NOVELISTS

Seventh Edition

CONTEMPORARY NOVELISTS

Contemporary Writers Series

Contemporary Dramatists
Contemporary Literary Critics
Contemporary Novelists
(including short story writers)
Contemporary Poets
Contemporary Popular Writers
Contemporary Southern Writers
Contemporary Women Poets
Contemporary World Writers

CONTEMPORARY NOVELISTS

SEVENTH EDITION

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION

DAVID MADDEN

EDITORS

NEIL SCHLAGER

AND JOSH LAUER

AN IMPRINT OF THE GALE GROUP

DETROIT • NEW YORK • SAN FRANCISCO LONDON • BOSTON • WOODBRIDGE, CT

Neil Schlager and Josh Lauer, Editors

Kristin Hart, Project Coordinator

Michelle Banks, Erin Bealmear, Laura Standley Berger, Joann Cerrito, Jim Craddock, Steve Cusack, Nicolet V. Elert, Miranda Ferrara, Jamie FitzGerald, Melissa Hill, Laura S. Kryhoski, Margaret Mazurkiewicz, Carol A. Schwartz, Christine Tomassini, Michael J. Tyrkus St. James Press Staff

Peter M. Gareffa, Managing Editor, St. James Press

Mary Beth Trimper, Manager, Composition and Electronic Prepress
Evi Seoud, Assistant Manager, Composition Purchasing and Electronic Prepress
Dorothy Maki, Manufacturing Manager
Rhonda Williams, Buyer

Kenn Zorn, Product Design Manager Mike Logusz, Graphic Artist

While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, St. James Press does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. St. James Press accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher.

Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

This publication is a creative work fully protected by all applicable copyright laws, as well as by misappropriation, trade secret, unfair competition, and other applicable laws. The authors and editors of this work have added value to the underlying factual material herein through one or more of the following: unique and original selection, coordination, expression, arrangement, and classification of the information.

All rights to this publication will be vigorously defended.

Copyright © 2001 St. James Press 27500 Drake Rd. Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535

All rights reserved including the right of reproduction in whole or in part in any form.

ISBN 1-55862-408-2 ISSN 1531-2232

Printed in the United States of America

St. James Press is an imprint of Gale Group Gale Group and Design is a trademark used herein under license 10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

CONTENTS

PREFACE	PAGE vii
EDITORS' NOTE	xiii
BOARD OF ADVISERS	XV
CONTRIBUTORS	xvii
LIST OF ENTRANTS	xxi
CONTEMPORARY NOVELISTS	1
NOTES ON ADVISERS AND CONTRIBUTORS	1083
NATIONALITY INDEX	1103
TITLE INDEX	1109

PREFACE

Beginning at the beginning, "novel" means, obviously, a new thing. The universal definition has been, more or less, that it brings a piece of news about places, people, and ideas.

The Death of the Novel and the Death of Reading

From the beginning, its health has been in doubt, and rumors of its death have dogged its history. If in the new millennium, rumors persist that the novel is no longer new—that it is old and as good as dead—perhaps, just to be certain, we ought to take its pulse now as a precaution against premature burial.

And while we are at it, shouldn't we also take the pulse of the reader, in the corporate sense—"the reader is dead" being the latest variation on the notion of the death of the novel?

Like "God is dead," "the novel is dead" was, on its inception, a lame-brained metaphor. A detailed chronology of the novel reveals, in every era, not only its liveliness, but its well-earned right to the term "novel."

On the contemporary scene, however, it can perhaps be said that there are no master novelists, male or female, and no masterpieces. If that is true, is that sad? I can't bring myself to think so. As a young writer, I had my heroes, and, at 67, I revere them still: James Joyce, Joseph Conrad, Thomas Wolfe, Ernest Hemingway, Virginia Woolf, Ralph Ellison, William Faulkner, Katherine Anne Porter, Carson McCullers, Wright Morris. They are dead, as are many who were once my contemporaries. But we who are left survive in that which is immortal—the art of fiction itself—while interesting subjects, such as war, love, and crime, and trends, such as the epic, the naturalistic, and the psychological novel, come and go in reader interest. The House of Fiction, Henry James assured us, has many windows and many doors. Readers have entered the front and the back doors and looked out through those many different windows with a sense of fiction's sameness and diminished creative power only if they have insisted on reading the same kinds of writers, genres, subjects, themes, and styles over and over again.

"Make It New!"

For the history of the novel is a history, almost decade by decade, of reinvigoration through innovation, in conception, style, and structure. Compared to the public awareness at mid-century of such innovative novelists as James Joyce and Gertrude Stein, readers today are not mindful of innovation, as such. Even so, the accomplishments of innovators of today are no less impressive for being unacknowledged by the general public or critics. In 1934, in The ABC of Reading, Ezra Pound exhorted both writers and readers to "Make it new!" Well, what is new? A rather perverse argument is that the novel has offered little "news that stays news" since 1760, when Tristram Shandy's shelf life began. A more profitable view of the state of the novel is that, on the evidence, it is business as usual in the House of Fiction. And business is vigorous and good.

Forces That Both Debilitate and Reinvigorate the Novel

Paradoxically, the very forces perceived to contribute to the prophesied death, or at least debilitation, of the novel and of the reader actually also reinvigorate and keep both very much alive today. As long as we focus with shivering obsessiveness on one or a nexus of forces, we run the risk of becoming transfixed, victims of a self-fulfilling prophecy. But if we consider all the forces and link our concern about their negative effects with a discovery of their positive effects, we may see that out of the fires that consume arise Phoenixes of more than one species.

In an era when the catch phrase is the death of reading itself, a list of all the forces that threaten the death of the novel fails to convince when we look at the well-read works of the past twenty years by such "new" novelists as: Susan Straight, Connie Porter, Robert Olen Butler, Andrei Codrescu, Alice Walker, Allen Wier, Richard Ford, Robert Morgan, Martin Amis, T. C. Boyle, Louise Erdrich, Amy Tan, John Irving, Thomas Keneally, Ernest Gaines, Charles Johnson, Bobbie Ann Mason, Barry Hannah, Steven Millhauser, Cormac McCarthy, Toni Morrison, Salman Rushdie, and Leslie Silko. True, many older novelists, with five or so successful novels on record, can't get published anymore—a crying shame. But now Internet reprints from Barnes and Noble and on-demand reprints from the Authors' Guild will eventually keep many excellent novels in print, both popular and innovative. And on the publishing scene, it is true that too few magazines publish short stories, because most magazines, like television channels, target specialized audiences. But more stories than ever are being published, mostly in literary quarterlies.

We are blessed with a phalanx of forces that develop and shape writers and readers and that pose both dark and bright prospects. On the dark side, the litany of long-active forces reads this way: the specter of environmental disaster; the plague of epidemics; the population time bomb; atomic annihilation; competition for world markets; diminishing faith in the political process. Cross-genre and media fertilization, cross-cultural assimilation, the creative turmoil of technological innovations, economic globalization, political strife or coalitions, religious discord or tolerance, and the relativism of shifting philosophical visions are negative and positive forces acting upon the progress and fate of fiction.

Readers have become television addicts, but while the proliferation of channels on cable television threatens to fragment the interests of viewers so finely that the diminution of a common experience for the reading of fiction may seem fatal to the novel, television—which is after all little more than radio with pictures—is now a conservative force. The most fundamentally revolutionary invention since the printing press, the major new force of unknown, but knowable, consequences, is the Internet, with the traffic hazards of the Information Superhighway, but with the potential to facilitate a major step in the way we perceive human experience. More specifically, the litany of dark and bright forces claims that readers and writers are taught literature by young teachers who at the notion of masters and masterpieces turn pale, who seem to hate literature more than they love cultural criticism and who work to replace "dead white male classic writers" with politically correct up-to-the-minute writers who foster discussion of issues on race, class, gender, post-colonialism, Freudianism, and Marxism. But actual sales in literature textbooks reveal that traditional fiction remains the vibrant core of curricula. Yes, students read less, but imagine the readers of the Harry Potter series as readers and writers of tomorrow. Yes, even young writers read less, but they write more: fiction, poetry, imaginative nonfiction, screenplays, and even stage plays. Those who write, we may expect, will eventually read. Most writers are now learning how to write in college and come out of the same workshop pedagogy, but there are signs of more variety in teaching strategies.

Most agents are inaccessible to new writers, but more small publishers are looking for emerging talent. The new editors must be more adept at sales and marketing than the art of fiction, but sometimes their ignorance is a blessing. Huge publishers cannibalize each other and smaller ones perish, but others rise and fall. Huge bookstore chains brutally compete, while small bookstores fade away, but Internet book sales have created a healthy chaos out of which we may hope some good may come.

There is far more of everything today on the literary scene. More literary magazines, small presses, critical journals, creative writing courses, writers conferences, than ever before. In the last two decades, societies devoted to the study and appreciation of Richard Wright, Thomas Wolfe, Carson McCullers, William Faulkner, Eudora Welty, Robert Penn Warren, even living writers, Cormac McCarthy, for instance. One of the conventional reasons why we should study literature, especially the classics, is that it reflects the society in which it was written. That justification has always struck me as half-assed, to borrow from Candide. The more complete reason is that literature both reflects and affects society, directly, as in Uncle Tom's Cabin by Harriet Beecher Stowe and The Jungle by Upton Sinclair, indirectly or more subtly, as in Huckleberry Finn and A Catcher in the Rye. In some literature courses today, the emphasis is upon how the reflection is distorted and the effect is negative. But the imagination and the visionary temperament have also created other worlds.

A piece of bad news is, some argue, that it is in the nature of the novel that it depicts and thus perpetuates the conflict among those dark forces. But the piece of good news is that novels also assimilate and domesticate those forces and thus give impetus to bright forces as well. Some writers—Ronald Sukenick in The Death of the Novel and John Barth in Lost in the Funhouse, for instance—even deal in their fiction with the undying question of the death of the novel.

Literary Fiction and Popular Genres

The universal type of the novelist wears a ragged Harlequin costume, on each patch of which is the name of a genre, a type, or a trend. The popular genres mutated during the last century, from bringing the news about the epic West, then the asphalt jungle, then the unknown universe, then the realm of the occult, until the West, the mean streets, outer space, and the bizarre have become relatively domesticated. Today, the territory ahead is fantasy, with resonant connotations of spiritualism. For most popular genres and types of novels there is a serious or literary counterpart, especially in innovative fiction. The Popular Culture Society has, for 35 years now, encouraged the serious examination of that interplay.

My survey into deepest Barnes and Noble reveals that not even the spirit of John Wayne can keep the Western in the saddle, even though the spirit of Louis L'Amour is there, but virtually alone, on two long shelves. But Larry McMurtry and Cormac McCarthy carry us beyond even Walter Van Tilburg Clark, while the very few Western movies showing up these days fail to compare well with The Ox-Bow Incident. Crime novels participate in a popularity sustained by television and the movies. If John Grisham, Elmore Leonard, and James Lee Burke are not the masters that Hammett, Chandler, and Cain were, they, like the late Ross Macdonald, transmit their own power. Historical romances flood both new and used book stores, but no Charlotte Brontë or even Daphne Du Maurier counterparts are found among the serious fiction titles; we are mindful, however, that the Civil War novels of Jeff Shaara, Charles Frazier, and Madison Jones help keep up interest in that defining moment in American history. Science fiction is holding its own, but no literary figures like Aldous Huxley, George Orwell, or Arthur C. Clarke are imagining other worlds either, while it is movies such as Star Wars and television series such as Star Trek that set the standard in the public consciousness.

Among more literary genres, we note that political novels are few. Except for the Civil War novel, now in its glory, the clamor of war novels, even Vietnam novels, is seldom heard. Two relatively new genres are novels in which the author pays homage to one of the giants, Hemingway, Dickens, Brontë, Poe, Twain, and Melville by taking up where they left off or by imagining new adventures for their characters, even minor ones; and the antiquarian novel, in which old genres such as the Gothic Romance are revisited by writers such as Joyce Carol Oates generally identified as literary, not genre-bound. Religious subjects and themes are appearing with surprising frequency, but no Graham Greene has yet appeared. Business and medical novels, purely as such, are being written to be used as textbooks in those disciplines.

The energy and pervasiveness of the once-marginalized ethnic novel have come in as a tidal wave that started building out in the sea of the 1960s: Chicano, Native American, African American, Irish, and Middle Eastern and oriental writers living in England. And far more women novelists are considered major in the literary sense, for instance, Toni Morrison, Mary Lee Settle, Susan Sontag, Muriel Spark, Elizabeth Spencer, Edna O'Brien, Rosellen Brown, Anne Tyler, Ellen Gilchrist, Mavis Gallant, and Diane Johnson.

Other Forms of Artistic Expression

A diagnosis of the state, health, and venturesomeness of the novel becomes clearer when we compare it with other literary genres and other forms of art, none of which seem dead, some of which, however, seem to be dying at the rind but are still vital at the core. From the 1950s on, there were highly visible innovations in the fields of drama, movies, music, dance, and painting. Movies and the theater are far less venturesome, more conventional overall, now than they were in the 1950s and 1960s. But even comic-strip sex and violence action movies are almost as sophisticated in the making as movies based on such novels as The English Patient. The adaptation of movies from the works of Shakespeare, Austen, Dickens, Forster do well. Having seen the movie, people today less often say, "I don't have to read the novel"; they say, "Can't wait to read the novel." That fabulous invalid, the theater, stages mostly musicals, revivals of musicals, but the lights go up on few new plays by playwrights of the stature of Tennessee Williams, Arthur Miller, and Edward Albee while aging innovators such as Sam Shepard and Harold Pinter are taken gratefully for granted. But theater is to literature as baseball is to basketball—too slow for most folks. Innovations in both serious and popular music have just about played out. Hiphop and Rap mutants dominate, corrupting the language, but Rap revels in a love of words, while music videos train young viewers to be receptive to innovative techniques in movies and in fiction as well. Interactive relationships among all media have never been as symbiotic as now.

Although all forms, genres, and modes of artistic expression do today as the novel often does—pursue randomness at a fast pace—the subjects, themes, and techniques of innovative fiction, and all other arts, have been masterfully, thoroughly, and forever assimilated, domesticated by popular culture. Novels can no longer hope to shock, disorient, confuse readers into new perspectives on human experience. But the novel has a firm place in this myriad, as no more and no less venturesome than most other forms and ahead of most; in its place, the novel provides many kinds of experiences in many different aesthetic venues. Asian, French, Indian, Chinese, Japanese, South American novelists do not seem to deviate to any notable extent from these generalizations.

The Contemporary Appeal of the Commonplace

Perhaps to see more clearly how the new derives from innovative masterworks of the past, from Sterne to Joyce, one might look at the novels of Chinua Achebe, Rudolfo Anaya, Julian Barnes, John Barth, Don DeLillo, Raymond Federman, Barry Hannah, Steve Katz, Richard Kostelanetz, Frederick Busch, Ernest Gaines, Charles Johnson, Allen Wier, Toni Morrison, Steven Millhauser, Thomas Pynchon, Ronald Sukenick, Gilbert Sorrentino, Kurt Vonnegut, Jr., Rudolph Wurlitzer. They keep our eye on venturesomeness, but bless those novelists who are conventional, in the best sense, in the Trollope sense: Louis Auchincloss, Margaret Atwood, Russell Banks, Charles Frazier, George Garrett, Saul Bellow, R. V. Cassill, John Knowles, Hortense Calisher, Norman Mailer, Gore Vidal, Alice Munro, Reynolds Price, Philip Roth, Eudora Welty, Ann Beattie.

If the Laurence Sternes disrupt the smooth history of the novel, even 600 or so years after its birth, the Anthony Trollopes sustain the flow. Both types are in our lives today, but the perception is of a Trollopian era. Novelists and readers have come a long way from Flaubert's "mot juste," through Joyce's multifaceted style, through Wolfe's rhapsodic but simple style, and Hemingway's simple but complex style, to William Gass, who holds the fort, a lonely outpost under the banner of style: "I don't write novels, I write words." Lacking the distinctiveness of Joyce, Wolfe, and Hemingway, the style of most of the best novelists today is relatively commonplace but effective.

Perhaps the perennial appeal of the commonplace, the ordinary, in style, subject, locale, and form derive from writer-reader fatigue from contending with the same forces that both threaten and invigorate the novel. Conventional novelists satisfy a craving for escape—not out of readers' own lives into other places, other times, and the lives of an exotic other, which the various popular genres provide—but deeper into the ordinary lives they live, or wish to live, and a craving for enlightenment about that life.

The history of the novel shows that even the most innovative, avant garde, or experimental novelists venture out only to discover and cozy down into a niche. If one looks at the most venturesome novel by D. H. Lawrence, John Barth, William Gaddis, James Joyce, Virginia Woolf, William Burroughs, Gertrude Stein, Andre Gide, Thomas Pynchon, Julio Cortazar, Vladimir Nabokov, Allain Robbe-Grillet, and John Hawkes, and then looks at all their others, one may discern a certain sameness. Few new voices prove to be polyphonic. Faulkner stands out as an innovator whose restless temperament imagined forms for four or five novels distinctively different from each other.

The terms innovative, avant garde, and experimental do not all mean the same thing; all three are useful for their nuanced differences; "innovative" is perhaps a better word than "experimental" or "avant garde" for use as a generalization, but a word that might embrace all three and might apply to some extent to the contemporary scene is "venturesome." Venturesomeness is just as prevalent today as it ever was. That readers are not as aware of this quality in the newest novels may only mean that variety describes the novel today in a climate of change so great and rapid we seldom pause, as we speed along on the Information Superhighway, to assess and elevate novelists to the status of venturesome masters of the form.

It has been my intention neither to excoriate nor to extol the state of the novel. If I am wrong, I can only hope not to live long enough to be counted among the mourners. If I am right, I can hope that a myriadminded perspective among writers and readers will keep the novel alive for at least a thousand years.

How Will the Novel Survive in the New Millennium?

Another recurrent question about the novel presupposes that the novel is indeed alive:

What might we predict for its future? Until recently, I have always felt that speculation about a form so protean is boring. But the context in which the novel must continue to develop will itself be far more protean. Such a very general and brief survey as I have been conducting is doomed to hostile reception by those readers impatient with generalizations per se and those devotees of any one genre, trend, or critical perspective. I can only plead a desire to venture into the realm of myriadmindedness, which is the theme of my generalization about the future of novelists and readers. As writer, critic, and as one who professes in creative writing workshops and in literature classes, I have always felt comfortable with a multitude of terms, even labels, of concepts and generalizations, mindful of their transitory power to illuminate and to propel one on into another realm of emotion, imagination, and thought.

What can the novel venture to achieve in this new millennium? Since the assignment I have given myself is to look back from the shifty horizon of the new millennium, permit me here at the end to pose a possibility for the future of writers and readers and for the novel, the deserving form that we must, working together, keep alive. Having claimed that writers today are just as venturesome as writers of any other era, I claim now that too few readers have ever been so venturesome as to meet novelists more than halfway. Even well-intentioned readers often mistake relatively fresh controversial subjects and themes for innovativeness in form, style, and technique, when they are merely being venturesome as readers. Serious readers of the future will have to learn, I imagine, how to read, just as writers must learn how to write, to paraphrase Mark Harris.

The question then arises, what new thing might the novelist write that would thrive only with a new kind of readership? The one major technique that, in the not so long history of the novel, has never realized its potential is the omniscient point of view, "omniscient" more as in God than even in Fielding, Dickens, Wolfe, Conrad, Tolstoy, Hardy, or Mann, none of whom ever came near consciously, deliberately exploring the possibilities. Which are what? At this point in time, only God knows. Recall the many applications of the Latin prefixes "omni" and also "multi" and "poly" and the possibilities begin to proliferate and to activate the intellectual imagination.

One of the problems is choreographic. How is the venturesome novelist of the future to keep all time and space and the characters there moving rhythmically at the still point of the dance, of art? It's a mystery, and a task, but a mystery worth contemplating and a task that may prove to be exhilarating for the new writer and the new reader.

After omniscience, what else do I have in mind? Myriadmindedness. Coleridge called Shakespeare myriadminded, and if you think about it, so were Da Vinci and other Renaissance minds, right on up through James Joyce, William Faulkner (I first heard the word applied to him) and Robert Penn Warren (I now apply the word to him) in the last century (no one comes to mind in this new century). But those minds do not really demonstrate what I mean by the word. By myriadmindedness, as a description of the future of the novelist whom I envision, I mean no longer monominded, but more positively, I mean, at first, having "the ability to hold two opposed ideas in the mind at once and still retain the ability to function," as F. Scott Fitzgerald said in, significantly enough, The Crack-Up. But beyond that, myriadmindedness is the ability to achieve simultaneity, and in the novel that means what it means in painting: two elements, interactive, functioning at once, just as all the reds and yellows in a painting simultaneously activate the viewer's perception.

Just as the surviving novelists of the future will have to cultivate myriadmindedness to depict the multivalent milieu of our lives, the reader will have to cultivate the ability to respond consciously to the development of two elements simultaneously. Writers and readers are active in the same global cultural complexities. Today, however, most writers and their readers are satisfied with cultivating their own gardens, little victory gardens that nourish small neighborhoods. Just as magazines and cable networks target specialized audiences, the novel, even the literary novel that aspires to the immortality of art, works a small audience.

My prediction is that mankind, with the imperative aid of computers and their continual development of expanding capabilities, will pursue the development of an ability first to perceive and contemplate and process intellectually two things simultaneously, and then maybe twenty years later, three things—an achievement that will constitute the first major breakthrough in human learning since man learned to use fire and hand tools. Then four things, with the goal of continuing that development process forever. The cultivation of the omniscient point of view and simultaneity in the novel will serve the more general venturesome purpose and long process of developing myriadmindedness and will even—I envision hopefully—lead the way. I can make that claim because the novel, from its nativity, has been the only human activity in which emotion, imagination, and intellection have been presented omnisciently in a focused, conscious manner. All novels, taken together, have provided readers, throughout the past five or six centuries, with a manifold view of humankind. We look to the new millennium horizon for that writer who will set an example of myriadmindedness for us all.

-David Madden

EDITOR'S NOTE

The selection of writers included in this book is based on the recommendations of the advisers listed on page xiii.

The entry for each writer consists of a biography, a complete list of separately published books, and a signed essay. In addition, entrants were invited to comment on their work.

Original British and United States editions of all books have been listed; other editions are listed only if they are first editions. All uncollected short stories published since the entrant's last collection, plus others mentioned by the entrant, have been listed; in those cases where an uncollected story was originally published in a magazine and later in an anthology, we have tended to list the anthology. As a rule all books written about the entrant are listed in the Critical Studies section; the reviews and essays listed have been recommended by the entrant.

We would like to thank the entrants and contributors for their patience and cooperation in helping us compile this book.

BOARD OF ADVISERS

Walter Allen Hermione Lee
Bernard Bergonzi John Lehmann
Earle Birney Harry Levin
Elmer Borklund David Lodge
Malcolm Bradbury David Madden
Richard Brown Harry T. Moore
Anthony Burgess J.E. Morpurgo

Keith ByermanStephen Murray-SmithD.D.C. ChambersShyamala A. Narayan

Richard Corballis W.H. New F. Brett Cox Leonard Orr Helen Daniel Cynthia Ozick Margaret Drabble Desmond Pacey Dorothy Driver Marge Piercy Peter Ferran Hal Porter Leslie A. Fiedler Anthony Powell Roy Fuller Arthur Ravenscroft James Gindin John M. Reilly D.C.R.A. Goonetilleke Kenneth Rexroth Albert Guerard H. Winston Rhodes James B. Hall Alan Ross John Hawkes Barney Rosset Laurie Hergenhan Mark Schorer Susan Hill Tony Tanner A. Norman Jeffares Fay Weldon Mark Williams William A. Johnsen Bruce King Michael Wood

George Woodcock

Jerome Klinkowitz James Korges

CONTRIBUTORS

Lisa Abney Rima Abunasser Maureen Aitken Stephen Akey Walter Allen Richard Almonte Patricia Altner Richard Andersen Susan Ang Mar Asensio-Aróstegui Alvin Aubert

Jane S. Bakerman John Clement Ball William C. Bamberger

Harold Augenbraum

John Barnes
Bob Batchelor
Ian A. Bell
Samuel I. Bellman
Bruce Bennett
Bernard Bergonzi
Tammy Bird

Earle Birney
William Bittner
William Borden
Elmer Borklund
Malcolm Bradbury

M.E. Bradford
Eckhard Breitinger

Peter Brigg Juliette Bright W.S. Broughton Lloyd W. Brown Richard Brown Lynne Bryer Harry Bucknall Jackie Buxton Keith Byerman

Mary Cadogan Cynthia Cameros Frank Campenni

Michela Canepari-Labib Victoria Carchidi D.D.C. Chambers Michael A. Chaney Shirley Chew Paul Seiko Chihara Laurie Clancy Anderson Clark

Sam Coale Loretta Cobb

Tom Colonnese Judy Cooke Richard Corballis John Cotton F. Brett Cox Ralph J. Crane Susan E. Cushman Edmund Cusick

Helen Daniel
Terence Dawson
Doreen D'Cruz
Leon de Kock
Marc Delrez
Peter Desy
Susie deVille
Adam Dickinson
Peter Dickinson
R.H.W. Dillard
Paul A. Doyle
Dorothy Driver
Deborah Duckworth
Andy Duncan

Patricia Keefe Durso Josh Dwelle Klay Dyer

Ursula Edmands Chester E. Eisinger Geoffrey Elborn

Mark A.R. Facknitz Peter Ferran Keith Ferrell John W. Fiero Ruel E. Foster

Jill Franks Anne French Warren French Melvin J. Friedman Lucy Frost John Fuegi

David Galloway
Tim Gauthier

Stephannie S. Gearhart David Geherin James Gindin D.C.R.A. Goonetilleke

D.C.R.A. Goonetill Lois Gordon Pat Gordon-Smith Hedwig Gorski Marian Gracias Colin Graham

Suzanne Disheroon Green

Sinda Gregory George Grella Jessica Griffin Prabhu S. Guptara

Laurie Schwartz Guttenberg Tracie Church Guzzio

Jay L. Halio
James B. Hall
Joan Wylie Hall
John Hanrahan
Jennifer Harris
June Harris
James A. Hart
Sue Hart
Thomas Hastings
David M. Heaton
John Herbert
Michelle Hermann
Katharine Hodgkin
Janis Butler Holm

Van Ikin

Louis James
A. Norman Jeffares
David K. Jeffrey
Annibel Jenkins
Ron Jenkins

Rosemary E. Johnsen William A. Johnsen

H.R.F. Keating Margaret Keith

Wendy Robbins Keitner

Fiona Kelleghan Sandra Kemp Burton Kendle Jake Kennedy Liam Kennedy Tabish Khair Robert F. Kiernan Bruce King Celia M. Kingsbury Connie Ann Kirk H. Gustav Klaus Marcus Klein Jerome Klinkowitz Judson Knight Judith C. Kohl James Korges Iva Korinkova

Suzanne Lane Ryan Lankford

Marta Krogh

Josh Lauer
Mary M. Lay
Robert Lecker
Thomas LeClair
Chris Leigh
Michal Lemberger
Peter Lewis
Stanley W. Lindberg
Jack Lindsay
Jennifer Livett
Devoney Looser
Gail Low
John Lucas
Robert E. Lynch

Andrew Macdonald Gary D. MacDonald Gina Macdonald Clinton Machann David Madden Veronica Makowsky Irving Malin Paul Marx Lawrence Mathews Roland Mathias John McCormick Frederick P.W. McDowell Margaret B. McDowell John McLeod Ian McMechan Kevin McNeilly John Mepham Patricia Merivale

Robert E. Mielke
D. Quentin. Miller
Stephen Milnes
Radhika Mohanram
David Montrose
Gerald Moore
Harry T. Moore
Robert A. Morace
Anne Morddel
Laura Moss
Eric Muirhead
Graham J. Murphy
Heather Murray

Janna Z. Nadler Shyamala A. Narayan W.H. New Judie Newman Leslie Norris

Maril Nowak Robert Nye Liam O'Brien D.J. O'Hearn John O'Leary James Ortego

Malcolm Page Joseph Parisi Marian Pehowski Tom Penner George Perkins Lisa A. Phillips Marge Piercy Jan Pilditch Sanford Pinsker Marco Portales John Povey Cathy Kelly Power Jeremy Poynting Joanna Price Elizabeth Purdy Lyn Pykett

Isabel Quigly

Arthur Ravenscroft Sandra Ray John M. Reilly Jessica Reisman H. Winston Rhodes Alan Riach Karen Robertson Marilyn Rose Christine Roth S.A. Rowland Trevor Royle Alan Rubin Louis D. Rubin, Jr.

Geoff Sadler Hana Sambrook David Sanders Stewart Sanderson William J. Schafer Neil Schlager Lynda D. Schrecengost Roberta Schreyer Linda Semple Michele S. Shauf Alan R. Shucard Melissa Simpson Victoria A. Smallman Angela Smith Christopher Smith Curtis C. Smith Andy Solomon

Tabitha Sparks
Jane W. Stedman
Caroline Steemson
Mark Stein
Carol Simpson Stern
James R. Stevens
Brian Stonehill Victor Strandberg
J.R. Struthers
W.J. Stuckey

Eric Solomon

Maggi R. Sullivan Judith Summers Fraser Sutherland John Sutherland Dean Swinford Arlene Sykes

Shana Tacon

Sharon Talley
Anna-Marie Taylor
John Thieme
Roger Thompson
Drew Tidwell
Chris Tiffin
Philippa Toomey
Shirley Toulson
Nicolas Tredell
C.W. Truesdale
Richard Tuerk
Penny van Toorn

Aruna Vasudevan Thomas A. Vogler

Tobias Wachinger William Walsh Val Warner Diane Watson Harold H. Watts Perry D. Westbrook Leonard Wilcox Margaret Willy Janet Wilson Bill Witherup George Woodcock Tim Woods Michael Woolf J.J. Wylie

Leopoldo Y. Yabes

Steven Zani Heather Zwicker

LIST OF ENTRANTS

Arthur C. Clarke Chinua Achebe Doris Betts Peter Ackroyd Rachel Billington Austin C. Clarke William Cobb Glenda Adams Maeve Binchy Neil Bissoondath Andrei Codrescu Richard Adams Ama Ata Aidoo Clark Blaise Jonathan Coe Brian Aldiss Fred Bodsworth J. M. Coetzee James Aldridge Dermot Bolger Barry Cole Sherman Joseph Alexie Vance Bourjaily Isabel Colegate André Alexis John Bowen Hunt Collins Dorothy E. Allison George Bowering James Colvin Lisa Alther Edgar Box Shane Connaughton Elechi Amadi William Boyd Pat Conroy Martin Amis Clare Boylan David Cook Mulk Raj Anand T. Coraghessan Boyle William Cooper Rudolfo A. Anaya Edward P. Bradbury Robert Coover Barbara Anderson Malcolm Bradbury Douglas Coupland Jessica Anderson Ray Bradbury Peter Cowan I. N. C . Aniebo David Bradley William Trevor Cox Michael Anthony John Ed Bradley P. J. Coyne Ayi Kwei Armah Melvyn Bragg Jim Crace Jeannette Armstrong Sasthi Brata Harry Crews Michael Crichton

Hortense Calisher

Marion Campbell

Philip Callow

Henry Calvin

Curt Cannon

Peter Carey

R. V. Cassill

Brian Castro

David Caute

Alan Cheuse

Mark Childress

Carolyn Chute

Sandra Cisneros

Shimmer Chinodya

Frank Cauldwell

Jerome Charyn

Upamanyu Chatterjee

Thea Astley
André Brink
Margaret Atwood
Louis Auchincloss
Paul Auster
Anita Brookner
Rita Mae Brown

Rosellen Brown Murray Bail Wesley Brown Paul Bailey Frederick Buechner Beryl Bainbridge Lois McMaster Bujold Elliott Baker James Lee Burke J. G. Ballard Bonnie Burnard Russell Banks Alan Burns John Banville Janet Burroway Leland Bardwell Frederick Busch A. L. Barker Octavia Estelle Butler Pat Barker Robert Olen Butler, Jr. Julian Barnes

Wilton Barnhardt Andrea Barrett

Stan Barstow

John Barth Frederick Barthelme

Jonathan Baumbach
Richard Bausch

Nina Bawden
Gregory Dale Bear
Ann Beattie
Stephen Becker
Mary Beckett
Sybille Bedford
Madison Smartt Bell
Saul Bellow

Gregory Albert Benford

John Berger Thomas Berger David Dabydeen
Fred D'Aguiar
Blanche d'Alpuget
Edwidge Danticat
Lionel Davidson
Liam Davison
Jennifer Dawson
Louis de Bernières
Ralph de Boissière
Len Deighton
Samuel R. Delany

E. V. Cunningham

Michael Cunningham

Nicholas Franklin Delbanco

Don DeLillo Anita Desai Boman Desai Shashi Deshpande Joan Didion

Chitra Banerjee Divakaruni

Stephen Dixon
E. L. Doctorow
J. P. Donleavy
Ellen Douglas
Michael Douglas
Dale Sara Dowse
Roddy Doyle
Margaret Drabble
Robert Drewe
C. J. Driver
Marilyn Duckworth

Alan Duff

Maureen Duffy Elaine Dundy Nell Dunn

John Gregory Dunne Dorothy Dunnett Wilma Dykeman

Clyde Carlyle Edgerton Stevan Eldred-Grigg Janice Elliott

Alice Thomas Ellis Bret Easton Ellis Trey Ellis James Ellroy David Ely Buchi Emecheta Louise Erdrich Walter Ericson Ahmed Essop Percival L. Everett

Zoë Fairbairns Nuruddin Farah Beverley Farmer Howard Fast Sebastian Faulks Irvin Faust Elaine Feinstein Eva Figes Timothy Findley Tibor Fischer Thomas Flanagan Shelby Foote Richard Ford Margaret Forster Frederick Forsyth David Foster John Fowles Janet Frame Ronald Frame

Dick Francis

Michael Fravn

Gillian Freeman

Marilyn French

Kinky Friedman

Abby Frucht

Bruce Jay Friedman

Ernest J. Gaines Mavis Gallant Janice Galloway Kenneth Gangemi Cristina Garcia Alex Garland Helen Garner George Garrett William H. Gass William Gay

Maggie Gee

Maurice Gee Zulfikar Ghose Amitav Ghosh Kave Gibbons Graeme Gibson William Gibson Ellen Gilchrist Brian Glanville Douglas Glover Gail Godwin Herbert Gold

Nadine Gordimer Giles Gordon Mary Gordon Phyllis Fay Gotlieb Robert Gover Patricia Grace Winston Graham Shirley Ann Grau Alasdair Gray Stephen Gray Joanne Greenberg Kate Grenville John Grisham Winston Groom Doris Grumbach Albert Guerard

William Goldman

Allan Gurganis Abdulrazak S. Gurnah David Guterson

Romesh Gunesekera

Sunetra Gupta

Arthur Hailey Russell Haley James B. Hall Rodney Hall Marion Halligan Hugo Hamilton Jane Hamilton Clifford Hanley Barry Hannah Ezra Hannon Mark Harris Wilson Harris Jim Harrison

Elizabeth Harrower Veronica Hart Nicholas Hasluck Jon Hassler Marianne Hauser Shirley Hazzard Dermot Healy Roy A. K. Heath Ursula Hegi Mark Helprin Aidan Higgins

Tomson Highway

Oscar Hijuelos

Carol Hill Susan Hill Thomas Hinde Barry Hines Edward Hoagland Russell Hoban Jack Hodgins

Harry Summerfield Hoff Alice Hoffman Desmond Hogan Alan Hollinghurst Hugh Hood Christopher Hope Nick Hornby

Janette Turner Hospital Elizabeth Jane Howard Maureen Howard Jeffrey Hudson David Hughes Keri Hulme Emyr Humphreys Evan Hunter Kristin Hunter

Michael Ignatieff Witi Ihimaera David Ireland John Irving Kazuo Ishiguro Festus Iyayi

Mick Jackson Dan Jacobson Howard Jacobson

Kelvin Christopher James

P. D. James Tama Janowitz Gish Jen Robin Jenkins Ruth Prawer Jhabvala Charles Johnson Colin Johnson Denis Johnson Diane Johnson Stephanie Johnson Jennifer Johnston Elizabeth Jolley Gayl Jones Glyn Jones Gwyneth A. Jones Madison Jones Marion Patrick Jones Mervyn Jones Erica Jong Neil Jordan Ivar Jorgenson Arun Joshi Gabriel Josipovici

Ward Just

Johanna Kaplan Steve Katz Dan Kavanagh Jackie Kay Victor Kelleher William Melvin Kelley Maeve Kelly

James Kelman
Randall Kenan
Thomas Keneally
A. L. Kennedy
William Kennedy
Ken Kesey
Fiona Kidman
Benedict Kiely
Jamaica Kincaid
Francis King
Stephen King
Thomas King
Johanna Kingsley
Barbara Kingsolver

Maxine Hong Kingston W. P. Kinsella John Knowles Calvin M. Knox Elizabeth Knox C. J. Koch Joy Kogawa Bernard Kops William Kotzwinkle Robert Kroetsch Hanif Kureishi

George Lamming John Lange John le Carré Chang-rae Lee Sky Lee

Ursula K. Le Guin
Alan Lelchuk
Elmore Leonard
Doris Lessing
Jonathan Lethem
Ira Levin
Norman Levine
Catherine Lim
Penelope Lively
David Lodge
Earl Lovelace
Alison Lurie
Morris Lurie

Ann-Marie MacDonald Bernard MacLaverty David Madden Deirdre Madden Jamal Mahjoub Norman Mailer Clarence Major

David Malouf

Hilary Mantel Kamala Markandaya Wallace Markfield Daphne Marlatt Owen Marshall Paule Marshall Adam Mars-Jones

Adam Mars-Jones Richard Marsten Carole Maso Bobbie Ann Mason Allan Massie Hilary Masters Peter Mathers Harry Mathews Jack Matthews Peter Matthiessen Elizabeth Mavor William Maxwell Ed McBain

Patrick McCabe
Cormac McCarthy
Sue McCauley
Alice McDermott
Roger McDonald
Joseph McElroy
Ian McEwan
John McGahern
Patrick McGrath
Thomas McGuane, III

Terry McMillan Larry McMurtry James McNeish Candia McWilliam Gita Mehta

Jay McInerney

Pauline Melville Barbara Mertz John Metcalf Anne Michaels Barbara Michaels Leonard Michaels Stanley Middleton Alex Miller Steven Millhauser Susan Minot Mark Mirsky Rohinton Mistry Julian Mitchell Timothy Mo N. Scott Momaday Rick Moody

Frank Moorhouse Toni Morrison John Mortimer Nicholas Mosley Walter Mosley Mudrooroo

Bharati Mukherjee

Michael Moorcock

Lorrie Moore

Val Mulkerns John Munonye Alice Munro Gerald Murnane Albert L. Murray

Chaman Nahal
V. S. Naipaul
R. K. Narayan
Mudrooroo Narogin
Gloria Naylor
Njabulo S. Ndebele
Jay Neugeboren
Ngugi wa Thiong'o
Eilis Ní Dhuibhne
Lawrence Norfolk
Howard A. Norman
Robert Nye

Joyce Carol Oates
Edna O'Brien
Tim O'Brien
Joseph O'Connor
Julia O'Faolain
Andrew O'Hagan
Ben Okri
Tillie Olsen
Stewart O'Nan
Michael Ondaatje
David Osborne
Vincent O'Sullivan
Cynthia Ozick

Grace Paley Charles Palliser Tim Parks Anne Perry Kathrin Perutz Jerzy Peterkiewicz Elizabeth Peters Harry Mark Petrakis Caryl Phillips Jayne Anne Phillips Mike Phillips Marge Piercy David Plante James Plunkett Richard Powers David Pownall Terry Pratchett Revnolds Price Richard Price David Profumo E. Annie Proulx James Purdy Thomas Pynchon

Anne Rampling Robert Randall Frederic Raphael Piers Paul Read
John Rechy
Ishmael Reed
Desmond Reid
Ruth Rendell
Anne Rice
David Richards
Mordecai Richler
Tom Robbins
Michèle Roberts
Kim Stanley Robinson
Marilynne Robinson

Peter Robinson
Mary Robison
Daphne Rooke
A. N. Roquelaure
Judith Rossner
Philip Roth
Arundhati Roy
Bernice Rubens
Jane Rule
Michael Rumaker
Salman Rushdie
Joanna Russ

Nayantara Sahgal Lisa St. Aubin de Teran Garth St. Omer J. D. Salinger James Sallis Ferrol Sams, Jr. Thomas Savage

Susan Fromberg Schaeffer

Budd Schulberg
Rosie Scott
I. Allan Sealy
Carolyn See
Hubert Selby, Jr.
Will Self
Shyam Selvadurai
Vikram Seth
Mary Lee Settle
Jeff Shaara
Maurice Shadbolt
Tom Sharpe
Wilfrid Sheed

Carol Shields Anita Shreve Bapsi Sidhwa Clancy Sigal Leslie Marmon Silko Robert Silverberg Mona Simpson Andrew Sinclair Khushwant Singh F. Sionil Jose Carolyn Slaughter

Carolyn Slaughter
Jane Smiley
Emma Smith
Lee Smith
Ray Smith
Rosamond Smith

Jane Somers Susan Sontag Gilbert Sorrentino

Wole Sovinka

Muriel Spark
Alan Spence
Colin Spencer
Elizabeth Spencer
C. K. Stead
John Steffler
Michael Stephens
Neal Stephenson
Bruce Sterling
Daniel Stern
Richard G. Stern
Robert Stone
Randolph Stow
Susan Straight

Ronald Sukenick Susan Swan Graham Swift

William Styron

Amy Tan
Emma Tennant
Shashi Tharoor
Alexander Theroux
Paul Theroux
Audrey Thomas
D. M. Thomas
Lawrence Thornton
Colin Thubron
Gillian Tindall
Peter Tinniswood
Miriam Tlali
Colm Toíbín
Barbara Trapido

Barbara Trapido Rose Tremain William Trevor Joanna Trollope Frank Tuohy Anne Tyler Barry Unsworth John Updike Edward Upward

Guy Vanderhaeghe Peter Vansittart M. G. Vassanji Gore Vidal Helena Maria Viramontes

Noel Virtue William T. Vollmann Kurt Vonnegut, Jr.

David Wagoner Dan Wakefield Alice Walker David Foster Wallace Marina Warner Keith Waterhouse David Watmough James Welch Fay Weldon Irvine Welsh Eudora Welty Albert Wendt Mary Wesley Anthony C. West Paul West William Wharton

Edmund Valentine White, III John Edgar Wideman

Rudy Wiebe
Allen Wier
Marianne Wiggins
Michael Wilding
Damien Wilkins
John A. Williams
Connie Willis
A. N. Wilson
Jeanette Winterson
Tim Winton
Larry Woiwode
Tom Wolfe
Tobias Wolff
Charles Wright

James Yaffe Lois-Ann Yamanaka Helen Yglesias Al Young Sol Yurick

Rudolph Wurlitzer

ACHEBE, Chinua

Nationality: Nigerian. Born: Albert Chinualumogu in Ogidi, 16 November 1930. Education: Government College, Umuahia, 1944–47; University College, Ibadan, 1948–53, B.A. (London) 1953. Family: Married Christiana Chinwe Okoli in 1961; two sons and two daughters. Career: Talks producer, Lagos, 1954-57, controller, Enugu, 1958-61, and director, Voice of Nigeria, Lagos, 1961-66, Nigerian Broadcasting Corporation; chairman, Citadel Books Ltd., Enugu, 1967. Senior research fellow, 1967–73, professor of English, 1973–81, and since 1984 professor emeritus, University of Nigeria, Nsukka. Visiting professor, 1972-75, and Fulbright Professor, 1987-88, University of Massachusetts, Amherst; visiting professor, University of Connecticut, Storrs, 1975–76; Regents' Lecturer, University of California, Los Angeles, 1984; Visiting Distinguished Professor of English, City College, New York, 1989, visiting professor, Stanford University, 1990. Charles P. Stevenson Professor of Literature, Bard College. Founding editor, Heinemann African Writers series, 1962–72 and since 1970 director, Heinemann Educational Books (Nigeria) Ltd., and Nwankwo-Ifejika Ltd. (later Nwamife), publishers, Enugu; since 1971 editor, Okike: An African Journal of New Writing, Nsukka; since 1983 governor, Newsconcern International Foundation, London; since 1984 founder and publisher, Uwa Ndi Igbo: A Bilingual Journal of Igbo Life and Arts. Since 1998 goodwill ambassador, United Nations Population Fund. Awards: Margaret Wrong Memorial prize, 1959; Nigerian National trophy, 1960; Rockefeller fellowship, 1960; Unesco fellowship, 1963; Jock Campbell award (New Statesman), 1965; Commonwealth Poetry prize, 1973; Neil Gunn International fellowship, 1974; Lotus award for Afro-Asian writers, 1975; Nigerian National Merit award, 1979; Commonwealth Foundation award, 1984. Litt.D.: Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire, 1972; University of Southampton, 1975; University of Ife, 1978; University of Nigeria, 1981; University of Kent, Canterbury, 1982; University of Guelph, Ontario, 1984; Mount Allison University, Sackville, New Brunswick, 1984; Franklin Pierce College, Rindge, New Hampshire, 1985; University of Ibadan, 1989; Skidmore College, Saratoga Springs, New York, 1990; D. Univ.: University of Stirling, 1975; Open University, Milton Keynes, Buckinghamshire, 1989; LL.D.: University of Prince Edward Island, Charlottetown, 1976; D.H.L.: University of Massachusetts, 1977; Westfield College, London, 1989; Georgetown University, Washington, D.C., 1990; doctor of letters, honoris causa, Trinity College, Connecticut, 1999. Honorary Fellow, Modern Language Association (USA), 1975; member, Order of the Federal Republic of Nigeria, 1979; Honorary Member, American Academy, 1982; Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1983. Member: University of Lagos Council, 1966; chairman, Society of Nigerian Authors, 1966, and Association of Nigerian Authors, 1982–86; member, Anambra State Arts Council, 1977-79; Pro-Chancellor and Chairman of Council, Anambra State University of Technology, Enugu, 1986-88. Since 1981 member of the Executive Committee, Commonwealth Arts Organization, London; since 1983 member, International Social Prospects Academy, Geneva; since 1984 director, Okike Arts Center, Nsukka. Served on diplomatic missions for Biafra during Nigerian Civil War, 1967–69; deputy national president, People's Redemption Party, 1983. Address: P.O. Box 53, University of Nigeria, Nsukka, Anambra State, Nigeria.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Things Fall Apart. London, Heinemann, 1958; New York, McDowell Obolensky, 1959; introduction by Kwame Anthony Appiah, New York, Knopf, 1992.

No Longer at Ease. London, Heinemann, 1960; New York, Obolensky, 1961.

Arrow of God. London, Heinemann, 1964; New York, Day, 1967.A Man of the People. London, Heinemann, and New York, Day, 1966.Anthills of the Savannah. London, Heinemann, 1987; New York, Doubleday, 1988.

The African Trilogy. London, Picador, 1988.

Short Stories

The Sacrificial Egg and Other Stories. Onitsha, Etudo, 1962. Girls at War. London, Heinemann, 1972; New York, Doubleday, 1973.

Poetry

Beware, Soul-Brother and Other Poems. Enugu, Nwankwo-Ifejika, 1971; revised edition, Enugu, Nwamife, and London, Heinemann, 1972; revised edition, as Christmas in Biafra and Other Poems, New York, Doubleday, 1973.

Another Africa (essay and poems), photographs by Robert Lyons. New York, Anchor Books, 1998.

Other (for children)

Chike and the River. London and New York, Cambridge University Press, 1966.

How the Leopard Got His Claws, with John Iroaganachi. Enugu, Nwamife, 1972; New York, Third Press, 1973.

The Flute. Enugu, Fourth Dimension, 1977.

The Drum. Enugu, Fourth Dimension, 1977.

Other

Morning Yet on Creation Day: Essays. London, Heinemann, and New York, Doubleday, 1975.

In Person: Achebe, Awoonor, and Soyinka at the University of Washington. Seattle, University of Washington African Studies Program, 1975.

The Trouble with Nigeria. Enugu, Fourth Dimension, 1983; London, Heinemann, 1984.

The World of the Ogbanje. Enugu, Fourth Dimension, 1986.

Hopes and Impediments: Selected Essays 1965–1987. London, Heinemann, 1988; New York, Doubleday, 1990.

The University and the Leadership Factor in Nigerian Politics. Enugu, ABIC, 1988.

A Tribute to James Baldwin. Amherst, University of Massachusetts Press, 1989.

The Voter, adapted by Ivan Vladislavic. Johannesburg, South Africa, Viva Books, 1996.

Home and Exile. New York, Oxford University Press, 2000.

Contributor, The South Wind and the Sun, edited by Kate Turkington. Johannesburg, South Africa, Thorold's Africana Books, 1996.

Contributor, Order and Chaos. Chicago, Great Books Foundation, 1997.

Editor, The Insider: Stories of War and Peace from Nigeria. Enugu, Nwankwo-Ifejika, and Chatham, New Jersey, Chatham Booksellers, 1971.

Editor, with Jomo Kenyatta and Amos Tutuola, Winds of Change: Modern Stories from Black Africa. London, Longman, 1977.

Editor, with Dubem Okafor, Don't Let Him Die: An Anthology of Memorial Poems for Christopher Okigbo. Enugu, Fourth Dimension, 1978.

Editor with C.L. Innes, African Short Stories. London, Heinemann, 1985.

Editor, Beyond Hunger in Africa: Conventional Wisdom and a Vision of Africa in 2057. Nairobi, Heinemann Kenya, and London, Currey, 1990.

*

Bibliography: In Africana Library Journal (New York), Spring 1970; Chinua Achebe: A Bibliography by B.M. Okpu, Lagos, Libriservice, 1984; Chinua Achebe by C.L. Innes, Cambridge University Press, 1990.

Critical Studies: The Novels of Chinua Achebe by G.D. Killam, London, Heinemann, and New York, Africana, 1969, revised edition, as The Writings of Chinua Achebe, Heinemann, 1977; Chinua Achebe by Arthur Ravenscroft, London, Longman, 1969, revised edition, 1977; Chinua Achebe by David Carroll, New York, Twayne, 1970, revised edition, London, Macmillan, 1980, 1990; Chinua Achebe by Kate Turkington, London, Arnold, 1977; Critical Perspectives on Chinua Achebe edited by Bernth Lindfors and C.L. Innes, London, Heimemann, and Washington, D.C., Three Continents Press, 1978; Achebe's World: The Historical and Cultural Context of the Novels of Chinua Achebe by Robert M. Wren, Washington, D.C., Three Continents Press, 1980, London, Longman, 1981; The Four Novels of Chinua Achebe: A Critical Study by Benedict C. Njoku, Bern, Switzerland, Lang, 1984; The Traditional Religion and Its Encounter with Christianity in Achebe's Novels by E.M. Okoye, Bern, Switzerland, Lang, 1987; Chinua Achebe by C.L. Innes, Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1990; Reading Chinua Achebe: Language and Ideology in Fiction by Simon Gikandi, London, Currey, 1991; Approaches to Teaching Achebe's "Things Fall Apart" edited by Bernth Lindfors, New York, Modern Language Association of America, 1991; Chinua Achebe: A Celebration edited by Kirsten Holst Petersen and Anna Rutherford, Oxford, England, Heinemann, 1991; Chinua Achebe: New Perspectives by Umela Ojinmah, Ibadan, Spectrum, 1991; Reading Chinua Achebe: Language and Ideology in Fiction by Simon Gikandi, London, Currey, 1991; Gods, Oracles and Divination by Kalu Ogbaa, Trenton, N.J., Africa World Press, 1992; Art, Rebellion and Redemption by Romanus Okey Muonaka, New York, Lang, 1993; South Asian Responses to Chinua Achebe edited by Bernth Lindfors and Bala Kothandaraman, New Delhi, Prestige Books International, 1993; Chinua Achebe, the Importance of Stories (videocassette), 1996; International Symposium for Chinua Achebe's 60th Birthday. Ibadan, Nigeria, Heinemann Educational Books, 1996; Colonial and Post-Colonial Discourse in the Novels of Yom Sangsop, Chinua Achebe, and Salman Rushdie by Soonsik Kim, New York, P. Lang, 1996; Form and Technique in the African Novel by Olawale Awosika, Ibadan, Nigeria, Sam Bookman, 1997; Chinua Achebe: A Biography by Ezenwa-Ohaeto, Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1997; Conversations with Chinua Achebe edited by Bernth Lindfors, Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1997; A Teacher's Guide to African Narratives by Sara Tallis O'Brien, Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Heinemann, 1998.

Chinua Achebe comments:

I am a political writer. My politics is concerned with universal human communication across racial and cultural boundaries as a means of fostering respect for all people. Such respect can issue only from understanding. So my primary concern is with clearing the channels of communication in my own neighborhood by hacking away at the thickets that choke them.

Africa's meeting with Europe must be accounted a terrible disaster in this matter of human understanding and respect. The nature of the meeting precluded any warmth of friendship. First Europe was an enslaver; then a colonizer. In either role she had no need and made little effort to understand or appreciate Africa; indeed she easily convinced herself that there was nothing there to justify the effort. Today our world is still bedeviled by the consequences of that cataclysmic encounter.

I was born into the colonial era, grew up in the heady years of nationalist protest and witnessed Africa's resumption of independence. (It was not, however, the same Africa which originally lost her freedom that now retained it, but a different Africa created in the image of Europe—but that's another story.) So I have seen in my not very long lifetime three major eras in precipitate succession, leaving us somewhat dazed. My response as a writer has been to try to keep pace with these torrential changes. First I had to tell Europe that the arrogance on which she sought to excuse her pillage of Africa, i.e., that Africa was the Primordial Void, was sheer humbug; that Africa had a history, a religion, a civilization. We reconstructed this history and civilization and displayed it to challenge the stereotype and the cliché. Actually it was not to Europe alone that I spoke. I spoke also to that part of ourselves that had come to accept Europe's opinion of us. And I was not alone nor even the first.

But the gauntlet had barely left our hands when a new historic phase broke on us. Europe conceded independence to us and we promptly began to misuse it, or rather those leaders to whom we entrusted the wielding of our new power and opportunity did. So we got mad at them and came out brandishing novels of disenchantment. Actually we had all been duped. No independence was given—it was never given but taken, anyway. Europe had only made a tactical withdrawal on the political front and while we sang our anthem and unfurled our flag she was securing her iron grip behind us in the economic field. And our leaders in whose faces we hurled our disenchantment neither saw nor heard because they were not leaders at all but marionettes.

So the problem remains for Africa, for black people, for all deprived peoples and for the world. And so for the writer, for he is like the puppy in our proverb: that stagnant water in the potsherd is for none other but him. As long as one people sit on another and are deaf to their cry, so long will understanding and peace elude all of us.

* * *

Chinua Achebe established his reputation with Things Fall Apart, one of the first novels to be published in post-independence Africa. It was admired for many reasons, notably the tragic profundity of its theme and the insights it offered on traditional Ibo life. Western critics also approved of Achebe's acceptance of the formal conventions of the genre even while he proved that the English language could be modified to express the very different African cultural context. This book became both archetype and classic, and many budding authors have attempted to emulate Achebe without demonstrating his competence. Things Fall Apart has been translated into many languages and is an established text in schools. It has sustained extensive critical examination and yet its poignant story still retains its capacity to move the reader.

Achebe's declared intention was to provide evidence that traditional African life was not the primitive barbarism that was the common judgment of the colonialists. Set in the early period of the initial British intrusion into Nigeria, the novel shows a society which, if not perfect, had structure and dignity; where human relations had order and security. Into this world came the foreigner and "things fall apart." The title, taken from Yeats, makes a subtle comment on the theme, because it expresses some degree of inevitability rather than calculated cause. Perhaps neither side could foresee the consequences of actions which seemed entirely reasonable within their own context. Though setting straight the record, this is not an anti-colonialist novel in the simplistic sense. Achebe discerns a terrifying truth, that when powerful worlds clash, even the best of men are defeated and only the accommodators prosper. Okonkwo exemplifies all the virtues of his people, but he is too harsh and inflexible to tolerate the inescapable changes. His friend Obierika is a far weaker but more sensible person. He survives, like others who yield their honor and adapt, preferring prosperity at the cost of their heritage. While understanding that this is a reasonable decision, which in time created the society which Achebe inherits, he clearly indicates where honor rests. Okonkwo is "the greatest man."

Three further novels form a tetralogy which covers Ibo history from the first arrival of the British to the violent coup of 1966. Though third to be published, it is Arrow of God which carries on the historical sequence. Its theme is similar to that of Things Fall Apart. Ezeulu, a distinguished village man, this time a high priest, finds himself in conflict with the now established British administration, a conflict activated as much by ignorance as malice. Angered by imprisonment and the failure of his people to assist him, Ezeulu imposes harsh penalties upon them. At last their misery is so acute they turn to the Christian missionaries who are preaching a less oppressive religion. With a terrible irony the priest's fierce battle to sustain the tribal god causes his destruction. Again there is the depiction of strength, admirable in itself, but too harsh to see the advantage and necessity of compromise. The man who most exemplifies traditional virtues, just like Okonkwo, brings about their destruction along with his own. In a further plot twist, Ezeulu sends his son to learn the ways of the white missionaries. He does not anticipate the conversion of the boy who then denies his heritage and begins to exemplify the cultural ambivalence and generational opposition which education inescapably brings.

The other two novels examine this dualistic situation. The revealing title of No Longer at Ease comes from T.S. Eliott. Obi, a bright, eager young man, is sent to England to study and returns to the luxury of the high Civil Service appointment previously reserved for the British. He is confident and optimistic, feeling he represents the hopes for a better Nigeria which will flourish under the direction of this new class of youthful, educated, and therefore honest and efficient administrators. In fact his position imposes peculiar strains. A salary, huge by village standards, proves insufficient to live the European life expected of him. His indifference, even scorn, of the values of his tradition, learned during his time in England, offends his people who had funded him. Obi is exposed as an alien and becomes uncomfortable and ineffective in both worlds. He drifts into taking bribes and is soon as corrupt as those he used to despise. He is an inept crook, however, and is charged and imprisoned. At one level this is a depressing tale. If someone as decent as Obi succumbs, can anyone succeed in improving conditions in Nigeria? The cynical colonial characters express only passing surprise, gloating to find their prejudice confirmed: "All Africans are corrupt." Achebe has something much deeper to communicate. Given this history and these conditions, how is it possible for even the idealist to maintain his integrity? In the final analysis when the struggle with the system destroys even the best, who shall be blamed? It is a contemporary application of the issue raised in the two historical novels.

The situation in A Man of the People is even more depressing. It reflects the terrible political deterioration which Nigeria has suffered since independence. "The Man," is Nanga, a brutally corrupt politician who nevertheless manages to remain both popular and successful. The novel examines this disastrous paradox. The term "man of the people' seems to indicate an admirable figure. Then, as Nanga's vile deeds are revealed, the reader reverses his judgment. How can a crook be "of the people?" In an ending of shattering pessimism, Achebe seems to accept that people as greedy and immoral as these deserve such a man who does nothing more than exploit their own similar values; envy not accusation motivates the voters. The dedicated intellectual, Odili, is drawn not as the hero come to redeem his people, but as an arrogant and incompetent fool. His ideas are far more remote from the people's than Nanga's. Corruption they understand, merely wishing to share in it; idealism seems absurd and irrelevant. Naively unpolitical Odili is defeated and in the dismal conclusion makes off with the funds committed to his election campaign, justifying his theft with typical intellectual rationalizations. The nation falls into chaotic violence.

Achebe's pessimism was prescient. Social cohesion in Nigeria disintegrated. When the disastrous civil war broke out he was a prominent participant on the Biafran side. These efforts so preoccupied him and induced so deep a discouragement that since 1966 his output has been slender. From the battle came some short stories which realistically depicted the sufferings—and the continuing corruption—within the cause to which he had dedicated himself with such idealism and hope. His most poignant comments on the war are in the poems of Beware, Soul-Brother.

In 1987 a new novel appeared. Anthills of the Savannah addresses the same themes. The decades of independence have brought only minimal reasons for hope. Ruling governments have oscillated between corrupt citizens and violent army generals. For the first time Achebe chooses to disguise the setting by inventing a fictional state, Kangan. The rulers and their practices are closely modeled on the actual atrocities of Amin's Uganda. This may be intended to universalize the African situation, or indicate that Achebe can no longer bear to contemplate directly the misery to which his own country has come. But there are some flickers of hope. Interestingly enough, it is the female characters who display strength and assurance through the corruption and violence.

Perhaps Achebe has begun to lose confidence in the generation which he has served. Nevertheless, his early quartet stands as a masterly achievement that will inform generations of readers of the disasters colonialism brought to Africa—sometimes with benign intentions. The tragic realization in the books of the human misery that results from massive social and economic change brings to the mind the Wessex novels of Hardy.

-John Povey

ACKROYD, Peter

Nationality: British. Born: London, 5 October 1949. Education: St. Benedict's, Ealing, 1960–67; Clare College, Cambridge, 1968–71; Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut (Mellon fellow), 1971–73. Career: Literary editor, 1973–77, and joint managing editor, 1978–81, the Spectator, London; chief book reviewer, the Times, London, from 1986; editor, president, and CEO, Tuttle Publishing; editor, Element Books, 1996–97, CEO, 1997–99. Lives in London. Awards: Maugham award, 1984; Whitbread award, for biography, 1985, for fiction, 1986; Royal Society of Literature Heinemann award, for non-fiction, 1985; Guardian Fiction prize, 1985. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1984. H.D.L.: Exeter University, 1993. Agent: Anthony Sheil Associates, 43 Doughty Street, London WC1N 2LF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Great Fire of London. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1982; Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1988.

The Last Testament of Oscar Wilde. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Harper, 1983.

Hawksmoor. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1985; New York, Harper, 1986

Chatterton. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1987; New York, Grove Press, 1988.

First Light. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Grove Weidenfeld, 1989.

English Music. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1991; New York, Knopf,

The House of Doctor Dee. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1993.

Dan Lemo and the Limehouse Golem. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1994; as The Trial of Elizabeth Cree, New York, Doubleday, 1995.

Blake. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1995; New York, Knopf, 1996. Dan Leno and the Limehouse Golem. London, Minerva, 1995.

The Plato Papers: A Prophecy. New York, Doubleday/Nan A. Talese, 2000.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Inheritance," in London Tales, edited by Julian Evans. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1983.
- "Ringing in the Good News," in The Times (London), 24 December 1985.

Poetry

London Lickpenny. London, Ferry Press, 1973.

Country Life. London, Ferry Press, 1978.

The Diversions of Purley and Other Poems. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1987.

Other

Notes for a New Culture: An Essay on Modernism. London, Vision Press, and New York, Barnes and Noble, 1976.

Dressing Up: Transvestism and Drag: The History of an Obsession.

London, Thames and Hudson, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1979

Ezra Pound and His World. London, Thames and Hudson, and New York, Scribner, 1981.

T.S. Eliot (biography). London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1984.

Dickens (biography). London, Sinclair Stevenson, and New York, Harper Collins, 1990.

The Life of Thomas More. London, Chatto and Windus, 1998.

Foreword, Thomas Chatterton and Romantic Culture, edited by Nick Groom. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1999.

Editor, PEN New Fiction. London, Quartet, 1984.

Editor, The Picture of Dorian Gray, by Oscar Wilde. London, Penguin, 1985.

Editor, Dickens' London: An Imaginative Vision. London, Headline, 1987.

* * *

By the time Peter Ackroyd published his first novel in 1982, he was already well known in the literary world as a poet, critic, literary theorist, and cultural historian. Since his début as a novelist he has further enhanced his reputation as a non-fiction writer, first with his award-winning biography of T.S. Eliot and more recently with his imaginatively daring biographies of Charles Dickens, William Blake, and Thomas More. Before the appearance of his first novel, it seemed that his writing career was likely to develop in the fields of literary criticism and biography, but with ten novels in quick succession between 1982 and 1999 he has established himself as one of the most gifted and imaginative English novelists to have emerged during the recent past.

Ackroyd's polemical book, Notes for a New Culture, contains a relentless attack on the parochialism and impoverishment of contemporary English culture, especially literature and the academic literary establishment; he makes clear his intellectual allegiance to Continental (primarily French and German) models and theories descending from such figures as de Sade, Nietzsche, Mallarmé, and Husserl, in opposition to what he sees as the stultifying tradition of empiricism, positivism, and humanism still dominant in English artistic and intellectual life. He insists on the autonomy and formal absoluteness of language, on the way in which language constitutes meaning only within itself, and he therefore challenges the philosophical basis of orthodox realistic fiction, regarding its conventions as no longer having any validity for the modern writer. As might be expected, his novels are not conventionally realistic, but his innovative approach to fiction has not led him into the cul-de-sacs of hyper-selfconscious experimentalism or navel-gazing phenomenology. On the contrary, each novel possesses a strong narrative drive and is highly readable, demonstrating that Ackroyd has not felt the need to reject storytelling in order to develop his own type of literary fiction.

There is an element of deception in the title of Ackroyd's novels, especially as the first four, The Great Fire of London, The Last Testament of Oscar Wilde, Hawksmoor, and Chatterton could be the titles of historical or biographical studies rather than works of fiction. The fire in The Great Fire of London is not that of 1666, but an apocalyptic fictional one that begins with the burning of a film set for a screen adaptation of Little Dorrit. As if to substantiate his theoretical point that writing emerges from other writing rather than from life, Ackroyd draws on Dickens's novel in many ways, thus emphasizing the fictionality of his own fictional world, however realistic it may appear in some respects. Ackroyd's novel is centrally concerned with the perpetual human activity of creating fictions in life as well as in art. The short opening section of The Great Fire of London, "the story so far," outlines the plot of Little Dorrit and ends: "although it could not be described as a true story, certain events have certain consequences"—including, of course, the writing of Ackroyd's novel. Dickens's eponymous heroine and the novel itself feature prominently in the minds of many of Ackroyd's characters, including Spenser Spender (a filmmaker, with two poets' names who is determined to put the novel on the screen), Rowan Phillips (a Cambridge don currently working on Dickens), and Audrey Skelton (a telephone operator who is possessed by the spirit of Little Dorrit during a séance). The setting of much of Little Dorrit, the Marshalsea Prison, also provides a link between the two novels because its site is visited by several of Ackroyd's characters. With its panorama of London in the 1980s from left-wing activists to gay bars, The Great Fire of London is at least as much a London novel as Little Dorrit. Ackroyd's narrative structure, in which several strands begin in parallel and gradually intertwine and coalesce, is itself derived from Dickens's methods and techniques, especially in his later novels such as Little Dorrit. By using one of the greatest of English novels as his point of departure, Ackroyd inevitably takes the risk of being unflatteringly compared with Dickens, but The Great Fire of London must be taken on its own terms, not Dickens's, and as such it is an exuberant, inventive, and accomplished piece of writing.

Ackroyd's second novel draws its inspiration from the life of an important late Victorian writer. The Last Testament of Oscar Wilde is the testament that Wilde himself did not write but that Ackroyd has written for him in the form of a journal-cum-memoir covering that last few months of Wilde's life in Paris in 1900. The book therefore purports to be Wilde's autobiographical confessions in the tradition of writing that connects St. Augustine with Rousseau and De Quincey. To write The Last Testament of Oscar Wilde Ackroyd must have steeped himself in Wilde's biography as well as his writing, and presumably could have written yet another study of the man and his work. Instead Ackroyd has chosen the freedom of fiction to enter imaginatively into Wilde's mind as he lives through his last weeks in France and simultaneously offers an explanation of his famous rise and infamous fall. The obvious danger with a novel of this type, not only about an historical personage but written from his point of view, is that readers will be tempted to compare the "facts" with the fictional re-creation, but this would be to approach the novel in far too literal-minded a way. As a fictional character, Ackroyd's Wilde cannot be the historical Wilde: for all its "factual" content, The Last Testament of Oscar Wilde is primarily a work of the imagination about the relationship between the artist and the world and about the difference between fictional and historical truth.

The skill with which Ackroyd creates a style and tone of voice for his narrator and sustains it throughout The Last Testament of Oscar Wilde is a remarkable technical achievement, but it pales beside the ludic and verbal virtuosity of Hawksmoor, in which he plays far more elaborate games with fact and fiction, history and imagination. The title is the name of Sir Christopher Wren's most distinguished assistant, Nicholas Hawksmoor, the great architect responsible for some of London's finest churches (referred to in The Great Fire of London), but in the novel these churches are attributed to Nicholas Dyer while Hawksmoor himself is a modern Detective Chief Superintendent investigating a series of murders in the East End. Although Hawksmoor contains characters who belong to history and draws heavily on various historical sources, it is not an historical novel in the usual sense; indeed, it radically subverts the conventions of historical fiction. In a concluding note Ackryod states that "this version of history is my own invention" and that "any relation to real people, either living or dead, is entirely coincidental." The six oddnumbered chapters in a book in which numerology plays a significant part are set in the early 18th century and are narrated by Dyer in a contemporary idiom, complete with old spellings and the initial capitalization of many words. Although a builder of churches, Dyer is secretly a Satanist and devotee of black magic, as well as being an opponent of the new scientific empiricism of the Royal Society. He dedicates his buildings to the dark powers by ensuring a human sacrifice in connection with each one. The six even-numbered chapters, set two and a half centuries later, provide a third-person narration of the bizarre and puzzling killings associated with the same churches and of Hawksmoor's attempt to track down the culprit. Ackroyd creates mystery and suspense, but unlike orthodox writers of crime and detection he does not provide a solution. Despite the time shift between the two narratives, they flow smoothly into each other and run strictly in parallel. The last words of the first chapter are also the first words of the second chapter. For example, the name of Dyer's first sacrificial victim is the same as that of the first person murdered in the twentieth-century narrative. Time dissolves so that the modern policeman is, in a sense, investigating crimes of the past. One of Ackroyd's central concerns is the human continuity associated with place, specifically the East End of London, in spite of all the changes wrought by the passage of time. Hawksmoor is as multi-layered as the archaeological heritage beneath the baroque churches built by Dyer. The dazzling erudition and ingenuity of Ackroyd's third novel bring to mind such authors as Borges, Nabokov, Pynchon, and Eco without seeming derivative in the pejorative sense.

Like The Last Testament of Oscar Wilde, Chatterton fictionalises the last part of an important literary figure's life, but in other respects, especially its handling of time and form, this novel is much closer to Hawksmoor, and is equally rich in internal echoes and cross-references. Like Ackroyd himself, the "marvellous boy" Thomas Chatterton was a master of pastiche and "faking," and it is easy to understand why Ackroyd should have been attracted by the fictional, rather than the biographical, possibilities offered by this extraordinary eighteenth-century poet. Chatterton committed suicide in 1770 while still in his teens, and for his Romantic successors his bizarre and tragic death ensured his status as a martyr in the cause of Art and Poetry. At a time when there was a great revival of interest in the Middle Ages, Chatterton was one of several poets who adopted a medieval style and presented their literary pastiches not as "imitations" but as authentic poetry of the past which they had unearthed. Chatterton attributed his "Rowley" poems to a fifteenth-century monk. However only some sections of the novel are set in the eighteenth century, with Chatterton either speaking in his own voice or being described. Much of the novel concerns a modern and frequently comic quest by a young poet and a much older woman novelist to discover the truth about Chatterton's death. An eighteenth-century manuscript provides these literary detectives with clues suggesting that Chatterton's suicide was itself faked and that he survived under another name. Interwoven with the eighteenth-century and twentieth-century narratives are sections set in Victorian England dealing with Henry Wallis's famous and highly romanticised painting of Chatterton's death (1856), for which the model was George Meredith, then himself a young poet. In this intricately structured novel about the reality of literature and art and the fictionality of reality, Ackroyd continues to explore the main themes of Hawksmoor, but the pervasive issues of plagiarism and faking focus particular attention on the ambiguity of art ("a lie that tells the truth") and its relationship with life, which is no less ambiguous.

Ackroyd's 1989 novel, First Light, is his longest and arguably his most ambitious, but after Hawksmoor and Chatterton it seems disappointing. This is not because First Light is any less readable then its two predecessors. Again there is a mystery to be investigated—an archaeological one-and this provides a strong narrative drive. The problem arises from the task Ackroyd sets himself—to resuscitate pastoral romance by writing a modern version of it. Iris Murdoch is another writer who has attempted to revivify pastoral and romance, and First Light is more Murdochian than Ackroyd's earlier novels, but both novelists experience considerable difficulty in reconciling pastoral conventions with the contemporary world without being fey. The excavation of a Neolithic passage grave in a rural backwater of the West Country-indeed of Hardy's Wessex-is what brings a fairly large and diverse cast of characters together in a lavishly textured story of intrigue, comedy, and pathos. A further dimension is added by the astronomical investigation of a giant star at a nearby observatory, which parallels the archaeological probe into the past. Literary allusions, especially to Hardy's fiction, abound in Ackroyd's imaginative exploration of time, history, space, and landscape, yet the total effect is more precious and etiolated than in the two city novels that preceded First Light.

Ackroyd has said that he is not interested in realism in the novel, and has further developed in his next two novels, English Music and The House of Doctor Dee, a genre in which fact and fiction are equally intertwined. This choice suggests that the traditional confines of fiction are inadequate to express what Ackroyd wants to say. In both novels Ackroyd has incorporated historically "dead" people, who talk to the living fictional characters with the purpose of giving meaning to some quest of his "living" characters. As a writer who particularly projects what he has to say through other voices, he has been likened to a ventriloquist, or a "polyquilivist." The Music of England refers to composed music, but also to landmarks in the whole of English literature, painting, and architecture. The novel provides an idiosyncratic survey of these arts, brought together in a total harmony through the imagination of Timothy Harcombe, an old bachelor, who recalls his boyhood life in the early 1920s. At night in alternating chapters, Timothy in either sleep or dream or trance, talks to historical and fictional characters and interacts with them as real people. The historical figures represent an unbroken link in "the great tradition" in English artistic creativity. Blake, for example, has him "write" a Song of Albion, naming English poets up to the end of the nineteenth century who have been conscious of this English heritage. Ackroyd's choice of those who defend the ancient springs is of course a subjective one, and few would include the very minor Ernest Dowson, nor really expect Blake (if he could have read him) to admire him at all.

Pastiche is again a strong feature in The House of Doctor Dee, set, like English Music, in Clerkenwell, London, where the area is at least as important as the characters. At times Ackroyd seems to have made it more so, letting the atmosphere of shady back streets block the light that would develop his characters more fully. The discovery by Matthew Palmer, a historical researcher, that a house he has inherited from his father once belonged to the Elizabethan astrologer, Dr. John Dee, is only the loose framework of the novel. Yet the framework, as in all Ackroyd's novels, is not limited to a simple structure or time scale and depends on a cumulative effect of rapid change of scene, period, and minutiae of often apparently irrelevant detail for the total effect. It is the means for informing the reader, amongst much else, about Dr. Dee, black magic, and Palmer's father, who it transpires had a sexual relationship with a transvestite. Matthew as a character hardly matters, but what he explores does.

Dan Lemo and the Limehouse Golem was publicised as a departure for Ackroyd and described by the publisher as "a groundbreaking commercial entertainment." If it is taken at face value as an imitation of the Victorian crime novel, it indeed succeeds very well, with its search for the perpetrator of horrifically detailed serial killings. Inexact clues point suspicion at all of the main characters, but deliberately Ackroyd provides no solution. Many of the characters are not what they seem to be and have double identities. Lambeth Lizzie, hanged for the murder of her husband, may or may not have been guilty, but she wore men's clothes, while the eponymous Dan Lemo, a rather repulsive music-hall artist, is a female impersonator. The whole question of reality and appearance is raised by the use of "golem" of the title, a "mythical creature able to dissolve in thin air" but which takes its identity by absorbing the souls of others. Dan Lemo and the Limehouse Golem is a wild theatrical extravaganza, but Ackroyd justifies his insistence that the reader question everything in it by quoting from Oscar Wilde's The Truth of Masks: "Truth is independent of facts always, inventing or selecting them at pleasure. The true dramatist shows us life under the condition of art, not art in the form of life."

Except for The Last Testament of Oscar Wilde, Milton in America is the only one of Ackroyd's novels to take place in a setting other than England. Milton in America is a novel predicated on the possibility that John Milton, the English poet, fled England near the end of the Commonwealth, and ended up in New England. Divided into two sections, "Eden," and "Fall," the novel employs an extended metaphor of Milton himself enacting the role of Lucifer the fallen angel in the historical Milton's Paradise Lost: forced to leave heavenly England, and make his way in the savage hell of New England. The novel traces John Milton's ascendancy as the leader of a settlement named New Milton, whose population evinces all the worst characteristics of the Puritanism, including the burning of suspected witches, overt hatred of Catholics, racism, sexism, homophobia, among others. Ackroyd brilliantly utilizes the American genre of the utopian-community novel (one thinks of Hawthorne's The Blithedale Romance and Morrison's Paradise) to his own ends. Here, religious hypocrisy, embodied in the character of Milton, is shown to lead to horrific ends.

Returning to his setting of choice, London, Ackroyd's latest novel, The Plato Papers, once again breaks new ground. Instead of his usual trope of seeing the past mirrored in the present, Ackroyd sets his new novel in a London of the very distant future, circa A.D. 3700.

In this London, angels are everyday members of society, and people have ancient Roman-and Greek-sounding names like Ornatus, as well as Sparkler and Madrigal, that might come from the Victorian music hall stage. The plot in this shortest of Ackroyd's novels revolves around a character named Plato, who is the chief orator of the city of London. Plato's job is to explain to the citizens of London their past. It has always been difficult to see Ackroyd directly in his characters, but with Plato, we are finally able to see the author writing himself directly into a character. Plato, whose hilarious misreadings of canonical writers of the distant past like Dickens (claimed as author of Darwin's Origin of the Species) and Freud (claimed as a standup comedian) are good examples of the literary technique of defamiliarization. Re-writing the story of Plato (the philosopher) and the Cave, Ackroyd has his future-Plato visit another cave, which turns out to be the earth as we know it, circa 1999. Like Milton in Milton in America (who goes off for six weeks into the wilderness), The Plato Papers ends with Plato self-banished from his beloved London, accused by his society of corrupting young people by teaching that there is an alternate reality. Readers of Ackroyd's ten novels have come to know and appreciate the nuances of this alternate reality.

-Peter Lewis, revisions by Geoffrey Elborn and Richard Almonte

ADAMS, Glenda

Nationality: Australian. Born: Sydney, 1939. Education: University of Sydney, B.A. (honours) 1962; Columbia University, New York, M.S. 1965. Family: Has one daughter. Career: Writing Workshop instructor, Columbia University, New York, and Sarah Lawrence College; fiction writing teacher at University of Technology, Sydney; associate director, Teachers and Writers Collaborative, New York, 1973–76. Awards: Miles Franklin Literary award, 1987; Age Fiction Book of the Year, 1990; National Book Council award for fiction, 1991. Member: Australian Society of Authors; Australian Writers Guild. Agent: Goodman Associates, 500 West End Ave., New York, New York 10024, USA. Address: Department of English, Columbia University, New York, New York, New York 10027, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Games of the Strong. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1982; New York, Cane Hill Press, 1989.

Dancing on Coral. New York, Viking, and Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, 1988.

Longleg. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1990; New York, Cane Hill Press, 1992.

The Tempest of Clemenza. New York, Angus & Robertson, 1996.

Short Stories

Lies and Stories. N.p., 1976.

The Hottest Night of the Year. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1979; New York, Cane Hill Press, 1989.

Plays

Pride, 1993.

Wrath, 1993.

The Monkey Trap. Sydney, Australia, Griffin Theatre, 1998.

*

Manuscript Collection: Australian Defense Force Academy, University of New South Wales, Canberra, Australia.

* * *

Born in Sydney, Glenda Adams left an Australia she found too restrictive in 1964 and lived in New York for many years before finally returning to her home country in what she sees as the completion of a personal odyssey. Her first collection of short pieces, written and published in various periodicals in the United States, was Lies and Stories, but The Hottest Night of the Year, which includes seven stories from the first collection together with more recent work, was the first book to establish her reputation. Most of the stories are written in the first person and concern vulnerable or alienated female protagonists, who fiercely insist nevertheless on retaining their individuality and independence. The first six stories seem to be set in Sydney (though the setting is not always named) and deal with the experience of childhood and adolescence. Running through them is a note of implicit protest against the mistreatment of women. This emerges clearly in "The Music Masters," with its bitterly misognynistic father, and is carried on in several stories about the early days of marriages in which husbands invariably dismiss and behave condescendingly toward their new wives. The later stories are more playful and whimsically self-conscious in form. "Twelfth Night, or The Passion," for instance, shows the narrator determinedly exercising her option to have an improbably happy ending, whereas "Reconstruction of an Event" ostentatiously flaunts its different narrative possibilities. The stories are written in a deceptively simple style and marked often by a bizarre kind of humour and almost surreal disconnectedness, qualities that will emerge in Adams's later fiction.

Games of the Strong is, in retrospect, Adams's least characteristic novel. Written in the genre of the dystopian novel (a surprisingly ubiquitous one in Australian fiction) it describes an impoverished police state; dissidents are expelled to "The Island," where they are left to die, where poverty is rampant, and where no one is to be trusted. Its heroine. Neila, is hardly political at all and is mostly concerned to discover the truth about her parents' deaths (allegedly in a car accident), but slowly she is drawn into resisting the injustices and inequalities she sees all around her. It is a world that is full of betrayals and one in which, although she insists constantly on her own weakness ("I have no valour," "I am a coward and did not want to get hurt"), Neila develops into another of Adams's sturdily independent female protagonists. Perhaps the most puzzling aspect of the novel is its allegorical intention or lack of it. There is only one reference to this world, a brief mention of David Oistrakh playing a Beethoven concerto, but there are several contemptuous observations on outside democratic powers that willingly tolerate the excesses of "The Complex."

Adams came into her own as a writer, however, with her two recent novels. Dancing on Coral, which won the Miles Franklin Award for the best Australian novel of the year, is a very funny and witty novel, its style built around a sense of derangement, non sequiturs, and conversations not connecting or at cross purposes. Lark Watters (who had appeared briefly in one of Adams's early stories) grows up in Sydney during the 1960s and falls in love with Solomon Blank, but he wins a scholarship in America. Then she is attracted to an American named Tom Brown. She and Donna Bird, her rival for Tom's attentions, embark on a freighter bound for the United States, but en route Lark, tormented by her dominant companion, allows her to be left behind when the ship sails.

The novel is in part a satire on what the author sees as a decade of silliness. It is peopled by grotesques, like the German captain of the freighter and Lark's father, who is building a coffin for himself and who indulges in trivial pursuits, such as learning how to get around London and memorising all the stops on the air route from Sydney to London. Underneath the comedy the serious point is being made, through a letter that Lark's mother writes to her saying that her father has disappeared: "Too, before I left on my holiday he said to tell you, you have made your own way in this tricky world. You have done it all yourself. There has not been much help from us, I am aware." Bereft of both lover and husband at the end, Lark is finally free to be her own person.

Independence is also a theme of Longleg, Adams's most disturbing novel. William Badger is ten when the novel opens shortly after the war and is fearful that his mother—beautitful, young, and dissatisfied with the country she lives in and with everything else—will leave him, which she does. When she eventually returns she is a different woman, from whom William closes himself off. We see William then at various stages of his life and in various places as he grows through relationships with women as if to gain the security he has never had with Meg Meese, who takes him cave exploring with her Trogs; Tillie Pepper and her group of radical activists, the Pan-European Barbarians; and Amanda, the married woman he falls in love with until finally he realizes the truth of what the most sympathetic of the Barbarians had said to him: "I think you can always recognize when you have to take a new path and when you should stay where you are." It is a brilliantly inventive novel and in its protagonist, William, Adams has created her most sympathetic character.

Certain types appear constantly in Glenda Adams's fiction: the vulnerable adolescent or young woman often just married; the older, sophisticated woman who is a threat to the bride; idiosyncratic or irresponsible parents. Her principal characters are questers seeking to find the identity so many people leave undiscovered; even the constant name-changing is a symbol of their uncertainty. Voyages dominate her two most recent novels, which are both very funny and at times poignant.

-Laurie Clancy

ADAMS, Richard (George)

Nationality: British. Born: Newbury, Berkshire, 9 May 1920. Education: Bradfield College, Berkshire, 1933–38; Worcester College, Oxford, 1938–39, 1946–48, B.A. in modern history 1948, M.A. 1953. Military Service: Served in the British Army, 1940–46. Family: Married Barbara Elizabeth Acland in 1949; two daughters. Career: Worked in the Ministry of Housing and Local Government, London, 1948–68; Assistant Secretary, Department of the Environment, London, 1968–74. Writer-in-residence, University of Florida, Gainesville, 1975, and Hollins College, Virginia, 1976. President, Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 1980–82 (resigned). Independent Conservative parliamentary candidate for Spelthorne, 1983. Awards: Library Association Carnegie medal, 1972; Guardian award, 1973. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1975. Agent: David Higham Associates Ltd., 5–8 Lower John Street, London W1R 4HA. Address: 26 Church Street, Whitechurch, Hampshire RG28 7AR, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Watership Down. London, Collings, 1972; New York, Macmillan, 1974.

Shardik. London, Allen Lane-Collings, 1974; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1975.

The Plague Dogs. London, Allen Lane-Collings, 1977; New York, Knopf, 1978.

The Girl in a Swing. London, Allen Lane, and New York, Knopf, 1980.

Maia. London, Viking, 1984; New York, Knopf, 1985.

Traveller. New York, Knopf, 1988; London, Hutchinson, 1989.

Tales from Watership Down, with decorations by John Lawrence. New York, Knopf, 1996.

Fiction (for children)

The Bureaucats. London, Viking Kestrel, 1985.

Poetry

The Tyger Voyage (for children). London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1976.

The Ship's Cat (for children). London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1977.

The Legend of Te Tuna. Los Angeles, Sylvester and Orphanos, 1982; London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 1986.

Other

Voyage Through the Antarctic, with Ronald Lockley. London, Allen Lane, 1982; New York, Knopf, 1983.

A Nature Diary. London, Viking, 1985; New York, Viking, 1986.The Day Gone By: An Autobiography. London, Hutchinson, 1990; New York, Knopf, 1991.

Editor, Occasional Poets: An Anthology. London, Viking, 1986.

Other (for children)

Nature Through the Seasons, with Max Hooper. London, Kestrel, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1975.

Nature Day and Night, with Max Hooper. London, Kestrel, and New York, Viking Press, 1978.

The Watership Down Film Picture Book. London, Allen Lane, and New York, Macmillan, 1978.

The Iron Wolf and Other Stories (folktales). London, Allen Lane, 1980; as The Unbroken Web, New York, Crown, 1980.

Editor, Grimm's Fairy Tales. London, Routledge, 1981.

Editor, Richard Adams's Favourite Animal Stories. London, Octopus, 1981.

Editor, The Best of Ernest Thompson Seton. London, Fontana, 1982.

*

Richard Adams comments:

(1991) I can only say, like Trollope, that I am an entertainer, and the essence of fiction is that the reader should wish to turn the page.

* * *

Originally published as a book for children, Watership Down made Richard Adams's name as a novelist by becoming one of the leading bestsellers of the 1970s. Set in the rabbit world of the English countryside, it is primarily an adventure story, original in conception, but with excellent natural descriptions and evocations of such human virtues as courage, loyalty, and modesty. The story begins when a peaceful rabbit warren in Berkshire is destroyed by a new housing development and a party of young bucks escape, thanks to the ability of one of their number, Fiver, to foresee the future. What follows is an odyssev to find a new home, during which the rabbits encounter many strange and terrifying adventures. Danger comes from human beings, poisoned fields, machines, and also from another group of rabbits led by the despotic General Woundwort. "In combat he was terrifying, fighting entirely to kill, indifferent to any wounds he received himself and closing with his adversaries until his weight overbore and exhausted them. Those who had no heart to oppose him were not long in the feeling that here was a leader indeed." Eventually, the rabbits achieve their goal but have to fight a fiercely contested battle to protect their new territory.

Adams, a senior civil servant when he wrote Watership Down, admitted that many parts of the novel were created as stories to please his children during long car journeys and that much of the factual information came from R.M. Lockley's study The Private Life of the Rabbit, but his work is very much a fictional unity. Some critics have suggested that Watership Down is an allegory on man's indifference to the natural life of his planet and, taken that way, it presents a grimly satirical view; but the novel is best seen as part of the fantastic strain in English literature, in line with the work of C.S. Lewis, J.R.R. Tolkien, and Kenneth Grahame.

In his second novel, Shardik, Adams shifted his center of literary influences to the adventure genre of H. Rider Haggard and John Buchan. The action and setting are timeless and the background imaginary—the Beklan empire which has been over-run, and its inhabitants, the Ortelgans, enslaved. When a large bear is driven from their forests, the Ortelgans take him to be an ancient bear-god called Shardik. With his help they are able to drive off their oppressors and are returned to power. Kelderek, "a simple foolish fellow," becomes king of the Ortelgans but idleness and luxury lures him into wickedness. Once again the country is threatened but is redeemed by Shardik's blood sacrifice. Although Adams centered most of his attention on the bear, the humans are real enough and his ability to create an imaginary world may be considered the novel's great strength. In parts overwritten—a trap for any adventure novel—Shardik is, nevertheless, a powerful statement about man's inhumanity to man.

Adams was more successful when he returned to the animal world in The Plague Dogs, which is, among other things, a hard-hitting attack on the world of animal research. Snitter, a thoroughbred terrier, and Rowf, a mongrel, escape from a government research station in the Lake District and the novel is an account of their adventures to keep out of man's way before they escape to the mystical Isle of Dog. As in Watership Down, Adams gives his animals human characteristics but they are not men in dogs' guise. When Snitter and Rowf decide to live off the land, for example, it is a fox who teaches them the necessary tricks and they have difficulty understanding his thick local dialect. When they are seen, men appear only as the enemy and the animals themselves have little understanding of their world.

Although he has also written adventure novels in the style of Shardik, Adams is at his happiest in the animal world. The Arcadian worlds of the rabbits' Berkshire and the dogs' Lake District are peopled by an organized society of idealized, largely peaceful animals, but this is not simple anthropomorphism. The animals might be able to speak and to rationalize like human beings but they have not lost their animal characteristics. The rabbits of Watership Down even have the remnants of an ancient rabbit language with its own words like n-Frith for noon and hrududu for tractor or any other man-made machine. It is his ability to create the rabbits and dogs as sensible and sensitive creatures and not as animals-in-man's-clothing or as lovable furry creatures which gives Adams his greatest strength as a novelist.

In 1996, a full twenty-two years after the publication of Watership Down, Adams returned to the setting of his greatest success with Tales from Watership Down. This collection of nineteen intertwined stories forms an extended narrative concerning the further adventures of Hazel, Bigwig, and all the other memorable characters of the first book. El-ahrairah returns as well, still larger than life; but Tales from Watership Down also sees the appearance of a new hero from a new warren—and thus the grand cycle of the rabbits' lives continues.

—Trevor Royle

AIDOO, (Christina) Ama Ata

Nationality: Ghanaian. Born: Abeadzi Kiakor, Ghana, 1942. Education: University of Ghana, Legon, B.A. (honours) 1964; Stanford University, California. Career: Lecturer in English, University of Cape Coast, Ghana, 1970–82; Minister of Education, 1982–83; writer-in-residence, University of Richmond, Virginia, 1989; chair, African Regional Panel of the Commonwealth Writers' prize, 1990, 1991; professor of English, University of Ghana, Cape Coast. Awards: Fulbright scholarship, 1988; Short Story Prize, Mbari Press. Address: University of Ghana, Department of English, Cape Coast, Ghana.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Our Sister Killjoy; or, Reflections from a Black-Eyed Squint. London, Longman, 1977; New York, NOK, 1979.

Changes: A Love Story. London, Women's Press, 1991; New York, Feminist Press at the City University of New York, 1993.

Short Stories

No Sweetness Here. London, Longman, 1970; New York, Doubleday, 1971.

The Eagle and the Chickens and Other Stories. Engu, Nigeria, Tana Press. 1986.

The Girl Who Can and Other Stories. Accra, Ghana, Sub-Saharan Publishers, 1997.

Plays

The Dilemma of a Ghost (produced Legon, 1964; Pittsburgh, 1988). Accra, Longman, 1965; New York, Macmillan, 1971.

Anowa (produced London, 1991). London, Longman, and New York, Humanities Press, 1970.

Poetry

Someone Talking to Sometime. Harare, Zimbabwe, College Press, 1985.

Birds and Other Poems. Harare, Zimbabwe, College Press, 1987.An Angry Letter in January and Other Poems. Coventry, England, Dangaroo Press, 1992.

Other

Dancing Out Doubts. Engu, Nigeria, NOK, 1982.

Contributor, Contemporary African Plays, edited and introduced by Martin Banham and Jane Plastow. London, Methuen, 1999.

Contributor, The Cambridge Guide to Women's Writing in English, edited by Lorna Sage. New York, Cambridge University Press, 1999.

*

Critical Studies: Ama Ata Aidoo: The Dilemma of a Ghost (study guide) by Jane W. Grant, London, Logman, 1980; The Art of Ama Ata Aidoo: Polylectics and Reading Against Neocolonialism by Vincent O. Odamtten, Gainesville, University Press of Florida, 1994; Emerging Perspectives on Ama Ata Aidoo edited by Ada Uzoamaka Azodo and Gay Wilentz, Trenton, New Jersey, Africa World Press, 1999.

* * *

Christina Ama Ata Aidoo's greatest strength is her ability to mix humor and hope with the serious issues of gender and social conflict. Her protagonists are caught in situations that are beyond their power to change; however, these characters' resistance to traditional roles and beliefs make them vibrant within these prescribed roles. Ghanaian critic Vincent Odamtten warns against using the terms of the (Western) liberal humanist tradition to describe the roles of these women: "individuality" and "independence" do not do justice to the different needs of African woman, he cautions. Their need for community, he believes, is greater than Western women's, and what they seek are relationships of equality with their men, not the wherewithal to live without them. Although this view is itself biased by Odamtten's own cultural and gender identity, it does appropriately state that Aidoo's protagonists seek fulfillment within their existing relationships rather than trying to live without men's love.

Aidoo's keen sense of drama is conveyed in both dramatic scripts and novels through witty, realistic, idiomatic dialogue and through careful juxtaposition of scenes that tell a story in pictures. In both plays, Anowa and The Dilemma of a Ghost, there are two sets of doubles to the main characters, whose scenes parallel the themes of the main duo. Characters called "Boy" and "Girl" bicker, slap, and insult the representative of the opposite sex, just as their grown-up counterparts do. The second set of doubles is the grandparent pair. Each play illustrates a social problem through the viewpoints of three generations. Aidoo surprises expectations through chiasmus: the grandfather figure speaks for the female protagonist's point of view, while the grandmother upholds the traditional view.

The plays discuss the social problems of gender roles and capitalism imposed on an agrarian society. The Dilemma of a Ghost features a strong woman married to a weak man who becomes corrupted by his own greed. When he decides to own slaves, she loses her mind because her values and love have been corrupted beyond her capacity of acceptance. In the contemporary setting of Anowa, on the other hand, the strong female protagonist is an African American who marries into a Ghanaian family. Her pivotal argument with his society is her belief in her right to delay childbirth. A side issue, which would provide an element of hilarity onstage, is that she smokes and drinks. The real issue of the play, however, is the imbalance of the day-to-day marital relationship: caught between the strong wills of mother and wife, the husband doesn't know who he agrees with. He wants whatever is easiest, not being able to make his own moral choices.

While Aidoo's dramas would make exciting stage productions because of their idiom, color, and tension, the novels make more entertaining reading. Our Sister Killjoy, written in 1966, is a precursor to the 1991 novel, Changes: A Love Story, in the same way that the play Dilemma foresees Anowa. The first novel tells the story of a sixteen-year-old Ghanaian girl who travels to Germany and London on an international government program for youth. The titular character, Sissie, earns her negative epithet of "killjoy" because she doubts the motives behind government programs such as student loans and grants to study abroad. Instead of celebrating the opportunity to expand their horizons, she deplores the suffering of her black brothers and sisters who live at poverty level in cold, unfriendly London, while deluding themselves that they are privileged to enroll in white education factories. Sissie urges them to return to Africa, to apply their skills to its economy instead. Many of her most "successful" compatriots are willfully blind to the horror they have bought into: soul-destroying white capitalism.

Sissie's idealism is touching, but it is not her only moral quality. The scene in which she ''loses her innocence'' is forceful and makes her seem cynical beyond her years. In rejecting a young German woman's love, Sissie observes her own enjoyment in causing pain to another. The reader wants her to connect her own enjoyment of power to her political ideas about white supremacy, to realize that she could be as abusive of power as a white person, but she does not make the connection.

Changes is the more polished novel: both narrator and protagonist are more mature. The protagonist, Esi, illustrates that, although the modern Ghanaian woman can "emancipate" herself by divorce, and obtain both love and independence by becoming another man's second wife, it is not enough. Although Esi's new lover is considered progressive in his views because he wants to honor her freedom and equality, his social status as an African male with the right to have many wives and girlfriends makes him different from Esi. Entirely honest in portraying the conflict between the need for love and the need for independence, Changes suggests that one thing that will not change, even if social structures do, is women's need for loving attention. Aidoo's characters are wise about gender differences; they do not blame everything on "the system" but recognize fundamental differences between men and women.

-Jill Franks

ALDISS, Brian (Wilson)

Nationality: British. Born: East Dereham, Norfolk, 18 August 1925. Education: Framlingham College, Suffolk, 1936–39; West Buckland School, 1939-42. Military Service: Served in the Royal Corps of Signals in the Far East, 1943–47. Family: Married Margaret Manson in 1965 (second marriage; divorced 1997); four children, two from previous marriage. Career: Bookseller, Oxford, 1947–56; literary editor, Oxford Mail, 1958-69; science-fiction editor, Penguin Books, London, 1961-64; art correspondent, Guardian, London, 1969-71. President, British Science Fiction Association, 1960-65; co-founder, 1972, and chair, 1976-78, John W. Campbell Memorial award; copresident, Eurocon Committee, 1975-79; chair, Society of Authors, London, 1978–79; member, Arts Council Literature Panel, 1978–80; president, World SF, 1982-84. Since 1975 vice-president, Stapledon Society; since 1977 founding trustee, World Science Fiction, Dublin; since 1983 vice-president, H.G. Wells Society; since 1988 vicepresident, Society of Anglo-Chinese Understanding; since 1990 council member, Council for Posterity. Since 1991 managing director, Avernus Ltd. Awards: World Science Fiction Convention citation, 1959; Hugo award, 1962, 1987; Nebula award, 1965; Ditmar award (Australia), 1970; British Science Fiction Association award, 1972, 1982, 1986, and special award, 1974; Eurocon award, 1976; James Blish award, for non-fiction, 1977; Cometa d'Argento (Italy), 1977; Jules Verne prize, 1977; Pilgrim award, 1978; John W. Campbell Memorial award, 1983; International Association for the Fantastic in the Arts award, for scholarship, 1986; Eaton award, 1986; World SF President's award, 1988; Kafka award, 1991. Guest of Honour, World Science Fiction Convention, London, 1965, 1979. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1990. Agents: Robin Straus, 229 East 79th St., New York, New York 10021, USA; Michael Shaw, Curtis Brown, Haymarket House, 28/29 Haymarket, London SW1Y 4SP, England. Address: Hambelden, 39 St. Andrews Road, Old Headington, Oxford OX3 9DL, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Brightfount Diaries. London, Faber, 1955.

Non-Stop. London, Faber, 1958; as Starship, New York, Criterion, 1959.

Vanguard from Alpha. New York, Ace, 1959; as Equator (includes "Segregation"), London, Digit, 1961.

Bow Down to Nul. New York, Ace, 1960; as The Interpreter, London, Digit, 1961.

The Male Response. New York, Galaxy, 1961; London, Dobson, 1963.

The Primal Urge. New York, Ballantine, 1961; London, Sphere, 1967.

The Long Afternoon of Earth. New York, New American Library, 1962; expanded edition, as Hothouse, London, Faber, 1962; Boston, Gregg Press, 1976.

The Dark Light Years. London, Faber, and New York, New American Library, 1964.

Greybeard. London, Faber, and New York, Harcourt Brace, 1964. Earthworks. London, Faber, 1965; New York, Doubleday, 1966.

An Age. London, Faber, 1967; as Cryptozoic!, New York, Doubleday, 1968.

Report on Probability A. London, Faber, 1968; New York, Doubleday, 1969

Barefoot in the Head. London, Faber, 1969; New York, Doubleday,

The Hand-Reared Boy. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, McCall, 1970.

A Soldier Erect; or, Further Adventures of the Hand-Reared Boy. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Coward McCann, 1971.

Frankenstein Unbound. London, Cape, 1973; New York, Random House, 1974.

The Eighty-Minute Hour. London, Cape, and New York, Doubleday, 1974.

The Malacia Tapestry. London, Cape, 1976; New York, Harper, 1977

Brothers of the Head. London, Pierrot, 1977; New York, Two Continents, 1978.

Enemies of the System. London, Cape, and New York, Harper, 1978. A Rude Awakening. London, Weidenfeld and Nicholson, 1978; New York, Random House, 1979.

Brothers of the Head, and Where the Lines Converge. London, Panther, 1979.

Life in the West. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1980; New York, Carroll and Graf, 1990.

Moreau's Other Island. London, Cape, 1980; as An Island Called Moreau, New York, Simon and Schuster, 1981.

The Helliconia Trilogy. New York, Atheneum, 1985.

Helliconia Spring. London, Cape, and New York, Atheneum 1982.

Helliconia Summer. London, Cape, and New York, Atheneum, 1983

Helliconia Winter. London, Cape, and New York, Atheneum 1985.

The Horatio Stubbs Saga. London, Panther, 1985.

The Year Before Yesterday. New York, Watts, 1987; as Cracken at Critical, Worcester Park, Surrey, Kerosina, 1987.

Ruins. London, Hutchinson, 1987.

Forgotten Life. London, Gollancz, 1988; New York, Atheneum, 1989.

Dracula Unbound. London, Grafton, and New York, Harper Collins, 1991.

Remembrance Day. London, HarperCollins, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1993.

Somewhere East of Life. London, HarperCollins, and New York, Carroll and Graf, 1994.

Short Stories

Space, Time, and Nathaniel: Presciences. London, Faber, 1957; abridged edition, as No Time Like Tomorrow, New York, New American Library, 1959.

The Canopy of Time. London, Faber, 1959; revised edition, as Galaxies Like Grains of Sand, New York, New American Library, 1960.

The Airs of Earth. London, Faber, 1963.

Starswarm. New York, New American Library, 1964; London, Panther, 1979.

Best Science Fiction Stories of Brian Aldiss. London, Faber, 1965; as Who Can Replace a Man? New York, Harcourt Brace, 1966; revised edition, Faber, 1971.

The Saliva Tree and Other Strange Growths. London, Faber, 1966. Intangibles Inc. London, Faber, 1969.

A Brian Aldiss Omnibus 1–2. London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 2 vols., 1969-1971.

Neanderthal Planet. New York, Avon, 1970.

The Moment of Eclipse. London, Faber, 1970; New York, Doubleday,

The Book of Brian Aldiss. New York, DAW, 1972; as The Comic Inferno, London, New English Library, 1973.

Excommunication. London, Post Card Partnership, 1975.

Last Orders and Other Stories. London, Cape 1977; New York, Carroll and Graf, 1989.

New Arrivals, Old Encounters: Twelve Stories. London, Cape, 1979; New York, Harper, 1980.

Foreign Bodies. Singapore, Chopmen, 1981.

Seasons in Flight. London, Cape, 1984; New York, Atheneum, 1986. The Magic of the Past. Worcester Park, Surrey, Kerosina, 1987.

Best Science Fiction Stories of Brian W. Aldiss (not same as 1965 book). London, Gollancz, 1988; as Man in His Time, New York, Atheneum, 1989.

A Romance of the Equator: Best Fantasy Stories. London, Gollancz, 1989; New York, Atheneum, 1990.

A Tupolev Too Far. London, HarperCollins, 1993; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1994.

The Secret of This Book: 20 Odd Stories, illustrations by Rosamund Chorley and Brian Aldiss. New York, HarperCollins, 1995.

Plays

Distant Encounters, adaptation of his own stories (produced London, 1978).

SF Blues (produced London, 1987).

Television Play: Life (4 Minutes series), 1986.

Poetry

Pile: Petals from St. Klaed's Computer. London, Cape, and New York, Holt Rinehart, 1979.

Farewell to a Child. Berkhamsted, Hertfordshire, Priapus, 1982. At the Caligula Hotel. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1995.

At the Caligula Hotel and Other Poems. London, Sinclair-Stevenson, Songs from the Steppes of Central Asia: The Collected Poems of Makhtumkuli: Eighteenth Century Poet-Hero of Turkmenistan (versified by Aldiss, based on translations by Youssef Azemoun). Caversham, Berkshire, England, Society of Friends of Makhtumkuli, 1995.

Other

Cities and Stones: A Traveller's Jugoslavia. London, Faber, 1966. The Shape of Further Things: Speculations on Change. London, Faber, 1970; New York, Doubleday, 1971.

Billion Year Spree: A History of Science Fiction. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Doubleday, 1973.

Science Fiction Art, illustrated by Chris Foss. New York, Bounty, 1975; London, Hart Davis, 1976.

Science Fiction as Science Fiction. Frome, Somerset, Bran's Head,

This World and Nearer Ones: Essays Exploring the Familiar. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1979; Ohio, Kent State University Press, 1981.

Science Fiction Quiz. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1983.

The Pale Shadow of Science (essays). Seattle, Serconia Press, 1985.

... And the Lurid Glare of the Comet (essays). Seattle, Serconia Press, Trillion Year Spree: The History of Science Fiction, with David Wingrove. London, Gollancz, and New York, Atheneum, 1986.

Science Fiction Blues (selections), edited by Frank Hatherley. London, Avernus, 1988.

Bury My Heart at W.H. Smith's: A Writing Life. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1990.

The Detached Retina. Liverpool, Liverpool University Press, 1995.

Foreword, Blood Read: The Vampire as Metaphor in Contemporary Culture, edited by Joan Gordon and Veronica Hollinger. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1997.

The Twinkling of an Eye, or, My Life as an Englishman. New York, St. Martin's, 1999.

Foreword, Soft as Steel: The Art of Julie Bell by Nigel Suckling. New York, Thunder's Mouth Press, 1999.

Editor, Penguin Science Fiction. London, Penguin, 1961; More Penguin Science Fiction, 1963; Yet More Penguin Science Fiction, 1964; 3 vols. collected as The Penguin Science Fiction Omnibus, 1973.

Editor, Best Fantasy Stories. London, Faber, 1962.

Editor, Last and First Men, by Olaf Stapledon. London, Penguin,

Editor, Introducing SF. London, Faber, 1964.

Editor, with Harry Harrison, Nebula Award Stories 2. New York, Doubleday, 1967; as Nebula Award Stories 1967, London, Gollancz, Editor, with Harry Harrison, All about Venus. New York, Dell, 1968; enlarged edition, as Farewell, Fantastic Venus, London, Macdonald, 1968.

Editor, with Harry Harrison, Best SF 1967 [to 1975]. New York, Berkley and Putnam, 7 vols., and Indianapolis, Bobbs Merrill, 2 vols., 1968-1975; as The Year's Best Science Fiction 1-9, London, Sphere, 8 vols., 1968-1976, and London, Futura, 1 vol., 1976.

Editor, with Harry Harrison, The Astounding-Analog Reader. New York, Doubleday, 2 vols., 1972–1973; London, Sphere, 2 vols.,

Editor, Space Opera. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1974; New York, Doubleday, 1975.

Editor, Space Odysseys. London, Futura, 1974; New York, Doubleday, 1976.

Editor, with Harry Harrison, SF Horizons (reprint of magazine). New York, Arno Press, 1975.

Editor, with Harry Harrison, Hell's Cartographers: Some Personal Histories of Science Fiction Writers. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Harper, 1975.

Editor, with Harry Harrison, Decade: The 1940's, The 1950's, The 1960's. London, Macmillan, 3 vols., 1975–1977; The 1940's and The 1950's, New York, St. Martin's Press, 2 vols., 1978.

Editor, Evil Earths. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1975; New York, Avon, 1979.

Editor, Galactic Empires. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 2 vols., 1976; New York, St. Martin's Press, 2 vols., 1977.

Editor, Perilous Planets. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1978; New York, Avon. 1980.

Editor, with others, The Penguin Masterquiz Book. London, Penguin, 1985.

Editor, with Sam J. Lundwall, The Penguin World Omnibus of Science Fiction. London, Penguin, 1986; New York, Penguin, 1987.

Editor, My Madness: The Selected Writings of Anna Kavan. London, Pan, 1990.

Editor, Mini Sagas from the Daily Telegraph Competition. Stroud, Gloucestershire, Sutton, 1997.

*

Bibliography: Brian W. Aldiss: A Bibliography 1954–1984 by Margaret Aldiss, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1991.

Manuscript Collections: Bodleian Library, Oxford University; Dallas Public Library.

Critical Studies: "Generic Discontinuities in SF: Brian Aldiss' Starship" by Fredric Jameson, in Science-Fiction Studies (Terre Haute, Indiana), vol. 1, no. 2, 1973; Aldiss Unbound: The Science Fiction of Brian W. Aldiss by Richard Mathews, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1977; Apertures: A Study of the Writings of Brian Aldiss by Brian Griffin and David Wingrove, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1984; article by Aldiss in Contemporary Authors Autobiography Series 2 edited by Adele Sarkissian, Detroit, Gale, 1985; A Is for Brian: A 65th Birthday Present for Brian W. Aldiss from His Family, Friends, Colleagues, and Admirers edited by Frank Hatherley, London, Avernus, 1990.

Brian Aldiss comments:

(1991) With Somewhere East of Life, I have completed the Squire Quartet, which opened with Life in the West. These novels cover a great extent of territory, from the United States to Singapore and Turkmenistan, from Stockholm to Sicily. Always my native county of Norfolk, East Anglia, serves as a sort of fulcrum. Family affairs are set against the slow decline of the West and the abrupt demise of the Soviet Union.

An idea of how much I might encompass was brought home to me while writing the three Helliconia novels in the early to mid-1980s: Helliconia Spring, Helliconia Summer, and Helliconia Winter. I have never experienced that great divide some people detect between science fiction and the ordinary contemporary novel; this probably reflects my reading and the company I keep.

I write every day and always have done—not invariably for publication. My SF presents a spectrum moving from extreme surreal situations in the early novels to events merely colored by an incipient future. By the time I wrote Report on Probability A and Barefoot in the Head, I had already moved away from the confines of genre fiction.

Happily, my contemporary novels have been about as successful as the more imaginative ones. Recent pleasures include having a volume of critical essays and a selection of my poems published. I'm now working on a large-scale autobiographical "thing"—an unlicked cub as yet—which will contain my experience of and meditations on war.

To be able to write is a slice of great golden fortune.

* * *

The great contribution Brian Aldiss has made to the art of science fiction is to help to raise it to the point where it is now accepted, by all but the chronically bigoted, as a literary form worthy of serious consideration. I suspect that this has much to do with the fact that Aldiss has always looked upon himself primarily as a novelist rather than as a writer of SF, and he has written several novels other than those on science-fiction themes.

His first full length science-fiction novel was Non-Stop, which was based on the almost classic SF theme of a giant space-ship adrift in space. As a piece of storytelling, it is first class, and it displays all the excellences that are to be found in his later work: the ability to establish by carefully selected detail a convincing atmosphere of place and time, and a logical development of situations so that even the most outlandish become acceptable to the reader. In Hothouse, for example, Aldiss creates a world dominated by vegetation where we can sense the continual and overwhelming growth, even breathe the vegetable air, and in Greybeard the experience of being in postatomic Oxford is remarkably vivid. But in Non-Stop, while the exploration of the ship (once built by giants) by Roy Complain and his companions has parallels with the sense of awe and wonder experienced by the Old English poets when they encountered the ruins of Roman cities, the space ship becomes a microcosm of Earth which, too, can be seen as a giant ship itself endlessly adrift in space, and the exploration develops into a search for destination and purpose.

A quality which informs Aldiss's work, and which should not be overlooked, is his sense of humor. In Non-Stop one aspect of this can be seen in his pursuit of the idea that in the future psychology will develop its own theology and superstitions and replace our present religions. It is a plausible thesis and at the same time an amusing one, and often Aldiss's humor helps to save his SF novels from the overseriousness that has engulfed other practitioners in this genre. It has been responsible too for the excellent humorous novels. The logical consequences of the invention and universal use of an "Emotional Register" are used in The Primal Urge to create a fantastic and hilarious story.

Since the late 1960s Aldiss has striven to extend the boundaries of his art. In Report on Probability A he attempted the first SF antinovel, a study in relative phenomena which proved a tour de force, and in Barefoot in the Head he produced another "first," where groups of poems and "pop-songs" reflect and comment on the preceding prose chapters. In a Europe reeling psychodelically from an attack by an Arab state with Psycho-Chemical Aerosol Bombs, Chateris, the hero of Barefoot in the Head, gradually absorbs the acidhead poison in the atmosphere to find himself a new Messiah. As social and thought patterns disintegrate so does the language, and Aldiss develops a stunning-punning prose reminiscent of the verbal pyrotechnics of Joyce's Finnegans Wake. At the same time he creates a nightmare world reflecting trends observable in the situation already with us.

Though not strictly within a discussion of Aldiss's novels, we should not overlook his collections of short stories, Space, Time, and Nathaniel and The Canopy of Time, of which he is justly proud. The Horatio Stubbs series constitutes a fictional autobiography covering the years from the 1930s to the 1960s, where through the sexual and spiritual development of Horatio are examined certain aspects of the poverty of English middle-class life. The first, The Hand-Reared Boy, begins with Horatio as a boy, his masturbatory fantasies and his first sexual encounters. The direct and extremely realistic style of the first part of this novel might not be to everyone's taste, but it flowers into a most beautifully controlled story of Horatio's first and hopeless love for an older woman. In the second novel, A Solder Erect, we find Horatio still hard at it in the army and serving in India and Burma where his sexual and social education is broadened. The coarse brutality of wartime soldiering in the Far East is accurately and brutally portrayed, but redeemed by humor and set in contrast with Horatio's growing awareness of values beyond the more immediately erotic, a theme continued and brought to conclusion in the third novel in the series, A Rude Awakening, where Horatio encounters the Dutch, Indian, Japanese, Chinese, and Indonesian forces in Sumatra and finds himself with two girls.

On the SF side, Aldiss's Frankenstein Unbound breaks new ground again. As a result of the indiscriminate use of nuclear weapons within the ambits of the Earth-Lunar system the infrastructure of space is seriously damaged to the point where time and space go "on the brink." The consequent "time shifts" find Joe Boderland suddenly transported to Switzerland in the year 1816 where he encounters not only Mary Shelley, the creator of Frankenstein, but Frankenstein himself in a world where reality itself is equally unstable and the dividing line between the real and the imagined world has become confused. In this situation Boderland finds himself unsure of his own role, and it is the discovery and fulfillment of his mission which constitutes the central theme of the narrative. It is a measure of Aldiss's powers as a novelist that he persuades the reader of the reality of this fantastic situation. The theme, I suspect, was suggested by his researches into the origins of science fiction which he undertook to produce his history of the genre, Billion Year Spree (and now Trillion Year Spree), and in which he makes a powerful case for Mary Shellev's Frankenstein as the first true SF novel.

More recent novels increase one's admiration for Aldiss's versatility and unflagging powers of invention. Brothers of the Head, the story of Siamese twin boys with a third dominant head which becomes increasingly demanding, is a brilliant if disturbing excursion into the macabre, while The Malacia Tapestry almost defies definition. Set in an age-old city state, riddled with rival philosophies, under the spell of magicians, and where change is forbidden, it presents the reader with a panorama of dukes, wealthy merchants, thespians, courtesans, spongers, and soldiers. What we are never sure of is whereabouts in the time scale we are. Is it a medieval town? Then just a glimpse of something tells us no. An alternative world? But never explicitly so. The way in which Aldiss makes this totally imaginary world a reality is remarkable, a superb example of how to induce the suspension of disbelief.

Given Aldiss's run of the gamut of fictional styles and structures it was almost inevitable that sooner or later he would attempt a saga. In The Helliconia Trilogy he does just that and in inventing an entire solar system with its own history, dynasties, religions, mythologies, and cultures it is one of epic proportions. While parallels with life on Planet Earth can be observed, the chief and fundamental difference is in the length of Helliconia's seasons. Centuries long the whole of life changes as the seasons wear on, dormant life forms emerge and dynasties rise and fall. At the heart of this, nevertheless, is the struggle between the Humans and the Phagors, and a stroke of genius is to have hovering in the background an Earth Observation Platform which is itself declining into disaster, thus adding a further perspective to this cosmic vision. The other remarkable aspect of Aldiss's invented universe is that it is not, as is so often the case in science fiction, an ideal world held up in criticism of our own. Helliconia's history is as messy, corrupt, illogical, and confused as Earth's. If there is a message it is in Helliconia's acceptance of and adjustment to its even harsher physical environment, while the Earth Platform's disaster is directly related to Earth's attempt to over-control its environment.

The books themselves, Spring, Summer, and Winter, are full of action and incident: picaresque journeys, hierarchical struggles, natural disasters, feats of endurance, bravery, loyalty and affection, and dynastic warfare which make them each, in an old-fashioned phrase, a gripping read. They are in addition a remarkable achievement.

Aldiss moved on from the massive achievement of Helliconia to yet another achievement. Back to Earth and the mainstream novel his Forgotten Life is another remarkable example of Aldiss's ability to assemble and organize a mass of material, in this case ranging over 50 years and three continents. In a sense the novel can be seen as a sort of intellectual whodunit, a cerebral voyage of discovery.

In the novel Clement Winter, who is married to a successful author of fantasy novels, comes into the possession of his brother Joseph's letters and diaries. In going through these in order to find and comprehend a pattern in his brother's life, Clement comes to review and assess his own. Aldiss calls upon his own experiences in pre-war Suffolk, wartime Burma and Sumatra, and his life as a writer in Oxford.

The real stuff of autobiography comes in Bury My Heart at W.H. Smith's. This is, not surprisingly, a wide-ranging story, haunted by wartime experience in Burma. True to its title Aldiss's autobiography is marked by a lightness of touch, and a cheerful friendly modesty. The story it tells is an intriguing one.

In the mid- to late 1990s Aldiss, then entering his eighth decade, proved himself still highly active. He published a story collection (The Secret of This Book, 1995), two books of poems (At the Caligula Hotel and Songs from the Steppes of Central Asia, both 1995), a biography (The Twinkling of an Eye, or, My Life as an Englishman, 1999), and assorted other works.

-John Cotton

ALDRIDGE, (Harold Edward) James

Nationality: Australian. Born: White Hills, Victoria, 10 July 1918. Education: Swan Hill High School; London School of Economics. Family: Married Dina Mitchnik in 1942; two sons. Career: Writer, Melbourne Herald and Sun, 1937–38, and London Daily Sketch and Sunday Dispatch, 1939; European and Middle East war correspondent, Australian Newspaper Service and North American Newspaper

Alliance, 1939–44; Tehran correspondent, Time and Life, 1944. Awards: Rhys Memorial prize, 1945; World Peace Council gold medal; International Organization of Journalists prize, 1967; Lenin Memorial Peace prize, 1972; Australian Children's Book Council Book of the Year award, 1985; Guardian award, for children's book, 1987. Agent: Curtis Brown, 28/29 Haymarket, London SW1Y 4SP, England. Address: 21 Kersley Street, London SW11, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Signed with Their Honour. London, Joseph, and Boston, Little Brown, 1942.

The Sea Eagle. London, Joseph, and Boston, Little Brown, 1944.Of Many Men. London, Joseph, and Boston, Little Brown, 1946.The Diplomat. London, Lane, 1949; Boston, Little Brown, 1950.The Hunter. London, Lane, 1950; Boston, Little Brown, 1951.Heroes of the Empty View. London, Lane, and New York, Knopf, 1954.

I Wish He Would Not Die. London, Bodley Head, 1957; New York, Doubleday, 1958.

The Last Exile. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Doubleday, 1961.

A Captive in the Land. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1962; New York, Doubleday, 1963.

The Statesman's Game. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Doubleday, 1966.

My Brother Tom. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1966; as My Brother Tom: A Love Story, Boston, Little Brown, 1967.

A Sporting Proposition. London, Joseph, and Boston, Little Brown, 1973; as Ride a Wild Pony, London, Penguin, 1976.

Mockery in Arms. London, Joseph, 1974; Boston, Little Brown, 1975.The Untouchable Juli. London, Joseph, 1975; Boston, Little Brown, 1976.

One Last Glimpse. London, Joseph, and Boston, Little Brown, 1977.Goodbye Un-America. London, Joseph, and Boston, Little Brown, 1979.

The True Story of Lola MacKellar. London, Viking, 1992.

Short Stories

Gold and Sand. London, Bodley Head, 1960.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Braver Time," in Redbook (New York), May 1967.
- "The Unfinished Soldiers," in Winter's Tales 15, edited by A.D. Maclean. London, Macmillan, 1969; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1970.
- "The Black Ghost of St. Helen," in After Midnight Ghost Book, edited by James Hale. London, Hutchinson, 1980.

Plays

The 49th State (produced London, 1947). One Last Glimpse (produced Prague, 1981).

Television Plays: Scripts for Robin Hood series.

Other

Undersea Hunting for Inexperienced Englishmen. London, Allen and Unwin, 1955.

The Flying 19 (for children). London, Hamish Hamilton, 1966.

Living Egypt, photographs by Paul Strand. London, MacGibbon and Kee, and New York, Horizon Press, 1969.

Cairo: Biography of a City. Boston, Little Brown, 1969; London, Macmillan, 1970.

The Marvelous Mongolian (for children). Boston, Little Brown, and London, Macmillan, 1974.

The Broken Saddle (for children). London, MacRae, 1982; New York, Watts, 1983.

The True Story of Lilli Stubek (for children). South Yarra, Victoria, Hyland House, 1984; London, Penguin, 1986.

The True Story of Spit MacPhee (for children). Ringwood, Victoria, Viking, and London, Viking Kestrel, 1986.

*

Critical Studies: "The Necessity of Freedom: A Discussion of the Novels of James Aldridge," in Overland (Melbourne), November 1956; "It All Comes Out Like Blood: The Novels of James Aldridge," in Australians by John Hetherington, Melbourne, Cheshire, 1960; "Man of Action, Words in Action" by Eric Partridge, in Meanjin (Melbourne), 1961; "The Heroic Ordinary" by Evelyn Juers, in Age Monthly Review (Melbourne), February 1987; Workers and Sufferers: Town v. Self in James Aldridge's St. Helen Novels, London, Australian Studies Centre, 1987, and "My Brother Tom: My Other Self," in Orana (Sydney), February 1989, both by Michael Stone.

* * *

James Aldridge left Australia when quite a young man as a war correspondent; and this fact has largely determined the material and the angle of approach in his work. He went through the Greek campaign and wrote two books based directly on his experiences in it. Here his method was strongly affected by Hemingway; but the books were saved from being mere imitations by the genuine freshness and truth of his presentation. He was learning how to build a narrative full of stirring events and based on historical developments which he knew at first-hand, and at the same time to link the story with the personal problems and struggles of his protagonists. With his next book, a collection of stories, came a break from the Hemingway influence. What he had gained from his apprenticeship was now integrated in his own method and outlook. The tales showed how well he was able to grasp situations with very diverse settings and convincingly to define aspects of national character in a compact form. Still drawing on his wartime experiences as a correspondent, he wrote The Diplomat, an ambitious large-scale work, dealing with both the Soviet Union and the region of the Kurds in northern Mesopotamia. With much skill he explored the devious world of diplomacy in the postwar world, making the issues concrete by their basis in the difficult national question of the Kurds. Aldridge emerged as an important political novelist. He showed himself able to handle complicated political themes without losing touch with the essential human issues. The political aspects were removed from triviality or narrowness by being linked with the painful struggles of the protagonist to understand the world in which he found himself an actor. Thus what gave artistic validity to the work, beyond any particular conclusions reached in the search for truth, was the definition of that search itself.

In The Hunter Aldridge next refreshed himself by dropping all large themes and turning to Canada in a work more concerned with immediacies of experience: his theme was the world of the hunter, a direct relationship to nature, and he showed he could conjure up a dimension of sheer physical living. But it was perhaps significant that when he turned from the theme of contemporary history and politics, it was to the sphere of nature, not to everyday life in some specific society. For good and bad, his uprooting through the war had made him into a novelist of the large national conflicts of his age. His material had thus been born of his journalism, but in transforming it to fiction he overcame the journalistic limitations and was able to penetrate to deep human issues. He saw problems in terms of real people, and has never been guilty of inventing puppets to represent national or political positions.

He turned again to the Near East, in Heroes of the Empty View, I Wish He Would Not Die, and The Last Exile, in which he took up the problems of the Arab world, with special reference to Egypt. He was helped by having many direct connections and sources of information; but despite his sympathy for the Arabs he did not oversimplify issues or make his works into tracts for a particular point of view. The stories clarified events and deepened the reader's understanding of the human beings entangled in vast conflicts. In his later works he returned to the question of the Soviet Union, but with less force and artistic success than in The Diplomat or the books on the near East. It would be hard to point to any contemporary novelist who has dealt more directly with international political problems in the second half of the twentieth century. Certainly it would be difficult to find one who has done so with such success, uniting a warm sympathy for the persons about whom he writes with, in the last resort, a true artistic detachment.

-Jack Lindsay

ALEXIE, Sherman Joseph, Jr.

Nationality: American. Born: Spokane, Washington, 7 October 1966. Education: Gonzaga University, 1985- 87; Washington State University, B.A. 1991. Awards: Poetry fellow, Washington State Arts Commission, 1991; National Endowment for the Arts, 1992; winner, Slipstream's fifth annual chapbook contest, March 1992; American Book Award, 1996. Address: P.O. Box 376, Wellpinit, Washington 99040, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Reservation Blues. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1995.

Indian Killer. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1996; New York, Warner Books, 1998.

Short Stories

The Lone Ranger and Tonto Fistfight in Heaven. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1993; New York, Harper Perennial, 1994.

The Toughest Indian in the World: Stories. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 2000.

Poetry

I Would Steal Horses. Niagara Falls, New York, Slipstream, 1992.
The Business of Fancydancing: Stories and Poems. Brooklyn, New York, Hanging Loose Press, 1992.

First Indian on the Moon. Brooklyn, New York, Hanging Loose Press, 1992.

Old Shirts & New Skins. Los Angeles, University of California American Indian Studies Center, 1993.

Water Flowing Home: Poems. Boise, Idaho, Limberlost Press, 1994. Seven Mourning Songs for the Cedar Flute I Have Yet to Learn to Play. Walla Walla, Washington, Whitman College Press, 1994.

The Summer of Black Widows. Brooklyn, New York, Hanging Loose Press, 1996.

The Man Who Loves Salmon. Boise, Idaho, Limberlost Press, 1998. One Stick Song. Brooklyn, New York, Hanging Loose Press, 1999.

Play

Smoke Signals, with introduction and notes by the author, New York, Hyperion, 1998.

* * *

Sherman Alexie, whose works repeatedly underscore the importance of retaining tribal connections, draws on the oral, religious, and political traditions of his Spokane/Coeur d'Alene Indian heritage. The wandering story lines of his novels reflect non-mainstream organizational structures, approaches, and attitudes as they shift time settings (mythical, historical, and modern), place, and person to gradually reveal tribal, family, and personal connections in keeping with the Native American philosophical framework, the web of life. As in oral tradition, Alexie's narratives aim for sudden, brief insights as connections that initially elude readers gradually take meaningful shape over time; their humor is dark, and their goal, in part, is to debunk what Alexie sees as political and cultural myths. Alexie, who began his writing career as a small press poet, asserts that, for the reservation Indian, imagination, given impetus by anger, is the only way to survive a life of despair worsened by alcoholism, abuse, poverty, diabetes, and economic dead ends.

"Distances," one of 22 intertwined stories from The Lone Ranger and Tonto Fistfight in Heaven (1993), typifies the crossover vision of intersecting times as Alexie's modern characters successfully reenact the failed nineteenth-century Plains Indian Ghost Dance. Historically, the dance was a desperate attempt to make whites disappear and to return the land to a pre-Columbian utopian state, yet it failed, bringing down on the heads of its practitioners the full weight of the U.S. Cavalry. Alexie's dystopian vision captures the futility of yearning for a return to the past: if modern technology and anyone with white blood were willed away, as the Ghost Dance promised, who and what would be left on the reservations? The assimilated would be without homes or transportation, food or clothing. In Alexie's apocalyptic tale tribes would be separated into the "Skins," or reservation Indians, and the "Urbans," or Indian outsiders, but such precautions would fail because even the pure bloods carry in their bloodstreams the taint of white diseases, so many would sicken and die. Even though hunter-gatherers who have been dead a thousand years are reborn, and their women give birth to salmon, life remains a dead end for Native Americans. At the close of Indian Killer (1998), the main character, who is possibly a schizophrenic serial killer, leads Seattle's native street people in a Ghost Dance that depopulates Seattle.

The Lone Ranger and Tonto Fistfight in Heaven and Reservation Blues (1994) illustrate the interconnectedness of life through three shared interlocking central characters: storyteller and self-proclaimed visionary Thomas Builds-the-Fire and his companions Junior and Victor, a former reservation-wide basketball hero and a semi-reformed alcoholic. (These young men appear in the 1998 film Smoke Signals, loosely based on the two novels.) Reservation Blues places pop music (blues and rock-and-roll) in the role of traditional storytelling as Thomas and his friends, aided by the magic guitar of legendary bluesman Robert Johnson, form the band Coyote Springs and recreate the world through their music. Before their recording session with U.S. Cavalry generals Sheridan and Wright, reincarnated as recording executives, the young musicians seek a vision on a mountain presided over by Big Mom, a Spokane Indian mystic whose personal history has been forever marked by the slaughter of 900 horses by the United States Cavalry in 1861. Since Mom has been the spiritual guide of Janis Joplin, Jimi Hendrix, and Benny Goodman, among others, the American blues, infused with the Indian spirit, echoes the "Reservation Blues" of the title. Alexie playfully and critically juxtaposes New Age groupies with the plight of a fishing people stuck in a land where all the rivers have been dammed. In The Lone Ranger, the reservation storyteller, like the Coyote Band and like their creator, uses his art to recreate the world and make daily life less bleak. As Thomas accompanies Victor to bring Victor's dead father's pickup and ashes home, the road that leads away from home also leads back to the past and forward to the future; the native Creation story, the mother goddess, and Coyote link all in the web of life.

Indian Killer (1998), a murder mystery of sorts, includes a cast of characters whose personal histories intersect in Seattle, Washington, in the late 1980s. The novel relies on an intentionally confrontational narrative voice, that of a displaced urban Indian, ironically named John Smith, whose adoption has left him without tribal roots and with no way to regain the tribal knowledge that Alexie believes is essential to his identity, despite his foster parents' attempts to educate him about native ways. A disturbed schizophrenic, he is beset on every side by racial and cultural stereotypes: white liberals suffering collective guilt for past wrongs; redneck Indian haters; homeless native drunks; cruel fathers. Alexie offers hazy visions of white doctors ripping John from his Indian mother's womb and armed men rushing him to his white adoptive parents. In retaliation for his foster parents' inadequacy, Smith kills and scalps random whites, though greedy rednecks are responsible for the most publicized death he is accused of (hence the intentional confusion inherent in the title: an Indian who kills or a killer of Indians?). Alexie mocks whites who universalize and romanticize Indians into something they are not, and he sympathizes with Indian characters like Maria, who runs a mobile sandwich kitchen for homeless Indians and attacks the white myths promulgated in local university courses. The detective story's genre conventions (investigating a crime, establishing culpability) take second place to Alexie's message that well-meaning whites cannot make up for their ancestors' genocide and that it is too late to rectify past wrongs: What has been destroyed—the native way of life and belief—can never be fully regained. Thus, many of his Indians are alcoholics and drug abusers, madmen, or ineffectual poseurs.

Alexie's first two works of fiction balance alienation and defeatism with laughter, but his third focuses only on gratuitous acts of violence and self-destruction. His collection of short stories The Toughest Indian in the World (2000), with its heartbreaking tales of hope and love amid pain and chaos, seems to be an emotional counter to the negativism of Indian Killer. Alexie offers readers vivid images of reservation life, some irreverent humor, and a distinctive perspective that he particularizes as his own Spokane/Coeur d'Alene voice. He admits that his characters contain bits and pieces of himself, and he worries that, given the statistical brevity of the lives of reservation males, his time of creativity is limited.

-Gina Macdonald

ALEXIS, André

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Trinidad, 1957. Family: One daughter. Career: Playwright, radio writer, poet, and writer of fiction. Awards: Trillium Book Award, 1999. Agent: c/o McClelland & Stewart, Inc., 481 University Avenue, Toronto, Ontario M5G 2E9 Canada. Address: Toronto, Ontario, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Childhood: A Novel. New York, Henry Holt, 1998.

Short Stories

Despair and Other Stories of Ottawa. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1994; published as Despair and Other Stories, New York, Henry Holt, 1999

Other

Lambton Kent: A Play. Toronto, Gutter Press, 1999.

* * *

Inclined towards experimental and avant-garde modes in his plays and performance-art collaborations, André Alexis in his fiction both represents and disturbs the familiar surfaces of banal, quotidian reality. His prose is emotionally cool but vivid and surprising in its images; his narrative world alternates—often in the same paragraph—between the mundanely recognizable and the outrageously, nightmarishly fantastical. Describing his fictional terrain as "the shifting ground between the imagined life and the life that you live in from day to day," he invites readers to question their assumptions about the normal and the abnormal, the real and the unreal, the remembered and the lived.

His début book, Despair and Other Stories of Ottawa, is an unsettling collection of macabre tales set mostly in the placidly prosperous Canadian capital where Alexis grew up, having moved to Canada from Trinidad at age three. Beneath Ottawa's apparently dull, institutional exterior Alexis reveals dream-worlds of flesh-biting "Soucouyants," bar patrons holding their own severed heads in their laps, and worms that, when swallowed, cause a boy and his father to write fine poetry until the burgeoning annelids destroy them. At times nauseating, at times darkly humorous, Alexis's playful stories wallow in the grotesque, but the weirdly degenerative physical conditions and lurid sexual scenarios they describe seem not so much comments on bodily vulnerabilities and (im)possibilities as mental and aesthetic exercises—discomfiting workouts for the writer's (and the reader's) imagination. More cerebral than referential, more performative than political, Alexis's narratives are often deliberately solipsistic and self-reflexive; when the street addresses mentioned in diverse stories all include the number 128, or when one story's characters are all named either André Alexis or Andrée Alexis, the author's role as presiding consciousness and metaphysical provocateur becomes as important a subject as anything actually "happening" in the stories.

Much the same can be said of Alexis's meditative first novel, Childhood, though it sheds the stories' outré preoccupations in favor of a firmer grounding in the psychologically and ontologically familiar. Addressing themes of loss, absence, the meaning of love, and the slipperiness of memory, the novel depicts 40-year-old Thomas MacMillan's search for knowledge and understanding of some fascinating but puzzling others, especially the mother who abandoned him at birth. But his introspective narrative of childhood relations turns out to be primarily a quest for the self; "The way to Katarina and Henry [his mother and her lover] is through me," he writes, but the reverse is also true. Having experienced as a child a variety of bewildering deceptions, dislocations, and power struggles, Thomas attempts to reconstruct his memories and order his life; his narrative activity is often displaced by his list-making habit and penchant for diagrams, graphs, and footnotes, all of which rather endearingly, if absurdly, endeavor to explain his world to himself and the enigmatic "you" to whom the novel is addressed. His four section titles-"History," "Geography," "The Sciences," and "Housecleaning" and his relentlessly analytical cast of mind reinforce the impression of an idiosyncratic man struggling nobly to gather the loose strands of his self into a coherent pattern.

One of Alexis's points in this quietly lyrical novel is that the search to make sense of the past and the self that has emerged from it—a well-worn theme of Canadian and international literature—is unavoidably subjective; any construct that results is but one of an infinite number of possible variations. The past is always framed and contaminated by present conditions, and the same story told a year later will be a different one. As Alexis has said in an interview, "all versions of the self are provisional, time-based, and evanescent, but all of these versions are also true, however briefly." In its muted attentiveness to place (Petrolia, Ontario, and Ottawa), to daily minutiae and to delicate maneuverings in intricate relationships, Childhood paints a compelling, if rather narrow, fictional portrait. And although it shares the first book's even, unflashy prose and tone of controlled detachment, it nonetheless resonates emotionally to a degree that the stories do not (nor seem to want to do).

Alexis rejects fashionable labels such as "magic realist," "surrealist," or "postmodern" that might seem to describe his work. And while his Trinidadian roots could place him within West Indian and African-Canadian literary traditions, he accepts these affiliations reluctantly, noting that such writing was not formative to his artistic and intellectual development. As literary influences he cites a diverse group that includes Samuel Beckett, Jorge-Luis Borges, Italo Calvino, Raymond Queneau, Leo Tolstoy, and Marcel Proust, along with the Canadian writers Norman Levine, bpNichol and Margaret Avison. His sensibility is often described as "cosmopolitan," which may be code for "European"; it is notable that the issues of race and racism, exile and displacement that vex so many African-Canadian and African-American writers are virtually absent from Alexis's work. Trinidadian origins, when they are mentioned at all, are typically treated as simple facts of a character's background rather than as sources of anxiety or conflict; their visible difference from the Canadian mainstream goes unnoticed or unremarked by most of Alexis's characters. Whether this represents a denial or a transcendence of the racialized consciousness that his peers' writing so often reflects, Alexis's quirky fiction seems destined to follow its own singular path through the contemporary literary landscape.

—John Clement Ball

ALLISON, Dorothy E.

Nationality: American. Born: Greenville, South Carolina, 11 April 1949. Education: Florida Presbyterian College (now Eckerd College), B.A. 1971; New School for Social Research, M.A. Family: Companion of Alix Layman; children. Awards: Lambda Literary awards, 1989 and 1999. Agent: Frances Goldin, 305 East Eleventh Street, New York, New York 10003, U.S.A. Address: Box 112, Monte Rio, California 95462, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Bastard out of Carolina. New York, Dutton, 1992. Cavedweller. New York, Dutton, 1998.

Short Stories

Trash. Ithaca, New York, Firebrand Books, 1988.

Poetry

The Women Who Hate Me. Brooklyn, New York, Long Haul Press, 1983.

The Women Who Hate Me: Poetry 1980–1990. Ithaca, New York, Firebrand Books, 1991.

Other

Skin: Talking About Sex, Class and Literature. Ithaca, New York, Firebrand Books, 1994.

Two or Three Things I Know for Sure. New York, Dutton, 1995.

Introduction, The Redneck Way of Knowledge: Down-Home Tales, by Blanche McCrary Boyd. New York, Vintage Books, 1995.

Foreword, My Dangerous Desires by Amber L. Hollibaugh. Durham, North Carolina, Duke University Press, 2000.

Contributor, Lesbian Words: State of the Art, edited by Randy Turoff. New York, Masquerade Books, 1995.

Contributor, Ida Applebroog: Nothing Personal, Paintings 1987–1997 by Ida Applebroog. New York, Distributed Art Publishers, 1998.

Contributor, This Is What Lesbian Looks Like, edited by Kris Kleindienst. Ithaca, New York, Firebrand Books, 1999.

Contributor, The Beacon Best of 1999: Creative Writing by Women and Men of All Colors, edited by Ntozake Shange. New York, Beacon Books, 1999.

Contributor, The Mammoth Book of Modern Lesbian Short Stories, edited by Emma Donoghue. New York, Carroll & Graf, 1999.

Contributor, The Vintage Book of International Lesbian Fiction: An Anthology, edited by Naomi Holoch and Joan Nestle. New York, Random/Vintage, 1999.

* * *

Dorothy Allison was born in 1949, to a teenage unwed mother in South Carolina. This fact is central to Allison's literary sensibility, which often takes up the themes of illegitimacy and poverty, marginalization and the rebellion it inspires. Like the writer herself, Allison's characters fashion themselves out of their painful circumstances, not in spite of them.

Out of her impoverished and abusive background, Allison made her way to college on a National Merit Scholarship, and by her early twenties she was living in a feminist commune in Tallahassee, Florida. There she began to take her writing seriously, and in 1988 her first book, Trash, a collection of short stories, was published by a small press. Shortly thereafter, a book of poetry, The Women Who Hated Me, appeared and heightened Allison's reputation in the gay and lesbian literary community.

Allison's first mainstream success came with Bastard Out of Carolina, which was well received by critics and was nominated for the National Book Award. It was also optioned and produced as a TV-movie, though not without controversy. The incest and violence at the narrative core of Bastard frightened off some broadcast executives, but the movie did eventually air on cable television.

A semi-autobiographical novel, Bastard Out of Carolina centers around a young girl, Ruth Anne ("Bone") Boatwright, growing up as "poor white trash" in the small-town South of the 1950s. In addition to her decidedly Southern gift for colorful and resonant dialogue, Allison's characterization drives the novel. We meet the Boatwright aunts, uncles, and cousins and through them Allison convincingly constructs a microcosm through which to view, and to understand, the deeper psychologies of dispossession and violence. The signs of rural poverty—a surfeit of liquor, sex, and quarreling—are there, to be sure, but Allison probes beneath the conventional shorthand to show us "the poor" as people rather than an abstraction. Even more important, and chillingly, she also de-abstracts incest, bringing to the scenes between Bone and her stepfather, Daddy Glen, a disturbingly convincing realism.

Allison's fiction fits well into the category somewhat narrowly defined as Southern Gothic, and she counts one of the style's foremost progenitors, Flannery O'Connor, as her most important literary ancestor. But Allison's sensibility in fact relates to two broad strands in American literature: the first, James Baldwin, Tennessee Williams, Carson McCullers, and what she calls "the whole critical tradition of southern outlaw writers, the queer, disenfranchised and expatriate novelists"; and the second, contemporary working-class novelists such as Sapphire, Terry McMillan, and Jewelle Gomez and work that otherwise shares Allison's feminist preoccupations—the poetry of Audre Lorde and Adrienne Rich, for instance. Indeed, it is not surprising that Allison the novelist would turn to poetry for inspiration. Her prose often reaches the lyrical decibels, and she has said that her novels and stories sometimes begin as poems that, through the editing process, unfold themselves into narrative strands.

In her second novel, Cavedweller, Allison leaves behind the autobiographical impulse of Bastard and invents the story of Delia Byrd, a rock-n-roller who escapes domestic violence and makes it to California, only to return to Cayro, Georgia, a decade later to struggle with alcoholism and craft a new life. Cavedweller is an epic narrative that traces familiar themes in Allison's work—especially maternal love and spiritual hunger.

Allison is also the author of a collection of essays, Skin, and a memoir adapted from a performance piece, Two or Three Things I Know for Sure.

-Michele S. Shauf

ALTHER, Lisa

Nationality: American. Born: Lisa Reed in Kingsport, Tennessee, 23 July 1944. Education: Wellesley College, Massachusetts, 1962–66, B.A. 1966. Family: Married Richard Alther in 1966; one daughter. Career: Editorial assistant, Atheneum Publishers, New York, 1966; staff writer, Garden Way Publishers, Charlotte, Vermont, 1969–72; visiting lecturer, St. Michael's College, Winooski, Vermont, 1980; book reviewer for newspapers and magazines. Lives in Hinesburg, Vermont. Address: c/o Watkins-Loomis Inc., 133 E. 35th St., No.1, New York, New York 10016, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Kinflicks. New York, Knopf, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1976.
Original Sins. New York, Knopf, and London, Women's Press, 1981.
Other Women. New York, Knopf, 1984; London, Viking, 1985.
Bedrock. New York, Knopf, and London, Viking, 1990.
Five Minutes in Heaven. New York, Dutton, and London, Viking, 1995.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Encounter," in McCall's (New York), August 1976.
- "The Art of Dying Well," in A Collection of Classic Southern Humor, edited by George William Koon. Atlanta, Peachtree, 1984.
- "Termites," in Homewords, edited by Douglas Paschall. Knoxville, University of Tennessee Press, 1986.
- "The Politics of Paradise," in Louder than Words, edited by William Shore. New York, Vintage, 1989.

Other

Non-Chemical Pest and Disease Control for the Home Orchard. Charlotte, Vermont, Garden Way, 1973.

Introduction, Tess of the D'Urbervilles: A Pure Woman by Thomas Hardy. New York, Signet Classic, 1999.

Contributor, Ladies Laughing: Wit as Control in Contemporary American Women Writers, edited by Barbara Levy. Amsterdam, Netherlands, Gordon and Breach, 1997.

Contributor, The Best of the Best: 18 New Stories by America's Leading Authors, edited by Elaine Koster and Joseph Pittman. New York, Signet, 1998.

Contributor, Beyond Sex and Romance?: The Politics of Contemporary Lesbian Fiction, edited by Elaine Hutton. Women's Press, 1999.

*

Critical Studies: "Condemned to Survival: The Comic Unsuccessful Suicide" by Marilynn J. Smith, in Comparative Literature Studies (Urbana, Illinois), March 1980; "Alther and Dillard: The Appalachian Universe" by Frederick G. Waase, in Appalachia/America: The Proceedings of the 1980 Appalachian Studies Conference edited by Wilson Somerville, Johnson City, Tennesse, Appalachian Consortium Press, 1981; article in Women Writers of the Contemporary South edited by Peggy Whitman Prenshaw, Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1984.

* * *

Lisa Alther comments with shrewdness, insight—and a hefty measure of irony—upon American types, their trendy habits, and their dreams. Typical though they be, Alther's protagonists are, nevertheless, fully realized individuals who are sometimes despairing, prickly, dense, or self-destructive, but who are also unfailingly interesting folk, often surprisingly courageous survivors. These factors, along with Alther's keen sense of place, her clever manipulation of point of view, and her exploitation of various levels of comedy are the chief strengths of Kinflicks, Original Sins, and Other Women.

Alther's manipulation of point of view contributes to the sprawling effect of her bulky novels even as it helps control them. The picaresque Kinflicks alternates between third-person narration of the present moment as Ginny Babcock Bliss keeps vigil at her mother's deathbed, and first-person flashbacks which hilariously and satirically recount Ginny's penchant for redesigning herself to suit those who successively dominate her affections—parents, gum-chewing football hero, motorcycle hood, lesbian reformer, snow-mobile salesman, disturbed Viet vet, baby daughter. Ultimately, alone but rather more determined, she sets out to suit herself. The distancing effect of Ginny's memories facilitates the bald, raucous humor of the book for, in effect, Ginny is laughing at herself with her readers; the detachment of the third-person narrator in the alternate chapters legislates against melodrama or shallow sentimentality.

Though Original Sins is told in the third person, major sections allow readers to share the consciousness of five protagonists. Members of a huge extended family, sisters Emily and Sally Prince, brothers Jed and Raymond Tatro, and Donny Tatro are inseparable as children, but are later driven apart by circumstances of sex, social class, personal ambition, and race (Donny is black). A bildungsroman, Original Sins depicts youngsters who believe they can do anything, becoming adults who often wonder if anything worthwhile can be done—yet they never stop trying. Other Women, a "delayed bildungsroman," also uses the third person throughout and shifts between the consciousness of its protagonists, Carolyn Kelley, a single mother whose lesbian relationship is dissolving, and her therapist, Hannah Burke. As Hannah counsels Carolyn toward acceptance of herself, adulthood, and responsibility, some of her own very old, deep wounds begin to heal, and the novel concludes with a note of genuine hope symbolized by the women's developing friendship. In Other Women and Original Sins, the availability of each protagonist's thought processes lends immediacy and realism as it arouses empathy. Readers may not fully endorse the protagonists' decisions, but they remain involved and concerned with the characters because their motivations are so clearly drawn. Suitably, the humor in these novels is quieter, developing more from quirks of personality and wry social comment than from the slapstick situations of Kinflicks.

Because both Kinflicks and Original Sins are set primarily in Tennessee, her home state, Alther has been dubbed a regionalist. She recognizes the influence of fellow Southerner Flannery O'Connor upon her literary sensibilities and freely acknowledges the usefulness and attraction of the "ready-made social context" available to Southerners writing about their area (see her article "Will the South Rise Again?," New York Times Book Review, 16 December 1979). It is equally important, however, to note that Alther's settings range across the eastern United States. Her assessment of college life on a New York City campus, her stringent portrayal of the power struggles among supposedly egalitarian Northern civil rights workers (Original Sins), her lovingly drawn Vermont landscapes in Other Women—as well as her acknowledgment that conducting a private life privately is just as difficult in any closed Northern community as it is in a Southern one (Kinflicks)—attest to her understanding of several locales and make explicit the wide scope of her social commentary. In this way, Alther differs a bit from regionalists who imply rather than dramatize the larger applications of their social comment.

Considered by many to be a feminist writer, Alther focuses primarily upon contemporary American women, giving great attention to the limitations thrust upon them, but she also details their selfimposed restrictions and stresses the need for each to assume responsibility for her own life. In an interview with Andrew Feinberg (Horizon, May 1981), she commented, "People are assigned roles because of their external characteristics and then are forced to play them out ... unless they are lucky enough to figure out what is going on and get out." The process of getting out, always painful, sometimes unsuccessful, is the motivational force in Alther's plots and functions as effectively for several male characters as it does for females. Alther's awareness that despite the deep social divisions which exist between many contemporary women and men, there are also shared problems—such as the constrictions of traditionalism, the desire to escape from parents' demands, the difficulties of assimilation into another cultural-geographic region—demonstrates the universality of feminist fiction just as her humor reveals that feminist writers can treat serious subjects without being deadly dull. By modifying critical categories, Lisa Alther produces novels incorporating strong plots and intriguing characterizations with effective social commentary.

The latter part of the 1990s saw nothing new in the way of extended fiction from Alther; however, she continued to pursue a wide-ranging career as reviewer, critic, and commentator. Her efforts included offerings as diverse as an introduction to an edition of Thomas Hardy's Tess of the D'Urbervilles; a discussion included in Beyond Sex and Romance?: The Politics of Contemporary Lesbian Fiction; and a July 1999 piece in the Women's Review of Books about a trip back to her home in east Tennessee. As with much of the world in the information age, Alther found that television, film, and the Internet had greatly increased the sense of connection between this once-isolated region of Tennessee and the outside world.

-Jane S. Bakerman

AMADI, Elechi

Nationality: Nigerian. Born: Aluu, 12 May 1934. Education: University College, Ibadan, 1955–59, B.Sc. in mathematics and physics 1959. Military Service: Served in the Nigerian Federal Army, 1963–66, 1968–69. Family: Married Dorah Ohale in 1957; eight children. Career: Government survey assistant, Calabar, 1953–55, and surveyor, Enugu, 1959–60; science teacher in mission schools, Oba and Ahoada, 1960–63; principal, Asa Grammar School, 1967; administrative officer, 1970–74, and permanent secretary, 1975–83, Government of Rivers State, Port Harcourt; writer-in-residence and Dean of the Faculty of Arts, College of Education, Port Harcourt, 1984–87; Commissioner of Education, 1987–89, and Commissioner of Lands and Housing, 1989–90, Rivers State. Awards: International Writers Program grant, University of Iowa, 1973; Rivers State Silver Jubilee Merit award, 1992. Address: Box 331, Port Harcourt, Nigeria.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Concubine. London, Heinemann, 1966.
The Great Ponds. London, Heinemann, 1969; New York, Day, 1973.
The Slave. London, Heinemann, 1978.
Estrangement. London, Heinemann, 1986.

Plays

Isiburu (in verse: produced Port Harcourt, Nigeria, 1969). London, Heinemann, 1973.

Peppersoup (produced Port Harcourt, Nigeria, 1977). Included in Peppersoup, and The Road to Ibadan, 1977.

The Road to Ibadan (produced Port Harcourt, Nigeria, 1977). Included in Peppersoup, and The Road to Ibadan, 1977.

Peppersoup, and The Road to Ibadan. Ibadan, Onibonoje Press, 1977. Dancer of Johannesburg (produced Port Harcourt, Nigeria, 1979).

Other

Sunset in Biafra: A Civil War Diary. London, Heinemann, 1973.
Ethics in Nigerian Culture. Ibadan and London, Heinemann, 1982.
Translator, with Obiajunwo Wali and Greensille Enyinda, Okwukwo Eri (hymnbook). Port Harcourt, Nigeria, CSS Printers, 1969.
Translator, Okupkpe (prayerbook). Port Harcourt, Nigeria, CSS Printers, 1969.

*

Critical Studies: The Concubine: A Critical View by Alastair Niven, London, Collings, 1981; Elechi Amadi: The Man and His Work by Ebele Eko, Ibadan, Kraft, 1991; Elechi Amadi at 55 (Poems, Short Stories and Papers) edited by W. Feuser and Ebele Eko, Ibadan, Heinemann, 1994; Four Fathers of African Fiction: A Critique of Artistic Flares and Flaws in the Major Works of Amos Tutuola, Cyprian Ekwensi, Chinua Achebe, and Elechi Amadi by Felix Edjeren, Eregha, Nigeria, Ughelli, 1998.

Elechi Amadi comments:

(1991) I like to think of myself as a painter or composer using words in the place of pictures and musical symbols. I consider commitment in fiction a prostitution of literature. The novelist should depict life as he sees it without consciously attempting to persuade the reader to take a particular viewpoint. Propaganda should be left to journalists.

In my ideal novel the reader should feel a sense of aesthetic satisfaction that he cannot quite explain—the same feeling he gets when he listens to a beautiful symphony. For those readers who insist on being taught, there are always things to learn from a faithful portrayal of life in a well-written novel.

* * *

From his first appearance as a novelist, with The Concubine in 1966, Elechi Amadi established himself as a unique figure in African fiction. He was not alone in attempting to convey the day-to-day texture of traditional, pre-colonial life in an African village: Chinua Achebe's Things Fall Apart had already done this, at least to an extent. But he distinguished himself by not offering any explicit contrasts between that traditional world and the one that replaced it. Whereas Things Fall Apart and many other African novels are concerned, in part at least, with the coming of the white man and the effect of that event, Amadi's novels have never emphasized alien influences at all. The action of any of his three novels could have taken place either five years or a century before the colonial intrusion upon the area. Likewise the dilemmas that confront and finally destroy his heroes or heroines derive entirely from the beliefs, practices, and events of their indigenous culture.

The Concubine was followed by The Great Ponds and The Slave. Although not thematically related, all three novels take place in what is recognizably the same Ikweore environment. The action of all three appears to turn upon the working out of a fate that falls on the characters from outside; yet it would be meaningless, in the eyes of this traditional and god-fearing community, to call such a fate unjust. Iheoma, heroine of The Concubine, is powerless to avert her spiritual marriage to the sea-king, a union that prevents her having any successful human relationships. Her attraction thus becomes a fatal one, resulting in the deaths of all those who seek to free her from her condition. Likewise, the hero of The Slave leaves the shrine of Amadioha to which his late father was bound as an osu (cult-slave), and appears to have right on his side in arguing for his emancipation, since he was not actually conceived there. Nevertheless, his brief career in freedom has an obstinately circular form, curving through initial success to a series of disasters that bring him, friendless and alone, back to the shrine he had so hopefully deserted.

Amadi has maintained a nicely judged ambiguity about the meaning of these events, leaving the reader to determine that meaning instead. The society of which he writes would have rejected—and perhaps still rejects—any clear distinction between the natural and spiritual orders of existence. These interpenetrate to such an extent that man cannot demand the mastery of his fate through will alone. The highest he can aspire to is to know his fate and tune his soul to its acceptance. Tragedy springs as much from failure to do this, as from the nature of that fate itself.

-Gerald Moore

AMIS, Martin (Louis)

Nationality: British. Born: Oxford, 25 August 1949; son of Kingsley Amis. Education: Exeter College, Oxford, B.A. (honors) in English 1971. Family: Married 1) Antonia Phillips in 1984 (divorced 1996), two sons; 2) Isabel Fonseca in 1998, one daughter; one daughter from an earlier relationship. Career: Editorial assistant, Times Literary Supplement, London, 1972–75; assistant literary editor, 1975–77, and literary editor, 1977–79, New Statesman, London. Since 1979 full-time writer. Lives in London. Awards: Maugham award, 1974. Agent: Andrew Wylie, New York, New York U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Rachel Papers. London, Cape, 1973; New York, Knopf, 1974.Dead Babies. London, Cape, 1975; New York, Knopf, 1976; as Dark Secrets, St. Albans, Hertfordshire, Triad, 1977.

Success. London, Cape, 1978; New York, Harmony, 1987.

Other People: A Mystery Story. London, Cape, and New York, Viking Press, 1981.

Money: A Suicide Note. London, Cape, 1984; New York, Viking, 1985.

London Fields. London, Cape, 1989; New York, Harmony, 1990.Time's Arrow; or, The Nature of the Offence. London, Cape, and New York, Harmony, 1991.

The Information. New York, Crown Publishing, 1995. Night Train. New York, Harmony Books, 1997.

Short Stories

Einstein's Monsters: Five Stories. London, Cape, and New York, Harmony, 1987.

Heavy Water and Other Stories. New York, Harmony Books, 1999.

Plays

Screenplays: Mixed Doubles, 1979; Saturn 3, 1980.

Other

Invasion of the Space Invaders. London, Hutchinson, 1982.

The Moronic Inferno and Other Visits to America. London, Cape, 1986; New York, Viking, 1987.

Visiting Mrs Nabokov and Other Excursions. London, Cape, 1993; New York, Harmony, 1994.

Introduction, The Adventures of Augie March by Saul Bellow. New York, Knopf, 1995.

Experience: A Memoir. New York, Hyperion, 2000.

*

Bibliography: Bruce Chatwin, Martin Amis, Julian Barnes: A Bibliography of Their First Editions by David Rees, London, Colophon Press, 1992.

Critical Studies: Venus Envy by Adam Mars-Jones, London, Chatto and Windus, 1990; Martians, Monsters, and Madonna: Fiction and Form in the World of Martin Amis by John A. Dern, New York, P. Lang, 2000.

Theatrical Activites: Actor: Film—A High Wind in Jamaica, 1965.

* * *

The buzz surrounding the release of his much anticipated memoir Experience has confirmed Martin Amis's standing as one of the most important contemporary English-language writers. Published in May 2000, Experience is a candid self-portrait of 51-year-old Amis's life, much of which has been played out in public, particularly in the press in his native Britain: his leaving his wife of almost 10 years and his two sons to take up with an American woman; his firing his agent and wife of best friend Julian Barnes in order to secure a more lucrative—some would say extravagant—advance for The Information; his torturous bout of dental reconstruction; and—most importantly—his complex relationship with his most famous critic and one of England's most important writers of the postwar era, his father Kingsley.

In fact, Amis's fiction has often been defined by its relationship to—and difference from—that of his father. Whereas Kingsley's writing adheres to the aesthetic conventions of realism which aspire to narrative objectivity, Martin's novels exemplify the postmodern aesthetic in which narratives call attention to themselves as fictions through the presence of an intrusive narrative voice which is often indistinguishable from that of the author. The themes pervasive in much of Amis's work—self-reflexivity, self-consciousness, epistemological and ontological uncertainty—exemplify the themes of postmodernism and the postmodern novel.

Published in 1973, when Amis was only 24, The Rachel Papers anticipates Amis's concern in future novels with literary and cultural self-consciousness. It is the story of Charles Highway, an articulate and arrogant 19-year-old reflecting on and trying to make sense of his life as he prepares to enter Oxford University—and adulthood. His story is centered around his seduction of Rachel, whom he meets while in London to attend a cram school for Oxford. As Highway's relationship with Rachel develops, his recognition of her corporeality is in contraposition to his fondness for language, in which he ultimately finds more abandon than sex. Generally well-received when it was first published, The Rachel Papers has become one of Amis's best known novels for its witty and candid representation of the transformation from adolescence to adulthood.

In Dead Babies, which followed in 1975, two groups of characters—the repulsively self-indulgent upper class English set of Quentin Villiers and his wife Celia, and the extremely drug-and-sex crazed Americans—team up for a weekend orgy of self-destruction that is not quite self-destruction since it is hurried on by the manipulative malignity of the mysterious "Johnny" who turns out to be none other than an alter ego of one of the "Appleseed Rectory" ravers. This narrative trickery, which allows Amis the freedom to ask questions about good and evil, about psychology and identity, and about the rules of narrative writing, without being stuffy or discursive, became a trademark of subsequent fictions.

Both Success and Other People disappointed certain reviewers, though for different reasons; the former, perhaps, because of its entrapment in some of Amis's obsessions and the latter, perhaps, because it attempted to break away from these obsessions and into new ground. In Success, Gregory Riding is another resident in the vicinity of what Philip Larkin called "fulfillment's desolate attic." He is more repellingly self-infatuated than Charles Highway, but—even despite his incestuous affair with his sister—less purely evil than Quentin Villiers. As the wheel of fortune turns, he loses his superhuman abilities with women and goes poetical and mad. Terry, his foster brother and erstwhile dupe, conversely ends up top dog. The novel is written as a dialogue alternating the narratives of the foster-brothers and subtly contrasting their points of view.

The amnesiac displacement of Mary Swan's sensibility that colors the narrative of Other People, might be thought of as providing some sort of continuity with Gregory's ending of Success. This displaced sensibility provides an opaque window through which we see the world of the novel and its events. These include Mary's escape from the hospital, her stay with a group of tramps and with the alcoholic family of one of them, until this relative domestic security is broken up by the violent Jock and Trev. Mary moves on to a hostel and then to a job as a waitress and a place in a squat where she manages a brief relationship with Alan en route to the world of ordinary domesticity, of the "other people," Prince, the apparently friendly policeman comes with the hints of her previous identity as a sexually predatory girl called Amy Hide, who may or may not have been murdered by a mysterious Mr. Wrong. By the end Mary seems to have rediscovered her old self but only, perhaps, in the sense that she has died into a cyclical afterlife or else returned from the death of the novel into her previous life. The novel's epilogue, in the voice of its intrusive narrator, further draws together hints that Prince may in fact be Mr. Wrong and that either or both may be identical with the narrator, who seems to aggrieved at something Mary has done to him and to be ultimately responsible for her death-in-life. Much of this is deliberately left unresolved and was condemned as incomprehensible by some readers. Other People is consequently Amis's most underrated novel. It demands but also rewards much careful re-reading and, while it is not as funny as his other books, its concerns are close to the lucid center of his art.

The attempt to explore the relationship of narrator to the character and to establish a new and compelling metaphor of narratorial complicity becomes a central thread of Money and also of Amis's 1989 work, London Fields. In Money, the narrator is a grotesque highand-low-life television commercial director called John Self, who jets backwards and forwards across the Atlantic trying to put together a deal to direct his first feature film. Meanwhile, his precarious life falls apart as sexual, financial, and literary plots become entangled in a series of schemes of which Self turns out not to be the perpetrator, as he supposed, but the victim. Money is perhaps Amis's most exemplary postmodern novel, addressing the tenuous distinction between reality and make-believe, high culture and low culture, as well as the uncertainty about gender roles and the place of women in contemporary society. Money also questions the nature of free will in postmodern society, evidenced in Self's pathological suspicion that he is being manipulated by forces that he cannot apprehend. This issue is further complicated by the appearance in the book of Martin Amis, the writer Self hires to work on his screenplay. Amis the character's musings about the relationship between the author and the characters he creates represents the kind of self-reflexivity and the blurring of the distinction between art and life that define postmodern writing.

Keith Talent, the protagonist of London Fields, is still more at home in a west London pub than Self and has an equally welldeveloped taste for the bad. The opening statement "Keith Talent was a bad guy ... ' offers an apparently incontrovertible condemnation of his horrible taste for playing darts, more horrible appetite for video pornography, and completely dreadful habit of saying "Cheers!" and "innit" on all occasions. But Keith, repulsive though he is, is to be upstaged in the novel, both by its postmodern femme fatale Nicola Six and by the grander evil of the narrator Samson Young, whom she lures into being the instrument of her planned self-destruction. In some ways, London Fields is a recasting of some of the ideas in Other People according to the lessons learned in writing Money. It has an undercurrent—new since Amis's post-nuclear stories Einstein's Monsters—of global crisis and eco-consciousness. We are invited to "imagine the atomic cloud as an inverted phallus and Nicola's loins as ground zero." Language glitters again and identity is a hall of mirrors and, like his darting surrogate, Amis is a master of the devastating finish.

The Jewish-American background of the narrator of London Fields (described in the novel's racy idiolect as a "four-wheel Sherman'') may have anticipated the theme of Time's Arrow, whose title had been a provisional title for the previous book. Also reminiscent of the two previous books is Amis's determination to take on the most enormous of the social issues of the 20th century: here it is the Nazi Holocaust and its aftermath. Time's Arrow is Amis's most ambitious technical achievement to date and is, indeed, one of the most extraordinary narrative experiments in existence, almost unprecedented outside of the science fiction of Philip K. Dick. The novel is written in reverse time, tracing a typical American suburban scene of the present back to the concentration camp Auschwitz, where its narrator, Odilo Unverdorben, has been an official. Some readers have complained that the cleverness and showiness of the time experiment detracts from the seriousness of the subject, but this need not be so. Read in the tradition of an experimental and historically traumatized novel like Kurt Vonnegut's Slaughterhouse Five or else backed-up by the critiques of rationalist intellectual constructions provided by postmodernist theoreticians like Theodor Adorno, the disturbances created by the novel's form and by its horrific subject matter hang nightmarishly together.

If Time's Arrow might have led us to expect a development away from the brilliant satire of the early novels towards a more sober and mature seriousness in Amis's work, then The Information must represent something of a disappointment. It is a book that euphorically condemns middle-age but which is surely itself written out of a deeply repressed fear of aging and its disillusionments. In The Information, Amis turns his gaze toward a kind of 40-year-old alter ego called Richard Tull—a novelist who is quite pathetically unsuccessful and who ekes out a modicum of literary income and of self-respect from the occasional review. For the most part, it must be said, Amis's reviewers took this chastening portrait of their craft in fairly good part. While Tull vegetates in the ruins of his ego and ambition, his arch rival Gwyn Barry strides from success to success. Only further disappointments greet Tull, and what the novel calls "the information" is his growing sense of vacuity and despair. Amis is quite relentlessly brilliant here, once again, on the compromises to and erosions of literary ambition that are brought on by domesticity and by the loss of a sentimentally cherished but unattainable ideal. Tull is, in some ways, the most fully fleshed, and the most convincing of all of Amis's postmodern grotesques, and he would quite probably have been the most congenial if the author had once relaxed and allowed him to peep out from beneath the high steel-capped heels of his satire. Neither he, nor the author, seem to contemplate for a moment the redeeming possibility that literary success is neither the only nor the absolute in human values; perhaps much in postmodern culture would lead us to the same conclusion.

Night Train, Amis's ninth and most recent novel, was published in 1997 to mixed reviews, criticized by some for sparseness of style and, as John Updike has said, for its "post-human" quality. Night Train is the story of the jaded, tough-talking female detective Mike Hoolihan whose pointed unsentimentality is shaken by the apparent suicide of her boss's daughter Jennifer, whose grisly death seems incongruous with her charmed life. At her boss's request, Mike undertakes to find Jennifer's killer, as it seems unlikely that her death would have been self-inflicted in light of her personal and professional successes, as well as her apparent optimism and benignity. Mike's investigation yields some startling revelations about her own identity and, more generally, about the development of the female identity in the postmodern world, a theme that is pervasive in much of Amis's work. Perhaps more significantly, Night Train explores the issue of motive in postmodernity, another theme important to Amis's work. In typical Amis fashion, Night Train bucks the conventions of genre, offering a detective story in which motive itself becomes the suspect.

In addition to his memoir Experience and the nine novels, Amis has published the short story collections Einstein's Monsters and Heavy Water and Other Stories as well as numerous essays, many of which have been collected in Invasion of the Space Invaders, The Moronic Inferno and Other Visits to America, and Visiting Mrs. Nabokov and Other Excursions.

-Richard Brown, updated by Alan Rubin

ANAND, Mulk Raj

Nationality: Indian. Born: Peshawar, 12 December 1905. Education: Khalsa College, Amritsar; Punjab University, 1921–24, B.A. (honours) 1924; University College, University of London, 1926–29, Ph.D.; Cambridge University, 1929-30; League of Nations School of Intellectual Cooperation, Geneva, 1930–32. Family: Married 1) Kathleen Van Gelder in 1939 (divorced 1948); 2) Shirin Vajifdar in 1950, one daughter. Career: Lecturer, School of Intellectual Cooperation, Summer 1930, and Workers Educational Association, London, intermittently 1932-45; has also taught at the universities of Punjab, Benares, and Rajasthan, Jaipur, 1948-66; Tagore Professor of Literature and Fine Art, University of Punjab, 1963-66; Visiting Professor, Institute of Advanced Studies, Simla, 1967-68. Fine Art Chairman, Lalit Kala Akademi (National Academy of Art), New Delhi, 1965-70. Since 1946 editor, Marg magazine, Bombay: editor and contributor, Marg Encyclopedia of Art, 136 vols., 1948-81; since 1946 director, Kutub Publishers, Bombay. Since 1970 President of the Lokayata Trust, for creating a community and cultural centre in Hauz Khas village, New Delhi. Awards: Leverhulme fellowship, 1940-42; World Peace Council prize, 1952; Padma Bhushan, India, 1968; Akademi prize, for Morning Face, 1970; Sahitya Academy award, 1974; Birla award; distinguished writer award, State Government of Maharashtra, India. D.Litt: University of Delhi, University of Patiala, University of Andhra, University of Benaras, and University of Kanpur. Fellow, Indian Academy of Letters. Address: 25 Cuffe Parade, Bombay 400 005, India.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Untouchable. London, Wishart, 1935; New York, New York Liberty Press, n.d.; revised edition, London, Bodley Head, 1970.

The Coolie. London, Lawrence and Wishart, 1936; as Coolie, London, Penguin, 1945; New York, Liberty Press, 1952; revised edition, London, Bodley Head, 1972.

Two Leaves and a Bud. London, Lawrence and Wishart, 1937; New York, Liberty Press, 1954.

The Village. London, Cape, 1939.

Lament on the Death of a Master of Arts. Lucknow, Naya Sansar, 1939.

Across the Black Waters. London, Cape, 1940.

The Sword and the Sickle. London, Cape, 1942.

The Big Heart. London, Hutchinson, 1945; revised edition, edited by Saros Cowasjee, New Delhi, Arnold-Heinemann, 1980.

Private Life of an Indian Prince. London, Hutchinson, 1949; revised edition, London, Bodley Head, 1970.

Seven Summers: The Story of an Indian Childhood. London, Hutchinson, 1951.

The Old Woman and the Cow. Bombay, Kutub, 1960; as Gauri, New Delhi, Orient, 1976; Liverpool, Lucas, 1987.

The Road. Bombay, Kutub, 1961; London, Oriental University Press, 1987.

Death of a Hero. Bombay, Kutub, 1963.

Morning Face. Bombay, Kutub, 1968; Liverpool, Lucas, and East Brunswick, New Jersey, Books from India, 1986.

Confession of a Lover. New Delhi, Arnold-Heinemann, 1976; Liverpool, Lucas, 1988.

The Bubble. New Delhi, Arnold-Heinemann, 1987; Liverpool, Lucas, 1988.

Short Stories

The Lost Child and Other Stories. London, J.A. Allen, 1934.

The Barber's Trade Union and Other Stories. London, Cape, 1944.

The Tractor and the Corn Goddess and Other Stories. Bombay, Thacker, 1947.

Reflections on the Golden Bed. Bombay, Current Book House, 1947. The Power of Darkness and Other Stories. Bombay, Jaico, 1958. Lajwanti and Other Stories. Bombay, Jaico, 1966.

Between Tears and Laughter. New Delhi, Sterling, 1973.

Selected Short Stories of Mulk Raj Anand, edited by M.K. Naik. New Delhi, Arnold-Heinemann, 1977.

Tales Told by an Idiot: Selected Short Stories. Mumbai, Jaico Publishing House, 1999.

Play

India Speaks (produced London, 1943).

Other

Persian Painting. London, Faber, 1930.

Curries and Other Indian Dishes. London, Harmsworth, 1932.

The Golden Breath: Studies in Five Poets of the New India. London, Murray, and New York, Dutton, 1933.

The Hindu View of Art. Bombay, Asia Publishing House, and London, Allen and Unwin, 1933; revised edition, Asia Publishing House, 1957.

Letters on India. London, Routledge, 1942.

Apology for Heroism: An Essay in Search of Faith. London, Drummond, 1946.

Homage to Tagore. Lahore, Sangam, 1946.

Indian Fairy Tales: Retold (for children). Bombay, Kutub, 1946.

On Education. Bombay, Hind Kitabs, 1947.

The Bride's Book of Beauty, with Krishna Hutheesing. Bombay, Kutub, 1947; as The Book of Indian Beauty, Rutland, Vermont, Tuttle, 1981.

The Story of India (for children). Bombay, Kutub, 1948.

The King-Emperor's English; or, The Role of the English Language in the Free India. Bombay, Hind Kitabs, 1948.

Lines Written to an Indian Air: Essays. Bombay, Nalanda, 1949.

The Indian Theatre. London, Dobson, 1950; New York, Roy, 1951.

The Story of Man (for children). New Delhi, Sikh Publishing House, 1952.

The Dancing Foot. New Delhi, Ministry of Information, 1957.

Kama Kala: Some Notes on the Philosophical Basis of Hindu Erotic Sculpture. London, Skilton, 1958; New York, Lyle Stuart, 1962.

India in Colour. Bombay, Taraporevala, London, Thames and Hudson, and New York, McGraw Hill, 1959.

More Indian Fairy Tales (for children). Bombay, Kutub, 1961.

Is There a Contemporary Indian Civilisation? Bombay, Asia Publishing House, 1963.

The Story of Chacha Nehru (for children). New Delhi, Rajpal, 1965. The Third Eye: A Lecture on the Appreciation of Art. Patiala, University of Punjab, 1966.

The Humanism of M.K. Gandhi: Three Lectures. Chandigarh, University of Panjab, 1967(?).

The Volcano: Some Comments on the Development of Rabindranath Tagore's Aesthetic Theories. Baroda, Maharaja Sayajirao University, 1968.

Roots and Flowers: Two Lectures on the Metamorphosis of Technique and Content in the Indian-English Novel. Dharwar, Karnatak University, 1972.

Mora. New Delhi, National Book Trust, 1972.

Author to Critic: The Letters of Mulk Raj Anand, edited by Saros Cowasjee. Calcutta, Writers Workshop, 1973.

Album of Indian Paintings. New Delhi, National Book Trust, 1973. Folk Tales of Punjab. New Delhi, Sterling, 1974.

Seven Little-Known Birds of the Inner Eye. Rutland, Vermont, Tuttle, 1978.

The Humanism of Jawaharlal Nehru. Calcutta, Visva-Bharati, 1978.The Humanism of Rabindranath Tagore. Aurangabad, Marathwada University, 1979.

Maya of Mohenjo-Daro (for children). New Delhi, Children's Book Trust, n.d.

Conversations in Bloomsbury (reminiscences). New Delhi, Arnold-Heinemann, and London, Wildwood House, 1981.

Madhubani Painting. New Delhi, Ministry of Information and Broadcasting, 1984; Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1995. Pilpali Sahab: Story of a Childhood under the Raj (autobiography). New Delhi, Arnold-Heinemann, 1985.

Poet-Painter: Paintings by Rabindranath Tagore. New Delhi, Abhinav, 1985

Homage to Jamnalal Bajaj: A Pictorial Biography. Ahmedabad, Allied, 1988.

Amrita Sher Gill: An Essay in Interpretation. New Delhi, National Gallery of Modern Art, 1989.

Kama Yoga. New Delhi, Arnold, and Edinburgh, Aspect, n.d.

Chitralakshana (on Indian painting). New Delhi, National Book Trust, n.d.

Afterword, The Panorama of Jaipur Paintings by Rita Pratap. New Delhi, D. K. Printworld, 1996.

Afterword, Price of Partition: Recollections and Reflections by Rafiq Zakaria. Mumbai, Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan, 1998.

Afterword, V. K. Krishna Menon: A Biography by K. C. Arora. New Delhi, Sanchar Publishing House, 1998.

Editor, Marx and Engels on India. Allahabad, Socialist Book Club, 1933

Editor, with Iqbal Singh, Indian Short Stories. London, New India, 1947.

Editor, Introduction to Indian Art, by A.K. Coomaraswamy. Madras, Theosophical Publishing House, and Wheaton, Illinois, Theosophical Press, 1956.

Editor, Experiments: Contemporary Indian Short Stories. Agra, Kranchalson, 1968.

Editor, Annals of Childhood. Agra, Kranchalson, 1968.

Editor, Grassroots. Agra, Kranchalson, 1968(?).

Editor, Tales from Tolstoy. New Delhi, Arnold-Heinemann, 1978.

Editor, with Lance Dane, Kama Sutra of Vatsyayana (from translation by Sir Richard Burton and F.F. Arbuthnot). New Delhi, Arnold-Heinemann, and Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey, Humanities Press, 1982.

Editor, with S. Balu Rao, Panorama: An Anthology of Modern Indian Short Stories. New Delhi, Sterling, 1986; London, Oriental University Press, 1987.

Editor, Chacha Nehru. New Delhi, Sterling, 1987.

Editor, Aesop's Fables. New Delhi, Sterling, 1987.

Editor, The Historic Trial of Mahatma Gandhi. New Delhi, National Council of Educational Research and Training, 1987.

Editor, The Other Side of the Medal, by Edward Thompson. New Delhi, Sterling, 1989.

Editor, Sati: A Writeup of Raja Ram Mohan Roy about Burning of Widows Alive. New Delhi, B.R. Publishing, 1989.

Editor, Splendors of Himachal Heritage. New Delhi, Abhinav Publications, 1997.

*

Bibliography: Mulk Raj Anand: A Checklist by Gillian Packham, Mysore, Centre for Commonwealth Literature and Research, 1983.

Critical Studies: Mulk Raj Anand: A Critical Essay by Jack Lindsay, Bombay, Hind Kitabs, 1948, revised edition, as The Elephant and the Lotus, Bombay, Kutub, 1954; "Mulk Raj Anand Issue" of Contemporary Indian Literature (New Delhi), 1965; An Ideal of Man in Anand's Novels by D. Riemenschneider, Bombay, Kutub, 1969; Mulk Raj Anand: The Man and the Novelist by Margaret Berry, Amsterdam, Oriental Press, 1971; Mulk Raj Anand by K.N. Sinha, New York, Twayne, 1972; Mulk Raj Anand by M.K. Naik, New Delhi, and London, Arnold-Heinemann, and New York, Humanities Press, 1973; Anand: A Study of His Fiction in Humanist Perspective by G.S. Gupta, Bareilly, Prakash, 1974; So Many Freedoms: A Study of the Major Fiction of Mulk Raj Anand by Saros Cowasjee, New Delhi and London, Oxford University Press, 1978; Perspectives on Mulk Raj Anand edited by K.K. Sharma, Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey, Humanities Press, 1978; The Yoke of Pity: A Study in the Fictional Writings of Mulk Raj Anand by Alastair Niven, New Delhi, Arnold-Heinemann, 1978; The Sword and the Sickle: A Study of Mulk Raj Anand's Novels by K.V. Suryanarayana Murti, Mysore, Geetha, 1983; The Novels of Mulk Raj Anand: A Thematic Study by Premila Paul, New Delhi, Sterling, 1983; The Wisdom of the Heart: A Study of the Works of Mulk Raj Anand by Marlene Fisher, New Delhi, Sterling, 1985; Studies in Mulk Raj Anand by P.K. Rajan, New Delhi, Arnold, 1986; Mulk Raj Anand: A Home Appraisal edited by Atma Ram, Hoshairpur, Punjab, Chaarvak, 1988; The Language of Mulk Raj Anand, Raja Rao, and R.K. Narayan by Reza Ahmad Nasimi, New Delhi, Capital, 1989; Mulk Raj Anand: A Short Story Writer by Vidhya Mohan Shethi, New Delhi, Ashish, n.d; Six Indian Novelists: Mulk Raj Anand, Raja Rao, R.K. Narayan, Balachandran Rajan, Kamala Markandaya, Anita Desai by A. V. Suresh Kumar, New Delhi, Creative Books, 1996; Mulk Raj Anand: The Journalist by Gita Bamezai, New Delhi, Kanishka Publishers, 2000.

Mulk Raj Anand comments:

I began to write early—a kind of free verse in the Punjabi and Urdu languages, from the compulsion of the shock of the death of my cousin when she was nine years old. I wrote a letter to God telling him He didn't exist. Later, going through the dark night of another bereavement, when my aunt committed suicide because she was excommunicated for interdining with a Muslim woman, I wrote an elegy. Again, when I fell in love with a young Muslim girl, who was married off by arrangement, I wrote calf love verse. The poetphilosopher, Muhammad Iqbal, introduced me to the problems of the individual through his long poem "Secrets of the Self." Through him, I also read Nietzsche to confirm my rejection of God. After a short term in jail, my father, who was pro-British, punished my mother for my affiliations with the Gandhi Movement. I went to Europe and studied various philosophical systems and found that these comprehensive philosophies did not answer life's problems. I was beaten up for not blacklegging against workers in 1926, in the coal-miner's strike. I joined a Marxist worker's study circle with Trade Unionist Alan Hutt, and met Palme-Dutt, John Strachey, T.S. Eliot, Herbert Read, Bonamy Dobrée, Harold Laski, Leonard Woolf. During that time I fell in love with a young Welsh girl painter, Irene, whose father was a biologist. For her I wrote a long confession about the break-up of my family, the British impact, and my later life. Nobody would publish the narrative. So I began to rewrite portions, as allegories, short stories, and novels. On a tour with Irene, in Paris, Rome, Vienna, Berlin, Brussels, I discovered Rimbaud, Gide, and Joyce. My first attempt at a novel was revised in Gandhi's Sabarmati Ashram in Ahmedabad, but was turned down by 19 publishers in London. The 20th offered to publish it if E.M. Forster wrote a Preface. This the author of A Passage to India did.

Since the publication of this first novel, I have written continuously on the human situation in the lives of people of rejects, outcasts, peasants, lumpen, and other eccentrics, thrown up during the transition from the ancient orthodox Indian society to the self-conscious modernist secular democracy.

I believe that creating literature is the true medium of humanism as against systematic philosophies, because the wisdom of the heart encourages insights in all kinds of human beings who grow to self-consciousness through conflicts of desire, will, and mood. I am inclined to think that the highest aim of poetry and art is to integrate the individual into inner growth and outer adjustment. The broken bundle of mirrors of the human personality in our time can only become the enchanted mirror if the sensibility is touched in its utmost pain and sheer pleasure and tenderest moments. No rounded answers are possible. Only hunches, insights, and inspirations and the karuna that may come from understanding.

The novelist's task is that of an all-comprehending "God," who understands every part of his creation, through pity, compassion, or sympathy—which is the only kind of catharsis possible in art. The world is itself action of the still center. The struggle to relate the word and the deed in the life of men is part of the process of culture, through which illumination comes to human beings. The world of art is communication from one individual to another, or to the group through the need to connect. This may ultimately yield the slogan "love one another," if mankind is to survive (against its own inheritance of fear, hatred, and contempt, now intensified through money-power, or privileges, and large-scale violence of wars) into the 21st century, in any human form.

* * *

Mulk Raj Anand is the champion of the underdog. All his novels deal with the underprivileged sections of Indian society. He was the first Indian novelist to make an untouchable the hero of a novel. Untouchable describes one day in the life of 18-year-old Bakha, who is treated as dirt by all Hindus just because his profession is to clean latrines. Artistically it is the most perfect of Anand's earlier novels. The distinction of Anand's writing lies in capturing Bakha's work ethic—Bakha tackles his odious job with a conscientiousness that invests his movements with beauty. The next novel, Coolie, has a wider canvas and is more diffuse in structure. Munoo, a young orphan, works at a variety of odd jobs at Daulatpur, Bombay, and Simla till he dies aged 15 of tuberculosis brought on by undernourishment. Munoo is exploited not because of caste but because he is poor. Two Leaves and a Bud is about the plight of the laborers in a tea plantation in Assam; the novel fails because Anand's approach is too simplistic; the English owners are shown as unmitigated villains. Anand's next work was a trilogy with the young Lal Singh as hero. The Village is an authentic picture of a typical Punjabi village, and shows the adolescent Lal Singh rebelling against the narrow superstitions of the villagers—he goes so far as to cut his hair, unthinkable for a Sikh. Across the Black Waters shows Lal as a soldier fighting in the trenches of Flanders in World War I; his contact with the French makes him realize that the white races too are human, and not demigods like the British in India. The Sword and the Sickle shows Lal engaged in revolutionary activities in India after eloping with the village landlord's daughter; it is not as well written as the earlier two Anand is a prolific writer, and has written a large number of extremely varied short stories. They reveal his gift for humor, and deal in a lighter vein with the problems that engage him in his novels—the exploitation of the poor, the impact of industrialization, colonialism, and race relations. One of Anand's best novels, The Big Heart, deals with the traditional coppersmiths who feel threatened by mechanization. The large-hearted Ananta tries to weld them into a trade union; he tells them that it is not the machines but the owners who exploit them, but he dies in a scuffle before his ideals can be realized.

The Old Woman and the Cow (republished as Gauri) takes up the plight of another underprivileged section of society-women. The heroine, Gauri, is sold to an old money-lender by her own mother out of economic necessity. Gauri re-enacts the Ramayana myth of Sita by staying for some time in the house of the old banker, just as Sita had to stay with Ravana. Gauri is reunited with her husband Panchi just as Sita was reunited with Rama, and Panchi rejects her later, just as Rama rejected the pregnant Sita because of social pressures. At this point, Anand gives a new turn to the old myth: unlike Sita who bore her sufferings meekly, Gauri rejects her cowardly husband and goes on to build a new life for herself. The story is well conceived and the use of the myth original, but the writing is hurried and slipshod, the harangues on social justice not organic to the plot. Private Life of an Indian Prince, a study of a neurotic maharajah, is confused and disorganized; some critics, however, have defended the narrative as a true reflection of the hero's psyche, and consider it Anand's best novel.

Anand is now at work on an ambitious seven-volume autobiographical novel, The Seven Ages of Man. Seven Summers, published more than four decades ago, is a lyrical account of early childhood, primarily from the child's point of view. Morning Face describes the life of the protagonist, Krishan Chander Azad, up to the age of 15, and we get a vivid picture of the brutality that once passed for schoolteaching. Confessions of a Lover deals with Krishan's undergraduate days at Khalsa College, Amritsar. The novel is not only a moving human document, it is an authentic account of life in the Punjab in the 1920's, and records the ferment caused by Gandhi's satyagraha. The fourth volume, The Bubble, covers the period 1925-29; it shows Krishan as a student in England, obtaining a Ph.D. degree. He falls in love with Irene Rhys, and pours out his feelings by writing a long novel (just as Anand did in real life). Most of Anand's works have a linear structure, but The Bubble departs from this convention. It is in the form of letters, diary entries, and excerpts from the novel Krishan is writing; it also includes numerous philosophical discussions. The life of an Indian student in England of the time, and particularly Krishan's loneliness, are impressively portrayed. But, like Morning Face and Confessions of a Lover, The Bubble is too long (600 pages). If only the "outpourings" had been sensitively edited, The Bubble would have been Anand's best work, and a triumph in terms of technique.

The forthcoming And So He Plays His Part is the fifth volume of The Seven Ages of Man. Anand observes in his "Afterwords" (sic), "As the forthcoming novel entitled And So He Plays His Part is seven novels in one, I have decided to issue it in parts, beginning with Little Plays of Mahatma Gandhi, as work in progress, symbolic of my departure from the accepted form." This "novel" is in the form of 15 scenes of a drama, framed by a long letter to Irene and a postscript to this letter, and shows the hero Krishan Chaner Azad living in Gandhi's ashram at Sabarmati, working on a novel with an untouchable as hero. All the characters, including historical figures like Gandhi and Subhas Chandra Bose, speak the same bad English, and the exclamation mark seems to be the only punctuation in their speeches. The innumerable mistakes of spelling and grammar (perhaps the printer is to blame) make it difficult for the reader to appreciate Anand's new perspective on Mahatma Gandhi.

Anand attempts to capture the ambiance of Punjabi life by literally translating words and phrases, but this device does not always succeed. Readers outside the Punjab may find it difficult to make anything of phrases like "there is no talk," and "May I be your sacrifice." However, Anand is successful in presenting a vivid picture of the Punjabi peasant and the problems of the poor. The range of his novels is impressive, covering not only the Punjab but life in towns like Bombay and Simla, the trenches of Flanders, and the tea gardens of Assam. His concern for the underdog does not take the form of communism—he is above all a humanist, and his humanism embraces all aspects of life, from contemporary slums to ancient Indian art and philosophy.

—Shyamala A. Narayan

ANAYA, Rudolfo A(lfonso)

Nationality: American. Born: Pastura, New Mexico, 30 October 1937. Education: Albuquerque High School, graduated 1956; Browning Business School, Albuquerque, 1956-58; University of New Mexico, Albuquerque, B.A. in literature 1963, M.A. in literature 1968, M.A. in guidance and counseling 1972. Family: Married Patricia Lawless in 1966. Career: Teacher, Albuquerque public schools, 1963-70. Director of Counseling, 1971-73, associate professor 1974–88, professor of English, 1988–93, and since 1993, professor emeritus, University of New Mexico. Lecturer, Universidad Anahuac, Mexico City, Summer 1974; teacher, New Mexico Writers Workshop, Albuquerque, summers 1977–79. Associate editor, American Book Review, New York, 1980-85. Since 1989 founding editor, Blue Mesa Review, Albuquerque. Vice-president, Coordinating Council of Literary Magazines, 1974–80. Awards: Quinto Sol prize, 1971; University of New Mexico Mesa Chicana award, 1977; City of Los Angeles award, 1977; New Mexico Governor's award, 1978, 1980; National Chicano Council on Higher Education fellowship, 1978; National Endowment for the Arts fellowship, 1979; Before Columbus Foundation award, 1980; Corporation for Public Broadcasting Script Development award, 1982; Kellogg Foundation fellowship, 1983; Mexican Medal of Friendship, 1986. D.H.L.: University of Albuquerque, 1981; Marycrest College, Davenport, Iowa, 1984. Address: 5324 Canada Vista N.W., Albuquerque, New Mexico 87120, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Bless Me, Ultima. Berkeley, California, Quinto Sol, 1972.

Heart of Aztlán. Berkeley, California, Justa, 1976.

Tortuga. Berkeley, California, Justa, 1979.

The Legend of La Llorona. Berkeley, California, Tonatiuh-Quinto Sol, 1984.

Lord of the Dawn: The Legend of Quetzalcoatl. Albuquerque, University of New Mexico Press, 1987.

Alburquerque. Albuquerque, University of New Mexico Press, 1992. Zia Summer. New York, Warner, 1995.

Jalamanta: A Message from the Desert. New York, Warner, 1996.

Rio Grande Fall. New York, Warner Books, 1996.

Shaman Winter. New York, Warner Books, 1999.

Short Stories

The Silence of Llano. Berkeley, California, Tonatiuh-Quinto Sol, 1982.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Captain," in A Decade of Hispanic Literature. Houston, Revista Chincano-Riqueña, 1982.
- "The Road to Platero," in Rocky Mountain (St. James, Colorado), April 1982.
- "The Village Which the Gods Painted Yellow," in Nuestro, January-February 1983.
- "B. Traven Is Alive and Well in Cuernavaca," in Cuentos Chicanos, revised edition. Albuquerque, University of New Mexico Press, 1984.
- "In Search of Epifano," in Voces. Albuquerque, El Norte-Academia, 1987.

Plays

The Season of La Llorona (produced Albuquerque, 1979). Who Killed Don Jose? (produced Albuquerque, 1987). The Farolitos of Christmas (produced Albuquerque, 1987). New

The Farolitos of Christmas (produced Albuquerque, 1987). New York, Hyperion, 1995.

Screenplay (documentary): Bilingualism: Promise for Tomorrow, 1976.

Poetry

The Adventures of Juan Chicaspatas. Houston, Arte Publico Press, 1985

Other

A Chicano in China. Albuquerque, University of New Mexico Press, 1986.

Flow of the River. Albuquerque, Hispanic Culture Foundation, 1988. The Anaya Reader. New York, Warner, 1995.

Maya's Children: The Story of La Llorona, illustrated by Maria Baca. New York, Hyperion Books for Children, 1997.

Farolitos for Abuelo, illustrated by Edward Gonzales. New York, Hyperion Books for Children, 1998.

My Land Sings: Stories from the Rio Grande, illustrated by Amy Cordova. New York, Morrow Junior Books, 1999.

Roadrunner's Dance, illustrated by David Diaz. New York, Hyperion Books for Children, 2000.

An Elegy on the Death of Cesar Chavez, with illustrations by Gaspar Enriquez. El Paso, Texas, Cinco Puntos Press, 2000.

Contributor, Muy Macho: Latin Men Confront Their Manhood, edited by Ray Gonzales. New York, Anchor, 1996.

Contributor, The Floating Borderlands: Twenty-Five Years of U.S. Hispanic Literature, edited by Lauro Flores. Seattle, University of Washington Press, 1999.

Contributor, Saints and Sinners: The American Catholic Experience through Stories, Memoirs, Essays, and Commentary, edited by Greg Tobin. New York, Doubleday, 1999.

Editor, with Jim Fisher, Voices from the Rio Grande. Albuquerque, Rio Grande Writers Association, 1976.

Editor, with Antonio Márquez, Cuentos Chicanos. Albuquerque, New America, 1980; revised edition, Albuquerque, University of New Mexico Press, 1984.

Editor, with Simon J. Ortiz, A Ceremony of Brotherhood 1680–1980. Albuquerque, Academia, 1981.

Editor, Voces: An Anthology of Nuevo Mexicano Writers. Albuquerque, El Norte-Academia, 1987.

Editor, with Francisco A. Lomeli, Atzlan: Essays on the Chicano Homeland. Albuquerque, El Norte-Academia, 1989.

Editor, Tierra: Contemporary Short Fiction of New Mexico. El Paso, Texas, Cinco Puntos Press, 1989.

Foreword, Dictionary of Hispanic Biography, edited by Joseph C. Tardiff and L. Mpho Mabunda. Detroit, Gale, 1996.

Translator, Cuentos: Tales from the Hispanic Southwest, Based on Stories Originally Collected by Juan B. Rael, edited by José Griego y Maestas. Santa Fe, Museum of New Mexico Press, 1980.

*

Manuscript Collection: Zimmerman Library, University of New Mexico, Albuquerque.

Critical Studies: "Extensive/Intensive Dimensionality in Anaya's Bless Me, Ultima" by Daniel Testa, in Latin American Literary Review (Pittsburgh), Spring-Summer 1977; "Degradacion y Regeneracion en Bless Me, Ultima" by Roberto Cantu, in The Identification and Analysis of Chicano Literature edited by Francisco Jimenez, New York, Bilingual Press, 1979; Chicano Authors: Inquiry by Interview edited by Juan Bruce-Novoa, Austin, University of Texas Press, 1980; The Magic of Words: Rudolfo A. Anaya and His Writings edited by Paul Vassallo, Albuquerque, University of New Mexico Press, 1982; article by Anaya, in Contemporary Authors Autobiography Series 4 edited by Adele Sarkissian, Detroit, Gale, 1986; Rudolfo A. Anaya: Focus on Criticism edited by César A. González-T., La Jolla, California, Lalo Press, 1990 (includes bibliography by Teresa Márquez); Keep Blessing Us, Ultima: A Teaching Guide for Bless Me, Ultima by Rudolfo Anaya by Abelardo Baeza, Austin, Texas, Easkin Press, 1997; Conversations with Rudolfo Anaya, edited by Bruce Dick and Silvio Sirias, Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1998; A Sense of Place: Rudolfo A. Anaya: An Annotated Bio-Bibliography by Cesar A. Gonzalez, Berkeley, University of California Press, 1999; Rudolfo A. Anaya: A Critical Companion by Margarite Fernandez Olmos, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1999.

Rudolfo A. Anaya comments:

(1995) I was born and raised in the eastern llano, plains country, of New Mexico. I spent my first 14 years in Santa Rosa, New Mexico, a town bisected by the Pecos River and Highway 66. My ancestors were the men and women of the Rio Grande Valley of the Albuquerque area who went east to settle the llano.

The llano was important for grazing sheep, and yet there were along the Pecos river little farming communities. My mother's family comes from such a small Hispanic village, Puerto de Luna. The most important elements of my childhood are the people of those villages and the wide open plains, and the landscape.

In my first novel, Bless Me, Ultima, I used the people and the environment of my childhood as elements of the story. Like my protagonist, Antonio, my first language was Spanish. I was shaped by the traditions and culture of the free-wheeling cow punchers and sheep herders of the llano, a lifestyle my father knew well, and was also initiated into the deeply religious, Catholic settled life of the farmers of Puerto de Luna, my mother's side of the family.

The oral tradition played an important role in my life. I learned about story from the cuentistas, the oral storytellers. It is a tradition one often loses when one moves into print, but its elements are strong and as valuable today as they have been historically. I want my literature to be accessible to my community, and I want it to reflect the strands of history which define us.

Because the Mexican American community has existed within the larger Anglo American society since the 19th century, and legally since 1848, our place in the history of this country is unique. We have a long history in the southwest, in the western United States. That history is generally not well known. Cultural identity is important to us as a way to keep the values and traditions of our forefathers intact.

In the 1960s the Mexican Americans created a social, political, and artistic movement known as the Chicano Movement. As a writer, I was an active participant in that movement. My second novel, Heart of Aztlán, deals with themes in the Chicano Movement. The novel explores a return to Mexican mythology. Chicano artists and writers like me returned to Mexican legends, mythology, and symbolism to create part of our Chicano expression.

When I was 16 I hurt my back and stayed a summer in a hospital. In Tortuga, I explored some of the consequences of that stay. The hero of the story is a young man who must find some redemption in suffering. The mythopoeic forces which had influenced my first two novels also are at work in the healing process which the protagonist must undergo.

Western writers reflect their landscape. We cannot escape the bond we have to our environment, the elements, especially water. As a Chicano writer I am part of a community which for the first time in our contemporary era has produced enough literary works to create a literary movement. Prior to the 1960s western literature was written about us, but seldom by us. Now the world has a truer insight into our world; the view is now from within as more and more Chicano and Chicana writers explore their reality.

Recently my work has taken a turn, and I have written my first murder mystery, Zia Summer. Although the form has certain requirements, often called the formula of a murder mystery, I have found the genre an interesting way to communicate my ideas. As an insider into Nuevo Mexicano (New Mexico) culture, I explore the cultural history of the region. I want my work to reflect the values of those ancestors who have lived in the Rio Grande Valley for so many centuries.

I am very interested in the spiritual values that are my inheritance, both from the Spanish/Mexican heritage and from the Native American side. As a mestizo, a person born from these two broad streams (or more correctly, from many inheritances), I want to create a synthesis, a worldview. I use the murder mystery genre as a tale of contemporary adventure, but the story within is laden with the cultural depth and richness that is our way of life. Ancestral values are the substratum of my work, as they have always been. I hope this new type of "adventure" fiction creates a mirror for our contemporary journey, a point of discussion of our world view.

This turn in my writing has been most enjoyable. The page-turning quality of the murder mystery allows me to have fun. Yes, fun. A writer should enjoy his work in spite of the cost. Each one of us suffers his own pain. But the new form also has a serious intent. It still allows me the deeper exploration that is part of my search for meaning.

An example of this continuing journey of knowledge is a novella called Jalamant, the Prophet, which I wrote in 1994. The continuing clarity of the worldview I was exploring in the murder mystery series became strong enough to require a coalescing in this philosophical work.

So nothing is lost to the writer. There is a pattern, and the communication to the reader continues in new forms.

* * *

Rudolfo A. Anaya is best known for a trilogy of novels published during the 1970s. Although Bless Me, Ultima; Heart of Aztlán; and Tortuga offer separate worlds with different characters, there are suggestions and allusions in the second and third novels that loosely connect the three works.

Bless Me, Ultima, a first-person narrative, details the childhood and coming of age of young Antonio Marez, a boy who grows up in the rural environs of Las Pasturas and Guadalupe, New Mexico, in the late 1940s and early 1950s. Behind almost every experience and adventure Antonio undergoes there is Ultima, a "cuarandera" who comes to live with the Marez family at the start of the novel. She is a miracle-worker who heals the sick through her extensive knowledge of the herbs and remedies of the ancient New Mexico settlers. Guided by her unseen but pervasively felt presence, Antonio moves through a series of incidents that show him the greed, evil, and villainy of men. The novel is significant mainly because it introduces characters and a type of writing not seen before in Chicano literature.

Heart of Aztlán, despite winning the Before Columbus Foundation American Book award, fared less well than its predecessor. The main character is Clemente Chavez, a farmer who loses his land at the start of the narrative and is forced to move into a barrio in Albuquerque. In the city, the Chavez family see their teenage children lose themselves in drugs, sex, and violence. Prompted by a desire to preserve his family, Clemente undertakes a soul-searching quest for an identity and a role for himself and the Chicanos in the barrio. The writing here is noticeably more labored than in Ultima. The book ends with a Chicano march against the oppressive Santa Fe Railroad, an attempt to provide a fictive analogue to the Chicano consciousness-raising efforts of the 1970s.

In Tortuga, Anaya engagingly captured life in a sanitarium for terminally ill teenagers. There is plenty happening in this labyrinthine ward in the desert, and the novel shows that Anaya is particularly adept at plausibly instilling life, vigor, and reasons to live into characters abandoned by society.

Anaya has also published work in other genres. For some time he has been interested in using the media to advance the interests of Spanish-speaking American citizens, and in 1976 he wrote a screenplay, Bilingualism: Promise for Tomorrow, which was produced as a documentary and aired on prime-time television. He is a tireless promoter of Chicano and other ethnic literatures and has edited a number of anthologies.

The Adventures of Juan Chicaspatas is something of a departure: a 48-page mock-heroic epic poem that employs the same type of search motif used in Heart of Aztlán. Anaya's tone and attitude here are quite different from that of his earlier work. In Heart of Aztlán, he was seriously engaged in creating a language appropriate to rendering one character's quest for self-definition, but Juan Chicaspatas (literally, John Smallfeet) is written in the language of the "vatos locos," or crazy barrio Chicanos who jest at virtually everything. In passing, Anaya pointed out that there are "many tribes of Chicanos," which suggests that there are different languages as well. The prime message of the sixteenth-century Aztlán goddess is: "Go and tell your people about Aztláan. Tell them I live. Tell them the españoles will come and a new people will be born. Tell them not to become like the tribes of the Anglos, and remind them not to honor King Arthur. Tell them their Eden and their Camelot are in Aztlán. Their covenant is with the earth of this world." Anaya's message had not changed, but now the appeal was made not to the more middle-class Chicanos as in the earlier work, but in a language closer to that of Alurista and Sergio Elizondo, two other writers who take great relish in Chicano slang.

A writer given to prodigious output, Anaya in the late 1990s produced two novels for adults (Rio Grande Fall and Shaman Winter) as well as numerous books for children, along with nonfiction works and contributions to anthologies.

-Marco Portales

ANDERSON, Barbara

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Barbara Lillian Romaine, 14 April 1926. Education: Woodford House secondary school, 1939–43; University of Otago, Dunedin, 1944–46, B.A. 1946; Victoria University, Wellington, 1979–83, B.A. 1983. Family: Married Neil Anderson in 1951; two sons. Career: Science teacher, Samuel Marsden Collegiate School, Wellington, 1947, Hastings Girls' High School, 1961, and Queen Margaret's College, Wellington, 1964–67; medical laboratory technologist, public hospitals in Napier, 1948–51, and Wellington, 1972–78. Awards: Queen Elizabeth II Arts Council grant, 1988, 1991; Victoria University fellowship, 1991; Goodman Fielder Wattie award, for Portrait of the Artist's Wife, 1992. Agent: Caroline Dawnay, Peters Fraser and Dunlop, 503–504 The Chambers, Chelsea Harbour, Lots Road, London SW10 OXF. Address: 36 Beauchamp Street, Karori, Wellington, New Zealand.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Girls High. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1990; London, Secker and Warburg, 1991.

Portrait of the Artist's Wife. Wellington, Victoria University Press, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1992; New York, Norton and Norton, 1993.

All the Nice Girls. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1993; London, Cape, 1994.

The House Guest. Wellington, New Zealand, Victoria University Press, 1995.

Proud Garments. Wellington, New Zealand, Victoria University Press, 1996.

Long Hot Summer. Wellington, New Zealand, Victoria University Press, 1999.

Short Stories

I Think We Should Go into the Jungle. Wellington, Victoria University Press, 1989; London, Secker and Warburg, 1993.

The Peacocks: And Other Stories. Wellington, New Zealand, Victoria University Press, 1997.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "I Thought There'd Be a Couch," in Vital Writing: New Zealand Stories and Poems, 1989–90. N.p., Godwit Press, 1990.
- "We Could Celebrate," in Speaking with the Sun. Sydney, Allen and Unwin, 1991.

Play

Gorillas (produced Wellington, 1990).

Radio Plays: Eric, 1983; Impossible to Tell, 1984; Hotbed, 1984; Close Shave, 1988; The Couch, 1988; Backwards Glance, 1990.

* * *

Barbara Anderson may not have been published until she was in her sixties, but since beginning, the works have tumbled over themselves to be released to a growing readership. Anderson explores the inner workings of everyday lives, with all their incongruities and foibles, making the reader witness to the often contradictory nature of family life and romantic love. The short stories in her first published work, I Think We Should Go into the Jungle are an eclectic collection, demonstrating a variety of thematic interests that defy easy categorization. Anderson's technique, however, is more easily definable. She often constructs her stories out of the tension of unlikely conjunctions and juxtapositions. Gaps found in the strange marriage of extraordinarily disparate ideas provide the reader with the space for creative intervention, which is a prerequisite for any story's completion. In Anderson's view, the story is not entirely an authorial product. It is produced through the combined efforts of reader and writer. Anderson has described herself as a devotee of the "fleeting-glimpse school of short fiction" and it is these glimpses which take the reader on a journey behind the scenes in ordinary lives that in the writing are never merely ordinary, in fact they teem with imaginative inconsistencies which Anderson paints with a characteristic wry humor and attention to detail.

The last two stories of I Think We Should Go into the Jungle anticipate the characters and locale of her second work, Girls High. Anderson's shift into the discontinuous narrative structure of Girls High, is signposted via the episodic variety of "School Story," which anticipates the plural points of view employed in Girls High. Like the minimalist plotting of Girls High, "School Story" is held together by the rivalry of Miss Franklin and Miss Tamp. In the final story in I Think We Should Go into the Jungle, "Fast Post," Anderson inaugurates what would be a recurring theme in Girls High as well as later novels, namely, the proximity of sex and mortality.

In Girls High, Anderson has devised a work that falls between a collection of short stories and a novel. There is a fixed cast of characters, a unifying locale, the school, although not all the happenings occur in the school, and temporal progression from the first staff meeting of the year to the final event of the school year, the Leavers' Play. Having paid her respects to certain nominal unities, Anderson trusts her work to the diverse consciousnesses inhabiting her book. The titles of all the stories, except the first and last, indicate that what we are witnessing is filtered through individual characters. For instance one title reads, "Miss Franklin Remembers the Smell of Pepper," and another, "Mr. Marden Thinks about Carmen." The syntax of the titles scarcely varies, consisting of subject, abstract verb, and object. An emphasis on introspection allows Anderson to avoid spatial and temporal confinement as the memories and thoughts of her characters often travel well out of range of the school and the present. Anderson seems to be suggesting that the banality of the quotidian, which is often within immediate view, is a deceptive front that hides significant depths.

The stories in Girls High proceed as much through their gaps as through their revelations, like those in I Think We Should Go into the Jungle, and in the later collection of short stories The Peacocks. One aspect of the discontinuities in Girls High is that character is not a fixed constant, but the discrepant outcome of the interplay of different points of view. Anderson's choice of play for the school leavers, Mother Courage, perhaps serves as a covert retrospective comment on how her characters are situated vis-à-vis the reader. The many angles trained on any particular character discourage identification and ensure, if not alienation, at least a dispassionate distance. The minimalist but clumsy plot of Girls High confirms Anderson's discomfort with and incapacity for a too ready rationalization of life, a theme which continues through her later novels.

In 1992 Anderson published Portrait of the Artist's Wife, which won New Zealand's prestigious Wattie Award in the same year. This novel extends Anderson's thematic preoccupation with the uneasy balance between relationships and creativity, one that becomes increasingly prevalent in her later novels. Portrait of the Artist's Wife opens with a posthumous book launch and ends with the death of the author of that book, Jack McCalister. What lies between these two events is the story of Sarah, and of Jack, and of a relationship that spans forty tumultuous years. From a shared 1950s childhood in "the Bay," these two escape their families as teenagers and set up house in Wellington, attempting to juggle his writing and her art with a lack of money and the inconvenience of an impending baby which preempted the registry office wedding. In the ensuing years Anderson's novel illuminates the selfishness of her characters in their singular pursuits of creativity, he as a writer, she as an artist, and their ability to be terrible together but even worse when apart. In London on a writing fellowship with their 18-year-old daughter Dora, Sarah discovers she is pregnant again at 36. The situation is made more difficult in view of a recent reconciliation between Jack and Sarah after acts of betrayal, adultery, and desertion. When Sarah suggests to Jack that the baby might not be his, his supreme confidence in his masculine domination of the relationship is evident. He pauses, then dismisses the suggestion outright, telling Sarah that not only is the child his, it will be a girl and she will be named Emily. At Emily's birth his "I told you" claims even this event as his own. Anderson depicts with clarity the shifting roles of wife, mother, and mainstay of the family Sarah is forced to undertake, and the battle between these roles and her desires as an artist, while Jack, despite brief bouts of parental and spousal concern, carries on an archetypal life of drinking, infidelity, and fiction. This reconciling of personal artistic desire with family obligations is a recurring theme, which Anderson explores from many angles in her writing.

Critics of Anderson's work often focus on the untidy nature of plot in her novels. However, in sacrificing the neatness of a plot that has one or two central characters as the primary focus, Anderson draws together a cast of extras who loom largely and do sometimes threaten to overshadow the main events. A feature in all Anderson's writing is her vivid characterization, so that even minor players are finely drawn, often remaining with the reader long after the novel is read. There is Mrs. Leadbetter, the politician's wife in Portrait of the Artist's Wife, consulting her notebook of notable people, where a crossed out name means a dead wife. In Proud Garments there is Carla, the regal Italian mistress who never leaves Milan but whose presence reaches beyond the grave. Or consider Wilfred Q. Hughes, who keeps the dresses of his three dead wives hanging in a shed and displays them proudly to visitors in The House Guest. Dead women's stories are often crucial to the plots of Anderson's novels. In The House Guest it is the ghost of a woman writer (Wilfred Q. Hughes's third wife) who provides both the novel's title and the mystery to be unraveled. However, it is the unconnected deaths of Robin's childhood sweetheart wife, Lisa, and elderly Miss Bowman that open the novel out into an exploration of the ephemeral connections of discordant lives that is Anderson's oeuvre.

In Long Hot Summer, Anderson returns to "the Bay" where she herself grew up, and to the 1930s, in a beachside story of family summers and racial tensions firmly located in the temporal milieu of early twentieth-century New Zealand. The filmic plot of this novel means that once again the cast of extras are vibrantly depicted, while the film itself ("Lust in the Dust") provides the plot device which enables Anderson to anchor the themes of belonging, desire, and racism which circle through the novel. The two narrators are mother and daughter, and their differing perspectives on the events of the summer give the reader a sometimes comic, sometimes painful reminder of the distances between child and grownup. Ann and Lorna's dreams, musings and betrayals preoccupy them, and their interspersed accounts of the summer at Laing's Point provide counterpoints in commentary. They are witnesses as members of the Laing family assert their Maori heritage, and as the relationship develops between Isabel Clements and Tam Ropata, crossing color barriers and giving voice to seldom spoken but deeply held racist views.

The eventual departure of 'Bel and Tam provides the novel with its penultimate filmic moment, that of the riders in silhouette against the skyline on a ridge, a clichéd off-into-the-sunset moment which is almost saved from bathos by the final moments of the novel.

It is in the junctures between cliché and originality that Anderson writes her extraordinary stories. Anderson resists moral commentary in her novels, instead she lays out the often messy moments of relationships and family for the readers to recognize and to judge for themselves. The gift of observation makes Anderson a novelist who weaves a story leaving spaces for the reader to add their own colors, but the gaps that she leaves do not diminish the reading, rather they provide spy holes for the reader to press up against with their own eyes.

-Doreen D'Cruz, updated by Shana Tacon

ANDERSON, Jessica (Margaret)

Nationality: Australian. Born: Jessica Margaret Queale, Gayndah, Queensland, 25 September 1916. Education: State schools in Brisbane; Brisbane Technical College art school. Family: Married and divorced twice; one daughter from first marriage. Awards: Miles Franklin award, 1979, 1981; New South Wales Premier's award, 1981; The Age Book of the Year award, 1987. Lives in Sydney. Agent: Elaine Markson Literary Agency, 44 Greenwich Avenue, New York, New York 10011, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

An Ordinary Lunacy. London, Macmillan, 1963; New York, Scribner, 1964.

The Last Man's Head. London, Macmillan, 1970.

The Commandant. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1975.

Tirra Lirra by the River. Melbourne, Macmillan, 1978; London and New York, Penguin, 1984.

The Impersonators. Melbourne, Macmillan, 1980; as The Only Daughter, New York and London, Viking, 1985.

Taking Shelter. Ringwood, Victoria, New York, and London, Viking,

One of the Wattle Birds. Ringwood, Victoria, Australia, Penguin Books, 1994.

Short Stories

Stories from the Warm Zone and Sydney Stories. New York, Viking, 1987; London, Viking, 1988.

Plays

Radio Plays: The American, 1966, The Aspern Papers, 1967, and Daisy Miller, 1968, all from works by Henry James; The Maid&quoteright;s Part, 1967; The Blackmail Caper, 1972; Quite Sweet, Really, 1972; Tirra Lirra by the River, 1975; The Last Man's Head, from her own novel, 1983; A Tale of Two Cities (serial), from the novel by Dickens; Outbreak of Love (serial), from the novel by Martin Boyd.

*

Manuscript Collections: Mitchell Library, Sydney; Australian National Library, Canberra.

Critical Studies: "Tirra Lirra by the Brisbane River," in Literature in Northern Queensland, vol. 10, no. 1, 1981, and "A Rare Passion for Justice: Jessica Anderson's The Last Man's Head," in Quadrant (Sydney), July 1988, both by Donat Gallagher; "The Expatriate Vision of Jessica Anderson" by Elaine Barry, in Meridian (Melbourne), vol. 3, no. 1, 1984; interview with Jennifer Ellison, in Rooms of Their Own, Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1986, and with Candida Baker, in Yacker 2, Woollahra, New South Wales, Pan, 1987; "Jessica Anderson: Arrivals and Places" by Alrene Sykes, in Southerly (Sydney), March 1986; article by Gay Raines, in Australian Studies (Stirling, Scotland), no. 3, 1989; Fabricating the Self: The Fictions of Jessica Anderson by Elaine Barry, St. Lucia, Queensland, Australia, University of Queensland Press, 1996; A Study Guide to Jessica Anderson's Tirra Lirra by the River by Valerie McRoberts, Ballarat, Australia, Wizard Books, 1998.

Jessica Anderson comments:

The settings of my seven works of fiction relate neatly to the three places where I have spent my life: mostly Sydney, a substantial portion of Brisbane, and a dash of London.

Now that I intend to write no more fiction, I can appreciate the pleasure I had in writing those seven books, and discount the pain, by realising how disappointed I would be if I had failed to produce them. That is not to say that I am wholly satisfied, but that I worked to my full capacity, and am pleased to have had this chance of deploying my imagination, observation, and experience.

* * *

In one of the more quietly startling moments of Jessica Anderson's Tirra Lirra by the River, Nora, the elderly narrator/protagonist, tells the reader almost off-handedly that in middle age she tried to commit suicide. One reason for the attempt was the failure of a facelift operation, and she links this with the horrifying revelations coming out of postwar Germany: "... if I leap to explain that the weakness resulting from six bronchial winters, and the approach of menopause, left me morbidly defenceless against the postwar revelations of the German camps, it is because I am ashamed to admit that in the same breath as that vast horror, I can speak of the loss of my looks."

Anderson's novels do not tackle broad social, political or historical issues head-on. Rather, the large event, the major issue, is always in the background, while her characters move in a world where small personal experiences, experiences which are as nothing on a world scale, profoundly influence them.

Tirra Lirra by the River is one of three novels by Anderson which begins with a woman arriving in Australia from "overseas." In The Commandant the woman is 17-year-old Frances, arriving from Ireland in the 1830s to live with her sister and brother-in-law, Captain Patrick Logan, the commandant of the title, who is remembered in Australian history as a fanatical and brutal disciplinarian, loathed by the convicts under his charge in the penal settlement at Moreton Bay. Frances initially takes on the traditional role of innocent observer, until events make her unwillingly responsible for a young convict receiving 50 lashes—thus drawing her into "the system." In Tirra Lirra by the River and The Impersonators, however, the role of onewho-arrives is more complex: both elderly Nora (Tirra Lirra) and middle-aged Sylvia (The Impersonators) are Australians returning home after many years of absence in Europe, bearing the accretions and conflicts of two cultures. The arrivals in these three books provide a promising opening, with their inherent possibilities of movement and change; yet they also provide a direct entry into several of Anderson's major themes. (Her two earlier novels, An Ordinary Lunacy and The Last Man's Head, open with smaller-scale but nonetheless portentous visits.)

Anderson is fascinated by the tug between the old culture (Europe) and the new (Australia). In her novels, arrival is always part of a longer journey, an inner journey as well as a physical one, and thus relates to the acquiring of wisdom and the conflicting desires for flight and sanctuary. To arrive at an unfamiliar place normally sharpens one's awareness of environment, and descriptions of place—particularly of houses, and the harbour and gardens of Sydney, shown as being deeply part of the consciousness of the women characters in particular—are among the strengths of Anderson's later novels.

Tirra Lirra by the River, the most highly regarded of Anderson's works, has in fact appeared in three forms: as a short story, as a radio play, and finally as a prize-winning novel. By no means overtly feminist, it has been praised by feminist critics as showing the difficulties of women's lives from the point of view of a woman born early in the century. As the title suggests, the novel has links with Tennyson's poem, "The Lady of Shallott." In the poem, the Lady, generally accepted as artist or perhaps anima, lives secluded in a tower on an island, weaving her magic web and watching the world indirectly through a mirror. When she hears Lancelot pass by, singing, she looks down for the first time on the "real" world; the mirror cracks, the web flies out the window, and the lady, dying, floats in her boat down to Camelot. Nora relates to the Lady in a quite complex way, which has at its base the idea of her as artist seeing the world indirectly, through the mirror of a culture (European) not her own. The process begins when she is a child, and she sees how a flaw in the glass of a window transforms the appearance of ordinary sticks, stones, and blades of grass into the magical landscape—with rivulets, castles, and lakes—of her story books. Enchanted, she fails even to see the "real river" near her home. After a failed marriage, she goes to London, working there for many years making theatre costumes; finally, she returns to Australia, and, like the Lady of the poem, faces the "real:" for her, suppressed memories, mistaken beliefs, a real river instead of the river running down to Camelot, and the discovery that embroidered hangings she made before she left Australia are the most promising things she ever did. Like the Lady, she becomes very sick, but unlike the Lady, she recovers, and the novel ends with her globe of memory (one of the recurrent images of the book) in full spin, with no dark sides hidden. Anderson habitually tests and qualifies her themes, and in Tirra Lirra Nora's spiritual/physical journey is counterbalanced by the lives of other women, who are partly defined, though not judged, by the journeys they make—or do not make.

As noted above, The Impersonators, a more diffuse and less successful book than Tirra Lirra, takes as its point of departure the return of Sylvia after nearly 20 years away. Here the conflict is framed in terms of what appears to be the cultural richness of Europe and the raw discontinuity of Australia; implicit is the question whether Australians who have been abroad to centers where culture is more securely consolidated are under an obligation to "come home and use what they've learned." In the end Sylvia, like Nora accepting that which for her is "real," recognizes that she has been yearning over "other people's rituals," and decides to stay in Sydney with her lover. An equally important theme is signalled by the title of the book: in the materialistic, fractured Sydney of 1977, when the story is set, most of the characters are in some sense impersonators, living part of their lives behind protective masks. Anderson's portrait is sharp-eyed and unsentimental, but compassionate rather than satirical. In 1994, she followed up her earlier works with One of the Wattle Birds, and throughout the 1990s her writing continued to receive critical attention in Australia.

-Alrene Sykes

ANIEBO, I(feanyichukwu) N(dubuisi) C(hikezie)

Nationality: Nigerian. Born: Nigeria in 1939. Education: Government College, Umuahia; University of California, Los Angeles, B.A., C.Phil., M.A. Military Service: Joined the Nigerian Army in 1959: attended cadet schools in Ghana and England; officer in the United Nations peace-keeping force in the Congo; at Command and General Staff College, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas; fought on the Biafran side in the Nigerian civil war; discharged from army, 1971. Career: Currently, Senior Lecturer in English, University of Port Harcourt. Address: Department of English, University of Port Harcourt, P.M.B. 5523, Port Harcourt, Rivers State, Nigeria.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Anonymity of Sacrifice. London, Heinemann, 1974.The Journey Within. London, Heinemann, 1978.Rearguard Actions. Ibadan, Nigeria, Heinemann Educational Books, 1998.

Short Stories

Of Wives, Talismans and the Dead. London, Heinemann, 1983. Man of the Market: Short Stories. Port Harcourt, Pam Unique, 1994.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Jealous Goddess," in Spear (Lagos), October 1963.
- "My Mother," in Sunday Times (Lagos), 22 December 1963.
- "The Ring," in Nigeria Magazine (Lagos), December 1964.
- "The Peacemakers," in Nigeria Magazine (Lagos), December 1965.
- "Shadows," in Black Orpheus 20 (Lagos), 1966.
- "Mirage," in Nigeria Magazine (Lagos), March 1966.
- "The Outing," in Happy Home and Family Life (Lagos), May 1972.
- "Happy Survival, Brother," in Ufahamu (Los Angeles), vol. 7, no. 3, 1977.

* * *

Since 1963 I.N.C. Aniebo has been the author of a steady succession of short stories written for various periodical publications, a selection of them at last appearing as Of Wives, Talismans and the Dead in 1983. Most of them deal with the problems of Igbo people in Eastern Nigeria trying to cope with the transition from rural to urban living and with other pressures of accelerating social change, including that most hectic of such changes, war itself. The commonest experience in Aniebo's fiction is the bewilderment that results from lack of trust in other people and lack of faith in the efficacy of the gods, whether traditional African or imported Christian. He often plunges his characters into some variety of spiritual emptiness or near-despair after they have been betrayed by those closest to them in childhood, adolescence, work, or marriage. The acrid taste of defeat is perhaps Aniebo's most distinctive contribution to West African literature in English—his ability to record convincingly instances of human strength wilting and shriveling, usually as the indirect outcome of large social processes. If Aluko's writing captures the comedy of Nigerian life acclimatizing itself to the modern world, and Achebe's the tragedy of it within an historical perspective, and Soyinka's the human spirit refusing to be broken by it, then what Aniebo records is the intense pain that afflicts people when social change halts, trips, nonpluses, or defeats them.

In the story "Dilemma," the priestess addresses her wayward son: "The earth has never changed. The winds still continue to blow, the rains to fall, and men to be born and die. Only little things that don't matter change. Don't say because things change, you'll stop believing in God and believe in the Devil." Her words pronounce the traditional wisdom that many Nigerians today mock, or cannot accept, or covet, when it appears in others, or deliberately reject for the pursuit of personal ambition and the acquisition of consumer goods. Aniebo, however, presents such evaporation of faith not as an ordinary clash-of-cultures matter but as the heavy price that Nigerians pay for entry into the modern world. While it is more pervasive in large towns, like Port Harcourt in the novel The Journey Within, it characterizes also the stories in Of Wives, Talismans and the Dead, most of which are set in rural Igbo villages. Thus, in the privacy of their tender incestuous love, widowed father and devoted daughter and only surviving child, in "Maruma," find the true fulfillment of giving to another, but when her pregnancy makes their love public, their having broken a powerful social taboo destroys first their relationship and then themselves and their line. Yet, years later, their ruined, crumbling compound is symmetrically matched at the other end of the village by another as desolate, whose respectable and fecund owners had committed no "abomination." This even-handed "leveling" at the end of the story is the author's explicit comment, and it makes one wonder whether the dark views of the human condition that many of Aniebo's characters express aren't also his own, as in the war story, "In the Front Line": "The war had proved that no matter what one did or worshipped one died all the same, and more often than not like a rat." Similarly, in the thoughts of Cristian Okoro in The Journey Within: "... his family had fought for survival, always getting up after a fall, always continuing to fight after a defeat. So, was life merely a getting-up after a fall?"

Aniebo's first published book, The Anonymity of Sacrifice, is a novel about the bitterness of successive Biafran "falls" during the Nigerian Civil War. It is a collection of very vivid, rapidly sketched illustrations of, admittedly, some heroic improvisations against great odds, but chiefly of betrayals, misunderstandings, personal defeats, frustration, and distrust, with the estrangement of the two major characters, and their pointless deaths, inadequately exploited novelistically. While the details of the narrative do indeed convey disillusion and corruption, there is little sense of their being worked into a firm design, and the title promises more significance than the book delivers.

The second novel, The Journey Within, is altogether more relaxed in execution, but again more ambitious in the endeavor than in the realization. It is centered upon the stories of two marriages, one traditional, the other Christian. In probing, to some depth, the joys, sorrows tensions, struggles, love, and hatred that are generated between husband and wife, Aniebo is clearly arguing that marriage (whatever its kind) is a very thorny experience. Unfortunately, by making the two marriages progressively less distinctive, he throws away the opportunity to break his larger theme with finer shades and more delicate ironies. Yet the novel is full of sardonic instances of human folly, as individuals seek their own fulfillments in an urban environment of free and selfish enterprise. While there is much mature observation of love and sexuality, some of the scenes between lovers are rendered with more mere titillation than the tone of the narration elsewhere strives after.

The collection of short stories is certainly the most successful of Aniebo's books, for under the pressure of brevity and pithiness, his particular gift, the rapid but accurate sketching of a scene without having to sustain its implications across a large design, is revealed as professional and complete in its own right. In the novels his transitions from one emotion to another are often incongruous, but in the stories he can move without inhibition or oddity across a gamut of emotions—anger at the exploitation of dockers in "Rats and Rabbits," self-confidence without moral crutches in "Godevil" (intentionally ambiguous as "Go devil" or "God evil"?), self-gratification in "Moment of Decision," the horror of murder within the family in "The Quiet Man" and "A Hero's Welcome," and, rarely, the consolation of faith in "Four Dimensions." The bleakness of Aniebo's vision is tempered, in his best writing, by a wry ironic sense that does not exclude muted compassion.

-Arthur Ravenscroft

ANTHONY, Michael

Nationality: Trinidadian. Born: Mayaro, 10 February 1932. Education: Mayaro Roman Catholic School; Junior Technical College, San Fernando, Trinidad. Family: Married Yvette Francesca in 1958; two sons and two daughters. Career: Lived in England, 1954–68; journalist, Reuters news agency, London, 1964–68; lived in Brazil, 1968–70; assistant editor, Texaco Trinidad, Pointe-à-Pierre, 1970–72. Since 1972 researcher, National Cultural Council (now Ministry of Culture), Port-of-Spain; broadcast historical radio programs, 1975–1989; University of Richmond, VA, teacher of creative writing, 1992. Address: 99 Long Circular Road, St. James, Port-of-Spain, Trinidad.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Games Were Coming. London, Deutsch, 1963; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1968.

The Year in San Fernando. London, Deutsch, 1965; Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Heinemann, 1996.

Green Days by the River. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Deutsch, 1967.

Streets of Conflict. London, Deutsch, 1976.

All That Glitters. London, Deutsch, 1981.

Bright Road to El Dorado. Walton-on-Thames, Surrey, Nelson, 1982. The Becket Factor. London, Collins, 1990.

In the Heat of the Day. Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Heinemann Educational Publishers, 1996.

Short Stories

Sandra Street and Other Stories. London, Heinemann, 1973.Cricket in the Road and Other Stories. London, Deutsch, 1973.Folk Tales and Fantasies. Port-of-Spain, Columbus, 1976.The Chieftain's Carnival and Other Stories. London, Longman, 1993.

Other

Glimpses of Trinidad and Tobago, with a Glance at the West Indies. Port-of-Spain, Columbus, 1974.

Profile Trinidad: A Historical Survey from the Discovery to 1900. London, Macmillan, 1975.

The Making of Port-of-Spain 1757–1939. Port-of-Spain, Key Caribbean, 1978.

First in Trinidad. Port-of-Spain, Circle Press, 1985.

Heroes of the People of Trinidad and Tobago. Port-of-Spain, Circle Press, 1986.

The History of Aviation in Trinidad and Tobago 1913–1962. Port-of-Spain, Paria, 1987.

A Better and Brighter Day. Port-of-Spain, Circle Press, 1987.

Towns and Villages of Trinidad and Tobago. Port-of-Spain, Circle Press, 1988.

Parade of the Carnivals of Trinidad 1839–1989. Port-of-Spain, Circle Press, 1989.

The Golden Quest: The Four Voyages of Christopher Columbus. London, Macmillan Caribbean, 1992.

Historical Dictionary of Trinidad and Tobago. Lanham, Maryland, Scarecrow Press, 1997.

Editor, with Andrew Carr, David Frost Introduces Trinidad and Tobago. London, Deutsch, 1975.

*

Critical Studies: In London Magazine, April 1967; "Novels of Childhood" in The West Indian Novel and Its Background by Kenneth Ramchand, London, Faber, and New York, Barnes and Noble, 1970; Green Days by the River by Linda Flynn and Sally West, Oxford, Heinemann Educational, 1989.

Michael Anthony comments:

I see myself principally as a storyteller. In other words, I am not aware that I have any message. I think both the past life and the fascination of landscape play a most important part in my work.

My infancy has been very important in my literary development and so far almost everything I have written—certainly my novels—are very autobiographical.

It is strange that I have never had the desire to write about England, although I spent 14 years there. To some people, judging from my writing alone, I have never been out of Trinidad. And this is true in some sort of way.

I feel a certain deep attachment to Trinidad and I want to write about it in such a way that I will give a faithful picture of life here. But when I am writing a story I am not aware that I want to do anything else but tell the story.

* * *

Michael Anthony's most successful novels are set in southern Trinidad, and deal with the experiences of childhood and youth. Each is simple in structure. When Anthony has stepped outside that framework, as he does in Streets of Conflict, and attempted explicit social comment, the results have not always been successful.

His first novel, The Games Were Coming, subtly explores the need for a balance between restraint and joyful abandon. In a society where order has been imposed by force, and the idea of celebration therefore takes on political undertones, these are important issues. The story contrasts the cycling championships, for which the novel's hero, Leon, is training with self-denying discipline, and the approach of carnival, which is associated with "fever," "chaos," and "release." Leon becomes so obsessed by the need for restraint that he neglects his girlfriend, Sylvia, and nearly loses her. She in turn suffers for failing to know herself. She prides herself on being cool, controlled, and pure, but is embarrassed by indelicate thoughts that spring unbidden to her mind. She disapproves of carnival, but is willing to "jump-on" at night when no one will see. She ignores these promptings of sexual energy, and as a result is swept away by her feelings and by Leon's neglect—into the arms of her calculating middle-aged employer. Anthony suggests a resolution of these forces, first in the character of Leon's younger brother Dolphus, who is attracted equally to the games and to carnival, and second by a subtle pattern of imagery that hints at the complementary quality of these events. Thus the "madness and wildness" of jouvert morning is shown as the energy disciplined into the "richness and splendor" of Grand Carnival.

The Year in San Fernando is also much more than a sensitive novel about growing up. Although Anthony scrupulously adhered to the unfolding perceptions of 12-year-old Francis, from puzzled naiveté towards the growth of sympathetic understanding, what he created in the novel is a richly textured and moving portrayal of the growth and disappearance of what is human. Set against the passage of the seasons is Francis's relationship with Mrs. Chandles, the old woman for whom he is brought as a companion from his impoverished village home in return for his board and schooling. Initially, she is all dominant will, a self-contained, bitter old lady who treats Francis as a virtual slave. When the year begins, he is cowed and passive, scarcely more than a bundle of sensations. As the year passes, however, he observes how Mrs. Chandles's spirit and flesh wilt in the drought of crop-season, and comes to understand the reasons for her ill-temper. At the same time, Francis's self is growing powerfully as he begins to acknowledge his feelings, both positive and negative. There is a brief season of rain when Mrs. Chandles is released from her pain and the two meet as open and giving personalities. But then as Francis continues his growth to personhood, the personality of Mrs. Chandles disintegrates, and she begins to die. There is more for Francis to learn than his part in the cycle of life and death, and this is contained in a puzzling comment Mrs. Chandles makes. Throughout the dry season he has painstakingly tended her shriveling flowers, and oiled and massaged her protesting limbs. She comments on his "willing mind" and tells him that she "connected willingness of mind with sacredness." It is through this "sacredness" that Francis redeems his year in San Fernando from time.

None of Anthony's other novels quite achieves the same degree of understated but unflawed art. Green Days by the River evokes another passage from adolescent freedom to adult responsibility in the countryside around Mayaro. Despite the beauty of its prose, the novel seems to escape from Anthony's control. The central relationship is Shellie, a youth, and Mr. Gidharee, an Indian farmer who lures him into marriage with his daughter. Here the meeting is complicated by its Trinidadian ethnic resonances. In portraying Gidharee as a creolized Jekyll who charms Shellie into his confidence, and an Indian Hyde who sets his dogs to savage him as a warning of what will happen if he fails to marry his daughter, Anthony unavoidably appears to be making a veiled statement about ethnic relations. Two kinds of irony tangle. One is the dramatic irony that Shellie fails to see the twig being limed to catch him, the other is the irony of Shellie's racial innocence when so much of Gidharee's behavior adds up to a Creole stereotype of the Indian as an economic threat. The second irony leads to inconsistencies in the portrayal of Shellie, who is bright and sensitive in all respects except in his dealings with Gidharee, where he appears spineless and impercipient. It is hard to know in a somewhat evasive novel quite what Anthony intended.

Two attempts to deal with broader social issues have met with limited success: Streets of Conflict, was inconsistent, and the plot of In the Heat of the Day seemed weighted by the heavy message Anthony intended for it to carry. All That Glitters, by contrast, found Anthony in territory more suited to his abilities. The story centers around the growing awareness of young Horace Lumpers regarding the complications of the adult world around him, and specifically the jealousies and deceptions provoked by the return of his sophisticated Aunty Roomeen to the village of Mayaro. In a more intense way than in any earlier novel, Anthony focused on a child's attempt to discern whether people were being sincere or false. Words such as trickster, genuine, hypocrite, acting, and feigned serve as leitmotifs in the text, and Horace has to learn that being adult means wearing different faces. This play on truth and falsity is linked through the novel's two complementary mottoes ("Gold Is Where You Find It" and "All That Glitters") to Anthony's most conscious exploration of the nature of his art. The distinction is caught in the contrast between Horace's joy in discovering through writing what he thinks and feels—when he writes about the golden day with the fishermen or the sordid saga of the stolen golden chain—and the way that the adult clichés used by his teacher Myra tend to embalm experience. Nevertheless, for all her circumlocutions, she recognizes the child's magical directness, and it is her advice, "Make it colorful and vivid—and true," which both Horace and Michael Anthony follow.

—Jeremy Poynting

ARMAH, Ayi Kwei

Nationality: Ghanaian. Born: Takoradi in 1938. Education: Achimota College, Accra; Groton School, Massachusetts; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, A.B. in social studies; Columbia University, New York. Career: Translator, Révolution Africaine magazine, Algiers; scriptwriter for Ghana Television; English teacher, Navrongo School, Ghana, 1966; editor, Jeune Afrique magazine, Paris, 1967–68; teacher at Teacher's College, Dar es Salaam, and universities of Massachusetts, Amherst, Lesotho, and Wisconsin, Madison. Address: c/o Heinemann Educational, Ighodaro Road, Jericho PMB 5205, Ibadan, Oyo State, Nigeria.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Beautyful Ones Are Not Yet Born. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1968; London, Heinemann, 1969.

Fragments. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1970; London, Heinemann, 1975.

Why Are We So Blest? New York, Doubleday, 1972; London, Heinemann, 1975.

Two Thousand Seasons. Nairobi, East African Publishing House, 1973; London, Heinemann, 1979; Chicago, Third World Press, 1980

The Healers. Nairobi, East African Publishing House, 1978; London, Heinemann, 1979.

Osiris Rising: A Novel of Africa Past, Present, and Future. Pogenguine, Senegal, Per Ankh, 1995.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "A Short Story," in New African (London), December 1965.
- "Yaw Manu's Charm," in Atlantic (Boston), May 1968.
- "The Offal Kind," in Harper's (New York), January 1969.
- "Doctor Kamikaze," in Mother Jones (San Francisco), October 1989.

Other

Contributor, The South Wind and the Sun: Stories from Africa, edited by Kate Turkington. Johannesburg, South Africa, Thorold's Africana Books, 1996.

Translator, Zaire, What Destiny?, edited by Kankwenda Mbaya. Oxford, England, ABC, 1993.

Translator, Senegambia and the Atlantic Slave Trade by Boubacar Barry. New York, Cambridge University Press, 1998.

*

Critical Studies: The Novels of Ayi Kwei Armah: A Study in Polemical Fiction by Robert Fraser, London, Heinemann, 1980; Ayi Kwei Armah's Africa: The Sources of His Fiction by Derek Wright, London, Zell, 1989; Resistance in Postcolonial African Fiction by Neil Lazarus, New Haven, Yale University Press, 1990; Critical Perspectives on Ayi Kwei Armah edited by Derek Wright, Washington D.C., Three Continents, 1992; The Novels of Ayi Kwei Armah by K. Damodar Rao, New Delhi, Prestige, 1993; Form and Technique in the African Novel by Olawale Awosik, Ibadan, Nigeria, Sam Bookman, 1997; Ayi Kwei Armah: The Telling of the Way by Olawale Awosika, Benin City, Nigeria, Ambik Press, 1997; The Existential Fiction of Ayi Kwei Armah, Albert Camus, and Jean-Paul Sartre by Tommie L. Jackson, Lanham, Maryland, University Press of America, 1997; Post-Colonial African Fiction: The Crisis of Consciousness by Mala Pandurang, Delhi, Pencraft International, 1997; Ayi Kwei Armah, Radical Iconoclast: Pitting Imaginary Worlds Against the Actual by Ode S. Ogede, Westport, Connecticut, Heinemann, 1999.

* * *

Ayi Kwei Armah's masterly control over language forces his reader to suspend his disbelief, however reluctant he may be to do so. The comic or horrific distortion of what is nearly recognizable reality in the first three novels has extraordinary imaginative power.

The title of the first novel refers to an inscription which the central character, known only as "the man," sees on a bus. By implication it refers back to the Teacher's story of Plato's cave, where the one man who escapes from the cave and returns to tell his fellow sufferers of the beautiful world outside is thought to be mad by those in the "reassuring chains." The man is anonymous because he is regarded as mad in his society, modern Accra. His family suffers from his refusal to take bribes in his position as a railway clerk, and his honesty is incomprehensible to "the loved ones." His former friend, Koomson, has become a Minister through corruption, and, though the regime of which he is a part falls, an equally corrupt one takes its place. The fusion of styles in The Beautyful Ones can be seen in the first few pages, which give a realistic account of a bus journey but also introduce the controlling symbol in the novel, that of money as decay, or excrement. The bus conductor smells a cedi note and finds it has "a very old smell, very strong, and so very rotten that the stench itself of it came with a curious, satisfying pleasure." This anticipates the comic and horrible way in which Koomson has to escape the new regime, by wriggling through a latrine. The depravity of the society is suggested by the manner in which a young man confesses he has made money in a lottery "in the embarrassed way of a young girl confessing love;" if he escaped from his society the man would only mirror his broken pencil sharpener, whose handle "sped round and round with the futile freedom of a thing connected to nothing else."

Armah's ability to invest apparently insignificant objects or scenes with meanings is clear in Fragments. Early in the novel there is a detailed account of the destruction of a mad dog by a man with a gross sexual deformity, while the little boy who loves the dog looks on helplessly. It is so vivid that it prepares the reader for the destruction of the central character, Baako, who returns to Ghana from New York wanting to write film scripts because "Film gets to everyone." He finds that his society wants material evidence of his "been-to" status. The new element in this novel is represented by Naana, Baako's blind grandmother, who is the voice of the traditional culture. Traditional ceremonies, such as Baako's baby nephew's outdooring, have lost their spiritual significance and become an opportunity for ostentation and avarice; the plot suggests that Naana's fears for the baby as the victim of this irreligious display are justified, for he dies in the course of it. The fragments of the title seem to be the members of the new society, placed within the opening and closing sections of the novel which express Naana's sense of meaningful community. The only other hopeful element is the growing love between Baako and the sensitive Puerto Rican, Juana.

Why Are We So Blest? is a more fragmented novel than Fragments, jumping between three narrators with no obvious narrative line, though we eventually discover that Solo, a failed revolutionary, is using the notebooks of Aimée, a white American, and Modin, a Ghanaian, intercut with his own text. The savage irony of the title is sustained throughout the novel, which lacks the cynical comedy of the two previous works and is much more overt in its distortion of reality. All the white women in the novel prey on the black men: Modin, a student who drops out of Harvard to go to Laccryville in North Africa as a would-be revolutionary, is used primarily by Aimée, who epitomizes the sexual sickness of all the white women. She is frigid when she meets Modin, and uses him as an object to stimulate her sexual fantasies of intercourse with a black servant. Modin's attempt to liberate her into a fuller sensitivity destroys him. The horrific scene, in which Aimée is raped and Modin castrated by white men, fully enacts Aimée's fantasy. She is sexually aroused and kisses Modin's bleeding penis, asking him to say that he loves her. Solo sees Modin as an African who does not know "how deep the destruction has eaten into himself, hoping to achieve a healing juncture with his destroyed people."

Armah's most recent novels are historical. Two Thousand Seasons is written in a new style, in its repetitiveness and long leisurely sentences suggesting that it is folk myth: "With what shall the utterers' tongue stricken with goodness, riven silent with the quiet force of beauty, with which mention shall the tongue of the utterers begin a song of praise whose perfect singers have yet to come?" Its narrator is not identified, though he participates in the action. The violation of his people's way of life by Arab and then European invaders is depicted powerfully but the ideal of "the way, our way" remains nebulous. The Healers is stylistically much more vigorous, and is set at a precise time in the past, during the Second Asante War. The idea of "inspiration" is gradually defined in the course of the novel as being a healing and creative force which can only work slowly, and Armah perhaps sees himself as one of those prophesied by Damfo in the novel, "healers wherever our people are scattered, able to bring us together again."

—Angela Smith

ARMSTRONG, Jeannette

Nationality: Canadian (Okanagan). Born: Penticton (Okanagan) Indian Reservation, British Columbia, Canada, 1948. Education: Okanagan College; University of Victoria, British Columbia, Canada, B.F.A. Career: Since 1989 director, En'owkin School of International Writing, Okanagan, British Columbia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Slash. Penticton, British Columbia, Theytus, 1987; revised edition, 1998.

Whispering in Shadows. Penticton, British Columbia, Theytus Books, 1999.

Poetry

Breathtracks. Penticton, British Columbia, Theytus, 1991.

Other

Enwhisteetkwa; Walk in Water (for children). Penticton, British Columbia, Theytus, 1982.

Neekna and Chemai (for children), illustrated by Barbara Marchand. Penticton, British Columbia, Theytus, 1984.

The Native Creative Process: A Collaborative Discourse, with Douglas Cardinal. Penticton, British Columbia, Theytus, 1992.

We Get Our Living Like Milk from the Land: Okanagan Tribal History Book. Penticton, British Columbia, Theytus, 1993.

Contributor, Speaking for the Generations: Native Writers on Writing, edited by Simon J. Ortiz. Tucson, University of Arizona Press, 1998.

Contributor, Native North America: Critical and Cultural Perspectives: Essays, edited by Patricia Monture-Angus and Renee Hulan. Chicago, LPC Group, 1999.

*

Critical Studies: Momaday, Vizenor, Armstrong: Conversations on American Indian Writing by Hartwig Isernhagen. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1999.

* * *

Following in the footsteps of her great aunt, Hum-Ishu-Ma (Mourning Dove/Christine Quintasket, 1888–1936), author of Cogewea, The Half-Blood (1927) and Coyote Stories (1933), Jeannette Armstrong published the first novel by a First Nations woman in 1985. With the publication of the novel, Slash, Armstrong established a place for writing by contemporary Native Canadian women along with Beth Brant's Mohawk Trail, Maria Campbell's Halfbreed, Beatrice Culleton's In Search of April Raintree, and Ruby Slipperjack's Honour the Sun. Now in its eight printing, Slash is an important novel that traces out a young Native Canadian man's struggles with colonialism, racism, and a self-identity that doesn't fit easily into "assimilated," "traditional," or "Pan-Indian" categories. In addition to her work as a novelist, Armstrong is also a political activist, sculptor, writer of children's books, and educator. Born on the Penticton Indian Reserve in British Columbia, she maintains strong links to her Okanagan community, which is reflected in the novel Slash.

Armstrong's novel foregrounds key issues in the political, cultural, and linguistic struggles of Native Americans in both Canada and the United States in the late 1960s and early 1970s, such as the birth of the American Indian Movement, changes in the Canadian Indian Act, the takeover of Department of Indian Affairs (DIA) and Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) offices, and the Wounded Knee occupation. Set primarily in British Columbia, Armstrong's title character, Thomas Kelasket, who is nicknamed "Slash" while serving time in prison, demonstrates how these events are linked, although geographically and culturally distant and distinct. Armstrong wants to examine how Native Americans, particularly young people, can confront what she calls their "postcolonial" situation, the double bind resulting from existence under the dominant white culture, on the one hand, and a desire to preserve important aspects of their own aboriginal communities, on the other.

Armstrong's novel is a bildungsroman, a fictional autobiography tracing the growth of a single main protagonist as he struggles with social and psychological pressures to maintain a positive sense of identity and community in a rapidly changing world. The novel is framed by two poems, one entitled "For Tony," which describes a man much like Slash, and an untitled concluding poem, as well as a "Prologue" in which Slash reminisces about his own progress from childhood innocence, through a self-destructive adolescence, to a mature state of understanding and an "Epilogue" in which Slash reflects on his adulthood and his reasons for relating his story, namely to assist young people like his son. The novel's four long chapters begin with "The Awakening," in which a 14-year-old Slash first comes to realize that being Indian in Canada means either occupying a space which is entirely antithetical to white Canadian values or adopting an "assimilated" identity and becoming what Homi Bhabha has called "almost white but not quite." Interestingly, Armstrong is able to convey a sense of the young adolescent's inner struggles by using dialogue a teenager of the 1960s and 70s might employ. For example, Slash and his friends use terms such as "chicks," "Mary Jane," and "Bro." In the second and third chapters, "Trying It On" and "Mixing It Up," the protagonist recounts his various experiences as a drug dealer, convict, activist, vagrant, and prodigal son. Slash tries on various roles and identities, shifting restlessly from place to place, focusing on his own inability to come to terms with what it means to be an Native person in North America. The final chapter, "We Are a People," draws the loose threads of Slash's life together as he struggles to make sense of his identity as an Okanagan community member and activist in many Native struggles, as well as his new roles of father, husband, and widower. In so doing, Armstrong elucidates complex notions of sovereignty, self-recognition, and treaty rights.

The three names he uses throughout the novel suggest these kinetic and multiple senses of self. "Thomas/Tommy," his Anglo-Celtic Christian birth name, indicates both his relationship to his family—his parents and siblings call him Tommy—and the assimilative force of the dominant Canadian culture; "Slash," a nickname he's given by his first love, Mardi, after a drug-related bar brawl in Vancouver, represents the angry, cynical warrior self; and an undisclosed Okanagan name, which, according to Slash, is given ceremonially to tribal members after birth, suggests his relationship to the larger Okanagan community in British Columbia and the close ties he maintains with individuals living on his own reserve.

In addition to being a bildungsroman, the novel follows another popular literary form, the picaresque, or traveler's tale, since its narrative consists of a loosely knit series of events involving numerous characters, many of whom do not recur in the rest of the text. For most of the narrative, Slash wanders from place to place—his reserve to Vancouver, Ottawa to Toronto, the Pine Ridge Reservation to Washington, D.C.—although he returns periodically to visit with his family in British Columbia. In moving through these cycles of relocation, Slash better understands his place in the world as an activist struggling for Native rights in general as well as his role as a member of a specific Native community. These connections are very important, especially when his father, who is suffering from medical problems, is healed by a visit from a medicine person from another tribe, although the Kelasket family typically doesn't trust outsiders.

Slash is somewhat polemical in its style; that is, Armstrong (who, as director of the En'owkin Centre in Penticton, is deeply involved in Native Canadian education) wants to employ her fiction to make clear, strong political statements about the contemporary state of Native Canada. And despite the fact that the main protagonist is a young man, the novel is also profoundly feminist. Slash is respectful of the women in his life and at one point proclaims, "It's really the women who keep things smooth ... We learned early from our mothers and grandmothers that it is women who are the strength of the people."

Slash confronts the personal and social issues that young First Nations people face and offers hope for improvement through education and self-discovery. The text moves forward from frustration and anger through activism to self-and communal-affirmation, but this path is not so neatly drawn or simple. Slash engages the welter of events and ideologies in contemporary history and projects a vital, current role for First Nations people in that history, a role played out in the narrative by the title character himself. This novel may prove to be one of the most important twentieth-century works of fiction by a Canadian author, as it addresses the historical origins of racism and colonialism and its contemporary manifestations in First Nations communities, as well as elucidating Native Canadians' struggle for the recognition of sovereignty with a rich and distinct First Nations' voice.

-Kevin McNeilly, updated by Michelle Hermann

ASTLEY, Thea

Nationality: Australian. Born: Thea Beatrice May Astley in Brisbane, Queensland, 25 August 1925. Education: The University of Queensland, Brisbane, 1943–47, B.A. 1947. Family: Married Edmund John Gregson in 1948; one son. Career: English teacher in Queensland, 1944–48, and in New South Wales, 1948–67; senior tutor, then fellow in English, Macquarie University, Sydney, 1968–85. Lives near Sydney. Awards: Commonwealth Literary Fund fellowship, 1961, 1964; Miles Franklin award, 1963, 1966, 1973; Moomba award, 1965; Age Book of the Year award, 1975; Patrick White award, 1989; Age Book of the Year award, 1996. Agent: Elise Goodman, Goodman Associates, 500 West End Avenue, New York, New York 10024, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Girl with a Monkey. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1958; New York, Penguin, 1987.

A Descant for Gossips. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, 1960.

The Well-Dressed Explorer. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, 1962; New York, Penguin, 1988.

The Slow Natives. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1965; London, Angus and Robertson, 1966; New York, Evans, 1967.

A Boat Load of Home Folk. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, 1968; New York, Penguin, 1983.

The Acolyte. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, 1972; in Two by Astley, New York, Putnam, 1988.

A Kindness Cup. Melbourne, Nelson, 1974; in Two by Astley, New York, Putnam, 1988.

An Item from the Late News. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1982; New York, Penguin, 1984.

Beachmasters. Ringwood, Victoria, Penguin, 1985; New York, Viking, 1986.

It's Raining in Mango: Pictures from a Family Album. New York, Putnam, 1987; London, Viking, 1988.

Two by Astley [includes A Kindness Cup]. New York, Putnam, 1988. Reaching Tin River. New York, Putnam, 1990.

Coda. New York, Putnam, 1994; London, Secker and Warburg, 1995. The Multiple Effects of Rainshadow. New York, Viking, 1996.

Drylands: A Book for the World's Last Reader. Ringwood, Victoria, Australia, Viking, 1999.

Short Stories

Hunting the Wild Pineapple. Melbourne, Nelson, 1979; New York, Putnam, 1991.

Vanishing Points. New York, Putnam, 1992; London, Minerva, 1995.Collected Stories. St. Lucia, Queensland, Australia, University of Queensland Press, 1997.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Cubby," in Coast to Coast. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1961.
- "The Scenery Never Changes," in Coast to Coast. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1963.
- "Journey to Olympus," in Coast to Coast. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1965.
- "Seeing Mrs. Landers," in Festival and Other Stories, edited by Brian Buckley and Jim Hamilton. Melbourne, Wren, 1974; Newton Abbot, Devon, David and Charles, 1975.
- Contributor, Amnesty, edited by Dee Mitchell. Port Melbourne, Victoria, Minerva, 1993.

Other

Editor, Coast to Coast 1969–1970. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1971.

*

Thea Astley comments:

(1972) My main interest (and has been through my five published and current unpublished novels) is the misfit. Not the spectacular outsider, but the seedy little non-grandiose non-fitter who lives in his own mini-hell. Years ago I was impressed at eighteen or so by Diary of a Nobody, delighted by the quality Grossmith gave to the non-achiever and the sympathy which he dealt out. My five published novels have always been, despite the failure of reviewers to see it, a plea for charity—in the Pauline sense, of course—to be accorded to those not ruthless enough or grand enough to be gigantic tragic figures, but which, in their own way, record the same via crucis.

* * *

Thea Astley is one of the most widely respected novelists in Australia, despite the fact that she has never received the kind of sustained critical attention that has been given to some of the country's newer female writers. Born in Queensland into a Catholic family, she long ago abandoned the Church but freely acknowledges its influence. Her language is rich in religious terminology and metaphor, yet she tends mostly to see religious life itself as containing tensions that lie immediately beneath its surface and eventually erupt in destructive forms. Politically to the left, her writing is nevertheless marked by formal, cultural, and, in many respects, ethical conservatism. She is also one of Australia's wittiest and shrewdest novelists, and she plots carefully for dramatic effect and exciting finales.

Astley's first three novels are apprentice works, though they contain the seeds of many of her later ideas, but with The Slow Natives, which won for her the first of a record four Miles Franklin awards, she established her reputation. In this novel the author chooses not to follow the fate of one or two particular characters, as she did in her early work, but to move freely among a group, switching attention omnisciently from one to another. Almost all the characters suffer from some form of spiritual aridity; in Astley's vision, there often seems nothing between repression, and empty or even corrupt sexuality. At times the novel sounds uncannily like Graham Greene in tone: "we carry our own hells within," a priest tells another character, and a moment later he uses the exact term from Greene: "They'll think I'm a whisky priest."

A Boat Load of Home Folk takes up several of the same themes but looks back also to the early A Descant for Gossips in its concentration on the torments of adolescence. It is peopled by as sorry and defeated a lot as the previous novel and in fact, several of the peripheral characters reappear and play a more central role. Again, sexual repression, but more generally an inability to love, lies at the heart of the problem with most of the characters. As Father Lake puts it, "God save me, God save me ... from a lack of love." The novel is also noteworthy for a magnificently climactic cyclone as well as for the blossoming of a comic talent which had been present earlier but here achieves an anarchic, even surreal quality.

The Acolyte is Astley's own favorite among her novels. Like several other Australian novels—Patrick White's The Vivisector, for example—it takes up the notion of the artist as a destroyer of human lives, feeding off the flesh of lesser mortals in the service of his sacred art. Unlike White, however, Astley is interested less in the artist figure himself than in the mortals who are helplessly attracted to him and allow themselves to become his sacrificial victims.

A Kindness Cup and An Item from the Late News are both violent and angry novels. The former is based on an incident that took place at The Leap, Queensland, in the second half of the nineteenth century when a group of blacks were massacred. The small town of The Taws is celebrating the progress it has made over the last two decades and has invited former citizens back for a week of reunion. The question, which is eventually answered in the negative, is whether the town can finally acknowledge the injustices it perpetrated in the past. An Item from the Late News deals once again with a person who has returned to the town years after a series of tragic events in order to expunge her guilt. As in A Kindness Cup the strong characters are evil bullies, while the others exhibit at most a kind of weak tolerance. The novel takes place against the ironical background of Christmas, just as A Kindness Cup uses the New Year.

Coming in between these two grimmest of her novels, Hunting the Wild Pineapple is a wonderfully funny, anarchic collection of stories, as if the author feels she can let her hair down in the shorter, more open form of the story in contrast to her meticulously plotted novels. Astley has in fact written quite a lot of short fiction as the publication of her Collected Stories in 1997 revealed. Most of the stories are related by Keith Leverson, whom we left as a young boy at the end of The Slow Natives in hospital with his leg amputated. Now middle-aged, Leverson is "a monopod self-pitier" but also a man who has become accustomed to observing others rather than living himself and his perceptions are shrewd, sardonic, witty. Mostly, the observation is of "this second-rate Eden," Astley's familiar northern Queensland, the area "north of twenty and one hundred and fortysix," and of the drop-outs and hippies who inhabit it. In contrast to the sympathetic way she had treated tortured adolescents in earlier novels, Astley through Leverson views these young people with a sort of benign contempt.

Beachmasters breaks new ground in that it is set outside Australia and is quite overtly political. A group of natives on the Pacific island of Kristi, somewhere near to the north of Australia, stage a brief-lived revolt against the English and French powers which govern it. Their bizarre rebellion is described in a quite Conradian way, in terms that are both absurdly farcical on the one hand and profoundly sad on the other. For all the comic elements in the rebellion, Astley's treatment is full of outrage. The sub-title of her eleventh book of fiction, "Pictures from the Family Album," is revealing as to how the novel works. It's Raining in Mango comes complete with a brief family tree and in fourteen episodes takes the history of the Laffey family from the time of the arrival of Cornelius and his wife up to roughly the present and the fourth generation. Ironically juxtaposed against their loosely structured history is that of a line of blacks—"Bidiggi" (known later as Bidgi the Mumbler) born in the 1860s, father of Jackie Mumbler, grandfather of Charley Mumbler and great-grandfather of Billy Mumbler.

Although the social concerns that inform all of Astley's work are present in Reaching Tin River they are more muted. The novel deals more directly with the relations between the sexes and is an unusually personal work, the pain internalized rather than directed outwards in the form of moral outrage. It is the story of the quest by Belle for her mother, and perhaps ultimately for herself. Reaching Tin River is an oddly moving novel. If there is a limitation to Astley's writing, it takes the form of a lack of emotional range. She is moved to anger far more often than anything deeper. This novel is quite desolate in parts, as well as being extremely funny in others. There is a wonderful evocation of Astley's favorite hunting ground of northern Queensland and its small towns with their absurd names.

Vanishing Points consists of two novellas which implicitly comment on one another. As the title suggests, they are linked by the protagonists' search for a means of escape and retreat from the world as a way of rediscovering meaning in it for themselves. The epigraph to each of the three sections of Astley's short novel Coda concerns itself with newspaper reports of old people being abandoned and left to fend for themselves by their children—granny dumping. In the course of the novella we learn about the life of Kathleen Hackendorf, her marriage, her friend Daisy who is now dead but whom she still sees and speaks to everywhere, and finally the treachery of her daughter and her politician husband. In Astley's later works the female characters rebel and stand up for themselves more and more, as if they have finally worked out that life has been dealing them a bum hand. Kathleen is never more attractive than when she is being rude to people who patronize her.

Like A Kindness Cup, The Multiple Effects of Rainshadow is based on a specific historical incident and again it is filled with a sense of outrage at the unjust treatment meted out to black people in Australia. Structurally complex, ranging widely in time and character, the novel takes the same despairing view of black-white relations in Australia as It's Raining in Mango, suggesting the cyclic and repetitive nature of the violence which befalls Aboriginal people, even though some characters such as a Catholic priest attempt to make a stand. Associated with the theme of endemic racism is Astley's increasingly overt preoccupation with feminism, though feminist issues have always been present in some form or other in her novels.

Drylands confirms the direction in which most of Astley's recent work has been going. Its eloquent subtitle is "a book for the world's last reader" and in its account of three generations Astley is able to pour all her dislike of what she believes contemporary Australia and especially contemporary Australian males have become. She deplores her society's racism, its sexism, the decline of country towns and country values, its lack of interest in culture, the illiteracy of its youth and especially their preference for loud, mindless rock over classical music. None of these concerns is new in her work but never has she written so stridently and despairingly, if with ferocious energy, about them. Despite her increasing pessimism, however, Astley's later writing has lost none of its wit, sharp-eyed observation, and relish in the absurdities of egotism. Her body of work is unmatched by that of any contemporary Australian novelist except perhaps Thomas Keneally.

-Laurie Clancy

ATWOOD, Margaret (Eleanor)

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Ottawa, Ontario, 18 November 1939. Education: Victoria College, University of Toronto, 1957–61, B.A. 1961; Radcliffe College, Cambridge, Massachusetts, A.M. 1962; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts 1962–63, 1965–67. Family: Married; one daughter. Career: Lecturer in English, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, 1964–65; instructor in English, Sir George Williams University, Montreal, 1967–68; teacher of creative writing, University of Alberta, Edmonton, 1969–70; assistant professor of English, York University, Toronto, 1971–72. Editor and member of board of directors, House of Anansi Press, Toronto, 1971–73. Writer-in-residence, University of Toronto, 1972–73, University of Alabama, Tuscaloosa, 1985, Macquarie University, North Ryde, New South Wales, 1987, and Trinity University, San Antonio, Texas, 1989; Berg Visiting Professor of English, New York University, 1986. President, Writers Union of Canada, 1981-82, and PEN Canadian Centre, 1984-86. Awards: E.J. Pratt medal, 1961; President's medal, University of Western Ontario, 1965; Governor-General's award, 1966, 1986; Centennial Commission prize, 1967; Union League Civic and Arts Foundation prize, 1969, and Bess Hogkin prize, 1974 (Poetry, Chicago); City of Toronto award, 1976, 1989; St. Lawrence award, 1978; Radcliffe medal, 1980; Molson award, 1981; Guggenheim fellowship, 1981; Welsh Arts Council International Writers prize, 1982; Ida Nudel Humanitarian award, 1986; Toronto Arts award, 1986; Los Angeles Times Book award, 1986; Arthur C. Clarke Science-Fiction award, for novel, 1987; Humanist of the Year award, 1987; National Magazine award, for journalism, 1988; Harvard University Centennial medal, 1990; Trillium award, for Wilderness Tips, 1992, for The Robber Bride, 1994; Trillium award for excellence in Ontario writing, 1995; Commonwealth Writer's prize, 1994, Sunday Times award for literary excellence, 1994, both for The Robber Bride. Chevalier dans L'Ordre des arts et des lettres, 1994; Giller prize 1996; Medal of Honor for Literature (National Arts Club), 1997. D.Litt.: Trent University, Peterborough, Ontario, 1973; Concordia University, Montreal, 1980; Smith College, Northampton, Massachusetts, 1982; University of Toronto, 1983; Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Massachusetts, 1985; University of Waterloo, Ontario, 1985; University of Guelph, Ontario, 1985; Victoria College, 1987; University of Leeds, 1994; McMaster University, 1996. LL.D.: Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario, 1974. Honorary degree from Oxford University, Oxford, England, 1998. Companion, Order of Canada, 1981. Fellow, Royal Society of Canada, 1987; Honorary Member, American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1988. Agent: Phoebe Larmore, 228 Main Street, Venice, California 90291, U.S.A. Address: c/o Oxford University Press, 70 Wynford Drive, Don Mills, Ontario M3C 1J9, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Edible Woman. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, and London, Deutsch, 1969; Boston, Little Brown, 1970; New York, Bantam Books, 1996.

Surfacing. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1972; London, Deutsch, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1973.

Lady Oracle. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1976; London, Deutsch, 1977.

Life Before Man. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1979; New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Cape, 1980.

Bodily Harm. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1981; New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Cape, 1982.

The Handmaid's Tale. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1985; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Cape, 1986.

Cat's Eye. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1988; New York, Doubleday, and London, Bloomsbury, 1989.

The Robber Bride. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, New York, Doubleday, and London, Bloomsbury, 1993.

Alias Grace. New York, Nan A. Talese, 1996.

The Blind Assassin. New York, Nan A. Talese, 2000.

Short Stories

Dancing Girls and Other Stories. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1977; New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Cape, 1982.

Encounters with the Element Man. Concord, New Hampshire, Ewert, 1982.

Murder in the Dark: Short Fictions and Prose Poems. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1983; London, Cape, 1984.

Bluebeard's Egg and Other Stories. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1983; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1986; London, Cape, 1987. Unearthing Suite. Toronto, Grand Union Press, 1983.

Hurricane Hazel and Other Stories. Helsinki, Eurographica, 1986.

Wilderness Tips. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, New York, Doubleday, and London, Bloomsbury, 1991.

Good Bones. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1992; London, Bloomsbury, 1993; published as Good Bones and Simple Murders. New York, Nan A. Talese/Doubleday, 1994.

In Our Nature: Stories of Wilderness, edited by Donna Seaman. New York, Dorling Kindersley, 2000.

Uncollected Short Stories

"When It Happens," in The Editors' Choice 1, edited by George E. Murphy, Jr. New York, Bantam, 1985.

"Theology," in Harper's (New York), September 1988.

"Kat," in New Yorker, 5 March 1990.

"Weight," in Vogue (New York), August 1990.

"Hack Wednesday," in New Yorker, 17 September 1990.

Contributor, Fiction, edited by R. S. Gwynn. New York, HarperCollins, 1993.

Contributor, Myths and Voices: Contemporary Canadian Fiction, edited by David Lampe. Fredonia, New York, White Pine Press, 1993.

Plays

Radio Plays: The Trumpets of Summer, 1964.

Television Plays: The Servant Girl, 1974; Snowbird, 1981; Heaven on Earth, with Peter Pearson, 1986.

Poetry

Double Persephone. Toronto, Hawskhead Press, 1961.

The Circle Game (single poem). Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, Cranbrook Academy of Art, 1964; introduction by Sherrill Grace. Toronto, House of Anansi, 1998.

Talismans for Children. Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, Cranbrook Academy of Art, 1965.

Kaleidoscopes: Baroque. Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, Cranbrook Academy of Art, 1965.

Speeches for Doctor Frankenstein. Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, Cranbrook Academy of Art. 1966.

The Circle Game (collection). Toronto, Contact Press, 1966.

Expeditions. Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, Cranbrook Academy of Art, 1966.

The Animals in That County. Toronto, Oxford University Press, 1968; Boston, Little Brown, 1969.

Who Was in the Garden. Santa Barbara, California, Unicorn, 1969.

Five Modern Canadian Poets, with others, edited by Eli Mandel. Toronto, Holt Rinehart, 1970.

The Journals of Susanna Moodie. Toronto, Oxford University Press, 1970; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1997.

Oratorio for Sasquatch, Man and Two Androids: Poems for Voices. Toronto, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, 1970.

Procedures for Underground. Toronto, Oxford University Press, and Boston, Little Brown, 1970.

Power Politics. Toronto, Anansi, 1971; New York, Harper, 1973; second edition published as Power Politics: Poems, Concord, Ontario, Anansi, 1996.

You Are Happy. Toronto, Oxford University Press, and New York, Harper, 1974.

Selected Poems. Toronto, Oxford University Press, 1976; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1978.

Marsh, Hawk. Toronto, Dreadnaught, 1977.

Two-Headed Poems. Toronto, Oxford University Press, 1978; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1981.

True Stories. Toronto, Oxford University Press, 1981; New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Cape, 1982.

Notes Towards a Poem That Can Never Be Written. Toronto, Salamander Press, 1981.

Snake Poems. Toronto, Salamander Press, 1983.

Interlunar. Toronto, Oxford University Press, 1984; London, Cape, 1988.

Selected Poems 2: Poems Selected and New 1976–1986. Toronto,
 Oxford University Press, 1986; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1987.
 Selected Poems 1966–1984. Toronto, Oxford University Press, 1990.
 Poems 1965–1975. London, Virago Press, 1991.

Morning in the Burned House. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Virago, 1995.

Eating Fire: Selected Poetry 1965–1995. London, Virago, 1998.

Other (for children)

Up in the Tree. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1978.

Anna's Pet, with Joyce Barkhouse. Toronto, Lorimer, 1980. For the Birds. Toronto, Douglas and McIntyre, 1990.

Princess Prunella and the Purple Peanut, illustrated by Maryann Kovalski. New York, Workman, 1995.

Other

Survival: A Thematic Guide to Canadian Literature. Toronto, Anansi, 1972.

Days of the Rebels 1815–1840. Toronto, Natural Science of Canada, 1977

Second Words: Selected Critical Prose. Toronto, Anansi, 1982; Boston, Beacon Press, 1984.

Margaret Atwood: Conversations, edited by Earl G. Ingersoll. Princeton, New Jersey, Ontario Review Press, 1990.

Strange Things: The Malevolent North in Canadian Literature. New York, Oxford University Press, 1995.

The Labrador Fiasco. London, Bloomsbury, 1996.

A Quiet Game: And Other Early Works, edited by Kathy Chung and Sherill Grace, with illustrations by Kathy Chung. Edmonton, Alberta, Juvenilia Press, 1997.

Two Solicitudes: Conversations (with Victory-Levy Beaulieu), translated by Phyllis Aronoff and Howard Scott. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1998.

Introduction, Women Writers at Work: The Paris Review Interviews, edited by George Plimpton. New York, Modern Library, 1998.

Contributor, The Case Against "Free Trade": GATT, NAFTA, and the Globalization of Corporate Power, edited by Ralph Nader. San Francisco, Earth Island Press, 1993.

Editor, The New Oxford Book of Canadian Verse in English. Toronto, New York, and Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1982.

Editor, with Robert Weaver, The Oxford Book of Canadian Short Stories in English. Toronto, Oxford, and New York, Oxford University Press, 1986.

Editor, The Canlit Food Book: From Pen to Palate: A Collection of Tasty Literary Fare. Toronto, Totem, 1987.

Editor, with Shannon Ravenel, The Best American Short Stories 1989. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1989.

Editor, Barbed Lyres. Toronto, Key Porter, 1990.

Editor, with Barry Callaghan, Gwendolyn MacEwen. Toronto, Exile Editions, 1994.

Editor, with Robert Weaver, The New Oxford Book of Canadian Short Stories in English. New York, Oxford University Press, 1995.

Foreword, The Book Group Book: A Thoughtful Guide to Forming and Enjoying a Stimulating Book Discussion Group, edited by Ellen Slezak. Chicago Review Press, 1995.

*

Bibliography: "Margaret Atwood: An Annotated Bibliography" (prose and poetry) by Alan J. Horne, in The Annotated Bibliography of Canada's Major Authors 1–2 edited by Robert Lecker and Jack David, Downsview, Ontario, ECW Press, 2 vols., 1979–80.

Manuscript Collection: Fisher Library, University of Toronto.

Critical Studies: Margaret Atwood: A Symposium edited by Linda Sandler, Victoria, British Columbia, University of Victoria, 1977; A Violent Duality by Sherrill E. Grace, Montreal, Véhicule Press, 1979, and Margaret Atwood: Language, Text, and System edited by Grace and Lorraine Weir, Vancouver, University of British Columbia Press, 1983; The Art of Margaret Atwood: Essays in Criticism edited by Arnold E. Davidson and Cathy N. Davidson, Toronto, Anansi, 1981; Margaret Atwood by Jerome H. Rosenberg, Boston, Twayne, 1984; Margaret Atwood: A Feminist Poetics by Frank Davey, Vancouver, Talonbooks, 1984; Margaret Atwood by Barbara Hill Rigney, London, Macmillan, 1987; Margaret Atwood: Reflection and Reality by Beatrice Mendez-Egle, Edinburg, Texas, Pan American University, 1987; Critical Essays on Margaret Atwood edited by Judith McCombs, Boston, Hall, 1988; Margaret Atwood: Vision and Forms edited by Kathryn van Spanckeren and Jan Garden Castro, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1988; The Novels of Margaret Atwood and Anita Desai: A Comparative Study in Feminist Perspectives by Sunaina Singh, New Delhi, Creative Books, 1994; Various Atwoods: Essays on the Later Poems, Short Fiction, and Novels, edited by Lorraine M. York, Concord, Ontario, Anansi, 1995; The Influence of Painting on Five Canadian Writers: Alice Munro, Hugh Hood, Timothy Findley, Margaret Atwood, and Michael Ondaatje by John Cooke, Lewiston, New York, Edwin Mellen Press, 1996; Margaret Atwood by Coral Ann Howells, New York, St. Martin's, 1996; Re/ membering Selves: Alienation and Survival in the Novels of Margaret Atwood and Margaret Laurence by Coomi S. Vevaina, New Delhi, Creative Books, 1996; Margaret Atwood: A Biography by Nathalie Cooke, Toronto, ECW Press, 1998; The Red Shoes: Margaret Atwood Starting Out by Rosemary Sullivan, Toronto, HarperFlamingo Canada, 1998; Margaret Atwood Revisited by Karen F. Stein, New York, Twayne, 1999; Margaret Atwood, edited by Harold Bloom, Philadelphia, Chelsea House, 2000.

* * *

In interviews, Margaret Atwood has often commented that when she started writing in the late 1950s and early 1960s, "Canadian literature" was considered a contradiction in terms. Arguably, as a novelist, poet, critic, and literary/political activist, Atwood has done more to put Canada on the literary map than any other author. While Atwood is an accomplished poet—and the interconnections between her poetry, short fiction, and her longer works are both rich and complex—it is primarily as a novelist that she has gained an international reputation. Her first novel, The Edible Woman, establishes a preoccupation that remains central in all her subsequent fiction: power politics, and in particular, sexual politics. Excavating their layered histories and formative childhood experiences, Atwood explores and exposes the unequal power relations that shape and inhibit the lives of her female protagonists. Novel by novel, she extends the scope and the complexity of this examination in an astute commentary on North American social and cultural politics and an unflinching recognition of our all too human capacity to both inflict and sustain harm. Although Atwood refuses any designations that may pigeonhole her as a writer, her work is clearly feminist, and distinctively Canadian.

While Atwood's first three novels are quite different in form and tone—anti-comedy, mythic quest, and Gothic spoof—they are united by their focus on the individual effects of a society that encourages women to collude in their own objectification. The three protagonists: Marian in The Edible Woman, the significantly unnamed narrator in Surfacing, and Joan Foster in Lady Oracle, all experience (or witness) the transformations demanded by gendered social norms, with their illusory promise of a happily ever after. Atwood's heroines, however, are not the stuff of which fairy tales or costume gothics are made. Thus, The Edible Woman traces the ambivalent responses of Marian MacAlpin (who, ironically, works for a market research firm), to her upcoming marriage to a young, rising lawyer. Here, Atwood links the economy of a consumer society with women's place in the economy of the marriage market for Marian's engagement to Peter marks her transition from subject consumer to object consumed as she becomes entrapped by his conservative expectations of regulation femininity. As Peter, the epitome of a shrink-wrapped husband-to-be, starts subjecting Marian to his ideal wife makeover, Marian experiences an increasing sense of her self as an object, an alienation that is textually signaled by the movement from first- to third-person narration. While she generally acquiesces to Peter's demands, her unconscious rejection of this process is played out quite literally in terms of consumption: Marian's body begins to refuse food. This rejection begins with steak, but as the wedding day approaches her rebellion escalates in a symbolic identification with any edible object. Finally, she flees her own engagement party before she is trapped forever in the menacing photographic frame of Peter's desires. Her return to subject status is marked by the baking of an edible woman; presenting this cake surrogate to her shocked fiancé, she rejects both his marriage proposal and his objectifying construction of her. Eating the cake herself, she moves from consumed victim to autonomous consumer.

Atwood's second novel develops many of the thematic concerns of her poetry in evocative prose. Like The Edible Woman, Surfacing presents a woman disabled by the consequences of her "marital" experience, but the protagonist's journey from psychic and emotional paralysis to unified agency has a powerful mythic dimension that the earlier novel lacks. With three companions, the narrator returns to the landscape of her childhood—a remote cabin on a lake in Northern Quebec-to search for her missing father. She is ambivalent about revisiting the scene of her past, because it reminds her of a more immediate event, the loss of her child in a recent divorce. It is an experience that has left her anaesthetized, cut off from her emotions by a form of mind/body split, and her memories are so painful that she represses them in willful amnesia. The quest in search of her father, however, triggers a quest of self-discovery, as the narrator's history refuses to remain submerged; she is haunted by memories of her parents, a marriage that never was, and her complicity in the abortion of her child. Eventually, she is forced to confront her specters when a dive below the lake surface becomes a symbolic dive into her own unconscious. Abandoning her manipulative companions, she ritualistically sheds all vestiges of a language and culture that has led her into self-betrayal and murder. Alone on the island, she undergoes a shamanistic cleansing madness, ultimately surfacing with a newfound sense of self. The novel's conclusion resonates with Atwood's contemporaneous thematic guide to Canadian literature, Survival. Poised to return to the world that she has left, the narrator's vision leaves her with a resolution that speaks to her experience as both a Canadian and as a woman: "This above all, to refuse to be a victim."

Lady Oracle comes as something of a light relief as Atwood's concerns with metamorphosis and identity are given a comic spin. With a protagonist whose many incarnations give new meaning to "a.k.a.," Atwood parodies the conventions of romance and of the gothic in an exploration of the damaging effects of mass-produced fantasies for women. Joan Foster is the ultimate escape artist whose identity is made up of a number of different personae. Ostensibly, she is Joan Foster, self-effacing wife of an ineffectually radical husband, but she is also Joan Foster, celebrated author of a volume of feminist poetry. Secretly, she is Louisa K. Delacourt, author of some fifteen costume gothics. Lurking in the background is a freakish circus clown figure, the Fat Lady, a lingering self-conception from her years as an overweight, unloved child. When, under threat of blackmail, Joan's various lives are in danger of converging, she fakes her own drowning and flees to Italy. These personae, however, continue to surface as she completes her latest Harlequinesque offering, Stalked By Love, in an ironic and unconscious identification with her heroine's predicament. For all its droll comedy-Atwood even includes parodic autobiographical asides-Lady Oracle, like The Edible Woman, contains a serious message. Although Joan's recognition of her situation is debatable, the novel demonstrates the debilitating consequences for women of the beauty myth and the conventional romance plot.

Life Before Man is Atwood's bleakest exploration of relations between the sexes, and her most atypical novel to date. Although popular with readers, it has been less well received by critics, partly because of its uncharacteristic pessimism. Set in a claustrophobic one-mile radius of metropolitan Toronto, the novel is dominated by a central symbolic locale, the dinosaur exhibit at the Royal Ontario Museum. Atwood's specimens are emotionally isolated characters involved in a love triangle: Elizabeth, whose icy, self-control is a product of a dreadful childhood; Nate, her indecisive, politically disillusioned husband; and Lesje, a dreamy paleontologist who becomes Nate's lover. Covering a precisely dated two-year span, and structured by the alternating perceptions of the participants in this banal ménage à trois, Life Before Man traces the frustrated interactions of characters who cannot connect. Events in the novel are unrelentingly quotidian; even the dramatic suicide of Elizabeth's lover occurs before the story opens. Lesje's obsession with prehistory focuses the novel's exploration of time and extinction, since the age of the dinosaurs provides a metaphysical conceit for the eyeblink of human existence in cosmic terms. Perhaps, Atwood implies, we are only in the middle of a lengthy evolutionary process; certainly, the changes undergone by the three protagonists are minimal at best. Since they are products of social milieu that is all too recognizable as our own, "life before man" suggests that at this historical moment ours is a condition that is not yet fully human.

Challenged about the apparent hopelessness of Life Before Man, Atwood asserts the writer's responsibility to bear witness to the world around her. Moving her examination of power politics into an international arena, Atwood's next two novels, Bodily Harm and The Handmaid's Tale, translate this commitment into a moral imperative. Here, Atwood outlines the interconnected nature of various oppressions for the protagonists' personal circumstances are literally or symbolically associated with systemic abuses of power. Initially, both Rennie Wilford in Bodily Harm and Offred in The Handmaid's Tale are complacently assured of their own political neutrality, in the mistaken belief that violence happens elsewhere to other people. They quickly learn, however, that immunity is a political myth. Rennie becomes embroiled in the after-effects of British and American foreign policy, while Offred exists in a chilling aggregate of historical and contemporary events pushed to their logical extreme: a totalitarian theocracy whose seeds lie in America's Puritan history. Both take up the challenge of documenting their experiences, bearing witness to the brutal realities of the worlds that they inhabit. The novels are saved from didacticism, however, by their narrative strength and the ironic observations of the protagonists who demonstrate that history, especially personal history, is never reducible to simplistic black and white categorizations.

Bodily Harm's protagonist is a journalist of sorts, but her work centers on surfaces rather than depths: Rennie writes trivial lifestyle pieces for city magazines. Her own insulated lifestyle, however, is disrupted by a malignant tumor. After a mastectomy, and subsequent abandonment by her lover—a more sinister version of Peter in The Edible Woman—she flees to a Caribbean island attempting to escape her feelings of violation and a life that has become too horrifically real. Structured associatively, rather than chronologically, Bodily Harm demonstrates Atwood's talent for mining the multilayered possibilities of metaphorical language as she links sexism with imperialism, cancer of the female body with cancer of the body politic. The fragmented narrative echoes Rennie's own sense of dismemberment. Like the narrator in Surfacing, she is alienated from the body that has betrayed her, a divorce that symbolically complements her inability to connect with others. Thus, she refuses to engage with the political situation in her island getaway, preferring instead to remain a professional tourist. When the island is shaken by a political coup, however, Rennie is dragged unwillingly into the thick of it. Witnessing the brutal torture of a defenseless prisoner, and the equally viscous beating of her friend and cellmate, Lora, Rennie starts making some personal and political connections. Finally, she realizes the illusory nature of her belief in her own political exemption, and of the pressing need for massive involvement. Clearly, Atwood's own involvement with Amnesty International marks this novel, for Rennie's projected response to the Canadian officials who release her and request her silence is a telling resolution: "In any case she is a subversive. She was not one once but now she is. A reporter. She will pick her time; then she will report."

The Handmaid's Tale—Atwood's first sustained prose foray into speculative fiction-struck many as a radical departure, but it is merely a versatile variation in her ongoing exploration of the intersections of sex and power. It is also the novel that best exemplifies her understanding of the political, a term that she defines as "who's allowed to do what to whom, who gets what from whom, who gets away with it and how." Revisioning Orwell's 1984 in feminist terms, Atwood creates the Republic of Gilead, a dystopian projection extrapolated from current trends. Although some critics derided its plausibility, the path of American affairs since the novel's publication makes The Handmaid's Tale read like prophetic realism. In Atwood's not-too-distant patriarchal future, New England has been taken over by right-wing Christian fundamentalists whose family values involve the state-enforced reduction of women to economic and biological functions, justified by selective readings of the Old Testament. As one of the few fertile women in a polluted world, the protagonist's role is that of a surrogate mother; she is a handmaid, ritually impregnated by the paternalistic Commander whose name she bears. Offred's "now" is partially explained by the memories that both pain and sustain her in a series of flashbacks to a past very similar to our own present. Then, Offred's chosen absence from history offered freedom; in Gilead this imposed absence constitutes historical erasure. Thus, her account documents her struggle to maintain her identity in a society that refuses to acknowledge it. Prohibited from access to pens or books, Offred's precocious command of language proves central to her selfpreservation. And of course Offred is constructing and preserving her identity through the fragmented story that she relates, thus her text is strewn with postmodern allusions to the role of the reader in that process. As a subversive reporter on experience, Offred's plea for an audience becomes all the more pressing in the light of the ironic historical notes that conclude the novel.

With Cat's Eye, The Robber Bride, and Alias Grace, Atwood returns to the Toronto setting of her earlier work to explore public and private histories, and the vicissitudes of female friendships. In many ways, Cat's Eye is also a return to the territory covered in Surfacing, not only in its autobiographical echoes, but also in its exploration of time and memory. Both present an artist protagonist reluctant to examine her personal and historical depths, who eventually wrestles with her inner demons in a psychic exorcism, but Cat's Eye's complexities are more subtle and more fully realized. The novel is retrospective both in form and content. A retrospective exhibition brings a grudging Elaine Risley back to the city of her childhood in a return that initiates an imaginative narrative retrospective of her own supposedly forgotten past. A child of the 1940s and 1950s, (like Atwood), her reflections render the Toronto scene in every minute detail, thus Cat's Eye functions not only as memoir, but also as a social document of post-war Canadian culture. The dramatic center of the novel lies in Elaine's childhood experience of victimization at the hands of her three best friends, and in her ambivalent feelings about the chief agent of her feminine indoctrination and torment, Cordelia. As Atwood presents it, the world of little girls is not marked by sugar and spice, but rather by the same power politics that characterize adult life. Artistic insight is offered, however, in the paintings that are the key to Elaine's unresolved anxieties, and ultimately her attempt to master her past in a visionary blend of revenge and forgiveness, love and loss. Cat's Eye is perhaps Atwood's most profound achievement for here she, like her protagonist, transforms the scattered details of a life into unified work of art.

If Cat's Eye ventures into the uncharted terrain of malicious little girls, then The Robber Bride plumbs the depths of female sexual competitiveness. Here, Atwood braids the contrasting histories and perceptions of three battle-scarred "veterans" - Charis, Tony, and Roz-whose weaknesses are exploited by a machiavellian seductress. In a comic gender inversion of Grimm's tale, the titular villain is Zenia, a protean femme fatale who invades the protagonists' lives only to make off with the booty—their men. Indeed, warfare is the dominant motif, for Zenia's sexual terrorism is played out against a backdrop of past and present military conflict. As in Bodily Harm, the personal and the political are intricately intermingled. The Robber Bride also develops Atwood's characteristic concern with formative influences and female identity since Zenia, like Cordelia in Cat's Eye, functions not only as an antagonist, but also as a doppelgänger for each of the characters. Although each woman's point of view is symmetrically apportioned, it is Tony—the text's literal and figurative historian—whose perspective frames the novel. Musing on the ambiguous promise of History's explanatory power, and its relation to the inexplicability of Zenia, it is she who wonders whether the evil that Zenia represents may not also be a part of us.

With Alias Grace, her most recent novel, Atwood contributes to the contemporary boom in historical fiction, even as she indulges the fascination with "bad girls" that marks her previous two novels. Raiding the nineteenth-century archive, Atwood presents the richly evoked history of Canada's answer to Lizzie Borden: the "celebrated murderess," Grace Marks, convicted of abetting the murder of her Tory employer and his housekeeper/mistress. A Zenia who is allowed to tell her own story, Grace calmly exposes the contradictory constructions of her character, and unsettles the conventional expectations of Simon Jordan, the ambitious doctor who hopes to make his reputation by curing her apparent amnesia about the case. Like the imprisoned handmaid, Grace's tale is her only power and she wields her ability with consummate skill; she is as adept at storytelling as she is at the female art of quilt-making, the novel's dominant, somewhat overdetermined metaphor. Grace Marks's narrative voice is quintessential Atwood-dispassionate, laconic, devastating in its acuity—but, much like the historians who consider the handmaid's tale, Simon Jordan cannot "hear" its political import or register his own complicity in the unequal class and gender system that her story so subtly exposes. Exhibiting the same prurient interest in Grace's case as the salivating public (and, implicitly, the reader), Simon longs for the gory details; an ever enigmatic Grace provides an uncompromisingly detailed account of the social and economic circumstances that may (or may not) have led a housemaid to murder. Although Alias Grace contains a "revelation" that demonstrates Atwood's continued attraction to the psychological possibilities afforded by the gothic mode, even this sensational conclusion is ambiguous. Ultimately, the question of Grace Marks's guilt or innocence is subordinated to a more telling exposé of the power politics that constitute Atwood's abiding concern. In this, her first extended exploration of Canada's past since The Journals of Susanna Moodie, Atwood reiterates and historicizes the central tenet of her moral vision: our human potential to be both a victim and victimizer and our responsibility to be neither.

—Jackie Buxton

AUCHINCLOSS, Louis (Stanton)

Nationality: American. Born: Lawrence, New York, 27 September 1917. Education: Groton School, Massachusetts, graduated 1935; Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1935–38; University of Virginia Law School, Charlottesville, LL.B. 1941; admitted to the New York bar, 1941. Military Service: Served in the United States Naval Reserve, 1941–45: Lieutenant. Family: Married Adele Lawrence in 1957; three sons. Career: Associate lawyer, Sullivan and Cromwell, New York, 1941-51; associate, 1954-58, and partner, 1958-86, Hawkins Delafield and Wood, New York. Since 1966 president of the Museum of the City of New York. Trustee, Josiah Macy Jr. Foundation, New York; former member of the Executive Committee, Association of the Bar of New York City. Awards: New York State Governor's award, 1985. D.Litt.: New York University, 1974; Pace College, New York, 1979; University of the South, Sewanee, Tennessee, 1986. Member: American Academy. Agent: Curtis Brown, 10 Astor Place, New York, New York 10003. Address: 1111 Park Avenue, New York, New York 10128, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Indifferent Children (as Andrew Lee). New York, Prentice Hall, 1947.

Sybil. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1951; London, Gollancz, 1952.

A Law for the Lion. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Gollancz, 1953.

The Great World and Timothy Colt. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1956; London, Gollancz, 1957.

Venus in Sparta. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Gollancz, 1958.

Pursuit of the Prodigal. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1959; London, Gollancz, 1960.

The House of Five Talents. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1960; London, Gollancz, 1961.

Portrait in Brownstone. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Gollancz, 1962.

The Rector of Justin. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1964; London, Gollancz, 1965.

The Embezzler. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Gollancz 1966

A World of Profit. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1968; London, Gollancz, 1969.

I Come as a Thief. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1972; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1973.

The Partners. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1974.

The Winthrop Covenant. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1976.

The Dark Lady. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1977.

The Country Cousin. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1978.

The House of the Prophet. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1980.

The Cat and the King. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1981.

- Watchfires. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1982.
- Exit Lady Masham. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1983; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1984.
- The Book Class. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1984.
- Honorable Men. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1985; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1986.
- Diary of a Yuppie. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1986; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1987.
- The Golden Calves. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1988; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1989.
- Fellow Passengers: A Novel in Portraits. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1989; London, Constable, 1990.
- The Lady of Situations. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1990; London, Constable, 1991.
- Tales of Yesteryear. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1994.
- The Education of Oscar Fairfax. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1995. Her Infinite Variety. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 2000.
- The Embezzler. New Brunswick, New Jersey, Transaction, 2000.

Short Stories

- The Injustice Collectors. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1950; London, Gollancz, 1951.
- The Romantic Egoists: A Reflection in Eight Minutes. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Gollancz, 1954.
- Powers of Attorney. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Gollancz, 1963.
- Tales of Manhattan. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Gollancz, 1967.
- Second Chance. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1970; London, Gollancz, 1971.
- Narcissa and Other Fables. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1983.
- Skinny Island: More Tales of Manhattan. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1987; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1988.
- False Gods. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1992; London, Constable, 1993.
- Three Lives. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1993; London, Constable,
- The Collected Stories of Louis Auchincloss. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1994.
- The Atonement, and Other Stories. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1997. The Anniversary and Other Stories. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1999.

Play

The Club Bedroom (produced New York, 1967).

Other

- Edith Wharton. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1961.Reflections of a Jacobite. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1961; London, Gollancz, 1962.
- Ellen Glasgow. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1964. Pioneers and Caretakers: A Study of 9 American Women Novelists.
- Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1965; London, Oxford University Press, 1966.

- Motiveless Malignity (on Shakespeare). Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1969; London, Gollancz, 1970.
- Henry Adams. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1971.
- Edith Wharton: A Woman in Her Time. New York, Viking Press, 1971; London, Joseph, 1972.
- Richelieu. New York, Viking Press, 1972; London, Joseph, 1973.
- A Writer's Capital (autobiography). Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1974.
- Reading Henry James. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1975.
- Persons of Consequence: Queen Victoria and Her Circle. New York, Random House, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1979.
- Life, Law, and Letters: Essays and Sketches. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1979; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1980.
- Three "Perfect Novels" and What They Have in Common. Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, Bruccoli Clark, 1981.
- Unseen Versailles. New York, Doubleday, 1981.
- False Dawn: Women in the Age of the Sun King. New York, Doubleday, 1984.
- The Vanderbilt Era: Profiles of a Gilded Age. New York, Scribner, 1989.
- J.P. Morgan: The Financier as Collector. New York, Abrams, 1990.Love Without Wings: Some Friendships in Literature and Politics.Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1991.
- Deborah Turbeville's Newport Remembered: A Photographic Portrait of a Gilded Past. New York, Abrams, 1994.
- The Style's the Man: Reflections on Proust, Fitzgerald, Wharton, Vidal, and Others. New York, Scribner, 1994.
- Deborah Turbeville's Newport Remembered: A Photographic Portrait of a Gilded Past (text), photography by Deborah Turbeville. New York, Henry N. Abrams, 1994.
- The Man Behind the Book: Literary Profiles. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1996.
- La Gloire: The Roman Empire of Corneille and Racine. Columbia, South Carolina, University of South Carolina, 1996.
- Woodrow Wilson. New York, Viking, 2000.
- Afterword, High Society: The Town and Country Picture Album, 1846–1996, edited by Anthony T. Mazzola and Frank Zachary. New York, Abrams, 1996.
- Contributor, with others, A Century of Arts and Letters: The History of the National Institute of Arts and Letters and the American Academy of Arts and Letters as Told, Decade by Decade, by Eleven Members, edited by John Updike. New York, Columbia University Press, 1998.
- Foreword, New York Novels by Edith Wharton. New York, Modern Library, 1998.
- Foreword, The Age of Innocence by Edith Wharton. New York, Modern Library, 1999.
- Editor, An Edith Wharton Reader. New York, Scribner, 1965.
- Editor, The Warden, and Barchester Towers, by Trollope. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1966.
- Editor, Fables of Wit and Elegance. New York, Scribner, 1975.
- Editor, Maverick in Mauve: The Diary of a Turn-of-the-Century Aristocrat, by Florence Adele Sloane. New York, Doubleday, 1983.
- Editor, The Hone and Strong Diaries of Old Manhattan. New York, Abbeville Press, 1989.
- Introduction, Cattle Boat to Oxford: The Education of R. I. W. Westgate: Edited from His Letters, Diaries, and Papers by Sheila Margaret Westgate. New York, Walker, 1994.

Introduction, Jean Christophe by Romaine Rolland. New York, Carroll & Graf, 1996.

Introduction, The Reef by Edith Wharton. New York, Scribner, 1996.

*

Bibliography: Louis Auchincloss and His Critics: A Bibliographical Record by Jackson R. Bryer, Boston, Hall, 1977.

Manuscript Collection: University of Virginia, Charlottesville.

Critical Studies: The Novel of Manners in America by James W. Tuttleton, Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1972; Louis Auchincloss by Christopher C. Dahl, New York, Ungar, 1986; Louis Auchincloss: The Growth of a Novelist by Vincent Piket, Nijmegan, Netherlands, European University Press, 1989, New York, St. Martin's Press, and London, Macmillan, 1991; Louis Auchincloss: A Writer's Life by Carol W. Gelderman, New York, Crown, 1993.

Louis Auchincloss comments:

(1972) I do not think in general that authors are very illuminating on their own work, but in view of the harshness of recent (1970) reviewers, I should like to quote from a letter of Edith Wharton in my collection. It was written when she was 63, ten years older than I now am, but the mood is relevant. She is speaking of critics who have disliked her last novel: "You will wonder that the priestess of the life of reason should take such things to heart, and I wonder too. I never have minded before, but as my work reaches its close, I feel so sure that it is either nothing or far more than they know. And I wonder, a little desolately, which." Mrs. Wharton's work was far from its close, and I hope mine may be!

* * *

Louis Auchincloss is among the few dedicated novelists of manners at work in contemporary America. He is a successor to Edith Wharton as a chronicler of the New York aristocracy. In this role he necessarily imbues his novels with an elegiac tone as he observes the passing beauties of the city and the fading power of the white Anglo-Saxon Protestants of old family and old money who can no longer sustain their position of dominance in the society or their aristocratic ideals. His principal subject is thus the manners and morals, the money and marriages, the families and houses, the schools and games, the language and arts of the New York aristocracy as he traces its rise, observes its present crisis, and meditates its possible fall and disappearance. The point of vantage from which he often observes the aristocracy is that of the lawyer who serves and frequently belongs to this class.

The idea of good family stands in an uneasy relation to money in Auchincloss's fiction. Auchincloss dramatizes the dilemma of the American aristocracy by showing that it is necessary to possess money to belong to this class but fatal to one's standing within the class to pursue money. People who have connections with those who are still in trade cannot themselves fully qualify as gentlemen, as the opportunistic Mr. Dale in The Great World and Timothy Colt shows. On the other hand, Auchincloss is clearly critical of those aristocrats like Bertie Millinder or Percy Prime who do nothing constructive and are engaged simply in the spending of money. Auchincloss recognizes that the family is the most important of aristocratic institutions and that its place in its class is guaranteed by the conservation of its resources. This task of preserving the family wealth falls to the lawyers, and his fiction is rich in the complexities, both moral and financial, of fiduciary responsibility; Venus in Sparta is a novel in point. The paradox that Auchincloss reveals but does not seem sufficiently to exploit is that the conservative impulse of the aristocracy, which emphasizes the past, is concerned ultimately with posterity, which of course emphasizes the future.

Auchincloss does, however, fully exploit the conflict between the marriage arranged for the good of the family, often by strong women, and romantic or sexual impulses that are destructive of purely social goals, as Portrait in Brownstone illustrates. Sex and love are enemies to the organicism of conservative societies, in which the will of the individual is vested in the whole. Auchincloss observes the workings of this organic notion in the structure of family and marriage as well as in institutions like the school and the club where a consensus judgment about value and behavior is formulated and handed down. Such institutions preserve a way of life and protect those who live by it from those on the outside who do not. The Rector of Justin is the most obvious of Auchincloss's novels to deal with an institution, or with a man as an institution, that performs this function.

Auchincloss's fiction does more than present us with a mere record of the institutions that support the American aristocracy. The dramatic interest in his novels and whatever larger importance may be accorded them lies in his recognition that the entire class is in jeopardy and that individual aristocrats are often failures. The closed, unitary life of the aristocracy is sometimes threatened by outsiders— Jews, for example, as in The Dark Lady and The House of the Prophet—who must be repelled or at worst absorbed. Sometimes Auchincloss sees problems arising within the context of aristocracy itself, as when individual will or desire comes in conflict with the organicism; perhaps Rees Parmalee, in Pursuit of the Prodigal, makes the most significant rebellion of all Auchincloss's characters, but he is rejecting a decadent aristocracy and not aristocracy itself. Auchincloss is severely critical of the idea of the gentleman when it is corrupted by allegiance to superficial qualities, like Guy Prime's capacity to hold his liquor or to behave with virile cordiality in The Embezzler. But the real failures are those aristocrats who suffer, as so many of Auchincloss's male characters do, from a sense of inadequacy and insecurity that leads them to self-destructiveness. They are not strong and tough-fibered, as so many of the women are; they seem too fastidious and over-civilized, and they are failing the idea of society and their class. In this way, and in others, Auchincloss regretfully chronicles the passing of the aristocracy, which cannot sustain its own ideals in the contemporary world: A World of Profit is the most explicit recognition of this failure.

Auchincloss has made his record of the New York aristocracy in a style which is clear and simple, occasionally elegant and brilliant, and sometimes self-consciously allusive. He has a gift for comedy of manners, which he has not sufficiently cultivated, and a fine model in Oscar Wilde. Other influences upon him include Edith Wharton, in ways already mentioned; Henry James, from whom he learned the manipulation of point of view, and the faculty of endowing things, art objects for example, with meaning; and St. Simon, a memorialist who did for the French court what Auchincloss wishes to do for Knickerbocker New York. Yet among his faults as a novelist, especially evident because of the particular genre he has chosen, is a failure to give the reader a richness of detail; he does well with home furnishings but is far less successful with the details of institutions. Furthermore, he sometimes loses control of his novels and permits action to overwhelm theme. The most serious criticism to be made of his work is that while he does indeed pose moral dilemmas for his characters, he too easily resolves their problems for them. He does not sufficiently convey a sense of the bitter cost of honesty or courage or moral superiority, a continuing difficulty for him, as The Country Cousin demonstrates.

This same ethical conflict is seen in Three Lives, which, like Gertrude Stein's work of the same title, consists of three novellas disclosing the lives of three characters from the same stratum of society. Being Auchincloss rather than Stein, his characters are three New Yorkers born to wealth around the turn of the century. In Tales of Yesteryear, we see as well an assortment of characters of wealth and privilege who suffer a hardening of the heart as a result of their station in society. In several tales, members of the older generation look back over their lives with quiet regret, suggesting that wealth and power do not bring contentment. From this collection come some of the stories in Auchincloss's fiftieth book, The Collected Stories of Louis Auchincloss. Here readers find a full range of Auchincloss, from one of his earliest stories, the perfectly composed "Maud," to his most recent "They That Have the Power to Hurt."

He has given us, on balance, a full enough record of upper-class life in New York, but he has fallen short of the most penetrating and meaningful kinds of social insight that the best of the novelists of manners offer.

-Chester E. Eisinger, updated by Sandra Ray

AUSTER, Paul

Nationality: American. Born: Newark, New Jersey, 3 February 1947. Education: Columbia University, New York, B.A. 1969, M.A. 1970. Family: Married 1) Lydia Davis in 1974; 2) Siri Hustvedt in 1981; two children. Career: Has had a variety of jobs, including merchant seaman, census taker, and tutor; creative writing teacher, Princeton University, New Jersey, 1986–90. Awards: Ingram Merrill Foundation grant, for poetry, 1975, 1982; PEN Translation Center grant, 1977; National Endowment for the Arts fellowship for poetry, 1979, and for creative writing, 1985; Cheavlier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres, 1992; Prix Medicis Etranger, 1993; Independent Spirit Award, 1996. Address: c/o Viking, 375 Hudson Street, New York, New York 10014, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Squeeze Play (as Paul Benjamin). London, Alpha-Omega, 1982; New York, Avon, 1984.

The New York Trilogy. London, Faber, 1987; New York, Penguin, 1990.

City of Glass. Los Angeles, Sun and Moon Press, 1985.

Ghosts. Los Angeles, Sun and Moon Press, 1986.

The Locked Room. Los Angeles, Sun and Moon Press, 1987.

In the Country of Last Things. New York, Viking, 1987; London, Faber, 1988.

Moon Palace. New York, Viking, 1989; London, Faber, 1990.

The Music of Chance. New York, Viking, 1990; London, Faber, 1991. Leviathan. New York, Viking, and London, Faber, 1992. Mr. Vertigo. New York, Viking, and London, Faber, 1994. Timbuktu. New York, Holt, 1999.

Uncollected Short Story

"Auggie Wren's Christmas Story," in New York Times, 25 December 1990

Plays

Eclipse (produced New York, 1977).

Screenplays: Smoke, Miramax Films, 1995; Blue in the Face (with Wayne Wang), Miramax Films, 1995; Lulu on the Bridge: A Film, New York, Holt, 1998.

Poetry

Unearth: Poems 1970–72. Weston, Connecticut, Living Hand, 1974. Wall Writing: Poems 1971–75. Berkeley, California, Figures, 1976. Fragments from Cold. New York, Parenthèse, 1977. Facing the Music. New York, Station Hill, 1980. Disappearances. New York, Overlook Press, 1988.

Other

White Spaces. New York, Station Hill, 1980.

The Art of Hunger and Other Essays. London, Menard Press, 1982; expanded edition, New York, Penguin, 1997.

The Invention of Solitude. New York, Sun, 1982; London, Faber, 1988.

Ground Work: Selected Poems and Essays 1970–1979. London, Faber, 1990.

Smoke and Blue in the Face: Two Films. New York, Hyperion, 1995. The Red Notebook and Other Writings. Boston, Faber and Faber, 1995.

Why Write? Providence, Rhode Island, Burning Deck, 1996.

Hand to Mouth: A Chronicle of Early Failure. New York, Holt, 1997.Introduction, Hunger by Knut Hamsun, translated by Robert Bly.New York, Noonday Press, 1998.

Introduction, with David Cone, Things Happen for a Reason: The True Story of an Itinerant Life in Baseball by Terry Leach with Tom Clark. Berkeley, California, Frog, 2000.

Contributor, Edward Hopper and the American Imagination by Deborah Lyons and Adam D. Weinberg, edited by Julie Grau. New York, Norton, 1995.

Editor, The Random House Book of Twentieth-Century French Poetry. London, Random House, 1982; New York, Vintage, 1984.

Editor and translator, The Notebooks of Joseph Joubert: A Selection. San Francisco, North Point Press, 1983.

Translator, A Little Anthology of Surrealist Poems. New York, Siamese Banana Press, 1972.

Translator, Fits and Starts: Selected Poems of Jacques Dupin. Weston, Connecticut, Living Hand, 1974.

Translator, with Lydia Davis, Arabs and Israelis: A Dialogue, by Saul Friedlander and Mahmoud Hussein. New York, Holmes and Meier, 1975.

Translator, The Uninhabited: Selected Poems of André de Bouchet. Weston, Connecticut, Living Hand, 1976.

Translator, with Lydia Davis, Jean-Paul Sartre: Life Situations. New York, Pantheon, 1977; as Sartre in the Seventies: Interviews and Essays, London, Deutsch, 1978.

Translator, with Lydia Davis, China: The People's Republic 1949–76, by Jean Chesneaux. New York, Pantheon, 1979.

Translator, with Françoise Le Barbier and Marie-Claire Bergère, China from the 1911 Revolution to Liberation. New York, Pantheon, 1979.

Translator, A Tomb for Anatole, by Stéphane Mallarmé. San Francisco, North Point Press, 1983.

Translator, Vicious Circles, by Maurice Blanchot. New York, Station Hill, 1985.

Translator, On the High Wire, by Philippe Petit. New York, Random House, 1985.

Translator, with Margit Rowell, Joan Miró: Selected Writings. Boston, Hall, 1986.

Translator and author of foreword, Chronicle of the Guayaki Indians by Pierre Clastres. New York, Zone Books, 1998.

Translator, with others, The Station Hill Blanchot Reader, edited by George Quasha. Barrytown, New York, Station Hill, 1999.

*

Critical Studies: Review of Contemporary Fiction, vol. 14, no. 1, Spring 1994 (entire issue devoted to Auster); Beyond the Red Notebook: Essays on Paul Auster edited by Dennis Barone, Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1995.

* * *

Paul Auster has frequently been called a "postmodern" novelist, perhaps in part because critics do not know what else to call a writer whose works include metaphysical detective stories, a dystopian fantasy, an extravagant bildungsroman, and an ambiguous parable of fate and chance. To the extent that the term denotes an ironic stance towards language and its uses, Auster is indeed postmodern; yet without surrendering this irony or foregoing the advantage of self-conscious narration, he has moved to a greater expansiveness of form and content. His later novels have not been hampered by embarrassment at asking big questions about the possibility of self-knowledge and personal redemption; rather, they have conceded to the reader the unmediated pleasures of character and story.

Such pleasures are rather scant in The New York Trilogy, the epistemological mystery novels that established Auster's reputation. What entertainment they provide is almost wholly cerebral: the delectation of intellectual puzzles that have little or no relation to a reality beyond the texts themselves. City of Glass, the first volume, is about a mystery novelist named Quinn whose attempt to live the life of the kind of hardened gumshoe he writes about ends in a tragic muddle. Not the least of the novel's ontological jokes is that the detective for whom Quinn is mistaken is named Paul Auster. Auster himself, or a simulacrum of him, appears in a scene in which the increasingly desperate Quinn goes to him for advice. Interrupted while composing an essay on the vanishing narrators of Don Quixote, Auster is unable to help; he is a writer, not a private investigator. This Paul Auster, however, is not the author of City of Glass. The "actual" author, it turns out, is a former friend of Auster's who heard the story from him and is convinced that Auster has "behaved badly throughout."

Ghosts extends the paradoxes about identity and fictive creation into a world of Beckett-like abstraction and austerity. White hires Blue to watch Black, who does little but write and watch back: "Little does Blue know, of course, that the case will go on for years." Not even violence can finally break this stasis, and as the narrator says at the end, "we know nothing."

A reader may get the feeling that The New York Trilogy is too clever for its own good, that Auster engages knotty intellectual issues partly to evade more troubling emotional ones. The Locked Room, the concluding volume, is nothing if not clever, yet it reveals a new openness in Auster's sensibility. The Paul Auster-like narrator is a young writer of promise whose life is taken over by the appearance, or disappearance, of his doppelgänger Fanshawe, his best friend from his youth. Fanshawe is presumed dead but has left his manuscripts in the care of the narrator, who sees them through publication and to a literary acclaim far surpassing that of his own work. As Fanshawe's appointed biographer, the narrator embarks on an obsessive investigation into the mystery of his friend's life, thereby discovering much about himself as about Fanshawe, for the lines separating their two identities are naturally convergent. The Locked Room may be no more than a game, but the stakes, which do not preclude the anguish that attends existential doubts about one's identity, are considerably higher than those in City of Glass and Ghosts.

The presence of a controlling author is not insisted upon in In the Country of Last Things, a nightmarish tale of total social breakdown in an unnamed city-state that could be New York some years in the future. This does not mean, however, that in this work Auster has resolved all doubts about the problematic relationship of language to reality. The narrator, a young woman named Anna Blume, comes to the city in search of a lost brother, only to be trapped in its round of violence, despair, and physical and spiritual poverty. She keeps a journal (the text of the novel) full of reflections on the inadequacy of words to describe a world where people scavenge viciously for garbage or plot their own suicides. Yet Anna, her lover, and her two remaining friends retain their decency if not their dignity. The truly lost, Auster suggests, may be those who have given up on language itself.

Language acquires a renewed immediacy and momentum in Moon Palace, one of Auster's most entertaining novels, and among his best. Its immensely complicated plot concerns the adventures of Marco Stanley Fogg, an orphan in the best Dickensian tradition, whose modest inheritance runs out in his senior year at Columbia University, consigning him—for reasons obscure even to himself to a season of homelessness and near starvation in Central Park. Just before the weather turns cold, he is rescued by his former college roommate and a young Chinese woman who becomes the love of his life. Soon thereafter he takes a job as an amanuensis to an eccentric and irascible old cripple whose wild stories of his youth as a painter and subsequent adventures in the old West Marco faithfully transcribes. Finally Marco meets up with the old man's estranged son, now a middle-aged and obese professor of history who has taught at a succession of second-rate colleges. In the end Marco loses everything: father, father-figure, and his loving girlfriend and their child, yet his excruciating education has not been wasted. The novel ends with Marco watching the moon rise from a California beach and thinking, "This is where I start ... this is where my life begins."

Auster's accustomed self-referentiality and playing up of literary patterns and allusions once again reveal the artifice that underlies any fictive representation of reality, but the emphasis in Moon Palace is on the reality, not the artifice. The more improbable the events described, the more bizarre the cast of characters, the more the reader is inclined to believe. Marco wonders if old Thomas Effing's outlandish reminiscences can possibly be true, but they are as true as they need to be: true to Effing's private wounds and world, true to the chaotic social reality of America in the 20th century, true to the novel's themes of personal loss and recovery, of the endless invention of the self.

What The Music of Chance is "about" is rather less clear. As fluidly written as Moon Palace, it begins as a fairly straightforward account of the squandering of a family inheritance by a 35-year-old ex-fireman named Jim Nashe; but about halfway through, it shifts into a Kafka-like parable in which Nashe and a young gambler named Jack Pozzi are trapped on the estate of a pair of rich and sinister eccentrics and forced to build a huge wall from the rubble of a castle disassembled and shipped overseas from Ireland. Nashe grows in moral stature as his difficulties increase, but the chances that determine his fate are ordained by the author, who ends the novel with a fatal car crash that is at once wholly arbitrary and perfectly logical. Although Auster's intelligence, humor, and inventiveness are evident throughout, the novel's realist and allegorical tendencies tend to work against one an other. The Music of Chance remains rather opaque, but it also demonstrates Auster's engagement with issues much larger than those that concerned the hermetic fabulist of The New York Trilogy.

The 1995 film Smoke, directed by Wayne Wang from a screenplay by Auster, succeeded in bringing the author's work before a larger, though still highly selective, audience. The story, of intersecting lives and the struggle for intimacy, also revealed him in a much more emotional light than his previous, more cerebral, works. In line with this increased openness, during this period Auster published Hand to Mouth, a reminiscence on his early challenges as a writer. He also began moving deeper into the world of film, and in 1997 directed his first picture, Lulu on the Bridge.

-Stephen Akey

B

BAIL, Murray

Nationality: Australian. Born: Adelaide, South Australia, 22 September 1941. Education: Norwood Technical High School, Adelaide. Family: Married Margaret Wordsworth in 1965. Career: Lived in India, 1968–70, and in England and Europe, 1970–74. Member of the Council, Australian National Gallery, Canberra, 1976–81. Awards: The Age Book of the Year award, 1980; National Book Council award, 1980; Victorian Premier's award, 1988. Address: c/o Faber and Faber, Inc., 50 Cross St., Winchester, Massachusetts 01890, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Homesickness. Melbourne, Macmillan, 1980; London, Faber, 1986;
New York, Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 1999.
Holden's Performance. London, Faber, 1987.
Eucalyptus. New York, Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 1998.

Short Stories

Contemporary Portraits and Other Stories. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1975; as The Drover's Wife, London, Faber, 1986.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Healing," in New Yorker, 16 April 1979.
- "Home Ownership," In Winter's Tales 27, edited by Edward Leeson. London, Macmillan, 1981; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1982.

Other

Ian Fairweather. Sydney, Bay, 1981.

Longhand: A Writer's Notebook. Fitzroy, Victoria, McPhee Gribble, 1989.

Editor, The Faber Book of Contemporary Australian Short Stories. London, Faber, 1988.

Editor, Fairweather. Queensland, Australia, Art and Australia Books, 1994.

* * *

Murray Bail is, with Peter Carey and Frank Moorhouse, one of the chief innovators in the tradition of the Australian short story and is especially associated with its revival in the early and mid-1970s. Since then he has established a reputation as one of Australia's most original and distinctive novelists. Bail's first book was a collection of short stories titled Contemporary Portraits and Other Stories. The first of many tricks is that there no story called "Contemporary Portraits." The collection was later republished as The Drover's Wife and Other Stories. Bail's interest in the relationship between language and reality is present in all the stories and especially "Zoellner's Definition." "The Drover's Wife" is a rewriting of Henry Lawson's classic story. Bail's version is a monologue by the deserted husband, based on a famous painting by Russell Drysdale. The story "Portrait of Electricity" contains the seeds of Bail's first novel, Homesickness. A great man is defined in terms of the various examples and pieces of evidence of his existence contained in a museum devoted to him, beginning with an ashtray and culminating in an example of his excrement. The stories display the strange mixture of surrealist fantasy and broad satire of Australian mores that characterizes all of Bail's work.

The motif of the museum is taken up in Homesickness, a funny, inventive, highly intelligent novel. Bail's obsession is with mythologizing what he sees as so far an unmythologized and therefore unpossessed country. A group of travelers from Australia set out to tour the world. As they do so they shift about and continually form new groups, new liaisons. At the same time they visit a series of museums, each of which seems a kind of paradigm of the culture it represents. The museum in Quito, Ecuador, for instance, is a Museum of Handicrafts. Many of the artifacts are British anachronisms, symbolic of the occupation of the country in the nineteenth century. In New York they see a reenacted mugging. In London there is a Museum of Lost and Found Objects. There are many internal and selfreferential jokes, witty aphorisms, characters with figurative names. There is a little African boy whose name is Oxford University Press and who, asked what he wants to be when he grows up, says "A tourist." Throughout all the wit and ingenuity Bail's concerns emerge with striking consistency. His interest in nationality is only part of his larger interest in identity, which is also central to the novel's motifs of tourism, museums, homesickness ("They could hear Sasha being homesick in the basin") and national differences: at one stage the party go into a series of cliches about national identity that lasts for three pages. And in turn concern with identity merges into concern with language and the relationship between language and experience.

Holden's Performance is again an attempt to mythologize Australia. As the controlling metaphor for the previous novel had been Australians circling the world looking for themselves and their home, so in this it is Australia's national car and icon, General Motors' Holden; the title refers to both "Australia's own car," as it used to be advertised, and the protagonist, Holden Shadbolt, who is made a deliberately representative figure. The novel covers his career from his birth in 1932 to the mid-1960s when he departs for the United States. The motif of the car is carried skillfully through to the final pages of the novel, which are a summary of the character of Holden and by implication of the national identity: "Ability to idle all day. Slight overheating," etc.

Bail makes it clear in all sorts of ways that in documenting the career of Holden he is also documenting the history of Australia from the 1930s, and even earlier, to the mid-1960s and the end of the reign of the Prime Minister, R. G. Menzies, whom he calls in the novel R. G. Amen. At one point in the novel we are told of Hoadley, the ambassador to Egypt, that "More than most ambassadors it seems he had this obsession for building bridges—between men and city, city and country, words and action, the imagination and fact." The same is true of the author. The preoccupation with language is evident to the point where Bail says that there is a "solidarity of words and objects," and this is one thing he tries to show. Holden literally eats words—newsprint: "What did Holden's early growth consist of? Words, words: a flawed gray-and-white view of the world." His health suffers as a result of the many errors in the newspapers he digests.

Bail's most recent novel, Eucalyptus, won him a number of literary awards. It opens with a discussion of the desertorum or Hooked Mallee, one of several hundred species of Eucalyptus, Australia's national tree. But almost immediately this turns into parodic speculations on the national character: "And anyway the very word, desert-or-um, harks back to a stale version of the national landscape and from there is a more or less straight line onto the national character, all those linings of the soul and the larynx, which have their origins in the bush, so it is said, the poetic virtues (can you believe it?) of being belted about by droughts, bushfires, smelly sheep and so on; and let's not forget the isolation, the exhausted shapeless women, the crude language, the always wide horizon, and the flies." All this—the preoccupation with myths of the Australian character, the self-referentiality, the investing of physical objects with figurative qualities—is familiar in Bail's work. What is surprising is that beneath all its game-playing and cerebrality, Eucalyptus is an unexpectedly human and even tender novel.

This account of a farmer who offers the hand of his spectacularly beautiful daughter to the man who can correctly name each of the five hundred species of eucalyptus tree he has planted on his property is a love story, a fairy tale and also, to a certain extent, a detective story in which the author plants clues as carefully as his protagonist plants his beloved trees. The husband and suitor of the beautiful Ellen are both good men in their own ways but their masculinity is bound up, in an Australian way, with emotional inhibition. In contrast, the femininity of the "speckled" Ellen is constantly stressed and she is associated with water, with softness and flexibility, with nature. As the fable of the storytelling stranger who finally wins her suggests, she is the young woman held captive by an ogre, thinking constantly of ways to escape. That she eventually does so is suggested in the closing paragraph of this wonderful novel.

Bail's intense interest in the visual arts led to his writing a biography of the Australian painter Ian Fairweather. He is also the author of Longhand: a Writer's Notebook, which offers fascinating insights into his own artistic practice.

-Laurie Clancy

BAILEY, Paul

Nationality: British. Born: Peter Harry Bailey in Battersea, London, 16 February 1937. Education: Sir Walter St. John's School, London, 1948–53; Central School of Speech and Drama, London, 1953–56. Career: Actor, 1956–63. Literary Fellow, University of Newcastle-upon-Tyne and University of Durham, 1972–74; visiting lecturer, North Dakota State University, Fargo, 1977–79. Awards: Maugham award, 1968; Arts Council award, 1968; Authors' Club award, 1970; E.M. Forster Award (U.S.A.), 1974; Bicentennial Arts fellowship, 1976; Orwell Memorial prize, for essay, 1978. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1982. Address: 79 Davisville Road, London W12 9SH, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

At the Jerusalem. London, Cape, and New York, Atheneum, 1967. Trespasses. London, Cape, 1970; New York, Harper, 1971.

A Distant Likeness. London, Cape, 1973.

Peter Smart's Confessions. London, Cape, 1977.

Old Soldiers. London, Cape, 1980.

Gabriel's Lament. London, Cape, 1986; New York, Viking, 1987.

Sugar Cane. London, Bloomsbury, 1993.

Kitty and Virgil. Woodstock, New York, Overlook Press, 2000.

Plays

A Worthy Guest (produced Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1973; London, 1974).

Alice (produced Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1975).

Crime and Punishment, adaptation of a novel by Dostoevsky (produced Manchester, 1978).

Radio Play: At Cousin Harry's, 1964.

Television Play: We Think the World of You, with Tristram Powell, 1980.

Other

An English Madam: The Life and Work of Cynthia Payne. London, Cape, 1982.

An Immaculate Mistake: Scenes from Childhood and Beyond (autobiography). London, Bloomsbury, 1990; New York, Dutton, 1992.

Editor, The Oxford Book of London. New York, Oxford University Press, 1995.

Editor, First Love. London, Orion, 1999.

Theatrical Activities: Actor: Plays—roles in The Sport of My Mad Mother by Ann Jellicoe, London, 1958; Epitaph for George Dillon by John Osborne and Anthony Creighton, London, 1958; and other plays.

Paul Bailey comments:

(1991) I write novels for many reasons, some of which I have probably never consciously thought of. I don't like absolute moral judgments, the ''placing'' of people into types—I'm both delighted and appalled by the mysteriousness of my fellow creatures. I enjoy ''being'' other people when I write, and the novels I admire most respect the uniqueness of other human beings. I like to think I show my characters respect and that I don't sit in judgment on them. This is what, in my small way, I am striving for—to capture, in a shaped and controlled form, something of the mystery of life. I am writing, too, to expand and stimulate my own mind. I hope I will have the courage to be more ambitious, bolder and braver in my search for the ultimately unknowable, with each book I write.

* * *

Paul Bailey's first novel, At the Jerusalem, has been rightly acknowledged as one of the outstanding literary debuts of the 1960's in England, and among the reasons why it attracted attention when it appeared was that it departed so markedly from our usual expectations of first novels—autobiographies in thin disguise. What came as a surprise was to find a first novel by a young man in his twenties about old age and its attendant tribulations. Yet Bailey's achievement did not, of course, lie in merely writing about the elderly and their problems, but in doing so with such sympathetic understanding and sensitivity while maintaining sufficient detachment and objectivity to avoid any trace of sentimentality. There is no falsification, no whimsy, none of that awkwardness and emotional uncertainty that tend to afflict writers when dealing with the old. Bailey's depiction of an old people's home, the Jerusalem of the title, and especially of the central character, Mrs. Gadny, whose fairly rapid decline after entering the home is charted, carries complete conviction. Quiet and unpretentious as At the Jerusalem is, it is also an extraordinary feat of the imagination.

In retrospect, we can now see that At the Jerusalem introduced many of the themes and preoccupations which have come to be integral components of the Bailey world: isolation, suffering, death, suicide, old age, the pain of loss, psychological collapse, role-playing in an attempt to bear or ward off reality. If At the Jerusalem is mainly a study of disintegration—Mrs. Gadny's fate is to be taken to a mental hospital—Bailey's second novel, Trespasses, partly set in a mental hospital, is about an attempt at reintegration after personal breakdown and fragmentation. Surprisingly for a Bailey novel, Trespasses ends on a note of muted optimism, but much of the book is pervaded by anguish, leading to suicide in the case of one character and mental collapse in the case of another. Technically, Trespasses is much more adventurous work than the fairly orthodox and straightforward At the Jerusalem. Some sections of the novel are collages of short, fragmented monologues, appropriate enough for the subject but demanding considerable concentration and imaginative involvement on the part of the reader, who has to construct the total picture from the pieces like a jig-saw puzzle. This intricate cross-cutting between different minds is a most economical way of revealing characters and events; narrated in a conventional way, the novel would be very much longer and far less intense than it is, and the technique justifies itself as the pieces finally cohere into a highly organized pattern.

Bailey's pursuit of poetic concentration, a concomitant of his increasing technical sophistication and artistic discipline, is taken a stage further in his third novel, A Distant Likeness. Like Trespasses, the novel is fragmented and elliptical so that the reader again has to work hard to piece the information together. Bailey is almost as sparing of words as Webern was of musical notes. The book, about a policeman in charge of a murder investigation, is another study in disintegration, resulting in this case from the policeman's inner contradictions. Many critics have felt the "distant likeness" to be between the policeman and the murderer, but the sentence from Simone Weil's Notebooks that provides the novel with its title, "Privation is a distant likeness of death," is perhaps the key to the interpretation of this complex book. Bailey's subject is privation, and it appears in various forms. A Distant Likeness has been compared to Crime and Punishment, but Bailey's novel is not so much like Dostoevsky as a distillation of a super-refined Dostoevskian essence. The extreme compression can be likened to T.S. Eliot's miniaturization of epic form in The Waste Land, a parallel that suggests itself because of similarities between the imagery of the two works.

After the minimalist austerity and purity, as well as human bleakness, of A Distant Likeness, Bailey altered course somewhat, producing a much more relaxed novel in a comic, even picaresque, vein, Peter Smart's Confessions. Here the Dickensian side of his talent, evident but not prominent in his earlier books, is given freer rein, although he maintains his usual technical and stylistic control, never wasting words. Peter Smart's Confessions is a kind of bildungsroman, dealing with the development of a sensitive and artistic boy surrounded by philistinism and other forms of paralyzing opposition. Yet much of the interest lies in the gallery of eccentrics and extraordinary characters with whom Peter comes into contact rather than in Peter himself. The later stages of the novel are more desultory and less subtle than the brilliant first half, but the novel as a whole opened up new possibilities for Bailey.

Old Soldiers is his most completely satisfying novel since At the Jerusalem and is also about old age, the two main characters being men in their seventies with unforgettable memories of World War Ihence the title. Technically, the novel is not as "difficult" as Trespasses or A Distant Likeness, but it resembles them in its brevity, imagistic density, and dependence on suggestion rather than statement. As usual, much is left unsaid. Bailey's treatment of the two very different men, who are nevertheless drawn together after their paths cross, again reveals one of his central concerns as a novelist to be the essential isolation of human beings, the way in which everyone lives and dies alone. He exposes the vulnerable core at the heart of all individuals, the strategies by which people try to disguise their vulnerability and protect themselves from the daily assault of reality, including the inevitability of death. This marks him as a descendant of Conrad, a novelist he greatly admires. Yet if Bailey peels away the deceptions and self-deceptions, the masks and pretenses, by which his characters live, he does so with enormous sympathy for their predicament. Bailey respects the uniqueness of individuals, and possesses the true novelist's fascination with people of every description.

Since Old Soldiers in 1980, Bailey has undertaken a great deal of literary journalism and broadcasting, become an important advocate of Italian literature, and written a couple of non-fiction books, but has published only two novels, Gabriel's Lament and Sugar Cane. This is by far his longest work of fiction and encompasses over 40 years of English life, from the early years of World War II on. The lament of the title is Gabriel Harvey's belated expression of grief at the age of 40 when, in the closing stages of the novel, he discovers the truth about his mother's disappearance nearly 30 years earlier in 1950. What Gabriel learns in Minnesota when he opens a strange bequest from his father, a box of letters, is that his mother Amy had committed suicide within a few weeks of leaving home, supposedly to take an extended holiday. Although Gabriel has become a religious scholar and successful author, much of his life—his adolescence and adulthood—has been profoundly affected by Amy's mysterious absence as well as by the overbearing presence of his outrageously eccentric father, Oswald, one of Bailey's most brilliant creations and a comic character of Dickensian stature. Thirty-five years older than his wife, Oswald, whose lifestyle is transformed by an unexpected financial windfall, eventually reaches the Shavian age of 94. In one sense, the story of his life that Gabriel unfolds is one of loneliness and perplexity, but it is also hilariously funny at times because of Oswald's unpredictable behavior and speech. Oswald may make Gabriel suffer, but he simultaneously makes the reader laugh. Bailey achieves a delicate synthesis of the tragic and the comic in Gabriel's Lament, which like his other novels succeeds in widening our sympathies and extending our imaginations.

-Peter Lewis

BAINBRIDGE, Beryl (Margaret)

Nationality: British. Born: Liverpool, 21 November 1934. Education: Merchant Taylors' School, Liverpool; ballet school in Tring, Hertfordshire. Family: Married Austin Davies in 1954 (divorced 1959); one son and two daughters. Career: Actress with repertory theaters in Liverpool, Windsor, Salisbury, London, and Dundee, 1949–60; cellar woman in a bottle factory, London, 1970; clerk, Gerald Duckworth Ltd., publishers, London, 1961–73. Presenter, Forever England television series, 1986. Since 1987 weekly columnist, London Evening Standard. Awards: Guardian Fiction prize, 1974; Whitbread award, 1977. D. Litt.: University of Liverpool, 1986. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1978; Whitbread Award, 1996; W.H. Amith Award, 1998; Commonwealth Eurasian Prize, 1998. Address: 42 Albert Street, London NW1 7NU, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Weekend with Claude. London, Hutchinson, 1967; revised edition, London, Duckworth, 1981; New York, Braziller, 1982.

Another Part of the Wood. London, Hutchinson, 1968; revised edition, London, Duckworth, 1979; New York, Braziller, 1980.

Harriet Said. London, Duckworth, 1972; New York, Braziller, 1973.The Dressmaker. London, Duckworth, 1973; as The Secret Glass, New York, Braziller, 1974.

The Bottle Factory Outing. London, Duckworth, 1974; New York, Braziller, 1975.

Sweet William. London, Duckworth, 1975; New York, Braziller, 1976.

A Quiet Life. London, Duckworth, 1976; New York, Braziller, 1977.
Injury Time. London, Duckworth, 1977; New York, Braziller, 1978.
Young Adolf. London, Duckworth, 1978; New York, Braziller, 1979.
Winter Garden. London, Duckworth, 1980; New York, Braziller, 1981.

Watson's Apology. London, Duckworth, 1984; New York, McGraw

Filthy Lucre. London, Duckworth, 1986; published as Filthy Lucre, or the Tragedy of Ernest Ledwhistle and Richard Soleway: A Sotry. London, Flamingo, 1988.

An Awfully Big Adventure. London, Duckworth, 1989; New York, Harper Collins, 1991.

The Birthday Boys. London, Duckworth, 1991; New York, Carrol and Graf, 1994.

The Dolphin Connection. North Blackburn, Victoria, Australia, CollinsDovePublishers, 1991.

Every Man for Himself. New York, Carroll and Graf, 1996. Master Georgie: A Novel. New York, Carroll and Graf, 1998.

Short Stories

Mum and Mr. Armitage: Selected Stories. London, Duckworth, 1985; New York, McGraw Hill, 1987.

Collected Stories. London, Penguin Books, 1994.

Plays

Screenplays: Sweet William, 1980.

Television Plays: Tiptoe Through the Tulips, 1976; Blue Skies from Now On, 1977; The Warrior's Return (The Velvet Glove series), 1977; Words Fail Me, 1979; The Journal of Bridget Hitler, with Philip Saville, 1981; Somewhere More Central, 1981; Evensong (Unnatural Causes series), 1986.

Other

English Journey; or, The Road to Milton Keynes. London, Duckworth, and New York, Braziller, 1984.

Forever England: North and South. London, Duckworth, 1987.

Something Happened Yesterday. London, Duckworth, 1993.

Foreword, Scott's Last Expedition: The Journals by Robert Falcon Scott. New York, Carroll and Graf, 1996.

Contributor, Colin Haycraft, 1929–1994: Maverick Publisher, edited by Stoddard Martin. London, Duckworth, 1995.

Editor, New Stories 6. London, Hutchinson, 1981.

*

Critical Studies: Ironic Formula in the Novels of Beryl Bainbridge by Elizabeth Wennö, Göteborg, Sweden, Acta Universitatis, 1993.

Beryl Bainbridge comments:

(1976) As a novelist I am committing to paper, for my own satisfaction, episodes that I have lived through. If I had had a camera forever ready with a film I might not have needed to write. I am not very good at fiction .... It is always me and the experiences I have had. In my last three novels I have used the device of accidental death because I feel that a book has to have a strong narrative line. One's own life, whilst being lived, seems to have no obvious plot and is therefore without tension.

I think writing is a very indulgent pastime and I would probably do it even if nobody ever read anything.

I write about the sort of childhood I had, my parents, the landscape I grew up in: my writing is an attempt to record the past. I am of the firm belief that everybody could write books and I never understand why they don't. After all, everyone speaks. Once the grammar has been learnt it is simply talking on paper and in time learning what not to say.

* * *

With the exception of Sweet William and Winter Garden, most of Beryl Bainbridge's novels have been centered on a death or act of violence. Her novels are also overshadowed by generalized violence, usually World War II. The Dressmaker evokes the Liverpudlian home front during the war, and An Awfully Big Adventure that city's postwar seediness. The title story and others in Mum and Mr. Armitage are set in the immediate postwar period. So is A Quiet Life, with German prisoners-of-war waiting to be repatriated, and Harriet Said slightly later, amid vivid memories of Italian prisoners-of-war. In A Weekend with Claude, an elderly Jewish woman finds herself unable to forget the concentration camps—the same camps that obsess the "Commandant" of the campsite in the earlier version of Another Part of the Wood. Since Young Adolf takes as its conceit the idea that Hitler might have lived in Liverpool in 1909, the book's very conception foreshadows the Holocaust and the war. Winter Garden is set against the Cold War; Injury Time draws on a background of terrorism and armed crime in contemporary London; and another London novel, The Bottle Factory Outing, relies for its effect on the build-up of a violently foreboding atmosphere in and around the bottle factory, without any political cause. Watson's Apology examines a clergyman's murder of his wife; it is based on an actual case of 1871. Bainbridge's novels in fact work largely by the build-up of violent atmosphere, drawn from both external circumstances and the characters themselves; this typically erupts in a death, albeit apparently accidental.

In A Weekend with Claude, the central act of violence is a shooting, innocuous in its effect whatever its intention. Like her second novel, Another Part of the Wood, which Bainbridge also later rewrote, it lacks the taut spareness which distinguishes her work from Harriet Said on.

Harriet Said presents a double-edged moral quandary: not only is the killing accidental, but the murdered person is a 13-year-old. On one level, the book is an amusing portrayal by a girl of her friend's sexuality and unnatural "wisdom": "We both tried very hard to give our parents love, and security, but they were too demanding." In The Dressmaker a young girl's pathetic first love for an American G.I. tragically unfolds against the stark symbolism of the dressmakers' work, while the dressmaker "dreamed she was following mother down a country garden, severing with sharp scissors the heads of roses." Through the more flamboyant black comedy of The Bottle Factory Outing flickers the rare lyricism that as elsewhere in Bainbridge's work is a measure of her Joycean acceptance of her characters. This lyrical quality derives from the setting; the garden in A Weekend with Claude has become Windsor Great Park in the later novel. But the death precludes total acceptance.

In Sweet William, a girl living in a London bedsit falls disastrously in love with the Don Juan of the title, a philandering playwright who moves nonchalantly among the human wreckage he creates. Outstanding here is the portrait of the girl's mother; reacting to her vicious pettiness, the daughter is all the more vulnerable to William. A Quiet Life again focuses on what children become in reaction to their parents, and hints that those children may pass on the same qualities to their own children, who will in turn react against them. Bainbridge begins several novels with a Chapter 0; here, as brother and sister meet 15 years later, she both begins and ends with this device—as in An Awfully Big Adventure.

Injury Time depicts the unorthodox dinner party of a middle-aged quartet, accidentally taken as hostages in a siege, to the special embarrassment of a married man caught dining with his mistress. Beneath the black comedy, both the mean and generous impulses of the two main characters come through in all their ambivalence.

Young Adolf is Bainbridge's most ambitious book, with the tension deriving from the reader's knowledge of what is to come, historically. Against this scenario, details such as the brown shirt made for the penniless Adolf by his sister-in-law—so that "he needn't sit wrapped in a blanket while his other one was in the wash"—are intensely black comedy.

Winter Garden hilariously follows an accident-prone civil servant masquerading as an artist in order to accompany his mistress in a delegation to the Soviet Union. In Watson's Apology Bainbridge traces a 26-year-old marriage to suggest how the Reverend Watson came to murder his wife. Contemporary documents are used in a narrative remarkable for its authentic reconstruction of Victorian London, culminating in moving impressions of the aged Watson.

Bainbridge wrote Filthy Lucre in 1946, at the age of 11, and several short stories in Mum and Mr. Armitage touch on the generation gap. Like many novelists, with stories Bainbridge takes risks not ventured in novels, as for instance in the surreal "The Man Who Blew Away" and "Beggars Would Ride." The setting of a Peter Pan production in "Clap Hands, Here Comes Charlie" is extended in An Awfully Big Adventure. Sixteen-year-old assistant stage manager Stella understands nothing of the doomed homosexual loves surrounding her, and virtually nothing of the equally doomed heterosexual loves, yet she is the catalyst for the inevitable act of violence.

Even in Bainbridge's earlier novels, the mandatory act of violence often seemed superfluous; this immensely gifted novelist's use of the device has become, to some extent, formulaic.

The 1995 film production of An Awfully Big Adventure, directed by Mike Newell and starring Hugh Grant, Alan Rickman, and Georgina Cates, extended the exposure of the author's works to a larger audience. It was not the only time in the 1990s when her career touched on the world of film, though in the other case the relationship was quiet coincidental. In 1996 Bainbridge earned the Whitbread Novel Award for Every Man for Himself, a fictionalized account of the Titanic disaster; at the same time, director James Cameron was filming his own fictionalized version of the tragedy, which would win the Academy Award for best picture two years later.

—Val Warner

BAKER, Elliott

Nationality: American. Born: Buffalo, New York, 15 December 1922. Education: Indiana University, Bloomington, B.S. 1944. Military Service: Served in the United States Army Infantry, 1943–46. Career: Writer for television programs U.S. Steel Hour and Robert Montgomery Show; script supervisor, Zero One series, BBC Television, London. Address: c/o Viking, 375 Hudson Street, New York, New York 10014, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Fine Madness. New York, Putnam, and London, Joseph, 1964. The Penny Wars. New York, Putnam, 1968; London, Joseph, 1969. Pocock and Pitt. New York, Putnam, 1971; London, Joseph, 1972. Klynt's Law. New York, Harcourt Brace, and London, Joseph, 1976. And We Were Young. New York, Times, 1979; London, Joseph, 1980. Unhealthful Air. New York, Viking, 1988.

Doctor Lopez. London, Holofernes, 1995.Percy, Bob, and Assenpoop. Van Nuys, California, Sacred Beverage Press, 1999.

Short Stories

Unrequited Loves. New York, Putnam, and London, Joseph, 1974.

Plays

The Deliquent, The Hipster, and The Square (broadcast, 1959). Published in The Delinquent, The Hipster, The Square, and the Sandpile Series, edited by Alva I. Cox, Jr., St. Louis, Bethany Press, 1962.

Screenplays: A Fine Madness, 1966; Luv, 1967; Viva Max, 1970; Breakout (with Howard B. Kreitsek and Mark Norman). Columbia Pictures, 1975.

Radio Plays: The Delinquent, The Hipster, and The Square, 1959.

Television Plays: The Right Thing, 1956 (U.K); Crisis in Coroma (U.S. Steel Hour), 1957; The Entertainer, from play by John Osborne, 1976; Malibu, from novel by William Murray, 1983; Lace, 1984, and Lace II, 1985, from novel by Shirley Conran.

*

Manuscript Collection: Indiana University, Bloomington.

* * *

Elliott Baker's first novels, A Fine Madness and The Penny Wars, demonstrate a diversity of ideas and themes but focus on moral and psychological growth and the life of the imagination. They are comic views of modern America informed by an underlying sense of tragedy or tragic potential. Baker's later works continue to present this tension.

A Fine Madness depicts the triumph of an artist, a kind of American Gulley Jimson, over the forces of conformity and death-in-life. Samson Shillitoe, a working-class hero, a Blakean poet driven by powerful artistic and sexual urges, is pursued and seized by a group of psychiatric experimenters. He is analyzed, institutionalized, and lobotomized but emerges whole, sane, and uncastrated, his creative (and procreative) energies intact. Baker uses his inside knowledge of modern psychotherapy to show the artist at war with a mechanical world and the mechanized minds of clinical psychology. Shillitoe is obsessed by imagination, driven by forces beyond his control. He is amoral, anti-social, unconcerned with "adjustment" or mental health. The psychologists view him only as a specimen, a sample of neurosis or psychosis. Shillitoe's view triumphs: he conceives and produces an epic-sized poem and his common-law wife conceives his child. Life and creation vanquish death and destruction.

In The Penny Wars Baker creates a nostalgic vision of adolescence on the eve of World War II. Tyler Bishop, another rebel, grows up in 1939 in squalor and confusion of values. An unreconstructed liberal, Tyler worries about the Nazis while America's smugness and isolationism seem invincible, worries about his budding sexuality, worries about the world he will inherit. Himself a WASP, he stands up for Jews and Negroes, fights bigotry and ignorance—and loses.

Through a series of social confrontations, Tyler begins to find his way toward a self-sufficient individualism.

Unrequited Loves, a set of related novellas, documents the youth (1939–45) of a persona named "Elliott Baker," especially initiations into love and sex. Each story is a comic odyssey wherein the young man discovers the battles and truces in the war between men and women. It is Baker's most genial and optimistic book, focusing the nostalgia of The Penny Wars on our national pastimes—love, war, baseball, growing up.

Pocock and Pitt is a satirical exploration of identity and child-hood in the modern world. Wendell Pocock, American middle-class victim of repeated heart attacks, becomes Winston Pitt, British worker in an organ bank. A pawn in an international espionage duel, he discovers genuine love and redemption after exhausting the cold consolations of history and philosophy. The novel develops the slapstick mediations of A Fine Madness and widens Baker's scope to the state of the whole modern world.

Klynt's Law is a tour de force in combining genres—a satirical "college novel," a thriller of Las Vegas criminal shenanigans, a study of parapsychology and gambling compulsions. In it, Tobias Klynt (a.k.a. Kleinmann), an archetypal klutz, breaks with his shrewish wife, his university career, and the straight world to put the paranormal talents of four students to work on roulette wheels. They have evolved the perfect "system" to beat Las Vegas but fail to understand that gambling is not for winners. The irony is alternately black and farcical, and, as in all good gambling stories, winners are losers.

The same is true in And We Were Young, which traces four exrifle-squad members in the red-scare years after World War II. A tangle of coincidences—or synchronistic ironies—brings them together in New York City, where each betrays his youthful desires and beliefs in the enveloping glaciers of the Cold War. The book extends Baker's picture of the generation that grew up with World War II, begun in The Penny Wars and Unrequited Loves, and develops his vision of our society as it changed radically in a new internationalist world.

In Unhealthful Air Baker updates F. Scott Fitzgerald's Pat Hobby stories, by way of Damon Runyon. The novel follows the adventures of a devious, cynical Hollywood scriptwriter and gambler, Corey Burdick, who becomes entangled with a horserace-fixing syndicate, an Ozark nymphet, and her brutal husband. The book deals wittily with movie-TV clichés and the way our lives imitate the "art" of the movies. At one point, Burdick wonders in exasperation, "Was there any act of man that hadn't already appeared on the motion picture screen?" Using his native wit, Burdick manages to survive the "unhealthful air" of Los Angeles—and even to prosper.

-William J. Schafer

BALLARD, J(ames) G(raham)

Nationality: British. Born: Shanghai, China, 15 November 1930. Education: Leys School, Cambridge; King's College, Cambridge. Military Service: Served in the Royal Air Force. Family: Married Helen Mary Matthews in 1954 (died 1964); one son and two daughters. Awards: Guardian Fiction prize, 1984; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1985. Agent: Margaret Hanbury, 27 Walcot Square, London SE11 4UB. Address: 36 Old Charlton Road, Shepperton, Middlesex TW17 8AT, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Wind from Nowhere. New York, Berkley, 1962; London, Penguin, 1967.

The Drowned World. New York, Berkley, 1962; London, Gollancz, 1963.

The Burning World. New York, Berkley, 1964; revised edition, as The Drought, London, Cape, 1965.

The Crystal World. London, Cape, and New York, Farrar Straus, 1966.

Crash. London, Cape, and New York, Farrar Straus, 1973.

Concrete Island. London, Cape, and New York, Farrar Straus, 1974. High-Rise. London, Cape, 1975; New York, Holt Rinehart, 1977.

The Unlimited Dream Company. London, Cape, and New York, Holt Rinehart. 1979.

Hello America. London, Cape, 1981.

Empire of the Sun. London, Gollancz, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1984.

The Day of Creation. London, Gollancz, 1987; New York, Farrar Straus, 1988.

Running Wild. London, Hutchinson, 1988; New York, Farrar Straus, 1989.

The Kindness of Women. London, Harper Collins, 1991; New York, Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 1991.

Rushing to Paradise. New York, Picador USA, 1995.

Cocaine Nights. London, Flamingo, 1996; Washington, D.C., Counterpoint, 1998.

Short Stories

The Voices of Time and Other Stories. New York, Berkley, 1962; London, Orion, 1992.

Billenium and Other Stories. New York, Berkley, 1962.

The Four-Dimensional Nightmare. London, Gollancz, 1963; published as The Voices of Time, London, Phoenix, 1998.

Passport to Eternity and Other Stories. New York, Berkley, 1963.

Terminal Beach. London, Gollancz, 1964; abridged edition, New York, Berkley, 1964; London, Phoenix, 1993.

The Impossible Man and Other Stories. New York, Berkley, 1966.

The Disaster Area. London, Cape, 1967.

The Day of Forever. London, Panther, 1967.

The Overloaded Man. London, Panther, 1967.

Why I Want to Fuck Ronald Reagan. Brighton, Unicorn Bookshop, 1968.

The Atrocity Exhibition. London, Cape, 1970; as Love and Napalm: Export USA, New York, Grove Press, 1972; published in expanded, annotated, illustrated edition under original title, with author's annotations, San Francisco, RE/Search Publications, 1990.

Chronopolis and Other Stories. New York, Putnam, 1971. Vermilion Sands. New York, Berkley, 1971; London, Cape, 1973. Low-Flying Aircraft and Other Stories. London, Cape, 1976. The Best of J.G. Ballard. London, Futura, 1977. The Best Short Stories of J.G. Ballard. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1978; with introduction by Anthony Burgess, New York, Holt, 1995.

The Venus Hunters. London, Panther, 1980.

News from the Sun. London, Interzone, 1982.

Myths of the Near Future. London, Cape, 1982.

Memories of the Space Age. Sauk City, Wisconsin, Arkham House, 1988

War Fever. London, Collins, 1990; New York, Farrar Straus, 1991.

Other

A User's Guide to the Millennium: Essays and Reviews. New York, Picador USA, 1996.

Contributor, Isaac Asimov Presents the Great SF Stories #22 (1959), edited by Isaac Asimov and Martin H. Greenberg. New York, DAW Books, 1991.

Contributor, Isaac Asimov Presents the Great SF Stories #24 (1962), edited by Isaac Asimov and Martin H. Greenberg. New York, DAW Books, 1992.

Contributor, The Playboy Book of Science Fiction, edited by Alice K. Turner. New York, HarperPrism, 1998.

*

Bibliography: J.G. Ballard: A Primary and Secondary Bibliography by David Pringle, Boston, Hall, 1984.

Critical Studies: J.G. Ballard: The First Twenty Years edited by James Goddard and David Pringle, Hayes, Middlesex, Bran's Head, 1976; Re/Search: J.G. Ballard edited by Vale, San Francisco, Re/Search, 1984; J.G. Ballard by Peter Brigg, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1985; Out of the Night and into the Dream: A Thematic Study of the Fiction of J.G. Ballard, New York, Greenwood Press, 1991; Out of the Night and into the Dream: A Thematic Study of the Fiction of J.G. Ballard by Gregory Stephenson. Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1991; The Angle Between Two Walls: The Fiction of J.G. Ballard by Roger Luckhurst. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1997.

J.G. Ballard comments:

I believe that science fiction is the authentic literature of the 20th century, the only fiction to respond imaginatively to the transforming nature of science and technology. I believe that the true domain of science fiction is that zone I have termed inner space, rather than outer space, and that the present, rather than the future, is now the period of greatest moral urgency for the writer. In my own fiction I have tried to achieve these aims.

* * *

As in the case of his acknowledged partial inspiration Graham Greene, J.G. Ballard seems to divide his distinguished canon into novels and "entertainments": serious, experimental prose which expands narrative possibilities, and productions which are, aesthetically, less rigorous. In the former category, one would find in chronological order The Drowned World, The Crystal World, The Atrocity Exhibition, Crash, The Unlimited Dream Company, Empire of the Sun, The Day of Creation, The Kindness of Women, and Rushing to Paradise. Ballard's "entertainments" include The Wind from Nowhere, The Drought, the short story cycle Vermilion Sands, Concrete Island, High-Rise, Hello America, Running Wild, and Cocaine Nights. Ballard's voluminous short fiction could profitably be divided along similar lines, with far greater debate concerning what works best. Ballard's own selection of his best fiction is very reliable: sympathetic readers of Ballard will share his enthusiasm for "The Voices of Time" and "The Terminal Beach." Nonetheless, he has consistently produced rewarding short prose since the last exhaustive anthology, most of which has been collected in Low-Flying Aircraft, The Venus Hunters, Myths of the Near Future, War Fever, and A User's Guide to the Millennium. These collections of essays and reviews provide a useful glimpse into the process by which Ballard transforms his opinions on issues into powerful symbolic topographies.

However, such divisions merely recapitulate the divisions which characterize most criticism of Ballard's work. Our task should not be to categorize Ballard's output but to understand how these works operate. Both novels and "entertainments" are involved in creating imaginary landscapes that anticipate the full extent of the horrors of contemporary life. Ballard's works, which range from elaborate evocations of erotic car crash fantasies (Crash) to deep-sea still lifes of submerged cities (The Drowned World) create and explore physical and psychological places which, for Ballard, stem from the unconscious desires of capitalist culture. For this reason, Ballard's work may seem intimidating to the uninitiated. Beginning with an "entertainment" before venturing into the major canon will allow the reader to acclimate to Ballard's grasping imagination, his densely ironic voice, and genuine moral vision.

Empire of the Sun provides the kindest entry into the major canon. This novel is both boy-book, a work written for adults about childhood, and war memoir. Jim, the protagonist, has received inevitable comparisons with his author. Both were interred in Japanese prisoner-of-war camps in China during World War II; Ballard admits these related events were his own in the foreword. As a result, Empire of the Sun allows the credulous to "solve" the case of J.G. Ballard. The young author's separation from his parents, radical dislocation, and struggle for survival produce the traumatic scene of the Ballardian text: a world of flat affect where setting predominates over character and action (unless a generic formula is being ruthlessly parodied), a landscape littered with aircraft fuselages, automobiles, miasmas, and tarmac, all aching to burn under the silent, bonerevealing glare of the Nagasaki explosion Jim witnesses in the ontological climax of the novel: "the light was a premonition of his death, the sight of his small soul joining the larger soul of the dying world." Thus begins the death-in-life of Jim Ballard.

This youth, our mythic construction of the ideal Ballard-author, grows up to become a science-fiction writer: the world he experienced did not match the conventions of nineteenth-century fiction, so he turned to visions of the future, reading pulp magazines while an airman in Canada. W. Warren Wager in Terminal Visions offers us a helpful paradigm for reading Ballard's science fiction and experimental canon through time. Ballard, roughly, has moved from an obsession with feminized natural landscape in the quartet of so-called disaster novels (the world imperiled by the four elements, approximately), through an obsession with homoeroticized technological artifacts (The Atrocity Exhibition through High-Rise), to an achieved polymorphous perversity (The Unlimited Dream Company). Only after this long therapeutic journey could he return to the traumatic scene that collapsed all of these impulses into a single event. Furthermore, Ballard's own statements posit this progressive impulse in his work which, paradoxically, regresses from more distant future worlds to our present world of apartment complexes and flyovers, and ultimately to his Shanghai past. Empire of the Sun gives the critic marvelous ammunition for familiarizing an unsettling fictional presence. The affect-less Ballardian voice, similar to that of William S. Burroughs, can be traced to the peculiar traumas of the Japanese camps.

Such reductive remarks could have passed for an accurate assessment of Ballard's work until he returned to the fantastic after Empire of the Sun with more recent works such as The Day of Creation, Running Wild, Rushing to Paradise, and Cocaine Nights. But even before these publications one was suspicious about this narrative of the career. Something is lost in the neatness of it all; most notably, the inescapable belatedness of the recent mainstream work. We read it in the light of Ballard's earlier science fiction and experimental writing: the cramped cubicles of Lunghau C. A. C. irresistibly invoke the locales of "Billenium" and High-Rise. Ballard values the fabulative powers of science fiction too greatly to allow his summating work to stand outside them. The ultimate joke on the reader may be that Empire of the Sun is history revealed as the ultimate science fiction text, especially as Ballard writes either. As Gould remarks in "Low-Flying Aircraft," "The ultimate dystopia is the inside of one's own head." Empire of the Sun is an immense and real achievement, but only partially enlightening as an end result of Ballard's journey as a writer. Other, less reductive structures can be suggested to illuminate Ballard's strategies.

One of the most helpful perspectives for enjoying Ballard can be located in Roland Barthes's Mythologies, which explains the social significance of a linguistic decoding of contemporary symbols and popular culture figures. For Barthes, myth is a secondary order of signification, a higher code of accepted meaning. The image of an oak tree in an insurance company advertisement, by a theft of the sign, becomes a signifier of longevity, dependability, etc. The artist has two strategies for attacking the conventional accretions of myth: she or he, according to Barthes, can either restore to physical objects their uncanniness and historicity or create a third order of signification by looking behind the myth for its concealed signification.

A fairly plausible case can be made that Ballard has always attacked conventional signification, progressing from Barthes's first strategy to an increasing use of his second strategy. The early novels restore to things their non-mythic materiality. This is exemplified by the significance accorded the heightened elemental powers in the quartet, as well as the technological flotsam and jetsam blown about or floating by. Likewise, the crystallization process in The Crystal World provides an almost perfect allegory of the defamiliarization of bourgeois nature.

But Ballard has been honing his skills at discovering the third order of signification, which emphasizes the ironic undercurrent inherent in the significatory process, since The Wind from Nowhere. One of the few nice things one can say about this work—produced in two short weeks, it remains Ballard's worst novel—is that it knows at all points that it's formulaic junk, a parody of the ''cozy catastrophe'' John Wyndham school of disaster writing. Its successor, The Drowned World, employs similar methods through its transparent allusiveness. However, The Drowned World also questions its own generic confines: it is a disaster fiction that reveals an awareness of the narrative and symbolic structures underlying disaster fiction. For Ballard and his protagonist Kerans, disaster is concealed psychic opportunity. In the clearly indicated "happy" ending of the work, Kerans embraces the destructive principle, the chthonic, by heading south into greater heat.

As in most later Ballard, such self-destruction is always a symbolic invitation to transformation, a relentless reiteration that the old social, political, and biological orders are quickly mutating into a new form inherently hostile to humanity. In Michel Foucault's terminology, we are in a shifting episteme: writers like Ballard and Burroughs most clearly anticipate the shape of the end result of such a shift. Their strategies are those of survival. Ballard reveals in Empire of the Sun that 'a code within a code' always intrigued Jim. He would always watch bridge games for this reason; later, such skills would keep him alive. The same applies for Ballard. This decoding process, often embedded in allegorical tableau, allows Ballard to predict, and thereby prevent, possible futures.

In The Atrocity Exhibition, Ballard's talents as a reader of bourgeois myth emerge strikingly. The book dissects some of the psychoanalytic significance behind the overdetermination of 1960s culture: television coverage of the Vietnam war, the assassination of John F. Kennedy, Marilyn Monroe, the automobile, cancer victims all converge in a terrifying psychedelic phantasmagoria of image, redeemed, like Naked Lunch, only by its abiding ironic humor, its Swiftian critical distance, and its undeniable prophecy. The obsessional accuracy of this series of "condensed novels" has aged remarkably well, as a chapter title like "Why I Want to Fuck Ronald Reagan" indicates.

For some readers, Crash is even more difficult, a semiological anatomy of the automobile accident that exchanges breadth (in The Atrocity Exhibition) for depth of analysis. As in the later Empire of the Sun, Ballard toys with the reader by giving the narrator his own name. Ballard the character's quest for 'the keys to a new sexuality born from a perverse technology' horrifies, delights, and enlightens. At his best, Ballard's imagination risks the unimaginable, even as his clunky, chunky prose—with its transparent allusions and similes, its hard-boiled rhythms, and its vague redundancies—acquires a paradoxical grace all its own: a bombed-out, flat affect poetry that perfectly ensnares our era. His sinister replication of medical school textbook argot in this second phase assures us Ballard has a good ear; he knows exactly what effects he's achieving in this minatory technological pornography.

Ballard's recent polymorphous phase has given us some of his finest writing, in The Unlimited Dream Company, Empire of the Sun, and The Kindness of Women and his funniest in the overlooked Hello America. Lately, his quest for ultimate reality has passed through autobiographical incident to the ultimate contemporary reality: television. It remains an interesting question who's influencing whom: Ballard or Baudrillard, the cool rhetoric of "hyperreality," the triumphant televisual simulacrum. One suspects Ballard is the influence here, since Baudrillard has written on Crash, while Ballard seems uninterested in theory when interviewed. Be that as it may, I have been alluding to many postmodern theorists here because Ballard's practice so overtly complements their observations. Since at least The Atrocity Exhibition and short stories like "Motel Architecture" and "The Intensive Care Unit" in Myths of the Near Future, Ballard has been interested in the alternate gestalt of televisual reality. In this stage, the simulational triumphs completely over the real. In The Day of Creation, a fantastic river appears in Africa, created out of the embodied wish fantasies of Mallory, the main character. He alternately wishes to destroy and preserve his creation, to drift down it and to explore its source. It is what Deleuze and Guattari would deem a "smooth space," a zone of easy movement and free play that comes suspiciously to resemble the world inside our VCRs. One character, Senger, carries a broken camera and "films" an "imaginary documentary." When they drift rapidly downstream, the scenery looks like "a reversed playback." As Senger explains to Mallory, "Television doesn't tell lies, it makes up a new truth..... Sooner or later, everything turns into television." Baudrillard couldn't have said it better.

By the time we get to Running Wild, a tale of videotaped violence and suburban mayhem that intentionally resembles a children's book, Ballard can revise reality through his simulations, as when the narrator compares some of the deadly children's journals to "Pride and Prejudice with its missing pornographic passages restored." The tone throughout all of Ballard, finely honed in the most recent books, is the creepy-funny both/and double register of postmodernism, the mood of any Jack Nicholson or Dennis Hopper performance. Is Ballard writing satire? Social criticism? Whimsy? Yes.

The Kindness of Women is his most remarkable achievement along these thematic lines. This novel-autobiography hybrid is a sequel to Empire of the Sun and a virtual retrospective gallery exhibition of all the major phases discussed above: for example, the chapter called "The Exhibition" returns to the interests of Crash; the first three chapters rework Empire of the Sun. This book, if not his most accessible, is nonetheless the most thorough introduction available to Ballard's fictional project. And it offers a powerful culmination of his meditations on media and simulation. The climax of the book is his participation in Stephen Spielberg's filming of Empire of the Sun. Ironically, Spielberg chose to film the British section of Shanghai in Sunningdale, a residential area fifteen minutes away by car from Shepperton (a distant suburb of London where Ballard has lived for the last 35 years). As Ballard notes in his annotations to the Re/Search magazine reissue of The Atrocity Exhibition, "I can almost believe that I came to Shepperton 30 years ago knowing unconsciously that one day I would write a novel about my wartime experiences in Shanghai, and that it might well be filmed in these studios. Deep assignments run through all our lives; there are no coincidences." The Kindness of Women unifies all of Ballard's lifelong obsessions and enables him to return full circle to his childhood, now made more real as Hollywood film: "All the powers of modern film had come together for this therapeutic exercise." Echoing Samuel Beckett's wish to leave "a stain upon the silence," Ballard sees his true immortality as a blurred image in the film, which is all that remained of his cameo appearance after final editing: "this seemed just, like the faint blur which was all that any of us left across time and space."

One story in his latest short fiction collection War Fever also deserves mention in this regard, the hilarious "Secret History of World War 3." It zanily prophesies a change in the Constitution enabling Ronald Reagan to serve a third term in the 1990s. His fading health comes to dominate the national consciousness so much that his vital signs scroll across all channels, his bowel movements deserve special news bulletins, and a brief nuclear exchange goes unnoticed by distracted viewers. Ballard was obviously thinking of Reagan's polyp operation, but the story anticipates the bloated media spectacles which increasingly dominate the public realm.

This assessment of the link between media culture, with its numerous sects and factions, and the natural world is developed in Rushing to Paradise. Here, as in his more recent Cocaine Nights,

Ballard works consciously within the satirical tradition. Rushing to Paradise emphasizes the failures inherent in attempts to manufacture the utopian. In this sense, Ballard focuses on extremism and factionalism as forces that are as powerful as the four elements in his disaster quartet. As a result, Ballard shifts his focus from descriptions of imaginary places to detailed examinations of character. This movement is likewise evident in Cocaine Nights, with its emphasis on the lurid depravity of the rich on holiday. Such shifts indicate a new stage in Ballard's writings. These more recent novels operate like collections of prose such as A User's Guide to the Millennium in their more overt commentaries on the social aspects of contemporary culture.

Ballard will undoubtedly continue to grow along the amazing and original course he has charted. Much of his supposed classism and racism seems unfounded; his use of formulaic heroines, though periodic and appropriate for his gender-bound, extreme loners, has drawn greater and more justified criticism from feminists. Recent stories like "Having a Wonderful Time" and "The Smile" and the character of Noon in The Day of Creation adumbrate his own interest in correcting these misperceptions. Thematically, he will continue to gesture towards a problematic social transformation, hoping for its arrival but uncertain of its shape, wishing for it to resemble the community in his utopian Vermilion Sands, but, ever the survivor, willing to settle for anything shy of Eniwetok. As long as we avoid choosing the latter (and perhaps for a bit on the day after if we do not manage that), Ballard will continue to interest us as our bravest explorer of the psychic contours of post-nuclear humanity, the fabulist chronicler of our overlooked median strips. Somehow this maverick presence has become one of the most important and distinguished writers of English prose working today. His metaphors will haunt any reader; he dares to articulate what only the most obscure regions of our animal brain contemplate: desires for nuclear apocalypse, for incestuous sex, for participating in auto wrecks. Above all, Ballard maps these impulses, creating narrative places which reveal the innate connections between events and desires.

-Robert E. Mielke, updated by Dean Swinford

BANKS, Russell (Earl)

Nationality: American. Born: Newton, Massachusetts, 29 March 1940. Education: Colgate University, Hamilton, New York, 1958; University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1964–67, A.B. 1967 (Phi Beta Kappa). Family: Married 1) Darlene Bennett in 1960 (divorced 1962), one daughter; 2) Mary Gunst in 1962 (divorced 1977), three daughters; 3) Kathy Walton in 1982 (divorced 1988); 4) Chase Twichell in 1989. Career: Mannequin dresser, Montgomery Ward, Lakeland, Florida, 1960-61; plumber, New Hampshire, 1962-64; publisher and editor, Lillabulero Press, and co-editor, Lillabulero magazine, Chapel Hill, North Carolina, and Northwood Narrows, New Hampshire, 1966-75; instructor, Emerson College, Boston, 1968 and 1971, University of New Hampshire, Durham, 1968-75, and New England College, Henniker, New Hampshire, 1975 and 1977-81. Since 1981 has taught at New York University and Princeton University, New Jersey. Lives in Princeton. Awards: Woodrow Wilson fellowship, 1968; St. Lawrence award, 1975; Guggenheim fellowship, 1976; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1977, 1982; Merrill Foundation award, 1983; Dos Passos prize, 1985; American Academy award, 1986. Agent: Ellen Levine Literary Agency, 432 Park Avenue South, Suite 1205, New York, New York 10016. Address: c/o Ellen Levine Literary Agency, Suite 1801, 15 E. 26th Street, New York, New York 10010, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Family Life. New York, Avon, 1975.

Hamilton Stark. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1978.

The Book of Jamaica. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1980.

The Relation of My Imprisonment. Washington, D.C., Sun and Moon Press, 1983.

Continental Drift. New York, Harper, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1985.

Affliction. New York, Harper, 1989; London, Picador, 1990.

The Sweet Hereafter: A Novel. New York, HarperCollins, 1991; London, Picador, 1992.

Rule of the Bone. New York, HarperCollins, 1995.

Cloudsplitter. New York, HarperFlamingo, 1998.

Short Stories

Searching for Survivors. New York, Fiction Collective, 1975.

The New World. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1978.

Trailerpark. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1981.

Success Stories. New York, Harper, and London, Hamish Hamilton,

The Angel on the Roof: The Stories of Russell Banks. New York, HarperCollins, 2000.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Indisposed," in Prime Number, edited by Ann Lowry Weir. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1988.

"The Travel Writer," in Antioch Review (Yellow Springs, Ohio), Summer 1989.

"Xmas," in Antaeus (New York), Spring-Autumn 1990.

Poetry

15 Poems, with William Matthews and Newton Smith. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Lillabulero Press, 1967.

30/6. New York, The Quest, 1969.

Waiting to Freeze. Northwood Narrows, New Hampshire, Lillabulero Press, 1969.

Snow: Meditations of a Cautious Man in Winter. Hanover, New Hampshire, Granite, 1974.

Other

The Invisible Stranger: The Patten, Maine, Photographs of Arturo Patten (text), photographs by Arturo Patten. New York, HarperCollins, 1999.

Introduction, Gringos and Other Stories by Michael Rumaker. Rocky Mount, North Carolina, North Carolina Wesleyan College Press, 1991. Introduction, A Tramp Abroad by Mark Twain. New York, Oxford University Press, 1996.

Contributor, The Autobiographical Eye, edited by Daniel Halpern. Hopewell, New Jersey, Ecco Press, 1993.

Editor, with Michael Ondaatje and David Young, *Brushes with Greatness: An Anthology of Chance Encounters with Greatness.*Toronto, Coach House Press, 1989.

* * *

Novelist, poet, and short story writer Russell Banks experienced early in life an abundance of pain, denial, and adventure that would later profoundly influence his writing. In 1989 Banks told interviewer Wesley Brown: "I can see my life as a kind of obsessive return to the 'wound' ... Going back again and again trying to get it right, trying to figure out how it happened and who is to blame and who is to forgive." Revisiting past memories is apparent early in Banks's career as is seen in his collections of poetry, including 15 Poems, 30/6, Waiting to Freeze, and Snow: Meditations of a Cautious Man in Winter. And, although Banks does not consider himself to be much of a poet, these collections are significant because in his poetry we see the presence of the themes he later develops in his short story collections, including Searching for Survivors, Success Stories, and Trailerpark, and in his novels. Banks addresses several recurring issues in these three genres, notably the joys and sorrows of life in New England, race relations in the Caribbean and America, conditions of the working class, American family struggles, and repressed childhood memories.

Family Life, Banks's first novel, is a relatively short text that rejects traditional methods of narration and characterization and attempts instead, in what some consider to be a postmodern move, to make the reader aware of the artifice of writing. In spite of the fragmented story, however, Banks presents a cogent tale that engages the reader. Set in an imaginary kingdom, the novel focuses on the events surrounding King Egress, the Hearty; his wife Naomi Ruth; and their sons, Dread, Orgone, and Egress, Jr. Some critics suggest that Family Life, though about a family in a fantasyland, indicts the contemporary American family. The story's self-centered, displeased parents and children who are drifting through their teen years rather lethargically do, in fact, appear to support this claim. The novel is difficult to categorize, as it might be deemed anything from a fable to a satire, and was called by some critics an "experimental novel," though Banks rejects this label along with others that are sometimes bestowed upon the book.

Banks's second novel, Hamilton Starks, is another text that is concerned with the art of writing, using the story of a character known as "A." (but later called "Hamilton Starks" by the story's main narrator) to track the process of composing a novel. Throughout Hamilton Starks many people construct their own unique and often discordant versions of Starks's character by presenting lengthy monologues, stories-within-stories, and even some their own writings about Starks. Because of these various viewpoints, the story suggests that Starks's life, and perhaps everyone's life, is disconnected and fragmented; there is no inherent "self" to discover or to rely upon.

The 'relation' was a genre practiced by imprisoned seventeenth-century Puritans and written to testify to the ways their faith was tested and so strengthened when they were jailed. Banks's third novel, The Relation of My Imprisonment, was modeled after this genre. The novel tells of a coffin maker who is imprisoned for twelve years when he continues his trade after a law has been established prohibiting the work. The prisoner, now considered to be a heretic, narrates his experiences in prison, which include acts of debauchery, obsessive thoughts about food, drink, and money, and even attempts at in-depth self-analysis. The book, some critics suggest, though partly concerned with Puritan Dissenters in England, ultimately confronts the metaphorical imprisonment of contemporary Americans, who, like the narrator, are fragmented and so suffer a loss of self.

As he departs somewhat from the formal experimentation in his first three novels, The Book of Jamaica marks Banks's move toward realism and his intensified preoccupation with class issues. Set in Jamaica, the book tells the story of an American professor, who is left unnamed until he is befriended by the Maroons and then is called "Johnny"—a term of affection they bestow upon him. The novel focuses on the professor's experiences while studying the Maroons, a group descended from slaves, who in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries revolted against their British and Spanish owners. "Johnny," who narrates his own tale, is burdened by his systematic style of thinking and believes that his feelings of alienation will be quelled if only he can remake himself and become more like the Jamaicans. However, in spite of his attempts to become like the Jamaicans, "Johnny" realizes that race, economics, and culture ultimately separate America and the Caribbean.

Fostering realism in each chapter, but using metafictional techniques in the novel as a whole, Banks's Continental Drift manages to combine two seemingly dissimilar tales, one of a white working-class American man, Bob DuBois, and one of Vanise Dorsinville, an impoverished black Haitian single mother who attempts to escape to America in order to have a better life. DuBois, an oil-burner repair man living in New Hampshire, realizes his dissatisfaction with his life—"He is alive, but his life has died"—and so decides to pursue the American dream by moving his family to Florida so he can work in his brother's liquor store. Though DuBois's situation appears at first to be rather grim, as his tale is juxtaposed with Vanise's, DuBois's world begins to look as if it is one of wealth and comfort. The two stories in Continental Drift are linked by the suggestion that humanity's movements are similar to the movements in naturenearly imperceptible, though constantly occurring and ultimately inescapable—and by the description of the drifting quality of life in twentieth century America.

Banks's next three novels, Affliction, The Sweet Hereafter, and Rule of the Bone, might be thought of as the result of his marked shift away from the postmodern techniques of his early work and toward "gritty" realism. These three novels are similar in terms of style and theme; each uses a first person narrative and each is concerned, at some level, with the traumas of childhood and the American family.

Affliction, made into a movie in 1997 starring Nick Nolte, Sissy Spacek, James Coburn, and Willem Dafoe, explores the inner life of Wade Whitehouse and his struggle to escape "the tradition of male violence" and alcoholism in his working-class family. Set in a fictional town in New Hampshire—"a town people sometimes admit to having come from but where almost no one ever goes"—the novel is narrated by Wade's brother Rolfe, who has escaped the family by being its first member to attend college, and who, because he is ultimately implicated in the family's life, becomes preoccupied with interpreting Wade's psyche. Rolfe's narrative, though elevated and insightful, reveals that he too finds it nearly impossible to flee his family's cycle of brutality. Some critics have argued that Rolfe's narrative is clumsy and implausible because there is no way he might know all of Wade's thoughts at any given moment as the story suggests he does. Still, others argue that without Rolfe as mediator, the story would lack psychological intensity because Wade himself could not articulate his own inner feelings as can his brother.

Banks demonstrates the versatility of the first person narrative in The Sweet Hereafter, a novel about a school bus accident that claims the lives of fourteen children in a fictional town in upstate New York, as he presents the story from four unique points of view: Dolores Driscoll, the bus driver responsible for the accident; Billy Ansel, a parent of two children who died in the crash; Mitchell Stephens, a New York City lawyer who believes that "[t]here are no accidents"; and Nichole Burnell, an eighth grader who is left paralyzed after the crash. The novel, ultimately, is concerned with the status of children in America and examines who is to blame, and who is to forgive. Atom Egoyan recently filmed an adaptation of The Sweet Hereafter, which was nominated for two Oscars and won three Cannes Film Festival awards.

Banks's Rule of the Bone has been hailed by some as a contemporary Huck Finn or Catcher in the Rye because of its troubled protagonist's first person narrative. Primarily concerned with the events that contribute to fourteen-year-old Chappie Dorset's maturation, the novel includes his encounters with family, politics, religion, money, sex, drugs, and his development of self. Abused by his stepfather, Ken, and "heavy into weed," Chappie runs away from home, takes on a new identity as he renames himself "Bone," and learns several life lessons from an illegal Jamaican alien, I-Man, and an abandoned, abused young child, Rose. Eventually, Bone decides to go to Jamaica with his mentor, I-Man, where he meets his biological father, who, much to Bone's dismay, does not live up to the boy's expectations. Some critics have praised the novel in its entirety, though others have critiqued its chapters set in Jamaica for their improbable events and simplistic moral conclusions. Still, the novel is concerned with criticizing the irrational and selfish world of adults, while it glorifies the endurance of youth. And again, as in Affliction and The Sweet Hereafter, Banks critiques the nuclear family.

Banks's most recent novel, Cloudsplitter, is a fictionalized account of Owen Brown, son of John Brown, who led his followers to murder pro-slavery groups in Kansas and claimed to have received orders from God to attack Harper's Ferry in 1859. The book acquaints the reader with several historical figures, including Frederick Douglass and Ralph Waldo Emerson, but its main focus is on Owen's tale of his father's life and its effects on their family. Although this novel, which Banks researched for several years, seems to diverge from his previous subject matter, Banks's main concerns—a son haunted by the memory of his father, the obsessive return to the ''wound,'' family relationships, and racial issues—are apparent in Cloudsplitter.

-Stephannie Gearhart

BANVILLE, John

Nationality: Irish. Born: Wexford, 8 December 1945. Education: Christian Brothers School, and St. Peter's College, both Wexford. Family: Married Janet Dunham in 1969; two sons. Career: Copy editor, Irish Press, Dublin, 1970–83. Since 1989 literary editor, Irish Times, Dublin. Awards: Allied Irish Banks prize, 1973; Arts Council of Ireland Macaulay fellowship, 1973; Irish-American Foundation award, 1976; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1977; Guardian Fiction prize 1981; Guinness Peat Aviation award, 1989. Agent: Sheil Land Ltd., 43 Doughty Street, London WC1N 2LF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Nightspawn. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Norton, 1971

Birchwood. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Norton, 1973.

Doctor Copernicus. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Norton, 1976.

Kepler. London, Secker and Warburg, 1981; Boston, Godine, 1983.
The Newton Letter: An Interlude. London, Secker and Warburg, 1982; Boston, Godine, 1987.

Mefisto. London, Secker and Warburg, 1986; Boston, Godine, 1989.The Book of Evidence. London, Secker and Warburg, 1989; New York, Scribner, 1990.

Ghosts. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Scribner, 1993.

Athena. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Scribner, 1995.

The Untouchable. New York, Knopf, 1997.

Short Stories

Long Lankin. London, Secker and Warburg, 1970.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Party," in Kilkenny Magazine, Spring-Summer 1966.
- "Mr. Mallin's Quest" and "Nativity," in Transatlantic Review (London), Autumn-Winter 1970–71.
- "Into the Wood," in Esquire (New York), March 1972.
- "De rerum natura," in Transatlantic Review 50 (London), 1975.
- "Rondo," in Transatlantic Review 60 (London), 1977.

Plays

Screenplay: Reflections, 1984; The Broken Jug (After Kleist), 1994.

Other

Introduction, Ormond, a Tale by Maria Edgeworth. Belfast, Appletree Press, 1992.

Introduction, The Deeps of the Sea and Other Fiction by George Steiner. Boston, Faber and Faber, 1996.

Contributor, Arguing at the Crossroads: Essays on a Changing Ireland, edited by Paul Brennan and Catherine de Saint Phalle. Dublin, New Island Books, 1997.

*

Manuscript Collection: Trinity College, Dublin.

Critical Studies: "John Banville Issue" of Irish University Review (Dublin), Spring 1981; John Banville: A Critical Introduction by Rudiger Imhof, Dublin, Wolfhound Press, 1989, Chester Springs, Pennsylvania, Dufour, 1990; John Banville, A Critical Study by Joseph McMinn. New York, Macmillan, 1991; The Supreme Fictions of John Banville by Joseph McMinn, New York, Manchester University Press, 1999.

* * *

John Banville writes about writing. His characters are marionettes, entangled in self-reflexive explorations of the relationship between creation and reality. Banville's fiction is full of borrowings, from Marvell to Sir Arthur Eddington, yet it is saved from intellectualism and narcissism by its disciplined structure and Nabokovian narrative voice, deliberately uneasy and emotionally strained.

Its third-person narrative distinguishes Long Lankin from Banville's later books. Like Dubliners, this debut collection presents different stages in the lives of Irish characters in sets of episodic stories dealing with childhood, adolescence, and adulthood respectively. "The Possessed," a novella, is added as a coda. Each story centres on two dispossessed characters who frustrate each other's initial sense of freedom and end up in a state of arrest, wholly unable to fathom the "whatness of things." Ominously prominent background noises and shadows continually hint at Long Lankin, the leper from the old English ballad, whose cure depended on a ritual murder. He materializes in the novella as Ben White and radically upsets the tenor, chronology, and fictional level of the book. White's transformation into "Black Fang" intermediates his appearance in two preceding stories: in "Summer Voices" as a boy, bullied by his sister and fascinated with death; and in "Island" as an unproductive writer who stares at Delos and is accused of murder by his demanding girlfriend. In "The Possessed," Ben demands a blood-sacrifice for creative freedom, metaphorically kills his sister by severing their almost incestuous-ties, and lifts himself to the status of implied author, unleashing a savagery that reflects the author's urge to finish off the book.

Nightspawn is a sequel to "The Possessed" and exploits the metafictional effects of coalescing hero, narrator, and writer. Ben imitates Yeats, Prufrock, and Shelley, and in the best nouveau roman tradition he soon becomes a pawn in his own cliché thriller. His Greek island gets crowded with his stock characters who emotionally involve White beyond his narrative control and are to blame for the novel's doubles, double plots, and obscurity. Eager to get to "the real meat," but checked by "the conventions," White becomes the first of Banville's Beckettian heroes who must go on, or perish in silence and who are doomed at the end to return to the first sentence.

In Birchwood, Banville refutes many of his fabulations. Gabriel Godkin, the narrator, is once again autocratic and conditioned by his own narrative. His genre is the Irish big house with all its familiar trappings and stock characters. There are slapstick humour and morbid fun: Granny Godkin finds her end in the summerhouse by spontaneous combustion. Intermingled with the big house is the external world of romance, Prospero's circus, which Gabriel joins on his quest for a sister who is in fact an imaginative character created to deprive him of his inheritance by the aunt who proves to be his mother. Gabriel's anachronistic narrative is determined by his "search for time misplaced"; like the antics of Birchwood's grandfather clock, it transcends boundaries of time as deftly as Proust's Recherches. But the book's shifting frames of reference are firmly fixed in its philosophical observation that the expression of the memories of things is at best a two-dimensional mirror-image in which much is consistently reversed.

In his classical tetralogy, Banville translates his fascination for the relationship between creation and reality into eminent scientists' quests for truth. He even appends bibliographies with references to works on theoretical physics. In Doctor Copernicus, Duke Albrecht claims that he and Copernicus are "the makers of ... supreme fictions." And indeed, Coppernigk is time and again likened to Wallace Stevens in order to show how science is art and how art cannot express truth, but only embody it. Coppernigk's quest leads from conceptualization to cognition, a unification with his anti-self, his syphilitic brother Andreas who repeats verbatim Eddington's "We are the truth." Although the book recreates the cruelty and stench of the Renaissance, it is not an historical novel. Copernicus is a protégé of a writer's consciousness which is informed by Einstein, Kierkegaard, Wittgenstein, Max Planck, Yeats, and Stevens-who are all quoted in a pandemonium of opposing philosophical contentions. Banville feels free to introduce a map-cap, manic depressive paranoid called Rheticus, who claims responsibility for Copernicus's De Revolutionibus, lies like mad, lays bare the irrational undertones of the book and provides a delightfully comic interlude. Ultimately Doctor Copernicus is another metafiction; all characters may be figments of Copernicus's own mind; and he, in turn, acts and thinks as part of the literary creation. Every book of the novel is a closed entity, revolving within itself and resolving in a restatement of the first paragraph, with the very last sentence being a return to the very first. The narrative reads like a fugue, but despite its insistence on form it is immensely realistic in its depiction of a nightmarish era, where total chaos is just around the corner.

The structure of Kepler is a reflection of the hero's belief that "in the beginning is the shape." The five chapters are shaped like the polygons that Kepler envisaged within the intervals of the six planetary orbits; the sections acrostically spell out the names of famous scientists, and the shifts of time in each section reflect Kepler's discovery that the planets move in ellipses. In his Quixotic quest for a truthful order, Kepler the man becomes conditioned by the entropy that Kepler the scientist creates, with a paradoxical anti-hero as the result.

At the basis of The Newton Letter lies von Hofmannsthal's Ein Brief; the Nabokovian first sentence aptly reads "Words fail me, Clio." The epistolary form grants the narrator more autonomy than any of Banville's protagonists and emphasizes his treacherous subjectivity. The novel is the satire of the tetralogy and details the consequences of immersing an historian with a Newtonian mechanistic view in the common world of the big house, where Goethe's humanity reigns supreme. The hero is constantly baffled and blinded, misinterprets the inhabitants of Ferns and is Banville's most convincing example that truth is perhaps inhuman.

The Book of Evidence and Athena exploit even further than Banville's previous work the fragile span between reality and the need to believe and live in illusion. The first person narrative of Frederick Montgomery in The Book of Evidence is a confessional monologue of an art expert awaiting trial for murdering a young female servant, who caught him stealing a Dutch masterpiece, A Portrait of a Woman with Gloves, from a friend. He killed her simply because she was in the way. Montgomery, a gentleman and noncriminal type, has to make sense of his crimes, to discover the impulse that drove him to them. Articulately written, Montgomery's recollections of his past include scenes of viewing life from within, through windows, as if he had been imprisoned all his life. This feature continues when he appears in Athena. Montogmery, out of prison, changes his name to Morrow, but becomes no less self-obsessed.

Banville's imaginative description of the Portrait of a Woman with Gloves, as seen by Montgomery, goes beyond what is on the canvas. Montgomery is able to brilliantly invent details of the life and circumstances of a long-dead woman in the portrait, but of the living woman he killed, he realises later, he cannot be forgiven because "I never imagined her vividly enough, that I never made her be there sufficiently, that I did not make her live. I could kill her because for me she was not alive." Athena develops Montgomery/Morrow's difficulties of identity in a scenario that is a fantastic play of words and images. Figures from The Book of Evidence recur, but slightly altered, and even the one solid character, described with a blend of humour and pathos, Morrow's dying aunt, is a fraud. Acting as a kind of subliminal commentary, paintings are described and analysed to reflect on Morrow's psyche and his pursuit of love via an imagined recreation of the murdered servant. In The Book of Evidence Montgomery declared that his task was to bring her back to life and that he would from then on be "living for two"; he later remarks in Athena "She had been mine for a time ... from the start that was supposed to be my task: to give her life." Gombrich notes of Belli's Pygmalion "that his quest was 'for forms more perfect and more ideal than reality,"" which pinpoints Morrow's obsession and his tragic dual state of mind. Banville's handling of this extremely complex theme is faultless, for his great ability is to project us into the psychotic world of Montgomery/Morrow, and to share his confusion without question.

-Peter G.W. van de Kamp, updated by Geoffrey Elborn

BARDWELL, Leland

Nationality: Irish Born: Leland Hone, India, 1928. Education: Alexandra School, Dublin; London University, 1950s. Family: Married 1) Michael Bardwell in 1940s (separated 1950s), three children; 2) Finton McLachlan in 1959, three sons. Career: Various jobs, London and Paris, 1940s; playwright and writer for radio, Ireland, 1960s; poetry editor, Force 10 magazine, County Sligo, Ireland. Address: County Sligo, Ireland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Girl on a Bicycle: A Novel. Dublin, Irish Writers Co-operative, 1977. That London Winter. Dublin, Co-op Books, 1981. The House. Dingle, Ireland, Brandon, 1984. There We Have Been. Dublin, Attic Press, 1989.

Short Stories

Different Kinds of Love. Dublin, Attic Press, 1987.

Poetry

The Mad Cyclist. Dublin, New Writers' Press, 1970.

The Fly and the Bed Bug. Dublin, Beaver Row Press, 1984.

Dostoevsky's Grave: Selected Poems. Dublin, Dedalus, 1991.The White Beach: New and Selected Poems, 1960–1998. Cliffs of Moher, Ireland, Salmon Publishing, 1998.

Plays

Thursday. Dublin, Trinity College, 1972. Open Ended Prescription. Dublin, Peacock Theatre, 1979. Edith Piaf. Dublin, Olympia Theatre, 1984.

Other

Contributor, Ms. Muffet and Others: A Funny, Sassy, Heretical Collection of Feminist Fairytales. Dublin, Attic Press, 1986. Editor, with others, The Anthology. Dublin, Co-Op Books, 1982.

* * *

Over the past four decades Leland Bardwell has been an important and popular presence in Irish writing. As a poet, dramatist, short story writer, and novelist, Bardwell has consistently produced work that is noted for its complexity, creativity, detail, and craftsmanship. Originally a poet, Bardwell turned to prose in the 1970s as a means of supporting her family. Girl on a Bicycle, set in 1940s Ireland, was her first novel and it introduced several of the themes that continue to resurface in Bardwell's subsequent writing. Through the character of a young Protestant woman attempting to negotiate life-ultimately unsuccessfully-in a new Catholic state, Bardwell explores both the reality of being Protestant in England, and what it means to be an individual caught up in the momentum of historical change. In both of these central thematic questions, Bardwell's own experience is evident: Protestant herself, born in colonial India and brought to Ireland at the age of two, she has not only lived through the violent political upheaval of twentieth-century Ireland, but also survived being bombed while living in London during World War II. As a former extramural student at London University, Bardwell has been able to situate these experiences in relation to the ancient history she studied, and furthermore realize their potential for literary and mythic treatment, as evident in much of her poetry, where she often incorporates mythical and historical figures in poems that signify the contemporary present.

Bardwell's best-known novel to date, The House, and her latest novel, There We Have Been, continue to probe questions of history, memory, relationships, personal identity, and Protestantism. Both of these novels reveal Bardwell's ability to convincingly create and then mine the psyches of individual characters, and the kinds of personal crises that underlie their everyday lives. In The House a middle-aged Irish Protestant man who has been living in England returns to his family home in Ireland. When confronted with the physical space of his history, memories of his childhood refuse to be contained, forcing him to confront the history of his emotional relationships as well. Those factors that are supposed to define him as an individual—familial ties, religion, etc.—are revealed to be both problematic and tenuous, and Bardwell's protagonist must reconsider just what and who has made him what he is. There We Have Been features a similar return by a protagonist to a childhood home. Just as the farm Diligence Strong returns to has been neglected, so too have her memories of, and questions about, the personal past. In struggling with the presence of her emotionally distant brother and the memories of a sister whose death has never been satisfactorily understood, Diligence must strip away the fabrications families and individuals construct in an attempt to perpetuate the illusion of coherence in their lives.

That Bardwell situates a return to home as the crucial generative action of each book suggests how fundamental she believes space and place, as mitigated by history, to be in the formation of individuals. Furthermore, it underscores how central she understands memory to be as an ordering principle of the imagination, a theme that recurs in her poetry. For Bardwell, the individual is always in some way in the process of "returning," whether it be a physical return, an emotional one, or both. In 1998 Bardwell published her fourth book of poetry, The White Beach: New and Selected Poems, 1960-1998, which is resonant with returns. Divided into four sections, each of which chronicles one of the four decades during which she has been writing, the collection poetically documents the personal and political developments of Bardwell's life to date, demonstrating their inextricability. Her poetry, so deeply personal in its reflections on her relationships and experiences, nevertheless veers away from egocentrism, documenting those she has encountered and been moved by with equal sensitivity and clarity, particularly the lives of other women. This anticipated poetic overview of four decades' experience and literary output is expected to be followed by an equally anticipated new novel.

—Jennifer Harris

BARKER, A(udrey) L(ilian)

Nationality: British. Born: St. Paul's Cray, Kent, 13 April 1918. Education: Schools in Beckenham, Kent, and Wallington, Surrey. Career: Worked for Amalgamated Press, London, 1936; reader, Cresset Press, London, 1947; secretary and sub-editor, BBC, London, 1949–78. Member of the Executive Committee, English PEN, 1981–85. Awards: Atlantic award, 1946; Maugham award, 1947; Cheltenham Festival award, 1963; Arts Council award, 1970; South East Arts award, 1981; Society of Authors travelling scholarship, 1988. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1970. Agent: Jennifer Kavanagh, 44 Langham Street, London W1N 5RC, England. Address: 103 Harrow Road, Carshalton, Surrey SM5 3QF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Apology for a Hero. London, Hogarth Press, and New York, Scribner, 1950

A Case Examined. London, Hogarth Press, 1965.

The Middling: Chapters in the Life of Ellie Toms. London, Hogarth Press, 1967.

John Brown's Body. London, Hogarth Press, 1969.

A Source of Embarrassment. London, Hogarth Press, 1974.

A Heavy Feather. London, Hogarth Press, 1978; New York, Braziller, 1979.

Relative Successes. London, Chatto and Windus, 1984. The Gooseboy. London, Hutchinson, 1987.

The Woman Who Talked to Herself. London, Hutchinson, 1989. Zeph. London, Hutchinson, 1992.

The Haunt. London, Virago Press, 1999.

Short Stories

Innocents: Variations on a Theme. London, Hogarth Press, 1947; New York, Scribner, 1948.

Novelette with Other Stories. London, Hogarth Press, and New York, Scribner, 1951.

The Joy-Ride and After. London, Hogarth Press, 1963; New York, Scribner, 1964.

Lost upon the Roundabouts. London, Hogarth Press, 1964.

Penguin Modern Stories 8, with others. London, Penguin, 1971.

Femina Real. London, Hogarth Press, 1971.

Life Stories. London, Chatto and Windus, 1981.

No Word of Love. London, Chatto and Windus, 1985.

Any Excuse for a Party: Selected Stories. London, Hutchinson, 1991.Contributor, Seduction: A Book of Stories, edited by Tony Peake.New York, Serpent's Tail, 1994.

Play

Television Play: Pringle, 1958.

Other

Introduction, Hester Lilly, and Other Stories by Elizabeth Taylor. London, Virago, 1990.

* * *

The theme of A.L. Barker's work is the ambivalence of love and the dangers of egoism. She examines those relationships that exist between victor and victim, he who eats and he who is eaten. This material is handled lightly and skillfully; she has the satirist's ability to select detail, placing her characters socially as well as psychologically. Her territory covers childhood, the worlds of the outcast and the ill, and the impoverished lives of the lonely. She is close to the English tradition of the comic novel and like Angus Wilson, a major writer in this genre, she often indulges in caricature.

Many of her short stories reveal a fondness for the macabre, introducing elements of horror into the midst of apparent calm. Her first collection, Innocents, begins with a study of a boy testing his courage in swimming; he becomes involved in a scene of adult violence that is far more dangerous to him than the tree-roots in his river. Innocence in these stories is seen as inexperience, as the blinkered vision of the mad and as the selfishness of the egoist. Lost upon the Roundabouts is a further exploration of these ideas, and contains two very fine short stories, "Miss Eagle" and "Someone at the Door."

The central characters in Barker's novels are parasites, dependent on other people for a sense of their own identity. For Ellie in The Middling love means "turning another person into a colony of myself." Charles Candy, the central character of Apology for a Hero, loves his wife Wynne "because she could give him himself." After Wynne's death he acquires a housekeeper and finds that "when he was with her he felt located." He meets death on a reckless voyage, persuaded that sea-trading will, at last, show him the real Mr. Candy.

The egoist in A Case Examined is Rose Antrobus, the chairman of a charity committee with the power to allocate money either to a destitute family or to the church hassock fund. Rose has always insulated herself against suffering. She remembers a childhood friend, Solange, whom she credits with the understanding of despair: Solange provokes violence, she feels, by her own wickedness. This fantasy is shattered by a visit to Paris and a meeting with the real Solange, whose account of Nazi persecution shakes Rose into compassion. A bridge has been made between the worlds of the two women, between the petty and the tragic, and the committee decision is altered accordingly.

Femina Real is an entertaining set of portraits, nine studies of the female character. In many of the situations an apparent vulnerability hides an underlying strength. A frail woman dominates those around her: adolescence vanquishes middle-age; a ten-year-old cripple turns the tables on the man holding her prisoner. As always, Barker's clear prose style matches the accuracy of her observations. The Haunt, which Barker completed just before she was struck by a debilitating illness in 1998, marked a departure in that, unlike earlier works, this one is not an "articulated novel" of short stories, or even an extended short story, but rather a fully realized narrative. The haunting of the title refers not to ghosts, of which there are plenty in earlier writings, but rather to the act or experience of being haunted—a phenomenon she treats as something to be enjoyed and treasured, not feared. Indeed, Barker's is a talent to be treasured as well.

—Judy Cooke

BARKER, Pat(ricia)

Nationality: British. Born: Thornaby-on-Tees, England, 1943. Education: LSE, B.Sc.1965. Family: Married David B. Barker in 1978; two children. Career: Has taught further education. Awards: Fawcett prize, for Union Street; Booker Prize, 1995, for The Ghost Road. Agent: Curtis Brown Associates, 162–168 Regent Street, London W1R 5TA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Union Street. London, Virago, 1982; New York, Putnam, 1983.Blow Your House Down. London, Virago, and New York, Putnam, 1984.

The Century's Daughter. London, Virago, and New York, Putnam, 1986.

The Man Who Wasn't There. London, Virago, 1989; New York, Ballantine, 1990.

Regeneration. London, Viking, 1991; New York, Dutton, 1992. The Eye in the Door. London, Viking, 1993; New York, Dutton, 1994. The Ghost Road. London, Viking, 1995; Boston, Compass, 1995. The Regeneration Trilogy. London, Viking, 1996.

Another World. London, Viking, 1998; New York, Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 1999.

*

Film Adaptation: Stanley and Iris, from the novel Union Street.

* * *

Union Street was Pat Barker's first novel, and at once marked her as a powerful voice in objective realism. She had tried writing middle-class fiction but was encouraged by Angela Carter to write of her own working-class roots. Set in an unnamed northern England industrial town, Union Street consists of seven interlinked stories, each named after a working-class woman. These form a graphic account, in their own idiom, of women whose lives are circumscribed by poverty and violence. The first chapter, which is the longest, describes a childhood typically shared by the older characters, describing circumstances that account for their attitudes as adults. Kelly Brown, an intelligent 11-year-old, is hardly cared for by her mother, who has been abandoned by her husband. Playing truant, Kelly roams the streets at night, and on one such occasion she is raped. This she conceals from her mother, and in the end, determined not to be defeated, she is even more strongly compelled to wander alone. Barker treats Kelly entirely sympathetically, so that when the girl vandalizes a middle-class house and her own school, the reader feels compassion rather than disgust at her actions. She encounters an old woman in a park who has chosen to abandon her house to avoid being put in an old people's home. The woman will die in the cold, and this experience encourages Kelly to return to her mother.

The speech patterns of the characters are authentically northern English working-class, and the story of Union Street reveals bigotry caused by ignorance, overt racism, unwanted pregnancies, and a close society united and also torn apart by appalling social conditions. Running like a thread through all the chapters is the strong Iris King, whose capable way of organizing her own life while helping others provides hope in the midst of misery. The novel, which is cyclical, ends with the story of Alice Brown, a confused, senile woman who believes that nineteenth-century workhouses still exist, and has saved against the indignity of a pauper's funeral. In doing so she is half-starved, and even after a severe stroke she refuses to go to a home. Knowing she will be forcibly moved and not allowed to end her days in her own house, she decides to die in the open. She is the woman Kelly met at the beginning of the novel, and Alice's reflections of her own past emphasize the unchanging patterns of life.

Barker's skill was confirmed by her Blow Your House Down, a fictional reconstruction of prostitution and a Yorkshire Ripper prototype. More successful was The Century's Daughter, which covers a period of 80 years and has a large cast of characters, some of whom might have strayed from Union Street. In a sense a fictional history of the century, the most poignant section is about the sufferings of men in the trenches of World War I and the effect their deaths have on their families. It was a subject that fascinated Barker, and one which she made her own in a trilogy about the Great War.

The fictional treatment of World War I was the domain of the male writer until Susan Hill broke new ground with Strange Meeting. Barker's Regeneration trilogy—comprised of Regeneration, The Eye in the Door, and The Ghost Road—uses a mixture of fiction and facts about W. H. R. Rivers, an army doctor, and his shell-shocked patients at the Craiglockhart War Hospital in Edinburgh. The patients, who have to be cured before they are sent back to the front—probably to be killed—include several familiar names, in particular Wilfred Owen and Siegfried Sassoon. There is also William Prior, a completely fictional creation who appears in all three novels.

Regeneration—the regeneration of nerves, that is—examines in microscopic detail the horrific mental disorders caused by trench warfare. Much of the historical detail is already familiar, but Barker gives it a new perspective by providing a background to the soldier's lives. Prior's mental disturbance is exacerbated by his past relationship with his violent father; his reversion as an adult to his childhood ways of escape by "changing" to another personality is a persistent theme in the series. Originally working-class but now an army officer, he is what the middle and upper classes snobbishly label as a "temporary gentleman."

He is, however, acceptable for sex, and the second novel opens with a gay sex scene between him and an upper-class officer, whose hidebound class consciousness will gradually be eroded. Barker expands on the facts of a genuine cause célèbre of a female pacifist wrongly imprisoned on trumped-up evidence she was plotting to kill Lloyd George. Her version of this real character is called Beattie Roper, and Beattie tests the loyalties of Prior, the intelligence officer called in to question her. It so happens she is his lifelong friend, and thus he finds himself on the one hand wanting to prove evidence against an agent provocateur in order to help her, and on the other hand pulled by his own strongly nonpacifist convictions.

Another figure in The Eye in the Door is a lunatic who sets out to expose homosexuals, libeling an actress by implying that she is a lesbian, and attempting to nail an M.P. for the same crime. All the characters feel watched, by conscience or under suspicion, and the "eye in the door" is the glass in a cell through which the inmate is constantly scrutinized. Implicit in the entire series, however, is the eye of the author scrutinizing her own society, an idea that becomes more apparent in The Ghost Road. As Prior returns to the front, newly patched up by Rivers and on his way to new horrors-horrors that seem particularly absurd in light of the fact that the war is drawing to a close—Rivers thinks back on his earlier work among the headhunters of Melanesia. The same British Empire now engaged in acts of wholesale slaughter on the battlefields of France, it seems, had earlier outlawed headhunting among the natives of its colony. Barker presents these two facts with a minimum of comment, thus only serving to heighten the topsy-turvy moral landscape of her characters' world.

—Geoffrey Elborn

BARNES, Julian (Patrick)

Pseudonym: Dan Kavanagh. Nationality: British. Born: Leicester, 19 January 1946. Education: City of London School, 1957–64; Magdalen College, Oxford, 1964–68, B.A. (honours) in modern languages 1968; also studied law. Family: Married Pat Kavanagh in 1979. Career: Editorial assistant, Oxford English Dictionary supplement, 1969–72; contributing editor, New Review, London, 1977–78; assistant literary editor, 1977–79, and television critic, 1977–81, New Statesman, London; deputy literary editor, Sunday Times, London, 1980–82; television critic, the Observer, London, 1982–86; London correspondent, The New Yorker, 1990–94. Lives in London, England. Awards: Somerset Maugham award, 1981; Faber Memorial prize, 1985; Médicis Essai prize (France), 1986; American Academy award 1986; Gutenberg prize (France), 1987; Premio Grinzane Cavour (Italy), 1988; Prix Fémina (France), 1992; Shakespeare prize (Hamburg), 1993. Chevalier de l'Ordre des Arts et des Lettres, 1988.

Agent: Peters Fraser and Dunlop, 503–504 The Chambers, Chelsea Harbour, Lots Road, London SW10 0XF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Metroland. London, Cape, 1980; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1981.Before She Met Me. London, Cape, 1982; New York, McGraw Hill, 1986.

Flaubert's Parrot. London, Cape, 1984; New York, Knopf, 1985.Staring at the Sun. London, Cape, 1986; New York, Knopf, 1987.A History of the World in 10 1/2 Chapters. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1989.

Talking It Over. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1991. The Porcupine. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1992. Cross Channel. New York, Knopf, 1996. England, England. New York, Knopf, 1999.

Novels as Dan Kavanagh

Duffy. London, Cape, 1980; New York, Pantheon, 1986. Fiddle City. London, Cape, 1981; New York, Pantheon, 1986. Putting the Boot In. London, Cape, 1985. Going to the Dogs. London, Viking, and New York, Pantheon, 1987.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The 50p Santa" (as Dan Kavanagh), in Time Out (London), 19 December 1985–1 January 1986.

"One of a Kind," in The Penguin Book of Modern British Short Stories, edited by Malcolm Bradbury. London and New York, Viking, 1987.

"Shipwreck," in The New Yorker, 12 June 1989.

Other

Letters from London: 1990–1995. London, Picador, and New York, Vintage, 1995.

Introduction, The Reef by Edith Wharton. New York, Knopf, 1996.
Contributor, The Mammoth Book of Twentieth-Century Ghost Stories, edited by Peter Haining. New York, Carroll and Graf, 1998.
Contributor, The Penguin Book of Twentieth-Century Essays, edited by Ian Hamilton. London, Penguin, 2000.

Translator, The Truth About Dogs, by Volker Kriegel. London, Bloomsbury, 1988.

*

Critical Studies: Understanding Julian Barnes by Merritt Moseley, Columbia, South Carolina, University of South Carolina Press, 1997; Language, History, and Metanarrative in the Fiction of Julian Barnes, New York, Lang, 2000.

* * *

The much-quoted glowing tribute paid to Julian Barnes by Carlos Fuentes has given him the reputation—by no means entirely undeserved—of being the most literary, the most intellectual and above all the most international of British contemporary novelists. Barnes's fluency receives frequent acclaim, and indeed, this prolific writer's most successful experiments in literary form can be most closely compared to his Italian, French, and South American contemporaries. Yet along with such international strains, however, there is something specifically English deeply interfused in his work.

His first novel, Metroland, published in 1981 when Barnes was 35, owes a great deal to the language and traditions of English poetry. Philip Larkin (himself later to praise Barnes) is quoted on occasions and the poet's steady, empirical temperament and suburban stoicism can be sensed behind the narrative. The plot centers around a young Englishman, Christopher Lloyd, who visits France during the revolts of 1968 and has a brief affair with a French girl. The novel immediately demonstrates Barnes's aptitudes as both meticulous stylist and careful recorder of closely observed detail. Its three balanced scenes, which echo Flaubert's Éducation sentimental in many ways, are equally vivid and imaginative: the adolescent pranks of clever schoolboys Chris and his friend Toni; Chris's belated and intelligently unsentimentalized sexual initiation in Paris; and the suburban idyll of Chris's subsequent marriage, to which Toni's rather phony iconoclasm is compared. These values may seem anti-extremist to the point of being smug, but the scenes are very convincing.

Graham Hendrick in Before She Met Me ditches his safe, non-sexual first wife for a sportier, younger model (Ann) who suits him better at first, until her previous life as a minor, sexy starlet soon becomes the subject of his obsessive fascination. While reminiscent of Nabokov's Humbert Humbert, Hendrick is also a typical Barnes protagonist, rather academic in temperament (he might be Chris Lloyd 10 years on) and catalogues Ann's past life and celluloid affairs meticulously until the supposed trail leads him back to the brash novelist host Jack Lupton at whose house he has first met her. This fact finally makes Hendrick lose his cool and leads him to the carefully planned murder and suicide he has devised in order to punish her.

If these two early novels were promising in that they revealed much of Barnes's wit and psychological sensitivity, Flaubert's Parrot, being both a tribute to his acknowledged master and model, Flaubert, and one of the most outstanding contributions to British postmodernism, is Barnes's master work. This prize-winning, widely acclaimed 1984 novel combines the semi-academic protagonist Geoffrey Braithwaite and his interest in the complexities of marital love with a brilliant, well-informed, creative exploration of the French writer's life and work, which ultimately questions the philosophical nature of all history and knowledge. It is one of only a handful of novels written in England whose inventiveness in form has kept pace with what has been such an intellectually stimulating period in literary theory and criticism. The postmodern problematizing of any attempt to reconstruct historical truth is moderated, though, as the novel presents a plethora of ideas and invention that make it by no means only abstract or intellectual. If Hendrick in Before She Met Me constructs like a detective the data he obsessively imagines, Braithwaite's attempt to find the authentic parrot that sat on Flaubert's desk while Un Coeur simple was written (while at the same time rationalizing his wife's suicide), is doomed to fail, because every trace he finds is inevitably subjective. So the narrator-detective's own writing pushes more and more into the center of the novel.

Barnes's other identity as crime writer Dan Kavanagh (complete with mildly racist fictional biography) was the worst kept literary secret of the 1980s, casually announced in the cult literary magazine Quarto and then blown wide open when "Kavanagh" appeared on a front cover portrait in the London Review of Books, and when Barnes married the literary agent Pat Kavanagh. The first two immensely entertaining novels featuring his bisexual ex-cop Duffy (Duffy and Fiddle City), with the Soho sex clubs of the former and the airport smuggling of the latter providing vivid low-life detail, were as successful in their way as Metroland was in its. But by the time of Putting the Boot In and Going to the Dogs, with Flaubert's Parrot as the new yardstick, the joke and the material have worn a little thin. In the contemporary fiction scene a successful highbrow novel may well outsell a supposedly "popular" crime thriller, so profit alone is not sufficient motive. The Duffy novels (reflecting the grand topic of the impossibility of the detective putting together the single pieces to get the overall picture) helped give Barnes some "street-cred" and may also have served to keep his desire to be sensational out of his input into literature.

Structurally, Barnes's heterogeneous 1986 novel Staring at the Sun is (like Metroland) a triptych. The boldness of its form, its long time-perspectives and its compelling central metaphor (of a pilot who, due to an accident of flying, experiences sunrise twice) make it another accomplished novel of ideas. It highlights three moments in the life of Jean Sergeant: as a naive 17-year-old during World War II entering a sexually-closeted marriage; as a mother in her mid-fifties in 1984, who takes off on a trip to explore the wonders and wisdoms of the world; and finally as a widow on the eve of her 100th birthday in the twenty-first century, when all the answers to life's questions (at least those questions to which answers are possible) are stored on the General Purposes Computer within a program that (depending on your degree of credulity or skepticism) is called either The Absolute Truth or TAT.

Barnes's A History of the World in 10 1/2 Chapters (the allusion, of course, is to H.G. Wells's classic of Edwardian optimism A Short History of the World) confronts history with postmodern theories of representation to produce the most successful yet of his novels. Its ten chapters, each a tour de force, describe a succession of critical moments from our culture and history where nothing less is at stake than human survival itself. Noah's Ark from the point of view of a woodworm and then in subsequent searches for the historical record of Ararat; a semi-academic Barnes protagonist lecturing on a Mediterranean cruise but caught up in a terrorist hijack; a girl who may be inventing her story to protect herself from emotional trauma; Gericault's Raft of the Medusa, first imagined as history and then brilliantly analyzed as art, all lead up to a curiously empty achieved heaven at the end of survival's quest, in which Leicester City Football Club nauseatingly win the F.A. Cup year after year and a hearty breakfast is served every morning. Simultaneously playful and serious, yet packed with suggestive detail, the book presents a world that is imagined through the postmodern concept of "fabulation," one in which everything is subtly related to everything else by metaphor and analogy rather than by causal succession, a world only comprehensible in terms of the "primal metaphor" of sea voyage and survival. Its lush parenthetical celebration of love—the half chapter at the core of the novel—links English poetry and postmodernism since, to return to Larkin's "almost" truth: "what will survive of us is love."

Talking It Over is an effortlessly structured sequence of monologues that tells of the love triangle of the three principal speakers: boring banker Stuart; unpredictable TEFL teacher Oliver; and the rather simple-minded social-work-trained picture restorer Gillian, who comes between them. At first Stuart's schoolboy friendship for Oliver is hardly threatened by his love for and marriage to Gillian but love soon triangulates and transfers and Stuart gets left out in the cold.

Though both men vigorously deny it, the male-bonding is obviously a powerful undercurrent, but love itself (''a system for getting someone to call you darling after sex,'' Stuart cynically concludes), the inevitability of repeated patterns, and the wonderful tendency of language (gestured at in the title) to turn something into something else are the smoothly handled themes. Talking It Over, Barnes's entry to the nineties, returns to a realistic idiom while deftly absorbing some well-documented trends in the sociology of contemporary love: frankly capitalistic and commercial metaphors; the intensification of romantic affection during a period when marital break-up is almost the norm; background details regarding telephone pornography and AIDS. It returns to many of the things Barnes has done successfully in the earlier novels and does them better still, though one wonders why he didn't have a go at writing it as a play.

The Porcupine, a novella, and Barnes's seventh work of fiction written under his own name, appeared in 1992 as a very timely response to the political upheavals that occurred in the former Eastern Bloc countries. Whilst Romania made the biggest headlines of the day, Barnes took Bulgaria as his subject and produced an economical yet convincing portrait of a society in the crisis of ideological revolution. Several aspects of The Porcupine, such as its meticulous descriptive pace, its Eastern European setting, its hints of Kafka, and the tenor of its concern with issues of gender as well as those of politics suggest a comparison with the work of his contemporary Ian McEwan. Again central, now politically crucial, is the attempt to evaluate competing claims to the truth in a postmodern cultural environment where all unitary claims are to be questioned. The two competing claims to truth in this situation are those of Stoyo Petkanov, the old party man and leader of the country for the past 33 years who now has to defend the whole of the past Communist regime and its ideals in the face of the new drive toward capitalism and its spokesman, the new Prosecutor General, Piotr Solinsky. Petkanov is the ready-made villain of the piece, but Barnes lets us in on his point of view, so that by the end of the trial we have warmed to him as a man of a certain kind of integrity and achievement. We are left in no doubt that, in the real world, politics is stronger than justice and that the best location for justice—poetic justice in its original sense—may lie in the balance and dialogue of the novel itself.

The next book to be published in 1995 was a collection of journalistic pieces Barnes had written as London correspondent of the New Yorker, where all of them originally appeared. Although the title Letters from London: 1990-1995 seems a bit odd as the last letter dates from August 1994, the book, detailed, fresh, and often funny, is another masterpiece. Covering a variety of things his American metropolitan readership might find of interest regarding Britain-Thatcher's fall, the poll tax, the Rushdie affair, and the caprices of the Royal Family—Barnes manages never to bore his readers, even when focusing on abstruse matters like chess tournaments and mazemaking or on half-forgotten scandals. The letters show Barnes—as in The Porcupine—to be a sensitive political writer, concerned with the state of Britain in times of a dawning change in power. For all its freshness, however, the book also reveals a gloomy—especially towards the end-and rather weary Barnes, deploying the image of the political clock being "rehung on the wall at a completely different angle."

If France—its locations, language, and literature—figures largely in most of Barnes's books, the 1996 short story collection Cross Channel is the monumentalization of the writer's love affair with Britain's continental next-door neighbor. All ten stories link Britain to France in some way, spanning the seventeenth century to the year 2015. Barnes is at his best here, exposing the respective and mutual stereotypes in a wonderfully ironic way. The major "French" topics that appear, from amour fou to the Tour de France, are pitted against very "English" characters—the self-righteously austere composer Leonard Verity in "Interference," the frigidly lewd Uncle Freddy in "Experiment," the late nineteenth century tourist-explorers Emily and Florence in "Hermitage," and Barnes himself as "an elderly Englishman" of sixty-nine years in the concluding story "Tunnel." In this last piece, which sees the narrator, traveling on the Eurostar in less than three hours from London to Paris, torn between nostalgia and self-directed cynicism, all these different views on the notoriously problem-riddled Anglo-French relationship are eventually linked together, as the elderly Englishman leaves "the tunnel of memory," and "when he returned home, began to write the stories you have just read." Perhaps this is Barnes's answer to the question that the protagonist in the Great War story "Evermore" poses and that pervades the whole collection: "She wondered if there was such a thing as collective memory, something more than the sum of individual memories."

In his most recent novel, England, England, Barnes returned to post-postmodernist territory, though not in terms of stylistic devices, but as far as the topic is concerned. The tycoon Sir Jack Pitman, as grotesque as powerful a character, mobilizes forces to realize his one last great idea: a transformation of the Isle of Wight into a quality tourist resort, gathering all the quintessences of England—that is, replacements and replica of Stonehenge and Bronte-country, a halfsize Big Ben, Manchester United, and Robin Hood. "The Project" recycles the five-star sites of England's past as simulacra in the third millennium, following exclusively the logic of the market. Sir Jack's team is busy advertising "England, England"'s quality leisure, searching for a logo or convincing the Royal Family to move to the Isle's replica of Buckingham Palace. The decline of "Olde England" into a place of vokeldom about to be forgotten by the world is the logical consequence of Barnes's dark satire. The book, however, is more interested in the effects the vast success of "The Project" has on human relationships. Martha Cochrane, the Appointed Cynic in Sir Jack's team and the protagonist proper of the novel, engages in a capital power struggle with her employer. In a world where the replica easily outmatches the original, Martha's search for real love remains futile. Yet the book ends on a note of melancholy, with Martha in the country formerly known as England, nostalgic for a past she has never known. England, England confirms once again Julian Barnes's status as one of Britain's top novelists, refined in style and controlled in structure. We can only look forward to his next delightful masterpiece.

-Richard Brown, updated by Tobias Wachinger

BARNHARDT, Wilton

Nationality: American. Born: Winston-Salem, North Carolina, 25 July 1960. Education: Michigan State University, B.A. 1982; Oxford University, M. Phil. 1989. Agent: Henry Durlow, Harold Ober and Associates, 425 Madison Avenue, New York, New York 10017, U.S.A. Address: c/o St. Martin's Press, Inc., 175 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York 10010, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Emma Who Saved My Life. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1989. Gospel. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1993. Show World: A Novel. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1998.

* * *

Wilton Barnhardt is an epochal novelist, targeting phases, periods, decades. In his first novel, Emma Who Saved My Life, Gil narrates his twenties-life through the 1970s (Barnhardt was born in 1960, so these historical backdrops are archival, not personal). There is a beginning chapter which grounds time present in Evanston, post-1984 (although Barnhardt stays well away from the resonances of that year) then successive chapters devoted to his New York years from 1974 through 1983. Gil fled college for New York, and an acting career. He moves in with Lisa, a girl he had a crush on in college, and her unusual friend Emma, whom he falls in love with as well.

This is a narrated book, with characters who are friends because they tell funny stories about themselves to each other. Gil's story is about trying to rise up through menial roles and depressing insights into the theatre world. We get a thorough review of Brooklyn life which is balanced between fun and depression. Gil eventually reaches a level of success which his friends credit, but he also realizes that he is not a great talent, which turns him back home.

Part of the novel's quality is its durable self-regulation. Gil finds himself pursued by a woman well beyond his usual company, who does everything thoroughly and stylishly. He doesn't understand her interest in him, but it doesn't destabilize him either. At a party she gives, he meets an old boyfriend of hers she has invited as well, who makes him see that his time is nearly up. In one of the most somber points in the book, Gil finds out from him that Connie has herpes. Gil doesn't pretend it doesn't hurt him, but he also tells us that it formalizes his nonsexual friendship with Emma.

Finally, Gil does not chew the curtains as he realizes he is only acting at acting. He takes one last look at New York with Emma, and concludes back in the present time of the book's composition, as he and his wife wait for their baby in Evanston.

One could not anticipate the gargantuan Gospel from anything Barnhardt had written, yet it too can be seen as a chronicle of an epoch, of the Gulf War period as the "End Times" prophesied by all the religions of Abraham. Lucy Dantan is a graduate student in theology at the University of Chicago. The chair of her department sends her to Oxford (there are no fellow faculty he would trust) to bring back Dr. O'Hanrahan, an emeritus faculty and former chair whose drinking and quixotic scholarship threatens the reputation of his department. O'Hanrahan is on the trail of the lost gospel of Matthias. Religious, political, and academic agents follow him (and her) to Oxford, County Antrim, Florence, Assisi, Rome, Puglia, Athens, Holy Mt. Athos, Piraeus, Jerusalem, Aswan, the Nile, Khartoum, Gonder, Addis Ababa, and The Promised Land (a PTLtype college-hospital-retirement village in Philadelphia, Louisiana). Each group chasing them seeks the lost gospel to change the world for the last time. Yet the individual scholars and learned theologians surrounded by vested interests are mostly full of concern and forgiveness for each other. Lucy and O'Hanrahan gradually come to trust in each other.

Beginning the novel, and interspersed within these chapters, are sections of the lost gospel, a homely and despairing account of his trial of faith the disciple Matthias (who replaced Judas) dictates to be sent to his brother Josephus.

A recurring narrative device of a divine voice speaking back to Lucy and O'Hanrahan's silent ruminations, which at times runs the danger of descending into the George Burns "Oh God" shtick, becomes impressive at the end. Although there are erudite footnotes to Matthias's gospel detailing the Church's rewriting of Sophia, the female principle of wisdom, into the (male) Holy Spirit, and the novel's dedication to Barnhardt's mother and two other female relatives at the beginning, it is not until the end of this long novel that we fully understand that it is Sophia (not the Father) whose voice they hear.

Show World, Barnhardt's latest novel, features the 1990s, when the economy has insured that those usually hired last will be first: Humanities majors are perfect for the worlds of Washington and Hollywood, where nothing is made, everything is public, hyped, shown. Samantha Flint escapes Missouri by going to Smith College, remaking herself. Her college roommate Mimi Mohr approves her skeptical understanding of public identities, and introduces her to the spectacle of Manhattan. Samantha follows her there after graduating, entering the world of public relations.

A contact she makes with a senator at a charity affair in New York gets too much publicity for her client, embarrassing her boss who sent her there in her place, but the senator makes her his legislative director after she has served on his staff a few years in Washington. When he announces his retirement, she realizes she can not give up the public power, and she signs on as legislative director for the man who wins his seat, a right-wing yahoo whose signature causes against homosexual rights and other liberal interests are compromised by his son's accidental death within an autoerotic cult at military school.

When her senator ignores her advice for a speech that could transcend his difficulties, she gives him over to the scandal press, which finishes her in Washington. She follows Mimi out to Hollywood, but her growing dependence on drugs matches the destructive and suicidal culture of Hollywood agency culture. She marries a client of Mimi's as a cover for his homosexuality, but she cares as little for him as anyone else. When her husband dies in a homosexual orgy in a Las Vegas hotel, she becomes the hunted victim of the public attention she has managed throughout her life, and her body finally detonates under the conflicting effects of the drugs she uses. Before it chronicles Samantha's life beginning at Smith in 1978, the novel began with a note from Samantha to Mimi dated 1998, mailing her the file of everything she has ever written, and it effectively closes with an essay dated 1978, which she decided not to present to her college writing class as too self-revelatory: a pastoral afternoon playing as hard as she can with her rural cousins, holding hands.

-William Johnsen

BARRETT, Andrea

Nationality: American. Born: 16 November 1954. Education: Union College, Schenectady, New York, 1974, B.S. in Biology. Career: Faculty, Northlight Writers' Conference, Moorhead, Minnesota, 1988–89, and Mount Holyoke Writers' Conference, 1991–93; senior fiction fellow, New York State Summer Writers' Institute, Skidmore College, 1993; faculty, Warren Wilson MFA Program for Writers, 1993-98, 2000; faculty, Yellow Bay Writers' Workshop, University of Montana, 1995, Bread Loaf Writers' Conference, 1996–97, 1999, and Napa Valley Writers' Conference, 1996; adjunct lecturer, University of Michigan, 1995. Visiting writer, Saint Mary's College, California, 1998, and University of Virginia, 1999. Awards: National Endowment for the Arts fellowship, 1992; Peden prize for best short fiction, Missouri Review, 1995; Distinguished Story citation, Best American Short Stories, 1995; fiction prize, The Southern Review, 1996, Los Angeles Times Book Prize, finalist, 1996, and National Book Award, 1996, all for Ship Fever and Other Stories; Pushcart prize, 1997, for "The Forest"; Guggenheim fellowship, 1997; Salon Magazine book award, 1998, American Library Association Notable Book, 1999, and Lillian Fairchild award, 1999, all for The Voyage of Narwhal. Agent: c/o Wendy Weil Literary Agency, 232 Madison Avenue, Suite 1300, New York, New York 10016 USA. Address: 243 Berkeley Street, Rochester, New York 14607, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Lucid Stars. New York, Delta/Delacorte Press, 1988.

Secret Harmonies. New York, Delacorte Press, 1989.

The Middle Kingdom. New York, Pocket Books, 1991.

The Forms of Water. New York, Pocket Books, 1993.

The Voyage of the Narwhal. New York, W. W. Norton, 1998.

Short Stories

Ship Fever and Other Stories. New York, W. W. Norton, 1996.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Secret Harmonies," in Northwest Review (Eugene, Oregon), vol. 23, no. 3, 1985.
- "Animal Magic," in Prairie Schooner (Lincoln, Nebraska), vol. 61, no. 1, 1987.
- "Here at the Starlight Motel," in Michigan Quarterly Review (Ann Arbor), vol. 26, no. 4, 1987.
- "Escaped Alone to Tell," in Willow Springs (Cheney, Washington), no. 24, 1989.
- "The Seducer," in Mademoiselle (New York), October 1989.
- "The Church of New Reason," in American Short Fiction (Austin, Texas), no. 1, 1991; reprinted in American Voices: Best Short Fiction by Contemporary Authors, selected by Sally Arteseros, New York, Hyperion, 1992.
- "The Forms of Water," in American Short Fiction (Austin, Texas), no. 6, 1992.
- "The Littoral Zone," in Story (Cincinnati, Ohio), Spring 1993; reprinted in The Norton Anthology of Short Fiction, edited by R.V. Cassill and Richard Bausch, 6th edition, New York, W. W. Norton, 2000.
- "Out Here," in American Short Fiction (Austin, Texas), no. 12, Winter 1993.
- "The English Pupil," in Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Louisiana), January 1994; reprinted in The Second Penguin Book of Modern Women's Short Stories, London, Viking, 1997.

- "The Behavior of the Hawkseeds," in Missouri Review (Columbia), vol. XVII, no. 1, 1994; reprinted in The Best American Short Stories, 1995, edited by Jane Smiley, Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1995
- "Agnes at Night," in Story (Cincinnati, Ohio), Fall 1994.
- "The Marburg Sisters," in New England Review (Middlebury, Vermont), Fall 1994.
- "Rare Bird," in The Writing Path 1: Poetry and Prose from Writers"

  Conferences, edited by Michael Pettit, University of Iowa Press, 1995.
- "Soroche," in Story (Cincinnati, Ohio), Autumn 1995.
- "The Mysteries of Ubiquitin," in Story (Cincinnati, Ohio), Summer 1996.
- "The Forest," in Ploughshares (Boston, Massachusetts), Winter 1996; reprinted in The 1998 Pushcart Prize XXII: Best of the Small Presses, an Annual Small Press Reader, Wainscott, New York, Pushcart Press. 1997.
- "Blue Dress," in I've Always Meant to Tell You: Letters to Our Mothers, edited by Constance Warloe, New York, Pocket Books, 1907
- "Breathing Under Ice," in Outside, October 1998.
- "Theories of Rain," in Southern Review (Baton Rouge, Lousiana), Summer 1999.
- "The Door," in Story (Cincinnati, Ohio), Autumn 1999.
- "Servants of the Map," in Salmagundi (Saratoga Springs, New York), Fall 1999–Winter 2000.
- "Why We Go," in New York Times Magazine, 6 June 1999.

Other

Introduction, The Widow's Children by Paula Fox. New York, W. W. Norton, 1999.

Introduction, "Paula's Case" by Willa Cather, in The Norton Anthology of Short Fiction, edited by R.V. Cassill and Richard Bausch, 6th edition, New York, W. W. Norton, 2000.

Introduction, Weird and Tragic Shores: The Story of Charles Francis Hall, Explorer by Chauncy Loomis, New York, Modern Library, 2000.

* * *

Andrea Barrett writes highly researched literary fictions that explore human character and relationships through the language and lens of science. Her work has been critically acclaimed and, with her fifth and sixth publications, popularly successful. Her works have progressed from close-in, intimate portraits of modern-day American families to stories that encompass a wider scope in history, geography, and theme. In Lucid Stars and Secret Harmonies Barrett focused on the struggles and quest for selfhood of young female characters within the contexts of dysfunctional families. With The Middle Kingdom and The Forms of Water she moved out to engage other characters and places, while continuing to examine and illuminate the relationships of individuals to one another, to the world, and to themselves with notable intelligence and depth. Barrett's next work, the collection of stories entitled Ship Fever, moved her characterdriven writing into a more complex realm of history and science, a journey that the novel The Voyage of the Narwhal continued.

Voyage of the Narwhal, in telling the story of a nineteenth century sailing expedition to the Arctic and its consequences, recasts classical adventure narrative through the experiences of characters not generally heard from in such texts. Barrett unfolds the journey through the eyes of several characters, but chiefly those of Erasmus Darwin Wells, a reticent, disappointed naturalist, and Alexandra, a woman of scientific mind who longs to go on an expedition but remains at home in Philadelphia as companion to Erasmus's sister. The journey is as much into the complicated landscapes of human ambition, desire, and regret as it is into the expanse and detail of the harsh, beautiful environment of the Arctic, life aboard ship, and life as a woman in the mid-nineteenth century. Erasmus and Alexandra are both of a scholarly mind, interested in understanding how life, in the articulation of living flora and fauna, works; they are, like many of Barrett's characters, people who name and order the world in order to illuminate and know it. In opposition to Erasmus is the leader of the expedition, a young man who, in his lack of will to see or understand anything but his own ambition—in which he resembles the traditional protagonists of classical adventure narratives—cuts a course that leaves loss and death in its wake.

Though Barrett expresses surprise that people view Voyage of the Narwhal as an adventure tale, she does admit that she sees both science and writing as a sort of adventure, and physical exploration as an excellent metaphor for both. She is fascinated with the history of science, its language and way of viewing the world, and this is reflected in all her work, though nowhere so keenly and successfully as in Voyage of the Narwhal and the short stories in Ship Fever, each a thoughtful meditation on science and scientists, whether historic or contemporary.

This preoccupation, not yet fully realized, is nevertheless evident in her earlier works. A tradition of astronomy, of naming the stars, and charting and exploring the heavens as a means of charting one's life, is handed on from one generation to the next and one side of a broken family to the other by the women in Lucid Stars. The language of music, of composers, and of secret musical codes is the thread that weaves together the characters in Secret Harmonies. It is science that brings together the protagonist of The Middle Kingdom and her husband and brings them to China, and it is science and medicine that in part bring her together with Dr. Yu, the Chinese woman who helps her turn her life around.

The influence of scientists like Charles Darwin and Gregor Mendel, of nineteenth-century scientific journals and naturalists' texts, is evident not only in Barrett's themes and characters but in the thoroughgoing research and meticulous observation of detail in her writing. This meticulousness, which is so potent in Voyage, on occasion makes her earlier novels seem too slow and fails to provide a sense of meaningful result or insight, rather like a failed experiment. It is in the turn to scientists, naturalists, and people consumed by theories and phenomenon of the observable world as her protagonists that Barrett's work gains its most rewarding power and intensity.

Examining Barrett's short stories in connection to Voyage of the Narwhal reveals further nuances of her preoccupation with the themes of science and imagination with regard to what might be termed the chemistry of self as her particular field of inquiry. In "Theories of Rain" a girl raised by two women who write science texts for children correlates the phenomena of mist, rain, meteor showers, and various relationships and behaviors of the scientific men in her life as though she is reading barometric pressures in order to form an understanding of her life. In "The English Pupil" the Swedish naturalist Carolus Linnaeus, who developed modern taxonomy, loses the names and order of his own life as the chemistry of his brain loses cohesion. In "Rare Bird" the character of Sarah Anne Billopp, an ornithologist who sets out to refute a theory of Linnaeus's, foreshadows the character of Alexandra in Voyage of the Narwhal in that she, too, in following her mind's passion, breaks from the traditional female role she had been occupying.

Barrett is a writer of unfailing intelligence and integrity with a knack for getting inside her characters' minds and emotions. Her earlier work, focusing largely on the struggles of women to find their place in life, is at times uneven, but she has secured a place for herself in literature with works that bring together science and imagination with history and character in insightful, rewarding narratives. Her writing is marked by a clear prose and authoritative detail. Her language articulates theories of self and human relations in which the desire to realize order out of chaos, to name and understand life, emotions, and the world around them makes her characters very human indeed.

-Jessica Reisman

BARSTOW, Stan(ley)

Nationality: British. Born: Horbury, Yorkshire, 28 June 1928. Education: Ossett Grammar School. Family: Married Constance Mary Kershaw in 1951; one son and one daughter. Career: Draftsman and sales executive in the engineering industry, 1944–62. Lives in Hawath, West Yorkshire. Awards: Writers Guild award, 1974; Royal Television Society award, 1975. M.A.: Open University, Milton Keynes, Buckinghamshire, 1982. Honorary Fellow, Bretton Hall College, Wakefield Yorkshire, 1985. Agent: Lemon Unna and Durbridge Ltd., 24 Pottery Lane, London W11 4LZ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Kind of Loving: The Vic Brown Trilogy. London, Joseph, 1981.
A Kind of Loving. London, Joseph, 1960; New York, Doubleday, 1961.

The Watchers on the Shore. London, Joseph, 1966; New York, Doubleday, 1967.

The Right True End. London, Joseph, 1976.

Ask Me Tomorrow. London, Joseph, 1962.

Joby. London, Joseph, 1964.

A Raging Calm. London, Joseph, 1968; as The Hidden Part, New York, Coward McCann, 1969.

A Brother's Tale. London, Joseph, 1980.

Just You Wait and See. London, Joseph, 1986.

B-movie. London, Joseph, 1987.

Give Us This Day. London, Joseph, 1989.

Next of Kin. London and New York, Joseph, 1991.

Short Stories

The Desperadoes. London, Joseph, 1961.

The Human Element and Other Stories, edited by Marilyn Davies. London, Longman, 1969.

A Season with Eros. London, Joseph, 1971.

A Casual Acquaintance and Other Stories, edited by Marilyn Davies. London, Longman, 1976.

The Glad Eye and Other Stories. London, Joseph, 1984.

Plays

Ask Me Tomorrow, with Alfred Bradley, adaptation of the novel by Barstow (produced Sheffield, 1964). London, French, 1966.

A Kind of Loving, with Alfred Bradley, adaptation of the novel by Barstow (broadcast 1964; produced Sheffield, 1965). London, Blackie, 1970.

An Enemy of the People, adaptation of a play by Ibsen (produced Harrogate, Yorkshire, 1969). London, Calder, 1977.

Listen for the Trains, Love, music by Alex Glasgow (produced Sheffield, 1970).

Stringer's Last Stand, with Alfred Bradley (produced York, 1971).

We Could Always Fit a Sidecar (broadcast 1974). Published in Out of the Air: Five Plays for Radio, edited by Alfred Bradley, London, Blackie, 1977.

Joby, adaptation of his own novel (televised 1975). London, Blackie, 1977.

The Human Element, and Albert's Part (televised 1977). London, Blackie, 1984.

Radio Plays: A Kind of Loving, from his own novel, 1964; The Desperadoes, from his own story, 1965; The Watchers on the Shore, from his own novel, 1971; We Could Always Fit a Sidecar, 1974; The Right True End, from his own novel, 1978; The Apples of Paradise, 1988; Foreign Parts, 1990.

Television Plays: The Human Element, 1964; The Pity of It All, 1965; A World Inside (documentary), with John Gibson, 1966; A Family at War (1 episode), 1970; Mind You, I Live Here (documentary), with John Gibson, 1971; A Raging Calm, from his own novel, 1974; South Riding, from the novel by Winifred Holtby, 1974; Joby, from his own novel, 1975; The Cost of Loving, 1977; The Human Element, 1977; Albert's Part, 1977; Travellers, 1978; A Kind of Loving, from his own novels, 1981; A Brother's Tale, from his own novel, 1983; The Man Who Cried, from the novel by Catherine Cookson, 1993.

Other

Editor, Through the Green Woods: An Anthology of Contemporary Writing about Youth and Children. Leeds, E.J. Arnold, 1968.

*

Stan Barstow comments:

Came to prominence about the same time as several other novelists from North of England working-class backgrounds, viz. John Braine, Alan Sillitoe, David Storey, Keith Waterhouse, and saw with satisfaction, and occasional irritation, the gains made in the opening up of the regions and the "elevation" of the people into fit subjects for fictional portrayal absorbed into the popular cultures of the cinema and TV drama series and comedy shows. Still, living in the provinces and using mainly regional settings, consider myself non-metropolitan oriented. The publication of some of my work in the U.S. and its translation into several European languages reassures me that I have not resisted the neurotic trendiness of much metropolitan culture for the sake of mere provincial narrowness; and the knowledge that some of the finest novels in the language are "regional" leads me to the belief that to hoe one's own row diligently, thus seeking out the universal in the particular, brings more worthwhile satisfactions than the frantic pursuit of a largely phony jet-age internationalism.

(1995) As I review this comment in 1995, reading flourishes, yet the mainstream literary novel has a harder time than ever in the world of the "celebrity" novel, where fortunes are regularly made by doing badly what others have spent their working lives trying to do well.

* * *

It is never easy for the author of a best-selling first novel to come to terms with its success. All too often, publishers demand a sequel, or at the very least another novel written in the same vein, in an attempt to recreate the formula. Stan Barstow is one of the few novelists who has managed to keep intact the mold of their first success and then to have built upon it. Following the appearance of A Kind of Loving in 1960, he created a trilogy around Vic Brown, the driven central character who finds himself struggling against the odds in a tough and no-nonsense world. Written at the tail-end of the 1950s, when Britain was entering its first sustained period of postwar prosperity, it is very much a novel of its times. It also reflected a sense of proletarian evangelism: it was as if Barstow was desperate to write about real lives and real events, things normally ignored by the literary world at the time. Although the background was supplied by the potentially grim northern town of Cressley, this was not a joyless fortress but a living place whose inhabitants had created a close-knit community. In many ways too, Cressley was a metaphor for what was happening at the time, as its population seemed to be unaware of the shift that was slowly eroding their existences. Vic is told this in terms that could be said to be prophetic: "But we're all living in a fool's paradise, that all. A fool's paradise, Vic. Full employment and business booming? It just isn't possible, lad. Don't say I didn't warn you when the crash comes."

Barstow's ability to grasp the moment and record it in fictional terms is typical of the way in which he attacks a novel. Tom Simpkins, caught up in a love affair in A Raging Calm, is aware of the possibilities that lie outside his own existence and wants to enjoy them but is also painfully aware of the inhibitions that have helped to shape his life and to give meaning to his sense of morality. (Here it is worth acknowledging that Barstow is particularly responsive to all the complexities for romantic and physical love and does not shirk from attempting to understand the motives for adultery, broken affairs, divorce and unhappiness.) With his ability to allow the narrative to unfold through the development of his main characters, it is little wonder that A Raging Calm was later transformed into an equally successful television play.

That Barstow was content to remain within the confines of a world which he knew best—the West Riding of Yorkshire—and with characters whom he understood—the working class of northern England—has been made abundantly clear by his later output. His trilogy of novels about the Palmer family during World War II is a good example—Just You Wait and See, Give Us This Day, and Next of Kin. The setting of the small Yorkshire town of Daker, another close-knit community of millhands and colliers, is a resonant background for a wide range of ordinary people who find themselves caught up, willy-nilly, in the maelstrom of war. By far the most notable of these is Ella, a mature 23-year-old who comes to prominence in Give Us This Day—the anxieties and hardships she has to face give the meaning to the book's title. A young war bride, she discovers that marriage means having to cope with the absence of her husband Walter as she struggles to make a home which they can enjoy once the war is over. Without ever descending into sentimentality, Barstow carefully recreates the tender embarrassment that invades their lives when they meet, and one of the novel's highlights is a firmly constructed set-piece scene in which Walter comes home on leave and the young couple have to rediscover one another all over again.

Mature and single-minded beyond her years, Ella is the still presence at the novel's center, and around her the other characters act almost like a chorus to record the desperate events of a world—their world, in the town of Daker—that has been plunged into war. One of the most memorable moments in the novel is Barstow's description of a mass air-raid on Sheffield that Ella and her mother witness from a train. "None of the pain and loss in her life had prepared her for the vast faceless malice of last night; for sitting in that train while the sky lit up, the bombs fell, the ground shook beneath her. And all the time, behind, in the middle of it, people they knew, whom they had only just left behind."

In its successor, Next of Kin, an older Ella has to struggle even harder to preserve her independence and to adjust to the privations of being a war widow. Although she revives a relationship with a former lover, Howard Strickland, he remains a shadowy figure who only brings new pressures into her life. As in the previous two novels, a key feature is Barstow's unerring ability to bring alive the atmosphere of life in a northern provincial town. A born storyteller, Barstow also underscores all his writing with a genuine love for the characters he has created

B-movie finds Barstow breaking new ground with a short novel written in the manner of a 1950s crime thriller. Opening with the murder and robbery of a pawnbroker in a Northern town, it shifts focus to the two leading characters, young men on holiday in Blackpool. As the two friends form relationships with local girls and news filters through of the murder in their home town, the tension rises and events move to a shocking conclusion. The fact that most readers would recognize the murderer at an early stage does not in any way detract from the power of the plot, core of which is the changed relationship between close friends who are suddenly revealed as strangers, and the life-and-death decisions that are forced upon them.

B-movie, like the Palmer trilogy, is an excellent example of its form, but in both works Barstow transcends genres to produce something of his own. His writing refuses to fit into pigeon-holes, remaining what it has always been, tough and honest and true to itself.

-Trevor Royle, updated by Geoff Sadler

BARTH, John (Simmons)

Nationality: American. Born: Cambridge, Maryland, 27 May 1930. Education: The Juilliard School of Music, New York; Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, A.B. 1951, M.A. 1952. Family: Married 1) Ann Strickland in 1950 (divorced 1969), one daughter and two sons; 2) Shelly Rosenberg in 1970. Career: Junior instructor in English, Johns Hopkins University, 1951–53; instructor, 1953–56, assistant professor, 1957–60, and associate professor of English, 1960–65, Pennsylvania State University, University Park; professor of English, 1965–71, and Butler Professor, 1971–73, State University of New York, Buffalo; Centennial Professor of English and Creative Writing, Johns Hopkins University, 1973–91, professor emeritus, 1991—. Awards: Brandeis University Creative Arts award, 1965; Rockefeller grant, 1965; American Academy grant, 1966; National Book award, 1973. Litt. D.: University of Maryland, College Park, 1969; F. Scott Fitzgerald Award, 1997; PEN/Malamud Award, 1998; Lannan Literary Awards lifetime achievement award, 1998. Member: American Academy, 1977, and American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 1977. Agent: Wylie Aitken and Stone, 250 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10107. Address: c/o Writing Seminars, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Maryland 21218, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Floating Opera. New York, Appleton Century Crofts, 1956; revised edition, New York, Doubleday, 1967; London, Secker and Warburg, 1968.

The End of the Road. New York, Doubleday, 1958; London, Secker and Warburg, 1962; revised edition, Doubleday, 1967.

The Sot-Weed Factor. New York, Doubleday, 1960; London, Secker and Warburg, 1961; revised edition, Doubleday, 1967.

Giles Goat-Boy; or, The Revised New Syllabus. New York, Doubleday, 1966; London, Secker and Warburg, 1967.

Letters. New York, Putnam, 1979; London, Secker and Warburg, 1980.

Sabbatical: A Romance. New York, Putnam, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1982.

The Tidewater Tales: A Novel. New York, Putnam, 1987; London, Methuen, 1988.

The Last Voyage of Somebody the Sailor. Boston, Little Brown, 1991. Once Upon a Time: A Floating Opera. Boston, Little Brown, 1994.

Short Stories

Lost in the Funhouse: Fiction for Print, Tape, Live Voice. New York, Doubleday, 1968; London, Secker and Warburg, 1969.

Chimera. New York, Random House, 1972; London, Deutsch, 1974.Todd Andrews to the Author. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1979.

On with the Story: Stories. Boston, Little, Brown, 1996.

Other

The Literature of Exhaustion, and The Literature of Replenishment (essays). Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1982.

The Friday Book: Essays and Other Nonfiction. New York, Putnam, 1984.

Don't Count on It: A Note on the Number of the 1001 Nights. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1984.

Further Fridays: Essays, Lectures, and Other Nonfiction, 1984–1994. Boston, Little Brown, 1995. Contributor, Innovations: An Anthology of Modern and Contemporary Fiction, edited by Robert L. McLaughlin. Normal, Illinois, Dalkey Archive Press, 1998.

Introduction, Not-Knowing: The Essays and Interviews of Donald Barthelme by Kim Herzinger. New York, Random House, 1997.

*

Bibliography: John Barth: A Descriptive Primary and Annotated Secondary Bibliography by Josephy Weixlmann, New York, Garland, 1976; John Barth: An Annotated Bibliography by Richard Allan Vine, Metuchen, New Jersey, Scarecrow Press, 1977; John Barth, Jerzy Kosinski, and Thomas Pynchon: A Reference Guide by Thomas P. Walsh and Cameron Northouse, Boston, Hall, 1977.

Manuscript Collection: Library of Congress, Washington, D.C.

Critical Studies: John Barth by Gerhard Joseph, Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1970; John Barth: The Comic Sublimity of Paradox by Jac Tharpe, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1974; The Literature of Exhaustion: Borges, Nabokov, and Barth by John O. Stark, Durham, North Carolina, Duke University Press, 1974; John Barth: An Introduction by David Morrell, University Park, Pennsylvania State University Press, 1976; Critical Essays on John Barth edited by Joseph J. Waldmeir, Boston, Hall, 1980; Passionate Virtuosity: The Fiction of John Barth by Charles B. Harris, Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1983; John Barth by Heide Ziegler, London, Methuen, 1987; Understanding John Barth by Stan Fogel and Gordon Slethaug, Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1990; A Reader's Guide to John Barth by Zack Bowen, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1994; John Barth and the Anxiety of Continuance by Patricia Tobin. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1992; Death in the Funhouse: John Barth and the Poststructuralist Aesthetics by Alan Lindsay, New York, P. Lang, 1995; Transcending Space: Architectural Places in Works by Henry David Thoreau, E.E. Cummings, and John Barth by Taimi Olsen, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, Bucknell University Press, 2000.

* * *

John Barth is often called one of the most important American novelists of the twentieth century. He combines the kind of experimentation associated with postmodernist writing with a mastery of the skills demanded of the traditional novelist. A progression toward postmodernism may be traced in his works from the more traditional treatments of his earlier books—The Floating Opera, The End of the Road, and The Sot-Weed Factor—to the wild experimentation that characterizes such works as Giles Goat-Boy, Chimera, Letters, and especially Lost in the Funhouse. In Sabbatical, he returns to the more traditional kind of narrative, with the added postmodernist twist that the novel itself is supposed to be the work produced by the two central characters in it. In The Tidewater Tales, too, the novel is supposed to be the work of one of the central characters. In fact, The Tidewater Tales combines many of the elements of postmodern fiction, including an awareness of itself as fiction, with the strong story line associated with more traditional novels. Barth's works after Tidewater Tales—The Last Voyage of Somebody the Sailor and Once Upon a Time—also involve many elements of postmodernist fiction, especially Once Upon a Time, in which the narrator constantly reminds the reader that the work is a piece of fiction.

Although Barth denies that he engages in experimentation for its own sake, the stories in Lost in the Funhouse give that appearance. Subtitled Fiction for Print, Tape, Live Voice, the work marks Barth's embrace of the world of the postmodern in which fiction and reality, and fictitious characters and the authors that produce them, become indistinguishable and in which consistent suspension of disbelief becomes almost impossible. Barth's insistence that some of the stories in this "series," as he calls it, were not composed "expressly for print" and thus "make no sense unless heard in live or recorded voices" is questionable, since they are in print and presumably the author did compose them in written form. Nonetheless, they show Barth's versatility with various fictional forms. Still, even if Barth really intended a story like "Echo," the eighth in the series, only for live or recorded voice, it is difficult to determine whether it is profound or merely full of gimmickry.

Barth calls Letters "an old time epistolary novel," yet it is anything but old-fashioned. In this monumental work, the author himself becomes a fictitious character with whom his "fictitious drolls and dreamers," many of whom are drawn from Barth's earlier works, correspond concerning their often funny yet sometimes horrifying problems. The letters they exchange gradually reveal the convoluted plot that involves abduction, possible incest, and suicide. That postmodernism may have reached a dead end in this book is something Barth himself seems to have recognized with his return to a more traditional form in Sabbatical, a novel with an easily summarizable plot involving clearly defined characters. The Tidewater Tales, too, has a very strong story line, yet like Letters, it has some characters familiar from other works by Barth, including the "real" authors of Sabbatical. It also includes a thinly disguised version of Barth himself, called Djean, familiar from Chimera, as well as many characters from other pieces of literature, including Ulysses and Nausicaa (also known as the Dmitrikakises), Don Quixote (called Donald Quicksoat), and Scheherazade, who is more closely modeled on the Scheherazade of Barth's Chimera than on the heroine of the Arabian Nights.

Along with Barth's movement from modernism to postmodernism may be traced a movement from what he calls "the literature of exhaustion" to what he calls "the literature of replenishment." The antiheroes of his earlier works—Todd Andrews, Jake Horner, and Ebenezer Cooke—give way to the genuinely heroic protagonist of Giles Goat-Boy, a book of epic dimensions containing a central figure and plot modeled largely on myths of various heroes, both pagan and Christian. This work may prove to be one of the most important pieces of literature of the twentieth century. The central character, Giles himself, may be lacking a human father (quite probably he was fathered by the computer that controls the world of the novel). As the book unfolds, he proceeds without hesitation to fulfill his typically heroic destiny to "Pass All Fail All." Whatever victories he achieves are, of course, ambiguous, and his existence is left in doubt.

The part of the book involving the actual narrative of events in the life of George Giles is entitled "R. N. S. The Revised New Syllabus of George Giles OUR GRAND TUTOR Being the Autobiographical and Hortatory Tapes Read Out at New Tammany College to His Son Giles (,) Stoker By the West Campus Automatic Computer and by Him Prepared for the Furtherment of the Gilesian Curriculum." It contains a kind of comic, cosmic new testament, a collection of sacred-profane writings designed to guide future students in the university world in which the body of the novel is set. Narrating the life and adventures of George Giles, the goat-boy of the title, it recounts his intellectual, political, and sexual exploits. The introductory material to the "Revised New Syllabus," consisting of a "Publisher's Disclaimer," with notes from Editors A through D and written by "The Editor-in-Chief"; the "Cover-Letter to the Editors and Publisher," written by "This regenerate Seeker after Answers, J. B."; the "Posttape" as well as the "Postscript to the Posttape," again written by J. B.; and the "Footnote to the Postscript," written by "Ed.," are all part of this fiction.

From the paralysis of a Jacob Horner in The End of the Road to the action of a Giles is a long stride. Horner is paralyzed, he claims, because he suffers from "cosmopsis," "the cosmic view" in which "one is frozen like the bullfrog when the hunter's light strikes him full in the eyes, only with cosmopsis there is no hunter, and no quick hand to terminate the moment—there's only the light." An infinite number of possibilities leads to a paralyzing inability to choose any one. The same kind of cosmic view, however, causes no problem for George Giles, who, when unable to choose between existing possibilities, unhesitatingly creates his own, as he does when he first leaves the barn to seek his destiny in the outside world. Heroically, George realizes that he "had invented myself as I'd elected my name," and he accepts responsibility not only for himself but also for his world.

In Sabbatical and The Tidewater Tales, Barth draws heavily on the folklore of the Chesapeake Bay and the CIA. In the former, he writes of the end of a year-long sailing voyage taken by Fenwick, an ex-CIA agent, and Susan, a college professor, in order to decide what they will do with their lives. Their problem's resolution seems trite and unconvincing, but their path toward that resolution is interesting. Like Chimera, Sabbatical is a twentieth-century fairy tale, ending with the statement that the two central characters "lived/Happily after, to the end/Of Fenwick and Susie. ...*" The rhyme is completed in the footnote: "*Susan./Fenn." Obviously, in this work too it is often difficult to distinguish gimmickry and profundity. Sentimentality also pervades The Tidewater Tales, essentially the story of the ending of Peter Sagamore's writing block, as he and his pregnant wife travel the Chesapeake Bay on their sailboat named Story.

The Last Voyage of Somebody the Sailor is set partially and Once Upon a Time is set mostly on the Chesapeake Bay. Both are pieces of fantasy, the former loosely structured on the seven voyages of Sinbad the Sailor as told by Scheherazade in 1001 Arabian Nights. Both are also structured, Barth claims in Once Upon a Time, on the hero quest, which he calls the Ur-myth. In fact, in Once Upon a Time, the narrator, who may also be the author, says that all of his works since The Sot-Weed Factor are variations on the Ur-myth, even though he claims not to have known about the myth when he wrote The Sot-Weed Factor.

Both The Last Voyage of Somebody the Sailor and Once Upon a Time draw largely on the author's life, so much so that the latter repeats many things from the former. The latter pretends to be autobiography masquerading as fiction, but it may be fiction masquerading as autobiography. At any rate, it recounts what its narrator claims both is and is not Barth's early life, his education, his two marriages, his teaching career, and the writing of his books and stories.

Barth then is one of the most important figures in twentiethcentury American literature. He has consistently been at the forefront of literary experimentation, consequently producing works occasionally uneven and, as a result of his particular type of experimentation, occasionally too self-consciously witty. Still, he has produced some works that are now ranked and probably will continue to be ranked among the best of this century.

-Richard Tuerk

BARTHELME, Frederick

Nationality: American. Born: Houston, Texas, 10 October 1943; brother of the writer Donald Barthelme. Education: Tulane University, New Orleans, 1961–62; University of Houston, 1962–65, 1966–67; Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore (teaching fellow; Coleman Prose award, 1977), 1976-77, M.A. 1977. Career: Architectural draftsman, Jerome Oddo and Associates, and Kenneth E. Bentsen Associates, both Houston, 1965-66; exhibition organizer, St. Thomas University, Houston, 1966-67; assistant to director, Kornblee Gallery, New York, 1967-68; creative director, BMA Advertising, Houston, 1971–73; senior writer, GDL & W Advertising, Houston, 1973-76. Since 1977 professor of English, director of the Center for Writers, and editor of Mississippi Review, University of Southern Mississippi, Hattiesburg. Visual artist: exhibitions at galleries in Houston, Norman, Oklahoma, New York, Seattle, Vancouver, Buenos Aires, and Oberlin, Ohio, 1965–74. Awards: National Endowment for the Arts fellowship, 1979; University of Southern Mississippi research grant, 1980. Address: Box 5144, Hattiesburg, Mississippi 39406, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

War and War. New York, Doubleday, 1971.

Second Marriage. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1984; London, Dent, 1985.

Tracer. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1985; London, Dent, 1986.
Two Against One. New York, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1988; London, Viking, 1989.

Natural Selection. New York, Viking, 1990.

The Brothers. New York, Viking, 1993.

Painted Desert. New York, Viking, 1995.

Bob the Gambler. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1997.

Short Stories

Rangoon. New York, Winter House, 1970.

Moon Deluxe. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1983; London, Penguin, 1984.

Chroma and Other Stories. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1987; London, Penguin, 1989.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Cooker," in New Yorker, 10 August 1987.
- "Law of Averages," in New Yorker, 5 October 1987.
- "Shopgirls," in Esquire (Japanese edition, Tokyo), August 1988.
- "War with Japan," in New Yorker, 12 December 1988.
- "Driver," in New American Short Stories 2, edited by Gloria Norris. New York, New American Library, 1989.

- "With Ray and Judy," in New Yorker, 24 April 1989.
- "Domestic," in Fiction of the Eighties, edited by Gibbons and Hahn, Chicago, TriQuarterly, 1990.
- "The Philosophers," in Boston Globe Magazine, 22 July 1990.
- "Margaret and Bud," in New Yorker, 15 May 1991.
- "Jackpot," in Frank Magazine, 1992.
- "Retreat," in Epoch, 1993.

Other

Trip (text), photographs by Susan Lipper. New York, Powerhouse, 1999.

Double Down: Reflections on Gambling and Loss (with Steven Barthelme). Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1999.

* * *

Frederick Barthelme's early fiction—Rangoon and War and War—is self-consciously experimental, overly influenced (and greatly overshadowed) by the far more successful work of writers such as his older brother Donald. It was not until more than a decade later, in the 17 stories that comprise Moon Deluxe, that he would begin writing the kind of fiction that would establish him as one of the most interesting of contemporary American writers.

Barthelme's stories have the familiar look of the real world; they are meticulously detailed in such matters as the make and color of the cars the characters drive, the brand names of the products they buy, the names of the places where they live and the restaurants where they eat. On the other hand, they are eerily vague and indistinct about such matters as their location (the general setting is the Sun Belt states along the Gulf Coast), background information about the characters' jobs, their past—sometimes even their own names. Barthelme's fictional world is filled with real objects but empty of meaningful experience; his characters talk about things, but seldom about things that matter.

The stories are typically narrated in present tense by men in their late thirties, either single or divorced, who live alone. Like Camus's Meursault, they report events in a detached, disengaged, almost affectless manner. (Several of the stories are told in second person, which distances the narrator even from himself.) Passive individuals, these men are watchers rather than doers; it is usually the women who are the aggressors, the men responding almost willy-nilly to their advances. These characters reveal so little of their real selves that they are virtually interchangeable from one story to another.

The emptiness of the characters' lives, and the dead tone in which the tales are narrated, combine to make a powerful statement about the loneliness that infects the lives of many who inhabit the modern shopping malls, fast food restaurants, and singles apartment complexes of contemporary suburban America. However, by presenting incidents and dialogue with a decidedly comic touch, Barthelme avoids making his stories as bleak as his characters' lives. The stories also transmit a strong sense of expectation, an unsettling feeling that something dramatic is about to happen (it seldom does). In Moon Deluxe the dull and the routine seem charged with mystery.

Second Marriage is a brilliant comedy of contemporary social and sexual manners, rich in offbeat characters and wickedly funny dialogue. The novel tells the story of a man named Henry (no last name) whose ex-wife Clare moves in with him and his current wife Theo. The two women soon discover they like each other more than they like Henry, so they ask him to move out. The book records with wry humor his goofy experiences following his eviction by his wives.

Henry is in many ways a typical Barthelme character: decent but ineffectual, he finds himself pushed aside, a casualty of the sexual revolution; bewildered, he passes the time watching TV, vacuuming his apartment, cleaning the refrigerator, aimlessly reading magazine articles he doesn't understand. One activity that usually rouses him from his torpor is eating, a favorite pastime for all of Barthelme's characters. None of them especially savors food; going out to eat is simply something to do, a safe way of filling up time, though the fast food they routinely consume is as lacking in nutrition as the tentative relationships they stumble in and out of.

Martin, the narrator of Tracer, moves into the Florida motel-condo operated by his wife Alex's sister Dominica following the breakup of his marriage. He is soon sleeping with Dominica, which complicates matters when both Alex and Dominica's estranged husband Mel show up. Out of this tangled web of relationships Barthelme fashions another of his quirky comedies of modern life.

Tracer is rich in details, incidents, and dialogue which underscore Barthelme's favorite themes of displacement and failed connections. The central symbol of the novel is a P-38 Night Fighter plane which, like Martin, has come to rest on Dominica's property like a lost bird. The dialogue, composed largely of humorous yet pointless monologues, conversational non-sequiturs, and misunderstood statements, is as disconnected as the characters' lives. Even incidents (such as the bizarre episode involving a stranger who takes out a gun and inexplicably begins shooting at the P-38) seem to have become unglued from any sort of logical context.

Two Against One presents another familiar Barthelme triangle. Following a six-month separation, Elise returns to husband Edward on his 40th birthday with a novel suggestion: she wishes to invite her former lover Roscoe, whose wife has been killed in a traffic accident, to move in with the two of them. Sex is not the motivating factor; some sort of connection is. Like the rest of Barthelme's aimless and confused heroes, Edward is uncertain what he should do; though not entirely opposed to the idea, he does not know whether he likes it either.

Like Tracer, Two Against One moves beyond the spare, elliptical quality of Barthelme's earlier fiction. The characters are also portrayed with more empathy, less scorn. They may not have any of the answers, but in contrast to many of their earlier counterparts, they are at least yearning for answers and taking tentative (albeit unorthodox) steps towards finding them.

The aimlessness that afflicts Barthelme's characters, and that is often the source of much of the humor in his books, takes on a decidedly darker hue in Natural Selection. Peter Wexler concludes that he is not terribly happy in his marriage to his second wife, Lily. Wandering the malls and haphazardly driving the freeways temporarily provides a comforting outlet for his uneasiness, as these activities commonly do for Barthelme's characters. But this time the resolution of his marital dilemma comes unexpectedly: in the final scene of the novel, a late-night drive on the freeway with his wife results in a fatal traffic accident. Thus the heartbreak that usually lurks just beneath the comic surface in Barthelme's novels surfaces with sudden impact.

Barthelme is a poet of the mundane who combines the satirist's knack for exposing the ridiculous in contemporary society with a photographer's ability to capture the quotidian details of everyday life. His fiction, situated somewhere between good-humored social satire and documentary realism, both captures the absurdity and celebrates the wonder of the ordinary.

During the late 1990s, he produced two additional works—a novel and a work of narrative nonfiction—that amply illustrate the close relation between the ordinary and extraordinary in the world of Barthelme. Bob the Gambler concerns a Texas architect, Ray Kaiser, drawn into the world of Gulf Coast casinos. For him, losing becomes not a tragedy but a kind of adventure: "I sort of felt it was more exhilarating to lose a lot than to win a little. Losing meant you had to play more, try harder." Barthelme's acquaintance with his subject matter was far more than academic, as revealed in Double Down: Reflections on Gambling and Loss, cowritten with brother Steven (And He Tells the Horse the Whole Story). In the course of researching Bob the Gambler, Barthelme visited a number of casinos; and following the death of their parents, as the Barthelmes reveal, both became full-fledged gambling addicts who "would have been willing to win, but ... were content to lose." The owners of the Grand Casino in Gulfport, Mississippi, however, did not buy this account: they filed suit against the Barthelmes for conspiring with a blackjack dealer to rig games. Indicted in September 1997, the brothers faced up to two years in prison before the Mississippi State Circuit Court dismissed the charges in August 1999.

-David Geherin

BAUMBACH, Jonathan

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 5 July 1933. Education: Brooklyn College, New York, 1951-55, A.B. 1955; Columbia University, New York, 1955-56, M.F.A. 1956; Stanford University, California, 1958-61, Ph.D. 1961. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1956–58. Family: Married 1) Elinor Berkman in 1956 (divorced 1967), one son and one daughter; 2) Georgia A. Brown in 1968 (divorced 1990), two sons. Career: Instructor, Stanford University, 1958-60; instructor, 1961-62, and assistant professor, 1962-64, Ohio State University, Columbus; assistant professor, New York University, 1964–66; associate professor, 1966–70, 1971–72, and since 1972 professor of English, Brooklyn College, City University of New York. Visiting professor, Tufts University, Medford, Massachusetts, 1970–71; University of Washington, Seattle, 1978-79, 1985-86; Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, 1994. Film critic, Partisan Review, New Brunswick, New Jersey, and Boston, 1974-83. Co-founder, 1974, co-director, 1974-78, and currently member of the Board of Directors, Fiction Collective, New York; chair, National Society of Film Critics, 1982-84. Awards: New Republic award, 1958; Yaddo grant, 1963, 1964, 1965; National Endowment for the Arts fellowship, 1967; Guggenheim fellowship, 1978; Ingram Merrill Foundation fellowship, 1983. Agent: Ellen Levine Literary Agency, 432 Park Avenue South, Suite 1205, New York, New York 10016. Address: Brooklyn College, Department of English, Bedford Avenue and Avenue H, Brooklyn, New York 11226, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Man to Conjure With. New York, Random House, 1965; London, Gollancz, 1966.

What Comes Next. New York, Harper, 1968.

Reruns. New York, Fiction Collective, 1974.

Babble. New York, Fiction Collective, 1976.

Chez Charlotte and Emily. New York, Fiction Collective, 1979.

My Father More or Less. New York, Fiction Collective, 1982.

Separate Hours. Boulder, Colorado, Fiction Collective 2, 1990.

Seven Wives: A Romance. Boulder, Colorado, Fiction Collective 2, 1994

D-Tours. Normal, Illinois, FC2, 1998.

Short Stories

The Return of Service. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1979. The Life and Times of Major Fiction. New York, Fiction Collective, 1987.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "You Better Watch Out," in Seems (Sheboygan, Wisconsin), Fall 1978.
- "Neglected Masterpieces III," in Columbia (New York), 1986.
- "The History of Elegance," in Columbia (New York), April 1988.
- "Low Light," in Fiction International (San Diego), Spring 1990.
- "The Mother Murders," in Witness (Farmington Hills, Michigan) Summer-Fall 1990.
- "The Man Who Invented the World," in Film Comment (New York), February 1991.
- "Men at Lunch," in Boulevard, Fall 1991.
- "Stills from Imaginary Movies," in Film Comment, May-June 1991.
- "The Villa Mondare," in Mississippi Review, Spring 1992.
- "The Reading," in Boulevard, Spring 1993.
- "Outlaws," in Georgetown Review, Fall 1993.
- "Bright Is Innocent," in Iowa Review, September 1994.
- "His View of Her View of Him," in Boulevard, Spring 1995.

Play

The One-Eyed Man Is King (produced New York, 1956).

Other

The Landscape of Nightmare: Studies in the Contemporary American Novel. New York, New York University Press, 1965; London, Owen, 1966.

Editor, with Arthur Edelstein, Moderns and Contemporaries: Nine Masters of the Short Story. New York, Random House, 1968; revised edition, 1977.

Editor, Writers as Teachers/Teachers as Writers. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1970.

Editor, Statements: New Fiction from the Fiction Collective. New York, Braziller, 1975.

Editor, with Peter Spielberg, Statements 2: New Fiction. New York, Fiction Collective, 1977.

*

Manuscript Collection: Boston University Library.

Critical Study: The Life of Fiction by Jerome Klinkowitz, Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1977; Writing in a Film Age: Essays by Contemporary Novelists edited by Keith Cohen, Boulder, University Press of Colorado, 1991.

Jonathan Baumbach comments:

Novels are an attempt to make sense out of experience and to make experience out of sense, to eschew the illusion of verisimilitude, to give form to what never existed, not to imitate life but to re-invent it out of language, to imagine the processes of the imagination, to imagine the imagining of the processes of the imagination, involved with cinema, dream, and memory, and the underground landscape of their conjunction.

No theory informs the work. It is what it comes to. My fiction is the illusion of itself.

* * *

A helpful preface to Jonathan Baumbach's fiction is his critical study, The Landscape of Nightmare: Studies in the Contemporary American Novel. Baumbach is representative of a new style of novelist (which includes Ronald Sukenick, Jerzy Kosinski, and William H. Gass), having earned a graduate degree before writing fiction himself. Baumbach's thesis, that "To live in this world, to live consciously in this world in which madness daily passes for sanity is a kind of madness in itself," describes a problem for literary art against which he poses his own fiction as solution. "Unable to believe in the surface (the Life magazine reality) of our world," he argues, "the best of the post-Second-World-War novelists have taken as their terrain the landscape of the psyche." Yet for that "landscape of nightmare" writers such as Bernard Malamud and William Styron were still using techniques more appropriate to social realism. In his own work Baumbach has striven to find a new style suitable for the innovative fiction he writes. As he emphasized to an interviewer in 1973, "I'm not just using the dream in the traditional sense, in the psychological sense where it's an almost compacted parable, with special symbols. I'm just trying to find another way of getting at reality. I mean, my sense is that the conventional novel, for me, anyway, is on its way to a dead end. And I'm trying to get at the way things are in a way that no one has ever seen them before."

Baumbach's first novel, A Man to Conjure With, synthesizes various trends outlined in his critical study. Much like William Styron's Lie Down in Darkness, Baumbach's work has a protagonist who moves simultaneously backward and forward in time, carefully orchestrating revelations of plot and character so that the present is gradually understood in a plausible and convincing way. As a result, the narrative is assembled as a psychological collage; only in the protagonist's final act do all the elements become clear. Baumbach's technical achievement has been to find a structural form that reflects this psychological state: a thoroughly spatial novel.

What Comes Next is a more tightly written exploration of this same structural theme. Again the situation is psychological: a young college student, beset by sexual and parental problems, is "flipping out," and Baumbach's novel expresses this confusion by its very form. Violence erupts on every page, though primarily as mental device, since it is usually sparked by newspaper headlines and fantasized incidents. The book organizes itself as a literal landscape of nightmare, as all reference points for the character's reality are located within his own disjointed perceptions. As far as temporal narrative, "what comes next" is created from the workings of his mind.

Baumbach's subsequent work has been even more strongly experimental. His third novel, Reruns, abandons plot and character entirely in favor of dream-like images from movies rerun page by page. Babble, a novel made up of several 'baby stories' written through the mid-1970s, is more playful but no less daring in its technical achievement. In order to explore the workings of narrative, Baumbach records the stories his infant son allegedly tells him ('His second story is less fresh than the first, though of greater technical sophistication'; 'The robot is after him again, this time disguised as a soda vending machine. 'You can't have any Coke,' the robot says, 'until you wash your face.'''). Once more Baumbach has become the critic in order to fashion a new mode for fiction.

Technical resources for Baumbach's developing style of fiction are discussed in his introduction to Writers as Teachers / Teachers as Writers. Here, speaking as both a fiction writer and a literary critic, he reveals that in creative writing classes one can "talk to the real person, the secret outlaw hiding out in the 'good' student." This outlaw quality distinguishes the narrative artist, whose genius is to be in touch with himself or herself, with the personal voice inside that overcomes the "strategies of evasion" which in fact cover up the idiosyncratic qualities of expression (and therefore of beauty and insight). Such expression cannot be taught, but can only be developed in a context whereby the writer-to-be discovers his or her own talent. The strategies for doing this reflect Baumbach's own experiments in fiction: overcoming the fear of being foolish, learning that it is less important to understand something than appreciating how to live with it, and getting to know how to exist in a community with one's readers. In the process, one must fight against "years and years of systematic depersonalization to get at what's unique and alive." Consequently Baumbach and his contributors emphasize the importance of finding one's personal voice, a strategy that informs the later contributions to a fiction anthology Baumbach co-edited, Moderns and Contemporaries, the second edition of which features personally vocal stories by Grace Paley (also a contributor to the writing book) and Donald Barthelme.

Throughout the 1970s Baumbach continued to experiment with various structures for fiction, including the sub-genre parodies, movie mythologies, and dreamlike obsessions featured throughout his story collection The Return of Service. But it is his fifth novel, Chez Charlotte and Emily, which displays his greatest facility as a writer. Ostensibly the device by which a bored husband and wife communicate with each other (by proposing a narrative and then critiquing it), the novel is actually an excuse (à la The Canterbury Tales) for the telling of stories. Freed from the necessity of plausible context, Baumbach is able to spin out fantasies of shipwreck, sexual adventure, intrigue, and the complexity of human relationships—all as pure writing, justified by the arrangement of the couple's critical debate. Soon the two contexts, critical and fictional, merge—as they must, Baumbach would argue, for it is through works of the imagination that we preserve our consciousness of the world.

His sixth novel, My Father More or Less, experiments with forms of intertextuality to make this same point. Alternately narrated by Tom Terman and by a third-person narrator reflecting the actions of his father Lukas, the novel shows how Tom's visit to his father in London is shaped by the son's memory of his earlier abandonment, while the father's own coming to terms with his son, his mistress, and his employer becomes interwoven with the detective-story screenplay he's been working on. Lukas only superficially controls his film narrative, as its development toward the protagonist's death is impelled by the pressure of events unfolding in Terman's life. But these same events are enriched by the textual experience with his script. At times the writer's role takes over, as when Terman extricates himself from an unhappy situation by "writing himself a few lines of dialogue." For his part, Tom finds himself in a film script situation enhanced by the fact that actual movies have been shot on location in his father's house; but when events threaten, he is able to telephone his father for a rescue, much like a character calling upon the author for relief. That the father is creator of the son helps establish the naturalized quality of Baumbach's narrative. Although as experimentally intertextual as the most sophisticated literary experiments, My Father More or Less reads as accessibly as the most realistic fiction, indicating that Baumbach has found a useful device for bringing innovative fiction back within the literary mainstream.

Comfortable in his style that melds both tradition and innovation, Baumbach uses a range of familiar materials in the stories of The Life and Times of Major Fiction to show how fresh techniques for presentation are available to the writer who both knows the tricks of the trade and appreciates how readers will appreciate their use. His particular genius is displayed in "Mr. and Mrs. McFeely at Home and Away," based as it is on characters from a popular children's show who are, in their televised roles, the quintessence of familiarity, while their lives off-screen are shown as offering a challenge to the imagination, given that on TV the audience's imagining has been done for them. In similar manner, the challenge to write a story about basketball produces "How You Play the Game," an exercise in trying to make a narrative out of what is in essence merely a situation. The author, who is a character in his own story by virtue of having been asked in the first line to write it, struggles to make life as interesting as art, and succeeds only by following the most rudimentary role of fantasy: placing himself in the actual game.

A similar strategy informs Separate Hours, Baumbach's novel in which the long relationship of husband and wife becomes problematic for a novel, because its telling is complicated by the fact that each is a psychotherapist possessed of an entire battery of systems for just such interpretation. As in the basketball story, there are thus two streams to the narrative: action and interpretation. Problems result when one turns into the other. That each character wishes to be the narrator creates a dilemma for the reader in search of a story to be trusted. The dual nature of this and of all narrative is Baumbach's continuing interest, also evident in his experiments at combining photos and text as "stills from imaginary movies." D-Tours returns to the idea of a story-within-a-story, but does so in a manner much simpler than that which readers of Baumbach have become accustomed: this novel is more clearly a series of interrelated stories, united by the character of Max Million, who skips blithely between genres, situations, incidents, and even planets.

-Jerome Klinkowitz

BAUSCH, Richard

Nationality: American. Born: Fort Benning, Georgia, 18 April 1945. Education: George Mason University, B.A. 1973; University of Iowa, M.F.A. 1975; also attended Northern Virginia Community College. Military Service: U.S. Air Force, survival instructor, 1966–69. Family: Married Karen Miller; two sons, three daughters. Career: Worked as singer-songwriter and comedian; professor, George Mason University, Fairfax, Virginia, 1980—. Awards: National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1982; Guggenheim Fellowship, 1984; Lila Wallace Reader's Best Writer's Award, 1992; Academy Award in Literature (American Academy of Arts and Letters), 1993. Agent: Harriet Wasserman, Russell & Volkening, Inc., 551 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York 10017, U.S.A. Address: Department of English, George Mason University, 4400 University Drive, Fairfax, Virginia 22030–4443, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Real Presence: A Novel. New York, Dial Press, 1980.

Take Me Back: A Novel. New York, Dial Press, 1981.

The Last Good Time. New York, Dial Press, 1984.

Mr. Field's Daughter: A Novel. New York, Linden Press/Simon & Schuster, 1989.

Violence. Boston, Houghton Mifflin/Seymour Lawrence, 1992.

Rebel Powers. Boston, Houghton Mifflin/Seymour Lawrence, 1993. Good Evening Mr. and Mrs. America, and All the Ships at Sea. New York, HarperCollins, 1996.

In the Night Season: A Novel. New York, HarperFlamingo, 1998.

Short Stories

Spirits and Other Stories. New York, Linden Press/Simon & Schuster, 1987.

The Fireman's Wife and Other Stories. New York, Linden Press/Simon & Schuster, 1990.

Rare and Endangered Species: A Novella and Stories. Boston, Houghton Mifflin/Seymour Lawrence, 1994.

Aren't You Happy for Me? and Other Stories. London, Macmillan, 1995.

The Selected Stories of Richard Bausch. New York, Random House, 1996.

Someone to Watch Over Me: Stories. New York, HarperFlamingo, 1999.

Other

Afterword, Appalachee Red: A Novel by Richard Andrews. Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1987.

Introduction, The Sound of Writing, edited by Alan Cheuse and Caroline Marshall. New York, Anchor Books, 1991.

Introduction, The Old Forest and Other Stories by Peter Taylor. New York, Modern Library, 1995.

Foreword, Bad Man Blues: A Portable George Garrett by George Garrett. Dallas, Texas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1998.

Contributor, Love in Full Bloom, edited by Margaret Fowler and Priscilla McCutcheon. New York, Ballantine Books, 1994.

Contributor, Off the Beaten Path: Stories of Place, edited by Joseph Barbato and Lisa Weinerman Horak. New York, North Point Press, 1998.

Editor, with R. V. Cassill, The Norton Anthology of Short Fiction. New York, W. W. Norton, 2000.

*

Critical Studies: Contemporary Literary Criticism, Volume 51, Detroit, Gale, 1989; Contemporary Authors Autobiography Series, Volume 14, Detroit, Gale, 1992; Dictionary of Literary Biography, Volume 130, American Short-Story Writers Since World War II, Detroit, Gale, 1993.

* * *

Real Presence begins with a man answering an employment advertisement only to discover that the company that placed the ad is not only no longer hiring—it has all but gone out of business. From such prosaic beginnings, the novel centers upon a literally heartsick priest who becomes the unwilling benefactor to the erstwhile jobhunter and his family of five wild children and an eternally beset and very pregnant wife. This, with its Southern setting, its identifiable symbolism, its cast of seeming grotesques, and its dramatic crisis of faith, is, as one reviewer put it, "Flannery O'Connor country." But the author of Real Presence would soon, in later works, pull himself out of the long shadow thrown by the author of Wise Blood.

As a novelist, Richard Bausch is an unabashed humanist. His writing is far from the satirical social surveys of Tom Wolfe or the metafictional virtuosities of John Barth. Nor is he, like O'Connor, a metaphysical tester of souls. Instead, over the course of eight novels and four acclaimed collections of short fiction, Bausch has focused his own talents on that most cliched, and thus undervalued, of fictional constructs—character.

Bausch deploys an unadorned and direct, but unusually supple, style of narration that eschews overt affect for simple description and depiction. Telling details and evocative incidents accrete until discernible personalities emerge. The Last Good Time begins with several pages describing the quotidian routine of an old widower who lives alone in a small apartment. But Bausch does not create static portraits; he is as rigorous as an anthropologist in filling in the context of circumstance under which his characters are formed. Taking E. M. Forster's epigraph to 'only connect' as his aesthetic manifesto, Bausch excels at portraying lives in the process of living. The routine of the elderly man in The Last Good Time is shown to have deep roots in the man's past, but it must soon give way when his life is irrevocably altered by the intrusion of a young prostitute.

If Bausch's mastery of literary characterization is unquestionable, his choice of character has created considerable critical acrimony, for Bausch has chosen to focus his meticulous imagination on creating ordinary people living ordinary lives. Critics often fault Bausch's choice of subject matter as uninteresting, which may help explain why his work does not enjoy a wider readership. Take Me Back, Bausch's second novel, may have suffered from being marketed as the story of a marriage sundered by alcoholism and mental illness. But the achievement of this particular novel is that Bausch has, through scrupulous attention to the portrayal of the emotional lives of his characters, breathed real life into such stereotypical clay. The alcoholic husband, a professional failure, slowly emerges as nobly, if imperfectly, loyal to his wife, a former musician whose decline into insanity is portrayed with pathos.

It is not that Bausch is incapable of literary experimentation; the structures of all his novels are as organically complex with memory and rumination as they are largely linear in chronology. But Mr. Field's Daughter, Bausch's fourth novel, is also formally complex, interspersing its mostly third-person narration with chapters entitled "Certain Testimony" that contain the first-person voices of the book's two main characters, an older man and his grown daughter, both of whom must cope with the damage her elopement has caused to their relationship even as they disagree with how to deal with the daughter's estranged and vengeful husband.

Even when Bausch creates the most extraordinary circumstances, as he does in In the Night Season, in which a young widow and her son become the target of vindictive and murderous smugglers thinly disguised as white-supremacist militia-men, Bausch maintains a tight focus on the emotional reactions of his characters. The more sensational elements of his plots are harnessed tightly to this aim. That is, the significance of such extraordinary events, like the armed robbery that Connally, the protagonist, survives in Violence, is secondary to their aftermath. The real violence of Violence lies in the way that physical trauma begets emotional damage in perpetrators as well as victims. In this novel, the end of a physical act of violence marks only the beginning of its many victimizations, and Bausch explores the unfolding consequence of the fatal robbery with what seems to be an unerring eye for the confusions and surges of passion that roil throughout his characters' interactions. As Connally changes from shocked victim to inadvertent hero to ostensible avenger in the wake of the crime, Bausch describes each transformation from within Connally's perceptions. What matters for Bausch is not the depiction of a sensational event; it is the artful creation of real feeling.

The Russian formalist Victor Shklovsky maintained that the purpose of art was to knowingly shift perceptions so as to make familiar objects seem new again. Bausch most effectively employs this maxim in Rebel Powers, his sixth novel and his most ruminative one, in which a middle-aged bookseller, tellingly named Thomas, remembers and relates the failed marriage of his parents following his father's imprisonment for a petty crime. Taking the familiar elements of an alienated husband and wife, the travails of single parenting, and a young man's coming-of-age, Bausch attempts artistic alchemy, this time with a plot that partakes of nothing more extraordinary than the theft of a typewriter. Still, Rebel Powers is, in its dogged resistance to encapsulation, Bausch's least ordinary book. Again and again in this novel, Thomas posits, then rejects, easy explanations for the events he narrates, and this unwillingness to pass summary judgement focuses attention on the principals involved rather than on the culpability of their actions. Clearly, the placement of blame is seen as a barrier to connection and compassion with Thomas's parents, a discernible lesson that, once distilled, nevertheless diminishes (and is antithetical to) this particular incarnation of the Bauschian aesthetic. What is important are the lives portrayed, not the parables thus gleaned, and Thomas's relentless remembrance, executed without indictment, becomes a book-length manifestation of filial love.

Bausch's only overt comedy is his seventh novel, Good Evening Mr. and Mrs. America, And All the Ships At Sea, a bildungsroman set in 1963 in Washington D.C., where Walter Marshall, a nineteen-year-old innocent, is enrolled in the D'Allessandro School for Broadcasting, but he has developed political, even presidential, aspirations because of his adoration of the assassinated President John F. Kennedy. Walter then undergoes romantic and moral maturation through a series of comic developments that disabuse him of his dreams.

For all the bleakness and despair and disillusionment that Bausch introduces into the lives of his literary constructs, he nevertheless ends all of his novels on a note that is, if not hopeful, at least an acknowledgement that life endures, like the Dilsey section of Faulkner's The Sound and The Fury. It is a gesture aimed at addressing the wider world outside each novel, enfolding it back into the universe out of which Bausch has scrupulously worked to distill and clarify his narratives and his aesthetic ends. For Walter Marshall, the end of Good Evening Mr. and Mrs. America, And All the Ships At Sea is a tragicomic one as Walter, wiser for all the buffetings his ideals have taken, still manages to muster enough noble aspiration to seek out a better place based on an idealized past, "where concern for what was right mattered, and people were what they seemed to be ... where the war was being fought for freedom, and where the conflict was definite, the enemy clear." In short, the novel ends with Walter resolving to enlist in the Vietnam War.

—J.J. Wylie

BAWDEN, Nina

Nationality: British. Born: Nina Mabey in London, 19 January 1925. Education: Ilford County High School; Somerville College, Oxford, B.A. 1946, M.A. 1951; Salzburg Seminar in American Studies, 1960. Family: Married 1) H.W. Bawden in 1946, two sons (one deceased); 2) the broadcast executive A.S. Kark in 1954, one daughter. Career: Assistant, Town and Country Planning Association, 1946–47; Justice of the Peace for Surrey, 1968–76. Regular reviewer, Daily Telegraph, London. Awards: Guardian award, for children's book, 1976; Yorkshire Post award, 1976. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1970. CBE (Commander of the British Empire). Member: PEN Executive Committee, 1968–71; President, Society of Women Writers and Journalists. Agent: Curtis Brown, 162–168 Regent Street, London W1R 5TB. Address: 22 Noel Road, London N1 8HA, England; or, 19 Kapodistriou, Nauplion 21000, Greece.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Who Calls the Tune. London, Collins, 1953; as Eyes of Green, New York, Morrow, 1953.

The Odd Flamingo. London, Collins, 1954.

Change Here for Babylon. London, Collins, 1955.

The Solitary Child. London, Collins, 1956; New York, Lancer, 1966.Devil by the Sea. London, Collins, 1957; Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1959; abridged edition (for children), London, Gollancz, and Lippincott, 1976.

Just Like a Lady. London, Longman, 1960; as Glass Slippers Always Pinch, Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1960.

In Honour Bound. London, Longman, 1961.

Tortoise by Candlelight. London, Longman, and New York, Harper, 1963.

Under the Skin. London, Longman, and New York, Harper, 1964.
A Little Love, A Little Learning. London, Longman, 1965; New York, Harper, 1966.

A Woman of My Age. London, Longman, and New York, Harper, 1967.

The Grain of Truth. London, Longman, and New York, Harper, 1968. The Birds on the Trees. London, Longman, and New York, Harper, 1970; Thorndike, Maine, Thorndike Press, 1995.

Anna Apparent. London, Longman, and New York, Harper, 1972.George Beneath a Paper Moon. London, Allen Lane, and New York, Harper, 1974; as On the Edge, London, Sphere, 1985.

Afternoon of a Good Woman. London, Macmillan, 1976; New York, Harper, 1977.

Familiar Passions. London, Macmillan, and New York, Morrow, 1979.

Walking Naked. London, Macmillan, 1981; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1982.

The Ice House. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1983.

Circles of Deceit. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1987.

Family Money. London, Gollancz, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1991.

A Nice Change. London, Virago Press, 1997.

Fiction (for children)

The Secret Passage. London, Gollancz, 1963; as The House of Secrets, Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1964.

On the Run. London, Gollancz, 1964; as Three on the Run, Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1965.

The White Horse Gang. London, Gollancz, and Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1966

The Witch's Daughter. London, Gollancz, and Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1966

A Handful of Thieves. London, Gollancz, and Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1967.

The Runaway Summer. London, Gollancz, and Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1969.

Squib. London, Gollancz, and Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1971.

Carrie's War. London, Gollancz, and Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1973. The Peppermint Pig. London, Gollancz, and Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1975.

Rebel on a Rock. London, Gollancz, and Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1978

The Robbers. London, Gollancz, and New York, Lothrop, 1979. Kept in the Dark. London, Gollancz, and New York, Lothrop, 1982. The Finding. London, Gollancz, and New York, Lothrop, 1985. Princess Alice. London, Deutsch, 1985.

Keeping Henry. London, Gollancz, 1988; as Henry, New York, Lothrop, 1988.

The Outside Child. London, Gollancz, and New York, Lothrop, 1989.Humbug. London, Gollancz, and New York, Clarion Books, 1992.The Real Plato Jones. London, Gollancz, 1993; New York, Clarion Books, 1994.

Granny the Pag. New York, Clarion Books, 1996. Off the Road. New York, Clarion, 1999.

Other (for children)

William Tell. London, Cape, and New York, Lothrop, 1981.St. Francis of Assisi. London, Cape, and New York, Lothrop, 1983.In My Own Time. London, Virago Press, 1994; New York, Clarion Books, 1995.

ĸ

Critical Study: Article by Gerda Seaman, in British Novelists since 1960 edited by Jay L. Halio, Detroit, Gale, 1983.

Nina Bawden comments:

I find it difficult to comment on my adult novels. I suppose one could say that the later books, from Just Like a Lady onwards, are social comedies with modern themes and settings; the characters moral beings, hopefully engaged in living. People try so hard and fail so often, sometimes sadly, sometimes comically; I try to show how and why and to be accurate about relationships and motives. I have been called a "cryptomoralist with a mischievous sense of humor," and I like this description: it is certainly part of what I aim to be.

This quotation, from the Christian Science Monitor, though not the most flattering, might be useful:

Nina Bawden is a writer of unusual precision who can depict human foibles with an almost embarrassing accuracy. Yet for all that she centres dead on target, there is always a note of compassion in her stories. The light thrown on her characters, clear though it is, is no harsh spotlight. It is a more diffuse beam that allows one to peer into the shadows and see causes even while it focuses on effects.

* * *

The world of the English middle classes is the focal point for most of Nina Bawden's fiction. In The Birds on the Trees—a key novel in her development—she observes life as she sees it, centering on an entirely believable middle-class family, with children who puzzle and dismay their parents, because these are the people she sees every day, and these are the children who interest and baffle her, too. She captures the capricious intensity of sibling love, rivalry, and loyalty; she is reluctant to pin blame and quick to display compassion; she is also logical enough to offer no easy solutions, but sufficiently warm-hearted to include realistic sprinklings of hope. Above all, she brings a sympathetic ear to the cadences of everyday speech, a virtue which heightens the intensity of the plot—a story of alienation and the betrayal by the pampered Toby of his vain self-righteous parents.

Her no-nonsense, no-holds-barred approach to contemporary social problems is taken a stage further in Walking Naked, a chillingly precise novel about people unable to come to grips with the worlds they inhabit. Laura is a novelist whose method of dealing with difficulties is to retreat into the realm of her imagination. These problems are induced by guilt-guilt about her parents, her first marriage, her son who is in jail, her friends, and her present husband. "I write because I am afraid of life," is her easy palliative to life's ills. Now life is taking its revenge. In the course of one fraught day Laura struggles to come to terms with what she has made of her life, to strip away the layers of anxiety which give her nightmares that her house is falling down about her ears, to avoid the self-deception which has made a mockery of her art, to walk naked and alone. The timescale gives the novel a sharp narrative vigor and the dialogue is always slyly intelligent and believable, but what gives Walking Naked its authority is Bawden's precise analysis of middle-class mores and the way in which they are brought to bear on a woman's life.

As in all her later fiction Bawden excels at revealing the tensions and hidden currents at work beneath the calm and humdrum exteriors of her characters. She is no mere moralist; rather, the matter of relationships is her main concern. In The Ice House, a caustic glance at the complexities of modern marriage, friendship, and loyalty, she examines the unlikely friendship of Daisy and Ruth who have been friends since their schooldays. As girls, Daisy was boisterous and extroverted; Ruth withdrawn and frightened, a victim of an overbearing father. Thirty years later Ruth has a successful career and, on the surface at least, has a happy marriage; Daisy, though, is less content. When a tragedy rocks the lives of the two women and their families, its repercussions force them out of uneasy self-deception into a new and painful reality which they both have to accept. The Ice House is an unusual and subtle novel about familiar themes—love, marriage, friendship, adultery—in which the emotional lives of the two female protagonists are viewed with a mixture of sympathy and disconcerting accuracy. No less tangled are their moral confusions and the task of unraveling them gives the novel its central narrative line. To her adult novels Bawden has brought psychological depth and a humorous focus on human moods, resignations and self-deceptions, tempered only by her powers of observation and discrimination.

Nina Bawden is one of the very few authors who will admit to making a conscious adjustment to writing for children. She has said: "I consider my books for children as important as my adult work, and in some ways more challenging." In all her children's novels childhood is seen with a special clarity, and she has the gift of understanding her subject. The Peppermint Pig, for example, explores the reactions of a family of Edwardian children to their new and reduced circumstances, and it is through their eyes that we see their reactions to the world around them. We can understand their hopes and fears, their relationships with each other and with the adult world: this is felt most clearly in a profound episode dealing with the inevitable death of Johnny, the children's pet pig.

Off the Road and Granny the Pag are both for children, though the former represents something of a departure for Bawden. Set in the year 2040, the book concerns 11-year-old Tom, who joins in his grandfather in seeking the latter's childhood home. In their world, it is a journey fraught with danger, one that takes them through "the Wall" and into a forbidden region called "the Wild." The subject matter of Granny the Pag is far more down-to-earth. A "Pag," as narrator Cat (or Catriona) explains, is "someone who can make things happen," and her flamboyant grandmother—who rides a motorcycle and wears leather—certainly is one. No wonder, then, that when Cat's self-indulgent and emotionally distant parents decide that they want to take on raising her themselves, she chooses to stay with her grandmother. Bawden's secret is that her sympathy for her characters never flags—she thereby retains the readers' sympathies, too.

-Trevor Royle

BEAR, Gregory Dale

Nationality: American. Born: San Diego, California, 20 August 1951. Education: San Diego State College (now University), A.B. 1969. Family: Married 1) Christina Nielsen in 1975 (divorced 1981); 2) Astrid Anderson in 1983, one son, one daughter. Career: Worked in bookstores, a planetarium, and as a freelance teacher in San Diego, California. Awards: Nebula Award (Science Fiction Writers of America), best novelette and best novella, 1984, best short story, 1987, best novel, 1994; Hugo Award, best novelette, 1986, best short story, 1987; Prix Apollo, 1986. Agent: Richard Curtis, 171 East 74th Street, New York, New York 10021, U.S.A. Address: 506 Lakeview Road, Alderwood Manor, Washington 98037, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Hegira. New York, Dell, 1979.

Psychlone. New York, Ace, 1979.

Beyond Heaven's River. New York, Dell, 1980.

Strength of Stones. New York, Ace, 1981.

Corona (Star Trek novel). New York, Pocket Books, 1984.

The Infinity Concerto. New York, Berkeley, 1984.

Eon. New York, Bluejay Books, 1985.

Blood Music. New York, Arbor House, 1985.

The Serpent Mage. New York, Berkeley, 1986.

The Forge of God. New York, Tor Books, 1987.

Eternity. New York, Warner Books, 1988.

Hardfought (bound with Cascade Point by Timothy Zahn). New York, Tor Books, 1988.

Queen of Angels. New York, Warner Books, 1990.

Heads. Legend, 1990.

Anvil of Stars. New York, Warner Books, 1992.

Songs of Earth and Power (includes The Infinity Concerto and The Serpent Mage). Legend, 1992.

Moving Mars. New York, Tor Books, 1993.

Legacy. New York, Tor Books, 1995.

/(pronounced "slant"). New York, Tor Books, 1997.

Dinosaur Summer. New York, Warner Aspect, 1997.

Foundation and Chaos. New York, HarperPrism, 1998.

Darwin's Radio. New York, Ballantine, 1999.

Star Wars: Rogue Planet. New York, Del Rey, 2000.

Short Stories

The Wind from a Burning Woman. Sauk City, Wisconsin, Arkham House Publishers, 1983.

Sleepside Story. New Castle, Virginia, Cheap Street, 1987.

Early Harvest. New England Science Fiction Association, 1988.

Tangents. New York, Warner Books, 1989.

Sisters. Pulphouse, 1992.

The Venging. Legend, 1992.

Bear's Fantasies: Six Stories in Old Paradigms. Newark, New Jersey, Wildside Press, 1992.

Other

The White Horse Child (computer file). Union City, California, Ebook, 1992.

Introduction, Psycho Shop by Alfred Bester and Roger Zelazny. New York, Vintage Books, 1998.

Contributor, Isaac Asimov's War, edited by Gardner Dozois. New York, Ace Books, 1993.

Contributor, Far Futures, edited by Gregory Benford. New York, Tor, 1995.

Contributor, Skylife: Space Habitats in Story and Science, edited by Gregory Benford and George Zebrowski. New York, Harcourt Brace, 2000.

Editor, with Martin H. Greenberg, New Legends. New York, Tor, 1995.

* * *

Greg Bear is widely considered to be among the best of his generation's science fiction writers. Specifically, Bear is felt to have made major contributions to the reinvigoration of "hard" science fiction—that is, science fiction in which the science, however speculative or far-fetched, is solidly grounded in reality. Additionally, Bear recognized during the 1980s the vast changes that were taking place in the biological sciences, building several of his most important books around biological themes and extrapolations. Blood Music was among the first novels to deal with nanotechnology, the science of engineering machines, and in this case intelligent life forms-at the microscopic and submicroscopic levels. The novel also dealt with information engineering, a theoretical field which argues that the manipulation of information itself can affect the structure of the universe; information engineering is also at the heart of Bear's award-winning novel Moving Mars. His duo of novels, Queen of Angels and / (pronounced "Slant"), along with the short novel, Heads, explore the effects of nanotechnology on a world transformed almost beyond recognition. Oueen of Angels is Bear's most overtly experimental and ambitious novel. More recently he used many of his biological themes and concerns in a thriller, Darwin's Radio.

Bear has always displayed an enthusiastic willingness to stretch and experiment. Other than books that are direct or indirect sequels to each other, he has rarely repeated himself in theme or approach. His early stories and novels (he sold his first short story when he was 16) explore classic science fictional themes and settings—alien planets, mysterious structures, and the nature of religion and power. Bear is also a talented visual artist—his work has graced the covers of science fiction magazines and the reprint edition of one of his own novels—and even his earliest works were enhanced by a dramatic visual sense.

In 1985 Bear hit his stride as a writer, publishing two novels, Blood Music and Eon, that attracted substantial attention and established him as a mature novelist. The science fiction community noted the arrival of a major writer. Blood Music was nominated for the Hugo and Nebula, leading science fiction awards; the previous year a shorter version of the story won the Hugo and Nebula, while another work, the visionary and experimental Hardfought, won a Nebula. Another story, the heartbreaking "Tangents," won the 1987 Hugo and Nebula awards.

While biology has been the focus of much of Bear's major work, his other 1985 novel, Eon, demonstrated his mastery of materials more traditionally associated with science fiction: vast sweeps of time and space. Eon, and its sequels, Eternity and Legacy, explore a vast structure whose interior offers access to other times and places. Although more recent historical developments have outdated some of Eon's underpinnings—primarily the conflict between the United States and the Soviet Union—the readability and ongoing popularity of this novel and its sequels is preserved by Bear's ability to communicate a true sense of wonder at the size and mystery of the universe, as well as his well-developed storytelling abilities and insights into characters.

Another pair of linked novels, The Forge of God and Anvil of Stars, likewise explore the vastness of space. The first novel deals with destruction of the Earth, and culminates in a sequence of images, as our planet dies, that are among the most haunting and tragic in all of science fiction. The sequel is a more straightforward revenge story, although Bear declines to offer his characters—or his readers—any easy answers or triumphs.

Following his own literary triumphs of the 1980s, Bear grew more overtly experimental and published in 1990 what many consider his finest achievement—Queen of Angels. Set in a world so transformed by nanotechnology as to be alien to us, this stylistically audacious novel is a tale of crime and punishment, and of the role and responsibility of the artist in society. Using typography, invented jargon and slang, news clips, and other narrative devices, Bear not only tells a story, he also immerses the reader in his transformed world to a degree unusual in science fiction (or, for that matter, any other type of fiction). However, other books set in the Queen of Angels world—/ and Heads—employ more traditional narrative tools.

Following Queen of Angels, Bear seemed to concentrate on extending the range of his speculations rather than his stylistic experiments. Always a clear and often a poetic writer, Bear focused his energies in the 1990s on novels that revisited many of his—and science fiction's—grand themes, but did so in literary modes more accessible to general readers than Queen of Angels. His novel Moving Mars, won the 1994 Nebula, and was one of the first of the decade's wave of large "Mars novels." The novel functions admirably as both an adventure story and as an investigation of the informational nature of our universe. Its broad speculations are among the boldest in recent science fiction.

Although it is for his science fiction that Bear is best known, he has published some fantasy, most notably the novels that form the sequence Songs of Earth and Power. Again wrestling with the nature and responsibilities of the artist, this novel sequence is among Bear's most effective, if least known, works.

Rarely forgetting that novelists are also entertainers, Bear has written more than a few works that might be classed solely as "entertainments." Chief among them is his novel Dinosaur Summer, a loving look at the motion pictures of the 1930s and 1940s, the role of science fiction itself in shaping our view of the world, and the process by which a boy becomes a man. Dinosaur Summer is perhaps the most purely delightful of Bear's works.

He has also joined in exploring the science fictional universes of other writers, most notably Isaac Asimov's legendary Foundation universe. Along with Gregory Benford and David Brin (together referred to by science fiction fans as "the killer Bs,") Bear participated in the creation of a new Foundation trilogy, linked to Asimov's great sequence of stories and novels. Bear's contribution was the novel Foundation and Chaos.

Another novel set in a universe not his own is Star Wars: Rogue Planet, an adventure tale set in the Jedi universe of George Lucas's Star Wars films. Rogue Planet was a major international bestseller.

Despite diversions in the Foundation and Star Wars universes, as the twenty-first century loomed Bear seemed determined to continue breaking new ground, setting himself new challenges. His novel Darwin's Radio synthesized much of his biological thinking and speculation, with Bear's provocative ideas about evolution couched in a taut plot. Although the book reads like a straightforward medical-scientific thriller of the sort that Michael Crichton or Robin Cook might write, the level of speculation and characterization underlying the story is far deeper than is common in suspense fiction. Bear's speculations, indeed, attracted some attention from the professional scientific community. The novel's sensibility was likewise informed by those virtues that have been hallmarks of Bear's pure science fiction—verisimilitude, thoroughness of research, seamless integration of science and plot, and careful and clear writing.

If not the sort of coterie-gathering literary breakthrough that Queen of Angels was, Darwin's Radio nonetheless sent a clear signal that Bear intended to continue breaking new ground and opening new territory, both for science fiction and for himself. He has been one of the key figures in science fiction over the past two decades, and bids fair to become one of science fiction's most effective literary ambassadors to the larger reading world.

-Keith Ferrell

BEATTIE, Ann

Nationality: American. Born: Washington, D.C., 8 September 1947. Education: American University, Washington, D.C., B.A. 1969; University of Connecticut, Storrs, 1970–72, M.A. 1970. Family: Married 1) David Gates in 1973 (divorced), one son; 2) Lincoln Perry. Career: Visiting assistant professor, 1976–77, visiting writer, 1980, University of Virginia, Charlottesville; Briggs Copeland Lecturer in English, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1977–78. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship, 1977; American University Distinguished Alumnae award, 1980; American Academy award, 1980; L.H.D., American University, 1983. Member of the American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters since 1983. Agent: International Creative Management, 40 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10019, U.S.A. Address: c/o Janklow and Nesbit, 598 Madison Avenue, New York, New York 10022–1614, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Chilly Scenes of Winter. New York, Doubleday, 1976.

Falling in Place. New York, Random House, 1980; London, Secker and Warburg, 1981.

Love Always. New York, Random House, and London, Michael Joseph, 1985.

Picturing Will. New York, Random House, and London, Cape, 1990; New York, Vintage, 1991.

Another You. New York, Knopf, 1995.

My Life, Starring Dara Falcon. New York, Knopf, 1997.

Short Stories

Distortions. New York, Doubleday, 1976.

Secrets and Surprises. New York, Random House, 1978; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1979.

Jacklighting. Worcester, Massachusetts, Metacom Press, 1981.

The Burning House. New York, Random House, 1982; London, Secker and Warburg, 1983.

Where You'll Find Me and Other Stories. New York, Linden Press, 1986; London, Macmillan, 1987.

What Was Mine and Other Stories. New York, Random House, 1991. Park City: New and Selected Stories. New York, Knopf, 1998.

Other

Spectacles (for children). New York, Workman, 1985. Alex Katz (art criticism). New York, Abrams, 1987.

Americana, photographs by Bob Adelman. New York, Scribner, 1992.

Editor, with Shannon Ravenel, The Best American Short Stories 1987. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1987.

*

Theatrical Activities: Actress: Play—Role in The Hotel Play by Wallace Shawn, New York, 1981.

* * *

Chilly Scenes of Winter and Distortions were published simultaneously, and, to Ann Beattie's consternation, she was quickly celebrated as the chronicler of the disillusioned 1960s counterculture. She was praised as an objective observer of the ennui and disillusion of the postlapsarian love children, the generation that turned on in the 1960s but totally dropped out in the 1970s. Of this Beattie said: "That's a horribly reductive approach... . What I've always hoped for is that somebody will then start talking more about the meat and bones of what I'm writing about," and one shares Beattie's sentiment. While it is true that many of her stories use the manners and jargon of the postcounterculture era as a backdrop—particularly its songs and culture heroes-these details function in much the same way as Raymond Carver's Pacific Northwest, or Donald Barthelme's New York City. They create a concrete setting from which larger human dilemmas may be extracted—in Beattie's case, the difficulties of adjusting to the modern world, the growing distance between one's youthful dreams and present responsibilities, and, most particularly, the fragility and difficulty of sustaining relationships and the despair of loneliness. What also persists in Beattie's fiction, at least until Love Always, is a focus on the common human decency and bonds of friendship that survive even the worst of times. Despite their personal circumstances, Beattie's men and women extend themselves to others.

Since the mid-1980s, Beattie has taken a more negative and less sympathetic or ironic and detached view toward members of the generation who became aging, careless, and smug Yuppies. Picturing Will, while focusing on the problems of balancing career and parenthood, reveals entirely new concerns. As the title suggests, Beattie is not only interested in parenthood and children (here a boy named Will) but in the responsibilities incurred by human will, along with the contingencies determined by an impersonal fate.

Chilly Scenes of Winter, more than any of her subsequent works, details the dreams and values of the 1960s. It concerns a 27-year-old disaffected love-child, Charles, despairing over his girlfriend Laura's return to her husband. Instead of pursuing her, the helpless Charles busies himself with a cast of needy people—his childhood friend Sam, his suicidal mother, and ex-girlfriend Pamela (now experimenting with lesbianism), and his helplessly naive sister Susan. When he at last learns that Laura has left her husband he visits her, and they prepare to sail into the sunset.

Beattie treats the loss of optimism and first love as by-products of the 1960s youth culture. She also studies, through Charles and Sam, the aimlessness and ennui of the 1970s lost generation. "You could be happy ... if you hadn't had your eyes opened in the sixties," is repeated throughout. Beattie retains a characteristic detachment—a balance between an objective (sometimes critical) and affectionate (sometimes mocking) portrait of the times. Charles, for example, is wistful toward the past. Everyone has died, he repeats—not just Janis

Joplin and Brian Jones, but also Jim Morrison's widow Pamela, Amy Vanderbilt, Adele Davis, and maybe even Rod Stewart (about whom, of course, he is wrong). Elsewhere, the world-weary Charles and Sam lament that times have grown worse, because "women put their brassieres back on and want you to take them to Paul Newman movies." Beattie has a wonderful sense of humor.

The dreamer Charles, out of place in any time or locale, is afraid of the present; he is also obsessed with illness and death, and, like many others in the book, he longs to be a child again. But his earnestness, sympathy, and kind generosity are redemptive. Even so, the novel ends bitterly. Sam gets a new and ugly dog, "a terrible genetic mistake," as Charles observes, and one can't help thinking the same of his own reunion with Laura.

The stories in Distortions focus on the empty relationships of married and single couples, on the urgent need for companionship and definition that drives most people. Especially moving are the figures in "Dwarf House," "The Parking Lot," "A Platonic Relationship," "Snakes' Shoes," and "Vermont." Although these characters are only peripherally aware of their drab lives, the reader feels deeply for them. More fully portrayed are the characters in Secrets and Surprises, men and women once again trapped in unfulfilling jobs and personal relationships. A more affluent group, they are into gourmet cooking, jogging, health foods, weekends in the country, and the usual fare of the 1970s upper-middle-class mobile society. What they share is a deep sense of emptiness, although friendship and pets (particularly dogs) are once more their only comfort. Some of Beattie's most memorable evocations of loneliness and yearning are in the title story, "A Vintage Thunderbird," "A Reasonable Man," "Distant Music," and "The Lawn Party." Lines that summarize a lifetime—like one character's remark that people smile because they don't understand each other-underscore the collection. These people are trapped but they lack self-pity; they are lost but they still extend a hand.

An even more sophisticated society inhabits The Burning House, but it is the juxtaposition of loneliness and selflessness that continues to move the reader. Little occurs in the way of change, although there are occasional moments of muted insight; once again, the stories are evocations of mood, descriptive of states of being. There also remains very little trace of the 1960s past. Of particular interest is the title story and "Learning to Fall," where Beattie concretizes two characters' remarks: "What will happen can't be stopped," and "I'm sick of hearing how things might have been worse, when they might also have been better." "Girl Talk" is about two women, one young, unmarried, and pregnant, and the other, the unborn child's grandmother, who is many times married, wealthy, still beautiful but no longer capable of bearing children. It is about how "pain is relative." "The Cinderella Waltz," one of Beattie's most evocative stories, is about the complex of emotions exchanged between a mother and daughter and their estranged husband/father and his new male lover.

Falling in Place, Beattie's second novel, portrays the limited control one has over one's destiny and how life just seems to fall in place. Once again, Beattie measures the fragility of relationships, here focusing on the disintegration of a family and the guilt that falls to both parents and children. The book lacks a traditional plot; rather, Beattie shifts from character to character and then combines events from each chapter into brief italicized mood interludes. Set in Connecticut and New York in the summer of 1979, the novel focuses on the surrogate emotional relationships each member of the John Knapp family sets up. The climax revolves around the son's quasi-accidental shooting of his sister and how the family members finally face one another—things fall into place. Although the book ends with a positive resolution, like Chilly Scenes of Winter, it is bitter and the prognosis for future happiness is bleak.

Love Always, Beattie's third novel, marks a change in style and vision. Less detached, satiric, and sympathetic, her indictment of her materially successful, world-weary people is more pronounced. The book opens at a Vermont retreat, where the sophisticates of a trendy New York magazine, Country Daze, have gathered. Lucy Spenser, for example, under the pseudonym Cindi Coeur, writes both the letters and answers for a tongue-in-cheek Miss Lonelyhearts column. Lucy's niece, 14-year-old Nicole, who joins the group, is a TV actress who portrays an adolescent alcoholic on a popular soap opera. The brilliance of the novel results from Beattie's intertwining how the real-life Vermont group is defined not just by the bucolic fantasy of country life espoused by the magazine but also by the fantasies and grim truth of the Miss Lonelyhearts column, as well as the melodramatic, selfish, and sometimes cruel world of television and Hollywood soaps. The so-called real characters in the novel-infertile in every sense of the word—are as needy and blighted as any portrayed by the printed word or on screen. These characters also lack, one should note, the compassion and generosity that have characterized Beattie's earlier people.

The short stories in Where You'll Find Me are terse, minimalist profiles of Beattie's familiar 1960s and 1970s types, once again estranged from themselves and others. Now successful doctors, lawyers, and Indian chiefs, they have the money, possessions, and social respect that go along with their time, place, and economic efforts. But they suffer the losses that accompany people of their status and age, such as divorce, illness, and death. Beattie's focus is the enormous disparity between external success and inner emptiness. All the same, these figures retain our sympathy. "People and things never really get left behind," remarks one, very much aware that human connection remains possible.

Picturing Will confronts the next, logical question. Can one have it all: ambition, success, and a child? And if so, how does one deal with the eventualities of divorce, missing fathers, potential stepfathers, and—always of central concern—the young child? Will is the five- and later six-year-old abandoned child of a scurrilous, selfish, and violent father. His mother, clearly the more caring parent, is torn between career and motherhood. It is her lover, Mel, who truly parents and completely loves Will. The novel is divided into three sections that reflect each family member's point of view: interwoven through these, in addition, is yet another commentary that functions as the authorial voice, in matters of true responsibility and a child's deepest needs. The commentary is, in fact, from Mel's diary.

If Beattie's earlier characters were passive products of a specific social, cultural, and political world, the figures here are personally responsible for their own lives, despite the vagaries of fate. But Beattie never loses her sense of humor. Mel, for example, remarks on the responsibilities of fatherhood: "Do everything right, all the time, and the child will prosper. It's as simple as that, except for fate, luck, heredity, chance, the astrological sign under which the child was born, his order of birth, his first encounter with evil, the girl who jilts him in spite of his excellent qualities."

The fragility of human relationships and their inevitable disintegration—between friends, spouses, children and parents—is once again Beattie's subject in What Was Mine. "You Know What," the ironic title of one story, could well characterize many of the others: characters speak on slightly tangential levels that are sufficiently askew to guarantee miscommunication. Mothers and fathers worry over children—whose lives justify worry—but the quality and definition of that worry is frequently inappropriate. In "Horatio's Trick," a 19-year-old college student criticizes his mother for being too intimidated by him to directly ask about his life. Beattie acknowledges the son's disturbance: "She was just sitting there, scared to death." The title piece tells of another son whose father died after World War II, and whose mother, true to the father's memory, lived with but never married "Uncle Herb." Ethan, the son, now a young man, loves Herb as a father, but they are forced to separate when the mother, "irrationally angry," decides she no longer wants him in the house. Herb tries to console the son with advice to listen to Billie Holiday's records, study Vermeer's paintings, and "look around" and "listen." He explains that "What to some people might seem the silliest sort of place might be, to those truly observant, a temporary substitute for heaven." One makes due with what one has at hand. The deep compassion in Beattie's portrayals of these necessary accommodations, along with her exquisite evocation of the emptiness and loneliness in both the self and world, continue to place her among the best fiction writers in America today. One is haunted by lines such as the following, exchanged between two 14-year-old boys: "We both suffered because we sensed that you had to look like John F. Kennedy in order to be John F. Kennedy."

The plot of Another You involves an exceedingly complex set of relationships between characters Marshall, Sonja, McCallum, Cheryl, Sarah, Livan, and Tony. Marshall remains the central figure, however, and throughout the story he is dogged by the awareness of a secret involving his past. Eventually the reader learns what this secret is, but Marshall never does. Darcy Fisher, who goes by the stage name of Dara Falcon, also has a secret, and this provides part of the allure that draws Jean Warner, the narrator of My Life, Starring Dara Falcon, to her. This book represents a shift for Beattie: not only is it her first coming-of-age story, but it relies less on the details of the 1970s (Jean in the 1990s tells the story as a flashback) than on the powerful relationships of its characters.

-Lois Gordon

BECKER, Stephen (David)

Also writes as Steve Dodge. Nationality: American. Born: Mount Vernon, New York, 31 March 1927. Education: Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1943–47, B.A. 1947; Yenching University, Peking, 1947–48. Military Service: Served in the United States Marine Corps, 1945. Family: Married Mary Elizabeth Freeburg in 1947; two sons and one daughter. Career: Instructor, Tsing Hua University, Peking, 1947–48; teaching fellow, Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts, 1951-52; lecturer, University of Alaska, College, 1967, Bennington College, Vermont, 1971, 1977, 1978, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1974, and Hollins College, Virginia, 1986. Since 1987 professor of English, University of Central Florida, Orlando. Editor, Western Printing Company, New York, 1955-56. Awards: Paul Harris fellowship, 1947; Guggenheim fellowship, 1954; National Endowment for the Arts grant, for translation, 1984. Agent: Russell and Volkening Inc., 50 West 29th Street, New York, New York 10001. Address: 880 Benchwood Dr., Winter Spring, Florida 32708, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

- The Season of the Stranger. New York, Harper, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1951.
- Shanghai Incident (as Steve Dodge). New York, Fawcett, 1955; London, Fawcett, 1956.
- Juice. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1958; London, Muller, 1959. A Covenant with Death. New York, Atheneum, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1965.
- The Outcasts. New York, Atheneum, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1967.
- When the War Is Over. New York, Random House, 1969; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1970.
- Dog Tags. New York, Random House, 1973; London, Barrie and Jenkins, 1974.
- The Chinese Bandit. New York, Random House, 1975; London, Chatto and Windus, 1976.
- The Last Mandarin. New York, Random House, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1979.
- The Blue-Eyed Shan. New York, Random House, and London, Collins, 1982.
- A Rendezvous in Haiti. New York, Norton, and London, Collins, 1987.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "To Know the Country," in Harper's (New York), August 1951.
- "The Town Mouse," in The Best American Short Stories 1953, edited by Martha Foley. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1953.
- "A Baptism of Some Importance," in Story. New York, McKay, 1953.
- "Monsieur Malfait," in Harper's (New York), June 1953.
- "The New Encyclopaedist," in The Year's Best SF 10, edited by Judith Merril. New York, Delacorte Press, 1965.
- "Rites of Passage," in Florida Review (Orlando) Autumn 1984.

Other

- Comic Art in America: A Social History of the Funnies, the Political Cartoons, Magazine Humor, Sporting Cartoons, and Animated Cartoons. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1959.
- Marshall Field III: A Biography. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1964
- Translator, The Colors of the Day, by Romain Gary. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Joseph, 1953.
- Translator, Mountains in the Desert, by Louis Carl and Joseph Petit. New York, Doubleday, 1954; as Tefedest, London, Allen and Unwin, 1954.
- Translator, The Sacred Forest, by Pierre-Dominique Gaisseau. New York, Knopf, 1954.
- Translator, Faraway, by André Dhôtel. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1957.
- Translator, Someone Will Die Tonight in the Caribbean, by René Puissesseau. New York, Knopf, 1958; London, W.H. Allen, 1959.
- Translator, The Last of the Just, by André Schwarz-Bart. New York, Atheneum, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1961.

- Translator, The Town Beyond the Wall, by Elie Wiesel. New York, Atheneum, 1964; London, Robson, 1975.
- Translator, The Conquerors, by André Malraux. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1976.
- Translator, Diary of My Travels in America, by Louis-Philippe. New York, Delacorte Press, 1977.
- Translator, Ana No, by Agustín Gomez-Arcos. London, Secker and Warburg, 1980.
- Translator, The Forgotten, by Elie Wiesel. New York, Schoken, 1995.
- Translator, The Last of the Just, by Andre Schwarz-Bart. Woodstock, New York, Overlook Press, 2000.

*

Critical Study: By Becker, in Contemporary Authors Autobiography Series 1 edited by Dedria Bryfonski, Detroit, Gale, 1984.

* * *

Equally distinguished as a translator, a biographer, a commentator on the popular arts, and a novelist, Stephen Becker brings to his fiction a breadth of experience with world culture and human behavior which yields moral complexity and psychological verity in his work. Two major themes intertwine through his novels—the problems of justice and the necessity for self-knowledge and self-fulfillment.

Beginning most clearly with Juice, Becker concentrates on the moral and social complexities of law and justice, continuing this theme in A Covenant with Death and When the War Is Over. The problem Becker's protagonists face is to distinguish between the arbitrary and mechanical justice of the law and true human justice. The rigidity and absoluteness of law collide with human values especially the need for expiation, mercy and compassion. The characters' dilemma is to choose between true justice and simple retribution and to use the mechanism of blind justice to solve difficult moral problems. Against this theme is developed another—an existential concept of the self, men struggling with themselves, with nature and with circumstances to become fully alive and functioning beings. This theme is isolated most clearly in The Outcasts, which describes a group of engineers building a bridge deep in a primeval jungle. There they must overcome the indifferent force of nature, their own weaknesses, their fears and prejudices.

In Juice the theme of human and mechanical justice arises when the central character, Joseph Harrison, kills a pedestrian in an auto accident. His friends and employer try to use the law and the power of money and position (''juice'') to white-wash the occurrence, while Harrison demands an absolute judgment to redeem his error. The tensions between views of law and truth reshape Harrison's whole existence. In A Covenant with Death a young judge is confronted with a difficult decision in a murder case; through detective work, insights into motivation and a complete understanding of the limits of the law, Judge Lewis is able to render a humane verdict and still satisfy the meaning of law. The forces of procrustean and draconian legalism are averted through the judge's efforts, through an intense moral revaluation which ultimately changes the judge's own life. In this novel, humanity triumphs through the action of the law.

The tragedy of the law is exposed in When the War Is Over, Becker's most satisfying novel. It is the story of the last victim of the Civil War, a boy executed as a Confederate guerrilla long after hostilities had ceased. The moral struggle is embodied in Lt. Marius Catto, a young career officer caught between a genuine love of peace and justice and a natural inclination toward the arts of war. He works to prevent General Hooker from wreaking vengeance through law on the boy but fails and is left scarred and embittered by disillusionment. The novel, based on historical fact, is a brilliant reconstruction of the time and place and an intense scrutiny of moral and social values. It convincingly examines the mechanism of military order, social justice and our conflicting views of violence and law. The story uncovers basic contradictions in our organization of legal murder.

Dog Tags is another densely detailed chronicle of man at war and his ability to survive it humanly and intelligently. It focuses on Benjamin Beer, a Jew wounded in World War II and later interned in North Korea. His response to war is to become a skilled and humane doctor, as if in expiration for the universal crime of war. His life is a moral struggle for self-knowledge and understanding of man's limitless potentials; "You're worried about good and bad," he says, "well, I'm worried about good and evil." In his quest, Benjamin learns his own abilities and limitations and achieves peace and grace within himself.

The Chinese Bandit, The Last Mandarin, and The Blue-Eyed Shan are finely-wrought and highly atmospheric Asian tales which focus on the collision of Western adventurers with oriental culture. Each story details the effect of American mercenaries in search of action in China and Southeast Asia after World War II and develops the moral and social conflicts between the two cultures through tales of violence and individual struggles for survival. The landscape and social patterns of a changeless East are refracted through the sensibilities of self-sufficient and resourceful Americans who find themselves alone in the crowds of the orient.

In A Rendezvous in Haiti, Becker returns to the U.S. Marines as a focus for a romantic adventure. The novel follows a young Marine lieutenant, Robert McAllister, and his fiancée during a rebellion in Haiti in 1919. McAllister, a veteran of the brutality of World War I, must single-handedly rescue his fiancée from the rebels (and the romantic spell of a mysterious rebel chieftain), crossing the island and its dense jungles. The story, like Becker's earlier Conradian romances, is rich with authentic period details and feeling and also comments seriously on American political and cultural imperialism and adventurism.

Becker's examination of society's structure and limitations and his portrayal of men seeking "grace under pressure" is a significant contribution to contemporary fiction. The existential premises of the works—individuals finding meaning inside the arbitrary bounds of social order—reflect our acceptance of the civilization we have built.

-William J. Schafer

BECKETT, Mary

Nationality: Northern Irish. Born: Belfast, Northern Ireland, 28 January 1926. Education: Attended St. Mary's Training College. Family: Married Peter Gaffey in 1956; three sons, two daughters. Career: Teacher at primary schools in Belfast, Northern Ireland, 1945–56. Awards: Arts Award (Ireland Sunday Tribune), 1987.

Agent: Nat Sobel, Nat Sobel Associates, Inc., 146 East 19th Street, New York, New York 10003, U.S.A. Address: 24 Templeville Drive, Dublin, Ireland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Give Them Stones. New York, Beech Tree Books, 1987.

Short Stories

A Belfast Woman and Other Stories. Swords, County Dublin, Ireland, Poolbeg Press, 1980.

A Literary Woman. London, Bloomsbury, 1991.

Other

Orla at School (for children), illustrated by Carol Betera. Swords, County Dublin, Ireland, Poolbeg Press, 1991.

A Family Tree, illustrated by Ann Kennedy. Swords, County Dublin, Ireland, Poolbeg Press, 1992.

* * *

Mary Beckett's two collections of short stories, A Belfast Woman and A Literary Woman, and her novel Give Them Stones, have earned her a place as one of contemporary Ireland's finest writers. The people she writes about are ordinary, and their lives mundane. Against the backdrop of Irish political dissonance and the constant, random threat of violence, their lives are shaped by a tragic undertone of loss and compromise. Beckett's writing is spare, and often disconcerting. Her Ireland is a crumbling edifice where life must go on, often at a great price, and the nation's political and public traumas are replayed in the family again and again, between the generations and between men and women. Beckett, a former primary school teacher and writer for the BBC, is a Roman Catholic whose non-partisan portrait of Ireland shows it to be a country with no victorious sides.

The thankless position of women, particularly those in the lower middle-class, comprises Beckett's focus in many of her short stories and in Give Them Stones. Beckett writes about women living on the precipice between middle-class respectability and lower-class suffering. As Frank McCourt has popularized in Angela's Ashes, the entrapment of Irish women due to the common stresses of (primarily male) alcoholism and unemployment create a nation of beleaguered wives, and Beckett's are no exception. They desire national unity not out of deeply felt political convictions, but out of a desire to more easily live their lives and better protect their children. The women in Beckett's stories offer case studies of the chronically depressed, told with the graceful hand of a poet.

Beckett's stylistic influences are an earlier generation of British women writers, including Rosamund Lehman, Elizabeth Taylor, and Muriel Spark, who like Beckett, deftly and economically capture the details of private, interior lives. She also shares the polite detachment of Anita Brookner, but Beckett's heroines seem one step closer to madness, fraught as they are by random IRA raids, fires, and harassment. Beckett's overarching tone of compromise is lifted, when least expected, by a sharp wit that counteracts the bleakness of the lives of these women and men, and infuses her stories with the calmness sometimes possible in the heart of a crisis.

Beckett's first collection of stories, A Belfast Woman, anticipates her later works in its recurrent theme of women learning to adapt to disappointing lives. One woman resents demands made on her with a telling reflection upon her place in the world: "I'm a woman. I'm supposed to be passive. I've got three small children. I'm expecting another." This woman's catalogue of troubles extends naturally from the assertion of her gender, and like many of her fictional counterparts, she endures by resignation rather than courage. The small acts of rebellion of many of Beckett's women are characterized not so much by bravery but by desperation, and for the protection of someone else—husband, children, or parents.

The resigned tone of A Belfast Woman is repeated in Give Them Stones, but Beckett's novel is an extraordinary document of one woman's struggle against the oppressive tide of poverty and political oppression. The longer narrative structure suits Beckett well, as she recounts in detail heroine Martha Hughes's life, from childhood through middle age. As with many of the women in Beckett's stories, Martha is a strong woman surrounded by weak men. Her father cannot find work and dies young, after virtually neglecting his family in favor of his political loyalties. Her brother is another disappointment, a ne'er-do-well killed young by the IRA. Martha decides to marry the passive but affable Dermot Hughes largely because his family house includes a well-appointed kitchen. Martha finds in this kitchen her deliverance from a lifetime of waiting for Dermot to provide for her and their children (which he does so only intermittently). Using her talent for baking, Martha sells bread from home to her neighbors, all while caring for Dermot, an unsympathetic motherin-law, and her four sons.

But Martha's determination to take her life into her own hands is hardly a statement of empowerment. Her efforts to earn money are a mark of her desperation, and the aching fatigue that comes from her work is a predominant theme in the novel. In the only form of defiance she has access to, Martha refuses to sell her bread to IRA soldiers after experiencing their harassment and witnessing their haphazard murder of a young neighbor boy. The ending of Give Them Stones is unexpected because uplifting, and with it Beckett shows her talent for making narrow lives the subject of greatness, and for finding hope, love, and forgiveness in improbable places.

In A Literary Woman, stories mostly set in Dublin, Beckett expands her range by weaving in and out of these tales the maddening presence of an anonymous letter writer, a self-proclaimed "watcher" or "well-wisher" who takes it upon herself to write incriminating letters, anonymously. This woman, revealed in the titular story, translates neighbors' problems into misinformed and misbegotten rumors—a dead child motivates the charge of infanticide, a distant wife is accused of alcoholism. These letters unsettle their recipients, and the malevolence of the "literary woman" documents a noxious public spirit, a local version of Ireland's larger, political and religious enmity. These stories surprise and unnerve the reader in ways that inspire new attention to the seemingly plainest of people and events. Their canny ability to unsettle the simple domestic worlds that Beckett illustrates suggest that no private life, however modest, is without its private dramas and illicit secrets.

Critics have almost universally singled out Mary Beckett as an important chronicler of life in modern Ireland, and as a writer with a uniquely lyrical prose style. Give Them Stones has been called a "small miracle" and "immensely readable," and was awarded Ireland's Sunday Tribute 1987 Arts Award for Literature.

-Tabitha Sparks

BEDFORD, Sybille

Nationality: British. Born: Sybille von Schoenebeck in Charlottenburg, Germany, 16 March 1911. Education: Privately in Italy, England, and France. Family: Married Walter Bedford in 1935. Career: Worked as a law reporter: covered the Auschwitz trial at Frankfurt for the Observer, London, and the Saturday Evening Post, Philadelphia, 1963–65, and the trial of Jack Ruby at Dallas for Life, New York, 1964. Vice-president, PEN, 1979. Awards: Society of Authors traveling scholarship, 1989. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1964. O.B.E. (Officer, Order of British Empire), 1981. Address: c/o Greene and Heaton, 37 Goldhawk Rd., London W12 8Q0, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

- A Legacy. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1956; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1957.
- A Favourite of the Gods. London, Collins, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1963.
- A Compass Error. London, Collins, 1968; New York, Knopf, 1969.Jigsaw: An Unsentimental Education. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Knopf, 1989.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Compassionata at Hyde Park Corner," in 23 Modern Stories. New York, Knopf, 1963.

"Une vie de chateau," in New Yorker, 20 February 1989.

Other

A Visit to Don Otavio: A Mexican Journey. London, Gollancz, and New York, Harper, 1953; revised edition, New York, Atheneum, 1963; as A Visit to Don Otavio: A Traveller's Tale from Mexico, London, Collins, 1960.

The Best We Can Do: An Account of the Trial of John Bodkin Adams. London, Collins, 1958; as The Trial of Dr. Adams, New York, Simon and Schuster, 1959.

The Faces of Justice: A Traveller's Report. London, Collins, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1961.

Aldous Huxley: A Biography. London, Chatto and Windus-Collins, 2 vols., 1973–74; New York, Knopf, 1 vol., 1974.

As It Was: Pleasures, Landscapes, and Justice. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1990.

In Conversation with Naim Attallah. London, Quartet Books, 1998.

*

Critical Studies: By Evelyn Waugh, in Spectator (London), 13 April 1956; V.S. Pritchett, in New Statesman (London), 11 January 1963; P.N. Furbank, in Encounter (London), April 1964; Bernard Levin, in London Daily Mail, 12 September 1966; Constantine FitzGibbon, in Irish Times (Dublin), 19 October 1968; introductions to A Favourite of the Gods and A Compass Error, both London, Virago Press, 1984, and article in London Magazine, January 1991, all by Peter Vansittart; Robert O. Evans in British Novelists since 1900 edited by Jack I. Biles, New York, AMS Press, 1987; David Leavitt in Voice Literary Supplement, June 1990; Gilbert Phelps in Folio Quarterly (London), Winter 1990; Anne Sebbaix in Daily Telegraph, 4 February 1995.

* * *

The stature of Sybille Bedford's first and still her finest novel, A Legacy, suggests Thomas Mann's Buddenbrooks, or the historical theme of Hermann Broch's The Sleepwalkers. All three writers are continental in their attention to the effects of historical event on the flow of family life and time. If Bedford lacks the philosophical dimension of Mann or the high and heavy seriousness of Broch, she possesses instead energy, gaiety, and a refreshing comic sense that seem unmistakably British.

What stays in the mind long after a reading of A Legacy is not the Prussia or Baden of 1810-1913 in which it is set, but characters, scenes, and individual sentences of fine prose. Bedford's best characters are improbable but memorable for her objective treatment of them. Johannes von Feldon once danced with a bear at a fair, became autistic from the brutality of his military academy, then a decorated, still autistic captain of cavalry. Julius von Felden, a central figure in the chronicle, is nominally Catholic, briefly a diplomat, member of the Jockey Club in Paris, collector of bibelots, and devoted to his monkey and two chimpanzees, whom he treats as human beings. He marries into the Merz family of Berlin, astonished that they are nominally Jewish rather than Catholic, but content to accept their over-stuffed largesse. The elder Merzes are wealthy philistines given to large, frequent meals and to generosity to their feckless offspring and their children, who acquire "the habit of being rich." The tragicomedy of the two families and their incompatible histories combine into a plot involving legacies, marriages, fornications, and displacements. The death of Julius's Merz wife, Melanie, a dim, determined girl, leads to his marriage to an Englishwoman, Caroline Trafford, a beautiful, fickle, interesting wife and, briefly, mother. The actual legacies are frittered away, and the figurative legacy of Caroline to Julius is a German house and a precocious daughter, who supposedly is narrator. The chronicle is mainly narrated in the third person.

A Favourite of the Gods, set in Italy, might appear to be a departure from A Legacy, but it is not. Often called "Jamesian" for its account of a wealthy American girl who marries a corrupt Roman minor aristocrat, it is James-like only in theme. The Italians here are caricatures, uttering "Già" and "Meno male," while Anna the American is such only by description. Over-filled with incident, the novel relates the education of Constanza, Anna's daughter, who is brought up in Edwardian England when Anna cannot stomach her husband's adultery. Again people eat and drink fabulously, fall in and out of loves and beds, while potted history is served in chunks: "Meanwhile, Mussolini marched on Rome." History here, as in the later A Compass Error and Jigsaw, is outlined, reported, but the characters do not actually live and have their fictional reality in that history. Constanza marries Simon Herbert, the author's least convincing character. A pacifist by conviction, he nevertheless is commissioned and sent to the trenches, emerging promptly with a convenient wound. A brilliant career follows, and an arranged divorce from Constanza permits his marriage to a press tycoon's daughter. Simon dies young. Constanza's daughter, Flavia, is born in 1914; after the war, Contanza moves from lover to lover but remains unmarried and at odds with Anna, the dowager-heroine. Wonderful episodes occur, but the novel suffers from a weak structure and a surfeit of raw matter.

Flavia is the narrator of A Compass Error, the structure of which is pure disaster. Left alone at 17 in Provence to swot for entrance to Oxford, Flavia engages in a lesbian affair and consumes some 53 pages of this brief novel to recapitulate in monologue to her lover the entire contents of A Favourite of the Gods. A psychologically improbable plot involving Constanza's last chance at marriage to a French intellectual unfolds. Flavia is again precocious, a great imbiber of claret, and intellectually ambitious as well as bisexual. Plot tends to falsify chronicle, which has its own twists and turns.

Jigsaw is a novel only by courtesy. Despite some novelistic touches, it is transparently personal memoir, as well as an explanation of the structural difficulties of the two preceding novels. We are back in the territory of Legacy, with the story of young Billi's (for Sybille) early years at Feldkirch with her father, the impoverished Julius, eating smoked mutton but drinking the rare clarets surviving from better days. Like Flavia, like Constanza, she moves as a young girl to London, then to Provence, and the dubious tutelage of her egotistical, beautiful, self-indulgent mother, who declines into poverty and drug addiction. Again the text is packed with incident, with essays on wine and politics, but now with actual historical figures: Aldous and Maria Huxley; Cyril Connolly, Roy Campbell, Ivy Compton-Burnett among them. Again a precocious girl aspires to university and fails, but a writer's career beckons (that distinguished career as travel writer and reporter which has also been Bedford's). Characters and entire episodes are lifted from the preceding narratives, but the story is frankly her own, with elements of confession and muted justification. Although eminently readable, the whole fails to do justice to splendid parts.

Bedford's affinity is perhaps not with Mann or Broch, but with Huxley and Compton-Burnett, whom she imitates, and with Molly Keane, who tells over and again the same story with elegant and delightful variations, comic turns with tragic overtones.

—John McCormick

BELL, Madison Smartt

Nationality: American. Born: Williamson County, Tennessee, 1 August 1957. Education: Princeton University, New Jersey, A.B. (summa cum laude) in English 1979; Hollins College, Virginia, M.A. 1981. Family: Married Elizabeth Spires in 1985; one daughter. Career: Writer-in-residence, Goucher College, Towson, Maryland, 1984–86, 1988–89; lecturer, YMHA Poetry Center, New York, 1984–86; visiting lecturer, University of Iowa Writers Workshop, Iowa City, 1987–88; lecturer, Johns Hopkins University Writing Seminars, Baltimore, Maryland, 1989–91. Awards: Lillian Smith award, 1989; Guggenheim fellowship, 1991; Maryland State Arts Council award, 1991; Howard Foundation fellowship, 1991; Robert Penn Warren award for the Fellowship of Southern Writers, 1995. Agent: Vivienne Schuster, John Farquharson Ltd., 162–168 Regent Street, London W1R 5TB, England; or, Jane Gelfman, John Farquharson Ltd., 250 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10107. Address: Department of English, Goucher College, Towson, Maryland 21204, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Washington Square Ensemble. New York, Viking Press, and London, Deutsch, 1983.

Waiting for the End of the World. New York, Ticknor and Fields, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1985.

Straight Cut. New York, Ticknor and Fields, 1986; London, Chatto and Windus, 1987.

The Year of Silence. New York, Ticknor and Fields, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1987.

Soldier's Joy. New York, Ticknor and Fields, 1989.

Doctor Sleep. San Diego, Harcourt Brace, 1991.

Save Me, Joe Louis. San Diego, Harcourt Brace, 1993.

All Souls' Rising. New York, Pantheon, and London, Granta, 1995.

Ten Indians. New York, Pantheon Books, 1996.

Master of the Crossroads. New York, Pantheon Books, 2000.

Short Stories

Zero db and Other Stories. New York, Ticknor and Fields, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1987.

Barking Man and Other Stories. New York, Ticknor and Fields, 1990.

Other

The History of the Owen Graduate School of Management. Nashville, Tennessee, Vanderbilt University, 1988.

Narrative Design, a Writer's Guide to Structure. New York, W.W. Norton, 1997.

* * *

Madison Smartt Bell's special province is the sensuousness of desperation, the aesthetic hideaways in which the disenchanted, disenfranchised, and dysfunctional seek refuge from storms raging in their own minds. That has been clear from his first novel, The Washington Square Ensemble, whose tangle of first-person narratives follows a gang of urban heroin dealers through a jungle of violence and sin.

The violence and frantic edge-running of Bell's novels invite comparison with the early novels of Robert Stone. Both writers probe the grimy underbelly of life and characters balanced precariously between suicide and murder. But as dark as Bell's tales may be, rays of affirmation seep in, unlike Stone's. For Stone's characters, the darkening world offers little chance to wrench from it a life. But for Bell's, the moral condition of the world is either static or cyclic rather than entropic. There are dusks, but there are also dawns. In that way, Bell's world may be truer than Stone's, and less soul-deadening.

Bell's characters are in quest of redemption and rebirth. They'll blow bullet holes in traditional moral tablets, as do Stone's, but they seem more eager to pick up a pen and write new ones than to cling to the pistol.

This quest appears in Bell's 1985 novel, Waiting for the End of the World, the story of a plot to detonate a nuclear device under New York. Larkin, an associate member of a cell led by the profoundly maladjusted psychiatrist Simon Rohnstock, has the unenviable position of human trigger for the weapon—a kind of guerrilla Valhalla entirely appropriate to Bell's message, for the author seems to suggest that only gestures of immense proportion can have any lasting impact in an age of mass lassitude.

Ultimately, collective will disintegrates as Rohnstock decides that this venture might be just the vehicle to propel him to parapolitical supremacy, and Larkin begins to doubt his own purpose. By this stage however, the focus has shifted towards the novel's other themes: Larkin has "adopted" Tommy, the child victim of vicious ritualistic abuse, and is being pursued by the boy's demented father a dark avenging angel. Descending into the detritus of New York society, Bell unifies several quasi-religious sub-texts, blending a spate of spontaneous combustions, elements of Russian Orthodoxy, and a liberal dose of Satanism. The subsequent action takes on mystic overtones—Tommy's real name is revealed to be Gabriel, and he, previously mute, manifests visionary powers and a voice suitable to their expression. Larkin's own spectacular fate is just one of many impressive flashes of invention that litter a script which is both a convincing study of personal motivation and an accomplished semiallegorical interpretation of late twentieth-century malaise.

Straight Cut reveals a clear movement towards order. Bell follows the rivalry between Tracy Bateman and Kevin Carter, former friends and colleagues in an independent film-making company that has been their cover for drug smuggling. Kevin and Tracy represent two sides of the same nature, one scheming and manipulative, the other intuitive and unambiguous; platonically in love with each other and both in love with Tracy's estranged wife Lauren. The real interest of the book lies not in the high-tension plot twists, but in the duel between intellect and instinct, a tussle kept alive brilliantly by Bell's rapid scene shifting and neat line in tough-guy backchat.

The Year of Silence fuses multiple narrative perspectives, offering a series of individual reactions to Marian's death from an overdose. Friends, lovers, and nodding acquaintances are all struggling desperately to come to terms with a world bereft of her presence. In truth, only Gwen, Marian's cousin, has by the end of the book reached a compromise, and we leave her in the sanctuary of a white clapboard holiday home, preparing to restart her life. The loss of a 'flair for transforming the tacky into something transcendent' is to be mourned, but whether it quite merits the indulgence of a whole book is questionable. Depending on your preference, Bell either offers a stunning essay on the idolization of vacuousness or fails to evoke sufficient sympathy for Marian for us to feel much moved by the bleatings of the bereaved.

If The Year of Silence lacks completeness, almost all of the pieces in Zero db are the finished article: polished, absorbing, and of a consistently high standard. This is Bell in virtuoso form, producing an utterly compelling range of voice and concern, and throwing off the shades of Faulkner and Poe which have coloured his previous technical and imaginative achievements. "Today Is a Good Day to Die" is a memorable highlight, and, happily, in "Triptych I" and "Triptych II" we are at last afforded a real insight, from an insider, into life on a Tennessee hog farm.

In Soldier's Joy, Thomas Laidlaw returns from Vietnam to his family's now-deserted farm outside Nashville. A loner, Laidlaw wants little more than peace, freedom to roam the landscape, and time to hone his considerable talents as a bluegrass banjo player. He's been half a world away dispensing and avoiding death.

Tennessee seems the ideal place to heal from a disorienting war. Bell's minutely observed description make Laidlaw's deliberate actions feel like Nick Adams returning to the Big Two-Hearted River, his farm an arcadian balm to his senses. Then comes Laidlaw's reunion with his black childhood friend and Vietnam comrade Rodney Redmon, and Laidlaw learns he has simply left one war zone for another. Soldier's Joy is a tale of life lived close to the bone. Once again Bell tenses his muscular grip on the feel and meaning of violence, wrenching a piece of literary art from a plot whose outline could sound like that of a television movie.

In Doctor Sleep, Bell weaves an arresting if uneven tapestry. Its several threads unfurl from three closely observed days and nights in the life of Adrian Strother. Four years earlier, Adrian had sworn off both heroin and New York City and moved to London. Now he works as a hypnotist, "a sort of psychological repairman," whose most interesting client, Eleanor Peavy, suffers multiple personalities: prim Miss Peavey by day, prostitute Nell by night.

She is the least of Adrian's problems. Wracked by insomnia, he walks London's streets where a serial killer brutally murders little girls. Mistaken for his friend Stuart (a born-again former addict now forming a heroin self-help center), Adrian is stalked by thugs and abducted by London's chief heroin distributor. When drug traffickers are not hunting him, he's hunting them under pressure from Scotland Yard. On free nights, he moonlights as a stage hypnotist at a burlesque club or works out at a tae kwon do studio and spars with his West Indian friend Terence after class in the dark.

Back in Adrian's flat, his pet boa constrictor is losing color and won't eat, and Adrian's neglected girlfriend Clara has left him for the fourth time. Nicole—the dazzling former call-girl Stuart battered and Adrian secretly married—is in London, maybe to pick up with Adrian again or maybe to ask him for a divorce. All the while, Adrian reflects obsessively on the Hermetic mysticism of Renaissance philosopher Giorano Bruno. Little wonder Adrian cannot sleep.

As far removed from the Tennessee hills, glacial pacing, and third-person restraint of Soldier's Joy as Doctor Sleep is, the two books feel strongly linked. Like returning soldier Thomas Laidlaw, Adrian seldom eats and never sleeps, has thematically important attachments to both his male friends and his animals, and is painfully reticent about his feelings. Most importantly, like Laidlaw just back from Vietnam, Adrian is a solitary figure in need of healing.

There is nothing new about that. Since his first novel, The Washington Square Ensemble, with its cluster of heroin dealers, Bell has always written with conspicuous sympathy for the alienated and the bruised. He searches for characters beaten down by a combination of life and poor choices, whose hearts (to paraphrase a line of Spires's) are a bit off-center, yet who desire affirmation. At some point, a moment flickers where new choice is possible, and they choose to move toward grace, often amid religious symbolism.

As the elements of Doctor Sleep bond artfully together—as Eleanor Peavey's pathology links to the vicious child murders which tie to the London drug lord who bears on Adrian's work with Scotland Yard and Adrian's need to face the truth which joins him in spirit to Eleanor Peavey—perhaps the most important element turns out to be Adrian's fasting snake. Adrian feels a Jungian connection to it and keeps it "in honor and acknowledgment of the snake in" himself. The boa constrictor will not eat for the same reason Adrian cannot sleep: he is undergoing a dramatic metamorphosis.

Bell may not always hide the symbolic seams where plot and philosophy join, he can oversensationalize an ending, and his fascination for characters from society's dingiest creases does put off some readers. But in Doctor Sleep he once again artfully blends perceptiveness, a deadpan mastery of the grotesque, and a startling profundity of mind.

Though Bell meanders between the beatific Appalachian rurality of his childhood, the decaying gothic grandeur of the New York that nursed from him his first novel, and foggy London, he is, in fact, a regional writer. His region is the misty border buffering purgatory from hell in the sootiest creases of contemporary society. In Save Me, Joe Louis, 23-year-old Macrae walks that border. He is AWOL from the army and living in New York's Hell's Kitchen. He hasn't enjoyed much of anything since his teen years in Tennessee when he was in love, without knowing it, with a spirited photographer named Lacy.

Petulant and lost, Macrae often takes "a wring fork in the crisscross trails of conversation" and blindly strews mines along his own path. He forms unfortunate attachments, one to a prostitute whose pimp decides to blow half her head off. Macrae's most dangerous alliance is with his increasingly unstable partner-in-crime Charlie, whose rationale—"Ain't nobody cares that much what you do"—faintly recalls Flannery O'Connor's Misfit. After they've made New York too hot for their comfort by forcing people to withdraw and turn over money from their ATMs, they head south to Baltimore where they add a third partner, a benign young black man named Porter, fresh off a jail term for a bar fight that turned inadvertently gory. The three hold up an armored bank truck, but police arrive, bullets fly, and the trio heads full speed for Macrae's father's farm outside of Nashville.

Were trigger-happy Charlie not with him, Macrae might at last feel he's returned from far east of Eden. There's the potential for a wholesome life in Tennessee. Adjacent to Macrae's land is the farm of Thomas Laidlaw, the hero of Soldier's Joy. Not only is Laidlaw there, still playing banjo with his bluegrass band and still with Adrienne Wells, but the beautiful Lacy has returned home from art school in Philadelphia. That she still loves Macrae is clear to everyone but him, who keeps stumbling aimlessly in restless confusion. After a robbery attempt which they botch even worse than the Baltimore fiasco, Macrae, Charlie, and Porter flee to the South Carolina coast. There it grows obvious that Macrae may have outlived his usefulness to Charlie, and that the book's final page won't be big enough to hold both of them.

In Save Me, Joe Louis, Bell once again invites us to care about characters who offer scarcely an inch of ground to build affection on. Yet once again, by combining subtle technique and native compassion, he succeeds, walking sympathetically among contemporary thieves and moral lepers with a charity that either converts or shames his readers. All Souls' Rising is the most intensely historical of Bell's works, drawing on a time and place unfamiliar to many American readers—Haiti during its struggle for independence in the late 1700s and early 1800s. The book was a finalist for the National Book Award, but Ten Indians was less well-received. With its diffuse plot surrounding Mike Derlin, a white professional who inexplicably opens a martial arts school in the black projects of Baltimore, it ran the risk of losing focus. Yet All Souls' Rising has proven that Bell can paint beautifully on a large canvas, without losing a sense of the entire picture.

BELLOW, Saul

Nationality: American. Born: Lachine, Quebec, Canada, 10 June 1915; grew up in Montreal; moved with his family to Chicago, 1924. Education: Tuley High School, Chicago, graduated 1933; University of Chicago, 1933-35; Northwestern University, Evanston, Illinois, 1935-37, B.S. (honors) in sociology and anthropology 1937; did graduate work in anthropology at University of Wisconsin, Madison, 1937. Military Service: Served in the United States Merchant Marine, 1944-45. Family: Married 1) Anita Goshkin in 1937 (divorced), one son; 2) Alexandra Tschacbasov in 1956 (divorced), one son; 3) Susan Glassman in 1961 (divorced), one son; 4) Alexandra Ionescu Tulcea in 1975 (divorced 1986); 5) Janis Freedman in 1989, one daughter. Career: Teacher, Pestalozzi-Froebel Teachers College, Chicago, 1938-42; member of the editorial department, "Great Books" Project, Encyclopaedia Britannica, Chicago, 1943-44; freelance editor and reviewer, New York, 1945-46; instructor, 1946, and assistant professor of English, 1948–49, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis; visiting lecturer, New York University, 1950–52; Creative Writing Fellow, Princeton University, New Jersey, 1952-53; member of the English faculty, Bard College, Annandale-on-Hudson, New York, 1953-54; associate professor of English, University of Minnesota, 1954-59; visiting professor of English, University of Puerto Rico, Rio Piedras, 1961; Romanes Lecturer, 1990. Since 1962 professor and chairman, 1970-76, Committee on Social Thought, University of Chicago; now Gruiner Distinguished Services Professor. Co-editor, The Noble Savage, New York, then Cleveland, 1960-62. Fellow, Academy for Policy Study, 1966; fellow, Branford College, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship, 1948, 1955; American Academy grant, 1952, and gold medal, 1977; National Book award, 1954, 1965, 1971; Ford grant, 1959, 1960; Friends of Literature award, 1960; James L. Dow award, 1964; International Literary prize, 1965; Jewish Heritage award, 1968; Formentor prize, 1970; Nobel Prize for Literature, 1976; Pulitzer prize, 1976; Neil Gunn International fellowship, 1977; Brandeis University Creative Arts award, 1978; Malaparte award (Italy), 1984; Scanno award (Italy), 1988; National Book award, for lifetime achievement, 1990; Lifetime Cultural Achivement Award (YIVO Institute for Jewish Research), 1996. D.Litt.: Northwestern University, 1962; Bard College, 1963; Litt.D.: New York University, 1970; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1972; Yale University, 1972; McGill University, Montreal, 1973; Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts, 1973; Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, 1976; Trinity College, Dublin, 1976. Chevalier, 1968, and Commander, 1985, Order of Arts and Letters (France); Commander, Legion of Honor (France), 1983. Member: American Academy, 1970. Agent: Harriett Wasserman Literary Agency, 137 East 36th Street, New York, New York 10016. Address: Committee on Social Thought, University of Chicago, 1126 East 59th Street, Chicago, Illinois 60637, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Dangling Man. New York, Vanguard Press, 1944; London, Lehmann, 1946.

The Victim. New York, Vanguard Press, 1947; London, Lehmann, 1948.

The Adventures of Augie March. New York, Viking Press, 1953; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1954; with an introduction by Martin Amis. New York, Knopf, 1995.

Henderson the Rain King. New York, Viking Press, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1959.

Herzog. New York, Viking Press, 1964; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1965.

Mr. Sammler's Planet. New York, Viking Press, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1970; with an introduction by Stanley Crouch. New York, Penguin Books, 1996.

Humboldt's Gift. New York, Viking Press, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1975.

The Dean's December. New York, Harper, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1982.

More Die of Heartbreak. New York, Morrow, and London, Alison Press, 1987.

The Actual. New York, Viking, 1997.

Ravelstein. New York, Viking, 2000.

Short Stories

Seize the Day, with Three Short Stories and a One-Act Play (includes The Wrecker). New York, Viking Press, 1956; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1957; published as Seize the Day, with an introduction by Cynthia Ozick, New York, Penguin Books, 1996.

Mosby's Memoirs and Other Stories. New York, Viking Press, 1968; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1969.

Him with His Foot in His Mouth and Other Stories. New York, Harper, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1984.

A Theft. New York and London, Penguin, 1989.

The Bellarosa Connection. New York and London, Penguin, 1989. Something to Remember Me By: Three Tales. New York, Viking, and London, Penguin, 1991.

The American Short Story: A Collection of the Best Known and Most Memorable Short Stories by the Great American Authors (contributor), edited by Thomas K. Parkes. New York, Galahad, 1994.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Mexican General," in Partisan Reader, edited by William Phillips and Philip Rahv. New York, Dial Press, 1946.
- "Dora," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), November 1949.
- "A Sermon by Dr. Pep," in The Best American Short Stories 1950, edited by Martha Foley. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1950.
- "The Trip to Galena," in Partisan Review (New York), November-December 1950.
- "Address by Gooley MacDowell to the Hasbeens Club of Chicago," in Nelson Algren's Book of Lonesome Monsters, edited by Nelson Algren. New York, Lancer, 1962; London, Panther, 1964.
- "The Old System," in Playboy (Chicago), January 1968.
- "Burdens of a Lone Survivor," in Esquire (New York), December 1974.

Plays

The Wrecker (televised 1964). Included in Seize the Day, 1956.Scenes from Humanitas: A Farce, in Partisan Review (New Brunswick, New Jersey), Summer 1962.

The Last Analysis (produced New York 1964; Derby, 1967). New York, Viking Press, 1965; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1966.

Under the Weather (includes Out from Under, A Wen, and Orange Soufflé, produced Edinburgh and New York, 1966; as The Bellow Plays, produced London, 1966). A Wen published in Esquire (New York), January 1965; in Traverse Plays, edited by Jim Haynes, London, Penguin, 1966; Orange Soufflé published in Traverse Plays, 1966; in Best Short Plays of the World Theatre 1968–1973, edited by Stanley Richards, New York, Crown, 1973.

Television Plays: The Wrecker, 1964.

Other

Dessins, by Jesse Reichek; text by Bellow and Christian Zervos. Paris, Editions Cahiers d'Art, 1960.

Recent American Fiction: A Lecture. Washington, D.C., Library of Congress, 1963.

Like You're Nobody: The Letters of Louis Gallo to Saul Bellow, 1961–62, Plus Oedipus-Schmoedipus, The Story That Started It All. New York, Dimensions Press, 1966.

Technology and the Frontiers of Knowledge, with others. New York, Doubleday, 1973.

The Portable Saul Bellow, edited by Gabriel Josipovici. New York, Viking Press, 1974; London, Penguin, 1977.

To Jerusalem and Back: A Personal Account. New York, Viking Press, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1976.

Nobel Lecture. Stockholm, United States Information Service, 1977.Conversations with Saul Bellow, edited by Gloria L. Cronin and Ben Siegel. Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1994.

It All Adds Up: From the Dim Past to the Certain Future. New York, Viking, 1994.

The Collected Essays of Ralph Ellison (preface), edited by John F. Callahan. New York, Modern Library, 1995.

Foreword, Sixty Years of Great Fiction from Partisan Review, edited by William Phillips. Boston, Partisan Review Press, 1997.

Foreword, Clean Hands: Clair Patterson's Crusade against Environmental Lead Contamination, edited by Cliff I. Davidson. Commack, New York, Nova Science Publishers, 1998.

Editor, Great Jewish Short Stories. New York, Dell, 1963; London, Vallentine Mitchell, 1971.

^

Bibliographies: Saul Bellow: A Comprehensive Bibliography by B.A. Sokoloff and Mark E. Posner, Norwood, Pennsylvania, Norwood Editions, 1973; Saul Bellow, His Works and His Critics: An Annotated International Bibliography by Marianne Nault, New York, Garland, 1977; Saul Bellow: A Bibliography of Secondary Sources by F. Lercangée, Brussels, Center for American Studies, 1977; Saul Bellow: A Reference Guide by Robert G. Noreen, Boston, Hall, 1978; Saul Bellow: An Annotated Bibliography by Gloria L. Cronin, New York, Garland, 2nd edition, 1987.

Manuscript Collections: Regenstein Library, University of Chicago; University of Texas, Austin.

Critical Studies (selection): Saul Bellow by Tony Tanner, Edinburgh, Oliver and Boyd, 1965, New York, Barnes and Noble, 1967;

Saul Bellow by Earl Rovit, Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1967, and Saul Bellow: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by Rovit, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, Prentice Hall, 1975; Saul Bellow: A Critical Essay by Robert Detweiler, Grand Rapids, Michigan, Eerdmans, 1967; The Novels of Saul Bellow by Keith Michael Opdahl, University Park, Pennsylvania State University Press, 1967; Saul Bellow and the Critics edited by Irving Malin, New York, New York University Press, and London, University of London Press, 1967, and Saul Bellow's Fiction by Malin, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1969; Saul Bellow: In Defense of Man by John Jacob Clayton, Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1968, revised edition, 1979; Saul Bellow by Robert R. Dutton, New York, Twayne, 1971, revised edition, 1982; Saul Bellow by Brigitte Scheer-Schäzler, New York, Ungar, 1973; Saul Bellow's Enigmatic Laughter by Sarah Blacher Cohen, Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1974; Whence the Power? The Artistry and Humanity of Saul Bellow by M. Gilbert Porter, Columbia, University of Missouri Press, 1974; Saul Bellow: The Problem of Affirmation by Chirantan Kulshrestha, New Delhi and London, Arnold-Heinemann, 1978, Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey, Humanities Press, 1979; Critical Essays on Saul Bellow edited by Stanley Trachtenberg, Boston, Hall, 1979; Quest for the Human: An Exploration of Saul Bellow's Fiction by Eusebio L. Rodrigues, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, Bucknell University Press, 1981; Saul Bellow by Malcolm Bradbury, London, Methuen, 1983; Saul Bellow's Moral Vision: A Critical Study of the Jewish Experience by L.H. Goldman, New York, Irvington, 1983; Saul Bellow: Vision and Revision by Daniel Fuchs, Durham, North Carolina, Duke University Press, 1984; Saul Bellow and History by Judie Newman, New York, St. Martin's Press, and London, Macmillan, 1984; A Sort of Columbus: The American Voyages of Saul Bellow's Fiction by Jeanne Braham, Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1984; On Bellow's Planet: Readings from the Dark Side, Rutherford, New Jersey, Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1985, and Herzog: The Limits of Ideas, London, Maxwell Macmillan, 1990, both by Jonathan Wilson; Saul Bellow by Robert F. Kiernan, New York, Crossroad Continuum, 1988; Saul Bellow and the Decline of Humanism by Michael K. Glenday, London, Macmillan, 1990; Saul Bellow: Against the Grain by Ellen Pifer, University Park, Pennsylvania State University Press, 1990; Saul Bellow: A Biography of the Imagination by Ruth Miller, New York, St. Martin's Press, 1991; Saul Bellow at Seventy-Five: A Collection of Critical Essays edited by Gerhard Bach, Tubingen, Narr, 1991; Saul Bellow by Peter Hyland, New York, St. Martin's Press, 1992; Saul Bellow: A Mosaic compiled by Aharoni et al., New York, Lang, 1992; Character and Narration in the Short Fiction of Saul Bellow by Marianne M. Friedrich, New York, Lang, 1993; Saul Bellow: The Feminine Mystique by Tarlochan Singh Anand, Jalandhar, India, ABS, 1993; Quest for Salvation in Saul Bellow's Novels by Kyung-Ae Kim, Frankfurt am Main, Lang, 1994; Saul Bellow and the Struggle at the Center edited by Eugene Hollahan, New York, AMS Press, 1994; The Critical Response to Saul Bellow, edited by Gerhard Bach. Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1995; Handsome Is: Adventures with Saul Bellow: A Memoir by Harriett Wasserman. New York, Fromm International, 1997; Prophets of Recognition: Ideology and the Individual in Novels by Ralph Ellison, Toni Morrison, Saul Bellow, and Eudora Welty by Julia Eichelberger, Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1999; Small Planets: Saul Bellow and the Art of Short Fiction, edited by Gerhard Bach and Gloria L. Cronin, East Lansing, Michigan State University Press, 2000; A Room of His Own: In Search of the Feminine in the Novels of Saul Bellow by Gloria L. Cronin, Syracuse, New York, Syracuse University Press, 2000.

* * *

Saul Bellow is widely recognized as America's preeminent living novelist. His fiction, which is as intellectually demanding as it is imaginatively appealing, steadfastly affirms the value of the human soul while simultaneously recognizing the claims of community and the demoralizing inauthenticity of daily life. Refusing to give in to the pessimism and despair that threaten to overwhelm American experience, Bellow offers a persistently optimistic, though often tentative and ambiguous, alternative to postmodern alienation. In their struggle to understand their past and reorder their present, his protagonists chart a course of possibility for all who would live meaningfully in urban American society.

Reflecting the stylistic influence of Flaubert, Bellow's first two novels, Dangling Man and The Victim, are brief and disciplined works, darker in mood and less intellectually complex than the later fiction but featuring protagonists who anticipate later Bellovian heroes both in their introspection and in their resistance to urban apathy. The first novel to display Bellow's characteristic expansiveness and optimism, The Adventures of Augie March presents a dazzling panorama of comically eccentric characters in a picaresque tale narrated by the irrepressible title character, who defends human possibility by embracing the hope that "There may gods turn up anywhere." Subsequent novels vary in tone from the intensity of Seize the Day to the exuberance of Henderson the Rain King to the ironic ambiguity of Herzog, but all explore the nature of human freedom and the tensions between the individual's need for self and society. Augie March, Tommy Wilhelm, Eugene Henderson, and Moses Herzog all yearn to redeem themselves by finding the beauty in life. By creating these highly individualistic characters and the milieu in which they move, Bellow reveals the flashes of the extraordinary in the ordinary that make such redemption possible and rejects the attitude that everyday life must be trivial and ignoble.

This redemption of the self paradoxically requires the surrender of the self. Nowhere is this fact more vividly portrayed than in Henderson the Rain King. Driven in the beginning by a relentless inner voice that repeats, "I want! I want!," Henderson's egoistic absorption in his material success ironically alienates him from himself. Fleeing civilization to seek fundamental truths in the wilderness of Africa, he discovers the loving relationship that humans need with nature and with each other and symbolically surrenders his self by accepting responsibility for a lion cub and an orphan child.

In their quest to find the love that gives meaning to life, Bellow's protagonists must also come to terms with death. The message Bellow conveys in almost all of his novels is that one must know death to know the meaning of life and what it means to be human. Henderson overcomes his fear of death when he is buried and symbolically resurrected in the African king Dahfu's experiment. Similarly, in Seize the Day, Tommy Wilhelm confronts death in a symbolic drowning. Charlie Citrine in Humboldt's Gift echoes Whitman in viewing death as the essential question, recognizing that it is only through death that the soul can complete the cycle of life by liberating itself from the body. Bellow's meditations on death darken in Mr. Sammler's Planet and The Dean's December. While the title character in Mr. Sammler's Planet awaits the death of the person he most values in the world, Bellow contemplates the approaching death of Western culture at the hands of those who have abandoned humanistic values. The Dean's December presents an apocalyptic vision of urban decay in a Chicago totally lacking the comic touches that soften Charlie Citrone's portrait of this same city as a "moronic inferno" in Humboldt's Gift. With More Die of Heartbreak and the recent novellas, however, Bellow returns to his more characteristic blend of pathos and farce in contemplating the relationship between life and death. In the recent Ravelstein, Bellow once again charts this essential confrontation when Chick recounts not only his best friend's death from AIDS but also his own near-death experience from food poisoning. Through this foreground, in a fictionalized memoir to his own friend Allan Bloom, Bellow reveals the resilient love and tenderness that offer the modern world its saving grace.

Because Bellow refuses to devalue human potential in even his bleakest scenarios, his novels often come under attack for their affirmative endings. Augie hails himself as a new Columbus, the rediscoverer of America; Henderson, while triumphantly returning home with his new charges, dances with glee, "leaping, leaping, pounding, and tingling over the pure white lining of the grey Arctic silence." Herzog inexplicably evades his fate, emerging from the flux of his tortured mind to reclaim his sanity and his confidence in the future. Yet, the victories of Bellow's heroes are not unqualified, but rather as ambiguous and tenuous as is the human condition itself. As a new Columbus, Augie speaks from exile in Europe; in holding the orphan child, Henderson recalls the pain of his separation from his own father; by renouncing his self-pity and his murderous rage at his ex-wife Madeleine, Herzog reduces but does not expiate his guilt. Nonetheless, these characters earn whatever spiritual victory they reap through their pain and their refusal to succumb to doubt and cynicism. Through their perseverance in seeking the truth of human existence, they ultimately renew themselves by transcending to an intuitive spiritual awareness that is no less real because it must be taken on faith.

In all of Bellow's works, an appreciation of the cultural context in which his protagonists struggle is essential to understanding these characters and their search for renewal. Bellow's vision centers almost exclusively on Jewish male experience in contemporary urban America. Proud of their heritage, his heroes are usually second-generation Jewish immigrants who seek to discover how they can live meaningfully in their American present while honoring their ties to the past. Much of their ability to maintain their belief in humanity despite their knowledge of the world can be attributed to the affirmative nature of the Jewish culture. Bellovian heroes live in a WASP society in which they are only partially assimilated. However, as Jews have done historically, they maintain their concern for morality and community despite their cultural displacement.

Though in some ways separated from American society, Bellow's protagonists also strongly connect their identity with America. Augie begins his adventures by claiming, "I am an American, Chicago born—Chicago, that somber city." Almost all of Bellow's novels take place in an American city, most often Chicago or New York. Through his depiction of urban reality, Bellow anchors his novels in the actual world, and he uses the city as his central metaphor for contemporary materialism. Although recognizing the importance of history and memory, Bellow's novels maintain a constant engagement with the present moment. His characters move in the real world, confronting sensuous images of urban chaos and clutter that often threaten to overwhelm them. Looking down on the Hudson River, Tommy Wilhelm sees "tugs with matted beards of cordage" and "the red bones of new apartments rising on the bluffs." Sammler denounces contemporary New Yorkers for the "free ways of barbarism'' that they practice beneath the guise of "civilized order, property rights [and] refined technological organization." In Humboldt's Gift, which is replete with images of cannibalism and vampirism, Charlie Citrone sees Von Trenck, the source of his material success, as "the blood-scent that attracted the sharks of Chicago." Acknowledging the influence of the city on his fiction, Bellow himself has remarked, "I don't know how I could possibly separate my knowledge of life such as it is, from the city. I could no more tell you how deeply it's gotten into my bones than the lady who paints radium dials in the clock factory can tell you." However, although the city serves to identify the deterministic social pressures that threaten to destroy civilization, Bellow's heroes refuse to become its victims and instead draw on its latent resources of vitality to reassert their uniquely American belief in individual freedom, as well as their faith in the possibility of community.

Except for Clara Velde in A Theft, the protagonists in Bellow's novels and novellas are all male. The Bellovian hero typically seeks erotic pleasure, emotional security, and egoistic confirmation from the women in his life. In marriage, his relationships with women are conflicted, and he often retreats from his role as husband to a sensuous but selfish and demanding wife who paradoxically represents both his yearning for happiness and society's pressure to relinquish the freedom so essential to his self-realization. In contrast to the complex shadings that delineate his male characters, Bellow's females are often interchangeable and serve roles of little dramatic import. However, although the author has come under increasing criticism for his superficial treatment of women, his depiction of women and malefemale relationships serves to reinforce the psychological crisis that each protagonist must negotiate to achieve peace and fulfillment.

Stylistically, Bellow's fiction reflects some of the same tensions that his protagonists seek to balance. His concern with social and personal destruction has been traced to European writers such as Flaubert, Dostoevsky, Kafka, Sartre, and Camus. But Bellow's fiction also has many ties to the American literary tradition. His neotranscendentalism, his identification with America, and the loose form of his most acclaimed novels link him most obviously to Emerson and Whitman. An intensely intellectual writer who peppers his novels with allusions, Bellow draws on many cultural traditions in his analysis of both the sources of American experience and its present manifestations. His fiction fully documents the decline of Western civilization without conceding its demise, and the ambiguity and tenuousness of even his most positive endings balance sadness and comic skepticism with the steadfast faith that the artist can effect coherence and order out of the chaos of modern experience. For his achievement in confronting the modern existential dilemma with compassion and humor, Bellow's place in twentieth-century American literary history seems assured.

—Sharon Talley

BENFORD, Gregory Albert

Also writes as Sterling Blake. Nationality: American. Born: Mobile, Alabama, 30 January 1941. Education: University of Oklahoma, B.S. 1963; University of California, San Diego, M.S. 1965, Ph.D.

1967. Family: Married Joan Abbe in 1967; one son, one daughter. Career: Fellow, Lawrence Radiation Laboratory, Livermore, California, 1967–69, research physicist, 1969–71, consultant; assistant professor, University of California, Irvine, 1971–73, associate professor, 1973–79, professor of physics, 1979—. Awards: Woodrow Wilson fellowship, 1963–64; National Science Foundation grant, 1972–76; Nebula award, Science Fiction Writers of America, 1975, 1981; Office of Naval Research grant, 1975, 1982; Army Research Organization grant, 1977–82; British Science Fiction Association award, 1981; John W. Campbell award, World Science Fiction Convention, 1981; Ditmar award for International Novel, 1981; Air Force Office of Scientific Research grant, 1982; California Space Office grant, 1984–85. Address: Department of Physics, University of California, Irvine, California 92717, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Deeper Than the Darkness. New York, Ace, 1970; revised as The Stars in Shroud, New York, Putnam, 1979.

Jupiter Project (for children). Nashville, Thomas Nelson, 1975; second edition, 1980.

If the Stars Are Gods (with Gordon Eklund). New York, Putnam, 1977.

In the Ocean of Night. New York, Dial, 1977.

Find the Changeling (with Gordon Eklund). New York, Dial, 1980. Shiva Descending (with William Rotsler). New York, Avon, 1980.

Timescape. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1980.

Against Infinity. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1983.

Across the Sea of Suns. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1984.

Time's Rub. New Castle, Virginia, Cheap Street, 1984.

Artifact. New York, Tor, 1985.

Of Space-Time and the River. New Castle, Virginia, Cheap Street, 1985.

In Alien Flesh. New York, Tor, 1986.

Heart of the Comet (with David Brin). New York, Bantam, 1986.

Great Sky River. Toronto, Bantam, 1987.

Under the Wheel (with others). Riverside, New York, Baen, 1987.

We Could Do Worse. Abbenford Associates, 1988.

Tides of Light. Toronto, Bantam, 1989.

Beyond the Fall of Night (with Arthur C. Clarke). New York, Putnam, 1990.

Centigrade 233. New Castle, Virginia, Cheap Street, 1990.

Chiller (under pseudonym Sterling Blake). New York, Bantam, 1993.

Furious Gulf. New York, Bantam, 1994.

Sailing Bright Eternity. New York, Bantam, 1995.

Foundation's Fear. New York, HarperPrism, 1997.

Cosm. New York, Avon Eos, 1998.

The Martian Race. New York, Warner Books, 1999.

Eater: A Novel. New York, Avon Eos, 2000.

Short Stories

In Alien Flesh. New York, T. Doherty Associates, 1986. Matter's End. New Castle, Virginia, Cheap Street, 1991.

Other

Deep Time: How Humanity Communicates Across Millennia (nonfiction). New York, Avon, 1999.

Foreword, Last and First Men: A Story of the Near and Far Future by Olaf Stapledon. Los Angeles, J. P. Tarcher, 1988.

Introduction, Look Away by George Alec Effinger. Eugene, Oregon, Axolotl Press, 1990.

Contributor, Again, Dangerous Visions, edited by Harlan Ellison. New York, Doubleday, 1972.

Contributor, Threads of Time: Three Original Novellas of Science Fiction, edited by Robert Silverberg. Nashville, Thomas Nelson, 1974.

Contributor, Universe 4, edited by Terry Carr. New York, Random House, 1974.

Contributor, New Dimensions 5, edited by Robert Silverberg. New York, Harper, 1975.

Contributor, Universe 8, edited by Terry Carr. New York, Doubleday, 1978.

Contributor, Universe 9, edited by Terry Carr. New York, Doubleday, 1979.

Contributor, Synergy: New Science Fiction, edited by George Zebrowski. San Diego, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1988.

Contributor, Isaac Asimov's War, edited by Gardner Dozois. New York, Ace Books, 1993.

Contributor, Roads Not Taken: Tales of Alternate History, edited by Gardner Dozois and Stanley Schmidt. New York, Del Rey/Ballantine Books, 1998.

Contributor, Science Fiction Theatre, edited by Brian Forbes. Scottsdale, Arizona, Quadrillion Media, 1999.

Editor, with Martin H. Greenberg, Hitler Victorious: Eleven Stories of the German Victory in World War II. New York, Berkeley Publishing, 1987.

Editor, The New Hugo Winners: Award-Winning Science Fiction Stories, Volume 4. New York, Wynwood Press, 1989–1997.

Editor, with Martin H. Greenberg, What Might Have Been, Volume 4: Alternate Americas. New York, Bantam, 1992.

Editor, Far Futures. New York, Tor, 1995.

Editor, with George Zebrowski, Skylife: Space Habitats in Story and Science. New York, Harcourt Brace, 2000.

*

Critical Studies: Dream Makers: The Uncommon People Who Write Science Fiction: Interviews by Charles Platt, by Charles Platt, New York, Berkeley Books, 1980; Bridges to Science Fiction, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1981; Across the Wounded Galaxies: Interviews with Contemporary American Science Fiction Writers, edited by Larry McCaffery, Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1990.

* * *

Gregory Benford is an important American science fiction writer who is also a physicist of some distinction. The combination of large literary ambition and an ongoing scientific career (he is a professor of physics at the University of California, Irvine) has given Benford's work a depth of scientific speculation that is unsurpassed among writers of his generation. Beginning with his first novel, Deeper Than the Darkness, Benford has explored again and again the nature of intelligence in the universe, the place of Homo sapiens in that universe, and the role of science within the larger human culture. Benford's scientific career informs his work not only with the rigor of scientific knowledge that underlies his fiction, but also with the process of doing science, of science as a living profession. To find a body of fiction that so carefully and consistently explores the scientific impulse one would have to look at the novels of C.P. Snow from the generation preceding Benford, or those of Richard Powers from a generation later.

Benford's southern roots are also central to his literary work. Born in Alabama in 1941, Benford was greatly influenced by the works of William Faulkner. Faulkner's stylistic innovations and experiments continue to echo in Benford's often poetic and occasionally stream-of-consciousness prose; Benford's 1983 novel, Against Infinity was an homage to Faulkner's "The Bear." Benford's familiarity with the main currents and voices of modern literature are reflected throughout his work.

Equally clear is his familiarity with and understanding of the nature of science fiction and its place in the body of literature. Benford's insights into science fiction's tropes and traditions enable him continually to explore and extend those traditions even as he introduces new and fresh themes of his own. His early novel for young readers, Jupiter Project, was a clear homage the works of Robert A. Heinlein, the most influential science fiction writer of the twentieth century. In essays and criticism Benford has presented a clear and sharp understanding of the literary opportunities and limitations of science fiction.

His early work—his first short story appeared in 1965—in fact seems in retrospect to be exploratory, with science fiction itself, and the nature of Benford's own abilities, the territory being explored. He worked frequently with collaborators, and on more than one occasion revisited earlier works, revising, for example, Deeper Than the Darkness as The Stars in Shroud, making it a richer and more textured (if slightly less youthfully exuberant) novel.

Never a prolific short story writer, Benford displayed a comfort at novella-length works, and by the late 1970s was using long stories to create a backdrop for a fictional cycle concerned with human contact with non-human intelligence. These early works were assembled as a novel, In the Ocean of Night, in 1977.

Even as Benford's novellas displayed an increasingly distinctive voice—and while simultaneously pursuing a full-time and intensive scientific and teaching career—he was creating the novel that would elevate him from his promising beginnings to a position of importance within science fiction. Timescape, published in 1980, transcended all of Benford's work to that date, and remains, simply, the finest and most ambitious literary portrait of scientists at work ever to emerge from science fiction, and one of the best in all of literature. The complex story of a polluted, dying earth, and the scientist who slowly becomes aware of messages from the future that hold the key to saving the planet, Timescape was a mature, balanced, provocative, and occasionally sly work. Ultimately moving and in many ways profound, Timescape presented Benford's view of the universe's indifference to our existence and the ways in which our approach to that indifference shapes us as a species. It was a remarkable and award-winning performance, and is one of the cornerstones of his career.

But Benford embarked on an even more ambitious literary voyage, one that began with the novella-sequence of In the Ocean of Night. The story of astronaut Nigel Walmsley's encounter with and alteration by a non-human intelligence in the near future would provide the foundation for a cycle of novels that would take two decades for Benford to complete and would become, along with Timescape, his major contribution to science fiction. This was the "Galactic Center" saga, a sequence of six novels that move from the near future to the farthest, that employ a variety of literary experiments and techniques to present and explore the nature of intelligent life, and an unequalled portrait of cosmology as it is presently understood.

The non-human intelligence encountered by Walmsley turns out to be machine, rather than organic, in nature. The next novel in the sequence, Across the Sea of Suns, deals with Walmsley's voyage in search of the intelligence that altered him, and with the invasion of earth by beings inimical to human existence. The ambiguous ending of the second novel promised further revelations of Walmsley's destiny, but the next novel in the sequence, Great Sky River, jumped into the far future to tell the story of a family's flight through a brilliantly realized cosmology, pursued by machine intelligences. Succeeding as both literary fiction and rousingly adventurous hard science fiction, Great Sky River raised the bar for portrayals of alien intelligence, and broke much ground in the exploration of machine consciousness and the interface between humans and machines.

Two years later Benford pushed the Galactic Center novels even farther with Tides Of Light. Once more Benford's beleaguered humans—the Family—are locked in a death struggle with overwhelmingly powerful machines, against a vast galactic backdrop. It was becoming clear as the work emerged that Benford was drawing on his scientific knowledge to create fiction in which the universe itself, in addition to the novels' humans and non-humans, was a major character. Few works of science fiction have offered so concrete and poetic a "sense of wonder" at the physical universe's sheer size and strangeness: collapsing stars, whorls and eddies of space-time, bleak planetary vistas, and a lush sensuousness all work together to immerse the reader in Benford's vision.

Nor was the Galactic Center series—or his scientific work—enough to occupy Benford's energies. Always interested in suspense fiction, he turned to the field himself with Artifact, a thriller with an archaeological theme. Another suspense novel, Chiller, was published in 1993 under the pseudonym Sterling Blake. Collaborations over two decades included work with Gordon Eklund, William Rotsler, Mark O. Martin, and David Brin. The most notable of Benford's collaborative works was Heart of the Comet, with Brin, the story of an expedition to Halley's Comet. Benford collected his short stories in two volumes—In Alien Flesh and Matter's End.

After a five-year hiatus from the sequence, Benford returned in 1994 to the Galactic Center, and once again he raised the series' stakes. Furious Gulf follows the fleeing Family toward the True Center, toward ever larger revelations and speculations. Nigel Walmsley, ancient beyond words now, returns to the series as Benford tightens the spring of suspense and presents stunning cosmological speculations. With Sailing Bright Eternity Benford completed the Galactic Center cycle. This novel, which would perhaps seem inscrutable to readers unfamiliar with the preceding volumes, offered a level of surprise and surprisingly emotional, even visionary, transcendence for those who had made the entire journey. In long passages of prose that is essentially poetic, making use of a range of typographical and stylistic techniques, Benford achieved a true ending to his saga, one that presents the reader with an all but heartbreaking sense of intelligence's dual fragility and persistence in an uncaring universe. The Galactic Center sequence is one of science fiction's major accomplishments.

After completing the sequence, Benford turned to less ambitious—but no less entertaining or provocative—novels. The Martian Race was a rigorous look at the challenges a human expedition to Mars might face. His thematically related novels, Cosm and Eater used the form and structure of the thriller to explore questions of scientific responsibility and high-level physics. Along with David Brin and Greg Bear (the trio known as science fiction's "Killer Bs"), Benford wrote one of the three novels of the "Second Foundation Trilogy," set in the universe created by Isaac Asimov. Benford has also edited or co-edited several anthologies of science fiction stories. Benford's Beyond The Fall of Night was both a collaboration with Arthur C. Clarke and a sequel to Clarke's own first novel.

Prolific in nonfiction—both scientific and journalistic—Benford has since the mid-1990s contributed a science column to The Magazine of Fantasy & Science Fiction, as well as a variety of thoughtful and insightful essays on science fiction and science to numerous publications. His 1999 nonfiction book Deep Time explained transmillennial communications strategies to non-scientific audiences. In 1990 he was awarded the United Nations Medal in Literature, and in 1995 he received the Lord Foundation award for his scientific accomplishments. For Japanese broadcaster NHK he wrote and hosted portions of a late-1980s scientific program, A Galactic Odyssey, which, despite a large investment, never aired.

Now in the fourth decade of an extraordinarily prolific career, Benford shows few signs of any diminution of ambition or ability. If his recent novels have operated on a less cosmic scale than his major works, they nonetheless display a still-gathering command of character and psychological insight. Perhaps most interesting about his recent work is Benford's effort to reach out to a larger audience than that of science fiction per se. Should that audience discover him, their attention will be rewarded many times over by this boldest of literary speculators.

-Keith Ferrell

BERGER, John (Peter)

Nationality: British. Born: Stoke Newington, London, 5 November 1926. Education: Central School of Art and the Chelsea School of Art, London. Military Service: Served in the Oxford and Buckinghamshire Infantry, 1944–46. Family: Married twice; three children. Career: Painter and drawing teacher, 1948–55; contributor, Tribune and New Statesman, both London, 1951–60; television narrator, About Time, 1985, and Another Way of Telling, 1989. Artist: exhibitions at Wildenstein, Redfern, and Leicester galleries, London, Denise Cade gallery, New York, 1994. Awards: Booker prize, 1972; Guardian Fiction prize, 1972; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1973; New York Critics prize, for screenplay, 1976; George Orwell Memorial prize, 1977; Barcelona Film Festival Europa award, 1989; Lannan Foundation award, 1989; Australian State prize, 1989. Address: Quincy, Mieussy, 74440 Taninges, France.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Painter of Our Time. London, Secker and Warburg, 1958; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1959.

The Foot of Clive. London, Methuen, 1962.

Corker's Freedom. London, Methuen, 1964; New York, Pantheon, 1993.

G. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Viking Press, 1972

Into Their Labours (trilogy in one volume). New York, Pantheon, 1991; London, Granta, 1992.

Pig Earth (short stories). London, Writers and Readers, 1979; New York, Pantheon, 1980.

Once in Europa (short stories). New York, Pantheon, 1987; Cambridge, Granta, 1989.

Lilac and Flag: An Old Wives' Tale of a City. New York, Pantheon, 1990; Cambridge, Granta, 1991.

To the Wedding. New York, Pantheon, and London, Bloomsbury, 1995.

Photocopies. New York, Pantheon Books, 1996.

King, a Street Story. New York, Pantheon Books, 1999.

Plays

Jonas qui aura 25 ans en l'an 2000 (screenplay), with Alain Tanner.
Lausanne, Cinémathèque Suisse, 1978; translated by Michael Palmer, as Jonah Who Will Be 25 in the Year 2000, Berkeley, California, North Atlantic, 1983.

A Question of Geography, with Nella Bielski (produced Marseille, 1984; Stratford-on-Avon, 1987; London, 1988). London, Faber, 1987.

Les Trois Chaleurs (produced Paris, 1985).

Boris, translated into Welsh by Rhiannon Ifans (produced Cardiff, 1985).

Goya's Last Portrait: The Painter Played Today, with Nella Bielski. London, Faber, 1989.

Screenplays, with Alain Tanner: La Salamandre (The Salamander), 1971, Le Milieu du monde (The Middle of the World), 1974, and Jonas (Jonah Who Will Be 25 in the Year 2000), 1976; Play Me Something, with Timothy Neat, 1989.

Poetry

Pages of the Wound: Poems, Photographs, Drawings by John Berger. London, Circle Press, 1994.

Other

Marcel Frishman, with George Besson. Oxford, Cassirer, 1958.Permanent Red: Essays in Seeing. London, Methuen, 1960; as Towards Reality, New York, Knopf, 1962.

The Success and Failure of Picasso. London, Penguin, 1965; New York, Pantheon, 1980.

A Fortunate Man: The Story of a Country Doctor, photographs by Jean Mohr. London, Allen Lane, and New York, Holt Rinehart, 1967.

Art and Revolution: Ernst Neizvestny and the Role of the Artist in the U.S.S.R. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Pantheon, 1969.

The Moment of Cubism and Other Essays. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Pantheon, 1969.

The Look of Things, edited by Nikos Stangos. London, Penguin, 1972; New York, Viking Press, 1974.

Ways of Seeing, with others. London, BBC-Penguin, 1972; New York, Viking Press, 1973.

A Seventh Man: Migrant Workers in Europe, photographs by Jean Mohr. London, Penguin, and New York, Viking Press, 1975.

About Looking. London, Writers and Readers, and New York, Pantheon, 1980.

Another Way of Telling (on photography), with Jean Mohr. London, Writers and Readers, and New York, Pantheon, 1982.

And Our Faces, My Heart, Brief as Photos. London, Writers and Readers, and New York, Pantheon, 1984.

The White Bird, edited by Lloyd Spencer. London, Chatto and Windus, 1985; as The Sense of Sight, New York, Pantheon, 1986.

Keeping a Rendezvous. New York, Pantheon, 1991; London, Granta, 1992.

Isabelle: A Story in Shots (with Nella Bielski). Chester Springs, Pennsylvania, Dufour Editions, 1998.

Contributor, Happiness and Discontent. Chicago, Great Books Foundation, 1998.

Translator, with Anya Bostock, Poems on the Theatre, by Bertolt Brecht. London, Scorpion Press, 1961; as The Great Art of Living Together: Poems on the Theatre, Bingley, Yorkshire, Granville Press, 1972.

Translator, with Anya Bostock, Helene Weigel, Actress, by Bertolt Brecht. Leipzig, Veb Edition, 1961.

Translator, with Anya Bostock, Return to My Native Land, by Aimé Césaire. London, Penguin, 1969.

Translator, with Lisa Appignanesi, Oranges for the Son of Asher Levy, by Nella Bielski. London, Writers and Readers, 1982.

Translator, with Jonathan Steffen, After Arkadia: The Wickerwork Tram and The Barber's Head, by Nella Bielski. London, Viking, 1991.

不

Critical Studies: Seeing Berger: A Revaluation of Ways of Seeing by Peter Fuller, London, Writers and Readers, 1980, revised edition as Seeing Through Berger, London, Claridge Press, 1988; Ways of Telling: The Work of John Berger by Geoff Dyer, London, Pluto, 1986.

. . .

From his 10 years as art critic for the New Statesman through to his present storytelling narratives concerning AIDS and homelessness, John Berger has been constantly experimenting with various perspectives, voices, and kinds of writing. But certain qualities remain constant in all of his mixed-genre writing: the seriousness of tone and attitude toward human life; the conviction that "seeing comes before words" (Ways of Seeing); the determination to show how the ways of the modern capitalist world distort and destroy lives and imaginations; the spirit of affirmation of, and faith and hope in, possibilities of the creative imagination and humans' capacity as social animals to recognize the roots of value and meaning and to bring about change. As an oppositional and interdisciplinary thinker, Berger sees writing as a social act and writes not out of any particular tradition, but out of his rational and humane Marxist convictions, mitigated somewhat over the years by broader philosophical investigations.

His first three novels are set in the London of the 1950s and 1960s. A Painter of Our Time uses the world of an émigré to explore the crossroads of culture and politics. It arose out of Berger's art critical essays of the 1950s and out of his experiences with people he knew in the art world, particularly certain émigré artists. The novel sets Hungarian painter and scientific socialist Janos Lavin's artistic and political ideals against modern London's cynical and opportunist art business, with which he must deal, and explores his isolation as an exile with no suitable context in which to work.

Berger "thought about [his next three novels] quite consciously in terms of British society" (interview with Diane Watson, May 1988). He maintains that bourgeois society "underdevelops" consciousness and life on an individual level, and empathy consistently informs his fictional portraits of those whose lives are most "underdeveloped," from his examination of those disabled by modern British society, to those ignored or dismissed by Marxism, such as the peasants about whom he writes in his trilogy Into their Labours.

In The Foot of Clive Berger departs permanently from the world of art in his fiction, and dramatizes the minutiae of the daily actions and the subconscious impulses of six men from across the class strata who are patients in a hospital ward. The lack of a collective dream and the void left by the society's destruction of a coherent heroic image informs the quality of life and relations in the ward, a microcosm of British society. Prevented from action, they lead a passive, static existence; all they can do is think, talk, and feed off their fears.

In A Fortunate Man, Berger's most moving work of non-fiction, he describes the situation of "wholesale cultural deprivation"; in Corker's Freedom—his most underrated novel—he illuminates the situation by examining the consequences of this deprivation for one particular individual, Corker, the owner of an employment agency and a self-proclaimed "traveller." Mainly by depicting the contours of Corker's self-consciousness, the novel traces several days in his awakening to what he feels to be his true potential and his struggle to liberate himself from his sister and from his society's expectations of him.

Berger's best known work of fiction, G., closes out the phase of works written from inside the society of which he is most critical; it looks backwards to ideas and struggles of previous work and forwards to the solving of questions it raises about writing and to other possibilities of philosophical-mainly existential and phenomenological—and ideological perspective. This highly technically experimental novel grapples with the living of two kinds of time, historical and subjective, elucidates the workings of memory, and documents the historical preconditions that make a Don Juan possible: the novel is set in the period between the late nineteenth century and the beginning of World War I. G. is grounded in Ways of Seeing, particularly in its consideration of sexual appetite and social roles as determined by political, historical, and cultural contexts. Its global resonance is brought about by the author's imaginative identification with not only particular individuals, but with a historical period of a continent, with a revolutionary class, and with women. The mysterious, cosmopolitan Don Juan figure, G., has brushes with all that is vital about his period in history, but is interested in engaging with nothing but moments of liberation through sexual passion.

Berger described his "thinking about narrative" as "having become tighter and more traditional" after G. ("The Screenwriter as Collaborator," interview in Cineaste, no. 10, 1980), and he turned his attention to a culture whose perspective predates that of progress and capitalism. Throughout the three-part project Into Their Labours comprised of Pig Earth, Once in Europa, and Lilac and Flag, each of which addresses a different stage of this process—he acts as a witness to the disintegration of traditional French peasant work, perspective, and experience, and adopts a storytelling voice and narrative style. In storytelling, Berger has found a language that speaks of and from lived experience, in opposition to that which reflects and perpetuates the constraints and limitations of bourgeois society. He values the art of storytelling for its ability to situate people, individually and collectively, in history, and as a kind of narrative that feeds and answers to imaginative and metaphysical experience. This rich and lyrical trilogy contains some of his best writing, particularly in Once in Europa, a book of love stories that turn on the mystery and amplitude of intimacy.

Berger's penchant for poetic declarations, coupled with his characteristic humanism, lends his fiction a strong sense of the aphoristic and even the allegorical. In his latest two novels, To the Wedding and King: A Street Story, Berger mobilizes a markedly sensual, erotically charged prose to once again explore the nature of political and physical resistance. To the Wedding, for example, is narrated by a blind storyteller who literally "hears" the novel. Berger deftly turns the reader into a "listener of voices" and the effect of the work, so rife with similes and preoccupied with both ancient and modern poetry, is beguilingly lyrical. The plot concerns the trauma of a young woman who contracts AIDS and, specifically, the uncovering of her past and the past of her family and friends as they journey to her wedding. Berger's specific descriptions of the physical body combating the AIDS virus constitute a terrible but revealing analogy of political struggle. When Nino, the protagonist, is eventually diagnosed the narrator confronts the utter bleakness of her situation and asks: "How to change nothing into everything?" It is a jarring and resolutely Berger-esque question—and one that King, Berger's most recent fiction, takes up directly.

King's eponymous protagonist—ostensibly a dog—is a sort of roving watch-mutt, not to mention a first-rate yarn-spinner, for a group of homeless squatters living on a motorway-bordering wasteland. Early on in the novel, King interrupts his own narrative to relate a brief parable about a sparrow trapped inside a house. As King explains, the bird eventually finds its way back into the air and then releases a chirp of joy. King itself, the reader recognizes, is a meditation about freedom and also, fundamentally, about the political responsibilities of the storyteller. Though King is essentially a tragic, even pessimistic novel—the squatters are, in the end, violently removed from the land—such is Berger's gift that his multi-vocal reportage seems to survive the community's destruction.

As unflinchingly brutal as Berger's descriptions of dispossession and human evil can be, the very act of writing remains—Berger convinces one of this—a sign of profound hope. Throughout his evolution from one of Britain's best social realists to master storyteller, his aim remains consistent: to point to possibilities of disalienation. And while his fiction moves increasingly in the direction of philosophical speculation and metaphysical rumination, it loses none of its political impact. Thus the small, seemingly insignificant sparrow engaged in its heroic escape comes to resonate and challenge the most dire, most bleak of closures. As Berger writes in his essay "The White Bird": "Under the fallen boulder of an avalanche a flower grows."

—Diane Watson, updated by Jake Kennedy

BERGER, Thomas (Louis)

Nationality: American. Born: Cincinnati, Ohio, 20 July 1924. Education: The University of Cincinnati, B.A. 1948; Columbia University, New York, 1950-51. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1943–46. Family: Married Jeanne Redpath in 1950. Career: Librarian, Rand School of Social Science, New York, 1948-51; staff member, New York Times Index, 1951-52; associate editor, Popular Science Monthly, New York, 1952-54; film critic, Esquire, New York, 1972-73; writer-in-residence, University of Kansas, Lawrence, 1974; Distinguished Visiting Professor, Southampton College, New York, 1975-76; visiting lecturer, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1981, 1982; Regents' Lecturer, University of California, Davis, 1982. Awards: Dial fellowship, 1962; Western Heritage award, 1965; Rosenthal award, 1965. Litt.D.: Long Island University, Greenvale, New York, 1986. Agent: Don Congdon Associates, 156 Fifth Avenue, Suite 625, New York, New York 10010, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Crazy in Berlin. New York, Scribner, 1958.

Reinhart in Love. New York, Scribner, 1962; London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1963.

Little Big Man. New York, Dial Press, 1964; London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1965.

Killing Time. New York, Dial Press, 1967; London Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1968.

Vital Parts. New York, Baron, 1970; London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1971.

Regiment of Women. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1973; London, Eyre Methuen, 1974.

Sneaky People. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1975; London, Methuen, 1980.

Who Is Teddy Villanova? New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Eyre Methuen, 1977.

Arthur Rex: A Legendary Novel. New York, Delacorte Press, 1978; London, Methuen, 1979.

Neighbors. New York, Delacorte Press, 1980; London, Methuen, 1981.

Reinhart's Women. New York, Delacorte Press, 1981; London, Methuen, 1982.

The Feud. New York, Delacorte Press, 1983; London, Methuen, 1984.

Nowhere. New York, Delacorte Press, 1985; London, Methuen, 1986.Being Invisible. Boston, Little Brown, 1987; London, Methuen, 1988.The Houseguest. Boston, Little Brown, 1988; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1989.

Changing the Past. Boston, Little Brown, 1989; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1990.

Orrie's Story. Boston, Little Brown, 1990.

Meeting Evil. Boston, Little Brown, 1992.

Robert Crews. New York, Morrow, 1994.

Suspects. New York, William Morrow and Company, 1996. The Return of Little Big Man. Boston, Little, Brown, 1999.

Short Stories

Granted Wishes. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1984.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Professor Hyde," in Playboy (Chicago), December 1961.
- "A Monkey of His Own," in Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia), 22 May 1965.
- "Fatuous Fables," in Penthouse (London), March 1973.
- "Envy," in Oui (Chicago), April 1975.
- "The Achievement of Dr. Poon," in American Review 25, edited by Theodore Solotaroff. New York, Bantam, 1976.
- "Tales of the Animal Crime Squad," in Playboy (Chicago), December 1980.
- "The Methuselah Factor," in Gentlemen's Quarterly (New York), September 1984.
- "Planet of the Losers," in Playboy (Chicago), November 1988.
- "Gibberish," in Playboy (Chicago), December 1990.
- "Personal Power," in Playboy (Chicago), December 1992.

Play

Other People (produced Stockbridge, Massachussetts, 1970).

*

Film Adaptations: Little Big Man, 1970; The Neighbors, 1981; The Feud, 1989.

Bibliography: "Thomas Berger: Primary and Secondary Works" by James Bense, in Bulletin of Bibliography 6(2), 1994.

Manuscript Collection: Boston University Library.

Critical Studies: "Bitter Comedy" by Richard Schickel, in Commentary (New York), July 1970; "Thomas Berger's Little Big Man as History" by Leo Oliva, in Western American Literature (Fort Collins, Colorado), vol. 8, nos. 1–2, 1973; "Thomas Berger's Elan" by Douglas Hughes, in Confrontation (New York), Spring-Summer 1976; "The Radical Americanist" by Brooks Landon, and "The Second Decade of Little Big Man" by Frederick Turner, both in Nation (New York), 20 August 1977; "Berger and Barth: The Comedy of Decomposition" by Stanley Trachtenberg, in Comic Relief edited by Sarah Blacher Cohen, Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1978; "Thomas Berger Issue" (includes bibliography) of Studies in American Humor (San Marcos, Texas), Spring and Fall 1983; "Reinhart as Hero and Clown" by Gerald Weales, in Hollins Critic (Hollins College, Virginia), December 1983; "Laughter as Self-Defense in Who Is Teddy Villanova?," in Studies in American Humor (San Marcos, Texas), Spring 1986, and "A Murderous Clarity: A Reading of Thomas Berger's Killing Time," in Philological Quarterly (Iowa City), Winter 1989, both by Jon Wallace; Thomas Berger by Brooks Landon, Boston, Twayne, 1989; Critical Essays on Thomas Berger edited by David W. Madden, New York, G. K. Hall, 1995.

Thomas Berger comments:

I write to amuse and conceal myself.

* * *

Thomas Berger's novels exhibit an extraordinary comic sensibility, a satiric talent for wild caricature, and a concern for the quality of middle-class life in middle America. His novels chronicle the decline and fall of the Common Man in 20th-century America and meticulously detail the absurdities of our civilizations. Berger is one of the subtlest and most accurate parodists writing today, with a flawless sense of style and proportion that is charged with comic vitality.

His Reinhart saga (Crazy in Berlin, Reinhart in Love, Vital Parts, and Reinhart's Women) follows Carlo Reinhart from adolescence to middle age, detailing his career as a soldier in occupied Germany, a GI Bill student, and a failed wage-slave and decrepit father in the bewildering America of the 1980s. Reinhart epitomizes the failure of good intentions. A believer in the American Dream as purveyed in magazines, high-school classrooms, and advertisements, Carlo is a constant victim of deceit and fraud. Like the Good Soldier Schweik, Carlo takes the world at face value and assumes that appearance is reality; unlike Schweik, Carlo is guileless and incapable of hypocrisy, so he is perpetually victimized and disillusioned. The comedy arises in the gulf between Carlo's expectations and his experience.

In Crazy in Berlin Carlo is swept up in conspiracy, involved with spies and criminals dividing the spoils of the fallen Nazi state. A good-natured slob and summer soldier, Carlo survives, but he is driven to murder and madness, shattered not by war but by the lunacy of peace. The novel exudes the bitter ironies of sophisticated slapstick comedy, similar to Preston Sturges's films. Carlo, a bewildered, optimistic average man, is driven mad by the Hobbesian nightmare of Occupied Germany.

The second novel, Reinhart in Love, continues the mock-heroic saga. Carlo returns to the purported normality of peace-time America to continue college on the GI Bill. Again he is duped, exploited, and betrayed as Orlando himself, charged with cosmic love: "Reinhart was in love with everything." But as his boss tells him, the world is still a Hobbesian jungle, with every man's hand raised against his fellows: 'life, real life, is exactly like the fighting, except in the latter you use guns and therefore don't destroy as many people.' The novel ends with Carlo married by deception to a shrew, failed even at suicide and bereft of ideals and ambitions, ready to move upward and onward.

Vital Parts moves ahead 20 years to reveal Reinhart still married to his shrew and father to a fat, mooning daughter and a vicious ne'erdo-well son. He has failed at every capitalistic venture, lost his hair and youth, gained debts and a paunch. Again in suicidal despair, he becomes involved in a bizarre cryogenics scheme—to immortality via technology. He becomes the guinea pig in a scheme to freeze and revive a human being. Carlo feels he has little to choose between an absurd life, an absurd death, and a remote hope of immortality.

In Reinhart's Women, Carlo achieves a degree of peace with his wife and daughter, as he takes on a new role as a gourmet cook. Berger makes Carlo here less the ever-ready butt of slapstick and more the master of his destiny, as if Carlo were growing in later middle age into himself. The book's comedy is mellower and less acerbic than the view of corrupt post-World War II culture from which Berger began the saga.

In Little Big Man Berger also uses mock-heroic satire, here on the elaborate mythology of the Old West. A tale of cowboys and Indians told from both views, the novel describes the only white survivor of the Battle of the Little Big Horn—111-year-old Jack Crabb, victim of Indian attacks, Indian, Indian-fighter, gunfighter, gambler, con man, etc. The novel follows the "half-man, half-alligator" tradition of frontier humor, bursting with gigantic hyperbole. It is also a detailed, convincing picture of prairie life, both with the Cheyenne (the "Human Beings") and with the white settlers. The violence, squalor, and monotony of life in raw nature are as intensely realized as the farce. Jack Crabb is a frontier Carlo Reinhart, with the same insecurities, the same propensities for confusion and cowardice, the same common humanity.

Arthur Rex may be the finest redaction of the legend since Malory. It is a labor of love for pure story and style in which Berger's brilliant prose is honed like Excalibur itself. A straightforward rendering of the Arthurian material, the novel is a tribute to romance, adventure, and storytelling as the roots of our literature. Berger makes the characters come sharply alive in vigorous, dramatic scenes and retains the mixture of exuberance and nostalgia which defines the ancient cycle.

A theme inherent in Berger's work is that of metamorphosis transformation, counterfeiting, deception, the shiftiness of reality. Who Is Teddy Villanova?, Nowhere, and Neighbors focus on this theme. Detective fiction and cold-war thrillers are parodied in the first two novels, which follow the hapless adventures of Russel Wren, an inept semi-pro detective who is constantly overwhelmed by violent events beyond his perception. Who Is Teddy Villanova? caricatures the conventions of the tough-guy detective novel, and Nowhere brilliantly combines the spy story and the utopian romance. An atmosphere of bizarre paranoia suffuses both installments of the Wren romance. In Neighbors the same mode is applied to suburban realities. Earl Keese, prone to hallucinations, is subjected to a series of emotional and mental assaults by a man and woman who move in next door. The story turns on paradoxes and illusions, an increasingly grotesque feeling that things are never what they seem. In Berger's view, our culture has crashed through the looking glass, where absurdity rules all and everything turns by subtle and malicious irony into its opposite.

Sneaky People and The Feud also anatomize middle-class American life; both are set in the 1930s and deal with the peculiar conflation of acquisitiveness and sexuality which creates the ethos for the people-next-door culture described in Neighbors. A mixture of healthy cynicism and obvious nostalgia makes the narratives attractive as satires on the conventional American success story. The Houseguest extends the comedy of domestic paranoia that shaped Sneaky People, Neighbors, and The Feud. In his usual absurdist/surrealist manner, Berger constructs a Kafkaesque novel of invaded hospitality and territorial hostility.

Being Invisible and Changing the Past mine Berger's fantasticspeculative vein. Each is a cautionary tale about power—one on the old idea of the presumed powers of invisibility, the other a "three wishes" story of a man granted the power to relive his life. The novels are fables on the vanity of human wishes and the inevitability of overreaching. Their comedy mirrors serious concerns with the ethics of power, the intractability of ego and the illusory nature of freedom and choice.

In Orrie's Story Berger retells the Orestes legend as a contemporary, post-Vietnam fiction. Less successfully than in the majestic Arthur Rex, he reinvents the past to illumine our complex present. Suspects, Berger's twentieth novel, is a murder mystery busy with extraneous details, as though the author was not content to offer up something so ordinary as a good, solidly suspenseful read. It came on the heels of Robert Crews, which found him on familiar ground: the tale of a hapless figure who ultimately finds a place for himself—if not a full understanding of his circumstances—in the midst of a larger drama. As its title suggests, the protagonist is a Robinson Crusoe type, and his "Friday" is a woman running away from her abusive husband. With The Return of Little Big Man, Berger stepped onto even more familiar territory. The book finds the unflappable Jack Crabb at age 112, witnessing events ranging from the shootout at the O.K. Corral (predictably, this time Wyatt Earp is the villain, not the Clanton brothers) and the appearance of Buffalo Bill and Annie Oakley in London, where Queen Victoria attends their Wild West Show.

-William J. Schafer

BETTS, Doris

Nationality: American. Born: Statesville, North Carolina, 4 June 1932. Education: Woman's College, Greensboro, North Carolina, 1950-53; University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1954. Family: Married Lowry M. Betts in 1952; one daughter and two sons. Career: Journalist, Statesville Daily Record, 1950-51; Chapel Hill Weekly and News Leader, 1953-54; Sanford Daily Herald, 1956-57. Editorial staff, N.C. Democrat, 1961; editor, Sanford News Leader, 1962. Lecturer of creative writing, 1966–74, associate professor of English, 1974-78, professor of English, 1978-80, and since 1980 Alumni Distinguished Professor of English, University of North Carolina. Director, freshman-sophmore English, 1972–76; Fellows program, 1975–76; assistant dean, honors program, 1979–81; and faculty chair (elected), 1980-83, University of North Carolina. Visiting lecturer, Duke University, 1971; member of the board, 1979–81, and chair, 1981, Associated Writing Programs, National Endowment for the Arts. Awards: G.P. Putnam-U.N.C. Booklength Fiction prize, 1954; Sir Walter Raleigh Best Fiction by Carolinian award, 1957, for Tall Houses in Winter, 1965, for Scarlet Thread; Guggenheim fellowhsip, 1958; North Carolina Medal, 1975, for literature; Parker award, 1982-85, for literary achievement; John dos Passos award, 1983; American Academy of Arts and Letters Medal of Merit, 1989, for short story; Academy award, for Violet. Honorary D.Litt.: Greensboro College, 1987, and University of North Carolina, 1990; D.H.L., Erskine College, 1994. Member: National Humanities Center, 1993. Agent: Russell and Volkening, 50 West 29th Street, New York, New York 1001, USA. Address: c/o English Department, CB# 3520, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, North Carolina 27599–3520, USA.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Tall Houses in Winter. New York, Putnam, 1954; London, Gollancz, 1955.

The Scarlet Thread. New York, Harper, 1964.

The River to Pickle Beach. New York, Harper, 1972; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1995.

Heading West. New York, Knopf, 1981.

Souls Raised from the Dead. New York, Knopf, 1994.

The Sharp Teeth of Love. New York, Knopf, 1997.

Short Stories

The Gentle Insurrection. New York, Putnam, 1954; published as The Gentle Insurrection and Other Stories. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1997.

The Astronomer and Other Stories. New York, Harper, 1966; Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1995.

Beasts of the Southern Wild. New York, Harper, 1973; published as Beasts of the Southern Wild and Other Stories. New York, Scribner, 1998.

*

Film Adaptation: Violet, adaptation from her own short story "The Ugliest Pilgrim."

Manuscript Collection: Boston University, Boston.

Critical Studies: The Home Truth of Doris Betts, North Carolina, Methodist College Press, 1992; Doris Betts by Elizabeth Evans, New York, Twayne, 1997.

* * *

Doris Betts's writing is deeply informed by her religious sensibility, not in a dogmatic or didactic sense but in the way of one who asks important questions about good and evil, life and death, and who finds meaning in the universe and in the ways people respond to it. The biblical story of Job's much-tried faith could be considered a touchstone for Betts, and her fiction concerns similar trials in the 20th-century South, particularly North Carolina. Her earliest work tends to probe these philosophical questions in a somewhat programmatic way, as in "Mr. Shawn and Father Scott" in her first collection of short stories, The Gentle Insurrection. But four decades later in her novel, Souls Raised From the Dead, Betts's mature insights and highly developed techniques make her work incandescent with wisdom about the human condition.

In her second novel, The Scarlet Thread, Betts uses the experiences of the rapidly rising and dissolving Allen family of a North Carolina mill town to probe questions of human suffering. Through Thomas, the middle child, Betts explores the origins of evil. Thomas, from childhood on, exhibits anger and cruelty that culminate in the physical and mental abuse of his fragile wife, Nellie. One naturally wonders what made Thomas so, and one could respond that it was his belief that his siblings were "favored" both by life and their parents; his feelings of frustration and powerlessness were alleviated only through the power of cruelty. Betts, though, does not allow us to accept such a simplistic causal chain because Thomas's childhood and family are at least as good, and probably better, than those of most people around him, particularly the "mill children" and even his own siblings. His sister, Esther, responds to a jilting by leaving town and founding a new life. His brother, David, an artist in a world of philistines, pulls himself out of a life of drift backed by his parents' money to accept the challenge of learning the art of stone carving. Betts seems to suggest that even though all meet adversity in one sense or another, it is the individual's response to it that reveals whatever happiness is possible.

Betts's third novel, The River to Pickle Beach, continues to engage the question of human suffering through the contrasting responses of a married couple, Jack and Bebe Sellars. Jack responds to life's uncertainties with reserve and caution. He learns, plans, and avoids as much as he can, but his anxieties about the future will not let him enjoy the present; when he and Bebe embark on a new life as managers of a small beach resort, his fear of the impending visit of the owner's retarded relations blocks his own exhilaration at their new venture. It also prevents him from sharing Bebe's pleasure in the world of ocean and beach since Bebe meets life with optimism and joy, despite such disappointments as her childlessness. Jack's old army buddy, Mickey McCane, however, uses his rough childhood as the son of a disappearing and whoring mother to justify his need for power through the sexual degradation of women. When Bebe rejects his advances, Mickey does not learn that his demeaning attitude bars him from any meaningful relations with women but instead seeks the phallic power of guns on the easy target of the physically and mentally defective visitors whom, he subconsciously fears, represent his real self.

Abduction by a criminal who calls himself Dwight Anderson is the trial for North Carolina librarian Nancy Finch in Betts's fourth novel, Heading West. What started as a kidnapping becomes an opportunity for Nancy to escape not only Dwight but her self-made bonds to her elderly mother, epileptic brother, and spoiled sister. Nancy chooses to "head west" with him, bypassing some possibilities of escape, since she seems to fear her trivialized servitude to her family more than this dangerous criminal; she is learning that all he can do is kill her quickly as opposed to the slow death her "normal" life has become. She tests herself through her grueling flight from Dwight in the Grand Canyon and emerges victorious; he plunges to his death in an attempt to make himself feel powerful by controlling her with taunts and threats. Throughout her captivity, Nancy has attempted to find out what made Dwight so manipulative, affectless, and dehumanized—essentially to confront the problem of evil—and she continues to investigate his background as she heads back east alone. She learns that he was the "bad twin" raised by a crazed and begging grandmother; his brother, however damaged, has remained law-abiding. Again, Betts suggests that it is not circumstances, but the response to them that makes the man or woman and that even the horrors of an abduction have the potential for good in one who can learn from them.

What many would regard as the ultimate horror or evil, the death of a child, is Betts's subject in her fifth novel, Souls Raised from the  Dead. Over the course of the novel, lively, intelligent Mary Grace Thompson dies of chronic renal failure, and those around her are tested like Job. As she always has, Mary Grace's mother escapes into her narcissistic world of men, mobility, and beauty rituals. Her father, Frank, a policeman who has seen much evil and suffering, must come to terms with Mary's illness, an adversary that cannot be confronted and vanquished by physical force. Unlike Mary's mother, Frank overcomes his tendency to avoid emotional situations in order to stand by Mary and to meet his commitments to life and work, friendships and family. His mother, Tacey, has always been a religious woman, but now her faith meets and surmounts, however tentatively, its ultimate challenge, surviving a grandchild who should have survived her. As this novel so painfully yet inspiringly suggests, for Betts we all have the potential to be "souls raised from the dead" no matter how life—and our situations in it—deny our circumstances.

-Veronica Makowsky

BILLINGTON, (Lady) Rachel (Mary)

Nationality: British. Born: Rachel Mary Pakenham, Oxford, 11 May 1942; daughter of the writers Lord Longford and Elizabeth Longford; sister of the writer Antonia Fraser. Education: University of London, B.A. (honors) in English 1963. Family: Married the film and theatre director Kevin Billington in 1967; two sons and two daughters. Career: Freelance writer; reviewer for Financial Times and Evening Standard, both London, and New York Times; columnist, Sunday Telegraph, London. Agent: David Higham Associates Ltd., 5–8 Lower John Street, London W1R 4HA, England. Address: The Court House, Poyntington, Nr. Sherborne, Dorset DT9 4LF, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

All Things Nice. London, Heinemann, 1969.

The Big Dipper. London, Heinemann, 1970.

Lilacs Out of the Dead Land. London, Heinemann, 1971; New York, Saturday Review Press, 1972.

Cock Robin; or, A Fight for Male Survival. London, Heinemann, 1972.

Beautiful. London, Heinemann, and New York, Coward McCann, 1974.

- A Painted Devil. London, Heinemann, and New York, Coward McCann, 1975.
- A Woman's Age. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1979; New York, Summit, 1980.
- Occasion of Sin. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1982; New York, Summit, 1983.
- The Garish Day. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1985; New York, Morrow, 1986.

Loving Attitudes. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Morrow, 1988.

Theo and Matilda. London, Macmillan, 1990; New York, HarperCollins, 1991.

Bodily Harm. London, Macmillan, 1993.

Magic and Fate: Being the Not Quite Believable Adventures of Sissie Slipper. London, Macmillan, 1996.

Perfect Happiness. London, Sceptre, 1996.

Uncollected Short Stories

"One Afternoon," in Winter's Tales 1 (new series), edited by David Hughes. London, Constable, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1985.

"The Photograph," in Winter's Tales 2 (new series), edited by Robin Baird-Smith. London, Constable, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1986.

Plays

Radio Plays: Mrs. Bleasdale's Lodger, 1976; Mary, Mary, 1977; Sister, Sister, 1978; Have You Seen Guy Fawkes?, 1979.

Television Plays: Don't Be Silly, 1979; Life after Death, 1981.

Other (for children)

Rosanna and the Wizard-Robot. London, Methuen, 1981.

The First Christmas. London, Collins Harvill, 1983; Wilton, Connecticut, Morehouse Barlow, 1987.

Star-Time. London, Methuen, 1984.

The First Easter. London, Constable, and Grand Rapids, Michigan, Eerdmans, 1987.

The First Miracles. London, Collins Harvill, 1990; Grand Rapids, Michigan, Eerdmans, 1991.

Other

The Great Umbilical, Mother Daughter Mother. London, Macmillan, 1994.

* * *

On a surface level the novels of Rachel Billington reflect the conventions of the upper-class comedy of manners. Her works are invariably set within an aristocratic milieu, their central characters a privileged churchgoing elite of country or London gentry, whose condescension towards the lower orders seems a natural response. Billington's books are distinguished by an adroit use of language, personalities revealed through conversations that display a keen, often caustic wit. Yet beneath the outward show of humor lurks a strong tendency to violence, which manifests itself in the conflicts of obsessional love.

In All Things Nice and The Big Dipper the wit and comedy predominate, these early novels emerging as vehicles for the author's stylistic skills. Lilacs Out of the Dead Land is both deeper and more dark. April, the younger daughter of moneyed parents, travels to Italy with her married lover. During their time together, she is forced to reassess their relationship in the context of her elder sister's death. The infatuation that draws her to the lover is slowly countered by the fear of being smothered by his love. As the tension builds inside her, events move swiftly to the cathartic act of violence. More complex and unsettling than its predecessors, Lilacs Out of the Dead Land shows considerable narrative skill, the author switching fluently from April's time with her lover to scenes with her parents, at the school where she teaches, and her last encounter with her sister. Dialogue fits the dovetailed scenes, each character perfectly matched by his or her patterns of speech. This novel is an early indication of the psychological depths that lie under the surface glitter of Billington's work.

Beautiful and Cock Robin are lighter, but accomplished creations, the elegant prose and polite behavior merely masking the pathological impulses deeper down. Cock Robin centers on the male narrator's passion for three girls at his university, all of them seemingly unattainable. The book follows the four of them in their careers, where the young man gradually emerges as the dominant figure, while the three goddesses prove to be tragic failures. The bitchy wit is in evidence, the story itself eminently credible, if marked by a heartless gloss. In Beautiful, obsessive passion again appears as a destructive force. Lucy, the flawless, amoral heroine of the novel, has thus far been able to shape the world in her image as it revolves around her. Alex, the discarded lover unwilling to let go, threatens to shatter that world and its fake stability: "Lucy prided herself on her understanding of the human psyche; with the unmentionable exception of Alex, no one had ever stepped out of the role in which she had cast them." Once more the course is set for a violent resolution. A light, tautly written work, with short terse scenes and skilful dialogue, Beautiful shows the author at her most assured, the hard sheen of the surface and the murky underlying depths in perfect balance.

A Painted Devil is altogether more sinister, revealing Billington's vision at its grimmest. Obsessional love is again the agent of destruction, embodied in Edward, the negative central character. A painter of genius, Edward draws unquestioning adoration from his wife and friends, while giving nothing in return. His cold, remote personality, its inhuman quality symbolized by his hatred of physical love, is subtly glimpsed in conversation and unuttered thoughts. In A Painted Devil the glittering crust of civilized behavior is thin indeed, the novel becoming increasingly horrific as one tragedy follows another. Cruellest of all Billington's works, it is nevertheless a memorable achievement.

A Woman's Age is a new departure, the comedy of manners forsaken for an epic novel spanning a period of 70 years. It focuses mainly on the figure of Violet Hesketh, who survives a difficult childhood and broken marriages to find a successful career in politics. A mammoth undertaking, the novel shows its author's ability to convey the essence of the passing years, but one cannot help feeling that it lacks the bite and conviction of some of her shorter works, and it is in the latter that her main strength as a writer lies.

With Occasion of Sin is another experiment, this time a contemporary retelling of Tolstoy's Anna Karenina; Billington's account of the lawyer's wife who falls for a computer software executive follows the original closely, both in characters and incidents, but avoids too slavish an interpretation, particularly in some of its solutions. A worthy variant of the classic novel, the depth of this novel's theme is matched by a highly effective use of language, with Billington's mastery of dialogue well to the fore. The Garish Day is an ambitious saga covering two generations of diplomats at the time of the British Raj. A similar epic approach is taken in Theo and Matilda, where the lovers of the title are explored in various incarnations, through Saxon, Tudor, and Victorian periods to the present day. Their adventures are set against the background of Abbeyfields, whose landscape changes with the centuries from monastery to manor house, lunatic asylum, mental hospital, and finally "des res." Billington handles her epic materials with style and conviction, and Theo and Matilda must be judged the most impressive of her large-scale works.

Loving Attitudes centers on the confrontation between the successful media professional Mary Tempest and her unacknowledged daughter, the product of a youthful love affair. Their unexpected meeting leads Mary to a reassessment of her marriage and family, and to a fresh exploration of that earlier love. The gradual unfolding of the tangle of relationships is accomplished neatly and without strain, the characters sensitively portrayed as they are forced to confront the consequences of their actions.

Bodily Harm, a more powerful, disturbing novel, opens with a brutal knife attack on a young woman by a total stranger in a London shop. The girl survives and her attacker is jailed, but the passage of time draws them inexorably back together. Their slow recovery and rehabilitation, the reasons behind the attack, and the eventual resolution are achieved with masterly skill, action presented from the alternating viewpoints of the two protagonists, the climactic scene approached with a sequence of brief snapshot images and incidents. Bodily Harm ranks with the finest of Billington's work and is clear proof of her ability to blend stylistic flair with increasingly complex themes.

—Geoff Sadler

BINCHY, Maeve

Nationality: Irish. Born: Dublin, 28 May 1940. Education: Holy Child Convent, Killiney, County Dublin; University College, Dublin, B.A. in education. Family: Married Gordon Snell in 1977. Career: History and French teacher, Pembroke School, Dublin, 1961–68. Since 1968 columnist, Irish Times, Dublin. Agent: Christine Green, 2 Barbon Close, London WC1N 3JX, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Light a Penny Candle. London, Century, 1982; New York, Viking, 1983.

Echoes. London, Century, 1985; New York, Viking, 1986.

Firefly Summer. London, Century, 1987; New York, Delacorte Press, 1988.

Circle of Friends. London, Century, 1990; New York, Delacorte Press, 1991.

The Copper Beach. London, Orion, 1992; New York, Delacorte Press, 1993.

The Glass Lake. London, Orion, 1994; New York, Delacorte Press, 1995.

Evening Class. New York, Delacorte Press, 1996. Tara Road. New York, Delacorte Press, 1996.

Short Stories

Central Line. London, Quartet, 1978.

Victoria Line. London, Quartet, 1980.

Dublin 4. Dublin, Ward River Press, 1982; London, Century, 1983.London Transports (includes Central Line and Victoria Line).London, Century, 1983; New York, Dell, 1986.

The Lilac Bus. Dublin, Ward River Press, 1984; London, Century, 1986; New York, Delacorte Press, 1992.

Silver Wedding. London, Century, 1988; New York, Delacorte Press, 1989.

Dublin People. Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1993.

This Year It Will Be Different and Other Stories: A Christmas Treasury. New York, Delacorte Press, 1996.

The Return Journey. New York, Delacorte Press, 1996.

Plays

End of Term (produced Dublin, 1976).

Half Promised Land (produced Dublin, 1979).

Television Plays: Deeply Regretted By—, 1976; Echoes, from her own novel, 1988; The Lilac Bus, from her own story, 1991.

Other

My First Book. Dublin, Irish Times, 1978.

Maeve's Diary. Dublin, Irish Times, 1979.

Dear Maeve: Writings from the "Irish Times." Dublin, Poolbeg Press, 1995.

Aches and Pains, illustrated by Wendy Shea. New York, Delacorte Press, 2000.

Contributor, Ladies' Night at Finbar's Hotel, edited by Dermot Bolger. New York, Harcourt, 2000.

*

Maeve Binchy comments:

I write novels and stories set within my own experience of time and place, but they are not autobiographical. They mainly touch on the emotions of women and the aspirations and hopes of young Irishwomen growing up in the relatively closed society of Ireland in the 1950s and 1960s.

* * *

Maeve Binchy's best-selling novels set in mid-century Ireland alternate in form between works that focus on one woman or a pair of friends and collections of interlocking stories organized in a posy or grand chain. This was a form she developed early in The Lilac Bus, a collection on a group of passengers who travel home from Dublin every weekend, and repeats in The Copper Beach and Silver Wedding. Binchy's work is marked by her understanding of the social and economic structure of small Irish county towns—the grid of shop-keepers, doctors, lawyers, and hotel keepers who serve and order the community under the omnipresent supervision of the church.

Binchy's work, though marketed as romances, by no means fits that category precisely. Binchy, a longstanding columnist for The Irish Times, presents a realistic picture of the lives of women ordered within the rigidities of Catholic orthodoxy that forbid divorce and abortion. In her work, women's survival is predicated on the creation of powerful, though informal, networks of alliance and friendships that survive the vicissitudes of pregnancy, forced marriage, and alcoholism.

Such sociological accuracy does not support the illusions of romance. Although Benny, the large, only daughter of over-protective shopkeepers, in Circle of Friends, does win the love of the handsome soccer hero of the university, she painfully discovers his insubstantiality. The romance pattern of other novels is complicated by Binchy's decision to pursue her heroines' lives after the altar. In Echoes, the heroine's triumphant marriage to the doctor's son is succeeded by a first year of domestic unhappiness, postpartum depression, and despair. In Light a Penny Candle, the heroine, safely married, in a quarrel pushes her husband down the stairs and kills him. In both novels, the promise of a safe haven in marriage is complicated by Binchy's clear insight into the painful restrictions of domesticity.

Although women's friendships, formed often at eight or ten, last through adolescent love, courtship, marriage, abortion, domestic violence, and encompass even murder, systems of political, religious, and social authority remain controlled by men. Binchy's heroines struggle against, but do not entirely triumph over these circumstances. Binchy is too aware of particular constraints on Irish women's lives to allow easy rewards. In Echoes the conventional Bildungsroman features an intelligent heroine Clare, aged ten, who enters an essay competition. We await the triumphant rise of the sweetshop owner's daughter. Yet the necessary boundaries around Clare's triumphs are suggested by the echoing story of the teacher who encourages her. Angela O'Hara was once a successful student. She, like Clare, won a scholarship, yet was inexorably pulled back to Castlebay by the domestic responsibilities for an ailing mother that devolve on an unmarried daughter in an Irish family. Add to that boundary of success for an intellectual woman, the unavailability of contraception, and Binchy has created a life for her heroine more realistically limited than the popular romance usually provides.

Light a Penny Candle traces the story of two women whose friendship began when Elizabeth arrived in a small Irish town as a wartime evacuee. The loyalty of the childhood friendship of Aisling and Elizabeth is deepened through the vicissitudes of feminine experience—an abortion in London, a lover who will never marry, an alcoholic husband, and an unconsummated marriage. The pattern of their lives is shaped by the men they marry, until, in a frightening, though not fully confronted moment, the Englishwoman, Elizabeth, pushes her husband down the stairs and kills him accidentally. The silence of her best friend over the manslaughter she has witnessed demonstrates the depth of female bonding. In Light a Penny Candle, Binchy suggests that this violent accident may be nurtured by the stifling restraints of bourgeois marriage. Elizabeth's mother dies in an insane asylum after a violent attack on her husband. Her mother's murder of her lover is the secret that isolates Leo from her friends in The Copper Beach.

Firefly Summer, combining the two forms, centers on the successful marriage of Kate and John Ryan, a marriage that survives the appalling, almost casual, accident that cripples Kate for life, and links that story with the varied responses in the village to the building of a luxury hotel in a Georgian mansion burned in the Troubles. Binchy is particularly clear about the restraints on economic change, the wariness of envy, the precautions against feuds, the aggression that flares in petty vandalism. These are the ties that restrict initiative, yet smooth social friction. The central characters survive, their lives shadowed by great losses. Binchy's willingness to acknowledge in her novels a sense of a world without purpose—''It was never meant to be like this. Pointless tragedy, and confusion everywhere''—creates a dense picture of Irish life in the 1950s and 1960s.

The most captivating figure, if not the firmly established protagonist, of Evening Class is Nora O'Donoghue, known to her students as Signora. Despite her somewhat questionable past as the lover of a married Sicilian, Aidan Dunne invites her to help make his program of adult education classes—hers is "Introduction to Italian"—a success. Those who fall under her spell refuse to judge Signora, as is the case (needless to say) with Binchy herself. Ria Lynch of Tara Road is on the other end of the affair triangle, finding herself abandoned by her successful developer husband in favor of his young pregnant lover. This sense of loss provides the occasion for a temporary trade of houses with Marilyn Vine, an American whose son has just died, and in the end each woman helps the other find meaning in her misfortune.

-Karen Robertson

BISSOONDATH, Neil

Nationality: Canadian (emigrated from Trinidad in 1973). Born: Devindra Bissoondath, Trinidad, West Indies, 19 April 1955. Education: York University, Toronto, B.A. in French 1977. Career: Teacher of English and French, Inlingua School of Languages, Toronto, 1977–80; teacher of English and French, Language Workshop, Toronto, 1980–85. Awards: McClelland and Stewart award for fiction, 1986, and National Magazine award, 1986, both for "Dancing." Address: c/o Macmillan of Canada, 39 Birch Ave., Toronto M4V 1E2, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Casual Brutality. Toronto, Macmillan, 1988; New York, Potter, 1989.

The Innocence of Age. Toronto, Knopf, 1992.

The Worlds within Her. Toronto, Knopf Canada, 1998.

Short Stories

Digging Up the Mountains. Toronto, Macmillan, 1985; New York, Viking, 1986.

On the Eve of Uncertain Tomorrows. Toronto, Dennys, and New York, Potter, 1990.

Other

Selling Illusions: The Cult of Multiculturalism in Canada. N.p., n.d.

* * *

Neil Bissoondath's writing takes readers into marginalized social and geographical territories, without ever moving far outside the conventions of literary realism. This combination of the exotic and the familiar has attracted a wide readership extending from North America to Europe, where his works have been translated into French and German.

Given his family history of double migration from India to Trinidad to Canada, it is not surprising that his narratives often focus on migrant experiences of displacement, uncertainty, isolation, cultural dislocation, and adaptation. These themes dominate many of the stories in Digging Up the Mountains and On the Eve of Uncertain Tomorrows. Of particular interest in such stories as "Christmas Lunch," "Veins Visible," "Security," and "The Power of Reason" is Bissoondath's alertness to the complexity of gender relations in multicultural contexts, and to differences between women's and men's respective experiences of migration and cultural adaptation.

Episodes of apparently random violence witnessed by Bissoondath in his early years in Trinidad find a place in his first novel A Casual Brutality. Narrated in the first person, the novel is a colonial Bildungsroman. The protagonist's inner journey towards maturity and understanding is bound up with a physical journey from a small Third World island to a metropolitan center of Western culture. Although the fictional island of Casaquemada resembles Trinidad in certain respects, Bissoondath's aim is not to recount a specific epoch in Trinidad's history, but rather to draw on episodes that took place in various West Indian countries. This desire to internationalize and universalize his stories, and to avoid analysis of specific historical episodes and political struggles, has attracted severe criticism from certain quarters.

Over time, Bissoondath's focus has shifted away from Trinidad toward his Canadian experiences and concerns. The title story of On the Eve of Uncertain Tomorrows penetrates the limbo world of a diverse group of fugitives from political violence and economic oppression who anxiously await the outcome of their applications for refugee status in Canada. "Uncertain Tomorrows" exposes the ethnocentricity of the legal criteria for granting refugee status, and the biases institutionalized in the court process. "The Power of Reason" emphasizes the gender-specificity of migrant experiences. Because equality of opportunity for women is often contingent upon their race and nation of origin, Canada's vertical mosaic has its own distinctive pink ghettos. Monica, an immigrant woman who cleans house for a white professional woman, has daughters who also work hard to take advantage of the opportunities gained through migration. Monica's sons, by contrast, either laze in front of the television or hang out on the street, mimicking the young Black American males they see on television. To Monica, her sons are complete strangers. The cultural gulf that opens up in many migrant families between the generations is compounded by a gap between gender roles.

Yet as The Innocence of Age suggests, migration is not a necessary prerequisite either to intergenerational conflict or to cultural alienation within the family. In Bissoondath's second novel, a father and son live in entirely different worlds, although both have always resided in Toronto. Except for the fact that its two main characters are Anglo-Canadian, and have no familial connection with another country, The Innocence of Age conforms in virtually every respect to the thematic and structural paradigms of "ethnic fiction." This would be a quintessential immigrant novel, were it not for the fact that its central characters are not immigrants. By writing an "ethnic novel" centering on people customarily perceived as "nonethnic," Bissoondath effectively "ethnifies" Canada's dominant cultural group.

With each successive publication, it becomes increasingly clear that Bissoondath's novels and short stories occupy a place beside his interviews, newspaper and magazine articles, and his book on multiculturalism, Selling Illusions: The Cult of Multiculturalism in Canada—all contribute to the debate on Canadian multiculturalism. Irrespective of their geographical settings, which range from Trinidad to Europe and Japan as well as Canada, Bissoondath's works comment on the conditions under which the category of "multicultural writing" is constructed, and they critique the institutional circumstances under which "multicultural texts" are produced, interpreted, and evaluated. Bissoondath's literary practices and aesthetic values are entirely consistent with his critical stance on Canadian multiculturalism. By exploring what he sees as universal human themes, emotions, and experiences, Bissoondath endeavors to build and strengthen forms of mutual understanding and social cohesion that he would like to see asserted more strongly throughout Canadian society.

-Penny van Toorn

BLAISE, Clark (Lee)

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Fargo, North Dakota, United States, 10 April 1940; became Canadian citizen, 1973. Education: Denison University, Granville, Ohio, 1957-61, A.B. 1961; University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1962-64, M.F.A. 1964. Family: Married Bharati Mukherjee, q.v., in 1963; two sons. Career: Acting instructor, University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee, 1964-65; teaching fellow, University of Iowa, 1965-66; lecturer, 1966-67, assistant professor, 1967-69, associate professor, 1969–72, and professor of English, 1973–78, Sir George Williams University, later Concordia University, Montreal; professor of Humanities, York University, Toronto, 1978-80; Professor of English, Skidmore College, Saratoga Springs, New York, 1980-81, 1982-83. Visiting lecturer or writer-in-residence, University of Iowa, 1981–82, Saskatchewan School of the Arts, Saskatoon, Summer 1983, David Thompson University Centre, Nelson, British Columbia, Fall 1983, Emory University, Atlanta, 1985, Bennington College, Vermont, 1985, Columbia University, New York, Spring 1986, and New York State Writers Institute, Sarasota Springs, New York, Summer 1994 and 1995; exchange professor, Meiji University, Japan, 1994. Currently, adjunct professor, Columbia University, New York. Awards: University of Western Ontario President's medal, for short story, 1968; Great Lakes Colleges Association prize, 1973; Canada Council grant, 1973, 1977, and travel grant, 1985; St. Lawrence award, 1974; Fels award, for essay, 1975; Asia Week award, for non-fiction, 1977; Books in Canada prize, 1979; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1981; Guggenheim grant, 1983. D.Litt.: Denison University, 1979. Agent: Janklow and Nesbit, 598 Madison Ave., New York, New York 10022.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Lunar Attractions. New York, Doubleday, 1979. Lusts. New York, Doubleday, 1983. If I Were Me. Erin, Ontario, Porcupine's Quill, 1997.

Short Stories

New Canadian Writing 1968, with Dave Godfrey and David Lewis Stein. Toronto, Clarke Irwin, 1969.

A North American Education. Toronto and New York, Doubleday, 1973.

Tribal Justice. Toronto and New York, Doubleday, 1974.

Personal Fictions, with others, edited by Michael Ondaatje. Toronto, Oxford University Press, 1977.

Resident Alien. Toronto and New York, Penguin, 1986. Man and His World. Erin, Ontario, Porcupine's Quill, 1992.

Plays

Screenplays: Days and Nights in Calcutta, with Bharati Mukherjee, 1991.

Other

Days and Nights in Calcutta, with Bharati Mukherjee. New York, Doubleday, 1977; London, Penguin, 1986.

The Sorrow and the Terror: The Haunting Legacy of the Air India Tragedy, with Bharati Mukherjee. Toronto, Viking, 1987.

I Had a Father. New York, Addison-Wesley, 1993.

Editor, with John Metcalf, Here and Now. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 1977.

Editor, with John Metcalf, 78 [79, 80]: Best Canadian Stories. Ottawa, Oberon Press, 3 vols., 1978–1980.

***

Manuscript Collection: Calgary University Library, Alberta.

Critical Studies: On the Line, Downsview, Ontario, ECW Press, 1982, and Another I: The Fiction of Clark Blaise, ECW Press, 1988, both by Robert Lecker; article by Blaise in Contemporary Authors Autobiography Series 3 edited by Adele Sarkissian, Detroit, Gale, 1986.

Clark Blaise comments:

(1981) My fiction is an exploration of threatened space; the space has been geographically and historically defined as French-Canada and French-America (New England), as well as extremely isolated areas of the deep South. Most of my fiction has been concerned with the effects of strong and contrasting parents, with the memory of Europe and of Canada, and the very oppressive reality, rendered minutely, of America. I am concerned with nightmare, terror, violence, sexual obsession, and the various artistic transformations of those drives. The tone of the work is not gothic or grotesque, however; I am devoted to the close observation of the real world, and to hold the gaze long enough to make the real world seem distorted. My work is also involved with the growth of the mind, the coming on of ideas about itself and the outside world. I would agree with critics who see my work as courting solipsism, and much of my own energy is devoted to finding ways out of the vastness of the first person pronoun.

* * *

Clark Blaise's short stories and novels are marked by their preoccupation with the tensions between a host of metaphorical extremes. Blaise is attracted to raw experience, spontaneous impulse, grotesque realism, uncultured thought: simultaneously, he is a polymath who needs reason, order, intellect, and learning in order to survive. For Blaise, these two worlds can never coincide; yet his fiction is driven by the strategies he employs in his attempt to make them coincide. The most obvious strategy involves doubling and superimposition. Blaise's characters are often two-sided, and their stories detail, through extended use of archetype and symbol, a profound desire to discover an integrated and authentic self. A list of the authors who influenced Blaise-including Pascal, Flaubert, Proust, Faulkner, and Céline—suggests that his work is philosophical, realistic, epic, eschatological, and existential. It is important to note this range, if only because Blaise has been viewed as a purely realistic writer involved with the tragic implications of his age. This perspective seems curious when one considers the extent to which Blaise's stories become self-conscious explorations of their own mode of articulation. Their ultimate reality is internal, psychological, personal, and self-reflective. To trace Blaise's growing preoccupation with this self-reflective mode is to describe the evolution of his fiction.

A North American Education, Blaise's first collection of linked short stories, is marked by the multi-leveled revelation of the fears, obsessions, and aesthetic values informing its three central narrators. In the final group of tales—"The Montreal Stories"—Norma Dyer begins to comment on the cosmopolitan milieu he inhabits from the removed and condescending perspective of an intellectual elitist who appears to be in full, if arrogant, control. But as the three stories comprising this section develop, panic sets in; the distanced thirdperson perspective of the opening eventually gives way to a revealingly fragmented first-person mode that details Dyer's personal and narrative collapse as he confesses that "I who live in dreams have suffered something real, and reality hurts like nothing in the world." In the "Keeler Stories" we hear the confessions of "a writer, a creator" who "would learn to satisfy himself with that." But here, as in the closing "Thibidault Stories," Blaise makes it clear that his narrators will never be satisfied with their creations, or with themselves. Yet they continue to deceive themselves in the belief that "anything dreamt had to become real, eventually."

The dreams shared by Blaise's narrators are always highly symbolic and archetypal in form, a conclusion supported by even the most cursory reading of Blaise's second short story collection, Tribal Justice. Here, in some of his richest and most evocative fiction, Blaise returns again and again to his narrators' meditations on their art. If there is a paradigmatic Blaise story—one that reveals the various tensions I have described—it is surely "Grids and Doglegs." It begins with its narrator recalling his interest in creativity, maps, education, history, archaeology, and cultural life; but no sooner is this interest articulated than it is ruthlessly undercut by hints of isolation and impending doom. Other stories—I think particularly of "Notes Beyond a History" and "At the Lake"—are framed by the same kind of divided opening, and by the same suggestion that the narrator who inhabits that opening is psychologically split.

Blaise's first two books established him as one of the finest short story writers in Canada at the very time he decided to explore a different genre. While Lunar Attractions proved that Blaise could master the novel form, it also demonstrated that his fundamental attraction to self-reflective writing remained central to his art. After all, Lunar Attractions is a semi-autobiographical account of a writer's development: David Greenwood insists on seeing himself in every aspect of his creation, so much so that his fiction becomes an intricate confession about his failure to get beyond himself. Yet Lunar Attractions is by no means purely solipsistic: it is a book about our times, about growing up in our times, and about the symbols and systems we use to explain our lives. Blaise has written that he wanted "to create the portrait of the authentically Jungian or even Freudian whole mind," which "sees every aspect of the natural and historical world being played out in its own imagination, and it literally creates the world that it sees."

These words suggest that for Blaise the writer can never be merely a recorder or even the interpreter of events. He must give form to experience and must be responsible to that form. The nature of this responsibility is the focus of Blaise's second novel, Lusts. Here the nature of writing is explored through Richard Durgin's struggle to understand the suicide of his wife, a successful poet who challenged Durgin's assumptions about the social and political implications of art.

If Rachel is Richard's "other self" then her death is doubly significant: it suggests that Blaise may have overcome the personal divisions that kept his successive narrators from becoming whole. Does this mean that he has found the integrated self he has sought throughout his work? A forthcoming volume of autobiographical essays may answer this question. But Blaise has written autobiography before—most notably in Days and Nights in Calcutta—only to return to the story of his personal and aesthetic search. The search is essential to his art, for the quality of his writing—its permutations, obsessions, and complex use of voice—is tragically dependent on Blaise's constant inability to find himself or his final story.

-Robert Lecker

BODSWORTH, (Charles) Fred(erick)

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Port Burwell, Ontario, 11 October 1918. Education: Port Burwell public and high schools. Family: Married Margaret Neville Banner in 1944; two daughters and one son. Career: Reporter, St. Thomas Times-Journal, Ontario, 1940–43; reporter and editor, Toronto Daily Star and Weekly Star, 1943–46; staff writer and editor, Maclean's Magazine, Toronto, 1947–55. Since 1955 freelance writer. Director and former president (1965–67), Federation of Ontario Naturalists: leader of worldwide ornithological tours. Since 1970 honorary director, Long Point Bird Observatory; chair of the Board of Trustees, James L. Baillie Memorial Fund for Ornithology, 1975–89; editor, Natural Science of Canada series, 1980–81. Awards: Doubleday Canadian Novel award, 1967. Agent: Curtis Brown, 10 Astor Place, New York, New York 10003, U.S.A. Address: 294 Beech Avenue, Toronto, Ontario M4E 3J2, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Last of the Curlews. Toronto and New York, Dodd Mead, 1955; London, Museum Press, 1956; foreword by W. S. Merwin, afterword by Murray Gell-Mann, illustrated by Abigail Rorer, based on original drawings by T.M. Shortt. Washington, D.C., Counterpoint, 1995.

The Strange One. Toronto and New York, Dodd Mead, 1959; London, Longman, 1960.

The Atonement of Ashley Morden. Toronto and New York, Dodd Mead, 1964; as Ashley Morden, London, Longman, 1965.

The Sparrow's Fall. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, New York, Doubleday, and London, Longman, 1967.

Other

The People's Health: Canada and WHO, with Brock Chisholm.Toronto, Canadian Association for Adult Education, 1949.The Pacific Coast. Toronto, Natural Science of Canada, 1970.Wilderness Canada, with others. Toronto, Clarke Irwin, 1970.

*

Critical Studies: Introduction by James Stevens to Last of the Curlews, Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1963; article in The Oxford Companion to Canadian History and Literature edited by Norah Story, Toronto, New York, and London, Oxford University Press, 1967; Don Gutteridge, in Journal of Canadian Studies (Peterborough, Ontario), August 1973; Olga Dey, in Canadian Author and Bookman (Toronto), Fall 1981; article in A Reader's Guide to the Canadian Novel by John Moss, Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1981.

Fred Bodsworth comments:

(1991) The major part of my work has been novels linking human and animal characters in a fiction format with strong natural history content and wilderness backgrounds. The nature storyteller who uses birds or mammals in fictional situations treads a narrow path if he wishes to be scientifically authentic and portray them as they really are. On the one hand, he has to personalize his animal as well as his human characters or he simply has no dramatic base for his story.

Yet if the personalizing of animal characters goes too far and begins turning them into furry or feathered people—the nature writer's sin of anthropomorphism—the result is maudlin nonsense that is neither credible fable nor fiction. I enjoy the challenge of presenting wildlife characters as modern animal behavior studies are showing them to be—creatures dominated by instinct, but not enslaved by it, beings with intelligence very much sub-human in some areas yet fascinatingly superhuman in others. Out of the blending of human and animal stories comes the theme that I hope is inherent in all my books: that man is an inescapable part of all nature, that its welfare is his welfare, that to survive he cannot continue acting and regarding himself as a spectator looking on from somewhere outside.

* * *

Fred Bodsworth, writing in imaginative, uncomplicated prose, has used the Canadian shield of pine-tree laden granite for the setting of his novels. He calls it "a benign land sometimes amiable, even indulgent, but at other times a land of perverse hostility." These sparsely Indian-populated lands provide a unique characteristic which distinguishes Canada from its gargantuan neighbor to the south. Bodsworth is then readily identifiable as a Canadian novelist.

The strength of his writing is the skillful portrayal of characters who are dependent upon the milieu and the forces within it. He is able to make his birds and humans unpredictable because of unforeseen but crucial subtleties in the environmental settings. Bodworth's naturalist and ornithological knowledge fosters such keen insight. Atook, a native hunter in The Sparrow's Fall, seems doomed because Christian myth interferes with his hunting prowess. But the will to survive, which resides in all his characters, eventually causes Atook to cast aside his alien beliefs and adjust to his natural surroundings.

Last of the Curlews is his most stimulating and moving novel. Bodsworth reveals the brutal and senseless slaughter of a bird that has not developed a fear of the earth's most irrational creature, man. In sensitive prose, the tiny bird becomes personalized but not human; thus he avoids sham. The theme of this novel has increased in importance since its writing because of the growing awareness of our threatened environment.

Although Bodsworth commits the occasional transgression by allowing his creatures to reason, it does not seriously detract from his animal characters.

In The Strange One, he adroitly interweaves the mating of an alien Hebridean Barra goose with a native Canada goose and the love of a young biologist for a Cree maiden, who has been socialized in the whiteman's world. Indian-white miscegenation is as old as Canada itself and this theme intertwined with the geese is unusual in Canadian literature. Bodsworth is the first to write about it. The parallel between man and bird in this novel clearly reveals the interrelationship of man with animal when Rory, the scientist, follows what appear to be almost instinctual feelings, disregards social convention and returns to the beautiful Cree, Kanina.

The Strange One and The Atonement of Ashley Morden involve what may be melodramatic relationships between men and birds, but the two themes are drawn together skillfully, and are quite effectively written. An underlying theme in both these novels, as well as the others, is the complicated, often contradictory behavior of men contrasted with the logical, conditioned instincts of animals and birds.

In the context of Canadian literature, Bodsworth is one of the leading traditional novelists.

-James R. Stevens

BOLGER, Dermot

Nationality: Irish. Born: Finglas, Ireland, 6 February 1959. Education: Attended Beneavin College Secondary School. Family: Married Bernadette in 1988; two children. Career: Founder and editor, Raven Arts Press, Finglas, Ireland, 1979–92; executive editor, New Island Books, 1992—. Awards: A. E. Memorial Prize, 1986; Macaulay Fellowship, 1987; Samuel Beckett Award; Stewart Parker BBC Award; Edinburgh Fringe First Award; A. Z. Whitehead Prize. Agent: A. P. Watt, 20 John Street, London WC1N 2DR, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Night Shift. Dingle, Ireland, Brandon, 1985.

The Woman's Daughter. Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1987; expanded edition, New York, Viking, 1991.

The Journey Home. New York, Viking, 1990.

Emily's Shoes. New York, Viking, 1992.

A Second Life. New York, Viking, 1994.

Father's Music. London, Flamingo, 1997.

Plays

The Lament for Arthur Cleary. Dublin Theatre Festival, 1989.

Blinded by the Light. Dublin, Abbey Theatre, 1990.

In High Germany. Dublin Theatre Festival, 1990; Dublin, New Island Books, 1999.

The Holy Ground. Dublin, Gate Theatre, 1990.

One Last White Horse. Dublin Theatre Festival, 1991.

A Dublin Quartet (contains the plays The Lament for Arthur Cleary, In High Germany, The Holy Ground, and One Last White Horse). London, Penguin, 1992.

The Dublin Bloom. Philadelphia, Annenberg Theatre, 1994; published as A Dublin Bloom: An Original Free Adaptation of James Joyce's Ulysses. London, Nick Hern Books, 1995.

April Bright; and Blinded by the Light: Two Plays. London, Nick Hern Books, 1997.

The Passion of Jerome. London, Methuen, 1999.

Poetry

The Habit of Flesh. Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1979.

Finglas Lilies. Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1980.

No Waiting America. Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1981.

Internal Exiles. Mountrath, Ireland, Dolmen Press, 1986.

Leinster Street Ghosts. Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1989.

Taking My Letters Back: New and Selected Poems. Dublin, New Island Books. 1998.

Other

A New Primer for Irish Schools (nonfiction, with Michael O'Loughlin). Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1985.

Contributor, The Crack in the Emerald: New Irish Plays, edited by David Grant. London, Nick Hern Books, 1994.

Editor, Manna in the Morning: A Memoir 1940–1958 by Madeleine Stuart. Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1986.

Editor, The Dolmen Book of Irish Christmas Stories. Mountrath, Ireland, Dolmen Press, 1986.

Editor, The Bright Wave: Poetry in Irish Now. Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1986.

Editor, 16 on 16: Irish Writers on the Easter Rising. Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1988.

Editor, Invisible Cities: The New Dubliners: A Journey through Unofficial Dublin. Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1988.

Editor, Invisible Dublin: A Journey through Dublin's Suburbs. Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1991.

Editor, Francis Ledwidge: Selected Poems. Dublin, New Island Books, 1992.

Editor, Wexford through Its Writers. Dublin, New Island Books, 1992.

Editor, The Picador Book of Contemporary Irish Fiction. London, Picador, 1993.

Editor, with Aidan Murphy, 12 Bar Blues. Dublin, Raven Arts Press, 1993.

Editor, Ireland in Exile: Irish Writers Abroad. Dublin, New Island Books, 1993.

Editor, Selected Poems by Padraic Pearse. Dublin, New Island Books, 1993.

Editor, The Vintage Book of Contemporary Irish Fiction. New York, Vintage Books, 1995.

Editor, with Ciaran Carty, The Hennessy Book of Irish Fiction. Dublin, New Island Books, 1995.

Editor, Greatest Hits: Four Irish One-Act Plays. Dublin, New Island Books, 1997.

Editor and contributor, Finbar's Hotel. London, Picador, 1997.

Editor and contributor, Ladies' Night at Finbar's Hotel. San Diego, Harcourt, 2000.

*

Critical Studies: No Mean City? The Image of Dublin in the Novels of Dermot Bolger, Roddy Doyle, and Val Mulkerns by Ulrike Paschel, New York, P. Lang, 1998.

. . .

Dermot Bolger is one of the most remarkable products of Ireland's institution of universal secondary education in 1968, which produced a wider population of readers and writers of fiction independent of the universities and, arguably, the necessary number for a national audience for a national literature apart from the imaginative needs of England and America. This new guild of fiction readers and writers is necessarily Bolger's age and younger, which may account for the freedom with which Bolger described the "suburban underbelly" (Fintan O'Toole's sensational phrase) of Dublin. Bolger began writing convincingly not only of this class, but to this class.

Critics who early on disparaged the "Finglas school of writing" missed the utopian element never far from Bolger's writing and his work as a publisher. Night Shift, Bolger's first novel, describes the working conditions of eighteen-year-old Donal Flynn, who works the press at a factory, and lives with his young wife in a caravan at the bottom of her parent's garden. Donal's conflict is a common one, the competing loyalties to the wild freedom of his mates and his love for Elizabeth. Like all of Bolger's work, the story line is distinctive, arresting, and heading creatively for surprises.

Although she tries, Elizabeth can hardly fit herself to the rude male humor and dissolute behavior of Donal's friends. They are sympathetically portrayed, and the reader is given a full tour of the working class youth culture north of the Liffey, but at the same time is ready to agree with Donal that it is more than time to go home.

Donal does go home the morning after a final farewell to his youth, to find that Elizabeth is in the hospital. In her frenzied worry and despair over her husband's absence, she has fallen down the stairs, losing their baby. Donal tells her that he has come home to her to love her better, but his irresponsible self-absorption that has caused her such pain has taught her that she needs to take care of herself better. She hands him her ring and leaves him.

Bolger compares more than favorably with the self-absorbed quality of masculinity of other famous first-novel portraits of the artist like Sons and Lovers and Portrait of the Artist As a Young Man itself. The ethos of Night Shift is startling and inexorable: a young man even genuinely repentant can lose the love of a good woman, forever.

The Woman's Daughter first appeared in 1987, consisting of what are now Part I and sections of Part III of the final 1991 version. There is the abuse of more than one woman's daughter to follow, and the parallels and connections between stories and times are not merely formal. Bolger's characters are authentically haunted by people from the past. The poetry (Leinster Street Ghosts) and drama (The Lament for Arthur Cleary) of this period begin colluding with the fiction in considering hauntings as well as haunting each other: poems turning into plays and novels. The last narrator of The Woman's Daughter accepts in all their names the imperative of past voices: "let us live on again through you, don't cast us into the darkness where our names and lives will have all meant nothing."

The Journey Home shares with Nightshift the setting of suburban and north of the Liffey Dublin and a complex narrative sequence. Despite the title, the resonances are more public than domestic. Bolger borrows from postwar Italian film the metaphor of sexual perversion standing for political perversion to scandalize an Irish public inured to corruption. Perhaps the most sensational of his novels, it begins and concludes with Hano and Katie on the run from the police, because Hano has avenged his friend Shay's death by killing one of the notorious and politically influential Plunkett family. Solely in this novel Bolger offers a short glossary at the beginning, annotating Irish political and street slang.

Emily's Shoes risks the untouchable status of fiction that speaks for the dispossessed and voiceless by focusing on a child growing up with real problems but manifested in a fetish (for shoes) that has been used to ridicule psychological theory since Freud. It is up to the reader to decide if Bolger has transcended the stereotype to reach the boy's pain.

A Second Life is perhaps Bolger's greatest novel. It begins with Sean Blake's spirit floating above the nearby Botanical Gardens while seeing his body below in a car accident. We gradually realize that he is having a near-death experience. As Blake reluctantly recuperates he follows two spiritual hauntings: he tries to find his biological mother who gave him up for adoption, and to identify a face he saw when he was near death, a face that is associated with the past history of the Botanical Gardens. The novel also follows Sean's mother, who ''hears'' the crash in Dublin although she lives in England. As Sean works his way back to her, the novel brings her story forward, how she was forced into an institution for unwed mothers, forced to give up her child.

Sean ultimately gives up the search for the mysterious face from someone else's life to work harder on sorting out his own. Painfully, he finds his mother's identity a few days after she has died, still waiting for him to find her, but there is a magnificent reconciliation scene at the end, when Sean takes his family to the graves of his grandparents who cast his mother out, and releases his mother's ashes there. Like many of Bolger's novels, his feeling for the collective psyche of Ireland is uncanny. The novel was being published just as there was a long-delayed public investigation in Ireland of how women were hidden away in institutions for real or imaginary sins.

Tracey Sweeney is the narrator of Father's Music. We begin with her relationship with a married Irishman Luke Duggan who has left behind his family's notoriety in Dublin to run tile shops in London. Unknown to Luke, Tracey is herself half-Irish; her mother married an itinerant sean-nós singer three times her age while on a trip to Ireland, but he left her shortly after Tracey was born. Gradually uncovered is a damaging week in Tracey's past, when her mother took her back to Ireland to escape her restrictive parents, to perhaps find her husband. While in Dublin her mother stopped using the medication that kept her from succumbing to her depression. Tracey, aged eleven, is able to slip away from her mother in the streets of Dublin. She runs with a group of traveler children supporting themselves on what they can steal or scam, but she is sexually assaulted by a man before her grandfather comes to Dublin to bring her and her mother back to England.

The reader is as uncertain as Tracey herself whether to trust her middle-aged Irish lover. At times he seems to love her, at times he seems to be using her to screen a major crime. The novel profits from Bolger's longstanding involvement in traditional Irish music, as it follows Tracey's attempt to find her father. Luke is murdered before her eyes in the west of Ireland when they are close to finding her father. As the novel ends, Tracey, wrung nearly empty by all the pain, sits in a pub listening to her father. As if in a dream, she is recognized both by the pub owner and her father as her mother's child.

Temptation shares with Bolger's earlier work only the author's intention to imagine the real lives and intimate responsibilities of others in an arresting and unpredictable narrative. Alison, her husband Peadar, and their three children, go for their annual holiday at a hotel on the coast of Ireland south of Dublin. We first review the family's anticipation. Later, we discover that Alison's father, who once worked in the kitchen in Fitzgeralds, began the association of holidays there in Alison's mind by taking the family there once.

Peadar is preoccupied with his responsibilities as a headmaster; Alison has been waiting all term to tell him that she had a benign tumor removed from her breast. Peadar is called back suddenly when the construction company building an addition to the school goes bankrupt. Alison is left alone with her children for their five-day holiday, making her think more than once, "I gave up my happiness to make another person happy."

As deftly as ever Bolger wires a series of shocks to the reader. Chris, an old acquaintance who was in love with Alison twenty years before but who timidly deferred to Peadar, shows up at Fitzgeralds. Having recognized him after a bit, we follow Alison as she tries to match him with a wife and children from among the other guests, but she is told later that he lost them in a car accident. He is there to try to make some peace with the memory of his family before he leaves Ireland forever.

His presence makes Alison wonder about her life with Peadar. After several intense encounters, and a final episode where she saves Chris from drowning himself, Alison awaits her husband, "her lover [who] would be here in the morning for her" to take her and her children back home. One must admire the felt stress and importance of elementary kinships that run across the considerable range of class and experience Bolger has presented in his novels, from working class Finglas to a posh hotel at Rosslare.

-William Johnsen

BOURJAILY, Vance (Nye)

Nationality: American. Born: Cleveland, Ohio, 17 September 1922. Education: Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Maine, B.A. 1947. Military Service: Served in the American Field Service, 1942–44, and in the United States Army, 1944–46. Family: Married Bettina Yensen in 1946; three children (one deceased). Career: Instructor at the Writers Workshop, 1957–58, and associate professor, 1960–64, 1966–67, 1971–72, University of Iowa, Iowa City; visiting professor, 1977–78, and professor, 1980–85, University of Arizona, Tucson. Member, United States Department of State mission to South America, 1959. Distinguished Visiting Professor, Oregon State University, Corvallis, Summer 1968. Awards: American Academy of Arts and Letters award, 1993. D.Litt, Bowdoin College, 1993. Agent: William Morris Agency, 1350 Avenue of the Americas, New York, New York 10019, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The End of My Life. New York, Scribner, 1947; London, W.H. Allen, 1963.

The Hound of Earth. New York, Scribner, 1955; London, Secker and Warburg, 1956.

The Violated. New York, Dial Press, 1958; London, W.H. Allen, 1962.

Confessions of a Spent Youth. New York, Dial Press, 1960; London, W.H. Allen, 1961.

The Man Who Knew Kennedy. New York, Dial Press, and London, W.H. Allen, 1967.

Brill among the Ruins. New York, Dial Press, 1970; London, W.H. Allen, 1971.

Now Playing in Canterbury. New York, Dial Press, 1976. A Game Men Play. New York, Dial Press, 1980.

The Great Fake Book. New York, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1987. Old Soldier. New York, Fine, 1990.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Poozle Dreamers," in Dial (New York), Fall 1959.
- "Fractional Man," in New Yorker, 6 August 1960.
- "Goose Pits," in New Yorker, 25 November 1961.
- "Varieties of Religious Experience," in The Esquire Reader, edited by Arnold Gingrich and others. New York, Dial Press, 1967.
- "A Lover's Mask," in Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia), 6 May 1967.
- "The Amish Farmer," in Great Esquire Fiction, edited by L. Rust Hills. New York, Viking Press, 1983.
- "The Duchess," in Stand One, edited by Michael Blackburn, Jon Silkin, and Lorna Tracy. London, Gollancz, 1984.

Plays

$4000: An Opera in Five Scenes, music by Tom Turner (produced Iowa City, 1969). Published in North American Review (Cedar Falls, Iowa), Winter 1969.

Other

The Girl in the Abstract Bed (text for cartoons). New York, Tiber Press, 1954.

The Unnatural Enemy (on hunting). New York, Dial Press, 1963.Country Matters: Collected Reports from the Fields and Streams of Iowa and Other Places. New York, Dial Press, 1973.

Fishing by Mail: The Outdoor Life of a Father and Son, with Philip Bourjaily. New York, Atlantic Monthly, 1993.

Editor, Discovery 1–6. New York, Pocket Books, 6 vols., 1953–1955.

*

Manuscript Collection: Bowdoin College Library, Brunswick, Maine.

Critical Studies: After the Lost Generation by John W. Aldridge, New York, McGraw Hill, 1951, London, Vision Press, 1959; by Bourjaily in Afterwords edited by Thomas McCormack, New York, Harper, 1969; The Shaken Realist by John M. Muste, Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1970.

* * *

Vance Bourjaily's first three novels trace the effects of World War II on his generation of Americans, people who were undergraduates at the time of Munich and Benny Goodman's rendition of "I Got It Bad and That Ain't Good." In the looser structure of his fourth book, Confessions of a Spent Youth, the war becomes one of several stages in the narrator's growing up, and Bourjaily attempts moods, situations, humor, and introspection that had not entered his more rigid earlier work. The novels that have followed this pivotal book have displayed a remarkable variety of subject and technique without gaining for Bourjaily the popularity or critical recognition that many have thought his due over the past 35 years.

The End of My Life recalls another slender novel of wartime ambulance service, Dos Passos's One Man's Initiation—1917. Skinner Galt, Bourjaily's hero, is another young man who believes in a few friends; any larger society or more complex idea repels him. He accounts for this emptiness by sifting through his slight reading and slighter experience to understand why he has "no principles, no truths, no ethics, no standards." The Hound of Earth is a parable of American responsibility for nuclear power, which describes the last days of the seven-year flight of an atomic scientist, who has left his work and family because these ties constantly remind him of the people he has helped to kill. In his reduced fugitive existence, he is run down by a "hound of earth," a nagging humanitarian impulse that makes him perform small acts of kindness to everyone he meets. The Violated, a far more ambitious novel, shows how four characters violate those whom they would love, and are, in turn, violated in the emptiness of their rapacious lives. The child of one of them (or perhaps two of them) plays the lead and directs other children in her own production of Hamlet before the parents, who sit as so many kings and queens stupefied or weary until when "frightened with false fire," a Claudius rises to end the show. This most sustained and complicated of Bourjaily's early plots thus ends with his first striking outburst of fictional invention.

Confessions of a Spent Youth is a retelling of The End of My Life that relieves the narrator, Quincy Quince, of the burden of philosophical exposition and allows him to reminisce easily about his young life; friendships, drinking, brushes with drugs, his loves, and his war service. The autobiographical element, admitted by Bourjaily, is clearest in Quincy's statement that "to recall is a pleasure," for these stories show the writer let loose with craft he had begun to tap with the children's play in The Violated.

In The Man Who Knew Kennedy Bourjaily examines the crises that overtake two friends in the months following the President's assassination. The connection between history and private lives is not altogether clear. Kennedy, according to the narrator, was killed by the psychotic force of someone writhing out of an abyss of frustration. A generation's illusions of invulnerability were smashed on impact. The gifted, graceful victim of this novel is, on the other hand, destroyed by his inexplicable ties to a woman as depraved as she is helpless. The man had traded on his talent instead of developing it, while the surviving friend realizes that he is the stronger of the two for such reasons as his "making necessary items out of wood—not fibreglass." Brill among the Ruins is Bourjaily's richest novel, and Brill, a middleaged lawyer from a small town in southern Illinois, is his most fully realized character. He stands among two kinds of ruins, the hard bargain of his life and the archaeological sites of Oaxaca, developing on that line an understanding of himself that finally arrests his flight from responsibility. The accounts of digging are superb, surpassed only by the hunting scene where Brill alone "sculls" for ducks along the banks of the Mississippi before dawn.

A Game Men Play concerns yet another combat veteran, this one a poetic, reflective man trained as a killer and conditioned as a victim. Is there anything at all that I can do? he wires an old friend and tormentor upon learning of a family catastrophe. What he could or could not do to help is lost in the novel's (perhaps deliberate) loose ends, although the last glimpse of him in exile is utterly clear, recalling an incident decades before when he helped free the inmates of a German death camp and confronted their ragged warden: "bitte ...' He was the last man Chink killed in the Second World War. Chink did not stop to wonder if the man was asking for his life or for his death." If not Bourjaily's great novel, A Game Men Play is closer than the others to his summing up.

Bourjaily, always devoted to jazz, moved to New Orleans in the mid-1980s when he wrote widely read articles and further sharpened the already distinctive language of his fiction. Old Soldier, a novella, celebrates a bond between brothers, the title character and his AIDS-ridden sibling, against a background of jazz argot and a few piped Highland melodies. The Great Fake Book, another story of a young man's search for his father, takes its title and particular inspiration from "Songs for Professional Musicians," which is explained to the hero, thus: "Now if you know you chords, you kin fake 'bout any song you'd ever want to play from just this one book here." Most of the narrative moves through sketches by the father bearing the titles of old standards, transitions aided by the son's notes. At its best, the novel is the "working book of magic spells" the father and son took their fake book to be.

—David Sanders

BOWEN, John (Griffith)

Nationality: British. Born: Calcutta, India, 5 November 1924. Education: Queen Elizabeth's Grammar School, Crediton, Devon; Pembroke College, Oxford (editor, Isis), 1948-51; St. Antony's College, Oxford (Frere Exhibitioner in Indian Studies), 1951–53, M.A. in modern history 1953; Ohio State University, Columbus, 1952–53. Military Service: Served in the Mahratha Light Infantry, 1943–47: Captain. Career: Assistant editor, Sketch magazine, London, 1953-56; copywriter, J. Walter Thompson Company, London, 1956–58; head of the copy department, S.T. Garland Advertising, London, 1958–60; script consultant, Associated Television, London, 1960-67; drama producer, Thames Television, London, 1978-79, London Weekend Television, 1981-83, and BBC, 1984. Since 1991 member of the board, Authors Licensing and Copyright Society. Awards: Society of Authors travelling scholarship, 1986. Agent: (fiction) Elaine Greene Ltd., 37 Goldhawk Road, London W12 8QQ; (theatre) Margaret Ramsay Ltd., 14-A Goodwin's Court, London WC2N 4LL. Address: Old Lodge Farm, Sugarswell Lane, Edgehill, Banbury, Oxfordshire OX15 6HP, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Truth Will Not Help Us: Embroidery on an Historical Theme. London, Chatto and Windus, 1956.

After the Rain. London, Faber, 1958; New York, Ballantine, 1959.

The Centre of the Green. London, Faber, 1959; New York, McDowell Obolensky, 1960.

Storyboard. London, Faber, 1960.

The Birdcage. London, Faber, and New York, Harper, 1962.

A World Elsewhere. London, Faber, 1965; New York, Coward McCann, 1967.

Squeak: A Biography of NPA 1978A 203. London, Faber, 1983; New York, Viking, 1984.

The McGuffin. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1984; Boston, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1985.

The Girls: A Story of Village Life. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1986; New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1987.

Fighting Back. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1989.

The Precious Gift. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1992. No Retreat. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1994.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Another Death in Venice," in London Magazine, June 1964.
- "The Wardrobe Mistress," in London Magazine, January 1971.
- "Barney," in Mae West Is Dead, edited by Adam Mars-Jones. London, Faber, 1983.
- "The Rabbit in the Garden," in Critical Quarterly (Manchester), Summer 1987.

Plays

The Essay Prize, with A Holiday Abroad and The Candidate: Plays for Television. London, Faber, 1962.

I Love You, Mrs. Patterson (produced Cambridge and London, 1964).London, Evans, 1964.

The Corsican Brothers, based on the play by Dion Boucicault (televised 1965; revised version produced London, 1970). London, Methuen, 1970.

After the Rain, adaptation of his own novel (produced London, 1966; New York, 1967). London, Faber, 1967; New York, Random House, 1968; revised version, Faber, 1987.

The Fall and Redemption of Man (as Fall and Redemption, produced London, 1967; as The Fall and Redemption of Man, produced New York, 1974). London, Faber, 1968.

Silver Wedding (televised 1967; revised version, produced in We Who Are about to ..., later called Mixed Doubles, London, 1969). London, Methuen, 1970.

Little Boxes (including The Coffee Lace and Trevor) (produced London, 1968; New York, 1969). London, Methuen, 1968; New York, French, 1970.

The Disorderly Women, adaptation of a play by Euripides (produced Manchester, 1969; London, 1970). London, Methuen, 1969.

The Waiting Room (produced London, 1970). London, French, 1970;New York, French, 1971.

Robin Redbreast (televised 1970; produced Guildford, Surrey, 1974).
Published in The Television Dramatist, edited by Robert Muller, London, Elek, 1973.

Diversions (produced London, 1973). Excerpts published in Play Nine, edited by Robin Rook, London, Arnold, 1981.

Young Guy Seeks Part-Time Work (televised 1973; produced London, 1978).

Roger, in Mixed Blessings (produced Horsham, Sussex, 1973). Published in London Magazine, October-November 1976.

Florence Nightingale (as Miss Nightingale, televised 1974; revised version, as Florence Nightingale, produced Canterbury, 1975). London, French, 1976.

Heil Caesar!, adaptation of Julius Caesar by Shakespeare (televised 1974). London, BBC Publications, 1974; revised version (produced Birmingham 1974), London, French, 1975.

Which Way Are You Facing? (produced Bristol, 1976). Excerpts published in Play Nine, edited by Robin Rook, London, Arnold, 1981.

Singles (produced London, 1977).

Bondage (produced London, 1978).

The Inconstant Couple, adaptation of a play by Marivaux (produced Chichester, 1978).

Spot the Lady (produced Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1981).

The Geordie Gentleman, adaptation of a play by Molière (produced Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1987).

The Oak Tree Tea-Room Siege (produced Leicester, 1990).

Radio Plays: Digby (as Justin Blake, with Jeremy Bullmore), 1959; Varieties of Love (revised version of television play The First Thing You Think Of), 1968; The False Diaghilev, 1988.

Television Plays: created the Garry Halliday series; episodes in Front Page Story, The Power Game, Wylde Alliance, and The Villains series; A Holiday Abroad, 1960; The Essay Prize, 1960; The Jackpot Question, 1961; The Candidate, 1961; Nuncle, from the story by John Wain, 1962; The Truth about Alan, 1963; A Case of Character, 1964; Mr. Fowlds, 1965; The Corsican Brothers, 1965; Finders Keepers, 1967; The Whole Truth, 1967; Silver Wedding, 1967; A Most Unfortunate Accident, 1968; Flotsam and Jetsam, 1970; Robin Redbreast, 1970; The Guardians series (7 episodes), 1971; A Woman Sobbing, 1972; The Emergency Channel, 1973; Young Guy Seeks Part-Time Work, 1973; Miss Nightingale, 1974; Heil Caesar!, 1974; The Treasure of Abbot Thomas, 1974; The Snow Queen, 1974; A Juicy Case, 1975; Brief Encounter, from the film by Noel Coward, 1976; A Photograph, 1977; Rachel in Danger, 1978; A Dog's Ransom, from the novel by Patricia Highsmith, 1978; Games, 1978; The Ice House, 1978; The Letter of the Law, 1979; Dying Day, 1980; The Specialist, 1980; A Game for Two Players, 1980; Dark Secret, 1981; Honeymoon, 1985.

Other (for children)

Pegasus. London, Faber, 1957; New York, A.S. Barnes, 1960.The Mermaid and the Boy. London, Faber, 1958; New York, A.S. Barnes, 1960.

Garry Halliday and the Disappearing Diamonds [Ray of Death; Kidnapped Five; Sands of Time; Flying Foxes] (as Justin Blake, with Jeremy Bullmore). London, Faber, 5 vols., 1960–1964.

*

Manuscript Collection: Mugar Memorial Library, Boston University; (television works) Temple University Library, Philadelphia.

Critical Studies: Postwar British Fiction, Berkeley, University of California Press, 1962, and "The Fable Breaks Down," in Wisconsin Studies in Contemporary Literature (Madison), vol. 8, no. 7, 1967, both by James Gindin.

Theatrical Activities: Director: Plays—At the London Academy of Music and Dramatic Art since 1967; The Disorderly Women, Manchester, 1969, London, 1970; Fall and Redemption, Pitlochry, Scotland, 1969; The Waiting Room, London, 1970. Actor: Plays—In repertory in North Wales, summers 1950–51; Palace Theatre, Watford, Hertfordshire, 1965.

John Bowen comments:

(1996) I have always been interested in problems of form. Thus, in my first novel, The Truth Will Not Help Us, I wanted to try to tell a story of an historical occurrence of 1705 in Britain in terms of the political atmosphere and activities in the U.S.A. in 1953; in both these years political witch-hunting caused injustice and harm to innocent persons. My second novel, After the Rain, began as an attempt to do for science fiction what Michael Innes had done for the detective story: I failed in this attempt because I soon became more interested in the ideas with which I was dealing than in the form, and anyway made many scientific errors. My third novel was straightforwardly naturalistic, but in my fourth, Storyboard, I used an advertising agency as a symbol of a statement about public and private life, just as Zola used a department store in Au Bonheur des Dames. In my fifth novel, The Birdcage, I attempted to use a 19th-century manner—the objective detachment of Trollope, who presents his characters at some distance, displays and comments on them. In my sixth novel, A World Elsewhere, the hero, himself a wounded and needed politician, is writing a fiction about Philoctetes, the wounded archer, and until he has found his own reasons for returning to political life in London, cannot conclude his fiction, because he does not see why Philoctetes should allow himself to accompany Odysseus to Troy. In Squeak, the biography of a pigeon I once helped to rear, the story is told sometimes from Squeak's point of view, sometimes from that of her owners. In The McGuffin I tried to tell the story as the first-person narrative of one of the characters inside the kind of film Hitchcock might have made, the character himself being a reviewer of films. The same interest in different problems of form can be seen in my plays the first Ibsenesque, the second borrowing from Brecht, Pirandello, and the Chinese theatre, the third a pair of linked one-acters, designed as two halves of the same coin, the fourth an attempt to rework the myth of The Bacchae as Sartre, Giraudoux, and Anouilh had used Greek myths, and to blend verse and prose, knockabout comedy, high tragedy, and Shavian argument. My full-length play The Corsican Brothers (an expansion of my earlier television play) has songs set within the play to music pirated from 19th-century composers, and I tried to make, from the melodramatic fantasies of Dumas and Dion Boucicault, a kind of Stendhalian statement about a society based on ideas of honour. In two of my television plays, Miss Nightingale and The Emergency Channel, I experimented with a narrative method that was associative, not lineal.

In this commentary, I am more confident in writing of form than of theme. One's themes are for the critics to set out neatly on a board: one is not always so clearly conscious of them oneself. There is a concern with archetypical patterns of behaviour (therefore with myth). There is a constant war between reasonable man and instinctive man. There is the pessimistic discovery that Bloomsbury values don't work, but that there seem to be no others worth holding. There is a statement of the need for Ibsen's 'Life Lie' even when one knows it to be a lie, and Forster's 'Only connect' becomes 'Only accept' in my work. There is, particularly in The McGuffin, a concern with—and sorrow over—the ways in which human beings manipulate others of their kind.

I believe that novels and plays should tell a story, that the story is the mechanism by which one communicates one's view of life, and that no symbolism is worth anything unless it also works as an element in the story, since the final symbol is the story itself.

Inasmuch as the influences on one's style are usually those writers whom one has discovered in one's adolescence and early twenties, I might be said to have been influenced as a novelist by Dickens, Trollope, E.M. Forster, Virginia Woolf, E. Nesbit, P.G. Wodehouse, and Evelyn Waugh—perhaps a little also by Hemingway and Faulkner. As a playwright, I have been influenced by Ibsen, Chekhov, Shaw, Pirandello, Anouilh, Giraudoux, and Noel Coward.

Most of these names, I am sure, would be on any lists made by most of my contemporaries.

* * *

John Bowen has always been an intelligent and didactic novelist. His first novel, The Truth Will Not Help Us, uses a story of English seamen charged with piracy in a Scottish port in 1705 as a metaphor for the political evil of assuming guilt by rumor or association. A World Elsewhere uses the myth of Philoctetes as a parallel to complicated speculation about hypocrisy and engagement in contemporary political life. The Birdcage contains a long essay giving an account of the history and development of commercial television; and a defense of advertising as not necessarily more corrupt than any other institution in urban, capitalistic society introduces Storyboard. Although Bowen's fictional lessons are invariably complex and thoughtful, the author's presence is always visible, as he arranges, blocks out, and connects the material. Myth is made pointedly and explicitly relevant; symbols, like the lovebirds in The Birdcage or the breaking of a bronze chrysanthemum at a funeral in The Centre of the Green, sometimes seem attached heavy-handedly and literally. Bowen always acknowledges his own presence in his fiction, at times addressing the reader directly and becoming playful and intelligently skeptical about the complexities that prevent him from making any easy disposition of the characters and issues he has developed. The author is conspicuously articulate and instructive, but he does not attempt to play God; in fact, the dangers of human substitutions for a nonexistent or unknowable deity comprise part of the message of After the Rain and the skepticism underlying The Birdcage and A World Elsewhere.

Bowen's novels contain sharply memorable and effective scenes: the retired colonel expressing his style and his strength through his garden in The Centre of the Green, the nocturnal trip around Soho in which a character is beaten in The Birdcage, the picnic on a Greek island in A World Elsewhere. Often the best scenes involve a witty and comic treatment of dramatic conflict between two characters involved in close relationship, like the familial and sexual relationships in The Centre of the Green and Storyboard, the brilliantly handled quarrel between two contemporary London lovers who have lived together too long that takes place in the Piazza San Marco in The Birdcage, or the play with switching gender identities in The McGuffin. Bowen's comedy, however, no matter how strident initially, invariably turns into sympathy for his characters because they are unable to be more dignified or to match their own conceptions of a fuller humanity. This characteristic switch from satire to sympathy is emblematic of most of Bowen's fiction which works on reversals, on dramatically presented and thematically central violations of expected conclusions. The simple, muscle-flexing athlete, not the expected sensitive intellectual, finally defies and defeats the tyrant who would make himself God in After the Rain. Humanity and integrity appear in just those places most easily and generally thought the most corrupt in modern society in Storyboard. The family in which all members seem, superficially, most selfish and isolated can understand and respect each other in The Centre of the Green. This engagingly perverse positivism is often applied to social or political clichés, as in the forceful and complicated treatment of E. M. Forster's "Only connect" in The Birdcage or the ramifications on "politics is the art of the possible" developed in A World Elsewhere. Such clichés, in Bowen's fictional world, never honestly express the concerns or dilemmas of the characters who use them so glibly, although they may yet be partially true in ways the characters never intend and can seldom comprehend. The fact that people, in Bowen's novels, generally haven't a very good idea of what they're about is no warrant for denying their humanity or their capacity to invoke sympathy.

In the mid-1960s, Bowen turned to writing and producing plays for stage and television. Some of these, like adaptations of Euripides' The Bacchae, Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, and Dion Boucicault's The Corsican Brothers, compress the use of myth and symbol in dramatic confrontations, and suggest darker and more tragic versions of experience than do the novels. In the mid-1980s, after nearly 20 years away from novels, Bowen published two, Squeak and The McGuffin. Both depend on formal devices, dramatic fictional artifice. In Squeak, this artifice involves the reconstruction of the knowable world through the carefully limited attention to a pigeon's perspective. The McGuffin refers to Hitchcock's term for a device in his films that triggered the action without itself being part of the plot, such that one could review the story and find an inconsistency at the heart of it. These novels function less as implicit social commentary than do some of Bowen's earlier ones, although beneath the wit, they still convey humane and thoughtful lessons concerning the need to accept human deficiency and to respect forms of being, in oneself and in others, that one could not have initially imagined. During the late 1980s and 1990s, Bowen produced three more novels: The Girls, Fighting Back, and The Precious Gift, a mystery.

-James Gindin

BOWERING, George

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Keremeos, British Columbia, 1 December 1935. Education: University of British Columbia, B.A. 1960, M.A. 1963; also studied at University of Western Ontario. Military Service: Aerial photographer, Royal Canadian Air Force, 1954–57. Family: Married Angela Luoma in 1962; one daughter. Career: Instructor and later assistant professor, University of Calgary, Calgary, Alberta, 1963–66; instructor and writer-in-residence, Sir George Williams University, Montreal, Quebec, 1967–68, assistant professor of English, 1968–72; professor of English, Simon Fraser University, Burnaby, British Columbia, 1972—. Awards: Governor-General's Award, 1969, 1980. Address: Department of English, Simon Fraser University, 8888 University Drive, Burnaby, British Columbia, V5A 1S6, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Mirror on the Floor. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1967.

A Short Sad Book. Vancouver, Canada, Talonbooks, 1977.

Concentric Circles. Coatsworth, Canada, Black Moss Press, 1977.

Burning Water. New York, Beaufort Books, 1980.

Eneaux troubles. Editions Quinze, 1982.

Craft Slices. Ottawa, Canada, Oberon Press, 1985.

Caprice. New York, Viking, 1987.

Errata. Red Deer, Canada, Red Deer College Press, 1988.

Harry's Fragments: A Novel of International Puzzlement. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1990.

Shoot! Toronto, Key Porter Books, 1994.

Parents From Space. Montreal, Roussan Publishers, 1994.

Diamondback Dog. Montreal, Roussan, 1998.

Short Stories

A Place to Die. Ottawa, Canada, Oberon Press, 1973.

Flycatcher and Other Stories. Ottawa, Canada, Oberon Press, 1974. Protective Footwear: Stories and Fables by George Bowering. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1978.

The Rain Barrel and Other Stories. Vancouver, Canada, Talonbooks, 1994.

Poetry

Sticks and Stones. Vancouver, Canada, Tishbooks, 1963.

Points on the Grid. Contact Press, 1964.

The Man in Yellow Boots. Mexico City, El Corno Emplumado, 1965. The Silver Wire. Quarry Press, 1966.

Baseball: A Poem in the Magic Number 9. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1967.

Rocky Mountain Foot: A Lyric, a Memoir. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1968.

Two Police Poems. Vancouver, Canada, Talonbooks, 1968.

The Gangs of Kosmos. House of Anansi, 1969.

Touch: Selected Poems 1961–1970. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1969.

Sitting in Mexico. Beaven Kosmos, 1970.

George, Vancouver: A Discovery Poem. Toronto, Weed Flower Press, 1970.

Geneve. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1971.

Autobiology. New Star Books, 1972.

The Sensible. Toronto, Massasauga Editions, 1972.

Layers 1–13. Toronto, Weed Flower Press, 1973.

Curious. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1973.

In the Flesh. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1974.

At War with the U.S. Vancouver, Canada, Talonbooks, 1974.

Allophanes. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1976.

The Catch. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1976.

Poem and Other Baseballs. Coatsworth, Canada, Black Moss Press, 1976.

The Concrete Island: Montreal Poems, 1967–1971. Montreal, Vehicule Press, 1977.

Another Mouth. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1979.

Particular Accidents: Selected Poems. Vancouver, Canada, Talonbooks, 1980.

West Window: The Selected Poetry of George Bowering. Toronto, General Publishing, 1982.

Ear Reach. Alcuin Society, 1982.

Smoking Mirror. Edmonton, Canada, Longspoon, 1982.

Kerrisdale Elegies. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1984.

Seventy-One Poems for People. Red Deer, Canada, Red Deer College Press, 1985.

Delayed Mercy. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1986.

Urban Snow. Vancouver, Canada, Talonbooks, 1991.

George Bowering Selected: Poems 1961–1992. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1993.

Blonds on Bikes. Burnaby, Canada, Talonbooks, 1997.

Other

How I Hear ''Howl'' (essay). Montreal, Sir George Williams University, 1968.

Al Purdy (monograph). Toronto, Copp Clark Publishing, 1970.

Three Vancouver Writers (criticism). Toronto, Coach House Press, 1979.

A Way with Words (criticism). Ottawa, Canada, Oberon Press, 1982.
The Mask in Place: Essays on Fiction in North America. Winnipeg, Canada, Turnstone Press, 1982.

Imaginary Hand: Essays. Edmonton, Canada, NeWest Press, 1988.

Contributor, Solitary Walk: A Book of Longer Poems. Toronto, Ryerson Press, 1968.

Contributor, The Human Elements: Second Series, edited by David Helwig. Ottawa, Canada, Oberon Press, 1981.

Contributor, Approaches to the Work of James Reaney, edited by Stan Dragland. Downsview, Canada, ECW Press, 1983.

Contributor, The Oberon Reader. Toronto, HarperCollins, 1991.

Editor, Vibrations: Poems of Youth. Toronto, Gage Educational Publishers, 1970.

Editor, The Story So Far. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1971.

Editor, Great Canadian Sports Stories. Ottawa, Canada, Oberon Press, 1979.

Editor, Fiction of Contemporary Canada. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1980.

Editor, Selected Poems: Loki Is Buried at Smoky Creek by Fred Wah. Vancouver, Canada, Talonbooks, 1980.

Editor, My Body Was Eaten by Dogs: Selected Poems of David McFadden by David McFadden. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1981.

Editor, The Contemporary Canadian Poetry Anthology. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1982.

Editor, Sheila Watson and The Double Hook. Ottawa, Canada, Golden Dog Press, 1985.

Editor, with Linda Hutcheon, Likely Stories: A Postmodern Sampler. Toronto, Coach House Press, 1992.

Editor, with Michael Ondaatje, An H in the Heart: A Reader. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart. 1994.

*

Critical Studies: Out-posts: Earle Birney, Bill Bissett, George Bowering, Nicole Brossard, Paul Chamberland, Raoul Duguay, B. P. Nichol, Claude P. Lokin (Peloquin): Interviews, Poetry, Bibliographies and a Critical Introduction to 8 Major Modern Poets by Caroline Bayard and Jack David, Erin, Canada, Press Porcepic, 1978; A Record of Writing: An Annotated and Illustrated Biography of George Bowering by Roy Miki, Vancouver, Canada, Talonbooks, 1989; George Bowering: Bright Circles of Color by Eva-Marie Kroller, Vancouver, Canada, Talonbooks, 1992.

George Bowering comments:

(2000) There is a distinction between "the reader" and the person who is holding the silent book and reading it.

Sometimes I go so far as to say that the "author" and the "reader" are characters in my story. (The implications are interesting if you extend this structure to speeding tickets and marriage certificates.)

How often you or I have read something in criticism or theory about "the reader," and realized that this construct is as distinct from us as is Patrick Henry or Spider Robinson.

Anyone knows that literature is an idea but reading is what you do. Literature can't hurt you but reading can.

(I am of course in my own ant-trap here, because no matter what I do, the "you" I am talking about is not the person reading these words, are you?)

So that construct that certain critics like to write about, "the reader," can't do anything about what is written. But if you are reading a book you can intervene. You can invent a reading.

You can always skip page 35. You can read from the last page to the first. You can stick pages from a pornographic novel between Northrop Frye's sheets. You can call the narrator of Atwood's second novel Agnes. Or you can intervene simply by reading the way you read.

The person who wrote the book can't stop you. The 'author' can't, either. And the 'reader' doesn't know you exist.

A lot of what they call ''reflexive'' writing is simply the result of the writer trying to be you. You are the ground of the so-called postmodern. You know, our high school English teachers really knew all this, but they didn't think that it was the kind of thing they were supposed to be teaching us. We knew it, too, but we didn't think we were supposed to think about such things during the high school English game.

* * *

A prolific and award-winning poet, provocative (though not always discerning) critic, and longtime gadfly on the Canadian literary scene, George Bowering is a prose writer whose oeuvre includes short fiction (notably Protective Footwear: Stories and Fables), a novella (Concentric Circles), and several novels, beginning with the forgettable A Mirror on the Floor, which was followed a decade later by what he has called a "historical-geographical" novel, A Short Sad Book. Recognized as much for its theorizing of, and challenges to, the traditional novel form, this later book established Bowering as a fiction-maker determinedly wary of realism and of traditional relationships between the increasingly static and institutional conditions of narrative and the telling of stories and spinning of yarns. With sections dedicated to a postmodern imploding of many of the clichés that continue to dominate the Canadian cultural imagination (including "Canadian Geography" and the drive to canonize "The Pretty Good Canadian Novel"), A Short Sad Book set the stage in many ways for Bowering's next novel, Burning Water, for which he was awarded the prestigious Governor General's Award for Fiction despite generally weak and even negative reviews.

A metafictional exploration of the process and product of a novelist (named George Bowering) who travels to Italy in order to write a historical novel about Captain George Vancouver's cartographic colonization of the land mass that would become Canada's west coast, Burning Water demands its readers to confront often challenging questions about the ideological implications of art and artifice, about the assumptions informing Western traditions of language and narrative, and about the employment of history (as story, as "fact," as political tool). Foregrounding Bowering's playful wit and propensity for wordplay (puns, for instance, abound in the book), the novel is also very much concerned with illuminating the mechanisms by which language is appropriated and deployed as an instrument of domination, especially as it comes to be wielded by hyper-masculine imperial powers. Developing a framed story that focuses, in part, on the intense, and ultimately fatal shipboard rivalry that builds between Vancouver and the ship's surgeon Menzies, Bowering shows how language (the textual, the oral, the cartographic) is the single most precious commodity sought after by the various constituencies from both the new and the old world.

Densely intertextual, openly parodic, and self-consciously reflexive, Burning Water prepared readers for Bowering's next two novels, Caprice and the less successful Shoot!. Once again taking their cues from stories and events from Canada's past, both books mark an affiliation, too, with the convention-laden genre of the classic American dime-store western. Subverting or reconfiguring the traditional strategies of stereotyping women and indigenous peoples, as well as the still popular romanticization of the outlaw gunslinger, Bowering's Canadian ''west'' is clearly a horizon marked by difference, a not-so-wild place where the reductive and the formulaic are laid bare for critical scrutiny.

Populated mainly by baseball- and peace-loving artists and writers (and by the occasional character from the earlier novels), it is a geocultural space, too, where language is the center of much attention as the traditional reticence of the wild west of Louis L'Amour and Zane Grey is inverted. It is a place where a love of language is not positioned as a weakness or flaw, but as a strategy for survival and source of intellectual and spiritual guidance. When Bowering's titular female hero, Caprice, finds herself trapped in a classic "western" quest to track down the killer of her brother, for example, she finds solace in the volumes of romantic poetry that fill her saddle bags and in the lines from Faust that she recites as she rides the hills of Western Canada. Similarly, the infamous (and hauntingly youthful) McLean gang, the protagonists of Shoot!, are read and sung to by the compassionate young wife of the warden, in whose jail they are eventually incarcerated en route to the gallows.

Although they can never sustain the complexities that distinguish such notable antecedents as Thomas Berger's Little Big Man, E.L. Doctorow's Welcome to Hard Times, or fellow Canadian Robert Kroetsch's The Studhorse Man, Bowering's novels do succeed in raising intriguing and seductive questions about now familiar poststructuralist constellations of language, power, sex, and discipline; questions that entertain and disabuse as readers weave their way through the polyphony of voices sounding in these fictions—from the musicality of first nation's storytellers to self-mythologizing spinners of tall tales to the minimalist dialogue of ranchmen and gunslingers. Bristling with subtle (and not so subtle) ironies, these are intelligent and generally well-crafted novels that do warrant reading and attention.

—Klay Dyer

BOX, Edgar

See VIDAL, Gore

BOYD, William

Nationality: British. Born: William Andrew Murray Boyd, Accra, Ghana, 7 March 1952. Education: Gordonstoun School, Elgin, Morayshire; University of Nice, France, diploma 1971; University of Glasgow, M.A. (honours) in English and philosophy 1975; Jesus College, Oxford, 1975–80. Family: Married Susan Anne Wilson in 1975. Career: Lecturer in English, St. Hilda's College, Oxford, 1980–83. Television critic, New Statesman, London, 1981–83. Lives in Chelsea, London. Awards: Whitbread award, 1981; Maugham award, 1982; Rhys Memorial prize, 1982; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1990. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1983; Sunday Express Book of the Year award, 1993. Agent: Lemon Unna and Durbridge Ltd., 24 Pottery Lane, London W11 4LZ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

- A Good Man in Africa. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1981; New York, Morrow, 1982.
- An Ice-Cream War. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1982; New York, Morrow, 1983.
- Stars and Bars. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1984; New York, Morrow, 1985.
- The New Confessions. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1987; New York, Morrow, 1988.
- Brazzaville Beach. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1990; New York, Morrow, 1991.
- The Blue Afternoon. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1993; New York, Knopf, 1995.
- Armadillo. New York, Knopf, 1998.

Short Stories

- On the Yankee Station and Other Stories. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1981; New York, Morrow, 1984; revised edition, London, Penguin, 1988.
- The Destiny of Nathalie "X". London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1995; published as The Destiny of Nathalie X and Other Stories. New York, Knopf, 1997.

Plays

- School Ties (includes the TV plays Good and Bad at Games and Dutch Girls, and an essay). London, Hamish Hamilton, 1985; New York, Morrow, 1986.
- Care and Attention of Swimming Pools, and Not Yet Jayette (produced London, 1985).
- Screenplays: Stars and Bars, 1988; Aunt Julia and the Scriptwriter, 1990; Mr. Johnson, 1990; Chaplin, 1992; A Good Man in Africa, 1994.
- Radio Plays: On the Yankee Station, from his own story, 1985; Hommage to A.B., 1994.
- Television Plays: Good and Bad at Games, 1983; Dutch Girls, 1985; Scoop, from the novel by Evelyn Waugh, 1987.

Other

Introduction, Martin Chuzzlewit by Charles Dickens. New York, Knopf, 1994.

* * *

But for An Ice-Cream War, William Boyd would be firmly labelled an exponent of that familiar comic genre, the accident-prone hero novel, as practised by, among others, Kingsley Amis (Lucky Jim), Anthony Burgess (the Enderby series), and Tom Sharpe (the Wilt series). Both A Good Man in Africa and Stars and Bars feature protagonists—Morgan Leafy and Henderson Dores, respectively—entrusted with crucial assignments only to be hampered and finally thwarted by proliferating complications. Foreign locations enable Boyd to add occasional culture shock to their predicaments.

Morgan Leafy is a minor diplomat stationed in a provincial backwater in the "not-very-significant" West African nation of Kinjanja. For three years, his stupefying boredom has been palliated only by readily available alcohol and sex. Then, unexpectedly, his boss, Fanshawe, deputes him to cultivate, on behalf of H.M. Government, a local politician (Samuel Adekunle) who is a bigwig in the party set to win Kinjanja's forthcoming elections. At the same time, Morgan begins to court Priscilla, Fanshawe's attractive daughter. Initially, the outlook seems promising: both Adekunle and Priscilla respond to Morgan's overtures. Subsequently, things deteriorate inexorably. Distractions and indignities dog him. Through a misunderstanding, he loses Priscilla to a hated underling. Then he finds himself being blackmailed by Adekunle. To secure his silence, Morgan must suborn an expatriate Scot, Dr. Murray, who is obstructing a lucrative swindle the politician hopes to transact. Unfortunately, Murray is a model of rectitude: Morgan's proposition only worsens matters. In the final pages, though, providence apparently rescues him.

Henderson Dores is an art expert who has recently left England to join the fledgling New York branch of Mulholland, Melhuish, a London auction house. Already he has become simultaneously involved with two alluring, imperious women: his former wife, Melissa, with whom he is discussing remarriage, and his mistress, Irene. Henderson's assignment entails travelling to the Deep South to talk Loomis Gage, a reclusive millionaire, into letting Mulholland, Melhuish handle the sale of his paintings: a coup that would "signal their arrival." Inconveniently, Bryant, Henderson's teenage stepdaughterto-be, invites herself along, thereby jeopardising his plans to meet Irene while away. Then the Gage household proves to be chock-full of confusing and/or intimidating oddballs. Nevertheless, braving the violent opposition of Gage's elder son and assorted misadventures, Henderson brings matters to a successful conclusion. Gage, however, promptly suffers a fatal coronary, leaving him with only an unwitnessed oral agreement. Furthermore, Bryant announces her intention of eloping with Duane, the son of Gage's housekeeper. Abducting Bryant, Henderson decamps to New York. After further misadventures, the novel closes with him fleeing a vengeful Duane. By this time, Henderson has lost his job (perhaps temporarily) and both his women (probably permanently). The paintings, meanwhile, have been destroyed.

Stars and Bars contains various inventive comic flights, but several others seem decidedly routine, poking fun at soft targets like American speech, American cuisine (especially the downhome kind), radio "sermonettes," country and western music. Elsewhere, bedroom farce ensues when Henderson and Irene rendezvous at Atlanta's swishest hotel. A Good Man in Africa generally avoids such lapses into the familiar. In addition, the world created in Stars and Bars is distinctly cartoon-like: Henderson is a two-dimensional character whose pratfalls provide entertainment alone. Morgan's mishaps also arouse some sympathy: the reader discerns his real desperation as Adekunle turns the screw, his pricks of conscience at engaging, albeit unavailingly, in corruption.

At one stage in Julian Barnes's Flaubert's Parrot the narrator proposes that certain types of fiction be no longer written, including "... novels about small hitherto forgotten wars in distant parts of the British Empire, in the painstaking course of which we learn ... that war is very nasty indeed." An Ice-Cream War is clearly one of the novels that has prompted this injunction: it is set mainly in East Africa during World War I, when the adjacent British and German colonies became a secondary battlefield. The description, though, is unjust: Boyd's point about the nature of war is a deeper one—he believes that literature has not only glossed over the bloodiness of war, but also its contingency.

Boyd's humour is altogether more grim here than in his other novels. Destiny is again antipathetic towards his characters, but the tricks of fate are now brutal rather than mischievous. An incongruous episode in Stars and Bars concerns Henderson's discovery that his father's death during World War II occurred when he was struck by a tin of pineapple chunks dropped from a supply plane. In An Ice-Cream War, death and injury from comparably absurd causes are commonplace; accident rather than design is throughout the motive force behind events. One of the principal characters, Captain Gabriel Cobb, takes part in the sea-borne invasion of German East Africa, during which military order and discipline degenerate into chaos. Later, as an escaping POW, he is killed by German askaris who have misunderstood their commander's orders. In the novel's penultimate section, Gabriel's revenge-bent younger brother, Felix, tracks down the commander only to find that he has just died from influenza. Elsewhere, Felix and his brother-in-law are severely wounded in training botch-ups.

The action of the novel is witnessed through several centres of consciousness. The main ones—in addition to Gabriel and Felix—are (in Britain) Gabriel's wife, Charis, and (in Africa) an American planter, Temple Smith, whose martial activities are simply a means of continuing his quest to recover a prized farm machine confiscated by the Germans. An Ice-Cream War is easily Boyd's most substantial work, even if he rather overdoes the ironies and also perpetrates some false notes, notably the employment—decidedly old-hat—of a Scottish sergeant with an impenetrable accent.

The stories in On the Yankee Station do not represent Boyd at his best. Several might have been written for the glossy magazine market. The remainder feature some fine ideas, but they are developed perfunctorily and without the stylistic verve of the novels. "Next Boat from Douala" and "The Coup," however, are noteworthy for the presence of Morgan Leafy, while "Hardly Ever" deals with the public school world also explored in the screenplay of School Ties.

The New Confessions might be regarded as a forerunner of a type of self-examination, to be intensified in Brazzaville Beach. A fictitious, rumbustious "autobiography" of an outrageous Scotsman, John James Todd, presents a man, both "vile and contemptible" and "generous and selfless," with a self-deprecatory humour. Boyd's skill in sweeping rapidly through years and across continents matches a range of challenging situations that confront Todd, who eventually comes to terms with his life at age seventy.

Without any escape route of humour, Brazzaville Beach is the self-probing of Hope Clearwater, a woman trying to understand her life in England and Africa, burdened by incomprehensible tragic events. How much is she to blame, she asks? Firmly believing that "the unexamined life is not worth living," hers is one she insists has to be told honestly. The review is relayed in non-chronological episodes, between England, with the remembered life of her husband, his madness and suicide, and Africa, where she discovers that the chimpanzees she is to study are involved in a murderous war with each other. The novel operates as an allegory, for it is set within the Biafran war of 1963. Neither the death of her husband, the killings of the chimpanzees (some she was forced to shoot herself), or the human civil war could be avoided. Hope Clearwater's husband died because of a compulsive need to prove life by rigid mathematical formula, and his parallel figure in Africa nearly destroys Hope Clearwater because of his blindness to facts, which threaten to wreck a theory and his lifework. Simply being, Boyd argues, has rules, but they are not inflexible in a system that selects survivors. Hope's questioning, her "selections, willed and unwilled ... of infinite alternatives and choices," resolve through flexible mathematics, as defined by Pascal. It does not matter if theories could be fully proved as long as they worked. "Intuition," Hope finally learns, rates "higher than vigorous proof."

The stories in The Destiny of Nathalie X are populated by an array of international characters, from the African filmmaker of the title piece to the Vietnamese writer in another story, to a variety of others, all united in their sense of exile—whether literal or internal. A sense of exile likewise pervades the world of Lorimer Black, protagonist of Armadillo. Despite his Anglicized name and his innocuous job as an insurance adjuster, Black is the descendant of gypsies, and as the tale unfolds he finds his exile deepening: first he loses his job, then other events assail him. Throughout the book is an abiding sense of London, a city Boyd observes so carefully one would think that he, too, came from somewhere else.

—David Montrose, updated by Geoffrey Elborn

BOYLAN, Clare

Nationality: Irish. Born: Dublin, 1948. Education: Convent schools in Dublin. Family: Married Alan Wilkes in 1970. Career: editor, Young Woman, Dublin, 1969–71; staff feature writer, Dublin Evening Press, 1973–78; editor, Image, Dublin, 1981–84. Regular book reviewer and feature writer for Sunday Times, London, Irish Times, Dublin, Evening Standard, London, New York Times, Los Angeles Times, The Guardian, London, Cosmopolitan, Vogue, and Good Housekeeping. Lives in Kilbride, County Wicklow. Awards: Journalist of the Year award, 1973. Agent: Gill Coleridge, Rogers Coleridge and White Ltd., 20 Powis Mews, London W11 1JN, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Holy Pictures. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Summit, 1983

Last Resorts. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1984; New York, Summit,

Black Baby. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1988; New York, Doubleday, 1989.

Home Rule. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1993; as 11 Edward Street, New York, Doubleday, 1994.

Room for a Single Lady. London, Little, Brown, 1997.

Short Stories

A Nail on the Head. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1983; New York, Penguin, 1985.

Concerning Virgins. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1989.

That Bad Woman. London, Little Brown, 1995.

Another Family Christmas: A Collection of Short Stories. Dublin, Poolbeg, 1997.

Other

The Literary Companion to Cats. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1994. Editor, The Agony and the God, Literary Essays. London and New York, Penguin, 1994.

Contributor, Ladies' Night at Finbar's Hotel, edited by Dermot Bolger. New York, Harcourt, 2000.

*

Clare Boylan comments:

My novels deal with the confrontative and revelatory nature of sexual relationships, the anarchy of innocence, and the difference between male and female morality. In my novels the random and exploitative nature of maternal love is a recurrent theme. Overall, there is the sense of a wonderful life in which the characters are not equipped to participate and the dark motifs are explored through humor and irony.

* * *

The novels and stories of Clare Boylan follow the search of lonely individuals for love and fulfillment in a hostile environment. Events are often viewed through the eyes of children or the elderly, each intimidated by an increasingly threatening world. Her writing embraces all aspects of life from the comic and grotesque to the tragic, and displays a rare ability to approach routine situations from unexpected angles. In Holy Pictures the society of adults dominates. To Nan and Mary, growing up in Dublin in 1925, the world of their elders is marked by rules specifically designed to thwart the dreams of the young, its rigidity typified by the old-fashioned corset produced in their father's factory. Nan, coming painfully to adolescence in a strict convent school, is lured by the dream-world of the cinema and the cutout pictures of movie stars she worships at a distance. She and Mary long to escape the drab life allocated to them, glimpses of freedom coming only briefly as in Nan's dance as the fairy at a school concert. "She was a star, elevated as the lovely ladies of America who wore coatees of mink and ermine and walked on spirals of celestial stairs." Such dreams break down before the blind indifference and rejection of the adult world. The author presents these rites of passage without sensationalism, deftly contrasting the innocence of the girls against the often-grotesque figures of their elders. Touches of humor lighten the story, but only serve to emphasize its prevailing darkness. Boylan's outwardly simple style conceals the depth of her insights, visual imagery subtly utilized in family photographs, pictures of film stars, and the religious cards Mary handles like talismans. These provide a focus for the dreams of the two girls, calling out the purest qualities in their worshippers. Last Resorts reverses the vision of Holy Pictures, its single-parent heroine dominated by the selfish needs of teenage children. Harriet longs for the easy domesticity taken from her by the desertion of her husband. "Contentment was more nourishing than joy. Being in love was not very peaceful." Snatching vainly at happiness with a married lover, and faced by the return of her husband with a fresh set of demands, Harriet is forced to choose between the comfort of others and her own freedom. Boylan portrays her struggles in a restrained prose whose quietness occasionally startles with sharp single-line images. Set in the present in a more exotic location than Holy Pictures, Last Resorts explores the same basic theme.

Home Rule moves further into the past, describing the fortunes of the Anglo-Irish Devlin family in Dublin in about 1900. With memorable skill Boylan evokes the colorful, squalid city underworld, its casual violence and cruelty. The reader follows the efforts of Daisy Devlin and her siblings to break out from their grim slum tenement with its dissolute father and deluded mother. Daisy escapes only to fall for the handsome, feckless Cecil Cantwell, whose ill-fated business schemes with "the Cantwell corset" recall the use of this rigid, imprisoning symbol in Holy Pictures. Daisy's adventures, and those of her family, are movingly recounted, the author blending humor and pathos with a threatening, atmospheric darkness.

Recent novels show continuing exploration of the form, and fresh psychological perceptions. In Black Baby Boylan re-enters the modern world, where an African child "adopted" by a young middle-class convent girl comes to Dublin to find her now aging "mother." The contrasting characters of large, assertive, life-enhancing Dinah and the sad, withdrawn pensioner Alice, who at her "daughter's" prompting makes her own bid for independence, engage the reader's interest and sympathy, the imaginative plot matched by lively dialogue and description. Towards the end the action veers into the surreal, and the conclusion (for this reader at least) is something of a disappointment. This is a pity, because in all other respects Black Baby is a brilliant example of Boylan's ability to find an unexpected slant on everyday life, and in places is as witty and poignant as anything she has written.

Room for a Single Lady sees the novelist at her best. Rose Rafferty's journey from childhood to adolescence in the Dublin of the 1950s is beautifully evoked, and the book is crammed with the usual lively cast of characters. Rose's glamorous mother downtrodden by domesticity, her old-fashioned father with his doomed "get-richquick" schemes, her sisters Bridie and Katie, all live in the memory. More striking still are the procession of lodgers whose different personalities hold out to Rose the promise and the perils of the world outside. Through them, and her family, Rose confronts love and loss, the taboos of sex and incest, from the shocking experiences of Minnie and Mo to the slapstick "affair" of Katie and the milkman "Norman Wisdom." Boylan's first-person narrative abounds in wonderful oneliners—a Christmas turkey lies in the pantry "like a great reclining nude," a bird savaged by the cat flaps feebly "like a wasp stuck in jam," Christmas itself approaches "like a big, lighted cruise liner." Through Rose's eyes, the reader experiences the excitement and terror of entering the adult world, and the bittersweet loss of innocence as childhood passes. ("That summer when nothing happened seemed the end of time intensely lived.") Room for a Single Lady has all Boylan's finest qualities, and shows her writing at its most inspired.

Equally impressive but far more harrowing is Beloved Stranger, where Boylan confronts the problems of aging. The lives of a devoted elderly couple are totally disrupted when shortly before their golden wedding the husband falls victim to senile dementia. The disintegration of the handsome, self-assured Dick Elliott—made crueler still by rare moments of lucidity—is viewed through the eyes of his wife and middle-aged daughter, who find themselves struggling to accept this unforeseen catastrophe. Quietly and without sentimentality Boylan outlines the distress of Lily as she sees her beloved husband change to a violent, aggressive stranger, and shows how she and her daughter Ruth at last come to terms with his madness and death. With today's aged population increasing steadily, and in a world where care homes are a growth industry, Boylan depicts the heartbreak that afflicts so many ordinary lives. With Room for a Single Lady, Beloved Stranger marks the peak of its author's achievement so far.

Boylan's talents are equally evident in the shorter forms. Her earliest collection of stories, A Nail on the Head, describes the pursuit of love in its many manifestations. "The Wronged Woman" reveals the differing views of a husband by his two wives, while "Bad Natured Dog" deftly points out the gulf between appearance and reality. Boylan ranges from the throwaway humor of "Ears" to the macabre atmosphere of "For Your Own Bad" and "Mama," the grotesque characters worthy rivals to those of Holy Pictures. With Concerning Virgins the emphasis is on naivete and innocence, where in a variety of encounters her "virgins" meet and adapt to the demands placed upon them. The author moves easily from the wry humor of "Venice Saved" to the nightmare scenario enacted by two young girls in "The Picture House," and once more displays her gift for the unexpected in striking imagery and frequent twists of plot. The same is true of That Bad Woman, perhaps her best collection to date, where Boylan again provides a new perspective on familiar themes. In different stories she compels pity for a music-hall artist jailed for sex with an under-age girl, and casts fresh light on the feelings of the young woman who steals a child. Things are not always what they seem, Boylan seems to be telling us. The liberating affair of "That Bad Woman" has a surprising aftermath, while in "It's Her" the insistent phone-calls of the nagging ex-wife prove to have a deeper, more tragic purpose. Like her novels, Boylan's stories show keen insights and a heightened, inspired use of language, her understated style creeping stealthily up to startle the unwitting reader. Here, as elsewhere in her fiction, she avoids happy endings, her vision of life presented as a continually absorbing process, still to be resolved.

-Geoff Sadler

BOYLE, T. Coraghessan

Nationality: American. Born: 2 December 1948. Education: State University of New York, Potsdam, B.A. in English and history 1968; University of Iowa, Iowa City, M.F.A. in fiction 1974, Ph.D. in British literature 1977. Family: Married Karen Kvashay; one daughter and two sons. Career: Assistant professor, 1978–82, associate professor, 1982–86, and since 1986 professor of English, University of Southern California, Los Angeles. Awards: Coordinating Council of Literary Magazines award, 1977, for fiction; National Endowment for the Arts grant, St. Lawrence award, 1980, for Descent of Man; Paris Review's Aga Khan prize, 1981, for fiction; Paris Review, John Train prize, 1984, for humor; Commonwealth Club of California, silver medal award, 1986, for Greasy Lake, gold medal, 1988, for World's End; Guggenheim fellowship, 1988; PEN/Faulkner Novel of the Year award, 1988, for World's End; O'Henry award, 1988, for "Sinking House," 1989, for "The Ape Lady in Retirement;" Prix Passion novel of the year, 1989, for Water Music; National Academy of Arts and Letters Howard D. Vursell memorial award, 1993, for prose excellence; Prix Medicis Etranger, 1997. D.H.L.: State University of New York, 1991. Member: Literature panel, National Endowment for the Arts, 1986–87. Agent: Georges Borchardt, 136 East 57th Street, New York, New York 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Water Music. Boston, Little Brown, 1982; London, Gollancz, 1982.Budding Prospects: A Pastoral. New York, Viking, and London, Gollancz, 1984.

World's End. New York, Viking, 1987; London, Macmillan, 1988. East Is East. New York, Viking, 1990; London, Cape, 1991.

The Road to Wellville. New York, Viking, and London, Granta, 1993. The Tortilla Curtain. New York, Viking, 1995.

Riven Rock. New York, Viking, 1998.

A Friend of the Earth. New York, Viking, 2000.

Short Stories

The Descent of Man. Boston, Little Brown, 1979; London, Gollancz, 1980.

Greasy Lake and Other Stories. New York and Harmondsworth, Viking, 1985.

If the River Was Whiskey. New York, Viking, 1989.

The Collected Stories of T. Coraghessan Boyle. London, Granta, 1993; published as T.C. Boyle Stories: The Collected Stories of T. Coraghessan Boyle. New York, Viking, 1998.

Without a Hero. New York, Viking, and London, Granta, 1994.

Santa Barbara Stories, edited by Steven Gilbar. Santa Barbara, California, John Daniel, 1998.

*

Film Adaptations: The Road to Wellville, 1994.

Critical Studies: Passion and Craft: Conversations with Notable Writers, edited by Bonnie Lyons and Bill Oliver. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1998.

* * *

A fictionist who delights in equal measures of the irreverent and the satiric, the ironical twist and the serious meditation, T. Coraghessan Boyle has been linked with writers such as Thomas Pychon and John Barth. What more accurately defines the arc of Boyle's career, however, is his persistent juggling of the mundane and the surreal. The result is not only stories filled with surprises; they are also balanced adroitly between the dazzle of invention and the systematic undercutting of the ordinary.

Boyle's earliest stories gave hints of longer, more ambitious novels to come. For example, "Heart of the Champion" (1975), focuses on popular TV canine/icon Lassie and her love affair with a sex-starved coyote; "A Women's Restaurant" concerns itself with a male protagonist's obsession with a women-only eatery. Seventeen of Boyle's stories from this period were collected in The Descent of Man, the title derived from a story about a woman's liaison with a chimpanzee who dotes on Nietzsche.

Water Music, his first novel, cobbles Mungo Park, the Scottish explorer, with a fictional counterpart named Red Rise. Their comic adventures in Africa are both informed by Park's actual expeditions of 1795 and 1805 and given a comic dimension by Rise's exploits as an irrepressible con man. What intrigued most critics, however, was the sheer verbal energy of Boyle's polysyllabic style. Here, in short, was a young, go-for-broke writer to reckon with.

Budding Prospects confirmed the suspicions that Boyle is a comic novelist potentially of the first rank. Felix Nasmyth, the novel's laconic protagonist, is a disillusioned teacher who finds himself entangled in a scheme to grow marijuana, and thus grow rich. For Nasmyth, the prospect of untold riches dances around his head like sugarplum fairies. The rub, alas, is that Nasmyth has a long track record as a quitter:

I've always been a quitter. I quit the boy scouts, the glee club, the marching band. Gave up my paper route, turned my back on the church, stuffed the basketball team ... I got married, separated, divorced. Quit smoking, quit jogging, quit eating red meat.

Ironically enough, the dope farm teaches the disillusioned teacher the lesson of hard work; and even when one of his associates, a fast-talking former CIA agent, skips off with the profits, it really doesn't matter. The money that had mattered so greatly at the beginning is no longer the center of Nasmyth's new, improved life.

Although Boyle continues to publish collections of short fiction (Greasy Lake and Other Stories, If the River Was Whiskey, and Without a Hero), the formula of bizarre action superimposed on seemingly normal settings has grown both predictable and limited. There is little doubt that Boyle has a way with the one-liner, much less that his short stories make for an engaging read. But, added together, they lack the heft one expects from a writer of his talent.

With World's End, however, the larger, more expansive canvas of the novel brought him the wide critical regard he apparently craves. Set in the Hudson River Valley of New York, World's End tells the interlocking tale of three families over ten generations. In a series of collisions, simultaneously literal and figurative, the past meets the present and historical mistakes are reenacted once again. An inescapable destiny thus shapes Boyle's most ambitious and aesthetically accomplished novel thus far. By contrast, The Road to Wellville has its comic way with an easier target: the health-food sanitarium run by cereal king John Harvey Kellogg. The high jinks that went on in Battle Creek, Michigan, during the early 1900s become an extended analogy for present-day food fads. Flimflammers are, of course, an abiding subject in American humor, and The Road to Wellville is a worthy enough contribution to that tradition. One turns its pages laughing, which is more than one can say of the novel's film version.

Boyle has yet to settle down as a serious writer, but those who keep their eye on contemporary American literature's best prospects know his name and look forward to his next books with anticipation.

-Sanford Pinsker

BRADBURY, Edward P.

See MOORCOCK, Michael

BRADBURY, Malcolm (Stanley)

Nationality: British. Born: Sheffield, Yorkshire, 7 September 1932. Education: West Bridgford Grammar School, Nottingham, 1943-50; University College, Leicester, 1950-53, B.A. in English (1st class honours) 1953; Queen Mary College, University of London (research scholar), 1953-55, M.A. in English 1955; Indiana University, Bloomington (English-Speaking Union fellow), 1955-56; University of Manchester, 1956-58, Ph.D. in American Studies 1962; Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut (British Association for American Studies fellow), 1958-59. Family: Married Elizabeth Salt in 1959; two sons. Career: staff tutor in literature and drama, Department of Adult Education, University of Hull, Yorkshire, 1959-61; lecturer in English, University of Birmingham, 1961-65. Lecturer, 1957-67, senior lecturer, 1967-69, reader in English, 1969-70, professor of American studies, 1970-95, and since 1995 professor emeritus, University of East Anglia, Norwich. Visiting professor, University of California, Davis, 1966; visiting fellow, All Souls College, Oxford, 1969; visiting professor, University of Zurich, 1972; Fanny Hurst Professor, Washington University, St. Louis, 1982; Davis Professor, University of Queensland, Brisbane, 1983; visiting professor, Griffith University, Nathan, Queensland, 1983, University of Birmingham, 1989, University of Hull, 1994; University of Nottingham, 1996. Series editor, Stratford-upon-Avon Studies, for Arnold publishers, London, 1971-84, and Contemporary Writers series for Methuen publishers, London. Awards: American Council of Learned Societies fellowship, 1965; Royal Society of Literature Heinemann award, 1976; Rockefeller fellowship, 1987; Emmy award, for television series, 1988; Monte Carlo Television Festival award, 1991. D.Litt.: University of Leicester, 1986; University of Birmingham, 1989; University of Hull, 1994. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1973; Honorary Fellow, Queen Mary College, 1984. C.B.E. (Commander, Order of the British Empire), 1991. Agent: Curtis Brown, 4th Floor, Haymarket House, Haymarket, London SW1Y 4SP, England; or, 10 Astor Place, New York, New York 10003, U.S.A. Address: School of English and American Studies, University of East Anglia, Norwich, Norfolk NR4 7TJ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Eating People Is Wrong. London, Secker and Warburg, 1959; New York, Knopf, 1960.

Stepping Westward. London, Secker and Warburg, 1965; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1966; New York, Penguin, 1995.

The History Man. London, Secker and Warburg, 1975; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1976.

Rates of Exchange. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Knopf, 1983.

Cuts: A Very Short Novel. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Harper, 1987.

Doctor Criminale. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Viking Penguin, 1993.

To the Hermitage. London, Picador, 2000.

Short Stories

Who Do You Think You Are? Stories and Parodies. London, Secker and Warburg, 1976; augmented edition, London, Arena, 1984.

Plays

- Between These Four Walls (revue), with David Lodge and James Duckett (produced Birmingham, 1963).
- Slap in the Middle (revue), with others (produced Birmingham, 1965).
- The After Dinner Game, with Christopher Bigsby (televised 1975). Included in The After Dinner Game, 1982.
- Love on a Gunboat (televised 1977). Included in The After Dinner Game, 1982.
- Standing In for Henry (televised 1980). Included in The After Dinner Game, 1982.
- The Enigma, from the story by John Fowles (televised 1980). Included in The After Dinner Game, revised edition, 1989.
- The After Dinner Game: Three Plays for Television. London, Arrow, 1982; revised edition (includes The Enigma), London, Arena, 1989.
- Inside Trading: A Comedy in Three Acts. Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Heinemann, 1997.
- Radio Plays: Paris France (documentary), 1960; This Sporting Life, with Elizabeth Bradbury, from the novel by David Storey, 1974; Scenes from Provincial Life and Scenes from Married Life, with Elizabeth Bradbury, from the novels by William Cooper, 1975–1976; Patterson, with Christopher Bigsby, 1981; Congress, 1981; See a Friend This Weekend, 1985.
- Television Plays: The After Dinner Game, with Christopher Bigsby, 1975; Stones (The Mind Beyond series), with Christopher Bigsby, 1976; Love on a Gunboat, 1977; The Enigma, from the story by John Fowles, 1980; Standing In for Henry, 1980; Blott on the Landscape series, from the novel by Tom Sharpe, 1985; Porterhouse Blue series, from the novel by Tom Sharpe, 1987; Imaginary Friends series, from the novel by Alison Lurie, 1987; Anything More Would Be Greedy series, 1989; The Gravy Train series, 1990; The Green Man series, from the novel by Kingsley Amis, 1990; The Gravy Train Goes East series, 1992; Cold Comfort Farm, from the novel by Stella Gibbons, 1995.

Poetry

Two Poets, with Allan Rodway. Nottingham, Byron Press, 1966.

Other

- Phogey! How to Have Class in a Classless Society. London, Parrish, 1960.
- All Dressed Up and Nowhere to Go: The Poor Man's Guide to the Affluent Society. London, Parrish, 1962.

- Evelyn Waugh. Edinburgh, Oliver and Boyd, 1964.
- What Is a Novel? London, Arnold, 1969.
- The Social Context of Modern English Literature. Oxford, Blackwell, and New York, Schocken, 1971.
- Possibilities: Essays on the State of the Novel. London, Oxford University Press, 1973.
- The Outland Dart: American Writers and European Modernism (lecture). London, Oxford University Press, 1978.
- All Dressed Up and Nowhere to Go (revised editions). London, Pavilion-Joseph, 1982.
- The Expatriate Tradition in American Literature. Durham, British Association for American Studies, 1982.
- Saul Bellow. London, Methuen, 1983.
- The Modern American Novel. Oxford and New York, Oxford University Press, 1983; revised edition, 1991.
- Why Come to Slaka? London, Secker and Warburg, 1986; New York, Penguin, 1988.
- My Strange Quest for Mensonge: Structuralism's Hidden Hero. London, Deutsch, 1987; New York, Penguin, 1988.
- No, Not Bloomsbury (essays). London, Deutsch, 1987; New York, Columbia University Press, 1988.
- The Modern World: Ten Great Writers. London, Secker and Warburg, 1988; New York, Viking, 1989.
- Unsent Letters: Irreverent Notes from a Literary Life. London, Deutsch, and New York, Viking, 1988.
- From Puritanism to Postmodernism: The Story of American Literature, with Richard Ruland. London, Routledge, 1991.
- The Modern British Novel. London, Secker and Warburg, 1994.
- Dangerous Pilgrimages: Transatlantic Mythologies and the Novel. London, Secker and Warburg, 1995; New York, Viking, 1996.
- Editor, Forster: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, Prentice Hall, 1966.
- Editor, Pudd'nhead Wilson, and Those Extraordinary Twins, by Mark Twain. London, Penguin, 1969.
- Editor, E.M. Forster: A Passage to India: A Casebook. London, Macmillan, 1970.
- Editor, with Eric Mottram, U.S.A., in The Penguin Companion to Literature 3. London, Penguin, and New York, McGraw Hill, 1971.
- Editor, with James McFarlane, Modernism 1890–1930. London, Penguin, 1976; Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey, Humanities Press, 1978.
- Editor, *The Novel Today: Contemporary Writers on Modern Fiction.*Manchester, Manchester University Press, and Totowa, New Jersey, Rowman and Littlefield, 1977; revised edition, London, Fontana, 1990.
- Editor, with Howard Temperley, Introduction to American Studies. London, Longman, 1981; revised edition, 1989; third edition, New York, Longman, 1998.
- Editor, The Red Badge of Courage, by Stephen Crane. London, Dent, 1983.
- Editor, The Penguin Book of Modern British Short Stories. London, Viking, 1987; New York, Viking, 1988.
- Editor, with others, Unthank: An Anthology of Short Stories from the M.A. in Creative Writing at the University of East Anglia. Norwich, University of East Anglia Centre for Creative and Performing Arts, 1989.
- Editor, The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent, by Washington Irving. London, Dent/Everyman, 1993.

Editor, The Blithedale Romance, by Nathaniel Hawthorne. London, Dent/Everyman, 1993.

Editor, Present Laughter: An Anthology of Modern Comic Short Stories. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1994.

Editor, The Marble Faun, by Nathaniel Hawthorne. London, Dent/ Everyman, 1995.

Editor, Class Work: An Anthology of 25 Years of Creative Writing at UEA. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1995.

Editor, The Atlas of Literature. New York, Stewart, Tabori & Chang, 1996.

*

Critical Studies: "Fictions of Academe" by George Watson, in Encounter (London), November 1978; "Images of Sociology and Sociologists in Fiction' by John Kramer, in Contemporary Sociology (Washington, D.C.), May 1979; "The Business of University Novels" by J.P. Kenyon, in Encounter (London), June 1980; "Malcolm Bradbury's The History Man: The Novelist as Reluctant Impresario'' by Richard Todd, and interview with Todd, in Dutch Quarterly Review (Amsterdam), vol. 2, 1981-1983; interviews in The Radical Imagination and the Liberal Tradition edited by Heide Ziegler and Christopher Bigsby, London, Junction, 1982, with Ronald Hayman, in Books and Bookmen (London), April 1983, with Alastair Morgan, in Literary Review (London), October 1983, and in Novelists in Interview by John Haffenden, London, Methuen, 1985; article by Melvin J. Friedman, in British Novelists since 1960 edited by Jay L. Halio, Detroit, Gale, 1983; The Dialogic Novels of Malcolm Bradbury and David Lodge by Robert A. Morace, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1989; article by Richard Todd, in Post-War Literatures in English: A Lexicon of Contemporary Authors, Bouhn Stafleu, Holland, 1994.

Malcolm Bradbury comments:

(1996) I suppose my fiction—six novels and a volume of short stories, as well as many television scripts and film screenplays, and three "television novels"—roughly follows the pattern, the styles and cultural and moral concerns, that have run through British fiction over the now five decades over which I've been writing. I began writing fiction in the 1950s when, in the period after the defeat of fascism, and in the aftermath of the Holocaust and the nuclear bomb, the novel in Britain moved back toward social and moral realism. In the wake of those events, there was also a strong concern with the problems affecting liberal and humanistic values. In fact if my books do possess one consistent theme (I believe they do), then that is their concern with the problems of liberalism, humanism, and general moral responsibility in the late 20th-century world.

In my earlier novels (Eating People Is Wrong, Stepping Westward), the central characters are concerned if confused moral agents, liberals not in the political but the moral sense, trying to do a reasonable amount of good in a difficult world, generally with comic, ironic or near-tragic results. I wrote Eating People is Wrong when I was 20 and was a university undergraduate, fascinated by the liberal universe of academic life, a place of often confused humanism and idealistic goodwill. I revised it a little later to make it more a retrospective general portrait of intellectual life in the British 1950s. With Stepping Westward, the result of several years in American universities as a graduate student, and about an American campus in the troubled years of anti-liberal sentiment that came from the witch-hunting of Senator McCarthy, I became interested in the different transatlantic meanings of liberalism, and I also began to explore my sense that humanism was in conflict with the hard realities of cold war politics and also with an age of materialist obsessions, self-seeking, and desire.

That theme is treated with a far harsher irony in The History Man, set in British academic life in the aftermath of the student revolutions of 1968. Its central character, Howard Kirk, is a radical sociologist who believes he is the spokesperson of a Marxist revolutionary process—history itself—that will still sweep away everything in its path; he tries to seduce his students and his colleagues into his bed and into the radical future. It is an ironic and a somewhat dark novel, as its liberal characters become incompetent in the face of inhumane theory and ideology. My next novel, Rates of Exchange, written at the beginning of the 1980s, is somewhat more hopeful. Dealing with various visits to Eastern European countries and my feeling that the rigid grid of the Marxist state was being increasingly undermined by the playfulness of language and the enduring power of the human imagination, it is set in an imaginary Eastern European state, Slaka, which is undergoing a language revolution. Its central character is a magical realist novelist, Katya Princip, who uses fiction to break free of ideology—and who in a later incarnation (see further on) becomes president of the country after it finally throws off its Stalinism. Like a number of British novelists I had also by now become fascinated by the opportunities of television drama in Britain. My next book, Cuts: A Very Short Novel, deals with this. A comedy about the making of what proves an abortive television series in the monetarist years of Mrs Thatcher's 1980s, it is about cuts in two senses: the cuts to British services that happened in the New Conservative 1980s, and the filmic technique of cutting.

Since some of these books are set in or around universities, I have often been thought of as a "campus novelist," and described as a progenitor of what is now called "the university novel." This is true to a point: I was a first-generation university student fascinated by the strangeness of the academic and intellectual world, and so made it fictional country. I have also spent most of my adult life teaching in universities in a number of countries; I am a professor of American studies and a teacher of creative writing, though now part-time; I have written a good deal of literary criticism, and been influenced by it. So my first book is set in a British redbrick in the 1950s, when it was a place of social change; my second is set on American campus near the Rockies at the start of the 1960s when it seemed a place of liberation; my third is set in a British new university as the 1960s died and the 1970s began, and radical hopes were beginning to be replaced by hard economic realities. I see them more as books about their decades, their themes, ideas, emotions, hypocrisies, intellectual fashions, and preoccupations; a university environment means that I can write about historically self-conscious and self-critical characters, the types who most interest me. I most see myself as a comic novelist, mixing satirical and ironic social and intellectual observation with play and parody. If I started writing in a time when the British novel was both thematically and technically provincial, I have tried to break out of that and become a more cosmopolitan, international, and technically elaborate writer. In Rates of Exchange, for example, I sought to find not only a larger subject matter, the question of what ideology we seek to live by in the late 20th century, but also a different language; in fact much of the novel exploits the technique of using English spoken by non-native speakers as its tone of voice.

My books have thus changed considerably over the years (and will continue to do so), but so has British fiction, which during the later 1960s and 1970s grew far more cosmopolitan and technically varied. As writer and critic, I have been very interested in postmodern experiment and found many of my more recent influences abroad. From The History Man onward, my books became harsher in tone, more elaborate technically, and they challenge some of the traditional ideas of character, realism of presentation, and moral confidence with which British novels have so often been written. Rates of Exchange thus deals with the problem of the British writer who uses a language deeply changed by its modern role as a lingua franca, and a world where stories become less reassuring and more ambiguous. This probably makes some of my later works rather more ironic, parodic, and less companionable, though I also think it makes them better. During the 1980s, for various reasons, I also found myself using the form of what I think of as the "television novel," that is, novel-like forms and ideas written and produced as television series. I liked television's immediacy, its rich techniques, its fast narrative pace. Anything More Would Be Greedy, a six-part series for Anglia Television, is about a group of students growing older, richer, and ever more cynical in Mrs Thatcher's entrepreneurial Britain; while The Gravy Train and The Gravy Train: The Economic Miracle (forthcoming) are both four-part drama series for Channel 4, dealing ironically with the European Community as it reaches toward the great late 20th century dream of European integration. The second series is once again about Slaka, after the fall of the Berlin Wall, and its attempts under President Katya Princip to join the mysterious entity of "Europe."

So my concerns and interests have widened. My sixth novel, Doctor Criminale, is a comedy about a tainted philosopher who has been a powerful intellectual influence during the Cold War period, and is now being seen as the philosopher of the Nineties. It's my attempt to deal with the great transformation that came with the end of the 45-year Cold War era, and to capture the climate as the new century, indeed a new millennium, approaches. I have continued to write regularly in a wide variety of media—books, television, film, and radio—and both in fiction and non-fiction, especially literary criticism and, increasingly, journalism. Having now retired from university teaching—mostly recently the teaching of creative writing and working as a full-time writer, I am, though, returning ever more refreshed to the novel. I still think of it as my primary and essential form—an ever-changing form that inevitably alters a good deal in history for any writer who isn't chiefly concerned with perpetuating the popular genres or simply providing entertainment.

I view my books as works of comic and satirical observation, which amongst other things explore both the decades in which they're set, and the changing moods and modes of fiction. Socially they explore the moral 1950s, the radical 1960s, the cautious 1970s, the entrepreneurial 1980s, and now the nervous and increasingly cynical 1990s. In form they shift from moral comedy to harder irony, where the comic more nearly touches the tragic. I stay fascinated by fiction's fictionality, and regard all our forms of exploring knowledge as forms of fiction-making, which is one reason why I regard the novel as central. Since it acknowledges its fictionality, and often explores its own method and declares its own scepticism, it stays at best one of our chief ways of discovering and naming the world. At the same time it depends on a sense of truth, a feeling for reality, a response to the authentic experience of individual humanity. And, if my books are satirical explorations of current confusion, pain, and inauthenticity, they hardly (as some critics have said) betoken the end of humanism. In fact the novel belongs with the spirit of ''liberalism,'' in the better sense of that word: the challenging of ideologies, intellectual fashions and inhuman systems or theories through sympathy and the imagination. Which is why I think the novel is always under challenge, but is far from dead.

* * *

Ever since the 1959 publication of his first novel, Eating People Is Wrong, Malcolm Bradbury has been regarded as an extremely witty satirist, lampooning topical phenomena and issues. He excels in group scenes: the cautiously wild and slap-stick university party that mixes faculty and students in Eating People Is Wrong; the American faculty committee meeting to choose a writer-in-residence that begins Stepping Westward and is ironically contrasted with the concluding one a year later; the department meeting that combines haggling over procedure, trivia, several forms of self-seeking, and genuine academic concerns in The History Man; the adult education class that was apparently cut from Eating People Is Wrong and, in revised form, printed in the collection of Who Do You Think You Are?; the guest lectures of and alcoholic lunches for the English linguist on a twoweek tour of the country in "central Eastern Europe" that prides itself on "clean tractors" and a "reformed watercress industry" in Rates of Exchange. All these pieces bring people, representing various points of view on some current question of politics or communal definition, into sharp, comically outrageous conflict or misunderstanding.

Bradbury often castigates a whole contemporary milieu through scenes like the "with-it," consciously "existential" party, a license for free self-definition, arranged by the "new university" sociologist, Howard Kirk, in The History Man. Bradbury also exploits his talent for mimicry of current attitudes, modes of speech (like the variety of ways to mangle English in Rates of Exchange), and the style and themes of other writers. A long section of Who Do You Think You Are?, for example, contains astringent parodies of Snow, Amis, Murdoch, Braine, Sillitoe, and others, along with less biting and salient echoes of Angus Wilson and Lawrence Durrell. The use of Amis (with whose early work Bradbury's has often been compared) is particularly resonant. Like Amis, Bradbury sometimes includes characters from one fiction in another, like the free-loving psychologist, Flora Beniform, who is both Howard Kirk's uncommitted mistress in The History Man and a central character on the television panel concerning modern sexual mores satirized in the story "Who Do You Think You Are?" As an in-joke, Bradbury even appropriates the Amis character who doesn't appear, the fraudulent L.S. Caton used in a number of novels until Amis finally killed him off in The Anti-Death League. Bradbury makes him a professor, scheduled to visit Benedict Arnold University in the U.S. to give a lecture on the "angry young men," who never arrives. In spite of all the critical comparisons and interlocking references, Bradbury's satire is different from Amis's, Bradbury generally more concerned with issues and ideas, less implicitly committed to pragmatic success in the world or, until the recent Rates of Exchange, to mocking various forms of contemporary incompetence.

Much of Bradbury's fiction takes place within a university setting: the provincial red-brick during the 1950s in Eating People Is Wrong, the American university in the flat wilderness of the Plains states in Stepping Westward the new south coast university in 1972 in The History Man. Yet, as Bradbury himself has rightly insisted, the applications of his fiction extend beyond the university, just as the implications of his moral treatments of contemporary experience are far from slapstick comedy. In Stepping Westward the Englishman, James Walker, who becomes writer-in-residence at the "moral supermarket" of the American university, begins with his own "decent modest radicalism" and tries to extend himself to assimilate more of the modern world, looking for "sense and design." The plot depends on Walker's public refusal to sign an American loyalty oath, part of his English "faith in unbelief," and the America he finds is one of "violence and meaninglessness and anarchy." In The History Man Howard Kirk, seen far less sympathetically than James Walker is, seeks "liberation" and "emancipation" in the new university for himself and others, ignoring or condescending to his old friend, Beamish, a rather bumbling locus of value in the novel, who claims "there is an inheritance of worthwhile life in this country." In this novel, written entirely in the rush of the present tense, Kirk chooses instead to redevelop the town, to lie, to manipulate others in the name of the "now" and the "new," and to ignore the voice of a young English teacher who sees her function as simply reading and talking about books. In both novels Bradbury's moral focus is clear and searching, although it sometimes seems slightly provincial. He attacks the self-seeking, the self-deceptive, and the meretricious, like a career academic named Froelich who becomes chairman in Stepping Westward and Kirk himself in The History Man. Yet some of Bradbury's work has more complexity and distance than outlining the moral framework might suggest. Sometimes, as in The History Man,, which ends with Kirk's wife deliberately pushing her arm through the window, an act of self-destruction like that more ambivalently performed by Beamish at an earlier party, or in a short story entitled "A Very Hospitable Person," the satire seems brittle, almost cruel, in denying the central figures any humanity or self-doubt. At other times, as in an excellent story called "A Breakdown," about a student having a futile affair with a married man in Chesterfield who runs off to Spain to punish herself, or as in Stepping Westward, where James Walker recognizes that America has defeated him, that, in spite of all his morality, he could not really handle his own freedom to define himself, Bradbury's perspective is more sympathetic without diluting the moral concern. A prefatory note to Rates of Exchange characterizes the novel as "a paper fiction, offered for exchange" that illustrates "our duty to lie together, in the cause, of course, of truth." Beneath its comic texture of constant mutual misunderstanding and incompetence (sometimes overdone), Bradbury sensitively questions the comfortable assumption of virtue or truth in any of the various national, political, intellectual, or sexual languages that form systems of human exchange.

Bradbury's commitment to liberal humanism has always been tempered by a willingness to test its continuing viability against various cultural, political, and economic challenges. And nowhere is that willingness more clearly evident than in Doctor Criminale. This witty fiction about fashionable literary theory, as well as the fashion for literary theory, is also, appropriately enough, Bradbury's most self-consciously intertextual novel to date, drawing on an impressive array of literary precedents which include his own Rates of Exchange, Cuts, and two Gravytrain television series as well as his friend David Lodge's Small World, an updating of the campus novel for an age of the global campus. But in many respects the work Doctor Criminale draws on most is F. Scott Fitzgerald's "symbolist tragedy," The Great Gatsby, "about the struggle of the symbolic imagination to exist in lowered historical time, and about that symbol's inherent ambiguity, its wonder and its meretriciousness," as Bradbury wrote in The Modern American Novel.

Doctor Criminale is, of course, a comedy, not a tragedy, and its subject is theory's, not the symbol's, essential ambiguity. Bradbury's Nick Carraway is the hapless, anachronistle Francis Jay, a verbal man and naive liberal humanist adrift in the visual culture of entrepreneurial England. And his Gatsby is a man no less able to inspire wonder in his admirers, the supercritic and celebrity thinker Bazlo Criminale. Criminale, the "text" Jay sets out to decode, proves a most elusive quarry. As mysterious as Eliot's famous MacCavity the Cat, he seems less a person than a floating signifier who exists largely as a collection of mutually exlusive interpretations, or signifieds. He is alternately a philosopher who has declared the end of philosophy and a master mystifier pulling books and articles out of his theoretical hat; perhaps a spy, though maybe a double agent, an ardent Communist or, what is just as likely, an ardent anti-Communist. Above all he is a version of the late Yale deconstructionist, Paul de Man, who posthumously became the subject of intense controversy following the discovery of articles he had written during the Nazi occupation. Like de Man, Criminale seems to be a man at best "flexible" and at worst "a moral disappointment." Bradbury's jokey magical mystery tour of the political, economic, and literary landscape at the end of the Cold War and on the eve of the European Community, thus, does more than just delight; it also "problematizes" both fashionable theory and old-fashioned liberal humanism by having each "interrogate" the other. However, Doctor Criminale does more than illuminate their relative strengths and weaknesses; in examining theory in a specific historical context, Bradbury also examines many of the defining features of the culture in which theory has been so ardently promoted and just as strenuously resisted.

During the late 1990s, Bradbury did not produce any novellength fiction; rather, he directed his attention toward drama, offering up plays (including Insider Trading) and an adaptation of Stella Gibbons's Cold Comfort Farm for the 1996 film directed by John Schlesinger. He also edited anthologies and wrote about the subject he has experienced both from outside and inside, literature.

-James Gindin, updated by Robert A. Morace

BRADBURY, Ray(mond Douglas)

Nationality: American. Born: Waukegan, Illinois, 22 August 1920. Education: Los Angeles High School, graduated 1938. Family: Married Marguerite Susan McClure in 1947; four daughters. Career: Since 1943 full-time writer. President, Science-Fantasy Writers of America, 1951–53. Member of the Board of Directors, Screen Writers Guild of America, 1957–61. Lives in Los Angeles. Awards: O. Henry prize, 1947, 1948; Benjamin Franklin award, 1954; American Academy award, 1954; Boys' Clubs of America Junior Book award, 1956; Golden Eagle award, for screenplay, 1957; Ann Radcliffe award, 1965, 1971; Writers Guild award, 1974; Aviation and Space Writers award, for television documentary, 1979; Gandalf award, 1980. D.Litt.: Whittier College, California, 1979. Agent: Harold Matson Company, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York 10001. Address: c/o Bantam, 666 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York 10103, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Fahrenheit 451. New York, Ballantine, 1953; London, Hart Davis, 1954; with a new foreword by the author, Thorndike, Maine, G. K. Hall, 1997.

Something Wicked This Way Comes. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1962; London, Hart Davis, 1963.

Death Is a Lonely Business. New York, Knopf, 1985; London, Grafton, 1986.

A Graveyard for Lunatics: Another Tale of Two Cities. New York, Knopf, and London, Grafton, 1990.

The Smile. Mankato, Minnesota, Creative Education, 1991.

Green Shadows, White Whale. New York, Knopf, and London, HarperCollins, 1992.

Quicker Than the Eye. New York, Avon Books, 1996.

Driving Blind. New York, Avon Books, 1997.

With Cat for Comforter, illustrated by Louise Reinoehl Max. Salt Lake City, Utah, Gibbs Smith, 1997.

Dogs Think That Every Day Is Christmas, illustrated by Louise Reinoehl Max. Salt Lake City, Utah, Gibbs Smith, 1997.

Ahmed and the Oblivion Machines: A Fable, illustrated by Chris Lane. New York, Avon Books, 1998.

Short Stories

Dark Carnival. Sauk City, Wisconsin, Arkham House, 1947; abridged edition, London, Hamish Hamilton, 1948; abridged edition, as The Small Assassin, London, New English Library, 1962.

The Martian Chronicles. New York, Doubleday, 1950; as The Silver Locusts, London, Hart Davis, 1951.

The Illustrated Man. New York, Doubleday, 1951; London, Hart Davis, 1952; New York, Avon Books, 1997.

The Golden Apples of the Sun. New York, Doubleday, and London, Hart Davis, 1953.

The October Country. New York, Ballantine, 1955; London, Hart Davis, 1956; with a new introduction by the author. New York, Ballantine Books, 1996.

Dandelion Wine. New York, Doubleday, and London, Hart Davis, 1957; New York, Avon Books, 1999.

A Medicine for Melancholy. New York, Doubleday, 1959.

The Day It Rained Forever. London, Hart Davis, 1959.

The Machineries of Joy. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Hart Davis, 1964.

The Vintage Bradbury. New York, Random House, 1965.

The Autumn People. New York, Ballantine, 1965.

Tomorrow Midnight. New York, Ballantine, 1966.

Twice Twenty Two (selection). New York, Doubleday, 1966.

I Sing the Body Electric! New York, Knopf, 1969; London, Hart Davis, 1970; published as I Sing the Body Electric and Other Stories, New York, Avon Books, 1998.

Bloch and Bradbury, with Robert Bloch. New York, Tower, 1969; as Fever Dreams and Other Fantasies, London, Sphere, 1970.

(Selected Stories), edited by Anthony Adams. London, Harrap, 1975.Long after Midnight. New York, Knopf, 1976; London, Hart Davis MacGibbon, 1977.

The Best of Bradbury. New York, Bantam, 1976.

To Sing Strange Songs. Exeter, Devon, Wheaton, 1979.

The Stories of Ray Bradbury. New York, Knopf, and London, Granada, 1980.

The Last Circus, and The Electrocution. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1980.

Dinosaur Tales. New York, Bantam, 1983.

A Memory of Murder. New York, Dell, 1984.

The Toynbee Convector. New York, Knopf, 1988; London, Grafton, 1989.

Plays

The Meadow, in Best One-Act Plays of 1947–48, edited by Margaret Mayorga. New York, Dodd Mead, 1948.

The Anthem Sprinters and Other Antics (produced Los Angeles, 1968). New York, Dial Press, 1963.

The World of Ray Bradbury (produced Los Angeles, 1964; New York, 1965).

The Wonderful Ice-Cream Suit (produced Los Angeles, 1965; New York, 1987; musical version, music by Jose Feliciano, produced Pasadena, California, 1990). Included in The Wonderful Ice-Cream Suit and Other Plays, 1972.

The Day It Rained Forever, music by Bill Whitefield (produced Edinburgh, 1988). New York, French, 1966.

The Pedestrian. New York, French, 1966.

Christus Apollo, music by Jerry Goldsmith (produced Los Angeles, 1969).

The Wonderful Ice-Cream Suit and Other Plays (includes The Veldt and To the Chicago Abyss). New York, Bantam, 1972; London, Hart Davis, 1973.

The Veldt (produced London, 1980). Included in The Wonderful Ice-Cream Suit and Other Plays, 1972.

Leviathan 99 (produced Los Angeles, 1972).

Pillar of Fire and Other Plays for Today, Tomorrow, and Beyond Tomorrow (includes Kaleidoscope and The Foghorn). New York, Bantam, 1975.

The Foghorn (produced New York, 1977). Included in Pillar of Fire and Other Plays, 1975.

That Ghost, That Bride of Time: Excerpts from a Play-in-Progress. Glendale, California, Squires, 1976.

The Martian Chronicles, adaptation of his own stories (produced Los Angeles, 1977).

Fahrenheit 451, adaptation of his own novel (produced Los Angeles, 1979).

Dandelion Wine, adaptation of his own story (produced Los Angeles, 1980).

Forever and the Earth (radio play). Athens, Ohio, Croissant, 1984. On Stage: A Chrestomathy of His Plays. New York, Primus, 1991. Screenplays: It Came from Outer Space, with David Schwartz, 1952; Moby-Dick, with John Huston, 1956; Icarus Montgolfier Wright, with George C. Johnston, 1961; Picasso Summer (as Douglas Spaulding), with Edwin Booth, 1972.

Television Plays: Shopping for Death, 1956, Design for Loving, 1958, Special Delivery, 1959, The Faith of Aaron Menefee, 1962, and The Life Work of Juan Diaz, 1963 (all Alfred Hitchcock Presents series); The Marked Bullet (Jane Wyman's Fireside Theater series), 1956; The Gift (Steve Canyon series), 1958; The Tunnel to Yesterday (Trouble Shooters series), 1960; I Sing the Body Electric! (Twilight Zone series), 1962; The Jail (Alcoa Premier series), 1962; The Groom (Curiosity Shop series), 1971; The Coffin, from his own short story, 1988 (U.K.).

Poetry

Old Ahab's Friend, and Friend to Noah, Speaks His Piece: A Celebration. Glendale, California, Squires, 1971.

When Elephants Last in the Dooryard Bloomed: Celebrations for Almost Any Day in the Year. New York, Knopf, 1973; London, Hart Davis MacGibbon, 1975.

That Son of Richard III: A Birth Announcement. Privately printed, 1974

Where Robot Mice and Robot Men Run round in Robot Towns: New Poems, Both Light and Dark. New York, Knopf, 1977; London, Hart Davis MacGibbon, 1979.

Twin Hieroglyphs That Swim the River Dust. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1978.

The Bike Repairman. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1978.
The Author Considers His Resources. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1979.

The Aqueduct. Glendale, California, Squires, 1979.

The Attic Where the Meadow Greens. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1980.

Imagine. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1981.

The Haunted Computer and the Android Pope. New York, Knopf, and London, Granada, 1981.

The Complete Poems of Ray Bradbury. New York, Ballantine, 1982. Two Poems. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1982.

The Love Affair. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1983.

Other

Switch on the Night (for children). New York, Pantheon, and London, Hart Davis, 1955.

R Is for Rocket (for children). New York, Doubleday, 1962; London, Hart Davis, 1968.

S Is for Space (for children). New York, Doubleday, 1966; London, Hart Davis, 1968.

Teacher's Guide: Science Fiction, with Lewy Olfson. New York, Bantam, 1968.

The Halloween Tree (for children). New York, Knopf, 1972; London, Hart Davis MacGibbon, 1973.

Mars and the Mind of Man. New York, Harper, 1973.

Zen and the Art of Writing, and The Joy of Writing. Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1973.

The Mummies of Guanajuato, photographs by Archie Lieberman. New York, Abrams, 1978.

Beyond 1984: Remembrance of Things Future. New York, Targ, 1979.

About Norman Corwin. Northridge, California, Santa Susana Press, 1979.

The Ghosts of Forever, illustrated by Aldo Sessa. New York, Rizzoli, 1981.

Los Angeles, photographs by West Light. Port Washington, New York, Skyline Press, 1984.

Orange County, photographs by Bill Ross and others. Port Washington, New York, Skyline Press, 1985.

The Art of Playboy (text by Bradbury). New York, van der Marck Editions, 1985.

Zen in the Art of Writing (essays). Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1990.

Yestermorrow: Obvious Answers to Impossible Futures (essays). Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1991.

Editor, Timeless Stories for Today and Tomorrow. New York, Bantam, 1952.

Editor, The Circus of Dr. Lao and Other Improbable Stories. New York, Bantam, 1956.

*

Manuscript Collections: Bowling Green State University, Ohio.

Critical Studies: Interview in Show (New York), December 1964; introduction by Gilbert Highet to The Vintage Bradbury, 1965; "The Revival of Fantasy" by Russell Kirk, in Triumph (Washington, D.C.), May 1968; "Ray Bradbury's Dandelion Wine: Themes, Sources, and Style" by Marvin E. Mengeling, in English Journal (Champaign, Illinois), October 1971; The Ray Bradbury Companion (includes bibliography) by William F. Nolan, Detroit, Gale, 1975; The Drama of Ray Bradbury by Benjamin P. Indick, Baltimore, T-K Graphics, 1977; The Bradbury Chronicles by George Edgar Slusser, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1977; Ray Bradbury (includes bibliography) edited by Joseph D. Olander and Martin H. Greenberg, New York, Taplinger, and Edinburgh, Harris, 1980; Ray Bradbury by Wayne L. Johnson, New York, Ungar, 1980; Ray Bradbury and the Poetics of Reverie: Fantasy, Science Fiction, and the Reader by William F. Toupence, Ann Arbor, Michigan, UMI Research Press, 1984; Ray Bradbury by David Mogen, Boston, Twayne, 1986; Ray Bradbury: An American Icon (video cassette), Great Northern Productions, 1996; Ray Bradbury and the Poetics of Reverie by William F. Touponce, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1998; American Science Fiction and Fantasy Writers by Claire L. Datnow, Springfield, New Jersey, Enslow Publishers, 1999; Ray Bradbury: A Critical Companion by Robin Anne Reid, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 2000; Ray Bradbury, edited by Harold Bloom, Philadelphia, Chelsea House, 2000.

Ray Bradbury comments:

I am not so much a science-fiction writer as I am a magician, an illusionist. From my beginnings as a boy conjurer I grew up frightening myself so as to frighten others so as to cure the midnight in our souls. I have grown into a writer of the History of Ideas, I guess you might say. Any idea, no matter how large or small, that is busy growing itself alive, starting from nowhere and at last dominating a town, a culture, or a world, is of interest. Man the problem solver is the writer of my tales. Science fiction becoming science fact. The machineries of our world putting away and keeping our facts for us so they can be used and learned from. Machines as humanist teachers. Ideas of men built into those machines in order to help us survive and survive well. That's my broad and fascinating field, in which I will wander for a lifetime, writing past science fictions one day, future ones another. And all of it a wonder and a lark and a great love. I can't imagine writing any other way.

* * *

Although he has written six novels, including the classics Fahrenheit 451 (1953) and Something Wicked This Way Comes (1962), Ray Bradbury is best known as an author of short stories. His style is so economical, striking, and lyrical that it has been described as prose poetry, and he is as skillful at presenting horror and the grotesque as was Edgar Allan Poe (1809–1849), his primary influence. Bradbury is known as one of "the big four" of the genres of science fiction and fantasy, the others being Isaac Asimov, Arthur C. Clarke, and Robert Heinlein. He is deeply respected and beloved by genre fans and by students who study him in high school and college. His significance in fantasy and horror owe much to his background, his prose style, his recurrent themes, and the sense of wonder that pervades his work.

Bradbury's second story sale, "The Candle" (1941), marked the beginning of his association with Weird Tales, the legendary American pulp magazine that first appeared in 1923 and that, despite changes in editorial staff and many deaths and resurrections, keeps returning from the literary grave. This magazine published such enormously popular authors as H. P. Lovecraft, Robert Bloch of Psycho fame, and Conan the Barbarian's creator Robert E. Howard. Weird Tales led supernatural fiction out of a poorly written Gothic and ghost tradition. It is essential to grasp the primacy of Weird Tales and its large fan base to recognize Bradbury's contemporary literary milieu and the adulation he earned during the years 1941 to 1948, when he became the most distinguished contributor to that magazine.

Bradbury began publishing collections of linked stories in the 1950s with The Martian Chronicles and The Illustrated Man (1951). Fahrenheit 451 (1953) and Dandelion Wine (1957) are fix-ups, or novels constructed of previously published short stories. Something Wicked This Way Comes (1962), Death Is a Lonely Business (1985), and A Graveyard for Lunatics (1990) are stand-alone novels.

The Martian Chronicles and The Illustrated Man exemplify Bradbury's evolving style, motifs, and themes. Though his technique varies from the subtle to the ironic to the hair-raising, one can call The Martian Chronicles a fantasy based on science fiction motifs and The Illustrated Man, which is darker and more tainted by the supernatural, despite occasional nods to science fiction (futuristic machines, spaceships, aliens), overall a work of horror.

The Martian Chronicles tells of the emigration of humans to a Mars that is either peopled by or haunted by eerie, wistful, telepathic Martians. Humans gradually displace and replace the natives, and in 2003 (which, in the 1940s, seemed sufficiently distant to allow for terraforming technologies), the settlement of Tenth City has hardly any red dust blowing through it, so exactly is it like a small midwestern town. In 2005 Earth is destroyed by thermonuclear war (as recounted in the classic short story "There Will Come Soft Rains") and, not long after, human colonies and customs have erased all vestiges of the natives. The men now are the Martians.

This sounds like an allegory of the European colonization of the West, and read in one sitting the stories may be taken as a dirge for lost civilizations. The theme of loss runs like a sad tune throughout Bradbury's work: loss of loved ones, of friendships, of youth, of golden opportunities, of marvels trampled in a blind rush of capitalistic greed. The dictum that "you can't stand in the way of progress" is multivalent in Bradbury's fiction. Progress brings us to the stars, but dazzles us so that many other good things are left behind.

The stories in The Illustrated Man are united by a slight yet disturbing conceit: the narrator encounters a man whose skin is painted by "living" tattoos. One of these will show the death of the observer if watched long enough. After a night of viewing different tattoo stories as though films in miniature, the narrator is horrified to see his own destiny revealed—in the future, from some unimaginable need for revenge, the illustrated man will strangle him to death.

Both books testify to Bradbury's deceptively simple, sentimental, lyrical prose and to challenging themes such as revenge, insanity, loneliness, hope, and survival. Bradbury's short, straightforward sentences owe their delights and horrors to sensory descriptions (such as the aromas of cut grass or burning autumn leaves), to settings evocative of his fondly remembered hometown Waukegan, Illinois, and to pensive dialogues in which young children or old men express their sense of wonder when contemplating the star-filled night sky, the miracles of sunlight or the menace of shadows, the innocence of childhood, or the tragedies of missed meetings and lost loves.

Dandelion Wine is narrated by twelve-year-old Douglas (Bradbury's middle name) Spaulding, who is, like many of his young protagonists, loosely based on Bradbury himself. This work captures, as though in a glass of home-made wine, the recurring flavors and themes of his fiction. During the summer of 1928, Douglas gains maturity as the loss of a friend and the appearance of a murderer transform his perceptions of his world. The boy's powers of imagination, Bradbury emphasizes, both enrich and darken his life.

Something Wicked This Way Comes is again semi-autobiographical, but far darker—literally—than Dandelion Wine. Sunlight and sunset color Dandelion Wine, but much of Something Wicked occurs at night and in the dark places of the human psyche. Light and Dark are allegorized throughout the tale of Will Halloway and Jim Nightshade, who are seduced by the arrival in Green Town, Illinois, of a carnival called Cooger and Dark's Pandemonium Shadow Show. This evil carnival tempts the townsfolk with its supernatural powers to grant dreams—but also to steal souls. The merry-go-round, the Hall of Mirrors, the parade, and other carnivalesque trappings become truly creepy under Bradbury's skillful pen.

Fahrenheit 451 treats the themes of imagination and loss so powerfully that it is alluded to in discussions of governmental oppression and censorship almost as commonly as George Orwell's 1984. The protagonist, Guy Montag, has happily labored as a "fireman"—a burner of books—for ten years. As the novel opens, he meets seventeen-year-old Clarisse, who asks him unsettling questions: Does he ever think about his society instead of mouthing the socially acceptable phrases? Is he curious about the books he burns? Is he happy?

Their friendship changes his life. Montag begins to question his world, and finds fear and unhappiness everywhere. Eventually he meets a secret society of readers who preserve illegal books by memorizing them. A New York Times reviewer praised "Bradbury's account of this insane world, which bears many alarming resemblances to our own."

Bradbury's fiction developed into a more realistic (though still rhapsodic) mode during the 1960s and 1970s, and relied more on non-supernatural, if sometimes morbid, themes, such as dysfunctional marriages, the dangers of technology, fear of aging, and fear of death.

This development can be observed in the collections The Machineries of Joy (1964) and I Sing the Body Electric (1969). Bradbury contributed to his favorite genres by editing anthologies and writing children's stories; he also wrote nonfiction and plays.

Not until 1985 did a new Bradbury novel appear: Death Is a Lonely Business, which is based on his years as a pulp fiction writer. The protagonist's optimism and hope of success bizarrely preserve him from the deaths that are striking down many of his contemporaries. Like Death, A Graveyard for Lunatics is a detective novel about a writer, this one working in the Hollywood of the 1950s. Hired as a science fiction film writer at a big studio, he is led to the adjoining graveyard, where he discovers a body frozen in time. Though not as famous as his earlier work, both novels continue his theme of a past that cannot stop haunting the present.

Perhaps the greatest contribution Bradbury has made to fantasy and horror lies in his creating and ever re-creating a bona fide American romantic, melancholic tradition: a nostalgia for corn fields and small towns and suburbs, replacing the previously overwhelming European nostalgia for aristocracies and castles and cathedrals.

Bradbury began writing for television in 1951 for such programs as Alfred Hitchcock and The Twilight Zone, and the highly praised USA Network television series The Bradbury Theatre (1985–1992) is based on many of his short stories. Bradbury has also written plays and filmscripts, including the Gregory Peck-starring Moby Dick (1956) and the Academy Award-nominated Icarus Montgolfier Wright (1962). Fahrenheit 451 was adapted for film (by François Truffaut) in 1966, The Illustrated Man in 1969, and Something Wicked This Way Comes in 1983, and The Martian Chronicles appeared as a television miniseries (1979). Something Wicked is the best of these adaptations.

In 1991 the extent of Bradbury's influence on later generations of writers was evidenced when William F. Nolan and Martin H. Greenberg commissioned twenty-two original stories (one by Bradbury) for The Bradbury Chronicles, published to honor his fiftieth year as a writer. The contributors included such noted names as Richard Matheson and his son Richard Christian Matheson, Charles L. Grant, F. Paul Wilson, Ed Gorman, and Chad Oliver. Horror authors Steven King and Clive Barker have also acknowledged his influence. Bradbury has earned the 1977 World Fantasy Award, the 1980 Grandmaster of Fantasy Gandalf Award, the 1989 Bram Stoker Award, and the 1988 Nebula Grand Master Award, and was inducted into the University of Kansas Center for the Study of Science Fiction's Science Fiction and Fantasy Hall of Fame (1999), all for Lifetime Achievement.

-Fiona Kelleghan

BRADLEY, David (Henry, Jr.)

Nationality: American. Born: Bedford, Pennsylvania, 7 September 1950. Education: Bedford Area High School, graduated 1968; University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia (Franklin scholar, Presidential scholar), 1968–72, B.A. (summa cum laude) in creative writing 1972; King's College, University of London (Thouron scholar), 1972–74, M.A. in area studies 1974. Career: Reader and assistant editor, J.B. Lippincott, publishers, Philadelphia, 1974–76; visiting lecturer in English, University of Pennsylvania, 1975. Visiting instructor, 1976–77, assistant professor, 1977–82, associate professor of English, 1982–89, professor, 1989–96, Temple University, Philadelphia. Editorial consultant, Lippincott, 1977–78, and Ace Science Fiction, New York, 1979; visiting lecturer, San Diego State University, 1980–81. Member of the Executive Board, PEN American Center, 1982–84. Awards: American Academy award, 1982; PEN-Faulkner award, 1982. Agent: Wendy Weil, Julian Bach Literary Agency, 747 Third Avenue, New York, New York 10017. Address: P.O. Box 12681, La Jolla, California 92039–2681, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

South Street. New York, Grossman, 1975.

The Chaneysville Incident. New York, Harper, 1981; London, Serpent's Tail, 1986.

The Lodestar Project. New York, Pocket Books, 1986.

Uncollected Short Story

"197903042100 (Sunday)," in Our Roots Grow Deeper than We Know, edited by Lee Gutkind. Pittsburgh, University of Pittsburgh Press, 1985.

Play

Sweet Sixteen (produced Louisville, Kentucky, 1983).

Other

From Text to Performance in the Elizabethan Theatre: Preparing the Play for the Stage. Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1991 Editor, with Shelley Fisher Fishkin, The Encyclopedia of Civil Rights in America. Armonk, New York, Sharpe Reference, 1998.

*

David Bradley comments:

(1996) I believe a work of fiction ought to more or less speak for itself—certainly the author ought to keep his mouth shut about it; he's had his chance. On the other hand, I have noticed a few things about my own attitudes that might bear mentioning. Nothing so deliberate as a "what I am trying to do with my writing" statement (which I find pretentious and usually wrong), but just observations about what I tend to think is good. I am, first of all, an Aristotelian writer. Meaning that I believe in the Gospel as laid down in The Poetics. Plot is paramount, and I do not like anything that does not have one. Second, I do not believe in a sharp distinction between fiction and non-fiction. Most of my writing is grounded in real places and people. I always find myself "adapting" reality to the writing, as one might "adapt" a novel for a film. Third, I do not believe in art for art's sake. Art has no sake; people do. A work of art that cannot be understood is a voice crying in the wilderness. Fourth, I demand a lot from readers. I do not write "easy" things; they require effort and emotional commitment from me-and they require the same from readers. I hope only that readers feel their time and sweat are well spent.

* * *

For David Bradley, place matters, and history haunts. If the Stephen Dedalus of James Joyce's A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man tries desperately to fly over the nets of family, church, and state, Bradley speaks lyrically of those cords that bind him to his birthplace (the rural community of Bedford, Pennsylvania), to the black church in which he grew up, and to the family that nurtured his early interest in history, and in writing about that history. As put in "A Personal View from the Third Generation" (New York Times Sunday Magazine):

For he [Bradley] realizes this is his church. Three generations of his family have occupied Mt. Pisgah's pulpit and worshipped in its pews. A plaque on the wall dedicates the 1960s redecoration to his grandmother. The Bible on the lectern was an offering by his father when his mother survived a dangerous illness. In the truest sense, he, not the denomination, owns Mt. Pisgah. And owes it.

For, in a day when and a place where opportunities were restricted, Mt. Pisgah gave him the chance to speak, to lead, to learn the history of his people. When opportunities became available, it was the experience gained at Mt. Pisgah that equipped him to take advantage of them. But, after taking advantage of them, he abandoned the church that had nurtured him. He walked from Mt. Pisgah down into the Promised Land and never really looked back. Perhaps the time has come to turn around.

These are eloquent, confessional words. For Bradley has moved with astonishing speed from the raw, lusty talent that described the "street people" who hold forth on Philadelphia's South Street (published in 1975, when Bradley was only 24) to the sweep and ambition of The Chaneysville Incident, the novel that brought Bradley national recognition.

South Street is a novel anchored in the naturalism of "elephantine cockroaches and rats the size of cannon shells," but it is also a novel that reaches well beyond the geography of urban despair. Bradley's South Street poises itself at the border of Philadelphia's black ghetto, where it ties "the city's rivers like an iron bracelet or a wedding band, uniting the waters, sewer to sewer, before they meet at the city's edge." Place matters deeply, of course—in this case, the locus seems to be Lightnin' Ed's Bar—but it is the people, and Bradley's ear for their colorful language, that matters even more:

Leo, the two-hundred-and-fifty-eight-pound owner-bartender-cashier-bouncer of Lightnin' Ed's Bar and Grill, looked up from the glass he was polishing to see a one-hundred-and-fifty-eight-pound white man walk into his bar. Leo's mouth fell open and he almost dropped the glass. One by one the faces along the bar turned to stare at the single pale face, shining in the dimness. "Yes, sir, cap'n," Leo said uneasily, "what can we be doin' for you?"

George looked around nervously. "I, ah, had a little accident. I, ah, ran over a cat in the street, and I, uh, don't know what to do about it."

"Whad he say?" a wino at the far end of the bar, who claimed to be hard of hearing, whispered loudly.

The jukebox ran out and fell silent just as somebody yelled to him, "Paddy says he run over some cat out in the street." The sound echoed throughout the bar. Conversation died.

"Goddamn!" said the wino.

Leo leaned over the bar, letting his gigantic belly rest on the polished wood. "Yeah?" he said to George. "Didja kill him?"

"Oh yes," George assured him. "I made certain of that."

Bradley is at his best when he moves inside the set pieces, the extended anecdotes, that give South Street its resonance. What might well have become yet another unrelenting grim account of sordid conditions and despairing lives transmogrifies itself into a high, more humane key. It was, in short, a novel that prompted reviewers to say "Keep your eye on Mr. Bradley." In this case, they were righter than they knew.

The Chaneysville Incident both widened and deepened the scope of Bradley's obvious talents. His postgraduate research in American history at the University of London sent him back, ironically enough, to a story he had heard in Bedford about 13 escaped slaves who asked to be killed rather than recaptured and about the 13 unmarked graves his mother once discovered.

The Chaneysville Incident tells this story from the perspective of John Washington, a black man who has bootstrapped himself from humble, rural origins to become a history professor at a Philadelphia university and who lives with Judith, a white psychologist. The question the book raises is simply, and perplexingly, how should a black man live in a world white men have made. The result is a thickly textured, multi-layered book, one that inextricably combines theory, historical research, and domestic tension. As Washington, the historian, puts it: "The key to the understanding of any society lies in the observation and analysis of the insignificant and the mundane .... If you doubt it [i.e. that America is a classed society], consider the sanitary facilities employed in America's three modes of public long-distance transportation: airplanes, trains, and buses."

Washington, however, not only discovers the historical truth of the "Chaneysville incident," but also that the truth is more complex, more riddling than he had imagined. If part of his character serves as Bradley's mouthpiece, part of him must, finally, be rejected by Bradley, the novelist. Luckily, it is the latter part that matters most, when one has recovered from the racial anger that gives this important novel much of its initial energy.

-Sanford Pinsker

BRADLEY, John Ed

Nationality: American. Born: Opelousas, Louisiana, 12 August 1958. Education: Louisiana State University, B.A. 1980. Career: Staff writer, Washington Post, 1983–87; contributing writer, Washington Post, 1988–89. Since 1991 contributing editor, Esquire; since 1993 contributing writer, Sports Illustrated. Agent: Esther Newberg, International Creative Management, 40 West 57th St., New York, New York 10019, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Tupelo Nights. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, and London, Bloomsbury, 1988.

The Best There Ever Was. New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, and London, Bloomsbury, 1990.

Love and Obits. New York, Holt, and London, Bloomsbury, 1992. Smoke. New York, Holt, 1994.

My Juliet. New York, Doubleday, 2000.

* * *

John Ed Bradley's first novel establishes his niche in the tradition of southern Gothic writers. Emphasis on the grotesque, the macabre, and the excessive pull of environment is predominant. Much of the setting in Tupelo Nights features the local cemetery, where the hero's best friend is a gravedigger and where he meets Emma Groves, the love of his life. Emma goes every night to pray at the grave of her infant son. The cemetery motif is constant. John Girlie, the novel's antihero, works the graveyard shift at a pipeline company, and images of death haunt the book.

Girlie had been an all-America football player at Louisiana State University and had a promising offer to play professional football. Under his domineering mother's influence, however, he returns to his hometown and cannot until late in the novel extricate himself from his oedipal situation.

At times Bradley's plot flirts with melodrama, but this is more than overcome by his keen gift for dialogue and vivid descriptions that are often poetically lyrical. Bradley captures the atmosphere of time and place with persuasive authenticity, totally immersing the reader in the stifling environment and grimness of Girlie's small Louisiana town.

Harold Gravely, the main figure in The Best There Ever Was, is a college football coach in his sixties. Almost thirty years ago his team won the national championship. Since then Gravely's teams have had mostly losing seasons, and the students, alumni, and college officials want him to resign. Learning that he has lung cancer, he decides to forego any treatment in the hope that the situation generated by his condition will force the college administration to renew his contract so that he can coach one final year.

The figure of Coach Gravely is drawn with believable and persuasive strokes perfectly conveying his loud, egotistical, and overbearing temperament. As the Old Man, a term he favors, he is a memorable if unpleasant character. Bradley also cleverly uses comedy to satirize the coach and emphasize the grotesque aspects of the situation. The novel's weakness is that often the descriptions of Gravely and many of the episodes he is involved in become essentially repetitive. The book at times becomes too wordy; too much material is presented. Even after the coach is murdered, many additional pages are devoted to his widow; this leads to a feeble anticlimax.

Joseph Burke, in Love and Obits, is a newspaper reporter who has been demoted to writing obituaries. Divorced, Burke lives with his wheelchair-bound father. Although he and his father are on good terms, Joseph is presented as one of the melancholy, lonely men who walk about the city at night looking for something they never had or for something they have lost and will never find again.

Burke's father, Woody, takes on more cheerfulness and hope when he falls in love with his day care nurse; Burke himself becomes more positive when he attracts the attention of widow Laura Vannoy. Burke had written the obituary article about her prominent husband, so even love is entwined with death. At the book's end, Woody, in an epiphany of love, performs a Christ-like action of feeding his fisherman's catch to the poor.

Smoke is both a continuation of previous characteristics of Bradley's work and a worrisome development, which was present on occasion in the earlier books. Smoke is a small town in Louisiana where Jay Carnihan's goal is to kidnap Monster Mart's founder, billionaire Rayford Holly, and require him to apologize for forcing so many downtown stores in America out of business. Kidnapped on one of his nationwide inspection trips, Holly proves to be an exceedingly lovable, down-to-earth individual who even pitches in as a short order cook at the lunch counter of Carnihan's small store.

Again, Bradley demonstrates his gifted talent for recording dialogue and lively characterization, but the narrative becomes too far-fetched. There comes a point when a tall tale can become too tall, when a novel can sprawl to an excessive degree, and when even an admirable talent can be overwhelmed by too many episodes, too many words, too drawn out a plot, and an unconvincing conclusion. As in The Best There Ever Was, Bradley does not seem to know when to stop, and melodrama and sentimentality predominate. Even the theme of love over death, which was so effectively presented in Love and Obits, becomes mawkish and cloying in Smoke.

Bradley is a considerable talent in handling dialogue and characterization, but he must temper plot excesses and a tendency to overelaborate a narrative.

-Paul A. Doyle

BRAGG, Melvyn

Nationality: British. Born: Carlisle, Cumberland, 6 October 1939. Education: Nelson-Thomlinson Grammar School, Wigton, Cumberland, 1950-58; Wadham College, Oxford, 1958-61, M.A. (honours) in modern history 1961. Family: Married 1) Marie-Elisabeth Roche in 1961 (died 1971), one daughter; 2) Catherine Mary Haste in 1973, one daughter and one son. Career: With BBC Television and Radio from 1961: general trainee, 1961-62; producer on Monitor, 1963; for BBC 2 editor on New Release (later Review, then Arena), Writers World, and Take It or Leave It, 1964-70; presenter, In the Picture, Tyne Tees Television, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1971, Second House, 1973-77, and Read All About It, 1976-77, BBC, London. Since 1978 editor and presenter, South Bank Show; Head of Arts, 1982-90, and since 1990 Controller of Arts, London Weekend Television; since 1988 presenter, Start the Week, BBC Radio 4. Chairman, Border Television, Carlisle. Since 1969 member, and chairman, 1977–80, Arts Council Literature Panel; president, Northern Arts, 1983–87, and National Campaign for the Arts since 1986. Awards: Writers Guild award, for screenplay, 1966; Rhys Memorial prize, 1968; Northern Arts Association prose award, 1970; Silver Pen award, 1970; Broadcasting Guild award, 1984; Ivor Novello award, for musical, 1985; BAFTA Dimbleby award, 1987; W. H. Smith Literary Award, 2000. D.Litt.: University of Liverpool, 1986; University of Lancaster, 1990; D.Univ.: Open University, Milton Keynes, Buckinghamshire, 1988. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1970, and Royal Television Society; Honorary Fellow, Lancashire Polytechnic; Domus Fellow, St. Catherine's College, Oxford, 1990. Received the title of lord from Prime Minister Tony Blair, 1998. Address: 12 Hampstead Hill Gardens, London N.W.3., England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

For Want of a Nail. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Knopf, 1965.

The Second Inheritance. London, Secker and Warburg, 1966; New York, Knopf, 1967.

Without a City Wall. London, Secker and Warburg, 1968; New York, Knopf, 1969.

The Cumbrian Trilogy. London, Coronet, 1984.

The Hired Man. London, Secker and Warburg, 1969; New York, Knopf, 1970.

A Place in England. London, Secker and Warburg, 1970; New York, Knopf, 1971.

Kingdom Come. London, Secker and Warburg, 1980.

The Nerve. London, Secker and Warburg, 1971.

The Hunt. London, Secker and Warburg, 1972.

Josh Lawton. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Knopf, 1972.

The Silken Net. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Knopf, 1974.

Autumn Manoeuvres. London, Secker and Warburg, 1978.

Love and Glory. London, Secker and Warburg, 1983.

The Maid of Buttermere. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Putnam, 1987.

A Time to Dance. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1990; Boston, Little Brown, 1991.

Crystal Rooms. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1992.

Credo. London, Sceptre, 1996.

The Sword and the Miracle. New York, Random House, 1996.

The Soldier's Return. London, Sceptre, 1999.

Fiction (for children)

A Christmas Child. London, Secker and Warburg, 1976.

Uncollected Short Story

"The Initiation," in Winter's Tales 18, edited by A.D. Maclean. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1972.

Plays

Mardi Gras, music by Alan Blaikley and Ken Howard (produced London, 1976).

The Hired Man, adaptation of his own novel, music and lyrics by Howard Goodall (produced Southampton and London, 1984). London, French, 1986.

Screenplays: Play Dirty, with Lotte Colin, 1968; Isadora with Clive Exton and Margaret Drabble, 1969; The Music Lovers, 1970; Jesus Christ Superstar, with Norman Jewison, 1973; The Seventh Seal, 1993.

Radio Play: Robin Hood, 1971.

Television Plays: The Debussy File, with Ken Russell, 1965; Charity Begins at Home, 1970; Zinotchka, 1972; Orion, music by Ken Howard and Alan Blaikley, 1977; Clouds of Glory, with Ken Russell, 1978.

Other

Speak for England: An Essay on England 1900–1975. London, Secker and Warburg, 1976; revised edition, London, Coronet, 1978; as Speak for England: An Oral History of England 1900–1975, New York, Knopf, 1977.

Land of the Lakes. London, Secker and Warburg, 1983; New York, Norton, 1984.

Laurence Olivier. London, Hutchinson, 1984; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1985.

Rich: The Life of Richard Burton. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1988; as Richard Burton: A Life, Boston, Little Brown, 1989.

(With Ruth Gardiner). On Giant's Shoulders: Great Scientists and Their Discoveries: From Archimedes to DNA. New York, Wiley, 1998.

Editor, My Favourite Stories of Lakeland. Guildford, Surrey, Lutterworth Press, 1981.

Editor, Cumbria in Verse. London, Secker and Warburg, 1984.

***

Melvyn Bragg comments:

(1972) The ways in which I came to write are sketched in the last chapters of A Place in England: they are made the notions of a fictional self—Douglas Tallentire.

Present ideas on fiction are represented in the novel The Nerve and in an essay "Class and the Novel" in Times Literary Supplement (London), 15 October 1971.

· · ·

Melvyn Bragg began his writing career with two good novels about wasted human potential, For Want of a Nail and The Second Inheritance. But it was Without a City Wall which secured for him a deserved reputation as one of the best contemporary novelists. Theme and structure reinforce each other as Bragg traces, first, the awakening of passion in Richard Godwin, a self-imposed exile from the chaos of London, for Janice Beattie, a Cumberland girl of unusual intelligence and powerful ambition; and then the challenges that the life of consummated passion entails for both of them. The drama develops principally from Janice whose ambition and fastidiousness prove stronger than sexual passion or her sense of responsibility to others. Her passion for Richard contracts, while his for her continues to expand. Richard is driven to the brink of self-destruction, but recoils in time to force Janice to some kind of modus vivendi between the claims of his passion and the claims of her individuality. The Silken Net also develops the theme of sexual struggle. This book focuses on a restless intellectual, Rosemary Lewis, whose energy alienates her from life in the Cumberland village of Thurston. Her vigor is admirable but her egoism is destructive as she attempts to breed in her husband the same intensities that motivate her. The resulting conflict registers with less authority, however, than that developed in Without a City Wall.

The alternation of intensity and apathy in the passional life is again one subject explored in The Hired Man. Covering the years 1898 to 1920 in the life of John and Emily Tallentire, the novel articulates the nuances of their emotions. Communication between a man and a woman becomes a function of the body; and estrangement develops when perfect physical accord is broken. After Emily's death, at the age of 40, John is back where he was at the beginning, a man for casual hire on the great farms but now with all his zest gone. Bragg's artistry is at its best in his honest portrayal of the hard lives of agricultural laborers in the early 20th century. The protagonist of A Place in England is Joseph Tallentire, John's son. Bragg is less close to Joseph than to John; in fact, the most memorable pages of the novel feature the now patriarchal John. After much struggle Joseph is able to "be his own man" as owner of a public house; but his success is undercut by the disintegration of his marriage, a loss to him for which he cannot account.

Kingdom Come reveals much of the power found in The Hired Man and has much interest for the modern reader, as Bragg presents the contemporary generation of the Tallentire men. Lester, a con man and cousin, and Douglas, the son of Joseph and a writer of talent, lack the purposefulness and inner strength of their ancestors, though Harry, the adopted son who stays in Thurston, retains these qualities in large part. Douglas is the sympathetically presented protagonist who can neither be satisfied with the stern ancestral morality nor get clear of the claims of responsibility which derive from it. His divided nature defeats him because it leads him to betray the woman he loves and whose real worth he realizes too late.

In two other novels Bragg has again had recourse to Cumberland and its people. In Josh Lawton, a moving parable, Lawton has overtones of a Biblical patriarch and suffers the predictable fate of those who are too good for this world. In Autumn Manoeuvres Bragg traces the destructive and self-destructive career of Gareth Johnson. His violent loathing of his stepfather and his own violent self-loathing are linked to the violence of his begetting (his mother had been gang raped in World War I). Is he the victim of fatality or is he his own victim? (more the second than the first, Bragg implies).

London figures more than Cumberland in The Nerve and Love and Glory. In The Nerve Bragg traces, in a first-person narrative, the stages in the mental breakdown of his protagonist, Ted. Power accrues when Ted, the narrator, actualizes some of his experiences of physical and mental pain, but the breakdown which is a "breakthrough" is not precisely characterized. In Love and Glory Bragg explores the various forms of love from self-serving passion to selfless devotion. The conflict centers on the relationship between Ian Grant, an actor of genius, and Caroline, his Scottish mistress, who loves him with greater devotion than he can reciprocate. The central character is a writer for television, Willie Armstrong, who is Grant's best friend. He comes to love Caroline to distraction but gives her up when she fails to respond to his advances and when he realizes the claims of his wife, Joanna, upon him. Willie thus gains in insight and understanding while Ian Grant retrogresses spiritually and becomes even more submerged in his egotism.

The immediacy of Bragg's Cumberland milieu is, at least superficially, the quality that impresses most in his fiction. As in Thomas Hardy and D.H. Lawrence, milieu is integrally fused with the fortunes and development of the characters. Like Hardy he has in unusual degree insight into human beings who confront the elemental realities of nature, and like Hardy's his people encounter problems difficult to resolve when they lose rapport with nature. The protagonist of The Soldier's Return, coming home in 1946 from years spent fighting in the jungles of Burma, finds himself alienated from his wife and family. With The Sword and the Miracle, inspired by his discovery of a sign to St. Bega in Cumbria, the author went back some thirteen hundred years for a tale of seventh-century Ireland. Bragg's eye for detail, his compelling sense of drama, his penetration into the emotional and psychic life of his characters, his sense of the moral verities, and his supple and luminous prose have all contributed to his standing as a distinguished novelist.

-Frederick P.W. McDowell

BRATA, Sasthi

Nationality: British. Born: Sasthibrata Chakravarti in Calcutta, India, 16 July 1939. Education: Calcutta Boys School; Presidency College, Calcutta University. Family: Married Pamela Joyce Radcliffe (divorced). Career: Has worked in Europe as a lavatory attendant, kitchen porter, barman, air-conditioning engineer, and postman, and in New York as a freelance journalist; London columnist, Statesman, 1977–80. Awards: Arts Council grant, 1979. Agent: Barbara Lowenstein, 250 West 57th Street, Suite 701, New York, New York 10107, U.S.A. Address: 33 Savernake Road, London NW3 2JU, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Confessions of an Indian Woman Eater. London, Hutchinson, 1971; as Confessions of an Indian Lover, New Delhi, Sterling, 1973. She and He. New Delhi, Orient, 1973.

The Sensuous Guru: The Making of a Mystic President. New Delhi, Sterling, 1980.

Short Stories

Encounter. New Delhi, Orient, 1978.

Poetry

Eleven Poems. New Delhi, Blue Moon, 1960.

Other

My God Died Young (autobiography). London, Hutchinson, and New York, Harper, 1968.

A Search for Home (autobiography). New Delhi, Orient, 1975.

Astride Two Worlds: Traitor to India. New Delhi, B.I. Publications, 1976; as Traitor to India: A Search for Home, London, Elek, 1976. Labyrinths in the Lotus Land (on India). New York, Morrow, 1985. India: The Perpetual Paradox. London, Tauris, 1986.

*

Sasthi Brata comments:

(1991) My first published book, My God Died Young, was a selfprofessed autobiography, written at the age of 28, before I had made any kind of a name for myself as a writer, or anything else. This led a good few publishers, readers, and finally critics to utter the exasperated cry: "What makes you think that the story of your life (woefully unlived-in up to that time) deserves to be told? Or that people will want to read it?" The answer to these questions was within the book itself, of course. But in a sense all of my writing, fiction, non-fiction, and journalism, has been an attempt to refute the assumptions lurking behind those superficially plausible and innocent-sounding queries. For they presume that only the heroic and the grand deserve artistic exploration and autobiographical treatment. While I believe, very firmly, that everyone, but everyone has a story to tell. The difference between the true artist and the pub bore is that the writer has a sure grasp over the instruments of his trade—words, sentences, paragraphs, syntax, metaphor, melody—and is then able to select, assemble, and present a somewhat more ordered and appetizing version of the world than the chaotic, often repetitive jumble of experiences from external reality which make up his raw material.

All my fiction has been supremely autobiographical. Even in those books which are listed as non-fiction on library shelves, I have used fictional devices, and equally freely introduced reportage techniques in books which profess to be novels. I should warn the prospective reader however not to deduce from this that every hero in every one of my novels is an exactly congruent picture of the man I am. In a review of the late Yukio Mishima's novels I wrote: "The obsessionally autobiographical writer may be an invisible man." For while he may not be telling lies, he is not necessarily telling the truth either, at least not of the kind the law courts would accept. Since he is an artist, he has used his imagination, but he has not necessarily let you into the secret of where the fictive imagination begins or where empirically verifiable reality ends.

There was a time when I used to be irked by attacks on the high sexual content in my writing. I am no longer. Few addicts of hardcore porn would find any of my books satisfactory. Prurient sensibilities, with a cavalier indifference to style and linguistic resonances, might equally be put off by their subject matter. Apologies to neither group.

I would call myself a "radical traditionalist" as a novelist, if only because to be a successful "experimental" writer, in the sense that Joyce and Borges are, requires a poetic sensibility I do not possess. It is easy to descend into the wholly bogus or deliberately pedantic in trying to achieve effects about which one is not totally sure. There are no rules in the use of language of course, but I would rather stick within certain wide but strictly defined limits, than stray into those unexplored territories where the arcane, obscure, or simply fraudulent vendors ply their wares. I believe that all my books can be read simply as good tales.

Labyrinths in the Lotus Land was my first commissioned work. I wrote it specifically for a Western audience. It was an ambitious attempt to inform a western reader, within the compass of a single book, everything that he or she might wish to know about the country, spanning the whole gamut of history, religion, art, politics, etc. Critics who complained about the apparent incongruity of introducing personal experiences into a book which purports to portray a picture of contemporary India were not aware of my long-held belief that by relating a particular incident or episode in a graphic and authentic manner, the universal is illuminated more poignantly than any amount of dry didactic scholarship can ever do.

* * *

Most of Sasthi Brata's books are written in the first person, and all his heroes seem to be modeled after the novelist himself. The hero is always a Bengali Brahmin, from a well-to-do family, who lives in Calcutta and studies physics at college. He leaves home in protest after the girl of his choice is married off to someone whom her parents have chosen. He drifts into a number of jobs, including journalism, and finally establishes himself comfortably in Hampstead. His chief hobby is haunting pubs. The narrator of his first novel, Confessions of an Indian Woman Eater, differs only in name from the narrator of the autobiographies My God Died Young and Astride Two Worlds. The physical characteristics remain the same, even if the hero is Zamir Ishmael of She and He: he is dark, of medium height, with dark eyes and an attractive smile; his success with women is unlimited. Brata's books are quite readable; his style is racy and adequate for his purpose, which is generally limited to describing the exploits of his hero in bed. The exception is Astride Two Worlds, the second part of his autobiography, which touches upon many serious topics like racial discrimination in Britain, the involvement of the Indian government in the guerrilla activities of the Mukti Bahini in Bangladesh in 1971, and the growing disillusionment of the young with established politicians in India. A couple of chapters, written in the third person, serve to give a proper perspective to this autobiography.

Brata's best selling novel, Confessions of an Indian Woman Eater, begins where his first book, My God Died Young, an autobiography, let off: Amit Ray, like Sasthi Brata, runs away from his Calcutta home. Amit recounts his varied sexual experiences in a number of capitals—New Delhi, Rome, London, Paris, Copenhagen. He finally ends up in Hampstead with a steady job, and becomes a successful writer. For a certain readership the chief attraction of the book would lie in the step-by-step accounts of copulation, found almost every ten pages. The next novel, She and He, has a hero born of an Arab father and a French mother; he is at home in England and lands a good job because he can speak the language with the proper accent. He always talks about writing the "Great English Novel," but does nothing about it until one of his ex-girlfriends sends him an unfinished novel, having written her side of the story, with blank pages for the hero to fill in. The first person account of Zamir alternating with the third person narrative of Sally is an interesting stylistic innovation, but the hero's mindless drifting from bed to bed is ultimately boring.

The Sensuous Guru: The Making of a Mystic President, perhaps the most imaginative of Brata's works, recounts the rise of Ram Chukker (short for Ram Chakravarti, just as Sasthi Brata is the shortened form of Sasthibrata Chakravarti). Chukker initially sets himself up as a Guru in New York, and makes a good living. He writes a short autobiographical novel, The Making of a Guru, which outdoes the worst that America can produce in pornography. Through high-pressure promotion with the help of an influential literary agent Chukker wins the Pulitzer Prize, is nominated for the Nobel Prize, manages one for Peace, and is ultimately elected President of the United States.

Brata has also published a collection of stories; most of them are like his novels (some have appeared, with modifications, as chapters in his novels). One very good story is "Smiles among the Bric-a-Brac," about a young Oxford graduate from a rich English family, comfortably settling down to the girl and the job his parents have chosen for him, though he earlier loves the beautiful Nina Fernandez, of mixed parentage. The first person account, with the hero justifying the way he drops Nina, is a beautiful psychological study of the hero's lack of principles. It is significant that Robert Lomax, from an old English family, is very different from the usual Bengali hero. One feels that Brata could write better fiction, especially if he got rid of his autobiographical obsession.

-Shyamala A. Narayan

BRINK, André (Philippus)

Nationality: South African. Born: Vrede, Orange Free State, 29 May 1935. Education: Lydenburg High School; Potchefstroom University, Transvaal, B.A. 1955, M.A. in English 1958, M.A. in Afrikaans and Dutch 1959; the Sorbonne, Paris, 1959–61. Family: Married 1) Estelle Naudé in 1959 (divorced), one son; 2) Salomi Louw in 1965 (divorced), one son; 3) Alta Miller in 1970 (divorced), one son and one daughter; 4) Marésa de Beer in 1990. Career: Lecturer, 1963–73, senior lecturer, 1974-75, associate professor, 1976-79, and professor, 1980-90, Department of Afrikaans and Dutch Literature, Rhodes University, Grahamstown. Since 1991 professor of English, University of Cape Town. Editor, Sestiger magazine, Pretoria, 1963-65; Standpunte magazine, Cape Town, 1986–87. President, Afrikaans Writers Guild, 1978–80. Awards: Geerligs prize, 1964; CNA award, 1965, 1979, 1983; South African Academy award, for translation, 1970; Médicis étranger prize (France), 1980; Martin Luther King Memorial prize (UK), 1980. D.Litt.: Rhodes University, 1975; University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, 1985. Chevalier, Legion of Honour (France), 1982; Commander, Order of Arts and Letters (France), 1992. Agent: Ruth Liepman, Maienburgweg 23, Zurich, Switzerland. Address: Department of English, University of Cape Town, Private Bag, Rondebosch 7700, South Africa.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Die gebondenes. Johannesburg, Afrikaanse Pers, 1959.

Die eindelose weë. Cape Town, Tafelberg, 1960.

Lobola vir die lewe (Dowry for Life). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1962.

Die ambassadeur. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1963; as The Ambassador, Johannesburg, CNA, 1964; London, Faber, 1985; New York, Summit, 1986; as File on a Diplomat, London, Longman, 1967.

Orgie (Orgy). Cape Town, Malherbe, 1965.

Miskien nooit: 'n Somerspel. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1967.

Kennis van die aand. Cape Town, Buren, 1973; as Looking on Darkness, London, W.H. Allen, 1974; New York, Morrow, 1975.

An Instant in the Wind. London, W.H. Allen, 1976; New York, Morrow, 1977.

Rumours of Rain. London, W.H. Allen, and New York, Morrow, 1978.

A Dry White Season. London, W.H. Allen, 1979; New York, Morrow, 1980.

A Chain of Voices. London, Faber, and New York, Morrow, 1982. The Wall of the Plague. London, Faber, 1984; New York, Summit, States of Emergency. London, Faber, 1988; New York, Summit, 1989.

An Act of Terror. London, Secker and Warburg, 1991.

The First Life of Adamastor. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Summit, 1993.

On the Contrary. London, Secker and Warburg, 1993; New York, Little Brown, 1994.

Imaginings of Sand. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1996.

Devil's Valley. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1999.

The Rights of Desire. London, Secker & Warburg, 2000.

Short Stories and Novellas

Die meul teen die hang. Cape Town, Tafelberg, 1958.

Rooi, with others. Cape Town, Malherbe, 1965.

Oom Kootjie Emmer. Cape Town, Buren, 1973.

'n Emmertjie wyn: 'n versameling dopstories. Cape Town, Saayman & Weber, 1981.

Oom Kootjie Emmer en die nuwe bedeling: 'n stinkstorie. Johannesburg, Taurus, 1983.

Loopdoppies: Nog dopstories. Cape Town, Saayman & Weber, 1984.Die Eerste lewe van Adamastor. Cape Town, Saayman & Weber, 1988.

Plays

Die band om ons harte (The Bond Around Our Hearts). Johannesburg, Afrikaanse Pers, 1959.

Caesar (in verse; produced Stellenbosch, Cape Province, 1965). Cape Town, Nasionale, 1961.

Die beskermengel en ander eenbedrywe (The Guardian Angel and Other One-Act Plays), with others. Cape Town, Tafelberg, 1962.

Bagasie (Baggage; includes Die koffer, Die trommel, Die tas; produced Pretoria, 1965). Cape Town, Tafelberg, 1965.

Elders mooiweer en warm (Elsewhere Fair and Warm; produced Bloemfontein, 1969). Cape Town, Malherbe, 1965.

Die verhoor (The Trial; produced Pretoria, 1975). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1970.

Die rebelle (The Rebels). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1970.

Kinkels innie kabel (Knots in the Cable), adaptation of Much Ado About Nothing by Shakespeare. Cape Town, Buren, 1971.

Afrikaners is plesierig (Afrikaners Make Merry). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1973.

Pavane (produced Pretoria, 1980). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1974.

Bobaas van die Boendoe, adapted from Synge's Playboy of the Western World (produced Bloemfontein, 1974). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1974.

- Die Hamer van die hekse (The Hammer of the Witches). Cape Town, Tafelberg, 1976.
- Toiings op die langpad (Toiings on the Long Road). Pretoria, Van Schaik, 1979.

Other

- Die bende (The Gang; for children). Johannesburg, Afrikaanse Pers, 1961.
- Platsak (Broke; for children). Johannesburg, Afrikaanse Pers, 1962. Orde en chaos: 'n Studie oor Germanicus en die tragedies van
- Shakespeare (Order and Chaos: A Study of Germanicus and the Tragedies of Shakespeare). Cape Town, Nasionale, 1962.
- Pot-pourri: Sketse uit Parys (Pot-pourri: Sketches from Paris). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1962.
- Die verhaal van Julius Caesar (for children). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1963.
- Sempre diritto: Italiaanse reisjoernaal (Sempre diritto: Italian Travel Journal). Johannesburg, Afrikaanse Pers, 1963.
- Olé: Reisboek oor Spanje (Olé: A Travel Book on Spain). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1965.
- Aspekte van die nuwe prosa (Aspects of the New Fiction). Pretoria, Academica, 1967; revised edition, 1969, 1972, 1975.
- Parys-Parys: Retoer (Paris-Paris: Return). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1969.
- Midi: Op reis deur Suid-Frankryk (Midi: Travelling Through the South of France). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1969.
- Fado: 'n reis deur Noord-Portugal (Fado: A Journey Through Northern Portugal). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1970.
- Die poësie van Breyten Breytenbach (The Poetry of Breyten Breytenbach). Pretoria, Academica, 1971.
- Portret van die vrou as 'n meisie (Portrait of Woman as a Young Girl). Cape Town, Buren, 1973.
- Aspekte van die nuwe drama (Aspects of the New Drama). Pretoria, Academica, 1974.
- Brandewyn in Suid-Afrika. Cape Town, Buren, 1974; as Brandy in South Africa, 1974.
- Dessertwyn in Suid-Afrika. Cape Town, Buren, 1974; as Dessert Wine in South Africa, 1974.
- Die Klap van die meul (A Stroke from the Mill). Cape Town, Buren, 1974
- Die Wyn van bowe (The Wine from Up There). Cape Town, Buren, 1974.
- Ik ben er geweest: Gesprekken in Zuid-Afrika (I've Been There: Conversations in South Africa), with others. Kampen, Kok, 1974.
- Voorlopige rapport: Beskouings oor die Afrikaanse literatuur van sewentig (Preliminary Report: Views on Afrikaans Literature in the 1970s). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1976; Tweede voorlopige rapport (Second Preliminary Report), 1980.
- Jan Rabie se 21. Cape Town, Academica, 1977.
- Why Literature?/Waarom literatur? Grahamstown, Rhodes University, 1980.
- Heildronk uit Wynboer saamgestel deur AB ter viering van die blad se 50ste bestaansjaar. Cape Town, Tafelberg, 1981.
- Die fees van die malles. Cape Town, Saayman & Weber, 1981.
- Mapmakers: Writing in a State of Siege. London, Faber, 1983; as Writing in a State of Siege, New York, Summit, 1984.
- Literatuur in die strydperk (Literature in the Arena). Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1985.

- Editor, Oggendlied: 'n bundel vir Uys Krige op sy verjaardag 4 Februarie 1977. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1977.
- Editor, Klein avontuur, by Top Naeff. Pretoria, Academica, 1979.
- Editor, with J.M. Coetzee, A Land Apart: A South African Reader. London, Faber, 1986; New York, Viking, 1987.
- Translator, Die brug oor die rivier Kwaï, by Pierre Boulle. Cape Town, Tafelberg, 1962.
- Translator, Reisigers na die Groot Land, by André Dhôtel. Cape Town, Tafelberg, 1962.
- Translator, Die wonderhande, by Joseph Kessel. Cape Town, HAUM, 1962.
- Translator, Nuno, die visserseun, by L.N. Lavolle. Cape Town, HAUM, 1962.
- Translator, Verhale uit Limousin, by Léonce Bourliaguet. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1963.
- Translator, Die slapende berg, by Léonce Bourliaguet. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1963.
- Translator, Land van die Farao's, by Leonard Cottrell. Cape Town, Malherbe, 1963.
- Translator, Die bos van Kokelunde, by Michel Rouzé. Cape Town, Malherbe, 1963.
- Translator, Moderato Cantabile, by Marguerite Duras. Cape Town, HAUM, 1963.
- Translator, Die goue kruis, by Paul-Jacques Bonzon. Cape Town, Malherbe, 1963.
- Translator, Land van die Twee Riviere, by Leonard Cottrell. Cape Town, Malherbe, 1964.
- Translator, Volke van Afrika, by C.M. Turnbull. Cape Town, Malherbe, 1964.
- Translator, Alice se avonture in Wonderland, by Lewis Carroll. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1965.
- Translator, Die mooiste verhale uit die Arabiese Nagte. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1966.
- Translator, Die avonture van Don Quixote, retold by James Reeves. Cape Town, HAUM, 1966.
- Translator, Ek was Cicero, by Elyesa Bazna. Johannesburg, Afrikaanse Pers, 1966.
- Translator, Koning Babar, by Jean de Brunhoff. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1966.
- Translator, Die Swerfling, by Colette. Johannesburg, Afrikaanse Pers, 1966.
- Translator, Die vindingryke ridder, Don Quijote de la Mancha, by Cervantes. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1966.
- Translator, Speuder Maigret, Maigret en sy dooie, Maigret en die Lang Derm, and Maigret en die Spook, by Simenon. Johannesburg, Afrikaanse Pers, 4 vols., 1966–1969.
- Translator, Die mooiste sprokies van Moeder Gans, by Charles Perrault. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1967.
- Translator, Die eenspaaier, by Ester Wier. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1967.
- Translator, Die eendstert (Brighton Rock), by Graham Greene. Johannesburg, Afrikaanse Pers, 1967.
- Translator, Mary Poppins in Kersieboomlaan, by P.L. Travers. Cape Town, Malherbe, 1967.
- Translator, Die Leeu, die heks en die hangkas, by C.S. Lewis. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1967.
- Translator, with others, Die groot boek oor ons dieremaats. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1968.
- Translator, with others, Koning Arthur en sy ridders van die Ronde Tafel. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1968.

- Translator, Die Kinders van Groenkop, by Lucy Boston. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1968.
- Translator, Alice deur die spieël, by Lewis Carroll. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1968.
- Translator, Die Botsende rotse, Die Bul in die doolhoof, Die Horing van ivoor, and Die Kop van de gorgoon, by Ian Serraillier. Cape Town, HAUM, 4 vols., 1968.
- Translator, Bontnek, by Dhan Gopal Mukerji. Cape Town, HAUM, 1968.
- Translator, Die Draai van die skroef (The Turn of the Screw), by Henry James. Johannesburg, Afrikaanse Pers, 1968.
- Translator, Die Gelukkige prins en ander sprokies, by Oscar Wilde. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1969.
- Translator (into Afrikaans), Richard III, by Shakespeare. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1969.
- Translator, Die Gestewelde kat, by Charles Perrault. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1969.
- Translator, Die groot golf, by Pearl S. Buck. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau. 1969.
- Translator, Die Nagtegaal, by H.C. Andersen. Cape Town, HAUM, 1969.
- Translator, Die Terroriste, by Camus. Johannesburg, Dramatiese Artistieke en Letterkundige Organisasie, 1970.
- Translator, Eskoriaal, by Michel De Ghelderode. Johannesburg, Dramatiese Artistieke en Letterkundige Organisasie, 1971.
- Translator, Ballerina, by Nada Ćurčija-Prodanović. Cape Town, Malherbe, 1972.
- Translator, Die Seemeeu (The Seagull), by Chekhov. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1972.
- Translator, Die Bobaas van die Boendoe (The Playboy of the Western World), by Synge. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1973.
- Translator, Jonathan Livingston Seemeeu, by Richard Bach. Cape Town, Malherbe, 1973.
- Translator, Hedda Gabler, by Ibsen. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1974.
- Translator, Die Wind in die wilgers, by Kenneth Grahame. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1974.
- Translator, Die Tragedie van Romeo en Juliet, by Shakespeare. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1975.
- Translator, Die Tierbrigade, and Nuwe avontuur van die Tierbrigade, by Claude Desailly. Cape Town, Tafelberg, 2 vols., 1978–1979.
- Translator, Die Nagtegaal en die roos, by Oscar Wilde. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1980.
- Translator, Rot op reis, by Kenneth Grahame. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1981.
- Translator, Adam van die pad, by Elizabeth Janet Gray. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1981.
- Translator, Klein Duimpie, by Charles Perrault. Cape Town, Human & Rousseau, 1983.
- 27 April: One Year Later/Een jaar later (editor). Pretoria, South Africa, Queillerie, 1995.
- Destabilising Shakespeare. Grahamstown, South Africa, Shakespeare Society of Southern Africa, 1996.
- The Novel: Language and Narrative from Cervantes to Calvino. New York, New York University Press, 1998.
- Reinventing a Continent: Writing and Politics in South Africa. Cambridge, Massachusetts, Zoland Books, 1998.

Manuscript Collections: University of the Orange Free State, Bloemfontein; National English Literary Museum, Grahamstown.

Critical Studies: Donker Weerlig: Literêre opstelle oor die werk van André P. Brink edited by Jan Senekal, Cape Town, Jutalit, 1988; "The Lives of Adamastor" by Anthony J. Hassall, in International Literature in English edited by Pobert L. Ross, London and Chicago, St. James Press, 1991; Colonization, Violence, and Narration in White South African Writing: André Brink, Breyten, Breytenbach, and J.M. Coetzee by Rosemary Jane Jolly, Athens, Ohio University Press, 1996.

André Brink comments:

(1996) My early work revealed the influence of existentialism (notably of Camus) and was largely a matter of technical exploration. Ever since a year-long stay in Paris in 1968 a deep awareness of the responsibility of the novelist towards his society has shaped my work: not in the sense of "using" the novel for propaganda purposes, which degrades literature, but as a profound evaluation of social and interpersonal relationships as they affect the individual: the individual doomed to solitude and to more or less futile attempts to break out of this spiritual "apartheid" by trying to touch others—which means that the sexual experience is of primary importance to my characters.

With the dismantling of apartheid there is a new freedom to broaden the scope of my writing and to explore the possibilities of an African magic realism.

* * *

André Brink is an Afrikaner dissident who chose to remain inside the South African apartheid society which he regarded as morally insupportable. His powerful political and historical novels have been translated into 20 languages, while in South Africa he is regarded with a somewhat sceptical eye by writers and academics alike.

Brink is a prodigious, multi-talented literary figure. In addition to plays, travel writing, and critical work, he has written 16 novels and translated a great many works into Afrikaans. Formerly a professor of Afrikaans literature at Rhodes University, he now occupies a chair in English literature at the University of Cape Town. Despite three nominations for the Nobel Prize for literature, Brink is disliked by many Afrikaans writers and critics in South Africa, not so much (or not only) because of his outright moral opposition to apartheid, but for what is regarded as sentimentality and sensationalism in his writing. There is no doubt that Brink's writing is extremely uneven. His novels are almost always flawed in some respect, and they are often overwritten. Also, Brink has a singular penchant for placing gauche and inane statements in the mouths of his characters, while his rendition of sexual experience is often cliché-ridden and tasteless. Yet he has written some of the most powerful stories to emerge in recent South African writing, and he commands impressive narrative skills.

As an emerging Afrikaans novelist in the late 1950s and early 1960s, Brink almost singlehandedly modernised Afrikaans novelwriting. Arguably the most eclectic South African writer at the time, he knocked the conservative Afrikaans literary tradition out of complacency with themes and techniques drawn from writers like Camus, Beckett, Sartre, Nabokov, Henry Miller, Faulkner, Greene, and Durrell. In 1974, the Afrikaner establishment was hit by the sensational news that Brink's Kennis van die aand, later translated into English as Looking on Darkness, had been banned. The banning created a major division between the State and many of the country's Afrikaans writers, and introduced a new era of increasingly vocal dissidence from within the establishment. After a Supreme Court hearing and a further two appeals, the novel was finally unbanned in 1982, but given an age restriction which is impossible to enforce.

For Brink, expulsion from the laager was an important juncture. Capitalising on sudden international fame as South Africa's first Afrikaans writer to be banned under the country's comprehensive 1963 censorship legislation—usually reserved for girlie calendars, Communist publications, and morally and politically perverse writing in English—Brink translated Kennis van die aand into English and became, thenceforth, an international novelist writing in English. He has since produced nine weighty novels, roughly one every two years.

By his own admission Brink remains, in essence, an Afrikaner, but his recent novels are not "translated." Brink maintains that he produces the novels in both languages more or less simultaneously, starting out in Afrikaans, but completing the first "final" draft in English. However, Brink is far more idiomatic and comfortable in Afrikaans, and his English versions sometimes suffer from a certain rigidity of style.

Looking on Darkness is a compelling but uneven novel. As Nadine Gordimer has observed, it suffers from the "defiant exultation and relief" of Brink's first major cry of rebellion. The novel veers recklessly from profound historical reconstruction and metaphoric statement to the slushiest of sexual and emotional scenes. This book tells the story of Joseph Malan, a coloured man and a descendant of slaves who makes good as an actor after winning a grant to study at RADA in London, and who then comes home to launch a full-on cultural assault against apartheid. A passionate love affair with a white (British) woman develops, and Joseph is caught between the impossibility of love across the colour line, and the sinister manoeuvres of the Security Police against his theatre group. In a contrived and somewhat unconvincing denouement, Joseph murders his lover, whereupon the Security Police half kill him in unspeakably brutal fashion. He is sentenced to death, and the narrative is written from the death cell on sheets of paper which (we are asked to believe) Joseph daily flushes down the toilet, so determined is he to escape the scrutiny of his gaolers.

Looking on Darkness sets the pattern for Brink's later novels in several important respects. There is an uncompromising engagement with issues of race and politics, an insistence on exposing the sinister, vicious, and hypocritical elements at the heart of the apartheid system, an ability to rediscover the present in terms of a rich and violent frontier history, and a persistent fictional exploration of sexual love as a framework for a higher form of enquiry into the state of modern existence, subject to the peculiar restraints of apartheid society.

In An Instant in the Wind, Brink's first "English" novel following Looking on Darkness, a runaway slave escorts an eighteenth-century Cape lady back to civilisation after her husband and their party come to grief in an expedition into the interior. The story is a rich investigation into pertinent South African themes, and has a strong romantic appeal, but the love story between the erstwhile slave and the fallen lady constantly verges on a kind of sentiment more appropriate to popular romance fiction.

However, Brink's best talents come to the fore powerfully in his next—arguably his best—novel, Rumours of Rain. Like its successor,

A Dry White Season, the novel examines the moral options of a contemporary Afrikaner who is rooted to a potent nationalistic history, but who is vulnerable to the short-comings and hypocrisy of Afrikaner nationalism. Rumours of Rain achieves remarkable depth and complexity, and contains some of Brink's best characterisation.

The narrative inventiveness of Rumours of Rain and A Dry White Season is taken further in Brink's other tour de force, A Chain of Voices. This is a major novel which fictionalises a slave revolt in the early 19th century in the Cape. Brink gives each of his several characters a narrating voice, and out of the overlapping narratives a story of great force and interlocking complexity emerges. Brink's exceptional ability to re-animate the past—especially that of slavery in South Africa—enables him to establish the recurrent motifs of a frontier history in which South Africa remains confined.

True to form, Brink followed up this success with a work which is thoroughly mediocre. The Wall of the Plague is a particularly clumsy attempt at metaphorically associating the Black Death plague of medieval Europe with modern apartheid. The novel degenerates into a lengthy implied debate between three South African expatriates about the merits of exile as opposed to active engagement in the country itself, expressed in terms of black versus white sexual potency (there is a coloured girl in the middle) with a great deal of melodrama and sheer inanity thrown in.

However, Brink's 1988 novel, States of Emergency, shows outstanding novelistic deftness. The "story" consists of "notes" towards a love story set in violence-torn South Africa during the State of Emergency in the 1980s. The story skillfully interweaves public and political emergency with the private emergency of conducting an illicit love affair in the midst of ceaseless violence and upheaval. Despite its brilliance, the novel uneasily mixes metafictional selfconsciousness with a series of unexamined illusions—principally the illusion that the novel one reads is not a novel at all but incomplete notes for a novel. In a project where every fictional device is brought to the surface for debate, it seems a massive sleight-of-hand-and contrary to the deconstructive spirit in which the writing takes place—not to examine this, the biggest fictional strategy of all. States of Emergency is further complicated by the juxtaposition of Brink's actual divorce and his liaison with a young woman, and the metafictional "fabrication" of a similar story in the book: a love affair between a professor and a young colleague. As part of a divorce settlement, the novel was embargoed for distribution in South Africa after its publication.

In Imaginings of Sand, Brink tackled a particularly challenging problem for a male writer: portraying the world from a female point of view, in this case through two sisters, Anna and Kristien. Like their creator, they are Afrikaners, and underlying the narrative is a sense that in the "new," post-Apartheid South Africa, the only prevailing ethnic antipathy is toward the descendants of the old Dutch settlers. Devil's Valley offers an intriguing spin on the idea of those settlers by depicting a "lost colony" of sorts, an anti-Shangri-La, of unreconstructed Boers living in a mountain redoubt. They are like the Japanese soldier who struggled on in the jungles of the Philippines for three decades after World War II, only to be "captured" in 1975. Brink's Boers, seen through the eyes of reporter Flip Lochner, show little sign of surrendering to the outside world; yet elements of that world are nonetheless encroaching on their alternate version of reality.

BRODBER, Erna (May)

Nationality: Jamaican. Born: Woodside, St. Mary, Jamaica, 21 April 1940. Education: University College of the West Indies, London, 1960-63, B.A. (honours) in history 1963; University of Washington, Seattle, (Ford Foundation fellowship), 1967; University College of the West Indies, Kingston, M.Sc. in sociology 1968, Ph.D. in history 1985; University of Sussex, (Commonwealth fellowship), 1979. Family: One son. Career: Lecturer in sociology, University of the West Indies for seven years, research fellow and staff member, Institute of Social and Economic Research, University of the West Indies, 1972-83; associate professor, Randolph-Macon College (Du-Pont scholar). Visiting scholar, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, 1973; visiting fellow, University of Sussex, 1981; visiting professor, Gettysburg College, Pennsylvania, Clark-Atlanta University, Georgia, and University of California, Santa Cruz. Awards: University of the West Indies postgraduate award, 1964; National Festival award, Jamaica Festival Commission, 1975; Commomwealth Writers Prize for Canada and the Americas, 1989; Fulbright fellowship, 1990. Address: Woodside, Pear Tree Grove, P.O. St. Mary/St. Catherine, Jamaica, West Indies.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Jane and Louisa Will Soon Come Home. London, New Beacon, 1980. Myal. London, New Beacon, 1988.

Louisiana. London, New Beacon, 1994; Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

Plays

Jane and Louisa Will Soon Come Home, adaptation of her own novel (produced, 1990).

Other

Abandonment of Children in Jamaica. Mona, Jamaica, Institute of Social and Economic Research, University of the West Indies, 1974.

Yards in the City of Kingston. Mona, Jamaica, Institute of Social and Economic Research, University of the West Indies, 1975.

Perceptions of Caribbean Women: Towards a Documentation of Stereotypes. Mona, Jamaica, Institute of Social and Economic Research, University of the West Indies, 1982.

Rural-Urban Migration and the Jamaican Child. Santiago, Chile, UNESCO, Regional Office for Education in Latin America and the Caribbean, 1986.

Manuscript Collections: University of the West Indies, Kingston.

Critical Studies: Healing Narratives: Women Writers Curing Cultural Disease by Gay Wilent, New Brunswick, New Jersey, Rutgers University Press, 2000.

Theatrical Activities: Actor: Radio—A Time to Remember, for six years. Play—Role in Eight O'Clock Jamaica Time.

Erna Brobder comments:

My work, fiction and non-fiction, is devoted to helping Africans of the diaspora to understand themselves and hopefully to consequently undertake with more clarity the job of social (re)construction which we have to do. To better communicate with this target group, I use folk songs, etc., which are well known within the culture to make my points and to inform a group often far from archival data. I inject information which I think this group needs to have, and which I arrive at from my investigations, into my novels.

* * *

Trained as a sociologist, with a Ph.D. and several significant publications on Jamaican society, Erna Brodber has produced fiction that is anything but sociological regurgitation of mundane facts. Instead, in her powerful novels-including Jane and Louisa Will Soon Come Home, Myal, and Louisiana-Brodber weaves mythic and fantastical elements throughout, establishing non-rational events and happenings as just as crucially implicated in the psychology of her characters as their class, gender, education, or other more conventional factors. The central metaphor of Jane and Louisa Will Soon Come Home (1980) is the amorphous kumbla, a magical spell that can both protect and restrict. In Myal (1988), a community invokes myalism, the earliest documented Jamaican religion with African roots, to counteract the psychological damage inflicted on a young woman by the circumstances of her life. Finally, the premise of Louisiana (1994) is that a voice from the grave dictates into a recording device as a means of communicating with a young anthropologist.

This emphasis on non-Western forms and ways of understanding functions as a challenge to colonial practices and ways of ordering the world, while also valuing traditions that colonialism attempted to eradicate. Furthermore, these traditions are understood in Brodber's fiction to possess transformative potential to heal the psychic damage inflicted by slavery and colonialism, which both enforce erasures of subjectivity and specificity on their victims. In Brodber's novels her young female protagonists invariably must struggle with the variety of erasures and abuses enacted upon their bodies as colonized, racially "othered" females. Struggling to liberate themselves from colonial scripts and create new ways of self-(re)presentation, these women rely on their communities to assist them in recovering a past that has been alternately stolen, obscured, or misrepresented. Brodber's representation of historical recuperation as necessary for her characters' healing is in keeping with the project of de-colonization via the deconstructing of the historical methodologies and assumptions utilized in defining the colonial subject.

Brodber's first novel, Jane and Louisa Will Soon Come Home, is a coming-of-age story. A non-linear bildungsroman, the narrative shifts back and forth in both Nellie's personal history and that of her family, suggesting that both are crucial in her formation. Originally written as a case history for sociology students, Brodber's novel fails as such for its lack of simple didactic clarity—which is, of course, exactly why it is such a compelling novel. Nellie moves from an understand of herself as an outward construction, perceived, judged, defined by others, to an understanding of herself as an individual and a member of a community. Her previous conduct has been defined by this always-present external eye, resulting in her alienation from her body, her identity, and her people. Brodber's linguistic playfulness throughout the novel heightens this tension of alienation and acceptance, as cool, grammatically impeccable sentences that dislocate the subject must compete with the powers of vernacular speech to convey what is intimate and personal. As a linguistically shifting, heavily signifying, anti-linear work, the novel is a challenge to those accustomed to standard Western narratives, and as such provides a challenge to not only the reading practices of Western culture, but the discursive practices that inform them. Ordering this text, and the origin of the title, is a Jamaican children's song, the type often prematurely dismissed by uninformed listeners as the nonsensical production of those too young to understand meaning. Yet as Brodber demonstrates, that which is enacted upon the child is crucial to the formation of the adult, and children can therefore not be assumed to be uncritical repositories. Jane and Louisa Will Soon Come Home is a study of the ramifications of childhood colonial indoctrination and concomitant forms of resistance.

This concern with children as subjects of, and subjected to, colonial discourses is also evident in Myal. The novel opens at the beginning of the twentieth century, with a community gathering to heal the mysterious illness of a young woman who has returned to Jamaica after an unsuccessful marriage abroad. The Afro-Jamaican myal, which asserts that good has the power to conquer all, is invoked to heal Ella, who, like Nellie, has been alienated from herself by colonial practices. Ella, who is light skinned enough to pass for white, has suffered a complete breakdown after her white American husband has mounted a black face minstrel show based on the stories of her village and childhood that she has shared with him. This theft, or "cultural appropriation," is just one of a series Ella has encountered in her life, and it parallels the ongoing theft of the labor and culture of colonized peoples for imperial gain and pleasure. In addition to this ongoing exploitation—particularly relevant in terms of U.S.-Jamaican relationships in the early pat of the century—is the attempt to cultivate an audience that is both worshipful of and submissive to British culture. In a series of flashbacks Brodber constructs a historical context for Ella's breakdown, from the sexual exploitation of her mother by an Irish police officer and the colorism present in her village, to her education and informal adoption by a local minister and his white English wife, for whom Ella becomes an anthropological subject. Ella is rewarded with her informal adoption because she has so successfully recited Kipling, and therefore distinguished herself. Yet an older Ella, recovering with the ongoing assistance of her community, becomes a teacher herself and begins to critique the local education system. Forced to teach a story in which the message of submission and resignation to higher authorities is implicit, Ella begins to develop alternative reading strategies, and to teach her students the necessity of always questioning the information with which they are presented, interrogating it for subversive possibilities. In rich, vivid language populated with vital characters, Brodber presents an anti-colonial road map for her own literary mission.

Brodber's third novel, Louisiana, continues her investigation of themes of colonial resistance, indigenous ways of knowing, female development, communal forces, and deconstructing colonial imperatives. Returning to the early twentieth-century United States, the novel concerns an anthropologist—again named Ella—of Jamaican extraction. Employed by the Works Progress Administration to record the narratives of elderly blacks, Ella connects with Anna, known as "Mammy." The novel chronicles Ella's unraveling of Mammy's story over two decades, in part through the ghostly communications left by the deceased Mammy on Ella's tape recorder device, in part through research, and eventually through her own ability to hear the voices in her head. What Ella learns is that Mammy's tale is not hers alone: "It was a tale of cooperative action; it was a community tale." The novel also assumes this communal form—the opening is dizzying in its multitude of voices, a transcription of a spirit conversation left behind on the recorder. Serving to disorient the reader and render them sympathetic to Ella's initial confusion, the opening also signals several of Brodber's thematic preoccupations, particularly the necessity of new reading practices, and attuned readers. Even as Ella's life becomes inextricable from Mammy's tale, Ella also re-evaluates her own training as a reader and thinker in addition to how her training as an anthropologist is culturally laden. A novel about preservation and retrieval, Louisiana also affirms the importance of transcending the presumptuous divide of investigator/subject, and articulates the desirability of human connection over the objective distance privileged by Western cultures.

-Jennifer Harris

BROOKE-ROSE, Christine

Nationality: British. Born: Geneva, Switzerland. Education: Somerville College, Oxford, 1946–49, B.A. in English, M.A. 1953; University College, London, 1950–54, B.A. in French, Ph.D. 1954. Family: Married Jerzy Peterkiewicz, q.v., in 1948 (divorced 1975). Career: Freelance literary journalist, London, 1956–68; Maître de Conférences, 1969–75, and professeur, 1975–88, University of Paris VIII, Vincennes. Awards: Society of Authors traveling prize, 1965; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1967; Arts Council translation prize, 1969. Litt.D.: University of East Anglia, Norwich, 1988. Address: c/o Cambridge University Press, P.O. Box 110, Cambridge CB2 3RL, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Languages of Love. London, Secker and Warburg, 1957.

The Sycamore Tree. London, Secker and Warburg, 1958; New York, Norton, 1959.

The Dear Deceit. London, Secker and Warburg, 1960; New York, Doubleday, 1961.

The Middlemen: A Satire. London, Secker and Warburg, 1961.

Out. London, Joseph, 1964.

Such. London, Joseph, 1966.

Between. London, Joseph, 1968.

Thru. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1975.

Amalgamemnon. Manchester, Carcanet, 1984; Normal, Illinois, Dalkey Archive, 1994.

Xorandor. Manchester, Carcanet, 1986; New York, Avon, 1988.

Verbivore. Manchester, Carcanet, 1990.

Textermination. Manchester, Carcanet, and New York, New Directions, 1991.

Remake. Manchester, Carcanet, 1996.

Next. Manchester, Carcanet, 1998.

Subscript. Manchester, Carcanet, 1999.

Short Stories

Go When You See the Green Man Walking. London, Joseph, 1970.

Poetry

Gold. Aldington, Kent, Hand and Flower Press, 1955.

Other

A Grammar of Metaphor. London, Secker and Warburg, 1958.

A ZBC of Ezra Pound. London, Faber, 1971; Berkeley, University of California Press, 1976.

A Structural Analysis of Pound's Usura Canto: Jakobson's Method Extended and Applied to Free Verse. The Hague, Mouton, 1976.

A Rhetoric of the Unreal: Studies in Narrative and Structure, Especially of the Fantastic. Cambridge and New York, Cambridge University Press, 1981.

Stories, Theories and Things. Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1991.

With Umberto Eco, Richard Rorty, and Jonathan Culler, Interpretation and Overinterpretation, edited by Stefan Collini. New York, Cambridge University Press, 1992.

Translator, Children of Chaos, by Juan Goytisolo. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1958.

Translator, Fertility and Survival: Population Problems from Malthus to Mao Tse Tung, by Alfred Sauvy. New York, Criterion, 1960; London, Chatto and Windus, 1961.

Translator, In the Labyrinth, by Alain Robbe-Grillet. London, Calder and Boyars, 1968.

*

Critical Studies: "Christine Brooke-Rose" by Sarah Birch, in Contemporary Fiction (Oxford), 1994; Christine Brooke-Rose issue of Review of Contemporary Fiction (Elmwood Park, Illinois),1994; Christine Brooke-Rose and Contemporary Fiction by Sarah Birch, New York, Oxford University Press, 1994; Utterly Other Discourse: The Texts of Christine Brooke-Rose, edited by Ellen J. Friedman and Richard Martin, Normal, Illinois, Dalkey Archive Press, 1995.

Christine Brooke-Rose comments:

(1996) From Out onwards, experiments with language and forms of fiction.

* * *

If one looks at the details of Christine Brooke-Rose's life, one is struck by the many displacements (both physical and linguistic) she has undergone. This feeling is magnified when one reads the novels she produced from 1964 on, where her lack of a strong national identity, coupled with her bilingualism, is reflected in the novels' unspecified settings. Because of the importance this borderline position has had in her career, any attempt to place her in a cultural/geographical tradition has failed. Paradoxically, whereas in Britain she is seen as responsible for introducing the French nouveau roman to this country, in France she is known principally as a teacher of British and American narrative, which she taught there from 1968 to 1988, before retiring to Provence in order to concentrate on novel-writing. We cannot deny the influence nouveaux romanciers such as Robbe-Grillet initially had on her work, but we also mustn't ignore the distance she soon put between herself and them, the fact that all her novels are written in English, that they share features common to those produced by various British and American authors such as Ann Quin, B. S. Johnson, and Thomas Pynchon, and that she was equally influenced by Ezra Pound, Samuel Beckett, and Mikhail Bakhtin among others.

Although she has often been labeled a "difficult writer," the difficulties her novels pose have never been of a lexical or syntactical nature, but rather derive from the difficulty readers experience when trying to identify the various learned references in her texts. However, recognition of the source of these references is often irrelevant to an understanding of what the author is striving for, namely to shatter her readers' expectations and give these references fresh meanings, the discovery of which can be attained by readers only if they concentrate on how these elements work in the texts.

To this end, in her experimental novels Brooke-Rose replaces the narrator of Realist fiction with an impoverished narrator whose physical and psychological realities are never described, a perceiving consciousness who is "hit" by external phenomena and who simply registers what is happening around him/her. She creates worlds that cannot be placed in space or time; she produces texts that, by presenting different versions of the same events, prevent the reader from deciding which is the actual reality the novel depicts; she recognizes the poetic possibilities of specialized jargon and juxtaposes it to other discourses, in particular that of fiction.

Her Realist novels of the 1950s were essentially light and witty social satires, and although they already contained in embryonic form the thematics she would develop later—namely her concern with language (in particular the idea that there exist several, different languages interacting in the same person, and that language is all we have to apprehend reality)—it is only with Out, her first experimental novel, that she succeeded in adequately integrating them in her narrative. Here, she exploits for the first time the kind of discursive metaphor that would become fundamental in her work, and by positing a discursive system as her frame, she uses different discourses within that system as metaphors, making them interact with one another.

For instance, in Out—in which Brooke-Rose investigates what it means to be sick and to be made an outsider because of sickness—chemistry becomes a metaphor for illness and racial difference. Following a nuclear holocaust, referred to as the ''displacement,'' the previously dominant ''Colourless'' races suffer from a malady caused by the ensuing radiation. Since the "'Coloured'' are unaffected, they become the hegemonic race, and by invoking the discourse of chemistry as an arbitrary justification for racial discrimination, they turn it into the coercive language through which they impose a racial identity on the individual.

In Such—which describes the near-death experience and subsequent recovery of a psychiatrist working for the astrophysics department of an unspecified university—the language of astrophysics is used as a metaphor for human relations. Hence, the "laws of communication" investigated by the astrophysicists (who study the way in which light and radio waves bounce off astral bodies) are treated poetically by Brooke-Rose, and are applied to the signals between human beings; the theory of an expanding universe metaphorically indicates our society, in which everybody is becoming distanced from one another, and the theory of the Big Bang is used to construct a "cosmic theory of identity" in which the formation of the individual is equated with the event that began our universe.

In Between, which focuses on the idea of the loss of identity through language (also suggested by the total absence of the verb 'to be'), Brooke-Rose replaces the technical jargons of the previous novels with the languages of the specialized fields represented at the conferences attended by the narrator (a simultaneous translator), and the different national languages spoken in the countries she visits, thereby exploiting not only the metaphorical potential of different discourses, but also that of translation. Both aspects therefore function as agents of transition between different places, times, and contexts, and thanks to the novel's unique syntax, the reader can travel, within the same sentence, from one space/time to another.

Thru, which she wrote after moving to France, is an attempt to combine the disciplines of the critic and the writer, and pursues the discussion of gender issues she began in Between. The novel—in which Brooke-Rose urges the reader not to take the various theories the text plays with too seriously, since they are, after all, only words on a page—deals with the history of narratology, and is a maze of theories, linguistic games, typographical devices, verbal icons, and ambiguous settings. The book's myriad references are not always immediately recognizable, and all these "textual blocks," combined with an essential ambiguity about the novel's world, make it impossible for the reader of this very demanding "novel about the theory of the novel" even to identify the narrators with any certainty.

Having realized that with Thru she had gone too far, Brooke-Rose decided to strive for more readability, and after a gap of nine years published Amalgamemnon, a novel focused on the opposition between the past and the future and on the notion of redundancy. The novel is characterized by the parodic tone she adopts while treating various preconceived notions derived from Western history (in particular the phallocratic approach of Herodotus in his Histories), by the singular rhythm created by the tenses used (predominantly future and conditional), and by the mythological and astronomical imagery the novel evokes. The narrator, a female professor of literature and history who fears redundancy, is clearly imagining all that is described, and the whole novel consists of a long interior monologue in which she projects her fears and expectations for her future. As a result, the narrative material consists of her thoughts, memories, and fragments of her classical knowledge "amalgamated" with situations, fairy-tales, and dialogues with students, friends, and relatives that she creates in her mind (who often desert the roles she assigns to them and actually begin to interact with her in her world), along with extracts from the news, advertisements, quiz-games, and talk-shows from the radio that often function as a trigger for her imagination, displacing the discourse to another time, space, and narrative situation.

Xorandor—and its sequel Verbivore—are much more straightforward novels that return to a defined plot and—if we disregard the presence of talking stones supposedly from outer space who feed on radioactivity and who can interrupt all terrestrial wave-communication—to fairly conventional characters. Xorandor is narrated by two children, and is a self-reflexive science-fiction focusing on the ontological problem of what makes a human being a human being, the undecidability of truth, and various other philosophical, linguistic, and ecological matters. In Verbivore the reader learns that Xorandor was in fact the creation of Mira, the narrator of Amalgamemnon who returns in both novels, and it is narrated from different points of view, appearing as a collage of short narratives that draw on different genres (mainly the epistolary novel and the personal journal, although we also find a radio-play script, newspapers cuttings, and so on), each set piece characterized by the idiolects of the various people writing.

Mira is also present in Textermination, in which Brooke-Rose exposes the ambiguities implied by the notion of a literary Canon and discusses the relationship between high and popular culture. Mira attends the Convention of Prayer for Being, at which the fictional characters from narratives written by authors of all nationalities and all times converge to pray to the Reader, their Almighty God, who can decide the life or death of each character by reading or not reading particular novels. Because the various characters retain the identity and personal qualities they were given in their narrative of origin, the novel is not simply a collage of different texts, but is an inter-national and inter-temporal meeting point where the fictional worlds the different texts construct (with their separate beliefs, religions, and systems of knowledge) meet, often provoking amusing incidents caused by the clash of different cultures and eras.

Having concluded her second experimental tetralogy, Brooke-Rose then published Remake, where her own personal experiences and memories give birth to a novel in which the problematic distinction between history (personal and otherwise) and fiction is investigated.

After this autobiographical novel, in which (except for one chapter) all personal pronouns are intriguingly absent, in Next Brooke-Rose imposes yet another grammatical constraint on her prose (one that, as happened in Between and Amalgamemnon, is justified on a thematic level). Since the novel deals with the homeless (who do not own anything), she completely eliminates from her narrative the verb "to have." Twenty-six characters (one for each letter of the alphabet—a recurrent theme in this novel) appear in the text; all are loosely connected by the murder of one of the ten homeless characters whose initials, when taken together, form QWERTYUIOP, the first line of a typewriter. The murder remains unsolved, and by presenting no division into chapters or paragraphs, the novel—which denounces the responsibility that both the Government and the Media have for the creation of such a situation—emphasizes that the homeless are not only deprived of their homes, jobs, and social roles but of their identities as well, appearing alike to the outsider who hastily passes them by. Simultaneously, however, by transcribing phonetically the different levels of "Estuarian" language they speak, Brooke-Rose shows that they are, after all, different from one another, and by so doing not only does she render the changes of perspective that occur in the text very clearly, but she also enables her characters to oppose the attempted obliteration of their individuality enacted by their society.

Finally, in Subscript Broke-Rose exploits the discourse of paleontology and, beginning with a poetic description of a pre-biotic chemical reaction 4,500 million years ago, she deals with the history of evolution from unicellular organisms to the early human species, creating a "pre-historic" novel in which the genetic code almost becomes a character itself, steering various organisms through evolution. The novel is entirely told from these organisms' viewpoint: from a single cell, the story is passed from female organism to female organism, in ascending order of complexity, evolving into the creatures that will eventually become humanity. Throughout the novel the "pack" develops into a "tribe" of two-legged "buntunaminu" who slowly learn to create tools, make fire, cook food, rear animals, cover their nudity, and, above all, play the "mouth-noise game" that eventually evolves into different human languages, leading to the birth of story telling, medicine, simple mathematics, and the like. The tribes slowly develop the concept of a supreme being, thereby creating the rituals and paraphernalia of religion proper, and evolve into totemic clans. These communities consolidate the concept of politics and colonization, and in order to stipulate alliances among them, begin to use their females as tokens of exchange. Hence, although the novel is obviously focused on ontological issues, it also asks questions related to both gender (ironically likening the phallocratic clichés men still live by to those of "cave-men") and the notion of colonization, pointing, as Brooke-Rose had done in her previous novels, to an idiosyncrasy peculiar to human beings, namely that everyone has a latent disposition for oppression and coercion.

With her numerous novels, several major critical works, and a plethora of articles and essays (as well as poetry and a few extraordinary translations), Christine Brooke-Rose has earned her place among major British writers of the twentieth century, extending the scope of the novel and stretching the possibilities of language to its limit, offering an insightful representation of our society.

-Michela Canepari-Labib

BROOKNER, Anita

Nationality: British. Born: London, 16 July 1928. Education: James Allen's Girls' School; King's College, University of London; Courtauld Institute of Art, London, Ph.D. in art history. Career: Visiting lecturer, University of Reading, Berkshire, 1959–64; lecturer, 1964, and reader, 1977–88, Courtauld Institute of Art; Slade Professor, Cambridge University, 1967–68. Fellow, New Hall, Cambridge; fellow, King's College, 1990. Awards: Booker prize, 1984. C.B.E. (Commander, Order of the British Empire), 1990. Address: 68 Elm Park Gardens, London SW10 9PB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Start in Life. London, Cape, 1981; as The Debut, New York, Linden Press, 1981.

Providence. London, Cape, 1982; New York, Pantheon, 1984.
Look at Me. London, Cape, and New York, Pantheon, 1983.
Hotel du Lac. London, Cape, 1984; New York, Pantheon, 1985.
Family and Friends. London, Cape, and New York, Pantheon, 1985.
A Misalliance. London, Cape, 1986; as The Misalliance, New York, Pantheon, 1987.

A Friend from England. London, Cape, 1987; New York, Pantheon, 1988.

Latecomers. London, Cape, 1988; New York, Pantheon, 1989.
Lewis Percy. London, Cape, 1989; New York, Pantheon, 1990.
Brief Lives. London, Cape, 1990; New York, Random House, 1991.
A Closed Eye. London, Cape, 1991; New York, Random House, 1991.

Fraud. New York, Vintage Books, 1994.

Dolly. Thorndike, Maine, G.K. Hall, 1994.

A Private View. New York, Random House, 1994.

Incidents in the Rue Laugier. New York, Random House, 1996. Altered States. New York, Random House, 1996.

Visitors. London, Jonathan Cape, 1997.

Falling Slowly. New York, Random House, 1999.

Undue Influence. New York, Random House, 2000.

Other

Watteau. London, Hamlyn, 1968.

The Genius of the Future: Studies in French Art Criticism: Diderot, Stendahl, Baudelaire, Zola, the Brothers Goncourt, Huysmans. London, Phaidon Press, 1971; Ithaca, New York, Cornell University Press, 1988.

Greuze: The Rise and Fall of an Eighteenth-Century Phenomenon. London, Elek, and Greenwich, Connecticut, New York Graphic Society, 1972.

Jacques-Louis David: A Personal Interpretation (lecture). London, Oxford University Press, 1974.

Jacques-Louis David. London, Chatto and Windus, 1980; New York, Harper, 1981; revised edition, Chatto and Windus, 1986; New York, Thames and Hudson, 1987.

Soundings (essays). London, Harvill Press, 1998.

Romanticism and its Discontents. New York, Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2000.

Editor, The Stories of Edith Wharton. London, Simon and Schuster, 2 vols., 1988–89.

Translator, Utrillo. London, Oldbourne Press, 1960.

Translator, The Fauves. London, Oldbourne Press, 1962.

Translator, Gauguin. London, Oldbourne Press, 1963.

*

Critical Studies: Four British Women Novelists: Anita Brookner, Margaret Drabble, Iris Murdoch, Barbara Pym: An Annotated and Critical Secondary Bibliography by George Soule, Lanham, Maryland, Scarecrow Press, 1998.

* * *

Often compared to Jane Austen, Henry James, and Edith Wharton, sometimes simultaneously, Anita Brookner's brief, exquisitely wrought novels portray lonely, ordinary people, usually women, passively enduring somber ordinary lives in a bleak, gray London, skillfully delineated through reference to recognizable street names and shops. In her autobiographical first novel, A Start in Life, Brookner sets a characteristic theme and tone with another characteristic, references to literature and painting: "'About suffering they were never wrong, the Old Masters,' said Auden. But they were. Frequently. Death was usually heroic, old age serene and wise. And of course, the element of time, that was what was missing." In Brookner's novels, the present stretches on and on into an uncharted future, days need filling up, while the past only informs when it is too late. With little choice, Brookner's characters must bravely "soldier on."

Brookner's characters are immediately recognizable. As Brookner notes, she begins with an "idea of the main character and how the story ends. Then, I work toward that end." Her typical protagonists, female or male, allow cultural and familial attitudes and pressures to shape their lives, like Dr. Ruth Weiss in A Start in Life, whose life has been "ruined by literature." Brookner protagonists wear well-tailored clothes, live in well-furnished apartments, usually inherited from a parent dutifully nursed through a final illness, and vacation in France. Left to "ponder the careers of Anna Karenina and Emma Bovary" but "emulate" Little Dorrit, the women view life as offering limited choices, one being between marriage and spinsterhood. The unfulfilled young women of the early novels, crave the affection and love denied by their families, whose portraits are presented through the protagonists' memories and self-reflection. Yearning for the stuff of romantic novels, such as those written by Edith of the award-winning Hotel du Lac, the young women suffer in demeaning relationships, but although intelligent, lack the inner resources to take control of their lives. In sharp contrast, in Lewis Percy, the eponymous protagonist of Brookner's ninth novel and a student of 19th-century French fiction, escapes his dependency on his mother as well as a loveless marriage when he runs off to America with his best friend's eccentric sister.

The women in Hotel du Lac and A Friend from England also shed impossible relationships, from married men, but are not "rewarded" with happy endings. Edith analyzes the history of her predicament through letters never sent to her lover David; Rachel comes to understand that she will gamely "plough on" through middle age, her interior monologues never vocalized or shared.

Brookner's middle novels, A Misalliance and Brief Lives compound the meaninglessness of women's existence by exploring the present predicaments of older women through a retrospective on their past. This technique proves an excellent vehicle for Brookner's preoccupation with self-betrayal, the duplicity of others, and the betrayals of time. The defeats of time and the painful survival of destroyed illusions are portrayed in two novels best described as family chronicles: Family and Friends and Latecomers. The former brilliantly traces the contrasting stories of the members of the Dorn family by reading and projecting from a series of wedding photographs. Latecomers, a study of survivor-guilt, reviews the lives of the families of two Jewish friends—the melancholy Fibich and the epicurean Hartmann—through an emotional crisis in which Fibich comes to terms with his own history. These melancholy novels portray characters who barely survive, but with a modicum honor.

In both A Closed Eye and Fraud, however, Brookner suggests that people do not have to settle for a solitary, lonely life. In novels developed through similar structural techniques, dutiful daughters break the Brookner pattern. In A Closed Eye, although timid Harriet submits to an arranged marriage with well-to-do, divorced Freddie Lytton, she is partially fulfilled in motherhood, a new theme for Brookner, by the birth of her beautiful daughter Imogen, who, however, soon grows into an unspeakably selfish girl. Only when Harriet meets Jack, philanderer husband of Tessa, her best friend, does Harriet experience something of a sexual awakening, which, being a Brookner woman, she cannot act upon, despite their single shared kiss and her erotic dreams. Developed through retrospect, when the novel opens, Imogen is dead in an improbable car crash, Tessa is dead from cancer, and Harriet has dutifully accompanied Freddie to Swiss health spas. Liberated by his death, 53-year-old Harriet does not return home as would most defeated Brookner heroines. Instead she writes the letter which opens the novel and invites Lizzie, Tessa's daughter whom she partially raised, to her European villa to join her and her new male friend, thus opening the way to self understanding.

Brookner relies on the same circular technique in Fraud, which also develops the theme of mothers and daughters, but here from the daughter's point of view. Like a detective story, the novel opens with the report that 50-year-old Anna Durrant has gone missing; cleverly, the police inquiries spark the narrative. The reflections of Anna's few acquaintances introduce this obedient spinster daughter, who knows she lived in "a pleasant collaboration of unrealities," dominated by her mother. Thus, we are prepared to learn of Anna's self-rescue after her mother's death; planning her disappearance, she "refashions" herself rather than allowing others to and begins a career designing clothing for "women like myself." At novel's end, a chance encounter in Paris solves her mysterious disappearance and reveals a stronger Anna capable of inspiring another woman to resolutely follow an independent path and break from a married man.

Dolly, Brookner's thirteenth novel, brings the European to London in a vivacious aunt "singing and dancing" her way through life. Dolly collides with and, then, is eventually dependent upon, narrator Jane Manning, her young niece, whose keen observations delineate her parents' close, yet delicate, marriage and deaths, and, more importantly, reveal widowed Dolly's fraudulent gaiety. The power shifts when Jane reluctantly inherits the family money, but so does Jane's now benevolent understanding of her aunt's life. Young Jane finds contentment and success as a children's author while she installs her defeated, aging aunt in a much desired flat.

Despite these less melancholy endings, these new Brookner women still take long walks on melancholy Sunday evenings, drink bottomless cups of tea, and manage their days with little tricks of empty activity. Maud Gonthier in Incidents in the Rue Langier reads, sighs, and retires early; like Dolly, she too is a displaced French woman. Her daughter creates an unreliable, perhaps wishful, biography for her mother after she discovers a mysterious coded diary and silk kimono in Maud's belongings. The daughter's narrative spins a passionate romance-novel affair with the dashing, wealthy David Tyler in Paris. Almost in penance, Maud accepts marriage with Tyler's acquaintance, the staid, British used bookseller, Edward; thus an explanation for the marriage of the narrator's parents. Maud's male counterpart is Alan Sherwood, narrator of Altered States who also yearns for a former lover in Paris, sensual, heartless Sarah, while married to sexless Angela. Both novels examine the consequences of inopportune marriages from male and female points of view. Brookner also explores male-female relationships exacerbated this time by generational and cultural differences in her next paired novels which present the usual finely crafted portraits of the effects of loneliness.

Youth and age collide when young strangers interrupt the patterned, solitary well-to-do lives of retired bachelor George Bland in A Private View and widowed, 70-year-old Dorothea May in Visitors. Aware of their age, both meticulously prepare themselves for the day in front of the mirror and by novel's end both are forced to a new understanding of their futures. Bland, aptly named, succumbs to Katy Gibb (named for the American secretarial school?), a twenty-something intruder who sweet-talks her way into the neighboring apartment and eventually cons Bland into donating a large sum to help her set up a business based on New Age stress workshops; Katy talks about "being in the moment" or feeling "a lot of negativity." Enthralled, George contemplates marriage seeing Katy as a chance to escape a life not lived; rejected and exhausted, after an ongoing interior monologue of self scrutiny, he settles for a shift in his years' long companionship with Louise. Over the telephone, he invites Louise on a vacation trip.

Coping with ill health and increasing anxiety attacks, Dorothea May's civilized world also shifts under self-scrutiny when she reluctantly responds to family duty by opening the room where her husband Henry died for Steven Best, who has accompanied her sisterin-law's granddaughter Ann, a homeopathic therapist, and David, a crusading evangelical sports teacher, to London for their sudden wedding. The novel becomes a comedy of contrasts-old, proper British versus young, brash American and family secrets keep tumbling out. Astonished at herself, Dorothea offers crucial assistance in dealing with the recalcitrant bride and succumbs to Steven's presence. She shops and busies herself with his comfort. Although Steven disappoints her with his thoughtlessness, she misses him when the trio leaves for Paris. Her revelation is that the unknown future must be "an enterprise in which help must be solicited and offered." Like George, she cautiously reaches out over the telephone to her overwrought sister-in-law.

Small items and techniques reappear in subsequent Brookner novels, each time usually more complete. In Hotel du Lac, Edith does not mail her letters; in A Closed Eye, Harriet's mailed letter leads to self-knowledge. A vague New Age business in A Private View is actually the bride Anna's occupation in Visitors. George Bland switches off the incomplete radio shipping forecast to take Louise's phone call, but Falling Slowly takes its title from the shipping bulletin's last words; Edith's romance novels also reappear or are inverted by Brookner's novels themselves. Brookner's eighteenth novel explores the now familiar marginalized lives of two sisters: Miriam, a translator of French, who spends half her day in the London library and the other half fretting over life's minutia and her evaporating love life; and Beatrice, an accompanist forced into retirement, who flutters about and reads romance novels. A typical Brookner figure, Miriam, once married for five years, slides into an affair with a married man for whom she yearns after he simply disappears. Unable to commit to the suitable Tom, Miriam retreats to care for her ailing sister Beatrice; at their deaths, Miriam, left alone in a self-inflicted, circumscribed emotionless life, tells her former husband when he accuses her of reading too much, "I'm better off alone ... there were no happy endings." Seeking early morning reassurance, she listens to the shipping forecast sipping a cup of tea knowing that the high moments of life she and Beatrice anticipated will never come.

Spinster sisters reappear in Undue Influence as Muriel and Harriet St. John, elderly owners of a secondhand bookshop inherited from their father. Dutifully devoted to his memory, they employ attractive, well-dressed, 29-year-old Claire Pitt to edit his numbingly dull writings. Claire, alone after caring for her mother, who, in turn, had tended Claire's ailing father, still spins elaborate fantasies and now fantasizes an unattainable marriage with handsome, shallow Martin Gibson, a bookstore patron. Her one friend, Wiggy, sits by the phone waiting for a phone call from her married lover. Although far more modern than the octogenarian St. John spinsters, Claire and Wiggy are destined to become them, for with this nineteenth novel, nothing has changed in Brookner territory. In an effort to occupy her time, Claire endlessly cleans her inherited apartment, takes long walks in London parks, reads, fantasizes, and has anonymous sexual encounters during vacations in France. Without any lasting relationships, Claire's future holds the same glum promise of a drab, controlled life. She will courageously slip into middle age as Brookner slowly closes yet another analysis of unfulfilled longing.

-Lyn Pykett, updated by Judith C. Kohl

BROWN, Rita Mae

Nationality: American. Born: Hanover, Pennsylvania, 28 November 1944. Education: University of Florida, Gainesville; New York University, B.A. 1968; New York School of Visual Arts, cinematography certificate 1968; Institute for Policy Studies, Washington, D.C., Ph.D. 1976. Career: Photo editor, Sterling Publishing Company, New York, 1969-70; lecturer in sociology, Federal City College, Washington, D.C., 1970-71. Since 1973 visiting member, faculty of feminist studies, Goddard College, Plainfield, Vermont. Founding member, Redstockings radical feminist group, New York, 1970s. Awards: Best Variety Show award (TV Writers Guild), 1982; New York Public Library Literary Lion award, 1986; Outstanding Alumni, American Association of Community Colleges, 1999; Outstanding Alumna, Broward Community College, 1999. Agent: Wendy Weil Agency, 232 Madison Avenue, New York, New York 10016–2901, U.S.A. Address: American Artists Inc., P.O. Box 4671, Charlottesville, Virginia 22905, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Rubyfruit Jungle. Plainfield, Vermont, Daughters, 1973; London, Corgi, 1978.

In Her Day. Plainfield, Vermont, Daughters, 1976.

Six of One. New York, Harper, 1978; London, W.H. Allen, 1979.

Southern Discomfort. New York, Harper, 1982; London, Severn House, 1983.

Sudden Death. New York, Bantam, 1983.

High Hearts. New York and London, Bantam, 1986.

Bingo. New York, Bantam, 1988.

Wish You Were Here, with Sneaky Pie Brown. New York, Bantam, 1990.

Rest in Pieces, with Sneaky Pie Brown. New York, Bantam, 1992. Venus Envy. New York, Bantam, 1993.

Dolley: A Novel of Dolley Madison in Love and War. New York, Bantam, 1994.

Murder at Monticello; or, Old Sins, with Sneaky Pie Brown. New York, Bantam, 1994.

Pay Dirt, or, Adventures at Ash Lawn, with Sneaky Pie Brown. New York, Bantam Books, 1995.

Riding Shotgun. New York, Bantam Books, 1996.

Murder, She Meowed, with Sneaky Pie Brown. New York, Bantam Books, 1996.

Murder on the Prowl, with Sneaky Pie Brown. New York, Bantam Books, 1998.

Cat on the Scent, with Sneaky Pie Brown. New York, Bantam Books, 1999.

Loose Lips. New York, Bantam Books, 1999.

Outfoxed. New York, Ballantine Books, 2000.

Pawing through the Past, with Sneaky Pie Brown. New York, Bantam Books, 2000.

Plays

Television and film scripts: I Love Liberty, with others, 1982; The Long Hot Summer, 1985; My Two Loves, 1986; The Alice Marble Story, 1986; Sweet Surrender, 1986; The Mists of Avalone, 1987; Table Dancing, 1987; The Girls of Summer, 1989; Selma, Lord, Selma, 1989; Rich Men, Single Women, 1989; The Thirty Nine Year Itch, 1989.

Poetry

The Hand That Cradles the Rock. New York, New York University Press, 1971.

Songs to a Handsome Woman. Baltimore, Diana Press, 1973. Poems. Freedom, California, Crossing Press, 1987.

Other

A Plain Brown Rapper (essays). Baltimore, Diana Press, 1976.Starting from Scratch: A Different Kind of Writers Manual. New York, Bantam, 1988.

Rita Will: Memoir of a Literary Rabble-Rouser. New York, Bantam Books, 1997.

*

Critical Study: Rita Mae Brown by Carol M. Ward, New York, Twayne, 1993; Ladies Laughing: Wit as Control in Contemporary American Women Writers by Barbara Levy, Amsterdam, Netherlands, Gordon and Breach, 1997.

* * *

For a writer whose novels appear to be exclusively comic southern fiction, Rita Mae Brown has, in fact, produced a varied body of work. At the most basic level, her novels celebrate a particular image of the southern United States of America; they are funny, sassy, full of geographically specific language—expletives in particular seem to be strictly of the South rather than the North—and populated with hosts of astonishingly colorful characters.

Brown's writing is so particular to its location that her novels Bingo and especially High Hearts have led to her being accused of falling into the trap of depicting the South as "wrong but romantic" and the North as "right but repulsive." This did not preclude her from being tipped seriously for the commission to write the sequel to Gone with the Wind; in fact, it was probably a main factor in the (ultimately unfounded) rumor that she would write it.

Considering the great success of her southern novels, it may be surprising to discover that her real claim to popular adulation is her parallel and entwined career as foremother of the modern lesbian novel. She is not an experimental writer in the style of Monique Wittig or Jeanette Winterson; she is not a stream of consciousness/coming out writer like Verena Stefan or early Michelle Roberts; but her lasting fame among lesbian readers rests primarily on her first novel Rubyfruit Jungle which charted hilariously the coming-out process of a young Southerner called Molly Bolt—a joke untranslatable outside of American carpentry circles—and her consequent discovery and assertion that a) it was cool to be queer, b) the only problem is other people's reactions, and c) the rest of the world had better just get used to it.

In these heady days of (fairly) free expression of sexuality, it is difficult to realize just what a bombshell Brown dropped onto a world in which the most famous lesbian novel was The Well of Loneliness and lesbians in other fiction almost always recanted, threw themselves into a purifying orgy of self-sacrifice or—more frequently—committed suicide in despair. It is not stretching the point to say that for the overwhelming majority of lesbians, Rubyfruit Jungle was the first book we ever read which said it was OK.

After such a success with a first novel, it was hardly surprising that her second In Her Day was to many a disappointment. It tries to deal with the still thorny issues of lesbian-feminism versus "political correctness," older and younger women, class, race and so on. All of this in a very slim volume. The book was published in one edition by a small US feminist press and disappeared without trace—except to obsessive collectors—until two years ago when it was republished. Interestingly, its long absence was the choice of the author who felt it was an inferior novel.

Brown's use of her own life for fiction is fascinating. While it is true that characters appear in Rubyfruit Jungle, Six of One and the latter's sequel Bingo who are clearly based on the same autobiographical raw material, the most obvious example is Sudden Death. With information clearly gathered during her highly public relationship with Martina Navratilova, Brown dissects the world of women's professional tennis with the satiric scalpel of an expert. A favorite game for some time after its publication was for the reader to try and identify the real-life models on which the characters were based.

Attentive readers, however, have found a shift in political values in Brown's novels; it appears to be towards the right whilst retaining an undying feminism. A seeming contradiction, but then the Women's Movement had always intended to be a broad church. This reading is suggested by some of the apparently pro-Confederate sentiments in High Hearts and less than liberal stances taken by her main characters in Bingo.

Her writer's manual Starting from Scratch is probably best explained by her own assertion that she was broke after her messy divorce from Martina and needed to write something quickly. It is most memorable for being probably the first writer's manual since the 19th century which suggests that a putative writer must do nothing until they have spent some years mastering both Latin and Ancient Greek.

Wish You Were Here, her 1990 novel, marks something of a progression. Her novels have always been jointly dedicated to her animals but this, a competent if not particularly spectacular thriller, claims to have been co-written by her cat. Brown has continued in this tradition and brought us a number of popular murder stories called "Mrs. Murphy Mysteries." Rest in Pieces, Murder at Monticello: Or Old Sins, Pay Dirt, Or Adventures at Ash Lawn, Murder, She Meowed, Cat on the Scent, Murder on the Prowl, and Pawing through the Past have been all co-written by Rita Mae Brown and her cat, Sneaky Pie Brown. The protagonists of the murder stories, a tiger cat (Mrs. Murphy), a Welsh Corgi (Tucker), and a thirty-something postmistress (Mary Minor "Harry" Haristeen), live together in the small town of Crozet, Virginia, and attempt to solve the murders happening around them. In Brown's mysteries, animals, which make their witty comments and observations in italics, are always one step ahead of their human counterparts. Thus, Brown demonstrates her undying love for animals and respect for their natural wisdom. In 1999, Brown's prolific cat "published" (with Brown's co-authorship) its own cookbook, Sneaky Pie's Cookbook for Mystery Lovers, which introduces recipes for cats, dogs, and humans.

As stated before, however, Brown's scope includes much more than mysteries. As a lesbian author, Brown is to be celebrated alongside a writer such as Armistead Maupin for proving that queer life also has its hilarious side when the straight world lets it out. After the amusing as well as provocative Rubyfruit Jungle, Brown returned to the issue of lesbianism in Venus Envy. She lets her heroine, who is supposedly dying of lung cancer, come out with her sexual orientation as well as reveal her attitudes and opinions about others. When the 35-year-old gallery owner Frazier finds out that her diagnosis is a result of a computer mistake, she has to face the reality and the consequences of her disclosures. Once again, in Venus Envy Brown demonstrates her superb feel for satire, comicality, and nuances of the English language.

Rita Mae Brown does not forget her southern characters, though, and in Loose Lips, she brings back the Hunsenmeier sisters, whom she had already introduced in Bingo and Six of One. With the middle-aged Juts and Wheezie, Brown returns in an amusing manner to the atmosphere of a small southern town, touching on complex issues of adoption, friendship, and faithfulness. Riding Shotgun discusses similar issues in a story of the recently widowed Cig Blackwood, who, while fox hunting, travels back in time to the year 1699. Meeting her ancestors, Cig learns about love, betrayal, and, most importantly, herself. Brown also goes back in time in—for her atypical—a historical novel, Dolley: A Novel of Dolley Madison in Love and War. In this novel, Brown recreates a crucial year (1814) in the life of the fourth American president's wife during the conflict between America and Britain.

In her novel Outfoxed, Brown brings together the majority of her favorite subjects. Even though writing a murder story, this time Rita Mae Brown does not bring forth Mrs. Murphy to solve the mystery. Yet, the small Virginian town is full of speaking animals (hounds, foxes, birds, and horses), which become successful detectives in the murder case of Fontaine Buruss. Brown's passion for foxhunting is evident in the story, as she describes the sport and its elaborate rituals with precision and sometimes even exhausting detail. Again, this novel depicts, with a bit of nostalgia, the southern mentality, charm, and gallantry. Brown focuses her attention on the southern tradition, ancestry, land, and firm human ties, creating a charismatic and respected matriarchal character, Sister Jane Arnold, M.F.H. (Master of Fox Hunting).

In all her novels, Rita Mae Brown skillfully connects the autobiographical and the fictional. With its many specific details, Brown's autobiography, Rita Will: Memoir of a Literary Rabble-Rouser, becomes an invaluable source of information for readers interested in Brown's life and work. Brown does not shy away from any subject, discussing her poverty-stricken childhood with her adoptive parents, her struggle for public acceptance as a lesbian, and her love affairs with Martina Navratilova, Fannie Flagg, and Judy Nelson. With her typical sense of humor, she uncovers in front of the readers her life experiences, drawing together all that she loves and respects: southerners, close relationships between humans and animals, and meaningful, fulfilling work.

-Linda Semple, updated by Iva Korinkova

BROWN, Rosellen

Nationality: American. Born: 1939. Career: Instructor in American and English literature, Tougaloo College, Mississippi, 1965–67; instructor in creative writing, Goddard College, Plainfield, Vermont, 1976, and University of Houston, Texas, 1982–85. Since 1989 instructor in creative writing, University of Houston. Visiting professor of creative writing, Boston University, 1977–78. Awards: National Endowmment for the Arts fellowship, 1973, 1982; Guggenheim fellowship, 1976; Great Lake College Association best first novel award, 1976, for The Autobiography of My Mother; Janet Kafka best novel award, 1984, for Civil Wars; Ms. Magazine Woman of the Year, 1984; American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters award, 1987, for literature; Ingram-Merrill grant, 1989–90. Address: 1401 Branard, Houston, Texas 77006, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Autobiography of My Mother. Garden City, New York, Doubleday, 1976.

Tender Mercies. New York, Knopf, 1978; London, Hutchison, 1979.Civil Wars: A Novel. New York, Knopf, and London, Joseph, 1984.Before and After. New York, Farrar Straus, 1992; London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1993.

Half a Heart. New York, Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 2000.

Short Stories

Street Games. Garden City, New York, Doubleday, 1974.

Plays

The Secret Garden, with Laurie MacGregor, adaptation of the novel by Frances Hodgson Burnett (produced, 1983).

Poetry

Some Deaths in the Delta, and Other Poems. Amherst, University of Massachusetts Press, 1970.

Cora Fry. New York, Norton, 1977.

Cora Fry's Pillow Book. New York, Farrar Straus, 1994.

Other

A Rosellen Brown Reader: Selected Poetry and Prose. Vermont, Middlebury College Press, 1992.

Editor, The Whole World Catalog. N.p., 1972.

Editor, Men Portray Women, Women Portray Men. N.p., 1978.

不

Critical Studies: Conversations with American Novelists: The Best Interviews from The Missouri Review and the American Audio Prose Library, edited by Kay Bonetti. Columbia, University of Missouri Press, 1997.

* * *

Rosellen Brown's characters—adults, teenagers, and children alike—are living on the edge, from the beginning to the end of her novels. These works start from the premise of lost innocence and move through the various permutations of damage that the condition wreaks upon the psyches of sensitive individuals. All of Brown's fictional marriages are in one stage or another of breakdown; most of her adolescents are experiencing extreme forms of alienation; all of her characters experience the cruel contingency of fate in the form of unhappy coincidence, accident, or death.

All of the novels use conditions of shock and horror to start off the narration. Tender Mercies begins with the boating accident of a young married couple. Through his macho bravado, the husband rams a motorboat, which he does not know how to steer, into his swimming wife, severing her spinal cord and rendering her a quadriplegic. The Autobiography of My Mother is narrated in part by a woman who, although she doesn't always take money for it, conducts her life somewhat like a prostitute. Meanwhile, her lawyer-mother encounters a series of clients whose conditions in poverty, jail, or the insane asylum are intended to horrify (though the mother herself is stoic as she submits to a forceful vaginal exam administered by black female convicts who want to demonstrate why they are angry). The civilrights activist parents in Civil Wars are appointed legal guardians of children who have been raised by estranged relatives—estranged because they support the Ku Klux Klan. The orphaned daughter attempts suicide more than once. In Before and After, a middle-class, do-good family discovers that their son has murdered his girlfriend in a fit of rage at her name-calling.

As if these events were not enough, the narrations go on to describe how such crises, disasters, and shocks inevitably erode marriages. At the end of two of the three novels that are narrated by married partners, the spouses experience a qualified resolution of their relationship. In the third, the wife, after tolerating situations that would try the patience of Job, finally decides that she is through with her marriage. Working at the extremes of human experience, Brown analyzes the profound question of how much sadness the human mind is capable of absorbing without snapping. The human reader, however, may not be capable of absorbing all of Brown's plots, characters, and tone of sadness without losing interest. Although the plots are unique and different, the angst-ridden tone remains the same from one book to the next. Furthermore, the climaxes often arrive after too much delay. We may find ourselves reading on from morbid curiosity, simply to find out what happens: Did Jacob really kill his girlfriend, will Helen actually commit the suicide she obsesses about in her diary, will Renata's depression lead to insanity?

Brown's favored mode of narration contributes to this feeling of monotony: She switches back and forth between the interior monologues of her two main characters, usually spouses, whose private hatreds and sense of isolation become plots of their own, disconnected from the other half. These two subplots carry the narration without the necessary connection that makes for a coherent novel. Lacking are normal dramatic scenes that link characters: Caught between scenes of high-pitched crisis and interior monologues of despair, the scenes of quotidian family intercourse that do occur are laden with a sense of the ailing marriage and impending doom. Brown illustrates how such sadness permeates spouses' relations with their children, parents, and friends—as well as with each other.

Though all the novels rely heavily on plot, suspense, and character, they go lightly on place description and a kind of omniscience that one becomes accustomed to in the postmodern novel: an omniscience that contains a forgiving irony and mutes the pain of contemporary married life. Brown creates beautiful moments in characters' heads, but rarely are they communicated to other characters, especially spouses. Perhaps this is her own version of postmodern consciousness: She perceives life as a series of private, disconnected moments rather than a crescendo toward a good or bad ending. Postmodern or no, however, there is only so much blood, guts, and gore—of body or mind—that one can take and still have a good read.

The poetry volume, Cora Fry, contains some of the same sentiments and events as the novels, such as a serious accident. This suggests that the writing is closely autobiographical, which is no problem in itself. In general, however, I think that human beings either like the angst of specific other beings or they do not. There are certain kinds of angst, or expressions of it, that we relate to better than others. And some readers may not like angst at all. Reading Rosellen Brown is a highly personal experience; hers isn't the angst for everybody.

—Jill Franks

BROWN, Wesley

Nationality: American. Born: New York, New York, 23 May 1945. Education: Oswego State University, B.A. 1968.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Tragic Magic. New York, Random House, 1978. Darktown Strutters. New York, Cane Hill Press, 1994.

Plays

Boogie Woogie and Booker T. New York, Theatre Communications Group, 1987.

Screenplays: W.E.B. Du Bois, A Biography in Four Voices (with others). 1996.

Other

The Teachers and Writers Guide to Frederick Douglass. New York, Teachers & Writers Collaborative, 1996.

Contributor, Action: The Nuyorican Poets Cafe Theatre Festiva, edited by Michael Algarin and Lois Griffith. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1997.

Editor, with Amy Ling, Imagining America: Stories from the Promised Land. New York, Persea Books, 1991.

Editor, with Amy Ling, Visions of America: Personal Narratives from the Promised Land. New York, Persea Books, 1992.

* * *

Though he may not be prolific, Wesley Brown is certainly a proficient author and his two novels Tragic Magic and Darktown

Strutters offer virtuoso proof of his talents. While both works explore issues of racial injustice roiling beneath the surface of white America, it is the seismic and shifting conscience of black America, of African-American men in particular, that invigorates Brown's work. Most compelling is his use of anxiety-laden themes such as masculinity in crisis, the double minoritization of black women, and the vexing conundrum of racial performativity: whether a socially constructed and thus "mimicable" blackness ever completely displaces a concept of black essentialism. And while nearly two decades span the publication of two vastly different novels (one recounts urban life in the 1970s while the other is set in the mid-nineteenth century) there is a binding aesthetic interweaving them—Brown's signature lyricism. Few novelists display such acumen for capturing the jazzy nuances of various types of black speech. With a crafty ear for a dialogue built upon generations of signifying, as well as the ribald ripostes of the dirty dozens and incantatory street poetics, Wesley Brown exemplifies the "blues matrix" which Houston Baker, Jr., and other literary critics have theorized as the central catalyzing framework through which all African-American art generates. This "blues matrix" is recognized as a central, shared component of a widely divergent body of late twentieth-century African-American writing loosely dubbed the "New Black Aesthetic."

Brown's first novel, Tragic Magic is the story of Melvin Ellington, a.k.a. Mouth, a black, twenty-something, ex-college radical who has just been released from a five-year prison stretch after being a conscientious objector to the Vietnam War. Brown structures this first-person tale around Ellington's first day on the outside. Although hungry for freedom and desperate for female companionship, Ellington is haunted by a past that drives him to make sense of those choices leading up to this day. Through a filmic series of flashbacks the novel revisits Ellington's prison experiences, where he is forced to play the unwilling patsy to the predatorial Chilly and the callow pupil of the not-so-predatorial Hardknocks; then dips further back to Ellington's college days where again he takes second stage to the hypnotic militarism of the Black Pantheresque Theo, whose antiwar politics incite the impressionable narrator to oppose his parents and to choose imprisonment over conscription; and finally back to his earliest high school days where we meet in Otis the presumed archetype of Ellington's "tragic magic" relationships with magnetic but dangerous avatars of black masculinity in crisis. But the effect of the novel cannot be conveyed through plot recapitulation alone, for its style is perhaps even more provoking than its subject.

Brown amplifies his hip coming-of-age story with a musical intonation making almost every paragraph ring with the cadences of jazz. Drawing from the trick chords of Thelonius Monk and the unresolving rhapsodies of Charlie "Birdland" Parker, Brown does more than simply quote music, he transcribes jazz into prose. Like inmate Shoobee Doobie who plays the "lingo" instrument and trades licks of street philosophy with his favorite records, Brown's narrative literally riffs on Ellington's past, building towards an epiphany of meaning which ultimately never really plays out as we, the listenerreaders, or Ellington himself expect. After Otis is knifed while trying to restore his shattered manhood—whose disintegration he attributes more to the brainwashing bravado advertised in John Wayne movies than to the hand he lost in Vietnam—Ellington is also stabbed, but his wound results from a senseless act of selflessness as he attempts to stop a fight between two boys. The pain sends him into an aleatory fugue that begins with memories of Oedipal confusion, replays random moments of childhood, and crescendos into a psychological finale that mixes characters from each field of his past life and momentarily breaks the novel away from traditional narrative and temporal structures. In these last pages Brown evokes a postmodernist sense of what Frederic Jameson would call "depthlessness," for Ellington finally learns after recovering from his near death experience that despite his constant modernist searching for an ultimate meaning in life, a Miles Davis tune called "So What!" has held the secret all along, that "things really don't matter." But the novel does not terminate here. In a coda that dramatizes Ellington finally having sex with his new girlfriend, Brown provides a closure that is more erotic than emotional and redeems a hitherto problematic masculinity at the expense of the black woman, who is reduced to secondary status in the universe of the novel.

Darktown Strutters is a different sort of coming-of-age novel than Tragic Magic. This novel is not only set in the era of Jim Crow, its protagonist is Jim Crow, an antebellum slave whose dances are so incredible that they spawn a slave uprising, provide an avenue toward freedom in a white minstrelsy troupe, and even gain an interview with the renowned orator Frederick Douglass. As an example of what Linda Hutcheon calls "historical metafiction," the novel reveals Brown's maturation in moving away from his own time and milieu in Tragic Magic and turning a backward glance to history—those harrowing years just leading up to and just beyond the Civil War, when Jim Crow embodied the color line that prohibited blacks from enjoying the same activities as whites such as riding in the same train cars—hence, the designation of Jim Crow cars reserved for African Americans. In the novel, Brown dramatizes the "history" of the Jim Crow car as Jim rides in isolation to cities where the troupe releases racial anxieties by making fun of them. This is not the first time, however, that Brown commingles historical celebrities with fictional characters. A look at the dramatis personae of his play Boogie Woogie and Booker T (Ida B. Wells, W.E.B. Du Bois, and Booker T. Washington) provides further evidence of this impulse to thematize black history. And yet, it is important to note that Brown's historical approach approximates the more traditional roman a clef, in that he does not disrupt either the history that he writes about nor the method used to write it, as does, for example, Ishmael Reed, a novelist to whom Brown is often compared.

If Tragic Magic is a novel that sings and scats, then Darktown Strutters is a book that dances and shuffles. But critics have been quick to point out moments where Brown stumbles in his performance. Remonstrances once again center on Brown's characterization of black women, in particular the Featherstone Sisters, with whom Jim and Jubilee (an unpredictably violent male who represents another variation on the "tragic magic" love-hate masculine friendship) travel and perform for audiences after the Civil War. Even though Brown goes against the grain of popular American history by making these women so unique—they own their own minstrel company, are outspoken proto-feminists, carry concealed knives, and ignore social as well as gender codes by pursuing bisexual relationships—the sisters still operate within the parameters of a patriarchal fantasy, becoming the focus of hetero-masculine love interests instead of the potentially oppositional figures that their initial description would seem to imply.

Notwithstanding a lackluster characterization of women and an unbalanced distribution of give-and-take dialogue, Darktown Strutters intervenes into a current academic debate over the historical significance of minstrelsy regarding not only black representationality, but also the construction of American whiteness. However, those moments where characters brood most profoundly over these issues (Jim explaining his refusal to blacken up, the homosexual minstrel leader who can only cope with life while blackened up) occur during the first part of the book set before the Civil War. Thereafter, the postbellum sections build towards an unexpected riotous ending that tragically leaves most of the characters dead. In this way, the plot trajectory of Brown's second novel mirrors that of his first: both seethe as moods turgidly push toward an explosive ending. But the tone of Darktown Strutters and the stakes of its tragedy give it a naturalistic quality that Tragic Magic does not possess.

-Michael A. Chaney

BUECHNER, (Carl) Frederick

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 11 July 1926. Education: Lawrenceville School, New Jersey, graduated 1943; Princeton University, New Jersey, A.B. in English 1947; Union Theological Seminary, New York, B.D. 1958: ordained a Minister of the United Presbyterian Church, 1958. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1944–46. Family: Married Judith Friedrike Merck in 1956; three children. Career: English Master, Lawrenceville School, 1948–53; Instructor in Creative Writing, New York University, summers 1953-54; head of the employment clinic, East Harlem Protestant Parish, New York, 1954-58; chairman of the Religion Department, 1958-67, and School Minister, 1960-67, Phillips Exeter Academy, New Hampshire. William Belden Noble Lecturer, Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1969; Russell Lecturer, Tufts University, Medford, Massachusetts, 1971; Lyman Beecher Lecturer, Yale Divinity School, New Haven, Connecticut, 1976; Harris Lecturer, Bangor Seminary, Maine, 1979; Smyth Lecturer, Columbia Seminary, New York, 1981; Zabriskie Lecturer, Virginia Seminary, Lynchburg, 1982; lecturer, Trinity Institute, 1990. Awards: O. Henry prize, 1955; Rosenthal award, 1959; American Academy award, 1982. D.D.: Virginia Seminary, 1983; Lafavette College, Easton, Pennsylvania, 1984; Cornell College, Mt. Vernon, Iowa, 1988; Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1990; D.Litt.: Lehigh University, Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, 1985. Agent: Harriet Wasserman, 137 East 36th Street, New York, New York 10016. Address: 3572 State Route 315, Pawlet, Vermont 05761-9753, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Long Day's Dying. New York, Knopf, 1950; London, Chatto and Windus, 1951.

The Seasons' Difference. New York, Knopf, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1952.

The Return of Ansel Gibbs. New York, Knopf, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1958.

The Final Beast. New York, Atheneum, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1965.

The Entrance to Porlock. New York, Atheneum, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1970.

The Book of Bebb. New York, Atheneum, 1979.

Lion Country. New York, Atheneum, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1971. Open Heart. New York, Atheneum, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1972.

Love Feast. New York, Atheneum, 1974; London, Chatto and Windus, 1975.

Treasure Hunt. New York, Atheneum, 1977; London, Chatto and Windus, 1978.

Godric. New York, Atheneum, 1980; London, Chatto and Windus, 1981.

Brendan. New York, Atheneum, 1987.

The Wizard's Tide. New York, Harper, 1990.

The Son of Laughter. San Francisco, HarperSanFrancisco, 1993.

On the Road with the Archangel. San Francisco, HarperSanFrancisco, 1997.

The Storm. San Francisco, HarperSanFrancisco, 1998.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Tiger," in Prize Stories 1955: The O. Henry Awards, edited by Paul Engle and Hansford Martin. New York, Doubleday, 1955.

Other

The Magnificent Defeats (meditations). New York, Seabury Press, 1966; London, Chatto and Windus, 1967.

The Hungering Dark (meditations). New York, Seabury Press, 1969. The Alphabet of Grace (autobiography). New York, Seabury Press, 1970.

Wishful Thinking: A Theological ABC. New York, Harper, and London, Collins, 1973.

The Faces of Jesus, photographs by Lee Boltin. Croton-on-Hudson, New York, Riverwood, 1974.

Telling the Truth: The Gospel as Tragedy, Comedy, and Fairy Tale. New York, Harper, 1977.

Peculiar Treasures: A Biblical Who's Who. New York, Harper, 1979.
The Sacred Journey (autobiography). New York, Harper, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1982.

Now and Then (autobiography). New York, Harper, 1983.

A Room Called Remember: Uncollected Pieces. New York, Harper, 1984.

Whistling in the Dark: An ABC Theologized. New York, Harper, 1988.

Telling Secrets (autobiography). New York, Harper, 1991.

The Clown in the Belfry: Writings on Faith and Fiction. San Francisco, HarperSanFrancisco, 1992.

Listening to Your Life: Daily Meditations with Frederick Buechner, compiled by George Connor. San Francisco, HarperSanFrancisco, 1992.

The Longing for Home: Recollections and Reflections. San Francisco, HarperSanFrancisco, 1996.

The Eyes of the Heart: A Memoir of the Lost and Found. San Francisco, HarperSanFrancisco, 1999.

Manuscript Collection: Wheaton College, Illinois.

Critical Studies: Laughter in a Genevan Gown: The Works of Frederick Buechner 1970–1980 by Marie-Hélène Davies, Grand Rapids, Michigan, Eerdmans, 1983; Frederick Buechner: Novelist and Theologian of the Lost and Found by Marjorie McCoy, New York, Harper, 1988.

Frederick Buechner comments:

(1996) When I started out writing novels, my greatest difficulty was always in finding a plot. Since then I have come to believe that there is only one plot. It has to do with the way life or reality or God—the name is perhaps not so important—seeks to turn us into human beings, to make us whole, to make us Christs, to "save" us—again, call it what you will. In my fiction and non-fiction alike, this is what everything I have written is about.

* * *

The novels of Frederick Buechner represent a movement from a consideration of psychological textures to an assessment of the religious values that are expressed by those textures. The fact that Buechner is an ordained Presbyterian clergyman may not strike the reader of the earlier novels—A Long Day's Dying, The Seasons' Difference, and The Return of Ansel Gibbs—as particularly relevant to the interpretation of those novels. His early novels, indeed, may impress the casual reader as works that are in the tradition of Henry James, concerned as they are with the rather delicate and tenuously resolved relations among cultivated and privileged Americans. The characters in these novels are preoccupied with resolutions of their difficulties, but these resolutions go no farther than clarification of their identities in relation to each other. This clarification is conveyed in a style that was regarded, at the time of the novels' appearance, as oblique and over-worked. The actual course of events in the early novels issues, as indicated, in changes of orientation that can be spoken of as a clearing out of the psychological undergrowth that impedes the discovery of purpose and self-knowledge on the part of the chief characters. The course of the narratives is marked by a taste for ironic comedy—a comedy that records the experience of living in a world that, unlike the world of some older comedy, is bare of generally shared values. The values that are to be detached are values for a particular person and do not have much wider relevance.

It is in later novels—The Final Beast, The Entrance to Porlock, and Lion Country—that one can see Buechner moving, in an ironic and quite self-protective way, toward concerns that his ordination as a clergyman would suggest. He moves from concern with particular persons in special situations toward more inclusive concerns which announce that lives of individual characters are oblique annunciations of the general constraint and opportunity which all human beings can, if they are responsive, encounter. The psyche is also a soul—a focus of energy that achieves fulfillment by coming into relation with patterns that religion and mythology testify to. The style of the later work becomes simpler, and Buechner delights in reporting farcical aspects of American experience that found little place in his earlier work. And these farcical elements are organized by invocation of narrative patterns that are widely known. The narrative pattern that underpins The Entrance to Porlock is drawn from that item of popular culture, The Wizard of Oz; the motley company of his novel repeats and varies the quest that took Dorothy Gale and her companions along the Road of Yellow Bricks.

In Lion Country and the three novels that succeed it—Open Heart, Love Feast, and Treasure Hunt—the grotesque menagerie of characters has experiences that are organized by nothing less than the traditional patterns of the Christian religion itself. (The four novels are published together under the title of The Book of Bebb.) In this series, Christianity undergoes parody that on the surface is blasphemous. The reader is offered variation that is ironical rather than confirming, and yet—in the long run—achieves the only kind of validation that is possible at the present time. At the very least the series is a successful counter-weight to novels that confirm conventional piety by exercises in conventional piety. Yet beneath the adultery, farce, and sheer violence of the Bebb series is a set of insights that are very close to the assertions of conventional Christianity. The conventionality—and the sincerity—of Buechner's views can be sampled in the theological ABC contained in Wishful Thinking and other meditations.

On the Road with the Archangel draws on the Book of Tobit, dubbed apocryphal by Protestants but included in the Catholic Bible. In Nineveh, whence the Israelites (the future Lost Tribes) have been carried away, a wealthy and generous man named Tobit undergoes a Job-like series of trials. Tobit prays for death, while in the town of Ectabana, a beautiful girl named Sarah—plagued by a demon who has killed seven would-be husbands—makes the same request. The angel Raphael hears the prayers of both, and intervenes in their affairs, bringing the two together. The tale ends happily, with Sarah's marriage to Tobit's feckless son Tobias. The Storm likewise draws on a classic, though in this case one much more recent: Shakespeare's The Tempest, which Buechner places in a modern setting.

Buechner can, in summary, be seen as a novelist who at first was challenged by the sheer complexity of human behavior and who later finds that complexity comprehensible when linked with popular myth-work like the Oz books and, finally, with the self-mastery and self-discovery offered by the Christian religion.

-Harold H. Watts

BUJOLD, Lois McMaster

Nationality: American. Born: Lois McMaster in Columbus, Ohio, 2 November 1949. Education: Attended Ohio State University, 1968–72. Family: Married John Frederic Bujold in 1971 (divorced 1992); one son, one daughter. Career: Pharmacy technician, Ohio State University Hospitals, 1972–78. Awards: Nebula Award (Science Fiction Writers of America), best novel, 1988, best novella, 1989, best novel, 1995; Hugo Award (World Science Fiction Society), best novella, 1989, best novel, 1990, 1991, 1995; Locus Award (Locus magazine), 1991. Agent: Eleanor Wood, Spectrum Literary Agency, 111 Eighth Avenue, Suite 1501, New York, New York 10011, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Shards of Honor. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1986; republished as Cordelia's Honor. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1996.
Ethan of Athos. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1986.
The Warrior's Apprentice. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1986.
Falling Free. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1988.
Brothers in Arms. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1989.
Borders of Infinity. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1989.
The Vor Game. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1990.

Vorkosigan's Game (contains Borders of Infinity and The Vor Game). Science Fiction Book Club, 1990.

Barrayar. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1991.

The Spirit Ring. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1992.

Mirror Dance. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1993.

Cetaganda: A Vorkosigan Adventure. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1996.

Memory. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1996.

Young Miles. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1997.

Komarr: A Miles Vorkosigan Adventure. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1998.

A Civil Campaign: A Comedy of Biology and Manners. Riverdale, New York, Baen Books, 1999.

Short Stories

Dreamweaver's Dilemma: Stories and Essays, edited by Suford Lewis. Framingham, Massachusetts, NESFA Press, 1995.

Other

Editor, with Roland J. Green, Women at War. New York, Tor, 1995.

* * *

In 1986 Lois McMaster Bujold hit the science fiction reading world with the first installment of a remarkable space adventure series. What Bujold calls her "serial novels" center around the life of Miles Naismith Vorkosigan, a stunted, energetic, and charismatic character. Writing and publishing her saga, Bujold came to appreciate what she calls in her afterword to Cordelia's Honor the "each-book-independent-format" structure of serial novels: they have an almost hypertext-like freedom, as they are read in random order and can be written out of chronology as well. Her awareness of the form as well as her powerfully character-driven writing, have won Bujold Hugo and Nebula awards, as well as a devoted following of readers.

Although Bujold didn't begin writing science fiction until 1982, she traces that interest back to her early childhood and her father's influence on her. He was a professor of welding engineering who read science fiction on his travels as a consultant. Bujold's fourth novel, Falling Free, which she dedicated to her father and which won her her first Nebula award, has been praised for its depiction of the life of an engineer. One sequence in Falling Free involves the efforts of its central character to repair a broken mirror, a task that involves smelting and working molten materials. A similar focus on the material conditions of work also appears in The Spirit Ring, a novel not part of the Vorkosigan series, in which several characters cast a statue that comes to life and saves the day. Through such parallels as this, Bujold's 1992 departure from the Vorkosigan formula that has proved so popular offers an interesting insight into her central concerns.

The Spirit Ring shares with the Vorkosigan tales an interest in history and its implications, as well as an interest in marginalized people. It is a fantasy novel centering on a young woman who possesses magical powers. Despite its reliance on magic and supernatural creatures, the novel is grounded in historical research: it is set in Italy around the time of the Guelphs and Ghibellines, and much of the tension in the novel echoes historical events. Bujold details her sources in an authorial note, and outlines the connections several characters have to people from contemporaneous records. The lively heroine who must survive many pitfalls and find her true love is Bujold's invention.

To her many fans' delight, however, Bujold's desertion of the Vorkosigan universe was only temporary, and she continues to focus on detailing the many aspects of the multifaceted universe in which Miles lives. This fictional cosmos is made up of planets loosely linked by hubs of wormholes. Such a large and flexible structure allows Bujold to develop a range of cultures as well as a variety of interactions between them. For example, threats to different regions or to their access to a jump point, can cause shifting alliances. Bujold exploits these to vary the stresses and experiences of her characters. Although each novel in the series contains a time line indicating the chronology position of each work, Bujold does not limit herself to rehearsing the same plot—or even the same characters—in each novel or novella.

What does remain constant is that all Bujold's protagonists are in some way outsiders: a young woman with magical powers who must hide that skill or risk death (The Spirit Ring); a man with status in his home world who is reviled for his cultural practices and crippled by his beliefs when he must venture out of that safety (Ethan of Athos); a consulting engineer who must give up his identity as a downsider (planet dweller) and throw his lot in with genetically engineered people who can only live in freefall (Falling Free); Miles's own clone, who has been grown and deformed to subvert Barrayar (Mirror Dance).

Miles Naismith Vorkosigan also illustrates outsider status, even though he is the firstborn son of aristocratic parents in a militaristic, hierarchical culture on the planet Barrayar. Bujold has written that she first conceived of Miles as physically handicapped in a culture that valued physical strength and military might. Crippled by a chemical attack on his mother when he was in utero, Miles as a young man must struggle to find a role for himself other than pitied carbuncle.

This interest in underdogs may explain why Bujold is sometimes called a feminist writer. Certainly no overt ideological position arises in the Vorkosigan novels, unlike novels such as those by Sheri Tepper, who explicitly investigates environmentalist and feminist concerns. Bujold's novels are more swashbuckling space opera, usually centering on a male protagonist who outwits his superiors in brawn or authority. Some women feature as powerful assistants or, occasionally, a nemesis; but only Cordelia's Honor—the two-volume compilation of Shards of Honor and Barrayar—centers on a female protagonist.

Shards of Honor depicts the meeting of Miles's parents, Cordelia Naismith and Aral Vorkosigan. Both are persons of some position in their home cultures, but the two meet on territory alien to them both. Cordelia's team escapes, but she is captured, and therefore alone and friendless and facing alien values. Aral, who has captured her, is, ironically, equally on his own: his men have mutinied, and had the coup worked, he would be dead. In Shards of Honor, then, captor and captive must work together to save both their lives. This illustration of the power of cooperative action runs through many of the novels.

The follow-up novel, Barrayar—winner of a Hugo award—shows Bujold's strategy, as she has described it, of thinking of the worst thing to throw at her characters, and then watching them cope. Aral has become regent to the emperor; he and Cordelia are happily married and eagerly anticipating an offspring, when there is an attempted coup against the regency. Cordelia's outsider status is emphasized by the patriarchal structure of Aral's Barrayaran culture. When the fetal (yes, fetal—you have to read the book!) Miles is kidnapped, she mounts a rescue attempt that not only opposes her to the coup leaders, but to her own husband.

Bujold has written that she based Miles in part of T.E. Lawrence. At first a stronger parallel seems to be to Dick Francis's heroes, who can suffer torture without ever uttering a word or losing their machismo: Miles's bones snap at the least provocation, and the various dastardly forces he encounters don't hesitate to engage in brutality with their little victim (or with hapless females) when they can. Indeed, the early novels revel in evil, and too often place a dazed hero or heroine looking at the boots of some would be tormentor or rescuer.

The more properly Lawrentian quality becomes visible in the way Miles inspires near-fanatical loyalty and exertion in his followers. This effect leads to the almost accidental creation of the Dendarii mercenaries, the group that provides Miles with an identity outside Barrayar. The alienation of Admiral Naismith and Lord Vorkosigan—both Miles—gives Bujold a rich matrix in which to explore questions of personal and public identity.

But Bujold's interest in outsiders means that Miles cannot remain an accepted and powerful actor in the Dendarii fleet. As he approaches 30, Miles is killed and reconstituted with a flaw that prevents him from functioning properly under battle conditions. Shamed by hurting one of his crew, in Memory Miles returns home in disgrace. And once more Bujold studies the woes of an outsider. But likeable, self-deprecating, very wily Miles always turns defeat into victory. In the latest installments of his life, he has been appointed the youngest-ever imperial auditor. As in Komarr and A Civil Campaign, this structure promises a string of on-going adventures for Miles as he balances his aristocratic responsibilities with the challenges and excitement of exploring mysteries as an auditor exempt from the laws of each community he explores.

If not as philosophically inspiring as Octavia Butler's tales, Bujold's work is wholly—perhaps even wholesomely—enjoyable. From the earliest novels, which merged elements of romance and young adult fiction with sci fi, Bujold has shown an ability to weave elements of many genres together in her addictively engaging stories. As her main character matures, adventure gives way to detection, thus opening a wider scope for Bujold's ongoing interest in what her fictional universe reveals about the human condition.

-Victoria Carchidi

BURKE, James Lee

Nationality: American. Born: Houston, 5 December 1936. Education: University of Southwest Louisiana, Lake Charles, 1955–1957; University of Missouri, B.A. 1959, M.A. 1960. Family: Married Pear Pail; four children. Career: Social worker, Los Angeles, 1962–64; reporter, Lafayette, Louisiana, 1964; U.S. Forest Service, Kentucky, 1965–66; English instructor, University of Southern Louisiana, Lafayette, Louisiana; English instructor, University of Montana, Missoula; English instructor, Miami-Dade Community College, Florida. Currently English professor, Wichita State University, Kansas. Awards: Bread Loaf fellowship, 1970; Southern Federation of State Arts Agencies grant, 1977; Guggenheim fellowship, 1989; Mystery Writers of America Edgar Allan Poe award, 1989. Agent: Philip Spitzer, 788 Ninth Ave., New York, New York 10019, U.S.A. Address: 338 North Quentin, Wichita, Kansas 62708, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels (series: Dave Robicheaux, Billy Bob Holland)

To the Bright and Shining Sun. New York, Scribner, 1970; New York, Hyperion, 1995.

Lay Down My Sword and Shield. New York, Crewel, 1971.

The Lost Get-Back Boogie. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1986.

The Neon Rain (Robicheaux). New York, Holt, 1987; London, Mysterious Press, 1989.

Heaven's Prisoners (Robicheaux). New York, Holt, 1988; London, Mysterious Press, and London, Vintage, 1990.

Black Cherry Blues. Boston, Little Brown, 1989; London, Century, 1990.

A Morning for Flamingoes (Robicheaux). Boston, Little Brown, 1990; London, Arrow, 1993.

A Stained White Radiance (Robicheaux). New York, Hyperion, 1992; London, Arrow, 1993.

In the Electric Mist with Confederate Dead. New York, Hyperion, and London, Orion, 1993.

Dixie City Jam (Robicheaux). New York, Hyperion, and London, Orion, 1994.

Burning Angel. New York, Hyperion, 1995.

Half of Paradise. New York, Hyperion, 1995.

Two for Texas. New York, Hyperion, 1995.

The Convict: A Novel. New York, Hyperion, 1995.

Cadillac Jukebox. New York, Hyperion, 1996.

Cimarron Rose: A Novel. New York, Hyperion, 1997.

Sunset Limited. New York, Doubleday, 1998.

Heartwood. New York, Doubleday, 1999.

Purple Cane Road. New York, Random House, 2000.

Other

The Convict and Other Stories. Boston, Little, Brown, 1990.

* * *

In his thirteen novels, James Lee Burke sets up a basic confrontation between the beauties of the natural world and the stark, cruel, marginal existence of his characters. When he writes about the natural world of the Texas-Louisiana Gulf Coast with its swamps and bayous, or the blue mountains of Montana, he produces a poetic and lyrical prose, filled with affirmation and awe, based solidly on his descriptions and evocations of the weather, light, aromas, and colors. Such a world appears Edenic and, for the most part, unspoiled. Burke writes with a Thoreauvian attention to detail and a Whitmanic delight in the sheer boundlessness of nature, as in Burke's To the Bright and Shining Sun. Such a romantic sense of oneness and transcendence parallels his characters' often thwarted desire for escape, sex, occasional love, country music, and jazz. Titles such as A Morning for Flamingos, A Stained White Radiance, Sunset Limited, Neon Rain, and Heaven's Prisoners illustrate this core juxtaposition of nature's timeless beauty with the transient kitsch of the twentieth-century human struggle.

Burke's characters pollute the world they inhabit. The ex-cons, prostitutes, mobsters, drug dealers and runners, alcoholics, bad cops, psychopathic killers, and mindless thugs occupy a Darwinian combat zone of existence, of life at the edge. Burke's men are crude and violent, driven by their own testosterone tactics in a raunchy moral wasteland that portrays violent predators in a sprawling, sleazy underworld of society and the soul. His women often partake of the same characteristics, except for the few who manage to love and survive. Burke depicts this world in a hard-edged, Hemingway-style prose that is cryptic and often crude, a style that balances precariously between sadism and sentiment, terror and tenderness.

The hero of many of Burke's novels is Dave Robicheaux, a former cop on the New Orleans police force, who stakes his claim to New Iberia, a small town in southern Louisiana. He is a barely reformed alcoholic still suffering from the dark depressions and nightmares from his service in the Vietnam War and the murder of his first wife, Annie Ballard, a social worker. As one of the walking wounded, he continually examines his own existential doubts and uncertainties. In recent books he has married Bootsie, the widow of a mob boss who has lupus, and they have adopted Alafair, a Salvadoran orphan rescued from a plane crash. Robicheaux displays a tough Cajun code of honor and emerges as a kind of knight errant in the seedy underworld that is his life.

Burke's plots are sprawling and elaborate with their interlocking network of rednecks, racists, and raunchy hit men, served up in an intricate labyrinth of betrayals, double-dealings, frame-ups, and setups. In this grimly realistic and often nihilistic world, Robicheaux is usually able to find the connections beneath the murky mayhem, that touchstone of the mystery formula that assures us that some kind of rational order and moral victory can be achieved, however fitfully.

In The Lost Get-Back Boogie of 1986, an earlier novel that does not feature Robicheaux, Burke carefully lays out his landscape of prisons, dreary bars, holding cells, pickup trucks and gun racks, oil rigs and sleazy roadhouses, in which the ex-con, Iry Paret, tells the tale of his parole, released after having stabbed a man in a bar, and his journey to Montana from Louisiana to work on the ranch of his prison-buddy's father, Frank Riordan. In the course of the novel Paret, writing in the first-person, replaces Buddy Riordan, his friend from prison, by working well on the ranch and finally marrying Buddy's ex-wife Beth. In effect the story of this redneck's redemption is a complicated psychological process, for Iry's survival depends upon Buddy's death. Such Oedipal conflicts between "killer brothers" provide the novel with its terrible economy and vision: that personal triumph necessarily involves personal betrayal. That dark psychological subtext pervades all of Burke's subsequent novels.

An example of this kind of plot can be seen in one of the later books, In the Electric Mist with Confederate Dead, published in 1993. Here Burke mixes the Robicheaux milieu and mystery with gothic overtones that involve the apparition of a Confederate general, John Bell Hood, who appears in an eerie hallucinatory manner to become Robicheaux's advisor and conscience. The circuitous and labyrinthine plot involves the murder of a hooker, Robicheaux's memory of having witnessed the murder of a black man in the Atchafalaya Basin, and the return to New Iberia of the malignant mobster, Julie Balboni, to finance a Hollywood film there. Several murders and betrayals abound, Balboni is finally set afire in prison, and Robicheaux uncovers all the right solutions to the crimes.

James Lee Burke's novels build upon the "hard-boiled school" of American crime and detective fiction that was begun and carried on by Dashiell Hammett, Raymond Chandler, and Kenneth Millar writing as Ross Macdonald. Other contemporary writers continuing this tradition include Robert B. Parker, George V. Higgins, and Elmore Leonard. Such novels directly depict violent action in a world of total violence, corruption, and psychological mutants. Such writers create Dickensian characters who speak a tough, crude, naturalistic dialogue. Their vision of the world remains cruel, often heartless, relentlessly paranoid, and instinctually chaotic. Like Raymond Chandler, Burke emphasizes the thoughts and feelings of the main character, often in the foreground of the sizzling, danger-filled action.

In Black Cherry Blues, the winner of the 1990 Edgar Award for best mystery novel, Robicheaux is pursued by a professional killer and flees his home on the Bayou Teche to find a new life in Montana near the Blackfoot River Canyon. The ex-police officer's escape from the corrupt institutions of New Orleans crime into the anonymity of a fish and tackle business becomes another journey of self-reflection haunted by the memories of his wife's murder and father's death. His personal struggles are complicated by a surprise visit from an old Cajun friend, Dixie Lee Pughe, after which Robicheaux begins investigating an underworld scheme by the Mafia to take over Indian lands. Robicheaux is again involved with the violent world of Mafia thugs and federal agents. "The plot crackles with suspense," reported the Los Angeles Times Book Review about Black Cherry Blues, which is among the best of the Robicheaux series.

In novels such as Purple Cane Road, The Lost Get-Back Boogie, Burning Angel, Cadillac Jukebox, Cimarron Rose, Dixie City Jam, Half of Paradise, and Lay Down My Sword and Shield, Burke infuses his language with descriptive metaphors born of Louisiana's lush landscapes in combination with the "funky" music and myth unique to the culture of the state. He is not averse to exploiting the commercial potential of the genre, but infuses it with descriptive writing as lush as the settings he describes and as colorful as the denizens of the area. His is a genre writing grounded by a strong sense of place, one where the metaphysical and other-worldly events are commonplace and validated, as they are in Louisiana.

Burke brings to the hard-boiled school his own lyrical descriptions of the natural world, his own sense of loss for the Edenic world of his childhood in southern Louisiana, and his sounding of the psychological depths of guilt, obsession, and self-loathing that infect his characters. In using the mystery formula with its process of calculated revelation, he consistently exposes the darker, more frightening side of contemporary America, and even though the guilty may be captured and/or killed, that violent darker landscape remains brutally and masterfully intact.

From novels published earlier in his career during the 1980s with relatively nondescript titles such as Sabine Spring and Two for Texas, continuing to his 1999 novel, Heartwood, a Billy Bob Holland mystery, it is obvious that James Lee Burke is interested in commercial success. Choosing the mystery genre does not guarantee book sales, yet the simple and powerful eloquence that Burke brings to mystery writing elevates his novels toward comparisons with great literature while also increasing sales. He transforms an ordinary plot with a commercial edge into quality writing using metaphorical descriptions that ordinary writers of any genre can only envy.

—Samuel Coale, updated by Hedwig Gorski

BURNARD, Bonnie

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Stratford, Ontario, Canada, 1945.Career: Teacher, Sage Hill, Humber School of Writing; writer-inresidence, University of Western Ontario. Lives in London, Ontario, Canada. Awards: Commonwealth Best Book award, 1989;

Saskatchewan Book of the Year, 1994; Periodical Publishers award, 1994; Marian Engel award, 1995; Giller prize for Canadian Literature, 1999.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Good House. Toronto, HarperFlamingoCanada, 1999.

Short Stories

Women of Influence. Regina, Canada, Coteau Books, 1988. Casino and Other Stories. Toronto, HarperCollins, 1994.

Other

Editor, The Old Dance: Love Stories of One Kind or Another. Moose Jaw, Canada, Thunder Creek Publishing Co-operative, 1986.Editor, Stag Line: Stories by Men. Regina, Canada, Coteau Books, 1995.

* *

Establishing herself as a storyteller of the first rank through the considerable strengths of two books of short fiction—Women of Influence and Casino and Other Stories—Bonnie Burnard is recognized as a particularly sensitive chronicler of the extraordinary stories shaping seemingly ordinary lives. Her stories are thoughtful and intelligent meditations on the complex emotions attending the most powerful relationships in her character's lives (with siblings, parents, lovers, children) and with the tentative movements toward the defining moments of insight and self-awareness that accumulate slowly across years of experience. These are characters, as Burnard suggests in her first novel, A Good House, who come to understand that life, like love, is best lived with due respect for individual strength, common gentleness, absolute loyalty, and having a good ear with which to listen and learn.

Building on many of the themes and strategies that have drawn attention to her finest stories, Burnard proves herself an equally fine novelist in her management of this family saga that spans three generations of the Chambers family. Set mostly in a small town along the shores of Lake Huron, the novel begins with Bill Chamber's return from World War II, minus three fingers on his right hand, and builds slowly, tracing his readjustment to family life and to the subtle (and not so subtle) rhythms of the titular "good house," the family home around which most of the ten dated sections that structure the novel eventually orbit. As in life, the parameters of Bill's experiences and stories expand gradually to include the events shaping the lives of his children and their families, the loss of his first wife and life with a second, and the deep disappoints and lasting joys.

Not surprising given the historical reach of the novel, characters gather into a kind of generational kaleidoscope that allows Burnard to shift effortlessly from a section dedicated primarily to the story of Bill's first wife, the wise and generous Sylvia, to one that privileges the struggles of Patrick, the eldest and hopeful son, to one in which free-spirited daughter Daphne holds center stage. Adding to this polyphony is the discovery of an old journal called, optimistically, "Our New Life in Lambton County" that Burnard positions as a kind of formalized genealogy, a stable record against and through which readers can begin to interpret and reinterpret the unrecordable and distinctly unstable nuances of lives lived to the fullest. It is these most resonant of shadings that Burnard captures most eloquently. In the final section of the book ("1997"), for instance, she narrativizes the thoughts of Margaret, Bill's second wife, while she reflects on a series of photographs, some of "natural groupings" (husbands and wives, sisters and brothers), others of a more random nature. As the novel concludes, Margaret contemplates her final gesture, one in which "someone with a fine hand" would label each picture. Such an inscription, she thinks to herself, would "place" the names in some sort of knowable and familiar arrangement, "replicating the placement of the bodies" in each image, organizing the chaos of so many people and so many stories into something akin to a key, "or maybe it was more properly called a legend." In A Good House Burnard shows herself fully capable of remaining loyal to both the lives and the legends of people that she so clearly loves and respects.

-Klay Dyer

BURNS, Alan

Nationality: British. Born: London, 29 December 1929. Education: The Merchant Taylors' School, London; Middle Temple, London: called to the bar, 1956. Military Service: Served in the Royal Army Education Corps, 1949–51. Family: Married 1) Carol Lynn in 1954, one son and one daughter; 2) Jean Illien in 1980, one daughter. Career: Barrister in London, 1956–59; research assistant, London School of Economics, 1959; assistant legal manager, Beaverbrook Newspapers, London, 1959-62; Henfield fellow, University of East Anglia, Norwich, 1971; senior tutor in creative writing, Western Australian Institute of Technology, South Bentley, 1975; Arts Council writing fellow, City Literary Institute, London, 1976; associate professor and professor of English, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, 1977-91. Since 1992, lecturer, Creative Writing Department, Lancaster University, England. Awards: Arts Council grant, 1967, 1969, and bursary, 1969, 1973; C. Day Lewis fellowship, 1973; Bush Foundation Arts fellowship, 1984. Agent: Diana Tyler, MBA Literary Agents Ltd., 45 Fitzroy St., London W1P 5HR, England. Address: Creative Writing Department, Lancaster University, Lancaster LA1 4YN, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Buster, in New Writers One. London, Calder, 1961; published separately, New York, Red Dust, 1972.

Europe after the Rain. London, Calder, 1965; New York, Day, 1970. Celebrations. London, Calder and Boyars, 1967.

Babel. London, Calder and Boyars, 1969; New York, Day, 1970.

Dreamerika! A Surrealist Fantasy. London, Calder and Boyars, 1972.
The Angry Brigade: A Documentary Novel. London, Allison and Busby, 1973.

The Day Daddy Died. London, Allison and Busby, 1981. Revolutions of the Night. London, Allison and Busby, 1986.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Wonderland," in Beyond the Words. London, Hutchinson, 1975.

Plays

Palach, with Charles Marowitz (produced London, 1970). Published in Open Space Plays, edited by Marowitz, London, Penguin, 1974.

Other

To Deprave and Corrupt: Technical Reports of the United States Commission on Obscenity and Pornography. London, Davis Poynter, 1972.

The Imagination on Trial: British and American Writers Discuss Their Working Methods, with Charles Sugnet. London, Allison and Busby, 1981.

Critical Study: Article by David W. Madden, in British Novelists since 1960 edited by Jay L. Halio, Detroit, Gale, 1983.

* * *

Alan Burns's novels deserve the attention of serious readers. The first, Europe after the Rain, taking its title from a painting by Max Ernst, established him as a kind of infra-realist. Set in the unspecified future in a Europe devastated by internecine strife within "the party," it deals with ruined figures in a ruined landscape, purposelessly dedicated to "the work" which is the only thing the party will reward with the food necessary to keep alive. The unnamed narrator alone possesses any genuine purpose. His quest to find and take care of the daughter of the Trotskyite leader of the rebel forces is inspired by something like love, doubtfully implicit in his actions, later developed into a statement of hope which comes as the one redeeming human fact in a world blasted beyond the usual trappings of humanity, but arrived at only after much violence: a woman is flogged, a dog stabbed and its legs dislocated, people fight over corpses for the gold fillings in the teeth, a leg is wrenched off a corpse and eaten by a woman, other women pursue and stone and half-crucify and eventually beat to death the commander of the forces who are in power at the book's beginning. To this nightmarish action Burns applies a style which may be described as burnt-out. His sentences are mostly short, or built up of short phrases resting on commas where one might have expected full-stops, the total effect being slipped, stripped, and abrupt.

Celebrations is similarly uncompromising, with six characters and seven funerals. Williams, boss of a factory, has two sons, Michael and Phillip, whom he dominates. A hero to himself, Williams is a most uncertain personality, inconstant in his psychological attributes, extravagant in behavior which is nevertheless always reported in the same flat and colorless prose. Phillip's death, following an accident which necessitates the amputation of his leg, leaves an even sharper taste of doubt in the reader's mind—for while it throws his father and his brother into grim rivalry for the attention of his widow, Jacqueline, these affairs are chronicled with such irony that they hardly seem to occur. All the time, it appears, we are meant to be reminded of Kierkegaard's dictum, "The thought of death condenses and intensifies life," as Burns piles violence on violence, and funeral on funeral, abbreviating whole lives to a tapestry of gesture.

With Babel Burns seemed to have reached a dead end, though it confirms him in his role as infra-realist, anti-poet, steely perceiver of disconnections, writing as though he looks down on the rest of us from a private spaceship in unwilling orbit. Here he has assembled an ice-cold report on a world in chaos, stitching together clichés from the newspapers, fragments of misunderstood conversation, a babble of jokes and warnings. The cunningly fragmented styles owe too much to Burroughs and Ballard, and the comedy cannot quite conceal something merely self-disgusted in such furious insistence on unmeaning.

The Review of Contemporary Fiction devoted its Summer 1997 issue to Burns. Among the articles was a 1994 interview, conducted through the mail, with David Madden. The two discussed Burns's books, his influences, and his beliefs in a wide-ranging series of discussions that took in subjects ranging from James Joyce to the D-Day anniversary celebrations then taking place.

-Robert Nye

BURROWAY, Janet (Gay)

Nationality: American. Born: Tucson, Arizona, 21 September 1936. Education: The University of Arizona, Tucson, 1954–55; Barnard College, New York, B.A. (cum laude) in English, 1958; Cambridge University, B.A. (honours) in English 1960, M.A. 1965; Yale School of Drama, New Haven, Connecticut, 1960-61. Family: Married 1) Walter Eysselinck in 1961 (divorced 1973), two sons; 2) William Dean Humphries in 1978 (divorced 1981); 3) Peter Ruppert in 1993, one step-daughter. Career: Supply teacher and music director, Binghamton public schools, New York, 1961-63; costume designer, Belgian National Theatre, Ghent, 1965-70, and Gardner Centre for the Arts, University of Sussex, Brighton, 1965–71; lecturer in American Studies, University of Sussex, 1965–72; assistant to the Writing Program, University of Illinois, Urbana, 1972; associate professor, 1972-77, professor of English, 1977-; McKenzie Professor of English Literature and Writing, 1986-95, Florida State University, Tallahassee. Visiting lecturer, Writers Workshop, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1980. Fiction reviewer, New Statesman, London, 1970–71, 1975, and since 1991, New York Times Book Review. Since 1994, columnist, New Letters (Kansas City). Awards: Amoco award, for teaching, 1974; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1976; Florida Fine Arts Council grant, 1983; FSU Distinguished Teacher award, 1992; Lila Wallace-Reader's Digest fellowship, 1993. Agent: Gail Hochman, Brandt and Brandt Inc., 1501 Broadway, New York, New York 10036. Address: Florida State University, Department of English, Tallahassee, Florida 32306–1036.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Descend Again. London, Faber, 1960.

The Dancer from the Dance. London, Faber, 1965; Boston, Little Brown, 1968.

Eyes. London, Faber, and Boston, Little Brown, 1966.

The Buzzards. Boston, Little Brown, 1969; London, Faber, 1970.
Raw Silk. Boston, Little Brown, and London, Gollancz, 1977.
Opening Nights. New York, Atheneum, and London, Gollancz, 1985.
Cutting Stone. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London Gollancz, 1992.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Embalming Mom," in Apalachee Quarterly (Tallahassee, Florida), Spring 1985.
- "Winn Dixie," in New Letters (Kansas City), January 1986.
- "Growth," in New Virginia Review (Richmond), Spring 1990.
- "I'toi," in Prairie Schooner, Spring 1991.
- "Dad Scattered," in The Day My Father Died. New York, Running Press, 1994.

Plays

Garden Party (produced New York, 1958).

The Fantasy Level (produced New Haven, Connecticut, 1961; Brighton, Sussex, 1968).

The Beauty Operators (produced Brighton, Sussex, 1968).

Poenulus; or, The Little Carthaginian, adaptation of a play by Plautus, in Five Roman Comedies, edited by Palmer Boive. New York, Dutton, 1970.

Television Plays: Hoddinott Veiling, 1970; Due Care and Attention, 1973.

Poetry

But to the Season. Weston super Mare, Somerset, Universities' Poetry, 1961.

Material Goods. Tallahassee, University Presses of Florida, 1981.

Other

The Truck on the Track (for children). London, Cape, 1970; Indianapolis, Bobbs Merrill, 1971.

The Giant Ham Sandwich (verse only; for children), with John Vernon Lord. London, Cape, 1972; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1973.

Writing Fiction: A Guide to Narrative Craft. Boston, Little Brown, 1982; 3rd edition, New York, HarperCollins, 1991; 4th edition, HarperCollins, 1995; 5th edition, New York, Longman, 2000.

Manuscript Collection: Florida State University, Tallahassee.

Critical Studies: Article by Elisabeth Muhlenfeld, in American Novelists since World War II, 2nd series, edited by James E. Kibler, Jr., Detroit, Gale, 1980; "The Play in the Novel: The Nuns in Opening Nights" by Phyllis Zatlin, in Modern Language Studies, Summer 1993.

Janet Burroway comments:

(1996) I wrote my first novel, Descend Again, with the determination that it would be fiction, and not decorated autobiography. Therefore I set it in a town I knew only slightly, and in 1942, when I had been six years old. It was several years before I realized that it dealt with a heroine who, like myself, was driven by a desire to get out of Arizona and into a world of books.

I continued to choose subjects that seemed to me socially and politically "serious," eschewing concerns merely female, while certain themes chose me in spite of myself: the older-man-younger-woman relationship, near-suicide and the decision to live after all; the abandonment of children—even, recurrently, the image of proliferating garbage. I remember writing a scene in The Buzzards, when my children were toddlers, in which Eleanor walks out on her brood, myself thinking as I wrote: I could never do this. Why do I keep writing about this? Meanwhile my own boys pestered me to play and I kept sending them out of the room—"Can't you see mummy's working?"

After that novel I faced the fact that I had not considered women's lives sufficiently weighty for the content of fiction, and in the next book, Raw Silk, I faced my unchosen themes head on, beginning with the sentence, "This morning I abandoned my only child." The acknowledgement of gender as central to my identity has seemed to me a freeing and integrating change—freeing, even, to adopt a new breadth of attitude toward the global themes. I understand now why I kept fretting about all that garbage.

The greatest change in my work in the past five years has been in the process itself. I have paid deliberate attention to thwarting my linear, critical, perfectionist, left-brain proclivities, in favor of intuitive flow. It works; it makes for faster story, richer prose, more of the unexpected. The motto over my desk as altered, slightly but crucially, from "Don't Dread; Do" to "Writing is Easy. Not Writing is Hard." What's missing is mainly the imperative.

* * *

Janet Burroway depicts contemporary social issues through multiple points-of-view to convey strong, and sometimes nebulous, moral messages. Complicated relationships are neatly interconnected within sharply defined domestic and urban settings, as contrasting characters try to work out crises of conscience. The author's penchant for epigrams and symbols further unifies her narratives, but at the cost of excessive, self-conscious rhetoric. Likewise, while her abrupt and usually ambiguous endings avoid blatant didacticism, they also seriously mar the proportions of her careful structures. Stories do not seem to conclude so much as merely come to a halt. She also favors theatrical surprises which do not proceed necessarily from exigencies of plot but facilely exploit the sensational. These linguistic artifices and narrative ploys intrude more than they enlighten, weakening her otherwise admirable craftsmanship. Burroway's novels are wellpaced, however, and she further enhances their popular appeal by providing plenty of practical information.

Eyes views the problems of race prejudice and of ethics in medicine and journalism through the individual perspectives of the four principal characters. Set in the South, the novel examines one day in the life of Dr. Rugg, an eye surgeon; his wife Maeve, who is pregnant at 40; their somewhat estranged son Hilary, a liberal reporter on a conservative paper; and Hilary's fiancée Jadeen, a junior high school teacher. Skillfully Burroway evokes the southern atmosphere and delineates the elaborate rituals of black-white relations as enacted by her sensitive protagonists. As a newly liberal and insecure daughter of an old Southern family, Jadeen's dilemma becomes acute: to refuse to teach an outrageously biased textbook and thus lose her job and alienate her genteel but bigotted mother, or to cave in and betray her recent convictions and lose her fiancée. Dr. Rugg, awkward in his charity and family relations and preoccupied in his profession, unwittingly destroys his career by casually mentioning his war-time experiments. Hilary, frustrated in his job and resentful of his famous father, carelessly misses the major scandal his father's seemingly innocuous lecture turns out to be-ironically, sent out on the national wires by Dodds, Rugg's soon-to-be-blind patient—which costs him and his mentor their positions. No totally satisfactory solution to these complications is possible. But Rugg heroically refuses to recant to save face for the State Department, and he serenely awaits his final heart-attack. Hilary, given a last chance, refuses to compromise his principles, or betray his father. Jadeen, however, is not strong enough for the sacrifice and buckles under to the "system;" she resigns herself (somewhat illogically) to being a subservient, dull teacher, without Hilary. Only Maeve, always understanding if inarticulate, and calm, maintains stability amid the domestic chaos. At the end, Jadeen points a moral of sorts: "Thoughts are complex. Actions are not. That is the subject of tragedy." Burroway's vignettes are telling, especially when she describes racial tension in a black bar or the techniques of surgery, reporting, teaching. But that's the rub: she prefers to tell more than to show. Dialogue is often wooden, and despite the neat plotting, the separate thematic strands don't quite mesh. The melodrama ends slightly out of focus.

The Dancer from the Dance is an ambitious and often subtle attempt at a novel of manners, in which the young, strangely innocent yet wise Prytania naively brings about the destruction and nearcollapse of the older and more sophisticated people irresistibly drawn to her. 60-year-old Powers, the sensitive but detached narrator, gives the hapless girl a job in his UNICEF office in Paris and entrée into his elegant world. Soon Prytania holds all in thrall. Stoddard, a young and unimaginative medical student, she leads on but finally cannot marry. Old Riebenstahl, a primitive sculptor and curious sage, finally commits suicide, because he has acted as go-between for her illicit affair with the talented mime Jean-Claude. Even the worldly wise Mme. de Verbois, with whom she stays, and finally Powers himself are cruelly touched by her strange power. The nuances of social behavior, the curious transformations of character, and the complex emotional entanglements are deftly portrayed in several delicately drawn scenes. Yet, for all that, Prytania remains a shadowy figure, and the narrative barely escapes incredibility. Further, although the pages are cluttered with more witticisms and aphorisms than a Restoration comedy, the general tone is more that of a middling French film about yet another blighted romance. The several ironies and crises come off as contrived and formulaic, and ultimately the novel sadly disappoints: such an anticlimax after so much art.

In The Buzzards Burroway turns to the political realm, employing, yet again, several narrators. But as we follow the campaign trail of Alex, the conservative but likeable Senator from Arizona, the multiple perspectives—interior monologues, set speeches, newspaper articles, letters—soon become redundant and tedious. Especially so are the fatuous epigrams which clog the journal of the sententious and most implausible manager, Galcher (he calls them Axioms of God; e.g., "We are not subtle enough to contrive a machine in which disintegration contributes to maintenance and manufacture"). Alex's cold, brittle, and marvelously inept wife, his disaffected son, and neurotic daughter Eleanor (whose near-suicide and Mexican abortion pose serious threats to his chances), like the "allegorical" Galcher, are definite liabilities—not only for Alex but for the reader, who has little reason to be interested in them, let alone to like them. Younger daughter Evie, a vivacious, all-American, plastic pom-pom girl, is equally off-putting, though depicted as an asset in Alex's uphill struggle for re-election. Nonetheless, Burroway still has incisive power to reveal the moral ambiguities, contradictions, and rationalizations of her characters, especially the women. But beyond showing the hectic pace and many stratagems of modern politicking, the novel's rationale is not quite clear. And when Evie is precipitously assassinated in the last few pages, the event seems not tragic but merely expedient in terminating a journey that has no real destination. That a writer of Janet Burroway's obvious talents in use of detail and perspective should ultimately be defeated by a lack of control or malfunction of these very elements is an unfortunate irony of her otherwise impressive work.

—Joseph Parisi

BUSCH, Frederick (Matthew)

Nationality: American. Born: Brooklyn, New York, 1 August 1941. Education: Muhlenberg College, Allentown, Pennsylvania, 1958–62, A.B. 1962; Columbia University, New York (Woodrow Wilson fellow, 1962), 1962–63, M.A. 1967. Family: Married Judith Burroughs in 1963; two sons. Career: Writer and editor, North American Précis Syndicate, New York, 1964–65, and School Management magazine, Greenwich, Connecticut, 1965-66. Instructor, 1966-67, assistant professor, 1968-72, associate professor, 1973-76, professor of English, 1976-87, and since 1987 Fairchild Professor of Literature, Colgate University, Hamilton, New York. Acting director, Program in Creative Writing, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1978–79; visiting lecturer in creative writing, Columbia University, New York, 1979. Awards: National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1976; Guggenheim fellowship, 1980; Ingram Merrill Foundation fellowship, 1981; National Jewish Book award, 1985; American Academy award, 1986; PEN/ Malamud award, for short story, 1991. Litt.D.: Muhlenberg College, 1980. Address: Department of English, Colgate University, Hamilton, New York 13346, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

I Wanted a Year Without Fall. London, Calder and Boyars, 1971. Manual Labor. New York, New Directions, 1974.

The Mutual Friend. New York, Harper, and Hassocks, Sussex, Harvester Press, 1978.

Rounds. New York, Farrar Straus, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1980.

Take This Man. New York, Farrar Straus, 1981.

Invisible Mending. Boston, Godine, 1984.

Sometimes I Live in the Country. Boston, Godine, 1986.

War Babies. New York, New Directions, 1988.

Harry and Catherine. New York, Knopf, 1990.

Closing Arguments. New York, Ticknor and Fields, 1991.

Long Way from Home. New York, Ticknor and Fields, 1993.

Girls. New York, Harmony Books, 1997.

The Night Inspector. New York, Harmony Books, 1999.

Don't Tell Anyone. New York, Norton, 2000.

Short Stories

Breathing Trouble and Other Stories. London, Calder and Boyars, 1974.

Domestic Particulars: A Family Chronicle. New York, New Directions, 1976.

Hardwater Country. New York, Knopf, 1979.

Too Late American Boyhood Blues. Boston, Godine, 1984.

Absent Friends. New York, Knopf, 1989.

The Children in the Woods: New and Selected Stories. New York, Ticknor and Fields, 1994.

Other

Hawkes: A Guide to His Fictions. Syracuse, New York, Syracuse University Press, 1973.

When People Publish (essays). Iowa City, University of Iowa Press, 1986.

A Dangerous Profession: A Book about the Writing Life. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1998.

Editor, Letters to a Fiction Writer. New York, Norton, 1999.

*

Manuscript Collection: Ohio State University, Columbus.

Frederick Busch comments:

I write about characters I want to matter more than my own theories and more than my own delights. The great problem is to face the fullest implications of one's insights and fears—and to sustain the energy to make a usable shape from them. No: the great problem is to sit and write something worthy of the people on the page, and the good reader.

* * *

Frederick Busch is a humanist with an eagle eye fixed on the family. Stricken rather than soothed by family ties, Busch's protagonists are kindred spirits with Ted Hughes's primal father: "Shot through the head with balled brains/ ... Clubbed unconscious by his own heart/ ... He managed to hear faint and far—'It's a boy!'"

Busch's concern with the vicissitudes of domestic life is shared by many of his peers—Richard Ford, Ray Carver, Andre Dubus—and is indeed a main preoccupation of post-World War II American fiction. What distinguishes Busch is his willingness to engage with history. Though Closing Arguments and Girls have contemporary settings, the protagonists, both Vietnam War veterans, cannot shake the burden of history in their own lives.

The Mutual Friend and The Night Inspector are actually set in the past. These novels are fictionalized accounts of the doings of nineteenth-century writers: Charles Dickens and Herman Melville, respectively. Though expertly rendered, the settings of these novels are obviously imagined; we cannot suspend disbelief here as easily as we might in the more familiar time and place of a book such as Manual Labor. This dynamic frees Busch to some extent from the demands of realism, giving him room to work figuratively and metafictionally. In both novels, he uses this space to explore the idea of disguise. Billy of The Night Inspector wears a papier-mâché mask to conceal his war-shattered face. In The Mutual Friend, the narrator looks back on his life as a series of "narratives I have perpetuated, in guises I have made." Busch here suggests parallels between the craft of fiction and the construction of personalities and "false fronts." Dickens and Melville are perfect protagonists, as writers preoccupied with the ways human beings trick each other.

Domestic Particulars is also set in the past. It blends more explicitly Busch's concern with history and the family. Set in New York City between 1919 and the 1970s, this family saga progresses amid the conditions of the great national social ambiance of these decades. Claire, Mac, and their son Harry strive to tap into the power of family affection. In the end, though, they achieve a less than expansive harmony. They are, after all, limited people of chary good will, to some extent outcharacterized by Busch's depictions of Brooklyn and Greenwich Village through the decades.

In both time and space, Busch is a true literary journeyman. He takes on a variety of settings and occupations, yet never feels like a tourist or an apprentice. He is equally alert to the countryside or the city, to the barn or the hospital. Natural settings save, as in "Trail of Possible Bones" (Domestic Particulars), or frighten, as in "What You Might as Well Call Love" (Hardwater Country). Either way, they are portrayed in minute detail. Likewise with work. Whether it's Prioleau making a television hook-up (Take This Man), or Silver and Hebner at their pediatrics (Rounds; Domestic Particulars), the enterprise is always vividly rendered. Work is often a small—though at times, illusory—grace in the fraught lives of his characters; thus Busch particularizes every type of labor with care.

I Wanted a Year Without Fall is legend passing from a father to his sleeping infant son. Its comic absurdity resides in parallels with Pilgrim's Progress and Beowulf. Ben recounts his adventures with Leo, who hits the road to escape urban destitution and a cuckold who wants his hide. For his part, Ben is fleeing a dead woman's voice. In a typical parody, Ben plays the Green Knight to an army of cockroaches. Here is the heroism of flight, not of the quest. Busch's anxious and ongoing preoccupation with the act of writing is central to the conclusion. Ben's last bardic utterance to his uncomprehending boy, "I will ask you to listen to an old time lay," is absurd indeed.

Another recurring concern in Busch's work is the death of children. In The Mutual Friend, the narrator reflects that "children die all the time, you know. It's 1900, and we ought to be learning why children die." Set decades later, Manual Labor makes it clear that modern medicine has not completely solved this "why," particularly in the existential sense. Anne and Phil Sorenson struggle to overcome the loss of their unborn child. Yet death pervades their lives. Abe, a vagrant whom they befriend in Maine, becomes the unhealthy focus of Anne's own suicidal attention, then kills himself. The novel esteems the victory of the couple over the nearly ubiquitous disintegration surrounding them. Their salvation is the manual labor of the two rebuilding an old house following the ruined labor of a childless mother. Phil's dictum, "You forget with your hands," is provided at the outset by the "child."

Rounds joins the Sorensons, Elizabeth Bean (a school psychologist), and Eli Silver, M.D. The Sorensons still need children. Elizabeth is pregnant, unmarried, and unwilling to abort the fetus. At the outset, Silver is all but ruined. His inadvertence has cost his son's life and, in the disastrous aftermath of the tragedy, his marriage. Busch separates and eventually intersects his characters' stories, a common strategy in his work. Silver intends to save himself from alcohol and emotional collapse by unflagging and expert attention to his pediatric practice, which is presented with surpassing realism. But only the Sorensons' affectionate regard and Elizabeth's love for him finally achieve that. Silver's scrupulous decision to initiate the death of a little girl in her final agony is realized with superb ethical authenticity.

In Take This Man, Gus has two fathers. At ten he goes to Anthony Prioleau, the biological one. His mother follows suit. The three are a family, strangely but abidingly. Tony and Ellen never marry. The novel gradually sketches in backgrounds—why Tony was a conscientious objector during the war, why Ellen had a taste for leave-taking. The other father remains in emotional but not physical range, never betrayed by Gus, who nonetheless comes to love Ellen and Tony unreservedly. Gus's first meeting with Tony and Tony's passing are Busch at his emotional best. Two ministers, the Reverends Van Eyck and Billy Horsefall (a parody of Billy Joe Hargis), are Busch at his comic best.

Invisible Mending is equally hilarious and poignant. Though Zimmer, a "Jew manqué," fears loneliness, his Gentile wife shows him the door. Her love isn't equal to his self absorption. For the first four pages it is 1980; it requires 214 pages to get back there. Meanwhile, Zimmer recollects his wondrous days with Rhona Glinksy, librarian and Nazi hunter, and his marriage with Lillian. Lil avers that Zimmer "can make a secular mystery out of the holiest simplicity." Zimmer recollects himself as "the treacherous amphibian who waddled on the Christian sands and swam in the blood of Jews." When Rhona reappears in 1980, times past and present merge. But Zimmer's young son provides a new and imperative focus. Invisible Mending brings Philip Roth to mind, both Portnoy's Complaint and The Ghost Writer. The novel is entirely up to the comparison.

War Babies, a novella, follows Pete Santore's "mission of ignorant need" from Illinois to Salisbury, England. Son of a nowdead father who was imprisoned for treason after his return from the Korean War, Santore seeks Hilary Pennel, daughter of a dead British officer with whom Santore's father had been held captive. Just below full consciousness, Santore needs to expiate his father's sin, which he fears pertained not only to America but to this hero. Thus the adult children meet, have a brief affair and discover the paradoxical likeness of their fathers' emotional bequests. Hilary has experienced her father's fatal resistance to his captors as abandonment, as Santore has his father's collaboration. Pennel's inadvertent gift to his daughter proved to be his vicious jingoist subaltern, aptly named Fox. After surviving the camp, Fox has held Hilary thrall to both his horrifying memories of the war and his sexual needs. This has cost Hilary an authentic life and a serious measure of sanity. This is a disturbing, morally insightful book.

Absent Friends is a strong collection of stories. Those in which the "friends" are family, either dead or at a distance, are especially compelling. "From the New World," the first and longest, masterfully realizes a middle-aged son's relation to his dead father. But variety, both of absence and point of view about absence, gives the collection richness in subject and perspective.

Harry and Catherine tells us more than we need to know about the enduring relationship of an unmarried couple, separated over a decade and brought together again through Harry Miller's employment by a senator from New York. The boss wants to work out his political posture toward an upstate country mall being constructed over the bones of slaves who had died of the plague after finding their way north on the underground railway. Far too serendipitously, Catherine Hollander's current lover, Carter Kreuss, is the contractor. Harry is honorably disposed to the dead and Carter's case for free enterprise is not without merit, especially given that the town fathers had long since secretively moved the bones from their original locale, a fact not worth much to a presidential aspirant. The novel is principally shaped, however, by the bond between Harry and the independent, morally centered Catherine. Their endless, over-subtle exchanges strain patience. The novel's implausible integration of the characters' situations strains credulity.

In Closing Arguments, the burden of memory gives a menacing edge to family life in small-town America. Mark, a Vietnam vet, lives the ordered life of a Main Street attorney in upstate New York. His family life isn't so ordered, however. His marriage is on the rocks, his teenage son recalcitrant and troubled. Furthermore, these matters must compete with Mark's daily, horrific memories of the killing he did in Vietnam, some of it indiscriminate: "once in a while I got to ride down howling and make popcorn out of people." So when Mark takes on the case of young Estella, accused of murdering her lover, his sense of recognition closes in. He becomes obsessed with her. The trembling hold he has on work and family life is ruined. He and Estella become comrades in destruction, the ruthless soldier-self finally uncovered.

In Long Way From Home, the protagonist, Sarah, also upturns the domestic order of her life. Suddenly seized with an "emergency feeling," she abandons her husband and their six-year-old son to search for her biological mother. Cleverly, Busch explores the effects of Sarah's departure through shifting points of view. Her husband, Barrett, pursues her, at first heading in the wrong direction. His self-destructiveness along the way suggests that his journey is more about facing his own personal demons than finding his wife. Meanwhile, Sarah successfully finds her natural mother. But Gloria, an itinerant nurse-naturopath, is a dangerous discovery. The pull of "blood ties" that drove Sarah to find Gloria turns out to have a cruel kickback. Gloria kidnaps Sarah's son. The blood tie Sarah seeks becomes poisonous.

In Girls, Busch explores the most daunting aspect of "why children die." In "Ralph the Duck" (Children in the Woods), the seed story for Girls, a young couple's daughter dies in infancy. This loss, mysterious and painful as it may be to Jack and Franny, is at least an "innocent" one. In Girls, the couple's grief is compounded first by the frivolous-seeming suicide attempt by a local college student—whom Jack saves—and then by the search for a missing 14-year-old girl. Jack's heroism, however impressive, can't erase the profound loss of his child. The awful twist of fate that took his daughter from him is compounded by the horrific will of the girl's murderer, who, like Camus' Caligula, grants no mercy in his quest to mimic and compound the cruelties of fate.

-David M. Heaton, updated by Lisa A. Phillips

BUTLER, Octavia Estelle

Nationality: American. Born: Pasadena, California, 22 June 1947. Education: Pasadena City College, A.A. 1968. Awards: Fifth prize, Writer's Digest Short Story Contest, 1967; Creative Arts Achievement award (Los Angeles YWCA), 1980; Hugo award (World Science Fiction Convention), 1984, 1985; Nebula award (Science Fiction Writers of America), 1985; Locus award (Locus magazine), 1985; Best novelette award (Science Fiction Chronicle Reader), 1985; MacArthur fellowship, 1995. Address: P.O. Box 6604, Los Angeles, CA 90055, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Patternmaster. New York, Doubleday, 1976.

Mind of My Mind. New York, Doubleday, 1977.

Survivor. New York, Doubleday, 1978.

Kindred. New York, Doubleday, 1979; second edition, Boston, Beacon Press, 1988.

Wild Seed. New York, Doubleday, 1980.

Clay's Ark. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1984.

Dawn: Xenogenesis. New York, Warner Books, 1987.

Adulthood Rites: Xenogenesis. New York, Warner Books, 1988.

Imago. New York, Warner Books, 1989.

The Evening and the Morning and the Night. Eugene, Oregon, Pulphouse, 1991.

Parable of the Sower. New York, Warner Books, 1995.

Parable of the Talents. New York, Seven Stories Press, 1998.

Lilith's Brood. New York, Warner Books, 2000.

Short Stories

Bloodchild and Other Stories. New York, Four Walls Eight Windows, 1995.

Other

Contributor, *Tales from Isaac Asimov's Science Fiction Magazine:*Short Stories for Young Adults, edited by Sheila Williams and Cynthia Manson. San Diego, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1986.

Contributor, Omni Visions One, edited by Ellen Datlow. Greensboro, North Carolina, Omni Books, 1993.

Contributor, Invaders, edited by Jack Dann and Gardner Dozois. New York, Ace Books, 1993.

Contributor, Women of Wonder: the Classic Years—Science Fiction by Women from the 1940s to the 1970s, edited by Pamela Sargent. HBH/Harvest, 1995.

Contributor, Virtually Now: Stories of Science, Technology and the Future, edited by Jeanne Schinto. Persea, 1996.

^

Critical Studies: Octavia Butler by Marleen S. Barr, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1986; Across the Wounded Galaxies: Interviews with Contemporary American Science Fiction Writers, edited by Larry McCaffery, Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1990; Ecofeminist Literary Criticism: Theory, Interpretation, Pedagogy, edited by Greta Gaard and Patrick D. Murphy, Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1990; American Science Fiction and Fantasy Writers by Clare L. Datnow, Springfield, New Jersey, Enslow Publishers, 1999; A Companion Text for Kindred by Janet Giannotti, Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1999.

* * *

The many efforts by literary critics to define the work of Octavia E. Butler speak to their challenge and the author's complexity. Among the categories Butler has fallen into: science fiction writer, African-American writer, feminist writer, and speculative fiction writer. But none seem to capture the eerie depth of Butler's work, which includes more than 10 works.

Butler has regularly garnered praise from literary critics, largely for her prose style and powerful female characters. The more Butler creates a character that is hard to pigeonhole, the more Butler herself displays a unique quality of writing. Her focus on issues of ethics, race, and gender are imbedded into her science fiction; but these issues do not consume the stories. Many critics have praised her for a social inquiry of sexual equality, and they have noted her intensely interesting focus on independent characters and the need for unity.

Four of her five earliest books have been dedicated to the Patternist series: Patternmaster, Mind of My Mind, Survivor, and Wild Seed. These books are about telepaths who are the central power figures on Earth. They are an integrated society, and central characters are often black women. This Patternist community started when Mary created a connection between mental abilities and actives who needed her help. There are many people needing help in these books, but they are often those struggling with latent mental abilities, or those who have been subsumed by diseases from travel. This new society based on mental acuity is also an imagined look at what the world would be like if men and women were truly equal. In Patternmaster, for example, a central female character becomes a man's mentor, has his baby, and saves him from evil forces without having any real desire to marry him. This is Butler's strong suitimagining how a character would act in an equal society, how her decisions would be different, how real power would be an impetus to think individually and for others. Butler is certainly a proponent of love, but in this equal arrangement, her main characters are not about to simper around the parlor waiting for a man to take action.

In academic circles Butler is best known for her book Kindred about a contemporary African-American writer named Dana who is called back in time by her great-great-grandfather. He is a white plantation owner, and needs Dana to keep him from death. Without Dana's protection he will die, and consequently, Dana will not be born, either. This complex interconnection of races, and the mix of time periods, led to much praise for this book.

Parable of Talents, a more recent book, continues the story originated in Parable of the Sower. The story is set in 2032, when religious extremists have won government office. Lauren Olamina embraces another religious belief: Earthseed. Olamina sees herself as a future leader in this religion that focuses on mastering change, and sees truth in the stars. Parable of Talents shows the rift between Lauren and her daughter over this faith. The book has been highly praised for its eloquent writing and depth of character.

-Maureen Aitken

BUTLER, Robert Olen, Jr.

Nationality: American. Born: Granite City, Illinois, 20 January 1945. Education: Northwestern University, B.S. 1967; University of Iowa, M.A. 1969; postgraduate study at the New School for Social Research, 1979–81. Military Service: Military intelligence, U.S. Army, 1969–72: served in Vietnam, became sergeant. Family: Married 1) Carol Supplee in 1968 (divorced 1972); 2) Marilyn Geller in 1972 (divorced 1987), one son; 3) Maureen Donlan in 1987 (divorced 1995); 4) Elizabeth Dewberry in 1995. Career: Reporter/editor, Electronic News, New York, 1972–73; high school teacher, Granite City, Illinois, 1973–74; reporter, Chicago, 1974–75; editor-in-chief, Energy User News, New York, 1975–85; assistant professor, McNeese State University, Lake Charles, Louisiana, 1985–93, professor of fiction writing, 1993—. Awards: TuDo Chinh Kien award for Outstanding Contributions to American Culture by a Vietnam Vet (Vietnam Veterans of America), 1987; Emily Clark Balch award, 1990; Pulitzer prize, 1993; Richard and Hilda Rosenthal Foundation award (American Academy of Arts and Letters), 1993; Notable Book award (American Library Association), 1993; Guggenheim fellow, 1993; National Endowment for the Arts fellow, 1994. L.H.D., McNeese State University, 1994. Agent: Kim Witherspoon, Witherspoon and Chernoff. Address: Department of English, McNeese State University, 4100 Ryan Street, Lake Charles, Louisiana 70609, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Alleys of Eden. New York, Horizon Press, 1981. Sun Dogs. New York, Horizon Press, 1982. Countrymen of Bones. New York, Horizon Press, 1983. On Distant Ground. New York, Knopf, 1985. Wabash. New York, Holt, 1987. The Deuce. New York, Holt, 1989. They Whisper. New York, Holt, 1994. The Deep Green Sea. New York, Holt, 1997. Mr. Spaceman. New York, Grove Press, 2000.

Short Stories

A Good Scent from a Strange Mountain: Stories. New York, Viking Penguin, 1992.

Tabloid Dreams. New York, Holt, 1996.

Coffee, Cigarettes and A Run in the Park. Decantur, Georgia, Wisteria Press. 1996.

Other

Introduction, Vietnam War Literature: A Catalog by Ken Lopez, Francine Ness, and Tom Congalton. Hadley, Massachusetts, K. Lopez, 1990.

Foreword, Fragments by Jack Fuller. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1997.

*

Critical Studies: Conversations with American Novelists: The Best Interviews from the Missouri Review and the American Audio Prose Library, edited by Kay Bonetti, et al, Columbia, University of Missouri Press, 1997.

* * *

After writing six novels that received little attention, Robert Olen Butler won the Pulitzer Prize with his 1992 collection of short stories, A Good Scent from a Strange Mountain. What captured the attention of the Pulitzer judges—and of Butler's rapidly growing audience—is that these short stories are all narrated in first person by Vietnamese characters—businessmen, housewives, war veterans, all immigrants to the United States. This is a remarkable and unique achievement when compared with the "Vietnam fiction" of other authors such as Tim O'Brien and Elizabeth Scarborough. Butler speaks for the Vietnamese themselves, rather than about Americans affected by the war.

Butler's father taught theater in Illinois, so he earned a B.A. and M.A. in playwriting during the 1960s, assuming he would become an actor or dramatist. But after graduating in 1969, he anticipated conscription into military duty in Vietnam. He signed up for a position in counterintelligence, reckoning he could stay Stateside. He spent a year learning to speak Vietnamese fluently and in 1971 lived in Bien Ha and Saigon.

Returning to the States, Butler married, divorced, worked at journals and newspapers, remarried, and realized his calling was in fiction, not drama. He began writing novels on the commuter train from Long Island to Manhattan. When he flew to southern Louisiana in 1985 to accept a position as creative writing instructor at McNeese State University, the view from the plane of the wetlands and rice paddies reminded him so much of Vietnam that he moved there at once, and was please to find a thriving community of Vietnamese expatriates.

Because of these events, much of Butler's fiction is concerned with the search for a new home (or a lost one), the sadness of families separated by war and death, relationships between mothers and daughters, fathers and sons.

In Butler's first book, The Alleys of Eden, Clifford Wilkes, an American deserter in Vietnam, shares with lovely Lanh a blissful, passionate affair. The night the Viet Cong surround Saigon, Cliff must decide whether to run for the airlift, whether to bring Lanh with him, or whether to die now rather than risk capture and torture at the hands of the communists. During this night, which comprises the first half of the book, Cliff relives scenes from his past involving separation and loss: the death of his father, the disaffection of his mother, the flight of his best friend to Canada, his divorce. Cliff determines not to abandon Lanh, and they escape Saigon together. However, they cannot restore their happiness in America. With a culture shock too great, the two lovers drift into loneliness toward a hopeless conclusion.

When Cliff recalls his stint as a general infantryman in Alleys, Butler depicts the event that led him to desert. Two of his compatriots in the army were Wilson Hand and Captain David Fleming, the former of whom had been a prisoner of the Viet Cong and the latter his daring rescuer. Their stories comprise the next two novels, Sun Dogs and On Distant Ground.

In Sun Dogs, Wilson works for Royal Petroleum, which sends him from its New York office to Alaska to investigate theft of information. Wilson detests the city, where he feels "dead and buried" in its "clutter." He yearns to stay in the Alaskan outback, with its purity of landscape and stark living conditions. However, like the "sun dogs" Wilson sees in the Alaskan sky—illusory suns formed by atmospheric ice crystals—two horrors dog him: the suicide of his ex-wife and the torture of imprisonment by the Viet Cong. Wilson has an affair with the beautiful, untrustworthy Marta, and becomes friends for life with Clyde, a loyal bush pilot. Butler peels away lies and red herrings, webs of deceit and murderous schemes, to reveal not merely a mystery about corporate greed and reserves of fuel, but an unexpected drama about the fuels that keep the body and spirit alive.

In On Distant Ground, David Fleming is court-martialed for having "aided the enemy." An emotionally aloof man, he had been strangely affected by spying a graffito on a South Vietnamese prison wall: "Hygiene is healthful." The irony and courage of these words speak to him as those written by a kindred soul. Finding the prisoner incarcerated there, a Viet Cong officer named Tuyen, whose name suggests "twin," became an obsession. When at last he tracked Tuyen to a penal colony, he hijacked a helicopter and freed the prisoner. Years later, he is still unable to articulate even to his wife why he did this, and the jury sentences him to a dishonorable discharge.

Even as David and his wife see their first son born, circumstantial evidence convinces David that he also had a son by a Vietnamese woman while serving there. Remembering his own unkind father, he determines to find the boy. With his wife's reluctant compliance, he returns to Vietnam—during the very week that the communists overrun Saigon. While dodging various enemies, he learns the fate of his lover and finds a boy who may be their son. His desperate attempt to get them both out of the country alive culminates in a startling reencounter with Tuyen, who tells David a truth that forces all of his experiences into new perspective.

Countrymen of Bones chronicles the rivalry of an archaeologist, Darrell Reeves, and a military physicist, Lloyd Coulter, against the backdrop of New Mexico on the eve of the first detonation of an atomic weapon at Los Alamos. The subplots involve the Manhattan Project, run by J. Robert Oppenheimer, who provides the theme of the novel with his famous, awestruck, grieving remark: "I am become Death, the shatterer of worlds"; and a love affair between Reeves and Army private Anna Brown. Human failings such as opportunism and unrestrained anger become the shatterers of private worlds in this work.

At his new home in Louisiana, Butler drew upon autobiographical detail again for Wabash. Raised in Granite City, Illinois, Butler had as a teenager worked at a steel plant; his mother had lived there during the Depression years. This novel combines conflicts between the captains of profit (personified by the owner of the Wabash Steel foundry) and the budding communists, between Deborah Cole and her inarticulate, impotent husband Jeremy, and between Deborah's extended family of mother, aunts, and grandmother. As in so many of Butler's novels, the various conflicts parallel and play off each other in ingenious ways.

The Deuce marked a narrative breakthrough for Butler when he chose a first-person voice. The narrator is a teenager who seeks to understand his culture and identity as the son of a South Vietnamese bar girl and of a Vietnam vet who brings him to New Jersey. He used the technique again in A Good Scent from a Strange Mountain.

The fifteen stories therein are told by a war-time translator; an ex-spy in South Vietnam who goes to grotesque, Roald Dahl-esque measures to keep his gorgeous wife sexually faithful; a mother speaking to her unborn child; by Catholics and Buddhists; by the wealthy and the desperate; and in the title story by a saddened, dying old man who hallucinates a visitation by Ho Chi Minh. Some of these stories are slight, with a single, poignant point to make about the human condition. Most work on many levels to gather such themes as love, envy, loneliness, sensuality, miscommunication, hatred, vengefulness, and spiritual redemption into tales about ghosts, reincarnation, and cultural assimilation.

A Good Scent thrust Butler into the international spotlight. Besides the Pulitzer, it earned the Rosenthal Foundation Award from the American Academy of Arts and Letters, the Southern Reviewl Louisiana State University Prize for Short Fiction, a nomination for the PEN/Faulkner Award, and fellowships from the Guggenheim Foundation and the National Endowment for the Arts. Butler's earlier works were reissued, and he was commissioned by the Ixtlan film production company to write a screenplay for the collection. The literary world that had barely noticed Butler could now hardly get enough of him.

Butler next wrote a daring novel about sensuality and sexual relationships, They Whisper. The narrative technique is compelling and marvelous, consisting of a stream-of-consciousness recollection-cum-meditation by thirty-five-year-old Ira Holloway on the beauty and desirability of the women he has known, married, and lusted for. Imagining their thoughts and lives in his contemplation of and paean to the wonders of women, Ira seeks to solve the mystery of sexual yearning.

Two more collections followed: Tabloid Dreams, in which Butler takes inspiration from tabloid headlines, and Coffee, Cigarettes, and A Run in the Park, composed of three Vietnam stories. Butler's next foray into the stranger-in-a-strange-land mode came with Mr. Spaceman, superficially a science fiction novel. The stories of Desi, the humanoid extraterrestrial of the title, and of the twelve people who spend the last week of the twentieth century with him are explicitly modeled on the myths of the New Testament. Desi has been charged by his own race to reveal to humanity the existence of other sentient beings in the universe, and struggles with reluctance and fear when he is taken for the returning Messiah. Butler meditates upon language and its limitations, often to very funny effect, as Desi struggles in his precise and literal way to understand humans.

Butler has said in many interviews that he believes fiction can reveal human experience as universally understandable, that its power lies in connecting readers of all cultures through sensuality and emotion.

-Fiona Kelleghan

C

CALISHER, Hortense

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 20 December 1911. Education: Hunter College High School, New York; Barnard College, New York, A.B. in philosophy 1932. Family: Married 1) H.B. Heffelfinger in 1935, one daughter and one son; 2) Curtis Harnack in 1959. Career: Adjunct professor of English, Barnard College, 1956–57; visiting professor, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1957, 1959-60, Stanford University, California, 1958, Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, New York, 1962, and Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts, 1963-64; writer-in-residence, 1965, and visiting lecturer, 1968, Univeristy of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia; adjunct professor of English, Columbia University, New York, 1968-70 and 1972-73; Clark Lecturer, Scripps College, Claremont, California, 1969; visiting professor, State University of New York, Purchase, 1971–72; Regents' Professor, University of California, Irvine, Spring 1976; visiting writer, Bennington College, Vermont, 1978; Hurst Professor, Washington University, St. Louis, 1979; National Endowment for the Arts Lecturer, Cooper Union, New York, 1983; visiting professor, Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, 1986; guest lecturer, U.S.-China Arts Exchange, Republic of China, 1986. President, PEN, 1986-87; American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters, 1987-90. Lives in New York City. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship, 1952, 1955; Department of State American Specialists grant, 1958; American Academy award, 1967; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1967; Kafka prize, 1987; National Endowment for the Arts Lifetime Achievement award, 1989. Litt.D.: Skidmore College, Saratoga Springs, New York, 1980; Grinnell College, Iowa, 1986; Hofstra University, Hempstead, New York, 1988. Member: American Academy, 1977. Agent: Candida Donadio and Associates, 231 West 22nd Street, New York, New York 10011, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

False Entry. Boston, Little Brown, 1961; London, Secker and Warburg, 1962.

Textures of Life. Boston, Little Brown, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1963.

Journal from Ellipsia. Boston, Little Brown, 1965; London, Secker and Warburg, 1966.

The Railway Police, and The Last Trolley Ride. Boston, Little Brown, 1966.

The New Yorkers. Boston, Little Brown, 1969; London, Cape, 1970. Queenie. New York, Arbor House, 1971; London, W.H. Allen, 1973. Standard Dreaming. New York, Arbor House, 1972.

Eagle Eye. New York, Arbor House, 1973.

On Keeping Women. New York, Arbor House, 1977.

Mysteries of Motion. New York, Doubleday, 1983.

The Bobby-Soxer. New York, Doubleday, 1986.

Age. New York, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1987.

The Small Bang (as Jack Fenno). New York, Random House, 1992. In the Palace of the Movie King. New York, Random House, 1993.

In the Slammer with Carol Smith. New York, Marion Boyars, 1997. The Novellas of Hortense Calisher. New York, Modern Library, 1997.

Short Stories

In the Absence of Angels. Boston, Little Brown, 1951; London, Heinemann, 1953.

Tale for the Mirror: A Novella and Other Stories. Boston, Little Brown, 1962; London, Secker and Warburg, 1963.

Extreme Magic: A Novella and Other Stories. Boston, Little Brown, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1964.

The Collected Stories of Hortense Calisher. New York, Arbor House, 1975.

Saratoga, Hot. New York, Doubleday, 1985.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Gig," Confrontation, 1986.

"The Evershams' Willie," in Southwest Review (Dallas), Summer 1987.

"The Man Who Spat Silver," (novella) in Confrontation (41), Summer/Fall 1989.

"The Nature of the Madhouse," in Story (Cincinnati), Spring 1990.

"The Iron Butterflies," in Southwest Review, Winter 1992.

"Blind Eye, Wrong Foot," in American Short Fiction (10), Summer 1993.

Other

What Novels Are (lecture). Claremont, California, Scripps College, 1969.

Herself (memoir). New York, Arbor House, 1972.

Kissing Cousins: A Memory. New York, Weidenfeld and Nicolson,

Editor, with Shannon Ravenel, The Best American Short Stories 1981. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1981.

*

Critical Studies: In Don't Never Forget by Brigid Brophy, London, Cape, 1966, New York, Holt Rinehart, 1967; article by Cynthia Ozick in Midstream (New York), 1969; "Ego Art: Notes on How I Came to It" by Calisher, in Works in Progress (New York), 1971; article by Kathy Brown in Current Biography (New York), November 1973; interview in Paris Review, Winter 1987; "Three Novels by Hortense Calisher" by Kathleen Snodgrass, in Texas Studies in Literature and Language (Austin), Winter 1989, and The Fiction of Hortense Calisher by Snodgrass, University of Delaware Press, 1994.

Hortense Calisher comments:

(1972) False Entry and The New Yorkers are connected novels; either may be read first; together they are a chronicle perhaps peculiarly American, according to some critics, but with European scope, according to others. Journal from Ellipsia was perhaps one of the first or the first serious American novel to deal with "verbal" man's displacement in a world of the spatial sciences; because it dealt with the possibility of life on other planets it was classed as "science fiction" both in the USA and in England. The Dublin Times understood it; its review does well by it. It also satirizes male-female relationships, by postulating a planet on which things are otherwise. In category, according to some, it is less an ordinary novel than a social satire akin to Erewhon, Gulliver's Travels, Candide, etc. The Railway Police and The Last Trollery Ride—the first is really a long short story of an individual, the second a novella built around an environs, a chorale of persons really, with four main parts, told in the interchanging voice of two men.

I usually find myself alternating a "larger" work with a smaller one, a natural change of pace. Textures of Life, for instance, is an intimate novel, of a young marriage, very personal, as Journal is not. After the latter, as I said in an interview, I wanted to get back to people. The New Yorkers was a conscious return to a "big" novel, done on fairly conventional terms, descriptive, narrative, leisurely, and inclusive, from which the long monologue chapters of the two women are a conscious departure. Its earlier mate, False Entry, has been called the only "metaphysical" novel in the America of its period—I'm not sure what that means, except perhaps that the whole, despite such tangible scenes as the Ku Klux Klan and courtroom episodes, is carried in the "mind" of one man. It has been called Dickensian, and in its plethora of event I suppose it is; yet the use of memory symbols and of psyche might just as well be French (Proust and Gide)—by intent it does both, or joins both ways of narration. The New Yorkers is more tied to its environs in a localized way; part of its subject is the environs.

Queenie is a satire, a farce on our sexual mores, as seen through the eyes of a "modern" young girl. As it is not yet out at this writing, I shall wait to be told what it is about.

(1986) Standard Dreaming: short novel narrated through the consciousness of a surgeon who believes the human race may be in process of dying off. Herself: the autobiography of a writer, rather than of the total life. Included are portions of critical studies, articles, etc., as well as several in toto (including one on the novel and on sex in American literature), and commentary on the writer's role in war, as a feminist, critic and teacher. Eagle Eye: the story of a young American non-combatant during and after the Vietnam War. Just as Queenie, in the novel of that name, confided in her tape-recorder, Bronstein addresses his computer. In 1974 some critics were bemused at this; time has changed that. The Collected Stories: preface by author begins with the much-quoted "A story is an apocalypse, served in a very small cup." On Keeping Women: Herself had broken ground in some of its aspects of what feminists were to term "womanspeak." I was never to be a conventional feminist; conventional thought is not for writers. But I had always wanted to do a novel from within the female feelings I did have from youth, through motherhood and the wish for other creation. This is that book. Mysteries of Motion: as in Journal from Ellipsia I continue concern for the way we live daily with the vast efforts and fruits of the scientists, and the terrors, without much understanding. Begun in 1977, before shuttles had flown or manmade objects had fallen to earth from orbit, this story of the first civilians in space is I believe the first novel of character (rather than so-called "science fiction") to be set in space. Because of that intent, the lives of all six people before they embark are an essential part of the story. What may happen to people, personality—and nations—in the space race, is what I was after. Though I researched minimally—just enough to know the language, or some of it—one critic commented that its technical details could not be faulted. I imagined, rather than tried to be faithful to the momentary fact. And again, time has caught up with it, sadly so in the matter of "star wars." Saratoga, Hot: short works, called "little novels." Writing novels changes the short-story pen—the stories become novelistic, or mine do. The intent was "to give as much background as you can get in a foreground." The Bobby-Soxer: the story of the erotic and professional maturing of a young girl of the 1950s, as narrated by the woman she has become, it is also a legend of American provincial life, akin to the early novellas.

I have just completed a short novel called Age, and am resuming work on a novel set in Central Europe and the United States.

(1991) The working title of the book I refer to above as "a novel set in Central Europe and the United States" is In the Palace of the Movie King. I've been at work on this longer book in the background behind the shorter works that have emerged since the last longer work (Mysteries of Motion). It is certainly a more overtly political novel than any of the others, although that concern has been present in my work since the first stories.

This time the scene is Central Europe versus the U.S., as seen through the eyes of a filmmaker, Russian in origin, who grew up in Japan. Part of my interest has also been to see the U.S. as the visually obsessed nation it has fast become—through the eyes of a man who sees the world visually, rather than verbally. I hope thereby to free the book from what I think of as the de Tocqueville syndrome.

I am currently working on a shorter novel, set in England, where I have lived from time to time.

(1995) The "shorter work," set in England, is the novel, The Small Bang, published psuedonymously under the name Jack Fenno, to distinguish it from the other novel shortly to be published. As its title indicates, it poses the "small" bang that is human life against the "big bang" world views of the physicists. In the publisher's catalogue it is billed as a "mystery;" I wrote it as a novel purely, any novel being in a sense a "mystery" until its end.

On In the Palace of the Movie King: there comes a time for many of us when we feel seriously separated from the international intrigue that is happening all around us—and from the national picture also. Yet our domestic lives, urban or suburban or land-based, are always on that edge. I came to feel that I ought to be writing of what I thought of as "the long adventure"—that panorama, with documents, which would move through what we've been too trained to think of as the "thriller" novel. At the same time I must unite this with the domestic scene.

That's a nineteenth-century ambition, from the books I cut my teeth on: Dickens, Victor Hugo, Mark Twain, and in my teens, the Russians. I miss their scope—if not necessarily their size. A sentence can embody the long view. But a novel so conceived will concentrate along that axis. What will the reader allow me to do for our twentieth century time? Meanwhile—my century feeding me what I ought to be seeing—in both the subtle and monumental. I was seeing the whole metaphor of "the third world." Censorship, yes, torture for the dissident, death because one differs. But the crux of it: they—the citizens of that third world I happen to know best, Middle Europe—they were locked in. My country was not. Is not.

The Gonchevs, the couple I wrote about, emerged through those mists, along with a vision of the whole wide-screen planet we are now. The time is just before that savage Balkan conflict we are now witnessing. When Gonchev, an apolitical man entirely, is shipped to the U.S.A. and cast in the role of ''dissident,'' my own land emerges, as seen through his eyes. One strains like the devil not to be ''author,'' authoring. There the emigrants and transcontinentals I've known all my life surely helped.

At times Gonchev's story is taken to be satirical, even hilarious. That's a relief.

* * *

Many readers first encounter Hortense Calisher through her widely anthologized short stories, then anticipate her novels. After reading them, however, they may come away vaguely unsatisfied though seldom quite dissatisfied. She is too gifted a writer for that.

It seems impossible for Calisher to write poorly: she is a master of language. Precise, powerful verbs give scenes life and immediacy. In "The Woman Who Was Everybody" an overqualified department store employee reluctantly faces the day: "She swung sideways out of bed, clamped her feet on the floor, rose and trundled to the bathroom, the kitchenette." Calisher's imagery is bountiful, original, and appropriate. In the same story, "the mornings crept in like applicants for jobs." Equal to language, Calisher has evidently observed and experienced how truth is revealed in the course of living and can reconstruct these epiphanies readily in characters.

Then why, since hers are among the best American short stories of this century, are Calisher's novels less successful? At least two reasons are likely. One is that it is impossible to sustain in the long form the power she packs into the short form. The small cast, limited setting, single problem of the short story let her build the work to a final revelation which suggests that, for better or worse, a life will never be quite the same again. This is the classic short story.

Calisher novels often merely elongate the story format. Substituting for traditional plot and subplot, there are series of revelations related to the central situation. (A young couple disclose aspects of themselves as they cope with an ill child in Textures of Life. Another couple, from the novella Saratoga, Hot actually reveal more about their horsey social set than themselves.) Whether the reader can sustain interest in longer works whose internal logic is random and whose continuity needs occasional propulsion by fortuitous revelation is a question. Certainly that does work in The New Yorkers often called her most successful novel, an indulgent insight into family life. Ill-advised timing and treatment may have undercut Calisher's satirical novel, Queenie. The late 1960s were not laughing times and for many the new sexual freedom which Queenie fumbles toward was no laughing matter. What may be her least successful novel, Mysteries of Motion, distracts as much as discloses since six lives are revealed, and on a space journey at that. Better a bus ride in Brooklyn.

That more modest approach to setting is exactly what makes her short stories seem instantly relevant to our ordinary lives, that and the fact that each story—however brief—is also a life history of sorts. Calisher examines that life at a time of crisis and the reader comes away instructed in valuable experience. In the classic "One of the Chosen" a successful Jewish lawyer, Davy Spanner, always popular in his college days, has believed lifelong that he never needed the support of fraternity life and had comfortably rejected the early overtures of the campus societies. At a class reunion, a gentile classmate blurts out the unsettling truth that Spanner would never have been offered a serious membership bid.

Calisher's long interest in psychology and the supernatural is evident. Her life spans Freudianism and beyond, but psychology—eclectic and non-systematic—as it appears in her work at times is close to fantasy, at other times follows accepted dogma. "Heartburn" centers on the power of suggestion; "The Scream on 57th Street" treats fear. Both "work" just as her general grasp of family relationships seems valid, however it was acquired. On the other hand, Standard Dreaming, Calisher's unfortunate excursion into a dream world of searching characters, could be taken for a parody of surrealism.

Calisher's short stories and novellas may initially appear to be peopled by fully-rounded characters, but an overview of the stories reveals a high proportion of well-done types: the educated misfit, the eccentric family member, the young innocent, the at-odds mother-daughter (or husband-wife), the displaced southerner, the would-be radical. And type is all they need to be since hers are not primarily stories of character, but of complex situation, the result of long processes of cause and effect told in hints and subtleties. Where the Calisher protagonists have been, are now, and where they are probably going—or not going, depending on their revelations—is their story. Exactly who they are is incidental. Their external descriptions are often vivid, even witty, but their tastes and temperaments are revealed only to the degree that they serve the tale. If we flesh them out ourselves, it is a tribute to their creator's ability to write so that we read creatively.

The Collected Stories of Hortense Calisher, an enduring treasury of major works in her best genre, allows ready comparison of early and late works and reveals the consistency of Calisher's vision, even such traits as a vein of humor, a thread of the absurd, and a persistent interest in the power of the mind to direct fate. Similarly, The Novellas of Hortense Calisher gave readers an opportunity to savor some old treasures—Tale for the Mirror, Extreme Magic, Saratoga, Hot, The Man Who Spat Silver, The Railway Police, and The Last Trolley Ride—along with the previously unpublished Women Men Don't Talk About. Also in the late 1990s, Calisher published Age, an epistolary novel centering on Gemma, an architect, and Robert, four years her junior. She also produced In the Slammer with Carol Smith, whose title character has just been released from prison after a long sentence. Carol's imprisonment was not the result of a crime she actually committed, but rather the outcome of being at the wrong place at the wrong time—or more specifically, a poor black woman who fell in with wealthy white revolutionaries during the early 1970s.

Calisher is an eminently serious and concerned writer, despite the fatuous, the incompetents, the ditsy relatives, and the rattled authority figures who clamor for their share of attention in her works. Their truths are as true as anyone else's, Calisher suggests, and their numbers among us may be greater than we want to believe.

-Marian Pehowski

CALLOW, Philip (Kenneth)

Nationality: British. Born: Birmingham, 26 October 1924. Education: Coventry Technical College, 1937–39; St. Luke's College, Exeter, Devon, 1968–70, Teacher's Certificate 1970. Family: Married Anne Jennifer Golby in 1987 (third marriage); one daughter from previous marriage. Career: Engineering apprentice and toolmaker, Coventry Gauge and Tool Company, 1940–48; clerk, Ministry of Works and Minstry of Supply, 1949–51; clerical assistant, South West Electricity Board, Plymouth, 1951–66; Arts Council fellow, Falmouth School of Art, 1977–78; Creative Writing fellow, Open University, 1979; writer-in-residence, Sheffield City Polytechnic, 1980–82. Awards: Arts Council bursary, 1966, 1970, 1973, 1979; Society of Authors traveling scholarship, 1973; C. Day Lewis fellowship, 1973; Southern Arts Association fellowship, 1974. Agent: John Johnson Ltd., 45–47 Clerkenwell Green, London EC1R 0HT, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Hosanna Man. London, Cape, 1956.

Common People. London, Heinemann, 1958.

A Pledge for the Earth. London, Heinemann, 1960.

Clipped Wings. Douglas, Isle of Man, Times Press, 1964.

Another Flesh. London, Allison and Busby, 1989.

Going to the Moon. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1968.

The Bliss Body. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1969.

Flesh of Morning. London, Bodley Head, 1971.

Yours. London, Bodley Head, 1972.

The Story of My Desire. London, Bodley Head, 1976.

Janine. London, Bodley Head, 1977.

The Subway to New York. London, Martin Brian and O'Keeffe, 1979.

The Painter's Confessions. London, Allison and Busby, 1989.

Short Stories

Native Ground. London, Heinemann, 1959. Woman with a Poet. Bradford, Yorkshire, Rivelin Press, 1983.

Some Love. London, Allison and Busby, 1991.

The Magnolia. London, Allison and Busby, 1994.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Merry Christmas," in New Statesman (London), 22 December 1961.

Plays

The Honeymooners (televised 1960). Published in New Granada Plays, London, Faber, 1961.

Radio Plays: The Lamb, 1971; On Some Road, 1979.

Television Play: The Honeymooners, 1960.

Poetry

Turning Point. London, Heinemann, 1964.

The Real Life: New Poems. Douglas, Isle of Man, Times Press, 1964. Bare Wires. London, Chatto and Windus-Hogarth Press, 1972. Cave Light. Bradford, Yorkshire, Rivelin Press, 1981.

New York Insomnia and Other Poems. Bradford, Yorkshire, Rivelin Grapheme Press, 1984.

Icons. Bradford, Yorkshire, Blue Bridge Press, 1987.

Soliloquies of an Eye. Todmorden, Lancashire, Littlewood Press, 1990.

Notes over a Chasm. Bradford, Yorkshire, Redbeck Press, 1991. Fires in October. Bradford, Yorkshire, Redbeck Press, 1994.

Other

In My Own Land, photographs by James Bridgen. Douglas, Isle of Man, Times Press, 1965.

Son and Lover: The Young D.H. Lawrence. London, Bodley Head, and New York, Stein and Day, 1975.

Van Gogh: A Life. London, Allison and Busby, and Chicago, Dee, 1990.

From Noon to Starry Night: A Life of Walt Whitman. London, Allison and Busby, and Chicago, Dee, 1992.

Lost Earth: A Life of Cezanne. Chicago, Ivan R. Dee, 1995.

Chekhov: The Hidden Ground: A Biography. Chicago, Ivan R. Dee, 1998.

*

Manuscript Collection: University of Texas Library, Austin.

Critical Study: By Callow in Vogue (New York), 1 September 1969.

Philip Callow comments:

(1991) All my writing up to now has been autobiographical in style and content. My aim has simply been to tell the story of my life as truthfully as possible. In fact, this is impossible, and in the attempt to do so one discovers that another, spiritual, autobiography is taking shape. I now realize that by devising a narrative about total strangers based on events reported in a newspaper I reveal myself as nakedly as in a personal confession. Perhaps more so.

* * *

In all his earlier work Philip Callow is telling the same story—his life story. His "autobiography," In My Own Land, confirms a close approximation between himself and the "I" of the novels and the short stories in Native Ground. In his earliest novels he was seeking an idiom, which he found triumphantly in the freewheeling colloquialism of the trilogy Going to the Moon, The Bliss Body, and Flesh of Morning.

Callow's material is his working-class adolescence in the midlands, the experience of factory and clerical work there and in the west country, his artistic leanings and adult relationships. Louis Paul, Nicky Chapman, and Alan Lowry, the narrators respectively of The Hosanna Man, Common People, and Clipped Wings, and Martin Satchwell, the central character of A Pledge for the Earth, are prototypes for the Colin Patten of the trilogy, and its sequel The Story of My Desire, when Patten has qualified as a teacher. Parallels exist in the earliest books for the trilogy's other important characters, while in subsequent work the lecturer David Lowry, the central figure in Janine, and the poet and writer-in-residence Jacob Raby, the narrator of The Subway to New York, recall Patten.

Callow gives a full account of adolescence, describing the development of sexuality—more freely in the later books—as the boy grows up at the end of the war when "there was a ration even on questions." Then he has to adjust to life on the factory floor. Patten's painting and writing lead him into provincial artistic circles, amateur or bohemian and anarchic—the "city nomads." Callow's outstanding portrayal is Jack Kelvin, "the hosanna man" himself, a drop-out like Albert Dyer in Clipped Wings, who "sits up on a cliff like a dirty old monk;" in Common People there is the drunken Sunday painter,

Cecil Luce, leader of the "Birmingham Twelve." With the public poetry readings by the "Callow-figure" Jacob Raby in The Subway to New York (and the painter Breakwell's fame in The Painter's Confessions), the wheel has come full circle.

A Pledge for the Earth was the earliest of Callow's third-person novels. The most overtly structured of his novels, it describes two generations of Satchwells in a framework of natural imagery, and culminates in 20-odd pages in the first person written by Martin Satchwell. In Clipped Wings Callow returned to first-person narration: "I decided that the only way is to plant yourself down in the very center of things, and then set out. In the same railway carriage, with all the others." With its new forceful, colloquial idiom, Clipped Wings is the key book in Callow's stylistic development, and made possible the trilogy. At the same time, he had begun to publish a good deal of poetry, which perhaps cross-fertilized his prose.

In the trilogy Callow ranged over his experiences freely with only a rough chronological surge onward: "Going back is pure instinct with me." The rationale of his method is in a sense anti-art: "Who believes in a book cut away from its writer with surgical scissors? I don't, I never did. I don't believe in fact and fiction, I don't believe in autobiography, poetry, philosophy, I don't believe in chapters, in a story." Callow's refusal to categorize is also embodied in his non-fiction In My Own Land, differentiated from his novels only by the use of real names.

Yours is an extended letter written by a young girl to her exlover, recalling that first unhappy love affair. In The Story of My Desire Callow continued the trilogy, with Colin's affair with the married Lucy, both cause and effect of the breakdown of his own marriage, in turn inextricably linked in a nexus of guilt with his mental breakdown. Janine describes the middle-aged David Lowry's relationship with the mixed-up young girl of the title. It is written in the third person, and from the opening sentence, "His name was Lowry," the man is referred to throughout by surname. Until a key moment late in the novel, Janine never calls David by name, so that the third-person narration has an active structural role.

The structural rationale in The Subway to New York is circular: "always with a woman you go in circles." Thus Marjorie of The Story of My Desire, already resurrected as Kate in Janine, reappears as Carmel in The Subway to New York, and Lucy of The Story of My Desire is Nell in Subway.

Callow's return to fiction after a break of 10 years (apart from the small-press short story collection Woman with a Poet) seems less directly autobiographical, though the subject matter of The Painter's Confessions enables him to explore how an artist—in the broad sense—uses his experience. The painter Francis Breakwell's "confessions" begin "Even before my sister's violent death I had felt this urge to use words, to tell a story that would be my own, yet irradiated in some way by hers." The narrative moves forward to her drowning, through her love for the unbalanced Celia. The central figure in Breakwell's life is his former mistress and model, Maggie, with whom he remains tenuously in touch. His marriage disintegrates through the novel but his American wife seems peripheral beside Maggie's presence from the past. As a contemporary painter aged 50, Breakwell seems unrealistically successful given his predominant old-fashioned abstract expressionism. Inevitably, Patrick White's classic The Vivisector casts a long shadow over any novel about a painter but especially here given Breakwell's expressionism.

There are lacunae in The Painter's Confessions but the rambling reminiscence form could be held to justify loose ends. The structure is more problematic in Some Love, a moving third-person novel about the under-privileged Johnnie, who, after time in a children's home, gets involved as a minor in an affair with Tina, a younger friend of his mentally unstable mother. Initially, the viewpoint is mainly Johnnie's, but, with the emergence of Tina midway as a major character, the viewpoint switches predominantly to her, with no apparent rationale. Callow's often unstructured way of writing becomes more difficult when it is not applied to the solid corpus of autobiographical fact. However, Callow is too good a writer for that decade's silence not to be our loss.

In the 1990s, Callow published Some Love and The Magnolia, but he turned his attention increasingly to nonfiction, producing biographies of Van Gogh, Walt Whitman, Cezanne, and Chekhov.

—Val Warner

CALVIN, Henry

See HANLEY, Clifford (Leonard Clark)

CAMPBELL, Marion (May)

Nationality: Australian. Born: Sydney, 25 December 1948. Address: 45 Arkwell Street, Willagee, Western Australia 6156, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Lines of Flight. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1985.

Not Being Miriam. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1989.

Prowler. South Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1999.

* * *

Marion Campbell is one of Australia's most powerful intellectual and postmodern writers and has an impressive reputation on the basis of three novels. Her first novel, Lines of Flight, is a work of luminous and startling intelligence, both elegant and playful. Through rival narrative modes, it is the story of Rita Finnerty, a young Australian artist in France, struggling to create a career, but struggling also to break free of the cloisters of other peoples' lives. Splinter scenes of her childhood and her early compositions emerge through the notion of cumulo-nimbus formations, but in France, amid emotional and artistic upheaval, the notion of lignes de fuite prevails, obedience to perspective and the lines of flight which taper to disappearance point.

Rita's involvement with Raymond, the entrepreneurial gay semiotician, and his two students, Gerard and Sebastien, becomes a locus of postmodern dissent and denial. Internal pressures in Rita's private world implode and the language too becomes implosive, yet the form of the novel remains precise, elegant, baroque. Campbell draws on spatial structures, such as framing and tripytch to cross the lines between art and self, between rival determinations of event, word, imagination, and vision. The development of Rita's painting in France and the sharp satire of the Australian art scene on her return to Australia, her disappearance even, are occasions of profound visual and spatial luminosity, her prose extraordinarily energetic and intellectually rich.

The novel is both witty and ludic, the scenes in France often droll, but beneath that surface there is a profound intellectual quest and a struggle to find in painting and in language areas of self-determination without confinement to the interstices of others' lives. Her writing is marked by the precision of elusive and complex notions and forms of trespass from the definitions and determinations of others. Campbell writes with ... wild vertigo, intoxication of turning on my own axis in freed space. In a long greedy scrutiny of space from that pinnacle, I would see that crazy queue of arbitrarily fused selves, oh yes, from moments past recede, I would pluralize and scatter on horizons ebbing into horizons ....

Narrative shifts and tilts with concentric planes, emanations, absences, default, space vacated, searching out the sacred, transgressing boundaries, as if the prose is on an inner spiral, measuring the space of self which defines and confines.

Prowler, published in 1999, has a similar spatial construct playing over reversals of perspective and the sides of mirror and glass, again with tense and intense pressures of trespass and self-determination.

Her second novel, 1989's Not Being Miriam, is about the "danger of certainty." In its composition of shifting frames about the tendencies of things, the world is "a tissue of complicated events only tending to occur." It is a fiercely celebratory vision, in which Campbell's remarkable energies and intelligence play across the intense inner dialogue of three women.

Through the interlocking stories of the three women, whose lives overlap, Campbell weaves a tapestry of lives compressed and defined by default. It is first the story of Bess, her childhood and her teaching life and her young son taken by the father to Italy, then her world as a middle-aged single woman. Through her sense of chaos and dissolution, of possibilities shrinking all around her, there is a quest for the center of gravity. When her own life palls and seems uninhabitable, she enters and enacts other lives, playing out putative selves, in her theater of masks.

Bess's story overlaps with that of Lydia from childhood in Nazi Germany to her adult life married to Harry; and the life of Elsie, Bess's working-class neighbor and the second wife of Roger, haunted by the presence of the first wife, the late Miriam, whose image is treasured openly by Roger. The women come together in the absence of Miriam, who stands as the figure of reference. Through Bess, Elsie and Lydia, Campbell conjures numerous images of woman. Each one is shadowed by antecedent figures: for Bess, Ariadne; for Elsie the second Mrs. de Winter from Rebecca; and for Lydia, Katerina Kepler, Johannes Kepler's mother, "the last musician of the spheres." One of the most remarkable sequences is about Katerina Kepler, suspected of witchcraft and doomed. Her voice plays out many of the notions of women caught in the ellipses of male lives.

The novel has a series of interesting structures, with filigree lines of narrative, a labyrinth of voices and threads which lock together in one startling moment. In the climactic courtroom sequence, Bess is charged with manslaughter. Amid voices of gossip and condemnation, where every gesture of the self, past and present, is suspect, there are echoes of the charges against Lindy Chamberlain in the notorious Australian case which ran through the 1980s. As Bess feels the collapse of the past, the collapse of all her rival selves, the condemnation of Bess becomes a dark enclosure, as if she is trapped in the ellipses of the other, reduced to a figure of others' purposes, a player in a collective script.

Through themes of mechanistic and quantum physics, Campbell explores the causal links which tended towards this effect, seeking the rip, the breach in the fabric of things. Amid narrative modes of theater and script, of acting out roles and guises of the self, literary and mythological references abound, from the prophecies of Cassandra, to impassioned writing about Ariadne and Theseus, or to the sisters in Genet's The Maids, with Bess forever playing out 'this maid's revolt.' Not Being Miriam is a bold and prismatic novel, in which voices spar in the deepest recesses of the self, while the narrative weaves in and out of the lives of women in a montage of voices. The prose is rich and crystalline, full of resonances and summonings of historical and mythological, literary and classical antecedents.

-Helen Daniel

CANNON, Curt

See HUNTER, Evan

CAREY, Peter (Philip)

Nationality: Australian. Born: Bacchus Marsh, Victoria, 7 May 1943. Education: Geelong Grammar School; Monash University, Clayton, Victoria, 1961. Family: Married 1) Leigh Weetman; 2) Alison Summers in 1985, one son. Career: Worked in advertising in Australia, 1962–68 and after 1970, and in London, 1968–70; partner, McSpedden Carey Advertising Consultants, Chippendale, New South Wales, until 1988. Currently teacher, New York University and Princeton University. Lives in New York. Awards: New South Wales Premier's award, 1980, 1982; Miles Franklin award, 1981; National Book Council award, 1982, 1986; Australian Film Institute award, for screenplay, 1985; The Age Book of the Year award, 1985, 1994; Booker prize, 1988; Commonwealth Prize for best novel, 1998. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature. Agent: International Creative Management, 40 W. 57th St., New York, New York 10019, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Bliss. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, London, Faber, and New York, Harper, 1981.

Illywhacker. London, Faber, and New York, Harper, 1985.

Oscar and Lucinda. London, Faber, and New York, Harper, 1988. The Tax Inspector. London, Faber, and New York, Knopf, 1992.

The Unusual Life of Tristan Smith. London, Faber, and New York,

Knopf, 1995. The Big Bazoohley. New York, Henry Holt, 1995.

Jack Maggs. St. Lucia, Australia, University of Queensland Press, 1997; New York, Knopf, 1998.

Short Stories

The Fat Man in History. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1974; London, Faber, and New York, Random House, 1980; as Exotic Pleasures, London, Pan, 1981.

War Crimes. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1979.
Collected Stories. St. Lucia, Australia, University of Queensland Press, 1994.

A Letter to Our Son. St. Lucia, Australia, University of Queensland Press, 1994.

Plays

Screenplay: Bliss: The Screenplay, with Ray Lawrence, St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1986; as Bliss: The Film, London, Faber, 1986.

* * *

Peter Carey's short story collections The Fat Man in History and War Crimes established his reputation as one of Australia's most skilled and innovative writers of short fiction. His stories break away from the Australian tradition of realism as he experiments with surrealism, fantasy, cartoon characterization, and the "tall tale." In the often-anthologized story "Peeling," for example, when an old man's fantasies about his neighbor begin to come to fruition, he realizes that the fantasy is more appealing than the woman herself. She is left, after he has undressed her of her layers of clothing, with her flesh unzipped and peeled away. Thereafter, "with each touch she is dismembered, slowly, limb by limb." In "American Dream," a less fantastic but no less disturbing story, a replica of a small town in miniature, complete with townspeople and their secrets, becomes the vehicle for a poignant criticism of both provincialism and tourism.

In his novels Carey never seems afraid to play with the kind of experimentation associated with postmodernist writing or to be scathing in his social criticism. While no two Peter Carey novels look alike, they all share his fascination with the juxtaposition of the disturbing, the nightmarish, and the unexpected with the mundane and the real. Readers frequently compare Carey's work with that of Gabriel Garcia Marquez, Salman Rushdie, Robert Kroetsch, and Murray Bail. Although Carey himself is "wary" of being labeled a magic realist, his work has often been cited as exemplary of the form in a postcolonial context.

Carey's tendency to write past the limits of expectation in his short stories is expanded in his novels. His stories and novels are thematically linked through a concern with contemporary social systems, the politics of everyday life, the oppressive remnants of colonialism, and consumer exploitation. Carey's first published novel, Bliss, displays a particularly sharp critique of the effects of capitalism. He relies on a combination of Juvenalian satire and metafiction to highlight both personal and corporate corruption. This is the sad-butfunny story of an advertising executive, Harry Joy, who suffers a near-fatal heart attack and revives with a radically different perception of reality. Upon recovery he believes that he is in Hell. It is through the theme of cancer (caused by the food additives in a product advertised by Harry's company) that Carey most forcefully links the capitalism represented by the advertising world and the deterioration of society into Hell. Harry's savior from this dystopian world is Honey Barbara, "pantheist, healer, whore," with whom he escapes into a forest commune to spend his life planting trees and raising bees. The novel ends on a utopian note with the soul and blue essence of the dead Harry Joy being absorbed into a tree he planted 30 years earlier. Although the celebratory nature of the ending has been read by critics as providing too much of a cancellation of the sharp satiric criticism of the majority of the novel, Carey claims that it was not his intention to provide anything but a "temporary escape from a terminal future."

Such a "terminal future" is evident in Illywhacker, the story of the 139-year-old Herbert Badgery, the illywhacker or trickster/spieler hero-narrator of the title. Although Carey frequently plays with Australian myths in order to debunk them in his writing, such play reaches a crescendo in this novel. The stories of Badgery's life, and the lives of his son and grandson, provide a parallel history to the stories of Australia. The epigraph from Mark Twain points to the premise of the novel: "Australian history ... does not read like history, but like the most beautiful lies; and all of a fresh sort, no moldy stale ones." The central lies of Australian history exposed in the novel are the notion of pre-colonial Australia as terra nullis, the denial of a reliance on American interests in the economy (illustrated in the form of General Motors' "Australia's Own Car"), and the idea that Australians are free, proud, independent, and anti-authoritarian. The final third of the novel details the development of the Best Pet Shop in the World, which is clearly a metaphor for the increasing commercialization of Australian flora, fauna, and people. What begins as a celebration of "pure Australiana" ends as a grotesque exhibition of Australians themselves (including most of the surviving central characters). Again, Carey's exaggerated realism exposes the horrors of capitalism. Illywhacker celebrates the indomitable spirit of pioneers like Badgery, yet it also exposes flaws in the nation and culture they helped to create.

Carey's Booker Prize-winning third novel, Oscar and Lucinda, continues his fascination with the stories of Australian history. Set in the nineteenth century, the story follows the lives of Oscar, an "Odd Bod'' English Anglican minister who chooses to emigrate to New South Wales as punishment for his gambling addiction, and Lucinda, an heiress who champions women's rights, owns a glass factory, and is a compulsive gambler herself. Narrated by Oscar's great-grandson in contemporary Australia, 1985, the novel is the story of how, 120 years earlier, Oscar and Lucinda come together in their addictions but not in their love. It is also a story that Woodcock notes "reveals the brutal cultural expropriation" of the land "with disturbing violence." Carey weaves the love story into the commentary on aboriginal cultural genocide in the final sections of the novel as Oscar travels with a glass church through the Outback. In the style of historiographic metafiction, Kumbaingiri Billy, an aboriginal storyteller, tells an alternative version of history when he tells of Oscar's visit in the tale of how "Jesus come to Belligen long time ago." Carey presents facts about the settling of Australia in a self-reflexive narrative structured around a series of seemingly unconnected episodes. Oscar and Lucinda is, therefore, both a story about storytelling and a story about the fictionality and arbitrariness of history. Carey's narrative rings with verisimilitudinous historical detail. It transports the reader to nineteenth-century Epsom Downs, Darling Harbour, and rural New South Wales. Oscar and Lucinda is thought by many readers to be Carey's most technically and narratively complete novel.

In a dramatic shift into the present, Carey's next novel, The Tax Inspector, is an unsettling portrait of urban social and moral decay in the 1990s. The novel follows the Catchprice family through the four days their family motor business is under investigation by a government tax inspector. In those four days we are witness, in an almost cinematic style, to the nightmarish lives of the caricatured members of the Catchprice clan. (The cinematic pace of the novel is perhaps because Carey was writing this novel at the same time as he was working on Until the End of the World, a film he co-wrote with Wim Wenders.) One of the most disturbing themes in the novel is that of incest and sexual abuse. This metaphor of moral degeneration is set beside the ideals of social reparation represented by the tax inspector.

While The Tax Inspector is a non-linear, hyper-realist novel relying on flashbacks and immediate narration, The Unusual Life of Tristan Smith signals a return to the fantastic nature of Carey's earlier short story writing. This futuristic, dystopian, picaresque novel, narrated by Tristan Smith, the physically deformed son of an actress and three fathers, is set in the small inconsequential nation of Efica ("so unimportant that you are already confusing the name with Ithaca or Africa") and the overpowering and ruthless nation of Voorstand. The high-tech capitalist Voorstand Sirkus is juxtaposed with the morally and culturally idealist agit-prop theater group of Tristan's mother. Perhaps Carey's most overtly postcolonial novel, The Unusual Life of Tristan Smith is a complex allegory of colonialism. As a migrant narrator, Tristan can champion the culture and values of the colonized land even as he seeks salvation in the anonymity available to him in the overwhelming cultural imperialism of Voorstand.

In Jack Maggs Carey returns to early Victorian England, but it is a bleaker nation than in Oscar and Lucinda. The title character is a convict illegally returned to London from New South Wales in search of the young gentleman, Henry Phipps, he has made wealthy. As the novel "writes back" to Charles Dickens's Great Expectations, Carey compellingly recreates the gray, foggy, crowded nature of Dickensian London complete with devoted footmen, adulterous authors, and expert young silver thieves. Through the use of hypnosis, Tobias Oates, a young novelist-journalist whose sketches of London riffraff have made him a celebrity, unveils the secrets of Jack's past as he steals his story, the story of the Criminal Mind. Jack Maggs is the most overtly metafictional of Carey's novels. The biographic novel that Oates is writing about Jack Maggs is fittingly called Jack Maggs. In its use of postmodern hyperbole and untruths, this version of Jack Maggs contradicts the version that we are reading. As we see the unreliability of Oates's narrative, the unreliability of Carey's narrative is also, implicitly, called into question. In a sense, Carey is returning to the idea of questioning the lies of history he highlighted in both Illywhacker and Oscar and Lucinda.

Carey is one of the most important figures in recent Australian literature. He has consistently been at the forefront of literary experimentation in his use of form and at the forefront of cultural criticism in the themes he has chosen. Carey's work is certainly central in the growing canon of world literature written in English.

—Laura Moss

CASSILL, R(onald) V(erlin)

Nationality: American. Born: Cedar Falls, Iowa, 17 May 1919. Education: The University of Iowa, Iowa City, B.A. 1939 (Phi Beta Kappa), M.A. 1947; the Sorbonne, Paris (Fulbright fellow), 1952–53. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1942–46: Lieutenant. Family: Married Karilyn Kay Adams in 1956; three children. Career: Instructor, University of Iowa, 1948–52; editor, Western Review, Iowa City, 1951–52, Colliers' Encyclopedia, New York, 1953–54, and Dude and Gent, New York, 1958; lecturer, Columbia University and New School for Social Research, both New York, 1957–59, and University of Iowa, 1960–65; writer-in-residence, Purdue University, West Lafayette, Indiana, 1965–66. Associate professor, 1966–71, and professor of English, 1972–83, Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island; now emeritus. U.S. Information Service lecturer in Europe, 1975–76. Painter and lithographer: exhibitions—John Snowden Gallery, Chicago, 1946; Eleanor Smith Galleries, Chicago, 1948; Wickersham Gallery, New York, 1970. Awards: Atlantic "Firsts" prize, for short story, 1947; Rockefeller grant, 1954; Guggenheim grant, 1968. Agent: Candida Donadio and Associates, 231 West 22nd Street, New York, New York 10011. Address: 22 Boylston Avenue, Providence, Rhode Island 02906, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Eagle on the Coin. New York, Random House, 1950.

Dormitory Women. New York, Lion, 1953.

The Left Bank of Desire, with Eric Protter. New York, Ace, 1955.

A Taste of Sin. New York, Ace, 1955; London, Digit, 1959.

The Hungering Shame. New York, Avon, 1956.

The Wound of Love. New York, Avon, 1956.

An Affair to Remember (novelization of screenplay; as Owen Aherne).New York, Avon, 1957.

Naked Morning. New York, Avon, 1957.

Man on Fire (novelization of screenplay; as Owen Aherne). New York, Avon, 1957.

The Buccaneer (novelization of screenplay). New York, Fawcett, 1958.

Lustful Summer. New York, Avon, 1958.

Nurses' Quarters. New York, Fawcett, 1958; London, Muller, 1962.The Tempest (novelization of screenplay). New York, Fawcett, 1959.The Wife Next Door. New York, Fawcett, 1959; London, Muller, 1960.

Clem Anderson. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1960.

My Sister's Keeper. New York, Avon, 1961.

Night School. New York, New American Library, 1961.

Pretty Leslie. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1963; London, Muller, 1964

The President. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1964.

La Vie Passionée of Rodney Buckthorne: A Tale of the Great American's Last Rally and Curious Death. New York, Geis, 1968.

Doctor Cobb's Game. New York, Bantam, 1969.

The Goss Women. New York, Doubleday, 1974; London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1975.

Hoyt's Child. New York, Doubleday, 1976.

Labors of Love. New York, Arbor House, 1980.

Flame. New York, Arbor House, 1980.

After Goliath. New York, Ticknor and Fields, 1985.

The Unknown Soldier. Montrose, Alabama, Texas Center for Writers Press, 1991.

Short Stories

15 x 3, with Herbert Gold and James B. Hall. New York, New Directions, 1957.

The Father and Other Stories. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1965.

The Happy Marriage and Other Stories. West Lafayette, Indiana, Purdue University Press, 1967.

Three Stories. Oakland, California, Hermes House Press, 1982. Patrimonies. Bristol, Rhode Island, Ampersand Press, 1988. Collected Stories. Fayetteville, University of Arkansas Press, 1989.

Other

The General Said "Nuts." New York, Birk, 1955.

Writing Fiction. New York, Pocket Books, 1963; revised edition, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, Prentice Hall, 1975.

In an Iron Time: Statements and Reiterations: Essays. West Lafayette, Indiana, Purdue University Press, 1967.

Editor, Intro 1–3. New York, Bantam, 3 vols., 1968–1970.

Editor, with Walton Beacham, Intro 4. Charlottesville, University Press of Virginia, 1972.

Editor, Norton Anthology of Short Fiction. New York, Norton, 1978; revised edition, 1981, 1985, 1989, 1994, 1995, 2000.

Editor, Norton Anthology of Contemporary Fiction. New York, Norton, 1988; (with Joyce Carol Oates), 1998.

*

Manuscript Collection: Mugar Memorial Library, Boston University.

Critical Studies: "R.V. Cassill Issue" of December (Chicago), vol. 23, nos. 1–2, 1981 (includes bibliography).

R.V. Cassill comments:

(1972) My most personal statement is probably to be found in my short stories. If few of them are reliably autobiographical at least they grew from the observations, moods, exultations, and agonies of early years. If there is constant pattern in them, it is probably that of a hopeful being who expects evil and finds worse.

From my first novel onward I have explored the correspondences between the interior world—of desire and anxiety—and the public world of power—extra-social violences and politics. In The Eagle on the Coin I wrote of the ill-fated attempt of some alienated liberals, including a compassionate homosexual, to elect a Negro to the schoolboard in a small midwestern city. In Doctor Cobb's Game I used the silhouette of a major British political scandal as the area within which I composed an elaborate pattern of occult-sexualpolitical forces weaving and unweaving. Between these two novels, almost 20 years apart, I have played with a variety of forms and subject matter, but the focus of concern has probably been the same, under the surface of appearances. In Clem Anderson I took the silhouette of Dylan Thomas's life and within that composed the story of an American poet's self-destructive triumph. It probably is and always will be my most embattled work, simply because in its considerable extent it replaces most of the comfortable or profitable clichés about an artist's life with tougher and more painful diagrams.

But then perhaps my whole productive life has been a swimming against the tide. A midwesterner by origin, and no doubt by temperament and experience, I worked through decades when first the southern and then the urban-Jewish novel held an almost monopolistic grip on the tastes and prejudices of American readers. In my extensive reviewing and lecturing I have tried more to examine the clichés, slogans, and rallying cries of the time than to oppose or espouse them—thus leaving myself without any visible partisan support from any quarter. To radicals I have appeared a conservative, to conservatives a radical—and to both a mystification or, I suppose, I would not have been tolerated as long as I have been. As I grow older I love the commonplace of traditional thought and expression with a growing fervor, especially as their rarity increases amid the indoctrinating forces that spoil our good lives.

* * *

From the first novel, The Eagle on the Coin, and the early stories, R.V. Cassill's art shows a steady development from the autobiographical and the imitative to the fully dramatic capabilities of the mature novelist and short story writer. The range of his talent is wide: from near-pastoral impressions of midwestern America, to urban life in Chicago and New York, to his most technically accomplished work, Doctor Cobb's Game, based on the Profumo scandals in London.

Cassill's most complex work relies on four broad kinds of material: stories and novels about the midwest, most notably Iowa as in Pretty Leslie; stories and novels concerning academic life, as in "Larchmoor Is Not the World" and The President; materials about art and the artist's life (Clem Anderson); and finally materials of a less regional nature which may be called the vision of modernity found in the short story "Love? Squalor?" and Doctor Cobb. A second lesser-known order of Cassill's work consists of a dozen novels, "paperback originals" so-called because of the contractual circumstances of their first publication. For the most part The Wound of Love, Dormitory Women, and others await sophisticated literary evaluation. These shorter, often more spontaneous novels also exploit the same kinds of material. It should be well understood that these categories are intended to be only suggestive; the most ambitious work, for example, displays all these materials.

Beyond the technical accomplishments of any professional novelist, Cassill's most noteworthy literary quality is the "visual" nature of his prose fiction. There is a steady exploitation of color, of the precise, telling, visual detail, a sensitivity to proportion, and to the architectonics of scene. In fact Cassill began his artistic career as a painter, a teacher of art; from time to time he still exhibits his work. His fiction shows some of the same qualities as the Impressionists, the Post-Impressionists, and the German Expressionistic painters.

The literary influences are wide-ranging and interestingly absorbed. In general these influences are evoked when necessary rather than being held steadily as ''models'' in any neoclassic sense. Specifically, Cassill values Flaubert, James, Joyce, and especially D.H. Lawrence. Of a different order of specific influence would be Madam Bovary, Gissing's New Grub Street, and Benjamin Constant's Adolphe (1815). It is interesting that Cassill has written the best extant appreciation of Adolphe. Thus Cassill is a highly literary writer, with a broad, useful knowledge of American and European literatures; for many years he has been a teacher of contemporary literature and a writer-in-residence at universities, a professional reviewer, essayist, a discerning cultural commentator and critic.

The governing themes of Cassill's work are less easy to identify. A recurring situation is the nature and the resultant fate of a human pair, the destiny of a man or woman in the throes of new love, old love, marriage, or adultery. Closely bound to these concerns is the nature of love and responsibility; the implications of choice, loyalty, and liberty. Often there are conflicts generated between rationality and a merely emotional yearning—real or imagined—genuine affection as against the implied necessity of sexual aggression or the ironies of "modern love." At times these relationships are between teacher and pupil, lovers, man and wife; between artist and patron, mistress, or the world "out there."

A fascination with these and other difficult themes places a heavy obligation on the novelist, especially in the matter of plot-structures and the handling of sex scenes. Throughout Cassill's work there is the insistence of the centrality of the sexual aspect of all human relationships. If in real life such concerns are seldom finally resolved, so is it in many novelistic structures which tend to rely on sexual involvements as a central motivation. Often, therefore, a story or a novel will begin with a vivid, strong situation which in the end is obscured or vague rather than suggestive or resolved. The reliance on the sexual drive as a compelling motive becomes more insistent in the later work.

Although he is primarily a novelist, Cassill's most sustained work is often in the short fiction, of which he is a master. The best stories focus on domestic scenes, memories of youth, the pathos of age, the casual lost relationship, conversations of art, ideas, literature, and the meaning of life itself.

Taken together, the stories, novels, and criticism show a strongly unified sensibility, a dedicated, energetic artist, a man in a modern world imaginatively and at times romantically comprehended, a man whose powerful gifts are his best protection against his own vision of America and of the midwest where modernity is rampant and the end is nowhere in sight.

-James B. Hall

CASTRO, Brian

Nationality: Australian. Born: Kowloon, Hong Kong, 16 January 1950. Education: University of Sidney, M.A. 1976. Family: Married Josephine Mary Gardiner in 1976. Career: Teacher, Mt. Druitt High School, New South Wales, 1972–76; assistant in languages, Lycee Technique, Paris, 1976–77; French master, St. Joseph's College, Hunter's Hill, New South Wales, 1978–79; journalist, Asiaweek magazine, Hong Kong, 1983–87. Since 1989 tutor of literary studies, University of Western Sydney. Writer-in-residence, Mitchell College, New South Wales, 1985; visiting fellow, Nepean College, Kingswood, New South Wales,1988. Since 1989 writer for All-Asia Review of Books, Hong Kong. Awards: Vogel-Australian prize, 1982, for Birds of Paradise; Australian Council of Literature Board grant, 1983, 1988; Victorian Premier's Literary Award, for Double-Wolf and After China. Address: c/o Allen and Unwin, 8 Napier Street, North Sydney 2059, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Birds of Passage. Sydney and London, Allen and Unwin, 1983.
Double-Wolf. Sydney, Allen and Unwin, 1991.
Pomeroy. Sydney, Allen and Unwin, 1991.
After China. Sydney, Allen and Unwin, 1992.
Drift. Port Melbourne, Victoria, Australia, Heinemann, 1994.
Stepper. Milsons Point, New South Wales, Random House Australia, 1997.

Other

Writing Asia; and, Auto/biography: Two Lectures. Canberra, University College, Australian Defence Force Academy, 1995.

* * *

Of Portuguese and Chinese-American parents, Brian Castro has much to do in his fiction with questions of identity and place, with the influence of the past upon the present, and with the relationship between language and experience. His first novel, Birds of Passage, concerns the history of that very much persecuted race in Australia, the Chinese. It documents—with brief, dispassionate understatement—the persecution of Castro's ancestors on the goldfields one hundred years ago and points to the rejection of their descendants today, but the purpose of the work is far from polemical. Birds of Passage is a parable about and an inquiry into the nature of identity and the relationship between past and present.

Its method is to juxtapose the narrative of Seamus O'Young, an ABC (Australian-born Chinese), and his ancestor, Lo Yun Shan, who came to Australia from Kwangtung in 1856 in search of gold. Sensitive, intelligent, but an outsider in Sydney, O'Young discovers a manuscript that Shan had left behind and from that starting point begins to retell his ancestor's story and, in effect, to reinvent it. Events 120 years apart are strikingly paralleled. An old man on the boat to Australia shares his food with Shan; we cut to Seamus being offered bread by two old men in a Sydney park. Different characters with the same name appear in the two halves. Even individual images are replicated. As he ponders and recreates the past, Seamus becomes possessed by it. He begins to age physically and to feel the return of his Chinese consciousness. Physical and psychoanalytic reasons are offered for this but are unconvincing speculations only. The truth is that Seamus seems, by the power of his imagination, to become his ancestor until finally they meet. At the end of the novel Shan returns to Kwangtung, deserted by his lover Mary Young, never to see the son he has fathered with her but in a truer sense having established a sense of continuity with the future: "He was on a different path now, in control of his destiny, and he brought with him something of the void he had experienced in Australia, the silence and the stillness that helped him to accept his microscopic role in the eternal recurrences of nature."

Birds of Passage has some of the faults one might expect in a first novel. The prose tends to become abstract or showily sententious at times, and Castro is prone to gesture at significances, to throw in names for their own sake, as with Seamus's casual meeting with Roland Barthes. But most of the time it is a tenderly written work, immensely sad without being in the least sense depressing.

Castro's second novel, Double-Wolf, is as much a tour de force as his first. Based on the celebrated case of Sergei Wespe, Freud's Wolf-Man, who experienced a childhood nightmare of wolves appearing in a tree outside his window (Freud built much of his theory of infantile sexuality based on it). It proceeds to spin a complex web of surmise and speculation involving primarily the relationship between Wespe and a fraudulent Australian-born psychoanalyst who calls himself Artie Catacomb. Castro has said in interviews that after picking up a copy of the Wolf-Man's memoirs in a second-hand bookshop he was drawn to the case, first because the Wolf-Man had always wanted to be a writer and second because Freud many years later asked Wespe to testify that what he had told him was true, a curious and uncharacteristic gesture of lack of self-confidence on the great man's part. Equally unusual, Freud lent Wespe money during the 1920s when he was destitute.

Refusing to privilege any one narrator or narrative and meticulously listing date and place, Castro cuts between Catacomb, living out his last days in destitution at Katoomba in the Blue Mountains outside Sydney, and Wespe at various stages in his life—on his estate at Kherson, near Odessa, where he was born in 1887, in the Caucasus in 1906, Munich in 1910, and Vienna in 1972. Freud does not appear directly but is constantly a reported presence in the novel, and like much else in the novel he is often a comic one.

Strange things happened to Wespe when he was young. He watched his parents in the act of sex and saw his father crawl on all fours "and [hide] behind sofas with a wolf-mask over his face, springing up and terrifying the children, who ran screaming into the garden." He had an ecstatic sexual relationship with his sister, Anna. Two years older than himself, Anna, like his father and later like his wife, commits suicide. Wespe's response to Freud when he goes to be treated by him is an ambivalent and shifting one. Freud, it is hinted, in effect expropriates his client's writings while in turn the Wolf-Man's position as one of Freud's most celebrated cases gives him a certain status in the psychoanalytic world. It is one he adds to by becoming a successful author: "My book was a smash hit. Stayed on The New York Times best-seller list three months."

Through all this, Castro insists on the importance of play. Wespe tells us, "It was Freud who first taught me that parody comes before the paradigm, play before principle. The origin of man was a sort of partying without precedence." And again: "People have forgotten that life's a game. Play is the essence of thinking." The novel is full of jokes, puns, and wordplay ("The ego has landed"). Freud speaks like a character from the lower East side. In one of Castro's best gags, Wespe tells us, "When I got to Vienna I immediately visited Freud. He gave me an autographed copy of From the History of an Infantile Neurosis. I sold it for several hundred crowns to a fellow who came to see me. His name was Jung...." In a neat reversal of Melville's famous opening the psychiatric entrepreneur Ishmael Liebmann says, "Call me Doctor Liebmann." There is an almost promiscuous variety of allusion, from references to wolves to Little Red Riding Hood to a guesthouse in Katoomba called the Aeneas. Part of the point that Castro is making is the not vastly original one of the problematic nature of truth. Wespe says of Freud's demand by what authority he writes what he writes, "I was dumbfounded. Did he believe that pornographers rendered something called the 'truth'? ... Did he really mean to say that sexuality had firmer narrations than narrative, than a patient construction of scenes?" Similarly, he insists on the truth suggested in the title that reality is comprised of binary opposites. "A wolf is always a double," says Freud. Wespe says, "The Greeks understood how to be both true and false to themselves. Savagery and civilisation. Crudity and refinement." There are seven goats for seven wolves. Double-Wolf is an elegant and witty, if not always quite convincing, tour de force.

Given Castro's evident penchant for disconnectedness and fragmentation, the use of different narratorial personas and voices, the danger to his art lies in a heterogeneity of allusion so great that it makes finally for incoherence. This tends to happen in Pomeroy, his least typical and perhaps least successful novel. It is a novel of brilliant bits that finally do not make a whole. Pomeroy is a journalist cum detective cum aspiring writer who has been jilted by his cousin and former lover, Estrellita. He accepts a job in Hong Kong working for I.D. magazine, the initials standing variously for International Detective, Identity, Investigative Dialectics, and Indecent Disclosures. Pomeroy himself calls it Income for Destitutes. As the novel opens, however, he is living in Australia and has been summoned by Rory Halligan, the man whom Estrellita abandoned for him. In three sections, alternating first-person narration with third-person reportage, the novel crosses back and forth in time and space to tell the story of Pomeroy, one that leads finally to an anticipated end ("Give a man a chance to put off his own death").

As always with Castro the novel is full of jokes (Pomeroy's esky is covered with words from Finnegans Wake, which he reads as he almost drowns; there is a also letter in gloriously mangled English from Pomeroy's aunt complaining of his sexual activities) and allusions (to Shakespeare, Forster, Barthes, Housman). The esky is full of Hunter Valley wine. The novel both pays tribute to post-modernism and parodies it. The characters speak with incongruous sophistication: "That's why we're in the prison house of language. For us ... there is really nothing outside the incriminating text. Just think ... the mobster as reader." Castro is fond of repeating the injunction of E. M. Forster, the epitome of old-fashioned humanism, to "only connect," but the connections here are hard to follow.

Double-Wolf won Castro the Victorian Premier's Literary Award and he followed it the next year with After China, which achieved him the same honor. Once again, he exhibits his liking for rapidly shifting perspectives. A short novel, After China has almost as many scenes, neatly spliced together, as there are pages. Characteristically, it cuts between past and present, China and Australia, and first and third person to tell the story of the relationship between a Chinese architect, You Bok Man, and an unnamed but distinguished Australian writer of short stories. We learn little about the woman, apart from one brief episode devoted to her adolescence, except that it slowly becomes apparent that she is dying of cancer. The architect, however, eventually gives us his life story, from his training in Paris, imprisonment, impotence through an accident, and final escape in Shanghai, to a brief life in New York, to his current empty existence in the hotel he himself designed on the eastern coast of Australia, which is tumbling down around him. Castro's novels are nothing if not cosmopolitan and he himself points repeatedly to the extraordinarily complex cultural and racial background from which he comes.

Graver and more personal in tone than Castro's other novels, After China is also structurally a little simpler and more straightforward; it is a meditation on writing and its relation to sexuality and the relationship of both to immortality. The tales with which the architect "seduces" the writer and that become the substance of her final book are both from his own life and from ancient Chinese history and concentrate on this notion of immortality and its connection with the will to self-annihilation. The buildings that You designs are made deliberately difficult for their occupants. "When I built it," he says of his hotel, "I wanted people to be lost in it. The guest was not to come round again with any recognition or familiarity. Movement is discovery."

Similarly, we are told, "The Bauhaus and the Aufbau had attracted him because they opposed the unification of history, nationalism, and racial identity. He broke these things down into parts. Rearranged them." Doubleness is, of course, a central motif of Castro's work and fracturing goes hand in hand with unification. Perhaps the most appropriate of the many metaphors of binding and division that Castro offers us in the novel is that of the 16th-century pornographic painter in one of his stories, Tang Yin, who devises a fan that when opened from left to right depicts a traditional Chinese landscape and from right to left discloses an erotic painting. Tang Yin becomes famous when an imperial concubine catches sight of the fan open on the illicit side and takes a fancy to it.

Drift takes now familiar themes and forms as far as they can go. It opens with a preface (reputedly written by one Thomas McGann in Tasmania in 1993) concerning the cult experimental author B. S. Johnson, who killed himself at the age of 40; it goes on to suggest that the novel itself is the last two thirds of Johnson's last projected work, a trilogy that he failed to complete. Based on a tiny passage in the only completed volume that McGann insists refers to Tasmania, McGann completes the trilogy, as Johnson had invited his readers to do, adopting the voice of the author. In addition, there are a number of other different narrative voices, including that of Johnson himself as well as Emma McGann, an aboriginal woman writing letters from Tasmania to Johnson that call him across the world.

In Castro's scenario, Bryan Stanley Johnson, or Byron Shelley Johnson, as he likes to dub himself (''he carried deep within a massive, debilitating romanticism''), journeys to Tasmania to meet the author of the letters. Slowly he becomes caught up in the predicament of the Aborigines, identifying with them, taking toxins that alter the color of his skin to the point where he becomes even blacker than the Aboriginals themselves: "Extinction. No longer white, unquestioning, biblical. No more dreams of primogeniture and ownership. No longer an author. What a relief."

Like Johnson, Castro is fond of wordplay, of allusions, and of arcane words; he loves puns, like his description of two sisters, "one grave, one acute," or the sign on McGann's Volkswagen, "-sabled driver." In everything he does he questions the simplistic notion that "writing is writing, life is life ... and the former is always subordinate to the latter," which he quotes from an unsympathetic critic of Johnson. But like all of Castro's work the novel is fundamentally serious in its attempt to push his themes of estrangement and loss of identity as far as he can. From writing about being a person of Chinese origin in Australia he moves in this, his fifth novel, to the ultimate condition of exile, that of the aboriginal. The aim of the novel is best summed up in Johnson's final paradox: "What I am really doing is challenging the reader to prove his own existence as palpably as I am proving mine by the action of writing." By a combination of sheer linguistic brilliance and fundamental integrity Castro has succeeded in breaking through conventional labels such as "multicultural writer" to demonstrate the truth of his own expressed conviction: "Writing knows no boundaries. Its metaphors, its translations, are part of a migratory process, birds of passage, which wing from the subliminal to the page, leaving its signs for the reader."

-Laurie Clancy

CAULDWELL, Frank

See KING, Francis (Henry)

CAUTE, (John) David

Nationality: British. Born: Alexandria, Egypt, 16 December 1936. Education: Edinburgh Academy; Wellington College, Crowthorne, Berkshire; Wadham College, Oxford, M.A. in modern history, D.Phil. 1963; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts (Henry fellow), 1960–61. Military Service: Served in the British Army, in Africa, 1955–56. Family: Married 1) Catherine Shuckburgh in 1961 (divorced 1970), two sons; 2) Martha Bates in 1973, two daughters. Career: Fellow, All Souls College, Oxford, 1959–65; visiting professor, New York University and Columbia University, New York, 1966–67; reader in social and political theory, Brunel University, Uxbridge, Middlesex, 1967–70; Regents' Lecturer, University of California, 1974; Benjamin Meaker Visiting Professor, University of Bristol, 1985. Literary and arts editor, New Statesman, London, 1979–80. Co-chair, Writers Guild of Great Britain, 1981–82. Awards: London Authors' Club award, 1960; Rhys Memorial prize, 1960. Address: 41 Westcroft Square, London W6 0TA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

At Fever Pitch. London, Deutsch, 1959; New York, Pantheon, 1961.Comrade Jacob. London, Deutsch, 1961; New York, Pantheon, 1962.The Decline of the West. London, Deutsch, and New York, Macmillan, 1966.

The Occupation. London, Deutsch, 1971; New York, McGraw Hill, 1972.

The Baby Sitters (as John Salisbury). London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Atheneum, 1978.

Moscow Gold (as John Salisbury). London, Futura, 1980.

The K-Factor. London, Joseph, 1983.

News from Nowhere. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1986.

Veronica; or, The Two Nations. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1989; New York, Arcade, 1990.

The Women's Hour. London, Paladin, 1991.

Dr Orwell and Mr Blair. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1994. Fatima's Scarf. London, Totterdown Books, 1998.

Plays

Songs for an Autumn Rifle (produced Edinburgh, 1961).

The Demonstration (produced Nottingham, 1969; London, 1970). London, Deutsch, 1970.

The Fourth World (produced London, 1973).

Radio Plays: Fallout, 1972; The Zimbabwe Tapes, 1983; Henry and the Dogs, 1986; Sanctions, 1988.

Television Documentaries: Brecht & Co., 1979.

Other

Communism and the French Intellectuals 1914–1960. London, Deutsch, and New York, Macmillan, 1964.

The Left in Europe since 1789. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, McGraw Hill, 1966.

Fanon. London, Fontana, and New York, Viking Press, 1970.

The Illusion: An Essay on Politics, Theatre and the Novel. London, Deutsch, 1971; New York, Harper, 1972.

The Fellow-Travellers. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Macmillan, 1973; revised edition, New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Press, 1988.

Collisions: Essays and Reviews. London, Quartet, 1974.

Cuba, Yes? London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, McGraw Hill, 1974.

The Great Fear: The Anti-Communist Purge under Truman and Eisenhower. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1978.

Under the Skin: The Death of White Rhodesia. London, Allen Lane, and Evanston, Illinois, Northwestern University Press, 1983.

The Espionage of the Saints: Two Essays on Silence and the State. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1986.

Left Behind: Journeys into British Politics. London, Cape, 1987.

Sixty-Eight: The Year of the Barricades. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1988; as The Year of the Barricades: A Journey Through 1968, New York, Harper, 1988.

Joseph Losey: A Revenge on Life. London, Faber, 1994; New York, Oxford University Press, 1994.

Editor, Essential Writings, by Karl Marx. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1967; New York, Macmillan, 1968.

т

Critical Studies: Article by Caute, in Contemporary Authors Autobiography Series 4 edited by Adele Sarkissian, Detroit, Gale, 1986; Caute's Confrontations: A Study of the Novels of David Caute by Nicolas Tredell, West Bridgford, Paupers' Press, 1994.

David Caute comments:

(1996) My novels are (perhaps) about: how people interpret the world to make themselves better and larger than they are; the helpless guilt of the self-aware; and the strategies of fictional narrative itself. Every private life is touched, or seized, by a wider public life.

* * *

In his novels, David Caute has always been concerned to dramatize and explore the complex relations between political commitment, the urge for power, and sexual desire. His fiction vividly portrays characters caught up in a range of struggles: African decolonization in At Fever Pitch, The Decline of the West, News from Nowhere, and The K-Factor; the attempt by the seventeenth-century Diggers to establish a free community in the England of Oliver Cromwell, in Comrade Jacob; the campus revolts of the 1960s in The Occupation; the social conflicts of 1980s Britain in Veronica; feminism in The Women's Hour; anti-communism in Dr Orwell and Mr Blair. Caute's sympathies are with the left, but never, in his novels, in an uncritical or dogmatic way; indeed, he is sharply aware of the bad faith and vanity that may be bound up with left-wing commitment, and he can present a sympathetic portrait of a right-wing figure, as he does in Veronica.

Caute's first four novels were primarily realistic, but showed signs of strain, as if another kind of writer were trying to get out. In the context of English fiction in the 1950s, At Fever Pitch was notable for the variety of narrative techniques it employed, from interior monologues to attempts to imitate the style of African folktales. At moments, Comrade Jacob moved into caricature and deliberate anachronism. The Decline of the West went further in the direction of caricature, and its exuberant style, endlessly generating similes and metaphors, was a distraction from the narrative and from the impact of specific scenes. The Occupation, however, triumphantly resolved these strains: here Caute found a form and style well suited to his talents, and to his concerns at the time.

The protagonist of The Occupation is a radical English academic, Steven Bright, working in the USA at the height of the 1960s' student revolts. Roused by the tumults of the times, challenged by his students to live up to his radicalism, embroiled in fraught relationships with a range of women, Bright finds himself, and the novel he is in, falling apart. But this breakdown is a breakthrough for Caute: The Occupation mixes realism, fantasy, caricature, expressionism, and self-reflexive commentary in a way that vividly dramatizes its themes, but it also achieves aesthetic coherence through its skillful overall structure and the sustained pace, precision, and wit of its style. It is Caute's most frenetic but most assured achievement.

The Occupation was part of a trilogy that also included a play, The Demonstration, and a work of literary theory, The Illusion. This trilogy, which bore the overall title of The Confrontation, both advocated and sought to demonstrate a practice of politically committed writing that challenged and disrupted representation. Caute did not follow this up, however, and for the next thirteen years produced studies of modern history and politics. It was Under the Skin, his documentary account of the death of Ian Smith's Rhodesian regime, which heralded his return to fiction in The K-Factor; this short, fastpaced novel dramatized the identity crisis of Rhodesia in its last days, as definitions of reality were hotly disputed-were the black guerrillas, for example, to be seen as terrorists or freedom fighters? The K-Factor was followed by News from Nowhere, a long, serious, and absorbing chronicle of the fortunes of Richard Stern from his heady years as a Young Turk at the London School of Economics to his troubled existence as an ill-paid journalist in the twilight of white Rhodesia. Veronica explores the incestuous love of a Conservative Cabinet Minister for his half-sister, and The Women's Hour sharply and comically portrays the plight of an ageing, left-wing university lecturer who is accused of sexual harassment by a feminist colleague. Dr Orwell and Mr Blair offers a fictional memoir, supposedly written by a boy whom "Mr Blair" befriended, of George Orwell as he was developing the ideas for Animal Farm. All these novels are largely realistic, but they do sometimes highlight their own artifice, and call into question the veracity of representation in supposedly factual as well as fictional writing. They show neither the strain of Caute's early realist work nor the controlled frenzy of The Occupation; they are the work of a mature writer, skilled in his craft and balanced in his attitudes, who combines humour, scepticism, and clarity.

Caute's novels now comprise a significant body of work, but they have suffered some neglect. This is partly because they are difficult to classify. In their challenge to realism, they can be seen as postmodernist; in their political and ethical engagements, they subvert postmodernist playfulness. But it is precisely in this confrontation—between postmodernism and realism, politics and play, commitment and critical detachment—that their power and pleasure lies.

-Nicolas Tredell

CHARYN, Jerome

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 13 May 1937. Education: Columbia University, New York, B.A. (cum laude) 1959 (Phi Beta Kappa). Family: Married Marlene Phillips in 1965 (divorced). Career: Recreation leader, New York City Department of Parks, early 1960s; English teacher, High School of Music and Art, and School of Performing Arts, both New York, 1962–64; Lecturer in English, City College, New York, 1965; assistant professor of English, Stanford University, California, 1965–68; assistant professor, 1968-72, associate professor, 1972-78, and professor of English, 1978–80, Herbert Lehman College, City University of New York; Mellon Visiting Professor of English, Rice University, Houston, 1979; visiting professor, 1980, and lecturer in creative writing, 1981-86, Princeton University, New Jersey; Visiting Distinguished Professor of English, City College of New York, 1988-89. Founding editor, Dutton Review, New York, 1970-72; executive editor, Fiction, New York, 1970-75. Member of the Executive Board, PEN American Center, since 1984, International Association of Crime Writers, since 1988, and Mystery Writers of America, since 1989. Since 1986 member of Playwright/Director Unit, Actors Studio, New York. Awards: National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1979, 1984; Rosenthal Foundation award, 1981; Guggenheim grant, 1982. Chevalier, Order of Arts and Letters (France), 1989. Agent: Georges Borchardt Inc., 136 East 57th Street, New York, New York 10022, U.S.A.; or, Mic Cheetham, Anthony Sheil Associates, 43 Doughty Street, London WC1N 2LF, England. Address: 302 West 12th Street, Apartment 10-C, New York, New York 10014, U.S.A.; or, 1 rue Boulard, Paris 75014, France.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Once Upon a Droshky. New York, McGraw Hill, 1964.On the Darkening Green. New York, McGraw Hill, 1965.Going to Jerusalem. New York, Viking Press, 1967; London, Cape, 1968.

American Scrapbook. New York, Viking Press, 1969.

Eisenhower, My Eisenhower. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1971.

The Tar Baby. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1973.

The Isaac Quartet. London, Zomba, 1984.

Blue Eyes. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1975.

Marilyn the Wild. New York, Arbor House, 1976; London, Bloomsbury, 1990.

The Education of Patrick Silver. New York, Arbor House, 1976. Secret Isaac. New York, Arbor House, 1978.

The Franklin Scare. New York, Arbor House, 1977.

The Seventh Babe. New York, Arbor House, 1979.

The Catfish Man: A Conjured Life. New York, Arbor House, 1980. Darlin' Bill: A Love Story of the Wild West. New York, Arbor House, 1980

Panna Maria. New York, Arbor House, 1982.

Pinocchio's Nose. New York, Arbor House, 1983.

War Cries over Avenue C. New York, Fine, 1985; London, Abacus, 1986.

The Magician's Wife. Tournai, Belgium, Casterman, 1986; New York, Catalan, 1987; London, Titan, 1988.

Paradise Man. New York, Fine, 1987; London, Joseph, 1988.

The Good Policeman. New York, Mysterious Press, 1990; London, Bloomsbury, 1991.

Elsinore. New York, Mysterious Press, and London, Bloomsbury, 1991

Maria's Girls. New York, Mysterious Press, 1992; London, Serpent's Tail, 1994.

Montezuma's Man. New York, Mysterious Press, 1993. Little Angel Street. New York, Mysterious Press, 1994. El Bronx. New York, Mysterious Press, 1997.

Death of a Tango King. New York, New York University Press, 1998. Citizen Sidel. New York, Mysterious Press, 1999.

Captain Kidd. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1999.

Short Stories

The Man Who Grew Younger and Other Stories. New York, Harper, 1967.

Family Man, art by Joe Staton, lettering by Ken Bruzenak. New York, Paradox Press, 1995.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Blue Book of Crime," in The New Black Mask. San Diego, California, Harcourt Brace, 1986.

"Fantomas in New York," in A Matter of Crime. San Diego, California, Harcourt Brace, 1988.

"Young Isaac," in The Armchair Detective (New York), Summer 1990.

Other

Metropolis: New York as Myth, Marketplace, and Magical Land. New York, Putnam, 1986; London, Abacus, 1988.

Movieland: Hollywood and the Great American Dream Culture. New York, Putnam, 1989.

The Dark Lady from Belorusse: A Memoir. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1997.

The Black Swan: A Memoir. St. Martin's Press, 2000.

Editor, The Single Voice: An Anthology of Contemporary Fiction. New York, Collier, 1969.

Editor, The Troubled Vision: An Anthology of Contemporary Short Novels and Passages. New York, Collier, 1970.

Editor, The New Mystery. New York, Dutton, 1993.

不

Manuscript Collection: Fales Collection, Elmer Holmes Bobst Library, New York University.

Critical Studies: Introductions by Charyn to The Single Voice, 1969, and The Troubled Vision, 1970; "Notes on the Rhetoric of Anti-Realist Fiction" by Albert Guerard, in Tri-Quarterly (Evanston, Illinois), Spring 1974; "Jerome Charyn: Artist as Mytholept" by Robert L. Patten, in Novel (Providence, Rhode Island), Fall 1984; "Exploding the Genre: The Crime Fiction of Jerome Charyn" by Michael Woolf, in American Crime Fiction, London, Macmillan, 1988; Jerome Charyn issue of The Review of Contemporary Fiction, Summer 1992.

. . .

Jerome Charyn's work demonstrates a deep mistrust of the contemporary world, expressed frequently in alienation from mechanized or anti-humanistic institutions. At the same time, and in opposition to this perception, Charyn has celebrated humanity's heroic capacity for survival in the face of such alienation. A typical Charyn protagonist moves between worlds, between a landscape of urban decline and worlds of spiritual intensity and complexity where the capacity for magic and mayhem confronts the mundane and the menacing. Throughout his work he has imagined and re-imagined America (most commonly New York City) into forms that repeatedly challenge and subvert the reader's perception of contemporary reality. A dark comedy meets fragments of spiritual persistence that finally affirm the fragile survival of flawed but beautiful humanity in the rubble of our civilization. The fiction is formed and informed both by an awareness of contemporary literary practice and by a moral consciousness deeply influenced by Jewish experience and perception. Of all the novelists characterized as Jewish-American, Charyn is the most radical and inventive. There is in the body of his work a restless creativity which constantly surprises and repeatedly undermines the reader's expectation.

His first novel, Once Upon a Droshky, explored a recurrent conflict in Jewish-American writing, that between father and son. The narrative voice, however, is that of the father and the language is in an English that is shaped by Yiddish speech structures. This creates a powerful comic narrative but it also reveals a sense of continuity with, and nostalgia for, the lost world of Yiddish-American culture. The father reflects a sense of moral justice while the son represents a legalistic, inhumane America. He embodies a future against which the voices of the past have little power except that accrued by spiritual strength and the sense that reality is ambiguous, containing both the known and the transcendent. It is characteristic of Charyn's originality that his first novel, published when he was 26, should be told through the perception of the father.

The world as this kind of ambiguous landscape places Charyn's work, in one context, in relation to Isaac Bashevis Singer's. In one of Charyn's most important novels, War Cries over Avenue C, for example, he goes into the innermost heart of the desolate inner city to invent a world of heroes and grotesques, angels and demons. Avenue C is a world without God. The novel is not, though, a grim record of urban decline. A Jewish girl with bad skin becomes magically transformed into a mythic and heroic figure, Saigon Sarah, while her lover returns from Vietnam as "The Magician" picking shrapnel, like dandruff, from his skull. Vietnam is carried like a drug into the twisted heart of New York. Charyn is not, though, solely representing the familiar issues of violence and degeneration in the city but a complex synthesis of moral collapse and spirituality, degradation and salvation.

Charyn's prose precisely reflects his themes. It makes startling conjunctions, dramatically synthesizes the magical and the mundane. He thrusts the reader out of the known world and then back into it with a radically altered perception. The experience is comic, violent, and profoundly serious.

Another aspect of Charyn's writing is his awareness of contemporary literary issues; he is an editor and critic of considerable sophistication. His knowledge of this field is shown in his use of the notions of fictionality and fable-making that characterizes, in part, post-realist and postmodern writing. This aspect of his work is most clearly illustrated in the novels of the early 1970s: Eisenhower, My Eisenhower and The Tar Baby. In the first novel he creates a fictional gypsy tribe of Azazians who are essentially comic figures with tails and a belief in an anarchic God. The novel is told in the first person by an Azazian gypsy, and Charyn's achievement is to use that comic voice to record a tragic history. The voice reveals a condition of persecution that transforms the fable of Azazian history into one that reflects all histories of ethnic alienation and persecution. Non-realism paradoxically offers an incisive analysis into the real predicament of the ethnic stranger. A similar strategy is found in The Tar Baby. The novel is a parody of a literary periodical which ostensibly honors the life of one Anatole Waxman-Weissman. The form gives Charyn the opportunity to create a succession of literary jokes reminiscent of Nabokov's Pale Fire, but the formal issues co-exist with a sense of Anatole as an archetypal ethnic outsider in a society and institution hostile to the creative imagination.

Charyn's view of his own creativity is of a process that comes close to mystical experience in its transfer between real and quasisurreal worlds: "I start out each time to write a conventional story. All of a sudden, the story begins to shift. It's like a landslide—you're on one particular spot, and all of a sudden that spot disappears and you enter some other sort of crazy territory." These territories are rich indeed and they encompass many forms, from the Western landscape of Darlin' Bill to the immigrant history of America that informs Panna Maria. Of particular interest are two novels of quasi-mythical autobiography: The Catfish Man and Pinocchio's Nose. These frequently exuberant fables offer a kind of alternative history of Jewish America. This history counters the view of the Jews as an invariably upwardly mobile and successful immigrant group. Like the Azazians, Charyn's Jews remain on the edges of the world, occupying a territory that shifts and slides between alienation and magic. Charyn's Jews are in America but not always of it: a tribe apart.

Tribalism is, in fact, the mode in which he most frequently represents ethnicity. This is most clearly apparent in the crime novels that come close to offering an urban epic of major literary importance: The Isaac Quartet and The Good Policeman. In these five novels Charyn represents New York as a kind of tribal society populated by warring ethnic communities. The groups are intertwined in a system that blurs boundaries between good and evil, detective and criminal. In essence, the author uses the crime genre to complicate the nature of reality. He reverses a common objective of the form which frequently depends on a clear division between right and wrong, good and bad.

A writer of almost staggering energy, Charyn during the late 1990s seemingly turned out books as fast as his readers could read them. El Bronx, the ninth volume featuring New York mayor Isaac Sidel, is as much concerned with its preteen characters as with the fiftysomething mayor. Charyn followed this with a memoir about his mother, The Dark Lady from Belorusse, and a less successful work of fiction, Death of a Tango King. The latter, his 28th novel, was not part of the Sidel series, but with Citizen Sidel the writer returned full-force to his inimitable mayor. The book was a rollicking joyride, but the sprawling plot of Captain Kidd—ranging as it did from the invasion of Italy under Patton's Third Army to the internecine wars of drygoods merchants in wartime Manhattan—proved confusing to some readers. The Black Swan, a sequel to the earlier memoir, recounts Charyn's childhood obsession with the movies.

Charyn's view of the world is inclusive and complex. He grafts onto the form of the detective novel a set of strategies which permit those mystical transformations that are characteristic of a view of reality in which nothing stays simple or still. He is not essentially concerned with the mechanics of crime but he exploits the genre to approach the profoundest of paradoxes: the persistence of love and redemption in an ostensibly doomed and damned world. Within the violent disorder of contemporary experience, Charyn perceives the heroic nature of flawed humanity as it crawls towards some bizarre version of spiritual salvation.

Charyn is one of a handful of living American novelists who combine prolific output with stylistic originality and imaginative zest.

Part of his claim to our attention is his unpredictability. He has taken hold of a vast range of American myths, locations, and dreams and reshaped these within his rich imagination. He melds that creativity with the fertile tradition of Jewish storytelling which traditionally envisages a spiritual potential within a mire of poverty and violence. The outcome is a deeply serious and profound vision of a world simultaneously half-catatonic at the edge of doom and heroically groping towards some version of God's grace.

-Michael Woolf

CHATTERJEE, Upamanyu

Nationality: Indian. Born: Bihar, India, 1959. Career: Currently, officer, Indian Administrative Service. Address: c/o Faber and Faber, Ltd., 3 Queen Square, London, WC1N 3AU, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

English, August: An Indian Story. London, Faber, 1988. The Last Burden. New Delhi, Viking, and London, Faber, 1993.

* * *

The corpus of Upamanyu Chatterjee is not vast but his is a powerful emergent voice in Indian postcolonial literature. Thus far he has published "The Assassination of Indira Gandhi" in 1986 and two novels, English, August: An Indian Story in 1988 and The Last Burden in 1993. Critics have found Chatterjee difficult to categorize in that the protagonists—August in English, August and Jamun in The Last Burden—just drift with no apparent purpose in life. Reviews of English, August liken August to Kingsley Amis's Lucky Jim as a portrayal of the angry young man. But such a comparison would thematically make August angrier, for this novel is focused on India's postcolonial condition and the necessity to decolonize.

English, August deals with August as a member of the Indian Administrative Service, a reincarnation of the Indian Civil Service, a behemoth left behind by the British to govern the country. A job in the IAS is highly sought after in postcolonial India; August, while appearing lackadaisical and self-centered and seeming to be its most inappropriate member, draws attention to a system which has become totally outmoded and out of touch with the needs of the Indian masses. Overtly, the novel attempts to do an expose of the IAS with its corruption and the tension which exists between the IAS officers representing the federal government and the state governments resulting in the victimization of the common people in the administrative nightmare in modern India.

Furthermore, there is a subtext of anger which is aimed not just at the IAS, but one which questions reality in India which is mediated by the English text or more particularly through Western eyes. For instance, watching Indian television, August makes references to Peyton Place and Waiting for Godot, which prompts his uncle to respond with "the first thing you are reminded of by something that happens around you, is something obscure and foreign, totally unrelated to the life and language around you." This particular theme pervades the novel and all the characters agree that postcolonial India is unreal, "a place of fantasy" and "confused metaphysics." To this extent, the IAS itself becomes a metaphor for India. Under the guise of decolonization, post-independence IAS once more reinscribes the colonial government as well as the profound sense of dislocation that a lot of Indians feel. Nationalism represented by the IAS can only be purchased by the homogenization of India and its people. The IAS and its policy of placing elite officers in locales and terrains they are unfamiliar with only goes further towards making it an inept administrative body, unable to cope with the intricacies of administering in a place and language alien to it. How can India/IAS decolonize then? August's only option is through taking a break from the IAS altogether.

If English, August is dark and bleak, The Last Burden comes to terms with and accepts such darkness. This novel of decolonization is truly "indigenous" in that its concern is not with India's relationship to the metropolitan centers but rather with middle-class life. It exposes the myth of the unity of the joint Hindu family (as opposed to the Western nuclear one) and its sense of duty, and dwells instead on the banality of urban life in India. The most striking aspect of this novel is the incredible language used by Chatterjee, which makes the reader oscillate between the beauty of the high serious prose and the ridiculous emotions that it covers. For instance, the novel is framed by the death of Jamun's mother. Upon being reprimanded at his demeanor and lack of sorrow at her impending death, Jamun retorts, "She isn't Indira Gandhi, you know, that we've to hurtle out into the streets and thwack our tits to voice our grief." Thus the chaos in the aftermath of Indira Gandhi's assassination is contextualized as hyperbole. Again, when Urmila dies, the doctor advises them to cremate the body, for the mourners "crack up, if after a few hours, the cadaver they're half-worshipping exudes the wispiest pong." Thus Chatterjee's use of language is effective on two counts. First, his code-switching and inscription of the banal and the slang defuses the hyperbole and exaggerated emotions associated with death. Death becomes real and a part of life and not a farce. In addition, his treatment of language forcibly inflects the Indian and indigenous within the language reserved for the English canon and its system of cultural assumptions.

With The Last Burden and the deliberate indigenization of English, Chatterjee finds a solution to the postcolonial anxiety articulated in English, August.

-Radhika Mohanram

CHEUSE, Alan

Nationality: American. Born: Perth Amboy, New Jersey, 23 January 1940. Education: Rutgers University, New Brunswick, New Jersey, B.A. 1961, Ph.D. in comparative literature 1974. Family: Married 1) Mary Ethel Agan in 1964 (divorced 1972), one son; 2) Marjorie Pryse in 1975 (divorced 1984), two daughters; 3) Kristin O'Shee in 1991. Career: Toll taker, New Jersey Turnpike, 1961–62; speechwriter, 1965; reporter, Fairchild Publications, 1966; instructor in literature, Bennington College, Vermont, 1970–78; visiting writer, University of the South, 1984, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, 1984–86, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, and since 1987, George Mason University. Book critic, National Public Radio, All Things Considered, since 1984, producer and host, Sound of Writing, since 1989. Awards: National Endowment for the Arts fellowship, 1979–80. Member: National Book Critics' Circle. Agent: Nat Sobel, 146 East 19th Street, New York, New York 10003, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Bohemians: John Reed and His Friends. Cambridge, Massachusetts, n.p., 1982.

The Grandmothers' Club. Salt Lake City, Utah, Peregrine Smith, 1986.

The Light Possessed. Salt Lake City, Utah, Peregrine Smith, 1990.

Short Stories

Candace and Other Stories. Cambridge, Massachusetts, n.p., 1980.The Tennessee Waltz and Other Stories. Salt Lake City, Utah, Peregrine Smith, 1990.

Lost and Old Rivers: Stories. Dallas, Texas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1998.

Other

Fall Out of Heaven: An Autobiographical Journey. Salt Lake City, Utah, Peregrine Smith, 1987.

Editor, with Caroline Marshall, The Sound of Writing. New York, Doubleday, 1991.

Editor, with Caroline Marshall, Listening to Ourselves. New York, Doubleday, 1993.

Editor, with Nicholas Delbanco, Talking Horse: Bernard Malamud on Life and Work. New York, Columbia University Press, 1996.

*

Manuscript Collection: Alderman Library, University Of Virginia, Charlottesville.

Alan Cheuse comments:

Two notes about my stories. I tend to see them as pieces as much in the lyric mode as straight narrative, in which I work the language as closely as a poet might. So my stories are as close to writing lyric poetry as I will probably ever get.

As far as grouping them, I can see a rough geographical configuration. There are southern stories, western stories, and some eastern stories. I suppose in another ten or twenty years I'll have boxed the compass in short fiction. But I doubt if this has much to do with their meaning—it's a category that helps me keep track of them, is all, I think.

With regard to Fall Out of Heaven, I have to say that I would like to do more nonfiction, but I haven't yet found a new subject. In the case of this memoir-travel book, the subject was as personal as my own skin, and I had done all the research just by living and suffering. The travel part was the reward, I suppose, for having gone through the hellish rest of it, the battles with my father, the awful separation from my son that came when his mother and I divorced.

As far as finding an overall pattern in my work, who knows? No writer wants to think that he's finished searching for that, not before he himself is finished with life and work. Hemingway noticed certain patterns and began to parody himself. Faulkner kept on reaching and though the work fell off a bit it never became uninteresting. On goes the quest.

* * *

Alan Cheuse is not only a prolific writer of fiction and nonfiction, but also a widely appearing commentator-critic-lecturer dealing with modern literature and—not least—a member of the writing faculty of George Mason University's MFA Program. Four of the topics he has addressed in his public-speaking engagements have a particular bearing on his concerns as an author. These are: "Writing for the Ear," "Imagining Ancestry," "Fathers and Fictions," and "The Elusive Matter of Form." In varying degrees these work together for Cheuse in his longer works, enabling him to be seen as an experimental, widely ranging littérateur of enormous power and troubling vision.

Cheuse's first novel, The Bohemians: John Reed and His Friends, is dedicated as follows: "For Fathers and Sons—Phil and Josh." Phil, Cheuse's father, died shortly after The Bohemians was written; Josh is Cheuse's teenage son by his first wife. Considering its emotional impact and the way its historic characters are made to come alive for the reader, The Bohemians is perhaps Cheuse's most noteworthy work of fiction. It is an imaginative re-creation of the life of America's premier communist, wherein Cheuse blurs the line between documentary journalism and action-packed adventure fiction while making use of the personal memoir. Reed was a polemical journalist fiercely opposed to America's entering World War I, yet he was committed to overthrowing the capitalist system and replacing it with a radical redistribution of power such as that envisioned by the Bolshevik faction of the American Communist Party. Though Cheuse does not cite reference sources for his detailed "life" of this controversial figure, he seems to capture Reed's language, thereby enabling the reader to "hear" the fervent, irrepressible Reed in his comings and goings with associates on all levels of familiarity.

From childhood in Oregon to death from typhus in a Moscow hospital, Reed's life is played out in a largely first-person narrative pattern enriched through the inclusion of a postscript memoir by his wife, Louise Bryant, poetic inserts, a galaxy of important figures in Reed's life—each seeming to speak and act in propria persona—and a scattering of documentary details, real or imagined. Fascinating as are the occasional appearances of, among others, Lincoln Steffens, Max Eastman, Walter Lippmann, and Woodrow Wilson, Reed's stormy, sometimes tender, relationship with Louise Bryant makes an indelible impression on the reader. (Complicating their relationship was Reed's involvement with Edna St. Vincent Millay and Louise's with Eugene O' Neill.) Problematical as some of Cheuse's dramatic re-creations of Reed's personal history may appear, the live-voice dynamic of the supporting cast of The Bohemians lends plausibility to the book.

Hardly a novel in the literal sense, because it is not a fictional narrative, Fall Out of Heaven: An Autobiographical Journey integrates autobiographical episodes in Cheuse's life with an autobiographical manuscript left by his late father, a Russian immigrant and former captain and fighter pilot in the Soviet air force. The double-helix form of this experimental narrative, representing a heartfelt tribute to the parent with whom Cheuse had long had a tempestuous relationship, was foreshadowed in The Bohemians, written about six years before Fall Out of Heaven. Near the end of his life, John Reed tells his wife that he recently began "a novel in the form of a memoir" and then adds, "Or is it a memoir in the form of a novel? ... Well, what the hell, to hell with form! Leave that to the bourgeois artistes!" The Alan Cheuse portion of Fall Out of Heaven is based on a sentimental journey Cheuse took with son Josh to the Far East in the mid-1980s. That journey in turn was based on a strange inner voice Alan felt he had heard at his father's funeral almost four years earlier. It seemed to come from his father, directing Alan to go to Khiva. "Take your own son and go to Khiva, that little desert outpost in Uzbekistan where I spent my best youth, and I'll meet you there, and we'll see what happens next." Another unnatural visitation is recorded in Fall Out of Heaven. The day after Cheuse's friend, John Gardner (fiction writer, medievalist, academic), died in a motorcycle accident in 1982, he appeared to Cheuse in a vision and told him plainly to keep on working. This occurrence took place on the following day as well.

Cheuse's next novel, The Grandmothers' Club, is more of an "imagined" work-though still a reconstruction from a real-life story—than The Bohemians. It grew, he explains in an author's note, out of a New York Times news item he had read in the late 1970s, when he was beginning to write The Bohemians. "The president and CEO of United Brands," which had started out early in the 1800s "trading New England ice for Central American fruit, had jumped from a window high atop the Pan-Am building in midtown Manhattan," because of a "financial scandal, involving, among other things, bribery of high Latin government officials." He had begun "as a rabbinical student;" his most recent position, before entering "the world of corporate finance, had been assistant rabbi" in a Long Island synagogue. However, the central feature of this demanding novel is not the tarnished career of Manny Bloch the self-destructing rabbi but grandmother Minnie Bloch's narrative voice, shaping and projecting more than a mere saga of her antihero son. Minnie is a kind of tribal storyteller, creating a world of cultural experience behind Manny and his troubled family: for example, now a song title ("Mood Indigo," "Light My Fire"), now a commercial-history note on the development of the banana trade. Although some of the dialogue in The Bohemians (Lou Bryant and John Reed before his death, discussing their love and his writing achievement) suggests a parody of Hemingway at his weakest, the vocalized brooding sensibility of Minnie Bloch now and then evokes the powerful sweep and commanding presence of the overseeing narrator of Joyce's Ulysses.

As in Fall Out of Heaven, in The Grandmothers' Club there are also secret messages from beyond the realm of ordinary human experience. Manny Bloch's life has been permanently affected by the tragedy, when he was eight years old, of his father's death in a street accident. From time to time he senses that his dead father is delivering messages to him through the beak of a mysterious bird. At a crucial point in his life, when he finds himself wondering why he is going to the Temple on the High Holy Days, the experience of the oraclebird's arrival is overwhelming and he falls to the ground. Then Manny hears his father's mandate: He must do what he must do, he must go where he must go. His father adds, ''Midway in this life, a point I never reached, you must take a new road.'' Manny thereupon leaves the rabbinate so that he can enter his wife's family's shipping business, and he later becomes a powerful commercial entrepreneur. Manny's suicide, as described poetically by his super-sensitive, unusually articulate mother, provides what is perhaps the most beautifully written passage in the entire novel. In the end it is Manny's long-dead father who dominates Manny's life course and who thereby also exercises an indirectly damaging influence on two other members of Manny's star-crossed family, his wife and daughter.

Cheuse's latest novel, The Light Possessed, reveals a particular artistic and visual trait that he shared with the poet Emily Dickinson, a sensitivity to light. For example, in The Grandmothers' Club, Minnie Bloch tells about one of Manny's bird-visitations. The bird calls Manny's name, "and if sound can have a light, it's a bright light in the middle of the darkness that surrounds him, like a burning bush in a dark meadow, or a star against a black field of velvet, like that, all of the sunlight that was present a moment before condensed into the sound." Light is of much greater importance in the subsequent novel, which deals with 20th-century American art and one of our greatest artists. Cheuse offers us a fictionalized career study of Georgia O'Keefe (here called Ava Boldin) against the background of her husband, Alfred Stieglitz (Albert Stigmar in the novel), numerous relatives, and fellow artists. One real-life character appears in propria persona: Stanley Edgar Hyman, Bennington College professor, literary critic, and free-living man-about-town.

Again in this novel there is the figure of the unnatural visitant. This time it is Eve, Ava's twin, who died at birth. When Ava was very young, she claimed that Eve appeared to her secretly, giving her information about future happenings. At the end of the book, it is this dead infant who has the last word, as she asks her sister (now so widely renowned for the use she has made of light in her scenes of the New Mexico desert) to clear up certain questions for her before she awakens from her dream. She wants to be shown, Eve pleads, "if color has a sound and how light creates music. And if the shape of things takes on a shade, visible near darkness ... and ... if light is the old metaphor for infinity, and ... if color is light given in terms of the world." The Light Possessed, which contains a story line more difficult to follow than that of The Grandmothers' Club, exhibits to a fault three major features of the modernist mode in fiction: stream-ofconsciousness narrative, jumbled plot sequences, and multi-vocal rendition, as in for example, William Faulkner's The Sound and the Fury.

A number of Cheuse's short stories, originally appearing in various literary and mass-market magazines, were collected in Candace and Other Stories; all but the title story were published again in a collection titled The Tennessee Waltz and Other Stories. Although Cheuse clearly prefers to write novel-length, biographically based fiction (currently [1995] he is at work on another historical/biographical novel), he appears to favor "short takes," i.e., thin slices of life, as alternative fiction forms. Here his writing suggests somewhat the minimalist mode of certain stories by the late Raymond Carver. There is an underlying sadness in these tales of unhappy families and family members, each unhappy in a different way. Nashville and country music feature prominently in this assortment. Cheuse's real power as a writer of fiction is most pronounced when he has long pondered, perhaps brooded, over a complicated individual caught up in a formidable struggle with self and ominous circumstances. And though Cheuse in his fiction reflects touches of various contemporaneous authors, he is also capable of producing passages of rare poetic beauty as well as narratives with memorable personal voices, which in a sense sets him apart from some of the better known commercial writers with literary aspirations.

CHILDRESS, Mark

Nationality: American. Born: Monroeville, Alabama, 1957. Education: Attended Louisiana State University, Shreveport, 1974–75; University of Alabama, 1974–78. Career: Writer, Birmingham News, Birmingham, Alabama, 1977–80; features editor, Southern Living, Birmingham, Alabama, 1980–84; regional editor, Atlanta Journal-Constitution, 1984–85. Agent: Frederick Hill Associates, 1842 Union Street, San Francisco, California 94123, U.S.A. Address: San Francisco, California.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A World Made of Fire. New York, Knopf, 1984. V for Victor. New York, Knopf, 1984. Tender. New York, Harmony Books, 1990. Crazy in Alabama. New York, Putnam, 1993. Gone for Good. New York, Knopf, 1998.

Fiction (for children)

Joshua and Bigtooth. Boston, Little, Brown, 1992.Joshua and the Big Bad Blue Crabs. Boston, Little, Brown, 1996.Henry Bobbity Is Missing and It Is All Billy Bobbity's Fault! Birmingham, Alabama, Crane Hill Publishers, 1996.

Plays

Screenplays: Crazy in Alabama. Columbia Pictures, 1999.

* * *

Mark Childress's five novels constitute one of the most interesting bodies of work by a contemporary Southern author. Born in Monroeville, Alabama, hometown of Harper Lee and childhood home of Truman Capote, Childress was positioned literally from birth within a specific literary tradition. However, his novels appear far more influenced by the magic realism of Gabriel Garcia Marquez and the compulsively readable narratives of Stephen King (who has enthusiastically endorsed Childress's work) than by William Faulkner or Eudora Welty. Although three of his five novels are set in his native Alabama, and all of his books demonstrate intimate knowledge of the Southern landscape and Southern mores, Childress seems most preoccupied with two basic themes: the perennial story of alienated youth coming to terms (or not) with their parents, and the more contemporary problem of such youths' desire for media stardom, and the public's willingness to provide it, often at a terrible cost.

Childress's first novel, A World Made of Fire, set in rural Alabama in the first two decades of the twentieth century, tells the story of Stella and her brother Jacko, survivors of a house fire that destroyed their home and family. While Stella struggles to raise her brother with the help of neighbors, Jacko, crippled by polio, begins to display an ability to influence supernaturally the world around him, an ability encouraged by a mysterious old African-American woman named Brown Mary. When Jacko is blamed for a polio epidemic and threatened by the townspeople, his powers save him and punish the guilty, but, by novel's end, it is unclear if his magical relationship with fire will be a force for good or evil. The fantastic elements of the book are convincingly integrated into the narrative, but the book as a whole falters under a melodramatic plot and an overly earnest lyricism. Published when the author was twenty-seven, A World Made of Fire is very much a first novel by a talented and ambitious young author not yet fully in control of his materials.

Childress's next novel, V for Victor, is an impressive leap forward to the spare and controlled narrative skills that mark his later novels. Victor is a teenager forced by a domineering father to care for his dying grandmother on a remote island in Mobile Bay during World War II. The first third of the novel promises a carefully considered coming-of-age story as Victor cares for his grandmother and deals with his brutally abusive father. However, once Victor escapes his father and hooks up with Butch, an outlaw island boy, the novel takes an abrupt turn into the territory of boys' adventure novels. Victor and Butch are very much Tom Sawyer and Huck Finn, with the former's romanticized notions of grand adventure and the latter's refusal to be "civilized," but they are also the Hardy Boys as they become embroiled in a dangerous escapade featuring Nazi spies, submarines, and a variety of explosions. However, V for Victor is not a simple adventure story. Victor and Butch operate within the shadow of dysfunctional families and an unforgiving landscape; by the end of the novel, Victor is cured of his romantic longings.

In a 1994 interview, Childress stated that his third novel, Tender, was written as a novel about Elvis Presley but then rewritten because of the publisher's lawyers' fears of legal challenges from the Presley estate. The result is a roman a clef whose protagonist, Leroy Kirby of Tupelo, Mississippi, rises to unprecedented fame as a rock and roll singer in the 1950s. Childress's longest novel to date is also his most tightly focused, as Kirby's life and career undergo their inevitable rise and fall. The very familiarity of the Presley story enables Childress to spend valuable time with his characters. Kirby's conflicted relationship with his overbearing mother and ineffectual father is memorably detailed, and his ongoing conversation with his dead twin brother yields additional insights into Kirby's character while effectively displaying Childress's tendency toward the fantastic. Additionally, Childress displays both great knowledge of the popular music scene of the 1950s and uncanny insight into the dynamics of fame and the overpowering need of the Leroy Kirbys of the world to not merely rise above their circumstances, but utterly transcend them.

Although quite different in terms of plot and tone from Childress's other novels, Crazy in Alabama, ties in closely to many aspects of the author's earlier books. Like Victor, young Peejoe suspects there must be something beyond the confines of south Alabama; like Leroy Kirby, Peejoe's aunt Lucille will settle for nothing less than show business stardom as an escape from the dismal life of a rural housewife. However, Peejoe's adventure of initiation occurs when he is caught up in the struggles and tragedies of the civil rights movement, while Lucille makes her escape by murdering her oppressive husband and hitting the road for Hollywood, where she realizes her dream of fame with an appearance on the television show The Beverly Hillbillies.

It is easy to see why Crazy in Alabama is Childress's most commercially successful novel to date. In Peejoe's story, Childress finally touches base with his townspeople Lee and Capote through a richly evocative portrait of a small Alabama town and an unflinching examination of racism within that town. In Lucille's story, Childress shows a genuine gift for black comedy as Lucille does whatever is necessary to get what she wants, and reaffirms his penchant for the fantastic as Lucille carries on an ongoing conversation with her husband's severed head, which she carries with her in a sealed Tupperware bowl. Childress makes his case for linking the two stories in a single comment from Lucille: "Like them [African-Americans], she had done something radical to set herself free." Whether such a connection is reasonable or justified is open to debate.

In his most recent novel, Gone for Good, Childress continues his examination of the risk of celebrity while offering his most overt fantasy since A World Made of Fire. When 1970s folk-rock star Ben "Superman" Willis crashes his plane on an island off the coast of Central America, he finds himself in a paradise that is, on the one hand, a refuge for celebrities who have "disappeared" from the world (Marilyn Monroe, Jimmy Hoffa), and, on the other hand, a kind of prison run by a mysterious figure known as "the Magician" and from which there is no escape. As Willis acclimates to his life on the island and ponders his life's mistakes and his ambivalence about his own fame, he becomes privy to some of the island's magic (at one point, "Superman" literally flies) and leads the island's natives in a revolt against the Magician. Back in the "real" world, Willis's teenaged son makes a dangerous journey to find his lost father. The novel is almost a summary of Childress's ongoing concerns. Once again, a young man comes of age by placing himself in danger; once again, Childress conveys the glories and pitfalls of show business performance in extraordinarily convincing detail; once again, fantastic events suggest that, as Willis realizes, "The things we think we know are just stories we have been told. They are not necessarily true." Like the earlier V for Victor, Gone for Good moves from introspection to violent action, in this case with somewhat mixed results; the frantic combat and confrontation in the last third of the novel is less satisfying than the novel's earlier, quieter surreal speculations.

From his second novel on, Mark Childress has proven to be one of the best pure storytellers of his generation. His books have sometimes displayed a problematic tendency toward trying to fit two dissimilar stories into a single novel; in this regard, Tender is arguably his most successfully realized work to date. However, Childress remains a tremendously talented writer who deserves great praise for his willingness to take chances and his insistence on challenging the expectations many readers bring to the work of Southern writers. We may hope that Childress, still in his early forties, will continue to entertain and challenge us for many books to come.

-F. Brett Cox

CHINODYA, Shimmer

Nationality: Zimbabwean. Born: Gweru, Zimbabwe, 30 May 1957. Education: University of Zimbabwe, B.A. (honors) in English 1979; University of Iowa, M.A. in creative writing 1985. Family: Married; two daughters and one son. Career: High school teacher, 1981–81; curriculum developer, 1983–87; editor, publisher and author, 1988–94; Dana Visiting Professor of creative writing, St. Lawrence University, 1995–96. Awards: Commonwealth Writers prize (African region), 1990, for Harvest of Thorns; Zimbabwe Writers award, 1990; Ragdale fellowship, Lake Forest, 1993. Address: 39 Lorraine Drive, Bluff Hill, P.O. Mabelreign, Harare, Zimbabwe.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Dew in the Morning. Gweru, Zimbabwe, Mambo Press, 1982.
Farai's Girls. Harare, Zimbabwe, College Press, 1984.
Child of War. Harare, Zimbabwe, College Press, n.d.
Harvest of Thorns. Harare, Zimbabwe, Baobab, 1989; Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Heinemann, 1991.

Short Stories

Can We Talk, and Other Stories. Harare, Zimbabwe, Baobab Books, 1998.

Other

Classroom Plays for Primary Schools. Harare, Longman Zimbabwe, 1986.

Traditional Tales of Zimbabwe, Books 1-6. Harare, Longman Zimbabwe, 1989.

Poems for Primary Schools. Harare, Longman Zimbabwe, 1990.

*

Shimmer Chinodya comments:

Read voraciously while still young!

* * *

This was your initiation on a rock, in the forests of hoary mountains, with a girl who smelt of blue soap and beans and gunpowder, who wore denims and boots and carried a bazooka on her back; a girl who cut her hair short like a boy and whose fingers were stone-stiff from hauling crates of ammo. You were surprised when she said "Thank you, I needed it," never having thought a woman could say that and you tried to say something nice back, wondering if she knew this was your first time.... You had left her there with your seed in her and would she have your child? ... And what if she had your child? Would she deliver here in the camp? Would she carry the child in a strap together with her bazooka? Would the child look like you?

Thus muses Benjamin Tichafa, a.k.a. Pasi NemaSellout, the central character of Shimmer Chinodya's Harvest of Thorns, after he loses his virginity to a female comrade in a guerrilla camp. The passage encapsulates the central markers of Chinodya's writing: his concern for children, also demonstrated by his children's works; his profound humanism; and his sharp awareness that the personal and specific make up the broad political picture, giving it both its tragedy and its hope.

Critics have referred to Harvest of Thorns as a "coming-of-age" story; others emphasize its politics, reading it as a tale of Zimbabwe's fight for independence. It is these, and more. Chinodya demonstrates that unless people die—as some do, here—they must come of age, inescapably. What that means will be determined by idiosyncratic politics, in conjunction with the oral communication and awareness of community that alone can, in this novel, preserve humanity. Those communal values shape the novel's structure and content, imbuing it with a revolutionary vision belied by its straightforward and engaging style. Postmodern fireworks of language do not interrupt the story here; no narrator self-importantly trumpets about the difficulties of writing. Instead, we are caught up in the story of a young man—but one told in a way not imagined by the traditional bildungsroman.

Harvest of Thorns opens with Benjamin's return to his mother and the brother he accidentally crippled in childhood. After a few days of welcome, tensions grow, and his mother tells Benjamin's young foreign wife, whom he has brought home, that she must know who Benjamin truly is. Intriguingly, however, to show who Benjamin is requires circling into the past—this young man, as all of us, does not come from a vacuum. So, Chinodya recounts the youth of Shamiso, Benjamin's mother. We watch her attract the intentions of Clopas Tichafa, we see their courtship and wedding, and we follow their difficulty conceiving a child—which leads them to consult a doctor and a witch doctor and to attribute their final success to the Church of the Holy Spirit.

This early sequence shows the range of options to which people will turn in their quests. Beliefs, whether gained accidentally or not, determine the family structures in which children are brought up and in turn shape their reactions and their future paths. Through a wholly unpredictable path, his fanatical religious upbringing leads Benjamin to become the guerrilla Pasi NemaSellout.

Chinodya's treatment of the struggle again subverts expectations; battles and atrocities occur but are not central. Rather than glorifying young people fighting for a cause, Chinodya's narrative voice becomes distanced, describing day-to-day concerns. The tedium of finding food, staying dry, and getting enough sleep interweaves with struggles against the group's leader and telling stories around fires to explain the struggle to villagers. But the cause, even death, attract less thought than another interest: sex. Flirtation ends in a sudden, deadly raid by the opposing troops; or in tribal custom and virginity; or in orders to decamp.

Benjamin does grow up: by returning home, reversing the blind movement outward that led him to fight. The struggle, won at a heavy cost, has changed little in everyday life. When Benjamin embraces his place as a son, a brother, a husband, and a father, the novel questions the obstacles he had to overcome. Perhaps, Chinodya suggests, fewer causes and greater human compassion—between men and women, parents and children, neighbors and outsiders—offers the only hope for true political change.

-Victoria Carchidi

CHUTE, Carolyn

Nationality: American. Born: Born Carolyn Penny in Portland, Maine, 14 June 1947. Education: Attended University of Southern Maine, 1972–78. Family: Married 1) James Hawkes in 1963 (divorced 1972); 2) Michael Chute in 1978; one daughter (one son, deceased). Career: Variously professions, including waitress, chicken factory worker, hospital floor scrubber, shoe factory worker, potato farm worker, tutor, canvasser, teacher, social worker, and school bus driver, 1970s–1980s; part-time suburban correspondent, Portland Evening Express, Portland, Maine, 1976–81; instructor in creative writing, University of Southern Maine, Portland, 1985. Lives in Parsonsfield, Maine. Awards: First prize for fiction, Green Mountain Workshop, Johnson, Vermont, 1977. Agent: Jane Gelfman, John Farquharson, Ltd., 250 West 57th Street, Suite 1914, New York, New York 10107, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Beans of Egypt, Maine. New York, Ticknor & Fields, 1985; revised edition published as The Beans of Egypt, Maine: The Finished Version, San Diego, Harcourt Brace, 1995.

Letourneau's Used Auto Parts. New York, Ticknor & Fields, 1988. Merry Men. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1994. Snow Man. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1999.

Other

Up River: The Story of a Maine Fishing Community (nonfiction, with Olive Pierce). Hanover, New Hampshire, University Press of New England, 1996.

Contributor, Inside Vacationland: New Fiction from the Real Maine, edited by Mark Melnicove. South Harpswell, Maine, Dog Ear Press, 1985.

Contributor, I Was Content and Not Content: The Story of Linda Lord and the Closing of Penobscot Poultry, by Cedric N. Chatterley and Alicia J. Rouverol. Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 2000.

* * *

With the publication of her 1985 breakthrough novel The Beans of Egypt, Maine, Carolyn Chute's literary voice was hailed as almost primeval, an immaculately conceived mouthpiece for Maine's rural white underclass. Chute's three subsequent novels have marked her as an uneven literary power—with Snow Man almost universally denounced—but as a major figure, nevertheless. Originality of both subject and tone is perhaps Chute's greatest strength. The Bean family and their literary brethren are landed white trash whose land may be a dump or a swamp, and their house a trailer, and yet they retain the kind of permanence and sustainability that we associate with New England's blue-blooded dynasties. This resilience is Chute's most optimistic message amidst her portraits of people whose lives provide a more obvious opportunity for despair.

Chute's fictional Egypt, Maine, the setting of The Beans and Letourneau's Used Auto Parts is not a consumer culture per se so much as it is a culture of worthless goods that seems all-consuming. Her novels are narratives of failure by middle-class standards, but her characters seem indifferent to their own cultural entrapment; they live their lives fervidly and giddily, for the most part disinterested in middle-class "family values" such as attentive parenting, education, privacy, cleanliness, and good nutrition. Chute depicts an immobile class system that contrasts vividly to the sprawling and rambunctious Beans and their neighbors. These are messy lives and the telling of them is messy too, sometimes hard to follow; characters "gasp" and "choke" and "sputter" their words but seldom simply talk, and the twists and gaps and abrupt narrative shifts structurally replicate Chute's characters' disordered lives.

Throughout her novels sex is a craven and unromantic aspect of everyday life, and sexual relations are foretold with the grim inevitability of Greek drama. Incest and rape are commonplaces, denoted without the accompanying moral assertion that conventionally accompany these acts as literary themes. In her early novels Chute recalls Dorothy Allison's probing of the imprisoning forces of poverty and pregnancy, but does not share Allison's political and feminist agenda. Instead, Chute's portrayal of impoverished families lacks the framing devices of anger, sympathy, or outrage.

The Beans of Egypt, Maine, published after Chute borrowed the money to send the manuscript to a New York editor, tells the story of Earlene Pomerleau. Earlene's childhood fascination with the neighboring Bean clan foretells her eventual marriage to the violent Beal Bean. This marriage is difficult not to interpret as the book's tragic turning point, even though Chute avoids framing this, and other abusive couplings, with a critical eye. Instead, Earlene's decision to marry Beal is represented as the inescapable destiny of a girl, even a smart girl, growing up in Egypt, Maine. But the absence of a judgmental voice does seem amiss when precocious Earlene joins the ranks of always pregnant and often abused Bean mothers, wives, and mistresses. Despite Chute's dispassionate treatment of such lives, it is hard not to see Earlene's fall from spunk and wit to toil and degradation as a tragedy, even if doing so is to be influenced by the very middle-class values that Chute so determinedly resists.

Chute's anger against the establishment, variously represented by government workers, the middle and upper classes in general, and politicians, becomes more distinct with each novel she writes. Letourneau's Used Auto Parts maintains the same buoyant spirit as The Beans, and the title's reference to devalued goods reflects the novel's characters. They are themselves cheerfully recycled goods, in and out of marriages, haphazardly begetting and raising children, living amongst rummage sale bargains, crumbling houses, and conversations disrupted by protests and mumbles. But the entrance into this novel of the "code man," a census government worker who tries to regulate Lucien Letourneau's makeshift family (complete with illegitimate children, evicted neighbors, and a homeless old woman) establishes a theme even more overt in Chute's later novels: the disciplinary evil of the state.

Chute's most recent two novels are increasingly hostile in tone and her portrait of an unjust ruling class more reactionary than believable. In Merry Men Lloyd Barrington is a modern-day Robin Hood who has an affair with wealthy and hypocritical Gwen Curry Doyle, widow of a capitalist "devil" and Chute's scapegoat for the abuses and absurdities of capitalism. Lloyd is not one of Chute's typically down-and-out Maine workers—he's a poet and a college graduate, so his decision to be a gravedigger is exactly that—a decision that heroically marks his rejection of middle-class conventionality. Nothing and no one can make Lloyd anything but a kind of saint in gravedigger's clothing, and Chute's message is that "real" men can escape the pressures of corporate and soulless society and follow an independent, even consciously ignoble, path.

Snow Man, published in 1998, was almost routinely dismissed. Critics complained that the "activist has silenced the novelist" in this treatment of bourgeois hypocrisy. Robert Drummond, a construction-worker/militia man from Maine assassinates a U.S. senator and we are asked to condone this murder on the grounds that the senator was a corporate lackey. Following the murder, Drummond seduces the senator's daughter, a poorly drawn caricature of a Radcliffe-educated feminist/professor, and then he seduces her mother. What makes Snow Man disappointing is Chute's departure from what she does best: illustrate the lives of Maine's poor with humor, ingenuity, and a narrative voice largely indifferent to precedent.

Chute has said that it is not "the place of fiction to make judgments—to prescribe changes," which confirms the dispassionate tone of The Beans of Egypt, Maine and Letourneau's Used Auto Parts. But in Merry Men and Snow Man Chute does appear to be writing prescriptively, demarcating characters as good and bad depending on their class association. At times the spiritedness of her characters compensates for the abuses they suffer. At other times, however, their own complicity in their damaged lives is troubling, and the placement of blame on a weakly drawn middle- and upper-class establishment is reductive.

What is so surprising about Chute's better novels is that the lives of her Egypt-dwellers manage to be messily unpredictable and overdetermined by the grim yoke of poverty at the same time. Chute's slight of hand, her ability to illustrate a culture paradoxically composed of vitality and defeat, is truly original. At her strongest Chute writes, or rather sounds, like no one else: her dialogue and descriptions are rendered with the nuances and rhythms of real conversations and all of their staccato incongruities. To Lucien Letourneau, the almost god-like patriarch of Letourneau's Used Auto Parts, "everything is a miracle," and in Chute's improbable universe, we can begin to see his point. For despite its cruelty, even poverty is not without its own inchoate beauty.

-Tabitha Sparks

CISNEROS, Sandra

Nationality: American. Born: Chicago, Illinois, 20 December 1954. Education: Loyola University, B.A. 1976; University of Iowa, M.F.A. 1978. Career: Teacher, Latino Youth Alternative High School, Chicago, Illinois, 1978-80; college recruiter and counselor for minority students, Loyola University, Chicago, Illinois, 1981–82; artist-in-residence, Foundation Michael Karolyi, Vence, France, 1983; literature director, Guadalupe Cultural Arts Center, San Antonio, Texas, 1984-85; guest professor, California State University, Chico, 1987-88, University of California, Berkeley, 1988, University of California, Irvine, 1990, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, 1990, University of New Mexico, Albuquerque, 1991. Awards: National Endowment for the Arts fellow, 1982, 1988; American Book Award (Before Columbus Foundation), 1985; Paisano Dobie fellowship, 1986; first and second proize, Segundo Concurso Nacional del Cuento Chicano (University of Arizona); Lannan Foundation Literary Award, 1991; H.D.L., State University of New York at Purchase, 1993; MacArthur fellow, 1995. Agent: Susan Bergholz Literary Services, 17 West 10th Street, Suite 5, New York, New York 10011, U.S.A. Address: Alfred A. Knopf Books, 201 East 50th Street, New York, New York 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The House on Mango Street. Houston, Texas, Arte Publico Press, 1984.

Short Stories

Woman Hollering Creek and Other Stories. New York, Random House, 1991.

Poetry

Bad Boys. Mango Publications, 1980.

My Wicked, Wicked Ways. Bloomington, Indiana, Third Woman Press, 1987.

Loose Woman. New York, Knopf, 1994.

Other

Foreword, Camellia Street by Merco Rodoreda, translated by David H. Rosenthal. Saint Paul, Minnesota, Graywolf Press, 1993.

Hairs: Pelitos (juvenile, bilingual), translated from the English by Liliana Valenzuela, illustrated by Terry Ybanez, New York, Knopf, 1994.

Introduction, My First Book of Proverbs/Mi primer libro de dichos by Ralfka Gonzalez and Ana Ruiz. Emeryville, California, Children's Book Press, 1995.

Foreword, Holler If You Hear Me: The Education of a Teacher and His Students by Gregory Michie. New York, Teachers College Press, 1999.

Contributor, Daughters of the Fifth Sun: A Collection of Latin Fiction and Poetry, edited by Bryce Milligan, et al. New York, Riverhead, 1995.

Contributor, Chicken Soup for the Teenage Soul: 101 Stories of Life, Love and Learning, edited by Jack Canfield, et al. Health Communications, 1997.

Contributor, Leaning into the Wind: Women Write from the Heart of the West, edited by Linda M. Hasselstrom, et al. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1997.

Contributor, A Book of Poems, edited by Mark Warren. San Francisco, M. Warren, 1998.

Contributor, Growing Up Ethnic in America: Contemporary Fiction about Learning to Be American, edited by Maria Mazziotti Gillan and Jennifer Gillan. New York, Penguin, 1999.

Contributor, Bearing Life: Women's Writings on Childlessness, edited by Rochelle Ratner. Consortium, 2000.

*

Critical Studies: Interviews with Writers of the Post-Colonial World, conducted and edited by Feroza Jussawalla and Reed Way Dasenbrock, Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1992; Having Our Way: Women Rewriting Tradition in Twentieth-Century America, edited by Harriett Pollack, Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, Bucknell University Press, 1995; Sandra Cisneros' The House on Mango Street by Elizabeth L.

Chesla, Piscataway, New Jersey, Research & Educational Association, 1996; Sandra Cisneros: Latina Writer and Activist by Caryn Mirriam-Goldberg, Springfield, New Jersey, Enslow, 1998.

* * *

Chicana feminist, poet, and novelist, Sandra Cisneros, has been described most recently as "frankly erotic" (New York Daily News) and as a writer "whose literary voice is a deluge of playfulness, naughtiness, heartbreak, and triumph" (The Miami Herald). On the cover of her latest volume of poetry, Loose Woman, Time magazine describes her as "a unique feminist voice that is at once frank, saucy, realistic, audacious." Cisneros would likely agree with her critics—for she, herself, rounds out this R-rated collection with a fierce and powerful self-assessment: "I'm Bitch. Beast. Macha." But to understand the resonating irony of such a statement—to hear at once the laughter and the rage in Cisneros's wanton self-stereotyping—we need to return to the innocent world of Mango Street, the fictional space where Cisneros first became a writer.

Her first novel, and perhaps most widely read work to date, The House on Mango Street tells the heartwarming story of Esperanza Cordero, the young Chicana heroine who, like Cisneros herself, "comes of age" in a Chicago barrio, despite obstacles imposed by racism, classism, and sexism. A collection of forty-four seemingly unrelated vignettes, the novel's style may appear simplistic and choppy, but Esperanza's character is the center of consciousness that provides both coherence and perspective from chapter to chapter. Because her interactions with relatives and friends help Esperanza to define her goals, critics are right to say she is at once dependent on and critical of the Chicano community; like Cisneros herself, Esperanza embraces her culture warmly, but criticizes gender injustices within it. In this sense, as Julian Olivares points out, Cisneros "breaks the paradigm of the traditional female bildungsroman"—where female characters, unlike their male counterparts, are typically portrayed as seeking solely marriage and motherhood, resulting in a restriction or loss of freedom. After observing her mother's lifetime of sacrifices and her friends' physical and sexual abuse at the hands of men, Esperanza instead desires to leave the barrio, have a house of her own, and become a writer. These goals are not intended merely for her own self-improvement, however, but to educate others-especially the women—in her community as well.

Many critics have drawn obvious parallels between Cisneros's life and that of Esperanza in Mango Street: both have a Mexican father and a Mexican-American mother, and thereby straddle two cultures; both desire to leave the barrio to become writers; both eventually find "a home in the heart"—which translates to the ability to succeed individually (to call her "home" her "self"), and collectively on behalf of the community (to reinvent certain cultural stereotypes for all Chicanos). In personal interviews, Cisneros confided that it was not until she took graduate-level writing workshops with predominantly white, wealthy classmates, that she began tapping into her "difference" in order to create unique writing material; thus, upon remembering and sketching characters and events from her impoverished childhood, Cisneros at last developed her own voice as a writer—one she had previously suppressed and sacrificed because there were no Chicano/a models in her classes to emulate. Similarly, this budding decisiveness applies to her character, Esperanza, as well. For example, Cisneros describes Mango Street as "a very political work ... about a woman in her twenties coming to her political consciousness as a feminist woman of color." Surely, this statement describes Cisneros's own experience, as well as Esperanza's.

One cultural stereotype that Cisneros attempts to reinvent is the portrayal of women in Chicano literature, which only reaffirms patriarchal values and the unrealistic, if not abusive, treatment of Chicanas. In an interview, Cisneros explains how the two role models in Mexican culture—la Virgen de Guadalupe y la Malinche—are difficult for women to negotiate. They signify the extremes of saint and traitor, respectively, and there are no ''in-betweens.'' Women are often sanctified or vilified, but rarely are they portrayed as ordinary or acceptable; therefore, their natural sexuality—and even their beauty—are often punished by protective fathers and brothers.

If The House on Mango Street paved the way for Cisneros's coming-into-feminist-consciousness, then her first volume of poetry, My Wicked, Wicked Ways took that new self-awareness one step further in its confrontation of a taboo subject in Chicano culture: a woman's (liberal) sexuality. The title of the collection, therefore, is simply ironic: while her culture may view her as "wicked"—she writes about choosing not to marry, traveling abroad on her own, and sleeping with various men—for Cisneros, the term does not mean "evil," but free; her poetry abounds in positive personal choices. The title thus pokes fun at the stereotypical notion that she is (wrongly) considered "wicked" by her culture for merely articulating her own story in her poems.

In her collection of short fiction Woman Hollering Creek, Cisneros returns to many of the same coming-of-age themes explored in Mango Street—pre-teen anxiety, sibling relationships in a culture where girls are less valued than boys, loss of virginity and its shameful consequences, and identity conflicts from living on both sides of the Mexican border. The stories represent a range of authorial voices—from young girls to housewives—who struggle with gender inequality in their culture and their lives. Perhaps the character that best bridges the adolescent Esperanza of Mango Street and the mature, confident macha of Cisneros's "Loose Woman" poem, is the young bride, Cleofilas, the protagonist of the eponymous story, "Woman Hollering Creek." Based on the myth of the Llorona legend about a poor Mexican woman who drowned her children and died of grief after her husband abandoned her for another woman, Cisneros's story reinvents the tragic tale when Cleofilas is similarly victimized by an abusive husband and escapes a life of silent suffering in exchange for freedom across the border. At the end of the story, Cleofilas leaves her husband and crosses the arroyo to begin her own life, thus replacing the legendary wail of La Llorona with her own "ribbon of laughter, like water."

If we now return to the end of the 1994 collection Loose Woman, to Cisneros's brazen declaration, "I'm a macha, hell on wheels," we understand that her tone is playful, but her message quite serious. Any writer who publicly implores publishers to print the work of younger Chicanas, as Cisneros does, is not truly "bad" as this poem implies. Once again, Cisneros is merely redefining stereotypical labels. In this collection, after supporting herself by her writing for ten years and living as "nobody's wife and nobody's mother" in a house of her own, Cisneros asserts her most confident identity—one that is comfortable with the contradictions of living in two cultures. In an interview, Cisneros claimed to be "reinventing the word 'loose." It no longer need mean promiscuous, but rather, free. "I really feel that I'm the loose," she said, "and I've cut free from a lot of things that anchored me." While Cisneros has described her Wicked Ways (writing) days as "wandering in the desert," she calls her recent collection, Loose Woman, a celebration of the home in her heart. Currently, Cisneros lives in San Antonio, Texas, and is working on another novel called "Carmelito."

—Susan E. Cushman

CLARKE, Arthur C(harles)

Nationality: British. Born: Minehead, Somerset, 16 December 1917. Education: Huish's Grammar School, Taunton, Somerset, 1927–36; King's College, London, 1946-48, B.Sc. (honours) in physics and mathematics 1948. Military Service: Flight Lieutenant in the Royal Air Force, 1941-46; served as Radar Instructor, and Technical Officer on the first Ground Controlled Approach radar; originated proposal for use of satellites for communications, 1945. Family: Married Marilyn Mayfield in 1954 (divorced 1964). Career: Assistant auditor, Exchequer and Audit Department, London, 1936-41; assistant editor, Physics Abstracts, London, 1949–50; since 1954, engaged in underwater exploration and photography of the Great Barrier Reef of Australia and the coast of Sri Lanka. Director, Rocket Publishing, London, Underwater Safaris, Colombo, and the Spaceward Corporation, New York. Has made numerous radio and television appearances (most recently as presenter of the television series Arthur C. Clarke's Mysterious World, 1980, and World of Strange Powers, 1985), and has lectured widely in Britain and the United States; commentator, for CBS-TV, on lunar flights of Apollo 11, 12 and 15; Vikram Sarabhai Professor, Physical Research Laboratory, Ahmedabad, India, 1980. Awards: International Fantasy award, 1952; Hugo award, 1956, 1969 (for screenplay), 1974, 1980; Unesco Kalinga prize, 1961; Boys' Clubs of America award, 1961; Franklin Institute Ballantine medal, 1963; Aviation-Space Writers Association Ball award, 1965; American Association for the Advancement of Science-Westinghouse Science Writing award, 1969; Playboy award, 1971; Nebula award, 1972, 1973, 1979; Jupiter award, 1973; John W. Campbell Memorial award, 1974; American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics award, 1974; Boston Museum of Science Washburn award, 1977; Marconi fellowship, 1982; Science Fiction Writers of America Grand Master award, 1986; Vidya Jyothi medal, 1986; International Science Policy Foundation medal, 1992; Lord Perry award, 1992; Presidential Award, University of Illinois, 1997. D.Sc.: Beaver College, Glenside, Pennsylvania, 1971. D.Litt.: University of Liverpool, 1995; University of Hong Kong, 1996. Chair, British Interplanetary Society, 1946-47, 1950-53. Guest of Honor, World Science Fiction Convention, 1956. Fellow, Royal Astronomical Society; Fellow, King's College, London, 1977; Chancellor, University of Moratuwa, Sri Lanka, since 1979. C.B.E. (Commander, Order of the British Empire), 1989; knighted, 1998. European satellite, launched in April 2000, named after Clarke in recognition of his contribution to the development of global communication networks. Agent: David Higham Associates Ltd., 5–8 Lower John Street, London W1R 4HA, England; or, Scouil, Chichak, Galen Literary Agency, 381 Park Avenue, New York, New York 10016, U.S.A. Address: 25 Barnes Place, Colombo 7, Sri Lanka; or, Dene Court, Bishop's Lydeard, Taunton, Somerset TA4 3LT, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

- Prelude to Space. New York, Galaxy, 1951; London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 1953; as Master of Space, New York, Lancer 1961; as The Space Dreamers, Lancer, 1969.
- The Sands of Mars. London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 1951; New York, Gnome Press, 1952.
- Against the Fall of Night. New York, Gnome Press, 1953; revised edition, as The City and the Stars, London, Muller, and New York, Harcourt Brace, 1956.
- Childhood's End. New York, Ballantine, 1953; London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 1954.
- Earthlight. London, Muller, and New York, Ballantine, 1955, 1998.The Deep Range. New York, Harcourt Brace, and London, Muller, 1957.
- Across the Sea of Stars (omnibus). New York, Harcourt Brace, 1959.
  A Fall of Moondust. London, Gollancz, and New York, Harcourt Brace, 1961.
- From the Oceans, From the Stars (omnibus). New York, Harcourt Brace, 1962.
- Glide Path. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1963; London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 1969.
- An Arthur C. Clarke Omnibus [and Second Omnibus]. London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 2 vols., 1965–68.
- Prelude to Mars (omnibus). New York, Harcourt Brace, 1965.
- 2001: A Space Odyssey (novelization of screenplay), with Stanley Kubrick. New York, New American Library, and London, Hutchinson, 1968; with a new introduction, Thorndike, Maine, G. K. Hall, 1994.
- The Lion of Comarre, and Against the Fall of Night. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1968; London, Gollancz, 1970.
- Rendezvous with Rama. London, Gollancz, and New York, Harcourt Brace, 1973.
- Imperial Earth. London, Gollancz, 1975; revised edition, New York, Harcourt Brace, 1976.
- The Fountains of Paradise. London, Gollancz, and New York, Harcourt Brace, 1979.
- 2010: Odyssey Two. New York, Ballantine, and London, Granada, 1982.
- The Songs of Distant Earth. London, Grafton, and New York, Ballantine, 1986.
- 2061: Odyssey Three. New York, Ballantine, and London, Grafton, 1988.
- Cradle, with Gentry Lee. London, Gollancz, and New York, Warner, 1988.
- Rama II, with Gentry Lee. London, Gollancz, and New York, Bantam, 1989.
- Beyond the Fall of Night, with Gregory Benford. New York, Putnam, 1990; with Against the Fall of Night, London, Gollancz, 1991.
- The Ghost from the Grand Banks. New York, Bantam, and London, Gollancz, 1990.
- The Garden of Rama, with Gentry Lee. London, Gollancz, and New York, Bantam, 1991.
- Rama Revealed, with Gentry Lee. London, Gollancz, and New York, Bantam, 1993.
- The Hammer of God. London, Gollancz, and New York, Bantam, 1993.

- Richter 10, with Mike McQuay. New York, Bantam Books, 1996.
- 3001: The Final Odyssey. New York, Ballantine Books, 1997.
- The Trigger, with Michael Kube-McDowell. New York, Bantam Books, 1999.
- The Light of Other Days, with Stephen Baxter. New York, Tor, 2000.

Short Stories

- Expedition to Earth. New York, Ballantine, 1953; London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 1954; New York, Ballantine, 1998.
- Reach for Tomorrow. New York, Ballantine, 1956; London, Gollancz, 1962; New York, Ballantine, 1998.
- Tales from the White Hart. New York, Ballantine, 1957; London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 1972; New York, Ballantine, 1998.
- The Other Side of the Sky. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1958; London, Gollancz, 1961.
- Tales of Ten Worlds. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1962; London, Gollancz, 1963.
- The Nine Billion Names of God: The Best Short Stories of Arthur C. Clarke. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1967.
- The Wind from the Sun: Stories of the Space Age. New York, Harcourt Brace, and London, Gollancz, 1972.
- Of Time and Stars: The Worlds of Arthur C. Clarke. London, Gollancz, 1972.
- The Best of Arthur C. Clarke 1937–1971, edited by Angus Wells. London Sidgwick and Jackson, 1973.
- The Sentinel. New York, Berkley, 1983; London, Panther, 1985.
- A Meeting with Medusa, with Green Mars, by Kim Stanley Robinson. New York, Tor, 1988.
- Tales from Planet Earth. London, Century, 1989; New York, Bantam, 1990.

Plays

Screenplay: 2001: A Space Odyssey, with Stanley Kubrick, 1968.

Other

- Interplanetary Flight: An Introduction to Astronautics. London, Temple Press, 1950; New York, Harper, 1951; revised edition, 1960.
- The Exploration of Space. London, Temple Press, and New York, Harper, 1951; revised edition, 1959.
- Islands in the Sky (for children). London, Sidgwick and Jackson, and Philadelphia, Winston, 1952.
- The Young Traveller in Space (for children). London, Phoenix House, 1954; as Going into Space, New York, Harper, 1954; as The Scottie Book of Space Travel, London, Transworld, 1957; revised edition, with Robert Silverberg, as Into Space, New York, Harper, 1971.
- The Exploration of the Moon. London, Muller, 1954; New York, Harper, 1955.
- The Coast of Coral. London, Muller, and New York, Harper, 1956.The Making of a Moon: The Story of the Earth Satellite Program.London, Muller, and New York, Harper, 1957; revised edition, Harper, 1958.
- The Reefs of Taprobane: Underwater Adventures Around Ceylon. London, Muller, and New York, Harper, 1957.

Voice Across the Sea. London, Muller, 1958; New York, Harper, 1959; revised edition, London, Mitchell Beazley, and Harper, 1974.

Boy Beneath the Sea (for children). New York, Harper, 1958.

The Challenge of the Spaceship: Previews of Tomorrow's World. New York, Harper, 1959; London, Muller, 1960.

The First Five Fathoms: A Guide to Underwater Adventure. New York, Harper, 1960.

The Challenge of the Sea. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1960; London, Muller, 1961.

Indian Ocean Adventure. New York, Harper, 1961; London, Barker, 1962.

Profiles of the Future: An Enquiry into the Limits of the Possible. London, Gollancz, 1962; New York, Harper, 1963; revised edition, Harper, 1973; Gollancz, 1974, 1982; New York, Holt Rinehart, 1984.

Dolphin Island (for children). New York, Holt Rinehart, and London, Gollancz, 1963.

The Treasure of the Great Reef. London, Barker, and New York, Harper, 1964; revised edition, New York, Ballantine, 1974.

Indian Ocean Treasure, with Mike Wilson. New York, Harper, 1964; London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 1972.

Man and Space, with the editors of Life. New York, Time, 1964.

Voices from the Sky: Previews of the Coming Space Age. New York, Harper, 1965; London, Gollancz, 1966.

The Promise of Space. New York, Harper, and London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1968.

First on the Moon, with the astronauts. London, Joseph, and Boston, Little Brown, 1970.

Report on the Planet Three and Other Speculations. London, Gollancz, and New York, Harper, 1972.

The Lost Worlds of 2001. New York, New American Library, and London, Sidgwick and Jackson, 1972.

Beyond Jupiter: The Worlds of Tomorrow, with Chesley Bonestell. Boston, Little Brown, 1972.

Technology and the Frontiers of Knowledge (lectures), with others. New York, Doubleday, 1973.

The View from Serendip (on Sri Lanka). New York, Random House, 1977; London, Gollancz, 1978.

1984: Spring: A Choice of Futures. New York, Ballantine, and London, Granada, 1984.

Ascent to Orbit: A Scientific Autobiography: The Technical Writings of Arthur C. Clarke. New York and Chichester, Sussex, Wiley, 1984.

The Odyssey File, with Peter Hyams. New York, Ballantine, and London, Granada, 1985.

Astounding Days: A Science-Fictional Autobiography. London, Gollancz, 1989; New York, Bantam, 1990.

How the World Was One: Beyond the Global Village. London, Gollancz, and New York, Bantam, 1992.

By Space Possessed: Essays on the Exploration of Space. London, Gollancz, 1993.

The Snows of Olympus: A Garden on Mars. London, Gollancz, 1994. Greetings, Carbon-Based Bipeds!: Collected Essays, 1934–1998, edited by Ian T. Macauley. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1999.

Editor, Time Probe: Sciences in Science Fiction. New York, Delacorte Press, 1966; London, Gollancz, 1967.

Editor, The Coming of the Space Age: Famous Accounts of Man's Probing of the Universe. London, Gollancz, and New York, Meredith, 1967.

Editor, with George Proctor, The Science Fiction Hall of Fame 3: The Nebula Winners 1965–1969. New York, Avon, 1982.

Editor, July 20, 2019: A Day in the Life of the 21st Century. New York, Macmillan, 1986; London, Grafton, 1987.

*

Bibliography: Arthur C. Clarke: A Primary and Secondary Bibliography by David N. Samuelson, Boston, Hall, 1984.

Manuscript Collection: Mugar Memorial Library, Boston University.

Critical Studies: "Out of the Ego Chamber" by Jeremy Bernstein, in New Yorker, 9 August 1969; Arthur C. Clarke edited by Joseph D. Olander and Martin H. Greenberg, New York, Taplinger, and Edinburgh, Harris, 1977; The Space Odysseys of Arthur C. Clarke by George Edgar Slusser, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1978; Arthur C. Clarke (includes bibliography) by Eric S. Rabkin, West Linn, Oregon, Starmont House, 1979, revised edition, 1980; Against the Night, The Stars: The Science Fiction of Arthur C. Clarke by John Hollow, New York, Harcourt Brace, 1983, revised edition, Athens, Ohio University Press-Swallow Press, 1987; Odyssey: The Authorized Biography of Arthur C. Clarke by Neil McAleer, Chicago, Contemporary Books, and London, Gollancz, 1992; Arthur C. Clarke: A Critical Companion by Robin Anne Reid. Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1997; Arthur C. Clarke and Lord Dunsany, a Correspondence, edited by Keith Allen Daniels. San Francisco, Anamnesis Press, 1998.

Arthur C. Clarke comments:

I regard myself primarily as an entertainer and my ideals are Maugham, Kipling, Wells. My chief aim is the old SF cliché, "The search for wonder." However, I am almost equally interested in style and rhythm, having been much influenced by Tennyson, Swinburne, Housman, and the Georgian poets.

My main themes are exploration (space, sea, time), the position of Man in the hierarchy of the universe, and the effect of contact with other intelligences. The writer who probably had most influence on me was W. Olaf Stapledon (Last and First Men).

* * *

Although Arthur C. Clarke's success in the literary field began in the 1950s, his early involvement in the 1930s with the British Interplanetary Society (BIS) heralded his intellectual devotion to outer space. Later, as an enlisted officer in the Royal Air Force, Clarke wrote "Extra Terrestrial Relays" (1945), a prescient article detailing a communications satellite system that predated by two decades the eventual launching of the Early Bird synchronous satellites. Finally, Clarke's first books, the nonfiction Interplanetary Flight and its successor, The Exploration of Space, promoted space travel. The ease with which he rendered complex scientific principles catapulted The Exploration of Space into a Book-of-the-Month selection.

Capitalizing on the relationships he fostered through his affiliation with BIS, Clarke wrote nineteen science fiction (sf) stories—some published under the pseudonyms Charles Willis and E.G. O'Brien—before his first two novels, Prelude to Space and The Sands of Mars, were published in 1951. While Peter Nicholls remarks in The Encyclopedia of Science Fiction that these early works are marred by wooden prose and a somewhat mechanical structure, the novels do prefigure the scientific optimism, technological sense of wonder, and sheer entertainment value that dominate Clarke's philosophy and define his sf writing.

A jewel in the wealth of Clarke's short stories, "Sentinel of Eternity," reprinted in Expedition to Earth as "The Sentinel," shines forth, as it is the inspiration for Stanley Kubrick's landmark movie 2001: A Space Odyssey and Clarke's 2001 novel adaptation. 2001 tells the story of the Discovery, a spaceship operated by an intelligent computer, HAL 9000. The ship is sent into outer space to track a mysterious signal emanating from a black monolith on Earth's moon. HAL's secret agenda slowly eliminates Discovery's human crew save Dave Bowman who, encountering a mirror monolith on a Saturn moon, evolves into the Star Child. This narrative of an enigmatic alien artifact, also shown four million years in the past helping encourage the dawn of Man, embodies the scientific and metaphysical qualities of Clarke's writings. Nicholls considers these qualities as Clarke's central paradox; namely, that a writer exploring scientific theories and detailing technological advances should be drawn to the metaphysical, mystical, even quasi-religious essence of space and the universe at large.

Never one to avoid the tensions between science and religion, Clarke's darkly comic "The Nine Billion Names of God" depicts Tibetan monks who, with the aid of Western computer salesmen and technicians, count all the names of God and, fulfilling the purpose of Man, trigger the end of the universe. In the Hugo-winning "The Star," Clarke offers the reader a Jesuit astrophysicist questioning his faith after discovering evidence that the star of Bethlehem, which had announced the birth of Christ to the Three Wise Men, was a supernova that destroyed an entire alien race. "Although the narrator's faith is troubled," writes David N. Samuelson in Science Fiction Writers, "his trust in science—like Clarke's—is not."

Childhood's End, Clarke's first successful sf novel, is replete with his thematic interests in its offering of humanity's transcendent evolution under the guidance and tutelage of the Overlords, a devilshaped alien species steering Earth towards an admittedly ambiguous utopia. The true mission of the Overlords is revealed when Jeff Greggson—son of George and Jean Greggson, who, with others, have rejected the Overlords and established an independent New Athens begins displaying extrasensory powers. Humanity's maturation, it seems, is available only to Earth's children whose mental evolution draws them into the Overmind, a galactic entity transcending physical form. Barred from achieving their own transcendence, the Overlords watch humanity's evolutionary leap while Jan Rodericks, returning from the Overlords' home planet, remains as the last human to record Earth's final destruction. The novel is bittersweet as it announces humanity's next step up the evolutionary ladder while, in the same breath, condemning a humanity left behind.

City and the Stars—an updated and expanded version of Clarke's earlier Against the Fall of Night—depicts the far-future city of Diaspar as an enclosed urban utopia mediated by a complex computerized system. The protagonist Alvin is a "pure pattern" born out of the Memory Banks matrix, the first human born on Earth in ten million years. With the help of Khedron, a jester designed to introduce randomness into the highly regulated cityscape, Alvin escapes Diaspar only to find a parallel race of mentally evolved agrarian humans living in the town of Lys. Joined by the Lys-born Hilvar, Alvin uncovers a long-buried spaceship and proceeds into outer space to encounter the Vanamonde, a body-less consciousness created to defend Earth from the destructive powers of the equally bodiless Shalmirance. City and the Stars narrates humanity's divergent evolution along mental and technical paths, its subsequent consequences and resultant retreat from outer space, and a resurgent humanity once again reaching out to the stars. With the closing sunset/sunrise imagery symbolizing the eclipse of one epoch and the dawn of another, the "final passages blend a sense of loss and of transcendence with an almost mystical intensity," notes Nicholls.

While non-fiction books and articles—many of them dealing with undersea exploration—dominated Clarke's output in the 1960s, Rendezvous with Rama was the first of an unprecedented three-book deal Clarke signed following the immense success of 2001. Rama follows a group of humans, led by Captain Bill Norton, who explore a derelict artifact (dubbed "Rama") hurtling through space towards the inner solar system. While exploration and adventure dominate a story full of surprises and technological wonders, transcendence and closure are denied in Rama as the ship's intentions are withheld, only to be explored further in a series of sequels—Rama II, Garden of Rama, and Rama Revealed-written in collaboration with Gentry Lee. Although Clarke's original Rama swept the awards circuit (winning the Hugo, Nebula, John W. Campbell Memorial Award and British Science Fiction Award), controversy swirled as to whether the book, due to its stylistic flaws and narrative structure, actually deserved the awards or whether the accolade stemmed from the return to fiction of a much beloved sf author.

Clarke's next two novels, Imperial Earth: A Fantasy of Love and Discord and The Fountains of Paradise, offer a treasure trove of technological wonders and scientific imagery. Imperial Earth, notable for descriptions of outer-planet mining, spaceship propulsion, and cloning, tells the story of Titan native Duncan Mackenzie's investigation of political and scientific intrigues on Earth and his bid, through cloning, to procure an heir to his empire. The Fountains of Paradise narrates Vannevar Morgan's attempts to construct a space elevator designed to escape Earth's gravity. Fleshing out the story are two revelations: first, a highly advanced galactic civilization has communicated with the human race through a robot probe; and, second, Prince Kalidasa had challenged the gods 2,000 years earlier by attempting to build a tower into heaven on Taprobane, the same island-site for Morgan's space elevator. While The Fountains of Paradise won the Hugo, some critics fault the novel for abruptly dropping the Kalidasa storyline and centering the action on a somewhat stereotyped Morgan. Nevertheless, both novels broach the topics of science, technological marvels, and the bid for a taste of immortality, if not godhood.

The 1980s saw Clarke attempt the impossible; namely, to catch lightning in a bottle and write two sequels to 2001. 2010: Odyssey Two and 2061: Odyssey Three attempt to continue the magical weave of science, transcendence, and mystery embodied in the black monolith; unfortunately, the books fail to evoke the same narrative momentum as 2001. 2010 is a proficient book offering a distinctly human story as American/Russian tensions threaten a joint rescue mission of Dave Bowman's Discovery and the reactivation of HAL 9000. 2061 follows Heywood Floyd's exploration of Halley's comet and his subsequent redirection to the Jovian moon of Europa—the one place the monoliths had expressively forbidden humans to visit. While Clarke attempts to sustain the mystery of the monolith through the course of these books, critics feel the monolith was adequately explained in 2001 or, on the other hand, disappointingly depicted in the subsequent sequels. Although the 2001 sequels offer high-caliber scientific ideas and wondrous descriptions of the universe, Clarke's success at plot advancement and narrative vision is questionable.

The lukewarm critical reception of the 2001 sequels is symptomatic of the response to Clarke's contemporary work; in fact, divergent opinions on Clarke's narrative execution has increasingly dogged the latter phase of his career. For example, popular and critical responses to The Songs of Distant Earth—an expansion of a 1958 short story about human survivors introducing conflict to the inhabited utopia of Thallassa—and Richter 10 (with Mike McQuay)—a futuristic disaster novel—question the plausibility of Clarke's science, the privileging of scientific principles over plot development, and a pacing that is described alternately as taut and long-winded.

Quite possibly the most surprising novel of the 1990s was 3001: The Final Odyssey, supposedly the last of the Odyssey series. In this story, Frank Poole, long believed dead, is revived from a frozen state and is surprised to find the Europa monolith has absorbed Dave Bowman and HAL. Once again, critical opinion varies, as some view the narrative as reasonably written with thoughtful explorations of technology and Freudian theory, while others consider the novel's contemporary rendition of the once-transcendent monolith as an alien threat to be a disappointing treatment with few surprises.

Despite increasingly ill health, Clarke has continued to produce a voluminous literary output, often writing in collaboration with contemporary sf authors who grew up reading his early work. Indeed, after more than 50 novels, 35 non-fiction texts, 600 articles and short stories, numerous television scripts, and stints as a commentator during the Apollo moon landings, the Science Fiction Writers of America acknowledged Clarke's extensive contributions and continuing output and bestowed upon him Grand Master status in 1986. Armed with a scientific optimism and a cosmic, even transcendent, perception of humanity's role in an infinitely larger universe, Arthur C. Clarke is credited with helping revolutionize the sf genre from the Golden Age of the 1940s and 1950s through six decades of sf writing and into a new millennium that begins, as Clarke impatiently reiterates, in 2001.

-Graham J. Murphy

CLARKE, Austin C(hesterfield)

Nationality: Barbadian. Born: Barbados, 26 July 1934. Education: Combermere Boys' School, Barbados; Harrison's College, Barbados; Trinity College, University of Toronto. Family: Married Betty Joyce Reynolds in 1957; three children. Career: Reporter in Timmins and Kirkland Lake, Ontario, 1959-60; since 1963, freelance producer and broadcaster, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Toronto; scriptwriter, Educational Television, Toronto; Ziskind Professor of Literature, Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts, 1968-69; Hoyt Fellow, 1968, and visiting lecturer, 1969, 1970, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut; fellow, Indiana University School of Letters, Bloomington, 1969; Margaret Bundy Scott Visiting Professor of Literature, Williams College, Williamstown, Massachusetts, 1971; lecturer, Duke University, Durham, North Carolina, 1971-72; visiting professor, University of Texas, Austin, 1973-74; cultural and press attaché, Embassy of Barbados, Washington, D.C., 1974-76; writer-in-residence, Concordia University, Montreal, 1977. General manager, Caribbean Broadcasting Corporation, St. Michael, Barbados, 1975-76. Member, Board of Trustees, Rhode Island School of Design, Providence, 1970–75; vice-chair, Ontario Board of Censors, 1983-85. Since 1988 member, Immigration and Refugee Board of Canada. Awards: Belmont Short Story award, 1965; University of Western Ontario President's medal, 1966; Canada Council senior arts fellowship, 1967, 1970, and grant, 1977; Casa de las Americas prize, 1980; Toronto Arts award, for writing, 1993; Toronto Pride Achievement award, for writing, 1995. Agent: Phyllis Westberg, Harold Ober Associates, 425 Madison Avenue, New York, New York 10017, U.S.A. Address: 62 McGill Street, Toronto, Ontario M5B 1H2, Canada.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Survivors of the Crossing. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, and London, Heinemann, 1964.

Amongst Thistles and Thorns. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, and London, Heinemann, 1965.

The Meeting Point. Toronto, Macmillan, and London, Heinemann, 1967; Boston, Little Brown, 1972.

Storm of Fortune. Boston, Little Brown, 1973.

The Bigger Light. Boston, Little Brown, 1975.

The Prime Minister. Toronto, General, 1977; London, Routledge, 1978.

Proud Empires. London, Gollancz, 1986.

The Origin of Waves. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1997.

The Question. Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1999.

Short Stories

When He Was Free and Young and He Used to Wear Silks. Toronto, Anansi, 1971; revised edition, Boston, Little Brown, 1973.

When Women Rule. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1985.

Nine Men Who Laughed. Markham, Ontario, and New York, Penguin. 1986.

In This City. Toronto, Exile Editions, 1992.

There Are No Elders. Toronto, Exile Editions, 1994.

Other

The Confused Bewilderment of Martin Luther King and the Idea of Non-Violence as a Political Tactic. Burlington, Ontario, Watkins, 1968.

Growing Up Stupid under the Union Jack: A Memoir. Toronto, McClelland and Stewart, 1980.

A Passage Back Home: A Personal Reminiscence of Samuel Selvon. Toronto, Exile Editions, 1994.

The Austin Clarke Reader, edited by Barry Callaghan. Toronto, Exile Editions, 1996.

Pigtails 'n Breadfruit: The Rituals of Slave Food. Toronto, Random House Canada, 1999; New York, New Press, 2000.

*

Manuscript Collection: McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario.

Critical Studies: "The West Indian Novel in North America: A Study of Austin Clarke," in Journal of Commonwealth Literature (Leeds), July 1970, and El Dorado and Paradise: Canada and the Caribbean in Austin Clarke's Fiction, Centre for Social and Humanistic Studies, University of Western Ontario, 1989, both by Lloyd W.

Brown; interview with Graeme Gibson, in Eleven Canadian Novelists, Toronto, Anansi, 1974; "An Assessment of Austin Clarke, West Indian-Canadian Novelist" by Keith Henry in CLA Journal (Atlanta), vol. 29, no. 1, 1985; Austin C. Clarke: A Biography by Stella Algoo-Baksh, University of West Indies Press, 1994.

Austin C. Clarke comments:

Whenever I am asked to give a statement about my work I find it difficult to do. All I can say in these situations is that I try to write about a group of people, West Indian immigrants (to Canada), whose life interests me because of the remarkable problems of readjustment, and the other problems of ordinary living. The psychological implications of this kind of life are what make my work interesting and I hope relevant to the larger condition of preservation. The themes are usually those of adjustment, as I have said, but this adjustment is artistically rendered in the inter-relationship of the two predominant groups of which I write: the host Jewish-Anglo Saxon group, and the black group (West Indian and expatriate black American).

* * *

As the West Indian population has surged in Canada over the past two decades, so too has West Indian writing in Canada flourished. On the whole, West Indian literature in Canada is dominated by the familiar themes of exile, return, colonialism, dislocation, and otherness. However, these themes are complicated by the West Indian's response to Canada's much-touted ideal of a cultural mosaic—the notion that the country is, or ought to be, a harmonious aggregation of distinctive cultures which maintain their distinctiveness while blending with each other to create a diversified cultural whole. But for West Indians the ideal of a cultural mosaic is not quite as simple as it sounds to those who espouse it. Given the usual disadvantages of being black in a predominantly white society, West Indians must choose between being integrated into a strange culture—at the cost of their cultural uniqueness and racial integrity—or being so dedicated to maintaining their black, West Indian identity that they risk being cultural and economic outsiders in their adopted homeland. As Rinaldo Walcott has observed in Black Like Who, "To be black and 'at home' in Canada is to both belong and not belong," and it is from this "in-between" space that Canada's most enduring West Indian author, Austin Clarke, writes.

These Canadian issues are not the major concern in Clarke's earliest novels. Published a decade after Clarke's arrival in Canada, The Survivors of the Crossing and Amongst Thistles and Thorns are set in Barbados and explore the twin evils of colonial self-hatred and Caribbean poverty. The Prime Minister is centered on the experiences of a West Indian writer, John Moore, who has returned to Barbados, to a government appointment after 20 years in Canada, mirroring Clarke's own return to Barbados in 1975 as the manager of the Caribbean Broadcasting Company. Significantly, like Clarke, Moore does not stay in Barbados: he returns to his Canadian home after discovering to his mortification that he no longer has a real place in Barbados.

Moore's experiences can be viewed as paradigmatic of West Indians including Clarke himself, now living and writing in Canada. After almost half a century in Canada, it is logical enough that the Canadian presence dominates Clarke's fiction as a whole. His first collection of short stories includes works that take a close look at Canada as the West Indians' El Dorado. In "They Heard a Ringing of Bells" a group of West Indians discuss their experiences as immigrants—delighting in the sense of being released from Caribbean poverty while lambasting the hostility and indifference of white Canada to the West Indian presence. "Waiting for the Postman to Knock" is less ambivalent, more openly hostile to the adopted homeland. The heroine is one of the most typical and enduring symbols of West Indian life in Canada—the lonely and isolated West Indian domestic servant who feels equally exploited by her white employer and by her West Indian lover (if she is lucky enough to find a lover). For other West Indians in Clarke's short fiction, the problems of loneliness are compounded by racial self-hatred, especially in the lives of those who are achieving some degree of economic success at the cost of their racial pride or cultural integrity ("Four Stations in His Circle" and "The Motor Car").

These related themes of loneliness, self-hatred, and cultural exclusion are the main concerns of Clarke's Canadian trilogy, The Meeting Point, Storm of Fortune, and The Bigger Light. The three works center on the lives of a group of West Indians in Toronto—especially Bernice Leach, her sister Estelle, Boysie Cumberbatch, his wife Dots, and Henry White. The Meeting Point concentrates on Bernice's experiences as a maid in the home of the wealthy Burrmann family, and emphasizes the usual themes of sexual loneliness, cultural isolation, and the sense of economic exploitation.

Storm of Fortune shifts the focus to Estelle and her somewhat uneven struggle to gain a toehold in Canada. The novel also traces the failures of Henry White and his subsequent death, and, most important of all, it depicts the gradual emergence of Boysie Cumberbatch, from shiftless bon vivant to ambitious small businessman with his own janitorial company. His success story is continued in The Bigger Light, which, despite some uneven writing, remains Clarke's most ambitious novel to date. Having devoted much of the preceding novels to the failures and half-successes in the West Indian community, Clarke concentrates here on a successful man, but one whose economic successes have not protected him from emotional failure (the gradual breakdown of his marriage and his increasing isolation from his less fortunate West Indian friends). And in fact his success as a Canadian businessman, in the Anglo-Saxon mould, has had the effect of encouraging a certain snobbery and a marked reserve towards matters of cultural and racial significance. In short he becomes increasingly hostile towards the issue of racial identity.

But in spite of his extreme and increasing isolation in the novel, Boysie is not an entire failure as a human being. His very isolation becomes a catalyst for a certain perceptiveness, which allows him to recognize the real nature of his choices, and the limitations of the world in which he has chosen to live. And as a consequence he remains the typical Clarke protagonist, one whose failures—economic and moral—are counterbalanced by a persistent ability to perceive their own lives, without self-deception or self-pity, as they really are. Given the persistent hostilities of the world in which they live, this kind of honest self-awareness is the most important quality of all—and Clarke invariably presents and invites judgments on his characters on the basis of their ability to achieve such an awareness.

These themes of isolation and self-conflict have increasingly been integrated with the issue of Canadian society and Canadian identity in Clarke's more recent writing. Canada is no longer a temporary (and deeply resented) resting-place for immigrants with a strong sense of transience. Clarke's fictional world, in his second collection of short stories, When Women Rule, is firmly located in the much-touted Canadian ideal of social mosaic. These are stories about immigrants from Europe (Italians, "displaced" Central and Eastern Europeans), as well as from the Caribbean. They are almost all about middle-aged men whose familiar anxieties about aging, sexual relationships, and socioeconomic success are interwoven with pervasive uncertainties about the directions of Canadian society: the disruptive and challenging presence of "newer" immigrants, urban changes in metropolitan Canada, and the unsettling implications of female equality. And in one story, "Give It a Shot," these fears are shared even by a born-and-bred "Anglo-Canadian." Indeed, it is the central irony of this collection that the very idea of a Canadian mosaic, with its implicit promise of social harmony and individual success, binds Clarke's diverse Canadians together by virtue of its failure, rather than its fulfillment, in their lives. Failure, however, as Clarke makes clear in his next short story collection Nine Men Who Laughed, not only stems from discrimination and displacement, but also is complicated by the selfish materialism, social alienation, and urban isolation increasingly common in modern life.

It is noteworthy that Clarke's Canadian themes actually reify the most central and universal of all his themes-alienation. In their alienation from society, family, and even from their once-youthful selves, his middle-aged protagonists are the familiar isolates of much 20th-century fiction, ranging—in Clarke's work—from the canefields of Barbados to the chic boutiques and working-class bars of modern Toronto. By way of emphasizing Clarke's insistence on the universality of alienation, it is only necessary to move from When Women Rule to his autobiography, Growing Up Stupid under the Union Jack. The title is no mere whimsy. The imperial reference sets the cultural theme—boyhood and adolescence in colonial Barbados. But the key word here is "stupid." It suggests the naiveté, the stunted selfconsciousness of the (well educated) colonial, a culturally ingrained, institutionally enforced ignorance of one's history, society, and ethnicity. And, drawing on the Caribbean connotations of "stupid/ tchupidness," it connotes absurdity as well as mental dullness. The colonial situation is the essence of the absurd because it both causes and symbolizes the condition of being isolated from one's self, one's cultural and personal roots. To be a colonial is therefore to be both the unique product of a concrete, specific process-colonial cultureand another archetype of 20th-century alienation. "Tchupidness" is simultaneously a Caribbean condition and a universal experience. Yet even as Clarke explores this "tchupidness," and the absurdity of the colonial condition, he personally refuses to accept these as immutable or fixed.

An albeit unsuccessful Conservative candidate in 1977's Ontario provincial election, Clarke nevertheless affirmed his status as full participant in Canadian society, solidified by his decision in 1981 to become a citizen. Between 1988 and 1993 Clarke served on the Immigration Board of Canada, and in 1992 published a political pamphlet, Public Enemies: Police Violence and Black Youth, which condemned the Toronto police force. A fierce social critic of preventable "tchupidness," Clarke has used both his writing and the public ear it has earned to call into question governmental policies that perpetuate certain inequalities in Canadian society.

After leaving the series of government appointments he fulfilled in the late 1980s and early 1990s, Clarke has returned to writing full-time, producing what many believe to be his strongest work to date. In 1997 The Origin of Waves gained national acclaim for its subtle, sophisticated treatment of the conversation two men, reunited in a Toronto snowstorm forty years after their childhood in the Caribbean. As the two attempt to 'catch-up' on the lost years, they also must come to terms with certain events of their youth, and their own diverse personalities. The conversation is permeated by the spoken and the unspoken, and the lies, evasions, and contradictions that inevitably plague any attempt to explain and justify one's life to another. In a literary twist, Canada, while a source of alienation and betrayal, also becomes the space from which the two can reconsider the meaning of their childhood and the dynamic of their childhood friendship and experiences.

Clarke's latest novel, The Question, returns to the themes of friendship, betrayal, and imagining the other across the differences and distances that sometimes define our daily life. At its center is a judge at the immigration and refugee hearings whose own inability to distinguish between fact and fiction in his personal life must inevitably be reflected in his work, where he must determine the worthiness of applicants, based on what he perceives to be their need or veracity. In tandem with the publication of these increasingly introspective works on the nature of life in a transnational, fractured world, Clarke has also once more returned to the territory of his own youth, with Pigtails 'n Breadfruit: The Rituals of Slave Food. The process of remembering the recipes of his youth, and the roots, rituals, and familial activities associated with them leads Clarke into a complex but always compelling and readable analysis of the meaning of food in Barbadian culture. In 1998 Clarke's long time contributions to Canadian writing and culture at large were recognized as he was made a member of the Order of Canada, the highest form of recognition by the Canadian government.

-Lloyd W. Brown, updated by Jennifer Harris

COBB, William (Sledge)

Nationality: American. Born: Eutaw, Alabama, 20 October 1937. Education: Livingston State College, 1957–61, B.A. in English 1961; Vanderbilt University, 1961–63, M.A. in English 1963; Breadloaf School of English, Middlebury College, 1967–68. Family: Married Loretta Douglas in 1965; one daughter. Career: Professor of English, 1963–89, and since 1989, writer-in-residence, both University of Montevallo, Alabama. Awards: Story Magazine's Story of the Year Award, 1964; National Endowment for the Arts fellowship, 1978, for creative writing; Atlantic Center for the Arts grant, 1985, for playwriting; Alabama State Council on the Arts grant, 1985, for playwriting, and 1995, for fiction writing. Agent: Albert Zuckerman, Writers House, 21 West 26th St., New York, New York 10011, U.S.A. Address: 200 Shady Hill Drive, Montevallo, Alabama 35115, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Coming of Age at the Y. Columbia, Maryland, Portals Press, 1984.
The Hermit King. Columbia, Maryland, Portals Press, 1987.
A Walk Through Fire. New York, Morrow, 1992.
The Fire Eaters. New York, Norton, 1994.
Harry Reunited. Montgomery, Alabama, Black Belt Press, 1995.
A Spring of Souls. Birmingham, Alabama, Crane Hill Publishers, 1999.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Year of Judson's Carnival," in The Sucarnochee Review, 1961.
- "A Single Precious Day," in Livingston Life, 1961.

- "The Time of the Leaves," in Granta, 1963.
- "The Stone Soldier," in Story, Spring 1964.
- "Suffer Little Children ...," in Comment, Spring 1967.
- "The Iron Gates," in Comment, Winter 1968.
- "The Hunted," in The Arlington Quarterly, Summer 1968.
- "A Very Proper Resting Place," in Comment, Autumn 1969.
- "An Encounter with a Friend," in Inlet, Spring 1973.
- "Walk the Fertile Fields of My Mind," in Region, November 1976.
- "Somewhere in All This Green," in Anthology of Bennington Writers, edited by John Gardner. Delbanco, 1978.
- "The Night of the Yellow Butterflies," in Arete, Spring 1984.
- "Old Wars and New Sorrow," in The Sucarnochee Review, Spring 1984.
- "Faithful Steward of Thy Bounty." N.p., n.d.
- "The Queen of the Silver Dollar," in Amaryllis, Spring 1995.

Plays

The Vine and the Olive (produced Livingston, 1961).

Brighthope (produced Montevallo, 1985).

Recovery Room (produced New Orleans, 1986).

Sunday's Child (produced Montevallo, 1986; New York, 1987).

A Place of Spring (produced New York, 1987).

Early Rains (produced New York, 1988).

*

Manuscript Collection: Vanderbilt University Library, Nashville, Tennessee.

William Cobb comments:

A strong influence, perhaps the strongest, on the structure of Harry Reunited is Robert Altman's wonderfully funny film Nashville, which I saw years ago when it was first released and have since watched countless times on video. I wanted to write a novel about a disparate group of people whose only real connection is something ephemeral—in this case a vague and distant past—whose lives touch others' lives in various ways as they pass through a sequence of events, and who are finally brought together and at the same time separated by one apocalyptic event. I did not, of course, want to retell Nashville. It had to be my own story.

Since I had not attended my own high school class's 25th reunion (I was somehow left off the invitation list; I'm still not sure what that says about me!), I was able to pose a hypothetical question to myself: What happens when a man goes back home, into an artificially created environment that attempts to mirror, even recreate, a period in his past, and he has to confront all the demons from that past? As I began to work on the novel all sorts of other nuances and themes began to appear, among them the inevitable facing of middle age, that middle passage in which we invariably begin to look both backward and forward with varying emotional consequences. And as a Southern writer, I've always been fascinated with the presence of the past, of our histories both individually and collectively, and with the notion of the abiding importance of "place," and as I wrote I found those themes emerging as well.

And I quickly fell in love with Bud Squires. Even though it's Harry's book, it is Bud's book, too, because it is he who provides the counterpoint to Harry's semi-comfortable life. It is Bud who is the avenging angel, and I was able, in a way, through my creation of Bud, to exorcise some of the guilt I suspect I still carried around with me for the cruel things I must have done in my own adolescence and which I have conveniently forgotten or blacked out. Bud became a wonderful comic character for me, a man who awakens, in varying degrees and in various startling ways, all the people in the book—and gives a kind of new life to them.

Finally, it was the comic mode that most drove me as I created this book. I very consciously wished to return to the comedy of my first novel, Coming of Age at the Y, and I wanted to paint this story with broad strokes. It is full of the kind of humor that I love, subtle and sly and almost slapstick at the same time. A humor of character. I love all these characters—Bernie Crease, as ineffectual as he is; Marie, as innocently slutty as she is; the foul-mouthed adolescents in the Sacristy before the Sunday morning service; the little black kid in the fish-net shirt; the three women at the yard sale; Cholly Polly, poor, poor Cholly Polly; Vera Babbs, the "message artist," and on and on; I love them all! That is the gift that comic writing like this gives back to the writer. I got the richest, warmest laughs of all. And I, too,—even though I was not invited—was finally reunited!

* * *

William Cobb studied with the last of the Fugitives at Vanderbilt, and his fiction is deeply rooted in the southern soil that the Agrarians revered; however, his political views have not always been in keeping with the conservative views of his mentors. Throughout his work there runs a deep respect for spirituality, the importance of family, and the necessity of maintaining a sense of place. Many readers feel that Cobb is at his best as a comic writer (his flair for the profane is certainly apparent); however, his more serious civil-rights novel, A Walk Through Fire, brought Cobb national acclaim. Cobb's body of work includes an impressive number of short stories, four novels, and three plays that were produced in New York.

Cobb's first national recognition came in 1964 when his story "The Stone Soldier" won the prestigious Story Magazine's Story of the Year Award and was the title story in that year's collection. "The Stone Soldier" has since been anthologized a number of times. Cobb's flair for the vulgar was apparent in his vivid description of Lyman Sparks, a scalawag who preys on the families of Civil War soldiers. His "sausage legs" and "squiggly eyes" are indelibly printed in the reader's mind.

Another short piece of fiction was recognized as an outstanding contribution in the premier edition of Arete: A Journal of Sport Literature, published at San Diego State University. In "The Night of the Yellow Butterflies" the main characters are a minor league baseball coach and his star player, Luke Easter—who may or may not be an apparition. The theme of baseball, with its hopes and dreams—often lost ones—is recurrent in Cobb's work. This particular story weaves the real and the supernatural in a mysterious manner that is quite convincing.

There was some negative response to the bawdy nature of Cobb's satirical novel Coming of Age at the Y. Certainly, he took some chances writing a satirical coming-of-age story with a female protagonist (not always considered politically correct as early as the 1970s). However, it is hard to see how any reader could miss the tone of the book from its title. Though some readers felt that his heroine, Delores Lovelady, was a bit passive, most felt that it was a fine attack on sexism—loaded with irony. Lucille Weary, the "worldly" traveler on the Greyhound with Delores, is a wonderfully funny echo of

The Wife of Bath cramped in a century full of the New South and Shoney's Big Boys.

Cobb's second novel, The Hermit King, is a more traditional coming-of-age novel. The main story line here is between two runaway adolescents and an old black man who has lived a hermit's life much like Thoreau's a century earlier in quiet protest to the setting tradition offers him. Cobb's descriptive power is clear.

Cobb also has an ear for dialogue that seemed to lead him inevitably to write for the stage. Horton Foote, who admired his work, suggested that he send a trilogy to H. B. Playwright's Studio in New York. All three plays were done there over a two-year period. Herbert Berghoff said that Cobb's plays are like Foote's plays in that they are domestic plays that deal with quiet human conflicts.

Cobb's third novel, A Walk Through Fire, was well received. Both Library Journal and Publisher's Weekly gave the book a strong endorsement in 1992, its year of publication, and the West Coast Review of Books declared it one of the most important books of the year. Caught up in an interracial triangle, the three main characters spin a story filled with passion and strength. The reader can see clearly Cobb's firm sense of place in the following scene, where O. B. Brewster, a white farm implement dealer (and former baseball player), offers to help an old black farmer plow his field:

The black earth turned smoothly on each side of the shiny blade. I am not too far removed from this soil that I can't feel its message again, in my legs and in my heart. The loamy earth was damp, and it smelled fecund and rich, fertile as life itself. Tears misted his eyes, one droplet spilling down his cheek, but he could not wipe his face because he held to the handles of the plow.

Reviewers have said that Cobb has undoubtedly had his turn at the plow in that soil. His description of the violence and pain of our collective history during those years is seared into the minds of his readers through the fire imagery that permeates the book. Most importantly, we are reminded that those with intense faith can walk through fire.

Many of Cobb's central characters have a quiet strength that comes from life lived close to the earth. The setting is almost always southern, but the struggles of the human heart transcend the regional boundaries and make valuable commentary on life in the last half of the 20th century in the United States.

-Chris Leigh

CODRESCU, Andrei

Nationality: Romanian-American. Born: Sibiu, Romania, 20 December 1946. Family: Married Alice Henderson in 1968; two sons. Career: Visiting assistant professor, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, 1979–80; visiting professor, Naropa Institute, Boulder, Colorado; professor of English, Louisiana State University, Baton Rouge, 1984—; regular commentator on National Public Radio's All Things Considered. Awards: Big Table Younger Poets Award, 1970; National Endowment for the Arts fellowships, 1973, 1983; Pushcart Prize, 1980, 1983; A. D. Emmart Humanities Award, 1982; National Public Radio fellowship, 1983; Towson University Prize for Literature, 1983; General Electric/CCLM Poetry Award, 1985; American Romanian Academy of Arts and Sciences Book Award, 1988; George Foster Peabody Award (San Francisco Film Festival), best documentary film, 1995; best documentary film award, Seattle Film Festival, 1995; Cine Award, 1995; Golden Eagle Award, 1995; ACLU Civil Liberties Award, 1995; Romanian National Foundation Literature Award, 1996. Agent: Jonathan Lazear, 930 First Avenue North, Suite 416, Minneapolis, Minnesota 55401, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Repentance of Lorraine. New York, Pocket Books, 1976. The Blood Countess. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1995. Messiah. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1999.

Short Stories

Why I Can't Talk on the Telephone. San Francisco, Kingdom Kum Press, 1972.

Monsieur Teste in America and Other Instances of Realism. Minneapolis, Coffee House Press, 1987.

Poetry

License to Carry a Gun. Chicago, Big Table/Follett, 1970.
The Here What Where. San Francisco, Isthmus Press, 1972.
And Grammar and Money. Berkeley, California, Arif Press, 1973.
A Serious Morning. Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1973.
The History of the Growth of Heaven. New York, George Braziller, 1973.

A Mote Suite for Jan and Anselm. San Francisco, Stone Pose Art, 1976.

For the Love of a Coat. Boston, Four Zoas Press, 1978.

The Lady Painter. Boston, Four Zoas Press, 1979.

Diapers on the Snow. Ann Arbor, Michigan, Crowfoot Press, 1981.

Necrocorrida. Los Angeles, Panjandrum, 1982.

Selected Poems: 1970–1980. New York, Sun Books, 1983.

Comrade Past and Mister Present: New Poems and a Journal. Minneapolis, Coffee House Press, 1986; second edition, 1991.

Belligerence: New Poems. Minneapolis, Coffee House Press, 1991. Alien Candor: Selected Poems, 1970–1995. Santa Rosa, California, Black Sparrow Press, 1998.

Plays

Screenplays: Road Scholar, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 1993.

Other

For Max Jacob. Berkeley, California, Tree Books, 1974.

The Life and Times of an Involuntary Genius (autobiography). New York, George Braziller, 1975.

In America's Shoes (autobiography). San Francisco, City Lights, 1975.

- A Craving for Swan (essays). Columbus, Ohio State University Press, 1986.
- Raised by Puppets Only to be Killed by Research (essays). Reading, Massachusetts, Addison-Wesley, 1988.
- The Disappearance of the Outside: A Manifesto for Escape (essays). Reading, Massachusetts, Addison-Wesley, 1990.
- The Hole in the Flag: A Romanian Exile's Story of Return and Revolution (reportage). New York, Morrow, 1991.
- Acid Dreams: The Complete Social History of LSD: The CIA, the Sixties, and Beyond (introduction) by Martin A. Lee and Bruce Shlain. New York, Grove Weidenfeld, 1992.
- The MUse is Always Half-Dressed in New Orleans and Other Essays. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1993.
- Zombification: Stories from National Public Radio (essays). New York, St. Martin's Press, 1994.
- Road Scholar: Coast to Coast Late in the Century (reportage), with photographs by David Graham. New York, Hyperion, 1994.
- The Dog with the Chip in His Neck: Essays from NPR and Elsewhere. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1996.
- Elysium: A Gathering of Souls: New Orleans Cemeteries (foreword), by Sandra Russell Clark. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1997.
- Hail Babylon!: In Search of the American City at the end of the Millennium (essays). New York, St. Martin's Press, 1998.
- Ay Cuba: A Socio-Erotic Journey to Castro's Last Stand (reportage), with photographs by David Graham. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1999.
- A Bar in Brooklyn: Novellas & Stories 1970–1978. Santa Rosa, California, Black Sparrow, 1999.
- Land of the Free: What Makes Americans Different (nonfiction, with David Graham, edited by Michael L. Sand). New York, Aperture, 1999.
- The Devil Never Sleeps and Other Essays. New York, St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Contributor, Walker Evans: Signs ("with an essay by Andrei Codrescu"), by Walker Evans. Los Angeles, J. Paul Getty Museum, 1998.
- Editor and Contributor, American Poetry since 1970: Up Late. New York, Four Walls Eight Windows, 1987.
- Editor, The Stiffest of the Corpse: An Exquisite Corpse Reader. San Francisco, City Lights, 1988.
- Editor, Reframing America: Alexander Alland, Otto Hagel & Hansel Mieth, John Gutmann, Lisette Model, Marion Palfi, Robert Frank. Albuquerque, University of New Mexico Press, 1995.
- Editor, with Laura Rosenthal, American Poets Say Goodbye to the Twentieth Century. New York, Four Walls Eight Windows, 1996.
- Editor, with Laura Rosenthal, Thus Spake the Corpse: An Exquisite Corpse Reader, 1988–1998. Santa Rosa, California, Black Sparrow Press, 1999.
- Translator, At the Court of Yearning: Poems by Lucian Blaga by Lucian Blaga. Columbus, Ohio State University Press, 1989.

*

Critical Studies: Nine Martinis by Lita R. Hornick, New York, Kulchur Foundation, 1987.

Andrei Condrescu comments:

(2000) There were always so many things that didn't fit in my poems or essays: recipes, overheard conversations, intricate means of disposing of mean people, crushes on out-of-bounds women, and, above all, a sense of the passing of time. The capacious form of the novel could, it seemed to me, accommodate all those things and some. When I started writing one, I discovered that I was a good storyteller and that, in fact, the form was even more amazing, that it was a machine capable of activating myths and rituals and changing the status quo. After reading Messiah, a friend said, "I can't look at New Orleans the same way anymore. It's been changed." I have also changed some peoples' memory cassettes: they now remember their novelistic representations better than the experiences they were based on. The novel is not exhausted, though the purveyors of the faux-memoir and psychological realism have done their best to run it into the ground. A squad of imaginative rescuers steeped in outrageous magic (such as the city of New Orleans) are getting it putt-putting again.

* * *

Andrei Codrescu is an artistic jack-of-all trades who mixes genres and juggles conventions, combining fact with fiction to produce hybrids: not exactly novels or novellas, not exactly histories or memoirs, but, like dragons in fairy tales, new conglomerations that share characteristics of many conventional beasts. Add political and social commentary, satiric portraits, a touch of the poet's life and thought, a little Cold War history, a mixed bag of poetic images, and comic and sexual romps, and the end result is a Codrescu short-story collection or novella.

A Romanian-born naturalized American, Codrescu draws on his experiences as a journalist, a weekly radio broadcaster and commentator on National Public Radio, and as an editor of the radical literary journal Exquisite Corpse to create witty and insightful essays, seriocomic memoirs, and autobiographical poetry and fiction. However, he prides himself more on his poetry than his short stories and novels, partly because, as he admits, he regards writing fiction as a relaxing vacation from his true vocation as a poet. Besides, it may be difficult for an English-as-a-second-language writer to sustain the consistently complex syntax required by novel-length performances, especially those duplicating speech and dialogue or an extended narrative voice. (Critics have been unenthusiastic about Codrescu's prose stylistics in his novels, a failing he cheerfully admitted to in his early works when he was still perfecting his self-taught English.) Rather, Codrescu plays to his strengths, contriving strikingly vivid poetic images and word play that capture a quirky and engaging sensibility. Language aside, Codrescu's Romanian-influenced take on the culture and foibles of his adopted country is his great strength as commentator and writer, for his childhood in a late-Soviet satellite shot through with collectivist distortion and socialist blather clearly gave him a sensitive ear and eye for sham and falsehood. Codrescu is at his best in satiric essays that unmask establishment hypocrisy, as in his exuberant The Devil Never Sleeps and Other Essays, with its discussions of William Burroughs, New Orleans' libertinism, and fundamentalist Christianity.

Although he calls his loosely structured memoirs The Life and Times of an Involuntary Genius, its sequel In America's Shoes, and Road Scholar: Coast to Coast Late in the Century fiction, their descriptions of why he left Romania, the culture shock he experienced in Italy and then in the United States, the experiences (particularly in the San Francisco Bay area) that helped Americanize him, and his coast-to-coast trek across the USA, marveling at American oddities (like crystal gazers in the Southwest and a drive-through wedding in Los Angeles), are too thinly disguised and too true to his biography to be pure fiction. Still, all his novels, like his poems and essays, explore autobiographical subjects based on his experiences as an expatriate enfant terrible. The third person narrative of Involuntary Genius does distance him somewhat from his personal story, but the other two narratives assertively assume the narrative "I." Likewise, The Muse Is Always Half-Dressed in New Orleans and Other Essays has its inventive fictive moments but is more a collection of essays based on personal experience than of completely fictional short stories. In prose, Codrescu prefers a comically surreal mixture of philosophy, politics, science, and sex, bound together with attacks on oppression and repression, what Bruce Shlain of the New York Times Book Review sums up as "lyrical intellectual gymnastics" mixed with "dime store philosophy" (25 January 1987: 15). Again, Codrescu's upbringing in a rigid, corrupt system may in part explain his enthusiasm for bursting the constrictions of genre while indulging in (and often mocking) ideological and philosophical commentary, happily sampling an intellectual and stylistic freedom denied under the strictures of socialist realism.

The mix of poetry and short fiction in Why I Can't Talk on the Telephone is typically Codrescu in its defiance of genre conventions, as what has been called "apocalyptic realism" meets "sentencetheatre," jumbling together vampires, reviews of imaginary books (à la Jorge Luis Borges), speeches given by hands or hairs, and thoughts on "The Dada Council of World Revolution." The surreal How I Became a Howard Johnson provides early impressions of America in long conversations between stoned characters. Though published in 1999, A Bar in Brooklyn: Novellas and Stories 1970-1978 is a collection of short stories from Codrescu's "hip" days as a selfproclaimed radical and mock revolutionist. In Meat from the Goldrush, a tale of cannibalism, Codrescu spoofs Gabriel Garcia Marquez's One Hundred Years of Solitude through a close-knit family of Eastern European butchers who contact their past (and that of their customers) directly: a time machine helps them transport bodies from the past, which they convert into prime cuts that are so popular they end up short-circuiting the present by killing off so many from the past science fiction meets surrealism. A story of a quest for a mythic artifact, The Repentance of Lorraine, brings together a peculiar assortment of characters from past and present, including Roman harlots, modern Maoists, and university professors.

A horror story of sorts, The Blood Countess: A Novel is supposedly based on the life of a Codrescu ancestor. It interweaves in alternating chapters the true story of a sixteenth-century Hungarian countess, Elizabeth Bathory, and a fictive tale of her modern descendant, Drake Bathory-Kereshbur, a Hungarian-born American journalist. The cruel countess is a female version of Vlad the Impaler, having had 650 virgins killed so she could rejuvenate herself in their blood, and her life of debauchery and murder provides a disturbing study of tyranny, psychosis, superstition, and ruthless political machinations. Bathory-Kereshbur has returned to his homeland to cover Hungary's attempts to break away from the former Soviet Union and to move into the world of nations as a self-determined nation, so his position allows Codrescu to draw on his personal memories of life behind the Iron Curtain and the conflicts and hopes that ended the Cold War. However, even with Bathory-Kereshbur's confession to a dark family legacy that draws him into murder, modern events cannot compete with the nightmare images of past violence and violation that ultimately dominate this book.

As in The Blood Countess, the melodramatic Messiah: A Novel, a count-down to 2000 A.D. alternates chapters focusing on two heroines, New Orleanian Creole Felicity Odille LeJeune and Andrea Isbik, a Sarajevo refugee to Jerusalem, who together may save the world from Armageddon. LeJeune's prim and proper but senile 96year-old grandmother hands over her $2 million-winning lottery ticket to a sleazy Baptist evangelical nicknamed "Elvis" and wishes for an orgasm just before she dies, and LeJeune's fight is a righteous one to bring the money back home. The teenaged Isbik, in turn, seduces an assortment of religious believers as a means to escape the hospice where she has been placed and finance a trip to "New Jerusalem," a.k.a. New Orleans. Codrescu draws inspiration from everything from Dr. Strangelove to Terry Southern's Candy for his enmeshed plot of warring lunacies: fanatical religious fundamentalists who disagree over absurdities, tattooed nihilists and radical revolutionaries, millennial fears and extremist rhetoric, in a mordant social commentary on the hysteria attending the change in centuries.

Codrescu is an American success story, an immigrant finding fame and relative fortune not along the typical avenues to success traveled by newcomers—the fairly forgiving paths of entrepreneurship or business—but rather down the constricted alleyways of linguistic performance, cultural commentary, and literary creation in a new language. Making one's way in this enterprise means remaining alert to nuances that escape many native speakers, and to constructing a persona both appealing and critical with none of the foundations available to native speakers. Joseph Conrad showed that literary forms can be mastered in a second language as well as in a first, but few writers have duplicated his feat. Codrescu's achievement is quite different, but nonetheless remarkable, the creation of a distinct authorial voice, one heard in radio performance and fictional prose, which draws on a Romanian past, yet is distinctively, unequivocally, American.

-Andrew Macdonald

COE, Jonathan (Roger)

Nationality: British. Born: Birmingham, 19 August 1961. Education: Trinity College, Cambridge, 1980–83, B.A. (honours) in English literature; Warwick University, 1983–86, Ph.D in English literature. Family: Married Janine Maria McKeown in 1989. Career: Loan officer, Barclays Bank; poetry tutor, Warwick University; cabaret pianist; legal proofreader; arts journalist. Agent: Tony Peake, Peake Associates, 14 Grafton Crescent, London NW1 8SL, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Accidental Woman. London, Buckworth, 1987.

A Touch of Love. London, Buckworth, 1989.

The Dwarves of Death. London, Fourth Estate, 1990.

What a Carve Up!. London, Viking, 1994; as The Winshaw Legacy, New York, Knopf, 1995.

The House of Sleep. New York, Knopf, 1998.

Other

Humphrey Bogart: Take It and Like It. London, Bloomsbury, and New York, Grove, 1991.

James Stewart: Leading Man. London, Bloomsbury, and New York, Autumn, 1994; published as Jimmy Stewart: A Wonderful Life, New York, Arcade, 1994.

*

Jonathan Coe comments:

My first impulse to write came from the films and television programmes I watched as a child: British film comedies such as Kind Hearts and Coronets and I'm All Right, Jack, and TV sitcoms like Fawlty Towers. At the same time I have a certain yearning towards the high European seriousness of great twentieth-century novelists such as Proust, Mann, and Musil, and my own novels have grown out of the tension between these two very different influences.

Another creative tension arises from my desire to reach a wide readership while remaining convinced that it is the novelist's job to innovate, to take formal risks and always attempt something new. I have never wanted to write historical or escapist fiction: contemporary Britain provides me with my source material.

An off-the-cuff list of all-time favourite writers would include Henry Fielding, Laurence Sterne, Charles Dickens, Dorothy Richardson, Rosamond Lehman, Bohumil Hrabal, Milorad Pavic, Flann O'Brien, and B.S. Johnson.

* * *

"Words are awkward sods, and very rarely say what you want them to say"—a thought expressed in Jonathan Coe's first novel, The Accidental Woman. The intractability of language seems to preoccupy the young novelist. This slight tale of a young woman, Maria, to whom things happen, rather than who makes things happen, is haunted by an authorial voice that is never far from intervention. "Before the film they met for a drink, or at least they met at a place where drinks were served, and drank there." Such attention to detail is not uncommon in the first-time novelist; so keen to avoid cliché he is forever stopping the flow of the narrative to deconstruct the image: "Her hand was being held with a strength which it would not be inappropriate to compare to that of a vice."

The role of Maria reflects Coe's questing approach to narrative. Maria is the accidental woman; like one of Hardy's passive victims, things happen to her. Her actions never propel the narrative; the story is driven by her response to events. She marries Martin because she ate gammon.

In A Touch of Love, Coe eschews forthright authorial intrusion and tells a more direct story, although he does not completely forget his experimental roots. The story of Robin, a depressed postgraduate who is charged with indecency after a misunderstanding in a park, is seen from various viewpoints that allow the reader to build up a complete picture of his character. The clearest insight is allowed by the inclusion in the text of four of Robin's short stories. (The style of his work is reminiscent of The Accidental Woman.)

With The Dwarves of Death, Coe takes an enormous stride forward. The narrator, William, is a musician caught up in a murder case after being in the wrong place at the wrong time. Now, there is some heart (Maria and Robin had both been dealt their cards indifferently, even cruelly)—that is, William's frustrating relationship with the unreachable Madeline engenders the reader's sympathy. He gets us on his side early on, after all, by delivering blistering satirical salvos at Andrew Lloyd Webber's so-called music. Coe is experimenting. He constructs the novel like a popular song. It even has a middle eight—a hilarious account of waiting for a bus that never comes.

If Coe took a stride forward with Dwarves, he leaps to a higher plane with What A Carve Up! Societal satire, savage political attack, rip-roaring farce, in-depth character study, deeply moving love story. it's all here, and every aspect of it works like a dream. Especially the oneness of it, the masterful way in which the author brings it all together. Ostensibly, at least to begin with, it is the story of a rich and powerful Yorkshire family, the Winshaws, and writer Michael Owen, who is writing a book about the Winshaws for a vanity publisher. Tabitha Winshaw has been confined to an asylum, having overreacted to the death (she remains convinced it was no accident) of her brother, Godfrey. It is Tabitha who charges the Peacock Press with the task of finding someone to write the history of the Winshaws, and the more details that are revealed about the depths of greed and viciousness of her various relatives the more she emerges as the sanest of the bunch, despite being locked away.

Hilary Winshaw writes a vituperative, hawkish column for a right-wing tabloid; brother Roddy is a Cork Street gallerist sustaining the careers of talentless would-be artists. Henry becomes a Labour MP but veers sharply away from the party to become one of the powerful backroom thinkers and plotters behind the Conservatives' relentless drive to privatize everything they possibly can. Dorothy is a heartless factory farmer who becomes head of an insidious packaged-food business. Thomas is a merchant banker who involves himself in the film industry for the voyeuristic opportunities it will afford him. Mark sells arms to Saddam.

Exploiting this extraordinary cast of characters to the full, Coe tears apart the body politic of British society and lays bare its corrupt heart. Because the author handles his material so assuredly, the reader never gets lost in the richness of detail. The appalling political machinations remain fascinating throughout the book, but what really draws the reader in is the character of Michael Owen, who one senses may be only partly fictional. Though he is nine years older than the author, there's a strong temptation to read Coe into part of the part of Michael, and not only because of playful references to Michael's published novels, whose titles are reworkings of The Accidental Woman and A Touch of Love.

The passages taken from Michael's works seem deeply personal, as does the relationship between Michael and Fiona. It's an indication, however, of how absorbing the action is throughout the book, that 90 pages elapse after Michael and Fiona's first embrace before the narrative returns to them. And although the reader wants to get back to them because s/he cares for them now virtually as for real people, one remains captivated by all the many characters and narrative strands. This is partly due to ingenious plotting and a complicated structure that must have required the author constantly to go back and rework sections.

The scope of What a Carve Up! is dizzyingly ambitious, taking in the art world and factory farming; the depletion of the health service and the war against Saddam; the corruption of politicians and betrayal within the family; the philosophy that suggests that a course of events might be entirely accidental (harking back to Coe's first novel) set against elaborate and all-too-convincing conspiracy theories. It's a very brave novel and one that will have the reader laughing aloud and bursting into tears. The broad sweep and structure recall Michael Moorcock's Mother London, which was a masterpiece. In many respects, not least for the way in which the cinema metaphor is employed at the end of part one, that description would not be out of place here.

Coe continued his sly self-reference, once again using the device of a story within the story in The House of Sleep. This novel within the novel describes a series of "midnight kidnappings" committed by "a notorious criminal called the Owl," and the book us just one of the spectres that haunt the characters in The House of Sleep. At the center of the story is Dr. Gregory Dudden, who operates a sleep clinic in a nineteenth-century mansion named Ashdown—which just happened to be his dormitory in college more than a decade earlier. Reminiscences arise, old loves and conflicts are resurrected, and all in all, Coe amply satisfies his readers' hopes for an entertaining experience.

-Nicholas Royle

COETZEE, J(ohn) M(ichael)

Nationality: South African. Born: Cape Town, 9 February 1940. Education: The University of Cape Town, B.A. 1960, M.A. 1963; University of Texas, Austin, Ph.D. 1969. Family: Married in 1963 (divorced 1980); one son and one daughter. Career: Applications programmer, IBM, London, 1962-63; systems programmer, International Computers, Bracknell, Berkshire, 1964-65; Assistant Professor, 1968–71, and Butler Professor of English, 1984, State University of New York, Buffalo. Lecturer, 1972-83, and since 1984 Professor of General Literature, University of Cape Town. Hinkley Professor of English, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, 1986, 1989. Awards: CNA award 1978, 1980, 1983; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1980; Faber Memorial award, 1980; Booker prize, 1983; Fémina prize (France), 1985; Jerusalem prize, 1987; Sunday Express Book of the Year award, 1990; Mondello prize (Italy), 1994; Irish Times International Fiction prize, 1995; Booker prize, 1999; Commonwealth prize for best book, 2000. D.Litt.: University of Strathclyde, Glasgow, 1985; State University of New York, 1989. Life Fellow, University of Cape Town; Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1988; Honorary Fellow, Modern Language Association (U.S.A.), 1989. Agent: Murray Pollinger, 222 Old Brompton Road, London SW5 0BZ, England. Address: P.O. Box 92, Rondebosch, Cape Province 7701, South Africa.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Dusklands (two novellas). Johannesburg, Ravan Press, 1974; London, Secker and Warburg, 1982; New York, Viking, 1985.

In the Heart of the Country. Johannesburg, Ravan Press, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1977; as From the Heart of the Country, New York, Harper, 1977.

Waiting for the Barbarians. London, Secker and Warburg, 1980; New York, Penguin, 1982.

Life and Times of Michael K. London, Secker and Warburg, 1983; New York, Viking, 1984.

Foe. Johannesburg, Ravan Press, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1986; New York, Viking, 1987. Age of Iron. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Random House, 1990.

The Master of Petersburg. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Viking, 1994.

Disgrace. New York, Viking, 2000.

Other

White Writing: On the Culture of Letters in South Africa. New Haven, Connecticut, Yale University Press, 1988.

Doubling the Point. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1992.Giving Offense: Essays on Censorship. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1996.

Boyhood: Scenes from Provincial Life. New York, Viking, 1997. Contributor, Politics, Leadership, and Justice.. Chicago, Great Books Foundation, 1998.

Editor, with André Brink, A Land Apart: A South African Reader. London, Faber, 1986; New York, Viking, 1987.

Translator, A Posthumous Confession, by Marcellus Emants. Boston, Twayne, 1976; London, Quartet, 1986.

Translator, The Expedition to the Baobab Tree, by Wilma Stockenström. Johannesburg, Ball, 1983; London, Faber, 1984.

*

Critical Studies: The Novels of J.M. Coetzee by Teresa Dovey, Johannesburg, Donker, 1988; Countries of the Mind: The Fiction of J.M. Coetzee by Dick Penner, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1989; Critical Perspectives on J.M. Coetzee, edited by Graham Huggan and Stephen Watson, preface by Nadine Gordimer. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1996; Colonization, Violence, and Narration in White South African Writing: Andre Brink, Breyten Breytenbach, and J. M. Coetzee by Rosemary Jane Jolly. Athens, Ohio University Press, 1996; J.M. Coetzee by Dominic Head. New York, Cambridge University Press, 1997; Critical Essays on J.M. Coetzee, edited by Sue Kossew. New York, G. K. Hall, 1998.

* * *

J. M. Coetzee is one of the most significant white South African novelists to emerge in the latter half of the twentieth century. His work engages powerfully, though not always directly, with apartheid and its aftermath; but he also brings into the South African novel a concern with the nature of narrative that is more often associated with European and North American postmodernism. It is this combination of textual and political preoccupations, allied to a spare prose style and an unsparingly bleak vision, that gives Coetzee's work its distinctive quality.

Coetzee's indirect approach to apartheid and his questioning of narrative modes is evident in his first novel, Dusklands (1974). This combines and challenges two kinds of imperialist discourse. The first section traces the descent into madness of Eugene Dawn, who is analyzing psychological warfare in Vietnam for the U.S. Defense Department; the second, "The Narrative of Jacobus Coetzee," is supposedly a piece of travel writing by an early explorer of the African Cape. The founding moment of Afrikaner identity, and U.S. imperialism in Vietnam, are thus linked together and ironically subverted. Coetzee's second novel, In the Heart of the Country

(1977), addressed the South African situation more directly. Its narrator, Magda, a white South African spinster who lives with her father on an isolated farm, provides an account made up of 266 numbered sections in which she gives versions of events that are often contradictory—for example, she twice describes killing her father, once with an axe and once with a gun. She also describes an unsuccessful attempt, after her father's burial, to form a new relationship with the black servants, Hendrik and Anna; her rape by Hendrik and her desertion by both servants; and her final revival of her father. The novel can be read as an allegory of the whole South African position in the 1970s, as white South Africans made increasingly desperate attempts to alter or escape from a situation that was growing more and more violent; it also raises the question of how to write about South Africa in this moment of transition. To an extent, the novel invokes and subverts the tradition of the plaasroman, the lyrical, idealized Afrikaner novel of country life; it also invokes and implicitly interrogates the European literary and philosophical heritage—that of Hegel and Beckett, for instance—that sometimes speaks through Magda.

Waiting for the Barbarians (1980) is narrated by the long-serving, liberal-minded magistrate in a frontier settlement in a vaguely specified "Empire" where the ruthless Colonel Joll is torturing supposed barbarians. The magistrate, observing Joll's activities, is forced to conduct an agonizing analysis of his own unavoidable complicity in oppression and to undergo torture himself after rescuing a "barbarian" girl. Finally, Joll's forces, and many inhabitants, abandon the settlement, leaving a remnant "waiting for the barbarians." The novel can certainly be interpreted as a powerful image of the painful position of the South African white liberal under a violent and paranoid apartheid regime; but it also takes on a more general significance, as a fictional dramatization of one of the ways in which imperial regimes—not only in South Africa—can end.

If Waiting for the Barbarians was, for some critics, too general in its significance, The Life and Times of Michael K (1983) was more specific, at least in its setting: modern South Africa in an era of armed struggle. Michael K is a non-white South African who apparently lives on the margins of politics and society. He leaves his post as a gardener in Cape Town to return his sick mother to the farm where she grew up. She dies on the way, but he continues the journey with her ashes. He finds what may be the farm of which his mother told him, now deserted by the white man, buries her ashes, and starts to cultivate the land. The grandson of the proprietor returns and drives K off, but, after a spell in hospital and in an internment camp, he escapes and goes back to the farm to grow pumpkins and melons. Arrested as a collaborator by South African soldiers who are pursuing guerrillas, K is interned in another camp, and the brief second section of the novel is supposedly by the camp doctor, who tries to understand K. But K escapes once more, and the last section of the novel rises to a powerfully lyrical close in which K imagines himself using a teaspoon on a long string to draw water from the shaft of a sabotaged pump. The Life and Times of Michael K is, characteristically for Coetzee, elusive in its explicit political stance. However, the novel's final affirmation of the possibility of survival and cultivation in the most difficult conditions can be seen as a symbol of a hope that will endure not only in the face of oppression but also beyond the immediate euphoria of liberation. Michael K won Coetzee the United Kingdom's most prestigious literary award, the Booker prize.

Foe (1986) is Coetzee's most sustained encounter with a founding text of imperialism and of the English novel, Daniel Defoe's

Robinson Crusoe (1719). The story is supposedly told by Susan Barton, who is marooned on an island with "Cruso" and a Friday whose tongue has been cut out; in contrast to Defoe's Crusoe and Friday, Coetzee's duo focus simply on survival and build sterile stone terraces. Rescued and returned to England—Cruso dies on the voyage back—Susan and Friday seek out Daniel Foe—Defoe's original surname—to tell their story; Susan and Foe, however, become embroiled in a fight for control of the narrative of Cruso. Questions of authorship are shown not as abstract literary concerns but as bound up with questions of power, control, and empire; the kind of story that is told will have political implications and consequences.

Age of Iron (1990) returns to the contemporary South African situation. It takes the form of a long letter by Mrs. Curren to her daughter in the United States. Mrs. Curren is dying of bone cancer, and her physical disintegration is matched by her abandonment of her identification with the old South Africa as she registers the contrast between the country that the media portray and the violent reality of the "age of iron" around her that is exemplified, above all, by the deaths of the fifteen-year old son of her maid and his friend, shot by police. The novel is a kind of confession of complicity in apartheid with no one present to offer absolution—only the drunken down-and-out Vercueil, who does not even respond to Mrs. Curren's words. But this lack of response, Coetzee implies, may make her confession and renunciation less self-justifying, more complete.

The Master of Petersburg (1994) shifts to another site of political struggle, nineteenth-century Russia. In 1869 Coetzee's "Dostoevsky" returns from Europe to St. Petersburg to collect the papers of his dead stepson Pavel, who may have been murdered by the nihilist revolutionary Nechaev. Like Foe, The Master of Petersburg imagines the conflicts leading up to the emergence of a major novel—in this case, Dostoevsky's The Devils (1871–72; also translated as The Possessed and The Demons); and the issues of authorial control and responsibility are focused above all in the confrontation between Coetzee's "Dostoevsky" and Nechaev—and, as in Foe, there is a strong sense that such issues are not only literary but political.

Coetzee's memoir, Boyhood (1997), told in the third person and present tense, was followed by Disgrace, his seventh novel, and his first to be set in post-apartheid South Africa. Its protagonist is a fiftytwo year old Professor of "Communications" who falls into disgrace and loses his university post as a result of a brief affair with a female student. He goes to the Eastern Cape to stay with his lesbian daughter, who is raped by three Africans who attack their home. His daughter does not report the rape and, finding herself pregnant as a result, decides to go ahead and have the child, despite the disgrace involved. Disgrace is a complex, compact, immensely resonant novel about coming to terms with disgrace—transgression, guilt, and punishment in radically changing times. It alludes to the ways in which white South Africans have to come to terms with their guilt at their complicity in the apartheid regime; at the same time it raises the issue of how black South Africans, in the post-apartheid world, will deal with their own transgressions; and it also poses the more global question of male culpability for the oppression of women. Disgrace once again gained Coetzee the Booker prize, making him the first novelist to win it twice. It also demonstrated his capacity, in his late fifties, to produce a fiction that could engage powerfully with the complexities and contradictions, not only of post-apartheid South Africa, but also of the postcolonial and postfeminist world.

COLE, Barry

Nationality: British. Born: Woking, Surrey, 13 November 1936. Education: Balham Secondary School, London. Military Service: Served in the Royal Air Force, 1955–57. Family: Married Rita Linihan in 1958; three daughters. Career: Since 1958, staff member, Reuters news agency, London; reporter, 1965–70, and senior editor, 1974–94, Central Office of Information, London. Northern Arts Fellow, universities of Newcastle-upon-Tyne and Durham, 1970–72. Address: 68 Myddelton Square, London EC1R 1XP, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Run Across the Island. London, Methuen, 1968.

Joseph Winter's Patronage. London, Methuen, 1969.

The Search for Rita. London, Methuen, 1970.

The Giver. London, Methuen, 1971.

Doctor Fielder's Common Sense. London, Methuen, 1972.

Poetry

Blood Ties. London, Turret, 1967.

Ulysses in the Town of Coloured Glass. London, Turret, 1968.

Moonsearch. London, Methuen, 1968.

The Visitors. London, Methuen, 1970.

Vanessa in the City. London, Trigram Press, 1971.

Pathetic Fallacies. London, Eyre Methuen, 1973.

The Rehousing of Scaffardi. Richmond, Surrey, Keepsake Press,

Dedications. Nottingham, Byron Press, 1977.

*

Barry Cole comments:

I have no general statement to make about my novels, but the epigraphs which precede The Giver may say more than any collected exegeses.

* * *

Barry Cole's novels have one striking thing in common: they are extremely well-written. It may, of course, be said that to write well is not so much a virtue in a novelist as a necessity. Yet the fact is that the majority of novelists lack Cole's gifts of verbal precision, wit, exact ear for conversation, and his feeling for the elastic possibilities of language, the way it can be stretched and twisted to provide unexpected meanings and insights. No doubt the fact that he is also a very fine poet accounts for much of his virtue as a writer of prose, but this should not be taken to mean that he writes poetic prose. On the contrary: his style is as free as possible from those encrustations of adjective and epithet that identify "fine" writing.

A Run Across the Island is a brilliant tour de force and for it Cole invented a form that he has used for all his subsequent novels. Although by far the larger part of the novel is seen through the eyes of its hero, Robert Haydon, there is no straightforward narrative or division into chapters. Instead, we move about in time, each remembered detail or incident given a section, small or large, that is juxtaposed against others. By the end of the novel, however, the different incidents have been worked out and together compose one man's life, and it has been so resourcefully done that we have a much more real sense of a man's identity than we would have through a straightforward narrative.

The major theme of A Run Across the Island is, perhaps, of loneliness, of the difficulties of establishing relationships, of the slippery impermanence of friendship and love, and this theme is also present in the next novel. Joseph Winter's Patronage is, however, very different from A Run Across the Island in that its characters are almost exclusively old people. Indeed, the novel is mostly set in a retirement home, and the novelist manages with great sensitiveness to create the feeling of the home itself and of its inhabitants. Joseph Winter's Patronage is the most touching and warmly sympathetic novel that Cole has so far written.

By contrast, The Search for Rita is the most glittering. It is an extremely elegant novel, but the elegance is not one that marks how far its author stands fastidiously aloof from life. It is rather that the mess of life is met by a keen-eyed wit that can be ironic, self-deprecatory, satiric, and bawdy by turns. Style means everything in a novel of this kind, and the novelist's style does not let him down.

—John Lucas

COLEGATE, Isabel (Diana)

Nationality: British. Born: Lincolnshire, 10 September 1931. Education: A boarding school in Shropshire and at Runton Hill School, Norfolk. Family: Married Michael Briggs in 1953; one daughter and two sons. Career: Literary agent, Anthony Blond Ltd., London, 1952–57. Awards: W.H. Smith Literary award, 1981. Hon. M.A.: University of Bath, 1988. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1981. Agent: Peters Fraser and Dunlop, 503–504 The Chambers, Chelsea Harbour, Lots Road, London SW10 0XF, England. Address: Midford Castle, Bath BA1 7BU, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Blackmailer. London, Blond, 1958. A Man of Power. London, Blond, 1960.

The Great Occasion. London, Blond, 1962.

Statues in a Garden. London, Bodley Head, 1964; New York, Knopf, 1966.

The Orlando Trilogy. London, Penguin, 1984.

Orlando King. London, Bodley Head, 1968; New York, Knopf, 1969.

Orlando at the Brazen Threshold. London, Bodley Head, 1971. Agatha. London, Bodley Head, 1973.

News from the City of the Sun. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1979.

The Shooting Party. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1980; New York, Viking Press, 1981.

Deceits of Time. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Viking, 1988.

The Summer of the Royal Visit. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1991; New York, Knopf, 1992.

Winter Journey. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1995.

Short Stories

A Glimpse of Sion's Glory. London, Hamish Hamilton, and New York, Viking, 1985.

* * *

The English will never turn Communist, they're such snobs. An English Communist could have a duke at gunpoint; if he asked him to stay for the weekend he'd drop the gun and dash off to Moss Bros to hire a dinner-jacket.

(Agatha)

Isabel Colegate's fiction dramatizes the English obsession with aristocracy and sensitivity to the nuances of class, even in the 20th century when traditional aristocratic power was declining. Against a backdrop of post-World War II global unrest, Colegate's first three novels. The Blackmailer. A Man of Power, and The Great Occasion. depict both the aristocrats' alliances with new sources of wealth and their inability to comprehend the welfare state: "... a five-day week, holidays with pay, pensions, free this, free that ... There's no sense of values" (The Blackmailer). Her later novels, Statues in a Garden, The Orlando Trilogy, and The Shooting Party, root these changes in the disintegrating world immediately before and after World War I. The Blackmailer, a "self-making" man of lower-middle-class origins, extorts money from the widow of a Korean War hero primarily to gain entry to the hero's ancestral home and family and complete his identification with the dead man. The thriller elements are not a sound basis for Colegate's social satire, though her comedy supports the anti-romantic ending triggered by the heroine's class loyalties. (Similarly the recent story "Distant Cousins" in A Glimpse of Sion's Glory uneasily mixes a science-fiction thriller plot with cold war satire in the service of a plea for world peace and tolerance.)

The protagonist of A Man of Power, a capitalist of lower-middleclass origins who has risen through wartime opportunities, plans to wed an impoverished aristocratic beauty because of her "mystery" and ability to reshape his image; his first wife and former secretary is inadequate to the role: "It's always the wives that give them away." Upper-class characters respond as much to the protagonist's mystique as to his money: the aristocrat's daughter suffers a painful initiation into his chaotic world through her love for him. (Like the charismatic tycoon and the society beauty, the vulnerable young girl is a staple of Colegate's fiction.) Unfortunately, the novel's sentimentality undercuts the serious treatment of its themes.

The Great Occasion focuses on middle-class vulnerability by interweaving the lives of a magnate, whose success stemmed partly from his marriage to an upper-class wife, and his five daughters in a world that rejects his business integrity and their talents and idealism: "... I expect she'll soon level down to the others." The tone wavers because of Colegate's mixing of Waughesque satire with family saga, but her skill at maintaining several story lines anticipates Statues in a Garden and The Shooting Party. Like these later works, The Great Occasion presents the natural world as both ironical commentary on human futility and a source of reconciliation to existence.

Developed cinematically in short scenes, Statues in a Garden portrays a group of aristocrats just before World War I and flashes forward to the futures implicit in their actions. A quasi-incestuous affair, one of many in Colegate's fiction, between a society beauty and her nephew, whom she has adopted, suggests the destructive narcissism of aristocratic lives. The nephew and aunt proceed to dubious futures, his business speculations undermining the stability of her settled world. Colegate controls detail and tone, the heroine's uncomprehending "... not a very close sort of incest, surely?" perfectly defining her shallowness and ability to survive. Though the nephew's schematic significance as disturber of both sexual and economic order seems obtrusive, the novel uses this type of symbolism more gracefully than The Orlando Trilogy.

The protagonist of Orlando King, raised on a remote island by his adoptive father to protect him from civilization, carries a heavy symbolic burden besides his name: his hammer toes and damaged eyesight link him with Oedipus, as do, more obviously, his partial responsibility for his father's death and marriage to his aristocratic stepmother. The participants learn the truth only after many years: "I suppose you really think ... that I look old enough to be Orlando's mother.' 'Could be' he said.'" Though amusing, this dialogue puzzles; surely the stepmother's resultant breakdown and death and the consequences for the next generation make this stress on her superficiality misleading. Orlando's sense of guilt destroys his business and political careers in the England of the 1930s that is increasingly dominated by men like his father who capitalize on wartime connections and marriages to aristocrats. If such outsiders lust after class status, aristocrats display equal fascination with the challenge these newcomers represent. Orlando's initial success in emulating his father is presumably emblematic, but his other actions confuse the novel's political and social pattern. The incest motif seems especially intrusive: in Orlando at the Brazen Threshold he successfully pursues the mistress of his nephew, whom his daughter marries. Orlando's behavior seems motivated by a need to support the novel's symbolism and lacks the complexity that the interior monologues, letters, and searching dialogue initially promise. Similarly, the elliptical narration with flashwords and allusions to incidents as yet unknown to the reader creates an atmosphere of elusive reality puzzling to the characters through whose voices we perceive it; but then Colegate periodically destroys this rich ambiguity by overexplicit summary: "Stephen and Paul were Orlando's half-brothers. Their father Leonard had in the far-off and scarcely imaginable days of his youth also been the father of Orlando ... 'Colegate's epigrams about the inevitable failure of Communism in a class-obsessed society clash with her serious treatment of radicals, who seem as futile and foolishly motivated as her capitalists: Graham, who dies on the Loyalist side in Spain (Orlando King); Paul, who sells secrets to Russia during the Burgess era because of family problems (Agatha). Set during the Suez crisis, Agatha focuses on the girl's Forsteresque commitment to Paul rather than to England, partly because of Orlando's earlier ruthlessness. (Raymond, who defects to Russia in the title story of A Glimpse of Sion's Glory, has more ambiguous, even more attractive, motives than these earlier characters.)

Negative aristocratic images abound in the trilogy, sometimes mocking the physical effects of reclusiveness: "his little eyes directed their feeble gaze down the long organ through which his frail tones appeared to emerge (eugenically speaking, his breeding was a disaster)." Another aristocrat embodies more damning inadequacies, from 1930s appeasement, through Suez arrogance to personal betrayal of Agatha in the name of patriotism. Though Colegate effectively dramatizes the peculiar fusion of charm, decency, egotism, and plaintive misunderstanding that characterizes such aristocrats, her trilogy fails to provide an adequate political context that explains the contribution of this class to the general malaise of English civilization.

Like other Colegate characters, Sir Randolph Nettleby, protagonist of The Shooting Party, set in 1913, prophesies, "An age, perhaps a civilization, is coming to an end." The novel, Colegate's best, carefully places the Nettleby estate in its geographical and historical contexts and focuses on those details of dress and behavior that reveal the beauty and vulnerability of country life on the eve of destruction. Sir Randolph is at times over-generous in assessing his class: "If you take away the proper functions of an aristocracy, what can it do but play games too seriously?" But the novel's stress on the violence of these games redresses the balance: "It was hard to remember that the keen concentration of their hunting instinct was not directed at their fellow man." The callousness of a visiting Hungarian count, however, helps define, by contrast, the English commitment to their tenants and to their land. The highflown language and sentiments that impress servants have real substance. The narrowness of the aristocratic code, the complacency with which aristocrats experience their rituals is offset by their willingness to limit their freedom for the sake of standards: Hartlib's agonizing headaches are the price his inbred nerves exact for his performance as a hunter. However foolish, the codes of this class give form and meaning to their lives, including the duty to sacrifice these lives in war. Restraining the epigrammatical tendencies that unbalanced earlier works, Colegate fuses an ironical view of society with a moving appreciation of its painful pleasures.

Colegate's story "The Girl Who Had Lived Among Artists" (A Glimpse of Sion's Glory) comes closest of all her work to the skill of The Shooting Party. Set in pre-World War II Bath, the story both illustrates and refutes the idea that "The snobbery of England in the 1930s was the real thing," as it examines the complex attitudes of the classes toward each other, the even more painful situation among civil servants and merchants in India, where the English condescend to each other and unite against the Indians, the desperate anxieties of European refugees who stress the superiority of their own culture, the ambiguous social position of clerics, and the special relation between artists and the upper classes ("... there are three things that make people classless, talent, beauty, and something else I've forgotten''). What flaws this brilliantly conceived picture of the dangers of such a society is Colegate's attempt to pack so much rich material into a short story. Though the details are effective and the dialogue often chilling, the treatment is ultimately too truncated for such thematic wealth.

Colegate's 1988 novel, Deceits of Time, explores the mystery of a World War I hero's apparent pro-German activities before and during World War II and reveals the familiar milieu of social tensions and adjustments that may explain his actions. The middle-class biographer and Jewish holocaust survivor understandably learn much about themselves while investigating the hero's life, but the modest triumph of the novel is the gradual revelation of the character of the hero's aristocratic widow. Her values, however limited, are allowed their surprising victory. Despite the novel's occasionally fussy structure and tendency toward undramatic summary of other characters and their motives, this portrait is equal to the best in The Shooting Party. Colegate's fiction offers an impressive demonstration of genuine talent finding its strengths and continually refining its craft.

—Burton Kendle

COLLINS, Hunt

See HUNTER, Evan

COLVIN, James

See MOORCOCK, Michael

CONNAUGHTON, Shane

Nationality: Northern Irish. Born: County Cavan, Northern Ireland. Career: Screenwriter, actor, and producer for both film and television, 1980s—.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Border Station. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1989. The Run of the Country. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1992.

Plays

Screenplays: My Left Foot (with Jim Sheridan), Boston, Faber and Faber, 1989; Miramax Films, 1989; The Playboys (with Kerry Crabbe), Samuel Goldwyn Company, 1992; O Mary This London, produced 1994; The Run of the Country, Columbia Pictures, 1995.

Other

A Border Diary (nonfiction). London, Faber and Faber, 1995.

* * *

Much of Shane Connaughton's writing is concerned with the notion of boundaries or borders, and interest in these artificial constructs is reflected in the titles of two of his works, A Border Station and A Border Diary. Considering that Connaughton was born and raised in the county of Cavan, bordering Northern Ireland, this is not surprising. His novel The Run of the Country is a semi-autobiographical tale of adolescence that takes Cavan as its setting. It is an Irish coming-of-age story with all the obvious episodes included, but Connaughton imbues these moments with an original flair and unexpected twists. At times, he adopts or plays with cliches common to Irish literature—most particularly those of the hard domineering father and the saintly suffering wife.

Following the death of his mother, the unnamed protagonist attempts to live with his authoritative and headstrong father, a police sergeant who patrols the volatile borderland between Protestant and Catholic counties. He may be an authority figure, but he also expresses much of the rage and frustration that is a product of this seemingly unresolvable political-religious situation. While their love for each other is evident, the absence of a tempering female presence makes their living together impossible. The protagonist moves in with his friend, Prunty, and his mother, and begins an apprenticeship in which he learns about women, nature, fighting, smuggling, and the political realities of contemporary Ireland.

But a bildungsroman is incomplete without a love story. The protagonist is soon enamored of Annagh Lee, a young woman who lives in Fermanagh, across the border. This forbidden and doomed love affair serves to highlight some of the political realities that govern the country. Class and religion are the wedges that drive these young people apart. The world of the novel is a troubled place, and Connaughton emphasizes the arbitrariness of the border and the ways in which it influences the construction of identity. Death is everywhere, and the constant reminders of its presence serve to underline the absurdity of drawing lines in the sand: "It appears we destroy. And so we do. But the country remains long after we're gone. The land swallows us in the end." Connaughton's writing captures the volatility and unpredictability of border life. And the metaphor of crossing borders is extended throughout the novel to include other kinds of crossing—developmental, emotional, moral.

Despite its occasional doses of humor, the novel remains a bleak one. Annagh is sent away after she suffers a miscarriage and Prunty dies a painful death, crushed under a tractor. It is only later that the protagonist learns of Prunty's involvement with the IRA and the novel ends with a condemnation of the political situation. Resignation runs deep in Connaughton's writing. For individuals who have known nothing but tense and troubling circumstances the prospect of peace seems nothing more than an impossible dream. As the protagonist prepares to leave at the end of the novel, his father observes, "As long as that Border's there fools' blood is all you'll get in this country. If they wanted peace they wouldn't put a border up, would they? A border is a wall. Misguided fools will always smash their heads against it." This sentiment runs throughout most of the author's writing.

Published prior to The Run of the Country, A Border Station is a companion piece offering a series of seven loosely connected stories that focus on selected moments in the life of the same protagonist as a young boy, and can be read as a composite novel. We find the same characters and many of the same concerns. The innocence of the boy is used to good effect to highlight questions that have gone unasked, situations that have, for too long, been taken for granted. The answers provided by the adults are not always entirely satisfying. The conflictual relationship with his father and the Oedipal attraction to his mother are emphasized to a greater degree than they are in The Run of the Country (one of the stories, "Out," deals with the protagonist's struggle to remain sleeping in his mother's bed). Each story, in fact, describes some form of conflict between father and son, with the mother often acting as an ineffectual intermediary. In fact, mother and son often weather the storm by conspiring together. The events described are often simple everyday ones, but they are momentous in the life of the boy. In "Beatrice," for example, he witnesses his seemingly infallible father intentionally cut down a better tree for firewood than the one his benefactor had indicated, out of resentment. Connaughton resists the cliches and finally paints a realistic portrait of the relationship between a hard father and a son who wants nothing more than to please.

Like one of his contemporaries, Patrick McCabe, Connaughton returns to the 1950s of his childhood and adolescence as the setting for much of his work. Special attention is paid to the wit of dialogue, the quick turn of phrase, the play and the punning of words. And he uses narrative shifts, moving from present to past and back again, filling in plot details as they are needed, but also reflecting his protagonist's thought patterns.

In terms of popularity, Connaughton is perhaps best known for his screenplays, which highlight his strengths—his love of set pieces, and his play with dialogue. These screenplays also use the same setting and include a number of the same characters, including the police sergeant father (in The Playboys). In My Left Foot (co-written with director Jim Sheridan), the story of Irish painter and writer Christy Brown, Connaughton revisits the theme of the overbearing father and suffering mother. Born into a poor Catholic family and stricken with cerebral palsy, Christy must struggle to accomplish the most rudimentary activities. His eventual success and fame are an example of the triumph of the will over the most adverse circumstances, both physical and familial.

A Border Diary, a compilation of notes Connaughton kept during the making of the film The Run of the Country, serves to illuminate some of the themes and situations addressed in the novel. While witnessing the filming in his hometown of Redhills, Connaughton is forced to contend with the disparities among his imagination, the reality of Redhills, and the further discrepant interpretations of the filmmakers. The director and the actors interpret his screenplay in ways that differ from the scenes playing in his head. The Ireland of his youth is no longer, and the antagonisms dividing the land have only deepened. His attempts at reconciling the differences and, at times, raging against them are a powerful metaphor of Ireland's continuing struggle with the past and conflicting visions of its identity.

-Tim Gauthier

CONROY, (Donald) Pat(rick)

Nationality: American. Born: Atlanta, Georgia, 26 October 1945. Education: The Citadel, B.A. 1967. Family: Married 1) Barbara Bolling in 1969 (divorced 1977), one daughter and two stepdaughters; 2) Lenore Gurewitz in 1981, one daughter, one stepson and one stepdaughter. Career: High school teacher, Beaufort, South Carolina, 1967–69; elementary schoolteacher, Daufuskie, South Carolina, 1969. Awards: Anisfield-Wolf award (Cleveland Foundation), 1972: National Endowment for the Arts award for achievement in education, 1974; Georgia Governor's award for Arts, 1978; Lillian Smith award for fiction (Southern Regional Council), 1981; inducted into South Carolina Hall of Fame, Academy of Authors, 1988; Thomas Cooper Society Library award (Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina), 1995; South Carolina Governor's award in the Humanities for Distinguished Achievement (South Carolina Humanities Council), 1996; Humanitarian award (Georgia Commission on the Holocaust), 1996; Lotos Medal of Merit in Recognition of Outstanding Literary Achievement, 1996. Agent: IMG-Bach Literary Agency, 22 East 71st Street, New York, New York 10021-4911, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Boo. Verona, Virginia, McClure Press, 1970.
The Water is Wide. Boston, Houghton, 1972.
The Great Santini. Boston, Houghton, 1976.
The Lords of Discipline. Boston, Houghton, 1980.
The Prince of Tides. Boston, Houghton, 1986.
Beach Music. New York, Nan A. Talese/Doubleday, 1995.

Plays

Screenplays: The Prince of Tides, Columbia Pictures, 1991.

Other

Introduction, Even White Boys Get the Blues: Kudzu's First Ten Years by Doug Marlette. New York, Times Books, 1992.

Foreword, Savannah Seasons: Food and Stories from Elizabeth on 37th by Elizabeth Terry with Alexis Terry. New York, Doubleday, 1996.

Preface, Gone with the Wind by Margaret Mitchell. New York, Scribner, 1996.

Foreword, Entertaining for Dummies by Suzanne Williamson with Linda Smith. Foster City, California, IDG Books Worldwide, 1997.

Introduction, Of Time and the River: A Legend of Man's Hunger in His Youth by Thomas Wolfe. New York, Scribner, 1999.

*

Critical Studies: Pat Conroy: A Critical Companion by Landon C. Burns, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1996.

* * *

In a sense, once you've read one Conroy novel, you've read them all, for characters, themes, and setting remain fairly constant, regardless of any given novel's plot. As an ideological son of both William Faulkner and Thomas Wolfe, Conroy places his novels squarely in the South. He even writes about the perpetual themes of the Southern artist, such as family conflict, racism, a sense of place, and coming of age. As a result, each novel is like looking at oneself in the mirror only once every few years: the basic features remain the same with only slight variations as time passes.

So where lies the appeal of Pat Conroy? Why do his novels become instant bestsellers? Why do diehard fans return for more, knowing that each novel will be remarkably like the last? Answers to these questions must lie somewhere in Conroy's use of the language and his sense of his native South, both its geographical aspects and its struggles with timeless issues. Even if the story and characters are the same, Conroy entices the reading public every time.

Conroy's first two books were strictly autobiographical in nature. The Boo, a tribute to a respected teacher, was written and published by Conroy while he was still a student at the Citadel Military Academy in Charleston, South Carolina, a locale that recurs, both generally and specifically, in many of his novels. His second book, The Water is Wide, is somewhat of an exposé, chronicling his experiences teaching poor, disadvantaged children on Daufuskie Island, off the coast of South Carolina. Conroy began teaching at the height of idealism but realized quickly that fighting "the system" was more difficult than he expected. This personal experience engendered a frequent theme in his novels: seeking the approval of any authority, be it institutional or individual, is a vain pursuit. Instead, one must find intrinsic worth in standing for values held within. Because of his disrespect for the school's administration and his unconventional teaching style, Conroy was fired after only one year. He may have lost his job, but he gained material for more books than just one. He also garnered an award from the National Humanitarian Association for his work on Daufuskie Island.

While The Boo and The Water is Wide are strictly autobiographical, Conroy's subsequent "novels" are more correctly termed "autobiographical fiction," for characters, places, and even plot often reflect his own life. Conroy's 1976 novel The Great Santini begins a common theme in both Conroy's work and his life: family conflict. Over and over again, we read of the father with a strong military connection, typically a Marine Corps pilot, who is physically and mentally abusive but elicits a mixture of love, loyalty, and fear from his son, who is usually the protagonist of the novel. Bull Meecham, the unchallengeable "Great Santini," is a South Carolina Catholic, like all of Conroy's protagonists, and a Marine fighter pilot of 20-plus years. Ben Meecham, the son, is a young man coming of age—a son in conflict with his father. Though he initially tries to reach the stature of his father, he despises his father's authoritarianism and finally realizes that he is a worthwhile human being, with or without his father's approval. When Ben finally breaks away from his father's tyranny, he does so through a symbolic basketball game in which he becomes the first person to beat his father at anything. In some areas of the South, sports have become almost an institutionalized religion, and Conroy employs this arena as the archetypal battle between good and evil-a microcosm of life itself, full of rules yet pervaded by chaos. In fact, most of Ben's role models and father figures are coaches. After his victory, Ben seems to make a clean break from his father's authority, yet he puts on his father's fighter jacket when his father crashes his plane, seemingly illustrating Conroy's feelings toward his own father. Although Conroy's memories of his father have been overshadowed by ill will, Conroy admits that lurking beneath those negative feelings is a certain degree of affection and respect.

Conroy's 1980 novel The Lords of Discipline contains the same sort of father figure, only in the form of an institution rather than an individual. However, the novel does develop Conroy's archetypal mother with a depth not accomplished in The Great Santini. Similar to the fathers, the mothers in Conroy's novels are reflections of his own mother, whom he once described as "a beautiful Southerner out of Gone With the Wind." Conroy's mothers are from the "Old South": typically aristocratic women (or women who aspire to social heights) who are refined, educated, lovers of art and literature. In The Lords of Discipline the character Abigail St. Croix epitomizes the Conroy mother, as she teaches Will McLean, the best friend of her son Tradd and the novel's protagonist, "the difference between Hepplewhite and Regency, and between Chippendale and Queen Anne." The family's lineage goes so deeply into South Carolina's history that "a passing knowledge of the Tradd-St. Croix mansion was a liberal education in itself."

The Lords of Discipline is also the stage for new developments in Conroy's repertoire of themes: racism, betrayal, and tradition. Racism is a key issue as Will, a senior at the Carolina Military Institute (Conroy's fictional version of The Citadel), is called upon to protect the school's first black student during the Civil Rights/Vietnam era. The brutality of military life comes not from a father but from the institution itself and the elitism it transfers to its students. CMI is similar to the stereotypical, small, Southern town, with its closeness and sense of tradition and security. This close-knit setting operates much like the Southern barber shop or pool hall, where men gather to find comfort in orthodoxy or plot a lynching, should someone dare violate the customs of the community. This demand for conformity yields The Ten, a hate group on campus that operates much like a lynch mob. Even the stereotypical "crooked sheriff" is present in the character of General Durrell, who at first seems to only ignore the presence of The Ten but, as the reader learns, actually participates in its activities.

Will witnesses a great deal of cruelty at CMI toward any student viewed as different by The Ten, yet he feels a fierce love of the school and its traditions. Not only must he deal with his conflicting feelings toward the school, but he must also face betrayal by Tradd, who is not only a member of city's aristocratic elite but also of The Ten, after his roommates defy the school's code of honor. Through these circumstances, Will confronts the ultimate question: does he remain true to the traditions of the academy or to his personal sense of honor?

Although Conroy's books always take place in Beaufort, Savannah, Charleston or some variety of these cities, the importance of the South as a geographical locale is most obvious in his 1986 novel Prince of Tides. Though Conroy was born in Georgia and moved a great deal due to his father's military career, he bears deep connections to the southeast coast of South Carolina, especially Beaufort, where he graduated from high school. Some of his most lyrical passages are pastoral descriptions that make South Carolina sound like the Garden of Eden. Though Conroy's primary literary influences, Faulkner and Wolfe, rarely varied from their respective Yoknapatawpha County, Mississippi, and Altamont, North Carolina, Conroy does take his characters to distant places; however, they always make it "home."

In Prince of Tides, Tom Wingo's twin sister, successful but schizophrenic feminist poet Savannah, has moved to New York to escape the oppressions she feels in the South as a woman. Hoping to help Savannah, Tom goes to New York to open their childhoods to her therapist, Susan Lowenstein, and figuratively returns home through many anecdotal flashbacks, which are prime examples of Conroy's lyricism. Through Savannah and Tom's brother Luke, Conroy picks up the "Lost Cause" myth, which originated in the portrayal of Confederate soldiers as noble warriors protecting their beloved homeland from the rapacious, vile North. In this case, Luke sacrifices his life, not fighting off Yankees but battling the Atomic Energy Commission, which planned to build plutonium production plants on their beloved island. Conroy also utilizes the stereotypical "good ol boy," a phrase actually created by Thomas Wolfe that connotes a blue collar, outdoorsman who is deeply patriotic and unwaveringly honest. Wingo slips into this role as he comfortably teaches a "Yankee" youth to play football and plays the redneck at a party of elite New Yorkers given by Lowenstein, with whom he has an affair.

While Prince of Tides travels the country to some degree, Beach Music travels the world but still keeps South Carolina at the center of its vision. In Beach Music, Jack McCall takes his daughter from South Carolina to Rome after his wife Shyla commits suicide, but he is drawn back to Charleston by the mystery of her death and learns of her parents' roots in the Holocaust that so haunted Shyla's life. McCall's life in Rome takes up a great deal of the narrative, but Nazi Germany becomes as much a real part of the setting as any city because it has pervaded every moment of Shyla's life. As Conroy writes, "The Foxes' house on the Point in Waterford was simply an annex of Bergen-Belsen, a rest stop on the way to the crematoriums."

While Conroy's popularity has never been in question, the critical assessment of his novels has been mixed. Only one book devoted to his work exists. Pat Conroy: A Critical Companion, by Landon C. Burns, contains analyses of all of Conroy's books, plus chapters on biography and genre. Other criticism has been confined to reviews at the release of each book and scattered analyses in critical journals. While Burns's assessments are largely positive, many feel Conroy has "sold out" to Hollywood since all his books, except for

The Boo, have been made into feature films. He has also been criticized for melodrama and sensationalism, and scenes like the tiger attack in Prince of Tides and the trial scene at the end of The Lords of Discipline give some credence to this criticism.

However, few challenge the emotional appeal of his novels, and his popularity remains steadfast. If a reader has experienced a Conroy novel before, he knows the book will be flawed, he knows the book is 500-plus pages, and he knows the characters are, in many ways, the same ones he knew in the last Conroy novel. But in ways, it's like returning to old friends and familiar places, and the lyricism of the prose is more than most readers can resist.

-Melissa Simpson

COOK, David

Nationality: British. Born: Preston, Lancashire, 21 September 1940. Education: The Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, London, 1959–61. Career: Since 1961 professional actor. Writer-in-residence, St. Martin's College, Lancaster, 1982–83. Awards: Writers Guild award, 1977; American Academy E.M. Forster award, 1977; Hawthornden prize, 1978; Arts Council bursary, 1979; Southern Arts prize, 1985; Arthur Welton scholarship, 1991.; Odd Fellow Concern Book award, 1992. Agent: Greene and Heaton Ltd., 37 Goldhawk Road, London W12 8QQ. Address: 7 Sydney Place, London SW7 3NL, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Albert's Memorial. London, Secker and Warburg, 1972.

Happy Endings. London, Secker and Warburg, 1974.

Walter. London, Secker and Warburg, 1978; Woodstock, New York, Overlook Press, 1985.

Winter Doves. London, Secker and Warburg, 1979; Woodstock, New York, Overlook Press, 1985.

Sunrising. London, Secker and Warburg, 1984; Woodstock, New York, Overlook Press, 1986.

Missing Persons. London, Secker and Warburg, 1986.

Crying Out Loud. London, Secker and Warburg, 1988.

Walter and June. London, Secker and Warburg, 1989.

Second Best. London, Faber, 1991.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Finding Out," in Mae West Is Dead, edited by Adam Mars-Jones. London, Faber, 1983.

"Growing Away," in Daily Telegraph (London), 1994.

Plays

Square Dance (produced London, 1968).

If Only (televised 1984). Published in Scene Scripts 3, edited by Roy Blatchford, London, Longman, 1982.

Radio Play: Pity, 1989.

Television Plays: Willy, 1973; Jenny Can't Work Any Faster, 1975; Why Here?, 1976; Couples series, 1976; A Place Like Home series, 1976; Repent at Leisure, 1978; Mary's Wife, 1980; Walter, from his own novel, 1982; Walter and June, from his own novel, 1982; If Only, 1984; Singles Week-end, 1984; Love Match, 1986; Missing Persons, from his own novel, 1990; Closing Numbers, 1994; also scripts for Schools Television.

Screenplay: Second Best, from his own novel, 1994.

^

Film Adaptation: Second Best, 1994.

David Cook comments:

I began writing because I was an out-of-work actor, and needed an occupation which would be creatively satisfying. From the beginning, therefore, I brought an actor's concern with character to the task of writing fiction, and all my work is based on the same sort of act of empathy by which any actor brings life to an invented person. My discovery was that I now had to make this empathetic act for all my characters, not just one, seeing through their eyes, thinking their thoughts, feeling their feelings, and to do it without the help of a text; creating the text was up to me.

So the questions for me always are "Who are you?" "How do you live?" "How have you arrived at this condition?", and from the answers, logic will make a narrative. My first novel was about an old bag-lady whom I used to see sitting in doorways near South Kensington Station. I did not write a story; I wrote little pieces of what the details of her life might be, and after a while they began to form themselves into a story. All my work since, both the novels and the TV plays, has been based on empathy and research, and with a strong bias to those who have been called "the walking wounded." When I decided that my fifth novel, Sunrising, should be set in a time which was not my own, the research became different in kind. I could no longer walk to Fleetwood or work with autistic children, but had to find my material in books, and while it is not exactly easy for someone with no academic education whatever to gain access to Oxford's Bodleian Library, it was done. Now that I have the taste, for it, I shall write a sequel to Sunrising one day, but I do not anticipate that I shall abandon the walking wounded of the here and now; they press in too closely.

* * *

David Cook is a stage and television actor who began to write novels in the early 1970s. His first novel, Albert's Memorial, was acclaimed for its originality and its sharply detailed prose, and subsequent novels like Happy Endings and Walter won prestigious prizes. Finely and delicately crafted, Cook's novels build the interior perspectives of his characters with a meticulous sense of authenticity and convincing detail. Characteristically, Cook's characters are isolated, lonely, inward-dwelling creatures whose consciousness is limited by some form of impairment or crippling circumstance. Physical or emotional indigents, they wander through a world they perceive intensely, although never accurately, in only bits and pieces. The juxtaposition of their partial points of view, which Cook always sees sympathetically, with an assumed, seldom stated "normal" point of view provides the tension and the emotional energy of the novels. Albert's Memorial, for example, concentrates on two isolated creatures: Mary, who after her husband's death, tries to live in the cemetery where he is buried and later tramps to the seaside resort where they spent their honeymoon, interested only in the conversations she holds with him inside her head, and Paul, who establishes trivial routines in his more geographically circumscribed wanderings after his homosexual lover suddenly dies. In Walter, the world is seen through Walter's autistic point of view, tracing the origins and effects of the debility that has led to his being institutionalized. Cook's central characters are all dependent on others, or institutions, or fantasies, for a survival they cannot manage on their own.

Cook's characters welcome impingements on their isolation, respond to relationships that break through their defenses or their occluded and partial visions. In Albert's Memorial, Mary and Paul connect, finally living with each other and sharing the fantasy of Mary's phantom pregnancy (she has been raped while tramping, and mistakes symptoms because she and her husband had avoided having children by never fully consummating their love). The relationship exists in mutual dependency, as does that between Walter from the earlier novel and June, a more intellectually functioning although emotionally severely unstable resident of the mental institution, as they escape to wander England in Winter Doves.

Characters like Mary and Paul, Walter and June, are seen against the background of contemporary England. The reader is always aware of an ordinary England dimly seen through the distorted half-lens of the impaired, and Cook never explicitly and seldom even implicitly provides any significant social commentary. The understated conflict between the characters and the larger world is often effectively rendered as comedy, as in the scene in which Paul, consulting a doctor because he is worried that Mary's "pregnancy" may be endangered, is so haltingly unable to articulate his concern that the doctor tests him for gonorrhea and administers a preventive injection. Similarly, wandering characters, in Winter Doves and other novels, duplicate a muted version of the comic picaresque, as they clash with the society that they cannot understand. Cook frequently depicts representatives of the Welfare State who try to help or control the indigents. These representatives, nurses, social workers, custodians in mental hospitals, doctors, and bureaucrats, are generally benign and well-intentioned, although unable to touch or assuage the deeper disturbances of the central characters. England's postwar emphasis on the social services is seen as praiseworthy and humane, although never finally relevant, as if no social issue or characterization is ever as significant as is the tenuous establishment of the individual identity.

Much of that identity in Cook's fictional world is physical and direct. He concentrates on immediate experience, describing with acute sensitivity how his characters touch, feel, reason, and communicate. Long passages detail the tiring efforts necessary to establish oneself as a squatter in an uncompleted office building or the elaborate preparation for and physical progress of the homosexual love affair. In the emphasis on the physical and emotional, the detailed representation of how the impaired see and feel, Cook is attempting to shape his carefully developed prose to get at a primal quality within the human creature. Cook's versions of the primal are never aggressive or animalistic; rather, his novels are most frequently populated by birds, pigeons and doves, in both plot and metaphor. The birds suggest the delicacy, fragility, and tenuousness of identity, the only kind of precarious existence these impaired creatures can manage. Cook sees the bird-like fragility and tenacity of the creatures of limited consciousness with enormous sympathy that, because of his writing's directness, specificity, and lack of pretense, never descends to sentimentality.

-James Gindin

COOPER, William

Pseudonym: Harry Summerfield Hoff. Nationality: British. Born: Crewe, Cheshire, 4 August 1910. Education: Christ's College, Cambridge, M.A. in physics 1933. Military Service: Served in the Royal Air Force, 1940–45. Family: Married Joyce Barbara Harris in 1951 (died 1988); two daughters. Career: Schoolmaster, Leicester, 1933-40; assistant commissioner, Civil Service Commission, London, 1945-58. Part-time personnel consultant, United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, 1958-72, Central Electricity Generating Board, 1960-72, Commission of European Community, 1972-73; assistant director, Civil Service Selection Board, 1973-75; member of the Board, Crown Agents, 1975-77; adviser, Millbank Technical Services, 1975-77; personnel consultant, Ministry of Overseas Development, 1978. Adjunct professor of English, Syracuse University, London Center, 1977-90. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature. Address: 22 Kenilworth Court, Lower Richmond Road, London SW15 1EW, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Trina (as H.S. Hoff). London, Heinemann, 1934; as It Happened in PRK, New York, Coward McCann, 1934.

Rhéa (as H.S. Hoff). London, Heinemann, 1937.

Lisa (as H.S. Hoff). London, Heinemann, 1937.

Three Marriages (as H.S. Hoff). London, Heinemann, 1946.

Scenes from Provincial Life. London, Cape, 1950.

The Struggles of Albert Woods. London, Cape, 1952; New York, Doubleday, 1953.

The Ever-Interesting Topic. London, Cape, 1953.

Disquiet and Peace. London, Macmillan, 1956; Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1957.

Young People. London, Macmillan, 1958.

Scenes from Married Life. London, Macmillan, 1961.

Scenes from Life (includes Scenes from Provincial Life and Scenes from Married Life). New York, Scribner, 1961.

Memoirs of a New Man. London, Macmillan, 1966.

You Want the Right Frame of Reference. London, Macmillan, 1971. Love on the Coast. London, Macmillan, 1973.

You're Not Alone: A Doctor's Diary. London, Macmillan, 1976.

Scenes from Metropolitan Life. London, Macmillan, 1982.

Scenes from Later Life. London, Macmillan, 1983.

Scenes from Provincial Life, and Scenes from Metropolitan Life. New York, Dutton, 1983.

Scenes from Married Life, and Scenes from Later Life. New York, Dutton, 1984.

Immortality at Any Price. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1991.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Ball of Paper," in Winter's Tales 1. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1955.

"A Moral Choice," in Winter's Tales 4. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1958.

Plays

High Life (produced London, 1951). Prince Genji (produced Oxford, 1968). London, Evans, 1959.

Other

C.P. Snow. London, Longman, 1959; revised edition, 1971.
Shall We Ever Know? The Trial of the Hosein Brothers for the Murder of Mrs. McKay. London, Hutchinson, 1971; as Brothers, New York, Harper, 1972.

From Early Life (memoirs). London, Macmillan, 1990.

*

Manuscript Collection: Humanities Research Center, University of Texas, Austin.

Critical Studies: Tradition and Dream by Walter Allen, London, Phoenix House, 1964, as The Modern Novel in Britain and the United States, New York, Dutton, 1964; introduction by Malcolm Bradbury to Scenes from Provincial Life, London, Macmillan, 1969; William Cooper the Novelist by Ashok Kumar Sinha, New Delhi, Jnanada, 1977.

William Cooper comments:

(1972) I don't know that I specially believe in artists making statements about their own work. An artist's work is his statement. And that's that. The rest is for other people to say. Perhaps a writer whose original statement has turned out obscure may feel it useful to present a second that's more comprehensible—in that case I wonder why he didn't make the second one first.

Speaking for myself, Scenes from Provincial Life seems to me so simple, lucid, attractive, and funny that anyone who finds he can't read it probably ought to ask himself: "Should I be trying to read books at all? Wouldn't it be better to sit and watch television or something?" I write about the real world and real people in it. And I stick pretty close to what I've had some experience of. That's why Scenes from Metropolitan Life, which is also simple, lucid, attractive and funny, was suppressed. Scenes from Married Life, makes the third of a trilogy. Albert Woods and Memoirs of a New Man are about goings-on in the world of science and technology; You Want the Right Frame of Reference in the world of arts—they have an added touch of wryness and malice. An unusual marriage is the core of Young People and of Disquiet and Peace, the former set in the provinces in the '30s, the latter in Edwardian upperclass London—its small group of admirers thinks it's a beautiful book. The Ever-Interesting Topic is about what happens when you give a course of lectures on sex to a boarding school full of boys: what you'd expect. Shall We Ever Know? is a day-by-day account of a most surprising and mystifying murder trial, a kidnapping for ransom in which no trace whatsoever of the body was ever found, and two men were found guilty of murder.

(1981) Love on the Coast, my only novel to be set outside England, is about some former "flower children" in San Francisco who are working their way back into society by running an "experimental" theater. And You're Not Alone is the diary of a London doctor, a retired GP of some distinction, to whom people come to confide their sexual quirks—as a start he tells them they are not alone.

(1986) In 1981 the 30-year suppression of Scenes from Metropolitan Life ended, allowing the trilogy to be published complete. The three novels fit together thus: Provincial Life—Boy won't marry Girl; Metropolitan Life—same Girl now won't marry Boy; Married Life—Boy meets another Girl and marries happily every after. In 1983 I published Scenes from Later Life as a companion volume to the trilogy, with the characters in their sixties and seventies, learning to cope with old age—in the final chapter I can make you laugh and make you cry within seven pages.

(1991) For my next novel I decided to make a change and embark on obvious satire. I completed a first draft which needed quite a lot of work, and two things happened which led me to put it aside. The first was a long drawn-out personal tragedy, on which I was persuaded to do a piece for Granta about the last stages—the most intimate thing I have ever written. The second was a friend's suggestion which caught my fancy, that I should try my hand at autobiography (from which I had previously had an aversion). I decided to write down things I could remember happening between the ages of 2 and 17 just as they came into my head—pure reminiscence unsullied by "research," From Early Life, short and delightful. And then I came back to my new departure, the satirical novel called Immortality at Any Price. The jacket by Willie Rushton discloses its nature—my response to a most wounding comment once made by an American reviewer: "Who wants to read a novel by a nice guy?" Well! ...

* * *

William Cooper is the pen-name of a novelist who had already published four novels under his own name, H.S. Hoff, when in 1950 he emerged with a new literary identity, and won a new literary reputation, with Scenes from Provincial Life—a book which quickly became a classic of a new kind of postwar realism and undoubtedly had a very powerful influence on the development of the English novel in the 1950s and since. A delightful and tough-minded story set among young provincial intellectuals, in a British midland town that bears a close resemblance to Leicester, over the crucial months of change and crisis leading up to the outbreak of World War II, Scenes from Provincial Life-published at a time when new fictional directions were uncertain and no real postwar movement had shown itself—became the forerunner of a whole sequence of novels which, in the postwar years, were to treat local English life, and the familiar and ordinary experience of recognizable people, with a fresh, youthful, exploratory, and critical curiosity. There can be little doubt that the book did encourage, and often considerably influence, a number of younger writers like John Braine, David Storey, Stanley Middleton, and Stan Barstow, some of whom directly expressed their indebtedness; and it certainly helped writers thereafter to find a sense of direction in the period after the decline both of Modernism and the political fiction of the 1930s. Its force was strengthened by the fact that Cooper—along with C.P. Snow, Pamela Hansford Johnson, and some other younger writers like Kingsley Amis, Philip Larkin, and John Wain—was deliberately reacting against the Bloomsbury-dominated climate of "cultured" and cosmopolitan experimentalism, and was seeking out a form of fiction much more social, empirical, realistic, and humanly substantial in character, and concerned with a felt sense of texture and the issues of contemporary British life.

This spirit in writing has sometimes been characterized by critics as middlebrow, and it was self-defined as provincial. But it asserted a humanist vigor and a closeness to familiar life in the practice of serious British writing at a time when, in literary traditions in other countries, the break with the past was disquieting and the signs of literary strain were being felt. Joyce had seemed to bring the modern novel into a cul-de-sac, and Cooper and others pointed to the value of the native tradition, his argument clearly strengthened by the fact that his own novel was not just one of the first, but one of the best, of a kind. In time the tendency he represented was to come to seem a narrowed view of the direction of fiction, but Cooper represented this kind of novel in all its strength. Scenes from Provincial Life tells the story of Joe Lunn, the young science master at a provincial grammar school, and his friends, nonconforming emotional radicals who know they are distant witnesses to the world's great events, as a kind of conflict between the force of history and the force of the familiar. Fearful of a German occupation of Britain, they plan their exiles; but the day-to-day world of provincial life (especially their complex sexual relationships) seems all that matters, and they finally opt for it. The story was to go on through three more volumes, plotting the development of Joe's life as a scientific adviser to government, as a writer and a married man. Scenes from Metropolitan Life, written in the 1950s but not published for legal reasons until 1982, brings the story into the postwar world, the London scene, and the world of Whitehall, renewing Joe's relationship with his former mistress Myrtle in the context of urban sexual mores. Scenes from Married Life, which appeared in 1961, is, unusually in contemporary fiction, a celebration of marital life, reinforcing Cooper's gift for exploring the private underside of the public world in which Joe is now an important figure. Scenes from Later Life brings most of the characters forward into the world of the late 1970s, with Joe haunted by retirement and the ailments of his mother. But, despite a rising quota of pain, the characteristic Cooper good humor and the sense of celebration of the familiar prevails, and the sequence sustains the spirit with which it started. As in the novels of C.P. Snow, but without Snow's stoical and even tragic pessimism, we see the new bloods turn into the men of place and power in an age in which the scientist and technologist become important public figures. But Cooper's social history gives way to a history of the domestic and the familiar, a comedy of daily life done with great luminosity and delicacy.

Cooper's other novels are all marked by the same commitment to familiar life, and the same luminous good humor. One, Disquiet and Peace, is an historical novel, set in the high-society milieu of Edwardian political and drawing-room life as the strange death of Liberal England is taking place; another, Love on the Coast, takes radical Californian lifestyle as its subject. But most of his books are, in an approving sense of the term, "banal" novels—concerned, that is, with the world of everyday social and emotional experience, and capable of evoking a strong, strange sense of recognition. Set in the provinces, the suburbs, or the world of the urban middle-classes with its clubs and appropriate restaurants—the pieces of social experience Cooper knows and details very well—they describe with affection and understanding the way ordinary things happen to intelligent and skeptical people as they marry, breed families, have affairs, work at recognizable jobs, and worry about their sexual lives, their mortality, and their salaries. Many of them indeed belong to the world of the "new men" (one book is called Memoirs of a New Man) whose meritocratic ascent forms an important story in British social life.

Like that of his friend C.P. Snow (on whom he has written warmly), Cooper's fiction relates the life of ordinary origins to the commonsense decencies of public life, and, as with Snow, his realistic pleasure in the world seems to have to do with the fact that it is open to his mobility and talent. Like Snow's fiction, Cooper's achievement bears some relation to that desire for a better world that fed the postwar years, and also explores many of its ambiguities and disappointments.

But if one of Cooper's best qualities is his powerful realism, another is his comedy and wit. If he deals with familiar life, he lights it up with a striking sense of human oddity, and of the quirks and unexpected outrages that exist in his very recognizable characters. The outrage is often added to by the cool, undercutting tone of his narrators themselves. Like Muriel, who in Disquiet and Peace is provoked to stirring up disorder by donning an eyeglass and then dropping it in her soup, Cooper has a way of stirring up the surface of his world by his oblique vision. The struggles of the characters for sexual, social, or material success become matters for very cool irony. His plots often turn on conflicts between traditional and more liberal values, and he writes with a moral edge, but is also capable of moving lightly away from it all, leaving the chaos to itself, as in The Ever-Interesting Topic, about a headmaster who tries to bring lectures on sex education into his public school. All Cooper's books show a buoyant and vitalistic view of sexuality and an awareness of the way it undercuts so many of our social and moral pretensions. This comic vision is something he also handed on to his successors, and it makes his a realism of marvelous surprise, giving his books a sharp bite and clarity that distinguish them from Snow's sobered kind of realism. His Albert Woods and Joe Lunns may acquire influence, but they do not acquire sobriety. As a result they become attractive centers of vision, and that is especially true of Joe Lunn, who, in all the books where he is narrator, is both a performer in the chaotic and comic action and an artistic observer consciously knowing about fiction and busily interpreting, recalling, and shaping in a neat balance of sympathy and irony. Other narrative techniques are used in other novels, but they are usually distinguished by an adept mixture of sympathetic identification with lively characters and an ironic detachment from them.

With 17 novels over half a century to his credit, Cooper has contributed vitally to postwar British fiction. At times his committed support for realism and his distrust of writing in any way avant garde has been unfashionable and even inhibiting, though it has been an expression of his fierce literary individualism. Nonetheless his influence has been very considerable, and he did much to establish the "new realism" of British fiction from the 1950s onward. Though his own novels do vary somewhat in quality, they possess a very distinctive style, tone, and vision, and at their best a very cunning and powerful artistic control. Cooper's strengths are most apparent whenas in Young People—he is capturing the flavor of some distinctive period, milieu or generation, and then observing, with some cynicism, the characteristic, and comic, behavior of individuals within it. A strong admirer of the novelist H.G. Wells ("I loved it, enshrining Wells's message of optimism," Joe Lunn says of Wells's The History of Mr. Polly in Scenes from Later Life), and like him trained as a scientist, he can be compared with his master both for his concern with the way British society works and for his power to capture youthful, hopeful, buoyant pleasure from the stuff of ordinary life. At best, as in Scenes from Provincial Life, his balance of detail, reminiscence, sentiment, and irony comes together so exactly as to allow comparison with the great "artful realists," like Turgenev. Where many British novelists avoid the public world, of politics, government, law, and science, Cooper's books construct an important record of manners and moods, landscapes and cityscapes, social and historical changes, public operations and private and sexual emotions, in ways which are both morally and humanly illuminating and comically adept. Cooper has described his aim simply; it is "to tell the truth, laughing." These are the qualities that give the four novels of the Scenes series the classic status they now possess. Cooper has remained a vivid and influential writer, publishing in 1990 an autobiography of his midlands childhood, From Early Life, which captures his lower-middle-class social origins and ambitions with his familiar humane intelligence, and extends his chronicle of English life backwards to the years right after World War I. Meanwhile his late novel Immortality at Any Price deals in his sharp, cynical fashion with the raging competitiveness of the old, and turns on the principle that there is nothing like the animosity of old friends. Altogether, the long chronicle of his novels reminds us that the ability to see, illuminate, shape, and construct the experience of the ordinary and social world and to interpret the patterns of human behavior within it is something fundamental to the spirit of fiction.

-Malcolm Bradbury

COOVER, Robert (Lowell)

Nationality: American. Born: Charles City, Iowa, 4 February 1932. Education: Southern Illinois University, Carbondale, 1949–51; Indiana University, Bloomington, B.A. 1953; University of Chicago, 1958–61, M.A. 1965. Military Service: Served in the United States Naval Reserve, 1953-57: Lieutenant. Family: Married Maria del Sans-Mallafré in 1959; two daughters and one son. Career: Taught at Bard College, Annandale-on-Hudson, New York, 1966-67, University of Iowa, Iowa City, 1967-69, Columbia University, New York, 1972, Princeton University, New Jersey, 1972–73, Virginia Military Institute, Lexington, 1976, and Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts, 1981. Since 1981 writer-in-residence, Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island. Fiction editor, Iowa Review, Iowa City, 1974-77. Awards: Faulkner award, 1966; Brandeis University Creative Arts award, 1969; Rockefeller fellowship, 1969; Guggenheim fellowship, 1971, 1974; American Academy award, 1976; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1985; Rea award, for short story, 1987. Agent: Georges Borchardt Inc., 136 East 57th Street, New York, New York 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Origin of the Brunists. New York, Putnam, 1966; London, Barker, 1967; New York, Grove, 2000.

The Universal Baseball Association, Inc., J. Henry Waugh, Prop. New York, Random House, 1968; London, Hart Davis, 1970.

The Public Burning. New York, Viking Press, 1977; London, Allen Lane, 1978.

Spanking the Maid. New York, Grove Press, 1982; London, Heinemann, 1987.

Gerald's Party. New York, Linden Press, and London, Heinemann, 1986.

John's Wife. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1996. Briar Rose. New York, Grove Press, 1996. Ghost Town. New York, Henry Holt, 1998.

Short Stories

Pricksongs and Descants. New York, Dutton, 1969; London, Cape, 1971; New York, Grove Press, 2000.

The Water Pourer (unpublished chapter from The Origin of the Brunists). Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, Bruccoli Clark, 1972.

Hair o' the Chine. Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, Bruccoli Clark, 1979.
After Lazarus: A Filmscript. Bloomfield Hills, Michigan, Bruccoli Clark, 1980.

Charlie in the House of Rue. Lincoln, Massachusetts, Penmaen Press, 1980.

A Political Fable. New York, Viking Press, 1980.

The Convention. Northridge, California, Lord John Press, 1982.

In Bed One Night and Other Brief Encounters. Providence, Rhode Island, Burning Deck, 1983.

Aesop's Forest, with The Plot of the Mice and Other Stories, by Brian Swann. Santa Barbara, California, Capra Press, 1986.

A Night at the Movies; or, You Must Remember This. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Heinemann, 1987.

Whatever Happened to Gloomy Gus of the Chicago Bears? New York, Simon and Schuster, 1987; London, Heinemann, 1988.

Pinocchio in Venice. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Heinemann, 1991.

Plays

The Kid (produced New York, 1972; London, 1974). Included in A Theological Position, 1972.

A Theological Position (includes A Theological Position, The Kid, Love Scene, Rip Awake). New York, Dutton, 1972.

Love Scene (as Scène d'amour, produced Paris, 1973; as Love Scene, produced New York, 1974). Included in A Theological Position, 1972.

Rip Awake (produced Los Angeles, 1975). Included in A Theological Position, 1972.

A Theological Position (produced Los Angeles, 1977; New York, 1979). Included in A Theological Position, 1972.

Bridge Hand (produced Providence, Rhode Island, 1981).

Other

Editor, with Kent Dixon, The Stone Wall Book of Short Fiction. Iowa City, Stone Wall Press, 1973.

Editor, with Elliott Anderson, Minute Stories. New York, Braziller, 1976.

*

Critical Studies: Fiction and the Figures of Life by William H. Gass, New York, Knopf, 1970; Black Humor Fiction of the Sixties by Max Schulz, Athens, Ohio University Press, 1973; "Robert Coover and the Hazards of Metafiction" by Neil Schmitz, in Novel 7 (Providence, Rhode Island), 1974; "Humor and Balance in Coover's The Universal Baseball Association, Inc." by Frank W. Shelton, in Critique 17 (Atlanta), 1975; "Robert Coover, Metafictions, and Freedom" by Margaret Heckard, in Twentieth Century Literature 22 (Los Angeles), 1976; "The Dice of God: Einstein, Heisenberg, and Robert Coover" by Arlen J. Hansen, in Novel 10 (Providence, Rhode Island), 1976; "Structure as Revelation: Coover's Pricksongs and Descants" by Jessie Gunn, in Linguistics in Literature, vol. 2, no. 1, 1977; The Metafictional Muse: The Works of Robert Coover, Donald Barthelme, and William H. Gass by Larry McCaffery, Pittsburgh, University of Pittsburgh Press, 1982; Robert Coover: The Universal Fictionmaking Process by Lois Gordon, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1983; Robert Coover's Fictions by Jackson I. Cope, Baltimore, Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986; Dissident Postmodernists: Barthelme, Coover, Pynchon by Paul Maltby, Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991; Robert Coover: A Study of the Short Fiction by Thomas E. Kennedy, New York, Twayne, 1992; Comic Sense: Reading Robert Coover, Stanley Elkin, Philip Roth by Thomas Pughe, Basel, Switzerland, Birkhäuser Verlag, 1994.

Robert Coover comments:

In reply to the question: "Why Do You Write?": Because art blows life into the lifeless, death into the deathless.

Because art's lie is preferable, in truth, to life's beautiful terror. Because, as time does not pass (nothing, as Beckett tells us, passes), it passes the time.

Because death, our mirthless master, is somehow amused by epitaphs.

Because epitaphs, well-struck, give death, our voracious master, heartburn.

Because fiction imitates life's beauty, thereby inventing the beauty life lacks.

Because fiction is the best position, at once exotic and familiar, for fucking the world.

Because fiction, mediating paradox, celebrates it.

Because fiction, mothered by love, loves love as a mother might her unloving child.

Because fiction speaks, hopelessly, beautifully, as the world speaks.

Because God, created in the storyteller's image, can be destroyed only by His maker.

Because, in its perversity, art harmonizes the disharmonious.

Because, in its profanity, fiction sanctifies life.

Because, in its terrible isolation, writing is a path to brotherhood. Because in the beginning was the gesture, and in the end to come as well: in between what we have are words.

Because, of all the arts, only fiction can unmake the myths that Because of its endearing futility, its outrageous pretensions.

Because the pen, though short, casts a long shadow (upon, it must be said, no surface).

Because the world is re-invented every day and this is how it is done.

Because there is nothing new under the sun except its expression.

Because truth, that elusive joker, hides himself in fictions and must therefore be sought there.

Because writing, in all space's unimaginable vastness, is still the greatest adventure of all.

And because, alas, what else?

unman men.

* * *

Robert Coover's fiction is built around his firm belief that realist modes of fiction are outworn and need to be revivified. He writes fictions that are highly self-conscious and that draw attention to their own artifice and invention. He rejects, too, the notion that there is a fixed, objective truth, pointing constantly to the highly subjective nature of different people's interpretations of reality. Although the reception of his books has varied considerably, Coover has remained ruthlessly loyal to his own artistic premises throughout his long career.

Pricksongs and Descants was the third book Coover published, but he actually wrote most of the stories before his first two novels and it contains many of his fundamental beliefs and practices. In "The Magic Poker," for instance, he spells out the authority of the author over his creations: "I have brought two sisters to this invented island, and shall, in time, send them home again. I have dressed them and may well choose to undress them." Rejecting any notion that fiction is an act of mimesis of the real world, Coover celebrates the delights of linguistic invention. Many of the stories are rewritings of well-known myths and fairy tales. "I's Marriage," for instance, one of seven of what Coover calls "Exemplary Fictions" in homage to Cervantes, is a retelling of the story of Joseph and Mary. Other stories—most famously, "The Babysitter"—offer a bewildering and ever-changing choice of narrative possibilities.

The Origin of the Brunists established an immediate reputation for Coover as one of America's most original writers. It concerns a cult of the millennium which is cynically promoted by the editor of a small town newspaper for his own complex ends. The Brunists are led by Giovanni Bruno, a miner who, because he alone has been spared in a disastrous explosion that killed 97 workers, believes he is a prophet who can announce the coming end of the world. Although written in a predominantly realist style (though it experiments with a whole smorgasbord of different approaches), the novel foreshadows Coover's preoccupation with fiction at the expense of reality in its ironic and sometimes even parodic treatment of the necessity-yet danger-of myth-making. The novel is satirical at the expense of the cult but reserves its most severe criticism for Justin Miller, the editor of the local newspaper, who manipulates the sect, with tragic consequences. The Origin of the Brunists is a novel crowded with characters, filled with many voices and different texts, from letters to songs to sermons. It is the work of a writer rich in ideas and talent.

The Universal Baseball Association Inc., J. Henry Waugh, Prop. once again shows Coover's interest in fantasy and invention. An accountant, bored and able to relate to few other human beings, Waugh invents his own baseball league and game, played with cards and dice and so comprehensive that it eventually comes to take up his whole life and sense of reality. He is particularly affected by the death of a young pitcher who is having a dream run until fatally struck by a wild pitch. Coover immerses the reader completely in the world of baseball, blurring the divisions between the real and the imaginary, just as they are blurred for Henry, who progressively cuts himself off from the few connections he has, his job and two friends.

The Public Burning is probably Coover's best know and certainly most ambitious novel, though as always it divided the critics. It is a lengthy account of the execution of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg for allegedly selling atomic secrets to Russia but it is far from a conventionally historical narrative. The case becomes the basis for a satirical account of American Cold War paranoia in which Uncle Sam, a fast-talking, double-dealing parody of American ideals, is pitted against the Phantom, the embodiment of the forces of atheistic, Communistic darkness. Coover employs a series of Brechtian devices to distance the reader from the action. The execution is set for the night of the Rosenbergs' fourteenth wedding anniversary and is to be a public celebration in New York's Times Square, the entertainment to be organized by Cecil B. de Mille. Though he satirizes many American public figures, Coover is hardest of all on Richard Nixon, who narrates considerable chunks of the novel. Nixon is portrayed as a sexually repressed, paranoid, ambition-obsessed egomaniac, whose drive for power is the product of his deep sense of inferiority. His narrative swings between self-extenuation and assertiveness, it is filled with contradictions, but topples finally into absurdity, as much of the novel does, when Nixon fantasize about visiting Ethel Rosenberg in jail just before her execution and having her fall in love with him. The novel seems informed by Coover's conviction that art cannot do justice to the absurdities of reality. It is as if he can contain and express his anger only in the form of demented parody, satire, and ridicule.

A Political Fable and Gloomy Gus of the Chicago Bears first appeared in the New American Review but were later published separately. Fable is a satirical account of the political process and especially the presidential election. The political heavies are outmaneuvered by the Cat in the Hat, a strange creature who proceeds to subvert the whole political contest, rendering it absurd by his antics. The story is scathingly contemptuous of the political system, or at least it would be if it were not clear that Coover derives a great deal of fun from its idiotic behavior. "Gloomy Gus" is set in the 1930s, in Chicago; Gus becomes the eleventh fatality in a confrontation between workers and Republic Steel. The political background involves Spain, Guernica, battles between unions and large companies. But is a kind of parody of the American dream: "Winning was everything for him. Or at least scoring." One character says of him, "If he's a bit demented . . . well, he's only a mirror image of the insane nation that created him," and it is clear that Coover agrees. But the book is much more interesting when it is simply being funny than when it is preaching lessons.

In his later work, Coover sticks resolutely to the set of aesthetic beliefs he had announced but the writing becomes less political, less engaged in criticism of American society, even while remaining as self-conscious, and the writing suffers a little as a result. A Night at the Movies; or, You Must Remember This, for instance, is arranged like a film program, with each story being given a subtitle: "Previews of Coming Attractions," "The Weekly Serial," and an intermission. It is simultaneously both a satire of American popular culture, which plays a large role in Coover's consciousness, and an act of homage to it. Pinocchio in Venice is one of Coover's strangest fictions. It opens with a distinguished professor stranded in Venice on a snowy night. He is attempting to complete his final, valedictory work, Mamma, and needs to come to Venice for purposes of research. The title refers to the Walt Disney figure who possessed an exceptionally long nose which in this novel assumes phallic properties. There are, as always, lots of jokes, puns ("the Immaculate Kunt"), aphorisms, and sayings in short, an inventiveness with language that is one of Coover's trademarks.

Briar Rose reads like a fairy story, rather in the manner of Donald Barthelme's Snow White. As in Spanking the Maid, the same story is told over and over again. A knight sets out on an expedition: "He has undertaken this great adventure, not for the supposed reward—what is another lonely bedridden princess?—but in order to provoke a confrontation with the awful powers of enchantment itself." Most of Coover's later fictions are to do with disenchantment, parody, the debunking of myths, especially of American dreams. We are told of the princess that "Her longing for integrity is, in her spellbound innocence, all she knows of rage and lust." She is Briar Rose and she must rest easy: "Your prince will come." But he must press valiantly through the thickening briar hedge. The parodic note is constant: "Her true prince has come at last, just as promised." The constant retellings, as always, indicate the problematic nature of truth—and myth. Even the dragon is bound by convention: "Well, nothing to do but eat the bony little thing, he supposed, compelled less by appetite than by the mythical proprieties." If there is one work which sums up Coover's fictional beliefs and practices it is probably the story "The Babysitter." No single interpretation of reality is possible, fiction is the exploration of a myriad of possibilities, and the author is both lord over and responsible for the construction of the worlds he makes.

-Laurie Clancy

COUPLAND, Douglas

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Baden-Soellingen, Germany, 30 December 1961. Education: Attended Emily Carr College of Art and Design, Vancouver, Canada; completed a two-year course in Japanese business science, Hawaii, 1986. Career: Writer, sculptor, and editor. Host of The Search for Generation X (documentary), PBS, 1991. Lives in Vancouver.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Generation X: Tales for an Accelerated Culture. New York, St. Martin's, 1991.

Shampoo Planet. New York, Pocket Books, 1992. Microserfs. New York, ReganBooks, 1995. Girlfriend in a Coma. New York, ReganBooks, 1998. Miss Wyoming. New York, Pantheon, 1999.

Short Stories

Life after God. New York, Pocket Books, 1994.

Other

Polaroids from the Dead (essays and short fiction). New York, ReganBooks, 1996.

Lara's Book: Lara Croft and the Tomb Raider Phenomenon (with Kip Ward). Rocklin, California, Prima Publishers, 1998.

* * *

Douglas Coupland emerged in the 1990s as a novelist who seemed to capture the voice of a generation—the generation whose members were in their twenties by the last decade of the twentieth century and whose lives were rootless and marginal, caught between a desire to embrace and an urge to escape from the enticements of career success and consumer culture. Coupland's first book, Generation X: Tales for an Accelerated Culture, concerns Andy, Dag, and Claire, who live in Palm Springs, California, on the periphery of an affluent consumer culture, working at what Coupland calls "McJobs"—jobs with low pay, low status, low dignity, and no future. Each of the trio tell stories, some supposedly true, others obviously fictional, which all turn upon insecurity, dissatisfaction, exhaustion, and breakdown—the failure of youth, class, sex, and the future. Coupland wrote Generation X in a lively, up-to-the-minute style, incorporating or coining slang terms which were conveniently defined for the reader—for example, "emotional ketchup burst" means the sudden explosion of pent-up feelings—and the book was printed in bold typography with cartoon-style illustrations, rather like a graphic novel. Generation X immediately established Coupland as a writer to watch, but it was, in itself, an episodic, inconsequential, and possibly ephemeral work.

Coupland's second book, Shampoo Planet, was a more substantial novel. This time the story is told by 20-year-old Canadian Tyler Johnson who has returned to his home in a rundown Canadian town after a trip to Europe. With insight and good humor, the novel explores the complicated relationship between Tyler, whose memories began with Ronald Reagan and a little later encompassed the death of John Lennon, and his divorced ex-hippie mother, a 1960s survivor who was young in the era before the invention of conditioner, when people only used shampoo to wash their hair—shampoo and related hair products are the key symbol of postmodernity in the novel. Tyler's relationship with his girlfriend Anne-Louise is disrupted when a former girlfriend arrives from Paris, and he lights out to Los Angeles before finally returning for a reconciliation. The style of the novel combines much dropping of imaginary brand names with metaphysical reflections, for example on the nature of time. Although more focused than Generation X, Shampoo Planet remains rather ramshackle in its structure, and its postmodern surface does not conceal its conventional themes—the relationships between parents and grown-up children, and the complications of young love.

In 1994 Coupland published a collection of stories, Life After God, in which a variety of first person narrators, drifting around Canadian suburbia or setting out on the great roads of the U.S.A., try to find a purpose in their directionless postmodern lives. Here, Coupland was mining what had become a familiar vein, and critics began to wonder if he had anything new to say. With his third novel, however, he brought off a brilliant stroke by targeting the best-known phenomenon of the 1990s, the giant computer corporation Microsoft, and dissecting its corporate culture with graceful wit. Microserfs is set among the young programmers of the corporation who dwell in an intensely competitive, profit-driven world and have no real private life or profound relationships. Once more the story is told in the first person, this time by 26-year-old Daniel, who is writing a journal late at night, trying to make sense of his existence—increasingly, the protagonists of Coupland's novels become preoccupied with the quest for meaning in their lives. Daniel and a group of other microserfs desert the corporation to form their own software company, Oop!, but run into financial and other difficulties. As in Shampoo Planet, relations between parents and their young adult children are an important theme, and we are reminded that, in the postmodern world, job insecurity applies across the generations; there is an especially poignant portrait of the distress of Daniel's fiftysomething father after he has been sacked by IBM. The novel consists largely of short paragraphs, rather in the manner of e-mail, combined with a range of typographical devices and an occasional excursion into binary code.

Coupland followed up a collection of short fiction and nonfiction pieces, Polaroids from the Dead, with the novel Girlfriend in a Coma. Ostensibly narrated by Jared, a ghost, it employs Coupland's favorite device of focusing on a group of friends, but this time their lives are haunted not so much by the dead Jared as by the inert presence of Karen, who fell into a coma in 1979 after taking Valium and a vodka cocktail at a party, and, though giving birth unconsciously to a baby, remained oblivious to the world for the next 17 years. The novel charts the fortunes of her friends through those years, and we find ourselves, to some extent, in familiar Coupland territory—travel, drink, drugs, money, drifting, disaffection. But the silent, enduring presence of Karen, which we are never allowed to forget, serves as a measure of seriousness by which to evaluate their lives. Then, like Rip Van Winkle, Karen wakes up, and the novel explores her responses to the world of the late 1990s, a world in which, she feels, all conviction seems to have been lost. Girlfriend in a Coma is written in a quieter, more serious style than Coupland's previous work, and has a complex narrative structure that enables him to achieve a deeper perspective on the last decade of the 20th century.

Coupland's latest novel, Miss Wyoming, is a more romantic work, which gives vent to a streak of sentimentality that has underlain his earlier fiction. In Los Angeles, John, a 37-year-old burnt-out star of action movies, meets Susan, an ex-television celebrity, whom he thinks he has seen in a near-death vision while in hospital—though in fact he saw her on a repeat of her TV show. He is promptly entranced with her, but she at once disappears, and he sets off on a quest across America for her with a group of oddball friends. The story skillfully combines the story of John's quest with flashbacks from his and Susan's past lives—both of them have tried to find a new meaning in their existence. It is evident in Miss Wyoming that Coupland's capacity to handle a sophisticated narrative has increased and that he is getting older: more insistently than in his previous work, the novel poses questions of the meaning and purpose of life.

There can be no doubt of Coupland's significant contribution to the fiction of the 1990s, his capacity to catch the tones and attitudes of a disaffected postmodern generation in a degraded consumer culture. But his earlier fiction, though very enjoyable, had evident weaknesses: it was episodic and its characterization was often perfunctory. Girlfriend in a Coma and Miss Wyoming, however, move beyond this to offer a more complex narrative technique, richer characterization, and an exploration of more serious concerns, and it will be interesting to see how far he develops these features of his fiction in the 21st century.

—Nicolas Tredell

COWAN, Peter (Walkinshaw)

Nationality: Australian. Born: Perth, Western Australia, 4 November 1914. Education: The University of Western Australia, Nedlands, B.A. in English 1940, Dip. Ed. 1946. Military Service: Served in the Royal Australian Air Force, 1943–45. Family: Married Edith Howard in 1941; one son. Career: Clerk, farm labourer, and casual worker, 1930–39; teacher, 1941–42; member of the faculty, University of Western Australia, 1946–50; Senior English Master, Scotch College, Swanbourne, Western Australia, 1950–62. Senior Tutor, 1964–79, and since 1979 Honorary Research Fellow in English, University of Western Australia. Awards: Commonwealth Literary Fund fellowship, 1963; Australian Council for the Arts fellowship, 1974, 1980; University of Western Australia fellowship, 1982; Patrick White prize, for literature, 1992. A.M. (Order of Australia), 1983.

Address: Department of English, University of Western Australia, Nedlands, Western Australia 6009, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Summer. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, 1964.

Seed. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, and San Francisco, Tri-Ocean, 1966.

The Color of the Sky. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1986.

The Hills of Apollo Bay. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press. 1989.

The Tenants. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1994.

Short Stories

Drift. Melbourne, Reed and Harris, 1944.

The Unploughed Land. Sydney, Angus and Robertson, 1958.

The Empty Street. Sydney and London, Angus and Robertson, and San Francisco, Tri-Ocean, 1965.

The Tins and Other Stories. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1973.

New Country, with others, edited by Bruce Bennett. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1976.

Mobiles. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1979.

A Window in Mrs. X's Place. Ringwood, Victoria, and New York, Penguin, 1986; London, Penguin, 1987.

Voices. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1988.

Other

A Unique Position: A Biography of Edith Dircksey Cowan 1861–1932. Nedlands, University of Western Australia Press, 1978.

A Colonial Experience: Swan River 1839–1888. Privately printed, 1979.

Maitland Brown: A View of Nineteenth-Century Western Australia. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1988.

Editor, Short Story Landscape: The Modern Short Story. Melbourne, Longman, 1964.

Editor, with Bruce Bennett and John Hay, Spectrum 1–2. Melbourne, Longman, 2 vols., 1970; London, Longman, 2 vols., 1971; Spectrum 3, Melbourne, Longman, 1979.

Editor, Today: Short Stories of Our Time. Melbourne, Longman, 1971.

Editor, A Faithful Picture: The Letters of Eliza and Thomas Brown at York in the Swan River Country 1841–1852. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1977.

Editor, with Bruce Bennett and John Hay, Perspectives One (short stories). Melbourne, Longman Cheshire, 1985.

Editor, Impressions: West Coast Fiction 1829–1988. Fremantle, Western Australia, Fremantle Arts Centre Press, 1989.

*

Critical Studies: "The Short Stories of Peter Cowan," 1960, and "New Tracks to Travel: The Stories of White, Porter and Cowan," 1966, both by John Barnes, in Meanjin (Melbourne); essay by Grahame Johnston in Westerly (Perth), 1967; "Cowan Country" by Margot Luke, in Sandgropers edited by Dorothy Hewett, Nedlands, University of Western Australia Press, 1973; "Behind the Actual" by Bruce Williams, in Westerly (Perth), no. 3, 1973; "Regionalism in Peter Cowan's Short Fiction" by Bruce Bennett, in World Literature Written in English (Guelph, Ontario), 1980; "Practitioner of Silence" by Wendy Jenkins, in Fremantle Arts Review (Fremantle, Western Australia), vol. 1, no. 3, 1986; "Of Books and Covers: Peter Cowan" by Bruce Bennett, in Overland 114 (Melbourne), 1989, and Peter Cowan: New Critical Essays by Susan Miller and edited by Bennett, Nedlands, University of Western Australia with The Centre for Studies in Australian Literature, 1992.

Peter Cowan comments:

Up to the present time writing has been for me as much something I wanted to do to please myself as something aimed solely at publication and any kind of wide audience. Now, I don't think this kind of attitude is any longer possible, and the chances for this kind of fiction have greatly diminished.

My writing may have been concerned as much with place as with people, though I have tried to see people against a landscape, against a physical environment. If isolation is one of the themes that occur frequently, particularly in the short stories, this is perhaps enforced by the Australian landscape itself. I am deeply involved in everything to do with the physical Australia, the land, its shapes and seasons and colors, its trees and flowers, its birds and animals. And its coast and sea.

I have been more interested in the short story than the novel. The technical demands of a short story are high, and seldom met, and through the short story a writer has perhaps a better chance of trapping something of the fragmentary nature of today's living.

I am, however, interested in some present forms of the novel and an attempting to work within these forms. Novel and short story now perhaps seem closer to one another.

* * *

Peter Cowan is a quietly introspective writer, and consequently his intensity of vision and his scrupulous craftsmanship can easily be underrated. He has shown a particular talent for the short story or novella, in which he can focus on a single relationship and explore a single line of feeling. His stories, written in a spare, taut style, have as a recurring theme the relationship of a man and a woman seeking relief from their loneliness in sexual love. Cowan is intent upon an inner reality: his characters are seldom individualized very far; they seem almost anonymous, and the sensuous reality of the external world is only faintly felt. His imagination is compelled by a painful awareness of the feelings of loneliness and alienation that lie beneath the surface of commonplace lives; and in exploring this territory he has become, more than is generally recognized, a significant interpreter of Australian realities.

In Cowan's first collection of stories, Drift, the preoccupations of his mature work are merely sketched in. Uneven in quality and stylistically in debt to Hemingway, the book nevertheless has a coherence and a unity of impression unexpected in the work of a young writer. Cowan has known his subject right from the start. Most of these early stories are set in the poor farming country of southwestern West Australia before World War II, and they centre on the lives of people who are emotionally unfulfilled or unable to express themselves in normal relationships.

Over the next 14 years Cowan wrote little. In his second collection, The Unploughed Land, he reprinted seven of his stories from Drift, along with six new stories, which represent a distinct advance in technique. These new stories include the much-anthologized ''The Redbacked Spiders,'' a powerful story of a boy whose resentment at his brutal father leads to the man's death. The title story is an extended treatment of the pre-war country life about which he writes in his first volume. In its evocation of that life it is one of his finest pieces, and it marks the end of the first phase of his development.

From this point onward Cowan has been more prolific and more varied-though compared with most writers he has a small and narrow output. In his third collection, The Empty Street, there is a noticeable shift in setting. Cowan now writes of people in suburbia, for whom the country is a refuge. The sense of being caught in an irresistible and disastrous historical process is expressed in a story like "The Tractor," which concerns the efforts of a hermit to stop the clearing of the land. Cowan's sympathies are with those who oppose "progress," but he sees their dilemma truly. "The Empty Street," a novella, is an impressive study of an unhappy middle-aged clerk, whose marriage is now a mere shell, and whose children are strangers to him: desperate to escape the pressures of a life that is meaningless to him, he collapses into schizophrenia and turns murderer. Cowan is especially responsive to the theme of the middle-aged, defeated, and desolate in marriage, groping for a way out. The Tins and Other Stories confirms the achievement of the earlier volumes, with stories like "The Rock" and "The Tins," in which Cowan is seen at his characteristic best.

In recent years Cowan has spent a great deal of time researching the history of his family, which has been prominent in the public life of West Australia since colonial times. This turning to the past has the appearance of being a retreat from the present, of which he takes such a bleak view in his fiction. But the collection, Mobiles, and, even more strikingly, The Color of the Sky, show, rather, that the sense of the past has sharpened and enlarged his sense of the present. Four of the seven stories in Mobiles are set in the stony northwest, beyond the limits of settlement or where settlement has failed. In these starkly rendered episodes human beings are no more than transitory figures in an enduring and inhospitable landscape. The longest story in the volume, "The Lake," reworks a favourite theme of 19th-century novelists the "hidden valley" in the heart of the unexplored continent. In what is one of his most satisfying stories, the symbolic possibilities of the landscape—evoked here with more vividness than is usual in his writing—are subtly realized. This story points to a new strength in Cowan's writing which appears in his third and finest novel.

Peter Cowan's first two attempts at novels were not very successful. Summer is a short novel, more like two short stories that have been expanded and linked together. A businessman whose marriage has failed takes a job on the wheat bins, and in this lonely setting forms a relationship with the wife of the nearby storekeeper. The violent resolution is not well managed, and the central character tends to be a mouthpiece for Cowan's reflections on the spoiling of the natural environment. Yet there are some fine sequences establishing the relationship of the two lonely people in a solitary landscape.

In Seed Cowan set out to portray a group of middle-class families living in Perth. An Australian reader feels the force of his thesis about the boredom and frustration of suburban living, but it remains a thesis and seldom quickens into drama. It is a disappointing work, the result of Cowan's trying to write against the grain of his talent. He is not skilled at creating personalities or at suggesting the social facts of life, but in this rather old-fashioned, realistic novel the emphasis falls on just those aspects of his writing where he is weakest.

The Color of the Sky has the formal integrity and the imaginative vigour which the previous novels lacked. The narrator is a familiar enough Cowan creation—a man on his own, trying to make sense of his experience. In a visit to a place dimly remembered from a visit in childhood, the narrator is simultaneously exploring the past and the present, and much of the power of the narrative derives from the reader's realization of patterns only half-traced, elusive parallels, family likenesses, disturbing undercurrents and continuities. Both the past and the present contain events that could be sensationalizeddrug-running, murder, illicit sexual liaisons—but Cowan's novel is a study of the consciousness of a man in search of himself. In the end, the narrator can no more complete the jigsaw puzzle of his family relationships than he can give shape to the incoherence of his own emotional and moral life, with its tangle of loose ends, evasions, and denials. This work is Cowan's most impressive treatment of (in his own words) "the fragmentary nature of today's living."

Cowan's output during the 1990s was slight, consisting primarily of the novel The Tenants.

-John Barnes

COX, William Trevor

See TREVOR, William

COYNE, P.J.

See MASTERS, Hilary

CRACE, Jim

Nationality: British. Born: Brocket Hall, Lemsford, Hertfordshire, 1 March 1946. Education: Enfield Grammar School, Middlesex, 1957–64; Birmingham College of Commerce, 1965–68; University of London (external), B.A. (honours) in English 1968. Family: Married Pamela Ann Turton in 1975; one son and one daughter. Career: Volunteer in educational television, Voluntary Service Overseas, Khartoum, Sudan, 1968–69; freelance journalist and writer, 1972–86; since 1986 full-time novelist. Awards: Arts Council bursary, 1986; West Midlands Arts Literature grant, 1980; David Higham award, 1986; Whitbread award, 1986; Guardian Fiction prize, 1986; Antico Fattore prize (Italy), 1988; International prize for literature, 1989. Address: c/o Viking/Penguin, 27 Wrights Lane, London W8 5TZ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Gift of Stones. London, Secker and Warburg, 1988; New York, Scribner, 1989.

Arcadia. London, Cape, and New York, Atheneum, 1992.

Signals of Distress. London, Viking, 1994; New York, Farrar Straus, 1995.

The Slow Digestions of the Night (novella). London, Penguin, 1995. Quarantine. New York, Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1997. Being Dead. New York, Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2000.

Short Stories

Continent. London, Heinemann, 1986; New York, Harper, 1987.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Refugees," in Socialist Challenge, December 1977.
- "Annie, California Plates" and "Helter Skelter, Hang Sorrow, Care'll Kill a Cat," in Introduction 6: Stories by New Writers. London, Faber, 1977.
- "Seven Ages," in Quarto, 1980.

Plays

Radio Plays: The Bird Has Flown, 1977; A Coat of Many Colours, 1979.

*

Critical Studies: Jim Crace by Judy Cooke, London, Book Trust and the British Council, 1992.

Jim Crace comments:

I count myself to be a traditional, old-fangled novelist rather than a conventional writer or a new-fangled modernist. I am more interested in the fate of communities than the catharsis of individuals. I owe more to the oral traditions of storytelling (rhythmic prose, moral satire, naked invention) than to the idiomatic, ironic, realist social comedies which typify post-war British fiction. My books are not an exploration of self. They are not autobiographically based. I do not write from experience. I focus on subjects-usually political or sociological, usually concerning the conflict between the old and new ways of humankind-which interest me, which seem worthy of exploration but of which I have no personal expertise. (I am surprised but not saddened to note that my novels are less progressive and more pessimistic than I am myself.) I shroud the offputting solemnity of my themes in metaphorical narratives which tease and subvert and flirt with the reader and which regard lies to be more eloquent than facts. Thus far, my novels seem to reach-and-preach the same conclusion: that everything new worth having, in both the private and public universes, is paid for by the loss of something old worth keeping. Those who do not like my novels consider them to be overwrought, passionless, schematic, and unEnglish.

. . . .

The fiction of Jim Crace is an alchemical alloy of meticulous rationality wedded to a broadly inventive imagination and written in a seemingly arch style that belies its suppleness and tensile strength. While critics have noted his fondness for blank-verse iambic rhythms highlighted with occasional alliterative trills and rhetorical flourishes, this stylized writing has been used by Crace to construct narratives set in such exotic and varied places as the dawn of the Bronze Age, the deserts outside biblical Jerusalem, nineteenth-century rural England, and a present-day metropolis. But such scope should not imply that Crace writes panoramic epic. Instead, Crace portrays characters who are anything but heroic in the Homeric sense, their very ordinariness precisely rendered with a focused attention on the minutiae of lives lived within their specific—and ever-changing—historical contexts. And Crace can easily shift gears from ornate to ordinary, often within the space of a few syllables, at one moment relating the rhetorical musings of an elderly magnate, then seamlessly morphing into a prosaic account of the old man's indigestion.

His first book, Continent, betrays the strong influence of Borges and other Latin-American fabulists. Considered by many to be a novel only in name, this narrative is a collection of interrelated stories set on a mythical continent where the main occupations are, according to the book's epigraph, "trade and superstition." Far from being fanciful, however, these tales have the quality of parable, being both overtly fantastical as well as topically relevant to life on the real continents of our world. In the chapter entitled "Sins and Virtues," an old calligrapher must stoop to an ingenious but ironic solution to meeting government demands for his suddenly lucrative artwork. In "Electricity," the fate of a giant ceiling fan becomes emblematic of the promises and pitfalls of technological progress, and in "Cross-Country," a visiting teacher from Canada, an aficionado of the alien sport of jogging, engages in a kind of tortoise-versus-hare footrace against a local horseman. For all its fabricated flora and fauna, the continent of Continent is a recognizable place where the tragicomedy of life is brought into sharp relief against a vivid backdrop. This book made a literary star of Crace, winning him three of Great Britain's most prestigious literary awards: the Whitbread prize, the Guardian Fiction prize, and the David Higham award.

His second novel, The Gift of Stones, is an evocative depiction of life at the moment in human prehistory when bronze supplanted stone. It is also a meditation on the art and purposes of storytelling in the life of a community, albeit a doomed one. In a village of stoneworkers, a maimed boy becomes the tribe's entertainer, wandering away from the village during the day only to return and relate, with embellishment, his travels to his fellows as a way of earning his keep. When the village's fortunes fade with the sudden appearance of traders in bronze, the storyteller, as the tribe's most imaginative member, becomes a guide to the outside world as remnants of the tribe begin to wander in search of a new home. Tellingly, Crace leaves open the question of whether the storyteller's guidance proves fruitful or not.

In Arcadia, Crace's third novel, he creates a contemporary fable of a self-made man that begins, "No wonder Victor never fell in love." Now eighty, Victor, a produce magnate, decides to erase his dark and lowly past by erecting a huge, glass-enclosed mall over the open-air market where he spent his destitute childhood. But his aspiration is opposed by Rook, his former majordomo, and their conflict is further complicated by their involvement with Anna, Victor's assistant and Rook's mistress. But Arcadia is more than this triangle of competing motives; it's a meditation on life in and of cities, a novelistic aria on the theme of the city as an organism that thrives with the help of—and often in spite of—the efforts of its denizens, no matter their place in the socioeconomic strata. As befits a book about constructions, Arcadia is Crace's most overtly structured novel, and critics have praised this structure for its artfulness while berating it for creating a kind of clinical distance from his characters, blocking the reader from achieving any real sympathy.

Signals of Distress, Crace's fourth novel, has an even more specific historical setting: Wherry town, on the coast of England, during one week in November of 1836. An American sailing bark runs aground, stranding its Yankee crew, its cargo of cattle, and an African slave while the ship undergoes repairs. The townspeople, down-to-earthers who are mainly kelpers and fishermen, warily take in the sailors just as a priggishly moralistic abolitionist named Aymer Smith arrives to announce news of economic disaster for the Wherry. Like all of Crace's fiction, Signals of Distress is concerned with the clash of differing cultures in a time of historical upheaval, and this novel treats the ensuing conflicts with as much comedy as pathos. The slave escapes and becomes a local legend; Smith competes against a minister for the hand of a local girl only to lose his virginity unceremoniously to another woman; a local landmark is destroyed; and the sailing bark is repaired. The week passes, but nothing in Wherry—or the world—will ever be the same. Like Arcadia, Signals of Distress was both praised and condemned for Crace's contrivances of structure and theme at the expense of fully realized characterizations, a criticism Crace himself has repeatedly dismissed.

Quarantine is Crace's fifth and most provocative novel, being a reimagining of Christ's forty-day fast in the desert. However, Crace makes Christ a minor but pivotal character in the story of a group of pilgrims who have gone to the desert to seek spiritual renewal. Indeed, Crace's Christ is little more than a willfully deluded runaway who mistakes the proddings of his fellow fasters for the temptations of Satan. Beginning with the purely scientific premise that no mortal could survive forty days without food or water, Quarantine maintains a scrupulously realistic air that colors any mysticism with the patina of fever or madness. Jesus' prayers seem more like epileptic fits than communications with a Creator. But Quarantine is not just a literary debunking of the New Testament. Although Crace is a publicly avowed atheist who has admitted that the inspiration for this novel was in fact just such a debunking, the novel manages to rise above the level of anti-religious polemic by making its characters and setting come truly alive in ways his previous novels, at least according to reviewers, did not. Each of Christ's fellow pilgrims is a vivid character, from the beleaguered-yet-unflagging Miri to the proudbut-desperate Marta. Musa, the novel's true central character, is a deliberately coarse creation who nevertheless is the only one sensitive enough to realize that there is more to Christ and his story than the fate of a starving teenager who sees visions. In the end, Musa, though he is devious and even criminal, is the only one in the group to see a supposedly resurrected Christ following the pilgrims to Jerusalem after their fast, thence to start a movement that will sweep the globe. That Musa is able to envision the coming religion only in terms of its profit potential only deepens the questions raised by this book. Quarantine won Crace a second Whitbread prize, and it was a finalist for the Booker prize as well.

Throughout his first five novels, Crace again and again focuses his narratives on people living on the cusp of great historical change, be it the coming of electricity or Christianity. But setting his characters at such chronological crossroads allows Crace the freedom to sensationally dramatize the essential fact that life itself is flux, whether or not such flux is measurable along the timelines in history books. With his next novel, however, Crace eschewed such historically dramatic scene-setting; instead, he focused on the most dramatic change that any life can make.

Being Dead, Crace's sixth novel, is what one critic calls "a secular meditation on death" that, in vividly portraying the process of death in minute detail while recalling the lives previously lived by the corpses whose decay forms the structural spine of the novel, is also Crace at his most convincing. The book begins with the murder of a middle-aged couple en flagrante delicto. From there, the narrative diverges into two major tributaries. The first concerns what happens to the corpses as they decay; the second concerns the life of the couple as it led up to death. By tracing these forking paths of story, Crace has fashioned a novel that unflinchingly fixes the human place in the physical universe while affirming—however briefly—the single human trait able to jump the chasm between life and death: love. Such a structure again raises criticisms of Crace's tendency to over-design his novels, but such a structure is perfectly suited to this one. Joseph and Celice, the married-then-murdered couple, are unlikable as characters, but their deaths and subsequent lives, when subjected to Crace's close study, render them automatically sympathetic in ways that enlarge the reader's capacities for compassion rather than merely affirming the reader's preconceptions. Life is made precious by mortality, while love is even more so.

—J. J. Wylie

CREWS, Harry (Eugene)

Nationality: American. Born: Alma, Georgia, 6 June 1935. Education: The University of Florida, Gainesville, B.A. 1960, M.S.Ed. 1962. Military Service: Served in the United States Marine Corps, 1953–56: Sergeant. Family: Married Sally Ellis in 1960 (divorced); two sons. Career: English teacher, Broward Junior College, Fort Lauderdale, Florida, 1962–68. Associate professor, 1968–74, and since 1974 professor of English, University of Florida. Awards: Bread Loaf Writers Conference Atherton fellowship, 1968; American Academy award, 1972; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1974. Address: Department of English, University of Florida, Gainesville, Florida 32601, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Gospel Singer. New York, Morrow, 1968.

Naked in Garden Hills. New York, Morrow, 1969.

This Thing Don't Lead to Heaven. New York, Morrow, 1970.

Karate Is a Thing of the Spirit. New York, Morrow, 1971; London, Secker and Warburg, 1972.

Car. New York, Morrow, 1972; London, Secker and Warburg, 1973.
The Hawk Is Dying. New York, Knopf, 1973; London, Secker and Warburg, 1974.

The Gypsy's Curse. New York, Knopf, 1974; London, Secker and Warburg, 1975.

A Feast of Snakes. New York, Atheneum, 1976; London, Secker and Warburg, 1977.

All We Need of Hell. New York, Harper, 1987.

The Knockout Artist. New York, Harper, 1988.

Body. New York, Poseidon Press, 1990.

Scar Lover. New York, Poseidon Press, 1992.

The Mulching of America. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1995.

Celebration. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1998.

Short Stories

The Enthusiast. Winston-Salem, North Carolina, Palaemon Press, 1981.

Two. Northridge, Lord John Press, 1984.

Uncollected Short Stories

"The Player Piano," in Florida Quarterly (Gainesville), Fall 1967.

"The Unattached Smile," in Craft and Vision, edited by Andrew Lytle. New York, Delacorte Press, 1971.

"A Long Wail," in Necessary Fictions, edited by Stanley W. Lindberg and Stephen Corey. Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1986.

Play

Blood Issue (produced Louisville, Kentucky, 1989).

Other

A Childhood: The Biography of a Place (on Bacon County, Georgia). New York, Harper, 1978; London, Secker and Warburg, 1979. Blood and Grits. New York, Harper, 1979.

Florida Frenzy. Gainesville, University Presses of Florida, 1982.Classic Crews (non-fiction pieces and previously published novels).New York, Poseidon Press, 1993; London, Gorse, 1994.

*

Critical Studies: A Grit's Triumph: Essays on the Works of Harry Crews edited by David K. Jeffrey, Port Washington, New York, Associated Faculty Press, 1983; Getting Naked with Harry Crews: Interviews, edited by Erik Bledsoe. Gainesville, University Press of Florida, 1999.

* * *

Harry Crews's novels establish him as the most astringent observer of contemporary good-old-boy culture, the grass roots of the South. An outrageous satirist of U.S. lies in general, Crews pits the empty materialism of our mainstream society against deep-South grotesques and misfits with results at once comic and horrific.

Beginning with The Gospel Singer, which probes the psychology of show-biz fundamentalism, Crews has inverted a gallery of social, sexual, and spiritual outcasts who seek salvation in a civilization that offers them only things. The theme is expanded in Naked in Garden Hills. Fat Man, the 600-pound protagonist, lives in an abandoned phosphorous mine, where the earth has been eaten away, and he tries to eat the world itself. This is echoed in Car, in which Herman Mack vows to eat an entire 1971 Ford Maverick. A refugee from a junkyard, Mack revenges himself on the world by trying to consume it and defecate it. This Thing Don't Lead to Heaven caricatures the old-folks industry, in which people are the used-up detritus of our society. In this novel, Jefferson Davis Munroe, a midget who works for a "graveyard chain," competes with Axel's Senior Club for the bodies (if not the souls) of the dying.

In Karate Is a Thing of Spirit, Crews deals with the fads and obsessions of contemporary trendy culture. John Kaimon, its central character, wears a tee-shirt stenciled with William Faulkner's face and tries to find himself through a karate group. The story develops our sick fascination with sex and violence and the fear of love and belief that Crews sees as being the focus of our lives. The Hawk Is Dying portrays a more positive, even heroic, obsession, George Gattling's desire to "man" (train) a hawk in the prescribed medieval ritual. His attempt to fuse his soul with the raptor's is another way out of the stylized hell of a technologically focused world. George's need for belief is satisfied by the vitality of the hawk, its innate freedom and dignity.

The Gypsy's Curse returns to the world of physical violence and action with Marvin Molar, born with stunted legs, who walks on his hands and develops his upper body through exercise. In his upsidedown world, he becomes sexually obsessed with Hester, a normal woman. The connection between possessiveness, "normality," sexuality, and strength is a basic Crews theme. It appears also in the savage burlesque of A Feast of Snakes, in which high school football, batontwirling, weight-lifting, moonshine selling and rattlesnake hunting are intermixed as American rituals. The story ends, like The Gospel Singer, in an explosion of mortal violence, as Joe Lon Mackey, exstate-champ quarterback, loses his slender grip on his own life.

All We Need of Hell is a gentler satire examining the folkways of modern marriage. It is a lighter "screwball comedy" of marriage and divorce. The Knockout Artist and Body re-imagine the body-soul dichotomy that haunts Crews. The Knockout Artist centers on Eugene Talmadge Biggs, a failed glass-jaw boxer whose "occupation" is to fight himself in the ring and ultimately knock himself out. This caricatures phony "sports" like professional wrestling and boxing and defines guilt and masochism as motive forces in our culture. Body lampoons the already surreal world of bodybuilding and physical-culture narcissism. In the novel, Russell "Muscle" Morgan tries to re-live and better his bodybuilding success by transforming "white trash" Dorothy Turnipseed into hardbody and Ms. Cosmos-phenom "Shereel Dupont."

Crews's most recent work explores the effects of love and human kindness upon his typically afflicted characters. In Scar Lover, accident-survivor Pete Butcher is pulled from a life of mourning and solitude by cancer-stricken Sarah Leemer, who helps him locate moments of solace in an otherwise sad world. In The Mulching of America, company-man Hickurn Looney, who initially peddles "cureall" soaps to the elderly and ill, re-discovers human honor (though not exactly happiness) through his relationship with a prostitute. Celebration, set in a retirement community, pits the deformed Stump, a man with one hand who owns the community, against a vivacious, youthful woman named Too Much; Stump callously rejects the individuality of his elderly (and dying) patrons while Too Much tries to revitalize them by providing meaning and joy in their waning years.

Crews's satire is directed toward the triviality and rootlessness of our culture, its lack of belief. His characters search frantically for salvation through money, sex, social status, physical strength, mystical rites—through sheer acquisitiveness. Crews shows how these are false paths, failures. John Kaimon, in Karate Is a Thing of Spirit thinks,

... he also knew he did not believe. The breath of little children would leave his flesh only flesh. Belief could see through glass eyes, could turn flesh to stone or stone to flesh. But not for him. He could walk through the world naked. He would bruise and bleed. He saw it clearly.

Crews sees clearly, through his scathing satire, that the absence of faith leads to violence, madness, death. His creatures search through a world of junkyards and abandoned mines and prisons for their authenticity through belief, and our world fails and maims them in savage ways. Human kindness, love, provides some relief, but in Crews's fiction, such relief is contextualized within suffering.

-William J. Schafer, updated by Ryan Lankford

CRICHTON, (John) Michael

Pseudonyms: John Lange; Jeffery Hudson; Michael Douglas. Nationality: American. Born: 23 October 1942. Education: Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, A.B.(summa cum laude) 1964 (Phi Beta Kappa): Harvard Medical School, M.D. 1969: Salk Institute, La Jolla, California (postdoctoral fellow), 1969-70. Family: Married 1) Joan Radam in 1965 (divorced 1971); 2) Kathleen St. Johns in 1978 (divorced 1980); 3) Suzanne Childs (divorced); 4) Anne-Marie Martin in 1987, one daughter. Career: Visiting writer, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, 1988. Awards: Mystery Writers of America Edgar Allan Poe award, 1968, for A Case of Need, and 1980, for The Great Train Robbery; Association of American Medical Writers award, 1970, for Five Patients: The Hospital Explained; George Foster Peabody Award, for ER, 1995; Emmy Award, best dramatic series, for ER, 1996; Life Career Award, Academy of Science Fiction, Fantasy, and Horror Films, 1998. Agent: International Creative Management, 40 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10019, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Case of Need (as Jeffery Hudson). Cleveland, World, and London, Heinemann, 1968.

The Andromeda Strain. New York, Knopf, and London, Cape, 1969.Dealing; or, the Berkeley-to-Boston Forty-Brick Lost-Bag Blues (as Michael Douglas), with Douglas Crichton. New York, Knopf, 1971

The Terminal Man. New York, Knopf, and London, Cape, 1972. Westworld. New York, Bantam, 1974.

The Great Train Robbery. New York, Knopf, and London, Cape, 1975.

Eaters of the Dead: The Manuscript of Ibn Fadlan, Relating His Experiences with the Northmen in A.D. 922. New York, Knopf, and London, Cape, 1976.

Congo. New York, Knopf, 1980; London, Allen Lane, 1981. Sphere. New York, Knopf, and London, Macmillan, 1987. Jurassic Park. New York, Knopf, 1990; London, Century, 1991. Rising Sun. New York, Knopf, and London, Century, 1992. Disclosure. New York, Knopf, 1994. The Lost World: A Novel. New York, Knopf, 1995. Airframe. New York, Knopf, 1996. Timeline. New York, Knopf, 1999.

Novels as John Lange

Odds On. New York, New American Library, 1966.

Scratch One. New York, New American Library, 1967.

Easy Go. New York, New American Library, 1968; London, Sphere, 1972; as The Last Tomb (as Michael Crichton), New York, Bantam, 1974.

The Venom Business. Cleveland, World, 1969.

Zero Cool. New York, New American Library, 1969; London, Sphere, 1972.

Drug of Choice. New York, New American Library, 1970; as Overkill, New York, Centesis, 1970.

Grave Descend. New York, New American Library, 1970. Binary. New York, Knopf, and London, Heinemann, 1972.

Plays

Screenplays: Westworld, 1973; Coma, 1977; The Great Train Robbery, 1978; Looker, 1981; Runaway, 1984; Jurassic Park, with John Koepp, 1993; Rising Sun, with Philip Kaufman and Michael Backes, 1993; Twister, with Anne-Marie Martin, 1996

Other

Five Patients: The Hospital Explained. New York, Knopf, 1970; London, Cape, 1971.

Jasper Johns. New York, Abrams, and London, Thames and Hudson, 1977.

Electronic Life: How to Think about Computers. New York, Knopf, and London, Heinemann, 1983.

Travels. New York, Knopf, and London, Macmillan, 1988.

Twister: The Original Screenplay. New York, Ballantine Books, 1996.

*

Film Adaptations: The Andromeda Strain, 1971; The Carey Treatment, 1973, from the work A Case of Need; Westworld, 1973; The Terminal Man, 1974; The Great Train Robbery, 1978; Jurassic Park, 1993; Rising Sun, 1993; Disclosure, 1994; Congo, 1995; The Lost World, 1997; Sphere, 1998; The 13th Warrior, from the work Eaters of the Dead, 1999; Jurassic Park 3, from the works Jurassic Park and The Lost World.

Critical Studies: Michael Crichton: A Critical Companion by Elizabeth A. Trembley. Westport, Connectitcut: Greenwood Press, 1996.

Theatrical Activities: Director: Films—Westworld, 1973; Coma, 1978; The Great Train Robbery, 1978; Looker, 1981; Runaway, 1984. Television—Pursuit, 1972; ER (executive producer), 1994.

* * *

Michael Crichton has an unerring instinct for the hot topic of the moment. His best-selling novels—most of them subsequently transformed into hit movies—tend to deal with the cutting edge of modern technology, the latest discoveries, the most exciting and terrifying innovations. Yet at their heart lies a far older theme evoked so memorably by Robert Louis Stevenson in his Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde: the idea of the scientific discovery intended for the benefit of mankind that suddenly runs out of control to become a lethal threat. Whether the mutant plague virus of The Andromeda Strain, the homicidal android gunfighter of Westworld, or the dinosaurs recreated from prehistoric DNA who break out of Jurassic Park to spread death and devastation, all are testimony to the human pride that goes before a fall, the fumbling fingers that have released the imp from the bottle. This theme is at the core of his early works of the 1970s, a decade where disaster novels—and films—were the fashion. It's a point made to score more heavily by Crichton's skill in placing the latest technology within uneasy reach of mankind's basic instincts and the darker secrets of the mind. The pleasure electrodes of The Terminal Man, implanted in the brain of a potentially violent patient in order to render him manageable, end by driving him to greater violence as he becomes addicted to pleasurable sensations he can obtain only by assault and murder.

In The Terminal Man as elsewhere in his fiction, Crichton reminds us of the fragility of civilizing influences, our nobler impulses forever under threat from the atavistic animal brain beneath. "That cortex, which could feel love, and worry about ethical conduct, and write poetry, had to make an uneasy peace with the crocodile brain at its core. Sometimes, as in the case of Benson, the peace broke down, and the crocodile brain took over intermittently." The hightech security of the dinosaur wonderland in Jurassic Park is undone by old-fashioned human greed and an electric storm that between them let the dinosaurs loose on an unprepared bunch of humans. In Congo, the state-of-the art computers used by the scientists of ERTS to pinpoint the lost African city with its rare industrial diamonds are thwarted by a group of hybrid killer apes trained centuries ago by long-dead "primitive" masters. Again and again technology breaks down or finds itself helpless in the face of man's worst instincts, or the world's wild places.

One factor often overlooked in Crichton's career is his erudition. His background reading takes in a mass of scientific literature and business reports and extends to Norse legends and Arab traveler's tales. Most of his novels contain substantial end-bibliographies and a text peppered with footnotes and references to the relevant scientific report, e.g. animal training and behavior in Congo and "mind control" in The Terminal Man. The latter novel also contains diagrams of brain sections and what appear to be Xeroxed police reports. This formidable amount of confirmatory material adds weight to whatever imaginative leap is being made by the writer, whether killer apes or recreated dinosaurs on the rampage. The extent of Crichton's reading is shown in what might be regarded as his two "historical" novels, The Great Train Robbery and Eaters of the Dead (later revamped as The Thirteenth Warrior). These have fairly un-Crichtonlike themes in that neither deals with a current topic, but both reveal their author's impressive knowledge of his subject. In The Great Train Robbery Crichton displays a remarkably thorough awareness of Victorian England and its criminal underworld, commenting with apparent objectivity on the ruthless behavior of the robbers and their eventual escape from justice with a fortune in gold. This dispassionate narrative overview is found in his other novels, where his characters suffer or prosper in a life-like random fashion, rather than in accordance with their previous actions. Eaters of the Dead/The Thirteenth Warrior is presented in the form of a genuine travel narrative recounted in the first person by real-life Arab emissary Ibn Fadlan. Using an understated style and the familiar corroborative footnotes, Crichton manages to work in his own version of the Beowulf legend and to suggest that some of the monsters the hero encountered may have been examples of Neanderthal Man.

Significant also is Crichton's mastery of technical jargon, which is heavily used both in dialogue and narrative. Evident in his earliest work, if anything this has increased to the extent that the reader may well feel he or she is being beaten over the head with techno-speak. The computerized location-finders of Congo, the minutiae of CD-Rom production in Disclosure, and the jargon of aircraft manufacture in Airframe are three examples of many. Sometimes Crichton goes too far in this direction—parts of The Great Train Robbery are virtually unintelligible through over-use of criminal slang—but while often baffling to the untrained reader there is no doubt that, like the constant footnotes, the jargon adds to verisimilitude. The author has a sure grasp of his subject, and narrative and speech have a convincing sound.

Recent Crichton novels have tended to forsake the wilder undiscovered regions of the world to bring the action closer to home. Granted in The Lost World the author returns to the island jungle of Jurassic Park to find more dinosaurs lurking in the foliage (this time infected by a B.S.E.-type disease from their sheep-offal feed) in a successful sequel to the original blockbuster, but more often the "jungle" is found in the workplace, the boardroom, or the factory floor. In Rising Sun competition over modern technology between Japanese and American corporations runs to outright murder, confirming the Oriental claim that "business is war." Elsewhere the action stops short of killing, concerning itself with the threat of job loss or the stigma of business failure. The ruthless, predatory female executive who threatens to destroy Tom Sanders with a phoney sexual harassment claim in Disclosure (power, Crichton is careful to point out, is neither male nor female) may be seen as a modern variant on the flesh-eating velociraptors of Jurassic Park. The author avoids any obvious "male-female" confrontation by balancing the scary Meredith with defense lawyer Louise Hernandez and other sympathetic female characters. In Airframe, where a plane-making firm is wrongly accused of bad design following an in-flight "incident," he has a female lead in executive Casey Singleton. Writing credible dialogue and constructing realistic backgrounds to his action, Crichton casts interesting light on the various shenanigans made use of by business organizations and the mass media to twist the facts to their own advantage. Reading his novels for this aspect alone can be a most informative experience! Accused of sexism by some readers of Disclosure, and (perhaps more justly) of chauvinism in Rising Sun, Crichton has also been criticized for writing books that are like embryo movie scripts, with a future film in mind. Given that Crichton is himself a film director and the creator of the successful TV series ER, he could scarcely be blamed if this was the case. In fact, there has been no obvious change in his style since the early 1970s, before his works made it to the screen. Brilliant descriptions and profound character studies are not his territory; Crichton doesn't need them. Rather, he writes to his strengths, hooking the reader immediately and carrying him or her along, pacing the action with great skill and constantly building tension to delay resolution to the last few pages. None too sure what's about to happen next and anxious to find out, the reader keeps turning those pages. The fact that his works translate so well to the cinema screen merely serves as a further tribute to the power of the novels and the ability of the man who has written them.

—Geoff Sadler

CUNNINGHAM, E.V.

See FAST, Howard (Melvin)

CUNNINGHAM, Michael

Nationality: American. Born: Ohio, 1952. Education: Attended Stanford University; University of Iowa, M.F.A. Career: Worked for Carnegie Corp., New York, beginning in 1986. Awards: Pulitzer prize, 1999.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Golden States. New York, Crown, 1984.

A Home at the End of the World. New York, Farrar Straus, and Giroux, 1990.

Flesh and Blood. New York, Farrar Straus, and Giroux, 1995. The Hours. New York, Farrar Straus, and Giroux, 1998.

* * *

Recent critical praise for Michael Cunningham's novel The Hours, including the Pulitzer Prize in 1999, came as no surprise to those who followed his progression since the publication of A Home at the End of the World in 1990. The Hours addresses themes that have long been preoccupations of the author's: adopted social roles that end up owning us; the common desire to flee from our lives; the solution to that desire provided by suicide, but also by creativity; and the strained role of family in the late twentieth century. In addition, these universal issues are often explored within the further complicating frame of homosexuality. The manner in which Cunningham subtly inserts the many references to homosexuality has an effortless, natural quality. As some critics have noted, Cunningham's treatment of gay themes could only be a recent literary manifestation. This is no longer the "fearful closet" novel of the 1960s nor the "defiant ghetto" writing of the 1970s, rather it is fiction that treats homosexuality (and the looming shadow of AIDS) as just one subject among many.

Most of Cunningham's characters have a nagging suspicion that they are not living the lives they should be, that they are engaged in acts of "impersonation" that belittle their true selfhood. Despite depicting the occasional escape from role constraints, Cunningham's vision remains bleak with only flashes of hope shining through, often at the very conclusion of his texts. His novels focus on the shadow that falls between what is and what might have been, and the result is at best wistful and, at worst, despairing.

Told in four different voices, A Home at the End of the World presents the story of Jonathan and Bobby, boyhood friends in Cleveland during the 1970s. Each boy seeks to escape familial demands: Jonathan, his needy mother, Alice; Bobby the tragedy that slowly engulfs his family after the accidental death of his beloved older brother. Jonathan and Bobby's relationship becomes sexual, but, unlike openly homosexual Jonathan, Bobby's sexual identity remains ambiguous—the sex he has with both Jonathan and, later with Jonathan's roommate Clare, lacks any real desire on his part for either of them (''I'd had orgasms that passed through me like the spirits of people more devoted to the body than I was'').

The other voices in the novel belong to Alice, Jonathan's mother, and Clare, with whom he plans to have a child and begin a "new" family of his own. It is, in fact, Bobby, whom Clare ultimately chooses to conceive with. The three of them then attempt to live their version of utopia in a house in Woodstock, with both men playing father to the child. But this New Family splits at the seams, and Clare leaves with her child to begin her life anew. Jonathan and Bobby stay on to care for an old lover of Jonathan's who is dying of an unnamed virus and the novel ends in a mock baptism, as the three men stand in an icy pond in April. The new beginning implied leaves the reader with an unmistakable chill.

Actually creating a home at the end of the world may require that old models of family be trashed rather than revamped. After all, it is only when he finds himself with his ambivalent lover, Bobby, and his dying friend, Erich, that Jonathan finds some sort of epiphany: "I was merely present, perhaps for the first time in my adult life. The moment was unextraordinary. But I had the moment, I had it completely. It inhabited me. I realized that if I died soon I would have known this, a connection with my life, its errors and cockeyed successes." Cunningham seems to be saying that life's imperfections, the mistakes, are the thing. Accepting them with integrity makes for happiness rather than engaging in a hapless quest to efface them.

Cunningham's next novel, Flesh and Blood, belongs to the family epic tradition, spanning a century in the lives of the Stassos family (beginning in 1935 and ending with a prophetic and imaginary chapter that takes place in 2035). The novel focuses on Greek-born Constantine, his wife, Mary, and their three children, Billy, Susan, and Zoe. But it is drag queen Cassandra who provides the psychic center of the novel. As best friend to Zoe, surrogate mother to Jamal, Zoe's son, and eventually confidante to Mary, Cassandra acts as the mouthpiece for Cunningham's particular blend of optimism and pessimism. Having tested HIV-positive, Cassandra still manages to dish out words of wisdom and find the true balance between the various absolutist philosophies presented in the novel.

Cunningham manages to involve us in the lives of his particular characters, despite the secondary emphasis on plotline. The novel once again reveals the author's predominant concerns. Family is not something to seek solace and security from, but rather to flee. The characters resort to aberrant behavior as a means of expression (physical abuse, kleptomania, promiscuity, adultery, substance abuse). In fact, deviancy is so commonplace in the novel that one begins to wonder whether Cunningham wishes us to reconsider our standards for determining what is indeed normal.

The various characters adopt roles that thwart any possibility of self-actualization: Susan's brush with incest propels her into an early marriage with her first boyfriend to play the devoted wife; Billy, a homosexual, reacts angrily to his father's physical abuse and becomes a fifth grade teacher instead of an architect, primarily to spite his father; Zoe rejects a well-defined role, but her aimlessness turns tragic as she contracts AIDS. They are all in some state of anguish. They watch their lives pass them by; it is not that their lives are unexam-ined, it is simply that they feel powerless to change them. Neither parenthood, nor homosexuality, nor an alternative lifestyle, are sufficient to ground their identities. The characters remain plagued by uncertainty, constantly wondering at the lives they might have lived. As one notes, "We are adaptable creatures. It's the source of our earthly comfort and, I suppose, of our silent rage." This is an idea that Cunningham raises once more in his most balanced and accomplished work, The Hours.

Using Virginia Woolf's modernist techniques and Mrs. Dalloway as a springboard, The Hours consists of three concurrent narratives taking place at different times. The central narrative concerns Clarissa Vaughan, a present day book editor living in Greenwich Village, who is planning a party for her friend and former lover, Richard, a gay poet dying of AIDS. The second narrative tells a day in the life of Laura Brown, a housewife living in the suburbs of Los Angeles in 1949. To escape the monotony of her existence, she has given herself the task of reading all of Woolf's novels in order and has reached, of course, Mrs. Dalloway. The third narrative concerns Woolf herself as she sets out, in 1923, to write the novel that is the inspiration for Cunningham's text.

Cunningham subtly weaves a confluence of parallels to link the tales of these three women and revisit familiar themes: the notion of flight, restrictive roles, suicide as a means of escape, creativity as a means of momentarily eluding the grasp of that "old devil" that plagues us all (Woolf writing her novel, Laura making a cake, Clarissa hosting the party). Opening as the novel does with an evocative retelling of Woolf's suicide, the book is tinged with a longing for death. Death offers the ultimate escape, one that Woolf ponders for her protagonist, one that Laura Brown considers and attempts, and one that Richard actually accomplishes. Throughout Cunningham's oeuvre various characters become aware of the thin line that separates life from death, and that crossing that line is not the daunting experience they had always imagined it would be. Laura Brown sees that it would be, in fact, quite easy to end her own life; that the release suicide offers might compensate for whatever pain might be endured ("Think how wonderful it might be to no longer matter. Think how wonderful it might be to no longer worry, or struggle, or fail").

Suicide is treated as a temptation—the ultimate expression of free will, proof that we are not trapped in our lives. This realization is both liberating and frightening for Cunningham's characters. As pawns of something they have set in motion (frequently without any thought or conscious decision), this realization offers a sense of relief that helps some live and some die. Cunningham's fiction explores the gaps between our (creative) expectations and the reality of our lives. The creative endeavors of the characters in The Hours are representative of the plights of the majority of the men and women who people his books—individuals who have difficulty living in that space between perceptions of utter perfection and dismal failure.

-Tim Gauthier

D

DABYDEEN, David

Nationality: Guyanian and British (immigrated to Britain, 1969). Born: Berbice, Guyana, 9 December 1956. Education: Cambridge University, 1974–78, B.A. (honours) in English 1978; London University, Ph.D. 1982. Career: Director, Centre for Caribbean Studies, University of Warwick. Awards: Cambridge University Quiller-Couch prize, 1978; Commonwealth Poetry prize, 1984; Guyana Literature prize, 1991. Agent: Curtis Brown, Ltd., Haymarket House, 28–29 Haymarket, London S.W.1 England. Address: c/o Centre for Caribbean Studies, University of Warwick, Coventry, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Intended. London, Secker and Warburg, 1991. Disappearance. London, Secker and Warburg, 1993. The Counting House. London, J. Cape, 1996. A Harlot's Progress. London, Cape, 1999.

Poetry

Slave Song. London, Dangaroo Press, 1984. Coolie Odyssey. London, Hansib, 1988. Turner. London, Cape, 1994.

Other

Hogarth, Walpole and Commercial Britain. London, Hansib, 1985. Hogarth's Blacks: Images of Blacks in Eighteenth Century English Art. Manchester, Manchester University Press, 1987.

A Handbook for Teaching Caribbean Literature. London, Heinemann, 1988.

Editor, The Black Presence in English Literature. Manchester, Manchester University Press, 1985.

Editor, with Brinsley Samaroo, India in the Caribbean. N.p., Hansib Publishing Ltd., 1987.

Editor, with Paul Edwards, Black Writers in Britain: An Anthology. N.p., Columbia University Press, 1992.

Editor, Cheddi Jagan: Selected Speeches 1992–1994. London: Hansib, 1995.

Editor, with Brinsley Samaroo, Across the Dark Waters: Ethnicity And Indian Identity In the Caribbean. London, Macmillan Caribbean, 1996.

*

Critical Studies: Configurations of Exile: South Asian Writers And Their World By Chelva Kanaganayakam. Toronto: TSAR, 1995; English Imaginaries: Six Studies In Anglo-British Modernity By Kevin Davey. London: Lawrence & Wishart, 1999.

* * *

As a writer, editor, professor, and critic, David Dabydeen is remarkably committed to critically exploring the literary contributions of the Caribbean diaspora and the often conflicting polyglot identities that emerge from diasporic movements to and from homelands and homeless lands marked by racism, exploitation, and violence. Language—both the creolization of tongues and the overseer-institution of standard English—as an instrument of colonial bondage or the painful outcome of a brutal colonial past is also a central concern in Dabydeen's poetry and prose.

The Intended and Disappearance use Creole in ways that reveal a fascination with and resistance to standard English. First-person narrators in these bildungsroman-type novels start out by desiring assimilation and invisibility within white sociolinguistic norms. These norms are exemplified in an imagined purity and status associated with white bodies and standard English. Narrators in both novels are contrasted with characters and memories that recall them to the "angry, crude, energetic" (Slave Song) rawness associated with a Creole that has little patience for lyricism and cleanliness given the constantly intruding wounded history of its users. In The Intended and Disappearance, Dabydeen's focus shifts between England, Guyana, and Africa, playing with the intentions, memories, and desires of his fictional African and Asian diaspora in Britain. The writer juxtaposes his narrator's denial and shame with a series of narrative movements that double back on themselves, keeping the narrator both complicit and questioning as to the relationships between power and its consequences for race, gender, and empire.

The Intended presents a dilemma of diasporic writing. On the one hand, there is a pressure toward mimicry and the erasure of Black identity through the disciplinary projects of a seemingly apolitical aesthetics of reading practiced by some academic institutions. On the other hand, there is also a concentration on what Dabydeen called the "folking up" of Black literature that could lead to its being considered important only as an example of the ethnically exotic or aberrant ("On Not Being Milton: Nigger Talk in England Today"). The Intended problematizes these ambivalences by introducing the (ill) literate Joseph, who relentlessly questions the young student narrator and his friends in order to disrupt the intended narrative of mimicry. However, since Joseph sets fire to himself and dies, his influence on the narrator is mostly posthumous. It remains arguable, therefore, from the implications of Joseph's death, whether posing an alternate picture to colonial discourses can ever survive without tragic consequences. In Disappearance, the narrator is again compelled to move into the spaces between his present—as an engineer trained in Britain who resists cultivating a "sense of the past"—and the African masks on the walls of his landlady's home in Britain. Ironically, this time it is the English Mrs. Rutherford who discomfits the narrator's sense of history. The novel also takes Ireland into consideration in its questioning of imperialism. The narrator and Mrs. Rutherford share a curious blend of friendship that at times approaches a romantic closeness, and there is a sense of mystery associated with her past that complements the disappearance that the narrator has practiced with regard to his own racial history. However, as with The Intended, the narrative moves toward distancing the past but constantly undercuts itself by advancing right into those areas, destabilizing any security that the narrative might intend to offer the reader.

Dabydeen's poetry and fiction also contains overtones of riposte, overtones that are sporadically marked in the form of intertextual interrogations of well-known pieces of English literature, such as William Shakespeare's The Tempest, Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness, and John Milton's poetry. Some of his poems in Slave Song, Coolie Odyssey, and Turner write back to English paintings depicting blacks, such as those by Francis Wheatley and J. M. W. Turner, among others. These rejoinders come alongside his extensive research into the depictions of blacks and Indians in English art and society and into the history of indentured labor in the Caribbean. This research can be seen in his books Hogarth's Blacks: Images of Blacks in Eighteenth Century Art and Society and A Handbook for Teaching Caribbean Literature; as well as in books he has edited, such as The Black Presence in English Literature; or in books he has coedited, such as Black Writers in Britain 1760-1890 and India in the Caribbean. Dabydeen's poems, unlike his fiction, offer translations in standard English that accompany their creolized texts. The poetry collections also offer introductions and contexts (which the novels do not) for ways in which he uses Creole. These introductions also serve to emphasize some of his major poetic concerns, concerns that are present also in his fiction.

The Counting House begins in India, and takes protagonists Rohini and Vidia to Guiana as indentured servants in 1857. It is a novel of impotence, both literal (Vidia cannot father a child) and figurative. Mungo, the narrator of A Harlot's Progress, tells the story of a different but quite similar form of servitude: captured and sold into slavery, he has now been freed (as of "22 April 17—"), but he refuses to tell his story on behalf of the abolitionists who freed him. Instead, he directly addresses the reader, who is forced—by virtue of his apparent ingratitude toward those who freed him, and by other aspects of his personality—to avoid a too-easy sense of sympathy for Mungo.

The critical reception to Dabydeen's novels has been largely positive, except for a sharp critique on narrative complicity by Benita Parry. However, the complex and often tense ways in which gender, race, and identity configure in his writings deserve further and closer scrutiny that existing scholarship has offered.

-Marian Gracias

D'AGUIAR, Fred

Nationality: English. Born: London, England, 2 February 1960. Education: University of Kent at Canterbury, B.A. 1985. Career: Trained and worked as a psychiatric nurse; visiting fellow, Cambridge University, Cambridge, England, 1989–90; visiting writer, Amherst College, Amherst, Massachusetts, 1992–94; assistant professor of English, Bates College, Lewiston, Maine, 1994–95; professor of English, University of Miami, Coral Gables, Florida, 1995. Awards: Minority Rights Group Award, 1983; University of Kent T. S. Eliot Prize, 1984; G.L.C. Literature Award, 1985; Guyana Prize for Poetry (Guyanese government), 1989; David Higham First Novel Award (The Book Trust), 1995; Whitbread Award (Booksellers Association of Great Britain and Ireland), 1995. Agent: Curtis Brown, Ltd., 10 Astor Place, New York, New York 10003, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Longest Memory. New York, Pantheon, 1995.

Dear Future. New York, Pantheon, 1996.

Feeding the Ghosts. Hopewell, New Jersey, Ecco Press, 1999.

Plays

A Jamaican Airman Foresees His Death. London, Methuen, 1995; also appeared in Black Plays, edited by Yvonne Brewster. New York, Methuen, 1995.

Televisions Plays: Sweet Thames. BBC-TV 2, 1992; Rain. BBC-TV 2, 1994.

Radio Plays: 1492. BBC Radio 3, 1992.

Poetry

Mama Dot. London, Chatto & Windus, 1985. Airy Hall. London, Chatto & Windus, 1989. British Subjects. Newcastle upon Tyne, England, Bloodaxe, 1993. Bill of Rights. London, Chatto & Windus, 1998.

Other

Contributor, New British Poetries: The Scope of the Possible, edited by Robert Hampson and Peter Barry. New York, Manchester University Press, 1993.

Editor, with others, The New British Poetry. London, Paladin Grafton, 1988.

* * *

Fred D'Aguiar is part of a younger group of talented Black British writers and critics including David Dabydeen and Caryl Phillips who bring to their novels a multi-layered awareness of the aesthetic, cultural, literary, and political debates surrounding race and representation. All three novelists have experimented with the delivery of the novel, particularly in its manipulation of time, its use of metaphor and symbol as structuring devices that cut across the linear unfolding of the text, and its dialogic engagement with other narrative works as inter-texts. All three novelists have also tackled the history and legacy of slavery as a site for the imaginative interrogation of questions of history and memory, culture, power, and identity. As such, these novelists can be located within what Paul Gilroy has called a "Black Atlantic" web of diasporic connections and concerns.

D'Aguiar was known as a poet and had produced critically acclaimed collections such as Mama Dot, Airy Hall, and British Subjects long before he began to write novels. With the publication of The Longest Memory, a novel centered on the life of a slave set on an eighteenth-century Virginia plantation, Dear Future, a book about growing up in the political climate of Guyana in the 1960s and 1970s, and Feeding the Ghosts, based on the historic case of the Zong slave ship whose captain threw overboard ostensibly sick and dying slaves, D'Aguiar's stature as a novelist is assured. All three texts show D'Aguiar's ability to create compelling characters and moods, but they also exhibit a willingness to experiment with the traditional form of the novel. In interviews, D'Aguiar himself has argued that the nineteenth-century realist novel, with its relatively straightforward unfolding of events, is not tenable in an age that has seen the innovations of writers like James Joyce and Wilson Harris. D'Aguiar's work is a good example of how the emotional strengths of the traditional novel need not be sacrificed for a more intellectual engagement with form.

The Longest Memory plays with voice and time. The book is narrated through different characters, all of whom are given their own voices: Whitechapel, the slave; his "son" Chapel; Chapel's mother, the cook; Whitechapel's granddaughter; Mr. Sanders senior, the overseer; Mr. Sanders junior, his son and Chapel's half brother; Mr. Whitechapel, the master of the plantation; his daughter Lydia; and the editor of the slavers' journal, The Virginian. These accounts function like dramatic monologues and offer very different emotional and intellectual responses to the same events, for example, the punishment and death of Chapel. There is no extra-diegetic narrator to mediate between his father, the Master, the overseer, the slavers' news report or the granddaughter's reconstruction of the event and its aftermath. Each are offered within the ideological context and are (at times) incommensurable: the overseer's need to assert his authority over runaway and rebellious slaves, the editor's belief in the righteousness of slavery, Whitechapel's conviction that resistance is futile, and his son's belief that freedom matters and that a different future exists where slavery will be outlawed. The book's abandonment of an overarching narrator in favor of a multiplicity of voice leads to a more fractured kind of narration. The use of dramatic monologues allows an event or a series of events to be told and returned to repeatedly in reconstruction and memory. Such a deliberate mixing up of chronology when assembling the novel's variety of stories and voices makes the reader's experience more disjointed; but this also has the effect of replicating how an event is experienced and remembered. Hence, as D'Aguiar himself acknowledges, the novel's circular structure. What results is that history behaves like trauma, a repetition that refuses to go away; as Whitechapel remarks, "the future is just more of the past waiting to happen," "memory is pain trying to resurrect itself."

The representation of slavery as a trauma, the task of reconstructing the lives and stories of slaves from their relegation to the anonymity of history, are part of a modern and postcolonial ethical and archival project. The Black Atlantic preoccupation with slavery is often depicted as part of a process of reckoning that is required in order to move on (see, for example, Toni Morrison's Beloved). Coming to terms with the trauma of slavery enables one not to repeat the failures and mistakes of the past in new guises. But in an article, "The Last Essay about Slavery," D'Aguiar argues that there is also a compulsive need to revisit slavery—in their own language and imagery—for every succeeding generation of black writers. Rather than the past being laid to rest when it is told, each imagining "feeds the need for a further act of retrieval. In fiction as in song, the story continues both to bring to life a past that might otherwise remain lost or distorted into shame, and to convert that past from pain to cure."

This awareness that cultural memory is in an important sense not simply about recovering the past but how the past is formed and performed in the present is an integral part of a postmodern critique of essentialist notions of identity. Cultural identity is not simply an unproblematic ethnic inheritance; it is created and produced. Such debates structure D'Aguiar's Feeding the Ghosts. The novel's central protagonist, the slave Mintah, is compelled to remember the deaths on the Zong, and her connection with her African homeland, and expresses such acts of memory through the crafting of wooden carvings of these murdered companions. D'Aguiar's choice of Mintah as a character that survives the seaboard murder of slaves is deliberate. It allows him to use her reproductive ability—her body—to explore slavery's severance of family and community; here, her black identity is based on filial and kinship connections. Yet D'Aguiar also characterizes Mintah as an artist, and depicts her woodwork as a kind of creative "birthing." This allows D'Aguiar to capture a more complex articulation of black subjectivity as moving beyond the notion of the essential black subject that is based on a racialized culture; instead it is an affiliative connection that must be forged and renewed through creative and expressive forms.

If Feeding the Ghosts seems at first glance to be a more conventional novel than The Longest Memory, the novel's manipulation of metaphor and symbol cuts across the chronology of history and narrative and offers a more poetic meta-narrative. A body of metaphoric association, which accrues around the symbol of wood, land, and, especially, the sea (which owes much to Derek Walcott's poetry) forges a horizon of connections through the different spatial and temporal zones of the novel. D'Aguiar himself describes such a technique as abandoning the realism of the novel for the symbolism of poetry, but such a method of construction also performs the kind of diasporic aesthetics that Gilroy speaks about.

Dear Future looks not at slavery but at broader postcolonial issues such as the plight of former colonies, particularly Guyana, after independence. On the one hand, global capitalism makes nonsense of any form of political and economic autonomy, and on the other, the corruption of the indigenous elite undermines the future of the emerging nation. The black seamless bitumen road that replaces the red sand road of the village opens the rural heartland to a new form of colonial exploitation. Its huge articulated trucks 'never stopped for anyone or anything they hit' as they convert the interior's raw materials to a stream of commodities for sale on the world's market. The indigenous politicians, with their hand in the country's till, collude with and profit from this traffic; they magic votes out of thin air in order to stay in power. The result is a betrayal of the promise of independence, to turn them into ''nightmare[s] from the republic of dreams.''

The political context of Guyana is not handled directly but is filtered through a child's eyes and the experiences of his family. The child's life stands in for the nation's future but D'Aguiar's portrait of Red Head (who has prophetic visions), his extended family, and their very full life together in rural Guyana is done lovingly-but economically-through episodes that depict the adventures of individual characters. (These are reminiscent of some of what appeared in D'Aguiar's first semi-autobiographic collection of poetry, Mama Dot.) The result is that Red Head's letters to the future, "as a lost chance rather than an eager prospect," are all the more touching. As with D'Aguiar's other novel, there is a striking use of symbolism (notably the opposition between red and black in the child's view of things) and the manipulation of space (the spaces of the Guyanese village and that of London, where his mother resides). The chronology of the story is turned on its head, as episodes are not offered in their temporal sequence. Time becomes the "ever present past" of the future as Red Head asserts his memory of-and connection with—surviving family members. It goes without saying that such strategic use of kinship across and against time is also the basis of the notion of a black diaspora.

-Gail Low

d'ALPUGET, Blanche

Nationality: Australian. Born: Sydney, 3 January 1944. Education: Sydney Church of England Girls' Grammar School. Family: Married Anthony Ian Camden Pratt in 1965; one son. Career: Journalist, president of the Australian Capital Territory branch of the Oral History Association of Australia. Awards: PEN Sydney Centre Golden Jubilee award for literature, 1981; Age Book of the Year award, 1981, for Turtle Beach; South Australian Government award for literature, 1982; New South Wales Premier's award for nonfiction, 1983, for Robert J. Hawke. Member: Women's Electoral Body; Women's International League for Peace and Freedom; Australian Labor Party; Oral History Association of Australia; Australian Society of Authors. Agent: Robert Gottlieb, William Morris Agency, 1350 Avenue of the Americas, New York, New York 10019, U.S.A. Address: 18 Urambi Village, Kambah, Australian Capital Territory 2902, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Monkeys in the Dark. Sydney, Aurora Press, 1980.Turtle Beach. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1981.Winter in Jerusalem. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1986.White Eye. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1994.

Other

Mediator: A Biography of Sir Richard Kirby. Melbourne, Melbourne University Press, 1977.

Robert J. Hawke: A Biography. East Melbourne, Schwarts in conjunction with Landsdowne Press, 1982.

* * *

If it is true, as novelist Tom Keneally has often complained, that Australia lacks middle-brow writers who can write intelligent, absorbing fiction that deals with serious issues in a mature way, then Blanche d'Alpuget is the exception that proves the rule. She writes comparatively conventional novels that nevertheless are highly competent and engaging, show a keen interest in contemporary affairs, and engage with moral dilemmas in an accessible way without being shallow. She was one of the first Australian novelists to realize the relevance of Asia to Australian life and more recently has turned her attention to such contemporary issues as environmental destruction (and extremism in its defense), genetic engineering, and human cruelty to animals.

Monkeys in the Dark is set in Indonesia at the time of the attempted communist uprising but a year or so later than Christopher J. Koch's better known The Year of Living Dangerously. The revolution has been suppressed, Sukarno is still president though his power is clearly declining, and there is uneasy speculation in the air as to whether the communists will attempt another coup. It deals with Alexandra Wheatfield, a rather naive young woman working with the Australian consulate, and her relations with her first cousin and former lover, Anthony Sinclaire, as well as those with the militant Indonesian poet Maruli, with whom she falls in love. Although he does have some feeling for her, Maruli takes advantage of her diplomatic immunity to carry on his revolutionary activities. More wickedly, Anthony tricks her into coming back to him at the end of the novel by blackening Maruli's name. It is a gripping and well-plotted novel that captures the atmosphere of Indonesia in the wake of the uprising, but its pessimistic, even fatalistic, mood is summed up in the extract from a speech by Sukarno that gives the novel its title: "Oh, my people, if you abandon our history you will face a vaccuum.... Life for you will be no more than running amok. Running amok—like monkeys trapped in the dark!"

Turtle Beach is set in Malaysia, with the boat people arriving in the aftermath of the Vietnam War being greeted with hostility by local residents. When two hundred of them are drowned, the fish feed off their corpses and the livelihood of the fishermen is ruined, as people refuse to buy their produce. Ironies such as these abound in the novel. The heroine is again a reasonably attractive (not startlingly beautiful but with a seductively Monroe kind of voice) reporter in her late thirties, but unlike her predecessor, Judith Wilkes is a tough-minded careerist, determinedly carrying on with her work as she copes with a young family and a dying marriage to an ambitious political flunky back in Australia. Yet she has some of the same qualities as Alex: a tendency toward passivity, a weakness for sensual men, and a sense of idealism that renders her vulnerable to manipulation. Like Alex, she falls in love with one of the locals, Kanan, but is finally repelled by the fatalism of his Indian philosophy. Again the title of the novel embodies a metaphor to do with human helplessness in the face of larger historical movements. It comes from the turtles that battle against all odds to lay their eggs and bury them, only to have them dug up and sold or eaten by the local residents.

Winter in Jerusalem follows a relatively familiar format but with decreasing assurance. Its heroine is Danielle Green, a thirty-eight-year-old professional writer widowed after an unhappy marriage and with a teenage daughter in Sydney. She has arrived in Jerusalem to write the script for a film about an uprising of suicidal zealots in 73 A.D. and also to try and make contact with her father, whom she has not seen for many years. Although the novel has many of d'Alpuget's best qualities—her grasp of atmosphere, aphoristic wit, quick snapshots of characters—it is the least coherent and worse structured of her novels, heavily dependent on coincidence of an opportunistic kind. The theme of Danielle's relationship with her father is never explored in any depth and toward the end the action of the novel accelerates toward its upbeat resolution to a point that is almost laughable.

A gap of eight years followed before d'Alpuget published her fourth novel, White Eye, which again broke new ground for her. It is a kind of ecothriller, subsuming concerns the author has often spoken on in interviews in a popular format. Although written in a deliberately plain and simple style the novel has an extraordinarily intricate plot, involving illegal trafficking of chimpanzees between Thailand and Australia, genetic engineering, and an attempt to destroy the world. It opens dramatically with the discovery of the naked body of a woman who has been tortured, then shot. It will be the first of at least eight murders in the novel, some of them quite horrific. The protagonist, Diana Pembridge, is a quintessential d'Alpuget heroine, thirty-two years old, beautiful and patrician in appearance, but vulnerable and unfulfilled in reality. She is a passionate lover of nature without being a fanatic, and some of the finest writing in the novel is devoted to accounts of her falconing and her struggle to heal and release a wounded wedgetail eagle.

Against her is pitted John Parker, a deeply misogynistic man whose disgust with a proliferating human race drives him to invent a vaccine that will prevent it breeding: "He had succeeded in doing what every man, secretly, would like to do: he had created a vaccine that would sterilise all the other men on Earth." D'Alpuget has said that part of her aim was to preach against the excesses of environmentalists, but in Parker she has created not a zealot but a murderously pathological misanthrope with no redeeming qualities except a certain kind of mordant wit: Asked by a woman if he minds her smoking he replies amiably, "Not at all. Smoking helps reduce the population." It comes as no surprise to the reader to discover eventually that he is also a covert homosexual; gays in general get a bad press in this novel. Like all of d'Alpuget's work, White Eye is a carefully and thoroughly researched novel that at times indeed wears its learning a little ostentatiously. It alternates scenes of lyrical evocation of landscape and the beauty of the colony of birds that Diana looks after with descriptions of violence and cruelty. Like Winter in Jerusalem it suffers from a rushed ending in which Diana and a charismatic photographer cum environmentalist meet and fall in love in what seems seconds. D'Alpuget has admitted that she has difficulty in writing scenes of sexual love and this is evident here. The effect of love on Diana seems to be to turn her into a kind of travelling light show: "The colours around her body throbbed and flowed, rosered, rose-pink, violet around her shoulders, orange around her and around her hands a bright, clear green." However, d'Alpuget does save a couple of ingenious twists in the plot till right near the end.

-Laurie Clancy

DANTICAT, Edwidge

Nationality: American. Born: Port-au-Prince, Haiti, 19 January 1969. Education: Barnard College, 1990; Brown University, M.F.A. 1993. Career: Freelance writer, 1994—. Address: c/o Soho Press, 853 Broadway, Number 1903, New York, New York 10003, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Breath, Eyes, Memory. New York, Soho Press, 1994. The Farming of Bones. New York, Soho Press, 1998.

Short Stories

Krik? Krak! New York, Soho Press, 1995.

Other

Foreword, The Magic Orange Tree, and Other Haitian Folktales, edited by Diane Wolkstein. New York, Schocken Books, 1997.

Foreword, A Community of Equals: The Constitutional Protection of New Americans by Owen Fiss, edited by Joshua Cohen and Joel Rogers. Boston, Beacon Press, 1999.

Contributor, Island on Fire: Passionate Visions of Haiti from the Collection of Jonathan Demme, edited by Jonathan Demme. Nyack, New York: Kaliko Press, 1997.

*

Edwidge Danticat comments:

(2000) At the end of most readings and lectures, a writer is often asked, "How much of your work is autobiographical?" The writer's reaction to that question varies, depending on the subject of the work. I once heard a young, shy, soft-spoken, female novelist who had just published a thriller about a serial killer quickly answer, "Not much." However, for most of us, the answer is not always so simple.

As novelist and short story writer Katherine Anne Porter once said, "A story is something you wind out of yourself. Like a spider, it is a web you weave, and you love your story like a child." In an interview with Donna Perry for her book Backtalk: Women Writers Speak Out, British novelist and Booker Prize winner Pat Barker adds that the starting point of any work is "inevitably always something in your life, just as the source of every single character you create has to be yourself."

Is most writing on some level—large or small—autobiographical, whether it be emotional autobiography or straight out borrowing from our lives?

In order to create full-fledged, three dimensional characters, writers often draw on their encounters, observations, collages of images from the everyday world, both theirs and others'. We are like actors, filtering through our emotions what life must be like, or must have been like, for those we write about. Truly we imagine these lives, aggrandize, reduce, or embellish, however we often begin our journey with an emotion close to our gut, whether it be anger, curiosity, joy, or fear.

I always have trouble answering the "How much of your work is autobiographical?" question. Not so much because it feels like a curiosity probe or a violation of privacy, but simply because the question at times rings to me like an oxymoron. To ask a fiction writer how much truth is in her work seems like asking a jockey if his/her black horse is green. (Or maybe it's if his/her black horse is black?) I once heard a writer angrily answer that autobiographical question with "If I wanted to write an autobiography, I would have written one." However, the question can be a valid one, for what about the little mannerisms of ourselves that show up in the main or minor characters in our stories? What of the characters that we plop fully formed on the page mimicking our friends and relatives? And what of the incidents from childhood that reappear over and over in different forms in our tales?

Still what do we answer? Is the work ten percent autobiographical, twenty percent? Fifty percent?

I was born in Haiti in 1969 and moved to the United States when I was twelve to be reunited with my mother and father who had left Haiti eight years before I did. My first novel, Breath, Eyes, Memory, is about a girl, Sophie Caco, who is born in Haiti as a result of a rape and comes to the United States to be reunited with her mother when she is twelve. Because of the obvious similarities between the character's and my childhood, many of my readers assume that I too was born as a result of a rape. I was not. However there are many other things that the main character in that novel, Sophie Caco, and I share.

In writing Breath, Eyes, Memory, I used the sadness and desolation I experienced as a child separated from my parents. When I invented Sophie Caco, I relived my wonder at seeing a new country for the first time and infused those moments into her first day in New York. Perhaps what I did was write an emotional autobiography, but not a factual one.

I have always split my memories into two realms: one of real memory and one of fictional memory. Fictional memory has a series of plot devices, ordered scenes, convenient settings, clever dialogue and revisions aimed at the ending of your choice. My fictional memories are what come up when I consider my real memories and ask myself "What if?" What if when Sophie Caco/Edwidge Danticat arrives in New York City for the first time she discovers a dark secret in her past, her mother's rape.

Real memory is fragmented, messy, disorganized, has no clever dialogue and you don't always get the ending of your choice. That's why I prefer to write fiction, though it is fiction that draws heavily from certain moments in my life. With my fictional memories, I can use lies to tell a greater truth, winding a different kind of tale out of myself, one in which the possibilities for tangents and digressions are boundless; I can also weave a more elaborate web, where everyone's life can serve as a thread, including my own.

* * *

American literature has produced more than its share of prodigies. From Stephen Crane to F. Scott Fitzgerald to Carson McCullers to Truman Capote, many American writers have achieved significant acclaim, and produced some of their most famous works, while still in their twenties. To this list may be added the name of Edwidge Dandicat. Her first novel, Breath, Eyes, Memory, appeared when the author was twenty-five and was guaranteed significant popular success as a selection of Oprah Winfrey's Book Club. Her next book, the short story collection Krik? Krak! was a finalist for the National Book award. Her second novel, The Farming of Bones, appeared in 1998.

Born in Haiti, Dandicat moved to the United States at the age of twelve, and all of her fiction to date has been devoted to an unflinching examination of her native culture, both on its own terms and in terms of its intersections with American culture. Dandicat's work emphasizes in particular the heroism and endurance of Haitian women as they cope with a patriarchal culture that, in its unswerving devotion to tradition and family, both oppresses and enriches them. When Sophie, the narrator of Breath, Eyes, Memory, is taken from Haiti to live with her mother in New York City, she adapts to American culture on the surface but is damaged by her mother's obsession with female "purity" and constant, degrading "testing" of Sophie's virginity—a procedure that was also done to Sophie's mother, and her mother before her. Sophie leaves her mother, marries an American, and has a daughter of her own, but she must make a return pilgrimage to Haiti before she can begin, if not to condone, then to come to terms with her mother's actions and begin to understand the history she and her mother share with all the other "daughters of this land."

While Dandicat's first novel and most of her short stories focus on the plight and legacy of "those nine hundred and ninety-nine women who were boiling in your blood" (to quote the author's "Epilogue" to Krik? Krak!), The Farming of Bones paints on an even broader canvas as we witness the horrors of dictator Rafael Trujillo's 1937 massacre of Haitians resident in the Dominican Republic. The narrator, Amabelle, Haitian servant to a prosperous Dominican family, at first is reluctant to believe the rumors of massacre but eventually has no choice as she and her lover Sebastien witness unspeakable brutalities during their attempt to flee to Haiti. The few who survive carry with them wounds beyond the physical; by the time Trujillo is finally assassinated almost a quarter-century later, Amabelle and the other survivors must cope not only with the enormity of their catastrophe but with "the most unforgivable weaknesses of the dead: their absence and their silence."

Dandicat's novels and stories are written with a passionate lyricism but also with a control of craft and seriousness of purpose that would be impressive in any writer and are astonishing in one so young. She is determined to bear imaginative witness to the history of her culture. In so doing, she offers no easy outs—The Farming of Bones in particular is a narrative of almost unrelieved suffering—but also never lets us forget that the people of her stories, no matter how wounded, are individuals of intelligence and dignity and irreducible worth. That is, of course, a message for all cultures, and we are fortunate that a writer as talented as Dandicat has made proclaiming it her life's work.

-F. Brett Cox

DAVIDSON, Lionel

Nationality: British. Born: Hull, Yorkshire, 31 March 1922. Military Service: Served in the Royal Naval Submarine Service, 1941–46. Family: Married 1) Fay Jacobs in 1949 (died 1988), two sons; 2) Frances Ullman in 1989. Career: Freelance magazine journalist and editor, 1946–59. Awards: Authors Club award, 1961; Crime Writers Association Gold Dagger, 1961, 1967, 1979. Agent: Curtis Brown, 28/29 Haymarket, London SW1Y 4SP, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Night of Wenceslas. London, Gollancz, 1960; New York, Harper, 1961.

The Rose of Tibet. London, Gollancz, and New York, Harper, 1962.A Long Way to Shiloh. London, Gollancz, 1966; as The Menorah Men, New York, Harper, 1966.

Making Good Again. London, Cape, and New York, Harper, 1968. Smith's Gazelle. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1971.

The Sun Chemist. London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1976.

The Chelsea Murders. London, Cape, 1978; as Murder Games, New York, Coward McCann, 1978.

Kolymsky Heights. London, Heinemann, and New York, St. Martin's, 1994.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Note to Survivors," in Alfred Hitchcock's Mystery Magazine (New York), May 1958.
- "Where Am I Going? Nowhere!," in Suspense (London), February 1961.
- "Indian Rope Trick," in Winter's Crimes 13, edited by George Hardinge. London, Macmillan, 1981.
- "I Do Dwell," in Winter's Crimes 16, edited by Hilary Hale. London, Macmillan, 1984.

Fiction (for children) as David Line

Soldier and Me. New York, Harper, 1965. Run for Your Life. London, Cape, 1966. Mike and Me. London, Cape, 1974.

Under Plum Lake (as Lionel Davidson). London, Cape, and New York, Knopf, 1980.

Screaming High. London, Cape, and Boston, Little Brown, 1985.

* * *

A novelist in various genres, Lionel Davidson has become most widely known as a writer of mysteries, winning the Crime Writers Association Gold Dagger, an annual prize, three different times. His mystery stories are intricate and full of social and historical detail. The Chelsea Murders (published as Murder Games in the United States), for example, uses clues drawn from 19th-century literary and pre-Raphaelite figures. Each of the seven victims has the initials of one of the luminaries who lived in Chelsea, figures like Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Oscar Wilde, and Algernon Charles Swinburne; the mass killer, like one of the victims, has the initials of the satirist W.S. Gilbert. In addition, the clues, mailed to the police through different ingenious guises, are quotations from the writers, emphasizing the novel's resemblance to an intricate game. No clue is, in itself, more relevant than any of the others. The Chelsea Murders is also, like much of Davidson's fiction, socially referential, containing quick depictions of London porno clubs, film-making, language lessons for the acculturation of Arabs, a gay disco, and a jeans store on the King's Road. Within his quickly shifting and often comic scenes, Davidson pays deference to traditional elements in crime fiction, the establishment of time frame, the police procedure, and the use of disguise to confuse identity, although he allows himself little space for the treatment of motive, psychology, or any interior quality. His characterizations, like his characters themselves, are likely to operate in groups, and the most common theme in the mysteries is that of betrayal, the violation by one member of the ethos, the standards, or the lives of other members of the group.

Other of Davidson's novels shade the line dividing the mystery from the novel of espionage. One espionage novel is Making Good Again in which three lawyers in the 1960s, an Englishman, a German, and an Israeli, combine in an effort to find a long-missing German-Jewish banker or to decide what to do with the million Swiss francs still left in his name. Using various costumes and guises as they travel through the Bavarian forest and other parts of Europe, and shifting allegiances to various governments and national interests, they constantly confront echoes of Nazi feeling and raise questions about German guilt and possible reparations for crimes against the Jews and the rest of humanity. Again, the theme is betrayal; but the notion of a new international combination of responsibilities cannot sustain itself in a plot that involves a good deal of action and adventure. Another novel, published as A Long Way to Shiloh in England and The Menorah Men in the United States, combines adventure with a depiction of Israel in the 1960s. This novel places the search for a religious symbol originally lost or stolen from the Temple at Jerusalem against a background of contemporary Israel trying to develop a national identity through current forms of economic, social, sexual, and religious behavior.

Davidson manifests a considerable range among fictional genres, almost never writing the same kind of novel twice. The Rose of Tibet is pure adventure and travelogue, evoking that strange and isolated land held in by mountains. Smith's Gazelle, with considerable delicacy and sensitivity, deals with the excitements and problems of preserving a nearly extinct herd of deer, working its implicit argument for conservation into suggestions of a mythic statement about the origins of species. Under Plum Lake is a fantasy for children in which a young boy discovers a whole subterranean civilization underneath a familiar lake. Different as they are in genre and setting, all Davidson's novels depend on action and adventure, externalizing their themes and concerns into a constant involvement with a difficult, various, and morally confusing contemporary world.

Davidson's moral statements, however, never become obvious or heavy-handed. His humor and games are always visible, his social commentary more a matter of reference to or passing jabs at contemporary social phenomena than any sustained social criticism or analysis. His references, too, like those in The Chelsea Murders, are often literary, historical, or topical, references to other works or quick echoes of other styles that make the novels, especially those like The Sun Chemist (about the possible existence among Chaim Weitzmann's forgotten papers of a chemical formula that will free the world's industry from its dependence on Arab oil), sound derivative. Kolymsky Heights, Davidson's first thriller after a 16-year silence, plays on familiar themes—post-Cold War espionage involving the old superpower foes, a rough-and-tumble hero who must steal a secret from a remote base—but adds fresh details: for instance, the hero, Johnny Porter, is a Gitskan Indian from British Columbia.

Davidson has, as a novelist, not yet developed a strong or distinctive literary identity, but his protean skill, his deftness, his humor, and the excitement of the action and cleverness visible in all his novels, along with settings that always illustrate a responsiveness to the contemporary social and political world, have earned him a considerable and growing reputation.

—James Gindin

DAVISON, Liam

Nationality: Australian. Born: Melbourne, Victoria, 29 July 1957. Education: Melbourne State College, B.A. in education 1979. Family: Married Francesca White in 1983; one son and one daughter. Career: Taught creative writing, Peninsula College of Technical and Further Education. Awards: Australia Council/Literature Board fellowship, 1989, 1991; Marten Bequest Travelling Scholarship, 1992, for prose; National Book Council Banjo award, 1993, for fiction. Address: 1 Stephens Road, Mt. Eliza, Victoria 3930, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Velodrome. Sydney, Allen and Unwin, 1988.Soundings. St. Lucia, Australia, University of Queensland Press, 1993

The White Woman. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1994.

Short Stories

The Shipwreck Party. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press,

*

Manuscript Collection: University College, Australian Defence Force Academy, Campbell, Australia.

Liam Davison comments:

Much of my fiction is concerned with exploring the ways in which our knowledge of the past influences the way we perceive the world about us. Rather than writing historical fiction, I am interested in fiction that explores the notion of history itself and the relationship it bears with myth and story. Faulkner's notion of the past not being dead and not even being past yet, has had a strong influence on my work. I'm also interested in the idea of alternative and silenced histories which has a particular bearing on the post-colonial nature of Australian society and its attempts to redefine itself.

My third book Soundings integrates three narrative strands from different periods of Australian history, all set in the Westernport region of Victoria. While many have read it as a contemplation of the landscape of the region, it is also an exploration of the different cultural and historical perceptions and expectations imposed on a new land. The White Woman explores the notion of history in a quite different way. Operating largely as a re-working of a nineteenth century captivity myth about a virtuous white woman held captive by the Aborigines of Gippsland, it considers the power and consequences of story and the role it plays in shaping the way we live.

* * *

In four works of fiction, Liam Davison has made his mark among the younger generation of Australian novelists. He writes an elegant and cadenced yet earthly prose. Davison also has an individualistic preoccupation with humans' efforts to impose order on the world and to construct themselves by creating history, maps, roads, and canals. He is a landscape novelist, mapping the human psyche.

Davison's first novel, The Velodrome, is narrated by Leon, whose father, like his two friends Sam and Eric, is a passionate cyclist. Leon sees the three men constantly circle the cosmos on their biketrack, traveling eternally to the same spot and achieving "order."

In a cycling accident, Leon's father is killed and Eric is crippled. The two men and Leon's mother, now married to Eric, decide to find a new order by breaking the circle and making the long journey to the north of Australia. Traveling is a central theme in Davison's fiction, and most human interaction takes place on the road or on the water, shoulder-to-shoulder rather than face-to-face. There is a studied detachment in the prose, and dying is presented as an act of absent-mindedness. Being murdered is more thought-provoking. Characters do not turn to other people but to the stories they use to make themselves; to God as benign cartographer, to "collecting the facts" into a shoe box of index cards, to measuring out life with the wheels of a well-made bike. The Velodrome may at times seem a little too self-conscious in its emotional distancing, but its narrative line is strong, its images reverberate, and its spare, nuanced prose lingers tantalizingly.

The Shipwreck Party, Davison's collection of stories, furthers his preoccupation with landscape as a taken rather than a given. A party is held on a grounded ship. Water flows through most of the subsequent fiction. Davison does not write about people in the landscape. Rather he focuses on the landscape or the seascape within the people. At the shipwreck, characters see the same but different things. Seeing is creating.

A story about a famous Australian convict, Buckley, who escaped to live with the Aborigines, signals two interests that become central. Unpursued, Buckley experiences "ironic disappointment." Characters are so busily creating a self in story that they are unable to read the stories of others. Each man is an island complete unto himself. And the causeway can offer drowning as well as welcome.

Also, in his two next novels, Soundings and The White Woman, Davison has moved from assiduous impersonality to a more emotionally energetic prose. His writing never risks death by flamboyance, but language has thawed and the grace of the prose takes on more force as both novels develop the interest in Australia's colonial past found earlier in Buckley.

If each person is an island, islands still have histories and changing shapes. Soundings is a deftly constructed novel covering three periods of Australian history. The first is the 1820s, predating the colony of Victoria. Wolfish sealers, French scientists, and the English explorer Hovell suspiciously track each other. Each sees a different country—and, in the indigenous people, a different species. Passionately calm, Davison stories a shame that even now is being only edgily owned by history.

Davison is not in any conventional sense "an historical novelist," but he deeply probes the ways in which we talk ourselves into being. History becomes the present trying to run away from itself. His second era is the 1900s, when swamplands were reclaimed for "progress." Canals are human bypass surgery on nature. Life might swamp them, but they leave scars of control. The natural world has signed no Geneva Convention for rules in war. There is a constant edge of absurdity in Davison's writing. The human animal is laughable but too busy making its story seriously important to notice. As one character remarks, "history's a lot safer than boats."

The third story is that of a contemporary landscape photographer who, with an old photo-finish camera, glimpses people long dead. Though sometimes a little contrived, this reinforces Davison's focus that seeing is inventing.

The White Woman, Davison's most powerful achievement yet, confirms that there are no absolutes in history, only ceremonial reunions or family squabbles of relatives. An old man looks back over half a century to 1847 when he took part in an expedition to rescue a white woman supposedly held captive by the Aborigines. As he relives his story, he makes clear "how much we needed her." His narrative takes on religious dimensions—"It was love" and "I still had faith in her." She is the white Madonna, enslaved by "savages, brutes, the very opposite of what we are ourselves." Such is history, official truth. The old man's truth is savagely different. Davison becomes a frontier novelist. The frontier is where civilization ends or behind which it has flourished for fifty thousand years.

Here Davison transcends fashionable political politeness. His most firmly modulated narrative brings into harmony his interest in history as the story we tell ourselves to make our dreams safe, his sense of landscape as invention, and his vision of the world as eternally elusive. All good stories are Revised Standard Versions and The White Woman has biblical rhythm and authority.

-John Hanrahan

DAWSON, Jennifer

Nationality: British. Education: Mary Datchelor School, London; St. Anne's College, Oxford, M.A. in history 1952. Family: Married Michael Hinton in 1964. Career: Has worked for Clarendon Press, Oxford, as a social worker in a mental hospital, and as a teacher. Lives in Charlbury, Oxfordshire. Awards: James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1962; Cheltenham Festival award, 1963; Fawcett prize, for Judasland, 1990. Address: c/o Virago Press, 20–23 Mandela Street, London NW1 0HQ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Ha-Ha. London, Blond, and Boston, Little Brown, 1961. Fowler's Snare. London, Blond, 1962.
The Cold Country. London, Blond, 1965.
Strawberry Boy. London, Quartet, 1976.
A Field of Scarlet Poppies. London, Quartet, 1979.
The Upstairs People. London, Virago Press, 1988.
Judasland. London, Virago Press, 1989.

Short Stories

Penguin Modern Stories 10, with others. London, Penguin, 1972. Hospital Wedding. London, Quartet, 1978.

*

Jennifer Dawson comments:

My greatest passion in life has always been music. I regard writing as a last resort, a faute de mieux for me. In a world where language has been eroded, gutted ("pre-emptive strike," "take-out" for the murder of eight million civilians, etc.) all art "aspires to the condition of music," which cannot be exploited, interpreted, which explores the lost places of the heart, which makes all things new. Two of my novels have had musicians as their main characters—studies of the composer/musician who for social and political reasons experience dryness, aridity, and cannot play any more. Politics creep, burst inevitably into my novels. They then become shrill, rhetorical, routine, etc.

One feeling that has haunted me all my life is that life, social life as we know it, is a kind of game with correct moves, correct remarks and replies, correct procedures. I don't know the rules. I have struggled in vain for the real life as opposed to the game of menand-women.

But the thing that obsesses me most, and which I feel I shall never put into language, is the strangeness of life, its accidentalness.

Here we all are on a tiny, blue-green balloon in the midst of naked gases, chambers of violence. The planet as an accident that has produced music, literature, art, and the extraordinary theme-and-variations of religions. Here we are, with our fitted carpets and Mixmasters and spin-dryers, stilted above the world, talking about mock O-levels, who is to be next Master of St. Judas's, how all the cars in St. John's Street seemed badly parked today. Here we are in the midst of nothingness, in the midst of a mystery, accidental and yet behaving politically and socially as though the bizarre nature of our life on this planet has not hit us yet. To me this freak of life (like a purple flower growing out of the dumped tippings of a Hoover-bag) is the invitation to a new kind of freedom. Only art can introduce us to this. But my art? No! It must be someone else's. I shall never succeed in saying what I want to say.

* * *

Novels which explore madness have certain qualities in common. They describe a world which is enclosed, static and ruled by obsessions; they are vivid, fragmented, highly personal documents in which only one character can be fully realized. This intensity is double-edged. It can exclude, and ultimately bore, the reader or it can provide him with a vision of life which has a relevance beyond the barriers of mental illness. Kafka's metaphors have been readily accepted and understood. Jennifer Dawson's The Ha-Ha is one of the few contemporary novels significant enough to deserve the appellation "Kafkaesque."

The Ha-Ha is set in a mental hospital where the narrator, Jean, is slowly recovering from a breakdown. She has progressed from the ward and the company of the irretrievably mad; she is now allowed her own room and promised a suitable job, an eventual regrading. Even as the nurse explains these steps towards freedom, we see their sad irrelevance. Jean's private world is ready to obtrude at any moment; her existence is precarious, threatened by the anarchy in her own imagination. One of the most moving illustrations of her plight is given in the description of her work as a librarian. She happily catalogues books for an elderly couple in the nearby town but is nonplussed by their casual, friendly conversation. When fine weather is mentioned she remarks "I wonder whether the monkeys would be better at the top or the bottoms of the trees." Her own company of animals, spotted, sleek, furred and quilled, wait relentlessly for the time when she will step back into their universe.

The inevitable relapse is brought about by her first real relationship, a love affair with another patient. Alastair is critical of doctors and routines; he alarms Jean by telling her the true nature of her illness, and she panics when he leaves the hospital. She runs away, is picked up by the police and brought back to face "the black box crashing down around my head." It is at this point that the novel changes direction. Jean remembers Alastair for his anger; she begins to share his indignation, rejects the doctors and escapes for good, feeling that her own identity is worth more than any medical tag of health.

Schizophrenia is a disease that has received much attention from modern writers, particularly during the mid-twentieth century. It has been used to symbolize the artist's alienation from society and, by extension, presented as the condition of modern man—lost, lonely, unable to communicate. The schizophrenic is sometimes hailed as a prophet, whose view of life is not only as valid as that of his doctors but also morally superior to the standards they uphold. Dawson shares this fashionable, essentially romantic, attitude, but her writing is without the stridency of propaganda. The parallels with Sylvia Plath's The Bell Jar are many, and the prose is equally fine. Dawson has written further explorations of her subject, but has not yet matched the sustained brilliance of this first novel.

-Judy Cooke

de BERNIÈRES, Louis

Nationality: British. Born: London, 8 December 1954. Education: Manchester University, B.A. (honors) in philosophy; Leicester Polytechnic, P.G.C.E.; University of London, M.A. (with distinction) in English. Career: Has held jobs as landscape gardener, mechanic, and carpenter; teacher for ten years. Awards: Commonwealth Writers prize, 1991, 1992; Lannan Literary Award, 1995. Agent: Lavinia Trevor, 6 The Glasshouse, 49A Goldhawk Rd., London W12 8QP, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The War of Don Emmanuel's Nether Parts. London, Secker and Warburg, 1990; New York, Morrow, 1991.

Señor Vivo and the Coca Lord. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Morrow, 1991.

The Troublesome Offspring of Cardinal Guzman. London, Secker and Warburg, 1992; New York, Morrow, 1994.

Captain Corelli's Mandolin. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Pantheon, 1994.

*

Louis de Bernières comments:

I like to read and write books on a grand scale. I am interested in situations where ordinary people are caught up in abuses of power or historical crises and events. I disapprove of "genre" literature. I have hundreds of influences, but was moved to to want to become a writer by Nicholas Monsarratt's "The Cruel Sea." I am much influence by the great Latin American writers, by Tolstoy and Cervantes, and by my studies in philosophy.

* * *

A novel by Louis de Bernières is like a series of brightly colored and boldly drawn murals that combine into an exotic epic of life, love, and struggle. His first three novels are set in an imaginary South American country and make full use of the stock resources of such a setting: political corruption and malpractice; murder, torture, and violence perpetrated by the military; revolutionary opposition, which sometimes also takes violent forms; drug trafficking and prostitution; machismo and exotic femininity; Roman Catholicism and native magic. These novels also spring large surprises; for example, a troop of conquistadores, frozen in a glacier for four centuries, who are brought back to life and have to adjust to the modern world. De Bernières's fourth novel, Captain Corelli's Mandolin, is set on an imaginary Greek island invaded by the Italians during World War II, and, allowing for the difference of place and time, it has many of the same elements as his earlier works.

De Bernières is perhaps best seen as a mythic populist, who celebrates people in all their variety and idiosyncrasy and in their covert and overt resistance to oppression. In The War of Don Emmanuel's Nether Parts, the struggle of a band of guerrillas and a group of villagers against the depredations of the army culminates in the discovery of a half-buried Inca city, which they reinhabit and which becomes an intimation of Utopia; Señor Vivo and the Coca Lord sees the people of the city battling against the biggest drug baron of their country; and The Troublesome Offspring of Cardinal Guzman shows them resisting the drive of a new Inquisition to impose religious orthodoxy. In Captain Corelli's Mandolin, the oppressor is not only the invading Italians but also war itself, and de Bernières dramatizes both the cruelties of the conflict and the possibilities of transcending them through love.

Memorable characters people de Bernières's pages. Figures who recur in the South American novels include General Carlo Maria Fuerte, a true patriot and lover of the people, who, after his kidnap by guerrillas, learns the truth about the brutality of some of his army colleagues and exacts condign punishment before retiring to private life to pursue his interests as a lepidopterist and ornithologist; Dona Constanza Evans, the plump, idle wife of a wealthy landowner, who is also kidnapped by the guerrillas, who becomes leaner, fitter, and more desirable through sharing their strenuous life, and who eventually throws in her lot with them, not out of any political conviction but because of her passionate affair with one of the young fighters; and Remedios, the courageous and capable woman guerrilla chief, who falls in love with the leader of the revived conquistadores and presents a troubling and sometimes comic challenge to his patriarchal and feudal assumptions. Among the notable characters in Captain Corelli's Mandolin are the Captain himself, a handsome, cultured, and amusing Italian officer with whom the daughter of the Greek house on which he is billeted becomes enamored (against her will); and Carlo Piero Guercio, a brave and strong Italian soldier tormented by his homosexuality and by having to oppress the people whose ancestors exalted love between men.

In all his novels, de Bernières employs a form of magic realism, moving between vividly rendered incidents that stay within the confines of credibility, pastiches of anthropological and travel writing, and evocations of preternatural events and entities, such as the resurrection of the frozen conquistadores or the haunting figure of Parlanchina, a beautiful 19-year-old girl killed by a land mine, who continues, after her death, to appear to, and speak with, her adoptive father. The novels are told from a variety of viewpoints and in a range of voices; the third person authorial narration is characterized by an impersonal quality that makes the novelist come across as the unflinching, but not uncompassionate, recorder of all that happens.

De Bernières's novels do tend to repeat the same formula, and the move in Captain Corelli's Mandolin from South America to Greece is more a shift of setting than of theme, structure, or style. Nonetheless, he has found a way of writing fiction that enables him to engage with major issues of modern times—in particular, political and religious corruption and oppression—while retaining a keen perception of the pleasures of life, a sense of humor, a tempered anger, and a graceful utopianism.

-Nicolas Tredell

de BOISSIÈRE, Ralph (Anthony Charles)

Nationality: Australian. Born: Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, 6 October 1907; moved to Australia, 1947; became citizen, 1970. Education: Queen's Royal College, Port-of-Spain, 1916–22. Family: Married Ivy Alcántara in 1935; two daughters. Career: Accounts clerk, 1927–28, and salesman, Standard Brands, 1929–39, both Trinidad; clerk, Trinidad Clay Products, 1940–47; auto assembler, General Motors-Holden, 1948, cost clerk in car repair shops, 1949–55, freelance writer, 1955–60, and statistical clerk, Gas and Fuel Corporation, 1960–80, all in Melbourne. Agent: Reinhard Sander, Department of Black Studies, Amherst College, Amherst, Massachusetts 01002, U.S.A. Address: 10 Vega Street, North Balwyn, Victoria 3104, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Crown Jewel. Melbourne, Australasian Book Society, 1952; London, Allison and Busby, 1981.

Rum and Coca-Cola. Melbourne, Australasian Book Society, 1956; London, Allison and Busby, 1984.

No Saddles for Kangaroos. Sydney, Australasian Book Society, 1964.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Booze and the Goberdaw" and "The Woman on the Pavement," in From Trinidad, edited by Reinhard Sander. New York, Africana, 1979.

Play

Calypso Isle, music by the author (produced Melbourne, 1955).

Manuscript Collection: The National Library of Australia.

Critical Study: The Trinidad Awakening: West Indian Literature of the 1930s by Reinhard Sander, Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1988.

Ralph de Boissière comments:

I began writing Crown Jewel in 1935. As I am a slow writer who has rarely had much time to write I was still at it when the uprising took place in the oilfields of south Trinidad on 19 June 1937. I saw I was writing the wrong novel. The oil workers had lighted a torch to signal the breaking of the first bonds of colonialism, bonds which we novelists, short story writers, poets and artists who made up The Beacon group (after the name of the now-defunct magazine) had dared to dream would fall before our hatred of foreign masters and our urge to independence. A salesman at the time, I had come to know much of the oilfield area. From two of the important activists in the uprising I got important inside information on its origins, and I began again, discarding much of what I had already written.

I come from one of the best-known French-Creole families, families which, in days long gone, when cocoa was king, had been the real rulers of this British colonial outpost. But with 19 June 1937 my detestation of colonialism, simmering from childhood, and crudely expressed in a few short stories, now became clearly defined.

The second novel of the trilogy, Rum and Coca-Cola, deals with the war years when tens of thousands of American soldiers and civilians were building military bases on the island. The American military had in effect become our rulers. There is not the same tension as in Crown Jewel because everyone had a job and many had two. The conflicts were of a more subtle sort—the breaking down of British prestige, the mockery of former British might, under American occupation.

The third book of the trilogy, Homeless in Paradise (not yet published), covers the approach to Independence in 1962 and its immediate aftermath.

Readers sometimes want to know who was the real-life basis for such and such a character. It is both unwise and impossible to say because I am continually adding to and subtracting from people I have known and, what is more, putting myself into them as characters. The characters may have some resemblance to certain originals, that is all. It is in important crises that people truly reveal themselves: for the most part of our everyday lives we exhibit aspects of character that give only superficial insights into what we are made of. I chose a Black servant girl, Cassie, as one of the main figures in Crown Jewel because in Trinidad her class were the most oppressed, ill-paid, and despised among Blacks. In all of us there is potential of one kind or another, but I am thinking particularly of the potential of the human spirit to achieve greatness, something unsuspected by the individual until he or she is flung by events into a crucial situation which demands the utmost. Cassie has that potential. It made her a leader when the time came. There was no such woman as Cassie, but the point is, there could have been. In other more stable parts of the world there are fewer possibilities for the appearance of such characters because the social conflicts are not extreme or the time for their resolution is not ripe. This is evident in my third novel, No Saddles for Kangaroos, set largely in an automobile factory in Melbourne during the years of the Korean war; here I am dealing with different people at a different historical time.

In technology we have taken great leaps forward, but morally we lag far behind these attainments—which sometimes even threaten to destroy us. But under the surface of life there is always some urge, some movement to rise out of the mire, and it is this movement the writer should try to grasp, this spiritual strength that has to be encouraged. While a writer may profit greatly by displaying the potential for evil he fails if he does not also indicate the potential for creativity as well. The world does not need more hatred, gore, and contempt for life—especially now. It needs belief in the powers of ordinary people to achieve.

No Saddles for Kangaroos is based on experiences I and others had in the early 1950s. Those experiences, those times could produce a novel full of drama. But I find myself unable to write about other, quieter times in Australia because I wasn't born and schooled in that country. At the same time I am a West Indian who has become partly Australian without knowing it. Australia is in my blood, but home is still Trinidad, a home I intuitively, instinctively, emotionally understand as I do not understand Australia.

* * *

Ralph de Boissière's Crown Jewel and Rum and Coca-Cola, both published without much remark four decades ago in Australia, were rightly reissued in the 1980s and received with justified acclaim. They remain relevant because they give an unrivaled portrayal of two moments in Trinidad's recent past which are still very much alive in shaping its present. De Boissière's third novel, No Saddles for Kangaroos, deals with Cold-War politics in the Australian trade union movement, but it lacks the social inwardness and the shaping coherence that his own personal vantage point, as a white creole in a society moving towards black majority rule, gives his two Trinidadian novels.

Crown Jewel depicts Trinidadian society in the years between 1935 and 1937 when the black working class briefly threw aside the middle-class leaders who had diverted its power to their own ends and, through a series of bitter strikes and demonstrations began the process which led to universal suffrage, and political independence. Rum and Coca-Cola is set just before the end of World War II when the dollars from the American military presence changed Trinidad from a neglected and quasi-feudal British colony into a competitive market economy in which "we is all sharks, the stronger feedin" on the weaker." Both forces remain alive in Trinidadian society, the unfinished revolts of 1937 and 1970, and the individualistic consumer materialism which was fueled by the oil boom. Now that the boom has gone and social tensions rise, de Boissière's novels seem more relevant than ever.

Both novels are, in a Caribbean context, rare and largely successful attempts to create fictional models which give a panoramic view of their society. They give not merely a static or descriptive background against which characters perform, but a dynamic image of society created by the actions and social relationships of the characters. And, particularly in Crown Jewel, de Boissière shows individuals who are aware that it is they who make history.

There are limitations, both social and fictional in origin, to de Boissière's portrayal of his society. His portrayal of the Indian role in the social conflicts is inadequate and stereotyped, a consequence perhaps both of ignorance and his concern with coming to terms with his own denied black ancestry, which leads to the exclusion of the more significant relationship between people of African and Indian origin. De Boissière also has a naturalistic concern with narrative plausibility which condemns him to providing each of the major characters with some link of blood, service, or mutual acquaintance. This gives an image of Trinidad as a much more comfortable though quarreling social family than is, I think, intended by the overt picture of class warfare.

However, while most critics have agreed that Crown Jewel gives a detailed and vigorous social and historical portrayal of Trinidad, some have felt that its attempts at the development of a coherent literary design are undermined by its commitment to documentary realism. In fact, its relationship to historical reality is of a different kind. If one compares the fictional character of Le Maitre, the black trade union leader, with the historical person of "Buzz" Butler on whom it is based, one sees not the pursuit of topical detail but the simplification of the character in response to the needs of the novel's shaping pattern. Thus Le Maitre becomes a character of massive moral certainty and clear historical consciousness as a touchstone against which to measure the confused and tentative leanings of the three central intermediary characters towards the black working class.

It is de Boissière's concern with the moral choices facing this group, in particular the character of André de Coudray, like the author an idealistic and socially concerned French Creole, which shapes the novel. And because de Boissière is refreshingly honest in his recognition that de Coudray's commitment involved the destruction of his comfortably privileged world without any guarantee of a place in the new, he is convincing in making de Coudray's journey towards self-knowledge, social responsibility, and cultural pride an image for that of the whole society.

As befitting his perception of the individualism that the power of the American dollar stimulated in Trinidadian society, Rum and Coca-Cola places much greater emphasis on the inner lives of its major characters. In this period moral commitment is not so much a question of social action but of the attempt to stay true to one's perceptions of what one is and to principles which are being swept aside in a society engaged in a competitive struggle for survival, money and power.

In this novel the issue of choice is focused on the triangular relationship of three characters confused about who they are and how they should act in a Trinidad which denies their ideals. Fred Collingwood, a principled black working-class socialist is doomed because of his "moral strength in all its beauty" and he destroys the relationship with Marie, the woman he most loves, because he displaces his desire to change society onto her and in the process destroys her sense of worth. Indra, the part-Indian girl from a lowermiddle-class family, struggles against a "terrible division of spirit" which affects her social and racial sensibilities. Even though she makes a commitment to the working-class movement she still feels cut off, "doomed at this time to a lonely pursuit of the dust they raised in their forward marching." But it is the character of Marie, trapped by the lightness of her color into believing that she can escape into whiteness, which provides the novel's tragic focus. Of the three main characters, she is the one to benefit most materially from the war-time boom, but her unremitting efforts to escape from her past of poverty and casual prostitution are made at the expense of her inner self. Her fate is tragic because she sees herself engaged in a battle for individual self-hood, but in the process becomes separated from what she most truly is and disintegrates as a personality.

Yet Rum and Coca-Cola does not succumb to pessimism. Indra's cry, "O my God! But what am I capable of" is agonized, but the possibilities of moral choice and the issues of human capacity remain central to de Boissière's vision. He sees Trinidad moving in a direction which he detests, but when he has Fred reflect on what has occurred, he shows him capable of taking something positive from it. He sees a society which is not yet free, but one in which old colonial illusions have been destroyed. "Now that walls had falled, what lay exposed was a life of untrustworthy promises, treachery by those you trusted, servility ..." And in this process of laying bare, Fred sees the generation of a new disabused awareness and "ideas which could be weapons."

-Jeremy Poynting

DEIGHTON, Len

Nationality: British. Born: Leonard Cyril Deighton in London, 18 February 1929. Education: Marylebone Grammar School, St. Martin's School of Art, and Royal College of Art, 1952–55, all London. Military Service: Served in the Royal Air Force. Family: Married

Shirley Thompson in 1960. Career: Has worked as a railway lengthman, pastry cook, dress factory manager, waiter, illustrator, teacher, and photographer; art director of advertising agencies in London and New York; steward, British Overseas Airways Corporation, 1956–57; wrote weekly comic strip on cooking for the Observer, London, 1960s; founder, Continuum One literary agency, London. Agent: Jonathan Clowes Ltd., 10 Iron Bridge House, Bridge Approach, London NW1 8BD, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Ipcress File. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1962; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1963.

Horse under Water. London, Cape, 1963; New York, Putnam, 1968. Funeral in Berlin. London, Cape, 1964; New York, Putnam, 1965.

Billion-Dollar Brain. London, Cape, 1966; as The Billion-Dollar Brain, New York, Putnam, 1966.

An Expensive Place to Die. London, Cape, and New York, Putnam, 1967.

Only When I Larf. London, Joseph, 1968; as Only When I Laugh, New York, Mysterious Press, 1987.

Bomber. London, Cape, and New York, Harper, 1970.

Close-Up. London, Cape, and New York, Atheneum, 1972.

Spy Story. London, Cape, and New York, Harcourt Brace, 1974.

Yesterday's Spy. London, Cape, and New York, Harcourt Brace, 1975.

Twinkle, Twinkle, Little Spy. London, Cape, 1976; as Catch a Falling Spy, New York, Harcourt Brace, 1976.

SS-GB: Nazi-Occupied Britain 1941. London, Cape, 1978; New York, Knopf, 1979.

XPD. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Knopf, 1981.

Goodbye Mickey Mouse. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Knopf, 1982.

Game, Set and Match. London, Hutchinson, 1985; New York, Knopf, 1989.

Berlin Game. London, Hutchinson, 1983; New York, Knopf, 1984.

Mexico Set. London, Hutchinson, 1984; New York, Knopf, 1985.London Match. London, Hutchinson, 1985; New York, Knopf, 1986.

Winter: A Berlin Family 1899–1945. London, Century Hutchinson, and New York, Knopf, 1987.

Spy Hook. London, Century Hutchinson, and New York, Knopf, 1988.

Spy Line. London, Century Hutchinson, and New York, Knopf, 1989.Spy Sinker. London, Hutchinson, and New York, HarperCollins, 1990.

MAMista. New York, HarperCollins, 1991.

City of Gold. New York, HarperCollins, 1992.

Violent Ward. New York, HarperCollins, 1993.

Blood, Tears & Folly. London, Jonathan Cape, and New York, HarperCollins, 1993.

Faith. Bath, England, Chivers Press, and New York, HarperCollins, 1994

Hope. New York, HarperCollins, 1995.

Charity. New York, HarperCollins, 1996.

Short Stories

Declarations of War. London, Cape, 1971; as Eleven Declarations of War, New York, Harcourt Brace, 1975.

Plays

Pests: A Play in Three Acts. Mansfield Woodhouse, England, C. Martin, 1994.

Screenplay: Oh! What a Lovely War, 1969.

Television Plays: Long Past Glory, 1963; It Must Have Been Two Other Fellows, 1977.

Other

Action Cook Book: Len Deighton's Guide to Eating. London, Cape, 1965; as Cookstrip Cook Book, New York, Geis, 1966.

Ou Est le Garlic; or, Len Deighton's French Cook Book. London, Penguin, 1965; New York, Harper, 1977; revised edition, as Basic French Cooking, London, Cape, 1979; Berkeley, California, Creative Arts, 1987; revised edition, as Basic French Cookery, London, Century, 1990.

Len Deighton's Continental Dossier: A Collection of Cultural, Culinary, Historical, Spooky, Grim and Preposterous Fact, compiled by Victor and Margaret Pettitt. London, Joseph, 1968.

Fighter: The True Story of the Battle of Britain. London, Cape, 1977; New York, Knopf, 1978.

Airshipwreck, with Arnold Schwartzman. London, Cape, 1978; New York, Holt Rinehart, 1979.

Blitzkrieg: From the Rise of Hitler to the Fall of Dunkirk. London, Cape, 1979; New York, Knopf, 1980.

Battle of Britain. London, Cape, and New York, Coward McCann, 1980; revised edition, with Max Hastings, London, Joseph, 1990.

The Orient Flight L.Z. 127-Graf Zeppelin (as Cyril Deighton), with Fred F. Blau. N.p., Germany Philatelic Society, 1980.

The Egypt Flight L.Z. 127-Graf Zeppelin (as Cyril Deighton), with Fred F. Blau. N.p., Germany Philatelic Society, 1981.

ABC of French Food. London, Century Hutchinson, 1989; New York, Bantam, 1990.

Editor, Drinks-man-ship: Town's Album of Fine Wines and High Spirits. London, Haymarket Press, 1964.

Editor, London Dossier. London, Cape, 1967.

Editor, with Michael Rund and Howard Loxton, The Assassination of President Kennedy. London, Cape, 1967.

Editor, Tactical Genius in Battle, by Simon Goodenough. Oxford, Phaidon Press, and New York, Dutton, 1979.

Bibliography: Len Deighton: An Annotated Bibliography 1954–85 by Edward Milward-Oliver, Maidstone, Kent, Sammler, 1985.

Critical Studies: Secret Agents in Fiction: Ian Fleming, John le Carré, and Len Deighton by L.O. Sauerberg, London, Macmillan, 1984; The Len Deighton Companion by Edward Milward-Oliver, London, Grafton, 1987.

* * *

Partly as a result of the work of Len Deighton, the spy story has replaced the formal detective novel as the relevant thriller for its time. While continuing the tradition of literary excellence that has distinguished British espionage fiction since the days of Somerset Maugham, Eric Ambler, and Graham Greene, both Deighton and his gifted contemporary John le Carré have contributed new energy, intelligence, and meaning to the novel of espionage. Ever since his first novel, The Ipcress File, Deighton has instructed a large reading public in some of the factual and emotional realities of espionage and counterespionage. Writing with a lively wit, a keen eye for the surfaces of modern life, a convincing sense of authenticity, and a genuine intellectual concern for what the dark side of governmental practice can mean, Deighton has revealed, in all of his novels, some of the sham and self-delusion of contemporary politics.

The spy novels employ a nameless first-person narrator who owes something to Raymond Chandler's Philip Marlowe in his breezy wisecracks and sometimes strained metaphors; beneath the wiseguy surface, however, he possesses some of Marlowe's decency and compassion. Resolutely working-class in background, education, and point of view, Deighton's hero is a professional spy who must do constant battle with the forces of the British Establishment in their full and whinnying glory as well as with whatever is on the other side. Frequently, in fact, his spy never knows precisely which side he is on, and is so often betrayed by his colleagues and superiors that it sometimes doesn't matter. Professional and personal betrayal mesh perfectly in the two separate trilogies about Bernard Samson, whose wife and colleague, Fiona, turns out to be a defecting Soviet agent in the middle of an immensely complicated operation. The double trilogy—Berlin Game, Mexico Set, London Match, and Spy Hook, Spy Line, and Spy Sinker—initially appeared to signal a certain finality in Deighton's exploration of contemporary international politics, but he later resurrected the Samson saga in a third series: Faith, Hope, and Charity. Set in 1987—the backdrop includes the stock market crash of that year—Hope finds Samson in pursuit of his Polish brother-inlaw, George Kosinski, who has returned to Poland in search of his wife. With Charity, the saga comes up to 1988, and while it would be difficult for someone new to the Samson trilogies to jump in with this ninth book in the series, the book offers plenty of satisfaction for Deighton's veteran fans.

As the ambitiousness of the three trilogies indicates, a complicated sense of novelistic architecture supports Deighton's energetic style and disillusioned outlook. His books frequently delay revelation of method and meaning until their conclusions. As the protagonist solves whatever mystery has been confounding him, or wraps up a long and tangled investigation, the book reaches the end of an often puzzling and complex narrative structure. The complications of its subject and of its fictional development appear to blend perfectly: the construction artfully becomes an emblem of the meaning of espionage, as much as the usual anonymity of the narrator suggests something about the problem of identity in this troubled world.

Deighton's fictional and nonfictional researches into the history of World War II and his knowledge of Germany reflect some of the same concerns and interests of his espionage fiction. Like his spy novels, his war novels, Bomber and Goodbye Mickey Mouse, demonstrate his passion for authenticity along with a bittersweet attitude toward a past that is both glorious and ignoble. His generally unsuccessful Winter deals with the history of a particular family through the turmoil of two wars, economic collapse, and the rise of Nazism; characters in that novel recur in his Samson books, as if his oeuvre, in effect, constituted a single work in many volumes about some of the central events of the 20th century. Deighton has also dabbled in such odd areas of the modern landscape as fantasies of German victory in World War II (SS-GB) and a Graham Greeneish exploration of South American revolution (MAMista), which indicate an almost heroic attempt to comprehend the violence and horror of political conflict in our age.

Like le Carré again, Deighton has done much to advance our knowledge of the way spies and spying work and what they really mean in our time. For both writers the novel of espionage serves an emblematic function. It shows, all too convincingly, the sad history of treason that marks the real battle in the shadows—a spy seems always to betray one cause, one country, one person or another in order to accomplish his task. The contemporary reality of the Western world provides the necessary historical context for Deighton's writing; daily headlines indicate the truth of his fictional perceptions, and the Kafkaesque quality of international politics and modern life itself reflects the deeper truth of his books.

Because Deighton's novels invariably show the folly, imbecility, and corruption of the wealthy and privileged classes in England, they suggest something of the satiric flavor of the Angry Young Men, and his hero is somewhat of a Lucky Jim of espionage. Because they present a labyrinthine picture of undeclared war, conflicting loyalties, multiple betrayals, misuse of power, and complicated national alignments, they provide a useful image of the world we all inhabit. Their dominant emotions are those of our time—puzzlement, anxiety, cynicism, and guilt. They recognize, further, one of the major lessons of the modern English spy novel, that an entire class, long protected by its own sense of unity and privilege, has sold its birthright, as the sordid history of Burgess, Maclean, Philby, and Blunt, among others, has proved.

In his own flip, entertaining, and exciting style, Deighton treats essentially the same problem that haunts a great deal of English fiction, the timeless question of who will inherit the virtue of the nation, who will save England from itself. His works thus show some connections with books like Adam Bede, Tess of the d'Urbervilles, and Lady Chatterley's Lover, continuing in a highly unlikely form the theme of a nation and a class that, ultimately, have betrayed themselves. His work at its best indicates that the continuing vitality of the English novel itself may very well depend upon the popular and subliterary genres. As a spy novelist and simply as an author of British fiction, he deserves sympathetic reading and consideration with some of the better writers of his time.

-George Grella

DELANY, Samuel R(ay)

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 1 April 1942. Education: The Dalton School and Bronx High School of Science, both New York; City College of New York (poetry editor, Promethean), 1960, 1962–63. Family: Married the poet Marilyn Hacker in 1961 (divorced 1980); one daughter. Career: Butler Professor of English, State University of New York, Buffalo, 1975; Fellow, Center for Twentieth Century Studies, University of Wisconsin, Milwaukee, 1977; since 1988 professor of comparative literature, University of Massachusetts. Awards: Nebula award, 1966, 1967 (twice), 1969;

Hugo award, 1970. Address: Department of Comparative Literature, University of Massachusetts at Amherst, South College Bldg., Amherst, Massachusetts 01003, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Jewels of Aptor. New York, Ace, 1962; revised edition, New York, Ace, and London, Gollancz, 1968; London, Sphere, 1971; Boston, Gregg Press, 1977.

The Fall of the Towers (revised texts). New York, Ace, 1970; London, Sphere, 1971.

Captives of the Flame. New York, Ace, 1963; revised edition, as Out of the Dead City, London, Sphere, 1968; New York, Ace, 1977.

The Towers of Toron. New York, Ace, 1964; revised edition, London, Sphere, 1968.

City of a Thousand Suns. New York, Ace, 1965; revised edition, London, Sphere, 1969.

The Ballad of Beta-2. New York, Ace, 1965.

Babel-17. New York, Ace, 1966; London, Gollancz, 1967; revised edition, London, Sphere, 1969; Boston, Gregg Press, 1976.

Empire Star. New York, Ace, 1966.

The Einstein Intersection. New York, Ace, 1967; London, Gollancz, 1968.

Nova. New York, Doubleday, 1968; London, Gollancz, 1969.

The Tides of Lust. New York, Lancer, 1973; Manchester, Savoy, 1979

Dhalgren. New York, Bantam, 1975; revised edition, Boston, Gregg Press, 1977.

Triton. New York, Bantam, 1976; London, Corgi, 1977.

The Ballad of Beta-2, and Empire Star. London, Sphere, 1977.

Empire: A Visual Novel, illustrated by Howard V. Chaykin. New York, Berkley, 1978.

Nevèrÿona; or, The Tale of Signs and Cities. New York, Bantam, 1983; London, Grafton, 1989.

Stars in My Pocket Like Grains of Sand. New York, Bantam, 1984. Flight from Nevèrÿon. New York, Bantam, 1985; London, Grafton, 1989.

The Bridge of Lost Desire. New York, Arbor House, 1987.

The Straits of Messina. Seattle, Serconia Press, 1989.

Return to Nevèrÿon. London, Grafton, 1989; Hanover, New Hampshire, Wesleyan University Press, 1994.

They Fly at Ciron. Seattle, Incunabula, 1993.

The Mad Man. New York, Masquerade Books, 1994.

Hogg. Normal, Illinois, FC2, 1998.

Short Stories

Driftglass: 10 Tales of Speculative Fiction. New York, Doubleday, 1971; London, Gollancz, 1978.

Tales of Nevèrÿon. New York, Bantam, 1979; London, Grafton, 1988. Distant Stars. New York, Bantam, 1981.

The Complete Nebula-Award Winning Fiction. New York, Bantam, 1986

Atlantis: Three Tales. Hanover, New Hampshire, University Press of New England, 1995.

Other

The Jewel-Hinged Jaw: Notes on the Language of Science Fiction. Elizabethtown, New York, Dragon Press, 1977.

The American Shore: Meditations on a Tale of Science Fiction by Thomas M. Disch—''Angouleme.'' Elizabethtown, New York, Dragon Press, 1978.

Heavenly Breakfast: An Essay on the Winter of Love (memoir). New York, Bantam, 1979.

Starboard Wine: More Notes on the Language of Science Fiction. Pleasantville, New York, Dragon Press, 1984.

The Motion of Light in Water: Sex and Science Fiction Writing in the East Village 1957–1965. New York, Arbor House, 1988; with The Column at the Market's Edge, London, Paladin, 1990.

Wagner-Artaud: A Play of 19th and 20th Century Critical Fictions. New York, Ansatz Press, 1988.

Silent Interviews: On Language, Race, Sex, Science Fiction, and Some Comics. Hanover, New Hampshire, Wesleyan University Press, 1994.

Longer Views: Extended Essays. Hanover, New Hampshire, University Press of New England, 1996.

Bread and Wine: an Erotic Tale of New York City: an Autobiographical Account, Illustrated by Mia Wolff with an introduction by Alan Moore. New York, Juno Books, 1998.

Times Square Red, Times Square Blue. New York, New York University Press, 1999.

Shorter Views: Queer Thoughts and the Politics of the Paraliterary. Hanover, New Hampshire, University Press of New England, 1999.

Editor, with Marilyn Hacker, Quark 1–4. New York, Paperback Library, 4 vols., 1970–71.

Editor, Nebula Winners 13. New York, Harper, 1980.

*

Manuscript Collection: Mugar Memorial Library, Boston University.

Critical Studies: The Delany Intersection: Samuel R. Delany Considered as a Writer of Semi-Precious Words by George Edgar Slusser, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1977; Worlds Out of Words: The SF Novels of Samuel R. Delany by Douglas Barbour, Frome, Somerset, Bran's Head, 1979; Samuel R. Delany by Jane Weedman, Mercer Island, Washington, Starmont House, 1982; Samuel R. Delany by Seth McEvoy, New York, Ungar, 1983; Ash of Stars: On the Writing of Samuel R. Delany, edited by James Sallis. Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1996.

. . . .

Although Samuel R. Delany began his literary career at the age of 20 with The Jewels of Aptor, quickly followed by the Fall of the Towers trilogy and The Ballad of Beta-2, it wasn't until the prolific 1966–69 period—Empire Star, the Nebula-winning novels Babel-17 and The Einstein Intersection, the Nebula-winning story "Aye, and Gomorrah...", Nova, and the Hugo/Nebula-winning "Time Considered as a Helix of Semi-Precious Stones"—that Delany's literary power would reverberate throughout the science fiction (sf) community. It is in this early period that we can tease out the thematic threads Delany masterfully weaves throughout the corpus of his work.

Specifically, Delany is interested in the interactions among mythology, anthropology, linguistic theory, cultural history, psychology, poststructuralism, sociology, philosophy, and the quest/adventure story.

Quite often, Delany guides the reader through his complex worlds using figures of the socially outcast artist and/or criminal who, by their marginalized nature, pull at the underlying fabric of what constitutes reality. For example, Babel-17, a novel of galactic warfare, tells the story of poet Rydra Wong and her attempt to decipher communications intercepted from the Invaders by the Alliance. Wong soon discovers an unknown language and, in the process of deciphering these communications, both Wong and the reader are enlightened about the nature of language and its ability to structure reality. Of particular interest is the web, a symbol of interconnectedness and isolation suggesting that language can both constrain and structure reality.

The Einstein Intersection follows a race of aliens who, attempting to understand the post-apocalyptic Earth, take on corporeal form and immerse themselves in human myths, traditions, and archetypes. Unable to create their own culture out of the remnant world they occupy, the aliens encounter salvation in the form of "difference," embodied in the Black musician Lobey. Playing music on his murderous machete, Lobey, who is both Orpheus and Theseus, cleaves through the old myths to create the order upon which the alien civilization can thrive. The novel is a treatise on difference and explores the patterns of interaction among myths, archetypes, imagination, and the conscious mind. The Einstein Intersection is further enhanced with Delany's own diaries providing part of the novel's text.

Nova is Delany's unique take on space opera, offering readers Prometheus and the Grail legend woven into a quest for the much-valued fuel illyrion, located in the heart of a nova star. The narrative follows the Mouse, a musician playing the sensory-syrnynx, and his role in the epic struggle between, on one side, Captain Lorq Von Ray and, on the other, Prince and Ruby Red. George Slusser notes in The Delany Intersection that Delany has inverted the traditional epic by offering us a narrative wherein men do not struggle against an inhuman system so much as within an unhuman one.

Following Nova, Delany released The Tides of Lust, a non-sf pornographic novel with traits of the fantastic. Peter Nicholls writes in The Encyclopedia of Science Fiction that the sadomasochism of the novel is reminiscent of a "Baudelairean ritual of passage." This text occupies an important place in Delany's work as it was in the mid-1970s that his homosexuality became generally known; consequently, his work following Tides of Lust adds the cultural interplay of eroticism and love to his already extensive thematic interests.

From 1969 to 1973—a period that also saw Delany publish short stories, develop essays that would later appear in such studies as The Jewel-Hinged Jaw: Notes on the Language of Science Fiction, and edit four sf quarterlies—Delany put together his controversial 879page opus Dhalgren. The narrative—which some critics do not consider sf proper-follows the anonymous Kid who embarks on a series of adventures in Bellona, an orderless city resting under the double-mooned sky of a familiar U.S. setting. The novel, according to Douglas Barbour's entry in Science Fiction Writers, is symbolized in the chain the Kid receives prior to entering Bellona; namely, "it wraps in upon itself, a long, looped chain of mirrors, prisms, and lenses." Indeed, Dhalgren, like the earlier Empire Star, is both selfconscious and self-reflexive, evidenced in the novel the Kid writes which may be Dhalgren itself and, in Joycean style, the first sentence bringing an open-ended closure to the unfinished final sentence. Variously, the novel is about the tension between reality and reality models, the trials and tribulations of a writer's craft, and the representation of human lives with all their comedic, psychological, sociological, erotic, and emotional baggage.

Delany's next novel, Triton, is very much science fiction in its offering of a futuristic setting with technological advances and distinctly alien modes of relating to reality. In this novel, subtitled An Ambiguous Heterotopia, Delany explores future societies structured along sexual lines. The novel is particularly unique as the female protagonist, the former man Bron Helstrom, is an alienated character with whom the reader is not supposed to identify. Bron struggles through the course of the novel as her outdated twentieth-century misogyny rubs up against the sexual egalitarianism of Neptune's moon, Triton. In the end, Bron remains locked into herself, alienated and trapped "in social and psychological stasis," as Barbour writes. One can't help but hear Delany speaking to the persecution of women, homosexuals, and multisexuals through Triton's narrative.

The 1980s saw Delany shift tactics, infusing his science fiction with the magical scenery of sword-and-sorcery fantasy. The Nevèrÿon Series—Tales of Nevèrÿon, Nevèrÿona, Flight from Nevèrÿon, and The Bridge of Lost Desire—continues to explore Delany's multiple interests, especially the issue of slavery as it appears in both economic and erotic economies. The Nevèrÿon Series demonstrates Delany's self-reflexivity—exemplified in the appendices wherein Delany reflects on the creative process and, in the later books, makes direct references to the contemporary AIDS epidemic—as well as his profound understanding of how lives are affected by cultural shifts in reality.

For many critics, Stars in My Pocket Like Grains of Sand revealed an increasingly complex, richly textured, and smoother Samuel Delany. The narrative, involving interstellar politics set in a galactic civilization, seeks to explore large social ethical expectations, all the while offering the reader a love story, an exploration of the variety of human relationships, and the mysterious magnetism of sexual attraction. At the time of its publication, Stars in My Pocket Like Grains of Sand was intended to be a diptych, but the long-awaited sequel, The Splendor and Misery of Bodies, of Cities, although slated for a mid-1990s release, has not yet appeared.

From Harlem of the 1970s, which inspired the city wreckage of Dhalgren, through the sexual interactions in Stars in My Pocket Like Grains of Sand, inspired by New York City's sexual variety, and culminating in the echoes of the Port Authority Bus Terminal in The Nevèrÿon Series, New York looms large in Delany's writings. In the 1990s, Delany's non-fiction focuses on weaving his sexuality into the fabric of New York (especially the former porn theatres of Eighth Avenue) and exploring the face of the homeless, embodied in his partner, Dennis Rickett, who spent six years living on the streets. Delany's autobiographical reflections on New York City are the lifeblood of Bread & Wine: An Erotic Tale of New York; Heavenly Breakfast, an Essay on the Winter of Love; Atlantis: Three Tales; The Motion of Light in Water; Sex and Science Fiction Writing in the East Village, 1960–1965; and Times Square Red, Times Square Blue (Sexual Cultures).

The 1990s also saw Delany return to the fictive terrain of The Tides of Lust with a trio of novels—Equinox (a reprint of The Tides of Lust), The Mad Man and Hogg—that have been described as antipornographic. Through these texts, Delany engages both his own sexuality and depicts sexual escapades and violence in an unflinching manner, all the while calling for the valuation of sexual tolerance. As usual, Delany's theory and fiction intersect and intertwine into a complex exploration; specifically, Delany, as he notes in Silent Interviews, is interested in the relationship between eroticization and class relations and, consequently, in who benefits and loses in the act of eroticization.

Finally, the 1990s has seen a Delany renaissance, thanks in large part to Wesleyan University Press undertaking the task of reprinting Dhalgren, Trouble on Triton, and The Einstein Intersection as well as re-issuing The Nevèrÿon Series. With Delany's 1984—a collection of 56 letters and documents—and Shorter Views: Queer Thoughts & the Politics of the Paraliterary both slated for a 2000 release, Samuel Delany's impact bodes well for a new millennium of science fiction, literary criticism, pornography, historical fiction, and autobiography.

-Graham J. Murphy

DELBANCO, Nicholas Franklin

Nationality: American. Born: London, England, 27 August 1942. Education: Harvard University, B.A. 1963; Columbia University, M.A. 1966. Family: Married Elena Greenhouse in 1970; two daughters. Career: Member of Department of Language and Literature, Bennington College, Bennington, Vermont, 1966–84, writing workshop director, 1977–84; professor of English, Skidmore College, Saratoga Springs, New York, 1984–85; Robert Frost Professor of English Language and Literature, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, 1985—. Awards: National Endowment for the Arts creative writing award, 1973, 1982; National Endowment of Composers and Librettists fellowship, 1976; Guggenheim fellowship, 1980; Woodrow Wilson fellowship; Edward John Noble fellowship; New York State CAPS Award; Vermont Council of the Arts Award; Michigan Council of the Arts Award. Agent: Brandt & Brandt Literary Agents, Inc., 1501 Broadway, New York, New York 10036, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Martlet's Tale. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1966.
Grasse, 3/23/66. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1968.
Consider Sappho Burning. New York, Morrow, 1969.
News. New York, Morrow, 1970.
In the Middle Distance. New York, Morrow, 1971.
Fathering. New York, Morrow, 1973.
Small Rain. New York, Morrow, 1975.
Possession. New York, Morrow, 1977.
Sherbrookes. New York, Morrow, 1978.
Stillness. New York, Morrow, 1980.
In the Name of Mercy. New York, Warner, 1995.
Old Scores. New York, Warner, 1997.
What Remains. New York, Warner, 2000.

Short Stories

About My Table, and Other Stories. New York, Morrow, 1983. The Writer's Trade, and Other Stories. New York, Morrow, 1990.

Other

Group Portrait: Joseph Conrad, Stephen Crane, Ford Madox Ford, Henry James, and H. G. Wells (nonfiction). New York, Morrow, 1982.

The Beaux Arts Trio: A Portrait (nonfiction). New York, Morrow, 1985.

Running in Place: Scenes from the South of France (nonfiction). New York, Atlantic Monthly, 1989.

The Lost Suitcase: Reflections on the Literary Life (nonfiction). New York, Columbia University Press, 2000.

Contributor, On the Vineyard by Peter Simon. New York, Doubleday, 1980.

Editor and author of introduction, Stillness and Shadows by John Gardner. New York, Knopf, 1986.

Editor and author of introduction, Speaking of Writing: Selected Hopwood Lectures. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1990.

Editor, with Laurence Goldstein, Writers and Their Craft: Short Stories and Essays on the Narrative. Detroit, Wayne State University Press, 1991.

Editor, with Alan Cheuse, Talking Horse: Bernard Malamud on Life and Work by Bernard Malamud. New York, Columbia University Press, 1996.

Editor and author of introduction, The Writing Life: The Hopwood Lectures, Fifth Series. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 2000

Foreword, Avery Hopwood: His Life and Plays by Jack F. Sharrar. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1998.

* * *

As a novelist, Nicholas Delbanco can be considered doubly fortunate in that he has always been able to draw inspiration and sustenance from two continents and two cultures.

Of Italian and German descent, he was born in London at the height of the German Blitz, and his family did not depart for America until he was six, and he was not naturalized as an American citizen until he was eleven. It is not surprising that, though later he would anchor himself firmly in New England and particularly in Vermont, and more recently in Michigan as the Robert Frost Professor of English Language and Literature, the influence of his European origins would play a consistent part in his fiction and non-fiction alike.

The cultural ambivalence, if such it may be called, manifested itself early. At Columbia, his B.A. thesis was devoted to a joint study of Rilke and Heredia, two noteworthy wanderers, and the subject of his M.A. thesis was that tragic outcast, Malcolm Lowry. Examining the numerous novels Delbanco has published to date, one finds that only five are set exclusively in the United States and that the majority are set, either in whole or part, in Provence, Tuscany, Greece, Switzerland, or as far afield as Barbados and Mexico. Several of his non-fiction books are concerned with Europe, one of them a study of that remarkable group of literary exiles, including Conrad, Crane, and James, who lived and worked together in a small corner of England at the turn of the last century. Indeed, one of the courses Delbanco has taught over the years is specifically entitled "Exiles," and is devoted to Becket, Conrad, and Nabokov, while other courses have featured a gallery of roving and displaced novelists such as Joyce, Lawrence, Forster, Ford, Mann, Fitzgerald, and Hemingway, all of whom, like Delbanco, shuttled between one country and continent and another and drew on the experience to add richness, variety and color to their work.

In Delbanco's case, these qualities have been enhanced by a cunning employment in his fiction of the kind of classical or Old World template that one encounters, for example, in Ulysses or in Eliot. These templates, or perhaps one might better call them armatures, none of them overtly stated, have included, to take random examples, the Theban Trilogy, the Orphic Mysteries, the Synoptic Gospels, and the stories of Eloise and Abelard, Tristan and Isolde, and the Prodigal Son. Delbanco, the supremely conscious craftsman, has always been a great one for what he would term his "strategies," and the device has always lent a sense of depth and dimension to his otherwise contemporary plots. One must not, on the other hand, exaggerate the element of dépaysement in his work, or suggest that he is in any way a species of literary castaway. On the contrary, if in one sense he can be regarded in the honorable guise as an homme de lettres in the European mold, in another he must be regarded as an authentic if somewhat exotic performer—in the home-grown American manner. Since the age of eleven, after all, he has been domiciled in the United States, and therefore the cosmopolitan complexion of his work should be viewed as merely an addition to its natural elegance and polish.

We have mentioned Vermont as being one of the principal locations of his fiction. That state, where for two decades he was on the staff of Bennington College, has provided the setting for no less than five of his novels, including the magisterial Sherbrookes trilogy, which will possibly prove to be one of his greatest achievements. It was at Bennington, home to a close-knit company of writers, painters, and composers, that he conceived and brought into focus an idea that has been central to his career: the notion of the artistic community, and particularly the literary community, as a fellowship, a sodality, a guild almost in the sense of a craft guild in the mediaeval usage of the term. This conception was at the root of the notable series of Bennington Summer Writing Workshops that he founded in 1977 and presided over until 1985, when he left Vermont for Michigan. The aim of the Workshops (significant term) was to bind the band of mature writers who took part in them more closely together and to provide the students who would form the next generation of writers with an insight into the mysteries of technique. The preoccupation with technique has always been a prominent feature of Delbanco's fiction, as it was for Rilke, James, Ford, Conrad, Nabokov, and other writers who have influenced him, and as it was for John Gardner, Bernard Malamud, and other novelists who worked closely with him at Bennington and elsewhere, and for John Updike, his mentor and teacher at Columbia.

It was at Bennington that Delbanco wrote eleven books of fiction and three volumes of non-fiction, and where he developed his very personal style. How to describe this style? Delbanco's style is not at all the bald, slam-bang, in-your-face, go-for-the-jugular style common in American fiction. On the contrary, it is graceful, allusive, oblique, a cat's-cradle in which he artfully enfolds and enmeshes his characters and subjects. It is feline, the high style of the conscious craftsman. The prose is lyrical and inflected, and one may usefully indicate its general effect by noting its palpable affinities with painting and with music.

Delbanco's immediate family were intimately connected with the visual arts. His uncle Gustav was a founder of the firm of Roland, Browse and Delbanco, one of London's premier galleries. His father, a painter himself, and still exhibiting at the age of ninety, came to America to establish a branch of the gallery in New York. As a young man his son Nicholas, who had early tried his hand as a painter, recrossed the Atlantic to serve an apprenticeship in the original firm, and his wife Elena is herself an accomplished artist. Delbanco's stylistic methods have surely been affected by this lifelong link to the art of painting, both in the composition of the novels and in the meticulous laying on of color. He paints with a precise brush, not with a brash attack but with careful strokes. His characters and situations shape themselves with the subtle, suggestive, softly luminous half-light of a Chardin, say, or a Vuillard.

Similarly, the sister art of music has played a major role in Delbanco's evolution as individual and as writer. His wife is the daughter of the celebrated musician Bernard Greenhouse, for many years the cellist of the Beaux Arts Trio. Delbanco has not only devoted an entire book to an account of a European tour of the Beaux Arts Trio, but at this writing has in preparation a second book describing the fascinating history of his father-in-law's Stradivarius, the "Countess Steinlen." And again, when one considers Delbanco's style in its relationship to the art of music, it is once more a French master who springs to mind, Debussy, in the intricate play of its motifs, its deft shifts of key, and the astute handling of its dynamics.

Delbanco, in short, over a long career, has not only paid scrupulous attention to the nurturing of his own talent, but has played an exemplary role in furthering the interests of his profession. It is for these reasons that he has earned his leading position in contemporary letters and the admiration of that literary fellowship to whose service he has been committed.

-Jon Manchip White

DeLILLO, Don

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 20 November 1936. Education: Fordham University, Bronx, New York, 1954–58. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship, 1979; American Academy award, 1984; National Book award, 1985; Irish Times-Aer Lingus prize, 1989; PEN-Faulkner award for fiction, 1991; Jerusalem Prize, 1999. Agent: Wallace Literary Agency, 177 East 70th Street, New York, New York 10021, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Americana. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1971; London, Penguin, 1990.

End Zone. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1972; London, Deutsch, 1973.Great Jones Street. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1973; London, Deutsch, 1974

Ratner's Star. New York, Knopf, 1976; London, Vintage, 1991.
Players. New York, Knopf, 1977; London, Vintage, 1991.
Running Dog. New York, Knopf, 1978; London, Gollancz, 1979.
The Names. New York, Knopf, 1982; Brighton, Sussex, Harvester Press, 1983.

White Noise. New York, Viking, 1985; London, Pan, 1986; published as White Noise: Text and Criticism, edited by Mark Osteen, New York, Penguin, 1998.

Libra. New York and London, Viking, 1988.

Mao II. New York, Viking, and London, Jonathan Cape, 1991.

Underworld. New York, Scribner, 1997.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The River Jordan," in Epoch (Ithaca, New York), Winter 1960.
- "Spaghetti and Meatballs," in Epoch (Ithaca, New York), Spring 1965.
- "Take the 'A' Train," in Stories from Epoch, edited by Baxter Hathaway. Ithaca, New York, Cornell University Press, 1966.
- "Coming Sun. Mon. Tues.," in Kenyon Review (Gambier, Ohio), June 1966.
- "Baghdad Towers West," in Epoch (Ithaca, New York), Spring 1968.
- "Game Plan," in New Yorker, 27 November 1971.
- "In the Men's Room of the Sixteenth Century," in The Secret Life of Our Times, edited by Gordon Lish. New York, Doubleday, 1973.
- "The Uniforms," in Cutting Edges, edited by Jack Hicks. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1973.
- "Showdown at Great Hole," in Esquire (New York), June 1976.
- "The Network," in On the Job, edited by William O'Rourke. New York, Random House, 1977.
- "Creation," in Antaeus (New York), Spring 1979.
- "Human Moments in World War III," in Great Esquire Fiction, edited by L. Rust Hills. New York, Viking Press, 1983.
- "Walkmen," in Vanity Fair (New York), August 1984.
- "Oswald in the Lone Star State," in Esquire (New York), July 1988.
- "The Runner," in Harper's (New York), September 1988.
- "Shooting Bill Gray," in Esquire (New York), January 1991.
- "Pafko at the Wall," in Harper's (New York), October 1992.
- "Videotape," in Antaeus (Hopewell, New Jersey), Autumn 1994.

Plays

The Engineer of Moonlight, in Cornell Review (Ithaca, New York), Winter 1979.

The Day Room (produced Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1986; New York, 1987). New York, Knopf, 1987.

Valparaiso: A Play in Two Acts. New York, Scribner, 1999.

*

Critical Studies: In the Loop: Don DeLillo and the Systems Novel by Thomas LeClair, Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1988; Introducing Don DeLillo edited by Frank Lentricchia, Durham, North Carolina, and London, Duke University Press, 1991; Don DeLillo by Douglas Keesey, New York, Twayne, 1993; American Literary Naturalism and Its Twentieth-Century Transformations: Frank Norris, Ernest Hemingway, Don DeLillo by Paul Civello. Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1994; Conspiracy and Paranoia in Contemporary American Fiction: The Works of Don DeLillo and Joseph McElroy by Steffen Hantke. New York, P. Lang, 1994; White Noise: Text and

Criticism by Don DeLillo, edited by Mark Osteen. New York, Penguin Books, 1998; Critical Essays on Don DeLillo, edited by Hugh Ruppersburg and Tim Engles. New York, G.K. Hall, 2000.

* * *

Don DeLillo's novels since 1985 have turned their attention to the paradoxes and contradictions of postmodern culture. DeLillo's is the terrain of shopping malls and supermarkets, the temples of the new consumerist creed, of a market organized entirely around consumer demand, of the detritus and waste of consumerism produced by that insatiable demand. His is a world in which the mode of production associated with modernism has given way to the postmodern mode of information in which television shapes perceptions and creates its own self-referential world. As he moved into the 1990s we see that his novels become concerned with what might be called the "global postmodern," the point at which media spectacle itself becomes a world-wide phenomenon, the point at which every interstice of the international world is saturated in capital. His is a global landscape traversed by the indeterminate circulation of signs, by messages of resurgent nationalisms and religious fundamentalism, as well as the violence of international terrorism.

DeLillo is above all concerned with how the artist goes about representing this new world that, according to Frederic Jameson, exceeds the abilities of our "cognitive mapping." What is the place for the artist in a world whose multifarious representations (electronic and otherwise) exceed, in both scale and inventiveness, those of the artist? DeLillo's own sensibility was shaped in the fifties, a time when art was cast in the heroic mould, a time when literature was conceived as oppositional, flouting the conventions of taste and defying the solicitations of the market. Yet as DeLillo understands, cultural forms are no longer confined to the enclave of high art and its oppositional impulses, but permeate all aspects of society. Rather than being oppositional, art is often complicit with the new market order. Thus postmodern culture challenges the assumptions of an older modernist aesthetic. Accordingly, DeLillo's artist figures (such as Bill Gray in Mao II) find themselves searching and groping for new ways to express their artistic concerns and formulate "sneak attacks on the dominant culture" (as DeLillo puts it in Underworld). DeLillo's novels both explore the conceptual horizons of modernism—and modernism's vanishing point-but enact and embody new ways of attempting to represent what seems unrepresentable.

Although he writes on this subject in many of his earlier novels, White Noise (1985) is his most sustained exploration of the media saturation that characterizes postmodern culture. The narrator, Jack Gladney (holding, like many of DeLillo's protagonists, to older modernist notions of culture), sifts through the layers of "white noise" of contemporary culture—electronic media, printed information, traffic sounds, computer read outs—listening for significance, for a grasp of essence in the flux. But clearly the impetus of the larger culture works against Gladney's attempts to find essences, fixities, and stable identities. For television, with its "flow" and its proliferating images, represents a "peak experience" of postmodern culture. As Murray Suskind, a visiting professor at Gladney's university, explains to Gladney, television "welcomes us into the grid, the network of little buzzing dots that make up a picture patterns.... Look at the wealth of data concealed in the grid, the bright packaging, the jingles, the slice-of-life commercials, the products hurling out of darkness, the coded messages and endless repetitions, like chants, like mantras. 'Coke is it, Coke is it, Coke is it.''' Gladney may hold to notions of an authentic ground of being and authentic selfhood, but all about him the self is being saturated and colonized by media images, and the simulated environments of mall and mediascape are eclipsing the real.

Libra (1988) also reflects DeLillo's desire to explore postmodernity, with its televisional society of spectacle. For as DeLillo sees it the assassination of John F. Kennedy inaugurated the era of media spectacle, if not of a postmodern politics. For in a society increasingly filled with media representations (as was America by the early sixties), terrorism and assassination become one extreme in the logical extensions of spectacle. DeLillo depicts Lee Harvey Oswald as the first truly postmodern figure, desiring his ten minutes of media fame. Oswald is a protean figure engaged in a quest for selffashioning in terms of what the culture offers—and what the culture offers is precisely the immortality of the image. Just before his attempt on General Walker's life, Oswald directs his wife, Marina, to take a picture of him with a black shirt on, a rifle in one hand and a revolutionary pamphlet in the other. Oswald's understanding of revolutionary ideology is at best vague; what he wants is for this picture to be printed on the cover of Life and Time.

If Libra is DeLillo's attempt to trace the originary moments of postmodernity in the 1960s, Mao II marks that moment when spectacle goes global in the 1990s. The novel depicts a world where televisional catastrophes, spectral fear, pseudo events, and spectacle are an integral part of daily life. This is a new "geopolitical" arena that defies spatial coordinates. A character sitting in a revolving "designer" bar atop a skyscraper— which could be in any urban center in the world— suddenly says to the person across the table "Jesus. Where am I?" Eerie "nonplaces" like embassies and airport transit lounges populate the narrative. Along with this disorienting globalization comes an "everyday fear" fuelled by perceived dangers that come from no single isolable place but rather lurk in some unspecifiable future. Terrorism is a "x" factor in this fear blur, and terrorism is as anonymous as a natural catastrophe: postmodern death comes not in the natural course of things but upon those who are in the wrong place at the wrong time.

Terrorism becomes part of a generalized "everyday fear," however, because it is a media phenomenon. As part of the proliferation of image and spectacle, terrorism poses a "crisis of representation" insofar as its hyperreal character—and at the same time the totalizing logic of media spectacle— undermines the artist's traditional attempts at critical distance, analysis, and critical intervention. This is precisely the dilemma of Bill Gray, protagonist of the novel. As Bill Gray articulates this dilemma, terrorism presents the novelist with a "zero-sum game." "What terrorists gain, novelists, lose. The degree to which they influence mass consciousness is the extent of our decline as shapers of sensibility and thought. The danger they represent equals our own failure to be dangerous."

Feeling that the contemporary writer can no longer be an oppositional force, Bill Gray decides to confront the real world and offer himself as a hostage in exchange for a French poet being held by a revolutionary group. Ironically, as hostage, Gray finds himself part of a media exhibition of signs, part of the larger phenomenon of the loss of referent, part of the semiotic flow and exchange of signifiers in late capitalism. The hostage's very identity is ultimately absorbed into the "digital mosaic in the processing grid," the mutating set of signs of a technology of digitized global communication. Ultimately the novel asks, how can the artist be oppositional in a world where, like a Warhol silkscreen, simulations rule? How can the subversive imagination be effective when an image-saturated global network brings the single, universal story of prosperity and the global victory of the market? Even images of terrorism merge and mix with fashionable commodity images. An ad for a new soft drink, "Coke II," becomes confused in the mind of one character with a placard announcing a Maoist group because in both cases the "lettering is so intensely red."

Underworld (1997) is DeLillo's summary statement of postmodernity and its discontents. The novel encompasses the period from the early 1950s to the present. The world of DeLillo's 1950s youth, the Italian neighborhood of the Bronx, intersects with the global postmodern in the trajectory of the novel's protagonist, Nick Shay. Shay is in effect the inheritor of the legacy of America's Cold War supremacy and prosperity. Living his middle years in suburbia in the Southwest, Shay is an executive in a company that specializes in waste management. One of the forms of waste the company ''manages'' is nuclear waste.

Thus while the novel recapitulates many of the themes of DeLillo's previous novels—consumer detritus, media saturation, and the decentered world of global capitalism—Underworld introduces an issue that remained in the shadows in his earlier novels: the bomb. For it is not just that nuclear waste goes "underground" in landfills and bunker systems under mountains in Nevada. Rather, the specter of nuclear disaster is part of the "Underworld" of the social unconscious. The bomb is the "Other" of the contemporary world, the real specter that haunts the "floating zones of desire" of postmodern culture. Nick Shay is so haunted by the bomb that in middle age, when he uses sun block, he remembers Dr. Edward Teller putting suntan lotion on his face just before observing the first nuclear explosion. Nick is also haunted by the trauma of the disappearance of his father when he was a youth, yet even these traumatic memories haunt him in images that suggest collective nuclear anxieties. As a middle-aged man Nick is obsessed by a particular image, the logotype on the package of Lucky Strike cigarettes—his father's brand. A series of concentric rings circling a void at the center, the image is an uncanny reminder of ground zero.

Ultimately, Underworld takes us into the postmodern terrain of the present, where nuclear power has triumphed. In the last section of the novel, Nick Shay is sent to Russia to investigate business prospects, specifically of investing in a Russian company that specializes in nuclear energy. The Russians have developed a new process for dealing with nuclear waste: "we destroy contaminated nuclear waste by means of nuclear explosions." If waste is contamination, decay and death, it is also a "remainder," something that cannot be assimilated by the system, something intractable, a reminder of the "real." Yet here (in a way that parallels DeLillo's concern for the eclipse of the real by electronic representations and commodity signs), nuclear energy itself swallows all traces of the real. As such it is a form of postmodern production par excellence, part of a larger play of monetary entities and the total flow of financial speculation that circumscribes all aspects of culture.

DeLillo's novels have always been concerned with the limits of representation, how one represents the unrepresentable in a literary text. Indeed, one of the purposes of DeLillo's narrative in Underworld is to revisit historical anxiety and trauma, the "unspeakable" experience of the bomb, and to represent it in narrative form. DeLillo's narrative circles around the "unsayable" moments of nuclear trauma, but it also enables the unspeakable to be spoken by a narrative orchestration of events. This is, of course, part of the larger problem of the artist in the new world of the global postmodern, a problem that haunts, more than any of DeLillo's characters, Bill Gray in Mao II. To be sure the downward spiral of modernism and its subversive aesthetic DeLillo depicts in a novel like Mao II seems a truly grim topic for a writer who has aspirations, such as DeLillo clearly does, of critiquing society and interrogating culture. Yet DeLillo poses these problems precisely to indicate the need for new artistic strategies consonant with a new media age. His own novels go further than any other contemporary fiction to "cognitively map" the global postmodern. His works are comprised of "heteroglossic" narratives in which discourses clash and rebound, are decoded and recoded according to the logic of a society of information and spectacle. All this indicates an effort to understand—and thereby to critique— the semiotic and cultural dynamics of postmodernity. More than any other fiction of the contemporary period, DeLillo's novels probe the "limits of representation" of the novel and forge new ways of presenting the unpresentable.

—Leonard Wilcox

DESAI, Anita

Nationality: Indian. Born: Anita Mazumbar, Mussoorie, 24 June 1937. Education: Queen Mary's Higher Secondary School, New Delhi; Miranda House, University of Delhi, B.A. (honours) in English literature 1957. Family: Married Ashvin Desai in 1958; two sons and two daughters. Career: Since 1963 writer; Purington Professor of English, Mount Holyoke College, 1988-93; professor of writing, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1993—. Helen Cam Visiting Fellow, Girton College, Cambridge, 1986-87; Elizabeth Drew Professor, Smith College, 1987-88; Ashby Fellow, Clare Hall, Cambridge, 1989. Since 1972 member of the Sahitya Academy English Board. Awards: Royal Society of Literature Winifred Holtby prize, 1978; Sahitya Academy award, 1979; Guardian award, for children's book, 1982; Hadassah Magazine award, 1989; Tarak Nath Das award, 1989; Padma Sri award, 1989; Literary Lion Award, New York Public Library, 1993. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1978; Girton College, Cambridge, 1988; Clare Hall, Cambridge, 1991. Agent: Deborah Rogers, Rogers Coleridge and White Ltd., 20 Powis Mews, London W11 1JN, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Cry, The Peacock. Calcutta, Rupa, n.d.; London, Owen, 1963. Voices in the City. London, Owen, 1965.

Bye-Bye, Blackbird. New Delhi, Hind, and Thompson, Connecticut, InterCulture, 1971.

Where Shall We Go This Summer? New Delhi, Vikas, 1975.

Fire on the Mountain. New Delhi, Allied, London, Heinemann, and New York, Harper, 1977.

Clear Light of Day. New Delhi, Allied, London, Heinemann, and New York, Harper, 1980.

In Custody. London, Heinemann, 1984; New York, Harper, 1985.

Baumgartner's Bombay. London, Heinemann, 1988; New York, Knopf, 1989.

Journey to Ithaca. New York, Knopf, 1995.

Fasting, Feasting. London, Chatto & Windus, 1999; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 2000.

Short Stories

Games at Twilight and Other Stories. New Delhi, Allied, and London, Heinemann, 1978; New York, Harper, 1980.

Diamond Dust: Stories. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 2000.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Circus Cat, Alley Cat," in Thought (New Delhi), 1957.
- "Tea with the Maharani," in Envoy (London), 1959.
- "Grandmother," in Writers Workshop (Calcutta), 1960.
- "Mr. Bose's Private Bliss," in Envoy (London), 1961.
- "Ghost House," in Quest (Bombay), 1961.
- "Descent from the Rooftop," in Illustrated Weekly of India (Bombay), 1970.
- "Private Tuition by Mr. Bose," in Literary Review (Madison, New Jersey), Summer 1986.

Fiction (for children)

The Peacock Garden. Bombay, India Book House, 1974; London, Heinemann, 1979.

Cat on a Houseboat. Bombay, Orient Longman, 1976. The Village by the Sea. London, Heinemann, 1982.

*

Critical Studies: Anita Desai: A Study of Her Fiction by Meena Belliappa, Calcutta, Writers Workshop, 1971; The Twice-Born Fiction by Meenakshi Mukherjee, New Delhi, Arnold-Heinemann, 1972; The Novels of Mrs. Anita Desai by B.R. Rao, New Delhi, Kalyani, 1977; Anita Desai the Novelist by Madhusudan Prasad, Allahabad, New Horizon, 1981; Perspectives on Anita Desai edited by Ramesh K. Srivastava, Ghaziabad, Vimal, 1984; The Mind and Art of Anita Desai by J.P. Tripathi, Bareilly, Prakash, 1986; Stairs to the Attic: The Novels of Anita Desai by Jasbir Jain, Jaipur, Printwell 1987; The Novels of Anita Desai: A Study in Character and Conflict by Usha Bande, New Delhi, Prestige, 1988; Language and Theme in Anita Desai's Fiction by Kunj Bala Goel, Jaipur, Classic, 1989; Voice and Vision of Anita Desai by Seema Jena, New Delhi, Ashish, 1989; Virginia Woolf and Anita Desai: A Comparative Study by Asha Kanwar, New Delhi, Prestige, 1989; The Fiction of Anita Desai edited by R.K. Dhawan, New Delhi, Bahri, 1989; Symbolism in Anita Desai's Novels by Kajali Sharma, New Delhi, Abhinav, 1991; Anita Desai's Fiction: Patterns of Survival Strategies by Mrinalini Solanki, Delhi, Kanishka, 1992; Human Bonds and Bondages: The Fiction of Anita Desai and Kamala Markandaya by Usha Pathania, Delhi, Kanishka, 1992; Cultural Imperialism and the Indo-English Novel: Genre and Ideology in R.K. Narayan, Anita Desai, Kamala Markandaya, and Salman Rushdie by Fawzia Afzal-Khan, University Park, Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993; The Novels of Margaret Atwood and Anita Desai: A Comparative Study in Feminist Perspectives by Sunaina Singh. New Delhi, Creative Books, 1994; Anita Desai As an Artist: A Study in Image and Symbol by S. Indira. New Delhi, Creative Books, 1994; A Critical Study of the Novels of Anita Desai by N. R. Gopal. New Delhi, Atlantic Publishers and Distributors, 1995; Women and Society in the Novels of Anita Desai by Bidulata Choudhury. New Delhi, Creative Books, 1995; The New Woman in Indian English Fiction: A Study of Kamala Markandaya, Anita Desai, Namita Gokhale & Shobha De by Sharad Shrivastava. New Delhi, Creative Books, 1996; Six Indian Novelists: Mulk Raj Anand, Raja Rao, R. K. Narayan, Balachandran Rajan, Kamala Markandaya, Anita Desai by A. V. Suresh Kumar. New Delhi, Creative Books, 1996.

Anita Desai comments:

I have been writing, since the age of 7, as instinctively as I breathe. It is a necessity to me: I find it is in the process of writing that I am able to think, to feel, and to realize at the highest pitch. Writing is to me a process of discovering the truth—the truth that is nine-tenths of the iceberg that lies submerged beneath the one-tenth visible portion we call Reality. Writing is my way of plunging to the depths and exploring this underlying truth. All my writing is an effort to discover, to underline and convey the true significance of things. That is why, in my novels, small objects, passing moods and attitudes acquire a large importance. My novels are no reflection of Indian society, politics, or character. They are part of my private effort to seize upon the raw material of life—its shapelessness, its meaninglessness, that lack of design that drives one to despair—and to mould it and impose on it a design, a certain composition and order that pleases me as an artist and also as a human being who longs for order.

While writing my novels, I find I use certain images again and again and that, although real, they acquire the significance of symbols. I imagine each writer ends by thus revealing his own mythology, a mythology that symbolizes his private morality and philosophy. One hopes, at the end of one's career, to have made some significant statement on life—not necessarily a water-tight, hard-and-fast set of rules, but preferably an ambiguous, elastic, shifting, and kinetic one that remains always capable of further change and growth.

Next to this exploration of the underlying truth and the discovery of a private mythology and philosophy, it is style that interests me most—and by this I mean the conscious labour of uniting language and symbol, word and rhythm. Without it, language would remain a dull and pedestrian vehicle. I search for a style that will bring it to vivid, surging life. Story, action, and drama mean little to me except insofar as they emanate directly from the personalities I have chosen to write about, born of their dreams and wills. One must find a way to unite the inner and the outer rhythms, to obtain a certain integrity and to impose order on chaos.

* * *

If the male triumvirate—Mulk Raj Anand, Raja Rao, and R. K. Narayan—can be seen as the first generation of Indian writers in English, Anita Desai, who published her first novel in 1963, might usefully be described as in the vanguard of the second-generation of Indian writers in English, and—along with Kamala Markandaya and Ruth Prawer Jhabvala—among the first generation of Indian women writing in English. The daughter of a Bengali father and a German mother, her mixed background has enabled Desai to view India from something of an outsider's perspective, to see India both as Indians and as a non-Indians see it.

Desai has published novels, collections of stories, and books for young readers. In all these works, Desai has set about interpreting her country for outsiders.

The world of Desai's fiction is largely a domestic one. She is interested primarily in the lives of women in India since Independence, the lives of women in the modern Indian nation state, rather than the history or politics of the subcontinent on a more extensive scale.

Her early novels, to Where Shall We Go This Summer?, focus in various ways on the disharmony and alienation women frequently experience in marriage. And although novels like Voices in the City and Bye-Bye Blackbird in particular give the impression of being about the lives of their male characters, the focus inevitably shifts to the female characters and the limitations the patriarchal world places on them (as daughters, wives, or mothers).

Bye-Bye Blackbird, which moves out of India to look at wider postcolonial issues of displacement, is the most accomplished of Desai's early novels. Ostensibly a typical third-world immigrant novel focusing on the lives of Dev and Ajit, two Indians in Britain, and the racial discrimination with which they have to contend, it is ultimately more about the alienation Ajit's wife, Sarah, suffers in her own country following her marriage to an Indian and her changed position in relation to the (British) nation state.

Desai's exquisitely crafted fifth novel (and probably her most powerful work to date), Fire on the Mountain, brings a definite sense of politics to her hitherto essentially family-focused dramas. It is another female-centered narrative that portrays the lives of three women—the elderly Nanda Kaul, her great-granddaughter Raka, and Nanda Kaul's lifelong friend Ila Das—who one by one retreat to Carignano, a small villa in the Himalayan hill station of Kasauli, to escape the brutal patriarchal worlds in which they have each lived. Criticism of Fire on the Mountain has tended to focus on Desai's detailed study of her three female characters—particularly her presentation of Nanda Kaul—without paying sufficient attention to her attack on patriarchal oppression, which, Desai forcefully suggests in this novel, not only limits the opportunities given to women in India, but mentally and physically damages them.

In Clear Light of Day, although the fires of Partition riots burn in the background, Desai's interest is again firmly focused on the difficulties facing a woman who attempts to assert her identity within the family framework, on the relationships Bim, the central female character, has with the various members of her family. It is about the fragmentation of a family played out against the backdrop of a fracturing nation.

In Custody, in many respects a delightful and sad comedy in a Narayanish sort of vein, marks a broadening of Desai's oeuvre. The novel plots the disillusionment of Deven, a young Hindi lecturer at a college in the small town of Mirpore, and the various calamities that befall him after he is persuaded to go to Delhi to interview his hero, India's greatest living Urdu poet, Nur—only to find himself being dragged deeper and deeper into Nur's unsavory world. For all its comedy, there is a certain despair in this novel, which presents the decline of Muslim Urdu culture in the North of India in the years following Independence and Partition.

Despair of a different hue characterizes Baumgartner's Bombay. Here, through a series of flashbacks, Desai looks at the life of a now-elderly German Jew who fled to India fifty years earlier in the 1930s to escape the Nazis, and who stayed on after Independence only to be murdered in Bombay by a German youth he tried to help. It is another brilliant portrait of alienation.

Desai continues her interest in Europeans in India in Journey to Ithaca. The novel focuses on Matteo, a guru-seeking Westerner in India, his wife Sophie, and the charismatic Mother that Sophie desperately struggles to keep him from. This incursion into territory so definitively mapped by Ruth Prawer Jhabvala is Desai's least successful novel.

The various strands that can be traced through her previous nine novels are brought together in near perfect synthesis in Fasting, Feasting. In keeping with her earlier novels, there is a return to a focus on the family, and in particular the lot of women trapped in traditional family structures in a rapidly changing postcolonial world. At the same time Desai extends her interest in the West in this cleverly structured novel. Fasting, Feasting is an almost plotless novel that looks at the lives of two daughters and the son of a traditional Indian family in the modern world. The novel opens with Uma, the eldest daughter now in her forties, still at home and firmly under the authority of her parents. Through a series of flashbacks, the first part of the novel looks at how Uma came to be in this position. It is a view of a traditional Hindu family, including arranged marriages. The second part of the book shifts abruptly to the United States. If in the first part India is presented for Western eyes, in the second part the tables are effectively turned and America is viewed through Indian eyes when Arun, in the U.S. on a college scholarship, finds himself living with the Patton family during summer vacation. It is a carefully balanced novel of contrasts: between East and West; lack and excess; lack of ambition (for Uma and Melanie) and too much ambition (for Arun and Rod). It further explores the gendered condition of the nation state, both in Indian and the U.S.

Desai is undoubtedly one of the major Indian English writers of her generation. If her reputation was established on her early portraits of domestic disharmony in traditional Indian families and the suffering of women in a largely patriarchal world, her later novels demonstrate that she writes equally well about the world of men, about Indians abroad, and about Westerners in India. Above all, she demonstrates again and again how gender issues are central to politics and the nation as well as in the family.

-Ralph J. Crane

DESAI, Boman

Nationality: American. Born: Bombay, India, 4 March 1950. Education: Illinois Institute of Technology, 1969–71; Bloomsburg State College, 1971–72; University of Illinois at Chicago, B.A. 1977. Family: Married Marsha Lynne Dixon, 1972 (divorced 1976). Career: Has worked as telephone interviewer and demographics researcher. Currently, a secretary for Sears, Roebuck and Co., Chicago.

Award: Illinois Arts Council award, 1990, for "Under the Moon;" Stand Magazine award, for "A Fine Madness." Address: 567 West Stratford, No. 305, Chicago, Illinois 60657, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Memory of Elephants. London, Deutsch, 1988. David and Charles. N.p., 1990.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Blond Difference," in Debonair (Bombay), February 1986.
- "Beauty and the Beast," in Debonair (Bombay), April 1988.
- "Baby Talk," in Debonair (Bombay), April 1988.
- "A Fine Madness," in Stand, Fall 1989.
- "Underneath the Bombay Moon," in Another Chicago Magazine, 1989.

* * *

Boman Desai, who grew up in Bombay and was educated in the United States, began writing in 1976. It follows that his debut novel, The Memory of Elephants, would shuttle back and forth between Anglo and Indian worlds, neither critical nor laudatory, but clearly giving credence to the efficacy of both. Grounded in history, both panoramic and intimate, The Memory of Elephants is a visually evocative story chiefly concerned with memory—collective, personal, and perceived.

The novel's protagonist, Homi Seervai, is a brilliant Parsi from Bombay attending school in the United States. Homi has been conducting experiments on himself with a memory machine—a memoscan—that allows him to rewind to any memory he wishes to retrieve. He becomes so enamored of one particular memory that he overplays it, threatening to sever his synapses forever. As a result, he is now in a semiconscious state, without a short-term memory, and totally at the whim of an unrelenting past. Slipping in and out of time and space, Homi's memory takes him as far back as the 7th century, when the Parsis were driven from what is now Iran by the conquering Arabs. But most of his memories concern the last three generations, transporting readers into 19th-century India, England, even Scotland, and into the lives of his family's matriarchs.

The intriguing device of the memoscan is fairly inconsequential to the novel itself, although it certainly enhances the omniscience of the omniscient narrator. Homi not only remembers the past from his own perspective, he peeks into and actually participates in the perspectives of others. In this way he meets the long-dead Bapaiji, the strong-minded tomboy spurned by Navsari's most eligible bachelor and who visits Homi's memory dressed as a man, and Granny, whose happiest years were the four she spent in Cambridge and who never got beyond the single betrayal of her youth that established a lifetime of paranoia. Homi's own father returns to him in Highland regalia and attempts to teach him to dance the Scottish fling.

With these and many other familial trysts as his backdrops, the author is able to explore far deeper issues: the definition of self in a colonialized culture or, as the author puts it, "the pilgrimage to all things Anglo"; the strange contradiction of an India that is culturally chauvinistic yet submissive in its relation to England; and the freeing and fearsome aspects to being foreign, inside and outside of one's own culture.

Parsi words are interjected easily into the text without interrupting the narrative flow, and the author does a good job of explaining lingual distinctions, both quaint and exasperating. When presenting Indian perspectives on anything alien, the author is particularly adept, as when he describes a young American hippie having "a nimbus of cauliflower hair."

Especially persuasive are the passages describing Homi and his brother Rusi's struggles with cultural assimilation. Homi's observations of his host family—staid German farmers from Pennsylvania—are sympathetic and completely without condescension, even though he ultimately absorbs very little of their world.

Characters are drawn with warmth and penetrating satire. This is not a nostalgic memoir. We see these characters warts and all, and who they are is neither fixed nor immutable but changing and adaptive. Hence, the reader will often receive more than one perception of an event and, depending on the event itself, encounter different emphases and tones in much the same way that the memory functions, weeding out the things that are superfluous, selecting the things most strongly undergirded by emotion.

As the novel progresses, it becomes apparent that one memory has Homi held hostage. As he puts it, he could have "learned the password of whales" or "probed the memory of elephants." Instead, he is a cerebral slave to a single recollection—the night he lost his virginity. It is a nice touch on the author's part to suggest that it is a peculiar propensity of humans to shun the profoundly wise in favor of the emotionally and egoistically persuasive.

-Lynda Schrecengost

DESHPANDE, Shashi

Nationality: Indian. Born: Dharwad, 19 August 1938. Education: The University of Bombay, B.A. (honors) in economics 1956, diploma in journalism 1970, M.A. in English 1970; University of Mysore, Karnataka, B.L. 1959. Family: Married D.H. Deshpande in 1962; two sons. Awards: Raugammal prize, 1984; Nanjangud Tirumalamba award, for The Dark Holds No Terrors, 1989; Sahitya Academy award, 1990. Address: 409 41st Cross, Jayanagae V Block, Bangalore 560041, India.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Dark Holds No Terrors. New Delhi, Vikas, 1980. If I Die Today. New Delhi, Vikas, 1982. Roots and Shadows. Bombay, Sangam, 1983. Come Up and Be Dead. New Delhi, Vikas, 1985.

That Long Silence. London, Virago Press, 1988.
The Binding Vine. London, Virago Press, 1994.
A Matter of Time. New Delhi, Penguin Books, 1996; afterword by Ritu Menon, New York, Feminist Press, 1999.
Small Remedies. New York, Viking, 2000.

Short Stories

The Legacy and Other Stories. Calcutta, Writers Workshop, 1978. It Was Dark. Calcutta, Writers Workshop, 1986. The Miracle and Other Stories. Calcutta, Writers Workshop, 1986. It Was the Nightingale. Calcutta, Writers Workshop, 1986. The Intrusion and Other Stories. New Delhi, Penguin India, 1994.

Play

Screenplay: Drishte, 1990.

Other (for children)

A Summer Adventure. Bombay, IBH, 1978. The Hidden Treasure. Bombay, IBH, 1980. The Only Witness. Bombay, IBH, 1980. The Narayanpur Incident. Bombay, IBH, 1982.

*

Critical Studies: Indian Women Novelists, Vol. 5, Delhi, Prestige Books, 1991; The Novels of Shashi Deshpande by Sarabjit Sandhu, Delhi, Prestige Books, 1991; Man-Woman Relationship in Indian Fiction, with a Focus on Shashi Deshpande, Rajendra Awasthy, and Syed Abdul Malik by Seema Suneel. New Delhi, Prestige Books, 1995; Shashi Deshpande: A Feminist Study of Her Fiction by Mukta Atrey and Viney Kripal. New Delhi, D. K. Publishers, 1998; The Fiction of Shashi Deshpande, edited by R. S. Pathak. New Delhi, Creative Books, 1998.

Shashi Deshpande comments:

Though no writer in India can get away from the idea of social commitment or social responsibility, committed writing has always seemed to me to have dubious literary values. However, after 25 years of writing, I cannot close my eyes to the fact that my own writing comes out of a deep involvement with the society I live in, especially with women. My novels are about women trying to understand themselves, their history, their roles and their place in this society, and above all their relationships with others. To me, my novels are always explorations; each time in the process of writing, I find myself confronted by discoveries which make me rethink the ideas I started off with. In all my novels, from Roots and Shadows to The Binding Vine, I have rejected stereotypes and requestioned the myths which have so shaped the image of women, even the self-image of women, in this country. In a way, through my writing, I have tried to break the long silence of women in our country.

* * *

Shashi Deshpande's first book was The Legacy, a collection of short stories, and since then she has published dozens of stories. The authentic recreation of India, the outstanding feature of her stories, is a distinct feature of her novels also. There is nothing sensational or exotic about her India—no Maharajahs or snake charmers. She does not write about the grinding poverty of the Indian masses; she describes another kind of deprivation—emotional. The woman deprived of love, understanding, and companionship is the center of her work. She shows how traditional Indian society is biased against woman, but she recognizes that it is very often women who oppress their sisters, though their values are the result of centuries of indoctrination.

An early short story, "A Liberated Woman," is about a young woman who falls in love with a man of a different caste, and marries him in spite of parental opposition. She is intelligent and hardworking, and becomes a successful doctor, but her marriage breaks up because of her success. The Dark Holds No Terrors, Deshpande's first novel, seems to have grown out of this story. Sarita, the heroine, defies her mother to become a doctor, and defies caste restrictions by marrying the man she loves. Her husband Manu is a failure, and resents the fact that his wife is the primary breadwinner. She uses Boozie to advance her career, and this further vitiates her relationship with Manu. Sarita goes to her parental home, but she cannot escape her past so easily. She realizes that her children and her patients need her, and finally reaches a certain clarity of thought: "All right, so I'm alone. But so's everyone else."

The next novel, If I Die Today, contains elements of detective fiction. The narrator, a young college lecturer, is married to a doctor, and they live on the campus of a big medical college and hospital. The arrival of Guru, a terminal cancer patient, disturbs the lives of the doctors and their families. Old secrets are revealed, two people murdered, but the tensions in the families is resolved after the culprit is unmasked. One of the memorable characters is Mriga, a 14-year-old girl. Her father, Dr. Kulkarni, appears modern and westernized, yet he is seized by the Hindu desire for a son and heir, and never forgives Mriga for not being a son; her mother, too, is a sad, suppressed creature, too weak to give Mriga the support and love a child needs to grow up into a well balanced adult.

Roots and Shadows describes the break-up of a joint family, held together by the money and authority of an old aunt, a childless widow. When she dies, she leaves her money to the heroine, Indu, a rebel. Indu left home as a teenager to study in the big city, and is now a journalist; she has married the man of her choice. But she realizes that her freedom is illusory; she has exchanged the orthodoxy of the village home for the conventions of the "smart young set" of the city, where material well-being has to be assured by sacrificing principles, if necessary. Indu returns to the house when her great-aunt dies after more than 12 years' absence. As she attempts to take charge of her legacy, she comes to realize the strength and the resilience of the village women she had previously dismissed as weak.

Perhaps Deshpande's best work is her fifth novel, That Long Silence. The narrator Jaya, an upper-middle-class housewife with two teenage children, is forced to take stock of her life when her husband is suspected of fraud. They move into a small flat in a poorer locality of Bombay, giving up their luxurious house. The novel reveals the hollowness of modern Indian life, where success is seen as a convenient arranged marriage to an upwardly mobile husband with the children studying in "good" schools. The repetitiveness and sheer drabness of the life of a woman with material comforts is vividly represented, "the glassware that had to sparkle, the furniture and curios that had to be kept spotless and dust-free, and those clothes, God, all those never-ending piles of clothes that had to be washed and ironed, so that they could be worn and washed and ironed once again." Though she is a writer, Jaya has not achieved true selfexpression. There is something almost suffocating about the narrowness of the narrator's life. The novel contains nothing outside the narrator's narrow ambit. India's tradition and philosophy (which occupy an important place in the work of novelists like Raja Rao) have no place here. We get a glimpse of Hinduism in the numerous fasts observed by women for the well being of husbands, sons or brothers. Jaya's irritation at such sexist rituals is palpable—it is clear that she feels strongly about the ill-treatment of the girl-child in India. The only reference to India's "glorious" past is in Jaya's comment that in Sanskrit drama, the women did not speak Sanskrit—they were confined to Prakrit, a less polished language, imposing a kind of silence on them. In spite of her English education, Jaya is like the other women in the novel, such as the half-crazed Kusum, a distant relative, or Jeeja, their poor maid-servant. They are all trapped in their own self-created silence, and are incapable of breaking away from the supportive yet stifling extended family. The narrow focus of the novel results in an intensity which is almost painful. All the characters, including Mohan, Jaya's husband, are fully realized, though none of them, including the narrator Jaya, are likable.

Deshpande usually has the heroine as the narrator, and employs a kind of stream-of-consciousness technique. The narrative goes back and forth in time, so the narrator can describe events with the benefit of hindsight. It would not be correct to term her a feminist, because there is nothing doctrinaire about her fiction; she simply portrays, in depth, the meaning of being a woman in modern India. Exemplary of her worldview is A Matter of Time, her first novel published in the United States: it is the tale of a woman abandoned by a man. The woman is Sumi, who has three daughters; the man is her husband, a professor named Gopal; and her abandonment forces her to return to the family's home in Bangalore. The issues Sumi faces are not Indian problems; they are universal ones—not just the difficulties in her marriage, but the conflicts within her family as well.

-Shyamala A. Narayan

DIDION, Joan

Nationality: American. Born: Sacramento, California, 5 December 1934. Education: California Junior High School and McClatchy Senior High School, both Sacramento; University of California, Berkeley, 1952–56, B.A. in English 1956. Family: Married John Gregory Dunne, q.v., in 1964; one daughter. Career: Associate feature editor, Vogue, New York, 1956–63; moved to Los Angeles, 1964; columnist ("Points West"), with Dunne, Saturday Evening Post, Philadelphia, 1967–69, Life, New York, 1969–70, and "The Coast," Esquire, New York, 1976–77. Visiting Regents' Lecturer, University of California, Berkeley, 1975. Lives in New York. Awards: Vogue Paris prize, 1956; Bread Loaf Writers Conference fellowship, 1963; American Academy Morton Dauwen Zabel award, 1979; Edward MacDowell medal, 1996. Agent: Lynn Nesbit, Janklow and Nesbit, 589 Madison Ave., New York, New York 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Run River. New York, Obolensky, 1963; London, Cape, 1964; New York, Vintage, 1994.

Play It as It Lays. New York, Farrar Straus, 1970; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1971.

A Book of Common Prayer. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1977.

Democracy. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Chatto and Windus. 1984.

The Last Thing He Wanted. New York, Knopf, 1996.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Welfare Island Ferry," in Harper's Bazaar (New York), June 1965.
- "When Did the Music Come This Way? Children Dear, Was It Yesterday?," in Denver Quarterly, Winter 1967.
- "California Blue," in Harper's (New York), October 1976.

Plays

Screenplays: Panic in Needle Park, with John Gregory Dunne, 1971; Play It as It Lays, with John Gregory Dunne, 1972; A Star Is Born, with John Gregory Dunne and Frank Pierson, 1976; True Confessions, with John Gregory Dunne, 1981; Hills Like White Elephants, with John Gregory Dunne and Frank Pierson, 1992; Broken Trust, with John Gregory Dunne and Frank Pierson, 1995; Up Close and Personal, with John Gregory Dunne and Frank Pierson, 1995.

Other

Slouching Towards Bethlehem (essays). New York, Farrar Straus, 1968; London, Deutsch, 1969; New York, Modern Library, 2000. Telling Stories. Berkeley, California, Bancroft Library, 1978.

The White Album. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1979.

Salvador. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Chatto and Windus, 1983.

Essays and Conversations, edited by Ellen G. Friedman. Princeton, New Jersey, Ontario Review Press, 1984.

Miami. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1987; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1988.

After Henry. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1992; as Sentimental Journeys, London, Harper Collins, 1993.

*

Critical Studies: Joan Didion by Mark Royden Winchell, Boston, Twayne, 1980, revised edition, 1989; Joan Didion by Katherine Usher Henderson, New York, Ungar, 1981; The Critical Response to Joan Didion, edited By Sharon Felton. Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1994.

* * *

Though very much a California writer, Joan Didion is not provincial. She uses her immediate milieu to envision, simultaneously, the last stand of America's frontier values pushed insupportably to their limits and the manifestations of craziness and malaise which have initiated their finale. And while her novels invite a feminist critique, her understanding of sexual politics is beyond ideology. Each of her major characters struggles with a demonic nihilism which is corroding the individual, the family, and the social organism. Affluent and glib, her people endure a relatively privileged despair which may initially suggest a narrow purview. But a considerable ability to render social and physical environment broadly is saving.

In addition to dialogue which rivals Albee's, Didion's finest gifts are her talents for keeping clean of self-indulgence and for realizing a moral dimension in lives veering inevitably out of control. Certain recurring features of her work constitute leitmotifs germane to their interpretation. These include newspaper headlines, phrases from popular ballads, cinematic jargon, snakes, and the genteel Christian educations of her females. All pertain to the disintegration of an orderly past into a chaotic present, perhaps Didion's most irreducible theme.

Run River follows the eroding marriage of Everett and Lily (Knight) McClellan through 20 years. Concomitantly it chronicles the collapse of a way of life and the betrayal of the land which had given an epoch its apparent order. Ryder Channing enters the McClellans' lives when he courts Everett's sister. Though Martha never misconceives his selfishness and venality, she kills herself when Channing quits her. Lily's many unfeeling liaisons express her isolation from her husband and fatally draw her into Channing's increasingly nihilistic orbit. In his futile attachment to their Northern California ranch, Everett lives at a tangent to Lily's very genuine crises. When Everett kills Channing, it is not simply because Channing and his sleazy economic machinations are the wave of California's future, the perverse energy which turns redwoods to taco stands. Everett's suicide ends an era. But Lily's justifiable conclusion that Channing is guiltless, because he is a "papier-maché Mephistopholes," implies Didion's conviction that, however tawdry this interloper, he has only played upon a native tendency to ruin. Lily's survival implies her relatively greater, if tainted, adaptability and strength.

Play It as It Lays presents a culture beyond this metamorphosis. Consequently, it is set in Los Angeles where those tacky schemes of Ryder Channing are a fait accompli defining a whole state of being. Maria Wyeth's past is utterly disintegrated, her childhood home in Nevada having been detonated to oblivion by nuclear testing. Moribund, her marriage thins to extinction. With her brain-damaged daughter institutionalized and herself facing an abortion, Maria aimlessly drives the freeways to evade a ubiquitous dread.

Though Didion never politicizes abortion, she is morally obsessed with it. Lily and Maria endure the experience, but the treatment is fuller and more alarming here. A last straw, it pushes Maria closer to her counterpart and nemesis, BZ, another instance of modern demonic. Associated throughout with the serpent, this Hollywood Beelzebub tries with conscious nihilism to exploit Maria's drinking and sexual looseness. Maria's father, taking life as a crap game, had offered his case as a gambler and a cynic: "it goes as it lays, don't do it the hard way;" "overturning a rock [is] apt to reveal a rattlesnake." For Maria, this worldview is an affliction of passivity and anxiety, until she finally manages the small victory of rejecting BZ's invitation to join him in his successful suicide.

With A Book of Common Prayer, Didion suggests that the country is in the throes of metastasized California. So she invents an archetypal banana republic devoid of history. Boca Grande ("big mouth") yaps chamber of commerce propaganda and ingests North American residue. Charlotte Douglas, a San Francisco Pollyanna, weathers two difficult marriages: to a brilliant callous and cynical opportunist, and to a well-heeled radical lawyer. What she doesn't quite weather is the loss (à la Patty Hearst) of her daughter, Marin, "to history." Marin's situation is really very simple. She suffers from severe cases of banality and political jargon. But her new way of life tests to the limit Charlotte's too selective memory of the girl in Easter dresses. With the FBI agents who litter her house and the futility of her marriages at her back, she makes it to Boca Grande and a marginal life of good works for the suffering masses. She continues to put the best light on dark matters: stateside things like her brother's miserable existence on the old homestead in Hollister; Grande things like the Army's confiscation, for profit, of the people's cholera serum. She becomes oddly Sisyphean but holds out for the idea that we all remember what we need. Charlotte dies in the crossfire between Army and revolutionary forces, the guerilleros having decided that for once their insurrection is not going to be a State-sponsored melodrama. We come to like her and to wonder about the future of such folks as the Simbianese Liberation Army.

Democracy concerns the long and amorous liaison between Inez Victor, a politician's wife, and Jack Lovett. The latter embodies personal and social values lacking in and inconceivable to the husband, a Congressman aspiring to the presidency. Southern California recollected and contemporary Southeast Asia, particularly Kuala Lumpur, provide settings in which the fabulous quality of Boca Grande yields to realism. The novel clearly depicts American and international political life in the very fast lane, and its ruinous effect on familiar relationships. But Inez Victor's moral tenacity and practical resolve to use the past ethically distinguish her from Didion's earlier protagonists. Technically the novel is fresh, if not unique, for cinematic effects which break linear narrative; and for including a narrator named Joan Didion, who remarks the discrete functions of journalism and fiction, both provinces of great success for the real author.

With The Last Thing He Wanted, Didion's first work of fiction after 12 years of silence following Democracy, she returned to her familiar Central American/Caribbean locales and the political intrigue she had woven so successfully in previous books. The year is 1984, and the protagonist, Elena McMahon, seeks to carry out her father's dying wish: to bring in weapons, covertly supplied by the U.S. government, to the Contras fighting the Soviet-aligned Sandinista government in Nicaragua. The narrator is an unnamed figure, piecing together the story after the fact, much like the reporter who uncovered the secret biography of Citizen Kane. Hence Elena's motivation remains shadowy, yet the prose is as distinct and crisp as Didion's best.

—David M. Heaton

DIVAKARUNI, Chitra Banerjee

Nationality: Indian-American. Born: Chitra Banerjee in Calcutta, India, 29 July 1956. Education: Calcutta University, B.A. 1976; Wright State University, M.A. 1978; University of California, Berkeley, Ph.D. 1985. Family: Married S. Murthy Divakaruni in 1979; two children. Career: Professor of creative writing, Diablo Valley College, 1987–89; Foothill College, Los Altos, California, 1989—.

Awards: Memorial Award (Barbara Deming Foundation), 1989; Writing Award (Santa Clara County Arts Council), 1990; Writing Award (Gerbode Foundation), 1993; Before Columbus Foundation American Book Award; Bay Area Book Reviews Award for Fiction; PEN Oakland Josephine Miles Prize for Fiction; Allen Ginsberg Poetry Prize; Pushcart Prize. Address: Foothill College, English Department, 12345 El Monte Road, Los Altos, California 94022–4504, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Mistress of Spices. New York, Anchor Books, 1997. Sister of My Heart. New York, Doubleday, 1999.

Short Stories

Arranged Marriage: Stories. New York, Anchor Books, 1995.

Poetry

Dark Like the River. 1987.

The Reason for Nasturtiums. Berkeley Poets Press, 1990.

Black Candle: Poems about Women from India, Pakistan, and Bangladesh. Corvallis, Oregon, Calyx Books, 1991.

Leaving Yuba City: New and Selected Poems. New York, Anchor Books, 1997.

Other

Editor, Multitude: Cross-Cultural Readings for Writers. Boston, McGraw-Hill, 1993.

Editor, We, Too, Sing America: A Reader for Writers. Boston, McGraw-Hill, 1998.

* * *

Indian-American author Chitra Banerjee Divakaruni has recently published poems, short stories, and novels, all of which generally focus on similar themes: the roles of women in India and America; the struggle to adapt to new ways of life when one's cultural traditions are in conflict with new cultural expectations; and the complexities of love between family members, lovers, and spouses. Divakaruni's work is often considered to be quasi-autobiographical as most of her stories are set in California near where she lives, confront the immigrant experience—specifically, of Indians who settle in the U.S.—and evaluate the treatment of Indian-American women both in India and America. Divakaruni is also an editor of two anthologies, Multitude: Cross-Cultural Readings for Writers and We, Too, Sing America: A Reader for Writers, that include stories concerned with similar issues.

Divakaruni's volumes of poetry, Dark Like the River, The Reason for Nasturtiums, Black Candle, and Leaving Yuba City, each uniquely address images of India, the Indian-American experience, and the condition of children and women in a patriarchal society. Also exploring the relationship between art forms, Divakaruni writes poetry inspired by paintings, photographs, and films. And, as in her novels, she focuses intently in her poetry on the experiences of women pursuing identities for themselves.

Arranged Marriage, Divakaruni's collection of short stories that focus on Indian and Indian-American women caught between two conflicting cultures, seems to have developed from her poem "Arranged Marriage" in Black Candle. Both the poem and the stories are concerned with the emotions of women whose lives are affected by the Indian tradition of arranged marriages, though Arranged Marriage explores a broader scope of issues, including divorce, abortion, racism, and economic inequality. Relying heavily on techniques such as doubling and pairing, the stories expose the adverse conditions of women living in India, though the collection also suggests that life in America is as difficult as in India, and indeed perhaps more so because of the contradictory feelings immigrant women often experience as they are torn between Indian cultural expectations and American life. Arranged Marriage considers both cultures equally, critiquing and praising particular aspects of each.

The themes Divakaruni explores in her poems and short stories are developed in her novels, The Mistress of Spices and Sister of My Heart. Stylistically experimental, The Mistress of Spices combines poetic language with prose in order to, as Divakaruni suggests, "collaps[e] the divisions between the realistic world of twentieth century America and the timeless one of myth and magic in [an] attempt to create a modern fable." Tilo, Mistress's main character, is a young woman from a distant time and place whose training in the ancient craft of spices and initiation in the rite of fire allow her to become immortal and powerful. Traveling across time and space, Tilo comes to live in Oakland, California, in the form of an aged woman and establishes herself as a healer who prescribes spices as remedies for her customers. Although the novel appears to diverge thematically from the concerns in her poetry and short stories, Mistress does address similar issues, and as Tilo becomes involved in a romance that ultimately requires her to choose between two lifestyles—a supernatural immortal life and a more typical modern life—Divakaruni's themes of love, struggle, and opposing cultures become apparent.

Divakaruni's most recent novel, Sister of My Heart, is an expansion of and a variation on the short story "The Ultrasound" in Arranged Marriage. In the novel, two cousins, Anju and Sudah, who feel as though their lives are inextricably tied together, rely on each other for love, approval, and companionship. The women grow up together in the same house in Calcutta and have many similar experiences that bind them together, which leads them to feel as though they are sisters of the heart. However, when secrets regarding their births are revealed and the cousins are later physically separated because of arranged marriages, their unique relationship is tested, and the women struggle in the face of doubt and suspicion. Although one woman remains in India and the other moves to America, they experience similar traumas involving pregnancy and marriage and so come to rely on each other again for strength and support.

-Stephannie Gearhart

DIXON, Stephen

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 6 June 1936. Education: City College, New York, 1953–58, B.A. in international relations 1958. Family: Married Anne Frydman in 1982; two daughters.

Career: Worked in various jobs, including bartender, waiter, junior high school teacher, technical writer, journalist, news editor, store clerk, and tour leader, 1953–79; lecturer, New York University School of Continuing Education, 1979–80. Assistant professor, 1980–83, associate professor, 1984–88, and since 1989 professor of English, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore. Awards: Stanford University Stegner fellowship, 1964; National Endowment for the Arts grant, 1975, 1990; American Academy award, 1983; Train prize (Paris Review), 1985; Guggenheim fellowship, 1985; O. Henry prize, 1993. Address: Writing Seminars, Gilman 135, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Maryland 21218, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Work. Ann Arbor, Michigan, Street Fiction Press, 1977. Too Late. New York, Harper, 1978. Fall and Rise. Berkeley, California, North Point Press, 1985. Garbage. New York, Cane Hill Press, 1988. Interstate. New York, Henry Holt, 1995. Gould: A Novel in Two Novels. New York, Henry Holt, 1997. 30: Pieces of a Novel. New York, Henry Holt, 1999. Tisch. Los Angeles, California, Red Hen Press, 2000.

Short Stories

No Relief. Ann Arbor, Michigan, Street Fiction Press, 1976.

Quite Contrary: The Mary and Newt Story. New York, Harper, 1979.

14 Stories. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins University Press, 1980.

Movies. Berkeley, California, North Point Press, 1983.

Time to Go. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins University Press, 1984.

The Play and Other Stories. Minneapolis, Coffee House Press, 1988.

Love and Will: Twenty Stories. Latham, New York, Paris Review

All Gone: 18 Short Stories. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990.

Friends: More Will and Magna Stories. Santa Maria, California, Asylum Arts, 1990.

Frog. Latham, New York, British American, 1991.

Editions-British American, 1989.

Long Made Short. Baltimore, Maryland, Johns Hopkins University Press, 1993.

The Stories of Stephen Dixon. New York, Henry Holt, 1994.

Man on Stage: Play Stories, illustrations by the author. Davis, California, Hi Jinx Press, 1996.

Sleep: Stories. Minneapolis, Coffee House Press, 1999.

*

Manuscript Collection: Milton Eisenhower Library, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore.

Critical Studies: "Stephen Dixon: Experimental Realism," in North American Review (Cedar Falls, Iowa), March 1981, and The Self-Apparent Word, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1984, both by Jerome Klinkowitz; "Stephen Dixon Issue" of Ohio Journal (Columbus), Fall-Winter 1983–84 (includes bibliography); The Dramaturgy of Style by Michael Stephens, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1985.

Stephen Dixon comments:

(1991) I've just about nothing to say about my work, I only write fiction. I don't write book reviews or any nonfiction. In fact the only book review I've written is a story called "The Book Review," about a character writing one. The only non-fiction work I've written since 1963, when I stopped writing news, and 1968, when I stopped being a technical writer, is a piece called "Why I Don't Write Nonfiction," which proves its point and appeared in the Ohio Journal issue devoted to my work. I write novels and short stories only and I like writing both but for different reasons. Novels because they continue, stories because they end. All my novels but Fall and Rise, started off as short stories and just grew. I would rather the reader interpret what I write than I interpret it for the reader. I don't want to give my life away in a statement. Not only is my life not very interesting but sometime in the future I might use, in my own way, part of my life for my fiction and then a reader might say "That comes from his uninteresting life." Better the reader know next to nothing about my life and how I write, where I get my ideas, and so on.

Best for the reader to read my work and say for himself what to make of it. I have no way, nor do I have the means, nor do I have the inclination to simplify my work by explaining it, elucidating about it, or simply saying what I think about it. I work at one work at a time, story or novel, and when I'm done with it I begin another work. That's how I keep busy and also keep myself from thinking about my work once I finish with it.

(1995) I'm still pretty much the same. Dying to find more time to write, since I also teach fulltime and run a household. My ambition is to teach just half a year so I can devote eight months a year to my writing. I find it difficult to do all at once, but I still manage to complete 250 finished fiction pages a year. I don't know why but I still think I have something to write and a continually changing writing style to write it in.

* * *

Stephen Dixon is a master of self-generating fiction. While eschewing the flamboyantly anti-realistic experiments of authors such as Ronald Sukenick and Robert Coover, Dixon nevertheless refuses to propel his narratives on the energy of represented action. Instead, he contrives circumstances so that everything that happens within his novels grows from the initial elements of his fiction. Developing from itself, his narrative ultimately has no pertinent reference beyond itself; yet that growth is so organic that it offers all the delight expectable from a more realistically referential piece of storytelling.

Dixon's method can be traced to his way of writing sentences. Often his action will take place grammatically, as subjects have to battle their way past intransigent verbs in order to meet their objects, and as modifying phrases pop up to thwart syntactic progress. There are always modifications to everything, Dixon has learned, and his genius has been to apply this insight to the making of narratives.

His first novel, Work, finds this scheme in the workplace, as an image for both how hard it is to find employment and what a struggle it is to keep it. Hunting down a job takes his narrator fully one-third of the novel, and that turns out to be the easy part. Once he has signed on as a bartender in a New York City chain of restaurants, he has to cope with a prime ingredient of Dixon's fictionally generative world: in this case a self-contained universe of rules and relationships, which include how to mix drinks, charge for special orders, move customer traffic, scan the papers for conversation items, spot company spies, handle rush-hour jams, deal with the restaurant chain's union, thwart robberies, soothe tempers, counsel neurotics, and keep the whole mad dance of waiters, dishwashers, assistant managers, cashiers, and customers in step. And this is just three or four pages into the story. Work provides the ideal self-generating system for a Dixon novel.

Yet such a system also exists within the intimate relationship of a man and woman. Too Late borrows two favorite topics from Dixon's short stories-breaking off relationships and suffering through the endless complications of love—and rushes them through a breathless experience in the urban jungle, during which four days pass in an alternation of quick excitement and maniacal torture. The narrator's girlfriend has left him during a movie, the violence of which has sickened her. But she never arrives home, and tracing her disappearance becomes a full-time job. Not for the police, who want to brush it off as a jilting. Instead, the narrator's capabilities for worry (another self-generating machine for fiction) run through all the lurid possibilities, from abduction and rape to murder. The very worst fears are just what happen, as the ghouls who feed on sensational news rush into the narrator's life, and he himself experiences a Jekyll-and-Hyde transformation which costs him job, friends, and peace of mind. Too Late succeeds as a tangled web of disruptions and distractions, the very stuff of Dixon's fiction which is shown to be a built-in potential of city life.

Quite Contrary: The Mary and Newt Story assembles 11 related stories to form something less than a novel but much more than a story collection. Their unity, although established by subject and circumstance of action, comes from their address to the main concerns of Dixon's work: the fragility of human relationships and reality's dangerous tendency to run off into infinite digressions and qualifications. Quite Contrary treats the three-year off-and-on affair of a couple, familiar in Dixon's fiction, whose involvement breeds complications. Even their first meeting leads to a debate as to how they will leave to walk home. As their relationship develops, each finds fault: he is too demanding, she is noncommittal. Even breaking up becomes an endless complication, for if Newt tells a friend that he and Mary are "this time really through," a friend reverses his syntax to show that "Nah, you two are never really through. You're a pair: Tom and Jerry, Biff and Bang. You just tell yourselves you're through to make your sex better and your lives more mythic and poetic and to repeatedly renew those first two beatific weeks you went through." Here is Dixon's method established in the form of his sentences: the declaration that the pair (one and the other) are sundering their union leads directly to a restatement of that proposition in negative form, rebonding the relationship through a series of other conjunctions: mythic pairs, conjoined reasons, and most of all a grammatical structure which by virtue of more "ands" can string itself out indefinitely, just like their relationship which is commemorated in the final phrase.

Fall and Rise, a much longer and more ambitious novel, extends itself to its fullest fictional scope while requiring the least external circumstance. The affair which prompts it is the narrator's first sentence, "I meet her at a party." Its present tense is deliberate, for the narrator's voice moves through a constant set of possibilities to fill 245 closely-set pages with the action which devolves from just four or five hours of experience. Because so much of the narrator's action is made up of diffidence and fantasy, it has the character of fiction. In a Jamesian manner, Dixon examines every nuance, even of situations yet to transpire, and as a result the reader is caught up in the narrator's own imaginative experience. For one chapter, the narrative action is transferred to the object of these imaginative desires, and complications are amplified by having her point of view. The achievement of Dixon's work is that the smallest circumstance can expand to fill the space available, a reminder of fiction's infinite plenitude.

It is with Frog and Interstate that Dixon takes the novel form well past his standards for short stories, in both cases by contriving unique structural experiments. A massive work of 769 pages, Frog could be described as an initial collection of 14 stories followed by a novella, two additional stories, a second novella, a full-length novel, and a concluding story. All sections cover the life and times of a protagonist nicknamed "Frog," though only in the closing piece do readers learn the meritorious nature of this name. In the meantime, Frog himself is put through variations of circumstance, history, and identity, making the larger work contradictory in a close sense but universal in its ability to encompass all fictive possibilities. In character, the protagonist is much like the figures appearing in typical Dixon stories: so conscientious that he becomes worried to distraction, so earnest as to be compulsive, so anxious for everything to be right that he makes almost all things turn out hilariously wrong. Yet even more so than in a thematically organized collection, Frog gives a complete sense of this style of being, not just in itself but because of the historically improbable but imaginatively apt connections the reader is invited to draw. These same readerly connections motivate Interstate, a novel whose eight chapters retell a highway tragedy in competing forms. In the first, a father suffers when his little girl is shot and killed by a gunman in a passing car. Five subsequent versions focus on the different aspects of the tragedy, each with the hope that its effects can be mitigated, if not fully escaped. In the seventh, the killing is avoided, but at the cost of something worse. Only in the eighth and final chapter does all end well, allowing the reader to savor scenes of quiet domestic bliss that without the preceding versions would never merit fictive treatment. The protagonist is the usual Dixon type, but here pushed into literal life-or-death circumstances.

As prolific as his work has been, Dixon always has a great range of stories from which to assemble a new collection. In The Play his focus rests on narratives generated by the dynamics of interpersonal relationships. The volume's initial stories deal with a narrator leaving a relationship, while later pieces find a similarly dispositioned character dealing with other problems, more material and external, which nevertheless follow the same pattern of involved disinvolvement. Love and Will sees his characteristic protagonist more involved in the outside world, with the addition of stories told from a shared perspective, such as "Takes," in which a young woman's rape and attempted murder is considered (and worried about) by a range of bystanders who have varying amounts of information and differing degrees of involvement in her life. All Gone is Dixon's most thematically diverse yet technically unified collection in that almost every one of its 18 stories has its action derive from partial, confused, or incorrect information. Yet Dixon's writing habits often bring him back to familiar characters in typical predicaments; Will and Magna, the couple who appear in the title story of Love and Will, have a book to themselves in Friends, where their life yields a post-Beckettian sense of going on in narrative language within the very snares that language sets for us. Even though dialogue or other narrative situations threaten to trap these characters, Dixon's genius is, like Beckett, to write their way out of it with an energy which produces a sense of life in itself. The multiplicity of such life is celebrated in Long Made Short, a story collection focused on the idea of subtraction—specifically, how many elements can be withdrawn from the narrative and still let the story survive. "Man, Woman, and Boy" displays the elemental nature of this technique, as a scene that begins with a marital breakup is put through structural mechanisms of reversal, subtraction, and retraction until a more desired result is achieved—the method of Interstate in miniature.

Dixon's reputation is built on his short stories, over 300 of which have been published and 60 of which are collected in The Stories of Stephen Dixon. This large assemblage, drawing on the work of nearly four decades, shows his method in highest profile and establishes his talent for self-generative form. In "Said" he runs through the rise and fall of a relationship simply by dropping all content and running through the "he said/she said" rhythm of a fight. "Time to Go" uses fantasy to recapture the memory of a long-dead father, as an image of the old man accompanies his son and the young man's fiancee as they select wedding rings, the father forever hectoring about price and size in a voice only his son can hear. In all cases they are self-generating, perfectly made examples of fiction's ability to delight simply by its own working.

-Jerome Klinkowitz

DOCTOROW, E(dgar) L(awrence)

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 6 January 1931. Education: The Bronx High School of Science; Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio, A.B. (honors) in philosophy 1952; Columbia University, New York, 1952-53. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1953-55. Family: Married Helen Setzer in 1954; two daughters and one son. Career: Editor, New American Library, New York, 1960-64; editor-in-chief, 1964-69, and publisher, 1969, Dial Press, New York; member of the faculty, Sarah Lawrence College, Bronxville, New York, 1971-78. Adjunct professor of English, 1982-86, and since 1987 Glucksman Professor of American and English Letters, New York University. Writer-in-residence, University of California, Irvine, 1969-70; Creative Writing Fellow, Yale School of Drama, New Haven, Connecticut, 1974–75; visiting professor, University of Utah, Salt Lake City, 1975; Visiting Senior Fellow, Princeton University, New Jersey, 1980–81. Director, Authors Guild of America, and American PEN. Lives in New Rochelle, New York. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship, 1972; Creative Artists Public Service grant, 1973; National Book Critics Circle award, 1976, 1990; American Academy award, 1976; American Book award, 1986; Howells medal, 1990; PEN Faulkner award, 1990; National Humanities Medal, 1998; Commonwealth Medal, 2000. L.H.D.: Kenyon College, 1976; Brandeis University, Waltham, Massachusetts, 1989; Litt.D.: Hobart and William Smith Colleges, Geneva, New York, 1979. Member: American Academy, 1984. Agent: International Creative Management, 40 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10019, U.S.A. Address: c/o Random House Inc., 201 East 50th Street, New York, New York 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Welcome to Hard Times. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1960; as Bad Man from Bodie, London, Deutsch, 1961; published under original title, New York, Plume, 1996.

Big as Life. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1966.

The Book of Daniel. New York, Random House, 1971; London, Macmillan, 1972; New York, Plume, 1996.

Ragtime. New York, Random House, and London, Macmillan, 1975.Loon Lake. New York, Random House, and London, Macmillan, 1980.

World's Fair. New York, Random House, 1985; London, Joseph, 1986.

Billy Bathgate. New York, Random House, and London, Macmillan, 1989.

The Waterworks. London, Macmillan, 1994. City of God. New York, Random House, 2000.

Short Stories

Lives of the Poets: Six Stories and a Novella. New York, Random House, 1984; London, Joseph, 1985.

Plays

Drinks Before Dinner (produced New York, 1978). New York, Random House, 1979; London, Macmillan, 1980.

Screenplay: Daniel, 1983.

Other

American Anthem, photographs by Jean-Claude Suarès. New York, Stewart Tabori and Chang, 1982.

Eric Fischl: Scenes and Sequences: Fifty-Eight Monotypes (text by Doctorow). New York, Abrams, 1990.

Jack London, Hemingway, and the Constitution: Selected Essays, 1977–1992. New York, HarperPerennial, 1994.

*

Film Adaptations: Welcome to the Hard Times, 1967; Ragtime, 1981; Daniel from the work The Book of Daniel, 1983; Billy Bathgate, 1991.

Bibliography: E.L. Doctorow: An Annotated Bibliography by Michelle M. Tokarczyk, New York, Garland, 1988.

Critical Studies: E.L. Doctorow: Essays and Conversations edited by Richard Trenner, Princeton, New Jersey, Ontario Review Press, 1983; E.L. Doctorow by Paul Levine, London, Methuen, 1985; E.L. Doctorow by Carol C. Harter and James R. Thompson, Boston, Twayne, 1990; E.L. Doctorow by John G. Parks, New York, Continuum Press, 1991; Models of Misrepresentation: The Fiction of E.L. Doctorow by Christopher D. Morris, Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1991; Fiction as False Document: The Reception of E.L. Doctorow in the Postmodern Age by John Williams. Columbia, South Carolina, Camden House, 1996; Conversations with E.L. Doctorow, edited by Christopher D. Morris. Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1999; Critical Essays on E.L. Doctorow, edited by Ben Siegel. New York, G.K. Hall, 2000.

* * *

Towards the end of E.L. Doctorow's novella Lives of the Poets his central character is discussing the art of writing with a fellow author. "Each book," he believes, "has taken me further and further out" so that the place or idea he started out from is now no more than "a weak distant signal from the home station." The same is only partly true of Doctorow himself. His novels for the most part revisit the same themes and places, in particular the America of the 1930s. What changes and excites is that the same themes and treatments when applied to different characters portray differing aspects of the America they are living through. Inevitably Doctorow's novels are considered very political.

Almost invariably (the exception being Lives of the Poets), Doctorow's central character is either a child or adolescent or else (World's Fair) an adult writing about his childhood. The central character is always a narrator. Again almost without exception, the child or adolescent becomes displaced from his roots, and the breakdown of family structure becomes a dominant ingredient in almost every novel. Doctorow himself may not have strayed "further and further out" as his novelist has, but his characters, seldom by choice, frequently do. In the more expressly political novel, especially The Book of Daniel and Loon Lake, this is a freedom granted to the character out of economic or political circumstances. Daniel's parents have been executed as Communists, while in Loon Lake the central character Joe is an economic migrant of the Depression, uprooted and adrift. In the less overtly political novels the circumstances behind the displacement become correspondingly less social. Billy Bathgate enjoys a freedom even Huckleberry Finn might envy due mainly to a mother who has little or no grasp either on him or on the world in general. Of the full-length novels, only World's Fair differs substantially, the displacement being one of time as the narrator looks back.

In each case Doctorow is drawing a parallel between the development of his central character and the development of America during the same period. Ragtime uses real historical figures as frequent landmarks in the narrator's childhood, intertwining his development and that of America. The Book of Daniel unfolds Daniel's discovery of the circumstances of his parents' execution alongside the portrayal of America's own discovery of Communism and the way the American government reacted to it. In Loon Lake the distorted, disjointed way Joe sees the world evokes the economic turmoil that has displaced him from his home. Similarly the World's Fair is both a forthcoming excitement for a small child and a symbol of hope for better times ahead. The displacement of the central figure in each case frees that figure to be a symbol of the wider environment, a product of the times. And, arguably, in each novel the child or adolescent learns whereas the world he has been thrown into does not: Billy Bathgate's era of childhood is ending as the era of gangsters is ending. He is a good luck charm who leaves the gangsters as the charm of childhood leaves him. By leaving, Billy is seen to have learned. He survives. The gang leader does neither.

As the central character in each novel develops and grows, the language with which that character expresses the narrative develops accordingly. The Book of Daniel begins in a confused manner, non-sequiturs exemplifying how Daniel takes in only exactly what he sees. He cannot yet put anything into context or draw conclusions. Similarly Loon Lake depicts the upheaval of the 1930s with sentences which lack formal structure, even verbs. It shows a time, historically, when established structure is shaken and falling. The effect of the language is like watching debris fall after an explosion. Slowly the language settles as in both novels the characters understand more of what has been happening. As with the history depicted, patterns emerge with time. In World's Fair time has elapsed, the language is therefore coherent, the patterns are clear. Ragtime uses both techniques side by side. Some parts are written in a style which would not be out of place in a straight historical narrative. Elsewhere Doctorow uses the pauseless—breathless—sentences of Billy Bathgate. And in Billy Bathgate itself Doctorow appears to be using this device to make a further point. As a young child Billy is comical in the way he expresses himself and the adult world he comes to inhabit sees him as such. As Billy begins to come of age, and just begins to become articulate, it is the world that has laughed at him which is shown up as comical. Billy has the last laugh. The characters in these novels, in their various ways, all offer what the wide-eyed Billy Bathgate at the end of his story calls "this bazaar of life."

Exemplary of Doctorow's wide-ranging interests is City of God, a novel so broadly based it is difficult to characterize at all. Written in the form of an author's notebook for a story to be written (this fact only emerges somewhere deep within the book), the novel is on one level the tale of a love triangle, and on another a deeply metaphysical series of questions about the meaning of religion at the end of the second millennium. One of the more understandable aspects of the plot is the relationship that develops between Fr. Thomas Pemberton and two Jewish rabbis, Joshua Gruen and Sarah Blumenthal. The two happen to be husband and wife, and "Pem" (as he is called) enters their lives after he gets caught up in the mystery of how a cross stolen from an Episcopal church in New York's East Village winds up on top of a synagogue across town.

-John Herbert

DONLEAVY, J(ames) P(atrick)

Nationality: Irish. Born: Brooklyn, New York, United States, 23 April 1926; became Irish citizen 1967. Education: A preparatory school, New York; Trinity College, Dublin. Military Service: Served in the United States Naval Reserve during World War II. Family: Married 1) Valerie Heron (divorced), one son and one daughter; 2) Mary Wilson Price in 1970 (divorced), one daughter and one son. Awards: London Evening Standard award, for drama, 1961; Brandeis University Creative Arts award, 1961; American Academy award, 1975; Gold award, Houston Worldfest, 1993; Cine Golden Eagle award. Address: Levington Park, Mullingar, County Westmeath, Ireland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

- The Ginger Man. Paris, Olympia Press, and London, Spearman, 1955; New York, MacDowell Obolensky, 1958; complete edition, London, Corgi, 1963; New York, Delacorte Press, 1965.
- A Singular Man. Boston, Little Brown, 1964; London, Bodley Head, 1964.
- The Saddest Summer of Samuel S. New York, Delacorte Press, 1966; London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1967.
- The Beastly Beatitudes of Balthazar B. New York, Delacorte Press, 1968; London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1969.
- The Onion Eaters. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1971.

- A Fairy Tale of New York. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Eyre Methuen, 1973.
- The Destinies of Darcy Dancer, Gentleman. New York, Delacorte Press, 1977; London, Allen Lane, 1978.
- Schultz. New York, Delacorte Press, 1979; London, Allen Lane, 1980.
- Leila. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Allen Lane, 1983.
- DeAlfonce Tennis: The Superlative Game of Eccentric Champions: Its History, Accoutrements, Conduct, Rules and Regimen. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1984; New York, Dutton, 1985.
- Are You Listening Rabbi Löw. London, Viking, 1987; New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1988.
- That Darcy, That Dancer, That Gentleman. London, Viking, 1990; New York, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1991.
- The History of the Ginger Man. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1994.

Short Stories

Meet My Maker the Mad Molecule. Boston, Little Brown, 1964; London, Bodley Head, 1965.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "A Friend" and "In My Peach Shoes," in Queen (London), 7 April 1965.
- "Rite of Love," in Playboy (Chicago), October 1968.
- "A Fair Festivity," in Playboy (Chicago), November 1968.
- "A Small Human Being," in Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia), 16 November 1968.

Plays

- The Ginger Man, adaptation of his own novel (produced London and Dublin, 1959; New York, 1963). New York, Random House, 1961; as What They Did in Dublin, with The Ginger Man: A Play, London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1962.
- Fairy Tales of New York (produced Croydon, Surrey, 1960; London, 1961; New York, 1980). London, Penguin, and New York, Random House, 1961.
- A Singular Man, adaptation of his own novel (produced Cambridge and London, 1964; Westport, Connecticut, 1967). London, Bodley Head, 1965.
- The Plays of J.P. Donleavy (includes The Ginger Man, Fairy Tales of New York, A Singular Man, The Saddest Summer of Samuel S). New York, Delacorte Press, 1972; London, Penguin, 1974.
- The Beastly Beatitudes of Balthazar B, adaptation of his own novel (produced London, 1981; Norfolk, Virginia, 1985).

Radio Play: Helen, 1956.

Other

- The Unexpurgated Code: A Complete Manual of Survival and Manners, drawings by the author. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Wildwood House, 1975.
- Ireland: In All Her Sins and in Some of Her Graces. London, Joseph, and New York, Viking, 1986.
- A Singular Country, illustrated by Patrick Prendergast. Peterborough, Ryan, 1989; New York, Norton, 1990.

The Lady Who Liked Clean Rest Rooms: The Chronicle of One of the Strangest Stories Ever to Be Rumored About Around New York. New York, St. Martins Press, 1997.

An Author and His Image: The Collected Shorter Pieces. New York, Viking, 1997.

Wrong Information Is Being Given Out at Princeton. New York, Thomas Dunne Books, 1998.

*

Bibliography: By David W. Madden, in Bulletin of Bibliography (Westport, Connecticut), September 1982.

Critical Studies: J.P. Donleavy: The Style of His Sadness and Humor by Charles G. Masinton, Bowling Green, Ohio, Popular Press, 1975; Isolation and Protest: A Case Study of J.P. Donleavy's Fiction by R.K. Sharma, New Delhi, Ajanta, 1983.

* * *

Perhaps because of his transatlantic and multinational character, J.P. Donleavy defies easy classification and suffers from a certain critical neglect. His books blend some of the special literary qualities of all three—American, English, Irish—of his national traditions. He has a typically American zaniness, an anarchic and sometimes lunatic comic sense, mingled with an undertone of despair. He possesses an English accuracy of eye and ear for the look and sound of things, for the subtle determinants of class in appearances and accents, a Jamesian grasp of density of specification. Finally, his novels display an Irish wit, energy, and vulgarity as well as a distinctly Irish sense of brooding and melancholy. Like any Irish writer, he is inevitably compared to Joyce, but in this case the comparison is apt—his tone echoes the comic brevity and particularity of many parts of Ulysses, and his prose style often wanders into Joycean patterns.

Ever since his great success with The Ginger Man, which sometimes seems the template for almost all the later works, Donleavy has followed a sometimes distressing sameness of pattern and subject in his books. Roughly speaking, they are serio-comic picaresques that mix a close attention to verifiable reality with an increasingly outrageous sense of fantasy. Although the fantasy is always strongly sexual—and Donleavy writes about sex with refreshingly carnal gusto—it also dwells on the sensuousness, perhaps even the eroticism of all materiality. When he sinks his teeth into the dense texture of life, Donleavy imparts an almost sexual appetite to his prose, glorying in the things of this world to the virtual exclusion of all else. He writes with the same zest about such matters as gentlemen's clothing, wines, liquor, food, tobacco, women's bodies, the interior and exterior decorations of luxurious homes, all the lovingly itemized concretions that represent the good life. In his most recent novels, like Schultz and its successor, Are You Listening Rabbi Löw, Donleavy records, with no diminution in his sense of awe, the dithyrambic praise of the appetitive view of life as fully, comically, and joyously as in The Ginger Man.

Because of the basic similarity of characters, events, style, and structure in his books, they often seem initially a mere continual rewriting of the first and most famous novel. They pile, often rather randomly, episode upon outrageous episode, repeat the scenes of sex, of comic violence, of pratfalls and ridicule in the same fragmented sentences, and often appear to run out of steam rather than end. Few of his books possess a real sense of closure: the protagonist most often is left, like the Ginger Man, suspended midway between triumph and ignominy, humor and sadness, still completely himself but also touched by defeat and despair. Their constant, most powerful note is elegiac—the protagonist may continue on his crazy way but he inevitably recognizes the most final and undeniable fact of all, the fact of death. The last perception of Sebastian Dangerfield in The Ginger Man is a vision of horses: "And I said they are running out to death which is with some soul and their eyes are mad and teeth out." In The Destinies of Darcy Dancer, Gentleman and its sequels, Leila and That Darcy, That Dancer, That Gentleman, the fox hunt, which runs throughout the books, provides Dancer with the metaphors of mortality—"Till the Huntsman's blowing his long slow notes. Turn home. At end of day."

Schultz and Are Your Listening Rabbi Löw mix the perception of death with a jaunty, life-loving energy in a broader comic style than most of Donleavy's other works, as if the only solution to the perception of mortality is the relentless pursuit of physical gratification. The Jewish theatrical producer Schultz, who tries to succeed among the aristocratic sharks of London, is Donleavy's version of the Jamesian innocent American abroad. The books make their protagonist the butt of dozens of jokes but also the lovable scoundrel whose lunatic schemes somehow rescue him from his own preposterous ambitions and land him, rather shakily, on his feet. Like Darcy Dancer, he concludes his second, though perhaps not final, appearance with the achievement of a sort of stasis—rich, successful, and loved, he cruises on a yacht with a beautiful, brilliant, and mad daughter of the British aristocracy.

His latest books suggest that Donleavy may be on the one hand simultaneously running out of energy and ideas, and on the other, attempting to bring his seemingly endless episodes to completion. In both That Darcy, That Dancer, That Gentleman and Are You Listening Rabbi Löw Darcy Dancer and Schultz ultimately achieve a state of apparent repose. With Donleavy, of course, one can never be fully sure; as his character Schultz realizes, "if you can balance on top, you can not only scratch your fanny but touch the moon. But don't count on anything."

Like all good comic writers, Donleavy grounds his vision in a dark view of the world; amid all his embracing vitality lurks a perception of the desperate need for comedy. His art derives from that perception—under the fully realized surfaces of life lie fear, guilt, and the dread of death. His books quite properly partake of the three national traditions with which he has associated himself; all three converge in his mixture of solemnity and humor and in the same mixture of resolution and disintegration that so often forms his conclusions. In his comic mode Donleavy is sometimes uproariously funny, sometimes brilliantly witty, sometimes just plain silly; often touched by a surprising melancholy, hedonistically devouring life but haunted by death, his novels end, at best, in a resounding "if." You may touch the moon, but don't count on anything.

—George Grella

DOUGLAS, Ellen

Nationality: American. Born: Josephine Ayeres in Natchez, Mississippi, 7 December 1921. Education: The University of Mississippi, Jackson, B.A. 1942. Family: Married Kenneth Haxton in 1945

(divorced); three sons. Career: Writer-in-residence, Northeast Louisiana University, Monroe, 1978–82, and since 1982 University of Mississippi; visiting professor, University of Virginia, Charlottes-ville, 1984; Welty Professor, Millsaps College, Jackson, 1988. Awards: Houghton Mifflin fellowship, 1961; Mississippi Institute of Arts and Letters award, 1979; Fellowship of Southern Writers award, 1989. Agent: R.L.R. Associates, 7 West 51st Street, New York, New York 10020, U.S.A. Address: 1600 Pine Street, Jackson, Mississippi 39202, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Family's Affairs. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1961; London, Cape, 1963; Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1994.

Where the Dreams Cross. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1968.

Apostles of Light. Boston, Hougton Mifflin, 1973.

The Rock Cried Out. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1979; London, Virago Press, 1990; Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1994.

A Lifetime Burning. New York, Random House, 1982; London, Bodley Head, 1983.

Can't Quit You, Baby. New York, Atheneum, 1988; London, Virago Press, 1990.

Short Stories

Black Cloud, White Cloud. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1963.Truth: Four Stories I Am Finally Old Enough to Tell. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books of Chapel Hill, 1998.

Uncollected Short Story

"On the Lake," in Prize Stories 1963, edited by Richard Poirier. New York, Doubleday, 1963.

Other

The Magic Carpet and Other Tales. Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1987.

*

Manuscript Collection: University of Mississippi Library, Jackson.

Critical Studies: Conversations with Ellen Douglas, edited by Panthea Reid. Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 2000.

* * *

Ellen Douglas's novels, written over a period of 30 years, have consistently dealt with the South, with relationships between the individual and family, between men and women, and between blacks and whites. Never adopting a programmatic feminist stance, Douglas has nonetheless consistently made clear the difficulties faced by women in the world of Southern gentlemen and rednecks. Never adopting a stance of political activism, Douglas has also consistently stressed the close, complex, and ambiguous relationships between black and white Southern women. Throughout works notable for strong and sensitive characterizations, Douglas has created plots which test such humanistic values as love, responsibility, and respect for tradition against the impersonality, arrogant individualism, and materialism of the contemporary New South.

Her first novel, A Family's Affairs, won a Houghton Mifflin fellowship and was named one of the New York Times best novels of 1962. The novel focuses on the Anderson family during the years 1917–1948, when Kate, the family matriarch, dies at the age of 85. At the novel's center are five women: Kate, her three daughters, and a granddaughter. It is Anna through whose eyes we experience the family crises which make up the novel's plot—crises which usually result from the feckless behavior of the daughters' husbands and Kate's son. Their egocentric individualism contrasts with the women's sense of responsibility to the family and with what Anna calls at the end of the novel ''the habit of moral consciousness.''

Anna figures in one of the two novels and both of the short stories which form Black Cloud, White Cloud, Douglas's second book.

Here Douglas concentrates on the responsibilities of Southern whites to their black servants; the works attest to the complicated relationships between the races, acknowledging the guilt whites feel for their oppression of blacks and the difficulty of redeeming their relationships despite shared pasts.

Where the Dreams Cross is Douglas's weakest novel, attacking in obvious and easy ways the bigotry and greedy materialism of the New South's politicians and the empty-headed frivolity of Old and New Southern belles by contrasting those vices with the virtues of the beautiful but hard-drinking, scandalous but morally responsible heroine. Apostles of Light, however, deservedly won a nomination for the National Book award. Douglas here sensitively portrays the plight of the elderly, revealing the frustrations of her heroine, Martha, as, first, her mind and body begin to betray her, and as, eventually, her relatives begin to betray her as well. Torn between their sense of responsibility for Martha and their fear that she will become a financial burden to them, her relatives convert the old family mansion into a profitable nursing home, the ironically named Golden Age Acres. Douglas's powerful and contrasting characterizations of Martha with the home's villainous manager, who treated the elderly residents as prisoners, provide the novel's tension.

The Rock Cried Out won praise in the popular press for its portrayal of a young man's loss of innocence and for Douglas's original handling of elements of the Southern Gothic tradition. The novel chronicles the return of Alan McLaurin to Mississippi after years in Boston and his discovery that the car wreck which caused the death of his first love, Phoebe, was the result of a Ku Klux Klansman's bullet. The Klansman's confession of his crime during a 25-page monologue on the CB in his truck (which McLaurin overhears) marks a flaw in Douglas's narrative technique and strains the reader's credulity. However, McLaurin's maturation (his youthful idealism is gradually replaced by a worldly cynicism) is handled well, and Douglas portrays vividly the tensions in the South between both races and classes during the civil rights era. Here too Douglas reveals her angry sense that technology and materialism have replaced tradition values in the New South.

A Lifetime Burning takes the form of the diary of a 62-year-old English professor, Corinne, who discovers her husband George's infidelities and who writes in order to understand her own blindness, to make sense of what she had thought a "good" life with him, and to leave a record for their grown children. In the course of the six months during which Corinne keeps her diary, she first writes an absurdly comic (and perhaps false) account of George's affair with "The Toad," worries that his distaste for her aging body has motivated that affair, and eventually writes of George's affair with "The Musk-Rat," a male intern at the hospital where George practices. As critic Carol S. Minning has noted, Corinne's first diary entry makes it easier for her to accept the second, the comic anticipates the more shocking, the false anticipates the true. Throughout the novel invention anticipates confession; in dream begins reality. In Douglas's novel, as in the epistolary novels of the 18th century, Corinne writes so that she may find an order to the chaotic facts her life lacks; in her diary she seeks to illuminate the truth of human mystery, her own, her husband's, and her family's.

Douglas followed a collection of classic fairy tales, The Magic Carpet and Other Tales, with her best novel, Can't Quit You, Baby. It tells the stories of two middle-aged women, Cornelia—sheltered, privileged, white, and deaf—and her black servant, Julia or Tweet—experienced, vital, and enduring. As the women work at common household tasks in Cornelia's house, Julia's stories of her violent and poverty-ridden past awaken Cornelia's memories of crises in her own past. Julia's courage eventually helps Cornelia to survive the death of her husband, to endure her own grief, to live, and to help Julia sustain herself during a subsequent crisis. The novel also assesses the difficulties of story-telling; given the ''deafness'' of listeners such as Cornelia (or of the reader), how is a narrator such as Julia (or Douglas) to be heard? Intelligent, comic, and poignant, the novel validates the early claim of the New York Times Book Review that Douglas is ''one of the best ... American novelists.''

-David K. Jeffrey

DOUGLAS, Michael

See CRICHTON, (John) Michael

DOWSE, Dale Sara

Nationality: Australian. Born: Sara Fitch in Chicago, Illinois (immigrated to Australia in 1958, became naturalized citizen in 1972), 12 November 1938. Education: Attended University of California, Los Angeles, 1956-58; University of Sidney, B.A. 1968; attended Australian National University, 1968. Family: Married John Henry Dowse in 1958 (divorced 1977); four sons, one daughter. Career: Field editor, Thomas Nelson, Canberra, Australia, 1970-72; tutor in professional writing, Canberra College of Advanced Education; journalist, Australian Information Service, Canberra; press secretary, Federal Minister for Labor, Canberra, 1973; journalist, Australian Information Service, 1974; head of Office of Women's Affairs, Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet, Canberra, 1974-78; tutor in women's studies, Australian National University, Canberra, 1978–80; freelance writer, 1980—. Awards: Women and Politics Prize (Australian Institute of Political Science), 1982. Agent: Rosemary Creswell, P.O. Box 161, Glebe, New South Wales 2037, Australia. Address: 43 Froggatt Street, Turner, Australian Capital Territory 2601, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

West Block. Ringwood, Australia, Penguin, 1983. Silver City. Ringwood, Australia, Penguin, 1984. Schemetime. Melbourne, Australia, Penguin, 1990. Amnesty. Port Melbourne, Australia, Minerva, 1993. Sapphires. Ringwood, Australia, Penguin, 1994. Digging. New York, Penguin, 1996.

Other

Contributor, Decisions: Case Studies in Australian Public Policy, edited by Sol Encel, Peter Wilenski, and Bernard Schaffer. Longman Cheshire, 1981.

Contributor, Worth Her Salt: Women at Work in Australia, edited by Margaret Bevege, Margaret James, and Carmel Shute. Hale & Iremonger, 1982.

Contributor, Leaving School: It's Harder for Girls, edited by Sue Dyson and Tricia Szirom. Young Women's Christian Association of Australia, 1983.

Contributor, Women, Social Welfare, and the State, edited by Cora Baldock and Bettina Cass. Allen & Unwin, 1983.

Contributor, Unfinished Business: Social Justice for Women in Australia, edited by Dorothy Broom. Allen & Unwin, 1984.

Contributor, Sisterhood Is Global: The International Women's Movement Anthology, edited by Robin Morgan. Anchor Press, 1984.

Contributor, Canberra Tales (anthology). Ringwood, Australia, Penguin, 1988; reprinted as The Division of Love, 1995

*

Critical Studies: Rooms of Their Own by Jennifer Ellison. Ringwood, Australia, Penguin, 1986.

* * *

Dale Sara Dowse was born in Chicago in 1938, lived as a child in New York and then Los Angeles, and came to Australia in 1956. She settled first in Sydney but ten years later moved to the Australian capital of Canberra, where she remained for a long time. Not surprisingly, her fiction reflects her diverse background. Her first book, West Block, is less a novel than five largely self-contained stories, each devoted to one character, though with others recurring in minor roles, and a brief introductory section that links up with the ending. Thematically, what they have in common is the presentation of power at work—or in some cases not at work. Part of what the book shows—very convincingly and no doubt intentionally—is the sheer tedium that is involved in much of the exercise of bureaucratic power. The compromises, the destruction of idealism, the constant jockeying for position, the formal thrusting and parrying, take up a good deal of the book. Although it does not come to the forefront until the last section, "Cassie Down and Under," the continuing link among the stories is the concern with women's issues, with the relative helplessness of the women in a male-entrenched bureaucracy and specifically the cynical destruction of the Women's Equality Branch by a tough public servant appointed by the conservatives: Dowse was head of the Office of Women's Affairs during the early years of the conservative Fraser government in the late 1970s.

Dowse followed her first book with Silver City, a serious and ambitiously marketed attempt to translate Sophia Turkiewicz's film of that name into fiction. The title refers to a transit camp in which refugee Poles arrived to spend some time after the war. Though the story is fleshed out with a number of well-drawn characters, the protagonists are Nina Majowska, Julian Marcezewski, the man she falls in love with, and Julian's wife Anna. Although the writing is competent and holds the attention, there are some narrational problems arising from the attempt to translate film into literature. There is no central point of view, so that we are shifted quickly from the perspective of one character to another with no clear sense of a sustained and coherent position from which to view the action. This is accentuated by the rapid cutting; the cinematic cuts and ellipses work less successfully on paper than they do on screen. Apart from the personal relationships, the novel's interest lies mainly in its portrait of the reaction of "reffos" to their traumatic uprooting and relocation at the bottom of the world, and their unsympathetic treatment by Schemetime is set in 1968 and continues to display Dowse's intense interest in political radicalism. The novel employs some of the same techniques as West Block, in particular moving from one to another of a set of characters without focusing on any one story, shifting constantly in time, and moving between first and third person. The part-time narrator, Frank Banner, is an Australian director who goes to Hollywood to try and make a film. His story is interwoven with a number of others: the Austrian director Mannheim Zuchter whom Frank tries to interest in his film; a lawyer and actor's agent Nathan Leventhal; a black singer named Paula Jackson; Nathan's wife Susan, who leaves him and who finally becomes the most important and interesting character. There are some fine scenes in Schemetime but the array of techniques that Dowse borrows from the cinema she writes about tends to be distracting and finally bewildering more than anything else.

Sapphires is one of Dowse's most interesting and attractive works. Again a loosely related collection of stories, it tells the story—or stories—of the Kozminsky family over four generations. Dowse has gone back deeply into her Jewish origins: "Safar, to count, related to our word sapphire and the Kabalah's sephiroth, also derived from the Hebrew 'sappur,' said to be the substance of God's throne." The opening chapter offers a moral about the art of telling stories: "'A story is not only a story,' my grandmother said. 'A story that is only a story is, at best, a parable, with a moral that is easy to grasp. Everyone feels happy with a parable. But a story that is more than a story, my child, is a text." What follows is a number of "texts," dealing with the successive generations of the family but especially the women. They range in place from Omaha, where Lev Kozminsky is finally joined by his reluctant wife Ruchel in 1898 as refugees from the Russian pogroms, to Chicago, where their granddaughter Bernice moves to work as an actress, to New York and finally to Sydney where Bernice's daughter Evelyn emigrates and marries a Rugby player named Paul Hazelwood. The women of the family are both its strength and length of continuity, symbolized in the Fibonacci sequence the novel refers to several times, which suggests the women are the sum of both themselves and the mothers who had preceded them. The loose structure allows Dowse to range widely in time and place to offer finally a kind of coherent and inclusive account of many kinds of Jewishry over the last one hundred years. It is a tender but unsentimental book, filled with unexpected insights and charity.

Digging begins with the appearance of the ghost of a dog named Carly, who had died twelve years ago. The first three chapters go back into the history of the dog, how she came to be with her owner and how she lost her. Carly gets lost and is eventually found again and then at the beginning of chapter 4 the author/narrator says, "I suppose the time has come to tell you how the baby got sick and what may be of even greater interest, how the baby came to be." What follows is a fairly conventional account of a failed relationship with an academic archaeologist—another kind of "digging," which is the central motif of the book. The novel deals with events that occurred twelve years before but is set even further back in the early 1970s. There are carefully unspecific but nevertheless unmistakable references to Canberra and to the decline of the Whitlam Labor government, which remains a crucial period in Dowse's life. There is a slowly growing sense of the narrator as embryonic writer; her notebooks become increasingly more important to her. The third part of the novel returns us to Carly and her eventual death, extremely painful to her, but the narrative of the dog is never quite integrated into those of the woman's relations with the child and with the child's coldly distant father. There is also a curious reticence about many things. The man is identified only as X, just as a female friend is L and a male friend from the narrator's workplace is H, perhaps a spurious attempt to convey some kind of universality.

Dowse, who now lives in Canada, also has one of seven stories in a collection originally titled Canberra Tales, reprinted in 1995 as The Division of Love. She has mastered a form which lies somewhere between the short story and the novel, what the Australian writer Frank Moorhouse calls "discontinuous narratives."

-Laurie Clancy

DOYLE, Roddy

Nationality: Irish. Born: Dublin, 1958. Family: Married; two sons. Career: Since 1980 teacher of English and geography, Greendale Community School, Kilbarrack, Dublin. Award: Booker prize, 1993, for Paddy Clarke Ha Ha Ha.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Barrytown Trilogy. London, Secker and Warburg, 1992.

The Commitments, Dublin, King Farouk, 1987; London, Heinemann, 1988; New York, Vintage, 1989.

The Snapper. London, Secker and Warburg, 1990; New York, Penguin, 1992.

The Van. London, Secker and Warburg, 1991; New York, Viking, 1992.

Paddy Clarke Ha Ha Ha. London, Secker and Warburg, 1993.

The Woman Who Walked into Doors. New York, Viking, 1996.

Finbar's Hotel (serial novel, with others), devised and edited by Dermot Bolger. London, Picador, 1997.

A Star Called Henry. New York, Viking, 1999.

Not Just for Christmas (for children). Dublin, New Island Books, 1999.

The Giggler Treatment. New York, Arthur A. Levine Books, 2000.

Plays

War. Dublin, Passion Machine, 1989.

Brownbread. London, Secker and Warburg, 1992; published with War as Brownbread and War, New York, Penguin Books, 1994.

Screenplays: The Commitments, an adaptation of his own novel, 1991; The Snapper, an adaptation of his own novel, 1993; The Van, Fox Searchlight, 1996.

*

Film Adaptations: The Commitments, 1991; The Snapper, 1993; The Van, 1996.

* * *

Roddy Doyle's novels have fundamentally changed the possibilities open to any fictional representation of Ireland in the late twentieth century and early twenty first. Where Joyce had demolished the myth of rural Ireland as the only fit subject for "high" Irish literature by making Dublin the context for his fiction, Doyle has made Dublin the subject for a literature that questioningly straddles the boundaries between "high" and "popular," even deliberately "low," culture. Doyle's writing uses the urban in place of Joyce's sometimes-urbane Dublin. Doyle's novels are set outside the literary confines of central Dublin, among the post-war housing estates and the disenfranchised population; with his most recent novel he moves the style and simple assurance of his earlier work into the relatively surprising and unpopular genre of the Irish historical novel.

These two aspects of Doyle's work, his courting of the "popular" and the specific setting for his novels, have been apparent since his first work The Commitments (1987). Tracing the short lifespan of a soul group in "Barrytown," The Commitments self-consciously makes an iconic use of popular cultures and watches their mutation, examines their applicability, in the context of contemporary urban Ireland. The early comments in the novel "The Irish are the niggers of Europe ... An' the northside Dubliners are the niggers of Dublin' need some sceptical scrutiny for their cultural resonance, but they undeniably enforce the continual assertion that Doyle's novels make: that Ireland cannot contemporarily be considered in a pre-1950s separatist mode. The terms of cultural reference in The Commitments are necessarily delimited by its subject matter (usually American soul music), but the hybrid "Dublin soul" that is briefly born in the narrative points the way forward in Doyle's fiction to a continual, and politicized, prioritization of all elements of lived culture over the strictures of readily available "literary" tropes. One influential model for the novel is the movie The Blues Brothers, which is referred to in the text, and which in turn became the model for Alan Parker's film version of The Commitments (1991)—that the novel was so readily convertible into cinematic media testifies to its cultural influences and how they have structured Doyle's writing, which certainly owes more to film and television than it does to a "tradition" of "great" Irish writing.

The progression of Doyle's novels through The Commitments, The Snapper, The Van, and Paddy Clarke Ha Ha Ha might almost represent a strategy that captivates an audience before delivering a message. If The Commitments contained populism as well as the popular, the succeeding novels have become increasingly hard-edged and interested in ever more troubling and difficult issues. The Snapper (1990) traces characters from the Rabbitte family (central to The Commitments and The Van also) through a teenage pregnancy—in Catholic Ireland; with contraception still having problematic connotations and abortion illegal, this is difficult enough in itself. But Doyle chooses to focus his text through Jimmy Rabbitte, Sr., thus filtering social issues with feminist/gender issues attached through an almost archetypal (but challenged) male ego. Doyle's dialogue-driven style, in his use of slang, dialect, and dialogue, remains relatively constant across The Commitments and The Snapper, and thus his readers feel themselves to be back in the groove of the first novel. However, where The Commitments narrates a temporary escape from pressing economic and social problems, The Snapper is able to confront those issues; the recognizable stylistics of humor and place retain their potentially comforting familiarity, but the subject matter increasingly politicizes what Doyle writes.

The Van (1991) moves on, in both accomplishment and content, from The Snapper. Like the novels of his Scottish contemporary James Kelman, Doyle's The Van is comfortable when almost narrativeless-indeed the same social context (unemployment) forces characters in the novels of both writers into periods of apparently unhealthy stasis. Doyle again makes Jimmy Sr., and his type of masculinity, central to his fiction, and traces the social and psychological effects of unemployment. The Van of the title is a chip van bought by Jimmy's similarly out-of-work friend, Bimbo, and in which Jimmy begins to work. The strains on male relationships and friendships become clear when the ownership of the business venture becomes an issue. The old structures of working-class male bonding are overthrown by economic circumstances that hint at the "enterprise culture's" intrusion into the Irish economy. And again Doyle uses popular culture, in this case Ireland's national soccer team, as a constant explanatory background for the sense of community and its breakdown that the novel hints at.

Paddy Clarke Ha Ha Ha (1993) is in many ways the most complex and rewarding of Doyle's novels. It steps back slightly from the overlapping but progressing narrative of what is now called the Barrytown Trilogy and looks to the formation of the communities on Dublin's housing estates in the 1950s and early 1960s. Paddy Clarke's childhood is concurrent with these social developments—their influence is mixed with his peculiar and carefully documented range of reading and the cruelties (inflicted and received) of childhood in a novel that builds with painstaking care towards an examination of the effects of marital breakdown on a child. Paddy Clark showed that Doyle was able to write novels that are political in the way that singing soul music in Dublin is, as Jimmy Jar says in The Commitments, "real politics." With The Woman Who Walked into Doors (1996), Doyle put these "politics" to the test; having successfully narrated from the perspective of boyhood in Paddy Clarke, Doyle's narrator in The Woman Who Walked into Doors, Paula, presents an even greater challenge to the author's abilities and the reader's credulity. Paula's story tells of her experiences on the borders of poverty and of marital decline, including the constant experience of male domestic violence. Doyle's own voice is remarkably unobtrusive as Paula's story is told. The novel's focus is not on the sensational or the dramatic but on the heroic nature of everyday life under duress. Paula finally breaks out in her own way and finds her own voice, and Doyle's method and empathy are subtle enough to be able to register these changes too.

As if a process had reached its end with The Woman Who Walked into Doors, Doyle's A Star Called Henry (1999) sets out on a trilogy that explores Irish history, centering in this case around the Easter Rising of 1916 and the events that eventually lead to Ireland's independence. While such formative national moments had been briefly referred to earlier in his work (most humorously perhaps in Paddy Clarke, in which the boy narrator fraudulently claims a lineage with Thomas Clarke, one of the rebellion's leaders), A Star Called Henry is a disjunctive move in the trajectory of Doyle's writing. Despite critical acclaim for the novel, it remains for the rest of the trilogy to prove the value of the new direction Doyle has taken.

-Colin Graham

DRABBLE, Margaret

Nationality: British. Born: Sheffield, Yorkshire, 5 June 1939; sister of A.S. Byatt, Education: Mount School, York; Newnham College, Cambridge, B.A. (honours) 1960. Family: Married 1) Clive Swift in 1960 (divorced 1975), two sons and one daughter; 2) the writer Michael Holroyd in 1982. Career: Deputy chair, 1978–80, and chair, 1980–82, National Book League. Awards: Rhys Memorial prize, 1966; James Tait Black Memorial prize, 1968; American Academy E.M. Forster award, 1973. D.Litt: University of Sheffield, 1976; University of Keele, Staffordshire, 1988; University of Bradford, Yorkshire, 1988; University of East Anglia, 1994; University of York, 1995. C.B.E. (Commander, Order of the British Empire), 1980. Agent: Peters Fraser and Dunlop, Drury House 34–43, Russell Street, London WC2B 5HA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Summer Bird-Cage. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1962; New York, Morrow, 1964.

The Garrick Year. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1964; New York, Morrow, 1965.

The Millstone. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1965; New York, Morrow, 1966; as Thank You All Very Much, New York, New American Library, 1969; published under original title, San Diego, Harcourt Brace, 1998.

Jerusalem the Golden. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Morrow, 1967.

The Waterfall. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Knopf, 1969.

The Needle's Eye. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Knopf, 1972.

The Realms of Gold. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Knopf, 1975.

The Ice Age. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Knopf, 1977.

The Middle Ground. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Knopf, 1980.

The Radiant Way. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Knopf, 1987.

A Natural Curiosity. London and New York, Viking, 1989.

The Gates of Ivory. London and New York, Viking, 1991.

The Witch of Exmoor. London and New York, Viking, 1996.

Short Stories

Hassan's Tower. Los Angeles, Sylvester and Orphanos, 1980.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "A Voyage to Cytherea," in Mademoiselle (New York), December 1967.
- "The Reunion," in Winter's Tales 14, edited by Kevin Crossley-Holland. London, Macmillan, and New York, St. Martin's Press, 1968.
- "The Gifts of War," in Winter's Tales 16, edited by A.D. Maclean. London, Macmillan, 1970; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1971.
- "Crossing the Alps," in Mademoiselle (New York), February 1971.
- "A Day in the Life of a Smiling Woman," in In the Looking Glass, edited by Nancy Dean and Myra Stark. New York, Putnam, 1977.
- "A Success Story," in Fine Lines, edited by Ruth Sullivan. New York, Scribner, 1981.
- "The Dying Year," in Harper's (New York), July 1987.

Plays

Bird of Paradise (produced London, 1969).

Screenplays: Isadora, with Melvyn Bragg and Clive Exton, 1969; A Touch of Love (Thank You All Very Much), 1969.

Television Play: Laura, 1964.

Other

Wadsworth. London, Evans, 1966; New York, Arco, 1969.

Virginia Woolf: A Personal Debt. New York, Aloe, 1973.

Arnold Bennett: A Biography. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Knopf, 1974.

For Queen and Country: Britain in the Victorian Age (for children). London, Deutsch, 1978; New York, Seabury Press, 1979.

A Writer's Britain: Landscape in Literature. London, Thames and Hudson, and New York, Knopf, 1979.

Wordsworth's Butter Knife: An Essay. Northampton, Massachusetts, Catawba Press, 1980.

The Tradition of Women's Fiction: Lectures in Japan, edited by Yukako Suga. Tokyo, Oxford University Press, 1985.

Case for Equality. London, Fabian Society, 1988.

Stratford Revisited: A Legacy of the Sixties. Shipston-on-Stour, Warwickshire, Celandine Press, 1989.

Safe as Houses: An Examination of Home Ownership and Mortgage Tax Relief. London, Chatto and Windus, 1990.

Angus Wilson: A Biography. London, Secker and Warburg, 1995; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1996.

Editor, with B.S. Johnson, London Consequences (a group novel). London, Greater London Arts Association, 1972.

Editor, Lady Susan, The Watsons, Sanditon, by Jane Austen. London, Penguin, 1974.

Editor, The Genius of Thomas Hardy. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Knopf, 1976.

Editor, with Charles Osborne, New Stories 1. London, Arts Council, 1976.

Editor, The Oxford Companion to English Literature. Oxford and New York, Oxford University Press, 1985; concise edition, edited with Jenny Stringer, 1987; revised edition, 1995; revised edition, 1996; 5th edition, 1998.

Editor, Twentieth Century Classics. London, Book Trust, 1986.

*

Bibliography: Margaret Drabble: An Annotated Bibliography by Joan Garrett Packer, New York, Garland, 1988.

Manuscript Collections: Boston University; University of Tulsa, Oklahoma.

Critical Studies: Margaret Drabble: Puritanism and Permissiveness by Valerie Grosvenor Myer, London, Vision Press, 1974; Boulder-Pushers: Women in the Fiction of Margaret Drabble, Doris Lessing, and Iris Murdoch by Carol Seiler-Franklin, Bern, Switzerland, Lang, 1979; The Novels of Margaret Drabble: Equivocal Figures by Ellen Cronan Rose, London, Macmillan, 1980, and Critical Essays on Margaret Drabble (includes bibliography by J.S. Korenman) edited by Rose, Boston, Hall, 1985; Margaret Drabble: Golden Realms edited by Dorey Schmidt and Jan Seale, Edinburg, University of Texas-Pan American Press, 1982; Margaret Drabble: Existing Within Structures by Mary Hurley Moran, Carbondale, Southern Illinois University Press, 1983; Guilt and Glory: Studies in Margaret Drabble's Novels 1963-1980 by Susanna Roxman, Stockholm, Almquist & Wiksell, 1984; Margaret Drabble by Joanne V. Creighton, London, Methuen, 1985; The Intertextuality of Fate: A Study of Margaret Drabble by John Hannay, 1986; Margaret Drabble by Lynn Veach Sadler, Boston, Twayne, 1986; Margaret Drabble: Symbolic Moralist by Nora Foster Stovel, San Bernardino, California, Borgo Press, 1989; The In-Between of Writing, Experience and Experiment in Drabble, Duras, and Arendt by Eleanor Honig Skoller. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1993; The Novels of Margaret Drabble: This Freudian Family Nexus by Nicole Suzanne Bokat. New York, Peter Lang, 1998; Woman's Space: The Mosaic World of Margaret Drabble and Nayantara Sahgal by Sree Rashmi Talwar. New Delhi, India, Creative Books, 1997; British Women Writing Fiction, edited by Abby H. P. Werlock. Tuscaloosa, University of Alabama Press, 2000.

Margaret Drabble comments:

(1986) In this space I originally wrote that my books were mainly concerned with "privilege, justice and salvation," and that they were not directly concerned with feminism "because my belief in justice for women is so basic that I never think of using it as a subject. It is part of a whole." I stand by this, although the rising political consciousness of women has brought the subject more to the forefront in one or two of the later novels. I now see myself perhaps more as a social historian documenting social change and asking questions rather than providing answers about society: but my preoccupation with "equality and egalitarianism" remains equally obsessional and equally worrying to me, and if anything I am even less hopeful about the prospect of change.

* * *

With the appearance of her first novels in the early 1960s, Margaret Drabble gained a sizeable audience who felt their own discoveries and dilemmas in the contemporary world depicted with intelligence and immediacy. A Summer Bird-Cage presents a young woman, just after graduation from Oxford, alternately drawn to and repelled by her older sister, seen as brilliant and attractive, who marries a rich novelist. The marriage is ultimately hollow, and the young protagonist uses her recognition of this, as well as that of the marriage, affairs, and occupations of friends, to sort out her own approach to mature experience. The protagonist of The Garrick Year is more intimately involved. Married to an actor in a company playing in a provincial town, she falls in love with the producer and finally is able to draw away from the thickets of staged infidelities in her realization of her responsibility for her child. Moral issues, increasingly, become part of the protagonists' examinations of experience, as in The Millstone, in which a young academic, initially feeling "free" of the inhibitions of sexual morality and class, and, accidentally pregnant after a one-night stand, recognizes after the baby's birth that her concerns make her dependent on others, on community, and Jerusalem the Golden, in which a young graduate from the North, attracted to the cosmopolitan life represented by a London family, must sort out her own allegiances and responses to issues of love and class. Although The Waterfall is more internal, more exclusively concerned with the isolating emotions the protagonist feels in her affair with her cousin's husband, this novel, like the other early ones, reflects directly many of the problems concerning freedom, responsibility, sexual behavior, families, occupation, class, and geography confronted by young women in contemporary Britain.

Drabble's protagonists are invariably intelligent and literary, trying seriously (although not solemnly) to relate what they experience to what they've read. Often they define themselves, either positively or negatively, as characters within the fictions of the 19th-century middle classes, the heroines in George Eliot's world confronting moral dilemmas, or those in Hardy's measuring themselves in the metaphorical terms of landscape. The Waterfall rings changes on Jane Austen plots and attitudes: the protagonist in The Millstone superimposes Bunyan's allegorical geography on the dark streets of contemporary London. The frequency and the importance of the references indicate that Drabble has always seen herself as part of an English literary tradition, a consciousness of defining the self through fiction.

In Drabble's later novels, the consciousness and function of fiction change. Points of view are deliberately interrupted, fictionality is overtly proclaimed and manipulated, sometimes comically and sometimes not. Drabble relies on questions in literary criticism over the past 20 years as well as on the tradition of English literature. Library reference is likely to be more general and pervasive, as in the epigraph of The Ice Age which quotes Milton's Areopagetica about "the puissant Nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep" to illustrate the possibility of British "recovery" from a debilitating period, or the literary party, explicitly connected to the one in Virginia Woolf's Mrs. Dalloway, which concludes The Middle Ground. The frame of moral reference in the later novels is much wider, more international or more a statement concerning the condition of England, and the novels are more amenable to metaphorical readings. The Needle's Eye establishes various gardens in unlikely places, the London slums, the North, and in Africa, gardens that are conscious devices to preserve and nourish the human spirit. The Realms of Gold depicts an archeologist who collects both the shards of a public past in excavations in Africa and those of the private past of her family amidst the local and class deprivations of East Anglia, trying to combine the implications of all the relics into a fuller public and private life. The Ice Age focuses on the depression, sterility, and violence of Britain in the mid-1970s, problems demonstrated as private in the particular characters and rendered public through the metaphors of property development and misuse that dominate the novel. National "recovery" is seen, perhaps equivocally, as possible. The Middle Ground, again combining the public and private, tries to collect representatives of various cultures and classes in a contemporary London reclaimed from the septic wastes of its origins, a metaphor like that in Dickens's Our Mutual Friend. The Witch of Exmoor approaches similar issues from the perspective of the late 1990s. The "witch" of the title, actually only an eccentric old woman named Frieda Haxby Palmer, sees her grown children as products of the new Britain, and her sudden disappearance sends them into a flurry of speculation as they try to understand the strange woman they thought they knew. Drabble's self-conscious play with fictional perspectives keeps these metaphors away from the potential solemnity of the grandiose, yet the moral implications of the metaphors, the statements judging both personal and public conditions in England, are serious and controlling.

—James Gindin

DREWE, Robert

Nationality: Australian. Born: Melbourne, Victoria, 9 January 1943. Education: Hale School, Perth, Western Australia, 1952-60. Family: Married to Candida Baker (third marriage); four sons and two daughters. Career: Cadet journalist, Perth West Australian, 1961–64; journalist, 1964-65, and head of Sydney bureau, 1965-70, the Age, Melbourne; daily columnist, 1970-73, features editor, 1971-72, and literary editor, 1972-74, the Australian, Sydney; special writer, 1975-76, and contributing editor, 1980-83, the Bulletin, Sydney; writer-in-residence, University of Western Australia, Nedlands, 1979, and La Trobe University, Bundoora, Victoria, 1986; columnist, Mode, Sydney, and Sydney City Monthly, 1981–83; visiting writerin-residence, South Bank Centre, London, and Brixton Prison, 1994. Awards: Australia Council fellowship, 1974, 1976, 1978, 1983, 1988; Walkley award for journalism, 1976, 1981; U.S. Government Leader grant, 1978; Victorian Arts fellowship, 1987; National Book award, 1987; Commonwealth Literary prize, 1990; Australian Artists Creative fellowship, 1993–96. Agent: Hickson Associates, 128 Queen Street, Woollahra, New South Wales 2025, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Savage Crows. Sydney and London, Collins, 1976. A Cry in the Jungle Bar. Sydney, Collins, 1979; London, Fontana,

A Cry in the Jungle Bar. Sydney, Collins, 1979; London, Fontana 1981.

Fortune. Sydney, Pan, 1986; London, Pan, 1987.

Our Sunshine. Sydney, Pan, 1991.

The Drowner. Sydney, Macmillan, 1995; New York, St. Martin's Press, 1997.

Short Stories

The Bodysurfers. Sydney, Fraser, 1983; London, Faber, 1984. The Bay of Contented Man. Sydney, Pan, 1989; London, Pan, 1991.

Plays

The Bodysurfers, adaptation of his own story (produced Lismore, New South Wales, 1989).

South American Barbecue (produced Sydney, 1991).

Other

The Shark Net (memoir). New York, Viking, 2000.Editor, The Picador Book of the Beach. Sydney, Picador, 1993;London, Picador, 1994.

*

Manuscript Collection: University of Western Australia Library, Nedlands.

Critical Studies: "Making Connections" by Veronica Brady, in Westerly (Perth, Western Australia), June 1980; "The Littoral Truth" by Jim Crace, in Times Literary Supplement (London), 24 August 1984; "Beaches and Bruised Loves" by Jill Smolowe, in Newsweek (New York), 29 October 1984; "Cartoons for the Lucky Country" by J.D. Reed, in Time (New York), 15 December 1986; "A New Angle on Our Uneasy Repose" by Helen Daniel, in Sydney Morning Herald, 18 November 1989; "Mining Dark Places" by Don Anderson, in Age Monthly Review (Melbourne), May 1990.

* * *

Robert Drewe is an important, highly original voice in Australian fiction. Like other writers before him, Drewe deals with the plight of the Australian Aborigines, scrutinizes Australia's uneasy relationship with Asia, and shows an overriding concern with questions of Australian national identity (especially in regard to the role of urban life). But Drewe's approach to these issues is original and provocative.

Whereas a novel about the Australian Aborigines will usually be set among Aborigines, or at least involve white people who live in areas inhabited by Aborigines, The Savage Crows deals with a white youth whose contact with Aborigines is at first only theoretical. Stephen Crisp is researching the early 19th-century events which led to the extinction of the Aborigines living in the island state of Tasmania. His source material is a document titled "The Savage Crows: My Adventures Among the Natives of Van Diemen's Land," which is the diary-journal of the clergyman G.A. Robinson, whose attempts to bring Christianity and civilization to the Tasmanian natives led to cultural misunderstanding, the spread of disease, and death.

Though Robinson was an actual historical figure, the Robinson journal is based upon a number of 19th-century documents and newspaper reports. The Savage Crows has been described as a "documentary novel," but its concerns extend beyond the fictional recreation of history. Drewe presents a number of moral contrasts: Robinson's "good intentions" and their deplorable outcome; Crisp's clinical, academic approach and the dire human suffering to which it is directed; the petty "problems" of affluent 20th-century suburbia beside the plight of early colonists and Aborigines.

A Cry in the Jungle Bar explores Australia's relationship with Asia, once again with focus upon the experiences of a single individual. The Jungle Bar is an attraction of the Asian Eden Hotel, and the "cry" of the title is an utterance of helpless western frustration in the face of Asian complexities. Australian Dick Cullen is a tall, beefy, former football player who now works for the United Nations in Manila. Like Stephen Crisp, Cullen is a researcher; an expert on animal husbandry, he is writing a book about water buffalo titled "The Poor Man's Tractor." More importantly, Cullen shares Crisp's desire to relate his own life to history (though Cullen is more interested in the future history of Australian-Asian relations), and he shares Crisp's struggle to come to terms with another race and culture.

Drewe presents a pessimistic, satirical view of the meeting of cultures. Cullen is marked indelibly a foreigner because of his massive physique, but also because of his inability to understand the subtle political divisions of Asia. (His Bangladeshi colleague, Z.M. Ali, is an enigma to him, and Cullen is bewildered when Ali's political activities lead to his expulsion.)

Fortune is written as a series of terse film-takes or cartoon-panels which tell the story of Don Spargo, a contemporary explorer who discovers a sunken treasure ship off the coast of Western Australia. This story has a "factual" basis (inasmuch as it is based upon a real-life character and posits the possible fate of a real-life 16th-century sailing ship, the Fortuyn) and in this sense it confirms the "journalistic" impulse in Drewe's writing. But the underlying themes are literary, for Spargo's story is a parable on contemporary issues, and the use of a young journalist as narrator raises postmodernist concerns about the nature of narrative: "Officially the reporter was simply the recorder of events, the objective conduit, but events had a habit of including the messenger in the disorder."

Drewe's novels feature an underlying concern with the malaise affecting suburban Australia. This is seen in the way in which Crisp, Cullen, and the journalist-narrator of Fortune are aloof and clinical about pressing human problems (each addressing social issues through reports and documentation, rather than experiencing the problems directly), and it is evident in the failed sexual relationships portrayed in each novel. The short stories in The Bodysurfers and The Bay of Contented Man develop these concerns in more detail, exploring the conflicts and contradictions in the national character. One of the epigraphs to The Bodysurfers is a statement from the polemical historian Manning Clark about the loss of national values: "Just as Samson after being shorn of his hair was left eyeless in Gaza, was this generation, stripped bare of all faith, to be left comfortless on Bondi Beach?" The stories contrast the carefree sensuality of Australian beach life (the nude sunbathers, the smell of suntan oil) with the characters' unconscious prurience and uneasiness about sexuality, and with the mundane anxieties and problems of urban life.

Drewe's portrayal of the beach culture is journalistically superb; to quote one reviewer: "It's all here—the oiled bodies, the smell of the salt, the heat of the sun, the sensuality." But Drewe also offers a provocative analysis of Australian life, hinting at an inability to unite the "masculine" and "feminine" aspects of the national culture. In many stories the beach embodies the Australian myth of physical action and carefree hedonism, but these simplistic masculine values are often dispelled by the comments or actions of the female characters. And in the story called "The Last Explorer" an aged adventurer, slowly dying in hospital, symbolically turns his back on the sea (symbol of the young, feminine, new Australia) and faces the desert (symbol of the dead "macho" world of exploration and masculine deeds).

It is interesting, then, that the title of The Drowner seems to evoke the sea, but in fact its setting is the desert—where in the nineteenth century an irrigation engineer was known as a "drowner."

The novel is the story of Will Dance, who goes to England to learn his profession, falls in love there and marries, and brings his new bride Angelica back to the parched town he is determined to save. The characters of Will and Angelica are a bit too sparsely drawn, but the town itself comes alive in vivid detail.

—Van Ikin

DRIVER, C(harles) J(onathan)

Nationality: British. Born: Cape Town, South Africa, 19 August 1939. Education: St. Andrews College, Grahamstown; University of Cape Town, B.A. (honors) in English, B.Ed., and S.T.D. 1962; Trinity College, Oxford, M.Phil. 1967. Family: Married Ann Elizabeth Hoogewerf in 1967; two sons and one daughter. Career: President, National Union of South African Students, 1963-64; detained in 1964 under the "90 Day Law;" South African passport revoked, 1966. Assistant teacher, 1964-65 and 1967-68, and housemaster, International Sixth Form Center, 1968-73, Sevenoaks School, Kent; director of 6th Form Studies, Matthew Humberstone Comprehensive School, Humberside, 1973-78; principal, Island School, Hong Kong, 1978-83; headmaster, Berkhamsted School, Hertfordshire, 1983-89. Since 1989 master, Wellington College, Crowthorne, Berkshire. Research fellow, University of York, 1976. Fellow, Royal Society of Arts, 1984. Agent: John Johnson Ltd., 45–47 Clerkenwell Green, London EC1R 0HT. Address: Wellington College, Crowthorne, Berkshire RG11 7PU, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Elegy for a Revolutionary. London, Faber, 1969; New York, Morrow, 1970.

Send War in Our Time, O Lord. London, Faber, 1970.

Death of Fathers. London, Faber, 1972.

A Messiah of the Last Days. London, Faber, 1974.

Short Stories

Penquin Modern Stories 8, with others. London, Penquin, 1971.

Uncollected Short Story

"Impossible Cry," in London Magazine, February 1966.

Poetry

I Live Here Now. Lincoln, Lincolnshire and Humberside Arts, 1979. Jack Copel/C.J. Driver. Cape Town, Philip, 1979.

Hong Kong Portraits. Oxford, Perpetua Press, 1986.

In the Water-Margins. Capetown, Snailpress, and London, Crane River Press, 1994.

Holiday Haiku, July-August 1996. Plumstead, England, Firfield Poetry Press, 1997.

Other

Patrick Duncan, South African and Pan-African. London, Heinemann, 1980.

Editor, with H.B. Joicey, Landscape and Light: L Photographs and Poems of Lincolnshire and Humberside. Lincoln, Lincolnshire and Humberside Arts, 1978.

*

C.J. Driver comments:

I am a writer and a teacher; the order depends on whether I am writing or teaching, but I am Master of a great national—and increasingly international—boarding school, so am kept busy in term. I write poems, though I do little about publishing them these days; I do much less reviewing than I used to, though I still read books; I spent two years writing the biography of Patrick Duncan, one of the tragic heroes of recent South African history; and I write novels. I believe profoundly that the novel is the "great book of life," and I hope that all my concerns as a human being enter my work as a novelist—love, marriage, children, homes, money, food, work, leisure—though my predominant concerns are with politics—in the widest sense—the relation of self and society, and the relation of conscious and unconscious minds. I would, at the moment, regard myself more as a poet than a novelist; but I hope the picture may change before the final curtain.

* * *

C.J. Driver is a South African writer whose four novels have earned him a considerable reputation. Not exclusively South African in stetting or in theme, the novels concentrate on a sometimes challenging and always recognizable view of contemporary society.

Elegy for a Revolutionary, the first and least satisfactory of the novels, uses Driver's own experience of underground political action in South Africa during the early 1960s. Like Nadine Gordimer's The Late Bourgeois World, it is an attempt to examine the motives and the fate of a group of young white "liberals" who turned to violence as a means of opposing the repressive Nationalist Government. Driver's analysis centers on the personality of the student leader, Jeremy, whom he sees as both traitor and, paradoxically, hero. The Weakness of the novel lies in its excessively uncritical view of Jeremy. Unlike Nadine Gordimer, who presents her revolutionary as an integral part of a wider social setting, Driver fails to create a context in which Jeremy's actions can be understood. And, although he is much concerned with psychological motivation, the discussion of Jeremy's peculiar family relationships and obscure guilts remain too abstract to be really credible.

In Send War in Our Time, O Lord Driver's main theme is the examination of the liberal conscience under stress. His portrayal of Mrs. Allen, a middle-aged white widow, discovering the inadequacy of her life-long moral code based on decency and tolerance, demonstrates his ability to create a convincing character. The setting (an isolated missionary settlement on South Africa's northern border) is also well-presented. The major weakness of this novel lies in its melodramatic and somewhat far-fetched plot, which involves terrorist activity, much police brutality, madness and two or three suicides, all graphically described. In the welter of violent action, the central issues (the failure of liberal values, the need for dynamic leadership, the nature of political commitment) are almost submerged.

Death of Fathers and A Messiah of the Last Days are both set in England, and show a much surer grasp of technique and theme than the earlier books. Driver's interest in details of violence and suffering are still in evidence, but now become part of a general vision of modern life. Death of Fathers has a close affinity with Elegy for a Revolutionary, although it is set in the confines of an English public school. Its central character is a schoolmaster, and, as in the earlier novel, he is both 'heroic' (larger in every way than his colleagues) and 'treacherous' (he betrays the confidence of his most brilliant and difficult pupil, in an attempt to "save" him). Again, Driver explores the nature of guilt, and the concept of betrayal, which appears, in his view, to be an inherent part of human experience. Friendship between two different but complementary male characters forms another strand in the novel, and is more competently handled here than in the earlier book.

In A Messiah of the Last Days Driver returns to a contemplation of political action. This time he makes his anti-establishment figures a group of idealistic young anarchists, the Free People, who set up a commune in a disused warehouse in London. Their leader, charismatic John Buckleson, projects such a powerful and attractive vision of a new society that he wins the allegiance of a number of eminently respectable people, as well as exciting the younger members of society. The most ambitious of the four novels, A Messiah of the Last Days contrasts a number of different life styles, and presents a complex image of contemporary Britain. Through the fast-moving story runs what is clearly, by now, Driver's most persistent theme: the need society has for a "leader" with a compelling vision, and its equal need to destroy him. Buckleson, who ends his life as a "vegetable" in a psychiatric ward, having been shot at close range by a former follower of his, is the latest version of Jeremy, sentenced to death for sabotage; of the terrorist leader, gunned down by the police; and of Nigel, the schoolboy who hanged himself. Skilled as Driver undoubtedly is in contriving variations of his theme, one hopes that his interest in leadership and betraval will not become obsessive.

—Ukrsula Edmands

DUCKWORTH, Marilyn

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Marilyn Adcock, Auckland, New Zealand, 10 November 1935. Education: Victoria University of Wellington, 1953, 1956. Family: Married 1) Harry Duckworth 1955 (dissolved 1964); 2) Ian Macfarlane, 1964 (dissolved 1972); 3) Daniel Donovan, 1974 (died 1978); 4) John Batstone, 1985; four daughters. Career: Full-time writer. Has held positions in public relations, nurse aiding, factory work and library work. Awards: Scholarship in Letters, 1961, 1972, 1993; New Zealand award for achievement, 1963; Katherine Mansfield fellowship, 1980; New Zealand Book award, 1985, for fiction; Fulbright Visiting Writers fellowship, 1986; Australia New Zealand Exchange fellowship, 1989; Victoria University of Wellington Writers fellowship, 1990; Hawthornden Writers fellowship, Scotland, 1994; Sargeson Writers fellowship, Auckland, 1995. O.B.E. (Officer, Order of the British Empire), 1987. Member: New Zealand Society of Authors. Agent: Tim Curnow, Curtis Brown (Australia) Pty. Ltd., P.O. Box 19, Paddington, New South Wales 2021, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Gap in the Spectrum. Auckland, Hutchinson, 1959.
The Matchbox House. London, Hutchinson, 1960; New York, Morrow, 1961.

A Barbarous Tongue. London, Hutchinson, 1963.

Over the Fence Is Out. London, Hutchinson, 1969.

Disorderly Conduct. Auckland, Hodder and Stoughton, 1984.

Married Alive. Auckland, Hodder and Stoughton, 1985.

Rest for the Wicked. Auckland, Hodder and Stoughton, 1986.

Pulling Faces. Auckland, Hodder and Stoughton, 1987.

A Message from Harpo. Auckland, Hodder and Stoughton, 1989.

Unlawful Entry. Auckland, Random Century, 1992.

Seeing Red. Auckland, Random House, 1993.

Leather Wings. Auckland, Random House, 1995.

Studmuffin. N.p. 2000.

Short Stories

Explosions on the Sun. Auckland, Hodder and Stoughton, 1989. Fooling (novella). Auckland, Hazzard Press, 1994.

Poetry

Other Lovers' Children. Christchurch, New Zealand, Pegasus Press, 1975.

Other

Camping on the Faultline: A Memoir. Auckland, Random House New Zealand, 2000.

Editor, Cherries on a Plate: New Zealand Writers Talk about Their Sisters. Auckland. Random House New Zealand, 1996.

*

Marilyn Duckworth comments:

In my fiction I focus on the tension between individuals' need for each other and their need for independence. I'm fascinated by the words and the devices they use to conceal and reveal these needs.

Critic Heather Murray has said of my work that I espouse no ideology and that I refuse to dress my novels in the current colours of political correctness. My characters "continue to search, perchance to make sense of the existential void in which they haplessly float."

* * *

During a prolific 40-year career as the writer of 13 novels, short fiction, and poetry, Marilyn Duckworth has written about the plight of ordinary people, particularly women, in an indifferent universe. An early convert to Existentialism, Duckworth shows people adrift in free-falling mode amidst the trivia of daily life: nothing stays the same, the boundaries continually shift. Archetypal character Sophie in Disorderly Conduct realizes that her ''disorder'' is life itself:

What she suffers from is the human condition, no less.... She can expect a succession of bizarre and distressing symptoms. Small disasters, small rejections, dripping like acid onto her nerves and burrowing into her sense of well being. Life is a sexually transmitted terminal disease.

In breaking away from the certainties of the great tradition of the English novel, with its underpinning faith in a benevolent God and an ordered universe, Duckworth was initially misunderstood by critics who believed her characters lacked morality and were impelled by nothing worthier than a shallow animal fortitude. But as she demonstrated in A Message from Harpo, once characters realize that there is "No message," they are freed to pursue their own self-determination, a radical humanist and feminist message not often understood by her early readers. To Duckworth, the traditional English novel was male in themes, values, and modes of expression. She prefers to follow Virginia Woolf in seeking a female form of narrative, a code of values, which readers would accept as necessarily different but valid. Inspiration comes also from Muriel Spark's characters, who Duckworth said in a 1960 series of radio talks on women's writing, exude a sense of female normality and completeness: they are "rarely martyrs, rarely self-pitying, and in spite of their eccentricities appear totally sane." Duckworth shows the influence also of Penelope Fitzgerald, who "has a great deal to say and says it fast and quietly."

A recent memoir, Camping on the Faultline (2000), reveals Duckworth to have experienced a domestic life as full of incident, upheaval, and uncertainty as that of any of her characters. As wife to four husbands, and lover of many others, amidst her role as mother to four and stepmother to three, Duckworth is well placed to write of the unheroic but fraught lives of women at home. The daily round of women barely coping, but searching for some personal vindication of their deep need to find love and independence (usually incompatible), is placed against, and affected by, the upheaval of contemporary societal events or issues, such as the Puritanism and maleness of New Zealand society, feminism, pedophilia, incest, homosexual law reform, gambling, female violence, and HIV/AIDS. Duckworth uses a bare minimum of description and explanation, relying on carefully drawn character and on crisp dialogue; her plots unwind at a brisk speed, usually offering at the end some hope of personal advancement, although not the happiness of knowing that everything is sorted and under control.

Duckworth has been a chronicler of women's lives since the 1950s. In A Barbarous Tongue, Frieda, a teenage unmarried mother, still hopes for happiness after a bleak start. Her break for freedom from her inadequate lovers on the final page suggests she will strike out alone with greater confidence, even though she knows that "only children expect to be happy." As women have been engaged in redefining their status in society, claiming the right to a life of their own and to enjoy sex, so changing gender roles occupy a recurring place in Duckworth's novels. Children suddenly deprived of parents through death or desertion, the power games of siblings, incest, female refusal to mother and nurture, gender swapping and homosexuality, all provide tension and constitute traps for the unwary. In Seeing Red, Duckworth examines destructive family ties and female violence (not endearing herself to feminist readers). Pulling Faces transposes the traditional roles of man as leader and woman as dependent follower: in a tragi-comic love story that combines science fiction and social satire with the thriller genre, Stuart tries to bind elusive Gwyn in a conventional union. Towing her caravan wherever she likes, she eludes her mother and child, and Stuart; she alters her mind with drugs, and is ultra-secretive about her movements, playing childhood games of pulling faces to disguise self. Ironically she uses a machine to try to bind others to her by capturing their thoughts on videotape. Women are as prone to power complexes as the traditional male, and if communication exists only via computer, Utopia is a long way off.

Disorderly Conduct, Unlawful Entry, and A Message from Harpo are sophisticated studies of women as daughters, wives, and mothers. Duckworth is skilled at creating believable families and is particularly good at their intimate conversations. Aging mothers entrap and manipulate the young, but are often redeemed by some residual nobility. Children devour the strength of mothers with selfish demands, but are saved from monsterhood by honesty and disarming acts of kindness.

In the novella Fooling, Ros feels the strain of her independence (hard won by earlier generations of Duckworth women): "A woman of the nineties is expected to want control of her life—but not necessarily self-control—to be centred and self-sufficient, but not, of course, self-centred. It isn't easy." Ros is honest in an age when everyone else is fooling. She wants to find love, but her hopes of finding lasting happiness are fading: "Ros, you're going to have to grow up one day. You're 28 years old—aren't you?—and this is the real world. The freaky old real world."

In Leather Wings, female independence has transmuted into selfishness. No one will put aside self to care for and love 6-year-old Jania, whose mother has recently died. Her father wallows in self-pity, sending Jania to her grandparents, but grandfather is preoccupied and introverted by decrepitude, and grandmother is too busy juggling her job, a lover, and the Mills & Boon novel she is writing. To fill the void, a pedophile door-to-door salesman steps in, providing threat, tension, and suspense. Duckworth shows feeling for the tragedy of pedophilia, as the simple Warren fails to understand the feelings that grip him so violently, and she is percipient in this complex study of hard-won female independence, showing that putting self first leads to failure to care for those who should be loved and cherished. What is the answer for women?

Studmuffin is a modern reworking of the Alice-in-Wonderland story, using magic realism, and looking to a future when humans lose the power of speech, either through destroying their brains by drugs, or through the power of a mad mind controller. Alice, a career girl, slips through the looking glass with her newly acquired "white rabbit," an unhappily married albino accountant from her place of work, and they sail to a magic island that is in the grip of a nineties Mad Hatter who enslaves his community and destroys their power of speech and memory. Meanwhile in London, Alice's sister destroys her own speech and addles her mind with drugs. In the most optimistic end to a Duckworth novel yet, Alice and the albino escape after gothic adventures. Both find love: "I love, therefore I am," says Alice as she rows back to the "real world."

-Heather Murray

DUFF, Alan

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Rotorua, 26 October 1950. Education: Two years of high school. Family: Married Joanna Harper; two sons and three daughters. Awards: PEN Best First Book award, 1991; best screenplay, for What Becomes of the Broken Hearted?, New Zealand Film Awards, 1999. Agent: William Morris Agency, 1350 Avenue of the Americas, New York, New York 10019, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Once Were Warriors. Auckland, Tandem Press, 1990; Honolulu,
 University of Hawaii Press, 1994; London, Random House, 1995.
 One Night Out Stealing. Auckland, Tandem Press, 1991; Honolulu, University of Hawaii Press, 1992.

State Ward. Auckland, Vintage, 1994.

What Becomes of the Broken Hearted? Auckland, Vintage, 1996. Both Sides of the Moon. Auckland, Vintage, 1998.

Other

Maori: The Crisis and the Challenge. Auckland, HarperCollins, 1993.

Out of the Mist and Steam: A Memoir. Auckland, Tandem Press, 1999.

*

Film Adaptations: Once Were Warriors, 1994.

Critical Studies: Writing along Broken Lines: Violence and Ethnicity in Contemporary Maori Fiction by Otto Heim. Auckland, Auckland University Press, 1998.

Alan Duff comments:

Main influence: Contemporary American, Faulkner, Selby Jr., Doctorow, Gurganis, Styron.

* * *

Alan Duff is the enfant terrible of contemporary Maori writers. Like Witi Ihimaera and Patricia Grace, he focuses on the debilitating effect urban life has had on Maori. But the violent, drunken underworld of Once Were Warriors and One Night Out Stealing makes the cityscapes of Grace and Ihimaera look positively genteel.

Duff's formula for resolving the problems of the urban Maori likewise contrasts very sharply with the emphasis on traditional communal values in most Maori writing. In his syndicated newspaper articles, his autobiography (Out of the Mist and Steam), and his booklength survey of Maoridom (Maori: The Crisis and the Challenge), he has stressed the need for Maori to embrace orthodox Western education and an ethic of self-knowledge and self-help. Putting into practice the dreams of Beth Heke (in the opening pages of Once Were Warriors) and Tekapo (in the closing pages of Both Sides of the Moon), Duff has personally instigated a successful campaign to get books into every underprivileged Maori household. Conversely, he is wont to express contempt for many aspects of traditional Maori culture—though there have been signs recently of some softening in his attitudes.

In the early novels, Duff's politically incorrect views are implied by Grace Heke's excursions from her Pine Block ghetto to gaze on the plush Trambert house in Once Were Warriors and by Sonny's awed inspection of the Harland mansion in One Night Out Stealing. Typically Duff exaggerates the gap between these two worlds. The Harlands and the Tramberts, with their love of fine music, art, and furniture, are extreme examples of Pakeha patrician taste, and the account of the deep impression that their culture—especially their music—makes on the deprived Maori onlookers gets dangerously close to sentimentality.

Pakeha are not, however, depicted entirely uncritically in Duff's work. The men, in particular, have their shortcomings, ranging from Mr. Harland's penchant for pornographic pictures to the outright pedophilia of Mr. Dekka in State Ward. In What Becomes of the Broken Hearted? we learn of the moral and economic decay that underlies the splendid Trambert veneer. And in One Night Out Stealing the hardened recidivist, Jube McCall, is a Pakeha, while his softer sidekick, Sonny Mahia, is Maori.

In fact, Once Were Warriors does eventually grope towards a specifically Maori solution to the Maori problems that it illustrates so graphically—solutions that are ultimately much closer to the communal ethic proposed by Ihimaera, Grace, and others than Duff the journalist would probably care to admit. Towards the end of the book Beth reestablishes contact with her marae, in the countryside just outside Twin Lakes, the city where Once Were Warriors-like most of Duff's other novels-is set. (Twin Lakes is a fictional version not of Auckland-where the film of Once Were Warriors is set-but of Rotorua, the city where Duff himself grew up.) The funeral of Beth's daughter Grace takes place on this marae, presided over by "the paramount chief of the tribe," Te Tupaea. And a little later, after Beth has succeeded in throwing her aggressive husband Jake out of the house, she brings to town "a village committee," including Te Tupaea, to help her reestablish a sense of purpose among the Maori of the Pine Block ghetto.

On the one hand, Beth's "project" is a very practical one; she attempts to wean her people away from their reliance on state funding (notably the unemployment benefit) and to foster instead the spirit of "self-help" that Duff the journalist preaches. So, for example, she organizes the building of "a changing room and shower block" for a "newly ploughed and sown rugby field" conveniently donated by the benevolent Trambert family. On the other hand, all this practical "self-help" is underpinned by a strong dedication to traditional Maori culture, with the more aggressive aspects of that culture (the "warrior"—or, as some historians term it, "Red Maori"—heritage, particularly as exemplified in the haka) receiving special emphasis. So in the end the novel tentatively embraces a kind of primitivism, albeit a harder form of primitivism than the "Green Maori" version preferred by Ihimaera and Grace.

In fact it is not always easy to distinguish between the admirable aggression of the traditional "warriors" and the degenerate aggression of Jake Heke and his drunken mates. This confusion becomes particularly troubling in the final pages of the book, where scenes from Beth's "project" alternate with scenes from the last days in the life of Beth's son Nig, who has joined a Maori gang (the Brown Fists). The gang violence is presumably meant to act as a foil for the noble primitivism of the haka, but it is hard not to sense a kinship between the two. The film of Once Were Warriors actually seemed to some to present the gang in a positive light.

Meanwhile, in the background, the exiled Jake Heke, growing wiser as he lives rough and consorts with other down-and-outs, looks like a more realistic hope for the future. As a detached observer of Maori culture he actually occupies a position somewhat similar to Duff's own. Sure enough, in the sequel (What Becomes of the Broken Hearted?) Jake, guided by his new partner Rita, begins to adopt middle-class values: he finds work, takes up rugby and pig-shooting, and even becomes house-proud. Similarly, Beth's new partner, Charlie Bennett (a social worker), teaches her the importance of self-reliance. Even Mulla, a senior member of the Brown Fists gang, yearns for a better life.

One Night Out Stealing is less concerned with traditional Maori culture, but State Ward is built around the kind of liberating journey from city to country that features in the work of many Maori authors. George, a native Maori speaker, helps Charlie to escape from Riverton Boys' Home, where they have both been confined, and takes him back—not to Charlie's home in Twin Lakes, but to the Maori heartland of Ruapotiki (evidently a place not far away from the Waituhi of Ihimaera's fiction). Here George burns down the house haunted by the evil spirit (kehua) that has dogged his career hitherto, and celebrates the pair's "freedom"—freedom to adopt Pakeha values perhaps?

In Both Sides of the Moon (the most autobiographical of the novels) Duff attempts—almost too explicitly—to clarify his view of the proper relationship between Maori and Pakeha values. The story of Jimmy, growing up half-Maori, half-Pakeha in present-day Twin Lakes runs parallel to a tale of his Maori ancestors around the beginning of the nineteenth century. While, in the present, Jimmy fumbles towards his father's Pakeha ethic of self-reliance, his ancestors' "Red Maori" culture (awful, in both senses of that word) splits, under the pressure of European colonialism, into two strands: a "gang" mentality intent on "immediate satisfaction" and a "thinking" approach to the new Pakeha ways that recognizes (among other things) the value of books. While Once Were Warriors hedged its bets on the issue, Both Sides of the Moon clearly argues that there is no longer—if indeed there ever was—any place for the old "warrior" culture.

To convey the tough concerns of his novels, Duff has developed a strikingly idiomatic and hard-hitting form of interior monologue that, at its best (in One Night Out Stealing, for example) is flexible enough to accommodate varying states of inebriation and drug use in the characters. His energy often leads to excess; critics have complained of his "tendency to hector the reader" and to use "a vocabulary that would normally be out of the reach of his linguistically impoverished characters," and the purple prose of Both Sides of the Moon is sometimes almost indecipherable. State Ward, on the other hand, is generally regarded as Duff's weakest novel because of its departure from his customary in-your-face style. There are, however, two good reasons for this: the book deals with younger characters than its predecessors, and it was originally written to be read on radio, which requires a readily accessible idiom.

-Richard Corballis

DUFFY, Maureen (Patricia)

Nationality: British. Born: Worthing, Sussex, 21 October 1933. Education: Trowbridge High School for Girls, Wiltshire; Sarah Bonnell High School for Girls; King's College, London, 1953–56, B.A. (honours) in English 1956. Career: Schoolteacher for five years. Co-founder, Writers Action Group, 1972; joint chair, 1977–78, and president, 1985–89, Writers Guild of Great Britain; chair, Greater London Arts Literature Panel, 1979–81; vice-chair, 1981–86, and since 1989 chair, British Copyright Council; since 1982 chair, Authors Lending and Copyright Society; vice-president, Beauty Without Cruelty; fiction editor Critical Quarterly, Manchester, 1987; since 1992 vice-president, European Writers Congress. Awards: City of London Festival Playwright's prize, 1962; Arts Council bursary, 1963, 1966, 1975; Society of Authors travelling scholarship, 1976. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1985. Agent: Jonathan Clowes Ltd., Ironbridge House, Bridge Approach, London NW1 8BD. Address: 18 Fabian Road, London SW6 7TZ, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

That's How It Was. London, Hutchinson, 1962; New York, Dial Press, 1984.

The Single Eye. London, Hutchinson, 1964.

The Microcosm. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Simon and Schuster, 1966.

The Paradox Players. London, Hutchinson, 1967; New York, Simon and Schuster, 1968.

Wounds. London, Hutchinson, and New York, Knopf, 1969.

Love Child. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, and New York, Knopf, 1971.

I Want to Go to Moscow: A Lay. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1973; as All Heaven in a Rage, New York, Knopf, 1973.

Capital. London, Cape, 1975; New York, Braziller, 1976.

Housespy. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1978.

Gor Saga. London, Eyre Methuen, 1981; New York, Viking Press, 1982.

Scarborough Fear (as D.M. Cayer). London, Macdonald, 1982.

Londoners: An Elegy. London, Methuen, 1983.

Change. London, Methuen, 1987.

Illuminations. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1991.

Occam's Razor. London, Sinclair Stevenson, 1993.

Restitution. London, Fourth Estate, 1998.

Plays

The Lay-Off (produced London, 1962).

The Silk Room (produced Watford, Hertfordshire, 1966).

Rites (produced London, 1969). Published in New Short Plays 2, London, Methuen, 1969.

Solo, Old Thyme (produced Cambridge, 1970).

A Nightingale in Bloomsbury Square (produced London, 1973).Published in Factions, edited by Giles Gordon and Alex Hamilton, London, Joseph, 1974.

Radio Play: Only Goodnight, 1981.

Television Play: Josie, 1961.

Poetry

Lyrics for the Dog Hour. London, Hutchinson, 1968. The Venus Touch. London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1971.

Actaeon. Rushden, Northamptonshire, Sceptre Press, 1973.

Evesong. London, Sappho, 1975.

Memorials of the Quick and the Dead. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1979.

Collected Poems. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1985.

Other

The Erotic World of Faery. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1972. The Passionate Shepherdess: Aphra Behn 1640–1689. London, Cape, 1977; New York, Avon, 1979.

Inherit the Earth: A Social History. London, Hamish Hamilton, 1980. Men and Beasts: An Animal Rights Handbook. London, Paladin, 1984

A Thousand Capricious Chances: A History of the Methuen List 1889–1989. London, Methuen, 1989.

Henry Purcell. London, Fourth Estate, 1994.

Editor, with Alan Brownjohn, New Poetry 3. London, Arts Council, 1977.

Editor, Oroonoko and Other Stories, by Aphra Behn. London, Methuen, 1986.

Editor, Love Letters Between a Nobleman and His Sister, by Aphra Behn. London, Virago Press, 1987.

Editor, Five Plays, by Aphra Behn. London, Methuen, 1990.

Translator, A Blush of Shame, by Domenico Rea. London, Barrie and Rockliff, 1968.

*

Manuscript Collection: King's College, University of London.

Critical Study: A Female Vision of the City by Christine Sizemore, Knoxville, University of Tennessee Press, 1989.

* * *

Maureen Duffy is a prolific novelist, poet, and playwright whose work has consistently developed in range and importance. That's How It Was won her immediate acclaim for its simplicity and forcefulness. It is a moving account of the relationship between a mother and daughter; their existence is poor, insecure, even brutal, but transcended by mutual love. "I grew six inches under the light touch of her hand," explains the narrator. The little girl has an acute sense of social isolation and a fierce loyalty to the one constant figure in her universe; her mother's death is thus cause for more than grief, it brings total despair. The loneliness, restlessness, and sexual hunger which spring from the situation are the dominating themes of each subsequent novel.

Realism is the touchstone of Duffy's style; like many other observers of working-class life, she is at her best when she relies on accurate, detailed reportage and at her weakest when tempted by sentiment. The Paradox Players is an example of her writing at its most compelling. It describes a man's retreat from society to live for some months in a boat moored on the Thames. The physical realities of cold, snow, rats, and flooding occupy him continually and the hardship brings him peace. He is a novelist, suffering from the hazards peculiar to that profession and has some pertinent comments to make about the vulnerability of the writer. "When I saw the reviews I could have cut my throat. You see they're very kind to first novels for some mistaken reason but when the poor bastard follows it up with a second and they see he really means it they tear its guts out." The experience of winter on the river restores his faith in his own ability to survive.

Duffy's observations are acute, her use of dialogue witty and direct; this authenticity is complemented by an interest in the bizarre, the fantastic. Her best-known book uses these qualities to great effect in a study of lesbian society which is both informative and original. The Microcosm begins and ends in a club where the central characters meet to dance, dress up, and escape from the necessity of "all the week wearing a false face." Their fantasies are played out in front of the juke box; then the narrative follows each woman back into her disguise, her social role. Steve is Miss Stephens, a schoolmistress; Cathy is a bus conductress; Matt works in a garage. Their predicament as individuals, the author suggests, extends beyond the interest of their own minority group. A plea is made for tolerance, understanding, and that respect without which the human spirit must perish. "Society isn't a simple organism with one nucleus and a fringe of little feet, it's an infinitely complex structure and if you try to suppress any part ... you diminish, you mutilate the whole." Wounds and Love Child reaffirm this belief.

In Illuminations, a retired professor journeys through post-Cold War Germany, and there finds not only a lesbian lover, but a counterpart of sorts in the person of Tetta, an eighth-century nun. Eventually she sees her own world as a reflection of Carolingian Europe. Occam's Razor, too, dwells on a historical parallel, but not one involving William of Ockham (sometimes rendered as Occam), the fourteenth-century philosopher who helped bring an end to medieval dogmatism; here, instead, Duffy draws a line between the old (c. 1916) and the latter-day IRA, and between these and the Mafia.

—Judy Cooke

DUNDY, Elaine

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 1927. Education: Sweet Briar College, Virginia. Family: Married the writer Kenneth Tynan in 1951 (marriage dissolved 1964); one daughter. Career: Actress; worked for the BBC, London; directed the Winter Workshop of the Berkshire Festival; also journalist. Agent: Andrew Hewson, John Johnson Ltd., 45–47 Clerkenwell Green, London EC1R 0HT, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Dud Avocado. London, Gollancz, and New York, Dutton, 1958.
The Old Man and Me. London, Gollancz, and New York, Dutton, 1964.

The Injured Party. London, Joseph, 1974.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Sound of a Marriage," in Queen (London), 1965.
- "Death in the Country," in Vogue (New York), 1974.

Plays

My Place (produced London, 1962). London, Gollancz, 1962; New York, French, 1963.

Death in the Country, and The Drowning (produced New York, 1976).

Screenplay: Life Sign, 1975.

Other

Finch, Bloody Finch. London, Joseph, and New York, Holt Rinehart, 1980.

Elvis and Gladys: The Genesis of the King. New York, Macmillan, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1985.

Ferriday, Louisiana. New York, Fine, 1990.

* * *

In The Dud Avocado and The Old Man and Me, Elaine Dundy employs first-person, reflective narrators who self-consciously and self-indulgently record and evaluate their experiences in Paris and Soho. The narrators relate their stories in a candid, energetic, witty style, spiced with parenthetical revelations, word association games, and sensory impressions. Their language is often the jargon of the Beat-hipster; audacious, flippant, nervous, saucy. Their tone is the good-humored self-mockery of the cocktail party confession, the stage whisper, the open diary. The narrators are deliberate story-tellers, replaying moments from their pasts, exposing their naivety and limitations, and benefiting from hindsight.

Sally Jay in The Dud Avocado is the contemporary American innocent abroad, superficially hip to the decadent Left Bank and "running for her life." Caught in the ambiguity between naivety and sophistication, she is in pursuit of "freedom" and the ability "to be so sharp that I'll always be able to guess right ... on the wing." She expends her time and innocence in a disorganized, impulsive debauch with the avant-garde of Paris.

Through a series of wrong guesses, she eventually is schooled in the ways of the world. The glamorous, daring, free world of Paris is revealed as pretentious, opportunistic, grotesque. Her romantic vision of the rebellious life is destroyed when she understands that her would-be lover is a pimp and that her life in Paris has exposed her to "too much prostitution." She declares herself a dud avocado—a seed without life potential.

In flight to Hollywood, the narrator confronts her runaway life strategy and determines that some ''unrunning'' is called for to ''[lay] the ghost once and for all.'' She seeks out the role of librarian and schools herself in cynicism until she recognizes the life which she wishes to embrace. Giddy with optimism, she accepts the love and marriage proposal of a famous photographer and embarks on a new life with ''an entirely new passport,'' the new self emerging from the old like the growth of an avocado seedling from the stone of the old fruit: ''It's zymotic!'' The narrator survives her initiation experience ready to ''Make voyages. Attempt them. That's all there is.''

Betsy Lou in The Old Man and Me is older and more experienced than Sally Jay, but like Sally Jay, she is on a quest which leads to greater self-knowledge. Motivated by puerile revenge, she journeys to London to recover her "stolen" inheritance from C.D. McKee. As his unknown heir, she plans to hasten the recovery of her money by any means necessary—lying, cheating, masquerading, or attempting murder. She partially achieves her declared end, and in the process realizes her injustice to those in her past, the reasons for the loss of her father's love, and her love for C.D. despite his age and possession of her money. Thus she corrects her mistaken view of her past and sees the futility of trying to salve emotional loss with money.

Betsy Lou's relationship to C.D. is never linear and controllable. The very complexity of the relationship betrays her ambiguity over her past, her present motives, and her unconscious needs. She loves/hates him, recognizes that he is/is not a father figure, accepts/rejects him as teacher, is repulsed/excited by his lust, and wishes him dead/fears for his life. This confusion drives her to abandonment in jazz, drink, dope, and sex, which results in C.D.'s collapse and her self-confrontation and confession.

Betsy Lou's declaration of her identity, her deceit, and her desire for C.D. comes too late. He rejects the contrite Betsy Lou, gives her fifty percent of her money, and leaves her with the advice that she "use it. See its power to corrupt or save .... Learn from our stupidities." She is left with what she initially wanted "only ... because it was mine."

In both novels the narrators are left at the point of departure. For Sally Jay the future appears glorious with possibility. She sees her new life as "the end. The end. The last word." However, the author implies that Sally Jay has ended one cycle of learning experiences and is beginning another with her marriage. One is reminded of Stefan's description of the Typical American Girl as the avocado, "So green—so eternally green." She has experienced growth and is more worldly wise, but her final pronouncement indicates that her maturation is not complete. The process has just begun. Similarly, Betsy Lou is left facing her future. She hasn't Sally Jay's confidence of joy, but rather experiences a sense of unreality. She has no delusions about the future, and the past "seems (to) never really (have) happened." She is no longer directed by spurious monetary goals; instead she suffers the bewilderment of a hollow victory. Thus, while both narrators experience an epiphany, that moment of awareness is tinged with irony.

Dundy is an entertaining novelist who rehearses the familiar theme of initiation with adeptness and flair. However, her craftsmanship and energy do not always compensate for her characters' lack of psychological depth nor for her rather formulaic situations. Her novels do not provoke new or refined insights, but they do provide moments of engaging and refreshing humor.

—Deborah Duckworth

DUNN, Nell (Mary)

Nationality: British. Born: London in 1936. Education: A convent school. Family: Married the writer Jeremy Sandford in 1956 (marriage dissolved); three sons. Awards: Rhys Memorial prize, 1964; Susan Smith Blackburn prize, for play, 1981; Evening Standard award, for play, 1982; Society of West End Theatre award, 1982. Agent: Curtis Brown, 162–168 Regent Street, London W1R 5TB.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Poor Cow. London, MacGibbon and Kee, and New York, Doubleday, 1967.

The Incurable. London, Cape, and New York, Doubleday, 1971. I Want, with Adrian Henri. London, Cape, 1972.

Tear His Head Off His Shoulders. London, Cape, 1974; New York, Doubleday, 1975.

The Only Child: A Simple Story of Heaven and Hell. London, Cape, 1978.

My Silver Shoes. London, Bloomsbury, 1996.

Short Stories

Up the Junction. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1963; Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1966; with drawings by Susan Benson, Washinton, D.C., Counterpoint, 2000.

Plays

Steaming (produced London, 1981; Stamford, Connecticut, and New York, 1982). Ambergate, Derbyshire, Amber Lane Press, 1981; New York, Limelight, 1984.

Sketches in Variety Night (produced London, 1982).

I Want, with Adrian Henri, adaptation of their own novel (produced Liverpool, 1983; London, 1986).

The Little Heroine (produced Southampton, 1988).

Screenplay: Poor Cow, with Ken Loach, 1967.

Television Plays: Up the Junction, from her own stories, 1965; Every Breath You Take, 1988.

Other

Talking to Women. London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1965.

Freddy Gets Married (for children). London, MacGibbon and Kee, 1969.

Grandmothers Talking to Nell Dunn. London, Chatto and Windus, 1991.

Editor, Living Like I Do. London, Futura, 1977; as Different Drummers, New York, Harcourt Brace, 1977.

* * *

Nell Dunn begins with vignettes or fragmental episodes to build a picture of British urban life. Much like Charles Dickens, with his newspaper sketches and small portraits of London street life, she began her career with a set of brilliant realistic snapshots of the mod world. In Up the Junction she collected these sketches, which in effect are much like the 17th-century Theophrastan "character." They deal primarily with young working-class Britons in their milieu, incised in photographic reportage, built on their dialect, street signs, bits of popular music, the clichés and repetitious folk-wisdom of ghetto life. The feeling for the nagging, obstinate details of daily life is very strong—the sketches demonstrate how complex yet unrewarding most of these lives can be.

In Poor Cow Dunn develops the same method of terse, richly detailed sketches into a more unified form, a novel centering on the life of one young woman. Ironically named Joy, she becomes a "poor cow" through the constant erosion of her life. At 22 she has gone through one luckless marriage, and her life moves centrifugally around Jonny, her son. Joy drifts into casual prostitution, random affairs with anchorless men. She worries constantly about her looks, her body, her sexual responsiveness, the prospects of aging. Life is intractable, and wishes evaporate in the face of simple necessities. Joy's role as a mother is a transference of her egocentrism to Jonny, as an extension of her former hopes for herself. Her own life has run down a blind alley, but her son's life may be different. As she clings to Jonny, Joy invents a bitter epitaph for her youth: "To think when I was a kid I planned to conquer the world and if anyone saw me now they'd say, 'She's had a rough night, poor cow.""

A vision of the confusion and oppressiveness of modern life is extended in The Incurable, which deals with a middle-class woman, Maro, whose life collapses in crisis. Maro's husband develops multiple sclerosis, and her formerly orderly and manageable existence is destroyed. She falls into a state of anomie which, like her husband's progressive disease, eats up her life. She too is "incurable," although her malaise is mental and spiritual. Her children's cannibalistic demands and the relentless pressure of everyday routine erode her will and energy: "She felt like some country that had been oppressed for a long time and was slowly rising up and throwing over its oppressors. She was making a revolution but the bloodshed was horrifying and how many lives would be lost and when was it going to end and would she ever make the country of the free spirits?"

Tear His Head Off His Shoulders is another set of related vignettes and episodes in the lives of women. The narrative revolves around the sexual obsessions and conflicts of women, viewed in retrospect. The vernacular style and complex combination of nostalgia and revulsion give a bittersweet flavor to the work. A strong "fascination of the abomination" feeling makes the stories of sexual compulsion convincing.

In The Only Child Dunn constructs a novel again focused on sexual obsession and possessiveness—of a mother for her son. We follow Esther Lafonte through Dunn's careful sensual details as she drifts from her over-comfortable marriage to a search for her identity—sexual and spiritual—in her 19-year-old son, Piers. At one point she speaks for all of Dunn's lost women: "I want to get in, I want to be somebody, I have a feeling that I could have done very much more with my life, that I could be doing more now, I want to be a part of things."

Dunn's special province is the mind and spirit of the beleaguered woman—a view from the "oppressed country" of the woman trapped by circumstances. The vignettes she presents deal with developing sexuality, the allure of the pop world, the deadly immobility of domestic responsibilities. Her later fiction extends this vision to the perimeters of middle-class life.

-William J. Schafer

DUNNE, John Gregory

Nationality: American. Born: Hartford, Connecticut, 25 May 1932. Education: Princeton University, New Jersey, A.B. in English 1954. Married Joan Didion, q.v., in 1964; one daughter. Career: Staff writer, Time, New York, 5 years; columnist ("Points West"), with Didion, Saturday Evening Post, Philadelphia, 1967–69; regular contributor, Esquire and the New York Review of Books. Agent: Janklow and Nesbit, 598 Madison Ave., New York, New York 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Vegas: A Memoir of a Dark Season. New York, Random House, and London, Quartet, 1974.

True Confessions. New York, Dutton, 1977; London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1978.

Dutch Shea, Jr. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1982.

The Red, White and Blue. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1987.

Playland. New York, Random House, 1994; London, Granta, 1995.

Plays

Screenplays (with Joan Didion): Panic in Needle Park, 1971; Play It as It Lays, 1972; A Star Is Born, also with Frank Pierson, 1976; True Confessions, 1981; Hills Like White Elephants, 1992; Broken Trust, 1995; Up Close and Personal, 1995.

Other

Delano: The Story of the California Grape Strike, photographs by Ted Streshinsky. New York, Farrar Straus, 1967; revised edition, 1971.

The Studio. New York, Farrar Straus, 1967; London, W.H. Allen, 1970; New York, Vintage Books, 1998.

Quintana and Friends (essays). New York, Dutton, 1978.

Harp. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1989.

Crooning. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1991.

L.A. Is It with John Gregory Dunne (television program). Kingfish Video Productions/WNET-13, New York, 1991.

Monster: Living off the Big Screen. New York, Random House, 1997.

* * *

His wife and sometime collaborator, Joan Didion, is undoubtedly better known than he, but John Gregory Dunne certainly deserves a measure of critical attention. Like his wife he has carved out a successful career as a versatile writer.

In addition to novels he has written essays, articles, columns, and books of contemporary journalism that combine objective observation with a generous quantity of personal display, confession, and self analysis. Whatever his subject, method, or venue of publication, he generally returns over and over again to his family history, financial standing, and ethnic and religious background: Hartford, Connecticut, apparently prosperous, middle-class, Irish Catholic.

The numerous essays, articles, and columns, (the early ones written with his wife), cover a large range of subjects that challenge the writer not only eager to speak his mind, but also desperate to meet deadlines and make an honest buck; many of them, nevertheless, are penetrating, intelligent, and informative. Luckily, Dunne has strong opinions on a great many subjects and can communicate those opinions clearly, forcefully, and often humorously; he has a keen eye for sham and hypocrisy and a constructive sense of rage and outrage. His early columns tend to reflect something of the sweet haze of the 1960s, but the later ones show a more characteristic tone of weary, cynical anger creeping into his voice.

In one of the most useful books about the business of making movies, The Studio, Dunne provides not only important information but also a valuable corrective to the highflown nonsense of film theorists and critics about the art of film.

Dunne's very personal confessional style surfaces most obviously in Vegas, the record of his recovery from a nervous breakdown, a subject roughly akin to Melville's Great White Whale for contemporary writers, and in Harp, an impressionistic memoir that begins with a brother's suicide, chronicles a number of deaths in his family, and culminates in his own cardio-vascular troubles. Because it also discusses other matters, including some of the fascinating processes of the author's own methods, it is actually somewhat more interesting than it sounds. For the son of a Hartford surgeon who attended private schools and graduated from Princeton, Dunne rather overdoes the Studs Lonigan role; for readers from the working class, he hardly seems the rough diamond of the tough, impoverished Irish ghetto. In Harp the generative narcissism of any writer finally gives way to the self pity of a poseur.

His novels clearly benefit from his journalism, since they also turn on the same subjects that engage his nonfiction, exploring with a good deal more energy and bite contemporary American politics and public behavior and the variousness of Irish American life. True Confessions, Dutch Shea, Jr., and The Red, White and Blue reflect that variousness with some of the sensitivity and accuracy of a novelist of manners in the mold of John O'Hara. They constitute a contemporary trilogy that in this case perhaps really does deserve comparison with James T. Farrell's monumental Studs Lonigan; certainly Dunne seems to be the only American writer, except for Norman Mailer, still concerned with the Irish experience.

Dunne himself has stated that the three books attempt to show some of the history of the levels, from working class to upper class, that the Irish inhabit in America and how they have fared in this century. As a result, they concern themselves with historical events, from a famous murder case to national politics, in the public arena, while examining the lives and fortunes of some particular families. They also examine the traditional figures of Irish American life, literature, and cinema—policemen, priests, and politicians. In the process, his books touch on some of the major public events of the last 50 years.

True Confessions is based on the notorious unsolved Black Dahlia murder case of the 1940s, and uses one of those brother combinations of 1930s movies—Tom Spellacy, a detective, and Desmond, a priest. The fascinating murder investigation opens up a complicated tangle of religion, politics, and corruption in Los Angeles, a story told in the tough, cynical, funny, and wised-up manner of traditional American gangster and detective fiction. It is a brilliant, moving, and heartfelt performance, far superior to anything else Dunne has written. Less successful, Dutch Shea, Jr. revolves around the personal and public tragedy of a criminal lawyer's loss of his daughter, coyly hinting at but holding off the completion of its haunting and horrific background subject. Like True Confessions, however, the book handles its characters and especially its dialogue with considerable skill and confidence; it addresses, sometimes with defensive humor, the daily curse of criminality and the horrors of terrorism. The third volume of the trilogy, The Red, White and Blue reads at times like a roman à clef based on the history of some of the most successful Irish families in America, which of course means the Kellys and the Kennedys. With considerable ambition, the book takes aim at the all too familiar hypocrisy, horror, and tragedy of the waning decades of the 20th century—the culpability of politicians, the waste of war, the conspiracies of the media. This novel repeats the cynicism of the first two, but goes far beyond, to achieve a tone and a conclusion of utter despair, which though appropriate to its subject may signal the depths of the author's own reaction to contemporary American life.

Dunne's ethnicity, worn like a flag, seems somewhat anachronistic in a time when his fellow Irish Americans have practically become WASPs. At the same time, it has generated three good novels, some autobiographical writing, and numerous articles and essays, which means the concept remains useful to the writer, a notion that automatically endows it with meaning and value. The subject may no longer possess its former richness, however, and the author may have to look elsewhere. He may have now reached something of a crossroads in his career.

His bestselling novels and several screenplays have enabled him to enjoy some of the material rewards of the literary life that elude so many other writers, but like so many successful people in any field of endeavor, he has begun to question the importance and validity of his success. His new awareness of his own mortality, the serial losses of a number of loved ones, his own inherent cynicism, and perhaps even a certain Irish bitterness and melancholy have induced a gloom that his wisecracking cannot lighten.

The close relationship between fiction and fact in Dunne's work is amply illustrated by several of his offerings from the mid-1990s. In Up Close and Personal, cowriters Dunne and Didion set out to profile the tragic career of 1970s anchorwoman Jessica Savitch, but instead created a romance that provided an onscreen vehicle for stars Michelle Pfeiffer and Robert Redford. Playland, Dunne's sole novel from the period, is a satire that centers around child actress "Baby Blue Tyler, Hollywood's number-one cinemoppet." Monster: Living off the Big Screen provides a behind-the-scenes look at how a story becomes a movie—and the story just happened to be Up Close and Personal.

-George Grella

DUNNETT, (Lady) Dorothy

Nationality: British. Born: Dorothy Halliday in Dunfermline, Fife, 25 August 1923. Education: James Gillespie's High School, Edinburgh; Edinburgh College of Art; Glasgow School of Art. Family: Married Alastair (later Sir Alastair) M. Dunnett in 1946; two sons. Career: Assistant press officer, Scottish government departments, Edinburgh, 1940–46; member of the Board of Trade Scottish Economics Department, Glasgow, 1946–55; non-executive director, Scottish Television plc, Glasgow, 1979–92. Since 1950 professional portrait painter; since 1986 trustee, National Library of Scotland; since 1990 a director of the Edinburgh Book Festival. Awards: Scottish Arts Council award, 1976; St. Andrews Presbyterian College award, Laurinburg, North Carolina, 1993. Fellow, Royal Society of Arts, 1986. Agent: Curtis Brown, 162–168 Regent Street, London W1R 5TB, England. Address: 87 Colinton Road, Edinburgh EH10 5DF, Scotland.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels (Dolly books prior to Bird of Paradise published as Dorothy Halliday in UK)

The Game of Kings. New York, Putnam, 1961; London, Cassell, 1962; New York, Vintage, 1997.

Queens' Play. London, Cassell, and New York, Putnam, 1964; New York, Vintage, 1997.

The Disorderly Knights. London, Cassell, and New York, Putnam, 1966; New York, Vintage, 1997.

Dolly and the Singing Bird. London, Cassell, 1968; as The Photogenic Soprano, Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1968.

Pawn in Frankincense. London, Cassell, and New York, Putnam, 1969; New York, Vintage, 1997.

Dolly and the Cookie Bird. London, Cassell, 1970; as Murder in the Round, Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1970.

The Ringed Castle. London, Cassell, 1971; New York, Putnam, 1972; New York, Vintage, 1997.

Dolly and the Doctor Bird. London, Cassell, 1971; as Match for a Murderer, Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1971.

Dolly and the Starry Bird. London, Cassell, 1973; as Murder in Focus, Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1973.

Checkmate. London, Cassell, and New York, Putnam, 1975; New York, Vintage, 1997.

Dolly and the Nanny Bird. London, Joseph, 1976; New York, Knopf, 1982.

King Hereafter. London, Joseph, and New York, Knopf, 1982.

Dolly and the Bird of Paradise. London, Joseph, 1983; New York, Knopf, 1984.

Niccolò Rising. London, Joseph, and New York, Knopf, 1986.

The Spring of the Ram. London, Joseph, 1987; New York, Knopf, 1988.

Race of Scorpions. London, Joseph, 1989; New York, Knopf, 1990. Scales of Gold. London, Joseph, 1991; New York, Knopf, 1992.

Moroccan Traffic. London, Chatto and Windus, 1991; as Take a Fax to the Kasbah, New York, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1992.

The Unicorn Hunt. London, Joseph, 1993; New York, Knopf, 1994. To Lie with Lions. London, Joseph, 1995; New York, Knopf, 1996.

Caprice and Rondo. London, Michael Joseph, 1997; New York, Knopf, 1998.

Gemini. New York, Knopf, 2000.

Other

The Scottish Highlands, with Alastair M. Dunnett, photographs by David Paterson. Edinburgh, Mainstream, 1988.

*

Bibliography: In Book and Magazine Collector 53 (London), August 1988.

Critical Study: The Dorothy Dunnett Companion by Elspeth Morrison, London, Joseph, 1994.

* * *

Dorothy Dunnett's fame as a best-selling novelist has been built on two major series of historical romances, a long novel on Macbeth which startled and impressed academic historians, and a series of modern thrillers apparently thrown off with ease as a diversion from her other work.

She came comparatively late to writing, having previously established a reputation as a portrait painter and sculptress. This artistic versatility in itself offers clues to her literary achievement. As a painter she has a remarkable ability to create instantly recognizable likenesses. Her sitters are portrayed with nicely calculated chiaroscuro, their faces and figures standing out against closely observed and romantically ordered backgrounds. As a sculptress she controls the modeling of her subjects with skill, shaping her material into volumes that satisfy from whatever angle they are viewed.

Dunnett's first major series, six novels known as the Lymond saga, opens in turbulent 16th-century Scotland, torn by war and intrigue both in its relations with England and in the domestic struggles of its noble families for power at court. This is the period of Henry VIII's rough dynastic wooing of the infant Mary, Queen of Scots, for his son Edward; it is the period also of the Reformation and the clash between the old Catholic order and Protestantism.

The hero of the saga, Francis Crawford of Lymond and later Comte de Sevigny, is condemned as a rebel and forced into exile. The six volumes of the saga recount his clandestine return to Scotland, his quest for the truth about his lineage and rightful inheritance, the adventures which take the wide-ranging story and its characters to France, Russia, Turkey and the Netherlands, and the final denouement of the intricate web of mystery surrounding Lymond's birth. As befits popular romances there is a happy ending; but a great deal goes on before it is delivered.

With each volume of this sprawling tale there is an extraordinary proliferation of sub-plots. The array of major and minor figures, both historical and fictitious, is so numerous that the reader might well get lost in the crowd had the author not prefaced each volume with lists of the leading characters, asterisked if they are her own inventions. Her research into historical events, places, people, their homes, dress and comportment, are so accurate and detailed that the reader can, like the author before starting to write, visit the scenes of the action and, book in hand, calculate the angle of a bow-shot or see where a duel or a lovers' meeting was arranged. Dunnett's stamina in historical and topographical research is indefatigable; and she seemingly cannot bear to throw anything away unused.

In many hands this accumulation of detail would make the story founder. But the author has such energy, such narrative pace, such inventiveness, wit and vitality, that the story is driven forward at breath-taking speed and the reader is kept easily afloat on the running tide of her prose. She has also a deft way with intelligent and witty women and their handling of intelligent, and not so intelligent, men. There is freshness and charm in the love scenes, muscle in the fights and swordplay.

The qualities of the Lymond saga were perceived and promoted by the publisher's editor who discovered Gone with the Wind. A suggestion that Dunnett's next novel should be about Mary, Queen of Scots, or Prince Charles Edward Stuart, ground tilled enough by others, was countered with a proposal to write a book about Macbeth. Hardly known to the public apart from the matter of Shakespeare's play, Macbeth and his world were pursued by the author through countless 11th-century sources, including those for Thorfinn, Earl of Orkney, who shared common ancestry with Macbeth and according to some accounts was his foster-brother. Eventually she became convinced that Macbeth and Thorfinn were possibly the same person, presented to the world for reasons of secret intrigue as two individuals. The coincidence of dates and common activities in extending and consolidating the kingdoms of the Northern Isles, Caithness, and Alba into the beginnings of a recognizable Scotland made the identification plausible if not proven beyond doubt. Armed with this historical thesis Dunnett wrote King Hereafter, a blockbuster of a novel whose claim to the popular title of saga is greater than that of the Lymond cycle.

Meantime she was also publishing a series of thrillers, revolving around the portrait painter, yachtsman and Secret Service agent Johnson Johnson and his yacht Dolly. An enterprising feature of these suspense stories is that each is narrated by the girl in the case—all of whom, it seems, are intimidated and repelled by Johnson's bifocal spectacles. The thrillers with their different narrators' voices are great fun, substituting for the classic car chase some hard sailing in foul weather in seas as far apart as the Caribbean and the Scottish Minches.

Dunnett's second long historical series, published under the generic title The House of Niccolò, takes us to the 15th century and the rise of the merchant class in Flanders, France, and Venice, financed by Florentine and Genoese bankers and trading throughout Europe and the Mediterranean. Again there has been a massive accumulation of source material for the detailed mises-en-scène; again the characters are highlighted in the foreground of the composition; again the author's sparkling style and swift pace make the work immensely readable. The sixth volume in the series, To Lie with Lions, involves an intensely complex, and strikingly modern-seeming conflict set in the Venice of 1471. In Caprice and Rondo, protagonist Nicholas de Fleury—a banker as resourceful as he is ruthless—recovers from the brink of ruin with a scheme to simultaneously protect Europe from Ottoman invasion and enrich his own purse.

-Stewart Sanderson

DYKEMAN, Wilma

Nationality: American. Born: Asheville, North Carolina, 1920. Education: Biltmore Junior College, Asheville, North Carolina; Northwestern University, Chicago, B.A. Family: Married James R. Stokely, Jr. (died 1977); two sons. Career: Writer and lecturer. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship, 1955; Thomas Wolfe Memorial Trophy, 1955; Hillman award, 1958; special Waukegan Club award (Chicago Friends of American Writers), 1963; National Endowment for the Humanities senior fellowship; named Tennessee Conservation Writer of the Year; honorary doctor of literature, Maryville College; named Tennessee Outstanding Speaker of the Year (State Association of Speech Arts Teachers and Professors); Distinguished Service award (University of North Carolina at Asheville). Address: 405 Clifton Heights, Newport, Tennessee, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Tall Woman. New York, Holt, 1962.
The Far Family. New York, Holt, 1966.
Return the Innocent Earth. New York, Holt, 1973.
Explorations. Newport, Tennessee, Wakestone Books, 1984.

Other

The French Broad (nonfiction). New York, Rinehart, 1955.

Neither Black Nor White (nonfiction, with James R. Stokely). New York, Rinehart, 1957.

Seeds of Southern Change: The Life of Will Alexander (with James R. Stokely). University of Chicago Press, 1962.

Prophet of Plenty: The First Ninety Years of W.D. Weatherford. Knoxville, University of Tennessee Press, 1966.

Look to This Day (essays). New York, Holt, 1968.

The Border States (with James R. Stokely). New York, Time-Life Books, 1970.

Too Many People, Too Little Love (biography of Edna Rankin McKinnon). New York, Holt, 1974.

Tennessee: A Bicentennial History. New York, Norton, 1975.

Tennessee Women, Past and Present, edited by Carol Lyn Yellin. 1977.

Highland Homeland: The People of the Great Smokies (with son, Jim Stokely). Washington, D.C., National Park Service, 1978.

With Fire and Sword: The Battle of Kings Mountain, 1780, illustrated by Louis S. Glanzman. Washington, D.C., National Park Service, 1978.

Tennessee, photography by Edward Schell. Portland, Oregon, Graphic Arts Publishing Company, 1979.

Appalachian Mountains (with son, Dykeman Stokely), illustrated by Clyde H. Smith. Portland, Oregon, Graphic Arts Publishing Company, 1980.

Foreword, Flowering of the Cumberland by Harriette Simpson Arnow. Lexington, University Press of Kentucky, 1984.

Foreword, Seedtime on the Cumberland by Harriette Simpson Arnow. Lexington, University Press of Kentucky, 1984.

Tennessee: A History. New York, Norton, 1984.

At Home in the Smokies: A History Handbook for Great Smoky Mountains National Park, North Carolina and Tennessee. Washington, D.C., U.S. Department of the Interior, 1984.

Foreward, The WPA Guide to Tennessee. Knoxville, University of Tennessee Press, 1986.

Foreword, Strangers in High Places: The Story of the Great Smoky Mountains by Michael Frome. Knoxville, University of Tennessee Press, 1994.

Introduction, Daughter of the Legend by Jesse Stuart, edited by John H. Spurlock. Ashland, Kentucky, J. Stuart Foundation, 1994.

Haunting Memories: Echoes and Images of Tennessee's Past, photographs by Christine P. Patterson. Knoxville, University of Tennessee Press, 1996.

Foreword, The Last Chivaree: The Hicks Family of Beech Mountain by Robert Isbell. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1996.

Foreword, Reverend Joseph Tarkington, Methodist Circuit Rider: From Frontier Evangelism to Refined Religion by David L. Kimbrough. Knoxville, University of Tennessee Press, 1997. Contributor, We Dissent, edited by Hoke Norris. New York, St. Martin's Press, 1962.

Contributor, The Southern Appalachian Region: A Survey. Lexington, University Press of Kentucky, 1962.

Contributor, Nashville: The Faces of Two Centuries, 1780–1980 by John Egerton. Nashville, PlusMedia, 1979.

Contributor, Tennessee, A Homecoming, edited by John Netherton. Third National Corporation, 1985.

*

Critical Studies: Tell It on the Mountain: Appalachian Women Writers (sound recording, interviews by Nikki Giovanni), Whitesburg, Kentucky, WMMT-FM, 1995.

* * *

Wilma Dykeman was born in Asheville, North Carolina, in 1920, and she has lived most of her life near the French Broad River in the mountains of eastern Tennessee and western North Carolina. The river is the subject of her first book, The French Broad, a volume in the Rivers of America series and winner of the Thomas Wolfe Memorial Trophy, but it is also a recurring figure in Dykeman's work. A metaphor for generational continuity and the flow of history into the present, the river in many ways encapsulates Dykeman's concerns as a novelist, biographer, and historian: the importance of place, the connectedness of humanity, and the enduring relevance of the past.

Wilma Dykeman's first writings were short stories, radio scripts, and articles for Harper's and the New York Times Magazine, among other periodicals. Among her sixteen books, one finds a writerly fusion of social history, historical fiction, and memoir, all imbued with concerned engagement with contemporary sociopolitical issues. Dykeman's Neither Black Nor White, for instance, a collaboration with her husband, James Stokely, is a personal reflection on the Brown desegregation decision of 1954. The book won the Hillman Award for its contributions to world peace, civil liberties, and race relations.

Unfortunately, Dykeman's novels have too often been relegated to the minor category of regional fiction. Her fiction is decidedly rooted in Appalachia with the distinctive tenor of mountain dialect, but her themes are hardly unique to Southern life. Concerned especially with the changing roles of women and race relations, Dykeman in reality deals with some of the most universal issues of contemporary life. Her two most widely read works of fiction, The Tall Woman and its continuation The Far Family, both center around the lives of mountain women and challenge persisting stereotypes of Southern womanhood. Lydia McQueen, the protagonist of The Tall Woman, is especially antithetical to conventional portraits of the Southern lady. McQueen is committed to building a school for the mountain children of Thickety Creek in the years of Reconstruction, and she heroically stares down the man who would oppose her. But it is not only Dykeman's strong characters that offer an alternative view of femininity. The historical details that the author embeds in her novelsthe realities of mountain midwifery, for example-also work to dispute female stereotypes by showing their basis in misinformation about the leading roles women have played throughout history.

In honor of the contributions her histories, biographies, and historical novels have made, the state of Tennessee named Dykeman State Historian in 1981. She is the recipient of numerous honorary doctoral degrees and an honorary Phi Beta Kappa. In addition, she has received a Guggenheim fellowship, a senior fellowship from the National Endowment for the Humanities, the Chicago Friends of American Writers Award, the Distinguished Southern Writer Award of the Southern Festival of Books, and the North Carolina Gold Medal for Contribution to American Letters. For over twenty years, she has served as a professor in the English department at the University of Tennessee, and she sits on numerous regional and national boards dealing with conservation, literature, history, and women's issues.

-Michele S. Shauf

E

EDGERTON, Clyde Carlyle

Nationality: American. Born: Durham. North Carolina, 20 May 1944. Education: University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, B.A. 1966, M.A.T., 1972, Ph.D. 1977. Military Service: U.S. Air Force, 1967–71, piloted reconnaissance and forward air control missions in Southeast Asia during Vietnam War; received Distinguished Flying Cross. Family: Married Susan Ketchin in 1975; one daughter. Career: English teacher, Southern High School, Durham, North Carolina, 1972-73; codirector, English Teaching Institute, Chapel Hill, North Carolina, 1976; associate professor, Campbell University, Buies Creek, North Carolina, 1977-81, associate professor of education and psychology, 1981-85; associate professor of English and education, St. Andrews Presbyterian College, Laurinburg, North Carolina, 1985-89; full-time writer, 1989-. Awards: Guggenheim fellow, 1989; Lyndhurst fellow, 1991. Agent: Liz Darhansoff, 1220 Park Avenue, New York, New York 10128, U.S.A. Address: c/o Dusty's Air Taxi, 714 Ninth Street, G-7, Durham, North Carolina 27705, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Raney. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1985.

Walking Across Egypt. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1987.

The Floatplane Notebooks. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1988.

Killer Diller. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1991.In Memory of Junior: A Novel. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1992.

Redeye: A Western. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1995.

Pete and Shirley: The Great Tar Heel Novel (serial novel, with others), edited by David Perkins. Asheboro, North Carolina, Down Home Press, 1995.

Where Trouble Sleeps: A Novel. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1997.

Poetry

Understanding the Floatplane (chapbook). Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Mud Puppy Press, 1987.

Cold Black Peas (chapbook). Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Mud Puppy Press, 1990.

Other

Contributor, Weymouth: An Anthology of Poetry, edited by Sam Ragan. Laurinburg, North Carolina, St. Andrews Press, 1987.

Contributor, Family Portraits: Remembrances by Twenty Distinguished Writers, edited by Carolyn Anthony. New York, Doubleday, 1989. Contributor, New Stories from the South: The Year's Best, 1990, edited by Shannon Ravenel. Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Algonquin Books, 1990.

Contributor, Books of Passage: 27 North Carolina Writers on the Books That Changed Their Lives, edited by David Perkins, illustrated by David Terry. Asheboro, North Carolina, Down Home Press, 1997.

* * *

Clyde Edgerton burst on to the literary scene with his first work, Raney, in 1985. His subsequent works have been no less well-received, and Edgerton has continued to write equally interesting and controversial works such as Walking Across Egypt, The Floatplane Notebooks, Killer Diller, In Memory of Junior, Redeye: A Western, and his latest work, Where Trouble Sleeps. Edgerton's novels focus upon a variety of issues and present an array of intriguing characters, yet throughout his works, which are generally set in the South, the themes of hypocrisy, religion, and love emerge as pivotal elements.

Hypocrisy appears as a major theme in all of Edgerton's works. Raney illustrates the hypocrisy of the small, southern town, Listre, South Carolina, by relating the story through the perspective its naïve, female character, Raney. Her simplistic and often narrow view of the world forms the core of the novel. Because of the realism with which Edgerton imbues his characters, readers clearly understand, even if they do not always agree with, the perspective of such Southerners as Raney. Indeed, Raney's family's desperate desire to hide or to reform unacceptable relatives such as Uncle Nate demonstrates the hypocritical behavior of families such as Raney's. In Where Trouble Sleeps, Alease Toomey struggles to maintain the sobriety of her brother, Raleigh, who is an alcoholic veteran. She loves him, yet throughout the text, Alease agonizes over his state, not only for his health, but also for the bad reputation that he might bring to the family. This kind of double-edged, hypocritical simultaneous acceptance and condemnation of such characters becomes a mainstay of Edgerton's work.

Edgerton again explores hypocrisy in the image of the new Southerner. Raney's newlywed husband, Charles, who prides himself on enlightenment and progressiveness as a new Southern liberal, treats Raney's less-educated relatives in the same manner that he has seen whites treat blacks. He looks down on her family, viewing them as narrow-minded bumpkins, and he eagerly takes any opportunity to avoid spending extended amounts of time with them. Unfortunately, he never understands that he is guilty of the very kind of behavior that he so vociferously condemns in her relatives.

In Killer Diller Edgerton once again depicts characters mired in hypocrisy. The twin administrators of the small Baptist college in Listre, Ned and Ted Sears, cultivate devout and sincere public faces, yet all the while they work to enrich themselves by conducting shady business deals in the name of the college and the town.

Throughout his novels, characters such as those previously mentioned and those like Reverend Crenshaw in Where Trouble Sleeps and sisters Bette and Ansie in In Memory of Junior further illustrate Edgerton's attention to the hypocrisy apparent in Southern culture.

While hypocrisy is one of Edgerton's elemental themes, so too is religion. In all of Edgerton's works, a series of scenes convey his preoccupation with the Southern need to share what is right from what is wrong. These moral dictums often take the form of religious discussions. Such discussions generally occur between two to three characters who address a multitude of religious precepts from a conservative, southern Baptist view. To convey additional elements of the theme of religion, Edgerton employs the tempted or fallen pastor as an important character in his work.

In Memory of Junior contains a scene that illustrates the Southern preoccupation with God and religion. While hunting, Faison and Jimmy begin a discussion about killing animals. During the conversation, Jimmy begins to question the existence of God, and Faison shares his view of religious issues. This in-depth conversation lasts several pages until Faison shifts the conversation to a lighter subject.

In Raney, religion becomes a focal point of the text. Raney's insular view of what is and is not acceptable religious practice comes to light when Charles's mother, an Episcopalian, discusses her church traditions. To Raney, her mother-in-law's practices appear scandalous. Along with these discussions about the Episcopalians, she and Charles argue frequently about her views regarding sin and salvation. These religious discussions become a central part of many of Edgerton's works.

While religious discussions appear in Edgerton's novels, so too do characters who typify the fallen Christian. In Where Trouble Sleeps Reverend Crenshaw is tempted by Cheryl Daniels and almost falls prey to the blackmail scheme of the unscrupulous Jack Umstead, a.k.a. Delbert Jones. The Sears twins in Killer Diller further reflect this character of the fallen holy man when they plan university activities based not upon enhancing the lives of people within their community, but of selecting activities that provide good public relations opportunities. None of the author's fallen Christian characters appear to gain redemption by changing their behaviors. They remain corrupt throughout the works. Edgerton's novels depict religion as it is often actualized in the South—full of opinions and full of contradictions.

While hypocrisy and religion play significant roles in the Edgerton's work, the theme of love cannot be overlooked. Throughout his works, familial love, romantic love, and love of fellow humans transcends the pitfalls of the imperfect characters. Indeed, the love depicted may at times seem oddly termed as love, yet it is the kind of love reflective of reality. In Where Trouble Sleeps Mrs. Clark, the church receptionist, loves her husband, Claude T., yet she fears that he will go to hell because of his preoccupation with his Cadillac and diamond ring. In the same novel, Alease Harvey dotes on her son, Stephen, cares for her alcoholic brother, and pines for her overworked husband.

In Raney love again permeates the text. Raney, though married and living away from home, maintains strong ties to her younger siblings, her older relatives, and to her parents. She spends time with her younger sister and brother, and she would never dream of not being an integral part of their lives. Raney's family is large, loud, and expressive while her husband's family is small, quiet, and reserved. Both families, though, display deep love for their members, yet their different styles of communicating this love lead to many troubles within Charles's and Raney's relationship. Ultimately, however, during Raney and Charles's first year of married life, the couple embarks upon rough waters that are calmed by the love that they develop and the respect which they eventually gain for each other and for each one's family.

In Memory of Junior the character Faison holds such a great love for his wife's son that upon the child's death, Faison purchases a grave marker that has Faison's name with Jr. appended to replace the one that his wife, June Lee, has ordered with the child's legal name engraved upon it. Even though the child's paternity is uncertain, Faison loves this child tremendously. Toward the end of the text, June Lee and Faison read the child's journal from school in which he has written about the good times that he has shared with Faison. This touching scene reflects the love that the youngster possesses for his stepfather.

Edgerton's works vividly depict small town communities of the South without relying upon stereotypes or belittling the dignity of the characters. Edgerton shows the South as it is, warts and all. He creates realistic and well-developed characters who represent the contemporary every man. These characters display unceasing hypocrisy, a well-entrenched interest in religion, and many kinds of love which make Edgerton's characters realistic, interesting, and perplexing, all at the same time. Edgerton's works leave readers with the desire to always read more about these characters, who like many of our relatives, trouble, interest, and enlighten us.

-Lisa Abney

ELDRED-GRIGG, Stevan (Treleaven)

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Grey Valley, New Zealand, 5 October 1952. Education: University of Canterbury, Christchurch, 1970–74, M.A. (honours) 1975; Australian National University, 1975–78, Ph.D. 1978. Family: Married in 1976 (marriage dissolved, 1994); three sons. Career: Postdoctoral fellow, University of Canterbury, 1981; writing fellow, 1986, scholar-in-letters, 1991, Victoria University; New Zealand writing fellow, University of Iowa, Iowa City. Awards: A.W. Reed memorial book award, 1984; Commonwealth Writers prize, 1988. Agent: Curtis Brown, P.O. Box 19, Paddington, New South Wales 2021, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Oracles and Miracles. Auckland and New York, Penguin, 1987. The Siren Celia. Auckland, Penguin, 1989. The Shining City. Auckland, Penguin, 1991. Gardens of Fire. Auckland, Penguin, 1993. Mum. Auckland, Penguin, 1995. Blue Blood. Auckland and New York, Penguin, 1997.

Short Stories

Of Ivory Accents (novella). N.p., n.d.

Plays

Radio Play: Oracles and Miracles, from his own novel, 1989.

Other

A Southern Gentry: New Zealanders Who Inherited the Earth. Wellington, Reed, 1980.

A New History of Canterbury. Dunedin, McIndoe, 1982.

Pleasures of the Flesh: Sex and Drugs in Colonial New Zealand 1840–1915, 1984

New Zealand Working People, 1890–1990. Palmerston North, Dunmore Press, 1990.

My History, I Think. Auckland, Penguin, 1994.

The Rich: A New Zealand History. Auckland and New York, Penguin, 1996.

*

Manuscript Collection: Macmillan Brown Library, University of Canterbury, Christchurch, New Zealand.

Stevan Eldred-Grigg comments:

I'm a provincial writer, a writer of social comedy. My province is Canterbury, centred on the city of Christchurch. It's the comedy of a little white world, a small society, a very precise place. My novels resemble my province, a province whose history is as long or short as the history of the novel. A province civil, sociable, not unconcerned with style.

We write, though. We lie. We make meanings where there can be no meaning.

* * *

In the mid-1980s Stevan Eldred-Grigg switched his attention from history to fiction in order to challenge the customary "literary portrait of working class life" in New Zealand, which he saw as being "very remote from working class reality."

I knew ... that most of the people who had written serious history and fiction in New Zealand during the middle years of the twentieth century had been male and Pakeha. I also knew ... that most had been middle class... . The worker who turned up in the pages of mid twentieth century literature was almost always a man... . And these working men were not only male, they were usually also itinerant, solitary and homeless. The working man was Man Alone. He lived in a world of "casual workers and rouseabouts," "station hands and street loungers."

In a series of short stories and in his celebrated first novel, Oracles and Miracles—though not in a much earlier novella, Of Ivory Accents, which predates his socialist convictions—Eldred-Grigg set out to focus on the city rather than the country and on women rather than men. Rehabilitation of the Maori he has evidently left to New Zealand's rapidly expanding body of Maori writers.

Oracles and Miracles does not have a strong story line. Based on interviews with actual working-class women (and originally conceived as an oral history), it simply documents the lives of Ginnie and Fag from their births in 1929 through the Depression and World War II to their twenty-first birthdays. The method is akin to the realism of Arnold Bennett, but it must be said that Eldred-Grigg is not yet as adept as Bennett at suggesting human depth beneath the welter of surface detail.

Ginnie, who does not deviate from the working-class context of her birth, enables Eldred-Grigg to evoke what he calls the "grit and texture" of the times. Her working-class dialect is particularly well realized. Fag's voice is different since—like Eldred-Grigg's own mother, incidentally—she has realized the Cinderella myth by marrying out of her class and has cleaned up her idiom. Whereas Ginnie makes political statements unconsciously (as when she observes that "the two words 'good' and 'work' didn't have anything to do with one another"), Fag can stand apart from her upbringing and comment on it quite explicitly. Thus when she shows her husband-to-be (who, incidentally, closely resembles Eldred-Grigg's own father) round the working-class suburb where she grew up, she tells us that she "started to see it in a new way, thinking how strange it was that to him all this seemed interesting, important, this dreary old stamping ground of South Christchurch." Here she has become the mouthpiece for Eldred-Grigg's own concern about the destruction of working-class culture by the capitalist ideology of consumerism promulgated by the media of the day—including a popular magazine called Miracles and Oracles.

Ironically, at the very moment when she recognizes the authenticity of working-class culture, Fag is already in the process of deserting it for what turns out to be a sterile bourgeois existence. Ginnie, on the other hand, finds a partner from within the working class and seems happier at the end. The novel has been criticized for its naive implication that "it's better to be working class and know it as long as you marry for love." The author himself insists that he did not intend this moral and that what he calls "the tragedy" of both sisters "is not that they don't find love but that they do."

These problems with the conclusion to Oracles and Miracles are not resolved by the disappointing sequel, The Shining City. Fag is still married—happily enough, it would seem, though she continues to live in a sterile middle-class suburb, where her behavior and idiom (now considerably closer to her working-class origins than they were in the earlier book) mark her out as an eccentric. But she is a minor character in the book, whereas Ginnie scarcely features. Instead the focus is on the formative years of two young men of the next generation: Fag's son, Ashley, and his cousin, Christopher, a scion of pure patrician stock.

The Shining City is in effect the obverse of Oracles and Miracles in that it focuses on the exploiting class rather than the exploited class. Eldred-Grigg the historian had already critiqued the Canterbury squattocracy mercilessly in his early works, A Southern Gentry, A New History of Canterbury, and Pleasures of the Flesh. In The Shining City and—more memorably—in The Siren Celia and Gardens of Fire he levels the same critique in fictional form. In all three novels an exploited working class is glimpsed from time to time, but the primary focus is on the foibles and corrupt practices of the landed gentry.

Gardens of Fire is closely based on fact. It is a compelling reconstruction of the disastrous fire of 1947 that destroyed Ballantynes—Christchurch's premier department store. Forty-one employees died in the blaze, and Eldred-Grigg's account rests the blame for their deaths squarely on the shoulders of their bosses.

The Siren Celia is based not on fact but on an earlier work of New Zealand fiction—George Chamier's A South Sea Siren, first published in 1895 and reprinted in 1970. Eldred-Grigg explains that he took from Chamier's novel "all the bits that I thought worked really well and reinforced the themes I wanted to take up. I fed these chunks into my computer. Then I deconstructed them all and built them up again the way I wanted them." Other material is introduced from Chamier's earlier novel, Philosopher Dick, and from the writings of Sarah Amelia Courage.

His principal purpose in modifying Chamier was, he explains, to emphasize "questions of gender and class." So the landed gentry of Canterbury are effectively satirized, and the siren (who in Chamier's account was—according to one critic—"altogether too snaky and sinuous for modern belief") is shown to be the victim of a series of boorish and incompetent men. It is in his depiction of one of these men, the protagonist, Richard Raleigh, that Eldred-Grigg departs most radically from his source. Chamier's "philosopher Dick" finally abjures the siren, takes up an honest profession, and seems set to marry the respectable Alice Seymour; Eldred-Grigg shows him degenerating into a corrupt entrepreneur with whom the siren is finally unfortunate enough to contract a marriage. Eldred-Grigg has done to Chamier precisely what Shaw's Plays Unpleasant did to the Victorian well-made play.

Eldred-Grigg also felt that Chamier "didn't have the ability to dramatize" and tried to remedy this deficiency. He wisely cut the chapters in Chamier that amount to miniature Socratic dialogues led by "philosopher Dick" (Raleigh), but his version of the actual events of the story is really no more dramatic than Chamier's; as in Oracles and Miracles and The Shining City, the text conveys little sense of felt experience, even when Raleigh purports to be succumbing to the charms of the siren.

Mum continues the story, now with Ginnie as seen from the viewpoint of her children Jimmy and Viv. The alternating first-person voices work surprisingly well, as does the use of a real person—New Zealand writer Ngaio Marsh—in Blue Blood. The novel depicts Marsh in 1929, when her career was just beginning, and places her in the middle of a mystery that calls to mind her later writings.

-Dick Corballis

ELLIOTT, Janice

Nationality: British. Born: Derby, 14 October 1931. Education: Nottingham High School for Girls; Oxford University, 1950–53, B.A. (honours) 1953. Family: Married Robert Cooper in 1959; one son. Career: Journalist, House and Garden, House Beautiful, Harper's Bazaar, and Sunday Times, all London, 1954–62; since 1964 freelance reviewer, Sunday Telegraph, Sunday Times, Times, and New Statesman, all London. Awards: Southern Arts award, 1981. Fellow, Royal Society of Literature, 1989. Agent: Vivien Green, Richard Scott Simon Ltd., 43 Doughty Street, London WC1N 2LF, England. Address: Dolphin House, Trafalgar Square, Fowey, Cornwall PL23 1AX, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Cave with Echoes. London, Secker and Warburg, 1962.

The Somnambulists. London, Secker and Warburg, 1964.

The Godmother. London, Secker and Warburg, 1966; New York, Holt Rinehart, 1967.

The Buttercup Chain. London, Secker and Warburg, 1967.

The Singing Head. London, Secker and Warburg, 1968.

Angels Falling. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Knopf, 1969.

The Kindling. London, Secker and Warburg, and New York, Knopf, 1970.

England Trilogy:

A State of Peace. London, Hodder and Stoughton, and New York, Knopf, 1971.

Private Life. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1972.

Heaven on Earth. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1975.

A Loving Eye. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1977.

The Honey Tree. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1978.

Summer People. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1980.

Secret Places. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1981.

The Country of Her Dreams. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1982. Magic. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1983.

The Italian Lesson. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1985; New York, Beaufort. 1986.

Dr. Gruber's Daughter. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1986.

The Sadness of Witches. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1987.

Life on the Nile. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1989.

Necessary Rites. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1990.

City of Gates. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1992.

Figures in the Sand. London, Sceptre, 1994.

Short Stories

The Noise from the Zoo. London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1991.

Other (for children)

The Birthday Unicorn. London, Gollancz, 1970.

Alexander in the Land of Mog. Leicester, Brockhampton Press, 1973.

The Incompetent Dragon. London, Blackie, 1982.

The King Awakes. London, Walker Books, 1987.

The Empty Throne. London, Walker Books, 1988.

*

Janice Elliott comments:

I have always tried to avoid writing in a way that might invite categorisation in either subject matter or treatment. The result is a body of work ranging from the bizarre and darkly magical (Dr. Gruber's Daughter, Magic, The Sadness of Witches) to the social realism of the England Trilogy and the poignancy of Secret Places—set in the war-time Midlands where I grew up.

I make frequent use of myth, which fascinates me (most overtly in The Singing Head). So does modern history (Angels Falling set in Britain 1901–68; Life on the Nile, Egypt today and in the 1920s). The domestic scene has interested me only when it is set in and interacts with, the larger, outer world (e.g. the menace of the authoritarian state in Necessary Rites). A sense of place is vital to me, even when I have invented a country (The Country of Her Dreams).

I have been consistent only in my aspiration, my attempt each time to try something that will set me a fresh challenge as a writer. I am consistent too, in my conviction that style is not the icing on the cake but an organic and essential element in a good novel. If there is one recurring theme it may be the fall from grace, the image of exile from the garden.

In the last decade I have felt an urge to get out of England (mentally, imaginatively, and physically), and so made use of a number of foreign settings (The Italian Lesson, Life on the Nile).

I have also been more drawn by humour, sometimes to the forefront, more often as a bright, sharp thread in the weave. I believe that as a result, my novels may become more accessible to a wider audience.

Given my inclination to dash off in different directions, I have been lucky in my critical reception. Not that I could have done otherwise. I am an entirely intuitive writer, often astonished to find myself where I am and in what company (e.g. with Hitler in an attic in North Oxford in Dr. Gruber's Daughter).

* * *

Most of Janice Elliott's carefully crafted novels share the same background (the affluent English middle-class), the same period of time, the same preoccupation with the menopausal crises of well-established marriages, and, to a surprising extent, the same characters under different names. The Farmers of The Italian Lesson, the Tylers of Summer People, the Contis of Magic, the Watermans of The Sadness of Witches, the Franklands of Necessary Rites, appear to be all in admired and envied perfect marriages, while in private they are becoming estranged, even hostile to one another. Infidelity in thought and deed is commonplace, but the real issue seems to be a questioning of the need to continue living together.

The stress is on women's strength and ability to survive while men crack up and break. When disaster strikes, women will instinctively carry on with the daily round, knowing its therapeutic value ("cooking being an orderly process, a gesture, in a small way, against chaos.") Repeatedly Elliott emphasises the value of feminine friendships ("Friends ... are family nowadays, which is why there is so much kissing. For whatever reason, we seem to feel the need to touch"), in which there is unspoken understanding, the "dolphin language, mind to mind communication."

It is perhaps inevitable in these times when modish, halfunderstood cults and myths are elbowing out Christianity, that the bond between women should take the surprising form of a witches' coven, as in Magic.

Set against the praise of friendships between women is the recurrent theme of the absence of any such understanding between a mother and her daughter. Hinted at in The Italian Lesson, it is openly declared in Summer People ("she never cared for her mother because they were alike. And who can bear for long speaking to a mirror?"), and in The Sadness of Witches and Necessary Rites.

Conversely Elliott emphasizes the strength of the bond between a mother and her adolescent son (Summer People, The Sadness of Witches, Necessary Rites). There is a marked similarity both of physical appearance and of turn of mind between all these boys, as there is also between the young girls who float in and out of these people's houses and lives: long-haired, bare-foot flower children with little in the way of conversation and a terrifying egocentricity.

Some of the minor characters too bear an uncanny resemblance to one another (Felix Wanderman in The Italian Lessons and Max Stiller in Life on the Nile are both wise, elderly, Jewish, widowed, close to death—and sporting the same tufts of cottonwool after shaving).

Such similarities may perhaps be expected in a novelist who restricts herself largely to chronicle one small section of society. They are not due to a poverty of imagination; when she chooses Elliott can exercise her imagination with astonishing results: in Dr. Gruber's Daughter Adolf Hitler is hiding in a North Oxford attic, while his daughter, the offspring of an incestuous affair with his half-sister, roams leafy Oxford, a wraith from hell, in search of human and feline victims to devour. In Magic Sir Oliver and his housekeeper practise the skill of out-of-body experiences, and in The Sadness of Witches Martha, like the witches in Macbeth, can cause storms at sea and wreck or save boats.

The style is plain, straightforward; indeed in The Italian Lesson the short sentences seem to mimic those of the heroine's Italian phrase book. The form is usually that of a straight narrative; the horrors of bomb scares, car crashes, oil spills, murder, and suicide are all the more telling for this plainness. Only in Life on the Nile do we find a more complex form: the present-day story of Charlotte Hamp's experiences in Egypt is interwoven with extracts from the diary of her great-aunt who had lived in Egypt in the 1920s and was murdered there. This temporal crosscutting appears to even greater advantage in Figures in the Sand, which depicts the dying Roman Empire—only it is in the future, in a world of armored vehicles and cell phones. Christianity has been outlawed again, a fact that affects General Fidus Octavius's believing wife Livia, but not the agnostic general, who haunts a Syrian necropolis in hopes of finding proof that an afterlife truly exists.

Characteristic perhaps of most novels which present life through a woman's eyes are the descriptions of the small pleasures with which women shore up their lives. But always there is an undercurrent of unease beneath the calm surface ("a small daily terror"). In this respect particularly Elliott is a true chronicler of her chosen society.

-Hana Sambrook

ELLIS, Alice Thomas

Pseudonym for Anna Margaret Haycraft. Nationality: British. Born: Anna Margaret Lindholm in Liverpool, 9 September 1932; grew up in Penmaenmawr, Wales. Education: Bangor County Grammar School, Gwynedd; Liverpool School of Art; postulant, Convent of Notre Dame de Namur, Liverpool. Family: Married the publisher Colin Haycraft in 1956; four sons and one daughter (and one daughter and one son deceased). Career: Director, Duckworth, publishers, London. Columnist ("Home Life"), the Spectator, London, the Universe, London, 1989–91; and for The Catholic Herald. Awards: Welsh Arts Council award, 1977; Yorkshire Post award, 1986. Address: 22 Gloucester Crescent, London NW1 7DY, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Sin Eater. London, Duckworth, 1977.

The Birds of the Air. London, Duckworth, 1980; New York, Viking Press, 1981.

The 27th Kingdom. London, Duckworth, 1982; Wakefield, Rhode Island, Moyer Bell, 1999.

The Other Side of the Fire. London, Duckworth, 1983.

Unexplained Laughter. London, Duckworth, 1985; New York, Harper, 1987.

The Inn at the Edge of the World. London, Viking, 1990.

The Summerhouse Trilogy. London, Penguin, 1991; New York, Penguin, 1994

The Clothes in the Wardrobe. London, Duckworth, 1987.

The Skeleton in the Cupboard. London, Duckworth, 1988.

The Fly in the Ointment. London, Duckworth, 1989.

Pillars of Gold. London, Viking, 1992; Wakefield, Rhode Island, Moyer Bell, 2000.

The Evening of Adam. Harmondsworth, England, Viking, 1994. Fairy Tale. Wakefield, Rhode Island, Moyer Bell, 1998.

Uncollected Short Story

"Away in a Niche," in Spectator (London), 21–28 December 1985.

Other

Natural Baby Food: A Cookery Book (as Brenda O'Casey). London, Duckworth, 1977; as Anna Haycraft, London, Fontana, 1980.

Darling, You Shouldn't Have Gone to So Much Trouble (cookbook; as Anna Haycraft), with Caroline Blackwood. London, Cape, 1980.

Home Life. London, Duckworth, 1986; New York, Akadine Press, 1997.

Secrets of Strangers, with Tom Pitt-Aikens. London, Duckworth, 1986.

More Home Life. London, Duckworth, 1987.

Home Life 3. London, Duckworth, 1988.

Loss of the Good Authority: The Cause of Delinquency, with Tom Pitt-Aikens. London, Viking, 1989.

Home Life 4. London, Duckworth, 1989.

A Welsh Childhood, photographs by Patrick Sutherland. London, Joseph, 1990; Wakefield, Rhode Island, Moyer Bell, 1997.

Cat Among the Pigeons: A Catholic Miscellany. London, Flamingo, 1994.

Editor, Mrs. Donald, by Mary Keene. London, Chatto and Windus, 1983.

Editor, Wales: An Anthology. London, Collins, 1989.

* *

In all her books Alice Thomas Ellis takes the form of the upperclass social comedy and turns it inside out, with mordant, often uncomfortable wit, satire (some of it quite savage), and a gift for dialogue which means much more than is apparent, in a background which alternates between the country (usually Wales) and London, patches of which must be regarded as the author's own territory.

Her first novel, The Sin Eater, is set in Wales, where the Welsh have given up farming and taken to preying on the holidaymaker. In a country house, near a small resort which has declined since its prewar heyday, the Captain, patriarch of the family, lies dying, unable to speak or move. Only a matter of time, says the doctor, cheerfully. Not much grief is shown by the family assembling to say goodbye to him. Henry, the eldest son and heir, lives with his wife Rose and the twins in the family home. Visiting are younger brother Michael, his wife Angela, and Edward, a Fleet Street literary journalist, object of Angela's love (or lust). Ministering incompetently to the household is Phyllis, her son Jack ("Jack the Liar") and Gomer, Phyllis's adored but highly unpleasant grandson. The outsider is Ermyn, youngest daughter of the house, back from a secretarial course in London, regarded by the rest as half-witted (in fact she is slightly deaf, following measles in childhood, but no one has noticed). Rose (like Ellis) is a Roman Catholic, a brilliant organizer, one who arranges food, houses, and circumstances to disconcert others. Angela (who hates her) is disoriented by being put in a room newly arranged in 1930s style. A killing meal is eaten shortly before the cricket match of village versus Squire. When the village wins, for the first time, there follows a vengeful and dismaying Welsh saturnalia. Rose loves only the twins (absent from all but the first and last page of the novel) and the terrifying denouement is a fitting end to the outpouring of spite and malice so deftly observed.

Christmas is a family time, and in The Birds of the Air, Mrs. Marsh decides to invite all the family, to try to cheer Mary, whose grief will neither disappear, nor be assuaged. Mary's sister Barbara has just discovered her husband's infidelity by overhearing a sniggered comment that suddenly makes sense. She is on the way to a breakdown. Mary's grief is an indescribable agony, unhelped by her Catholicism, over the death of her illegitimate son, Robin. Everyone is embarrassed by Mary's grief. Barbara makes an exhibition of herself, getting drunk and pursuing Hunter, who rejects her. Social embarrassment to the last degree forms the basis for some hard, sharp things said about the nature of grief, love, and family life.

The 27th Kingdom (shortlisted for the Booker prize in 1982) is set in Chelsea in the 1950s, where Aunt Irene (of distant Russian descent) lives with her nephew Kyril in a pretty little house. Chelsea is still very socially mixed, and the cast includes the O'Connors, a large family of criminal Cockneys, and a passing parade of casual lodgers. The outsider and new lodger is Valentine, who wishes to be a nun, but has been sent out to see more of the world by Reverend Mother, who is Aunt Irene's sister. Valentine is, most inconveniently, a saint, as well as being very beautiful, and black. As in all the novels, the four last things of the Catholic Church—death and judgment, heaven and hell—loom in the background. Aunt Irene loves Kyril, but recognizes that he is evil and wicked. Both she and Mrs O'Connor, the Cockney matriarch, recognize the goodness of Valentine. Once again, it's very funny, and slightly more gentle in tone. Food plays its part, and so does Focus, a charming, beautiful, and amusing cat.

The Other Side of the Fire brings together a number of themes which can be claimed as standard ingredients in the Ellis novel. Claudia Bohannon is the second wife of Charles-they have two children of their own (absent at boarding school). Claudia finds herself inexplicably and shamingly in love with her stepson, Philip. Her confidante is Sylvie (living in the country, there are few congenial people around). Sylvie has given up love, and company, and has become a witch—or not, depending on how you view her. Certainly she has a familiar in the dog Gloria, evil-tempered and a perfect nuisance, rather like Sylvie's ex-husband, as one of the characters points out. Evvie, Sylvie's daughter, is writing a romantic novel along very predictable lines, containing stock characters like a Scottish vet with a dull fiancée, a housekeeper, a beautiful promiscuous girl, a mad Laird. Unfortunately and hilariously the characters from the novel invade life, and vice versa. Claudia is sweet but dim—it takes a brick dropped by Evvie before she realizes what everyone else knows—that Philip is a charming and unscrupulous homosexual. The book meditates on various forms of love-and its transitory naturetouching all but the maternal, which, as in The Sin Eater, is so important that it is never mentioned.

Unexplained Laughter is set in Wales, where Lydia, a tough London journalist, has retreated to get over a broken heart. With her is Betty, who is nice, but a bore. The only company (typically, a small group of characters at each other's throats) is a family. Hywel, a farmer, is married unhappily to Elizabeth; Angharad, his youngest sister, is speechless and considered mad but is not as mad as all that; Beuno, the younger brother, is studying for the ministry. There is also the doctor, formerly Elizabeth's lover. Lydia is witty and cruel. It is only when she starts hearing unexplained laughter in the air round the cottage, and she talks to Beuno about the existence of God and the devil that she begins to develop into a more human being and allows herself to become fond of others. The devil is at work; they are a nasty bunch, with exceptions. Beuno is some kind of saint, Betty is pleasant and dull, Angharad is a visionary, and Lydia is improving her soul. Beuno exorcises the laughter, and it disappears. Whatever it was, he considered it evil.

In Fairy Tale, young Simon and Eloise forsake the sinful pleasures of the city for a bucolic life of meditation, but Simon soon becomes alienated by his partner's mystic flights of fancy. She longs for a baby, which Simon refuses to provide her, so instead she goes wandering about the countryside, in hills haunted by a sexual predator, and eventually returns bearing a strange infant. Pillars of Gold almost seems to view the same situation from another angle: this time a young woman, an American named Barbs, has apparently succumbed to the clutches of a murderer, and is found dead in a canal. Her suburban London neighbors speculate as to the cause of the murder, and the outcome reveals facts about their community of which they would gladly have remained unaware.

These short novels are written with an uncanny ear for contemporary dialogue, the flash of steel beneath the apparently harmless words. There is a great deal said about the Catholic church, life, death, food, love, children, and the existence of evil, the devil in our midst ("Stan," Lydia calls him, a nickname for "Satan"). Only in the short story, "Away in a Niche," in which a tired housewife swaps places with the local saint for the three worst days of Christmas, do we get anything like a cheerful, happy conclusion.

-Philippa Toomey

ELLIS, Bret Easton

Nationality: American. Born: Los Angeles, 7 March 1964. Education: Bennington College, Vermont, B.A. 1986. Agent: International Creative Management, 40 West 57th Street, New York, New York 10019, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Less Than Zero. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1985; London, Pan, 1985.

The Rules of Attraction. New York, Simon and Schuster, 1987; London, Picador, 1988.

American Psycho. New York, Vintage, and London, Picador, 1991. The Informers. New York, Knopf, and London, Picador, 1994. Glamorama. New York, Knopf, 1999.

Film Adaptations: Less Than Zero, 1987; American Psycho, 2000.

* * *

Bret Easton Ellis's novels to date explore the apathy, boredom, and alienation of the "brat pack" or "blank generation" of affluent white youth in the United States in the 1980s. Whether set in Los Angeles (Less Than Zero and The Informers), a New England college (The Rules of Attraction), New York (American Psycho), or London and Paris (Glamorama), each of these novels represents the homogenizing and dehumanizing effect of late capitalist consumer culture. Through his cipher-like characters, who are mostly distinguished from each other only by the brand names of their designer clothes, Ellis traces the metonymies of desire in a culture where sex and the body are commodified and, like drugs, alcohol, and MTV, are addictively consumed.

The desire for excess that is underlain by ennui is recorded in an affectless and "stunned" prose style that is arguably mimetic of a "depthless" postmodern culture. Each of the novels has occasioned controversy as to whether this flat style merely reproduces the nihilistic lassitude of its characters or whether, through verisimilitude, Ellis is indeed offering a critique of the ethics of the society that he represents. This controversy culminated in the critical reception of American Psycho, Ellis's tale of serial killing and mass murder in yuppie Manhattan. This novel was variously perceived as a devastating indictment of the erosion of ethics by capitalism in the Reaganite 1980s, as a virulent brand of pornography thinly veiled as mainstream art for the middle classes, and as simply an aesthetic failure because it did not manage to create a metaphor for the violence that it repetitively detailed.

Arguably, each of Ellis's novels expresses a yearning for a meaningful reality that seems inaccessible through the inauthentic simulations of consumer culture. Less Than Zero, which begins with the observation that "people are afraid to merge on the freeways in Los Angeles," a statement of disconnection that becomes a refrain in the novel, describes the spiraling loss of ethical bearings experienced by the narrator, Clay, as he spends a Christmas vacation in Los Angeles, away from his college in the East. The various forms of consumption—sex, shopping, drugs, alcohol—that dominate the lives of Clay and his peers fail to signify for Clay. He is haunted by the menacing extremity of the desert, by reports of random violence and disaster, and by childhood memories that disclose psychic violence within a family where, in the end, "nobody's home." Passivity becomes voyeurism and consumption becomes pornographic spectacle as Clay is an unresisting witness to scenes of forced prostitution and gang rape. Nathaniel West's Hollywood of the 1930s is echoed by the broodingly apocalyptic vision of Los Angeles in the 1980s with which Ellis leaves us: "The images I had were of people being driven mad by living in the city. Images of parents who were so hungry and unfulfilled that they ate their own children."

The East Coast, an absent referent that would potentially signify in Ellis's first novel, fails to offer an authentic alternative to the artifice of Los Angeles in his second novel, The Rules of Attraction. The interior monologues of the three main characters and their somewhat indeterminate peers register the fluidity of desire that is sometimes shaped by romantic narratives but that ultimately is 'haphazard and random ... episodic, broken ... [showing] no sense of events unfolding from prior events,' to quote from the epigraph by Tim O'Brien, which serves to interpret the ensuing trajectory of the novel.

Ellis's apparent withholding of explicit moral comment on the spiritual impoverishment of the culture that his novels represent was critically perceived as being more problematic in his detailed account of the activities of Patrick Bateman, the eponymous "American Psycho." In contrast to the classic realist novel, here no "deep" psychological exploration of or explanation for the protagonist's actions is offered. Instead, the reader is immediately introduced into the hermetic world of New York consumer culture with the opening words of the novel: "Abandon all hope ye who enter here...." The randomness of desire that was the subject of The Rules of Attraction is now replaced by a deterministic consumerism whereby the serial killer is the parodic extremity of a cultural logic that reifies people and stimulates an addiction to excess that only violence can temporarily assuage.

If the relation between author, text, and reader is ambiguous in American Psycho, authorial comment seems foregrounded through the narrative strategies of The Informers. An impressionistic composite of narrative voices, this novel presents the estrangement between the generations and between the sexes in affluent Los Angeles. Images of anomie and personal and familial dissociation are interwoven with scenes of sexual violence that accelerate as the novel shifts into gothic fantasy, with vampires preying on their victims, and then moves toward a conclusion with the depiction of the sexual assault, torture, and murder of a child. The willfully blind romantic fantasy that concludes the novel would seem to draw attention to the cultural disavowal of what Ellis, speaking of the 1980s, has described as "the absolute banality of a perverse decade."

However, by the time of Glamorama, Ellis's stance as critic of a decade had lost most of the already modest moral punch it carried. There was the fact that Ellis himself, like many who criticized the 1980s, had done quite well in that decade, a period whose principal fault seemed to be that people made money during that time. In the 1990s, with the 1980s fading into memory—and with Wall Street generating far more millionaires than anyone in the "greedy" 1980s could ever have imagined—Ellis's posturing seemed all the more absurd, particularly given his origins among the nation's aristocracy. Plenty of critics still professed to find something new in the tired eighties-bashing of American Psycho, which found a new audience with its release as a motion picture, but Glamorama provided evidence that perhaps the author protested a bit too much. Set among the high-fashion upper echelons of London and Paris, the book was supposed to be another indictment of wealth and glamor, but Ellis's descriptions of the world inhabited by male models belie a certain fascination with that world—rather like a preacher who takes just a bit too much interest in condemning prostitution. The novel has a more traditional and discernible plot than its predecessors—a mysterious Mr. Palakon hires male model Victor Ward to save a film star in Paris from international terrorists—but is laden with threadbare postmodern narrative tricks. "So you're telling me we can't believe in anything we're shown anymore," Victor tells Mr. Palakon at one point. "I'm asking, 'That everything is altered? That everything's a lie? That everyone will believe this?"" Indeed.

-Joanna Price, updated by Judson Knight

ELLIS, Trey

Nationality: American. Born: Washington, D.C., 1962. Education: Attended Stanford University. Agent: c/o Publicity Department, Simon & Schuster, 1230 Avenue of the Americas, New York, New York 10020, U.S.A. Address: Santa Monica, California, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Platitudes. St. Paul, Minnesota, Vintage Books, 1988. Home Repairs. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1993. Right Here, Right Now. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1999.

Plays

Screenplays: The Inkwell (as Tom Ricostranza). Buena Vista Pictures, 1994.

Television Plays: Cosmic Slop/Space Traders. Home Box Office, 1994.

*

Critical Studies: A Moveable Feast (television documentary). South Carolina Educational Television/WETA-TV, 1991.

* * *

Among the vanguard of emerging African-American novelists, Trey Ellis is chiefly known for his highly celebrated first novel Platitudes and the multicultural, slightly apolitical "New Black Aesthetic' it cleverly demonstrates. Claiming to speak for other predominantly middle- to upper-class African-American males from filmmaker Spike Lee to hip-hop's Chuck D, Ellis describes the "New Black Aesthetic," or NBA, as a "post-liberated" compilation of "cultural mulattos" whose members are shamelessly assimilative (if not assimilationist) of both white and black forms of cultural production. To the NBA tragic rock icon Jim Morrison is just as significant as novelist Toni Morrison. Thus, the NBA is much less skeptical of commodity culture, embracing the multicultural utopianism of commercialization, MTV, and brand name identification. However, this bold espousal of what Karl Marx might have referred to as "false consciousness," comes at the expense of what W.E.B. Du Bois might call "race consciousness."

Ostensibly motivated by an urge to free the novelist from the limitations of "race" literature in which the African-American novelist must always address issues of race, Ellis refreshingly flouts the reader's expectation of "authentic" blackness. Instead of presenting familiar themes of racial misery and uplift, Ellis offers other kinds of African-American people, experiences, and lifestyles less visible in popular representations such as those of the black middle class, whose yuppies, preppies, and nerds have been routinely suppressed or villainized in traditional African American literary discourses. Set up as a panacea to internal fissures, Ellis's NBA attempts to mediate the aesthetic, social, racial, and even gender divisions of the black community that, in the universe of the novel Platitudes, polarizes into two recognizable factions: the masculine 1960s Black Arts Movement associated with Ishmael Reed and Amira Baraka, and the 1970–80s Womanist Movement as represented by Alice Walker and Toni Morrison. And although Ellis claims to satirize both traditions equally, his work has been charged with perpetuating sexism by returning obsessively to themes that glorify the adolescent male libido and mark the triumph of heterosexual attraction and patriarchal desire over political, racial, and class distinctions.

Like all works of metafiction, Platitudes is aware of its own writing. How to write the novel is precisely where the story begins.

Troubled by the vexed politics of race representation, Ellis's fictionalized experimentalist author Dewayne Wellington attempts to write a coming-of-age love story centering around the character of Earle, a chubby, adolescent geek more interested in computers, doing well on his PSATs, watching TV game shows, and getting laid than in the usual perilous activities found in typical narratives of black youth. After admitting failure, Dewayne pleads for assistance in plotting his quirky tale and invites readers to respond to an address under the title of "Which Ones Do I Kill?" He is answered by Isshee Ayam, Ellis's caricature of a Womanist or Black Feminist novelist who promptly inserts her own version of how the tale should begin. Her Earle inhabits a poor rural community sometime in the early 1900s and somewhere in Lowndes County, Georgia. He is suddenly the only male in a family of strong women held together by a frying pan wielding exaggeration of the self-sacrificing black matriarch. Thus, Isshee Ayam models the authentic mode of racially conscious storytelling, which not unhumorously parodies Alice Walker's The Color Purple. But Ellis makes it clear that neither is Isshee Ayam's illiterate Earle any more authentic than Wellington's portly genius. As an antidote to Ayam's inserted chapter re-writes, Wellington follows each of her revisions with a profusion of expansive stream-ofconsciousness exposition full of movie dialogue, snatches of TV commercials, and other extraneous texts such as photos of Earle's apartment, portions of a ludicrous PSAT exam, and a similarly marked answer sheet to Earle's high school sex survey.

Out of the dialectic clash of gendered narrative techniques, Wellington's Earle emerges much changed from what he is at the beginning of the story, not least because his Jewish girlfriend is replaced, his mother quits her job working for a South African airline, and he finds himself promoting African American voting. And although this increase in Earle's politics seems directly the result of Wellington's association with Ayam, the parody of the Womanist position never quite disappears, especially at the end of the novel when the two authors meet only to consummate their relationship. By having Wellington write himself into a sexual mood that he cannot attain naturally, Ellis seems to be reasserting a connection between masculine sexuality and creativity once again at the expense of objectifying women as well as satirizing feminism. According to this patriarchal logic, hypermasculine and heteronormative sexuality trumps all differences. And if this sexuality is slightly sentimentalized as puppy love in Platitudes, it is brazen to the point of controversy in Ellis's next two novels.

Indeed, Home Repairs may be seen as a continuation of Earle's story, only now the plot focuses exclusively on its hero's sexual conquests. Intelligent, libidinous, and neurotic Austin McMillan sets out to keep a diary (ironically based on Puritan spiritual diary writing) of his sexual exploits but indirectly records his rites of passage through manhood. Spanning Austin's life from the early 1970s and his experiences as an exceedingly well-to-do African American at Andover school and Stanford to the late 1980s when he becomes the host of a TV fix-it show, the diary is comprised of sexual "firsts" often containing lengthy descriptions of women's body parts peppered with occasional moments of reflection. A similar angst infuses Austin as it does Earle. Both obsess over TV, pornography, and how they appear to women, yet both worry over exactly the type of racial issues that their narratives seem to downplay. Indeed, those moments in Home Repairs in which Austin considers such issues are few, as when he insists upon going to a black prostitute for his first time instead of a white one. Nevertheless, the novel has been read by many critics as less literary than Platitudes.

Although as an epistolary pastiche Home Repairs provides further evidence of Ellis's postmodern play with narrative form, many critics find its obsessive descriptions of sexual scenes more tedious than scintillating. Behind this sexual monotony Ellis may be intentionally drawing attention to our cultural thresholds for tolerating such characters, perhaps offering an insipid but relentless eroticism precisely in order to reveal the commercial constructedness of desire. But in the process, his revered aesthetic of "cultural mulattoism" is reduced to an offensive version of "thirty-one flavors." Difference is redefined in the novel as a sexual smorgasbord of beautiful ethnic women for the Epicurean Austin to try.

In Right Here, Right Now Ellis offers yet another version of what we may call the typical Ellis protagonist in Ashton Robinson, an upper-class, globe-trotting genius. In the same way that Austin McMillan's story seems to be an extension of Earle's, so too does Ashton's tale seem to pick up exactly where Austin's television popularity leaves off. Completing the third installment of the Ellis hero's life, Ashton Robinson grows weary of the very same television fame that the hero of Home Repairs desired. Robinson turns his back on his infomercial celebrity to embark on a spiritual journey initiated by dream visions—the result of an evening's debauch of drugs and long expired cough syrup. He becomes the guru of his own religion called "axe" (aaa-shay). That axe is a Voo-dun spirit traceable to Africa mingles the novel's satiric jibes at America's ludicrous obsession with lucrative TV religions, New Age, Scientologists, psychics, and quack healers with a subtle endorsement of the genuine spirituality of traditional African-American folk traditions. Nevertheless, the hero's main objective is nothing so holy; he declares that the true path toward enlightenment involves orgiastic sex with his disciple's wives. And yet, Ashton undergoes a type of spiritual overhaul. His final insights diagnose the West in general as suffering from a "chronic cold of the soul" and, during a climactic interview for 60 Minutes, he reveals his own complicity in perpetuating America's moral malaise.

There are also interesting metafictional scenes in the novel. Just as Austin McMillan reflects upon the function of diaries in Home Repairs, Ashton is able to comment on the process of orally telling one's story—the book itself is meant to be the transcribed recordings of Ashton speaking into a microphone. Although Ellis's stylistic refashionings and profound witticism have often been the object of critical praise, his objectification of women has also been the target of critical censure. That Ellis has been charged with participating in a black masculinist tradition is not surprising given his aesthetic affinities with Ishmael Reed. Ellis's experimental approach matches Reed's zealous incorporation of techniques widely thought of as postmodern—even though the novels of both Reed and Ellis tend to support arguments made by Henry Louis Gates, Jr., and Phillip Brian Harper that techniques such as pastiche and metafiction are not new to Afrocentric aesthetics, but have always been central to the parodic, tricksterish practices of African-American storytelling.

-Michael A. Chaney

ELLROY, James

Nationality: American. Born: 1948. Family: 1) married (divorced 1991); 2) Helen Knode. Career: Has held a variety of jobs, including country club caddy, 1965–84. Since 1984, full-time writer. Agent:

Nat Sobel, Sobel Weber Assc., 146 East 19th St., New York, New York 10003, U.S.A. Address: 84 Siwanoy Blvd., Eastchester, New York 10707, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Brown's Requiem. New York, Avon, 1981; London, Allison and Busby, 1984.

Clandestine. New York, Avon, 1982; London, Allison and Busby, 1984

Blood on the Moon. New York, Mysterious Press, 1984; London, Allison and Busby, 1985.

Because the Night. New York, Mysterious Press, 1984; London, Century, 1987.

Suicide Hill. New York, Mysterious Press, 1986; London, Century, 1988

Killer on the Road. New York, Mysterious Press, 1986.

Silent Terror. New York, Mysterious Press, 1986; London, Arrow, 1990.

L.A. Quartet:

The Black Dahlia. New York, Mysterious Press, 1987; London, Mysterious Press UK, 1988.

The Big Nowhere. New York, Mysterious Press, 1988; London, Mysterious Press UK, 1989.

L.A. Confidential. New York and London, Mysterious Press, 1990.

White Jazz. New York, Knopf, and London, Random House, 1992.

American Tabloid. New York, Knopf, and London, Century, 1995.L.A. Noir. (contains Blood on the Moon, Because the Night, and Suicide Hill). New York, Mysterious Press, 1998.

Short Stories

Hollywood Nocturnes. New York, Knopf, 1994; as Dick Contino's Blues and Other Stories. London, Arrow, 1994.

Other

Murder and Mayhem: An A-Z of the World's Most Notorious Killers. London, Arrow, 1992.

My Dark Places: An L.A. Crime Memoir. New York, Knopf, 1996. Crime Wave: Reportage and Fiction from the Underside of L.A. New York, Vintage, 1999.

*

Film Adaptations: L.A. Confidential, 1997.

Manuscript Collection: Thomas Cooper Library, University of South Carolina, Columbia, South Carolina.

* * *

Labeling James Ellroy a writer of hardboiled crime or noir fiction oversimplifies his contribution to American imaginative writing. Although his earliest novels belong to the generic crime mode perfected by masters like Chandler, Cain, and MacDonald, the originality of recent works like Dick Contino's Blues and American Tabloid compel a different critical attention. After ten successful works of a pulp fiction both unsentimental and romantic, this unorthodox author began to depict life in America at the end of the 20th century as a remembered story of comically exaggerated criminality.

Similar traits stamp Ellroy's first two novels, Brown's Requiem and Clandestine, as the work of a gifted but unpracticed author: disturbed cops corrupted by the crime world they are supposed to combat; redeeming women who are (or were) hookers; sprawling, illmanaged plots loaded with depravity and violence. The second book replicates the framework of the murder of Ellroy's mother (which occurred in 1958 and remains unsolved), and it includes a portrait of himself as the young boy he was at the time of her death. His next projects were a long saga of the caper-filled life of gangster Bugsy Siegel and an extended epic of the Los Angeles underworld that concluded with the city's burning down. Persuaded to abandon The Confessions of Bugsy Siegel, Ellroy reworked and published the L.A. epic as Blood on the Moon in 1984. With his next two novels, Because the Night and Suicide Hill, it formed a trilogy about the brilliant but tainted L.A. cop, Lloyd Hopkins, described by New York magazine contributor Martin Kihn as "an evil-genius ... [who] becomes by the end of the series the archetypal Ellroy cop, indistinguishable from his prey and tortured by guilt." These were followed in 1986 by Killer on the Road, narrated by a serial killer named Martin Plunkett. Then Ellroy returned to the city and time of his own genesis—Los Angeles, from the late 1940s until 1958-to produce the four novels that constitute the "L.A. Quartet": The Black Dahlia, The Big Nowhere, L.A. Confidential, and White Jazz. Published between 1987 and 1992, they catapulted James Ellroy into the top rank of new, original crime fiction authors.

These progressively baroque stories of corruption, depravity, and violence turn Los Angeles into an emblematic urban inferno for our time. The Black Dahlia's hero is the sensitive ex-boxer, Bucky Bleichert, who joins the LAPD after World War II and is soon plunged into the famous 1947 "Black Dahlia" murder case, a social storm whipped up by the discovery of a young woman's mutilated body in a Los Angeles vacant lot. Obsessively pursuing a solution to the case (in reality it went unsolved), the naive Bleichert is personally transformed through a violent plot that parallels both the course of the murder investigation and the path of his relationships with fellow cops, a kindred detective partner, their shared lover, and a sexually irresistible female in her twenties who perversely relives the sordid career of the mysterious "Black Dahlia." Called by Harlan Ellison "the shocker other writers would kill to have written," The Black Dahlia is dedicated to "Geneva Hilliker Ellroy 1915-1958," and inscribed "Mother: Twenty-nine Years Later, This Valediction in Blood."

The heroes of the next three novels of the "L.A. Quartet" live, like Bucky Bleichert, in the region between morally unredeemable personal lives and the enveloping swamp of American urban corruption. Harboring terrible personal secrets, they are driven to accomplish something honest in their compromised lives, while also furiously compelled to identify the wellsprings of their spiritual torture. They move through plots that compound sensational incident and crazy complication at exponentially gathering paces, leading to tensilely wrought climaxes. Their adventures are narrated with a progressively condensed, high-energy expressiveness that mimics the several dictions of mainstream newspaper, sensational tabloid, gossip magazine, municipal bureaucracy, advertising agency, and police communication. Ellroy gives them speech and thought that convincingly captures the talk and intelligence of working cops, established gangsters, ethnic Los Angelenos, and most of the numerous types who populate the city's sprawling lowlife.

In The Big Nowhere, Ellroy employs a multiple point-of-view, his trio of compromised heroes carrying a three-strand plot that focuses on the early-1950s hunt for Communists in the movie business, the conspiracy between organized crime and the LAPD, and the growing phobia about homosexuality in American society. Young sheriff's deputy Danny Upshaw transforms his buried secret of unadmitted homosexuality into an obsessive zeal to prosecute the perpetrators of a string of revoltingly perverse sex murders. His counterparts, an ambitious police sergeant and an expulsed city cop turned private security guard, are similarly driven to compensate for self-perceived failures of character. The corrupt social system ultimately does them all in, leaving the Irish-born, diabolically conniving LAPD detective, Dudley Smith, to rule over the criminal infestation that defines American life more and more into the 1950s.

Dave Klein, the hero of White Jazz, is the most morally tortured cop-hero of the "Quartet." A sublimated incestuous relationship with his sister not only prevents his finding pleasure in women, but also shackles him psychologically to every prurient vice assignment. Everything in his barely tolerable environment stimulates his murderous inclinations, and his history of quasi-official executions and betrayals allows his departmental superiors to expose him to deadly hazards. Klein nevertheless succeeds in enlisting our sympathy, both by wrestling with his inner torment and by regarding his repulsive world honestly. In the most extreme act of unlawfulness yet committed by an Ellroy cop-hero, he exacts a ferocious revenge on the plot's lead villains, as penalty for which he suffers a beating so thorough that his physiognomy requires rebuilding. Thus disguised, he escapes his avengers and finds the freedom to set down this supposed "memoir" of horrible events in Los Angeles of the mid-1950s which we are reading.

The theme of an archetypal villainy rooted in the police mentality itself may dominate the four novels of the "L.A. Quartet," but Ellroy also injects them with an increasingly comic serum by portraying many of the secondary characters—especially the historically documentable gangsters and celebrities—as familiar caricatures. Although it seems clear that he means to suggest thereby the ludicrous influence wrought on the American imagination by these publicityfashioned personalities, with their outlandish behavior and bizarrely demotic lingo, some critics have found it callously offensive of Ellroy to bestow such unacceptable views and articulateness upon both his demi-heroes and their low-life confreres. But this presumed political incorrectness is also quite authentic, both behaviorally and linguistically. Indeed, the characters' aggregate argot constitutes a colorfully "hip" language all its own, a kind of fictively vulgar tongue for late century. These figures may therefore be heard as speaking in the submerged "voice of our time," uttering the unspoken views of a sickened national conscience. On this matter, Ellroy is quoted by Kihn as saying: "I think that social revisionism and political correctness make for very, very bad crime novels."

The 1994 collection of short pieces, Hollywood Nocturnes, offers an excellent sampling of Ellroy's developing dark-comic rendition of the world as a kaleidoscopic cartoon of corruption. The centerpiece of the compendium is the novella, Dick Contino's Blues, whose first-person narrator is the documentable Contino himself, a reasonably successful pop singer and accordionist of the 1950s. Ellroy has him tell a manic adventure story set in southern California, a tale of grade-Z Hollywood movies, sexual hustling, extortion, murder, and drug-dealing, enacted with a breathless brio by gangsters, politicians, moguls, detectives, and a gallery of L.A. citizenry—car salesmen, beat cops, real estate brokers, singers, hookers, waitresses, Disney artists, bureaucrats, small-time hoodlums, and every kind of proto-lounge lizard. In short, it is the usual Ellroy circus, but performing in a more than usually bizarre Ellroy plot.

Together with its introductory essay, "Out of the Past," Dick Contino's Blues encapsulates all the energies and impetuses of Ellroy's literary quest for his own life's significance, a creative destiny he has been pursuing unwittingly (it turns out) since the age of 30, when, after almost dying from drug and alcohol abuse three years earlier, he finally decided to start writing. His impetus for the novelistic experiment came from a recalled image of the entertaining Contino in a 1958 television appearance, an image that coalesced with a photograph, sent to him years later by a friend, taken of the ten-year-old Ellroy on June 22, 1958, minutes after he was told that his mother had been found murdered. As he relates in "Out of the Past:"

The photo held me transfixed; its force transcended my many attempts to exploit my past for book sales. An underlying truth zapped me: my bereavement, even in that moment, as ambiguous. I'm already calculating potential advantages, regrouping as the officious men surrounding me defer to the perceived grief of a little boy.

After he had framed the photo and stared at it for "a good deal of time," he writes, "Spark point: late '50s memories re-ignited." In his sparked memory, the "grade-Z movie" Daddy-O that Contino made after his career had been torpedoed by a charge of draft-dodging merges with Ellroy's awakening perception that the "L.A. Quartet" novels contain the significant secrets still locked in his own memory; these secrets now promise an emergent clarity because they have been re-contextualized by the chance juxtaposition of shocked boy's photo and lounge entertainer's television image, both deriving from the late 1950s. "Because I knew—instinctively—that he held important answers. I sensed that he could powerfully spritz narrative detail and fill up holes in my memory, bringing Los Angeles in the late '50s into some sort of hyper-focus.'' Memory, for Ellroy, is "that place where personal recollections collide with history."

Finding the 63-year-old Dick Contino in Las Vegas, the author of ten money-making crime novels confirmed the feeling that he was about to change direction in his writing. In two days of conversations—about how to adjust to shifting popular taste, what constitutes quality in popular entertainment, why the audience cannot be deprived of their easy entertainment—Ellroy solidified his sense that his "world had tilted toward a new understanding of my past." After the accordionist had serenaded him for his forty-fifth birthday, Ellroy says: "I asked Dick if he would consent to appear as the hero of a novella and my next novel." These would be books about "fear, courage and heavily compromised redemptions." Contino agreed, saying: "Good, I think I've been there."

These insights and the narrative action of Dick Contino's Blues make it possible to appreciate Ellroy's earlier fiction for more than the raw, sensational, titillating effects of its plots and narrative energies. At a deeper level, the maniacal violence and cold-bloodedness in them manifest the author's passionate need to understand the fullness of his half-buried personal memory, which had both haunted and eluded him. As he says, quoting Jung: "What is not brought to consciousness comes to us as fate." He refers both to his finding of Dick Contino and to his fictive sallies into the period shared by Contino's mid-life and his own childhood, the American post-Korea 1950s.

In American Tabloid, the novel he was writing as he also plotted the Contino novella, Ellroy breaks away from Los Angeles as his main fictive venue. The crime chronicler's American version of the City of Dis now spreads out to encompass all the sites of the momentous events leading to the assassination of John F. Kennedy. And the plot, tapping the several modes of contemporary American fiction that have already engaged this modern mythic material, gleefully tangles up the high-fictional doings of the Mafia, the CIA, the Kennedys, J. Edgar Hoover, Jimmy Hoffa, and the sundry organizations involved in early 1960s civil rights, racket-busting, Kennedy electioneering, the Bay of Pigs, and anti-Communism, not to omit a menagerie of Hollywood and showbiz characters ranging from Marilyn Monroe to Howard Hughes.

Miami, Chicago, New York, Los Angeles, New Orleans, and several other purviews of the Mob, the CIA, and the FBI intertwine to form a plot terrain that could compete, in its sweep and detail, with the combined features of Dali, Brueghel, Villon, and Rabelais. This ground is traversed with extreme modern facility by the novel's three maculate heroes: Kemper Boyd, a stone-souled free agent of conspiracy and a genius at multiple role-playing; Ward Littell, a guiltinfected repository of self-destructiveness and Jesuit-schooled moral absolutism, deteriorating sympathetically into a helpless American amorality; and Pete Bondurant, the hired hitman and dope-runner carried over from his minor role in White Jazz to discharge the duties of an old-fashioned fictional heavy who turns out to be a romantic. An introductory note, presuming the would-be narrative authority to "tell it like it is," declares that America, having long since lost its innocence, now needs to look at its recent traumatic history from the point of the view of the "bad little men" who have actually shaped it. These duly become the characters of Ellroy's most picaresque novel to date. American Tabloid presents the historic adventures of all the American rogues one can imagine participating in the early 1960s' commedia of Camelot, Cuba, and the CIA.

James Ellroy has declared that he wants to recreate the entire history of 20th-century America—"the story of bad white men" through crime fiction, thereby becoming "the Tolstoy of the crime novel." With the Contino novella and American Tabloid, he revealed a bold new direction to this design. He would not merely insert historical personages into his stories and rewrite their lives' facts, as docu-novelists like Norman Mailer and Don DeLillo were still doing; he would appropriate a still-living, modest entertainment figure from those "bad old days" like Dick Contino and make him the "improved" narrative hero of his memorial crime fictions. In this process, he would also refine the comic sensibility that has been growing through his years of holding off the demons of personal bitterness and egomania. As his friend Joseph Wambaugh told Martin Kihn: "I always suspect that beneath [his anger and intensity] there's a performer there .... You sort of know you're being put on when you're with James Ellroy-maybe even when you read him, in a sense." Ellroy's fictional performances, inspired by their fiercely unsentimental vision of our times, do indeed disclose a Beckett-like comedian who, spawned in Los Angeles, California, in the middle of the century, seems destined to chronicle its absurd, criminal course ironically—as if it were his own life's perfect metaphor. In the memoir My Dark Places, Ellroy explores the relationship between his early influences-most of all the murder of his mother-and his eventual development as a writer. "The 47-year-old man," he writes, "had to interrogate the 10-year-old boy."

—Peter W. Ferran

ELY, David

Nationality: American. Born: Chicago, Illinois, 19 November 1927. Education: The University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 1944–45; Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1947–49, B.A. 1949; St. Antony's College, Oxford (Fulbright scholar), 1954–55. Military Service: Served in the United States Navy, 1945–46, and the United States Army, 1950–52. Family: Married Margaret Jenkins in 1954; four children. Career: Reporter, St. Louis Post-Dispatch, 1949–50, 1952–54, 1955–56; administrative assistant, Development and Resources Corporation, New York, 1956–59. Awards: Mystery Writers of America Edgar Allan Poe award, for short story, 1962. Address: P.O. Box 1387, East Dennis, Massachusetts 02641, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Trot: A Novel of Suspense. New York, Pantheon, 1963; London, Secker and Warburg, 1964.

Seconds. New York, Pantheon, 1963; London, Deutsch, 1964.

The Tour. New York, Delacorte Press, and London, Secker and Warburg, 1967.

Poor Devils. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1970.

Walking Davis. New York, Charterhouse, 1972.

Mr. Nicholas. New York, Putnam, 1974; London, Macmillan, 1975.
A Journal of the Flood Year. New York, Fine, and London, Phoenix, 1992.

Short Stories

Time Out. New York, Delacorte Press, 1968; London, Secker and Warburg, 1969.

Always Home and Other Stories. New York, Fine, 1991.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "The Wizard of Light," in Amazing (New York), March 1962.
- "The Alumni March," in Cosmopolitan (New York), 1962.
- "McDaniels' Flood," in Elks Magazine (Chicago), 1963.
- "The Captain's Boarhunt," in Saturday Evening Post (Philadelphia), 21 March 1964.
- "The Assault on Mount Rushmore," in Cavalier (New York), July 1969.
- "The Carnival," in Antaeus (New York), 1971.
- "The Light in the Cottage," in Playboy (Chicago), 1974.
- "Starling's Circle," in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine (New York), July 1976.
- "The Running Man," in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine (New York), December 1976.
- "The Weed Killer," in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine (New York), May 1977.

- "The Temporary Daughter," in Seventeen (New York), April 1978.
- "The Rich Girl," in Seventeen (New York), July 1978.
- "The Looting of the Tomb," in Ellery Queen's Scenes of the Crime, edited by Ellery Queen. New York, Davis, 1979; London, Hale, 1981.
- "The Marked Man," in Best Detective Stories of the Year 1980, edited by Edward D. Hoch. New York, Dutton, 1980.
- "Methuselah," in Atlantic (Boston), March 1980.

* * *

David Ely's fiction describes the cost and conditions of freedom—what an ordinary man must do to understand himself and his world. His novels are shaped like thrillers; in each a man is driven onto a quest (initially for the wrong motives) which ultimately leads him to himself, to his unconscious mind, his heart. The novels describe with remarkable sensitivity individuals coping with worlds that are alien, inimical and all-powerful. The triumph of the individual spirit in hostile modern milieu is accompanied by pain and sorrow, loss of innocence and simple comfort, but it brings both self-knowledge and peace.

Trot, Ely's first novel, is subtitled "A Novel of Suspense" and predicates the world of all of Ely's fiction: an alien, minatory and hostile environment, in this case the Paris underworld after World War II. An Army CID man, Sergeant Trot, abruptly becomes the victim in a case on which he is assigned. Suspected of corruption and murder, he hides with the criminals he has stalked. The inversion of his world causes him to reassess his concepts of justice and freedom. Finally he is able to reinstate himself by breaking an extortion-murder plot by escaped Nazis. But the significant victory is Trot's own self-revelation.

In Seconds, probably Ely's best-known novel, a Babbitt-like man, a cipher known only by the code name "Wilson," abandons his comfortable but aimless upper-middle-class existence when a mysterious corporation offers him a new life, a second chance. He is surgically rehabilitated and supplied a total identity as a successful artist, but the new freedom proves too painful and challenging. Wilson disintegrates under the stress of his open and unfamiliar world of freedom and nonconformity. "I never had a dream," he says when he returns to the corporation to be erased.

The Tour deals with the same theme in a more terrifying form. A parable of American imperialism and military-scientific manipulation of other cultures, it describes a "tour" designed to provide jaded bourgeois travelers with ultimate thrills in a mythical Central American banana republic. The tour includes episodes of sex, jungle survival and guerrilla fighting, carefully staged for the fuddled gringos. Behind the scenes a test is made on an automated counterinsurgency weapon, a robot tank which wipes out a starveling guerrilla band (and its builders) and nearly decimates the tour. The novel develops as an analogue for U.S. involvement in Southeast Asia and for other paramilitary "tours" of policy. It is similar in shape to Peter Matthiessen's important At Play in the Fields of the Lord.

Poor Devils attacks the sociological concepts of poverty and its alleviation. Another parable, it describes the slow education of a history professor, Aaron Bell, who stumbles onto a Project Nomad, a genocidal agency for a "final solution" to poverty, a technological bureau that fights poverty with coldly mechanical games theory and supertechnology. Bell's education leads him to discover the futility of his life and his career, the absurdity of history and ideals faced with amoral technology. The old man he has pursued, Lundquist, a "picaresque saint," teaches him finally that he must discover (or invent) his values himself. Bell opts out of the system of research and manipulation to become a Whitmanesque wanderer, following the "Lundquist heresy, the preamble written short for men in too big a hurry to read much: Life, liberty, and the pursuit."

An allegorical study of personality in existentialist terms, Walking Davis describes Pierce Davis, who decides to walk around the world. Setting out from Spark, Iowa, Davis makes a Robinson Crusoe voyage of survival and self-discovery, finally plumbing all his human resources and learning that "You can't build a monument to a hero. If a man's a hero, he builds his own." His walk leads him into a strange union with nature and himself, stripped of all pretense like Camus's Sisyphus, reduced to one essential human function—questing.

Mr. Nicholas describes the complete symptomology of paranoia, centering on an executive in the surveillance industry who becomes convinced that "He was being watched everywhere and all the time." The protagonist, Henry Haddock, eventually adjusts to a life without privacy, wherein his public function subsumes his whole personality, and he becomes reconciled to a world without privacy, without self. The story develops allegorically in that it describes a whole world pressed and overcrowded, when personal rights are lost to the pressure of the many.

Ely's novels are all parables of the New Babbitt redeemed, the affluent and self-satisfied "Executive Man" freed to make real, life-or-death decisions, to direct his life and test the morality of his society. The transformations are costly, painful and sometimes tragic, but they are real and significant actions, leaps of faith which give meaning to the small existences Ely depicts.

-William J. Schafer

EMECHETA, (Florence Onye) Buchi

Nationality: British. Born: Lagos, Nigeria, 21 July 1944. Education: Methodist Girls' High School, Lagos; University of London, B.Sc. (honors) in sociology 1972. Family: Married Sylvester Onwordi in 1960 (separated 1969); two sons and three daughters. Career: Librarian, 1960–64; library officer, British Museum, London, 1965–69; youth worker and resident student, Race, 1974–76; community worker, Camden Council, London, 1976–78; visiting lecturer at 11 universities in the United States, 1979; senior research fellow and visiting professor of English, University of Calabar, Nigeria, 1980–81; lecturer, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut, 1982. Since 1982, lecturer, University of London. Proprietor, Ogwugwu Afo Publishing Company, London; since 1979, member of the Home Secretary's Advisory Council on Race. Address: 7 Briston Grove, London N8 9EX, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

In the Ditch. London, Barrie and Jenkins, 1972.

Second-Class Citizen. London, Allison and Busby, 1974; New York, Braziller, 1975.

The Bride Price. London, Allison and Busby, and New York, Braziller, 1976.

The Slave Girl. London, Allison and Busby, and New York, Braziller, 1977.

The Joys of Motherhood. London, Allison and Busby, and New York, Braziller, 1979.

Destination Biafra. London, Allison and Busby, 1982.

Double Yoke. London, Ogwugwu Afo, 1982; New York, Braziller, 1983

Adah's Story. London, Allison and Busby, 1983.

The Rape of Shavi. London, Ogwugwu Afo, 1983; New York, Braziller, 1985.

A Kind of Marriage. London, Macmillan, 1986.

Gwendolen. London, Collins, 1989; as The Family, New York, Braziller, 1990.

Kehinde. Oxford, Heinemann, 1994.

Fiction (for children)

Titch the Cat. London, Allison and Busby, 1979.
Nowhere to Play. London, Allison and Busby, 1980.
The Moonlight Bride. Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1980.
The Wrestling Match. Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1981; New York, Braziller, 1983.
Naira Power. London, Macmillan, 1982.

Plays

Television Plays: A Kind of Marriage, 1976; The Ju Ju Landlord, 1976.

Other

Our Own Freedom, photographs by Maggie Murray. London, Sheba, 1981

Head above Water (autobiography). London, Ogwugwu Afo, 1986.

*

Critical Studies: Gender Voices and Choices: Redefining Women in Contemporary African Fiction by Gloria Chineze Chukukere. Enugu, Nigeria, Fourth Dimension, 1995; Emerging Perspectives on Buchi Emecheta, edited by Marie Umeh. Trenton, New Jersey, Africa World Press, 1996; A Teacher's Guide to African Narratives by Sara Talis O'Brien. Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Heinemann, 1998; This Is No Place for a Woman: Nadine Gordimer, Nayantara Sahgal, Buchi Emecheta, and the Politics of Gender by Joya Uraizee. Trenton, New Jersey, Africa World Press, 1999.

* * *

The title Second-Class Citizen which Buchi Emecheta chose for one of her most successful novels constitutes a very fair summary of the major theme which she explores. She always feels for the oppressed and presents their plight in a way that engages the reader's sympathy. From childhood on she observed life in Nigeria, and since her early twenties she has looked at the ways of the west through the skeptical, appraising eyes of a trained sociologist. And what she has seen, whether in Africa or England, has been a bleak picture of antagonisms and tyranny. There are flashes of humor and moments of happiness, but generally she depicts the scouring of human relationships by the desire of the powerful to dominate and exploit those who are weaker.

Married life she depicts as a battle of the sexes, and if some white males are shown in a bad light, that is nothing compared with the portrayal of the Nigerian men. Francis, in Second-Class Citizen, is a Nigerian immigrant in London whose thoughtlessness is the ruin of his more gifted wife; lazy, egotistical, and feckless, he compounds every problem that confronts the pair in their struggle to make ends meet, and his sexual demands and irresponsibility about parenthood leave Adah a physical wreck, distraught and without a penny in her pocket. In The Joys of Motherhood we become aware of the mordant irony of the title as the novel chronicles the misfortunes of Nnu Ego, a simple Nigerian girl who comes to Lagos to marry and suffers every kind of humiliation as her husband proves himself incapable of overcoming the admittedly difficult circumstances of his wretched existence. Her agony reaches its peak when, in accord with custom, he takes as his second wife the widow of his brother and thoroughly enjoys the tensions this naturally creates.

Tyranny and heartlessness outside the domestic sphere also rouse Emecheta's ire. For many young people in Nigeria education seems to offer a route towards self-fulfillment, but Double Yoke shows what the price can be when a young girl tries to cope with the rival claims of tradition and modernity within a system which fundamentally has little to offer that is really valid. The cynicism of the whole enterprise is revealed when the heroine realizes she must trade sexual favors with her professor if she is to gain the examination results she covets. Once she has qualifications she will perhaps be able, like Adah in Second-Class Citizen, to go to the United Kingdom and enjoy what it has to offer. In fact, as Second-Class Citizen and its grim predecessor, In the Ditch, show, London is a hostile world where racialism is rife and housing is squalid. There is the welfare state, of course, yet it operates in such a way that a talented and qualified young woman is gradually but inexorably pauperized and deskilled. Destination Biafra is a chilling account of a different sort of horror, the disastrous civil war that ripped Nigeria apart in the difficult times immediately after the withdrawal of the inadequate colonial powers. No atrocity is too cruel for men in brief authority, and though Emecheta has sympathy for everyone, it is natural that the women are shown as those who suffer the most.

Gwendolen changes the focus to some degree, presenting the plight of Caribbean immigrants in London primarily through the perspective of the difficulties that a young girl has in finding any sort of fulfillment as a child and teenager in a culture which means very little to her at any time. A perfect symbol of this failure of integration lies in the fact that even her own family finds pronouncing her rather highfalutin name impossibly difficult. Emecheta is far from ascribing all her heroine's ills to the failure of the citizens of her adopted country to take her to their heart, though there are some criticisms, especially of the education service, that strike home. Gwendolen's misfortunes had, however, already begun before she ever left Jamaica, and in London tensions within the immigrant community are shown to be particularly damaging. Beneath the psychological problems of immigrants there runs, moreover, the deep current of protest at the exploitation of women by men whose sexual demands are never diminished by any sense of their only too apparent personal inadequacies and general fecklessness.

Few will seek to deny that Emecheta has grounds for the complaints she makes about marital relationships in particular and about the interplay of social and political forces in general. Yet she loads the dice a little too much. The girls and women she takes as her heroines always possess something which places them above the ordinary run of those with whom they mix. Birth or superior intelligence makes them outstanding. But it also has the unfortunate consequence of making them atypical of the group they represent. There is, too, some idealization of rural society in Nigeria in former times. It certainly had merits, which colonial powers were stupid not to recognize, yet by concentrating on the more advantaged members of such communities Emecheta distorts the picture. The problem becomes most acute in The Rape of Shavi, a somewhat mannered allegorical tale of Europeans who are fleeing from an impending cataclysm, and who have the privilege of insight into an almost Utopian Africa.

For the most part, however, Emecheta's mode is realistic. Indeed, Kehinde tackles the problem of idealization head-on, as the title character moves with her husband Albert from London-where she has lived for 18 years—back to Lagos. There she is overwhelmed by the appalling conditions of life, not least her expected role as virtual servant to Albert's every whim. And though Destination Biafra contains some devastating pictures of the pretentiousness and luxurious lifestyle of upper-class Nigerians, Emecheta generally concerns herself with the straightforward portrayal of the underprivileged. There is some description of locales, with Nigerian names for plants, foodstuffs, and fabrics adding a dash of local color which sometimes contrasts, especially in the earlier novels, a little too obviously with literary allusions in a dated English tradition. Dialogue is invariably crisp, highlighting important turns in the narrative or enhancing characterization. Above all, Emecheta is a storyteller. The titles of her novels, like the chapter headings, are direct and explicit, helping the reader to see the way forward through narratives that have the power to convince as well as the capacity to arouse sympathy with the misfortunes depicted.

—Christopher Smith

ERDRICH, (Karen) Louise

Nationality: American. Born: Little Falls, Minnesota, 7 June 1954. Education: Dartmouth College, Hanover, New Hampshire, B.A. 1976; Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, M.A. 1977. Family: Married Michael Anthony Dorris in 1981 (separated; Dorris committed suicide in 1997); three sons and three daughters. Career: Visiting poetry teacher, North Dakota State Arts Council, 1977–78; creative writing teacher, Johns Hopkins University, 1978–79; visiting fellow, Dartmouth College, 1981. Member, Turtle Mountain Band of Ojibwa. Awards: MacDowell fellowship, 1980; Yaddo fellowship, 1981; Nelson Algren award, for story, 1982; National Book Critics Circle award, 1984; Virginia Sully prize, 1984; Sue Kaufman award, 1984; Los Angeles Times Book award, 1985; Guggenheim fellowship, 1985. Address: c/o Harper Collins, 10 East 53rd Street, New York, New York 10022, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Love Medicine. New York, Holt, 1984; London, Deutsch, 1985; revised and expanded edition, 1993.

The Beet Queen. New York, Holt, 1986; London, Hamish Hamilton, 1987.

Tracks. New York, Holt, and London, Hamish Hamilton, 1988.

Crown of Columbus, with Michael Dorris. New York and London, Harper Collins, 1991.

The Bingo Palace. New York and London, Harper Collins, 1994. The Bluejay's Dance. New York and London, Harper Collins, 1995. Grandmother's Pigeon, illustrated by Jim LaMarche. New York, Hyperion Books for Children, 1996.

Tales of Burning Love. New York, HarperCollins, 1996.

The Antelope Wife. New York, HarperFlamingo, 1998.

The Birchbark House, with illustrations by the author. New York, Hyperion Books for Children, 1999.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Scales," in The Best American Short Stories 1983, edited by Shannon Ravenel and Anne Tyler. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1983; as The Year's Best American Short Stories, London, Severn House, 1984.
- "American Horse," in Earth Power Coming, edited by Simon J. Ortiz. Tsaile, Arizona, Navajo Community College Press, 1983.
- "Destiny," in Atlantic (Boston), January 1985.
- "Mister Argus," in Georgia Review (Athens), Summer 1985.
- "Flesh and Blood," in Buying Time, edited by Scott Walker. St. Paul, Minnesota, Graywolf Press, 1985.
- "Saint Marie," in Prize Stories 1985, edited by William Abrahams. New York, Doubleday, 1985.
- "Fleur," in Prize Stories 1987, edited by William Abrahams. New York, Doubleday, 1987.
- "Snares," in The Best American Short Stories 1988, edited by Shannon Ravenel and Mark Helprin. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1988
- "A Wedge of Shade," in Louder than Words, edited by William Shore. New York, Vintage, 1989.
- "Crown of Thorns," in The Invisible Enemy, edited by Miriam Dow and Jennifer Regan. St. Paul, Minnesota, Graywolf Press, 1989.
- "Matchimanito," in The Best of the West 2, edited by James Thomas and Denise Thomas. Layton, Utah, Peregrine Smith, 1989.
- "The Bingo Van," in New Yorker, 19 February 1990.
- "Happy Valentine's Day, Monsieur Ducharme," in Ladies' Home Journal (New York), February 1990.
- "The Leap," in Harper's (New York), March 1990.
- "Best Western," in Vogue (New York), May 1990.
- "The Dress," in Mother Jones (San Francisco), July-August 1990.
- "The Island," in Ms. (New York), January-February 1991.

Poetry

Jacklight. New York, Holt, and London, Sphere, 1990. Baptism of Desire. New York, Harper Collins, 1991.

*

Critical Studies: Conversations with Louise Erdrich and Michael Dorris, edited by Allan Chavkin and Nancy Feyl Chavkin. Jackson, University Press of Mississippi, 1994; The Broom Closet: Secret Meanings of Domesticity in Postfeminist Novels by Louise Erdrich, Mary Gordon, Toni Morrison, Marge Piercy, Jane Smiley, and Amy Tan by Jeannette Batz Cooperman. New York, Peter Lang, 1999; The Chippewa landscape of Louise Erdrich, edited by Allan Chavkin. Tuscaloosa, University of Alabama Press, 1999; A Reader's Guide to the Novels of Louise Erdrich by Peter G. Beidler and Gay Barton. Columbia, University of Missouri Press, 1999; Louise Erdrich: A Critical Companion by Lorena L. Stookey. Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1999; The Gamefulness of American Postmodernism: John Barth and Louise Erdrich by Steven D. Scott. New York, Peter Lang, 2000.

* * *

While it may seem that Americans might have recognized a Native American writer well before the end of the twentieth century, it was not until Louise Erdrich published her first novel, Love Medicine in 1984, to both critical and popular acclaim that a Native American writing about her heritage and the present condition of her people enjoyed so much notoriety and influence in that country's literature. Erdrich is a prolific writer, and from her novels more readers have begun to appreciate that contemporary Native Americans have important stories to tell that go beyond retelling their ancestors' rich creation myths and legends.

Most of Erdrich's novels have the same geographic center, a fictional Chippewa reservation in North Dakota. From this center characters appear and reappear in different books, and family lines cross and separate in deepening complexity much like an intricate braid or a beaded belt. Not only in the connected novels, but also in the totality of her oeuvre to date, Erdrich's accomplishment is that she is weaving a body of work that goes beyond portraying contemporary Native American life as descendants of a politically dominated people to explore the great universal questions—questions of identity, pattern versus randomness, and the meaning of life itself. As she writes at the end of The Antelope Wife, "Who is beading us?...Who are you and who am I, the beader or the bit of colored glass sewn onto the fabric of this earth?"

The connected novels include Love Medicine, The Beet Queen, Tracks, The Bingo Palace, and Tales of Burning Love. In Love Medicine, which first appeared in 1984 but was revised, expanded, and reissued in 1993, the reader meets not only members of three interconnecting families that will populate the later novels, the Kashpaws, the Lazarres, and Lulu Nanapush's extended family, but also Erdrich's style of making a whole out of seemingly random parts. The novel is comprised of short stories that set up this premise both structurally and in content. Plotlines thread and interweave. Among others, plots and subplots include the rivalry between Lulu Nanapush and Marie Lazarre for Nector Kashpay's love; Gerry Nanapush's relationships with June and Dot Adare; and Lipsha Morrissey's giving the raw turkey heart to Nector as love medicine. While the events occur from around 1900 to 1984, they do not always happen chronologically, and the disappearance and reappearance of characters and their relationships to other characters in different time periods often confuse readers until they reach the end of the book.

Events in The Beet Queen occur from 1932 to 1972 and are set in the mostly European-American community of Argus, North Dakota. This novel is another gathering of stories into chapters, but this time the focus is turned away from the reservation to life off of it in characters such as Dot Adare, who is part Chippewa but has few on-reservation experiences. Families are separated and unhappy and there is a sense of betrayal, abandonment, and loneliness.

The time period for Tracks, the third book in the connected series of novels, is 1912 to 1924 and is told by two alternating narrators: Nanapush, who survived the 1912 consumption epidemic, and Pauline Puyat, a mixed European/Native American who is ashamed of the Indian side of her heritage. Relationships and claims of identity are at stake in this novel.

The Bingo Palace brings the storylines to around the time of 1994–95, shortly after the end of Love Medicine chronologically. The primary plot is Lipsha's love for Shawnee Ray, which is made problematic by Shawnee Ray's uncertainty and a rivalry with Lipsha's boss, Lyman. In Tales of Burning Love, the time period is from 1962–95, and many of the elements center around Jack Mauser and his five wives.

As her body of work grows, Erdrich's fictional Chippewa Reservation centered around Matchimanito Lake in North Dakota is increasingly compared to William Faulkner's Yoknapatawpha County in Mississippi. Both are imaginary regions of a real American landscape where mixing of the races has caused issues of identity and disconnection.

Some of the confusion readers experience in the connected books is supported by problems in consistency within the later novels. Using the revised Love Medicine as a reference point in studying the later novels, critics have since found discrepancies in facts, characterizations, geography, and time among the later books. Whether this is a sign that Erdrich's project became too ambitious and complex even for her to keep straight, or whether the discrepancies are intentional as an expression of randomness, or a signal by which to recognize unreliable narrators, or an echoing back to the lack of concern for facts in the oral tradition of storytelling, it should be noted that the inconsistencies are a facet of Erdrich's work in the connected novels that will undoubtedly be further studied and explored.

Erdrich appears to depart from the series with The Antelope Wife. This novel introduces a different set of families: the Roy family, the Shawango family, and the Whiteheart Beads. In this novel, Erdrich seems to be stretching the thread on which she has beaded her stories in the previous books. While in the previous books readers beheld animals that had human characteristics, in The Antelope Wife this connectedness is heightened to the point where people are actually descended from animals such as the deer and antelope. While genders cross in her earlier work, in this one a soldier suckles babies. One wonders if, perhaps, Erdrich is not attempting to explore the so-called circle of life from every possible direction.

With the publication of Birch House, a juvenile novel that is similar to Laura Ingalls Wilder's Little House on the Prairie but from a Native American perspective, Erdrich has embarked on yet another planned series of novels. This one promises to be an important, fruitful addition to the historical novel genre for children.

-Connie Ann Kirk

ERICSON, Walter

See FAST, Howard (Melvin)

ESSOP, Ahmed

Has also written as Ahmed Yousuf. Nationality: Indian. Born: Dabhel, Surat, 1 September 1931. Education: The University of South Africa, Pretoria, B.A. 1956, B.A. (honours) in English 1964. Family: Married Farida Karim in 1960; four children. Career: Teacher at a secondary school, Eldorado Park, Johannesburg, 1980–85. Awards: English Academy of Southern Africa Schreiner award, 1979. Address: Raven Press, P.O. Box 145, Randburg, Johannesburg 2125, South Africa.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Visitation. Johannesburg, Ravan Press, 1980. The Emperor. Johannesburg, Ravan Press, 1984.

Short Stories

The Hajji and Other Stories. Johannesburg, Ravan Press, 1978; as Hajji Musa and the Hindu Fire-Walker, Columbia, Louisiana, Readers International, 1988.

Noorjehan and Other Stories. Johannesburg, Ravan Press, 1990.

Poetry

The Dark Goddess (as Ahmed Yousuf). London, Mitre Press, 1959.

*

Manuscript Collection: National English Literary Museum, Grahamstown, South Africa.

Critical Studies: "Mr. Sufi Climbs the Stairs: The Quest and the Ideal in Ahmed Essop's The Visitation" by Eugenie Freed, in Theoria (Pietermaritzburg, Natal), May 1988; "Straightforward Politics and Ironic Playfulness: The Aesthetic Possibilities of Ahmed Essop's The Emperor" by Antje Hagena, in English in Africa (Grahamstown, Cape Province), October 1990.

* * *

Ahmed Essop's fiction displays a marvelously realized sense of place and the ability to regard human nature, even at its most absurdly self-centered or viciously craven, as still worthy of some pity. Fordsburg, within metropolitan Johannesburg, is in Essop's writing what Malgudi is in R.K. Narayan's. Both are Indian places; their inhabitants have Indian names, often speak with similar accents, and would not feel entirely lost culturally if translated to each others' towns. In Fordsburg the women wear saris and there are "the raucous voices of vendors ... the spicy odors of Oriental foods, the bonhomie of communal life." Older Fordsburgians usually speak Gujarati or Urdu and try to preserve traditional customs like arranged marriages. Hindu and Muslim religious observances exist side by side, with both rivalry and some merging at the edges (as in the Caribbean) rather than as potential sources of communal violence. As in Trinidad and Guyana, the Indian proletariat and the educated alike speak a regional variety of English, illustrated by this passage of invective from "Hajji Musa and the Hindu Fire-Walker":

"You liar! You come and tell me dat good-fornutting Dendar boy, dat he good, dat he ejucated, dat he good prospect. My foot and boot he ejucated! He sleep most time wit bitches, he drink and beat my daughter. When you go Haj? You nutting but liar. You baster! You baster!"

The Afrikaans word "baster" (bastard) here signals the South African provenance of Essop's fiction about the largest population of Indian origin outside the sub-continent. Indeed Hindu and Muslim can taunt each other safely, in the knowledge that historically they have more in common than with members of other South African communities.

With its extension Newtown, Fordsburg seems to be based upon realities of Essop's childhood and youth before and during the 1950s campaign of passive resistance to apartheid, when there was a stronger sense of "Indianness," despite socializing and sexual encounters across racial boundaries. More secular and less traditional is Lenasia, beyond the Johannesburg perimeter, where The Emperor is set, a government-built township for the decanting of Fordsburg Indians, thus allowing white suburbs around Fordsburg to expand conveniently and cheaply.

It is in The Hajji and Other Stories that the life of Fordsburg/ Newtown is most engagingly and unpretentiously set forth. Nearly half the stories are satirizations of human beings falling short of the high standards of personal and social behavior that they profess: Dr. Kamal's political cowardice in "The Betrayal"; Yogi Khrishnasiva's covert fornication in his pursuit of spiritual liberation in "The Yogi," the holy men forced to seek refuge in the cinema and watch a film on "The Prophet" so as to escape the public violence they have stirred up as a protest against the screening of that film, the irrepressible Hajii Musa, in hospital with badly burned feet, dismissing Hindu firewalking as "showmanship" after his own unsuccessful attempt. At his best, Essop strips pretense, hypocrisy, untruth, and deviousness from his characters and shows the naked humanity beneath, but with an imaginative and delicate understanding of the humiliation that people suffer when thus exposed, as in "The Hajii," where obdurate refusal to condone a brother's past apostasy results only in selfinflicted hurt and spiritual aridity, or the 70-year-old father's pathetic defeat when his new young second wife divorces him, Muslimfashion, in preference for his own son. Some of the stories are competent psychological studies, as of the victim-figure in "The Target," or of the self-important (unto insanity) high school headmaster in "Gladiators," of the ambivalently dedicated political characters eventually left utterly isolated in "Ten Years" and "In Two Worlds." A frequent theme is the loss of human dignity, whether of the genuine or the merely outward kind. Occasionally Essop unnecessarily resorts to melodrama and sensationalism, as in "Labyrinth" and "Mr. Moonreddy."

The novel, The Visitation, sparkles with lively ideas and flashes of invention that on the whole don't quite coalesce. Mr. Sufi, a wealthy, complacent property owner, married but with a satisfying concubine discreetly housed in each of his apartment buildings, conducts his life quietly and respectably, even turning his monthly payment of protection money to the racketeer Gool into a polite little social ceremony. By the simple expedient of delivering large quantities of obviously stolen electric lamps to Sufi's home, Gool gains the blackmailer's firm hold upon a timid victim. Ironically, the lamps usher Sufi into an existence of darkness, fear, panic, and hallucination. As Gool and his thugs take over Sufi's very life, including his rent-collecting, like a supernatural visitation, he gradually realizes that they are doing crudely and violently what he has always done urbanely but equally ruthlessly. Even his love-life is reduced, when he witnesses Gool's sexual contortions with one of his former concubines. Clearly Gool is a doppelgänger, revealing to Sufi his own true nature—selfish, sensual, and sadistic—which he'd tried to cloak respectably. The weakness is that Gool becomes a mere caricature of criminality. The narrative might have been even more persuasive had Gool's wilder actions been incorporated in Sufi's hallucinations.

Caricature as a substitute for characterization is a legitimate satirist's tool, though probably more successful within the narrower compass of a short story than in the fuller extent and more subtle shadings of a novel. The Lenasia headmaster, Mr. Dharama Ashoka, the central character in The Emperor, is a "stooge" Indian, a creature of the apartheid state with an unassuageable appetite for power. The ludicrous story of his rise and downfall is also the tragedy of his wrong-headedness. The author's ingenious schema isn't really credible—an analysis, in one persona, of both arrogance and its necessary pettinesses in exercising power, with Ashoka as a possible figuring of the apartheid state and his opponents as the resistance. But Essop's ultimate interest in human individuality undercuts such a reading, making Ashoka at the end (like Sufi in The Visitation), a man to be pitied in the hour of his humiliating self-knowledge.

—Arthur Ravenscroft

EVERETT, Percival L.

Nationality: American. Born: Fort Gordon, Georgia, 22 December 1956. Education: University of Miami, A.B. 1977; attended University of Oregon, 1978–80; Brown University, A.M. 1982. Career: Worked as jazz musician, ranch worker, and high school teacher; associate professor of English and director of graduate creative writing program, University of Kentucky, Lexington, 1985–89; associate professor of English, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Indiana, 1989–92; professor of creative writing, University of California, Riverside, 1992—. Awards: D. H. Lawrence fellowship, University of New Mexico, 1984; Lila Wallace-Reader's Digest fellowship. Agent: Candida Donadio, 231 West 22nd Street, New York, New York 10011, U.S.A. Address: Department of Creative Writing, University of California, Riverside, CA 92521, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Suder. New York, Viking, 1983.

Walk Me to the Distance. New York, Ticknor & Fields, 1985.

Cutting Lisa. New York, Ticknor & Fields, 1986.

Zulus. Sag Harbor, New York, Permanent Press, 1989.

For Her Dark Skin. Owl Creek Press, 1989.

God's Country. Boston, Faber and Faber, 1994.

The Body of Martin Aguilera. Owl Creek Press, 1994.

Watershed. Saint Paul, Minnesota, Graywolf Press, 1996.

Frenzy. Saint Paul, Minnesota, Graywolf Press, 1997. Glyph. Saint Paul, Minnesota, Graywolf Press, 1999.

Short Stories

The Weather and Women Treat Me Fair: Stories. Little Rock, Arkansas, August House, 1989.

Big Picture: Stories. Saint Paul, Minnesota, Graywolf Press, 1996.

Other

The One That Got Away (for children), illustrations by Dirk Zimmer. New York, Clarion Books, 1992.

Contributor, From Timberline to Tidepool: Contemporary Fiction from the Northwest, edited by Rich Ives. Owl Creek Press, 1989.

* * *

Born outside of August, Georgia, in 1956, Percival Everett grew up in Columbia, South Carolina, and seems to have the Southern penchant for storytelling in his bones. Averaging a new book about every 18 months, Everett is a prolific and ambitious writer with a fierce imagination.

Like other Southern writers, most notably William Faulkner and Flannery O'Connor, Everett is captivated by what literary criticism calls the grotesque, that sometimes absurd, other times enigmatic admixture of comedy and tragedy. His minor characters in particular are fantastical gargoyle creations that allow the author opportunities for surrealistic subterfuge in virtually all of his work.

Everett's first novel, Suder, appeared in 1983. Its African-American protagonist, Suder, is a third-baseman for the Seattle Mariners who is in a slump, both on the field and at home where relations with his wife and son are strained. Suder thus embarks on a journey of inner discovery paralleled by an outlandish series of external events, a thematic structure to be found again and again in Everett's fiction. Sharing an affinity with the eighteenth-century novel, Suder is a fast-paced, episodic narrative in which the reader is carried away in a swift stream of improbabilities. The protagonist runs into a drug deal, meets up with a 300-pound vending machine service man, adopts a pet elephant, and even tries his hand at flying. This last twist, however, is more than a fanciful plot device. It also points to Everett's deep interest in mythology and in particular to the myth of flying, a recurring figure in both African folklore and in African-American fiction—Toni Morrison's Song of Solomon, for instance. To date, Everett has written two book-length reworkings of ancient Greek mythology, For Her Dark Skin and Frenzy, about the half-man, half-god Dionysus.

In his latest novel, Glyph, Everett joins the tradition of academic satires by the likes of Nabokov or, more recently, Jane Smiley and Don DeLillo. The book is a send-up of academic jargon, especially deconstructionist "language games," but it is also a meditation on language, the nature of genius, and the very real destructiveness of intellectual opportunism. Still, as is characteristic of Everett, Glyph is suffused with comedy. The protagonist and narrator is four-year-old Baby Ralph Townsend, a genius baby who reads the classics of Western philosophy and literature, and writes as well, but refuses to speak on aesthetic and philosophical grounds. Baby Ralph's father is a professor of literature and a scholar of the poststructuralist theories of Roland Barthes. At first believing his son retarded because of his refusal to speak, Baby Ralph's father soon realizes that in fact his son is a genius, capable even of blackmailing his father. Ralph's loving mother, by contrast, is a painter, who gives the child his first book, tellingly Wittgenstein's Tractatus. As one has come to expect, Everett steers the Townsend family through a veritable labyrinth of intrigue, meeting along the way a violently evil child psychologist, a top-secret military intelligence group, a delusional Catholic priest, and Ferdinand Marcos. Interspersed with the narrative, however, are Everett's pointed interrogations of postmodernism, semiotic analysis, and theoretical pretensions, all styled after the most esoteric discourses of French literary theory.

Everett is also the author of The One That Got Away, an imaginative children's book of wordplay about the numeral 1, as corralled by a comic trio of cowpokes.

-Michele S. Shauf

F

FAIRBAIRNS, Zoë (Ann)

Nationality: British. Born: Tunbridge Wells, Kent, 20 December 1948. Education: St. Catherine's School, Twickenham, Middlesex, 1954-67; University of St. Andrews, Fife, Scotland, 1967-72, M.A. in modern history 1972; College of William and Mary, Williamsburg, Virginia, 1969-70. Career: Editor, Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament newspaper Sanity, London, 1973-74; freelance journalist, 1975-82; poetry editor, Spare Rib, London, 1978-82; fiction reviewer, Everywoman, London, 1990-93. Since 1993 subtitler, Independent Television Facilities Centre, West London. C. Day Lewis Fellow, Rutherford School, London, 1977-78; creative writing tutor, City Literary Institute, 1978-82, Holloway Prison, 1978-82, Wandsworth Prison, 1987, Silver Moon Women's Bookshop, 1987 and 1989, and Morley College, 1988 and 1989, all London; writer-inresidence, Bromley schools, Kent, from 1981, and Deakin University, Geelong, Victoria, 1983, Sunderland Polytechnic, Tyne and Wear, 1983-85, and Surrey County Council, 1989. Awards: Fawcett prize, 1985; British Council travel grant 1990. Lives in London. Agent: A.M. Heath, 79 St. Martin's Lane, London WC2N 4AA, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Live as Family. London, Macmillan, 1968.Down: An Explanation. London, Macmillan, 1969.Benefits. London, Virago Press, 1979; New York, Avon, 1982.Stand We at Last. London, Virago Press, and Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1983.

Here Today. London, Methuen, and New York, Avon, 1984. Closing. London, Methuen, 1987; New York, Dutton, 1988. Daddy's Girls. London, Methuen, 1991. Other Names. London and New York, Penguin, 1998.

Short Stories

Tales I Tell My Mother, with others. London, Journeyman Press, 1978; Boston, South End Press, 1980.

More Tales I Tell My Mother, with others. London, Journeyman Press, 1987.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Relics," in Despatches from the Frontiers of the Female Mind, edited by Jen Green and Sarah Lefanu. London, Women's Press, 1985.
- "Spies for Peace: A Story of 1963," in Voices from Arts for Labour, edited by Nicki Jackowska. London, Pluto Press, 1985.
- "Covetousness," in The 7 Deadly Sins, edited by Alison Fell. London, Serpent's Tail, 1989.
- "By the Light of the Silvery Moon," in By the Light of the Silvery Moon, edited by Ruth Petrie. London, Virago, 1994.

Plays

Details of Wife (produced Richmond, Surrey, 1973).

Other

Study War No More. London, CND, 1974.

No Place to Grow Up, with Jim Wintour. London, Shelter, 1977.

Peace Moves: Nuclear Protest in the 1980s, with James Cameron, photographs by Ed Barber. London, Chatto and Windus, and Bridgeport, Connecticut, Merrimack, 1984.

Editor, Women's Studies in the UK, compiled by Oonagh Hartnett and Margherita Rendel. London, London Seminars, 1975.

*

Zoë Fairbairns comments:

I don't want to comment on my own work, but I'm always pleased and interested to receive comments from readers. (How will I know who you are or what you think, if you don't tell me?) Write to me c/o my agent—I will do my best to reply.

* * *

Zoë Fairbairns is, deservedly, one of the most popular feminist fiction writers working in Britain. Her pacey novels are very much a part of mainstream fiction, making their appeal much broader than that of many more overtly polemical books. At first glance her work seems straight genre fiction; science fiction in Benefits; the multigenerational family saga in Stand We at Last; the crime thriller in Here Today. However, what Fairbairns does is to take each genre and transform it for her own use.

The main theme underlying each of these works is the gradual, irresistible raising of feminist consciousness. Other themes are the complexity of relationships between the sexes; loneliness; the power-lessness of need; and the ever-changing yet somehow constant problems faced by women, whether they be women of the future, the past, or today. Fairbairns approaches all her characters with realism, sympathy, and a great deal of wit. Though her male characters tend to be lightly sketched, her women make up for this lack of depth; they are humorous, deep-thinking, and self-critical; and whenever a character seems to be slipping close to social stereotype, the author quickly steps in with a touch of irony.

Take, for example, the two main characters in Here Today. On the one hand there is Catherine, a 30-year-old virgin, feminist, and teacher who, having been made redundant, finds herself thrown into the world of temporary office employment. Shocked by the exploitation of her fellow temps by the employers and job agencies, she sets about undermining the temping system. On the other hand there is fashion-conscious Antonia, one-time self-satisfied "Temp of the Year," who is shaken out of her complacency both by the advent of word-processing which threatens her livelihood and by a bad case of genital herpes which brings about the end of her marriage. Drawn together in an uneasy alliance through their loneliness and their common need to earn a living, the two women embark on an adventurous road to self-fulfillment, fraught with contrasts between the traditional middle- and working-class attitudes to love and work.

The concept of romantic love, though not a central theme, plays a part in Fairbairns's novels. Men tend to be either saints or sinners and, surprisingly, the saints predominate. In Here Today, Catherine forms a close relationship with Frank, a union leader who's extremely sympathetic to the women's movement. In Benefits, in many ways the most pessimistic of her books, we are presented with the enlightened, too-good-to-be-true Derek, who bends over backwards not to oppress his journalist wife, Lynn. However, the cold dictates of a superbureaucracy intent on controlling the reproductive rights of its women drives Lynn away from "the women's pages of the Guardian" towards a more radical feminism epitomized by Collindeane Tower, an abandoned block of council flats which has become home to a leaderless feminist community. As Lynn struggles with mixed feelings about her marriage and her own fertility, the women of Collindeane form ranks against Family, a political party dedicated to restoring so-called "family values" by methods of giving or holding back government benefits to those women who do or do not reproduce. The novel takes us from the late 1970s through to a twenty-first century where family planning has become government planning and the fabric of a once-prosperous society is, like Collindeane, crumbling away. Though Benefits is a science-fiction novel, the futuristic views of post-industrial Britain depicted in it are, at times, too close to aspects of then-present reality to be comfortable. Poverty and decay are rife in all aspects of society; the Family Party eventually brings about its own destruction; and leaderless feminism seems to lead nowhere. The result is a powerful, chilling, somewhat depressing book.

Despite her preoccupation with the present lot of women, Fairbairns seems more at home when writing about the future or the past. Nowhere is this more evident than in Stand We at Last, perhaps the most ambitious of her novels. In her own words "a family saga with a feminist background," it traces the lives of a succession of women, starting in 1855 with the adventurous Sarah who emigrates to Australia hoping to make her fortune as a farmer, and ending with Jackie, a single parent living on a hippie commune in 1970s England. As in her other books, the writer remains true to the genre she has chosen: all of Life is present in this 600-page saga—births, suicides, miscarriages, abortions, raised hopes, dashed ambitions—not to mention love, passion, and sexual guilt. But this is no ordinary ragsto-riches saga; as in all Fairbairns's novels, ambitions are spiritual rather than material; children and men seem to be the rocks on which women's ambitions founder; and in order to break out of the cycle set up by her predecessors, the modern heroine must give up her man rather than get him in the end.

Though the themes in Fairbairns's writing are constant, each novel remains quite distinct in style. Her female characters, who are primarily ordinary people with ordinary problems, manage somehow to be extraordinarily interesting. Her plots are imaginative and gripping, yet as Fairbairns revealed in a 1998 interview with the Independent, after her initial success with Benefits, she struggled for many years to find her voice. Also in 1998, Fairbairns produced a new novel, Other Names.

—Judith Summers

FARAH, Nuruddin

Nationality: Somali. Born: Baidoa, 24 November 1945. Education: Istituto di Magistrale, Mogadiscio, Somalia, 1964; Panjab University, Chindigarh, India, 1966-70; University of London, 1974-75; University of Essex, Colchester, 1975-76. Family: Divorced, one son; remarried in 1992, one daughter. Career: Clerk-typist, Ministry of Education, and secondary school teacher, 1969-71, Mogadiscio; teacher, Wardhiigley Secondary School, 1970-71; lecturer, Somali National University, Mogadiscio, 1971-74; guest professor, Bayreuth University, Germany, 1981; associate professor, University of Jos, Nigeria, 1981-83; visiting professor, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, Autumn 1988, State University of New York, Stony Brook, Spring 1989, and Brown University, Providence, Rhode Island, Autumn 1991. Since 1990 professor, Makerere University, Kampala, Uganda. Awards: Unesco fellowship, 1974; English-Speaking Union award, 1980; Corman Artists fellowship, 1990; Tucholsky award for literary exiles (Sweden), 1993; Cavour prize (Italy), 1993; Neustadt International Prize for Literature, 1998. Agent: Curtis Brown, 162–168 Regent Street, London W1R 5TB, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

From a Crooked Rib. London, Heinemann, 1970.

A Naked Needle. London, Heinemann, 1976.

Variations in African Dictatorship:

Sweet and Sour Milk. London, Allison and Busby, 1979; St. Paul, Minnesota, Graywolf Press, 1992.

Sardines. London, Allison and Busby, 1981; St. Paul, Minnesota, Gravwolf Press, 1992.

Close Sesame. London, Allison and Busby, 1983; St. Paul, Minnesota, Graywolf Press, 1992.

Maps. London, Pan, 1986; New York, Pantheon, 1987.

Gifts. London, Serif, 1992; New York, Arcade, 1999.

Secrets. New York, Arcade, 1998.

Uncollected Short Stories

"Why Dead So Soon?" in Somali News (Mogadiscio), 1965.

Plays

A Dagger in Vacuum (produced Mogadiscio, 1970). The Offering (produced Colchester, Essex, 1975). Yussuf and His Brothers (produced Jos, Nigeria, 1982).

Radio Plays: Tartar Delight, 1980 (Germany); A Spread of Butter. n.d.

Other

Yesterday, Tomorrow: Voices from the Somali Diaspora. London and New York, Cassell, 2000.

×

Critical Studies: The Novels of Nuruddin Farah by Derek Wright. Bayreuth, Germany, Bayreuth University, 1994; Nuruddin Farah by Patricia Alden and Louis Tremaine. New York, Twayne, 1999.

* * *

When Nuruddin Farah's first novel in English, From a Crooked Rib, appeared in the Heinemann African Writers' Series (1970), the book was well received by critics, and Farah was immediately classified as a leading figure among the "second generation" of African writers. While Sweet and Sour Milk was about to appear, Farah stayed on a writer's fellowship in Italy and was warned not to return to Somalia, since the dictatorial regime of Siyad Barre had taken offense with his second novel, A Naked Needle. Farah decided "not to return home for the time being" and for more than thirty years now, he has been living in different African countries (Sudan, Gambia, Nigeria, Uganda) and has held a number of writer-inresidence positions in Europe and the United States. Since 1998 he has been living in Capetown, South Africa. Apart from his several published novels, Farah has written both stage and radio plays. He is also the author of a nonfiction book on the Somali refugee diaspora.

Since the publication of From a Crooked Rib with its first-person narration and simple diction, Farah's narrative style has become more complex. But he has remained faithful to Somalia as the space of his literary imagination and also to the predominant themes of the role of women, the psychology of power relations among men and women and between the generations, and the fragmentation of social structures from the family to the nation state in Africa.

From a Crooked Rib deals with the modern quest of Ebla, who escapes the supression of women in rural Somalia to achieve limited self-determination in the city, thus revolting against a male-dominated society. But Farah retains the structure and the idiom of an oral tale. We first meet Ebla in a community of camel nomads, where everything is determined by outside forces: the seasonal changes from drought to spring rains determine the annual life cycle, the needs of the camels determine the daily cycle of life, and the grandfather who heads the clan determines the social relations within his community. When he arranges a marriage with a husband 40 years her senior, Ebla escapes to a cousin in a small town, only to go through the same experience again, until she finally arrives in Mogadiscio. Ebla's quest unfolds in three stations—country, town, city. Following the typical structure of orality, she has to pass a test and prove herself at each of these stations. However, Ebla proves herself by rejecting female submission to social conformity, in clear contrast to oral morals. Parallel to Ebla's individual life cycle, Farah unfolds in exemplary fashion the life cycle of women from initiation to circumcision, marriage, and births. On the one hand Ebla accepts what seems to her the inescapable demands on women, on the other she learns to transform her traditional gender role into a source of empowerment in that she can exert control over men with her sexuality. She thus arrives at a delicate equilibrum between her individual sexual and moral responsibilties and her social conditioning. Ebla's quest leads her from a simplistic revolt against the domination by her grandfather to mature womanhood with an elaborate set of behavioral codes that allow her to evade male domination. From a Crooked Rib reveals two persistent features of Farah's writing: the ambigious tension between formal tradition and intended meaning—in this case the oral structure that carries an emancipatory message—and an ending that precludes unambigous moral conclusions.

After the publication of A Naked Needle, Farah designed a novel trilogy titled Variations in African Dictatorship. The first novel in this series, Sweet and Sour Milk, sets the tone for the following novels, Sardines—in which a journalist and her daughter, a national sports champion, decline popularity as puppets in the regime's propaganda machinery—and Close Sesame, which deals with the regimes tactics of whipping up clan rivalries to ensure the maintenance of power. As in Crooked Rib Farah uses an established literary form, the analytical detective novel, which he infuses with stylistic and structural elements of orality, thus achieving a complexity of form that subverts the simplicity of the "pure" form of the detective novel and the oral tale with contradictions and ambiguities. Loyaan, a dentist, is confronted with the mysterious death of his twin brother Soyaan, a journalist and top government official. Trying to unravel the deadly mysteries, Loyaan delves deeper and deeper into the life of his twin brother. He relives the same experiences as his brother. In a symbolic sequence of two cycles of seven days (death-wake-burial-final obsequities as prescribed in Somali tradition), Loyaan completes his double quest, at the end of which he practically becomes the double, the reincarnation of his own brother. His brother was appointed ambassador to Yugoslavia but died before assuming office. Now Loyaan is appointed to the very same position, and the novel ends with a government limousine picking him up. Just as with his brother, it is left open whether he is really taken to the airport, or rather to a prison cell or an execution chamber of the secret police. Farah bends the narrative form of the analytical detective novel, with its linear plot leading to a definite closure of demystification and the unravelling of the murder mystery, and brings it back in full circle to its beginning—as in an oral tale. Instead of unravelling the mysteries about Soyaan's death, he adds another mystery: whether Loyaan awaits the same fate as his double-his twin brother.

Farah essentially maintains a uniform narrative stance, but his narrator never seems to know more than his characters, and he never enters into complicity with his readers, as is common in detective novels. On the other hand, Farah arranges his characters in pairs, either as supportive doubles (Soyaan and Loyaan) or as Manichean opposites, e.g. the twins and their father, the twins and the regime—an oedipal conflict between the generations but also between modernism and fundamentalist dogmatism. This is exemplified when the twins play with a ball and run enthusiastically to their father, presenting him the ball as the globe. The father rudely denies this heretical idea, pronounces the earth to be flat, and strictly forbids any further games of that nature. He reveals himself as an unenlightened ideologue who acts as a third-rate informer for the secret police.

The trilogy Variations of African Dictatorships dealt with the relation of the individual to political power. Farah's second trilogy investigates the impact of international organizations and norms with Maps (on colonial boundaries), Gifts (on foreign aid), and Secrets (on ethical norms). Maps foregrounds Somalia's aspiration to true nation-statehood and the ensuing anxieties by neighboring states about Somali irredentism. The Somali people were divided among four different imperial powers, the British, the Italians, the French, and Imperial Ethiopia. At independence, only British and Italian Somali land were joined together as the Republic of Somalia. The five-pointed star in the national flag always reminds Somalis of the other three territories still under foreign domination: Northern Kenya, the Ogaden, and Djibuti.

Farah thematizes all these facets of national identity in Maps by focusing on the Ogaden war of 1977. He concentrates on the internal conflict, but the international involvement of the United States and the Soviet Union makes itself felt as an implied issue. The global conflict between capitalism and communism and the vicarious wars, together with the love of many African potentates for self-aggrandizement by playing the Russian-American rivalry card, constitutes the background to Maps.

Farah tells the life story of Askar, son of an Ogaden freedom fighter. Askar, an orphan and foundling, is brought up by Misra of mixed Oromo and Ethiopian/Amharic descent. Askar develops an intense relationship to his foster mother Misra, wavering between filial attachment, incestuous admiration, and machoistic urge for domination. For his future, Askar hovers between a career as an academic and poet and that of a freedom fighter. Eventually, he joins the West Somali Liberation Army. In the Ogaden war area, he meets Misra, who is accused of betraying the freedom fighters to the Ethiopian army. She falls victim to a gang rape and a nationalist-motivated ritual murder. Askar is arrested and accused of having participated in the crime.

This plot summary is misleading, since Farah no longer follows a linear narrative pattern. The time sequence and narrative perspective are disrupted—time and space, events and characters present themselves with a variety of contradictory associations. Meanings become ambiguous, multi-layered, inconclusive. Farah presents his reader with bits and pieces of a jigsaw puzzle that is deliberately left incomplete. The reader can never arrive at a complete reading of the novel, he can only formulate hypotheses or speculations; the author doesn't guide the reader, on the contrary he lures him into blind narrative alleys or traps him with deceiving images.

The plurality of meanings and voices manifest themselves through the three narrators: Askar appears as a first-person narrator, a self-centered egotistic chatter-box persona. His narrative stance is contrasted by a third-person authorial narrator with an uninvolved, condensed narrative voice. A dialogic narrative voice addresses his/ her counterpart with a familial "you." This could be Misra, the mother, addressing Askar and the children of the nation. The family, highlighted as the central institution in the socio-political fabric in the dictatorship novels, now falls victim to fragmentation: all the major characters are fatherless, motherless, or childless. Social organization is not based on the Somali extended family, nor the nuclear family, but on an amputated dual or triangular personal relationship. Farah even expands the image of amputation and fragmentation: Misra suffers amputation of one of her breasts due to cancer; Aw-Adan, teacher of the Quoran, loses one of his legs; Uncle Qorrax's fingers are hacked off. All these images are revealed as illustrations of different readings of the Somali national mythology, as it was passed on in the oral poetry of "The Sayyid." Sayyid and Farah celebrate Somalia as a beautiful and liberal woman who has affairs with five suitors. Three of the affairs end in miscarriages—a parable for the aborted dreams of "Great Somalia." When Farah retells this story from the oral tradition, he injects relativistic or divergent connotations on two levels. First, it is Misra, the Oromo-Amharic bastard who educates Askar about his national heritage. Secondly, he likens Misra to the mother Somalia of the oral tradition. Misra, too, has affairs with five different men, representing the various ethnic, social, and religious groups at the Horn of Africa. It is not Misra who betrays her suitors, but the suitors who betray her, enslave her, rape her, force her into abortion. Through Farah's retelling, the national epic acquires a new unheroic dimension. The moving story of the nation that has to forego the perfection of national unity is turned into a tale about intrigues, betrayal, and blackmail, where national pride is whipped up and strangers are prosecuted. Farah elaborates the metaphor of the nation as mother when he parallels the events and recurring cycles in Somalia's history with the pregnancies, miscarriages, and menstruation cycles of Misra. Farah even embarks on a gender-oriented interpretation of history.

With Askar's circumcision and initiation into adulthood, another set of images is imported into the narration that provided the title of the novel: maps. The prominent gift for his initiation is a globe, a map of the world. Maps are perceived as particularly reliable replicas of reality, and yet maps too are only reconstructions of reality. Farah emphasizes this aspect of maps as reconstructed reality. He shows us Askar and his freedom fighters plugging flags onto the map pretending to document the progress of the Ogaden war while they are really indulging in nationalist wishful thinking. Farah uses the one-dimensional medium of the map to inscribe broader dimensions by mapping out social, cultural, and mental spaces.

Farah's postmodern narrative stance leaves it to Askarto to unveil his naive enthusiasm for a national awakening of Somalia and ethno-fundamentalist attitudes. Farah also provides us with an insight into the rifts and cracks within Somalian society that resulted in the balcanization of the country and is the topic of Secrets.

Against the backdrop of the Ogaden war and the nationalist craze, Farah took up the issue of ethnic purity with Oromo-Amharic mongrel Misra and the pure-bred Somali Askar in Maps. With Secrets and the imminent clan wars of the rival warlords, Farah raises the issue of genealogical purity. Secrets, in spite of its title, is the only Farah novel where the major mystery is actually resolved, namely the parentage of Kalaman, a computer specialist and enterpreneur in Mogadiscio. What the very first line suggests, "My name Kalaman conjures up memories of childhood," with its ambiguities about parentage inherent in the name, and what later continuously surfaces with the saying "Mothers matter a lot, fathers matter not," points to the calamities of a Somali in Mogadiscio with its clan segregation. When he learns that he is the result of a gang rape committed by members of a rival clan, Kalaman has to accept that those people who were most influentual in his life—his grandfather Nonno, and his father Yaqut, who taught him everything—are in the terminology of the clan fanatics only strangers to him. And he also realizes that, contrary to the ideas of the clan fundamentalists, social and moral parenthood can matter more than biological parenthood. "Certainty" is a key word in Secrets, first as an opposite concept to secrets, but mainly as the biological certainty of motherhood. In the end, the social parenthoods of Nonno and Yaqut are the real certainties in Kalaman's life, while the biological certainty of motherhood loses in importance. Thus, the children's rhyme of "Mothers matter a lot, Fathers matter not" is a statement of social fact tranformed into a riddle, one that can be true or false. Secrets reflects the fragmentation, fluidity, and instability of life on the eve of the civil war through the multiple narrative voices and the fragmented flow of narrative continuity.

-Eckhard Breitinger

FARMER, Beverley

Nationality: Australian. Born: 1941. Family: Divorced, one son. Address: c/o University of Queensland Press, P.O. Box 42, St. Lucia, Queensland 4067, Australia.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Alone. Carlton South, Victoria, Sisters, 1980.
The Seal Woman. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1992.
The House in the Light. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1995; Portland, Oregon, International Specialized Book Services, 1995.

Short Stories

Milk. Fitzroy, Victoria, McPhee Gribble, and New York, Penguin, 1983.

Home Time. Fitzroy, Victoria, McPhee Gribble, and New York, Penguin, 1985.

A Body of Water: A Year's Notebook. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1990.

Place of Birth. London, Faber, 1990.

Collected Stories. St. Lucia, University of Queensland Press, 1996.

* * *

Beverley Farmer made an immediate impression with her first published work, the novella Alone. Published in 1980, it had been written ten years before and was set even earlier, in 1959. Alone concerns a student at Melbourne University who has been having an affair with another young woman. It ends when she becomes too importunate. In total despair, but quite rationally, she decides to end her life unless her estranged lover comes to see her before Sunday, the day of her eighteenth birthday. Alone describes exactly what the girl, Shirley Nunne, does during the last hours of her life, before she comes to the moment of her decision. Although Farmer's writing can sometimes be excessively sensuous to the point of over-ripeness, with a lavish use of color (golden, amber), more often it ranges from the poetic conjuring up of atmospheric detail—the beauty and ugliness of Melbourne at night—through to the meticulously objective rendition of harshly Australian idiomatic speech. It is a haunting and impressive debut.

Farmer confirmed the promise of this work with two fine collections of short stories, Milk and Home Time, in which the writing is noticeably sparer, more compressed. Nearly all the stories in the first collection concern the interaction between the cultures of Greece and Australia and the misunderstandings that occur between them, but their authenticity and almost elemental strength and intensity of feeling make them far more than merely sociological documents. Although frequently the protagonist is a young woman involved with a Greek man, the stories have a variety of voices and protagonists. Their most impressive quality is the author's ability to confront unflinchingly and immerse herself in the experience of her characters, no matter how distressing it is, without becoming self-pitying or maudlin. Violence—whether psychic or physical—is never far away; if it does not actually occur it hovers on the outskirts of the stories, constantly threatening as it does in "Sally's Birthday." Frequently, especially when the victim is a woman as it most often is, it takes the form of a humiliation or violation of some kind. Estrangement husband from wife, parent from child, Greek from Australian—is another pervasive element. Almost the sole source of comfort and consolation in this bleak world lies in the children who appear often in the collection, and whose joys and griefs—"the little tragedies of children"—are lovingly and tenderly evoked.

Many of the same themes recur in Home Time. Here again, few relationships are seen to be in any way harmonious; most are riddled with tension and often verge on violence. The sense of estrangement can be both emotional and geographical. In "Place of Birth" Bell (who appears in two stories) is pregnant and agonizing over whether to leave Greece and return to Australia. She receives little support from her husband. "You're a stubborn, selfish, cold-blooded woman, Bell." Several of the stories are set in Greece, but the sense of isolation is not confined to place. Whether the character is called Bell or Anne or Barbara, the stories are enlivened by a sensuous awareness of landscape, especially in those set in Greece, and an extraordinarily acute ear for dialogue.

Farmer waited five years, a period of apparent sterility, to publish her first full-length novel, A Body of Water. Subtitled "A Year's Notebook," it is in fact exactly that, her jottings from February 1987 to February 1988. It records her friendships, love affairs, conversations, thoughts, and above all her reading. Interspersed with the diary entries, which begin with the gloomy statement "My forty-sixth birthday, and no end in sight to the long struggle to come to terms with this isolation, this sterility," are the five stories she managed to complete during the year. The reader is thus in the privileged and fascinating position of reading not only the fiction but the process of its writing, how it emerged from the writer's unconscious and finally took shape. Marking a determined attempt to break from the limits of realism, the novel is not about anything so much as itself. It is about the act and art of writing, not the result. In the end, however, the theme of artistic and emotional sterility threatens to invade the book like a virus, and there is a good deal of overblown writing that recalls the excesses of Alone, rather than the spareness and economy of the short stories: "Tide coming in, a stiff wind. A black ship out, a white ship in. A flash out on the grey water—a pilot boat catching the sun. The dunes have grown fine long green hairs all over—their skin shows through."

Bleakness and solitude are themes of Farmer's most recent fiction also. The protagonist of The Seal Woman is a Danish woman named Dagmar Mikkelsen, who has come to live in a seaside resort in Victoria for a few months at the invitation of two absent Australian friends whose house she is minding. She falls in love with a man named Martin, muses over her past and the husband she lost at sea and the child she was unable to have. Like A Body of Water, this is a highly self-conscious, literary novel that makes constant allusion to other forms of narrative including fiction, poetry, film, and above all myth. Dense with imagery and symbolism, the novel finally abandons itself completely to myth in the closing chapter, in the story of the tragic seal woman whose fate runs in counterpoint to Dagmar's own: at the end, having left her faithless lover to return home, she finds herself joyfully with his child.

In The House in the Light, Farmer turns her back on experimental and post-modern forms of narrative to return to the familiar country of the short stories and her alter ego Bell. Now fifty years old, divorced, with her son a student living his own independent life and her ex-husband's new wife about to give birth, Bell has returned to the Greek village in which she married, to celebrate Easter. Her former father-in-law has recently died but the family still welcomes her, if ambivalently, into their midst. The novel takes us through the week of Easter day by day. It is almost a dramatic meditation, an account of the private mental struggle in which Bell has to reconcile past affections and allegiances with the changed circumstances she finds herself in, to treat the line between respect for the hospitality and culture of her hosts, especially her aging former mother-in-law, and a fierce insistence on her own very different values, which she will neither abandon nor deny. Again, it becomes apparent that the most central fact in the universe of Farmer's fiction is solitude. Her characters are mostly physical and mental isolates, and Bell is no exception. At the end, however, in a beautifully written scene, Bell and the family come to some kind of tentative accommodation. The House in the Light is a profoundly desolate but moving novel. Farmer's Collected Stories include the stories from her two volumes, the five stories that appeared in a Body of Water, and five uncollected stories.

-Laurie Clancy

FAST, Howard (Melvin)

Pseudonyms: E.V. Cunningham; Walter Ericson. Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 11 November 1914. Education: George Washington High School, New York, graduated 1931; National Academy of Design, New York. Military Service: Served with the Office of War Information, 1942-43, and the Army Film Project, 1944. Family: Married Bette Cohen in 1937 (died 1994); one daughter and one son, the writer Jonathan Fast. Career: War correspondent in the Far East for Esquire and Coronet magazines, 1945. Taught at Indiana University, Bloomington, Summer 1947; imprisoned for contempt of Congress, 1947; owner, Blue Heron Press, New York, 1952-57. Since 1989 weekly columnist, New York Observer. Founder, World Peace Movement, and member, World Peace Council, 1950–55; currently, member of the Fellowship for Reconciliation. American-Labour Party candidate for Congress for the 23rd District of New York, 1952. Lives in Greenwich, Connecticut. Awards: Bread Loaf Writers Conference award, 1933; Schomburg Race Relations award, 1944; Newspaper Guild award, 1947; Jewish Book Council of America award, 1948; Stalin International Peace prize, 1954; Screenwriters award, 1960; National Association of Independent Schools, award, 1962; Emmy award, for television play, 1976. Agent: Sterling Lord Literistic Inc., 1 Madison Avenue, New York, New York 10010, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

Two Valleys. New York, Dial Press, 1933; London, Dickson, 1934. Strange Yesterday. New York, Dodd Mead, 1934.

Place in the City. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1937.

Conceived in Liberty: A Novel of Valley Forge. New York, Simon and Schuster, and London, Joseph, 1939.

The Last Frontier. New York, Duell, 1941; London, Lane, 1948. The Unvanquished. New York, Duell, 1942; London, Lane, 1947. The Tall Hunter. New York, Harper, 1942.

Citizen Tom Paine. New York, Duell, 1943; London, Lane, 1946. Freedom Road. New York, Duell, 1944; London, Lane, 1946.

The American: A Middle Western Legend. New York, Duell, 1946; London, Lane, 1949.

The Children. New York, Duell, 1947.

Clarkton. New York, Duell, 1947.

My Glorious Brothers. Boston, Little Brown, 1948; London, Lane, 1950.

The Proud and the Free. Boston, Little Brown, 1950; London, Lane, 1952.

Spartacus. Privately printed, 1951; London, Lane, 1952.

Fallen Angel (as Walter Ericson). Boston, Little Brown, 1952; as The Darkness Within, New York, Ace, 1953; as Mirage (as Howard Fast), New York, Fawcett, 1965.

Silas Timberman. New York, Blue Heron Press, 1954; London, Lane, 1955.

The Story of Lola Gregg. New York, Blue Heron Press, 1956; London, Lane, 1957.

Moses, Prince of Egypt. New York, Crown, 1958; London, Methuen, 1959.

The Winston Affair. New York, Crown, 1959; London, Methuen, 1960.

The Golden River, in The Howard Fast Reader. New York, Crown, 1960

April Morning. New York, Crown, and London, Methuen, 1961.

Power. New York, Doubleday, 1962; London, Methuen, 1963.

Agrippa's Daughter. New York, Doubleday, 1964; London, Methuen, 1965.

Torquemada. New York, Doubleday, 1966; London, Methuen, 1967. The Hunter and the Trap. New York, Dial Press, 1967.

The Crossing. New York, Morrow, 1971; London, Eyre Methuen, 1972.

The Hessian. New York, Morrow, 1972; London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1973.

The Call of Fife and Drum: Three Novels of the Revolution. Secaucus, New Jersey, Citadel Press, 1987.

The Bridge Builder's Story. Armonk, New York, M. E. Sharpe, 1995. An Independent Woman. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1997.

Redemption. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1999.

The Immigrants:

The Immigrants. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1977; London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1978.

Second Generation. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1978.

The Establishment. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1979; London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1980.

The Legacy. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1981.

Max. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1982; London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1983.

The Outsider. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1984; London, Hodder and Stoughton 1985.

The Immigrant's Daughter. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1985; London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1986.

The Dinner Party. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, and London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1987.

The Pledge. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1988; London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1989.

The Confession of Joe Cullen. Boston, Houghton Mifflin 1989; London, Hodder and Stoughton, 1990.

The Trial of Abigail Goodman. New York, Crown, 1993.

Seven Days in June. New York, Crown, 1994.

Novels as E.V. Cunningham

Sylvia. New York, Doubleday, 1960; London, Deutsch, 1962. Phyllis. New York, Doubleday, and London, Deutsch, 1962. Alice. New York, Doubleday, 1963; London, Deutsch, 1965. Lydia. New York, Doubleday, 1964; London, Deutsch, 1965. Shirley. New York, Doubleday, and London, Deutsch, 1964. Penelope. New York, Doubleday, 1965; London, Deutsch, 1966. Helen. New York, Doubleday, 1966; London, Deutsch, 1967. Margie. New York, Morrow, 1966; London, Deutsch, 1968. Sally. New York, Morrow, and London, Deutsch, 1967. Samantha. New York, Morrow, 1967; London, Deutsch, 1968; as The Samantha. New York, Morrow, 1967; London, Deutsch, 1968; as The Case of the Angry Actress, New York, Dell, 1984.

Cynthia. New York, Morrow, 1968; London, Deutsch, 1969.

The Assassin Who Gave Up His Gun. New York, Morrow, 1969; London, Deutsch, 1970.

Millie. New York, Morrow, 1973; London, Deutsch, 1975.

The Case of the One-Penny Orange. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1977; London, Deutsch, 1978.

The Case of the Russian Diplomat. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1978; London, Deutsch, 1979.

The Case of the Poisoned Eclairs. New York, Holt Rinehart, 1979; London, Deutsch, 1980.

The Case of the Sliding Pool. New York, Delacorte Press, 1981; London, Gollancz, 1982.

The Case of the Kidnapped Angel. New York, Delacorte Press, 1982; London, Gollancz, 1983.

The Case of the Murdered Mackenzie. New York, Delacorte Press, 1984; London, Gollancz, 1985.

The Wabash Factor. New York, Delacorte Press, 1986; London, Gollancz, 1987.

Plays

The Hammer (produced New York, 1950).

Thirty Pieces of Silver (produced Melbourne, 1951). New York, Blue Heron Press, and London, Lane, 1954.

General Washington and the Water Witch. London, Lane, 1956.

The Crossing (produced Dallas, 1962).

The Hill (screenplay). New York, Doubleday, 1964.

David and Paula (produced New York, 1982).

Citizen Tom Paine, adaptation of his own novel (produced Williamstown, Massachusetts, 1985). Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1986.

The Novelist (produced Williamstown, Massachusetts, 1987). The Second Coming (produced Greenwich, Connecticut, 1991).

Screenplays: The Hessian, 1971.

Television Plays: What's a Nice Girl Like You ...?, 1971; The Ambassador (Benjamin Franklin series), 1974; 21 Hours at Munich, with Edward Hume, 1976.

Poetry

Never to Forget the Battle of the Warsaw Ghetto, with William Gropper. New York, Jewish Peoples Fraternal Order, 1946. Korean Lullaby. New York, American Peace Crusade, n.d.

Other

The Romance of a People (for children). New York, Hebrew Publishing Company, 1941.

Lord Baden-Powell of the Boy Scouts. New York, Messner, 1941. Haym Salomon, Son of Liberty. New York, Messner, 1941.

The Picture-Book History of the Jews, with Bette Fast. New York, Hebrew Publishing Company, 1942.

Goethals and the Panama Canal. New York, Messner, 1942.

The Incredible Tito. New York, Magazine House, 1944.

Intellectuals in the Fight for Peace. New York, Masses and Mainstream, 1949.

Tito and His People. Winnipeg, Contemporary Publishers, 1950.

Literature and Reality. New York, International Publishers, 1950.

Peekskill, U.S.A.: A Personal Experience. New York, Civil Rights Congress, and London, International Publishing Company, 1951.

Tony and the Wonderful Door (for children). New York, Blue Heron Press, 1952; as The Magic Door, Culver City, California, Peace Press, 1979.

Spain and Peace. New York, Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee, 1952.

The Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti: A New England Legend. New York, Blue Heron Press, 1953; London, Lane, 1954.

The Naked God: The Writer and the Communist Party. New York, Praeger, 1957; London, Bodley Head, 1958.

The Howard Fast Reader. New York, Crown, 1960.

The Jews: Story of a People. New York, Dial Press, 1968; London, Cassell, 1970.

The Art of Zen Meditation. Culver City, California, Peace Press, 1977. Time and the Riddle: Thirty Zen Stories. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1981.

Being Red: A Memoir. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1990.

War and Peace. Armonk, New York, Sharpe, 1992.

The Sculpture of Bette Fast. Armonk, New York, Sharpe, 1995.

Editor, The Selected Work of Tom Paine. New York, Modern Library, 1946; London, Lane, 1948.

Editor, The Best Short Stories of Theodore Dreiser. Cleveland, World, 1947.

*

Manuscript Collections: University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia; University of Wisconsin, Madison.

Critical Studies: History and Conscience: The Case of Howard Fast by Hershel D. Meyer, Princeton, New Jersey, Anvil Atlas, 1958; Counterpoint by Roy Newquist, New York, Rand McNally, 1964; Howard Fast: A Critical Companion by Andrew Macdonald. Westport, Connecticut, Greenwood Press, 1996.

Howard Fast comments:

(1972) From the very beginning of my career as a writer, my outlook has been teleological. Since my first work was published at a very early age—my first novel at the age of eighteen—my philosophical position was naturally uncertain and in formation. Yet the seeds were there, and by the end of my first decade as a writer, I had clearly shaped my point of view. In the light of this, both my historical and modern novels (excepting the entertainments I have written under the name of Cunningham) were conceived as parables and executed as narratives of pace and, hopefully, excitement. I discovered that I had a gift for narrative in the story sense; but I tried never to serve the story, but rather to have it serve my own purpose—a purpose which I attempted in a transcendental sense.

In other words, I was—and am—intrigued by the apparent lunacy of man's experience on earth; but at the same time never accepted a pessimistic conclusion or a mechanical explanation. Thereby, my books were either examinations of moments or parables of my own view of history. As a deeply religious person who has always believed that human life is a meaningful part of a meaningful and incredibly wonderful universe, I found myself at every stage in my career a bit out of step with the current literary movement or fashion. I suppose that this could not have been otherwise, and I think I have been the most astounded of any at the vast audiences my work has reached.

Since I also believe that a person's philosophical point of view has little meaning if it is not matched by being and action, I found myself willingly wed to an endless series of unpopular causes, experiences which I feel enriched my writing as much as they depleted other aspects of my life. I might add that the more I have developed the parable as a form of literature, the more convinced I become that truth is better indicated than specified.

All of the above is of course not a critical evaluation of my work; and I feel that a writer is the last person on earth capable of judging his own work as literature with any objectivity. The moment I cease to feel that I am a good writer, I will have to stop writing. And while this may be no loss to literature, it would be a tragic blow to my income.

As for the books I have written under the name of E.V. Cunningham, they are entertainments, for myself primarily and for all others who care to read them. They are also my own small contribution to that wonderful cause of women's liberation. They are all about wise and brave and gallant women, and while they are suspense and mystery stories, they are also parables in their own way.

* * *

Howard Fast has written in virtually every genre—novels, plays, poems, filmscripts, critical essays and short stories—and in a number of subgenres of fiction, including science fiction, social satire, historical and contemporary novels, spy thrillers, and moral allegories. He began publishing novels at the age of eighteen and has kept up a brisk pace of production.

His strongest fictional gifts are a talent for swift, interesting narrative, the vivid portrayal of scenes of action, especially of violence, and an uncluttered style only occasionally marred by sentimental lapses. Although he became identified in the 1940s as a publicist for the Communist Party line, his novels reveal an intensely emotional and religious nature which eventually clashed with his leftwing allegiances. His ideals reflect a curious compound of slumculture courage, Jewish concern for social justice, self-taught history, Cold-war Stalinism and, in his later years, Zen Buddhism. His entire literary career embodies his deepest beliefs: that life has moral significance, that the writer must be socially committed, that literature should take sides.

After two youthful blood-and-thunder romances, Fast found his métier in a series of class-conscious historical novels of the American Revolution. Conceived in Liberty heralded the loyalty of the common soldier; The Unvanquished celebrated the dogged persistence of George Washington (despite his aristocracy and wealth, Fast's favorite hero); and Citizen Tom Paine glorified our first professional revolutionary. Fast then championed anonymous heroes of other races: The Last Frontier is a spare but moving account of the heroic flight in 1878 of the Cheyenne Indians to their Powder River home in Wyoming; Freedom Road recounts the amazing social experiments of black Southern legislatures in the Reconstruction era. The best selling of the popular novels of the early 1940s, Freedom Road shows great power in its scenes of violent conflict but it is melodramatic and tendentious. By contrast, the poetically evocative Last Frontier, perhaps his best novel, enlists profound sympathy through great control and objectivity, and evades the pitfalls of "noble redskin" sentimentality.

In 1946 The American detailed the rise and fall of Illinois Governor John Peter Altgeld, who was politically defeated after he pardoned three anarchists convicted of bomb-throwing in Haymarket Square in 1886. Although Fast's novels had reflected Marxist thought since his youthful conversion to socialism, his propagandizing became too obtrusive with Clarkton in 1947. This proletarian strike novel of life in the Massachusetts textile mills revealed his inability to maintain the necessary distance to interpret contemporary events soundly. He returned in 1948 to the historical novel with My Glorious Brothers, a stirring account of the Maccabees and the thirty-year Jewish resistance to Greek-Syrian tyranny. This success was duplicated with Spartacus, the largely imagined story of the gladiatorial revolt against Rome in 71 BC. Spartacus was self-published in 1951 after the author was blacklisted for Communist activities and had spent three months in federal prison for contempt of Congress. But, predictably, Fast's other works of the early 1950s were failures in proportion to their nearness to the present day: The Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti recounted sentimentally the last hours of the doomed Italian anarchists; Silas Timberman depicted an academic victim of a McCarthyite witchhunt; and The Story of Lola Gregg described the FBI pursuit and capture of an heroic Communist labor leader. These self-published works of imprisoned martyrs, abounding in Christfigures and symbolic Judases, reflect their author's bitter sense of entrapment and isolation, for he could neither publish with established houses nor leave the country.

In 1957 Fast publicly quit the Communist Party after the Hungarian revolution and then described his tortured apostasy in The Naked God. He soon revisited Jewish history as a favored novelistic subject with Moses, Prince of Egypt; Agrippa's Daughter, and Torquemada. He returned, with a more mature vision, thrice more to the American revolution in April Morning, The Crossing, and The Hessian. In other historical novels he continued to re-examine earlier themes: The Winston Affair deals with the court-martial of an American murderer, homosexual and anti-Semite who nevertheless deserves and wins justice in a military court, while Power shows the corruption by power by a John L. Lewis-type of labor leader: Agrippa's Daugther rejects the "just-war" theory of My Glorious Brothers in favor of Rabbi Hillel's pacifism.

Most readers saw Fast in two new guises (or disguises), as author of science-fiction stories and as a writer of "entertainments" in the manner of Graham Greene. These late science fiction or "Zen stories" include stories in The Edge of Tomorrow, The Hunter and the Trap and The General Zapped an Angel (late gathered into one volume, Time and the Riddle). The dozen or so "entertainments" are written under the pseudonym E.V. Cunningham, most built around the female title characters. Both the science fiction and the Cunningham novels criticize American institutions and values with wit and humor, and all show the deft hand of the professional storyteller at work. A newer series of Cunningham thrillers stars Masao Masuto, a Japanese-American detective of the Beverly Hills Police Department and a Zen Buddhist. In these, character holds the main appeal, especially that of family-man Masuto.

More recently, Fast has achieved repeated bestsellerdom with an immigrant-saga that has grown to several large novels, starting with The Immigrants and including, The Immigrant's Daughter. These volumes trace the Italian, Dan Lavette, and his family while newly arrived Italians, Jews, Orientals, and others struggle against the entrenched wealth and prejudice of old-line Americans. Beginning with the San Francisco earthquake of 1906, the series energetically sweeps across twentieth-century American history and recent world events. No longer ax-grinding, Fast uses well his own rich experiences for the first time, and he is at the top of his admirable narrative form.

-Frank Campenni

FAULKS, Sebastian

Nationality: British. Born: Newbury, 20 April 1953. Education: Wellington College; Emmanuel College, Cambridge, 1974, B.A. (honours). Family: Married Veronica Youlten in 1989; one son and one daughter. Career: Teacher of English and French, International School of London, 1975–79; journalist, Daily Telegraph, London, 1979–82; feature writer, Sunday Telegraph, 1983–86; literary editor, Independent, London, 1986–89. Since 1989 deputy editor, Independent on Sunday. Radio broadcaster, British Broadcasting Corp. Editor, New Fiction Society, 1978–81. Address: c/o Independent, 40 City Road, London E.C.1, England.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

A Trick of the Light. London, Bodley Head, 1984.

The Girl at the Lion d'Or. London, Hutchinson, 1989; New York, Vintage, 1999.

A Fool's Alphabet. London, Hutchinson, and Boston, Little Brown, 1992.

Birdsong. London, Hutchinson, 1993.

Charlotte Gray. London, Hutchinson, 1998; New York, Random House, 1999.

Other

The Fatal Englishman: Three Short Lives. London, Hutchinson, 1996.

* * *

Although Sebastian Faulks had already published A Trick of the Light in 1984, it was his second novel, The Girl at the Lion d'Or (1989), that received attention. This novel is the first of a "French trilogy" that was published to critical acclaim. Faulks earned praise for his sensitive characterization of a love story set in 1930s France.

The small town of Janvilliers is still haunted by the First World War and uneasy with rumors about fascism and communism. At the hotel Lion d'Or, young Anne Louvet becomes a waitress. Like so many heroines of romances set against the backdrop of war, she is an orphan with a dark past.

The opening of the novel, when Anne is driven from the train to the hotel, is detailed and sets the pace and style of the prose. Everything en route is observed with the fidelity of a camera, as are the appearances and nature of the characters. Anne falls for a middle-aged lawyer, Charles Hartmann, who with his wife Christine lives in a rambling country house. Hartmann hires her to work as domestic help, and soon they start an affair.

Faulks sympathetically conveys Anne's naïveté as her past gradually unfolds. She tells Hartmann how her father, a brave soldier in the Great War, refused an order from a bullying officer and was shot. The lies and gossip about her disgraced husband were too much for Anne's mother, who took her own life.

Hartmann, who cares little for his wife or indeed for others, loses his self-absorption. As his name suggests, he learns sympathy from listening and recalling his own experiences of the war. The dominant image is of Hartmann's brooding house, with its clutter of bric-a-brac and old books, metaphors for the general malaise of France. Shoddy repairs result in the collapse of part of it, presaging the unhappy conclusion of the romantic liaison. When a troublemaker reveals their affair to Christine, Hartmann ends the relationship very abruptly, although broken-hearted. Anne has no choice but to begin life again in Paris. After many thoughts on free will and the possible circularity of destiny, she now knows that love is possible and life enriching, which makes her new wound endurable.

A Fool's Alphabet (1992) is accomplished but perhaps too contrived and inadequately characterized to succeed as memorable fiction. Pietro Russell, of partial Italian descent, searches for influences on his own personality. He decides to pass a night in various Italian towns according to the letters of the alphabet. Twenty-six chapters in alphabetical order but random chronology reveal the shaping forces on Pietro's life, such as his mother's death and his ongoing quest for love. Pietro achieves his goal with the exception of X—Xianging in China, the symbolic dream city, representing the places he can never visit.

In 1993, Faulks produced a companion novel to The Girl of Lion d'Or. Birdsong, a chronicle of the lives of three generations of an English family, topped the bestseller charts in England for over a year. Birdsong opens with a callow Stephen Wraysford lodging with a family in Amiens. Faulks describes an erotic, passionate affair between young Stephen and Isabelle, the lady of the house—an affair that led romantic reviewers to write blurb-ready copy in their appreciation of "heated passions and seething hatred," "swollen emotion, in whose heat is forged an epic kind of love," "a story so intense that at times the reader must put the book aside in order to catch her breath."

Unfortunately, Isabelle becomes pregnant and deserts Wraysford. Shocked into an emotional stupor, he joins the army in 1916, only to find himself behind German lines. Faulks's depiction of the horrors of war is graphic. No detail of deprivation, lice, filthy food, or the aroma of rotting corpses is spared, because for Faulks there is no glory in war, only horror, which has to be experienced to be understood. As a soldier, Wraysford is considered cold-hearted, and his frigidity is contrasted with the other soldiers who each cope with the daily threat of death in their individual ways. The men who dig the trenches are significant in their representation of self-reliance. For Jack Firebrace, who digs the mine tunnels under enemy lines, the conditions of war are better than his life of poverty in London. His survival of every disaster with courage, including the death of his son, makes a deep impression on Wraysford, whose suppressed feelings are freed when he is wounded and left for dead in a tunnel.

From 1910 and 1916, the novel jumps to 1978 and the point of view of Elizabeth, the daughter of the child he had with Isabelle. Elizabeth desires to research her family, and after discovering her grandfather's coded diaries, she translates them and learns the truth of his scandalous affair, the torments of trench warfare, and the happiness he eventually finds. While decoding his story, she diagnoses her own life as lacking in the intensity that earlier generations had experienced.

Wraysford's conclusion that the meaning of life is the continuity of human love is metaphorically represented by the exuberant birdsong of the title, the twittering of birds that starts when the gunfire stops, and which echoes through to the epilogue. Faulks accentuates his belief in redeeming the past when Elizabeth's baby, the fourth generation, is born in a symphony of rapture as the living proof of goodness from past tragedy.

In 1995, Faulks was recognized as Author of the Year by the British Book Awards for Birdsong. The following year, the novel was nominated for the 1996 International IMPAC Dublin Literary Award; and in 1997, a television and bookshop poll among British readers placed it in their top fifty books of the century. A nonfiction work, The Fatal Englishman: Three Short Lives (1996), was another best-seller; it dealt with three young men, all heroic in their own ways, whose lives were tragically cut short.

Faulks returned to war-torn Europe—this time during World War II—with a third romantic best-seller, Charlotte Gray (1999). Again Faulks examines the insidious way that war affects individual lives. In 1942, Charlotte Gray, a young Scotswoman, has a brief love affair with a Royal Air Force fighter pilot, Peter Gregory. When his plane is lost on a mission to France, she arranges to go there herself as a British secret courier, sent over to help support the French Resistance against the invading Germans. Intensifying the suspense, Faulks shows that British intelligence is prepared to sacrifice her if necessary. Instead of returning to England when the undercover assignment is accomplished, Charlotte stays in France to search for Gregory.

In the small town of Lavaurette, Charlotte befriends some assimilated French Jews—the orphans André and Jacob, whose parents have been murdered in the death camps, and the Levades, father and son, who lead the local resistance. Once there, she witnesses the ugliness of French collusion with the Nazis, but also the tremendous courage of those who fought and died for the Resistance. Though unable to help the French in any serious way, Charlotte gains insights into herself and her family through living with them—and growing increasingly attracted to idealistic young Julien Levade. Faulks draws metaphorical links between the struggle for France and Charlotte's own struggles to take control of her life.

Reviewers complained that Faulks did not achieve the emotional impact in Charlotte Gray that he did in Birdsong, that the settings and physical props are more believable than the somewhat flat characters, that he too often dips into old-fashioned melodrama. However, his fans loved the book, and like the previous novel, it was nominated for the International IMPAC Dublin Literary Award in 1999.

Faulks's early career as a journalist provides his greatest strength, his masterful skill at detailed description and historical accuracy. To evoke each of the senses, his settings are gritty with the realism conveyed by the mind-shattering sights of war, the precious touch of a lover's skin, the stench of the decomposing dead, the taste of the carefully described meals eaten by the wealthy or the starving. Such verisimilitudinous detail enhances Faulks's power and credibility as a story-teller.

In Faulks's fiction, love and heroism are the two most important and valuable qualities of life, and each strengthens the other. Another recurring theme is the human capacity for hope beyond reason. Faulks calls himself a romantic writer and admits that his influences are ''old-fashioned.'' Among these influences he lists the French writers Gustave Flaubert, Marcel Proust, and Emile Zola. When it supports the physical and historical settings, he employs long sentences to convey a highly formal and stifling atmosphere. This elevated diction matches his grand themes about human experience, about the healing powers of love and the determination to survive despite tremendous pain and horror. Like William Faulkner's, the heroism of Faulks's characters is that they endure.

-Geoffrey Elborn, updated by Fiona Kelleghan

FAUST, Irvin

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 11 June 1924. Education: City College of New York, B.S. 1949; Columbia University, New York, M.A. 1952, D.Ed. 1960. Military Service: Served in the United States Army, 1943–46. Family: Married Jean Satterthwaite in 1959. Career: Teacher, Manhattanville Junior High School, New York, 1949–53; guidance counselor, Lynbrook High School, Long Island, 1956–60. Since 1960 director of Guidance and Counselling, Garden City High School, Long Island. Taught at Columbia University, Summer 1963, New School for Social Research, New York, 1975, Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania, 1976, City College, 1977, and University of Rochester, New York, Summer 1978. Awards: O. Henry prize, 1983 and 1986; Charles Angoff award, for fiction, 1994. Agent: Gloria Loomis, Watkins Loomis Agency Inc., 150 East 35th Street, New York, New York 10016. Address: 417 Riverside Drive, New York, New York 10025, U.S.A.

PUBLICATIONS

Novels

The Steagle. New York, Random House, 1966.
The File on Stanley Patton Buchta. New York, Random House, 1970.
Willy Remembers. New York, Arbor House, 1971.
Foreign Devils. New York, Arbor House, 1973.
A Star in the Family. New York, Doubleday, 1975.
Newsreel. New York, Harcourt Brace, 1980.
Jim Dandy. New York, Carroll and Graf, 1994.

Short Stories

Roar Lion Roar and Other Stories. New York, Random House, and London, Gollancz, 1965.

The Year of the Hot Jock and Other Stories. New York, Dutton, 1985.

Uncollected Short Stories

- "Action at Vicksburg," in New Black Mask (Orlando, Florida), Fall 1985.
- "Artie and Benny," in Michigan Quarterly Review (Ann Arbor), Spring 1989.
- "Let Me Off Uptown," in Fiction (New York), 1991.
- "Black Auxiliaries," in The Literary Review (Madison, New Jersey), Summer 1994.

Other

Entering Angel's World: A Student-Centered Casebook. New York, Columbia Teachers College Press, 1963.

*

Critical Studies: By Richard Kostelanetz, in The New American Arts, New York, Horizon Press, 1965, in Tri-Quarterly (Evanston, Illinois), Winter 1967, and in On Contemporary Literature, New York, Avon, 1967; by R.V. Cassill, in New York Times Book Review, 29 August 1971; interview with Matthew Bruccoli, in Conversations with Writers 2, Detroit, Gale, 1978; by Martin Tucker in Confrontation (Brookville, New York), Fall 1994.

Irvin Faust comments:

(1972) It seems to me that thus far my work has dealt with the displacement and disorganization of Americans in urban life; with their attempt to find adjustments in the glossy attractions of the mass media—movies, radio, TV, advertising, etc.—and in the imageradiating seductions of our institutions—colleges, sports teams, etc. Very often this "adjustment" is to the "normal" perception a derangement, but perfectly satisfying to my subjects.

Recently my work has moved out to include suburban America and also back in historical directions. My characters to this date have been outside of the white anglo-saxon milieu, but have included Jews, Blacks, Puerto Ricans and the so-called Ethnic Americans.

Both Roar Lion Roar and The Steagle were published in France (Gallimard) and I feel the reviews were most perceptive, leading me to muse that perhaps, unbeknownst to me, I am quite close to the French literary sensibility.

(1995) Jim Dandy continues my exploration of the psychology and actuality of wars since 1898. This time I've dug into the Italo-Ethiopian conflict of 1936, which pre-figured World War II. We are still living with its ramifications, and fiction helps us to understand these relationships.

* * *

In his novels and short stories, Irvin Faust has attempted (as he said of one novel), "to show the rise and fall of this nation over the last forty years." Were this all, he would be essentially a social historian disguised as fictional chronicler of our times. Faust, however, has managed to weave together a substantial number of additional themes, drawing upon his background as Jew, New Yorker, veteran, husband, and professional guidance counselor. The integration of these materials, when successful, produces a rich tapestry of life in contemporary urban America, especially when played off against the past, both mythicized and actual.

