, Phoenix House, 1995. A Sin of Colour. London, Phoenix House, 1999.

* * *

Sunetra Gupta belongs to that Rushdie and post-Rushdie generation of "Indian English" writers whose members are essentially cosmopolitan in their cultural and linguistic affinities—though they are often read and marketed as predominantly "Indian" writers in the West. Gupta, born in 1965, spent her childhood in Bengal and Africa, studied biology at Princeton University, and obtained her Ph.D. from London's Imperial College. She now lives in Oxford with her husband and daughter and divides her time between writing and researching infectious diseases. Sunetra Gupta is the author of four novels: Memories of Rain, The Glassblower's Breath, Moonlight into Marzipan, and A Sin of Colour. She has been described as "a prodigious talent" by the Independent on Sunday and her work has been pronounced "brilliant" by The Times.

Being a resident in the famous university town, it is not surprising that Oxford provides some of the backdrop for Sunetra Gupta's fourth and latest novel, A Sin of Colour. This is a book, written in consciously literary English, that sets out to tell the story of three generations with their roots in a house called Mandalay in Calcutta. Bought from a British officer by a wealthy Bengali family, it is to Mandalay that Indranath Roy brings his clever and innocent bride. It is to Mandalay that Indranath's eldest son brings his own brilliant wife, the beautiful, collected and successful woman with whom the younger brother, Debendranath Roy, falls in love. Fleeing the house, his family and his apparently futile love, Debendranath moves to Oxford and marries an English woman, whom he largely neglects. Debendranath is later presumed drowned. It is left to his niece, Niharika, another of those brilliant, successful women who stock Gupta's narratives and share many similarities with the author, to provide the finishing touches. It turns out that Debendranath had fled back to India where he had lived incognito. His growing blindness drives him back to the family and to his writer-niece Niharika, who is almost the only family member living in Mandalay, now in ruins and abandoned by the next generation.

The thinness of the plot evident from the above summary of A Sin of Colour is also noticeable in Gupta's first novel, Memories of Rain—but in both these novels this thinness is brilliantly obscured by Gupta's virtuosity with literary language. Again, in both the novels, Gupta's extremely literary—even canonical—sensibility is revealed in the centrality and profusion of the references to Euripedes's Medea. In Memories of Rain, the entire plot is concentrated within the span of a single day. On that day, Moni, an Indian woman who had come to England after having married the English Anthony, decides to leave her unfaithful husband and returns to India with her daughter. The relationship between Moni and Anthony presents the usual paraphernalia of cross-cultural differences and racism, with the onus of "primitivity" reversed and applied implicitly to "cold" England rather than the Bengal of Rabindra Sangeet.

In between these two novels with relatively simple narrative and thematic structures, Gupta wrote two other novels that were somewhat more experimental. The Glassblower's Breath is the story of a brilliant young Indian woman and her relationships with a variety of people, such as the tragic Jon Sparrow ("poet and mathematician, child prodigy"), and places ("the inadequacy of your relationship with the city"). Against the backdrop of Calcutta, New York, and London, replete with echoes of the modernist big city experience, the second-person protagonist—always referred to as "you"—tries to satisfy the demands of individuality, family, and society. She fails, but in the process provides a narrative of a brilliant young woman's capacity for experience and the desire of men and society to control and define her. From the stylistic perspective, The Glassblower's

Breath is interesting because it is one of those rare novels with a second-person protagonist—an experiment that necessarily induces Gupta to employ the stream-of-consciousness technique, or something very similar to it.

Moonlight into Marzipan is also interesting from a stylistic perspective, as it mixes up first person narration ('I') with second person address (''you''). Moreover, it does not follow a chronological order of events, leaving the reader to assemble the parts of an openended story. In effect, Moonlight into Marzipan is not one text: it consists of various overlapping and at times incomplete texts. As in the other novels, we have an assemblage of brilliant characters, with the world of science leading to the experience of creative writing.

At its simplest, Moonlight into Marzipan is about two promising scientists, Promothesh and Esha, who marry each other and set up house in Calcutta. Marriage turns Esha into the typical housewife and obstructs her career. However, by accident, she enables Promothesh to achieve international renown for a major scientific discovery, a discovery that is clearly meant by the narrator to carry redemptive significance for the so-called Third World. Newly achieved celebrity enables the couple to move to London. However, this move leads to Promothesh's infidelity and Esha's ultimate suicide.

The above story line is tied up with Promothesh writing his autobiography, which provides us with the axis around which the novel turns. The novel is in many ways the autobiography. Later it is revealed that the autobiography was to be written for Promothesh by the expatriate Russian writer, Alexandra Vorobyova. As the Italian critic Sandra Ponzanesi has noted, "when Alexandra Vorobyova goes away and abandons the text, Promothesh is left with pieces of his life scribbled in notes; the result of his long conversations and confessions with the dismissive narrator."

As is obvious from the summaries given above, Sunetra Gupta's novels share many stylistic, narrative and thematic characteristics: a dexterity with literary language, a profusion of canonical references (ranging from Euripedes to Tagore), a tendency towards versions of the stream-of-consciousness technique, a concentration on brilliant protagonists straddling the worlds of science and literature, and thin plots resolved by or revolving around momentous events (deaths, disappearances, drowning, suicides).

What is perhaps less evident is the position that Gupta occupies between the two dominant trends in contemporary Indian English fiction—that of magic realism (Salman Rushdie and Vikram Chandra) and that of "domestic realism" (Vikram Seth and Anita Desai). At first glance, Gupta seems to belong to the first group, as she usually writes about individuals defined by their family relationships in an ostensibly realistic manner. But much of Gupta's oeuvre is also sustained by the evocative, non-metaphorical language of magic realism in extracts like this one: "From North Bengal, Indranath Roy had journeyed into the foothills of the Himalayas, to seek out the Japanese Cedars, with which they would line their new make of wardrobes-one of these they later had in their bedroom, and whenever she opened it, the room would fill with the fragrance of his shapeless desire to know and possess her" (A Sin of Colour). Gupta is not the only Indian English writer to use the language of magic realism in a narrative that is not really magic realist: Arundhati Roy has done it at a more complex level in The God of Small Things.

Given Gupta's concentration on female protagonists, her limited textual experiments, and her language, it is predictable that critics in the West would compare her to Virginia Woolf. Kirkus Reviews, for example, has called Gupta "a young, true heir to Virginia Woolf."

This comparison is both justified and exaggerated. Above all, it is a comparison that reveals more about Gupta than it seems to.

Like Woolf, Gupta is a literary stylist. But unlike Woolf, her stylistic experiments are not at the cutting edge of the contemporary literary scene. Again like Woolf, Gupta is a highly literary writer—after all, Gupta's social background is no less privileged, brilliant, and "arty" than Woolf's Bloomsbury circle. But, unlike Woolf, Gupta seldom—if ever—critiques and subverts the literary canon in a significant manner. It is in this context that one should be wary of providing a typically post-colonial ("subversive mimicry," "subaltern agency," etc.) reading of Gupta's—and, for that matter, many other so-called post-colonial writers'—texts. The situation is much more complex: there are both elements of cultural subversion and linguistic hegemony in Gupta's and other Indian English writers' texts.

Finally, like Woolf, Gupta provides a gendered reading of society while not making a militant political statement. However, while Woolf might have had a poor opinion of female suffragettes, her writings adopted feminist perspectives that were often far ahead of contemporary opinion even in literary circles. Something similar cannot be said of Gupta. In fact, women writing in other Indian languages (such as Ismat Chughtai and Mahasweta Devi) as well as some Indian English writers (Githa Hariharan and Shashi Deshpande) have taken the gendering of novelistic discourse to far more radical levels than anything that may be encountered in Gupta's novels. Gupta's novels remain interesting, though more for what they promise than what they actually achieve.

—Tabish Khair

GURGANIS, Allan

Nationality: American. Born: Rocky Mount, North Carolina, 11 June 1947. Education: Rocky Mount Senior High, 1965; Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts, 1965-66; Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, New York, 1970–72. Military Service: United States Navy, 1966-70. Career: Desk clerk and salesperson of art reproductions, 1969–70; night watchman in a vitamin factory, 1970–72; professor of fiction writing, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1972–74, Stanford University, Stanford, California, 1974-76, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina, 1976–78, Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, New York, 1978-86, and University of Iowa Writers' Workshop, 1989-90. Artist, with paintings in many private and public collections. Member of board, Corporation of Yaddo; cofounder, "Writers for Harvey Gantt." Awards: Jones lecturer, Stanford University; PEN prizes for fiction; National Endowment for the Arts grants; Ingram Merrill award; Wallace Stegner fellowship; National Magazine prize, National Magazine Association, 1994. Agent: c/o International Creative Management, 40 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10019, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novel

Oldest Living Confederate Widow Tells All. New York, Knopf, and London, Faber, 1989.

Plays Well with Others. New York, Knopf, 1997.

Short Stories

Good Help, with illustrations by the author. Rocky Mount, North Carolina Wesleyan College Press, 1988.

Blessed Assurance: A Moral Tale (novella). Rocky Mount, North Carolina Wesleyan College Press, 1990.

White People: Stories and Novellas. New York, Knopf, and London, Faber, 1991.

The Practical Heart. Rocky Mount, North Carolina Wesleyan College Press, 1993.

*

Critical Studies: "Black and Blue and Gray: An Interview with Allan Gurganis" by Jeffrey Scheuer, in Poets and Writers, November-December 1990.

* * *

Allan Gurganus is an old-fashioned storyteller. The stories he tells are multi-layered and contain strong, varied voices. While both his novel, Oldest Living Confederate Widow Tells All, and his short story collection, White People, are set primarily in the South, he should not be considered a "Southern Writer" solely. In American literature, the oral tradition that feeds his ability with voice and character is strongly associated with that region, but Gurganus covers territory that is all-American by bringing uniquely American questions to light, all somehow having to do with how Americans perceive themselves.

In Oldest Living Confederate Widow Tells All, a 99-year-old woman named Lucy Marsden relates stories that take place during more than a century of time, from the beginnings of the Civil War to the 1980s. At the time of its publication, some critics were happy to see, in light of recent literary trends toward the abstract, the minimal, and the eccentric, the emergence of such a "big" story; others considered the premise unequal to the task of carrying such a sizeable narrative. Lucy tells stories of her life and the life of her Civil War veteran husband, whom she had married when she was fifteen. She regales us with tales of his experiences before she was even born, becoming her husband's voice. Indeed, she even takes on the voice of his one-time slave, Castalia, as well as many others. This multiplenarrator role makes her at once story and storyteller, participant and omniscient observer. While this raises interesting questions about narrative authority, it also presents a fascinating experience for the perceptive reader, for there is also the author to consider. Through Lucy, he has entered and presented male and female lives, historical lives, young and old lives, warrior lives-American lives that embrace and reflect more than one American epoch, more than one American region.

In addition to all of this, there is more than the Civil War being fought here, although many issues from the other battles contained in the book are related to that war between the states. Sex, race, class, age—all those words which so efficiently assume the -ism suffix—are concepts in conflict within the novel. Gurganus has much to say about it all. However, at the core of the novel's resolution is forgiveness and the hope it can bring. Because of this, the comparison to at least one other Southern writer may come quickly to mind, for Flannery O'Connor's famous "Moment of Grace" resembles the theme closely. There is also Gurganus's sense of humor to tempt us into such a comparison. But it is his use of voice which makes the humor effective, the theme accessible. The author has quite an ear and quite an imagination, and it is his accuracy with the female voice that is most impressive.

Gurganus has said that he chose Lucy as narrator for this novel because he wanted a new version/vision of history that had not before been solicited: that of a female who was neither rich nor beautiful. He is successful in this; but in Castalia, the former Marsden slave, he is successful in giving us the vision of a female who was neither rich nor beautiful (in a white man's world) nor white. The Captain himself is not a particularly likeable character; still, he too has his sympathetic side and his own particularly strong voice. But again—we hear this voice only through Lucy and, thus, must be cautious about what we conclude from it.

It is a long book; and the plot, although guided by chronology, is not strictly linear in its construction. There are many side roads taken, even to Africa during the slave trade. Although necessary to the theme of his/her-story that the author is illuminating, this technique is often cited as the weakness of the book. But for those who enjoy an old-fashioned story treated with respect in the telling, Oldest Living Confederate Widow Tells All lives up to the promise of its title. It is rather like sitting around the kitchen table listening to previous generations tell what they know about family members and small town denizens in anecdotal but wise and witty tones. What could be more American?

In White People, Gurganus's collection of short stories and novellas, we are given just such an image in the opening passages of "A Hog Loves Its Life." The boy Willie and his grandfather, "hiding" from the other relatives, are forced into a "story-hour" by Willie's ignorance of local lore. The story of this novella, and the story within the story, are fine examples of what a writer can do with a talent for voice. The ritual engaged in by these two characters is related in tones of solemnity balanced by humor. It is important to the participants, and to the reader, that each understands the significance of what is being told at both levels—that of the grandfather telling the tale and the boy/man retelling it. As with Oldest Living Confederate Widow Tells All, the narrator is both story and storyteller. Gurganus's narrative constructions resemble the double helix of DNA: simultaneously, and deceptively, simple and complex.

Embedded in the themes weaving through the various tales of the collection is a penetrating look at what the passage of time and the losses it naturally brings, can mean to our individual sense of hope and forgiveness. One of the most often mentioned and poignant of the stories is "Blessed Assurance," the final novella of the collection. In telling the story of an aging, Southern, white man looking back on his days as a college student who sold funeral insurance to poor blacks in the late 1940s, Gurganus requires that the reader look carefully at the loss of youthful innocence and naiveté, the use of exploitation in race relations, the burden of guilt—and the absurdity of all these things. For that sense of humor is here, too, at the base of this and the other tales

The author seems to possess a core belief in the terrible beauty of daily survival; and this belief transcends geography, gender, age, race, and sexual orientation. In this way, Gurganus contributes to contemporary American literature while retaining an old-fashioned faith in, and a sizeable talent for, the telling of the tale.

GURNAH, Abdulrazak S.

Nationality: English. Born: Zanzibar (now part of Tanzania), 1948. Education: Earned a Ph.D. Career: Worked as a hospital orderly; lecturer in English and American literature, Rutherford College, University of Kent, Canterbury, Kent, England. Address: School of English, Rutherford College, University of Kent, Canterbury, Kent CT2 7NX, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Memory of Departure. London, Jonathan Cape, 1987. Pilgrim's Way. London, Jonathan Cape, 1988. Dottie. London, Jonathan Cape, 1990. Paradise. New York, New Press, 1994. Admiring Silence. New York, New Press, 1996.

Other

Editor and contributor, Essays on African Writing 1: A Re-evaluation. Oxford, England, Heinemann, 1994.

Editor and contributor, Essays on African Writing 2: Contemporary Literature. Oxford, England, Heinemann, 1996.

*

Critical Studies: "Abdulrazak Gurnah's Paradise and Admiring Silence: History, Stories, and the Figure of the Uncle" by Jacqueline Bardolphin, in Contemporary African Fiction, edited by Derek Wright, 1997.

* * *

Abdulrazak Gurnah, born in Zanzibar, had already acquired a reputation as a scholar and critic of African literature and published three novels set in the immigrant community in England when in 1994 Paradise was short-listed for the Booker Prize. This was followed in 1996 by Admiring Silence, partly set in the UK and Tanzania. Critics wondered how to classify Gurnah—as a Black British author, African writer, or simply a modern writer of the English language.

Paradise certainly deserves a place in East-African prose fiction, because the language policies in Tanzania had for a long time discouraged the use of English and gave preference to Kiswahili, while the coastal Swahili and Zansibari writers such as Said Khamis would never think of writing in English. The only other English novels of comparable caliber are those written by the African-Indian author M.G. Vassanji, The Gunny Sack (1989) or Uhuru Street (1991). Just like Vassanji, whose attention focuses on the East-African Indian community and their interaction with the "others," Gurnah's novel deploys multi-ethnicity and multiculturalism on the shores of the Indian Ocean from the perspective of the Swahili elite. Paradise spans the period from 1900–14, the time when the German colonial presence began to interfere drastically with the lives of the different communities in Tanganyika until the end of the short-lived episode of German colonialism. The dominant topic of the novel being an inland journey into the "heart of Africa," other colonial texts interfere intertextually: First of all, Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness about Kurtz's boat trip up the Congo river, but also the famous narrative of Tippu Tip, who reached the central lake area with his slave-hunting expeditions. Gurnah's text also relates to the imperial grand tales of exploration—Speke's Discovery of the Sources of the Nile (1863) and Richard Burton's The Lake Regions of Central Africa (1860).

The novel begins in Kawa, a small inland trading town that came into existence through the construction of the Tanganyika railway. Kawa, in the eyes of the novel's characters, is the liminal town between savagery and heathenism or the coastal civilization of the Arab-Swahili Muslim elite. From Kawa, Uncle Aziz, a rich Arab trader, sets out for his trading safaris into the hinterland, shipping his goods from the coast to Kawa by rail. Twelve-year-old Yusuf, through whose eyes and voice we follow the story, is the son of a petty trader who runs a hotel-plus-shop for Uncle Aziz. He pawns his son into the services of the Seeyid/Master to serve his debts. Thus, Yusuf comes to the coastal city to work as the shop assistant together with Khalil, five years his senior and also pawned to Aziz by his impoverished parents. The shop is situated at the edge of Aziz's compound, facing the city and the harbor. Inside his palace, Aziz had a beautiful "walled garden," modeled according to the Quoranic description of paradise, where Yusuf can sneak in occasionally to assist Mzee Hamdani, the gardener and guardian. At one time, Aziz hires out Yusuf to Hamid Suleiman, another shop owner in a nameless town at the foothills of Mount Kilimanjaro. But the most dramatic part of the plot is the journey into the hinterland across the Great Lake (Victoria?) to the capital of the powerful African king Chatu, renowned for his savagery, treachery, and being a bloodthirsty ruler. Uncle Aziz's safari does reach the goal of its quest, but instead of doing profitable business, buying ivory from Chatu, Chatu attacks Aziz's camp in the night, kills many men, and robs all the provisions and trade goods. Aziz, Yusuf, and a few others are lucky to escape with their lives.

Abdulrazak Gurnah thus created three distinct spaces in which the novel unfolds: the cultured and civilized coastal city, unquestionably controlled by the Arab traders and the Swahili elite; the inland trading town with their liminal position between civilization and the wilderness; and thirdly, the indefinite open space of lands, stretching from those outposts of civilization to the power center of "savagery." Lastly, there are the German colonialists who don't care about the Swahili elite's niceties of distinguishing between coastal sophistication and inland barbarism, because for them all non-whites are savages.

The concept of paradise is of paramount importance throughout the novel; once as a crucial issue of debate about religious concepts between the Hindu Kalasinga and the Muslim Hamid. But Paradise is also visualized and concretized in the gardens, first Aziz's garden in the city: "...the garden was divided into quarters, with a pool in the center and water channels running off it in the four direction. The quadrants were planted with trees and bushes, some of them in flower: lavender, henna, rosemary and aloe ... clovers and grass, and scattered clumps of lilies and irises"; and second, the poor replica of the paradisiacal garden behind Hamil's shop at the foot of the mountain: "... scrubs and thickets full of snakes and wild animals .... Instead of the shade and flowers which Mzee Hamdani had created ... here there was only the bush beyond their backyard which was used for rubbish. It shuddered with secret life, and out of it rose fumes of putrefaction and pestilence." Scenic vistas and landscape descriptions during the disastrous trading expedition underline the contrast between the uncultured natural scenery and the sophistication of the pleasure garden. Gurnah develops the garden on the coast and the roughlyhewn makeshift residence of the inland king Chatu as symbolic spaces, representing the Swahili perspective of civilization against barbarism. Aziz's garden however is paradisiacal only in appearance, in reality it reflects social and racial oppression: Mzee Hamdani, who tends the garden lovingly, has the status of a mere chattel slave. Aziz's senior wife, who haunts the garden, is facially disfigured and morally degenerated. Her walks in the garden resemble prison yard exercises, her lusting for young Yusuf approaches a pedophilic perversion while her open sore, which she tries to hide under her shaddor, can only be read as an image for the sickening quality of Aziz's home. And Aziz's youngest child-wife Amina, with whom Yusuf is enamoured, is another pawn given by Aziz's tenants. What might look like paradise and is designed according to the Quoranic scriptures, proves to be pure hell for the members of Aziz's household. The ending of the novel reveals the falsity of another idealization, that of the paradisiacal harmony of pre-colonial Africa. Yusuf runs after the German recruiting officer, although he has just witnessed the brutality with which forced recruitment is practiced in the wake of World War I. Yusuf as the young African obviously came to the conclusion that the brutality of German colonialism is still preferable to the ruthless exploitation by the Arabs. As Achebe does in Things Fall Apart, Gurnah draws a picture of East-African society that is on the verge of drastic change. Colonialism only accelerated this process, but did not initiate it. Gurnah narrates his story with two parallel but contrastive plot lines: Yusuf's is a story of growing up and gaining stature—a bildungsroman—while the historical plotline is one of decay and degeneration of pre-colonial African society.

With Admiring Silence, Gurnah returns to postcolonial Tanzania. Admiring Silence, like Paradise, has storytelling as one of its main subjects. His protagonist is a leftish dissident intellectual who left the country and settled in England, precariously but permanently, with his partner Emma. He tries to pacify Emma's father, a diehard imperialist, with idealized and idyllic stories about his youth, about the gallant courtship of his father and mother, inventing ever new fabrications about "home" as the demands of his British audience seems to require. When he returns home, he is frustrated by the discrepancy between the stories he invented-and started to half believe—and the dreary realities. The house of his parents is close to decay; essential services like water, electricity, and garbage disposal fail regularly. In addition, his schoolmates have become corrupt, selfseeking bureaucrats, and his mother was not gallantly courted but given as a pawn to his father. And yet, he never found the courage to inform his parents that he has been living together with a white infidel—a "kafir woman." When he is introduced to the child-wife who his relatives chose for him, he panics and flees "home," which is now England, only to find that Emma left and that he is condemned to be "on the edges of everything," on his own island in England. The hero despairs of establishing communication between the two worlds.

-Eckhard Breitinger

GUTERSON, David

Nationality: American. Born: Seattle, Washington, 4 May 1956. Education: University of Washington, B.A. 1978, M.A. 1982. Family: Married Robin Ann Radwick in 1979; three children. Career: High school English teacher, Bainbridge Island, Washington, 1984—.

Agent: Georges Borchardt, Inc., 136 East 57th Street, New York, New York 10020, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Snow Falling on Cedars. San Diego, Harcourt Brace, 1994. East of the Mountains. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1999.

Short Stories

The Country Ahead of Us, the Country Behind. New York, Harper, 1989.

Other

Family Matters: Why Homeschooling Makes Sense. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1992.

* * *

David Guterson acknowledges that a few of his early short stories owe a debt to the basic, naturalistic style of Raymond Carver; however, he continues, "You mature, your sensibilities become refined, you find your own voice." Nevertheless, Guterson established several characteristic techniques in his early pieces which carry over into his novels, suggested by the collection's metaphoric title, The Country Ahead of Us, the Country Behind. The "country" is the Pacific Northwest, the setting for most of his stories and his subsequent novels, Snow Falling on Cedars and East of the Mountains, while "ahead" and "behind" refer to the very lives of his protagonists, who recall salient events in their past through Guterson's use of flashback. In the stark, tough short stories about fathers and sons, brothers and buddies, a nostalgic adult recalls a boyhood adventure, usually involving hunting or fishing or some other self-test against nature, but leading to personal discovery. In the novels, Guterson's detailed descriptions of vast landscapes or intimate interiors achieve a atmospheric sense of place, and the single flashback of the short story deepens to complicated time strata; both enhanced by Guterson's now characteristic extended, meticulous research, acknowledged by lengthy lists in the novels. These techniques partially account for the phenomenal runaway success of Snow Falling on Cedars, which sold over three million copies, followed by a movie directed by Scott Hicks and starring Max Von Sydow and Ethan Hawke.

Set in December 1954 on a fictionalized San Piedro Island in Puget Sound, the novel seems, at first, a classic courtroom drama compounded by a long ago forbidden interracial romance which hints at a present-day love triangle. But, beneath the serene snow-muffled island and within its inhabitants simmers a matter-of-fact racial bigotry now exacerbated by the trial of Japanese-American Kabuo Miyamoto, accused of murdering fellow islander and salmon fisherman Carl Heine, found tangled in his boat's gill net. Kabuo and local newspaper reporter Ishmael Chambers were childhood playmates, but Ishmael and Kabuo's wife, Hatsue Imada were playmates and, then, teenage lovers before World War II and before Ishmael lost his arm in battle and she suffered internment with other Japanese-Americans at Manzanar in 1942.

Not surprisingly, Guterson acknowledges Harper Lee's To Kill a Mockingbird as a thematic influence, but in Snow Falling on Cedars, he uses his characters' courtroom testimonies to create a complex multileveled narrative evolving through serial flashbacks from the courtroom of the present to the retold incident pertinent to the trial to an evoked personal memory and often to a retelling of an historical event, such as Ishmael as participant in and witness to the Allied invasion against the Japanese on the South Pacific island of Betio. Alongside this intricate technique, Guterson increases the novel's suspense by withholding Kabuo's version of events, a standard detective novel ploy. Although some label the omniscient narrative voice as "leaden," Guterson's skillful use of these personal histories enlarges the novel, for it allows him to relate the history of the island while taking the reader beyond the three-day courtroom trial into the lush, yet often harsh, environment of the Pacific Northwest, which comes alive as if a character in both the novels.

Outside Amity Harbor's overheated courtroom, a severe blizzard wraps itself around the island eventually knocking down power lines and testing everyone's resolve as heat dissipates and cars run off iced roads. Guterson is at his best as he captures a warm, languid excursion of Kabuo's family or the ripe, sweet strawberry fields during picking time. The sensual encounters of Ishmael and Hatsue in their secret hollowed-out cedar tree contrast sharply with those of the married Hatsue and Kabuo in her family's sheet-divided room in Manzanar before he goes off to kill Germans, an act for which his guilt will have repercussions during the trial. Although some argue that the sex scenes achieve little, particularly because they replace dialogue and narrative, for the reader, they resonate years later as reminders of the characters' and the island's loss of innocence during World War II. Throughout Guterson's evocative descriptions, the reader is aware of the treacherous immediacy of the sea, the unwritten code of the men who man the fishing boats and their animosity towards the island's Japanese-Americans, especially Kabuo who turned to salmon fishing in lieu of farming the land he believes Heine's mother has cheated him of; his obsession with the lost land provides the motive for the alleged murder.

At one point, Guterson set aside writing this novel to complete Family Matters: Why Homeschooling Makes Sense. Hailed as an honest evaluation of the educational method Guterson himself, then a high school teacher, chose for his children, he describes a classroom visit by his father, a criminal lawyer, clearly the model for Nels Gudmundsson, the aging, ailing defense attorney in Snow Falling on Cedars. In his trial summation, Gudmundsson calls for the jurors to overcome the human frailties of hate and irrational fears; he urges them to try Kabuo as an American, to use reason, not prejudices left over from the war. Any flaws in the novel lie in the swift ending to trial and book. Ishmael, heretofore emotionally numb, heeds Gudmundsson's exhortation and provides the court with newly discovered evidence.

In his second novel, East of the Mountains, Guterson uses the same techniques of flashback and precise descriptions to create a philosophical novel; however, his own analysis identifies a leaner, more understated style. His protagonist is Seattle cardiac surgeon Dr. Ben Givens, a seventy-three-year-old, recent widower diagnosed with terminal colon cancer. As the title suggests, the "country" is east of Puget Sound into the desert and apple regions of the Columbia Basin, an area Guterson hunted and hiked as a youngster as did his protagonist. As in Snow Falling on Cedars, a front map guides the reader through the unknown territory which Guterson describes in beautiful, lyric detail. Notwithstanding a loving daughter and family, Givens has devised, what some critics have called inexplicable, a plan to commit suicide making it look like a hunting accident; thus, he meticulously creates a home scene suggesting his return and sets off from Seattle in his 1969 International Scout with his Winchester and his two Brittanies during a torrential downpour. As expected, Givens's plan goes awry, for the novel is, as Guterson says, "squarely in the genre of the mythic journey."

As a writer, Guterson believes that his role is to create fiction which addresses human needs and sustains the culture's themes and central myths. He likens East of the Mountains to Don Quixote since, in both, older men undertake quests which follow the conventions of the mythic journey. Ben Givens travels, Guterson continues, beyond his ordinary life 'into some strange place . . . [where] he can ultimately resolve whatever question drove him to leave in the first place.' Along the way Givens encounters strangers and incidents which test him physically and emotionally and which prompt memories, developed through lengthy flashbacks, that humanize any of his character's mythic traits. The flashbacks bear the mark of Guterson's research, including a trip to Italy's Dolomites for the recounting of young Givens's World War II experiences.

After the blockbuster success of Snow Falling on Cedars, apprehension increased Guterson's "sense of being challenged" as he prepared to write East of the Mountains. As a result, his style matured through his individualized voice and refined sensibilities, thus verifying his earlier identification by critics as a talent to watch.

-Judith C. Kohl

H

HAILEY, Arthur

Nationality: British and Canadian. Born: Luton, Bedfordshire, 5 April 1920; emigrated to Canada in 1947: became citizen, 1952. Education: Elementary schools in England. Military Service: Served as a pilot in the Royal Air Force, 1939–47: Flight Lieutenant. Family: Married 1) Joan Fishwick in 1944 (divorced 1950), three sons; 2) Sheila Dunlop in 1951, one son and two daughters. Career: Office boy and clerk, London, 1934–39; assistant editor, 1947–49, and editor, 1949–53, Bus and Truck Transport, Toronto; sales promotion manager, Trailmobile Canada, Toronto, 1953–56. Since 1956 freelance writer. Awards: Canadian Council of Authors and Artists award, 1956; Best Canadian TV Playwright award, 1957, 1958; Doubleday Prize Novel award, 1962. Address: Lyford Cay, P.O. Box N. 7776, Nassau, Bahamas.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Flight into Danger, with John Castle. London, Souvenir Press, 1958; as Runway Zero-Eight, New York, Doubleday, 1959.

The Final Diagnosis. New York, Doubleday, 1959; London, Joseph-Souvenir Press, 1960; as The Young Doctors, London, Corgi, 1962.

In High Places. New York, Doubleday, and London, Joseph-Souvenir Press, 1962.

Hotel. New York, Doubleday, and London, Joseph-Souvenir Press, 1965.

Airport. New York, Doubleday, and London, Joseph-Souvenir Press,

Wheels. New York, Doubleday, and London, Joseph-Souvenir Press, 1971.

The Moneychangers. New York, Doubleday, and London, Joseph-Souvenir Press, 1975.

Overload. New York, Doubleday, and London, Joseph-Souvenir Press, 1979.

Strong Medicine. New York, Doubleday, and London Joseph-Souvenir Press, 1984.

The Evening News. New York, Doubleday, and London, Doubleday-Souvenir Press, 1990.

Detective. New York, Crown Publishers, 1997.

Plays

Flight into Danger (televised 1956). Published in Four Plays of Our Time, London, Macmillan, 1960.

Close-up on Writing for Television. New York, Doubleday, 1960.

Screenplays: Zero Hour, with Hall Bartlett and John Champion, 1958; The Moneychangers, 1976; Wheels, 1978.

Television Plays: Flight into Danger, 1956 (USA); Time Lock 1962 (UK); Course for Collision, 1962 (UK); and plays for Westinghouse Studio One, Playhouse 90, U.S. Steel Hour, Goodyear-Philco Playhouse, and Kraft Theatre (USA).

*

Critical Studies: 1 Married a Best Seller by Sheila Hailey, New York, Doubleday, and London, Joseph-Souvenir Press, 1978.

Arthur Hailey comments:

My novels are the end product of my work and are widely available. Therefore I see no reason to be analytical about them.

Each novel takes me, usually, three years: a year of continuous research, six months of detailed planning, then a year and a half of steady writing, with many revisions.

My only other comment is that my novels are the work of one who seeks principally to be a storyteller but reflect also, I hope, the excitement of living here and now.

* * *

Arthur Hailey has developed and virtually perfected a highly efficient and extremely successful (and profitable) process of novel writing. Whether he is writing about doctors (The Final Diagnosis, Strong Medicine) or airline pilots (Flight into Danger), hotels (Hotel) or airports (Airport), government (In High Places) or industry (Wheels), he follows the same formula. Each of his novels is filled with enough information about the subject of his exhaustive research to satisfy the most curious reader; there are enough character types to appeal to the widest possible audience; everything is interwoven into a complex web of plots and sub-plots to satisfy every reader's desire for a good, suspenseful story.

Hailey writes documentary fiction, or what has been called "faction," that is, a mixture of the real and the fictitious. After spending a year of research for each novel, Hailey is prepared to give his reader as much factual information as he can work into the novel. Consequently, only his characters and situations are imaginary, and they are sometimes only slightly fictitious.

To speak of any Hailey novel is to speak of every Hailey novel for there is little to distinguish one from the rest except subject matter. Each novel shares the same characteristic strengths and weaknesses. Airport is a typical example. The action of the novel is centered at a fictitious Chicago airport during one of the worst blizzards in the city's history. To give his reader an inside look at the operations of a major airport and into the lives of the people responsible for its existence, Hailey devises several plots; an airliner is stuck in the snow, blocking a runway and causing emergency situations in the air; an air-traffic controller is planning suicide; a trans-Atlantic airliner is about to take off with a bomb aboard; a stewardess has discovered she is pregnant; a group of local citizens is demonstrating against the excessive noise of the airport. The novel follows each plot to its conclusion, but not before the reader's intellectual curiosity about airports and his emotional curiosity about the characters are satisfied.

The narrative is slick and fast-moving, the information is interesting, the prose is readable, but the seams in Hailey's fabric too often show through. In order to introduce all his researched information into the novel, he is frequently forced to construct irrelevant sub-plots or to break the flow of the narrative for a lecture on such things as the safety records of commercial airlines or the pressures suffered by airtraffic controllers. To manage all his characters, he is forced into a ''holding pattern'' of his own. The focus of the novel shifts from one character to another as Hailey abandons characters temporarily only to return to them later when their number in the rotation comes up again. Consequently what unity there is in the book is provided only by the subject matter. The characters themselves are paper thin, reduced to simple dimensions; they are so typical that they could be interchanged from one novel to the next with little difficulty.

Wheels is much like Airport in its intention and its execution. The main difference is its lack of dramatic suspense; there is less drama to be derived from the introduction of a new car, the primary plot device in the novel, than from the naturally more exciting subjects of the earlier novels.

With Detective, Hailey made it clear that he still possessed the skills that had made him a bestselling author in preceding decades. The novel also showed that Hailey had changed with the times, departing from aspects of his established formula to delve into a serial-killer story of the type popularized by Thomas Harris and many others. Like Harris, Hailey purports to take readers into the mind of a killer, in this case Elroy "Animal" Doil, convicted of killing numerous elderly couples in south Florida. The true protagonist is a considerably more sympathetic figure, former priest Malcolm Ainsley, now serving as a homicide investigator with the Miami police. Ainsley's quest is personal as well as professional, since he is certain that Doil's victims include the parents of his former lover Cynthia Ernst—but Doil, with no apparent reason to lie, insists that this is not true. Revealing himself as a master of suspense, Hailey manages to reveal the true killer's identity long before the novel's denouement, yet still keeps readers engaged.

-David Geherin

HALEY, Russell

Nationality: New Zealander (originally English: immigrated to Australia, 1961, then to New Zealand, 1966). Born: Dewsbury, England, 1934. Education: University of Auckland, M.A. in English, 1970. Address: c/o Viking Penguin, 375 Hudson St., New York, New York 10014, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Settlement. Auckland and London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1986.Beside Myself. Auckland and New York, Penguin, 1990.All Done with Mirrors. Christchurch, New Zealand, Hazard Press Publishers, 1999.

Short Stories

The Sauna Bath Mysteries and Other Stories. Auckland, Mandrake Root, 1978.

Real Illusions: A Selection of Family Lies and Biographical Fictions in Which the Ancestral Dead Also Play Their Part. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1984; New York, New Directions, 1985.

The Transfer Station. N.p., 1989.

Poetry

The Walled Garden. Auckland, Mandrake Root, 1972.
On the Fault Line and Other Poems. Paraparaumu, New Zealand, Hawk Press, 1977.

Other

Haley: A New Zealand Artist. Auckland, Hodder and Stoughton, 1989.

Editor, with Susan Davis, The Penguin Book of Contemporary New Zealand Short Stories. Auckland and New York, Penguin, 1989.

* * *

The Sauna Bath Mysteries and Other Stories established Russell Haley's reputation as a pioneering writer of postmodernist experimental fiction with affinities with writers such as Nabakov, Beckett, John Barth, Robert Coover, and Thomas Pynchon. This has been confirmed in the achievement of his two novels, The Settlement and Beside Myself, and the series of interlinked stories that are collected in The Transfer Station. These extend the narrative strategies of his short stories, such as the classic "Barbados-A Love Story," into ambitious performances in which he collapses the boundaries between fiction and reality, overlapping dream, memory, and experience and undermining epistemological certainties. Such metafictional constructions do more than challenge the reader's ingenuity. Haley, who came to New Zealand from England in the 1960s, has masterminded the characteristic dilemmas of the hero who is displaced due to "migratio" and whose extreme self-consciousness as subject and paranoid distrust of the world transforms a condition of existential disease into an absurdist vision of life.

The Settlement, partly inspired by public conflict over the Springbok tour of New Zealand in 1981, leaves the reader with minimalized certainties. In The Settlement at Moorfields, identified first as a convalescent home and later as a mental asylum, in which the middle-aged hero, Walter Lemanby, finds himself after falling from his roof, images of menacing control abound-mysterious installations, searchlights, helicopters, curfews, nameless uniformed assailants. They point either to civil unrest or to the existence of a centralized, totalitarian state that represses the individual; they are reinforced in the plot in the sinister, masked figure of Dr. Grimshaw. Yet Haley draws attention to the fictionality of his omniscient hero by creating a narrative break after 50 pages in an italicized passage, implying that he is the "secret collaborator within this text" who "threw the stone" by creating its circumstances, and then he starts over again. This authorial self-consciousness is reminiscent of the challenge issued to the reader in "Barbados-A Love Story" as to who should throw the first stone, call the narrator's bluff, and so undermine the fictionality of his creation.

Haley's foregrounding of the process of writing through metafictional games that stress the artifice of illusion and the fictional nature of subjectivity, however, rarely lapses into linguistic solipsism. His narratorial self-consciousness is both artful and endearing. Walter's struggles to familiarize himself with an alien world, to reorder experience by labeling his landscape, are intensely personal if not moving. In Beside Myself, a sequence of unsettling experiences destabilize the hero's attempts to impose order on his life: A heady sexual encounter with a woman he meets at a party, followed by the revelation of his best friend's death, lead to comical yet painful struggles to understand himself. In these works lyrical moments appear sporadically, creating sudden shifts of tone.

In his more recent writing Haley gestures nostalgically toward values of longing, loss, and love. The nine linked stories in The Transfer Station, an extended meditation on the meaning of death, represent the aging protagonist's bereavement at the death of his wife. The nearby Transfer Station, a rubbish dump on the outskirts of Auckland that chews up detritus and waste, has a unifying function as a symbol of death in its most dehumanized form as a sought-after memorable extinction of life. This is articulated by the two teenage girls whom the narrator befriends briefly and whose memory becomes a preoccupation until he is able to reaffirm the value of his own life. Cumulatively these stories convey the impression of a mind in a state of psychological dislocation recovering its mental balance. The customary zaniness and humor of Haley's heroes, although functioning near the surface of the text, are partly displaced into the girls' vision of life as brief, juvenile, yet imaginatively enduring.

Just as patterns of displacement characterize Haley's fiction, so too does the antilinear, multidirectional narrative and an insistence on the fragmented and uncertainly known nature of reality as conveyed through language. In his novels and in stories such as "Looping the Loop," "Barbados—A Love Story," or "The Balkan Transformer," he uses fantasy, dream transformations, and the uncertainties of memory to present events as occurring in the context of the multiple possibilities of the narrator's mind. Yet he insists equally on the physical presence of the body—its inevitable habits of defecation, erection, eating, and sleeping—as a point of entry into the often comical collusion between his narrators' self-conscious subjectivity and the constraints imposed by physical existence.

Haley's innovative humor is most immediately accessible in his short stories, whereas his two novels explore more fully the tragicomic conditions of existential angst leading to an absurdist worldview; at his best he has produced some of the liveliest, most engaging postmodern fiction yet to have been written in New Zealand.

—Janet Wilson

HALL, James B(yron)

Nationality: American. Born: Midland, Ohio, 21 July 1918. Education: Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, 1938–39; University of Hawaii, Honolulu, 1938–40; University of Iowa, Iowa City, B.A. 1947, M.A. 1948, Ph.D. 1953; Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio, 1949. Military Service: United States Army, 1941–46. Family: Married Elizabeth Cushman in 1946; five children. Career: Writer-in-residence, Miami University, 1948–49; instructor, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, 1952–53; writer-in-residence, University of North Carolina, Greensville, 1954; assistant professor, 1954–57, associate professor, 1958-60, and professor of English, 1960-65, University of Oregon, Eugene; director of the Writing Center, and professor of English, University of California, Irvine, 1965-68. Since 1968, professor of literature, and Provost of College V. University of California, Santa Cruz. Writer-in-residence, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, Summer 1956; guest artist, Pacific Coast Festival of Art, Reed College, Portland, 1958; writer-in-residence, University of Colorado, Boulder, 1963. Co-founding editor, Northwest Review, Eugene, Oregon, 1957-60; founder and director, University of Oregon Summer Academy of Contemporary Arts, Eugene, 1959-64. Editorial consultant, Doubleday and Company, publishers (West Coast staff), 1960; cultural specialist, United States Department of State, Washington, 1964. Awards: Octave Thanet prize, 1950; Yaddo grant, 1952; Oregon Poetry prize, 1958; Chapelbrook fellowship, 1967; Institute of Creative Arts fellowship, 1967; Balch Fiction prize, 1967. Address: 1080 Patterson #901; Eugene, Oregon 97401, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Not by the Door. New York, Random House, 1954.

TNT for Two. New York, Ace, 1956.

Racers to the Sun. New York, Obolensky, 1960; London, Corgi, 1962.

Mayo Sergeant. New York, New American Library, 1967.

Short Stories

15 x 3, with Herbert Gold and R.V. Cassill. New York, New Directions, 1957.

Us He Devours. New York, New Directions, 1964.

The Short Hall: New and Collected Stories. Athens, Ohio University Press, 1980.

I Like It Better Now. Fayetteville, University of Arkansas Press, 1992.

Poetry

The Hunt Within. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1973.

Bereavements. Brownsville, Oregon, Story Line Press, 1991.

Other

The Art and Craft of the Short Story. Murphy, Oregon, Castle Peak Editions, 1994.

Editor, with Joseph Langland, The Short Story. New York, Macmillan, 1956.

Editor, The Realm of Fiction: 61 Short Stories. New York, McGraw Hill, 1965; revised edition, 1970, 1977.

Editor, with Barry Ulanov, Modern Culture and the Arts. New York, McGraw Hill, 1967; revised edition, 1972.

Editor, John Barleycorn: Alcoholic Memoirs, by Jack London. Santa Cruz, California, Western Tanager Press, 1981.

Editor, with Hotchkiss and Shears, Perspectives on William Everson. Blackfoot, Idaho, Castle Peak Editions, 1992.

*

James B. Hall comments:

Although the novels are interesting, the central significance of the work resides largely in the short stories; the poetry is various, and by intention ancillary to the prose.

The novels, short stories, and poetry are thematically interrelated. The reccurring motifs are the effects of competition on individuals in a system of modified capitalism such as obtains in the United States. Thus acquisitive, frustrated, evasive protagonists reccur, some of them mad or nearly so. Extreme conduct in a hostile world is not infrequent; the adjustments which protagonists make vary from callous acceptance or the exploitation of others to withdrawal, revenge, and self-destruction. In general, the work shows the difficulty of remaining human in a competitive, non-Darwinian world fashioned in large part by a democratic society. Specifically, Racers to the Sun traces the "rise" and fall of a motorcycle racer who builds his own machine; the hero is injured (used up), and then is dropped by those who exploited his talent for machinery and speed. Likewise, in the typical short stories, "Us He Devours" and "The Claims Artist," the protagonists are in some ways laudable, but in the end are victims of their own and of society's demands. A typical poem, "Pay Day Night," treats the counterproductive nature of experience in another bureaucracy, the Army.

The short stories are experimental, highly compressed, and exploit language poetically for artistic effect. They are condensed statements that very often extend the possibilities of the genre. Many of the stories are anthologized; because they are complex they apparently "teach well" in classrooms.

(1995) Increasingly the short forms of imaginative writing claim most of my attention: the short story, poetry, nonfiction articles. This comes as no surprise for increasingly the literary artist under (finance) capitalism has the obligation to justify corporate investment, and the long forms, such as the novel, presently require greater sponsorship by the publisher and more author-time dedicated to promotion(s) of the work. This drift has evident impact on modernist (and post-modernist) work and is suggested merely as ways the writer's "work place" has changed in the past twenty years. No practicing writer may claim exemption therefrom; nevertheless, work of high literary quality does get written, published, and read. The new writer, I think, faces the greatest challenges for, among other things, the institutions which once offered some order of literary apprenticeship now offer too early specialization from which there seems no rise and no return.

* * *

James B. Hall is of that generation of writers who hit the beaches of American literature following World War II. Like Mailer and Vonnegut, Hall is a veteran. Unlike them, however, he did not write a war novel and get a literary Purple Heart. His medals are yet in the drawer. Along with having grown up on a farm, his military experiences are significant to an understanding of his social vision, and to the imagery and tropes in many of the short stories, especially "The Snow Hunter," "The Rumor of Metal," and "The War in the Forest," (in I Like It Better Now).

The three stories mentioned above are also typical of the way Hall works. They are compressed and complex, very close to poetry. The imagery is both precise and evocative; scenic and narrative paragraphs are modulated; the swift and brief dialogue often in counterpoint to the description elements. Character in Hall's stories and novels develops within a particular phenomenological environment. In other words, character is what character does in the world.

Here is a passage from Hall's second novel, Racers to the Sun. Though of course he doesn't know it, Harold "Speedy" Hill is about to enter his last race. The way that Speedy sees the arriving motorcycles is at the same time beautiful and threatening:

Delicate, the red, black, and sun-burst orange racing machines reared imperceptibly as their trailers stopped. They were vicious and lovely, imperious and chaste in orange or bone-white paint, the waspish handle bars curved downward over the front wheels, the magnetoes humped, fetal-like, in the coarse belly of the engine.

In Not by the Door, Hall has already discovered how to use scene to flesh out character. The Reverend Howard Marcham, an Episcopal minister in his first pastorate, has gotten himself into somewhat of a moral pickle. He decides to take a drive in the country, parks his car and goes for a walk. He comes upon a water moccasin sleeping on a willow branch. The snake has recently shed its skin. Hall makes the most of the biblical and mythological reference to sin, evil and rebirth. But he does it subtly, by scenic description. As a reader one "gets it" as an after-image. By this method of writing, Hall is very much a poet. The prose fiction is as burnished as a Spenserian stanza. In Hall's case, the genre boundaries among lyric, short story, and novel dissolve, and this in particular makes him a singular voice in contemporary fiction.

The Reverend Marcham is also typical of many of Hall's male characters. Very often the personae suggest some aspect of the author as self-critical. Unlike Hall, brought up Methodist, Howard Marcham is already a notch up, because he is an Episcopalian. Hall's protagonists fight to get ahead in the social world: fight for control of a motorcycle, a race, a yacht, a woman, real estate, or money; attempt to put a rein on personal anarchy but often end up in self-destruction. Howard Marcham is a pastor without spiritual depth, and he lacks a feeling for community. The reverend also prefigures Mayo Sergeant, an even emptier and more venal person.

We get to the last novel, with its much darker and sardonic social canvas, by way of Racers to the Sun. It is in the second novel that Hall begins to strike the note of class conflict and of the brutal nature of capitalism. Harold "Speedy" Hill and his boss, Jeffcoat, at the novel's beginning, are two of Hall's most sympathetic male characters. The author's rural upbringing, and his stint as a labor officer on the German docks during the occupation, are obviously influences on his social point of view. Hall favors the rural and urban working classes, those who try to make an honest living with their hands. No other prose writer writes so lovingly of tools and machinery as Hall in Racers to the Sun.

Generally, the female characters in his fiction come off better than the males. Lucern "Gunner" Greener in the racing novel is an exception. The daughter of a motorcycle agency owner, she gives herself to the winners. As soon as Hill is injured, she leaves him flat out. Gunner is a sexual metaphor for a system that uses people for its own needs and then dumps them. The motorcycle agency and the racing track owners drop the hero, too, when they can no longer profit from his status as a winner.

Whereas the system uses Speedy Hill, Mayo Sergeant uses women and the sleight-of-hand world of real estate as he glad-hands and charms and screws his way up the social ladder in Cutlass Bay, until he moves into the Moorish house on the hill and takes part possession of the racing yacht, Indus. The novel is narrated by Roberte "Bombie" Glouster, who lost his foot in World War II. Glouster represents "old money" in Cutlass Bay, and is in love with the very wealthy Hildy Moorish himself. At first Roberte befriends Mayo, who arrives from nowhere; but then he is taken in by Mayo and cuckolded as well. There is something of both Gatsby and Willy Loman in Mayo Sergeant, but Hall's novel perhaps surpasses the other two works in its savage judgment of the way we live. Hall's vision is indeed Dantean here, Hall's own version of Hell. There is not one likeable character in Mayo Sergeant, either male or female. But the novel should be reissued, for it contains some of the finest prose in American fiction today. And if the portrait of America is an unlikeable one, that is Hall's very point.

—Bill Witherup

HALL, Rodney

Nationality: Australian. Born: Solihull, Warwickshire, England, 18 November 1935; immigrated to Australia during his childhood. Education: City of Bath Boys' School; Brisbane Boys' College; University of Queensland, Brisbane, B.A. 1971. Family: Married Maureen Elizabeth MacPhail in 1962; three daughters. Career: Freelance scriptwriter and actor, 1957–67, and film critic, 1966–67, Australian Broadcasting Corporation, Brisbane. Tutor, New England University School of Music, Armidale, New South Wales, summers 1967–71 and 1977–80; youth officer, Australian Council for the Arts, 1971–73; lecturer in recorder, Canberra School of Music, 1979–83. Since 1962 advisory editor, Overland magazine, Melbourne; since 1967 poetry editor, The Australian daily newspaper, Sydney. Traveled in Europe, 1958–60, 1963–64, 1965, and the United States, 1974. Australian Department of Foreign Affairs Lecturer in India, 1970, 1981, Malaysia, 1972, 1980, and Europe, 1981, 1983, 1984. Awards: Australian National University Creative Arts fellowship, Canberra, 1968; Commonwealth Literary Fund fellowship, 1970; Literature Board fellowship, 1973, 1976, 1982, 1986, 1990; Grace Leven prize, 1974; Miles Franklin award, Australian Natives Association award, and Barbara Ramsden award, all 1982, all for Just Relations; Victorian Premier's literary award, 1989, for Captivity Captive. Address: c/o Penguin Books, P.O. Box 257, Ringwood, Victoria 3134, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Ship on the Coin: A Fable of the Bourgeoisie. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1972.

A Place Among People. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1975.

Just Relations. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1982; London, Allen Lane, and New York, Viking Press, 1983.

Kisses of the Enemy. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1987; New York, Farrar Straus, 1988; London, Faber, 1989.

Captivity Captive. Melbourne, McPhee Gribble, New York, Farrar Straus, and London, Faber, 1988.

The Second Bridegroom. Ringwood, Victoria, McPhee Gribble, and London, Faber, 1991.

The Grisly Wife. Sydney, Macmillan, and London, Faber, 1993. A Dream More Luminous than Love: The Yandilli Trilogy. Sydney, Picador Australia, 1994; New York, Noonday Press, 1995.

Poetry

Penniless till Doomsday. London, Outposts, 1962.

Four Poets, with others. Melbourne, Cheshire, 1962.

Forty Beads on a Hangman's Rope: Fragments of Memory. Newnham, Tasmania, Wattle Grove Press, 1963.

Eyewitness. Sydney, South Head Press, 1967.

The Autobiography of a Gorgon. Melbourne, Cheshire, 1968.

The Law of Karma: A Progression of Poems. Canberra, Australian National University Press, 1968.

Heaven, In a Way. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1970.A Soapbox Omnibus. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1973

Selected Poems. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1975.Black Bagatelles. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1978.The Most Beautiful World: Fictions and Sermons. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1981.

Recordings: Romulus and Remus, University of Queensland Press, 1971

Other

Social Services and the Aborigines, with Shirley Andrews. Canberra, Federal Council for Aboriginal Advancement, 1963.

Focus on Andrew Sibley. Brisbane, University of Queensland Press, 1968.

J.S. Manifold: An Introduction to the Man and His Work. Brisbane, University of Queensland Press, 1978.

Australia, Image of a Nation, 1850–1950, with David Moore. Sydney, Collins, 1983.

Journey Through Australia. Richmond, Victoria, Heinemann, and London, Murray, 1989; as Home, A Journey through Australia. Port Melbourne, Minerva, 1990.

The Writer and the World of the Imagination. Armidale, New South Wales, Faculty of Arts, University of New England, 1995.

Editor, with Thomas W. Shapcott, New Impulses in Australian Poetry. Brisbane, University of Queensland Press, 1968.

Editor, Australian Poetry 1970. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1970.Editor, Poems from Prison. Brisbane, University of Queensland Press, 1973.

Editor, Australians Aware: Poems and Paintings. Sydney, Ure Smith, 1975.

Editor, Voyage into Solitude, by Michael Dransfield. Brisbane, University of Queensland Press, 1978.

Editor, The Second Month of Spring, by Michael Dransfield. Brisbane, University of Queensland Press, 1980.

Editor, The Collins Book of Australian Poetry. Sydney, Collins, 1981; London, Collins, 1983.

Editor, Collected Poems by Michael Dransfield. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1987.

* * *

One of Australia's most prolific writers, Rodney Hall established his reputation first as a poet before turning to fiction. His early novelistic ventures were less than successful. The Ship on the Coin is a rather heavy-handed satire based on the "Creosus" travel agency, which rebuilds a quinquereme and invites customers to row their own ship for a holiday. The scheme is wildly successful but the allegory concerning voluntary subservience to the United States ("Buy your way into slavery now") seems somewhat dated today and the comedy is very broad. A Place Among People is a more sensitively written novel about a small town just out of Brisbane called Battery Spit. Set in the 1950s, a period where bigotries and conformist attitudes are skillfully conveyed, it concerns the nonconformist (intellectual, aboriginal) Collocott who is persecuted by the townspeople. The central incident involves the town's attempt to drive a black woman, Daisy Daisy, out of their midst and onto a reservation the blacks call Prison Island and Collocott's stubborn defiance of them in defense of her. However, it is relatively benign and even optimistic in many of its views. When it finally comes to the crunch only eleven of the townspeople actually turn up outside Collocott's house to force him to release Daisy, and others among them come unexpectedly to his aid. Many of the characters achieve minor victories over their own lesser instincts, and of the unorthodox hero Collocott the novel concludes, "He wavered on the brink of life." Occasional obscurities aside, A Place Among People is an intelligent and graceful novel.

Hall established his reputation, however, with his third novel, Just Relations. A long, complex, and sometimes overwritten book, it is set in the ironically named Whitey's Fall, a declining former gold town peopled by a set of aging eccentrics, whose only religion is "Remembering." There is Felicia Brinsmead, a seventy-three-yearold spinster who has never had her hair cut so that it hangs over her like a huge, dirty web and who believes that she is the mother of a twelve-year-old boy, Fido. There is the narcissistic Mr. Ping, who willfully destroys his fading beauty. There is the spirit of Kel McAlon, who has killed himself. In the local pub a group of people are sitting around drinking; they are aged between eighty and 114. Into this community comes beautiful thirty-four-year-old Vivien Lang, with whom the teenager Billy Swan falls in love, to the scandal of some of the town. To it also comes Senator Frank Halloran to inform the community that a highway is being built through to bring the town to life. All but one of the forty-nine residents are outraged. Their creed is summed up by Uncle, Billy's grandfather, who proudly lists the examples of "progress" that he has opposed—hospital, old people's home, police station, jail, school, highways, and the draft. Hall seems to intend the community to be a paradigm of a dying Australia that he sees as infinitely superior to the current one. The book is unnecessarily long and the writing often clumsy, particularly in any of the scenes to do with sex: "Her fingers fluttered round him, giant butterflies afraid to alight but fatally attracted by the honey hidden in him." The presence of Patrick White is felt at times in the deliberately dissonant rhythms of the prose, and there is a positive smorgasbord of techniques brought to bear as the novel moves between past and present, employing all kinds of texts—diaries, newspaper reports, letters—to illuminate the theme. Nevertheless, the conception is original and eventually the novel gains conviction, particularly through the beautifully realized figures of the women and its fine treatment of landscape.

In Kisses of the Enemy, Hall returns to political satire with a novel set in the near future. Australia has become a republic under the leadership of Bernard Buchanan, who represents the multinational Interim Freeholdings Incorporated of Delaware; Buchanan, in fact, is really the front man for the company's Luigi Squarcia and Australia is rapidly becoming the puppet state of the United States. Hall manages to draw this parable out to over 600 pages, but though the object of the satire is legitimate enough, the novel rarely comes to life and the jokes are even more labored than in The Ship on the Coin. For instance, Buchanan is very fat at the start of the novel, with two men carrying him around; at the height of his power the retinue has grown to eight and still later, when his power begins to decline, he simultaneously begins to lose weight. The very topicality of the satire ensures that the jokes become dated.

Just Relations apart, Hall's major novelistic achievement to date is found in his three most recent novels, Captivity Captive (published in 1988 but set in 1888), The Second Bridegroom (1991, 1836), and The Grisly Wife (1993, 1898). Hall has finally drawn these together as a trilogy under the title A Dream More Luminous than Love, or the Yandilli trilogy. According to the author, the first volume grew out of the Gatton murders, the macabre killing of three siblings in New South Wales in 1898. Then, according to an interview he gave, "Hall began working on an earlier setting and then realized that, ideally, there should be an even earlier novel, introducing the theme of the white presence and—almost immutably—that of the Aborigines." The Grisly Wife is the middle novel in terms of chronology and the only one to have a woman as its narrator, though all three are monologues. Hall explained, "In the two outside books I had two male voices, a pagan outcast from the Isle of Man and a working-class Catholic. Symmetry required me to have the voice of a Protestant middle-class woman." All three books have the same setting, the backwoods of south coastal New South Wales, where Hall himself now lives and which critics frequently compare to William Faulkner's Yoknapatawpha County as an example of a novelist creating his own fictive territory. All three are monologues spoke in an almost unnaturally eloquent, even poetic voice, though Hall has gone out of his way to anticipate this objection by giving each of his narrators a background of literacy. The convict forger in The Second Bridegroom learned about words from his mother and how to use them from his trade as a printer. Catherine Byrne, the eponymous wife, is the daughter of an Anglican clergyman. And Patrick Malone was the one child (of ten) chosen by his brutal father to be educated outside the closed family by a learned old Catholic priest.

The Second Bridegroom is the story of an unnamed youth told (we eventually learn) to the widow of his master with whom he has fallen blindly in love and who he wrongly believes to have at least some sympathy for him. Transported to Australia in the "Fraternity" for the forgery of a fifteenth-century document, he is manacled to Gabriel Dean, whose mistreatment of him drives him to strangle the man. He then escapes into the bush and joins a tribe of Aborigines who make him their king. When the tribe attack a settlement, killing a young woman and then most of the rest of the settlers and setting fire to their property, the narrator takes the guilt upon himself as having somehow willed it: "The truth was this, that while the Men knew no word of my language they must have known my thoughts. So, they had felt my fury and sensed my need. They had obeyed. I had given orders as sure as if I spoke them."

Although the Aborigines are not individualized and the narrator never learns even a single word of their language, their mode of life is shown to be inherently superior to that of the whites. The narrator quickly adjusts to their ways of thinking. When he comes upon a white settlement after a few months in the wilderness he speaks of their efforts to "tame" and fence the land in horrified terms of "the sheer scale of violence." He notes the Aborigines' generosity and selflessness toward himself, their patience with his clumsiness, and their refusal to steal more food than they need. The theme of the novel is perhaps best summed up in one of the narrator's many bouts of sententiousness: "I want you to understand that there is something to be understood out there, something free of the law, free of any comforting faith in a God whose motives may be explained through our own, something that has to become the map of my heart."

The Grisly Wife is a monologue delivered by Catherine Byrne before a silent audience, which we discover only at the end to be a sergeant who has come to inquire about the murder of the three Malone siblings, her neighbors and the subject of Captivity Captive. We learn also that Catherine believes he is inquiring about a different murder, that of the unnamed narrator of The Second Bridegroom. The year is 1898 and not the least of Hall's concerns is the intrusion of the secular and scientific world upon the kind of messianic faith inspired in Catherine and her female friends by the charismatic preacher Muley Moloch. There is mention of Charles Darwin, for instance, of Richard Wagner as some kind of herald of a new age, and of new scientific phenomena such as cameras, lawnmowers, and steam trains. Muley marries Catherine after she has been impressed by his apparent feat of levitation and then persuades a group of eight women to sail with him to Australia and found a new community on the south coast of New South Wales, christening them the Household of Hidden Stars. One by one the women die of consumption at the mission they establish, as the prophet's hold on them diminishes. Eventually the survivors kick him out after he shoots and kills a wild white man (the escaped convict).

This is an almost ostentatiously feminist novel, as The Second Bridegroom concerns itself conspicuously with environmental issues. A sense of close camaraderie grows among the women, especially after they dismiss Muley, and extends eventually to a close friendship between Catherine and Louisa Theuerkauf, the woman she had once hated. Protests against male authority keep emerging in the text, particularly in Catherine's constant reproaches of Sergeant Arrell, her silent audience. "Tenderness grows among us," we are told of the women, and they embrace frequently.

In Captivity Captive, Barney Barnett, the unsuccessful suitor of one of the girls shot and clubbed to death on a remote New South Wales farm, has confessed to the crime on his deathbed, but it soon becomes clear that his claim is merely a piece of retrospective self-aggrandizement. One of the surviving siblings sets out to tell the story of what actually happened. It does not take the reader too long to find out who the actual killer is, but the question of why remains almost as much of an enigma at the end as at the beginning. In a prose that is in turn poetic, highly self-conscious, rhetorical, and obsessive, Hall explores the relationship between guilt and innocence, captive and tyrant.

For all its occasional stylistic excesses, the trilogy is an impressive attempt to reexplore and rewrite white Australian history. One of the key themes in all three novels is the sense that the land was not empty but was seized by white people; hence the constant presence of the Aborigines, seen as ghosts or demons by the whites, hovering constantly around the outskirts of the narratives, their presence both a threat and an admonishment to the whites: "They were briefly there and soon gone but it was evident to me that they knew more than we had ever believed possible," Catherine says in The Grisly Wife. One critic has gone so far as to suggest that "Each of these characters attempts to live and reenact a myth, to take on some self-imposed mantle of immortality: the Second Bridegroom, the Second Coming or the Second Fall from Grace. Each fails."

HALLIGAN, Marion

Nationality: Australian. Born: Marion Mildred Crothall, Newcastle, New South Wales, 16 April 1940. Education: University College, 1957-62, B.A.(honours) in education 1962. Family: Married Graham James Halligan in 1963; one daughter and one son. Career: Teacher, Canberra High School, Australian Capital Territory, 1963-65, Canberra Church of England Girls' Grammar School, 1974-86. Since 1993, chair of literature, Board of Australia Council. Writer-inresidence, Charles Stuart University, Riverina, 1990. Awards: Patricia Hackett prize for best creative contribution to Westerly, 1985; Butterly/Earla Hooper award, for short story; Steele Rudd award, 1989, and Braille book of the year, 1989, for The Living Hothouse; Geraldine Pascall award, 1990, for critical writing; Australia/New Zealand Exchange, 1991; Keesing Studio Cite Internationale des Arts, Paris, 1991; Award for Gastronomic writing, 1991, for Eat My Words; Age book of the year, 1992, ACT book of the year, 1993, 3M talking book of the year, 1993, and Nita B. Kibble award, 1994, for Lovers' Knots; The Newton-John award, 1994. Agent: Margaret Connolly, 37 Ormond Street, Paddington, New South Wales 2021, Australia. Address: 6 Caldwell Street, Hackett, Australian Capital Territory 2602, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Self Possession. Brisbane, University of Queensland Press, 1987. The Hanged Man in the Garden. Melbourne, Penguin, 1989.

Spider Cup. Melbourne, Penguin, 1990.

Lovers' Knots. Melbourne, Heinemann, 1992; London, Minerva, 1995.

Wishbone. Melbourne, Heinemann, 1994.

Cockles of the Heart. Port Melbourne, Australia, Minerva, 1996. The Golden Dress. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1999.

Short Stories

The Living Hothouse. Brisbane, University of Queensland Press, 1988

The Worry Box. Melbourne, Heinemann, 1993.

Collected Stories. St. Lucia, Queensland, University of Queensland Press, 1997.

Plays

Gastronomica (produced Melbourne Festival, 1994).

Other

Out of the Picture. Canberra, National Library of Australia, 1990. Eat My Words. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1990.

Editor, with Rosanne Fitzgibbon, The Gift of Story: Three Decades of UQP Short Stories. St. Lucia, Queensland, University of Queensland Press, 1998; Portland, Oregon, International Specialized Book Services, 1998.

-Laurie Clancy

Manuscript Collections: National Library of Australia, Canberra.

Marion Halligan comments:

I am interested in words and stories. I think that when you find the words you find out what it is you want to say. Stories are what people are good at, both telling them and listening to them. In both fiction and non-fiction story-telling is important, though it may not always be simple; sometimes narratives are hidden.

Looking back over my writing I realise it is often about choice and chance, though I don't start with these notions. And I write about ordinary lives, and how amazing they are.

* * *

Marion Halligan's fiction moves through daily life to its structuring fantasies, personal and cultural. Her narratives of "what if" interrupt routine: Beyond the ordinary, other worlds beckon. At the beginning of "The Orangery," found in her third collection of short stories, The Worry Box, a woman sits on a train reading. From the seat opposite a stranger breaks into her containment. Lift your eyes, he admonishes her. The world is there to see. Get off at the next stop and visit the stationmaster's orangery. When the train halts, she looks out the window at orange trees covered with flower and fruit and, yielding to a sudden desire to breathe the sharp scented air of orange blossom, she puts down her book and follows the man. Suddenly the narrative, moving along a trajectory of erotic seduction, veers off into death. Anticipating elegance and artifice, the woman encounters explosion, a bomb blast, bodies in bits. What was she doing there? Did she choose, or was she lured? Where were the meanings for this violent intrusion?

Questions like these have disturbed Halligan's writing since she began publishing seriously in 1981. She is a writer of unease and yet a celebrator of story and the senses. In less than ten years she has become one of Australia's best-known writers, highly regarded for her work across an unusual range of forms. Her short stories, which have won many prizes, appear in literary and mainstream magazines, are read on national radio, and are frequently anthologized. The first collection, The Living Hothouse, with its stories set in Australia, New Zealand, and France, won the Steele Rudd Award and the Braille Book of the Year Award. Since that initial book, she has published over six years two more collections of short fiction, four novels, and a work of nonfiction. Her most ambitious novel to date, Lovers' Knots, won the Age Book of the Year Award. Set in the coastal town of Newcastle, where Halligan grew up and went to university, the novel begins as if it were a family saga covering the century 1911–2011, but its narrative denies the conventional chronology evoked and shatters into the fragments caught by photographs.

Halligan is fascinated by story and, refusing as she does the borders of telling, her narratives surface in unexpected places. She has written the libretto for a children's opera, a trilogy of plays for the Melbourne Theater Company, and the narratives to accompany photographs in Out of the Picture, commissioned by the National Library of Australia. Above all, however, she is admired for writing food. Food and story, she has said, are the most important things in life. Together they are irresistibly seductive. We cannot live without them. Probably her work of widest appeal is Eat My Words (winner of the Prize for Gastronomic Writing), a book of food and story set largely in France and loosely structured as autobiography. Its sequel, A Second Helping (forthcoming) will within a framework of travel through France offer readers another helping of words. Metaphor and reality took a new twist in Halligan's œuvre during 1994 when the patrons dining in five opulent 19th-century restaurants in Melbourne ate their way through menus specially devised as accompaniments for theater pieces performed between courses. Each of Halligan's five "Gastronomicas," commissioned by the Melbourne International Festival, was created for the particular eating space and drew for its stories on writers like Dickens and Wilde selected as fitting that restaurant. Diners ate the highest of cuisine amid the best of story.

Such pampering of desire takes strange twists in Halligan's most recent novel, Wishbone. Like the fairy tales where wishes come true to the considerable consternation of those careless with words, the wealthy characters in this fable of contemporary Australia find themselves swept up in narratives of murder, sex, and intrigue they never anticipated in their wishing. In the materialistic culture imagined, the opportunities for pleasures and indulgence abound, but no narrative of desire is genuinely to be wished. This novel has received little of the critical praise accorded Lovers' Knots. Perhaps those who delighted in the humor, warmth, and poignancy of the preceding novel are uncomfortable with the wicked wit and uncompromising satire of Wishbone. Gender may play its part. Although women writers in Australia have incorporated the satiric moment into their fiction, the sustained narratives of satire have belonged predominantly to men (such as Patrick White, Frank Moorhouse, and Morris Lurie). Marion Halligan is praised for writing the meals set on Australian tables; making a meal of Australia may be another matter, may be unbecoming in a woman writer. If the cultural cringe is gone from Australian readers, the gender cringe still seems to linger.

-Lucy Frost

HAMILTON, Hugo

Nationality: Irish. Born: Hugo O'Urmoltaigh in Dublin, Ireland, 28 January 1953. Career: Worked in the music business; freelance journalist, Dublin. Lives in County Dublin, Ireland. Awards: Rooney prize for Irish Literature, 1992. Agent: Derek Johns, 20 John Street, London WC1N 2DR, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Surrogate City. London, Faber and Faber, 1990.

The Last Shot. London, Faber and Faber, 1991; New York, Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 1992.

The Love Test. London, Faber and Faber, 1995; Boston, Faber and Faber, 1995.

Dublin Where the Palm Trees Grow. London, Faber and Faber, 1996. Headbanger. London, Secker & Warburg, 1996.

Sad Bastard. London, Secker & Warburg, 1998.

Other

Finbar's Hotel (serial novel, with others), devised and edited by Dermot Bolger. London, Picador, 1997.

* * *

Hugo Hamilton was born in 1953 of Irish-German parentage. He grew up with three languages—Irish, English, and German—and his fiction often works to suture these cultures into points of intersection. In particular, Hamilton is concerned both to make sense of the collapse of Communism in Eastern Europe, as epitomized by the fall of the Berlin Wall, and to understand the "New Ireland" and the cultural meanings of its trading outsider status for inclusion in the global marketplace.

In his novel The Last Shot, Hamilton takes on the final days of the Nazi regime and interweaves their chaos with a parallel narrative of the collapse of the Berlin Wall in 1989 and the promise of German reunification. The first narrative thread, set in 1945, centers around Franz Kern, a radio technician for the Wehrmacht, and Bertha Sommer, a civil secretary, who had been stationed in Laun, Czechoslovakia, and are fleeing after the surrender to return to Germany. The second plot line is related in the first person by an unnamed American who finds himself inexplicably drawn to Germany. Foregoing matriculation at an American university, he opts to study in Dusseldorf, where he begins an affair with a young German woman, which continues after she marries another man and bears a child with Down's syndrome. In an act eerily reminiscent of Nazi eliminations, the narrator, his mistress, and her husband eventually collaborate, "in an act of mercy," to cut short the child's agony when he develops leukemia. Hamilton braids these two narratives together with an oedipal quest, as it becomes plain that the American narrator is in fact the son of Bertha Sommer and that his obsession is to locate the precise day, indeed hour, of the Wehrmacht's withdrawal from Czechoslovakia. Like so much contemporary German fiction, Hamilton's novel takes care to complexify each character, refusing to give anyone a free and clear conscience and to suggest that, as a moral figure, Germany signifies "something that everybody secretly wants and openly denies.'

Hamilton also explores the years immediately following the fall of the Wall in The Love Test, but here he adds a specifically Irish contrast, as a cynical West German woman takes as her lover a hapless Irishman onto whom she projects the seductive scent of Otherness. By juxtaposing Continental affluence, jadedness, and spiritual emptiness with this Irish Otherness, Hamilton suggests that cultural identity is a play of signifiers that both glamorizes and subjugates the subaltern.

In his more recent novels, Hamilton ventures into detective fiction and, at the same time, undertakes close, if sarcastic, scrutiny of modern Ireland, whose biggest growth industry is crime. In Sad Bastard, the sequel to Hamilton's Headbanger, Dublin Garda (that is, policeman) Pat Coyne enters psychotherapy and therein encounters what he calls "cartoon psychology," familiar to critics of self-help culture as platitudes masquerading as wisdom. In the tradition of hard-boiled detectives, as crafted by writers like Raymond Chandler, Coyne is full of pithy one-liners, and the Coyne novels succeed most as black comedy.

-Michele S. Shauf

HAMILTON, Jane

Nationality: American. Born: Oak Park, Illinois, 13 July 1957. Education: Carleton College, B.A. 1979. Family: Married Robert Willard in 1982; two children. Career: Apple farmer, 1979—; freelance writer, 1982—. Lives in Rochester, Wisconsin. Awards: Ernest Hemingway Foundation award (PEN American Center), 1989. Agent: c/o Doubleday Publishers, 1540 Broadway, New York, New York 10036, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Book of Ruth. New York, Ticknor & Fields, 1988; published in England as The Frogs Are Still Singing, London, Collins, 1989.A Map of the World. New York, Doubleday, 1994.

The Short History of a Prince: A Novel. New York, Random House, 1998.

Disobedience: A Novel. New York, Doubleday, 2000.

* * *

Jane Hamilton is a best-selling author whose novels deal primarily with the varieties of pain. She gives voice to exceptionally dimensional characters, and renders ordinary and extreme hardship alike with a moving and wholesome realism.

In 1982, on her way to the promise of a job in the New York publishing industry, Hamilton stopped off in rural Wisconsin where she has remained. Her plots grow out of this environment—unremarkable and yet, like every place with human entanglements, extraordinary in every way. Hamilton has described herself as "an anthropologist in a foreign country," and her novels are studies of emotional territory.

In her first novel, The Book of Ruth, Hamilton maps the dreary life of the emotionally abused Ruth Grey, who, like all of her protagonists, searches for meaning in an apparently irrational universe. What distinguishes Hamilton's fiction from other novelists who examine this kind of existential pain, however, is the fact that her characters nonetheless manage to find meaning and grace—even eking out pleasure and a measure of pride. Ruth recounts her life in rural Illinois as a story about dignity, and Hamilton's attention to detail vivifies both Ruth's hardship and resilience. The novel received the 1989 PEN/Hemingway Foundation award for best new novel, and it was selected by Oprah Winfrey for her TV book club in 1996.

Hamilton's next book, A Map of the World, is also a domestic narrative set in the Midwest. Inspired by a drowning accident at her son's day-care center, Hamilton tells the story of Howard and Alice Goodheart who, the author suggests, are victims of the provincial prejudice that prevents people from embracing difference. The farming Goodhearts are received with a chill by their suburban neighbors, except for one friendly couple, Dan and Theresa Collins. When the youngest Collins child drowns in the Goodheart pond, Alice blames herself for the death. Then, later, she is accused by a boy of sexual abuse in her capacity as a part-time school nurse. The book has been praised for Hamilton's characterization of a broad range of characters—from women locked in jail to little children, each with a history—and for its belief that "a map of the world" is indeed possessable.

Hamilton continues this biographical approach to fiction in her third novel, The Short History of a Prince, which recounts the history of Walter McCloud, first as a young boy who loves Tchaikovsky and dreams of being a dancer, then as a homosexual teenager growing up in 1970s, and finally as a man returning home and confronting his memories of pain and loss. Once again, Hamilton's themes are family and friendship, cruelty and redemption, and yet in this novel she also considers the contours of artistic ambition and failure, as Walter must acknowledge the limits of his talent.

-Michele S. Shauf

HANLEY, Clifford (Leonard Clark)

Pseudonym: Henry Calvin. Nationality: British. Born: Glasgow, Scotland, 28 October 1922. Education: Eastbank School, Glasgow. Conscientious objector in World War II. Family: Married Anna E. Clark in 1948 (died 1990); one son and two daughters. Career: Reporter, Scottish Newspaper Services, Glasgow, 1940-45; subeditor, Scottish Daily Record, Glasgow, 1945-57; feature writer, TV Guide, Glasgow, 1957-58; director, Glasgow Films Ltd., 1957-63; columnist, Glasgow Evening Citizen, 1958-60; television critic, Spectator, London, 1963. Visiting professor, Glendon College, York University, Toronto, 1979-80. Awards: Oscar award, 1960, for Seawards the Great Ships. Member: Close Theatre Management Committee, Glasgow, 1965–71, Inland Waterways Council, 1967–71, and Scottish Arts Council, 1967-74; vice-president, 1966-73, and president, 1974-77, Scottish PEN; Scottish chairman, Writers Guild of Great Britain, 1968-73. Agent: Curtis Brown, 162-168 Regent Street, London W1R 5TB, England. Address: 35 Hamilton Drive, Glasgow G12 8DW, Scotland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Love from Everybody. London, Hutchinson, 1959; as Don't Bother to Knock, London, Digit, 1961.

The Taste of Too Much. London, Hutchinson, 1960.

Nothing But the Best. London, Hutchinson, 1964; as Second Time Round, Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1964.

The Hot Month. London, Hutchinson, and Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1967.

The Red-Haired Bitch. London, Hutchinson, and Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1969.

Prissy. London, Collins, 1978.

Another Street, Another Dance. Edinburgh, Mainstream, 1983; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1984.

Novels as Henry Calvin

The System. London, Hutchinson, 1962.

It's Different Abroad. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Harper, 1963.

The Italian Gadget. London, Hutchinson, 1966.

The DNA Business. London, Hutchinson, 1967.

A Nice Friendly Town. London, Hutchinson, 1967.

Miranda Must Die. London, Hutchinson, 1968; as Boka Lives, New York, Harper 1969.

The Chosen Instrument. London, Hutchinson, 1969.

The Poison Chasers. London, Hutchinson, 1971.

Take Two Popes. London, Hutchinson, 1972.

Plays

The Durable Element (produced Dundee, Scotland, 1961).

Saturmacnalia, music by Ian Gourlay (produced Glasgow, 1965).

Oh for an Island, music by Ian Gourlay (produced Glasgow, 1966).

Dick McWhittie, music by Ian Gourlay (produced Glasgow, 1967).

Jack o'the Cudgel (produced Perth, 1969).

Oh Glorious Inhiles, music by Ian Gourlay (produced Leeds, 1970).

Oh Glorious Jubilee, music by Ian Gourlay (produced Leeds, 1970). The Clyde Moralities (produced Glasgow, 1972).

Screenplays: Seawards the Great Ships, 1960; The Duna Bull, 1972.

Television Plays: Dear Boss, 1962; Down Memory Lane, 1971; Alas, Poor Derek, 1976.

Poetry

Rab Ha': The Glasgow Glutton. Glasgow, General District Libraries, 1989.

Other

Dancing in the Streets (autobiography). London, Hutchinson, 1958. A Skinful of Scotch (travel). London, Hutchinson, and Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1965.

Burns Country: The Travels of Robert Burns. Newport, Isle of Wight, Dixon, 1975.

The Unspeakable Scot. Edinburgh, Blackwood, 1977.

Poems of Ebenezer McIlwham. Edinburgh, Gordon Wright, 1978.

The Biggest Fish in the World (for children). Edinburgh, Chambers, 1979.

A Hypnotic Trance. Edinburgh, BBC Scotland, 1980.

The Scots. Newton Abbot, Devon, David and Charles, and New York, Times 1980

Another Street, Another Dance. Edinburgh, Mainstream, 1983.

Glasgow: A Celebration. Edinburgh, Mainstream, 1984.

The History of Scotland. London, Hamlyn, and New York, Gallery,

The Sheer Gall, with Willie Gall. Edinburgh, Mainstream, 1989. Gall in a Day's Work, with Willie Gall. Edinburgh, Mainstream, 1989.

*

Clifford Hanley comments:

(1972) Dancing in the Streets, my first published book, was written at the suggestion of my publisher, who wanted a book about the city of Glasgow. At the time I thought it a rather pedestrian recital of childhood memories and was taken aback by its critical and commercial success (it is still used as background reading in schools of social studies and urbanology). My first novel, Love from Everybody, written previously but published later, was frankly intended as a light entertainment, to make money, and was later filmed as Don't Bother to Knock. Having then retired from journalism, I wrote what I considered my first serious work, The Taste of Too Much, as a study of "ordinary" adolescence, without crime and adventitious excitement, and it may well be my most successful book in the sense of fully achieving the author's original conception. In the subsequent novels under my own name, I think my intention was to look at some areas of life—a businessman's troubles, the family situation, the agonies of work in the theater-simply in my own way, without reference to fashionable literary conceptions. I have often been surprised when people found the novels "funny" because their intention was serious; but an author can't help being what he is. I do see the human condition as tragic (since decay and death are the inevitable end), but I don't distinguish between comedy and tragedy. Funerals can be funny too, and life is noble and absurd at the same time. I also insist on distinguishing between seriousness and solemnity, which are opposite rather than similar. On looking back, I realize that the tone of the novels tends to be affirmation rather than despair. This may be a virtue or a fault, or an irrelevance—a novelist should probably leave such judgments to critics and simply get on with what he must do. Maybe they also betray some kind of moral standpoint of which I was unconscious. This was explicit, in fact, in my first professionally produced play, The Durable Element, which was a study of the recurrent urge to crucify prophets. It was also deliberate in The Chosen Instrument, a pseudonymous Henry Calvin ten years later, in which a contemporary thriller mode was used to do a sort of feasibility study on the New Testament mythology. (The intention was so well disguised that no critic noticed it).

But I suppose cheerfulness keeps breaking through. I am an entertainer as well as novelist, and the two may be compatible. My first commandment as a writer is not at all highfalutin. It is Thou Shalt Not Bore. A Skinful of Scotch is an irreverent guide to one man's Scotland and was written for fun. So, originally, were the Henry Calvin thrillers. I enjoy reading thrillers and I adopted the pen-name simply to feel uninhibited. The thriller too is a morality, but the morality is acceptable only if it has character and pace. These are not intellectual mysteries but tales of conflict between good and evil. My later work for the theater was exclusively devoted to calculated entertainment and I am glad that people were actually entertained. I find now that I see life in more somber terms, but whether this will show in future novels is hard to tell. It may even be a temporary condition.

(1991) Self-assessment has always struck me as a futile exercise, in the sense that we can study a bug through a microscope, but we can't study the microscope through itself. I wrote my novels for fun or from internal compulsion (the two are the same, maybe) but have always seen myself as an entertainer, so they were intended for the reader's fun, which could include laughter, fear, enlightenment, puzzlement, and any other response.

They are not bad, probably. I did feel I hit the target with The Taste of Too Much (a committee title I don't like too much) in picturing the pangs of teenage love. School pupils agreed, especially girls, and it seems nothing has changed in 30 years. Nothing But the Best was partly stolen from life, and when I myself was widowed in 1990 I was interested in how my own responses followed those of the hero. Another Street, Another Dance was compulsive. The heroine, Meg, came into my mind fully formed, I was back in the time and place of my autobiographical first book Dancing in the Streets. It went onto the typewriter at the rate of 4,000 to 7,000 words a day with no hesitation because Meg was in the room with me. A very strange experience.

The Henry Calvin thrillers were entirely for fun, and I can only hope readers have shared it. (Odd, how many Scottish writers have hidden under pseudonyms). Henry was my father's name, and I picked Calvin because in these light tales virtue would triumph over vice, and to hell with some of the grim realities.

Not sure if I'll produce any more. I am now lazy, and comfortably fixed—a serious disincentive to work. But I am being nagged by an idealistic young New Yorker on a voyage of discovery through working-class and academic Glasgow, and I fear I shall have to let him right into the brain to dictate his misadventures and revelations. He is taking over, and I mildly resent that, but life is real and life is earnest, and the gravy is our goal, still.

* * *

Humor is never far away from the prose writings of Clifford Hanley. Although it is not officially a work of fiction and is based largely on his childhood experiences, his autobiographical study Dancing in the Streets gives the best clue to his literary technique. Partly, its success was due to Hanley's ability to realize the sharp and witty cadences of Glasgow patois; partly, too, it was his by no means dispassionate discovery of objective gaiety in a city in which it is not a common commodity. But the main reason for the book's place as Hanley's seminal work was his ability to work himself and his own comic experiences into a punchy and furiously paced narrative. Thus, when he came to write his first novel, Love from Everybody, he not only confirmed his competence to write with wit and humor about people and places, but he also gave notice that in his future fiction his persona was never going to be far absent from his writing.

This gift is seen to good advantage in The Taste of Too Much, a sensitive study of adolescence clearly based not only on his own experiences in Glasgow but also on his observations of the lives of young people in the city during the late 1950s. (Hanley was then working as a journalist for a Glasgow newspaper). Once again, as in Dancing in the Streets, the central theme is of a clever boy who is about to make good in the world, but in this instance, Peter Haddow, the intelligent and sensitive teenager, has to come face-to-face with a reality that is not always comic. The pinpricks of parental coexistence, an exasperating older sister, a ghoulish younger one, and an outrageous Aunt Sarah make young Peter's life miserable at times, yet shining like a candle in a wicked world is the gleam of his first love for the fabulous Jean Pynne. Although lightly written, The Taste of Too Much perceptively records Peter Haddow's adolescent feelings, and its modern council-estate setting marks it as a precursor of the later Scottish school of proletarian romanticism.

In his subsequent novels it became obvious that although Hanley had not lost his comic touch he was striving too hard to achieve his humorous effects. The Red-Haired Bitch, with its promising plot combining historical romance and modern reality, is superficially treated, Hanley being unable to sustain the historical motif of Mary Queen of Scots and the realpolitik of Glasgow's gangland. An earlier novel, The Hot Month, suffered from similar flaws with Hanley treating the Scots Calvinist ethos in comic fashion before plunging on to an attempt at analysis.

Hanley found his touch again in Another Street, Another Dance which takes a panoramic view of Glasgow from the troubled years of the Depression and Red Clydeside to the events of World War II and the beginning of the end of the city's great industrial supremacy. Much of the action is seen through the eyes of the family of Meg Macrae, a young girl from the western islands of Scotland who has come to terms with the big city and all its associated problems. Through her we come face to face with the reality of spiritual and physical poverty, drunkenness, wretched housing conditions, bad schooling, and furtive sex. Her triumphant ability to rise above those problems and to overcome a series of harrowing domestic disasters without ever losing grasp of her essential femininity gives the book its main theme and provides the backbone to Hanley's narrative, yet it is his sure ear for Glasgow dialogue and his compassion for all of the characters—good and bad—which finally beguile the reader.

Hanley has also written several modest detective novels under the mischievous pseudonym of Henry Calvin; but he is at his most successful when he remains in Glasgow, a city which nourishes his fiction and provides him with a realistic backdrop, and whose people offer unfailingly witty patterns of speech.

-Trevor Royle

HANNAH, Barry

Nationality: American. Born: Meridian, Mississippi, 23 April 1942. Education: Mississippi College, Clinton, B.A. 1964; University of Arkansas, Fayetteville, M.A. 1966, M.F.A. 1967. Family: Divorced; three children. Career: Member of the Department of English, Clemson University, South Carolina, 1967–73; writer-in-residence, Middlebury College, Vermont, 1974–75; member of the Department of English, University of Alabama, University, 1975–80; writer for the director Robert Altman, Hollywood, 1980; writer-in-residence, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1981, University of Mississippi, Oxford, 1982, 1984, 1985, and University of Montana, Missoula, 1982–83. Awards: Bellaman Foundation award, 1970; Bread Loaf Writers Conference Atherton fellowship, 1971; Gingrich award (Esquire), 1978; American Academy award, 1979; Award in Fiction, Mississippi Institute of Arts and Letters, 1994. Address: c/o Houghton Mifflin Company, 2 Park St., Boston, Massachusetts 02108, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Geronimo Rex. New York, Viking Press, 1972.

Nightwatchmen. New York, Viking Press, 1973. Ray. New York, Knopf, 1980; London, Penguin, 1981.

The Tennis Handsome. New York, Knopf, 1983.

Power and Light. Winston-Salem, North Carolina, Palaemon Press, 1983

Hey Jack! New York, Dutton, 1987.

Boomerang. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1989.

Never Die. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1991.

High Lonesome. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1996.

Short Stories

Airships. New York, Knopf, 1978; London, Vintage, 1991.

Two Stories. Jackson, Mississippi, Nouveau Press, 1982.

Black Butterfly. Winston-Salem, North Carolina, Palaemon Press, 1982.

Captain Maximus. New York, Knopf, 1985.

Bats Out of Hell. Boston, Houghton Mifflin/Seymour Lawrence, 1993.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Sources Agree Rock Swoon Has No Past," in Harper's (New York), June 1986.

Other

In Honor of Oxford at One Hundred and Fifty. Grenada, Mississippi, Salt-works, 1987.

*

Critical Studies: Barry Hannah by Mark J. Charney, New York, Twayne, 1992; Barry Hannah: Postmodern Romantic. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1998.

* * *

Barry Hannah's favored form is the monologue, his subject matter the grotesqueries of American life. Hannah's work includes incidents of beheading, a car wreck in the upper branches of an oak tree, a man who saves himself from drowning by balancing on the tip of a car aerial, a walrus's sexual attack on a woman who is having an affair with her nephew, and a drowned man who jump starts himself using a bus battery. "But that's farfetched, and worse than that, poetic, requiring a willing suspension of disbelief along with a willing desire to eat piles of air sausage," complains a character in Nightwatchmen while trying to make sense of a senseless death. A reader must bring along this willingness when reading Hannah.

Geronimo Rex, Hannah's first novel, is a long song of remembrance, an ode to southern adolescence, his discoveries of music and women and firearms and, perhaps most importantly, the extra spark style can give to life. Style is very important to Hannah's characters; this and endurance are the virtues they admire and aspire to. Style is also a large element in Hannah's writing: in Geronimo Rex impressionistic sentences that at first seem a beginning writer's excesses grate against the coming-of-age context, stylize the bar-stool braggart tone of voice: "I felt very precise in the oily seat; I was a pistol leaking music out of its holster." Far from being excesses the mature Hannah would weed out, sentences such as these (what Thomas McGuane admiringly referred to as Hannah's "moon-landing English") come to dominate the later works, from Airships on.

In the stories collected in Airships much of the traditional connective tissue of setting and exterior atmosphere is absent, leaving us with thick, nervous monologues by emotionally damaged men and women with a lot of style. Even the Civil War stories (which are enough alike to suggest Hannah may once have planned a Civil War novel) are narrated by characters with a jaded, violent sensibility identical with that of Hannah's characters from a hundred years later—particularly those with some involvement in the Vietnam War in their past. (Vietnam and the Civil War thread through much of Hannah's work.) Sentences such as "Levaster did not dream about himself and French Edward, although the dreams lay on him like the bricks of an hysterical mansion," mix southern gothic with an updated "hardboiled dick" tone, sometimes moving past intelligibility into a private impressionistic flow. At other times this same mix produces beautiful straight-to-the-heart images: "There is a poison in Tuscaloosa that draws souls toward the low middle." Plots are sketchy here, short portraits or sketches of fragmented lives. Characters, as in much of the work that follows, tend to stand or sit around listlessly, or to strike poses that accentuate their stylized speeches.

The title character in the short novel Ray is hardly a character at all, serving for the most part as a kind of tuning fork adjusted to the pitches of certain kinds of misery, those that reflect his own. Dr. Ray is a drinker, an adulterer, and perhaps a little too free with his drug prescriptions. Dr. Ray was a pilot during the Vietnam War, and has begun confusing this experience with what he knows of the Civil War. Others living the low middle life around Dr. Ray get ahead or fall, but his yearnings are too huge or too vague, too subject to change, and he remains stalled in a stasis of half-hearted healing, sex, and war memories.

The title character, French Edward, sustains brain damage when he is nearly drowned trying either to save or to kill his mother's lover, who is also his old tennis coach. French Edward is still able to continue his career as a tennis pro through the Svengali-like attentions of Levaster, an unsavory old friend who likes to shoot people with a gun loaded with popcorn. The story version ends with everyone admiring, even taking solace in, French Edward's mindless grace and endurance, his perfect second of "blazing" serve. In the novel French Edward phases in and out, sometimes shocking himself into lucidity, writing poetry, finding religion, and generally frustrating everyone around him. Despite its brevity The Tennis Handsome seems to sprawl.

Captain Maximus, Hannah's second story collection, is even more spare, more knife-edged than Airships. Again these vignettes are filled with people consumed by yearning, but devoid of hope. Only in "Idaho," an ode to the late poet Richard Hugo which captures some of the poet's own style, and in "Power and Light," a reflection on the travails of working women, does Hannah's tone lighten at all, and only marginally.

Standing apart from his other works is Hannah's second novel, Nightwatchmen. While the novel's grotesqueries outnumber those of the other novels, it is a much more emotional, caring work. The writing here is much less stylized, and conflicts are not kept at a callous distance. Hannah's other works are plotted concentrically or in parallel lines, with groups of characters having some experience in common rather than sharing some common experience; only in Nightwatchmen do lives truly intersect in any significant way. The primary narrator, Thorpe Trove, is open and vulnerable, concerned for the people around him. He spends two years solving the mysteries of who knocked a half dozen people unconscious, and who then beheaded two nightwatchmen. When Thorpe records the stories of the "innocent" parties involved it becomes clear that they care only for their own fears and defenses. In the end the whodunit aspect is overshadowed by the realization of how much the other characters have in common with The Knocker and The Killer.

Mississippi State Press published Boomerang and Never Die in 1991, which was quickly followed by Bats out of Hell, a collection of stories that brings with it the same flair for the grotesque as Airships. Reviews of the collection were mixed, but given that the reader agrees to bring along a generous willingness to suspend disbelief, there is much to enjoy. Again, the Civil War provides the setting when the Confederate soldiers win the Union troops by playing Tchaikovsky in the title story, "Bats out of Hell Division."

The War in Vietnam also recurs as a shaping force in Hannah's short pieces. For example, in "I Taste Like a Sword," which appeared in The Oxford American, a character named Fagmost pukes at football games "but smiling." When he is dragged off by policeman, we see a glimpse of him that calls to mind the 1960s in the United States: "... him all wet in his lumpy flowered shirt and dirty beard." The narrator tells us that the veteran "... had a good four year war behind [him] and was carried down the street by a flock of children on Memorial Day."

The usual monologue is delivered by a waiter whose sense of humor saves him from the start. He speaks of his father: "... now I realize he might have been interesting although something about my devoted apathy in my teens wouldn't let me like him." By the end of the story, we have seen through his eyes and find him endearing, worthy of the same compassion as Flannery O'Connor's flawed characters. His father, a helicopter technology expert who was exposed to poisonous gas during the war, cries out on his deathbed, "God bless war otherwise the pestilent hordes rising up to level us. There you'd really have your flat plains." Hannah's work continues to be "farfetched and worse than that, poetic," yet the vision seems more tender.

—William C. Bamberger, updated by Loretta Cobb

HANNON, Ezra

See HUNTER, Evan

HARRIS, Mark

Nationality: American. Born: Mark Harris Finkelstein in Mount Vernon, New York, 19 November 1922. Education: The University of Denver, B.A. in English 1950, M.A. in English 1951; University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, Ph.D. in American Studies 1956. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1943-44. Family: Married Josephine Horen in 1946; one daughter and two sons. Career: Reporter, Daily Item, Port Chester, New York, 1944-45, PM, New York, 1945, and International News Service, St. Louis, 1945-46; writer for Negro Digest and Ebony, Chicago, 1946-51. Member of the English Department, San Francisco State College, 1954-68, Purdue University, Lafayette, Indiana, 1967-70, California Institute of the Arts, Valencia, 1970-73, Immaculate Heart College, Los Angeles, 1973-74, and University of Southern California, Los Angeles, 1973-75; professor of English, University of Pittsburgh, 1975–80. Since 1983 professor of English, Arizona State University, Tempe. Fulbright Professor, University of Hiroshima, 1957-58; visiting professor, Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts, 1963. Awards: Ford grant, for theater, 1960; American Academy grant, 1961; Guggenheim fellowship, 1965, 1974; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1966. D.H.L.: Illinois Wesleyan University, Bloomington, 1974. Member: San Francisco Art Commission, 1961-64; U.S. Delegate, Dartmouth Conference, Kurashiki, Japan, 1974. Address: Department of English, Arizona State University, Tempe, Arizona 85287, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Trumpet to the World. New York, Reynal, 1946.

City of Discontent: An Interpretive Biography of Vachel Lindsay, Being Also the Story of Springfield, Illinois, USA, and of the Love of the Poet for That City, That State, and That Nation, by Henry W. Wiggen. Indianapolis, Bobbs Merrill, 1952. The Southpaw: by Henry W. Wiggen: Punctuation Inserted and Spelling Greatly Improved. Indianapolis, Bobbs Merrill, 1953.

Bang the Drum Slowly, by Henry W. Wiggen: Certain of His Enthusiasms Restrained. New York, Knopf, 1956.

A Ticket for a Seamstitch, by Henry W. Wiggen: But Polished for the Printer. New York, Knopf, 1957.

Something about a Soldier. New York, Macmillan, 1957; London, Deutsch, 1958.

Wake Up, Stupid. New York, Knopf, 1959; London, Deutsch, 1960. The Goy. New York, Dial Press, 1970.

Killing Everybody. New York, Dial Press, 1973.

It Looked Like For Ever. New York, McGraw Hill, 1979.

Lying in Bed. New York, McGraw Hill, 1984.

Speed. New York, Fine, 1990.

The Tale Maker. New York, Fine, 1994.

Short Stories

The Self-Made Brain Surgeon, and Other Stories. Lincoln, University of Nebraska Press, 1999.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Carmelita's Education for Living," in Esquire (New York), October 1957.
- "Conversation on Southern Honshu," in North Dakota Quarterly (Grand Forks), Summer 1959.
- "Hi, Bob!," in Arizona Quarterly (Tuscon), Summer 1986.
- "Titwillow," in Michigan Quarterly Review (Ann Arbor), Summer 1986.
- "Flattery," in Sequoia (Stanford, California), Winter 1988.

Plays

Friedman & Son (produced San Francisco, 1962). New York, Macmillan, 1963.

The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg, adaptation of the story by Mark Twain (televised, 1980). Published in The American Short Story 2, edited by Calvin Skaggs, New York, Dell, 1980.

Screenplays: Bang the Drum Slowly, 1973.

Television Plays: The Man That Corrupted Hadleyburg, 1980; Boswell for the Defence, 1983 (UK); Boswell's London Journal, 1984 (UK).

Other

Mark the Glove Boy; or, The Last Days of Richard Nixon (autobiography). New York, Macmillan, 1964.

Twentyone Twice: A Journal (autobiography). Boston, Little Brown, 1966.

Public Television: A Program for Action, with others. New York, Harper, 1967.

Best Father Ever Invented: The Autobiography of Mark Harris. New York, Dial Press, 1976.

Short Work of It: Selected Writing. Pittsburgh, University of Pittsburgh Press, 1979.

Saul Bellow, Drumlin Woodchuck. Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1980. Diamond: Baseball Writings of Mark Harris. New York, Fine, 1994. Editor, Selected Poems, by Vachel Lindsay. New York, Macmillan, 1963; London, Collier Macmillan, 1965.

Editor, with Josephine and Hester Harris, The Design of Fiction. New York, Crowell, 1976.

Editor, The Heart of Boswell. New York, McGraw Hill, 1981.

*

Manuscript Collection: University of Delaware Library, Newark.

Critical Studies: Mark Harris by Norman Lavers, Boston, Twayne, 1978.

Mark Harris comments:

(1972) I have written eight novels. I think that a constant line travels through them. I didn't know this was happening while it was happening, but I can see it now, looking back after a quarter of a century since my first novel was published.

They are about the writer. That is, if you will, they are about the artist. Which is to say, if you will, they are about the one man against his society and trying to come to terms with his society, and trying to succeed within it without losing his own identity or integrity.

My novels are always very carefully written. Since hard work makes the writing look easy, there exist stupid reviewers and critics who think I (and others) just slam these writings out. My books are all constructed with great care. Nothing is missing from any of them in the way of plot. I forget nothing.

Of course, although I am spiritually at the center of my novels (every novel is mainly about one man), I am disguised as poet or baseball player or professor or historian. I am always a minority person in some sense, either because I am fictionally left-handed or, most recently, gentile in a Jewish milieu. (My first book was about a black man in a white milieu). I don't know why this is so. I believe that it is most deeply the result of being a Jew, but it may be attributable to other things I am not fully aware of. Maybe I was just born that way. It is a mystery.

Subject and theme: sometimes these aren't really stated in the works, and people feel disappointed. They want to know what they shouldn't: where does the author stand? In my heart, if not always dogmatically in my books, I stand for human equality and peace and justice.

I also stand for writing well: I don't believe that good ends can come of false or shoddy or hasty means. Books must be beautiful so that the world is put into a mood of beauty. Books mustn't merely say but must, on the other hand, exist as beauty.

I am opposed to the reduction or paraphrase of works of art. Thus I feel that I may on this page already have written more than I should.

* * *

Mark Harris's fiction and autobiography share several themes: the problems of racism and racial justice, the dilemma of violence and pacifism, the price of individualism and the forms of democracy and social justice. His work is dominated by genial comedy, a gentle optimistic view of man's possibilities and capacities, and Harris has pursued his own life through his fiction. His journal-autobiographies Mark the Glove Boy and Twentyone Twice complement fictionalized self-portraits like pitcher-author Henry Wiggen (The Southpaw, Bang the Drum Slowly, A Ticket for a Seamstitch), boxer-novelist-teacher

Lee Youngdahl (Wake Up, Stupid), soldier-pacifist Jacob Epstein (Something about a Soldier) and historian-diarist Westrum (The Goy).

Harris's novels depict individuals in pursuit of themselves, discovering through self-analysis, experience, and observation who they are and what their lives mean. His first novel, Trumpet to the World, follows a black man through self-discovery and self-education to his rejection of war and violence and his attempts to reach the world through writing. He suffers poverty, hatred, and violence but also discovers friendship and love. Through determination and courage, he overcomes dehumanizing conditions to become fully alive, a fully functioning man. The baseball tetralogy (The Southpaw, Bang the Drum Slowly, A Ticket for a Seamstitch, It Looked Like For Ever) describes the career of Henry W. Wiggen, a young man who succeeds in big-league baseball. In a Lardneresque style, Wiggen writes the journal of his maturity as an athlete and a man. Wiggen grapples with the mysteries of love, the problem of hatred and violence, becomes reconciled with the finality of death. Each story shows Wiggen's growth, mentally and spiritually, and his progress down a road to selfunderstanding and reconciliation. Overtly a comedy of athletics and folk-hero rambunctiousness, the four books also form a study of pacifism, love and justice.

Something about a Soldier turns explicitly to the problems of violence and nonviolence which appear in the earlier novels. In it Jacob Epp (Epstein) discovers the importance of his identity, the meaning of love and loyalty, and the relationship between violence and justice. A young, very bright, but naive recruit, Jacob rejects the Army and the war (World War II), militantly works for justice and equality for black people and begins to understand love and friendship. He rejects death for life, war for peace, goes AWOL, and through meditation in prison comes to self-reconciliation.

In Wake Up, Stupid Harris uses the epistolary form to follow a crisis of insecurity in the life of a man who is successful as an athlete, teacher, and writer. Lee Youngdahl, during a lull in artistic creativity, takes up letter-writing to occupy his imagination. Comic crises of his fantasy life involve all his friends and enemies and lead him to a final understanding of his needs and desires, the sources of his imagination. Lying in Bed continues Harris's exploration of marital comedy through the viewpoint of Lee Youngdahl. Older and wiser in the ways of love and literature, Youngdahl extends his imaginative self-analysis and reviews his love affairs, real and fictive, as he tries to defend his virtuous monogamy and his need for varied romance.

The Goy continues the theme of self-discovery. In it, Westrum, a midwestern gentile who has married an eastern Jew, pursues his identity through a massive, life-long journal. He comes to understand, through the journal, his relationship with the Jews in his life, his father's virulent anti-semitism, his own obsession with history, his relationship with his son, his wife, and his mistress. The past, through his journal and his study of history, ultimately explains his present.

In Killing Everybody Harris explores opposing passions of love and rage, life-giving and death. The novel deals with the madness of the world and of individuals caught up in its madness. It studies revenge and charity, physical love and sexual fantasy, a dialectic skillfully developed as a complex dance between four central minds. The story moves more deeply into the roots of modern psychic life than Harris's earlier fiction, and he confronts a massive theme—civilization and its discontents.

All of Mark Harris's fiction is comic in conception, and sports and games are at the center of the work, especially the social games which are the substance of comedy of manners. Lee Youngdahl, in Wake Up, Stupid, analyzes American literature in a statement epitomizing Harris's own work:

What is it that thrusts Mark Twain and Sherwood Anderson into one stream, and Henry James into another? ... It has so much to do with a man's early relationship to the society of boys and games—that miniature of our larger society of men and business, with its codes and rules, its provision for imagination within these rules, with winning, losing, timing, bluffing, feinting, jockeying, with directness of aim and speech and with coming back off the floor again.

Harris's fiction is solidly within this tradition, which translates social games into comedy, a comedy which explains our secret lives more clearly than any social or psychological theory. Speed shows his talents to less advantage: the story is a confusing tale of two brothers, one of whom (nicknamed "Speed") has a painful stammer. The other, the narrator, suggests that he may have pushed Speed off of a table when he was baby, thus perhaps causing his lifelong stutter. Eventually these and other misfortunes visited on Speed by his brother lead to his disappearance, and the narrator ends up wondering what happened to him. Much stronger are the tales in The Self-Made Brain Surgeon. The title story, for instance, concerns a grocer who fancies himself a psychologist, and dispenses harebrained advice to the unwary. Throughout the volume, readers will find many of the ingredients most appreciated in Harris's work, from baseball to comedy to criticism of social injustice.

-William J. Schafer

HARRIS, (Theodore) Wilson

Nationality: British. Born: New Amsterdam, British Guiana, now Guyana, 24 March 1921. Education: Queen's College, Georgetown. Family: Married 1) Cecily Carew in 1945; 2) Margaret Whitaker in 1959. Career: Government surveyor in the 1940s, and senior surveyor, 1955-58, Government of British Guiana; moved to London in 1959. Visiting lecturer, State University of New York, Buffalo, 1970; writer-in-residence, University of the West Indies, Kingston, Jamaica, and Scarborough College, University of Toronto, 1970; Commonwealth Fellow in Caribbean Literature, Leeds University, Yorkshire, 1971; visiting professor, University of Texas, Austin, 1972, and 1981-82, University of Mysore, 1978, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1979, University of Newcastle, New South Wales, 1979, and University of Queensland, St. Lucia, 1986; Regents' Lecturer, University of California, Santa Cruz, 1983. Delegate, National Identity Conference, Brisbane, and Unesco Symposium on Caribbean Literature, Cuba, both 1968. Awards: Arts Council grant, 1968, 1970; Guggenheim fellowship, 1973; Henfield fellowship, 1974; Southern Arts fellowship, 1976; Guyana fiction prize, 1987; Premio Mondello International award, 1992. D.Litt.: University of the West Indies, 1984; University of Kent, Canterbury, 1988. Address: c/o Faber and Faber Ltd., 3 Queen Square, London WC1N 3AU, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Palace of the Peacock. London, Faber, 1960. The Far Journey of Oudin. London, Faber, 1961. The Whole Armour. London, Faber, 1962.

The Secret Ladder. London, Faber, 1963.

Heartland. London, Faber, 1964.

The Eye of the Scarecrow. London, Faber, 1965.

The Waiting Room. London, Faber, 1967.

Tumatumari. London, Faber, 1968.

Ascent to Omai. London, Faber, 1970.

Black Marsden: A Tabula Rasa Comedy. London, Faber, 1972.

Companions of the Day and Night. London, Faber, 1975.

Da Silva da Silva's Cultivated Wilderness, and Genesis of the Clowns. London, Faber, 1977.

The Tree of the Sun. London, Faber, 1978.

The Angel at the Gate. London, Faber, 1982.

Carnival. London, Faber, 1985.

The Guyana Quartet. London, Faber, 1985.

The Infinite Rehearsal. London, Faber, 1987.

The Four Banks of the River of Space. London, Faber, 1990.

Resurrection at Sorrow Hill. London and Boston, Faber, 1993.

The Carnival Trilogy. London, Faber, 1993.

Short Stories

The Sleepers of Roraima. London, Faber, 1970. The Age of the Rainmakers. London, Faber, 1971.

Poetry

Fetish. Privately printed, 1951.The Well and the Land. Georgetown, Magnet, 1952.Eternity to Season. Privately printed, 1954; revised edition, London, New Beacon, 1979.

Other

Tradition, The Writer, and Society: Critical Essays. London, New Beacon, 1967.

History, Fable, and Myth in the Caribbean and Guianas. Georgetown, National History and Arts Council, 1970; Wellesley, Massachusetts, Calaloux Publications, 1995.

Fossil and Psyche (lecture on Patrick White). Austin, University of Texas, 1974.

Explorations: A Selection of Talks and Articles, edited by Hena Maes-Jelinek. Aarhus, Denmark, Dangaroo Press, 1981.

The Womb of Space: The Cross-Cultural Imagination. Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1983.

The Radical Imagination: Lectures and Talks, edited by A. Riach and M. Williams. Liège, Belgium, Université de Liège, 1992.

Selected Essays of Wilson Harris, the Unfinished Genesis of the Imagination, introduced and edited by A.J.M. Bundy. New York, Routledge, 1999.

Manuscript Collections: University of the West Indies, Mona, Kingston, Jamaica; University of Texas, Austin; University of Indiana, Bloomington; University of Guyana, Georgetown.

Critical Studies: Wilson Harris: A Philosophical Approach by C.L.R. James, Port of Spain, University of the West Indies, 1965; The Novel Now by Anthony Burgess, London, Faber, and New York, Norton, 1967, revised edition, Faber, 1971; essay by John Hearne, in The Islands in Between edited by Louis James, London, Oxford University Press, 1968; Wilson Harris and the Caribbean Novel by Michael Gilkes, Trinidad and London, Longman, 1975; Enigma of Values edited by Kirsten Holst Petersen and Anna Rutherford, Aarhus, Denmark, Dangaroo Press, 1975; The Naked Design: A Reading of Palace of the Peacock, Aarhus, Denmark, Dangaroo Press, 1976, and Wilson Harris, Boston, Twayne, 1982, both by Hena Maes-Jelinek; West Indian Literature edited by Bruce King, London, Macmillan, 1979; "The Eternal Present in Wilson Harris's The Sleepers of Roraima and The Age of the Rainmakers" by Gary Crew, in World Literature Written in English (Arlington, Texas), Autumn 1980; "Limbo, Dislocation, Phantom Limb" by Nathaniel Mackey, in Criticism (Detroit), Winter 1980; Wilson Harris and the Modern Imagination: A New Architecture of the World by Sandra E. Drake, Westport, Connecticut, and London, Greenwood Press, 1986; The Literate Imagination: Essays on the Novels of Wilson Harris edited by Michael Gilkes, London, Macmillan, 1989; Wilson Harris: The Uncompromising Imagination edited by Hena Maes-Jelinek, Aarhus, Kangaroo Press, 1991.

Theatrical Activities: Actor: Television—Da Silva da Silva, 1987.

Wilson Harris comments:

(1972) Palace of the Peacock through The Guyana Quartet and successive novels up to The Sleepers of Roraima and The Age of the Rainmakers are related to a symbolic landscape-in-depth—the shock of great rapids, vast forests and savannahs—playing through memory to involve perspectives of imperiled community and creativity reaching back into the Pre-Columbian mists of time.

I believe that the revolution of sensibility of defining community towards which we may now be moving is an extension of the frontiers of the alchemical imagination beyond an opus contra naturam into an opus contra ritual. This does not mean the jettisoning of ritual (since ritual belongs in the great ambivalent chain of memory; and the past, in a peculiar sense, as an omen of proportions, shrinking or expanding, never dies); but it means the utilization of ritual as an ironic bias-the utilization of ritual, not as something in which we situate ourselves absolutely, but as an unraveling of self-deception with selfrevelation as we see through the various dogmatic proprietors of the globe within a play of contrasting structures and anti-structures: a profound drama of consciousness invoking contrasting tones is the variable phenomenon of creativity within which we are prone, nevertheless, to idolize logical continuity or structure and commit ourselves to a conservative bias, or to idolize logical continuity or anti-structure and commit ourselves to a revolutionary bias. Thus we are prone to monumentalize our own biases and to indict as well as misconceive creativity. A capacity to digest as well as liberate contrasting figures is essential to the paradox of community and to the life of the imagination.

* * *

With the publication in 1990 of The Four Banks of the River of Space, Wilson Harris completed a trilogy of novels which began with Carnival and continued through The Infinite Rehearsal. Although each book involves different characters and locations, when taken together, they form a complex revision of three crucial texts of Western Culture: The Odyssey, The Divine Comedy, and Faust. This is the culmination of a process which began with Harris's first novel, Palace of the Peacock, published thirty years earlier, and has continued through twenty-six volumes of fictional prose, criticism and verse.

Like Blake, Harris is a visionary, and his work is the complex literary expression of a vision which offers redemptive hope. For Harris, creativity is an intrinsic value in all the forms taken by the expressions of the intuitive imagination. Harris's prose is not seductively mimetic, like that of a realist novel. Rather, it demands concentrated attention as it works through continual disclosures of its own ambivalence. For example, the opening of Palace of the Peacock seems to describe a character on horseback "approaching at breakneck speed." A shot rings out, the man falls dead and a second man approaches (an unnamed "I"). The narrative seems straightforward, but close scrutiny of Harris's language reveals ambivalent meanings. The word "breakneck" suddenly suggests that the man has been hanged, not shot, and the noise of the gunshot may be the sound of the trapdoor dropping. Harris puns repeatedly on "I"/"eye" and brings together "one dead seeing eye" and "one living closed eye" to suggest that the contemplative man of vision and the unimaginative man of action are not absolute types but only aspects of a complex wholeness, wherein no individual has absolute authority. Harris extends this notion radically in the Carnival trilogy, where cultural archetypes like Ulysses are seen to be no longer viable as the property of any single culture, but demand to be shared among cultures globally.

Thus the journey upriver into the rainforests of Guyana which forms the narrative "line" of Palace is better understood as a prismatic perspective which reveals the "characters" as parts of a vast, interrelated family. They are the representatives of numerous cultures, scattered from pole to pole by the processes of imperialism and colonialism. Though they are symbolic, the symbolism is unreliable and inconstant.

The strategy of Harris's novels is therefore to draw hope from a narrative which would seem to be linear and closed by opening it up to historical and geographical dimensional senses and formal experimentation. Although ostensibly "set" in South America, Palace is as much an inquiry into the nature of language and literary form as it is a story of conquistadors striking out for El Dorado. Indeed, the forbidding opacities and dazzling visions of the Guyanese rainforests seem sometimes to act metaphorically for Harris's written English, its adamantine immediacy and allusive depths. The name of the principal character, Donne, echoes that of the late Renaissance poet who stands at the end of the medieval world and at the beginning of the modern, at the point where colonial expansion began. Harris is hopefully signaling an equally transitional period. He addresses the questions of the dissolution of personal identity and "the open wound of human history" in ways which are significant not only in terms of "Caribbean literature" or "post-colonial literature," but rather in terms of modern literature in English.

The three novels which follow Palace are thematically distinct as they deal with slavery and indenture on the rice plantations, the imposition of law on frontier society and finally the rise of the modern state. But throughout The Guyana Quartet, themes and characters from past and present meet and mingle with each other. The space between the hinterland of forest and the cultivated coastal areas is shifting, just as language is a vast repository of unarticulated expression, an "enabling" or "womb-like space." As Harris has said, "The human person has very deep resources. We tend to live our lives on the surface and eclipse those deep and incredible resources. It happens on the individual as well as on the cultural level."

After the Quartet, Harris embarked upon a further cycle of novels beginning with Heartland, whose main character vanishes into the jungle (as Harris's own stepfather did), leaving only fragments of letters and notes. The Eve of the Scarecrow, The Waiting Room, Tumatumari, and Ascent to Omai, delve further into questions about the condition of irretrievable absence and loss. Yet for Harris, even the most dreadful conditions are intricately and indissolubly linked to processes of change which might reveal a further regeneration of possibility. Such regeneration is never glib or easy. But it is this motivating and empowering sense which Harris works through, as catastrophe and deprivation is understood to be in a difficult but actual relationship with emergent reality. Two volumes of short stories were followed by Black Marsden, subtitled "A Tabula Rasa Comedy," and set mainly in Scotland. Harris recognized in Scotland and in Scottish literature an implicit quality of diverse cultural and linguistic layers which corresponded with his understanding of the Caribbean, a country whose people were both exploiters and exploited, both a tributary and a backwater of empire. In Black Marsden, he takes a recognizable motif from Scottish fiction (the Devil as familiar tempter) and loads it with the unfamiliar depths of his vision. The following novels continued this process in Mexico, London, and later through the Carnival trilogy, in which the philosophical understanding of the relations between absence and presence, possession and loss, paradise, purgatory, and hell, is presented in fictional terms with diamond clarity and refractive depth.

With Resurrection at Sorrow Hill, Harris returned to motifs first used in the Quartet, grafting a highly complex set of observations and poetic myths onto the framework of a story with at least some roots in realism. Because the tale is set in an insane asylum located in the hinterlands of Guyana, it becomes possible to include all kinds of historical figures, using characters who believe themselves to be those people: Socrates, Montezuma, Leonardo, Karl Marx. The people outside the asylum are hardly more stable than the ones within, and Harris throws them together in a web of conflicting relationships.

Harris's peculiar distinction among modern novelists is threefold. He imagines in a complex dynamic and changing condition aspects of that condition which are normally held to be separate and static. He understands that imaginative act to be a radical departure from normal imaginative procedures, which are frequently run along familiar lines. And he embodies this in a major and invigorating sequence of novels which break down the rigidities of the form as drastically as they reconfirm potential in the protean forms of humanity.

-Alan Riach

HARRISON, Jim

Nationality: American. Born: James Thomas Harrison in Grayling, Michigan, 11 December 1937. Education: Michigan State University, East Lansing, B.A. in comparative literature 1960, M.A. in comparative literature 1964. Family: Married Linda King in 1959; two daughters. Career: Assistant professor of English, State University of New York, Stony Brook, 1965–66. Lives in Michigan. Awards: National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1967, 1968, 1969; Guggenheim fellowship, 1969. Agent: Robert Datilla, 233 East 8th Street, New York, New York 10028. Address: Box 135, Lake Leelanau, Michigan 49653–0135, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Wolf. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1971; London, Flamingo, 1993

A Good Day to Die. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1973; London, Flamingo, 1993.

Farmer. New York, Viking Press, 1976; London, Flamingo, 1993.
Legends of the Fall (novellas). New York, Delacorte Press, 1979;
London, Collins, 1980.

Warlock. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Collins, 1981.
Sundog: The story of an American foreman, Robert Corvus Strang, as told to Jim Harrison. New York, Dutton, 1984; London, Heinemann, 1985.

Dalva. New York, Dutton, 1988; London, Cape, 1989.

The Woman Lit by Fireflies (three novellas). Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1990; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1991.

Julip. Boston, Houghton Mifflin/Seymour Lawrence, and London, Flamingo, 1994.

The Road Home. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1998.

The Beast God Forgot to Invent: Novellas. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 2000.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Dalva: How It Happened to Me," in Esquire (New York), April 1988.

Poetry

Plain Song. New York, Norton, 1965.

Locations. New York, Norton, 1968.

Walking. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Pym Randall Press, 1969. Outlyer and Ghazals. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1971.

Letters to Yesenin. Fremont, Michigan, Sumac Press, 1973.

Returning to Earth. Ithaca, New York, Ithaca House, 1977.

Selected and New Poems 1961–1981. New York, Delacorte Press, 1982.

The Theory and Practice of Rivers. Seattle, Winn, 1986.

The Theory and Practice of Rivers and New Poems. Livingston, Montana, Clark City Press, 1989.

After Ikky'u and Other Poems. Boston, Shambhala, 1996.

The Shape of the Journey: New and Collected Poems. Port Townsend, Washington, Copper Canyon Press, 1998.

Other

Natural World, with Diana Guest. Barrytown, New York, Open Book, 1983.

Just Before Dark: Collected Nonfiction. Livingston, Montana, Clark City Press, 1991. Wolf (screenplay, with Wesley Strick). Columbia Pictures, 1994.
The Boy Who Ran into the Woods. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 2000.

*

Film Adaptations: Legends of the Fall, 1994.

Critical Studies: Jim Harrison by Edward C. Reilly. New York, Twayne Publishers, London, Prentice Hall, 1996.

* * *

A reviewer for the Times observed that Jim Harrison is "a writer with immortality in him." Archivist Bernard Fontana, of the University of Arizona, has expressed his belief in the quality of Harrison's work in another way: "To read Jim Harrison is to be tattooed." Harrison's early reputation was founded on four volumes of poetry. In 1971, his first novel, Wolf, was published. Wolf is the story of one man's quest for identity and freedom through the primal levels of nature and sex. The novel's themes and northern Michigan location drew critical comparisons to Ernest Hemingway's Nick Adams stories.

Two years after Wolf, A Good Day to Die appeared as a statement about the decline of America's ecological systems. In a blending of Edward Abbey's The Monkey Wrench Gang and Hemingway's The Sun Also Rises, readers are presented with three characters who are launched on a cross-country trek to blow up a dam and rescue the Grand Canyon. A modern day Tom Sawyer and Huck Finn and an earthy Becky Thatcher are faced with the bankruptcy of the American dream. The novel also illustrates the author's fascination with Native Americans and begins a thematic interest that is found in other novels.

Farmer is a Lolita-like account of a country school teacher coming to grips with middle age while caught between two love affairs—one with a nymphet student and the other with a widowed co-worker who was his childhood sweetheart.

Harrison's first three novels resulted in many attacks by critics who saw him as a stereotype of the Hemingway myth: a writer obsessed with the macho male activities of hunting, drinking, and manly sex. In later novels Harrison would confront these criticisms head-on.

After Farmer, Harrison entered into an unusual contract with the actor Jack Nicolson. For $15,000 in advance of writing and publication, Nicholson purchased half the film rights to Harrison's yet-to-bewritten project. Harrison produced three novellas which were published in book form under the title of Legends of the Fall. The first novella, "Revenge," is the story of a love affair between Cochran; an ex-fighter pilot; and Miryea, the wife of a Mexican gangster. "The Man Who Gave Up His Name" chronicles Nordstrom's divorce, his run-ins with the New York underworld and his attempt to form a new life built around a new identity. Legends of the Fall is an epic story that spans fifty years and tells the tale of William Ludlow and his three sons. The story is filled with beautiful characterizations and with great action from its beginning, when the brothers ride out to Calgary to join the Canadian army and fight in World War I; to its end, when Ludlow confronts Irish bootleggers who have come to kill one of his sons.

Published in 1981, Warlock parodies nearly everything for which critics had taken Harrison to task. Johnny Lundgren, a.k.a. Warlock, becomes a private detective after he loses his job as a foundation executive. Unable to handle women, earn the devotion of his dog or remember to load his pistol, he bumbles through a series of adventures on the behalf of a deranged physician. Sundog, subtitled "The story of an American foreman, Robert Corvus Strang, as told to Jim Harrison," is a piece of fiction presented as a true tale. Strang recounts the story of his life, his several marriages and children, dozens of lovers, and his work on giant construction projects around the world.

Dalva, which was published in 1988, contains two stories: a tale of a middle-aged women's search for her out-of-wedlock child as well as her tribulations with her almost-boyfriend professor; and a story of her pioneer ancestor, an Andersonville survivor and naturalist whose diaries vividly tell of the destruction of the Plains Indian way of life by Anglo invasion.

The Woman Lit by Fireflies is a collection of three novellas. The first, "Brown Dog" is the comic memoir of an ex-Bible college student who loves to eat, drink, and chase women and his discovery of an Indian chief submerged in Lake Superior. "Sunset Limited" concerns a group of 1960s radicals who reunite to rescue an old friend held in a Mexican jail. "The Woman Lit by Fireflies" is the story of a woman who walks away from her husband at an Interstate Welcome Center near Davenport, Iowa and is a tale of transfiguration and discovery.

A complex work that recalls aspects of Dalva—not least by bringing in characters related to those in the earlier novel—The Road Home uses several narrators, takes place over wide stretches of time, and emphasizes the interdependent quality of all life. One of the central figures is John Wesley Northridge II, Dalva's grandfather, who is told by his granddaughter, "When you tell me stories about your life, why do you always pretend you were such a nice person? ... Everyone in town says you were the scariest man in the county .... So I wish you wouldn't just tell the good parts about yourself." The novel, as it unfolds, reveals much more than just the "good parts," and does so with Harrison's usual masterful touch.

—Tom Colonnese

HARROWER, Elizabeth

Nationality: Australian. Born: Sydney, New South Wales, 8 February 1928. Career: Lived in London 1951–58; worked for the Australian Broadcasting Commission, Sydney, 1959–60; reviewer, Sydney Morning Herald, 1960; worked for Macmillan and Company Ltd., publishers, Sydney, 1961–67. Awards: Commonwealth Literary Fund fellowship, 1968; Australian Council for the Arts fellowship, 1974. Address: 5 Stanley Avenue, Mosman, New South Wales 2088, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Down in the City. London, Cassell, 1957. The Long Prospect. London, Cassell, 1958. The Catherine Wheel. London, Cassell, 1960. The Watch Tower. London, Macmillan, 1966.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Cost of Things," in Summer's Tales 1, edited by Kylie Tennant. Melbourne and London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1964.
- "English Lesson," in Summer's Tales 2, edited by Kylie Tennant. Melbourne and London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1965.
- "The Beautiful Climate," in Modern Australian Writing, edited by Geoffrey Dutton. London, Fontana, 1966.
- "Lance Harper, His Story," in The Vital Decade, edited by Geoffrey Dutton and Max Harris. Melbourne, Sun, 1968.
- "The Retrospective Grandmother," in The Herald (Melbourne), 1976.
- "A Few Days in the Country," in Overland (Melbourne), 1977.

*

Critical Studies: "The Novels of Elizabeth Harrower" by Max Harris, in Australian Letters (Adelaide), December 1961; Forty-Two Faces by John Hetherington, Melbourne, Cheshire, 1962; "Elizabeth Harrower's Novels: A Survey," in Southerly (Sydney), no. 2, 1970, and Recent Fiction, Melbourne, Oxford University Press, 1974, both by R.G. Geering; The Directions of Australian Fiction 1920-1974 by D.R. Burns, Melbourne, Cassell, 1975; "The Novels of Elizabeth Harrower' by Robyn Claremont, in Quadrant (Sydney), November 1979; Nola Adams, in Westerly (Nedlands, Western Australia), September 1980; "Deep into the Destructive Core" by Frances McInherny, in Hecate (St. Lucia, Queensland), vol. 9, nos. 1–2, 1983; "Down in the City: Elizabeth Harrower's Lost Novel" by Rosie Yeo, in Southerly (Sydney), no. 4, 1990; "The Watch Tower: Bluebeard's Castle" by Deirdre Coleman, in (Un)common Ground edited by A. Taylor and R. McDougall, Bedford Park, South Australia, CRNLE, 1990.

* * *

An ideal introduction to Elizabeth Harrower's work is the short story "The Beautiful Climate," since it provides a paradigm of her fictional universe. It is a world in which selfish men manipulate their women and material possessions in a vain attempt to achieve happiness; frustrated by their blind male egotism, they become subject to fits of smoldering violence and frequent relapses into bouts of alcoholism and morbid self-pity. The woman's role is to suffer, to pity, and to provide the innocent seeing eye for the narrative. In "The Beautiful Climate" the paranoiac male is Mr. Shaw, who secretly buys a holiday island, reduces his wife and daughter to domestic slavery there, then sells the place behind their backs. The consciousness that develops from innocent passivity to partial sad wisdom is the daughter's, who reflects her creator in turning from psychology to literature as a guide to truth. The same basic situations and characters recur throughout the novels; and the tormented relationship between father and daughter in this short story might seem to offer a psychological clue to the novelist's preoccupation with male domination.

In Down in the City, a very remarkable first novel, Harrower traces the disenchantment that follows when the heroine exchanges the empty security of her wealthy bay-side suburb in Sydney for the puzzling ups and downs of her husband's shady business world. In describing the characteristic claustrophobia of the flat-dwelling city wife, she succeeds wonderfully well in evoking the typical sights and sounds of Sydney and in establishing a connection between climate and states of mind. And the hero, who oscillates between his classy wife and his obliging mistress, reflects the conflicting drives and split personality of many an Australian business man.

What distinguishes Harrower's second novel, The Long Prospect, from all her others is that the malevolent main character is a woman not a man. But once again the viewpoint is through an innocent seeing eye; in this case, it is a child's. By the end of the novel, she has plumbed the seedy adult world to its depths. The scene in which four irredeemably corrupt adults spy on the 12-year-old and her middle-aged friend, transferring their own "atmosphere of stealth" onto the innocent pair, is only one of many pieces of superb psychological drama in this accomplished novel.

While the third novel, The Catherine Wheel, laudably attempts to extend the range of the fictional world by having its setting in London bed-sitter-land, it is a somewhat disappointing work that hardly prepares the reader for the splendid fourth novel, The Watch Tower. The conspicuous success in The Watch Tower lies in the creation of Felix Shaw, the Australian business man, who climaxes a series of similar portraits and shares the surname of the father in "The Beautiful Climate." But equally subtle is the analysis of pity, through the contrasted characters of Shaw's two victims, who show that pity may enslave as well as ennoble (this a continuous preoccupation in the novels). Shaw's capriciousness, his bursts of petty pique and rage, his resentment at others' success, his dark nihilism, brutal aggression, unrecognized homosexuality and alcoholism, all point to a profound psychic disorder. But it is the novelist's triumph to suggest that this disorder is at least partly the product of a society that worships materialism and masculinity.

In most of her work, Harrower combines sharp observation of individual life with a searching critique of Australian society. Although she lacks the resilient vitality of such English novelists as Margaret Drabble, her vision of a male-dominated society is depressingly authentic. She has been highly praised and compared favorably with Patrick White, but her unflattering, somewhat drab and disenchanted view of Australian life is now winning her the wide local readership her work certainly deserves.

-John Colmer

HART, Veronica

See KELLEHER, Victor

HASLUCK, Nicholas (Paul)

Nationality: Australian. Born: Canberra, 17 October 1942; son of the politician and diplomat Sir Paul Hasluck. Education: The University of Western Australia, Nedlands, 1960–63, LL.B. 1963; Oxford University, 1964–66, B.C.L. 1966. Family: Married Sally Anne Bolton in 1966; two sons. Career: Lawyer, admitted to Supreme Court of Western Australia as barrister and solicitor, 1968. Deputy Chairman, Australia Council, 1978–82. Awards: The Age Book of the Year award, 1984. Member: A.M. (Order of Australia), 1986. Agent: Murray Pollinger, 222 Old Brompton Road, London SW5 0B2, England. Address: 14 Reserve Street, Claremont, Western Australia 6010, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Quarantine. Melbourne and London, Macmillan, 1978; New York, Holt Rinehart, 1979.

The Blue Guitar. Melbourne and London, Macmillan, and New York, Holt Rinehart, 1980.

The Hand That Feeds You: A Satiric Nightmare, photographs by the author. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press. 1982.

The Bellarmine Jug. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1984.

Truant State. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1987; New York, Penguin, 1988.

The Country Without Music. Ringwood, Victoria, Viking, 1990. The Blosseville File. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1992. A Grain of Truth. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1994.

Short Stories

The Hat on the Letter O and Other Stories. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1978.

Poetry

Anchor and Other Poems. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1976.

On the Edge, with William Grono. Claremont, Western Australia, Freshwater Bay Press, 1980.

Chinese Journey, with C.J. Koch. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1985.

Other

Collage: Recollections and Images of the University of Western Australia, photographs by Tania Young. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1987.

Offcuts from a Legal Literary Life. Nedlands, University of Western Australia Press, 1993.

Editor, The Chance of Politics, by Paul Hasluck. Melbourne, Text Publishing, 1997.

Critical Studies: Review by Martin Seymour-Smith, in Financial Times (London), 15 June 1978; article by Helen Daniel, in The Age Monthly Review (Melbourne), December 1984; Liars by Helen Daniel, Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1988.

* * *

Nicholas Hasluck's first novel, Quarantine, introduced the combination of intrigue, dark humour, and fable that have become characteristic of Hasluck's style. In an ominous, rundown hotel on the bank of the Suez canal, the passengers of a cruise ship are unaccountably held in isolation under the sinister charge of the proprietor Shewfik Arud and the dipsomaniac Dr. Magro. The exiles themselves are caught between the menacing Burgess and the moral hero of the story, David Shears, who loses his life through the moral cowardice of the narrator. Parallels with Camus's La Peste do not deny the individuality of Hasluck's brand of mordant absurdism.

The more restrained The Blue Guitar, unusually for an Australian novel, is concerned with commerce, and is set in a vividly-evoked urban jungle (recognisably Sydney). As a speculator, Dyson Garrick attempts to promote the inventor Herman's "blue guitar" that automatically creates music. His quest is idealistic (the title directs us to Wallace Steven's poem "Things as they are are changed by the blue guitar") but also tangled in the temptations of commercial exploitation, and this conflict leads to Garrick's own moral disintegration as he finally betrays his friend.

The Hand That Feeds You subtitled "A Satiric Nightmare," turns to a science-fiction framework for its satirical fantasy of an Australia controlled by the trade unions and the mass media, where paid work has become taboo, tax evasion and social handouts the ideal. A product of New Right thinking of the early 1980s, the novel lacks the universality of The Bellarmine Jug, his most complex and assured novel to date.

The Bellarmine Jug explores the roots of Australian identity on both personal and social levels, using techniques from the spy thriller and a legal examination that probes each layer of truth to reveal alternative realities. In 1948, student unrest in the Grotius Institute, Den Haag, is linked to an attempt by the authorities to suppress evidence that the 1629 mutiny of the Batavia off Western Australia was led by the son of Grotius, codifier of international law and founder of the institute. The evidence has implications for the status of Grotius, the institute, and the relationship between authority and rebellion. As the mutiny is envisaged as leading to atrocities surrounding a Rosicrucian settlement of the Abrolhos islands, it is also conjecturally linked to the first white settlement of Australia. The plot moves between Holland, London, and Australia, implicating issues such as the British atomic tests in the Monte Bellow islands, and Australian involvement in Sukarno's independence movement, to question the nature of international law, human rights, and individual morality. Exploring these through a taut and compelling narrative, the novel rates amongst the finest Australian novels of the 1980s.

Truant State is set in Western Australia in the heady days of the 1920s and the depression of the 1930s. It is narrated by the young Jack Taverne, an immigrant from England, whose father becomes caught in the illusory hopes of the era. There is a vivid recreation of the conflict between the trades unions, and the reactionary West Guard secret society which sought seccession for Western Australia (the 'truant state' of the title). A subtext involves D.H. Lawrence's Kangaroo which also draws on the Fremantle riots and the right-wing secret organisations. The novel, which shows Hasluck's characteristic interweaving of personal, social, and metaphysical issues, with detective intrigue, is remarkable for its regional evocation of the fictional Butler's Swamp and Western Australia between the wars. The short stories of The Hat on the Letter O show Hasluck's technical versatility, and they are interesting as background to the novels.

In his most recent fiction, The Country Without Music, The Blosseville File, and A Grain of Truth, Hasluck, like John O'Hara and William Faulkner, has created an imaginary territory through which to explore contemporary actuality. Blosseville and the Baie de Baudin, and the off-shore islands of Depuis and Gournay, provide a subtle and complex milieu through which to explore historical and political issues of Western Australia. The Country Without Music is set on the island of Gournay, the site of a penal colony founded by French Revolutionaries. The ruins of the "panopticon" prison—Jeremy Bentham's model of penal reform—and the preserved guillotine stand as the ambivalent ideals of rational justice on which the island's administrator tries to build a modern capitalist society. But it is "without music" (or soul), and at the climax the island folk interact violently with authority in the rituals of Carnival.

If that novel explores political justice within the role of history, Hasluck's most recent work, A Grain of Truth turns directly to issues of contemporary law, and the novel is set on the mainland in Blosseville. The central character, the lawyer Michael Cheyne, finds himself standing for human rights against the weight of apparent justice within the legal system. The novel, which has an optimistic ending, underlines Hasluck's conviction that life is a conflict between the structures of social order—exemplified by the law—and the anarchy that lies at the core of human experience. Hasluck has declared that it is the "kind of quirky unpredictable exotic side of things" beneath the rational surface that is the task of literature to explore. Hasluck continues to develop his highly individual vein of intelligent and inventive fiction.

-Louis James

HASSLER, Jon

Nationality: American. Born: Minneapolis, Minnesota, 30 March 1933. Education: St. John's University, B.A. 1955; University of North Dakota, M.A. 1961. Family: Married (divorced), two sons and one daughter; remarried. Career: High school teacher of English for ten years; faculty member, Bemidji State University and Brainerd Community College. Since 1980 writer-in-residence, St. John's University. Awards: Friends of American Writers Novel of the Year, 1978, for Staggerford; Guggenheim grant, 1980; Society of Midland Authors Best Fiction award, 1987, for Grand Opening. D.Litt.: Assumption College, Massachusetts, 1993; University of North Dakota, 1994; University of Notre Dame, 1996. Address: St. John's University, Collegeville, Minnesota 56321, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Staggerford. New York, Atheneum, and London, Deutsch, 1977.Simon's Night. New York, Atheneum, and London, Deutsch, 1979.The Love Hunter. New York, Morrow, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1981.

A Green Journey. New York, Morrow, 1985; London, Allen, 1986. Grand Opening. New York, Morrow, 1987.

North of Hope. New York, Ballantine, 1990.

Dear James. New York, Ballantine, 1993.

Rookery Blues. New York, Ballantine, 1995.

The Dean's List. New York, Ballantine Books, 1997.

Underground Christmas. Afton, Minnesota, Afton Historical Society Press, 1999.

Poetry

The Red Oak and Other Poems. Privately printed, 1968.

Short Stories

Keepsakes and Other Stories. Afton, Minnesota, Afton Historical Society Press, 1999.

Rufus at the Door and Other Stories. Afton, Minnesota, Afton Historical Society Press, 2000.

Other

Four Miles to Pinecone (for children). New York, Warne, 1977. Jemmy (for children). New York, Atheneum, 1980. My Staggerford Journal. New York, Ballantine Books, 1999.

*

Manuscript Collections: St. Cloud State University, St. Cloud, Minnesota.

Critical Studies: An Interview with Jon Hassler (includes bibliography), Minneapolis, Dinkytown Antiquarian Bookstore, 1990.

* * *

Until very recently, only one comprehensive essay had ever been published about Jon Hassler-by Andrew Greeley in a Catholic journal. Why this should be so is not greatly surprising. Hassler is a very traditional writer with exciting, real, complex, and intriguing subject matter. But his strengths are quiet and (on the surface) unremarkable. And he is not bold and audacious like so many of our writing personalities—like, say, Norman Mailer or Camille Paglia and takes no overt political position. He is always present in his novels but he never identifies wholly with any of his major characters like Agatha McGee in Staggerford (his first novel) or Peggy Benoit in Rookery Blues (his most recent one). In fact, I would go so far as to say that although he is strongly attracted to characters like Agatha, Peggy, and Simon Shea, they don't much resemble him and often do things or take positions that he would probably not take himself. The only character he has created that is even remotely autobiographical is the young protagonist/observer of Grand Opening, Brendan Foster, whose father, like Hassler's, owns a grocery store in a small, rural Minnesota town called Plum.

Hassler's presence is subtle, quiet, and apparently unobtrusive. He is absorbed in what he is writing about and as indifferent to public recognition (as a persona) as Andrew Wyeth the painter. He does not take bold political positions, even though he sometimes seems obsessed with Church politics and the behaviors of the priests, sisters, and laypersons who people many of his novels. In some cases, he defuses potentially explosive conflicts by turning them into high comedy, as he does in Staggerford, with the confrontation between whites (or Anglos) and Native Americans, or in the strike action that takes place in Rookery Blues.

His four predominantly "Catholic" novels (Simon's Night, A Green Journey, North of Hope, and Dear James) more closely resemble the Barchester and distinctly Anglican novels of Anthony Trollope than they do the Catholic novels of Graham Greene (to whom he is sometimes compared). Like Trollope he is more fascinated with the political infighting and machinations of a huge and powerful Church that is in a state of transition than he is in the spiritual or mystical character of its clergy and laypeople. He is intrigued by the fact that laypeople like Agatha McGee and Simon Shea, both highly traditional Catholics, take vows and commitments more seriously than many of the clergy and are, in fact, "better Catholics." Shea, for instance, in one of Hassler's very best novels, Simon's Night, remains faithful for twenty years, not so much to the woman whom he marries early and who runs off with one of his colleagues as to their marriage vows. He gives up a warm and passionate relationship with one of his students who has seduced him not because he doesn't love this young woman but because he regards his vows to his unfaithful wife, Barbara, as binding. And Agatha McGee, who, at sixty-seven and on the verge of retirement from her teaching position in a religious elementary school, is startled nearly out of her mind when she discovers that an older Irishman named James O'Hannonwith whom she has engaged in a long and deeply personal correspondence—is in fact a priest. This violates her whole conception of herself as a Catholic and her conception also of what it is proper—and sacred—for a priest to do and not do. Yet the power of that friendship and its personal if not sexual intimacy fuels the action of two novels, A Green Journey and Dear James.

In a radio interview, Hassler once said that he likes to challenge his protagonists. This means, first of all, that his characters are fully alive to him, as if they were actors in a repertoire company or simply real, breathing human beings. Sometimes, as with Agatha McGee and her friend, James O'Hannon, they are central to more than one novel, larger than that one canvas. They are fully alive to him but also creatures of his own imagination and in the end they challenge him—his creative ability to make them work convincingly in new contexts and sometimes highly complex plots.

As a mark of his traditional practice, Hassler never uses stream of consciousness and other techniques perfected by such early modernists as James Joyce, Virginia Woolf, and Dorothy Richardson, even though he regularly enters the minds and sensibilities of his protagonists. Nor does he use first person singular narrative as perfected by Mark Twain in The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn or the soliloquy familiar to readers of Melville's Moby-Dick.

What Hassler does use with increasing mastery and fluidity are three other mnemonic techniques: flashbacks, journal entries, and letters. He does this because he knows all too well that what a particular character does in the present is strongly conditioned by what he or she has done or believed in the past. In his most recent novel, Rookery Blues, he inserts five two- or three-page flashbacks (set in italics) at various and appropriate points in the novel to tell us crucial things—in a very funny way—about each of the five members of the Icejam Quintet, the jazz group that forms the heart and soul of the book from beginning to end. In Staggerford, he uses the sometimes extensive journal entries written by protagonist Miles Pruitt about his early love life, especially his attraction to Carla Carpenter, the high school girl whom his brother seduces. In Dear James (as the title suggests), he makes extensive and highly dramatic use of some of the letters that Agatha McGee writes to James O'Hannon (but only mails to him much later) and the letters that she has saved from him.

Traditionally, plot is character in action or, in Hassler's case, many characters in action. For a novel to succeed, the protagonist and other major characters must first of all be rich and interesting in themselves; second, the actions they are involved in should be at least worthy of that depth and flow from it. Thus Simon Shea, in Simon's Night, is both an excellent college professor and a strong, believing Catholic. As the novel opens, he has retired from his college position and commits himself to a weirdly comic nursing home because he feels he is losing his ability to remember anything significant and is thus ready to cash in his chips. The young female doctor who regularly visits that home immediately decides that Simon is too interesting and has too much to live for to give up and in essence put himself to sleep or to death. She engineers his reunion with his wife, Barbara, and the novel ends with their beginning life together anew.

That Hassler is fascinated by richly compelling individuals who have sacrificed themselves to principle of one sort or another is equally manifest in his two later Agatha McGee-James O'Hannon novels, A Green Journey and Dear James, both of which test Agatha's rigidly held Catholic principles; she, like Simon Shea, is forced by the external circumstances of her life and her age to compromise that rigidity. This compromise grows out of the depth and richness of Agatha's character, her resilience, and the fact that she acts finally out of a character that those rigidly held principles don't explain.

In Rookery Blues, his most complex, funniest, and most satisfying novel to date, he manages to control in every respect the five protagonists—each radically different from one another—who make up the Icejam Quintet: Victor Dash is a hotheaded labor organizer, who happens also to be an aptly hotheaded drummer in the quintet; Neil Novotny is a poor teacher and an obsessed but dreadful novelist, who thinks he is in love with Peggy Benoit; Leland Edwards is a conservative, mother-bound professor and opponent of the teachers' strike Dash foments, who is a superb jazz pianist; Connor is a good portrait painter obsessed with doing paintings of mothers and daughters, who is a bass player and in a dreadfully unhappy marriage; and Peggy Benoit herself is a beautiful music professor and blues singer, who falls in love with Connor and eventually succeeds in wresting Connor away from his marriage. Any one or two of these characters might well have been the subject of a novel because each is fully, comically, ironically developed, but their interreactions and their roles in the external tensions of Rookery State University together form a complex, comic, and believable series of actions.

What makes Hassler such an interesting and engaging novelist—and what will probably make him outlast all or almost all of his flashier contemporaries—is not just that he is unashamedly a traditional novelist but that he does so well what he does, that he involves the reader so deeply in his characters that no matter who we might be we really care about them, talk about them as if they were very real and interesting people. Limited, sometimes myopic, often obsessive, they work their slow and ironic ways through recognizable and familiar situations or even rather unlikely ones (like the relationship between Agatha McGee and James O'Hannon) as if they were familiar. We come to know many of his characters better than we know most people and even ourselves (sometimes). I suspect that Jon Hassler will come to be recognized as a major 20th-century novelist.

--- C.W. Truesdale

HAUSER, Marianne

Nationality: American (originally French; granted U.S. citizenship, 1944). Born: Sreasbourg, Alsace, France, 11 December 1910. Education: University of Berlin; Sorbonne. Family: Married Frederic Kirshberger (divorced); one son. Career: Journalist, French and Swiss newspapers and periodicals; lecturer, Department of English, Queens College, New York, 1962–79; held various teaching positions, including positions at New York University and New School until 1988. Awards: Rockefeller grant; National Endowment for the Arts grant. Agent: Perry Knowlton, Curtis Brown, 1 Astor Pl., New York, New York, U.S.A. Address: 2 Washington Square Village, apt. 13-M, New York, New York 10012, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Monique. Zurich, n.p., 1934.

Shadow Play in India. Vienna, n.p., 1937.

Dark Dominion. New York, Random House, 1947.

The Choir Invisible. London, Gollancz, 1958; New York, McDowell Obolensky, 1959.

Prince Ishmael. New York, Stein and Day, 1963; London, Michael Joseph, 1964.

The Talking Room. New York, Fiction Collective, 1976.

The Memoirs of the Late Mr. Ashley: An American Comedy. N.p., Sun and Moon Press, 1986.

Me and My Mom. N.p., Sun and Moon Classics, 1993.

Short Stories

A Lesson in Music. N.p., 1964.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Colonel's Daughter," in Tiger's Eye, March 1948.
- "The Rubber Doll," in Mademoiselle, 1951.
- "Mimoun of the Mellah," in Harper's Bazaar, 1966.
- "The Seersucker Suit," in Carleton Miscellany, 1968.
- "O-To-Le-Do," in Parnassus, 14(1).
- "Weeds," in Denver Quarterly, 1983.
- "It Isn't So Bad That It Couldn't Be Worse," in City, 9, 1984.
- "Blatant Artifice," in Hallwalls, 1986.
- "Heartlands Beat," in Fiction International, 1988.
- "The Missing Page," in Witness, 1989.
- "No Name on the Bullet," in Fiction International, 1991.
- "Scandal at the Bide-a-Wee Nursing Home for Mature Seniors," in Fiction International, 1992.

Manuscript Collections: Florida University, Gainsville.

Marianne Hauser comments:

To write without compromise or an eye on the market.

* * *

Early on in Marianne Hauser's first major work, Prince Ishmael—an historical novel based on the legend of Caspar Hauser—the narrator observes, "I wasn't ready for reality black or white." This same inability to relate to a world of dizzying complexity and ambiguity through linguistic systems that reduce experience to simple binary categories is evident in all of Hauser's fiction; it also expresses Hauser's personal conviction that "reality" is a dynamic, multilayered process for which the conventions of traditional realism—with its empirical biases and emphasis on causal relationships and logic—are ill-equipped to represent. This conviction has resulted in a series of novels and stories that weave together dream and waking reality, the known and unknown, the perverse and banal, and the poetic and idiomatic into darkly humorous fables of great emotional power, uniqueness, and universal relevancy. Yet ironically enough it has been precisely the uniqueness and poetic intensity of Hauser's fiction that has thus far relegated her work to relative popular and critical obscurity—a situation that is almost certain to change as feminist and postmodern critics discover her works.

In a career that now spans some six decades, Marianne Hauser has published a total of eight books of fiction; these include an early novel written in German, Shadow Play in India, and seven subsequent English-language works: a story collection, A Lesson in Music, and five novels—Dark Dominion, The Choir Invisible, Prince Ishmael, The Talking Room, Memoirs of the Late Mr. Ashley: An American Comedy, and Me and My Mom. In the most extended and perceptive analysis of Hauser's work to date, Ewa Ziarek, writing in the Fall 1992 issue of Contemporary Literature, noted: "Marianne Hauser's fiction represents an interesting intersection between experimentation challenging literary conventions and feminist concerns. Significantly, both interests converge on the issue of articulating specifically feminine desires—sexual, reproductive, and linguistic." Yet, despite such recurrent themes—which have found their expression in remarkably rich, subtle, and evocative prose mannerisms—it would be a mistake to view her works solely or even primarily as feminist documents. Although several of her major novels—for example, Me and My Mom and The Talking Room—have been narrated by women and have focused on psychological issues peculiar to women's experiences, others have male narrators and can't be said to be specifically feminist in orientation. This isn't to deny the importance of Hauser's work from feminist perspectives-indeed, The Talking Room ranks with Marilynne Robinson's Housekeeping and Toni Morrison's Beloved as among the most significant and original feminist novels of the past 20 years; rather what needs to be stressed is that although Hauser's work has naturally always expressed viewpoints and concerns central to her own experiences as a woman, it has also consistently been concerned with expressing larger, more universal issues. Central to all her works, for example, has been an emphasis on human loneliness and the need for people to escape from isolation, understand their origins, and find erotic fulfillment. There is also a persistent fascination with epistemological and metaphysical issues the role of dreams, fantasy, and language in constructing memory and our sense of the waking world; a suspicion of empiricism and linguistic categories and a corresponding appreciation of storytelling and personal reverie in making sense of our lives.

Despite such thematic commonalties, the language, style, and tone of her work has undergone significant transformations over the last five decades. The precise, almost classical prose of Dark Dominion—which depicts a strange, haunting relationship between a nondreaming New York psychiatrist, his wife (whom he wins when he analyzes her dreams), her obsessively devoted brother, and her lover—has loosened; and Hauser has increasing incorporated American idioms, slapstick, and absurdist humor. She has also been increasingly adventurous in devising experimental formal strategies suited for portraying her sense of the permeability of dream and waking reality. The obsessions explored in Dark Dominion—the role of the imagination in shaping one's response to life, the search for and discovery in the ''dark dominion'' of the unconscious as a multilayered space in which phantom and reality coexist to create the drama of the self, and the difficulty in inhabiting a coherent ''self''— continue through her next two books, The Choir Invisible, which is set in a small town in the Midwest, and Prince Ishmael, a fictional account of the Caspar Hauser legend.

Her most recent novels, The Talking Room, The Memoirs of the Late Mr. Ashley: An American Comedy, and Me and My Mom all display a command of American lingoes and cultural references that range effortlessly from urban to rural, straight to gay, highbrow to lowbrow—all the voices a chorus of pathos, absurdity, lyricism, and beauty that sing the bittersweet song of the America Hauser found herself living when she took up permanent residency there beginning in 1937. From her earliest work, Hauser has explored how dreams, the unconscious, and the irrational affect our perception of the "real"; but with her last three novels (as well as her more recent short stories), this notion is no longer so much an element of "theme" but finds its expression as a fully integrated aspect of her style. Thus, to enter her recent fiction is to find oneself in a unsettling landscape where the strange becomes familiar and the familiar strange—a realm where people, events, and associations ebb and flow with the logic of dreams. Partly this effect comes from connections that make no rational sense but which are brought together by Hauser's ability to ground her fiction in details that are vivid and sensual; it arises too from the playfulness of her language and her willingness to let go of the linear in favor of something wilder and less predictable.

It was Hauser's 1976 novel, The Talking Room, where she first found a voice and a method uniquely her own. The plot of The Talking Room is as simple as it is outrageous. The book is narrated by B, a pregnant thirteen-year-old girl who is the daughter of a lesbian couple (her mother, V, and her lover J) who are living in a deserted neighborhood of New York City. Fearful of being forced by her "Aunt" J to have an abortion, B hides her pregnancy under the pretense of being fat and stays in her room. There she attempts to uncover the mystery of her origins (was she perhaps a test-tube baby?) by sifting through the many voices that drift up into her "talking room." These voices—which include those of her own imagination, the turbulent sounds of V and J arguing and reminiscing from downstairs, the funny and surrealistic chitchat of their eccentric friends, and the radio (which provides political and pop culture references)—combine to form what Ewa Ziarek described as a "polyphonic composition" that "makes it impossible to uncover the simplicity of origin in the maternal body." Ziarek goes on to note the ways that B's search for a matrilineal genealogy reinforces a metafictional critique of the "traditional idea of authorship as a conscious begetting, grounded in the intentionality of the author." This critique, in turn, links up to Hauser's ongoing presentation of the limitations of rationality and the ways that the search for one's self and one's origins are ultimately limited by the fact that the self is never a discrete entity but a plurality of different selves whose "essences" are themselves shifting perpetually in a state of transformation.

-Sinda Gregory

HAZZARD, Shirley

Nationality: American. Born: Sydney, New South Wales, Australia, 30 January 1931; became U.S. citizen. Education: Queenwood School, Sydney. Family: Married the writer Francis Steegmuller in 1963 (deceased 1994). Career: Staff member, Combined Services Intelligence, Hong Kong, 1947–48, United Kingdom High Commissioner's Office, Wellington, New Zealand, 1949–50, and United Nations Headquarters, New York (General Service Category), 1951–61. Awards: American Academy award, 1966; Guggenheim fellowship, 1974; O. Henry award, 1977; National Book Critics Circle award, 1981. Address: 200 East 66th Street, New York, New York 10021, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Evening of the Holiday. New York, Knopf, and London, Macmillan, 1966.

People in Glass Houses: Portraits from Organization Life. New York, Knopf, and London, Macmillan, 1967.

The Bay of Noon. Boston, Little Brown, and London, Macmillan, 1970.

The Transit of Venus. New York, Viking Press, and London, Macmillan, 1980.

Short Stories

Cliffs of Fall and Other Stories. New York, Knopf, and London, Macmillan, 1963.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Flowers of Sorrow," in Winter's Tales 10, edited by A.D. Maclean. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1964
- "Forgiving," in Ladies' Home Journal (New York), August 1964.
- "Comfort," in New Yorker, 24 October 1964.
- "The Evening of the Holiday," in New Yorker, 17 April 1965.
- "Out of Itea," in New Yorker, 1 May 1965.
- "Nothing in Excess," in New Yorker, 26 March 1966.
- "A Sense of Mission," in New Yorker, 4 March 1967.
- "Swoboda's Tragedy," in New Yorker, 20 May 1967.
- "Story of Miss Sadie Graine," in New Yorker, 10 June 1967.
- "Official Life," in New Yorker, 24 June 1967.
- "The Separation of Dinah Delbanco," in New Yorker, 22 July 1967.
- "The Everlasting Delight," in New Yorker, 19 August 1967.
- "Statue and the Bust," in McCall's (New York), August 1971.
- "Sir Cecil's Ride," in Winter's Tales 21, edited by A.D. Maclean. London, Macmillan, 1975; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1976.
- "A Long Story Short," in Prize Stories 1977: The O. Henry Awards, edited by William Abrahams. New York, Doubleday, 1977.
- "A Crush on Doctor Dance," in Winter's Tales 24, edited by A.D. Maclean. London, Macmillan, 1978; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1979.
- "Something You'll Remember Always," in New Yorker, 17 September 1979.
- "She Will Make You Very Happy," in New Yorker, 26 November 1979.
- "Forgiving," in Ladies' Home Journal (New York), January 1984.
- "The Meeting," in The Faber Book of Contemporary Australian Short Stories, edited by Murray Bail. London, Faber, 1988.

"The Place to Be," in Prize Stories 1988, edited by William Abrahams. New York, Doubleday, 1988.

"In These Islands," in New Yorker, 18 June 1990.

Other

Defeat of an Ideal: A Study of the Self-Destruction of the United Nations. Boston, Little Brown, 1972; London, Macmillan, 1973. Coming of Age in Australia (lectures). Sydney, Australian Broadcasting Corporation, 1985.

Countenance the Truth: The United Nations and the Waldheim Case. New York, Viking, 1990; London, Chatto and Windus, 1991. Greene on Capri: A Memoir. New York, Farrar, Straus, Giroux, 2000.

*

Critical Studies: "Patterns and Preoccupations of Love: The Novels of Shirley Hazzard" by John Colmer, in Meanjin (Melbourne), December 1970; Recent Fiction by R.G. Geering, Melbourne, Oxford University Press, 1974; "Shirley Hazzard: Dislocation and Continuity" by Robert Sellick, in Australian Literary Studies (Hobart), October 1979; "Shirley Hazzard Issue" of Texas Studies in Literature and Language (Austin), vol. 25, no. 2, 1983.

* * *

Shirley Hazzard is a slow, painstaking writer who seems to have known where she was going in her art right from the beginning. Her first published work, the 10 stories in Cliffs of Fall and Other Stories, is like the rest of her fiction with the exception of People in Glass Houses in that it is concerned with the tensions, complications, and disappointments of adult sexual love. The stories involve doubles, triangles, and sometimes quadrilaterals of people caught up with one another in complex webs of relationships, the trails of which are traced out in the subtle, witty, biting prose that is Hazzard's trademark. Usually the stories are told from the perspective of the female protagonist and often, as is the case with much of Hazzard's fiction, they are set in a fairly recent past. The scenes range from England to the United States and in one case Switzerland. Sometimes they consist simply of observation of manners at some occasion or gathering—"The Party," "The Weekend," "The Picnic"—but almost invariably they are chronicles of pain and betrayal.

The Evening of the Holiday is a short novel, a simple and rather inconclusive account of a love affair between a woman named Sophie and an Italian, Tancredi, who is separated from his wife but cannot gain a divorce under Italian law, a situation that occurs in several of these stories. It is a tender, elegantly written book with a strong but rather cryptic sense of fatalism hanging over it. People in Glass Houses is a brilliantly funny and scathing collection of eight interrelated stories concerning an unnamed "Organization" which is transparently the United Nations, where Hazzard worked for a time. The stories are linked, not merely by the reappearance of several characters such as Mr. Bekkus, Clelia Kinglake, Swoboda, Rodriguez-O'Hearn, and others but by the repetition of the savage criticisms that the author offers in each story. In her view, the U.N. is characterized by petty and insensitive bureaucracy, a determination to squeeze out the individual and the gifted, an absence of personal feeling and a refusal to promote loyal and efficient, if limited, employees such as Swoboda and Dinah Delbanco. It is especially unfair in the last respect to women. Hazzard's interest in language itself, always strong in her fiction, has never been livelier or more intense than in this book and she constantly points to bureaucratic inertia, insensitivity, and finally lack of human feeling by concentrating on the way people use language. The interest surfaces early in the figure of Algie Wyatta, rebel, iconoclast, and therefore doomed, who collects contradictions in terms such as ''military intelligence,'' 'competent authorities'' and ''easy virtue.'' The egregious Mr. Bekkus is characterized in terms of his employment of jargon. The story ''The Flowers of Sorrow'' hinges around an important personage intruding a personal note into his speech— ''In my country ... we have a song that asks, Will the flowers of joy ever equal the flowers of sorrow''—and the diverse but almost always disparaging reaction to this on the part of his staff.

The Bay of Noon is again a short novel, set in Naples and dealing with the complex relationships worked out among four people from a perspective of some twelve or fifteen years later. The story is told in the first person by Jenny, an English girl sent to Italy as a translator, who becomes involved with Gioconda, her lover Gianni and a Scot named J.P. (Justin) Tulloch. Hazzard brings to her treatment of the familiar theme of love and its entanglements all the sophisticated techniques she has been steadily developing in her fiction and which culminate in her finest and most ambitious novel, The Transit of Venus. The language is packed with literary allusion. There are aggressively bracketed interpolations, such as a violent attack on the military. There is a flash forward to Tulloch's eventual death in a plane crash, a recurring event in Hazzard's fiction. It is an enjoyable but finally rather lightweight novel that has an uncharacteristic look of improvisation about its plot.

But Hazzard's masterpiece and the basis of her reputation is undoubtedly The Transit of Venus. A young Australian woman travels to England with her sister, has a relationship with a worthless man, is reduced to material poverty and emotional impoverishment, out of which she is rescued by a rich, liberal-minded, middle-aged American. However, the novel moves on to the deeply melancholy ending of the death of its heroine Caroline (Caro) Bell in an air crash and the post-fictive suicide of Ted Tice, the man she has finally realized she loved and was on the way to meet. The novel is about love and about truth, about the difference between those who love truly and those who exploit emotions for selfish ends. It is also about chance and the contingent, specifically the accident referred to in the title by which Australia came to be discovered by Captain Cook.

The motif of Venus itself becomes an important one in the novel, along with a number of others of which perhaps the most important is that of the shipwreck. Caro is indeed a child of Venus in that for her. love is a total commitment; it is part of her complete emotional honesty, her belief in the possibility of an excellence and distinction that are not necessarily related to any demonstrable achievement or worldly success but may consist solely in a life of constant personal integrity: "the truth has a life of its own," she says. The Transit of Venus is an unfashionably romantic novel. Coupled with this, however, is the fact that in terms of structure and technique it is also ruthlessly calculating, even cold-blooded. This paradoxical combination has upset many of its critics. The novel is structured around an inferential method that makes heavy demands on the reader's ability to connect different events and personages, and demonstrates the author's almost lordly superiority over and distance from her material. Of these demands, the most important is the suicide of Ted Tice which, though mentioned explicitly early in the novel, takes place after its close and can be worked out by the reader only by carefully following a number of clues scattered carefully throughout its pages.

However, the meticulous—sometimes almost too meticulous—craftsmanship of the novel and the elegance and subtle wit of the style are a delight and almost unique among contemporary Australian fiction writers.

-Laurie Clancy

HEALY, Dermot

Nationality: Irish. Born: Finea, County Westmeath, Ireland, 9 November 1947. Family: Married Anne Mari Cusack in 1974; two children. Career: Worked as laborer and insurance underwriter in England and Ireland; owner and editor, Drumlin magazine, 1978–79; director, Hacklers Drama group, 1980–81. Awards: Hennessy Literary Awards, 1974, 1976; Tom Gallan Award (Society of Authors), 1983; All-Ireland Athlone Award. Agent: c/o Allison & Busby Ltd., 6A Noel Street, London W1V 3RB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Fighting with Shadows; or, Sciamachy. London and New York, Allison & Busby, 1984.

A Goat's Song. London, HarperCollins, 1993; New York, Viking, 1995.

Sudden Times. New York, Harcourt, 2000.

Short Stories

Banished Misfortune. London and New York, Allison & Busby, 1982.

Plays

Screenplays: Our Boys, 1979; Interrogations (also radio play), 1980.

Poetry

The Ballyconnell Colours. Loughcrew, Ireland, Gallery Press, 1992. What the Hammer. Oldcastle, Ireland, Gallery Press, 1998.

Other

The Bend for Home (autobiography). New York, Harcourt Brace, 1987.

Contributor, Soft Day, edited by Sean Golden and Peter Fallon. Dublin, Wolfhound, 1977.

Contributor, Paddy No More, edited by William Vorm. Dublin, Wolfhound, 1978.

Contributor, Firebird. Harmondsworth, England, Penguin, 1982. Contributor, A Feast of Christmas Stories. London, Macmillan, 1983.

* * *

Dermot Healy's first novel, Fighting with Shadows, is set in the rural border village of Fanacross, the midlands country between Northern Ireland and the Republic, during the renewal of the Troubles and the civil rights movements for Catholics in the 1960s and 1970s. No one else talks or thinks like the characters of this novel. If Healy's singular representation of human behavior wins belief, then every other novelist is wrong, or centuries of conflict in Ireland have produced a tribe for whom a different psychology and sociology is needed.

It is possible to evoke a story from this novel of forty-two chapters in eight parts. The extended family of Allens suffer. Joseph Allen's aunt was run down by a car, a murder more likely than an accident. His uncle George futilely searches with a gun for the car. Joseph's father was shot opening the door of their home, perhaps mistaken for his twin brother George; George disappeared into the South, returning only to clear his dead brother's name so that his widow can be compensated by the State.

Perhaps to get him clear of trouble, Joseph is sent to another uncle in the South. He works in their hotel which eventually fails because the Troubles ruin the easier atmosphere that it requires. When Joseph and his friend the hotel chef try to break up a fight, the chef is arrested; Joseph asks to accompany him to jail where he is beaten savagely, and made to confess to a misdemeanor to get rid of their attention. The novel closes on Joseph's mother receiving compensation by ignoring the advice of her lawyer to settle the case against the State (Frank Allen's killer was a part-time member of the UDR, in company with the Royal Ulster Constabulary [RUC]). They buy a house and move what is left of the family out of Fanacross.

No plot summary does justice to a novel, of course. The tone and sequence of narrative is skewed, lost. What happens in Fighting with Shadows violates no laws of probability. But Healy offers characters who think differently. There is some explanation at the beginning, perhaps to accommodate our customary psychological understanding. Fanacross is between North and South; there is a severe drought; even an improving economy in the South is named as cause of a greater questioning, and a greater consciousness.

In a chapter given over to letters, we read one that Joseph receives from Margaret, his cousin, describing his mother's distress. "It was not your mother's sanity went but her memory. She sees things isolated, as they are, connected to nothing in the past, irreversibly severed from their fellows and therefore offered up obscene." Her perspicacity is in no way unusual among fellow characters. If it were not for their troubles, the book would read like Nightwood: a setpiece for poetic prose.

A Goat's Song is Healy's second novel, after ten years (he also writes short stories and poetry). Thirty-four chapters are distributed over four sections. "Christmas Day in the Workhouse" is the first section, which sees the way Jack Ferris's drinking frustrates his career as a playwright and his love for Catherine. He works off a fishing boat in the west of Ireland. His time on land is devoted to drink, not his plays or Catherine, except for making things between them worse. As the novel begins, Jack comes back to his cottage with a letter from Catherine, which says that she loves him and will rejoin him.

Their promise to each other is that they will grow old and sober together, but Jack can't keep the promise. Because Catherine knows he has broken it, she doesn't return. Jack embarrasses himself by repeatedly phoning her at the Dublin theatre which is rehearsing the play he wrote for her. At the end of this section Jack has finally taken himself to the hospital to dry out. He knows that his relationship is over, that once he writes about her, they can never get back together.

The novel offers no gimmick to prove it is Jack's own work, but the following sections tell the story he intends to write. We blame Jack in the first section, but that is not tragedy, which is what the novel's title seems to mean. The following sections begin by telling the story of Catherine and her family as Protestants from the North. Her father trained for the clergy, but couldn't preach. He joined the RUC to answer his sense of duty. His life provides an effective incentive to the reader to leave blaming behind. He is a serious family man, thoughtful, even scholarly. Yet when he is caught up in the early stages of the civil rights in Belfast (he is one of the constables imported into Belfast to increase security), he is surprised to see himself on television beating an old man with his truncheon.

We follow Catherine's early life in the North, and her family's gradual shift to the South. We learn more about her life than Jack's life. When it comes to her time with him, we get a different view from our first one. They are both drinkers, both unable to be constant to each other's love. When the novel closes in the present time of their difficult relationship breaking up, at a moment of unreasoning hope, blaming or accusing either of them is behind us now, replaced by our sorrow for them.

Sudden Times begins in Sligo. Oliver Ewing (Ollie) is a damaged narrator and central character, reminding an American audience of Faulkner's Benjy, but an Irish readership will think of McCabe's "butcher boy." The source of Ollie's trouble is reflected in a series of flashbacks that gradually fill in, taking us back to London. He first shared a portakabin with his friend Marty Kilgallan, night-watching a construction area. Their life is an idyllic late (male) adolescence, drinking, partying, staying "home" to listen to music. But Marty is worried about having angered some toughs who run a protection racket in the construction industry. Eventually Ollie finds Marty's corpse in the back of his truck, disfigured with acid.

Ollie's brother Redmond arrives after Ollie has confronted Silver John, an employer of day laborers, with Marty's death. The first-person narration helps the reader to understand how Ollie allows himself to suspect Silver John yet find it necessary to work for him. Silver John's bodyguard gets into a fight with Redmond at a party. He returns to torch Redmond, burning himself as well. The novel closes on the trial, where the judicial system makes a fool of Ollie through cross-examination, turning what we have read as understandable decisions against him. One example: after Redmond is taken to the hospital, Ollie cleans up the flat, sickened by the traces of the violence. Yet the defense for Redmond's killer accuses Ollie of destroying evidence. All that we have to balance against Ollie's diminished being at the end of the book is the reconciliation with his father, narrated to us by Ollie early on before we understand the basis of their estrangement.

Although three novels in twenty years is less than his immediate peers in Irish fiction, Healy has so far produced original work without repeating himself. The prose style of his autobiographical The Bend for Home most closely resembles his first novel, which suggests that originality requires that he move further away from himself as subject.

-William A. Johnsen

HEATH, Roy A(ubrey) K(elvin)

Nationality: Guyanese. Born: British Guiana, now Guyana, 13 August 1926. Education: Central High School, Georgetown; University of London, 1952–56, B.A. (honours) in French 1956; called to the bar, Lincoln's Inn, 1964. Family: Married Aemilia Oberli; three children. Career: Treasury clerk, Georgetown, 1944–51; clerical worker, London, 1951–58; primary school teacher, Inner London Education Authority, 1959–68. Since 1968 French and German teacher, Barnet Borough Council, London. Awards: Guyana Theatre Guild award, 1972; Guardian Fiction prize, 1978; Guyana Literature prize, 1989. Agent: Bill Hamilton, A.M. Heath, 79 St. Martin's Lane, London WC2N 4AA. Address: c/o Allison and Busby Ltd, 44 Hill St, London W1X8LB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Man Come Home. London, Longman, 1974.

The Murderer. London, Allison and Busby, 1978; New York, Persea, 1992.

Kwaku; or, The Man Who Could Not Keep His Mouth Shut. London, Allison and Busby, 1982.

Orealla. London, Allison and Busby, 1984.

The Shadow Bride. London, Collins, 1988.

The Armstrong Trilogy. New York, Persea, 1994.

From the Heat of the Day. London, Allison and Busby, 1979.

One Generation. London, Allison and Busby, 1981.

Genetha. London, Allison and Busby, 1981.

The Ministry of Hope. London and New York, Marion Boyars, 1997.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Miss Mabel's Burial," in Kaie (Georgetown, Guyana), 1972.
- "The Wind and the Sun," in Savacou (Kingston, Jamaica), 1974.
- "The Writer of Anonymous Letters," in Firebird 2, edited by T.J. Binding. London, Penguin, 1983.
- "Sisters," in London Magazine, September 1988.
- "The Master Tailor and the Lady's Skirt," in *Colours of a New Day:*New Writing for South Africa, edited by Sarah Lefanu and Stephen Hayward. London, Lawrence and Wishart, and New York, Pantheon, 1990.
- "According to Marx," in So Very English, edited by Marsha Rowe. London, Serpent's Tail, 1991.

Plays

Inez Combray (produced Georgetown, Guyana, 1972).

Other

Art and History (lectures). Georgetown, Guyana, Ministry of Education, 1984.

Shadows Round the Moon: Caribbean Memoirs. London, Collins, 1990.

*

Roy A.K. Heath comments:

A Man Come Home relates the story of a large working-class Guyanese family whose mores provide a striking contrast to those of their middle-class brethren. From the Heat of the Day and One Generation are the first two parts of a trilogy treating the condition of the middle classes in Guyana in the 20th century. Genetha completes the trilogy and shows the heroine faced with the choice of joining the Catholic church, returning to a life of prostitution, or living with her aunts in a stifling middle-class atmosphere. Kwaku is the tale of a trickster figure. Orealla, the unseen haven for the main character in the novel of that title, is real, yet imagined.

I see myself as a chronicler of Guyanese life in this century.

* * *

Roy A.K. Heath's eight novels, beginning with A Man Come Home and concluding with the most recent, The Shadow Bride, represent a distinctive body of fictive insights into contemporary Guyanese society. It blends traditional social realism with local folklore and myths to dramatize the everyday lives of the poor and the lower middle class in the capital, Georgetown, and, occasionally, in the rural hinterlands. Indeed, it is this kind of blending, or interweaving, that makes for one of Heath's distinctive strengths as a novelist. The folk myths of "obeah" or voudun ("voodoo"), the strict orthodoxies of biblical morality, local legends drawn from Amerindian or East Indian sources—these all co-exist with the empirical "realities" of everyday village life, the familiar routine of middle-class home life, or the rough-and-tumble of the streets and slumyards of Georgetown's impoverished districts. Heath's is a world of popular beliefs and customs which determine the perceptions and choices of his characters; and the very diversity of values and viewpoints, not only within the community but also within any single individual, dramatizes the discrete complexities of the social milieu, complicates the very notion of moral judgment or social choices in the recurrent tensions between classes, religious traditions, and cultural backgrounds, and, finally, challenges conventional assumptions about "social realism" in prose fiction.

This discreteness also goes hand in hand with Heath's other strength—his ability to evoke a given environment and its social milieu (urban slum, middle-class neighborhood, rural village, and so forth), bringing to life the sights and sounds of a family dining room or a Georgetown whorehouse in vivid, richly suggestive vignettes. In his more recent fiction, especially in the impressively crafted Kwaku, he has shown signs of developing a flair for a lively, effective prose style as well as for credible characterization; but even in the previous novels where thinness of characterization and of style is often a problem, Heath's reader is always aware of a provocative intelligence perpetually raising questions about the nature of social reality and of moral judgments in a vividly realized world. These questions are integrated with recurrent themes which typify all of Heath's fiction: the inevitable obsession with material success in a society dominated by poverty, and the price of success as well as of failure; the conflict between the needs and desires of the private self and the restrictive conventions of a world in which ideals of family responsibility, social respectability, and moral conventions are paramount; and that unending war between the sexes in which mutual exploitiveness and shared dependency, hostility and desire all seem to mirror tensions and contradictions in human society as a whole. In turn all of these conflicts center on a fundamental dilemma which links all the novels, the dilemma of freedom: for whether the quest be freedom from poverty or from some intolerable marriage, Heath's rebel-protagonists must always wrestle, usually inconclusively, with certain unresolved contradictions—it seems all but impossible to flee from poverty without losing a part of one's basic humanity in the process of amassing wealth; the despised spouse (Heath's marriages are invariably wretched) is also an integral, indispensable part of one's self; and the young rebels against family and conventional morality soon discover that the target of their rebellion is also an ineradicable part of themselves

In A Man Come Home the chief rebel is Archie "Bird" Foster who tries to escape from the poverty of Georgetown's slum-yards by entering into a liaison with one of the legendary "Water People" of Guyanese folklore, a "Fair Maid," or witch. She gives him unlimited wealth on condition that he returns regularly to her bed at her bidding. Now wealthy, he quickly collects the usual trappings of middle-class affluence—an ostentatious house in the suburbs, expensive habits, and a wife (in the person of his long-suffering girlfriend from the slum-yard). The legendary materials provide Heath with a rather obvious and ready-made allegory on the middle-class aspirations of the poor, and the moral cost of acquiring wealth in exchange for one's humanity—for the contract with the Fair Maid is, in effect, a Faustian pact. His marriage, his ties with the rest of his family and with his old friends all conflict with that pact, and when he reneges on his agreement with the Fair Maid in order to re-establish the "normal" relationships and "respectable" conventions of his society, she exacts the inevitable price: he dies in a car accident which also claims the life of his sister's children.

Bird's tragedy is not isolated, for even the most isolated of Heath's characters are bound up with their families and the rest of society. The deaths of the children therefore emphasize that Bird's tragedy has become a family disaster. His sister never recovers from her loss, and her marriage eventually collapses. At the same time his father's household continues the steady decline which actually started before Bird's misadventures. Egbert Foster, the father, tries, unsuccessfully, to establish peace in a home in which his mistress envies the social life and sexual activity of her young daughter Melda. She administers a savage beating from which Melda never recovers fully, spending the rest of her life as an idiot. In the meanwhile the older woman enters upon an affair with one of Bird's slum-yard friends (who is also Melda's lover), then betrays him to her husband's inevitable violence. Viewed in the context of the Foster family as a whole, then, it becomes clear that Bird's liaison with the Fair Maid is not only an allegory on the moral dilemmas of poverty and materialism; it is also a mythological re-enactment of sexual conflicts and contradictions. The weakness and domination, the mutual exploitation, the futile obsession with escape and freedom—these are not only the patterns of Bird's ill-fated liaison with the Fair Maid, but also the familiar, repetitive patterns in his family and among his friends.

This grim vision of sexual relationships dominates The Murderer, where the waste and mutual destructiveness of many conventional relationships are explored through the experiences of abnormal psychology—a narrative strategy which allows Heath to juxtapose images of the "normal" or "conventional" with patterns of "abnormality" in order to challenge settled assumptions about these terms. The murderer is an archetypal psychotic: Galton Flood has been scarred by a wretched childhood in which his sexuality and social instincts were repressed or warped by the ridicule and harshness of a domineering mother who also made life miserable for her husband. His parents' marriage is a model of the shared resentment and contempt which characterize sexual unions in Galton's world, and when he becomes an adult he is deeply suspicious of women, a suspiciousness that is aggravated by his general inability to socialize. When he does marry, he chooses a wife whose prior experience (with an older lover and a dependent but unloving father) has convinced her that men are unreliable and weak beneath the usual male bravado. The marriage quickly fails because of Galton's jealousy and because of the unsociability which prevents him from developing a stable career. His jealousy is the first symptom of criminal insanity. He kills his wife, and although he confesses the murder to both her family and to his own, he is never brought to justice. He ends up, instead, as a street derelict, a relatively harmless idiot who is supported by his kind-hearted brother. Galton's inability to function as part of the family unit or in society at large is partly counteracted by the generosity and family loyalties of his older brother; but Heath's main achievement is to evoke ironic parallels between Galton's "abnormal" obsessions and those familiar habits of possessiveness and abusiveness which characterize the sexual relationships of "normal" people. "Abnormal" psychology is as much an allegory of the "real" world here, as "supernatural" events are in A Man Come Home.

Heath's other family tragedy, the tragedy of the Armstrong family, is the subject of his Georgetown trilogy, From the Heat of the Day, One Generation, and Genetha. The first work traces the history of the parents' marriage (Sonny Armstrong, from a poor, relatively uneducated background, resents his wife's middle-class family even before he marries her). It is a history of failing affections and growing isolation on both sides, a growing misery which inevitably affects the two children, Genetha and Rohan, and which concludes with the death of Mrs. Armstrong. Her misery, at least, ends with her death. He drowns his in drink, until he dies as a derelict pensioner, early in One Generation. The second novel describes Rohan's flight from the Georgetown family home, away from the possessive caring of his sister, to a Civil Service job in rural Guyana where he falls in love with a married woman while living with her sister. He is killed by his impoverished East Indian assistant who envies him his social standing and relative prosperity. His murderer is never discovered, and his impunity reinforces the grim realities which lend an air of inevitability and repetition to the trilogy as a whole: Rohan's personal life has been as wasted as his parents'; his sexual relationships have been equally fraught with betrayals and exploitation; and he, too, leaves behind him a legacy of hurt. The inheritors of that legacy are Dada, the mother of his unborn child, who has been victimized by his duplicity with her sister, and his own sister, Genetha, whom he has abandoned to face life alone as a single, inexperienced girl in Georgetown. Finally, in the third part of the trilogy, Genetha recalls her late mother by virtue of her loneliness and isolation, her inability to develop satisfactory relationships with men, and the perpetual tension between her need for the middle-class respectability of her mother's family and her dislike of the family's suffocating propriety. She ends as a total dependent on the family's former maid, now a very successful "madam" of a Georgetown whorehouse (another "success" acquired at the cost of one's humanity). Esther, like Mr. Armstrong before her, despises the middle-class attitudes of Genetha and the late Mrs. Armstrong, but the eventual bond between Genetha and Esther transcends the barriers, for it has been strengthened by their common experiences as women in a world of weak, bullying men.

Kwaku, the hero of the novel of the same name, is no bully, but he is another weak, insecure male whose dependency on his wife (Gwendoline) and his close, lifelong friend (Blossom) has been intensified by the fact that as a social misfit he has never made friends among the villagers with whom he has grown up. Like the other figures of poverty in Heath's fiction, he tries to make money, succeeding for a while as a "healer" in the small town of New Amsterdam. But his insecurity, his need to brag and command respect, leads to his downfall: he runs afoul of the village fisherman when he fails to "cure" the latter's family problems. The fisherman retaliates by resorting to obeah: Gwendoline becomes blind and the family sinks into utter destitution. Kwaku's children rebel or are forced to leave home for sheer survival, and both Kwaku and Gwendoline end up as a drunken pair of derelicts in New Amsterdam. It is worth noting that, to his credit, Kwaku never deserts his family in order to resuscitate his business as "healer" —despite the fact that the expenses of supporting a blind wife and eight children make it impossible for him to start up his business again. But the familiar irony with which Heath handles family and love remains the final judgment here. Kwaku is loyal to his family because he needs them. As he himself recognizes, his love for his wife is a kind of possessiveness—a possessiveness which we can easily recognize, in some of its most repulsive forms, in Gwendoline. Unlike Gwendoline, Blossom is fiercely independent—but her own marriage survives, after a fashion, because she has bullied her own husband into his (accepting) place, even manipulating him into "accepting" a child which, he himself knows, he never fathered. In the uncompromising realism of Heath's 20th-century vision, Wilfred's marital happiness with Blossom is the happiness of the Swiftian fool in A Tale of a Tub—a state of being well deceived. It is the kind of "happiness" which exemplifies the solid achievements and rich possibilities of Heath's narrative irony.

-Lloyd W. Brown

HEGI, Ursula

Nationality: German-American. Born: Ursula Koch in West Germany (emigrated to United States, 1965; naturalized citizen, 1970), 23 May 1946. Education: University of New Hampshire, B.A. 1978, M.A. 1979. Family: Married Ernest Hegi in 1967; two sons. Career: Lecturer in English, University of New Hampshire, Durham, 1978—. Agent: Gail Hochman, Paul R. Reynolds, Inc., 12 East 41st Street, New York, New York 10017, U.S.A. Address: Department of English, University of New Hampshire, Durham, New Hampshire 03824, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Intrusions. New York, Viking Press, 1981.
Floating in My Mother's Palm. New York, Poseidon Press, 1990.
Stones from the River. New York, Poseidon Press, 1994.
Salt Dancers. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1995.
The Vision of Emma Blau. New York, Simon & Schuster, 2000.

Short Stories

Unearned Pleasures and Other Stories. Moscow, Idaho, University of Idaho Press, 1988.

Other

Tearing the Silence: Being German in America. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1997.

* * *

There are three dominant subjects in the fiction of Ursula Hegi: the twentieth-century experience of being German in Germany and in America, the pain and complexity of the private lives of families and individuals, and the flow of experience in communities. Her method is a fine tapestry of prose of great subtlety and humanity, a naturalism often enriched by luminous images that telescope or expand time, linking generations or events in a gossamer pattern.

Hegi's Intrusions differs from her later fiction as it is an experimental metafictional novel in the style of John Barth and Robert Coover. The intrusions are those of the author and the characters, who get into rows about how the novel is going. The author frequently breaks off to complain about intrusions from her husband and children, and then her characters begin to attack her for misusing them. "The characters have moved in. They follow me around, even crowd my family at the dinner table." Both her heroine Megan Stone and she herself are trying to get peace and isolation and the stories of their lives converge without actually meeting towards the end of the book. There are brilliantly funny sections, such as the intrusions of a Norman Mailer supporter who vividly outlines the gross chauvinist style he thinks should be used for the sex scenes or the moment when Megan finds out what childbirth labor really feels like. While Hegi's later novels move away from this intellectual play, the concern with the management of the story remains one of her central concerns.

Although Hegi's Floating in My Mother's Palm is described as a novel, it is closer to a series of linked sketches of the girlhood of Hanna Malter and her perceptions of the fictional town of Burgdorf, a central construction in much of Hegi's writing. Hanna has complex memories of her mother, an artist and an unusual person in a small town, who dies in a car accident when Hanna is fourteen. The title chapter/story is about her mother's love of swimming and how she taught her young daughter to swim, supporting her in the water with safe hands as they swam in thunderstorms and rain in the nearby quarry. The final chapter/story "Saving a Life" occurs shortly after Hanna's mother's death when Hanna, wanting to save a life, goes swimming in the Rhein and is trapped by a barge's cables underwater. After escaping she realizes that she has saved a life—her own—and the reader sees in this her mother's loving care in teaching her to swim as well as her model to Hanna of daring and independence. The sections of Floating in My Mother's Palm are all from Hanna's point of view, so her experience shapes the events. In "The Woman Who Would Not Speak," for example, a drunken husband hangs himself by accidentally kicking away the chair while trying to get his wife to accept his apology. His wife sits clutching the kitchen table while he dies. When Hanna relates this horrifying tale she wishes to freeze the moment, Fixed in my mind, they have stayed like this—in that instant when everything is still possible, when luck lies suspended and wants to mold itself into a new beginning.

The moving Floating in My Mother's Palm is a set of finger exercises for Stones from the River. This sweeping panoramic novel begins during World War I and follows the flow of the lives of the citizens of Burgdorf to 1952, through the horrors of Hitler's regime, through deaths and births and murders and romances and humor and madness and all the profound and absurd possibilities of human experience. Its central figure is Trudi Montag, a Zwerg or dwarf who grows up in the love of her father after her mother's early insanity and death. She and her father keep the town pay-library and she becomes the town center for gossip and information. While on the one hand this novel is a vast chronicle of a culture in turmoil, on another it is an intimate study of how Trudi comes to accept and understand herself and the lives of those around her. Although comparison with Günter Grass's Oskar in The Tin Drum is inevitable, Trudi is far less acerbic and surreal a character, a Zwerg rather than a boy frozen in miniature as a result of the horrors of Nazi Germany. Moreover, in Trudi Hegi is pursuing a more elusive and poetic goal—the implications of the storymaker as a maker and interpreter of reality.

The central metaphor of Stones from the River is the idea of the river of experience which is defined by the "stones" of persons and events. In her childhood pain Trudi piles a cairn of stones at the river for her painful memories of individuals, a cairn beside which she and her wartime lover later make love. But those stones are also the pebbles embedded in her mother's knee, which she later realizes are the evidence of her mother's adultery with a motorcyclist while her father fought in World War I. Slowly Trudi becomes aware that she shapes stories through her intuition, and that stories give her power over people. She saves her own life in this way by making up the exact story that captures the cynical nihilism of a Gestapo interrogator who waives his power to send her to a camp because she reads him so well. This novel, Hegi's masterpiece to date, has both scope and a lyrical richness of detail and sensitivity. It in no way defends Nazi horrors except in the Latin sense of the word apology: being an explanation of a people, a history, and a time. But through Trudi and those delineated around her it is also an intense document of the poetry of lives lived.

Salt Dancers tells of the struggle of 41-year-old Julia Ives to resolve her relationship with her father before she has a first child. She has not seen him for twenty-three years and carries memories of his drinking and his beating and mistreating her after her mother mysteriously left the family. In an increasingly painful and complex unraveling that leaps through time to childhood from the present, Julia realizes the degree to which she has confused the past, a revelation that tempers her vision of events. As with Trudi's revelations in Stones from the River Julia's truth opens an understanding of the meanings of the interlocked lives so richly depicted. The salt dance of the title refers to a family tradition that walking over a line of salt will mean leaving cares behind. The novel clarifies that this is not so simply possible, but it also indicates that a new beginning is possible.

Next Hegi produced Unearned Pleasures, a collection of short stories set in the United States, and Tearing the Silence: Being German in America, a brilliant shaped collection of interviews that reveal the struggles, the denials, the forms of acceptance and the struggle against prejudice for German Americans. This latter collection undoubtedly influenced Hegi's most recent novel, The Vision of Emma Blau. It follows Stefan Blau, who runs away from his home in Burgdorf at the age of thirteen in 1894, as he comes to America and becomes wealthy by a lake in New Hampshire as a restaurateur and as the owner of a large apartment building, the Wasserburg, or water fortress. It follows Stefan through two brief American marriages, the first of which ends at childbirth and the second one week afterward. He then brings Helene Montag, Trudi's aunt, from Burgdorf to be his third wife but his fear of losing her blunts his passion and blights their marriage, although they do have one child, Robert, who in turn has Emma, Stefan's granddaughter. Stefan had had a vision of the sixyear-old Emma dancing before Wasserburg was even built, a vision he lives to see. After his death the property becomes the subject of complex struggles as it gradually declines, and in the closing passages Emma frees herself from the legacy she has tried to preserve.

Once again Hegi constructs a rich vision of a community, this time in New Hampshire, passing through the generations. In this novel she deals with the German heritage and American attitudes to it. But the true power of Hegi's writing lies in the detail, in the wealth of vision of human struggles within the frame of societies. Her characters are their fathers' and mothers' children, but they grow, struggle, and change, always in a natural world as powerfully depicted as the worlds of families and communities. That she has given Germans of the twentieth century a voice is no doubt a product of her own circumstances, but that is not the limit of her powers. Like the water that figures so prominently in the images in her novels she sees the unending flow of the human scene, rich with love and sometimes diverted by hate. Always there is the flow, and those who tell stories about both ripples and waves.

-Peter Brigg

HELPRIN, Mark

Nationality: American. Born: New York, New York, 28 June 1947. Education: Harvard University, A.B. 1969, A.M. 1972; postgraduate study at Magdalen College, University of Oxford, 1976–77. Military Service: British Merchant Navy; infantrymen, Israeli Army, and field security officer, Israeli Air Force, 1972–73; British Merchant Navy. Family: Married Lisa Kennedy in 1980; two daughters. Career: Instructor, Harvard University; senior fellow, Hudson Institute; advisor, Bob Dole presidential campaign, 1996; journalist and contributing editor, Wall Street Journal. Awards: PEN/Faulkner award, 1982; National Jewish Book award, 1982; Prix de Rome (American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters), 1982; Guggenheim fellow, 1984. Address: c/o Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, Inc., 15 East 26th Street, New York, New York 10010, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Refiner's Fire: The Life and Adventures of Marshall Pearl, a Foundling. New York, Knopf, 1977.

Winter's Tale. San Diego, California, Harcourt, 1983.

A Soldier of the Great War. San Diego, California, Harcourt, 1991. Memoir from Antproof Case. New York, Harcourt, 1995.

Fiction (for children)

Swan Lake, illustrated by Chris Van Allsburg. Boston, Houghton, 1989.

A City in Winter: The Queen's Tale, illustrated by Chris Van Allsburg. New York, Viking, 1996.

The Veil of Snows, illustrated by Chris Van Allsburg. New York, Viking, 1997.

Short Stories

A Dove of the East, and Other Stories. New York, Knopf, 1975.Ellis Island and Other Stories. New York, Seymour Lawrence/Delacorte, 1981.

Other

Introduction, Manhattan Lightscape, photographs by Nathaniel Liebe. New York, Abbeville Press, 1990.

Preface, Moby Dick, or, The Whale by Herman Melville. New York, Barnes & Noble Books, 1994.

Foreword, Only Spring: On Mourning the Death of My Son by Gordon Livingston. San Francisco, HarperSanFrancisco, 1995.

Contributor, In the Name of the Father: Stories About Priests, edited by Michael F. McCauley. Chicago, T. More Press, 1983.

Contributor, Reinventing the American People: Unity and Diversity Today, edited by Robert Royal. Grand Rapids, Michigan, William B. Eerdmans Publishing Company, 1995.

Editor, with Shannon Ravenel, The Best American Short Stories, 1988,1989.

* * *

Mark Helprin is a Jewish-American novelist, essayist, and short story writer. His stories and essays have appeared in The New Yorker, The Atlantic Monthly, The New Criterion, The Wall Street Journal, and the New York Times. His fiction blends flights of fantasy with realism, so that he has been often compared with Colombian magical realist author Gabriel García Marquéz. Helprin writes thick, ambitious novels full of bizarre and mystical complications. His characters have a larger-than-life fairy-tale quality; they are fervent believers in the richly lived life and the conviction that love and beauty will prevail. Though his plotting and characterization are occasionally fantastical, his settings and dialogue are in the realist tradition.

Tradition is a key word to use when describing Helprin. Politically and literarily conservative, Helprin is a senior fellow of the Hudson Institute, where he writes on foreign policy and defense issues, his specialty being Middle East Studies.

Yet Helprin's life has been so full of adventure that many commentators have accused him of flat-out falsehood. Helprin grew up in the British West Indies, attended Harvard and the University of Oxford, and balanced this apparently bookish side of his nature by serving in the British Merchant Navy, the Israeli infantry, and the Israeli Air Force, and is an avid mountain-climber.

During the late 1970s, he became an Israeli citizen and went on dozens of counter-infiltration patrols at the Lebanese border. The experiences he gained there became materials for his short fiction, much of which was gathered into two early collections, A Dove of the East and Other Stories, which contains some fantastic elements, and Ellis Island and Other Stories. The latter won the 1982 National Jewish Book Award in America, was awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship and the Prix de Rome, and was nominated for the P.E.N. Faulkner Award and the National Book Award.

Helprin's short fiction foreshadowed what was to come. These stories deal with children, old reminiscing men, travelers in many exotic lands, rabbis, war, love, beauty, guilt, and death. Some recurrent images that symbolize life and love are Helprin's use of light, color, and music.

Like the short fiction, Refiner's Fire: The Life and Adventures of Marshall Pearl, a Foundling contains many autobiographical incidents. It is a rollicking bildungsroman about an orphan born on an illegal immigrant ship attempting to fight its way through the British naval cordon around Palestine during a sea battle in 1947 (the year of Helprin's birth). Adopted by a wealthy couple of the Hudson River Valley, Marshall leaves the United States for Israel and joins the army to fight in the 1973 Israeli-Arab war, as Helprin did. The novel is episodic, jumping from one continent to another, from one extravagant adventure to another. Marshal swims through a hurricane, romances various women, endures epileptic fits, and finds glory in a climactic battle on the Golan Heights. The novel was both praised and condemned for its "old-fashioned" writing style; some critics faulted Helprin for its romanticism, its shallow characterization of women, its length. However, most agree that Refiner's Fire has moments of dazzling lyrical prose and transcendent perception.

Helprin's greatest novel is Winter's Tale, an epic fable set in an imaginary New York, potentially the site for the establishment of the New Jerusalem. The century-long story begins with a talking horse and an itinerant mechanic/thief named Peter Lake and concludes with an ambiguously redemptive apocalypse. A fairy tale that includes science-fictional conventions such as extraordinary machines and time travel, Winter's Tale possesses an intricate plot with a huge cast of characters.

One winter night at the turn of the twentieth century, Peter attempts to burgle a mansion on the Upper West Side. He unexpectedly meets beautiful heiress, Beverly Penn, and they fall in love. However, Beverly is dying of consumption, and when tragedy befalls them, Peter makes up his mind to "stop time and bring back the dead." He and his magical horse vanish into a mysterious "cloud wall," and the narrative jumps seventy years ahead. The reader now journeys with a young man from San Francisco to New York in search of a transcendent city. He endures several humorous adventures before witnessing an inferno that rages across Manhattan and heralds the millennium. In the year 2000, New York becomes a golden city, kingdom of heaven on earth.

The novel is remarkable in its sweep of wondrous and mysterious detail—such as a house in the middle of a lake, an impossible bridge, and a nineteenth-century village lost in winter somewhere beyond the city and the bounds of time—with broad strokes of comedy, villainy, tragedy, and exaltation. The treasures of the earth, Peter Lake says, are movement, courage, laughter, and love. Helprin provides these in generous abundance. The novel was critically acclaimed and became a national best-seller.

His next book, A Soldier of the Great War, also received warm attention. In August 1964, Alessandro Giuliani, an elderly Italian, unexpectedly finds himself walking the road to a town seventy kilometers away with an illiterate seventeen-year-old factory worker. To pass the time on their two-day journey, Alessandro tells the boy the story of his life. As a young man, he had ridden horses, climbed mountains, studied painting and aesthetics, and fell in love. Then World War I interrupts his life and he loses the girl of his dreams. Passionate, romantic, Alessandro becomes a soldier and hero while learning the horror and brutality of war, fighting in northern Italy, fighting with Sicilian bandits against the Italian army, fighting the Germans. He is imprisoned by the Austrian emperor's Hussars, then becomes a deserter. The hell of war and the insanity of the bureaucratic world are embodied in the person of Orfeo Quatta, a grotesque figure laboring in a dusty government office.

Alessandro enthralls his companion with stories about religion, politics, and morality, about the family he built and loved and lost. Through narrating his life of adventure, horror, absurdity, and loneliness, Alessandro finally understands the meaning of his retreat into his memories and realizes that in death he will join those he loved. Helprin told an interviewer that what he really meant by "The Great War" is the war which we fight against conditions of mortality—in other words, life. Critical response to A Soldier of the Great War was almost unanimously positive, with many calling it Helprin's "masterpiece."

Helprin's next novel was a brilliant work of dark comedy. Memoir from Antproof Case is narrated by an ancient American hiding out in Brazil from real or imagined assassins. The old man writes his life story and carefully secretes the pages in an ant-proof case for his beloved ten-year-old stepson to read when he is older. Why must these adventures be hidden? Perhaps the boy will be able to find the tens of millions in gold bullion that his father stole years earlier.

The narrator, who comically refuses to give his real name but introduces himself as "Oscar Progresso," claims to have been a murderer, a patient in a Swiss insane asylum, a lover to rival Don Juan, a billionaire, a World War II fighter pilot who was shot down twice, the greatest bank robber of the century, a protector of the innocent, a banker who met with popes and presidents, and a constant crusader against "the greatest enslaver of mankind: coffee." Progresso may be eccentric, to put it mildly, but he is also a man who possesses good and evil in large portions, a man who dizzies with the sheer joy of life.

Helprin has also written stories for children with the noted author and illustrator Chris Van Allsburg. Swan Lake is a popular and acclaimed reworking of Tchaikovsky's ballet about Odette, an orphaned princess. A City in Winter is narrated by a young queen whose parents were slaughtered by the evil Usurper, so that she was raised deep in the forest until, at the age of ten, she journeyed to reclaim her kingdom. Helprin's storytelling is still both comical and fantastical, though some reviewers complained that the tale is too violent and wordy for children. The Veil of Snows takes up the story some years later, when the Queen has ruled in peace but worries because her husband and his army have vanished in the wilderness. A battle with the vile Duke of Tookisheim foreshadows her greatest fear—the return of the cruel Usurper. Her faithful tale-singer joins forces with her to overthrow the invaders against enormous odds.

In both his juvenile and adult fiction, Helprin's themes of loyalty and courage in the face of danger, the heartless efficiency of evil, and the power of love to endure and prevail burn like a steady flame. Helprin credits Dante Alighieri as his greatest literary influence, an influence evident in his fables of redemption and revelation gained by surviving the terrible and beautiful vicissitudes that life has to offer. His fiction is sublime in its portrayal of great suffering and great joy. His novels present lionhearted, if occasionally foolhardy, quests for truth and love. What his fans cherish most is Helprin's certitude that life is worth living to the fullest, and that even in the face of death, the world is still full of hope.

-Fiona Kelleghan

HIGGINS, Aidan

Nationality: Irish. Born: Celbridge, County Kildare, 3 March 1927. Education: Celbridge Convent; Killashee Preparatory School; Clongowes Wood College, County Kildare. Family: Married Jill Damaris Anders in 1955; three sons. Career: Copywriter, Domas Advertising, Dublin, early 1950s; factory hand, extrusion moulder, and storeman, London, mid-1950s; puppet-operator, John Wright's marionettes, in Europe, South Africa, and Rhodesia, 1958–60; scriptwriter, Filmlets (advertising films), Johannesburg, 1960–61. British Arts Council grants; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1967; DAAD grant (Berlin), 1969; Irish Academy of Letters award, 1970; American-Irish Foundation grant, 1977. Lives in Kinsale, County Cork. Address: c/o Secker and Warburg, Michelin House, 81 Fulham Road, London SW3 6RB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Langrishe, Go Down. London, Calder and Boyars, and New York, Grove Press, 1966.

Balcony of Europe. London, Calder and Boyars, and New York, Delacorte Press, 1972.

Scenes from a Receding Past. London, Calder, and New York, Riverrun Press, 1977.

Bornholm Night-Ferry. Dingle, County Kerry, Brandon, and London, Allison and Busby, 1983.

Lions of the Grunewald. London, Secker and Warburg, 1993.

Short Stories

Felo de Se. London, Calder, 1960; as Killachter Meadow, New York, Grove Press, 1961; revised edition, as Asylum and Other Stories, Calder, 1978; New York, Riverrun Press, 1979.

Helsingør Station and Other Departures: Fictions and Autobiographies 1956–1989. London, Secker and Warburg, 1989.

Plays

Radio Plays (UK): Assassination, 1973; Imperfect Sympathies, 1977; Discords of Good Humour, 1982; Vanishing Heroes, 1983; Texts for the Air, 1983; Winter Is Coming, 1983; Tomb of Dreams, 1984 (Ireland); Zoo Station, 1985; Boomtown, 1990.

Other

Images of Africa: Diary 1956–60. London, Calder and Boyars, 1971.Ronda Gorge and Other Precipices: Travel Writings 1959–1989.London, Secker and Warburg, 1989.

Donkey's Years: Memories of a Life as Story Told. London, Secker and Warburg, 1995.

Samuel Beckett. London, Secker and Warburg, 1995.

Flotsam and Jetsam. London, Minerva, 1997.

Dog Days. N.p., 1999.

Editor, A Century of Short Stories. London, Cape, 1977.

Editor, Colossal Gongorr and the Turkes of Mars, by Carl, Julien, and Elwin Higgins. London, Cape, 1979.

*

Manuscript Collection: University of Victoria, British Columbia.

Critical Studies: By David Holloway, in The Bookman (London), December 1965; "Maker's Language" by Vernon Scannell, in Spectator (London), 11 February 1966; in New Leader (London), 25 September 1967; Morris Beja, in Irish University Review (Dublin), Autumn 1973; "Aidan Higgins Issue" of Review of Contemporary Fiction (Elmwood Park, Illinois), Spring 1983.

* * *

Aidan Higgins was born in 1927 to a rich legacy in Irish fiction dominated by the experimentations of James Joyce. Higgins makes full use of Joyce's innovative techniques in his novels and collections of short fiction, but with a broader world sensibility based on his extensive travels. In addition to his novels and short stories, Higgins documents his international experiences in non-fiction travel books based on his travel diaries and assorted memoirs, which constitute the primary resource for his fictional works. His recent autobiography, Dog Days (1999), confirms how much his personal experiences have informed the picaresque elements in his fiction.

Higgins's first major novel, Langrishe, Go Down, which received the James Tait Black Memorial Prize and the Irish Academy of Letters Award in 1966, is the story of Imogen Langrishe, the youngest of four spinster sisters. As the Langrishe sisters live their dried-up lives in the gentle landscapes of Ireland, Germany is rising to war and the Spanish Civil War is in full swing. Framed by these historical events, Imogen's only love affair with the German Otto Beck carries symbolically political undertones. Otto poaches on the sisters' estate, invading their lives while stealing their game. His invasion of Springfield and Imogen ends with his indifferent departure as Germany invades Austria.

Balcony of Europe, Higgins's second major novel, was shortlisted for the 1972 Booker Prize. The author's interest in phenomenology shapes the disjointed narrative, which is Dan Ruttle's first-person account of his adulterous affair with an American Jewess, Charlotte Bayless. Dan, a passionate Irish artist, is oblivious to the external reality of war as bombers fly over them in Andalusia. The experiences of the senses predominate in the sun-drenched area of southern Spain, which contrasts with the dreary gray weather of Ireland, where the story begins and ends. Higgins tries to coalesce the moment of experience and expression. Plot is largely sacrificed for a number of cognitive tableaux, held together by cross-references and an idiosyncratic authorial voice.

Balcony of Europe exercises the Joycean interior monologue technique with emphasis on rhetorical and grammatical distortions, such as repetitions and ellipses. The interior monologue focuses less attention on Dan's point of view than on the author's labored and insistent symbolism, often in homage to Joyce and Yeats. The planes that fly overhead, for example, alternately turn into the ghost of Dan's mother or a football that is kicked in the air on the Spanish beach.

Scenes from a Receding Past adds further scraps to the memory of Dan Ruttle from his early childhood and adolescence to his early maturity. The book is set in Sligo, which represents Celbridge, the author's birthplace and the parish near the big house in Langrishe. Young Ruttle's bildung is quite similar to young Stephen's in Joyce's bildungsroman, Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man. The pangs of growing up are projected onto Dan's brother, the inflexible and intransigent Wally, who ends up in a lunatic asylum. Interleaved are records, and records of records, including a—faulty—Dutch Mass Card, a clothes list for La Sainte Union Convent, and two pages from the score book for the Fifth Oval, August 20–23, 1938. Dan meets and woos Olivia Orr, a girl from New Zealand who hovers in the background of Balcony of Europe as his unhappy wife. The present and glimpses of their pasts are woven with mawkish poetry and casual prose disrupted, in one instance, by a page-long list of names for the baby that Olivia loses in her fifth month.

The epistolary form of Bornholm Night-Ferry is a logical follow-up to the snap-shot technique of Scenes from a Receding Past. It enables Higgins to combine his modernist techniques with a crafted attention to detail. The novel is as full of linguistic distortions, chronological jumps, and occasional lyricism as any of his works, but it is more organized by the epistolary form. The plot is again grounded by a love affair, this time between a Danish girl, Elin Marstrander, with poor English language skills, and an Irish writer, Finn Fitzgerald, with little commonsense. Higgins introduces an implied narrator-asarchivist who identifies letters and diaries as they come to him.

Lions of the Grunewald, published in 1995, is set in Europe and Berlin just before the Berlin Wall came down. It is a picaresque novel of frenzy that jaunts around postwar Europe with giddy abandon and inebriated characters engaged with each other's lusty mannerisms and surrealistic pranks. The novel's publication is surrounded by the publication of numerous collections of memoirs, including Images of Africa: Diary 1956–60 and Donkey's Years: Memories of a Life as a Story Told (1996), the prequel to Dog Days, supporting Higgins's admission that most of his books follow his life "like slug-trails."

In addition to Higgins's novels, several collections of shorter fiction works, such as Helsingør Station and Other Departures, Asylum and Other Stories, as well as his travel writing, such as Ronda Gorge and Other Precipices (1989), have earned Aidan Higgins a reputation as one of modern Ireland's greatest writers. The influence of the great Irish modernists, Yeats and Joyce, is unshakeable in all of the genres he has mastered, to which he adds a pantheistic verve and hedonism not uncommon in the lives and literature of twentieth-century writers following World War II. He does not shy away from rattling family skeletons or dissecting the follies of Irish Catholics as he sheds light on Ireland just before, during, and after the pivotal Second World War.

-Hedwig Gorski

HIGHWAY, Tomson

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Northwestern Manitoba, Canada, 6 December 1951. Education: Attended University of Manitoba; University of Western Ontario, B.Mus. 1975, B.A. 1977. Career: Member, De-ba-jeh-mu-jig Theatre Group, West Bay, Ontario; artistic director, Native Earth Performing Arts, Inc., Toronto, Ontario, until 1992; associated with numerous Native support groups; playwright. Awards: Chalmers Award, 1986; Dora Mavor Moore Award, 1987–88; The Rez Sisters was selected to represent Canada at Edinburgh Festival, 1988; four Dora Mavor Moore Awards, including one for best play, 1989–90; Wang Festival Award, 1989. Address: Playwrights Canada, 54 Wolseley Street, 2nd Floor, Toronto, Ontario M5C 1A5, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Kiss of the Fur Queen. Toronto, Doubleday Canada, 1998

Plays

The Rez Sisters: A Play in Two Acts. Toronto, Native Canadian Centre, 1986; Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, Fifth House, 1988.Aria (monologues). Toronto, Makka Kleist Annex Theatre, 1987.

New Song ... New Dance (multimedia dance production, with Rene Highway), 1987.

Dry Lips Oughta Move to Kapuskasing (also known as The Red Brothers). Toronto, Theatre Passe Muraille, 1989; Saskatoon, Saskachewan, Fifth House, 1989; also appeared in Modern Canadian Plays, edited by Jerry Wasserman, Vancouver, British Columbia, Talon Books, 1993.

The Sage, the Dancer, and the Fool (with Rene Highway and Bill Merasty). Toronto, Native Canadian Centre, 1989.

*

Critical Studies: Aboriginal Voices: Amerindian, Inuit, and Sami Theatre by William Morgan. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992.

* * *

Tomson Highway is best known as the author of two awardwinning plays. The Rez Sisters and Dry Lips Oughta Move to Kapuskasing focus, respectively, on the lives of seven Native-Canadian women and seven Native-Canadian men from the fictional Wasaychigan Hill Reservation in northern Ontario. The plays, part of a projected seven-play cycle that has prompted comparisons with the work of Michel Tremblay (whom Highway counts as a major influence) and James Reaney (with whom Highway studied at the University of Western Ontario), announce most of the major themes and aesthetic practices that Highway has pursued in all of his writing: the sexual and racial apartheid wrought upon First Nations communities in North America as a result of the colonial encounter with white Europeans; the attendant clash between Native and Christian mythologies; a preoccupation with the shape-shifting, gender-bending figure of the trickster Nanabush; and a wickedly irreverent humor that is as much scatological as it is eschatological.

Highway has said that he only seriously turned to novel writing (having already published several shorter fictional pieces) when he couldn't get the third installment of his "Rez cycle" produced. The musical Rose brings together both the Wasy Hill men and women from the first two plays; but major Canadian producers balked at the cast size and logistical constraints of the staging. (The play, workshopped across the country, has since received a full-scale amateur staging at the University of Toronto.) This setback for theater-goers has, however, been a boon for readers of fiction. For out of his frustration at failing to get his play produced, Highway composed his first novel, Kiss of the Fur Queen (in which the Wasy Hill Reserve makes a brief but pivotal appearance).

The novel recounts the story of the Okimasis brothers, Jeremiah and Gabriel, from their births in a tent on their parents' trapline in northern Manitoba, through their forced relocation to a Catholic residential school in the south (where both boys are physically and sexually abused), and on to their respective sexual awakenings and initial artistic successes (Jeremiah as a pianist and Gabriel as a dancer). Along the way, the brothers, who had always been extremely close, become estranged, in part because of their differing responses to the pressures of cultural assimilation, and in part because of Jeremiah's uneasiness with Gabriel's emerging homosexuality. With Gabriel's death from AIDS-related complications imminent, the brothers are reunited at the end of the novel, collaborating artistically on a play that Jeremiah has written, Ulysses Thunderchild, a Joycean exploration of one day in the life of a Cree man in Toronto.

The reference to Joyce is telling, for it is an indication of how successfully Highway has fused in Kiss of the Fur Queen modernist narrative techniques with traditional Native oratory and storytelling practices. While the novel can certainly be read as a dual Küntslerroman, progressing linearly from their idyllic childhood in a seeming arctic paradise on to the later painful lessons of life and art learned by Jeremiah and Gabriel in the urban centres of Winnipeg and Toronto, Highway's is nevertheless very much a Cree "Portrait of the Artist." The novel constantly circles back upon itself, employing repetition, embedded narrative, much dialogue, unglossed Cree phrases, and other stylistic features in order to bind together speaker/writer and listener/reader in a negotiated performance of both a literate narrative and an oral storytelling event. Central to this endeavor is, once again, the figure of Nanabush, who for Highway is not simply a magical gender-transgressive character (here incarnated variously as the spirit of the Fur Queen herself and as a breathy, cigarette-smoking, torch song-singing arctic fox named Maggie Sees) who knows all, but also a discursive trope or textual device that allows him to manipulate, rearrange, and reorder his story. Unlike the dispassionate God paring his fingernails in James Joyce's Portrait, Highway's Fur Queen and Miss Maggie actively interrupt and interfere with Jeremiah, encouraging him to mix things up even further. Linked to this is a larger concern that runs throughout the novel, namely Highway's conscious construction of Native mythology as matrilineal. As Maggie puts it to Jeremiah, "Show me the bastard who come up with this notion that who's running the goddamn show is some grumpy, embittered, sexually frustrated old fart with a long white beard hiding like a gutless coward behind some puffed-up cloud and I'll slice his goddamn balls off."

Kiss of the Fur Queen is very much an autobiographical novel. One must, of course, be wary of conflating the fictional Jeremiah with his author, but it is nevertheless worth pointing out that Highway began his artistic career as a pianist, and that his younger brother, René, was also a dancer, collaborating with Tomson on his plays (he danced the role of Nanabush in The Rez Sisters and choreographed Dry Lips) before succumbing to AIDS in 1990. And yet, while there is undoubtedly a very personal story that Highway is telling in this novel, he is also concerned with addressing and redressing a larger political issue, recovering the lost stories of a lost generation of Native children in Canada who, during the 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s, were forcibly removed from their families, denied the right to communicate in their own language, and compelled to undergo a frequently violent process of acculturation to dominant white society. Kiss of the Fur Queen speaks eloquently and powerfully to the decades-old silence surrounding this dark chapter in Canadian history.

HIJUELOS, Oscar

Nationality: American. Born: New York, New York, 24 August 1951. Education: City College of the City University of New York, B.A. 1975, M.A. 1976. Family: Divorced. Career: Advertising media traffic manager, Transportation Display, Inc., Winston Network, New York, 1977–84; writer, 1984—; professor of English, Hofstra University, Hempstead, New York, 1989—. Awards: "Outstanding writer" citation (Pushcart Press), 1978; Fellowship for Creative Writers award (National Endowment for the Arts), 1985; American Academy in Rome fellowship in Literature (American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters), 1985; Pulitzer prize for fiction, 1990. Address: Hofstra University, English Department, 1000 Fulton Avenue, Hempstead, New York 11550, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Our House in the Last World. New York, Persea Books, 1983. The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love. New York, Farrar, Straus, 1989.

The Fourteen Sisters of Emilio Montez O'Brien. New York, Farrar, Straus, 1993.

Mr. Ives' Christmas. New York, HarperCollins, 1995. Empress of the Splendid Season. New York, HarperCollins, 1999.

Other

Preface, Iguana Dreams: New Latino Fiction, edited by Delia Poey and Virgil Suarez. New York, HarperPerennial, 1992.

Introduction, Cool Salsa: Bilingual Poems on Growing up Latino in the United States, edited by Lori M. Carlson. New York, Holt, 1994

Introduction, The Cuban American Family Album by Dorothy and Thomas Hoobler. New York, Oxford University Press, 1996.

Contributor, Best of Pushcart Press III. Pushcart, 1978.

Contributor, You're On!: Seven Plans in English and Spanish, edited by Lori M. Carlson. New York, Morrow Junior Books, 1999.

*

Critical Studies: Life on the Hyphen: The Cuban-American Way, Gustavo Pérez Firmat, Austin, University of Texas Press, 1994; Dance Between Two Cultures: Latino Caribbean Literature Written in the United States by William Luis, Nashville, Vanderbilt University Press, 1997; U.S. Latino Literature: A Critical Guide for Students and Teachers edited by Harold Augenbraum and Margarite Fernández Olmos, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 2000.

* * *

Oscar Hijuelos is the only Latino to have been awarded the Pulitzer Prize in fiction, which he won in 1990 for The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love, a bittersweet exploration of the lives of two Cuban-born musicians and their families in the 1950s. His work is characterized by a beautiful literary style through which he captures and explores individual character.

Hijuelos was born in New York City and spent a very small part of his early years in Cuba. He graduated from the City College of New York, and has acknowledged an early debt to Henry Roth and his ultimate novel of Jewish adaptation, Call It Sleep. At the age of three, during a trip to the island, Hijuelos fell ill and subsequently lived for a period of time in a Connecticut children's sanitorium, which he chronicled in his first novel, the Bildungsroman Our House in the Last World.

Our House sets out many of the themes with which Hijuelos has grappled during his career: a search for spiritual meaning, memory and loss, the difficulty of maintaining a stable family life, poverty in immigrant communities, the implausibility of certainty in self-definition—especially among men, an extraordinary appreciation of both the physical and emotional presence of women, and the plasticity of national culture. An autobiographical novel, Our House is the story of the Santinios, father Alejo, mother Mercedes, brothers Horacio and Hector, who is the writer's Kunstlerroman alter ego. Alejo is an ineffectual husband and father—a theme to which Hijeulos returned in subsequent works. He is a womanizer and heavy drinker whose inability to pull the family out of its dire poverty in Spanish Harlem, lack of intimacy with his sons, and emotional abuse of his wife angers and embarrasses his family. Hector, the younger son, fair and sickly, develops a conflicted relationship with his own culture. Battered by what his mother calls Cuban microbios, one of the few Spanish words in the book that is not set in italics, and American culture's rejection of his "Cuban-ness," Hector cannot separate the personal and the political ("But he continued to pack up his junk ... he was thinking about sex with that blond girl [sic] ... He thought he would leave all the bad feelings behind ... he wouldn't ... think about microbios ...). Our House is a solid entry in the tradition of the American immigrant Bildungsroman, highly focused on the ideas of loss versus gain, adaptation versus assimilation.

In The Mambo Kings Play Songs of Love Hijuelos took a significant step forward in his career. He spent a great deal of time researching the Cuban music culture of 1950s America, setting the opening of the novel in the quintessential situation comedy of the period, I Love Lucy, which featured the only Hispanic professional on television, Desi Arnaz, who has since become a cultural icon. The eponymous brothers César and Nestor Castillo, man of action and man of contemplation, develop their musical careers to the point that they appear on television. César is a charming womanizer, lover of the American goddess, the large-breasted blonde Vanna Vane. Nestor settles into family life, though he is haunted by memories of María, who had rejected him back in Cuba. With the backdrop of the fastmoving, bygone world of mambo, in Mambo Kings Hijuelos explores the world of sex, music, and fame, creating a highly charged world of carpe diem sensuality, sensational and forbidding, contraposing it to anchors of the past, neither of which are fulfilling. Mambo Kings was made into a film starring Armand Assante.

The Fourteen Sisters of Emilio Montez O'Brien, Hijuelos's third novel, represents his most successful stylistic achievement, though it has serious structural problems. Gustavo Pérez Firmat has noted that The Fourteen Sisters continues Hijuelos's movement in his fiction away from a direct relationship with Cuba, but this evaluation was written before Hijuelos's most recent book, Empress of the Splendid Season and omits Hijuelos's preoccupation with memory as an important factor in the search for meaning. The latter is especially important in The Fourteen Sisters. The main characters, an Irish husband and Cuban wife, live a seemingly idyllic existence in rural Pennsylvania in the early part of the twentieth century. As one would imagine by the book's title, family dynamics are dominated by femininity, and the maternal and sexual presence of femaleness overwhelms the household. Various views of memory and their effects on the present and the future dominate the work, often in a gauzy pastorality and through discussions of the father's photography. Though The Fourteen Sisters contains Hijuelos's most beautiful prose, the sylvan world removes him from the urban landscape Hijuelos knows best, and the novel's structure suffers. With seventeen important fictional persons, his character explorations make the cast into a landscape in itself. There is too much there, and the lack of focus becomes detrimental to Hijuelos's seeming desire to home in on one character. In the end, he loses control and the ending falls apart, an admirable, ambitious, ultimately flawed effort.

In his fourth novel, Hijuelos returns to New York, and the fictional backdrop that allows him to focus on the search for meaning. Mr. Ives' Christmas is Hijuelos most spiritual work to date. The title character was adopted as a young child and has few cultural roots, though Hijuelos implies that Ives is Hispanic, as he is drawn time and again to New York's Hispanic community. Ives's successful marriage and professional life are thrown into disarray when his son is killed in a random act of violence. The book focuses on Ives's coming to terms with this death, re-learning identity and transforming himself as a man.

In his most recent work, Empress of the Splendid Season, Hijuelos returns to Spanish Harlem through the intimate portrait of a cleaning lady, cultural adaptation and assimilation (''Rico, with all his studies and for the way he was striving to become something in the English-speaking world ... felt as if he were on the outside looking in ... at the very source of his own emotionality ... ''), ephemerality, male ineffectuality, and the search for meaning in an individual life (''After so much work and effort, what on earth am I doing here?''), especially among those who have suffered loss or rejection. As so often happens in Hijuelos's work, courtship and nuptials represent the high point of relationships between men and women (though the marriage in Mr. Ives' Christmas is an exception).

Because he won the Pulitzer Prize and is the most prolific Cuban-American author, Hijuelos has drawn a great deal of critical interest. His books are reviewed in all major newspapers and magazines, and have received discussion in several critical studies. Hijuelos has also been interviewed for various publications, including Ilan Stavans's "Habla Oscar Hijuelos" (Linden Lane, 1989).

-Harold Augenbraum

HILL, Carol

Nationality: American. Born: Carol DeChellis, New Jersey, 20 January 1942. Education: At Chatham College, Pittsburgh, 1957–61, B.A. in history 1961. Career: Publicist, Crown Publishers, 1965–67, and Bernard Geis Associates, 1967–69, both New York; publicist, 1969–71, and editor, 1971–73, Pantheon Books, New York; publicity manager, Random House, New York, 1973–74; senior editor, William Morrow, publishers, New York, 1974–76; senior editor, editorin-chief, vice-president, and publisher, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, New York, 1976–79. Since 1980 full-time writer. Formerly, actress at Judson Poets Theatre, New York, and in summer stock, Gateway Playhouse, New Jersey. Agent: Lynn Nesbit, Janklow and Nesbit Associates, 598 Madison Avenue, New York, New York 10022.

Address: 2 Fifth Avenue, Apartment 19-U, New York, New York 10011, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Jeremiah 8:20. New York, Random House, 1970.

Let's Fall in Love. New York, Random House, 1974; London, Quartet, 1975.

An Unmarried Woman (novelization of screenplay). New York, Avon, and London, Coronet, 1978.

The Eleven Million Mile High Dancer. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1985; as Amanda and the Eleven Million Mile High Dancer, London, Bloomsbury, 1988.

Henry James' Midnight Song. New York, Poseidon Press, 1993.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Shameless Shiksa," in Playboy (Chicago), September 1969.

"Gone," in Viva (New York), November 1974.

"Lovers," in Viva (New York), April 1975.

Plays

Mother Loves (produced New York, 1967).

Other

Subsistence U.S.A., photographs by Bruce Davidson, edited by Jamie Shalleck. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1973.

*

Manuscript Collections: Mugar Memorial Library, Boston University.

* * *

Carol Hill writes with a wit and sense of the absurd that some critics have likened to the bizarre humor found in the novels of Tom Robbins. Her characters are varied, genuine, and somewhat offbeat. The protagonists usually find themselves in absurd situations sometimes of their own making, but often coming as a surprise. Contemporary issues are interwoven in the plots, although they are not necessarily central to the stories.

In her first novel, Jeremiah 8:20, peace marchers protesting the war in Vietnam and problems of racial integration affect the rather unusual hero of this novel. Jeremiah Francis Scanlon, fat, balding, and 39, is a bookkeeper of mediocre abilities who has worked for the same company for almost 20 years. After years of living in the protective environment of his parents' suburban home he has taken the plunge and moved to New York City, not far from his place of employment. He rents a room in a boarding house that comes complete with a cast of strange and unusual characters. Hill's talent for delineating a varied array of individuals is evident in her description of Jeremiah, the social misfit; Miles, a part-time actor who specializes in female roles and is often seen prancing around the house in full costume and makeup; his friend Jocko, a pseudo-revolutionary and a cynic who excels in debate and delights in flustering his opponent. There are also two ladies: a prim old maid, and a wasp-tongued librarian who secretly yearns for Jocko. Although Jeremiah seems the most unlikely sort of protagonist to carry a novel, Hill makes us care for this pathetic, befuddled man who suffers great loneliness and despair. He does not, however, give up on life, but in a strangely courageous way keeps seeking an answer to his misery. Admittedly the answer he comes up with—that there is a secret held by Negroes that will end all his problems—seems absurd, but we have come to know Jeremiah so well that we can believe he would believe such nonsense.

The humor in Jeremiah is dark, though not oppressive. In Hill's next two novels the tone is lighter. Let's Fall in Love has a $10,000-a-shot hooker caught up in a web of murder and intrigue. This book has plenty of sex, including some very strange forms of coupling, a considerable departure from her first novel (about which, she says, people complained because there was not enough sex). Let's Fall in Love offers Hill's usual humor, and satire that some readers may find shocking, others erotic. Although this novel sold well, in the author's own estimation it lacked the power of her first. With The Eleven Million Mile High Dancer Hill is back on form although writing in a very different vein from Jeremiah. She combines her flare for the comic with a layman's knowledge of physics, a concern for the environment, and a natural penchant for fantasy. And here again is a multitude of characters.

The heroine is Amanda Jaworski, pilot, particle physicist, ardent feminist (most of the time), America's leading lady astronaut, and free spirit who roller skates through the NASA complex in red and white striped non-regulation shorts. She lives with a cat named Schrodinger who spends 23 out of 24 hours in a catatonic state that Amanda believes must be a form of narcolepsy. Meanwhile Amanda, a champion of female rights, finds herself wildly in love with the ultimate macho man, Bronco McCloud. He was "devastating in the most literal sense of the word. It was quite exciting to be devastated by McCloud, and he knew it. His business was devastation not love. And this was why women adored him." Fortunately for Amanda there is another man in her life, Donald Hotchkiss, who is as masculine as Bronco, but capable of loving Amanda in a way she deserves to be loved. Love is an important theme in Hill's works: Jeremiah spent an entire novel in a desperate, futile search for it, while Amanda not only receives love in its many guises but returns it in abundance.

Bringing everything together is an intricate plot in which Amanda is selected to make an 18-month journey to Mars, but is diverted from this mission by the Great Cosmic Brain who kidnaps Schrodinger. The GCB is a disgustingly huge, bloated snake-like creature that discharges a foul odor with every exhalation. He is earth's creator and he is angry that humankind seems so ready to destroy itself either with nuclear weapons or pollution of the air and water. Amanda is helped in her search for Schrodinger by a tough-talking subatomic particle named Oozie. Their adventure in another dimension brings all Hill's imaginative skills to the fore. She amazes the reader with ever more exotic creatures and situations, culminating in a starry spin through space with the Dancer of the title. Throughout the story she intersperses quotes from scientists writing on the new physics which show how strange our world of reality can be (Paul Davies: "One of the more bizarre consequences of quantum uncertainty is that matter can appear more or less out of nowhere''). So perhaps the wild imaginings of Hill are not so farfetched after all.

Not only the writer named in the title of Henry James's Midnight Song, but Sigmund Freud, Carl Jung, Edith Wharton, Emperor Franz Josef, and a host of other real people appear in the story, a murder mystery set in Vienna in the early twentieth century. At one point Hill has playwright Arthur Schnitzler observe, in a comment that sums up much of the narrative, "Vienna lies like a dream, singing songs to us of our daylight selves. All masks and deception. Beautiful masks, but masks .... No one believes either in himself or in anything else, and in my opinion, they are quite right not to do so."

Hill's literary style is often blunt, filled with contemporary jargon, and always to the point. She demonstrates the feelings of her characters by letting the reader eavesdrop on internal conversations. In this way she shows the desperate unhappiness and bewilderment suffered by Jeremiah as well as the gutsy determination and deeply felt love that drive Amanda to the ends of the universe to save Schrodinger. Although the themes of her books have varied greatly, there is one element that permeates them all—her ability to portray the human condition in all of its terrible and wonderful ways, and to portray even the darkest moments with plenty of wit.

-Patricia Altner

HILL, Susan (Elizabeth)

Nationality: British. Born: Scarborough, Yorkshire, 5 February 1942. Education: Grammar schools in Scarborough and Coventry; King's College, University of London, B.A. (honours) in English 1963. Family: Married the writer and editor Stanley Wells in 1975; three daughters (one deceased). Career: Since 1963 full-time writer: since 1977 monthly columnist, Daily Telegraph, London. Presenter, Bookshelf radio program, 1986–87. Awards: Maugham award, 1971; Whitbread award, 1972; Rhys Memorial prize, 1972. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1972, and King's College, 1978. Address: Longmoor Farmhouse, Ebrington, Chipping Campden, Glos GL55 6NW England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Enclosure. London, Hutchinson, 1961.

Do Me a Favour. London, Hutchinson, 1963.

Gentleman and Ladies. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1968; New York, Walker, 1969.

A Change for the Better. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1969.

I'm the King of the Castle. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Viking Press, 1970.

Strange Meeting. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1971; New York, Saturday Review Press, 1972.

The Bird of Night. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1972; New York, Saturday Review Press, 1973.

In the Springtime of the Year. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Saturday Review Press, 1974.

The Woman in Black: A Ghost Story. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1983; Boston, Godine, 1986.

Air and Angels. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1991.

The Mist in the Mirror. London, Mandarin, 1993.

Mrs. de Winter. London, Sinclair Stevenson, and Thorndike, Maine, Thorndike Press, 1993.

The Service of Clouds. London, Vintage, 1999.

Short Stories

The Albatross and Other Stories. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1971; New York, Saturday Review Press, 1975.

The Custodian. London, Covent Garden Press, 1972.

A Bit of Singing and Dancing. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1973.

Lanterns Across the Snow (novella). London, Joseph, 1987; New York, Potter, 1988.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Kielty's," in Winter's Tales 20, edited by A.D. Maclean. London, Macmillan, 1974; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1975.

Plays

Lizard in the Grass (broadcast 1971; produced Edinburgh, 1988). Included in The Cold Country and Other Plays for Radio, 1975.

The Cold Country and Other Plays for Radio (includes The End of Summer, Lizard in the Grass, Consider the Lilies, Strip Jack Naked). London, BBC Publications, 1975.

On the Face of It (broadcast 1975). Published in Act 1, edited by David Self and Ray Speakman, London, Hutchinson, 1979.

The Ramshackle Company (for children; produced London, 1981). Chances (broadcast 1981; produced London, 1983).

Radio Plays: Taking Leave, 1971; The End of Summer, 1971; Lizard in the Grass, 1971; The Cold Country, 1972; Winter Elegy, 1973; Consider the Lilies, 1973; A Window on the World, 1974; Strip Jack Naked, 1974; Mr. Proudham and Mr. Sleight, 1974; On the Face of It, 1975; The Summer of the Giant Sunflower, 1977; The Sound That Time Makes, 1980; Here Comes the Bride, 1980; Chances, 1981; Out in the Cold, 1982; Autumn, 1985; Winter, 1985; I am the King of the Castle, Susan Hill, London, Longman, 1990.

Television Plays: Last Summer's Child, from her story "The Badness Within Him," 1981.

Other (for children)

One Night at a Time. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1984; as Go Away, Bad Dreams!, New York, Random House, 1985.

Mother's Magic. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1986.

Suzy's Shoes. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1989.

I Won't Go There Again. London, Walker Books, 1990.

Septimus Honeydew. London, Walker Books, 1990.

Stories from Codling Village. London, Walker Books, 1990.

The Collaborative Classroom. with Tim Hill. Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Heinemann, 1990.

Beware, Beware, with illustrations by Angela Barrett. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Candlewick Press, and London, Walker, 1993.

The Christmas Collection, with illustrations by John Lawrence. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Candlewick Press, and London, Walker, 1994

The Glass Angels. London, Walker, 1991. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Candlewick, 1992.

White Christmas. London, Walker, and Cambridge, Massachusetts, Candlewick, 1994.

King of Kings. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Candlewick, 1993; London, Walker Books, 1994.

Can It Be True? A Christmas Story. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Viking Kestrel, 1988.

A Very Special Birthday. London, Walker, 1992.

Other

The Magic Apple Tree: A Country Year. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1982; New York, Holt Rinehart, 1983.

Through the Kitchen Window. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1984.

Through the Garden Gate. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1986.

Shakespeare Country, photographs by Rob Talbot. London, Joseph, 1987.

The Lighting of the Lamps. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1987.

The Spirit of the Cotswolds, photographs by Nick Meers. London, Joseph, 1988.

Family. London, Joseph, 1989; New York, Viking, 1990.

Crown Devon: The History of S. Fielding and Co. Stratford Upon Avon, Jazz, 1993.

Diana: The Secret Years, with Simone Simmons. New York, Ballantine Books, 1998.

Editor, The Distracted Preacher and Other Tales, by Thomas Hardy. London, Penguin, 1979.

Editor, with Isabel Quigly, New Stories 5. London, Hutchinson, 1980. Editor, People: Essays and Poems. London, Chatto and Windus, 1983.

Editor, Ghost Stories. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1983.

Editor, The Parchment Moon: An Anthology of Modern Women's Short Stories. London, Joseph, 1990; as The Penguin Book of Modern Women's Short Stories, 1991.

Editor, The Walker Book of Ghost Stories. London, Walker Books, 1990; as The Random House Book of Ghost Stores, New York, Random House, 1991.

Editor, Contemporary Women's Short Stories. London, Joseph, 1995.

*

Manuscript Collections: Eton College Library, Windsor, Berkshire.

Critical Studies: Susan Hill: I'm the King of the Castle by Hana Sambrook, London, Longman, 1992.

* * *

One striking feature of Susan Hill's novels is the wide-ranging diversity of the experience they depict; and another, a maturity of understanding remarkable in a writer who began publishing her work at the age of only 19.

From the first she has shown a painful awareness of the dark abysses of the spirit—fear, grief, loneliness, and loss. A recurring early theme is that of lives warped and ruined by the selfishness of maternal domination. In A Change for the Better Deirdre Fount struggles in vain to break the shackles of dependence forged by her overbearing mother. The boy Duncan in the short story "The Albatross" is the impotent victim of a similar situation, dogged by the mother-created image of his own inadequacy. Driven finally over the brink of desperation, he does achieve his desired freedom, however brief, through a climactic act of violence.

Hill has always been especially perceptive in her portrayal of children. One of her most memorable novels, I'm the King of the Castle, is a penetrating study of mounting tensions in a bitter conflict between two eleven-year-old boys. This arises when a widower engages a new housekeeper, who brings with her a son the same age as his own. The peevish weakling already in possession is outraged at this invasion of his cherished territory, and in a subtle campaign of persecution, relentlessly hounds the hapless intruder towards an inevitably tragic denouement.

Hill's sensitive insight into the behavior and motivations of the young is matched by equal acuteness in delineating the problems and attitudes of those at the opposite end of the human life-span. Gentleman and Ladies, a novel simultaneously funny and sad, observes with a shrewdly amused yet compassionate eye the daily life and personalities of the inmates of an old people's home. The same intuitive sympathy informs the short story called "Missy." Through a dying woman's fragmentary memories—frustratingly interrupted by the ministrations of brisk nurse and single visitor—the author intimately identifies with the thought-processes of extreme age.

Hill's gift of imaginative projection into worlds of experience far removed from her own is nowhere more apparent than in Strange Meeting. Probably her most notable tour de force, this is set in the trenches of Flanders during the 1914–18 war, and depicts with power, and at times almost intolerable poignancy, the doomed friendship of two young officers drawn together by their mutual daily contact with destruction and imminent death. There is also an irresistible attraction between opposite temperaments and family backgrounds: the reserved, introspective Hilliard finding inhibition magically thawed in the warmth of his companion Barton's easy, outgoing generosity.

The impact of actuality in this novel, both in its factual detail and the immediacy of involvement in the responses of combatants, is an astonishing achievement for a young woman. Strange Meeting also exemplifies Hill's capacity—comparatively rare among women novelists either past or present—for the convincing depiction of life from a male viewpoint. The Bird of Night is another highly original novel of great intensity which surveys a close relationship between two men. The central character is a poet, Francis Croft, whose tormented struggle against intermittent but increasing insanity is chronicled by the withdrawn scholar Lawson, whose life becomes devoted to care of his friend. The first-person masculine narrative of The Woman in Black, published after a silence of some years in her career as a novelist, provides a further instance of this aspect of Hill's talent. An atmospherically charged ghost story, it is related in a formal, rather stately past idiom, although carefully unlocated in any particular time. Full of Jamesian echoes and undercurrents, it traces with chilling compulsiveness the progress of a mysterious and sinister haunting.

Her adventurous charting of such varied areas of experience—childhood and old age, loyalties between men, the horrors of war and of insanity—demonstrates this versatile writer's ability to participate truthfully in many states of mind and conditions of life. But this does not preclude her treatment of the more conventionally "feminine" subject. Perhaps more than any of her books, In the Springtime of the Year has a direct appeal for a readership of women. Its heroine is a young widow cruelly bereaved after a short and happy marriage; and it movingly explores the successive stages of her grief, from initial angry refusal to accept the fact of loss through a gradual coming to terms and adjustment to her changed situation. The surrounding countryside, evoked with poetic precision, plays a key role in Ruth's final renewal of hope. This echoes the author's own belief in the restoring influence of rural rhythms and simplicities, reflected in her volumes of essays, such as The Magic Apple Tree, Through the Kitchen Window, and Through the Garden Gate.

Mrs. De Winter constitutes a sequel to Daphne du Maurier's 1938 classic Rebecca, but adds little to the original. With The Service of Clouds, Hill offers a tale of a woman's journey from girlhood, through triumphs and misfortunes to the time when she seemingly sees her hopes fulfilled in her son. But the story of Florence Hennessey is executed in the manner of an archetype, with few specific details, as though Hill intended to make it an Ur-version of a distinctly female Bildungsroman. The results are uneven; still, as with her effort to sequelize Daphne du Maurier, one lauds Hill for the courage of her attempt.

-Margaret Willy

HINDE, Thomas

Pseudonym for Sir Thomas Willes Chitty, Baronet. Nationality: British. Born: Thomas Willes Chitty in Felixstowe, Suffolk, 2 March 1926; succeeded to the baronetcy, 1955. Education: Winchester School, Hampshire; University College, Oxford. Military Service: Served in the Royal Navy, 1944–47. Family: Married Susan Elspeth Glossop (i.e., the writer Susan Chitty) in 1951; one son and three daughters. Career: Worked for Inland Revenue, London, 1951–53; staff member, Shell Petroleum Company, in England, 1953–58, and in Nairobi, Kenya, 1958–60. Granada Arts Fellow, University of York, 1964–65; visiting lecturer, University of Illinois, Urbana, 1965–67; visiting professor, Boston University, 1969–70. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature. Address: Bow Cottage, West Hoathly, near East Grinstead, Sussex RH19 4QF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Mr. Nicholas. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1952; New York, Farrar Straus, 1953.

Happy as Larry. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1957; New York, Criterion, 1958.

For the Good of the Company. London, Hutchinson, 1961.

A Place Like Home. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1962.

The Cage. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1962.

Ninety Double Martinis. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1963.

The Day the Call Came. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1964; New York, Vanguard Press, 1965.

Games of Chance: The Interviewer, The Investigator. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1965; New York, Vanguard Press, 1967.

The Village. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1966.

High. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1968; New York, Walker, 1969.

Bird. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1970.

Generally a Virgin. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1972.

Agent. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1974.

Our Father. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1975; New York, Braziller, 1976.

Daymare. London, Macmillan, 1980.

Other

Do Next to Nothing: A Guide to Survival Today, with Susan Chitty. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1976.

The Great Donkey Walk, with Susan Chitty. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1977.

The Cottage Book: A Manual of Maintenance, Repair, and Construction. London, Davis, 1979.

Sir Henry and Sons: A Memoir. London, Macmillan, 1980.

A Field Guide to the English Country Parson. London, Heinemann, 1983.

Stately Gardens of Britain, photographs by Dmitri Kasterine. London, Ebury Press, and New York, Norton, 1983.

Forests of Britain. London, Gollancz, 1985.

Just Chicken, with Cordelia Chitty. Woodbury, New York, Barron's, 1985; London, Bantam Press, 1986.

Capability Brown: The Story of a Master Gardener. London, Hutchinson, 1986; New York, Norton, 1987.

Courtiers: 900 Years of English Court Life. London, Gollancz, 1986. Tales from the Pump Room: Nine Hundred Years of Bath: The Place, Its People, and Its Gossip. London, Gollancz, 1988.

Imps of Promise: A History of the King's School, Canterbury. London, James and James, 1990.

Paths of Progress: A History of Marlborough College. London, James and James, 1992.

Highgate School: A History. London, James and James, 1993.

Editor, Spain: A Personal Anthology. London, Newnes, 1963.

Editor, The Domesday Book: England's Heritage, Then and Now. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Crown, 1985.

Editor, Looking-Glass Letters, by Lewis Carroll. New York, Rizzoli, 1992.

*

Manuscript Collections: University of Texas, Austin.

Critical Studies: In New York Herald Tribune, 24 May 1953; The Angry Decade by Kenneth Allsop, London, Owen, 1958; Times Literary Supplement (London), 26 May 1961, 27 October 1966, 7 November 1968, 11 September 1970; Observer (London), 7 June 1964; New York Times, 9 August 1967; Books and Bookmen (London), September 1974.

Thomas Hinde comments:

I write novels because I like novels and I like trying to make my own. These aim to be—but unfortunately hardly ever succeed in being—the novels I will like best of all. Just as my taste in novels changes, so the sort of novel I try to write changes. I also believe in the importance of the novel—one of the few places where individual art as opposed to script-conference art can still flourish. I believe that it can and will change and develop, however fully explored it seems at present. I believe that people will go on wanting to read novels. But however much I am convinced by these logical arguments of the vitality, value, and survival of the form, the real reason why I go on writing novels remains personal: despite its anxiety and difficulties, I like the process, and, despite disappointments, I am still excited by the results which I aim for.

* * *

When in 1957, American popular journalism first discovered the "Angry Young Men," Thomas Hinde was listed, in articles in Time and Life, along with Kingsley Amis, John Wain, and John Braine, as one of the principal progenitors of the "Movement." Happy as Larry, Hinde's second novel, had just been published and the novel's protagonist was a rather feckless young man who lost menial jobs, was vaguely trying to write, and irresponsibly drifted away from his wife. Yet the designation of "Angry Young Men," over-generalized and inappropriate as it was for all the writers to whom it was applied, was particularly inappropriate for Hinde. Far from "angry" or defiantly rebellious, Hinde's protagonist wanders about apologetically, full of guilt, trying to help a friend recover a lost photograph that might be used for blackmail. His indecision, inhibitions, and constant self-punishment characterize him far more consistently than do any articulate attitudes toward society. In addition, Hinde's point of view in the novel is far from an unqualified endorsement of his protagonist's actions and attitudes. The ending, like the endings of most of Hinde's novels, is left open, without any definitive or summarizable statement. And the kind of judgment frequently assumed in popular accounts of novelists, the clarion call for a new way of life or the castigation of depraved contemporary morality, is entirely absent.

At the same time, however, in other terms, Happy as Larry is a novel of the 1950s. The protagonist's wandering, his lack of certainty, his allegiance only to close personal friends, his inhibitions and apologies, his insistence on self as a starting point for value, are all characteristic of much of the serious fiction of the decade. London, too, shrouded in rain, and gloom, spotted with crowded pubs that provide the only refuge, is also made the grim postwar city. In addition, Hinde uses a frequent symbol in fiction, the photograph, as central to the plot of his novel. In a world in which identity was regarded as shifting, unreliable, unknowable, only the photograph, the fixed and permanent image, could give identity any meaning, although that meaning, far more often than not, was itself a distortion, an over-simplification, occasion for blackmail. In fact, Hinde's novels most characteristically begin with categories definable in terms of other novels and novelists, with genres to which the reader is accustomed.

His first novel, Mr. Nicholas, chronicles the struggles of a young Oxonian, home on holidays, to define himself against his domineering and insensitive father. Another novel, For the Good of the Company, deals with the struggles for definition and power within the business combine, the complex organization that seemed a microcosm to depict human efforts to maintain a sense of rational control. The Cage and A Place Like Home are Hinde's African novels, The Cage a particularly sensitive and effective treatment of a young British colonial girl in Kenya attempting to retain her ties to the world of her parents while simultaneously understanding sympathetically the emerging black society. The Village establishes, without sentimentality or nostalgia, the world of the small English village about to be leveled by bulldozers and flooded for a new reservoir. High is Hinde's American visit novel, an account of the 40-year-old British writer teaching at an American university, including the familiar device of a novelist character writing a novel which is itself partly reproduced within the novel. In other words, the themes, techniques, concerns, and atmosphere of Hinde's novels are all familiar, all representative of their time and place—the heroine of The Cage often sounds like a more restrained Doris Lessing heroine, the protagonist of High is well established in a lineage that stretches back to Eric Linklater—yet Hinde is also an individual novelist of great skill with an individual sense of texture and intelligence.

Hinde is frequently at his best in describing the sensitivities of his young characters—their introspections, their naivety, their commitments to attitudes and to people they cannot entirely understand. The heroine of The Cage, unable to untangle the racial antagonisms she does not entirely understand, thinks her young colonial boyfriend will kill the black man he thinks she's been sleeping with, overdramatizing a conflict she cannot solve. The young budding capitalist in For the Good of the Company makes love to the boss's daughter but cannot really fathom all the perplexities of her emotions. He is loyal to the enigma he has partially observed and partially constructed, always wondering how much he has made up himself. A similarly intelligent sensitivity characterizes the love affair in The Village between the harassed local doctor and the opportunistic young stockbroker's wife, an affair in which love is created out of mutual desperation. Hinde's sensitivity is applied not only to personal relationships, but to exterior atmospheres as well. Each novel contains many descriptions of weather, rich and subtle evocations of different climates and seasonsequally acute whether England, America or Africa-that are shaped carefully to suit the emotions or the problems of the characters. Weather is both the material for physical description and a principal means of controlling the atmosphere of the novel.

Hinde's novels are also full of action, concerned with plot. Yet the plots never reach definitive conclusions, never entirely resolve the issues they present. The protagonist of Happy as Larry finally finds the photograph, but may or may not become a solid citizen and create a home for his faithful wife. The young capitalist in For the Good of the Company is enmeshed in the system and, at the end, like his boss, is about to live his past over again. But whether or not he will be any wiser is an open question. The Village ends with the feeling that the old English village is probably doomed, as much from its own hypocrisies and inadequacies as from an insensitive "urban bureaucracy," but the fight to save the village is not completely finished. Hinde's novels are, in a way, slices of recognizable contemporary life, a life in which people live and react, in which things happen although those things are not irremediably conclusive, and in which judgment is superficial or irrelevant. And these slices, communicated with a rich sense of personal and historical atmosphere, are never distorted by conversion into an object lesson or part of a message. In fact, Hinde, as author, keeps his distance. He can use familiar themes effectively because he treats them from a distance, stands far enough away to demonstrate a compassionate irony or an intelligent sympathy with his fictional world, a world effectively communicated because, like our larger world, it is one not easily reduced to understandable principles or judgments.

-James Gindin

HINES, (Melvin) Barry

Nationality: British. Born: Barnsley, South Yorkshire, 30 June 1939. Education: Ecclesfield Grammar School, 1950–57; Loughborough College of Education, Leicestershire, 1958–60, 1962–63, teaching certificate. Family: Divorced; one daughter and one son. Career: Teacher of physical education in secondary schools in London, 1960–62, Barnsley, 1963–68, and South Yorkshire, 1968–72; Yorkshire Arts Fellow in Creative Writing, University of Sheffield, 1972–74; East Midlands Arts Fellow in Creative Writing, Matlock College of Further Education, Derbyshire, 1975–77; Fellow in Creative Writing, University of Wollongong, New South Wales, 1979; Arts Council Fellow, Sheffield City Polytechnic, 1982–84. Awards: Writers Guild award, for screenplay, 1970; Society of Authors traveling scholarship, 1989. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1977; Honorary Fellow, Sheffield City Polytechnic, 1985. Agent: Lemon Unna and Durbridge Ltd., 24 Pottery Lane, London W11 4LZ. Address: 323 Fulwood Road, Sheffield, Yorkshire S10 3BJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Blinder. London, Joseph, 1966.

A Kestrel for a Knave. London, Joseph, 1968; as Kes, 1974.

First Signs. London, Joseph, 1972.

The Gamekeeper. London, Joseph, 1975.

The Price of Coal. London, Joseph, 1979.

Looks and Smiles. London, Joseph, 1981.

Unfinished Business. London, Joseph, 1983.

The Heart of It. London, Joseph, 1994.

Elvis over England. London and New York, Penguin Putnam, 1999.

Uncollected Short Stories

"First Reserve," in Argosy, 1967.

"Another Jimmy Dance," in Dandelion Clocks, edited by Alfred Bradley and Kay Jamieson. London, Joseph, 1978.

"Christmas Afternoon," in The Northern Drift, edited by Alfred Bradley. London, Blackie, 1980.

Plays

Billy's Last Stand (televised 1970; produced Doncaster, Yorkshire, 1984; London, 1985).

Two Men from Derby (televised 1976; produced London, 1989).Published in Act Two, edited by David Self and Ray Speakman, London, Hutchinson, 1979.

Kes, with Allan Stronach, adaptation of the novel by Hines (produced Oldham, Lancashire, 1979). London, Heinemann, 1976.

The Price of Coal (includes Meet the People and Back to Reality) (televised 1977; produced Nottingham 1984). London, Hutchinson, 1979.

Screenplays: Kes, with Ken Loach, 1969; Looks and Smiles, 1981.

Television Plays: Billy's Last Stand, 1970; Speech Day, 1973; Two Men from Derby, 1976

*

Critical Studies: The Silent Majority: A Study of the Working Class in Post-War British Fiction by Nigel Gray, London, Vision Press, and New York, Barnes and Noble, 1973; Fire in Our Hearts by Ronald Paul, Gothenburg, Sweden, Gothenburg Studies in English, 1982;

"Miners and the Novel" by Graham Holderness, in The British Working-Class Novel in the Twentieth Century edited by Jeremy Hawthorn, London, Arnold, 1984.

Barry Hines comments:

My novels are mainly about working-class life. They are about people who live on council estates or in small terraced houses. The men work in mines and steelworks, the women in underpaid menial jobs—or, increasingly, are on the dole. I feel a strong sense of social injustice on behalf of these people which stems from my own mining background. The hardness and danger of that life (my grandfather was killed down the pit, my father was injured several times) formed my attitudes and made me a socialist.

My political viewpoint is the mainspring of my work. It fuels my energy; which is fine, as long as the characters remain believable and do not degenerate into dummies merely mouthing my own beliefs. However, I would rather risk being didactic than lapsing into blandness—or end up writing novels about writers writing novels. If that happens it will be time to hang up the biro.

My books are all conventional in form. They have a beginning, a middle, and a sort of ending (mainly in that order), with the occasional flashback thrown in. I think, after seven novels, I've now probably exhausted this form and need to explore different ways of telling a story, using some of the more fractured techniques I employ in writing film scripts.

* * *

The setting of all Barry Hines's novels is the working-class community of his native West Riding of Yorkshire. But every new work has dealt with another section or facet of this community, a new experience or dilemma as encountered by a representative, if highly individualized, figure from this class.

The author began his writing career in the wake of the late 1950s and 1960s movement in which a whole generation of northern working-class novelists had come to the fore, imprinting themselves on the map of English literary history through an unblinking representation of their native milieu and its language. Like Alan Sillitoe, Keith Waterhouse, Brendan Behan, or Sid Chaplin, Hines is initially concerned with the problems of young people. Like David Storey's This Sporting Life, Hines's first novel The Blinder considers professional football as an escape route from the working class, and Lenny Hawk is clearly akin to Arthur Seaton or Arthur Machin in his unbounded confidence, ready wit, and aggressiveness, though his gifts—intellectual as well as physical—reach far beyond the football pitch.

However, almost from the outset, certainly from A Kestrel for a Knave onward, Hines has found his own voice. It is not only an angry voice denouncing class prejudice and class privilege, and attacking the shortcomings of the once celebrated affluent society. It has also a cautiously hopeful ring emanating from the creative, defiant, and ultimately invincible qualities which his working-class characters display, often against overwhelming opposition. Thus The Blinder ends with Lenny publicly throwing torn-up sterling notes in the face of the powerful mill owner and football club director Leary who has sought to take revenge on the young soccer star by aiming to destroy his brilliant career through ugly intrigue. And even Billy Casper, despite being more isolated than ever after the violent death of the hawk which he has reared and looked after with the care and devotion that he has never himself received from any human being, will, we feel, somehow carry on unsubdued, a victim but also an Artful Dodger of the ways of the adults.

A Kestrel for a Knave, better known by the title of the acclaimed film adaptation Kes, remains Hines's best-know and bestselling novel to date. It is technically an accomplished work, breaking up the story of a day in the life of an undersized lad from a one-parent family through a series of skillfully interwoven flashbacks. It has a number of memorable scenes (e.g., Billy before the careers officer), some of which have entered textbooks. What they convey is not only a sense of the complete breakdown of communication between adults and the adolescent but also his consequent negative perception of social relations and institutions—the family, school, law, work. Significantly, his one point of succor and fulfillment in an otherwise hostile and crippling environment lies outside society—the hawk, trained but not tamed, embodying strength, pride, and independence.

The author pursues this theme in The Gamekeeper just as the previous novel had developed the school subject from The Blinder. If A Kestrel for a Knave could be read as an affirmation of the Lawrentian opposition between an alienating and degrading urbanindustrial world and a fuller, more aware natural life, The Gamekeeper demonstrates that the author has either emancipated himself from this view or has never fully endorsed it. For the life of George Purse, who works on a ducal estate rearing and protecting pheasants from predators and poachers alike, is unspectacular and bare of romanticism. It is true that he has chosen this ill-paid job precisely in order to get away from the heat and dust of shiftwork in a steel mill. But the contentment and pride that he finds in his occupation are questioned and subverted by its inherent contradictions: the game is preserved for no other reason than to provide the Duke and his shooting party with the maximum bag; the gamekeeper's family suffers from the isolation imposed by living in a far-off cottage; chasing the poachers implies turning against members of his own class. Gamekeeping may thus be a personal alternative to industrial labor, but this form of living in direct contact with natural processes cannot shed capitalist relations of property and domination.

With The Price of Coal Hines returns to the industrial working class, this time confronting squarely such central issues as the nature of the work underground, the relationship between management and workforce, and the exigencies of an industrial policy to which, despite nationalization, the interests of the men remain firmly subordinated. The miners of this novel—the author has here visibly widened his cast even though he retains a central working-class family—are a singularly class-conscious and humorous breed; the way they poke fun at the absurdly exaggerated preparations for the impending Royal Visit to the colliery shows them drawing upon unfailing sources of resilience.

The militant spirit and satirical perspective of The Price of Coal clearly owe something to the 1972 and 1974 strikes in the industry, which goes to show how close to the thoughts and feelings of ordinary working people Hines has remained over the years, how loyal to his roots and faithful to his socialist humanist creed. The episodic structure of this terse narrative, its revealing juxtaposition of contrasting scenes and parts, and the dominance of dialogue derive in part from cinematographic techniques. The film version of The Price of Coal did, in fact, precede the novel by two years, and it is important to remember that Hines is a television playwright and filmscript writer as well as a novelist. He has been lucky to find a congenial interpreter of his material in the film director Ken Loach, whose documentary realist approach successfully transposed Kes, The Gamekeeper, The Price of Coal, and Looks and Smiles onto the screen, and has thus enabled the author to reach new audiences at home and abroad. In the 1990s, Hines published The Heart of It in Britain, and Elvis over England in both Britain and the United States.

-H. Gustav Klaus

HOAGLAND, Edward (Morley)

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 21 December 1932. Education: Deerfield Academy; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1950–54, A.B. 1954. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1955–57. Family: Married 1) Amy Ferrara in 1960 (divorced 1964); 2) Marion Magid in 1968 (deceased 1993); one daughter. Career: Taught at the New School for Social Research, New York, 1963-64, Rutgers University, New Brunswick, New Jersey, 1966, Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, New York, 1967 and 1971, City College, New York, 1967-68, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1978 and 1982, Columbia University, New York, 1980-81, Bennington College, Vermont, 1987-95, and University of California, Davis, 1990 and 1992. Editorial writer, New York Times, 1979-89. Since 1985 general editor, Penguin Nature Library, New York. Awards: Houghton Mifflin fellowship, 1956; Longview Foundation award, 1961; Guggenheim fellowship, 1964, 1975; American Academy traveling fellowship, 1964, and Vursell Memorial award, 1981; O. Henry award, 1971; New York State Council on the Arts fellowship, 1972; Brandeis University citation, 1972; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1982; New York Public Library Literary Lion award, 1988, 1996; National Magazine award, 1989; Lannan fellowship, 1993; Literary Lights Award, Boston Public Library, 1995. Member: American Academy, 1982. Address: P.O. Box 51, Barton, Vermont 05822, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Cat Man. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1956. The Circle Home. New York, Crowell, 1960. The Peacock's Tail. New York, McGraw Hill, 1965. Seven Rivers West. New York, Summit, 1986.

Short Stories

City Tales, with Wyoming Stories, by Gretel Ehrlich. Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1986.

The Final Fate of the Alligators. Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1992.

Other

Notes from the Century Before: A Journal from British Columbia. New York, Random House, 1969.

The Courage of Turtles: Fifteen Essays about Compassion, Pain, and Love. New York, Random House, 1971.

Walking the Dead Diamond River (essays). New York, Random House, 1973.

The Moose on the Wall: Field Notes from the Vermont Wilderness. London, Barrie and Jenkins, 1974.

Red Wolves and Black Bears (essays). New York, Random House, 1976.

African Calliope: A Journey to the Sudan. New York, Random House, 1979; London, Penguin, 1981; with a new afterword by the author, New York, Lyons & Burford, 1995.

The Edward Hoagland Reader, edited by Geoffrey Wolff. New York, Random House, 1979.

The Tugman's Passage (essays). New York, Random House, 1982. Heart's Desire: The Best of Edward Hoagland. New York, Summit, 1988; London, Collins, 1990.

Balancing Acts (essays). New York, Simon and Schuster, 1992. Balancing Acts: Essays. New York, Lyons Press, 1999.

Tigers & Ice: Reflections on Nature and Life. New York, Lyons Press, 1999.

Editor, The Circus of Dr. Lao, by Charles Finney. New York, Vintage, 1983.

Editor, The Mountains of California, by John Muir. New York and London, Penguin, 1985.

Editor, The Maine Woods, by Henry David Thoreau. New York, Penguin, 1988.

Editor, Walden, by Henry David Thoreau. New York, Vintage, 1991. Editor, Steep Trails, by John Muir. Sierra Club, 1994.

* * *

In the years since he published his first novel, Cat Man (1956), Edward Hoagland has gradually developed a reputation as one of America's leading essayists and a distinctive creator of fiction about both city life and the wilderness. His circus and boxing novels have been labeled required reading for those interested in these activities. In all his novels and many of his short stories, he shows a detailed, often first-hand knowledge of occupations where brawn or physical skills are more important than intellect. His essay, "Big Cats," is a deft description of the cat family; Cat Man is a novel of circus life that contains sordid but not unrealistic detail about the human struggles unseen by the spectators; and The Circle Home is a novel full of information about the training of boxers and life among the destitute. In his third but not best novel, The Peacock's Tail, he still shows an interest in the lower classes, for the protagonist is a young white man who gradually loses cultural and racial prejudice as he works among the urban poor. In his most recent novel, Seven Rivers West, a small group of white men and two women make an arduous journey through the Canadian west.

His prose style, though varied, is often unembellished, staccato, and unpretentious; yet since his narrators and central characters are usually lower class people, relatively uneducated and inarticulate, the straightforward colloquial prose is appropriate. In its direct, deflationary tone, the beginning of his short story, "The Final Fate of the Alligators," is a succinct introduction to most of his main characters: "In such a crowded, busy world the service each man performs is necessarily a small one. Arnie Bush's was no exception." Yet the lack of subtle, intellectual prose does not mean that the author offers no insights. A description of leopards in motion ends, for example, with a deft comment: "Really, leopards are like machines. They move in a sort of perpetual motion. Their faces don't change; they eat the same way, sleep the same way, pace much the same as each other. Their bodies are constructed as ideally as a fish's for moving and doing, for action, and not much room is left for personality." Regrettably, the final clause may aptly be applied to his characters, for many of them are so busy learning survival techniques in an uncaring world that their personalities are never fully developed. We may believe in them, but we are not always interested in them. The lack of interest sometimes results from the brevity of a character's role or the analysis devoted to it. Thus when characters fall back into self-destructive habits such as self-pity or alcoholism, we feel little sympathy. We impatiently dismiss them as born losers. On reflection, however, we may realize that we lack the compassion that Hoagland has for the urban poor or the uneducated easterner following his dream.

An accurate and just sense of Hoagland's strengths and weaknesses in prose style, narrative technique, characterization, and thought may be obtained from The Circle Home, the story of Denny Kelly, an irresponsible 29-year-old who has failed and continues to fail as a prize fighter and husband. In prose direct and at times colorful, the author demonstrates a close knowledge of the world of third-rate boxers.

A lively fight: One-hand found occasion to maneuver into every foot the ring provided. He'd be close, mining in the belly, and spring back with a lithe light antelope-type movement. Often when his left returned from thrusts his arms dropped by his sides to balance him. Those leaps, narrow body straight upright and turning in the air to face the way he wanted, were the essence of his style....

The author seems intent, not upon muckraking, but upon having readers understand the world of boxers and boxing. The reader comes to know Denny through the straight chronological flow of his attempted comeback, and through a series of flashbacks that chronicle his irresponsible and immature behavior as a husband and father. In re-creating the flow of events Hoagland shows a keen ear for dialogue. The end of the novel, however, is weak: Denny, contrite yet once more, phones to inform his wife that he is determined (because of his miseries) to return and to be henceforth a good family man. The title, The Circle Home, suggests that at last he will be truly home, but because he has failed so often before and has shown no true deep reformation, the reader may prophesy further backsliding. If we are meant to view Denny's future optimistically, the author's compassion for the dwellers in the 'lower depths' has led him to a sentimental conclusion.

Seven Rivers West contains some of Hoagland's best fictional writing. Set in the Canadian west of the 1880s, not yet settled by Europeans, though it has been touched by them, it gives a vivid and detailed look at the white men pressing on with their railroad and seeking their future in the territory of the Indians, some of whom are still defiant, others already tainted by an alien civilization. Hoagland makes us appreciate both the energy and activities of the native people, and the magnificent challenge of the landscape. John Updike rightly praised it for being "wonder-ful." The conclusion of the novel, however, is somewhat disappointing in its treatment of Cecil Roop's capture of a bear he has long sought and the depiction of the mythic Bigfoot.

From his works as a whole, Hoagland appears as a careful writer who, steeped in firsthand knowledge of his material, attempts with some humor and considerable compassion to show us men and women struggling first to survive and then to improve themselves or the world. There is, indeed, a definite sense of the author's feelings and involvement in the fiction and essays. (One reviewer objected to Hoagland exposing his neuroses in his travel essays.) But Hoagland does not hesitate to acknowledge the autobiographical aspects of his fiction. In the foreword to City Tales, he says:

I found at the end of the 1960s that what I wanted to do most was to tell my own story; and by the agency of my first book of nonfiction, Notes From the Century Before—which began as a diary intended only to fuel my next novel—I discovered that the easiest way to do so was by writing directly to the reader without filtering myself through the artifices of fiction. By the time another decade had passed, however, I was sick of telling my own story and went back to inventing other people's, in a novel I hope will be finished before this book you are holding comes out.

Because Hoagland has the skill to make vivid the plight of the unprivileged, whether in the city or in the wilderness, he deserves the esteem that has gradually gained during his writing career.

-James A. Hart

HOBAN, Russell (Conwell)

Nationality: American. Born: Lansdale, Pennsylvania, 4 February 1925. Education: Lansdale High School; Philadelphia Museum School of Industrial Art, 1941–43. Military Service: Served in the United States Army Infantry, 1943–45: Bronze Star. Family: Married 1) Lillian Aberman (i.e., the illustrator Lillian Hoban) in 1944 (divorced 1975, deceased 1998), one son and three daughters; 2) Gundula Ahl in 1975, three sons. Career: Magazine and advertising agency artist and illustrator; story board artist, Fletcher Smith Film Studio, New York, 1951; television art director, Batten Barton Durstine and Osborn, 1951-56, and J. Walter Thompson, 1956, both in New York; freelance illustrator, 1956-65; advertising copywriter, Doyle Dane Bernbach, New York, 1965-67. Since 1967 full-time writer; since 1969 has lived in London. Awards: Christopher award, 1972; Whitbread award, 1974; Ditmar award (Australia), 1982; John W. Campbell Memorial award, 1982. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1988. Agent: David Higham Associates Ltd., Golden Square, 5–8 Lower John Street, London W1R 4HA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Lion of Boaz-Jachin and Jachin-Boaz. London, Cape, and New York, Stein and Day, 1973.

Kleinzeit. London, Cape, and New York, Viking Press, 1974.

Turtle Diary. London, Cape, 1975; New York, Random House, 1976.
Riddley Walker. London, Cape, and New York, Summit, 1980; expanded edition, with afterword, notes, and glossary by the author, Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1998.

Pilgermann. London, Cape, and New York, Summit, 1983.

The Medusa Frequency. London, Cape, and New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1987.

The Moment under the Moment. London, Cape, 1992.

Fremder. London, Jonathan Cape, 1996.

Angelica's Grotto. London, Bloomsbury, 1999.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Schwartz," in Encounter (London), March 1990.

Fiction (for children)

Bedtime for Frances. New York, Harper, 1960; London, Faber, 1963.
Herman the Loser. New York, Harper, 1961; Kingswood, Surrey, World's Work, 1972.

The Song in My Drum. New York, Harper, 1962.

London Men and English Men. New York, Harper, 1962.

Some Snow Said Hello. New York, Harper, 1963.

The Sorely Trying Day. New York, Harper, 1964; Kingswood, Surrey, World's Work, 1965.

A Baby Sister for Frances. New York, Harper, 1964; London, Faber, 1965.

Bread and Jam for Frances. New York, Harper, 1964; London, Faber, 1966.

Nothing to Do. New York, Harper, 1964.

Tom and the Two Handles. New York, Harper, 1965; Kingswood, Surrey, World's Work, 1969.

The Story of Hester Mouse Who Became a Writer. New York, Norton, 1965; Kingswood, Surrey, World's Work, 1969.

What Happened When Jack and Daisy Tried to Fool the Tooth Fairies. New York, Four Winds Press, 1965.

Henry and the Monstrous Din. New York, Harper, 1966; Kingswood, Surrey, World's Work, 1967.

The Little Brute Family. New York, Macmillan, 1966.

Save My Place, with Lillian Hoban. New York, Norton, 1967.

Charlie the Tramp. New York, Four Winds Press, 1967.

The Mouse and His Child. New York, Harper, 1967; London, Faber, 1969.

A Birthday for Frances. New York, Harper, 1968; London, Faber, 1970.

The Stone Doll of Sister Brute. New York, Macmillan, and London, Collier Macmillan, 1968.

Harvey's Hideout. New York, Parents' Magazine Press, 1969; London, Cape, 1973.

Best Friends for Frances. New York, Harper, 1969; London, Faber, 1971.

The Mole Family's Christmas. New York, Parents' Magazine Press, 1969; London, Cape, 1973.

Ugly Bird. New York, Macmillan, 1969.

A Bargain for Frances. New York, Harper, 1970; Kingswood, Surrey, World's Work, 1971.

Emmet Otter's Jug-Band Christmas. New York, Parents' Magazine Press, and Kingswood, Surrey, World's Work, 1971.

The Sea-Thing Child. New York, Harper, and London, Gollancz, 1972.

Letitia Rabbit's String Song. New York, Coward McCann, 1973.

How Tom Beat Captain Najork and His Hired Sportsmen. New York, Atheneum, and London, Cape, 1974.

Ten What? A Mystery Counting Book. London, Cape, 1974; New York, Scribner, 1975. Dinner at Alberta's. New York, Crowell, 1975; London, Cape, 1977. Crocodile and Pierrot, with Sylvie Selig. London, Cape, 1975; New York, Scribner, 1977.

A Near Thing for Captain Najork. London, Cape, 1975; New York, Atheneum, 1976.

Arthur's New Power. New York, Crowell, 1978; London, Gollancz, 1980

The Twenty-Elephant Restaurant. New York, Atheneum, 1978; London, Cape, 1980.

The Dancing Tigers. London, Cape, 1979.

La Corona and the Tin Frog. London, Cape, 1979.

Flat Cat. London, Methuen, and New York, Philomel, 1980.

Ace Dragon Ltd. London, Cape, 1980.

The Serpent Tower. London, Methuen, 1981.

The Great Fruit Gum Robbery. London, Methuen, 1981; as The Great Gumdrop Robbery, New York, Philomel, 1982.

They Came from Aargh! London, Methuen, and New York, Philomel, 1981.

The Battle of Zormla. London, Methuen, and New York, Philomel, 1982.

The Flight of Bembel Rudzuk. London, Methuen, and New York, Philomel, 1982.

Ponders (Jim Frog, Big John Turkle, Charlie Meadows, Lavinia Bat). London, Walker, and New York, Holt Rinehart, 4 vols., 1983–84; 1 vol. edition, London, Walker Books, 1988.

The Rain Door. London, Gollancz, 1986; New York, Crowell, 1987. The Marzipan Pig. London, Cape, 1986; New York, Farrar Straus, 1987.

Monsters. London, Gollancz, and New York, Scholastic, 1989.

Jim Hedgehog's Supernatural Christmas. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1989; New York, Clarion, 1992.

Jim Hedgehog and the Lonesome Tower. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1990; New York, Clarion, 1992.

M.O.L.E. Much Overworked Little Earthmover, with Jan Pienkowski. London, Cape, 1993.

The Court of the Winged Serpent. London, Cape, 1994.

The Trokeville Way. New York, Knopf, 1996.

Trouble on Thunder Mountain. New York, Orchard Books, 1999.

Plays

The Carrier Frequency, with Impact Theatre Co-operative (produced London, 1984).

Riddley Walker, adaptation of his own novel (produced Manchester, 1986).

Some Episodes in the History of Miranda and Caliban (opera libretto), music by Helen Roe (produced London, 1990).

Television Plays: Come and Find Me, 1980.

Poetry (for children)

Goodnight. New York, Norton, 1966; Kingswood, Surrey, World's Work, 1969.

The Pedalling Man and Other Poems. New York, Norton, 1968; Kingswood, Surrey, World's Work, 1969.

Egg Thoughts and Other Frances Songs. New York, Harper, 1972; London, Faber, 1973.

Other

The Second Mrs. Kong: An Opera in 2 Acts (libretto), music by Harrison Birtwistle. London, Universal Edition, 1994.

A Russell Hoban Omnibus. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1999.

Russell Hoban: Forty Years: Essays on His Writings for Children, edited by Alida Allison. New York, Garland, 2000.

Other (for children)

What Does It Do and How Does It Work? Power Shovel, Dump Truck, and Other Heavy Machines. New York, Harper, 1959.

The Atomic Submarine: A Practice Combat Patrol under the Sea. New York, Harper, 1960.

*

Critical Studies: Through the Narrow Gate: The Mythological Consciousness of Russell Hoban by Christine Wilkie, Rutherford, New Jersey, Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, and London, Associated University Presses, 1989.

* * *

Russell Hoban's novels for adults have a compelling strangeness made up of the most elusive aspects of myth, riddle, history, fantasy, philosophy, and humor. For many readers this is a deeply intriguing mixture which has made him something of a cult author. Drop the title of his most-discussed book, Riddley Walker, into any literary conversation and it will divide the group into three parties: the excited supporters who believe it to be one of the great underestimated novels of the 20th century, the bored opposition who didn't get past page six because it was "odd," and the remainder who've never heard of Russell Hoban. This last group is smaller since the success of the film Turtle Diary, which follows the bare plot of Hoban's third novel, but with scarcely a shadow of the book's power.

Turtle Diary is the most approachable of Hoban's works for readers familiar with the "realist" novel, although its structure is unusual. The first chapter is a kind of journal note by William G. who works in a London bookshop and whose deliberately limited life is metaphorically connected to the lives of the giant turtles he visits in the London Zoo. Chapter 2 is an apparently unrelated narration by Neaera H., an author of children's books, but now in a state of block about a water-beetle she had hoped would become a new character. As William and Neaera meet and join forces to free the turtles the parallel narration continues, creating two characters of powerful immediacy, and allowing the reader to know far more about them than either is willing to reveal to the other. Like all Hoban's major characters these two are seekers, looking for answers, or even the right questions, about the meaning of life. The starting point is often a sudden perception of the extraordinariness of the ordinary, whether it's the daily human routine or the world of landscape and natural objects.

Animals are often used by Hoban as metaphors, or totems, or familiars. Through them he questions reality and identity, Thing-in-Itself. What a turtle is to itself remains a riddle for Neaera and William. The lion in The Lion of Boaz-Jachin and Jachin-Boaz, Hoban's first novel for adults, begins as a figure in a lion-hunt Boaz-Jachin sees carved in relief upon a tomb. It develops as a richly ambiguous image during his search for his father and the map of life his father has promised him. Like many other objects in the internal worlds of Hoban's narrators, the lion becomes increasingly "real," and moves into the external world with farcical, sad, moving, results. Although some of the black comedy, like the outrageously funny scene in the asylum, is similar to the surrealism of Samuel Beckett, the bleakness is always moderated in Hoban's work by a far more benign, optimistic view of the world than Beckett's. Love is possible, even probable, in Hoban's world, though it is always love with toughness, risk, and no certainties. Like life, it requires courage, hope, and a sense of humour.

Kleinzeit and The Medusa Frequency have hints of Beckett too, but also of Charlie Chaplin, Woody Allen, and "magic realism." Kleinzeit tells Ward Sister that his name means "hero" in German, but his rival explains that it really means "smalltime," and the unheroic hero, struggling with inner states which have become inseparable from outer, is often at the center of Hoban's novels. Gifts are given to Kleinzeit as he leaves the hospital with Ward Sister, "cured" of his "dismemberment," if not of the pains in his hypotenuse, diapason, and stretto. God gives the lovers a week free of electricity-strikes to start them off on their joint life, Hospital gives a week's postponement of Kleinzeit catching the flu, and Death gives Kleinzeit the power to draw with a calligraphy brush in "one fat sweep" of black ink, a perfect circle, symbol of harmony and completion. But although the symbols in Hoban's novels are often universal ones, and frequently have a classical source, like the recurrent Orpheus and Eurydice myth, their particular appearances are always full of wit and unexpected application. The Orpheus and Eurydice myth allows scope to some of Hoban's strongest interests, the need to love which has as its dark side the possibility of loss and death, the power of memory and history, and the urge to make sense of experience by remaking it in song, story, and art.

Hoban has fun with names and words in all his books, but Riddley Walker is, among other things, an extended examination of the connections between language and the world. The action is narrated by Riddley Walker himself in an extraordinary dialect, a cross between phonetic Cockney, mixed regional, and corrupted remnants of computer-speak, which succeeds brilliantly in suggesting the language of England over two thousand years after the "1 Big 1," a nuclear explosion around 1997 A.D. With no words for half the abstractions we take for granted, Riddley expresses ideas of religion, science, and art in terms of the practical things he knows, and the resulting metaphors are exhilarating. (In 1998—the real 1998— Hoban published an expanded edition of the book, including a glossary and explanatory notes.) The two parts of Riddley's name hint at the two aspects of his adventures, mental and physical, during the ten days after he earns manhood in his tribe. "Walker is my name and I am the same. Riddley Walker. Walking my riddles where ever they've took me and walking them now on this paper the same." One of the great pleasures of Hoban's novels lies in the participation demanded from the reader. In this novel the distant past of Riddley's society, known to him only from scraps of myth, song, and game, is the reader's twentieth-century present. There are continual shocks in the collision between our own and Riddley's view of events. A very funny scene satirizes "expert" interpretation of the past when Goodparley explains the meaning of a manuscript dating from the twentieth century.

Pilgermann, Hoban's most violent and disturbing novel, is an equally startling use of history to ask philosophical questions, but this time with a complexity of biblical and Islamic allusions. The pilgrimhero is a Jew in the eleventh century, another of Hoban's seekers on whom the riddles of life suddenly force an imperative physical journey and metaphysical quest. Any answers come through connections demonstrated, not merely told.

Nick Hartley, the hero of The Trokeville Way, a novel for children, has a grown-up mind: he compares the object of his affection (an older girl, naturally) to a pre-Raphaelite painting, and has trouble fitting in with the world of children. Harold Klein of Angelica's Grotto also has problems adjusting, but his difficulties are much more serious, since he is seventy-two. Whereas Nick may be an art historian in the making, Harold is the genuine article. Obsessed by Gustav Klimt's nudes, he stumbles onto a titillating Web site called Angelica's Grotto, and enters into a complex relationship—first in cyberspace, then in real life— with the site's mistress, a feminist intellectual. "I'm on the edge of madness," Klein confesses. "On the other hand … I've got a lot of company."

—Jennifer Livett

HODGINS, Jack

Nationality: Canadian. Born: John Stanley Hodgins in Comox Valley, Vancouver Island, British Columbia, 3 October 1938. Education: Tsolum School, Courtenay, British Columbia; University of British Columbia, Vancouver, 1956-61, B.Ed. 1961. Family: Married Dianne Child in 1960; one daughter and two sons. Career: Teacher, Nanaimo District Senior Secondary School, British Columbia, 1961-80; visiting professor, University of Ottawa, 1981-83; visiting professor, 1983-85, and currently professor of creative writing, University of Victoria, British Columbia. Writer-in-residence, Simon Fraser University, Burnaby, British Columbia, 1977, and University of Ottawa, 1979; Canadian Department of External Affairs lecturer, Japan, 1979. Awards: University of Western Ontario President's medal, for short story, 1973; Canada Council award, 1980; Governor-General's award, 1980; Canada-Australia award, 1986. D.Litt., University of British Columbia, 1995. Agent: Bella Pomer Agency, 22 Shallmar Boulevard, Toronto, Ontario M5N 2Z8. Address: Creative Writing Dept., University of Victoria, Box 1700, Victoria, British Columbia, Canada V8W 2Y2.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Invention of the World. Toronto, Macmillan, 1977; New York, Harcourt Brace, 1978.

The Resurrection of Joseph Bourne; or, A Word or Two on Those Port Annie Miracles. Toronto, Macmillan, 1979.

The Honorary Patron. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1987. Innocent Cities. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1990. The Macken Charm. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1995. Broken Ground. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1998.

Short Stories

Spit Delaney's Island: Selected Stories. Toronto, Macmillan, 1976. The Barclay Family Theatre. Toronto, Macmillan, 1981.

Beginnings: Samplings from a Long Apprenticeship: Novels Which Were Imagined, Written, Re-Written, Submitted, Rejected, Abandoned, and Supplanted. Toronto, Grand Union, 1983.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The God of Happiness," in Westerly, (Nedlands, Australia) 4, 1968.
- "Promise of Peace," in The North American Review, New Ser. 6(4), 1969.
- "A Matter of Necessity," in The Canadian Forum, January 1970.
- "The Graveyard Man," in Descant (Fort Worth, Texas) 15(4), 1971.
- "Witness," in Alphabet 18-19, 1971.
- "Edna Pike, on the Day of the Prime Minister's Wedding," in Event: Journal of the Contemporary Arts, 2(1), 1972.
- "Open Line," in The Antigonish Review 9, 1972.
- "Passing by the Dragon," in Island: Vancouver Island's Quarterly Review of Poetry and Fiction, (Nanaimo, British Columbia), 2, 1972.
- "The Importance of Patsy McLean," in Journal of Canadian Fiction, 2(1), 1973.
- "In the Museum of Evil," in Journal of Canadian Fiction, 3(1), 1974.
- "Silverthorn," in Forum (Houston) 12(1), 1974.
- "Great Blue Heron," in Prism International, 14(2), 1975.
- "A Conversation in the Kick-and-Kill: July," in Sound Heritage, (Victoria, British Columbia), 6(3), 1977.
- "The Invention of the World," in Viva, February 1978.
- "Spit Delaney's Nightmare," in Toronto Life, January 1978.
- "Miss Schussnigg's First Spring," in Peter Gzowski's Spring Tonic, edited by Peter Gzowski. Edmonton, Alberta, Hurtig, 1979.
- "Victims of the Masquerade," in Interface, 4(8), 1981.
- "Change of Scenery," in Small Wonders: New Stories by Twelve Distinguished Canadian Writers, edited by Robert Weaver. Toronto, CBC, 1982.
- "The Day of the Stranger," in Chatelaine, December 1982.
- "Faller Topolski's Arrival," in True North/Down Under (Lantzville, British Columbia), 1, 1983.
- "The Crossing," in Vancouver Magazine, February 1985.
- "Earthquake," in The Canadian Forum, March 1986.
- "Loved Forever," in Books in Canada, August-September 1988.
- "Balance," in Paris Transcontinental: A Magazine of Short Stories 7, 1993.
- "Galleries," in O Canada 2, edited by Cassandra Pybus, Meanjin (Parkville, Victoria), 54, 1995.
- "In the Forest of Discarded Pasts," in Paris Transcontinental: A Magazine of Short Stories, 11, c. 1995.
- "Over Here," in Prism International, 33(3), 1995.

Other

Teachers' Resource Book to Transition II: Short Fiction, with Bruce Nesbitt. Vancouver, CommCept, 1978.

Teaching Short Fiction, with Bruce Nesbitt. Vancouver, CommCept, 1981.

Left Behind in Squabble Bay (for children), illustrated by Victor Gad. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1988.

Over Forty in Broken Hill: Unusual Encounters Outback and Beyond. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1992.

A Passion for Narrative: A Guide for Writing Fiction. Toronto,
 McClelland & Stewart, 1993; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1994.
 Editor, with W.H. New, Voice and Vision. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1972.

Editor, The Frontier Experience. Toronto, Macmillan, 1975.
Editor, The West Coast Experience. Toronto, Macmillan, 1976.
Editor, with Bruce Nesbitt, Teaching Short Fiction; A Resource Book to "Transitions II: Short Fiction." Vancouver, CommCept, 1978.

*

Bibliography: "Jack Hodgins," in The Writers' Union of Canada: A Directory of Members, edited by Ted Whittaker, Toronto, The Writers' Union of Canada, 1981; "Hodgins, Jack (1938–)" by Helen Hoy, in her Modern English-Canadian Prose: A Guide to Information Sources, Detroit, Gale Research, 1983; "Hodgins, Jack (1938–)" by Allan Weiss, in his A Comprehensive Bibliography of English-Canadian Short Stories, 1950–1983, Toronto, ECW Press, 1988; "Selected Bibliography" by David [L.] Jeffrey, in his Jack Hodgins and His Works, Toronto, ECW Press, 1989.

Manuscript Collection: The National Library of Canada, Ottawa, Ontario.

Critical Studies: "The Mind of the Artist: The Soul of the Place," in Essays on Canadian Writing, 5, 1976, "Fantasy in a Mythless Age" in Essays on Canadian Writing, 9, 1977-78, "Thinking about Eternity," in Essays on Canadian Writing, 20, 1980–81, all by J.R. (Tim) Struthers; "An Interview with Jack Hodgins" by Jack David, in Essays on Canadian Writing, 11, 1978; "Jack Hodgins and the Island Mind," in Canada Emergent: Literature/Art, edited by James Carley, Book Forum, 4, 1978, "A Crust for the Critics," in Canadian Literature, 84, 1980, "It Out-Hodgins Hodgins: Burlesque and the Freedoms of Fiction," in Essays on Canadian Writing, 26, 1983, and Jack Hodgins and His Works, Toronto, ECW Press, 1989, all by David L. Jeffrey; "Jack Hodgins" by Geoff Hancock, in his Canadian Writers at Work: Interviews with Geoff Hancock, Toronto, Oxford University Press, 1987; "Haunted by a Glut of Ghosts: Jack Hodgins' The Invention of the World" by Robert Lecker, in Essays on Canadian Writing, 20, 1980-81; "Canadian Burlesque: Jack Hodgins" The Invention of the World" by Susan Beckmann, in Essays on Canadian Writing, 20, 1980-81; "Western Horizon: Jack Hodgins" by Alan Twigg, in his For Openers: Conversations with 24 Canadian Writers, Madeira Park, British Columbia, Harbour, 1981; "The Barclay Family Theatre" by Ann Mandel, in The Fiddlehead, 134, 1982; "An Interview with Jack Hodgins" by Peter O'Brien, in Rubicon (Montreal), 1, 1983; "Irish and Biblical Myth in Jack Hodgins' The Invention of the World" by Jan C. Horner, in Canadian Literature, 99, 1983; "Isolation and Community in Jack Hodgins's Short Stories," in Recherches Anglaises et Américaines, 16, 1983, "Jack Hodgins: Interview," in Kunapipi 9(2), 1987, and "Magic Realism in Jack Hodgins's Short Stories," in Recherches Anglaises et Nord-Américaines 20, 1987, all by Jeanne Delbaere-Garant; "Jack Hodgins' The Invention of the World and Robert Browning's 'Abt Vogler" by Laurence Steven, in Canadian Literature, 99, 1983; "Brother XII and The Invention of the World," in Essays on Canadian Writing, 28, 1984, and "Lines and Circles: Structure in The Honorary Patron' in Canadian Literature, 128, 1991, both by JoAnn McCaig; "Disbelieving Story: A Reading of The Invention of the World" by Frank Davey, in Present Tense, The Canadian Novel, edited by John Moss, vol. 4, Toronto, NC Press, 1985; "If Words Won't Do, and Symbols Fail': Hodgins' Magic Reality' by Cecilia Coulas Fink, in Journal of Canadian Studies, 20(2), 1985; "The Invention of a Region: The Art of Fiction in Jack Hodgins' Stories" by Waldemar Zacharasiewicz, in Gaining Ground: European Critics on Canadian Literature, edited by Robert Kroetsch and Reingard M. Nischik, Edmonton, NeWest, 1985; "Jack Hodgins's Island: A Big Enough Country" by Allan Pritchard, in University of Toronto Quarterly, 55, 1985; "Jack Hodgins and the Sources of Invention," in Essays on Canadian Writing 34, 1987, "Jack Hodgins," in A Sense of Style: Studies in the Art of Fiction in English-Speaking Canada, Toronto, ECW Press, 1989, "Hodgins's 'Pack of Crazies': The Resurrection of Joseph Bourne" and "On the Edge of Something Else: Jack Hodgins's Island World," both in An Independent Stance: Essays on English-Canadian Criticism and Fiction, Erin, Ontario, Porcupine's Quill, 1991, all by W.J. Keith; "Out on the Verandah: A Conversation with Jack Hodgins" by Alan Lawson and Stephen Slemon, in Australian-Canadian Studies 5(1), 1987; "Jack Hodgins: Interview" by Russell McDougall, in Kunapipi, 12(1), 1990; "Reader's Squint: An Approach to Jack Hodgins' The Barclay Family Theatre" by Simone Vauthier, in Modes of Narrative: Approaches to American, Canadian, and British Fiction, edited by Reingard M. Nischik and Barbara Korte, Würzburg, Germany, Königshausen and Neumann, 1990; The Counterfeit and the Real in Jack Hodgins' "The Invention of the World" by Carol Langhelle, Lund, Sweden, Nordic Association for Canadian Studies—L'Association Nordique d'études Canadiennes, 1992; How Stories Mean edited by John Metcalf and J.R. (Tim) Struthers, Erin, Ontario, Porcupine's Quill, 1993.

Jack Hodgins comments:

(1981) I write fiction in order to free myself of those shadowy creatures that walk briefly across the back of my mind and then return to grow into living breathing people who aren't satisfied to live in my skull: Spit Delaney, the engineer who falls apart when his steam locomotive is sold to a museum; Maggie Kyle, the gorgeous "loggers' whore" who sets herself up a new life in the ruins of a failed utopian colony; Joseph Bourne, the famous poet who dies and returns to life in a tiny town on the edge of the world; Jacob Weins, the small-town mayor never seen without a different costume on, who after his town has slid off the mountain and into the sea has to search for a new role for himself, and a new costume. Writing them down is a way of getting rid of them. It is also, I hope, a way of sharing them-of allowing other people to love them too, as I must do myself before I'm through with them. I write fiction in order to explain their mysteries to myself-what makes them tick?-but always in the process of writing uncover more mystery than I solve. I write fiction in order to nail down a place before it disappears. If much has been made of the fact that most of my stories are set on Vancouver Island, it is not just that there is some excitement in introducing a part of the world seldom represented before in fiction. The place is changing while I look at it and I want to get the trees, the rocks, the beaches down right before they disappear. I also feel that if I nail the place down right, the people who walk around in it will be just that much more convincing to the reader, wherever he is in the world. I write fiction, finally, for the same reason the magician creates his illusions—in order to start something magical happening in the audience's (reader's) mind. If the critics insist on calling me a "magic realist" it isn't because I distort reality or indulge in fantasy but because I see the magic that's already there.

* * *

Jack Hodgins is a strongly regional writer who has never significantly departed in his fiction from the setting of Vancouver Island, the fairly circumscribed region where he was born and spent his childhood and young manhood. As Canada's westernmost edge of settlement, the rural north of Vancouver Island is a region that runs to excess. Until recently it still counted as a frontier area, attracting with its fine scenery and good winters a rich variety of eccentrics who populated its fishing villages, stump farms, and logging camps. Yet, in common with the best of regional writers, Hodgins portrays the local as a staging point for the universal, and his novels and stories owe their appeal largely to his ability to realize the fact that "imagination can redeem or transcend the physical," as Frank Davey observed in the Oxford Companion to Canadian Literature. Hodgins's imagination is indeed prodigious, and its inventions, while often seemingly improbable in their carnivalesque scope or burlesque nature, nevertheless reveal a commitment to humanity at large, as well as the dignity of the individual. Until recently Hodgins's fiction was overflowing with humor, and suggested a temperamental inability on the author's part to see life as other than good, prospects as other than expansive, and human nature as other than extravagant in its potentialities. However, his 1998 novel, Broken Ground, suggests that a darker side of Hodgins's imagination has emerged, and with it brought a new complexity to his work without sacrificing the outrageous and sometimes magical visions that have to date defined his writing.

Hodgins's first book was a group of loosely linked stories, Spit Delaney's Island; Spit Delaney himself, wild and often shocking in the unconventionality of his behavior, is the first of Hodgins's roguish and exuberant heroes who live by their dreams and in the process expose the futility of the limited lives of the literal-minded. Hodgins in fact practices a latter-day picaresque fiction. His central characters are often variants on the classical picaro, the ultimately redeemable rogue. His novels take on the loose structure of the picaresque romance, and in the process he constantly intertwines parables with the deceptions of verisimilitude. The Invention of the World is still to date the best known of Hodgins's longer fictions and the most representative of his writing. It is a mingling of the eccentrically regional and the extravagantly parabolical. A larger-than-life evangelist (based on an actual confidence trickster who once operated in the same area under the name Brother Twelve) persuades a whole Irish village to follow him to Vancouver Island and form a community subservient to his wishes. In a way the evangelist invents a world, but it is a false one; the real heroine and creative spirit of the book is the exuberant and promiscuous Maggie Kyle, eventual bride in an epic and Brueghelesque wedding at which the island loggers break into ferocious battle. Maggie is not only a splendidly complex personality; she also spans literary genres and approaches, from Joycean interior monologue to vitalist action.

Winner of the Gibson Literary Award as best first novel of the year, The Invention of the World was followed by The Resurrection of Joseph Bourne, for which Hodgins received Canada's most prestigious literary award, the Governor General's. The Resurrection of Joseph Bourne is even more emphatically vitalist than its predecessor in its insistence on the power of the human imagination to make its own terms with existence. The once internationally renowned, now reclusive poet, Joseph Bourne, is revitalized by the appearance of a mysterious woman whose mystical powers endow Bourne with the ability to regenerate his isolated community through a succession of comical yet genuine encounters.

The occasional problem of sustaining exaggerative fantasy surfaced in Hodgins's 1981 collection, The Barclay Family Theatre. While it more explicitly treats Hodgins's interest in the figure of the artist than in his previous work, this series of stories concerning the daughters of a single backwoods family and their disconcerting impact on the world is somewhat shallow in parts and occasionally artificial in its construction. The Barclay daughters, in a reprise of their appearance in Spit Delaney's Island, do not capture the reader's sympathy or interest in the manner of their original vehicle. Some wondered whether Hodgins had come to the point where the possibilities of his existing material and his current methods were almost exhausted. Instead, Hodgins has expanded as a writer, producing a striking number and variety of new works that range widely in both a geographical and a generic sense. These include a children's book, Left Behind in Squabble Bay, a travel book, Over 40 in Broken Hill, based on an expedition with Australian writer Roger McDonald, and a creative writing text, A Passion for Narrative. Several novels have also since appeared, demonstrating his versatility and ability to learn from exploring different literary forms, and inject his novels with Hodgins's literal exploration of different geographic territory led to his fictional explorations in The Honorary Patron, divided between Europe and Vancouver Island, and Innocent Cities, divided between Australia and Vancouver Island. While The Honorary Patron presents an unprecedented central figure in Hodgins's oeuvre, the older, cautious, and chronically pensive Jeffrey Crane, it is in Innocent Cities that Hodgins departs most radically from his earlier work. It is, in its own way, a historical novel, set in Victoria during the 1880s, the period of lull between the Cariboo and the Klondike gold rushes. Yet this "Victorian" novel is anything but Victorian in form. Inspired by the actual letters of a woman who invited her sister to join her in Canada, so as to assume certain "wifely" duties for her husband, the novel defies Victorian convention and notions of decorum from the onset. In a frontier society where names and identities are easily exchanged, masquerades are revealed to be common, even necessary for the society's belief in itself to prosper. Hodgins uses these deceptions as the basis of a post-modern investigation of history, meaning, language, and narrative. Innocent Cities is a work of parody and palimpsest, an imitation Victorian novel presented through an ironic modern sensibility.

Comfortable in his departure from form, Hodgins's was just as comfortable in his return in 1995's The Macken Charm, a bildungsroman covering the 1956 summer before Rusty Macken's departure from Vancouver Island for university on the mainland. The novel possesses the semi-autobiographical elements that an author usually mines earlier in his career. Coming as it does, however, mid-career, The Macken Charm avoids the romantic rememberings or sentimental meanderings that sometimes characterize the genre. Instead Hodgins navigates the young Macken's sensitive recognition of his family's peculiarities and strengths, as framed by the events of a cousin's anything but funereal funeral and just as outlandish wake. Combining the magical realism and extravagant humor of his earlier works with the sensitive perception of an isolated narrator, Hodgins's proved himself and his subject matter inexhaustible.

Nevertheless, he challenged himself again in his critically acclaimed novel Broken Ground. Set in 1922 in Portuguese Creek, a "soldiers' settlement" on Vancouver Island, the novel is permeated by the horror of war and the ethos of settlement, as the characters who populate the novel struggle with love and loss in their lives, the complexities of truth, and the difficulties of assigning coherent meaning to events. A forest fire looms throughout the first one-third of the novel, paralleling the war in its random destructiveness and forcing the issues many would rather suppress to the fore. Nature is a cataclysmic force not welcoming to the inhabitants of the settlement; the land they have been rewarded with by the government is unsuitable for farming, ultimately causing numerous deaths and disasters. Just as the fire erupts and the settlers are evacuated, Hodgins moves his novel to 1919 and the letters of one couple separated by the war, providing a few answers to the novel's many mysteries, and an insightful portrait of one soldier's experience of war. Part three is set in 1996 as Rusty Macken—of The Macken Charm—returns to Vancouver Island with a cinematic version of the events of the now legendary fire, causing one elderly survivor to recall the aftermath with devastating clarity, and wonder how quiet personal lives are reinterpreted over time as staunch purposefully heroic archetypes. Hodgins, always interested in the process of mythmaking, has raised the stakes in Broken Ground, his self-reflexive playfulness traded in for thoughtful introspection and exceptionally sensitive characterization. Broken Ground was nominated for the 2000 International Impac Dublin Literary Award.

—George Woodcock, updated by J.R. (Tim) Struthers and Jennifer Harris

HOFF, Harry Summerfield

See COOPER, William

HOFFMAN, Alice

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 16 March 1952. Education: Adelphi University, Garden City, New York, B.A. 1973; Stanford University, California (Mirelles fellow), M.A. 1975. Family: Married to Tom Martin; two sons. Lives in Boston, Massachusetts. Awards: Bread Loaf Writers Conference Atherton scholarship, 1976. Address: c/o Putnam, 200 Madison Avenue, New York, New York 10016, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Property Of. New York, Farrar Straus, 1977; London, Hutchinson, 1978.

The Drowning Season. New York, Dutton, and London, Hutchinson, 1979.

Angel Landing. New York, Putnam, 1980; London, Severn House, 1982.

White Horses. New York, Putnam, 1982; London, Collins, 1983.Fortune's Daughter. New York, Putnam, and London, Collins, 1985.Illumination Night. New York, Putnam, and London, Macmillan, 1987.

At Risk. New York, Putnam, and London, Macmillan, 1988.

Seventh Heaven. New York, Putnam, and London, Virago Press, 1991.

Turtle Moon. New York, Putnam, and London, Macmillan, 1992. Second Nature. New York, Putnam, and London, Macmillan, 1994. Practical Magic. New York, Putnam, and London, Macmillan, 1995. Fireflies. New York, Hyperion Books for Children, 1997. Here on Earth. New York, Putnam, 1997. Local Girls. New York, G.P. Putnam's Sons, 1999. Horsefly. New York, Hyperion Books for Children, 2000. The River King. New York, G.P. Putnam's Sons, 2000.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Blue Tea," in Redbook (New York), June 1982.

"Sweet Young Things," in Mademoiselle (New York), June 1983.

"Sleep Tight," in Ploughshares (Cambridge, Massachusetts), vol. 15, no. 2–3, 1989.

Film Adaptations: Practical Magic, 1998.

* * *

Alice Hoffman's female protagonists have much in common. They are all drawn to dangerous men: a saboteur, a gang leader, a drug-dealing older brother, a nihilistic singer. They are all estranged from their parents, though most have strong relationships with their grandparents or someone of their grandparents' age. These older people are often fortunetellers of some kind. There is a strong undercurrent of magic in Hoffman's work.

In Hoffman's first novel, Property Of, the unnamed narrator attaches herself to McKay, a gang leader whose life is dedicated to the notion of honor as the gang had adapted it to the violent world of The Avenue, gang territory on the edge of New York City. When she leaves McKay it is because his glittering image and his honor have both crumbled. Hoffman brings almost nothing new to this old-hat situation, and only in the scattered passages where the narrator meditates on deeper things does her language come alive. The neohardboiled style dialogue is undermined by an unrealistic candor between characters who hardly know one another. Hoffman tries to pass this off as cool detachment, but it is clearly narrative strategy; a way to delineate character without much development. Hoffman's interest in ceremonial or ritual behavior, and in personal mythmaking that will continue to be a part of all her work is present here, though muffled by the screen of toughness. There is also the first of many magic charms and talismans: a locket with a human tooth inside given to the narrator by Monty, an older man who tries to look out for her.

Property Of's narrator, like many of Hoffman's women, seeks a life of magic. She contrasts the "little magic" of herbs and that nature that fights its way up through the concrete with the "big magic" of alcohol and drugs. "Difficult to categorize, until, of course, the consequences are seen. The little magic only causes a smile, but the big magic always seems to end up in the slammer or at a wake." In the last sentence of the novel she smiles.

The Drowning Season is the story of Esther the White and her granddaughter Esther the Black. The generation between these two women, Esther the Black's parents, are both lost: her father to his compulsion to drown himself every summer, and her mother to drink and dream of escape to the desert. Esther the White and the caretaker who loves her try to help the younger Esther come to grips with the emptiness of her life.

Like The Drowning Season, Angel Landing is set on the shore of a large cove. Two women live in a nearly empty boarding house across the bay from a nuclear plant under construction. When the plant is sabotaged the younger of the women, Natalie, discovers who "the bomber" is and finds herself falling in love with him. This "dangerous" man works his way through his feelings of alienation through his commitment to Natalie. Aunt Minnie, the older woman and owner of the boarding house, encourages Natalie in the relationship, even when she knows the man is "the bomber." As in Property Of the parts of this novel that are timely—the protesting over the nuclear plant, the struggle for better conditions in an old age homeclutter the story and add little. And again there is the unbelievable openness: Finn, the "bomber," who had been completely closed up, speaks his first emotionally committed words to Natalie in front of five strangers at a Thanksgiving dinner. After a deus ex machina helps Finn escape prosecution, he and Natalie run off to Florida, ending the novel on a hopeful but vague note.

White Horses is a difficult novel. The writing is as emotional and poetic as Hoffman's best work, but there is no character with which a reader might comfortably identify, or even sympathize. Aversion or pity are the likely responses. Young Teresa spends her life waiting for an "Aria," a mythical kind of outlaw lover, whose image has been passed down to her from her mother. The mother passes up real love while she waits, surrendering the myth only as she is dying. Both Teresa and her mother believe Teresa's brother Silver is an Aria, and Teresa enters into an incestuous relationship with him. Mother and daughter are both caught between the romance of the wild outlaw lover and the harsh life of attachment to the self-centered cruel Silver. Teresa breaks away from this destructive love only in the last pages.

Fortune's Daughter is a story of nurturing, and of "female mythology" as the jacket copy reads. Rae Perry is pregnant by a cruel and dangerous man, Jessup. Here the older woman Rae (who has cut herself off from her parents) turns to is Lila, a fortune-telling woman whose illegitimate daughter was given up at birth. She helps Rae, though her tea-leaf reading turns up the image of a dead baby. The dead child, however, turns out to be Lila's daughter, and Lila has to choose between isolating herself with the ("actual") ghost of her dead child, or giving it up and accepting her childless life with her supportive husband—who had a dangerous reputation when she met him. (In all Hoffman's novels women are the real movers, the instigators. The men run in circles raising dust, but accomplish little.) Lila chooses the living. Rae does not cut herself off completely from Jessup, and their relationship is left an open question at the novel's end.

Turtle Moon again invokes the theme of magic and mysticism, this time in a community of divorcees, Verity, Florida, a place where sea turtles migrate during the month of May. When the sea turtles mistake "the glow of streetlights for the moon, people go a little bit crazy;" marriages crumble and affairs begin. The story of Verity is the story of Lucy Rosen and her twelve-year-old son Keith, who find out just how bad life can be when the turtles migrate. A woman in Lucy's apartment building, also a runaway wife from New York, is murdered and Lucy's son rescues the victim's baby daughter and runs off, making him suspect in the murder. When Verity native Julian Cash investigates the murder and the missing children, he becomes romantically involved with Lucy, and another of Hoffman's female protagonists is drawn to a reckless man.

In Second Nature, there's a primal blend of the mysterious and the commonplace as compelling as the moon-besotted turtles found in Turtle Moon. Stephen and Robin are a modern-day Beauty and the Beast; Stephen, now an attractive man, was a feral child raised by wolves and Robin the woman who falls under his spell. It is when Robin tries to hide Stephen away in the small island community where she lives that the love story unfolds. By the end of the story the astute reader has taken Hoffman's foreshadowing as the inevitable ending of a good fairy tale, and the magic has worked again.

In Hoffman's eleventh novel, Practical Magic, another tale of love, the magic is not so much practical as predictable. As in earlier novels, Hoffman's older generation of characters are seers. Sally and Gillian are two orphaned sisters who live with their two aunts, women who grow strange herbs to make their magical brews and who are visited by lovesick women seeking their love potions and charms. Shunned by superstitious classmates, Sally and Gillian finally flee the small New England town in an attempt to flee the mysteries of love, which is always one step behind them. They cannot escape the magic of love and of life, even when it takes a malevolent form. Unlike earlier Hoffman stories, by the end of the story the overwhelming dose of magic becomes as hard to swallow as the aunts' mysterious love potions.

Hoffman seems content to rework her favored themes and ideas again and again, but usually manages to keep them fresh. Of the several tellings of the Hoffman story, Fortune's Daughter is surely the finest, with The Drowning Season not far behind. In attempting to keep her ideas always fresh, Hoffman's strengths at times seem to verge on self parody, seen occasionally in At Risk and Seventh Heaven.

-William C. Bamberger, updated by Sandra Ray

HOGAN, Desmond

Nationality: Irish. Born: Ballinasloe, County Galway, 10 December 1950. Education: Garbally College, Ballinasloe, 1964–69; University College, Dublin, 1969–73, B.A. in English and philosophy 1972, M.A. 1973. Career: Writer and actor with Children's T. Company theatre group, Dublin, 1975–77; moved to London, 1977: teacher, 1978–79; writer-in-residence, University of Glasgow, 1989. Awards: Hennessy award, 1971; Irish Arts Council grant, 1977; Rooney prize (USA), 1977; Rhys Memorial prize, 1980; Irish Post award, 1985. Agent: Rogers Coleridge and White Ltd., 20 Powis Mews, London W11 1JN, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Ikon Maker. Dublin, Co-op, 1976; London, Writers and Readers, and New York, Braziller, 1979.

The Leaves on Grey. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Braziller, 1980.

A Curious Street. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Braziller, 1984.

A New Shirt. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1986.

The Edge of the City. London, Faber, 1993; Boston, Faber, 1994. A Farewell to Prague. London and Boston, Faber, 1995.

Short Stories

The Diamonds at the Bottom of the Sea and Other Stories. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1979.

Children of Lir: Stories from Ireland. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Braziller, 1981.

Stories. London, Pan, 1982.

The Mourning Thief and Other Stories. London, Faber, 1987; as A Link with the River. New York, Farrar Straus, 1989.

Plays

A Short Walk to the Sea (produced Dublin, 1975). Dublin, Co-op, 1979.

Sanctified Distances (produced Dublin, 1976).

The Ikon Maker, adaptation of his own novel (produced Bracknell, Berkshire, 1980).

Radio Plays: Jimmy, 1978 (UK).

Television Plays: The Mourning Thief, 1984 (UK).

* * *

The writings of Desmond Hogan testify to the strength of the creative impulse, and the fragility of those who carry it within them. In his novels and stories he depicts the struggles of isolated individuals to assert and define themselves in the face of social pressures. The tragedies he explores—whether set in rural Ireland or urban Britain—present a vision of human frailty, with characters unable to withstand the force of their own destructive passions and the smothering proprieties of the world. They are rendered vulnerable to attack by their fellows, succumbing to a collective psychological violence whose inevitable outcome is madness and suicide. The mental hospital and the dark depths of the river are images that recur constantly in Hogan's fiction. Equally common to his work are other images, the ikon objects used by his characters to give meaning to their lives.

The Ikon Maker, Hogan's first novel, describes the close, obsessional relationship between a mother and son in a remote part of Galway. Charting its growth from the boy's childhood, through the trauma of a friend's early death, and later through his travels among hippies, homosexuals, and IRA activists in England, Hogan portrays compellingly the son's desire for freedom and the fierce, all-consuming need of the mother who pursues him in a doomed effort to reestablish the original bond between them. Building up his narrative from a pattern of terse, fragmented sentences, the author draws the threads of plot neatly together, his style at once jagged and poetic. Diarmaid, the quiet, self-contained youth creating his own inner world through "ikons" of collage, and the mother struggling to suppress her rampant life-force, are both memorable. Here too, as elsewhere in his works, Hogan reveals the bleak, stultifying nature of life in rural Ireland, and its gradual change under the impact of the modern world with its television and terrorism.

The Leaves on Grey has as its central point the friendship ripening into love, of three privileged youngsters in 1950s Dublin. Growing up in a world where the ideals of the Easter Rising have already been betrayed, forming an elite distinct from their fellows, the three friends see themselves as being chosen for a noble destiny, prospective arbiters of their country's regeneration. Liam the mystic intellectual, Sarah with her religiously charged sexuality, and the narrator Sean together experience the varieties of love and loss, pursuing in their different ways the search for fulfillment. The suicide of Liam's mother, a beautiful Russian émigré, binds them closer, and shadows the course of their future lives. Hogan evokes with subtlety the characters and their shifting perceptions, and once more employs his "splintered" technique of short, sharp sentences to good effect. He also uses a device not unlike Joyce's epiphany, fixing on moments of revelation and insight which bridge chronological time and emphasize the continuity of human experience. (This device, as well as the fragmented style, is used later in the more ambitious A Curious Street). The Leaves on Grey contains the symbol which most appropriately sums up the nature of Hogan's art: the stained glass window, here the last act of creation by a dying artist, in which broken shards are fitted together and transformed by light into a vision of beauty, perfectly encapsulates the method—and the achievement—of this writer.

A Curious Street is arguably the most impressive of Hogan's novels. Taking as its beginning the suicide of Alan Mulvanney, a teacher and unpublished writer, in Athlone in 1977, the story is presented in the form of a memoir by its half-English narrator, son of the woman with whom Mulvanney enjoyed a brief, frustrating affair. Scanning these two lives and the lives of those closest to them, the narrative glides freely in and out of time, going back to explore previous generations, returning to touch on an intense threefold friendship involving the narrator himself. The novel appears to expand outward, branching through families and friends, delving by way of Mulvanney's unpublished writings into the traumas of the past—the Cromwellian invasion, the devastating famine of the 1840s, the 1916 revolution. Hogan's treatment of his subject is nothing less than inspired. As ever, he constructs from broken splinters of sentences, adroitly marshalling his devices-potted "biographies" of his numerous characters, spreading outward from the novel's core, dream-vision passages from history and legend that still strike echoes in the modern Irish consciousness, the transcendent moment linking the experience of successive generations. A Curious Street probes at the purity and the loss of innocence, the brutal violence that lurks in family relationships, the destructive power of creativity. Images of the quest, of constant journeyings in search of peace through a wartorn land, and of the ever-present threat of death and madness haunt the pages. Recent writings yield fresh explorations of those themes central to the author's fiction, touching once more on vulnerability, alienation and exile, the struggle for self-assertion in the face of tribal disapproval. The Mourning Thief and Other Stories is perhaps the most accessible, childhood memories resurfacing in the flawed hero-figures of "Teddyboys" and "The Man from Korea." "Afternoon" gives a moving account of an ancient tinker queen's adventures, while the title story examines the conflict between a young pacifist and his dying father, a former I.R.A. activist now troubled by the bombings in the North. The stories of Lebanon Lodge provide further variations on the theme—the Irish-Jewish actor of the titlestory recalling the birth and death of love from exile in England, the murderous response of a rural village to illicit love in "The Players," the fraught marriage of a Catholic beauty queen and her violent clergyman husband in "The Vicar's Wife." By turns gentle and savage, Hogan's vision challenges with undeniable conviction.

A Farewell to Prague shows the author at his least accessible and most complex. The novel follows its narrator, Des, in his wanderings through Europe and the United States, his dream-visions and reminiscences. Des recounts his bisexual love affairs, his bond with the unattainable Eleanor and the doomed Marek, who later dies of AIDS. Nightmare memories pervade the text, of World War II concentration camps and racial hatred, a scenario viewed as beginning again in wartorn Croatia. As always, Hogan builds his work from disparate visual images, bringing alive the wastelands and high-rise blocks of Prague, the desolation of rural Ireland, the dirt roads of Georgia. At the heart of his narrative is the quest for love, the fight to maintain the self against the tribal will. His distrust of the herd and its values is given perhaps its most ferocious expression to date: "Community leads to fascism, the swastikas in the churches, the lilies of the valley under Hitler." His positive images are of artistic creation, the familiar talismans of the stained glass window, the ancient Russian religious ikons. In these later works, as in all his writings, Hogan assembles the shards of experience to produce a literary ikon of his own, light shining through a sequence of moments seized from the passage of time.

—Geoff Sadler

HOLLINGHURST, Alan

Nationality: British. Born: Stroud, Gloucestershire, 26 May 1954. Education: Magdalen College, Oxford, B.A. in English 1975, M.Litt. 1979. Career: Lecturer of English, Magdalen College, 1977–78; Somerville College, 1979–80, and Corpus Christi College, 1981, all Oxford University, and University of London, 1982; assistant editor, 1982–90, and since 1990 poetry editor, Times Literary Supplement, London, 1982–90. Address: c/o Times Literary Supplement, Priory House, St. John's Lane, London EC1M 4BX, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novel

The Swimming-Pool Library. London, Chatto and Windus, 1988; New York, Vintage, 1989.

The Folding Star. London, Chatto and Windus, and New York, Pantheon, 1994.

The Spell. London, Chatto & Windus, 1998; New York, Viking, 1999.

Poetry

Confidential Chats with Boys. Oxford, Sycamore Press, 1982.

Other

Editor, with A. S. Byatt, New Writing 4. London, Vintage, 1995. Translator, Bajazet, by Jean Racine. London, Chatto and Windus, 1991.

* * *

With the publication of The Swimming-Pool Library in 1988, British writer Alan Hollinghurst emerged as one of the most articulate voices in the expanding field of contemporary gay fiction. The success of Hollinghurst's novel arose from its erotically charged depiction of contemporary gay life in London, as well as from its attempt to articulate that ever-elusive "gay sensibility" that so many gay writers claim to understand but can never, it seems, adequately describe.

Stylistically and thematically, Hollinghurst places his novel within a richly intertextual framework of other gay texts, characters, events, and literary traditions. The novel is peopled with various gay historical characters, such as E.M. Forster and Ronald Firbank, and it draws eclectically upon various alternative forms of expression that have historically served the clandestine needs of the gay community, such as camp, pink prose, and classical mythology. Throughout The Swimming-Pool Library echoes of other homosexual writers can be heard. These include, for example, the Genet-like encounter with a gang of skinheads, or the Firbank-like thematics found in the novel's racist commodification of the black male body. The novel's proliferation of witty aphorisms and anecdotes reminds one of Wilde, while its meditative moments and search for sexual identity are reminiscent of Proust.

The novel's narrative revolves around two historically separate, yet thematically comparable, events that expose the continuity and insidiousness of oppression used by British authorities against homosexuals throughout the last two centuries. When, for example, the novel's modern-day protagonist is naively told that sexual oppression is no longer an issue and that it belongs to another time, to "another world," he responds with what is surely the most important utterance of the novel: "it isn't another world ... it's going on in London almost every day." Oppression and bigotry, as Hollinghurst's novel reveals, continued as frequently in Thatcher's Britain as they did during any other place or time.

The central narrative takes place in London during the summer of 1983, "the last summer of its kind," and describes, with tragicomic flourish, the amorous adventures of 25-year-old Will Beckwith, whose primary concern, he writes, is "making passes at anything in trousers." Hollinghurst's Will Beckwith, like White's unnamed narrator and Andrew Holleran's Malone, is one of the most memorable characters of recent gay fiction. That summer, Will writers, "I was riding high on sex and self-esteem—it was my time, my belle époque." Egotistical and unreflective, Will lives a privileged life of luxury, supported by his wealthy grandfather. During the course of the summer, Will meets an elderly and eccentric homosexual, Lord Charles Nantwich, and their unlikely alliance forms the cornerstone of the novel's detective-like narrative. Will is commissioned by the older man to write his biography because, as a character tells Will, "he thinks you will understand." In the process of reading through Charles's journal entries Will discovers that in 1954 his own grandfather, as the former Director of Public Prosecutions, was responsible for entrapping and imprisoning Charles, along with many other homosexual men, for the sin of "male vice." When a similar event happens to James, Will's best friend, he is outraged and takes action to prevent history from cruelly repeating itself: "I decided that if necessary, and if it might save James, I would testify in court ... and so perhaps do something, though distant and symbolic, for Charles, and for Lord B's other victims." In this act of defiance against his own grandfather, and, in turn, against the whole legal system which suppresses homosexual expression, Will puts aside his over-developed ego for the first time and becomes aware of his communal identity with other homosexuals. These "experiences," declares Will, "gave me an urge to solidarity with my kind." The suffering of Charles and James ultimately serves as a catalyst for Will's own developing sense of responsibility and underscores the central theme of Hollinghurst's novel: the journey toward liberation can only begin when one acknowledges a political responsibility to a community under siege.

Although A Swimming-Pool Library brilliantly achieved what the author intended, it can never be granted the status of a "classic" in general fiction. To achieve that universality, such a novel would have to embody a world where gay and heterosexual characters, including women, are integrated equally. Sexual description would have to be balanced against the rather obvious, deliberate purpose of much of A Swimming-Pool Library, and also his next novel, A Folding Star, where one feels that Hollinghurst is aware of the market demands of readers whose main concern is the enjoyment of gay erotic description. A Swimming-Pool Library partly delineated a gay world where frequency of sex on demand was easily achieved and nearly all the sexual partners were unrealistically physically perfect—it was amongst the last fiction of its kind that could do so. Since the advent of AIDS, the moral responsibility in writing of safe sex became obligatory, something Hollinghurst is conscious of in A Folding Star.

A Folding Star, with its exceptionally clear prose, is more impressive than Hollinghurst's first novel, for the charmed world of the 1980s is replaced by a broader range of personalities as well as more introspection. Hollinghurst also gives a welcome unblinkered handling of his main character, Edward Manners: gay, physically unattractive in his early thirties, and fond of a drink. The unrelenting ugliness of the Belgium town where Manners has arrived to teach English to two boys corresponds to Manners' hopeless and obsessional love for one of his pupils, the attractive and seventeen-year-old Luc Altidore. Hollinghurst's vivid account of the semi-underworld of gay life, represented here by a bar called "The Casette" and its inhabitants, is far less self-conscious than that of A Swimming-Pool Library, with more engaging and likeable characters. He also makes Manners a rounded portrait by relating flashbacks of his childhood experiences, often with comic humour and a strong awareness of the ridiculous. The circumstances of Edward Manners' love force him into repeated self-examination, as he knows he cannot yet escape the grip of this temporary insanity. He does have sex with Luc, an experience that has physical satisfaction but ridicules any hopes of love. The theme of loyalty and betrayal, traitors and victims, connects the main topic with the sub-plots. Although A Folding Star makes a significant contribution towards lifting gay fiction out of a narrow gay ghetto, it is not quite broad enough to escape limitations of the label of "genre writing."

—Thomas Hastings, updated by Geoffrey Elborn

HOOD, Hugh

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Hugh John Blagdon Hood in Toronto, Ontario, 30 April 1928. Education: De La Salle College, Toronto; St. Michael's College, University of Toronto, 1947–55, B.A. 1950, M.A. 1952, Ph.D. 1955. Family: Married Ruth Noreen Mallory in 1957; two sons and two daughters. Career: Teaching fellow, University of Toronto, 1951–55; associate professor, St. Joseph College, West Hartford, Connecticut, 1955–61; professor titulaire, Department of English Studies, University of Montreal, 1961–95. Awards: University of Western Ontario President's medal, for story, 1963, for article, 1968; Women's Canadian Club of Toronto Literary award, 1963; Beta Sigma Phi prize, 1965; Canada Council grant, 1968, award, 1971, 1974, and Senior Arts grant, 1977; Province of Ontario award, 1974; City of Toronto award, 1976; Queen's Jubliee medal, 1977; QSPELL award, 1988; 125th anniversary of Canadian Confederation medal, 1992; University of Montreal medal for distinguished service, 1995. Officer, Order of Canada, 1988. Address: 4242 Hampton Avenue, Montreal, Quebec H4A 2K9, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

White Figure, White Ground. Toronto, Ryerson Press, and New York, Dutton, 1964.

The Camera Always Lies. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1967.

A Game of Touch. Don Mills, Ontario, Longman, 1970.

You Can't Get There from Here. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1972; New York, Beaufort, 1984.

Great Realizations. Concord, Ontario, Anansi Press, 1997; Buffalo, New York, General Distribution Services, 1997.

The New Age/Le nouveau siècle:

The Swing in the Garden. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1975.

A New Athens. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1977.

Reservoir Ravine. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1979.

Black and White Keys. Downsview, Ontario, ECW Press, 1982.

The Scenic Art. Toronto, Stoddart, 1984.

The Motor Boys in Ottawa. Toronto, Stoddart, 1986.

Tony's Book. Toronto, Stoddart, 1988.

Property and Value. Toronto, Anansi, 1990.

Be Sure to Close Your Eyes. Toronto, Anansi, 1993.

Dead Men's Watches. Toronto, Anansi, 1995.

Five New Facts about Giorgione (novella). Windsor, Ontario, Black Moss Press, 1987.

Short Stories

Flying a Red Kite. Toronto, Ryerson Press, 1962.

Around the Mountain: Scenes from Montreal Life (sketches). Toronto, Peter Martin, 1967.

The Fruit Man, the Meat Man, and the Manager. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1971.

Dark Glasses. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1976.

Selected Stories. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1978.

None Genuine Without This Signature. Downsview, Ontario, ECW Press, 1980.

August Nights. Toronto, Stoddart, 1985.

A Short Walk in the Rain. Erin, Ontario, Porcupine's Quill, 1989. The Isolation Booth. Erin, Ontario, Porcupine's Quill, 1991.

You'll Catch Your Death. Erin, Ontario, Porcupine's Quill, 1992.

Plays

Friends and Relations, in The Play's the Thing: Four Original Television Dramas, edited by Tony Gifford. Toronto, Macmillan, 1976.

Other

Strength Down Centre: The Jean Béliveau Story. Toronto, Prentice Hall. 1970.

The Governor's Bridge Is Closed: Twelve Essays on the Canadian Scene. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1973.

Scoring: The Art of Hockey, illustrated by Seymour Segal. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1979.

Trusting the Tale (essays). Downsview, Ontario, ECW Press, 1983.
 Unsupported Assertions (essays). Concord, Ontario, Anansi, 1991.
 Editor, with Peter O'Brien, Fatal Recurrences: New Fiction in English from Montréal. Montreal, Véhicule Press, 1984.

*

Bibliographies: "A Bibliography of Works by and on Hugh Hood," in Before the Flood: Our Examination round His Factification for Incamination of Hugh Hood's Work in Progress, edited by J.R. (Tim) Struthers, Downsview, Ontario, ECW Press, 1979, and "Hugh Hood: An Annotated Bibliography" also by Struthers, in The Annotated Bibliography of Canada's Major Authors: Volume Five, edited by Robert Lecker and Jack David, Downsview, Ontario, ECW Press, 1984; "Hood, Hugh (1928-)" by Allan Weiss, in his A Comprehensive Bibliography of English-Canadian Short Stories, 1950–1983, Toronto, ECW Press, 1988.

Manuscript Collections: The University of Calgary Libraries, Alberta.

Critical Studies: "Grace: The Novels of Hugh Hood" by Dennis Duffy, in Canadian Literature 47, 1971; "An Interview with Hugh Hood," in World Literature Written in English, (11)1, 1972, and "An Interview with Hugh Hood," in Le Chien d'or/The Golden Dog, 3, 1974, both by Victoria G. Hale; "An Interview with Hugh Hood," in Journal of Canadian Fiction (2)1, 1973, and "Space, Time and the Creative Imagination" in Journal of Canadian Fiction, 3(1), 1974, both by Pierre Cloutier; "Hugh Hood and His Expanding Universe," in Journal of Canadian Fiction, 3(1), 1974, and "Formal Coherence in the Art of Hugh Hood" in Studies in Canadian Literature, 2, 1977, both by Kent Thompson; "An Interview with Hugh Hood" by Robert Fulford, in The Tamarack Review, 66, 1975; "Near Proust and Yonge: That's Where Hugh Hood Grew Up and Why He's Making a 12-Novel Bid for Immortality" by Linda Sandler, in Books in Canada, December 1975; The Comedians: Hugh Hood and Rudy Wiebe by Patricia A. Morley, Toronto, Clarke Irwin, 1977; "Hugh Hood and John Mills in Epistolary Conversation" by Hugh Hood and John Mills, in The Fiddlehead, 116, 1978; Before the Flood: Our Examination round His Factification for Incamination of Hugh Hood's Work in Progress, Downsview, Ontario, ECW Press, 1979, and The Montreal Story Tellers: Memoirs, Photographs, Critical Essays, Montreal, Véhicule Press, 1985, both edited by J.R. (Tim) Struthers; "Hugh Hood" in Profiles in Canadian Literature, edited by Jeffrey M. Heath, vol. 2, Toronto, Dundurn Press, 1980, and "A Secular Liturgy: Hugh Hood's Aesthetics and Around the Mountain," in Studies in Canadian Literature, 10, 1985, both by Struthers; "The Case for Hugh Hood," in An Independent Stance: Essays on English-Canadian Criticism and Fiction, Erin, Ontario, Porcupine's Quill, 1991, and "The Atmosphere of Deception: Hugh Hood's 'Going Out as a Ghost',' in Writers in Aspic, edited by John Metcalf, Montreal, Véhicule Press, 1988, and "Hugh Hood," in A Sense of Style: Studies in the Art of Fiction in English-Speaking Canada, Toronto, ECW Press, 1989, all by W.J. Keith; "Hugh Hood's Celebration of the Millenium's End" by Geoff Hancock, in Quill and Quire, November 1980; "Field of Vision: Hugh Hood and the Tradition of Wordsworth" by Anthony John Harding, in Canadian Literature, 94, 1982; "'Incarnational Art': Typology and Analogy in Hugh Hood's Fiction" by Barry Cameron, in The Fiddlehead, 133, 1982; On the Line: Readings in the Short Fiction of Clark Blaise, John Metcalf and Hugh Hood by Robert Lecker, Downsview, Ontario, ECW Press, 1982; "Tradition and Post-Colonialism: Hugh Hood and Martin Boyd" by Diana Brydon, in Mosaic: A Journal for the Interdisciplinary Study of Literature, 15(3), 1982; "Faith and Fiction: The Novels of Callaghan and Hood" by Barbara Helen Pell, in Journal of Canadian Studies, 18(2), 1983; Hugh Hood by Keith Garebian, Boston, Twayne, 1983; "Hugh Hood's Edenic Garden: Psychoanalysis Among the Flowerbeds' by Patrick J. Mahony with a reply by Hugh Hood, in Canadian Literature, 96, 1983; Hugh Hood and His Works, Toronto, ECW Press, 1985, and "Onward to the New Age," in Books in Canada October 1990, both by Keith Garebian; Pilgrim's Progress: A Study of the Short Stories of Hugh Hood by Susan Copoloff-Mechanic, Toronto, ECW Press, 1988; "On the Trail of Hugh Hood: History and the Holocaust in Black and White Keys" by Dave Little, in Essays on Canadian Writing, 44, 1991; "Changing Metropolis and Urbs Eterna: Hugh Hood's 'The Village Inside''' by Simone Vauthier, in her Reverberations: Explorations in the Canadian Short Story, Concord, Ontario, House of Anansi Press, 1993; Canadian Classics: An Anthology of Short Stories, Toronto, McGraw-Hill Ryerson, 1993, and How Stories Mean, Erin, Ontario, Porcupine's Quill, 1993, both edited by John Metcalf and J.R. (Tim) Struthers; "A Scriptible Text" by John Mills, in Essays on Canadian Writing 50, 1993; "The History of Art and the Art of History: Hugh Hood's Five New Facts About Giorgione" by Alex Knoenagel, in Mosaic: 27(1), 1994; The Influence of Painting on Five Canadian Writers: Alice Munro, Hugh Hood, Timothy Findley, Margaret Atwood, and Michael Ondaatje by John Cooke, Lewiston, New York, Edwin Mellen Press, 1996.

Hugh Hood comments:

(1971) My interest in the sound of sentences, in the use of colour words and the names of places, in practical stylistics, showed me that prose fiction might have an abstract element, a purely formal element, even though it continued to be strictly, morally realistic. It might be possible to think of prose fiction the way one thinks of abstract elements in representational painting, or of highly formal music.... It's the seeing-into-things, the capacity for meditative abstraction, that interests me about philosophy, the arts and religious practice. I love most in painting an art that exhibits the transcendental element dwelling in living things. I think of this as true super-realism. And I think of Vermeer, or among American artists of Edward Hopper, whose paintings of ordinary places, seaside cottages, a roadside snack bar and gasoline station, have touched some level of my own imagination which I can only express in fictional images... . Like Vermeer or Hopper or that great creator of musical form, Joseph Haydn, I'm trying to concentrate on knowable form as it lives in the physical world. These forms are abstract, not in the sense of being inhumanly non-physical but in the sense of communicating the perfection of the essences of things—the formal realities that create things as they are in themselves. A transcendentalist must first study the things of this world, and get as far inside them as possible.... That is where I come out: the spirit is totally in the flesh. If you pay close enough attention to things, stare at them, concentrate on them as hard as you can, not just with your intelligence, but with your feelings and instincts, you will begin to apprehend the forms in them.... The illuminations in things are there, really and truly there, in those things. They are not run over then by the projective intelligence, and yet there is a sense in which the mind, in uniting itself to things, creates illumination in them.... The poetry of Wordsworth supplies us again and again with examples of this imaginative colouring spread over incidents and situations from everyday life.... Like Wordsworth, I have at all times endeavoured to look steadily at my subjects. I hope my gaze has helped to light them up.

(1978) I am trying to assimilate the mode of the novel to the mode of fully-developed Christian allegory, in ways that I don't fully understand. I want to be more "real" than the realists, yet more transcendent than the most vaporous allegorist. In short, I am following what I conceive the method of Dante.... Now let me put it to you that since I am both a realist and a transcendentalist allegorist that I cannot be bound by the forms of ordinary realism.

(1979) I think it would be marvellous for Canada if we had one artist who could move easily and in a familiar converse with Joyce, and Tolstoy, and Proust; and I intend to be that artist if I possibly can; and I am willing to give the rest of my life to it. I don't say that to put down Margaret Atwood or to make Margaret Laurence seem insignificant. That isn't my point at all. I want simply—and I think every artist does—to do what I think I can do as fully, and as powerfully, and as many-modally, and as exhaustively, as I can... . I really want to endow the country with a great imperishable work of art. If I do, it will be the first one that we have. I think it would make an enormous difference to the confidence of this country if we did have one thing like the plays of Shakespeare or War and Peace or A la recherche du temps perdu, and we knew it, and were sure of it. Jalna, ha, ha, won't do. It isn't good enough. I think that The New Age and the works of mine which go with it and around it will be good enough, and I think it will do a lot for the country.

(1995) I am now, February 1995, at work on the eleventh volume (of twelve) in the novel sequence The New Age/Le nouveau siècle, which I've been working on since I began to make notes for the project in late 1966. The first volume actually appeared, as The Swing in the Garden, in 1975, and the final book in the series is scheduled for publication at the end of 1999 when the "new age" will really be directly in front of us as new century and new millenium. At this moment I can feel myself beginning to wonder how it will feel to write the closing page. Now I can suspect what Gibbon, Proust, and Joyce of Finnegans Wake (seventeen years in the making) must have gone through towards the end, an end that Proust unfortunately never saw. Temptations and distractions of a long work!

* * *

Hugh Hood is a writer in whom pedantry wars with creative gifts of a high order. His best work so far occurs in his short stories which demonstrate his mastery at revealing what is immense through what is small. He is an indefatigable explorer of human aspiration, conveying much of its mystery, heroism, and comedy. An impassioned drive towards some symbolic victory is celebrated seriously or gaily in such stories as "Silver Bugles, Cymbals, Golden Silks" (Flying a Red Kite), "The Pitcher" (Dark Glasses), and "Le Grand Déménagement" (Around the Mountain). His art is at its finest in "Looking Down from Above" (Around the Mountain), where separate characters connect in a visionary moment of great beauty, crowded like a medieval tapestry with life: "inscrutable but undeniable."

Hood's earlier novels have something of this imaginative intensity, as in the burning warehouse scene (A Game of Touch), an incident pivotal to the hero's fate and a keystone in the novel's structure. However, Hood is unable to control the tone of his prose over the long course of a novel. When the painter in White Figure, White Ground retreats to the safety of his old manner and family life, Hood's point of view is unclear. Although the hard urbanity and narrow sympathies of the wife offend, it is uncertain whether the artist's glorification of her is to be received with irony or approval. In The Camera Always Lies, a romance, Hood's continuing problem with creating likeable characters re-emerges. A romance requires archetypal figures on whom fantasies can be projected: yet "virtuous" Rose Leclair, suffering through near-death and rebirth, is a bore, the hero who saves her an overbearing prig. Precise detail of film financing, production, and costume design merely throws into relief Hood's difficulty with his characters. You Can't Get There from Here, set in an imaginary African nation, is both a study of struggle in a new society and "Christological [except] ... that the Christ figure does not rise again...." Because he is writing satire and allegory, Hood must be excused for missing opportunities of further defining the two tribes, and of describing the personal history of his sketchy hero; but his Cabinet villains need sharper outlines to succeed either as allegory or satire.

When Hood attempts in The New Age, a serial novel in twelve volumes of which eight have been completed, to work on the scale of "Coleridge, Joyce, Tolstoy, and Proust," his inadequacies become obvious. He is striving for "a very wide range of reference without apparent connection on the surface which nonetheless will yield connections and networks and links and unities if you wait and allow them to appear." Moving back and forth through time, the huge project includes passages of philosophy, social history, topography, and lectures on a broad variety of topics, as well as the fictionalized incidents of his own life.

As a simultaneous "realist and transcendental allegorist" (his admitted aim), Hood falls short in these novels, for although characters and events have a formal importance, they rarely achieve emotive significance. The marriage in A New Athens, for instance, is never felt as the redemptive force intended, because Edie is no more than a shadow, and Matt Goderich remains, as one character observes, "a pompous ass." Too often Hood offers neither psychological nor pictorial realism, but the factuality of an encyclopedia or a catalogue. Obsessive lists of, for example, baseball players (The Swing in the Garden) suggest an inability to select. Local history and neighborhood cartography too often supply the substance rather than the raw material of these fictions. Pedantic tenacity in description cannot of itself invest places or objects with meaning, nor is Hood's style sufficiently adept, usually, to produce this result by its own power. He even slips into bathos with the showpiece engagement scenes in A New Athens and Reservoir Ravine. His uninspired prose has created a bland, provincial world where values do not develop organically, but are imposed from without. Only when he writes of marvels does the reader's interest freshen, as with the appearance of the visionary painter (A New Athens). Striving to write a masterpiece, Hood is so concerned with large patterns and themes that he fails to breathe life into the material of which these patterns are composed. Heterogeneity can succeed only for the writer gifted enough to consume disparate materials in the unifying fire of his art; but, with one third of the sequence still to come, Hood may yet produce work on a level comparable to that of the short stories.

Of course critical assessments may vary strikingly from one person to another; indeed, judgments frequently say as much about readers' assumptions as they do about writers' achievements. Perhaps genius needs to create—that is, to educate—its own audience, an audience that appreciates and quite possibly revels in the idiosyncrasies that some readers find disconcerting. A number of volumes so far in Hood's sequence, including The Swing in the Garden, A New Athens, Black and White Keys, Property and Value, and Dead Men's Watches, have been received with considerable enthusiasm by individual reviewers and critics. With time—and with the altered understanding that further attention, different assumptions, and a broader perspective can bring—The New Age may win the distinguished audience that its advocates believe it deserves. With the completion of the last two of twelve volumes as we reach a new millenium, the overall design and the inner workings of the sequence will certainly become clearer. Perhaps then The New Age will stand as Hood envisioned it twenty-five years earlier: "I hope it will be an enormous image, an enormous social mythology, an enormous prism to rotate, to see yourself and your neighbors and friends and your grandparents."

-Margaret Keith, updated by J.R. (Tim) Struthers

HOPE, Christopher

Nationality: South African. Born: Christopher David Tully Hope in Johannesburg, 26 February 1944; moved to Europe in 1975. Education: Christian Brothers College, Pretoria, 1952-60; University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, 1963-65, B.A. 1965, M.A. in English 1970; University of Natal, Durban, 1968-69, B.A. (honours) 1969. Military Service: Served in the South African Navy, 1962. Family: Married Eleanor Marilyn Klein in 1967; two sons. Career: English teacher, Halesowen Secondary Modern School, 1972; editor, Bolt, Durban, 1972–73; writer-in-residence, Gordonstoun School, Elgin, Morayshire, 1978. Lives in London. Awards: English Academy of Southern Africa Pringle award, 1974; Cholmondeley award, for poetry, 1978; David Higham prize, 1981; Natal University Petrie Arts award, 1981; Silver Pen award, 1982; Arts Council bursary, 1982; Whitbread award, 1985; CNA award, 1989. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature. Agent: Deborah Rogers, Rogers Coleridge and White Ltd., 20 Powis Mews, London W11 1JN, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Separate Development. Johannesburg, Ravan Press, 1980; London, Routledge, and New York, Scribner, 1981.

Kruger's Alp. London, Heinemann, 1984; New York, Viking, 1985.The Hottentot Room. London, Heinemann, 1986; New York, Farrar Straus, 1987.

My Chocolate Redeemer. London, Heinemann, 1989.

Serenity House. London, Macmillan, 1992.

Darkest England. New York, W.W. Norton, 1996.

Me, the Moon, and Elvis Presley. London, Macmillan, 1997.

Short Stories

Private Parts and Other Tales. Johannesburg, Bateleur Press, 1981; London, Routledge, 1982; as Learning to Fly, London, Minerva, 1990.

Black Swan (novella). London, Hutchinson, and New York, Harper, 1987.

The Love Songs of Nathan J. Swirsky. London, Macmillan, 1993.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Carnation Butterfly," in London Magazine, April-May 1985.
"Strydom's Leper," in Colours of a New Day: Writing for South**Africa edited by Sarah Lefany and Stephen Hayward, London

Africa, edited by Sarah Lefanu and Stephen Hayward. London, Lawrence and Wishart, and New York, Pantheon, 1990.

Plays

Radio Plays: Box on the Ear, 1987; Better Halves, 1988.

Television Plays: Ducktails, 1976; Bye-Bye Booysens, 1979; An Entirely New Concept in Packaging, 1983.

Poetry

Whitewashes, with Mike Kirkwood. Privately printed, 1971.
Cape Drives. London, London Magazine Editions, 1974.
In the Country of the Black Pig and Other Poems. Johannesburg, Ravan Press, and London, London Magazine Editions, 1981.
Englishmen. London, Heinemann, 1985.

Other

The King, the Cat, and the Fiddle (for children), with Yehudi Menuhin. Tonbridge, Kent, Benn, and New York, Holt Rinehart, 1983

The Dragon Wore Pink (for children). London, A. and C. Black, and New York, Atheneum, 1985.

White Boy Running: A Book about South Africa. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Farrar Straus, 1988.

Moscow! Moscow! London, Heinemann, 1990.

Signs of the Heart, London, Picador, 2000.

Editor, Life Class: Thoughts, Exercises, Reflections of an Itinerant Violinist, by Yehudi Menuhin. London, Heinemann, 1986.

*

Christopher Hope comments:

Writing has always seemed to me to be a rather mischievous occupation. I write not to change the world but to undermine it, since the models on offer seem pretty dull most of the time. Much of life is odd and disorganized. Many people who pretend to be sure about things are either ingenuous or wicked. They are also often charlatans. One wants to record their utterances as a warning to others.

I was lucky enough to grow up in South Africa, a place where the lethal folly of what everyone assured me was "normal" life outstripped even the most audacious imaginations. For a writer, this was wonderful training. It taught me about the sheer inventiveness of life. And it gave me a subject—the triumph of power and the terminal comedy provided by those who wield it.

* * *

Christopher Hope is a leading example of an important new group of white South African writers who have broken free of the traditional mold of liberal realism in South African fiction. These writers have cast off the predictable and often sterile tones of superior intellectual humanism or impassioned but helpless outrage against apartheid. Seen against the seriousness and moral sanctimony of the liberal idiom, Hope's writing is positively liberating. His vision is black, wicked, and surreal, and his satire and humor have a measure of viciousness that seems peculiarly appropriate to South Africa. In the case of two of his novels, A Separate Development, winner of the 1981 David Higham Prize for Fiction, and Kruger's Alp, winner of the 1985 Whitbread Prize for Fiction, one feels that here is a writer who has found a language of fiction that matches the system for ruthlessness, power, subtlety, and the ability to knock down targets.

Hope, who had been living in voluntary exile in London since 1976, recently moved to a remote village in rural France. Signs of the Heart is a non-fiction account of life in the village over the past few years of his residence there. It is populated with the types of characters his readers expect to find in his fiction. Two additional non-fiction works, White Boy Running, winner of the 1988 CNA Literary Award in South Africa, and Moscow! Moscow!, clarify his sentiments and political understandings about the new democratic South African government from his international perspective.

He also published several volumes of poetry and a collection of short stories, Private Parts. In the stories, as in the novels, Hope's unusual blend of familiar reality and bizarre, surreal inventiveness is apparent. Increasingly in his fiction, Hope has created a special space for himself halfway between the real and the bizarre while establishing newly capacious and flexible fictional conventions.

Like Herman Charles Bosman and Tom Sharpe before him, Hope demonstrates how endlessly funny South African life is when seen from a great and merciless distance. In A Separate Development the notions of mixed blood and miscegenation, so tragically dealt with by such South African heavyweights as Sarah Gertrude Millin and Alan Paton, become a mainspring for blackish and farce-filled comedy. The young first-person narrator, Harry Moto, thrives on irony and absurdity, having grown up as a white South African and then being forced to take refuge as a "black" denizen of Johannesburg. Moto scrambles the categories: his darkish skin and somewhat frizzy hair suggest certain irregularities in his ancestry, and through no fault of his own, he becomes a comic victim. In Harry, Hope achieves what has always remained impossible for South African writers in their more serious efforts, which is to combine or unify black and white experience. By discarding the heavy mantle of serious liberalism, Hope permits his character, Harry, who has grown up spending idle hours around swimming pools and ruminating about sex, to finally go "black."

Because of Harry's hue of skin, his sexual liaison with a wealthy white girl is humiliatingly close to sexual impropriety. Harry faces absolute disapproval from his parents, who see in him tangible evidence of their deep psychological fears about mixed blood. Harry disappears to become a black, working first as a runner for an Indian clothing merchant, and later as a "living proof" assistant to a man who sells skin-lightening creams to infinitely deluded blacks. He ends up as the invisible "boy" collecting trays from cars at a roadhouse, and finally as a detainee writing his story to stay alive.

If A Separate Development is an unusually deft first novel, then Kruger's Alp is a truly remarkable effort for a second novel. More "serious" in effect, the novel demonstrates literary artifice and fictional inventiveness of masterful proportions. Hope combines modern political mystery with historical myth, revelatory allegorical structure with acid-strength satire. This amalgam is based on a wide vision of present and past South African experience, in which social and historical myth is reformulated and given new meaning. As in Bunyan's Puritan allegory, A Pilgrim's Progress, the story begins with a dream of revelation leading to a physical journey of discovery to a mythic destination. Hope's main protagonist, Blanchaille (whitebait), is obsessed with the notion of escaping acute anxiety due to being part of a "despised sub-group within a detested minority [waiting] for the long-expected wrath to fall on them and destroy them." Blanchaille's anxiety is fueled by the news that a former friend of his, a top fiscal official, has been murdered, apparently by his own government for political reasons.

As boys, Blanchaille and the murdered official, Tony Ferreira, both served under a prophesying and idiosyncratic Irish priest, Father Lynch. Lynch preaches the truth about a great hoard of gold gone missing. The president of the Transvaal republic during the Boer War, Paul Kruger, is reputed to have taken the gold away with him into exile in Switzerland. As interpreted in this novel, Kruger is supposed to have established a "shining city," like the "celestial city" in The Pilgrim's Progress, for white South Africans seeking an ultimate haven after lifetimes of trekking. Ferreira is killed because he uncovers massive irregular spending on huge projects to buy world opinion (the situation is closely modeled on the Information Scandal that rocked South Africa in the late 1970s). Blanchaille undertakes an allegorical journey of revelation to Kruger's "white location in the sky" in Switzerland, traveling even deeper into the heart of the mythic secrets of white South African existence.

In The Hottentot Room a group of South African exiles find a fellow sufferer in Frau Katie, a German Jew and refugee from Nazi Germany. Frau Katie presides over the Hottentot Room, a London club for South African expatriates. The novel's protagonist, Caleb Looper, is an expatriate who joins the club, but he is a spy for the South African regime, while the regulars of the club are enslaved to illusions about themselves and their former homeland. These illusions, as well as the secret of betrayal in their midst, all find a correlative, or mythical resonance, in Frau Katie's story. But there is self-deception at the heart of her sustaining myth, and a complementary self-deception in all the ''Hottentots'' who use her story for their own ends. The novel is an intricately patterned fable that says much about the condition of exile.

Hope's next work, Black Swan (a novella), exhibits his satirical and ironic skill at its pared-down best. The story of an idiosyncratic black township boy who wants to be a ballet dancer but is eventually executed exhibits Hope's ability to create fictions that reveal the victory of the cruel over the poignant in South African life.

My Chocolate Redeemer tells the story of a friendship between a French-English girl and the deposed head of a black African state. It is set in France and a fictional African country called Zanj, and relies heavily on principles borrowed from the New Physics about truth being a function of observation. It would appear as though Hope may be trying to move away from South Africa as subject matter, but My Chocolate Redeemer lacks Hope's usual ironic punch, and survives merely as an odd but forgettable novel by an excellent writer. It is followed by the redemptive Serenity House, which was shortlisted for the 1992 Booker Prize, about Old Max, the giant of Serenity House, North London's "Premier Eventide Refuge," who might have been left to die in peace. Old Max's son-in-law Albert, an MP with an interest in the new War Crimes Bill, has other ideas.

Darkest England deals with South African and British racism and hatred shortly after the South African democratization. The story begins with the narration of a UN observer during the first free election in South Africa; nevertheless, it presents the point of view of a Bushman tribe. The tribe challenges modern Britain to uphold a nineteenth-century promise to protect them from the Boer, consequently mounting an expedition in the 1990s to Britain. The bulk of the novel is therefore set in Britain and is written from the perspective of the bushman. After arriving in Britain, he passes through detention centers and immigration procedures. The bushman interprets the harsh treatment he receives as hospitality, even, ironically, as special consideration, because of his faith in the British promise of aid.

Me, the Moon and Elvis Presley begins during 1949 in Karoo, a remote village of Lutherburg. Old Aunt Betsy acquires a little servant girl at a bargain price of six bars of soap. Forty-five years later, when Lutherburg becomes Buckingham, its new deputy-mayor, Mimi de Bruyn, is disturbed by identity problems. In a typical Hope paradox about South Africa, the protagonist is plagued by the past as well as haunted by the future. Mimi suspects she was the lost child sold into semi-slavery, but no one will speak to her of the old days. Mimi also seeks proof that new Buckingham is an improvement over old Lutherburg, when Pascal Le Gros, dressed entirely in white, becomes her love interest. He is a dreamer, disgraced lawyer, and presents a stout lunar image representative of Elvis Presley. Elvis is an apt figurehead for the new Buckingham as the novel moves between past and present while humorously surmising the future.

Christopher Hope states that politically pivotal nations, such as South Africa, Poland, and Russia, have a nostalgia for the future while they overcome the haunting of the past. He is keen to observe how quickly the white populations have adapted to the new policies in South Africa, despite their deepest objections during that time of "racial lunacy." People in the outside world, he points out, approvingly pray that nothing disturbs the optimistic change of governments. He views the change in South Africa from Europe and quotes the French symbolist poet Paul Valéry to describe his forebodings about the future of South Africa's new democracy: "the future is not what it used to be." Those governments that don't change, like North Korea or Cuba, become quaint outposts of an outdated past and political system. Perhaps South Africa was the final cause for outrage by international liberalism, and Hope's sarcastic fictional commentaries may illustrate this "disturbing" state of world calm.

-Leon de Kock, updated by Hedwig Gorski

HORNBY, Nick

Nationality: English. Born: c. 1957. Agent: c/o Victor Gollancz Ltd., Villiers House, 41–47 Strand, London WC2N 5JE, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

High Fidelity. New York, Riverhead Books, 1995. About a Boy. New York, Riverhead Books, 1998.

Other

Contemporary American Fiction (essays). London, Vision Press and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1992.

Fever Pitch (memoir). London, Gollancz, 1992; New York, Penguin Books, 1994.

Editor, My Favourite Year: A Collection of New Football Writing. London, Gollancz/Witherby, 1993.

*

Film Adaptation: High Fidelity, 2000.

* * *

With just two novels and one memoir of his life as a soccer fan to his credit, Nick Hornby has become one of the defining voices of the past decade. He is a keenly observant recorder of, and self-deprecating commentator on, the changing nature of masculine identity in the late twentieth century. His men—whether the autobiographical Arsenal fan of Fever Pitch or the fictionalized protagonists of the no less punningly titled novels, High Fidelity and About a Boy—would have been minor cads in any earlier period, but in Hornby's narratives of 'the way we live now,' they strike a surprisingly sympathetic chord. Their plights, however self-created, make them seem strangely poignant and therefore more deserving of the reader's compassion than of his, or her, disdain.

Hornby's phenomenal success (all three books have been bestsellers and High Fidelity turned into a critically acclaimed and commercially successful film) derives in large measure from his being a generational writer—spokesman for the thirty-somethings, mainly but not exclusively English (the film version of High Fidelity is set in Chicago) and male (Hornby is suprisingly popular with female readers as well). In his work, the New Laddism so evident in British culture as something of a backlash against women's gains, appears, but in gentler form, at its most benign and self-examining: not the lowlifes of Irvine Welsh's fiction, but the male equivalent of the protagonist of Helen Fielding's similarly successful Bridget Jones' Diary. In seemingly effortless but hardly artless prose, as deliberately scaled back as his anti-heroes' psyches, Hornby examines his male characters' obsessions (soccer, popular music—often of a slightly dated kind—and being cool) as well as the double-bind in which they find themselves: on the one hand, wanting to belong, while on the other, fearing commitment of any kind to anyone. It is a fear that both stems from and contributes to a low-grade awareness of their own inadequacy, one that they further worry will be all too obvious to others, women in particular, and that helps account for lives of quiet desperation marked by stasis and drift. Although English to their nearly hollow core, his young men seem in many ways latter-day versions of those quintessentially American characters, Huck Finn, Holden Caulfield, and Sal Paradise, or a younger, hipper version of J. Alfred Prufrock.

Rob, High Fidelity's narrator-protagonist, is thirty-six and the owner of Championship Vinyl, a moribund, North London record shop he opened ten years earlier and that he now runs with the help of Dick and Barry, two lesser versions of himself. Rob's twin obsessions are Laura, the lawyer-lover who has recently left him, and the records that not only give voice to his own ideas about love and life but shape those ideas as well. One way Rob tries to shape his life is by making lists of everything from favorite songs to old girlfriends. However, because these lists are little more than a comic reflex, they provide no lasting relief from the constant fear of not being able to measure up, along with the complementary but more insidious fear of losing what little he has. Even as he deliberately cultivates the superficial life and a defensive, self-ironized stance in relation to it ("Is it so wrong to want to be at home with your record collection?"), he is nonetheless made somewhat bitter by feeling out of his depth. When Rob and Laura first meet, she works as a legal aide lawyer, poorly paid and dressed accordingly. By the time they split up, she is working for a City law firm, well paid and dressing the part. (It is a part she did not choose; in what passes for political consciousness in Hornby's novel, Laura is the victim of Tory economics, which cut funding for her earlier position and left her no choice but highly paid City work.) Feeling that he is alternately stuck in a groove and "falling off the edge," Rob fears both stasis and change, which are just what Hornby gives him when the emasculating lawyer is transformed into a sexy fairy godmother. Although Rob fears that he is nothing more than the music he collects, Laura contends he has some vaguely defined "potential" which she will use some of her money to bring out in a happy ending that turns novel into fairy tale. The sentimentality allows Hornby and his admiring readers to evade the serious psychological and political issues raised, however jokingly, in Fever Pitch, where the fan is clearly a case of arrested development and where the nervous humor masks a very real sense of political compromise ("Yes the terrible truth is that I was willing to accept a Conservative government if it guaranteed an Arsenal Cup Final win").

About a Boy plays a variation on the Rob theme. Although similarly unattached, thirty-six, and lacking ambition, Will Freeman is more financially secure and self-confident (or at least self-consciously cool) than Rob. His sole patrimony—royalties from a popular Christmas song that his father wrote in 1938 and that Will despises-provides Will with the money and therefore the time to indulge his only real passion: sex. Pretending to be a single father, he finds a ready supply of young as well as vulnerable women at a meeting of SPAT (Single Parents—Alone Together). The existence of Marcus, a needy preteen newly arrived in London with his suicidal mother, complicates Will's life and Hornby's novel, which moves back and forth between the two characters (as centers of consciousness) in alternating chapters. Although even more self-centered than Rob, and more willing to use others (including children, both real or imagined) to serve his purpose (making him more attractive to women), Will has something Marcus needs. Will knows things about popular culture—about clothes and Kurt Cobain and Manchester United—that can help Marcus as this consummate outsider tries to find his way in the unknown territories of London and early adolescence. Despite his misgivings, Will does help Marcus, offering him the only kind of advice he can: not on how to grow up but on how to be a kid. Marcus too has some advice to give that addresses the somewhat larger social context of Hornby's second novel. Where High Fidelity portrays a representative weak male, About a Boy offers an epidemic of dysfunctional adults. It also offers an ending that, although no less sentimental than Laura's rescuing Rob, seems more convincing: "'those human pyramids," as Marcus explains at novel's end, "'that's the sort of model for living I'm looking at now .... You're safer as a kid if everyone's just friends. When people pair off ... it's more insecure." And insecurity is the name of Hornby's finely tuned, or attuned, writing.

-Robert Morace

HOSPITAL, Janette Turner

Nationality: Australian. Born: Melbourne, Victoria, 12 November 1942. Education: The University of Queensland, St. Lucia, Brisbane, B.A. in English 1965; Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario, M.A. 1973. Family: Married Clifford G. Hospital in 1965; one son and one daughter. Career: Teacher, Queensland, 1963-66; librarian, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1967-71; lecturer in English, Queen's University, and St. Lawrence College, Kingston, Ontario, 1971-82. Since 1982 full-time writer. Writer-in-residence, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, 1985–86, 1987, 1989; University of Ottawa, Ontario, 1987; University of Sydney, New South Wales, 1989; Boston University, 1991; La Trobe University, Melbourne, Australia, 1992–93; University of East Anglia, Norwich, England, 1996; adjunct professor of English, La Trobe University, 1990–93. Lived in the United States, 1967–71, and India, 1977, and 1990. Currently divides year between Australia, Boston, and Paris. Awards: Seal award (Canada), 1982; Atlantic First citation from Atlantic Monthly, 1978; CDC Literary Prize, for short story, 1986; Fellowship of Australian Writers Fiction award, 1988; Torgi award, Canadian Association for the Blind, 1988; Australian National Book Council award, 1989. Agent: Jill Hickson Associates, P.O. Box 271, Woollahra, New South Wales 2025, Australia; or, Molly Friedrich,, Literary Agent, 708 Third Ave., 23rd Floor, New York, New York 10017, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Ivory Swing. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1982; New York, Dutton, and London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1983.

The Tiger in the Tiger Pit. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1983; New York, Dutton, and London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1984.

Borderline. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, New York, Dutton, and London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1985.

Charades. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1988; New York and London, Bantam, 1988.

A Very Proper Death (as Alex Juniper). Melbourne, Penguin, 1990; New York, Scribner, 1991.

The Last Magician. London, Virago, and New York, Holt, 1992. Oyster. London, Virago Press, 1996; New York, W.W. Norton, 1998.

Short Stories

Dislocations. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1986; Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1988.

Isobars. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1990; Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1991; London, Virago, 1992.

Collected Stories: 1970–1995. St. Lucia, Queensland, University of Queensland Press, 1995.

*

Critical Studies: "Recent Australian Writing: Janette Turner Hospital's Borderline" by Michael Wilding, in Working Papers in Australian Studies, Australian Studies Center, University of London, 1988; "The Commonplace of Foreignness: the Fictions of Janette Turner Hospital" by Sabrina Achilles, in Editions, (Sydney), 1989; Introduction by Helen Daniel to Virago Modern Classics edition of Borderline, 1990; Janette Turner Hospital issue of LINQ Magazine, (Queensland, Australia), 17(1) 1990; "Charades: Searching for Father Time: Memory and the Uncertainty Principle" by Sue Gilett, in New Literature's Review (Australia), 21, Summer 1991; "Janette Turner Hospital" by Elspeth Cameron in Profiles in Canadian Literature, No. 8, edited by Jeffrey M. Heath, Toronto, Dundum Press, 1991; Janette Turner Hospital, edited by Selina Samuels. London, British Australian Studies Association, 1998.

Janette Turner Hospital comments:

In childhood, I felt like a space voyager, traveling daily between two alien worlds, daily mediating between them, decoding mutually unintelligible sign systems, an instinctive semiotician from the age of six. This was the result of growing up within a subculture of evangelical fundamentalist Pentecostalism (in which almost everything was forbidden to me) within the wider culture (encountered at school each day) of boisterous working-class anti-religious subtropical Australia. The incantatory rhythms of the King James version of the bible (especially the Psalms), read aloud at the family dinner-table every night for the first twenty years of my life until I left home, are a dominant influence on my prose, as are the jagged, irreverent, piquant, slangy bush-ballad rhythms of working-class Australia. My weirdly cross-cultural childhood turned out to be a good rehearsal for the rest of my life, which, by happenstance (economic, academic, and marital) rather than by deliberate choice, has been culturally nomadic. I have lived for extended periods of time in the U.S.A., Canada, India, and England, although for some time I have been spending an increasing portion of each year back in Australia, and the drift of things is toward a permanent return.

All my writing, in a sense, revolves around the mediation of one culture (or subculture) to another. Wherever I am, I live about equally (in terms of company kept and haunts frequented) in the rarefied academic/literary/cultural worlds and the netherworlds of working-class pubs/cops/street people/gutter people (with, I must confess, an instinctive preference for the latter). I mix easily in both worlds, I switch accent and idiom easily. I have, in general, (there are always individual exceptions on both sides), a higher moral opinion of the denizens of the netherworld than of pillars of the community.

My first novel The Ivory Swing, was written after a period of living in a village in South India and explored the fact that, regardless of the degree to which educated and enlightened individuals of western and Asian cultures bend over backwards to understand and appreciate one another, there are certain basic and intractable differences that, given a particular course of events, will result in insoluble dilemmas and cataclysms. Since then, all my novels and short stories have explored the same basic situation of clashing perspectives (particularly the clash between the socially favored and the disempowered) but have stayed within a western framework.

The themes of dislocation and connection are constant in my work. So are the themes of moral choice and moral courage. I am always putting my characters into situations of acute moral dilemma (this encompasses the political), to find out what they will do. This is, it seems to me, the question of maximum interest about the human species: what will she, or he, do under extreme pressure? The attempt to find a fictional form which will bridge the disparate worlds I explore has meant that I have often seen myself categorized as "postmodernist." I don't object to this, except that I am disturbed when I read Terry Eagleton, a critic whom I esteem, extolling modernism but finding postmodernism morally nihilistic. I object. (His definition of the term is too narrow). I have passionate moral and political commitments (though I like to feel that these can be surmised but cannot be precisely located in my work. I would like to think that my writing forces the reader to make inner moral and political choices and alignments, but does not tell the reader what such alignments should be).

Stylistically, I probably have more in common with poets and formalists than with other politically <code>engagé</code> writers and postmodernists. Words, images, rhythms are of major sensual importance to me. I have an erotic relationship with language. (Ironically, this goes back to those family bible readings. The stern prophets of the Old Testament were voluptuous with words.) I am a feminist who has frequently been trashed by literary "career feminists." I am, it seems, "ideologically unsound." Apparently I'm much too exuberant about female sexuality, seeking, for example, to redeem and reclaim words like "slut;" and much too fond of male characters.

All labels, in fact, are a bad fit. I'm a maverick and a guerrilla.

~ ~ ~

Janette Turner Hospital was born in Melbourne, moved to Brisbane at the age of seven, and then to the United States in 1967. She spent a number of years in Canada and accompanied her husband to India on his study leave. More recently she has divided her time between Australia, Boston, and Canada. It is hardly surprising, then, that her fiction should be deeply concerned with clashes between cultures, beliefs, nationalities, as even the titles of some of her works suggest: Borderline, Dislocations, Isobars. In one of the stories in Isobars, the narrator could well be speaking of the author when she says, "I live at the desiccating edge of things, or the dividing line between two countries, nowhere."

The Ivory Swing is a study of the faltering marriage of a Canadian academic on leave and his wife and family, focusing on the wife as she struggles to decide when it is legitimate to interfere in the lives of others and when it is not. At the end her well-meant intrusion has disastrous effects, and she is left pondering the ensuing tragedy she might or might not have caused, or prevented, had she acted differently. Early in the novel we are told that "There was a blurred borderline crossed by accident at certain times," and this question of where to draw the line recurs often in Hospital's fiction. At the end the novel intimates the precarious but perhaps hopeful condition of the couple's marriage.

Though the title of The Tiger in the Tiger Pit refers to the irascible, dying old man Edward Carpenter, the most important character is really his wife, Bessie, who on the occasion of their golden anniversary manipulates the various members of the family in order to bring them together. The novel slowly builds up composite sense of the myriad dramas that have unfolded among the members in the past and that will lead towards a climax. Hospital cuts skillfully among them, shifting point of view and focus, enacting her belief in the people's subjective perceptions of reality. It is Bessie who "arranges" the various lives. Having given up a promising career for her husband, she is now working on a composition of her own, "a family symphony," that is both actual and metaphorical; she "conducts" the members of the family as if they were players in an orchestra.

Borderline is one of Hospital's most accomplished novels, working well simultaneously on the levels of narrative thriller and moral speculation and inquiry, especially of where to draw the "borderline" between intrusion into others' lives and responsibility for them that she raised in The Ivory Swing. A meat truck is stopped at the border between the U.S. and Canada and found to be carrying a number of refugees inside with the frozen carcasses. One of them, however, escapes by hiding inside a beef carcass and is rescued on the spur of the moment by the occupants of two following cars. Gus Kelly is a Catholic, guilt-ridden, alcoholic philanderer and Felicity one of those very beautiful, slightly unworldly young woman who are the characteristic heroines in Hospital's novels. They assist the woman, and out of that impulsive action a complicated, ambiguous web of mystery develops, within which they are both eventually embroiled. Though the themes raised are almost too many for the novel to handle with complete authority, Borderline is a highly intelligent and grip-

Hospital's later novels have grown increasingly speculative and even in parts apocalyptic. Charades, for instance, opens: "The grand unified theories, Koenig writes, are difficult to verify experimentally." Koenig is an American scientist, tipped for the Nobel Prize, who is accosted late at night by an Australian named Charade Ryan. Charade is engaged on a quest for her father, which proves in the end to be a quest for her mother; only much later do we learn why she has sought out Koenig. He is working on Heisenberg's Uncertainty Principle, and the novel is itself a dramatization of the principle, of the "necessity of uncertainty," as Charade puts it. Hospital announces the theme repeatedly, and the novel is filled, too, with images of dissolution, change, uncertainty. Charades is the account of a wanderer and a search, a psychological study in guilt, an intellectual thriller, a rewriting of A Thousand and One Nights, but above all a narrative that simply hums and crackles with tension. If there is a criticism it is again that at times the author appears to have taken on too much: the quest for the father, the Holocaust, Heisenberg, allusions to other scientists and writers, Scheherazade, the logbooks of early Australian explorers. What tends to result is a kind of intellectual promiscuity, with the author struggling to do justice to the richness of her material.

The Last Magician begins in startling fashion, with a woman fainting in a London cinema as she unexpectedly sees herself on screen. Still in a state of shock, she takes a flight home to Australia, where she begins her agonizing reappraisal of the lives of four people born in Queensland who grew up together and whom she has come to know later in Sydney. Slowly sifting through the rubble of memories and photographs, the narrator Lucy Barclay eventually arrives as nearly as she can at the truth of their entangled relationships, though the author, in self-mocking anticipation of critical objections, points out, "Late twentieth century social realism cannot always provide definitive and enclosed endings to novels." Speaking in an energetic, often self-contradictory voice, addressing the non-existent reader, breaking off to indulge in long parentheses, Lucy patiently follows the trail right back to its beginnings, trying to "salvage the future and to predict the past." But The Last Magician is also a philosophical inquiry into what the novel postulates as the overground and the underground, into the contingent and uncertain nature of the self, and into the concept of "triage," by which the powerless are sacrificed to those in power.

Hospital's writing is as usual dizzyingly energetic, full of allusions, sudden shifts in time and place and above all packed with images, the most important of which is that of the quarry. Here, she proposes a giant system of caves, tunnels, and canals beginning under Sydney's suburbs and reaching as far perhaps as Brisbane. In the novel's most pervasive motif they are a kind of Inferno, the eighth circle of hell, and "the last magician," the photographer Charlie Chang, becomes an antipodean Dante. Hospital's sympathies are clearly with the undergrounders and outsiders of this world, rather than with characters like the complacent judge Robinson Gray. Worldly society, she seems to be arguing, can only exist at the expense of those it drives out, or under: "The quarry props up a lot of walled gardens."

Oyster picks up and foregrounds the apocalyptic elements in parts of The Last Magician. Written with an eye on the millennium, it tells the story of a cult in the tiny town of Outer Maroo in outback Queensland, so remote that it does not appear on any map. Mail occasionally gets into the town but never leaves it; the postmistress makes sure of that. This doesn't stop its citizens from behaving violently, especially towards "foreigners." Oyster attracts young people to his fabulous underground opal site and then exploits and enslaves them. This is a novel crowded with metaphysics, rollicking in ideas, rendered in a prose that borders on the riotously portentous if it does not cross over into it, and ending in a long-heralded and spectacular apocalypse. As often, Hospital highlights the problematic nature of truth by employing a partial narrator who is close to but never a central part of the story and whose search for the truth enacts the sense of indeterminacy that is central to the author's vision. Much of her narrative is to do with the difficulty of creating coherent narratives. But it is hard to find any coherence at all in this one, with its gallery of characters whose evil is so relentless that finally they lack not merely plausibility but even interest.

Although best known as a novelist, Hospital is also an accomplished and productive short story writer, as her Collected Stories attest. These bring together the stories from her two collections, as well as a further seven more recent ones, gathered together under the title "North of Nowhere." They amount to some thirty-nine stories in all. They are cosmopolitan, ranging widely over the various countries in which Hospital has lived, and the variety of her protagonists is equally impressive. Again though, a common theme is displacement; the characters are often at odds with their environment. Most of the protagonists are estranged or solitary in some form or other, outside the mainstream of humanity. Sometimes the estrangement is by choice, as in "Port After Port, the Same Baggage," in which, in defiance of the young members of her own family, an aging widow makes the decision to embark on a world voyage. At others times, as in "After the Fall," estrangement is thrust upon the protagonist; the artist figure in the story has become unhinged after her husband abandoned her. The later stories tend to be set more often in Australia and especially Queensland, which the author has acknowledged to be her real home, and are often autobiographical in nature.

-Laurie Clancy

HOWARD, Elizabeth Jane

Nationality: British. Born: London, 26 March 1923. Educated privately; trained as an actress at the London Mask Theatre School and with the Scott Thorndike Student Repertory; acted in Stratfordon-Avon, and in repertory theatre in Devon. Military Service: Served as an air raid warden in London during World War II. Family: Married 1) Peter M. Scott in 1942 (divorced 1951), one daughter; 2) James Douglas-Henry in 1959 (divorced); 3) Kingsley Amis, q.v., in 1965 (divorced 1983). Career: Worked as a model, and in radio and television broadcasting, 1939-46; secretary, Inland Waterways Association, London, 1947-50; editor, Chatto and Windus Ltd., London, 1953-56, and Weidenfeld and Nicolson Ltd., London, 1957; book critic, Queen magazine, London, 1957-60. Honorary artistic director, Cheltenham Literary Festival, 1962; co-artistic director, Salisbury Festival, 1973. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature. Lives in Suffolk. Awards: Rhys Memorial prize, 1951; Yorkshire Post award, 1983. Agent: Jonathan Clowes Ltd., Iron Bridge House, Bridge Approach, London NW1 8BD, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Beautiful Visit. London, Cape, and New York, Random House, 1950.

The Long View. London, Cape, and New York, Reynal, 1956.The Sea Change. London, Cape, 1959; New York, Harper, 1960.After Julius. London, Cape, 1965; New York, Viking Press, 1966.Something in Disguise. London, Cape, 1969; New York, Viking Press, 1970.

Odd Girl Out. London, Cape, and New York, Viking Press, 1972.Getting It Right. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Viking Press, 1982.

The Light Years. London, Macmillan, and New York, Pocket Books, 1990.

Making Time. London, Macmillan, and New York, Pocket Books, 1991.

Confusion. London, Macmillan, and New York, Pocket Books, 1993. Anemones. Memphis, Tennessee, Grandmother Earth Creations, 1998.

Short Stories

We Are for the Dark: Six Ghost Stories with Robert Aickman. London, Cape, 1951.

Mr. Wrong. London, Cape, 1975; New York, Viking Press, 1976.

Plays

Screenplays: The Very Edge, 1963; Getting It Right, 1989.

Television Plays: The Glorious Dead (Upstairs, Downstairs series), 1974; Skittles (Victorian Scandals series), 1976; Sight Unseen (She series), 1977; After Julius, from her own novel, 1979; Something in Disguise, from her own novel, 1980.

Other

Bettina: A Portrait, with Arthur Helps. London, Chatto and Windus, and New York, Reynal, 1957.

Howard and Maschler on Food, with Fay Maschler. London, Joseph, 1987.

Cooking for Occasion, with Fay Macshler. London, Macmillan, 1994.

Editor, The Lover's Companion: The Pleasure, Joys, and Anguish of Love. Newton Abbot, Devon, David and Charles, 1978.

Editor, Green Shades: An Anthology of Plants, Gardens, and Gardeners. London, Aurum Press, 1990.

*

Elizabeth Jane Howard comments:

I consider myself to be in the straight tradition of English novelists. I do not write about "social issues or values"—I write simply about people, by themselves and in relation to one another. The first aim of a novel should be readability. I do not write (consciously, at least) about people whom I know or have met.

My methods are to be able to write in one sentence what my novel is to be about, to test this idea for several months, and then to invent situations that will fit the theme. I make the people last—to suit the situations. I write only one draught and rarely make any alterations to it. Occasional cutting has sometimes seemed necessary. I write about 300 words a day with luck and when I am free to do so. I do it chiefly because it is the most difficult thing that I have ever tried to do.

I began by writing plays when I was 14. Before that I wrote 400 immensely dull pages (since destroyed) about a horse. I have also written a film script of The Sea Change with Peter Yates, but this has not yet been produced. I would very much like to write a good play, and, indeed, come to that, a first rate novel.

* * *

Elizabeth Jane Howard's novels are distinguished by sharp and sensitive perceptions about people—their loves, their guilts, the damage they wittingly or unwittingly do to others. Sometimes, the perceptions are worked into satirical set pieces, like the treatment of a group of feckless post-Oxford young people sponging in London in Something in Disguise. Often the satire is more gentle and generous, like that of the patriotic major in After Julius who combines long, boring speeches about the past with silent sensitivity to the human dramas around him. Howard's protagonists, often simple, gentle young girls from a variety of backgrounds, are treated with a great deal of sympathy, with respect for their quiet intelligence and their capacity to feel for others. Any tendency toward the mawkish or sentimental is carefully controlled by a prose that works on sharp and often comic juxtapositions of images: the heavy-handed Colonel, trying to appear sympathetic to others in Something in Disguise, is "about as jocular and useless as the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Lion," in The Sea Change a young actress tries desperately to impress a playwright by showing a knowledge of his plays, "broadcasting her innocuous opinions like weed killer on a well kept lawn," the repressed and deferential hairdresser who is the central character in Getting It Right begins by noticing a wealthy and demanding client whose face has the "apoplectic bloom of unpeeled beetroot" and eyes "the shade of well-used washing-up water," and then proceeds, in a moment of personal conflict, to discover his mind like a "partially disused branch railway line."

The careful control visible in Howard's prose is also apparent in the structure of her novels. Sometimes, as in all of The Sea Change and most of After Julius, the novel consists of alternate narrations from the point of view of a small number of closely connected characters. Each episode is seen from at least two points of view, started by one character, taken up by the next who then moves the narrative on a little further until a third character takes it up. In After Julius the action of the novel is confined to a three-day week-end, although most of the characters are engaged in sorting out casual connections of current problems to the heroic death of Julius at Dunkerque twenty years earlier. Something in Disguise compresses action into three segments: April, August, and December of a single year. The Long View begins with a marriage breaking up in 1950 and its consequences for the couple's children, then traces the marriage back, through several precisely dated stages of problem and uneasy reconciliation, to its desperate origin in 1926. The past invariably leads to the present in Howard's fictional world, and the structural control often indicates both a working out of causation in human affairs and a kind of moral control, an insistence on a combination of awareness, responsibility, and refusal to hurt others in order to end the painful isolation of contemporary dilemmas.

More tightly controlled, and showing characters able to resolve their dilemmas more positively than do some other novels, After Julius depends, to some extent, on a rather striking coincidence. A young woman, visiting her mother for the week-end, finds her London lover, whom she had thought in Rome, arriving, with his wife, for dinner, and the affair explodes in a scene where fireworks are literal as well as symbolic. The structured plot shapes a novel in which moral or immoral actions eventually reveal themselves, in which moral judgment insists that characters take publicly visible responsibility for their actions. Similarly, in Odd Girl Out the young girl, amoral from a conventional point of view, who visits a young couple who have established a self-sufficient "island" in ten years of marriage and, in turn, sleeps with each of the partners, refuses to lie and insists on confronting both together to try to establish the "truth" of a three-way love that could nourish a child. Although the ménage à trois, full of ironic parallels and other forms of structural compression, cannot work for these three characters, the young girl who proposes it is seen as more moral, more willing to face the consequences of her actions and her emotions, than is the superficially more respectable couple. Virtue, in Howard's world, is not fragmented or buried, never the private gesture of an alienated sensibility; rather, actions have consequences, visible and direct, on the people closest to one.

Knowing and facing the past allows all three of the central women in After Julius some kind of resolution of their current dilemmas, but Howard's endings are not always so positive. In The Sea Change an aging playwright, who has longed for a renewal of youth in loving a young girl brought up in a village parsonage, and his wife, who has lost her only child, can understand and forgive each other in an acknowledgment of mutual pain and loss. The acknowledgment, the assumption of responsibility, allows them to survive, although it is far from a triumphant resolution. In Something in Disguise the resolution is melodramatic. The mother, a war widow who has raised her children alone, finally marries a retired army colonel to whom both her children object. Underneath the colonel's blunt, dull, insensitive exterior, the author slowly reveals, is the criminal heart of a man who tries gradually to poison his wife for her money, as he has poisoned two previous wives. And the daughter, who unpredictably marries a man who is both exciting and considerate, both a successful man of the world and a paragon of simple understanding and virtue, is desolate when the man is killed in an auto accident, having been sent on a fool's errand by one of the inconsiderate. Although moral judgment on each of the characters is clear enough, the plot punishes with an intensity that seems, somewhat sensationally, to detract from the emphasis on moral choice in some of the other novels. In Getting it Right melodrama and sensationalism recede into the background, useful for the hairdresser's discovery of sex, but not finally relevant to his moral choices that require the careful adjustment of both his concern for others' pain and his need to establish a satisfying life for himself.

Howard's carefully shaped moral tales are also dense with descriptions and references that convey the social texture of the times. The Long View is skillful in recreating both the sense of the wealthy English in southern France between the wars and the austerely genteel dinner party of 1950. The Sea Change contrasts the conventional life in the village parsonage with that of the 1950s playwright conveying a young girl to London, New York, and a Greek island. After Julius is brilliant with settings: the tiny attic office of the editorial staff of an old, respectable publishing firm; the spacious, chintzy Tudor of the mother's house in Sussex; the cheerful chaos of a young doctor's and his family's crowded flat. Something in Disguise contains a terrifying portrait of daily life in the pseudo-Spanish surroundings of the "distinguished" house on a new suburban housing estate. Within these tartly observed and wholly recognizable environments, certain types appear in novel after novel. The apparently dull retired Army officer, either basically sensitive and kindly or basically cruel and criminal, represents an older England, an irrelevant survival. The confident man of the world, playwright in The Sea Change, doctor in After Julius, international businessman in Something in Disguise (though quickly parodied in Getting It Right), generally has not allowed charm, success, or the modern world to distort his basically simple sense of responsibility. But all these men are seen from the point of view of women, and the novels reiterate a constant sense that women are more responsible, more affectionate, more genuinely concerned with others than men are. After the dinner party that opens The Long View, the men rejoin the women "having discussed the fundamentals as superficially as the women in the drawing room discussed the superficialities fundamentally." Getting It Right switches the emphasis to the young lower-middle class male hairdresser discovering his need for risking conflict and responsibility, his recognition that one "can't take out a kind of emotional insurance policy with people." The three principal women in the novel have known this all along.

Howard's intelligent and sensitive heroines are, however, far from independent. They often regret or seek to rediscover the wise father lost. The benign and revered village parson father in The Sea Change is killed in a bicycle accident; fathers in other novels are killed in World War II; still other fathers, like the one in The Long View, are remote and indifferent or, like the actor who deserts his family in a melodramatic sub-plot in Odd Girl Out, completely irresponsible. The heroines seek protection, look for the man who might replace the absent father and make smoothly decisive all the hard and complex edges of a difficult world. They want to be safe and cosseted, a desire that can lead to the aridity of The Long View, the self-discovery of After Julius, or the impossible fantasies of Something in Disguise and Odd Girl Out. The complexities of the search for protection are stated explicitly near the end of Odd Girl Out, when the couple turns the amoral young girl who proposed it into a scapegoat who can be exorcised. Yet they cannot return to their "island": "Each thought of what he had to do to sustain life for the other; each considered his efforts and translated them into nobility and unselfish determination." The roles are not equivalent, for, a few pages later, at the very end of the novel, the wife realizes that she, who had thought herself protected originally, must now become the principal protector. And they will not have a child.

Howard's Cazalet Chronicle, published in the 1990s, begins with The Light Years. The latter is set in 1937 and 1938, and depicts three generations of a wealthy Sussex family as they become entangled in problems of class, sexuality, and politics-each of them experienced on a deeply personal level. Marking Time takes up their saga in 1939, with the outbreak of the war, and provides a particularly compelling portrait of the three young Cazalet girls, Louise, Polly, and Clary. The series concludes with Confusion, which carries the three into adulthood amid the mayhem of wartime. Polly suffers from the loss of her mother, but even more painful is Clare's longing for her father, missing since the Normandy invasion of 1944. In Howard's fictional world sympathetic and competent mothers, who abound, are not enough. Heroines need the wisdom, the control, and the safety of the responsible and caring father, a safety dimly seen, always lost, and invariably over-compensated for. Looking for safety, always precarious in a world of airplanes and betrayals, requires a great deal of risk, sensitivity, and control. Howard's great distinction is that the search for safety is presented with such rare and intelligent discrimination.

-James Gindin

HOWARD, Maureen

Nationality: American. Born: Maureen Keans in Bridgeport, Connecticut, 28 June 1930. Education: Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts, B.A. 1952. Family: Married 1) Daniel F. Howard in 1954 (divorced 1967), one daughter; 2) David J. Gordon in 1968; 3) Mark Probst, 1981. Career: Worked in publishing and advertising, 1952–54; lecturer in English, New School for Social Research, New York, 1967–68, 1970–71, and since 1974, and at University of California, Santa Barbara, 1968–69, Amherst College, Massachusetts, Brooklyn College, and Royale University. Currently, Member of the School of the Arts, Columbia University, New York. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship, 1967; Radcliffe Institute fellowship, 1967; National Book Critics Circle award, 1979; Merrill fellowship, 1982. Address: c/o Penguin, 375 Hudson Street, New York, New York 10014, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Not a Word about Nightingales. London, Secker and Warburg, 1960; New York, Atheneum, 1962.

Bridgeport Bus. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1965.

Before My Time. Boston, Little Brown, 1975.

Grace Abounding. Boston, Little Brown, 1982; London, Abacus, 1984.

Expensive Habits. New York, Summit, and London, Viking, 1986. Natural History. New York, Norton, 1992.

A Lover's Almanac. New York, Viking, 1998.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Bed and Breakfast," in Yale Review (New Haven, Connecticut), March 1961.
- "Sherry," in The Best American Short Stories 1965, edited by Martha Foley and David Burnett. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1965.
- "Three Pigs of Krishna Nura," in Partisan Review (New Brunswick, New Jersey), Winter 1971–72.
- "Sweet Memories," in Statements, edited by Jonathan Baumbach. New York, Braziller, 1975.

Other

Facts of Life (autobiography). Boston, Little Brown, 1978; with a new afterword by the author, New York, Penguin, 1999.

Editor, Seven American Women Writers of the Twentieth Century. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1977.

Editor, The Penguin Book of Contemporary American Essays. New York, Viking, 1984.

* * *

In her award-winning autobiography, Facts of Life, Maureen Howard explains the conflict between her goals and her father's hopes for her: "I think because I loved him, coarse and unlettered as he pretended to be, that he would have known from experience that our lives do not admit the fictional luxury of alternate endings." Howard's fiction reflects this view that alternate endings are illusive. As her characters attempt to recreate their stories, they discover that the past has predetermined their lives. One cannot alter personality; one can only understand, accept, and grow within the frame of individual talent. At the end of Facts of Life, Howard describes herself at twentythree: "I am beginning. My life is beginning which cannot be true." Her life began long ago, her character determined years before that moment. That the majority of Howard's fictional characters are female seems coincidental; in her introduction to Seven American Women Writers of the Twentieth Century, Howard asserts her preference for universal concerns: "To my mind this is the most egalitarian manner in which to study women's literature—to presume that these women are artists first and do not have to be unduly praised or their reputations justified on grounds of sex." In Howard's novels, discovery and acceptance of one's own character challenge both genders.

When Professor Albert Sedgely, in Not a Word about Nightingales, prolongs his sabbatical in Italy, he wants "to take his life as it was and alter its limits as though he lived in a theatrical set, movable flats—and having created a new scene, then he could shift his tastes, his emotions, even his appearance." To create this illusive possibility, Howard emphasizes Albert's daughter Rosemary's reaction. As with Henry James's Strether in The Ambassadors, Rosemary, sent to bring Albert back, is so charmed by his new personality and environment that she ignores her pledge until she discovers Albert's affair with Carlotta Manzini. Sexual awakening so threatens Rosemary, her mother Anne, and even Albert that all three retreat to narrow and confined lives. Is this the novel that Howard alludes to in Facts of Life as her "mannered academic novel," that displays a "sense of order as I knew it in the late fifties and early sixties with all the forms that I accepted and even enjoyed: that was the enormous joke about life that our passion must be contained if we were not to be fools?" If so, at least Albert's final decision rests on acknowledgment of his own character; that his love for Carlotta is "incomplete" and his business with Anne "unfinished" brings Albert home.

With humor Howard tackles the same questions in Bridgeport Bus. Although Howard shifts point of view frequently between her protagonist Mary Agnes Keely and other characters, the central question belongs to Mary Agnes: is "the mutually destructive love of mother and daughter more substantial than tidy freedom?" Howard's readers view Mary Agnes's attempts as recorded in her journals. When Mary Agnes begins her affair with Stanley Sarnicki, she records the event twice: first as "a thirty-five-year-old virgin would write it-the easy dodge and genteel fade-out," and then "done by a thirty-five-year-old lady writer who fancies herself a woman of experience when really there will always be something too delicate about her sensibility." Mary Agnes cannot escape her own nature, despite the different journal entries. As in her play, "The Cheese Stands Alone," one of several creative interludes in her journal, Mary Agnes recognizes that her fate is "inextricably woven" to her mother's. She returns, pregnant and unmarried, to help her mother die. Truth and fiction are not always discernible in Mary Agnes's journal, but as her friend Lydia comments, "she has in fact got at us in every meaningful respect." Mary Agnes's "triumph" is that she knows that "it was not a great sin to be, at last, alone." She has grown within her limits.

By sharing personal histories, Laura Quinn in Before My Time exchanges spirits with her cousin's son, Jim Cogan. At the end of the novel, a more responsible Jim returns to face drug charges while Laura writes of personal rather than public feelings. However, Howard states clearly, "Whoever compares the present and the past will soon perceive that there prevail and always have prevailed the same desires and passions." Although beneficial, this ending reflects an awakening, not a creation, of character. To develop the pedagogy to instruct young Jim, Laura resees her brother Robert's failed relationship with their father; silently to Jim, Laura urges, "Think that this story is your answer: Robert and all my honesty and self-knowledge are here for you at last. Think before you run." Howard also offers histories of other family members. The most successful story, that of Jim's twin siblings Cormac and Siobhan, parallels Jim and Laura's as the twins have similar desires but are out of step with each other. Mary Agnes Keely may have had "triumph" in Bridgeport Bus, but at the end of Before My Time, Laura Quinn's new doubt is as "sweet"; the confines of her personality contain newly tapped emotion.

Because Howard's characters in Grace Abounding remain isolated from each other, the reader senses little more than ongoing struggle at the end of this novel. Within shifts of point of view and time frame, each character attempts to discern what in the past enlightens the present. The reader first meets Maude and Elizabeth

Dowd in shock after Frank Dowd's death; widow Maude and daughter Elizabeth, "unable to speak of their abandonment," "have drawn off into private desolation." Maude's mother, lost in the world of senility, and her nurse die soon after. Years later, neither Maude's nor Elizabeth's husbands know their wives' true natures. In a disturbing scene, three-year-old Warren, a victim of child abuse who is locked within himself, dies before Maude, now a psychologist, can reach him. Only the mad poet Mattie appears to have a whole life, but, after her death, her heir inadvertently burns all her poems. After the first two sections of the novel, "Sin" and "Sorrow," the reader expects in the final "Grace Note" some resolution but encounters instead Theodore Lasser, Maude's husband's son, a priest more concerned with public relations than spiritual needs. Where then is that "grace abounding"? The last line holds some answer: "The young priest stumbles back and forth from bush to lemon tree, brushing and brushing at cold cobwebs that will fade with the morning dew." The reader knows that Theodore's ghostly cobwebs stem from unresolved conflicts with his father. Grace Abounding may well serve as Howard's warning rather than model: to accept limits, one must discover, know, and then share one's nature.

The starting point of A Lover's Almanac is a party to welcome in the year 2000 (Howard published the book two years earlier). Events at the party place her protagonists, Louise or Lou Moffett and Artie Freeman, at odds with one another after a besotted Artie attacks two of the guests. Though much of the ensuing plot involves Artie's attempts to reconcile with Lou, the most compelling aspect of the story involves Artie's grandfather Cyril. The latter, who raised his grandson, finds himself face to face with Sylvie, a lover he has not seen in half a century. His tale unfolds in a series of flashbacks, and throughout the story, Howard brings to bear her considerable talents with the use of numerous motifs, ranging from biographical sketches of Sir Isaac Newton and Benjamin Franklin to tidbits of folk wisdom.

-Mary M. Lay

HUDSON, Jeffrey

See CRICHTON, (John) Michael

HUGHES, David (John)

Nationality: British. Born: Alton, Hampshire, 27 July 1930. Education: Eggar's Grammar School, Alton; King's College School, Wimbledon; Christ Church, Oxford (editor, Isis), B.A. in English 1953, M.A. 1965. Military Service: Served in the Royal Air Force, 1949–50. Family: Married 1) the actress and director Mai Zetterling in 1958 (divorced 1976); 2) Elizabeth Westoll in 1980; one daughter and one son. Career: Assistant editor, London Magazine, 1953–54; editor, Town magazine, London, 1960–61; documentary and feature film writer in Sweden, 1961–68; lived in France, 1970–74; editor, New Fiction Society, 1975–77, 1981–82; film critic, Sunday Times, London, 1982–83. Since 1982 film critic, Mail on Sunday, London. Assistant visiting professor, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1978–79 and 1987, and University of Alabama, University, 1979; visiting associate professor, University of Houston, 1986. Awards: W.H.

Smith Literary award, 1985; Welsh Arts Council prize, 1985. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1986. Agent: Anthony Sheil Associates, 43 Doughty Street, London WC1N 2LF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Feeling in the Air. London, Deutsch, 1957; as Man Off Beat, New York, Reynal, 1957.

Sealed with a Loving Kiss. London, Hart Davis, 1959.

The Horsehair Sofa. London, Hart Davis, 1961.

The Major. London, Blond, 1964; New York, Coward McCann, 1965.

The Man Who Invented Tomorrow. London, Constable, 1968.

Memories of Dying. London, Constable, 1976.

A Genoese Fancy. London, Constable, 1979.

The Imperial German Dinner Service. London, Constable, 1983.

The Pork Butcher. London, Constable, 1984; New York, Schocken, 1985.

But for Bunter. London, Heinemann, 1985; as The Joke of the Century, New York, Taplinger, 1986.

The Little Book. London, Hutchinson, 1996.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Coloured Cliffs," in Transatlantic Review (London), Spring 1961.

"Rough Magic," in Shakespeare Stories, edited by Giles Gordon. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1982.

Plays

Flickorna (screenplay). Stockholm, PAN/Norstedt, 1968.

Screenplays (with Mai Zetterling): Loving Couples, 1964; Night Games, 1966; Dr. Glas, 1967; The Girls, 1968.

Television Plays: The Stuff of Madness, with Mai Zetterling, from story by Patricia Highsmith, 1990.

Other

J.B. Priestley: An Informal Study of His Work. London, Hart Davis, 1958; Freeport, New York, Books for Libraries, 1970.

The Road to Stockholm and Lapland. London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1964.

The Cat's Tale (for children), with Mai Zetterling. London, Cape, 1965.

The Seven Ages of England. Stockholm, Swedish Radio, 1966.

The Rosewater Revolution: Notes on a Change of Attitude. London, Constable, 1971.

Himself and Other Animals: A Portrait of Gerald Durrell. London, Hutchinson, 1997.

Editor, Memoirs of the Comte de Gramont, translated by Horace Walpole. London, Folio Society, 1965.

Editor, Sound of Protest, Sound of Love: Protest-Songs from America and England. Stockholm, Swedish Radio, 1968.

Editor, Evergreens. Stockholm, Swedish Radio, 1977.

Editor, Winter's Tales 1 (new series). London, Constable, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1985.

Editor, The Stories of Ernest Hemingway. London, Folio Society, 1986

Editor, with Giles Gordon, Best Short Stories 1986 [1988]. London, Heinemann, 3 vols., 1986–88.

Editor, with Giles Gordon, Best Short Stories 1989 [1991]. London, Heinemann, 3 vols., 1989–91; as The Best English Short Stories 1989 [1991]. New York, Norton, 3 vols., 1989–91.

Editor, with Giles Gordon, The Minerva Book of Short Stories 1–6. London, Minerva, 6 vols., 1990–94.

* * *

David Hughes takes war for his subject, but he is certainly not concerned to make stirring adventures out of the sordid tragedies, mass killings, and crowd emotions of armed conflict, nor to contrive intellectual puzzles out of the intrigues of international enmity. His business is with individuals and the way that their lives have been shaped (and frequently grossly distorted) by the wars of this century.

His skillful control of his subject matter, his ingenuity as a story teller, and his subtle and powerful delineation of character enable him to create unforgettable novels out of his chosen material. He seldom makes overt judgments. His characters may condemn themselves out of their obsessions and stored guilt, but their creator insists that, whatever they may have done to other people, they are themselves frail and vulnerable, and therefore, in some respects at least, lovable. However much the readers are kept at a distance by the way Hughes structures his novels, they are never allowed to forget that he is dealing with people not ciphers.

The history of the war-torn first half of this century is epitomized in Memories of Dying in which Flaxman, a prosperous business man on the brink of a nervous breakdown is suddenly caught up into the consciousness of his old history teacher, Hunter. As Flaxman flies to the south of France, in a vain attempt to escape from the pressures of work and family, he finds his mind invaded by thoughts of his home town and the aged lonely man who once taught him, now engaged in the impossible task of writing a history of the world that will present the facts honestly to future generations of schoolchildren. It is an act of penitence, for in the first world war Hunter through accident and panic shot one of his fellow officers. For years thereafter he carried the man's wallet around with him, vowing that he would marry the widow whose photograph it contained. He achieved his aim. He located the woman, who had turned into a lonely alcoholic, married her, and had one son. At the outbreak of World War II he insisted that she should leave their home for a more remote cottage. In that place, of his choosing, she was killed by a random air raid. History had not finished with Hunter. Sometime in the years of unsteady peace, his son was found dead of drugs and alcohol in an Oxford college.

Like Hunter, the narrator of The Imperial German Dinner Service tries to make some reparative and creative response to the war-torn century into which he has been born. In his case, his task takes the symbolic form of collecting the scattered pieces of a dinner service made in Edwardian England as a gift for the Kaiser. Many threads are drawn into his search, for Hughes is determined to show, yet again, how individual needs are woven into public events. As his obsessed narrator journeys to meet his unlikely contacts in the countries of western Europe and Scandinavia, and ultimately reaches the precarious geology of Iceland in his search for the fragile pieces of china, he is reconstructing his own life as well as searching for the innocence of an impossible golden age. Each bit of the dinner service is adorned with an English scene, which he has visited at some time with his estranged wife. So, as Europe is torn, so is he, both by the torments of his marriage to an ambitious Sunday columnist (who discovered the first plate of the dinner service and so set him off on his quest) and the futility of his own work as a freelance journalist.

Ernst Kestner, the protagonist of The Pork Butcher, Hughes's most important and serious novel so far, is also on a quest. A widower from Thomas Mann's town of Lubeck, he is dying of lung cancer and determined that his final act shall be a confrontation with the guilt of his wartime past. So he goes to Paris to take his coldly neurotic, selfobsessed daughter (who has married a Frenchman) on a weekend trip to the village where he had been stationed in the 1940s. In that village, Kestner had met Jannie and become so infatuated with her that he wrote home to his German fiancée breaking off the engagement. The letter never arrived, for the day he posted it, the order came that the village was to be "punished," the inhabitants were to be lured to the central square and shot, and the whole place was to be abandoned. In the numbed brutality of that act, Kestner killed the girl he loved. Now, like Hunter, he is determined to make some amends, even if all he can do is to give himself up to the mayor of the restored village. Beating the usual intransigence of local bureaucracy, he manages to talk to the mayor and gradually realizes that the man is Jannie's brother. When the mayor also recognizes to whom he is talking, he drives the car in which he is conveying Kestner with such wild fury that it is involved in a fatal accident. The mayor is killed; and Kestner, now badly injured, has to end his life with a double guilt on his shoulders. This irony underlines the impossibility of making amends either internationally or personally for the obscenities of war.

But for Bunter takes up the same theme in a strangely light-hearted vein. Hughes imagines that Billy Bunter (the fat boy of Greyfriars, who entertained generations of schoolboys) has survived into the 1980s, and is now ready to confess his own responsibility for the horrors of the century he has lived through. Once again Hughes makes his point: none of us, not even the most unlikely, can shelve responsibility for the times we live in.

-Shirley Toulson

HULME, Keri

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Christchurch, 9 March 1947. Education: North Beach primary school; Aranui High School; Canterbury University, Christchurch. Career: Formerly, senior postwoman, Greymouth, and director for New Zealand television; writer-in-residence, Canterbury University, 1985. Awards: New Zealand Literary Fund grant, 1975, 1977, 1979, and scholarship in letters, 1990; Katherine Mansfield Memorial award, for short story, 1975; Maori Trust Fund prize, 1978; East-West Centre award, 1979; ICI bursary, 1982; New Zealand writing bursary, 1984; Book of the Year award, 1984; Mobil Pegasus prize, 1985; Booker prize, 1985; Chianti Ruffino Antico Fattor award, 1987. Address: Okarito, Private Bag, Hokitika Post Office, Westland, New Zealand.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Bone People. Wellington, Spiral, 1983; London, Hodder and Stoughton, and Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1985

Lost Possessions (novella). Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1985.

Short Stories

The Windeater/Te Kaihau. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1986; London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Braziller, 1987.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "See Me, I Am Kei," in Spiral 5 (Wellington), 1982.
- "Floating Words," in Prize Writing, edited by Martyn Goff. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1989.
- "The Plu-perfect Pawa," in Sport 1 (Wellington), 1989.
- "Hinekaro Goes on a Picnic and Blows Up Another Obelisk," in Subversive Acts, edited by Cathie Dunsford. Auckland, New Women's Press, 1991.

Poetry

The Silences Between (Moeraki Conversations). Auckland, Auckland University Press-Oxford University Press, 1982.Strands. Auckland, Auckland University Press, 1991.

Other

Homeplaces: Three Coasts of the South Island of New Zealand, with photographs by Robin Morrison. Auckland, Hodder and Stoughton, 1989; London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1990.

*

Critical Studies: "In My Spiral Fashion" by Peter Simpson, in Australian Book Review (Kensington Park), August 1984; "Spiraling to Success" by Elizabeth Webby, in Meanjin (Melbourne), January 1985; "Keri Hulme: Breaking Ground" by Shona Smith, in Untold 2 (Christchurch); Leaving the Highway: Six Contemporary New Zealand Novelists by Mark Williams, Auckland, Auckland University Press, 1990; Writing Along Broken Lines: Violence and Ethnicity in Contemporary Maori Fiction by Otto Heim. Auckland, New Zealand, Auckland University Press, 1998.

Keri Hulme comments:

I have a grave suspicion that Life is a vast joke: we are unwitting elements of the joke.

It is not a nice or kind joke, either.

I write about people who are in pain because they can't see the joke, see the point of the joke.

What I write is fantasy-solidly-based-in-reality, everyday myths.

I rarely write out of a New Zealand context and, because I am lucky enough to be a mongrel, draw extensively from my ancestral cultural heritages—Maori (Kai Tahu, the South Island tribe), Scots (the Orkneys), and English (Lancashire). (Remember that the Pakeha elements of my ancestry predominate, but they have been well-sieved by Aotearoa.) I want to touch the raw nerves in NZ—the violence we largely cover up; the racism we don't acknowledge; the spoliation of land & sea that has been smiled at for the past 150 years—and explore why we (Maori & Pakeha) have developed a very curious type of humor which not many other people in the world understand, like, or appreciate and which is a steel-sheathed nerve I want to hide inside.

I'm not particularly serious about anything except whitebaiting. (Whitebait are the fry of NZ galaxids: they are a greatly relished and very expensive-about $75NZ a kilo—delicacy. I whitebait every season.)

* * *

Keri Hulme comes from the heartland of New Zealand—the South Island's west coast—and, perhaps as a consequence, she has developed an idiom which remains distinctively New Zealand even when it is feeding on the great traditions of English, Irish, American, and other (notably sufic) literature. This New Zealandness is the most immediately striking feature of the work for which she is best know, The Bone People.

The Maori phrases which permeate the text immediately proclaim its provenance. But the texture of the English which she writes is also unmistakably New Zealand. Many writers before her have managed a passable imitation of Kiwi pub argot, but Hulme is one of the first to have succeeded in giving a characteristic account of the speech and thoughts of New Zealanders as educated and intelligent as her protagonist, Kerewin Holmes. In passages like the following one can sense the typical rhythms and accents (''thunk''), the half-suppressed obscenities (''whateffers''), the gentle ironies and not-sogentle prejudices (''Poms'' are Englishmen) of New Zealand's more articulate denizens. (Kerewin has just discovered that her young protégé, Simon Gillayley, may have aristocratic Irish blood):

Ah hell, urchin, it doesn't matter, you can't help who your forbears were, and I realized as I thunk it, that I was reveling in the knowledge of my whakapapa and solid Lancashire and Hebridean ancestry. Stout commoners on the left side, and real rangatira on the right distaff side. A New Zealander through and through. Moanawhenua bones and heart and blood and brain. None of your (retch) import Poms or whateffers.

The uncovering of Simon's background constitutes one strand of the plot of The Bone People, but ultimately—like the plots of many of Hulme's short stories—it turns out to be an inconclusive strand. All we can be sure of is that he comes from a background of violence and drug-dealing. The more detailed clues lead nowhere, and it seems that Hulme intended merely to tease her readers with these elements of a "well-made" plot, and that her real interest lay elsewhere. As Kerewin begins to check out Simon's Irish background she apologizes for "dragging" the reader "out of the cobweb pile, self-odyssey." The phrase highlights not only the book's principal concern (Kerewin's mental and spiritual progress) but also one of its dominant images (the spider's web, which at different times represents entanglement and intricate harmony).

Even more prominent than the spider and its web is the traditional Maori (and sufic) motif of the spiral. Kerewin lives in a tower full of spirals, notably a spiral staircase and a double spiral engraved on the floor: "one of the kind that wound your eyes round and round into the center where surprise you found the beginning of another spiral that led your eyes out again to the nothingness of the outside ... it was an old symbol of rebirth, and the outward-inward nature of things..." At the beginning of the book Kerewin has clearly begun a downward spiral into "nothingness." Her Tower, conceived as a "hermitage," "a glimmering retreat," has become an "abyss," a "prison," She is entangled in a web of self-absorption and materialism.

Into her life walks Simon, who is her opposite in almost every respect. She is dark (though only one-eighth Maori); he is fair. She is 'heavy shouldered, heavy-hammed, heavy-haired'; he is lithe, almost skeletal. She is wonderfully articulate; he is a mute. (Again Hulme teases our expectations of a "well-made" plot by holding out the promise that he will eventually learn to speak. He does not.) She is obsessed by her possessions, and fears as a consequence that she has 'lost the main part' of life; he is "rough on possessions," but has a sense of the deeper aura of things. She shrinks from touching others; he and his adoptive father (Joe) are, as Hulme has subsequently put it, 'huggers and kissers deluxe.' She is clever; he is trusting—two terms which are juxtaposed in the book. She is associated with the moon; he is a "sunchild." She is an introvert; he and Joe are extroverts.

Symbol-hunters have been quick to latch on to Simon's character, but they have so far been baffled by the diffuseness of the portrait. Hulme herself claims that she writes "from a visual base and a gut base rather than sieving it through the mind," and so it is probably futile to search for any conscious allegorical design in the book. A psycho-analytical approach offers greater rewards. Many aspects of The Bone People—notably the dreams (which often foretell the future), the paintings, the search for "wholeness" (and the dance imagery which accompanies it), the emphasis on myth, the eclectic attitude to religion, the disdainful attitude towards sex, and the mandala-like tricephalos which anticipates the asexual harmony ("commensalism") achieved by the principal characters at the end—suggest the influence of Jung. Jung also provides as good an explanation as any of Simon's relationship with Kerewin.

The book is full of projections and personifications of deviant aspects of the characters' personalities. Kerewin's more cynical thoughts are attributed to an inner voice labeled "the snark"; her violent tendencies turn at length into a palpable cancer; and the mysterious character who helps her to grapple with this cancer ("a thin wiry person of indeterminate age. Of indeterminate sex. Of indeterminate race") appears to be a projection of her own enfeebled self. Similarly Simon (who was originally conceived as a figment of Kerewin's dreams and not as an independent character) may be seen as her "shadow"—the embodiment of everything she has lost by withdrawing from society. This includes not only positive factors like trust and responsiveness to touch but also negative ones, especially violence.

Simon brings with him a long history of violence, culminating in the savage beatings inflicted on him by Joe. Kerewin's spiraling descent is accompanied and to a large extent occasioned by her recognition of this violence, and the nadir of her "self-odyssey" comes when she gives way to violence herself. At the same time an orgy of violence (effectively amplified by the recurrent images of knives and splintered glass) erupts among the other characters, so that at the end of the third part of the novel Simon is hospitalized, Joe (wounded) is in jail, one minor character is dead, another seriously ill, and Kerewin's Tower has been reduced to a single story.

Many readers feel that Hulme should have left the book there—that, as in much of her other fiction (of which the fine story "Hooks and Feelers" and the novella Lost Possessions are the most accessible examples) it is the violence, and especially the violence that wells out of love, which is the most compelling element. But Hulme added a fourth section and an epilogue in which the principals, aided by a set of unorthodox assistants and (except in Simon's case) by a deep draught of Maori culture, spiral back towards "rebirth," "wholeness," and harmony.

In a recent interview Hulme has acknowledged that the ending owes something to Jung, which encourages the notion advanced here that the whole novel is susceptible to a Jungian interpretation. Just who is really the focus of this interpretation—Kerewin Holmes or her virtual namesake, Keri Hulme—is a question difficult to resolve. Hulme concedes that the three protagonists emerged from her dreams. (She keeps a dream diary, and at least one of the dreams in The Bone People—Kerewin's at Moerangi—is lifted straight from it.) Much of the material also seems quasi-autobiographical. Time will tell if she can write effectively on less personal subjects.

—Richard Corballis

HUMPHREYS, Emyr (Owen)

Nationality: British. Born: Prestatyn, Clwyd, Wales, 15 April 1919. Education: University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, 1937–39; University College of North Wales, Bangor, 1946-47. Military Service: Served as a relief worker in the Middle East and the Mediterranean during World War II. Family: Married Elinor Myfanwy Jones in 1946; three sons and one daughter. Career: Teacher, Wimbledon Technical College, London, 1948-50, and Pwllheli Grammar School, North Wales, 1951-54; producer, BBC Radio, Cardiff, 1955-58; drama producer, BBC Television, 1958-62; freelance writer and director, 1962-65; lecturer in drama, 1965-72, and Honorary Professor, 1988, University College of North Wales. Since 1972 freelance writer. Awards: Maugham award, 1953; Hawthornden prize, 1959; Welsh Arts Council award, 1972, 1975, 1979, for nonfiction, 1984; Gregynog fellowship, 1974; Society of Authors traveling scholarship, 1979; Welsh Arts Council Book of the Year, 1992, for Bonds of Attachment. D.Litt.: University of Wales, Cardiff, 1990. Honorary Fellow, University of Wales, 1987. Agent: Anthony Sheil Associates, 43 Doughty Street, London WC1N 2LF, England. Address: Llinon, Pen-y-berth, Llanfairpwll, Pnys Môn, Gwynedd LL61 5YT, Wales.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Little Kingdom. London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1946.The Voice of a Stranger. London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1949.A Change of Heart. London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1951.Hear and Forgive. London, Gollancz, 1952; New York, Putnam, 1953

A Man's Estate. London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1955; New York, McGraw Hill, 1956. The Italian Wife. London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1957; New York, McGraw Hill, 1958.

Y Tri Llais (in Welsh). Llandybie, Dyfed, Llyfrau'r Dryw, 1958.

A Toy Epic. London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1958.

The Gift. London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1963.

Outside the House of Baal. London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1965.

National Winner. London, Macdonald, 1971.

Flesh and Blood. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1974.

The Best of Friends. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1978.

The Anchor Tree. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1980.

Jones. London, Dent, 1984.

Salt of the Earth. London, Dent, 1985.

An Absolute Hero. London, Dent, 1986.

Open Secrets. London, Dent, 1988.

Bonds of Attachment. London, Macdonald, 1991.

Unconditional Surrender. Chester Springs, Pennsylvania, Dufour Springs, 1996.

The Gift of a Daughter. Bridgend, Wales, Seren, 1998.

Short Stories

Natives. London, Secker and Warburg, 1968.

Miscellany Two. Bridgend, Glamorgan, Poetry Wales Press, 1981.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Down in the Heel on Duty," in New English Review (London), 1947.
- "Michael," in Wales (London), vol. 7, nos. 26-27, 1947.
- "A Girl in the Ice" and "The Obstinate Bottle," in New Statesman (London), 1953.
- "Mrs. Armitage," in Welsh Short Stories. London, Faber, 1959.
- "The Arrest," in Madog 3 (Barry), 1977.

Plays

King's Daughter, adaptation of a play by Saunders Lewis (produced London, 1959; as Siwan, televised, 1960). Published, as Siwan, in Plays of the Year 1959–60, London, Elek, 1960.

Dinas, with W.S. Jones. Llandybie, Dyfed, Llyfrau'r Dryw, 1970.

Radio Plays: A Girl in a Garden, 1963; Reg, 1964; The Manipulator, 1970; Etifedd y Glyn, 1984; The Arrest, 1985.

Television Plays and Documentaries: Siwan, 1960; The Shining Pyramid, from a story by Arthur Machen, 1979; Y Gosb (The Penalty), 1983; Wyn ir Lladdfa (Lambs to the Slaughter), 1984; Hualau (Fetters), 1984; Bwy yn Rhydd (Living Free), 1984; Angel o'r Nef (An Angel from Heaven), 1985; Teulu Helga (Helga's Family), 1985; Cwlwm Cariad (A Love Knot), 1986; Twll Ole (A Hole), 1987; Yr Alwad (The Call), 1988; The Triple Net, 1988; Yr Alltud (The Exile), 1989; Dyn Perig (A Dangerous Fellow), 1990; Outside Time, 1991; Dwr Athân (Fire and Water), 1991.

Poetry

Roman Dream, music by Alun Hoddinott. London, Oxford University Press, 1968.

An Apple Tree and a Pig, music by Alun Hoddinott. London, Oxford University Press, 1969.

Ancestor Worship: A Cycle of 18 Poems. Denbigh, Gee, 1970.Landscapes, music by Alun Hoddinott. London, Oxford University Press, 1975.

Penguin Modern Poets 27, with John Ormond and John Tripp. London, Penguin, 1979.

The Kingdom of Bran. London, Holmes, 1979. Pwyll a Riannon. London, Holmes, 1979.

Other

The Taliesin Tradition: A Quest for the Welsh Identity. London, Black Raven Press, 1983; revised edition, Chester Springs, Pennsylvania, Dufour, 1990.

The Triple Net: A Portrait of the Writer Kate Roberts 1891–1985. London, Channel 4 Television, 1988.

The Crucible of Myth. Swansea, University of Swansea, 1990.

*

Bibliographies: A Bibliography of Anglo-Welsh Literature 1900–1965 by Brynmor Jones, Swansea, Library Association, 1970.

Manuscript Collections: National Library of Wales, Aberystwyth.

Critical Studies: The Novel 1945–1950 by P.H. Newby, London, Longman, 1951; Y Ilenor a'i Gymdeithas by A. Llewelyn Williams, London, BBC, 1966; The Dragon Has Two Tongues by Glyn Jones, London, Dent, 1968; Ysgrifau Beirniadol VII by Derec Llwyd Morgan, Denbigh, Gee, 1972; Jeremy Hooker and Andre Morgan, in Planet 39 (Llangeitho Tregaron, Dyfed), 1977; Emyr Humphreys, Cardiff, University of Wales Press, 1980, and "Land of the Living," in Planet 52 (Llangeitho Tregaron, Dyfed), 1985, both by Ioan Williams; "Channels of Grace: A View of the Earlier Novels of Emyr Humphreys," in Anglo-Welsh Review 70 (Tenby, Dyfed), 1982, and article in British Novelists 1930–1959 edited by Bernard Oldsey, Detroit, Gale, 1983, both by Roland Mathias; Emyr Humphreys by M. Wynn Thomas, Caernarvon, Pantycelyn, 1989.

* * *

The preoccupations of Emyr Humphreys are peculiarly Welsh, and since there are very few Welsh novelists writing in English who spring from or have assimilated the Welsh Nonconformist religious heritage, his work has few parallels in that of his contemporaries. Humphreys manifests in his novels a Puritan seriousness about the purpose of living, about the need for tradition and the understanding of it, and about the future of the community (usually seen as Wales) as well as the good of the individual. Welsh Nationalist as well as Christian, he re-emphasised in 1953 that "personal responsibility is a Protestant principle" and saw himself as engaged in writing the Protestant novel. His interest in the non-realist novel is minimal and his technical experimentation is limited to the use, in A Man's Estate, of a number of narrators and, in Outside the House of Baal, to an interleaving of narratives in which the past rapidly catches up with the present.

His first two novels, The Little Kingdom and The Voice of a Stranger, are concerned respectively with idealism betrayed by false leadership and idealism bludgeoned by Knavery. Their conclusions are pessimistic. The earlier of those themes appears again in A Toy Epic. But with A Change of Heart begins Humphreys's concern with the Christian belief in the gradual progress of society towards the good and the means by which good is transmitted from generation to generation. Heredity is soon discarded in favour of answers more complex. Perhaps the finest of the earlier novels which pursue this theme is Hear and Forgive, and of the later, Outside the House of Baal. In this book Humphreys faces the apparently total defeat of his Calvinistic Methodist minister, leaving the reader only with the silence which might make room for faith.

The Anchor Tree is a digression—with the same preoccupations—into his Welsh-American experience; but Humphreys devoted much of his time in the 1970s and 1980s to a series in which he intended National Winner to occupy the fourth position. Flesh and Blood, The Best of Friends, and Salt of the Earth are part of this sequence, while Jones is a single-volume study of the refusal of responsibility. Set during the final days of World War II, Unconditional Surrender recalls Anthony Trollope's The Warden with its complex tale of conflicting loyalties.

-Roland Mathias

HUNTER, Evan

Pseudonyms: Curt Cannon; Hunt Collins; Ezra Hannon; Richard Marsten; and Ed McBain. Nationality: American. Born: Salvatore A. Lombino, New York City, 15 October 1926. Education: Evander Childs High School, New York; Cooper Union, New York, 1943–44; Hunter College, New York, B.A. 1950 (Phi Beta Kappa). Military Service: United States Navy, 1944–46. Family: Married 1) Anita Melnick in 1949 (divorced), three sons; 2) Mary Vann Finley in 1973, one step-daughter. Career: In the early 1950s taught in vocational high schools and worked for Scott Meredith Literary Agency, New York. Lives in Norwalk, Connecticut. Awards: Mystery Writers of America Edgar Allan Poe award, 1957, and Grand Master award, 1985. Agent: John Farquharson Ltd., 250 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10107, U.S.A.; or, 162–168 Regent Street, London, W1R 5TB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Big Fix. N.p., Falcon, 1952; as So Nude, So Dead (as Richard Marsten), New York, Fawcett, 1956.

The Evil Sleep! N.p., Falcon, 1952

Don't Crowd Me. New York, Popular Library, 1953; London, Consul, 1960; as The Paradise Party, London, New English Library, 1968.

Cut Me In (as Hunt Collins). New York, Abelard Schuman, 1954; London, Boardman, 1960; as The Proposition, New York, Pyramid, 1955.

The Blackboard Jungle. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1954; London, Constable, 1955.

Second Ending. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Constable, 1956; as Quartet in H, New York, Pocket Books, 1957.

Tomorrow's World (as Hunt Collins). New York, Avalon, 1956; as Tomorrow and Tomorrow, New York, Pyramid, 1956; as Ed McBain, London, Sphere, 1979.

- Strangers When We Meet. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Constable, 1958.
- I'm Cannon—For Hire (as Curt Cannon). New York, Fawcett, 1958; London, Fawcett, 1959.
- A Matter of Conviction. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Constable, 1959; as The Young Savages, New York, Pocket Books, 1966.
- Mothers and Daughters. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Constable, 1961.
- Buddwing. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Constable, 1964.
- The Paper Dragon. New York, Delacorte Press, 1966; London, Constable, 1967.
- A Horse's Head. New York, Delacorte Press, 1967; London, Constable. 1968.
- Last Summer, New York, Doubleday, 1968; London, Constable, 1969.
- Sons. New York, Doubleday, 1969; London, Constable, 1970.
- Nobody Knew They Were There. New York, Doubleday, and London, Constable, 1972.
- Every Little Crook and Nanny. New York, Doubleday, and London, Constable, 1972.
- Come Winter. New York, Doubleday, and London, Constable, 1973. Streets of Gold. New York, Harper, 1974; London, Macmillan, 1975.
- Doors (as Ezra Hannon). New York, Stein and Day, 1975; London, Macmillan, 1976
- The Chisholms: A Novel of the Journey West. New York, Harper, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1976.
- Walk Proud. New York, Bantam, 1979.
- Love, Dad. New York, Crown, and London, Joseph, 1981.
- Far from the Sea. New York, Atheneum, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1983.
- Lizzie. New York, Arbor House, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1984.
- Criminal Conversation. New York, Warner, 1994.
- Privileged Conversation. New York, Warner Books, 1996.
- Me and Hitch. London and Boston, Faber and Faber, 1997.

Novels as Richard Marsten

- Runaway Black. New York, Fawcett, 1954; London, Red Seal, 1957.
  Murder in the Navy. New York, Fawcett, 1955; as Death of a Nurse (as Ed McBain), New York, Pocket Books, 1968; London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1972.
- The Spiked Heel. New York, Holt, 1956; London, Constable, 1957. Vanishing Ladies. New York, Permabooks, 1957; London, Boardman, 1961.
- Even the Wicked. New York, Permabooks, 1958; as Ed McBain, London, Severn House, 1979.
- Big Man. New York, Pocket Books, 1959; as Ed McBain. London, Penguin, 1978.

Novels as Ed McBain

- Cop Hater. New York, Permabooks, 1956; London, Boardman, 1958.
  The Mugger. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1956: London, Boardman, 1959.
- The Pusher. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1956; London, Boardman, 1959.

- The Con Man. New York, Permabooks, 1957; London, Boardman, 1960.
- Killer's Choice. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1958; London, Boardman, 1960.
- Killer's Payoff. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1958; London, Boardman, 1960.
- April Robin Murders, with Craig Rice (completed by McBain). New York, Random House, 1958; London, Hammond, 1959.
- Lady Killer. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1958; London, Boardman, 1961.
- Killer's Wedge. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1959; London Boardman, 1961.
- 'Til Death. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1959; London, Boardman, 1961.
- King's Ransom. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1959; London, Boardman, 1961.
- Give the Boys a Great Big Hand. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1960; London, Boardman, 1962.
- The Heckler. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1960; London, Boardman, 1962.
- See Them Die. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1960; London, Boardman, 1963.
- Lady, Lady, I Did It! New York, Simon and Schuster, 1961; London, Boardman, 1963.
- Like Love. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1962; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1964.
- Ten Plus One. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1963; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1964.
- Ax. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1964.
- The Sentries. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1965.
- He Who Hesitates. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1965.
- Doll. New York, Delacorte Press, 1965; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1966.
- Eighty Million Eyes. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1966.
- Fuzz. New York, Doubleday, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1968.Shotgun. New York, Doubleday, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1969.
- Jigsaw. New York, Doubleday, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1970.
- Hail, Hail, The Gang's All Here! New York, Doubleday, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1971.
- Sadie When She Died. New York, Doubleday, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1972.
- Let's Hear It for the Deaf Man. New York, Doubleday, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1973.
- Hail to the Chief. New York, Random House, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1973.
- Bread. New York, Random House, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1974.
- Where There's Smoke. New York, Random House, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1975.
- Blood Relatives. New York, Random House, 1975; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1976
- Guns. New York, Random House, 1976; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1977.

So Long as You Both Shall Live. New York, Random House, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1976.

Long Time No See. New York, Random House, and London, Hamish Hamilton. 1977.

Goldilocks. New York, Arbor House, 1977; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1978.

Calypso. New York, Viking Press, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1979

Ghosts. New York, Viking Press, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1980.

Rumpelstiltskin. New York, Viking Press, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1981.

Beauty and the Beast. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1982; New York, Holt Rinehart, 1983.

Ice. New York, Arbor House, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1983
Jack and the Beanstalk. New York, Holt Rinehart, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1984.

Lightning. New York, Arbor House, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1984.

Snow White and Rose Red. New York, Holt Rinehart, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1985.

Eight Black Horses. New York, Arbor House, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1985.

Another Part of the City. New York, Mysterious Press, 1985; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1986.

Cinderella. New York, Holt, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1986.Poison. New York, Arbor House, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1987

Puss in Boots. New York, Holt, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1987.Lullaby. New York, Morrow, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1987.The House That Jack Built. New York, Holt, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1988.

Downtown. New York, Morrow, and London, Heinemann, 1989. Three Blind Mice. New York, Arcade, 1990.

Vespers. New York, Morrow, and London, Heinemann, 1990.

Widows. London, Heinemann, 1991.

Kiss. London, Heinemann, 1992.

Mary, Mary. London, Heinemann, 1992.

Mischief. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1993.

The Last Dance. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1999.

Short Stories

The Jungle Kids. New York, Pocket Books, 1956.

I Like 'em Tough (as Curt Cannon). New York, Fawcett, 1958

The Last Spin and Other Stories. London, Constable, 1960.

The Empty Hours (as Ed McBain). New York, Simon and Schuster, 1962; London, Boardman, 1963.

Happy New Year, Herbie, and Other Stories. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1963; London, Constable, 1965.

The Beheading and Other Stories. London, Constable, 1971.

The Easter Man (a Play) and Six Stories. New York, Doubleday, 1972; as Seven, London, Constable, 1972.

The McBain Brief. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1982; New York, Arbor House, 1983.

McBain's Ladies: The Women of the 87th Precinct. New York, Mysterious Press, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1988.

McBain's Ladies Too. New York, Mysterious Press, 1989; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1990. Barking at Butterflies, and Other Stories. Unity, Maine, Five Star, 2000.

Running from Legs and Other Stories. Unity, Maine, Five Star, 2000.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Ticket to Death," in Best Detective Stories of the Year 1955, edited by David Coxe Cooke. New York, Dutton, 1955.

"Classification: Dead" (as Richard Marsten), in Dames, Danger, and Death, edited by Leo Margulies. New York, Pyramid, 1960.

"Easy Money," in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine (New York), September 1960.

"Nightshade" (as Ed McBain) in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine (New York), August 1970.

"Someone at the Door," in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine (New York), October 1971.

"Sympathy for the Devil," in Seventeen (New York), July 1972.

"Weeping for Dustin," in Seventeen (New York), July 1973.

"The Analyst," in Playboy (Chicago), December 1974.

"Dangerous Affair," in Good Housekeeping (New York), March 1975.

"Eighty Million Eyes" (as Ed McBain), in Ellery Queen's Giants of Mystery. New York, Davis, 1976.

"Stepfather," in Ladies' Home Journal (New York), June 1976.

"What Happened to Annie Barnes?," in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine (New York), June 1976.

Plays

The Easter Man (produced Birmingham and London, 1964; as A Race of Hairy Men, produced New York, 1965). Included in The Easter Man (a Play) and Six Stories, 1972.

The Conjuror (produced Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1969).

Screenplays: Strangers When We Meet, 1960; The Birds, 1963; Fuzz, 1972; Walk Proud, 1979.

Television Plays: Appointment at Eleven (Alfred Hitchcock Presents series), 1955–61; The Chisholms series, from his own novel, 1978–79; The Legend of Walks Far Woman, 1982.

Other (for children)

Find the Feathered Serpent. Philadelphia, Winston, 1952.

Rocket to Luna (as Richard Marsten). Philadelphia, Winston, 1952; London, Hutchinson, 1954.

Danger: Dinosaurs! (as Richard Marsten). Philadelphia, Winston, 1953.

The Remarkable Harry. New York and London, Abelard Schuman, 1961.

The Wonderful Button. New York, Abelard Schuman, 1961; London, Abelard Schuman, 1962.

Me and Mr. Stenner. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1976; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1977.

Other (as Ed McBain)

Editor, Crime Squad. London, New English Library, 1968. Editor, Homicide Department. London, New English Library, 1968.

Editor, Downpour. London, New English Library, 1969. Editor, Ticket to Death. London, New English Library, 1969.

*

Manuscript Collections: Mugar Memorial Library, Boston University.

Critical Studies: Neither Seen the Picture Nor Read the Book: Literary References in Ed McBain's 87th Precinct Series: Homage to Ed McBain/Evan Hunter on His Seventieth Anniversary, October 15, 1996 by Ted Bergman. Grover Park, 1996.

Evan Hunter comments:

(1972) The novels I write under my own name are concerned mostly with identity, or at least they have been until the most recent book. (I cannot now predict what will interest or concern me most in the future.) I change my style with each novel, to fit the tone, the mood, and the narrative voice. I have always considered a strong story to be the foundation of any good novel, and I also apply this rule to the mysteries I write under the Ed McBain pseudonym. Unlike my "serious" novels, however, the style here is unvaried. The series characters are essentially the same throughout (although new detectives appear or old ones disappear from time to time, and each new case involves a new criminal or criminals). The setting is the same (the precinct and the city), and the theme is the same—crime and punishment. (I look upon these mysteries, in fact, as one long novel about crime and punishment, with each separate book in the series serving as a chapter.) I enjoy writing both types of novels, and consider each equally representative of my work.

* * *

The vividness and immediacy of the author's prose, coupled with the timeliness of his subject, drew considerable attention to Evan Hunter's novel The Blackboard Jungle. This story of a young teacher confronting the brutal realities of a big city vocational high school was praised for its realism and for opening to fiction an area of public concern that had begun to attract national attention in the United States. Second Ending was an even more aggressively topical novel, tracing the effects of drugs on four young New Yorkers. The central character, a young trumpet player who has been addicted for two years, draws the other characters together, and they are all altered in some way by his descent toward death. Some of the novel's episodes, which were termed "sensational" at the time of publication, now no longer seem so unique, and despite the awkwardness with which portions of the novel are narrated. Hunter's power as a storyteller moved his characters unerringly toward the slough of mutual desperation.

In Strangers When We Meet Hunter elected to describe a more muted kind of action in which a young architect, happily married and the father of two children, drifts into an affair with a suburban neighbor. Hunter showed a keen eye for the minute details that slowly gather round the illicit relationship, creating a highly realistic impression of a young man unable to cope with conflicting loyalties. Nonetheless, his characters finally seem insignificant—certainly not sufficiently strong to carry the philosophical baggage that the author gives them in an improbable conclusion.

A Matter of Conviction was a return to the mode of social protest that Hunter had developed so successfully in his two earlier novels. A polemic against the forces in society that make young men into killers, it was too contrived to offer more than passing interest. Mothers and Daughters, which chronicles the youth and maturity of four middle-class women—their dreams and their loves—is a more substantial work, despite its occasional melodrama.

Much of Hunter's fiction is over-written: striving for a realistic thickness, it bogs down in minutiae, and while the author writes with a high and consistent degree of professionalism, his vision rarely penetrates beneath the elaborate surfaces that his prose projects. Last Summer is a major exception to this adroit verbosity. It is told with an unforgettable simplicity and directness, which nonetheless conveys the author's own highly sophisticated point of view. During a summer holiday two teenage boys and a girl explore an Atlantic island, tell each other the "truth," and dominate a shy young girl. Their experiences end in violence, which vividly symbolizes the moral degeneracy of their society.

Few contemporary writers can match the versatility and consummate professionalism of Evan Hunter. His work includes a highly successful series of detective novels published under the pseudonym of Ed McBain; a science-fiction novel for children; a comic cops-and-robbers novel, A Horse's Head, written with great inventiveness and wit; and a spirited children's book in verse, illustrated by his own sons. Sons tells the story of three generations of a Wisconsin family, powerfully challenging some of the basic presumptions of the American Dream; The Paper Dragon is a densely plotted intriguing story of a five-day plagiarism trial; and Buddwing plunges its amnesiac hero into the heart of a Washington Square riot, a hold-up, and a crap game. Nobody Knew They Were There takes a futuristic look at the innate forces of violence that assail man's attempt to achieve world peace.

In Privileged Conversation, Hunter somewhat sketchily tells the tale of a New York stalker who invades the furtive affair of a married psychiatrist and a woman he has met in Central Park. The Last Dance marks the 50th novel of the 87th Precinct in Isola, his (that is, McBain's) fictional New York. Throughout a varied and highly prolific career, Hunter has produced a body of work distinguished for its sound craftsmanship, although only one of his novels, Last Summer, clearly demonstrates the art which such craft should sustain.

-David Galloway

HUNTER, Kristin (Elaine)

Nationality: American. Born: Kristin Elaine Eggleston, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, 12 September 1931. Education: Charles Sumner School and Magnolia Public School, both Philadelphia; Haddon Heights High School, New Jersey, graduated 1947; University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, 1947–51, B.S. in education 1951. Family: Married 1) Joseph Hunter in 1952 (divorced 1962); 2) John I. Lattany in 1968. Career: Philadelphia columnist and feature writer, Pittsburgh Courier, 1946–52; teacher, Camden, New Jersey, 1951; copywriter, Lavenson Bureau of Advertising, Philadelphia, 1952–59; research assistant, School of Social Work, University of Pennsylvania, 1961–62; copywriter, Wermen and Schorr, Philadelphia, 1962–63; information officer, City of Philadelphia, 1963–64, 1965–66; director of health services, Temple University, Philadelphia, 1971–72; director, Walt Whitman Poetry Center, Camden, 1978–79. Lecturer in creative writing. 1972–79, adjunct professor of English, 1980–83, and since 1983 senior lecturer in English, University of Pennsylvania. Writer-in-residence, Emory University, Atlanta, 1979. Awards: Fund for the Republic prize, for television documentary, 1955; Whitney fellowship, 1959; Bread Loaf Writers Conference De Voto fellowship 1965; Sigma Delta Chi award, for reporting, 1968; National Council on Interracial Books for Children award, 1968; National Conference of Christians and Jews Brotherhood award, 1969; Christopher award, 1974; Drexel citation, 1981; New Jersey Council on the Arts fellowship, 1982, 1985; Pennsylvania Council on the Arts fellowship, 1983. Agent: Don Congdon Associates, 156 Fifth Avenue, Suite 625, New York, New York 10010. Address: 721 Warwick Road, Magnolia, New Jersey 08049, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

God Bless the Child. New York, Scribner, 1964; London. Muller, 1965.

The Landlord. New York, Scribner, 1966; London, Pan, 1970.

The Survivors. New York, Scribner, 1975.

The Lakestown Rebellion. New York, Scribner, 1978.

Kinfolks. New York, Ballantine Books, 1996.

Do Unto Others. New York, One World, 2000.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "To Walk in Beauty," in Sub-Deb Scoop (Philadelphia), 1953.
- "Supersonic," in Mandala (Philadelphia), vol. 1, no. 1, 1956.
- "There Was a Little Girl," in Rogue (New York), 1959.
- "An Interesting Social Study," in The Best Short Stories by Negro Writers, edited by Langston Hughes. Boston, Little Brown, 1967.
- "Debut," in Negro Digest (Chicago), June 1968.
- "Honor among Thieves," in Essence (New York), April 1971.
- "The Tenant," in Pennsylvania Gazette (Philadelphia).
- "Bleeding Berries," in Callaloo (Lexington, Kentucky), vol. 2, no. 2, 1979.
- "The Jewel in the Lotus," in Quilt 1 (Berkeley, California), 1981.
- "Bleeding Heart," in Hambone (Santa Cruz, California), 1983.
- "Perennial Daisy," in Nightsun (Frostburg, Maryland), 1984.
- "Brown Gardenias," in Shooting Star Review (Pittsburgh), Fall, 1989.

Fiction (for children)

The Soul-Brothers and Sister Lou. New York, Scribner, 1968; London, Macdonald, 1971.

Boss Cat. New York, Scribner, 1971.

The Pool Table War. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1972 Uncle Daniel and the Raccoon. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1972. Guests in the Promised Land: Stories. New York, Scribner, 1973. Lou in the Limelight. New York, Scribner, 1981.

Plays

The Double Edge (Produced Philadelphia, 1965).

Television Plays: Appointment at Eleven (Alfred Hitchcock Presents series), 1955–61; The Chisholms series, from his own novel, 1978–79; The Legend of Walks Far Woman, 1982.

*

Critical Studies: From Mammies to Militants: Domestics in Black American Literature by Trudier Harris, Philadelphia, Temple University Press, 1982, and article by Sondra O'Neale, in Afro-American Fiction Writers after 1955 edited by Harris and Thadious M. Davis, Detroit, Gale, 1984.

Kristin Hunter comments:

The bulk of my work has dealt—imaginatively, I hope—with relations between the white and black races in America. My early work was ''objective,'' that is, sympathetic to both whites and blacks, and seeing members of both groups from a perspective of irony and humor against the wider backdrop of human experience as a whole. Since about 1968 my subjective anger has been emerging, along with my grasp of the real situation in this society, though my sense of humor and my basic optimism keep cropping up like uncontrollable weeds.

* * *

In her first two novels, Kristin Hunter plays upon the contradictions between reality as it is experienced by the black urban poor and the false optimism of popular story. God Bless the Child parodies the tale of the enterprising but low-born youngster who, since the origins of middle-class fiction, has set out to achieve a place in society by the application of nerve and energy. In the case of Rosie Fleming, however, vitality leads to failure, for by setting herself up as a small entrepreneur, she earns the animosity of the white men who manage the poor people's version of finance capitalism. Despite her portrayal of the relentless power that destroys Rosie, Hunter is not resigned to a sense of human powerlessness. A sympathetic and complex portraval of three generations of black women conveys an intensely humanistic conception of character, which in her second novel, The Landlord, becomes the basis for an optimistic theme. Its main character, determined to "become a man" by exercising mastery over his tenants, is frustrated and tricked at every turn as they purge him of the mythology of white male dominance. Against his will, and contrary to the assumptions of middle-class convention, the landlord forms an admiration and appreciation for the diverse styles by which blacks cope with life's troubles.

Following the publication of The Landlord, Hunter occupied herself with stories of ghetto life directed toward younger readers. Like the adult novels that preceded them, these children's books reject the idealizations of popular genres while preserving a belief in the capacity of the black underclass to transform their lives by the power of their spirit. In both the adult and children's books, the message has been that society's "victims" refuse the dehumanization that either social relations or a literature of pity would assign them. The Soul Brothers and Sister Lou, one of the earliest attempts to realistically depict the black urban experience, is Hunter's most famous example of young adult fiction. This novel gained her recognition as a gifted author of young adult literature. In this work, Hunter tells the story of a juvenile gang that forms a music group in order to escape the violence within their community. In her next work of children's literature, Boss Cat, Hunter explores the same theme of underprivileged youths. Her third example of young adult fiction, Guests in the Promised Land, which is a collection of short stories, describes the experiences of black children as they struggle with racial adversity. It was in 1981 that Hunter returned to The Soul Brothers and Sister Lou to compose its sequel, Lou in the Limelight. In this work, Hunter examines the ramifications of success.

Committed to the verve and quality of black life, Hunter wrote four additional adult novels that must be termed celebrations. The first, The Survivors, signifies by its title its author's devotion to the rendition of character traits that enable a middle-aged dressmaker and a street kid to form an emotional and practical alliance that enables them both to overcome the predacious circumstances of the neighborhood.

In The Lakestown Rebellion, Hunter tells the story of a small black township that was originally settled by fugitive slaves. As the community battles against plans to build a highway that will destroy their homes, the tradition of the folk trickster is renewed. The novel's wit perfectly suits Hunter's optimistic humanism. The book is so enjoyable one is almost unaware that it is also a symbolic reenactment of cultural history.

Hunter's next novel, Kinfolks, is the story of Cherry and Patrice. These two former political radicals and lifelong friends learn to accept their past mistakes. While this text probes serious questions about family, sexual freedom, and responsibility, it has also been recognized for its humor. In Do Unto Others, Hunter once again shows an ability to take the reader through a broad range of emotions. The text deals with the gap between Africans and African-Americans, while acknowledging the bridge that links the two cultures. The main character, Zena, an African-American woman, struggles with her own ancestry, while housing a twenty-year old Nigerian girl. This text follows Hunter's tradition of examining important emotional and social problems. Hunter combines humor with her social criticism, and her works provide an optimistic look at African-American culture.

—John M. Reilly, updated by Marta Krogh

I

IGNATIEFF, Michael

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Toronto, Ontario, 12 May 1947. Education: Upper Canada College, Toronto; University of Toronto, B.A., 1969; Harvard University, Boston, (teaching fellow in social studies), 1971-74, Ph.D., 1975; Cambridge University (research fellow, King's College), 1978-84, M.A., 1978. Family: Married Susan Barrowclough in 1977; one son and one daughter. Career: Reporter, The Globe and Mail, 1966-67; assistant professor of history, University of British Columbia, 1976-78; broadcaster, Channel 4, London, 1986. Since 1987, broadcaster, British Broadcasting Corp, London. Visiting fellow, École des Hautes Études, Paris, 1985; Alistair Horne Fellow, St. Anthony's College, Oxford, 1993-95. Editorial columnist, The Observer, 1990-93. Awards: Canadian Governor General's award, 1988, Heinemann prize, 1988, both for The Russian Album. Agent: Sheil Land Associates, 43 Doughty Street, London WC1N 2LF, England. Address: 37 Baalbec Road, London N5 1QN, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Asya. London, Chatto and Windus, and New York, Knopf, 1991.Scar Tissue. London, Chatto and Windus, 1993; New York, Farrar Straus, 1994.

Plays

1919 (screenplay), with Hugh Brody. London, Faber, 1985.

Other

A Just Measure of Pain: The Penitentiary in the Industrial Revolution, 1750–1850. London, Macmillan, 1978.

The Needs of Strangers. London, Chatto and Windus, and New York, Viking, 1984.

The Russian Album. London, Chatto and Windus, and New York, Viking, 1987.

Blood and Belonging. London, BBC, 1993; New York, Farrar Straus, 1994.

The Warrior's Honor: Ethnic War and the Modern Conscience. New York, Metropolitan Books, 1998.

Isaiah Berlin: A Life. New York, Metropolitan Books, 1998.

Virtual War: Kosovo and Beyond. New York, Henry Holt, 2000.

Editor, with Jeffrey Rose, Religion and International Affairs. Toronto, Anansi, 1968.

Editor, with Istvan Hont, Wealth and Virtue: The Shaping of Political Economy in the Scottish Enlightenment. Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1983.

* * *

Michael Ignatieff arrived at fiction by the route of introspection, through sensitive and intelligent effort to understand both his personal and historical moment. He has produced two novels, Aysa and Scar Tissue, but his arrival as a fiction writer emerges organically from earlier prose works.

Trained as an historian, Ignatieff gravitated to social philosophy in The Needs of Strangers, a study of the issue of social responsibility in the modern state that focuses on the relationship between material and emotional needs, the question of rights to the fulfillment of needs, and a history of the concept of needs. He then produced Blood and Belonging, an intense, personal, and philosophical study of the painfilled nationalisms in the Balkans, Northern Ireland, Germany, Ukraine, Quebec, and Kurdistan. In these volumes he demonstrates a rare balance between analysis and personal involvement, commitment conditioned by historical perspective.

Ignatieff won the 1988 Governor General's Award for Non-Fiction (the Canadian Pulitzer Prize) for The Russian Album, his account of his family's White Russian history and emigration to England and, later, Canada. In it he dramatizes life under the tsars in terms of the personal lives of his ancestors, including his grandfather, who was minister of education under Nicholas II, the last tsar.

From his knowledge of the Russian past comes Aysa, the life of a Russian princess who escapes to France and, much later, to England. The novel is enriched both by historical accuracy of detail and by the development of Aysa herself from a self-willed rich child to a suffering and perceptive woman. It is patently not stereotyped, for many of its emigres are prosperous and able, aware that the Russia they have left is gone yet constantly orbiting around things Russian, such as the struggle between the motherland and Hitler. It has a fatalism to its shape, coming to a conclusion when the ninety-year-old Aysa finds the grave of her first husband in Moscow's Novodevichy cemetery. Although it owes structural debts to the sweeping historical epic novel, Aysa is anchored to the intimate life of a woman whose stature grows gently in the reader's eyes until she stands as a marker of strength of will mixed with keen self-knowledge drawn from the century of pain.

Scar Tissue is a book dominated by such a searing immediacy of anguish that it is, simply, hard to read. Yet it is so powerful and its subject matter so central to human experience that it exerts a grip on the imagination matched only by other unrelentingly direct fictions, like those of Samuel Beckett. It is the retrospective story of a man experiencing the degeneration and death of his mother from neurological disease and its effects on family, on love, on loyalty. Beyond that it subtly places the situation of one death and one family in medical and philosophical frameworks that go to the heart of human experience.

When, Ignatieff asks, does selfhood disappear when the mind is breaking apart—when memory goes, when recognition goes, when the plague overtakes the pathways in the brain? Is there always a self inside? And, if so, how horribly chaotic must be the terrible collage of the unlinked present and past, the life always lived among strangers because even loved ones are not remembered?

What makes these questions truly excruciating is the intense emotional and intellectual perspective of the middle-aged professor whose mother is dying. In an immense leap from the conventional omniscient chronological narration of Aysa, Ignatieff has mastered a style that mixes time and allows for the flows of feeling and language. The narrator looks backward for the first signs of his mother's change and charts the slow decline as it drags her loving husband to self-sacrifice and death and then immerses the narrator himself in a struggle of responsibility that ruins his marriage, damages his relationship with his brother, and nearly ruins his life.

Towering above all this affliction is his growing knowledge that he is seeing his own destiny, for his brother, who has become a neuroscience researcher, makes clear the condition is genetic. The narrator sees the scans of his mother's brain, strangely beautiful abstract colored designs, and he sees the patterns of the damaged chromosomes that mark the start of the cascade of tiny events of disease. As he struggles to continue to see his once vital, gifted mother as a person, she loses her personhood before his eyes, and he comes face to face with protracted living death.

The narrator's voice is so intense that criticism has been leveled at the autobiographical elements of the text. But that is to mistake its real achievement. Scar Tissue marks the emergence of a fully disciplined and original writer who communicates the deepest and most painful of human questions through the lives it portrays.

-Peter Brigg

IHIMAERA, Witi (Tame)

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Gisborne, 7 February 1944. Education: Te Karaka District High School, 1957–59; Church College of New Zealand, 1960–61; Gisborne Boys High School, 1962; University of Auckland, 1963-66; Victoria University, Wellington, 1968–72, B.A. 1972. Family: Married Jane Cleghorn in 1970. Career: Cadet reporter, Gisborne Herald, 1967; journalist, Post Office Headquarters, Wellington, 1968-72; information officer, 1973-74, Third Secretary, Wellington, 1975-78, Second Secretary, Canberra, 1978, and First Secretary, Wellington, 1979-85, Ministry of Foreign Affairs; New Zealand Consul, New York, 1986-88; Counsellor on Public Affairs, New Zealand Embassy, Washington, D.C., 1989; lecturer, University of Auckland, 1990-95. Awards: Freda Buckland Literary award, 1973; James Wattie award, 1974, 1986; University of Otago Robert Burns fellowship, 1974; Scholarship in Letters, 1990; Katherine Mansfield fellowship, 1993. Address: 2 Bella Vista Road, Herne Bay, Auckland, New Zealand.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Tangi. Auckland and London, Heinemann, 1973.

Whanau. Auckland, Heinemann, 1974; London, Heinemann, 1975.

The Matriarch. Auckland and London, Heinemann, 1986.

The Whale Rider. Auckland, Heinemann, 1987; London, Heinemann, 1988.

Bulibasha. Auckland, Penguin, 1994.

Nights in the Gardens of Spain. Auckland, Secker and Warburg, 1995.

The Dream Swimmer. Auckland and New York, Penguin, 1997.

Short Stories

Pounamu, Pounamu. Auckland, Heinemann, 1972; London, Heinemann, 1973.

The New Net Goes Fishing. Auckland, Heinemann, 1977; London, Heinemann, 1978.

Dear Miss Mansfield: A Tribute to Kathleen Mansfield Beauchamp. Auckland, Viking, 1989; New York, Viking, 1990.

Kingfisher Come Home: The Complete Maori Stories. Auckland, Secker & Warburg. 1995.

Other

Maori. Wellington, Government Printers, 1975.

New Zealand Through the Arts: Past and Present, with Sir Tosswill Woollaston and Allen Curnow. Wellington, Friends of the Turnbull Library, 1982.

Land, Sea and Sky (text), photographs by Holger Leue. Auckland, Reed, 1994.

Editor, with D.S. Long, Into the World of Light: An Anthology of Maori Writing. Auckland, Heinemann, 1982.

Editor, Te Ao Marama: Maori Writing Since the 1980s, Vols. 1–4. Auckland, Reeds, 1992–94.

Editor, Te Ao Marama: Contemporary Maori Writing. Auckland, Reed Books, 1993–96.

Editor, Vision Aotearoa: Kaupapa New Zealand. Wellington, Bridget Williams Books, 1994.

Editor, Mataora, the Living Face: Contemporary Maori Art. Auckland, D. Bateman, 1996.

*

Critical Studies: "Participating" by Ray Grover, in Islands (Auckland), Winter 1973; "Tangi" by H. Winston Rhodes, in Landfall (Christchurch), December 1973; "Maori Writers," in Fretful Sleepers and Other Essays by Bill Pearson, Auckland, Heinemann, 1974; The Maoris of New Zealand by Joan Metge, London, Routledge, 1977; Introducing Witi Ihimaera by Richard Corballis and Simon Garrett, Auckland, Longman Paul, 1984; Writing Along Broken Lines: Violence and Ethnicity in Contemporary Maori Fiction by Otto Heim. Auckland, Auckland University Press, 1998.

Witi Ihimaera comments:

There are two cultural landscapes in my country, the Maori and the Pakeha (European), and although all people, including Maori, inhabit the Pakeha landscape, very few know the Maori one. It is important to both Maori and Pakeha that they realize their dual cultural heritage, and that is why I began to write. Not to become the first Maori novelist but to render my people into words as honestly and as candidly as I could; to present a picture of Maoritanga which is our word for the way we feel and are, in the hope that our values will be maintained. I like to think that I write with both love—aroha—and anger in the hope that the values of Maori life will never be lost. So far I have written about exclusively Maori people within an exclusively Maori framework, using our own oral tradition of Maori literature, our own mythology, as my inspiration. Cultural difference is not a bad thing, it can be very exciting, and it can offer a different view of the world, value system, and interpretation of events. This is what I would like to offer: a personal vision of Maori life as I see it, the Maori side of New Zealand's dual heritage of culture.

* * *

Witi Ihimaera writes with a keen awareness of his cultural heritage, and a profound commitment to the values and traditions of his people. A central feature of his imaginative landscape is the whanau, or extended family community, an emotional and cultural bastion eroded by urbanization and social fragmentation. Writing with "both love and anger," Ihimaera documents the traditional Maori way of life and the changes it has undergone since the coming of the Pakeha. Although his early works can be seen as pastoral and elegiac, Ihimaera does not idealize his subjects; rather, he renders their trials and conflicts, joys and sorrows, shortcomings and strengths, with remarkable honesty and clarity. Drawing upon the rich resources of Maori myth and legend, he blends the past with the present, evoking the ancestral framework of historical continuity that is an essential part of Maoritanga. His work proclaims the vitality and significance of New Zealand's "other culture," one that Ihimaera suggests enriches the lives of Maori and Pakeha alike.

Many of the stories in Ihimaera's first collection, Pounamu, Pounamu, are set in the village of Waituhi, the geographical and cultural hearth—and heart—of the Whanau A Kai to which much of his subsequent fiction returns. Both celebration and lamentation, they are lyrical evocations of a rural, communal way of life that is rapidly becoming a thing of the past. Pounamu, or greenstone-semi-precious jade traditionally used to make weaponry and jewelry, is Ihimaera's symbol of Maoritanga, and he contrasts it with the cold, glittering attractions of Pakeha culture in "the emerald city." One story in particular, "The Whale," dramatizes the conflicting claims of tradition and change, as an old man sits in the meeting house mourning the decay of the world that he knew and the loss of the young to the city's siren call. It is his granddaughter who articulates the dilemma that the young people face: "The world isn't Maori any more. But it's the world I have to live in. You dream too much. Your world is gone. I can't live it for you. Can't you see?"

Ihimaera's first novel, Tangi, is an extended meditation on the subject of Pounamu, Pounamu's concluding story: Tama Mahana's return from Wellington (the emerald city) to attend the burial of his father. Structured by the ceremonial patterns of the funeral itself, Tangi is a work that mines the emotional intensity of loss and the communal rituals surrounding death. It is at once a mourning of the dead and an affirmation of the living, for Tama's personal grief and memories are tempered by the spirit of love and kinship that draws the community together on such occasions. Past, present, and future interconnect as Tama's individual response to his father's death is framed by the history of his whanau, and the mythic history of Maori legend: the separation of Rangitane, the sky father, from Papatuanuku, the earth mother, so that their children could dwell in the light. Coming to terms with his loss is, for Tama, a voyage of self-discovery and a recognition of his responsibility to uphold the tradition that is his father's legacy. Thus, Tama's journey into the future is focused through the myth of creation that underpins the novel, the separation of earth and sky that allowed "the dawning of the first day."

If, through the single consciousness of an individual, Ihimaera introduced his readers to the communal basis of Maoridom, then Whanau gives that extended grouping full fictional rein. Since the whanau is the combination of the land and its people, Ihimaera's approach is utterly in keeping with his title and theme. In an interrelated series of vignettes spanning a single day, he captures the lives of the individuals who comprise the Whanau A Kai. Although deftly drawn, no one character in this novel could be said to be central; rather, it is the whanau itself that is the subject and focus. Through the reflections of sorrowing elders, disillusioned adults, and rebellious adolescents, Whanau records the slow disintegration of the traditional way of life as Pakeha culture encroaches and many of the young people willingly embrace its values at the expense of their Maoritanga. But it also symbolically affirms the strength of the cultural ties that bind this community as the whanau come together to search for their missing kaumatua, the revered patriarch who is their living link with the past.

The New Net Goes Fishing heralded a new streak of anger in Ihimaera's writing that would find its most clear expression in The Matriarch and its sequel, The Dream Swimmer. Framed by two stories that allude to The Wonderful Wizard of Oz, The New Net Goes Fishing examines Maori in the urban setting of the emerald city. Although a few of the stories register success or acceptance in the Pakeha world, many focus on the conflicts arising from an impersonal, alien environment and the clash of two different value systems. While this collection often proffers a bleak view of race relations, it does conclude on a note of hope. Returning to Waituhi after twenty years in Oz, an old man stresses the need for his people to experience the best of both worlds. The complexities of Maori/Pakeha concourse, however, and Ihimaera's need to find a new means with which to express it, prompted a self-imposed hiatus. Nearly ten years later, Ihimaera broke his silence with a novel of epic historical proportions, The Matriarch.

Unabashedly aggressive, The Matriarch constitutes Ihimaera's battle cry. Mixing fact and fiction, biography and autobiography, myth and "reality," Ihimaera imaginatively reconstructs New Zealand colonial history from a Maori perspective. The novel challenges the claims of official history even as it declares its own contingency, and the inadequacy of any history to enclose and explain its subject. The woman warrior of the novel's title is Artemis Riripeti Mahana, the enigmatic figure who dominated the narrator's youth and who now dominates his memories as he struggles to understand her. Tama Mahana's recollective investigation of his grandmother leads him further back to two significant ancestors, the warrior prophet, Te Kooti, and the politician, Wi Pere Halbert. All three are linked by a common cause: the fight to retain Maori land under Maori control, and this theme is the driving force behind the various histories and narrative styles that compose the novel. Maori myth-history and spirituality feature prominently in The Matriarch, but Ihimaera also draws freely upon European history and culture: the trials of his people are likened to those of the Israelites in Egypt, and the matriarch's instruction of her grandson is liberally interspersed with snatches of Verdi (in a symbolic paralleling of nationalist struggles). Although the matriarch herself remains shadowed by historical controversy, her political legacy is clear: "to fight the Pakeha you must learn to be like him. You must become a Pakeha, think like him, act like him and, when you know that you are in his image then turn your knowledge to his destruction." Critics are divided over the success of Ihimaera's unwieldy epic; what cannot be denied, however, is the scope and power of this ambitious work.

Ihimaera's next two works can be termed "occasional": The Whale Rider was written in anticipation of a visit by his teenage daughters, and the collection Dear Miss Mansfield marks the centenary celebrations of New Zealand's most famous writer. While The Whale Rider returns to the mythic territory of Ihimaera's ancestry in a lyric and positive revisioning of Pounamu, Pounamu's "The Whale," Dear Miss Mansfield is a response to the work of an equally important literary ancestor, Katherine Mansfield. The titular letter that opens the collection is a song of homage to the divine Miss M., but the stories themselves evoke the subversive notion of "writing back" that characterizes The Matriarch and The Dream Swimmer. Playing Maori variations on Mansfield's themes, or retelling some of her most famous short stories from a Maori perspective, Ihimaera presents the other side of Mansfield's New Zealand in a self-conscious, intertextual refashioning. Ihimaera interprets his world through the lens of Maori culture, but he is also aware that that culture is not a static entity. Although The Matriarch and Dear Miss Mansfield proclaim that the Maori cannot be subsumed under the banner of Pakeha history, they also demonstrate that the latter has become a part of an ongoing Maori genealogy. Like the old man of "Return from Oz," Ihimaera incorporates the best of both worlds.

Bulibasha: King of the Gypsies continues the exploration of New Zealand's dual cultural heritage in Ihimaera's typical blend of fiction and autobiography. In some ways, Bulibasha is the paternal complement to The Matriarch, since the central relationship of the narrator with his grandparent is intermingled with the history of the tribe. With this novel, however, Ihimaera eschews metafictional bricolage in favor of a straightforward Bildungsroman concerning the anxiety of influence. The king of the novel's title is the Mahana family patriarch, a powerful economic and religious leader who rules the familial shearing gangs with an iron fist. Set against Bulibasha is the rival Poata clan, and his grandson, Simeon, whose verbal audacity and intellectual pursuits label him as whakahihi: too big for his boots. It is from Simeon's precocious perspective that the twin rivalries are related, and, like the matriarch, it is he who both challenges and upholds the traditions of his people. Set in the era of Ihimaera's youth, Bulibasha examines generational conflict and social change, offering an often-humorous insight to the oral histories of which family legends are made. Simeon's perceptions testify to the intermingling of cultural landscapes: family dramas are often recounted and comically illuminated by the formulaic plots of the American movies that Simeon watches so avidly; the ritualized conflicts between the two clans are the rivalries of Montagues and Capulets, and his heretical challenges to Bulibasha's authority are construed as those of a mortal intent on toppling Olympus. The novel concludes with a resounding deconstruction of Bulibasha's mythic status, but Simeon's assumption of responsibility prompts a recognition of his grandfather's guiding principle: the family always comes first.

For Ihimaera, Bulibasha concerns the challenge of surviving familial influence and establishing one's separate identity. Nights in the Gardens of Spain explores the conflict between family and sexual identity. Equally as autobiographical as his earlier work, Nights in the Gardens of Spain nevertheless represents a radical new departure in Ihimaera's writing. The central character is a Pakeha, a university lecturer torn between the love of his wife and two daughters, and his sexuality as a gay man. A coming out novel, Nights traces David's exploration of his sexual identity and the social and emotional complexities of being married and being gay. Many of the minor characters in the novel are satiric caricatures, and the narrator's characterization is an odd blend of cardboard gay Everyman and particularized individuality. While Nights presents a provocative foray into the steamroom gardens of gay culture, the emotional center of the book-and of its web of Peter Pan allusions-lies in the narrator's powerful and often-anguished relationship with his young daughters. Nights in the Gardens of Spain is Ihimaera's novelistic declaration that his writing need not necessarily be restricted to exclusively Maori issues. It also indicates, as one commentator has noted, that the category "Maori writer" is not one in which Ihimaera can be expected to stay.

In interviews, Ihimaera has often mentioned an unfinished companion-piece to his award-winning historical epic. His most recent novel, The Dream Swimmer, is the long-awaited sequel to The Matriarch, one that continues Tama Mahana's odyssey as he assumes the mantle of power that is his grandmother's legacy. Less a sequel than a completion of the earlier work, The Dream Swimmer fills in some of the historical gaps in The Matriarch, most particularly in the narrator's relationship with his mother, Tiana, the mythically charged dream traveler of the novel's title. Although as monumental in scope as its predecessor, The Dream Swimmer is a much more coherent narrative, interweaving the history of twentieth-century struggle for Maori land rights with a dramatic tale of family conflict. With his characteristic cross-cultural blend of literary and mythological allusions, Ihimaera presents his epic tale in six operatic acts, and accords the fraught history of the Mahana clan the dimensions of Greek tragedy, likening their conflicts to those that divided the House of Atreus. If this novel is as politically passionate as The Matriarch, critics also comment that this intensity leads occasionally to the hyperbolic and the melodramatic. And, while The Dream Swimmer is compelling reading, it is also characterized by the autobiographical self-indulgence—even self-mythologization—that has tinged Ihimaera's work since The Matriarch. Nevertheless, the very breadth of its ambitious vision demonstrates that Ihimaera's is a powerful and important voice in New Zealand literature.

-Jackie Buxton

IRELAND, David

Nationality: Australian. Born: Lakemba, New South Wales, 24 August 1927. Family: Married 1) Elizabeth Ruth Morris in 1955 (divorced 1976), two sons and two daughters; 2) Christine Hayhoe in 1984. Career: Worked as a greenskeeper, in factories, and at an oil refinery. Awards: Adelaide Advertiser award, 1966; Miles Franklin award, 1972, 1977, 1980; The Age Book of the Year award, 1980. Member: Order of Australia, 1981.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Chantic Bird. London, Heinemann, and New York, Scribner, 1968.

The Unknown Industrial Prisoner. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, 1971.

The Flesheaters. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, 1972. Burn. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, 1975.

The Glass Canoe. Melbourne and London, Macmillan, 1976.

A Woman of the Future. Ringwood, Victoria, Allen Lane, and New York, Braziller, 1979; London, Penguin, 1980.

City of Women. Ringwood, Victoria, Allen Lane, 1981.

Archimedes and the Seagle. Ringwood, Victoria, Viking, 1984; London, Viking, 1985; New York, Penguin, 1987.

Bloodfather. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1987; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1988.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Wild Colonial Boy," in Winter's Tales 25, edited by Caroline Hobhouse. London, Macmillan, 1979; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1980.

Plays

Image in the Clay (produced Sydney, 1962). Brisbane, University of Queensland Press, 1964.

*

Critical Studies: Double Agent: David Ireland and His Work by Helen Daniel, Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1982; Atomic Fiction: The Novels of David Ireland by Ken Gelder, Brisbane, University of Queensland Press, 1993.

* * *

David Ireland is one of Australia's most innovative prose stylists. His first three novels depict a world that is in its "industrial adolescence," obsessed with profit and production to the point where those who do not contribute to industry (the poor, the aged, the unemployed) are treated as failures and misfits—as social lepers. The Chantic Bird offers this view in semi-comic fashion, its alienated teenage narrator providing a jaded running commentary on existence: "If there is no other life, why is this one so lousy?" Written in the absurdist-surrealist mode, but viewing its subject matter more somberly, The Flesheaters is set in a boarding-house for the poor and unemployed.

To counter the pervasive "functional" mentality (which insists that all human activity must have a public and profit-making purpose), Ireland's fictions insist upon the psychic value to the individual of such "useless" (but natural) activities as day-dreaming, fantasizing, and self-expression. Realistic treatments merge with fantasy sequences, and oblique viewpoints reveal familiar behavior from unusual angles. (Some of these effects verge on magical-realism, and Ireland has acknowledged his interest in South American writers of this school.) Ireland structures his works as scattered fragments, like elaborate mosaics constructed from tiny pieces, and this presentation clearly reflects not only his sense of the fragmentation of experience but also a celebration of its gloriously frustrating diversity.

Arguably the best of Ireland's early novels, The Unknown Industrial Prisoner portrays the life of workers in a foreign-owned Sydney oil refinery, examining their plight piece by piece and layer by layer until the fragmented mosaic builds into a microcosm of Australian industrial society. Ireland himself worked for a time in such a refinery, and the novel provides an absurdist (but acutely authentic) record of the dehumanization of the workforce, the emasculation of management, and the laziness and inefficiency of both employer and employee.

The Unknown Industrial Prisoner is an angry and rigorous account of the absurdities of industrialism. But Ireland is Australia's most intensely analytical writer, and it should therefore come as no surprise that he is prepared to question the assumptions behind his own angry sense of injustice. This analytic quality is seen in frequent bitter references to the workers as "the soil" in which the "money tree" of industry is growing. This is primarily an image of protest at exploitation and degradation, but it can also be seen as a wholly natural organic image (for if there is to be a "money tree" there must be "soil" to sustain it). Instead of accepting social realities at face value, Ireland digs for underlying assumptions and implications.

Monotonous conformity is the keynote of Ireland's vision of Australian society. He sees Australians as tame and insipid, bowed in philistine worship to the god of materialism. The Chantic Bird portrays the people of Sydney sitting at home at night, "filling in insurance policies on their fowls, their wrought-iron railings, concrete paths, light globes, their health, funeral expenses, borers, carpets," and so on; The Glass Canoe deals with characters who escape this monotony by drowning their woes in "amber fluid" (beer). A bawdy and violent celebration of life in a Sydney pub, The Glass Canoe portrays the urban drinkers as the last of a colorful "tribe" which preserves values (such as mateship and "macho" brawniness) from Australia's mythic past.

Though the writer of this essay would defend Ireland's earlier novels, most critical opinion favors the works of his "second phase." These recent novels have moved more clearly in the direction of fable, the prose style has become remarkably agile and witty, and the author's earlier concern with specific political issues has broadened into a preoccupation with the inner world of the imagination. The later novels are more mellowed and sensuous without having lost any of their radical analytical edge.

A Woman of the Future is Ireland's first attempt to create a fullscale female character, but-more importantly-it is an attempt to confront Australia's dauntingly masculine national self-image. It deals with the outlook and adventures of an intellectually gifted young female about to take crucial end-of-school exams before venturing upon life in the larger world. By setting the novel some years in the future, Ireland allows himself to extrapolate the effects of current social problems (especially unemployment), but the novel's chief concern is to draw a parallel between the young heroine stepping out into life, and her country—Australia—stepping out into nationhood. Ireland has argued in an interview that "women seem more open [than men] to experience and to new things," and A Woman of the Future attempts to redefine the national consciousness in these terms. But the book is also concerned with female sexuality, and many of its sexual episodes proved controversial (some because they were explicit, some because they addressed female sexuality in allegedly male language).

City of Women pursues these preoccupations, but often by questioning them. Ostensibly, the novel is set in the city of Sydney after all males have been expelled, and tells the story of an aging mother's loneliness after her daughter has joined an engineering project in the heart of the continent. Challenging the premise that women have an outlook different to that of men, Ireland portrays the city of women as being no different from the former city of men. The functions of bully or criminal or whinger are still fulfilled—but by women, not men (which suggests that the basic humanity of the sexes is more important than their differences). However, this judgment in turn is questioned when the novel's ending reveals that the City of Women exists only in the mind of the eccentric central character. Though frequently criticized as a "cop out," this unexpected denouement is an effective means of insisting upon the value of individual viewpoint and perception.

As if having had enough of women, Ireland's most optimistic novel takes a dog as its central character. Archimedes and the Seagle is the memoir of a dog in the city of Sydney ... but it is also a deliberately (and successfully) "upbeat" novel, celebrating the joys of life and the beauties of nature even in the midst of a huge city's urban sprawl. The novel asserts Ireland's optimism about the world, re-affirming his preoccupation with fantasy and individual perception. It is a slight work, but successfully exuberant.

Bloodfather is generally considered to be Ireland's best work to date. A Bildungsroman, presented in the by now familiar fragmentary "mosaic" pattern, it clearly draws deeply upon aspects of Ireland's own experience. The life of young David Blood is traced from infancy to his teenage years, recording the child's evolving perception of his environment, his growing awareness that he needs a God (and that this God will provide him with his life's work). But the book's richness lies not in what it is about but the way it deals with that material; in the words of reviewer Mary Rose Liverani, "The sources of pleasure in Bloodfather are too many to explore in a very brief review: enjoyment of characters who are portrayed with uninhibited affection, exploration of religious, moral and social issues in language that is genuinely fresh and unexpected, and the affirmation of the god-like in mankind and the universe."

—Van Ikin

IRVING, John (Winslow)

Nationality: American. Born: Exeter, New Hampshire, 2 March 1942. Education: Phillips Exeter Academy, Exeter, graduated 1962; University of Pittsburgh 1961-62; University of Vienna, 1963-64; University of New Hampshire, Durham, B.A. (cum laude), 1965; University of Iowa, Iowa City, M.F.A. 1967. Family: Married 1) Shyla Leary in 1964 (divorced 1981), two sons; 2) Janet Turnbull in 1987. Career: Taught at Windham College, Putney, Vermont, 1967–69; lived in Vienna, 1969-71; writer-in-residence, University of Iowa, 1972–75; assistant professor of English, Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Massachusetts, 1975–78. Awards: Rockefeller grant, 1972; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1974; Guggenheim grant, 1976; American Book Award, for paperback, 1980; Academy Award, Best Adapted Screenplay (Cider House Rules), 2000. Agent: Sterling Lord Literistic, 1 Madison Avenue, New York, New York 10010. Address: c/o Random House, Inc., 201 E. 50th Street, New York, New York 10022-7703, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Setting Free the Bears. New York, Random House, 1969; London, Corgi, 1979.

The Water-Method Man. New York, Random House, 1972; London, Corgi, 1980.

The 158-Pound Marriage. New York, Random House, 1974; London, Corgi, 1980.

The World According to Garp. New York, Dutton, and London, Gollancz, 1978.

The Hotel New Hampshire. New York, Dutton, and London, Cape, 1981.

The Cider House Rules. New York, Morrow, and London, Cape, 1985.

- A Prayer for Owen Meany. New York, Morrow, and London, Bloomsbury, 1989.
- A Son of the Circus. New York, Random House, and London, Bloomsbury, 1994.

John Irving: Three Complete Novels (contains Setting Free the Bears; The Water-Method Man; and The 158-Pound Marriage). New York, Wings Books, 1995.

A Widow for One Year. New York, Random House, 1998.

Short Stories

Trying to Save Piggy Snead. London, Bloomsbury, 1993.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "A Winter Branch," in Redbook (New York), November 1965.
- "Weary Kingdom," in Boston Review, Spring-Summer 1968.
- "Almost in Iowa," in The Secret Life of Our Times, edited by Gordon Lish. New York, Doubleday, 1973.
- "Lost in New York," in Esquire (New York), March 1973.
- "Brennbar's Rant," in Playboy (Chicago), December 1974.
- "Students: These Are Your Teachers!," in Esquire (New York), September 1975.
- "Vigilance," in Ploughshares (Cambridge, Massachusetts), no. 4, 1977.
- "Dog in the Alley, Child in the Sky," in Esquire (New York), June 1977.
- "Interior Space," in Fiction (New York), no. 6, 1980.

Plays

Screenplays: The Cider House Rules: A Screenplay. New York, Hyperion, 1999.

Other

My Movie Business: A Memoir. New York, Random House, 1999.

*

Film Adaptations: The World According to Garp, 1982; The Hotel New Hampshire, 1984; Simon Birch, based on the work A Prayer for Owen Meany, 1998; The Cider House Rules, 1999.

Manuscript Collections: Phillips Exeter Academy, Exeter, New Hampshire.

Critical Studies: Introduction by Terrence DuPres to 3 by Irving (omnibus), New York, Random House, 1980; Fowles, Irving, Barthes: Canonical Variations on an Apocryphal Theme by Randolph Runyon, Columbus, Ohio State University Press, 1982; John Irving by Gabriel Miller, New York, Ungar, 1982; Understanding John Irving by Edward C. Reilly, Columbia, South Carolina, University of South Carolina Press, 1991.

Theatrical Activities: Actor: Film—The World According to Garp, 1982.

* * *

The publication of The World According to Garp was an important event in contemporary American literature. For John Irving himself, of course, the novel's reception must have been extremely gratifying: the book neatly divided his career forever into the pre- and post-Garp periods. Initially a little-known academic novelist whose first three books—Setting Free the Bears, The Water-Method Man, and The 158-Pound Marriage—rapidly sought the remainder lists, he suddenly found himself inundated by critical superlatives and, no doubt, positively drenched in money. He achieved that rare combination of literary acclaim and wide readership that every writer dreams of. The success of Garp, following the previous achievement of E.L. Doctorow's Ragtime, indicated that after many years of stifling academicism, fiction may have finally graduated from college and ventured out into the arena of ordinary life. Because many professors seem to believe that literature was written exclusively to be studied in their courses and because far too many writers receive their training in those courses, a great deal of American writing has been marked by a sterile obsession with technique for its own sake, a conscious avoidance of traditional subjects, a fatal attraction to critical theory, and a perverse desire to appeal only to a coterie of initiates.

Irving's works in general, and Garp most spectacularly, signal the return of fiction to its proper and honorable concerns—a close engagement with the stuff of real life, a profound compassion for humanity, and—inextricably and possibly even causally connected to these qualities—great dedication to the narrative process, to storytelling itself. Irving cares deeply for his characters and their stories and makes his readers care for them as well; in doing so he places his work in the great lineage of the novel. Only a bold and innovative writer could venture so daringly backward into the literary past. His three most significant books at this point in his career—The World According to Garp, The Cider House Rules, and A Prayer for Owen Meanyindicate that this late twentieth-century American novelist also participates in the traditions of the nineteenth-century English novel. Long, leisurely narratives, densely populated with eccentrics, attentive to the whole lives of virtually all the characters, replete with coincidence and foreshadowing, full of allusions to specific writers and works, his novels combine a Dickensian richness of character and emotion with a Hardyesque sense of gloom and doom.

In addition to his refreshingly old-fashioned qualities, Irving also demonstrates his appropriateness to his own time and place. His novels are in many ways as contemporary as those of any of his peers. In addition to a growing sense of topicality, most fully realized in A Prayer for Owen Meany, they display all the familiar landmarks of the American literary countryside: violence, grotesquerie, a certain craziness, a racy, energetic style, and a powerful interest in the fictionmaking process. They differ from one another in manner, matter, and merit—The 158-Pound Marriage seems his weakest performance but they also share certain peculiarly Irvingesque subjects that create their special zany charm. Until The Cider House Rules, his books all dealt with such matters as academia, art, children, marital triangles and quadrangles, wrestlers, writers, sexual mutilation, Vienna, and bears. Bears creep through his first book and also show up in the long story "The Pension Grillparzer," that appears in The World According to Garp as well as The Hotel New Hampshire.

The pre-Garp Irving is lively, comic, whimsical, a writer whose works display immense confidence, a kind of assured easiness rare in a young beginner, far beyond the usual condescending cliches about promise. Setting Free the Bears is a revitalized American picaresque improbably set in Austria; the goal of its protagonist's lunatic quest is suggested in its title and works out to be as improbable as its location. The Water-Method Man deals with the sexual escapades, personal failures, and professional problems of a more or less lovable rogue wonderfully named Bogus Trumper; it explores, with rich glee, some fascinating notions about the creation of art from the chaos of Trumper's life, through the medium of avant-garde filmmaking and Trumper's absurd doctoral dissertation.

Whatever the value of his earlier work, however, in retrospect it seems a preliminary for The World According to Garp, which entirely altered Irving's career. The novel is written with enormous energy and strength, clearly the work of writer in full command of his material and his method. Although its style presents no particular problems and its plot moves in a leisurely, straightforward manner, the novel seems radically experimental for its complicated narrative progress. Its ostensibly simple story of the life of T.S. Garp from conception to death is interrupted by a number of other fictions from "The Pension Grillparzer" to a horribly violent account of rape, murder, and despair, Garp's own novel, The World According to Bensenhaver; the book also includes bits from Garp's mother's autobiography, A Sexual Suspect, other short stories, and parts of the biography of Garp that will only be written after his life and the book are over. In an action that must have called for some courage, Irving even includes an epilogue, detailing the lives of his characters after the main events of his major fiction have concluded: once again, in reverting to the methods of the past the author seems daringly innovative.

The actual subjects and events of Garp, just as unusual as its narrative archaism, come to dominate all of Irving's works. Although the novel itself was almost universally regarded as comic and, in Irving's words, "life affirming," it is an immensely sad and troubling book, haunted by violence, savagery, fear, horror, and despair. From beginning to end a bleeding wound gapes across the book: Garp's mother slashes a soldier in a theater; his father dies of a terrible war wound; his wife bites her lover's penis off in the same automobile accident that kills one of Garp's sons and half-blinds the other; and Garp's own novel, The World According to Bensenhaver, employs one of the most vivid rape scenes in all of literature. The relationship between sexuality and mutilation is emphasized through virtually every character-from Roberta Muldoon, the transsexual former football player to the man-hating feminists who cut out their own tongues to commemorate the maining of a rape victim; Garp himself is assassinated by a cult member, the sister of the girl who was responsible for his sexual initiation.

Irving's fascination with sex-related violence and sexual mutilation winds disturbingly through most of his works, from the gang rapes of The Cider House Rules through the hijras—transvestite eunuchs—of India and the transsexual serial murderer Rahul in A Son of the Circus. Along with the bizarre and horrific narratives and the close attention to the character and life of the artist, the theme of sexual mutilation suggests something about the creative act itself. Throughout his works, art is generated out of sex, fear, pain, blood, and guilt; experiencing all these, Irving's artists create their fictions, which also make up a large part of the books about them, sometimes even as in A Son of the Circus, attempting to "write" life as if it were their own narrative. Sex, art, life, and the interpretation of both provide his rich and often puzzling structures, sometimes leading away from their initially simple, comic narrative lines into a region of horror, grotesquerie, insanity, and myth.

The post-Garp Irving, no longer the obscure academic writer, was rapidly transformed into the celebrity author, attentive to sales, publicity, and movie rights. He soon began to appear on the television talk shows, demonstrating his recipe for breaded veal cutlet; dressed in wrestler's togs and flexing his wrestler's muscles, he brooded handsomely in full color for readers of slick magazines. His good looks, his popularity, and his willingness to publicize his books and films earned him a more than literary fame and no doubt a more than literary fortune—his post-Garp works are copyrighted by something called Garp Enterprises Ltd. The Hotel New Hampshire and The Cider House Rules demonstrate the pernicious influence of success. The former continues some of the subjects of its predecessor, boiling over with violence and whimsy—a gang rape, a plane crash, suicide, terrorism, a lesbian in a bear suit, and a flatulent dog named Sorrow. Although the obsessions remain intact, they seem mechanical and perfunctory in style and substance; the laborious drollery and the easy cynicism, along with the specious profundities of the repeated catch phrases and verbal tags, read like warmed-over Vonnegut.

The Cider House Rules, on the other hand, shows that the author can move away from a possibly fatal self-imitation in new directions. Irving discovers for the first time the depths and possibilities of his natural penchant for Dickensian storytelling by inventing a truly Irvingesque place, an orphanage where abortions are performed. Though heavily dependent on the kind of research that hinders so many academic authors, The Cider House Rules recaptures some of the original Garpian compassion. The quirkiness of style and the fascination with genital wounds and sexual pain remain, but they are mixed with less labored touches of lightness and a good deal of love.

The Dickens and the Hardy influences flourish in A Prayer for Owen Meany, his finest work after Garp, which shows the author once again in full command of his considerable gifts and more fully aware of the tradition in which he works. Returning to the autobiographical mode that fuels the energy of Garp, Irving once again reports terrible events in a straightforward, even comic style, invents some remarkable people—especially the title character—and explores some of his favorite subjects. In addition, he more explicitly confronts his repeated theme of problematic paternity and this time attempts to provide reason and causality for what he had previously presented as the horrible mischancing of coincidence and fate; in A Prayer for Owen Meany Irving has found religion, specifically Christianity. He employs a nicely orchestrated set of typically unusual symbols and a variety of people and events to express the religious dimension, which encompasses the primitive and mythic as well as the various Protestant orthodoxies. As a result the book suggests a more energetic but less lapidary and learned John Updike.

The novel, along with the long, rather disordered exploration of India in A Son of the Circus, demonstrates that Irving has challenged himself in new ways: instead of settling for the sort of repetition that pleases far too many readers, he has chosen to break new ground. By contrast, A Widow for One Year marked a return to somewhat familiar territory, constituting a sort of female Garp saga with novelist Ruth Cole as its protagonist.

In a relatively brief time and at a relatively young age, John Irving has become a major contemporary novelist. His considerable body of work displays originality, development, and richness of subject and theme. His startling mixture of humor and sorrow, accessibility and complexity, clarity and confusion, of strong narrative with humane vision, of horrified despair with life-affirming comedy seems perfectly suited to end-of-century culture and literature. The chord he struck in a large and varied public with Garp continues to resonate; his works still appeal to a readership that encompasses many levels of literacy, an indication of their timeliness and power.

-George Grella

ISHIGURO, Kazuo

Nationality: British. Born: Nagasaki, Japan, 8 November 1954. Education: Woking County Grammar School for Boys, Surrey, 1966–73; University of Kent, Canterbury, B.A. (honors) in English and Philosophy 1978; University of East Anglia, Norwich, M.A. in creative writing 1980. Career: Community worker, Renfrew Social Works Department, 1976; social worker, 1979–80, and resettlement worker, West London Cyrenians Ltd., 1979–80. Awards: Winifred Holtby prize, 1983; Whitbread award, 1986; Booker prize 1989; Premio Scanno for Literature (Italy), 1995; Order of the British Empire (O.B.E.), 1995. D.Litt.: University of Kent, 1990; University of East Anglia, 1995. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature. Agent: Deborah Rogers, Rogers Coleridge and White Ltd., 20 Powis Mews, London W11 1JN, England. Address: c/o Faber and Faber, 3 Queen Square, London WC1N 3AU, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Pale View of Hills. London, Faber, and New York, Putnam, 1982.
An Artist of the Floating World. London, Faber, and New York, Putnam, 1986.

The Remains of the Day. London, Faber, and New York, Knopf, 1989. The Unconsoled. New York, Knopf, 1995.

When We Were Orphans. New York, Knopf, 2000.

Uncollected Short Story

"A Family Supper," in The Penguin Book of Modern British Short Stories, edited by Malcolm Bradbury. London, Viking, 1987; New York, Viking, 1988.

Plays

Television Plays: A Profile of Arthur J. Mason, 1984; The Gourmet, 1986.

*

Film Adaptations: Remains of the Day, 1993.

Critical Studies: Understanding Kazuo Ishiguro by Brian W. Shaffer. Columbia, South Carolina, University of South Carolina Press, 1998; Narratives of Memory and Identity: The Novels of Kazuo Ishiguro by Mike Petry. New York, Peter Lang, 1999.

* * *

Kazuo Ishiguro is the author of five novels, and he was awarded the Booker prize in 1989 for his third, The Remains of the Day. It is not surprising that Ishiguro was given this literary accolade so early on in his writing career, as each of these novels is powerfully crafted in the inimitable, meticulously observed manner that has brought much critical and popular acclaim to their author. His more recent novels have been characterized by a formal adventurousness and willingness to experiment that have brought him further acclaim as a stylist and explorer of the possibilities of the novel.

Ishiguro's novels are characterized by the way that the calm expository style and seemingly unimportant concerns of the narrators disguise a world fraught by regrets, unresolved emotional conflicts, and a deep yearning to recapture (and make sense of) the past. In the case of A Pale View of Hills and An Artist of the Floating World, the central figures are, like Ishiguro, Japanese by birth, and their personal desires to excavate the past suggest not only their troubled personal history, but also broader issues concerned with post-war Japanese society.

Ishiguro's first full-length work, A Pale View of Hills, is set in present-day rural England, where Etsuko, a Japanese widow, comes to terms with her elder daughter's recent suicide. The sad event of the present precipitates memories of the past and leads the mother to recall certain aspects of her life in Nagasaki just after the war. In particular, she remembers her friendship with the displaced, independent, and rather cruel Sachiko, a woman once of high rank now living in poverty with her neglected, willful daughter, Mariko. An elegant, elliptical composition, this novel (or perhaps more precisely novella) hints at connections between Etsuko's Nagasaki days and her present-day English existence. Her half-understood relationship with the enigmatic Sachiko and Mariko prefigures her problematic one with her own daughters, while Sachiko's displacement from her class, and eventually her turning away from her race as well, anticipate Etsuko's future anomie.

A striking feature of this confident first novel is the underlying sense of the macabre that pervades Etsuko's memories, particularly in her recollection of the strange, perhaps not entirely imaginary, woman whom young Mariko claims to know, and who appears like a character from a Japanese folk tale. This hinting at sinister possibilities, coupled with the way that Ishiguro with the skill of a miniaturist delicately shapes the story around shifting perspectives and selective memories, marks out A Pale View of Hills as a compelling and intriguing debut work.

While Etsuko's narrative betrays hesitation and uncertainty from the beginning, the narrator of An Artist of the Floating World is a much more robust creation. It is 1948 and Masuji Ono, a painter who has received great renown for his work, some of it decidedly nationalistic in its objectives, reconsiders his past achievements in the light of the present. As with the previous novel, little of consequence seems to happen. Over a number of months, Ono is visited by his two daughters, is involved in marriage negotiations on the part of one of them, re-visits old artist colleagues, drinks in the "Migi-Hidari," and, in a beautifully evoked scene, attends a monster movie with his grandson. However, these seemingly mundane domestic occurrences gradually force the elderly painter to review his past to reveal a complex personal history of public and private duties, professional debts and ambitions, and possible culpability in Japan's recent military past. More obviously than in A Pale View of Hills, the central character is both an individual and a representative figure. Through Ono's re-visiting of his past life, Ishiguro very skillfully describes an artist's training and work conditions before the war, raising much broader questions about artistic and personal responsibility during this contested period in Japan's history.

Ono's "floating world" is "the night-time world of pleasure, entertainment and drink," frequented by fellow artists. The narrators of all Ishiguro's novels seem to inhabit "floating worlds" distinct from the much visited, and joyfully described, pleasure-quarter. For them the old assumptions they held about their lives are under scrutiny, leaving them to try to make sense of the brave new "floating worlds" they inhabit. In The Remains of the Day, Ishiguro examines the changed cultural climate of post-war England through the attempts by Stevens, a "genuine old-fashioned English butler" (in the words of his American employer), to make sense not only of the present but, more acutely, of the past as well. As with the other novels, this tale of self and national discovery is precisely dated. In July 1956 the butler of the late Lord Darlington sets forth on a motoring holiday, accompanied by Volume III of Mrs. Jane Symons's The Wonders of England, to meet Miss Kenton, housekeeper at Darlington Hall during the inter-war years.

In the previous novels, Ishiguro raises questions about the relationship between personal and public morality. In the figure of Stevens, he presents public and domestic behavior as indivisible. Stevens has renounced family ties in order to serve his masters, having given up many years of his life to Darlington. As he sojourns in the West Country, Stevens reconsiders his time in service to the English aristocracy. The Remains of the Day, like the novels with Japanese settings, is distinguished by the skilled use of first-person narration. Here the stiff formality and prim snobbery of the butler's voice are maintained throughout, demonstrating the way that Stevens has renounced his individuality in order to serve well, and creating also some splendid moments of comedy when the events narrated are inappropriately described in such dignified and constrained tones.

In Ishiguro fashion, the "truth" is gradually hinted at through summoning up memories of things passed, and Stevens has to admit that his former master to whom he has devoted a good part of his life was possibly an incompetent amateur diplomat who was manipulated by National Socialists in the 1930s. However, as with the previous novels, the confrontation with an earlier, at times misguided, self offers hope for the future, and the endings of these precisely composed books are gently optimistic, rather than painfully elegiac, celebrating people's capacity for adaptation, understanding, and change.

Ishiguro's 1995 novel The Unconsoled, revisits much of the terrain of memory, regret, and aesthetic culpability that have been the hallmarks of his style. In this stylistically ambitious novel, however, Ishiguro inflects those concerns through a nightmarish dream-space where a Kafka-esque circularity results in a relentlessly anxiety-provoking narrative. The central character, a concert pianist of some renown named Ryder, arrives at an unnamed, vaguely central European town to give a recital. He then proceeds, in a time-frame that is stubbornly indeterminate, to pursue a bewildering number of delays, deferrals, and wild goose-chases, all of which may or may not be related to his own personal history.

The town that Ryder encounters has several fault lines in its social fabric. The most significant involves the civic implications of his performance, which differing factions within the town see as either a vindication or discrediting of an aesthetic conflict that is mapped along vaguely conservative and progressive lines. Ryder's unawareness of the broader ramifications of this performance, along with the continual emergence of new factional strife, produces a vertiginous plot, where encounter after encounter fail to resolve the issue at hand, and instead follow a bewildering line of deferral. Adding to the confusion is the fact that the characters themselves are frequently realized through what Ishiguro calls "appropriation," a technique by which, as in a dream, they appear as refracted manifestations of the narrator or his submerged fears and desires: the child Boris, whom Ryder frequently consoles with an insight that seems unnaturally empathetic; Stephan, an anxiety-ridden young pianist who looks to Ryder for advice on how to please his parents; and the elderly porter Gustav, who has ceased to speak to his daughter Sophie (Boris's mother) as an act of will. Ryder finds himself responsible for the suturing of these various social wounds, which are replayed through the many fractured parent-child relationships whose suffering permeates the novel, and his success or failure is to be measured by some nameless epiphany to be revealed through his endlessly deferred recital.

As in the earlier novels, there is a brooding sense of intergenerational trauma with which the narrator must somehow come to terms. In The Unconsoled, however, that trauma remains disturbingly unresolved. Ryder is unable to reconcile the various splintered relationships—too many to recount—that the narrative mourns throughout. Unlike The Remains of the Day, in which Stevens manages to recover the illusion of redeeming insight by the novel's close, The Unconsoled ends only with Ryder's tortured realization that resolution of the conflicts that have beset him throughout the novel—both personal and social—will evade him as surely as the recital that is the ostensible reason for his presence in the town. Ultimately, the hallucinatory style of the plot colludes so insidiously with Ryder's personal dream-world that the consolation of an ending where fragments are resolved in some measure is denied the reader as well.

When We Were Orphans proves a fitting stylistic continuance to The Unconsoled. Again, the territory is that of memory and nostalgia, and the failure of generational inheritance to relieve a painfully revisited nostalgia. Christopher Banks, the narrator and protagonist of the novel, is a well-known detective in pre-war England who is haunted by the disappearance of his parents in Shanghai years earlier. In 1937 he sets off to Shanghai to solve the mystery of their vanishing, and in so doing is forced to come to terms with the shady business practices not only of his father but of the colonial community as a whole. While the denouement may clarify some of the mystery, as in all of Ishiguro's novels there is much going on beneath the limpid prose of the narrative.

The undercurrents in the novel are again history—personal and public—as well as the troubling instability of memory in the face of trauma. Banks's failed relationship with fellow orphan Sarah Hemmings, as well as his childhood friendship with the Japanese boy Akira, emerge as part of a doubled time-line that triggers his recollections. While Banks as a narrator seems disarmingly disingenuous, upon closer reflection significant discrepancies begin to appear between his memories and the reported reactions of those around him. The resulting instability is a familiar one to the attentive reader of Ishiguro's fiction: the truth, as usual, is not the sole province of the narrator or memory, and resides instead in a more nebulous space where history and memory—trauma and wound—are indivisible from their informants.

--- Anna-Marie Taylor, updated by Tom Penner

IYAYI, Festus

Nationality: Nigerian. Born: 1947. Educated in Nigeria; University of Bradford, Yorkshire, Ph.D. 1980. Career: Economic correspondent for several newspapers in Bendel; industrial training officer, Bendel State University, Ekpoma. Currently lecturer in business administration, University of Benin, Benin City. Awards: Association of Nigerian Authors prize, 1987; Commonwealth Writers prize, 1988. Address: Department of Business Administration, University of Benin, PMB 1154, Ugbowo Campus, Benin City, Nigeria.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Violence. London, Longman, 1979. The Contract. London, Longman, 1982. Heroes. London, Longman, 1986.

Short Stories

Awaiting Court Martial. Lagos, Malthouse Press, 1996.

* * *

"... those who carry the cross for society always get crucified in the end ..."

Heroes

Festus Iyayi's three novels, Violence, The Contract, and Heroes, as well as his collection of short stories, Awaiting Court Martial, expose the abject penury and disenfranchisement that constitute the social reality of the majority of Nigerians. In language that is often vitriolic and stinging, Iyayi's protagonists potently display his contempt for the rampant corruption that strangles contemporary Nigeria. Businesspersons, politicians, generals, and other officials hoard the country's wealth and power at the expense of the working class. This base depravity of the ruling class manifests itself in various forms and ultimately trickles down to the ruled class. In each of Iyayi's novels the real tragedy is that those of the ruled class are either forced or coerced to absorb their oppressor's abuse. They in turn release their anger and frustration not upon the deserving ruling class, but amongst themselves. Iyayi, however, does weave threads of hope within each of his narratives via truculent calls by the main characters to defy their oppressors en masse and fight for their civil rights as well as for the future of their country. Also driving Iyayi's political critique is a profound acceptance of humanity's fragility and frailty. Especially in Awaiting Court Martial, Iyayi displays an uncanny ability for capturing the details of his character's troubled psyches through crisp metaphors and often naturalistic imagery.

Violence usually connotes physical abuse, but in his first novel, Violence, Iyayi redefines it as a continual, demoralizing structure that eliminates hope, pride, self-esteem, health, and the ability to live independently. Having to always rely on borrowed naira from those who are more fortunate leaves deep scars of shame and guilt. Iyayi's violence creeps into the corners of the pneuma of the lower classes, the have-nots, and renders them helpless against the socio-political machine powered solely by money, corruption, and privilege.

Obofun and Queen exemplify Nigeria's corrupt, monied class. Obofun makes his millions by winning coveted building contracts through his connections in the government and through the relinquishing of percentages of the contracts' total worth to those who award them. His wife, Queen, sleeps with other men to get what she wants—namely, supplies, which are otherwise expensive and scarce, for her hotels. When Idemudia, a typical, destitute laborer, is fortunate enough to find work, the conditions at the site are deplorable. If he wants to keep his job and be able to feed himself and his wife, Adisa, then he has to swallow the maltreatment. If he chooses to fight the system, to organize the workers against his boss, Queen, and to ask for higher wages and better conditions, then he risks being fired and subsequent starvation.

One of the most effective passages in Violence is a series of lines from a play performed at a local hospital. Iyayi utilizes this poignant and very effective device to convey his definition of violence. Idemudia witnesses this play is educated and inspired by the actor who denounces violence and advocates resistance, and then leads his co-workers in threatening to strike for better wages and conditions.

Iyayi's writing continues to be mordacious and gripping in his second novel, The Contract. The main character, Ogie, returns to Benin after an absence of four years and is amazed and disgusted at how quickly and completely the city has decayed. There is filth and chaos everywhere. He learns that the government awards contracts for building hospitals, roads, and low-cost housing, then demands percentages for awarding the contract. This practice leaves little or no money for building the structures the contract was for—resulting in inferior and often-abandoned projects. The people of Benin live in squalor while a few wealthy, corrupt officials get fatter. Anything can be bought or sold. Men will even offer their wives for a favored chance at winning a contract, or lie, cheat, and even kill for fortunes. Like Idemudia in Violence, Ogie's abomination of the stark contrasts of wealth and poverty in his hometown is potently conveyed. He swears he will fight the system of which even his father is a part. He takes a job at the council and soon finds himself tortuously torn and confused over right and wrong. He continues to reaffirm decent convictions, but eventually compromises his values to become "corruption with a human face." He decides he cannot beat the system entirely, but can take the money he receives from the contract percentages and invest it in Benin and local businesses, rather than hoard it in a Swiss bank account.

Heroes, Iyayi's third novel, is set against the background of Nigeria's civil war in the late 1960s. As in his previous work, Iyayi's style is forceful and bold. Once again, he cries out against the injustices in Nigeria through well-crafted characters and electrifying writing.

Osime is a journalist who supports the vociferous calls for a united Nigeria and those denouncing the Biafran soldiers and exalting the Federal troops. He sees the Federal troops as the saving force for Nigeria. But when the Federal troops shoot and kill his girlfriend's father without cause in cold blood, he begins to realize that there is more to the war than he had originally thought. Osime quickly sees that even though the Biafran and Federal troops commit wretched crimes, the generals and the officers are the real enemies of the people of Nigeria. The soldiers have learned to become murderers from the military's officers—they are merely instruments of destruction under the orders of officers who seek power, territory, and fortune. In its critique of the generals and military power, therefore, the novel offers a useful analogy for unveiling the hypocrisy and self-interest that lie hidden behind bourgeoisie ideology. Osime's solution is the formation of a third army—one that fights the greedy politicians, businesspersons, and generals. A total revolution, powered by the third army, could eliminate the corrupt officials reigning at the top of all sectors of Nigerian society and replace it with rule by those who love the land, work the land, and therefore respect it and its inhabitants.

Iyayi's criticism of Nigerian society is relentless in all three novels, but even among the dire revelations and depressing reality of the polarities of privation and opulence in Nigeria, he offers an encouraging creed for social change: "A people are never conquered. Defeated, yes, but never conquered." And some of the more striking moments of defeat are explored in Awaiting Court Martial.

The collection's fifteen stories create a gallery of tortured souls, poignantly imagined and rendered visibly luminous by Iyayi's piercing psychological descriptions. As in the novels, the main character's crisis, no matter how unique or personal, often reflects the political chaos and social disintegration of the nation at large. For example, the opening story, "Jeged's Madness," is about a mutually destructive marriage that ruinously ends when a rich bureaucrat, Mr. Throttle Cheat-Away, offers the husband advancements only so that he can rape the wife. The title story, "Awaiting Court Martial," is a dreamlike, first-person confession made by a once-efficient executioner of the state. The doomed soldier did not give the order to shoot his latest victim, his brother, who came boisterously laughing to his own execution. The brother's laughter disarms and ridicules the effectiveness of the mass execution, transforming the marksmen into boys simply "spitting at the sun." Uniting the stories are themes also prevalent in Iyayi's novels: political corruption, interpersonal cruelty, the nightmarish threats of kidnapping, murder, home invasion, or robberies, psychological obsessions, the power of dreams and folk values, and the political responsibility of the artist-intellectual—a few of the narrators seem to be Iyayi himself.

Current literary criticism of Iyayi's works has focused on the validity of postcolonial theories when applied to Iyayi and other non-exile writers (Femi Osofisan), and the aesthetic intertwining of radical narrative techniques with radical politics (Fírinne Nì Chréachàin); but perhaps the most popular treatment of Iyayi deals mainly with his exemplification of characteristics commonly associated with Chinua Achebe and other renowned authors of the Nigerian canon as it is articulated by and for Western readers (John Bolland).

—Susie deVille, updated by Michael A. Chaney

J

JACKSON, Mick

Nationality: English. Born: Great Harwood, Lancashire, England, 1959 or 1960. Education: Graduated in Theatre Studies from Dartington College of Arts; University of East Anglia, M.A. 1992. Career: Founder and singer-songwriter for band, variously called The Screaming Abdabs and The Dinner Ladies, 1980s. Agent: Derek Johns, 20 John Street, London WC1N 2DR, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Underground Man. New York, William Morrow, 1997.

Other

Rock the World (muscial recording, with others). New York, Select Records, 1985.

* * *

In 1997 Mick Jackson's debut novel, The Underground Man, was short-listed for both the popular Whitbread Best First Novel award, and the internationally coveted Booker McConnell prize. While it won neither, it nevertheless garnered much praise for the inventive treatment of its subject, the real life fifth Duke of Portland, William John Cavendish-Bentinck-Scott. The Duke, a reclusive eccentric, is as much remembered for the extensive network of tunnels he constructed under his estate as for the popular myths his peculiarities inspired. Combining the factual record with the public and authorial imagination, Jackson created a narrative that weaves through the mind and journals of the Duke and the thoughts of those who encounter him. The tunnels themselves serve as the unifying motif of the novel, providing a parallel to the internal burrowing of the Duke as he retreats further into himself, finally severing his already tenuous connection with the outside world and the human contact that governs it. In the character of the elderly Duke, Jackson explores a mind unsuited for the everyday world, lacking the ability to discriminate between ideas, and betrayed by the aging body that contains it. Even in the face of this betrayal, the Duke attempts to maintain control over both the physical property of the body, and the physical property of the estate—the logical extension of the self for a titled property owner—and it is his failure to recognize his own limitations in both that brings the novel to its startling conclusion.

Not merely imaginative historical fiction, The Underground Man signals a contemporary tendency to mine the past for the purposes of considering contemporary preoccupations with the individual, the relationship between the self and other, and the possibilities and limits of both humanity and the human intellect. That Jackson bestows upon the Duke a childlike innocence, curiosity, and enthusiasm, however, provides both humor and pathos to the novel, and ensures that its theoretical preoccupations never alienate the reader or disrupt the trajectory of the story itself.

Ultimately, the narrative of The Underground Man is very much an act of story telling, and Jackson himself is not unqualified as a storyteller. Trained as an actor at the Dartington College of Arts (1983), Jackson has written and directed several short films. Previously he also wrote lyrics for a number of bands with which he performed at the Glastonbury and Reading rock festivals: Dancing with the Dog, The Screaming Abdabs, and The Dinner Ladies. When his bandmates complained that his lyrics were becoming unwieldy, Jackson moved to poetry, and then short story writing. In 1991, with only a few short stories to his credit, Jackson was accepted into the prestigious University of East Anglia (Norwich) Creative Writing M.A. program. The program's literary pedigree is impeccable, and it boasts an impressive list of alumni, including Andrew Cowan, Kazuo Ishiguro, Deirdre Madden, Ian McEwan, and Rose Tremain. Today Jackson has joined UEA's list of successful and recognized graduates.

-Jennifer Harris

JACOBSON, Dan

Nationality: British. Born: Johannesburg, South Africa, 7 March 1929. Education: The University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, 1946–49, B.A. 1949. Family: Married Margaret Pye in 1954; three sons and one daughter. Career: Public relations assistant, South African Jewish Board of Deputies, Johannesburg, 1951-52; correspondence secretary, Mills and Feeds Ltd., Kimberley, South Africa, 1952–54. Fellow in Creative Writing, Stanford University, California, 1956–57; visiting professor, Syracuse University, New York, 1965-66; visiting fellow, State University of New York, Buffalo, 1971, and Australian National University, Canberra, 1980; lecturer, 1976–80, reader, 1980–88, professor of English, 1988–94, University College, London. Since 1994, professor emeritus, University College, London. Vice-chair of the Literature Panel, Arts Council of Great Britain, 1974-76. Awards: Rhys Memorial prize, 1959; Maugham award, 1964; H.H. Wingate award (Jewish Chronicle, London), 1978; Society of Authors traveling scholarship, 1986; J.R. Ackerley award, for autobiography, 1986. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1974. D.Litt., University of Witwatersrand, 1997. Agent: A.M. Heath, 79 St. Martin's Lane, London WC2N 4AA, England; or, Russell and Volkening Inc., 50 West 29th Street, New York, New York 10001, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Trap. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Harcourt Brace, 1955.

A Dance in the Sun. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Harcourt Brace, 1956.

The Price of Diamonds. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1957; New York, Knopf, 1958.

The Evidence of Love. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and Boston, Little Brown, 1960.

The Beginners. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Macmillan, 1966.

The Rape of Tamar. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Macmillan, 1970.

The Wonder-Worker. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1973; Boston, Little Brown, 1974.

The Confessions of Josef Baisz. London, Secker and Warburg, 1977; New York, Harper, 1979.

Her Story. London, Deutsch, 1987.

Hidden in the Heart. London, Bloomsbury, 1991.

The God-Fearer. London, Bloomsbury, 1992; New York, Scribner, 1993.

Short Stories

A Long Way from London. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1958. The Zulu and the Zeide. Boston, Little Brown, 1959.

Beggar My Neighbour. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1964.

Through the Wilderness. New York, Macmillan, 1968.

Penguin Modern Stories 6, with others. London, Penguin, 1970.

A Way of Life and Other Stories, edited by Alix Pirani. London, Longman, 1971.

Inklings: Selected Stories. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1973; as Through the Wilderness, London, Penguin, 1977.

Plays

Radio Plays: The Caves of Adullan, 1972.

Other

No Further West: California Visited. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1959; New York, Macmillan, 1961.

Time of Arrival and Other Essays. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Macmillan, 1963.

The Story of the Stories: The Chosen People and Its God. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Harper, 1982.

Time and Time Again: Autobiographies. London, Deutsch, and Boston, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1985.

Adult Pleasures: Essays on Writers and Readers. London, Deutsch, 1988

The Electronic Elephant: A Southern Africa Journey. London, Hamilton, 1994.

Heshel's Kingdom (memoir). Evanston, Illinois, Northwestern University Press, 1999.

Editor, with Daniel Bar-Tal and Aharon Klieman, Security Concerns: Insights from the Israeli Experience. Stamford, Connecticut, JAI Press, 1998.

*

Bibliographies: Dan Jacobson: A Bibliography by Myra Yudelman, Johannesburg, University of the Witwatersrand, 1967.

Manuscript Collections: National English Literary Museum, Grahamstown, South Africa; University of Texas, Austin.

Critical Studies: "The Novels of Dan Jacobson" by Renee Winegarten, in Midstream (New York), May 1966; "Novelist of South Africa," in The Liberated Woman and Other Americans by Midge Decter, New York, Coward McCann, 1971; "The Gift of Metamorphosis' by Pearl K. Bell, in New Leader (New York), April 1974; "Apollo, Dionysus, and Other Performers in Dan Jacobson's Circus," in World Literature Written in English (Arlington, Texas), April 1974, and "Jacobson's Realism Revisited," in Southern African Review of Books, October 1988, both by Michael Wade; "A Somewhere Place" by C.J. Driver, in New Review (London), October 1977; Dan Jacobson by Sheila Roberts, Boston, Twayne, 1984; "Stories" by John Bayley, in London Review of Books, October 1987; "Intolerance" by Julian Symons, in London Review of Books, October 1992; "The Mother's Space" by Sheila Roberts, in Current Writing (South Africa) 5(1), 1993; "Weapons of Vicissitude" by Richard Lansdown, in The Critical Review (Australia) 34, 1994.

Dan Jacobson comments:

My novels and stories up to and including The Beginners were naturalistic in manner and were written almost entirely about life in South Africa. This is not true of the novels I have written subsequently.

* * *

Dan Jacobson's first two novels, The Trap and A Dance in the Sun, marked him as a writer of considerable ability, with an interest in typically South African "problems." Since then, he has developed rapidly to become one of South Africa's best known and most interesting novelists.

The two early novels are both concerned with the tensions inherent in the extremely close, almost familial, relationships between white employer and black employee, which tend to develop in the particular kind of farm community Jacobson describes. Both embody what might be described as allegorical statements about the South African situation. Jacobson implies that the inhabitants of the country are trapped in their own environment and condemned to perform a ritualistic "dance in the sun." To an outsider this can only appear to be a form of insanity. This vision of South Africa leaves out of account, or, at best, finds irrelevant, the group (English speaking, liberal, white) to which Jacobson himself belongs, and it is, therefore, not surprising that he should have chosen to live and work abroad.

For some years, however, his novels continued to deal with South African subjects. The Evidence of Love tells the story of a black man and a white woman who fall in love and attempt to defy South African law and custom by living together. The novel treats the theme of interracial love in a more relaxed and naturalistic way than is usual in South African fiction, and also highlights aspects of the individual struggle for freedom and the achievement of self-identity. The Price of Diamonds focuses on shady dealings and financial corruption in a small town in South Africa, and reveals Jacobson's quite considerable gift for comedy.

The Beginners, which, together with the collection of stories A Long Way from London, established Jacobson's position as a writer of stature, is an ambitious and substantial novel. The story of three generations of an immigrant Jewish family, it offers a penetrating, subtle, and complex analysis of what it means to be a "demi-European at the foot of Africa" and a "demi-Jew" in the modern world. The novels which follow The Beginners are not concerned with South Africa directly, nor are they naturalistic in manner. But two of the three later novels deal with political tensions and power struggles, and in so doing appear to have deliberate parallels with the contemporary situation in South Africa. Jacobson's continuing interest in South Africa is also reflected in his collection of autobiographical pieces, Time and Time Again, in which he reflects, among other things, on the way in which his perceptions of the country have changed since the days when he could see it only as a place from which he had to escape.

The Rape of Tamar is a witty and sophisticated reconstruction of an episode at the court of the biblical King David, focusing on a power struggle between the aging king and his politically ambitious sons. The Wonder-Worker, set in contemporary London, explores the world of a sensitive and lonely character whose inability to establish meaningful relationships leads inevitably to his complete alienation from the world around him, but, paradoxically, also to his ability to understand people completely. Jacobson's novel, The Confessions of Joseph Baisz, is a brilliantly inventive and deeply disturbing fantasy: the "extraordinary autobiography" of an emotionally stunted individual who discovers very early in his bleak life that he is capable of loving only those people whom he has first betrayed. Set in an imaginary country with a nightmarish but distinctly recognizable resemblance to South Africa, the novel is wholly convincing in its portrayal of a society whose members illustrate what Baisz calls "the iron law: the wider their horizons, the narrower their minds."

Like other contemporary South African novelists, Jacobson has written some excellent short stories. Many of them probe the guilts and fears of white South Africans living in the midst of what they regard as an alien and hostile black culture. Two stories that are among the best things he has done are "The Zulu and the Zeide" and "Beggar My Neighbour." The former contrasts the small-minded meanness of a wealthy Jewish businessman with the unaffected humanity of the black servant he employs to care for his ailing father; while "Beggar My Neighbour" movingly evokes the world of a young white boy forced to come to terms with the cruel realities of a racist society through his chance meeting with two black children. In these stories, as in all his work, Jacobson's special skills are displayed: detailed observation, economic presentation, and a compassionate but objective analysis of the varieties of human behavior.

Jacobson showed his imaginative talent to good advantage in The God-Fearer, a novel that takes place in a sort of alternate reality. Set in an indeterminate period that might well be medieval times, the novel gradually unfolds its secret: in this world, Jews are the culturally dominant group in Western civilization, and the "Christers" are a persecuted minority. It is a challenging vision, deftly executed.

—Ursula Edmands

JACOBSON, Howard

Nationality: British. Born: Manchester, 25 August 1942. Education: Stand Grammar School, 1953–60; Downing College, Cambridge, 1961–64, B.A. in English 1964. Family: Married Rosalin Sadler in 1978; one son from a previous marriage. Career: Lecturer, University of Sydney, New South Wales, 1965–68; supervisor, Selwyn College, Cambridge, 1969–72; senior lecturer, Wolverhampton Polytechnic, West Midlands, 1974–80. Presenter, Traveller's Tales television series, 1991; currently freelance book reviewer, the Independent, London. Agent: Peters Fraser and Dunlop, 503–504 The Chambers, Chelsea Harbour, Lots Road, London SW10 0XF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Coming from Behind. London, Chatto and Windus, 1983; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1984.

Peeping Tom. London, Chatto and Windus, 1984; New York, Ticknor and Fields. 1985.

Redback. London, Bantam Press, 1986; New York, Viking, 1987.
The Very Model of a Man. London, Viking, 1992; New York, Overlook Press, 1994.

No More Mister Nice Guy. London, Jonathan Cape, 1998. The Mighty Walzer. London, Jonathan Cape, 1999.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Travelling Elsewhere," in Best Short Stories 1989, edited by Giles Gordon and David Hughes. London, Heinemann, 1989; as The Best English Short Stories 1989, New York, Norton, 1989.

Other

Shakespeare's Magnanimity: Four Tragic Heroes, Their Friends and Families, with Wilbur Sanders. London, Chatto and Windus, and New York, Oxford University Press, 1978.

In the Land of Oz (travel). London, Hamish Hamilton, 1987.Roots Schmoots: Journeys Among Jews. London, Viking, 1993; New York, Overlook, 1994.

*

Howard Jacobson comments:

It is an irony not lost on novelists that though they inveigh against all characterizations of their work in reviews, in profiles, and even on the covers of their own books, the moment they are invited to describe themselves, they say they would rather not.

I too, would rather not. Except to say that an argument about the nature of comedy—an argument I go on having largely with myself—is at the back of everything I write. The familiar formula, that comedy stops where tragedy begins, is unsatisfactory to me. The best comedy, I maintain, deals in truths which tragedy, with its consoling glimpses of human greatness, cannot bear to face. Comedy begins where tragedy loses its nerve. That's the sort of comedy I try to write, anyway.

* * *

"You know what novelists are like—they spill their guts on every page and claim it's plot." So Barney Fugelman is told by his second wife Camilla in Howard Jacobson's second novel, Peeping Tom. That fiction writers must draw on their own experience in order to give their work a ring of truth is something of a truism, but Jacobson's easy familiarity with Lancashire, Wolverhampton, Cambridge, Cornwall, and Australia, and his sharply observed portrayals of academic life and the urban Jewish psyche give his bawdy, scatological books a piquant verisimilitude. The themes that pervade his novels—ideological duplicity, cultural self-consciousness, sexual ambivalence, and gnawing self-doubt—could make some readers uncomfortable as they recognize themselves within his glass, were it not for the verve and aplomb of the humor with which they are relayed. And although Jacobson's protagonists often share the same individual afflictions and obsessions—identity crises, failed relationships, self-conscious Judaism, robustly masculine sexual preoccupations—and inhabit similar milieux (characters occasionally put in appearances in one another's novels), the underlying issues have universal appeal and are dealt with in a way which is simultaneously reassuring and thought-provoking.

Sefton Goldberg, the subject of Jacobson's first novel and only third-person narrative, Coming from Behind, is a man with a great future behind him. Manchester born, Cambridge educated and now doomed to ignominy in his post at a Midlands polytechnic which is in the throes of merging with the local football club, he spends his days applying unsuccessfully for every available academic post and skirmishing with colleagues. He is jealously obsessed with the success of these colleagues' publications while he himself, as yet unpublished, plans to write a tome on failure, which trait in himself is another obsession. Doggedly leading the lifestyle of a transient visitor, his condition is aggravated by his refusal to make the best of his situation and environment. He is finally granted an interview for a post in Cambridge, only to discover that he is to be in competition with, and interviewed by, his former students. The result is a success which is so thoroughly compromised on all sides that it is practically a Pyrrhic victory: a success achieved through a failure to fail consummately.

In Jacobson's most ribald book, Peeping Tom, Barney Fugelman discovers under hypnosis that he is somehow reincarnated from (or possibly related to) Thomas Hardy and, it transpires, the Marquis de Sade. Incest, voyeurism, troilism, and autoerotic hanging all feature in the plot as the sexual predilections of the narrator's alteregos manifest themselves through him, helping to precipitate his downfall and the ruin of his two marriages. What is being examined is the confusion of sexual and personal identities: Barney has two unwanted guests in his psyche and cannot tell if he is loved for himself, for Hardy, or for de Sade. Nor is it made easy for him to get a purchase on his real self in terms of his psychological make-up or his personal history. His parents swap spouses with their neighbors and so, compounded by his mother's intimations and revelations, Barney is never sure of his true relationship to Rabika Flatman, his father's paramour and the object of his own erstwhile voyeuristic fantasies. The discovery that Mr. Flatman is in fact his real father merely completes the symmetry, it is the resolution of the comic mechanism.

Redback is remarkable not least of all because the logistics of the plot neatly mirror Clive James's semi-autobiographical trilogy, Unreliable Memoirs. But James—himself namechecked within—tells a vastly different story to that of Leon Forelock, who leaves Cambridge with a degree in Moral Decencies and is assigned by the CIA to purge Australia of its non-conformist elements. Castigating homosexuals, drug-takers, and anyone voicing an opinion remotely left of the farright, he censors and bans his way through university campuses and bookstalls. But Leon practices much of what he preaches against and relishes the privileges of the Englishman abroad while setting obscure questions on Langland's Piers Plowman as a test for prospective immigrants. The narrative is informed, however, by Forelock's epiphanic conversion, the occasion of which is a bite inflicted by the venomous redback spider of the title. Given a new outlook on humanity, doomed to suffer a myriad of recurring symptoms which include priapism, and kept under surveillance by his former employers, Leon overtly embraces all that is radical and bohemian in the world. His priapism is a metaphor for the contradictions of his moral condition: the rampant impotence of his own self.

The protagonist of The Very Model of a Man is no less than Cain himself, who bemoans a series of misfortunes that pepper his long life, from his parents' unfortunate decision in the Garden to the Tower of Babel. Jacobson's work has been compared to that of Kingsley Amis, Malcolm Bradbury, and David Lodge and rightly so, for he exhibits many themes, nuances, and preoccupations in common with them. Certain elements of his work do lack finesse: tendencies toward stereotypical characters and meandering narrative are apparent on occasions, as is what some might claim to be an unhealthy dwelling on all things phallic. Nonetheless, his characters evoke pathos even in their more grotesque or puerile moments, his plots are thoughtful and rounded, and his wit is dry and infectious. After less than a decade spent writing in his chosen genre, Jacobson seems set to become a major force in English comic fiction.

-Liam O'Brien

JAMES, Kelvin Christopher

Nationality: Trinidadian (immigrated to United States, U.S. citizenship pending). Born: Port of Spain, Trinidad. Education: University of West Indies (St. Augustine), B.S. (honors) in zoology and chemistry 1967; Columbia University, New York, M.A. in 1975, M.Sc. in education 1976, and doctorate in science education, 1978. Career: Science researcher, Department of Agriculture, Trinidad, 1961–64; high school science teacher, Trinidad, 1968–70; technologist in chemistry lab, Harlem Hospital, 1970–76. Since 1980, full-time writer. Awards: New York Foundation for the Arts award, 1989. Agent: Joy Harris, 156 Fifth Ave., Suite 617, New York, New York 10010, U.S.A. Address: 1295 Fifth Ave., New York, New York 10029, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Secrets. New York, Random House, 1993. A Fling with a Demon Lover. New York, HarperCollins, 1996.

Short Stories

Jumping Ship and Other Stories. New York, Random House, 1992.

* * *

Trinidadian writer Kelvin Christopher James began writing fulltime in 1980. Prior to that he taught high school science in Sangre Grande before emigrating to New York, where he worked as a lab technician at Harlem Hospital Center and eventually earned a Ph.D. in science education from Teachers College, Columbia University. His background in zoology contributes richly to the lush, sensual landscapes in both of his works.

In his debut collection of short stories—Jumping Ship and Other Stories—James paints a bold canvas of savage sexuality, physical and mental incarceration, and bloody revenge. The first five stories are set in the Caribbean, followed by two transitional tales of immigrants making the difficult adjustment to a new country. The remaining stories take place in a hard-edged, gritty Harlem. At a first glance, the collection appears desultory in theme. But a closer look reveals an intriguing evocation of ritual that is a unifying thread through most of the stories—in the intense games of sibling rivalry in "Littleness"; in the rote cruelties of the street in "Guppies"; in the inscrutable circumstances of an Obeah voodoo ceremony in "Tripping." These rituals, both terrifying and essential, bring into sharp relief the visceral quality of life for many of the characters.

The descriptive language of the stories is potent and visual, if occasionally self-conscious. At times, the violence of the Harlem tales seems to be gratuitous, and one wishes for a little more narrative cohesion to lend them some purposefulness. Still, the author is quite effective with a story like "Home Is the Heart," in which a father severs the bonds of his youth in order to form a stronger alliance with his son.

In James's second work, the novel Secrets, he seems more at ease and in his natural element. Here the author uses idiomatic language and natural description to good effect: The fecund earth—the ripening fruit and buzzing flies of island life—mirror a young girl's sexual coming-of-age. And as with most mythopoeic tales, the prosaic becomes profound. An expedition in search of balata, an elusive, pulpy fruit that nests high in the trees, transcends the commonplace to become a virtual odyssey.

The story is told from the viewpoint of Uxann, a plump, bookish Catholic schoolgirl, who steals mangoes from her neighbor, cooks mouthwatering meals for her Paps, and gossips mercilessly with best friend Keah. The author captures convincingly the easy rhythms and musings of a typically self-absorbed adolescent, and from the opening sentences he thrusts the reader into her almost excessively sensual, dangerously naive world. But soon the novel and Uxann's life take on the character of a folktale, with the discovery of a snake in her island's Garden of Eden. Uxann's journey becomes at once universal and disturbingly out of the ordinary. The author is commended for retelling an age-old story in such an imaginative way and for capturing a young girl's sexual odyssey with candor and insight.

In both these works, James unearths the darker forces that lie in wait beneath the surface, whether they be in a tropical jungle or an asphalt one.

-Lynda Schrecengost

JAMES, P(hyllis) D(orothy)

Nationality: British. Born: Oxford, 3 August 1920. Education: Cambridge Girls' High School, 1931–37. During World War II worked as a Red Cross nurse and at the Ministry of Food. Family: Married Ernest Connor Bantry White in 1941 (died 1964); two daughters. Career: Prior to World War II, assistant stage manager, Festival Theatre, Cambridge; principal administrative assistant, North West Regional Hospital Board, London, 1949–68; principal, Home Office, in police department, 1968–72, and criminal policy department, 1972–79. Justice of the Peace, Willesden, London, 1979–82, and Inner London, 1984. Chair, Society of Authors, 1984–86; governor, BBC, and board of the British Council, 1988–93; chair, Arts Council Literature Advisory Panel, 1989–92. Lives in London. Awards: Crime Writers Association award, 1967, Silver Dagger award, 1971, 1975, 1986, Diamond Dagger award, 1987; Grand Master, Edgar Allan Poe Awards, 1999. D.Litt.: Buckingham, 1992; London, 1993; Hertfordshire, 1994; Glasgow, 1995; Essex, 1996; Durham, 1998; Portsmouth, 1999. Associate Fellow, Downing College, Cambridge, 1986; Fellow, Institute of Hospital Administrators, Royal Society of Literature, 1987, and Royal Society of Arts; honorary fellow, St. Hilda's College, Oxford, 1996. O.B.E. (Order of the British Empire), 1983. Baroness, 1991. Agent: Greene & Heaton, Ltd., 37 Goldhawk Road, London W12 8QQ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Cover Her Face. London, Faber, 1962; New York, Scribner, 1966.A Mind to Murder. London, Faber, 1963; New York, Scribner, 1967.Unnatural Causes. London, Faber, and New York, Scribner, 1967.Shroud for a Nightingale. London, Faber, and New York, Scribner, 1971.

An Unsuitable Job for a Woman. London, Faber, 1972; New York, Scribner, 1973.

The Black Tower. London, Faber, and New York, Scribner, 1975.Death of an Expert Witness. London, Faber, and New York, Scribner, 1977.

Innocent Blood. London, Faber, and New York, Scribner, 1980.
The Skull Beneath the Skin. London, Faber, and New York, Scribner, 1982.

A Taste for Death. London, Faber, and New York, Knopf, 1986. Devices and Desires. London, Faber, 1989; New York, Knopf, 1990. The Children of Men. London, Faber, 1992; New York, Knopf, 1993. Original Sin. London, Faber, 1994; New York, Knopf, 1995. A Certain Justice. New York, Knopf, 1997.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Moment of Power," in Ellery Queen's Murder Menu. Cleveland, World, 1969.
- "The Victim," in Winter's Crimes 5, edited by Virginia Whitaker. London, Macmillan, 1973.
- "Murder, 1986," in Ellery Queen's Masters of Mystery. New York, Davis, 1975.
- "A Very Desirable Residence," in Winter's Crimes 8, edited by Hilary Watson. London, Macmillan, 1976.
- "Great-Aunt Ellie's Flypapers," in Verdict of Thirteen, edited by Julian Symons. London, Faber, and New York, Harper, 1979.
- "The Girl Who Loved Graveyards," in Winter's Crimes 15, edited by George Hardinge. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press. 1983.
- "Memories Don't Die," in Redbook (New York), July 1984.
- "The Murder of Santa Claus," in Great Detectives, edited by D.W. McCullough. New York, Pantheon, 1984.
- "The Mistletoe Murder," in The Spectator (London), 1991.
- "The Man Who Was 80," in The Man Who. London, Macmillan, 1992.

Plays

A Private Treason (produced Watford, Hertfordshire, 1985).

Other

The Maul and the Pear Tree: The Ratcliffe Highway Murders, 1811, with Thomas A. Critchley. London, Constable, 1971; New York, Mysterious Press, 1986.

Time to Be in Earnest: A Fragment of Autobiography. New York, Knopf, 2000.

*

Critical Studies: P.D. James by Norma Siebenheller, New York, Ungar, 1981; P.D. James by Richard B. Gidez, Boston, Hall, 1986.

* * *

Starting from a conventional first detective story, Cover Her Face, P.D. James has moved toward fiction in which criminal investigation provides merely a loose structure for characterization, atmosphere, and theme, which now seem most important to her. In this assault on generic boundaries, she resembles, but is more determined than, Dorothy L. Sayers, Josephine Tey, and Ngaio Marsh. Consequently, James's detectives—Cordelia Gray (private and young) and Adam Dalgliesh (professional and middle-aging)—have been absent from or muted in recent works.

Commander Dalgliesh resembles other detectives created by women writers: tall, dark, attractive, and frangible (he is ill, bashed, or burned in half his novels). "When the Met ... want to show that the police know ... what bottle to order with the canard à l'orange ..., they wheel out Dalgliesh," a hostile chief inspector says. Sensitive under seeming coldness, he has published several volumes of poetry. Before his first appearance, Dalgliesh's wife has died in childbirth, but in successive novels her presence dies away. At one time readers hoped that Cordelia Gray would take her place, but romantic notes have ceased to be struck; Cordelia has disappeared, and Inspector Kate Miskin, introduced in A Taste of Death, has not replaced her. In fact, few James characters are happily married, and there are no juvenile leads to assert the normality of love. There are, however, close, psychologically incestuous brother-sister relationships.

James once told an interviewer that she believes detective fiction can lessen our fear of death. Yet her details of what happens after death—the doctor's fingers penetrating the orifices of the female body, the first long opening cut of an autopsy—are scarcely reassuring. Other shocks of mortality include the skulls of plague victims packed cheekbone to cheekbone in the crypt of Courcy Castle in The Skull Beneath the Skin, James's most gothic novel, and boatloads of the elderly sailing out to die in The Children of Men.

Although few of James's settings are as conventional as the house party in Skull, her action generally takes place in closed, often bureaucratic communities: e.g., a teaching hospital, a psychiatric clinic, a forensic laboratory, or a nuclear power station, organizations which draw, no doubt, upon the author's own administrative experiences.

In terms of plot, James is most successful when dealing with the processes of investigation and is weakest in motivation. She has said she thinks in terms of film sequences; her latest novels contain variants of the "chase," and the long "panning" shots and close-ups in which she relentlessly describes interiors have become at times an intrusive mannerism. Perhaps her best, most controlled use of domestic detail occurs in Innocent Blood, where Phillipa furnishes a flat to greet her just-released murderess mother. Indeed, this violent Lehrjahr with its slower discoveries, its ambiguities, and its psychological images in "the wasteland between imagination and reality" is James's best claim to consideration as a "serious" novelist.

James's characters have always thought and talked about truth, faith, responsibility, and justice, even if not profoundly. But in the books that follow Innocent Blood, plot is almost lost amid talkiness and theme. The nature of Sir Paul Berowne's religious experience in A Taste for Death, for instance, is more important and less explicable than the identity of his blood-happy killer. In Devices and Desires (title drawn from the Book of Common Prayer), a nuclear power station and a ruined abbey confront each other, perhaps adversarially, in one of James's bleak coastal landscapes. They are surrounded by serial murder, terrorism, anti-nuclear and pro-animal protesters, cancer, drowning, anti-racism, a libel suit—all pretexts and conveniences for a plot which the novel is not about. Dalgliesh is present, but almost a bystander, although he finds a corpse and almost dies in the fire that consumes the killer. Since then he has appeared in Original Sin, heading the investigation into the deaths of a young publisher and his sister, but is even more detached, except for brief bravura scenes, which demonstrate his sureness of touch and of technique. Instead, Kate Miskin is to the fore, with a Jewish detective who tries to be an atheist. The "original sin" is presumably the Nazi murder long ago of a woman and her two children, whom her husband finally avenges by murdering the two children of the man responsible. Ironically, however, they had merely been adopted to satisfy a childless wife, whose infertile husband is not particularly fond of his "offspring."

In The Children of Men, a futurist thriller, published between Devises and Desires and Original Sin, James opts for brutality. The year is 2021; mankind has lost the power to reproduce, and Xan is Warden of England. The narrator, Xan's cousin and once his advisor, is attracted to a tiny protest group, "The Five Fishes," and particularly to Julian, who is almost miraculously pregnant. To escape Xan's protective care, they embark on a wild drive, during which the religious Luke is bludgeoned to death by a band of "Painted Faces." Julian bears a son, but her midwife is murdered. When Xan appears, the narrator shoots him and becomes Warden in his stead. He signs a cross on the newborn's head. But, the reader wonders, will the state of the world really improve? In a 1985 interview, James described herself as born with a sense "that every moment is lived, really, not under the shadow of death but in the knowledge that this is how it's going to end." This sense now dominates her fiction.

-Jane W. Stedman

JANOWITZ, Tama

Nationality: American. Born: San Francisco, California, 12 April 1957. Education: Barnard College, New York, B.A. 1977; Hollins College, Virginia, M.A. 1979; Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1980–81. Career: Model, Vidal Sassoon, London and New York, 1975–77; assistant art director, Kenyon and Eckhardt, Boston, Massachusetts, 1977–78; writer-in-residence, Fine Arts Works Center, Provincetown, Massachusetts, 1981–82; since 1985 freelance writer. Awards: Bread Loaf Writers fellowship, 1975; Janoway Fiction prize, 1976, 1977; National Endowment award, 1982. Agent: Jonathan Dolger, 49 East 96th Street, New York, New York 10028. Address: c/o Crown Publishers, 201 E. 50th St., New York, New York, New York 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

American Dad. New York, Putnam, 1981; London, Picador, 1988.A Cannibal in Manhattan. New York, Crown, 1987; London, Pan, 1988

The Male Cross-Dresser Support Group. New York, Crown, and London, Picador, 1992.

By the Shores of Gitchee Gumee. New York, Crown Publishers, 1996. A Certain Age. New York, Doubleday, 1999.

Short Stories

Slaves of New York. New York, Crown, 1986; London, Picador, 1987.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Conviction," in The New Generation, edited by Alan Kaufman. New York, Doubleday, 1987.

"Case History No.179: Tina," in Between C and D, edited by Joel Rose and Catherine Texier. New York, Penguin, 1988.

* * *

Few can match Tama Janowitz's commentaries on the race of fakes, freaks, and flakes who inhabit the sprawling metropolis of social non-achievement. By her own admission, satiric observations designed for humorous entertainment limit an author's appeal to those readers who share a similar sense of humor with the author. In addition, sharp-tongued social critics like Janowitz seem to invite harsher criticism of their writing, easily falling prey to the reactionary statement that their attempts at humor are not funny. Janowitz matches wits—and takes the resulting jabs—with writers such as Ring Lardner and Mark Twain, situating her novels in the tradition of "comic American misanthropy." Other favorable reviews compare her witty observations to those of Lewis Carroll and Kurt Vonnegut. The San Francisco Chronicle relegates her "adventurous narratives" to a category of classics like Tom Jones and Tristram Shandy, albeit feminist versions of them. It is clear that Janowitz's six books, beginning with the debut of American Dad in 1981, have established her reputation as a successful woman among male satirists.

American Dad is a tale of familial disaffection centering on Earl Przepasniak and his mother Mavis, a neglected poet, with the awe-inspiring shadow of father and husband, Robert, falling over them both. Robert's reputation rests less on his skills as a psychiatrist than on his social achievements with the opposite sex. "Can you imagine what it is for me, five-foot-six-inches," asks Earl "to live up to a six-foot-tall Dad whose sexual prowess is mythical in the northwestern corner of a certain New England state?" Following the inevitable divorce of his parents, Earl cultivates misanthropy in his mother's house with the aim of escaping his father's admonishing glare. After Mavis dies, Earl slips back into society with a highly developed feminine side, lacking overtly masculine merit in a seemingly male-oriented meritocracy.

Slaves of New York elevated Janowitz to literary stardom in 1986 and was made into a movie shortly after. It is an assortment of loosely connected short stories about an array of aspiring Greenwich Village artists, gallery owners, and their associates. Janowitz casts her gaze around the sparse crowd of her fellow disaster addicts and is rewarded with a splendid display of self-delusion, clashing colors, and reckless hope. Eleanor, an extension of Earl Przepasniak's female aspects, appears in several stories linking them together. The theme that coheres the separate stories, which were previously printed in magazines such as Spin, The New Yorker, Paris Review, and Interview, is how an insecure woman becomes a social being in the world's most significant bohemian society. It is a society of egos shackled by their own modish attitudes and the self-promoting opinions of others in a highly artificial environment about which they can only barely make sense.

Taken in isolation, the stories in Slaves of New York lack the epigrammatic sparkle that enlivened American Dad and, as a whole, lack the dynamism of the earlier work. Neither of these problems is apparent in Janowitz's second novel, A Cannibal in Manhattan, which was published in 1987. It received mixed reviews: enough negative press to dampen the excitement that followed her best-seller of 1986.

A Cannibal in Manhattan tells the story of Mgungu Yabba Mgungu, who is transplanted from his native island of New Burnt Norton to even more fierce surroundings. The eponymous "cannibal" relates the history of his intended journey toward greater civilization, which is Manhattan. Mgungu, nominal leader of the withered and disenfranchised Lesser Pimbas, possesses the recipe for a narcotic that has made his tribal life bearable during sixty-five years of indolence. We soon discern that he has been brought to America solely to be exploited. That this only becomes explicit through the knowing use of extra-narrative devices deployed by Janowitz is testimony to the sophistication of her wit and the profundity of Mgungu's gullibility.

Duped at every turn, unwittingly implicated in a horrendous crime, and abandoned by his erstwhile sponsors, this distinctly unmythical savage slides towards vagrancy and is eventually apprehended in typically ridiculous circumstances. Yet his mind-numbing naivete, a fondness for drink, his unenviable record as a chief, and his occasionally incongruous use of language serve to alert readers to the possibility that he may be an unreliable narrator. Manipulating her characters with a barely concealed Nabokovian glee, Janowitz draws a world of drug-dealing, treachery, and self-aggrandizement, while underpinning it with an alternate landscape of itinerancy, drunken camaraderie, and self-destruction.

Mgungu's passage through the first sphere of the drug business is a journey of missed connections and plans gone awry, allowing the reader plenty of space to fill in the details; his trawl through the second sphere of self-destruction leaves less to the imagination. Guilty or innocent, Mgungu is a thoroughly engrossing guide to his own misfortune. The richly inventive tale of a decline into contemporary civilization is both stunningly funny and damningly true.

The Male Cross-Dresser Support Group, published in 1992, followed A Cannibal in Manhattan with similar mixed reviews, prompting some critics to refer to the author as a one-book phenomenon. The Male Cross-Dresser Support Group suggests a metaphorical connection to the notion that being a male member of society affords greater privilege than being female. Protagonist Pamela Trowell works for a hunting magazine while living in a grotesque basement apartment. Pamela, who considers herself "ponderous and dumpy and unpleasant," concludes that her sole disadvantage in the hierarchy of her love life and employment by equally disadvantaged men is her gender. After a journey to Maine with her adopted son, Abdul, a stray adolescent who follows her home from a pizza parlor one night, she tests her premise by returning to Manhattan dressed as a man.

Despite mixed reactions from critics and readers, the novel was selected as Notable Book of the Year by The New York Times, which did commend the satirical humor in the abnormalities that constitute Pamela's normal life as a single woman in Manhattan. The exaggerations that constitute her hysterically funny observations about the curiosities of gender identity, family values, and motherhood in the 1990s de-politicize the universal truth of gender discrimination. The redeeming relationship between Pamela and Abdul, who are the least perverted in the array of family members and associates surrounding Pamela, offers a foothold of genuine affection in a seriously defective system of values.

By the Shores of Gitchee Gumee again covers this uncomfortable territory of modern values from the perspective of Maud Slivenowicz, the 19-year-old narrator who lives with her mother and four siblings in a trailer on the outskirts of a small city in upstate New York. Like the stereotype of white trailer trash, each child is fathered by different absent men. Maud schemes against her sister in a race to see who will marry into a life of wealth and privilege, as if that were a realistic option. She is distracted from this by her brother, Pierce, who is as dense as "Neanderthal man" but handsome enough to move to Los Angeles and become a movie star. This humorous look at sibling rivalry received the usual contradictory critical reviews, especially that the novel's satirical elements conflict with the human moments, creating a sense of incompleteness in the novel as a whole.

Janowitz's skills as a novelist found redemption in A Certain Age, published in 1999. In this parody of a consuming theme in Jane Austen's parlor dramas, a well-educated Sarah Lawrence graduate, Florence Collins, is desperate to find a husband. Whereas Austen's single women worry about being past it when they reach twenty, Florence is concerned about being thirty-two. She travels to the Hamptons, the equivalent of Austen's British country estates, displays her charms, clothing, and beauty, and is exploited or rejected by the coterie of men who might be marriageable suitors. Unlike an Austen novel, where suitable men and women happily marry into love and agreeable financial circumstances, nothing Florence does saves her from her damaging, graceless superficiality. Like an Edith Wharton novel, the ending for this most recent of Janowitz's insecure women protagonists is at the bottom of a downward spiral.

Janowitz states that the difficulty of finding a publisher for humorous novels by women equals the limitations of satisfying a mass audience's sense of humor. Her unique farcical voice speaks in a brilliant and biting prose while trying to balance insight with social criticism. Although seeming to avoid overtly political statements in her fiction, Janowitz addresses the issues of feminism, racism, capitalism, and cultural imperialism in a genuinely original and surprising manner, containing equal parts of humor, seriousness, and warmth. She accomplishes this in a wonderfully light and fanciful style that is often outrageously funny.

-Ian McMechan, updated by Hedwig Gorski

JEN, Gish

Nationality: American. Born: Lillian Jen, c. 1956. Education: Harvard University, B.A. 1977; attended Stanford University, 1979–80; University of Iowa, M.F.A. 1983. Career: Lecturer in fiction writing, 1986, Tufts University; visiting writer, University of Massachusetts, 1990–91. Awards: Transatlantic Review award (Henfield Foundation), 1983; resident, MacDowell Colony, 1985 and 1987; fellow, Radcliffe Bunting Institute and James A. Michener Foundation/Copernicus Society, 1986; fellow, Massachusetts Artists Foundation, 1988; fellow, National Endowment for the Arts, 1988; Katherine Anne Porter Contest prize, 1987; Urban Arts Project prize (Boston MBTA), 1988. Agent: Maxine Groffsky, Maxine Groffsky Literary Agency, 25th Avenue, New York, New York 10011, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Typical American. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1991. Mona in the Promised Land. New York, Knopf, 1996.

Short Stories

Who's Irish?: Stories. New York, Knopf, 1999.

Other

Contributor, Best American Short Stories of 1988. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1988.

Contributor, New Worlds of Literature. New York, Norton, 1989. Contributor, Home to Stay: Asian American Women's Fiction. Greenfield Review Press, 1990.

* * *

For someone whose first novel was just published in 1991, Gish Jen has already made quite a mark on the literary scene. Her first novel, Typical American, was a finalist for the National Book Critics' Circle award, and her second novel, Mona in the Promised Land, was listed as one of the ten best books of the year by the Los Angeles Times. In addition, both novels made the New York Times "Notable Books of the Year" list. Jen's latest work, a collection of short stories entitled Who's Irish, has also been largely acclaimed, putting Jen's name once again on the New York Times "Notable Books of the Year" list, while one of the short stories in the collection, "Birthmates," was chosen for inclusion in The Best American Short Stories of the Century. Jen's work has been canonized via inclusion in the Heath Anthology of American Literature, discussions of her work appear in various studies of American—and particularly Asian-American—literature, and her writing is well-represented in college literature courses.

All of Jen's work to date centers around similar themes, each set within a distinctly American context: identity, home, family, and community. This fictional ground is clearly claimed in Typical American, which announces itself from the beginning as "an American story." It is the story of Ralph Chang and his family—from his life in China (quickly covered) to his arrival in the U.S. in 1947, to his education, marriage, children, and career as a scholar and entrepreneur in America. The novel chronicles Ralph's rise and fall in business (somewhat like a latter-day Chinese American Silas Lapham), as well as the Chang family's immersion in American culture. Ralph dubs his family the "Chang-kees" (Chinese Yankees), they celebrate Christmas, they go to shows at Radio City Music Hall, Ralph buys a Davy Crockett hat, Helen (Ralph's wife) learns the words to popular musicals, Theresa (Ralph's sister) gets her M.D., Ralph gets his Ph.D. and a tenured job. But Ralph is unhappy; he is convinced that in America you need money to be somebody, to be something other than "Chinaman." It is only after Ralph makes and loses his money—and tears apart his family—that he realizes that the real freedom offered in America is not the freedom to get rich, to become a self-made man, but the freedom to be yourself, to float in a pool, to wear an orange bathing suit—to define your own identity.

While Jen's novels—and particularly Typical American—have been classified as "immigrant novels," it is essential to recognize the ways in which her novels stand apart from traditional immigrant novels of the early twentieth century. Typical American's departure from earlier immigrant novels, for example, is immediately apparent upon Ralph's arrival in America: rather than being greeted by the glorious Golden Gate Bridge (symbol of "freedom, and hope, and relief for the seasick" in Ralph's mind), Ralph is greeted by fog so thick that he can't see a thing. While earlier immigrant novels focused largely on the goal of assimilation and their characters (usually white European immigrants) achieved this goal, Jen's Typical American like other contemporary immigrant novels such as Mei Ng's Eating Chinese Food Naked, Chang-rae Lee's Native Speaker, Amy Tan's The Joy Luck Club and The Kitchen God's Wife, Gus Lee's China Boy, Fae Myenne Ng's Bone, and Maxine Hong Kingston's Woman Warrior and Tripmaster Monkey-focuses on a different generation of ("nonwhite") immigrants with substantially different problems and goals. In this contemporary generation of immigrant novels, the "American dream" is shrouded, like the Golden Gate Bridge upon Ralph's arrival, in fog—and underneath the dream is old, tarnished, and not quite what the characters thought it would be. Their effort is not to assimilate and become "American" but-recognizing that they lack the "whiteness" that leads to full assimilation as unhyphenated "Americans"—they work to negotiate the space occupied by the hyphen and stake out their own uniquely American territory. As Typical American illustrates, in this generation of immigrant novels there really is no "typical American"—Ralph Chang, as much as anyone, can stake claim to that title.

As part of this new generation of novelists focusing on the immigrant experience in America, Jen then reconstructs and recasts the ways in which we see both the "American dream" and American identity. At least since Crevecoeur posed the question in 1782, "What is an American?" has echoed throughout American literature. The answer to this question, of course, has never been easy or stable— American identity is fluid, shifting, unstable, and never more so than now. Nothing illustrates this better, perhaps, than Jen's second novel, Mona in the Promised Land. In many ways a sequel to Typical American, Mona in the Promised Land moves the Changs to a larger house in the suburbs, to the late 1960s/early 1970s, and to a focus on Ralph's and Helen's American-born children, Callie and Mona. Americans, this novel suggests, are constantly reinventing themselves, and no one more so than Mona, who in the course of the novel "switches" to Jewish (after entertaining thoughts of "becoming" Japanese) and becomes, to her friends, "the Changowitz." Callie likewise reinvents herself during her years at Radcliffe, where she "becomes" Chinese (she was "sick of being Chinese—but there is being Chinese and being Chinese"); she takes a Chinese name, she wears Chinese clothes, cooks Chinese food, chants Chinese prayers—all under the influence and tutelage of Naomi, her African-American roommate. It is also through Naomi that both Callie and Mona decide that they are "colored." While the contemporary theorist Judith Butler has argued that gender identity is performative, Jen's works suggest that ethnic identity is also performative—at least to an extent. The "promised land" in Mona in the Promised Land is one in which the characters have the freedom to be or become whatever they want—within, of course, the limitations placed upon them by American culture and society.

Mona in the Promised Land, like Typical American, is narrated in a straightforward, realistic fashion, without the self-conscious narrative stance or vast intertextual references of writers such as Maxine Hong Kingston (there is no winking at the reader or formal pyrogenics here). While Jen's writing is poignant and beautiful—as well as often hilariously funny-she clearly puts her characters, rather than her narrative, center stage. It is the characters, with wonderful dialogue that catches all the idiosyncrasies of American speech (regardless of ethnicity or gender of the character), who stand out in Jen's novels. Jen's later work is also distinguished by her use of tense; Mona in the Promised Land is narrated rather unconventionally in the present tense, giving the reader a sense of immediacy and placing us right there with Mona as she navigates through her adolescence. (Who's Irish continues Jen's experimentation with tense, with some stories told in the first person—including the voice of a young, presumably white, boy—and one even told partially in the second person.)

While Jen has been most often compared to other Asian-American authors such as Kingston and Amy Tan, she has stated that the largest influence on her writing has been Jewish-American writers—partly as a result of her upbringing in a largely Jewish community in Scarsdale, New York, but also partly as a result of a commonality she finds between Jewish and Chinese cultures. Other authors Jen has noted as influential on her work include diverse contemporary writers such as Grace Paley, Cynthia Ozick, and Jamaica Kincaid, as well as realistic nineteenth-century women writers such as Jane Austen. Jen has also been paired with Ursula K. LeGuin on an audiocassette, with both authors reading stories about a female protagonist struggling to make sense of the sometimes culturally foreign world in which she finds herself. In terms of literary associations and influences, one might also observe that Jen's focus on suburban family life invites comparisons to well-known chroniclers of the American suburbs such as John Cheever. Although the suburbs and the marital malaise that Cheever depicts in them have been cast as overwhelmingly white in the American imagination, Jen shows us that those "nonwhite" immigrants newly "making it" to the suburbs have their own problems, secrets, skeletons—all of which are complicated by the strange rituals and ways that govern the American suburban landscape, right down to its neatly trimmed lawns.

There is no doubt that Jen is here to stay. She is a writer of great insight and power. While her writing evokes the alienation and pain of the immigrant experience, it also shows us the possibility and hope embodied in new versions of the "American dream." As her characters continually reinvent themselves and seek to define their place within America, Jen encourages her readers to see the ways in which "identity" in America is a complex, multifaceted, constantly shifting thing. Overall, Jen shows us that the Chinese-American story, like her first novel, is truly and simply "an American story."

-Patricia Keefe Durso

JENKINS, (John) Robin

Nationality: British. Born: Cambuslang, Lanarkshire, Scotland, 11 September 1912. Education: Hamilton Academy; Glasgow University, 1931–35, B.A. (honors) in English 1935, M.A. 1936. Family: Married Mary McIntyre Wyllie in 1937; one son and two daughters. Career: Teacher at Dunoon Grammar School; Ghazi College, Kabul, Afghanistan, 1957–59; British Institute, Barcelona, 1959–61; and Gaya School, Sabah, Malaysia, 1963–68. Awards: Frederick Niven award, 1956. Address: Fairhaven, Toward, by Dunoon, Argyll PA23 7UE, Scotland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

So Gaily Sings the Lark. Glasgow, Maclellan, 1951.

Happy for the Child. London, Lehmann, 1953.

The Thistle and the Grail. London, Macdonald, 1954.

The Cone-Gatherers. London, Macdonald, 1955; New York, Taplinger, 1981.

Guests of War. London, Macdonald, 1956.

The Missionaries. London, Macdonald, 1957.

The Changeling. London, Macdonald, 1958.

Love Is a Fervent Fire. London, Macdonald, 1959.

Some Kind of Grace. London, Macdonald, 1960.

Dust on the Paw. London, Macdonald, and New York, Putnam, 1961.

The Tiger of Gold. London, Macdonald, 1962.

A Love of Innocence. London, Cape, 1963.

The Sardana Dancers. London, Cape, 1964.

A Very Scotch Affair. London, Gollancz, 1968.

The Holy Tree. London, Gollancz, 1969.

The Expatriates. London, Gollancz, 1971.

A Toast to the Lord. London, Gollancz, 1972.

A Figure of Fun. London, Gollancz, 1974.

A Would-Be Saint. London, Gollancz, 1978; New York, Taplinger, 1980

Fergus Lamont. Edinburgh, Canongate, and New York, Taplinger, 1979.

The Awakening of George Darroch. Edinburgh, Harris, 1985.

Just Duffy. Edinburgh, Canongate, 1988.

Poverty Castle. Nairn, Balnain, 1991.

Leila. Edinburgh, Polygon, 1995.

Matthew and Sheila. Edinburgh, Polygon, 1999.

Short Stories

A Far Cry from Bowmore and Other Stories. London, Gollancz, 1973. Lunderston Tales. Edinburgh, Polygon, 1996.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Exile," in Modern Scottish Short Stories, edited by Fred Urquhart and Giles Gordon. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1978.

* * *

Scotland, Spain, Afghanistan—the countries in which he has lived—have provided the backdrops for much of Robin Jenkins's writing, and it is his uncanny ability to realize those settings and the people who inhabit them which has given so much immediate strength to his fictional output. "You must write about people you know best," Jenkins has written, "and they are the ones you were born and brought up with." His Scottish novels—So Gaily Sings the Lark, Happy for the Child, The Thistle and the Grail, The Cone-Gatherers, Guests of War, The Missionaries, The Changeling, Love Is a Fervent Fire, A Love of Innocence, The Sardana Dancers, A Toast to the Lord, A Would-Be Saint, Fergus Lamont, The Awakening of George Darroch, and Just Duffy—tend to focus on the sterner aspects of Calvinism. The best of the early novels, The Cone-Gatherers, set on the patrician country estate of Lady Runcie-Campbell, follows to its bitter conclusion the enmity between Duror the gamekeeper and Calum, a simple-minded hunchback who gathers pine cones for their seeds. Loss of innocence is also a central theme of The Changeling and Guests of War, and is transformed in Jenkins's later novels to a yearning for the level of grace that transcends human frailty.

In all his work Jenkins's writing is characterized by his probing insights into the paradox that makes human relationships both loving and self-destructive, and by his skillful delineation of character and psychological make-up. Poverty, too, is a central issue, whether it be the spiritual poverty which disfigures men like Mungo Niven, the self-deluding hero of A Very Scotch Affair, or the physical poverty of the slums of Drumsagart in The Thistle and the Grail. Yet, despite his moral stance and his round condemnation of a society which breeds those twin evils, Jenkins is not without mercy. The reader is invited to examine the reasons which make Niven such an unattractive character and to understand how other factors, such as religion, upbringing, and heredity have helped to warp his life. Even when Niven commits adultery, sympathy for his stupidity is never far away from Jenkins's narrative. Similarly, the citizens of the mean town of Drumsagart experience a moment of grace when their football team wins a cup competition. Irony is never far away from Jenkins's literary style.

Nowhere is this virtue seen to better advantage than in The Awakening of George Darroch. Set in 1843, the year of the Disruption (the schism in the Church of Scotland over livings and privileges which led to the foundation of the Free Church of Scotland), it follows the crisis of conscience which affects George Darroch, a minister of the church whose parish is in a typically grim and Jenkinsian small Scottish town. On one level Darroch's dilemma is political in origin. Should he follow the dictates of his conscience and side with the Free Church reformers, or should he allow himself to be tempted into staying with the established church? At that level the arguments for following the first option are his engrained beliefs in the necessity for change, beliefs which he wishes to make manifest; balanced against these is his brother-in-law's promise of a rich living in a decent country area. On another level, Darroch is besieged by a moral problem. To throw in his lot with the reformers means that he will have to sacrifice his family and their well-being.

As time passes and the day of the "Disruption" meeting comes closer, Darroch sways from one direction to the other, much to the dismay of his family who expect him not only to remain constant to the established church but also to have the good sense to accept the offer of a new and more agreeable parish. When he eventually makes the fateful decision to join the reformers it seems, superficially, that Darroch is doing so to expiate past sins, in the full knowledge that he is of the Elect. But Jenkins is too clever a writer and too committed a critic of the effects of extreme Calvinism to allow Darroch such a simple exit. It is not religious faith that carries Darroch forward but simple hypocrisy: the important motive for him is not the action itself but the view which others will have of his part in it.

Despite the maturity of the writing and the sense of culmination which suggested that he had little more to say on the subject, Jenkins returned once more to the matter of sin and betrayal in Just Duffy. This is set in contemporary small-town Scotland, a world which the author obviously detests: Duffy lives in a bleak, urban, and uncaring environment in which achievement and greed are preferred to the more ordinary values of respect and friendship. Never addressed by his Christian name of Thomas—hence the title—Duffy is the only child of an unmarried mother and, considered stupid, he occupies a nevernever land between leaving school as a simpleton and entering a world dominated by despair and poverty. Instead of accepting meekly what is offered to him, Duffy declares war on society, indulging in a growing number of meaningless actions until he commits the ultimate crime of murder. Although Jenkins reserves much sympathy for his central character, he also makes clear that Duffy's crimes are born of a frightful innocence which allows him to imagine that he can act with impunity. Eventually, Duffy retreats into the silence of madness, the only justification he can discover for what he has done.

Although Jenkins is capable of ranging easily and fluently over a wide range of social backgrounds, his vision of the demonic state of the world and the salving balm of love remain the central motifs. Anger, sexual disappointments, the betrayal of innocence are emotions never far from the surface, and like Edwin Muir (1887–1959) Jenkins is aware of the fall from grace and the widening gulf between man and Eden.

—Trevor Royle

JHABVALA, Ruth Prawer

Nationality: American. Born: Ruth Prawer in Cologne, Germany, of Polish parents, 7 May 1927; sister of the writer S.S. Prawer; moved to England as a refugee, 1939; became British citizen, 1948; now U.S. citizen. Education: Hendon County School, London; Queen Mary College, University of London, 1945–51, M.A. in English literature 1951. Family: Married C.S.H. Jhabvala in 1951; three daughters. Lived in India, 1951–75, and in New York City from 1975. Awards: Booker prize, 1975; Guggenheim Fellowship, 1976; Neil Gunn International fellowship, 1978; MacArthur fellowship, 1984; Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences award for screenplay (Oscar), 1987, 1992. LHD., London University, 1995; D.Arts, London University, 1996. Agent: Harriet Wasserman, 137 East 36th Street, New York, New York 10016. Address: 400 East 52nd Street, New York, New York 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

To Whom She Will. London, Allen and Unwin, 1955; as Amrita, New York, Norton, 1956.

The Nature of Passion. London, Allen and Unwin, 1956; New York, Norton, 1957.

Esmond in India. London, Allen and Unwin, and New York, Norton, 1958.

The Householder. London, Murray, and New York, Norton, 1960. Get Ready for Battle. London, Murray, 1962; New York, Norton, 1963.

A Backward Place. London, Murray, and New York, Norton, 1965. A New Dominion. London, Murray, 1972; as Travelers, New York, Harper, 1973.

Heat and Dust. London, Murray, 1975; New York, Harper, 1976.
In Search of Love and Beauty. London, Murray, and New York, Morrow, 1983.

Three Continents. London, Murray, and New York, Morrow, 1987. Poet and Dancer. London, Murray, and New York, Doubleday, 1993. Shards of Memory. New York, Doubleday, 1995.

Short Stories

Like Birds, Like Fishes and Other Stories. London, Murray, 1963; New York, Norton, 1964.

A Stronger Climate: Nine Stories. London, Murray, 1968; New York, Norton, 1969.

An Experience of India. London, Murray, 1971; New York, Norton, 1972.

Penguin Modern Stories 11, with others. London, Penguin, 1972.How I Became a Holy Mother and Other Stories. London, Murray, and New York, Harper, 1976.

Out of India: Selected Stories. New York, Morrow, 1986; London, Murray, 1987.

East into Upper East: Plain Tales from New York and New Delhi. Washington, D.C., Counterpoint, 1998.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Parasites," in New Yorker, 13 March 1978.
- "A Summer by the Sea," in New Yorker, 7 August 1978.
- "Commensurate Happiness," in Encounter (London), January 1980.
- "Grandmother," in New Yorker, 17 November 1980.
- "Expiation," in New Yorker, 11 October 1982.
- "Farid and Farida," in New Yorker, 15 October 1984.
- "The Aliens," in Literary Review (Madison, New Jersey), Summer 1986.

Plays

A Call from the East (produced New York, 1981).

Screenplays: The Householder, 1963; Shakespeare Wallah, with James Ivory, 1965; The Guru, 1968; Bombay Talkie, 1970; Autobiography of a Princess, 1975; Roseland, 1976; Hullabaloo over Georgie and Bonnie's Pictures, 1978; The Europeans, 1979; Jane Austen in Manhattan, 1980; Quartet, 1981; Heat and Dust, 1983; The Bostonians, 1984; A Room with a View, 1986; Madame Sousatzka, with John Schlesinger, 1988; Mr. and Mrs. Bridge, 1990; Howard's End, 1992; The Remains of the Day, 1993; Jefferson in Paris, 1995.; Surviving Picasso. Warner Brothers, 1996.; A Soldier's Daughter Never Cries, 1998.; The Golden Bowl, 2000.

Television Plays: The Place of Peace, 1975.

Other

Meet Yourself at the Doctor (published anonymously). London, Naldrett Press, 1949.

Shakespeare Wallah: A Film, with James Ivory, with Savages, by James Ivory. London, Plexus, and New York, Grove Press, 1973. Autobiography of a Princess, Also Being the Adventures of an American Film Director in the Land of the Maharajas, with James Ivory and John Swope. London, Murray, and New York, Harper, 1975.

*

Film Adaptations: The Householder, 1963; Heat and Dust, 1983.

Critical Studies: The Fiction of Ruth Prawer Jhabvala by H.M. Williams, Calcutta, Writer's Workshop, 1973; "A Jewish Passage to India" by Renee Winegarten, in Midstream (New York), March 1974; Ruth Prawer Jhabvala by Vasant A. Shahane, New Delhi, Arnold-Heinemann, 1976; Silence, Exile and Cunning: The Fiction of Ruth Prawer Jhabvala by Yasmine Gooneratne, New Delhi, Orient Longman, and London, Sangam, 1983; Cross-Cultural Interaction in Indian English Fiction: An Analysis of the Novels of Ruth Prawer Jhabyala and Kamala Markandaya by Ramesh Chadha, New Delhi. National Book Organisation, 1988; The Fiction of Ruth Prawer Jhabvala by Laurie Sucher, London, Macmillan, 1989; The Novels of Kamala Markandaya and Ruth Prawer Jhabvala by Rekha Jha, New Delhi, Prestige, 1990; Passages to Ruth Prawer Jhabvala edited by Ralph J. Crane, New Delhi, Sterling, 1991, and Ruth Prawer Jhabvala by Crane, New York, Twayne, 1992; Ruth Prawer Jhabvala in India: The Jewish Connection by Ronald Shepherd, Delhi, Chanakya Publications, 1994; The Challenge of Cross-Cultural Interpretation in the Anglo-Indian Novel: The Raj Revisted, a Comparative Study of Three Booker Prize Authors: Paul Scott, the Raj Quartet, J.G.Farrell, the Siege of Krishnapur, Ruth Prawer Jhabvala, Heat and Dust by Gerwin Strobl, Lewiston, New York, E. Mellen Press, 1995; Ruth Prawer Jhabvala: A Study in Empathy and Exile by Aruna Chakravarti, Delhi, B.R. Publishing, 1998.

Ruth Prawer Jhabvala comments:

(1972) The central fact of all my work, as I see it, is that I am a European living permanently in India. I have lived here for most of my adult life and have an Indian family. This makes me not quite an insider but it does not leave me entirely an outsider either. I feel my position to be at a point in space where I have quite a good view of both sides but am myself left stranded in the middle. My work is an attempt to charter this unchartered territory for myself. Sometimes I write about Europeans in India, sometimes about Indians in India, sometimes about both, but always attempting to present India to myself in the hope of giving myself some kind of foothold. My books may appear objective but really I think they are the opposite: for I describe the Indian scene not for its own sake but for mine. This excludes me from all interest in all those Indian problems one is supposed to be interested in (the extent of Westernisation, modernity vs. tradition, etc! etc!). My work can never claim to be a balanced or authoritative view of India but is only one individual European's attempt to compound the puzzling process of living in it.

(1981) In 1975 I left India, and am now living in and writing about America—but not for long enough to be able to make any kind of comment about either of these activities.

(1986) I have now lived in the U.S. for ten years and have written one novel, several stories, and several film scripts about the experience. I cannot claim that India has disappeared out of—synonymously—myself and my work; even when not overtly figuring there, its influence is always present. But influence is too weak a word—it is more like a restructuring process: of one's ways of thinking and being. So I would say that, while I never became Indian, I didn't stay totally European either.

* * *

In a writing career that now spans five decades, Ruth Prawer Jhabvala has successfully combined the writing of novels, short stories, and screenplays. She is perhaps still best known as a novelist of India, even as a novelist who interprets India for the Western reader; yet for almost twenty years now her novels have focused less on India than on America and England, revealing the author's desire to combine her own triple European, Indian, and American background in her fiction.

Jhabvala's life of exile and expatriation has placed her in an unusual position among novelists who write about India, and has enabled her to write about that country from the ambiguous position of an outsider who is also an intimate insider. All of Jhabvala's fiction up to Heat and Dust (with the exception of two short stories) is set in India. For the most part Jhabvala has avoided the harsher problems of post-Independence India (the communal violence, the political unrest, etc.) in these novels, and, except in Heat and Dust, she has also avoided the subject of the British Raj. In her early work Jhabvala focuses on the domestic and social problems of predominantly middle-class urban Indians living in Delhi in the years following Independence. Her first two novels, To Whom She Will and The Nature of Passion, both deft comedies of manners in an Austenish vein, treat the subjects of arranged marriage and romantic love and explore the conflicts that arise as the modern, Western views of characters like Amrita (in To Whom She Will) or Viddi and Nimmi (in The Nature of Passion) clash with the traditional values of their families. Both novels express the author's obvious delight in all she found in the West. But she was never blind to the overwhelming social problems facing India. In Get Ready for Battle, those problems are confronted as far as the limits of her domestic drama will allow; this is Jhabvala's darkest portrait of modern India, and the last of her novels to deal primarily with Indian characters.

In her next three novels, A Backward Place, A New Dominion, and Heat and Dust, Jhabvala moves away from the presentation of India to a portrayal of the Westerner in India, a subject she had previously broached in Esmond in India, and an interest in the effect of India on her Western characters. She explores the problems faced by expatriate Westerners (mostly women) and the world of often-fraudulent gurus encountered by the young Western seekers who flocked to India in the 1960s and 1970s. This shift in emphasis is also reflected in her short stories—all nine stories in A Stronger Climate are concerned with Westerners in India—and in her screenplays—in such films as Shakespeare Wallah, The Guru, and Autobiography of a Princess.

In A Backward Place Jhabvala considers whether or not it is possible for some Europeans to live in India and survive, and through the character of Judy she shows that it is possible if one is willing to adopt Indian values, to accept India on its own terms. In A New Dominion and Heat and Dust Jhabvala again shows that Westerners can remain in India and survive, as Miss Charlotte does, and as both Olivia and the unnamed narrator of Heat and Dust do, but the question of whether this is desirable remains largely unanswered in her fiction. For the first time, these two novels move out of Delhi and beyond the confines of the largely domestic, interior settings of her earlier novels. The landscape, the heat and the dust, become increasingly important metaphors that show how unsuitable India is for most of the Westerners who populate Jhabvala's fiction. Quite different narrative techniques are employed, too-the straightforward realist narrative method of the earlier novels gives way to a more experimental form in which the reader is addressed directly, through monologues, letters, and journal entries, both by characters and the author herself. Jhabvala attributes these innovations to the influence of her writing for the cinema.

Heat and Dust contains two parallel stories, skillfully interwoven to contrast two time periods fifty years apart. The earlier of the two stories, Olivia's story, set in 1923, invites comparison with E. M Forster's A Passage to India. The later story, that of the unnamed narrator, which began in response to her reading of Olivia's letters, updates the 1923 story, and reveals Jhabvala's postmodernist interest in the effect of text on life.

Since moving to America, Jhabvala's interest has moved away from Indian subjects and settings. In In Search of Love and Beauty, which focuses on a group of German and Austrian refugees in New York, Jhabvala writes for the first time on a sustained level about the German-Jewish background she knew as a child. At the center of this novel and her subsequent novel, Three Continents, is a concern with the search for identity and heritage-and an attempt to explain and understand the sense of alienation and expatriation that has been her own experience as well as that of many of her Western characters. While these novels mark a new phase in Jhabvala's writing career, it is clear to the reader familiar with her oeuvre that the concerns of her Indian fiction have not been entirely left behind; both novels share much in common with her later Indian fiction. The guru figures, Leo of In Search of Love and Beauty and the Rawul of Three Continents, recall, among others, the unprincipled Swami of A New Dominion, while the seekers of these novels are variations on the young questing figures like Lee of A New Dominion and Katie of "How I Became a Holy Mother," for example. An interesting development is that for the first time in her fiction Jhabvala explores the backgrounds of the Western characters who populate her Indian fiction.

In her 1993 novel Poet and Dancer, India as a locale is altogether absent, and the presence of an Indian mother and son is too peripheral to the main narrative to bring the spirit of the place into the work. And so in some ways Poet and Dancer marks the greatest single shift in Jhabvala's career as a novelist. In other ways, though, there is still common ground between this work and her earlier fiction. At the heart of this novel is an exploration of the dichotomy between good and evil—played out through the destructive relationship between Angel and her cousin Lara, whose love Angel obsessively pursues—that is reminiscent of the destructive relationships between the many seekers and bogus gurus found in her earlier work.

Maintaining the shift away from India begun with In Search of Love and Beauty, India as a literal landscape exists only in the recollections of a few characters in 1995 novel, Shards of Memory, where the principal settings are again New York and London (specifically the limited geographical locations of Manhattan and Hampstead). Yet in other ways, India, like continental Europe, pervades the very core of this novel, and is literally in the blood of the Kopf family. Shards of Memory is intrinsically a family saga, concerned with four generations of the Kopf and Keller families and their involvement with "the Master"—the latest in a long line of such spiritual leaders to appear in Jhabvala's fiction. Here, though, the question of whether or not the Master is a charlatan is of less consequence than it is in earlier novels and stories. Instead, Jhabvala's focus is entirely on the bonds of family.

The oriental and occidental locations that characterize the two major phases of her novel writing career are effectively juxtaposed in her 1998 collection of short stories, East into Upper East, which carries the Kiplingesque subtitle, Plain Tales from New York and New Delhi. Six of the stories in this robust collection are set in New Delhi, a further seven in New York's Upper East Side. The final story, "Two Muses," the only exception to the two-town pattern promulgated in the title, deals with the German-Jewish community in North-West London between 1939 and 1951. Its only companion in Jhabvala's writing is "A Birthday in London," included in her first collection of short stories, Like Birds, Like Fishes, almost 40 years ago.

Ruth Prawer Jhabvala's reputation as a writer of fiction has been built around her Indian novels, particularly the Booker prize-winning Heat and Dust. Her later novels show that she can write equally well about America and Europe, and suggest that she is an international writer who deserves to be numbered amongst the best novelists writing in English today.

-Ralph J. Crane

JOHNSON, Charles (Richard)

Nationality: American. Born: Evanston, Illinois, 23 April 1948. Education: Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, B.A. in journalism 1971, M.A. in philosophy 1973; State University of New York, Stony Brook, 1973–76. Family: Married Joan New in 1970; two children. Career: Reporter and cartoonist, Chicago Tribune, 1969–70; member of art staff, St. Louis Proud, Missouri, 1971–72; assistant professor, 1976–79, associate professor, 1979–82, and since 1982 professor, University of Washington, Seattle. Since 1978 fiction editor, Seattle Review. Awards: Governor's award for literature, 1983; Callaloo creative writing award, 1985; National Book award, 1991. Address: c/o Antheneum Publishers, Macmillian Publishing Company, 866 3rd Avenue, New York, New York 10022; c/o University of Washington, Department of English, Seattle, WA 98105 U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Faith and the Good Thing. New York, Viking, 1974.

Oxherding Tale. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1982; London, Blond and Briggs, 1983; with a new introduction by the author, New York, Plume, 1995.

Middle Passage. New York, Atheneum, 1990; London, Picador, 1991

Dreamer. New York, Scribner, 1998.

Short Stories

The Sorcerer's Apprentice: Tales and Conjuration. New York, Atheneum, 1986; London, Serpent's Tail, 1988.

Plays

Olly Olly Oxen Free. New York, French, 1988.

Television Writing: Charlie's Pad series, 1971; Charlie Smith and the Fritter Tree, 1978; For Me Myself, 1982; A Place for Myself, 1982; Booker, with John Allmann, 1984.

Other

Black Humor (cartoons). Chicago, Johnson, 1970.

Half-Past Nation Time (cartoons). Westlake Village, California, Aware Press, 1972.

Being and Race: Black Writing since 1970. Bloomington, Indiana Press, and London, Serpent's Tail, 1988.

I Call Myself an Artist: Writings by and about Charles Johnson, edited by Rudolph P. Byrd. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1999.

King: The Photobiography of Martin Luther King, Jr. (with Bob Adelman). New York, Viking Studio, 2000.

Editor, with John McCluskey, Jr., Black Men Speaking. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1997.

*

Critical Studies: I Call Myself an Artist: Writings by and about Charles Johnson, edited by Rudolph P. Byrd. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1999.

* * *

Like many contemporary writers, Charles Johnson has a particular interest in the historical novel, and he uses this form to question the nature of the self and its relation to society and history. Two of his novels, Oxherding Tale and Middle Passage, are neo-slave narratives (novels that use the first person form to recount a story of slavery), and another, Dreamer, follows the end of Martin Luther King, Jr.'s campaign for racial equality. Each of these novels presents a highly educated and deeply philosophical first-person narrator who undergoes a spiritual transformation as he participates in and comes to understand his connection to African-American history.

Johnson's critically acclaimed Middle Passage won the 1990 National Book award, and has been favorably compared to Melville's Moby Dick. In Middle Passage, Rutherford Calhoun, a newly freed slave and petty thief, seeks to avoid his personal responsibilities by working on board a slave clipper bound for Africa. During his time on ship, Calhoun becomes familiar with both the slave ship captain, Ebenezer Falcon, and the slaves, and his interaction with them forces him to revise his worldview. Falcon, an embittered dwarf wedded to the doctrine of Manifest Destiny, spouts the philosophy of dualism, of the split between mind and body, knower and known, as the natural (and just) cause of slavery. Calhoun recognizes and begins to fear his own resemblance to Captain Falcon's quest for "experience" and willingness to appropriate the possessions of others. In contrast, the slaves, from Johnson's mythical Allmuseri tribe, believe in the unity of Being, and the worst feature of slavery, in their view, is the fact that they learn the philosophy of dualism as they learn the English language. Caught in the middle when the slaves take over the ship (named The Republic), Calhoun increasingly learns to view life through the Allmuseri's beliefs, experiencing a death to his former self when the ship breaks apart and he is thrown into the sea, and a resurrection as the embodiment of the Allmuseri philosophy when he is rescued.

As this summary suggests, Johnson's novels work as allegories as much as they work as historical fiction. In fact, his novels are a pastiche of forms, including spiritual autobiography, tall tale, adventure story, philosophical treatise, and comedy of manners. Part of Johnson's literary goal is to draw on multiple genres and traditions in order to create novels capable of conveying the richness of African-American history. Johnson's first novel, Faith and the Good Thing, embeds a naturalist story within an oral tale, combining myth, fantasy, and realism. The embedded story has many similarities to Richard Wright's Native Son, but Faith Cross, the main character, is able to transcend the limitations placed on her by racism and socioeconomic oppression by becoming a conjurer. The philosophical traditions that Johnson's narrators share are as rich as the literary forms they narrate. Johnson's novels are filled with allusions to Buddhist and Hindu texts, Enlightenment philosophers, and Thomist theologians. But the central philosophy that underpins all of Johnson's writing is phenomenology, which he presents as the philosophy of the Allmuseri.

Thus in Oxherding Tale, the extensively educated, mixed-race slave Andrew Hawkins, who has met Karl Marx and can quote from Lao Tze, still has a great deal to learn from his fellow slave Reb, an Allmuseri tribesman. Without the belief in the interconnectedness of all beings, which leads to the conclusion that the "self" is a fiction, Hawkins cannot understand his relationship to either the black or the white worlds. Hawkins must first reject the beliefs of his Black Nationalist father, whose violent revolt against slavery leads to his death and the dispersal of the other plantation slaves. He must also reject his own too-easy assimilation, when his flight from the slave catcher leads him to assume a white identity. Reb releases both himself and Hawkins from the slave catcher by having no essential identity, no static self that allows the slave catcher to identify, and thus entrap, him. Neither black nor white yet both, Hawkins finally becomes free only when he can both acknowledge his slave past and imagine a future beyond the restrictions of imposed racial identity. Dividing his novel into "House and Field" and "The White World," Johnson signifies upon and updates both the fugitive slave narrative and the classic novel of passing.

Although Johnson's novels are philosophical and sometimes difficult, they are also immensely comic. Johnson's comedy permeates his entire work from character depictions to a style of dialogue that is often Wodehousian in its wit: "Peggy Undercliff gave me what I have often read described in popular fiction as the 'eye,' though I'll not swear on it, never having seen the 'eye' at such close range before" (Oxherding Tale). Much of Johnson's comedy works by inverting expectations and by throwing his characters into highly improbable situations. The story of Hawkins's conception, for instance, is a masterpiece of social satire. Because he has stayed up too late drinking with his slave, Jonathan Polkinghorne is afraid to face his wife and thus sends his slave (Hawkins's father) to spend the night with her. After enjoying herself with the slave, Anna Polkinghorne screams, locks herself in a separate wing for the rest of her life, and refuses to acknowledge Hawkins as her son.

In his most recent novel, Dreamer, Johnson explores the nature of the self by creating a doppelganger for Martin Luther King, Jr., and imagining how the circumstances of their lives determine their different identities. Chaym Smith, who looks so much like King that he becomes a stand-in, and who is equally well educated in philosophy and religious theory as King, nonetheless has lived an entirely different life. Where King was raised in a middle-class household, Smith was abandoned by his father. This juxtaposition allows Johnson to meditate upon the way in which social and historical forces shape identity, and conversely, how individual identity shapes history. The reception of Dreamer is more mixed than was the response to the neo-slave narratives, with some critics praising the empathetic portrayal of King and others criticizing what they perceive to be the lack of coherence, as Smith simply disappears partway through the novel, picked up by the FBI.

Other critical controversy surrounds Johnson's use of the supernatural. He has been criticized for overuse of the supernatural purely for reasons of effect, but this is to misunderstand both the author and his intentions. The fantastic and uncanny play an important role in disrupting the reader's ability to read Johnson's fiction according to standard generic conventions, and this in turn meshes with Johnson's goal of dismantling our conceptions of essentialist identities.

-Harry Bucknall, updated by Suzanne Lane

JOHNSON, Colin

See MUDROOROO

JOHNSON, Denis

Nationality: American. Born: Munich, Germany, in 1949. Awards: American Academy Kaufman prize, 1984; Whiting Foundation award, 1986; literature award, American Academy of Arts and Letters, 1993. Address: c/o Robert Cornfield, 145 W. 79th Street, New York, New York 10024–6407, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Angels. New York, Knopf, 1983; London, Chatto and Windus, 1984.Fiskadoro. New York, Knopf, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1985.

The Stars at Noon. New York, Knopf, 1986; London, Faber, 1987.

Resuscitation of a Hanged Man. New York, Farrar Straus, 1991. Already Dead: A California Gothic. New York, HarperCollins, 1997. The Name of the World. New York, HarperCollins, 2000.

Short Stories

Jesus' Son. New York, Farrar, Straus, 1992.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Taking of Our Own Lives," in Three Stances of Modern Fiction, edited by Stephen Minot and Robley Wilson, Jr. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Winthrop, 1972.
- "There Comes after Here," in Atlantic (Boston), April 1972.
- "Tattoos and Music," in North American Review (Cedar Falls, Iowa), Spring 1977.
- "Two Men," in New Yorker, 19 September 1988.
- "Work," in New Yorker, 14 November 1988.
- "The Bullet's Flight," in Esquire (New York), March 1989.
- "Car-Crash While Hitchhiking," in Paris Review, Spring 1989.
- "Dirty Wedding," in New Yorker, 5 November 1990.

Poetry

The Man among the Seals. Iowa City, Stone Wall Press, 1969.

Inner Weather. Port Townsend, Washington, Graywolf Press, 1976.

The Incognito Lounge and Other Poems. New York, Random House, 1982.

The Veil. New York, Knopf, 1987.

The Throne of the Third Heaven of the Nations Millennium General Assembly: Poems, Collected and New. New York, HarperCollins, 1995

Film Adaptations: Jesus' Son, 1999.

* * *

Denis Johnson's first two novels, Angels and Fiskadoro, delineate the lives of outcasts on the fringes of their societies. The first is a contemporary urban novel whose characters drift into tragedy and moral and physical decline; still, it is a novel of hope. In the second, though the landscape is bleaker, an even deeper, more elemental hope for human survival is posited. Johnson brings his considerable gifts as a poet to help explore the possibilities of persistence and redemption in two separate worlds, one in decline, the other struggling to be born.

The surface of Angels is sensational, melodramatic, and even savage at times. Occasionally the characters are presented as cartoon-like as Johnson depicts the contemporary world in ways that bring this work close to the absurdist novel; however, Angels is finally a novel more in the realistic mode, and the self-conscious gothicism is meant as a comment on the irrationalism and hysteria that have become commonplace in descriptions of contemporary urban life in the United States.

The two lower-class characters, Jamie Mays and Bill Houston, an ex-sailor and ex-convict, are losers who travel across America in a state of radical drift. What we see is a society spiritually blighted by vacuous radio, movies, and TV, and superstitious cults that function as ersatz religions; all these derive from the human need for moral purpose and personal transcendence that have everywhere been lost and which only serve to disguise the destructive forces that lay just beneath the surface, often represented in images of self-immolation: "Scarlet light and white heat awoke her. She was in flames.... It was not her clothing, but her flesh itself that was burning." The setting of this hallucination is a mental ward where Jamie is taken after a psychotic break precipitated by a rape that is motivated by an almost indifferent sadism, itself the amoral outcome of a society spiritually lost, one in which self-identity is always at risk: "For a second standing in line behind a half dozen people, she felt as if no one part of herself was connected to any other." Bill Houston becomes involved in a bank robbery during which he kills a bank guard, but given the circumstances of his life, it is difficult to determine moral culpability. Mainly for political reasons, he is sentenced to die in the gas chamber, but the angel of light finally prevails and Bill's life is at the end given moral dimension in his epiphany at the moment of death: "He got it right in the dark between heartbeats, and rested there. And then he saw that another one wasn't going to come. That's it. That's the last. He looked at the dark. I would like to take this opportunity, he said, to pray for another human being." This is the angel of light, corresponding to Jamie's return to sanity and wholeness, and is the hope that infuses the end of the novel. However, no such hope is held out for a social healing.

Fiskadoro, Johnson's second novel, set in the Florida Keys two generations after the nuclear holocaust, is also a novel about survival, this time removed from an urban environment and put in the larger social context of the entirety of human society.

The question posed at the center of the novel is "What must be done to ensure the rebirth of civilization?" Several alternate societies coexist, and it is their clash and intermingling that provide the answer. Mr. Cheung represents the old pre-nuclear society built on art and rationalism; members of his group meet to try and reconstruct the Western (and to some extent, the Eastern) tradition from the bits and pieces of it that have survived: various artifacts, a book on nuclear war, a clarinet, spent radiation-sensitive buttons that declare the wearers believers in reason and science. The anti-culture, represented by Fiskadoro, a young teen, clashes with the defunct culture when Fiskadoro comes to Mr. Cheung (who is manager of the bedraggled Miami Symphony Orchestra) for clarinet lessons, as if asking Cheung to integrate him into the old cultural tradition. However, Fiskadoro has no talent for music and fails to master the instrument until at the end of the novel when he is transformed.

Fiskadoro becomes the leader of the new order, but only after he spends days among the jungle savages who destroy his memory through drugs and primitive ritual, which includes self-inflicted circumcision. This memory loss fits Fiskadoro as the harbinger, and perhaps founder, of the new world struggling to be born because, Johnson says, memory is the faculty through which history lives and culture is transmitted; memory severed makes rebirth possible. After the cleansing, the historical cycle will again be put in motion: "Everything we have, all we are, will meet its end, will be overcome, taken up, washed away. But everything came to an end before. Now it will happen again. Many times. Again and again." Alternating action at the end of the novel juxtaposes Fiskadoro's rebirth with that of Cheung's grandmother, a ship-wrecked Vietnamese refugee who is the offspring of a Western father and Asian mother. She spends twenty hours in the sea awaiting rescue: "The shock of finding herself here where she'd always been was like a birth." She has obvious parallels with Fiskadoro: "... saved not because she hadn't given up, because she had, and in fact she possessed no memory of the second night...." Thus Johnson integrates within this complex poetic novel the themes of social and individual regeneration. The novel at times strains to keep these and other elements in balance, but manages to do so often enough to make this ambitious work succeed.

With Already Dead, Johnson uses biting humor in a tale that is—on the surface at least—as light as Fiskadoro's is ponderous. Though a marijuana farmer, protagonist Nelson Fairchild, Jr., is a highly sympathetic figure, and when he gets himself between a rock and a hard place, the reader is compelled to care. In the midst of this, he saves the enigmatic Carl Van Ness from a suicide attempt, and the two hatch a scheme to rescue Fairchild's fortunes. As the book progresses, however, Nelson begins to wonder if Carl is not really his worst problem. Particularly compelling is Johnson's portrayal of the northern California setting: "hills above them massed with redwoods and the waves beating themselves to pieces in the mist below."

-Peter Desy

JOHNSON, Diane

Nationality: American. Born: Diane Lain in Moline, Illinois, 28 April 1934. Education: Stephens College, Columbia, Missouri, 1951–53, A.A. 1953; University of Utah, Salt Lake City, B.A. 1957; University of California, Los Angeles (Woodrow Wilson fellow), M.A. 1966, Ph.D. 1968. Family: Married 1) B. Lamar Johnson, Jr., in 1953, two sons and two daughters; 2) John Frederic Murray in 1968. Career: Member of the Department of English, University of California, Davis, 1968–87. Awards: American Association of University Women fellowship, 1968; Guggenheim fellowship, 1977; American Academy Rosenthal award, 1979; Strauss Living award, 1987. Agent: Lynn Nesbit, New York, New York. Address: 24 Edith Street, San Francisco, California 94133, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Fair Game. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1965.

Loving Hands at Home. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1968; London, Heinemann, 1969.

Burning. New York, Harcourt Brace, and London, Heinemann, 1971. The Shadow Knows. New York, Knopf, 1974; London, Bodley Head, 1975.

Lying Low. New York, Knopf, 1978; London, Bodley Head, 1979.Persian Nights. New York, Knopf, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1987.

Health and Happiness. New York, Knopf, 1990; London, Chatto and Windus, 1991.

Le Divorce. New York, Dutton, 1997.

Le Mariage. New York, Dutton, 2000.

Uncollected Short Stories

"An Apple, An Orange," in Prize Stories 1973, edited by William Abrahams. New York, Doubleday, 1973.

Plays

Screenplays: The Shining, with Stanley Kubrick, 1980.

Other

The True History of the First Mrs. Meredith and Other Lesser Lives.
New York, Knopf, 1972; London, Heinemann, 1973.
Terrorists and Novelists. New York, Knopf, 1982.
Dashiell Hammett: A Life. New York, Random House, 1983; as The Life of Dashiell Hammett, London, Chatto and Windus, 1984.
Natural Opium. New York, Knopf, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1993.

*

Critical Studies: Article by Judith S. Baughman, in Dictionary of Literary Biography Yearbook 1980, edited by Karen L. Rood, Jean W. Ross, and Richard Ziegfeld, Detroit, Gale, 1981; Women Writers of the West Coast: Speaking of Their Lives and Careers, edited by Marilyn Yalom, Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1983.

Diane Johnson comments:

(1986) I try not to think about my novels in sum too directly; but I guess I think of them as serious comic novels on subjects of contemporary concern. At the moment I'm writing a novel (set in Iran) about being American, and about political meddling, being a woman, relationships and ideas. I think these are pretty much the subjects of my other novels too. This is the first one not set in California.

* * *

In Fair Game, Diane Johnson's first novel, the characters' movement is toward pairing off and finding stability, despite some outward denials that this is what they want. The characters here are "types": the frustrated virgin, the ambitious executive, the frustrated executive, the ambitious writer, and the libidinous eccentric writer (clearly modeled on Henry Miller). Only in some of the matchmaking and in making the woman writer the author of a children's book taken up by intellectuals, does Johnson show much originality in dealing with the clichéd material.

Beginning with Loving Hands at Home the momentum of the characters' lives tends toward the splitting of bonds between people; man-woman love relationships in particular require heroic efforts to sustain them. In Johnson's later novels the women characters stand almost completely alone.

On the first page of Fair Game a man is said to have a knack for finding "moments of truth" in the course of any experience. Most of Johnson's protagonists are sensitized—at times to an obsessive degree—to this search for epiphanies. In The Shadow Knows N. Hexam is haunted by her premonition of evil and probes every occurrence for significance; Ouida in Lying Low believes in "old" magic, and watches for signs. And, as Karen Fry says in Loving Hands at Home, "It is odd how events follow suspicions, as if, by wondering about things, you cause them to happen." This is often the case in Johnson's work, though the characters are never prepared for the form these conjured-up events ultimately take. Despite this hunger for signs (and, in the early novels, a glut of psychiatrists) Johnson's characters are not particularly inward-looking; the outside world has to nudge or shake them. Karen Fry, for example, discovers she is unhappy with her life only after she impulsively accepts a motorcycle ride from a stranger and falls off: "A pratfall in the middle of Santa Monica Boulevard is too large a symbol to be overlooked." Karen, married into a tradition-bound Mormon family, longs to be like a shiftless girl she knew when she was younger; a girl who, in Karen's mind, directed her own fate in defiance of convention. Karen finally does free herself, becomes "shiftless," and takes up residence on the sand at the Pacific beach. There she creates her own symbol: a huge baroque sandcastle she contentedly lets the waves destroy because she knows she has done her work on it well.

In Burning the jolt that forces Barney and Bingo Edwards to look at themselves is the removal of a high hedge that kept out the sight of the disturbing, passionate lives of their psychiatrist neighbor and his patients. Bingo is a perfect wife, "infinitely erudite ... witty when she wasn't depressed," and the mother of two. But when she stands in for a junkie mother whose children are about to be taken by the state, her truthful answers to a bank of psychological tests classify her as an unfit mother. Here, as in all Johnson's novels except Fair Game, the main female character encounters women who personify hidden aspects of her own makeup: in Bingo's case, the unfit mother and promiscuous women. With their protective hedge gone, Bingo and Barney are infected with the neighbor's passions and the neighborhood burns—literally.

If the problem in these first three novels is how to attain and manage a passion-filled, self-determinate life, the problem in Lying Low and The Shadow Knows is not one of escaping the clichéd life, but how to be protected from slipping out of such a life into something truly horrible. In Lying Low Marybeth lives "underground," in fear of imprisonment for her part in a political bombing that took a life. Her life of passionate commitment has led her to a decade of the most mundane, restricted kind of life. Marybeth's landlady, Theo, is a dancer who chose the unsung life rather than risk failure trying to become a prima ballerina. Marybeth and Ouida, a Brazilian girl who is hiding from officials who want to have her deported, hide and live in fear of discovery, but when tragedy comes it comes not to them but to Theo while she is trying to move out of her mundane life and do something worthwhile for others.

The Shadow Knows is Johnson's most complex novel, partly because its subject is the indeterminate, lurking nature of evil. N. Hexam begins the new year with a prophetic dread she interprets as a premonition that she will be murdered. As in Loving Hands at Home, the root of her fear is "the realization that life can change on you, can darken like a rainy day; wretchedness and dread can overtake the lightest heart." It is this dread that is N. Hexam's worst enemy. For her evil is a closing circle with its center nowhere and its circumference all around her. (Johnson has said that The Shadow Knows was in part intended to show how race relations stood at the time of its writing, 1974, but the blackness of the two women that figure most prominently in N. Hexam's life is not their most important attribute; what is important about these women is that they live out two of N. Hexam's own possible fates: life drives one mad, while the other is killed by a violent man.)

All through The Shadow Knows N. Hexam tries to solve the puzzle of how and from where the anticipated evil will strike. The method she uses is to conceive an ideal Famous Inspector, someone part lover and part Sherlock Holmes, to whom she compares her own efforts at finding the answers she seeks. (Still, she knows such a Famous Inspector would be unable to understand her fears, because he would be male. Here, more clearly than in her other novels, Johnson insists there is a basic irreconcilable difference between women and men based in their different fears.) When a real life counterpart of this Famous Inspector appears, his name is Dyce, "suggesting the tincture of chance." He tells her many mysteries are insoluble, and so is the voice not of reason but of reality. As in Lying Low the anticipated evil does manifest itself, though in a form N. Hexam never anticipates. Her reaction is one of relief: now that she truly knows evil ("I... have taken on the thinness and the lightness of a shadow ...") she can live with it.

One might expect Le Mariage to precede Le Divorce, but exactly the opposite is the case. In the latter book, Isabel Walker, a high-spirited but disorganized drop-out from Berkeley film school, goes to Paris to rally round her stepsister Roxy. Roxy has one child and is pregnant with another; meanwhile, her French husband has left her for another woman. In the aftermath, much of which centers around a valuable painting disputed in the divorce settlement, Isabel gets an education in the conflicts of men and women, French and American. Le Mariage is not a sequel, though it is set in Paris and one of the characters from the earlier book, the faithless husband Antoine de Persand, joins the ensemble cast in a rollicking tale of misunderstanding, misadventure, and romance.

-William C. Bamberger

JOHNSON, Stephanie

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Auckland, New Zealand, 1961. Family: Married Tim Woodhouse; three children. Career: Actress, temporary secretary, 1980s; writer and homemaker, 1990s—. Lives in Auckland, New Zealand. Awards: Bruce Mason Memorial Playwright's Award.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Crimes of Neglect. Auckland, New Zealand, New Women's Press, 1992.

The Heart's Wild Surf. London, Vintage, 1996.
The Whistler. Auckland, New Zealand, Vintage, 1998.

Short Stories

The Glass Whittler: And Other Stories. New York, Penguin, 1989. All the Tenderness Left in the World: Short Stories. Dunedin, New Zealand, University of Otago Press, 1993.

Other

Editor, with Graham Beattie, Penguin 25 New Fiction. Auckland, New Zealand, Penguin, 1998.

* * *

For a young writer, Stephanie Johnson is surprisingly well published in the genres of the novel, short fiction, and poetry, and her dramatic works have been extensively produced on stage, over radio, in film, and on television. She is a reviewer and commentator on the arts, as well as being a drawing card at literary festivals, where she performs with flair and vigor. Johnson spent much of the 1980s living in Australia, a setting for her first and third novels. The second novel, The Heart's Wild Surf, explores the Pacific and Fijian antecedents of Johnson's New Zealand family.

Johnson, university-educated in history and drama, has a sharp satiric eye and a mordant wit, yet she shows sympathy for the human condition, in particular for derelicts, misfits, and for the innocence of youth, soon to meet the corruption of adult life. Basing her two historical novels on thorough research, she uses realism with postmodern touches, and a leavening of magic realism to create present and—in The Whistler—imaginative evocations of future dystopias.

In Crimes of Neglect, Johnson creates an anti-heroine, Bea, aged forty-two, failed wife, mother, and erstwhile failed cellist, "huge and ugly with open pores and dull red hair," often drunk and dirty, whose crimes have been to avoid all responsibility and to neglect traditional female duties. She is a "complete hedonist and selfish to the last," someone who has avoided responsibility by adhering blindly to her "Driftwood Theory," that she merely drifts at the mercy of the currents of life. When her daughter, who cares and is anxious for her, tells her that she must now stand on her own two feet, Bea is probably beyond redemption: "What an impossible idea, to look after myself.... How could I? I don't know how." Johnson plays with conventional notions of female beauty and novel heroines, of the efficacy of the nuclear family in a disintegrating society, and she reverses the normal child-parent roles. Bea is somehow made worthy by having a daughter who loves her. Some enlightenment comes to Bea in the last chapter as she prepares to latch onto a new man to take responsibility for her: "I would like to believe that my involvement [in the death and destruction that has followed her] was coincidental .... But I can't, of course." Terrible as Bea is, she is treated with sympathy by Johnson. Bea's conventional sisters are treated more harshly, as their more conforming female paths lead also to disaster. They lack the redeeming feature of Bea: her subversive and anarchic spirit. A cellist herself, Johnson cannot reject totally another cellist, Bea, however badly she plays.

The Heart's Wild Surf is a colonial novel, set in Fiji in 1918 during the British administration and the influenza epidemic, written from hindsight with all the post-modern tricks of a satiric postcolonial writer. Based on Johnson's own family history, the novel features the McNabs, chandlers and sailmakers working out of Suva. Being in trade, and connected only too recently with the stage and its elastic morals, the family is considered not respectable by fellow Englishmen, striving to keep up appearances before the natives. The McNabs are not coping with the epidemic, nor with the farce of colonial overlordship and increasingly restless natives; the First World War has left its toll on a son. Life is unpredictable and threatening, symbolized by a rampant tropical vine that destroys the Church and entwines almost unto death the innocent Olive, perhaps the only innocent person in the narrative. Johnson awards colonialism the full Technicolor satiric treatment: the stiff Brits, unable to forsake rubber corsets, flannel petticoats, fur stoles, trying to live out a raj of their own with support from Indian servants and a boost from ginlaced teapots. Romantic notions of a Pacific paradise, personified by an earlier visit from Rupert Brooke, who conducted an affair with the mad Elvira McNab (Gothic elements abound), are stubbed out by the present realities of British failure to adapt to that paradisiacal life. Being there, they have learned nothing from it, and have corrupted Paradise as well.

The story is narrated through the eyes of young Olive, who has second sight (elements of magic realism), and of her mother, dying of influenza. It is through the new generation of Olive that some accommodation with Fiji might be achieved: she does things her own instinctive way, not bound by the idiocies of British colonial heritage.

Johnson's novel The Whistler is her most difficult to fathom, and has been liked least by critics who point to its disjointed and episodic nature. Johnson admits to working in short infrequent bursts to accommodate bringing up her young family, and offers that this might lead to the work lacking clear narrative drive and cohesion. The book is set in dystopic Sydney in 2318, after collapse of the environment through exploitation and nuclear accident, when democracy is sacrificed to the corporate principle (rule by autocratic Tower Kings), when genetic modification has led to weird mutations of people and animals, and life itself seems in its terminal stage. Johnson calls this novel her protest, an angry book prompted by what she sees as the dumbing down of knowledge, the deletion of historical memory (which gives cohesion to society), the shrinkage of communality, and the elevation of economic agendas above human needs. She believes, and works out through the novel, the idea that only a sense of history may rescue the world from such an ignominious fate. Clinging still to a knowledge of the past in the novel is an underground group (inhabiting a sewer) who, as Record Keepers, keep hope alive. Hope exists also with the severely mutated boy, Vernon, and his mother, who maintain an old library of outlawed books. The story is narrated mostly through the "voice" of a mutant legless dog, the Whistler, who as well as narrating the story via his brain linkage to a computer, acts as the link between past and present, in that he has experienced many incarnations and deaths, from his presence at the birth of Christ, until now, possibly his last incarnation. The episodic nature of his narrative comes from his retelling of each incarnation as a complete episode. He puts his story on record, but the question is whether anyone will read it and learn from it.

The novel abounds in black humor, filth reminiscent of Gulliver among the Yahoos—in all Johnson's novel she dwells on human filth and detritus as symptom of inner lack of health and right thinking. There are gothic elements, mystery, and adventure (will dog and boy find out who Vernon's father is? Will they reach Grandfather and the Record Keepers before all remaining memory is erased?), science fiction and the nightmare of laboratory experiment, as well the traditional simple joys of telling a good story: the dog has plenty of them from former lives. In her novels Johnson reveals a diverse and genuinely creative mind, drawing on widely disparate material and methods of telling.

—Heather Murray

JOHNSTON, Jennifer (Prudence)

Nationality: Irish. Born: Ireland, 12 January 1930; daughter of the dramatist Denis Johnston. Education: Park House School, Dublin; Trinity College, Dublin. Family: Married 1) Ian Smyth in 1951, two sons and two daughters; 2) David Gilliland in 1976. Awards: Pitman award, 1972; Yorkshire Post award, 1973, 1980; Whitbread award, 1979. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1979; member, Aosdana. D.Litt.: University of Ulster, Coleraine, 1984. Address: Brook Hall, Culmore Road, Derry BT48 8JE, Northern Ireland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Captains and the Kings. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1972. The Gates. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1973.

How Many Miles to Babylon? London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Doubleday, 1974.

Shadows on Our Skin. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1977; New York, Doubleday, 1978.

The Old Jest. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1979; New York, Doubleday, 1980.

The Christmas Tree. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1981; New York, Morrow, 1982.

The Railway Station Man. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1984; New York, Viking, 1985.

Fool's Sanctuary. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1987; New York, Viking, 1988.

The Invisible Worm. London, Sinclair-Stevenson, 1991; New York, Carroll and Graf, 1993.

The Illusionist. London, Sinclair-Stevenson, 1995.

Finbar's Hotel (serial novel, with others), edited by Dermot Bolger. London, Picador, 1997; Dublin, New Island Books, 1997; San Diego, California, Harcourt Brace, 1999.

Two Moons. London, Review, 1998.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Trio," in Best Irish Short Stories 2, edited by David Marcus. London, Elek, 1977.

"The Theft," in Irish Ghost Stories, edited by Joseph Hone. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1977.

Plays

The Nightingale and Not the Lark (produced Dublin, 1979). London, French, 1981.

Indian Summer (produced Belfast, 1983).

Andante un Poco Mosso, in The Best Short Plays 1983, edited by Ramon Delgado. Radnor, Pennsylvania, Chilton, 1983.

The Porch (produced Dublin, 1986).

Three Monologues: Twinkletoes, Mustn't Forget High Noon, and Christine. Belfast, Lagan Press, 1995.

The Desert Lullaby: A Play in Two Acts. Belfast, Lagan Press, 1996.

*

Critical Studies: "Three Writers of the Big House: Elizabeth Bowen, Molly Keane and Jennifer Johnston" by Bridget O'Toole, in Across a Roaring Hill: The Protestant Imagination in Modern Ireland edited by Gerald Dawe and Edna Longley, Belfast, Blackstaff Press, 1985; Studies in the Fiction of Jennifer Johnston and Mary Lavin by Eileen Fauset. Ft. Lauderdale, Florida, Nova Southeastern University, 1998.

* * *

Jennifer Johnston is often described as a Big House novelist, writing in the tradition (beginning with Maria Edgeworth and continuing to William Trevor) of those who delineate the plight of the Anglo-Irish, strangers alike in Ireland and England, living an attenuated half-life of divided loyalties and allegiances in crumbling houses filled with the ghostly remains of better days and a broader culture, more and more alienated from the world of the native Irish around them, treated by their former inferiors with, at best, indifference, at worst, open hostility.

There are, of course, reasons for grounding Johnston in this tradition. All her novels focus on a situation in which a member of the Anglo-Irish is led to try to overcome their political and personal isolation by creating a relationship, across the barriers of national identity, class, religion, and political allegiance, with a member of the native Irish. This attempt is doomed to failure from the start; the barriers to be surmounted being too well entrenched in time and history.

Yet, in spite of the apparent familiarity of the setting and subject matter, and even the depiction of family relationships in her novels, it is far too limiting to regard Johnston merely as a Big House novelist. In a 1987 article she said:

What the characters in my books are trying to do ... is to keep for a few moments their heads above the waters of inexorable history. "I know that in the end I will drown," they shout. "But at this moment I am waving."

This statement encapsulates a central aspect of Johnston's parable-like novels. The personal and the historical are so intertwined, with metaphors and allusions resonating from one sphere to the other, that it is impossible to say whether what is paramount is a portrait of class at a crucial historical juncture, modulated through the experiences of particular characters or the examination of personal situations of alienation, loneliness, choice, and the necessity for and function of art against the determining and limiting background of time, history, and tradition.

Most of Johnston's characters are would-be artists, musicians, or writers. They are concerned with the relationship between art and life; the formality and perfection of art and the shapelessness and failure of life. Many of them look for subjects for their art and, because she has a fondness for first-person, retrospective narratives, that subject is often their own lives and the crucial moments when the choices that determined the shape of those lives were made. To this extent, many of her novels are Bildungsroman—portraits of the artist as a young man or woman, even if recollected from age or at the point of death. The themes that are crucial in this, essentially personal, focus are the forces of family, society, and tradition that entrap the writer. As Alex Moore shapes his life before his execution (How Many Miles to Babylon?) he makes it clear that it is his rejection by his cold, manipulative mother and the social pressures that compel him, against his own inclination, to be "an Officer and a Gentleman" that have led directly to his impending death. The focus seems to be less on the background of World War I or the 1916 rising than on Alex's sense of silence and isolation in the murderous battle between his parents. However, it is also clear that Alex's parents represent different allegiances, different senses of history. He is caught in more than a personal impasse. He is torn between conflicting roles, identities, allegiances. His attempt to escape in his companionship with Jerry Crowe, cannot succeed. The "inexorable" force of "history" is against it. That history conditions Jerry Crowe, too. One of the achievements of Johnston's novels is her capacity to suggest levels of complexity beneath the apparent simplicity and lyricism of her prose. Jerry is not presented as the stereotyped "peasant" living in harmony with the land and his own senses, the opposite to Alex's repressed intellectualism. Jerry too is sent to his death by his mother and is, in his way, as alienated from his home and class as is Alex. In the presentation of these destructive mothers (and in the naming of the horse which the two young men train for the Morrigan, the Celtic Goddess of war), Johnston is extending the scope of her themes from conflicted nationalisms to a consideration of the human capacity for violence.

It is noticeable that all of her novels deal with war in one form or another. Two are set against the background of World War I. The Old Jest and Fool's Sanctuary deal with the period of the Black and Tans. Shadows on Our Skin and The Railway Station Man are concerned with the modern IRA. The Christmas Tree is centrally concerned with the holocaust. In one sense, Johnston's novels represent an answer to the question of whether it is possible to deal with the reality of contemporary violence in the north without being programmatic or strident. She is able to do this because the violence is seen as both almost unimportant and as a permanent part of human experience. The essential question about war and death is how the experience is used, and in this aspect, there has been a notable development in the novels. The early ones concentrate on defeat. The wave before the drowning is very subdued; the characters are in retreat from life, insulating themselves behind writing, drinking, or accepting that there is no possibility of a relationship with the world or with another individual. In the later novels, however, the outlook is more hopeful. Even though Constance Keating dies (The Christmas Tree) she has left behind her a child who will provide hope for Jacob's future, and she has got young Bridie May to arrange her papers into a, finally, publishable book. The latest novel, The Invisible Worm, is the most ambitious to date, providing in its story of incest and abuse of a daughter by her successful politician father, a chilling metaphor of the state of modern Ireland, and a new variation of Johnston's old reworking of the stereotype of "Mother Ireland." It also continues to suggest that moments of personal happiness can be snatched in spite of violence and madness and that the ghosts of the past which haunt all Johnson's characters, can be appeased.

—Anne Clune

JOLLEY, (Monica) Elizabeth

Nationality: Australian. Born: Monica Elizabeth Knight in Birmingham, England, 4 June 1923; moved to Australia, 1959; became citizen, 1978. Education: Friends' School, Sibford, Oxfordshire, 1934–40; St. Thomas' Hospital, London (orthopaedic nursing training), 1940-43; Queen Elizabeth Hospital, Birmingham (general training), 1943-46. Family: Married Leonard Jolley; two daughters and one son. Career: Salesperson, nurse, and domestic, 1960s. Part-time tutor in creative writing, Fremantle Arts Centre, Western Australia, from 1974; part-time tutor in English from 1978, writer-in-residence, 1982, and since 1984 half-time tutor in English, Western Australian Institute of Technology, Bentley; half-time lecturer and writer-inresidence from 1986, and since 1989 honorary writer-in-residence, Curtin University of Technology, Perth, Western Australia. Writerin-residence, Scarborough Senior High School, Winter 1980, and Western Australian College of Advanced Education, Nedlands, 1983. President, Australian Society of Authors, 1985–86. Awards: State of Victoria prize, for short story, 1966, 1981, 1982; Sound Stage prize, for radio play, 1975; Wieckhard prize, 1975; Australian Writers Guild prize, for radio play, 1982; Western Australia Week prize, 1983; The Age Book of the Year award, 1983, 1989; Australia Council Literature Board senior fellowship, 1984; New South Wales Premier's award, 1985; Australian Bicentennial National Literary award, 1986; Miles Franklin award, 1987; Fellowship of Australian Writers Ramsden plaque, 1988; Australian Literary Society Gold Medal award, 1991, for Cabin Fever; The France-Australia award, 1993, for translation of The Sugar Mother; The Premier of West Australia's prize, 1993, for Central Mischief; National Book Connail Banjo award, 1994, for The Georges' Wife. D.Tech.: Western Australian Institute of Technology, 1986. Officer, Order of Australia, 1988. Agent: Caroline Lurie, Australian Literary Management, 2-A Armstrong Street, Middle Park, Victoria 3206. Address: 28 Agett Road, Claremont, Western Australia 6010, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

- Palomino. Collingwood, Victoria, Outback Press, and London, Melbourne House, 1980; New York, Persea, 1987.
- The Newspaper of Claremont Street. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1981; New York, Viking, 1987; London, Penguin, 1988.
- Mr. Scobie's Riddle. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1983; New York, Penguin, 1984; London, Penguin, 1985.
- Miss Peabody's Inheritance. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1983; New York, Viking, 1984; London, Viking, 1985.
- Milk and Honey. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1984; New York, Persea, 1986; London, Viking, 1987.
- Foxybaby. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, and New York, Viking, 1985; London, Viking, 1986.
- The Well. Ringwood, Victoria, London, and New York, Viking, 1986.
  The Sugar Mother. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, and New York, Harper, 1988; London, Viking, 1989.
- My Father's Moon. Ringwood, Victoria, and London, Viking, and New York, Harper, 1989.
- Cabin Fever. Ringwood, Victoria, Viking, 1990; London, Sinclair-Stevenson, and New York, Harper Collins, 1991.
- The Georges' Wife. Ringwood, Victoria, Viking, 1993.
- The Orchard Thieves. Ringwood, Victoria, Viking, 1995.
- Lovesong. Victoria, Australia, and New York, Viking, 1997.

Short Stories

- Five Acre Virgin and Other Stories. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1976.
- The Travelling Entertainer and Other Stories. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1979.
- Woman in a Lampshade. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1983; New York and London, Penguin, 1986.
- Stories. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1984; New York, Viking, 1988; London, Penguin, 1989.
- Fellow Passengers: Collected Stories, edited by Barbara Milech. Ringwood, Victoria, New York, Penguin Books, 1997.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Talking Bricks," in Summer's Tales 2, edited by Kylie Tennant. Melbourne and London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1965.
- "The Rhyme," in Westerly (Nedlands, Western Australia), no. 4, 1967.
- "The Sick Vote," in Quadrant (Sydney), vol. 12, no. 5, 1968.
- "The Well-Bred Thief," in South Pacific Stories, edited by Chris and Helen Tiffin. St. Lucia, Queensland, SPACLALS, 1980.
- "Mark F," in The True Life Story of ..., edited by Jan Craney and Esther Caldwell. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1981.
- "Night Report," "It's about Your Daughter Mrs. Page," and "Poppy Seed and Sesame Rings," in Frictions, edited by Anna Gibbs and Alison Tilson. Fitzroy, Victoria, Sybylla, 1982.
- "Night Runner," in Room to Move, edited by Suzanne Falkiner. Sydney, Allen and Unwin, 1985.
- "Bathroom Dance," in Transgressions, edited by Don Anderson. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1986.
- "Frederick the Great Returns to Fairfields," in Portrait: A West Coast Collection, edited by B.R. Coffey and Wendy Jenkins. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1986.
- "This Flickering, Foxy Man, My Father," in Vogue Australia (Sydney), October 1986.
- "Mr. Berrington," in Australian Literary Quarterly, April 1987.
- "Melon Jam," in The Crankworth Bequest and Other Stories, edited by Jennifer Haynes and Barry Carozzi. Adelaide, Australian Association for the Teaching of English, 1987.
- "A Miracle of Confluence," in Landfall (Christchurch), no. 2, 1988.
- "727 Chester Road," in Southern Review (Adelaide), vol. 21, no. 3, 1988.
- "The Fellmonger," in Eight Voices of the Eighties, edited by Gillian Whitlock. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1989.
- "My Mother's Visit," in Westerly (Nedlands, Western Australia), vol. 34, no. 4, 1989.
- "The Widow's House," in Expressway, edited by Helen Daniel. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1989.
- "The Goose Path," in Best Short Stories 1990, edited by Giles Gordon and David Hughes. London, Heinemann, 1990; as The Best English Short Stories 1990, New York, Norton, 1990.
- "The Widder Tree Shadder Murder," in Crimes for a Summer Christmas, edited by Stephen Knight. Sydney, Allen and Unwin, 1990.

Plays

- Woman in a Lampshade (broadcast 1979). Published in Radio Quartet, Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1980.
- Radio Plays: Night Report, 1975; The Performance, 1976; The Shepherd on the Roof, 1977; The Well-Bred Thief, 1977; Woman in a Lampshade, 1979; Two Men Running, 1981; Paper Children, 1988; Little Lewis Has Had a Lovely Sleep, 1990.; Off the Air: Nine Plays for Radio. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin Books, 1995.

Poetry

Diary of a Weekend Farmer. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1993.

Other

Travelling Notebook: Literature Notes. Fremantle, Western Australia, Arts Access, 1978.

Central Mischief. Ringwood, Victoria, Viking, 1992.

*

Manuscript Collections: Mitchell Library, Sydney.

Critical Studies: Articles by Jolley and by Laurie Clancy, in Australian Book Review (Melbourne), November 1983; Helen Garner, in Meanjin (Melbourne), no. 2, 1983; "Between Two Worlds" by A.P. Riemer, in Southerly (Sydney), 1983; "The Goddess, the Artist, and the Spinster" by Dorothy Jones, in Westerly (Nedlands, Western Australia), no. 4, 1984; Joan Kirkby, in Meanjin (Melbourne), no. 4, 1984; Martin Harrison, in The Age Monthly Review (Melbourne), May 1985; Elizabeth Jolley: New Critical Essays edited by Delys Bird and Brenda Walker, Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1991; Bio-Fictions: Brian Matthews, Drusilla Modjeska, and Elizabeth Jolley by Helen Thomson. Townsville, Queensland, Foundation for Australian Literary Studies, 1994.

Elizabeth Jolley comments:

(1991) In my writing I try to explore and celebrate the small things in human life. I am interested in people and their needs and feelings. I work with imagination from moments of truth and awareness. Characters stay with me for years.

* * *

Elizabeth Jolley has had perhaps the most meteoric rise to fame of any Australian writer during the last quarter of the twentieth century. Apart from stories in anthologies and journals Jolley had had no work published until 1976 when, at the age of fifty-three, her collection Five Acre Virgin and Other Stories appeared under the aegis of the newly formed Fremantle Arts Centre Press. Since then her rate of publication has been as phenomenal as the rise in critical acclaim of her work. The stories were written over a period of sixteen years prior to publication in book form and show already her peculiar combination of unsentimental realism and original, often bizarre humor. The title itself suggests one of the most pervasive themes in her early work. "There's nothing like having a piece of land," a protagonist in several of the stories says. "Having a piece of land" is crucial to the characters in these works, many of whom are dispossessed or migrants or both. They have come from Vienna, where the author's father grew up, or the Black Country of England where she herself lived, or Holland from where the recurring figure of Uncle Bernard migrated. They struggle all their lives to buy the talismanic five acres only to find out that they cannot live off them. They lie and blackmail in order to stay on other people's land. Adam, in "Adam's Wife," one of the most powerful and somber stories that Jolley has written, even marries a retarded woman in order to gain possession of her miserable shack and few acres.

Jolley's second collection, The Travelling Entertainer, contains her longer stories from much the same period and shows her going back and revising and reworking the same material—themes, characters, landscapes, situations and motifs, even names. As well as the preoccupation with land again, the stories contain many elements that appear throughout her work: allusions to music (especially Beethoven), to literature (especially Tolstoy), the interest in nursing homes and hospitals, the figure of the defeated salesman, the migrants from Holland and the Black Country including Uncle Bernard again, and the first of Jolley's many treatments of lesbian relationships and of women offering themselves to other women as a form of comfort or consolation or even occasionally as a means of achieving power. A lesbian relationship is at the center of her first and least typical novel, Palomina, which was written partly in the late 1950s, partly in 1962, and then rewritten over 1970, 1973, and 1974 before finally appearing in 1980. It is a lyrical, even reverential account of a love affair between a sixty-year-old deregistered doctor and another woman barely half her age. It is totally devoid of her usual humor and sense of the incongruous and despite the then controversial subject the two women behave with such relentless nobility towards each other that they threaten to become merely boring. The Newspaper of Claremont Street is vintage Jolley, not her most profound book but a delightfully amusing and at times quite poignant one. The heroine of this novella is a cleaning woman known as Newspaper, or Weekly, because she gathers gossip from her rich clients and passes it on to the rest of the community.

Mr. Scobie's Riddle placed Jolley instantly in the forefront of Australian novelists. Set in the appalling nursing home of St. Christopher and St. Jude, the novel gives full vent to her penchant for mordant and grotesque humor; it is both hilarious and horrifying and yet its triumph is that it avoids the extremes of seeing the aged people of the home as either the victims of society's cruelty and indifference on the one hand, or merely comic eccentrics on the other. Woman in a Lampshade is an assured collection of stories, though there is little in it to surprise readers of the author's earlier work, while Miss Peabody's Inheritance is an earlier novella, rewritten, which cuts back and forth between two separate and interrelated stories. At the end of the book, the two stories, set in England and Australia, converge in an unexpected way to make a comment on a theme that increasingly concerns Jolley in her later work: the relationship between life and art, and between reality and fantasy.

Throughout the 1980s Jolley continued her prolific output, confirming her reputation and winning all major Australian literary awards at some stage or other. The short novel Milk and Honey is a strange parable and a darkly disturbing, somber book. Foxybaby, on the other hand, returns more to the bizarrely comic and almost surreal mode of Mr. Scobie's Riddle. The Well is a fusion of Grimm fairytale (there are many images and motifs to do with fairytales) and psychological thriller, about two women who lower a man down into a well after they believe they have killed him in a car accident. The significance of the well itself, as both fact and symbol, steadily expands as disturbing ripples swell out from the initial action. The title of The Sugar Mother refers to the surrogate mother used by one of the characters in this strange but delicate novel in which most of the meanings are both subterranean and suggestive, the comedy present but muted and somber.

But perhaps Jolley's finest achievements came later, with the publication of My Father's Moon and Cabin Fever. Here Jolley has returned to her roots, to what Yeats called "the foul rag and bone shop of the heart," in order to reassess her life and work. What the critic Helen Daniel said of My Father's Moon—that it is "the novel at the heart of all her work"—is equally true of its successor and the two books read in fact like the first two parts of a closely autobiographical and linked trilogy. Their protagonist is Vera or Veronica Wright and the setting is England in all the misery of its immediate postwar austerity. My Father's Moon depicts Vera as a young girl, growing up to become a student nurse during the war and becoming pregnant by a worthless doctor. By the time of Cabin Fever her lover is dead, she has given birth to a daughter and become a qualified nurse. Vera speculates at one point on "Whether things are written down or they dwell somewhere within and surface unbidden at anytime." The two novels are a record of that unbidden surfacing, a confrontation with the events of the past and all their shaping of the novelist's subsequent art.

-Laurie Clancy

JONES, Gayl

Nationality: American. Born: Lexington, Kentucky, 23 November 1949. Education: Connecticut College, New London, B.A. in English 1971; Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, M.A. 1973, D.A. 1975. Career: Member of the Department of English, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, 1975–83. Awards: Howard Foundation award, 1975; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1976. Address: c/o Lotus Press, P.O. Box 21607, Detroit, Michigan 48221, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Corregidora. New York, Random House, 1975; London, Camden, 1988.

Eva's Man. New York, Random House, 1976. The Healing. Boston, Beacon Press, 1998. Mosquito. Boston, Beacon Press, 1999.

Short Stories

White Rat. New York, Random House, 1977.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Almeyda," in Massachusetts Review (Amherst), Winter 1977.
- "Ensinança," in Confirmation, edited by Amiri and Amina Baraka. New York, Morrow, 1983.

Plays

Chile Woman. New York, Shubert Foundation, 1975.

Poetry

Song for Anninho. Detroit, Lotus Press, 1981. The Hermit-Woman. Detroit, Lotus Press, 1983. Xarque. Detroit, Lotus Press, 1985.

Other

Liberating Voices: Oral Tradition in African American Literature.

Cambridge and London, Harvard University Press, 1991.

*

Critical Studies: Engendering the Subject: Gender and Self-Representation in Contemporary Women's Fiction by Sally Robinson, Albany, State University of New York Press, 1991; Bridging the Americas: The Literature of Paula Marshall, Toni Morrison and Gayl Jones by Stelamaris Coser, Philadelphia, Temple University Press, 1994.

* * *

Gayl Jones's first novel, Corregidora, focuses on the lingering effects of slavery in black America-specifically on its sexual and psychological manifestations in the life of Ursa Corregidora, a Kentucky blues singer. The great granddaughter of a Portuguese plantation owner who fathered not only her grandmother but also her mother, and who used his progeny both in the fields and in his own whorehouse, Ursa is unable to free herself of painful and obsessive family memories. In each personal relationship she finds yet again the sickness of the master-slave dynamic. Her short-lived first marriage is convulsive with desire, possessiveness, humiliation, and violence; her second, safer, marriage fails as she cannot forget the first. In relating Ursa's story, Jones shows the difficulty of loving when abusive relationships have been naturalized by cultural continuity, when so much has been taken that one's only dignity is in withholding. Her taut and explicit idiom, sometimes plainly narrative, sometimes wildly stream-of-consciousness, captures the nuances of a tormented sexuality that is both specific to black experience and symptomatic of our troubled gender system. "I knew what I still felt. I knew that I still hated him. Not as bad as then, not with the first feeling, but an after feeling, an aftertaste, or like an odor still in a room when you come back to it, and it's your own." The book's ending, almost unbearably intense but strangely hopeful, suggests that we may begin to heal ourselves only as we confront the deep sexual hatred that pervades our lives.

Whereas Corregidora allows us to perceive the construction of personality as historical process, Eva's Man offers a very different kind of experience, one that many readers have found profoundly disturbing. Eva Canada, the main character of the novel, tells her tale from an institution for the criminally insane, where she has been imprisoned for a hideous sexual crime of murder and dental castration. Like Ursa, Eva has been damaged by abuse and by a legacy of violence; unlike the protagonist of Corregidora, she has no sense of how her past motivates her present. As she speaks her disjointed narrative, an ugly story disrupted by flashes of recalled nastiness, she remains alien to us, a personality beyond promise or repair.

I put my hand on his hand. I kissed his hand, his neck. I put my fingers in the space above his eyes, but didn't close them. They'd come and put copper coins over them. That's why they told you not to suck pennies. I put my forehead under his chin. He was warm. The glass had spilled from his hand. I put my tongue between his parted lips. I kissed his teeth.

In Eva's Man, Jones takes us into the pathological mind, and we do not find ourselves there. As the tidy reader-protagonist identification is denied us, we are left with the horror of what we can't sympathetically imagine. Jones's unflinching violation of our strongest taboos-made all the more chilling by her starkly controlled prose-raises a number of questions about the roles of writers, readers, and cultural conventions. Beyond shock value, what does a writer achieve in presenting the truly sordid? Is our understanding necessarily dependent upon the protagonist's understanding? What do disturbing books demand of us that comforting ones do not? How must we see the world in order to change it? The stories that make up White Rat suggest that Jones is intent on keeping those questions before us. The majority of these pieces ("Legend," "Asylum," "The Coke Factory," "The Return," "Version 2," "Your Poems Have Very Little Color in Them") are about madness or extreme psychic alienation. Some ("The Women," "Jevata") address the painful complications of desperate sexual arrangements. The most attractive, of course, are those few ("White Rat," "Persona," "The Roundhouse") that hint at successful human connection despite overwhelming odds. Like Eva's Man, most of the stories in White Rat challenge our notions of what fiction should do.

Jones's later novels, The Healing and Mosquito, press the limits of the novel in an entirely different direction, by evoking the sound and form of oral storytelling. The narration in both novels is idiomatic and non-linear, following the syntax and associative logic of the spoken word. And though both novels are written in the first-person, they incorporate multiple voices through free indirect discourse, and through a technique in which the narrator responds to the implied questions of her audience, creating a dialogic, multi-voiced narrative. In Mosquito, the narrator expressly comments on this form, suggesting that she's creating a jazz narrative in which the readers can join in and improvise as they will.

This new dialogic narrative form corresponds to a greater emphasis on the beneficial possibilities in human interaction. The narrator of The Healing is a faith healer who can cure afflictions of both the body and mind; the narrator of Mosquito is an African-American woman truck driver in south Texas who becomes involved in the new Underground Railroad, transporting illegal immigrants and providing sanctuary. Both of these narrators experience transformation and a change of consciousness, yet the narratives' non-linear forms suggest that these changes are neither sudden nor isolated, but instead interconnected with the narrators' histories.

Harlan Jane Eagleton, the narrator of The Healing, for instance, tells her tale backwards. She moves from her experience as a faith healer to her previous career as the manager of the rock star, Joan "the bitch" Savage, her affairs with Joan's husband and with an African-German horse breeder, her brief marriage to a medical anthropologist, and her first career, as a beautician. As a faith healer, Harlan continues to promote natural beauty products and to listen to Joan's music. The bodyguard of her horse-breeder lover is her "witness," so that all of the experiences of Harlan's life inform her contemporary identity as a healer. Harlan's ability to heal is never explained; instead, the retrospective narrative stands in for the explanation, suggesting that Harlan's increasing independence and ability to "manage herself" eventually leads to her ability to heal herself, and then to heal others.

African-American women's independence is a major theme in Mosquito as well. Mosquito herself (aka Sojourner Jane Nadine Johnson) is an independent truck driver who refuses to join the union and who eventually forms the worker-owned Mosquito Trucking Company. Her childhood friend, Monkey Bread, joins the "Daughters of Nzingha," an African-American women's group that pursues womanist philosophy and advocates economic independence for its members. This emphasis on independence complements rather than contradicts the novel's other main theme, of interdependence. It is because Mosquito remains independent from the union that she can carry immigrants in the back of her truck and thereby discharge her social obligations to the immigrants that she understands to be the contemporary versions of fugitive slaves. Thus in this novel as well, history (both personal and cultural) informs the main character's change of consciousness.

Jones's skillful control of African-American idiom, use of parody, and ability to subtly signify on everything from the CIA's illegal activities to movie stars' hair color in Mosquito has led reviewers to compare Jones's work to that of Zora Neale Hurston, Ralph Ellison, and Ishmael Reed. In fact, Jones's more recent work draws on both the traditions of the African-American vernacular and on the forms of postmodern literature, creating novels that layer many forms and provide commentary on the state of the novel. Both Mosquito and The Healing are replete with references to, and analysis of, other novels from Invisible Man to Huckleberry Finn. Much of Jones's brilliance lies in her ability to use the colloquial voice of working-class African-American women to provide not only extensive social commentary but also intriguing metafictional discourse on the nature of narrative, or, in the words of The Healing's narrator, "confabulatory truth."

-Janis Butler Holm, updated by Suzanne Lane

JONES, (Morgan) Glyn

Nationality: British. Born: Merthyr Tydfil, Glamorgan, 28 February 1905. Education: Castle Grammar School, Merthyr Tydfil; St. Paul's College, Cheltenham, Gloucestershire. Married Phyllis Doreen Jones in 1935. Career: Formerly a schoolmaster in Glamorgan; now retired. First chair, Yr Academi Gymreig (English Section). Awards: Welsh Arts Council prize, for non-fiction, 1969, and Premier award, 1972. D.Litt.: University of Wales, Cardiff, 1974. Agent: Laurence Pollinger Ltd., 18 Maddox Street, London W1R 0EU, England. Address: 158 Manor Way, Whitchurch, Cardiff CF4 1RN, Wales.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Valley, The City, The Village. London, Dent, 1956.The Learning Lark. London, Dent, 1960.The Island of Apples. London, Dent, and New York, Day, 1965; revised edition, Cardiff, University of Wales Press, 1992.

Short Stories

The Blue Bed. London, Cape, 1937; New York, Dutton, 1938. The Water Music. London, Routledge, 1944. Selected Short Stories. London, Dent, 1971. Welsh Heirs. Llandysul, Dyfed, Gomer, 1977.

Plays

The Beach of Falesá (verse libretto), music by Alun Hoddinott (produced Cardiff, 1974). London, Oxford University Press, 1974.

Poetry

Poems. London, Fortune Press, 1939.

The Dream of Jake Hopkins. London, Fortune Press, 1954.

Selected Poems. Llandysul, Dyfed, Gomer, 1975.

The Meaning of Fuchsias. Newtown, Gregynog Press, 1987.

Selected Poems, Fragments, and Fictions. Bridgend, Glamorgan, Poetry Wales Press, 1988.

The Story of Heledd, with T.J. Morgan; edited by Jenny Rowland and engravings by Harry Brockway. Newtown, Powys, Gwasg Grefynog, 1994.

The Collected Poems of Glyn Jones, edited by Meic Stephens. Cardiff, University of Wales Press, 1996.

Other

The Dragon Has Two Tongues: Essays on Anglo-Welsh Writers and Writing. London, Dent, 1968.

Profiles: A Visitor's Guide to Writing in Twentieth Century Wales, with John Rowlands. Llandysul, Dyfed, Gomer, 1980.

Setting Out: A Memoir of Literary Life in Wales. Cardiff, University College Department of Extra Mural Studies, 1982.

Random Entrances to Gwyn Thomas. Cardiff, University College Press, 1982.

Editor, Poems '76. Llandysul, Dyfed, Gomer, 1976.

Translator, with T.J. Morgan, The Saga of Llywarch the Old. London, Golden Cockerel Press, 1955.

Translator, What Is Worship?, by E. Stanley John. Swansea, Wales for Christ Movement, 1978.

Translator, When the Rose-bush Brings Forth Apples (Welsh folk poetry). Gregynog, Powys, Gregynog Press, 1980.

Translator, Honeydew on the Wormwood (Welsh folk poetry). Gregynog, Powys, Gregynog Press, 1984.

Translator, A People's Poetry: Hen Benillion. Bridgend, Wales, Seren, 1997.

*

Bibliographies: By John and Sylvia Harris, in Poetry Wales 19 (Bridgend, Glamorgan), 3–4, 1984.

Manuscript Collections: National Library of Wales, Aberystwyth.

Critical Studies: Article by Iolo Llwyd, in South Wales Magazine (Cardiff), Autumn 1970; Glyn Jones by Leslie Norris, Cardiff, University of Wales Press, 1973, and article by Norris in British Novelists 1930–1959 edited by Bernard Oldsey, Detroit, Gale, 1983; Harri Pritchard-Jones, in Welsh Books and Writers (Cardiff), Autumn 1981; David Smith, in Arcade (Cardiff), February 1982.

Glvn Jones comments:

I began my literary life as a poet. In 1934 I first became friendly with Dylan Thomas, who suggested I should write short stories, as he himself was doing then. My first published book was a volume of short stories, The Blue Bed. This was written when the great industrial depression was at its most intense in South Wales and the longest story in the book takes this for its subject. South Wales, industrial and agricultural—this is the theme in all the stories in The Blue Bed. Indeed, all my prose, and much of my poetry, is concerned with this region. The novel The Valley, The City, The Village, which is partly autobiographical, tries to convey what it was like to grow up in South Wales; The Learning Lark deals with learning and teaching in the area; The Island of Apples describes childhood and its fantasies in a closely knit community in the Welsh valleys.

The Water Music has stories about both the industrial east of South Wales (Glamorgan) and the agricultural west (Carmarthen, Pembroke, Cardigan). To quote my publisher—I have "carried the medium [i.e., the imaginative short story] to an unexcelled synthesis of realism and fantasy, magic and humor. From the regional contrasts of industrialism and pastoralism, modernity and tradition, he builds up a world of convincing beauty, and expresses himself in a prose style of unusual poetic vitality." I would accept this as a statement of what I have tried to do in my short stories. Whether I've done it is of course quite another question.

* *

"While using cheerfully enough the English language, I have never written in it a word about any country other than Wales, or any people other than Welsh people," wrote Glyn Jones in The Dragon Has Two Tongues. This deliberate limitation of his material is the only reason I can suggest for any kind of restriction to the general recognition his gifts deserve.

Certainly his stories and novels, although they share a Welsh background, are set in widely separate countries of the mind, pose different problems, and offer to us recognizable human situations. His prose, too, is very much more than the "cheerful use" of the English language. Always exuberant and seemingly spendthrift ("I fancy words," he says in his poem, "Merthyr"), it is also exact, muscular, very energetic. He can range from elegant and mannered writing—and the use of a vocabulary so exotic that it upset some reviewers of his first novel, The Valley, The City, The Village—to the direct, racy, almost physical style, the true, idiosyncratic speaking voice we find in some of the stories and in the two later novels.

His Wales commonly has two contrasting faces, that of the idyllic land of country happiness opposing the suppurating mining towns where the ugly, comical people are unfailingly kindly. But it also exists as a metaphysical universe, and the young people who are to be found in almost everything Jones writes are given early experience of both Heaven and Hell. To some extent this duality reflects Jones's own early life; during his impressionable boyhood he lived in the grimy steel and coal town of Merthyr Tydfil, but spent significant periods in Llanstephan, a beautiful Carmarthenshire village.

His identification with the scenes and characters of his imagination is absolutely complete, and it is noticeable that many of these stories and all three of his novels are told in the first person. Many critics, indeed, thought The Valley, The City, The Village largely autobiographical, although this story of a young painter, aware of his vocation but forced by the obstinate love of his grandmother to go to university to train as a preacher, has only tenuous links with Jones's own life. It is the quality of Jones's visual imagination and the unjudging tolerance that lies behind his observation that make his young artist credible.

For in the end Jones's love of his people is the illuminating quality of his work. He has created a whole gallery of memorable characters, some of them fully realized, some of whom enter his pages but once. He sees their blemishes, particularly their physical shortcomings, as clearly as their virtues, but to him they are lovable because their faults are the faults of human beings. Even in The Learning Lark, that picaresque send-up of the state of education in a corrupt mining valley where teachers have to bribe their way to headships, there is no scalding satire. Both bribed and bribers are seen as only too human and the book is full of gargantuan laughter.

The world of childhood and adolescence, that magical period when the real and the imagined are hardly to be distinguished, has been a particularly fertile area of Jones's concern. The Water Music, for example, is a collection of stories about young people: of his three novels only one is set entirely in the world of adults, and even that one has some very realistic schoolboys in it.

The Island of Apples is a full-scale exploration of the world of adolescence, seen through the eyes of the boy Dewi. It is a remarkable novel, using a prose which is obviously the boy's voice, yet flexible and powerful enough to describe an enormous range of events and emotions. Its sensitivity, its combination of dreamlike confusion and the clear, unsentimental observation which is the adolescent state of mind, the excitement with which the boy invests the commonplace with the exotic, are perfectly balanced attributes of a work which is as individual and complete as Le Grand Meaulnes, that other evocation of vanishing youth.

Perhaps the greatest of Jones's qualities is that of delight in the created world and the people who inhabit it. If he writes of a small and often shabby corner of that world—the first story in The Blue Bed is called "I Was Born in the Ystrad Valley" and it is to Ystrad that he returns for The Island of Apples—yet his writing is a celebration, an act of praise. To this end he has shaped his craftsmanship and inspiration, and his achievement is permanent and real.

-Leslie Norris

JONES, Gwyneth A(nn)

Also writes as Ann Halam. Nationality: English. Born: Manchester, England, 14 February 1952. Education: University of Sussex, B.A. 1973. Family: Married Peter Wilson Gwilliam in 1972; one son. Career: Executive officer, Manpower Services Commission, Hove, England, 1975–77; author of books for young people and adults, 1977—. Awards: First prize, children's story competition (Manchester Evening News), 1967; James Tiptree, Jr., award, 1991; Children of the Night Award (Dracula Society), 1996; World Fantasy Award, 1996. Agent: Anthony Goff, David Higham Associates, Ltd., 5–8 Lower John Street, Golden Square, London W1R 4HA, England. Address: 30 Roundhill Crescent, Brighton, East Sussex BN2 3FR, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Ally Ally Aster (as Ann Halam). London, Allen and Unwin, 1981. The Alder Tree (as Ann Halam). London, Allen and Unwin, 1982. Divine Endurance. Boston, Allen and Unwin, 1984.

Escape Plans. London, Allen and Unwin, 1986.

King Death's Garden (as Ann Halam). London, Orchard, 1986.

The Daymaker ("Inland" trilogy; as Ann Halam). London, Orchard, 1987

Transformations ("Inland" trilogy; as Ann Halam). London, Orchard, 1988.

Kairos. London, Unwin Hyman, 1988.

The Hidden Ones. London, Women's Press, 1988.

The Skybreaker ("Inland" trilogy; as Ann Halam). London, Orchard, 1990.

White Queen. London, Gollancz, 1991; New York, Tor, 1993.

Dinosaur Junction (as Ann Halam). London, Orchard, 1992.

Flowerdust. London, Headline, 1993; New York, Tor, 1995.

North Wind. London, Gollancz, 1994; New York, Tor, 1996.

The Haunting of Jessica Raven (as Ann Halam). London, Orion, 1994.

The Fear Man (as Ann Halam). London, Orion, 1995.

Phoenix Café. London, Gollancz, 1996; New York, Tor, 1998.

The Powerhouse (as Ann Halam). London, Orion, 1997.

Crying in the Dark. (as Ann Halam). N.p., n.d.

The Shadow on the Stairs. (as Ann Halam). N.p., n.d.

The NIMROD Conspiracy. (as Ann Halam). N.p. 1999.

Fiction for Children

Water in the Air. New York, Macmillan, 1977. The Influence of Ironwood. London, Macmillan, 1978. The Exchange. London, Macmillan, 1979. Dear Hill. London, Macmillan, 1980.

Short Stories

Identifying the Object. Austin, Texas, Swan Press, 1993.Seven Tales and a Fable. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Edgewood Press, 1995.

Other

Editor, Deconstructing the Starships: Science, Fiction and Reality. Liverpool, England, Liverpool University Press, 1998.

* * *

Gwyneth Jones is a British author of science fiction and fantasy and a feminist critic who has earned many literary awards and nominations. Her fiction is famous for its feminist approach and its recurring themes of the importance of community and of respect for the Earth. Her fantasy novels are unconventional, primarily for showing that happy endings are difficult to achieve.

Jones began with juvenile fiction. Her first novels were Water in the Air, The Influence of Ironwood, The Exchange, and Dear Hill. These follow the not unusual pattern of an adolescent girl who must come to grips with her changing attitudes and world.

To escape this formula, Jones began writing as Ann Halam with the Nordic myth-based Ally Ally Aster, which tells of an ice spirit who conjures up a terrible winter. The Alder Tree is a Gothic fantasy featuring a dragon. King Death's Garden and The Haunting of Jessica Raven are ghost stories. The Hidden Ones, published as Gwyneth Jones, concerns a rebellious teenager struggling against a Sussex farmer who plans to industrialize a magic piece of wilderness. The Fear Man earned the Children of the Night Award given by The Dracula Society. Further Halam thrillers include Dinosaur Junction, The Powerhouse, Crying in the Dark, The Shadow on the Stairs, and The NIMROD Conspiracy.

Jones's 'Inland'' series, composed of The Daymaker, Transformations, and The Skybreaker, are her best juvenile novels. Jones designed this far-future England ('Inland'') as a humorous take on the quantum mechanics hypothesis that reality holds together simply because people observe it. In Inland, magic has replaced technology, and observable reality is held together by people's consensus. If the characters disagree, their world literally begins falling apart. Zanne's community, a matriarchal utopia, has renounced technology for the 'Covenant,' which lets people use the magic of nature to build and heal. However, Zanne is attracted to the 'Daymakers,' ancient power plants. She wishes to restore the wonders of the machine era, but learns that the powers of technology and magic cannot be balanced.

If sorrow for lost things weaves a thread of tragedy through Daymaker, the tone of Transformations is much darker. Zanne finds a Daymaker in a remote region whose inhabitants lead harsh, puritanical lives. Zanne tries to restore happiness to these mining folk, but gradually realizes something is very wrong in the community. Here and in Skybreaker, she discovers that her healing powers are suited to shutting down the evil machines, dramatizing a philosophy of balance between people and their land and between people's desires and fears.

Jones gained attention in the United States with the publication of Divine Endurance. This remarkable novel is flavored by the years she lived in Singapore and Southeast Asia (1977–80). In the far future, an undescribed apocalypse has wasted the Earth and destroyed the wisdom of past civilizations. Her richly imagined Malay Peninsula, though, is a matriarchal society, bound by traditions of "hearth magic" and strict gender roles. The Peninsulans are governed by the mysterious Rulers, who reserve what little technology remains to themselves and rule by martial law. The arrival of Cho—an innocent girl who is not what she seems and who can grant the heart's desire—and a cat called Divine Endurance catalyzes a civil war between rebels and matriarchs. Jones paints a melancholy landscape of a dying Earth in this meditation on utopia and the results of getting what you wish for.

Escape Plans uses a dystopian setting and the computer jargon typical of cyberpunk, a fast-paced computer-savvy subgenre of science fiction. A spacewoman from an orbital station is unaware of the dismal lives of a dehumanized worker class until she journeys through their underground world and uncovers a secret history. The novel was nominated for the Arthur C. Clarke Award, given annually to the best science fiction novel published in the British Commonwealth.

With Kairos, Jones began dealing seriously with gender issues. In post-apocalyptic London, two pairs of homosexual lovers endure a repressive government, brutal poverty, social anarchy, and the experiments of BREAKTHRU Ltd., which intends to end the world for its own gain. This company has developed a drug, "kairos," so powerful it can change the nature of physical reality. Jane, called "Otto," a political and sexual radical, sets up shop with Sandy, the first victim of kairos. Their friends James and Gordon ("Luci") discover the evil of the BREAKTHRU representatives called "angels," and when the surviving protagonists flee London, they find different worlds outside. A lesbian druidic cult challenges BREAKTHRU, but reality metamorphoses so drastically that time and causality unravel. Apocalypse is eventually prevented, but the "happy" ending cannot overcome the mood of futility and despair.

White Queen was another Clarke Award nominee and a cowinner of the James Tiptree, Jr., Memorial Award, given to science fiction that explores sex and gender roles. It is the first of the "Aleutian" series, the others being North Wind and The Phoenix Café. Mysterious humanoids arrive on Earth in 2038; apparently telepathic hermaphrodites, they are called Aleutians, a name suggesting "aliens." The relationship between aliens and humans becomes a metaphor for the relationship between men and women. Johnny Guglioli, exiled as a "petrovirus" victim from the United States, befriends journalist Braemar Wilson and the "woman" Clavel. From Clavel's behaviors, they deduce the insidious invasion, but cannot unriddle what the aliens want. Are they superbeings, candidly offering assistance to a world shaken up by geological and political catastrophes? Similar to humans, they differ in important details—such as their attitudes towards sex, death, and personal identity.

White Queen, a "preemptive resistance movement" that works to undermine trust in the aliens's promises, sees the Aleutians as technologically superior conquerors. Played out among conflicts arising from miscommunication, gender, and identity, the plot accelerates when a White Queen agent attempts to take an alien tissue sample. The Aleutians kill her and disrupt technologies across the world, nearly causing global war. Braemar and Johnny attempt to infiltrate the aliens' starship, precipitating a showdown. The novel has been praised for its well-rounded characterization, exotic settings, convincing technology, and eroticism.

In Flowerdust, Jones returned to the Southeast Asia of Divine Endurance. The first book had introduced Derveet Garuda, a rebel against the matriarchal government, who now prepares to undertake a full-scale revolution. Derveet journeys to the refugee camps on the island of Ranganar to learn the source of their unrest, which might explode prematurely into an easily suppressed rebellion. Uncovering a Ruler conspiracy to distribute flowerdust, a bliss-generating drug, Derveet must stop its spread and venture into enemy territory. The book is a satisfying adventure novel, full of political intrigue and intercultural conflict in a colorful setting.

North Wind, the Clarke Award-nominated sequel to White Queen, takes place a century later. Bella, a crippled Aleutian, and "her" human caretaker, Sydney Carton, share an unusual relationship in a world riven by gender war. Men want to violently eradicate the Aleutians and human collaborators, while the women desire a return to power through a more nurturing society. "Halfcastes," such as Carton, admire the Aleutians. The Aleutians' proposal to level the Himalayas generates violent anti-alien sentiment. While sheltering Bella, Sydney seeks an instantaneous travel device that the legendary Johnny Guglioli used to reach the Aleutians' starship. Unknown to him, Bella's importance to the Aleutians signals her critical role in finding the device. Evoking the courage of Charles Dickens's Sydney Carton in A Tale of Two Cities, Carton helps Bella on a journey across the war-ravaged remains of Europe, gradually falling in love with her.

Where White Queen presented first contact, and North Wind showed the conquerors at the height of their empire, Phoenix Café is about their disengagement from Earth. Jones considers the trilogy a version of the European invasion of Africa and India in the nineteenth century, dramatizing different aspects of a dominating culture with attractively powerful technology. Jones blames the Europeans for having looted those continents, establishing "democracies," and finally leaving town because everything was still a mess. What do natives do when the invaders depart? How can they discard the practices that have been imposed and assimilated?

After 300 years, the Aleutians have decided to go home. The problem is getting there; they must perfect their instantaneous-transfer drive. At this point, bodily transformation is so evolved that humans have dropped the old distinctions and now come in all varieties. Catherine, the protagonist, is an experiment, an Aleutian in human form. Engaging in increasingly deeper involvement with humans, Catherine enters a sexually perverse relationship that brings him/her among the planet's elite, who plot a conspiracy that might mean the end of the Aleutian Expedition or all life on Earth.

Jones pushes ever harder against our notions of identity, sex, and gender assumptions. Not only are the Aleutians impossible to classify in male/female terms, but almost no one's appearance in Phoenix Café can be trusted because of virtual reality and designer sex drugs. Jones upsets reader expectations in depicting alien/human sex, samegender sex, clone sex, and even computer sex. The reader is left to ponder the possibility of lasting peace between humans and aliens, men and women, Self and Other.

Deconstructing the Starships: Science, Fiction and Reality gathers critical essays and reviews on various subjects, from genre limitations to creating aliens, from the need for more incisive feminist commentary to a biology textbook on sexual differentiation. The collection earned applause from science fiction scholars and belongs in major academic libraries.

Jones is one of the most important feminist science fiction authors, a growing group that includes award winners Joanna Russ, Suzy Charnas, and Sheri Tepper. From her young adult novels that emphasized the importance of moderation and balance, Jones has developed into a writer of disturbing, destabilizing novels concerned with the human preoccupation with arbitrary divisions by gender, race, politics, and other discriminations that lead to conflict.

-Fiona Kelleghan

JONES, Madison (Percy, Jr.)

Nationality: American. Born: Nashville, Tennessee, 21 March 1925. Education: Vanderbilt University, Nashville, A.B. 1949; University of Florida, Gainesville, 1950-53, A.M. 1951. Military Service: Served in the United States Army in the Corps of Military Police, Korea, 1945-46. Family: Married Shailah McEvilley in 1951; two daughters and three sons. Career: Farmer in Cheatham County, Tennessee, 1940s; instructor in English, Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, 1953-54, and University of Tennessee, Knoxville, 1955-56. Member of the Department of English from 1956, writer-in-residence, 1967-87, and professor of English, 1968-87, Auburn University, Alabama; now emeritus. Member: Alabama Academy of Distiguished Authors; Fellowship of Southern Writers. Awards: Sewanee Review fellowship, 1954; Alabama Library Association Book award, 1968; Rockefeller fellowship, 1968; Guggenheim fellowship, 1973; Lytle prize, for short fiction, 1992. Agent: Harold Matson Company, Inc., 276 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York 10001. Address: 500 Brook Stone Way, Louisville, Kentucky, U.S.A. 40202.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Innocent. New York, Harcourt Brace, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1957.

Forest of the Night. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1960; London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1961.

A Buried Land. New York, Viking Press, and London, Bodley Head, 1963.

An Exile. New York, Viking Press, 1967; London, Deutsch, 1970; as I Walk the Line, New York, Popular Library, 1970.

A Cry of Absence. New York, Crown, 1971; London, Deutsch, 1972.Passage through Gehenna. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1978.

Season of the Strangler. New York, Doubleday, 1982.

Last Things. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1989. To the Winds. Atlanta, Georgia, Longstreet Press, 1996.

Nashville 1864: The Dying of the Light: A Novel. Nashville, J.S. Sanders, 1997.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Homecoming," in Perspective (St. Louis), Spring 1952.
- "Dog Days," in Perspective (St. Louis), Fall 1952.
- "The Cave," in Perspective (St. Louis), Winter 1955.
- "Home Is Where the Heart Is," in Arlington Quarterly (Texas), Spring 1968.
- "A Modern Case," in Delta Review (Memphis, Tennessee), August 1969.
- "The Fugitives," in Craft and Vision, edited by Andrew Lytle. New York, Delacorte Press, 1971.
- "The Family That Prays Together Stays Together," in Chattahoochee Review (Dunwoody, Georgia), Winter 1983.
- "A Beginning," in Homewords, edited by Douglas Paschall. Knox-ville, University of Tennessee Press, 1986.
- "Zoo," in Sewanee Review, Summer 1992.
- "Before the Winds Came," in Oxford American (Oxford, Mississippi), Winter 1994.

Other

History of the Tennessee State Dental Association. Nashville, Tennessee Dental Association, 1958.

*

Film Adaptations: I Walk the Line, 1970, from the novel An Exile.

Manuscript Collections: Emory University, Atlanta; Auburn University, Alabama.

Critical Studies: By Ovid Pierce, in New York Times Book Review, 4 July 1971; Joseph Cantinella, in Saturday Review (New York), 9 July 1971; Reed Whittemore, in New Republic (Washington, D.C.), July 1971; Separate Country by Paul Binding, London and New York, Paddington Press, 1979; interview, in Southern Quarterly (Hattiesburg, Mississippi), Spring 1983; in The History of Southern Literature edited by Louis Rubin, Louisiana State University Press, 1986.

Madison Jones comments:

Generally, on a more obvious level, my fiction is concerned with the drama of collision between past and present, with emphasis upon the destructive elements involved. More deeply, it deals with the failure, or refusal, of individuals to recognize and submit themselves to inevitable limits of the human condition.

* * *

There is a homogeneity of theme that links together into a coherent body the published fiction of Madison Jones. The setting of these books is invariably Jones's native south. But whether their time be late eighteenth-century settlement days or the region's more recent past, his unvarying song is abstraction, ideology, and its consequences. The Innocent, his first novel, set in rural Tennessee immediately after the coming of modernity, treats of the attempts by a young southerner, Duncan Welsh, to repent of earlier impiety and reestablish himself upon inherited lands in inherited ways. The enterprise is a failure because of Duncan's deracinated preconception of it. Welsh "sets up a grave in his house." Soon he and his hopes are buried in another.

A Cry of Absence again focuses on a fatal archaist, a middle-aged gentlewoman of the 1960s who is anything but innocent. Hester Glenn finds an excuse for her failures as wife, mother, and person in a self-protective devotion to the tradition of her family. But when her example proves, in part, responsible for her son's sadistic murder of a black agitator, Hester is driven to know herself and, after confession, to pay for her sins with suicide.

A kind of Puritanism distorts Mrs. Glenn. In The Innocent the error is a perversion of the Agrarianism of Jones's mentors (Lytle, Davidson). But in his other novels the informing abstractions are not so identifiably southern. Jones's best, A Buried Land, is set in the valley of the Tennessee River during the season of its transformation. Percy Youngblood, the heir of a stern hill farmer (and a central character who could be any young person of our century), embraces all of the nostrums we associate with the futurist dispensation. He attempts to bury the old world (represented by a girl who dies aborting his child) under the waters of the TVA; but its truths (and their symbol) rise to haunt him back into abandoned modes of thought and feeling. In An Exile Hank Tawes, a rural sheriff, is unmanned by a belated explosion of passion for a bootlegger's daughter. His error has no date or nationality, but almost acquires the force of ideology once Tawes recognizes that, because he followed an impulse to recover his youth, his "occupation's gone." Forest of the Night tests out an assumption almost as generic, the notion that man is inherently good. An interval in the Tennessee "outback" is sufficient to the disabusement of Jonathan Cannon. There is no more telling exposé of the New Eden mythology.

In all of Jones's fiction there operates an allusive envelope embodied in a concrete action and supported by an evocative texture. That action is as spare as it is archetypal; and in every case its objective is to render consciousness. Jones is among the most gifted of contemporary American novelists, a craftsman of tragedy in the great tradition of his art.

-M.E. Bradford

JONES, Marion Patrick

Nationality: Citizen of Trinidad and Tobago. Born: Trinidad. Family: Married. Career: Librarian and social anthropologist. A founder of Campaign Against Racial Discrimination, London. Address: c/o Columbus Publishers, 64 Independence Square, Port of Spain, Trinidad.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Pan Beat. Port of Spain, Columbus, 1973. J'Ouvert Morning. Port of Spain, Columbus, 1976.

* * *

The relatively limited contributions of women writers to Caribbean literature has been one of the long-standing curiosities about the region. In the area of prose fiction there has been a small handful of women novelists, and from the English-language Caribbean in particular there have only been Sylvia Wynter of Jamaica, the Barbadosborn Paule Marshall of the United States, and Merle Hodges and Marion Patrick Jones of Trinidad. Jones therefore belongs to a rather small circle in Caribbean literature, one that has unfortunately been slow—with the exception of Paule Marshall—to attract significant attention from students and teachers of the literature. And on the basis of her published works it is clear that Jones has carved out a distinctive niche for herself within that small circle.

Thus far, at any rate, she has chosen to concentrate on domestic drama as the main staple of her novels. For example, both Pan Beat and J'Ouvert Morning center on middle-class marriages in Port of Spain, Trinidad, each work concentrating on not one but several couples, on the quality of the marriages (invariably bad and getting worse), on the circle within which the couples move (usually since their childhood), and on a social background that is experiencing the growing pains of new nationhood. And in the case of J'Ouvert Morning this all spans three generations. As this synopsis is intended to imply, Jones's fiction usually borders on soap opera. Her plots are endless strands of unrelieved misery that are interwoven in a pattern of endless conflicts and unmitigated wretchedness.

In Pan Beat, for example, the narrative events are sparked by Earline MacCardie's return home to Trinidad for a holiday visit. As a high-schooler she was associated with the Flamingoes steel band. After high school she and David Chow, a member of the band, emigrated to England. He committed suicide after their estrangement, and she promptly turned to prostitution to assuage her grief—and to express her resentment at his suicide. Then she had subsequently married a British homosexual in New York (where she has been 'passing' as a white Brazilian). Now that she is in Trinidad her husband breaks off the marriage, and she discovers that her former friends have been just as unhappy as she has been abroad: another old boyfriend, Louis Jenkins, is a futile, left-wing radical who is eventually killed in a gang war during Earline's visit; Louis's wife, Denise, enjoys some success, but merely as an insipid, commercially popular artist; Alan Hastings is a highly paid oil refinery worker who divides his time between a disastrous marriage and an affair with Earline herself. Of the two persons who have managed to avoid the endemic miseries of marriage, Tony Joseph is a desperately lonely prude of a civil servant, while Leslie Oliver, a Roman Catholic priest, is tormented by his sexual passion for Denise Jenkins.

The middle-class miseries of J'Ouvert Morning are less convoluted, largely because Jones mercifully concentrates on a smaller, more tightly knit group of sufferers in this novel—the Grant family. But their collective wretchedness is no less acute. Helen and Mervyn Grant have worked hard to secure a good education and middle-class affluence for their children. But one daughter, Elizabeth, is a well-known city drunk whom everyone knows as "Stinking Fur Liz." Their son, John, is a wealthy Port of Spain doctor with an unhappy marriage and a rebellious son, John Jr. Eventually John Jr.'s rebelliousness leads to an anti-government, left-wing plot that ends in his death at the hands of the police. The novel itself ends with the abortive suicide attempt by John Jr.'s distraught mother.

In spite of the soap operatic quality of her narrative materials, Jones's novels succeed as riveting documents of a troubled society in a state of transition. Jones's Trinidad has left official colonialism behind, but it has not yet discovered a vital sense of its own direction and purpose. It is soulless, without a driving motive, except the predictable trappings of neo-colonial values and the second-hand middle-class aspirations that have been handed down from Europe and the United States. The present tragedies and failures of her characters therefore reflect the unfulfilled promise of a generation that grew up in the years before independence. The empty successes of her achievers demonstrate the limitations of the neocolonial imitativeness that too often thwarts the growth of a healthy national consciousness. The radical dissidents like Louis Jenkins or John Jr. are equally failures in their own way: their radicalism is too often a self-destructive aimlessness that merely underscores their irrelevance in a society which is completely indifferent to them and their revolutionary messages.

Moreover, all of this remains convincing in the long run, because, despite Jones's melodramatic tendencies, the characters are vividly drawn and the language—especially in J'Ouvert Morning—is original and invigorating. Thus far she has demonstrated considerable promise, one that should be fulfilled to a significant degree if she continues to integrate an engaging narrative language with both disturbing social insights and a formidable grasp of the human personality.

-Lloyd W. Brown

JONES, Mervyn

Nationality: British. Born: London, 27 February 1922. Education: Abbotsholme School, Derbyshire; New York University, 1939–41. Military Service: Served in the British Army, 1942–47: Captain. Family: Married Jeanne Urquhart in 1948; one son and two daughters. Career: Assistant editor, 1955–60, and dramatic critic, 1958–66, Tribune, London; assistant editor, New Statesman, London, 1966–68. Awards: Society of Authors traveling scholarship, 1982. Agent:

Scott Ferris Associates, 15 Gledhow Gardens, London S.W.5. Address: 1 Evelyn Mansions, Carlisle Place, London SW1P 1NH, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

No Time to Be Young. London, Cape, 1952.

The New Town. London, Cape, 1953.

The Last Barricade. London, Cape, 1953.

Helen Blake. London, Cape, 1955.

On the Last Day. London, Cape, 1958.

A Set of Wives. London, Cape, 1965.

John and Mary. London, Cape, 1966; New York, Atheneum, 1967.

A Survivor. London, Cape, and New York, Atheneum, 1968.

Joseph. London, Cape, and New York, Atheneum, 1970.

Mr. Armitage Isn't Back Yet. London, Cape, 1971.

Holding On. London, Quartet, 1973; as Twilight of the Day, New York, Simon and Schuster, 1974.

The Revolving Door. London, Quartet, 1973.

Strangers. London, Quartet, 1974.

Lord Richard's Passion. London, Quartet, and New York, Knopf, 1974.

The Pursuit of Happiness. London, Quartet, 1975; New York, Mason Charter, 1976.

Nobody's Fault. London, Quartet, and New York, Mason Charter, 1977

Today the Struggle. London, Quartet, 1978.

The Beautiful Words. London, Deutsch, 1979.

A Short Time to Live. London, Deutsch, 1980; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1981.

Two Women and Their Man. London, Deutsch, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1982.

Joanna's Luck. London, Piatkus, 1984.

Coming Home. London, Piatkus, 1986.

That Year in Paris. London, Piatkus, 1988.

Short Stories

Scenes from Bourgeois Life. London, Quartet, 1976.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Foot," in English Story 8, edited by Woodrow Wyatt. London, Collins, 1948.
- "The Bee-Keeper," in English Story 10, edited by Woodrow Wyatt. London, Collins, 1950.
- "Discrete Lives," in Bananas (London), 1978.
- "Five Days by Moonlight," in Encounter (London), November 1978.
- "Living Together," in Woman (London), 1979.

Plays

The Shelter (produced London, 1982).

Radio Plays: Anna, 1982; Taking Over, 1984; Lisa, 1984; Generations, 1986.

Other

Guilty Men, 1957: Suez and Cyprus, with Michael Foot. London, Gollancz, and New York, Rinehart, 1957.

Potbank (documentary). London, Secker and Warburg, 1961.

Big Two: Life in America and Russia. London, Cape, 1962; as The Antagonists, New York, Potter, 1962.

Two Ears of Corn: Oxfam in Action. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1965; as In Famine's Shadow: A Private War on Hunger, Boston, Beacon Press, 1967.

Life on the Dole. London, Davis Poynter, 1972.

Rhodesia: The White Judge's Burden. London, Christian Action, 1972.

The Oil Rush, photographs by Fay Godwin. London, Quartet, 1976. The Sami of Lapland. London, Minority Rights Group, 1982.

Chances: An Autobiography. London, Verso, 1987.

A Radical Life: The Biography of Megan Lloyd George. London, Hutchinson, 1991.

Michael Foot. London, Gollancz, 1994.

Editor, Kingsley Martin: Portrait and Self-Portrait. London, Barrie and Rockliff, and New York, Humanities Press, 1969.

Editor, Privacy. Newton Abbot, Devon, David and Charles, 1974. Translator, The Second Chinese Revolution, by K.S. Karol. New York, Hill and Wang, 1974.

*

Critical Studies: Chapter by Kiernan Ryan, in The Socialist Novel in Britain edited by H. Gustav Klaus, Brighton, Harvester Press, 1982.

Mervyn Jones comments:

(1981) I have become known as a political novelist, although only two of my books—Joseph and Today the Struggle—could be defined strictly as political novels, and some others are deliberately limited to the study of personal relationships. Probably, this reveals how rarely most British novelists concern themselves with the political framework of life. Taking account of that framework does, I think, extend the novel's range. But I also think, decidedly, that a novel ceases to be a novel when it does not have human character and human experience at its center. Those interested in my views on the matter are referred to a Guardian interview, 9 July 1979.

I have never planned a recurrent theme in my writing, but when I consider it I believe that there is one: the nobility and irony of idealism. I take both the nobility and the irony to be realities. This is the subject of Strangers, the novel with which I am least dissatisfied and by which I should wish to be judged.

* * *

Mervyn Jones is a fine storyteller whose skill has continued to improve over a career that spans half a century. While some of his novels are about a broad variety of characters, and tend to be built on his journalistic experience, his specialty seems to be the problems of those people who have enough time and money to enable them to reflect on life. The conflicts between their ideals and their experiences, or between values related to ideals, are the themes of The New Town, Mr. Armitage Isn't Back Yet, Strangers, Joanna's Luck, and the short stories "The Syndrome" and "Happiness Is ..." How these people reconcile themselves to reality while retaining their ideals or, more often, how they retain ideals that have less and less to do with their actions and decisions is of primary interest to Jones. He has said that the theme of the nobility and irony of idealism is a recurrent one in his writing, and crucial to his depiction of this theme is his calculated distance from his characters. They are intellectual rather than emotional; their thoughts are clear, their emotions suppressed; and if they seem to lack depth, it may be because this lack is an aspect of the modern middle-class idealist.

Strangers, the novel by which Jones has said he would like to be judged, is the best example of his study of the problems of idealism. Andrew Stanton is a pacifist who refuses to live in his native South Africa, and whose refusal to fight in the Second World War has alienated him from his conservative family. He has devoted himself to the ideal of fighting the pure evil in the world with the pure good of compensatory charitable actions. His first wife was a frail survivor of a concentration camp, who was killed by a sniper in Israel. His young second wife, Val, marries him out of her own idealism and faith in him. When Andrew leaves to work with refugees in Uganda, Val is left with a house full of charity cases: a pregnant teenager on the run from her parents, an American on the run from the draft, and a foreign student who runs off with a local schoolgirl. As Andrew and Val struggle in their separate situations, both are confronted with the futility of charity, but while Val sheds specific failures to become more hopeful, Andrew, after a major success, is cruelly struck by the failure of his ideals.

A Short Time to Live is a more cynical view of the idealist. A charismatic journalist with a conscience, Michael Kellet, dies mysteriously on a Pacific island. Each of the old school-friends, teacher, exwife, and widow who attend his funeral is carefully examined, as the solution to the mystery gradually becomes apparent. None of them cherishes much of any ideal, except the old teacher, secure in his faith in education, and each is laid bare with a cold, journalistic precision that could have been that of the dead Kellet.

Joanna's Luck is a study of one of the children of the idealists of the 1960s. Joanna's mother and father are ex-hippies, described with the snide acceptance of a disillusioned young woman of the 1980s: the one is still smoking dope and wearing beads at forty-eight, the other has shed it all to become a prosperous businessman. Locked in the thoughts of their era, they cannot comprehend why Joanna cares so much about finding a rewarding job or about wanting to feel close to a man before she goes to bed with him. Joanna is bright, but muddled in her emotions, lonely and drifting. It is not until she drifts into situations that force decisions that she begins to analyze her own emotions and beliefs with the same clarity that she had applied to her work in social research. Jones has always written sympathetically about women, but here he extends that to a deeper, fuller portrayal of a character.

The Beautiful Words is probably Jones's finest book, combining his excellent storytelling with interesting characterization. Here he contrasts a sensitive, full description of his main character, Tommy, with flatter, colder perceptions of the many people Tommy encounters but cannot understand. Tommy is a handsome boy of seventeen with the mind of a very small child. After a life of being shunted among relatives, he becomes a homeless drifter. All that his confused mind can offer for consolation in times of loneliness, fear, and despair are the ''beautiful words'' his one kind aunt taught him to memorize.

He wanders into the home of a prostitute, who cares for him and has him do her cleaning, but her pimp uses him for a robbery and he gets beat up by the police. Lost, he lives with the dossers and drunks on London's Embankment until he finds an empty house and becomes a squatter. Others move in and care for him in a haphazard way, finally dumping him on Belle, a rich and greedy old woman who uses him as a watchdog. The story is about how all of these people deal with the responsibility of innocence as much as what it is like for poor Tommy to be an innocent, and Jones tells the sad story with compassion.

Because of their topical nature, some of Jones's novels date quickly, but not those which delve deeply into the effort of modern people trying to find something to believe and to live by it. For the craft of his storytelling alone, Jones continues to be well worth reading.

—Anne Morddel

JONG, Erica

Nationality: American. Born: Erica Mann in New York City, 26 March 1942. Education: The High School of Music and Art, New York; Barnard College, New York (George Weldwood Murray fellow, 1963), 1959-63, B.A. 1963 (Phi Beta Kappa); Columbia University, New York (Woodrow Wilson fellow, 1964), M.A. 1965; Columbia School of Fine Arts, 1969–70. Family: Married 1) Michael Werthman in 1963 (divorced 1965); 2) Allan Jong in 1966 (divorced 1975); 3) the writer Jonathan Fast in 1977 (divorced 1983), one daughter; 4) Kenneth David Burrows in 1989. Career: Lecturer in English, City College, New York, 1964–66, 1969–70, and University of Maryland European Division, Heidelberg, Germany, 1967-68; instructor in English, Manhattan Community College, New York, 1969-70. Since 1971 instructor in poetry, YM-YWHA Poetry Center, New York. Member of the literary panel, New York State Council on the Arts, 1972-74. Since 1991 president of Author's Guild. Awards: Academy of American Poets award, 1963; Bess Hokin prize (Poetry, Chicago), 1971; New York State Council on the Arts grant, 1971; Madeline Sadin award (New York Quarterly), 1972; Alice Fay di Castagnola award, 1972; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1973; Creative Artists Public Service grant, 1973; International Sigmund Freud prize, 1979. Agent: Ed Victor Ltd., 162 Wardour Street, London W1V 3AT, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Fear of Flying. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1973; London, Secker and Warburg, 1974.

How to Save Your Own Life. New York, Holt Rinehart, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1977.

Fanny, Being the True History of the Adventures of Fanny Hackabout-Jones. New York, New American Library, and London, Granada, 1980.

Parachutes and Kisses. New York, New American Library, and London, Granada, 1984.

Serenissima: A Novel of Venice. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Bantam, 1987.

Any Woman's Blues. New York, Harper, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1990.

Megan's Two Houses: A Story of Adjustment. West Hollywood, California, Dove Kids, 1996.

Inventing Memory: A Novel of Mothers and Daughters. New York, HarperCollins, 1997.

Uncollected Short Stories

"From the Country of Regrets," in Paris Review, Spring 1973. "Take a Lover," in Vogue, April 1977.

Poetry

Fruits and Vegetables. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1971; London, Secker and Warburg, 1973.

Half-Lives. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1973; London, Secker and Warburg, 1974.

Here Comes and Other Poems. New York, New American Library, 1975.

Loveroot. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1975; London, Secker and Warburg, 1977.

The Poetry of Erica Jong. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1976.

Selected Poems 1-2. London, Panther, 2 vols., 1977-80.

At the Edge of the Body. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1979; London, Granada, 1981.

Ordinary Miracles: New Poems. New York, New American Library, 1983; London, Granada, 1984.

Becoming Light: Poems: New and Selected. New York, HarperCollins, 1991.

Other

Four Visions of America, with others. Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1977.

Witches (miscellany). New York, Abrams, 1981; London, Granada, 1982.

Megan's Book of Divorce: A Kid's Book for Adults. New York, New American Library, 1984; London, Granada, 1985.

The Devil at Large: Erica Jong on Henry Miller. New York, Turtle Bay, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1993.

Fear of Fifty: A Midlife Memoir. New York, HarperCollins, 1994. What Do Women Want?: Bread, Roses, Sex, Power. New York, HarperCollins, 1998.

*

Critical Studies: Interviews in New York Quarterly 16, 1974, Playboy (Chicago), September 1975, and Viva (New York), September 1977; article by Emily Toth, in Twentieth-Century American-Jewish Fiction Writers edited by Daniel Walden, Detroit, Gale, 1984; "Isadora and Fanny, Jessica and Erica: The Feminist Discourse of Erica Jong" by Julie Anne Ruth, in Australian Women's Book Review (Melbourne), September 1990; Feminism and the Politics of Literary Reputation: the Example of Erica Jong by Charlotte Templin. Lawrence, Kansas, University Press of Kansas, 1995; Writing Mothers, Writing Daughters: Tracing the Maternal in Stories by American Jewish Women by Janet Handler Burstein. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1996.

* * *

Erica Jong is an impressive poet who writes in the confessional vein of Anne Sexton, Robert Lowell, Sylvia Plath, and John Berryman. She also creates an energetic, garrulous, witty, and tender verse, both erudite and earthy, about the conflict between sexuality and inhibiting intelligence, about death (and one's impulse both toward and away from suicide), the problems of sexual and creative energy (both consuming and propelling), and the hunger for love, knowledge, and connecting. Although she has aligned herself with the feminist movement, her poetry goes beyond the dilemma of being a woman in a male-dominated world, or for that matter, a Jew in an urban culture, to the ubiquitous need for human completeness in a fiercely hostile social and cosmic world.

Jong distinguishes her poetic and fictional forms: "In poetry I could be pared down, honed, minimal. In the novel what I wanted was excess, digression, rollicking language, energy, and poetry." Her stated preference was always for the novel that made one believe "it was all spilled truth." To be sure, "excess," "energy," and "rollicking language" are terms that well describe her fiction, along with its absolute quest for truth.

Fear of Flying, still Jong's most influential work, is a funny, moving, and deeply serious book. "Nothing human was worth denying," her heroine, Isadora Wing, says, "and even if it was unspeakably ugly, we could learn from it, couldn't we?" Isadora, a picaresque heroine, is a bright, pretty, Jewish, guilt-ridden writer, who accompanies her Chinese-American, child psychiatrist husband, Bennett Wing, to a psychoanalytic congress in Vienna. Torn between the stability of marriage and her sexual fantasies for the "zipless fuck," she abandons Bennett for Adrian Goodlove, an illiterate, sadistic, but very sexy London psychiatrist. Adrian is a selfish and pompous bully, whose words arouse her as much as his sexual promise. (Bennett, though "often wordless," is a far better lover.) Her excursions into the past, where we meet her family and childhood world, her brilliant but sad and mad first husband, and her various sexual partners, are drawn in an earthy and ebullient fashion. But beneath all the bravura is Isadora's basic lack of fulfillment. Sex is only the apparent means toward connecting and feeling alive, an outlet that confounds desperation and freedom. It is only a temporary departure from guilt, an illusory means of flying. Isadora's life remains tortured. The end of the book only half-heartedly suggests some sort of insight and the half-believed: "People don't complete us. We complete ourselves." Isadora has struggled to write as a means of self-discovery and as a sublimated but illusory fulfillment for the frustrations of the real world. She retains an unremitting sense of guilt, vulnerability, childish impulsiveness, and romanticism.

The less successful sequel, How to Save Your Own Life, focuses on Isadora's literary success, her divorce from Bennett, and her subsequent move to Hollywood with its virtually limitless number of disappointments, sexual and otherwise. As Jong again portrays it, the plight of the woman is to be torn between her own restlessness and the bourgeois virtues of marriage. She illustrates poignantly and powerfully how a woman's greatest fear is of being alone, and yet her deepest wish is to break free as "hostage" to her own "fantasies," her "fears," and "false definitions."

Fanny, Being the True History of the Adventures of Fanny Hackabout-Jones is an extraordinary tour de force. In the style and spirit of the eighteenth century, it tells of the tragic and comic fortunes of the beautiful and brilliant young Fanny, whose picaresque adventures en route to becoming a writer and member of the gentry include everything from membership in a witches' coven—really a modern sisterhood—a brothel, and a pirate ship to a series of sexual adventures with the likes of Alexander Pope, Jonathan Swift, and Theophilus Cibber. It is a rich, racy, and enormously funny and serious book moving, at times to the extreme, in its focus on love, friendship, motherhood, and courage. It is filled with serious, playful, and frequently ironic references to an enormous body of literature. Fanny is conversant with Homer, Virgil, Horace, Boileau, La Rochefoucauld, Voltaire, Locke, and Pascal. Although as a character, Fanny speaks with a 1980s consciousness, the kind of woman she represents might have lived during any age for, to quote Jong's stated intention in creating her, Fanny transcends her own time. Fanny, as a character and novel, embodies, above all, an unflagging and uncompromising search for truth.

"A Woman is made of Sweets and Bitters.... She is both Reason and Rump, both Wit and Wantonness," Fanny remarks, in an observation that is applicable to all of Jong's females, including her Isadora Wing character in Parachutes and Kisses. Here Jong portrays the famous, rich, brilliant, and beautiful writer, now nearly forty and separated from her husband. Isadora once again possesses a prodigious sexuality, but it is now accompanied by a purposive loneliness. Although she would seem to have reconciled her sexuality with her personal and professional responsibilities-mainly as mother and writer—it is the quest for love that remains her driving force. Isadora relates her experiences with a series of lovers—including a real estate developer, rabbi, antiques dealer, plastic surgeon, and medical studentbut the need for love and security remains insatiable. Isadora may long ago have given up the fear of flying, but she remains, in many ways, the woman she described herself as in the earlier works: "My life had been a constant struggle to get attention, not to be ignored, to be the favored child, the brightest, the best, the most precocious, the most outrageous, the most adored." Such is her relationship with parents, lovers, and not least of all, the world.

Serenissima, another historical novel and tour de force of the order of the Rabelaisian Fanny, is set in the Venice of Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice. It is filled not only with details and characters from Shakespeare's life and plays but also with echoes from any number of other Elizabethan writers, as well as often hilarious reminders of numerous more modern authors-from Byron and Ruskin to Dylan Thomas, Henry James to James Joyce. Jessica Pruitt, a middle-aged, jet-setting movie star, has come to Venice as a judge for the Film Festival. Although she plans to play Jessica in a "filmic fantasy" of The Merchant of Venice, she is forced to remain in Italy, since she has become ill. She takes this as the occasion to embark upon a trip back in time to sixteenth-century Venice. The city, with its grand history, labyrinthine canals, and reflexive surfaces, permits not just her thorough investigation of the Bard himself—in all his natural (i.e., sexual), as well as social and literary capabilities but it provides the means for a personal journey into her own female identity, in fact and fantasy. It is a pagan rite de passage in preparation for her future. She is, after all, forty-three—an aging woman who must survive within a professional and everyday world that adulates youth; even Shakespeare's heroine, Jessica, is a celebration of youth.

Once back in time, in Shakespeare's Venice, she is a reborn Jessica. She cavorts with an enormous retinue of suitors and even fancies herself as Shakespeare's Dark Lady, among any number of other real and fantasized roles. Amid all the disguises, ruses, and exposes, however, Jong casts a number of tasteless scenes, such as the incredible romping of the Bard with his own creations (like Juliet), or with specifically important people who lived during his lifetime, like his patron, the Earl of Southampton. Jong portrays, for example, Shakespeare and Southampton with a courtesan posing as a boy. They were, she writes, "a three-backed beast that pants and screams and begs for mercy." The reader may be similarly offended by Jessica's numerous attempts to describe "Will's stiff staff." Jong remains at her best linguistically, in her use of quotes and puns. When Jessica first meets Shakespeare, for example, in the Ghetto Vecchio, he says to her: "Who ever loved, who loved not at first sight?" and "What's in a name? A rose by any other name would smell as sweet."

Any Woman's Blues portrays yet another "sexaholic," as Jong's newest sexual Wonderwoman, Leila Sand, describes herself. Presumably authored by Isadora Wing (which we learn in a foreword and afterword), the novel deals with an artist in her mid-forties. Leila's (midlife) crisis, as the epigraph announces, is that "the blues ain't nothing/but the facts of life." Despite all her celebrity, Leila fears that her talent is waning; she must also come to terms with drugs and alcohol; most importantly, she must confront her masochistic relationship with a young, blond WASP named Darton Veneble Donegal IV. (When she first sees him he is "helmeted like Darth Vader.") On the one hand, Leila says, in the typical poor prose of the novel: "He rarely said anything that wasn't loving, sweet, and dear. He spoke, in fact, like a Hallmark greeting card." But she adds: "It was just that his actions belied his words." Dart, her "great primitive god," is also, a "con man, a hustler, a cowboy, a cocksman, an addict." He is also well celebrated for being "born with an erection." As Leila tries, still like Isadora in Fear of Flying, to "get free" and be her own person, she utters the cloying: "Life ... is a feast. It is there for the taking. You have only to ... love one another, thank God, and rejoice. At its most simple, it is a prayer." Leila's words ring hollow: "Give, give, give! is the cry of the gods. It rhymes with: "Live, live, live! Why else are we passing through this sublunary sphere?" Such a conclusion—and the language in which it is couched—is unworthy of the lusty, witty, and utterly unrepentant Jong persona, whose wild and wicked adventures we have otherwise enjoyed in her previous novels.

Having coined the term "zipless fuck" in Fear of Flying, virtually a classic in its portrayal of female libido, Jong now uses the word "whiplash" in Fear of Fifty to describe what she calls the "women of her generation." Once more, in her autobiographical novel form. Jong focuses on many women who grew up during the respectable 1950s and feminist 1960s—women who burned their bras but subsequently had children and discovered the joys of simple motherhood. The book rings painfully true for many women torn between career and motherhood, sexuality and traditional reserve, and even feminism as opposed to femininity. Subtitled "A Midlife Memoir," Fear of Fifty more importantly deals with the "terror" women experience when they realize they are no longer young and beautiful. Although Jong appears less concerned with her body (while still capable of great sexual prowess), her words ring true in such statements as: "I wander around," wondering if "I have the right to my immortal soul." Perhaps she laments her earlier romans a clef and the devastating impact they must have had on her barely disguised characters; now she says: "Writing matters only if it ... ripens your humanity."

Jong's most recent offering is strikingly reminiscent of the rash of multi-narrator, mother-daughter novels that have become popular in the past decade—novels such as Amy Tan's The Joy Luck Club and Rebecca Wells's Divine Secrets of the YaYa Sisterhood and Little Altars Everywhere. Sadly, Jong's Inventing Memory does not live up to the high standards set by other novels of this genre. Telling the story of four generations of women, in this case of Jewish heritage, she demonstrates their growth as they are "shaped by the challenges of Jewish history and the misery created by the deeply flawed men they choose." The novel was greeted with highly critical reviews, suggesting that the greatest value in Jong's fiction may be found in her early work.

-Lois Gordon, updated by Suzanne Disheroon Green

JORDAN, Neil

Nationality: Irish. Born: Sligo in 1950. Education: University College, Dublin. Career: Co-founder, Irish Writers Co-operative, 1974. Lives in Bray, County Wicklow. Awards: Arts Council bursary, 1976; Guardian Fiction prize, 1979; Cannes Film Festival Palme d'Or, 1986; Sorrento Film Festival De Sica award, 1986; New York Film Critics Circle award, Best Screenplay, 1992; Alexander Korda award, Best British Film, Best Direction, 1993; Writers Guild American Screen award, Best Screenplay Written Directly for Screen, 1993; Academy Award, Best Writing, Screenplay Written Directly for Screen 1993; Golden Lion award, Venice Film Festival, 1996; Crystal Isis award, Brussels International Film Festival, 1998; Silver Raven award, Brussels International Festival of Fantasy Film, 1999. Address: c/o Faber and Faber, 3 Queen Square, London WC1N 3AU, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Past. London, Cape, and New York, Braziller, 1980.

The Dream of a Beast. London, Chatto and Windus, 1983; New York, Random House, 1989.

Sunrise with Sea Monster. London, Chatto and Windus, 1994; New York, Random House, 1995.

Nightlines. New York, Random House, 1995.

Short Stories

Night in Tunisia and Other Stories. Dublin, Co-op, 1976; London, Writers and Readers, 1979.

Collected Fiction. London, Vintage, 1997.

Uncollected Short Stories

"A Bus, a Bridge, a Beach" and "The Old-Fashioned Lift," in Paddy No More. Nantucket, Massachusetts, Longship Press, 1978.

"The Artist" and "The Photographer," in New Writing and Writers 16. Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey, Humanities Press, 1979.

Plays

Screenplays: Angel (Danny Boy), 1982; London, Faber, 1989; The Company of Wolves, with Angela Carter, 1984; Mona Lisa, with David Leland, 1986; London, Faber, 1986; High Spirits, 1988; London, Faber, 1989; We're No Angels, 1989; The Miracle, 1991; The Crying Game, 1992; Interview with the Vampire, 1994; Michael Collins, Geffen Pictures, 1996; published as Michael Collins: Screenplay and Film Diary, New York, Plume, 1996; (With Patrick McCabe), The Butcher Boy, Warner Brothers, 1997; (With Bruce Robinson), In Dreams, DreamWorks, 1999; The End of the Affair, 1999.

*

Theatrical Activities: Assistant director: Film—Excalibur (John Boorman), 1981; Director: Films—Angel (Danny Boy), 1982; The Company of Wolves, 1984; Mona Lisa, 1986; High Spirits, 1988; We're No Angels, 1990; The Miracle, 1991; The Crying Game, 1992; Interview with the Vampire, 1994.

* * *

Irish-born Neil Jordan first came into prominence in 1976 with his publication of Night in Tunisia and Other Stories, which won the Somerset Maugham award and the Guardian Fiction prize. These perceptive stories, often about lonely or displaced people, seem strongly influenced by James Joyce's Dubliners, but to Joyce's crisp realism Jordan characteristically adds a poetic quality.

He followed this with The Past, a similarly well-received novel about a man searching for the truth about his parentage. But Jordan treats this apparently straightforward theme in a highly complex way. The novel takes us over various places in England and (mainly) Ireland over the years from 1912 to 1934. Una, a mediocre but successful actress, has a child, Rene, by Michael O'Shaughnessy, a lawyer, and marries him. There is little love, merely resignation, between them. Many years later, when the unnamed narrator comes looking for his past, Rene's close friend Lili becomes a major source of information. She tells much of the story in her own words and the narrator often addresses her. But the main narrative voice is that of the unnamed man who is rediscovering—even, he constantly insists, reinventing and remaking—the past in order to discover the truth about his own origins. The novel is an act of imaginative reconstruction, with the past often having to be guessed at, conjured up, in the absence of information. The narrator frequently directs his speculations, hypotheses, and deductions directly to Lili and by implication the reader. Jordan's writing is deeply sensuous, lyrical, almost painterly at times and saturated with visual imagery. As often in his work, both fictional and cinematic, the political and the romantic are deeply entwined, and the novel is deeply aware of what it calls "the slow irony of history." The story of the novel is to a certain extent the story of Ireland in those years. Eamonn de Valera makes frequent guest appearances, Roger Casement is arrested off-stage, and Michael O'Shaughnessy, an active Free Stater, is assassinated.

Jordan's next work of fiction, a novella titled The Dream of a Beast, could hardly be more different. Set in a mysteriously dystopian

Dublin, it is the nightmarish story of a man who slowly turns into some kind of animal. He becomes estranged from his wife and young daughter, increasingly cut off from an urban world that is subtly intimated as undergoing its own dark metamorphoses. At the same time, there are strange epiphanies occurring constantly, such as a young woman who visits him in his advertising office and falls in love with him, or a young boy who also feels love for him. In the ambiguous ending it is possible even that his family returns to him. The Dream of a Beast is a deeply imagistic novel about a man who has lost touch with feelings and perhaps learns to recover them. Jordan himself has said of it that it is less Kafka than Creature from the Black Lagoon.

Given his highly visual imagination, it is not so surprising in retrospect that since this novella Jordan has turned away from fiction in favor of film, although he himself denies any conflict. He says, "I don't know any novelists, particularly the younger ones, who aren't working in film. In the fifties, people used to talk about the death of the novel and saw television as a threat to writing. Now the writers have pushed their way in." He has become a world-famous director and scriptwriter, with hits like Mona Lisa, The Crying Game, and Michael Collins. He co-wrote the original screenplay of Mona Lisa, of which he said, "The attraction of it was that it could become a love story, a contemporary moral tale with two characters so far apart, but so inherently likeable that an audience might empathize, understand each point of view, feel the depth of their misplaced passion, and yet know from the start how impossible it was."

—Judy Cooke, updated by Laurie Clancy

JORGENSON, Ivar

See SILVERBERG, Robert

JOSHI, Arun

Nationality: Indian. Born: 1939. Education: Attended schools in India and the United States. Career: Director, Shri Ram Centre for Industrial Relations.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Foreigner. Bombay and London, Asia Publishing House, 1968. The Strange Case of Billy Biswas. Bombay, London, and New York, Asia Publishing House, 1971.

The Apprentice. Bombay and New York, Asia Publishing House, 1974; London, Asia Publishing House, 1975.

The Last Labyrinth. New Delhi, Vision, 1981.

The City and the River. New Delhi, Vision, 1990.

Short Stories

The Survivor: A Selection of Stories. New Delhi, Sterling, 1975.

Other

Shri Ram: A Biography, with Khushwant Singh. London and New York, Asia Publishing House, 1968.

Laia Shri Ram: A Study in Entrepreneurship and Industrial Management. New Delhi, Orient Longman, 1975.

*

Critical Studies: Arun Joshi: A Study of His Fiction edited by N. Radhakrishnan, Gandhigram, Tamilnadu, Gandhigram Rural Institute, 1984; The Fictional World of Arun Joshi, New Delhi, Classical, 1986, and The Novels of Arun Joshi, New Delhi, Prestige, 1992, both edited by R.K. Dhawan; The Novels of Kamala Markandaya and Arun Joshi by A.A. Sinha. Jalandhar, India, ABS Publications, 1998; Arun Joshi: The Existentialist Element in His Novels by Mukteshwar Pandey. Delhi, B.R. Publishing, 1998.

* * :

Arun Joshi is a novelist who, more strongly than most, has brought to his work that detachment from the everyday, while still acknowledging its existence, which is perhaps India's particular gift to the literature of the world. The rising up into the transcendental is a trait that has increasingly marked out his novels from his first, The Foreigner—where the young hero, after experiencing life and love in America, is, back in Delhi, at last persuaded by a humble office worker that sometimes detachment lies in actually getting involved—on up to The City and the River, which takes place wholly in an imaginary land.

To venture as a writer into such territory it is necessary to be equipped with the means to make the everyday credible and sharply present. This Joshi was from the start well able to do, as his early short stories, subsequently collected in The Survivor, clearly show. "The Gherao" tells simply and effectively of how a young college teacher arrives at maturity when his aged Principal is subjected to that peculiar Indian form of protest action, the gherao, the preventing of a target figure from moving anywhere or receiving any succor.

The Strange Case of Billy Biswas is the story of a young, rich, American-educated Indian who ends up in the wilderness of central India living as a semi-naked "tribal" seeking a meaning to things above and beyond all that everyday civilization can provide. A key to Joshi's whole intent can be found in the words he puts into the mouth of his narrator; as he grows old he realizes that the most futile cry of man is his impossible wish to be understood.

The Apprentice, Joshi's third novel, takes his search for understanding man's predicament one step further toward the transcendental. Its central figure is a man essentially docile and uncourageous whose life more or less parallels the coming into being of postcolonial India. Eventually gaining a post in the civil service, he ends, as many real-life civil servants did, by taking a huge bribe. But in the final pages he comes to see that at least corrupt man can strive to do just a little good—he cleans shoes at a temple—and that while there are in the world young people still untainted, there is a spark of hope.

In The Last Labyrinth, the hero, if that always is not too strong a term for the men Joshi puts at the center, is a man crying always "I want! I want!" and not knowing what it is he desires, in some ways a parallel figure to Saul Bellow's Henderson, the rain king. His search takes him, however, to infinitely old Benares, a city seen as altogether intangible, at once holy and repellent, and to an end lost in a miasma of nonunderstanding. But the way there is gripping. Joshi writes with a persuasive ease and illuminates the outward scene with telling phrase after telling phrase.

Then there is The City and the River, where the city is not the Delhi or the Bombay Joshi has elsewhere described so concretely but a wholly intangible place, removed from time, where nonetheless a man can be seen wearing jeans. Joshi, in his search for a way to describe the meaning of things, has now come to a world akin to those of science fiction or perhaps to the mystical poetry of Blake writing of "Golgonooza the spiritual Fourfold London eternal." But all the while there are digs or sly hints at the current ills of Indian society and, by implication, of all societies everywhere. And in the final pages, where the wild river sweeps over the whole complex city, there is, again, sounded that faint note of hope. The question is not of success or failure, an old yogi tells his disciple; the question is of trying.

-H.R.F. Keating

JOSIPOVICI, Gabriel (David)

Nationality: British. Born: Nice, France, 8 October 1940. Education: Victoria College, Cairo, 1950–56; Cheltenham College, Gloucesteshire, 1956–57; St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, 1958–61, B.A. in English 1961. Family: Married in 1963. Career: Lecturer, 1963–74, reader, 1974–80, part-time reader, 1981–84, and since 1984 professor of English, University of Sussex, Brighton. Northcliffe Lecturer, University College, London, 1981. Awards: Sunday Times award, for play, 1970; South East Arts prize, 1978. Agent: John Johnson, 45–47 Clerkenwell Green, London EC1R 0HT. Address: Department of English, University of Sussex, Falmer, Brighton, Sussex BN1 9RH, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Inventory. London, Joseph, 1968.

Words. London, Gollancz, 1971.

The Present. London, Gollancz, 1975.

Migrations. Hassocks, Sussex, Harvester Press, 1977.

The Echo Chamber. Brighton, Harvester Press, 1980.

The Air We Breathe. Brighton, Harvester Press, 1981.

Conversations in Another Room. London, Methuen, 1984.

Contre-Jour: A Triptych after Pierre Bonnard. Manchester, Carcanet, 1986.

The Big Glass. Manchester, Carcanet, 1991.

In a Hotel Garden. Manchester, Carcanet, 1994; New York, New Directions, 1995.

Moo Pak. Manchester, Carcanet, 1995.

Now. Manchester, England, Carcanet, 1998.

Short Stories

Mobius the Stripper: Stories and Short Plays (includes the plays One, Dreams of Mrs. Fraser, Flow). London, Gollancz, 1974.

Four Stories. London, Menard Press, 1977.

In the Fertile Land. Manchester, Carcanet, 1987.

Plays

Dreams of Mrs. Fraser (produced London, 1972). Included in Mobius the Stripper, 1974.

Evidence of Intimacy (produced London, 1972).

Flow (produced Edinburgh and London, 1973). Included in Mobius the Stripper, 1974.

Echo (produced London, 1975). Published in Proteus 3, 1978.

Marathon (produced London, 1977). Published in Adam (London), 1980.

A Moment (produced London, 1979).

Vergil Dying (broadcast 1979). Windsor, SPAN, 1981.

Radio Plays: Playback, 1973; A Life, 1974; Ag, 1976; Vergil Dying, 1979; Majorana: Disappearance of a Physicist, with Sacha Rabinovitch, 1981; The Seven, with Jonathan Harvey, 1983; Metamorphosis, from the story by Kafka, 1985; Ode for St. Cecilia, 1986; Mr. Vee, 1988; A Little Personal Pocket Requiem, 1990.

Other

The World and the Book: A Study of Modern Fiction. London, Macmillan, and Stanford, California, Stanford University Press, 1971; revised edition, Macmillan, 1979.

The Lessons of Modernism and Other Essays. London, Macmillan, and Totowa, New Jersey, Rowman and Littlefield, 1977.

Writing and the Body: The Northcliffe Lectures 1981. Brighton, Harvester Press, 1982; Princeton, New Jersey, Princeton University Press, 1983.

The Mirror of Criticism: Selected Reviews 1977–1982. Brighton, Harvester Press, and New York, Barnes and Noble, 1983.

The Book of God: A Response to the Bible. New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Press, 1988.

Steps: Selected Fiction and Drama. Manchester, Carcanet Press, 1990.

Text and Voice. Manchester, Carcanet, 1992.

Touch. New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Press, 1996.

On Trust: Art and the Temptations of Suspicion. New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Press, 1999.

Editor, The Modern English Novel: The Reader, The Writer, and the Work. London, Open Books, and New York, Barnes and Noble, 1976.

Editor, The Sirens' Song: Selected Essays, by Maurice Blanchot. Brighton, Harvester Press, and Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1982.

*

Critical Studies: Interview with Bernard Sharratt, in Orbit (Tunbridge Wells, Kent), December 1975; "True Confessions of an Experimentalist" by Josipovici, and interview with Maurice Kapitanchik, in Books and Bookmen (London), 1982; article by Linda Canon and Jay L. Halio, in British Novelists since 1960 edited by Halio, Detroit, Gale, 1983; interview with Timothy Hyman, in Jewish Quarterly (London), 1985; James Hansford, in Prospice (Portree, Isle of Skye), 1985; essay by Josipovici, in Contemporary Authors Autobiography Series 8 edited by Mark Zadrozny, Detroit, Gale, 1988; "Bonnard and Josipovici" by Jean Duffy, in Word and Image, 9(4), October-December 1993.

* * *

"Modern art," says Gabriel Josipovici in The Lessons of Modernism, "moves between two poles, silence and game." In his own novels the game is that of verbal art; the silence is that of unanswered questions. Conversations abound, explanations are sought, inquiries are pursued, but answers are always lacking. Characters experience an overwhelming pressure to speak, like a weight on the chest. But there is no narrator with authority to pronounce on the truth. The reader is drawn into puzzled involvement, impotent attentiveness, and pleasure in the play of the text.

In The Inventory a young man is constructing a list of the contents of a flat in which an old man and his son Sam used to live. They are both now dead. The precision of the inventory contrasts with the uncertainty of what he hears about their lives from Susan who tells him stories about her experiences of the two men. Why did Sam suddenly leave? Was he in love with Susan? Did she love him? Are her stories based on memory or invention? The novel is almost entirely in dialogue form and its effect depends on the author's precise control of rhythm, pace, and tone. It demonstrates his fascination with the musical, kinesthetic, and dramatic aspects of speech which he has explored equally in his work for radio and theater.

In Words Louis and his wife Helen are visited by Jo, who was once Louis's girlfriend and who may or may not also have had an affair with his brother Peter. The reader learns about the characters only through what they say to each other. Conversations return again and again to certain nagging questions. What happened years ago when Louis and Jo separated? Are either of them in earnest now when they talk about going away together? Are they serious or are they playing games? We only have their words to go on and words always leave open a variety of possible interpretations: cheerful banter or wounding aggression, flirtation or contempt, honesty or evasion? The Present represents a change in fictional technique, for in this novel even the basic narrative situation is left undecided. The narrative, in the present tense, simultaneously develops stories in a number of different possible directions. The present leaves the future open. Reg and Minna share a flat with Alex; Minna is in hospital after a breakdown and dreams or imagines her life with Reg; Minna is married to Alex and they live with their two daughters in the country; Alex is dead having thrown himself from the window of Reg and Minna's flat. The stories interweave, each compelling but inconclusive.

Since 1977 Josipovici has written his most ambitious and accomplished work, including the major radio play Vergil Dying and the novels Migrations and The Air We Breathe. In these novels he moves further away from the conventions of realist narrative. Whereas the early novels (and The Echo Chamber) are constructed around inconclusive stories and are primarily in dialogue form the later novels are constructed around multiple repetitions of fragmentary scenes and haunting images.

In Migrations a man lies on a bed in an empty room; a man collapses in an urban street; an autistic child fails to communicate with uncomprehending adults; a man talks in an over-furnished room with an unsympathetic woman, and so on. The text migrates restlessly from scene to scene: "You try to find a place to stop, roots ... attempt to find a resting place for the imagination." "A series of places. Each must be visited. In turn. Then it will be finished. Then they will disappear." Temporary stillness and a disturbing sense of the physicality of speech, of words in the mouth, are achieved as the narrative voice repeats certain rhythms, images, and sound patterns and occasionally settles on certain sensuous sentences: "The black sky presses on his face like a blanket." "The sun streams in through the closed panes." "Silence drains away from him in dark streams." There is a poetic preoccupation with certain elemental forces, water and light, motion and rest, air and breath, which are to become an explicit theme of inquiry in The Air We Breathe.

In Conversations in Another Room an old woman, Phoebe, lies in bed. She shares her flat with a companion and is visited regularly by her niece. The narration is in the present tense and is mostly dialogue, at times very funny. The conversations circle around unanswered questions about Phoebe's husband who vanished without trace, and her son David whose marriage has broken up. In the hall the niece's boyfriend sits under a convex mirror, occasionally jotting in a notebook. To the reader's surprise, towards the end of the book there is suddenly a section in an unfamiliar and unidentified voice, in the first person. We do not know what the relationship is between this voice and the characters in Phoebe's flat. The voice says: "Perhaps we cannot write about our real selves, our real lives, the lives we have really lived. They are not there to be written about. The conversation always goes on in another room." Contre-Jour derives from a fascination with the French painter Pierre Bonnard. The first half of the novel is in the voice of his daughter, who has left home. The second half is in the voice of his wife. She compulsively bathes as her husband sits and sketches her. She voices her complaints and her unhappiness about her daughter's behavior. She writes odd notes and pins them around the house. We begin to realize that she is seriously disturbed. Perhaps the daughter does not exist at all but is made up as a consolation or a demented irritant by the painter's wife. We hear only short fragments of the painter's own speech as they are quoted by the women. Through all of his wife's miseries he continues, apparently serenely, to paint. Is his absorption in his work immensely cruel or is it that he has extraordinary patience? At the end we read a short, formal letter from the painter to a friend announcing the death of his wife. It has come to seem that the main subject of the work is the painter himself even though we scarcely hear his own voice directly. We view him only in the negative shapes he makes against the background of those who surround him, against the light.

The plot of In a Hotel Garden takes place as much in flashback as in forward motion, with the glum protagonist Ben attempting to sort out the problems of his past. All in all, the book offers little to hold a reader's attention. One central image from Migrations can serve as an index of Josipovici's concerns as a novelist. The friends and relations of Lazarus wait outside the tomb, excited, anticipating a miracle. Lazarus emerges and slowly unwinds the linen cloth. He unwinds and unwinds and when he is finished there is nothing there, nothing but a little mound of dust. There is nothing in the center. There is no central meaning. As Josipovici says in The Lessons of Modernism the modern writer, like Eliot's Prufrock, rejects the role of Lazarus, "come back from the dead, come back to tell you all."

JUST, Ward

Nationality: American. Born: Michigan City, Indiana, 5 September 1935. Education: Trinity College, Hartford, Connecticut, 1953–57. Family: Has two daughters, one son; married Sarah Catchpole, 1983. Career: Reporter, Newsweek, Chicago and Washington, 1959–62; The Reporter Magazine, Washington, 1962–63; Newsweek, London and Washington, 1963–65; The Washington Post, Washington and Saigon. Awards: Overseas Press Club award, 1968; National Magazine award, 1970, for non-fiction, and 1980, for fiction; Chicago Tribune Heartland award for fiction, 1989, for "Jack Gance"; O. Henry Award, 1985, 1986, 1993. Address: RFD 342, Vineyard Haven, Massachusetts 02568, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Soldier of the Revolution. New York, Knopf, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1970.

Stringer. Boston, Atlantic, 1974.

Nicholson at Large. Boston, Atlantic, 1975.

A Family Trust. Boston, Atlantic, and London, Secker, 1978.

Honor, Power, Riches, Fame and the Love of Women. New York, Dutton, 1979.

In the City of Fear. New York, Viking, 1982.

The American Blues. New York, Viking, 1984.

American Ambassador. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Serpent's Tail, 1987.

Jack Gance. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Hale, 1989.

The Translator. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1991.

Ambition and Love. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1994.

Echo House. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1997.

A Dangerous Friend. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1999.

Short Stories

The Congressman Who Loved Flaubert: 21 Stories and Novellas. Boston, Atlantic, and London, Little Brown, 1973.

Twenty-One: Selected Stories. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1990.

Other

To What End: Report from Vietnam. New York, Knopf, 1968; New York, Public Affairs, 1968.

Military Men. New York, Knopf, 1970.

*

Manuscript Collection: Cranbrook School Archives, Bloomfield Hills, Michigan.

Critical Studies: "Just Deserts" by Tad Friend, GQ, June 1990; "Just So: The Odyssey of a Quintessentially American Novelist" by Dinitia Smith, New York Magazine, 19 August 1991.

* *

Though Ward Just has distinguished himself as a journalist, he has also produced an impressive body of fiction. As a novelist, he has been compared favorably with Ernest Hemingway and Henry James. Much of his work centers around war—portrayed by the keen eye of a newsman—as is often true of Hemingway; however, his characters and their settings seem more Jamesian in their affluence and jaded sophistication. It is as if Just has felt the pulse of America for the past fifty years and produced "our story," one that is frighteningly familiar. The primary criticism of Just's work is that his action is slow and plodding. Although his characters are articulate and witty, they often do just sit and talk, especially in his fine piece on Washington during Vietnam, In the City of Fear.

Stringer, published in 1974 during the era of disillusion that followed Watergate, received mixed reviews. The general response was that this was a small book with flaws but a powerful look at the Vietnam War and the society that lived through it. In the opening scene, when Stringer savors the taste of chocolate and limeade through a high that captures his readers with the physical surroundings, he might well be a Hemingway character discovering watercress except that this war is different for the individual soldier who feels more alienated than heroic. The main character does not feel connected to the war anymore than he does to his education, his career as a journalist, or to his family.

In his next novel, Nicholson at Large, Just captures the spirit of Washington as it reflects whatever else is going on in the nation. Many readers, however, felt that the work revealed flaws of an early novelist who, nonetheless, showed promise. Other reviewers insisted that this novel was more than promising—that it had, in fact, established Just as a serious writer to be watched. In 1978, A Family Trust was widely praised for its insightful treatment of family conflict. The word "promising" was less audible but still heard in response to Ward Just.

With In the City of Fear, the promise came to fruition almost without dispute. Just was praised for the convincing character of Colonel Sam Joyce and for his satirical look at some of Washington's key figures, including the presidents (even if he does not name them). One of the most stirring scenes in the book helps to illustrate the realization of Just's ability to portray strong female characters. Sheila has disrupted the chatter of a Washington dinner party (attended by military men, politicians, newspaper men, and their wives) by producing a poignant photo of her young son, who is in Vietnam. The photo quiets even the most enthusiastic war conversationalists, and Marina muses:

Watching Sheila now, Marina was surprised at her—forbearance. At the general forbearance of women—Sheila's, Jo's, her own. It would not last, they concealed so much. She knew the tempo of the dance was increasing. ... They would all go to pieces, men would leave their wives and women their families. Children would disappear. There would be heart attacks and suicides and breakdowns and no one would be as he or she had been. The thin would grow fat, and the fat would grow fatter. They were all fighting the same war, in this murderous twilight of the American century. Now she was drawn to Sheila, tired and distraught, her grief worn like a black badge of courage.

She goes on to say they were all beguiled in the way that Henry James once described "women traveling in exotic Italy." The echo of James is significant in the middle of this musing, but even more so is the echo of Stephen Crane's badge of courage. No wonder this book brought Just praise as a sensitive, distinguished writer of our time.

The American Blues, a first-person narrative, is disarming, given the close relationship of journalism and fiction that readers of Just already grapple with. His work often reads more like a factual account than a novel, particularly here.

The theme of father and son pitted against one another recurs in The American Ambassador, when William and Bill Jr., a diplomat and a terrorist respectively, struggle in the exciting backdrop of international intrigue. Not surprisingly, The Translator, which appeared in 1991, covers the historic lifting of the Iron Curtain. An American woman in Paris marries a refugee who has become a linguist—a skill that leads to international intrigue again. Critics found this a gloomy portrayal of humanity as it nears the twenty-first century, but none of them were arguing that a more hopeful picture is deserved.

With Ambition and Love Just moved away from the political scene and gives the reader a delightful "tour" of Paris through the eyes of an artist, who may well be Just's strongest female character, and her lover, who is a writer. Echo House, the name for the Washington, D.C., mansion occupied by the prestigious Behl family, offers a sort of family history of postwar America, and presents insights into the intelligence community and the operations of government. In A Dangerous Friend, Just pictured America on the brink of full commitment to the Vietnam War in 1965. Through the eyes of a misguided civil servant, the book compellingly depicts the nation's descent down the slippery slope to folly.

—Loretta Cobb

K

KAPLAN, Johanna

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 29 December 1942. Education: The High School of Music and Art, New York; University of Wisconsin, Madison; New York University, B.A. 1964; Columbia University Teachers College, M.A. in special education 1965. Career: Since 1966 teacher of emotionally disturbed children in New York public schools at Mount Sinai Hospital, New York. Awards: Creative Artists Public Service grant, 1973; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1973; Jewish Book Council Epstein award, 1976; Wallant award, 1981; Jewish Book award, 1981; Smilen-Present Tense award, 1981. Agent: Georges Borchardt Inc., 136 East 57th Street, New York, New York 10022. Address: 411 West End Avenue, New York, New York 10024, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novel

O My America! New York, Harper, 1980.

Short Stories

Other People's Lives. New York, Knopf, 1975.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Not All Jewish Families Are Alike," in Commentary (New York), January 1976.
- "Family Obligations," in Forthcoming (New York), March 1983.
- "Close Calls," in Commentary (New York), May 1986.
- "Christmas Party," in City Journal (New York), Winter 1995.

*

Johanna Kaplan comments:

(2000) What I aim for in my work, both for my readers and for myself, is that self-transcendent state we all remember from the ecstasy of reading in childhood. In other words, a deep plunge into the world of otherness—not at all surreal or magical otherness, but rather an intense imaginative joining with lives going on about us which we might otherwise only guess at: a face glimpsed from a bus window, a transaction overheard in a store. Who are these people is what I want to know; what are their lives really like? Such (gossipy) wonderings instigate my fiction. I think it's also fair to say that I am concerned with the ways in which the past, specifically Jewish history, has a way of peeking and poking through to the everyday present.

* * *

By all the laws of literary logic, Johanna Kaplan should not have a career at all, much less an increasingly successful one. She began publishing short fiction about American-Jewish life in the early 1970s, at a time when the tapestry of American-Jewish life seemed threadbare, when sheer exhaustion had taken its toll on imaginative transformations of American-Jewish material, when critics and reviewers alike outraced themselves to say "Enough already!" Other People's Lives proved how wrong the nay-sayers had been. In this collection of five short stories and a novella, Kaplan made us aware, once again, of how vital, how dynamically alive, renderings of the American-Jewish milieu could be—especially if one had Kaplan's ear for speech rhythms and an instinctive grasp of our time, our place. Here, for example, is a snippet from the title story:

When your mother wrote that book [a character hectors a disaffected daughter], it was the Age of Conformity. And I'm not just talking about gray flannel suits! What I'm talking about is all those people who got caught up—they couldn't help themselves—in the whole trend and sway and spirit of the times. Not that I got trapped into it even then. Because it always seemed escapist and reactionary to me. And that's all that was going on—the flight to the suburbs! Your own lawn. Your own house. Your own psyche. Your own little garden—and for some people, not so little! And that, Julia darling, was what your mother was up against! Forget the city and live in the trees! And these were genuinely progressive people, not just ordinary shtunks!

Kaplan's congenial turf is the ordinariness of ordinary New York Jewish life. You walk into her stories as if through a crowded living room—never as an invited, "formal" guest, but, rather, as some distant cousin catching up on family gossip. It is a world where one's childhood is fixed forever in the mind of an aunt, even when that "child" is now an adult, and a psychiatrist to boot:

"Naomi!" the aunt said, jumping up from a green plastic chair that could easily have come from the office of a dentist with no eye for the future.

"I know," Naomi said. "My panti-hose are crooked. I'll go to the ladies' room and fix them."

"When did I—"

"All right, then, I'll go to the men's room and fix them ..."

But that much said about the comic ironies, the delicately shaded satire of Kaplan's stories, what lasts in these fictions are the complex privacies that simmer just beneath the surface. In "Sour or Suntanned, It Makes No Difference," for example, a ten-year-old protagonist who hates, absolutely hates, the regimen and artificiality of a summer camp ("at flag lowering you joined hands and swayed ... in swimming you had to jump for someone else's dripping hand.... There was no reason to spend a whole summer hugging them"), is confused, and frightened, by the part she must play in a camp production directed by a visiting Hebrew playwright. The story's concluding sentence, brilliantly written and hauntingly evocative, might stand for many of the stories in Other People's Lives: "standing there on the stage, a little girl in braids and a too-long dress who would end up not dead, Miriam promised herself that never again in her life would anyone look at her face and see in it what Amnon did, but just like the girl who could fake being dead, she would keep all her aliveness a secret."

O My America! extended the range and depth of Kaplan's fiction. It is, on one level, the story of Ezra Slavin, a crusty, unremitting social critic who dies at an anti-war rally in 1972. As an obituary puts it:

From very early in his career, Mr. Slavin was harshly critical of the anomic trends of urban, mechanized American life, yet his vision of the city as a place of "limitless, tumultuous possibility" was a lyrical, even celebratory one. "I have had a lifelong affair with the idea of America," Mr. Slavin once said. "And when people find that difficult to believe, I remind them of that flintier vision which is bound to result when love is unrequited."

That, one might say, is the "official," the pundit's, version of Ezra Slavin and what he stood for. O My America!, on the other hand, is that life told in flashback by his daughter Merry, one of his six children and part of what can only be called a complicated, free-form and exasperatingly extended "family."

The result is a canvas large enough for Kaplan to pour in a satiric history of immigrant Jewish life, to sketch minor characters by the dozen and to deepen the connections between American Jews and contemporary versions of the American Dream. Even more impressive, O My America! opened new possibilities for American-Jewish fiction, at a time when its dimensions seemed limited to pale retellings of Borsht Belt jokes or to pale imitations of major writers like Bernard Malamud, Saul Bellow, and Philip Roth. Even the most skeptical reviewers admitted that if Kaplan's fiction were the norm, there would be plenty of American-Jewish novels to kick around, for some time to come.

-Sanford Pinsker

KATZ, Steve

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 14 May 1935. Education: Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, 1952-56, A.B. (honors) 1956; University of Oregon, Eugene, M.A. in English 1959. Family: Married Patricia Bell in 1956 (divorced 1979); three sons. Career: Staff member, English Language Institute, 1960, and faculty member, University of Maryland Overseas, 1961-62, both Lecce, Italy; Assistant Professor of English, Cornell University, 1962-67; Lecturer in Fiction, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1969–70; writerin-residence, Brooklyn College, New York, 1970-71; Assistant Professor of English, Queens College, New York, 1971-75; Associate Professor of English, Notre Dame University, Indiana, 1976-78. Since 1978 Associate Professor of English, and Director of Creative Writing, 1978–81, University of Colorado, Boulder. Has also worked for the Forest Service in Idaho, in a quicksilver mine in Nevada, and on dairy farms in New York State; since 1971 teacher of Tai Chi Chuan. Awards: National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1976, 1981; Creative Artists Public Service grant, 1976. Agent: Georges Borchardt Inc., 136 East 57th Street, New York, New York 10022. Address: 3060 8th Street, Boulder, Colorado 80302, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Lestriad. Lecce, Italy, Milella, 1962; Flint, Michigan, Bamberger, 1987.

The Exagggerations of Peter Prince. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1968. Posh (as Stephanie Gatos). New York, Grove Press, 1971.

Saw. New York, Knopf, 1972.

Moving Parts. New York, Fiction Collective, 1977.

Wier and Pouce. College Park, Maryland, Sun and Moon, 1984.

Florry of Washington Heights. Los Angeles, Sun and Moon, 1988; London, Serpent's Tail, 1989.

Swanny's Ways. Los Angeles, Sun & Moon Press, 1995.

Short Stories

Creamy and Delicious: Eat My Words (in Other Words). New York, Random House, 1970.

Stolen Stories. New York, Fiction Collective, 1984. 43 Fictions. Los Angeles, Sun and Moon, 1991.

Plays

Screenplays: Grassland (Hex), with Leo Garen, 1972.

Poetry

The Weight of Antony. Ithaca, New York, Eibe Press, 1964. Cheyenne River Wild Track. Ithaca, New York, Ithaca House, 1973. Journalism. Flint, Michigan, Bamberger, 1990.

*

Critical Studies: The Life of Fiction by Jerome Klinkowitz, Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1977; "Fiction and the Facts of Life" by J.K. Grant, in Critique (Atlanta), Summer 1983; article by Sinda J. Gregory and Larry McCaffery, in Dictionary of Literary Biography Yearbook 1983 edited by Mary Bruccoli and Jean W. Ross, Detroit, Gale, 1984.

Steve Katz comments:

(1991) The nature of our work is determined by our peculiar collaborative procedures. There are nine Steve Katz and each of us makes a contribution to each piece. Three of the Steve Katz are women, putting them in a minority, but allowing, at least, for some female input into all of the work, which sometimes invokes misogyny, but because of the female component in its composition transcends that inference. We break down into three groups of three, each one with a woman at its pivot most of the time, though sometimes the women collaborate as a separate cadre. Three of us live in New York City, three travel all over North America, and sometimes to South America, and are stationed in Boulder, Colorado, and the third three never rest as travelers of the remaining world. Sometimes for variety one Steve Katz from the New York triumvirate will replace one Steve Katz from the world travelers and etc., generally without disruption or conflict. Some of the works can be written by only five of us (this blurb, for instance), and some by seven. In these instances we arbitrarily eliminate the four Steve Katz, or the two, by a process we call ''blistering.'' For more information about this process please contact our agent. We have never before revealed our method of composition because we had expected great financial gain from this unique procedure. Since this has not been forthcoming, voilà!

* * *

Steve Katz's fictions are woven from two distinct strands: from playful fable-like tales, often of serious intent, and from disruptive watch-the-writer-writing materials. The proportions in which these two narrative impulses are mixed vary from book to book, and give each its individual character.

Experiments in textual disruption dominate and shape The Exagggerations of Peter Prince. Devices used include crossed-out pages, notices of deleted passages, partially whited-out ads, and authorial injunctions to the characters and to the author himself. Despite the emphasis on technical manipulations, the emotional contour of a caring young man's struggles to do the right thing comes through—both from Peter Prince and from Katz. Katz's hope here, as in most of his quasi-autobiographical fiction, is that by writing Peter Prince he will invent for himself a better life. It is an admission of uncertainty about the future that the novel has no ending, that the planned ending is lost in the "archives of the unwritten." (The ending was to have been "America, with a rock and roll band at the castle, and all the new dances, formal and primitive ..." This scene does appear, sixteen years later, as "The Death of Bobby Kennedy" in Wier and Pouce.) Between disruptive passages Katz also shows himself to be a visually oriented writer, with a gift for evoking realistic detail: "... trees like candelabra, holding vultures, their gray and carmine heads flickering, and the small dark kites circling the umbrella crowned acacias." With the stories in Creamy and Delicious Katz's neo-fable style hits its stride. This book collects the "Mythologies," satirical reworkings and defacings of the stories and images of Wonder Woman, Nancy and Sluggo, Dickens, and Greek mythology. The writing here shares with Peter Prince a tense feel, and a need to discomfit or shock the reader: "Wonder Woman was a dike, but she was nice." The plain speech style is in places extended and stylized, with results not unlike some of Gertrude Stein's work: "A man there was called Thomas who in the aged long ago time before I was a boy was the man of many creatures, a many-creatured man in the hills before my youth....' Katz's disruptive side is here confined to two short, comparatively unsuccessful pieces, and some short poems. Katz followed this collection with the erotic novel Posh, which he wrote in six weeks.

With Saw Katz finds his mature voice. The disruptive and the fabulous are blended in a much more confident and relaxed, even whimsical, way. Characters in the novel include Eileen, who feeds a puppy to a hawk; a sphere from the center of the earth; a cylinder; a talking fly; and an astronaut from a distant galaxy—who, as Katz confesses midway through the book, is really the author. The Astronaut has come to Earth seeking a substance which can revitalize his world, a substance which is an amalgam of "ambition, greed, bullshit, pride, envy, bourbon, and smut." If we can credit the authorial interruptions in Saw, this is identical with Katz's idea of the substance of fiction. So in some ways Saw is about, not the process, but the experience of creating fiction. The final chapter (titled "The First Chapter") is a detailed account of a long hot day filled with poets and worries, and concludes with Katz getting away from it all in the more genial company of The Astronaut; leaving his everyday life behind and going off to explore his fictional world.

Beginning with "Female Skin" in Moving Parts Katz's fables move into new territory, become more deeply reflective of modern life and concerns than was possible through the more conventionally satirical characters of the earlier "Mythologies." "Female Skin" takes literally the metaphorical idea of getting inside another's skin. Called a novel, Moving Parts contains stories, diary entries, photographs, and a log of encounters with the number forty-three. Katz's playful side is evident everywhere: a photograph of Katz with a beard is followed by one of a barber shop, then one of a clean-shaven Katz. The author's face is one more "moving part" employed in the process of creating his fiction.

In Stolen Stories the literary experimentalist and the fable-wright once again speak separately. Half the pieces here are disembodied monologues, which are disruptive not in the sense of any authorial intrusion, but through their staccato, Burroughs-like use of language ("come in: this is my tent: you carry the sickness:"). These monologues succeed only in evoking the sounds of the experiences and states Katz deals with, with little of the emotional depth of his best work. The fabulous stories here are Katz's best. "Friendship" makes a convincing case for cannibalism being the logical and loving end toward which all friendships should move. "Death of the Band" crosses John Cage-style compositional ideas with psychotic urban violence to prophesy a new musical form.

Wier and Pouce is Katz's masterpiece, an encapsulation of the spiritual/ideological crisis in America since the 1950s. (Wier and Pouce is a very American novel: it begins and ends with ball games.) The writing style varies to mirror the temper of the times, from the Horatio Algerish first chapter, through anagramic and alphabetical sections (covering roughly the years of Katz's early literary experiments), before settling into the mature Katz voice.

Dusty Wier is clearly Katz's stand-in here, but he is also representative of everyone who grew up in those times hoping for a better American Way to manifest itself. E. Pouce embodies the arrogance and ambition of the dark side of that Way: among his other deeds he drops napalm on his own party—this in the wake of "The Death of Bobby Kennedy," that is, of the death of 1960s idealism. Episodes and images subtly mirror one another from scene to scene and country to country, reinforcing the universal feel Katz is striving to establish. Fiction's role here is spelled out for the reader: "When the day gets short people must make up stories just to get through the nights." As at the end of Peter Prince, Katz here is uncertain about what is to come: an impossibly high fly ball is falling toward a long-dormant giant's glove as the novel closes.

-William C. Bamberger

KAVANAGH, Dan

See BARNES, Julian (Patrick)

KAY, Jackie

Nationality: Scottish. Born: Jacqueline Margaret Kay in Edinburgh, Scotland, 9 November 1961. Education: University of Stirling, B.A. 1983. Family: One son. Career: Writer-in-residence, Hammersmith, London, 1989–91. Awards: Eric Gregory award, 1991; Scottish Arts Council Book award, 1991; Saltire First Book of the Year award, 1991; Forward prize, 1992; Signal Poetry award, 1993; Somerset Maugham award. Agent: Pat Kavanagh, Peters Fraser & Dunlop, 503/4 The Chambers, Chelsea Harbour, London SW10 0XF, England. Address: 20 Townsend Road, London N15 4NT, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Trumpet. New York, Pantheon, 1998.

Poetry

That Distance Apart (chapbook). London, Turret, 1991.The Adoption Papers. Newcastle upon Tyne, England, Bloodaxe, 1991.

Two's Company (for children). London, Puffin, 1992. Other Lovers. Newcastle upon Tyne, England, Bloodaxe, 1993. Three Has Gone (for children). London, Blackie Children's, 1994.

Other

Bessie Smith (biography). New York, Absolute, 1997.

Contributor, Stepping Out: Short Stories on Friendships Between Women. New York, Pandora Press, 1986.

Contributor, Lesbian Plays, edited by Jill Davis. New York, Methuen, 1987.

Contributor, Gay Sweatshop: Four Plays and a Company, edited by Philip Osment. Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Methuen Drama, 1989.

* * *

Jackie Kay is part of a vibrant literary scene of black British writers who among others include Grace Nichols, Bernadine Evaristo, and David Dabydeen. Unlike most black British writers she has grown up in Scotland and is therefore in the position to craft a new literary language that bears both a "Scottish" and a "black" inflection. Kay published her first novel after establishing herself with three collections of poetry, and her lyrical tone and mature control of language reveal the poet behind the novelist. Kay's novel also connects with her interest in trans-racial adoption, and specifically with her first collection of poetry, The Adoption Papers.

The Trumpet is love story and lament, full of tension and pain. It is loosely influenced by the life of Jazz musician Billy Tipton, whose story is transposed from 1930s America to 1950s Scotland. The black Scottish trumpeter Joss Moody has led life as a man—but in the body of a woman. Only his wife Millie shared this secret, while their adopted son Colman finds out when he sees Moody's body in the funeral parlour. The novel opens with Millie not only having to deal with her personal loss but also fending off the press, which relishes the potential sensationalism of Joss Moody's double life. As the book unfolds, several characters relate their own version of Moody, including his mother, a former school friend, and his drummer "Big Red." Puzzled by the Jazz musician's gender bending, Dr. Krishnamurty reluctantly signs the death certificate. The novel's characters find it difficult to reconcile their former knowledge of Moody with the revelation made upon his death. Indeed, Moody himself could not speak to his wife about his life as a young girl until shortly before his death. Resembling short riffs and solo instruments, these and many other voices are variations of a theme, Moody's life, which is rendered as a piece of jazz.

The stories of those who knew Moody compete with each other for validity—they are not disinterested accounts. Presenting conflicting stories of Moody's life, the novel questions the notion of authenticity. Moody had been a trespasser between reality and performance; by remaining in control of his story for most of his life, he deliberately divided private and public, thereby creating his own identity and effectively inventing himself. The price paid is the exclusion of his son Colman. The novel thereby also addresses the issue of investment into stories. What are they used for, whom do they serve, what is their cost? Colman's case drastically shows that the threat to the recollection of his father is profoundly unsettling: "I don't know any of us any more. He has made us all unreal."

While Millie retreats to a remote coastal village in an attempt to protect her own privacy and her husband's memory, her son's incomprehension and hurt lead him to bond with tabloid journalist Sophie Stone, whose investment in Moody's story is purely commercial. She becomes Colman's ghost-writer, and they travel through England and Scotland together, looking for Moody's acquaintances and family for their bare-all biography. But their research becomes a quest for Colman himself. He traces not his unknown biological parents but his adoptive father, thereby pursuing a partly illusory figure. His father's trumpet resounded with a yearning for the past, with displacement. Colman quests his fantasy father and authors his own memory, his own story, putting himself into his father's lineage.

-Mark Stein

KELLEHER, Victor

Pseudonym: Veronica Hart. Nationality: British (also a citizen of Australia). Born: Victor Michael Kitchener Kelleher in London, 19 July 1939. Education: The University of Natal, Pietermaritzburg, South Africa, B.A. in English 1962; University of St. Andrews, Fife, Dip. Ed. 1963; University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, B.A. (honors) 1969; University of South Africa, Pretoria, M.A. 1970, D.Litt. et Phil. 1973. Family: Married Alison Lyle in 1962; one son and one daughter. Career: Junior lecturer in English, University of the Witwatersrand, 1969; lecturer, then senior lecturer, in English, University of South Africa, 1970-73; lecturer in English, Massey University, Palmerston North, New Zealand, 1973-76; senior lecturer, 1976-84, and associate professor of English, 1984-87, University of New England, Armidale, New South Wales. Awards: Patricia Hackett prize, for short story, 1978; West Australian Young Readers' Book award, 1982, 1983, 1993; Australia Council fellowship, 1982, 1989-91, 1995-98; Australian Children's Book of the Year award, 1983, 1987; Australian Science Fiction Achievement award, 1984; Australian Children's Book Council Honour award, 1987, 1991; Australian Peace prize, 1989; Koala award, 1991; Hoffman award, 1992, 1993; Cool award, 1993. Address: 1 Avenue Rd., Clebe, New South Wales 2037, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Voices from the River. London, Heinemann, 1979; St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1991.

The Beast of Heaven. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1984.

Em's Story. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1988. Wintering. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1990.

Micky Darlin'. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1990.

Double God (as Veronica Hart). Melbourne and London, Mandarin, 1994.

The House That Jack Built (as Veronica Hart). Melbourne and London, Mandarin, 1994.

Fire Dancer. Ringwood, Victoria and New York, Viking, 1996.Storyman. Milsons Point, New South Wales, Random House Australia, 1996.

Earthsong. Ringwood, Victoria, Puffin Books, 1997. Into the Dark. Ringwood, Victoria, Viking, 1999.

Short Stories

Africa and After. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1983; as The Traveller, 1987.

Other (for young adults)

Forbidden Paths of Thual. London, Kestrel, 1979.

The Hunting of Shadroth. London, Kestrel, 1981.

Master of the Grove. London, Kestrel, 1982.

Papio. London, Kestrel, 1984; as Rescue, New York, Dial Books, 1992.

The Green Piper. Melbourne, Viking Kestrel, 1984; London, Viking Kestrel, 1985.

Taronga. Melbourne, Viking Kestrel, 1986; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1987.

The Makers. Melbourne, Viking Kestrel, 1987.

Baily's Bones. Melbourne, Viking Kestrel, 1988; New York, Dial Press, 1989.

The Red King. Melbourne, Viking Kestrel, 1989; New York, Dial Press, 1990.

Brother Night. London, MacRae, 1990; New York, Walker, 1991.Del-Del. London, MacRae/Random House, 1991; New York, Walker, 1992.

To the Dark Tower. London, MacRae/Random House, 1992.

Where the Whales Sing. Melbourne and London, Viking, 1994; published as Riding the Whales, New York, Dial, 1995.

Parkland. Melbourne and New York, Viking, 1994.

* * *

Although he has spent considerable periods of time in several countries, it is his experiences in Africa that dominate Kelleher's fiction. He says of himself, "Central Africa, where I was to spend a good portion of the next twenty years [after leaving England], did more to alter my attitudes and prospects than anything before or since," and he speaks also of his immense grief at being compelled to leave it. His first novel, Voices from the River is, like most of his work, a study of the many forms that racism and also racial interaction generally can take, and of the necessity of finding what is universal in human nature that can overcome the superficialities of differences in the color of skin. The voices belong to five different people: two brothers, Davy and Jonno, their father Cole (whom one or both of them murder), and two policemen, Samuels and Priestly, who are temperamentally and philosophically poles apart. In its complex structure and deliberate, even willful creation of uncertainty about motive and even fact, the novel seems influenced by Faulkner. Kelleher's view of Africa and Africans is far from misty-eyed. In many ways the novel could be read as a critique of the philanthropic liberalism of Samuels, who returns after retirement to England. But the fact that he is killed because, as Priestly had predicted, he is too trusting and sentimental, is offset by the large numbers of Africans at his funeral.

Africa and After contains fifteen stories: seven set in Africa, one bridging story which looks back upon Africa from self-imposed exile, and seven set in Australia, where Kelleher finally settled. The first half of the book is far better than the second. The material itself is richer, and Kelleher's imagery seems engaged by it in a way that is not true of the later stories where the view of human behavior is often reductive and even cynical, the observations of an uninvolved outsider.

Kelleher has spoken of his wish to write in a diverse variety of modes. He is a very successful writer of young adult fiction and has published two bloodthirsty novels of terror under the pseudonym of Veronica Hart. Even his third book of adult fiction under his own name, The Beast of Heaven, represents another radical departure from anything he had written previously. The novel is set 100,000 years after a nuclear holocaust that has taken place in the year 2027, and is a moral fable about the merit of continuing the human race. Two computers, the survivors of a war which destroyed the "Ancients" who created them, debate the issue while the only survivors, the peaceful Gatherers, struggle amid the desolate landscape to eke out a living and to evade the predatory Houdin, the Beast of Heaven. It is an ingeniously constructed and often lyrically written novel which leads ineluctably to an apocalyptic ending of dreadful irony. Reviewers have mentioned Dylan Thomas in connection with it but a more appropriate analogy would be with Yeats' "The Second Coming."

Em's Story returns us to Africa and the question of race. A young woman named Eva is asked by her grandmother Emma Wilhelm to write the story of an heroic trek she undertook sixty years before. Rebelling against her German ancestors and their virtual extinction of the Hereros, she offers shelter to a Herero tribesman and then makes love to him. After he is murdered by her father, she sets out on her journey north to rejoin the remnants of the tribe she has come to accept as her own people. Sixty years later, her granddaughter undertakes the same journey in circumstances which, as she observes, are markedly different, bent on a similar mission of reconciliation and recovery of her personal identity. Kelleher cuts frequently between past and present, and the similarity of Eva's circumstances to those of Em are pointedly stressed, but the novel's emphasis is on the healing and hopeful qualities of Eva's journey across the bridge between white and black Africa.

Wintering is set in Australia in 1988, the year of the bicentennial, but returns to many of the same themes as Kelleher's earlier fiction. The narrator, a young man named Jack Rudd, writes out his story in between visiting his friend Benny, who lies comatose in hospital. The novel cuts rapidly between the present—Benny's condition and Jack's struggle to revive his relationship with his Aboriginal former girlfriend Bridget—the past of a year before, and the events that led to Benny's destruction and the end of the relationship. Once again, Kelleher finds the soil of Australia a little too arid to write the kind of novel he had in mind: his 1960s white radicals are hardly more complex or interesting than his Redfern Aboriginals, and the upbeat ending of the novel is both startling and unconvincing. Nevertheless, the pleasures to be found in this work are those in all of his fiction—a fine ear for dialogue, a command of narrative, an ability to evoke landscape, and more importantly and less definably, a fundamental integrity in the way he approaches the issues that concern him.

The same qualities are evident in Micky Darlin', in which the author has returned to the first of his three countries for his material. The book consists of a number of interrelated stories which together comprise a history of the sprawling Donoghue family of Irish expatriates, spread over many years and narrated by the eponymous Micky. Beginning in the early 1940s in wartime London when Micky is of preschool age, the tales take us through the following decade when Micky has grown to be a young adult, the witness and recorder of the family's progressive disintegration over the different generations. More or less abandoned by his weak mother and alcoholic father, Micky has been brought up by his grandparents, Nan and Gramps, but when Gramps dies in a foolish accident, the family falls apart and the embittered Micky feels forsaken yet again. In the hands of a lesser writer the Donoghues would be almost Irish stereotypes constantly drinking, brawling, angrily divided from another over questions of religion—but Kelleher's unsentimental, sharply observant prose brings them alive.

-Laurie Clancy

KELLEY, William Melvin

Nationality: American. Born: Bronx, New York, 1 November 1937. Education: Fieldston School, New York; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts (Read prize, 1960), 1957–61. Family: Married Karen Gibson in 1962; two children. Career: Writer-in-residence, State University College, Geneseo, New York, Spring 1965; teacher, New School for Social Research, New York, 1965–67, and University of the West Indies, Mona, Jamaica, 1969–70. Awards: Dana Reed Literary prize, Harvard University, 1960; Bread Loaf Writers Conference grant, 1962; Whitney Foundation award, 1963; Rosenthal Foundation award, 1963; Transatlantic Review award, 1964; Black Academy of Arts and Letters award, 1970. Address: The Wisdom Shop, P.O. Box 2658, New York, New York 10027, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Different Drummer. New York, Doubleday, 1962; London, Hutchinson, 1963.

A Drop of Patience. New York, Doubleday, 1965; London, Hutchinson, 1966.

Dem. New York, Doubleday, 1967.

Dunfords Travels Everywheres. New York, Doubleday, 1970.

Short Stories

Dancers on the Shore. New York, Doubleday, 1964; London, Hutchinson, 1965.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Jest, Like Sam," in Negro Digest (Chicago), October 1969.

"The Dentist's Wife," in Women and Men, Men and Women, edited by William Smart. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1975.

* *

William Melvin Kelley's novels to date have dealt with interracial conflict, but the emphasis has been on the examination of characters, black and white, and the myths with which they delude themselves. His novels pose no "solutions" to the conflict but the solution of self-understanding, and his depiction of the relationships—loving and competitive—between men and women and blacks and whites combines compassion, objectivity, and humor.

His first novel, A Different Drummer, set realistically rendered characters in a fantasy plot. From multiple points of view he displayed the reactions of the whites of a fictional Southern state to the spontaneous grass-roots emigration of the state's blacks. A minor incident in A Different Drummer concerns Wallace Bedlow, who is waiting for a bus to take him to New York City, where he plans to live with his brother, Carlyle. Bedlow appears only that one time, but he surfaces again in "Cry for Me," probably the best short story in Dancers on the Shore, in which he becomes a famous folk singer. In that story the themes of one's public image versus the true self and commercialism versus art are explored.

These themes are developed further in Kelley's second novel, A Drop of Patience. The protagonist is a blind, black jazz musician, whose intuitive experimentation is contrasted to the intellectualization of critics, and whose love of music comes into conflict with the commercialization of music. More important than these themes, however, is the development of the character himself, who passes through various rites of passage as he learns to deal with sex, love, racism, and fame.

Carlyle Bedlow, who appeared in several of the stories in Dancers on the Shore, reappears in Dem, Kelley's third novel. "Lemme tellya how dem folks live," the novel begins. It goes on to show dem white folks living out their myths of white superiority, masculine prerogative, and soap-opera escapism. They are such victims of the pernicious myths of their culture that they are no longer even a threat to black people.

Racial conflict nearly disappears amidst the experimentation and fantasy of Dunfords Travels Everywheres, Kelley's own clever and original permutation of Finnegans Wake. A triptych in plot, style, and character, Dunfords Travels Everywheres is an ambitious short novel; it succeeds in being clever, but as an exploration into character it's less satisfying than his earlier novels.

Kelley has shown himself a skillful craftsman in a variety of styles and approaches. In his stories and in his first three novels his exploration of character develops as the character seeks—or refuses to seek—a unity between the person he feels he is and the personality he or society thinks he should be. This is true also in one of the three interwoven stories of Dunfords Travels Everywheres. In the other two stories a playful fantasy dominates. If Kelley's fiction has a direction, it's one that moves from seriousness and psychological probing to fantasy, playfulness, and comedy.

-William Borden

KELLY, Maeve

Nationality: Irish. Born: Ennis, County Clare, Ireland, 1930. Education: Studied nursing at St. Andrew's Hospital, London. Family: Married Gerard O'Brien-Kelly; two sons. Career: Founder and administrator of Adapt, shelter for victims of domestic violence, 1978—. Awards: Hennessey Award, 1972. Agent: Mic Cheetham, Sheil Land Associates, 43 Doughty Street, London, England. Address: Adapt House, Rosbrien, County Limerick, Ireland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Necessary Treasons. London, M. Joseph, 1985.Florrie's Girls. London, M. Joseph, 1989.Alice in Thunderland: A Feminist Fairytale. Dublin, Attic Press, 1993.

Short Stories

A Life of Her Own, and Other Stories. Dublin, Poolbeg Press, 1976.
Ms Muffet and Others: A Funny, Sassy, Heretical Collection of Feminist Fairytales (contributor). Dublin, Attic Press, 1986.
Mad and Bad Fairies (contributor). Dublin, Attic Press, 1987.
Orange Horses. London, M. Joseph, 1990.

Poetry

Resolution. Dover, New Hampshire, Blackstaff Press, 1986.

* * *

Maeve Kelly writes in several genres, and all of her work is informed by clear feminist principles. Born in 1930, Kelly has lived through significant changes in Irish society's attitudes toward women, but her literary works suggest some of the ways in which the changes have been insufficient. Her fictional representation of what life is like for Irish women is both emotionally and intellectually convincing.

A Life of Her Own, her first published collection of short stories, introduces the themes that recur throughout her oeuvre. Most of these stories have a clear feminist voice, and Kelly creates sympathetic characters whose ordinary lives embody the barriers women face. The title story, "A Life of Her Own," is told by a young female narrator who recounts the attempts of her aunt to achieve a measure of independence after spending many years as housekeeper for her bachelor brother. Her brother ridicules her for marrying and literally starves himself to death in a display of self-pity; Aunt Brigid herself dies in childbirth, for she was not young and the risks were greater in those days.

Kelly's first novel, Necessary Treasons, draws on her own experiences establishing and directing a Limerick-area shelter for battered women. Young Eve Gleeson is pulled in two directions: she becomes engaged to a middle-aged doctor, Hugh Creagh, at the same time as she grows steadily more involved in the women's movement. Her fiancé's relatives are living proof of the tenacity of sexism and the vilification of independent women. His sisters participate enthusiastically in denigrating Eve's political involvement and mistreat their former sister-in-law, Eleanor; Eleanor was physically abused by their brother, Donogh, who absconded to England with their child while Eleanor was being treated for the injuries he inflicted. Eleanor's search for her daughter was fruitless, but at novel's end it is revealed that she has been spending a month at the Creagh home, with the four sisters, every year since her father spirited her away. Eve's work with the women's shelter, in its infancy, brings her into contact with many kinds of concrete wrongs that women all around her suffer daily. As she leaves behind her sheltered, middle-class existence, Hugh becomes increasingly resentful; he is fascinated by the sufferings of the past, as manifested in old family papers he is studying, but refuses to grant any credibility to the present-day sufferings Eve brings to his attention. As the novel progresses, Eve becomes more outspoken about women's rights, and the others pull away from her. Even Eleanor, an outspoken feminist, fears that Eve will become an "earnest, humourless missionary." Finally, Eve breaks off her engagement and goes to California for six months to learn from women's activists there. The novel's representation of women's issues is compelling; Kelly shows the political, legal, religious, medical, and social forces arrayed against Irish women. It is sometimes unclear, however, whether readers are to see Eve's changes as maturity or if Eleanor and the others are right to criticize her for being "obsessive."

After a volume of poetry, Resolution, Kelly published her next novel, Florrie's Girls. Florrie's Girls draws on Kelly's experiences as a student nurse in London. Caitlin Cosgrave leaves the family farm in County Clare at age eighteen to train as a nurse in London. The farm cannot support more than one family member, and it is to go to Caitlin's brother. The narrative is written in journal form; there are no dates given, though sometimes days of the weeks or months are named. The journal begins with Caitlin's journey on the train taking her away from home, and continues throughout her four-year training course. It shows her growth as a person and includes often-scathing commentary on the medical profession. The novel underscores the rigid male hierarchies of medicine; while the nurses perform virtually all of the practical care of patients and become quite skilled at diagnosis, they have to bow before the male doctors who come in and make pronouncements, often dictating procedures with little consideration for the dignity and humanity of the patients. A brief stint with a gynecologist underscores for Caitlin how the medical community treats women's health as abnormal and somehow grotesque. Another significant theme in the novel is relations between English and Irish, but here again the rhetoric and the example of the novel seem to be in conflict. For example, Caitlin complains often of stereotypical English views of the Irish, but she herself is full of anti-English stereotypes. She contrasts English "bossiness" and craving for order with Irish virtues, but as a character she often embodies those supposedly English traits. She loves her uniform and notes repeatedly that she enjoys opportunities to manage things and believes herself to be better at it than others.

After another collection of short stories, Orange Horses, Kelly published a satirical novel, Alice in Thunderland. Subtitled A Feminist Fairytale, the satire takes on the social codes that continue to denigrate and limit women. Alice in Thunderland examines contemporary society by creating a fictional world of "memblies" and "femblies" whose interactions reveal very strange codes of conduct; Alice comes from Harmony Isle and is baffled by what she sees in Thunderland. Kelly's satire is in the tradition of Swift's Gulliver's Travels (notably, the embittered brother in "A Life of Her Own" reads Swift's condemnation of the female Yahoos) but takes on its own targets. Kelly's satire is insightful; hilarious and provocative by turns, no summary could do it justice. The book includes cartoon-style illustrations (drawn by Trina Mahon), showing Alice as a very large figure, looming over the inhabitants of Thunderland with her big hair and Doc Martens-style boots.

Kelly is a notable figure in contemporary Irish literature, disproving the critical commonplace that there were no serious Irish women writers until the 1990s. Hers is an important feminist voice, and her fiction creates a realistic and compelling portrait of the everyday lives of Irish women.

-Rosemary Johnsen

KELMAN, James

Nationality: Scottish. Born: Glasgow, 9 June 1946. Education: Greenfield School, Stonedyke School, and Hyndland School, all Glasgow, 1951–61. University of Strathclyde, Glasgow, 1975–78, 1981–82. Family: Married Marie Connors in 1969; two daughters. Career: Has worked at a variety of semi-skilled and labouring jobs. Scottish Arts Council Writing fellowship, 1978–80, 1982–85. Awards: Scottish Arts Council bursary, 1973, 1980, and book award, 1983, 1987, 1989; Cheltenham prize, 1987; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1990; Booker McConnell Prize, 1994. Agent: Cathie Thomson, 23 Hillhead Street, Glasgow G12. Address: 244 West Princess Street, Glasgow G4 9DP, Scotland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Busconductor Hines. Edinburgh, Polygon Press, 1984. A Chancer. Edinburgh, Polygon Press, 1985.

A Disaffection. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Farrar Straus, 1989.

How Late It Was, How Late. London, Secker and Warburg, 1994.

Short Stories

An Old Pub Near the Angel. Orono, Maine, Puckerbrush Press, 1973.
Three Glasgow Writers, with Tom Leonard and Alex Hamilton.
Glasgow, Molendinar Press, 1976.

Short Tales from the Nightshift. Glasgow, Print Studio Press, 1978. Not Not While the Giro and Other Stories. Edinburgh, Polygon Press, 1983.

Lean Tales, with Alasdair Gray and Agnes Owens. London, Cape, 1985.

Greyhound for Breakfast. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Farrar Straus, 1987.

The Burn. London, Secker and Warburg, 1991.

Busted Scotch: Selected Stories. New York, Norton, 1997.

The Good Times. London, Secker & Warburg, 1998; New York, Anchor Books, 1999.

Plays

The Busker (produced Edinburgh, 1985).

Le Rodeur, adaptation of the play by Enzo Cormann (produced Edinburgh, 1987).

In the Night (produced Stirling, 1988).

Hardie and Baird: The Last Days (produced Edinburgh, 1990).London, Secker and Warburg, 1991.

Radio Plays: Hardie and Baird: The Last Days, 1978.

Screenplays: The Return, 1990.

Other

Some Recent Attacks: Essays Cultural and Political. Stirling, Scotland, AK Press, 1992.

Editor, An East End Anthology. Glasgow, Clydeside Press, 1988.

*

Manuscript Collections: Mitchell Library, Glasgow.

Critical Studies: "Patter Merchants and Chancers: Recent Glasgow Writing" in Planet (Aberystwyth), no. 60, 1986–87, and article in New Welsh Review, (Aberystwyth), no. 10, 1990, both by Ian A. Bell.

James Kelman comments:

Glasgow is a post-industrial city; its culture comprises many different cultural traditions: I work within this.

* * *

James Kelman has established himself as one of the most compelling new voices in British fiction. Combining intense local affiliation with the west of Scotland and great stylistic inventiveness, he represents commitment and integrity, frankness and exuberance, and has been compared with Kafka and Beckett. His first novel, The Busconductor Hines takes a sombre subject, but articulates its central character through a mixture of impersonal reports and stream-of-consciousness imaginings. Kelman ignores the conventions of orthodox ''realist'' fiction in favour of a kaleidoscopic juxtaposition of fact and fantasy, in tribute to the imaginative capacities of ''ordinary people.'' Here is a sample:

Life is too serious.

Hunch the shoulders and march. The furtively fast figure. One fine morning Hines R. was arrested. Crackle crackle crackle. We have this fantasy coming through on the line sir should we tape it and hold it against him or what. Naw but honest sir he's just a lowly member of the transport experience; he slept in a little and perforce is obliged to walk it to work, having missed the bastarn omnibus. A certain irony granted but nothing more, no significance of any insurrectionary nature.

It may be tempting to read this as a purely formal experiment, and relax into appreciating the multivocal texture of the writing. However, the stylistic extravaganza is always at the service of a purposive exploration of Hines's world, and the book retains its human centre in moving descriptions of Hines at work and at home.

Kelman's second novel, A Chancer, adopts a different approach. It portrays a young man without qualities, with no attempt to investigate what goes on inside his head. Instead, it narrates his day-to-day existence as he drifts and gambles—a perennial interest of Kelman's—without overt or coercive authorial intrusion. The novel is interspersed with brief scenes where Kelman scrupulously describes events, and just as scrupulously keeps his distance. Such reluctance to invade his character's privacy is yet another way of resisting the pseudo-omniscience of more conventional third person narrative. It challenges us to make sense of events, without allowing us any special privileges. The formal features are not decorative, but are ways of identifying the limits of knowledge. What we eventually see through the sombre narrative is a life of purposelessness and indecision, lived within day-to-day privations, invigorated by the austerity of its unadorned, skeletal telling.

In his collections of short fictions, Greyhound for Breakfast and The Burn, Kelman shows more of his range. Some stories are brief vignettes, less than a page long, an anecdotal form he has experimented with from his earliest full collection—Not Not While the Giro—onwards. Others are more elaborately developed, in alternating moods of wit, exhilaration, exasperation, and despair. They are certainly the most diverse and exuberant collections of recent years, with the power and intensity and wit of the prose encapsulating very large social and political concerns within miniaturist sketches.

"Greyhound for Breakfast" is an exceptional piece, showing the author at his best. Without ornament, it recounts a couple of hours in the life of a character and his newly-acquired greyhound. It sounds comic, a not-very-shaggy dog story, but it is not. Ronnie has bought the dog for more money than he really has, and as the day goes on he can find no good reason for having done so. He had a half-formed idea of entering it in races, but this soon seems ridiculous. As he wanders, more and more of his life begins to look absurd. He has no job, no proper communication with his wife, his son has just left home, and the whole business of living seems meaningless. As the story ends, the narrative drifts into a wonderfully controlled and frightening stream-of-consciousness reverie. The nihilism is deeply unsettling, representing the inarticulate yearnings and unsatisfied desires of an ordinary man undergoing the alienations of contemporary urban life. Kelman's language is of necessity frank, but never gratuitously so. dramatising the painful struggle towards articulacy of the most complex emotions. The dog is used as a symbol, but to call it that suggests a cruder, more schematic technique than Kelman offers. The story is typically suggestive, enigmatic, and nuanced. Without overly directive authorial intervention, the connections between individual lives and the circumstances which prescribe them are made. Although Kelman's work is insistently angry, it is angry on behalf of his subjects, rather than exasperated with them.

The same intensity and the same humanity can be found in Kelman's 1989 novel, A Disaffection, which returns to the fabric of interior and exterior description. This book puts on display a Glasgow school teacher at the moment when he sees the paucity of his own life. It offers an engagement with the traditional concerns of the social realist novel, but also a more tense mixture of moods than in comparable work by David Storey or Alan Sillitoe. Kelman uses his very flexible style to move inside and outside Doyle's head, to maintain scrupulous attention to him and his fantasies. The novel becomes an unsentimental education, taking us through Doyle's crisis of confidence. Although it is an attack on the constraints and hypocrisies of the State educational system, it is a much more broadly-based revelation of a culture clinging onto the vestiges of its self-esteem.

Doyle's yearnings for something better, represented by the strange pair of pipes he finds and his unsatisfied fancy for a fellow-teacher, become a way of intensifying and demonstrating not only Doyle's own malaise, but also broader national circumstances. At times, the political leanings are explicit. Kelman uses the book to insinuate a disturbing critique of those who believe in the possibilities of change from within. Doyle struggles all the way through under the pressures to effect change, pressures which are much greater than he fully realises. In very powerful scenes with his parents and his unemployed brother, he enacts his alienation from the conditions of their lives, yet he has found nothing to replace their dignity. In the classroom and the staffroom, the futility of trying to educate people genuinely in circumstances so adverse is made very clear.

Yet the book is neither a simple diatribe, nor a purely personal vision. Kelman introduces complex framing devices through Doyle's interests in Hölderlin and Pythagorean philosophy. As in The Busconductor Hines the author seems very close to his character, but these references, like the frequent allusions to Hamlet, are ways of introducing new perspectives, and encouraging distance. At times, Kelman shows a Swiftian taste for irony, using that form as the only possible way of coping with the revealed awfulness of the world. We are not allowed to hold Doyle in contempt, and the sharp oscillations in the narrative between wit and horror are both compulsive and disturbing.

In 1994 Kelman's novel How Late It Was, How Late won the Booker McConnell Prize, a highly prestigious award. Yet this harrowing tale of blindness and affliction provoked an extraordinary controversy in Britain. Unable to see the book's deep humanity, many critics castigated its harsh language and its intense concentration on the lives of the dispossessed. How Late It Was, How Late is Kelman's toughest book yet, his most clearly focussed and uncompromising. His fascinating style, combining the darkest humour with glimpses of the horror of everyday life, allows him to produce narratives capable of the caustic and the tender, the intimate and the aloof. Moving in and out of the central figure's consciousness makes possible a fully human realisation of an individual's plight, and a recognition of the material circumstances that impose such pressure. More recently, Kelman has written plays (notably Hardie and Baird) and numerous political pamphlets, and his development is clearly continuing.

-Ian A. Bell

KENAN, Randall (G.)

Nationality: American. Born: Brooklyn, New York, 12 March 1963. Education: University of North Carolina, B.A. 1985. Career: Editor, Alfred A. Knopf, New York, 1985–89; lecturer, Sarah Lawrence College, 1989—, Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York, 1989—, and Columbia University, New York, New York, 1990—. Awards: MacDowell Colony fellowship, 1990. Address: Lecturer in Writing, Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, New York 10708, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Visitation of Spirits. New York, Grove Press, 1989.

Short Stories

Let the Dead Bury Their Dead and Other Stories. San Francisco, Harcourt, 1992.

Other

James Baldwin. New York, Chelsea House, 1994.

Walking on Water: Black American Lives at the Turn of the Twenty-First Century. New York, Knopf, 1999.

Contributor, Crossing the Color Line: Readings in Black and White, edited by Suzanne W. Jones. Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 2000.

*

Critical Studies: The Power of the Porch: The Storyteller's Craft in Zora Neale Hurston, Gloria Naylor, and Randall Kenan by Trudier Harris, Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1996.

* * *

James Baldwin, about whom Randall Kenan has written eloquently, used to say with characteristic irony that by being both black and gay in America, he had "hit the jackpot." If so, then Kenan is a Powerball winner; he is black, gay, and southern—and rural southern, too, as Kenan's hometown of Chinquapin, North Carolina, in contrast to Baldwin's native New York City, is a community so small and obscure that most people even in Raleigh and Chapel Hill have never heard of it. Chinquapin is transmogrified into Tims Creek in Kenan's two books of fiction to date, the novel A Visitation of Spirits and the story collection Let the Dead Bury Their Dead, an output slim but nevertheless sufficient to establish Kenan as one of the most distinctive voices in contemporary American fiction.

In alternating chapters, A Visitation of Spirits tells two related Tims Creek stories, separated in time by more than a year. on April 29 and 30, 1984, brilliant but troubled teenager Horace Thomas Cross, plagued by his community's high expectations and by his shame at his secret homosexuality, puts into effect a strange plan drawn from folklore, an attempt to escape his circumstances by turning himself into a bird. Horace's clumsy ritual succeeds only in summoning evil spirits who may or may not exist outside Horace's fevered imagination but who force poor Horace to re-live the most tormenting episodes of his young life. The reader gradually realizes that these are the last hours of that life, as Horace descends into a suicidal phantasmagoria akin to that experienced by Quentin Compson in another snall-town southern novel of fractured April chronology, William Faulkner's The Sound and the Fury.

In the alternating chapters of Kenan's novel, which take place on December 8 of the following year, Horace's older cousin, the Rev. Jimmy Green, grudgingly drives his aged aunt and uncle to visit a sick relation. The shadow of Horace's death still lies over the family, and tensions in the car run high as Jimmy ponders his troubled marriage and as the decades-long bickering between the aunt and uncle reaches a frightening new pitch of intensity and revelation.

Much of the commentary on A Visitation of Spirits focused on its gay themes and its Toni Morrison-like use of magic realism to convey the African-American experience. Yet the novel is remarkable, too, for its closely observed and compassionate depiction of the bickering old-timers, and for its witty and insightful examination of pop-culture appropriation on the margins of society. Certainly Horace derives more inspiration from his white-bread comic-book collection than from any more authentically African-American influence.

Though Let the Dead Bury Their Dead is a collection of stories rather than a novel per se, most of it is set in Tims Creek or among its expatriates, and characters from A Visitation of Spirits reappear—Horace being a notable exception. Moreover, consecutive stories within the book give the reader different perspectives on the same characters. For example, the Right Reverend Hezekiah Barden, the fire-breathing homophobe who so terrifies Horace in the novel, reappears in one story in a comic supporting role, as an unwelcome dinner guest who pries into everyone's business. In another story, however, the reader shares Barden's point of view as he preaches a platitudinous eulogy over the casket of a parishioner who was his secret lover; Barden's simultaneous private eulogy for the woman is quite different from the public one.

The collection thus has the feel of an episodic novel, if not a sequel then certainly a continuation of the Tims Creek story begun in A Visitation of Spirits. Again Kenan displays a flair for dialogue, for the rhythms of country speech. Again his senior citizens are his most fully realized characters. Again he makes Tims Creek a magical place: In one story, a hog apparently bestows the gift of clairvoyance; in another, a very out-of-place Asian man falls from the sky. More often in the stories than in the novel, however, Kenan allows himself to be funny, culminating in the title story, which is partially a parody of the academic folkloric study and partially a fond homage to our funniest folklorist, Zora Neale Hurston.

Having placed Tims Creek and himself on the landscape of American fiction, at an age when many young writers are just beginning to put stamps onto their self-addressed envelopes, Kenan then turned to non-fiction, most notably to the seven-year odyssey of cross-country interviewing that resulted in the nearly 700 pages of the impressive Walking on Water: Black American Lives at the Turn of the Twenty-First Century. Confronted with the many faces of black American culture, Kenan concludes that it was always postmodern, because "folks made it up as they went along." One hopes that Kenan, having shaken the road dust from his feet, now feels like making up some new stories of his own. Tims Creek, like Faulkner's Jefferson, is a locale too rich in possibilities to leave unvisited for long.

—Andy Duncan

KENEALLY, Thomas (Michael)

Nationality: Australian. Born: Sydney, New South Wales, 7 October 1935. Education: St. Patrick's College, Strathfield, New South Wales; studied for the priesthood 1953–60, and studied law. Military Service: Australian Citizens Military Forces. Family: Married Judith Mary Martin in 1965; two daughters. Career: High school teacher in Sydney, 1960-64; lecturer in drama, University of New England, Armidale, New South Wales, 1968-69; lived in the U.S., 1975-77; visiting professor of English, University of California, Irvine, 1985; Berg Professor of English, New York University, 1988. Member: Australia-China Council, 1978-83; member of the advisory panel, Australian Constitutional Commission, 1985-88; member, Australian Literary Arts Board, 1985-88; president, National Book Council of Australia, 1985-89; chairman, Australian Society of Authors, 1987. Awards: Commonwealth Literary Fund fellowship, 1966, 1968, 1972; Miles Franklin award, 1968, 1969; Captain Cook Bicentenary prize, 1970; Royal Society of Literature Heinemann award, 1973; Booker prize, 1982; Los Angeles Times award, 1983;. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1973, American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1993; Officer, Order of Australia, 1983. Agent: Deborah Rogers, Rogers, Colleridge and White, 20 Powis Mews, London W11 1JN, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Place at Whitton. Melbourne and London, Cassell, 1964; New York, Walker, 1965.

The Fear. Melbourne and London, Cassell, 1965; as By the Line, St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1989.

Bring Larks and Heroes. Melbourne, Cassell, 1967; London, Cassell, and New York, Viking Press, 1968.

Three Cheers for the Paraclete. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1968; London, Angus and Robertson, and New York, Viking Press, 1969.

The Survivor. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1969; London, Angus and Robertson, and New York, Viking Press, 1970.

A Dutiful Daughter. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, and New York, Viking Press, 1971.

The Chant of Jimmie Blacksmith. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, and New York, Viking Press, 1972.

Blood Red, Sister Rose. London, Collins, and New York, Viking Press, 1974.

Moses the Lawgiver (novelization of television play). London, Collins-ATV, and New York, Harper, 1975.

Gossip from the Forest. London, Collins, 1975; New York, Harcourt Brace, 1976.

Season in Purgatory. London, Collins, 1976; New York, Harcourt Brace, 1977.

A Victim of the Aurora. London, Collins, 1977; New York, Harcourt Brace, 1978.

Passenger. London, Collins, and New York, Harcourt Brace, 1979. Confederates. London, Collins, 1979; New York, Harper, 1980.

The Cut-Rate Kingdom. Sydney, Wildcat Press, 1980; London, Allen Lane, 1984.

Schindler's Ark. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1982; as Schindler's List, New York, Simon and Schuster, 1982.

A Family Madness. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1985; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1986.

The Playmaker. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1987.

Towards Asmara. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1989; as To Asmara, New York, Warner, 1989.

Flying Hero Class. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Warner, 1991.

Woman of the Inner Sea. N.p., Doubleday and Hodder, 1992; New York, Plume, 1993.

Jacko. N.p., Heinemann, 1993.

A River Town. London, Reed Books, 1995; New York, N. A. Talese, 1995.

Bettany's Book. New York, Bantam, 1999.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Performing Blind Boy," in Festival and Other Stories, edited by Brian Buckley and Jim Hamilton. Melbourne, Wren, 1974; Newton Abbot, Devon, David and Charles, 1975.

Plays

Halloran's Little Boat, adaptation of his novel Bring Larks and Heroes (produced Sydney, 1966). Published in Penguin Australian Drama 2, Melbourne, Penguin, 1975.

Childermass (produced Sydney, 1968).

An Awful Rose (produced Sydney, 1972).

Bullie's House (produced Sydney, 1980; New Haven, Connecticut, 1985). Sydney, Currency Press, 1981.

Gossip from the Forest, adaptation of his own novel (produced 1983).

Screenplays: The Priest (episode in Libido ), 1973; Silver City, with Sophia Turkiewicz, 1985.

Television Writing (UK): Essington, 1974; The World's Wrong End (documentary; Writers and Places series), 1981; Australia series, 1987.

Other

Ned Kelly and the City of Bees (for children). London, Cape, 1978; Boston, Godine, 1981.

Outback, photographs by Gary Hansen and Mark Lang. Sydney and London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1983.

Australia: Beyond the Dreamtime, with Patsy Adam-Smith and Robyn Davidson. London, BBC Publications, 1987; New York, Facts on File, 1989.

Child of Australia (song), music by Peter Sculthorpe. London, Faber Music, 1987.

Now and in Time to Be: Ireland and the Irish, photographs by Patrick Prendergast. N.p., Panmacmillan, n.p., Ryan, and n.p., Norton, 1992.

The Great Shame: A Story of the Irish in the Old World and the New. Milsons Point, New South Wales, Random House, 1998; published as The Great Shame, and the Triumph of the Irish in the English-speaking World, New York, Nan A. Talese, 1999.

*

Manuscript Collections: Mitchell Library, Sydney; Australian National Library, Canberra.

Critical Studies: Thomas Keneally by Peter Quartermaine, London, Arnold, 1991.

Theatrical Activities: Actor: Films—The Devil's Playground, 1976; The Chant of Jimmie Blacksmith, 1978.

Thomas Keneally comments:

(1972) I would like to be able to disown my first two novels, the second of which was the obligatory account of one's childhood—the book then that all novelists think seriously of writing.

I see my third novel as an attempt to follow out an epic theme in terms of a young soldier's exile to Australia.

The fourth and fifth were attempts at urbane writing in the traditional mode of the English novel: confrontations between characters whose behaviour shows layers of irony and humour, in which all that is epic is rather played down.

For A Dutiful Daughter, the best novel I have written (not that I claim that matters much), I have turned to myth and fable, as many a novelist is doing, for the simple reason that other media have moved into the traditional areas of the novel.

(1986) I can see now that a great deal of my work has been concerned with the contrast between the new world—in particular Australia—and the old; the counterpoint between the fairly innocent politics of the new world and the fatal politics of Europe. One of the most remarkable phenomena of my lifetime has been the decline of both the British Empire and the European dominance in the world. As a colonial, I was just getting used to these two phenomena and adjusting my soul to them when they vanished, throwing into doubt the idea that artists from the remote antipodes must go into the northern hemisphere to find their spiritual source and forcing me to reassess my place in the world as an Australian.

Blood Red, Sister Rose, for example, concerned a European aboriginal, a potent maker of magic, Joan of Arc. Gossip from the Forest concerned the war, World War I, by which Europe began its own self destruction. These books are characteristic of my middle period, the historical phase, when in a way, coming from a fairly innocent and unbloodied society, I was trying to work Europe out. There was some of this too in Schindler's Ark. In my last book, A Family Madness, you have Australian ingenuousness and the ancient, complicated and malicious politics of Eastern Europe standing cheek by jowl.

I feel it is significant that A Family Madness is set in 1985. I believe the historic phase is nearly over for me and was merely a preparation for the understanding of the present. Time—and future work—will tell.

* * *

Within the past two decades, Thomas Keneally has evolved from one of Australia's best-known and most prolific writers to a novelist with a worldwide following. Even before The Great Shame, his recent historical work, Keneally had worked extensively with material from Australia's past. But his body of work is noteworthy for its range of material. He has written on subjects as varied as Joan of Arc, the American Civil War, the Holocaust, and contemporary Africa. However diverse the material, Keneally brings a consistently humanistic point of view, an eye for accuracy of detail, and a knack for engaging storytelling, all of which account both for his wide readership and critical acclaim.

The novels set in colonial Australia are built around cultural conflict. The Chant of Jimmie Blacksmith, a fictional meditation on a real event in Australian history, is about the ritualistic murder of a white woman by the title character, an aborigine desperately trying to resist the imposition of European ways. Keneally resists the temptation to make Jimmy and his rage understandable to his readers; instead he takes pains to distance reader and character, an effect that is discomforting but true to the material. Australia's relation to Britain provides the setting for The Playmaker (adapted by Timberlake Wertenbaker for the stage as Our Country's Good). Keneally uses a seemingly insignificant detail from the history of the Sydney Cove prison and converts it into a compelling metaphor for his country's birth. When an idealistic British officer is asked to stage Farquhar's restoration comedy The Recruiting Office with a cast of convicts, he, they, and we come to a new understanding of the meaning of human dignity and freedom. The Australian setting is also dominant in Woman of the Inner Sea, whose sophisticated heroine, having lost her two children in a fire, finds in the basic values of the Outback the strength to confront her grief and throw off her unwarranted guilt. Again in A River Town, Keneally uses the origin of a rural settlement to convey the essential identity of Australia: outcasts coming together to form a community and, through their diversity, to define a national character.

When it is not his primary setting, Australia is often involved indirectly in Keneally's novels, as in Passenger, in which the story of an Irish girl's pregnancy is narrated by her unborn child. While living in London, she is writing a historical novel about a group of Irish prisoners being transported to Australia for their part in the Rebellion of 1798. The determination of the fetal narrator to survive parallels that of the Irish rebels, and, in fact, the birth eventually does take place in Australia. The influence of history is also apparent in A Family Madness, in which an Australian worker falls in love with his boss's daughter and becomes involved with their haunted past in Byelorussia during World War II. Keneally uses the double plot structure again in To Asmara, in which the Eritrean guerrilla war against Ethiopia mirrors the prior struggles of the main character, the journalist Darcy, to reconcile his European heritage with his determination to help the Australian tribes. In all these novels Keneally's native Australia is a vital presence regardless of where the story takes his characters.

When Keneally chooses historical material from foreign sources, the effect is usually less engaging. Blood Red, Sister Rose, his version of the Joan of Arc legend, and Confederates, set in Northern Virginia during the summer of 1862, both feature typical Keneally heroes—realistically earthy characters caught up in the historical moment—but despite a wealth of historical detail, neither the Maid of Orleans nor the Virginian farmer-turned-soldier really seem to live in their respective worlds. Even Stonewall Jackson, who figures prominently in Confederates, has more Australian pluck than Southern grit in him.

Two novels dealing with twentieth century world wars, on the other hand, display considerable insight and power. The diplomats in Gossip from the Forest, gathered at Compiegne in the fall of 1918 to negotiate an armistice, are compelling characters. The cultured German delegate, Matthias Erzbergen, finds himself in an impossible political bind as he tries to deal with the imperious Marshall Foch, who takes full advantage of his superior position. The tenuous political alliances of the period are reflected in the negotiations at Compiegne, with the tragic realization that an opportunity for lasting peace is lost and another war becomes inevitable. Of greater scope is Schindler's List, the story of a Catholic industrialist who ran an arms factory using Jewish workers from concentration camps. The Oskar Schindler of Keneally's novel is as enigmatic as the man seems to have been in life, conveying no sense of high moral principle even though he was saving hundreds of Polish Jews by convincing the gullible Nazis that his factory's productivity depended on their labor.

The narrative voice in Schindler's List, like that of Jimmie Blacksmith, is detached and distant, as if Keneally is determined to allow Schindler to maintain his privacy, a hero we need not like or even understand. This fascinating ambiguity of character was lost in Stephen Spielberg's popular film based on Keneally's book.

The clash of cultures, a recurring theme in Keneally's work, dominates Flying Hero Class, in which an airplane carrying Barramatjara tribal dancers from New York to Frankfurt is hijacked by a group of Palestinians. The hijackers try to convince the aborigines that theirs is a common cause, but without much success. The danger is averted by the courage of the troupe's Australian manager and supposed exploiter. Although contrived, the novel summarizes Keneally's ambivalence toward cultural assimilation. Rejecting the comforting liberal assumption that cultural diversity is to be cherished and celebrated, he more often shows the inevitability of misunderstanding and conflict when cultures collide, whether it be as direct as the murderous outburst of a Jimmie Blacksmith or as subtle as the Australian journalist's inability to express his emotions to an Eritrean woman in To Asmara.

With The Great Shame, his exhaustively researched treatise on the plight of the Irish exiled to Australia's penal colonies for petty crimes or political resistance to British rule, Keneally crosses from historical fiction into history, but the epic scope of the material relies on the human stories he finds hidden in the official documents. With hundreds of characters, some of historical significance, others not (including his own and his wife's ancestors), Keneally conveys through multiple narratives the same virtues of determination, redemption, and survival as in his novels. The material he had used for background in the earlier works, especially Passenger, The Playmaker, and A River Town, emerges again in a seemingly different form. In reality, despite its extensive index, notes, and bibliography, The Great Shame reads like Keneally's best fiction.

Given his steady output and his often-risky choices of material, Keneally has maintained a remarkable level of quality in his work, a testament to the power of the historical imagination and to the novelist's craft.

-Robert E. Lynch

KENNEDY, A. L.

Nationality: Scottish.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Looking for the Possible Dance. London, Secker and Warburg, 1993. So I Am Glad. London, Cape, 1995. Original Bliss. London, Jonathan Cape, 1997.

Everything You Need. London, Jonathan Cape, 1997.

Short Stories

Night Geometry and the Garscadden Trains. London, Secker and Warburg, 1990.

Now That You're Back. London, Cape, 1994.

Other

The Life and Death of Colonel Blimp (screenplay). London, British Film Institute, 1997.

Editor, with Hamish Whyte. The Ghost of Liberace. Aberdeen: Association for Scottish Literary Studies, 1993.

Editor, with James McGonigal. A Sort of Hot Scotland. Aberdeen: Association for Scottish Literary Studies, 1994.

* * *

Throughout her work, Scottish writer A.L. Kennedy has explored the potentially infinite spaces within "ordinary" people's minds. Kennedy's novels and short stories focus on the mental and emotional confinement that is caused by isolation, psychic and physical violence in personal relationships, and enclosure within the ritualized routines of "the average shape of the day." These conditions are frequently met with an obsessive striving for control and the repetition of violence. Yet Kennedy's works also express a yearning for connection and an almost religious sense of the expansiveness of human life as glimpses are gained of a potentiality that exceeds the trammels of the quotidian. Her characters frequently represent a desire to perceive a larger, more harmonious pattern beyond both their own psychic turmoil and the apparent political and social chaos of the late twentieth century.

These concerns are introduced in Kennedy's first collection of short stories, Night Geometry and the Garscadden Trains. Here, in her already notably economic style, Kennedy writes of "small people" who, "withered by lack of belief," "live their lives in the best way they can with generally good intentions and still leave absolutely nothing behind." In her second collection of short stories, Now That You're Back, Kennedy, returning to the minds of "small people," explores the fine distinctions between normality and perversity as she probes the points at which isolation and estrangement produce what is perceived as obsession and deviance. As Kennedy ventriloquizes her characters' voices, several of the stories being written in the form of dramatic monologues, she confers upon them an impression of bodilessness, a fitting signifier of their disconnection from the world. Yet her characters seek that correspondence through which "a spasm of what I might call completeness" may be attained.

Kennedy retains her focus on subtle gradations of psychic spaces in her first novel, Looking for the Possible Dance, where she explores the way in which her protagonist's relationship with her father inscribes that with her lover. Here, as in her other works, Kennedy's exploration of parental legacy is allusive rather than diagnostic as she displays the proximity between pleasure and pain, particularly the pleasure that is sought through self-denial. Through one of the novel's central structural metaphors, that of the dance, Kennedy weaves together several of the novel's main concerns. Margaret's father's words at a Methodist ceilidh are echoed in her reflection that the search for meaningful political opposition in Britain in the 1980s was "looking for the possible dance, the step, the move to beat them all." The possibility that the discrete spaces that individuals occupy may be choreographed into an overarching pattern is adumbrated by the novel's concluding image: "Margaret walks to one door and sinks into brilliant air, becoming first a moving shadow, then a curve, a dancing line."

The concerns of Kennedy's earlier works are strikingly elaborated in her novel, So I Am Glad. Like the characters of her short stories, Kennedy's narrator, Jennifer Wilson, has learned "to enjoy a small, still life," achieving a "calmness" that is "empty space ... a pause." Having been made a voyeur, as a child, of her parents' violent sexual practices, she now pathologizes other people's emotions as "moles ... violent, tunnelling mammals." Jennifer's desire to free herself from her body and its emotional history is facilitated by her work as a radio commentator, a "professional enunciator." The novel recounts her attempt to discover the identity of her lover who, it transpires, is Cyrano de Bergerac, reincarnated in late-twentiethcentury Scotland. This fantastic device enables Kennedy to explore further a number of the concerns of her earlier works. De Bergerac becomes a vehicle for metaphysical speculation that is the more poignant as it is incorporated into Jennifer's mourning for his inevitable loss and her search for the words to articulate this. Through de Bergerac's estranged perspective, he is able to comment on the "madness" of the late twentieth century, defamiliarizing horrors to which, it is implied, the reader may have become acculturated. De Bergerac's history of dueling is extended through his verbal parrying with Jennifer as he explains, "The point is that single moment when you truly touch another person. You reach to them with a word, a thought, a gesture." The duel codifies the desire for violence that is elsewhere in the narrative less successfully contained, whether in scenes of sadomasochistic sex or the political atrocities that are the subject of Jennifer's news broadcasts.

In So I Am Glad, as in Kennedy's earlier works, the movement between the personal and the political, between the poetic and the polemic, is uneven, the power of Kennedy's work lying in her painterly detailing of psychic spaces rather than in the large brush strokes with which she comments on the political turbulence of the late twentieth century. Her work is, however, already notable for its combination of wit, precision, and restraint with bold imaginative gestures.

Original Bliss, Kennedy's next novel, is a tale of abuse, lust, and longing as Helen Brindle, a middle-aged Glaswegian caught in a painful marital relationship, turns from her cruel husband to a German sex guru for fulfillment. Gradually, however, she becomes repelled by both men, and discovers that she can depend only on herself and on God. This quest for redemption amid spiritual squalor also plays itself out in Everything You Need, in which young Mary Lamb comes to the writers' colony of Foal Island on a fellowship. The island's inhabitants are all writers, a depressed lot given to rather disgusting fantasies. This is particularly true of Nathan Staples, who will be Mary's advisor for the period of her fellowship—and who, as we learn early in the book, is also her father.

—Joanna Price

KENNEDY, William (Joseph)

Nationality: American. Born: Albany, New York, 16 January 1928. Education: Siena College, Loudonville, New York, B.A. 1949. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1950–52: sports editor and columnist for Army newspapers. Family: Married Ana Daisy Dana Segarra in 1957; two daughters and one son. Career: Assistant sports editor and columnist, Glens Falls Post Star, New York, 1949–50; reporter, Albany Times-Union, 1952–56; assistant managing editor and columnist, Puerto Rico World Journal, San Juan, 1956; reporter, Miami Herald, 1957; Puerto Rico correspondent for Time-Life publications, and reporter for Dorvillier business newsletter and Knight newspapers, 1957-59; founding managing editor, San Juan Star, 1959-61; full-time writer, 1961-63; special writer, 1963-70, and film critic, 1968-70, Albany Times-Union; book editor, Look, New York, 1971. Lecturer, 1974-82, and since 1983 professor of English, State University of New York, Albany; visiting professor of English, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York, 1982-83. Since 1957 freelance magazine writer and critic; brochure and special project writer for New York State Department of Education and State University system, New York Governor's Conference on Libraries, and other organizations; director, New York State Writers Institute. Awards: Puerto Rican Civic Association of Miami award, 1957, NAACP award, 1965, Newspaper Guild Page One award, 1965, and New York State Publishers award, 1965, all for reporting; National Endowment for the Arts fellowship, 1981; Siena College Career Achievement award, 1983; MacArthur Foundation fellowship, 1983; National Book Critics Circle award, 1984; Celtic Foundation Frank O'Connor award, 1984; Before Columbus Foundation award, 1984; New York Public Library award, 1984; Pulitzer prize, 1984; Governor's Arts award, 1984; Brandeis University Creative Arts award, 1986. L.H.D.: Russell Sage College, Troy, New York, 1980; Siena College, 1984; Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, Troy, New York, 1987; Long Island University, Greenvale, New York, 1989; D.Litt.: College of St. Rose, Albany, 1985. D.H.L.: Skidmore College, 1991; Fordham University, 1992; Trinity College, 1992. Commander, Order of Arts and Letters, France, 1993. Agent: Liz Darhansoff Literary Agency, 1220 Park Avenue, New York, New York 10128. Address: R.D. 3, Box 508, Averill Park, New York 12018, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Ink Truck. New York, Dial Press, 1969; London, Macdonald, 1970.

Legs. New York, Coward McCann, 1975; London, Cape, 1976. Billy Phelan's Greatest Game. New York, Viking Press, 1978; London, Penguin, 1983.

Ironweed. New York, Viking Press, 1983; London, Penguin, 1984. Quinn's Book. New York, Viking, and London, Cape, 1988. Very Old Bones. New York, Viking, 1992.

The Flaming Corsage. New York, Viking, 1996.

An Albany Trio: Three Novels from the Albany Cycle. New York, Penguin Books, 1996.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Secrets of Creative Love," in Harper's (New York), July 1983.

"An Exchange of Gifts," in Glens Falls Review (Glens Falls, New York), no. 3, 1985–86.

"The Hills and the Creeks (Albany 1850)," in Harper's (New York), March 1988.

Plays

Screenplays: The Cotton Club, with Francis Ford Coppola, 1984; Ironweed, 1987.

Other

Getting It All, Saving It All: Some Notes by an Extremist. Albany, New York State Governor's Conference on Libraries, 1978.

O Albany! Improbable City of Political Wizards, Fearless Ethnics, Spectacular Aristocrats, Splendid Nobodies, and Underrated Scoundrels. Albany and New York, Washington Park Press-Viking Press, 1983.

The Capitol in Albany (photographs). New York, Aperture, 1986; as Albany and the Capitol, London, Phaidon, 1986.

Charlie Malarkey and the Belly Button Machine (for children), with Brendan Kennedy. Boston, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1986; London, Cape, 1987.

Riding the Yellow Trolley Car. New York, Viking, 1993.

Charlie Malarkey and the Singing Moose (for children), with Brendan Kennedy. Viking Children's Books, 1994.

*

Bibliographies: "A William Kennedy Bibliography" by Edward C. Reilly, in Bulletin of Bibliography 48(2), June 1991.

Critical Studies: "The Sudden Fame of William Kennedy" by Margaret Croyden, in New York Times Magazine, 26 August 1984; Understanding William Kennedy by J.K. Van Dover, Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1991; William Kennedy by Edward C. Reilly, Boston, Twayne, 1991; Conversations with William Kennedy, edited by Neila C. Seshachari, Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

. . .

In O Albany!, William Kennedy's "urban biography" of Albany, New York, he describes himself as "a person whose imagination has become fused with a single place." This fusion has proved an impressive resource and theme in his novels which present an expansive yet intimate fictional and historical tableau of Albany life. While there is a humanist breadth of vision in Kennedy's writings—he views Albany as a city "centered squarely in the American and human continuum"—his treatment of the city is closely focused on the lives and histories of Irish-Americans. His novels pay detailed attention to the culture and politics of this ethnic group, exploring both the local historical conditions and the internal mechanisms of ethnic identity, and illuminating the rich interplay of history, myth, and memory as these give meaning to the lives of Irish-Americans.

Kennedy offers his readers a richly detailed world where language is always inventive. The interactions of realism and romance, and of historical and mythical vision in his novels have led many critics to describe them as "magic realist." The lyrical treatment of larger-than-life characters and use of vernacular humor also suggest the influences of American strains of imaginative journalism and oral storytelling. If there is a "magic" in the narratives it is the sense of intimacy they convey. The sounding of a common past and shared memories is an important element in Kennedy's writings and in having places, characters, and everyday objects animated by reminiscence and anecdote he shows how the past may be kept alive in "memory and hearsay." Kennedy's first novel, The Ink Truck, is a black comedy which details the pathetic attempts of a small group of strikers to keep alive a failed strike against their newspaper employers. The true center of the novel is Bailey, a garrulous loner who invents crazy plots to challenge the newspaper company. Like the other strikers, Bailey is caught in the paradoxes of ideal and action which emerge from supporting a lost cause, but Kennedy draws his protagonist with an irrepressible energy and wit which mark his repeated failures with curious heroism. Although there is clearly a satirical intention to illuminate the way American society can both foster and thwart idealism, the narrative relies a little too heavily on the egotistical rhetoric and surreal imaginings of Bailey. If he is a failed hero there is little to draw the reader into his predicament.

Legs deals with a form of hero in the character of Jack "Legs" Diamond, the prohibition gangster-cum-celebrity whose life story is narrated by Marcus Gorman, a lawyer who is simultaneously attracted to and perturbed by this "venal man of integrity." Diamond is an entertainer who is able to act out his fantasies and appetites in public, only to find that he is "created anew" by the media who draw on, add to, and manipulate his glamour. Kennedy interweaves history and myth in his characterization of Diamond as a powerful public figure who finds that fame is not a force he can control: "Jack had imagined his fame all his life and now it was imagining him." Kennedy uses Gorman to mediate the multiple and conflicting documents, stories and cultural references surrounding Diamond's life. Legs is less a close study of what motivated this particular criminal than an examination of how he became a product of America's "collective imagination." In Billy Phelan's Greatest Game Kennedy shows a more localized interest in how memory and myth circulate in the everyday actions and discourses of Albany's Irish-Americans in the 1930s. Billy Phelan, a young Irish-American hustler, has his world turned upside down when he is caught up in the kidnapping of Charlie McCall, son of the city's political boss. While Kennedy keeps the kidnap plot moving steadily along it is clear that his real interest is in exploring how an ethnic past is absorbed into the present day lives of his characters. Billy's encounters with the McCalls reveal a political network which maintains its power by endorsing and exploiting a rhetoric of family, morality, and loyalty that draws heavily on mythicized immigrant experiences. Kennedy also identifies rich seams of a common or collective memory which establishes a knowledge of the past in stories and anecdotes engendered by commonplace stimuli. In detailing and juxtaposing multiple rememorisations of the Irish-American past he shows how all members of the ethnic group, not only the politically powerful, are engaged in reconstructing the past to meet the demands of the present.

Ironweed, a Pulitzer prize-winner, is widely viewed as Kennedy's finest novel to date. The novel is closely connected to Billy Phelan's Greatest Game in terms of character, event, theme, and temporal setting. Francis Phelan, father of Billy and the "Ironweed" of the title, is a vagrant who returns to Albany after twenty-two years "on the bum," a partly self-induced exile sustained by the guilt he feels about the deaths of a scab he felled during a strike and of his thirteen-day-old son Gerald whom he accidentally dropped and killed. On his return to Albany he confronts voices and images of ghosts which press him to re-examine his past. Returning to a community which has projected him into myth Francis reaches no clear resolution of his need to locate himself "in time and place," but he does discover that in releasing memories and sharing them with others he is able tentatively to embrace much that he has repressed. Kennedy brilliantly meshes fantasy and realism in this narrative, examining both the inner confusions of his protagonist's ethnic identity and the powerful cultural and social forces which willfully idealize or obscure aspects of the ethnic past.

Set in mid-nineteenth-century Albany, Quinn's Book is the narrative of Daniel Quinn, an orphaned boy who witnesses such major historical events as the Underground Railroad, the Civil War and the New York draft riots. While there is a wealth of historical detail in this novel it is the apocalyptic opening—as Albany experiences freak disasters of fire and flood—and the surreal tinge to the events which imaginatively fire the narrative. Kennedy evokes a spirit world which shadows the lives of his characters providing sometimes comic, sometimes frightening perspectives on the past, present, and future. A sense of prescience grips the narration as Daniel grows to become the journalist-writer who views his life as a "great canvas of the imagination." As in his earlier novels Kennedy intermingles fact and fantasy, but is perhaps more ambitious with his historical sweep, constructing a phantasmagoria of human actions and desires that denies any simple patternings or resolutions.

In Kennedy's novels the Irish-American past is always under construction, its reinvention important to the patterning of social relations in the present. Kennedy is a speculative historian of this ethnic past, self-consciously aware that he is himself playing a part in its reinvention. He skillfully dissolves distinctions between the real and the fictional as his writings explore how memory and fantasy can influence historical understanding. In Billy Phelan's Greatest Game he offers an ironical authorial note: "Any reality attaching to any character is the result of the author's creation, or of his own interpretation of history. This applies not only to Martin Daugherty and Billy Phelan, to Albany politicians, newsmen, and gamblers, but also to Franklin D. Roosevelt, Thomas E. Dewey, Henry James, Damon Runyon, William Randolph Hearst, and any number of other creatures of the American imagination."

-Liam Kennedy

KESEY, Ken (Elton)

Nationality: American. Born: La Junta, Colorado, 17 September 1935. Education: A high school in Springfield, Oregon; University of Oregon, Eugene, B.A. 1957; Stanford University, California (Woodrow Wilson fellow), 1958–59. Family: Married Faye Haxby in 1956; four children (one deceased). Career: Ward attendant in mental hospital, Menlo Park, California; president, Intrepid Trips film company, 1964. Since 1974 publisher, Spit in the Ocean magazine, Pleasant Hill, Oregon. Served prison term for marijuana possession, 1967. Awards: Saxton Memorial Trust award, 1959. Address: 85829 Ridgeway Road, Pleasant Hill, Oregon 97455, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

One Flew over the Cuckoo's Nest. New York, Viking Press, 1962; London, Methuen, 1963.

Sometimes a Great Notion. New York, Viking Press, 1964; London, Methuen, 1966.

Demon Box. New York, Viking, and London, Methuen, 1986. Caverns, with others. New York, Viking, 1990. The Further Inquiry. New York, Viking, 1990. Sailor Song. New York, Viking, 1992; London, Black Swan, 1993. Last Go Round, with Ken Babbs. New York, Viking, 1994.

Short Stories

The Day Superman Died. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1980.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The First Sunday in October," in Northwest Review (Seattle), Fall 1957.
- "McMurphy and the Machine," in Stanford Short Stories 1962, edited by Wallace Stegner and Richard Scowcroft. Stanford, California, Stanford University Press, 1962.
- "Letters from Mexico," in Ararat (New York), Autumn 1967.
- "Excerpts from Kesey's Jail Diary," in Ramparts (Berkeley, California), November 1967.
- "Correspondence," in Tri-Quarterly (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1970.
- "Once a Great Nation," in Argus (College Park, Maryland), April 1970.
- "Dear Good Dr. Timothy," in Augur (Eugene, Oregon), 19 November 1970.
- "Cut the Motherfuckers Loose," in The Last Whole Earth Catalog. San Francisco, Straight Arrow, 1971.
- "The Bible," "Dawgs," "The I Ching," "Mantras," "Tools from My Chest," in The Last Supplement to the Whole Earth Catalog-The Realist (New York), March-April 1971.
- "Over the Border," in Oui (Chicago), April 1973.
- "Seven Prayers' by Grandma Whittier," in Spit in the Ocean 1–5 (Pleasant Hill, Oregon), 1974–79.

Other

Kesey's Garage Sale (miscellany; includes screenplay Over the Border). New York, Viking Press, 1973.

Little Tricker the Squirrel Meets Big Double the Bear (for children). New York, Viking, 1990.

The Sea Lion: A Story of the Sea Cliff People (for children). New York, Viking, 1991.

*

Manuscript Collections: University of Oregon, Eugene.

Critical Studies: The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test by Tom Wolfe, New York, Farrar Straus, 1968, London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1969; Ken Kesey by Bruce Carnes, Boise, Idaho, Boise State College, 1974; "Ken Kesey Issue" of Northwest Review (Eugene, Oregon), vol. 16, nos. 1–2, 1977; Ken Kesey by Barry H. Leeds, New York, Ungar, 1981; The Art of Grit: Ken Kesey's Fiction, Columbia, University of Missouri Press, 1982, and One Flew over the Cuckoo's Nest: Rising to Heroism, Boston, Twayne, 1989, both by M. Gilbert Porter; Ken Kesey by Stephen L. Tanner, Boston, Twayne, 1983; On the Bus: The Legendary Trip of Ken Kesey and the Merry Pranksters by Ken Babbs, photographs by Rob Bivert, New York, Thunder's Mouth Press, 1989, London, Plexus, 1991.

* * *

Ken Kesey's celebrity and critical reputation were instantly established with the publication of his first two novels. One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest was a widely popular commercial success as a novel and was also successful in its adaptations for stage and screen. Sometimes a Great Notion was initially received with some critical reservations. Seen as an ambitious but not altogether satisfying attempt to enter the rank of great American novels, it has since received more favorable attention from the academic critics, though it has not found a secure place in the established canon of contemporary American literature. After finishing it, Kesey announced a shift from "literature" to "life," and achieved a great deal of public notoriety in the process of making the change. He was frequently public news during the late 1960s, forming a band of "Merry Pranksters" (reported on at length in Tom Wolfe's The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test) who attempted to live life as a work of comic fiction. His arrest and conviction for marijuana possession made still more news and provided experiences that he would frequently exploit in his writing. Stray and often occasional pieces of a miscellaneous nature were published in countercultural venues during the late 1960s and early 1970s, suggesting that perhaps a new project was in the works, and some of these were assembled in Kesey's Garage Sale, an apt title for a collection of miscellaneous items. In 1986 a more ambitious collection was assembled for Demon Box, a series of largely autobiographical pieces that continued to look back in time to the historical period of Kesey's public notoriety. The volume is loosely united by a first-person narrator whose name, Devlin Deboree (pronounced debris), hints at a devil-may-care attitude towards social and artistic conventions, and at the disorganized, self-consciously problematic value of his observations.

Both of Kesey's early novels are richly northwestern and regional in setting and atmosphere, with a strong sense of the incursion of the white man on the Indian's land and way of life. The emphasis is a bit one-sided in Cuckoo's Nest, which is set in a mental institution and has for its stream-of-consciousness narrator a "dumb" (thought to be deaf, but in fact choosing not to speak) Indian nick-named Chief, whose father was the last chief of his tribe. The novel can be read as an allegory of how the invaders have been driven to subjugate the Native Americans because they are a reminder of what must be sacrificed in the process of western civilization and its discontents, and an exploration of the power struggle between a desire to be free and the fearful consequences of that freedom. Most of the characters confined in the institution could leave if they wished; but their fear of the outside is more intense than their hatred of the inside, until the raucous protagonist McMurphy comes along to inspire their lapsed selfconfidence and zest for life. Recognizable as a tragicomic parodic microcosm of the world we all live in, the book captures and reflects the reality of a Walt Disney world, as perceived through the eyes of the "Big Chief" who used to be on the bright red covers of the writing tablets of children all over the United States, but who is now pretending to be a vegetable in a nut house. What he sees is "Like a cartoon world, where the figures are flat and outlined in black, jerking through some kind of goofy story that might be real funny if it weren't for the cartoon figures being real guys ..." The comic-book quality has lent itself nicely to dramatic production, as have the compactness and wild humor of the novel. These qualities also tempt one to allegorize, but at the same time mock the attempt as absurd, for the work is not itself allegorical. It is a report on the way people choose to see themselves and their world in allegorical or comic-book fashion. The reality of the villain, "Big Nurse," is as exaggerated by the characters who fear and hate her as it is by the novelist. It is their insecurity and weakness that feed her power and make her "big," while the institution, with its equipment and routines, becomes the pretext for sociological and cultural myths pushed to an exaggerated but all-too-plausible extreme. The prefrontal lobotomy performed on McMurphy at the end is any operation on or treatment of or way of seeing a man designed to limit him for his own sake, to protect him from his own human nature. The Big Nurse is that spirit which loves the "idea" of man so much it can't allow individual men to exist.

Sometimes a Great Notion was Kesey's stab at writing the great American novel in a Faulknerian mode, and it deserves more attention than can be given it here. Like an Absalom, Absalom! set in Oregon, intensely regional, with elaborate and intricately complex narrative structure (flashbacks, shifts of point of view), the work demands several readings. With such attention, what at first seem like gratuitous confusions and exploitations of narrative technique begin to emerge as the necessary supports for a novelistic structure which commands respect even though it fails in the end to achieve its full potential. In this novel Kesey aimed high, and he came impressively close to his target. The publication two decades later of Demon Box produces the effect of a long-deferred anti-climax. Lingering colloquially and nostalgically over his acquaintances and escapades in the 1960s and 1970s, in a deliberately naive reportage style, this work often succeeds in capturing the colloquial idiom of prison life or Hell's Angels banter, but it does little to enhance Kesey's reputation as an innovative writer of the first rank. As if aware of this critical judgment, Kesey deliberately prefaced the book with a poem called "TARNISHED GALAHAD-what the judge called him at his trial," two lines of which ask and answer the significant question:

Tarnished Galahad—did your sword get rusted?

Tarnished Galahad—there's no better name!

-Thomas A. Vogler

KIDMAN, Fiona

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Fiona Judith Eakin, Hawera, 2 March 1940. Family: Married Ian Kidman in 1960; one daughter, one son. Career: Librarian, Rotorua Boys High 1961–62; wrote and produced radio plays in the 1970s, has taught creative writing, and has been a weekly columnist for The Listener; President of the New Zealand Book Council, since 1992. Awards: New Zealand Scholarship in Letters, 1981, 1985, 1995; Mobil Short Story award, 1987; Arts Council award for achievement, 1988; New Zealand Book award, 1988, for fiction; Writers Fellow, Victoria University, 1988; OBE (Officer, Order of the British Empire); DNZM (Dame Commander of the New Zealand Order of Merit). Member: New Zealand Writers' Guild; New Zealand Book Council. Agent: Ray Richards, Richards Literary Agency, P.O. Box 31–240, Milford, Auckland 9, New Zealand. Address: 28 Rakan Rd., Hataitai, Wellington 3, New Zealand.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Breed of Women. Ringwood, Victoria, Harper and Row, 1979; New York, Penguin, 1988.

Mandarin Summer. Auckland, Heinemann, 1981.

Paddy's Puzzle. Auckland, Heinemann, 1983; London, Penguin, 1985; as In the Clear Light, New York, Norton.

The Book of Secrets. Auckland, Heinemann, 1987.

True Stars. Auckland, Random Century, 1990.

Ricochet Baby. Auckland, Vintage, 1996.

Short Stories

Mrs Dixon and Friend. Auckland, Heinemann, 1982.

Unsuitable Friends. Auckland, Century Hutchinson, 1988.

The Foreign Woman. Auckland, Vintage, 1993.

The Best of Fiona Kidman's Short Stories. New York, Vintage, 1998.

Plays

Search for Sister Blue. Wellington, New Zealand, Reed, 1975.

Poetry

Honey and Bitters. Christchurch, New Zealand, Pegasus Press, 1975.On the Tightrope. Christchurch, New Zealand, Pegasus Press, 1978.Going to the Chathams, Poems 1977–84. Auckland, Heinemann, 1985.

Wakeful Nights, Poems Selected and New. Auckland, Vintage, 1991.

Other

Gone North, with Jane Ussher. Auckland, Heinemann, 1984. Wellington, with Grant Sheehan. Auckland, Random House, 1989. Palm Prints. Auckland, Vintage, 1994.

Editor, New Zealand Love Stories: An Oxford Anthology. Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1999.

*

Manuscript Collection: Alexander Turnbull Library, Wellington, New Zealand.

Fiona Kidman comments:

I was brought up in the northern part of New Zealand in isolated country areas, an only child whose family moved a lot, and was hard-up. Perhaps because of this, I have often examined the situation of people who live at "the edge" and find it difficult to communicate. My work has been identified to some extent with the feminist movement in New Zealand, particularly my historical novel, The Book of Secrets, (winner of the New Zealand Book award, 1988) which examined the life of migrant Scottish women on their journeys from Scotland to Nova Scotia, and ultimately New Zealand. My most recent short story collection The Foreign Woman, (runner-up to New Zealand Book award, 1994) has been likened to the work of Alice Munro—a great, but probably undeserved, compliment.

* * *

Fiona Kidman is one of a generation of New Zealand's women writers born during World War II whose works espouse the sub-texts of feminist self-discovery and social validation. Her efforts on behalf of New Zealand's writers, however, are not restricted to gender-based advocacy. As president of PEN and the New Zealand Book Council, she used her influence to establish Women's Book Week in conjunction with her involvement in the United Women's Conventions in the 1970s and the 1975 International Women's Year, which profoundly affected her. She has stated that any account of women's writing in New Zealand during the past two decades is incomplete without reviewing 1975. In a socialist realist style, her fiction depicts New Zealand women, both contemporary and historical, as rebellious heroines who resist the social values that threaten to engulf them.

She brilliantly describes the atmosphere of small towns like Waipu in her first novel, A Breed of Women, which created something of a sensation in New Zealand as it broke social taboos. Kidman believes that she is not wholly responsible for her characters' choices, which originate in the subtle underpinnings that construct her psyche and history. That reaction of New Zealand society to frankly feminist estimations of it was repeated around the globe during the crucial 1970s when women began to speak and write about such matters. Kidman exposes the narrow-minded, conformist mentality of bourgeois New Zealand and the limited choices open to her heroine. Harriet, a bright but unsophisticated farm girl, falls into the hands of milkbar cowboys, and ends up in a shotgun marriage to a Maori. Harriet and her friend Leonie present contrasting pictures of unfulfilled women driven to take risks and seek alternative sources of happiness outside marriage, providing a near-perfect paradigm for middle-class New Zealand women of the late 1970s.

Her second novel, Mandarin Summer, owes more to the genre of Gothic horror, for it tells a disturbing story by evoking a macabre atmosphere. Set in 1946 in a small Northland community, it narrates the encounter between a wealthy, decadent European family and their hangers-on and a New Zealand family, the Freemans, who have been duped into buying unsuitable land from the Europeans. In a tidy reversal of colonial history, the Machiavellian Brigadier Barnsley coerces the Freemans into a servitude that embroils them in his disputes and passions. Although the scenes concerning his opiumaddicted, incarcerated wife, his Jewish mistress, and the final conflagration that destroys the homestead are inspired by Jane Eyre, the novel exerts a weird fascination while exploring a new twist on the theme of incest. Emily, the eleven-year-old narrator, sees more than is good for her, even though at times her retrospective child's point of view slips into adult reportage. Kidman distorts the lens of romantic fiction by telling an implausible tale with compelling directness.

Although the second half of Paddy's Puzzle is also set at the end of World War II, the novel opens in the small town of Hamilton during the 1930s depression. The traumas caused by Winnie's pregnancy, poverty, and her husband's abandonment of the family to seek work anticipate the abortive, juvenile love affair of her heroine Clara, whom Winnie has also raised. But her early life does not entirely explain Clara's subsequent fate—a life of abandonment in prostitution, and then tuberculosis—outlined in a grim account of her dying days in Paddy's Puzzle, the name of a tenement slum for prostitutes on Karangahape Road. Through this cityscape Kidman explores the seedy side of life during the war with pathos and dramatic flair. Although Clara's death may convey a message about the afflictions women suffered at a time of limited social support, it reveals Kidman's fascination with forms of self-entrapment and marginal states of existence. Paddy's Puzzle was re-issued in the United States under the title In the Clear Light.

In The Book of Secrets Kidman returns to historical fiction, telling the lives of three women through letters, journals, and dreams. The novel is an exploration of the isolated, strangely un-emancipated figure of Maria, who lives in solitude as a witch. Her story has its roots in fact: the account of the charismatic figure of Reverend McLeod who led his followers from poverty-stricken Scotland to Nova Scotia and New Zealand is true. The plot's main focus is the three generations of women who enact some pattern of retribution through their association with McLeod. Isabella defies him, is raped, and goes mad; her daughter, Annie, submits to his order; and Maria eventually achieves some kind of spiritual victory. The theme of hidden lives once more demands negotiation with religious and social values, which reflect an irrational patriarchal power structure. But Kidman lets her story take its path rather than imposing a determinedly feminist pattern on her historical sources.

Kidman's True Stars tells a contemporary story of love, betrayal, politics, and death in the last days of Lange's Labour government. Her subjects are the citizens of Weyville: the left-wing yuppies who rose to prominence at the time of the 1981 Springbok tour. They gained a political voice through their freshly elected Labour MP, Kit Kendall, and the Maori activists, along with the drop-out generation. Together they represent a range of topical issues in New Zealand during the 1980s, including the need to confront a collapsing dream with the reality of a nearly defunct government. The victimization of Kit's wife, Rose, and her conflicting family and social loyalties signal the full extent of those confused times. Kidman shows her strengths as a journalist, capturing with immediacy the class and social divisions of the times, the tensions of small-town politics as played out against a national context, and the personal dilemmas faced by the middle-aged Rose. In a tightly organized plot, she ties together these different strands in such a way that each interacts with the other to create a thrilling denouement.

Kidman has been called an "ordinary woman" who dares to challenge, and she takes on a common effect of provincial and lower middle-class life with Ricochet Baby. Lower economic classes are often forced to ignore the serious effects of the so-called mysterious women's illnesses, such as post-natal depression. Kidman's examination of one woman's bout with the hormonal imbalance reveals how devastating the postpartum syndrome can be on the family as well as the individual. The novel The House Within delves even further into an ordinary woman's psyche as Bethany Dixon negotiates her complex network of relationships, the numerous roles to which women often devote themselves in an irrationally generous manner. She plays mother and step-mother, wife and ex-wife, daughter-in-law, sister, and lover in fragments and snapshots that span twenty-five years. Despite her devotion to the woman's roles she plays, Bethany has yet to establish her own identity separate from those she serves, and her own place in the world. In compensation for this, she is addicted to food, children, and Peter, a departed ex-husband who Bethany continues to regard as her emotional focal point.

Fiona Kidman is one of New Zealand's most honored novelists, as well as the author of numerous critically acclaimed collections of short stories, poetry, and non-fiction, as well as dramatic works including radio plays. She has won a number of awards and scholarships: the Ngaio Marsh Award for Television Writing; the 1988 New Zealand Book Award for Fiction for The Book of Secrets; the Literary Fund Award for Achievement. As a writing fellow at Victoria University in 1988, she was awarded the OBE, and in 1998 was made a Dame Commander of the New Zealand Order of Merit for her ceaseless, all-encompassing service to literature.

Like her predecessor, Katherine Mansfield, she may be remembered best for her short stories, which discuss marital infidelity, marital break-up, and failed relationships. However, her talent for weaving together stories as easily as many women juggle the bits and pieces of their families' lives is evident in the novel The House Within, which takes the form of interwoven stories, each narrated by the central character. Kidman's prose is economical, yet often sensual. Her women characters become the outsiders in a narrowly conformist society, and this status is dramatized by sexual transgression and punishment. She has been called a "raider of the real" because of her unerring look and prolonged gaze at women's lives written in the social-realism style.

-Janet Wilson, updated by Hedwig Gorski

KIELY, Benedict

Nationality: Irish. Born: Dromore, County Tyrone, 15 August 1919. Education: Christian Brothers' schools, Omagh; National University of Ireland, Dublin, B.A. (honours) 1943. Family: Married Maureen O'Connell in 1944; three daughters and one son. Career: Journalist in Dublin, 1939–64. Writer-in-residence, Hollins College, Virginia, 1964–65; visiting professor, University of Oregon, Eugene, 1965–66; writer-in-residence, Emory University, Atlanta, 1966–68. Since 1970 visiting lecturer, University College, Dublin. Awards: American-Irish Foundation award, 1980; Irish Academy of Letters award, 1980. Member: Of the Council, and President, Irish Academy of Letters. Address: c/o The Irish Times, Westmoreland Street, Dublin, Ireland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Land Without Stars. London, Johnson, 1946.

In a Harbour Green. London, Cape, 1949; New York, Dutton, 1950.Call for a Miracle. London, Cape, 1950; New York, Dutton, 1951.Honey Seems Bitter. New York, Dutton, 1952; London, Methuen, 1954.

The Cards of the Gambler: A Folktale. London, Methuen, 1953. There Was an Ancient House. London, Methuen, 1955.

The Captain with the Whiskers. London, Methuen, 1960; New York, Criterion, 1961.

Dogs Enjoy the Morning. London, Gollancz, 1968. Proxopera. London, Gollancz, 1977; Boston, Godine, 1987. Nothing Happens in Carmineross. London, Gollancz, and Boston, Godine, 1985.

The Trout in the Turnhole. Dublin, Wolfhound Press, 1995.

Short Stories

A Journey to the Seven Streams: Seventeen Stories. London, Methuen, 1963

Penguin Modern Stories 5, with others. London, Penguin, 1970.

A Ball of Malt and Madame Butterfly: A Dozen Stories. London, Gollancz, 1973.

A Cow in the House and Nine Other Stories. London, Gollancz, 1978.The State of Ireland: A Novella and Seventeen Stories. Boston, Godine, 1980; London, Penguin, 1982.

A Letter to Peachtree and Nine Other Stories. London, Gollancz, 1987; Boston, Godine, 1988.

God's Own Country. London, Minerva, 1993.

Other

Counties of Contention: A Study of the Origins and Implication of the Partition of Ireland. Cork, Mercier Press, 1945.

Poor Scholar: A Study of the Works and Days of William Carleton 1794–1869. London, Sheed and Ward, 1947; New York, Sheed and Ward, 1948.

Modern Irish Fiction: A Critique. Dublin, Golden Eagle, 1950.

All the Way to Bantry Bay and Other Irish Journeys. London, Gollancz, 1978.

Ireland from the Air. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Crown, 1985.

Yeats' Ireland: An Illustrated Anthology. London, Aurum Press, and New York, Crown, 1989.

Drink to the Bird: A Memoir. London, Methuen, 1991.

25 Views of Dublin (commentary), photographs by James Horan. Dublin, Town House in Association with the Office of Public Works, 1994.

The Waves Behind Us: A Memoir. London, Methuen, 1999.

Editor, The Various Lives of Keats and Chapman and The Brother, by Flann O'Brien. London, Hart Davis MacGibbon, 1976.

Editor, The Penguin Book of Irish Short Stories. London, Penguin, 1981.

Editor, Dublin. Oxford and New York, Oxford University Press, 1983

Editor, And As I Rode by Granard Moat. Dublin, Lilliput Press, 1996.

*

Critical Studies: Benedict Kiely by Daniel J. Casey, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, Bucknell University Press, 1974; Benedict Kiely by Grace Eckley, New York, Twayne, 1974.

* * *

Myth and legend, the heroic and the mock-heroic, form the central strands to the short stories of Benedict Kiely. He relies heavily on the Irish genius for creating epic myths about man, his heroic deeds and his human frailties. Although his fiction is largely set in the County Tyrone of his boyhood, a landscape that he knows intimately and with a sense of delight, it is transformed in a story like "A Journey to the Seven Streams" to a land of eternal and universal childhood. The trip to the stone-fiddle beside Lough Erne in Hookey Baxter's whimsical motor car takes on the aspect of a pilgrimage to a shrine or the tale of travellers in a magic, dreamlike land who have to face numerous adventures and dangers.

In a second collection, A Ball of Malt and Madame Butterfly, Kiely confirmed that although his work continues to be rooted in the Ireland that he knows so well, it has a breadth of vision and humanity in its subject matter and literary style that raises it above the merely provincial. The Tyrone of his childhood and the Dublin of his formative years are favorite backdrops for his novels where the mood changes from the mock-epic to the mock-gothic romance in a work like The Captain with the Whiskers with its memorable scene of the mad captain drilling his three sons in Boer War uniforms in the doomed big house; and in Dogs Enjoy the Morning with its satirical mixture of pub gossip and idle anecdote in the grotesque, but finely drawn, village of Cosmona where a newspaper reporter remarks, aptly enough, that "all human life is here." Kiely is at his best when he is writing short stories in which fantasy, satire, anecdote, and comic inventiveness play vital parts. The stories in A Letter to Peachtree are all told from a narrator's point of view, often as rambling comic monologues, and the end result is similar to listening to saloon bar badinage or half-heard eclectic conversations. Much of it is very funny and in each story the voice of the narrator is of paramount importance. A countryman reminisces about the past in a Dublin pub, attempting to put faces to half-remembered acquaintances in long-forgotten incidents; a writer attends a curious reenactment of the events of 1690; a "secret poltroon" desires the girls at the dancing class and in the title story an American is caught up in other people's lives as he attempts to write about an Irish writer. It is not stretching a point to compare Kiely's later short stories to the great classical short fiction written by his fellow countrymen Frank O'Connor and Sean O'Faolain.

A new note in Kiely's work was struck with the publication of Proxopera in 1977, a savagely indignant novel with its anger directed against all men of violence in Ireland. The title comes from an "operation proxy" when an elderly grandfather, Binchey, is forced by three terrorists holding his family ransom to take a bomb into the neighboring town. The background is again Tyrone, but the mood is at once savage in Binchey's outrage at the terrorism that Ireland has helped to spawn, and at once an elegy for the non-sectarian, chivalrous past of his own childhood. Everything is seen through the enraged consciousness of Binchey and his sense of loss that nothing, his past, his family, the countryside and his relationship to them, will ever be the same again.

The same theme is continued—although this time on a larger canvas—in Nothing Happens in Carmincross, a novel which is constructed with enormous skill, layer upon layer, until its final and devastating act of violence. Mervyn Kavanagh, the central character, has a career as an academic in America, but has retained a great love for his native Ireland. Unlike many Irish-Americans, though, he has no love for terrorism; this cannot save him from the reality he has to confront when, on a visit to Ireland, he is brought face to face with the violence of his country's past and present history.

At the novel's end the reader is left with the certainty that another meaningless act of horror is about to become just another memory, part of the historical process: in that sense Kiely has faced up courageously to the peculiar tragedy of the Irish situation. In contrast to his morbid theme Kiely writes with zest and grace, humor and irony, in a style which is totally individual, the cadences of his language pointing and counterpointing feelings and ideas.

-Trevor Royle

KINCAID, Jamaica

Nationality: American. Born: Elaine Potter Richardson in St. John's, Antigua, 25 May 1949. Education: Princess Margaret girls' school, Antigua; New School for Social Research, New York; Franconia College, New Hampshire, Family: Married Allen Evan Shawn; one daughter and one son. Career: Since 1974 contributor, and currently staff writer, The New Yorker. Awards: American Academy Morton Dauwen Zabel award, 1984. Honorary doctorate: Williams College, 1991; Long Island College, 1991; Amherst College, 1995; Bard College, 1997; Middlebury College, 1998. Address: The New Yorker, 25 West 43rd Street, New York, New York 10036, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Annie John. New York, Farrar Straus, and London, Pan, 1985.Lucy. New York, Farrar Straus, 1990; London, Cape, 1991.The Autobiography of My Mother. New York, Farrar, Straus, Giroux, 1996.

Short Stories

At the Bottom of the River. New York, Farrar Straus, 1983; London, Pan, 1984.

Annie, Gwen, Lily, Pam, and Tulip, illustrated by Eric Fischl. New York, Library Fellows of the Whitney Museum of American Art, 1986

Talk Stories. New York, Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2000.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Autobiograph of a Dress," in Grand Street Magazine.

Other

A Small Place. New York, Farrar Straus, and London, Virago Press, 1988.

My Brother. New York, Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1997.

Poetics of Place (essay), photographs by Lynn Geesaman. New York, Umbrage Editions, 1998.

My Garden Book, illustrations by Jill Fox. New York, Farrar Straus Giroux, 1999.

Editor, with Robert Atwan, The Best American Essays 1995. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1995.

Editor, My Favorite Plant: Writers and Gardeners on the Plants They Love. New York, Farrar Straus Giroux, 1998.

*

Critical Studies: Jamaica Kincaid: Where the Land Meets the Body by Moira Ferguson, Charlottesville, University Press of Virginia, 1994; Jamaica Kincaid by Diane Simmons, New York, Twayne Publishers, 1994; Jamaica Kincaid, edited by Harold Bloom, Philadelphia, Chelsea House, 1998; Jamaica Kincaid: A Critical Companion by Lizabeth Paravisini-Gebert, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1999.

* * *

Jamaica Kincaid is a talented writer, who has so far published five arresting books of fiction: At the Bottom of the River; Annie John; Lucy; Annie, Gwen, Lily, Pam, and Tulip; and The Autobiography of My Mother. Her nonfiction work includes an extended essay on her homeland, A Small Place; a meditation on her brother's 1996 death from AIDS, My Brother; and My Garden Book, which considers her particular relationship to gardening and the history of horticulture. Kincaid's work has been described variously as elegant, beguiling, gentle, graceful, dazzling, poetic, and lyrical.

Her fiction is sensuous, evocative, and sometimes erotic. The meanings are elusive in her first, second, and fourth books, and they emerge gradually from an almost hypnotic litany marked by repetition, echoes, and refrains as well as by brilliant descriptions of people, objects, and geography. The third book, Lucy, and Kincaid's most recent novel, The Autobiography of My Mother, depart from this style with their more direct prose. In the first two books Kincaid uses the narrative voice of a girl preoccupied with love and hate for a mother who caresses her only child one moment and then berates her as "the slut you are about to become." The child's father, thirty-five years older than her mother, is seldom with his wife and daughter and has had more than thirty children by various women, who jealously seek his wife's death through obeah rites. In the ten meditative sections of At the Bottom of the River, neither the child nor her homeland, Antigua, have names; in Annie John both do. In Annie John, Annie ages from ten to seventeen, giving the second book greater continuity and a more specific chronology. In both books the narrator describes her experiences and reflects upon them in monologues that complement one another but could stand separately. In both of these episodic works Kincaid achieves a degree of aesthetic unity through her careful and sparse selection of characters, an emphasis on the relative isolation of the child, a preoccupation with the mother/daughter relationship, and the use of a distinctive narrative voice. Kincaid reflects the childlike simplicity and apparent naiveté of the speaker, even while she conveys Annie John's sophisticated vision of her cultural milieu, her sexual awakening, her responses to nature, and her sensitivity to events, persons, and influences possessing symbolic overtones. Hypnotically talking to herself, Annie John uses parallel phrases reminiscent of biblical poetry. She is keenly receptive to sense impressions—sounds, scents, and colors. These two books offer insight into the nature of a typical girl's growth to maturity, but they also offer analysis of an atypical and highly sensitive child as she moves inevitably toward psychological breakdown, which occurs when she is fifteen.

Annie John lives in constant conflict with her unpredictable mother. She must choose always to submit or to resort to lies, trickery, and even open rebellion. In both books, transitions from everyday school and home life into the psychic are lacking as Kincaid shifts abruptly from realistic depiction of the Caribbean milieu to disclosure of the child's dreams and fantasies. At the most intense crisis of her protagonist's experiences Kincaid approaches the mythic and archetypal. She projects the unusual and timeless aspects of the mother/daughter relationship as an alternate merging and separating of two spirits. Annie John also views the strength of a mature woman symbolically—as the shedding of the skin, so that a woman stands up naked, vulnerable, and courageous before the world and leaves her protective covering rolled into a ball in the corner. The child in both books recites rules dictated by her mother, defining the female role in household routines and in social behavior. Some of these chants are ominous: "This is how to make a good medicine for a cold; this is how to make a good medicine to throw away a child before it even becomes a child ... this is how to bully a man; this is how a man bullies you." The narrator in At the Bottom of the River parodies the commandments as she mischievously recites, "this is how to spit up in the air if you feel like it, and this is how to move quick so that it doesn't fall on you."

The protagonist in both books moves into the disordered and the surreal as in dreams she walks with her mother through caves, empty houses, and along the shores of the sea. She dreams of happy marriage to a "red woman," who seems to be her mother (or an idealized mother-substitute), who wears skirts "big enough to bury your head in," and who will make her happy by telling stories that begin with "Before you were born."

In At the Bottom of the River the most notable explorations of the visionary and contemplative mind of the child occur in the sections entitled "Wingless" and "My Mother" and most disturbingly in "Blackness." In Annie John the girl's narrative of her mental and physical breakdown, marked by hallucinations, appears in "The Long Rain," and her illness is concurrent with rain that continues for ten weeks. Annie John's mother and maternal grandmother treat her with medications supplied by a British physician, but they also use in spite of her father's objections—various obeah potions and rituals. In her fantasy the child never loses all contact with reality. At the bottom of the river of her mind, trust exists as cold, hard, and uncompromising as rocks embedded below moving water. Moving into the surreal or unconscious, she does not quite abandon her world of household routine, the rigors of her life at school, or her sensitivity to the details of external nature. In the midst of a visionary passage, she startles the reader with a meditative statement based upon her observations of concrete realities: "I covet the rocks and the mountains their silence." On the closing page of At the Bottom of the River, the girl finds direction and substance, not so much in her visionary flights as in familiar objects: books, a chair, a table, a bowl of fruit, a bottle of milk, a flute made of wood. As she names these objects, she finds them to be reminders of human endeavor, past and present, though in themselves they are transient. She identifies herself as part of this endeavor as it betokens a never-ending flow of aspiration and creativity. She declares: "I claim these things then—mine—and now feel myself grow solid and complete, my name filling up my mouth." Annie John admires the courage and wildness of an imaginary "red girl," whom her mother denounces. Near the close of Annie John, the girl moves away, implying that Annie John no longer needs this double. Such kinship—even with an imagined role model—determines her positive self-identity in the last analysis as a human being and as a part of nature. As she leaves at seventeen to study nursing in England, she stands quietly and stoically on the ship, watching her mother become a mere dot in the distance.

The protagonist of Lucy similarly leaves Antigua at nineteen to become an au pair, caring for the children of a rich white couple in New York, and studying in night school, with nursing as a possible goal. Lucy Josephine Potter's mother is considered to be saintly, although Lucy suspects she angrily named her Lucifer at birth. Her father, like Annie John's, is a philanderer, with mistresses who have borne his many children and who jealously threaten his wife through obeah schemes. But Lucy, except for occasional moments in this novel, presents herself as a relatively unemotional, detached, and selfcentered woman, far different from Annie John. Her tough cynicism may arise primarily from resentment of her parents and from her anger at what she perceives as an oppressive island background. She despises the negative impact on her education of historic British imperialism, the exploitation of the island's beauty by Antiguan promoters of tourism, and the corruption of Antiguan politicians. At home she was punished for her healthy refusal to regard Columbus as a hero for his part in the "discovery" of West Indies, and she suffered silently the failure of books and teachers to recognize black African heritage in Antiguan students.

In general, however, Lucy's emotional repression is so great that she is a far less vibrant character than Annie John, whose imagination, passion, amusing impudence, and open laughter and grief make her unforgettable. Annie John's sensitive response to surroundings transformed the most mundane and familiar objects into art, but Lucy in her new surroundings allows herself to notice and remember only a few selected scenes. Protectively, she closes her mind and heart to new people and events, as if to cut herself off from the future and the present. She has already cut herself off from the past in her refusal even to open any letters from home. Only for a moment does she feel guilt upon learning a month late of her father's death. She sends her penniless mother a little money, but no message, and then burns all the unread letters from home. Yet when Peggy, her Irish apartment-mate, speaks of having "outgrown" her parents, Lucy is startled. She thinks she has never known anyone who could think of parents as pests, rather than as people "whose presence you are reminded of with each breath you take." At such rare moments, Lucy reveals the difficulty with which she maintains her cold isolation from emotion and intimacy. In all of her relationships, she seeks to appear detached. When her employer, Mariah, who is forty confides that her marriage is breaking up, Lucy simply wants to declare, "Your situation is an everyday thing. Men behave in this way all the time.... Men have no morals." Lucy contends she and Peggy have nothing in common except that they feel at ease when together. She manages to learn to love only one of the four children she cares for. Her companionship with Peggy and Peggy's sister lessens; her evenings with young men she meets at night school provide welcome and exciting sexual experience but no warmth and love. She remains always critical in evaluating their skill in arousing her but never viewing them as people worthy of love. On the last page we glimpse Lucy without her protective mask. She lies alone in her bed and on the first white page of a book Mariah has given her, she writes: "I wish I could love someone so much that I would die from it." Her tears fall on the page and blur the words. Kincaid's writing style—a plain prose lacking the imagery, cadence, and brilliant descriptions of the earlier books—reinforces the rigidity of the mask that Lucy hides behind throughout most of the novel.

Kincaid's fourth book of fiction, Annie, Gwen, Lily, Pam, and Tulip, blends literature with visual art in the evocative meditations of five young women in this collaboration with the artist Eric Fischl. Kincaid's text and Fischl's full-page lithographs of the women—nude, loosely draped, or shadowed-appear on alternate pages in this beautifully designed fine-press book. Kincaid's interest in photography flourished in university night classes in New York before she began publishing stories, and in her effort to blend her writing with visual art, she feels kinship with Virginia Woolf, James Joyce, and other modernists. The speeches of the five women resemble the style of At the Bottom of the River, and bear close resemblance also to the Song of Solomon in their relating of the beauty of women's bodies to nature imagery—animals, birds, mountains, and valleys. The influence of Woolf, particularly in The Waves, may also be evident. Though usually idyllic, the tone becomes ominous at times. As their thoughts dip into the unconscious, one senses their loving concern for one another, but the meanings are elusive and the abstraction of the poetic monologues seems to demand the abstraction of the visual artistry of Fischl's lithographs.

The Autobiography of My Mother continues Kincaid's charting of the interior lives of intelligent yet stifled women and their ambivalences about the choices they make. Via the now familiar form of a first-person monologue, seventy-year-old Xuela Claudette Richardson engages in an extended retrospective meditation on the direction of her life, and the choices she has made. While the title might suggest a narrative return to the conflicted mother/daughter relationships common in Kincaid's work, in fact in this novel the exploration of mothering is fundamentally different, in its complete absence of mothers as characters. The novel opens with Kincaid "killing off" the narrator's mother: "My mother died at the moment I was born, and so for my whole life there was nothing standing between myself and eternity." Furthermore, Xuela refuses to bear children, recognizing that: "I would bear children, but I would never be a mother to them ... I would destroy them with the carelessness of a god." Her aborting of her pregnancy then, is not a refusal of the unborn child, but an acknowledgement of her inability to engage in the act of mothering. Like all of Kincaid's fiction there is an element of the autobiographical at the center of her fictional plot; in this instance it is her belief that her mother should not have had children. However, The Autobiography of My Mother should not be dismissed as a mere therapeutic exercise—it is far more compelling. Like Lucy, Xuela longs for love, but the only person to whom she extends her love is her mother. Others she is unable to sustain connections with, and in old age she admits: "All the people I knew intimately from the beginning of my life died. I should have missed their presence but I did not." Emotionally distant, Xuela admits growing "to love not loving my father" and in another instance admits to the reader that this act of withholding is not passive: "He did not look like anyone I could love, and he did not look like anyone I should love, and so I determined then that I could not love him and I determined that I should not love him." Whether Xuela's inability to love anyone who exhibits the imperfections of humanity is a response to her childhood is almost irrelevant; the novel is about how Xuela asserts herself and her independence in the face of her inherited lot. Vivid characterization and mesmerizing lyrical prose chart her development from an observant child to an introspective adult, her relationships with others entering, but never defining, her life story. If, as some observe, Kincaid is continually rewriting the story of the difficulties of moving from childhood to womanhood-negotiating sexuality, power, colonialism, patriarchy, and other forces—then in the elderly Xuela she brings that story to a close for the first time. Yet as the novel ends, and Xuela is alone contemplating her life, there is no sense of an unqualified resolution in her life. Instead the novel reproduces the ambivalence common to all of Kincaid's endings, as Xuela asserts "Since I do not matter, I do not long to matter, but I matter anyway."

All the definitive themes of Kincaid's fiction are reworked in her nonfiction, which assumes the musing circular style of her novels. Her fierce criticism of colonialism and its legacy assumes full force in A Small Place, where she takes aim at the legacy of colonialism, as well as the continuing imperial exploitation of Antigua via tourism, and the failure of Independence to take seriously the needs of the people. Cultural exchange, Kincaid argues, must be measured and weighed, bringing the nation to task for adopting Europe's emphasis on capitalism instead of that on education. Likewise, My Garden Book, examines the cultural exchange of gardening via colonialism, and the history of attempts at cultivation in, or exportation from, foreign climes. Exceptionally perceptive, Kincaid examines the function of gardens as sites of luxury, and as repositories of history and memory, sometimes oppressive. While Kincaid favors hollyhocks, for instance, as a cousin of the cotton plant they elicit memories of childhood labor, and the institution of slavery. However, for Kincaid, memory is inescapable, and any event can generate an opportunity for exploration of the past and both its personal and larger meanings. Nowhere is this more apparent than in Kincaid's My Brother, where the dying of her brother becomes an opportunity to revisit the fraught familial relations that haunt much of her writing. A return not only to the past, the moving memoir is also a return to the "what might have been" had she not found greater opportunities elsewhere, or perhaps if her brother had. While Kincaid's nonfiction prose is powerful enough to stand as such, these personal meditations also read as powerful companions to her works of fiction.

-Margaret B. McDowell, updated by Jennifer Harris

KING, Francis (Henry)

Pseudonym: Frank Cauldwell. Nationality: British. Born: Adelboden, Switzerland, 4 March 1923. Education: Shrewsbury School; Balliol College, Oxford, B.A. in English, 1949, M.A. 1951. Career: Poetry reviewer, the Listener, London, 1945–50; worked for the British Council, 1949–63: lecturer in Florence, 1949–50, Salonika, 1950–52, and Athens 1953–57; assistant representative, Helsinki, 1957–58; regional director, Kyoto, 1959–63. Literary reviewer, 1964–78, and theatre reviewer, 1978–89, Sunday Telegraph, London. Since 1978 fiction reviewer, Spectator, London. Member of the Executive Committee, 1969–73, vice-president, 1977, and president, 1978–85, English PEN; International President, PEN, 1986–89; chair, Society of Authors, 1975–77; member of the Royal Literary Fund Committee, 1977–89; member of the Executive Committee, National Book League, 1980–81. Awards: Maugham award, 1952; Katherine Mansfield-Menton prize, 1965; Arts Council bursary, 1966; Yorkshire Post award, 1983. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1952; resigned, then re-elected, 1967. O.B.E. (Officer, Order of the British Empire), 1979; C.B.E. (Commander, Order of the British Empire), 1985. Agent: A.M. Heath, 79 St. Martin's Lane, London WC2N 4AA. Address: 19 Gordon Place, London W8 4JE, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

To the Dark Tower. London, Home and Van Thal, 1946.

Never Again. London, Home and Van Thal, 1948.

An Air That Kills. London, Home and Van Thal, 1948.

The Dividing Stream. London, Longman, and New York, Morrow, 1951.

The Dark Glasses. London, Longman, 1954; New York, Pantheon, 1956.

The Firewalkers: A Memoir (as Frank Cauldwell). London, Murray, 1956.

The Widow. London, Longman, 1957.

The Man on the Rock. London, Longman, and New York, Pantheon, 1958

The Custom House. London, Longman, 1961; New York, Doubleday, 1962.

The Last of the Pleasure Gardens. London, Longman, 1965.

The Waves Behind the Boat. London, Longman, 1967.

A Domestic Animal. London, Longman, 1970.

A Game of Patience. London, Hutchinson, 1974.

The Needle. London, Hutchinson, 1975; New York, Mason Charter, 1976.

Danny Hill: Memoirs of a Prominent Gentleman. London, Hutchinson, 1977.

The Action. London, Hutchinson, 1978.

Act of Darkness. London, Hutchinson, and Boston, Little Brown, 1983.

Voices in an Empty Room. London, Hutchinson, and Boston, Little Brown, 1984.

The Woman Who Was God. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1988.

Punishments. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1989; New York, Viking, 1990.

Visiting Cards. London, Constable, 1990.

The Ant Colony. London, Constable, 1991.

The One and Only. London, Constable, 1994.

Ash on an Old Man's Sleeve. London, Constable, 1996.

Short Stories

So Hurt and Humiliated and Other Stories. London, Longman, 1959. The Japanese Umbrella and Other Stories. London, Longman, 1964. The Brighton Belle and Other Stories. London, Longman, 1968. Penguin Modern Stories 12, with others. London, Penguin, 1972. Flights (2 novellas). London, Hutchinson, 1973. Hard Feelings and Other Stories. London, Hutchinson, 1976.

Indirect Method and Other Stories. London, Hutchinson, 1980.

One Is a Wanderer: Selected Stories. London, Hutchinson, 1985; Boston, Little Brown, 1986.

Frozen Music (novella). London, Hutchinson, 1987; New York, Harper, 1988.

Secret Lives (novella). London, Constable, 1991.

A Hand at the Shutter. London, Constable, 1996.

Plays

Far East (produced Coventry, 1980).

Radio Plays: The Prisoner, 1967; Corner of a Foreign Field, 1969; A Short Walk in Williams Park, from a story by C.H.B. Kitchin, 1972; Death of My Aunt, from the novel by C.H.B. Kitchin, 1973; Desperate Cases, 1975.

Poetry

Rod of Incantation. London, Longman, 1952.

Other

Japan, photographs by Martin Hürlimann. London, Thames and Hudson, and New York, Viking Press, 1970.

Christopher Isherwood. London, Longman, 1976.

E.M. Forster and His World. London, Thames and Hudson, and New York, Scribner, 1978.

Florence, photographs by Nicolas Sapieha. New York, Newsweek, 1982.

Florence: A Literary Companion. London, Murray, 1991.

Yesterday Came Suddenly. London, Constable, 1993.

Editor, Introducing Greece. London, Methuen, 1956; revised edition, 1968

Editor, Collected Short Stories, by Osbert Sitwell. London, Duckworth, 1974.

Editor, with Ronald Harwood, New Stories 3. London, Hutchinson, 1978.

Editor, Prokofiev by Prokofiev: A Composer's Memoir, translated by Guy Daniels, London, Macdonald and Jane's, 1979.

Editor, My Sister and Myself: The Diaries of J.R. Ackerley. London, Hutchinson, 1982.

Editor, Writings from Japan, by Lafcadio Hearn. London, Penguin, 1984

Editor, Twenty Stories: A South East Arts Collection. London, Secker and Warburg, 1985.

*

Manuscript Collections: Humanities Research Center, University of Texas, Austin.

Critical Studies: Essay by King, in Leaving School, London, Phoenix House, 1957; "Waves and Echoes: The Novels of Francis King" by John Mellors, in London Magazine, December 1975-January 1976; "Francis King's Obscured Passions" by Barbara Hardy, in European Gay Review, vols. 6–7, 1991; "Francis King" by Val Warner, in Dictionary of Literary Biography, Detroit, Gale Research; Privileged Moments: Encounters with Writers by Jeffrey Meyers. Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 2000.

Francis King comments:

(1972) Except for the period of my schooling and the war, mine has, until the last decade, always been an itinerant life. As a child, I was brought up alternately in India and Switzerland (the country of my birth); subsequently I worked for the British Council in Italy, Greece, Egypt, Finland and Japan. This desire always to set off for another destination is reflected in my novels. Of course, certain themes in them are constant; but I have never wished to be identified with only one type of fiction. Perhaps this has harmed me in popular esteem; the public tends to like its novelists to write the same novel over and over again.

Foreign places have always provided me with imaginative stimulation and the majority of my books have foreign settings. Most English novelists, like the society from which they derive, seem to me to be too much preoccupied with differences of class, which obscure for them differences more profound between human beings. In choosing so often to write about "abroad," I have, perhaps subconsciously, attempted to avoid this class-obsession.

I believe strongly in national character, and a recurrent theme of my books is the way in which people struggle to break out of the patterns of national behavior in which they have been imprisoned since birth.

Critics sometimes say that they find my work "depressing" and my readers sometimes ask why I never write about "nice" people or "normal" people—not surprisingly perhaps, since mine is an attitude of profound, if resigned, pessimism about the world. I do not expect people to behave consistently well, and my observation is that few of them do. But I should like to think that the tolerance and compassion that I genuinely feel are also reflected in my writing.

I have always been preoccupied with style and form. I feel that I am most successful in achieving both if the reader is unconscious of any straining for them.

In my early books, written at a period of loneliness in my own life, isolation is a recurrent theme; in my later books I see now that envy and jealousy—to my mind the least attractive of human traits—have taken over.

My biggest and most successful novels were The Custom House and Act of Darkness. The novel that comes nearest to saying what I wanted to say—and that cost me most—was A Domestic Animal.

* * *

Francis King's first novel, To the Dark Tower, is his most experimental. In some of the stories in The Japanese Umbrella he adopts Isherwood's trick of using a narrator to whom he gives his own name, and The Firewalkers, subtitled "a memoir," was first published under the pseudonym of Frank Cauldwell, who is also the narrator, and who first appeared as a novelist in To the Dark Tower. King's stress on the plurality of truth, as formulated in the early story "A True Story" (So Hurt and Humiliated), led him to write from both first- and third-person angles in The Custom House and The Last of the Pleasure Gardens. The Action, actually about a novel, seems redolent with echoes from King's previous work. The bawdy Danny Hill, with much linguistic humor, purports to be an eighteenthcentury text by John Cleland and is written by King in that idiom, modernized. The very structure of Voices in an Empty Room, linking three separate stories of attempts at communication with the dead, mirrors death's arbitrary cut-off and residual loose ends.

The themes of separation and loss recurring throughout King's work may be traced to his second novel, Never Again, a moving evocation of childhood and adolescence in India and at an English prep school. In his third novel, An Air That Kills, there is a lyricism, often negated, in the spirit of Housman's poem whence the title comes. The Dividing Stream, a complex novel set in Florence, is imbued with a sense of decay and the melancholy that pervades much of King's world. These moods are articulated in the stark ending of The Dark Glasses, as Patrick recognizes "the terrible, morbid beauty of this world." Yet the Greek setting seems to make for an easier sensuous acceptance: in The Dark Glasses King evokes the natural beauty of Corfu, while The Firewalkers is a mainly happy reminiscence of a group of friends in Athens centered on the dilettante and metaphorical firewalker, Colonel Grecos. In The Man on the Rock King succeeds in impersonating as narrator the parasitic Spiro, a character utterly removed from the self-effacing King/Cauldwell persona. King is as skillful with the short story form as the novel, with some of the stories in his first collection, So Hurt and Humiliated, set in Greece. So is the second novella in Flights, "The Cure," which like the other, "The Infection," set in Hungary, has political overtones.

King's most ambitious book to date, The Custom House, also has political implications. In this long, complex novel he focuses on a cross-section of Japanese society, both from within and through western eyes. King's writing is always rich in ambivalence; he found congenial material in Japanese formalism, recording "the echoes which surround events, not merely after they have taken place but also before them." Yet the novel has his characteristic intense sensuousness hedged with negatives. Like the collection of short stories, The Japanese Umbrella, The Waves Behind the Boat is set in Japan, though its theme of incest and dishonesty concerns expatriates, including the woman narrator.

Christine Cornwell in The Widow is outstanding among King's female portraits. The novel's opening illustrates his skill in manipulating the reader's sympathy in a few pages as he highlights alternately her unlikeable and likeable traits. His evocation of wartime London in part 2 of The Widow is complemented by his account of civilian rural experience, chiefly through the eyes of a seventeenyear-old land-girl, in A Game of Patience. In The Last of the Pleasure Gardens King shows how a severely retarded child exacerbates beyond endurance the weaknesses in a marriage. Most of the short stories in The Brighton Belle are studies in decay, symbolized in the town itself. A Domestic Animal, about unreciprocated homosexual love, is a poignant and powerful study of sexual jealousy; the narrator's attitude to Pam recalls the narrator's attitude to Anne in An Air That Kills, although the novels are different in tone.

The darkness of The Needle, about a doctor's love for her weak brother, is expressed too in some of the stories in Hard Feelings. The stories in Indirect Method are either set abroad or involve foreigners in Britain. The Action, about the libel action threatened against Hazel's novel on the eve of publication, incidentally reveals much about King's understanding of the novel form; the ending, as Hazel begins a new story, is something of a writer's credo. Act of Darkness, set mainly in 1930's India, focuses on a child's murder apparently by someone in his family circle; it is a major novel of suspense with powerful psychological depths. Voices in an Empty Room shows para-normal communication as mainly fraudulent, though the only certainty is doubt.

The affirmative novella Frozen Music, set in contemporary India, shows an elderly Englishman "giving" his young Finnish wife to his son, her lover, in an extraordinary act of love. In The Woman Who Was God Ruth, unable to accept that her son's death in an African commune was accidental, travels there and confronts its charismatic leader, "Mother." Through King's skillful sleight-of-hand narrative, Ruth not "Mother" emerges as playing God—with a destructiveness stemming from inability to understand her son. The moving Punishments opens in 1981 with Michael dreaming about his trip to Germany in 1948 in a party of students including the woman he married. The novel then describes that visit among Germans forced to see themselves as punished and guilty, the setting for Michael's seduction by a male German student: "And no future experience of my whole life was ever to be so thrilling." Visiting Cards is a brilliant comic novel set at a World Association of Authors conference, presided over by the undistinguished Amos Kingsley, mistakenly elected as Kingsley Amis. The serious underlying issue is whether public agitation is necessarily in the interests of imprisoned writers if it further alienates their governments.

Though always a skillful storyteller, King's outstanding quality through all his work is his understanding of a wide range of characters' emotions. He is a master of implication, and writes with unnerving precision, strength, and sensitivity.

-Val Warner

KING, Stephen (Edwin)

Also writes as Richard Bachman. Nationality: American. Born: Portland, Maine, 21 September 1947. Education: University of Maine at Orono, B.Sc. 1970. Family: Married Tabitha Jane Spruce in 1971; two sons, one daughter. Career: Worked as a janitor, a laborer in an industrial laundry, and in a knitting mill; English teacher, Hampden Academy (high school), Hampden, Maine, 1971–73; University of Maine, Orono, writer-in-residence, 1978-79; owner, Philtrum Press (publishing house), and WZON-AM (rock 'n' roll radio station), Bangor, Maine; actor in films, television, and commercials, 1981—; reviewer, New York Times Book Review. Awards: Balrog Awards, second place in best novel category and second place in best story collection category, 1979; American Library Association's list of best books for young adults, 1979, 1981; World Fantasy Award, 1980, 1982; Career Alumni Award (University of Maine at Orono), 1981; special British Fantasy Award (British Fantasy Society), 1982; Hugo Award (World Science Fiction Convention), 1982; Best Fiction Writer of the Year (Us Magazine), 1982; Locus Award for best collection (Locus Publications), 1986; World Fantasy award for short story, 1995; Tommy Award, 2000. Agent: Arthur Greene, 101 Park Avenue, New York, New York 10178, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Carrie: A Novel of a Girl with a Frightening Power. New York, Doubleday, 1974; with an introduction by Tabitha King, New York, Plume, 1991.

Salem's Lot. New York, Doubleday, 1975; with an introduction by Clive Barker, New York, Plume, 1991.

The Dark Tower: The Gunslinger. Amereon Ltd., 1976; published as The Gunslinger, illustrated by Michael Whelan. New York, New American Library, 1988.

The Shining. New York, Doubleday, 1977; with an introduction by Ken Follett, New York, Plume, 1991.

Rage (as Richard Bachman). New York, New American Library/ Signet, 1977.

The Stand. New York, Doubleday, 1978; enlarged and expanded edition published as The Stand: The Complete and Uncut Edition. New York, Doubleday, 1990.

The Long Walk (as Richard Bachman). New York, New American Library/Signet, 1979.

The Dead Zone. New York, Viking, 1979; movie edition published as The Dead Zone: Movie Tie-In. New York, New American Library, 1980; The Dead Zone, introduction by Anne Rivers Siddons, New York, Plume, 1994.

Firestarter. New York, Viking, 1980.

Cujo. New York, Viking, 1981.

Roadwork: A Novel of the First Energy Crisis (as Richard Bachman). New York, New American Library/Signet, 1981.

The Running Man (as Richard Bachman). New York, New American Library/Signet, 1982.

Different Seasons. (novellas; contains Rita Hayworth and Shawshank Redemption: Hope Springs Eternal, Apt Pupil: Summer of Corruption, The Body: Fall from Innocence, and The Breathing Method: A Winter's Tale). New York, Viking, 1982.

Pet Sematary. New York, Doubleday, 1983.

Christine. New York, Viking, 1983.

Cycle of the Werewolf (novella), illustrated by Berni Wrightson. Westland, Michigan, 1983.

The Talisman (with Peter Straub). New York, Viking Press/Putnam, 1984.

The Eyes of the Dragon (young adult), illustrated by Kenneth R. Linkhauser, Philtrum Press, 1984; illustrated by David Palladini, New York, Viking, 1987.

Thinner (as Richard Bachman). New York, New American Library, 1984.

It. New York, Viking, 1986.

Misery. New York, Viking, 1987.

The Tommyknockers. New York, Putnam, 1987.

The Dark Half. New York, Viking, 1989.

The Dark Tower II: The Drawing of the Three, illustrated by Phil Hale. New York, New American Library, 1989.

Needful Things. New York, Viking, 1991.

The Dark Tower III: The Waste Lands, illustrated by Ned Dameron. New York, New American Library, 1991.

Gerald's Game. New York, Viking, 1992.

Dolores Claiborne. New York, Viking, 1993.

Insomnia. New York, Viking, 1994.

Rose Madder. New York, Viking, 1995.

The Green Mile (serialized in six chapters). New York, Signet, 1996; published as The Green Mile: A Novel in Six Parts. New York, Plume, 1997.

Desperation. New York, Viking, 1996.

The Regulators (as Richard Bachman). New York, Dutton, 1996.

The Two Dead Girls (with a foreword by the author), New York, Signet, 1996.

The Bachman Books: Four Early Novels (all previously published, with a new introduction by the author). New York, Plume, 1996.

The Dark Tower IV: Wizard and Glass. New York, Plume, 1997; published as Wizard and Glass, illustrated by Dave McKean. Hampton Falls, New Hampshire, D. H. Grant, 1997.

Bag of Bones. New York, Scribner, 1998. The Girl Who Loved Tom Gordon. New York, Scribner, 1999. Hearts in Atlantis. New York, Scribner, 1999. Riding the Bullet (e-book novella). New York, Scribner, 2000.

Short Stories

The Star Invaders. Durham, Maine, Gaslight Books, 1964.

Night Shift New York, Doubleday, 1978; published as Night Shift: Excursions into Horror. New York, New American Library/Signet, 1979.

Stephen King's Skeleton Crew, illustrated by J. K. Potter. New York, Viking, 1985.

Dark Visions. London, Gollancz, 1989.

My Pretty Pony (with Barbara Kruger). New York, Knopf, 1989. Four Past Midnight. New York, Viking, 1990.

Nightmares & Dreamscapes. New York, Viking, 1993.

Plays

Screenplays: Creepshow. Warner Brothers, 1982; published as Stephen King's Creep Show: A George A. Romero Film, illustrated by Berni Wrightson and Michele Wrightson, New York, New American Library, 1982.; Cat's Eye, Metro Goldwyn-Mayer/United Artists, 1984; Silver Bullet, Paramount Pictures/Dino de Laurentiis's North Carolina Film Corp., 1985, illustrated by Berni Wrightson, New York, New American Library/Signet, 1985; Maximum Overdrive (and director), Dino de Laurentiis's North Carolina Film Corp., 1986, New York, New American Library, 1986; Pet Sematary, Paramount Pictures, 1989; Stephen King's Sleepwalkers. Columbia, 1992.

Television Plays: Battleground, Martin Poll Productions/NBC-TV), 1987; Tales from the Dark Side (teleplay of episode, "Sorry, Right Number"), 1987; Stephen King's Golden Years, CBS-TV, 1991; Stephen King's The Stand (also executive producer), ABC-TV, 1994; The X-Files (teleplay of episode, "Chinga," with Chris Carter), Fox-TV, 1998; Storm of the Century, ABC-TV, 1999, New York, Pocket Books, 1999.

Poetry

Another Quarter Mile: Poetry. Dorrance, 1979.

Other

Stephen King's Danse Macabre (nonfiction). Everest House, 1981.The Plant (privately published episodes of a comic horror novel in progress). Bangor, Maine, Philtrum Press, 1982.

Black Magic and Music: A Novelist's Perspective on Bangor (pamphlet). Bangor, Maine, Bangor Historical Society, 1983.

The Mist (sound recording). Fort Edward, New York, ZBS Foundation, 1984.

Nightmares in the Sky: Gargoyles and Grotesques, photographs by F. Stop FitzGerald. New York, Viking, 1988.

Dolan's Cadillac. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1989. On Writing: A Memoir of the Craft. New York, Scribner, 2000.

- Contributor, The Year's Finest Fantasy, edited by Terry Carr. New York, Putnam, 1978.
- Contributor, Shadows, Volume 1, edited by Charles L. Grant. New York, Doubleday, 1978.
- Contributor, Shadows, Volume 4, edited by Charles L. Grant. New York, Doubleday, 1981.
- Contributor, New Terrors, edited by Ramsey Campbell. New York, Pocket Books, 1982.
- Contributor, World Fantasy Convention 1983, edited by Robert Weinberg. Weird Tales Ltd., 1983.
- Contributor, The Writer's Handbook, edited by Sylvia K. Burack, Boston, Writer, Inc., 1984.
- Contributor, The Dark Descent, edited by David G. Hartwell. Doherty Associates, 1987.
- Contributor, Prime Evil: New Stories by the Masters of Modern Horror, edited by Douglas E. Winter. New York, New American Library, 1988.
- Contributor, The Complete Masters of Darkness, edited by Dennis Etchison. Novato, California, Underwood-Miller, 1990.
- Contributor, Shock Rock, edited by Jeff Gelb. New York, Pocket Books, 1992.
- Contributor, Death Walks Tonight: Horrifying Stories, edited by Anthony Horowitz. New York, Puffin, 1996.
- Contributor, Twists of the Tale: Cat Horror Stories, edited by Ellen Datlow. New York, Dell, 1996.
- Contributor, Screamplays, edited by Richard Chizmar. New York, Ballantine, 1997.
- Contributor, The Best of the Best: 18 New Stories by America's Leading Authors, edited by Elaine Koster and Joseph Pittman. New York, Signet, 1998.
- Foreword, Tales from the Nightside: Dark Fantasy by Charles L. Grant. Sauk City, Wisconsin, Arkham House, 1981.
- Foreword, Scars and Other Distinguishing Marks by Richard Christian Matheson. Los Angeles, Scream/Press, 1987.
- Foreword, Archie Americana Series: Best of the Forties, created by John L. Goldwater. Mamaroneck, New York, Archie Comic Publications, 1991.
- Foreword, Fear Itself: The Early Works of Stephen King, edited by Tim Underwood and Chuck Miller. San Francisco, Underwood-Miller, 1993.
- Introduction, The Arbor House Treasury of Horror and the Supernatural, edited by Bill Pronzini, Barry M. Malzberg, and Martin H. Greenberg. New York, Arbor House, 1981.
- Introduction, Grande Illusions: A Learn-by-Example Guide to the Art and Technique of Special Make-up Effects from the Films of Tom Savini by Tom Savini. Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Imagine, 1983.
- Introduction, The Blackboard Jungle by Evan Hunter. New York, Arbor House, 1984.
- Introduction, Fear Itself: The Horror Fiction of Stephen King, edited by Tim Underwood and Chuck Miller. New York, New American Library, 1984.
- Introduction, Joe Bob Goes to the Drive-In by Joe Bob Briggs. New York, Delacorte Press, 1987.
- Introduction, Classic Tales of Horror and the Supernatural, edited by Bill Pronzini, Barry N. Malzberg, and Martin H. Greenberg. New York, Quill, 1991.
- Introduction, Graven Images: The Best of Horror, Fantasy, and Science Fiction Film Art from the Collection of Ronald V. Borst, edited by Ronald V. Borst and Margaret A. Borst. New York, Grove Press, 1992.

Introduction, *The Fugitive Recaptured: The 30th Anniversary Com*panion to a Television Classic by Ed Robertson. Los Angeles, Pomegranate Press, 1993.

Introduction, Heading Home: Growing Up in Baseball, photographs by Harry Connolly. New York, Rizzoli, 1995.

Introduction, Horripilations: The Art of J. K. Potter, text by Nigel Suckling. Woodstock, New York, Overlook Press, 1995.

Introduction, The Shawshank Redemption: The Shooting Script by Frank Darabont. New York, Newmarket Press, 1996.

Introduction, Saturday Night at Moody's Diner: Even More Stories by Tim Sample. Camden, Maine, Down East Books, 1996.

Introduction, The Green Mile: The Screenplay by Frank Darabont. New York, Scribner Paperback Fiction, 1999.

*

Manuscript Collection: Folger Library, University of Maine at Orono.

Critical Studies: Fear Itself: The Horror Fiction of Stephen King, edited by Tim Underwood and Chuck Miller, San Francisco, Underwood-Miller, 1982, new edition, with introduction by King and afterword by George Romero, New York, New American Library, 1984; Stephen King by Douglas E. Winter, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1982; Dream Makers: The Uncommon Men and Women Who Write Science Fiction by Charles Platt, New York, Berkley, 1983; Stephen King: The Art of Darkness by Douglas E. Winter, New York, New American Library, 1984; Stephen King as Richard Bachman by Michael R. Collings, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1985; The Many Facets of Stephen King by Michael R. Collings, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1985; The Shorter Works of Stephen King by Michael R. Collings and David Engebretson, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1985; Discovering Stephen King, edited by Darrell Schweitzer, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1985; The Annotated Guide to Stephen King: A Primary and Secondary Bibliography of the Works of America's Premier Horror Writer by Michael R. Collings, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1986; The Films of Stephen King by Michael R. Collings, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1986; Kingdom of Fear: The World of Stephen King, edited by Tim Underwood and Chuck Miller, San Francisco, Underwood-Miller, 1986; The Stephen King Phenomenon by Michael R. Collings, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1987; Stephen King Goes to Hollywood: A Lavishly Illustrated Guide to All the Films Based on Stephen King's Fiction by Jeff Conner, New York, New American Library, 1987; The Gothic World of Stephen King: Landscape of Nightmares, edited by Gary Hoppenstand and Ray B. Browne, Bowling Green, Ohio, Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1987; The Author Talks by Stephen King (sound recording), Charlotte Hall, Maryland, Recorded Books, 1987; Reign of Fear: Fiction and Film of Stephen King, edited by Don Herron, Los Angeles, Underwood-Miller, 1988; Landscape of Fear: Stephen King's American Gothic by Tony Magistrale, Bowling Green, Ohio, Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1988; Stephen King: The First Decade, Carrie to Pet Sematary by Joseph Reino, Boston, Twayne, 1988; Bare Bones: Conversations on Terror with Stephen King, edited by Tim Underwood and Chuck Miller, New York, McGraw-Hill, Warner Books, 1988; The Stephen King Companion, edited by George W. Beahm, Kansas City, Missouri, Andrews & McMeel, 1989; The Moral Voyages of Stephen King by Anthony

Magistrale, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1989; American Horror Fiction: From Brockden Brown to Stephen King, edited by Brian Docherty, New York, St. Martin's Press, 1990; The Shape Under the Sheet: The Compete Stephen King Encyclopedia, Ann Arbor, Michigan, Popular Culture, 1991; The Stephen King Story by George W. Beahm, Kansas City, Missouri, Andrews & McMeel, 1991, revised and updated edition, 1992; The Dark Descent: Essays Defining Stephen King's Horrorscape, edited by Tony Magistrale, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1992; A Casebook on "The Stand", edited by Tony Magistrale, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1992; Stephen King: The Second Decade— "Danse Macabre" to "The Dark Half" by Tony Magistrale, New York, Twayne, 1992; Stephen King, Master of Horror by Anne Saidman, Minneapolis, Minnesota, Lerner Publications, 1992; Feast of Fear: Conversations with Stephen King, edited by Tim Underwood and Chuck Miller, New York, Carroll & Graf, 1992; The Works of Stephen King: An Annotated Bibliography and Guide by Michael R. Collings and edited by Boden Clarke, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1993; The Films of Stephen King by Ann Lloyd, New York, St. Martin's Press, 1993; Fear Itself: The Early Works of Stephen King, edited by Tim Underwood and Chuck Miller (foreword by King, introduction by Peter Straub, afterword by George A. Romero), San Francisco, Underwood-Miller, 1993; Stephen King's America by Jonathan P. Davis, Bowling Green, Ohio, Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1994; More Things That Are Dreamt Of: Masterpieces of Supernatural Horror, from Mary Shelley to Stephen King, in Literature and Film by James Ursini and Alain Silver, New York, Limelight Editions, 1994; Observations from the Terminator: Thoughts on Stephen King and Other Modern Masters of Horror Fiction by Tyson Blue, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1995; Susie Bright's Sexwise: America's Favorite X-Rated Intellectual Does Dan Quayle, Catherine MacKinnon, Stephen King, Camille Paglia, Nicholson Baker, Madonna, the Black Panthers, and the GOP— by Susie Bright, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, Cleis Press, 1995; Scaring Us to Death: The Impact of Stephen King on Popular Culture by Michael R. Collings, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1995; Stephen King by Amy Keyishian and Marjorie Keyishian, New York, Chelsea House, 1995; Writing Horror and the Body: The Fiction of Stephen King, Clive Barker and Anne Rice. by Linda Badley, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1996; The Work of Stephen King: An Annotated Bibliography and Guide by Michael R. Collings and edited by Boden Clarke, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1996; Maps of Heaven, Maps of Hell: Religious Terror as Memory from the Puritans to Stephen King by Edward J. Ingebretsen, Armonk, New York, M. E. Sharpe, 1996; Stephen King: A Critical Companion by Sharon A. Russell. Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1996; Reading Stephen King: Issues of Censorship, Student Choice, and Popular Literature, edited by Brenda Miller Power, Jeffrey D. Wilhelm, and Kelly Chandler, Urbana, Illinois, National Council of Teachers of English, 1997; Fangoria Masters of the Dark, edited by Anthony Timpone, New York, HarperPrism, 1997; Stephen King: America's Best-Loved Boogeyman by George Beahm, Kansas City, Missouri, Andrews & McMeel, 1998; Stephen King from A to Z: An Encyclopedia of His Life and Work by George Beahm, Kansas City, Missouri, Andrews & McMeel, 1998; Stephen King, edited and with an introduction by Harold Bloom, Philadelphia, Chelsea House, 1998; Treks Not Taken: What If Stephen King, Anne Rice, Kurt Vonnegut, and Other Literary Greats Had Written Episodes of Star Trek, The Next Generation?, New York, HarperPerennial, 1998; Imagining the Worst: Stephen King and the Representation of Women, edited by Kathleen Margaret Lant and Theresa Thompson, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1998; The Lost Work of Stephen King: A Guide to Unpublished Manuscripts, Story Fragments, Alternative Versions, and Oddities, Secaucus, New Jersey, Birch Lane Press, 1998; Stephen King Country: The Illustrated Guide to the Sites and Sights That Inspired the Modern Master of Horror by George Beahm, Philadelphia, Running Press, 1999; Stephen King by John F. Wukovits, San Diego, Lucent Books, 1999; On Writing: A Memoir of the Craft by Stephen King, New York, Scribner, 2000; American Horror Writers by Bob Madison, Berkeley Heights, New Jersey, Enslow Publishers, 2000; Stephen King: King of Thrillers and Horror by Suzan Wilson, Berkeley Heights, New Jersey, Enslow Publishers, 2000.

* * *

Stephen King is a prolific, best-selling, internationally famous author who is known primarily as a writer of horror fiction but who has also worked extensively in other genres, particularly fantasy. In his horror stories, King draws on a range of classic motifs, such as vampirism and evil spirits, and masterfully employs a variety of techniques drawn from popular fiction, for example in the way he creates narrative suspense by skilful concealment and timely revelation. But he is not only interested in sensational effects; his novels also provide him with canvases—usually large ones—on which he can explore communities, especially those of small New England towns, and evoke the workings of the human mind, particularly when it is subject to terror and fear.

King's first novel, Carrie, was a powerful debut that introduced a number of his key themes. Carrie, bullied by her fanatically religious mother and shunned by her schoolfriends, finds the psychokinetic power she possessed as an infant reviving with her first period. Humiliated at the high school prom night, she takes a terrible revenge, unleashing her psychic wrath to set the town ablaze and bring about many deaths. Carrie combines King's skills as a horror writer with his insights into the feelings of the vulnerable and the abused, and the combination of these two elements recurs in many subsequent novels, giving them a human interest that deepens their horrific aspects. But Carrie is an uncharacteristically short novel; its success allowed King to work on a larger scale with his next book, Salem's Lot. This novel deals with a vampire takeover of a small New England town, and a significant element of its strength comes from the way in which King carefully, almost affectionately, builds up his portrayal of the life of the community. Most of King's later books are long, and while he has been criticized for this, it does enable him to enrich the complexity of his characterization and narrative. Salem's Lot is also significant in that the key protagonist is a writer—and writers, though rather less successful ones than King himself, will feature in a number of his later novels. Indeed his third book, The Shining, is a powerful story of an unsuccessful author spending the winter as a caretaker with his wife and child in an isolated, haunted hotel; he is prone to drunkenness and violence in a way that terrifies his precognitive son, through whose mind some of the most disturbing scenes of the novel are evoked.

A batch of novels followed that moved away from horror and employed more of a mixture of popular genres. The Stand shows the human beings who have survived the ravages of an escaped germ warfare virus setting out to rebuild civilization. Starting as science fiction, it develops into a powerful fantasy that dramatizes the contest between good and evil. The Dead Zone focuses on a young man with precognitive and telepathic powers who determines to kill a politician whom he foresees will begin a nuclear war if he becomes President. Firestarter echoes Carrie in that its protagonist, a little girl called Charlie, has the power to set off fires and is hunted by a mysterious government agency that wants to use her for malign ends, while Cujo features a monstrously transformed St. Bernard dog that menaces a small New England town.

In 1982 King brought out four suspense novellas under the title Different Seasons, the best-known of which is The Shawshank Redemption, where a prisoner unjustly convicted of his wife's murder spends years digging his way out of his cell. 1982 also saw the first novel of the still unfinished "Dark Tower" series, The Gunslinger. Subsequent novels in the series are The Drawing of the Three, The Waste Lands, and Wizard and Glass, and there are perhaps three more novels to come. The series takes its title and some of its symbolism from Robert Browning's complex, sinister Victorian poem "Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came" (1855). Its central character, Roland of Gilead, a gunslinger in a strange, bleak fantasy future with some echoes of our own civilization, is engaged on a quest for the Dark Tower, where he hopes to arrest and possibly to reverse the accelerating destruction of Mid-World. King himself regards this series as a very important work that encompasses the elements of all the other fictional worlds that he has created.

King's horror fiction continued in the 1980s with Pet Sematary, in which pets and people buried in an old Indian burial ground return to life in distorted, savage form, and in which a doctor's attempt to resurrect his dead son has horrific consequences. Christine is about a possessed car, a 1958 Plymouth Fury, that takes over its owners. King collaborated with Peter Straub on the novel The Talisman, which follows a twelve-year old boy on a quest for the Talisman that will save his dying mother, but the styles and narrative techniques of the two writers did not quite gel. In 1986 King returned to his own work with It, which deals once more with a New England town under threat, this time by an evil spirit that lives in its storm-drains and sewers and that a band of children finally destroy. This was followed by the highly praised Misery, in which a writer, badly injured in a car crash, is brought back to life by a woman who insists that he write another book about her favorite character, whom he has previously killed off. A longer, more diffuse novel, The Tommyknockers concerns the finding of a spaceship that sends out vibrations that change the behavior of the citizens of a small town in destructive ways. The Dark Half, like Misery, features a writer who is unable to dispose of a character he has created; Thad Beaumont has written a number of best-selling thrillers under the pseudonym of George Stark, and endowed Stark with a sinister character. But when he tries to kill Stark off, Stark, the "dark half" of his imagination, enters his actual life and starts to murder his friends.

King's books in the 1990s included Four Past Midnight, a collection of novels, of which the most chilling is The Library Policeman, in which a monster that takes the shape of a librarian needs to regenerate itself by feeding off the fears of children and incarnating itself in adult bodies. In Needful Things, a devilish shopkeeper creates conflict among the townsfolk of Castle Rock by offering to gratify their most private desires. Gerald's Game is a tormented, claustrophobic novel in which a wife left handcuffed to a bed in a bondage game, after her husband has died of a heart attack, has to relive an experience of being abused by her father in order to survive. In Dolores Claiborne, a companion housekeeper tells the story of her troubled relationship with an almost insane crippled widow whom she looked after, while Rose Madder follows the trail of a woman who flees from a murderous husband, enters a picture to discover her own powers of resistance, and later persuades her husband to get into the picture, where he effectively murders himself—a remarkable combination of thriller and fantasy elements. Desperation, like The Stand, dramatizes the battle between good and evil, this time in a desolate Nevada town. The protagonist of Bag of Bones is again an author, suffering from writer's block after his wife's death, who returns to their lakeside retreat and starts to uncover dark secrets, while The Green Mile focuses on a strange prisoner awaiting execution for two brutal murders. Hearts in Atlantis comprises five interlinked stories that run from 1960 to 1999 and explore the continuing impact of the 1960s and the Vietnam War. King's greatest achievement of the 1990s, however, is Insomnia, with its harrowing descriptions of an acute form of sleeplessness that produces the power of transcendent vision in an elderly man who, in a town riven by battles over abortion, has to restore the balance between the "Purpose," which ends human lives at the appropriate time, and the "Random," which can cut the thread of life at whim.

King was struck by a car and seriously injured in June 1999, and for a time it seemed that he might be unable to go on writing. However, he has recently enjoyed success with the publication, in electronic form, of the novella Riding the Bullet. Many of his books have been filmed, though the results have rarely met with his approval. His huge output and immense popularity have proved barriers to sustained critical consideration of his work in the past, but now that literary and cultural criticism has broadened its scope to take in popular writing, there is a growing volume of analysis of King as a cultural phenomenon and of the structural and stylistic qualities of his fiction. While the standard of his work is variable, and he can sometimes fall back on the stock devices and images of the horror or fantasy writer, his writing at its best demonstrates a vivid style and a capacity for imaginative penetration into dark and disturbing areas of human psychology that place him in a tradition of American novelists that includes Charles Brockden Brown, Nathaniel Hawthorne, and Edgar Allan Poe.

-Nicolas Tredell

KING, Thomas

Nationality: Canadian citizen. Born: Sacramento, California, 24 April 1943. Career: Currently Chair of American Indian Studies, University of Minnesota.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Medicine River. Toronto, Penguin, 1989.A Coyote Columbus Story. Toronto, Douglas and McIntyre, 1992.Green Grass, Running Water. Toronto, HarperPerennial, and Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1993.

Truth and Bright Water. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 2000.

Short Stories

One Good Story, That One. Toronto, HarperPerennial, 1993.

* * *

In Canada, Thomas King is well known as an author of fiction; as the straightman side kick in a weekly radio show he also writes called "The Dead Dog Café Comedy Hour" on national public radio; and as an associate professor of English literature at the University of Guelph. The three sides of Thomas King are not as far apart as they might seem: King addresses native issues through satire and humor in his novels, his radio show, and classes. Introduced in his second novel, Green Grass, Running Water, The Dead Dog Café, with a neon sign of a dog in a stewpot, is a tourist trap that capitalizes on the appetite of non-native tourists for consumption of stereotypes about indigenous peoples. In his first two novels, Medicine River and Green Grass, Running Water, particularly, King relies on the humor generated by the subversion of expectation to combat stereotypes and normalize the quotidian elements of life of the Native Canadian. Blanca Chester argues that ultimately, "King's novel shows how First Nations storytelling continues to theorize the world through a Native literature written in English." King retells the stories of history (through non-linear, overlapping versions of stories) from new perspectives as he attacks the cultural icons of patriarchal settler society by obliquely critiquing materialism, capitalism, and neoimperialism. He does all this through an almost lighthearted circular storytelling style. King's writing often seems to contain a dialogue between storyteller and audience, between theories of postcoloniality and native modes of narration, and between traditional stories and popular culture. As King says of Harry Robinson's work, the stories resist being read silently. They recreate the sense of an oral storytelling in a written form.

King's fiction explores what it means to be native in a predominantly white culture. However, his writing does not simply separate native elements from a corrupt white influence or mythologize native life, strategies that tend to create dehumanizing stereotypes of indigenous peoples as members of a "vanishing race" or as "noble savages." Rather, King sees the native experience as hybrid. King himself is of Greek and Cherokee descent, and he appears to understand ethnicity as an inherently unstable set of self-created fictions, to be treated ironically rather than merely accepted. His writing is playfully satiric; with broad humor he debunks both white and native misconceptions of native life. King's native person plays a dual role, at once participant and critic, a member of mainstream society and social misfit. His satire hinges on this duality, with its troubling, comic contradictions.

In Green Grass, Running Water, more than his other novels, King engages with the myth of Canada as an empty wilderness, and the subsequent myths of the ''Indians'' (the term King uses so he can ''talk about Native people in general'') in a ''Cowboy and Indian''-dominated Western landscape. One of the pivotal moments in the novel is when the ending of a popular Western film is revised so that the Indians win and kill John Wayne. The novel highlights the fact that First Nations people have often been constructed in Hollywood movies and Western books as artifacts and commodities or have been romanticized. King's satire is perhaps sharpest in the novel in the depiction of Portland, a Native man who goes to Hollywood to become an actor in Westerns but who must don a fake nose because he does not look "Indian enough." Through Portland, King tackles the notions of falsely constructed identity and performative ethnicity. Before he can act in the movies he must go through an initiation into Hollywood culture by dancing in a strip show. He dances an almost pornographic dance with Pocahontas, during which a cowboy dancer comes on stage and defeats him, the Indian. In the end, however, Portland has a moment of triumph, after several moments of humiliation, when he is transformed into the Chief who leads the Indians into victory over the cowboys in the revised film.

While King has been criticized for glossing over, or sentimentalizing, the "real" issues of native life in America and Canada instead of creating a realistic portrait of the everyday problems of alcoholism, suicide, and poverty, he argues that he is simply presenting a positive portrait of those often depicted as oppressed and down-trodden. In a sense, his work acts as a normalizing corrective to both the representation of negative stereotypes of native people and to the "issue"dominated genre of fiction by several other Native North American writers. His characters are not drawn according to type, nor as political mouthpieces, and, indeed, they often defy both stereotype and polemics. In Medicine River, for instance, one of the central characters, Louise Heavyman, is an accountant and a single mother by choice—not by accident and not as a feminist maneuver. In the naming of Louise's daughter "South Wing," after the area in the hospital in which the child is born, we can see the humor with which King combines "Indian" and white symbolism. South Wing is a hybrid character. Like Will, the internationally acclaimed photographer and mediocre basketball player, South Wing defies categorization and expectation. The native person in King's work often acts as a detached observer, pointing with amazement and disbelief to the selfinterested behavior within North American culture. Lionel James, one of many storytellers who inhabit Medicine River, is mystified by what he calls this "crazy world." He can not understand why people want to fly him to Japan to recite, and he worries about his audiences "living in the past like that," listening to other people's "old" stories instead of making up their own.

While Green Grass, Running Water is written as a story cycle in the vein of an Aboriginal oral tradition cloaked in satire, and Medicine River is a more linear satirical novel, King's subsequent novel, Truth and Bright Water, is a simpler coming-of-age tragedy. Unlike Medicine River and Green Grass, Running Water, in this novel the fact that the characters are native is almost incidental to the story. Set in the American border town of Truth and the Canadian town across the river, Bright Water, the novel is the story of two cousins, a dog, and an artist returning home. The boys search for the identity of a human skull found in the river between the two towns. In the process they come to terms with their own positions in the community. Perhaps the most engaging element of the novel concerns the return of Monroe Swimmer, "famous Indian artist," to Truth. He paints a church into the prairie landscape to such an extent that not even he can find its door. He also (re)populates the prairie with iron statues of buffalo. In the end, we learn that Monroe is responsible for the skull in the river as he repatriates "Indians" to the land from which they were taken. Truth and Bright Water may not have the lyricism or the magic of Green Grass, Running Water, but it does have a cast of characters who illicit strong readerly responses in their acts of betrayal and reconciliation, love and death, and an ending that will draw even skeptics to tears.

-Kevin McNeilly, updated by Laura Moss

KINGSLEY, Johanna

See PERUTZ, Kathrin

KINGSOLVER, Barbara

Nationality: American. Born: Annapolis, Maryland, 8 April 1955. Education: DePauw University, B.A. 1977; University of Arizona, M.S. 1981; additional graduate study. Family: Married Joseph Hoffmann in 1985 (divorced); one daughter. Career: Research assistant in department of physiology, University of Arizona, Tucson, 1977–79, technical writer in office of arid lands studies, 1981–85; freelance journalist, 1985–87; full-time writer, 1987—; book reviewer, 1988—. Awards: Feature-writing award (Arizona Press Club), 1986; American Library Association award, 1988, 1990; citation of accomplishment from United Nations National Council of Women, 1989; PEN fiction prize, 1991; Edward Abbey Ecofiction Award, 1991; Woodrow Wilson Foundation/Lila Wallace fellow, 1992–93; D.Litt., DePauw University, 1994. Agent: Frances Goldin, 305 East 11th Street, New York, New York 10003, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Bean Trees. New York, Harper, 1988.

Animal Dreams. New York, Harper, 1990.

Pigs in Heaven. New York, HarperCollins, 1993.

The Poisonwood Bible. New York, HarperFlamingo, 1998.

Short Stories

Homeland and Other Stories. New York, Harper, 1989.

Poetry

Another America/Otra America (with Spanish translations by Rebeca Cartes). Seal Beach, California, Seal Press, 1992.

Other

Holding the Line: Women in the Great Arizona Mine Strike of 1983 (nonfiction). Ithaca, New York, ILR Press, 1989; with new introduction, 1996.

High Tide in Tucson: Essays from Now or Never. New York, HarperCollins, 1995.

Contributor, Rebirth of Power, edited by P. Portwood, M. Gorcey, and P. Sanders. Mother Courage Press, 1987.

Contributor, Florilegia, an Anthology of Art and Literature by Women, edited by M. Donnelly. Calyx Books, 1987.

Contributor, New Stories from the South: The Year's Best, 1988, edited by Shannon Ravenel. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1988.

Contributor, I've Always Meant to Tell You: Letters to Our Mothers, An Anthology of Contemporary Women Writers, edited by Constance Warlow. Pocket Books, 1997. Contributor, The Eloquent Essay: An Anthology of Classic and Creative Nonfiction from the Twentieth Century, edited by John Loughery. New York, Persea Books, 1999.

Introduction, Off the Beaten Path: Stories of Place, edited by Joseph Barbato and Lisa Weinerman Horak. New York, North Point Press, 1998.

*

Critical Studies: Tell It on the Mountain: Appalachian Women Writers (sound recording), Whitesburg, Kentucky, WMMT-FM, 1995; Barbara Kingsolver: A Critical Companion by Mary Jean DeMarr, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1999.

* * *

Barbara Kingsolver's novels emerge as answers to implicitly embedded "very big" questions that she devises in hopes that she might "shift the world a little bit on its axis." Rising from her unwavering commitments to social justice, her novels, as well as her nonfiction, address political issues such as Western colonialism, cultural imperialism; disappearing cultures, particularly of Africans and Native Americans; class and economics; nature and ecology; along with race and gender issues. Not a preacher, Kingsolver skillfully weaves her political ideologies into the fabric of her fiction, often subtly enlightening her reader through educating a character. She first creates a detailed world right down to the appropriate flowers, and then invents characters who, through interaction with one another and the setting, answer her devised question.

In The Bean Trees, Kingsolver's question probes how friendship and community sustain and assist people through periods of great difficulty. Spurning a predictable life of early pregnancy, spunky Marietta Greer flees Pittman, Kentucky, renames herself Taylor in Illinois, ironically has thrust upon her a Native American infant in Oklahoma, and halts in Tucson. In this bildungsroman, reworked from a woman's point of view, Taylor's rich Kentucky voice introduces the new community and family she fashions for herself. With its "instant motherhood" and multitude of problems, Taylor's new life collides with social injustices. Forced to seek medical treatment and then social services for the withdrawn, abused infant Turtle, so named for her tenacious clinging, Taylor learns of the physical and emotional aftermath of child abuse. Through her activist employer Mattie, she meets and grows to love Estevan and Esperanza, illegal aliens, and thus learns of political unrest, torture, and disappeared ones in Guatemala. With her housemate Lou Ann Ruiz, a new mother whose husband has left her, Taylor redefines family. Through Kingsolver's gradual revelations, Taylor matures to greater selfassurance and political sophistication; thus without hesitation she aids her Guatemalan friends to safely relocate and secures fraudulent adoption papers for Turtle.

The prize-winning sequel Pigs in Heaven, Kingsolver's third novel, catches up with Taylor and Turtle several years later. Here Kingsolver's motivation is to explore the complications created when the beliefs and needs of an individual and a community clash, in this instance the illegally adopted child Turtle and the Cherokee Indian Nation, represented by lawyer Annawake Fourkiller of Heaven, Oklahoma. At issue is the removal, through adoption by white families, of Native American children from their people and culture.

Dedicated to multiple points of view, Kingsolver uses the novel's title to illustrate different ways of seeing and telling things. Annawake relates her tribal myth of the "Six Bad Boys" who are changed into "The Six Pigs in Heaven." She interprets this Cherokee variation of the Pleiades or Seven Sisters as meaning "Do right by your people." A white man's credo might be "Do right by yourself." These incompatible value systems of individualism versus community and tradition provide the conflict for the plot, which some have criticized as too coincidental and manipulated with too many settings.

One of the glaring manipulations brings together Taylor's mother Alice Stamper Greer, who appeared in the previous novel only in phone conversations, and Turtle's Cherokee Grandfather, Cash Stillwater. In an effort to help Taylor, Alice travels to Heaven where she joins her cousin, Sugar Boss, who introduces Alice to the Cherokee community and explains its traditions and history, such as the Trail of Tears, the stomp dance, and the Indian Child Welfare Act. Not surprisingly, the affection between Alice and Cash helps resolve the conflict and by novel's end, a matured Taylor returns to Tucson committed to a family with Jax, her rock musician boyfriend, and Turtle, for whom she now shares custody with Pop-Pop Stillwater, her new stepfather.

Kingsolver's fiction is not autobiographical. Her characters are what she calls "complex conglomerates" based on features that she has carefully observed or experienced. Her second novel, Animal Dreams, illustrates this point. The strong Mexican-American women she interviewed while researching the nonfiction Holding the Line provided the models for the novel's Emelina Domingos and the elder women of the Stitch and Bitch Club; in addition, their remote southern Arizona villages outlined the novel's Grace, Arizona, a fictionalized town set in a nurturing yet dying landscape. Intrigued by why individuals either engage or detach themselves from life, to dramatize the answer Kingsolver creates undirected, passive Codi Noline and her idealistic younger sister Hallie, who has gone to Nicaragua to teach crop management. Codi returns to Grace to teach high school and care for her Alzheimer's-stricken father, Homer, the respected town doctor. His short narrations brilliantly capture his wandering mind's inability to determine present from past. Through his confused flashbacks and Codi's incomplete memories, eventually filled in by women in the community, Kingsolver provides partial answers to her fundamental question about engagement.

Citing Doris Lessing's "Children of Violence" series as an influence, Kingsolver believes that writing is a form of political activism; thus, she readily accepts the classification of "political novelist"; however, author Jane Smiley criticizes Kingsolver for packing Animal Dreams with too many issues—Native Americans, U.S. involvement in Nicaragua, parental relationships, acculturation, environmental issues, loss and grief, anti-violence, women taking charge. And again, although integral to the character development and plot, some of the political issues lead to predictable outcomes. Hallie is kidnapped, tortured, and murdered in Nicaragua; numbed by this loss, Codi mounts a national campaign to first rescue and, then, memorialize her sister. Loyd Peregrina, the father of teenaged Codi's miscarried child and now her adult, supportive lover, proves to be unmarred emotionally from the death of his twin brother, perhaps because of his loving matriarchal family. After Codi succeeds as an offbeat teacher whose students discover the silent environmental catastrophe of the town's "dead" river, her lecture to the Stitch and Bitch Club sparks the women to fight the mining company's plan to build a dam and, thus, flood the town and cover up their culpability. Raising money through selling piñatas as folk art, they succeed.

All of Kingsolver's novels portray women taking charge, many narrating their own success stories of personal growth through political involvement. In fact, her novels are often labeled "chick books," implying that they are written for women and, hence, seemingly about unimportant issues. The Poisonwood Bible put this unfortunate assumption to rest.

This long-awaited novel grew from Kingsolver's brief childhood experience in Africa as well as the 1991 short story "My Father's Africa," but was developed through extensive research (the novel contains a bibliography) and a careful reading of the King James Bible. Within the Bible, Kingsolver found the novel's structure, leitmotif, cadences, and vocabulary for the vivid voices who narrate their missionary family's experiences in Kilanga, Belgian Congo. Set on the eve of Zaire's independence, Africa, as the catalyst in irrevocably shaping and changing lives, becomes a character in the novel, reminiscent of Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness. Historical incidents, such as Patrice Lumumba's assassination and Mobutu's betrayal through complicity with the CIA, play out as background to the Price family's destruction by a land that they completely misunderstand in a village where they are not trusted. The novel's brilliance originates in Kingsolver's stunning development of characters through language. Through first-person narration, five female voices provide the shifting points of view that develop the complex portrait of their family, headed by an evangelical Baptist Reverend, the smugly superior, abusive Nathan Price. Although never a narrator in his own story, Nathan is nevertheless fully developed by narratives of his wife and four daughters.

One of Kingsolver's constant reference books was K. E. Laman's Dictionnaire Kikongo-Français, a Kikongo-French dictionary that she read daily to grasp the "music and subtlety of this amazing African language, with its infinite capacity for being misunderstood and mistranslated." Characteristically, as with Pigs in Heaven, she uses her accumulated knowledge of another culture to enrich the novel's title as well as reveal Nathan's character. In Kikongo, "bangala," pronounced one way, describes something very precious; pronounced slightly differently it refers to the deadly poisonwood tree, whose woodsmoke can kill. Stubborn Nathan Price insists on preaching "Tata Jesus is 'bangala," complete with mispronunciation so that he insists, "Jesus is poisonwood." Ironically, his fierce, strict interpretation of the Bible coupled with his arrogant superiority poisons his very mission in Africa.

Another research tool was a pile of popular magazines. Kingsolver used them to attune her ear to the language of the Price teenagers. Rachel, a shallow, self-centered fifteen year old, walks right out of the beauty advertisements in Look and Life of the late 1950s. Her voice provides some comic relief to the family's nightmarish situation. A second playful voice is that of Adah, a mute twin suffering from hemiplegia but who thinks in palindromes and quotes Emily Dickinson. Readers are amused by Rachel, but they gravitate to the other twin, Leah, as she struggles to understand Africa; eventually Leah becomes a part of the continent by marrying her father's interpreter, the revolutionary Anatole, and living in Angola with their four sons. The childish voice of Ruth May, who parrots overheard discussions, is stilled by her death, then seen as senseless, in Africa in 1961; that tragedy provides the impetus for the girls' mother, Orleanna, to gather her three remaining daughters and flee the village, leaving Nathan to his own increasingly insane devices.

Kingsolver moves the novel into the mid-1980s in the introspective sixth section, titled "Song of the Three Children," from the Apocrypha, which exposes the adult sisters' views of one another at a reunion and as they discuss their father's awful death in Africa and update their mother's new life in Georgia. Orleanna's voice opens the novel, reconstructing an African picnic. By partially addressing the reader with an invitation to become the conscience and the eyes in the trees of the African forest and partially addressing Ruth May, long buried in African soil, Orleanna seeks some insight into her responsibility for the destruction of her family as well the international issue of the West's destruction of Africa. By the novel's epilogue, "The Eyes in the Trees," a symbolic Ruth May eerily speaks of forgiveness and understanding as muntu Africa—"all that is here."

Appearing on best-seller lists for months and hailed for its rich style and language, fully fleshed out, believable characters and complex plot woven through with political issues such as social injustice, colonial occupation, and genocide, The Poisonwood Bible drew inevitable comparisons with novels by Lessing and Nadine Gordimer. Following their lead, Kingsolver will no doubt continue to speak out to contemporary issues through her fiction. By establishing the Bellwether prize, awarded for literature that supports social responsibility, Kingsolver guarantees that others will follow her lead.

-Judy Kohl

KINGSTON, Maxine Hong

Nationality: American. Born: Maxine Ting Ting Hong, Stockton, California, 27 October 1940. Education: University of California, Berkeley, A.B. 1962, teaching certificate, 1965. Family: Married Earll Kingston in 1962; one son. Career: Teacher of English and mathmatics, Sunset High School, Hayward, California, 1965-67; teacher of English, Kahuku High School, Hawaii, 1967; teacher, Kahaluu Drop-In School, 1968; teacher of English as a second language, Honolulu Business College, Hawaii, 1969; teacher of language arts, Kailua High School, Hawaii, 1969, and Mid-Pacific Institute, Honolulu, 1970-77. Since 1977 visiting associate professor of English, University of Hawaii, Honolulu. Awards: National Book Critics Circle award, 1976, for nonfiction; Mademoiselle award, 1977; Anisfiel-Wolf Race Relations award, 1978; National Education Association writing fellowship, 1980; American Book award, 1981, for nonfiction; Arts Commission award, 1981; Hawaii Award for Literature, 1982; California Governor's Award, 1989; Major Book Collection Award, Brandeis University, 1990; Award for Literature, American Academy & Institute for Arts & Letters, 1990; Lila Wallace Reader's Digest Writing Award, 1992; Special Achievement, Oakland Business Arts award, 1994; Cyril Magnin Award for Outstanding Achievement in the Arts, 1996; Distinguished Artists Award, the Music Center of L.A. County, 1996; National Humanities Medal, NEH, 1997; Fred Cody Lifetime Achievement Award, 1998; John Dos Passos Prize for Literature, 1998; Ka Palapola Po'okela Award, 1999; Profiles of Courage Honor, Swords to Plowshares, 1999. Honorary doctorate, Eastern Michigan University, 1988; Colby College, 1990; Brandeis University, 1991; University of Massachusetts, 1991. Named Living Treasure Hawaii, 1980; Woman of the Year, Asian Pacific Women's Network, 1981. Address: University of California, Department of English, 322 Wheeler Hall, Berkeley, California 94720-1030, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Tripmaster Monkey, His Fake Book. New York, Knopf, and London, Pan, 1989.

Hawaii One Summer. Honolulu, University of Hawaii Press, 1998.

Other

The Woman Warrior: Memoirs of a Girlhood Among Ghosts. New York, Knopf, 1976; London, Allen Lane, 1977.

China Men. New York, Knopf, 1980; London, Pan, 1981.

The Making of More Americans. Honolulu, Hawaii, InterArts, 1980.
Through the Black Curtain. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1987.

Conversations with Maxine Hong Kingston, edited by Paul Skenazy and Tera Martin. Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1998.

*

Critical Studies: Approaches to Teaching Kingston's 'The Woman Warrior' edited by Shirley Geok-Lim, New York, Modern Language Association of America, 1991; Articulate Silences: Hisaye Yamamoto, Maxine Hong Kingston, Joy Kogawa by King-Kok Chueng, Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1993; Stories of Resilience in Childhood: The Narratives of Maya Angelou, Maxine Hong Kingston, Richard Rodrigues, John Edgar Wideman, and Tobias Wolff by Daniel D. Challener, New York, Garland, 1997; The Female Bildungsroman by Toni Morrison and Maxine Hong Kingston: A Postmodern Reading by Pin-chia Feng, New York, P. Lang, 1998; Critical Essays on Maxine Hong Kingston edited by Laura E. Skandera-Trombley, New York, G.K. Hall, 1998; In Her Mother's House: the Politics of Asian American Mother-Daughter Writing by Wendy Ho, Walnut Creek, AltaMira Press, 1999; Maxine Hong Kingston by Diane Simmons, New York, Twayne Publishers, 1999; Asian-American Authors by Kathy Ishizuka, Berkeley Heights, New Jersey, Enslow Publishers, 2000; Maxine Hong Kingston: A Critical Companion by E.D. Huntley, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 2000.

* * *

Myth, legend, history, and biography are so seamlessly blended in Maxine Hong Kingston's books that it is often difficult to know how to categorize them. Are The Woman Warrior: Memoirs of a Girlhood Among Ghosts and China Men works of non-fiction? Officially, they are cataloged as such, but in the deepest sense of reader's experience they seem more akin to fairy tales, folkloric stories, even epic poems. Based on the history and myth passed on to Kingston by members of her immediate family, as well by "story-talkers" in the Stockton, California, community where she grew up, the result is a species of magical realism, one that continually hovers between fact and the imagination, between what was and what might have been.

Kingston regards The Woman Warrior and China Men as a single large book, despite the fact that they were published separately.

Moreover, she often confuses, willfully or no, family members who actually lived with those she invents. This penchant for blurring the distinctions between the actual and the invented has occasioned some criticism, especially among those who feel that Kingston plays fast and loose with history, but most reviewer-critics showered her with praise.

No doubt categories matter when one is handing out literary prizes (both The Woman Warrior and China Men received awards for general excellence in non-fiction), and the confusion of actuality and invention may be worth quarreling about, but what matters finally are the stories themselves—and they are quite good. Indeed, one would be hard-pressed to think of books that detail the joys and pains of growing up within a strictly defined ethnic community that could match Kingston's sentence for sentence, paragraph for paragraph, page for page. She is, quite simply, a marvelous writer.

Moreover, Kingston so experiments with form that the result is a species of algebra: stories that interlock or comment on each other; life lessons that creep inextricably out of mythic depths; and perhaps most of all, an eerie sense of that the burdens of the past rest securely on the shoulders of those in the present. Kingston herself straddles two vibrant worlds, each as menacing as it is mysterious.

The Woman Warrior is dominated by Kingston's mother (Brave Orchid, in the book) and the other women of China—ghosts of the heart, all—who formed her sensibility and willed her strength. By contrast, China Men focuses on the man who labored for fifteen years in a laundry to pay for Brave Orchid's passage. The books beg to be read as a inseparable pair, as yin and yang are seen as opposite sides of a unified principle.

In Kingston's culture, it is the women who use story as a means to understanding and survival. By contrast, Chinese men tend toward silence, which forces Kingston to invent multiple versions of what may have happened in her father's past. No doubt some must have wondered if Kingston could write as penetratingly about men as she clearly did about women, especially given the restricted circumstances under which Chinese women traditionally functioned. The worries, however, were unfounded, for the effect of China Men is as riveting as it is daring.

As for Wittman Ah Sing, the male protagonist of Tripmaster Monkey: His Fake Book, one can hardly get him to shut up. A typical rant has him complaining frenetically about "F.O.B." or "fresh off the boat" immigrants from Asia, and at various places in the book, he jumps around and chatters and generally moves so fast it is hard to follow him. Named—perhaps—after Walt Whitman, Wittman represents an ancient archetype not only of Chinese but of world literature, best known to Western readers through personae such as Loki, the Norse god of mischief. In Kingston's skillful hands, myth is not only a source of refuge and inspiration, but also of power. Thus she works not as a professional Sinologist—one factor that contributes to the antipathy toward her on the part of ethnic stalwarts such as Frank Chin, who insists on calling himself a "Chinaman" rather than Chinese—but as a creative writer operating in a world tradition. The result is the construction of a deeper truth than facts normally allow. Kingston's extraordinary books remind us that what James Joyce, an Irishman on the other side of the world, set out to accomplish when his protagonist set off to forge on the smithy of his soul "the uncreated conscience of my race" can also happen when a young Chinese-American writer sets out to discover who she is amid the rich tapestry of memory and the imagination.

KINSELLA, W(illiam) P(atrick)

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Edmonton, Alberta, 25 May 1935. Education: Eastwood High School, Edmonton, graduated 1953; University of Victoria, British Columbia, B.A. in creative writing 1974; University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1976–78, M.F.A. 1978. Family: Married 1) Myrna Salls in 1957, two children; 2) Mildred Clay in 1965 (divorced 1978); 3) Ann Knight in 1978 (divorced 1997). Career: Clerk, Government of Alberta, 1954-56, and manager, Retail Credit Co., 1956-61, both Edmonton; account executive, City of Edmonton, 1961-67; owner, Caesar's Italian Village restaurant, 1967-72, editor, Martlet, 1973-74, and cab driver, 1974-76, all Victoria, British Columbia; assistant professor of English, University of Calgary, Alberta, 1978-83. Since 1983 full-time writer. Awards: Edmonton Journal prize, 1966; Canadian Fiction award, 1976; Alberta Achievement award, 1982; Houghton Mifflin Literary fellowship, 1982; Books in Canada prize, 1982; Canadian Authors Association prize, 1983; Leacock medal, for humor, 1987; Vancouver Writing award, 1987, Order of Canada, 1994. Named Author of Year, Canadian Library Association, 1987. D.Litt., Laurentian University, Sudbury, 1990; University of Victoria, 1991. Address: 9442 Nowell, Chilliwack, British Columbia, Canada, V2P 4X7.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Shoeless Joe. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1982; London, Allison and Busby, 1988.

The Iowa Baseball Confederacy. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1986.Box Socials. Toronto, HarperCollins, 1991; New York, Ballantine, 1992.

The Winter Helen Dropped By. Toronto, HarperCollins, 1995. If Wishes Were Horses. Toronto, HarperCollins, 1996. Magic Time. Toronto, Doubleday Canada, 1998.

Short Stories

Dance Me Outside. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1977; Boston, Godine, 1986.

Scars. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1978.

Shoeless Joe Jackson Comes to Iowa. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1980; Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1993.

Born Indian. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1981.

The Ballad of the Public Trustee. Vancouver, Standard, 1982.

The Moccasin Telegraph and Other Indian Tales. Toronto, Penguin, 1983; Boston, Godine, 1984; London, Arrow, 1985.

The Thrill of the Grass. Toronto and London, Penguin, 1984; New York, Viking, 1985.

The Alligator Report. Minneapolis, Coffee House Press, 1985.

The Fencepost Chronicles. Toronto, Collins, 1986; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1987.

Red Wolf, Red Wolf. Toronto, Collins, 1987; Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1990.

Five Stories. Vancouver, Hoffer, 1987.

The Further Adventures of Slugger McBatt. Toronto, Collins, and Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1988.

The Miss Hobbema Pageant. Toronto, Harper Collins, 1989.

The Dixon Cornbelt League and Other Baseball Stories. Toronto, HarperCollins, 1993.

Brother Frank's Gospel Hour, and Other Stories. Toronto, HarperCollins, 1994; Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1996.

Go the Distance: Baseball Stories. Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1995.

The Secret of the Northern Lights. Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, Thistledown Press, 1998.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "These Changing Times" (as Felicien Belzile), in Civil Service Bulletin (Edmonton), vol. 35, no. 9, October 1955.
- "I Walk Through the Valley" (as Felicien Belzile), in Civil Service Bulletin (Edmonton), vol. 36, no. 1, January 1956.
- "I Was a Teen-age Slumlord," in Edmonton Journal, 27 May 1966.
- "Hofstadt's Cabin," in Edmonton Journal, 14 June 1966.
- "The Jackhammer," in Edmonton Journal, 24 June 1966.
- "Something Evil This Way Comes," in Edmonton Journal, September 1966.
- "Night People Never Come Back," in Martlet (Victoria, British Columbia), 10 February 1972.
- "White Running Shoes," in View from the Silver Bridge, vol. 2, no. 1, May 1972.
- "Children of the Cartomancy," in Martlet (Victoria, British Columbia), November 1972.
- "Does Anyone Know How They Make Campaign Buttons?," in Karaki (Victoria, British Columbia), January 1973.
- "Broken Dolls" (as Leslie Smith), in Martlet (Victoria, British Columbia), Fall 1973.
- "The Snow Leprechaun," in This Week (Coquitlam, British Columbia), 9 March 1974.
- "Famines" (as Angie Jean Jerome), in Martlet (Victoria, British Columbia), Spring 1974.
- "A Literary Passage at Arms; or, TX vs. BK," in Iowa City Creative Reading Series Magazine, Spring-Summer 1977.
- "The Elevator," in Canadian Fiction (Vancouver), nos. 40–41, 1981.
- "Intermediaries," in Scrivener (Montreal), Spring 1982.

Poetry

Rainbow Warehouse, with Ann Knight. Lawrencetown Beach, Nova Scotia, Potterfield Press, 1989.

Other

Two Spirits Soaring: The Art of Allen Sapp, The Inspiration of Allan Ganor. Toronto, Stoddart, 1990.

The First and Last Annual Six Towns Area Old Timers' Baseball Game, with wood engravings by Gaylord Schanilec. Minneapolis, Coffee House Press, 1991.

Even at This Distance (with Ann Knight). Lawrencetown Beach, Nova Scotia, Pottersfield Press, 1994.

*

Bibliographies: W.P. Kinsella: A Partially-Annotated Bibliographic Checklist (1953–1983) by Ann Knight, Iowa City, Across, 1983.

Manuscript Collections: National Library of Canada, Ottawa.

Critical Studies: "Down and Out in Montreal, Windsor, and Wetaskiwin" by Anthony Brennan, in Fiddlehead (Fredericton, New Brunswick), Fall 1977; "Don't Freeze Off Your Leg" Spring 1979, and "Say It Ain't So, Joe" Spring-Summer 1981, both by Frances W. Kaye, in Prairie Schooner (Lincoln, Nebraska); article by Brian E. Burtch, in Canadian Journal of Sociology (Edmonton), Winter 1980; essay by Anne Blott, in Fiddlehead (Fredericton, New Brunswick), July 1982; Marjorie Retzleff, in NeWest Review (Edmonton), October 1984; "Search for the Unflawed Diamond" by Don Murray, in NeWest Review (Edmonton), January 1985; The Fiction of W.P. Kinsella: Tall Tales in Various Voices by Don Murray, Fredericton, New Brunswick, York Press, 1987.

* * *

Before the publication of his best-known novel, W.P. Kinsella had already written extensively about baseball in four short story collections. Shoeless Joe (filmed as Field of Dreams) is preeminently a paean to baseball as it was once played when it was the national pastime, before inflated salaries, players' disputes, and artificial turf. The novel is almost studiously old-fashioned in its unabashed lyricism and unmitigated affirmation of life and love. Shoeless Joe has nothing in common with either the modernist or postmodernist traditions, and very little with the realist tradition. It posits the possibility of achieving the Whitmanesque dream, but denies that Democratic Vistas had ever been written. Its antecedent is J.D. Salinger's The Catcher in the Rye, but only Holden Caulfield's vision of a world redeemed through his sister Phoebe's innocence. Shoeless Joe is, in many ways, a plea for a return to the Edenic dream in which the serpent appears only to be crushed. Although Kinsella's novel often seems to be all surface, it can be read on the levels of love story, tall tale, and myth.

Shoeless Joe affirms the absolute redemptive power of human love. Ray Kinsella, the narrator and main character, makes love to his wife Annie who "sings to me, love songs in tongues, bird songs thrilling and brilliant as morning," and he marvels that he "can love her so much ... that [their] love puts other things in perspective." (The reader may suspect that Kinsella owes more to E.E. Cummings's views of love and his detestation of technology than he does to any novelist.) Above all, baseball has the power to unite in love those estranged by time and emotional distance. Eddie Scissons, an old player, advised Ray that to be reconciled with his dead father he must realize that they "both love the game. Make that your common ground, and nothing else will matter."

But it is baseball mythologized and raised to the levels of magic and religion that has the transcendent power. As a Moses of the midwest, Ray hears a voice tell him 'If you build it, he will come;' the 'he' is Shoeless Joe Jackson, a member of the infamous 1919 Black Sox team that fixed the World Series. So bidden, Ray erects a baseball stadium, replete with bleachers and lights, on his Iowa farm, which is soon peopled with the entire Chicago team that nightly play their opponents on a field of planted grass, undefiled by the artificial turf of modern playing fields. But only those who firmly believe in magic and love the game can see the players or the action, when "all the cosmic tumblers have clicked into place and the universe appears for a few seconds, or hours, and shows you what is possible." Ray's twin brother, Richard, is not privy to the shades because his "eyes are blind to the magic," and he must ask Ray to "teach me how to see."

At times Kinsella puts too great a burden on baseball's redemptive power by giving it too many of the trappings of religion and myth. J.D. Salinger (whom Ray, obeying the voice, has kidnapped from his home in New Hampshire, and who soon becomes Ray's mythic accomplice) eulogizes that people will "watch the game, and it will be as if they have knelt in front of a faith healer, or dipped themselves in magic waters where a saint once rose like a serpent and cast benedictions to the wind like peach petals." Playing baseball is like being "engaged in a pagan ceremony," and as Eddie "Kid" Scissons says, "I know there are many who are troubled, anxious, worried, insecure. What is the cure? ... The answer is in the word, and baseball is the word," and those who heed the message "will be changed by the power of the living word." The game becomes too freighted with symbolism to survive the attributions. Then there is the question of evil, which in this Garden takes two forms. One is Ray's wife's brother who contrives to buy Ray's land and plans to turn it into part of a vast computerized farm, destroying the stadium and playing field. Needless to say, his brother-in-law is foiled; technology cannot prevail against the pastoral ideal. The second is Eddie Scissons who has lied about his baseball triumphs and is punished by striking out in a game he is allowed to play as a returned youth; the serpent head cane he fondles is too intrusive and obvious a symbol.

But Shoeless Joe has a great many strengths, in particular its sustained lyricism and Kinsella's love for the literal game and its authentic rituals. It is worth noting that in his recent short story collection The Thrill of the Grass Kinsella continues to write about baseball; his lyricism is unabated, but he usually avoids the excesses that mar Shoeless Joe.

In The Iowa Baseball Confederacy, much of the same imagery of magic and religion recurs. Gideon Clarke finds himself inspired by the presence of his absent father to carry the family tradition forward and prove to the historians and to the Chicago Cubs that the Confederacy did exist. Matthew, the father, dreams a wife named Maudie who steps out of a carnival side show and into his life at least long enough to produce Gideon, whose shoulder-length white hair and strange blue eyes set him apart in the same way that his father was set apart even before the lightning bolt struck him during his first contact with Maudie. These characters continue the tradition of ''being dipped in magic waters'' that offer healing to a modern world through the ritual of baseball. The stakes of the game are high here: the losers will be consigned to everlasting oblivion. Of course, there is the suggestion that baseball is eternal, and the winners will bask in it forever.

Box Socials, a strong affirmation of love, is set in rural Canada, outside Edmonton. The central hero is one who does not quite make it in the big leagues, but he is admired in his community. All the families take box lunches to church socials, and their social lives are centered around the activity. Kinsella offers a generous portrait of rural Alberta, some touching pictures of life out on the plains.

Throughout Kinsella's work, there is a refreshing belief that love is possible and that life is good. He lifts us to the level of myth where we, too, can walk taller.

-Peter Desy, updated by Loretta Cobb

KNOWLES, John

Nationality: American. Born: Fairmont, West Virginia, 16 September 1926. Education: Phillips Exeter Academy, Exeter, New Hampshire, graduated 1945; Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, B.A. 1949. Career: Reporter, Hartford Courant, Connecticut, 1950–52; freelance writer, 1952–56; associate editor, Holiday magazine, Philadelphia, 1956–60. Writer-in-residence, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1963–64, and Princeton University, New Jersey, 1968–69. Awards: Rosenthal Foundation award, 1961; Faulkner Foundation award, 1961; National Association of Independent Schools award, 1961. Address: c/o Penguin Putnam, 405 Murray Hill Parkway, East Rutherford, New Jersey 07073–2136, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Separate Peace. London, Secker and Warburg, 1959; New York, Macmillan, 1960; edited and with an introduction by Harold Bloom, Philadelphia, Chelsea House, 1999.

Morning in Antibes. New York, Macmillan, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1962.

Indian Summer. New York, Random House, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1966.

The Paragon. New York, Random House, 1971.

Spreading Fires. New York, Random House, 1974.

Vein of Riches. Boston, Little Brown, 1978.

Peace Breaks Out. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1981.

A Stolen Past. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1983; London, Constable, 1984.

The Private Life of Axie Reed. New York, Dutton, 1986.

Short Stories

Phineas: Six Stories. New York, Random House, 1968.

Other

Double Vision: American Thoughts Abroad. New York, Macmillan, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1964.

Backcasts: Memories and Recollections of Seventy Years as a Sportsman. Fowlerville, Michigan, Wilderness Adventure, 1993.

*

Manuscript Collections: Beinecke Library, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut.

* * *

John Knowles writes, in general, not about his home turf but about New England or Europe. Only one novel, Vein of Riches, and that not his best, is about West Virginia, his childhood home. His fictional world is a cultivated, cosmopolitan, somewhat jaded world. He is a fine craftsman, a fine stylist, alert to the infinite resources and nuances of language. Yet, as he says, he is one of the live-around-the-world people, rootless, nomadic, and making a virtue of that rootlessness. He is a connoisseur of different cultures but master of none—or perhaps of one only, the sub-culture of the New England prep school. One defect of this very cosmopolitanism is the feeling of alienation that Knowles feels from his fictional world. As a veteran of many cultures he finds this trait an advantage when he writes graceful travel essays for Holiday magazine. He finds it a disadvantage when he wishes to create for Vein of Riches a thoroughly credible fictional character.

A Separate Peace, his first novel, is also by far his most important. It is a prep school novel about Gene Forrester and his close friend, Finney, and the studied set of ambiguities and ambivalences arising from the intense and complex relationship between the two. Gene, beset by a love-hate attitude toward Finney, causes Finney to suffer a serious injury and still later is the putative cause of his death from a second injury. But Finney's death is preceded by Gene's reconciliation with him, a redemptive act which to some degree assuages his feeling of guilt. Thus, the novel recounts Gene's initiation into manhood and into both worldly and moral maturity. Fifteen years after Finney's death, Gene returns to Devon to conclude the novel by thinking—"Nothing endures, not a tree, not love, not even a death by violence." What does endure is the extraordinary popularity of this novel with prep school and college students.

Knowles's later books display his writing grace but not the inner strength of A Separate Peace. His second novel, Morning in Antibes, has a pot-pourri of comatose characters revolving about the deracinated Nicolas Petrovich Bodine in a kind of latter day The Sun Also Rises; it lacks, however, the Hemingway tone, atmosphere, and taut dialogue. The people are phony and maybe the novel is too. The long passivity of Nick makes him seem to move under water. The novel fails in characterization.

Indian Summer follows Cleet Kinsolving, World War II vet, in his jousting with his friend, Neil Reardon, Irish Catholic and heir to multi-millions (seemingly modeled on John Kennedy). Cleet's conviction, which he shares with T.S. Eliot's Sweeney, is that each man needs to do someone in. A good deal of cultural primitivism is spread about, but again the characters are unconvincing. The Paragon describes Lou Colfax, a brilliant, handsome sophomore in love with a beautiful actress four years older than he. In spite of the Yale ambiance and a plethora of cocktail parties and beautiful people the intended "Gatsby glamour" never comes to this novel. Perhaps because we miss the "yellow cocktail music" of Gatsby, perhaps because the characters remain partially developed. Spreading Fires, a brief novel of decadence and homosexual vagaries set in the south of France, deals with madness, potential madness, and the low life of the upper class.

Vein of Riches is a study of the great coal boom of 1910–1924 in a West Virginia town. Knowles shows a house, a family, and an industry, and the interactions of the three; he employs one of the central themes of American fiction, money versus land. It is a pleasant novel but the characters again are given perfunctory treatment. We do not have the empathy and zest that bubbled up from A Separate Peace. Coal does not interest Knowles the way New England prep school life did.

Peace Breaks Out is set in Devon School, New Hampshire, and is an attempt by Knowles to revisit the scene of his greatest fictional success, A Separate Peace. The parallels between the two novels are very strong: the place is the same school, the time is five years later and the crux of the plot is the wrongful death of a disliked schoolmate, Hochschwender, who dies of heart failure after being tortured by four of his classmates. Again, as in A Separate Peace, there is a legacy of guilt suffered by the four survivors. Knowles is much at home in the world of the private school and depicts it with grace and clarity. But it has all been done before in his earlier and better novel and thus lacks freshness and spontaneity. Many readers will find the excessive hypocrisy of Wexford, the ringleader of the torturers, a little unrealistic. This novel will not achieve the status of A Separate Peace, although it is well crafted and knowledgeably written.

In summary, Knowles is intelligent, highly literate, a skilled and sensitive craftsman and stylist. He is knowledgeable of the world, tolerant, a connoisseur of many cultures. He possesses in his own person that bifocal vision which he praises in Double Vision. He has created one extraordinary novel, A Separate Peace, which for many young people has truly caught the zeitgeist. There is also a negative side. Every novel but his first suffers from one fundamental defect the characters are not plausible. There is not a single memorable woman character in his fiction and only two male characters-Gene Forrester and Phineas-that stay in our memory. The result is an imperfect empathy and a resultant lack of reader interest. In general his male protagonists are inert, deracinated, ambivalent, depersonalized, dehumanized. Why does Knowles create such types? Only he can answer this definitively, but perhaps he gives us the answer in his book Double Vision where he argues against roots and for rootlessness, the new form of nomadism. "We need to be nomadic and uprooted today," he maintains. As he says, he is not regional, does not come from a town or a city. He is one of the live-around-the-world people. So he is and so are the characters in his books. This is his fundamental failure and it is a major one. He may yet overcome this and give us again a convincing, brilliant novel as was A Separate Peace.

-Ruel E. Foster

KNOX, Calvin M.

See SILVERBERG, Robert

KNOX, Elizabeth (Fiona)

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Wellington, 15 February 1959. Education: Tawa College, 1972–76; Victoria University, Wellington, 1983–86, B.A. in English 1986. Family: Married Fergus Barrowman in 1989, one son. Career: Clerk, Department of Inland Revenue, 1977–78; printer, Butterworths, and PPTA, 1980–81; insurance underwriter, 1981; publicity officer, National Museum, 1983–84; assistant editor of Sport, 1988–93; tutor in film studies, Victoria University, 1989–95. Awards: PEN award, 1988, and fellowship, 1991; New Zealand Book award, 1993. Address: 74 Glen Rd., Kelburn, Wellington, New Zealand.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

After Z-Hour. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1987. Paremata. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1989. Treasure. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1992. Pomare. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1994. Glamour and the Sea. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1996. Tawa. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1998. The Vintner's Luck. New York, Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 1998.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "From the Treasury," in Sport (Wellington), April 1989.
- "After Images," in New Zealand Listener (Wellington), March 1990.
- "Post Mortem," in Landfall (Christchurch), March 1990.
- "The Sword," in Sport (Wellington), October 1990.
- "Sex of Metals," in Now See Hear! edited by Ian Wedde and Gregory Burke. Wellington, Victorian University Press, 1990.
- "Afraid," in Sport (Wellington), April 1991.
- "Take as Prescribed," in Soho Square 4., edited by Bill Manhire. London, Bloomsbury, 1991.
- "Fiona Pardington," in Pleasures and Dangers, edited by Wystan Curnow and Trish Clark. Auckland, Moet and Chandon/Longman Paul. 1992.
- "Going to the Gym," in Into the Field of Play, edited by Lloyd Jones. N.p., Tandem, 1992.
- "A Doubtful Guest," in Stout Centre Review, February 1992.
- "The Black Disc (Treasure 2.2)," in Metro, May 1992.

Plays

Screenplays: The Dig (Un Certain Regard), 1994.

* * *

As early as her award-winning first novel, After Z-Hour, New Zealand author Elizabeth Knox has displayed a fascination with place. In each of her works since, the characters are impelled through their experiences due to the locations in which they find themselves. This concentration on place then bleeds into the narratives themselves, turning childhood or grief or love into places the characters inhabit, places whose geographies must be discovered and navigated in order to learn to live within them and ultimately to move beyond them into newer realms. Into each of these experiential states, Knox adds a layer of mystery or the supernatural, as if to say that since all of life is a strange environment needing to be explored, nothing is beyond the realm of the possible. The improbable elements of the stories would seem to contradict the simple or mundane aspects of life, which are ultimately the indicators of the beauty of the human landscape, from a child's halting move into adolescence to an old man's life and eventual death.

Each of the novels engages in new ways with Knox's concerns: the human groping for understanding in a world that often defies comprehension; how thinking, feeling creatures come to know and interact with one another; and the eventual connections between people that ultimately give meaning to life despite the distances between them. What the novels share is a tendency to inhabit various points of view in order to tell a story that moves through time and the psychological journeys of the characters. They are, however, never simply constrained by chronology. Knox's narratives often incorporate the experiences and voices of people dead before the figures of the main plot-line were ever born. The result of this layering of time and psychology is that emotional salvation, even if imperfect, can be effected in a past to which those dwelling in the present have no immediate access. This device allows all of time to interact, and the mythic, extra-ordinary element of Knox's works becomes fully apparent.

Her first novel, After Z-Hour, perfectly illustrates all of the trends that have become signatures of Knox's novelistic style. Set in an abandoned house during a freak spring storm, the novel brings together six strangers to try to cope with the possible haunting of the house and their own personal hauntings, from the recent death of one character's stepdaughter, to the feelings of perpetual alienation felt by another, and finally the communication between a third character and a dead World War I veteran, both of whom also provide narrative episodes. The inclusion of the dead man's story acutely draws attention to memory, the novel's main focus, and how the horrors of the past, whether personal or national, both inform and allow passage into the future.

Her second novel, Paremata, relies least on the paranormal to tell its tale. Instead, the novel enters the world of children, who supply their own mystery through the power of imagination and curiosity. Paremata, like the other novels, is concerned with place, in this case the landscape of childhood set within the shifting cultural scene of late 1960s New Zealand. Knox is interested in the ways in which children make sense of the world, the acuteness of their observations. She uses the make-believe world that the children of Paremata create to delineate their fumbling towards an understanding of loyalty, belief, and their own eventual adulthood. Though the novel stays focused on the children's experience, they bring the mysterious past into play with their evocations of a shamanistic religion replete with ritual, curses, and tribal allegiances. Through this game, the children are able to safely explore their feelings and filter the bewildering adult ideas that surround them.

Treasure, Knox's third novel, sets up an ambitious scheme, alternating between an exterior plot, set in New Zealand, and an interior story that takes place in the southern United States. As opposed to the earlier novels, the two main plot lines converge at the end, bringing together all of the major themes that the novel explores. Once again, Knox inserts the supernatural and mysterious to help explain the growth of the characters involved. Here, religion, specifically the enthusiastic expression of fundamental Christian belief and its reliance on extraordinary powers, plays a central role. The ability to heal with the human touch becomes associated with the psychological healing that is afforded to the characters. Once again, Knox evokes the physical worlds in which these stories occur with careful and illustrative detail.

In The Vintner's Luck, Knox moves the setting to France during the nineteenth century. The novel is structured chronologically, each chapter recounting the events of a single year in the relationship between a vintner and the immortal angel who becomes the most important figure in his life. Knox's control over narrative and structure are fully apparent in this novel, in which the landscape in which the vintner lives and the landscape of his life as it unfolds intertwine and inform one another. Here, too, salvation becomes a reciprocal gift, the angel enriching and giving meaning to the man's short life, and the man sustaining the angel long after his human life has ended. This chronicle of a complex relationship that develops in human time despite the eternal youth of one of its participants once again highlights Knox's tendency to see the mundane and incredible as intersecting states that not only inform one another but have the ability to directly interact and influence each other and the world.

—Michal Lemberger

KOCH, C(hristopher) J(ohn)

Nationality: Australian. Born: Hobart, Tasmania, 16 July 1932. Education: Clemes College; St. Virgil's Christian Brothers College; Hobart State High School, 1946–50; University of Tasmania, Hobart, 1951–54, B.A. 1954. Has one son. Career: Until 1972, radio producer, Australian Broadcasting Commission, Sydney. Awards: The Age Book of the Year award, 1978; Australian National Book award, 1979; Miles Franklin award, 1986. Agent: Curtis Brown, 27 Union Street, Paddington, New South Wales 2021, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Boys in the Island. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1958; revised edition, Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1974.

Across the Sea Wall. London, Heinemann, 1965; revised edition, Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, 1982.

The Year of Living Dangerously. Melbourne, Nelson, and London, Joseph, 1978; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1979.

The Doubleman. London, Chatto and Windus, 1985; New York, McGraw Hill. 1986.

Highways to a War. New York, Viking, 1995. Out of Ireland. London, Heinemann, 1999.

Plays

Screenplay: The Year of Living Dangerously, with Peter Weir and David Williamson, 1983.

Other

Chinese Journey, with Nicholas Hasluck. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1985.

Crossing the Gap: A Novelist's Essays. London, Chatto and Windus, 1987.

*

Manuscript Collections: Australian National Library, Canberra.

Critical Studies: "In the Shadow of Patrick White" by Vincent Buckley, in Meanjin (Melbourne), no. 2, 1961; "The Novels of C.J. Koch" by Robyn Claremont, in Quadrant (Sydney), 1980; "Asia, Europe and Australian Identity: The Novels of Christopher Koch," May 1982, and "Asia and the Contemporary Australian Novel," October 1984, both by Helen Tiffin, in Australian Literary Studies (St. Lucia, Queensland); "Pour mieux sauter: Christopher Koch's Novels in Relation to White, Stow and the Quest for a Post-colonial Fiction," in World Literature Written in English (Guelph, Ontario), 1983, and "Living Dangerously: Christopher Koch and Cultural Tradition," in Quadrant (Sydney), September 1985, both by Paul Sharrad; "Oedipus in the Tropics: A Psychoanalytical Interpretation of C.J. Koch's The Year of Living Dangerously" by Xavier Pons, in Colonisations (Toulouse), 1985; "Expanding Other-world: The Achievement of C.J. Koch' by Andrew Sant, in The Age Monthly Review (Melbourne), June 1985; "The Envenomed Dreams of C.J. Koch" by Laurie Clancy, in Island (Hobart, Tasmania), Winter 1985.

C.J. Koch comments:

(1991) I began by writing verse, but gave my main attention to the novel from the age of 19. I believe that the novel can be a poetic vehicle, and that it has taken over the function of narrative poetry in this century. By this I do not mean that it uses the techniques of verse; nor do I mean that it can replace the lyric.

My first two novels were youthful and over-written. I have cut and revised both, and am now more satisfied with them. I don't expect to do this again, since I feel that I reached the stage of mastering my craft with The Year of Living Dangerously.

Two things preoccupy me as a novelist: the way in which many people search for a world just outside normal reality; and dualities: the dualities that run through both the human spirit and the world itself. It is the effort to reconcile these contradictions that makes for the pathos and drama I am interested in. Perhaps an Australian is attuned to duality more than some other writers, since he comes from a country born of Europe, but lying below Asia.

* * *

C. J. Koch (who originally signed himself Christopher Koch) had his first poem accepted when he was seventeen and began writing fiction in his teens. He wrote two novels but became silent until, at the age of forty, he left his senior position at the Australian Broadcasting Commission to devote himself full-time to writing. Since then he has established himself as one of Australia's leading novelists. Koch substantially revised his first two novels and published a fine book of essays, Crossing the Gap, which does much to illuminate his own art, but most importantly has produced several outstanding novels. His concerns in all his books remain remarkably consistent, as do the imagery and symbolism through which he explores them. He is preoccupied with the nature of reality and illusion and the relationship between them, and with the related question of whether it is not, after all, necessary to live by illusion if one is to live at all. Waking up and growing up are, for Koch's earlier and younger characters especially, conditions to be feared. Koch's concern also is with the flaws in his male protagonists that lead to their betrayal or near betrayal of the women with whom they become involved.

The Boys in the Island tells the story of a sensitive young boy through his school days and adolescence to his final, reluctant initiation into early manhood. Francis falls in love with a young girl who suddenly, heartbreakingly, abandons him. He fails his exams and travels from Tasmania to Melbourne, where he becomes involved in a meaningless life of petty crime. Then the suicide of a friend and his own near death in a car crash send him back to his home to reassess his life and accept unprotestingly "the iron bonds of his imminent adulthood." Despite the familiarity of the material, Koch's keen ear for colloquial speech, sensuous command of natural detail, and understated prose give the novel a fresh and poignant flavor.

Across the Sea Wall opens with journalist Robert O'Brien looking back over an affair he had six years ago. Fleeing from marriage and the life of a staid suburbanite working for his future father-in-law, O'Brien and a childhood friend take a boat to Naples, Italy. En route he falls in love with Ilsa Kalnins, and they skip the boat at Ceylon. But eventually O'Brien discovers that he cannot accept the challenge of Ilsa's love or believe in its sincerity when confronted with the accusations that his friends bring against her, and he returns to Australia. Two years later she appears in Sydney and they make plans to marry, but once again O'Brien abandons her. The novel has many shrewd touches of characterization and the same sensitivity in dealing with the impact of love on the uninitiated, the failure of the males to respond adequately to its demands, that is a recurring them in Koch's work.

The Year of Living Dangerously is set in Indonesia in the last year of Sukarno's regime. The Sukarno of this novel is a man who seemed originally to embody the hopes and dreams of his people (including those of an Australian-Chinese dwarf named Billy Kwan who is in the country as a press photographer) but who has now lost himself in grandiose schemes and the pursuit of private gratification. A coup is being prepared against him, and it is this that provides the spectacular climax to the novel. Slowly, as Billy begins to see through Sukarno, his idealistic allegiance to and hope in a savior begin to switch towards Guy Hamilton, the journalist who has been sent out to replace Billy's previous boss. The novel is narrated by someone identified only as "Cookie" or by the initials he supplies to his occasional footnotes, R.J.C. Through the use of diaries, speaking through the voices of various characters, using purloined documents from Billy Kwan's private files, speculating and inventing when he cannot know for certain, the narrator builds up layer after layer of texture upon the basic structure of the narrative. At the end, Koch tries, unfashionably and audaciously, to suggest Hamilton's final redemption and capacity to love as he ascends into insight via partial

The central character in The Doubleman is Richard Miller, a thoughtful, complex man but an observer rather than a participant in life and a man who has developed a heavy psychological dependence on worlds of fantasy and illusion. Although barred from an active physical life, he is drawn towards his athletic cousin Brian Brady, who is both simpler and more adventurous than himself; such relationships are common in Koch's fiction. Miller leaves Tasmania and follows Brady and his friend Darcy Burr to the mainland, where he pursues a career as a radio actor and the other two form a musical group. When the three men come together again in Sydney, Miller is now a successful media producer; Burr, Brady, and eventually Miller's emigre wife Katrin form a folk group called Thomas and the Rymers; and it is inevitable that he will become entangled in the complex moral and ethical choices that confront Koch's protagonists sooner or later. As with the previous novel, comparisons with Graham Greene come to mind—the superb sense of place and atmosphere, the conviction of the ambiguous and double-edged nature of innocence and in fact Greene expressed his admiration for it.

The locale of Highways to a War is Vietnam and then Cambodia (after a beautifully written section on Tasmania), but the period is the 1960s and 70s; again the confrontation is between an Australian innocent and a world of Asian complexity that leaves him vulnerable and bewildered. As presented by his friend Ray Barton, the protagonist Langford is a deeply romanticized character; he is even, if we are to believe the ending, a Christ figure who attracts his own Judas in the person of the secret operative Aubrey Hardwick. But he is also a man fatally in love with the past, and although it is not primarily his own fault, his relations with women are all doomed ones that he spends his life, unsuccessfully and in the end fatally, trying to keep alive.

As he did in The Year of Living Dangerously, Koch tells the story by adding layer upon layer, voice upon voice, so that the effect is of a kind of palimpsest that has been painted over repeatedly, with each portrait of the main character adding to or contradicting the ones previously offered. The effect is of a rich and multi-faceted tapestry of meanings that involve not just Langford himself but the history of the Vietnam War and of Asia during the bloody decade that the novel covers. The history of Langford being slowly sucked into the vortex of the war becomes a history of that decade and what Koch sees, even though he is careful not to take sides, as its betrayals.

There is a scene in Highways to a War in which two young boys break into a locked room and discover a portrait, a cache of letters, and two calfskin-covered notebooks. The portrait is of Irish patriot Robert Devereux, who was tried before a rigged jury and sentenced to exile for inciting rebellion against the English occupiers of Ireland in 1848. Out of Ireland purports to be a record of the contents of those diaries—Devereux's account of his three years in exile before escaping to America, as edited again by Ray Barton. In Highways to a War different people wrote the text that is put together by Barton. In Out of Ireland, however, the whole long novel is written in the voice of Devereux himself. That it succeeds is mainly because Koch is able to capture that voice—grave, measured, beautifully lucid—so well; he makes it consistent and plausible while varying it sufficiently to maintain interest.

Devereux is the charismatic head of the Young Irish movement, a brilliant writer and orator and potentially a leader of Ireland's rebellion against its oppressors. Barton says of Devereux that he "stood on the brink of the modern world," and Koch seems to want to make him an avatar of historical change, the kind of change, he seems to imply, that is not always for good. The novel is set in 1848, that quintessentially revolutionary year in Europe, and yet for his fervor Devereux is at heart a conservative, even aristocratic, figure. He praises France as the capital of freedom and the new order yet at the same time argues that "Socialism and feudalism are brothers under the skin." One suspects that Koch agrees. It was the French intellectual tradition, after all, that gave birth to and nurtured the terrible ideology of the Khmer Rouge.

At the same time Devereux is Prometheus—potential savior of mankind but now bound to a rock. And in one of Koch's favorite tropes he speaks of himself as a "man of double nature." For all his genuine qualities there is something stiff-necked about him. As with many of Koch's protagonists, his insistence on standing on his dignity carries disastrous consequences for the woman he loves and very nearly for himself. Out of Ireland brings to its conclusion an impressive and formidable achievement. Although both Out of Ireland and Highways to a War are self-sufficient, when read together they illuminate one another more fully as commentaries on two crucial and interrelated periods of history.

—Laurie Clancy

KOGAWA, Joy

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Toronto, 6 June 1935. Family: Has one son and one daughter. Awards: Books in Canada First Novel award, 1981, Canadian Authors Association Book of the Year award, 1981, Before Columbus Foundation's American Book award, 1982, and American Library Association Notable Book award, 1982, all for Obasan; Ryerson Polytechnical Institute fellowship, 1991; Urban Alliance Race Relations award, 1994; Grace MacInnis Visiting Scholar award, 1995. D.L.: University of Lethbridge, 1991; Simon Fraser University, 1993. D.Litt: University of Guelph, 1992. Member: Officer, Order of Canada, 1986. Address: 447 Montrose Ave., Toronto, Ontario M6G 3H2, Canada; and 845 Semlin Dr., Vancouver, British Columbia V51 4J6, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Obasan. Toronto, Dennys, 1981; New York, Anchor, 1994.
Itsuka. New York, Viking, 1992; revised edition, New York, Penguin, 1993.

The Rain Ascends. Toronto, Knopf Canada, 1995.

Poetry

The Splintered Moon. St. John, University of New Brunswick, 1967. A Choice of Dreams. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1974. Jericho Road. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1977. Woman in the Woods. Oakville, Ontario, Mosiac Press, 1985.

Other

Naomi's Road (for children). Toronto, Oxford University Press, 1986.

*

Critical Studies: Articulate Silences: Hisaye Yamamoto, Maxine Hong Kingston, Joy Kogawa by King-Kok Chueng, Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1993.

* * *

Joy Kogawa, after several collections of poetry, published her first novel, Obasan, in 1981. It and its sequel, Itsuka, written eleven years later, show Kogawa's poetic origins, as they are extremely lyrically written books. Obasan is the story of the internment of Japanese Canadians and Canadians of Japanese descent during World War II. In so doing, it is one of few fictional accounts of the North American treatment of ethnic Japanese during this period, others being Carlos Bulosan's America is in the Heart of 1943, John Okada's No-No Boy, written in 1957, Jean Wakatsuki Houston and Jones Houston's Farewell to Manzanar of 1974, and Maxine Hong Kingston's 1980 novel, China Men.

Obasan (''aunt'') is a unique and successful blending of the literary, the historical, and the autobiographical. Kogawa's novel is the account of two families' experiences told primarily from the point of view of Naomi Nakane, a schoolteacher in Alberta in 1972. The occasion of her uncle's death brings her brother (Stephen), her widowed aunt (Aya Obasan), and another aunt (Emily) together for the first time in years and precipitates a series of recollections and revelations about the war that begin when Naomi was about six (and Kogawa herself about seven). The war leads to the dissolution of Naomi's parents' families, the Nakanes and the Katos, and the seizure of their property. Naomi, her brother, father, aunt, and uncle are shunted progressively further east as the internment proceeds through and after the war, ending in Canada in 1949.

Obasan's narrative is essentially retrospective, a backward movement into Naomi's childhood seeded by a packet of materials given to her by her Aunt Emily. They lead to a series of memories of childhood as seen through the consciousness of the young Naomi, and shaped by the literary consciousness of Kogawa, who delineates a texture of symbols that become the personal metaphoric language of this book. Thus, a loaf of "stone bread" baked by her uncle just before his death becomes a symbol of a Eucharistic sort as it is eaten by his grieving relatives. It also serves as a symbol of the Japanese exile to the prairies as it is connected to the manna of Moses' people in Egypt in Obasan's epigraph. Kogawa develops a rich texture of personal and biblical symbolism throughout to reinforce her themes.

The novel moves into the present gradually, and the past and present are linked in the import of some documentary materials which have been kept from Naomi and Stephen until their adulthood. Naomi, who has grown up with a mixture of puzzlement and misplaced guilt about the failure of her mother to return from Japan, is eventually initiated into the horrors of her death in the atomic bombing at Nagasaki through a letter from the distant past.

This news breaks the silence of the past in Obasan, and begins the process of final healing. Aunt Emily, a fully Canadianized "word warrior" who crusades for publicity or compensation in the Japanese cause, and Aya Obasan, Naomi's ancient aunt who still has only rudimentary English after spending most of her life in Canada, seem diametrically opposed in their cultural adaptations. Secretiveness about the fate of Naomi and Stephen's mother is perhaps the only thing they have in common. Yet this novel does not attempt to dichotomize attitudes to silence into "good" or "bad," and itself negotiates the fine line between telling the past and giving the present room to grow. Obasan explores language, euphemism, and silence; traces the ties of the self to family and place; and initiates the process of healing.

Itsuka ("someday") resumes Naomi's story in Toronto in 1983, and traces her involvement in the Japanese-Canadian fight for redress for the internment, as Joy Kogawa was herself involved. The novel, like Obasan, is simultaneously mixed-up in both the personal and the political, but in Itsuka the sharp line that Naomi has tried to maintain between the two in her life becomes blurred. Itsuka also shows Naomi's personal development in her tentative romance with Cedric, a priest involved in her political world.

In Itsuka, Kogawa tells a story well worth telling, but perhaps not so successfully fictionalized. At many points the narrative verges on the didactic, and the psychology of Naomi remains static and somewhat tangential to the politics of the tale she narrates.

-Ron Jenkins

KOPS, Bernard

Nationality: British. Born: London, 28 November 1926. Education: Attended London elementary schools to age 13. Family: Married Erica Gordon in 1956; four children. Career: Has worked as a docker, chef, salesman, waiter, lift man, and barrow boy; writer-inresidence, London Borough of Hounslow, 1980–82; lecturer in Drama, Spiro Institute, 1985–86, Surrey, Ealing, and Inner London education authorities, 1989–90, and City Literary Institute, London, 1991. Awards: Arts Council bursary, 1957, 1979, 1985, 1990, 1991; C. Day Lewis fellowship, 1981–83. Agent: John Rush, Sheil Land Associates, 43 Doughty St., London WC1N 2LF, England. Address: 35 Canfield Gardens, Flat 1, London N.W.6, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Awake for Mourning. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1958.

Motorbike. London, New English Library, 1962.

Yes from No-Man's Land. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1965; New York, Coward McCann, 1966.

The Dissent of Dominick Shapiro. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1966; New York, Coward McCann, 1967.

By the Waters of Whitechapel. London, Bodley Head, 1969; New York, Norton, 1970.

The Passionate Past of Gloria Gaye. London, Secker and Warburg, 1971; New York, Norton, 1972.

Settle Down Simon Katz. London, Secker and Warburg, 1973.

Partners. London, Secker and Warburg, 1975.

On Margate Sands. London, Secker and Warburg, 1978.

Plays

The Hamlet of Stepney Green (produced Oxford, London, and New York, 1958). London, Evans, 1959.

Goodbye World (produced Guildford, Surrey, 1959).

Change for the Angel (produced London, 1960).

The Dream of Peter Mann (produced Edinburgh, 1960). London, Penguin, 1960.

Stray Cats and Empty Bottles (produced Cambridge, 1961; London, 1967)

Enter Solly Gold, music by Stanley Myers (produced Wellingborough, Northamptonshire, and Los Angeles, 1962; London, 1970). Published in Satan, Socialites, and Solly Gold: Three New Plays from England, New York, Coward McCann, 1961; in Four Plays, 1964.

Home Sweet Honeycomb (broadcast 1962). Included in Four Plays, 1964.

The Lemmings (broadcast 1963). Included in Four Plays, 1964.

Four Plays (includes The Hamlet of Stepney Green, Enter Solly Gold, Home Sweet Honeycomb, The Lemmings). London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1964.

The Boy Who Wouldn't Play Jesus (for children; produced London, 1965). Published in Eight Plays: Book 1, edited by Malcolm Stuart Fellows, London, Cassell, 1965.

David, It Is Getting Dark (produced Rennes, France, 1970). Paris, Gallimard, 1970.

It's a Lovely Day Tomorrow, with John Goldschmidt (televised 1975; produced London, 1976).

More Out Than In (produced on tour and London, 1980).

Ezra (produced London, 1981).

Simon at Midnight (broadcast 1982; produced London, 1985).

Some of These Days (produced London, 1990).

Sophie! Last of the Red Hot Mamas (produced London, 1990).

Dreams of Anne Frank (produced London, 1993).

Who Shall I Be Tomorrow (produced London, 1993).

Playing Sinatra (produced London, 1993).

Call in the Night (produced West Yorkshire, 1995).

Golem (produced London, 1995).

Radio Plays: Home Sweet Honeycomb, 1962; The Lemmings, 1963; Born in Israel, 1963; The Dark Ages, 1964; Israel: The Immigrant, 1964; Bournemouth Nights, 1979; I Grow Old, I Grow Old, 1979; Over the Rainbow, 1980; Simon at Midnight, 1982; Trotsky Was My Father, 1984; Kafe Kropotkin, 1988; Colour Blind, 1989; Congress in Manchester, 1990; The Ghost Child, 1991; Soho Nights, 1991; Sailing with Homer, 1994; Protocols of Fire, 1995.

Television Plays: I Want to Go Home, 1963; The Lost Years of Brian Hooper, 1967; Alexander the Greatest, 1971; Just One Kid, 1974; Why the Geese Shrieked and The Boy Philosopher, from stories by Isaac Bashevis Singer, 1974; It's a Lovely Day Tomorrow, with John Goldschmidt, 1975; Moss, 1975; Rocky Marciano Is Dead, 1976; Night Kids, 1983; The Survivor, serial, 1991–92.

Poetry

Poems. London, Bell and Baker Press, 1955.
Poems and Songs. Northwood, Middlesex, Scorpion Press, 1958.
An Anemone for Antigone. Lowestoft, Suffolk, Scorpion Press, 1959.
Erica, I Want to Read You Something. Lowestoft, Suffolk, Scorpion Press, and New York, Walker, 1967.

For the Record. London, Secker and Warburg, 1971. Barricades in West Hampstead. London, Hearing Eye, 1988.

Other

The World Is a Wedding (autobiography). London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1963; New York, Coward McCann, 1964.

Neither Your Honey nor Your Sting: An Offbeat History of the Jews. London, Robson, 1985.

Editor, Poetry Hounslow. London, Hounslow Civic Centre, 1981.

*

Manuscript Collections: University of Texas, Austin; Indiana University, Bloomington.

Critical Studies: By Colin MacInnes, in Encounter (London), May 1960; "The Kitchen Sink" by G. Wilson Knight, in Encounter (London), December 1963; "Deep Waters of Whitechapel" by Nina Sutton, in The Guardian (London), 6 September 1969.

* * *

The novels of Bernard Kops are an extension of his work as poet and playwright. His prose is rhythmic, almost ritualistic, and his plots unfold through dialogue. He is concerned with Jewishness, with the Jew as outsider to the world at large, and as a trapped insider in the claustrophobic atmosphere of the tightly knit Jewish family in which a child can find it almost impossible to grow up. So sixteen-year-old Dominick in The Dissent of Dominick Shapiro is driven to run away from home and join a collection of drop-outs protesting against established society; and in By the Waters of Whitechapel Aubrey, at thirty-five, can only free himself from his financial and emotional dependency on his mother by indulging in far-fetched fantasies of a prospective career which will bring him wealth and fame.

These goals have indeed been realized by the successful Jewish businessman, Daniel Klayman, in Partners, but his achievement leads him to madness. At the very height of his powers, while the house-warming celebrations for his new St. John's Wood home are in progress, he goes crazy. Lionel is his partner in lunacy, a projected doppelgänger, who pushes him into killing his new neighbor's dog, and which eventually engineers the situation which makes him responsible for the death of his beloved son, Zachary. Until that moment, despite the disastrous party, Daniel manages to disguise his madness by running away from his wife and family, and by pretending that Lionel is a real person, who is going to become a partner in his business and so relieve him of the stress and strain which has caused his strange behavior.

The lengths that the mad will go to in attempts to hide their condition is the theme of Kops's most mature novel, On Margate Sands. Here he abandons his Jewish concern for one which affects the whole of society, and which is even more urgent in Britain now than it was when this novel was published. He wrote his study of five former patients of a psychiatric hospital in the light of the 1975 Parliamentary White Paper on the revised services to the mentally ill as a result of new drug treatments. Because their sickness can be more or less controlled by "Happy tabs" as their warden landlady calls them, Brian, Larry, Dolores, Buzz, and Michelle can exist in sheltered accommodation outside the hospital.

On Margate Sands should be compulsory reading for any planners concerned with the present widespread closure of psychiatric hospitals, who still believe that "Community care" is anything more than a socially acceptable phrase. Kops's confused characters experience the reality of being "post-mad" in a society that is both fearful and uncaring. The owners of the run-down seaside hotel in which they are housed are clearly on to a money-making enterprise, squeezing their sick lodgers into cramped rooms, and kicking them out of the house during the daylight hours. The five of them walk the streets and lounge on the beach, and the "pre-mad" citizens of Margate and the frenzied holidaymakers do their best to ignore them.

Yet this is not simply a novel of social concern. It is one which could only have been written by a poet, for it demands that the reader experience the simultaneous levels of rational thought and irrational emotional response that lead to the bizarre and anti-social behavior of the insane. Like most of Kops's characters, Brian, the most integrated of the quintet, is a middle-aged man still in thrall to his parents, even though they are long dead. His emotional life stopped at the age of seven; and although he is both intellectually aware and well read (the novel's title comes from a quotation from T.S. Eliot with which he is familiar—"On Margate Sands/I can connect/Nothing with nothing") he is incapable of controlling the violent impulses that push him back into his past. Yet he is capable of a real, non-sexual affection for the adolescent boy, Buzz, and is seriously concerned when the lad runs off with a group of drop-outs, who can be compared with the hippies that Dominick linked up with in the previous novel. In Brian's estimation, and in that of his creator, the Alternative Society offers its "ragged and self-indulgent" adherents a life that is no better than the killing waste of time experienced by former psychiatric patients at the mercy of the community.

Despite his wretched and crazy behavior, Brian has courage, determination and an ability to appreciate reality and the cruelty of the machine age. In a lyrical, rural passage, the old man Larry recalls family holidays in the Kent hop fields; so all five go off in search of the farm where he spent those childhood, summer days. Of course it has been mechanized, and this abrupt encounter with present reality is the fulcrum of the novel. His companions return to Margate, but Brian goes off on his own, tablet-less, on a quest for his lost sister and a sane and normal life. It cannot be achieved. In a state far worse than the one in which he set out he returns to Margate beach. His story of tragic waste is repeated in thousands of case studies, but it takes a poet to enable the "pre-mad" to enter the turbulent, sad world of the "post-mad."

-Shirley Toulson

KOTZWINKLE, William

Nationality: American. Born: Scranton, Pennsylvania, 22 November 1938. Education: Attended Rider College and Pennsylvania State University. Family: Married Elizabeth Gundy in 1970. Career: Worked as a short order cook and editor/writer in the 1960s; full time writer, 1960s—. Awards: National Magazine awards for fiction, 1972, 1975; O'Henry prize, 1975; World Fantasy Award for best novel, 1977; North Dakota Children's Choice Award, 1983; Buckeye Award, 1984. Address: c/o David R. Godine, Inc., Horticultural Hall, 300 Massachusetts Avenue, Boston, Massachusetts 02115, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Hermes 3000 (science fiction). New York, Pantheon, 1972. The Fan Man, drawings by Keith Bendis. New York, Avon, 1974. Night-Book. New York, Avon, 1974.

Swimmer in the Secret Sea. New York, Avon, 1975.

Doctor Rat (science fiction). New York, Knopf, 1976.

Fata Morgana. New York, Knopf, 1977.

Herr Nightingale and the Satin Woman. New York, Knopf, 1978.

Jack in the Box. New York, Putnam, 1980; published as Book of Love. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1990.

Christmas at Fontaine's, illustrations by Joe Servello. New York, Putnam. 1982.

E.T., the Extra-Terrestrial Storybook (juvenile, novelization of screenplay by Melissa Mathison). New York, Putnam, 1982.

Superman III (novelization of screenplay by David and Leslie Newman). New York, Warner, 1983.

Queen of Swords, illustrations by Joe Servello. New York, Putnam, 1983.

E.T., the Storybook of the Green Planet: A New Storybook (juvenile, based on story by Steven Spielberg), illustrations by David Wiesner. New York, Putnam, 1985.

The Exile. New York, Dutton/Lawrence, 1987.

The Midnight Examiner. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1989.

Hot Jazz Trio, illustrations by Joe Servello. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1989.

The Game of Thirty. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1994.

The Bear Went over the Mountain. New York, Doubleday, 1996.

Fiction (for children)

The Fireman. New York, Pantheon, 1969.

The Ship That Came Down the Gutter. New York, Pantheon, 1970. Elephant Boy: A Story of the Stone Age. New York, Farrar, Straus, 1970.

The Day the Gang Got Rich. New York, Viking, 1970. The Return of Crazy Horse. New York, Farrar, Straus, 1971. The Supreme, Superb, Exalted, and Delightful, One and Only Magic Building. New York, Farrar, Straus, 1973.

Up the Alley with Jack and Joe. New York, Macmillan, 1974.

The Leopard's Tooth. New York, Seabury Press, 1976.

The Ants Who Took Away Time. New York, Doubleday, 1978.

Dream of Dark Harbor. New York, Doubleday, 1979.

The Nap Master. New York, Harcourt, 1979.

The World Is Big and I'm So Small, illustrations by Joe Servello. Crown, 1986.

The Empty Notebook, illustrations by Joe Servello. Boston, Godine, 1990.

The Million Dollar Bear, illustrations by David Catrow. New York, Random House, 1994.

Short Stories

Elephant Bangs Train. New York, Pantheon, 1971.

The Oldest Man, and Other Timeless Stories (juvenile). New York, Pantheon, 1971.

Trouble in Bugland: A Collection of Inspector Mantis Mysteries (juvenile), illustrations by Joe Servello. Boston, Godine, 1983.

Jewel of the Moon. New York, Putnam, 1985.

Hearts of Wood, and Other Timeless Tales (juvenile), illustrations by Joe Servello. Boston, Godine, 1986.

Tales from the Empty Notebook (juvenile), illustrations by Joe Servello. New York, Marlow, 1996.

Poetry

Great World Circus (juvenile), illustrations by Joe Servello. New York, Putnam, 1983.

Seduction in Berlin, illustrations by Joe Servello. New York, Putnam, 1985.

Other

The Dream Master (with Brian Helgeland), based on characters created by Wes Craven, adapted by Bob Italia. Edina, Minnesota, Abdo & Daughters, 1992.

* * *

William Kotzwinkle is an accomplished author who is best known for his book of the film E.T.: The Extra-Terrestrial, but who has produced a range of work for both adults and children that often transgresses genre boundaries and the distinction between serious and popular fiction. His key theme is the conflict between materialism and spiritual awareness, a conflict that he sometimes explores through fantasy and sometimes through satire. Beginning as a children's writer with The Fireman, he then published novels for adults such as Hermes 3000, The Fan Man, and Queen of Swords, which began to establish him as an original and distinctive novelist and won him praise from, for example, Kurt Vonnegut. But it was Doctor Rat that made his reputation as a powerful fantasy writer with a sharp satirical edge. The novel focuses upon laboratory rats whose spokesman, the Doctor Rat of the title, eventually escapes from the vast laboratory where experiments on his fellow-creatures are taking place, and whose adventures are interwoven with shorter tales told by animals of different kinds who finally try to form a whole that will make humans more peaceful and benign. But they are all killed.

Parallel, intersecting worlds are a favorite theme of Kotzwinkle's, and his most remarkable novel in this respect is Fata Morgana. Starting in Paris in 1861, and structured around three Tarot cards—The Fool, the Valet of Coins, and the Magician—it combines elements of fantasy and of the detective story. The tale traces the quest of a case-hardened French detective, Inspector Picard, to expose the truth about Ric Lazare, a dazzling magician whom Picard believes to be a fake and a killer. Picard's journey across Europe to probe the magician's past takes him into the beds of beautiful women and into strange worlds in which reality and illusion merge. He finally reaches the powerful and threatening Fata Morgana, but the difference between illusion and reality remains uncertain at the end of the novel. Further novels of Kotzwinkle's that combine detection with fantasy and the supernatural include Herr Nightingale and the Satin Woman and The Midnight Examiner.

Among Kotzwinkle's other notable novels are The Exile, in which a movie star is trapped in the body of a World War II German gangster who is eventually tortured by the Gestapo, and The Game of Thirty, in which a game that survives from ancient Egypt is played out again on the streets of modern New York. New York is also the setting for much of The Bear Went over the Mountain, an engaging animal fantasy for adults and a hilarious satire on literary and media success in the modern world. A large black bear, finding a manuscript written and abandoned by a literary academic under a tree, reads it because he cannot eat it, and, styling himself Hal Jam—his favorite food—he goes to New York and is taken up as a writer who might possibly be the next Hemingway. When the literary academic sues him for stealing his novel, the bear wins the case and his literary standing is assured.

Kotzwinkle's ability to write in a variety of genres and to combine elements of those genres in specific works has made him difficult to classify, while his willingness to produce film tie-ins in the 1980s has sometimes given the impression that he is solely a commercial writer. But in his best work, such as Fata Morgana and The Bear Went over the Mountain, there can be no doubt of his narrative skills and his capacity to produce both suggestive fantasy and shrewd satire that is engaging and penetrating. This has won him a devoted following, but his most substantial fiction merits a wider readership and a more detailed critical examination than it has so far received.

-Nicolas Tredell

KROETSCH, Robert (Paul)

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Heisler, Alberta, 26 June 1927. Education: Schools in Heisler and Red Deer, Alberta; University of Alberta, Edmonton, B.A. 1948; McGill University, Montreal, 1954–55; Middlebury College, Vermont, M.A. 1956; University of Iowa, Iowa City, Ph.D. 1961. Family: Married 1) Mary Jane Lewis in 1956 (divorced 1979), two daughters; 2) Smaro Kamboureli in 1982. Career: Laborer and purser, Yellowknife Transportation Company, Northwest Territories, 1948–50; information specialist (civilian), United States Air Force Base, Goose Bay, Labrador, 1951–54; assistant professor, 1961–65, associate professor, 1965–68, and professor of English, 1968–78, State University of New York, Binghamton.

Professor of English, 1978–85, and since 1985 Distinguished Professor, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg. Artist-in-residence, Calgary University, Alberta, Fall 1975, University of Lethbridge, Alberta, Spring 1976, and University of Manitoba, 1976–78. Co-founder, Boundary 2 magazine, Binghamton, 1972. Awards: Bread Loaf Writers Conference grant, 1966; Governor-General's award, 1970; Killam award, 1986. Fellow, Royal Society of Canada, 1986. Agent: Sterling Lord, 10 St. Mary Street, Suite 510, Toronto M4Y 1P9. Address: Department of English, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba R3T 2N2, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

But We Are Exiles. Toronto, Macmillan, 1965; London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1966.

The Words of My Roaring. Toronto and London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1966.

The Studhorse Man. Toronto, Macmillan, and London, Macdonald, 1969; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1970.

Gone Indian. Toronto, New Press, 1973.

Badlands. Toronto, New Press, 1975; New York, Beaufort, 1983.

What the Crow Said. Toronto, General, 1978.

Alibi. Toronto, Stoddart, and New York, Beaufort, 1983.

The Puppeteer. Toronto, Random House, 1993.

The Man from the Creeks. Toronto, Random House of Canada, 1998.

Plays

The Studhorse Man, adaptation of his own novel (produced Toronto, 1981).

Poetry

The Stone Hammer: Poems 1960–1975. Nanaimo, British Columbia, Oolichan, 1975.

The Ledger. London, Ontario, Applegarth Follies, 1975.

Seed Catalogue. Winnipeg, Turnstone Press, 1977.

The Sad Phoenician. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1979.

The Criminal Intensities of Love as Paradise. Lantzville, British Columbia, Oolichan, 1981.

Field Notes: Collected Poems. Toronto, General, and New York, Beaufort, 1981.

Advice to My Friends. Toronto, Stoddart, 1985.

Excerpts from the Real World: A Prose Poem in Ten Parts. Lantzville, British Columbia, Oolichan, 1986.

Completed Field Notes: The Long Poems of Robert Kroetsch. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1989.

Other

Alberta. Toronto, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1968.

The Crow Journals. Edmonton, Alberta, NeWest Press, 1980.

Labyrinths of Voice: Conversations with Robert Kroetsch, with Shirley Neuman and Robert Wilson. Edmonton, Alberta, NeWest Press, 1982. Letter to Salonika. Toronto, Grand Union, 1983.

The Lovely Treachery of Words: Essays Selected and New. Toronto, Oxford University Press, 1989.

A Likely Story: The Writing Life. Red Deer, Alberta, Red Deer College Press, 1995.

Editor, with James Bacque and Pierre Gravel, Creation (interviews). Toronto, New Press, 1970.

Editor, Sundogs: Stories from Saskatchewan. Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, Thunder Creek, 1980.

Editor, with Smaro Kamboureli, Visible Visions: The Selected Poems of Douglas Barbour. Edmonton, Alberta, NeWest Press, 1984.

Editor, with Reingard M. Nischik, Gaining Ground: European Critics on Canadian Literature. Edmonton, Alberta, NeWest Press, 1985.

*

Bibliographies: "An Annotated Bibliography of Works by and about Robert Kroetsch" by Robert Lecker, in Essays on Canadian Writing (Toronto), Fall 1977.

Manuscript Collections: University of Calgary Library, Alberta.

Critical Studies: Robert Kroetsch by Peter Thomas, Vancouver, Douglas and McIntyre, 1980; "Robert Kroetsch Issue" of Open Letter (Toronto), Spring 1983 and Summer-Fall 1984; Robert Kroetsch by Robert Lecker, Boston, Twayne, 1986; The Old Dualities: Deconstructing Robert Kroetsch and His Critics by Dianne Tiefensee. Montreal and Buffalo, New York, McGill-Queen's University Press, 1994; Ledger Domain: An Anthology for Robert Kroetsch, edited by Charlene Diehl-Jones and Gary Draper. Stratford, Ontario, Trout Lily Press, 1997.

Robert Kroetsch comments:

(1991) My novels, often set on the open plains and in the new cities of the Canadian West, border on the comic and hint of the bawdy. The critic Linda Hutcheon has called me the champion of postmodern in Canada because of the experimental nature of my work. I think of myself as a storyteller trying to tell stories amidst the radical discontinuities of contemporary life.

* * *

Robert Kroetsch has been viewed as the father of Canadian postmodernism, and the novels that he has published over a period of more than thirty years explore issues of Canadian identity in a range of non-realistic modes. They have been accompanied by several volumes of self-reflexive poetic and prose autobiography and numerous theoretical essays, which, like his fiction, address ways in which notions of self, region, gender, genre, and nation are constructed. Kroetsch's work is centrally concerned with "the anxiety of influence," and he has habitually avoided historiographical accounts of the traditions that have shaped writers and cultures in favour of a Foucault-like archaeological mode of investigation, which suggests that texts contain multiple layers from earlier texts and that, however deeply one digs, it is finally impossible to arrive at an original source-narrative.

Throughout his career Kroetsch has drawn on a broad range of cultural intertexts ranging from Greek myths and eighteenth-century English novels to western Canadian oral tales and the mythologies of the Blackfoot and Cree nations. Oral elements are prominent in all his fiction, particularly in his magic-realist version of an Albertan tall tale, What the Crow Said, and his 1998 novel, The Man from the Creeks, which takes its initial inspiration from Robert Service's gold rush ballad, "The Shooting of Dan McGrew." Kroetsch's sceptical, postmodernist approach to his influences characteristically leads to their being reworked as pastiche or even parody. Nevertheless, his fiction engages with the politics of particular regional and cultural issues to a greater extent than that of many of his American postmodernist contemporaries.

Kroetsch was born in Alberta and is first and foremost a prairie writer, committed to realizing a sense of the distinctiveness of western Canadian experience, while turning away from the primarily realistic narrative modes of such precursors in the Canadian prairie novel as Sinclair Ross and W. O. Mitchell. He has written of the problem of establishing "any sort of close relationship in a landscape ... whose primary characteristic is distance," and his fictional practice is similarly concerned with the difficulties of encapsulating a sense of prairie experience within the closed form of the book. For the most part he has confronted this difficulty through the use of quest narratives. The Studhorse Man employs a comic analogy with The Odyssey, as the eponymous hero, Hazard Lepage, tramps the prairies in search of a mare for his stallion to "cover," so that the breed and his occupation may be preserved. Meanwhile, the narrator of the novel, Demeter Proudfoot, a Swiftian "madman" writing naked in a bathtub, embarks on his own abortive quest, as he struggles to write the definitive biography of Hazard, only to find his Boswellian endeavours culminating in a story that has more affinity with Sterne's Tristram Shandy. In Gone Indian, an American graduate student, attempting to write a thesis on the origins of the archetypal westward journey exemplified by Columbus's voyages, travels to Alberta and finds himself caught up in a carnivalesque, northwestern version of the quest for new beginnings. Badlands moves between two, interlocking quest narratives: a third-person tale about a 1916 archaeological expedition hunting for dinosaur bones, symbolic on one level of the search for a prehistoric source, and a first-person account of the expedition leader's daughter's attempt to retrace her father's footsteps, and through so doing liberate herself from paternal influence, in 1972. The protagonist in Alibi is initiated into a similar quest for an originary source, when, at the outset of the novel, his mysterious employer instructs him to find a spa.

In Kroetsch's first two novels, But We Are Exiles and The Words of My Roaring, the quest patterns demonstrate the influence of the myth criticism that was highly influential in academic circles in the 1950s and 1960s. Both novels are focused on conflicts between an older and a younger man, Freudian struggles that reflect Kroetsch's belief that the storyteller has to find ways of rejecting the authority of the previous generation. They also employ classic mythic elements, such as the doppelgänger motif, the scapegoat figure, and the cyclic continuity of death and rebirth. They foreshadow Kroetsch's subsequent attempts to evolve a distinctive Canadian fictional practice, but provide little indication of the formal innovation that would characterize his subsequent fiction.

With The Studhorse Man, Kroetsch discovered the fictional terrain for which he is best known. Built around lacunae, digressions, and narrative unreliability, it is his first major statement, written in a postmodernist mode, on the problematics of writing about the Canadian West. Demeter's attempt to record the life of Hazard, a latter-day Odysseus whose comic misadventures mainly take the form of being lured into sexual liaisons with a series of women, may initially seem to celebrate western macho values—and it is possible to read the novel as an elegy for the passing away of older male myths-but it becomes increasingly clear that Hazard's biography, as narrated by the ambivalently named Demeter (the cult of Demeter and Persephone is a myth of seasonal rebirth centered on female genealogies), interrogates popular western male mythologies. The novel moves towards an androgynous conclusion, having along the way also redefined relationships between the Canadian West and East and the western vernacular and literary discourse. In Gone Indian the American narrator, Jeremy Sadness, travels to Edmonton for an academic interview, only to find himself confronted by the possibility of transforming his identity when he discovers that he has someone else's suitcase. Prior to his journey he has had frontier fantasies, centered on Grey Owl, the English-born fake Indian, Archie Belaney. Now he is able to effect a similar transformation in his own identity in the ambience of a rural winter carnival. In this novel Kroetsch's absorption with theory manifests itself in an obvious indebtedness to Bakhtin's writing on the carnivalesque, but once again this is translated into a vividly realized comic fable that is firmly located within the Canadian West.

Badlands also initially appears to be a male quest novel. The members of the archaeological expedition undertake a quest for origins that draws on Conrad's Heart of Darkness and various classical accounts of descents into the underworld. However, the male story is framed and punctuated by the comments of the contemporary female narrator, who suggests the futility of male adventuring. In the text's present, she journeys west, as her father has done before her, refusing to play the role of a waiting Penelope in the settled eastern environment of Georgian Bay. On one level, the novel belongs very obviously to the feminist climate of the period in which it was published, the 1970s, and its account of a journey into "prehistory" is reminiscent of Margaret Atwood's Surfacing. On another level, through the use of its two narrative voices, it engages in a more dialectical debate about gender mythologies.

What the Crow Said is in many ways the strangest of all Kroetsch's western fables. It begins with a scene in which a young Albertan woman is impregnated by a swarm of bees, and the tall tale continues in this vein, relating a series of interconnected events that have more in common with Greek myth than the kind of action normally associated with the novel form. The story proceeds at breakneck pace, so that this comparatively short novel contains as much action as an epic. At the same time it demonstrates an obvious indebtedness to Gabriel Garcia Marquez, once again implicitly suggesting the need to explore and develop new conventions in order to evolve a fictional practice that can respond to the problematics of prairie "realities," seen here to be every bit as fantastic as those of Latin American "marvelous realism."

Kroetsch's quest for new forms takes a different turn again in Alibi and its companion-piece, The Puppeteer, in both of which notions of identity are radically unsettled, with Kroetsch exploring Lacanian themes of desire and concealment in elliptical texts that, despite their theoretical density, move with the swiftness and economy of a Hitchcock thriller. In The Man from the Creeks, Kroetsch tells a tale of the gold rush that once again sees the North as the last frontier. Ostensibly the narrative mode is more realistic than that of most of Kroetsch's fiction, and the ingenuous first-person narrator employs an oral register that has more in common with Kroetsch's first novels than his other more recent fiction. However, the Robert Service intertext is a highly self-conscious use of a literary source and foregrounds the extent to which the novel is mediating between a literary construction of an experience and other possible versions. While it can be seen to mark a partial retreat from fabulation and postmodernism, it is nevertheless typical of all Kroetsch's fiction in that its metaliterary elements emanate from a compelling narrative that makes extensive use of oral idioms.

-John Thieme

KUREISHI, Hanif

Nationality: British. Born: Bromley, England, 5 December 1954. Education: King's College, London, B.A. Career: Film director, playwright, screenwriter, novelist; writer-in-residence, 1981 and 1985–86, Royal Court Theatre, London. Awards: Themes Television Playwright award, 1980, for The Mother Country; George Devine award, 1981; Evening Standard award, 1985, for screenplay; Rotterdam Festival's Most Popular Film award, New York Film Critics' Circle Best Screenplay award, and National Society of Film Critics' Best Screenplay award, all 1986, all for My Beautiful Launderette; Whitbread book of the Year award, and Booksellers Association of Great Britain and Ireland first novel category, both 1990, both for The Buddha of Suburbia. Agent: Sheila Lemon, Lemon and Durbridge Ltd., 24 Pottery Lane, London W11 4 LZ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Buddha of Suburbia. London, Faber, and New York, Viking, 1990.

The Black Album. London, Faber, 1995.

Love in a Blue Time. New York, Scribner, 1997.

Intimacy. New York, Scribner, 1999.

Short Stories

Midnight All Day. London, Faber, 1999.

Plays

Soaking Up the Heat (produced London, 1976).

The Mother Country (produced London, 1980).

The King and Me (produced London, 1980).

Borderline (produced London, 1981). London, Metheun, 1981.

Cinders, adaptation of a play by Janusz Glowacki (produced London, 1981).

Tomorrow—Today! (produced London, 1981).

Birds of Passage (produced London, 1983). London, Amber Lane, 1983.

Outskirts, The King and Me, Tomorrow—Today! London, River Run Press, 1983.

Mother Courage, adaptation of a play by Bertold Brecht (produced London, 1984).

Sleep with Me. London and New York, Faber, 1999.

Screenplays: My Beautiful Launderette, 1985; published with other works as My Beautiful Laundrette and Other Writings, London, Faber and Faber, 1996; Sammy and Rosie Get Laid, 1987.

Radio Plays: You Can't Go Home, 1980; The Trial, adaptation the novel by Franz Kafka, 1982.

Other

Editor, with Jon Savage, The Faber Book of Pop. London and Boston, Faber and Faber, 1995.

*

Critical Studies: Hanif Kureishi: Postcolonial Storyteller by Kenneth C. Kaleta. Austin, University of Texas Press, 1998.

* * *

Hanif Kureishi's fiction is a conglomeration of influences; youth culture, the British Asian experience, sexuality and experimentation, politics and resistance. The Buddha of Suburbia and The Black Album, in including these influences, make a political aesthetic of their interaction. The ironies of adolescence explored in The Buddha of Suburbia depend on the ability of the reader to see wry and sly humour in the meeting of unstable cultural entities; but more significantly Kureishi's version of British Asian identity insists on critiquing the reification of that identity, and implies a necessary and layered complexity in the politics of identity in general. For this reason, Kureishi's novels make him an extraordinarily perceptive commentator on the complexities of post-coloniality and immigrant experiences, a perception that he has applied to the status of Asian identity in the widest contexts of post-1960s Britain.

The Buddha of Suburbia, Kureishi's first novel, opens with an uncovering of the "Indianness" and Englishness of the adolescent Karim. Karim asserts his right to describe himself as an "Englishman," but this soon becomes qualified ("a funny sort of Englishman") and then shifts to a discussion of "the odd mixture of continents and blood, of here and there, of belonging and not belonging, that makes me so restless and easily bored." Already established then is the assumption that the novel will examine this movement from cultural fixity to flux and that the ability to recognize the constituent parts of the result of these changes is a vital outcome in itself. The Buddha of Suburbia begins from a similar position to that described autobiographically by Kureishi in "The Rainbow Sign" (published with the script of My Beautiful Laundrette in 1986): "From the start I tried to deny my Pakistani self. I was ashamed. It was a curse and I wanted to be rid of it. I wanted to be like everyone else." The Buddha has a narrative starting point in which Karim and his father Haroon are archetypally "like everyone else"—Haroon is the perfect civil servant, Karim behaves like the typical adolescent. Yet the novel is spurred by the events that begin to transform both characters, as Haroon adopts a comically (but never entirely ridiculed) Buddhist personality while Karim develops along the unpredictable cultural and sexual trajectories of teenage life.

The Buddha of Suburbia opens up these moments of stasis. Its narrative progresses almost without the participation of its main characters; their lives are affected by perceptions of their identity constructed by those around them, and Kureishi continually emphasizes the importance of particular versions of being Indian/Muslim that resurface. The Buddha, for example, is scathing in its satire of the apparently well-intentioned liberal/left in Britain and its over-indulgence in the "East" as a site of mysticism and spirituality. Indeed most of the humor associated with Haroon in the novel depends on the discrepancy between his Islamic roots and his newfound Buddhism. Edward Said's notion that the West constructs a monolithic East for its own purposes is neatly played out through Haroon, yet with an irony at the expense of the "West" that is in some ways lacking in Said. Thus a fixed "Indian" cultural identity, desired and projected by those liberal spiritualists who come to Haroon's meditations, is never allowed to settle; it is undermined by their own inability to see Haroon's "inauthenticity" because of their preconceptions.

While liberal Western mysticism is under scrutiny in The Buddha of Suburbia, Kureishi uses his second novel to examine a more serious "usage" of marginalized racial groups in the metropolis. The Black Album is set during the Rushdie affair (when a fatwa was imposed by Iran's spiritual leader upon Salman Rushdie, author of The Satanic Verses) and takes the brave step (considering Kureishi's credentials during the Rushdie affair as someone outspoken in his defense of Rushdie) of attempting to enter the thought processes involved in the anger caused by The Satanic Verses. Shahid, the novel's central character, is placed between the familiar poles of an essentialist Asian identity (in this case anti-Rushdie fundamentalism) and Western liberalism. But The Black Album (and this is part of its comparative seriousness) produces other options within these polarities. The apparently insupportable monolithic ideology of cultural essentialism represented by Chad and Riaz is given an attraction through its ability to produce a sense of cultural cohesion, community, and comfort. From the liberal Western pole splinters Brownlow, who is used as an example of the Western leftist tendency to overprioritize the marginality of marginal groups—this becomes a drama playing out a guilt that is apparently purged if reversed. The Black Album is then more complex than The Buddha of Suburbia in the delineation of race in British society; it is also a more serious and intense piece of writing, dealing with the same issues in a more threatening, highly charged context. Kureishi's fiction has thus moved along the trajectories of the experience of post-colonial immigration in Britain with an intelligence and irony, while developing a more complex attitude to political issues and continually using narrative and writing stylistics to place that experience in its political and (popular) cultural context.

Intimacy, Kureishi's 1999 novel (at a time when his short story and screenplay writing continue to be prolific), moves away from cultural-identity politics and brings out a strand that has always been part of his writing—the loneliness, cruelty and disconnectedness of human relations. The narrator, Jay, is on the point of leaving his partner and their two children and, at times viciously and egotistically, he assesses his soon-to-be past relationship. Jay's self-justification hovers always between alienating and challenging the reader, as Kureishi dares to deploy a central character whose apparently objectionable sense of himself and disregard for others seems to be posited as necessary and universal. Intimacy's title is its key; deeply ironic at the expense of the text, the novel takes the reader to the boundaries of his own moral judgement and then asks if he can be sure of the ground he stands on. In this it shares with Kureishi's earlier two novels a belief that writing and reading should not be processes of comfort.

L

LAMMING, George (Eric)

Nationality: Barbadian. Born: Carrington Village, 8 June 1927. Education: Roebuck Boys' School; Combermere School. Career: Teacher in Trinidad, 1946–50; moved to England, 1950; host of book review programme, BBC West Indian Service, London, 1951. Writer-in-residence, University of the West Indies, Kingston, 1967–68. Coeditor of Barbados and Guyana independence issues of New World Quarterly, Kingston, 1965 and 1967. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship, 1954; Kenyon Review fellowship, 1954; Maugham award, 1957; Canada Council fellowship, 1962. D.Litt.: University of the West Indies, Cave Hill, Barbados, 1980. Address: 14-A Highbury Place, London N.5., England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

In the Castle of My Skin. London, Joseph, and New York, McGraw Hill, 1953.

The Emigrants. London, Joseph, 1954: New York, McGraw Hill, 1955.

Of Age and Innocence. London, Joseph, 1958; New York, Schocken, 1981.

Season of Adventure. London, Joseph, 1960; Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1999.

Water with Berries. London, Longman, 1971; New York, Holt Rinehart, 1972.

Natives of My Person. London, Longman, and New York, Holt Rinehart, 1972.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "David's Walk," in Life and Letters (London), November 1948.
- "Of Thorns and Thistles" and "A Wedding in Spring," in West Indian Stories, edited by Andrew Salkey. London, Faber, 1960.
- "Birds of a Feather," in Stories from the Caribbean, edited by Andrew Salkey. London, Elek, 1965; as Island Voices, New York, Liveright, 1970.
- "Birthday Weather," in Caribbean Literature, edited by G.R. Coulthard. London, University of London Press, 1966.

Other

The Pleasures of Exile. London, Joseph, 1960; Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1992.

Influencia del Africa en las literaturas antillanas, with Henry Bangou and René Depestre. Montevideo, Uruguay, I.L.A.C., 1972.

The Most Important People, with Kathleen Drayton. Bridgetown, Barbados, Drayton, 1981.

Western Education and the Caribbean Intellectual: Coming, Coming, Coming Home. New York, House of Nehesi, 1995.

Coming, Coming Home: Conversations II: Monographs. Philipsburg, St. Martin, House of Nehesi, 1995.

Editor, Cannon Shot and Glass Beads: Modern Black Writing. London, Pan, 1974.

Editor, On the Canvas of the World. Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago Institute of the West Indies, 1999.

*

Bibliographies: George Lamming: A Select Bibliography, Cave Hill, Barbados, University of the West Indies Main Library, 1980.

Critical Studies: The Novels of George Lamming by Sandra Pouchet Paquet, London, Heinemann, 1982; Anancy in the Great House: Ways of Reading West Indian Fiction by Joyce Jonas, New York and London, Greenwood Press, 1990; Caliban in Exile: The Outsider in Caribbean Fiction by Margaret Paul Joseph, New York and London, Greenwood Press, 1992; Caliban's Curse: George Lamming and the Revisioning of History by Supriya Nair. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1996.

Theatrical Activities: Director: Play—Meet Me at Golden Hill, Barbados, 1974.

* * *

The critical reception of George Lamming's first four novels fell short of their real merits and originality. It is often said that Lamming demands too much of the reader; it might be truer to say that the reader demands too little of Lamming. West Indian fiction has often been distinguished by a certain energy and rhetorical glow but not, except in the work of Lamming and Wilson Harris, by much complexity of form or texture. Right from his first book, In the Castle of My Skin, Lamming made it clear that the real complexity of West Indian experience demanded some adequate response of its writers. He has since elaborated this view in an important essay called "The Negro Writer and His World," where he wrote: "To speak of his [the Negro Writer's situation is to speak of a general need to find a center as well as a circumference which embraces some reality whose meaning satisfies his intellect and may prove pleasing to his senses. But a man's life assumes meaning first in relation to other men ..." In the Castle of My Skin may at first appear to be an autobiography of childhood, but it soon becomes apparent that the book is also the collective autobiography of a Barbadian village moving through the break-up of the old plantation system dominated by the Great House and into the new age of nationalism, industrial unrest and colonial repression. The four boys who stand at the center of the book are given a more or less equal importance though it is "George" who ultimately registers the meaning of their disparate experiences as they are driven asunder by education, travel, and emerging social distinctions.

The collective quality already evident in this, the most personal of all Lamming's books, is more strongly present in The Emigrants. Here the portrait is of one boatload of the black emigrants (the title is significant, for it stresses what they leave as well as what they find) who flocked from the Caribbean to Britain between 1950 and 1962. On the boat the emigrants discover a new identity as "West Indians," only to lose it again as they fly centrifugally apart under the stresses of life in an alien culture.

The Emigrants is the saddest of all Lamming's books, because there is almost no focus of hope amid so much disillusionment and despair. By contrast both Of Age and Innocence and Season of Adventure are powerfully positive books in which what is shed is a set of values adhering to the older generation, those who are unable to match the pace and tendency of the times. Of Age and Innocence is set in San Cristobal, a fictional Caribbean island colony rapidly approaching independence. The dominant generation of islanders is unable to break away from its class and racial identities to work together for a new society which will redeem the past of slavery and colonialism, but it is throughout juxtaposed to the generation of its children, who struggle towards that meaning which the nationalist leader Shepherd has glimpsed and then lost again.

I had always lived in the shadow of a meaning which others had placed on my presence in the world, and I had played no part at all in making that meaning, like a chair which is wholly at the mercy of the idea guiding the hand of the man who builds it.... But like the chair, I have played no part at all in making that meaning which others use to define me completely.

Shepherd is destroyed by the forces of the past, but the children look out through the flames of destruction which end the novel towards a future they have already presaged in their games. At the center of Season of Adventure stands another unawakened character, the "big-shot coloured" girl Fola, whose father is a West Indian police officer imbued with all the old ideas of order, dominance, and segregation. A visit to a Voduñ ceremony awakens her to the real capacity of her nature for self-discovery and self-renewal. This awakening by ancestral drums is in itself a cliché of Caribbean literature, but here it escapes banality by the intensity of Lamming's lyrical style and the bizarre violence of much of the action. Season of Adventure is in some ways the finest of his novels, just as The Emigrants is certainly the weakest. Yet the hesitancy which overtakes the drums at the end of the novel, in the very moment of their triumph as the expression of popular values, is analogous to the problem of language Lamming faces in projecting a West Indian culture which will be truly united, consistent and free: "But remember the order of the drums ... for it is the language which every nation needs if its promises and its myths are to become a fact."

After a silence of more than ten years, Lamming published two new novels within a year. These were powerfully contrasted in style and theme. Water with Berries is superficially a naturalistic novel about three West Indian artists living difficult and ever more lonely lives in modern London. Gradually, however (and the quotation of Caliban in the title gives a clue), the reader becomes aware that this is a study of what happens when Caliban comes to Prospero's original home. The revenges of history work themselves out through characters who are helpless to prevent completing the bizarre and violent patterns of the past. Each of the friends is an aspect of Caliban and each passes through an extreme personal crisis at the novel's end. But Derek, erect upon the stage before a howling audience, having completed the rape of Miranda at last, or Teeton, erect upon a northern island after destroying his last links with the racial past, have at least sketched the possibilities of freedom from these tyrannies of history.

Natives of My Person is more of an extended reverie upon certain dominant themes in Atlantic mythology—the demonic captain, the slave-ship, the imprisoned Amerindian prince, the crew variously haunted by tragedy and terror—which are treated like themes in music. The style is deliberately wrought from the timbers of seventeenth-century maritime prose, in which this mythology finds its roots. Hence the novel voyages freely in the dimension of spacetime, deriving its structure simply from the musical resolution of its dominant themes. This is a work of great beauty, originality, and difficulty, which may finally prove to be Lamming's most important achievement.

-Gerald Moore

LANGE, John

See CRICHTON, (John) Michael

Le CARRÉ, John

Pseudonym for David John Moore Cornwell. Nationality: British. Born: Poole, Dorset, 19 October 1931. Education: Sherborne School, Dorset; St. Andrew's Preparatory School; Bern University, Switzerland, 1948-49; Lincoln College, Oxford, B.A. (honours) in modern languages 1956. Family: Married 1) Alison Ann Veronica Sharp in 1954 (divorced 1971), three sons; 2) Valerie Jane Eustace in 1972, one son. Career: Tutor, Eton College, Berkshire, 1956-58; member of the British Foreign Service, 1959-64: second secretary, Bonn Embassy, 1961–64; consul, Hamburg, 1963–64. Awards: British Crime Novel award, 1963; Maugham award, 1964; Mystery Writers of America Edgar Allan Poe award, 1965, and Grand Master award, 1984; Crime Writers Association Gold Dagger, 1978, 1980, and Diamond Dagger, 1988; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1978; Nikos Kasanzakis prize, 1991. Honorary doctorate: University of Exeter 1990; St. Andrews University, 1996; University of Southampton; University of Bath. Honorary fellow, Lincoln College, 1984. Agent: David Higham Associates, 5-8 Lower John Street, London W1R 4HA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Call for the Dead. London, Gollancz, 1961; New York, Walker, 1962; as The Deadly Affair, London, Penguin, 1966.

A Murder of Quality. London, Gollancz, 1962; New York, Walker, 1963.

The Spy Who Came In from the Cold. London, Gollancz, 1963; New York, Coward McCann, 1964.

The Looking-Glass War. London, Heinemann, and New York, Coward McCann, 1965.

A Small Town in Germany. London, Heinemann, and New York, Coward McCann, 1968.

The Naive and Sentimental Lover. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1971; New York, Knopf, 1972.

The Quest for Karla. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Knopf, 1982.

Tinker, Tailor, Soldier, Spy. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Knopf, 1974.

The Honourable Schoolboy. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Knopf, 1977.

Smiley's People. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Knopf, 1980.

The Little Drummer Girl. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Knopf, 1983.

A Perfect Spy. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Knopf, 1986.

The Russia House. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Knopf, 1989.

The Secret Pilgrim. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Knopf, 1991.

The Night Manager. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Knopf, 1993.

Our Game. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Knopf, 1995.

John Le Carré: Three Complete Novels (contains Tinker, Tailor, Soldier, Spy, The Honourable Schoolboy, and Smiley's People). New York, Wings Books, 1995.

The Tailor of Panama. New York, Knopf, 1996. Single & Single. New York, Scribner, 1999.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Dare I Weep, Dare I Mourn," in Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia), 28 January 1967.
- "What Ritual Is Being Observed Tonight?," in Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia), 2 November 1968.

Play

Television Play: Smiley's People, with John Hopkins, from the novel by le Carré, 1982.

Other

The Clandestine Muse. Portland, Oregon, Seluzicki, 1986.Vanishing England, with Gareth H. Davies. Topsfield, Massachusetts, Salem House, 1987.

*

Film Adaptations: The Spy Who Came In from the Cold, 1965; The Deadly Affair, from the work Call for the Dead, 1967; The Looking Glass War, 1970; Tinker, Tailor, Soldier, Spy (for television), 1980; Smiley's People (for television), 1982; The Little Drummer Girl, 1984; The Russia House, 1990; A Murder of Quality (for television), 1991; The Tailor of Panama, 2000.

Critical Studies: John le Carré by Peter Lewis, New York, Ungar, 1985, London, Lorrimer, 1986; The Novels of John le Carré: The Art of Survival, Oxford, Blackwell, 1985, and Smiley's Circus: A Guide to the Secret World of John le Carré, London, Orbis, 1986, both by David Monaghan; John le Carré by Eric Homberger, London, Methuen, 1986; Taking Sides: The Fiction of John le Carré by Tony Barley, Milton Keynes, Buckinghamshire, Open University Press, 1986; Corridors of Deceit: The World of John le Carré by Peter Wolfe, Bowling Green, Ohio, Popular Press, 1987; The Quest for John le Carré edited by Alan Bold, London, Vision Press, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1988; Understanding John Le Carré by John L. Cobbs, Columbia, South Carolina, University of South Carolina Press, 1998; The Spy Novels of John Le Carré: Balancing Ethics and Politics by Myron J. Aronoff, New York, St. Martin's Press, 1998.

* * *

Though John le Carré had written two thrillers, Call for the Dead and A Murder of Quality, it was when The Spy Who Came In from the Cold was published that it became obvious that a new talent for writing a different kind of spy story had emerged. Le Carré caught a new mood of chilling horror in this picture of the beastliness underlying the espionage of the cold war, for this is a novel which shows how man's capacity for inhumanity to man and woman is heightened through the process of espionage. The style matches the material. The moods evoked are of gray despair. The tone is cold, almost clinical. The conversations convince; they have the authentic texture of contemporary speech. And the details of the British, Dutch and German background are painted in with a casual assurance. The story is unfolded, given fresh twists, until the reality of life itself becomes warped. Leamas, the British agent, is created convincingly; he carries out his role of defector only to find that his own people have framed him, in order to frame Fiedler, an East German who has discovered the truth about Mundt, his chief.

This is a world of intellectual skills applied arbitrarily, of brilliance without scruple, of brutality without restraint. The inexorable march of the story continues: its destiny is disaster, the same kind of disaster which opens its account of the effects of treason and betrayal. And yet in the final moment Leamas returns for Liz, the English communist party member who befriended him in London, who has been brought to East Germany to testify against him. Before their final moments, before they attempt to cross the Berlin wall, he makes his apology to her. To him it seems the world has gone mad. His life and hers, their dignity, are a tiny price to pay. They are, ultimately, the victims of a temporary alliance of expediency. His people save Mundt because they need him, "so that," he says to her, "the great moronic mass that you admire can sleep soundly in their beds at night. They need him for the safety of ordinary crummy people like you and me." He sees the loss of Fiedler's life as part of the small-scale war which is being waged, with a wastage of innocent life sometimes, though it is still smaller than other wars. Leamas doesn't believe in anything, but he sees people cheated, misled, lives thrown away, "people shot and in prison, whole groups and classes of men written off for nothing." Her party, he remarks, was built on the bodies of ordinary people, and she remembers the German prison wardress describing the prison as one for those who slow down the march, "for those who think they have the right to err."

Le Carré's next book, The Looking-Glass War, carries his exploration of the work of intelligence services further. This story opens impressively, with the death of a courier who has gone to Finland to pick up films made by the pilot of a commercial flight apparently off course over Eastern Germany. An unconfirmed report indicates the likelihood of a rocket site there. Then a small intelligence unit is authorized to put an agent into the area. The preparations are described in detail: the recruiting and training of the agent, the ineptitude involved, and the rivalry among the different agencies—and ultimately the schooled indifference with which the older professionals see their scheme fail abysmally. They are already planning the future, disowning the agent whose slow broadcasting on single frequencies on an obsolete radio has doomed him to capture. The story is well told; it explores the stresses and the vanities, the dangerous risks, even delusions, which beset the world of intelligence; it has a curious pathos, accentuated by the naivety and decency of the young man Avery which is opposed in fury by Haldane, who has become a technician: "We sent him because we needed to; we abandon him because we must."

In A Small Town in Germany there is an enlarging of scope. Here is a story of the British embassy in Bonn, from which secret files—and Leo Harting—have vanished. Turner comes from London to investigate. His interrogations of some of the embassy staff are brilliant. The pattern of thieving, of treachery, of insinuation, of making himself indispensable, of using others, emerges slowly as Turner tries to build up his picture of Leo Harting. The contrasts of personalities as Turner painstakingly pursues his inquiries give this picture depth, and yet the nature of the vanished man remains elusive. The complications of the British negotiations in Brussels where German support is necessary, the student riots, and the ugly neonazism give the man-hunt an extreme urgency. The attitude of the German authorities, and that of the Head of Chancery, surprise Turner. And the events he unravels surprise the reader.

The novel has a continuous tension; the discoveries of the investigator are cumulative, and finally his aggressive desire to hunt out the missing man turns to a sympathetic understanding of just what Harting has been doing. At this point his attitude differs markedly from that of the Head of Chancery. To a certain extent his reactions are parallel to those of Avery in The Looking-Glass War. Both are younger men, outside the orthodoxies of their elders, possessed ultimately of more humanity, though they have no capacity to influence the final stages of the story. The difference lies between the character who professes to control the processes of his own mind and the character who believes we are born free, we are not automatons and cannot control the processes of our minds. The novel is, in fact, about the problems of forgetting, and about the problems of idealism, innocence, and practical politics; and the incidental picture it gives of the complex working life of an embassy provides a very suitable background against which political issues can be spotlit.

The Naive and Sentimental Lover lacks the punch and energy of his earlier works. In them the tendency of the characters to be warped, maimed, frustrated men and women mattered little because the action backed by skillful description carried the plot forward at such headlong speed that analysis of character per se was less important than the actions taken by the participants. In this novel there is a need for a deeper analysis of character, and this does not seem to have been fully achieved, while the story does not move with the same sureness. However, it is likely that le Carré was experimenting with a new genre, and just as The Spy Who Came In from the Cold needed preliminary studies this may herald a development in character depiction similar to his earlier advances in technique and architectonic power in The Spy Who Came In from the Cold, which will remain as a chilling exposé of the continuous underground battle of intelligence services.

Tinker, Tailor, Soldier, Spy and The Honourable Schoolboy are both surpassed by Smiley's People, the narrative art of which is combined with a sympathetic compassion for its characters. Here le Carré shows Smiley torn by loyalties, uncovering instead of covering up the murder of an ex-agent, and in the process peeling layer after layer from the mystery of betrayal, getting steadily closer to his old enemy the Russian Karla. The story moves deliberately, the details are amassed, but the tension is maintained right to the climax. This is a tour de force because its present action demands an understanding of the past, and that past is revealed so skillfully that its actions live as a pressing part of the present. The reader is involved in the characters' memories, their evasions and searchings.

In The Little Drummer Girl le Carré portrays the violent conflicts of Arab and Israeli, moving his characters freely about Europe as he tightens the tense atmosphere created by terrorism. His characters are meticulous in their attention to detail; he conveys the concentration, the ruthlessness, the tyranny of abstract concepts made utterly inhuman. This is a story in which several ways of looking at life—and the deaths of victims—are juxtaposed convincingly; the effect is achieved through le Carré's capacity to create confidence in his readers through an inside knowledge of how terrorists and counter-terrorists operate.

A Perfect Spy and The Russia House both show le Carré's maturity, his established mastery of his medium. In The Russia House he moves to the new situation in the Soviet Union and brings alive the nature of its strange society. Deftly he indicates the effect of glasnost, the shift from suppression of public debate to new speculation, new credulity, new idealism, all balanced by old shortages, old skepticism, old inertias. The analysis is effective, the shifting pattern of change suggested with subtlety, the tension maintained. Bailey, the blundering British publisher, and Katya, the unselfish Russian woman with whom he falls in love, hold our attention, watched over by the British and American intelligence agents. It is convincing, at times moving, always exciting; it blends irony with a sense of the absurdity of suspicion, while at the same time suggesting the need for political caution in reacting to the unpredictable turmoil of the then-contemporary Soviet scene.

The Secret Pilgrim is a collection of short stories that functions as a novel, or a novel broken into a series of stories. In this context, the method of disjointed chapters serves well to tell the story of a spy's education, and of the sometimes pathetic characters he has encountered in his career. The Tailor of Panama illustrates how le Carré can reduce a story of global proportions to one on a very personal scale, and moreover how he has effectively moved beyond the lines of the Cold War-not to mention his penchant for humor both dry and black. Under false pretenses, protagonist Harry Prendel operates a tailor shop in Panama, and when he is called down by an agent of British intelligence named Andrew Osnard, he has to come up with "evidence" of a conspiracy involving the transfer of the Panama Canal from U.S. to Panamanian hands. The title of le Carré's next novel, Single & Single, refers to the name of a shady British bank that assists Russian black marketeers with money laundering. When the Russians shoot a bank employee and company president Tiger Single has to go into hiding, his son Oliver sets out—rather like Telemachus in the Odyssey-to avenge his father. What ensues is indeed an odyssey of sorts, one that shows le Carré at his intriguing best.

-A. Norman Jeffares

LEE, Chang-rae

Nationality: American. Born: Seoul, South Korea, 29 July 1965. Education: Yale University, B.A. 1987; University of Oregon, M.F.A. 1993. Family: Married Michelle Branca in 1993. Career: Assistant professor of creative writing, University of Oregon, Eugene, 1993—. Agent: Amanda Urban, International Creative Management, 40 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10019, U.S.A. Address:

Creative Writing Program, University of Oregon, Eugene, Oregon 97403, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Native Speaker. New York, Riverhead Books, 1995. A Gesture Life. New York, Riverhead Books, 1999.

* * *

Chang-rae Lee, the first Korean-American novelist to be published by a major press, focuses on the experiences of first- and second-generation immigrants. His novels explore the nuances of intergenerational relations, the problems of assimilation, and the relationship of culture and memory to identity. While these concerns link him to other contemporary Asian-American writers, Lee's fiction also draws heavily on other influences. Lee experiments with form in his first novel, Native Speaker, which is part detective story, part minimalist chronicle of a failing marriage, reminiscent of John Updike. His prose style has been compared to that of both John Cheever and Kazuo Ishiguro.

In Native Speaker, Korean-American Henry Park must negotiate the dual forces of alienation and assimilation to establish a coherent ethnic identity. Park, an undercover investigator for a private firm whose specialty is infiltrating ethnic enclaves, describes his work as creating "a string of serial identity." Lee presents Park's skill at intelligence gathering and impersonation as an extension of his bicultural childhood, in which his Korean identity of home differed widely from his American identity at school. But Park's ability to assimilate, to portray American-ness, veils his persistent inability to establish a workable ethnic identity. We meet Park in the midst of a separation from his Caucasian wife, Lelia, who has left Park a list of traits that define him, including "stranger," "emotional alien," and "false speaker of language." Park's desire to reunite with Lelia leads him to confront this habit of presenting facades; to restore his life, Park must find and then "speak" a self that is his own. In this tightly woven narrative, Lee integrates Park's memories of childhood, his quest to regain Lelia, and his increasingly dangerous undercover assignment as an aid to the Korean-American politician, John Kwang, in order to explore the complex process of identity formation.

Lee's second novel, A Gesture Life, revisits the themes of alienation and displacement developed in Native Speaker. The narrator, "Doc" Hata, is doubly displaced, as an ethnic Korean raised in Japan who immigrates to America after serving in the Japanese Army during World War II. Hata runs a successful medical supply business and becomes a leading civic figure and prototypical private, suburban resident in Bedley Run, a rich community in upstate New York. From the outside, his life, like his impeccable Tudor home, seems complete, but from the inside, both are sterile and isolated. Hata's adopted daughter, Sunny, a Japanese orphan, remains distant and aloof, and Hata himself never fully connects to his new community or to the woman who becomes his lover; instead, Hata remains a marginal character in his own life. His commanding officer in Japan is the first to suggest that he leads the "gesture life" of the title, following the form but missing the essential meaning of any activity, but his daughter too finds this emphasis on gesture to be the central fact of Hata's life. In this novel, Lee emphasizes Hata's personal history and the displacement itself more than Korean cultural background as the cause of Hata's reserve.

For the narrators of both of these novels, form often substitutes for essence, as they assimilate by learning in detail the language, gestures, and attitudes of Americans but have difficulty expressing their selves through these gestures. But the brilliance of Lee's novels lies precisely in his focus on these minute details of daily life, and in his ability to convey emotional depth through these detached narrators.

-Suzanne Lane

LEE, Sky

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Port Alberni, British Columbia, 1952. Education: University of British Columbia, B.A.; Douglas College, diploma in nursing. Family: Has one son. Career: Nurse and writer.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Disappearing Moon Cafe. Vancouver, Douglas and McIntyre, 1990;Seattle, Washington, Seal Press, 1991.Bellydancer. Vancouver, Press Gang, 1994.

Short Stories

Teach Me to Fly, Skyfighter! and Other Stories, with Paul Yee. Toronto, Lorimer, 1983.

* * *

In "All Spikes but the Last" (1957), F. R. Scott rebukes E. J. Pratt for failing in his epic, Towards the Last Spike (1952), to acknowledge the contribution Chinese laborers made in finishing the transnational Canadian Pacific Railway. "Where are the coolies in your poem, Ned? / Where are the thousands from China who swung their picks with bare hands at forty below?" Who, Scott asks, "has sung their story?"

A revisionist narrative returning presence to historical absence, defying silence with song and story, Disappearing Moon Cafe tells the story of Vancouver's Chinese community, whose role in British Columbia's development has, until recently, been disregarded. Sky Lee's novel is a formidable addition to the growing, though relatively small, body of Chinese-Canadian literature. Epic in scope and intent, spanning four generations and nearly a century (1892 to 1986), Disappearing Moon Cafe weighs the cultural cost of survival, particularly for generations of Chinese-Canadian women, and charts the tangled connections between Wong Gwei Chang, who is entrusted by the Chinese community with the responsibility of collecting the bones of laborers who died building the railway and returning them to China for burial, and his descendants. Great-granddaughter Kae Ying Woo, inspired by her pregnancy, narrates the story and exposes murky familial secrets. Like her ancestor, Kae searches for her family's bones. Powerful vignettes, flashbacks, multiple perspectives, and temporal juxtapositions are features of her narrative as she wrestles with the problems of knowing and representing the past. At times, though, the sameness of Lee's narration and its occasional inchoateness restrain the promising elasticity of her invention.

Lee's family saga deals with repatriation and assimilation, the tug between cultures. The young migrants maintain connections with China to protect themselves from the Canadian wilderness and nativism. But as they settle down and have families, as the Canadian government restricts passage between China and Canada, and as China is politically transformed and then isolated, their Canadianborn children forge new identities, negotiating the conflicting demands of the old world, where customs and laws are clear, and the new, where values are less certain. For some, such as relocated village teenager Wong Choy Fuk, this is easy. He proves "amazingly quick to shed his bumpkin ways in favour of a more cocky western style." Indeed, the cafe of the title is symbolically divided in two. One section, "a nostalgic replica of an old-fashioned Chinese teahouse," is very popular with "homesick Chinese clientele;" the other, a "more modern counter-and-booth section," enchants Choy Fuk: "He loved the highly polished chrome and brightly lit glass, the checkerboard tiles on the floor, the marble countertop. And except for the customers, his mother, and perhaps the cacti, there was nothing Chinese about it."

The family plays an important role offsetting the dislocations of immigration. Mui Lan, Gwei Chang's Chinese wife, expends considerable malicious energy ensuring that the Wong name does not evaporate. Although her obsession with her daughter-in-law's fertility may appear to be a traditional Chinese concern, conditions in Canada—the Canadian government imposed an expensive head tax and then prohibited Chinese immigration for many years, thus obstructing the possibility of family reunion—helped shape and exacerbate this concern also.

The genealogy of the Wong family, a potential dynasty, structures Disappearing Moon Cafe. Maintaining a pure lineage is impossible, as Kae discovers when she probes the secrets, allegiances, demands, and contradictions of family. Anything is permissible, so long as a son is born and the Wong name perpetuated. Security, honor, and prestige, for example, will be Fong Mei's reward on the condition that she let her husband, Choy Fuk, who we later learn is impotent, sleep with Song An, a waitress at Disappearing Moon Cafe. The Wong family tree prefaces the story; primarily Chinese, it includes aboriginal Shi'atko and an anonymous French-Canadian woman, although both are nominal figures. Positioning the family tree at the start of the narrative and thus disclosing the infidelities and incest that motivate various characters does, however, drain the narrative of much of its tension.

Lee's 1994 short story collection, Bellydancer, augments her range of characters, if not her colloquial prose, which favors explanation and exclamation over ellipsis. Some stories focus on Chinese-Canadian experience and expand upon themes addressed in Disappearing Moon Cafe—"Broken Teeth" is about conflict between a mother born in China and her Canadian-born daughter, and the marvelous "The Soong Sisters" revolves around a genealogy only slightly less complicated than the Wong family's. Others consider relationships: heterosexual, lesbian, and, in "Safe Sex," something mysterious that transcends gender altogether.

-Stephen Milnes

LE GUIN, Ursula K(roeber)

Nationality: American. Born: Berkeley, California, 21 October 1929; daughter of the anthropologist Alfred L. Kroeber. Education: Radcliffe College, Cambridge, Massachusetts, AB in French 1951 (Phi Beta Kappa); Columbia University, New York (Faculty fellow; Fulbright fellow, 1953), MA in romance languages 1952. Family: Married Charles A. Le Guin in 1953; two daughters and one son Career: Instructor in French, Mercer University, Macon, Georgia, 1954, and University of Idaho, Moscow, 1956; department secretary, Emory University, Atlanta, 1955; taught writing workshops at Pacific University, Forest Grove, Oregon, 1971, University of Washington, Seattle, 1971-73, Portland State University, Oregon, 1974, 1977, 1979, 1995, in Melbourne, Australia, 1975, at the University of Reading, England, 1976, Indiana Writers Conference, Bloomington, 1978 and 1983, and University of California, San Diego, 1979. Awards: Boston Globe-Horn Book award, 1968; Nebula award, 1969, 1975, 1990, 1996; Hugo award, 1970, 1973, 1974, 1975, 1988; National Book award, 1972; Newbery Silver Medal award, 1972; Locus award, 1973, 1984, 1995, 1996; Jupiter award, 1975 (twice), 1976; Gandalf award, 1979; Lewis Carroll Shelf award, 1979; University of Oregon Distinguished Service award, 1981; Janet Kafka award, 1986; Prix Lectures-Jeunesse (France), 1987; Pushcart prize, 1991: Harold Vursell award, 1991: Oregon Institute of Literary Arts HL Davis award, 1992; Hubbub Annual Poetry award, 1995; Asimov's Reader's award, 1995; James Tiptree, Jr. Award, 1995; Theodore Sturgeon Award, 1995; Retrospective Award, 1996, 1997. Guest of Honor, World Science Fiction Convention, 1975. DLitt: Bucknell University, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, 1978; Lawrence University, Appleton, Wisconsin, 1979; DHL: Lewis and Clark College, Portland, 1983; Occidental College, Los Angeles, 1985. Lives in Portland, Oregon. Agent: Virginia Kidd, 538 East Harford Street, Milford, Pennsylvania 18337, USA

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Rocannon's World. New York, Ace, 1966; London, Tandem, 1972. Planet of Exile. New York, Ace, 1966; London, Tandem, 1972. City of Illusions. New York, Ace, 1967; London, Gollancz, 1971.

A Wizard of Earthsea. Berkeley, California, Parnassus Press, 1968; London, Gollancz, 1971

The Left Hand of Darkness. New York, Ace, and London, Macdonald, 1969; 25th anniversary edition, with a new afterword and appendices by the author, New York, Walker, 1994.

The Lathe of Heaven. New York, Scribner, 1971; London, Gollancz, 1972.

The Tombs of Atuan. New York, Atheneum, 1971; London, Gollancz, 1972.

The Farthest Shore. New York, Atheneum, 1972; London, Gollancz, 1973.

The Dispossessed: An Ambiguous Utopia. New York, Harper, and London, Gollancz, 1974.

The Word for World Is Forest. New York, Putnam, 1976; London, Gollancz. 1977.

Earthsea. London, Gollancz, 1977; as The Earthsea Trilogy, London, Penguin, 1979.

Malafrena. New York, Putnam, 1979; London, Gollancz, 1980.
The Eye of the Heron. New York, Harper, and London, Gollancz, 1983.

Always Coming Home. New York, Harper, 1985; London, Gollancz, 1986.

Tehanu: The Last Book of Earthsea. New York, Atheneum, and London, Gollancz, 1990.

Buffalo Gals, Won't You Come Out Tonight, illustrated by Susan Seddon Boulet, San Francisco, Pomegranate Artbooks, 1994.Four Ways to Forgiveness. New York, HarperPrism, 1995.

Short Stories

The Wind's Twelve Quarters. New York, Harper, 1975; London, Gollancz, 1976.

The Water Is Wide. Portland, Oregon, Pendragon Press, 1976. Orsinian Tales. New York, Harper, 1976; London, Gollancz, 1977. The Compass Rose. New York, Harper, 1982; London, Gollancz, 1982

The Visionary: The Life Story of Flicker of the Serpentine, with Wonders Hidden, by Scott Russell Sanders Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1984.

Buffalo Gals and Other Animal Presences. (includes verse) Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1987; as Buffalo Gals, London, Gollancz, 1990.

Searoad. New York, HarperCollins, 1991; London, Gollancz, 1992.
A Fisherman of the Inland Sea: Science Fiction Stories, New York, HarperPerennial, 1994.

Worlds of Exile and Illusion. New York, Orb, 1996.

Fiction (for children)

Very Far Away from Anywhere Else. New York, Atheneun, 1976; as A Very Long Way from Anywhere Else, London, Gollancz, 1976.
 Leese Webster. New York, Atheneum, 1979; London, Gollancz, 1981.

The Beginning Place. New York, Harper, 1980; as Threshold, London, Gollancz, 1980

The Adventure of Cobbler's Rune. New York, Virginia, Cheap Street, 1982.

Solomon Leviathan's Nine Hundred and Thirty-First Trip Around the World. New Castle, Virginia, Cheap Street, 1983.

A Visit from Dr Katz. New York, Atheneum, 1988; as Dr Katz, London, Collins, 1988.

Catwings. New York, Orchard, 1988.

Catwings Return. New York, Orchard, 1989.

Fire and Stone. New York, Atheneum, 1989.

A Ride on the Red Mare's Back. New York, Orchard, 1992.

Fish Soup. New York, Atheneum, 1992.

Wonderful Alexander and the Catwings. New York, Orchard, 1994. Tom Mouse, illustrated by Julie Downing, New York, DK, 1998.

Jane on Her Own: A Catwings Tale, illustrations by S.D. Schindler. New York, Orchard Books, 1999.

Plays

No Use to Talk to Me, in The Altered Eye, edited by Lee Harding Melbourne, Norstrilia Press, 1976; New York, Berkley, 1980.

King Dog(screenplay), with Dorstoevsky, by Raymond Carver and Tess Gallagher Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1985.

Poetry

Wild Angels. Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1975.

Tillai and Tylissos, with Theodora K. Quinn. Np, Red Bull Press, 1979.

Torrey Pines Reserve. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1980.

Gwilan's Harp. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1981.

Hard Words and Other Poems. New York, Harper, 1981.

In the Red Zone. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1983.

Wild Oats and Fireweed. New York, Harper, 1988.

Blue Moon over Thurman Street. Portland, Oregon, NewSage Press,

Going Out with Peacocks and Other Poems New York, HarperPerennial, 1994

Sixty Odd: New Poems. Boston, Shambhala, 1999.

Other

From Elfland to Poughkeepsie (lecture). Portland, Oregon, Pendragon Press, 1973.

Dreams Must Explain Themselves. New York, Algol Press, 1975. The Language of the Night: Essays on Fantasy and Science Fiction, edited by Susan Wood. New York, Putnam, 1979; revised edition, London, Women's Press, 1989.

The Seasons of Oling: For Narrator, Viola, Cello, Piano, Percussion (words), music by Elinor Armer. Albany, California, Overland

Music Distributors, 1987.

Dancing at the Edge of the World: Thoughts on Words, Women, Places. New York, Grove Press, and London, Gollancz, 1989.

The Way the Water's Going: Images of the Northern California Coastal Range, photographs by Ernest Waugh and Alan Nicolson. New York, Harper, 1989.

Tao Te Ching: A Book about the Way and the Power of the Way (Paraphraser, with J.P. Seaton), by Lao Tzu. Boston, Shambhala, 1007

Steering the Craft: Exercises and Discussions on Story Writing for the Lone Navigator or the Mutinous Crew. Portland, Oregon, Eighth Mountain Press, 1998.

Editor, Nebula Award Stories 11. London, Gollancz, 1976; New York, Harper, 1977.

Editor, with Virginia Kidd, Interfaces. New York, Ace, 1980.

Editor, with Virginia Kidd, Edges. New York, Pocket Books, 1980. Editor, with Brian Attebery, The Norton Book of Science Fiction: North American Science Fiction, 1960–1990. New York, Norton, 1993.

Recordings: The Ones Who Walk Away from Omelas, Alternate World, 1976; Gwilan's Harp and Intracom, Caedmon, 1977; The Earthsea Triology, Colophone, 1981; Music and Poetry of the Kesh, Valley Productions, 1985

*

Bibliography: Ursula K Le Guin: A Primary and Secondary Bibliography by Elizabeth Cummins Cogell, Boston, Hall, 1983.

Manuscript Collection: University of Oregon Library, Eugene.

Critical Studies: The Farthest Shores of Ursula K. Le Guin by George Edgar Slusser, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1976; "Ursula Le Guin Issue" of Science-Fiction Studies (Terre Haute, Indiana), March 1976; Ursula Le Guin by Joseph D. Olander and Martin H. Greenberg, New York, Taplinger, and Edinburgh, Harris, 1979; Ursula K. Le Guin: Voyage to Inner Lands and to Outer Space edited by Joseph W. De Bolt, Port Washington, New York, Kennikat Press, 1979; Ursula K. Le Guin by Barbara J. Bucknall, New York, Ungar, 1981; Ursula K. Le Guin by Charlotte Spivack, Boston, Twayne, 1984; Approaches to the Fiction of Ursula K. Le Guin by James Bittner, Ann Arbor, Michigan, UMI Research Press, and Epping, Essex, Bowker, 1984; Understanding Ursula K. Le Guin by Elizabeth Cummins Cogell, Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1990; Zephyr and Boreas: Winds of Change in the Fiction of Ursula K. Le Guin: A Festschrift in Memory of Pilgrim Award Winner, Marjorie Hope Nicolson (1894-1981), edited by Robert Reginald and George Edgar Slusser, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1996; Between Two Worlds: The Literary Dilemma of Ursula K. Le Guin by George Edgar Slusser, San Bernardino, Calif., Borgo Press, 1996; Presenting Ursula K. Le Guin by Suzanne Elizabeth Reid, New York, Twayne Publishers and London, Prentice Hall International, 1997.

* * *

Ursula K. Le Guin's earliest works attracted, almost exclusively, the devoted audience of science-fiction readers. Rocannon's World, Planet of Exile, and City of Illusions are interconnected novels which depict a situation entirely familiar to such readers. Earth and other planets of a far-future "League of All Worlds" are peopled by "Human" races which must struggle to recognize one another as such. The League prepares to meet a rather vaguely defined invasion from afar. Heroes out of touch with lost civilization undertake quests of self-discovery, or get the enemy's location through to headquarters just in time to repel the invasion. In short, Le Guin offers us space opera, although the delicate tone, the theme of communication, and the imagery of light and darkness suggest her future development.

With The Left Hand of Darkness, The Word for World Is Forest, the Earthsea fantasy trilogy, and The Disposessed, Le Guin moved to another level, and began, deservedly, to attract an audience outside the science-fiction ghetto. The treatment of androgyny in The Left Hand of Darkness has made the book into a minor classic. The League of All Worlds has been succeeded by a non-imperialistic "Ekumen," which sends a lone envoy, Genly Ai, to make an alliance with the isolated planet Winter (Gethen). The Ekumen has no wish to subdue Winter but to extend "the evolutionary tendency inherent in Being; one manifestation of which is exploration." Subverting the stock situation of civilization brought to the savages, Le Guin has Ai learn at least as much from the relatively primitive Gethenians as they from him. Gethenians mate only once a month, and they may adopt alternatively male and females roles. We learn at one point that "the King is pregnant." Ai, a male chauvinist, learns how difficult it is to think of our fellow humans as people rather than as men and women. When he forms an alliance with a Gethenian called Estraven, Ai learns how close together the words "patriot" and "traitor" can be. Ai's loyalty begins to shift from the Ekumen to Gethen, but this shift is a precondition of his mission's success. Conversely, Estraven's loyalty shifts to Ai, but only because he loves his country well enough to want Ai to succeed.

Although Ai and Estraven grow closer to one another, a vast distance also remains between them. Humans are alienated from one another in a wintry universe. But hope springs from the melancholy. The universe is dark but young, and spring will follow winter. The book reverberates with a non-theistic prayer: "Praise then darkness and Creation unfinished."

Although they meet as equal individuals, Ai and Estraven are members of differing societies. Le Guin would insist on Aristotle's definition of people as social animals. In her ambivalent utopia The Dispossessed, Le Guin preserves this insistence—while making it equally clear that anarchism is one of her centers of value. The book is an important break in science fiction's anti-utopian trend. A scientist, Shevek, moves to and fro between an anarchist utopia which is becoming middle-aged, and a world-obviously analogous to our own-that is divided between propertarian (capitalist) and statist (communist) countries. Nowhere does he find full self-expression; conversely, full self-expression requires one's participation in a society. In alternating chapters which disrupt sequential chronology, Shevek moves both away from the anarchist utopia and back toward it. Le Guin identifies herself both as a stylistic artist and as a thinker. Her stark, wintry worlds are philosophically rich with dialectical Taoism, and the co-reality of such opposites as light and darkness, religion and politics, and language and power. In A Wizard of Earthsea the magician has power over things when he knows their true names, so that his power is the artist's power. Le Guin plays with the notion, in "The Author of the Acacia Seeds and Other Extracts from The Journal of the Association of Therolinguistics," that ants, penguins, and even plants might be producing what could be called language and art.

Since writing The Dispossessed, Le Guin has been turning in the direction of fantasy. Malafrena is a compelling mixture of fantasy and historical fiction. Le Guin sets the imaginary country of Orsinia into central Europe in the 19th century. It is Itale Sorde's story: he rejects the ease of an inherited landed estate (Malafrena) to work for revolution against Orsinia's domination by the Austrian Empire. After being jailed for several years and after a failed insurrection in 1830, he returns to Malafrena, but there are hints that he will leave again. True voyage is return, and structure and theme coalesce, as in The Dispossessed.

In subsequent works Le Guin often presents us with the ambiguity of revolution, once again the theme of a long short story, "The Eye of the Heron." A colony of young counter-culturalists attempts to break away from their elders, with typically ambiguous results. A central paradox in Le Guin's fiction is her simultaneous recognition of the need for harmony and the need for revolt .

Praise for Le Guin has been high—too uniformly high. Her style is unexceptional and her desire for peace and harmony borders on sentimentality at times. But she has taken important steps toward blending politics and art in her novels, and she is still experimenting with both form and content. Thus Always Coming Home both returns to the anthropological format of The Left Hand of Darkness and greatly expands that format. Le Guin has gathered together stories, folklore, histories, and other materials into what she calls "an archaeology" of primitive people living in a far-future northern California. The central story (occupying only a small part of the book) is of the coming of age of the woman "Stone Telling," whose mother lives in the peaceful Valley, which is integrated with nature, and whose father is of the war-like Condor people. Stone Telling leaves her valley to join her father for a while, but she becomes "woman always coming home" when she returns, her to-and-fro motion reminding us of The Dispossessed. When we discover that the Condor can build bridges and that they have electric lights, we may wonder how their traditional culture is supposed to have survived. But Le Guin's ability to capture the language, culture, and thought of primitive people is, despite some lapses, generally remarkable.

Harmony with nature is more than just a greeting card sentiment in Le Guin's short story collection Buffalo Gals and Other Animal Presences and the novel Buffalo Gals, Won't You Come out Tonight. In Animal Presences, the gap between the natural world and the human has become a virtual chasm. Shifting points of view allow even a lab rat his voice of protest. But voice alone is not sufficient to narrow the gap: one must set fire to complacency and open oneself up to hearing voices other than one's own, as in the story "May's Lion," about a woman who transcends her fears to help a mountain lion to die. The intriguing novella Buffalo Gals, Won't You Come out Tonight, which first appeared in the Magazine of Fantasy and Science Fiction, is a parable of the disintegrating relationship between humankind and the natural world. A remarkably resilient girl-child survives a plane crash only to find herself in different plane of reality, a desert world not unlike pre-settlement America, where the line between animals and man is less clearly drawn. As the girl becomes increasingly aware of the sour smell of humanity and its encroachments, she becomes more and more uprooted and unsure of her place. She eventually returns to her own people, but with an eye, both figuratively and literally, to seeing the world differently. Although occasionally heavy-handed, the story is compelling and visually rich. The girl protagonist speaks with the recognizable and sympathetic voice of a child.

The short story collection, Searoad, reveals how definitions of mainstream fiction and science fiction are not mutually exclusive. Though clearly a work of realistic fiction, the novel contains aspects of myth and ritual that fall into the realm of fantasy. Each story can be read as a separate entity, yet each contributes to one unified vision. This vision is unabashedly feminist, and as such is chiefly and somewhat exclusively concerned with the lives of women. Set in the small resort town of Klatsand, located on the Oregon coast, the stories contrast the different ways in which males and females communicate, the first being authoritative and unyielding, the other conversational and communal. This rigid polarity marks one of the problems with the novel, especially in terms of its persuasiveness. Male characters are impotent, if not downright evil; female characters are still waters running effortlessly deep. This seems to diminish rather than enhance believability. In addition, one questions the validity of rejecting outright the male world as a means of acquiring personal freedom. Nonetheless, characterization is compelling enough to sustain interest. One admires the resiliency of women who have also recognized the incontrovertibility of choice, or as the character Jilly in the story "In and Out" realizes, "doing something wasn't just a kind of practice for something that would keep happening .... You didn't get to practice".

In A Fisherman of the Inland Sea, Le Guin returns to science fiction, with a disparate collection of tales, both humorous and serious, that asserts many of the recurrent themes in her work: the responsibility we have to nature; cultural diversity and ethnic tolerance; the importance of communication in spite of the inadequacies of language; and the interdependency of peoples. Among the most compelling stories in the collection is "Newton's Sleep," which casts a circumspect eye on the elitism of technology and suggests the need for the irrational, for the unknown and unseen in our lives. As with all of the author's work, this collection seeks to expand and challenge the reader's ideas as to what it means to be human. In Four Ways to Forgiveness, a quartet of novellas, Le Guin returned to the Hainish culture first examined in The Left Hand of Darkness. This time, however, the setting runs as far afield as the planets Werel and Yeowe, explained by the author in copious footnotes; and the roles of men and women are treated with much greater complexity and reality.

—Curtis C. Smith, updated by Lynda Schrecengost

LELCHUK, Alan

Nationality: American. Born: Brooklyn, New York, 15 September 1938. Education: Brooklyn College, B.A. 1960; University College, London, 1962-63; Stanford University, California, M.A. 1963, Ph.D. in English 1965. Family: Married Barbara Kreiger in 1979; two sons. Career: Assistant professor of English, 1966–75, and writer-inresidence, 1975-81, Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts. Since 1985 professor of English, Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire. Visiting writer, Amherst College, Massachusetts, 1982–84; writer-in-residence, Haifa University, Israel, 1986-87. Associate editor, Modern Occasions quarterly, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1970-72. Guest, Mishkenot Sha'Ananim, Jerusalem, 1976-77. Awards: Yaddo Foundation grant, 1968, 1971, 1973; MacDowell Colony fellowship, 1969; Guggenheim fellowship, 1976; Fulbright grant, 1986. Agent: Georges Borchardt, 136 East 57th Street, New York, New York 10022. Address: RFD 2, Canaan, New Hampshire 03741, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

American Mischief. New York, Farrar Straus, and London, Cape, 1973.

Miriam at Thirty-four. New York, Farrar Straus, 1974; London, Cape, 1975.

Shrinking: The Beginning of My Own Ending. Boston, Little Brown, 1978.

Miriam in Her Forties. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1985.

Brooklyn Boy. New York, McGraw Hill, 1989.

Playing the Game. Dallas, Baskerville, 1995.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Sundays," in Transatlantic Review 21 (London), Summer 1966.
- "Of Our Time," in New American Review 4, edited by Theodore Solotaroff. New York, New American Library, 1968.
- "Winter Image," in Transatlantic Review 32 (London), Summer 1969.
- "Cambridge Talk," in Modern Occasions 1 (Cambridge, Massachusetts), Fall 1970.
- "Hallie of the Sixties," in Works in Progress 6 (New York), 1972.
- "Doctor's Holiday," in Atlantic (Boston), March 1981.
- "New Man in the House," in Boston Globe Magazine, 29 March 1987.
- "Adventures of a Fiction Boy," in Partisan Review (Boston), Fall 1989.

Plays

Screenplays: Tippy, with Jiri Weiss, 1978; What Ashley Wants, with Isaac Yeshurun, 1987.

Other

On Home Ground (for children). New York, Harcourt Brace, 1987.Editor, with Gerson Shaked, Eight Great Hebrew Short Stories. New York, New American Library, 1983.

*

Manuscript Collections: Mugar Memorial Library, Boston University.

Critical Studies: By Philip Roth in Esquire (New York), September 1972; "Lelchuk's Inferno" by Wilfrid Sheed, in Book-of-the-Month Club News (New York), March 1973; "The Significant Self" by Benjamin DeMott, in Atlantic (Boston), October 1974; "Faculty in Fiction: Images of the Professor in Recent Novels" by Frances Barasch, in Clarion (New York), June 1982; "Aaron's Rod" by Sven Birkerts, in New Republic (Washington, D.C.), 5 February 1990.

Alan Lelchuk comments:

Some points about my fiction: A realism of extreme sensibilities and modernism of content ... the intensity and ambiguity of the sensual life ... a blurring of the line between the comic and the serious ... vibrating the odd strings of obsession ... character through sexuality, and sexuality as (native) social gesture ... a mingling of lofty thought and contemporary vulgarity ... playing out the deep comic disorders of our culture ... some unnerving fables and comic myths of our time camouflaged by realistic garb and inhabited by real souls ...

* * *

Alan Lelchuk's first four novels recreate that rich Jewish-American intellectual life which synthesizes John Garfield with Bakunin. These cautionary tales dramatize the self-destructiveness inherent in political, artistic, and sexual revolt, the three frequently fused, as an academician (American Mischief), a woman photographer (Miriam at Thirty-four, Miriam in Her Forties), and a novelist (Shrinking) painfully test the boundaries of contemporary experience. American Mischief, Lelchuk's variation on The Possessed, explores 1960s campus upheaval through the contrapuntal voices of a radical student, Lenny Pincus ("Not the son of Harry and Rose Pincus of Brooklyn, but a boy with fathers like Reston and Cronkite, mothers such as Mary McCarthy and Diana Trilling"), and a liberal dean, Bernard Kovell ("a kind of Americanized version of Romanov-Quixote, a European Liberal-Idealist turned Massachusetts sensualist, tilting simultaneously at foolish theories and female bodies"). A wealth of political and literary allusions threatens to overwhelm the novel, as the protagonists share both their private agonies and extensive bibliographies with the reader. But the novel impresses with its vivid style, ultimately sane perspective, and brilliant bursts of imagination: the notorious episode detailing Norman Mailer's symbolically appropriate bloody end manages to outdo an already bizarre reality. Like Lelchuk's other novels, American Mischief attempts narrative complexity by telling its story through a variety of "documents": Lenny's preface; Kovell's journal focusing on his six mistresses; his lengthy speech during a campus uprising, interlarded with Lenny's comments; Lenny's "Gorilla Talk," an account of radical activities that occupies more than half the book. This stylistic attempt to heighten the dialectical tension between the two men fails because their voices sound so alike from the beginning that the fusion of their ideologies into a statement of concern for man's ultimate victimization seems predictable.

Victimization goes even further in Miriam at Thirty-four. The heroine's sexual experimentation (three lovers with a variety of backgrounds and tastes) parallels her exploration of the Cambridge setting, which is "a male with secrets ... one whom she could arouse by uncovering different parts of his anatomy and photographing them." This obsession with exposing truth leads Miriam to take sexually revealing pictures of herself and exhibit them at a prestigious gallery to the sounds of "early Dylan, trio sonatas (Tartini? Bach?), the Beatles." Her final breakdown results from the uncomprehending responses of her audience: "they were cannibals who had just feasted on human flesh with no time yet for digestion. And the flesh was herself, Miriam." To provide multiple views of Miriam, Lelchuk supplements the narrative with her letters and notebook ("her selftherapy kit, her doctor between covers, her book of reason, reflection, questions ... ") Shorter and less ambitious than American Mischief, the novel primarily conveys Miriam's pathos and leaves the sources of her disaster uncertain: a society that simultaneously seeks and savages the new, or the self-destructive urges that are implicit in Miriam's authentic artistry? A similar uncertainty pervades Shrinking, which chronicles the breakdown of novelist/academician Lionel Solomon, victimized by both inner doubts and a hostile world epitomized by Tippy, a predatory young woman who humiliates him sexually, reveals his inadequacies in an Esquire exposé, and leads him on a strange journey into Hopi country. Elaborately narrated, Shrinking includes a foreword and afterword by Solomon's psychiatrist, letters from other characters, and the text of Tippy's article with Solomon's comments. The article forces a comparison of Tippy's version with the "real" experience, a contrast that underscores the novel's obsession with truth: "what happens in life, when put into fiction, can sound 'in poor taste' and be near impossible to write about." This apologia and Lelchuk's witty parodies of reviewers almost disarm criticism, but cannot obscure the catch-all quality of the book: essays on Hopi culture and Melville, however they reflect the workings of Solomon's mind, are too long for the effects they achieve, and Lelchuk's wit seems more forced, less outrageous than in American Mischief.

Miriam in Her Forties lacks much of the excitement and the sense of discovery of Miriam at Thirty-four, despite the weaknesses of the original. The sequel provides Miriam with an overly facile ability to analyze and resolve the types of problems that threatened to destroy her ten years earlier. The rape by a black man that triggered her breakdown in the original seems to have strengthened her to the extent that she now responds to a renewed threat from the rapist by using gangster-government ties to imprison him on trumped-up charges. She then helps arrange his release and rehabilitation, though the outcome of these efforts is left ambiguous. Like the teenage Aaron of Lelchuk's latest novel, Brooklyn Boy, who is seduced by a Jamaican librarian, Miriam must investigate the meaning of blackwhite sexuality. She may reject such a relationship for herself, as she does the lesbian overtures of a feminist artist, but she certainly considers the possibilities. Besides, she already has commitments to an emblematic Israeli, and WASP surgeon, with whom she experiences Maileresque sex in an almost deserted medical school lecture hall, and she has recently come to accept the validity of masturbation (in an implicit tribute to Roth). These teasing echoes of slightly older contemporaries seem appropriate in a writer very conscious of his place in the pantheon of American-Jewish authors and give the book some leavening wit. Significantly, despite her anxieties and occasional bouts of dangerous sex, Miriam sometimes echoes Bellow's Sammler in her sense of being the one sane person in a lunatic world: "In short, one is ready at last for the higher stage—wisdom, contemporary-style. So, wisdom, where do you reside?" The novel's chief weakness, in addition to the sentimentalized treatment of Miriam's son and some easy anti-Cambridge satire, is the third-person narrative voice which often unconvincingly infuses Miriam's experiences with an instant analysis that sounds more like the author's notes than a transcript of Miriam's mind. This technique threatens to stifle her distinctiveness and to parody her responses to serious issues.

Brooklyn Boy and Playing the Game are Lelchuk's most conventional work thus far, though both novels introduce material that almost unbalances their narrative flow. Brooklyn Boy is an expansion of the slightly earlier On Home Ground (designed "for young readers''). The novel develops Aaron's obsession with the Brooklyn Dodgers and the resultant conflict with his European-born father, who has a different set of priorities for his son, but then the novel seems to abandon this theme to trace Aaron's interest in writing and his job as a deckhand on a freighter that in the final scene heads up the Congo so that Aaron can complete his education with blacks begun in his affair with the Jamaican librarian. Unfortunately, the most lively sections of Brooklyn Boy are the excerpts from Aaron's school reports on local history. Though the novel shifts, early on, to a first-person narrative, it fails to provide Aaron with a plausible voice, and the reader has met variants of the character in other coming-of-age works (On Home Ground, which focuses on the father-son relation, is on its own terms the stronger of the two narratives).

Sidney Berger, the protagonist of Playing the Game, a fifty-oneyear-old assistant coach with a Ph.D. in history, is given the opportunity to coach basketball at an ivy-league college and manages to produce a Cinderella team that attracts international media coverage. The team members suggest a World War II bomber crew film—black, Hispanic, native American, white ethnic, and even a Soviet Jew. Some of the boys have problems that hint at serious tensions later on, but these problems, like Berger's with the college and the NCAA, get easily resolved, primarily through Berger's commitment to coaching and basic decency. What inspires the team to victorious exploits is Berger's practice of half-time reading from key American writers like Parkman and Thoreau, whose prose apparently awes the players into an almost mystical awareness of the meaning of America, a prose that stimulates them to a better game than elaborate discussions of strategy or the personal humiliations inflicted by some coaches would have accomplished. One problem with these long excerpts, aside from their breaking the tension of the novel, is that the prose and its ideas are more exciting than anything in the framework narrative and leave the reader reluctant to return to the main story, a reluctance stemming partly from the stereotyped portraits of the players and various college and sports officials. Berger's voice, which narrates the story, seems at times a surrogate for the author's views on sports, education, and current American values, and only rarely conveys the idiosyncratic flavor of Lelchuk's earlier protagonists.

Lelchuk's shift to the relatively conventional material of these last two novels perhaps provides a breathing space from the bravura performances of earlier works. Admirers of Lelchuk's talent anticipate a return to his distinctive voice, often brilliant, often charmingly irrelevant to the apparent themes of the books, and often suggesting an underlying despair that the writing can only imperfectly capture.

-Burton Kendle

LEONARD, Elmore

Nationality: American. Born: New Orleans, Louisiana, 11 October 1925. Education: The University of Detroit, 1946–50, Ph.B. in English 1950. Military Service: Served in the United States Naval Reserve, 1943–46. Family: Married 1) Beverly Cline in 1949 (divorced 1977); 2) Joan Shepard in 1979 (died 1993), two daughters and three sons; 3) Christine Kent in 1993. Career: Copywriter, Campbell Ewald advertising agency, Detroit, 1950–61; writer of industrial and educational films, 1961–63; director, Elmore Leonard Advertising Company, 1963–66. Since 1967 full-time writer. Awards: Western Writers of America award, 1977; Mystery Writers of America Edgar Allan Poe award, 1984; Michigan Foundation for the Arts award, 1985; Mystery Writers of America Grand Master Award, 1992. Agent: Michael Siegel and Associates, 502 Tenth St., Santa Monica, California 90402, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Bounty Hunters. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1953; London, Hale, 1956.

The Law at Randado. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1955; London, Hale, 1957.

Escape from Five Shadows. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1956; London, Hale, 1957.

Last Stand at Saber River. New York, Dell, 1959; as Lawless River, London, Hale, 1959; as Stand on the Saber, London, Corgi, 1960. Hombre. New York, Ballantine, and London, Hale, 1961.

Valdez Is Coming. London, Hale, 1969; New York, Fawcett, 1970. The Big Bounce. New York, Fawcett, and London, Hale, 1969.

The Moonshine War. New York, Doubleday, 1969; London, Hale, 1970.

Forty Lashes Less One. New York, Bantam, 1972.

Mr. Majestyk (novelization of screenplay). New York, Dell, 1974; London, Penguin, 1986.

Fifty-Two Pickup. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1974.

Swag. New York, Delacorte Press, 1976; London, Penguin, 1986; as Ryan's Rules, New York, Dell, 1976.

The Hunted. New York, Delacorte Press, 1977; London, Secker and Warburg, 1978.

Unknown Man No. 89. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1977.

The Switch. New York, Bantam, 1978; London, Secker and Warburg, 1979.

Gunsights. New York, Bantam, 1979.

City Primeval: High Noon in Detroit. New York, Arbor House, 1980; London, W.H. Allen, 1981.

Gold Coast. New York, Bantam, 1980; London, W.H. Allen, 1982.Split Images. New York, Arbor House, 1982; London, W.H. Allen, 1983.

Cat Chaser. New York, Arbor House, 1982; London, Viking, 1986. Stick. New York, Arbor House, 1983; London, Allen Lane, 1984. LaBrava. New York, Arbor House, 1983; London, Viking Press, 1984.

Glitz. New York, Arbor House, and London, Viking, 1985.
Bandits. New York, Arbor House, and London, Viking, 1987.
Touch. New York, Arbor House, 1987; London, Viking, 1988.
Freaky Deaky. New York, Arbor House, and London, Viking, 1988.
Killshot. New York, Arbor House, and London, Viking, 1989.
Get Shorty. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Viking, 1990.
Maximum Bob. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Viking, 1991.

Rum Punch. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Viking, 1992.Pronto. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Viking, 1993.Riding the Rap. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Viking, 1995.

Out of Sight. New York, Delacorte Press, 1996. Cuba Libre. New York, Delacorte Press, 1998. Be Cool. New York, Delacorte Press, 1999. Pagan Babies. New York, Delacorte Press, 2000.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Trail of the Apache," in Argosy (New York), December 1951.
- "Red Hell Hits Canyon Diablo," in Ten Story Western, 1952.
- "Apache Medicine," in Dime Western, May 1952.
- "You Never See Apaches," in Dime Western, September 1952.
- "Cavalry Boots," in Zane Grey's Western (New York), December 1952.
- "Long Night," in Zane Grey's Western 18 (London).
- "The Rustlers," in Zane Grey's Western 29 (London), 1953.
- "Under the Friar's Ledge," in Dime Western, January 1953.
- "The Last Shot," in Fifteen Western Tales, September 1953.
- "Trouble at Rindo's Station," in Argosy (New York), October 1953.
- "Blood Money" in Western Story (London), February 1954.
- "Saint with a Six-Gun," in Frontier, edited by Luke Short. New York, Bantam, 1955.
- "3:10 to Yuma," in The Killers, edited by Peter Dawson. New York, Bantam, 1955.
- "The Hard Way," in Branded West, edited by Don Ward. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1956.
- "No Man's Gun," in Western Story (London), May 1956.
- "Moment of Vengeance," in Colt's Law, edited by Luke Short. New York, Bantam, 1957.
- "The Tall T," in The Tall T and Other Western Adventures. New York, Avon, 1957.
- "The Rancher's Lady," in Wild Streets, edited by Don Ward. New York, Doubleday, 1958.
- "Only Good Ones," in Western Roundup, edited by Nelson Nye. New York, Macmillan, 1961.
- "The Boy Who Smiled," in The Arbor House Treasury of Great Western Stories, edited by Bill Pronzini and Martin H. Greenberg. New York, Arbor House, 1982.
- "The Nagual," in The Cowboys, edited by Bill Pronzini and Martin H. Greenberg. New York, Fawcett, 1985.
- "The Captive," in The Second Reel West, edited by Bill Pronzini and Martin H. Greenberg. New York, Doubleday, 1985.
- "Law of the Hunted Ones," in Wild Westerns, edited by Bill Pronzini and Martin H. Greenberg. New York, Walker, 1986.

- "The Colonel's Lady," in The Horse Soldiers, edited by Bill Pronzini and Martin H. Greenberg. New York, Fawcett, 1987.
- "Jugged" in The Gunfighters, edited by Bill Pronzini and Martin H. Greenberg. New York, Fawcett, 1987.
- "The Big Hunt," in More Wild Westerns, edited by Bill Pronzini. New York, Walker, 1989.

Plays

Screenplays: The Moonshine War, 1970; Joe Kidd, 1972; Mr. Majestyk (with Joseph Stinson), 1974; Stick (with John Steppling), 1985.

Television Plays: High Noon, Part II: The Return of Will Kane, 1980.

*

Film Adaptations: Get Shorty, 1995; Jackie Brown, 1997; Last Stand at Saber River, 1997; Out of Sight, 1998.

Manuscript Collections: University of Detroit Library.

Critical Studies: Elmore Leonard by David Geherin, New York, Ungar-Continuum, 1989; Elmore Leonard by James E. Devlin, New York, Twayne Publishers, 1999.

* * *

Elmore Leonard is one of those rare authors who began as a pulp writer and ended top of the bestseller lists. More impressive, however, is his feat of moving from being considered a mere genre novelist to being credited with elevating the crime novel to new levels of artistic achievement.

Leonard began as a writer of Westerns, turning out stories for the pulps that still flourished in the 1950s. One of his early novels, Hombre, the story of a white man raised by Indians whose bravery saves the lives of his fellow stagecoach passengers, was selected by the Western Writers of America as one of the twenty-five best Westerns of all time.

With The Big Bounce in 1969, Leonard switched to writing about the contemporary scene. Set in the author's home state of Michigan, the novel describes the dangerous encounter between Jack Ryan, an ex-convict, and Nancy Hayes, a restless 19-year-old with a thirst for thrills. The Big Bounce highlights the two kinds of characters that would become trademarks of Leonard's fiction: those who run afoul of the law, and those who become involved with those who do.

In 1972, after reading George V. Higgins's The Friends of Eddie Coyle, a comic novel about the activities of a small-time Boston hoodlum narrated through colorful dialogue and extended monologues, Leonard began to experiment with new ways of telling his stories. He found that by relying more on dialogue he could effectively shift the burden of storytelling to his characters. The result was Fifty-Two Pickup, his first major success as a crime novelist.

Fifty-Two Pickup is the story of a Michigan businessman named Harry Mitchell who is being framed by a trio of low-life characters for the murder of his mistress. Like many of Leonard's protagonists, Mitchell is an easygoing guy until pushed. Then he takes control of the situation and single-handedly extricates himself from his predicament.

In 1978, Leonard was commissioned by a local newspaper to write a non-fiction profile of the Detroit police. Though he planned to spend only a few days hanging around police headquarters, he ended up staying for two and a half months, soaking up atmosphere, listening to the cops and criminals, lawyers and witnesses who passed through the squad room. This rich assortment of colorful characters provided a new source for the distinctive sounds and speech rhythms that would heighten the realism of his fiction.

The first novel that resulted from this experience was City Primeval, also his first book to feature a policeman as protagonist. Raymond Cruz, a Detroit Police Homicide Lieutenant, crosses paths with Clement Mansell, a killer known (with ample reason) as the ''Oklahoma Wildman.'' Their final showdown reads like the climax to one of Leonard's early Westerns. (Appropriately, the novel is subtitled High Noon in Detroit.) Besides exciting action, the novel also owes its success to its authentic characters and unflinching realism.

Convinced of the benefits of research on his fiction, Leonard now began employing a part-time researcher to assist him in his efforts. No amount of background research can guarantee a novel's success. However, combined with Leonard's gift for creating fresh and believable characters and dialogue that unerringly rings true, research provides a factual grounding that enhances an already solid core of believability. Such a combination resulted in some of the most notable crime novels in recent American fiction.

Glitz is a good example. Vincent Mora is an off-duty Miami policeman who is recuperating from a bullet wound in sunny Puerto Rico. There he meets and takes a liking to a young woman named Iris Ruiz. When she plunges to her death from a hotel room in Atlantic City, where she has gone to work as a hostess, Mora heads north to investigate. Soon he is engaged in a deadly cat-and-mouse game with Teddy Magyk, a sociopathic ex-convict who seeks revenge on Mora for having sent him to prison.

Thanks to Leonard's extensive research, the reader enjoys an insider's peek behind the scenes at the Atlantic City casinos and gets to meet the distinctive inhabitants of that world. Vincent Mora and Teddy Magyk give life to Glitz, while the setting and colorful supporting cast flesh it out in vivid detail.

Leonard employs a similar recipe with equal success in novels like Stick, LaBrava, Bandits, Freaky Deaky, Get Shorty, Rum Punch, and Be Cool. However, he is careful never to repeat a stale formula. The settings vary from Miami Beach to New Orleans to Hollywood and back to Detroit, and each novel introduces a fresh cast of memorable characters and plots filled with unpredictable twists.

Though his novels are about serious—often deadly—matters, they also reveal Leonard's gift for comedy, especially comic dialogue. Leonard has a talent for mimicking voices that capture the distinctive personality of the speaker. Once these characters open their mouths, they open their minds, and the result is fiction filled with amusingly offbeat points of view.

In several of his recent novels, Leonard has introduced a fresh new element—smart, independent women—to his usual colorful mix of offbeat characters. Rum Punch, for example, centers around Jackie Burke (re-named Jackie Brown in the Quentin Tarentino film version of the novel), a forty-four-year old flight attendant who is arrested when the police find cocaine someone has hidden in the money she has been hired to transport from the Bahamas to the U.S. on her flights. Taking matters into her own hands, she concocts an elaborate shell game that outfoxes both the feds and the killer whose money she was carrying. Out of Sight features Karen Sisco, a deputy U.S.

marshal who deftly manages to balance her attraction to an escaped convict into whose path she stumbles with her sworn duties as a law enforcement officer.

Leonard is sometimes mistakenly categorized as a mystery writer. Though suspenseful, his novels contain little mystery. Instead, they are novels about character and, because many of those characters are either criminals or policemen, novels about crime. The best of them are rich in texture, authentic in detail, and colorful in the richness and variety of character and voice. Over the past three decades, Leonard has produced an impressive body of fiction that sets the standard for what the crime novel in the hands of a talented artist is capable of achieving.

-David Geherin

LESSING, Doris (May)

Pseudonym: Jane Somers. Nationality: British. Born: Doris May Tayler in Kermanshah, Persia, 22 October 1919; moved with her family to England, then to Banket, Southern Rhodesia, 1924. Education: Dominican Convent School, Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia, 1926-34. Family: Married 1) Frank Charles Wisdom in 1939 (divorced 1943), one son and one daughter; 2) Gottfried Lessing in 1945 (divorced 1949), one son. Career: Au pair, Salisbury, 1934-35; telephone operator and clerk, Salisbury, 1937–39; typist, 1946–48; journalist, Cape Town Guardian, 1949; moved to London, 1950; secretary, 1950; member of the Editorial Board, New Reasoner (later New Left Review), 1956. Awards: Maugham award, for fiction, 1954: Médicis prize (France), 1976; Austrian State prize, 1981; Shakespeare prize (Hamburg), 1982; W.H. Smith Literary award, 1986; Palermo prize (Italy), 1987; Mondello prize (Italy), 1987; Cavour award (Italy), 1989; Premi Internacional Catalunya, 1999. Honorary doctorate: Princeton University, New Jersey, 1989; Durham, 1990; Warwick, 1994; Bard College, New York, 1994; Harvard, 1995. Named Woman of the Year, Norway, 1995. Associate member, American Academy, 1974; Honorary Fellow, Modern Language Association (U.S.A.), 1974. Agent: Jonathan Clowes Ltd., Iron Bridge House, Bridge Approach, London, NW1 8BD, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Grass Is Singing. London, Joseph, and New York, Crowell, 1950. Children of Violence:

Martha Quest. London, Joseph, 1952; with A Proper Marriage, New York, Simon and Schuster, 1964.

A Proper Marriage. London, Joseph, 1954; with Martha Quest, New York, Simon and Schuster, 1964.

A Ripple From the Storm. London, Joseph, 1958; with Landlocked, New York, Simon and Schuster, 1966; published under original title, 1995.

Landlocked. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1965; with A Ripple From the Storm. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1966.

The Four-Grated City. London, MacGibbon and Kee, and New York, Knopf, 1969. Retreat to Innocence. London, Joesph, 1956; New York, Prometheus, 1959.

The Golden Notebook. London, Joseph, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1962.

Briefing for a Decent into Hell. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1971.

The Summer Before the Dark. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1973

The Memoirs of a Survivor. London, Octagon Press, 1974; New York, Knopf, 1975.

Canopus in Argos: Archives:

Shikasta. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1979.

The Marriages Between Zones Three, Four, and Five. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1980.

The Sirian Experiments. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1980. The Making of the Representative for Planet 8. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1982.

The Sentimental Agents. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1983.The Diaries of Jane Somers. New York, Vintage, and London, Joseph, 1984.

The Diary of a Good Neighbour (as Jane Somers). London, Joseph, and New York, Knopf, 1983.

If the Old Could— (as Jane Somers). London, Joseph, and New York, Knopf, 1984.

The Good Terrorist. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1985.

The Fifth Child. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1988.

Love, Again: A Novel. New York, HarperCollins Publishers, 1996.

Mara and Dann: An Adventure by Doris Lessing. New York, HarperFlamingo, 1999.

Ben, in the World: The Sequel to the Fifth Child. New York, HarperCollins, 2000.

Short Stories

This Was the Old Chief's Country. London, Joseph, 1951; New York, Crowell, 1952.

Five: Short Novels. London, Joseph, 1953.

No Witchcraft for Sale: Stories and Short Novels. Moscow, Foreign Language Publishing House, 1956.

The Habit of Loving. London, MacGibbon and Kee, and New York, Crowell, 1957.

A Man and Two Women. London, MacGibbon and Kee, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1963.

African Stories. London, Joseph, 1964; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1965.

Winter in July. London, Panther, 1966.

The Black Madonna. London, Panther, 1966.

Nine African Stories, edited by Michael Marland. London, Longman, 1968

The Story of a Non-Marrying Man and Other Stories. London, Cape, 1972; as The Temptation of Jack Orfkney and Other Stories, New York, Knopf, 1972.

Collected African Stories. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1981. This Was the Old Chief's Country. London, Joseph, 1973. The Sun Between Their Feet. London, Joseph, 1973.

(Stories), edited by Alan Cattell. London, Harrap, 1976.

Jack Orkney. London, Cape, 2 vols., 1978; as Stories, New York, Knopf, 1 vol., 1978.

London Observed: Stories and Sketches. London, and New York, HarperCollins, 1992.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Case of the Foolish Minister" (as Doris M. Wisdom), in Rafters (Salisbury, Rhodesia), November 1943.
- "A Sense of Humour" (as D.M. Wisdom), in Rafters (Salisbury, Rhodesia), December 1943.
- "Esperanto and Others" (as D.M. Wisdom), in Rafters (Salisbury, Rhodesia), April 1944.
- "Politics and Alister Warren," in Labour Front (Salisbury, Rhodesia), September 1948.
- "The Twitching Dog," in N.B. (Salisbury, Rhodesia), January 1949.
- "Fruit from the Ashes," in Trek (Johannesburg), October 1949.
- "Pretty Puss," in Trek (Johannesburg), March 1950.
- "Womb Ward," in New Yorker, 7 December 1987.
- "The Real Thing," in Partisan Review (Boston), Fall 1988.
- "Debbie and Julie," in Antaeus (New York), Spring 1989.
- "Among the Roses," in Ladies' Home Journal (New York), April 1989.

Plays

Before the Deluge (produced London, 1953).

Mr. Dollinger (produced Oxford, 1958).

Each His Own Wilderness (produced London, 1958). Published in New English Dramatists, London, Penguin, 1959.

The Truth about Billy Newton (produced Salisbury, Wiltshire, 1960). Play with a Tiger (produced Brighton and London, 1962; New York, 1964). London, Joseph, 1962; in Plays by and about Women, edited by Victoria Sullivan and James V. Hatch, New York, Random House, 1973.

The Storm, adaptation of a play by Alexander Ostrovsky (produced London, 1966).

The Singing Door (for children), in Second Playbill 2, edited by Alan Durband. London, Hutchinson, 1973.

The Making of the Representative for Plant 8 (opera libretto), music by Philipo Glass, adaptation of the novel by Lessing (produced London, 1988).

Television Plays: The Grass Is Singing, from her own novel, 1962; Care and Protection and Do Not Disturb (both in Blackmail series), 1966; Between Men, 1967.

Poetry

Fourteen Poems. Northwood, Middlesex, Scorpion Press, 1959.

Other

Going Home. London, Joseph, 1957; revised edition, London, Panther, and New York, Ballantine, 1968.

In Pursuit of the English: A Documentary. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1960; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1961.

Particularly Cats. London, Joseph, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1967.

A Small Personal Voice: Essays, Reviews, Interview, edited by Paul Schlueter. New York, Knopf, 1974.

Prisons We Choose to Live Inside. Montreal, CBC, 1986; London, Cape, and New York, Harper, 1987.

The Wind Blows Away Our Words, and Other Documents Relating to Afghanistan. London, Pan, and New York, Vintage, 1987.

Particularly Cats and More Cats. London, 1989; as Particularly Cats ... and Rufus, illustrated by James McMullen, New York, Knopf, 1991.

The Doris Lessing Reader. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1990.

African Laughter: Four Visits to Zimbabwe. London, and New York, HarperCollins, 1992.

Under My Skin. London, and New York, HarperCollins, 1994.

Doris Lessing: Conversations, edited by Earl G. Ingersoll. Princeton, New Jersey, Ontario Review Press, 1994.

Putting the Questions Differently: Interviews with Doris Lessing, 1964–1994, edited by Earl G. Ingersoll. London, Flamingo, 1996. Walking in the Shade: Volume Two of My Autobiography, 1949–1962. New York, HarperCollins, 1997.

On Women Turning 70: Honoring the Voices of Wisdom, interviews and photography by Cathleen Rountree. San Francisco, Jossey-Bass Publishers, 1999.

不

Bibliography: Doris Lessing: A Bibliography by Catharina Ipp, Johannesburg, University of the Witwatersrand Department of Bibliography, 1967; Doris Lessing: A Checklist of Primary and Secondary Sources by Selma R. Burkom and Margaret Williams, Troy, New York, Whiston, 1973; Doris Lessing: An Annotated Bibliography of Criticisim by Dee Seligman, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1981; Doris Lessing: A Descriptive Bibliography of Her First Editions by Eric T. Brueck, London, Metropolis, 1984.

Critical Studies (selection): Doris Lessing by Dorothy Brewster, New York, Twayne, 1965; The Novels of Doris Lessing by Paul Schlueter, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1973: Doris Lessing, London, Longman, 1973, and Doris Lessing: Critical Studies edited by Annis Pratt and L.S. Dembo, Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1974; The Tree Outside the Window: Doris Lessing's Children of Violence by Ellen Cronan Rose, Hanover, New Hampshire, University Press of New England, 1976; The City and the Veld: The Fiction of Doris Lessing by Mary Ann Singleton, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, Bucknell University Press, 1977; The Novelistic Vision of Doris Lessing: Breaking the Forms of Consciousness by Roberta Rubenstein, Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1979; Doris Lessing: The Problem of Alienation and the Form of the Novel by Rotraut Spiegel, Frankfurt, Germany, Lang, 1980; From Society to Nature: A Study of Doris Lessing's Children of Violence By Ingrid Holmquist, Gothenburg, Studies in English, and Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey, Humanities Press, 1980; Notebooks/Memoirs/Archives: Reading and Re-reading Doris Lessing edited by Jenny Taylor, London and Boston, Routledge, 1982; Substance under Pressure: Artistic Coherence and Evolving Form in the Novels of Doris Lessing by Betsy Draine, Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1983; Doris Lessing by Lorna Sage, London, Methuen, 1983; Transforming the World: The Art of Doris Lessing's Science Fiction, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1983; and The Unexpected Universe of Doris Lessing: A Study of Narrative Technique, Greenwood Press, 1985, both by Katherine Fishburn; The Implicit Feminism of Doris Lessing's The Four-Gated City by Lisa Maria Hogeland, Stanford, California, Stanford University Press, 1983; Doris Lessing by Mona Knapp, New York, Ungar, 1984; Doris Lessing and Women's Appropriation of Science Fiction by Mariette Clare, Birmingham, University of Birmingham Centre for Contemporary Cultural Studies, 1984; Doris Lessing edited by Eve Bertelsen, Johannesburg, McGraw Hill, 1985; Critical Essays on Doris Lessing edited by Claire Sprague and Virginia Tiger, Boston, Hall, 1986; Rereading Doris Lessing: Narrative Patterns of Doubling and Repetition by Claire Sprague, Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1987, and In Pursuit of Doris Lessing: Nine Nations Reading edited by Sprague, London, Macmillan, 1990; The Theme of Enclosure in Selected Works of Doris Lessing by Shirley Budhos, Troy, New York, Whitston, 1987; Doris Lessing: The Alchemy of Survival edited by Carey Kaplan and Ellen Cronan Rose, Athens, Ohio University Press, 1988; Doris Lessing by Ruth Whittaker, London, Macmillan, 1988; Doris Lessing by Jeannette King, London, Arnold, 1989; Understanding Doris Lessing by Jean Pickering, Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1990; Doris Lessing: Sufi Equilibrium and the Form of the Novel by Shadia S. Fahim. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1994; Doris Lessing by Margaret Moan Rowe, New York, St. Martin's Press, 1994; Doris Lessing: The Poetics of Change by Gayle Greene, Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1994; Text/Countertext: Postmodern Paranoia in Samuel Beckett, Doris Lessing, and Philip Roth by Marie A. Danziger, New York, P. Lang, 1996; From the Margins of Empire: Christina Stead, Doris Lessing, Nadine Gordimer by Louise Yelin, Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1998; Doris Lessing-In This World But Not of It by Carole Klein, Boston, Little, Brown, 1999; Spiritual Exploration in the Works of Doris Lessing, edited by Phyllis Sternberg Perrakis, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1999.

* * *

Doris Lessing's writings extend the boundaries of fiction, experiment with different genres, explore the worlds of Africa, Britain, and Space, and offer a socio-political and cultural commentary upon the postmodern world. She is a descendant of those nineteenthcentury women writers who made poverty, class conflict, women's suffrage, and slavery the subjects of their novels. She is a writer of epic scope and startling surprises. Her novels range from social realism to science fiction, with brief forays into speculative mysticism and fables of horror. After completing five books in her sciencefiction sequence, Canopus in Argos, in 1983, Lessing startled her public by turning away from the Antarctic cold of two of her planetary realms and returning to novels of postwar London with its welfare state, terrorists, and aging population. Two of these books, The Diary of a Good Neighbour and If the Old Could—, were originally published under the pseudonym of Jane Somers; the third, The Good Terrorist, offers a detailed psychological and political portrait of a group of radicals-turned-terrorists living in London in a dilapidated council flat. Her novella The Fifth Child, tells the chilling tale of a changeling, a goblin-child, and questions whether this child is actually the incarnation of evil, a bad seed, a genetic freak—or is it the mother who is deeply disturbed, projecting her own fears and ambivalence regarding the child onto a child who might, in fact, be nearly normal, or minimally retarded, had he not been so cruelly treated by his family and relatives who thought they had an evil "alien" in their midst?

The Antartic expeditions of Britain's once revered, now tarnished hero, Robert Falcon Scott, profoundly influenced Lessing's The Sirian Experiments and The Making of the Representative for Plant 8, not only by providing her with an understanding of the landscape of paralyzing ice and snow, but by offering her insights into the social processes of Scott's time—the Edwardian era of fierce nationalistic pride and Imperial longings—and of ours. Subsequent books, departing completely from her science-fiction vein, nonetheless continue her preoccupation with human behavior and social processes. Two depict, with graphic psychological realism and rich naturalistic detail, the ordinary day-to-day life of an unmarried, middle-aged career woman living in London and tending society's outcast aged, and belatedly trying to love and give—something she was always too busy to do. Another recounts the life of a group of squatters whose radical spirits transform them into revolutionaries.

Many greeted The Golden Notebook, written in 1962, as Lessing's feminist manifesto, underestimating its critique of the twin gods, Communism and Freud. Later in life, Lessing was a pioneer in writing novels of aging and dying, confronting the pressing social problems these entail and depicting the grim reality we so often ignore or repress. Her fierce reformist spirit pervades her writing; her anger very much with her, she nonetheless tempers her disillusionment with a wisdom learned through living. Her uncanny gift for knowing characters deeply is very much in evidence.

Lessing's books have always articulated her ideas, whether they be about women's orgasms, Armageddon, or utopia. More often than one would expect from so prolific a writer, she is sufficiently imaginative to integrate smoothly her ideas into her narrative. Even more to her credit is that her writing is continually evolving and is unusual in its breadth. Her plunge into science fiction seemed entirely unexpected. In its incipient stages, in Briefing for a Descent into Hell, it was startling and seemed to mark a change as radical as Picasso's when he moved from the Blue Period to Abstract Cubism. With more reflection, one can discover the thread that connects The Golden Notebook to her science-fiction sequence, Canopus in Argos; but it is hard to think of a writer of her stature in the past half-century who has demonstrated such range.

Her career began with The Grass Is Singing, a gem of a book. Set in Rhodesia, it charts with an economy rare in Lessing's works the dissolution of a couple's relationship. After Lessing left Africa in 1949, she devoted ten years to the Children of Violence series which explored exhaustively the theme of the "free Woman" long before it was fashionable. It also displayed Lessing's preoccupation with politics, which many have criticized as tedious. The Golden Notebook is the best of her works from this period despite its obvious flaws. It is as much a book about writing as it is an exploration of women's relationships with each other and men. In many ways it ought to be compared to Gide's The Counterfeiters—the writer's quest to capture the self intended in fiction, not a different, diminished, or enhanced self; the journey through madness that this task requires—the visions of violence it calls up are integral to both books. Both descend from Joyce; both require a sophisticated audience who enjoys unraveling puzzles; both mirror an age when the Heisenberg Uncertainty Principle threatens the reliability of all narrators and estranges the artist from world and self.

In the 1970s came the unexpected turn to science fiction. Lessing's interest in extra-sensory perception first emerged in Landlocked. Madness had been seen as a state offering Anna Wulf a respite from the obsessional insistence upon the self that Saul Green spattered out like machine-gun bullets in The Golden Notebook. In Briefing for a Descent into Hell Lessing took her interest in madness a step further. Calling the book a work of "inner space fiction," she built a story around Charles Watkins, a fifty-year-old classics professor who is found wandering on Waterloo Bridge and is confined for a stay in a psychiatric hospital. Two doctors, of conflicting views, struggle to bring back his memory while he follows a visionary journey in which he enjoys a different, higher identity—one conferred upon him by the Crystal—and one that ordained that he enter earth, hell, as part of a Descent Team whose mission is to show the mad, ego-obsessed humans that they are part of a larger harmony. Lessing, following R.D. Laing, explores the possibility that only the mad are sane. But much more intriguing than this idea is Lessing's decision to fashion the language and metaphors of madness from the idiom of science fiction and the visions experienced through ESP. The inner journey of this modern Odysseus is traveled on the spacetime warp of science fiction. The regions he visits are vividly depicted. The language which attempts to capture the visions Watkins is experiencing is one where words are understood by their sounds, not their connotative meanings. "I" glides into "aye" and "eye" as Watkins's mind seems to float in limbo, carrying his body through an unfamiliar medium, revealing images from the visionary realm. Lessing sustains this style, interrupted by only the curt notations of the two psychiatrists, for over a hundred pages. The effect is startling. At times one almost drowns in verbiage, but the flow of the vision is interrupted with the banal observations of the doctors or the staccato questioning of the patient. Undoubtedly, Lessing's style will cost her some readers, but those who bear with her will find themselves caught up in this bizarre account and caring very much whether this amnesiac will tenaciously hang on to his visionary self or succumb to the pressures of the doctors and society and return to the ordinary realm where he is merely a slightly eccentric don. Watkins's hold on the link between the two ways of seeing is most precarious. The reader must try to decide whether Felicity, Constancia, and Nancy, creatures in his visions, correspond with his wife, Felicity, his mistress, Constance, and the wife of a friend. We are also left puzzling whether Miles and Watkins are at some level identical, and whether it matters at all since others in the Descent Team seem still to be around. Also, of course, there is the possibility that Watkins is nothing more than temporarily schizophrenic, though the weight of the story seems to negate this alternative. This book introduces all the ideas and the paraphernalia of science fiction that dominate the Canopus in Argos sequence. In its ambiguous treatment of Watkins's identity, it anticipates questions raised in The Fifth Child.

Shikasta and The Marriages Between Zones Three, Four, and Five are the first works in the sequence. In the first a compilation of reports, historical documents, letters, and psychiatric diagnoses is used to unfold the story of Johor's three visits to Shikasta (Earth), the last taking place in the final phase just following the Third World War. Johor is an emissary from the galactic Empire of Canopus, sent to Shikasta to report on the colony. It is Johor's task to educate those who survive the Third World War to their true place in a larger planetary System, where cosmological accidents have heavily contributed to the blighted human condition, and where Shammat, the criminal planet of another galactic empire, has temporarily obstructed the lock that will connect Shikasta to Canopus. A Chronicler from zone Three is the narrator of the second book. He tells one of the myths that accounts for man's fallen state and reveals the will of the Powers that the potentates of three hitherto separate zones are to marry and so hasten the evolutionary design that governs the six zones encircling Earth. The myth he tells is of the marriage of Al-Ith, Queen of Zone Three, to Ben Ata, ruler of Zone Four, and, later, the marriage of Ben Ata to Vahshi, ruler of Zone Five. Two births follow. The marriages alter the Zones, estrange their monarchs from the old dispensation, and bring about alterations which enable all the peoples to move between the Zones to explore again, in new metaphors, the human qualities responsible for the catastrophic happenings in this century, and the nature of the kinds of relationships men and women must make and the kinds of societies that must be constructed to move humans to a higher consciousness. The Marriage Between Zones Three, Four, and Five is far more lyrical than Shikasta. The Chronicler uses songs and pictures to capture the mythic dimension of the story he tells. The Sirian Experiments recounts the colonial experiments practiced upon Shikasta, leading its people into their 20th century of Destruction. The Making of the Representative for Planet 8 tells of Johor's journeys to the planet and the ordeal that he and Doeg, the narrator of the novel, along with other representatives, encounter when the planet begins to freeze to death. Doeg comes to understand his part in the Canopean grand design and recognizes finally the mystical transformation which makes him both many and one and enables him to transcend time and space, entering the realm of all possibility under the tutelage of the Canopean Agents. The last book in the series, The Sentimental Agents, is the most disappointing. The history of invasions and conquests of the Volyen Empire enables Lessing to reflect on Klorathy's educational process and his attempts to free the Volyens from the power of words and rhetoric, and teach them the power of thought. The book aspires to place itself in the tradition of Plato, Rousseau, Mill, and Orwell as a novel about an educational project, but it is over-written and the ideas seem tedious. Her old concerns abound—how a revolutionary is made; why man has created a world he cannot manage; that history is a repetition of invasion and conquest with the oppressors of one age the oppressed of the next—but the narrative frame is predictable and the ideas simplistic.

Lessing's next four books return to the kind of fiction she was writing before she tackled science fiction. The Summer Before the Dark, The Memoirs of a Survivor, and the ambitious The Golden Notebook are of a piece with her later writing. The Summer Before the Dark is one of Lessing's most perfectly crafted novels. Compact, tightly constructed, it tells the moving story of a woman's coming to terms with aging. Kate Brown, the forty-five-year-old mother of four children, all grown, and the wife of a neurologist of some standing, is a woman who has lived her married years making accommodations, to her husband's choices and to the needs of her children. In the summer of the story, events unexpectedly leave Kate Brown without family responsibilities and alone in London for the first time since her marriage. She holds a job briefly, depending again on the talents that the sympathetic understanding of mothering taught her. Then she has a brief affair with a young man on the continent. Both fall sick; Kate returns to London where she lies ill, preoccupied with the recurring dream of a seal which she must complete. She loses weight; her brightly tinted red hair becomes brassy, then banded in gray. In the last phase of the story, she shares quarters with a young woman who is struggling with her own coming of age. The two women work upon each other; Kate's dream is completed; both separate to enter another stage of their lives—the young woman choosing marriage, children, even responsibility; Kate, returning to her husband, with her hair gray, as a woman who acts for her own reasons, not merely to please others.

The Memoirs of a Survivor is an even more remarkable book, and equally as mature. It is the memoirs of a nameless woman who has survived "it," a nameless war that has left the cities of England empty shells, with conclaves of people living barricaded in their apartments while the gangs of youths roam the streets and the air is so polluted that hand-driven machines are necessary to purify it. The narrator retells how she lived through this period; how she came by a child, Emily, who was entrusted to her care; how she entered a space behind the white walls of her living-room, and inhabited others rooms, from earlier times, and witnessed the traumatic moments of Emily's youth spent with her real parents. She struggles to tell in words how the two worlds, at first so different, began to impinge upon one another. She contrasts what she calls "personal" moments of experience with others that she labels "impersonal." Both reside in the world behind the wall. The story blends the dreamy, prophetic, timeless moments behind the wall where some heightened consciousness, some visionary powers, exist, with a dispassionate, often chilling, realistic account of "ordinary" life in a ravaged London apartment. Always, when the narrator goes behind the wall, she seeks, with a sense of urgency, the inhabitant of the other house, those other gardens. The protagonist's memoirs end with her account of how they somehow came through the darkest times, and realized that the worst was over, that something new would be built. The final paragraphs describe the moment when the walls opened again, and she saw the face she had sought so long, the inhabitant of that hidden world. And that presence takes the hands of Emily, her boyfriend, and the evil child who had terrorized the London streets and leads them into the garden. It is a mystical moment, transfiguring, mysterious, and a consummate end for this exquisitely crafted book.

In The Diary of a Good Neighbour Jane Somers, like Kate Brown, is a middle-aged, seemingly successful woman, but, unlike Kate, she is childless and recently widowed with only a career to give her definition. To compensate for her lack of relationships and to try to come to terms with cancer and dying—she had faced neither when her husband was terminally ill—she befriends an elderly woman, Maudie, whom she has met in a corner store. The book offers an extraordinarily moving, also frightening, story of this stubborn old woman's final years, living in a council flat, tended to by Meals on Wheels, day nursing, a cadre of Home Helpers, and the volunteer Good Neighbours. Lessing diligently details the life of the ninetyyear-old woman, alone in London, too ill to care for herself, too proud to let others help her, and too angry to let friendship or death come easily to her. Soiled in her own clothing, almost too weak and brittle to walk to the unheated lavatory in the hall outside her flat, or to light her meager fire, far beyond any ability to clean her rooms or even dress or bathe. Maudie fiercely clings to her independence, refusing to be put in a home or a hospital which she knows will only mark her end. This is a novel about our time, aging, and society's refusal to differentiate between growing old and dying. It calls forth Lessing's gifts—a precise eye for detail, an absorption in the quotidian, a psychological understanding of people, and the ability to tell a story. The book is full of stories-Maudie's, the elderly Anne's, another of the women Jane comes to help, and, of course Jane's. The second book in the series is less successful. If the Old Could-tells a triter story of Jane's affair with a married man whose unhappy daughter shadows them and whose son baffles her with his unexpected declaration of love. The portions that deal with the elderly, however, are again excellent. Lessing, in both these books, forces the reader to see the elderly. After reading the books, I found myself looking searchingly at the solitary old people sitting on benches, or queuing in the grocery store, or shuffling to a bus, and more important, I looked forward and within.

The Good Terrorist is absorbing, so apt is its portrait of Alice Mellings, a 36-year-old over-aged adolescent, and her "family" of squatters. Alice's instincts are motherly; her zeal to save council flats from being condemned makes her a valuable friend for other, younger, motley members of the Communist Centre Union who join her as a squatter. Her rages are instantaneous and inexplicable to her. Immersed in her day-to-day life, we witness her transformation into a terrorist.

The Fifth Child again demonstrates Lessing's ability to defy labels and forge in new directions. Although its world relates back to a world she revealed in both Briefing for a Descent into Hell and Memoirs of a Survivor, the tale is told in a new and disquieting form. It begins with a too idyllic account of a pair of young Londoners and their old-fashioned dream of a large family, housed in a mammoth Victorian mansion, comfortably away from the strife of the city. After recounting a cycle of yearly house parties and the arrival of four healthy children, it moves to the birth of the fifth child and the disastrous consequences. Folk ingredients, elements of Frankenstein, and images of gnomes and trolls and distant ancestors of the Nebelung haunt the imagination of the mother as her child grows. Mysterious stranglings of animals, and, later, a beating of a classmate, and then thefts and worse crimes occur. All seem the work of the demon child and the idyll of a happy family disintegrates. Throughout the book, we are conscious not only of the desperate plight of the mother of this hapless child, but also of deeper societal unrest. As in many of her other novels, Lessing questions whether there is a higher dimension, or whether mankind has reverted to some darker, primitive age where troll-like creatures dominate the land.

Mara and Dann, Lessing's twenty-first novel, is set during an ice age some 15,000 years in the future, and takes place on the continent of Ifrik, formerly known as Africa, one of the few habitable regions on Earth. Throughout the book are references to the past, and how the world got to be the way it had become—primarily because of an asteroid that hit the Mediterranean. The territory of Love, Again, is much more familiar, and the contrast between the two books mirrors Lessing's wide-ranging talent. This time the protagonist is a sixty-five-year-old widow, Sarah, who takes part in the production of a play based on the life of Julie Vairon. The latter, a feminist writer who committed suicide in 1912, is as much a character as any in the story, and throughout the novel's panorama of failed relationships (between Sarah and a daughter-like niece, and Sarah and a son-like lover), she forms an abiding presence.

It is too early to assess Lessing's place in literary history. Her imagination is too rich. What can be said is that she is deeply concerned with the human condition, and hungry to explore new dimensions, to redefine relationships. Her writings reflect a nearly obsessive effort to find a way through the historical ravages of the twentieth century to a condition beyond the one of personal unhappiness that plagues so many human relationships. Her novels expose a world out of control, and attempt to teach us how better to manage our world.

—Carol Simpson Stern

LETHEM, Jonathan (Allen)

Nationality: American. Born: New York, New York, 19 February 1964. Education: Attended Bennington College, 1982–84. Career: Bookseller, Brazen Head Books, New York, 1977–80, Gryphon Books, New York, 1982–84, Pegasus Books, Berkeley, California, 1985–90, Moe's Books, Berkeley, California, 1990–94; writer. Awards: Best first novel of the year (Locus magazine), 1994; Crawford Award for best first fantasy novel, 1995; Nebula award finalist, 1995; National Book Critics' Circle award, 1999. Agent: Richard Parks Agency, 138 East 16th Street, Number 5B, New York, New York 10003, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Gun, With Occasional Music. San Diego, Harcourt, 1994.

Amnesia Moon. San Diego, Harcourt, 1995.

As She Climbed Across the Table. New York, Doubleday, 1997.

Girl in Landscape. New York, Doubleday, 1998.

Motherless Brooklyn. New York, Doubleday, 1999.

Short Stories

The Wall of the Sky, the Wall of the Eye: Stories. San Diego, Harcourt, 1996.

Other

The Vintage Book of Amnesia: An Anthology. New York, Vintage Books, 2000.

Contributor, In Dreams, edited by Paul J. McAuley and Kim Newman. London, Gollancz, 1992.

* * *

Jonathan Lethem is unquestionably one of the most interesting writers of the late twentieth and early-twenty-first centuries. He began writing science fiction, publishing forty or so short stories before selling his first novel, Gun, With Occasional Music, in 1994. Fans and scholars of his work, however, speculate about Lethem's goals in fiction, because he has achieved crossover success, garnering praise among reviewers outside of the science fiction field.

Gun, With Occasional Music arrived with all the fanfare a beginning novelist could wish for. In this dark, funny, highly imaginative mystery, "Private Inquisitor" Conrad Metcalf is hired by a man who has been framed for murder. The corpse is that of wealthy Maynard Stanhunt, who had once hired Metcalf to follow Stanhunt's wife Celeste. Metcalf interviews various acquaintances of the Stanhunts and exchanges wise-aleck banter with gangster Danny Phoneblum and gunsel Joey Castle, who threaten him to drop the matter if he knows what's good for him.

So far we are in familiar Raymond Chandler territory, and Lethem imitates Chandler's voice with astonishing fidelity. The novel's premises, however, require much faith in the author, who proves himself capable of establishing his bizarre, dystopian setting as both science-fictional and admirably original. For one thing, only Inquisitors are socially permitted to ask any kind of question. For another, everyone is addicted to government-issued drugs such as Acceptol, Avoidol, and Forgettol. Stranger elements of this society include a judicial system based on "karma points" and a disturbing proliferation of bio-engineered animals and infants, the former developed for use as servants, the latter a delinquent class known as "babyheads." Joey Castle is a kangaroo—and he's a mean one.

Metcalf seeks the truth, making enemies of the decadent Bay Area residents and the Public Inquisitors alike, but is finally jailed in cryonic suspension as punishment for his inquisitiveness. Nevertheless, when he awakens he succeeds in solving the crime, a bleak triumph in a rapidly deteriorating society.

Gun won the 1995 Crawford Award for Best First Fantasy Novel (given by the International Association for the Fantastic in the Arts) and was a finalist for the 1995 Nebula Award (bestowed by the Science Fiction and Fantasy Writers of America).

Lethem's second novel, Amnesia Moon, was a departure, but allowed recurrent themes to emerge. It is a road novel set in a fragmented future America; if one called it a quest novel, the quest would be for a definitive shared sense of reality. In an interview, Lethem described it as "a collage of disaster and dystopia scenarios, where I tried to dispose of all my impulses to destroy the world in one book." Where Chandler's voice haunted Gun, With Occasional Music, science fiction author Philip K. Dick's hovers throughout Amnesia Moon, with mystery novelist Cornell Woolrich and The Wizard of Oz as added shaping influences. An amnesiac loner called Chaos journeys from Wyoming to San Francisco through various communities, each of which is blind or obsessed in its own distressed way. What has happened to his world? Nuclear holocaust? Alien invasion? As Chaos uncovers pieces of his own past and self, the truth retreats into ever deeper obscurity, because he is one of the survivors who can change reality with his dreams.

These novels established Lethem as a brilliant pasticheur, as well as a master ironist and fabulist of the difficult themes of entropy and epistemology. With The Wall of the Sky, The Wall of the Eye, his World Fantasy Award-winning collection of short stories, Lethem proved that his narrative materials were not solely derivative. While alluding to classics and contemporary pop culture, he could also create nightmarish compositions in his own voice. "The Happy Man," his first Nebula winner, "Light and the Sufferer," "Forever," Said the Duck," "Five Fucks," "The Hardened Criminals," and "Sleepy People" are dreamlike, edgy, funny, and painful. They emulsify various themes including dysfunctional family, social, and sexual relationships with nightmarish images of journeys into hell, virtual reality parties whose guests' conversations and character assassinations are as superficial as their presences, prison walls formed of living human criminals, and devolution of humans into creatures scuttling across the ocean floor.

Lethem's next novel, the tour-de-force campus comedy As She Climbed Across the Table, homages American Book Award-winning author Don DeLillo's 1985 novel White Noise as well as Lewis Carroll's Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. Physicist Alice Coombs and her colleagues have created a void on their laboratory table, a hole of nothingness that may be a portal to another universe, which she and her colleagues name "Lack." Narrator Philip Engstrand, a professor who studies other professors, loves Alice, but Alice has fallen in love with her physics experiment.

Alice anthropomorphizes the void, calling it "him" and feeding it various objects in an obsessive need to satisfy Lack. While campus professors debate the nature of Lack and the absurdities of each other's theories—in one funny scene, two blind men are brought in to solve the quantum-mechanical "problem of the observer"—Philip strives to regain Alice's affections. Lethem expertly blends DeLillo's cool, wry narrative tone with the futility-burdened voice and plot of John Barth's 1958 novel End of the Road.

Girl in Landscape is not nearly as playful. The book is based on John Ford's 1956 film The Searchers, which starred John Wayne as the hard, Indian-hating Ethan Edwards who for years pursues the band of Comanches who abducted his niece. Ford's most sophisticated film challenges Western genre conventions and shows the dark side of the popular cowboy hero.

Lethem's frontier is a newly colonized planet, its despised natives a race known as "Archbuilders." A rich and lyrical portrayal of an adolescent girl, Pella Marsh, growing into adulthood while coping with the death of her mother, her emotionally alienated father, and her strange new home, Girl in Landscape pits Pella against Efram Nugent, the Ethan Edwards figure.

The central mystery is complex, involving the Archbuilders' strange quiescence and wistful glorification of the majority of their race, who left the planet long ago for unknown parts; the role of the tiny 'household deer' in the ecosystem; and Efram's hatred for both. Though a loner, Efram rules the town by the force of his ugly charisma. He clashes horns with the Marshes when learning that they decline to take a drug that everyone else swallows religiously. These pills counteract a contagious Archbuilder virus that psychologically transforms humans in a disturbing way: 'It's called becoming a witness.' The settlers are secretive about the matter, displaying the obliquities, the alarums and excursions, the displacements and inarticulations of normative values that distort the fabric of a guilt-wracked society. So Pella decides to act on her own. She 'becomes a witness,' and learns the appalling truth about Efram's reclusivity and hatred of the natives.

Following the climax, which, in ironized Western fashion, features a shoot-out and a major character fleeing Dodge, Pella learns from an Archbuilder a truth hidden within herself. After grappling with racism, complicity, pathological secrecy, and alien mysteries, in a gentle moment of revelation the novel discloses an underlying theme that was never really concealed, survivor's guilt.

Lethem's fans remained loyal, but grumblings from other readers began to appear and echo. He was forgetting his roots. Lethem's fiction was too alloyed, die-hard science fiction readers accused, with the materials of other genres. He was getting too much attention from the highbrow list-makers of New York. The dogs growling in the manger were especially discomfited by an essay Lethem published in the Village Voice, "The Squandered Promise of Science Fiction" (June 1998).

Lethem took the high road. He politely insists in interviews that he must follow his muse. His next novel showed this determination: Motherless Brooklyn, a National Book Critics' Circle Award winner, was yet another radical departure from earlier works.

Motherless Brooklyn is narrated by Tourette's syndrome victim Lionel Essrog, who pursues the killer of the man who saved him from orphanage and life as an outcast. Frank Minna had selected Lionel and three other hapless youths from the St. Vincent's Home for Boys in Brooklyn, New York, and given them a job, a sense of self-worth, and even a family of sorts. They deride Lionel as a "Human Freakshow" because of his physical tics and uncontrollable linguistic syncopations, but he is smart enough to realize that their gopher jobs for Minna run the shady side of the street. Their primary front is a car service, their secondary front an alleged detective agency, and their real business is delivering packages for mobsters. When Lionel finds Minna stabbed to death in a dumpster, he decides with goofy but lovable determination to become a real detective.

The book can fit perfectly well onto bookstore mystery shelves, though it has been classified as that cryptomorphic creature, "Literature." Indeed, Motherless Brooklyn cries out for a new genus, one that would include novelists such as Vladimir Nabokov, Jorge Luis Borges, and David R. Slavitt. The whimsical richness of the twisting linguistic world in Lionel's mind is nothing short of genius. Every word or phrase that Lionel locks onto produces birth pangs of anagrammatizing and spoonerizing logogenesis.

Many critics have described Lethem's fiction as postmodern, as it suggests that the disappearance of a stable, universal context is the context for contemporary culture. Lethem's divided impulses and resistance to easy categorization are certainly postmodern. His unpredictable novels become unstable whenever the slightest perturbation in plotting is introduced. Every narrative factor is potentially unreal and negotiable.

One does not have to be a card-carrying postmodernist to see paradox and flux as symptomatic of twentieth-century modes of thinking. Lethem's irony focuses on disorder in the human condition itself, his novels comedies of ignorance and interpretation. He analyzes human nature with compassion, rejecting Barth's dictum that the truth is that nothing makes any difference, including that truth. For Lethem, meaning matters, values matter, human happiness matters. As Newsweek announced in its April 21, 1998, issue, Lethem is an artist to watch in the twenty-first century.

-Fiona Kelleghan

LEVIN, Ira

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 27 August 1929. Education: Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa, 1946–48; New York University; 1948–50, A.B. 1950. Military Service: Served in the United States Army Signal Corps, 1953–55. Family: Married 1) Gabrielle Aronsohn in 1960 (divorced 1968), three sons; 2) Phyllis Finkel in 1979 (divorced 1982). Awards: Mystery Writers of America Edgar Allan Poe award, 1954, 1980; Bram Stoker award, 1997. Agent: Harold Ober Associates, 425 Madison Avenue, New York, New York 10017, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Kiss Before Dying. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1953; London, Joseph, 1954.

Rosemary's Baby. New York, Random House, and London, Joseph, 1967.

This Perfect Day. New York, Random House, and London, Joseph, 1970.

The Stepford Wives. New York, Random House, and London, Joseph, 1972.

The Boys from Brazil. New York, Random House, and London, Joseph, 1976.

Sliver. New York, Bantam, and London, Joseph, 1991.

Son of Rosemary: The Sequel to Rosemary's Baby. Thorndike, Maine, Thorndike Press, 1998.

Plays

No Time for Sergeants, Adaptation of the novel by Mac Hyman (produced New York, 1955; London, 1956). New York, Random House, 1956.

Interlock (produced New York, 1958). New York, Dramatists Play Service, 1958.

Critic's Choice (produced New York, 1960; London, 1961). New York, Random House, 1961; London, Evans, 1963.

General Seeger (produced New York, 1962). New York, Dramatists Play Service, 1962.

Drat! That Cat!, music by Milton Schafer (produced New York, 1965).

Dr. Cook's Garden (also director: produced New York, 1967). New York, Dramatists Play Service, 1968.

Veronica's Room (produced New York, 1973; Watford, Hertfordshire, 1982). New York, Random House, 1974; London, Joseph, 1975.

Deathtrap (produced New York and London, 1978). New York, Random House, 1979; London, French, 1980.

Break a Leg (produced New York, 1979). New York, French, 1981.
Cantorial (produced Stamford, Connecticut, 1984; New York, 1989).
New York and London, French, 1990.

*

Film Adaptations: A Kiss Before Dying, 1956, 1991; Critic's Choice, 1963; Rosemary's Baby, 1968; Dr. Cook's Garden (TV), 1970; The Stepford Wives, 1975 (also Revenge of the Stepford Wives, TV, 1980; The Stepford Children, TV, 1987; The Stepford Husbands, TV, 1996); The Boys from Brazil, 1978; Deathtrap, 1982; Sliver, 1993.

Critical Study: Ira Levin by Douglas Fowler, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont, 1988.

Theatrical Activities: Director: Play—Dr. Cook's Garden, New York, 1967.

* * *

The heroine of Rosemary's Baby is overwhelmed by the "elaborate ... evil" of the witches coven through whose agency she has unknowingly borne Satan's child, which now lies in a black bassinet with an inverted crucifix for a crib toy. Elaborateness is, indeed, the chief characteristic of both evil and good in Ira Levin's novels. Bud Corless of A Kiss Before Dying makes neat lists of ways to arrange his pregnant girlfriend's "suicide" and to win her eldest sister's love. In This Perfect Day all human actions are ostensibly directed by a world computer and everyone must touch his identification bracelet to scanners before he can do anything, go anywhere, or receive any supplies. The novel's hero, Chip (or Li RM35M4419, to give him his "nameber") fights system with system in a complicated expedition to disable UniComp's memory banks. The first dozen pages of The Boys for Brazil describe, course by course, Dr. Mengele's dinner partycum-briefing for the assassination of ninety-four retired civil servants, each of whom has unwittingly adopted a clone of Hitler, produced by the Doctor, who now intends to recreate Hitler's family environment.

Such procedures provide the sustaining interest and suspense of Levin's novels, combining neatness and system with Satanism, secrets, universal surveillance, violence, and death. Rosemary uses a Scrabble set to work out the anagram which identifies her friendly neighbor Roman Castevet as devil-worshipping Steven Marcato. In A Kiss Before Dying Dorothy's provision of "Something old, Something new, Something borrowed, And something blue" enables her sister to deduce that Dorothy intended marriage, not suicide. The husbands of The Stepford Wives make speaking, moving replicas of their spouses. They begin with seemingly innocuous sketches of each real wife and tape recordings of her voice; they end by killing her offstage. Levin increases the "reality" of such sinister processes by mingling them with ordinary routines of eating, pregnancy, moving to a new house, etc.

Both good and bad characters must, at times, revise their elaborate plans on the spur of the crisis. Their expedients are ingenious, often complex, and the pleasure of following Levin's details is enough to make some of his novels re-readable when their surprise is over.

The forward movement and acceleration of the plots are further complicated by sudden reversals, single or double, overt or psychological, in which characters (and often readers) are temporarily disoriented. For example, Rosemary, arriving at the logical conclusion that her husband had joined the coven, "didn't know if she was going mad or going sane." Joanna cannot tell if her best friend is still a person or has become an automaton. (She is an automaton, and stabs Joanna). Although the reader is sometimes prepared for these discoveries, there are also unexpected shocks, such as when Rosemary, thinking herself safe, sees her witch-obstetrician enter, or when Chip, suddenly taken prisoner by a trusted team-member, discovers that betrayal is really recruitment by the elite subterranean programmers. The effect on the reader of such continual reversals and realignments is a constant uneasiness as to his personal safety and moral identity, which produces horror very successfully in Rosemary's Baby, but rather mechanically in This Perfect Day and The Stepford Wives. No doubt Levin's constant readers now anticipate his surprises, which may account for his increasing detail of violence as excitement in The Boys from Brazil.

Occasionally and chiefly in This Perfect Day, Levin's literary antecedents are apparent. His shock techniques are essentially those of Ambrose Bierce and Villiers de I'Isle Adam. Bud's slow plunge into a vat of molten copper recalls H.G. Wells's "The Cone" with its archetypal death by blast furnace. The world of UniComp is essentially a Brave New World with a Big Brother mentality, but controlled by a mad scientist out of Edgar Rice Burroughs, who rejuvenates through body transference. In short, Levin has drawn upon the almost inescapable traditional materials of his genre, but he uses them intelligently and individually.

Increasingly, Levin's novels imply larger significances. Looking at the copper smelter, the murderer says seriously, "It makes you realize what a great country this is." Rosemary's subtly evil apartment house is owned by the church next door, and there are seemingly casual references to the Death of God. An ideal universe of "the gentle, the helpful, the loving, the unselfish" is the vision of a powerjoyful egoist. Even the intelligent Stepford husbands in a strange feminist fable want only big-breasted, floor-waxing, mindless wives. A wise old Nazi-hunter, clashing with a radical rabbi, refuses to let ninety-four teenage Hitlers be exterminated for the sake of future Jewish safety, saying, "This was Mengele's business, killing children. Should it be ours?" These moral paradoxes, undeveloped though they are, both extend and intensify the disquieting uncertainty which had been Levin's chief characteristic.

Sliver, which came fifteen years after The Boys from Brazil, seems almost a parody of earlier motifs. There is the sinister apartment house of Rosemary's Baby, now dominated by the corrupting power of television. Its owner, Peter Henderson, a hi-tech Peeping Tom, has bugged every room for closed circuit TV and watches the most intimate lives of his tenants—the soap operas God sees. Like God, Peter rewards and punishes, while manipulating a plot to avenge his actress-mother's death. There is also the violent fall of A Kiss Before Dying as Peter pushes Kay (less innocent and sympathetic than Rosemary) backward through a window—although she manages to hold on while her cat claws out his eyes. Levin's processes in this novel have become pedestrian, and there is no real shock of reversal since Kay has known of and participated in Peter's surveillance. Nor is a reader likely to be much disquieted by learning that three other New York buildings have been similarly wired. Instead, Sliver is basically a melodramatic parable about television, for which Levin himself wrote in its golden age. Then, a character says, it was more real because shows were live. Now it corrupts, and Sam Yale, Peter's intended victim, points out that "TV madness" was bound to come. He and Kate give in quickly to the lure of Peter's multiple screens, even while disapproving.

There is promise in the premise of Son of Rosemary, sequel to the book that shocked the world thirty years earlier. But the world has changed a great deal since then, as Rosemary learns when she awakens from a coma on November 9, 1999, to discover that her son Andy has since become a guru revered and loved throughout the world. She finds herself surrounded by similar adoration as a sort of latter-day Virgin Mary—only the "savior" she has spawned is an anti-Christ who has managed to hide his past from a spiritually hungry world. Despite the intriguing idea behind the story, it lacks the impact of the earlier book—yet another sign that times have changed.

-Jane W. Stedman

LEVINE, (Albert) Norman

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Ottawa, Ontario, 22 October 1923. Education: York Street School and High School of Commerce, Ottawa; Carleton College, Ottawa, 1945; McGill University, Montreal, 1946–49, B.A. 1948, M.A. 1949; King's College, London, 1949–50. Military Service: Served in the Royal Canadian Air Force, 1942–45: Flying Officer. Family: Married 1) Margaret Payne in 1952 (died 1978), three daughters; 2) Anne Sarginson in 1983. Career: Employed by the Department of National Defence, Ottawa, 1940–42; lived mainly in England, 1949–80; head of the English Department, Barnstaple Boys Grammar School, Devon, 1953–54; resident writer, University of New Brunswick, Fredericton, 1965–66. Awards: Canada Council fellowship, 1959, and Arts award, 1969, 1971, 1974. Address: Penguin Books, 10 Alcorn Avenue, Toronto, Ontario M4V 3B2, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Angled Road. London, Laurie, 1952. From a Seaside Town. London, Macmillan, 1970.

Short Stories

One Way Ticket. London, Secker and Warburg, 1961.

I Don't Want to Know Anyone Too Well: 15 Stories. London, Macmillan, 1971.

Selected Stories. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1975.

In Lower Town, photographs by Johanne McDuff. Ottawa, Commoners', 1977.

Thin Ice. Ottawa, Deneau, and London, Wildwood House, 1980. Why Do You Live So Far Away? A Novella and Six Stories. Ottawa, Deneau, 1984.

Champagne Barn. Toronto and London, Penguin, 1984; New York, Penguin, 1985.

Something Happened Here. Toronto and London, Viking, 1991.

Poetry

Myssium. Toronto, Ryerson Press, 1948.The Tight-Rope Walker. London, Totem Press, 1950.I Walk by the Harbour. Fredericton, New Brunswick, Fiddlehead, 1976.

Other

Canada Made Me. London, Putnam, 1958.The Beat & the Still. Toronto, North Edition, 1990.Editor, Canadian Winter's Tales. Toronto and London, Macmillan, 1968.

*

Manuscript Collections: University of Texas, Austin; York University, Toronto.

Critical Studies: "The Girl in the Drugstore" by Levin, in Canadian Literature 41 (Vancouver), 1969; interview in Canadian Literature 45 (Vancouver), 1970; Philip Oakes, in Sunday Times (London), 19 July 1970; Alan Heuser, in Montreal Star, 26 September 1970; Times Literary Supplement (London), 3 December 1971; Maurice Capitanchik, in Books and Bookmen (London), September 1972; Frederick Sweet, in Profiles in Canadian Literature 4 edited by Jeffrey M. Heath, Toronto, Dundurn, 1982; George Galt, in Saturday Night (Toronto), June 1984; "A Small Piece of Norman Levine" (interview) by Michael Winter, in TickleAce 26 (St. John's, Newfoundland), Winter 1993.

Norman Levine comments:

For anyone who wants to know where to begin, I suggest that the start would be Canada Made Me, From a Seaside Town, then Champagne Barn.

I wrote in the Atlantic Advocate: "When you go to a writer's work—it is into his personal world that you enter. What he is doing is paying, in his own way, an elaborate tribute to people and places he has known."

* * *

Norman Levine has always been remarkable for the reserve of his writing; but it took him some years to learn what best to withhold and what to reveal. In his early autobiographical stories and novel, The Angled Road, he was "trying to cut out [his] past, to cover ... up" his origins as the Canadian-bred son of a Jewish street-peddler. As if to compensate for this leaching of color from his material, he was also experimenting with patches of vulgar prose-poetry. While teaching himself to write simply and directly, he came to terms with his personal history. Now, in Thin Ice, although his range is narrow, he shapes his stories with the unmistakable authority of a writer who has found his subject and style.

Speaking for the most part in the first person, Levine relates in neutral prose incidents from his Canadian upbringing and his years in England. Certain worlds are revealed which he leaves and is drawn back to: Jewish society, life at McGill University summer cottages by the Richelieu, the tourist villages of Cornwall, poverty in a small town. He has achieved the outsider's vantage point from which he turns a telephoto lens on ordinary people and events. The danger of his method is that when it miscarries, as sometimes it does, the reader is left with a commonplace, colorless anecdote that adds up to nothing. His later stories and novel do not differ greatly from his travel narrative, Canada Made Me, except in being increasingly crafted, concise, and superficially detached. Although he has escaped the heavy cold of Montreal and the intimate squalor of lower Ottawa, he takes with him wherever he goes his Canadian melancholy and taste for failure.

In drawing on his personal past, Levine often returns to the same scenes, characters, and even fragments of conversation, as if he were unable to invent afresh or to leave behind any of his life. An Englishman awaiting the flowering of a large cactus, a woman without a nose, a prowling man whom a couple nicknames "the house detective," are only a few of many recurrent elements in the work of this man who mines his own writings, word for word, as well as his past. The friction of repeated use has polished his memories until all that is inessential has worn away, leaving a smooth pebble of experience.

Levine consistently avoids evocative vocabulary, choosing instead to make a plain statement of fact in language so empty of implication that it becomes mysterious. It is as if he is trying to create prose as objective as the reality he perceives. Yet, in his best work, when everything possible has been jettisoned, a core of emotion remains. He writes in short, often broken, sentences that correspond to the fragmentary moments of human contact in his tales. Sometimes an ugly expression such as "less worse" (Canada Made Me) has been selected as the only way of expressing what he means, but at other times a sentence muddles into ambiguity that adds nothing, or an angularity almost illiterate. Except for brief periods, Levine lived in England from 1949 until 1980, so it is not surprising that he somewhat lost his grasp of Canadian idiom and fact. His use of such expressions as "the School of Seven," "motorways," "left luggage," and "do some walks" is evidence of the distance he traveled from his native speech. Even his distinguished German translator, Heinrich Böll, the Nobel prize-winner, must have felt it a hopeless task to convey in all its aspects Levine's continual shuttling between England and Canada.

Although Levine says little about his feelings, one cannot miss the passion that concentrates his prose and sends him back to places and people he cannot forget. His journeys are the counterpart of the sexual hunger that runs through From a Seaside Town. His appetite for experience and his enjoyment of the grotesque have so far saved him from the sterility that threatens autobiographical writers in middle age. In his low-keyed world even tiny incidents stand out like figures against a landscape of snow. They may mean nothing or anything, but to him they have an importance which the reader feels, but never entirely understands.

-Margaret Keith

LIM, Catherine

Nationality: Singaporean (naturalized). Born: Kedah, Malaysia, 23 March 1942. Education: University of Malaysia, B.A. (honours) in English 1963; National University of Singapore, M.A. in applied linguistics 1979, Ph.D. 1987. Family: Married in 1964 (divorced 1980); one daughter and one son. Career: Education officer, 1965–78; deputy director of curriculum development, Institute of Singapore, 1979–85; lecturer in sociolinguistics, Seameo Regional Centre, Singapore, 1989–90. Address: 18 Leedon Heights, #07–05, Farrer Road, Singapore 1026.

PUBLICATIONS

Novel

The Serpent's Tooth. Singapore, Times Books International, 1982.The Bondmaid. Singapore, Catherine Lim Publishing, 1995; New York, Overlook Press, 1997.

The Teardrop Story Woman. Woodstock, New York, Overlook Press, 1998.

Short Stories

Little Ironies: Stories of Singapore. Singapore and Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Heinemann, 1978.

Or Else, the Lightning God and Other Stories. Singapore and Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Heinemann, 1980.

They Do Return. Singapore, Times Books International, 1983.

The Shadow of a Shadow of a Dream: Love Stories of Singapore. Singapore, Times Books International, 1987.

O Singapore!: Stories in Celebration. Singapore, Times Books International, 1989.

Deadline for Love and Other Stories. Singapore, Heinemann, 1992. The Woman's Book of Superlatives. Singapore, Times Books International, 1993.

The Best of Catherine Lim. Singapore, Heinemann, 1993.

Poetry

Love's Lonely Impulses. Singapore, Heinemann, 1992.

*

Critical Studies: "Catherine Lim and the Singapore Short Story in English" by Robert Yeo, in Commentary, 2, 1981; "An Interview with Catherine Lim" by Siti Rohaini Kassim, in Southeast Asian Review of English, December 1989; in Literary Perspectives on Southeast Asia: Collected Essays by Peter Wicks, 1991; Women in Bondage: The Stories of Catherine Lim by Lim Yi-En, Singapore, Times Books International, 1999.

Catherine Lim comments:

Absorbing, enduring interest in the Chinese culture of my childhood; aware of my unusual position as an English-educated Chinese writing in English, with a perspective inevitably coloured by the fact of straddling two worlds.

* * *

Catherine Lim's writing is fuelled by the energies of incongruities, incongruities that power themes including clashes between generations and cultures, the disparity of attitudes and lifestyles found amongst various income-groups, and the discrepancy between the society's ever-improving economic profile and its state of moral poverty. While the themes are large ones, they are expressed within a context of the mundane, in terms of the bric-a-brac of everyday life which lend these themes concreteness and believability. The authorial voice is generally ironic though not uncompassionate, the irony exploiting the territory between differing levels of awareness (e.g., between author, reader, and characters) and pointing sharply to the complacence and the unthinking selfishness displayed by individuals that must be remedied. Lim, however, seldom intrudes judgement; action is allowed to serve as its own comment, and the discrepancies, blandly presented, (e.g., Angela in The Serpent's Tooth spends 5,000 dollars on a birthday dinner whereas 17 dollars and 25 cents is undreamed-of wealth to Ah Bah in "Ah Bah's Money") insist on the reader's attention, engendering social/moral awareness even if none should have existed before.

The Serpent's Tooth brings together many of the concerns treated of separately in the short stories. As its reference to King Lear makes clear, it is on one level about ingratitude and thankless children. But more importantly, it is about the tensions born of the different assumptions and perspectives brought to bear upon things and events, by the main character, Angela and her mother-in-law, (and to a lesser extent, by other members of the extended family). The one stands for the modern, English-speaking Singaporean, for whom money stands in place of culture, the other is an adherent of traditional Chinese beliefs and practices, impervious to change in the world around. They are each other's serpents, each seeing the other as the cause of separation from her child, each making life intolerable for the other, yet ironically unaware of her own shortcomings and insensitivity. What emerges here, and in the short stories, is a sketch of a culture/society comprising morally indifferent and solipsistic individuals. Neither set of values (modern or traditional) is seen as being above reproach. The antique bed belonging to the mother-in-law serves as a vehicle by which both the callousness of the older generation: a bondmaid (who subsequently bled to death) has been raped on it, and also the mercenary tendencies of the younger generation, concerned only with the value of the antique, are exposed.

Certain of the short stories (e.g. "Gold Dust," "Miss Pereira," and "Deadline for Love") examine the disparity between economic plenty and emotional/spiritual starvation, and the groping of the individual for meaning un-indexed by the ownership of material things. However, genuine piety or spirituality is seldom encountered in Lim's stories; instead, what is made to substitute for this is a shallow and formal worship of supernatural forces. These forces must be propitiated, not out of devotion, but from a desire to avert ill-fortune ("Or Else the Lightening God") or to increase wealth. Kindness goes ill-repaid ("A.P. Velloo") and hopes are, more often than not, thwarted. Thus, while as a body of work, Lim's stories stand as testimony to culture in transit, the older traditions particular to race becoming slowly eradicated or homogenized, they also stand as an indictment of materialism on the increase which threatens to destroy things of intangible value.

Lim was forced to self-publish The Bondmaid, due to censorship of the work in Singapore. It is a novel of modern slavery, as four-year-old Han is sold into slavery during the 1950s. Raised in the wealthy House of Wu, she falls in love with her young master, who had been her playmate as a child; yet she can never be his equal, and she reaps a harvest of bitterness and betrayal. The 1950s also provides the setting for The Teardrop Story Woman, which takes place in Malaya during the latter years of the British occupation. The title refers to a teardropshaped mole beside the eye of protagonist Mei Kwei, a defect that the Chinese associate with a destiny of suffering. Much of her life fulfills that destiny, but the indomitable Mei rises above all challenges to find fulfillment in the forbidden love of a young French priest.

-Susan Ang

LIVELY, Penelope (Margaret)

Nationality: British. Born: Penelope Margaret Low in Cairo, Egypt, 17 March 1933; came to England, 1945. Education: Boarding school in Sussex, 1945–51; St. Anne's College, Oxford, B.A. (honors) in modern history 1956. Family: Married Jack Lively in 1957; one daughter and one son. Career: Has been presenter for BBC Radio program on children's literature; regular reviewer for newspapers and magazines in England. Awards: Library Association Carnegie Medal, 1974; Whitbread award, 1976; Southern Arts Association prize, 1979; Arts Council National Book award, 1980; Booker prize, 1987. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1985. Agent: Murray Pollinger, 222 Old Brompton Road, London SW5 OB2, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Road to Lichfield. London, Heinemann, 1977; New York, Grove Weidenfeld, 1991.

Treasures of Time. London, Heinemann, and New York, Doubleday, 1979.

Judgement Day. London, Heinemann, 1980; New York, Doubleday, 1981.

Next to Nature, Art. London, Heinemann, 1982.

Perfect Happiness. London, Heinemann, 1983; New York, Dial Press, 1984.

According to Mark. London, Heinemann, 1984; New York, Beaufort, 1985.

Moon Tiger. London, Deutsch, 1987; New York, Grove Press, 1988.Passing On. London, Deutsch, 1989; New York, Grove Weidenfeld, 1990.

City of the Mind. London, Deutsch, 1991.

Cleopatra's Sister. London, Viking, and New York, HarperCollins, 1993.

Heat Wave. New York, HarperCollins, 1996.

Beyond the Blue Mountains. London and New York, Viking, 1997. Spiderweb. New York, HarperFlamingo, 1999.

Short Stories

Nothing Missing But the Samovar and Other Stories. London, Heinemann, 1978.

Corruption and Other Stories. London, Heinemann, 1984.

Pack of Cards: Stories 1978–86. London, Heinemann, 1986; New York, Grove Press, 1989.

The Five Thousand and One Nights. Seattle, Washington, Fjord Press, 1997.

Plays

Television Plays: Boy Dominic series (3 episodes), 1974; Time Out of Mind, 1976.

Other (for children)

Astercote. London, Heinemann, 1970; New York, Dutton, 1971.
The Whispering Knights. London, Heinemann, 1971; New York, Dutton, 1976.

The Wild Hunt of Hagworthy. London, Heinemann, 1971; as The Wild Hunt of the Ghost Hounds, New York, Dutton, 1972.

The Driftway. London, Heinemann, 1972; New York, Dutton, 1973.
The Ghost of Thomas Kempe. London, Heinemann, and New York, Dutton, 1973.

The House in Norham Gardens. London, Heinemann, and New York, Dutton, 1974.

Going Back. London, Heinemann, and New York, Dutton, 1975.Boy Without a Name. London, Heinemann, and Berkeley, California,Parnassus Press, 1975.

A Stitch in Time. London, Heinemann, and New York, Dutton, 1976. The Stained Glass Window. London, Abelard Schuman, 1976.

Fanny's Sister. London, Heinemann, 1976; New York, Dutton, 1980. The Voyage of QV66. London, Heinemann, 1978; New York, Dutton, 1979.

Fanny and the Monsters. London, Heinemann, 1979.

Fanny and the Battle of Potter's Piece. London, Heinemann, 1980. The Revenge of Samuel Stokes. London, Heinemann, and New York,

The Revenge of Samuel Stokes. London, Heinemann, and New York Dutton, 1981.

Uninvited Ghosts and Other Stories. London, Heinemann, 1984; New York, Dutton, 1985.

Dragon Trouble. London, Heinemann, 1984; New York, Baron, 1989.

Debbie and the Little Devil. London, Heinemann, 1987.

A House Inside Out. London, Deutsch, 1987; New York, Dutton, 1988.

The Cat, the Crow, and the Banyan Tree, illustrated by Terry Milne. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Candlewick Press, 1994.

Good Night, Sleep Tight, illustrated by Adriano Gon. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Candlewick Press, 1995.

One, Two, Three, Jump!, illustrated by Jan Ormerod. New York, McElderry Books, 1999.

Other

The Presence of the Past: An Introduction to Landscape History. London, Collins, 1976.

Oleander, Jalaranda: A Childhood Perceived. London, Viking, 1994.Egypt: Antiquities from Above (essay), photographs by Marilyn Bridges. Boston, Little, Brown, 1996.

Critical Studies: Penelope Lively by Mary H. Moran, New York, Twayne, 1993.

* * *

In addition to a mass of children's novels, short story collections, and historical works, British writer Penelope Lively has to her credit numerous adult novels. The main intellectual preoccupation of these novels has been contingency. In other words, she asks what do we do with the facts that don't get explained by the myths of the family and self-expressive authorship that guide us. Lively has answered her query differently at different times. During the first period of her career, Lively faithfully held that the dominant myth of family must be deconstructed. Even the idea of a dominant myth proved restricting to Lively during her middle period: the narratives of her novels grew exponentially with no narrative dominating. After watching the narratives proliferate, in her most recent period, Lively feared cultural fragmentation, and her most recent three novels have reinstated the realist narrative.

Lively's realist period lasted from The Road to Lichfield (1977) to Next to Nature, Art (1982). Housewife, mother, and history teacher Anne Linton regularly drives the road to Lichfield, where her father is slowly dying in a nursing home. Her father had been a traditional man: an educator; a husband and father of two; a fisherman and outdoorsman. Linton's discovery of her father's extra-marital affair comes as a shock: Was her father a hypocrite? Had she never known her father? Linton deconstructs the myth of the family man to show the irrationality of the ideal, which had led her father to an affair no happier than was his home life. Learning from the past, Anne happily reunites with her estranged husband. What happens when the myth of the family man is not deconstructed? is the question asked in Lively's next book, Treasures of Time (1979). In contrast to Anne Linton, who faces the unpleasant truth about her parents' marriage, the young Kate Paxton is so immersed in the myth of the family that she is blind to her parents' mutual loathing. So completely has the myth of the happy family structured Kate's view of the world that she has repressed a memory of her mother kissing a boy, who wasn't her husband. So completely has the myth of the happy family structured her mother's view of herself that she has repressed the fact that her sister and her husband had truly loved one another. The repressed memories of both women return, however: for Kate Paxton, the repressed returns as irrational jealousy of her fiancé; for Laura Paxton, the repressed returns as uncontrollable grief at her sister's death. The contrast between Lively's representations of Anne Linton and Kate Paxton's responses suggests that the myths of the family must be deconstructed, or else they will lead to senseless violence. What is the artist's responsibility when it comes to myths? asks Lively in her fourth novel, Next to Nature, Art (1982). "The artist's responsibility, so far as I'm concerned, is to himself," says Toby Standish, a central character. As the artists of the Framleigh Creative Study Centre withdraw entirely from the demands of reconstructing a viable narrative, the result is a bunch of casual affairs, superficial production by both students and teachers, and the Centre's relentless pursuit of the Big Buck.

The novels from According to Mark (1984) through City of the Mind (1991) make up Lively's romantic period. All of the deconstruction of her previous period has led her to believe that no myth—realist or romantic—is dominant. Like Linton, Mark Lamming makes a surprising discovery at odds with the public construct of the subject of his current biography. Whereas Linton manages to reconstruct the narrative of her traditional father, Lamming abandons an agreed-upon Gilbert Strong for multiple Gilbert Strongs: Bloomsbury aesthete Strong; Georgian Strong; moralist Strong; plagiarist Strong; jaded husband Strong; earnest lover Strong. "The producer interrupts once to say the balance is good but that the programme is perhaps too fragmentary now, are we skipping about too much, what do you think? And Mark, not really paying attention, shakes his head and says no, he thinks it will work like this." In Moon Tiger, Lively begins to critique her realist preoccupations of prior novels. She locates the novel's center of consciousness in the iconoclastic historical novelist, Claudia Tate, who proves too big for the world around her. Her first love is killed during the War. Her brother marries for convenience. Her conventional daughter proves a disappointment. Now resigned to a nursing home, the elderly Claudia can only remember the joyous episodes of her life as she drifts closer towards death. Rather than succumbing to the disorder that threatens her at the end of her life, Claudia remains driven to narrativize events in her life: as she lies dying, she begins to write a "History of the World." Passing On (1989) chronicles the lives of Helen and Edward, who are coping with the recent death of their domineering mother. Beginning with City of the Mind, the center has failed to hold: there is not London, but Londons. Multiple narratives interweave without unifying into a single vision. One London is that of Matthew Halland, a father, whose divorce has left him without direction, until he falls in love with a woman at first sight. Another London is that of Richard Owen, a Victorian paleontologist. Another London is that of Martin Frobisher, an Elizabethan Arctic explorer; another is that of Rose, a street urchin; yet another is that of Jim, a World War II fire warden. If the drive to discover uncharted territory spurred on the Victorians, Matthew's journey is interior: to find love. None of these Londons is dominant, so there is no agreement on what London is.

After relativizing myths in According to Mark, Moon Tiger, and, especially, City of the Mind, Lively felt it was time to reinstate a realist myth. Cleopatra's Sister (1993), Heat Wave (1996), and Spiderweb (1999) return to the agreed-upon reality of the family—a reality that Lively now worried was under excessive attack by skeptical deconstructionists. In Cleopatra's Sister, Omar Sharif, president of Callimbia, is of mixed cultural parentage: a Callimbian father and a British mother. Sharif's feelings of cultural alienation lead him to commit violent acts, such as overthrowing the Callimbian government, that threaten the lives of Howard Beamish and Lucy Faulkner. One of the least likeable of these deconstructionists is Maurice, the cultural critic of Heat Wave. "My task is the deconstruction of a myth,' says Maurice." In contrast, his wife, Teresa, is completely absorbed by the demands of her family. Their disagreement over what is meant by "family" leads Teresa's mother, Pauline, to wonder, "Is this the original Eden of the senses or is it a harsh imprisonment?" In contrast to earlier novels in which the characters' absorption in the myth of the family required their repression of alternative feelings, here it is Maurice's casual subversion of his marriage that escalates the violence. His bland acceptance of his extra-marital affairreviving Pauline's repressed fury at her own philandering husband provokes Pauline to murder Maurice: "Later, much later, when she tries to recover each moment, she knows that she moved towards him, powered by anger. She has never felt such rage—it came roaring up from somewhere deep within." In Spiderweb, Stella Brentwood is an anthropologist whose task also "is the deconstruction of a myth." Her deconstruction of kinship systems illustrates her skepticism of such institutions, as also later illustrated in her refusal of three marriage proposals. Like Maurice's rude handling of his wife, Brentwood's rejection pains her suitors. Her casual handling of her manic neighbors has even more dire consequences. By giving the boys a place to vent their rage, their repressed fury returns in their murder of her dog—a symbol of her lone attempt to establish bonds. In these most recent works, Lively has warned that the senseless violence of the uncommitted threatens the fragile bonds of civilization.

LODGE, David (John)

Nationality: British. Born: London, 28 January 1935. Education: St. Joseph's Academy, London; University College, London, 1952-55, 1957-59, B.A. (honors) in English 1955; M.A. 1959; University of Birmingham, Ph.D. 1967. Military Service: served in the Royal Armoured Corps, 1955-57. Family: Married Mary Frances Jacob in 1959; two sons and one daughter. Career: Assistant, British Council, London, 1959-60. Assistant lecturer, 1960-62, lecturer, 1963-71, senior lecturer, 1971-73, reader, 1973-76, and professor of modern English literature, 1976–87, University of Birmingham; now honorary professor. Since 1987 full-time writer. Visiting associate professor, University of California, Berkeley, 1969; Henfield Writing Fellow, University of East Anglia, Norwich, 1977. Chairman of the Booker prize judges, 1989. Awards: Harkness Commonwealth fellowship, 1964; Yorkshire Post award, 1975; Hawthornden prize, 1976; Whitbread award, for fiction and for book of the year, 1980; Sunday Express Book-of-the-Year award, 1988. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1976, University College, London, 1982, and Goldsmiths' College, London, (honorary), 1992. Address: English Department, University of Birmingham, Birmingham B15 2TT, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Picturegoers. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1960.

Ginger, You're Barmy. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1962; New York, Doubleday, 1965.

The British Museum Is Falling Down. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1965; New York, Holt Rinehart, 1967.

Out of the Shelter. London, Macmillan, 1970; revised edition, London, Secker and Warburg, 1985; New York, Penguin, 1989.

Changing Places: A Tale of Two Campuses. London, Secker and Warburg, 1975; New York, Penguin, 1979.

How Far Can You Go? London, Secker and Warburg, 1980; as Souls and Bodies. New York, Morrow, 1982.

Small World: An Academic Romance. London, Secker and Warburg, 1984; New York, Macmillan, 1985.

Nice Work. London, Secker and Warburg, 1988; New York, Viking, 1989.

Paradise News. London, Secker and Warburg, 1991.

Therapy. New York, Viking, and London, Secker, 1995.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Man Who Couldn't Get Up," in Weekend Telegraph (London), 6 May 1966.
- "My First Job," London Review of Books, 4 September 1980.
- "Hotel des Boobs," in The Penguin Book of Modern British Short Stories, edited by Malcolm Bradbury. London, Viking, 1987; New York, Viking, 1988.
- "Pastoral," in Telling Stories, edited by D. Minshull. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1992.

Plays

Between These Four Walls (revue), with Malcolm Bradbury and James Duckett (produced Birmingham, 1963).

Slap in the Middle (revue), with others (produced Birmingham, 1965).

The Writing Game (produced Birmingham, 1990). London, Secker and Warburg, 1991.

Television Writing: Big Words ... Small Worlds (also presenter), 1987; Nice Work, from his own novel, 1989; The Way of St. James (also presenter), 1993; and Martin Chuzzlewit (adapted from Charles Dickens), 1994.

Other

About Catholic Authors (for teenagers). London, St. Paul Publications, 1958.

Language of Fiction. London, Routledge, and New York, Columbia University Press, 1966; revised edition, Routledge, 1984.

Graham Greene. New York, Columbia University Press, 1966.

The Novelist at the Crossroads and Other Essays on Fiction and Criticism. London, Routledge, and Ithaca, New York, Cornell University Press, 1971.

Evelyn Waugh. New York, Columbia University Press, 1971.

The Modes of Modern Writing: Metaphor, Metonymy, and the Typology of Modern Literature. London, Arnold, and Ithaca, New York, Cornell University Press, 1977.

Working with Structuralism: Essays and Reviews on Nineteenth- and Twentieth-Century Literature. London, Routledge, 1981.

Write On: Occasional Essays 1965–1985. London, Secker and Warburg, 1986.

After Bakhtin: Essays on Fiction and Criticism. London and New York, Routledge, 1990.

The Art of Fiction. New York, Viking, and London, Secker and Penguin, 1992.

Editor, Jane Austen: "Emma": A Casebook. London, Macmillan, 1968; Nashville, Aurora, 1970(?).

Editor, with James Kinsley, Emma, by Jane Austen. London, Oxford University Press, 1971.

Editor, Twentieth-Century Literary Criticism: A Reader. London, Longman, 1972.

Editor, Scenes of Clerical Life, by George Eliot. London, Penguin, 1973.

Editor, The Woodlanders, by Thomas Hardy. London, Macmillan, 1974

Editor, The Best of Ring Lardner. London, Dent, 1984.

Editor, The Spoils of Poynton, by Henry James. London, Penguin, 1987.

Editor, Modern Criticism and Theory: A Reader. London, Longman, 1988; revised edition, 1999.

Editor, Lucky Jim, by Kingsley Amis. London, Penguin, 1992.

*

Manuscript Collections: University of Birmingham Library.

Critical Studies: Interview with Bernard Bergonzi, in Month (London), February 1970, "The Decline and Fall of the Catholic Novel," in The Myth of Modernism and Twentieth-Century Literature by Bergonzi, Brighton, England, Harvester Press, 1986, Exploding English: Criticism, Theory, Culture by Bergonzi, Oxford, England, n.p., 1990; "The Novels of David Lodge" by Michael Parnell, in Madog (Barry, Wales), Summer 1979; article by Dennis Jackson, in British Novelists since 1960 edited by Jay L. Halio, Detroit, Gale, 1983; Novelists in Interview by John Haffenden, London and New York, Methuen, 1985; The Dialogic Novels of Malcolm Bradbury and David Lodge by Robert A. Morace, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1989; Modern Critics in Practice: Critical Portraits of British Literary Critics by P. Smallwood, London, n.p., 1990; David Lodge: How Far Can You Go? by M. Moseley, San Bernardino, California, n.p., 1991; Faithful Functions: The Catholic Novel in British Literature by T. Woodman, n.p., Milton Keynes, 1991; David Lodge: An Annotated Primary and Secondary Bibliography by Norbert Schurer. Frankfurt am Main and New York, P. Lang, 1995; David Lodge by Bergonzi, Plymouth, England, Northcote House, 1995; David Lodge by Bruce K. Martin, New York, Twayne, 1999.

David Lodge comments:

(1972) My novels belong to a tradition of realistic fiction (especially associated with England) that tries to find an appropriate form for, and a public significance in, what the writer has himself experienced and observed. In my case this experience and observation include such things as: lower-middle-class life in the inner suburbs of South East London; a wartime childhood and a postwar "austerity" adolescence; Catholicism; education and the social and physical mobility it brings; military service, marriage, travel, etc. My first, second, and fourth novels are "serious" realistic novels about such themes, the last of them, Out of the Shelter, which is a kind of Bildungsroman, being, as far as I am concerned, the most inclusive and most fully achieved.

My third novel, The British Museum Is Falling Down, was something of a departure in being a comic novel, incorporating elements of farce and a good deal of parody. I plan to write more fiction in the comic mode, as I enjoy the freedom for invention and stylistic effect it affords. On the other hand, I have not (like many contemporary writers) lost faith in traditional realism as a vehicle for serious fiction. The writer I admire above all others, I suppose, is James Joyce, and the combination one finds in his early work of realistic truthtelling and poetic intensity seems to me an aim still worth pursuing.

As an academic critic and teacher of literature with a special interest in prose fiction, I am inevitably self-conscious about matters of narrative technique, and I believe this is a help rather than a hindrance. I certainly think that my criticism of fiction gains from my experience of writing it.

(1981) Since writing the above I have come to have less faith in the viability of the traditional realistic novel of the kind that seeks, by suppressing the signs that it is written and narrated, to give the illusion of being a transparent window upon the real. This shift of attitude does not entail abandoning the novel's traditional function of engaging with, organizing and interpreting social-historical experience—merely being open about the necessarily conventional and artificial ways in which it does so. My last two works of fiction, therefore, have a prominent "metafictional" thread running through them through which the self-consciousness about fictional technique referred to above is allowed some play in the texts themselves—licenced by comedy in Changing Places, but with more serious thematic intent in How Far Can You Go?

(2000) The comic-carnival seque-metafictional strain in my fiction that started with The British Museum Is Falling Down perhaps reached its fullest development in Small World: An Academic Romance (1974). After that book I began to move back towards a more realistic, and perhaps more "serious," engagement with my material, though still aiming to amuse, and still experimenting with narrative technique. Nice Work (1988), for instance, has a playful intertextual relationship with certain Victorian Industrial Novels, but it also attempts to give a faithful account of what it was like to work in industry and academia in England in the 1980s, the Thatcher years. Nice Work was also the most "researched" of my books to date, since the industrial side of the story was unknown territory to me when I first got the idea. This set the pattern for subsequent work. The basic story of Paradise News (1991)—the hero's visit to his dying aunt in Honolulu—was based on personal experience, but I made two research trips to Hawaii and did a great deal of reading in modern theology and about tourism before beginning the novel. Therapy (1995) drew on personal experience of depression and knee surgery, but involved extensive reading of Kierkegaard. In these two novels I made extensive use of first-person narrative for the first time in my work since Ginger You're Barmy, but with more variation and conscious artifice than in that early novel. This will also be a feature of my next full-length novel, to be published in 2001. I try to write novels that tell more than one story, that have several levels of meaning and many voices, that will entertain but also provoke thought, that reflect contemporary social reality, but at the same time acknowledge their debt to literary tradition.

* * *

David Lodge's novels use and stay close to material that he knows well. Without being overtly autobiographical, they often draw on personal experience: a lower-middle-class South London childhood and adolescence in The Picturegoers and Out of the Shelter, military service in Ginger, You're Barmy, and academic life in his "campus" novels. Lodge was brought up as a Catholic and some of his novels examine the culture and customs of English Catholic life. His emphasis is sociological rather than theological, providing sharp but affectionate observations of the lives of a minority group. In The British Museum Is Falling Down he gives brisk comic treatment to the human problems arising from the Catholic ban on contraception. In How Far Can You Go?, a longer and more serious-minded novel (though none of his fiction is without comic elements), Lodge traces the lives of a group of middle-class English Catholics from the early 1950s when they are students at London University, to the late 1970s when they are approaching middle age and have lived through the transformations of Catholicism which followed the Vatican Council.

Though he is an entertaining and sharp-eyed recorder of personal and social embarrassment, Lodge is a good-humored writer, and rather too genial to be a thoroughgoing satirist. These qualities are apparent in the three novels set wholly or partly in the city of Rummidge and its university, which form a sequence with recurring characters, covering the years from 1969 to 1986. Lodge describes their settings as imaginary places which for the purposes of fiction occupy "the space where Birmingham is to be found on maps of the so-called real world." They draw on Lodge's long career as a university teacher of English between 1960 and 1987, during which time he published several academic critical books in addition to his fiction. Changing Places is subtitled "A Tale of Two Campuses": Rummidge is contrasted with Plotinus, a celebrated Californian university which bears much the same relation to Berkeley as Rummidge does to Birmingham. Philip Swallow, a mild, amiable, unsophisticated lecturer in English at Rummidge, goes to Plotinus as an exchange professor; in return Rummidge gets one of the biggest guns at Plotinus, the high-powered Professor Morris Zapp, who comes to England to escape his marital problems. The story moves, with a wealth of inventiveness, back and forth between Swallow in Plotinus and Zapp in Rummidge, each coping with different kinds of culture shock. They end up having exchanged not only jobs but wives; the reader is left uncertain whether the exchange will be permanent. Changing Places exploits polarities to splendid comic effect: Britain and America, the Midlands and San Francisco Bay, English academic life and American. Zapp and Swallow are representative types, well observed and culturally placed: the ruthless professional Zapp wants to be the greatest expert on Jane Austen in the world, even though he dislikes her novels; the dithering Swallow likes the whole of English literature so much that he can never find a "field" to specialize in, to the amused incredulity of the Americans.

In Small World, set ten years on, Zapp is divorced and even more famous; Swallow and his wife are together again, though he is now more worldly and has achieved some modest academic success. It is a formally elaborate novel, making use of the conventions of the epic romances of the Italian Renaissance, where narratives are interwoven, the characters have frequent and surprising adventures, and a beautiful maiden flits elusively in and out of the narrative. It opens in Rummidge but moves over the globe, as the academic participants fly from one conference or lecturing engagement to another. There is a rich mixture of comedy, sex, and scholarship, sometimes all on the same plate. Small World is learned and allusive—among other things, it offers an ordinary reader's guide to structuralism—but at the same time farcical, fast-moving, and highly entertaining.

Nice Work is set wholly in Rummidge, when the university is suffering from the financial cuts of the 1980s. Zapp and Swallow put in appearances, but the principal characters are new, a man and woman who are completely different types but whose lives become fascinatingly entwined. Vic Wilcox runs a local engineering works; he is tough, energetic, and good at his job but socially and emotionally insecure. Robyn Penrose teaches English and Women's Studies at the university. She is a recognizable figure of the age: attractive, intellectual, and self-assured, an articulate feminist and supporter of leftwing causes, at home in the abstruse reaches of critical theory. But she is also narcissistic and naive, and entirely ignorant of the industrial world (represented by Wilcox, the factory, and its workers) into which she finds herself thrown. She is an expert on the Victorian "Condition of England" novel, and Nice Work is Lodge's own essay in the genre, surveying Margaret Thatcher's England. The unfashionably happy ending has what looks like a deliberately Victorian air. In this novel, Lodge, like Robyn, takes a good look at the world outside the academy—Nice Work appeared soon after he had taken early retirement from teaching—with rewarding results.

His next novel, Paradise News, returns to the Catholic topics of How Far Can You Go? and takes them further still. The central character, Bernard Walsh, is an ex-priest in his forties, from the South London Irish milieu of Lodge's first novel. He is a sad, lonely figure who has lost not only faith but hope; he makes a meagre living as a part-time, unbelieving lecturer in theology at a non-denominational college. His life picks up when he and his cantankerous widower father travel to Hawaii, where Bernard's expatriate aunt has lived for many years and where she is now dying of cancer. Hawaii, the self-styled island paradise, is contrasted in Bernard's thoughts with the Christian heaven which he used to preach about and can no longer believe in. But in Hawaii he unexpectedly finds love, and, if not faith, a renewed sense of hope. In this gentle, quietly moving novel Lodge takes another look at the themes and some of the settings of his earlier work; but it is a little lacking in the ingenuity and wit that readers have come to expect in his fiction.

Those qualities, though, are triumphantly present in Therapy, which Lodge published soon after his sixtieth birthday. It is the story, told in the first person, of Tubby Passmore, a successful and prosperous television scriptwriter. He has most things he could want in life, including, he believes, a stable and happy marriage. He wonders, therefore, why he is consumed by anxiety and dread, neuroses which have sent him to a variety of therapists, and which make him an avid reader of Kierkegaard, the Danish philosopher who wrote books with titles that Tubby finds irresistible: Fear and Trembling, The Concept of Dread, and Sickness Unto Death. Tubby's world falls apart when his wife suddenly leaves him after thirty years, not for anyone else but because she finds him too moody and boring to live with any longer. Tubby is shattered but he survives and fights back in ways which involve him in farcical humiliations, especially when he tries, in late middle age, to get some sexual variety into his life. He resembles the heroes of many American novels, who undergo all kinds of personal, professional, and sexual disasters, but who remain fiercely articulate and opinionated in the midst of everything-an English cousin of Saul Bellow's Herzog, perhaps. Therapy shows Lodge at the top of his form, comic, thoughtful, and continually surprising.

—Bernard Bergonzi

LOVELACE, Earl

Nationality: Trinidadian. Born: Taco, Trinidad, 13 July 1935. Family: Married; two sons, one daughter. Career: Proofreader, Trinidad Guardian, 1953–54; civil servant: agricultural assistant in Jamaica, 1956–66; journalist, Trinidad and Tobago Express, 1967; lecturer in English, University of the District of Columbia, 1971–73; writer-inresidence, Hartwick College, Oneonta, New York, 1986. Since 1977 teacher, University of the West Indies, Saint Augustine, Trinidad. Awards: B.P. Independence award, 1965; Pegasus Literary award, 1966; Guggenheim fellowship, 1980; National Endowment for the Humanities grant, 1986; Commonwealth Writers' prize, 1997. Address: c/o Andre Deutsch, 105 Great Russell St., London WC1B 3LJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

While Gods Are Falling. London, Collins, 1965; Chicago, Regnery, 1966.

The Schoolmaster. London, Collins, and Chicago, Regnery, 1968.The Dragon Can't Dance. London, Deutsch, 1979; Washington, D.C., Three Continents Press, 1981.

The Wine of Astonishment. London, Deutsch, 1982; New York, Vintage, 1984.

Salt. New York, Persea Books, 1997.

Short Stories

A Brief Conversation and Other Stories. London, Heinemann, 1988.

Plays

The New Hardware Store (produced London, 1985). Included in Jestina's Calypso and Other Plays, 1984.

Jestina's Calypso and Other Plays (includes The New Hardware Store and My Name Is Village). London, Heinemann, 1984.

The Dragon Can't Dance, adaptation of his own novel (produced London, 1990).

*

Bibliography: "Earl Lovelace: A Bibliography" by Chezia Thompson-Cager, in Contributions in Black Studies, 8, 1986–87.

Manuscript Collection: The Lovelace Archives, Port of Spain, Trinidad.

Critical Studies: "In Search of the West Indian Hero: A Study of Earl Lovelace's Fiction" by Marjorie Thorpe, in Critical Issues in West Indian Literature, edited by Erika Sollish Smilowitz and Roberta Quarles Knowles, Parkersburg, Iowa, Caribbean, 1984; "Salvation, Self, and Solidarity in the Work of Earl Lovelace" by Norman Reed Cary, World Literature Written in English, Spring 1988; "Earl Lovelace's Bad Johns, Street Princes and the Masters of Schools" by Chezia Thompson-Cager, in Imagination, Emblems, and Expressions, edited by Helen Ryan, Bowling Green, Ohio, Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1992.

* * *

Earl Lovelace has established himself as one of Trinidad's most well known literary talents. As a writer and storyteller his novels, short stories, and plays explore the effects the significant social, economic, and political change of late twentieth-century Trinidad have had on the lives of individuals and communities. Lovelace has witnessed this change first hand: born into a large family in Toco, Trinidad, in 1935, Lovelace spent his early life in part with his grandparents in Tobago, and in different districts on the outskirts of Port of Spain. This travelling attuned Lovelace to the nuances of local dialects, whether mitigated by class, region, ethnicity, or mood. These linguistic subtleties are utilized in his exceptionally vivid writing, as dialect functions to convey the cultural particularities of his subjects, while also contributing to his distinct brand of lyrical realism. A storyteller at heart, the prevalence of dialect in Lovelace's writing, and the ease with which he uses it, foregrounds the importance of the Caribbean's oral traditions to his writing and narrative structure.

At the thematic center of Lovelace's narratives is an exploration of the ambiguous relationship between change and progress. His characters often must weigh the merits of tradition and cultural continuity against financial gain and upward mobility. In his first novel, While Gods Are Falling, Lovelace considers the dilemma of Walter, whose frustration with the urban congestion, cacophony, and confusion of Port of Spain results in a nostalgia for the imagined opportunities of the rural environment for independence and self-assertion. However, Lovelace reveals Walter's construction of the rural environment to be flawed, influenced more by his dissatisfaction with the present than any long-standing romance with the past. Nevertheless, in his measured representation of both rural and urban environments, Lovelace asserts the reality of the limited opportunities for self-realization available to those politically and economically disempowered in-and by-a colonial society. Continuing this investigation of progress and its inextricable connection to colonialism and power in his second novel, The Schoolmaster, Lovelace presents the small community of Kumaca, whose longing for economic advancement makes them vulnerable to the manipulations of others. The black teacher who arrives to educate the isolated townspeople is a product of colonial schooling, and reproduces the dynamics of domination in his relationship to the illiterate villagers. Even as the local villagers recognize the inevitable intrusion of the ever-expanding Port of Spain into their lives, and desire the skills that will permit them to access the opportunities the nation's capital will provide, they are not prepared for the ways in which the teacher will use his knowledge to exploit them. The novel ends with an uneasy resolution, suggesting that while the residents of Kumaca will adapt, this adaptation does is not a mark of superiority or triumph.

It is the changing nature of Trinidad's annual Carnival, and how these changes are indicative of larger shifts in communities and the nation at large, that is the subject of Lovelace's third novel, The Dragon Can't Dance. Here, the members of a small community define themselves through their participation in the pageantry of Carnival and the roles they assume in it. While the festival itself has remained consistent in many of its practices, the characters must confront how the meaning of enacting the Carnival has changed. For example, those participants previously valorized as warriors have no place in the contemporary city except as "Bad Johns" who cause trouble, while their stick fighting battles have been displaced in popularity and importance by competitions between calypso bands. The nature and rhythms of calypso are central to Lovelace's text. Just as calvpso's consistent rhythm overlaid by improvisation results in a repetition-with-difference, new nuances and beats, the changes in Trinidadian culture have caused new forms and meanings to emerge with which its citizens must learn to live.

Music as a repository of cultural and communal practices is also thematically significant in The Wine of Astonishment. As the practice of the Spiritual Baptist religion and its raucous musical style of worship is legally outlawed in the early part of the twentieth century, one small community attempts to maintain faith. This faith, however, receives constant challenges from colonial society and its policies, including the corruption that they engender. Lovelace's ongoing fascination with the dynamics of individual communities, as well as the relationships of individuals within those communities, is at the core of The Wine of Astonishment. While the decriminalization of Spiritual Baptism comes too late for many of its practitioners, who have lost the spirit required for its form of worship, one woman who has maintained her faith recognizes its cultural continuance in the energetic music of the steel bands. Recognized as a form of cultural persistence, this continuity functions as a spiritual affirmation of the people in the face of racial discrimination, economic disadvantages, and other trials. Lovelace does not end this story on an uncritically uplifting note, however. The novel, like his others, is woven through with tragedies and disappointments. Even as characters assert "God will not put on a people more than they can bear," it is clear that what is "bearable" is not by definition necessarily desirable or sustaining.

Lovelace's collections published in the 1980s—Jestina's Calypso and Other Plays and A Brief Conversion and Other Stories—are further investigations of the thematic preoccupations established in his previous work. However, in his latest novel, Salt published in 1997, Lovelace's recurring themes—change, colonialism, community, culture, desire, materialism, belonging, self-definition, etc.—are all reworked via the historical framework provided by Guinea John, resulting in Lovelace's most pointed social critique to date. Guinea John is a mythic figure is said to have fled the death sentence imposed for his part in an unsuccessful slave rebellion by placing two corncobs under his arms and flying back to Africa. His descendents who remain behind in Trinidad alternately struggle to establish a place for themselves or to escape overseas. In this epic tale, Lovelace weaves together narrators from various centuries and the multiple ethnicities that make up Trinidad's multi-ethnic, culturally creolized society, to create a stunning literary portrait of Trinidad's history and its people. Implicit in this tale is the moral and ethical necessity for reparations to those populations displaced and dehumanized by slavery, disenfranchised by colonialism, and continually dislocated by the inheritance of both. Guinea John's rejection of slavery and its "authority" is echoed in his great-grandson's disdain for the façade of Emancipation, which provided financial compensation for those who lost their slave property, but none for those formerly enslaved who had endured generations of stolen labor and other heinous abuses. Lovelace's primary twentieth-century protagonist is the schoolteacher Alford George, whose realization that he spent nineteen years preparing his students to "escape" overseas causes him to reevaluate his relationship to Trinidad. An "Everyman," George struggles to overcome the psychological legacy of slavery in order to teach his people about the necessity of investing one's self in Trinidad. Here the acceptance characterizing the refrain of his previous book, "God will not put on a people more than they can bear," is reworked into an aggressive political manifesto, as characters prove their strength not by endurance, but by action. As always, Lovelace's characters are masterfully drawn, captivating and convincing in their struggles and the resolutions they reach. Salt marks Lovelace's move from writing of the ramifications of what Langston Hughes identifies as "the dream deferred" (by the failure of Emancipation), to asserting the necessity of facing that deferral and demanding the right to realize the dream, the first step being the right to demand reparations. Salt was awarded the 1997 Commonwealth Writers' Prize.

-Jennifer Harris

LURIE, Alison

Nationality: American. Born: Chicago, Illinois, 3 September 1926. Education: Radcliffe College, Cambridge, Massachusetts, A.B. in history and English 1947. Family: Married Jonathan Peale Bishop, Jr., in 1948 (divorced 1985); three sons. Career: Lecturer, 1968–73, adjunct associate professor, 1973–76, associate professor, 1976–79, and since 1979 professor of English, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York. Awards: Yaddo Foundation fellowship, 1963, 1964, 1966; Guggenheim fellowship, 1965; Rockefeller grant, 1968; New York State Council on the Arts grant, 1972; American Academy award, 1979; Pulitzer prize, 1985; Prix Femina Etranger (France), 1989. Address: Department of English, Cornell University, Ithaca, New York 14853, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Love and Friendship. London, Heinemann, and New York, Macmillan, 1962.

The Nowhere City. London, Heinemann, 1965; New York, Coward McCann, 1966.

Imaginary Friends. London, Heinemann, and New York, Coward McCann, 1967.

Real People. New York, Random House, 1969; London, Heinemann, 1970.

The War Between the Tates. New York, Random House, and London, Heinemann, 1974.

Only Children. New York, Random House, and London, Heinemann,

Foreign Affairs. New York, Random House, 1984; London, Joseph, 1985.

The Truth about Lorin Jones. Boston, Little Brown, and London, Joseph, 1988.

The Last Resort. New York, Henry Holt, 1998.

Short Stories

Women and Ghosts. New York, Doubleday, and London, Heinemann, 1994

Uncollected Short Stories

"Hansel and Gretel," in New Story 2 (New York), 1951.

"Fat People," in Vogue (New York), October 1989.

Other (for children)

The Heavenly Zoo: Legends and Tales of the Stars. London, Eel Pie, 1979; New York, Farrar Straus, 1980.

Clever Gretchen and Other Forgotten Folktales. New York, Crowell, and London, Heinemann, 1980.

Fabulous Beasts. New York, Farrar Straus, and London, Cape, 1981. Don't Tell the Grown-ups: Subversive Children's Literature. Boston, Little Brown, and London, Bloomsbury, 1990; as Not in Front of the Grown-ups: Subversive Children's Literature, London, Cardinal, 1991.

Cap o'Rushes. London, BBC, 1991.

The Black Geese: A Baba Yaga Story From Russia (reteller), illustrated by Jessica Souhami. New York, DK, 1999.

Other

V.R. Lang: A Memoir. Privately printed, 1959; in Poems and Plays, by V.R. Lang, New York, Random House, 1975.

The Language of Clothes. New York, Random House, 1981; London, Heinemann, 1982.

Steve Poleskie, Artflyer, with Stephen Foster. Southampton, Hampshire, John Hansard Gallery, 1989.

Editor, The Oxford Book of Modern Fairy Tales. Oxford and New York, Oxford University Press, 1993.

Editor, The Secret Garden, by Frances Hodgson Burnett. New York, Penguin Books, 1999.

*

Manuscript Collections: Cornell University Library, Ithaca, New York.

Critical Studies: Alison Lurie by Richard Hauer Costa, New York, Twayne, 1992.

* * *

It is difficult to think of any other North American writer who has held up the mirror to the nature of the professional middle classes as exactly and as wittily as Alison Lurie. From Love and Friendship (1962) all the way through to The Truth about Lorin Jones (1988), the customs and usages, fancies and foibles, of comfortable (usually East Coast) America are carefully scrutinized with Lurie's wryly amused, detached, yet not unsympathetic gaze.

Events that could have become the stuff of American tragedy in another writer's hands—marital breakdown, illicit sexual passion, madness, problems of artistic creation, loss of innocence, crisis in personal identity, emotional neglect—are transformed deftly and sharp-wittedly by Lurie into a compelling comedy of affluent U.S. life. The reader's pleasure is further enhanced by the meticulously composed and poised nature of Lurie's prose, and her ability to create vigorous characters and to spin an engaging tale.

In particular, Lurie is skilled at describing North American campus life and the idiosyncratic behavior of U.S. academics. Her novels are self-referential, employing recurrent characters usually connected with the successful, confident and combative Zimmern family. The Lurie reader looks forward to further acquaintanceship with the aggressive and influential critic Leonard D. Zimmern, for example, and the Zimmern brood are used to represent the fortunes of artistic and intellectual life in postwar East Coast America.

All her novels depict characters who are subject to rapid, and often unexpected, changes which precipitate crises in previous and usually smoothly organized existences. Rational academics join crazy religious sects, careful WASP wives have affairs with unsuitable musicians and artists, besuited historians turn beatnik, while refined East Coast ladies on vacation in London have passionate flings with waste-disposal engineers from Tulsa. Like fellow campus chroniclers David Lodge and Malcolm Bradbury, Lurie obviously enjoys the narrative strategy of placing her characters in unfamiliar surroundings, testing their previous relationships and assumptions to the limit.

Thus in Love and Friendship upper-class metropolitan Emily Turner finds her relationship with her rather insensitive academic husband tried by her new life as college wife in an inward-looking rural community. The Nowhere City, set in Los Angeles, shows how Californian attitudes gradually reshape the social presumptions of historian Paul Cattleman and his New England wife, Katherine. Imaginary Friends explores how two sociologists, much given to behavior models, are forced into serious reconsideration of their own identities and actions by their fieldwork among the religious group, the Truth Seekers, in a small town in rural New York State. This questioning of self and motive results in Lurie's possibly most hilarious episode when the two rationalists cast off their professional clothing in preparation for a supreme being's arrival in Sophis.

In Real People, an intimate novel about the act of writing, successful novelist Janet Belle Smith finds her principles tested and her status as happily married woman threatened during her transposition from well-run home to the less rule-bound atmosphere of the writer's retreat, Illyria. The War Between the Tates sees Erica's orderly home and long-established marriage completely transformed by the presence of her 'nasty, brutish and tall' teenage offspring and husband Brian's absence due to fluffy-headed and hippyish Wendee, while the adults in Only Children (the only novel without a contemporary setting) shed their adult social apparel and behave in an often childish manner, when weekending on a rural retreat in the Catskill Mountains during the Depression.

The search for self-knowledge when an accepted life is disrupted becomes even more pronounced in Lurie's later novels. Foreign Affairs, played out in London, is the only novel set abroad, and, here in a Jamesian fashion, a group of North American exiles are challenged by the people and customs of the Old World. But it is The Truth about Lorin Jones that tries most ambitiously and strenuously to combine the novel of social displacement with the quest for self-knowledge. Here art historian Polly Alter, in her attempt to write a biography of a prematurely deceased artist, discovers an "alter ego" in her subject, and, on her visit to Key West to search for Lorin's past, finds her own life under question, as it becomes increasingly entwined with that of the dead painter.

Lorin Jones (born Lolly Zimmern) is seen as a young girl in Only Children, in which novel, as might be expected from Lurie's own academic research into children's literature and authorship of books for children, the child's view of adult behavior is portrayed very sensitively and winningly. Also present in this novel, and indeed discernible throughout her work, is the sense that Lurie's adults themselves crave the release from responsibility, decision-making, and conventional behavior that is present in a happy childhood. Many of her central figures are products of less than contented childhoods (a point not labored in any way by Lurie), and the topsy-turvy, fantastic ways they choose to change their lives reflect such a desire for liberation as an adult.

Lurie's work is intelligent, entertaining and consistently well crafted, and, like that of an earlier novelist with a superior talent for social portraiture, Jane Austen, the American writer's books provide us with a very keen and real understanding of the everyday life and aspirations of a particular group of people.

-Anna-Marie Taylor

LURIE, Morris

Nationality: Australian. Born: Melbourne, Victoria, 30 October 1938. Education: Melbourne High School; Royal Melbourne Institute of Technology. Divorced; one son and one daughter. Career: Worked in advertising, early 1960s; lived in Europe and Morocco, 1965–72, then in Melbourne. Address: c/o Penguin Books, P.O. Box 257, Ringwood, Victoria 3134, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Rappaport. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1966; New York, Morrow, 1967.

The London Jungle Adventures of Charlie Hope. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1968.

Rappaport's Revenge. London, Angus and Robertson, 1973.

Flying Home. Collingwood, Victoria, Outback Press, 1978; London, Penguin, 1982.

Seven Books for Grossman. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1983. Madness. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1991.

The String. Ringwood, Victoria, McPhee Gribble Publishers, 1995.Welcome to Tangier. Ringwood, Victoria and New York, Penguin, 1997.

Short Stories

Happy Times. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1969.

Inside the Wardrobe: 20 Stories. Fitzroy, Victoria, Outback Press, 1975; New York, Horizon Press, 1978.

Running Nicely. Melbourne, Nelson, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1979.

Dirty Friends. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1981; New York, Penguin, 1983.

Outrageous Behaviour: Best Stories. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1984; London and New York, Penguin, 1985.

The Night We Ate the Sparrow: A Memoir and Fourteen Stories. Ringwood, Victoria, and New York, Penguin, 1985.

Three Stories. Melbourne, Grossman Press, 1987.

Two Brothers, Running: Seventeen Stories and a Movie. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1990.

Plays

Waterman: Three Plays (includes Jangle, Jangle; A Visit to the Uncle; Waterman). Collingwood, Victoria, Outback Press, 1979.

Other (for children)

The Twenty-Seventh Annual African Hippopotamus Race. London, Collins, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1969.

Arlo the Dandy Lion. London, Collins, and New York, McGraw Hill, 1971.

Toby's Millions. Ringwood, Victoria, Kestrel, 1982; London, Penguin, 1983.

The Story of Imelda, Who Was Small. Melbourne, Oxford University Press, 1984; Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1985; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1988.

Night-Night! Seven Going-to-Bed Stories. Melbourne, Oxford University Press, 1986.

Heroes. North Ryde, New South Wales, Methuen, 1987.

Alison Gets Told. Crows Nest, New South Wales, ABC Enterprises, 1990.

What's That Noise? What's That Sound? Milsons Point, New South Wales, Random Century, 1991.

Other

The English in Heat. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, 1972.

Hack Work. Collingwood, Victoria, Outback Press, 1977.

Public Secrets. Melbourne, Sun, 1981.

Snow Jobs. Carlton, Victoria, Pascoe, 1985.

Whole Life: An Autobiography. Fitzroy, Victoria, McPhee Gribble, 1987.

My Life as a Movie and Other Gross Conceits: 24 Essays Sportifs. Fitzroy, Victoria, McPhee Gribble-Penguin, 1988.

Editor, John Hepworth, His Book. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1978.

* * *

Morris Lurie is one of Australia's most prolific writers, centering himself firmly in the fabulist tradition, or, more colloquially, as a spinner of yarns. The son of Jewish immigrant parents, Lurie shares the call of ancient European traditions, practiced and firmly clung to by the older migrant group among whom he grew up, and about whom he writes so well, with the irresistible sense of freedom from such tradition which Australian life produced for the boy and young man in the 1950s and early 1960s.

Lurie, like Judah Waten before him, explores this conflict between the New World and the Old in compassionate, yet humorous, terms, finding a voice for hundreds of thousands of people caught up in the postwar migration and refugee flood which brought so much to Australian life and culture. Here was a different tradition, neither English nor Celtic, but firmly Euro-centered, and just as firmly Jewish, transported to a country which neither understood nor appreciated what that tradition would eventually offer.

Little wonder, then, that four of Lurie's novels, Rappaport, The London Jungle Adventures of Charlie Hope, Rappaport's Revenge, and Flying Home, as well as many of his short stories, focus on the theme of the young Australian attempting to cope with cultural traditions learned first from books and the memories of his parents and their friends, yet having to be confronted firsthand and experienced personally before any of their richness or folly can be assessed. It is not for nothing that Charlie Hope finds London a jungle and capers about with shrewd simian nimbleness, or that Rappaport, having received something of a drubbing when he first arrived in London, nevertheless manages to exact his revenge, financially and culturally, when he is safe and sound back in Australia.

Lurie's major work is the novel Flying Home. It is both a love story, as Leo Axelrod seeks to understand the mystery of his lover Marianne, and a novel which seeks to explore the confused and confusing tangle of roots and origins which migrant families carry within their displaced baggage. Leo comes to realize that he will never exorcise, much less comprehend, his demons until he visits Israel, for somewhere in that promised land lies the secret to his own self and the ambiguities which enclose his relationship with his parents and grandparents. As he reflects:

It was the way I was brought up, it was what they felt. They didn't like Australia. Well, it wasn't even a matter of like. They ignored it. They pretended it wasn't there. Australia was an unfortunate thing that had happened to them; that Hitler had done, that's all it was to them. An accident. A terrible accident. It wasn't the real world. The real world was Bialystock, Poland, Europe.... So that's where I was born, that's where I grew up, that's where I lived. Nowhere. In a black cage.

The conflict between the "nowhere" of Australia and the "real world" of Europe is exigent and drives Leo to explore that "real world" in search of his self and his true home. This exploration of the mystery of family relationships—their tortuous and often painful ambiguities—and the search for a locus, a spiritual natal place, are the predominant themes of Lurie's work until the early 1980s.

During the 1970s his trips to the U.S.A. provided him with a rich source of material for exploring the Jewish community in that country of immigrants, and allowed him to see how a more established and larger community handled the translocation from Europe to a new country of considerable freedom and material progress. Several of his books of reportage, Hack Work and Public Secrets, for example, contained witty and ebullient pieces on the Jewish community in America, particularly in New York. His novella Seven Books for Grossman explores the mad and funny world of the Jewish fantasist, coping with sexual anarchy, a maddening intelligence, and a material culture at war with ancient demons which demand guilt and obeisance to vestigial traditions. As book tumbles after book (Dirty Friends, Outrageous Behaviour, The Night We Ate the Sparrow and Two Brothers, Running are recent story collections), Lurie shows himself not only as an acute and funny social observer, but as something of a transcultural anthropologist. His interest in the quirky, the outrageous, the madcap, in no way diminishes his exploration of the roots of human behavior and ideals.

Despite, or perhaps because of, the steady and voluminous flow of his work, Lurie remains a professional craftsman. His style is colloquial and confessional, brimming with witty aphorisms and incisive dialogue. His humor teeters on the brink of the absurd, often the anarchistic, and his later works show a considerable freedom of imagination, particularly when he, or his fictive creations, explore sexual situations, as though, by having confronted a range of taboos in his earlier work, he has earned for himself the freedom to move unselfconsciously wherever his keen nose for the funny, the eccentric, or the absurd, might lead him.

One aspect of his work often overlooked by critics as though it were secondary to his short stories, essays, and novels is his attention to and success in children's fiction. His first foray into this field was as far back as 1969 with The Twenty-Seventh Annual African Hippopotamus Race, followed by Arlo the Dandy Lion, The Story of Imelda, Who Was Small, and several other stories. These simple, homespun yarns have proved immensely popular with young children, partly because Lurie manages the difficult feat of containing his narrative within the perspective of a child's eye and allowing his fictive heroes moderate, but not overwhelming, success in a world seen as competitive, but not threatening.

When one looks at the range and volume of Lurie's work, one can only admire his dedication to the creative tasks and his skill as a craftsman. Where some have found a certain sameness about his earlier works and their concentration on the young Jewish male, squirming his way to maturity through the mess of memory, tradition, and lore imposed upon him, others have seen in his humor and aphoristic style, his sharp eye for the idiosyncratic, and his keen sense of human folly a writer deeply concerned for the constant rediscovery of human values and human freedom. Behind the sophisticated wit, the mock-heroic style of so much of his works, lies a writer making sense of the modern world, noting its curiosities and failures of sensibility, but realizing, through his imaginative creations, the human capacity to survive with sadness, but also with humor.

-D.J. O'Hearn

M

MacDONALD, Ann-Marie

Nationality: Canadian. Born: 1958. Education: National Theatre School. Career: Actress; playwright and novelist; host, Life and Times (CBC- TV), Toronto. Lives in Toronto, Canada. Awards: Gemini Award; Governor General's award; Chalmers award; Canadian Authors Association award; Commonwealth prize; Best First Book award.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Fall on Your Knees. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1996.

Short Stories

The Day the Men Went to Town: 16 Stories by Women from Cape Breton (contributor), selected by Ronald Caplan. Wreck Cove, Nova Scotia, Cape Breton Books, 1999.

Plays

Goodnight Desdemona (Good Night Juliet). Toronto, Nightwood Theatre, 1988; Toronto, Coach House Press, 1990; New York, Grove Press, 1998.

The Arab's Mouth. Toronto, Factory Theatre, 1990; Winnipeg, Manitoba, Blizzard Publishing, 1995.

Negredo Hotel. Toronto, Tarragon Theatre, 1992. Anything That Moves. Toronto, Canadian Stage, 2000.

* * *

Ann-Marie MacDonald has worked as an actor, director, producer, playwright, and novelist. It is in the last role, however, that she has garnered the most critical and popular acclaim. When her debut novel, Fall on Your Knees, was published it received such flattering praise as: "so assured is the style, so intricate the plotting, and so accomplished the portrait of the four unforgettable Piper sisters, one would expect that the author was a seasoned novelist" and "Not since Newfoundland poet E.J. Pratt's epic poem, 'Brebuff and his Brethen,' have we seen Canadian Literature writ so large and wide, and with such energy, passion, and nerve." While the merit of Pratt's poem has been called into question, the elegance of MacDonald's first novel is not often in debate. Perhaps what makes the novel stand out is its curious mixture of dramatic tableaux, detailed characterization, and musical language. In fact, her training in the theater is perhaps most evident in MacDonald's use of language and dialogue. The naturalness of the conversations between lovers, neighbors, and sisters creates a believable backdrop for the sometimes horrific events in the novel. For all its theatricality, the novel is anything but a lightweight romp through the Canadian maritimes. The story of four sisters growing up in industrial Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, swirls through incidents of racism, incest, social exploitation, class conflict, and religious intolerance. These are balanced with moments of intense love, humor, and sacrifice.

Fall on Your Knees exemplifies what Njabulo Ndebele has called, in another context, the need for the 'rediscovery of the ordinary.' His point is that spectacular events have lost their shock value, because they have become accepted as ordinary. In order to reject the spectacular and show it as extraordinary, it is necessary to reinscribe the ordinary. MacDonald's novel progresses through a series of ordinary events in order to highlight the horrors and passions of the spectacular events with which they are juxtaposed. In this manner she shows the prejudices of the Catholic church, the seediness of nightclubs, the anger of fathers, the excitement of music, and the love of sisters.

The novel differs sharply from her first solo-written play, Good Night Desdemona (Good Morning Juliet), which is a comedy about a mousy lecturer in Renaissance drama who is trying to decipher a coded manuscript for what she believes to be the lost manuscripts for Romeo and Juliet and Othello. She travels through a time warp into both plays in order to search for a Fool/Author to give her the key to the plays. Instead, however, she meets Desdemona and Juliet and discovers that Desdemona is violent and bloodthirsty, and Juliet is in love with the romance of love and death, rather than with Romeo. MacDonald cleverly weaves dialogue from Shakespeare's plays into her own play's dialogue, with a few key substitutions, for comic results. The first director of the play notes in her introduction that the story is a journey into the "zone of the unconscious mind" where Desdemona and Juliet represent elements of the lecturer's psyche. While the sardonic use of humor links the play to MacDonald's first novel, the novel goes far beyond the play in interrogating the depths of the individual characters' minds and relationships with others. That said, the novel does not read as a Jungian exploration of the sisters' collective unconscious. Indeed, one of the characters, Frances, is described as a "sealed letter. It doesn't matter where she's been or who's pawed her, no one gets to handle the contents no matter how grimy the envelope. And it's for sure no one's going to be able to steam her open" (293). The reader's role in Fall on Your Knees is to follow the narrative's developments as if putting an envelope up to a light. We can't be certain what the letter inside says, but we can see the writing inside, at first opaquely and then gradually with increased clarity, as scrutiny is increased. By the end of the investigation we are certainly rewarded for our persistence.

-Laura Moss

MacLAVERTY, Bernard

Nationality: Irish. Born: Belfast, Northern Ireland, 14 September 1942. Education: Queen's University, Belfast, B.A. (honors) in English 1974, diploma in education 1975. Family: Married Madeline McGuckin in 1967; three daughters and one son. Career: Medical laboratory technician, Belfast, 1960–70; teacher of English, St. Augustine's High School, Edinburgh, 1975–78, and Islay High School, 1978–81; writer-in-residence, University of Aberdeen, 1983–85. Since 1981 full-time writer. Awards: Northern Ireland Arts Council award, 1975; Scottish Arts Council award, 1978, 1981, 1982; Pharic McLaren award, for radio play, 1981; Jacobs award, for television play, 1982; Irish Sunday Independent award, 1983; London Evening Standard award, for screenplay, 1984. Address: 26 Roxburgh Street, Hillhead, Glasgow G12 9AP, Scotland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Lamb. London, Cape, and New York, Braziller, 1980. Cal. London, Cape, and New York, Braziller, 1983. Grace Notes. New York, W.W. Norton, 1997.

Short Stories

Secrets and Other Stories. Belfast, Blackstaff Press, 1977; New York, Viking, 1984.

A Time to Dance and Other Stories. London, Cape, and New York, Braziller, 1982.

The Great Profundo and Other Stories. London, Cape, 1987; New York, Grove Press, 1988.

Walking the Dog and Other Stories. London, Cape, 1994; New York, Norton, 1995.

Uncollected Short Stories

"For My Wife's Eyes Only," in Redbook (New York), February 1985

"A Foreign Dignitary," in Best Short Stories 1989, edited by Giles Gordon and David Hughes. London, Heinemann, 1989; as The Best English Short Stories 1989, New York, Norton, 1989.

"Life Drawing," in The Oxford Book of Irish Short Stories, edited by William Trevor. Oxford and New York, Oxford University Press, 1989.

Plays

Screenplays: Cal, 1984; Lamb, 1986.

Radio Plays: My Dear Palestrina, from his own story, 1980.

Television Plays: My Dear Palestrina, from his own story, 1980; The Real Charlotte, from the novel by Somerville and Ross, 1991.

Other (for children)

A Man in Search of a Pet. Belfast, Blackstaff Press, 1978. Andrew McAndrew. London, Walker, 1989.

^

Critical Studies: "An Introduction to the Stories of Bernard MacLaverty" by Arnold Saxon, in Journal of the Short Story in English, Spring 1987.

* * *

Vivid imagery and emotional dialogue distinguish much of Bernard MacLaverty's writing, and combined with his use of such compelling themes as isolation and dissociation, the reader quickly becomes engrossed in MacLaverty's art. A concern with the artist and his relationship to the audience occasionally emerges and blends with the major thematic concerns found in MacLaverty's pages, and he skillfully shapes his writing with the proficiency of an experienced craftsman, all the while giving time and attention to the Irish culture and people. MacLaverty's first major literary work, Secrets and Other Stories, introduces the reader to an intriguing array of characters who regularly face a myriad of conflicts including loneliness, isolation, and the frustration associated with human relationships. The title story features a young man who grapples with the guilt he feels over past violations of secrecy and trust. "Hugo," along with "Secrets," introduces the strong, recurring theme of the relationship between the artist and audience. This theme of aesthetics runs throughout the entire canon of MacLaverty, and he adeptly mingles his observations on art with the main narrative, yet the reader never loses interest in the characters or their struggles.

Shortly after publishing Secrets and Other Stories, MacLaverty produced his first novel, Lamb, which tells the story of Brother Sebastian, an Irish priest who runs away with Owen, an unwanted, sickly young boy. Brother Sebastian attempts to rekindle the love he remembers from his youth, but problems arise when he learns that nurturing a child (especially a sick and rebellious child such as Owen) involves much more than simply being called "Dad." Brother Sebastian fails to reach Owen in any significant way, and his failure demonstrates MacLaverty's fascination with the intricacies involving human relationships. Society rejects and abuses Owen through the course of his short life; his despair is such that he states at one point, "I don't care if I live or die." The novel ends with the death of Owen and the bewilderment of Brother Sebastian. The ending encourages the reader to ponder the thematic hints at the "troubles" of Ireland; hints that suggest that while people may possess the basic components for a successful relationship, Ireland's social ills so dominate her citizens that survival becomes at best a whimsical fantasy.

MacLaverty's fascination with human relationships continued with the publication of A Time to Dance, a collection of short stories that offers the reader a fascinating look at a myriad of relationships and how they succeed, fail, or maintain a level of impartiality. In the title story, Nelson rebels by refusing to wear his protective eyepatch in school, thus speeding up his chances of going blind via eyestrain. Nelson's rebellion exemplifies the attitudes of many protagonists in this work, and while many of the characters wind up facing isolation, anger, and despair, Norman in "Language, Truth, and Lockjaw" finds some success by going against the grain and attempting a reconciliation with his family. This optimistic ending suggests that, at least for some, hope may be found if one puts forth the necessary effort.

MacLaverty's next novel, Cal, features a young man who makes a valiant effort to exist in a perplexing world, but fails due to the violence perpetuated by the Catholics and Protestants. Cal's powerful narrative and gripping story line illuminate the socially pervasive 'troubles' of Ireland and bring the reader, natives and aliens alike, into a world where warring religious factions dictate almost every citizen's action. Cal (a Roman Catholic) abhors the terrorist tactics of his friends in the IRA. He only wants to live in peace, but if Cal refuses to aid the 'Catholic Cause,' he will become an adversary to both sides. Cal further complicates matters when he falls in love with Marcella, a widow who lost her husband to a violent death orchestrated by Cal's friends. Cal feels guilt over his role in the death of Marcella's husband and his "abandoning" the "Catholic Cause," and his guilt forces him to avoid making a decisive choice, either for or against the Catholics. Cal chooses neither, but he does not get to enjoy his neutrality very long; he falls victim to a divided Ireland when violence and hatred overcome his best efforts at peace. MacLaverty's powerful dialogue (a trademark of many of his works) helps make Cal a moving tale that admirably depicts the "troubles" that plague Ireland.

MacLaverty's The Great Profundo continues to explore and develop the themes of isolation and despair he introduced in Secrets and Other Stories. Many of the protagonists in this collection of short stories experience isolation and despair due to their failed attempts to reconcile a medley of deep emotional scars firmly embedded in past atrocities. A motif concerning aesthetics subtly traces the relationship between artist and audience, especially in "Words the Happy Say" and "The Drapery Man." The title story deals with a magician whose skills break down and fail him in front of an unsympathetic audience. The Great Profundo derives its strength from an energetic and compassionate narrative that binds universal themes with Irish concerns and exciting characters with their struggles. At times, MacLaverty feels the weight of his literary forefathers, but he also feels the tension created by the Catholics and Protestants. Consequently, the author's skillful narrative and vivid imagery not only allow readers to share the character's concerns and cares, they also force us to confront the everyday horrors felt by many Irish citizens.

In MacLaverty's next collection of short stories, entitled Walking the Dog, many of the protagonists grapple with the problems usually held to the confines of close personal friends and family. The title story examines the fears of a man who tries to avoid the violence associated with the Catholics and Protestants. John insists he "believes in nothing," but to no avail: two members of the IRA kidnap, interrogate, and beat him, then eventually leave him to ponder his neutral position. Like Cal, John learns that a neutral position does not exempt him from the emotional and physical duress associated with living in a divided country. Perhaps the most compelling feature of Walking the Dog is the brief italicized stories that occur at odd intervals. These brief stories examine the private concerns of a writer as well as the problems some artists experience while creating art. With this ingenious structuring device, MacLaverty shrewdly voices his concerns about the relationship between artist and audience and between art and connoisseur, all the while maintaining the delicate balance dictated by the short story's literary form.

MacLaverty's critically acclaimed Grace Notes observes Catherine McKenna's struggle to balance her music career with her home life. The narrative fluctuates back and forth between Catherine's musical career, her childhood history, and her adult years, thus giving the reader a wealth of information. Like Cal, Catherine faces serious dilemmas and paradoxes and no matter what choice she makes, it does not turn out to be the right choice. As a single woman, Catherine gives birth to a baby girl, but her fears of being rejected by her parents and ostracized by society force her to give up her daughter. As the novel progresses, Catherine's music career stagnates and her relationship with her live-in lover deteriorates. She has hopes of making a fresh start, so she returns to visit her daughter, but her plans for reconciliation fail. Catherine finally returns to Ireland, and the novel ends with an enthusiastic performance of one of her musical compositions. All of Catherine's relationships fail, but her efforts at music succeed; the audience gives her a standing ovation at the end. Once again, MacLaverty provides an intriguing look behind the scenes of creative art. Beauty may indeed be produced, but there is always a price to pay for such accomplishments, and in the end, willing or not, Catherine learns this truth.

MacLaverty's ingenious use of spatial imagery combined with color and sound resonates throughout Grace Notes, and even though the novel's primary concern lies with the artist and the demands of her art, MacLaverty still introduces and sustains thematic references to the troubles of the Irish. As an Irish novelist, MacLaverty remains true to his culture and the plight of his people, but his writing talents and skills invite readers of all nationalities to explore his literary works. MacLaverty's literature in general and Grace Notes in particular delivers something for everyone, and his art whets the reader's appetite for future literary efforts.

-James Ortego

MADDEN, (Jerry) David

Nationality: American. Born: Knoxville, Tennessee, 25 July 1933. Education: Knox High School, Knoxville; Iowa State Teachers College (now University of Northern Iowa), Cedar Falls, 1956; University of Tennessee, Knoxville, B.S. 1957; San Francisco State College, M.A. 1958; Yale Drama School (John Golden fellow), New Haven, Connecticut, 1959-60. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1955-56. Family: Married Roberta Margaret Young in 1956; one son. Career: Instructor in English, Appalachian State Teachers College, Boone, North Carolina, 1958–59, and Centre College, Danville, Kentucky, 1960–62; lecturer in creative writing, University of Louisville, Kentucky, 1962-64; member of the Department of English, Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio, and assistant editor, Kenyon Review, 1964-66; lecturer in creative writing, Ohio University, Athens, 1966-68. Writer-in-residence, 1968-92; director, Creative Writing Program, 1992-94; founding director, United States Civil War Center, 1992-99; Donald and Velvia Crumbley professor of creative writing, 1999—, all Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge. Awards: Rockefeller grant, 1969; National Endowment for the Arts prize, 1970; Bread Loaf Writers Conference William Raney fellowship, 1972. Address: 614 Park Boulevard, Baton Rouge, Louisiana 70806, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Beautiful Greed. New York, Random House, 1961.
Cassandra Singing. New York, Crown, 1969.
Brothers in Confidence. New York, Avon, 1972.
Bijou. New York, Crown, 1974.
The Suicide's Wife. Indianapolis, Bobbs Merrill, 1978.
Pleasure-Dome. Indianapolis, Bobbs Merrill, 1979.
On the Big Wind. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1980.
Sharpshooter: A Novel of the Civil War. Knoxville, University of Tennessee Press, 1996.

Short Stories

- The Shadow Knows. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1970.
- The New Orleans of Possibilities. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1982.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "My Name Is Not Antonio," in Yale Literary Magazine (New Haven, Connecticut), March 1960.
- "Hair of the Dog," in Adam (Los Angeles), April-November 1967.
- "The Master's Thesis," in Fantasy and Science Fiction (New York), July 1967.
- "Nothing Dies But Something Mourns," in Carleton Miscellany (Northfield, Minnesota), Fall 1968.
- "The Day the Flowers Came," in The Best American Short Stories 1969, edited by Martha Foley and David Burnett. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1969.
- "A Voice in the Garden," in English Record (Oneonta, New York), October 1969.
- "Traven," in Short Stories from the Little Magazines, edited by Jarvis Thurston and Curt Johnson. Chicago, Scott Foresman, 1970.
- "Home Comfort," in Jeopardy (Bellingham, Washington), March 1970.
- "No Trace," in The Best American Short Stories 1971, edited by Martha Foley and David Burnett. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1971.
- "Night Shift," in Playboy's Ribald Classics 3. Chicago, Playboy Press, 1971.
- "A Secondary Character," in Cimarron Review (Stillwater, Oklahoma), July 1972.
- "The Spread-Legged Girl" (as Jack Travis), in Knight (Los Angeles), October 1972.
- "The Singer," in Scenes from American Life: Contemporary Short Fiction, edited by Joyce Carol Oates. New York, Vanguard Press, 1973.
- "Here He Comes! There He Goes!," in Contempora (Atlanta, Georgia), Summer 1973.
- "Wanted: Ghost Writer," in Epoch (Ithaca, New York), Fall 1973.
- "The World's One Breathing," in Appalachian Heritage (Pippa Passes, Kentucky), Winter 1973.
- "Hurry Up Please, It's Time," in The Botteghe Oscure Reader, edited by George Garrett and Katherine Garrison Biddle. Middletown, Connecticut, Wesleyan University Press, 1974.
- "The Hero and the Witness," in New Orleans Review, vol. 4, no. 3, 1974.
- "On the Big Wind," in The Pushcart Prize 5, edited by Bill Henderson. Yonkers, New York, Pushcart Press, 1980.
- "Putting an Act Together," in Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Louisiana), Winter 1980.
- "Code-a-Phone," in Crescent Review (Winston-Salem, North Carolina), vol. 1, no. 1, 1983.
- "Lights," in New Letters (Kansas City), Winter 1984-85.
- "Rosanna," in South Dakota Review (Vermillion), Summer 1985.
- "Was Jesse James at Rising Fawn?," in South Dakota Review (Vermillion), Autumn 1985.
- "Willis Carr at Bleak House," in The Bread Loaf Anthology of Contemporary American Short Stories, edited by Robert Pack and

- Jay Parini. Hanover, New Hampshire, University Press of New England, 1987.
- "Gristle," in Appalachian Heritage (Berea, Kentucky), Spring-Summer 1988.
- "Children of the Sun," in New Letters (Kansas City), Summer 1988.
- "The Invisible Girl," in The Southern California Anthology 7. Los Angeles, University of Southern California Master of Professional Writing Program, 1989.
- "The Demon in My View," in Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Louisiana), Spring 1989.
- "Crossing the Lost and Found River," in Chattahoochie Review (Dunwoody, Georgia), Winter 1989.
- "James Agee Never Lived in This House," in Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Louisiana), Spring 1990.
- "A Forgotten Nightmare," in The Southern Californian Anthology (Los Angeles), 1991.
- "The Last Bizarre Tale," in Southern Short Stories. Huntsville, Texas, Huntsville Texas Review Press, 1991.
- A Survivor of the Sinking of the Sultana, "in Appalachian Heritage (Berea, Kentucky), 1992.
- "If the Ash Heap Begins to Glow Again ..." in Louisiana English Journal (Eunice, Louisiana), October 1993.
- "Fragments Found on the Field," in Gulf Coast Collection (Montrose, Alabama), 1994.
- "Hairtrigger Pencil Lines," in Louisiana Cultural Vistas Magazine (New Orleans), Spring 1994.

Plays

- Call Herman in to Supper (produced Knoxville, Tennessee, 1949). They Shall Endure (produced Knoxville, Tennessee, 1953).
- Cassandra Singing (produced Knoxville, Tennessee, 1955). Published in New Campus Writing 2, edited by Nolan Miller, New York, Putnam, 1957; (expanded version, produced Albuquerque, New Mexico, 1964).
- From Rome to Damascus (produced Chapel Hill, North Carolina, 1959).
- Casina, music by Robert Rogers, lyrics by Joseph Matthewson (produced New Haven, Connecticut, 1960).
- In My Father's House, in First Stage (Lafayette, Indiana), Summer 1966.
- Fugitive Masks (produced Abingdon, Virginia, 1966).
- The Day the Flowers Came (produced Baton Rouge, Louisiana, 1974). Chicago, Dramatic Publishing Company, 1975.

Other

- Wright Morris. New York, Twayne, 1965.
- The Poetic Image in Six Genres. Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1969.
- James M. Cain. New York, Twayne, 1970.
- Harlequin's Stick, Charlie's Cane: A Comparative Study of Commedia dell'Arte and Silent Slapstick Comedy. Bowling Green, Ohio, Popular Press, 1975.
- A Primer of the Novel, For Readers and Writers. Metuchen, New Jersey, Scarecrow Press, 1980.
- Writers' Revisions: An Annotated Bibliography of Articles and Books about Writers' Revisions and Their Comments on the Creative Process, with Richard Powers. Metuchen, New Jersey, Scarecrow Press, 1981.

Cain's Craft. Metuchen, New Jersey, Scarecrow Press, 1985.

Revising Fiction: A Handbook for Writers. New York, New American Library, 1988.

The Fiction Tutor. Fort Worth, Texas, Harcourt Brace, 1990.

A Pocketful of Essays: Thematically Arranged. Fort Worth, Texas, Harcourt College Publishers, 2001.

Editor, Tough Guy Writers of the Thirties. Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1968.

Editor, Proletarian Writers of the Thirties. Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1968.

Editor, American Dreams, American Nightmares. Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1970.

Editor, Rediscoveries: Informal Essays in Which Well-Known Novelists Rediscover Neglected Works of Fiction by One of Their Favorite Authors. New York, Crown, 1971.

Editor, with Ray B. Browne, The Popular Cultural Explosion: Experiencing Mass Media. Dubuque, Iowa, William Brown, 2 vols., 1972.

Editor, Nathanael West: The Cheaters and the Cheated. Deland, Florida, Everett Edwards, 1973.

Editor, with Jeffrey J. Folks, Remembering James Agee. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1974.

Editor, Creative Choices: A Spectrum of Quality and Technique in Fiction. Chicago, Scott Foresman, 1975.

Editor, with Virgil Scott, Studies in the Short Story. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1975; 6th edition, 1984.

Editor, with Peggy Bach, Rediscoveries II. New York, Carroll and Graf. 1988.

Editor, 8 Classic American Novels. San Diego, Harcourt Brace, 1990. Editor, The World of Fiction (short stories). Fort Worth, Texas, Holt Rinehart, 1990.

Editor, with Peggy Bach, Classics of Civil War Fiction. Jackson, University of Mississippi, 1991.

Editor, A Pocketful of Prose: Contemporary Short Fiction. Fort Worth, Texas, Harcourt Brace, 1992.

Editor, A Pocketful of Plays: Vintage Drama. Fort Worth, Texas, Harcourt Brace, 1996.

Editor, A Pocketful of Poems: Vintage Verse. Fort Worth, Texas, Harcourt Brace, 1996.

Editor, Beyond the Battlefield: The Ordinary Life and Extraordinary Times of the Civil War Soldier. New York, Touchstone, 2000.

Editor, The Legacy of Robert Penn Warren. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 2000.

Editor, with Kimberly J. Allison, A Pocketful of Essays. Fort Worth, Texas, Harcourt Brace, 2001.

*

Bibliographies: "A David Madden Bibliography 1952–1981" by Anna H. Perrault, in Bulletin of Bibliography (Westport, Connecticut), September 1982.

Manuscript Collections: University of Tennessee Library, Knoxville.

Critical Studies: "A Conversation with David Madden," and "The Mixed Chords of David Madden's Cassandra Singing" by Sanford Pinsker, in Critique (Atlanta), vol. 15, no. 2, 1973; "An Interview with David Madden," in The Penny Dreadful (Bowling Green, Ohio), vol. 3, no. 3, 1974; "The Story Teller as Benevolent Con

Man' by Madden, in Appalachian Heritage (Pippa Passes, Kentucky), Summer 1974; interviews in Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Louisiana), vol. 11, no. 1, 1975, New Orleans Review, Spring 1982, and Louisiana Literature (Hammond), Fall 1984; by Jeffrey Richards in Contemporary Poets, Dramatists, Essayists, and Novelists of the South, edited by Robert Bain and Joseph M. Flora, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1994.

David Madden comments:

I've been trying all my life to pass the test F. Scott Fitzgerald set for himself. "The test of a first-rate intelligence is the ability to hold two opposed ideas in the mind at the same time and still retain the ability to function." Camus's concept of the absurd helped clarify Fitzgerald's: one's life should be a self-created contradiction of the fact that life is basically absurd. A similar polarity has given some form to my art as well as my life. It was not books but my grandmother's storytelling and the movies' charged images that inspired me to write. My first literary hero was the Dionysian Thomas Wolfe; then came the Apollonian James Joyce. In the tensions between those two extremes I have tried to shape my own work. I have practiced for a long time now the concept that it is between the limitations externally imposed by the form I'm working in and limitations I imposed on myself in the writing of a specific work that I experience genuine and productive freedom. Two metaphors of the artist (and the teacher) are useful for me: the magician and the con man. As with the magician's techniques of illusion, art works by a phantom circuit; and the relationship between writer and reader is like that between the con man and his mark, except that the climax (the sting) is beneficial for both. For me, the function of fiction is to create imaginary words; discipline and technique enable me to cause that to happen. And in that process I consider my reader as an active collaborator.

(1995) Because it is on the crest of a single great wave of creative energy that I enter up all the activities in my life and in my writing, I reject the perception that the fact that I have not published a novel in fifteen years is evidence of diminished capacity. In all that time, I have researched and revised Sharpshooter, a Civil War novel, and published fourteen chapters from it. I have also created the United States Civil War Center. I have the first draft of a book that provides a unique perspective on ancient London Bridge (1110 to 1828). I have always worked simultaneously on five major projects, while taking up dozens of other life and literary projects. Surfing on the one great, never-ending wave of creative force is the life-work for me.

(2000) Recently, in my mid-sixties, as a matter of cold fact, I came to see that most of my fiction, and the best of it, reaches into unique characters or predicaments and unique other places, and unique other selves—unique in both life and literature, as I have lived, read, and imagined them.

From childhood, my fiction was written in a specific place and out of the specific oral traditions of the southern Appalachian Mountains, and out of radio drama and the movies, more than out of classic and modern literature. But the lure has always been nonspecific, extraordinary other places where my ordinary characters could explore and create unique other selves. For some characters, that uniqueness lasts only for the time duration of the fiction, for others, it is permanent. My characters cross the border between the ordinary and the extraordinary very rapidly.

Reading my contemporaries, I seldom see inclinations toward the kind of stories and novels I have just described as my own. I feel very little affinity for them or their work, except for Steven Millhauser. Although my masters in the art of fiction are Hemingway, Joyce, Fitzgerald, Faulkner, Conrad, and Mansfield, I see now, looking back at the age of 67, more kinship in the creation of character and situation with Poe, Borges, Marquez, Michel Tournier, Jules Romains, Kafka, John Collier, A. E. Coppard, E. M. Forster. "Tales of Mystery and Imagination," title of a Poe collection, fits my own corpus.

In my childhood, I viewed every specific place (my bedroom) and every general place (my hometown) as other, and even as I moved from place to place, my imagination was stimulated to create other places, other selves (for my characters, more than myself). Sometimes the more specific the place and time, in the conventional sense (San Francisco in 1957, for instance), the more my imagination reached for possibilities beyond. In my novel in progress (since Christmas 1991), London Bridge Is Falling Down, nothing could be more specific than a bridge, even one with almost 200 houses and shops built on it. The first version reaches back and forth in time over the 800-year history of the ancient bridge and draws on times, places, people, real and imagined, and events up to the 365 nights I took nocturnal walks on London Bridge. For instance, Harpo Marx shows up on the bridge in the year 1342. Fragments of a story and facts about the building, maintenance, and final demolition of the bridge are scattered throughout those walks in words. My recent conversion to Christianity may affect the way I revise that first draft, but it won't be less other in time, place, and character, nor less exotic, bizarre, and demonic.

"When I am writing, I am far away and when I return I have already left." Neruda, Muchos Somos.

* * *

Much of David Madden's fiction is autobiographical. Like Lucius Hutchfield in Bijou, Madden goes over his personal history again and again, remolding details. Incidents appear in more than one work; short stories are absorbed into novels; the short novel Brothers in Confidence becomes the first half of the longer novel Pleasure-Dome, as Madden works at perfecting the tale of his life. Arranged in chronological order Madden's fictional autobiography would begin with two stories from The Shadow Knows, "The Pale Horse of Fear" and the title story, then continue on through Bijou, The Beautiful Greed, Pleasure-Dome, to the elegiac story "The World's One Breathing."

Madden's goal is to transport his readers into "the Pleasure-Dome." As Lucius says in the novel of that name, "Everyday life is an effort to disentangle facts and illusions. There are rare moments in our lives when we transcend captivity in fact-and-illusion through pure imagination and dwell in the Pleasure-Dome, a luminous limbo between everyday experience and a work of art." Lucius knows well the value of a good story. He is an aspiring writer, and his older brother is a con man—which for Madden is nearly the same thing: "The relationship between the storyteller and the listener is like that between the con man and his mark," Madden has said. Madden himself is at his best when emulating the oral storytelling style he learned from his grandmother when he was growing up in the Tennessee hills, the setting of much of his fiction.

In the stories collected in The Shadow Knows the characters are caught between the knowledge that their old lives—in many cases rural or small town lives—are disappearing, and that the new lives available to them are spiritually unsatisfying. Madden's world here is primarily one of moonshiners and county fairs, motorcycles and coalmines, but a few of these stories are set outside the mountains. "Love Makes Nothing Happen," set in Alaska, is the best of these, while "The Day the Flowers Came," set in some faceless suburb, is maudlin and unbelievable. Two of the mountain stories here turn up as Lucius's memories in Bijou.

Bijou picks up Lucius's story in early adolescence, when he becomes an usher in a movie theater. Lucius tries to reinvent his life in the image of the films he sees. The Bijou itself is a symbol of the exotic mysteries of adulthood: "... the Bijou ... seemed foreign, beyond his life, as if he were entering a special Bijou experience prematurely. The Bijou was somehow for other people, people who were superior to him because they'd had Bijou experiences he hadn't had." The promising framework of the theater as Lucius's doorway into adulthood is unfortunately overloaded with page after page of movie synopses, and undercut by the repetitive nature of his experiences with the other characters. We last see Lucius lurking about Thomas Wolfe's house, ready to give up films for the idea of the writer's life.

The Beautiful Greed relates the adventures of a young man named Alvin (who is just a little older than Lucius at the end of Bijou) on a merchant marine voyage to South America. This novel was Madden's first, and it seems thin in almost all regards when compared to his later works, though the plot here is unusually straight for Madden.

Pleasure-Dome is perhaps Madden's finest novel to date, despite a structure of two clumsily hinged together story lines. Lucius Hutchfield is once again the main character. He has been in the merchant marine and has become a writer since the events of Bijou. Lucius spends the first half of the novel trying to free his younger brother from jail by using his storytelling gifts. But it is the eldest brother, the con man, who succeeds in this—by telling taller tales than those Lucius tells. The second half is a cautionary tale about the responsibilities of being a storyteller. A boy's outlaw side lies dormant until Lucius awakens it with a story about Jesse James. The boy tries to emulate the outlaw's success with a young woman, with disastrous results. Though the boy goes to prison he is happy: he has on some small scale entered the world of legendary figures.

Cassandra Singing, the story of a wild boy and his invalid sister, is generally considered one of Madden's least autobiographical works, but it would be more accurate to say that Madden's character is here split between Lone and his sister Cassie. Lone is the motorcycle rider, the one with the need to escape the small world of the hills, while bedridden Cassie's life is in touch with the country's oral tradition, through the songs and stories she knows. That these two lie down together as the novel's end may be more of a self-portrait than a suggestion of incest. On the Big Wind is a loose string of satiric sketches with obvious targets, tied together by the voice of Big Bob Travis, nomadic radio announcer. The most telling thing here is "The World's One Breathing," spliced in from The Shadow Knows.

The Suicide's Wife stands apart from the rest of Madden's work. It is the story of a woman, and a story of the city. The language and plot are very spare and straightforward. Ann Harrington's husband kills himself, leaving "a vacuum into which things rushed." The novel is the story of Ann's struggle to gain a command over these "things," which is also the struggle to open herself to possibilities: "Before, I had never really imagined possibilities. Since she never caused events, they just happened, and she took them as they came." Ann's triumph over the foreboding world of "things" is symbolized by her successful quest to earn a driver's license, an official recognition of her right to take herself where she wants to go.

-William C. Bamberger

MADDEN, Deirdre

Nationality: Northern Irish. Born: Belfast, Northern Ireland, 20 August 1960. Education: Trinity College, Dublin, B.A. 1983; University of East Anglia, M.A. 1985. Awards: Hennessy literary award, 1980; Rooney Prize for Irish Literature, 1987; Somerset Maugham award (Society of Authors), 1989. Agent: A. P. Watt Ltd., 20 John Street, London WC1N 2DR, England. Address: County Antrim, Northern Ireland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Hidden Symptoms. Boston, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1986.
The Birds of the Innocent Wood. London, Faber and Faber, 1988.
Remembering Light and Stone. Boston, Faber and Faber, 1992.
Nothing Is Black. London, Faber and Faber, 1994.
One by One in the Darkness. London, Faber and Faber, 1996.

Other

Afterword, The Ante-Room by Kate O'Brien. New York, Penguin Books, 1990.

Contributor, First Fictions: Introduction 9. London, Faber and Faber, 1986.

* * *

Deirdre Madden, born in 1960, is an important voice in Northern Irish writing. The winner of several literary awards, Madden in her novels examines the state of individual consciousness in the fragmented and confusing late-twentieth-century world. Her interest in how individuals discern their place in the world leads her to examine institutions that affect people's lives: religion, geography, politics (particularly in Northern Ireland), violence, and women's rights. All of her novels rely heavily on conversation; in the tradition of Elizabeth Bowen's fiction, Madden's work uses in-depth conversations to advance characters' understanding of themselves and each other while developing her themes for the reader.

Her first novel, Hidden Symptoms, offers an excellent introduction to life in Belfast. The title refers to Ulster before the renewal of violence broke out; it has always been "sick," but the symptoms only became visible with the violence. The main character, Theresa Cassidy, lost her twin brother Francis to sectarian violence. In her first exposition of an injustice she will return to in One by One in the Darkness, Madden makes clear that Francis was not politically active, but was singled out as a representative of his "tribe." The other main character is Robert McConville, a lapsed Catholic. Although he makes regular visits to his working-class sister and her family, he thinks that he has left behind his past to embrace an artistic and intellectual life; the novel (and Theresa) proclaim the impossibility of that goal. Conversations between Theresa and Robert develop most of the book's themes, and the principal importance of events is often the conversations they inspire. The baptism of Robert's niece prompts a long discussion of Theresa's religious faith. That faith is examined as a source of anguish to her, as she struggles to maintain her belief in a benevolent God and forgive those who killed her twin. Tellingly, Theresa uses "Christian" to mean Roman Catholic; she despises the Presbyterians and seems unaware of other Christian denominations. Madden's novel examines the inner lives of Theresa and Robert, but always reminds readers of how their options are limited by Belfast political/religious realities. Theresa explains to Robert why his agnosticism is a worthless evasion: "'there's a big difference between faith and tribal loyalty, and if you think that you can escape tribal loyalty in Belfast today you're betraying your people and fooling yourself."

